Ebionites (Heb., "poor men"), an ascetic sect of Jewish Christians, who took their name from the beatitude on "the poor in spirit" (Matt 5:3; Luke 4:18; 7:22). In their view, Jesus was a human being who lived the Jewish law to perfection because of the descent of the Holy Spirit upon him at his baptism. He was, therefore, the Messiah, the new Moses, who showed the real meaning of the law. Because the Ebionites believed in the permanent validity of the Mosaic law, they opposed Paul's ministry to the uncircumcised. They discredited Paul by denying that he had a vision of the risen Christ. Living a simple, communal life east of the Jordan for two hundred years after Jesus, they practiced ritual ablutions and baptism. Their relationship to other sects (e.g., the Nazarenes and the Essenes) remains unclear. See also Adoptionism.

Ecclesia discens (e-klay'zee-ah di'shenz; Lat., "the learning Church"), a term traditionally used by Roman Catholic authors for the laity and sometimes the lower clergy, contrasted with the Ecclesia docens, "the teaching Church," which applied exclusively to the hierarchy, and sometimes to the clergy as well. The division, which in large measure can be explained historically, was often approached polemically, artificially elevating the hierarchy and the clergy and downgrading the laity. The Second Vatican Council (1962–65) effectively set aside the distinction by claiming that the Church is the whole People of God, by insisting that every person has a responsibility to proclaim the gospel, and by accenting the importance of consultation and reception. See also Ecclesia docens; magisterium; reception of doctrine.

Ecclesia docens (e-klay'zee-ah doh'chenz; Lat., "the teaching Church"), a term traditionally used by Roman Catholic authors for the hierarchy and sometimes all the clergy, contrasted with the Ecclesia discens, "the learning Church," which applied exclusively to the laity, and sometimes to the lower clergy as well. The distinction was often interpreted in an artificial sense, as if the clergy was never in a position to learn and the laity was never in a position to teach. The Second Vatican Council (1962–

65) supplanted the distinction by identifying the Church as the whole People of God, by giving the laity a constitutive role in the spreading of the gospel, and by recognizing the importance of reception and consultation. See also Ecclesia discens; magisterium.

Ecclesiam Suam (ek-klay'zee-am soo'am; Lat., "His Church"), first encyclical of Pope Paul VI, issued on August 6, 1964. The document proposes "three thoughts" about the Church: that it "should deepen its consciousness of itself," that it should be ready to correct its own defects through reform, and that it should be marked by the spirit and practice of dialogue. The encyclical outlines the terms of the dialogue by situating the Church of Rome at the center of a series of concentric circles: the first and widest comprises the whole human community; the second circle embraces all religious people; the third, all Christians; and the fourth, all Catholics.

ecclesiastical person, a person subject to canon law. There are two types of ecclesiastical person: the first is a physical person, i.e., a human person baptized into the Catholic Church or received into it after Baptism. The second is a juridical person, i.e., some aggregate of being or of things that, by the law or by special act of competent authority, is recognized as an ecclesiastical person and so can be the subject of rights and obligations, e.g., a parish, diocese, or religious institute.

ecclesiastical province. See province.

ecclesiology, the theological study of the Church. Although it did not formally begin as a coherent subdiscipline in theology until the conciliarist controversies of the early thirteenth century, there are ecclesiologies already in the NT. For example, Ephesians and Colossians present the Church as the body and the bride of Christ; Luke-Acts, as the community of the Holy Spirit; and the Johannine books, as a community of equal disciples. Matthew emphasizes the role of Peter.

In the fourth and fifth centuries the theologians of the East stressed the Church's oneness in Christ achieved through the power of the Holy Spirit as well as its eschatological, or otherworldly, dimension, expressed in the Eucharist; the West, confronting heresies like Donatism, had to focus more on juridical questions such as the validity of the sacraments. The Western emphasis on papal authority and the hierarchical structure of the Church intensified in the Middle Ages, especially during the conciliarist controversies, the Reformation, and the Counter-Reformation. Robert Bellarmine (1542–1621) exercised the dominant influence over Catholic ecclesiology from this period until Vatican II (1962–65).

The council brought about a convergence of Western and Eastern ecclesiologies by emphasizing, for example, the sacramentality of the Church and the role of the bishops within a collegial rather than a monarchical structure of governance. The council also served as a corrective to Bellarmine with its teaching on the Church as mystery and as People of God. By the mid-twentieth century Yves Congar had replaced Bellarmine as the Church's premier ecclesiologist. See also Bellarmine, St. Robert; Church; Congar, Yves.

RICHARD P. MCBRIEN

Eck, John, 1486–1543, theologian and Martin Luther's principal Catholic opponent. Eck debated Luther at Leipzig (1519) and helped confute the Augsburg Confession (1530). His defense of Catholicism, the Enchiridion, had ninety editions. See also Luther, Martin.

Eckhart, Meister, ca. 1260–ca. 1328, Dominican theologian and spiritual writer. Born in Thuringia, Eckhart entered the Dominican order ca. 1275, studied in Paris and Cologne, held various administrative positions within his order, and on two separate occasions occupied a magisterial chair of theology at the University of Paris. He later spent about ten years in Strasbourg and in 1323 was named spiritual director and professor at the Dominican Studium Generale in Cologne. The bold phrasing of many of his sermons and treatises led the archbishop of that city to begin inquisitorial proceedings against him early in 1326. A year later Eckhart denounced that investigation and appealed to the pope at Avignon but died sometime before the publication of the papal bull In Agro Dominico (1329), which condemned a number of his statements as heretical or suspect of heresy.

A key distinction for understanding Eckhart's thought is one between our "formal being" (Lat., esse formale) and our "virtual being" (esse virtuale). The former refers to our existence as creatures in space and time; from this perspective Eckhart regularly draws the sharpest possible contrast between creatures and God. However, we also have a virtual being, which has been (or rather "is") in God from all eternity; in virtue of it we are utterly one with God, without distinction. In large measure, Eckhart sought to defend himself against his opponents by insisting that they were interpreting from the standpoint of creaturehood and time what he had meant from the standpoint of eternity. Not surprisingly, diverse interpretations of and judgments about his work continue to this day. See also Dominican spirituality.

JAMES WISEMAN

École Biblique (Fr., "Biblical School"), French Dominican biblical and archaeological graduate school in Jerusalem. It was founded in 1890 by Father Marie-Joseph Lagrange and was recognized by the French government in 1920 as its archaeological school in Jerusalem. In 1982 the school was accredited by the Vatican to grant the doctorate in Sacred Scripture. Since 1892 it has published the Revue Biblique (Fr., "Biblical Review"), a series of longer works called Études Bibliques (Fr., "Biblical Studies"), and a series of shorter works called Cahiers de la Revue Biblique (Fr., "Studies of the Biblical Review"). Early on it acquired a good reputation for its decipherment of Semitic and Greek inscriptions and for its series of archaeological publications on the major sites of the Holy Land, especially Jerusalem. Later it undertook excavations at Tirza, Qumran, Keisan, and in Jordan. For its pioneering of a moderately critical approach to the Bible, it has won worldwide respect, but had to suffer a period of ecclesiastical suspicion (1907–43). It was the first resident archaeological school in Jerusalem, but was soon imitated by others. It was also the first Catholic school of modern higher biblical studies and was thus influential throughout the Catholic world. See also Revue Biblique.

ecology, moral aspects of, ethical concerns related to the interrelationship of organisms and their environment. The moral aspects of ecology are seen in the context of a larger moral crisis concerning the order and unity of creation and humanity's place within it. The relationship of humanity to the rest of creation is a long-standing concern of the Catholic tradition as seen in the thought of figures like Augustine of Hippo (d. 430), Hildegard of Bingen (d. 1179), and Francis of Assisi (d. 1226). Today our increased knowledge of ecosystems and our growing awareness of humanity's role in environmental change have also increased our moral reflection on the topic of ecology.

The moral problems related to ecology are several: (1) the indiscriminate use of advances in science and technology; (2) pollution resulting from the dominance of economic interests over other values; (3) a lack of ecological balance due to the imbalance among rich and poor in use of resources; (4) biological research that may lead to unforeseen harms; (5) war's significant ecological damages; and (6) the connection between the environment and development. This last point is characteristic of Catholic social teaching with its insistence that ecological concerns cannot be treated independently of the topic of economic development (see, e.g., Pope John Paul II's Centesimus Annus, nn. 30–43).

Catholicism relies upon several axioms when addressing these challenges: (1) the goods of the earth are to be shared by all; (2) there is a human right to live in a safe environment; (3) the diversity of life has inherent value, for it exhibits the grandeur and glory of the Creator; (4) aesthetic appreciation of the beauty of the universe is a classic path to knowledge and love of God; (5) any attempt at resolving environmental abuses must not ignore the poor, who have a right to authentic development; and (6) a new spirit of solidarity among nations is necessary to resolve issues that are global in scope.

KENNETH R. HIMES

ecology, theological aspects of, the systematic delineation of specifically religious reasons for caring about the welfare of nonhuman nature. Concern for nature's integrity has not been a special area of concern throughout most of Christian history. Several prominent environmentalists have chastised Christianity and other faiths not only for failing to address the ecological crisis but also for some complicity in bringing it about. Ecological theology seeks to retrieve from tradition those resources relevant to the alleviation of contemporary threats to the earth's ecosystems.

Only recently have Catholic leaders, following the example of the World Council of Churches, begun to address the ecological crisis. Noteworthy are the 1988 pastoral letter by the Philippine bishops, What Is Happening to Our Beautiful Land?, the World Day of Peace message by Pope John Paul II entitled The Ecological Crisis: A Common Responsibility (1990), and the U.S. Catholic bishops' statement Renewing the Earth (1992).

Ecology is becoming a major issue in theology. Some suspicion about theology's focusing so explicitly on the state of the natural world came initially from economically impoverished countries, where some Christians voiced their fear that too much attention to ecological problems could distract theology from its task of promoting the liberation of socially and economically oppressed peoples. Now, churches and theologians are acknowledging the inseparable connection between poverty and ecological degradation. Issues of justice can no longer be treated separately from concern for the survival of the many complex and interdependent layers of life on our planet.

Ecology and Creation: Catholicism shares with the wider Christian world a sense of obedience to the biblical charge that we remain faithful stewards of God's creation. Likewise it bases its ecological outlook on the Psalms' exaltation of God's handiwork, the biblical theologies of creation, the wisdom literature, John's incarnational theology, and Paul's cosmic Christology, all of which entail a holistic vision of nature and its goodness. The Catholic tradition also has conspicuous ecological authority in the practices of Francis of Assisi (d. 1226), Benedict of Nursia (d. ca. 550), and many others who have encouraged a moderate, nonexploitive attitude toward nature. However, many critics still wonder whether, in spite of these positive features, Catholic Christianity has a sufficiently deep interest in the cause of conservation. At times the faith has been interpreted in such otherworldly terms that the present natural order seems insignificant except perhaps as a stage for the drama of salvation to be consummated elsewhere. The Christian sense of exile here has been unfortunately misinterpreted as an excuse for not caring for the earth as our home. In modern times, a one-sided preoccupation with salvation history and with God-human relationships has drawn theology's attention away from the earth-human connection.

On the other hand, Catholicism has always emphasized the sacramentality of creation, a feature that implicitly affirms nature's intrinsic value. All sacramental religions hold that the sacred mystery is disclosed primarily through symbols or "sacraments." In many religious traditions aspects of nature such as clean water, bright light, fertile soil, fresh air, and the fertility of living beings have given humans symbolic access to a sacred presence. In its worship and theology Catholicism enthusiastically embraces not only the revelatory word of God, but also this sacramental character of religion with its implied obligation of respect for the wholeness of nature. God is made known through the mediation of components of nature (such as water, life, and light) or elements close to nature (e.g., bread and wine) that have been shaped by the "work of human hands." Consequently, at least in principle, Catholic faith has a very special interest in the conservation of nature. As the American theologian Thomas Berry has observed, if we lose the environment we will lose our sense of God as well.

Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) also illustrates this sacramental vision when he states that the goodness of God cannot be manifested in any one creature; thus God created a multiplicity of beings so that in the manifestation of the divine goodness what was lacking in one could be supplied by another (Summa Theologiae 1.48.2). In the 1990s, ecologically sensitive theologians emphasize that preserving natural diversity contributes to the coming of God's reign which is partially shaped not only through the practice of social justice and love, but also through the maintenance of nature's richness and integrity.

Theology's gradual appropriation of evolutionary ideas also contributes to the conviction that human life shares a common ancestry with plants and animals and that the destiny of the cosmos is inseparable from our own. Awareness of evolution can foster an ecologically positive sense of kinship, interdependency, and communion and at the same time give a more cosmic scope to biblical and traditional images of hope. See also creation; creation-centered spirituality.

Bibliography

Berry, Thomas. The Dream of the Earth. San Francisco: Sierra Club Books, 1988.

Birch, Charles, William Eakin, and Jay McDaniel, eds. Liberating Life: Contemporary Approaches to Ecological Theology. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1990.

McDonagh, Sean. The Greening of the Church. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1990.

JOHN F. HAUGHT

Economic Justice for All, the U.S. Catholic bishops' 1986 pastoral letter on the U.S. economy. The letter consists of five chapters. The first describes the economic setting of the United States as including both failures—for instance, the persistence of the problem of homelessness—and signs of hope—for example, the number of parents who balance work and family life. The second chapter sets out a Christian vision of economic life within which to address the realities described. Such a vision accents the dignity of persons, which is grounded in the fact that all persons are created in the image of God. Such dignity is fostered wherever persons actively participate in the life of the community. Human rights, on this account, are the minimum conditions for life in community. A society fails when it marginalizes persons from the life of the community. In the third chapter, the bishops bring this emphasis on participation to bear on the specific issues of employment, poverty, agriculture, and the global economy. The fourth chapter makes a broad proposal for a "new American experiment" where the bishops call for expanding the participatory ethos that marks American political life to include economic life as well: we best carry forward the bold experiment in democracy of the American founders by extending it to the economy. The fifth chapter returns to explicitly confessional language in urging Christians to a holiness in the modern world that reflects their commitment to the eschatological community of God's kingdom, where love and justice unite. Specifically, it reminds the Church that it must practice what it preaches about justice: "All the moral principles that govern the just operation of any economic endeavor apply to the church and its agencies and institutions; indeed the church should be exemplary" (n. 347; italics in original). See also Catholic social teachings; social justice. TODD D. WHITMORE economy, divine (Gk., oikonomia, Lat., dispensatio), the mystery of salvation and God's providential plan. Oikonomia means the law or management (nomos) of the household (oikos), thus the salvific economy is God's providential management of the household of creation, redemption, and consummation.

economics. See capitalism; Catholic social teachings; Marxism.

According to the Pauline writings, the divine economy has been hidden in the mind of God from all eternity (Eph 3:9; 1 Cor 2:7) but was revealed in Christ for the first time. The great plan of salvation described in Eph 1:3–14 begins with our election before the creation of the world, adoption as daughters and sons in Jesus Christ, redemption through the blood of the cross, forgiveness of sins, and the final consummation of all things in Christ. This mystery of the economy is a plan set out for the fullness of time, and all who believe in Christ are sealed with the Holy Spirit.

Economy has the related meaning of stewardship; Paul refers to himself as a steward (oikonomos) of the mysteries of God (1 Cor 4:1; Col 1:25); he has a commission to preach the gospel (1 Cor 9:17). In the pastoral Letters the bishop is called God's steward (oikonomos; Titus 1:7).

In the pre-Nicene period of the Church, economy generally meant the saving dispensation by which God redeems all things through Christ. Gradually economy took on the restricted meaning of the Incarnation of Christ, in contrast to "theology" (theologia), meaning the hidden mystery of God. In connection with early trinitarian theology, economy meant the "distribution" of the Godhead among the divine Persons. See also creation; redemption; salvation. CATHERINE M. LACUGNA economy, principle of, a term used by Orthodox churches for the basis on which the Church's authority grants a departure from strict conformity with a canonical norm in particular cases. It closely resembles the use of dispensation in the Catholic Church, which is the relaxation of an ecclesiastical law granted in a particular case when the spiritual good of the faithful requires it.

The principle of economy is invoked to resolve a number of difficult situations. For example, it is in virtue of economy that the Orthodox Church may recognize the validity of sacraments administered by non-Orthodox Christians. It is economy that permits church authorities to show leniency toward second and third marriages and allows people to have a second chance even after divorce. The principle also allows Church authorities to declare that certain laws are no longer binding even though they may not have been formally abrogated. See also dispensation.

ecstasy (Gk., ekstasis, "to stand outside oneself"), in the Christian mystical tradition, the suspension of internal and/or external sense activity as a result of being in the presence of or in union with the divine. The physical phenomena associated with mystical ecstasy are the result of the weakness of the human person coming under the influence of the Holy Spirit and are not an indication in themselves of holiness, since these phenomena can have many causes. These experiences are transient and cease when the spiritual life has become strong enough to host the divine presence. Teresa of Ávila (d. 1582) offers the traditional Christian discernment of mystical experience and phenomena: love of God revealed through love of neighbor. Teresa of Ávila, in the fourth mansions (introduction) and sixth mansions of The Interior Castle, her Life (20.1), and Spiritual Testimony (59), sorts out the various ways that ecstatic mystical prayer manifests itself, e.g., rapture, wound of love, flight of the spirit, sleep of faculties, etc. Teresa sees these and other ecstatic experiences as essentially the same and only perceptually distinct. See also mysticism; Teresa of Ávila, St.

ECUMENICAL COUNCILS

There have been twenty-one ecumenical councils recognized by the Catholic Church. Each council is listed in this table with the year or years in which it was held and a brief summary of its most important teachings or decrees. Separate entries on all twenty-one councils (e.g., "Nicaea, First Council of") appear elsewhere in the encyclopedia, although some individual councils are included in clustered entries, i.e., the five Lateran councils and the four councils of Constantinople.

1. FIRST COUNCIL OF NICAEA 325	The council taught against Arianism that the Son is of the same divine substance (Gk., homoousios) as the Father. Arianism held that the Son is the greatest of creatures, but not himself divine.
2. FIRST COUNCIL OF CONSTANTINOPLE 381	The council ratified the teaching of the First Council of Nicaea and condemned Apollinarianism, which held that Christ was fully divine but not fully human, since he lacked a human spirit. The Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed recited today at the Eucharist is traditionally associated with this council.
3. COUNCIL OF EPHESUS 431	The council condemned Nestorianism, which held that there are two persons in Christ, one divine and one human. As such, Mary is the mother of Christ, but not the Mother of God. The council affirmed that she is also the Mother of God (Gk., Theotokos), because in Christ there is only one divine Person.
4. COUNCIL OF CHALCEDON 451	The council condemned Monophysitism, which held that in Christ there is only one divine nature. The Chalcedonian definition taught that in Christ there are two natures, one divine and one human, hypostatically united in one divine Person. The definition remains the doctrinal framework for Christology today.
5. SECOND COUNCIL OF CONSTANTINOPLE 553	In order to placate the Monophysites, the council, at the instigation of the emperor Justinian, condemned the Three Chapters of Theodore of Mopsuestia, Theodoret of Cyrrhus, and Ibas of Edessa, on the grounds that they were Nestorian in tone.
6. THIRD COUNCIL OF CONSTANTINOPLE 680–81	The council condemned Monothelitism, which held that in Christ there is only one divine will rather than two wills, one divine and one human. It also censured Pope Honorius as a Monothelite.
7. SECOND COUNCIL OF NICAEA 787	The council condemned iconoclasm, a movement that opposed the use of icons and other images for liturgical and devotional purposes. The council distinguished between the veneration that is appropriate for such images and the worship (Gk., latria) that belongs to God alone.

8. FOURTH COUNCIL OF CONSTANTINOPLE
869–70

This council and those following it are not recognized by the Eastern Orthodox churches. Constantinople IV upheld the Roman synod's condemnation of Photius, patriarch of Constantinople, and also established the order of precedence among patriarchates: Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem.

9. FIRST LATERAN COUNCIL
1123

The first ecumenical council held in the West. It confirmed the Concordat of Worms, which ended the controversy regarding lay investiture, i.e., the practice of lay rulers' determining appointments to ecclesiastical offices.

10. SECOND LATERAN COUNCIL
1139

The council met following an eight-year schism that had taken place at the time of Pope Innocent II's election. An antipope, Anacletus II, was elected at the same time. Upon Anacletus's death, the council annulled all of his and his followers' decisions, acts, and ordinations.

11. THIRD LATERAN COUNCIL
1179

The council ended a schism created by the election of an antipope, supported by the emperor. To avoid future problems of this sort, it decreed that a two-thirds majority of cardinals was necessary for the election of a pope, a rule that still applies today.

12. FOURTH LATERAN COUNCIL
1215

The most important of the Lateran councils, it decreed that all Catholics must receive the sacrament of Penance at least once a year, defined the Eucharist in terms of transubstantiation, prohibited the foundation of new religious orders, and required Jews and Muslims to wear distinctive dress.

13. FIRST COUNCIL OF LYONS
1245

The council was called by Pope Innocent IV to deal with the "five wounds of the Church": the immoral lives of the clergy and faithful, the danger posed by the Saracens, the Greek schism, the invasion of Hungary by the Tartars, and the break between the Church and Emperor Frederick II, whom the council formally deposed.

14. SECOND COUNCIL OF LYONS
1274

Attended by some of the greatest figures in medieval Christendom (e.g., Albertus Magnus, Bonaventure), the council defined the double-procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son (Lat., Filioque) and forged a short-lived union between Rome and the Greek Church. Thomas Aquinas died en route to the council.

15. COUNCIL OF VIENNE
1311–12

Under pressure from the French king, Philip IV, the council condemned the Knights Templar, who were being accused of heresy and immorality by those, including Philip, who coveted their wealth. The council also decided in favor of the stricter Franciscan observance of poverty.

16. COUNCIL OF CONSTANCE
1414–18

The council was called to end the Great Western Schism, involving three separate claimants to the papal throne. It deposed John XXIII and Benedict XIII, received the abdication of Gregory XII, and conducted a conclave in which Martin V was elected.

17. COUNCIL-OF-BASEL-FERRARA-FLORENCE-ROME
1431–45

This council met in four different cities (some official lists do not include Basel). The chief object of the council was reunion with the Greek Church. The Greeks, eager for Western help against the Turks, accepted the Latin formulations on the Filioque, the Eucharist, purgatory, and papal primacy. When the Turks captured Constantinople in 1453, the union fell apart.

18. FIFTH LATERAN COUNCIL
1512–17

The council declared invalid the decrees of the Council of Pisa (1409), which deposed two claimants to the papal throne during the Great Western Schism and elected the antipope Alexander V, and the council also repudiated the Pragmatic Sanction of Bourges, issued by the French clergy in 1438, asserting the independence of the French church from papal control.

19. COUNCIL OF TRENT
1545–47, 1551–52, 1562–63

The council was held to address the challenges posed by the Protestant Reformation. It touched upon almost every major aspect of Catholic doctrine: Scripture and tradition, the Church's teaching authority, original sin, justification, and the sacraments, especially the Eucharist. Its most important disciplinary decree established seminaries for the training of clergy.

20. FIRST VATICAN COUNCIL
1869–70

The council taught papal primacy (the pope's authority over all other bishops and over the whole Church) and papal infallibility (the pope's immunity from error in defining matters of faith and morals). It also taught that faith is consistent with reason and that reason is illumined by faith, thereby condemning both rationalism (only reason can establish truth) and fideism (only faith can establish truth).

21. SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL
1962–65

An exception in the history of ecumenical councils, this council was not called to combat error or to deal with disciplinary problems. It was convoked by Pope John XXIII to update the Church and to open it up to the modern world. Its main emphases were on renewal and reform of the liturgy, the role of the laity, ecumenism, the role of the Church in the temporal order, the collegiality of bishops and the pope, religious freedom, and the saving activity of God outside the Church.

ecumenical council, an assembly (Gk., synodos; Lat., concilium) of representatives from the whole Church or from specific churches for consultation and decision making regarding ecclesial matters. The ecumenical councils, which represent the whole Church, are distinguished from the different types of particular councils (often called synods): general, patriarchal, plenary, primatial, regional, and provincial.

Theological Basis: The meaning of councils can be understood correctly only within the framework of a comprehensive theology of the Church. In this perspective, the Church itself (Gk., ekklesia, from kaleo, "to call together") is the comprehensive "assembly" (concilium, from Lat., concalare, "to call together") of the believing people, called together by God. For this reason, the Church itself can be called in a profound theological sense the "ecumenical council formed in response to the divine convoking." It follows that the whole Church as the community of believing people has a completely conciliar, synodal (collegial) structure, a fact that should shape the life and structures of local churches (parishes and dioceses), national churches, and the whole Church.

In light of this consideration, an ecumenical council in the ordinary sense, i.e., one formed in response to a "human convoking," can be defined as a representation of the ecumenical council that is formed in response to the divine convoking, i.e., the whole Church. Thus a council is not the only, or even the most concentrated, representation of the Church (other practices, e.g., the liturgy, especially the Eucharist, represent the Church in other ways); but it is a comprehensive representation, comprehensive in both concerns and constituency, designed for, but not limited to, consultation and decision making regarding the governance and formation of the whole Church. Representation means not merely the use of delegates to "take the place of" members of the Church; the council also represents the Church by serving as an expression of it. The first Christian report about Christian councils expresses this fundamental theological understanding of the council as the locus of representation: "There were held in the Greek lands at definite places those councils of all churches, at which important matters are communally treated and also the representation of all Christianity is expressed in a reverential manner" (Tertullian De Paen [Concerning Repentance] 13.6–7). Since the early Church, the idea of representation, though in different forms, has been fundamental for understanding the ecumenical councils.

Historical Forms: The concrete forms of an ecumenical council are also very different. According to contemporary canon law, there can be no ecumenical council that is not convoked by the pope. Among the rights of the pope also belong the leadership of the council (by himself or another), the determination of the topics for consideration and their order, and the composition, adjournments, and dissolution of the council as well as the juridically binding confirmation of the definite resolutions (cans. 338, 341). Only the bishops, who are members of the college of bishops, have the right and the obligation to participate in a council with a deliberative vote. Other persons can be called to the council by the "supreme authority of the Church" (the pope), who will also determine the degree of their participation (can. 339). The college of bishops exercises with the pope the "highest and most perfect form of oversight over the whole Church" (can. 336), which occurs "in celebratory manner" in an ecumenical council (can. 337). If the papacy should become vacant, the council is interrupted until a new pope orders its resumption or has it dissolved.

These specifications codify the governance observed by the councils of Trent (1545–63) and Vatican I (1869–70). Nevertheless, many of these specifications are innovations of the past thousand years, postdating the establishment of the specifically Roman Catholic paradigm with the Gregorian reform in the eleventh century. In particular, it cannot be historically maintained that the ecumenical councils of roughly the first one thousand years of the Church were called, led, and confirmed by the pope. Thus, all the rules and regulations governing ecumenical councils are simply specifications of ecclesial, not divine, law (Lat., ius humanum). They are not required by the Church's essential constitution as given in the Gospels. Because the Petrine office (i.e., the papacy), however, belongs to the essential constitution of the Church, it must be canonically represented (in the ancient councils legates sufficed) at an ecumenical council so that the council may be a genuine representation of the whole Church (can. 338).

The forms of this representation have nevertheless differed greatly in the various councils in the history of the Church. In several instances there was only subsequent approval by the pope. Also, cases of conflict between the Church and the pope (e.g., a heretical or schismatic pope, the removal of such a pope) have actually happened historically and cannot be foreclosed as a possibility for the future. Moreover, direct representation of the laity—men and women—in councils is not only dogmatically possible but also theologically desirable and in some situations unconditionally necessary in light of the universal priesthood of all believers. It is also of practical value given the laity's direct knowledge of the world and responsibility in the world.

On the other hand, a council held in opposition to those in ecclesiastical office would be contrary to church governance and the essence of an ecumenical council, which is meant to represent the whole Church. Thus, without the participation of those in Church offices, an ecumenical council is not possible. From every point of view, observable differentiations are evident among the provincial councils of the second and third centuries (out of which the ecumenical councils proceeded), the eight ancient ecumenical councils of the Byzantine East that were called by the emperor, the general synods of the Latin High Middle Ages, the late medieval Fifth Lateran Council on the eve of the Reformation, the purely ecclesial Council of Trent for Catholic reform, the First Vatican Council, which was controlled by the pope, and the Second Vatican Council, which stressed collegiality.

A Theological Viewpoint: In the spirit of Vatican II, a theology of the council that opposes papalist restriction and resists the centralist tendencies of the Curia must be promoted anew. The ecumenical council should be a credible manifestation of the Church—one, holy, catholic, and apostolic. This concretely means that the resolutions of a council should be decided in unanimity and with a spiritual consensus. The external framework, conduct, and resolutions of a council should be shaped by the gospel. The apostolic spirit, the apostolic witness, and—in a subordinate capacity—the apostolic office should be decisive for the council. Insofar as, according to the promise of Jesus, the Holy Spirit operates in the Church itself, the Spirit is also at work in the special event of its representation, namely, in an ecumenical council in response to human convoking. On this basis, an ecumenical council may claim a special binding authority, even though its decrees and definitions are incomplete, fragmentary human words (cf. 1 Cor 13:9–12). The acts of a council—different from decrees on doctrine and discipline—have only the binding character that the meeting council wants to give to them. Every council and every decree of a council is to be understood historically and to be interpreted in relation to its period in time. See also council.

Bibliography

Küng, Hans. Structures of the Church. New York: Thomas Nelson and Sons, 1964.

Tanner, Norman P., ed. Decrees of the Ecumenical Councils. 2 vols. Washington, DC: Georgetown University Press, 1990.

HANS KÜNG

ecumenical movement, the process by which Christian churches that had been separated by doctrinal, social, ethnic, political, and institutional factors move toward cooperation and unity, by mutual understanding and respect through dialogue; by cooperation or common witness to whatever divine gifts and gospel values they already share and experience; and by a common search for that unity which the Lord wills for his one and only Church, "so that the world may believe" (John 17:21).

History: Church historians describe the 1800s as the "great century" of prolific Catholic, Protestant, and Orthodox missions; they label the 1900s as the decades of the ecumenical movement. The two movements relate in their origins, and fuse in intent.

In the 1800s Protestants across denominational lines formed associations, notably Bible and tract societies. Some mission agencies agreed to policies of collaboration in health and education. Various Protestant groups divided mission territories into spheres of activities, a "denominationalism by geography" that kept distant those variant forms of teaching, worship, and policy that could scandalize non-Christians and hinder witness to the basic gospel message.

In 1910 at Edinburgh, a world missionary conference gathered 414 delegates from 122 denominations and 43 countries. They discussed Christian education and national life, the missionary message in relation to non-Christian religions, the preparation of missionaries, missions, and governments, and cooperation between mission agencies and their denominations. The delegates confessed that "our divisions were contrary to the will of Christ," and professed that "a unity in Christ and fellowship in the Spirit is deeper than our divisions."

The modern ecumenical movement was born at this Edinburgh conference, from which issued, after the First World War, the International Missionary Council (1921, a forum of Protestant national councils of mission agencies in Europe and North America, and local councils of churches in Africa, Asia, and Latin America); the Life and Work movement (1925, social ethics and "practical collaboration in the secular order"); and the Faith and Order movement (1927, church teaching, sacraments, and governance).

In 1920 the Orthodox patriarchate in Constantinople had appealed publicly for a permanent institution of fellowship and cooperation of "all the churches," similar to the proposed League of Nations. Other leaders later supported this appeal. In 1948, shocked by the scandal of a second world war among Christian nations, 147 Protestant, Anglican, and Orthodox churches formed the World Council of Churches.

The official Catholic response to these developments was a suspicious wariness, typified by Pope Pius XI's Mortalium Animos on "fostering religious union" (1928). The pope judged that Catholic participation at non-Catholic assemblies would easily confirm that one religion or church is as good as another, and would "countenance a false Christian religion quite alien to the one true Church of Christ." The model of reunion is the return of non-Catholics to the Catholic Church, because it believes itself to be coextensive with the One Church. Catholics would compromise that witness by mixing with others who were not clear on what the ecumenical movement was, or where it was to move.

Vatican II and Beyond: But Vatican Council II (1962–65) reversed this ecclesial understanding and chartered the Catholic Church's active participation in the one movement "fostered by the grace of the Holy Spirit, for the restoration of unity among all Christians" (Decree on Ecumenism, n. 1).

The ecumenical movement is wider and deeper than any or all of its local, national, regional, or world expressions. It continues to mirror the interplay of different forces that are affecting both converging and diverging understandings of ecumenism.

Since the rapid decolonization of the world after the Second World War, the traditional Christian heartland, which in 1948 had embraced the local churches of the North Atlantic, Eastern Europe, and Mediterranean areas, is fading in its dominant influence over the southern hemisphere. The local churches in Africa, Asia, the Caribbean, Latin America, and Oceania are becoming their own subjects of theological articulations, personal and social ethical stances, spiritualities, church disciplines, and interchurch cooperation in common witness. These new centers do not accept without question the ecumenical priorities of renewal, mission, and unity that are based on the historical experience of church divisions: East and West, and later in the West, the Roman Catholic Church and the churches that issued from the Reformation.

Ecumenical experience no longer supports the oversimplified dictum of a few decades ago, that doctrine divides, action unites. For just as formal bilateral and multilateral dialogues are leading to convergences on those doctrinal affirmations that helped to cause and perpetuate classical church separations, personal and social ethical issues are emerging that are more divisive in the public arena than they were in the 1960s: among others, abortion and euthanasia; active homosexuality and premarital sex; justice, peace, and economic issues and prudential decisions based on them; women's rights in society and the churches.

Even with recent Catholic participation, the ecumenical movement remained sectarian because of the absence of conservative evangelical Christians and most Pentecostal and Holiness churches. Once intentionally "antiecumenical," an increasing number of Evangelicals are becoming active allies to the ecumenical movement, bringing new energies and nuances to old ecumenical agendas. Forming at the same time is a new coalition of Protestant and Catholic fundamentalists who, with often opposing reasons and judgments, reject the ecumenical movement. For them it is too accommodating to the modern world, too compromising with biblical fundamentals and/or Church traditions, and too eager to cover a multitude of sins by downplaying theological barriers in favor of organizational unity based on cooperative social action.

Indeed, the ecumenical movement is a relatively young movement with its deepest hopes for unity still to be fulfilled. See also Church; Decree on Ecumenism; ecumenism; unity of the Church; World Council of Churches.

THOMAS F. STRANSKY

ecumenism, a process that is directed toward the achievement of unity among all Christian churches, and ultimately among all religious communities. The term is derived biblically from both "the household of God" (Gk., oikodome) of the whole Church (cf. 1 Cor 3:9; Eph 2:19; 1 Tim 3:15; Heb 3:6) and "the whole inhabited earth" (Gk., oikoumene, Luke 2:1). The still developing understanding of ecumenism tries to hold relational tensions between the unity and the mission of the Church in the context of the whole world, and between the present era and the expected reign of God, "the oikoumene to come" (Heb 2:5).

Ecumenism, therefore, is the unceasing search to draw all Christians together through the renewal of the churches in order to manifest the unity that Christ wills for his one and only Church, and the obligation of the Church to proclaim the whole gospel to the world, as the servant to both that gospel and that world.

There may be general Christian consensus on this paradigm of unity-in-mission, mission-in-unity, but there is not the same consensus on the nature of this unity, on the Church, or on the full communion (koinonia). Fundamental orientations are emerging.

First, the unity confessed in the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed of ca. 381 ("one, holy, catholic, and apostolic") is not only a spiritual, invisible reality, but also the visible expression of one apostolic faith by the preaching of one gospel and the breaking of one bread in a corporate life that reaches out in witness to all peoples.

Second, unity with the whole Christian fellowship in all places and all ages needs the visible, full, and unqualified acceptance of all members and ministries.

Third, unity is not uniformity but a diversity of theological expressions and forms of ecclesiastical life, rooted in different traditions and various cultural, ethnic, or historical contexts.

Fourth, emerging from the above convergences are the unavoidable questions that find the least consensus today: What and for what is the Christ-given authority in and of his one Church? Where is that authority, and how should it be exercised?

Fifth, all forms of unity are provisional, the first fruits of that ultimate fulfillment when God will unite and complete all things in the perfect communion of the divine heavenly banquet.

Official Catholic teaching stresses "full visible communion" in the confession of one faith, the common celebration of divine worship, and the fraternal harmony through the ecclesiastical governance of collegiality (Decree on Ecumenism, 1964, n. 3), without sacrificing "the rich diversity of spirituality, discipline, liturgical rites, and elaborations of revealed truth that has grown up among the churches" (1993 Ecumenical Directory, n. 17). See also Decree on Ecumenism; ecumenical movement; unity of the Church. THOMAS F. STRANSKY

Edessa, present-day Urfa (Turkey), ancient capital of the kingdom of Osrhoene and early center of Syriac Christianity. Associated with Edessa are such works as the Odes of Solomon, the Gospel of Thomas, and the Acts of Thomas and such figures as Bardesanes, Tatian, and St. Ephraem. Edessa fell to the Arabs in 639.

Edict of Constantine/Milan. See Constantine, Edict of.

editio typica (ed-ee'tsee-oh teep'ee-kah, Lat., "official edition"), the official, usually Latin, edition of a document, often a liturgical rite. All other editions and translations are to be in agreement with it.

Edmundites, Society of St. Edmund (S.S.E.), a religious community of priests and brothers founded in Pontigny, France, by Fathers Jean-Baptiste Muard and Pierre Bouyer in 1843. The motherhouse of the Edmundites is located in Vermont, and the approximately seventy members of the community serve in the United States and Venezuela. Dedicated to evangelizing the materially and spiritually poor, the Edmundites engage in pastoral and educational work. In the United States, they have concentrated on ministry to African-Americans in the southern states, on higher education (notably St. Michael's College in Vermont), and on retreat ministry.

education, Catholic. See Catholicism and education.

education, moral, education for the purpose of the development of character and formation of conscience. Character is developed through the cultivation of virtues by habit. Conscience gives the virtuous life rational direction by applying general principles to particular cases. Acting according to conscience, each individual expresses divinely given freedom and dignity. The primacy of conscience does not, however, entail moral relativism, which denies the existence of unchanging, universal principles of moral behavior. Conscience must be formed through moral education. Such education fosters the ability to make free and responsible decisions in dialogue with others, and imparts information about particular values, rules of behavior, and the official teachings of the Church. In recent years, research in psychology and sociology has deepened the understanding of moral development, influencing Catholic as well as secular approaches to moral education. This research has underscored traditional teaching that family, Church, school, and society all play a significant role in the lifelong process of moral education. These communities foster moral growth by providing a context for sharing norms, values, and ideals, discussing moral issues, and encouraging the practice of the virtues. Moreover, family, Church, and Catholic education nourish a specifically Christian moral life of service based on the Gospels. See also moral theology; religious education.

Edward the Confessor, St., 1003–66, king of England from 1042 to 1066. Son of King Aethelred, he returned in 1042 to England as king, after spending most of his youth in Normandy. He died childless in 1066 and the crown passed to Harold of Wessex, igniting a contest with Edward's cousin Duke William of Normandy. A pious man known as a friend to the poor and the clergy, Edward was buried at Westminster, the abbey he built. Feast day: October 13.

Egan, John J., b. 1916, priest and social activist. A priest of the archdiocese of Chicago, he was named head of the Cana Conference in Chicago in 1947 where his work gained him a national reputation. In the 1950s he became involved in urban affairs and, with the assistance of Saul Alinsky, noted community organizer, he placed the Church's financial and moral strength behind many community organizations in Chicago. In 1967, together with other social activists, he founded the Catholic Committee on Urban Ministry, which sought to promote social and racial justice. For thirteen years (1970–83) he worked at the University of Notre Dame as a special assistant to the president, Father Theodore Hesburgh, and as director of the Institute for Pastoral and Social Ministry, which he founded. In 1987 he became an assistant to the president of DePaul University in Chicago, after having served the archdiocese of Chicago in the areas of ecumenical and community relations since 1983. See also Cana Conference.

Egbert, St., 639–729, abbot, bishop, and supporter of the evangelization of Germany. An Englishman studying in Ireland during a plague, Egbert made a vow never to return home if he survived. He was a principal organizer of the mission to Germany, especially that of Willibrord in 690. After serving as bishop in Ireland, he became abbot of Iona (716), which adopted the Roman observance of Easter under his influence. Feast day: April 24. See also Iona; Willibrord, St.

Egbert of York, d. 766, bishop and teacher of Alcuin. Bishop of York from 732, Egbert was brother of King Edbert and a student of Bede, who wrote a letter offering him pastoral advice and recommending that York should be an archdiocese (734), a promotion granted by Pope Gregory III in 735. See also Bede, St.

Egeria, Pilgrimage of (eh-jehr'ee-ah), early-fifth-century travel diary in Latin dialect, also known as Pilgrimage of Aetheria. Valued especially for descriptions of ceremonies in Jerusalem during Epiphany, Holy Week, Easter, and Pentecost, this account of visits to OT and NT holy sites was discovered in 1884 in an eleventh-century manuscript. In addition to the Holy Land, Egeria visited Egypt, Syria, and Constantinople. Nothing is known of the author beyond what can be inferred from the text—that she was a wealthy woman who could spend years on pilgrimage, enjoyed considerable social standing, knew the Bible well, and belonged to a devout sisterhood, to whom the report is addressed. See also Jerusalem.

Egypt, one of the most illustrious centers of Christianity in the ancient world. The origins of Christianity in Egypt are obscure, although they certainly date at least to the latter part of the first century and are to be located among the strong Jewish populations of Alexandria, who were evangelized by groups from Jerusalem. With the savage destruction of the Jews by Trajan (98–117), Christianity at Alexandria acquired a more thoroughly gentile and Greek character, and the first Egyptian Christians we know by name are the speculative and philosophical heterodox teachers of the early second century, including the Gnostics Valentinus and Basilides. Their style of theology was continued in a more orthodox vein by Pantaenus (late second century), his student Clement (ca. 150–215), and the great Origen (ca. 185–ca. 254), whose thought set the intellectual agenda for the influential Alexandrian catechetical school until the end of the fourth century. From the time of Demetrius (190–232), the first bishop about whom we have substantial information, the see of Alexandria grew in power and prestige until it became one of the three most influential sees in the empire, after Rome and (later) Constantinople.

But no less important are the achievements of the non-Alexandrian, native Egyptian population, Coptic rather than Greek speaking. The celebrated history of monasticism in the Egyptian desert belongs to the Coptic church, from Anthony of Egypt (251–356), who inspired a movement of anchorites, or hermit ascetics; to Pachomius (292–347), who founded cenobitic, or communal, monasticism; to Shenoute (ca. 350–ca. 450), abbot of the White Monastery in Upper Egypt, whose prose is the flowering of Coptic literature. Strictly speaking, the Coptic or Coptic Orthodox church dates from the time of the Council of Chalcedon (451), which was rejected by the great majority of the Egyptian church. It subsequently developed a hierarchy of its own, separate from both Rome and Constantinople, and this has continued to the present despite conquest by the Arabs (641) and their intermittent persecution and repression of Christians. The Coptic church reckons as its first era, the "Era of the Martyrs," the time from the accession of the emperor Diocletian (284) to the end of the Great Persecution (311), particularly savage in Egypt, and claims as its heritage, through Dioscorus, the whole succession of Alexandrian bishops from Demetrius and Dionysius, to Peter, Athanasius, Theophilus, and especially Cyril. See also Alexandria, school of; Anthony of Egypt, St.; Copt, Coptic; Coptic Catholic Church; Coptic rite; Pachomius.

JOHN C. CAVADINI

Einhard, or Eginhard, ca. 770–840, abbot, courtier, and scholar. According to a biographical sketch by Walafrid Strabo, Einhard, educated at Fulda, was sent to Aachen as a youth. There he became a friend of Alcuin (whom he succeeded as head of the palace school), Charlemagne (whose biography he wrote), and Charlemagne's son, Louis the Pious.

Einsiedeln (in'tseed-uhln; Ger., "Hermitages"), Abbey of Our Lady of the Hermits, near Schwyz, Switzerland. The site of the martyrdom of the hermit St. Meinrad attracted other hermits, then (937) a Benedictine monastery. A popular pilgrimage site, the abbey founded houses in the United States and Argentina. See also Meinrad, St.

ejaculation (Lat., ex, "from"; iacere, "to throw"), a short prayer usually expressing love or praise of God. These prayers are also called aspirations since they are so brief they can be said in a single breath. It is not necessary, however, to vocalize ejaculations. They may be offered mentally. Examples of popular ejaculations include: "Jesus Christ, I love and honor you"; "Sacred heart of Jesus, I trust in you"; "Jesus, Mary, and Joseph, I give you my heart and soul"; "Lord, have mercy." See also prayer.

elder, a respected leader of a community. The elders of Israel are specifically named by Moses at the Exodus (Exod 12:21); they served as candidates for special appointments (Num 11:16). They are mentioned frequently from Joshua through 2 Kings and continued to function in Jewish society in Jesus' time (e.g., Matt 15:2; 21:23).

Christian elders or (in Gk.) presbyters emerge as the Church organizes. Paul does not mention them, but they are portrayed in Acts in Jerusalem (Acts 15:2–6; 16:4) and elsewhere (Acts 13:1–3; 20:17). By the late first century, distinct presbyters (1 Pet 5:1; 1 Tim 5:1) received compensation (1 Tim 5:17) and had defined functions, including ordination (1 Tim 4:14). By A.D. 200 a hierarchical order was in place (Hippolytus Apostolic Tradition). See also presbyter; priesthood.

election, canonical, one of the means of filling some ecclesiastical offices. Canon law has strict general norms regulating elections: the convening of the electors, the process of voting, the qualities necessary for a valid vote, the majority required on a given ballot, and the obligation of having the election confirmed by higher authority. There are other norms as well for particular elections. The election of the pope is currently governed by an apostolic constitution, Romano Pontifici Eligendo, issued by Pope Paul VI in 1975. Religious institutes and other organizations can have election laws particular to them. See also papal election.

election, divine, God's decree that certain individuals or peoples receive grace sufficient and efficacious for salvation. In Catholic theology, divine election refers first and foremost to the general intention and action of God that orders created beings to a happy end; it is applied only secondarily to individuals as subjects of redemption. The chief means by which God accomplishes this end in a world tainted by sin is the calling forth of an elect group, the People of God, which then becomes the locus and effective sign of God's salvific activity in the world. Such election is only realized in community; the retelling of God's deeds both establishes this chosen people and initiates salvation history.

Divine election is first manifested with the foundation of Israel whom God calls "his treasured people" (Deut 26:18). This election is the fulfillment of God's promise to Abraham that his descendants should become more numerous than the stars in the sky (Gen 15:5). Such election is completely gratuitous and not a function of merit: "It was not because you were more numerous than any other people that the Lord set his heart on you and chose you—for you were the fewest of all peoples. It was because the Lord loved you and kept the oath that he swore to your ancestors" (Deut 7:7–8). The instrumental nature of God's special election in effecting the redemption of all people cannot be overemphasized. In the figure of the Suffering Servant in Deutero-Isaiah, Israel is chosen by God as "a light to the nations" (Isa 42:6). The sufferings borne by Israel are undertaken for the benefit of all (Isa 52:13–53:12). This election and service to the entire human race foreshadows that of the Church in the NT, "a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, God's own people" (1 Pet 2:9; cf. Exod 19:5–6), and is reaffirmed by the Second Vatican Council in the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, Lumen Gentium (1964). See also predestination; salvation.

GERARD JACOBITZ

election, papal. See papal election.

electronic church, a term that refers collectively to the creators and consumers of religious programs on radio and television. The expression originated as a variant of "the electric church," a phrase coined in 1976 by Ben Armstrong, executive director of National Religious Broadcasters, and later used as the title of his 1979 book.

Few religious broadcasters in North America are affiliated directly with any denomination. Rather, media ministries function more like independent enterprises lodged alongside the existing churches, with their own staffs, policies, and budgets. The majority are Protestant in orientation, with the evangelical and fundamentalist traditions predominating.

Several pioneers of the electronic church in America, such as Bishop Fulton J. Sheen (1895–1979), were Catholic clergymen. Nevertheless, the Catholic influence in this sphere is less pronounced. An exception, however, is the Eternal Word Television Network of Mother M. Angelica (b. 1923). Based near Birmingham, Alabama, EWTN offers inspirational programs with a decidedly traditionalist orientation to cable operators across the country via satellite. In addition, Catholic producers collaborate in programming VISN, the Vision Interfaith Satellite Network. See also Catholicism and mass media.

elevation, the moment in the Roman Mass when first the consecrated bread and then the cup are raised for the adoration of the faithful following the words of consecration. An older elevation is actually that which accompanies the concluding doxology. This elevation was overshadowed by the one at the consecration, which was introduced in the thirteenth century as part of the wave of "Eucharistic realism" that swept Europe in the High Middle Ages. See also Eucharist.

Elias of Cortona, ca. 1180–1253, vicar general under Francis of Assisi and, later, third general of the Franciscan order. Elected general in 1232, he was deposed and excommunicated by Pope Gregory IX in 1239 because of his self-indulgence and despotism.

Eligius, St., ca. 588–660, patron saint of metalworkers. He was a skilled metalsmith who was master of the mint for King Clotaire II and, after being ordained in 640, was made bishop of Noyon the following year. He founded a monastery at Solignae and convents in Paris and Noyon. Feast day: December 1.

Elijah (ee-lī'juh), a ninth-century B.C. Jewish prophet. He battled with priests of Baal (1 Kgs 16:29–19:18), condemned a royal murder (1 Kgs 21; 2 Kgs 9), prophesied Ahaziah's death (2 Kgs 1–2), and instructed his successor, Elisha (1 Kgs 19:19–21; 2 Kgs 2). Mal 4:5 predicted his return. Hence, some thought of Jesus as Elijah (Matt 16:14; Mark 6:15; 8:28; Luke 9:8), but Jesus identified John the Baptist as Elijah (Matt 17:9–13; Mark 9:9–13). See also prophecy; prophet.

Elipandus, ca. 718–ca. 802, archbishop of Toledo (ca. 753–ca. 802) and leader of the Spanish Adoptionists, who taught that Jesus in his humanity was God's adoptive Son. To Pope Hadrian I and Carolingian theologians such as Alcuin this was tantamount to Nestorianism. Elipandus was condemned by four councils (Regensburg, 792; Frankfurt, 794; Rome, 798; Aachen, 799) but was never removed from his see, since Toledo was under Muslim rule. See also Adoptionism.

Elizabeth I, 1533–1603, queen of England. Daughter of Henry VIII and Anne Boleyn, she was placed in line for the throne after Edward VI and Mary Tudor by the Act of Succession (1544). Upon succeeding to the throne in 1558, she addressed the religious controversy created by Mary's reign. The Acts of Supremacy and Uniformity (1559) restored the ecclesiology and liturgy of 1552. With Matthew Parker as archbishop of Canterbury, Elizabeth sought to stabilize the reform of the Church of England by means of monarchical episcopal polity and moderate Lutheran and Reformed doctrine, rendered as inoffensive as possible to Catholics, culminating in the Thirty-nine Articles of 1563 and Parker's "Advertisements" of 1566. Elizabeth's policy took a decidedly anti-Catholic direction after her excommunication by Pius V in 1570, but she never acceded to Puritan demands to abandon episcopacy for a presbyterian polity and to purify the worship of the Church of all remnants of Catholic ritual. See also England, Catholicism in; Protestantism; Reformation, the; Thirty-nine Articles.

Elizabeth, St., wife of Zechariah and mother of John the Baptist. Luke 1 recounts how, aged and barren, she miraculously conceived. At her cousin Mary's visit she pronounced the Hail Mary's second verse, "Blessed are you among women and blessed is the fruit of your womb" (Luke 1:42), eliciting Mary's Magnificat. Feast day: November 5. See also John the Baptist, St; Magnificat.

Elizabeth Ann Seton, St. See Seton, St. Elizabeth Ann Bayley.

Elizabeth of Hungary, St., also known as Elizabeth of Thuringia, 1207–31, queen. After an extraordinarily happy marriage and three children, she was widowed in 1227. Exiled from court, she lived in Marburg (Germany) as a Franciscan tertiary devoted to her children, a life of prayer, and charity to the sick and the poor. Her spiritual director, Conrad of Marburg (d. 1233), a papal inquisitor, was a very severe man who may have helped shorten her already overburdened life. Feast day: November 17.

Elizabeth of Portugal, St., 1271–1336, queen of Portugal, known for her charitable works and as a peacemaker. She retired, in her last years, to a convent near Coimbra. Feast day: July 4.

Elizabeth of Schönau, ca. 1129–64, Benedictine prioress of a double monastery (in which men and women live in separate but neighboring houses) near Bonn, Germany. She authored three books describing her mystical experiences of the Passion and Resurrection of Jesus and conversations with many saints. Some of her revelations were once attributed to Elizabeth of Hungary. Although she was never formally beatified or canonized, she was referred to as St. Elizabeth in the Roman Martyrology. See also double monasteries.

Elizabeth of the Trinity, Bl., 1880–1906, Carmelite nun of Dijon. Born Elizabeth Catez near Bourges, France, she was influenced by John of the Cross, Thérèse of Lisieux, and Jan van Ruysbroeck. Her spirituality, which leads through deepening silence to the indwelling Trinity, is strongly Christocentric. She sees transformation into the image of God taking place on earth as individuals relive the mysteries of the Incarnate Word in their personal humanity. In the Letter of Paul to the Ephesians, she found her "new name," Praise of Glory (1:12). Her writings emphasize heaven and eternity permeating every temporal moment. She died of Addison's disease. Feast day: November 8.

Elkesaites, a Judeo-Christian sect originating east of the Jordan ca. 100 and centered around the "Book of Elkesai." Sometimes considered Gnostic, their actual beliefs are poorly attested. Mani (ca. 216–76), the founder of Manichaeism, grew up in an Elkesaite community. See also Manichaeism.

Ellard, Gerald, 1894–1963, American Jesuit priest and liturgical scholar. A founding co-editor (in 1926) of the influential journal Orate Fratres (now Worship), he worked for almost forty years to promote liturgical instruction at the popular level. His book Christian Life and Worship (1933) was long a standard college text.

Ellis, John Tracy, 1905–92, priest and Church historian. Regarded as the "dean of American Catholic historians," he spent most of his career at The Catholic University of America (1938–63, 1978–89). Of more than twelve books and hundreds of articles, his most famous work is a two-volume biography (1952) of Cardinal Gibbons. In 1955, he gained wider influence with his critique of the lack of American Catholic intellectual life. In 1968, he received the Laetare Medal from the University of Notre Dame.

Elmo, St. 1 Also called Erasmus, d. ca. 300, bishop of Formiae and legendary patron saint of sailors. His emblem is the discharge of light often appearing near masts of ships after a storm. He was one of the Fourteen Holy Helpers of the later Middle Ages. Feast day: June 2. 2 Peter Gonzalez, ca. 1190–1246, Spanish Dominican, not to be confused with the first St. Elmo. Feast day: April 14.

Elvira, Council of (ca. 300–310), first known Spanish council famous for its harsh disciplinary canons and its insistence that bishops and other clergy not marry or, if already married, not live with their wives. Other canons penalize such things as usury, idol possession, fornication, adultery, and abortion (or perhaps infanticide). See also celibacy, clerical.

ember days, four sets of three days each (Wednesdays, Fridays, Saturdays) in each of the seasons of the year, until 1969 set aside for special liturgical and penitential observance. The ember days were, in winter, the week after the third Sunday of Advent; in spring, the week after the first Sunday of Lent; in summer, in the octave of Pentecost; in autumn, after the feast of the Holy Cross on September 14. On these days there were proper liturgical texts, and fast and abstinence were required.

The origins of the ember days can be traced at least to the third century. A product of the church of Rome, the observance was widespread in the West by the middle of the ninth century. In 1966 Pope Paul VI removed the obligation of fast and abstinence on ember days, allowing this and most other penitential discipline to be regulated by the national conferences of bishops. The bishops of the United States decided that each bishop could determine the practice for ember days in his own diocese. Subsequently, the ember days became obsolete despite isolated attempts to revive them.

Since the revision of the Roman Calendar in 1969, ember days are no longer considered penitential days but as times to pray for the needs of people, for the productivity of the earth and human labor, and to give public thanks to God. The precise nature of, and times for, their observance is left to the conference of bishops.

embolism, an insertion into the "Our Father" prayer asking for the deliverance from the power of evil for the entire community, part of the rites introducing the reception of Communion in the Roman tradition. The embolism derives from the "Our Father" and develops that prayer. The use of an embolism dates to the time of Gregory the Great (590–604), when the Libera prayer of the Tridentine Mass called on the intercession of Mary, Andrew, Peter, and Paul to bring peace to the faithful through the Eucharist. According to the General Instruction of the Roman Missal, the embolism is said by the presider alone, with the faithful participating in the concluding doxology, "For the kingdom, the power and the glory are yours. . . ." See also Lord's Prayer.

embryo, the term used to refer to the human organism in the early stages (first six weeks) of development. Biological science distinguishes the successive stages of development as follows: zygote, blastocyst, embryo, fetus. The term "preembryo" is often used to designate the period prior to implantation (zygote, blastocyst), because the earliest stages of mammalian development primarily involve the development of the nonembryonic trophoblast (feeding layer), which is the precursor of the later placenta and is discarded at birth.

The central question surrounding the embryo is its status and the moral claims it generates. For centuries there was vigorous debate among Catholic theologians about when the developing organism was ensouled or animated. Most theologians argued for delayed animation, a position still held by some contemporary authors. The distinction between the ensouled and nonensouled fetus was largely concerned with the nature of canonical penalties that would be incurred for abortion, since all interruptions of the reproductive process were condemned as immoral. In 1869 Pope Pius IX dropped the reference to "the ensouled fetus" and since that time official formulations are very similar to what is found in the work of Vatican II (1962–65): "From the moment of conception, life must be guarded with the greatest of care" (Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, n. 51).

Modern Developments: With the advent of modern reproductive technologies such as in vitro fertilization with embryo transfer, the status of the preembryo (the preimplantation period) has assumed new significance and urgency. At stake are issues such as: what may be done to preembryos before transfer; whether all preembryos must be transferred; what may be done to preembryos that are not transferred.

In 1982 Pope John Paul II, in an address to a group of scientists, stated the traditional Catholic evaluation as follows: "I condemn, in the most explicit and formal way, experimental manipulations of the human embryo, since the human being, from conception to death, cannot be exploited for any purpose whatsoever." The Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, in its 1987 Instruction on Respect for Human Life in Its Origin and on the Dignity of Procreation (Donum Vitae), attributes great importance to genetic uniqueness. On that basis it makes two quite different statements about the embryo: (1) It is a person ("How could a human individual not be a human person?"); and (2) It must be treated as a person ("The human being is to be respected and treated as a person from the moment of conception").

Some contemporary theologians argue that, before personhood can be attributed, there is required beyond genetic individuality developmental individuality (developmental singleness). Such individuality is not present prior to the appearance of the primitive streak around the fourteenth day. Before that time the possibility of twinning and recombination of two preembryos indicates that developmental singleness has not been achieved. Authors proposing such a view still may argue for strong protection of the preembryo. See also abortion; bioethics; in vitro fertilization; reproductive technologies.

RICHARD A. MCCORMICK

Eminence, the title of honor given to a cardinal, first bestowed by Pope Urban VIII in 1630 and in use to the present day. It is preceded by the words "Your" or "His," and in formal address is conjoined with "Most Reverend," as in "His Eminence the Most Reverend [first name] Cardinal [last name]." See also cardinal.

Emmanuel (Heb., Immanuel, "God is with us"), name given to the child mentioned in Isaiah's prophecy (Isa 7:14; 8:8) as a sign of God's presence and protection. Matt 1:23 cites Isa 7:14 as a prophecy of Jesus' miraculous conception.

emotions, moral aspects of. Over the past century, Catholic moral theologians, attempting in their reflections to take account of the findings of the human sciences, have increasingly turned from the Scholastic language of the passions to a more contemporary and developmentally oriented language of the emotions. Although there are many definitions of emotion within the literatures of psychology and philosophy, most would agree that the emotions are affective responses to real or imagined aspects of individuals and the external world, which typically incorporate sensual and even physiological components in their origin and response. There is wide disagreement as to the moral significance of the emotions, ranging from arguments that the emotions are irrelevant to the moral life, to arguments that there can be no fully moral life if one's emotions are stunted or deformed. Within traditional Catholic moral theology, certain emotions have been seen as being morally problematic, e.g., envy and hatred, and others have been seen as potentially praiseworthy but also subject to corruption, e.g., anger and sexual longing.

enarxis (en'arks-is; Gk., "introduction"), the part of the Byzantine eucharistic liturgy that precedes the Introit (entrance song). The enarxis comprises an opening blessing followed by three litanies, collects, and antiphons, the third of which is the primitive Introit antiphon during which the Minor Introit (Lat., "Little Entrance") procession with the Gospel takes place. This is a relic of the original Introit into the church, before the enarxis began to develop from the stational rites of Constantinople between the fifth and eighth centuries. See also Introit.

enchiridion (en-ki-ri'dee-uhn; Gk., en, "in"; cheir, "hand"), a handbook or manual; in modern usage, any of several books containing selections of documents for theological study. The most famous is Heinrich Denzinger's Enchiridion Symbolorum (1854; many subsequent editions) with its anthology of Church councils and papal pronouncements; it was widely used in theological education, especially in seminaries, before Vatican II (1962–65). See also Denzinger, Heinrich Joseph; Enchiridion Symbolorum.

Enchiridion Symbolorum, also known as "Denzinger," the name of the original editor, a handbook of articles of faith and morals that contains a collection of Latin and Greek theological or historical texts used in ecclesiastical studies. Each entry is coded with a number for referencing in bibliographic citations. This handbook contains the Eastern and Western creeds, documents of the popes from Clement I through Paul VI's Instruction to the Pontifical Biblical Commission (1964), and conciliar decrees through Vatican I. The material is indexed according to scriptural references, initial phrases, systematic themes, and alphabetical names and terms.

Originally edited by Heinrich Joseph Denzinger (d. 1883) and published at Wurzburg in 1854, the handbook has passed through thirty-three editions. The most recent was edited by A. Schönmetzer in 1965. The most recent English version is The Sources of Catholic Dogma, translated by Roy J. Deferrari from the thirtieth edition (Herder, 1957). See also Denzinger, Heinrich Joseph.

enclosure, the separation of members of a contemplative religious order from nonmembers. The 1983 Code of Canon Law stipulates that strict enclosure is to be observed by monasteries of nuns totally dedicated to the contemplative life; that is, such nuns may not leave their cloister, nor may others enter it, except under very limited circumstances. Monasteries of monks totally dedicated to the contemplative life are not bound by canon law to observe the strict enclosure. Contemplative orders (both monks and nuns) that also engage in some apostolic work may regulate for themselves a modified observance of enclosure. A papal enclosure is a section of a religious house of contemplatives restricted to members of the contemplative community. See also cloister; contemplative life; monastery.

Encratites (ehn'krah'tits; Gk., "self-control" or "continence"), a name that Hippolytus (d. ca. 235), Irenaeus (d. ca. 200), and Clement of Alexandria (d. ca. 215) applied loosely to a variety of ascetic groups that were probably distinct. The practices said to characterize them—including renunciation of meat and of wine (even in the Eucharist) and condemnation of all sexual relations—were incorporated into a cohesive body of teachings by Tatian, whom Eusebius and Jerome call the founder of the Encratite sect. See also Tatian.

encyclical, a formal pastoral letter (lit., a circular letter) written by, or under the authority of, the pope concerning moral, doctrinal, or disciplinary issues and addressed to the universal Church. With Pope John XXIII (d. 1963) such letters have also been addressed to all persons of goodwill. The modern use of papal encyclicals began with Benedict XIV's Ubi Primum (1740) and since the pontificate of Pius IX (1846–78) has become the standard means for exercising the pope's ordinary teaching authority.

Although Catholics are normally obliged to give assent to the moral and doctrinal content of papal encyclicals, three issues are important for reception. First, papal encyclicals possess less authority than dogmatic pronouncements made by the extraordinary infallible magisterium, whether by the pope acting in the name of the whole Church or by an ecumenical council. Second, because encyclicals do not normally contain definitive, or infallible, teaching, a Catholic assent remains conditional and some forms of dissent are permitted. Finally, the publication of an encyclical does not imply that the theological issues examined in the encyclical are now "closed." An encyclical necessarily expresses a particular theological point of view, but it is usually not a definitive assessment.

Although an encyclical may be written by the pope, it is usually the product of a collaborative effort. Ideally, encyclicals should reflect the collegial nature of the Church, respect legitimate theological diversity, uphold the importance of local theology and pastoral practice, and embody the principle that ecclesial authority is always in service to the community for the common good. See also doctrine; magisterium. MICHAEL O'KEEFFE encyclicals, social, papal letters circulated to the whole world concerning matters of social justice, human rights, and peace. Each of the encyclicals listed hereafter has a separate entry in the encyclopedia:

Rerum Novarum (1891), Leo XIII
Quadragesimo Anno (1931), Pius XI
Mater et Magistra (1961), John XXIII
Pacem in Terris (1963), John XXIII
Populorum Progressio (1967), Paul VI
Laborem Exercens (1981), John Paul II
Sollicitudo Rei Socialis (1987), John Paul II
Centesimus Annus (1991), John Paul II.
See also Catholic social teachings.

ends, morality of, the moral status of consequences in the determination of rightness or wrongness of actions. In Catholic theology the ends or consequences of an action are the good or evil results that follow from the performance of an action. Persons are held morally responsible for all the consequences that are directly intended. In general, ends that are foreseen but unintended are not morally imputed to the agent. However, in some cases evil consequences may be attributed to the agent even if they were not the object of a direct rational choice, e.g., if the agent had a moral obligation to avoid the action in the first place. Other moral theories, e.g., consequentialism and Joseph Fletcher's situation ethics, have proposed that actions are right or wrong only according to the consequences that they produce. Thus, actions are judged to be right or wrong according to whether they do or do not bring about the desired consequences. Because there are factors other than consequences that must be included in judgments of moral rightness or wrongness, e.g., how the ends of actions are brought about, Catholic moral theology denies that the ends in themselves can justify the means.

Engel, Howard R., b. 1930, physician. Having obtained his undergraduate and medical degrees from the University of Chicago (M.D., 1955), he has practiced internal medicine in South Bend, Indiana, since 1960. His patients have included theologians and biblical scholars on the faculty of the University of Notre Dame, including the general editor, several of the associate editors, and various other contributors to this volume. He has been married to Sondra Friend since 1958.

England, Catholicism in. The Church in England, with its primate the archbishop of Canterbury, had a continuous history within the Latin Church from the sixth century, with Augustine of Canterbury's mission from Rome, until Crown and parliament rejected papal authority in the sixteenth century. A small minority of English people, led by Thomas More (d. 1535) and John Fisher (d. 1535), firmly refused to share in this rejection. Centuries of intermittent persecution followed. English Catholicism survived chiefly in more remote areas of the north, especially in Lancashire, Yorkshire, and Durham, but it did so only through the establishment in continental Europe of a remarkable network of seminaries, monasteries, and convents, fed generation after generation by English youth. It was for a long time a poorly organized community, subject to much party strife, but by the eighteenth century, with vicars apostolic ruling four districts, it had become a stable, viable, but almost insignificant minority. When the French Revolution drove most of the seminaries and monasteries of the Continent back to England, they were able to settle quietly into country villages. They were no longer a threat to the nation's Protestantism.

Nineteenth-Century Developments: The nineteenth century brought three major developments. The first, Catholic Emancipation in 1829, removed all legal disabilities and was granted chiefly to pacify Ireland, still part of the United Kingdom. This was followed by the reestablishment of dioceses and a hierarchy in 1850, with Nicholas Wiseman as first cardinal-archbishop of Westminster. The second development was Irish immigration produced by overpopulation, underdevelopment, and famine. By the second half of the century, four-fifths of Catholics in England were Irish, mostly gathered in the poorest areas of Liverpool and other cities. The third development was a wave of distinguished converts from Anglicanism brought by the Oxford movement and led by John Henry Newman (d. 1890) and Henry Edward Manning (d. 1892). Newman was unquestionably the greatest English theologian of the century, Manning probably its greatest ecclesiastical statesman. Manning, like most of the converts, emphatically repudiated earlier Anglican attitudes and became a leading Ultramontane whose forcefulness was much felt at the First Vatican Council (1869–70). Newman's theological position remained more ambiguous. Never an Ultramontane and in some ways remarkably liberal and ecumenical, he came under official suspicion for years. A tension between the influence of the two was added to tensions between "Old Catholics" and converts, between English and Irish. While there had always been a sturdy working-class English Catholicism in the north, the strain between English and Irish was often a class one between gentry (whether the squires of old families or Oxford converts) and an urban underclass. Manning's Ultramontanism, however, combined with social radicalism and sympathy for Irish grievances, enabled him as second archbishop of Westminster to contribute to the development of a Church that united the various strands.

The Twentieth Century: In the twentieth century Irish Catholics were increasingly integrated into English society as they moved up the social scale and out of the ghettos. Only in Liverpool did an Irish character to English Catholicism dominate until after the Second World War. Nevertheless, parochial ministry remained heavily dependent upon a flow of priests from Irish seminaries to English dioceses. Against this Irish clerical influence is set the intensely English character of both the Venerabile, the English College in Rome (dating from the sixteenth century) where many of the bishops were trained, and the principal schools run by Benedictines and Jesuits. John Heenan, eighth cardinal-archbishop of Westminster (1963–75), typified the new mix. Born in London of working-class Irish parents, educated by the Jesuits and at the Venerabile, he was wholly English in outlook and Ultramontane in theology—Manning's natural heir.

While the Church in England struggled hard to develop a network of schools, it has had no university. Manning tried unsuccessfully to create one in Kensington. After his death Catholics studied increasingly at Oxford, Cambridge, and the modern universities. This has greatly helped to integrate them into the national community not only socially and politically but intellectually as well. Only theology had to be studied at university level abroad until after the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). Catholic journals (especially the influential weekly The Tablet) and publishing houses have also been controlled mostly by laypeople. In few countries has intellectual and political control of the Church by the hierarchy been so limited.

The lay character of English Catholicism, its close links with the national universities, and the continued reception of distinguished converts all helped to give it an exceptionally impressive cultural and intellectual character. G. K. Chesterton, Christopher Dawson, Ronald Knox, E. Evans-Pritchard, Christopher Butler, Graham Greene, and Evelyn Waugh are just a few of the outstanding converts received between the First World War and the Second Vatican Council. They and other English Catholics, like Barbara Ward, have had a wide influence both upon the country as a whole and upon the English-speaking world outside Britain. Where they had least influence was upon the Catholic Church in England, at least upon its clergy. After the Modernist crisis of the early years of the twentieth century, particularly affecting English Catholics like George Tyrrell and Baron Von Hügel, the clergy avoided theology and held to a marked pastoral and liturgical conservatism. Only the English Dominicans, centered upon Blackfriars at Oxford, were exceptions.

The 1950s may appear to be the golden age of an English Catholic Church, numerically and institutionally growing, endowed with an array of famous literary names yet theologically conservative. The Second Vatican Council (1962–65) took it almost wholly by surprise and Cardinal Heenan was increasingly bewildered by postconciliar developments.

No church has been more affected by the issues of Humanae Vitae (1968) and clerical celibacy. Considerable statistical decline has been experienced since the late 1960s despite the widely respected leadership of Cardinal Basil Hume from 1976. The 1992 election of the first English Master General of the Dominicans in seven hundred years, Timothy Radcliffe, former prior of Blackfriars, like Hume an upper-class Oxford graduate, suggests that English Catholicism may still have unexpected contributions to make, but in the 1990s it is closer in its predicament and problems to other churches of Western Europe than in the past, and its future must depend increasingly upon the way in which wider issues facing Catholicism as a whole are tackled internationally.See also Canterbury; Chesterton, Gilbert Keith; Greene, Graham; Manning, Henry Edward; Modernism; Newman, John Henry; Oxford movement; Ultramontanism; Waugh, Evelyn.

Bibliography

Bossy, John. The English Catholic Community 1570–1850. London: Darton, Longman and Todd, 1975.

Hastings, Adrian. A History of English Christianity 1920–1990. London: SCM Press, and Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1991.

Norman, Edward. Roman Catholicism in England. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.

ADRIAN HASTINGS

England, John, 1786–1842, Irish-born bishop of Charleston, South Carolina (1820–42). Considered liberal by his French ecclesiastical colleagues, England believed that the success of Catholicism in the United States depended upon the Church's ability to adapt to the political and cultural milieu of the people. His accomplishments were numerous: he established a newspaper, The United States Miscellany (1823); founded a seminary for native-born clergy (1825); addressed the U.S. Congress (1826); organized a diocesan religious community, the Sisters of Our Lady of Mercy (1829); and created a diocesan constitution that called for lay participation in annual diocesan conventions. England's insistence on episcopal cooperation initiated the councils of Baltimore. See also Baltimore, councils of; United States of America, Catholicism in the.

English Martyrs, those executed for their profession of faith from the time of Henry VIII to that of Charles II. For Catholics, the English Martyrs are the approximately 360 people executed for their allegiance to the faith and the pope (and, after 1570, for seeking the overthrow of the English monarch) from 1535 to 1680. The Holy See approved 316 as martyrs in 1886, of whom 42 were canonized as saints (1935, 1970), including John Fisher, Thomas More, and Edmund Campion. Of the martyrs, the overwhelming majority were clerics; 93 were laypeople, including 4 women. The feast day of the Forty Martyrs, canonized in 1970, is October 25; for Fisher and More, June 22. For Anglicans and Protestants, the English Martyrs are the approximately 280 people executed under Henry VIII and Mary Tudor for advocating reform of the Church of England, including William Tyndale and Thomas Cranmer. Many of these martyrs are memorialized in the Acts and Monuments of John Foxe (1563), also known as "Foxe's Book of Martyrs." See also Forty Martyrs of England and Wales; martyr; martyrdom.

English Mystics, a group of fourteenth-century English spiritual writers known for their wisdom and originality. They were somewhat protected from academic controversy because they wrote in English, whereas most academics of the time wrote in Latin. Each of them was influenced by the eremitical spirit in England and a literary tradition of English spiritual writings. They based their spiritual teaching on personal mystical experience, and most of the time they directed their advice to individuals living outside religious communities. Richard Rolle, a hermit, addressed his poetry and scriptural commentaries to lay devotees or other hermits. Walter Hilton wrote his well-known Scale of Perfection for an anchoress. The anchoress Julian of Norwich described the compassion of God for individuals in her Book of Showings. The anonymous author of the Cloud of Unknowing, who also wrote The Book of Privy Counselling, The Epistle of Discretion, and translations of Denis's Hid Divinity and Benjamin Minor, directed his original works to a young solitary; his description of the true spirit of prayer and the way to progress toward union with God anticipate the teachings of John of the Cross. See also Cloud of Unknowing, The; Hilton, Walter; Julian of Norwich, Bl.; Rolle, Richard.

English translations of the Bible. See Bible, English translations of the.

enhypostasia (en-hi̲p-ah-stah-see'uh; Gk., "in the person"), an interpretation of the doctrine of Chalcedon regarding the full humanity of Jesus Christ originally proposed by Leontius of Byzantium (d. ca. 543) and later reaffirmed by John of Damascus (d. ca. 749). In this view, Jesus' human nature remained personal to himself, although it subsisted in, or was taken up by, the divine hypostasis (person) of the Logos. In other words, although rooted in the divine personhood of the Son of God, the personal humanity of Christ was not lost. This teaching stands in opposition to the theory of anhypostasis (Gk., "without a hypostasis") associated with Cyril of Alexandria (d. 444), which affirms the full humanity of Jesus but denies Jesus' human hypostasis, or personal humanity. Today, advocates of the enhypostasis theory maintain that it ensures the full humanity of Jesus better than the anhypostasis theory, while its critics claim that the enhypostasis theory compromises the unity of the one divine person, Jesus Christ. See also Chalcedon, Council of; Christology; hypostatic union; Incarnation, the.

enlightenment, period of, the final period of the catechumenal preparation before the reception of the sacraments of initiation. This final period usually takes place during Lent and through rituals and teaching concentrates on the question of conversion in the lives of the candidates. Conversion is presented as a profound reevaluation of the purpose and goals of life as prompted by the death and Resurrection of Christ (the Paschal Mystery). This process of prayer and reflection is celebrated in rituals that purify and enlighten—the scrutinies and the presentations.

The scrutinies consist of intercessions for the catechumens and prayers of exorcism after the readings and homily of the Mass, celebrated on the third, fourth, and fifth Sundays of Lent. Their aim is gradually to enlighten the conscience of the candidate. The so-called presentations are the handing over of the texts of two prayers central to Christian faith, the creed and the Lord's Prayer. These prayers are also a means of enlightenment. The creed (the Apostles' or the Nicene) is given during the week following the first scrutiny, preferably in the presence of a community, after the homily of the Mass. The prayer is recited by the presider and the assembly. The candidates may give back this prayer during the preparation rites of Holy Saturday. The Lord's Prayer is usually presented during the week following the third scrutiny. The candidates recite this prayer after their Baptism during the celebration of their first Eucharist. See also Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults; scrutinies.

Enlightenment, the, philosophical, political, and scientific movement of eighteenth-century Europe in which the ideas of the great seventeenth-century thinkers—Newton, Bacon, Hobbes, Locke, Descartes, and Spinoza—were carried forward by thinkers such as Diderot, Rousseau, Hume, and Kant, as well as popularized and disseminated in an effort to reform society. Enlightenment thinkers rejected tradition and authority, whether philosophical, political, or religious, and relied instead on human reason. Kant enjoined: "Have courage to use your own reason!" They had great confidence in the capacity of human reason, an optimism generated from the progress of the natural sciences, and hoped to extend this progress by applying reason to all problems of human life. The Enlightenment fostered important advances in science and technology and promoted humanitarian ideals of tolerance, equality, and freedom in social reforms.

Enlightenment figures derived a narrow conception of reason from the natural sciences. This promoted a tendency to view society and the human person in mechanistic and materialistic terms and to deny the validity of any knowledge that is not empirically verifiable, whether metaphysical or religious. This mechanistic and materialistic outlook and skepticism are reflected in Enlightenment thought in a strongly individualistic conception of society in which the state, considered the creation of sovereign individuals, exists to provide only for the minimal material conditions for human existence, that is, protecting one's person and one's property. Similarly, these thinkers accepted religion only as reduced to practical moral guidance, dismissing as groundless affirmations based on revelation and rejecting subservience to any authority other than reason.

For several generations the Catholic Church reacted negatively against Enlightenment values, but a greater openness came with the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). Many now speak of our time as the post-Enlightenment period, in which an uncritical reliance on reason is no longer accepted without question. See also faith and reason; philosophy and theology. JAMES LE GRYS enneagram (en'nee-uh-gram; Gk., "graph of nine"), a popular method of personality assessment. There are different versions regarding the origins of the system. The two major figures in its modern development are George Ivanovitch Gurdjieff (d. 1949), a Russian spiritual teacher, and Oscar Ichazo (b. 1931), a Bolivian mystic who is said to have brought it to the United States in 1970. American Jesuits played a key role in spreading its use for spiritual direction.

The system posits nine basic personality types with three centers of intelligence: affective, theoretical, and effective. Each personality type is defined by one compulsion: resentment, flattery, vanity, melancholy, stinginess, cowardice, escapism, vengeance, or indolence. Every person has one of these basic patterns and is ruled by its compulsion, defenses, and false self-image until redemption occurs. This brings corresponding virtues, which are the person's strong points.

There are different listings of these virtues in the various presentations of the enneagram system. One rendering includes: the reformer, the helper, the motivator, the artist, the thinker, the loyalist, the generalist, the leader, and the peacemaker.

Some consider the enneagram's focus to be negative, but many of its proponents strongly emphasize its positive characteristics, namely, its capacity to help individuals to understand and transform themselves and to improve and enrich their relationships with others.

Entrance, Great. See Great Entrance.

envy. See capital sins.

eparch (ep'ahrk; Gk., "ruler"), in Eastern canon law, the bishop who governs an eparchy (diocese) in his own name. He exercises this authority in full communion with the Apostolic See of Rome. Within a patriarchate he is elected by the synod of bishops. The equivalent in the Latin Church is the diocesan bishop. See also bishop.

eparchy (ep'ahr-kee; Gk., "territory under rule"), in Eastern canon law, a portion of the People of God under the pastoral care of a particular bishop (eparch). An eparchy constitutes a particular church in which the Church of Christ is present and active in a particular place. It is the equivalent of the diocese in the Latin Church. See also diocese.

Ephesus (ef'uh-suhs), a major Greek city on the western coast of Asia Minor and a center of early Christianity. It had a magnificent temple to the Greek goddess Artemis. The Apostle Paul used Ephesus as the center for his activities on his third missionary journey (Acts 19:10; 20:31) and wrote some of his Letters from there. It was the first church addressed in Revelation (1:11; 2:1–7). Ephesus was also traditionally associated with John the Apostle. Ignatius of Antioch (early second century A.D.) addressed one of his letters to the Ephesian church. In A.D. 431 Ephesus was the site of the third ecumenical council that condemned Nestorius, who held that there are two separate persons in Christ, one divine and one human, rather than one divine person. See also Ephesus, Council of; Nestorianism.

Ephesus, Council of, the third ecumenical council of the Church (431), summoned to settle a complex controversy between Nestorius and Cyril of Alexandria, but acknowledged today principally as the council that declared Mary the Mother of God (Gk., Theotokos). The Council of Ephesus was convoked by the Emperor Theodosius II at the request of Nestorius, whose preaching against use of the title Theotokos for Mary had ignited great controversy between Oriental bishops led by John of Antioch in support of Nestorius and the Alexandrian partisans of Cyril. Cyril actually opened the council prior to the arrival of John of Antioch and his adherents and managed to secure the condemnation of the absent Nestorius and his teachings that in Christ there are two persons and that Mary is mother of the human person, not the Mother of God. Upon their arrival at Ephesus, the Antiochian prelates convened their own council and excommunicated and deposed both Cyril and Memnon, the bishop of Ephesus. Of the two rival councils of Ephesus, however, the larger Cyrillian assembly won the approval of the Apostolic See and met again for a total of seven sessions, during which Nestorianism was officially condemned, John of Antioch was excommunicated, and the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed was established as the only acceptable formula of faith. Two years after the council's stormy inception, Cyril and John of Antioch forged an agreement whereby the Antiochians confessed that Mary is Theotokos and that two natures are distinguished in Christ but are united in one person. Cyril, on his part, agreed to refrain from further use of his contested formula about "the one nature of the Incarnate Word," and made no further mention of the anathemas against Nestorius. Ultimately, the Council of Chalcedon (451) affirmed adherence to the ordinances and the doctrinal declarations of that Council of Ephesus that had been under the guidance of Pope Celestine and Cyril of Alexandria.

Precisely what declarations were made by the Cyrillian council is still debated, as is the corresponding doctrinal significance of the Council of Ephesus. But as a result of the later agreements between John and Cyril, and since Cyril had expressly claimed to have formulated the faith of Nicaea at the first session of Ephesus, historians and theologians have tended to settle upon the following as the most noteworthy formulations of the Council of Ephesus: The council affirmed that within the one Christ, both Son of God and Son of Man two natures are conjoined without the suppression of either the divinity or humanity of Christ. Moreover, because Christians affirm not that the Word is united to a human nature but rather that the Word has become flesh, they rightly declare that the one Christ was born of Mary, suffered and died for us, and is worshiped as Lord. Consequently, the divine maternity of Mary is understood as concomitant to the mystery of the hypostatic union. Because the Council of Chalcedon (451) went further to clarify Christological terminology for this union, the Council of Ephesus is traditionally associated almost exclusively with the definition of Mary as Mother of God. See also Christology; Incarnation, the; Jesus Christ; Nestorianism; Theotokos. JANICE POORMAN

Ephesus, Robber Council of, also known as Latrocinium, a council held in Ephesus in 449 to deal with difficulties related to the condemnation of Eutyches, head of a large monastery in Constantinople. Eutyches' sharp denunciation of Nestorianism, a heresy that held that there are two persons in Jesus Christ, one human and one divine, was perceived by many to be equally, but oppositely, heretical. He was accused of Monophysitism, a heresy that denied that Jesus had a human nature, and was condemned by Flavian, archbishop of Constantinople, at the Synod of Constantinople in November 448 and was also deposed from the headship of his monastery. In response, he and his supporters called for a Council at Ephesus in August 449. Pope Leo I was present by virtue of his Tome to Flavian, as were the bishops who had condemned Eutyches the year before, but both were suppressed by the conciliar president, Dioscorus. When Flavian and the bishops protested, they were forcibly removed by soldiers. The first session thus ended with Eutyches' reinstatement. A second session later in the month dismissed other Nestorian bishops and condemned the doctrinal compromise struck by Cyril of Alexandria and John of Antioch in 433. In September, Pope Leo condemned the decisions of this latrocinium (Lat.),

"robber council." See also Ephesus, Council of; Monophysitism; Nestorianism.

Ephraem the Syrian, St., ca. 306–73, poet, theologian, and Doctor of the Church. A lay Christian, he founded a theological school at Nisibis under the auspices of Jacob. Here he taught until the city was ceded to the Sassanids in 363. He continued his composition and instruction in Edessa until his death.

Ephraem draws heavily from Jewish exegetical traditions in developing a complex matrix of symbols centering upon Christ. The Cross and paradise are intertwined in a manner distinct from Western concepts of "the Fall." Eve is counterbalanced by Mary, Adam by Christ, and the expulsion from paradise by a future readmission. Current feast day: June 18 (historically July 9 or February 1).

epiclesis (ep-ik'lay'sis; Gk., "calling down upon," "invocation"), in the liturgy, the prayer to God the Father for the coming of the Holy Spirit (or, rarely, the Word), especially the prayer in the anaphora (the central eucharistic prayer) for the Spirit to be sent (or to come) to sanctify the gifts of bread and wine, or the similar invocation for the blessing of the waters of Baptism. The eucharistic epiclesis became a source of dispute between Greeks and Latins in the fourteenth century when the Latin Scholastic theory of instantaneous transubstantiation of the substance of the bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ at the moment of consecration led to determining a specific "moment of consecration" in the liturgy. In the 1990s, ecumenical theologians avoid attempts to locate a "moment of consecration" at either the epiclesis or Words of Institution ("This is my body. . . . This . . . is . . . my blood" from 1 Cor 11:24–25), preferring to consider the entire Prayer over the Gifts, and not one of its isolated moments, as the consecratory prayer. See also Eucharistic Prayer.

epigonation (eh-pig-uh-nah'tee-awn; Gk., "on the knee"), a lozenge-shaped Byzantine liturgical insignia of stiffened vestment cloth, decorated with a cross, and measuring about one foot. It is worn on the right side of the body at knee-level, hanging from a tape around the neck or from the cincture, the rope worn around the midriff like a belt. Restricted to bishops at least until the fourteenth century, it is now also worn by the higher ranks of presbyters (priests) such as hegumens, archpriests, and archimandrites.

Epigonation

epikeia (ep-ee-ki̱'ah; Gk., epieikes, "act of justice"; Lat., aequitas, "equity"), also rendered as epicheia and epieikeia, an act of justice whereby, for the sake of the common good and the good of individuals, the intention of a law in a given instance is recognized as a higher norm of moral reasoning and interpretation than the letter of the law. A moral concept taken over from Aristotle (d. 322 B.C.), especially by Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) and Francisco de Suarez (d. 1617), epikeia means that a law need not be obeyed when its observance would be detrimental to the common good or the good of individuals. Its use does not imply that the law itself is invalid or that it can be disregarded at will. Epikeia is a principle of moral reasoning that is only applicable in specific instances under circumstances of necessity or urgency. Epikeia is opposed to legalism, which makes the observance of the letter of the law always primary, even over the demands of justice. See also canon law, interpretation of; justice; legalism; moral theology.

epimanikia (ep-ee-mahn-ih'kee-ah; Gk., "cuff," lit., "on the sleeves"), Byzantine liturgical vestment, a set of detachable cuffs of stiffened vestment material. Now worn by deacons, priests, and bishops, their use was restricted to bishops at least until the late twelfth century.

Epiphanius of Salamis, St. (ep-i-fay'nee-uhs), ca. 315–403, bishop of Salamis (365–403), known mainly for his Panarion, an attempt to refute all known heresies, which remains an important historical source. He figured prominently in the fourth-century campaign against Origenism, although he was not sympathetic to Theophilus's attempt to depose John Chrysostom. Feast day: May 12. See also heresy; Origenism.

Epiphany (Gk., "the manifestation"), a feast, probably of Eastern origin, celebrated on January 6. Where it is not observed as a holy day of obligation, it has been assigned to the Sunday occurring between January 2 and January 8. This feast, which was designed to supplant the pagan celebration of the winter solstice, celebrated in the East on January 6, may be an older celebration of the birth of Christ than that of December 25. When the feast of Christmas was adopted by the Eastern churches in the fourth century with an emphasis on the birth of Christ, their celebration of Epiphany then changed its focus to the baptism of Christ with a commemoration of the adoration of the three wise men. The Western Church seems to have accepted the feast of Epiphany from the church in Gaul by the fifth century, and the three themes of the adoration of the wise men, the baptism of Christ, and his first miracle at Cana seem to have been adopted in whole or in part by the various local churches. In the current liturgical calendar, the churches of the East and West celebrate the birth of Christ on December 25, with the East also commemorating the adoration of the three wise men. The theme of Epiphany in the East is the baptism of Christ, and in the West, the adoration of the newborn Jesus by the wise men.

episcopacy (Gk., episkopos, "overseer"), the highest level, or fullness, of the sacrament of Holy Orders, also known as the episcopate. Those ordained to the episcopacy are called bishops. The term denotes the body of bishops as well as the ecclesiastical system of governance in which bishops exercise pastoral authority over their own dioceses and over the whole Church in union with the Bishop of Rome.

"The order of bishops is the successor to the college of the apostles in teaching authority and pastoral rule.... Together with its head,... the episcopal order is the subject of supreme and full power over the universal Church" (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 22). See also bishop.

Episcopal Church, formerly known as the Protestant Episcopal Church in the U.S.A.; part of the worldwide Anglican communion. It currently has about two and a half million baptized members. The first Anglican church was built at Jamestown, Virginia, in 1607, and other congregations were gradually established on the American continent, but it was only after the American Revolution that the Episcopal Church became a fully autonomous body within the Anglican communion. Its first bishop, Samuel Seabury, received his consecration from bishops of the Episcopal Church in Scotland in 1784, and other bishops were consecrated in England in 1787 and 1790. The first General Convention of the Church was held in 1789, at which a constitution and canons were drawn up and a prayer book issued. General Convention, held every three years, continues to be the supreme governing body of the Church. It consists of a House of Bishops, in which all the bishops of the Church sit, and a House of Deputies, composed of elected representatives of the clergy and laity from each diocese. Either house may initiate legislation, and all acts of the convention require adoption in both houses.

All the varieties of theological positions and ecclesiastical parties that exist in the Church of England are also found in the Episcopal Church: there are "high church" or Anglo-Catholic Episcopalians whose doctrinal stance and liturgical style closely mirror those of the Roman Catholic Church; there are "low church" or evangelical Episcopalians who have a close affinity with the Protestant churches; there are those who are very conservative theologically (among them the group known as the Episcopal Synod of America); and there are those so radical that severe strains develop within the church over theological and ethical issues from time to time. There are, however, also some notable differences from the Church of England. Partly because of the freedom from state control and partly because of the absence of a resident episcopate in its early history, local congregations have much greater autonomy and power in the Episcopal Church; and because there are proportionately fewer Episcopalians at the Protestant end of the theological spectrum, they exercise much less influence on the church's life than is the case in England. Above all, the American context has encouraged the Episcopal Church to be less bound by tradition and more open to change and innovation than other parts of the Anglican communion. Thus, it is not surprising that practices such as the ordination of women and the communion of infants first gained firm hold within Anglicanism in the United States. Beside its involvement in the worldwide Anglican ecumenical dialogues with other churches (Lutheran, Orthodox, Reformed, and Roman Catholic), the Episcopal Church has entered into an agreement of "interim eucharistic sharing" with the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America. See also Anglicanism. PAUL F. BRADSHAW episcopal college. See bishops, college of.

episcopal conference, the periodic assembly of the bishops of a nation or a region for the purpose of addressing pastoral issues affecting those nations or regions. National conferences of bishops originated in Europe after 1848 when Pope Pius IX fled Rome in disguise, under pressure from the forces of Italian nationalism. They were in some cases hindered; they were not taken into consideration in canon law (1917). The conference of bishops as an important institution for the Church first gained formal recognition at Vatican II, where their establishment was recommended for the entire Church (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 22; Decree on the Bishops' Pastoral Office in the Church, nn. 37, 38). In the motu proprio (papal document) Ecclesiae Sanctae (1966) of Paul VI and in the new code of canon law (1983) they are placed in the hierarchy between the individual bishops of dioceses and the Apostolic See.

Nevertheless, the council and the postconciliar codification did not adopt the proposal of respected conciliar theologians to give to the conference of bishops general jurisdiction for all questions that pertain to a region with a unified ecclesial structure. These theologians argue that the conference of bishops will become an effective balancing mechanism between tendencies toward overcentralizing the Church on the one side and extreme particularizing of pastoral activity on the other. Theologically speaking, based on the principle of collegiality, an individual bishop could be bound by the resolutions of the majority of bishops in a region. Objections to this proposal were raised at the Second Vatican Council. It was feared that the binding resolutions of a conference of bishops would limit both the authority of a bishop in his diocese—an authority the council wanted to strengthen—and also the rights of the pope. Above the bishop stands iure divino (Lat., "according to divine decree") only the highest authority, the pope. Talk about collegial acts in the strict sense could not be applied to a conference of bishops, since such acts can be undertaken only by the college of bishops as a whole.

Pastoral Implications: Practical considerations addressed these basic objections. Regional legislation, which is seldom necessary, is better left to the episcopal conferences. Therefore, the current custom that any decisions taken by the bishops should come about only through a consensus will continue. The council has left open the fundamental question of the theological status of a conference of bishops. The codification follows the middle course. Instead of being granted general authority over pastoral and doctrinal matters, the conference of bishops was assigned various specific areas of authority. Binding resolutions in these areas of authority require a two-thirds majority of the bishops of a conference. Outside of these areas of authority, a joint action requires the agreement of all bishops.

According to the 1983 Code of Canon Law (cans. 447–59) a conference of bishops is an association of the bishops of a nation or of a definite region. Thus, alongside national conferences of bishops are also continental conferences of bishops, whose members include the bishops of dioceses and also all bishops who exercise an ecclesiastical office in the territory. A permanent board and a general secretariat are authorized to handle the conference's ongoing work; the conference elects a president.

After Vatican II: Since Vatican II, it has become clear that the general recognition of the conference of bishops by the council has proven to be a farsighted reform. Conferences of bishops have undeniably displayed their value in the areas of pastoral coordination and the presence of the Church in society. The pastoral letters of some conferences of bishops have received worldwide respect. Synods of bishops have repeatedly recommended that the theological status of the conference of bishops now be clarified. A working paper on this topic by the Roman Curia of 1988 met criticism from bishops and theologians. It repeated the objections presented at the council and denied that the conference of bishops has teaching authority.

More recent theological discussion has recovered the original intention of the council, which wanted to make connections between the conference of bishops and the institution of the patriarchs (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 22). The ancient Church developed a threefold ecclesial structure: the local churches, the regional community of the local churches, and the whole Church. Only in this form can the basic structure of the Church realize itself as the community of churches (Lat., communio ecclesiarum). The particular church needs the community of the neighboring dioceses of a nation or of a region in order to assume its mission in its social context. The whole Church needs the regional community of the Church in order to make possible catholic diversity. See also bishop; collegiality; Decree on the Bishops' Pastoral Office in the Church; National Conference of Catholic Bishops.

HERMAN J. POTTMEYER

episcopal vicar, office within a diocese held by a priest who functions as the bishop's vicar for people within a geographical segment of a diocese or for a specified group of the faithful, e.g., Hispanics. The episcopal vicar has, for such a group, authority comparable to that of a vicar general, i.e., he may perform certain acts of executive power in the diocesan bishop's name. He is considered a local ordinary. Vatican II called for the establishment of this office (Decree on the Bishops' Pastoral Office in the Church, n. 27). See also vicar general.

epistle. See letter.

epitaphios (ep-ee-tah'fee-aws; Gk., "funerary," lit., "on the tomb"), a large, rectangular Byzantine liturgical cloth bearing an image that depicts the scene of the deposition from the Cross and burial of the dead body of Jesus. The epitaphios is carried in solemn procession during Good Friday Matins and Vespers, and placed on a "tomb" in the center of the church for veneration until Holy Saturday Compline. Both the epitaphios and its Good Friday processional use originate in the "aer" or great veil carried in the Great Entrance procession and used to cover the eucharistic gifts after their deposition on the altar.

epitrachelion (ep-ee-trah-kay'lee-awn; Gk., "on the neck"), Byzantine-rite liturgical stole worn by priests and bishops. Like the Western stole, it consists of a long band of cloth worn around the neck; the two bands that come down over the breast of the minister do not hang free but are sewn or buttoned together. See also stole.

equality, in moral theology, the condition of parity between persons or groups. Natural equality is based on inherent qualities of the human and is presumed in the use of "human nature" in moral argument. Political and social equality are terms that usually include a prescriptive content requiring, e.g., equal treatment under the law or mutual acceptance among members of society. The concern of Christian social ethics for the common good and supportive reciprocal relationships among persons assumes the equality of persons and leads to the development of principles of distributive and commutative justice that regulate relations among persons and things. See also common good.

equiprobabilism, an approach to moral decision making employed by Alphonsus Liguori (d. 1787) whereby an opinion favoring freedom from obligation had to be "equally probable" before it could be followed in practice. Catholic moral theology in the eighteenth century struggled with two extremes. On the one hand, there were certain laxist interpretations of moral laws that allowed applications without any genuine support in sound moral reasoning. On the other hand, a seventeenth-century reaction, particularly among the Jansenists, held to a rigorist position known as probabiliorism, whereby only the more probable opinion on a controverted issue could legitimately be followed. In confronting the extremes of rigorist legalism and laxist permissiveness, Alphonsus Liguori sought to protect the freedom of conscience as a moral certainty where a specific law proved doubtful. Alphonsus's equiprobabilism, by allowing a person to avoid the seeming obligation of a law only on condition that the contrary position was at least as probable, did not then succumb to permissive interpretations of the law. See also probabiliorism; probabilism.

Erasmus, Desiderius, also known as Erasmus of Rotterdam, 1466–1536, Dutch scholar, author, and critic central to the emergence of Christian Humanism and to both Protestant and Catholic Reformations. Educated in humanist fashion by the Brethren of the Common Life at Deventer and steeped in the Devotio Moderna, Erasmus developed a lifelong love of classical Latin and Greek language and literature. He adopted and then abandoned monasticism after six years (1492). He attended the Collège de Montaigu in Paris, but left in 1494, disenchanted with Scholastic theology and the lack of intellectual challenge.

While visiting England in 1499, Erasmus underwent a spiritual and intellectual transformation influenced by Thomas More and John Colet. They convinced him of the possibilities for employing his literary gifts in the service of Christian piety and reform, which could be furthered more through humanist study of the Bible and early Church Fathers than by Scholastic debates. He wrote several books after his return to the Continent, including the Enchiridion Militis Christiani (Handbook of the Christian Soldier, 1503, on Christian virtues). On a subsequent trip to England (1509), Erasmus produced his most famous work, The Praise of Folly. While appearing frivolous and ambiguous, this book was in fact an eloquent testimony to reason, humaneness, and Christian love.

Desiderius Erasmus, sixteenth-century Christian humanist and scholar, who, in spite of his own criticisms of the Catholic Church, remained faithful to it to the end; sixteenth-century painting by Hans Holbein the Elder.

In 1514 Erasmus returned to Basel, Switzerland, from Cambridge and produced critical editions of St. Jerome, Seneca, and Plutarch. He also published a Greek and Latin version of the NT, Novum Instrumentum Omne (1516), translating critical Greek terms differently from the standard medieval Vulgate. Along with the Enchiridion, Erasmus's biblical edition proved influential with early Protestant Reformers, especially Ulrich Zwingli and Martin Butzer, who were also struck by his attacks on formalism and Scholasticism and his appeal to an ancient biblical piety.

Despite influencing the early Reformers, Erasmus himself remained a devout Catholic, opposed the Reformation, and challenged Luther on free will and predestination in On the Freedom of the Will (De Libero Arbitrio, 1524). He attempted unsuccessfully to urge toleration in an atmosphere of growing religious violence, which led both Protestants and Catholics to accuse him of cowardice. Counter-reformers especially viewed Erasmus as a cause of the Protestant revolt, eventually placing his work on the Index of Forbidden Books.

Forced to leave Basel in 1529 because of the Reformation there, Erasmus settled in Catholic Freiburg, where he continued to work, editing the Church Fathers. He returned to Basel in 1535 and died there in 1536.

A renowned literary figure of the sixteenth century, Erasmus greatly influenced humanists and religious reformers alike in three different areas. First, his satires and colloquies combined with his great works the Enchiridion and Praise of Folly to call for a constructive, pious reform of life and Church, effective among both Protestants and Catholics. Second, his editions of early Christian writings and especially the NT laid the groundwork for exegesis and theology based on historically authentic texts. Finally, Erasmus used the new printing press more creatively than most of his contemporaries to establish a wide audience. See also Counter-Reformation/Catholic Reformation; Devotio Moderna; humanism, Catholic; Reformation, the. W. DAVID MYERS

Erastianism, the authority of the state over all ecclesiastical jurisdiction, named after Thomas Erastus (1524–83), a Swiss professor of medicine at the University of Heidelberg from 1558 who was made the elector Frederick's personal physician and a member of his council. Opposing efforts to institute Calvin's polity in the Palatinate, he argued instead for the polity of Zwinglian Zurich, in which the civil authority had ultimate jurisdiction over civil and ecclesiastical discipline and punishment. His work in defense of this position, the Explicatio Gravissimae Quaestionis (An Explication of a Most Serious Question) was published in London in 1589, influencing Richard Hooker's Treatise on the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity (1594–97) and the Westminster Confession. See also Church and state.

eremitic life. See hermit.

Eric IX, St., d. 1160, king and, by tradition, patron saint of Sweden. He supported Christian evangelization in his realm, but was killed by rebelling Swedish nobles in league with Danish invaders. He was never formally canonized.

Eriugena, John Scotus (air-ee-yoo'jah-nuh), ca. 810–ca. 877, Carolingian theologian. Arriving at the court of Emperor Charles the Bald ca. 845, Eriugena—the word means "Irish born"—taught in the palace school, writing a commentary on the liberal arts and a treatise on single predestination directed against Gottschalk of Orbais. About 860, the emperor asked Eriugena to prepare a translation of the works of Pseudo-Dionysius, replacing that made earlier by Abbot Hilduin of St. Denis. Eriugena followed this with other translations from the Greek.

Eriugena's greatest work is the dialogue Periphyseon or De Divisione Naturae ("On the Division of Nature"), composed ca. 862–64. Periphyseon stresses God's transcendence of all categories of being but also pictures God as the essence of all created beings. Condemned as pantheistic, the book was ordered burned in 1225 and placed on the Index of Forbidden Books when printed in 1681.

error [canon law], in canon law an individual's incorrect judgment regarding the meaning of the law or a mistake concerning the facts of the matter. In cases of error the law does not lose its force, and it is possible that such a mistake may result in an act that is canonically invalid (can. 15.1). For example, a priest thinks he does not need to obtain faculties to witness a marriage when, in fact, he does. The priest's acting on his error may result in a marriage considered canonically invalid. If the Church's legal system—or any legal system—were ordinarily to depend on the knowledge or beliefs of persons under the law, there would be no end to uncertainties and litigation, and the whole Church would suffer. Error must be distinguished, however, from cases of doubt in which the law does not bind, and from ignorance, which is a lack of knowledge altogether. See also doubt [canon law]; ignorance [canon law].

Error has no rights, a formula widely in use during the pre–Vatican II and conciliar debates over religious liberty and Church and state to indicate that, where there is a sufficient Catholic majority (as in Spain during the Franco regime), the state has the obligation of suppressing all forms of non-Catholic worship and religious practice. This is so, it was argued, because the rights of an erroneous conscience, even if sincere, cannot be considered equal to the rights of a conscience that is both sincere and correct. The Second Vatican Council (1962–65) rejected this thinking in its Declaration on Religious Freedom (n. 3). See also religious liberty.

eschatology, individual (Gk., eschatos, "last," "farthest"), the study of the final condition of individual human beings. Eschatology means literally the study of last things. Eschatological statements at first glance seem to be direct affirmations about the absolute future, whether of individual human beings or of the human race and the whole world. Traditionally, one speaks about death, divine judgment, purgatory, the resurrection of the body, eternal life, the Second Coming of Christ, the heavenly Jerusalem, the end of the world, the new heavens and the new earth, and hell.

However, Karl Rahner (d. 1984), in Foundations of Christian Faith, has suggested that eschatological statements are really about the present as it tends toward the future. Rahner's view stands in contrast to the approach, sustained by Jürgen Moltmann in Theology of Hope, that sees the eschaton breaking into time from the future, contradicting all temporal achievement, and bearing no relation to events that transpire in history, except to the Cross and Resurrection of Jesus.

Rahner contends that the dynamism of grace operating within the individual points ahead to death, judgment, purgatory, resurrection, and eternal life. Hell is the contradiction of this dynamism.

Dynamism of Grace: Death, of course, in itself is a natural event. But grace is working within human beings now to transform this natural event into a supernatural event wherein human beings ratify the meaning of their whole lives by committing themselves irrevocably to God. However, it is possible for an individual to resist grace throughout life and at death to turn oneself irrevocably away from God. It is not known whether anyone ever does this.

This irrevocable commitment for or against God coincides with a divine judgment that makes real what the individual has definitively chosen. This is the particular judgment.

Present within the dynamism of grace is the call to repentance and purification. As it operates within the decisive moment of death it brings about perfect repentance and purification from every sinful tie. Residual selfishness causes the person to experience this purification as a kind of suffering that is joyfully embraced. This is purgatory.

The grace of the Spirit now dwelling in our mortal bodies is already the seed of the resurrection. It is a participation in divine life, whose full effect is to transform the mortality of our flesh into the immortality of a glorified body after the model of the Risen Christ (1 Cor 15:49, 53).

Finally, the eternal life of Beatific Vision, unfailing love, and unselfish joy is the final and unending fruit of the present participation in divine life through grace.

There is no dynamism toward hell or eternal punishment. But human self-centeredness can lead one to resist the dynamism of grace and to so center one's life in oneself that one is cut off from God as the last end. Such a person would be lost and would experience the frustration of the fundamental orientation toward God as radical and unending suffering. See also Beatific Vision; eternal life; heaven; hell; judgment, particular; last things; purgatory.

JOHN H. WRIGHT

eschatology, universal (Gk., eschatos, "last," "farthest"), the study of the final state of the universe, the goal toward which God is moving all creation. Like individual eschatology, universal eschatology does not make statements directly about the future, but about the power now at work in the world to bring about God's intended goal.

This power is found in the Risen Christ, who himself has passed to the end state. Underlying the consummating activity of Christ is the evolutionary movement of the universe. This is the natural foundation that his grace elevates and brings to perfection. Matter possesses the inherent tendency to bring forth life, sentience, intelligence, and freedom under the personalizing presence of God. God intends this development in order to bring creatures into personal relationship with God. This movement is summed up in Christ, through whom God "created the worlds" and who "sustains all things by his powerful word" (Heb 1:2, 3). The Risen Christ, by acting within the universe and communicating the Holy Spirit, shares with the world, especially with intelligent creatures, his access to the Father. This is God's "plan for the fullness of time, to gather up all things in him, things in heaven and things on earth" (Eph 1:10).

The present activity of Christ is to "reign until he has put all his enemies under his feet" (1 Cor 15:25). He looks forward to the time of his Parousia or Second Coming, when he will fully exercise "the power that also enables him to make all things subject to himself" (Phil 3:21).

The Final Events: This final exercise of power will manifest itself first in the resurrection of the dead. This is not simply restoration to life, but an act conforming us to Christ who "will transform the body of our humiliation that it may be conformed to the body of his glory" (Phil 3:21).

Sinners also will be raised, "to shame and everlasting contempt" (Dan 12:2; see also John 5:29). For the action of Christ in raising the dead is also the act of general judgment (Matt 25:31–46). This judgment is not just a way of letting everyone know how everyone else has done. It is an effective divine action exercised by the Son of God to realize in the world what God has intended from the beginning. While it is essentially a faithful and effective response to the love of those who have done good, it is also a response ratifying the self-chosen separation from God of those who have done evil.

The transformation of the present world into the new heaven and the new earth (Rev 21:1) could conceivably take place when the physical universe collapses in upon itself in a reversal of the Big Bang. The whole nature of matter could be transformed to become fully subject to spirit. At this moment Christ "hands over the kingdom to God the Father . . . so that God may be all in all" (1 Cor 15:24, 28). See also heaven; hell; judgment, general; kingdom of God [in the Bible]; kingdom of God [theology of]; last things; purgatory.

JOHN H. WRIGHT

espousals, spiritual. See marriage, spiritual.

essence (Lat., essentia, Gk., ousia, "what something is"), that which makes something the kind of thing it is. The term came into Christian theological usage (in its Greek form) in the attempt to understand how Jesus could have a human and a divine essence, yet not be two distinct persons. See also homoousios; Incarnation, the.

Essenes (es-seens'), a Jewish party, like the Pharisees and Sadducees, that flourished in Palestine from about the mid-second century B.C. to the defeat by the Romans, ca. A.D. 70. Descriptions of the group are found in first-century authors, both Jewish (Philo, Josephus) and Roman (Pliny), but not in the NT, the Mishnah, or the Talmud. The Essenes are described as devoted to the Torah, ascetic, highly organized in structure, holding property in common, and believing in providence and the immortality of the soul (but not necessarily bodily resurrection). They lived in towns throughout Judea.

Pliny narrates that on the northwest shore of the Dead Sea there was a settlement of Essenes, which many scholars think included the scribes of the Qumran scrolls. See also Dead Sea Scrolls; Qumran.

Estonia, Catholicism in. See Baltic countries, Catholicism in the.

Eternal City, a title for the city of Rome reflecting the widespread belief that the end of Rome would mean the end of the world. Because the pope is the Bishop of Rome, the term appears frequently in Church prose, since it is believed that the Church will last until the end of time. See also Rome.

eternal life, a participation in the life of God, which begins in the present and comes to fullness beyond death. It is not just unending existence, which even the damned would have. The expression "eternal life" first appears in late OT literature. The prophecy of Daniel says of the final consummation: "Many of those who sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt" (Dan 12:2; see also Wis 5:15; 2 Macc 7:9).

At the time of Christ, the idea of eternal life was current in Jewish religious thought. A young man asked Jesus: "Good Teacher, what must I do to inherit eternal life?" (Mark 10:17). Jesus himself used the expression in his own teaching, e.g., "the righteous [will go away] into eternal life" (Matt 25:46). In Johannine literature eternal life is a central theme: "For God so loved the world that he gave his only Son, so that everyone who believes in him may not perish but may have eternal life" (John 3:16).

It is not enough to say that in eternal life the mind finally sees all truth and the will possesses all good. Eternal life essentially is living in personal relationship with God through the work of Jesus Christ and the gift of the Holy Spirit. This relationship begins in the graced activity of the present life and unfolds hereafter. Faith, hope, and love become intuitive vision, unselfish joy, and unfailing love.

The face-to-face vision of God in eternal life (1 Cor 13:12; Rev 22:4; 1 John 3:2) is the future perfection of the personal knowledge of God that has begun in faith. In John's Gospel, Jesus likens the union of knowledge between him and his followers to the union between him and the Father: "I know my own and my own know me, just as the Father knows me and I know the Father" (John 10:14b–15a). Indeed, Jesus in prayer describes eternal life as knowing the Father, "the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom you have sent" (John 17:3).

The unselfish joy of the future (Matt 25:23; John 17:13; Rom 8:18) is the transformation of our present hope and joyful confidence of one day possessing God. Already human beings may taste the peace that "surpasses all understanding" (Phil 4:7) and know the joy that no one can take from them (John 16:22).

The unfailing love of heaven (1 Cor 13:8; Rom 8:39; John 17:23) is the eternal realization of a present loving union with God. Paul sees the special excellence of love in this, that whereas other charismatic gifts, like prophecy, speaking in tongues, and knowledge, pass away, "love never ends" (1 Cor 13:8). Such persons are already grasped and transformed by the love of God that will bring them into the fullness of eternal life (Eph 2:4–7). See also Beatific Vision; heaven; immortality. JOHN H. WRIGHT eternity, an attribute of God, denoting God's timelessness. Time is defined in relation to change (Aristotle, Physics 4.12). Words that depend on the notion of time, like "before" and "after," have meaning only in relation to a being that has changed. Simply removing a beginning and an end from time does not alter the essence of time since unending change is still change (sempiternity). Eternity, then, does not mean a time with no beginning and no end. Eternity as timelessness must involve no change, i.e., immutability.

Immutability refers to God's perfection. God neither grows nor deteriorates in knowledge and goodness. God enjoys the fullness of life "always." Since God is unchanging in perfection, God is eternal. The human hope for eternity is the hope to share in God's fullness of life. See also God.

Ethelbert, St., d. 616, king of Kent from ca. 560 to 616 and first Christian king in England, converted by his Frankish wife, Bertha, and baptized ca. 601. Through her influence he had also received the mission of Augustine of Canterbury, sent to England by Pope Gregory the Great in 597. Feast day: February 25. See also England, Catholicism in.

Etheria (eth-ee'ree-ah). See Egeria, Pilgrimage of.

ethics, Christian, those moral norms that are thought to be distinctive of Christianity; the academic discipline that reflects on morality from the perspective of Christian belief. Some scholars draw a distinction between Christian ethics, which they associate with Protestant traditions, and moral theology, which is related to the Catholic and Anglican traditions. This distinction reflects the historical lack of contact among Protestant, Catholic, and Anglican scholars, which led in the past to the discussion of quite different problematics among scholars who were concerned with the moral life from a Christian perspective. It also reflects the distinctive influence of the practice of the sacrament of Penance (now Reconciliation) on Catholic, and to a lesser extent Anglican, moral thought. But the influence of the ecumenical movement, and the decline of the practice of individual confession, have led to a convergence of the concerns and approaches of Christian ethicists and moral theologians today. See also moral theology.

Ethiopian Catholic Church, the ecclesiastical community of Ethiopian-rite Catholics who are in communion with Rome. It is the Catholic counterpart to the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, which separated itself from full communion with Rome when it rejected the teaching of the Council of Chalcedon (451) that in Christ there are two natures, human and divine, and not only a single divine nature, as the Monophysites held.

After some early unsuccessful missionary activity by Dominican friars, in the sixteenth century the Portuguese Jesuits became involved in a major effort to bring the Ethiopian Church into union with Rome.

Largely through the efforts of Father Peter Paez, the Ethiopian negus (king) Susenyos became Catholic and declared his new faith the state religion in 1622. In 1623, Pope Gregory XV appointed another Portuguese Jesuit, Affonso Mendez, as Ethiopian patriarch. Formal union of the two churches was proclaimed when Mendez arrived in Ethiopia in 1626.

However, Mendez imposed a series of latinizations on the Ethiopian liturgy, customs, and discipline, which Susenyos then tried to enforce with cruelty and bloodshed. Susenyos died in 1632, and his successor was hostile to the union. In 1636 Mendez was expelled, the union was dissolved, and many Catholic missionaries were put to death. The country was closed to Catholic missionary activity for two hundred years.

In 1839 limited activity was resumed by the Lazarists and Capuchins, but public hostility was still very strong. It was only with the accession of King Menelik II to the throne in 1889 that Catholic missionaries could again work freely in the country. Their activity expanded in Ethiopia during the Italian occupation from 1935 to 1941, as it had earlier in Eritrea, which had been under Italian control since 1889.

The present ecclesiastical structure of the Ethiopian Catholic Church dates from 1961, when a metropolitan see was established at Addis Ababa, with suffragan dioceses in Asmara and Adigrat. Most Ethiopian Catholics, numbering in 1992 about 125,000, live in Addis Ababa and Asmara.

The church maintains minor and major seminaries in each of the three dioceses. An Ethiopian College was founded in Rome within the Vatican walls in 1919. See also Africa, Catholicism in; Chalcedon, Council of; Eastern Catholics and ecumenism; Eastern Catholics and Rome; Eastern churches; Eastern liturgies; Eastern rites; Ethiopian rite. RONALD G. ROBERSON Ethiopian rite, the liturgical and ecclesial tradition of the Ethiopian Orthodox and Ethiopian Eastern Catholic churches. In the second half of the fourth century a bishop for the Kingdom of Axum was consecrated in Alexandria and began the conversion of Ethiopia. Egyptian influence was strengthened by the presence in Ethiopia from 480 of monks who had received their monastic initiation in Egypt. At the same time, monks from Syria were also active in the region. From these beginnings until 1270, when the predominance in Ethiopia of the Coptic Church and its rite were reaffirmed, little is known about the history of the Ethiopian rite. But its Alexandrian origins are still visible, especially in the eucharistic liturgy, monastic hours, liturgical vestments, and liturgical year, which, like the Coptic, has a large number of fast days.

The Ethiopian rite is also distinguished by a number of Jewish usages. Some scholars trace this to the Jewish origins of the original Christian community, others to the large Jewish community in Ethiopia, and still others to later Judaizing tendencies (keeping the Sabbath, circumcision, dietary rules) and the influence of apocryphal literature, such as the books of Enoch and the Ascension of Isaiah. In addition to the customary services common to all traditional Eastern churches, the popular Ethiopian folk tradition includes a large body of legendary and folkloristic material and practices. It is a church culture based more on popular and monastic traditions and ritual practices than on speculative theology or religious instruction. The traditional liturgical language, Ge'ez, is a dead language, but in the twentieth century Amharic, now the official tongue of Ethiopia, has been used in the liturgy.

Peculiar to this rite is the presence of not one but three distinct Divine Offices, only one of which is derived from the Coptic monastic Horologion. The other two are independent, native offices. The Ethiopian rite is thus a synthesis of Egyptian and indigenous Ethiopian elements, and cannot be labeled simply a branch of the Alexandrian tradition. See also Eastern churches; Ethiopian Catholic Church.

ROBERT F. TAFT

Études (ay-tood'; Fr., "studies"), French Jesuit journal of religious and cultural thought. Founded in 1856 in Paris, it has chronicled and confronted the French dialogue between Catholicism and society. Since World War II and Vatican II (1962–65) its horizons have become global and its emphases frequently on ethical issues.

eucharistic adoration, a devotion centered on worshiping Christ as Divine Lord and Savior in the consecrated bread (and wine). Though such adoration is expressed in the liturgy itself, this term has come to designate nonliturgical worship, usually involving exposition of the Blessed Sacrament. Many persons also have engaged in such adoration privately through visits to the Blessed Sacrament.

Though special reverence and adoration were offered the eucharistic Christ in the early Church, eucharistic adoration outside of Mass rose to prominence only in the thirteenth century. Often in the popular mind, it replaced the Mass and reception of Communion as the most significant Christian experience of worship. Current ecclesiastical legislation governing worship seeks to reintegrate eucharistic worship outside of Mass with the Mass itself. Devotions are seen as prolongations of thanksgiving, of interior communion with one's saving Lord, of prayer for the Church and world, all of which are celebrated and actualized in the Eucharistic Liturgy. See also Benediction; Blessed Sacrament; Real Presence.

Eucharistic Congress, a series of over forty-five major meetings or assemblies held since 1881 for the purpose of deepening understanding of, and devotion to, the Eucharist. The term may refer to local, regional, or international meetings.

Marie Marthe Emilia Tamisier (1834–1910) conceived the idea of the Eucharistic Congress both to foster eucharistic devotion and to respond to the antireligious policies of the French government. Her first efforts were not successful, but in 1881 she obtained the approval of Pope Leo XIII. The first Congress was held at the University of Lille, in France.

The success of the international meetings has also spurred the development of national congresses. Several have been held in the United States since 1895 when the first American Eucharistic Congress convened in Washington, D.C.

eucharistic devotions, nonliturgical religious practices centered on Christ's presence to the Church in the reserved Sacrament. Public or private, they include exposition of the Blessed Sacrament (for long or short periods), usually followed by Benediction, holy hours of adoration, and eucharistic processions and visits.

Eucharistic devotions developed from the thirteenth century, inspired by the desire of the faithful to look at and to contemplate Christ in the sacred species (the consecrated bread and wine) in order to foster interior communion with him. Emphasis on the divinity of Jesus, convictions of personal unworthiness to receive Communion, and the coldness and distance of the Latin Mass created a need for such devotions. Their simplicity, their use of local languages, and the warmth of their hymns and prayers filled that need, engaging persons not only in mind but also in heart.

Because of the value of eucharistic devotions, the Congregation of Rites, in a 1967 instruction, Eucharisticum Mysterium, sought to promote them. The congregation called for their reintegration with the Mass, the "source and summit" of Christian life. It stipulated that Scripture readings and suitable hymns and prayers should accompany eucharistic devotions, particularly exposition, for such devotions should be seen as prolongations of the Eucharistic Liturgy itself. Thus, they provide Christians with additional inspiration and time to contemplate the mysteries celebrated in the Eucharist. Eucharistic devotions offer believers further opportunities to give thanks to God for God's redemptive love, to enter into personal communion with Christ, to seek from him strength for the journey of discipleship, and to pray with Christ for the Church and the world. See also Blessed Sacrament; devotions; Eucharist.

GERARD H. LUTTENBERGER

EUCHARIST

The Eucharist (Gk., "thanksgiving") is the sacramental celebration of the Paschal Mystery (i.e., Christ's dying and rising for humankind) in a context of praise and thanks for all that God has done and continues to do. During the Eucharist the Holy Spirit is called down on the assembly that it might become the Body of Christ, the People of God.

THE NEW TESTAMENT CHURCH

The Christian Scriptures give four accounts of the Last Supper (Mark 14:22–25; Matt 26:26–29; Luke 2:15–20; 1 Cor 11:23–26), in which Christ took the bread and cup of a sacred meal and transformed them by his action and words. John's Gospel also has a Last Supper scene, but in place of the bread and cup actions, the writer recounts Christ's washing the feet of his disciples. Some Scripture scholars point out, however, that there is a strong eucharistic element in John's narration of the multiplication of the loaves and fishes and the "bread of life" discourse of ch. 6. The four accounts can be reduced to two traditions (Mark/Matthew and Luke/Paul) by looking at the words spoken over the bread and cup and the theological ideas that are emphasized. As an example, in the words over the cup, Mark and Matthew speak of the "covenant," referring to the Sinai covenant that Moses and the people made with God (Exod 24:5–8). Paul and Luke prefer to speak of the "new covenant in my blood," echoing a phrase of the prophet Jeremiah (Jer 31:31–34).

These discrepancies do not change the essential meaning of Jesus' words and actions at the Last Supper. Among the possible reasons for these differences is the fact that twenty to fifty years elapsed before these accounts were actually written down. These accounts also bear marks of liturgical use over the years by Christian communities. What is common to all the accounts is that a religious meal was celebrated by Christ and his disciples on the night before his death during the course of which Christ gave a new and transforming meaning to the bread ("This is my body") and to the wine ("This is my blood"). These words prophetically predict and enact Christ's self-gift on the cross for all people.

THE JEWISH CONTEXT

As a Jew, Christ was formed in and influenced by the prayer and worship traditions of his people. The Last Supper is described as a Passover meal, which traditionally celebrates God's liberation of the Jewish people and the continuing covenant with them. Such a celebration offers a model for understanding Christ's liberation of the world from sin through his death. The ways in which Jews prayed to God in the Temple and in the synagogue were also a rich heritage that influenced Jesus' prayer at the Last Supper. The bread and cup in the religious meals of Jews were accompanied by a berakah (Heb.), a blessing and thanksgiving to God for all the benefits received. Some scholars detect this type of prayer in Jesus' actions (he took the bread and cup and blessed and thanked God). Other scholars point to another form of prayer, the todah (a "sacrifice of praise"), in which a thank offering of leavened bread and prayers of praise were offered. This meal sacrifice with prayer was another way to celebrate and renew the covenant with God. This type of meal could have provided a way of interpreting Jesus' death as a new covenant with God. Although these scholarly discussions continue, all agree that the Last Supper is a religious meal that theologically interprets and explains Christ's death on the cross.

The meals of Jesus with sinners, as frequently described in the Gospels, also have a profound meaning within the Jewish tradition. In the Hebrew Scriptures the reign of God at the end of time is depicted as a festive meal. This image is continued by Jesus in his parables and his actions. A frequent criticism by Jesus' enemies is that he eats with sinners, an action a pious Jew would avoid. Yet Luke's Gospel in particular emphasizes these meals with social outcasts (e.g., tax collectors, prostitutes) as a prophetic action showing that God's mercy and reign were open to anyone who would repent. The Last Supper should be understood within the important context of meals with sinners in Christ's public life and reconciling meals in eating scenes with his disciples after his Resurrection.

THE POST–NEW TESTAMENT CHURCH

The first Christians continued to celebrate the Last Supper in their gatherings. Although Christ's actions and words are described as taking place during the course of a ritual meal, by the time Paul writes to the Christians at Corinth in the mid-first century, the celebration of the Eucharist occurs at the end of a meal shared together. Since the first Christians were Jews, they initially continued their prayer in the Temple and celebrated their Eucharist domestically. As Jews in other parts of the Roman Empire became converts, they too adapted their Eucharist to the style of prayer with which they were familiar. (Some scholars, for example, believe that chs. 9–10 of the Didache, an early East Syrian Christian manual, may be such an adaptation.)

As Gentiles became converts, the eucharistic celebrations continued to be adapted to the culture and practical situations of the converts. Eventually "families" of such prayers, reflecting different geographical areas of the Roman Empire, developed (e.g., Western eucharistic prayers including Roman, Mozarabic, Gallic, Ambrosian, and North African examples). Justin Martyr, writing in the mid-second century, describes the Eucharist at Rome to non-Christians as offering bread and wine to a presider who then gives praise and glory to God through the name of the Son and the Holy Spirit, followed by a lengthy thanksgiving. Such prayers were usually improvised by the presider.

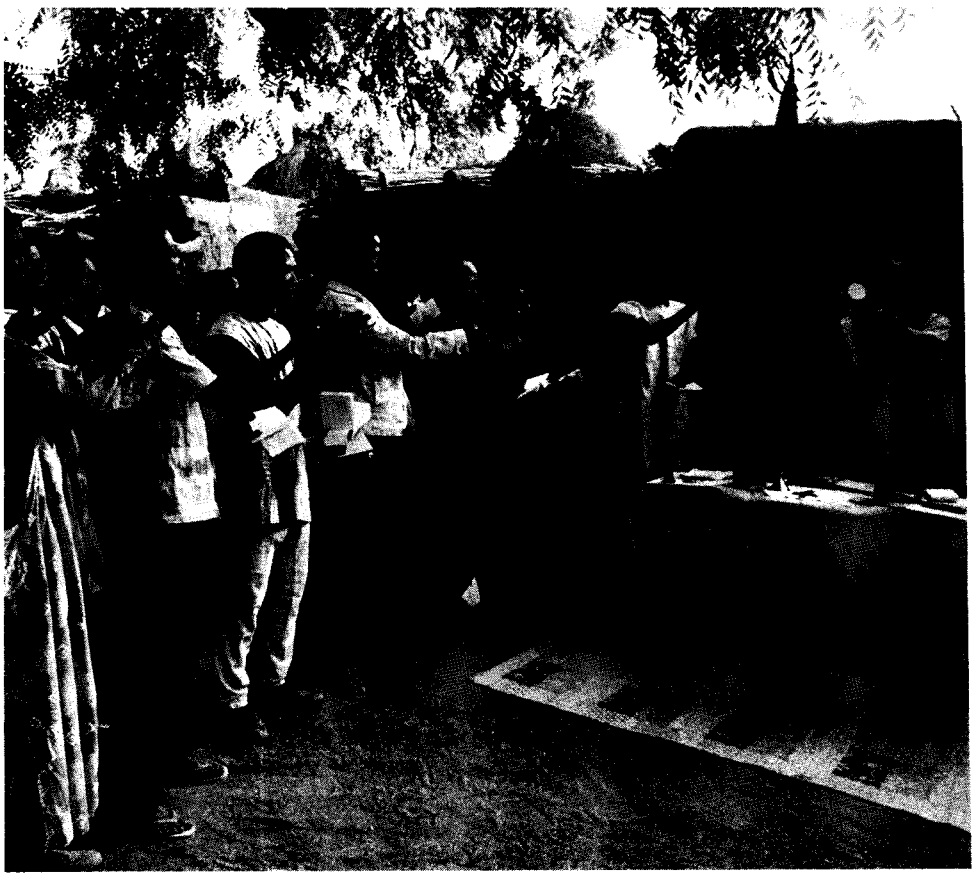
In the first three centuries of the Christian era, the local churches were periodically persecuted. These persecutions had two practical effects on the types of eucharistic teaching that were presented. Against frequent pagan distortions of the meaning and practice of the Eucharist, apologists like Justin Martyr at Rome and Tertullian at Carthage in North Africa gave limited descriptions and explanations of the Eucharist to pagan readers. As the persecutions continued, local churches saw the need for preparing candidates more extensively for their initiation in the Christian life.

This preparation was called the catechumenate and could extend several years. When these candidates were finally initiated, they were baptized and anointed and received the Eucharist as part of the one initiation rite. In many local churches it seems that these sacraments were explained to the newly initiated only after they had been received. In the fourth century, with the end of the persecutions, catechumenal leaders' instructions were written down. Thus, the eucharistic teachings of Eastern (e.g., of Cyril of Jerusalem and Theodore of Mopsuestia) and of



The celebration of the Eucharist in Mali, West Africa, with the active participation of the congregation gathered around the altar. Although Catholicism was introduced in Mali in the second half of the nineteenth century, Catholics comprise only 1 percent of the total population of almost 10 million.

Western churches (e.g., of Ambrose of Milan and Augustine of Hippo in North Africa) have survived. These teachings on the Eucharist emphasize Christ's death for humankind and its practical moral applications to the lives of the converts, as well as repeat Paul's teaching that the one bread of the Eucharist makes Christians the one Body of Christ.

THE MEDIEVAL CHURCH

The transition from the eucharistic preaching of Augustine and Ambrose in the fifth century to the early medieval eucharistic teaching and practice is best understood as a movement away from symbolic thinking about the Eucharist (i.e., why Christ gave the Eucharist to the Church) to an instrumental thinking (i.e., a practical "how" the bread becomes the body of Christ). There were two immediate effects of this change to instrumental thinking: the proliferation of miracle stories and devotional practices about the Eucharist and the types of theological discussions about the Eucharist that eventually led to heresy.

These changes must be seen against the historical and social background of the barbarian invasions that devastated the religious, cultural, and sociopolitical world of Augustine and his contemporaries. The practical result was an impoverishment of religious and ethnic culture from which people drew their symbolic resources and inspiration. Religious education also suffered, with the result that most people no longer understood the highly developed rituals of the medieval Mass or the Latin language in which it was now celebrated.

The early medieval period witnessed a decrease in reception of Communion by eucharistic participants. Also, stories about miraculous hosts or wine that emphasized the presence of Christ in the Eucharist in a way that caught ordinary people's imagination were widely disseminated. These miracle stories frequently replaced people's religious understanding about the Eucharist and often misled them by their one-sided emphasis on the purported sensational aspects of the Eucharist and by encouraging a passive eucharistic piety rather than an active participation in the Eucharist.

In a similar way, some theologians described the parts of the Mass in fanciful and metaphorical ways (e.g., the priest washing his hands at the altar refers to Pontius Pilate washing his hands of the judgment of Christ). These problems are best exemplified in the growing medieval practice of people running from church to church in order to be present only at the moment in the Mass after the consecration when the host and cup were elevated, because of a popular belief that looking at the Eucharist helped preserve youthfulness.

Other examples of eucharistic practice divorced from the larger purposes of the sacraments were the proliferation of private Masses because of a privatized piety and especially a preoccupation with Masses for the dead. The ancient custom of reserving some of the consecrated host for the Communion of the sick resulted in the construction of elaborate tabernacles, which eventually were moved to the main altar (except in cathedrals) and promoted a eucharistic piety frequently unconnected to the celebration and purposes of the Mass.

The theological discussions about the Eucharist also reflected concerns different from those of Augustine or Ambrose. As theologians emphasized the presence of Christ in the Eucharist rather than the Paschal Mystery, they searched for language that might help them. Until the ninth century, theologians did not have the sophisticated terminology of later medieval philosophy with which to discuss the Eucharist. As a result, in the debate about how Christ was present after the consecration of the bread and wine, their language tended to be vague, if not ambiguous. Theologians cited the texts of earlier writers like Augustine but without their contexts of church and eucharistic celebration.

These weaknesses finally coalesced into the first heresy about the Eucharist, that of Berengar of Tours in the eleventh century. In the oath that Berengar took at the Synod of Rome in 1079, he acknowledged that there was a substantial change from bread and wine to the body and blood of Christ. The term "substance" is a technical term that refers to the essence of a particular reality. Although this term would become more nuanced and developed in later medieval writing, it provided a way of affirming that Christ was really present in the Eucharist, once the earlier symbolic language of Augustine and others was no longer fully understood.

When Thomas Aquinas in the thirteenth century writes of the Eucharist, he retains the classical understanding of Augustinian symbol but also brilliantly employs the insights of Aristotle to discuss how bread and wine can be changed substantially into the Real Presence of Christ while the "accidents" (e.g., color, taste, shape) of bread and wine remain. This explanation, known as transubstantiation, had already been used at the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215.

Even with such an explanation, Thomas ultimately still insists that the Eucharist is a mystery no theological explanation can hope to master. Thomas also teaches that the priest acts "in the person of Christ" in consecrating the bread and wine with the words of Christ, for it is Christ who is acting.

But these sophisticated explanations did not touch the ordinary pastoral life of the European church. Ignorance and superstition were constant pastoral problems in the teaching and practice of the Eucharist among mostly illiterate Christians. By the sixteenth century there were major problems (e.g., rare reception of the Eucharist) and abuses (e.g., money was given so that the Mass would be offered for one's intention) that provoked some of the strongest attacks of Reformation theologians such as Martin Luther and John Calvin.

The Council of Trent (1545–63), while acknowledging in its pastoral sessions the rampant abuses of the sixteenth-century Church, reaffirmed the real, true, and substantial presence of Christ under the appearance of bread and wine after the consecration of the Mass. A new and reformed celebration of the Eucharist resulted from this reform council. Trent also encouraged a catechetical renewal with a more responsible preparation for the reception of the Eucharist. The Reformed churches attempted to return to a more biblical and less frequent celebration of the Lord's Supper and to a theology of ministry that did not privilege the role of the eucharistic presider as a consecrator of the bread and wine.

THE LITURGICAL RENEWAL

The contemporary renewal of eucharistic understanding and participation has its roots in the late-nineteenth- and early-twentieth-century liturgical movement, which sought to reconnect worship and sacraments of the Church more intimately with the lives of Christians. Liturgical scholars studied the development of the eucharistic celebrations in the Eastern and Western churches and rediscovered a rich heritage of celebrating and understanding the Mass. Biblical scholars uncovered many illuminating connections between Jewish prayer and worship that further enriched the contemporary appreciation of how the Last Supper was connected to the death of Jesus on the cross.

A priest elevates the consecrated blood of Christ at a Eucharist celebrated at St. Ann's Church, Cassopolis, Michigan.

Pope Pius X (d. 1914) in the early part of the twentieth century strongly encouraged a more frequent reception of the Eucharist and the earlier first reception by young children. Pius XII (d. 1958) introduced some limited liturgical reforms dealing with the Mass (e.g., eucharistic fasting) that facilitated participation, and his encyclicals on the Mystical Body and on liturgy signaled a more contemporary theological appreciation of the Eucharist in the daily life of the Church.

The discussions of Vatican II on worship and sacraments in the contemporary Church resulted in one of the most important documents of that council, the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, in 1963. In it the council members called for a full, conscious, and active participation in the liturgy that would preclude Christians' being strangers or silent spectators at its celebration. To facilitate participation, the council called for a reform of the eucharistic ritual and the use of the vernacular. The ancient practice of Communion under the species of bread and wine was restored in certain situations and concelebration of Mass by several priests was again permitted.

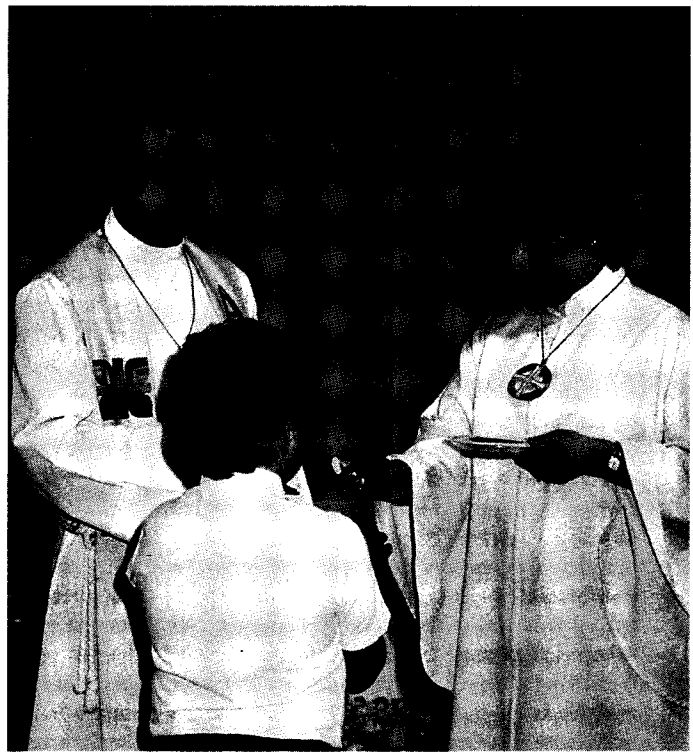
The postconciliar commissions that implemented the mandated liturgical reforms provided the Church with a renewed version of the "Roman" Canon (the only eucharistic prayer in use in the Western Church at the time of Vatican II) as well as several other eucharistic prayers, eventually including ones for Reconciliation and for children. Since the council acknowledged the need for adaptation of the liturgy to the cultural contexts of each local church and even allowed for a more radical adaptation in some situations, other eucharistic prayers were eventually approved (e.g., for the church of Switzerland and that of Zaire).

As a result of Vatican II's insistence on the importance of the celebration of the Eucharist in the life of the Church, postconciliar theologians have re-studied the Eucharist within its larger context, the worshiping Church. In other words, the Eucharist is always connected to the way in which Christians are the Body of Christ (Paul's teaching that because we eat the one bread, we are one body [1 Cor 10]). The teaching that the Eucharist is the sacrifice of the Cross has also been enriched by the scholarly insights of Scripture scholars so that an ecumenical consensus on this teaching now seems possible. Finally, the eucharistic presence of Christ has been better appreciated within the council's teaching on the other presences of Christ in his word, in the sacramental ministries, in the liturgical prayer of the Church, and in the worshiping assembly itself (Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, n. 7).



A eucharistic minister distributes Holy Communion to a young boy, while a priest waits to offer the chalice containing the Precious Blood.

See also Last Supper; Mass; Real Presence; Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults; sacrament; worship.

Bibliography

Hay, Leo. Eucharist: A Thanksgiving Celebration. Wilmington, DE: Michael Glazier, 1989.
Mazza, Enrico. The Eucharistic Prayers of the Roman Rite. New York: Pueblo, 1986.
Power, David. The Sacrifice We Offer. New York: Crossroad, 1989.
_____. The Eucharistic Mystery. New York: Crossroad, 1992.

REGIS A. DUFFY

eucharistic fast, the practice of abstaining from food and drink before receiving Communion. Current canon law stipulates that (1) water never breaks the fast; (2) one must abstain from solid food and liquids for one hour before communicating; (3) sick persons may take nonalcoholic liquid and medicine without restriction; (4) sick persons, elderly persons, and persons accompanying them may take food and alcoholic beverages until one-quarter hour before Communion.

Originally, Christians celebrated the Eucharist during a commemorative meal. Early abuses (see 1 Cor. 11:17–34), however, brought about the separation of the eucharistic memorial from the meal. Reverence for Christ, the desire to foster devotion, and the desire to forestall further abuses led to the practice of abstaining from all food and drink from midnight on before receiving Communion. This practice, documented in the third century, became universal by the fourth century. The current law originated with Pope Pius XII (1953, and again in 1957), Pope Paul VI (1964) and the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments (1973). See also Eucharist; fasting.

eucharistic minister, a person who distributes the Eucharist either within or outside of the celebration of Mass. The ordinary minister of the distribution of the Eucharist is the priest who presides at the celebration. However, when there are large numbers of people receiving Communion, various assisting ministers are employed. When present, the deacon distributes the cup and may also distribute the host. Special ministers of the Eucharist, both men and women, are permitted to function in the distribution during Mass when deacons and acolytes are not available and in the bringing of Communion to the sick (Immensae Caritatis, 1973). See also extraordinary minister of Eucharist.

eucharistic prayer, the liturgical expression of praise and thanksgiving for all that God has done in creation and in the Paschal Mystery (i.e., Christ's dying and rising for humankind) in and through the Holy Spirit. In the NT, the four accounts of the Last Supper (Mark 14:22–25; Matt 26:26–29; Luke 22:15–20; 1 Cor 11:22–26) narrate, with some variations, the last meal that Christ shared with his disciples on the night before he died. The tradition represented by Luke's and Paul's account (often called the Antiochene account) contains explanatory phrases in the words over the bread ("body [given] for you") and cup ("new covenant in my blood"). In the Marcan account there is an emphasis on the covenant ("my blood of the covenant which is poured out for many"). Although it is debated whether the Last Supper was a Passover meal or simply a farewell religious meal, this meal setting and its interpretation of the death of Christ provided a model for the early Christian communities in fulfilling Christ's command, "Do this in memory of me."

Early Christian Eucharists: The earliest Christian communities were composed of Jewish converts whose worship was modeled on that of the Temple and synagogue. There is still disagreement among scholars as to the particular Jewish prayer forms that influenced the eucharistic prayers of these communities. (The berakah, or "blessing," models, for example, are favored by some, while others point to the todah, or "sacrifice of praise," as the chief source of inspiration.) What is more certain is that the Eucharist of these first Christians continued to be celebrated within a meal, though by Paul's time, a decade or so after the Last Supper, the Eucharist followed the meal in the Christian community at Corinth. There are no extant eucharistic prayers from this earliest period because improvised or extemporaneous prayers were the normal style of worship, a practice that continued until at least the fourth century.

Texts of Early Eucharistic Prayers: In the Didache (Gk., "The Teaching," a late-first-century document on church practice) we find the first example of Jewish prayers, transformed by belief in Christ, that served either as table prayers or as a very early example of a eucharistic prayer (possibly the end of the first century). In ch. 9 the meal begins with a prayer of thanksgiving over the cup followed by a similar prayer over the bread and then a petition for the Church. In ch. 10, at the end of the meal, the prayers follow the order of the Jewish blessings for this portion of the meal (Birkat ha-Mazon) with three sections: God's name is blessed for the work of creation and redemption; there is a blessing of spiritual food and drink given to those who believe in Christ; and finally, there is a prayer for the Church, whose gathered members are a promise of God's final banquet at the end of time. Since the Lord's words over the bread and cup are lacking, some scholars believe this could not have been a eucharistic prayer. Others believe that it still might have been.

When the earliest known texts of eucharistic prayers are examined, the influence of Jewish prayer is still seen. In the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus from Rome (the text dates from 215, but the prayer itself may be much older) and in the prayer of Addai and Mari from Syria, there is either praise or thanksgiving for creation, followed by thanksgiving for redemption (a Last Supper narrative in the Apostolic Tradition), and then intercessions, a calling down of the Holy Spirit, and a final praise of God. The themes of these prayers generally centered on Christ (who is called God's servant-child), who has restored creation, revealed God's life, and destroyed evil.

Later Eucharistic Prayers: Eucharistic prayers from the fourth and fifth centuries in the Eastern and Western churches show that improvisation is no longer common and that there is a wide borrowing of texts from one another. (Some scholars believe that the eucharistic prayer in the West was already fixed by the first half of the fourth century.) The prayers usually are longer than earlier prayers, are more developed in their theology, and have acquired certain characteristics and order that permit us to divide them into families (East Syrian, West Syrian, Western, etc.). In the Western Church, the so-called Roman Canon gradually became the only text used.

On April 3, 1969, Pope Paul VI approved the new Roman Missal, which had been called for by Vatican II. It contained three new eucharistic prayers, in addition to the so-called Roman Canon. (The words of institution over the bread and wine were, however, to be identical for all forms of the Eucharistic Prayer.) In 1974, three eucharistic prayers for children and two for Masses of Reconciliation were also approved for experimental use. Subsequently, eucharistic prayers for some local churches (e.g., that of Switzerland and Zaire) have also been approved. See also anaphora; Canon of the Mass; Eucharist.

Bibliography

Mazza, E. The Eucharistic Prayers of the Roman Rite. New York: Pueblo, 1986.

Power, D. The Eucharistic Mystery. New York: Crossroad, 1992.

REGIS A. DUFFY

eucharistic presence. See Real Presence.

eucharistic spirituality, devotions and religious attitudes centered on the Eucharist. The Eucharist has served as a focus for Christian devotion since the earliest centuries, although the form that devotion has taken has varied. In the first through fifth centuries, devotion to the Eucharist was understood to effect a close identification of one's own life with that of Christ. Thus Ignatius of Antioch (d. ca. 107) could speak of his martyrdom as a eucharistic celebration of Christ's own sacrifice (Letter to the Romans). This identification of a Christian life of sacrifice with the sacrifice of Christ celebrated in the Eucharist continued well into the Middle Ages, when theologians, following the example of Augustine (d. 430) would most commonly identify a life of active faith and love as that which the Eucharist produced and that which it celebrated.

Starting in the twelfth century, a growing devotion to the Real Presence of the Risen Lord in the Eucharist added a new dimension to this earlier active form of spirituality. The Feast of Corpus Christi, the elevation of the host, the practice of the exposition of the Sacrament and other extraliturgical devotions gave rise, in the early modern period, to a number of new religious orders whose prayer life centered on meditation and contemplation on the eucharistic presence outside of the liturgy. Emphasis was placed on communing with Christ rather than imitation of Him. Lay devotions also followed this trend.

Liturgical renewal in the twentieth century revived the more active spirituality of the early Church. Both forms of spirituality now exist within the Catholic community. GARY MACY

Euchologion (ev-koh-loh'gee-awn; Gk., "prayer-book"), principal Byzantine liturgical book, equivalent to the old Roman Sacramentary, containing those prayers and formulas priests and deacons need to fulfill their roles in the liturgical services. Printed liturgical books distinguish between the "great euchology" and extracts thereof, such as the Hieratikon or Leitourgikon containing Eucharist, Vespers, and orthros (Matins); and the ritual, called the "small euchologion" or hagiasmaterion (book of blessings), containing the other sacraments, blessings, funerals, and occasional services.

Eudes, St. John, 1601–80, priest and founder of the Congregation of Jesus and Mary (the Eudists). Born in Normandy, France, and educated by the Jesuits at Caen, he was ordained in 1625 and served in the Oratory of Paris. For many years, he preached missions throughout France. In 1643 he left the oratory to found the congregation that bears his name. The principal work of the Eudists was the training of seminarians, though now Eudists are mostly involved in secondary education. He was canonized in 1925. Feast day: August 19.

Eugene. [names of popes]. See Eugenius III, Bl.; IV.

Eugenius III, Bl. [Bernardo Paganelli], d. 1153, pope from 1145 to 1153. Elected pope after being a Cistercian monk at Clairvaux and then abbot of Sts. Vincent and Anastasius, he was forced to flee Rome due to opposition from the senate and Arnold of Brescia, returning for good only in 1153 with the aid of Frederick I Barbarossa. Eugenius issued the first formal Crusade bull and authorized Bernard of Clairvaux to preach the Crusade. During his pontificate, he also sought to reform clerical and monastic life; Bernard addressed his famous treatise On Consideration to him. See also Bernard of Clairvaux, St.; Crusades.

Eugenius IV [Gabriel Condulmaro], ca. 1383–1447, pope from 1431 to 1447. He was made cardinal in 1408 by his uncle, Pope Gregory XII. He remained in papal service after his uncle was forced to abdicate at the Council of Constance (1415). As pope he resisted calling the Council of Basel (1431–38) and eventually tried to dissolve it as a threat to papal power. He yielded and recognized its validity in 1433. At the Council of Florence (1439–45), he negotiated a short-lived union with the Greek church that served as a model for all further unions based upon agreement in faith with diversity in rite. See also Basel, Council of; Florence, Council of.

Eulalia, St., d. ca. 304, virgin and martyr. She was burned at the stake in Mérida, Spain, at age twelve for allegedly denouncing a judge for attempting to induce Christians to renounce their faith. Feast day: December 10.

eulogia (ev-loh-gee'ah; Gk., "blessing"), term used for a blessing, also a holy place or object through which a blessing or other benefit was thought to be conferred. More specifically, the term eulogia is used for the consecrated eucharistic species (bread and wine) as well as for the unconsecrated bread offered by the faithful for use at the Eucharist, and distributed to them at the end of the liturgy. This blessed bread is now more commonly called antidoron. See also antidoron.

eulogy (yoo'luh-jee; Gk., "blessing" or "praise"), a sermon delivered at a funeral. Current regulations for funeral liturgies forbid the practice of delivering eulogies or such "verbal obituaries." Good words spoken in regard to the faithful deceased during a funeral liturgy ought instead be subordinated to the proclamation of God's saving work performed in them through Christ. Hence, in place of a eulogy, the practice of expressing gratitude to God for specific aspects of a person's life and their persistence in faith during the funeral homily is now regarded as pastorally appropriate. Eulogia also refers to the blessed bread that is distributed in Orthodox and Oriental Catholic churches following the Eucharist. See also eulogia; homily.

Eunomius, d. 394, bishop of Cyzicus and theologian. His views are known mainly from his opponents, the Cappadocians, although some fragments of his writings survive. An extreme Arian, Eunomius believed in the subordination of the Son to the Father and also that God's essence could be named as "Unbegottenness." See also Arianism; Cappadocian Fathers; subordinationism.

Eusebius of Caesarea, ca. 260–ca. 339, bishop of Caesarea in Palestine and often called the "Father of Church History." As a young man Eusebius studied at Caesarea under the martyr Pamphilius, inheritor of the library of Origen, and began to write his History of the Church. He became bishop of Caesarea ca. 313. In the Arian controversy regarding the divinity of Jesus, Eusebius initially offered qualified support to Arius, who held that Jesus was only the greatest of creatures, but later recanted and gave assent to the Nicene Creed, which taught that Jesus was "of the same (divine) substance" as God the Father. At the time of his death he was a respected scholar-bishop. Eusebius was a prolific writer in diverse fields such as biblical interpretation and Christian apologetics, and he also wrote on the idea of a Christian empire—an idea that had been realized in his lifetime in the emperor Constantine. But his fame rests principally on his History, the first major account of the rise of Christianity in which are preserved long excerpts of important earlier works that otherwise would have been lost.

Eusebius of Vercelli, St., fourth-century bishop noted for his stand against the Arians. Some of his writings were previously attributed to Athanasius. He is thought to have translated the Gospels before Jerome. Feast day: August 2.

Eustace, St., also known as Eustachius, d. ca. 118, patron saint of hunters. His life is legendary, including his conversion as a Roman general to Christianity while hunting. He is said to have seen a stag with the figure of Christ on the cross between its antlers. Feast day: September 20.

Eustochium, St. Julia, ca. 368–418/419, virgin and close associate of Jerome. The third daughter of St. Paula, Eustochium was the recipient of Jerome's famous Letter on virginity (Epistle 22). As a child she vowed herself to virginity before settling with her mother near Jerome in Bethlehem. There Paula founded three convents, which Eustochium directed after 404. Feast day: September 28.

euthanasia (yoo-thin-ay'zhuh; Gk., "easy death"), according to the Vatican Declaration on Euthanasia (1980), "an action or an omission which of itself or by intention causes death, in order that all suffering may in this way be eliminated."

"Mercy killing" is another name for euthanasia. It emphasizes killing out of compassion to relieve suffering. "Assisted suicide" is a related concept that emphasizes helping someone to take their own life by providing the means and the knowledge to do so. "Aid-in-dying" is a concept now being used to include either assisted suicide or active euthanasia.

Types of Euthanasia: Euthanasia is often distinguished as voluntary or involuntary, direct or indirect, active or passive. It is voluntary when the person whose life is at stake explicitly requests help to die. It is involuntary when the person killed has expressed no desire to die, as in the case of infants or the comatose. Direct euthanasia means death is the primary goal of the intervention. By contrast, it is indirect when the action is primarily intended to relieve pain but has the side effect of hastening death, such as in giving narcotics to comfort the patient, even though they also hasten death by repressing respiration. Active euthanasia refers to death intentionally brought on by intervention, such as a lethal injection. Legal endorsement is being sought for direct, voluntary, active euthanasia—none of which is morally acceptable according to Catholic teaching.

Passive euthanasia is more complicated. It entails a moral difference between ordinary and extraordinary treatment and between killing and allowing to die. These distinctions are common in Catholic medical ethics, and a solid base of support for the traditional Catholic position on these matters can be found among many who debate the issue of euthanasia.

Moral Issues: The common misunderstanding of the ordinary/extraordinary distinction relates these terms to the state of the medical art for treating the pathological condition in question. The vagueness and confusion of these terms has led the Vatican declaration to suggest that "proportionate/disproportionate" may better express the substance of this distinction. According to the traditional Catholic use of this distinction, treatments are "ordinary" (required or proportionate) or "extraordinary" (optional or disproportionate) relative to the benefits their effects will bring over the burdens they entail physically, emotionally, or economically for the patient and the patient's family. "Ordinary" means bring reasonable hope of benefit and tolerable burdens. "Extraordinary" means are futile and/or overly burdensome. This distinction is always patient-specific and a moral assessment of treatment must be made on a case-by-case basis.

The other moral difference that distinguishes active and passive euthanasia is that between killing and allowing to die. "Killing" refers to a human agent being morally responsible for causing death. "Allowing to die" refers to withholding or withdrawing extraordinary treatment so that the underlying pathology can run its course and cause the patient's death. It follows from the moral conviction that no one is morally obliged to receive treatment when treatment is judged to be futile or overly burdensome. Withholding and withdrawing useless or burdensome treatment is not a question of euthanasia, murder, suicide, or assisted suicide, since the physical cause of death is ultimately the underlying pathology that first required the medical treatment. No one is morally responsible for the death since the fatal pathology causes it. All those involved should be considered as humbly accepting the inherent limitations of the human condition.

Moral Arguments: Before one can endorse euthanasia or not, one must determine whether there is a moral difference between killing and allowing to die. If they are not morally different, then whether one kills or allows to die makes no difference. Advocates of euthanasia regard this distinction as indicating a descriptive difference in the way a patient dies. What matters to them is not how the patient dies but what the patient chooses. The Catholic moral tradition and other opponents of killing patients, however, maintain a moral difference in the distinction. They see it validly separating those deaths for which people are morally responsible from those for which they are not. It protects the overall respect for life because it recognizes that people are limited in their ability to control the ultimate progression of a fatal disease. It also has social validity by preserving the role of health-care providers as ones committed to curing and caring rather than to killing. It supports the bonds of trust in the doctor-patient relationship and does not introduce suspicion or insecurity into the hospital room.

Advocates of active euthanasia, such as the Hemlock Society, defend it on the libertarian principle of patient autonomy. For them, what gives humans their dignity and worth is free choice. They put the burden of proof on anyone who would deprive persons of freedom over their bodies and their lives. They advocate active euthanasia as the ultimate civil liberty, and claim that anyone should be allowed aid-in-dying who chooses it freely without violating another's freedom, or when no overriding duty prevails. Their goal is to allow the person to retain control over one's own dying, to avoid the prolonged agony of dying, and to assure that no one's life will be artificially prolonged by technological means when quality-of-life is gone.

Opponents of killing patients argue on religious and philosophical grounds. They invoke not only the divine prohibition against killing but also the principles of sanctity of life and of God's dominion and human stewardship. Sanctity of life entails the positive obligation to nurture and support life, and the negative obligation not to harm or destroy life. It creates a presumption in favor of sustaining life and so places the burden of proof on those who would take life or fail to forestall death.

The principle of God's dominion and human stewardship tells us that human freedom is limited, especially when it comes to having absolute control over life. Life is entrusted to humankind to use and make fruitful, but it is not a possession that an individual can end when one chooses. Since people are made in the image of God—a community of loving persons—we are social by nature. Because individuals live in community as interdependent persons, no one person's freedom is absolute. An individual's action must be weighed in light of its impact on the social good, and not just whether it satisfies self-interest. To give someone else power over one's freedom and life, as active euthanasia does, also gives away too much of what it means to be human. Euthanasia actually contradicts the very freedom and life it claims to respect.

Moral arguments such as these are necessary but not sufficient by themselves as a moral response to the euthanasia movement. Action is also required that witnesses to convictions. Healing communities that strive to carry on the mission of Jesus must bear convincing witness in personal and corporate ways to the care of the dying. Hospice care is one such response. Hospice creates an environment in which one maintains the best quality of life possible while dying without actively prolonging dying or hastening death. The great challenge of the euthanasia movement is for the Catholic health-care community to incorporate the hospice concept of care throughout its delivery system in caring for the dying. The standards of care embodied in hospice make killing patients mistaken and unnecessary. See also death and dying; hospice movement.

Bibliography

Callahan, Daniel. The Troubled Dream of Life: Living with Mortality. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1993.

Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. "Declaration on Euthanasia" (May 5, 1980). In Gula, What Are They Saying About Euthanasia?

Gula, Richard M. What Are They Saying About Euthanasia? Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press, 1986.

Veath, Robert M. Death, Dying, and the Biological Revolution: Our Last Quest for Responsibility. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1989.

RICHARD M. GULA

Eutyches (yoo'tee-keez), ca. 378–454, abbot of a monastery near Constantinople during the mid-fifth century and a vigorous opponent of Nestorianism. His alternative, Monophysitism, insists that after the Incarnation Christ had but one nature, the divine, into which the human was fully absorbed. The effect of this view was to eliminate the reality of the human nature of Christ, thus negating the possibility of humanity being saved through Christ's death. Eutyches' Christology was condemned by the Synod of Constantinople in 448, reauthorized by the "Robber Council" of Ephesus, also known as Latrocinium, in 449, but condemned again by the Council of Chalcedon in 451, after which Eutyches was exiled. See also Chalcedon, Council of; Monophysitism.

Evagrios of Pontus, ca. 344–99, Greek mystic and theologian. A noted preacher who attended the Council of Constantinople (381), he retired to the Nitrian Desert in 382 and remained there for the rest of his life. His numerous writings, especially on prayer, influenced Christian spirituality via John Cassian, Denys the Areopagite, Maximus the Confessor, and, through them, John Scotus Eriugena and Bernard of Clairvaux.

evangelical counsels. See counsels, evangelical.

evangelicalism, an interdenominational Protestant movement dedicated to spreading the gospel to non-Christians and revitalizing faith among Christians. Evangelicalism emphasizes individual conversion (the "new birth") to a personal, experienced faith in Christ; Christ's atoning sacrifice for individual sin; the Bible's authority in matters of faith and life; holy living; and the obligation of laity and clergy to propagate the gospel through preaching and missionary effort. Evangelicals tend to deemphasize denominational differences and fine points of theology in favor of the shared experience of salvation through faith.

Evangelicalism originated in the Protestant Reformation of the sixteenth century. The doctrines of salvation by faith, authority of the Scriptures, and the priesthood of all believers were central to the Reformers' understanding of Christianity. The evangelical revivals of the early eighteenth century gave the movement definitive shape through two related impulses. First, Pietism in Europe generated new denominations, notably the Moravians, and renewal movements in Lutheran, Reformed, and Anabaptist churches. Second, Methodism in England brought forth a host of new Wesleyan denominations and renewal within the Anglican church.

Since the eighteenth century, evangelicalism has produced new denominations, revitalization movements within existing traditions, and new transdenominational religious movements (such as fundamentalism and Pentecostalism). Twentieth-century evangelicalism has influenced many Roman Catholics, especially Hispanics in the United States and Latin America, at the grassroots level through missionary and evangelistic work, publications, radio and television, and informal contacts. Because this has turned many Catholics toward Protestant churches, evangelicalism is regarded with some caution in Catholic circles.

Evangelicals are found in every denomination, as well as outside organized churches. It has been estimated that one of every four adults in the United States is an evangelical, but that figure cannot be verified statistically. MICHAEL S. HAMILTON

Evangelii Nuntiandi (ay-vahn-jay'lee-ee noon-tsee-ahn'dee; Lat., "Of proclaiming the gospel"), "On Evangelization in the Modern World," apostolic exhortation issued by Pope Paul VI on December 8, 1975. The document was occasioned by three events: the end of a Holy Year, the tenth anniversary of the closing of the Second Vatican Council, and the anniversary of the Third General Assembly of the Synod of Bishops, which had focused on evangelization. Many commentators regard this as Paul VI's best and most important pronouncement.

The document links the process of evangelization with the Church's abiding concern for the social question. Evangelization proclaims the coming of the reign of God as a form of liberation "from sin and the Evil One," but also from every form of economic, social, and political oppression (nn. 9, 29). While it is of the essence of the Church's mission to evangelize, it must begin "by being evangelized itself" (n. 15). See also evangelization.

evangelism. See evangelization.

evangelist (Gk., "proclaimer of the good news"), anyone engaged in spreading the gospel; also an itinerant preacher with no fixed pastoral charge. In Isa 52:7 the herald brings good news of salvation (see Luke 4:18). Eph 4:11 lists evangelists after apostles and prophets among God's gifts to the Church. Philip (Acts 21:8) and Timothy (2 Tim 4:5) are called evangelists. The term "evangelists" is first used of the canonical Gospel writers in the third century by Hippolytus and Tertullian. Under the influence of Ezek 1:10, the symbol of the human being came to represent Matthew; the lion, Mark; the calf, Luke; and the eagle, John. See also gospel; John the Evangelist, St.; Luke, St.; Mark, St.; Matthew, St.

Tenth-century ivory plaque depicting the four Evangelists as a man (Matthew), a lion (Mark), an ox (Luke), and an eagle (John), figures drawn from Rev 4:7.

evangelization, the proclamation of the gospel. Jesus understood this to be at the center of his own ministry: "I must proclaim the good news of the kingdom of God to the other cities also; for I was sent for this purpose" (Luke 4:43). He conferred the same mandate upon his apostles: "Go into all the world and proclaim the good news to the whole creation" (Mark 16:15). The Church, in turn, receives the mandate from the apostles and makes its own the words of the Apostle Paul, "Woe to me if I do not proclaim the gospel" (1 Cor 9:16). Thus, it sends missionaries "until such time as the infant churches are fully established and can themselves carry on the work of evangelizing" (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 17).

Through the proclamation of the gospel, the Church "prepares the hearers to receive and profess the faith, disposes them for baptism, snatches them from the slavery of error, and incorporates them into Christ so that through charity they may grow up into full maturity in Christ" (ibid.). The "specific purpose" of missionary activity, therefore, is "evangelization and the planting of the Church among those peoples and groups where it has not yet taken root" (Decree on the Church's Missionary Activity, n. 6). The former, evangelization, is the "chief means" of achieving the latter, implantation.

Evangelization is not only the responsibility of the bishops and the clergy, but of "every disciple of Christ, according to his or her ability" (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 17). Indeed, "the whole Church is missionary, and the work of evangelization is a basic duty of the People of God" (Decree on the Church's Missionary Activity, n. 35).

Because the kingdom of God that Jesus, the apostles, and the Church proclaim is a kingdom of justice and peace as well as of holiness and grace (Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, n. 39), evangelization is about liberation from every form of sin and oppression (Evangelii Nuntiandi, 1975, n. 29). Jesus himself evangelized in more than word. He cured the sick, fed the hungry, raised the dead, and gave hope to the poor (n. 12). For the Church, therefore, "evangelizing means bringing the Good News into all the strata of humanity, and through its influence transforming humanity from within and making it new" (n. 18).

The "first means" of evangelizing is "the witness of an authentically Christian life." And that applies to the Church as well as to its individual members. The Church "will evangelize the world . . . by its living witness of fidelity to the Lord Jesus—the witness of poverty and detachment, of freedom in the face of the powers of this world, in short, the witness of sanctity" (n. 41). Evangelization also occurs through preaching, that is, the verbal proclamation of the message. It occurs in the liturgy and sacramental life of the Church; through catechesis; through the use of the mass media; and through various forms of popular piety (nn. 40–48). In effect, evangelization encompasses the entire mission of the Church. See also Catholic social teachings; gospel; missions; sacramentality, principle of.

RICHARD P. MCBRIEN

Evans, St. Philip, 1645–79, a Jesuit martyr of Wales. For fourteen years he ministered to Catholics in southern Wales until he was arrested for being a Catholic priest and sentenced to death for high treason. Feast day: December 1.

Eve (Heb., ḥawwah, "life"), the first woman. Her Hebrew name can be from a word for "life" and also from one for "snake." According to Gen 2–4, she was made from the rib of her husband, Adam. Though she was an appropriate helper for him, she surrendered to the serpent's temptation, ate the forbidden fruit, and persuaded her husband to do likewise, who then shared fully in the sin. Both were expelled from the garden of Eden and were subjected to various afflictions, including, in Eve's case, the pain of childbirth. She was the mother of Cain, Abel, Seth, and other unnamed children. In 1 Tim 2:11–15 the author argues that since Adam preceded Eve who, moreover, was deceived first (see also 2 Cor 11:3), women should be silent, should not teach, and should have no authority over a man. Nevertheless, women in the Pauline churches held responsible positions: Phoebe (Rom 16:1–2), Prisca (Rom 16:3; 1 Cor 16:9) and Junia (Rom 16:7) are depicted as preaching (1 Cor 11:5) and teaching (Acts 18:26). See also Adam; Adam and Eve; original justice; original sin.

Evening Prayer. See Vespers.

Evensong. See Vespers.

evil, in classical terms, the privation of the good, i.e., the absence of the being or perfection that is proper to a creature. Evil may refer to the absence in itself, to the subject in whom the evil exists, or to the effects of evil in human subjects, such as the injustice suffered by one or many persons at the hands of evildoers. As privation or absence, however, evil lacks any inherent intelligibility. As such an ontological surd and an existential scandal, it resists systematic understanding.

The prevalent Catholic approach to understanding evil is influenced by Thomas Aquinas's interpretation of Aristotle and Augustine. This approach avoids the radical dualism of Manichaeism, in which the goodness of God is opposed by evil as a second, independent principle; Pelagianism, in which evil can be effectively countered by that self-effort that effects a growth in virtue; Stoicism, which identified the effects of evil with fate; and Pantheism, which so fuses creation with God that evil can be rendered a mere human interpretation of reality, but not real (Spinoza). Catholic moral theology and social ethics have noted the intersubjective, social, and political dimensions of moral evil.

In this approach, evil is a privation of being. For example, blindness is an evil because it is the absence of a function that is part of human completeness; calumny is an evil because it deprives a person of his or her due reputation. To say that evil is a privation is not to deny it any reality. It is to deny that there is an "essence" of evil, that is, that evil subsists on its own or could exist apart from created reality or from human subjects who are essentially good because they are God's creation. Evil can only exist in another; it is parasitic on the good.

Physical Evil: A distinction is usually made between physical and moral evil. Physical evil is that privation of good experienced as disorder within the perceived order of creation. This includes both physical pain and mental anguish. While hurricanes, earthquakes, and various "acts of God" are typically given as examples of physical evil, the evil in question here is to be seen essentially in the suffering these events cause, for in themselves they are natural. (Indeed, the very notion of disorder as an exception to an orderly state has been placed in doubt by some contemporary physics, which has proposed entropy tending toward chaos as a normative state.)

Still, physical evil is a reality and is a source of real suffering and death. The Christian recognizes that suffering and death are experienced as evils, but they are only experienced as ultimate evils when this earthly life is placed above other ends and transcendent meaning is excluded from suffering and death. Death is the natural end of the physical organism, an organism created as good; in this view, death is not understood only as an evil in itself. On the other hand, death and other forms of physical evil cannot be adequately understood simply as the necessary by-products of finite processes. While physical evil may be a statistical necessity, the Catholic tradition has drawn an ultimate linkage between the disorder that characterizes physical evil, especially death, and the ontological disorder of moral evil symbolized by the fall of Adam and Eve.

Moral Evil: One must distinguish moral evil from premoral evil. Premoral evil (also called ontic or nonmoral evil) refers to a lack or absence in reality that conditions the moral situation before any moral actions occur. Moral evil is of personal origin, a disorder of the will, which has been created in freedom to affirm or to deny the intelligent and loving intentions of God. When human beings exercise their freedom in such a way as to introduce destruction into their lives, lives that impinge upon the lives of others, one may speak of moral fault or ontological guilt. Because such moral fault or ontological guilt constitutes an offense against God, one can speak of sin. Sin entails an understanding of human persons as ontologically free, i.e., as ultimately responsible for themselves in relation to other free subjects. The freedom of the human subject is presupposed by the very possibility of sin.

The trajectory of a human life can be understood as the result of the exercise of the will in freedom, in greater or lesser degrees of correspondence with God's intelligent and loving intention (Gk., telos). It is possible to choose a denial of God with such a consistent resoluteness that one in effect has chosen eternal loss, or hell. Hell is the state of perpetual decision against God, the utter loss of God.

Sin or moral evil is intimately related to suffering because it can directly or indirectly cause suffering—spiritual, psychological, and physical; it is related to death (Rom 5:12–14) because the free decision to deny God's intelligent and loving intention is the decision, however germinal, to destroy the possibility for life. Moral evil filters the experience of natural death such that natural death is seen and experienced as an unrelieved evil, often as a tragedy. Sin or moral evil can, therefore, be understood as a kind of death (in reality, a spiritual death); it cannot be considered in any sense good.

Moral evil is also related to the various forms of social evil that afflict humankind, from war and famine to racism, sexism, and poverty. These kinds of evil, which wreak havoc at the heart of human existence, constitute injustices because their ultimate cause is a deprivation of the goodness of God and of the original justice in which humans were created in the sight of God.

Freedom, Radical Guilt, and Providence: Though Catholic theology speaks of the ontological freedom of the moral subject, the extent of this freedom can be questioned. It could seem, in fact, that people are "doomed" to an existence riddled with moral evil. The mysterious conjunction of ontological freedom with the existential fact of evil is the focus of the biblical story of the Fall (Gen 2–3), which was extrapolated by Augustine and later theologians into the doctrine of original sin. This doctrine holds that the exercise of human freedom has, from the very origins of its exercise, initiated a rejection of God's directive influence and thus lost the sanctifying presence of God. The effect of original sin is the real human and historical situation wherein the exercise of human freedom is in fact compromised by any number of personal and historical factors that give distorted contour to the moral playing field. Theologian Karl Rahner (d. 1984) describes it as the radical codetermination of the situation of human freedom by guilt. Thus, evil can seem inescapable, and humans can seem trapped in a morass of evil of overwhelming proportions. However, human beings are not predestined toward evil; any such predestination would compromise both human freedom and the goodness of God.

Catholic moral theology has largely focused on the evil possible in individual acts. But the last third of the twentieth century has seen a retrieval of the understanding of sin as a fundamental and pervasive distortion of one's relationship to God. This period has also seen a renewed perception of the social dimensions of evil, not only by moral and systematic theologians, but also by the social teaching of the Church's magisterium. Sin itself is seen not simply as an objective personal act or omission, but also as an intersubjective reality, extending beyond discrete evil acts or omissions to the infection of entire social structures. In liberation theology, evil is described in a comprehensive fashion, after the manner of the prophets. The horror and banality of evil typified in the twentieth century by the Holocaust have raised in Catholic circles (and beyond) timeless questions about the mystery of iniquity (2 Thess 2:7).

The perennial question is how evil can exist when God is infinitely good. Part of the answer lies in the freedom with which the Creator endowed human beings. This freedom is part of the perfection of the human creature, and should God have withheld this freedom, the dignity of the human person as a rational being capable of love would also have been denied. However, the freedom of the human person is played out within the ambit of God's providence, the ultimate context for all moral action. The doctrine of providence holds that God's designs are most perfectly realized through the freedom of God's creatures, that God's intelligence and loving will pervade all of creation and act victoriously in concert with it, and that ultimately in all things God works for the "good for those who love God" (Rom 8:28). Thus, God is the One for whom all things are possible, including the possibility of the intrusion of evil, sin, and death into creation; but God, in God's infinite goodness, is also the One who can draw good out of all eventualities in and through the freedom and autonomy of creation, especially of the human person who is the image of God. God does not remain aloof from creation and human history (the position of deism), but is actively involved in it, acting through created freedom.

Christian Hope: The doctrine of providence is a source of Christian hope not that all forms of evil will ultimately be expunged from earthly human existence, but that ultimately the goodness of God works toward the good of all things. More somberly, Karl Rahner invoked a "Christian pessimism," a posture toward reality that sees the situation of human freedom as inescapably codetermined by the objectification of evil, but one that finds its transcendent meaning in the Cross of Jesus Christ. It is in the Cross that the mystery of moral evil, that meeting of God's goodness with the human repudiation of it, comes to its emblematic focus. But it is also in the Cross that the love of God condescends to meet and suffer that evil, and ultimately to supersede it, not through a denial of suffering and death, but in a passage through the reality of suffering and death to the definitive reality of the Resurrection. The Resurrection is the reclaiming by God of the life that has been robbed by the invasion of evil and the reestablishment of all creation in the ambit of God's life. See also dualism; Fall, the; free will; guilt, moral; Manichaeism; original sin; providence; sin.

Bibliography

Gula, Richard. Reason Informed by Faith: Foundations of Catholic Morality. New York: Paulist Press, 1989.

Maritain, Jacques. God and the Permission of Evil. Milwaukee, WI: Bruce Publishing, 1966.

Ricoeur, Paul. The Symbolism of Evil. Boston: Beacon Press, 1967.

PAUL CROWLEY

evil, intrinsic, that which is absolutely opposed to the will of God and the laws of nature. This term refers primarily to a type of action that is evil because of its object, meaning that some types of action are wrong no matter what the circumstances or the motives of the agent may be. The prohibition of these types of action, such as the killing of an innocent nonaggressor, is absolute, i.e., allowing of no exceptions. One may, therefore, never directly will an action of this kind.

The term "intrinsic evil" has been variously understood. For instance, medieval theologians classified stealing as an intrinsically evil act, yet they also taught that to take what someone considers as personal property is not stealing when taking it is necessary for one's survival. Thus, for medieval writers, the prohibition of what normally would be stealing allows of exceptions in abnormal circumstances. Contemporary theologians generally restrict the meaning of the term to types of action that are never permissible.

Many prominent theologians question whether there are intrinsically evil acts in the second sense, that is, apart from qualifying circumstances. For this group, the morality of any act cannot be determined apart from consideration of motivation and circumstances. See also evil, moral.

evil, moral, a lack of integrity resulting from a disordered will, i.e., one oriented away from God's own will. A physical evil, such as blindness or illness, is experienced as a real lack or privation but its presence or absence does not make the person bad or good. A moral evil involves voluntary activity and the transgression of a norm or law. Moral evil pertains to a disorder or defect in human action and affects one's moral integrity. Other organisms suffer physical evil, but only a rational creature with free will can be a subject of moral evil. A human action is morally evil (i.e., sinful) when someone is sufficiently free in its performance. Such freedom includes adequate knowledge and absence of significant obstacles.

The existence of moral evil is the central enigma of human life. The possibility of moral evil or sin is a corollary of free will. God's bestowal of the capacity to be in control of one's actions enables humankind to attain a kind of goodness not available to nonrational beings. The realization of moral evil, however, is essentially mysterious, so that theologians refer to "the mystery of iniquity." The question is, Why would a creature spurn God's goodness and deform itself? Although the doctrine of original sin provides clues about the origins of moral evil and how it affects all people, the doctrine's assertion that human nature remains basically good serves rather to emphasize the mysteriousness of moral evil than to explain it. See also evil, intrinsic; good, moral.

ROBERT P. KENNEDY

evolution, the descent of all forms of life, with modification, from earlier forms. According to standard Darwinian theory, the natural selection and reproduction of favorably adapted organisms accounts for the origin and diversity of all living species. Some drastic revisions of Darwin's theory are being proposed today, but most scientists still accept the "modern synthesis" of molecular biology, genetics, and Darwinian principles. In an extended usage, however, the term "evolution" refers not only to the transformations of life on earth, but also to the unfolding of the entire cosmic story.

Catholicism and Evolution: In spite of some initial misgivings, Catholic teaching and theology have been comparatively hospitable to the theory. Pope Pius XII's encyclical Humani Generis (1950) acknowledged its plausibility, insisting however on the immediate creation of the human soul by God. The documents of Vatican II (1962–65) give evidence of Catholic thought's having assimilated some evolutionary motifs (Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, 1965, n. 5).

Catholic theology strives for a formulation consistent with contemporary evolutionary science. Much of this effort is influenced by the synthesis of Christianity and evolution undertaken by the Jesuit paleontologist Pierre Teilhard de Chardin (1881–1955). At the same time, some Catholic theologies of evolution owe much to non-Catholic religious thought, including some aspects of "process theology" inspired by philosophers Alfred North Whitehead (d. 1947) and Charles Hartshorne (b. 1897).

Catholic theology is comfortable with the view that God "creates" through evolution. It has distanced itself, therefore, from "creationism," which, on the basis of a literalist reading of Genesis, insists that evolution is completely incompatible with the doctrine of divine creation. Likewise it dismisses the version of creationism known as "creation science" or "scientific creationism," which considers the Bible a more reliable source of scientific information concerning the origins of life than modern evolutionary biology. Scientific creationism not only fails to give science its own legitimate authority, but it also trivializes biblical teachings by implicitly placing them in the same genre as scientific discourse.

Biblical revelation is debased whenever it is considered another source of information that science is capable of discovering on its own. Following the principle that truth is one, Catholic teaching has consistently maintained that there can be no contradiction between authentic science and an integral faith in revelation. Respect for this principle places the expressions of theology not in a competitive but a complementary relation to evolutionary thinking. Thus, in keeping with the traditional doctrine that God's creativity works continuously and not just "in the beginnings," Catholic theology generously allows for the possibility that evolution is a medium of divine creativity.

Evolution and Contemporary Theology: Nevertheless, much Catholic thought today shares with Christian theology in general the characteristic of not being deeply affected by evolutionary ideas. Perhaps because of theology's understandable preoccupation with human freedom and social justice, nature's evolution has not been a central theme in modern Catholic theology. Though Catholicism has a strong tradition of natural theology that relates divine activity closely to the cosmos, its recent theology has portrayed God as acting almost exclusively in the area of human history rather than in nature and its evolution.

Nevertheless, a growing number of Catholic theologians now object to this one-sided emphasis on salvation history. By relating God only to humanity and its history, theology runs the risk of dualism, of separating human beings from the natural world in which they are rooted. An evolutionary accent in theology, on the other hand, brings out the intimacy of the Christian story of creation with the themes of revelation, incarnation, and redemption. Likewise it allows us to see more clearly the ecological connections between our species and the plants and animals that constitute with humans a single "earth community." It is unwise for theology to tie itself too intimately to the always revisable science of any particular historical period, but many Catholic theologians are grateful nonetheless that evolutionary thinking has deepened our understanding of God's and humanity's relationship to the natural world.

Questions: While fundamentalists find Darwin's theory incompatible with faith, many prominent scientific thinkers consider Christianity to be hostile to the notion of evolution. This supposition is not alleviated when some Christian groups insist that the creation stories of the Bible should become mandatory reading in science classes in the public schools. Media coverage of court cases surrounding this issue also inflames the controversy at times, leaving the impression that Christianity and the idea of evolution are irreconcilable.

This impasse can be overcome only if, on the one hand, Christians allow for a wider understanding of God's creativity than they have accepted in the past and, on the other hand, if scientific thinkers are willing to abandon the unnecessarily materialistic and pessimistic philosophical assumptions that have tainted many of their portraits of the evolutionary process. Scientific skeptics interpret the prominent role of chance in organic variations, for example, as evidence of a universe unguided by providence. And they consider evolution's requirement that countless individuals and species die out in the struggle for existence to be a refutation of God's power and care. Moreover, they often situate evolution only within the restrictive framework of a now outdated mechanistic philosophy of nature.

Contemporary theologies of evolution, on the other hand, interpret the data of evolutionary science as consistent with a God of compassionate love and persuasive power. They underscore the compatibility of nature's randomness (and other manifestations of indeterminacy) with a God who loves freedom and who "lets the world be." And they assimilate the suffering in evolution to the theme of the "kenotic," self-emptying God revealed in the cross of Christ. This God does not stand aloof from evolution, but enters into it, takes its suffering and struggle into the divine life and, consistent with the way God is presented in the Bible, continually offers possibilities of renewal to the cosmos at every stage of its unfolding. Many Catholic theologians now embrace Teilhard de Chardin's vision, according to which the human species carries the world's evolution toward its ultimate destiny by virtue of "a great hope held in common," centered on the incarnate and coming Christ. See also creation; creationism.

Bibliography

Barbour, Ian. Religion in the Age of Science. San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1992.

McMullin, Ernan, ed. Evolution and Creation. Notre Dame: University of Notre Dame Press, 1985.

Rahner, Karl. Hominization: The Evolutionary Origin of Man as a Theological Problem. Tr. W. T. O'Hara. New York: Herder & Herder, 1965.

Teilhard de Chardin, Pierre. The Phenomenon of Man. Tr. B. Wall. New York: Harper & Row, 1959. JOHN F. HAUGHT

exaltation, elevation to heavenly glory. The affirmation that the resurrected Christ was brought to a position of honor with God is common in the NT (Acts 5:31; 7:55; Rom 1:3; 8:34; Phil 2:9; Eph 1:20; Heb 1:3; 8:1; 12:2; 1 Pet 3:22; Rev 3:21). Such texts frequently use the language of Ps 110, which describes the enthronement of an Israelite king. The Fourth Gospel, trading on the physical and spiritual meanings of certain terms, insists on the intimate association of the exaltation with the Passion, when Jesus is "lifted up" on the Cross (John 3:14; 12:32). See also Ascension.

Exaltation of the Cross, currently known as Triumph of the Cross, a liturgical feast celebrated on September 14. The origin of the feast dates to the finding of the True Cross of Christ by Constantine's mother, St. Helena, and the subsequent dedication of a basilica on the site at Golgotha in 335. In the Eastern Church, the feast is marked by veneration of the cross through elevation and blessings in the directions of the four compass points. In Rome, a procession from St. Mary Major to the Lateran preceded a veneration of the cross before Mass. The exalted cross, prefigured in Moses' lifting up the serpent staff in the desert, is glorified on this feast as the instrument of Christ's victory over death. See also cross; Helena, St.

examination of conscience, a prayerful review of one's own life on the basis of gospel values. In the history of the Church, an examination of conscience has been part of spirituality from the earliest centuries. Egyptian monasticism included a form of this examination. Celtic monasticism made it a central part of its spiritual program. When the Celtic monks began in the late sixth century to popularize a private form of sacramental confession, the examination of conscience became structured even more into Christian life. In the Middle Ages, popular piety was focused on the confession of sins, and this required a preliminary examination of conscience. Medieval Scholastic theologians formulated moral theology in a more technical way, with a distinction of sins according to number, species, and circumstances. This led to the development of set forms for the examination of conscience. Medieval monasticism emphasized daily or weekly examination of faults, and this custom contributed to the development of a set form for such an examination, based either on the Ten Commandments or a list of virtues. In the post-Tridentine period, Catholic pastors strongly encouraged detailed confession of sin. Under the influence of Jansenism, a seventeenth-century French movement that stressed human sinfulness and the need for severe forms of penance, many of the confessional books of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries were unnecessarily rigorous but influenced the way many priests viewed the examination of conscience. After Vatican II (1962–65), the examination of conscience, in the renewed rite of Penance, is presented as a prayerful consideration of one's past, but with a major focus on the future, i.e., conversion of one's life. See also confession, auricular; Reconciliation, Sacrament of.

KENAN B. OSBORNE

exarch (eks'ahrk; Gk., "leader"), in Eastern canon law, the person who governs an exarchy. He does not govern the exarchy in his own name but in the name of the authority that appointed him. This can be the patriarch, in a patriarchal church, or the Apostolic See of Rome outside patriarchates. The exarch may or may not be a bishop. The term "exarch" is used in a different sense by the Orthodox churches. Here it may be applied to metropolitans (bishops who exercise authority over several dioceses in a province) or to a bishop who has authority over metropolitans.

exarchate. See exarchy.

exarchy (eks'ahr-kee), in Eastern canon law, the portion of the People of God that because of particular circumstances has not been canonically erected or established into a fully constituted eparchy (diocese). The Latin equivalent is the apostolic vicariate or prefecture. See also prefect apostolic; vicar apostolic.

excardination, the process in which a cleric loses canonical attachment to a particular diocese. This can only occur when a cleric definitively joins a religious institute or is permanently attached to a different diocese. Certain specific circumstances must be verified before either of these actions is effected. For example, if a cleric asks to move to a diocese with a warmer climate for the sake of his health, some medical verification is required. If, however, there is evidence of mere restlessness or instability, the request may be denied. Among the concerns of canon law here are a more equitable geographical distribution of priests, the possibility for a priest to discern and follow a vocation to religious life, and the necessity of a cleric's never being without a proper ecclesiastical superior. See also clergy; incardination.

ex cathedra (eks kah-tay'drah; Lat., "from the chair"), the highest level of papal teaching. The expression originated in the early Church, where it was customary for a bishop to preside, preach, and give instructions from his chair near the altar; eventually ex cathedra came to designate "authoritative teaching." The First Vatican Council (1869–70) used ex cathedra to describe the highest level of papal teaching: "when the Roman Pontiff speaks ex cathedra. . . , he is empowered with that infallibility with which the Divine Redeemer willed to endow his Church." This statement was intended to reject the Gallican claim that the See (Lat., Sedes) of Rome is empowered with infallibility, but an individual pope (Sedens) is not. Following Vatican I, theologians have emphasized that for a papal teaching to be ex cathedra, it must be (1) universal, i.e., enunciated by the pope as teacher of all Christians, (2) supreme, i.e., expressing the highest level of papal teaching authority, (3) definitive, i.e., defining a doctrine concerned with faith and morals, and (4) mandatory, i.e., requiring acceptance by all Christians. Given these requirements, ex cathedra teaching is infrequent. See also infallibility.

exclaustration, permission for a religious to live apart from the common life (outside the cloister). Although a religious may be assigned to live outside a religious community for reasons of work, health, or study, a religious may not otherwise leave the common life without the special permission of the highest authority of the religious institute. This permission may only be given for a period of up to three years. A frequent reason for this permission is to assist the religious in vocational discernment. The Holy See might require a religious to live outside the common life at the request of the superiors of the religious if he or she is judged harmful to community life. Such an exclaustration is without time limit; it is ad nutum Sanctae Sedis (Lat., "at the pleasure of the Holy See").

exclusive language, words or phrases used for a class or group that are not applicable to all its members. Such terms are commonly called "false generics." The English word "man" is an example. Though originally (like the Latin homo) a generic term for "human being" applicable to either sex, "man" has acquired, historically, a narrower, gender-specific meaning ("man" means "male"). Thus, a phrase like "the future of man (or mankind)" appears to exclude women, even though it purports to designate everyone. In 1990 the U.S. Catholic bishops addressed this problem as it concerns biblical texts in the liturgy by issuing "Criteria for the Evaluation of Inclusive Language." These criteria note that words like "men," "sons," or "brothers," which were once considered inclusive terms, are often understood today as excluding women. Hence, the bishops conclude, such terms should not be used in Scripture texts intended for liturgical usage.

excommunication, the penalty in canon law that partially excludes a Catholic from the life of the Church. Excommunication does not expel a person from the Church, but it does distance one from the Christian community. Excommunication is considered a very serious penalty in canon law, one used for very serious canonical offenses. These offenses are of such a nature that they must be strongly repudiated by the Christian community. Because of their seriousness, an unrepentant perpetrator is to be, to a certain degree, repudiated by the Christian community and disbarred from full communion therein. Of itself excommunication says nothing concerning the moral standing of a given person before God; rather, it addresses the person's relationship with the Christian community.

Reasons for Excommunication: The penalty of excommunication is ancient and references are made to it in early Church councils (see, e.g., the First Ecumenical Council, Nicaea [325], can. 5). In some instances it is incurred automatically (Lat., latae sententiae) after the commission of a given offense; if the offense is notorious, this automatic excommunication might also be formally declared by proper Church authority. In other cases excommunication is the result of a formal process (ferendae sententiae) and is imposed after such a process. The penalty is incurred automatically in cases of apostasy, heresy, schism, and the absolution by a priest of an accomplice in a sin against the sixth commandment. Automatic excommunication is also the punishment in cases where a bishop consecrates another bishop without permission from Rome or a priest violates confessional secrecy. Incidents of successful abortion, profanation of the Eucharist, or physical force against the pope are also punished by automatic excommunication. The penalty of excommunication is not limited to the above cases and may be given in other cases after a canonical hearing. For the most part, this penalty is used for cases judged under universal Church law established by Rome, though proper ecclesiastical authority might establish the penalty for particular territories. A notable example is the former law in the United States excommunicating anyone who was divorced and remarried. This law was established in the nineteenth century by the American bishops for the United States and has been subsequently abolished.

Effects: Excommunicated persons are not allowed to receive or administer the sacraments. In addition, they may not discharge any ecclesiastical office or function. If the excommunication has been declared or imposed publicly, any attempted discharge of duties of an ecclesiastical office or function is considered invalid in Church law, and even the mere presence of the excommunicate at a church service is proscribed.

It is important to note that canon law is hesitant about the infliction of all penalties, even automatic ones, and that there are a number of factors that might legitimately block the incurrence of a prescribed penalty. In general, anything that diminishes responsibility on the part of the perpetrator might also diminish the penalty. In addition to allowance of such excusing factors that can lessen guilt and hence punishment and penalties, ecclesiastical penal law itself must always be so construed that the number of cases that fall under its purview is limited rather than expanded.

Excommunication is lifted when suitable penance has been performed. Often the penalty is lifted within the private context of sacramental confession. In some cases, especially those in which the excommunication was publicly imposed or declared, the lifting of the penalty can be more public. A few of the most serious offenses (e.g., profaning the Eucharist) require permission from Rome in order to rectify the person's relationship with the Christian community.

Public excommunication is not often used as a penalty. Some of the more notable cases in recent times have involved ultraconservative dissidents, e.g., Father Leonard Feeney, S.J. (d. 1978), who preached that one must be Catholic to be saved (he was later reconciled with the Church), and Archbishop Marcel Lefebvre (d. 1991), who started a schismatic church by consecrating bishops without permission from the pope. See also Church; penal law.

JOHN F. LAHEY

exegesis (eks-e-jee'sis; Gk., exēgeisthai, "to draw out or explain"), explanation of a biblical text. In principle the methods of biblical exegesis are no different from those used for the study of any ancient text. It is employed with units as small as verses or as large as whole books, e.g., a biblical commentary. The goal of exegesis is to offer enough information to make an ancient text intelligible to contemporary readers. The methods of exegesis comprise textual criticism, i.e., determining among variant readings in the manuscript tradition those that have the greatest claim to originality and antiquity; lexical study of the meaning of words in the original language along with attention to grammar and syntax; translation from one of the biblical languages into an accurate and idiomatic modern language; study of the literary integrity of a text, i.e., are there interpolations by authors later than the original author?; attention to the form and structure of a text, and to the relation of a given text to its proximate and larger literary context (e.g., the Lord's Prayer in the context of Matthew's Sermon on the Mount, and in the context of the Gospel); investigation of the historical, social, and religious contexts of a given text or body of texts; and descriptions of the religious or theological content of a text.

Biblical exegesis is an integral part of historical criticism, which has developed since the Enlightenment as an attempt to use all the available historical sciences to arrive at the original meaning of a text. In its initial phases historical-critical exegesis served to counter encrusted doctrinal interpretations and met with great opposition in both Protestantism and Catholicism. The encyclical Divino Afflante Spiritu (On the promotion of biblical studies) of Pius XII (September 30, 1943) and the Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation of Vatican II (November 18, 1965) sanctioned the use of historical-critical exegesis by Catholic scholars. It has become a positive tool for opening the riches of the Bible to the other theological disciples, and to clergy and laypeople.

Often exegesis is contrasted to "eisegesis" (Gk., a "reading into" the text) and is seen as a caution against subjective interpretation. The ideal of a purely objective interpretation or exegesis without presuppositions, which is a legacy of the Enlightenment, has been challenged by recent theories of interpretation. They stress that the biblical texts as religious and often poetic literature do not offer a single clear meaning and that different readers in different historical and social circumstances, though guided by the text, can find meanings not "intended" by the original author, and that extend the meaning of the text beyond its original context (e.g., the use of the Exodus as a paradigm for liberation from oppressive social and political structures). Exegesis can describe well the framework and guidelines that preclude misinterpretation of a text, but can never exhaust the potential for fruitful interpretation. See also biblical criticism; biblical exegesis, thirteenth-century; biblical exegesis, twelfth-century; Scripture, interpretation of. JOHN R. DONAHUE exemplarism, a theory of atonement, also called the "moral" or "subjective" theory, according to which Jesus Christ effects our salvation by being the perfect embodiment of love within history. His witness of selflessness, especially in his suffering, death, and Resurrection, can transform human hearts and minds so that people are inspired to give themselves completely to God and one another. A form of this theory was advocated by Peter Abelard (d. 1142); recast in sacramental terms, it operates in the theology of Karl Rahner (d. 1984). See also atonement, doctrine of.

exemption of religious, removal of a religious institute from the immediate authority of the local bishop. Such an institute is then under the direct authority of the Holy See. Religious communities of pontifical right all enjoy such exemption with respect to their internal affairs. This exemption prohibits a local bishop from interfering in the internal life of a religious community.

Institutes are responsible to the local bishop with regard to the external works of the apostolate. Preaching, teaching, and the celebration of the liturgy are under the bishop's supervision. Canon law allows the possibility for further exemption on the part of the Holy See, but does not specify the meaning or degree of that exemption. See also religious institute.

Exercises, Spiritual. See Spiritual Exercises.

existentialism, a philosophy that emphasizes the radical singularity of individual existence and the encounter between such individual "existents" or between an individual and a moment of the prevailing culture. The mood of existentialism can be one of alienation, as with Jean-Paul Sartre's (1905–80) anguished individual facing an absurd world, or reconciliation, as with Martin Buber's (1878–1965) insistence that the "I" is realized only in the encounter with a "Thou." The most important existentialist thinker for Christian theology is Martin Heidegger (1889–1976), whose writings focus on the encounter, even the confrontation, between humanity and the question of its own existence.

Pius XII rejected existentialism in his 1950 encyclical Humani Generis, finding existentialism's vocabulary of radical temporality, situation, and encounter at odds with Scholastic theology's emphasis on eternal truths and immutable essences. Nonetheless, existentialist motifs are widespread in contemporary Catholic theology, primarily due to the influence of Karl Rahner (d. 1984), whose fundamental theology utilizes elements from Heidegger in a Thomistic framework. Heideggerian existentialism has also influenced the work of the twentieth-century Protestant theologians Rudolf Bultmann and Paul Tillich. See also philosophy and theology.

Exodus, Israel's departure from Egypt, probably ca. 1200 B.C. Jacob's descendants who had moved to Egypt (Gen 46) were enslaved after several generations. The Lord then commissioned Moses to lead these Israelites from Egypt, but he succeeded only after the ten plagues had weakened the pharaoh's resolve. The Passover meal, which the Israelites ate while the tenth plague was occurring, was followed by a hasty exit from Egypt and crossing of the Reed Sea into the wilderness. The importance of these events to the biblical narrative caused the second book of the Bible to be named Exodus in the Greek and subsequent translations.

ex opere operantis (eks oh'pair-ay oh-pair-ahn'tis; Lat., "from the work of the doer"), expression used in sacramental theology to refer to the actions or merits of the minister or recipients of the sacraments, in contrast to God's own action in and through the sacraments. This phrase does not deny that the validity of a sacrament depends ultimately on God's saving will as expressed in the promises of Christ, but it emphasizes the importance of the interior disposition of human beings. Although the subjective disposition of a person receiving or celebrating a sacrament has no bearing on its validity, a sacrament's spiritual effects or fruitfulness can be blocked by lack of faith or attentiveness, or by sin. The phrase ex opere operantis is especially applicable to the reception of sacramentals, whose celebration does not carry the same guarantee of grace as the seven sacraments. See also ex opere operato; fruitfulness of the sacrament; sacrament; sacramentals.

ex opere operato (eks oh'pair-ay oh-pair-ah' toh; Lat., "from the work done"), expression used in the theology of the sacraments to emphasize that, since God is the chief agent of the sacrament, the sacrament can never fail to celebrate the salvation promised in Christ provided that it is celebrated under proper conditions. This assertion underscores the traditional Christian conviction that God's salvific will is not ultimately dependent upon human action or attitudes, but is expressed publicly in the Church's sacraments, which are objectively valid pledges of God's grace. This teaching also emphasizes that sacraments are not discrete, magically effective signs, but are the self-expressions and actualizations of the Church, which itself is Christ's continuing saving presence in the world. It is the intrinsic connection of the sacraments with the Church as the fundamental sacrament that guarantees that those who approach the sacraments in faith will unfailingly receive grace from God. See also ex opere operantis; sacrament.

exorcism, the act of liberating persons, places, or things from the power of evil through prayer and symbolic deeds. Such acts of liberation characterized the ministry of Jesus (see, e.g., Luke 11:14–23) and that of his disciples (see, e.g., Acts 16:18). Historically, two basic types of exorcism developed in the Church. The first of these ("major" or "solemn" exorcism) involved freeing persons from obsessive spiritual conditions thought to derive from evil powers or diabolical spirits. Such solemn exorcisms came to be restricted, in time, to bishops or to priests with explicit episcopal permission. More common are exorcisms of the second type: ritual prayers for adult catechumens, associated with the process of Christian initiation. Such exorcisms already are found in early Christian documents like the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus (ca. 215), which directs the bishop to exorcise the catechumens on the day before their baptism. Similar prayers of exorcism were retained, even when (increasingly, after the fourth century) the majority of candidates for baptism were infants. The Rite of Baptism for Children, reformed following Vatican Council II, contains only one exorcism (which may be omitted). The 1972 Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults, however, restores exorcisms at several points in the process of initiation: when candidates are enrolled in the order of catechumens; during the period of the catechumenate itself; and, more elaborately, during the three "scrutinies," which take place on the third, fourth, and fifth Sundays of Lent, prior to the catechumens' Baptism at the Easter Vigil. See also demonic possession; Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults.

NATHAN MITCHELL

exorcism [in the Bible], a rite performed to expel an evil spirit from a person or from a habitation. In the Greco-Roman world the practice was widespread and varied greatly in form. The exorcist might invoke a sacred name or a particular angel who had power over that spirit or use incantations, spells, or physical objects, such as herbs or the entrails of animals. One particular technique involved ascertaining the name of the demon and commanding it to leave the victim. Sometimes the demon was directed to go into the sea or another ill-omened place. These ceremonies involved explicit use of magic and were condemned by Jews and Christians. There is only one clear reference to exorcism in the OT, namely, Tob 6:7–18 and 8:1–3, where Raphael frees the victim by the use of the heart and liver of a fish. Paul (1 Cor 12:1–10) does not list exorcism as a ministry of the Spirit. The two cases of exorcism in Acts involve pagan persons (Acts 16:16; 19:13–19). The synoptic Gospels, especially Mark, portray Jesus as an exorcist, but he does not use any of the magical rites or physically touch a possessed person. Only in one case does he ask the demons' names and cast them into the abyss (Mark 5:1–20; Matt 8:28–34; Luke 8:26–39). There are no exorcisms in John.

The Catholic Church has always proceeded with extreme care in dealing with cases of supposed possession. The Church requires that the patient undergo both physical and psychological examinations before it will consider exorcism. In rare cases it chooses a minister of exceptional talent and stable character to perform the rite, which is found in the Roman Ritual. Most cases of purported demonic possession should be appropriated to and handled by a professional psychiatrist. See also demonic possession.

J. MASSYNGBAERDE FORD

exorcist, formerly the third minor order. This office was based on the belief that malign spiritual forces exist and have influence on human affairs. It emerged as an ecclesiastical institution in the third century. The task of the exorcist is to drive out evil spirits. The early Church incorporated exorcism into the preparation of a catechumen for Baptism. The exorcist later acquired other liturgical responsibilities as well. Although Pope Paul VI (1963–78) eliminated this minor order in 1972, bishops may still appoint priests to perform the rite of exorcism when a person has been determined to be possessed by a demon. It is, however, something to be rarely, if ever, invoked. See also minor orders.

experience and moral theology, the relationship between human experience and theological reflection on it. Attention to human experience has long been a part of Catholic moral theology, implicit in its consideration of how particular circumstances may contribute to the meaning of a moral act. However, influenced by contemporary philosophical and theological personalism, and in reaction to overly deductive and law-centered approaches to morality, moral theology after the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) has increasingly turned to experience as an explicit source and criterion of moral judgment. The appeal to experience, which involves the attempt to delimit more precisely its nature and scope within moral reflection, and its relation to moral theory, has had the most far-reaching effects in the areas of biomedical and sexual ethics.

experimentation, medical, procedures performed on human beings for the purpose of gaining knowledge beneficial to others. Differentiation is often made between therapeutic experimentation, where benefit to the individual patient is anticipated, and nontherapeutic, or research, experimentation, where the only benefit is knowledge gained for others.

Catholic tradition bases its approval of proper human medical experimentation on the inherently social character of the human person as created by God and saved by Jesus Christ, and supports two sets of requirements generally mandated in this context: informed consent and criteria assuring the proper balance of risk and benefit.

Patients and research subjects must be adequately informed about the experiment, including its risks and benefits and any alternative therapies, about the odds of receiving a placebo if applicable, and about the right to withdraw at any time. Voluntariness must be assured by reducing pressure to consent; particular care should be taken regarding institutionalized persons and others who might experience psychological or material need. Disagreement persists about the validity of proxy consent for children, and some reject it for all nontherapeutic experiments.

No experiment is permitted that entails unjustified risk, regardless of consent. Thus needless experiments, including those done to benefit the researcher or to provide knowledge of dubious value, are illicit. Prior computer and animal testing are usually mandatory. Therapeutic experiments may entail more risk than nontherapeutic research, since a balanced benefit to the patient is anticipated. Children may be subjected only to minimal risk in nontherapeutic research. Placebos must be discontinued if it becomes clear that the subject will benefit from the investigated therapy. See also medical ethics.

DAVID F. KELLY

expiation, to make satisfaction, or to cleanse from guilt or pollution by religious ceremonies (2 Sam 21:3; Num 35:33). In Leviticus it refers to the "mercy seat" (Heb., kapporet) on the ark, where God appears on a cloud (Lev 16:2), and where expiation was made by the sprinkling of blood on the day of atonement (Lev 16:14–16). In Rom 3:25, "Christ Jesus, whom God set forth as an expiation," in the Revised Standard Version and the New American Bible Revised New Testament, "expiation" translates the Greek, hilasterion, where Christ is the new "mercy seat" (see also 1 John 2:2, 4:10). The New Revised Standard Version's "put forward as a sacrifice of atonement" is inaccurate. Though often used synonymously with propitiation, the terms have different nuances. Propitiation is a more legal, forensic term and suggests warding off divine punishment. Expiation refers to the sin or guilt itself and looks to the restoration of the covenant relationship with God. See also atonement, biblical view of; atonement, doctrine of; propitiation; satisfaction.

exposition of the Blessed Sacrament, a religious devotion in which the consecrated host is displayed for the worship of the faithful. The host is usually in a monstrance placed upon the altar or above the tabernacle. The devotion arose from the desire of the faithful to focus their eyes and attention upon the host as a means of fostering interior communion with the Lord and of contemplating the mystery of Christ's presence. As such, this practice is an extension of the custom, originating in the thirteenth century, of the priest's elevating the bread, then the cup, after reciting the words of consecration during the Mass.

Exposition has been part of Forty Hours devotion, First Friday devotions, holy hours of adoration, perpetual adoration, Benediction, and Corpus Christi processions. The liturgical renewal of Vatican Council II, however, promoted an active lay participation in Mass, including Communion. The result has been a decreased need and desire for exposition. See also adoration; Benediction; Blessed Sacrament; Real Presence.

Exsurge Domine (ek-suhr'jay dohm'ee-nay; Lat., "Rise up, Lord"), bull excommunicating Martin Luther. Promulgated June 15, 1520, by Pope Leo X, it gave Luther sixty days to submit. Luther refused and appealed to a future Church council. Although excommunication made Luther liable to civil prosecution, the bull was ineffective, simply marking Luther's final break with Rome. See also Luther, Martin.

Extension Society. See Catholic Church Extension Society.

external forum, process of judgment in canon law that deals with matters publicly known or provable. Matters dealt with in the external forum are not issues that are confined solely to the confidence of the seal of confession or to a strictly confidential pastoral conversation (internal forum). While knowledge of such matters may be held within a certain degree of confidence, they may also be shared with appropriate individuals and may be the basis for making decisions effective in the public realm, e.g., a decision concerning the nullity of a marriage. See also internal forum.

extracanonical writings, several books that, for one reason or another, did not find their way into the Hebrew Bible but were included in the Old Greek (Septuagint) translation and enjoyed considerable popularity and authority in NT times. These were 1–2 Esdras, Judith, Tobit, Wisdom of Solomon, Sirach (Ecclesiasticus), Baruch with the Letter of Jeremiah, 1–2 Maccabees, and Additions to Esther and Daniel. In Protestant usage these are known as Apocrypha (esoteric, to be excluded), while Catholics refer to them as deuterocanonical, though the distinction is now considered to be less important. Most if not all of these books were written between the second century B.C. and the first century A.D. See also Apocrypha; apocryphal Gospels; canon of the Scriptures; pseudepigrapha.

extraliturgical service, a public form of worship that may make use of liturgical elements (e.g., Scripture readings), but which is technically not part of the Church's official liturgy. Examples include popular devotions such as the Rosary or the Stations of the Cross. Neither of these devotions—though frequently celebrated in parishes (especially during seasons like Lent)—has ever been considered part of the Church's official liturgical rites. They are optional practices that play a legitimate role in Christian life but whose contents (so Vatican II insisted in its Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, n. 13) must be in harmony with the Church's liturgy. See also devotions; paraliturgy.

extraordinary means. See ordinary/extraordinary means.

extraordinary minister of the Eucharist, a nonordained (hence "extraordinary") person who distributes Holy Communion to the faithful. Since 1973, diocesan bishops (or their delegates) have been authorized to appoint nonordained Catholics to administer Communion at Mass and to take the Eucharist to the sick or dying. This appointment (for which a rite of commissioning exists) may be either permanent or limited to a specified period. The principle supporting this "extraordinary ministry" is outlined in the 1983 Code of Canon Law (can. 230. 3), which states that laypeople can exercise the ministry of the word, preside over liturgical prayers, confer Baptism and distribute Holy Communion whenever the needs of the Church require it, or whenever sufficient ordained ministers are not available. Thus, extraordinary eucharistic ministers may be appointed whenever the lack of ordained clergy would unduly lengthen a service or whenever the spiritual needs of the infirm in homes or hospitals require it. See also eucharistic minister.

Extreme Unction. See Anointing of the Sick.

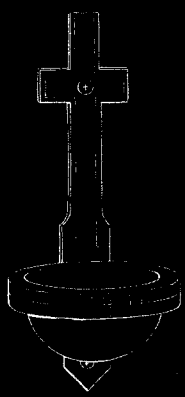
Eymard, St. Peter Julien, 1811–68, founder of two religious communities. Born in Grenoble, France, he was ordained a Marist in 1834. He founded the Blessed Sacrament Fathers (1856) and helped establish a contemplative women's community, the Servants of the Blessed Sacrament (1858). He was canonized in 1962. Feast day: August 1.

F



Faber, Frederick W., 1814–63, author, priest, composer. Born into a Calvinist family and educated at Oxford, Faber first converted to Anglicanism and then in 1845 to Catholicism. He was ordained a Catholic priest in 1847 and soon earned a reputation as a composer of popular hymns and a writer of spiritual books.

Faber, Jacobus, also known as Jacques Lefèvre d'Étaples, ca. 1450–1536, French priest, humanist reformer, and translator of the NT into French. Though condemned by the French government for his Lutheran sympathies, he never fully sympathized and remained personally committed to Catholicism.

Fabian, St., pope (from 236 to 250) and martyr. He was executed during the Decian persecution; his tomb is still extant in the catacombs of Callistus. Feast day (with St. Sebastian): January 20.

Fabiola, St., d. 399, Roman matron who, having divorced a dissolute husband, remarried. Upon her second husband's death she did public penance, distributing her wealth to the poor and caring for the sick. From 394 she lived in Bethlehem with Paula and Eustochium and studied Scripture with Jerome, but eventually she returned to Rome to continue her work with the poor. Feast day: December 27. See also Jerome, St.

faculties, canonical, the authorization, given either by canon law itself or by delegation from competent authority, to perform certain acts of ministry or of governance. Most common are the faculty of hearing confessions and the faculty of officiating at marriages. In these cases, as well as many others, the Church does not recognize the validity of acts performed without the requisite faculties. In order to assure adequately prepared and properly disposed ministers, delegated faculties may be withdrawn or refused under certain specified circumstances.

Faith, Defender of. See Defender of the Faith.

faith and morals (Lat., fides et mores), a phrase used by theologians to identify those areas where the Church is competent to teach. The inner reality of faith is expressed in the revealed truth given in Jesus Christ and the Scriptures and preserved in tradition. The term "morals" has a more ambiguous history. Mores originally referred to the religious and devotional customs and practices of Church life. The ambiguity arose in modern times as "morals" connoted ethical behavior. At the Council of Trent (1545–63) mores clearly meant "customs," although the ethical conduct, particularly of the clergy, was an underlying concern. The shift in meaning can be recognized at the First Vatican Council (1869–70), where a question was raised whether "morals" should be rendered as "the general precepts of morals." Since the definition of papal infallibility concerns the pope's competence to proclaim on "matters of faith and morals," the question of exact meaning becomes crucial. Many moral theologians argue that only the most general precepts of morality are found in revelation, even though the life of faith entails certain moral behavior. Here the power of infallible declarations would include only these most general moral precepts. Others argue that the teaching of the Church aims towards salvation, which requires both living faith and good moral conduct. Hence, infallible papal teaching could provide safeguards for specific moral principles along with truths of faith. That no pope has explicitly declared any moral precept infallibly suggests that the understanding of the phrase "faith and morals" remains unsettled. See also infallibility.

MARK MILLER

Faith and Order, a study commission of the World Council of Churches (WCC) that focuses on the ecumenical call to the churches to pursue "the goal of visible unity in one faith and in one eucharistic fellowship, expressed in worship and in the common life of Christ, and to advance toward that unity in order that the world may believe."

The commission is composed of 120 men and women theologians of various disciplines, from church traditions across all six continents. They include full participants from WCC nonmember churches; for example, there are twelve Roman Catholics (since 1968).

History: In 1921, over four hundred Anglican, Protestant, and Orthodox theologians held the first Faith and Order world conference in 1927 (Lausanne). At its second conference in 1937 (Edinburgh) the theologians decided to fuse their movement into what would become the WCC (1948). The new commission at Lund (1952) moved from the "comparative ecclesiology" method of registering points of agreement and disagreement on church-dividing issues to the method of facing them from that common biblical and Christological basis uncovered in a common history.

Over four decades, Faith and Order had dealt with a broad spectrum of theological issues: the one Church, the churches, and the nature of Church unity; Scripture and tradition; the role of creeds and confessions; so-called nontheological factors on efforts for Church unity; Christian hope today; ordination of women; worship and spirituality; intercommunion.

Since 1982 Faith and Order work has become widely known for its broad discussion and reception process of the Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry (BEM) document, which revealed a formulated agreement on teaching and practice related to the three historically divisive issues mentioned in the title of the document. BEM complements two other ongoing major studies: on the common understanding and common expression of the apostolic faith today, and on the inseparability of the search for Church unity from the quest for renewed human community, for the formulation of doctrinal agreements "cannot be divorced from the redemptive and liberating mission of Christ in the modern world."

The commission prepared jointly with the Pontifical Council for Christian Unity the materials for the annual Week of Prayer for Christian Unity in January. See also World Council of Churches.

THOMAS F. STRANSKY

faith and reason, the relationship between the gift of divine faith and the role of human reason in understanding and explaining it. The Catholic Church avoids two extreme positions regarding the relationship between faith and reason: fideism and rationalism. Fideism denies the possibility of arriving at certain knowledge of the existence of God and the facts of revelation by natural powers. In fideism the sources of religious and moral knowledge lie exclusively in divine revelation. Rationalism subjects the objects of religious faith and the data of revelation to the judgment of unaided human reason.

Vatican I: Vatican I's Dogmatic Constitution on the Catholic Faith (1870) declared that unaided natural reason could acquire certain knowledge of God's existence and nature. The guarantee of the proof of the true religion is not to be found in interior experiences, but in the exterior signs given by God. These signs are the miracles performed by Christ. These objective and external criteria offer rational proof of the existence and authority of God, according to the preambles of faith. They also permit one to hold that one religion is more believable than another.

Vatican II: The Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation (1965) promulgated by Vatican II does not negate the previous council's pronouncements on faith and reason, but casts them in a different light. Where Vatican I begins with the natural knowledge of God and states that it pleased God to reveal "the eternal decree of his will," Vatican II states that God reveals the sacrament of the divine will. Thus, rather than a legalistic and propositional notion of revelation, we have a sacramental view that encompasses the mystery of Christ.

In Vatican II, all the individual miracles are set within the one miracle, which is Christ. The word uttered is the Word, the Son of God. The sixth paragraph of chapter 1 on the nature of divine revelation reiterates that not only is God self-manifested and communicated, but also "the eternal decrees of [the divine] will." It further states that "God, the first principle and last end of all things, can be known with certainty from the created world, by the natural light of human reason." However, the position of these statements gives priority to the revelatory action of God. We are able to come to knowledge of God's existence through reason only because those created realities grounding the basis of rational proof are themselves manifestations of God. This negates the possibility that reason operates independently of grace, for in addition to the subjective assistance that grace provides the person who seeks the preamble of faith, the fact that all created reality is founded in Christ because it proceeds from God's creative word places both faith and reason in a dependence on the revelation of God. Thus, even though reason may precede faith, revelation supplies the criteria of reason. Rather than setting faith and reason against each other, it is more correct to examine their mutual interdependence.

Vatican I teaches that there can be no true contradiction between faith and reason because the source of both is God and God cannot engage in self-denial nor can truth contradict truth. The council attributes any apparent contradiction to the misinterpretation of faith or an error of reason. See also faith; fideism; rationalism; Vatican Council I.

SUSAN K. WOOD

FAITH

Faith is the graced but free human acceptance of God's self-communication in Christ as mediated by the Christian community. Grace and freedom, God's free initiative and the free human response of acceptance, comprise the mystery of faith. Christian faith assumes and transforms the universal experience of human faith and the diverse and varied experience of religious faith. Human faith is the simple capacity to trust another person. As such, it is not peripheral to, but constitutes, the human condition. It assumes that there are reasonable grounds for such trust. When two people meet, they go through a process of getting to know one another by sharing names, background, interests, and so forth. But if the relationship is to move beyond mere acquaintance to a deeper level of friendship, there comes a moment of self-transcendence, which carries with it the risk of deception or betrayal. This is the moment when each person entrusts him- or herself to the other. There are reasonable grounds for such trust in that each knows the other through a shared history, but there is no way to prove with absolute certainty that the other is fully trustworthy. There is always risk, but the risk is credible, not foolish. Without the capacity for self-transcendence in trust and the actual experience of trust in a particular relationship, people cannot grow as mature human beings. Faith in this sense is what makes people human. This human experience is analogous to religious and Christian faith but is the experiential ground that must be subsumed into, and transformed by, a human relationship of friendship with God.

The religious understanding of faith is central to the Judeo-Christian experience as well as to Islam. All three religions claim Abraham as their common father in faith. Faith is central to these religions because they have a historical understanding of world process. Abraham had a personal experience of God who called him forth from the comfort of his ancestral home and promised him a new future for countless generations to come. Faith is precisely trust in the one who promises this future and who is understood to accompany the people on their journey. In this personal and historical sense faith is unique to the Judeo-Christian heritage. It is the appropriate and indeed necessary stance in a world that has not yet arrived at its final consummation. Other religious traditions that have a more cyclical notion of world process and a more impersonal understanding of the divine do not use faith in this sense. However, all religions, insofar as they seek knowledge of the divine and some sort of relationship with the divine that affects human life, can be said to be religious "faiths" or "beliefs." What follows is a further explanation of Christian faith.

A GRACED ACCEPTANCE

Christian tradition has always recognized that faith is a gift of God that depends totally on God's initiative. Individuals cannot enter into a personal, trusting relationship with God unless God invites them into the divine life. While God seeks human friendship, the mutuality that friendship implies can never be that of equals. Jesus said, "I have called you friends, because I have made known to you everything I have heard from my Father" (John 15:15), yet the initiative for such self-revelation is completely from the bosom of the Father (John 1:18). John gives a particularly rich description of the life of faith, which he equates with eternal life, as consisting primarily of the triune God (Father, Son, and Spirit) dwelling in the one who believes and the believer dwelling within the triune God. At its most fundamental, faith is an invitation from God to live the divine life. It is the firm conviction of Christian and Catholic faith that God wills the salvation of all people (1 Tim 2:3–7). Therefore, all people receive this invitation from God (Vatican II, Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, nn. 2, 13–16) but experience it differently within the concrete conditions that constitute their particular life situation. The invitation offered through creation and covenant comes to its deepest and fullest expression in the incarnation of God's only Son (John 1:14–18). One can understand this as the progressive deepening of God's personal self-involvement in the creative process. It is God's own breath (Spirit) that humans breathe to become living creatures (Gen 2:7). It is God's compassionate love for the children of Abraham that frees them from slavery, makes them a people, and brings them to the land of promise (Exod 2:23–4:17). It is God's continuing fidelity in love that has given the world the ultimate gift of grace, his only Son (John 1:17; 3:16; Rom 5:1–11; 8:1–4). Thus, the whole of creation is the expression in ever-deepening ways of God's gracious love.

The certainty of faith, as a gift from God, can be called absolute because it comes from God, who can neither deceive nor be deceived. The inward illumination of grace enables one to entrust oneself to God who is worthy of absolute and total trust. This excludes doubt with regard to the object of faith, because the object of belief is God. But, since faith is neither self-evident nor based on apodictic or empirical "proof" (in a scientific sense), the certainty of faith cannot exclude the possibility of serious questioning and even doubt from the perspective of one's personal, subjective apprehension of the gift. This is normally where the question of certitude arises. As in the case of Abraham, faith gives persons the kind of certainty that allows them to trust in a promised future and to act on that trust. Were apodictic or empirical proof possible, talk would no longer be of faith but of vision (1 Cor 13:12; 1 John 3:2; Heb 11:1).

A FREE HUMAN ACCEPTANCE

Faith in the fullest and deepest sense is not just the intellectual assent of the mind to the truths that God reveals, although that dimension is integral. It is not a question of the mind's grasping something so much as it is of the whole self's being "grasped" by the presence and power of God's Spirit who illumines the mind and draws a person into a life of intimacy and friendship with God. Thus, faith is not reducible to a particular act; it is a whole way of life, a basic orientation of the whole person that includes intellect, will, emotions—in a word, one's deepest desires. Faith is a kind of knowledge, but knowledge in the biblical sense of an intimate and personal involvement of oneself in the life of another. Its primary exemplification in human experience is the total gift of two persons one to another in sexual union. God as portrayed in the Bible is repeatedly characterized as "faithful love" (through the joining of the terms for "merciful love" and "fidelity in truth" in the Hebrew Scriptures, which is then translated as "grace and truth" in John 1:14, 17). One believes God and trusts God because God is faithful to the divine promises (Gen 15:1–6; Rom 4:1–3, 13–25; Heb 11:1–3, 8–12, 17–19) which are fulfilled in Jesus who is "the pioneer and perfecter of our faith" (Heb 12:2).

Faith, then, is a call from God to be faithful in love as God is faithful. In this sense, as with Martin Luther's view of faith, faith is something to be lived and so includes the virtues of love and hope, the experience of union with God, and the desire to live forever in that union. Faith and hope will be subsumed into and transformed by love when we see God "face to face" (1 Cor 13:12–13). Faith and hope are appropriate and necessary in this life, but faith without works is dead. For Paul, "works" mean "works of the law" (Gal 3:2–5, 10–12), so he prefers to speak of "the fruit of the Spirit" (Gal 5:22–23, 25). What is finally effective is a faith that works through love (Gal 5:6). The Letter of James, on the other hand, which Luther called an "epistle of straw," exhorts believers to be "doers of the word, and not merely hearers" (Jas 1:22). The reason is that "faith by itself, if it has no works, is dead" (2:17). For Luther, one is justified by "faith alone," but he understood faith in the full Pauline sense to include the effective power of love and hope. When James says "a person is justified by works and not by faith alone" (2:24), he is distinguishing faith and works but he is also saying that justification requires their inseparable unity. The distinction allowed the Council of Trent (1545–63) to maintain, against Luther, that faith can coexist with sin. However, all Christians—Lutherans and Catholics alike—agree that the faith necessary for justification and salvation must include endurance, character, hope, and love (Rom 5:1–5).

GOD'S SELF-COMMUNICATION IN CHRIST

The term "mystery" in the Christian Scriptures refers to the eternal plan or intention of God, i.e., God's will, hidden in God through the centuries, fully and finally revealed in Christ, and proclaimed by the Christian community (Rom 16:25–26; Col 1:24–28; 2:2–3; Eph 1:9–10; 3:2–12). Christian faith is centered in Christ, but to speak of God's self-communication in Christ is to speak of Jesus' personal relation to the Father in the power of the Spirit, i.e., the inner triune life of God. Equally important is the Christian community, which is the sacramental embodiment of God's own inner life to the degree that humans are enabled to receive and express visibly the mystery. The only and unique mediator between God and humans who makes this possible is the fully human Christ Jesus (1 Tim 2:4–6). Cardinal John Henry Newman (d. 1890) said that no people has been denied a revelation from God. It is true that God reveals the divine Self through experiences of nature, of consciousness and conscience (moral exigence), of self-transcending relationships with other persons, especially in love, and of personal and communal histories. Vatican II affirms the constant tradition that God can be known with certainty from created reality by using human reason and reflection (Vatican II, Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, nn. 3, 6), but the council is more concerned to emphasize that in Christ is the fullness of revelation (nn. 2, 4, 6). This revelation is final in that humanity awaits no new public revelation before the final coming and it is full because it communicates the divine mystery, which totally transcends the capacities of the human mind. The mystery hidden in God and revealed in Christ is the fullness of the triune life of God.

It is helpful to distinquish two ways in which this revelation is received in faith. First, fides qua (Lat., "faith by which") refers to the self-involving act of trust in the personal God who reveals the inner divine life to individuals and calls them into a promised future. The Hebrew Scriptures understand faith primarily in these concrete and personal terms as fidelity (or obedience) to God's word. The Hebrew word 'emet refers to something solid or firm, something that can be relied upon to be true in the sense of trustworthy or faithful. Faith, in effect, says "I believe you." Signs, e.g., miracles that might provide motives for belief, are secondary to the personal relationship as such. The Christian Scriptures continue this understanding, but the Greek word pisteuein means not only to trust or show confidence, but also to accept as true. Thus, Paul speaks of "the obedience of faith" (Rom 1:5; 16:26), which includes not only fidelity but also acceptance of "the word of faith that we proclaim" (Rom 10:8). This involves both believing in the heart that God raised Jesus from the dead and confessing with the lips that Jesus is Lord (Rom 10:9–10; 4:24–25). In other words, the experience of faith also includes doctrinal content. This is the second way in which the revelation is received in faith, fides quae (Lat., "faith which"). This refers to the knowledge and acceptance of revealed truth, the content of teaching (doctrine). Concern for this becomes more evident in the Christian Scriptures as Church structure and organization develop. For example, the term "mystery" takes on a clear doctrinal meaning in 1 Timothy, where the emphasis is on correct teaching and right Church order (1:3–7; 3:9, 16; 4:1–3, 6; 6:20–21). Likewise, the Gospel of John, with its strong emphasis on personal relationship with God, concludes with the affirmation that these things were written "so that you may come to believe that Jesus is the Messiah, the Son of God, and that through believing you may have life in his name" (20:31). It should be emphasized, however, that the ecclesial concern for correct doctrine, which involves intellectual assent to propositions

("I believe that something is true"), while integral and necessary for a complete understanding of faith, is secondary and subordinate. It can never displace the primary and essential commitment of one person to another ("I believe you").

MEDIATED BY THE CHRISTIAN COMMUNITY

Faith is personal not only in an individual sense but also in a social sense. Through Baptism persons are incorporated into a community of believers/disciples that is the matrix of growth into mature faith. Each individual, through his or her particular gifts of the Spirit, builds up the whole body into an integrated and harmonious unity. "For as in one body we have many members, and not all the members have the same function, so we, who are many, are one body in Christ, and individually we are members one of another" (Rom 12:4–5; cf. 1 Cor 12:4–11, 12–31; Col 3:14–15; Eph 4:11–16). As Ephesians so beautifully puts it: "Speaking the truth in love, we must grow up in every way into him who is the head, into Christ" (4:15). However, communal faith must not be confined to the building up and maintenance of the Church as such (which is the concern of Vatican II's Dogmatic Constitution on the Church). Such faith must serve the primary mission of the Church by going outside it, by proclaiming the gospel to all nations and building the kingdom of God on earth as in heaven (which is the concern of Vatican II's Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World). It is increasingly recognized today that the service of faith includes the promotion of justice as an absolute requirement. Thus, Christian faith as the following of Jesus can never be adequately understood as an asocial, individualistic reality. A true believer is one who reaches out to all of God's children, both within and outside the Church, and indeed to the whole of creation, which is to be cared for as the expression of God's creative love (Gen 2:15; 1:26–27). In a word, living faith includes not only the love of God whom one does not see, but inseparably the love of all those whom one does see (1 John 4:20).

OFFICIAL CATHOLIC TEACHINGS

The Second Council of Orange (529), following the teaching of Augustine of Hippo (d. 430), condemned all forms of Pelagianism or semi-Pelagianism, which sought to displace the priority and continuance of divine grace with purely human efforts. The Council of Trent (1545–63), following the teaching of Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274), maintained the distinction between faith, hope, and love. Faith is caused by the internal movement of the Holy Spirit, to which the intellect assents by a movement of the will. Thus, the process is one of graced, but free human acceptance. Faith is not simply a matter of trust (as Luther was understood at the council), but includes assent to revealed truths. As distinct from love and hope, faith can coexist with sin, but as the free gift of God that involves the whole person it is necessary for salvation. The First Vatican Council (1869–70), against the excesses of both rationalism (which displaces faith with reason alone) and fideism (which exalts faith at the expense of reason), emphasized both the authority of God who reveals, and so the need for the enlightenment of the Holy Spirit, and the coherence of reason with the obedience of faith. Finally, the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) remained in continuity with the traditional understanding of faith while recognizing in the Decree on Ecumenism that true faith, which justifies and sanctifies, exists in all Christian churches, not just in the Catholic Church. Likewise, in the Declaration on Religious Freedom the council recognized the priority of conscience in matters of faith. Faith as the graced but free human acceptance of God's self-communication cannot be forced, and so a certain legitimacy is accorded religious pluralism.

See also faith and reason; grace; revelation.

Bibliography

Haight, Roger. Dynamics of Theology. Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press, 1990.
Hellwig, Monika K. Understanding Catholicism. New York: Paulist Press, 1981.
McBrien, Richard P. Catholicism. Rev. ed. San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1994.

MICHAEL L. COOK

Faithful, Mass of the. See Mass of the Faithful.

faith healing, health cures brought about by prayer or the laying on of hands. The NT gives abundant indications of healings performed in the name of God. The healing of the sick is alluded to in the sacramental practice of the Anointing of the Sick. Some denominational movements (e.g., Christian Science) substitute such healing for conventional medicine.

Today faith healing tends to be identified with certain practices and services connected with charismatic Christians, both Protestant and Catholic, in which healings are sought through ecstatic prayer, the laying on of hands, and, infrequently, anointings with oil. Such healings often invoke the notion of the exorcism of evil spirits or malign powers. Catholics are not required to believe in such healings. See also healing.

Falconieri, St. Alexis, 1200–ca. 1310, one of seven Florentine nobles who founded the Servite order. This group withdrew from society to live in prayer and austerity. Unlike the others, Alexis refused ordination and remained a lay brother until his death at age 110. Alexis was canonized with the other founders in 1888. Feast day: February 17. See also Servites.

Falconieri, St. Juliana, 1270–1341, niece of Alexis Falconieri. Refusing an arranged marriage, she became a Third Order Servite. After her mother's death, Juliana lived in a group with other pious women. The order of life which she composed for this group eventually became the rule for Servite nuns. Feast day: June 19. See also Servites.

faldstool (fawld'st*oo*l; Old Eng., "movable stool"), a small, backless, folding stool with arms; used as a seat for bishops. Auxiliary and coadjutor bishops, who may not occupy the bishop's cathedra (chair), always use the faldstool instead of the throne. In conjunction with a cushion it is used as a support for kneeling. The faldstool may substitute for the prie-dieu (Fr., "pray God"), a prayer desk with kneeler.

Fall, the, term referring to the early Christian interpretation of Gen 3. According to the narrative, a serpent tempts the woman to eat fruit from the tree in the middle of the garden, the tree God had forbidden to the man and woman. God had warned that eating from it would cause death, but the serpent enticed the woman to eat, promising that eating the fruit would make the man and woman like God, knowing good and evil. The woman, persuaded by the fruit's attractiveness and the serpent's ploy, ate of the fruit and gave some to the man, who also ate.

When God questioned the man and woman, the man blamed the woman for giving him the fruit, and the woman blamed the serpent. God proceeded to punish them for their action: the serpent would crawl on his belly, eat dust, and have an adverse relationship with humankind; the woman, in spite of increased pain in childbearing, would still be sexually attracted to the man, and he would dominate her; the earth would yield food for humankind only after very hard work on the part of the man until his death.

This narrative, because it tells the story of the first man and woman's disobedience to God's directive and its consequences, has been described theologically as "the Fall." The term affirms that the harmonic relationship God intended at creation was ruptured when humankind disobeyed God and "fell" from grace. The action has been understood as the "original sin" that began a history of humankind's unfaithfulness to God. Only Jesus and Mary were preserved from the effects of this first sin.

Historical criticism has provided another interpretation of Gen 3. The chapter is understood as an etiological narrative, that is, a story intended to explain why certain things are the way they are, in this case why, in spite of God's love and goodness, humankind suffers. God should not be blamed for the harsh realities the ancient Israelites experienced—for the threat poisonous snakes represented, for the physical pain endured by women at childbirth, for male domination over females, and for the hard work essential to the production of food. The narrative explains that humans, not God, are responsible for these difficult experiences.

If one understands the text in this way, it no longer narrates "the Fall." The sufferings are not punishments sent by God to be borne bravely. On the contrary, humankind should—and has—set about diminishing them. The domination of women by men is the one curse named in Gen 3 that, often unrecognized as an evil, continues to prevail.

"The Fall" remains a theological term but it has been generalized to refer to the recognized fact that human beings have been, and continue to be, unfaithful to God. See also Adam and Eve; original sin.

ALICE L. LAFFEY

False Decretals, a series of papal letters and canonical documents supposedly originating in early Christianity that were forged ca. 850 in France, perhaps at Rheims. Part of a collection falsely attributed to Isidore of Seville (d. 636), the forgeries as a whole seek to buttress the episcopal office and secure bishops from legal attack. Influential in later medieval canon law and ecclesiology, they were used by the Gregorian reformers to support their claims for episcopal independence from lay control. See also Gregorian reform; Gregory VII.

family, the most basic unit of the Church. Echoing John Chrysostom's late fourth-century commentary on the book of Genesis in which he called the family ekklesia (Gk., "church"), Pope Leo XIII (d. 1903) wrote, "The family was ordained of God. . . . It was before the Church, or rather the first form of the Church on earth" (Arcanum Divine Sapientiae, "On Christian Marriage," 1880). The Second Vatican Council (1962–65) revived this ancient but neglected aspect of the Church's self-understanding. In the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church the council declared that the family is "the domestic Church" (n. 11), and in the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World it said, "The Christian family . . . will show forth to all . . . the authentic nature of the Church" (n. 48). The Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity called the family "a domestic sanctuary of the Church" (n. 11).

Teachings on the Family: Since Vatican II, popes Paul VI, John Paul I, and John Paul II have all restated the importance of understanding the family as "the domestic Church." Paul VI, in his 1975 apostolic exhortation on evangelization, Evangelii Nuntiandi, wrote, "At different moments in the Church's history and also in the Second Vatican Council, the family has well deserved the beautiful name of 'domestic Church.'" In an address to the bishops of the United States, John Paul I said, "The Christian family is so important, and its role is so basic in the kingdom of God, that the council called it a 'domestic Church'." In his 1981 apostolic exhortation on the family, John Paul II repeated, "The Christian family . . . can and should be called 'the domestic Church'" (n. 21). He continued, "The family, called together by word and sacrament as the Church of the home, is both teacher and mother, the same as the worldwide Church" (n. 38). "No plan of organized pastoral work at any level," the pope wrote, "must ever fail to take into consideration the pastoral area of the family" (n. 70).

During the course of his 1987 visit to the United States, John Paul II declared that family life is central to the life of the parish. He said that "every parish is a family of families. The vitality of a parish greatly depends on the spiritual vigor, commitment and involvement of its families. The family in fact is the basic unit of society and of the Church." The pope pointed out that families "are those living cells which come together to form the very substance of parish life." At the same time, the pope expressed realism: "Some [families] are healthy and filled with the love of God. . . . In some there is little energy for the life of the Spirit. Some have broken down altogether."

For John Paul II, families are a major source of pastoral concern: "The priests and their collaborators in a parish must try to be very close to all families in their need for pastoral care, and to provide the support and spiritual nourishment they require." He continued, "Each parish must be fully committed to [the pastoral care of families], especially in the face of so much breakdown and undermining of family life in society. I appeal to all priests—pastors, associates and all concerned . . . to do everything possible, working together, to serve the family as effectively as possible."

The 1983 Code of Canon Law states that "pastors of souls are obliged to ensure that their own church community provides for Christ's faithful the assistance by which the married state is preserved in its Christian character and develops in perfection." Among the ways "pastors of souls" are to do this is "by the help given to those who have entered marriage, so that by faithfully observing and protecting their conjugal covenant, they may day by day achieve a holier and a fuller family life" (can. 1063).

Family Rights and a Family Perspective: At the request of the 1980 Synod of Bishops, in 1983 the Vatican issued a "Charter of the Rights of the Family." This charter states that "the rights of the person, even though they are expressed as rights of the individual, have a fundamental social dimension which finds an innate and vital expression in the family." The family "exists prior to the state or any other community, and possesses rights which are inalienable."

In 1988, the ad hoc committee on Marriage and Family Life of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops in the United States issued "A Family Perspective in Church and Society." This document defined the family as "an intimate community of persons bound together by blood, marriage, or adoption, for the whole of life." In the Catholic tradition, "the family proceeds from marriage—an intimate, exclusive, permanent, and faithful partnership of husband and wife." According to this document, "the Church needs to support positive developments, to look for new ways to help families, and to unearth the resources that enable families to move from crisis to growth, from stress to strength. This can be done by incorporating a family perspective, as a pastoral strategy, in all its policies, programs, ministries, and services." The Church needs to do this, not so much because family life is in trouble today, but because family life "is fundamental to the healthy life of the Church and society."

Family Life and the Future of the Church: There is an interdependent relationship between the parish and the families, or home churches, that constitute the parish. Each must nourish and support the other if the Church as a whole is to carry out faithfully the mission entrusted to it by Christ.

The family—including two-parent families, single-parent families, childless married couples, couples whose children are grown and gone, single and widowed persons in the context of their extended family network, and blended families—is meant to "constitute the Church in its fundamental dimension" (John Paul II). Therefore, as family life goes, so goes the future of the Church. Any complete theology of the Church, and any effective pastoral ministry, must take this strand of tradition seriously. See also domestic church; Marriage.

Bibliography

Finley, Mitch, and Kathy Finley. Christian Families in the Real World: Reflections on a Spirituality for the Domestic Church. Chicago: Thomas More Press, 1984.

Finley, Mitch. Your Family in Focus: Appreciating What You Have, Making It Even Better. Notre Dame, IN: Ave Maria Press, 1993.

Kehrwald, Leif. Caring That Enables: A Manual for Developing Parish Family Ministry. Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press, 1991.

Papal Committee for the Family. The Family in the Pastoral Activity of the Church. Washington, DC: United States Catholic Conference, 1978.

MITCH FINLEY

Farley, John M., 1842–1918, cardinal-archbishop of New York. An Irish immigrant educated at Fordham University and the North American College (Rome), he was ordained a priest in 1870. He became secretary to Cardinal John McCloskey (1872), advanced to vicar general (1891) and auxiliary bishop (1895), and succeeded McCloskey to become the fourth archbishop of New York (1902) and was later made a cardinal (1911). His career was dedicated to education and pastoral care, especially of immigrants. He doubled the number of archdiocesan parochial schools, and opened Cathedral College and Seminary in 1903. A patron of the original Catholic Encyclopedia, he published two books: The History of St. Patrick's Cathedral (1908), and The Life of John Cardinal McCloskey (1918).

Farley, Margaret, b. 1935, Catholic moral theologian. She is currently the Gilbert L. Stark Professor of Christian Ethics at Yale Divinity School. She received a Ph.D. from Yale University in 1973. Her works include Personal Commitments: Making, Keeping, Breaking (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1986). She is a member of the Religious Sisters of Mercy.

Fascism, one of the most important and successful extreme right-wing movements in post–World War I Europe. Its creator was the Italian politician Benito Mussolini (1883–1945). Mixing together nationalism, the philosophy of Friedrich Nietzsche, and the political theory of Karl Marx, Mussolini emerged after World War I at the head of a political party called the Fasci di Combattimento (It., "combat groups") from which the name Fascism derives. The Fascist party called for an end to the power of capitalist elites, increased state control over the economy through state/labor corporative councils, and for Italy's return to the imperial greatness of its Roman past. Mussolini rapidly rose to power, helped greatly by the instability of Italy's postwar democracy. In 1922, faced with a Fascist army marching on Rome, King Victor Emmanuel III asked Mussolini to form a new government.

In 1929, Pope Pius XI and Mussolini signed the Lateran Treaty. The treaty recognized papal control over Vatican City and its political independence. It also made Catholicism the official religion of the Italian state and allowed Catholic religious education in public schools.

However, the following year the pope criticized the Fascists, claiming that the party trained the young to worship the state. A papal encyclical in 1937, Mit Brennender Sorge, similarly denounced Nazism for promoting racism and paganism. See also Lateran Treaty.

fast, eucharistic. See eucharistic fast.

fast days, days on which solid food may not be taken between meals, meals are meatless, and the smaller meals combined are not to equal in size the main meal of the day. Prior to the reforms of the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), fast days were far more numerous, but the current discipline of the Western Church prescribes only two fast days in universal law: Ash Wednesday and Good Friday. Fasting on these days is required for those who have reached canonical majority (eighteen years of age) and have not yet celebrated their fifty-ninth birthday. It is important to note that the purpose of the fast, indeed of any penitential practice, is to give the faithful the opportunity to reflect on their lives, to express sorrow for sins, and to resolve to lead a more fervent Christian life. See also abstinence; fasting.

fasting, a spiritual discipline by which food is voluntarily given up for a defined period. With clear warrant in the Bible, especially the example of Jesus who fasted in the desert, fasting has had a long history in the Catholic tradition.

Various religious communities have institutionalized full or partial fasts as part of their weekly regime. It was common in the Catholic tradition to fast on the evening before the reception of Holy Communion as the word breakfast indicates. Today, however, only a partial fast (for one hour before communion) is demanded.

In the contemporary Church, fasting (with the meaning of only one full meal in a day) is enjoined on adult Catholics on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday by the Code of Canon Law (can. 1251), although the practice is encouraged as a private devotion whenever appropriate (can. 1249). The practice of a daylong fast in solidarity with the poor of the world has been an informal custom in many areas of the Catholic world. See also abstinence; penance.

fate (Lat., fatum, "that which has been spoken"), an ancient concept denoting a force that moves all human affairs toward a predetermined end.

Within Christianity, fate is acknowledged to the extent that an individual's life finds definition within contexts where not all factors may be controlled. Although individuals may shape their own reactions to the world, the world itself often seems uncontrollable. In this sense, one's life is determined not only by personal actions, plans, and dreams, but also by what happens outside oneself. All people ultimately share death as a common fate. While an individual may either temporarily postpone or hasten death, each person must finally surrender to death as a universal given.

For Christians, fate is not an impersonal force. Rather, God remains as the essential mystery that grounds the world and all its conditionings in love. Indeed, Jesus' Resurrection even deprives death, the most common and perhaps most feared fate, of its lasting power. Events and situations will remain to which people can only resign themselves in an acceptance founded in faith. In contrast, deterministic notions of fate as the basic condition of life severely weaken human responsibility and freedom. See also providence.

Father, title generally given to a priest, denoting a spiritual relationship between the priest and his congregation or with anyone else to whom he ministers. In the early Church, the bishop was often viewed as a spiritual father, as one who had teaching authority over the local church. The title "Father" was extended to priests who were sacramental confessors and during the medieval period to all mendicant friars. However, it was not until the nineteenth century that the title was extended to all priests in the English-speaking world. Today, the title is sometimes used by priests and ministers of the Anglican (especially Anglo-Catholic) and Lutheran churches. See also priest.

Fatherhood of God, the role of father commonly, though now controversially, attributed to God. In the OT God is called Father only rarely, but in the NT this is a relatively common name for God. In the Gospels God is called the Father (Lat., pater) of Jesus Christ 170 times: 4 times in Mark, 15 in Luke, 42 in Matthew, and 109 in John. In the Greek Gospels Jesus uses the Aramaic term for Father, "Abba," only once (Mark 14:36). "Abba" is used only two other times in the Scriptures, by Paul in Rom 8:15 and Gal 4:6. In twelve places Jesus addresses himself in prayer to God as Father (Matt 11:25–6; Luke 10:21; John 11:41; Mark 14:36; Matt 26:39; Matt 26:42; Luke 22:42; Luke 23:34; Luke 23:46; John 17:1, 5, 11, 21, 24, 25), leading most exegetes to conclude that God's fatherhood is a clear and consistent hallmark of Jesus' prayer. The distinction Jesus makes between "my Father" and "your Father" is post-Easter but is based on Jesus' distinction between "my Father" and "the Father in heaven"; the latter term is used to talk to others about their God. By addressing God as "Abba" or Father, one uses a term of intimacy that was a characteristic feature of Jesus' own prayer. However, just as the early Christian community did not infer the uniqueness of Jesus' sonship directly from his prayers to "Abba" but from other data about Jesus, so also one cannot deduce an ontological fatherhood of God directly from the fact that God was called "Father" by Jesus.

Despite the fact that God is so often called Father (and not Mother) in the NT, it would be improper to draw a strict correlation between divine and human fatherhood, for example, by concluding that God is male. First, God is beyond all names and, second, God's being is not marked by sexuality. Fatherhood is clearly an analogous or metaphorical term and cannot be applied literally to God's being. God is as much like as unlike human fathers.

Doctrine of the Trinity: The biblical metaphor of God's fatherhood came into even greater prominence through the doctrine of the Trinity. Prior to the fourth century, "God" and "Father" were synonyms; there was not yet an "intratrinitarian" meaning to fatherhood. In time, the Father-Son relationship, well attested especially in John's Gospel, became the cornerstone of speculation on God's Trinity. Divine fatherhood came to be understood as indicating more than God's relationship to creation, specifically, God the Father's eternal relationship to God the Son.

These doctrinal developments took place within a patriarchal society, which assumed that fathers (not mothers) were the active, life-giving principle. The great temptation was to use the biblical witness to legitimate the social arrangements of patriarchy. Recently, feminist criticism has unmasked the extent to which the Christian tradition has literalized the image of God's fatherhood, thereby failing to observe the cardinal theological principle of God's incomprehensibility. Further, feminism has criticized the tendency of the tradition to project the supposed dominance of male over female onto God's being, thereby eclipsing women as equal carriers of the divine image. Feminism preserves the authentic Christian insight into the incomprehensibility and unnameability of God's essence, as well as the doctrine that each individual woman and man is created imago Dei (Lat., "in the image of God"). See also God; Trinity, doctrine of the.

CATHERINE MOWRY LACUGNA

Fathers, Apostolic. See Apostolic Fathers.

Fathers of the Church, in contemporary usage an informal designation generally reserved for those early figures whose teaching, collectively regarded, is considered the foundation of orthodox Christian doctrine. The age of the Fathers is generally held to close in the East with John of Damascus (d. 749) and in the West with Gregory the Great (d. 604), although some extend the latter to Isidore of Seville (d. 636) or even Bede (d. 735). The term is not restricted to bishops (Jerome and Anthony of Egypt are included) or even to persons of unquestionable orthodoxy (Origen, Tertullian, John Cassian, and even Theodore of Mopsuestia are generally included) and is almost always used in the plural.

Contemporary usage has its roots in mid-fourth century usage by Basil and Gregory of Nazianzus, among others, who use the term "fathers" to describe earlier authorities, especially the bishops gathered at Nicaea (325). At the Council of Ephesus (431) Cyril had a dossier of earlier authorities, and the formula of the Council of Chalcedon (451) refers to the bishops of the councils of Nicaea and of Constantinople (381) as the "fathers." By the fifth century it was common in polemical situations to invoke among the "fathers" any earlier orthodox teacher whose authority was generally recognized, whether bishop or not (and Augustine so refers to Jerome in polemic against Julian of Eclanum). By the time of the Carolingians the word is used collectively not only to designate authority, but with a sense of closure and distance, so that, for example, Alcuin (d. 804) can speak of wandering through the "cellars" or "storehouses" of the "fathers," who are thus collectively imaged as a respository of authority that cannot be duplicated. See also Apostolic Fathers; patristics.

JOHN C. CAVADINI

Fátima (fa'ti-muh), a small town in Portugal associated with one of the most important Marian shrines. On May 13, 1917, three illiterate children, Lucia dos Santos and her two cousins, Francisco and Jacinta, claimed to have seen a vision of a woman standing on a cloud in an evergreen tree near the Cova de Iria. In a conversation heard only by Lucia and Jacinta, the woman asked the children to return to the site on the thirteenth of each month until October. Despite local resistance and an effort to refute the testimony of the children, the popularity of the apparitions grew, so that by October fifty thousand pilgrims assembled with the children at the Cova de Iria. Although many claimed to have witnessed a "miracle of the sun," the woman was visible only to the children. She identified herself as "Our Lady of the Rosary," and asked the children to recite the Rosary daily, proclaim the need for moral conversion, and erect a chapel in her honor.

In 1930, after a seven-year study, the bishop of Leiria proclaimed the legitimacy of the apparitions and authorized the cult of Our Lady of Fátima. Subsequently, Jacinta provided two important accounts of the apparitions in 1936–37 and 1941–42, from which the "Threefold Message of Fátima," namely, the practice of penance, the recitation of the Rosary, and devotion to the Immaculate Heart of Mary was made known.

Although approved by the Church, the events surrounding Fátima are private revelations. Catholics are not required to give assent to the apparitions themselves or to the revelations disclosed at Fátima. See also apparitions of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

MICHAEL O'KEEFFE

Faulhaber, Michael von, 1869–1952, cardinal-archbishop of Munich, Germany, and a leader against the Nazis. He forcefully condemned totalitarianism and racism, especially anti-Semitism. After World War II, he worked with American occupation forces in reconstructing Munich. He received the Grand Cross of the Order of Merit, the highest award from the then West German Republic.

Faustus of Riez, ca. 410–ca. 490, preacher, writer, abbot of Lérins beginning in 433 and bishop of Riez in Gaul (now France) beginning in 457. He produced two treatises, De Gratia (Lat., "On Grace") and De Spiritu Sancto (Lat., "On the Holy Spirit"), and a large correspondence. His views on grace, written against predestinarianism, align him with what is generally termed the "semi-Pelagian" position, which held that the beginning of faith is an act made independently of the grace of God. See also predestination; semi-Pelagianism.

favor of law, in canon law a device establishing legal presumptions and indicating what facts or ways of proceeding are to be followed to overturn presumptions. The fact, for example, that marriage enjoys the favor of the law (can. 1060) indicates that a marriage is presumed to be valid; only proper juridical procedure can overturn this presumption. An annulment proceeding must, therefore, establish the invalidity of a given marriage with moral certitude and, if it does not, the marriage is still considered valid.

Fawkes, Guy, 1570–1606, born in Yorkshire, England, a member of the Gunpowder Plot conspiracy, an apparent attempt by Roman Catholic conspirators to blow up the English Parliament during the state opening on November 5, 1605. A former Protestant, Fawkes was recruited into the plot by Robert Catesby. Discovered with the explosives, Fawkes was executed with coconspirators. See also England, Catholicism in.

fear of God, the attitude of respect and awe that humans are to have toward God. The Hebrew word yir'âh, though it literally means "fear," is best translated as "awe" or "respect." As an attitude toward God, it acknowledges the greatness and power of God. Faithfulness and obedience are appropriate responses to the awesome God.

Many passages in the OT specify behavior appropriate to those who fear the Lord. For example, they will not obstruct the path of the blind (Lev 19:14) or cheat others (25:17). The NT records the awe/fear toward God that was experienced, for example, at the birth and naming of John the Baptizer (Luke 1:65); at Jesus' marvelous calming of the storm (Luke 8:25); and at the wonders the apostles performed after the Ascension (Acts 2:43).

Because believers are to fear God, no one and nothing else need be feared. Abram is counseled not to fear, for God is his shield (Gen 15:1); Isaac, because God is with him (Gen 26:24); Joseph's brothers, because God had intended their actions for good (Gen 50:19); and the Hebrews, because God would accomplish their deliverance (Exod 14:13). God is in charge; there is no need to be anxious. Similarly, the NT counsels not to fear. Joseph should not fear because Mary's child is from the Holy Spirit (Matt 1:20); Mary, because she has found favor with God (Luke 1:30); and the shepherds, because the Anointed One, the Lord, had been born (Luke 2:10).

Like wisdom, knowledge, and understanding, fear of God is a gift of God whose attainment is to be ardently sought. See also gifts of the Holy Spirit.

ALICE L. LAFFEY

feasts, liturgical, days in the Church calendar that commemorate significant events in the life of Christ, the saints, or the Christian people. Sunday, the weekly commemoration of Christ's Resurrection, is the original feast and, since Constantine's Edict of Toleration (313), has been considered a Christian "day of rest." At an early period, however, two principal categories of feasts developed: "movable" (with no fixed date) and "immovable" (fixed date). The most important movable feast is Easter, always celebrated (following a decree of the Council of Nicaea in 325) on the first Sunday following the first full moon after the vernal equinox (hence, between March 22 and April 25). Easter's variable date also determines the dates of other major feasts such as Ascension (forty days after Easter) and Pentecost (fifty days after Easter). Similarly, Ash Wednesday and the beginning of Lent are computed by working backward from the date of Easter for that year. (If Easter falls on April 25, for example, Ash Wednesday is March 10.) Among the immovable feasts are the anniversaries of martyrs' deaths (celebrated in Rome by at least the third century); saints' birthdays (e.g., John the Baptist on June 24, the Virgin Mary on September 8); and, most prominently, the feast of Christ's Nativity (December 25). In the Roman Catholic calendar, reformed after Vatican Council II, "feast" is a technical term for days that are of less importance than "solemnities" (like Easter), but of more importance than "memorials" (most saints' days). See also liturgical year.

Febronianism, an eighteenth-century movement in Germany that subordinated the Church to national interests. Under the penname of Justinus Febronius, Johann Nikolaus von Hontheim (1701–90), auxiliary bishop of Trier, proposed this popular theory in 1763. In 1778, after Pope Pius VI condemned the view, Hontheim recanted, but Febronianism continued into the nineteenth century.

Febronianism restricted papal authority to supervising Church unity and promulgating decrees of general councils. If the pope did not regularly convene a general council, bishops or the emperor should do so. Papal pronouncements would bind only with the bishops' consent. To promote Church unity, Hontheim would have divided the Church into state-controlled national churches. The movement collapsed after the French Revolution and for lack of support from other German bishops. See also ecumenical council; Germany, Catholicism in; primacy, papal.

Federation of Diocesan Liturgical Commissions (FDLC), an organization of diocesan liturgical commissions. A 1968 suggestion from the U.S. Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy (BCL) resulted in a BCL-sponsored meeting of twenty-four representatives from the twelve episcopal regions of the United States. A second meeting in El Paso, Texas, in 1969 established FDLC. Its main purpose is the promotion of the liturgy as the heart and center of Christian life, especially in parishes. The FDLC is directed by an executive secretary and its headquarters are in Washington, D.C.

Feehan, Patrick Augustine, 1829–1902, archbishop of Chicago (1880–1902). Born in Ireland, he emigrated to the United States in 1850 and was ordained in 1852. He was made bishop of Nashville in 1865 and in 1880 was chosen to head the archdiocese of Chicago. At this time Chicago witnessed a major influx of southern and eastern European Catholics. Feehan graciously welcomed the newcomers and allowed a proliferation of ethnic churches and social welfare institutions to blossom in his diocese. He also established the archdiocesan newspaper New World.

Feeney, Leonard, 1897–1978, Jesuit priest, poet, founder of "The Slaves of the Immaculate Heart of Mary." He was dismissed from the Jesuits and was excommunicated in 1953 for refusing to recant his strict interpretation of Boniface VIII's axiom, "Outside the Church, no salvation." According to Feeney, only Catholics could be saved. The Vatican's Holy Office rejected his view by distinguishing between those who "really" (Lat., in re) belong to the Church by explicit faith and Baptism and those who belong to the Church "by desire" (in voto). The desire would be explicit in the case of catechumens and implicit in the case of those people of good will who would join the Church if they knew it to be the one, true Church of Christ. In his earlier years, Feeney was known for his work as spiritual director for Catholic students at Harvard University, for his books and poetry, and for his controversial street-preaching in Boston, with its disturbingly anti-Semitic overtones. Pope Paul VI lifted the excommunication prior to Feeney's death, without requiring him to make a public retraction of his views. See also salvation outside the Church.

Felician Sisters, the Congregation of the Sisters of St. Felix of Cantalice of the Third Order of St. Francis (C.S.S.F), a congregation dedicated to prayer and works of mercy. It was founded in Warsaw, Poland, in 1855 by Sophia Truszkowska under the direction of a Capuchin priest, Honorat Kozminski. They adopted the Third Order Regular Franciscan rule and the patronage of St. Felix, an Italian Capuchin brother. In the late nineteenth century a group came to the United States, originally to serve Polish immigrants and eventually the broader population. In 1993 there were just over three hundred sisters, the largest number being in the United States. There are also Felicians in Poland, Canada, and South America. See also Franciscan Sisters.

Felicity, St. 1 Roman widow and martyr. Felicity, also known as Felicitas, suffered death in A.D. 165 with her sons in Rome. Feast day: November 23. 2 Slave of St. Perpetua, martyred in Carthage in A.D. 203. Feast day: March 7.

Felix III (II), St., d. 492, pope from 483 to 492, formerly Felix III until the removal of Felix II (papal claimant during the reign of Liberius) from the list of popes. He is famous for his rejection of the Henoticon (favoring Monophysitism) and his excommunication of the patriarch Acacius of Constantinople (471–89) for supporting it. The ensuing Acacian Schism lasted until 519. Feast day: March 1. See also Acacianism.

Felix of Urgel, d. 817, supporter of the Spanish Adoptionist Elipandus, and principal exponent of Spanish Adoptionism in the border areas of Charlemagne's realm. Charlemagne's anxiety prompted Felix's condemnation in 792 (Regensburg), 794 (Frankfurt) and, after a debate with Alcuin in which Felix declared himself convinced, 799 (Aachen). He died under house arrest in Lyons, reformulating his teaching for a salon of admirers. See also Adoptionism.

Felix of Valois, St., 1126–1212, cofounder of the Order of the Most Holy Trinity (Trinitarians). Born in France, he lived as a hermit until he and one of his disciples, John of Matha, secured papal approval for a new religious order to ransom Crusaders who were taken captive by the Moors in Spain and by Muslims in the Holy Land and elsewhere. Felix administered the French province from his hermitage in Cerfroid. Feast day: November 20. See also Trinitarians.

feminism, the belief that women and men should have equal economic, political, and social opportunity and should be accorded the same dignity and rights. Feminists strive to create social attitudes, policies, and structures to attain those goals. Feminism maintains that both women and men are dehumanized by androcentric and patriarchal structures that subordinate women. The aim, therefore, is for the transformation of systems and structures that are oppressive. Feminism may be liberal, radical, romantic, or socialist. Liberal feminism emphasizes legal and political equality for women; radical feminism analyzes patriarchal structures for the purpose of liberating women from them. Romantic feminism aspires to bring so-called feminine values to bear on the public order, while socialist feminism focuses on the sexual division of labor, production, and reproduction and the connection between class, race, and gender in oppressive systems.

The feminist movement that has grown since the publication of The Feminine Mystique by Betty Friedan in 1963 is not a new phenomenon. In 1792, Mary Wollstonecraft published A Vindication of the Rights of Women, in which she proposed that women deserve the same opportunities as men in education, employment, and politics and that they be judged by the same moral standards. The Declaration of Sentiments and Resolutions issued by the First Women's Rights Convention at Seneca Falls, New York, in 1848 declared that "all men and women are created equal."

Christian Feminism: The modern feminist movement has given rise within the Church to feminist theology that is rooted in the experience of women. Christian feminists, both male and female, continue to develop a liberation theology from the perspective of the experience of women. Social, political, and economic equality, while important, is not their primary concern. Feminist theologians put the Christian message and feminist thought in conversation, mutually critiquing one another. They investigate to what extent theology may have contributed to the oppression of women even as they acknowledge the contributions theology has made to women.

Feminist theology holds that all theology is culturally and historically conditioned, that traditional theology is rooted in an androcentric and patriarchal culture, and that the prejudices and biases of that culture have served to oppress women and dehumanize men. Therefore, feminist theologians consciously and deliberately write from the perspective of women's experience. Like other liberation theologies, feminist theology insists that theology is not a purely academic and intellectual pursuit. It demands praxis—action and reflection together. Theology, then, is understood not just as faith seeking understanding but faith seeking understanding and the transformation of life. This transformation includes both personal and systemic conversion.

Feminist Theologies: Feminist theology is a multifaceted rather than a one-dimensional endeavor. Its various manifestations are affected by liberal, radical, romantic, and socialist thought as well as by the gospel. Feminist theologians have been broadly described as reformist, revolutionary, and separatist.

Reformist theologians bring a feminist paradigm to bear on the symbol systems, language, myths, rituals, and traditions that have been used to support an androcentric view of humanity and a patriarchal view of the Church. They critique Scripture and tradition for elements that have oppressed women, search for women whose contributions may have been ignored, and interpret foundational doctrines from the perspective of women's experience. In their work, they are not attempting to destroy or replace the rich tradition but to enrich the enterprise by bringing the talents, experiences, scholarship, and reflections of women to bear on it. Reformist theologians have a strong commitment to the sacramental, incarnational, and communal aspects of Catholicism.

Revolutionary or reconstructive feminists perceive the Christian tradition itself to be irredeemably patriarchal. They call for a total redefinition of Christian symbols and traditions. Among their priorities are the creation of egalitarian and nonhierarchical communities.

Separatist theologians define salvation for women as freedom from the misogynous chains of Christianity. They, therefore, withdraw from institutions that are male-centered and create supportive communities of women. While defined as post-Christian, their work has a profound effect on mainstream Christian feminism.

Recent feminist theology, like socialist feminism, addresses the connection between sexism, racism, and classism. It also focuses on the attendant breakdown of relationships among persons and between persons and God. African-American and Third World feminists argue that white feminists may be guilty of another form of cultural imperialism in defining their experience as "women's experience." A process of self-critique on the part of European and North American feminist theologians has resulted.

Feminists have also begun to focus on the destruction of the earth's resources, pollution, militarism, and poverty. What is emerging from this new focus is an ecofeminist theology. See also feminist interpretation of Scripture; women in the Church.

Bibliography

Carmody, Denise Lardner. Responses to 101 Questions About Feminism. New York: Paulist Press, 1993.

Coll, Regina. Christianity and Feminism in Conversation. Mystic, CT: Twenty-Third Publications, 1994.

Loades, Ann, ed. Feminist Theology: A Reader. Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox Press, 1990.

Ruether, Rosemary Radford. Sexism and God-Talk: Toward a Feminist Theology. Boston: Beacon Press, 1983, 1993. REGINA COLL

feminist interpretation of Scripture, a way of reading Scripture based on feminist theology. There is no one single feminist way to read Scripture; rather there is a range of approaches generally based on the assumption that the biblical texts and the cultures that produced them and have continued to interpret them through the centuries are androcentric (male-centered) and patriarchal (paternalistic). The four principal forms of feminist interpretation might be characterized as: revisionist, deconstructionist, symbolic, and liberation.

Forms of Interpretation: Revisionist feminist interpretation seeks to retell the biblical stories with better use of historical methods to highlight the roles and contributions of women that have been obscured by androcentric interpretation. For example, the story of Martha and Mary with Jesus (Luke 10:38–42) portrays Mary not as contemplative, a traditional and safe characterization, but as a disciple who learns Jesus' teaching in the same way the male disciples did.

Deconstructionist interpretation aims to expose more directly the androcentric and patriarchal bias behind the texts themselves and their ongoing interpretation. For example, the stories of the sacrificed daughter of Jephthah and the gang-raped and murdered concubine (Judg 11:30–40; 19:1–30) reflect not only situations of violence and abuse, but a world in which women are expendable to save male honor. Abraham's hand was stayed from sacrificing his only son (Gen 22), while Jephthah was not so divinely prevented from sacrificing his only daughter.

Symbolic feminist interpretation develops the positive significance of female figures, for example, Eve as mother of all the living (Gen 3:20); daughter Zion (Isa 52:2); the woman clothed with the sun (Rev 12:1–6); and the Church and the new Jerusalem as bride (Eph 5:25–27; Rev 21:2).

Liberation feminist interpretation emphasizes the biblical call for everyone to work for the liberation of the poor and oppressed, not only in heaven, but for the establishment of the reign of God in history as well. It calls attention to the strong female figures of Scripture who were empowered by God and who empowered others, for example, Deborah (Judg 4–5), Judith, and Esther as saviors of the people and the Samaritan woman and Mary Magdalene as apostles (John 4:39–42; 20:17–18). It brands oppressive texts (e.g., 1 Tim 2:11–16) as nonrevelatory, not only in the abusive ways that they have been used throughout history to exploit and control women, but in the intentions of the biblical authors themselves.

No biblical interpreters who incorporate feminist insights use only one of the above approaches, but a combination of them, depending on each one's basic assumptions. Modern interpretive theory has made us aware that there is no such thing as a completely "objective" interpretation, for every interpreter comes with given assumptions based on his or her worldview, more or less explicit. Feminist interpretation aims to expose the biases that have lessened the full equality of women. Many of the most prominent feminist biblical interpreters, female or male, are Roman Catholics, and the Church's continuing stance on justice and the elimination of discrimination compel ongoing reassessment of biblical interpretation in this regard. See also feminism; hermeneutics; Scripture; interpretation of. CAROLYN OSIEK

Fénelon, François, 1651–1715, French archbishop and spiritual writer. Ordained a Sulpician in 1675, he was appointed tutor to the prince in the royal court in 1689. During this time, Fénelon wrote the fictional Telemachus. Intended as an aid to educating the prince, the book contained a veiled satire of the absolutism characteristic of the reigning king, Louis XIV. Fénelon was named archbishop of Cambrai in 1695. About this time he became engaged in a famous controversy with Jacques Bossuet. After the writings of Jeanne-Marie Guyon were condemned for their Quietist tendencies, Fénelon wrote his Maxims of the Saints. The book revealed his continued support for much of Guyon's spiritual teaching. In response, Bossuet, one of the judges in Guyon's case, sought the condemnation of the Maxims. In 1699, Innocent XII condemned the Maxims as dangerous but refused to categorize the book as heretical. See also Quietism.

Fenwick, Benedict Joseph, 1782–1846, U.S. bishop. An American Jesuit, he administered the diocese of New York (1815–17) and for one year served as president of Georgetown College (1818). In 1819 he went to the diocese of Charleston, South Carolina, as Bishop John England's vicar-general, and then returned to Georgetown as president and procurator general of the Jesuits (1811–25). In 1825 he was appointed the second bishop of Boston, founded a newspaper, the Jesuit (1829), dispelled tensions after the burning of the Charlestown Convent (1834), and established Holy Cross College in Worcester, Massachusetts (1843). Fenwick's leadership transformed the Boston diocese into a powerful influence in the U.S. church. See also Georgetown University.

Feodorov, Leonid, 1879–1934, first exarch of the Russian Catholic Church. Of partially Greek origin and of an Orthodox family, he became a Catholic through study of the early church Fathers and Vladimir Solov'ev. He entered the Studite order in Bosnia and was chosen as exarch of the Russian Catholics by Metropolitan Sheptyckyj of Galicia. In spite of innumerable obstacles put in his way by the Bolshevik Revolution, Feodorov was able to organize the Russian Catholics and open a short-lived chapel at St. Petersburg. For his time, Feodorov was ecumenical in his approach, enjoyed rather good relations with several Orthodox clergymen, and stood staunchly for liturgical purity. After serving a long sentence in prison and the concentration camps, Feodorov died in exile, a victim of the general persecution.

Ferdinand II, 1578–1637, Holy Roman emperor from 1619 to 1637. Influenced by the Jesuits and the example of the Bavarian dukes, Ferdinand devoted his reign to forcibly recatholicizing his lands. Although he was most successful in Austria, Protestant resistance ignited the Thirty Years' War (1618–48).

Ferdinand III, St., 1199–1252, king of Castile and Leon, founder of the University of Salamanca, and patron saint of engineers. A warrior-king, he drove the Muslims (Moors) from portions of present-day Spain. Feast day: May 30.

Ferdinand of Aragon, 1452–1516, king of Aragon from 1479 and, with his wife Isabella of Castile, sponsor of the Spanish Inquisition (1478) and of Columbus's discovery of America. Forcibly reforming the Church by placing it under royal control, he and his wife united most of the Iberian Peninsula into Catholic Spain and conquered the last Spanish Muslim state (Granada, 1492). See also Inquisition; Spain, Catholicism in.

ferendae sententiae (fair-en'day sen-ten'tsee-ay; Lat., "imposed sentence"), a penalty that has been imposed by order of a tribunal or by the action of another competent authority. Canon law lays down certain necessary procedures for such imposition. This type of penalty is contrasted to an automatic penalty (latae sententiae), which occurs without any direct involvement of authority when a given action has been performed under specified circumstances. See also latae sententiae; penal law.

feria (Lat., "holiday"), weekday. The classical Latin term referred to a holiday or feast day; the ecclesiastical term refers to days on which no feast falls. Days of the week were designated numerically; feria prima, Latin for "first day" of the week, Sunday, which was also called dies dominica, Latin for "the Lord's day" (Rev 1:7).

fermentum (Lat., "leaven"), in fifth-century Rome, the fragment of eucharistic bread consecrated at the pope's Sunday Mass and sent to parish priests who were celebrating with their people in the suburbs and could not attend the papal liturgy. The fragment signified the unity of all the faithful in Christ. See also Communion, Holy.

Ferrer, St. Vincent. See Vincent Ferrer, St.

Ferrini, Bl. Contardo, 1859–1902, legal scholar, patron saint of universities. Italian-born expert in Roman law and author of some two hundred monographs, he combined a commitment to the intellectual life with a deep spirituality.

fetal research, experimental procedures on human fetuses, often including procedures with fetal tissue taken from fetal cadavers, especially for transplant purposes. Recent Vatican documents judge that even the earliest human embryos are, or at least must be considered as if they are, human persons. Thus experimental procedures on living fetuses within the womb (Lat., in vivo) are judged morally right only if they offer hope of benefit for the individual fetus. Informed consent must be given by the mother and the potential benefit to the fetus must be proportional to the risk to woman and fetus.

Theoretically, nontherapeutic procedures, which offer no potential benefit to the individual fetus, might also be permitted if the risk to the fetus is minimal and the potential benefit to future fetuses substantial. This is similar to experiments performed on children, whose membership in society entails certain obligations to others. Proxy consent by the parents is said to suffice. But this position is rejected by those who argue that proxy consent is always invalid for nontherapeutic research. And almost all nontherapeutic fetal research now conducted or proposed implicitly or explicitly denies the personhood of the fetus and thus discounts fetal risk, anticipating death as a result of the research or of elective abortion. This is not acceptable to those who consider the fetus a human person.

The Instruction on Respect for Human Life, published by the Vatican in 1987, rejects all in vitro (Lat.) fertilization, where the sperm and egg are mixed outside the woman's body. But many Catholic moral theologians accept it in some cases of infertility when the husband's sperm and the wife's egg are used. Those who maintain this position allow experimental procedures in vitro with the same criteria that apply in vivo.

Fetal Tissue Research: Fetal tissue research, including transplantation research, is different since the fetus has died before the tissue is taken. Here it seems proper for the same principles to apply as apply to any cadaver transplant. Some allow cadaver transplantation from fetuses spontaneously aborted (miscarriages) or indirectly aborted as in ectopic pregnancies, but reject transplantation from directly aborted fetuses, arguing that this practice cooperates in immoral abortions and that it lends support to abortion or to laws permitting it. This effectively eliminates fetal tissue transplantation altogether since tissue from miscarried or ectopic fetuses is rarely fit for transplant. Other Catholic moralists accept these procedures under the usual criteria for cadaver transplantation. They deny the implication of proximate cooperation with abortion and insist that there is little or no reason to anticipate that abortions will be chosen specifically to provide tissue as long as legal safeguards separate the abortion and donation decisions.

Recent theological argument, returning to earlier Catholic tradition, has questioned the judgment that all fetuses are human persons. Some Catholic scholars maintain that the very early embryo, or "pre-embryo," cannot be a person. Strong theological, philosophical, and biological arguments support this position. Many who hold it, however, continue to reject risky nontherapeutic research, arguing that even the pre-embryo, which cannot be a person, must not be made the object of research that does not respect its intrinsic claim to life. See also abortion; bioethics; in vitro fertilization; medical ethics.

DAVID F. KELLY

fetishism, undue and exaggerated devotion to, or belief in, an object, practice, or idea. The term embraces several overlapping definitions and may now be so vague as to be useless in moral theology. Historically, fetishism described the belief that supernatural power resided in objects such as magic charms or carved figures. Fetishism is also used by twentieth-century psychologists to describe pathological erotic fascination with particular objects or rituals. Fetishism is morally significant because each of its definitions describes a disordered attachment to created goods rather than to their Creator. As such, it violates the principles of Catholic morality.

feudalism (Lat., feudum, "land"), a social form of interlocking relationships based on the use of land in payment for military services. Flourishing in ninth-century France after the collapse of Charlemagne's empire, it endured, with its conventions of homage and tenure, through most of the medieval period and into early modern times. In the early medieval economy land was the only real means of payment for necessary military service. But rather than alienate land permanently, lords gave up its use to vassals in exchange for specified military assistance, an arrangement that was sealed with promises of mutual loyalty (homage). The medieval Church, also needing military protection, entered into feudal relationships, interweaving the religious with the secular. This association and its attendant compromises, including the right of secular leaders to appoint bishops, were of central concern to the Gregorian reformers. See also Gregorian reform.

Feuerbach, Ludwig Andreas (foy'uhr bahk), 1804–72, German philosopher. He studied theology at Heidelberg and was then drawn to Berlin by Hegel's reputation. Leaving Berlin in 1826 because of insufficient financial support, he completed his doctorate in philosophy at Erlangen in 1828. Until 1835 he lectured on modern philosophy at Erlangen. But all hopes of a permanent academic position faded after he published in 1830 Thoughts on Death and Immortality, in which he criticized fundamental Christian tenets and denounced the conservative alliance between the churches and the reactionary regimes of the day. His marriage to a woman of wealth in 1835 allowed him to continue his scholarly and literary work without an academic appointment. His most famous book, The Essence of Christianity, appeared in 1841 and was followed by Preliminary Theses for the Reform of Philosophy (1842), Foundations for the Philosophy of the Future (1846), and Lectures on the Essence of Religion (1851). During these years he became the leader of the "left-wing" Hegelians and greatly influenced Karl Marx's critique of religion.

Feuerbach turned religion in general and Christianity in particular into anthropology. Religion, he taught, is the projection of qualities inherent in the human species outward into "God." Statements about God are really statements about humanity. Religion has served a useful purpose in humanity's development and culminated in Christianity which, with its doctrine of the God-man, is the fullest religious statement of the disguised anthropological truth. But now that humanity has attained its maturity in modernity, religion has been outgrown and must be discarded. Thus, he sought "to turn the lovers of God into the lovers of humanity." Feuerbach is a major figure in the development of modern atheism and was a prime source for the "death of God" theology of the mid-twentieth century. Modern Catholic apologetics has had to take the Feuerbachian anthropological critique with great seriousness. See also apologetics; faith and reason; philosophy and theology.

MICHAEL J. HIMES

Fiacre, St. (fee-ah'kruh), also known as Fiachra, d. ca. 670, patron saint of gardeners and the cabdrivers of Paris, whose vehicles are called "fiacres" because the first cab for hire in Paris was located near the Hotel Saint-Fiacre. An Irish hermit, Fiacre moved to France to live a solitary life there on land given to him by St. Faro, bishop of Meaux. Fiacre built a hospice for travelers and established a reputation for charity and spiritual wisdom. Feast day: September 1.

Fichter, Joseph H., 1908–94, sociologist. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1930, was ordained in 1942, received his doctorate in sociology from Harvard University, and served on the faculty of Loyola University in New Orleans for almost his entire academic career, beginning in 1947. From 1965 to 1970 he held the Charles Chauncey Stillman professorship of Roman Catholic Theological Studies at Harvard Divinity School. A past president of the Society for the Scientific Study of Religion, he was the author of more than thirty books and reports, including his classic, Southern Parish (1951).

Ficino, Marsiglio (mahr-seel'yoh fee-chee'noh,), 1433–99, Italian humanist, theologian, and leader of the influential Florentine Platonic academy. Rejecting Scholasticism, he became a champion of Christian Platonism through his study of Augustine, insisting that philosophy and religion are parallel means to truth based on contemplation of God, the final end of human nature. In Theologica Platonica (1469–74) and De Christiana Religione (1474), Ficino conceived the universe Neoplatonically, as a hierarchical structure flowing from God, with humankind providing the crucial link between spirit and matter. Among those influenced by Ficino were the Italian scholar Pico della Mirandola (d. 1694), the dean of St. Paul's in London John Colet (d. 1519), and the French humanist Jacobus Faber (d. 1536). See also Neoplatonism.

fideism (fee' day-iz-uhm), the view that religious knowledge is an act of faith (Lat., fides) alone and not at all an act of the human intellect (ratio). In general, fideism refers to any view that rejects reason as the basis for truth and insists that such grounds are found only in acquiescence to some other authority, be it that of instinct (Charles S. Pierce) or feeling (Friedrich Schleiermacher) or an empirical sensibility (William James) or practical reason (Immanuel Kant).

A narrower understanding of fideism restricts human knowledge of God to divine revelation. This is the position of the fourteenth-century William of Ockham, whose influence is seen in the sixteenth-century Martin Luther. In the nineteenth century, Catholic traditionalists commonly responded to the rationalism of the day by insisting that a spark or germ of faith was necessary for an intellectual grasp of speculative truth.

Vatican I's Dogmatic Constitution on the Catholic Faith (Dei Filius) opposed both fideism (and its Catholic variant, traditionalism) and rationalism. Unaided natural reason, the document states, is sufficient for knowledge of the existence of God. Faith in itself is possible only by grace and results in a different kind of knowledge, supernatural knowledge. For believers, both natural reason and supernatural knowledge are operative in the human response to divine revelation. Vatican I, therefore, steers a middle ground. The act of faith is both reasonable and marked by a supernatural character. In other words, it retains the integrity of the human intellect while remaining subject to the freedom and gratuity characteristic of divine revelation. See also faith; faith and reason; revelation. NANCY DALLAVALLE fidelity, oath of. See oath of fidelity.

Fidelis of Sigmaringen, St. (fee-day'lis uhv sig-mahr-eeng'en), 1577–1622, priest and martyr. After a legal career, he joined the Capuchin order. He was murdered while on a mission in Calvinist Switzerland. Feast day: April 24.

fidelity of God, God's commitment to the divine promises. In the OT, God remains faithful to the chosen people even when Israel strays from the covenantal relationship (e.g., Exod 34:6–7; Deut 7:9–11). The NT reaffirms God's covenant of salvific love with Israel and through Jesus, and institutes a new relationship with all humanity (e.g., Gal 4:24–31; 2 Tim 2:12–13; Eph 2:11–22). This new partnership fully acknowledges the dignity of the promises made to Israel while broadening its scope to include the entire human community (Heb 7–10).

The course of human lives, however, sometimes appears arbitrary and chaotic. Attempts to impose meaning or coherence onto one's life through personal plans and actions are sometimes dashed by factors outside one's control. God's fidelity, however, provides humanity with the certain assurance that God loved humankind first, and thus life itself has an ultimate goal. Although the meaning of God's pledge may only become apparent through the course of history, God's promise of faithfulness provides the assurance that human redemption stands as an irrevocable offer.

fides fiducialis (fee'dez fee-doo-chee-ah'lis; Lat., "trusting faith"), an understanding of faith, associated especially with Martin Luther, that stresses the operation of the will (trust) over the intellect. The Council of Trent (1545–63) taught that sins are not forgiven to anyone who boasts of confidence and certainty of the forgiveness of sins and rests on that alone (ch. 9). It also condemned the proposition that justifying faith is nothing other than "confidence in the divine mercy which remits sins for Christ's sake, or that it is this confidence alone by which we are justified" (can. 12). Sacramental grace is "conferred from the work which has been worked" rather than by faith alone in the divine promise (can. 9 on The Sacraments in General.) See also faith; Luther, Martin.

fides quarens intellectum (fee'days kwair'renz in-tel-lek'toom; Lat., "faith seeking understanding"), the classic definition of theology provided by Anselm of Canterbury (d. 1109). Theology begins from the standpoint of faith and, by unique methods and use of sources, attempts to understand the God who is the object of theological understanding. See also theology.

Filioque (fee-lee-oh'kway; Lat., "and the Son"), Latin term added to the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed (381) after the phrase "the Holy Spirit who proceeds from the Father." Both its theological meaning and the way in which it was added to the creed have been and continue to be sources of controversy between Eastern and Western Christians.

Early History: The doctrine of the double procession of the Holy Spirit, that is, the idea that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son (Lat., a patre filioque), was a subject of disagreement between Christian theologians as early as the fourth century and of division by the ninth century. In the fourth century, Theodoret of Cyrus (d. ca. 460) accused Cyril of Alexandria (d. 444) of teaching erroneously that the Son has a role in the origin of the Holy Spirit. It is unlikely that Cyril intended to teach such a doctrine. The differences between Theodoret and Cyril do, however, demonstrate the differences between two approaches to theology: the school of Antioch whose theologians leaned toward literal interpretation of Scripture and emphasized the distinction of divine persons, and the Alexandrian school that favored analogical interpretation of Scripture and emphasized the oneness of the divine essence. From within these two approaches would develop the two sides of the Filioque controversy.

The first clear statement of the doctrine of the Filioque is found in the On the Trinity of Augustine of Hippo (d. 430), who stated that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son, though principally from the Father. Although it was not a major tenet of his theology, the Filioque fit naturally within Augustine's approach to the doctrine of the Trinity, in which the Holy Spirit is pictured as the bond of love between the Father and the Son.

During the same century, three Eastern Fathers of the Church, Basil of Caesarea (d. 379), Gregory of Nazianzus (d. 390), and Gregory of Nyssa (d. 395), often called "the Cappadocian Fathers," developed their teaching on the Trinity along the lines of the Antiochene tradition mentioned above. They stressed the real distinction of the divine Persons and defined the distinguishing characteristic of the Father as Unoriginate Origin. They also emphasized the distinction between the incomprehensible divine essence and the divine energies through which we know God. Within their system, Filioquist thought is radically out of place because it obscures what is unique to the person of the Father. Furthermore, biblical references to Christ's sending of the Spirit show the relationship between the missions of the Son and the Spirit, but do not explain the essential relationship of the Son and Spirit to each other within the inner life of God.

The East-West Conflict: The term "Filioque controversy" is sometimes applied specifically to the argument among Eastern and Western theologians of the ninth century. In 810, theologians of Charlemagne's court, where the creed including the Filioque was already in use, petitioned Pope Leo III (d. 816) for official approval of their practice. Leo refused, although he declared his theological agreement with the Filioque. The Carolingian theologians composed an extensive defense of the Filioque, now called the Libri Carolini. In the East, the patriarch Photius (d. ca. 893) responded to the practice of certain Frankish monks in Jerusalem who attempted to impose the Western practice on their Eastern brothers. Photius's Mystagogy of the Holy Spirit introduced the formula that became the Eastern motif during the controversy and was eventually defined as dogmatic for Orthodox Christians: the Holy Spirit proceeds "from the Father alone." According to Photius, the Filioque is not only an illegitimate addition to the creed but a grave theological error.

The dispute was heated and complicated by political events including the deposition and reinstatement of Photius as patriarch. The issue of the Filioque remained alive. It was listed among the complaints against Rome by Michael Cerularius and his followers when the relationship between Western and some Eastern Christians was officially broken in the eleventh century (1054).

At a council in Lyons in 1274 and again at Florence in 1439, Western Christians sought to impose acceptance of the Filioque, though not its recitation, on Eastern Christians. Popular Eastern response to the proclamations of those councils demonstrates the growing importance of the underlying issues of trinitarian theology, as well as the ecclesiological issue regarding the authority to change the creed. At a council in Constantinople in 1351, the distinction between divine essence and divine energies, which had begun with the Cappadocians and developed especially in the writings of the Byzantine theologian Gregory Palamas (d. 1359), was defined as dogmatic. On the basis of that distinction, as well as the conviction that it is the Father's personal property to be the source of divine life, Eastern theologians continue to insist that the Filioque is irreconcilable with Orthodox trinitarian faith.

The Filioque and the Creed: The Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed, because of its antiquity, is almost universally recognized among Christian denominations as a true expression of Christian faith. That creed states simply belief in "the Holy Spirit who proceeds from the Father, who together with the Father and Son is worshiped and glorified." The first official proclamation of a creed with the addition of the Filioque is found in the documents of the Third Council of Toledo (589), which strongly affirmed the divinity of the Son against a growing Arian heresy in the West. Eastern monks, on hearing the altered creed, accused Westerners of defying the orders of the Council of Ephesus (431) that no addition should be made to the creed approved at Constantinople (381). Western response indicated that the phrase was considered a clarification of the faith already expressed in the creed and not a true addition.

Pope Leo III's rejection in 810 of the amended creed as an official element of the liturgy also stood in the West until the eleventh century (1014), when Pope Benedict VIII (d. 1024) gave his approval. Even the Council of Lyons (1274), which required Eastern churches wishing to be reunited with Rome to accept the Filioque as a legitimate expression of the faith, did not require those Christians to change the recitation of the creed in their liturgy.

The Filioque is currently a matter of concern among theologians interested in ecumenical discussion, especially those connected with the work of the World Council of Churches. The vast majority of Western theologians propose that the Filioque be dropped from the creed when it is recited in the liturgy for two reasons: the process by which it was added was questionable at best, and it remains a barrier to the profession of a common Christian faith. Pope Paul VI (d. 1978), meeting with Orthodox Catholics, not only recited the creed in its earlier form but referred to the meeting at Lyons as a "Western synod" rather than as an ecumenical council. Further discussion centers on the likeness and differences between Eastern and Western trinitarian theology, and the ecclesiological implications of the two approaches. See also Eastern Schism; Holy Spirit; Nicene Creed; Trinity, doctrine of the.

Bibliography

Congar, Yves. I Believe in the Holy Spirit. 3 vols. New York: Seabury Press, 1983.

Kelly, J. N. D. Early Christian Creeds. 3d ed. New York: Longman, 1972.

LaCugna, Catherine Mowry. God for Us: The Trinity and Christian Life. San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1991. CORINNE WINTER

Filippini, St. Lucy, 1672–1732, founder of the Pontifical Institute of Religious Teachers, popularly called the Filippini Sisters, in Italy in 1704. The purpose of the congregation was for the education of young poor girls. The Filippini Sisters came to the United States in 1910. She was canonized in 1930. Feast day: March 25.

final perseverance. See perseverance, final.

finance council, group mandated by canon law to give advice and, under specified conditions, required consent to administrators of Church property. Every ecclesiastical juridical person (e.g., diocese, parish, religious community) is obliged to have a finance council.

Finbar, St., seventh-century Irish hermit and bishop (and patron saint) of Cork. Feast day: September 25.

finding of the cross. See invention of the cross.

Fiorenza, Elisabeth Schüssler, b. 1938, biblical scholar and Krister Stendahl Professor at Harvard Divinity School. Known for her work in feminist biblical interpretation, especially her 1983 study In Memory of Her: A Feminist Theological Reconstruction of Early Christian Origins, she is founding coeditor (with Judith Plaskow) of the Journal of Feminist Studies in Religion and active in the women church movement. See also feminist interpretation of Scripture.

First Fridays, a nonobligatory, devotional custom of receiving the Eucharist on the first Friday of nine consecutive months. The custom originated in a promise that Christ is alleged to have made to Margaret Mary Alacoque (1647–90), a nun of the Visitation order. She claimed that over a period of eighteen months, beginning in December 1673, Christ revealed to her a new devotion centered on his Sacred Heart, afire with love for humanity. Practitioners of the devotion were expected to receive Communion on the first Friday of each month, to spend a holy hour in the presence of the Blessed Sacrament each Thursday, and to celebrate, annually, the Feast of the Sacred Heart (authorized in 1765 by Pope Clement XIII). According to Margaret Mary, those keeping the First Fridays will not die in sin or without the sacraments, and Christ will be their refuge at the moment of death. See also Alacoque, St. Margaret Mary.

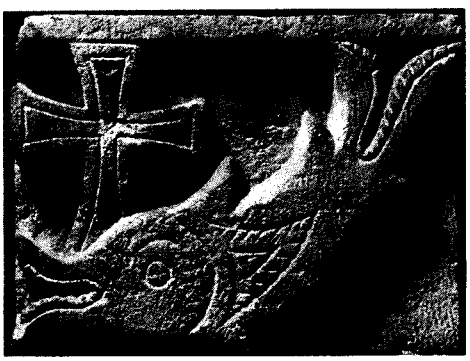
First Saturdays, a set of devotional customs in honor of the Immaculate Heart of Mary performed on the first Saturday of five consecutive months. These devotions (which no Catholic is obliged to practice) consist of participating in the sacrament of Penance ("confession"), receiving Communion, and reciting five decades of the rosary while meditating on its mysteries for fifteen minutes. In some parishes, a special votive Mass in honor of Mary is celebrated on first Saturdays. This devotion appears to have originated in the alleged Marian apparitions at Fátima, Portugal, in 1917. The link between Saturday and devotion to Mary, however, is far more ancient; it surfaced in the West as early as the eighth century. Eventually, it assumed liturgical form in the recitation of the "Office of the Blessed Virgin Mary" on Saturday, a practice supposedly introduced by Pope Urban II at the Council of Clermont in 1096. See also Immaculate Heart of Mary.

fish, ancient Christian symbol. Found among catacomb graffiti as well as wall frescos and sarcophagus sculpture, stylized drawings of a fish were common symbols of Christ. Such stylized drawings are still found today among Christians as medallions and automobile bumper stickers.

The first letters of the Greek phrase "Jesus Christ, Son of God, Savior" spell out the Greek word for fish (ichtys). There is no scholarly consensus as to whether this acrostic led to the iconographic symbol or vice versa.

The fish, an early Christian symbol for Christ.



Fisher, St. John, 1469–1535, chancellor of Cambridge University, bishop of Rochester (from 1504), and cardinal (1535). Seeking to reinvigorate Scholasticism with humanist criticism, he became renowned both for his preaching and for his educational reforms. From 1519 to 1527, Fisher wrote polemical defenses of Church tradition against Martin Luther, John Oecolampadius, and others, making a decisive contribution to Counter-Reformation theology. After 1527, Fisher led the ecclesiastical opposition to Henry VIII's divorce and claims to supremacy over the Church. Arrested in 1534 and executed for treason on June 22, 1535, he was canonized in 1935. Feast day: June 22. See also England, Catholicism in; English Martyrs; Forty Martyrs of England and Wales.

fistula (fis'tch*oo*-lah; Lat., "pipe"), a silver straw used to sip Communion wine from the chalice. Communicants sip a small amount of wine through the fistula. They then drink a sip of water from another chalice to purify it. This was the most common method for Communion from the chalice in Rome from the late classical period until the early Middle Ages. Though permitted, the fistula is not commonly used in the United States today. See also chalice; Communion, Holy.

Fitzmyer, Joseph A., b. 1920, internationally renowned NT and Aramaic scholar. Ordained a Jesuit priest (1951), he received a Ph.D. from the Johns Hopkins University (1956), the S.S.L. from Pontifical Biblical Institute (1957), honorary doctorates from various U.S. universities and from Lunds Universitet (Sweden) and the University of St. Andrews (Scotland). He taught at Woodstock College, Maryland (1958–69), the University of Chicago (1969–71), Fordham University (1971–74), Weston School of Theology, Cambridge, Massachusetts (1974–76) and The Catholic University of America (1976–86). He was president of the Catholic Biblical Association five ways of St. Thomas Aquinas, five proofs for the existence of God found in the Summa Theologiae of Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274). Thomas's second question of the Summa Theologiae asks, "Does God exist?" After dispensing with claims that God's existence is self-evident, he goes on to show that human ways of explaining the universe cannot be made complete on their own terms. Human reason itself leaves a space for the God whom Jews, Christians, and Muslims believe freely created the world. The source for the faith of Jews and of Christians is not human reason alone, but the Scriptures. Yet the God whom those Scriptures reveal is not foreign to human beings who use reason to explain how it is that things are as they are. God's role as Creator cannot be offered as a scientific explanation because science cannot totally explain the world as it is; there must be room for an account such as that given by the Bible.

(1969–70), the Society of Biblical Literature (1979–80), and Studiorum Novi Testamenti Societas (1992–93), and a member of the Pontifical Biblical Commission since 1984. Author of more than thirty books, most notably The Gospel According to Luke (Anchor Bible, vols. 28, 28a), he is editor, with R. E. Brown and R. E. Murphy, of The Jerome Biblical Commentary (1968) and The New Jerome Biblical Commentary (1990).

Drawing from Aristotle, Aquinas's "five ways" are based on explanatory schemes considered sufficient in his time for accounts of what happens in the world, specifically, (1) what makes things change, (2) how causality works, (3) what is always the way it is or what happens contingently, (4) degrees of excellence in things, and (5) the goal of natural things. He shows how each of these schemes cannot suffice when speaking of the universe itself, where one must move to another level. That very opening in human discourse, then, offers him a way of connecting the rest of his monumental theological treatise to the widest range of human intellectual concerns. And that is precisely how these "five ways" should be considered. They connect theology with the human enterprise of explaining without claiming that theology is that sort of an explanation.

Finally, these arguments of Aquinas ought not be considered to be "proofs" (in any acceptable modern sense of that word) of God's existence. Their role is essentially as an introduction to a theological inquiry grounded in faith. What the "five ways" do show is that the inquiry into God's existence connects with wider human inquiries, without being itself a part of them. The premises for Thomas's arguments come from revelation, yet that revelation addresses the concerns of both intellect and heart. Aquinas's "five ways" show that human inquiry leaves space for a transcendent God. See also God.

DAVID B. BURRELL

flagellants, organized groups in the Middle Ages who scourged themselves in public processions in penance for their sins and those of the whole world. First organized in Italy in 1260 and revived in the fourteenth century after the Black Death, they were condemned by the popes for their excesses.

flagellation, scourging of oneself or another. The practice of scourging as a punishment was known in the ancient world. In early and medieval Christianity clerics, monks, and laity were punished by scourging for some crimes. Voluntary flagellation became common in the Middle Ages as expiation for one's sins or those of others. An incentive was the scourging of Christ. Flagellation of oneself or taking the discipline became customary in religious communities but has largely been abandoned since Vatican II (1962–65). The Church has frowned on the public processions of flagellation, a few of which have lasted to modern times.

Flaget, Benedict Joseph, 1763–1851, French-born bishop and missionary. A French Sulpician, he served as bishop of Bardstown, Kentucky (1810–51), a diocese extending from the Allegheny Mountains to the Mississippi River. An insightful bishop, he was often consulted in the selection of bishops for U.S. sees. He established schools, colleges, and a seminary, and welcomed the foundation of the Trappist (Cistercian) Monastery of Gethsemani, south of Bardstown.

Flavian, St., d. 449, the patriarch of Constantinople beginning in 446. An opponent of Monophysitism, he excommunicated Eutyches at the synod in Constantinople in 448. His decision was supported by Pope Leo I, but it was reversed at the Council of Ephesus in 449, the "Robber Synod," which also condemned and exiled Flavian. He was posthumously exonerated at the Council of Chalcedon (451). Feast day: February 18. See also Chalcedon, Council of.

Fleury, abbey at Saint-Benoît-sur-Loire, in central France. Fleury acquired the (alleged) relics of Benedict of Nursia in the seventh century and was noted for its learning and wealth throughout the Middle Ages. Reformed according to Cluniac and Maurist patterns, the abbey was suppressed in 1790 but revived in 1944. See also Cluny; Maurists.

flight from the world (Lat., fuga mundi), a Christian attitude of rejection toward earthly things. This theme in Christian spirituality has largely been rejected since Vatican II (1962–65) as being dualistic and unappreciative of the goodness and beauty of creation. However, an authentic understanding of this tradition sees flight from the world as a rejection of sin, e.g., in modern times a rejection of greed and consumerism. It is a flight to conversion and to God. Monks and nuns in the desert sought to live together in love so as to live separated from the sin of the world. See also asceticism; detachment; world, responsibility for.

Flood, the, a destruction of the inhabited world by water narrated in Gen 6–9. The story reflects traditions about a flood recorded in Mesopotamian literature. The best known example is the Epic of Gilgamesh, published in 1873 from tablets discovered in the library of the seventh-century B.C. Assyrian king Ashurbanipal. There the surviving hero, equivalent to Noah, is named Utnapishtim. In an earlier Sumerian version he is Ziusudra. Berossus, a Babylonian priest writing in Greek in the third century B.C., recorded the Mesopotamian stories in a form cited by the Chronicle of the fourth-century bishop Eusebius. The Mesopotamian traditions build local catastrophies into events of worldwide significance. The biblical story in turn typified the coming judgment (Matt 24:27–28; Luke 17:26–27; Heb 11:7; 1 Pet 3:20; 2 Pet 2:5).

Florence, Council of, a council held between 1438 and 1445 for the purpose of reuniting the Roman Catholic Church and the Greek church, which was seeking Western aid against the Turks. It was convened in Ferrara in 1438, moved to Florence in 1439 due to economic problems, and concluded in Rome after the Greek participants had signed the Decree of Union and departed. The theological issues discussed included the double procession of the Holy Spirit, the use of unleavened bread for the Eucharist, the doctrine of purgatory, and papal primacy.

The chief obstacle to agreement proved to be the Filioque (Lat., "and the Son") clause, an expression of the doctrine of the double procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father "and the Son," which the Roman church had added to the creed. The Greeks argued that the addition had been made in violation of the decision of the Council of Ephesus (431) that nothing should be added to the creed approved at the Council of Constantinople (381). Furthermore, the Filioque was not attested in Scripture and had been denied by important Greek Fathers of the Church. After protracted discussion, the Greek participants themselves became divided on the issue. Unionists among them urged the acceptance of the formula on the grounds that because it was found among some of the saints or Fathers of the early Church, it must be consistent with the faith expressed by the Greek Fathers. The Decree of Union, Laetentur Coeli, signed on July 5, 1439, included the acceptance by some of the Greeks of the Filioque as a legitimate expression of the universal faith. The patriarch Mark of Ephesus refused to sign the agreement. On his return to Constantinople, Mark garnered considerable popular support, and some of the bishops repented of having signed the decree.

In addition to the acceptance of the Filioque, the decree included decisions on the other major issues. Both the eucharistic rite that used leavened bread and the one that used unleavened bread were valid. Also, after death some souls are cleansed by undergoing punishment while others receive immediately either eternal reward or eternal punishment. Further, the pope is the successor of Peter, head and teacher of the whole Church. After him come the patriarchs in a specified order.

The conquest of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453 cut short whatever union was achieved between Rome and the Greek church. After Florence, decrees of union were issued with other Eastern churches on similar terms. Many of those were also short-lived. See also Azymites; Eastern Schism; Filioque; primacy, papal; purgatory. CORINNE WINTER

Florian, St., d. 304, martyr, patron saint of Poland. His conversion to Christianity while a Roman officer led to his execution by drowning. Feast day: May 4.

florilegia (floh-rih-lay'gee-ah; Lat., "flower collections"), collections of excerpts, whether sacred, secular, or both, especially important in antiquity and the Middle Ages, when books were costly. A sacred florilegium may include biblical, patristic, liturgical, or legal texts and serve purposes ranging from apologetics to inspiration.

Focolare (foh-kuh-lahr'ay; It., "fireplace"), modern religious movement within the Roman Catholic Church. Founded in 1943 by Chiara Lubich (who won the Templeton Prize in 1977) in Trent, Italy, and approved by Rome in 1962, Focolare has a number of different branches within a larger movement. There are celibate communities of men and women who observe the evangelical counsels (poverty, chastity, and obedience) but do secular work; married people who identify with the ideals of the movement; and a young people's movement and priestly fraternities who do the same. The general purpose is to change the world through the observance of gospel ideals. Annual meetings called Mariapolis ("City of Mary") are held to intesify the zeal of the movement, which is found in Europe, North and South America, and Africa. See also counsels, evangelical.

following Christ. See imitation of Christ.

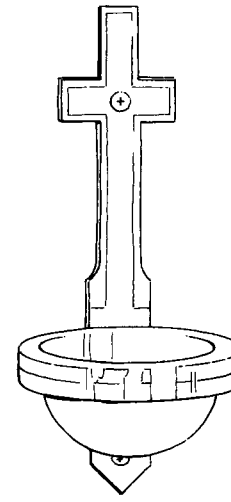
font, baptismal, the receptacle, containing water, in which baptisms are performed. Fonts vary in size from small holy water stoups (basins) to installations of sufficient size and shape for the immersion of adults. Fonts may be found in one of three locations in a church: at or near the door to the church; in a baptistery, which is a small room off to the side of the nave or in the vestibule; or in or near the sanctuary or pulpit. Fonts are sometimes octagonal in shape or may include a three-step entrance and exit from the basin. Thus, by their shape, size, or other visual features, they depict symbolic aspects of the sacrament, e.g., death and resurrection, water and new life. Among furnishings recognized as vital to the appointment of a church building, the baptismal font ranks as high as the altar in its importance. See also baptismal font; baptistery.

font, holy water, the vessel for holy water set near the entrances to churches and chapels. Sometimes called stoups, such water vessels may have derived from the fountains often found in the forecourts of Roman basilicas, in which worshippers could wash their face and hands before services. In modern times, holy water is collected on the fingers of the right hand and, with the sign of the cross, applied to one's self as a blessing and reminder of Baptism. See also holy water.

Holy water font



Fontevrault, Order of (fohn-tev-roh'), double order of nuns and monks ruled over by an abbess, derived from a community of Benedictine nuns founded by Robert d'Abrissel ca. 1101 and centered in the convent of Fontevrault, France. Suppressed in 1790, it was revived as a women's order without lasting success in the nineteenth century. See also double monasteries.

Fools, Feast of, mock religious festival celebrated in the Middle Ages, generally held on New Year's Day and noted for its burlesque and unseemly behavior. Opposed and later forbidden by the Church, remnants of it existed into the sixteenth century.

Ford, John, 1902–89, prominent American Jesuit moral theologian with teaching assignments at Weston School of Theology and The Catholic University of America. Author of many articles, including the famous "The Morality of Obliteration Bombing" (Theological Studies, 1944), he coauthored with Gerald Kelly Contemporary Moral Theology: Questions in Fundamental Moral Theology (1958), and Contemporary Moral Theology: Marriage Questions (1963). A member of the papal commission on birth control, he supported the traditional ban on all forms of contraception and vigorously opposed critics of Humanae Vitae.

forgiveness, the act of being restored to a good relationship with God, others, and self following a period or incident of sin or alienation. In the Christian tradition, forgiveness is the sinner's transforming acceptance of the unconditional mercy of God through Jesus Christ and the subsequent extending of that experience to other persons by accepting them. The practice of forgiveness is central to the Christian identity as described in the Lord's Prayer (Luke 11:1–4; Matt 6:9–15), and it is to be offered as often as it is requested (Matt 18: 21–35).

Historically, the Christian community has required of the individual sinner penance, almsgiving, and even separation from the community as means of conversion and reconciliation. Forgiveness is celebrated ecclesially in Baptism and Eucharist, as well as the sacrament of Reconciliation, in which there is to be confession of sin, contrition, and absolution by the Church's minister. Since Vatican II (1962–65), the celebration of the sacrament of Reconciliation has stressed the social dimensions and structures of sin and forgiveness. See also Reconciliation.

form criticism, the study of a text according to its generic, structural, and formal characteristics, and the attempt to locate its form in the oral stage of the lived experience of a people (the "setting in life"). OT material is divided into prose forms (e.g., myths, legends, sagas, historical narrative) and poetic forms (e.g., prophetic oracles, and in the Psalms, hymns, laments, thanksgivings, and wisdom psalms). The more frequent distinction in the NT (esp. in the Gospels) is between narrative and discourse material, the former involving legends (e.g., Mark 6:14–29) and miracle stories, while the latter include proverbs, parables, apocalyptic sayings, and apophthegms (Gk., "utter forth"), which consist of narratives used to illustrate sayings (e.g., Mark 2:15–17). Since it challenged the literal historicity of traditional material, form criticism was strongly resisted within Catholicism until Pope Pius XII's Divino Afflante Spiritu (1943), and was approved by the Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation (1965) of Vatican II (see n. 12). See also biblical criticism.

form of a sacrament. See sacrament, form of a.

form of marriage. See marriage, form of.

fornication, heterosexual intercourse between two unmarried persons. From the NT writings of Paul to the present, fornication has been understood to be a moral evil. This is because the only proper context for intercourse is marriage. Various reasons are given for this teaching. The Genesis vision of "two becoming one flesh" in marriage is one reason. Another, emerging in the Middle Ages, was concern for the well-being and education of a child that might result from such a union. See also chastity; Marriage; temperance.

Fortescue, Adrian, 1874–1923, priest and liturgist. He was a linguist and an expert in Eastern liturgies. His book The Mass: A Study of the Roman Liturgy (1907) was a pioneering work in English on the subject, though he is more widely known for his book Ceremonies of the Roman Rite Described (1918).

fortitude, a cardinal virtue that is equivalent to courage. Within the framework of traditional moral theology, fortitude is one of the four cardinal virtues necessary to living a completely moral life. It is traditionally associated with the other cardinal virtues of temperance, justice, and prudence. Fortitude is equivalent to courage, although within the Catholic moral tradition it has come to have a broader meaning than is usually given to courage. Fortitude may be defined as that quality of character through which its possessor is enabled to endure hardships and to overcome fears that would tend to deflect an individual from the pursuit of the aims of a humanly and Christian good life. Fortitude is expressed not only in the physical courage that is exhibited by soldiers on a battlefield, but also through the moral courage that enables a person to endure social disapproval for one's efforts to attain social justice, and through the patience that enables another to pursue a vocation as an artist in spite of obstacles. The vices contrary to fortitude would include a tendency to shrink from danger and tendency to take unnecessary or unjustified risks.

Within the Catholic tradition, fortitude, like all the other virtues, can only be understood within the context of the overall goods of human life, and the kinds of risks and hardships that a person can be expected to undergo in pursuit of those goods. As our understanding of the aims of life and the obligations that result from those aims has developed and changed, our understanding of what can be called fortitude has also developed and changed. See also cardinal virtues. JEAN PORTER fortune-telling, the prediction of the future or reading of one's personality by means of cards, tea leaves, palm-reading, crystal balls, and astrology.

Fortune-telling, or divination, is generally considered to be a sin against religion, specifically the First Commandment, because it involves a claim to know what only God can know and is a false form of prophecy. Many forms of fortune-telling, which describe events of the future as fixed and inescapable, are sinful because such predictions and their acceptance neglect human moral agency. In addition, many fortune-telling operations involve fraudulent practices. Nevertheless, the culpability of some adherents of fortune-telling may be reduced because of their ignorance or naiveté.

Forty Hours devotion, a form of prayer before the Blessed Sacrament as it is solemnly exposed during an uninterrupted period of forty hours. The practice is in continuity with late medieval eucharistic devotions connected with the Sacred Triduum. After the Holy Thursday evening procession with the Blessed Sacrament, the faithful took turns praying at the altar of reservation until midday of Holy Saturday, a period of forty hours. According to Augustine (On the Trinity 4.6), Jesus would have lain in his tomb precisely forty hours, and it is this symbolism that lies behind the origin of the devotion. At Milan, in 1527, the priest Antonio Bellotti imposed on members of his confraternity, founded in the Church of the Holy Sepulcher, the obligation of celebrating Forty Hours not only during the Sacred Triduum, but also in connection with the feasts of Pentecost, Assumption, and Christmas. The practice soon spread to other churches, often with a eucharistic procession from one church to another. Frequently celebrated during times of calamity and public need, the devotion took on an increasingly penitential character and, in the context of the revelry of carnival time, a spirit of reparation. The devotion quickly spread throughout Europe. Until modern times, the complex ceremonial followed was based on the Clementine Instruction published in 1731 by Pope Clement XII. Since Vatican II (1962–65), the aspect of penance and reparation is less in evidence, and the much simplified ceremonial is governed by the general norms for the prolonged exposition of the Blessed Sacrament. See also Blessed Sacrament; devotions; eucharistic devotions.

CHRYSOGONUS WADDELL

Forty Martyrs of England and Wales, English and Welsh Catholics who were put to death by the English state between 1535 and 1680 for refusing to take the Oath of Supremacy that acknowledged the English's sovereign's leadership of the Church of England, or simply for being priests or for sheltering priests. The forty are representative of a larger group of 357 martyrs whose causes of beatification and eventual canonization are still under consideration. The forty were canonized by Pope Paul VI in 1970. Thirteen were diocesan seminary professors, ten were Jesuits (including Edmund Campion and Robert Southwell), three were Benedictines, three were Carthusian monks, one was a Brigettine nun, two were Franciscans, one was an Austin Friar, and the remaining seven were laypersons—four men and three women (including Margaret Clitherow). The names of the forty martyrs (the dagger symbol indicates a separate entry under that name in this encyclopedia) are: John Almond, Edmund Arrowsmith†, Ambrose Barlow, John Boste, Alexander Briant†, Edmund Campion†, Margaret Clitherow†, Philip Evans†, Thomas Garnet, Edmund Gennings, Richard Gwyn, John Houghton, Philip Howard†, John Jones, John Kemble†, Luke Kirby†, Robert Lawrence, David Lewis, Anne Line, John Lloyd, Cuthbert Mayne†, Henry Morse†, Nicholas Owen, John Payne†, Polydore Plasden, John Plessington†, Richard Reynolds†, John Rigby†, John Roberts†, Alban Roe, Ralph Sherwin, Robert Southwell†, John Southworth†, John Stone†, John Wall, Henry Walpole†, Margaret Ward†, Augustine Webster, Swithun Wells†, Eustace White. Feast day: October 25. See also England, Catholicism in; English Martyrs; martyr; martyrdom.

forum, tribunal or judicial situs. The appropriate forum or tribunal in which to hold a canonical trial is one wherein an ecclesiastical judge may legally declare himself or herself competent by reason of subject matter and place as provided in canon law. Forums are also distinguished as extraordinary or ordinary, external or internal. See also external forum; internal forum; tribunal.

Foucauld, Charles de, 1858–1916, priest, hermit, and inspiration for the founding of the Little Brothers (and Sisters) of Jesus. He spent several years in the military and served in North Africa. As an adolescent, he abandoned the practice of his faith, but in 1886 he was drawn back to God. For a time, he was a Trappist. In 1901, his deepening conversion and devotion to the Blessed Sacrament led him to ordination, after which he returned to the Sahara and built a hermitage. He was unsuccessful in his efforts to convert Muslims to Christianity and he attracted no disciples to his hermitage. It was only after his death that de Foucauld's private papers inspired those who founded the Little Brothers of Jesus in 1933 and the Little Sisters of Jesus in 1936. See also Little Brothers of Jesus.

foundations, called pious foundations in canon law, resources established either as a juridical person or dependent upon another juridical person that are destined to fulfill the purposes of religion or charity. There are specific regulations concerning their establishment and administration. See also juridical person.

Four Crowned Martyrs, d. early fourth century, patrons saints of sculptors. They were either four Persian stonemasons (named Claudius, Nicostratus, Simpronian, and Castorius) executed by the Romans under Emperor Diocletian for not sacrificing to the gods, or four Roman soldiers also executed under Diocletian for the same reason. Venerable Bede records that an early seventh-century church in Canterbury was dedicated to them and contained their relics. Feast day: November 8.

Fourier, St. Peter, 1565–1640, French-born cofounder of the Augustinian Canonesses of Our Lady, an order devoted to the education of poor children. Feast day: December 9.

Fourteen Holy Helpers, a group of saints known for their response to prayers of petition, especially for recovery from diseases and for spiritual strength at the hour of death. Popular in the Rhineland from the fourteenth century, the devotion was strongly criticized by the reformers for its superstitious overtones and was eventually discouraged by the Council of Trent in the sixteenth century. The names of the fourteen saints are: Acacius, Barbara, Blaise, Catherine of Alexandria, Christopher, Cyricus, Denis, Erasmus, Eustace, George, Giles, Margaret of Antioch, Pantaleon, and Vitus.

Fox, Matthew, b. 1940, spiritual writer. Since the publication of his book On Becoming a Musical, Mystical Bear (1972), Fox has become the most articulate and best-known proponent of creation-centered spirituality in Catholic circles. He is the founder of the Institute for Creation-Centered Spirituality, located at Holy Names College in Oakland, California. He is the author of numerous other books and articles. In 1992 he left the Dominican order after a dispute with his superiors regarding his relationship to his province, and in 1994 he left the Roman Catholic Church to become an Episcopalian. See also creation-centered spirituality.

fraction, the breaking of bread. At the Eucharist this action repeats the most ancient of Christian liturgical gestures, the recognition of Christ "in the breaking of bread" (Luke 24:3). After the fraction, the presider drops a part of the host into the chalice (commingling). During the Agnus Dei litany, presider and assistants solemnly divide the consecrated breads into portions suitable to the Communion that will follow. See also Communion, Holy; host.

France, Catholicism in. It is not known when Christianity came to Roman Gaul, although probably the Church there traced its roots to Asia Minor. A flourishing community existed at Lyons by 150; the reputation of the bishop of that city, Irenaeus (d. ca. 200) and the fact that the first great Western synod was held at Arles in 314 attest to the importance of Christian Gaul. During the fourth century, the number of bishoprics grew from about twenty to seventy; major figures were Hilary of Poitiers (d. 367) and Martin of Tours (d. 397), generally acclaimed as the greatest ascetic figure of the West. This Gallo-Roman church was just beginning to penetrate the rural districts when the country was overrun by Germanic tribes; the conversion of the Frankish king, Clovis, in 496 marked the beginning of the assimilation of these Germanic peoples to Catholic Christianity, an event that gave France its title "the eldest daughter of the Church."

Under Frankish rule, there was a good deal of political unrest; the condition of the Church reflected the prevailing lack of order. Celtic monks were active in evangelization efforts, and the English missionary bishop Boniface, as papal legate, helped reorganize the Frankish church in 747–751, bringing closer assimilation to Roman practices.

By the eleventh century, France had disintegrated into over fifty virtually independent feudal states; with Church support, Hugh Capet was installed as king in 987. The new dynasty had a very close working relationship with the Church: the monarchs gave enthusiastic support to monastic reform movements and were a reliable source of backing to the popes in their Crusading efforts and in their continual political struggles with the Holy Roman emperors. A high point of this relationship was the reign of St. Louis IX (1226–70). However, the later Middle Ages were marked by growing tensions between the French kings seeking to consolidate power over their domains and the papacy.

Post-Reformation: The Reformation quickly made an impact in France. The most important Protestant leader was John Calvin, who directed his efforts from French-speaking Switzerland and gained many adherents. By 1560 about 10 percent of the country was Protestant. From 1562 to 1593 the country was torn by bloody religious wars; an equilibrium was reached with the Edict of Nantes in 1598, which guaranteed a good measure of toleration to the Protestants.

The seventeenth century witnessed a great Catholic revival with such figures as Francis de Sales (d. 1622) and Vincent de Paul (d. 1660); a distinctive French school of spirituality blossomed that would remain vastly influential within Catholicism until the twentieth century. Catholics, however, were strongly divided as a result of the Jansenist reform movement, and the policies of both Louis XIV and the hierarchy sought to make the French national church virtually autonomous from Roman control. This movement was known as Gallicanism.

Post-Revolution: In the eighteenth century the Enlightenment made strong inroads among the educated classes, weakening Counter-Reformation religious conformism. The Revolution of 1789 had a major impact on the Catholic Church; the Gallican sympathies of revolutionary legislators led them to nationalize Church property, and the Civil Constitution of the Clergy (1791), which put the choice of bishops and pastors into the hands of the voters, was condemned by the pope. The result was a schism in the French church that was finally healed by Napoleon's concordat with Rome in 1801.

Although the Catholic Church retained its legal establishment and enjoyed a remarkable renaissance throughout the nineteenth century, there was a growing polarization within French society. The majority of Church leaders, allied with conservative aristocratic and rural elements, were intransigently opposed to the "liberties" of the Revolution; working-class people, drawn to the cities as a result of the Industrial Revolution, increasingly desired those liberties for themselves and thus perceived the Church as the enemy. The broadening of the suffrage in the later part of the century brought anticlerical forces to power; the result was a gradual weakening of Church influence; education was secularized in 1882, and complete separation of Church and state was decreed in 1905.

Although French Catholics continued to be at the forefront of the theological and liturgical movements that led up to Vatican II, at the same time a far-reaching transformation of French society was taking place caused by the great exodus of the population from rural areas, long the bastion of the Church. Today France is one of the most secularized countries of Western Europe; over 20 percent of the population no longer claims any religious affiliation, and only about 10–15 percent of professing Catholics practice the faith on a regular basis. See also Avignon; Francis de Sales, St.; Gallicanism; Holy Roman Empire; Jansenism; Paris; Protestantism; Vincent de Paul, St.

DOMINIC MONTI

Frances of Rome, St., 1384–1440, founder of the Oblates of Tor de'Specchi. Her husband was still living when Frances founded a community of women without vows to serve the poor. After she was widowed, she became a member and superior of this community. Frances is a patron saint of motorists. Feast day: March 9.

Frances Xavier Cabrini, St. See Cabrini, St. Frances Xavier.

Francis, Prayer of St., also known as the Peace Prayer of St. Francis, one of the most popular Christian prayers. Though probably not written by Francis of Assisi himself, it is at least Franciscan in spirit and tone.

PRAYER OF ST. FRANCIS

Lord, make me an instrument of your peace;
where there is hatred, let me sow love;
where there is injury, pardon;
where there is doubt, faith;
where there is despair, hope;
where there is darkness, light;
and where there is sadness, joy.
Grant that I may not so much seek to be consoled as to console;
to be understood as to understand;
to be loved as to love;
for it is in giving that we receive;
it is in pardoning that we are pardoned;
and it is in dying that we are born to eternal life.

Francis, Rule of St., the rule of life drawn up by Francis of Assisi (d. 1226) for himself and his associates, rooted in the evangelical call to a life of poverty and to the peaceful and gentle love of all people, especially the poor, and of the whole of God's creation. The first rule, now lost, was known as the Regula Primitiva (Lat., "primitive rule"). It was based on sayings from the Gospels and was approved by Pope Innocent III during Francis's visit to Rome in 1209–10. A second, recast form of the rule, known as the Regula Prima ("first rule"), was drawn up in 1221 and, after still further revision, received formal papal approval by Pope Honorius III in 1223. The approved version was known as the Regula Bullata ("[papally] sealed rule"). It enjoins complete poverty not only on individual members of the Franciscan order (friars) but on the whole order. Beginning about 1245, there were often bitter disputes within the order about the implications of the requirement of poverty. The Spiritual Franciscans insisted on a literal interpretation, while the majority adopted a more moderate and pragmatic interpretation in accordance with changing historical circumstances and pastoral needs. See also Conventuals; Franciscan order; Franciscan spirituality; Francis of Assisi, St.; Spiritual Franciscans.

Franciscan Friars of the Atonement (S.A.), a branch of the Third Order Regular of St. Francis of Assisi founded in 1898 by Lewis Thomas Wattson (Father Paul) at Garrison, New York; they are also known as Graymoor Frairs or Atonement Friars. Wattson, an Episcopalian clergyman, wished to begin a preaching order modeled on the religious poverty of Francis of Assisi. Early efforts were hampered by low numbers, poverty, and the lack of support from fellow Anglicans. In 1909, Father Paul was received into the Catholic Church. Today the society is most known for its missionary and charitable endeavors and its promotion of Christian unity.

Franciscan order, the common designation of the Order of Friars Minor ("Lesser Brothers"), who follow the rule of life written by Francis of Assisi and approved by Pope Honorius III in 1223. In a broader sense the term is also used in reference to two other orders descended from Francis's original followers: the contemplative nuns known as the Poor Clares and the lay penitential movement later known as the Third Order. Today, the latter has evolved into two distinct ways of life: the Secular Franciscans for the laity and a large number of religious congregations of both men and women following the Third Order Regular Rule.

Early History: The Friars Minor arose as one of the many movements of devout laity in the late twelfth and thirteenth century who sought to return to life of the primitive Church, following the example of Jesus and his first disciples. When Francis and his little brotherhood received initial papal approval in 1209, they were laymen who had rejected the desire for wealth and status characteristic of the emerging commercial towns of central Italy to become an itinerant evangelical brotherhood living on the margins of society. After their annual chapter the friars would disperse in small groups, supporting themselves by whatever trade they knew, devoting themselves to lives of simple gospel witness and popular penitential preaching. At the chapter of 1217, the friars decided to spread north of the Alps and to the Crusader states in the Middle East; within two years friars brought their evangelical witness even among Muslim "unbelievers."

Pope Honorius III approving the definitive rule of the Franciscan order in 1223 in the presence of Francis of Assisi and other friars; fifteenth-century manuscript illustration.

However, during these same years Francis's "Lesser Brothers" began undergoing a rapid and thoroughgoing transformation whose effects have divided the order to the present day. The phenomenal growth of the brotherhood, which by 1221 numbered between three thousand and five thousand friars, demanded that more complex internal structures be instituted; the Friars Minor quickly began to conform to more recognizable patterns of religious life. At the same time, the papacy recognized in the Franciscan movement a potent instrument to implement the pastoral reform vision of the Fourth Lateran Council of 1215 and increasingly intervened to oversee and channel its growth toward this end. The attitude of Francis himself toward these changes has long been debated by historians. In any event, whether this development is viewed as a betrayal or a natural evolution, by mid-century the life of the Friars Minor was increasingly focused on the organized pastoral ministry of the Church, especially formal preaching and the hearing of confessions. A predominantly lay brotherhood had become an order of educated clerics; the friars largely abandoned their rural hermitages, settling down in urban friaries and following a traditional conventual routine with churches attached to accommodate their growing clientele. To support these apostolic tasks, the original rigorous observance of poverty was relaxed by several papal interventions. The training schools of the order in such centers as Paris and Oxford produced some of the greatest masters of Scholastic theology, such as Bonaventure (d. 1274), John Duns Scotus (d. 1308), and William of Ockham (d. 1347).

Later Developments: Within the order, however, there was a vocal minority that resisted these changes. Toward the end of the thirteenth century, this faction, known as the Spirituals, grew increasingly restive, refusing to submit to the modifications of absolute poverty increasingly accepted by the majority of friars. The increasingly acrimonious debate eventually led to outright schism on the part of the Spirituals and their eventual condemnation in a series of decisions by Pope John XXII between 1317 and 1323. With the theoretical underpinnings of their distinctive observance thus undercut, the Friars Minor gradually conformed to the pattern of common ownership of property customary among other religious orders.

During the latter part of the fourteenth century however, a certain reaction set in, with small groups of friars receiving permission to retire to remote houses to live a more primitive form of Franciscan life while accenting the ministry of itinerant popular preaching. This movement, known as the Observant reform, gained momentum during the next century under such leaders as Bernardino of Siena (d. 1444) and John Capistrano (d. 1456). Relations between the friars who accepted this reform and those who did not, known as the Conventuals, grew increasingly tense, until Pope Leo X finally split them into two separate congregations in 1517. But the zeal for primitive patterns of life refused to be contained; finding that the Observance itself had become too lukewarm, in the course of the sixteenth century, new reform movements arose within the friars. The largest of these, the Capuchins, achieved a large measure of autonomy almost immediately. Pope Clement VII gave canonical approval to the Capuchin reform in 1528, and in 1536 Pope Paul III solemnly approved the order as a reform branch of the Franciscan order. The Capuchins were immensely successful as popular preachers among the lower classes during the Counter-Reformation, finally becoming a third independent congregation (with their own Minister General) in 1619. A number of other reform groups—the Reformed, the Recollects, and the Discalced—attained a large degree of autonomy, living under their own statutes within the Observant branch. However, these latter observances were ended with the Leonine Union of 1897. Thus today, the Franciscan order is actually divided into three independent congregations: the Friars Minor, the former Observant groups, generally simply referred to as Franciscans in English-speaking countries; the Conventual Franciscans; and the Capuchin Franciscans. As of the early 1990s there were about 19,000 Friars Minor, 11,300 Capuchins, and 4,300 Conventuals.

Although the Franciscans lost some of their intellectual preeminence in Catholicism after the sixteenth century, the order has remained in the forefront of the Church's preaching ministry and mission activity. Franciscans played a notable role in the evangelization of the Americas, and since Vatican II (1962–65) have recaptured a focus on living among and ministering to the poor. Although Franciscans have remained committed to the pastoral ministry and as such are still considered by Rome to be a clerical order, there has been much more emphasis on the fundamental equality of all friars and their contribution to the mission of the order as heralds of the gospel in the world. In the nineteenth and twentieth centuries the friars have worked very closely in their ministries with the numerous congregations of Third Order Franciscan women devoted to teaching, nursing, and other charitable activities that were founded during these years. See also Capuchins; Conventuals; Franciscan spirituality; Francis of Assisi, St.

Bibliography

Iriarte, Lazaro. Franciscan History. Chicago: Franciscan Herald Press, 1982.

Short, William. The Franciscans. Wilmington, DE: Michael Glazier, 1989.

DOMINIC MONTI

Franciscan Sisters, members of any religious congregation of women governed by a rule of life and constitution reflecting their affiliation with the Third Order Regular of St. Francis of Assisi. Franciscan Sisters have traditionally professed simple vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience and have demonstrated in various ways their dedication to the spirituality of Francis, a spirituality characterized by peacefulness, compassion, poverty of spirit, and a deep love for all of God's creation. Many historically have worn the brown or black habit associated with Francis himself, with both male and female congregations dating back to the thirteenth century. Most of the Third Order Franciscan congregations of women, of which there are many, were founded in the nineteenth century and continue to exercise ministerial apostolates with either papal or episcopal approbation. See also Franciscan spirituality; Francis of Assisi, St.

Franciscan spirituality, the approach to the Christian life characteristic of the followers of Francis of Assisi. There has never really been a systematic Franciscan spirituality. Francis himself was keenly aware of the uniqueness of his own and each individual's experience of God; nevertheless, his life and writings and their appropriation in the spiritual experience of countless men and women across the centuries have shaped a distinctively Franciscan approach to the experience of God and the Christian life.

Its starting point is the profound awareness of God as the "Most High," totally transcendent mystery manifest especially in God's goodness. Francis experiences God's absolute otherness as total self-gift, evident in all of creation, but especially in God's special concern for the poor, little ones. For God pours out all that is within, holding nothing back, a mystery that has taken human flesh in the person of Jesus Christ. Franciscan spirituality is therefore Christocentric. Christ is the incarnation of God's eternal self-gift, a light who reveals the world to itself, as existing from and for God, stamped with God's beauty and goodness. The Incarnation completes the world by recapitulating all that is.

But it is precisely in his own self-emptying that Christ redeems the world; he reestablishes the primacy of God's gift by accepting the poverty of being human and sharing the goodness of God. For the root of human sinfulness, that alienation from God and one another that all people experience, is ultimately due to self-appropriation, taking to oneself what only belongs to God. Human beings have refused to live within the experience of God's gift, but have attempted to make themselves like God. Through his entry into the poverty of the human condition, through his own self-emptying in loving service, Christ redeems the world, showing all people how they too can truly experience God and creation.

Elements of the Spirituality: Thus, for the Franciscan the privileged symbolic moments have always been Bethlehem, Calvary, and the Eucharist: the child Jesus, the suffering Christ, and the littleness of broken bread and poured out wine are the most compelling images of the fact that in Christ God has chosen to become "poor for us in this world." This also explains the centrality of poverty and thanksgiving in Franciscan spirituality: humble thanks recognizes that all has been given to us, and poverty imitates God by giving it all away. By choosing to be among the poor of this world, Francis sees himself as sharing in a truly divine activity, accepting his true identity as fashioned in the image of a self-giving God.

Franciscan spirituality has always been at the same time deeply contemplative and essentially mission-oriented. The Franciscan needs to step back to savor God's goodness, creating "a dwelling place for God" within where "his holy working" in each one might be recognized. But it is precisely this awareness that impels Franciscans to imitate Christ by becoming heralds of the gospel, proclaiming God's goodness by demonstrating it through their peaceful and gentle love of all people, especially the little ones of this world. See also Francis, Rule of St.; Franciscan order; Francis of Assisi, St. DOMINIC MONTI

Francis de Sales, St., 1567–1622, bishop of Geneva, best known for the spiritual direction he provided for the laity and clergy through conversations, sermons, letters, and treatises. His writings, such as The Introduction to the Devout Life, reveal a thorough understanding of the spiritual tradition of the Church and an ability to make it relevant for people in various circumstances. Born to a noble family in Savoy, he studied theology and law at the University of Padua and was consecrated bishop in 1602. He was declared a saint in 1665 and a Doctor of the Church in 1877. Feast day: January 24. See also Introduction to the Devout Life.

Francis of Assisi, St., 1181/82–1226, founder of the Franciscans. The son of Pietro di Bernardone, a wealthy cloth merchant of Assisi, Italy, and his wife, Pica, Francis became a junior partner in the family business. His youth was marked by high living and a concern for social status. In 1202, in a war between Assisi and neighboring Perugia, Francis was taken prisoner. Released after a year's confinement, he returned home, but began questioning his former values. He found himself increasingly drawn to a life of penance marked by intense periods of prayer, pilgrimages, and almsgiving. Confirmed in these new directions by an encounter with a leper, he began to spend much of his time working among these social outcasts. All this provoked a prolonged conflict with his father, which finally reached a climax in 1206. Responding to what he felt was a divine call to rebuild the ruined chapel of San Damiano, Francis sold some valuable cloth from the family store to raise money for the project. Brought to trial by his father, he renounced his patrimony in a dramatic scene before the bishop of Assisi. Living as a penitent hermit, Francis spent several years caring for lepers and repairing small chapels in the neighborhood.

Francis of Assisi, founder of the Franciscans, in the desert, where he manifested his love of nature and his simplicity of life; late-fifteenth-century painting by Bellini, Frick Collection, New York.

Founding of the Franciscans: In the spring of 1208, his life took a new turn: responding to what he felt was a personal call to implement Jesus' mission to his apostles (Matt 10), Francis began to preach publicly; he also attracted his first followers. A new movement was born. By early 1209 there were twelve brothers; writing down a brief statement of their way of life based on a few Gospel texts, Francis journeyed to Rome and secured tentative approval from Innocent III for the group. Returning to Assisi, these "Lesser Brothers" (Friars Minor) settled at the rural chapel of the Portiuncula; from there they would spread out in small bands through central Italy, devoting themselves to contemplative prayer, working as day laborers and preaching, calling all to conversion by their word and example. In 1212, Clare, a young aristocratic woman of Assisi, joined Francis's movement; with several other women she founded a community of "Poor Ladies" at San Damiano. About the same time, Francis also began to guide groups of devout laypeople, who were called the Brothers and Sisters of Penance or, later, the "Third Order." The preaching ministry of the Friars Minor soon spread beyond Italy, for Francis was convinced that God had sent his brothers to bring their lives of Gospel witness to the whole world. At the chapter of 1217, he sent missions beyond the Alps and even to the Crusader states in the Near East. Francis himself had long possessed the desire to preach Christ to the Muslims and, by doing so, win a martyr's death. He finally was able to get to Egypt in 1219, where Crusaders were mounting an attack on the forces of Sultan al-Kamil. He somehow managed to pass through the lines and meet the sultan, who was deeply impressed by his transparent sincerity (although remaining unconverted). However, Francis was forced to return to Italy by growing tensions among his friars, now about three thousand strong. There were strict divisions in the ranks about the directions the order should take; furthermore, there were many in the hierarchy opposed to this novel religious community. Realizing that he was unequal to the situation, Francis resigned the administration of the order and also sought the appointment of Cardinal Hugolino da Segni as protector of his movement. However, he was always viewed as the spiritual head of the brotherhood; in this capacity he prepared a revision of his rule, which won definitive papal approval in 1223. During these years Francis was plagued by serious illness, and he increasingly withdrew for long periods of prayer. While on one of these retreats on Mount La Verna in the fall of 1224, he underwent a profound mystical experience, returning with the scars of Christ's Passion, or stigmata, imprinted in his body. He died at the Portiuncula on October 3, 1226, and was canonized two years later by his old friend, Hugolino, now Pope Gregory IX.

Francis has always enjoyed a widespread cult as "another Christ," but the twentieth century has witnessed a remarkable revival of devotion to him, even among nonbelievers. His charismatic personality, deep compassion for all people, and love for God's creation are features that have made him one of the best-loved saints. He is the patron saint of Italy and of the environment. Feast day: October 4. See also Francis, Rule of St.; Franciscan order.

DOMINIC MONTI

Francis of Paola, St., 1416–1507, a Calabrian Franciscan who, after a life of solitude and penance, founded a branch of Franciscans known as Minims, which received papal approval in 1474. Famous as a prophet and miracle worker, he spent the last years of his life in France. Feast day: April 2. See also Minims.

Francis Xavier, St., 1506–52, French Jesuit missionary, known as the "Apostle of the Indies" and "Apostle of Japan." While a student in Paris, he met Ignatius of Loyola, whom he eventually joined as a companion in what would become the Society of Jesus. In 1534, Xavier, Ignatius, and five other companions vowed themselves at Montmartre to the service of God.

In 1536 the group left Paris. When plans to work as missionaries in the Holy Land failed, they gathered in Rome to deliberate about their future. While still awaiting formal approval of their new institute (the Society of Jesus), the king of Portugal, John III, requested a Jesuit for missionary work among the Christians in the East. Xavier was given the mission when the first candidate, Bobadilla, became ill. Xavier arrived in Goa, India, in 1542. There he baptized many among the lower caste of India, but he was unsuccessful at gaining a hearing among the higher caste Brahmin.

At Malacca in Malaya Xavier met a Japanese nobleman and decided to undertake a mission to Japan. After returning to Goa for a period to oversee the growing missionary effort in the east, Xavier left for Japan in 1549. He spent two successful years in Japan before returning to Malacca. While in Japan he learned of the influence of China on Japanese culture. In 1552, while trying to arrange entry into China, Xavier fell ill and died on the island of Sancian off the coast of China. He was canonized on March 12, 1622. Feast day: December 3. See also China, Catholicism in; India, Catholicism in; Japan, Catholicism in; missions.

JAMES K. VOISS

Frankfurt, Council of (794), Frankish synod. When the condemnation of Adoptionism and of Felix of Urgel at the synod of Regensburg in 792 failed to quell the Spanish heresy, Charlemagne summoned a new council at Frankfurt, presiding over its sessions and arranging for Alcuin, though only a deacon, to present the orthodox position to the assembled bishops. See also Adoptionism; Alcuin; Charlemagne.

Franks, a Germanic people who settled along the right bank of the Rhine and, from the late third century, invaded Gaul, most of which they eventually (by 511) occupied. Clovis (ca. 481–511) united all the Franks under his own rule with his capital at Paris. Baptized in the late 490s, he was the only Catholic king in the West, in the eyes of many the protector of the orthodox. In his kingdom Franks and Romans, united under a single episcopacy, mingled more freely. From 639 the Merovingian dynasty began to be supplanted by the Carolingians, the two most notable of whom were Charles Martel, who checked Arab ambitions on Europe east of Spain at the battle of Poitiers (732), and Charlemagne, crowned emperor of the West by the pope on Christmas Day, 800. See also Charlemagne; Charles Martel; Clovis.

Fransen, Piet, 1913–83, Flemish Jesuit theologian. He served on the faculty at the University of Louvain and is known for his work in the theology of grace, ecumenism, and ecclesiology.

Franzelin, Johann Baptist (yoh'hahn bahpteest' frahnz'eh-lin), 1816–86, Jesuit theologian, cardinal, and professor at the Gregorian University in Rome. Franzelin shared with his colleagues in Rome, G. Perrone, C. Passaglia, and K. Schrader, an interest in the integration of biblical and patristic sources into Scholastic theological treatises, which separated him from the proponents of the budding neo-Thomistic revival. A consultant for several Roman congregations, he wrote the first draft of Vatican I's constitution on reason and faith. His ecclesiology reflected the influence of the German Tübingen theologians in viewing the Church as the Mystical Body, the exemplar of the Incarnate Word. He wrote theological manuals on the sacraments, the Trinity, and fundamental theology. In his theology of tradition Franzelin recognized that while the hierarchy had a principal role in preserving and articulating the deposit of faith, the laity, too, participated in the transmission of tradition. The hierarchy possessed an "active infallibility" in teaching, but the whole faithful possessed a "passive infallibility" in believing.

Frassinetti, St. Paola, also known as Paula, 1809–82, Italian-born founder of the Sisters of St. Dorothy, an order dedicated to the education of poor children. Feast day: June 11.

fraternal correction, a spiritual work of mercy patterned after Jesus' words: "If another member of the church sins against you, go and point out the fault when the two of you are alone. If the member listens to you, you have regained that one. But if you are not listened to, take one or two others along with you.... If the member refuses to listen to them, tell it to the church. And if the offender refuses to listen even to the church, let such a one be to you as a Gentile and a tax collector" (Matt 18:15–17). The words "against you" are not in some texts, so that sin may be interpreted less narrowly. Paul advises, "Brothers, if anyone is caught in a transgression, you who have received the Spirit should restore such a one in a spirit of gentleness" (Gal 6:1). Fraternal correction is an act of love. Jesus offers a process for the loving confrontation of evil. There may be an obligation to confront a neighbor's evil, just as one may be obliged to aid a hungry or homeless neighbor. See also mercy; spiritual works of.

Fraternity of St. Peter, Priestly, a society of apostolic life (see can. 731) with a special mission to active and former members of the Society of St. Pius X. The Fraternity was founded in Switzerland in 1988 by members of the society who did not wish to follow Archbishop Marcel Lefebvre into schism; it was canonically erected (i.e., established) by the Holy See on October 18, 1988. Its priests celebrate the Eucharist according to the old Tridentine rite. See also Lefebvre, Marcel; traditionalism, Catholic; Tridentine Mass.

Fraticelli, a name given to the Spiritual Franciscans of Italy and Provence in the early fourteenth century. Inspired by the teachings on poverty and apocalypticism of Petrus Joannis Olivi, Angelo Clareno, and Ubertino of Casale, the Fraticelli separated from the Franciscan order and were condemned by Pope John XXII in 1317. See also Spiritual Franciscans.

Frederick I, "Barbarossa," ca. 1123–90, king of Germany (1152) and Holy Roman emperor from 1155. He attempted to subdue Italy but was opposed successfully by the allied forces of the Lombard League and the Papal States. He died in Turkey while en route to the Third Crusade. See also Holy Roman Empire.

Frederick II, 1194–1250, Holy Roman emperor who wore the crowns of Sicily, Germany, Jerusalem, and the empire. He was a patron of translators and scientists, although his intellectual and military accomplishments were overshadowed by his headstrong ambitions and bitter opposition to the papacy. See also Holy Roman Empire.

Frederick III, 1415–93, Holy Roman emperor and king of Germany from 1440. His support of the papacy against the conciliarist Council of Basel (1431–38) earned him the imperial crown; he was the last emperor to be crowned in Rome. See also Basel, Council of; Holy Roman Empire.

Free churches, certain Protestant churches in England and Wales that, although agreeing with the Church of England in doctrinal areas, refused to conform (thus, the term "nonconformist") to its discipline and liturgical practices in the seventeenth century. Eventually, the Free churches rejected the principle of establishment and fought for the separation of Church and state. The Act of Uniformity (1662) marks the formal beginnings of separatism, and the formation of Free Church councils began in the late nineteenth century. The term is usually associated with Methodists, English Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Baptists, Quakers, Unitarians, freedom, the absence of compulsion and determination from anything within or outside of a person or persons. In positive terms, it is the ability to weigh possibilities, choose among them, and act on this choice. Insofar as human beings possess this self-agency for thinking, deciding, and acting, they can truly act and engage in activity of a moral and religious character. According to Catholic teaching, human freedom was not completely destroyed by Adam's sin but was damaged and has been restored by Jesus Christ (Gal 5:1, 13; Council of Trent, 1545–63). In other words, human freedom needs to be set free by someone other than ourselves, namely, by Christ, and full freedom is a gift from God. See also free will; grace, actual; nature and grace; religious liberty.

Churches of Christ, Plymouth Brethren, and various Pentecostal sects. See also Protestantism.

Freemasonry, fraternal organization founded in eighteenth-century England on the basis of an earlier tradition of a guild of masons. The organization spread to the continent of Europe (and later to the Americas) as a social organization with strong ties to deist religion in northern Europe and with an unremitting hostility to organized Christianity in Latin countries. Membership was forbidden to Catholics under pain of excommunication and papal documents frequently condemned the movement.

The new Code of Canon Law (1983) does not forbid membership in the Masons by name but does forbid membership in societies that plot against the Church (can. 1374). Decrees of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith have said, however, that membership is forbidden and violations of the prohibition are gravely sinful.

free will, the human faculty to choose among courses of action. Common sense and moral theology agree that free will is required for moral responsibility. People do, in fact, hold one another accountable for their actions, though like St. Paul (Rom 7:15–24) they sometimes feel powerless to do what they know is right.

Catholic moral theology affirms that limited human responsibility is sufficient for deciding among alternative courses of action insofar as a person understands them. Since the time of Pelagius (third century), the Catholic Church has formally taught that God's grace does not take away free will. The Council of Trent (1545–63) affirmed that original sin does not destroy human free will. Trent's "Decree on Justification" (can. 5) formally proclaims that rejection of the doctrine of free will is grounds for expulsion from membership in the Catholic Church.

Debate about both the nature and the level of freedom of the human will continues to engage philosophers and theologians. In the twentieth century, psychology and other sciences have pointed out that a person's ability to determine a course of action is limited in ways that elude awareness. Some theories of human personality go so far as to claim that freedom is an illusion and that all human actions are determined by external influences upon our human psyche. Catholic moral theology, like civil law, has traditionally noted that human responsibility can be reduced or destroyed by a variety of factors—fear, ignorance, emotional disturbance, passion, drugs, habits, etc. DANIEL KROGER freewill offerings, charitable donations. As opposed to a tithe or some other bequest to the Church due by law or custom, freewill offerings are those gifts, usually of a monetary nature, that are given to the Church for any of a number of charitable or religious purposes, purely as acts of generosity.

Frequens (fray'kwenz; Lat., "Frequent"), reform decree of the Council of Constance, promulgated October 1417, calling for frequent general councils to reform the Church, one to meet five years after Constance, the next seven years later, and then every ten years thereafter. This scheme was abandoned by Pope Eugenius IV (1431–47). See also Constance, Council of.

fresco (It., "fresh"), artistic technique of painting on wet plaster. Typically done on a wall or ceiling, Eleventh-century fresco depicting the burials of Sts. Peter and Paul, in the basilica of San Piero a Grado, Tuscany, Italy.

it is, historically, a favored form of church decoration.

friar (Fr., Mid. Eng., frere, "brother"), the distinctive title of the members of the mendicant orders which arose in thirteenth-century Europe. The major orders of friars were the Dominicans, Franciscans, Augustinians, and Carmelites. The mendicants were distinguished from the traditional monastic orders by three chief characteristics: friars pursued an ideal of corporate poverty, refusing landed endowments and being supported instead by the freewill offerings of the faithful; they united their common life with active involvement in pastoral ministry; and they belonged to a centralized international brotherhood, thus enabling them to move about according to need. See also mendicant orders.

Friday (Old Eng., Fria, "Goddess of Love" and diaeq, "day"), the sixth day of the week. the Jewish Sabbath begins at sundown on this day, and it is the special day of prayer for Muslims. Christians remember the Passion and Crucifixion of Jesus, which occurred on that day. Until recently, it was a day of abstinence from meat. See also abstinence; First Fridays; Good Friday.

friendship, in the spiritual tradition, an affectionate relationship between and among Christians that serves to increase their love of God and others. John Cassian (d. 435), Augustine (d. 430), Aelred of Rievaulx (d. 1167), and Francis de Sales (d. 1622) are among those who sought to define the nature of true spiritual friendships. Traditionally, such friendships are said to include mutual affection and service, combined with conversations that reveal what is in the depth of each one's heart. The love that friends have for each other is a gift from God and the support, encouragement, and correction provided through the relationship allows friends to grow toward spiritual perfection.

Fries, Heinrich (freez), b. 1911, German Catholic theologian. As professor at Tübingen and Munich, and through writings ranging from an original survey of modern philosophies of religion (1949) to a system of fundamental theology (1985) and an overview of church unity (written with Karl Rahner [1983]), Fries has been an important figure in the development of the Catholic theology of revelation and ecumenism.

Frohschammer, Jakob, 1821–93, German theologian and philosopher of nature. Two years after he became professor at Munich in 1857, his study on the generation of the soul was placed on the Index of Forbidden Books. Because of his writings on the history of philosophy, natural science, and Thomas Aquinas, he was embroiled in controversies with the Vatican that ended in suspension from the priesthood and papal condemnation.

fruitfulness of the sacraments, expression that describes whether the sacrament has indeed bestowed the grace it contains. This concept emphasizes the need for human beings to cooperate with the grace God offers in the sacraments in order for the sacraments to have any spiritual effect. The sacraments are not simply automatic mechanisms of grace, but require cooperation on the part of those receiving them to be fruitful. An individual can receive a valid sacrament but frustrate the sacrament's ultimate purpose, which is conversion in love to God and to neighbor. For example, if one receives the Eucharist in an unrepentant state of sin that persists after Communion, and experiences absolutely no increase in love for others or for God, then it is said that the reception of the Eucharist in this instance did the individual no spiritual good—the Communion was not fruitful. See also grace, sacramental; sacrament.

fruits of the Mass, the theory originating with Duns Scotus (d. 1308) that the Eucharist is the source of blessing to the celebrant, the whole Church, and those for whose intention the Eucharist is offered and who thus were considered to be the recipients of "special fruits." This terminology is little used today because no one can measure either the abundance of God's blessings or the receptivity of the human heart to them. The 1983 Code of Canon Law states that those who make an offering for the celebration of the Eucharist support the Church's ministers and works (can. 946). Because of this special involvement in a particular celebration they might, if properly disposed, derive greater spiritual benefit from it. See also Eucharist.

fruits of the Spirit, more properly designated the fruit of the Spirit, that is, the effect(s) of the Holy Spirit active in human life. The term is based on qualities listed in Gal 5—love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, generosity, faithfulness, gentleness, and self-control. The Latin Vulgate translation adds modesty, continence, and chastity to the list. The fruit of the Spirit acts as a counterpart to the works of the flesh or the seven capital sins.

Generosity fosters a sense of values and is willing to do that which may be unpopular, such as disciplining a child. Generosity also considers the ultimate welfare of one's enemies. Faithfulness abides by the decision to follow what is good and is willing to endure suffering in order to overcome evil. Love entails surrendering oneself to God and to the important people in one's life. Love flows from a profound experience of God's love and mercy, and joy follows upon that experience. Peace, patience, and gentleness address emotional states, whereas self-control, continence, and chastity counterbalance human desires. Peace fears no external forces of evil and patience bears wrongs without anger or vengeance. A gentle person has no need for power over others, for the power and authority of Jesus enables a person to submit even to death with equanimity. The fruit of the Spirit is not the habit of virtue but the strengthened condition of those possessed by God's Spirit. See also gifts of the Holy Spirit; Holy Spirit; love.

Frumentius, St., d. ca. 380, patron saint of Ethiopia. A native of Tyre, he landed in Ethiopia after surviving a shipwreck and became secretary to the king. Upon the king's death he remained and helped rule the country, introducing Christianity. When the king's sons came of age, he left Ethiopia but was sent back later as a missionary bishop by Athanasius. He was called Abbuna ("Our Father") in Ethiopia, and that remains the title of the primate of the Ethiopian church. Feast day: October 27.

Fuchs, Josef, b. 1912, prominent German Jesuit moral theologian. He taught moral theology at St. George Hochschule, Frankfurt, from 1947 to 1954, then at the Pontifical Gregorian University, Rome, beginning in 1954. Author of many articles and books, the latter including Natural Law: A Theological Investigation (1965), Human Values and Christian Morality (1967), and Personal Responsibility and Christian Morality (1983).

Fulbert of Chartres, St., ca. 970–1028, bishop. A student of Gerbert of Aurillac (Pope Sylvester II), Fulbert was a master in the school of Chartres and chancellor when elected bishop (1006). Among his students was Berengar of Tours. Many of his letters, poems, and sermons survive. He began rebuilding Chartres after the fire of 1020. Feast day: April 10 (in Chartres and Poitiers). See also Chartres.

Fulda, German monastery founded by Boniface and Sturmi ca. 744; Boniface's relics rest there. Among students at Fulda's school and library were Gottschalk of Orbais, Lupus of Ferrières, and Walafrid Strabo. The ninth-century chapel is still in use, though the abbey was suppressed in 1802. See also Boniface, St.

Fulgentius of Ruspe, St., ca. 467–ca. 532, monk, bishop, and theologian. Born in Vandal North Africa, he became Catholic bishop of Ruspe ca. 507. Exiled, recalled, and exiled again by the Arian king Thrasimund, he was finally recalled (523) by the Catholic king Hilderich. His writings against Arians and semi-Pelagians reproduce Augustine's thought. Feast day: January 1. See also Arianism; semi-Pelagianism.

functional Christology, critical inquiry into the mission of Jesus Christ. Its focal questions are: What was Jesus' aim and message? What did/does Jesus Christ bring about by his life, death, and Resurrection? Also, what did/does God accomplish in and through Jesus Christ? Functional Christology points beyond itself to ontological (or classical) Christology, which treats who and what Jesus Christ was/is. See also Christology.

fundamentalism, biblical, an approach to the Bible, associated mainly with conservative movements within Protestantism, that asserts that what the Bible says is always literally true (literalism). Fundamentalism developed among Protestants out of a series of Bible conferences first held in Niagara Falls in 1895 in reaction to the rise of historical criticism in the late nineteenth century. Its name derives from a series of publications (1905–15) that defined five "fundamentals" of the Christian faith (the verbal inerrancy of Scripture, the divinity of Jesus Christ, the Virgin Birth, a substitutionary theory of the atonement that views Jesus as a substitute for humanity in enduring divine punishment for sin, and the physical Resurrection and bodily return of Christ). Fundamentalists generally do not recognize literary forms other than history; thus, Gen 1–2:4a describes six actual days of creation and Jonah was really in the belly of the whale. Concomitant with fundamentalism is a dictation theory of inspiration where the biblical author is held to be simply a scribe of divine revelation. Biblical fundamentalists assert absolute inerrancy of Scripture and argue that Scripture provides an adequate guide for all areas of Christian life (biblicism).

Fundamentalism is less a method of biblical exegesis than a religious disposition. Fundamentalists operate out of a distorted understanding of the "literal" (which should instead be understood as the "literary") sense of Scripture. When the Bible uses literary forms that are not historical to present its message (e.g., the book of Jonah as an edifying religious tale), the "literal" or literary sense is not historical. Fundamentalists themselves often ignore or interpret in nonliteral ways texts such as turning the other cheek or giving one's cloak to the poor (Matt 5:38–42). Catholics who are challenged by fundamentalists should realize that fundamentalists are offering interpretations, not literal meanings, of biblical texts. The appeal of biblical fundamentalism is simplicity of belief and security in a world that often seems threatening. Though biblical fundamentalism has historically not been strong within Catholicism, it has been gaining ground since Vatican II (1962–65), partially as a reaction to the council's liberalizing initiatives and partially under the impulse of the council's strong emphasis on the Bible. On November 5, 1987, the U.S. Catholic bishops issued a pastoral statement on biblical fundamentalism in which they urged greater knowledge and study of the Bible as the best Catholic response to fundamentalism (see Origins 17/21). See also fundamentalism, Catholic; Scripture, intepretation of.

JOHN R. DONAHUE

fundamentalism, Catholic, the Catholic forms of religious fundamentalism, including especially an unhistorical and literal reading not only of the Bible but also of the official teachings of the Church. In general, fundamentalism tends to isolate and control the divine in objects, to claim special and direct access to God, to encourage the miraculous, and to hold an apocalyptic and elitist stance toward humanity. Catholic forms of fundamentalism often focus upon things and authorities: regarding things, exaggerated attention is given to dramatic powers vested in medals, water, clothes, visions, oils, and photographs; regarding authorities, claims are made that a few church members (officials or visionaries) are instructed by the Holy Spirit on many topics and are given immediate and certain information apart from research and consultation. This fundamentalist spirit is manifested in the attention given to unapproved visions or to pictures with paranatural activities (e.g., weeping). There are also fundamentalist communities ranging from the Lefebvre schism within the Catholic Church to movements of a dubious spirituality or to unapproved religious communities. Authoritarian fundamentalism may work to discredit theology, to replace the discussion of issues with shallow piety, to censure divergent views not on matters of dogma but on theological issues, and to locate the gospel solely in one vision or activity.

The rise of Catholic fundamentalism includes typical characteristics of anger, anxiety, self-doubt, and revenge. Best seen as a reaction against movements in the Church that seek to introduce maturity and diversity, it is threatened by the underlying drive of the present-day Catholic Church to become a worldwide, diverse, but united Church. The fundamentalist personality is usually ignorant of Catholicism's diverse, rich, and complex traditions. Fundamentalism of any sort is opposed to basic facets of the Catholic understanding of Christianity: a variety of traditions in theology, liturgy, and the spiritual life; a theology of grace that focuses on the presence and image of God in each human being; the absence of an angry God or an apocalyptic future; the importance of the local church; and Church authority. To some Catholics, fundamentalism appears to be more a psychological problem than a theology; pastorally it is often a search for real personal and communal experiences of God. See also fundamentalism, biblical.

Bibliography

Marty, Martin, and Scott Appleby. Fundamentalisms Observed. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991.

O'Meara, Thomas. Fundamentalism: A Catholic Perspective. New York: Paulist Press, 1990.

THOMAS F. O'MEARA

fundamental moral theology, that part of moral theology that deals with basic questions such as human acts, the law of Christ, the vocation of the fundamental option, a technical and even misleading term that refers to a dimension of freedom in human action deeper than mere freedom of object choice. This dimension is not the freedom of choice to do a particular thing or not, that is, a choice of specific objects. It is rather the free determination of oneself with regard to the totality of existence. It is a fundamental choice between love and selfishness, between self and God, who is our destiny.

Christian, the theological virtues of faith, hope, and love, moral norms, and the imputability of effects. Fundamental moral theology is usually contrasted with special moral theology, that part of the discipline that treats various concrete problems such as war and peace, poverty, sexuality and marriage, the beginning and end of life, race relations, justice problems, and sexism. For many decades, under the influence of the moral manuals, fundamental moral theology was one-sidedly confession-oriented, magisterium-dominated, canon-law related, sin-centered, and seminary-controlled. For this reason, Vatican II stated: "Special attention needs to be given to the development of moral theology. Its scientific exposition should be more thoroughly nourished by scriptural teaching. It should show the nobility of the Christian vocation of the faithful, and their obligation to bring forth fruit in charity for the life of the world" (Decree on Priestly Formation, n. 16). See also moral theology.

Theologians, following above all the anthropology of Karl Rahner (d. 1984), assert that in the moral act there are two distinguishable aspects. First, there is a particular object of choice (an act of obedience, a lie). This is the explicit and reflexively conscious concern of the agent. Second, there is the disposition or commitment of the agent as a person with relation to God, the person's ultimate end. This anthropology sees the constitutive core of the person as a capacity or freedom to accept or deny the divine self-communication known as grace. This acceptance or rejection is not a thematic datum of human experience that is immediately and empirically observable. The reason for this is that the human person is conscious of the self as a subject without necessarily reflecting on the self as an object.

This self-disposition of the person reflects the fact that human persons cannot be indifferent to their ultimate end. They cannot not opt for or against the God of their lives. Persons must say yes or no in the depths of their being. This answer is said to be a use of basic or fundamental freedom. It is fundamental for several reasons. First, it is not an activity like the many daily activities that occupy people's lives. It underlies all other choices. Second, since it underlies other, more superficial choices and manifests itself in them, there is a continual interplay between this basic freedom and particular acts. Acting according to this option, one deepens it. Acting contrary to it, one undermines its stability. Finally, actions derive their moral seriousness from the presence or absence in them of this basic freedom. Thus, many theologians understand both mortal sin and conversion from it as necessarily being fundamental options. See also free will; mortal sin; sin.

RICHARD A. MCCORMICK

fundamental theology, a discipline that establishes the basic intelligibility of theology, using the tools of philosophy, linguistics, and historical-critical methods. The task of fundamental theology may be understood analytically, for example, to establish the facticity of an event or the truth of a doctrine solely on historical or metaphysical grounds. Or, in an approach now called foundational theology, this task can be understood synthetically, acknowledging that the claim of faith is integral to its intelligibility. Both these approaches are generally considered to be distinct from apologetics, which attempts to establish the credibility of faith claims for nonbelievers.

The need for fundamental theology dates, for Christians, from the NT exhortation to "always be ready to make a defense to anyone who demands from you an accounting for the hope that is in you" (1 Pet 3:15). In the history of Christian thought, an implicit fundamental theology has always functioned, arising in response to the intellectual exigencies of various times and places.

History: The term "fundamental theology" first appears in the work of Pierre Annat (in 1700) as another term for positive theology, the theology of Protestant writers that based itself on the texts of Scripture and the early Church (i.e., that which was "posited"). It was opposed to the Catholic Scholastic theology of the time, which employed metaphysical categories to systematize its treatment of faith and doctrine.

To adequately address the rationalism of the seventeenth century, and in particular, to counter deism's rejection of the possibility of divine revelation, fundamental theology had to present the Christian faith as both logically necessary and empirically verifiable. To this end it saw its task as the demonstration of the possibility of revelation and the verifiability of the miraculous.

Fundamental theology took two different forms in the nineteenth century. Fideism, the position that religious knowledge is not an act of the intellect but rather resides in a "leap of faith," called for new scientific approaches to ground the intelligibility of belief. German writers, responding to the rise of historical consciousness and the corresponding development of the idea of human subjectivity, cast theology as a properly scientific discipline by examining the structures of human knowing, as exemplified in Johann Nepomunk Ehrlich's 1859 Fundamentaltheologie. This approach continues in the work of the twentieth-century theologian Karl Rahner (d. 1984), and is especially evident in the structure of his Foundations of Christian Faith (1978).

By contrast, the Catholic neo-Scholastic theology of the nineteenth and early-twentieth centuries saw its task as the defense of the Catholic faith. Such works would begin by grounding the idea of religion, then defending the notion of God's revelation, particularly the revelation of God in Christ, and finally demonstrating the authority of the Catholic hierarchical magisterium, and its continuity with the tradition of the apostles.

In the contemporary context, new questions in philosophy and linguistics recast the nature of fundamental theology's focus on the intelligibility of the claim that God is definitively revealed to humanity in Jesus Christ. For example, fundamental theology now must begin by defending the very possibility of theological statements, and even the assumption that language refers to anything outside of itself. In this milieu, both the German and Roman approaches appear with a new focus. The epistemological starting point of the heirs of German idealism now poses the question of the difference, if any, between fundamental theology and theological method. And the Roman approach now must defend the very possibility of metaphysics, if it is credibly to propose a fundamental theology that is independent of the faith-claims of systematic theology. See also theology.

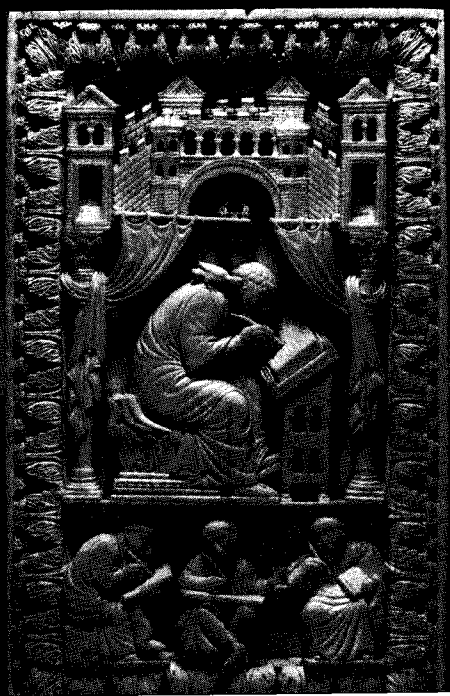
NANCY DALLAVALLE

funeral Mass, or the Mass of Christian Burial, second part of the three-part complex of rites by which the Church bids farewell to the dead: prayers following the time of death, the Mass of Christian Burial, and the rite of committal. The funeral Mass reflects the paschal character of the death of Christians. Hence, the funeral Mass employs the following themes: the Christian's union with Christ in Baptism, the communion of saints into whose community the deceased will be welcomed, the Second Coming of Christ, and the longed-for reunion with all the faithful at the end of time. The funeral follows the order of Mass with two major revisions: the body of the deceased is greeted at the door of the church at the beginning of Mass, and a rite of final commendation follows the Communion. Although funeral Masses are not permitted during the Triduum (Holy Thursday, Good Friday, and the Easter Vigil), on holy days of obligation, or on the Sundays of Advent, Lent, or Easter, simple burial is permitted. See also burial, Christian.

future, the, a perennial theme in Christian theology. St. Paul and other early Christians were preoccupied with the resurrection of the body and the Second Coming of Christ. Medieval and early modern Christians developed extensive treatises on the four last things (death, judgment, heaven, and hell). In the twentieth century, the theology of the future has exhibited new characteristics. Among contemporary Christians there is growing concern about the future of humankind and about the grounds for Christian hope. Teilhard de Chardin's The Phenomenon of Man (Eng. trans., 1959), for example, focused on Christ as the Omega Point of cosmic evolution. Likewise, Jürgen Moltmann's Theology of Hope (Eng. trans., 1967) accented the Resurrection as the promise of a future greater than present reality. Moltmann's thought also reflects the tension in contemporary theology about responsibility for the future: is it God's or ours? Obviously, it must be both God's and ours; but classically and process-oriented theologians differ in their explanations. Classically oriented thinkers believe that God is the primary cause of everything in the world, ordering the free actions of humans and the spontaneous activity of other creatures to the divine purposes. Process-oriented thinkers argue that God works through hidden persuasion, luring creatures to the good that God has in mind for them. In both cases, however, the mystery of God's action in the world remains so that Christians must ultimately trust in God's enduring love for them. See also eschatology, universal.

JOSEPH A. BRACKEN

G



Gabriel (Heb., "man of God"), archangel. In the later biblical and postbiblical period Gabriel is preeminently revealer (e.g., to Daniel, 8:15–26; 9:20–27) and heavenly intercessor (e.g., 1 Enoch 9:1). He is one of those who stand in the presence of God (Rev 8:2) and is sent to announce the births of John the Baptist (Luke 1:11–20) and Jesus (Luke 1:26–38). See also angel; archangel.

Gabriel of the Sorrowful Mother, St., 1838–62, Passionist priest, patron saint of clerics and youth. Born Gabriel Possenti in Assisi, Italy, he took the name Brother Gabriel of the Sorrowful Mother upon entering the Passionists. Having lived an exemplary religious life marked not only by penance but also cheerfulness, he died of tuberculosis at the age of twenty-four. Feast day: February 27. See also Passionists.

Gaetano da Tiene (gi-tah'noh dah tee-ay'nay). See Cajetan [Thomas de Vio].

Galilee, a region in the north of the land of Israel. It extended from the rugged hills in the north around Safed, through the lower hills around the plain of Gennesaret and the valley of Jezreel (or Esdraelon), ending in the northern reaches of the central hill country of Palestine. In the distribution of land among the tribes of Israel it fell to Asher, Zebulun, Naphtali, and Issachar. Annexed by the Assyrians in 734 B.C., it remained under foreign domination until 80 B.C., when it was conquered by Alexander Jannaeus. At the death of Herod the Great (4 B.C.), it became a separate district under Herod Antipas who reigned until A.D. 39. Galilee then became part of the kingdom of Herod Agrippa I (A.D. 41–44) and thereafter part of a Roman province. Between A.D. 27 and 30 it was the location of most of Jesus' ministry.

Galileo [Galilei] 1564–1642, Italian scientist and philosopher. Galileo began studying medicine in 1581 at the University of Pisa, but his mathematical and philosophical abilities soon became apparent and he gave up medicine in 1585 to begin lecturing at the Florentine Academy. In 1586 he published his invention of the hydrostatic balance. In 1588 he published on the center of gravity in solid bodies. He was appointed professor of mathematics in 1592 at Padua, where he published his study of the motion of falling bodies (De Motu). With the newly invented telescope Galileo began to explore the heavens. His Sidereus Nuncius (Starry Messenger, 1610) made him famous. In it he announced that the moon was not a perfectly smooth object, that the Milky Way was composed of countless stars, and that Jupiter had four moons.

Galileo was attacked for his views by representatives of the dominant, primarily Aristotelian, scientific community. The prevailing Ptolemaic/Aristotelian theory of the cosmos placed an immovable earth at the center of the universe and encased by spheres in which the sun, stars, planets, and other celestial bodies revolved in perfect circles. These spheres, beginning with that of the moon, were perfect and unchanging. Galileo's observations placed these theories in doubt. In fact, Galileo was an adherent of Nicholas Copernicus (1473–1543), who placed the sun at the center of the universe. In 1613 Galileo published his Letter on Sunspots in which he openly advocated the Copernican theory (though he had admitted his private acceptance as early as 1597).

The resulting philosophical controversy eventually drew in the Church. It is important to realize that Galileo could not prove the Copernican theory. For some aspects of it, it would only be in the nineteenth century that proof would be found. The Ptolemaic/Aristotelian system explained phenomena as well as did the Copernican, it had wide and long-lived acceptance by scientists and philosophers, and, very importantly, it was more easily accommodated to the text of Scripture, which in a number of passages (Josh 10:12–13; Ps 104:5; Eccl 1:5) describes the earth as motionless and the sun as moving. For these reasons the Congregation of the Index suspended republication of Copernicus's De Revolutionibus Orbium until it was rendered more hypothetical. (It was republished four years later with the necessary corrections.) Galileo argued that Scripture was not designed to teach science. Cardinal Robert Bellarmine warned Galileo that without convincing scientific proof it was not permissible to teach on this issue against Scripture as interpreted by Church tradition. Galileo was ordered by the Inquisition not to teach or seek to prove the Copernican theory. Obeying the letter but not the spirit of the injunction, Galileo published A Dialogue on the Two Great World Systems (1632). He was brought before the Inquisition again (1633), was forced to abjure, and lived the rest of his life under house arrest, where he proceeded to publish perhaps his greatest work, Discourses Concerning Two New Sciences (1638). The Dialogue, however, remain banned until 1822. In 1979 Pope John Paul II conceded that the Church had erred in its treatment of Galileo. In 1984 all of the documents on the case in the Vatican archives were made public. See also Inquisition.

R. EMMET MCLAUGHLIN

Gall, St., ca. 560–after 615, one of St. Columbanus's twelve companions and exiled with him from Gaul. Settling in Switzerland, he spent the rest of his life converting the Alamani. The Benedictine Abbey of St. Gallen was established on the site of his hermitage a century after his death. Feast day: October 16. See also Columbanus, St.

Gallicanism (Lat., Gallus [Gaul], the ancient name of France), an ecclesiology, with roots already in the thirteenth century, that claimed for France the right to resist all but very restricted forms of papal intervention within its jurisdiction. The French kings had controlled the papacy in Avignon from 1303 to 1377. The subsequent Great Western Schism (1378–1417) was concluded only when the Council of Constance (1414–17) declared the supremacy of general councils over popes (conciliarism) and removed the three papal claimants. These events encouraged the French church to resist papal interventions. The state courts (parlements), basing themselves on the royal ordinance, the "Pragmatic Sanction of Bourges" (1438), interpreted this right of resistance rigorously.

The faculty of the University of Paris defended a more moderate version of Gallicanism even after the Council of Trent (1545–63), and under Louis XIV this version was formulated in the four articles of the "Declaration of 1682" of the Assembly of the Clergy of France: (1) rejection of the extreme parliamentary position that denied any papal intervention in temporal matters; (2) admission of papal authority but only subject to conciliar supremacy; (3) demand that popes respect the ancient canons and customs of the French church; (4) admission of papal primacy in matters of faith but denial of papal infallibility apart from the consent of the universal Church.

Gallicanism never proposed schism from the Roman see. Gallicanism became obsolete with the French Revolution, but the restoration of the monarchy in France in the nineteenth century revived its influence until secular democracy and the conciliar definition of papal infallibility at Vatican I (1870) removed its influence. See also ecumenical council; France, Catholicism in; primacy, papal; Vatican Council I.

BENEDICT M. ASHLEY

Gallican rite, a collective name for several non-Roman forms of liturgy found in Western Europe between the fourth and eighth centuries. Despite Rome's early importance as an ecclesiastical center, its liturgy was not immediately adopted by all other churches. Northern Italy, Gaul, Spain, and the British Isles developed indigenous liturgical traditions that differed markedly from those of Rome. Differences were especially evident in three areas: Eucharist, Baptism, and ordination. In Gallican Masses, for instance, the kiss of peace occurred before the eucharistic prayer (not after it, as at Rome) and the eucharistic prayer itself was largely variable (not invariable, as at Rome). Some Gallican baptismal rites included the ceremony of foot washing (unknown at Rome). Gallican ordinations included anointings (e.g., of the priest's hands) that were adopted only later at Rome. Although Charlemagne tried to abolish it, the Gallican rite survived as an important element in—and influence on—the Roman liturgy. See also rite.

gambling, the staking of money or other valuables on outcomes that are the product of chance. Gambling is in general morally permissible provided that the parties to this type of contract are reasonably equal, indulgence is moderate, there is no fraud involved, and the activity is legal. Gambling involves personal property, which may morally be disposed of as the individual wishes unless requirements of justice or charity should conflict with such disposition. Therefore, a person may not gamble if this endangers his or her family or prevents the person from discharging obligations. In no case may a person gamble with money or property that does not belong to her or him. Gambling may be sinful when no proportion exists between the amount wagered and the possibility of return. Disproportion is permissible, however, in cases where loss of the property may be considered an act of charity, as in fund-raising raffles or lotteries contributing to state revenue. Gambling, however, can be addictive. In that case, all forms, including even the latter, are to be discouraged.

Garabandal, Our Lady of (gah-rah-bahn-dahl'), a Marian title associated with a reported apparition in a mountain village in northwest Spain. On June 18, 1961, four young girls, led by twelve-year-old Conchita González, reported a vision of the archangel Michael, who announced that the Blessed Virgin Mary would appear to them beginning on July 2.

During the more than two thousand alleged apparitions, which lasted until 1965, the actions of the four children were filmed by Spanish, Italian, and British networks. Although no official judgment has been made regarding the authenticity of the apparitions, the Vatican did not accept the negative conclusions reached by a diocesan investigation conducted between 1962 and 1967. See also apparitions of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

Gardeil, Ambrose, 1859–1931, French Dominican theologian. He brought Thomism into modern French religious life. His work in apologetics and spiritual theology can be found in his book The Structure of the Soul and the Mystical Experience. In 1893 he cofounded the Revue Thomiste. See also Thomism.

Garrigou-Lagrange, Reginald (gahr-ee-goo'-lah-grahnj'), 1877–1964, French Dominican theologian and philosopher. After studying medicine in Bordeaux, he joined the Dominicans and studied under Ambrose Gardeil. From 1909 to 1960 he taught fundamental, dogmatic, and spiritual theology at the University of St. Thomas Aquinas in Rome ("Angelicum"), publishing over five hundred articles and books and often serving as a consultor to the Holy See. His thought centered on two issues he believed especially timely: (1) the need to ground theology in a realistic metaphysics rather than in idealistic and anti-intellectualist trends; and (2) the defense of the universal call of all Christians to the mystical life as the ordinary way of holiness.

Gaspar del Bufalo, St., 1786–1836, Italian priest, founder of the Society of the Precious Blood, an order dedicated to parish ministry, chaplaincies, and missionary work. He was canonized in 1954. Feast day: January 2. See also Precious Blood Fathers.

Gasparri, Pietro, 1852–1934, professor of canon law at the University of Paris and author of canonical treatises, including Treatise on Matrimony. He was cardinal, papal secretary of state (1914–30), and chair of the commission responsible for compiling 1917 Code of Canon Law. He negotiated the Lateran Treaty (1929) with the Italian government. See also Lateran Treaty.

Gasser, Vinzenz Ferrer (gahs'sair), 1809–79, Austrian prince-bishop of Brixen (Germany), influential theologian at Vatican I. A professor at the seminary in Brixen, Gasser was nominated prince-bishop by Franz Joseph I and approved by Pope Pius IX in 1856. As bishop, he established the Vincentinum seminary in Brixen and sought recognition of Catholicism as the exclusive religion in Tirol. A member of the Commission on Faith at Vatican I, he composed the first draft of the decree on papal infallibility, the first part of the second schema De Fide (Lat., "On Faith"), and proposed language in the decree on papal primacy defending the authority of local bishops. See also Vatican Council I.

Gaudete Sunday (Lat., gaudete, "rejoice"), the Third Sunday of Advent, so-called from the opening word of the Introit (the antiphon of the Roman Gradual). Gaudete, taken from the Latin translation of Phil 4:4, sets a tone of joyful expectation for the Lord's birth and Second Coming, as do the permitted rose-colored vestments. See also Laetare Sunday.

Gaudium et Spes (gou'dee-*oo*m et spez). See Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World.

Ge'ez (gayz), an ancient south Semitic language, the classical tongue of Ethiopian Christian literature and the official liturgical language of the Ethiopian Orthodox and Catholic churches. Ge'ez, observable in written form by the fourth century, is now a dead language, replaced as the Ethiopian vernacular by Amharic, another Semitic tongue, by the year 1000. Though Amharic has been the Ethiopian literary language since the sixteenth century, Christian works continued to be written in Ge'ez until more recent times. In the 1990s, Amharic is being gradually introduced into the Ethiopian liturgy. See also Ethiopian rite.

Gehenna (ge-hen'nah; Heb., ge'hinnom, "valley of Hinnom"), ravine south of Jerusalem that was the site of a cult of Moloch during the Israelite monarchy (2 Kgs 23:10; Jer 7:31–32). By the first century Gehenna came to symbolize a place of fiery torment for the wicked (Matt 5:22–30; 10:28; 23:33; Mark 9:43–47; Jas 3:6). See also hell.

Geiler von Kaisersberg, Johann, 1445–1510, greatest Catholic reform preacher in late medieval Germany, holding an endowed preachership in Strassburg from 1478 until his death. His sermons catalogue the vices, abuses, and crimes of both Church and society.

Geiselmann, Josef Rupert (gi'zehl-mahn), 1890–1970, German theologian. He followed the early Tübingen school approach to tradition and revelation as a constructive alternative to dominant Thomistic models of theology. On the basis of his careful historical studies of the Council of Trent (1545–63), he challenged the prevailing Catholic assumption that revelation is partly in Scripture and partly in revelation. In this regard he anticipated the teaching of Vatican II's Constitution on Divine Revelation (n. 10). See also Scripture and tradition.

Gelasian Sacramentary, a liturgical book containing presider's prayers for Eucharist, Baptism, ordination, and other services. The name "Gelasian" derives from L. Muratori, who in 1748 incorrectly attributed the book's contents to Pope Gelasius I (492–496). Several sacramentaries fall into the "Gelasian" category. The oldest of them (the "Old Gelasian") is preserved in a single manuscript produced in a convent near Paris ca. 750. Other manuscripts of the Gelasian category (so-called "Gelasians of the eighth century") were copied in Gaul later in that century. The Gelasian books follow the Church (not the civil) calendar, and most contain the text of the eucharistic prayer. See also sacramentary.

Gelasius I, St., d. 496, pope from 492 to 496. He is remembered for his strong stand against emperor and patriarch in the Acacian Schism (484–519) and for his defense of papal primacy in this context, which included the theory of the "two powers" or "two swords," so influential in the Middle Ages. Over a hundred letters or fragments and six theological treatises of his survive, including one against Pelagianism and four against Christological heresies. Neither the Gelasian Sacramentary, however, nor the Decretum Gelasianum are his. Gelasius was the first pope to be titled "Vicar of Christ," although the title was not exclusively attached to the pope until the pontificate of Eugenius III (1145–53). Feast day: November 21. See also Acacianism; primacy, papal.

Gelineau, Joseph, b. 1920, French Jesuit liturgist and composer, well-known for his translation and musical settings of the Psalter. Closely associated with the Centre de Pastorale Liturgique, he is professor of liturgy and musicology at the Institute Catholique in Paris.

general, a title for the highest superior of a religious institute, called in the Code of Canon Law (can. 622) the supreme moderator. There is a variety of combinations in which this title is used, e.g., among the Franciscans, minister general, for the Dominicans, master general, and for Augustinians and Carmelites, prior general. See also superior general.

general absolution, the sacramental forgiveness of sins within a ritual that does not require individualized confession of sins to a priest. This form of sacramental absolution became common in the Middle Ages. As Scholastic theologians focused more on individual confession of sin to a priest, general absolution was viewed alternatively as a sacrament, not a sacrament, or reserved only for instances in which a large number of people were in danger of death, e.g., during a plague or prior to a battle. In 1972 the Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith issued norms for general absolution which were incorporated into the revised rite of the sacrament of Penance (1973), and provide conferences of bishops with guidelines for the use of general absolution. See also absolution; confession, auricular; Reconciliation.

general chapter, the gathering of a religious institute that has ultimate authority within the institute or order. Canon 631 of the Code of Canon Law describes the scope and responsibilities of the general chapter. It "should be a true sign of . . . unity in love" and is to protect the institute's patrimony, promote renewal, elect superiors general, and publish norms for observance by the institute. Papally approved constitutions of the institute determine the composition of the chapter and its powers. General chapters are a remarkable instance of the collegial process in which all delegates to the chapter have equal voice in the chapter's affairs. See also chapter; superior general.

general confession, the confession of one's sins in a generic rather than a detailed way, e.g., all of one's sins of anger. The general acknowledgment that one is a sinner is found in the NT (cf. the "Our Father"; Rom 2:9–20; 1 John 1:8). A general confession of one's sinfulness and a desire for conversion played a major role in the origins of monasticism. The medieval addition of a confiteor (Lat.) to the Mass became a form of general confession. When frequent private confession was emphasized in the late medieval and post-Tridentine Church, general sacramental confession became part of Christian spirituality. Vatican II (1962–65) theology is ambiguous on general confession, due to the reevaluation of the nature of sin, the source of moral norms, the meaning of natural law, the role of experience in the formation of conscience, and the limits of the magisterium in setting moral norms. See also confession, auricular; Reconciliation.

General Instruction of the Roman Missal, a document on eucharistic celebration published in 1969 by the Sacred Congregation of Divine Worship and accompanying the Order of Mass. The 1975 edition contains minor changes. In eight chapters plus an appendix for the United States, the document treats eucharistic celebration under headings of structural elements and choices, offices and ministries, forms of celebration, arrangement of churches, and requisites for celebrating Mass. Rubrical material is presented in relation to theological and pastoral considerations. See also Roman Missal.

general intercessions. See Prayer of the Faithful.

general judgment. See judgment, general.

Genesius of Arles, St., d. ca. 303, martyr, patron saint of actors, lawyers, printers, secretaries, and stenographers. Although there is no doubt of his existence, what is known about him is probably legendary. He is said to have been a court reporter who left his profession in disgust over a sentence and was later beheaded. He was also thought to have been a comedian who, in the midst of an anti-Christian satire, converted to Christ and was beheaded. Feast day: August 25.

Geneviève, St., d.ca. 500, virginal patron saint of the city of Paris. Renowned for her charitable deeds, she is said to have averted Attila II and the Huns from sacking Paris in 451. Feast day: January 3. See also Paris.

genocide, the deliberate and methodical extermination of a particular human group. Strictly speaking, the term applies to the killing (Lat., cidium) of members of a race, nation, or ethnic minority (Gk., genos) only because they happen to belong to that group. However, the Convention on Genocide, ratified by the General Assembly of the United Nations, includes in its definition the violation of basic human rights of members of a group.

Among the unprincipled acts committed in a situation of total war and condemned as inexcusable, the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) singled out genocidal acts as "horrendous crimes" (Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, 1965, n. 79).

genuflection, the gesture of lowering oneself momentarily on the right knee, acknowledging divine presence. This gesture is made as one enters or leaves a church where Christ is present in the Blessed Sacrament.

George, St., d. ca. 303, legendary knight and martyr. Martyred probably under Diocletian, according to legend he was a Christian knight who killed a dragon that had been terrorizing the town of Sylene, Libya. As an exemplary knight he was very popular in the Middle Ages, especially among the Crusaders, and was included in the Golden Legend. He is the patron saint of England and of soldiers. Feast day: April 23.

Georgetown University, oldest Catholic institution of higher education in the United States. Founded in 1786 by a group of ex-Jesuits led by John Carroll, Georgetown began classes in 1792 as an academy to provide candidates for the ministry. Within its first decade, however, it became a college, offering a full range of courses to a student body that was national and even international in its character and pluralistic in its religious affiliation. In 1805, with the partial restoration of the Society of Jesus, the order was given the direction of the school. A decade later the college secured a federal charter.

In 1849 and 1870 the institution sponsored its first professional schools, in medicine and law respectively. Two presidents in the last three decades of the century, the Reverends Patrick Healy (1873–82) and Joseph Havens Richards (1888–98) attempted to convert these loosely connected schools into a university, with limited success. Healy reformed the curriculum and standards in all three schools and constructed a major facility to provide adequate housing for library, classrooms, laboratories, and undergraduates. Richards began graduate courses in the arts and sciences and built new facilities for the law and medical schools, including a hospital. A dental school and a nursing school were also established. In 1919 the newly founded School of Foreign Service offered the first program in the nation to prepare students for careers in diplomacy or international business. Ultimately two additional schools, Languages and Linguistics (1949) and Business Administration (1955), developed from the School of Foreign Service. Finally the School for Summer and continuing Education was organized in the 1950s.

The Healy Building at Georgetown University, Washington, D.C., the oldest Catholic university in the United States. It has been under the direction of Jesuits since 1805.

In the decade after World War II enrollment doubled to more than five thousand. Under the leadership of Reverends Edward Bunn (1952–64), Gerard Campbell (1964–69), and Robert Henle (1969–76), the university entered the modern world of higher education with the restructuring of schools and the introduction of professional standards. By the mid-1970s, enrollment had doubled again, to nearly twelve thousand, including women in all schools by 1969. The student body, which during the first half of the twentieth century had become overwhelmingly Catholic and regional (Northeast) in its composition was again truly national, international, and pluralistic (ethnically and religiously). During the administration of Timothy S. Healy (1976–89), the university achieved national prominence for the quality of its undergraduates, law school, certain medical research programs (e.g., the Lombardi Cancer Center), and special institutes (e.g., Kennedy Institute of Ethics). See also Catholicism and education; Healy, Timothy Stafford. R. EMMETT CURRAN

Georgian Byzantine Catholics, a group adhering to the Byzantine rite that was formed by Catholic missionaries working in Georgia, a traditionally Orthodox former Soviet republic on the eastern shore of the Black Sea.

In about 1230, Franciscan missionaries began to work among the remaining pagans in the Georgian kingdom. They were joined a few years later by the Dominicans. In 1329 Pope John XXII created a Latin diocese in Tbilisi, but no bishops were appointed to it after 1507, and the Catholic missions ended. In 1626 the Theatines were sent to work as missionaries among the Orthodox Georgians. They were replaced by the Capuchins in 1661.

In 1845, the Russian government, which had controlled Georgia since 1801, expelled the Capuchin missionaries. But in 1848, Czar Nicholas I agreed to the creation of a Latin diocese at Tiraspol with jurisdiction over Catholics in the vast southern regions of the empire, including Georgia.

A small community of Armenian Catholics existed in Georgia since the eighteenth century. But because the czars forbade Catholics to use the Byzantine rite and the Holy See did not promote its use among Georgians, no organized Georgian Byzantine Catholic Church ever existed. In 1920 it was estimated that of 40,000 Catholics in Georgia, 32,000 were Latins and the remainder of the Armenian rite.

A small Georgian Catholic parish has long existed in Constantinople (Istanbul). Twin male and female religious orders "of the Immaculate Conception" were founded there in 1861, but have since died out. See also Byzantine rite; Eastern Catholics and ecumenism; Eastern Catholics and Rome; Eastern churches; Eastern liturgies; Eastern rites.

Gerald of Aurillac, St. (aw'ree-yak), 855–909, count known for his personal piety, chastity, and gift of healing, as well as his defense of the poor. Feast day: October 13.

Gerard Majella, St., 1726–55, patron saint of mothers in childbirth. A tailor by trade, he joined the Redemptorists as a lay brother and became known for his extraordinary charity and spiritual gifts. Feast day: October 16.

Gerard of Brogne, St. (brohn' yuh), ca. 880–959, abbot of Brogne and monastic reformer. After rebuilding the oratory in Brogne and establishing it as a monastery, Gerard was commissioned to reform monasteries throughout France, following the ideals of Benedict of Aniane (d. 821), an abbot who reformed Benedictine life by making it more austere. Feast day: October 3. See also Benedict of Aniane, St.

Gerhoh of Reichersberg (gair'hoh uhv rik' uhrs-bairg), 1093–1169, German historian and ecclesiastical writer. A prolific polemicist for the papal side during the investiture controversy, he also began the Chronicle of Reichersberg and wrote moral and theological treatises. Highly symbolic, his writings on the antichrist influenced later medieval apocalyptic thinkers. See also investiture controversy.

Germain-des-Prés, St. See Saint-Germain-des-Prés.

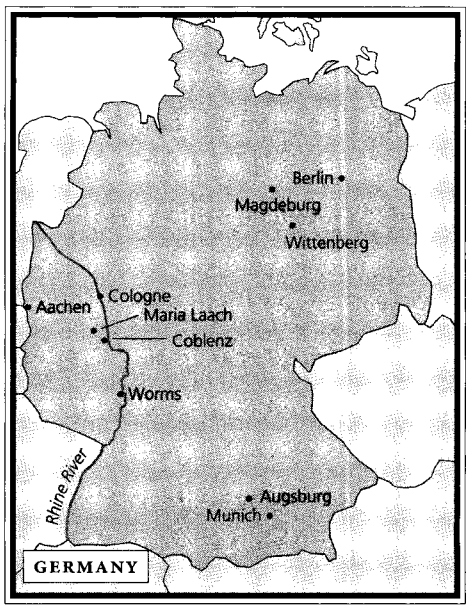
Germany, Catholicism in. The Catholic Church in Germany has been shaped by its history of close ties to German rulers and to principalities divided by religious confessions.

Early History: The Christian evangelization of the German tribes began in the second century in the regions conquered by the Romans. The great migrations of Germans, Goths, Vandals, and others after the third century into Gaul, Spain, and Italy largely eradicated this Christianity. Some Germanic tribes, notably the Visigoths, adopted Christianity in the form of Arianism, which held that Christ was not equal to God but was only the greatest of creatures. The conversion of the king of the Franks, Clovis I, to Catholic Christianity (A.D. 500) was of decisive importance. Franks along with the Alamannen, Bavarians, and Saxons formed the basis of an emerging empire. Influenced by Frankish and Irish missionaries, the Alamannen and Bavarians became Catholic.

A characteristic of Germanic Christianity was the system of proprietary churches. The dioceses, churches, and cloisters belonged to the king and the landlords, who also appointed the clergy. Later this system led to conflicts with Rome. The situation in which independence and influence were tied to the ownership of land led to the existence of ecclesiastical territories owned by the pope and the bishops. Boniface (d. 754) came from England as the "apostle to the Germans," and Charlemagne completed the Church's missionary activity and institutional organization. Boniface secured a close tie with Rome; Charlemagne accomplished the conversion of the Saxons and created the Reichskirche (Ger.), the church of the empire. His coronation as Holy Roman emperor (A.D. 800) established the continuity between the Roman Empire and the empire of the Franks, and created a newly integrated social and religious world of Europe and the West overseen by the emperor and the pope. The status of emperor gave the German kings the responsibility for the well-being of the papacy. The ties between the empire and the Church became even closer when Otto I (d. 973) named bishops to important imperial offices. These imperial bishops evolved over time into prince-bishops who ruled over a specific territories, an institutional practice that continued until 1803.



The German kings' claim that they had the right to appoint bishops to their offices led to the investiture controversy between Pope Gregory VII and Henry IV, which ended with the compromise of the Concordat of Worms (1122). Since then, the German church developed amid often hostile interaction between popes and emperors concerning the governance of Christianity. This process caused the gradual separation of the spiritual and secular authorities, something characteristic of the West in contrast to the East.

After the Reformation: The Reformation and its effects meant the end of the unity of Western Christianity that was attained during the Middle Ages. Ruling families and free states in Germany became Protestant. The Peace of Augsburg in 1555 resulted in the recognition of Catholic and Protestant regions, which determined the confessional map of Germany's states until the Second World War. The Counter-Reformation deepened the chasm between the Catholic and Protestant churches. In the Catholic regions the imperial-ecclesial structure was maintained until secularization in 1803, a structure that limited the influence of Rome upon German affairs.

After the dissolution of the Holy Roman Empire in 1806, Rome attempted a new ecclesiastical organization through concordats with the newly formed states. Romanticism and the Restoration of the nineteenth century led to renewal in Catholic theology, education, monasticism, and other areas and to the mobilization of the laity and the formation of lay associations. The new founding of the empire in 1871 by Bismarck, with the exclusion of Austria and the establishment of a Protestant realm, made Catholics a minority. Rome's efforts toward restoration and centralization, as well as measures of the First Vatican Council (1869–70), led to splitting off of the Old Catholics from Rome and also to the Kulturkampf (Ger., "culture struggle" [against the Church]), in which Bismarck was eventually defeated. The political party of the Catholics, the Center party, played an important parliamentary role, especially during the Weimar Republic (begun in 1918). The Vatican's concordats with Bavaria (1924), Prussia (1929), and Baden (1932) and with the Third Reich (1933) still determine the relationship between Church and state in Germany and influence features of Catholic organizations. The Third Reich of Adolf Hitler dissolved the Center party and all Catholic associations and planned the annihilation of the Church after "the final victory." The institutional Church's opposition to the Third Reich unfortunately remained weak.

World War II to the Present: With the end of the Second World War, Church life in West Germany flourished once again. This vitality manifested itself in many ways: the rebuilding of destroyed churches and church buildings, the construction of many new churches, the establishment of new educational institutions, the emergence of lay associations, the increase of vocations to the priesthood and religious life, and the development of an internationally respected theology. Collection of the church tax by the state and governmental agencies provided the financial resources for theological faculties at universities, religious education at public schools, and church hospitals, schools, and preschools. Given the political-geographical configuration of West Germany, the Federal Republic of Germany, Catholics played an important role, not the least through the Christian Democratic party, which united Catholic and Protestant Christians in one party. In East Germany, the former German Democratic Republic, Catholics formed for historical reasons a small minority, 5 percent of the population, living under Communist rule.

After the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) a series of synods were held in Germany. The council awakened lay interest in the study of theology. Disillusionment regarding the stalled reform of the Church and social uncertainties mirrored in the student revolution of 1968 have generated opposition groups within the Church, the "church from below." Furthermore, general developments in Western society and Rome's perceived program of restoration have led to a drastic decline in participation in the Church, a decline of vocations to the priesthood and religious life, and an increasing number of departures from the Church.

The 27 million Catholics of West Germany live in twenty-three dioceses. In light of the recent unification of Germany some new dioceses are being planned. In 1990, in former West Germany, 22 percent of the Catholics attended Mass weekly, but in the same year over 90,000 Catholics left the Church. Reliable studies of Catholic belief and Church life in the former East Germany are not yet available. See also Boniface, St., Kulturkampf; Nazism; Reformation, the.

HERMAN J. POTTMEYER

Gerosa, St. Vincentia, 1784–1847, Italian-born cofounder of the Sisters of Charity of Lovere, an institute devoted to the poor and the sick, and to the education of children. Feast day: June 28.

Gerson, Jean, 1363–1429, theologian, chancellor of the University of Paris and conciliarist during the Great Schism, and spiritual author. Succeeding his teacher Pierre d'Ailly as chancellor of the University in 1395, Gerson was an important figure among the conciliarists who strove to heal the Great Schism in the West (1378–1417). Arguing for the authority of council over pope in numerous writings, he advocated the resignation or deposing of the rival popes and conciliar election of a new pope. This strategy failed at the Council of Pisa (1409), resulting only in three papal claimants, but succeeded at the Council of Constance (1414–18), where Gerson headed the French delegation and made a stirring defense of the council's right to act without a pope presiding. Gerson spent his remaining years at Lyons concentrating on spiritual and pastoral writings. Writing both in Latin and French, Gerson adapted speculative theology for a more general audience. See also conciliarism; Constance, Council of; Great Schism; Pisa, Council of.

Gertrude the Great, St., ca. 1256–ca. 1302, German nun and mystic. From age five, Gertrude lived at the convent of Helfta in Thuringia, which also housed a kindred mystic, Mechtilde of Hackeborn. Gertrude's mystical revelations are related in Revelations and her Spiritual Exercises. Feast day: November 16.

Gethsemani, Abbey of Our Lady of, monastery of Cistercians of the Strict Observance (Trappists), founded in 1848 from the Breton Abbey of Melleray, and located near Bardstown, Kentucky. With six foundations in the United States and South America since 1944, Gethsemani Abbey is known chiefly as a retreat center and as the home and burial place of the influential spiritual writer, Thomas Merton (d. 1968). See also Merton, Thomas; Trappists.

Gibbons, James, 1834–1921, American cardinal-archbishop. Born in Baltimore but raised in Ireland, he returned to New Orleans in 1853. Educated by the Sulpicians in Baltimore, he was ordained in 1861. As secretary of Archbishop Martin John Spalding of Baltimore, he was named vicar apostolic of North Carolina in 1868. In 1872 he was appointed bishop of Richmond, and in 1878 coadjutor to Archbishop James Roosevelt Bayley of Baltimore, whom he succeeded that year.

In 1884 Gibbons was appointed to preside over the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore and in 1886 was named a cardinal, the second in the United States. At that time he formed a warm friendship with Archbishop John Ireland of St. Paul, John J. Keane, rector of The Catholic University of America, and Denis O'Connell, rector of the American College in Rome. Together they led the "liberal" party against a formidable coalition of conservative bishops, such as Archbishop Michael Corrigan of New York, Germans generally, and the Jesuits in particular, in a series of controversies involving the Knights of Labor, demands for German autonomy, the school controversy, the Catholic University, and "Americanism," the last condemned by Rome as a heresy in 1899.

Gibbons survived the fall of the liberal party to continue as the recognized leader and spokesman of the Catholic Church in the United States until his death in 1921. He was a friend of presidents and perhaps the most admired American Catholic churchman of his time. He was also a noted author; his Faith of Our Fathers (1877) proved the most popular apologetical work in the English-speaking world. See also Americanism; Baltimore, councils of; United States of America, Catholicism in the.

THOMAS SPALDING

Giberti, Gian Matteo, 1495–1543, bishop, reformer, and member of the Oratory of Divine Love. After his appointment as bishop of Verona, he was one of the model bishops who reformed the Catholic Church in the sixteenth century. At Worms (1540) he sought to heal the breach with the Protestants. See also Oratory of Divine Love.

gifts of the Holy Spirit, unmerited spiritual favors or benefits bestowed by the Spirit. They are seven in number according to the Catholic tradition that is based on the numbering in the Septuagint version of Isa 11:1–3, which added piety to the list of six gifts in the Hebrew version: wisdom, understanding, counsel, fortitude, knowledge, and fear of the Lord.

Catholic tradition recognizes the full manifestation of these gifts in Jesus at his baptism and a subsequent bestowal of the gifts of the Holy Spirit on the disciples of Jesus at Pentecost. The Second Vatican Council (1963–65) has spoken of these gifts as bestowed on the members of the Church for the sake of the Church's vitality.

In the early Church it was understood that a Christian was called to grow beyond a minimal observance of the commandments of God and the Church to a life lived more fully under the influence of the Holy Spirit. Greek Fathers of the Church wrote about the gifts of the Holy Spirit without concern for their number. However, the Latin Fathers were specific about these gifts as seven. Pope Gregory the Great (d. 604), influenced by the writings of Augustine of Hippo (d. 430), laid the foundations for a theology of the gifts of the Holy Spirit that was more fully articulated in the Middle Ages by Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274). Aquinas saw the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit as distinct from virtues. Moreover, he described the gifts as the way the Christian can be habitually open to the influence of the Holy Spirit.

Mystical theologians have written of the gifts of the Holy Spirit as disposing a person to be responsive and docile to the work of the Holy Spirit, who is the agent of mystical contemplation in the human person. See also charism; fear of God; fortitude; fruits of the Spirit; Holy Spirit; wisdom.

PATRICIA M. VINJE

Gilbert of Poitiers, also known as Gilbert Poretta, ca. 1075–1154, theologian, bishop of Poitiers from 1142 to 1154. After studies with Bernard of Chartres, Anselm of Laon, and Peter Abelard, Gilbert taught at Chartres for about twenty years, serving as chancellor from 1126 to 1137. Gilbert was a leader in the struggle to establish theology as a distinct science within the school curriculum. His teaching and writings, especially his commentaries on Boethius's theological works (Opuscula sacra), were widely read even in the thirteenth century and influenced the development of ideas about Christology and the Trinity. Accused of tritheism, Gilbert was cleared of all charges both at a papal consistory (1147) and at the Council of Reims (1148).

Gilbert of Sempringham, St., 1083–1189, founder of the (now extinct) Gilbertine order, the only medieval religious order originating from England. Gilbert's order, while starting with only seven women, grew to include men and lay brothers and sisters. Feast day: February 4.

Giles, St. (Lat., "Aegidius"), hermit of perhaps the eighth century. Known only by legend, he was patron saint of the poor and of the physically disabled; his shrine at Saint-Gilles near Arles was a pilgrimage center throughout the Middle Ages. Feast day: September 1.

Giles of Rome, ca. 1243–1316, Augustinian Hermit, theologian, and bishop. A student of Thomas Aquinas at Paris, he was elected Augustinian prior general in 1292 and in 1295 was appointed archbishop of Bourges. He wrote numerous philosophical and theological works; his most famous is On the Rule of Princes (1285), which he wrote for his precocious pupil the future King Philip IV of France. In another work influential for the developing papal response to regal claims, On the Power of the Supreme Pontiff, he ardently defended papal dominion over all things, spiritual and temporal. Members of his order were urged to follow his teaching. See also Augustinian Hermits.

Gillespie, Eliza, also known as Mother Mary of St. Angela, 1824–87, American educator. Founder of the Sisters of Holy Cross, she administered St. Mary's College, Notre Dame, Indiana (1855–70, 1878–87). During the Civil War she organized the sisters into a nursing corps and established military hospitals. Gillespie was the principal founder of the publication Ave Maria (1865). See also Sisters of Holy Cross.

Gillis, James M., 1876–1957, Paulist priest and journalist. Born in Boston, he studied for the diocesan priesthood before joining the Paulist Fathers, for whom he was ordained in 1901. After teaching for several years in the Paulist seminary, Gillis served as a missionary before becoming editor of The Catholic World in 1922. He wrote a widely circulated newspaper column, "Sursum Corda: What's Right with the World," lectured regularly on NBC's "The Catholic Hour," and wrote numerous books and pamphlets on religious and controversial questions. Gillis was an acute critic of modern literature and a strong political conservative. He resigned as editor of The Catholic World in 1948.

Gilson, Etienne, 1884–1978, French philosopher and leading scholar of medieval thought. A professor at various European and North American universities, he founded the Institute of Mediaeval Studies in Toronto (1929) that achieved pontifical status in 1939 and remains important for the study of medieval culture. Born in Paris and trained at the Sorbonne, he came to the study of the Middle Ages through his graduate work on the medieval antecedents of Cartesian philosophy. Although he wrote important accounts of the thought of Augustine and of the mystical theology of Bernard of Clairvaux, his great love was for the study of the thirteenth century, specifically the thought of Thomas Aquinas. Because of the centrality of the act of existence (Lat., esse) for Aquinas, Gilson provocatively characterized Thomist thought as "existentialist," in contrast to the alleged "essentialism" of other medieval philosophers. Such works as The Christian Philosophy of Saint Thomas Aquinas remain essential reading for students of the Middle Ages. An overarching notion in Gilson's scholarship is "Christian philosophy," which emphasizes the harmony of reason and revelation. Christian philosophy is a sapiential endeavour; reason's search for the highest truth, which will fufill the deepest aspirations of the human person, can be successful only under the guidance of faith. See also Thomism.

Glenmary Home Missioners, society of diocesan priests (Glmy.). In 1936, Father William Howard Bishop proposed a plan for a society of priests, brothers and sisters to work in counties of the United States that had no resident priests. The Home Missioners of America, as the society of priests is formally called, was established in 1939. With headquarters and a major seminary at Glendale, Ohio, and a research center in Atlanta, Georgia, the society establishes parishes and works to bring them to the point of being able to support a resident priest. Then the parish is returned to the diocese and the Glenmary member moves on.

Gloria in Excelsis (gloh'ree-ah in eks-chel'sees; Lat., "glory in the highest"), words beginning the brief hymn of the angels to the shepherds after the birth of Jesus (Luke 2:14). They also serve as the opening verse of the Gloria in the Mass.

Glorious Mysteries of the Rosary. See Mysteries of the Rosary.

glory of God, an expression that can be understood in two senses: as the reality of God and as creation's appropriate acknowledgment of God. In the OT, God is depicted as majestic and filled with power, frequently conveyed in the images of fire and light, for example, in the burning bush, on Mount Sinai, and in Moses's tent (Exod 3:1–6; 24:17; 33:18–23). The NT sustains this imagery, for example, in the infancy narrative (Luke 1:35, 79; 2:9) and the accounts of Jesus' Transfiguration (Mark 9:2–8). Also, Jesus speaks of revealing the Father's glory (John 17:1, 4–5). This understanding of glory as the divine reality is complemented by the sense of giving glory as the fitting act of creation before God. At Jesus' birth, the angels declare "Glory to God in the highest" (Luke 2:14). All people should give glory and praise to God (Luke 17:18; Acts 12:23; Rev 4:9–11). In sum, "the glory of God" expresses the wondrous mystery of God as well as God's will to draw all of creation into this mystery. See also creation; God.

gloss, a word or words inserted between the lines or in the margin of a text to explain difficult or foreign words; also used more broadly of commentary, especially the medieval glossa ordinaria (Lat.), consisting principally of comments on Scripture from patristic authors. These developed into full-scale compilations and were called "the bible of Scholasticism." Gloss is also used to mean comments on canon law.

Glossa Ordinaria, (glah'sah ohr-dee-nah'ree-ah; Lat., "ordinary interpretation"), the standard gloss or commentary on the Latin Vulgate and an important medieval reference tool for the interpretation of the Bible. Drawn from the writings of important Latin patristic and Carolingian authors, glosses are both interlinear and marginal, and of varying lengths. Typically, the layout of the manuscript page would distinguish clearly between the biblical text itself and interpretive comment: the biblical text might be larger in size, centered, even marked off in different ink, thus showing its greater authority.

Details of the evolution of the Glossa remain shrouded in mystery; the wrongful ascription of the marginal gloss to Walafrid Strabo (d. 849), a German abbot, is a late medieval theory. The Glossa took shape over the course of the first half of the twelfth century, due to the efforts of scholars in northern France; the exact contribution of individual scholars is obscure. The fact that the Glossa had its origin in the leading region of theological inquiry in the High Middle Ages ensured its subsequent prominence. More than three thousand manuscripts of the Glossa are extant. See also Scripture, interpretation of.

glossolalia (Gk., glossa, "tongue," "language"; lalein, "speak"), the phenomenon of speaking in a "language" not learned in a human way. It is found in almost all religious traditions, particularly in primitive forms of worship and especially as a group phenomenon. It does not specifically occur in the OT, but in the NT it is mentioned in Acts 2:1–13; 8:9–25 (implicitly); 10:11–18; and 19:1–7. In Acts glossolalia is always a group phenomenon; it is temporary and it takes place as a symbol of God's approval of the Christian community taking a new step in its missionary activity. Paul discusses glossolalia at length in 1 Cor 12–14. Here, in contrast to Acts, it is an individual prayer/prophecy gift that is under the control of the recipient and is permitted to be used with care at prayer meetings (1 Cor 14:28–40). Paul prefers an interpreter to be present. Glossolalia is also mentioned in the longer ending of Mark (16:15–18), which is not considered authentic. Here the term "new tongues" is used and the gift appears to enable the missionary to communicate with persons whose language he or she does not know. Glossolalia has been attributed to a number of saints in the Catholic Church, e.g., Teresa of Ávila and Alphonsus Liguori. It has occurred as a group phenomenon in a number of revivalist movements, Catholic and other Christian, throughout the Church's history. Whereas there may be a genuine gift consequent upon a private or communal spiritual experience, synthetic glossolalia occurs frequently with negative results, such as regression of the ego, dependence on the authority figure who introduced the recipient to "tongues," elitism, histrionic behavior, and uninhibited euphoria. Linguistic researchers (using numerous tape recordings) conclude that glossolalia is not a true language but rather "play words" or partially formed speech. Considerable anthropological research has been conducted on this subject and its findings suggest that it may be a type of induced ecstasy. Scholars differ in their appraisal of personalities prone to glossolalia. Some find that they are balanced, but others find that they often exhibit hostility toward authority, tendencies toward dependency, suggestibility, inferiority, and a desire to compensate for feelings of isolation. Those who have a more positive approach to glossolalia see it as a prayer speech that opens up new realms of spiritual joy and redemptive experience.

Bibliography

Mills, Watson E. Speaking in Tongues: A Guide to Research on Glossolalia. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1986.

J. MASSYNGBAERDE FORD

gluttony, inordinate indulgence in food or drink. Desire for food and drink, essential to human beings, must be moderated by the virtue of temperance. Gluttony, the vice opposed to temperance, consists in the habitual, inordinate enjoyment of food and drink, including eating or drinking too often, too much, too voraciously, or too fastidiously. Gluttony does not indicate a serious moral disorder unless it becomes an obstacle to one's fulfillment of serious obligations, health, or love of God. Gluttony is the source of other faults, such as mental torpidity, excessive speech, loud behavior, and the like. See also capital sins.

Gnosticism (Gk., gnosis, "knowledge"), a system of religious belief according to which salvation depends upon a singular knowledge or inner enlightenment about God, which liberates a person from the ignorance and evil that characterize the created order. While the historical origins of Gnosticism remain unclear, it is evident that Gnosticism was present almost at the very beginning of Christianity itself. Its teachers (e.g., Basilides, Marcion, and Valentinus) denied the full humanity of Jesus Christ, refused to acknowledge the validity of the entire OT and the NT, and rejected the authority of the Church and its tradition. Our knowledge of Gnosticism at the time of the early Church comes from the writings of the Church Fathers (e.g., Irenaeus) and the discovery in 1945 of fourth-century Gnostic texts at Nag Hammadi, Egypt.

Though Gnosticism has assumed different specific forms and has been embraced by a variety of distinct religious groups, it possesses basic traits. It is dualistic, regarding human life as imprisoned in a creation controlled by sinister forces, especially a semidivine being (the demiurge), and yet possessing a yearning for a truth and goodness outside of space and time. It is soteriological, maintaining that there exists an utterly transcendent God who has willed to send a bearer of divine enlightenment into the (fallen) created order, so that those human beings who choose to receive this special knowledge or revelation can be led out of the evil material reality and into the kingdom of truth and goodness. It is sectarian, distinguishing between the saved, those people who have received divine illumination, and the damned, those who continue to live in ignorance. It is syncretistic, including ideas and practices from various, even divergent, philosophical and religious traditions (e.g., Hellenistic mystery cults, Jewish cabalism, Iranian dualism, Babylonian and Egyptian mythology, and Christian scriptures and rituals). See also Docetism.

ROBERT A. KRIEG

godparent, a fully initiated Catholic Christian who represents the faith community and assists the catechumen throughout the initiation process. In the case of infant baptism, godparents pledge to support the parents or guardians in their role of Christian formation. Godparents are chosen by the catechumens or by the parents or guardians of the child to be baptized. The godparents should be mature (at least sixteen years old, unless another age is determined by the diocese and/or pastor). A baptized and believing Christian not belonging to the Catholic Church may be chosen as one of the godparents, but the Catholic godparent must meet the above requirements. It is the responsibility of the godparents to show the candidates how to practice the gospel in personal and social life, to sustain the candidates in moments of hesitancy and anxiety, to bear witness, and to guide the candidates' progress in the baptismal life (Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults, n. 11). See also catechumen; catechumenate; sponsor.

Gog and Magog, distant enemies of the people of God. In Ezek 38–39 Gog is chief prince of the land of Magog. Both are otherwise unidentified. The land lies situated to the north of Israel. In Rev 20:8 Gog and Magog are two nations at the end of the earth mustered by Satan after Christ's millennial reign.

GOD

God is the supreme and supremely personal Source and Creator of the universe, revealed in creation and in the events of salvation history (covenant, prophecy, the Incarnation of Jesus Christ, and the ongoing presence of the Holy Spirit), and object of religious devotion and subject matter of theology.

The specifically Christian way of speaking of God is by means of the doctrine of the Trinity. The doctrine of the Trinity is not one doctrine among others but lies at the center of Christian faith. It affirms and summarizes the most profound convictions of Christian believers and also determines the systematic structure of the whole of Christian dogmatics. At its root, the doctrine of the Trinity expresses what Christians believe about who God is, namely, the eternal, loving, personal source of all of reality, who created the world and all in it for loving union with God through the person of Jesus Christ. In this respect the doctrine of the Trinity also expresses what Christians believe about the nature of the world and of the human person and so comprises a comprehensive theological perspective on all of reality. In short, the doctrine of the Trinity affirms, first, that it belongs to the nature of God to be in communion with all persons and all creatures of the earth, a communion that is brought about by redemption through Jesus Christ and the ongoing power and presence of the Holy Spirit; second, that all of reality is deeply personal since it is created by a personal God and that it is the destiny of human persons to live in authentic communion with God, with other human beings, and with all the creatures and goods of the earth.

Despite its centrality and indispensability, once the doctrine of the Trinity was formulated in the late fourth century and refined in the Middle Ages in both Eastern and Western Christianity, it largely passed to the margins of Christian consciousness, particularly in Latin Christianity. There are many reasons for this, explored below, but Catholic theologian Karl Rahner (d. 1984) has pointed out that for many Christians, were the doctrine of the Trinity to be removed or even proved false, little or nothing of their faith or piety would change. In effect, Rahner argued, many Christians are, practically speaking, unitarians, even though Christian faith is irreducibly trinitarian.

ORIGINS OF THE DOCTRINE OF THE TRINITY

It was common in neo-Scholastic manuals of dogmatic theology to cite texts such as Gen 1:26, "Let us make humankind in our image, according to our likeness" (see also Gen 3:22; 11:7; Isa 6:2–3), as proof of a plurality in God. Today, however, scholars generally agree that there is no doctrine of the Trinity as such in either the OT or the NT. However, the foundations for what later became this doctrine are indeed found in Scripture.

The OT depicts God as the Father of Israel and personifies God with terms such as Word (Heb., dabar), Spirit (ruah), Wisdom (hokmah), and Presence (shekinah). While it would go far beyond the intention and thought-forms of the OT to suppose that a late-fourth-century or thirteenth-century Christian doctrine can be found there, still it is consistent with the general tradition of Christian interpretation of Scripture to see in the ancient texts of the OT precedents and foreshadowings of the revelation of God in Jesus Christ.

Likewise, the NT does not contain an explicit doctrine of the Trinity; however, later doctrinal formulations owe a more obvious debt to NT texts. In antiquity, God and Father were synonyms; God the Father is source of all of creation (Gk., Pantokrator). Early liturgical and creedal fragments refer to God as the "Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," and Paul instructs his readers to offer all praise to God through Jesus Christ and indeed to do all things in the name of Jesus Christ. Some texts mention the names of both Father and Son, or God and Christ (Rom 4:24; 8:11; 2 Cor 4:14; Col 2:12; 1 Tim 2:5–6; 6:13; 2 Tim 4:1) and a few link the names of Father, Son, and Spirit (or God, Christ, and Spirit). The Roman Catholic eucharistic liturgy uses the text from 2 Cor 13:14 to open the celebration of the Mass: "May the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Spirit be with you." The baptismal formula of Matt 28:19 ("Baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit") is an obvious trinitarian text, though many exegetes today suppose that this text did not originate with Jesus but was a later interpolation. There is the description of Jesus' baptism in Matt 3:16–17, during which God speaks from the heavens and the Spirit rests on Jesus. There are what appear to be prayer fragments in Gal 4:6 and Rom 8:15 (the Spirit praying in us calls God Abba). Other trinitarian texts include 1 Cor 6:11; 12:4–6; 2 Cor 1:21–22; 1 Thess 5:18–19; and Gal 3:11–14. The text from Eph 1:3–14 deserves special mention; it summarizes the basic providential plan of salvation initiated by God, fulfilled in Jesus Christ, and consummated in the Holy Spirit. It describes this plan as an "economy" (Gk., oikonomia, providential plan or management) foreordained by God through which God destines all creatures for ultimate and eternal union with God. Jesus Christ is the revelation of God's economy, and the Spirit is the active power bringing God's providential plan to fruition and completion. Finally, the high-priestly prayer of Jesus in John 17 contains important ingredients of what later theology will develop as God the Father's special relationship with Jesus Christ.

In sum, a number of NT texts bear witness to Jesus Christ and the Spirit as essential to our salvation. The pattern of these texts is mediatory; God's salvation and revelation are made known through Jesus Christ and in or by the power of God's Holy Spirit. Moreover, it is important to keep in mind that what the later doctrine of the Trinity attempts to express is the whole mystery of salvation through Christ. Thus, in order to avoid a "proof-text" approach, biblical texts regarded as authentically trinitarian should not be limited solely to those that contain three divine names. Every shred of testimony to the saving power of God realized through Christ belongs to the fount of biblical witness to the mystery of the triune God.

It would be anachronistic to say that the NT necessarily implies what will later be expressed with metaphysical refinement as a Trinity of three coequal divine Persons who share the same substance. While it is entirely legitimate to see later dogmatic development as springing forth from the witness of the Scriptures, the language of the Bible remains economic, that is, rooted in the concrete history and stories of salvation and redemption. The vocabulary of metaphysics cannot be found in Scripture. Because of this, there are theologians who regard all postbiblical doctrinal developments as arbitrary or even aberrant. For them, one cannot go beyond the language and concepts of the Bible. The Catholic approach, however, has always been to see doctrinal developments as legitimate provided one can show the connection between the Scripture, which is normative, and doctrine, which is derivative. Doctrine can never replace Scripture; the Bible remains the authoritative witness to God's providential plan of salvation.

The early liturgical practice of Christians is another important source for the origins of trinitarian doctrine. Although Christian prayer is largely an adaptation of Jewish prayer, it was new to offer prayer to God through Jesus Christ, in his name, by the power of the Holy Spirit. The mediatory pattern of the new doxologies is well attested in the Letters of Paul and in those attributed to Paul (see Eph 5:20; 1 Cor 15:57; Col 3:17; Rom 1:8; 16:27; 7:25: 2 Cor 1:20; Heb 13:15; 1 Pet 4:11). The earliest liturgical texts do not refer to the Holy Spirit; however, the early Church was very much aware that the power for prayer came from the Spirit. Rom 8:15 and Gal 4:6 are evidence that Christians understood themselves to be called "in the Spirit" to new relationship to the God of Jesus Christ: "And because you are children, God has sent the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, crying, 'Abba! Father!'" The eucharistic prayers (anaphorae) duplicate the mediatory pattern of prayer; all praise and thanksgiving were offered to God through Jesus Christ.

Christian Baptism was an exception. The text of Matt 28:19b to baptize in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit is unusual because of the prepositions ("and . . . and"). Even if the command to baptize cannot be traced back to Jesus himself, it undoubtedly reflects the Church's early baptismal practice. The candidate was asked a triple set of questions: "Do you believe in God the Father the Almighty? Do you believe in Jesus Christ? Do you believe in the Holy Spirit?" The candidate "handed back" (Lat., redditio) what had been "handed over" (traditio) by affirming each portion of the creed. The interrogation was followed by a triple immersion in water. Early Christian creeds were not the full-blown, antiheretical summaries of faith and doctrine that emerged in the fourth century and thereafter, but collections of biblical and apostolic teaching that were fashioned for baptismal practice. The creed was a "symbol" (symbolum), a sign of the God into whose name one was initiated.

DEVELOPMENT OF TRINITARIAN DOCTRINE

In the immediate post-NT period of the Apostolic Fathers, there were no attempts to speculate about the relationship between God and Christ, Father and Son. The second-century Apologists, however, identified the preexistent Christ mentioned in the prologue of John's Gospel with the Logos (Word) of Greek philosophy. Justin Martyr (d. ca. 165) used the Stoic distinction between the immanent word (Gk., logos endiathetos) and expressed word (logos prophorikos) to explain a two-stage theory of the Incarnate Word. In the third century, Monarchianism (monē archē, "one principle"), which upheld the absolute unity of God and the sole divinity of God the Father, arose in reaction to Logos Christology. Sabellius, whose name is linked with "Modalism," believed that God's being could manifest itself in different modalities in history, such as the person of Jesus Christ, but that these historical modes of existence did not affect God's being as such. The great Eastern theologian Origen (d. 254) was responsible for the idea of an eternal generation of the Son within the being of God; for him, the Son is a distinct hypostasis (person) who always resided with God. In the West, the lawyer and theologian Tertullian (d. ca. 225) conceived of the three divine Persons as a kind of plurality in God's being.

It was Arius, the priest from Alexandria, around whom the greatest controversies over the status of Christ took place. Around 320 Arius wrote a public letter claiming that Jesus Christ was not divine in the same sense that God (Father) was divine; Jesus Christ was the highest of creatures, but still a creature who had a beginning. Arius's argument was stunningly simple: God (Father) is absolutely transcendent; God's essence (Gk., ousia) cannot be shared by another; therefore, God and Christ cannot be "of the same substance." If they were of the same substance, there would be two gods. Therefore, Christ is subordinate to God. The slogan of Arianism, "there was when he [the Son] was not [in existence]," meant that Jesus Christ was begotten of God in time, not from all eternity. One of the factors that allowed Arianism to evolve into such a vital movement was the fact that the Church's mediatory prayer at this time, along with numerous biblical texts (e.g., Prov 8:22: "The Lord created me at the beginning . . . ") seemed, at least on the face of it, to support Arius's position. Arius's views provoked Christian theologians to ask new questions about the status of Jesus Christ with respect to God. If Christ was God's mediator, was he then "less than" God? If he was less than God, could he be the Savior?

To refute Arius, the Council of Nicaea (325) taught that Christ is not created but is homoousios (Gk., "of the same substance") with God. Although from one perspective this word settled an immediate problem, few in the Church were happy with it. Greek theologians protested that the term homoousios was illegitimate because it was not biblical, and, moreover, it could be interpreted to mean that God and Christ are numerically identical (thus blurring any distinction between them). Some suggested that the word homoiousios ("of similar substance") be used instead, but this could be interpreted as subordinating Christ to God. In any case, Arius had pushed Christian theology in the direction of ontology: what would it mean to say that Christ is "same in being" with God?

Athanasius (d. 373), who is considered the great defender of Nicene orthodoxy, wrote several tracts against Arius basically arguing that since Christ is essential to our salvation, he must be divine. Athanasius had a limited philosophical vocabulary and made his arguments primarily on the basis of his reading of the Scriptures. Late in the fourth century the Cappadocians Basil of Caesarea (d. 379), Gregory of Nyssa (d. 394), and Gregory of Nazianzus (d. 390) formulated the classic expression of orthodox trinitarian doctrine: the one God exists in three equal persons. Their teaching made it possible for the Council of Constantinople (381) to affirm the divinity of the Holy Spirit, which up to that point had nowhere been clearly stated, not even in Scripture. The Cappadocians regularized the philosophical vocabulary of trinitarian doctrine by distinguishing clearly between hypostasis (Gk., "particular person") and ousia ("common substance or nature"). Further, they distinguished between being begotten (gennesia) and being created (genesia). Jesus Christ the Son was begotten, not created, which placed him on the side of God, not of creatures. The Cappadocians also maintained the biblical and liturgical sense of God (Father) as the monarch, the sole originating principle and source of all that is, including source of Son and Spirit. Godhood is the same as God's fatherhood; everything originates with God the Father, is brought into being through the Son, and is perfected by the Holy Spirit.

The Arianism of the early fourth century had evolved into various forms by the time of Cappadocians, most notably, Eunomianism. Eunomius believed that he knew the definition of God's essence to be "Unbegottenness." Eunomius's argument about the inferiority of the Son was simple to state but enormously difficult to refute: The Father is Unbegotten; the Son is Begotten; therefore they do not share the same substance of divinity; and therefore the Son is less than God. Unlike Eunomius, who claimed to know the name of God's essence, the Cappadocians were filled with respect for the absolute unknowability of the inaccessible divine essence. In order to refute Eunomius, Gregory of Nazianzus argued that "Unbegottenness" cannot be the name of the divine essence. No one knows the definition of the divine essence. Not even the word "Father" names God's hidden essence. Indeed, Gregory argued, "Father" is the name of a relation, namely, the relation of God to Christ. In effect, the two Gregories and Basil argued (against Eunomius) that God and Christ, Father and Son, do share the same divine substance because what makes God to be God is not to be Unbegotten, but to be uniquely personal as Father, Son, and Spirit. This brilliant move made the first full-fledged trinitarian doctrine possible. The closest we can get to defining the divine Persons is indirect and oblique, depicting their origin: God the Father comes from no one; God the Son comes from the Father; God the Spirit comes from the Father through the Son.

The emergence of a trinitarian doctrine of God's fatherhood altered what it had meant up to that point. In the Bible and in early creeds and liturgical prayers, God and Father were synonyms. The Cappadocian teaching added the meaning that God is the eternal Father (Begetter) of the eternal Son. God the Father could still be thought of as the monarch, however, now that three persons shared the monarchy of divinity. The unity of God resided in part in the Father as the source of Godhood, but also in the "perichoretic" (Gk., perichōrēsis, "interdependence") relationship among the three persons. This "intratrinitarian" sense of God's fatherhood and of Christ's sonship set Christian theology on a course toward further refinement of the intradivine relations among the divine Persons.

Western trinitarian theology followed a different course with Augustine (d. 430). He, too, was influenced by Neoplatonism, but instead of seeing the Father as the source of divinity, Augustine began with the unity of the divine substance common to all three Persons. Believing that the soul was a mirror of its Creator, Augustine held that contemplating the soul was a means of contemplating God. He sought images for the Trinity within the human soul and formulated several so-called psychological analogies (such as lover-beloved-love; memory-understanding-will) to explain how one substance could be internally differentiated without dividing the substance. Knowing and loving are distinct operations of the soul, but one would not say that there are two souls.

In the more philosophical part of Augustine's On the Trinity, he argued against Arian subordinationism by emphasizing that the three divine Persons are fully coequal sharers in the one divine substance. Each Person is the divine substance. While this approach was an effective way to circumvent Arianism, it also meant that the distinctiveness of each Person—whatever makes the Son or Spirit unique—became less pronounced. Augustine's idea that "all works of the Trinity ad extra are indivisible" highlighted the equality of the divine Persons, but made it difficult to see the unique roles of Son and Spirit in human salvation. This tension gave rise to the "doctrine of appropriations," according to which various roles and acts within salvation history, such as creation, redemption, and sanctification, are "appropriated" to one of the divine Persons.

The Cappadocians and Augustine followed fundamentally different routes in their trinitarian theologies. Although all generalizations have their exceptions, in general, Greek theology emphasizes the divine Persons, whereas Latin theology emphasizes the divine nature. In the Greek approach, all of reality emanates from its one source in God the Father, passes through the Son and to the Spirit who is the bridge to the world, whereas Latin theology tends to depict God as a self-enclosed Trinity of Persons. The Greek scheme can be represented as a point on a line moving outward; the Latin scheme can be represented by a circle or triangle. The danger in the Greek approach is subordinationism, in the Latin it is tritheism.

After Nicaea, and with the advent of trinitarian doctrine per se, both traditions, Eastern and Western, shifted from the earlier concern with soteriological questions (how Christ saves; what salvation means) to ontological questions (how Christ and God are of the same substance). This shift is sometimes described as the shift from the perspective of the "economic Trinity" to the "immanent Trinity," that is, from the works of God in the economy of redemption to the intradivine relations among the divine Persons. In recent Catholic theology Karl Rahner formulated the axiom that "the economic Trinity is the immanent Trinity, and vice versa" to indicate that there is a fundamental unity between what we know of God in God's self-revelation through Christ and the Spirit, and God's eternal, invisible being. While the essence of God can never be known as it is in itself, however, it is truly and fully given in the course of salvation history.

The Cappadocian and Augustinian approaches were refined throughout the medieval period in both traditions. In the East, John of Damascus (d. 749) summarized all patristic developments up to that point. Gregory Palamas (d. 1359), who stands at the summit of Orthodox theology, was embroiled in a controversy over hesychasm (Gk., hesychia, "silence"). The Hesychasts practiced a form of contemplation that they believed led to an inner vision of God's uncreated light, just like the light revealed on Mount Tabor during the Transfiguration of Christ. Palamas defended the Hesychast doctrine by distinguishing three aspects of God's being: the imparticipable and unknowable divine essence; the three divine hypostases, Father, Son, and Spirit; and the uncreated divine "energies" (self-expressions). Although God's essence remains beyond the reach of the creature, even in Hesychastic prayer, the contemplative does enter into real union with God through the divine energies which are "God as such." Thus in prayer and mystical union one participates in the divine energies, not the divine essence. Although Palamism amounts to a very strong theology of grace, there is some concern that the divine essence and indeed the divine Persons are too distant from the creature. If this critique made by Western theologians is true (and the Orthodox deny it), then Palamas's doctrine of God would contribute to the sense that the Trinity is remote from Christian life.

In the West, Augustine's thought was extremely influential. Boethius (d. 524) formulated the classic definition of person, "individual substance of a rational nature." The main lines of Augustine's theology were given further elaboration in the medieval period by Anselm (d. 1109) and Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274). Thomas provided a sophisticated philosophical treatment of all of the themes of Christian faith using the principles of Aristotelian science and metaphysics. Thomas's theology in the Summa Theologiae is rich and profound and has served as a wellspring for Catholic theology ever since. Like Augustine, Thomas saw the human acts of knowing and loving as images of the divine acts of knowledge (through the Son) and love (through the Spirit). Thomas also greatly clarified the metaphysical vocabulary appropriate to this new science of the Trinity; he defined divine personhood as a "subsistent relation" (that is, a relation that is its own substance). He was original in writing two distinct tracts on God: On the One God (De Deo Uno) and On the Triune

God (De Deo Trino). This arrangement has been severely criticized in contemporary theology because it gives the impression (surely at odds with Thomas's own intention) that the philosophical unity of God is prior to God's Trinity. In its own way, perhaps, this structural arrangement contributed to the general irrelevance of the doctrine of the Trinity within Western theology. Insofar as personhood was seen as secondary to substance or nature, the Christian doctrine of God appeared to be unitarian rather than trinitarian. Trinitarian theology became abstract and speculative, divorced from other theological tracts (such as grace and the sacraments), from liturgy, and from the ordinary concerns of Christian life. Through Thomas's influence as mediated by the neo-Scholastic manuals of theology, most people today associate "Trinity" with the self-relatedness of God, rather than God's relationship to humans through the mysteries of creation, redemption, and sanctification. As Karl Rahner notes, "The treatise on the Trinity locks itself in even more splendid isolation, with the ensuing danger that the religious mind finds it devoid of interest" (The Trinity [New York: Herder & Herder, 1970], p. 17). In contemporary theology there are efforts to rehabilitate the positive aspects of Thomas's theology of God without adopting the whole of his method and procedure.

Also influenced by Augustine but focusing on person rather than nature, Richard of St. Victor (d. 1173) and Bonaventure (d. 1274) used a more "social" than "psychological" analogy for the Trinity. Richard taught that God is the supreme instance of charity. Perfect charity requires not just two, a lover and beloved, but a third who is loved without jealousy or competition. Bonaventure, much like the Cappadocians, emphasized the monarchy of the Father who is self-diffusive and fecund and who created the whole world full of trinitarian vestiges.

After the medieval period there was very little development concerning the Trinity. Although the Reformers, especially John Calvin, were keen on the trinitarian creedal structure of Christian faith, they had no interest in furthering the medieval metaphysical project. In the nineteenth century, Friedrich Schleiermacher relegated the doctrine of the Trinity to an appendix in his work The Christian Faith. Palamism was discovered by the West and reinvigorated by the East in the twentieth century. In the last thirty years, the Church Dogmatics of Reformed theologian Karl Barth (d. 1968) and the monograph by Karl Rahner entitled The Trinity inaugurated the current renewal of trinitarian theology.

FUTURE DIRECTIONS AND REMAINING PROBLEMS

As of this writing the renaissance of interest in trinitarian theology is only in its beginning stages. In several denominations, but particularly within Catholic theology, the doctrine of the Trinity is being used as the foundation to explore issues in diverse areas such as spirituality, ethics, and ecclesiology. Since the concept of personhood lies at the heart of every trinitarian theology of God, this teaching forms the basis for reflection on the nature of the human person, especially the relationship between individual persons and communities or societies. For example, liberation and feminist theologians appeal to the trinitarian emphasis on the equality of persons to base their vision of egalitarian society. The "tract" approach to theology, according to which theological themes were treated separately as discrete topics with little bearing on each other, is gradually being overcome by a more unified vision of the theological enterprise. Amid these new developments, the following issues and questions will continue to require attention.

First, the classical approach to trinitarian doctrine was to treat the internal workings of the Trinity—how many divine Persons, how they were related to each other, how they were produced, what analogies might be found in the created order, and so forth. It has been amply shown in many current theological writings why this preoccupation with the so-called immanent Trinity is unsatisfactory. We live in an age that thinks in historical, personalist, and existential, rather than metaphysical and speculative terms. Thus the force of the doctrine of the Trinity must concern God's relationship with humankind not merely God's relationship with God. Questions of salvation are at the heart of every religion, and Christians believe that God is involved with humanity in a saving relationship that is transforming the face of the world. Contemporary theologians favor the "economic" approach to theological questions, which is a way of saying that because theological questions are inherently existential, they must be also treated in their practical and pastoral dimensions. This has required a fundamental reevaluation of the traditional framework of trinitarian theology, specifically, the relationship between "immanent" and "economic" Trinity, in such a way that the practical implications of the doctrine of the Trinity can be realized.

Second, the development of feminist theology over the last few decades has meant the reassessment of both the method and content of all areas of theology. The Christian tradition has presented God nearly exclusively in masculine concepts, images, metaphors, and stereotypes, even though it is one of the cardinal rules of theology that God exceeds all such depictions and can never be fully expressed in any one manner. The doctrine of the Trinity is particularly subject to the feminist critique because of the centrality of the metaphors of Father and Son. To meet feminist objections, contemporary theologians typically focus on the nonpatriarchal dimensions of these names for God or substitute nonsexual and/or feminine names for God (e.g., Eternal Source, Savior, Advocate), or emphasize the deeply egalitarian vision of human persons and human society implied by the doctrine of the Trinity. Liturgical experimentation is increasingly common, as the churches seek to overcome the oppressively patriarchal and one-sided image of God. In this instance the vast Christian tradition is both a rich resource and yet in other respects also needs to be overcome.

Third, some have called the modern period "the age of the Spirit," meaning a deemphasis on institutional religion and the crossing-over between and among disparate religious traditions. The Christian doctrine of God must be developed in light of the truth-claims of other world religions. This is not to compromise the uniqueness of the Christian tradition, but only to say that trinitarian doctrine need not be narrowly Christomonistic, in the sense that Jesus Christ is essential to every person's salvation, including the pious Hindu and Jew. Other paths to salvation cannot be denigrated but must be seen as part of God's universal plan of salvation. While Christians see this plan fully realized in Jesus Christ and must hold to this faith, it would be unrealistic to yearn for the days of a narrow-minded apologetics that saw all non-Christians as heathen.

Finally, theologians must continue to reflect on God within the context of the God-question of a particular age or race or nation. In an age where we are more aware of the global dimensions of human suffering, the classical depiction of God as immutable and passionless needs to be rethought from the perspective of trinitarian theology. Secular society brings its own unique questions and doubts about the God presented by traditional religion and classical theism. These challenges must be faced openly and honestly, bringing to bear the riches of the Christian tradition, where possible. Further, the current ecological crisis has generated fresh reflection on God's intent in making human beings stewards of creation. Science and religion must be seen as partners in search of the ultimate truth about the universe and all creatures in it.

Among the many resources that can enable trinitarian doctrine to once again stand at the center of Christian faith and to be a vital expression of that faith are: the voices and experience of those who have been on the margins of Christianity or of society but who testify nonetheless to the saving power of God; the insights of modern cultures, especially to the extent that cultural insights call the Church back to a more faithful witness to God's presence and mercy; the doubts and questions of unbelievers who continually press the Church toward greater truthfulness; the wisdom of other religious traditions; the collective wisdom of prayer and mystical experience, across religious traditions; and the liturgical and sacramental life of the churches.

See also creation; eternity; fatherhood of God; five ways of St. Thomas Aquinas; monotheism; providence; salvation; Trinity, doctrine of the.

Bibliography

Congar, Yves. I Believe in the Holy Spirit. 3 vols. New York: Seabury, 1983.
Hill, William J. The Three-Personed God. Washington, DC: University Press of America, 1983.
Kasper, Walter. The God of Jesus Christ. New York: Crossroad, 1985.
LaCugna, Catherine Mowry. God for Us: The Trinity and Christian Life. San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1991.
Rahner, Karl. The Trinity. New York: Herder & Herder, 1970. CATHERINE MOWRY LACUGNA

Goldbrunner, Josef, b. 1910, German priest, educator, and author. Ordained in 1936, he is known for his spiritual writings, which emphasize the relationship between personal holiness and psychological health. His best known work is Holiness is Wholeness (Eng. trans., 1964).

Golden Legend, The, a popular collection of saints' lives compiled by the mid-1260s by the Dominican Jacobus de Voragine, providing concise readings for feast days according to the ecclesiastical calendar. The Legend draws upon earlier collections and was meant to be used by the clergy for sermon illustration and devotional reading. Originally in Latin, the Legenda Aurea or Legenda Sanctorum was soon translated into the vernacular languages of Europe, with William Caxton's translation (1483) being the most popular in English. Phenomenally successful in the later Middle Ages, it was criticized by humanists as catering to the crassest kind of credulity and superstition. Recent years have seen a renewed interest among historians, who see the Legend as reflective of late medieval piety and culture.

Golden Rose, a rose-shaped ornament blessed by the pope on the fourth Sunday of Lent. The custom of giving the Rose as an honor (usually to a royal recipient) originated in the early eleventh century.

Golden Rule, designation coined in the sixteenth century for the proverb "In everything do to others as you would have them do to you" (Matt 7:12; see also Luke 6:31). Taking the proverb from the sayings gospel, Q, Matthew added "for this is the law and the prophets," making it a summary principle; Luke set it among sayings on love stressing more than reciprocity (6:27–36). Early Christians cited it in both positive and negative ("silver rule") forms (e.g., "And what you hate, do not do to anyone," Job 4:15). The proverb was widely known before Christianity: Confucians, Greeks, Romans, and Jews all knew it.

Golgotha (gahl'guh-thuh). See Calvary, Mount.

Gonzaga, St. Aloysius. See Aloysius Gonzaga, St.

good, moral, the orientation of a person toward the fulfillment of human potential as manifested by habitual dispositions and human acts. Although the ultimate human fulfillment occurs through God's grace, a moral agent must also cooperate by developing dispositions and habits that dispose a person to perform right actions (the virtues). Such dispositions and habits make oneself and one's actions good, because they nourish one's ability to choose good under the proper circumstances and for the right reasons. Thus, a morally good choice differs from one that is morally right in that it not only observes the objectively correct order of values but also subserves the human fulfillment of the agent. See also evil, moral; virtue.

Good Friday, the first full day of the Easter Triduum, or the Friday in Holy Week, the day on which the Passion and death of Jesus are commemorated. The liturgy for the day is the most simple of all days during the liturgical year. The Liturgy of the Passion and Death of Our Lord consists of three parts: the Liturgy of the Word, the Veneration of the Cross, and the Service of Communion. The Liturgy of the Word begins in profound silence followed by an opening prayer. Readings are from Isa 52:13–53:12, Ps 31, and Heb 4:14–16, 5:7–9. The Passion from the Gospel of John (John 18:1–19:42) is proclaimed, sometimes by several lectors. An extended form of the intercessions concludes this part of the liturgy. A large cross is either unveiled or processed into the front of the church. During this unveiling or procession, the acclamation, "This is the Wood of the Cross on which hung the Savior of the World," is sung with its congregational response, "Come, let us worship." The acclamation is sung three times, after which members of the assembly approach the cross and venerate it. The Communion Service on Good Friday does not make this liturgy a Mass. The eucharistic bread consumed on Good Friday was consecrated on Holy Thursday evening, was solemnly adored through the evening until midnight, and was reserved in some other location through the night. After the Lord's Prayer, the Communion rite, and a short prayer, the ministers and assembly depart in silence. Good Friday is a day of fast and abstinence for Catholics. See also crucifixion; Holy Week; triduum.

JEFFREY T. VANDERWILT

Good Shepherd, the, one of the most ancient representations of Jesus Christ, based especially on John 10:1–42; Luke 15:3–7; Matt 18:12–14; Heb 13:20; 1 Pet 2:25; and 5:4. In early Christian art, Jesus Christ is frequently depicted as a young, beardless man either with a lamb on his shoulders or with a flute in his hand and protecting the sheep that gather around him. The image itself of the Christ, the Good Shepherd, surrounded by his sheep, whom he loves and cares for (Luke 15:3-7; John 10:7-18); mosaic, in the Galla Placidia Mausoleum, Ravenna, Italy.

shepherd has pre-Christian origins. See also Jesus Christ.

Goretti, St. Maria, 1890–1902, virgin and martyr. An Italian child murdered while defending her chastity, she was canonized in the presence of her killer in 1950. Feast day: July 6.

Görres, Johann Joseph von (ger'rez), 1776–1848, German lay theologian and political philosopher. He defended a free Church independent of the state, without promoting Ultramontanism. The culmination of his research into mysticism can be found in his four-volume work Christliche Mystik (1836–42), but also significant were his contributions with the Catholic circle in Munich to the review Eos (1828–32) and the Historisch-politische Blätter (1838). See also mysticism.

gospel (Old Eng., godspel, "good news"), the message of God's salvific action in Christ and the accounts of Jesus' activity produced by the early Church. The simple sense is regularly found in Paul's Letters (e.g., Rom 1:1, 9; 1 Cor 9:12–14; Gal 1:11; 2:2; 1 Thess 1:5). The literary sense stems from the word's use in the opening of the Gospel of Mark (1:1).

Transmission of the gospel in the first sense was facilitated by brief formulations of the proclamation (Gk., kerygma) of essential events of Christ's Passion, death, and Resurrection, as in 1 Cor 15:1–5. Development of the literary genre is more complex.

The four Gospels (Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John) of the NT were built on oral and written traditions that probably included collections of sayings, miracle stories, and a passion narrative. The first three Gospels have much in common and are termed "synoptic" because they can be, for the most part, "viewed together." Most scholars believe that Mark, written around A.D. 70, was the first of the Synoptics. Matthew and Luke, written in the 80s and 90s, independently used Mark alongside a collection of sayings of Jesus. Some scholars, however, still defend the priority of Matthew. The relationship of John to the Synoptics is uncertain. Although there are parallels in both sayings and deeds of Jesus, John, written in final form around A.D. 100, seems to have drawn on independent traditions for much of his story of Jesus.

In addition to the four canonical Gospels, early Christians produced numerous other works that reported the sayings or deeds of Jesus. These works, which did not win formal approbation by the Church, are usually termed "apocryphal" Gospels. See also apocryphal Gospels; evangelist; evangelization; infancy Gospels; synoptic Gospels. HAROLD W. ATTRIDGE Gospel book, the liturgical book containing the readings from the Gospels used during Mass. Ornately embroidered or jewel-encrusted bindings were common from the eighteenth century onward. The Gospel book is accorded all the honors due a symbol of Christ's presence. When carried in procession it may be flanked by candles and preceded by incense. See also gospel.

Gothic. See Catholicism and architecture.

Gothic spirituality, a form of asceticism and style of art that emphasized the humanity of Jesus, especially his suffering and Crucifixion, in increasingly realistic ways. An urban intellectual world of theologians and university scholars preoccupied with the meaning of symbols established the foundations of Gothic spirituality in the early twelfth century. Major influences included the mathematical and cosmological speculations of scholars at Chartres, such as William of Conches (ca. 1080–1154), who described the hierarchy of the universe in terms of a golden chain, and the legacy of the mystical theology of Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite, a fifth-century Syrian writer confused with St. Denis, patron saint of France. A commentary on the Pseudo-Dionysian Celestial Hierarchy by Hugh (d. 1142), of the Parisian abbey of St. Victor, led to a more nuanced understanding of the Neoplatonic idea that the material world leads beyond itself to God. Hugh of St. Victor redefined the notion to mean that only through the humanity of the suffering and ascended Christ can one understand the created world as a source of God's self-revelation.

The translucency of glass and jewels, the weightlessness, harmony, and unity of Gothic architecture symbolically expressed the ineffable presence of God, the immaterial True Light to which the believer aspired to ascend. Theological emphasis on the humanity of Christ encouraged the emerging realism of the sculptural tradition, presenting in an increasingly more naturalistic style images affirming a popular perception of the presence of God in everyday life. Out of this climate arose theological and artistic interest in new themes of popular religiosity, including the cult of the Virgin, the Pietà (It., "pity"), the Man of Sorrows, and the Crucifixion. See also Gothic style.

MARCHITA MAUCK

Gothic style, French architectural development. Gothic style originates at the royal abbey church of St.-Denis near Paris, rebuilt by Abbot Suger between 1137–44. It represents a new spirit, combining pointed arches and ribbed groin vaults with harmonious mathematical proportions, and a quest for luminosity, expressed by translucent walls of stained glass invisibly supported by exterior buttresses. Derived from cosmological speculations and interpretations of the mystical treatises of Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite (a fifth-century Neoplatonic writer confused with St. Denis, patron saint of France), Gothic style symbolically expresses both the rationality of divine creation and the ineffable presence of the Divine. See also Catholicism and architecture; Gothic spirituality.

The interior of the basilica of St.-Denis, a Gothic church located in Paris and the burial place of many French kings.

Gothic vestments, a style of chasuble, the sleeveless outer garment worn by priests and bishops presiding at the Eucharist. The Gothic style of chasuble extends from the collar to the midportion of the forearm. It drapes from the shoulders to the knees or midcalf in both front and rear panels. The Gothic style contrasts with the baroque, "fiddle-back" chasuble which covered the shoulders and upper torso only. The Gothic style found its champions in the Cambridge movement of the nineteenth century and has since become the standard style of chasuble for the Roman Catholic and many Protestant churches. See also Gothic style; vestments.

Gottschalk of Orbais, ca. 808–ca. 867, Carolingian theologian. A child oblate at Fulda, Gottschalk as an adult attempted to escape the childhood vows but was frustrated in these attempts by his abbot, Rabanus Maurus. Gottschalk's teaching of double predestination (to eternal life and eternal death) sparked widespread controversy and led archbishop Hincmar of Reims to imprison him at Hautvilliers, where he died. See also predestination.

Goupil, St. René, 1606–42, missionary, North American martyr, patron saint of anesthetists. Born in France and trained as a surgeon, he went to Quebec as a lay assistant to Jesuit missionaries among the Hurons. He was captured and killed by the Iroquois, along with Isaac Jogues and others. Feast day: October 19. See also North American martyrs.

Grabar (grah-bahr'), classical Armenian, an Indo-European language and the liturgical language of the Armenian Orthodox and Catholic churches. The invention of the Armenian alphabet ca. 400 inaugurated the Golden Age of Armenian literature. Grabar is the language in which Armenian Christian literature of late antiquity and the Middle Ages is written. Now a dead language, Grabar—and hence the liturgy—is not understood by speakers of modern East and West Armenian. See also Armenian rite.

Grabmann, Martin, 1875–1949, theologian and historian of medieval Scholastic theology and philosophy. By 1918 professor of theology at Munich, Grabmann made great contributions in manuscript research, discovering lost works of important theologians, and in charting the evolution of Scholastic thought. See also Scholasticism.

GRACE

Grace is God's free and forgiving self-communication that enables humans to share in the trinitarian relationship of love. A search for the biblical roots of the term cannot be limited to Hebrew and Greek words translated as "grace," since the mystery of God's saving love is central throughout the Scriptures. In the Hebrew Scriptures God's favor is the liberating power behind the Exodus event, the creative energy that is the source of all that is, the faithful covenant relationship that God constantly extends to Israel in spite of betrayal, and the firm and reliable promise of God to provide future salvation for all creation.

In the Christian Scriptures Jesus embodies God's covenant love and offer of salvation. In the life, death, and Resurrection of Jesus the early Christians experienced the power and presence of God's love. The risen Jesus bestows the gift of the Holy Spirit on the Christian community; through Baptism, Christians are granted an unmerited share in the relationship between Jesus and the Father. Paul explicitly identifies Jesus Christ as the charis (Gk., "grace") of God and describes this Christian experience of God's mercy and favor with such diverse terms as salvation, redemption, sanctification, freedom, transformation, new creation, reconciliation, and justification. Paul emphasizes that grace is freely given as a gift to the baptized; it is totally unmerited and cannot be earned through any works of the law. Paul also uses the term "grace" (charisma) to refer to the variety of gifts bestowed on individuals in the Christian community "for building up the body of Christ" (Eph 4:12). A complete theology of grace in the Christian Scriptures would include not only the Pauline emphasis on forgiving love, but also the notions of divine indwelling (John 14:23) and of God's freely bestowed favor that planned and destined humankind in love before the foundation of the world (Eph 1:3–14).

EARLY CHRISTIAN PERSPECTIVES: EAST AND WEST

In general, the emphasis among the early Christian writers in the Eastern (Greek-speaking) tradition was on divinization or participation in divine life, while the emphasis in the (Latin-speaking) West was on the healing aspect of grace as salvation from sin.

The Eastern tradition developed the mystical and sacramental symbolism of the Johannine writings and the passage from 2 Peter that proclaims Christians to be "participants of the divine nature" (2 Pet 1:4). The accent on divinization (or deification) was connected with reflection on the incarnation ("He became human that we might become divine"; Irenaeus Against Heresies 4.28.1) and the indwelling of the Holy Spirit ("If the Spirit is not divine, how are we divinized?"—a motif popularized by the Cappadocian Fathers). Manifest in the many texts and rites of the liturgy, the Eastern tradition emphasized that Christians come to share the divine life through participation in the sacraments, preeminently Baptism and the Eucharist. Eastern theologies of the incarnation included with the divinizing effects of the incarnation the healing grace of redemption, since in Christ all humanity is reunited with God. Because death, rather than guilt, was viewed as the major consequence of sin in the East, many writers stressed that a special effect of grace is immortality; we become, like God, incorruptible, immortal. The Eastern doctrine of divine "energies," uncreated forces or powers distinct from the divine essence by which God creates and divinizes the world, provided a way of speaking of God's immanence while respecting the transcendence and inaccessibility of the divine.

The Western approach to a theology of grace is influenced markedly by Augustine of Hippo (d. 430), whose language and categories for grace, sin, and psychology set the stage for centuries of theological disputes. The mystery of grace is at the heart of Augustine's writings, which include a sacramental view of reality that sees the "vestiges of the Trinity" present throughout creation, an inner desire for God at the core of every human heart, and Baptism as a share in the inner divine life of love. However, the controversy between Augustine and Pelagius determined Augustine's strong emphasis on grace as a divine force liberating the human will from the bondage of sin.

Pelagius, a British spiritual director in Rome at the beginning of the fifth century, emphasized the moral responsibility of the baptized to live a "new life in Christ." He reasoned that if we are responsible to keep God's law, we must be able to do so; the God-given ability to choose between good and evil is itself a grace of God. In response, Augustine stressed the damage done to human nature by original sin, interpreted as the bondage of the human will that results from sin. The ability to live the Christian life is sheer gift: "Command what you wish, but give what you command" (Confessions 10.29).

Augustine argued that grace is necessary to heal and liberate the freedom (Lat., libertas) that is at the core of the human person. Grace is the internal assistance of the Holy Spirit that releases one from the bondage of sin, illuminates the mind, and provides a new delight in the good. Augustine's view on the necessity and gratuity of grace became the teaching of the Church and received lasting recommendation with the condemnation of Pelagianism at the Council of Carthage (418) and the later condemnation of semi-Pelagianism at the Council of Orange (529). Due to ecclesial approval and the depth and breadth of his thought, Augustine gained extraordinary authority in subsequent centuries.

THE MEDIEVAL SYNTHESIS OF THOMAS AQUINAS

Both the Eastern and Western Christian traditions on grace were integrated into a systematic approach to the mystery of the relationship between the trinitarian God and human persons in the medieval synthesis of Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274). Aquinas's theology of grace cannot be limited to the tract on grace in the Summa Theologiae but rather pervades his systematic writings as well as his biblical commentaries. The very structure of the Summa Theologiae suggests that everything comes from God and is meant to return to God. While incorporating Augustine's emphasis on grace as healing, Aquinas developed the Eastern tradition on divinization through the notion of participation in the divine life of love.

In the medieval textbook the Sentences, Peter Lombard had identified grace, charity, and the Holy Spirit with one another. Aquinas, on the other hand, made a distinction between "uncreated grace"—the very inner life of the Trinity—and "created grace"—the effects that being drawn into that life of love have on humans. Aquinas described grace not only as healing human nature that had been wounded by sin, but also as elevating human nature to what is beyond merely human capacity—participation in the divine nature through friendship with the Trinity. To preserve the integrity and autonomy of the human yet account for the profound transformation of the person by grace, Aquinas drew on Aristotle's natural philosophy and psychology.

According to Aristotle, reality can be understood as a system of natures with capacities and operations proportioned to their final goal (Gk., telos). Because the final goal of human beings is life in union with God, a goal that remains beyond human capacity, Aquinas concluded that an "elevation" of human nature is necessary if humans are to reach their goal. This inner transformation of the human soul through the indwelling of the Holy Spirit expands fundamental human capacities and operations through the theological virtues of faith, hope, and charity. Grace enables persons to share in the relationship of mutual friendship with the trinitarian mystery of God. What is "natural" to the Trinity is extended to humans "by adoption." Finally Aquinas's theology of grace as a special kind of "habit" or "quality" emphasized the perduring presence of the Spirit in Christians.

TRENT'S RESPONSE TO THE REFORMERS

Throughout the fifteenth through the twentieth centuries, Thomas's subtle distinctions were often misunderstood. To emphasize that grace was a free gift, theologians began to speak of "pure nature" with its own "natural end" as separate from a higher "supernatural" destiny. Many considered grace a transient impulse necessary for salvation that could be increased by good works and prayer, but that remained elusive, temporary, fragile. Teachings from the Augustinian and Franciscan schools, about predestination and the sovereignty and freedom of God, prompted fear of God's arbitrary will and absolute power. Disturbed by both the arbitrary power of God and the rampant "works righteousness" of the devotional practices of the time, the Augustinian monk Martin Luther turned to the Pauline doctrine of justification by faith and by grace alone. According to Luther's interpretation, the "justice" or "righteousness" of God (Rom 1:17) imputes the redemptive works of Christ to believers without any work or merit on their part. Those who have been "acquitted" or "declared righteous" remain at the same time both justified and sinners (Lat., simul justus et peccator). The Reformers argued that "righteousness" refers to God's righteousness or justice; the grace of Christ is an "alien righteousness."

The Council of Trent (1545–63) in its Decree on Justification gave an official Catholic response to the Reformers' theologies. Trent argued that justification is not only a remission of sins, but the radical transformation of the baptized. This renovation of the human soul by habitual (sanctifying) grace is such that the unjust person moves from "being an enemy" to friendship with God. This inner transformation (grace inheres in the just) fashions the human being as capable of meritorious actions that are totally God's initiative but that are also fully actions of the person. While Trent talks about good works done in Christ meriting a reward, the document on justification reaffirms the primacy, gratuity, and necessity of grace and underscores that merit is really God's crowning of God's gifts (an expression taken from Augustine).

After the Council of Trent, the Catholic theology of grace focused on a variety of disputes over the nature of created grace, distinctions between sanctifying and "actual" (assisting) grace, the relationship of grace and human freedom, questions of predestination and God's universal salvific will, and the relationship of nature and grace. Various positions were represented by different schools (Salamanca, Paris, Louvain) or orders (Jesuits, Franciscans, Augustinians, Dominicans). Dominicans and Jesuits debated the relationship between grace and human freedom (De Auxiliis controversy, 1597–1607), a question that remains open even to this day. With the censures of the forty propositions of Baius (1567) and the teachings of Cornelius Jansen (1653), both God's universal salvific will and the possibility of human rejection of God's grace were reaffirmed.

TWENTIETH-CENTURY PERSPECTIVES

By the twentieth century, the post-Tridentine focus on diverse kinds of "actual" graces and the sharp separation of a human "natural finality" as distinct from a supernatural goal known only from revelation resulted in a major problem. Many Catholics did not see how the doctrine of grace had any connection with a lasting, sovereign love of God or with their human experience. Rooted in the biblical, patristic, and liturgical renewal of the early twentieth century, a variety of theologians attempted to restore the central focus of the theology of grace to the mystery of God's self-communication in love.

Retrieving Augustine's experiential approach to grace and Aquinas's more nuanced view of the relationship of nature and grace, Henri de Lubac (1991), Karl Rahner (1984), Pierre Teilhard de Chardin (1955), Edward Schillebeeckx, and others proposed ways of preserving not only the transcendence and gratuity of God's self-offer, but also the immanent desire for grace rooted in the human heart. De Lubac insisted that grace is both a truly "natural desire" of human beings and an utterly free offer on God's part, since friendship is never "deserved" or "owed" even between human beings. Rahner agreed that a desire for God (whether conscious or not) is a fundamental orientation of every human being. Rahner insisted that this real and concrete, if silent and unexpressed, orientation of human existence should be called a "supernatural existential" to indicate that it is an utterly gratuitous gift of God that need not have been.

Rahner restored the Catholic theology of grace by reemphasizing the trinitarian presence of God's self-communication ("uncreated grace") and by drawing together human nature and divine grace. He advanced the discussion on both the universality of grace outside of Christian Baptism and the ways people experience grace. Emphasizing God's universal salvific will and yet maintaining the Christian conviction that Jesus Christ is the unique mediator of grace/salvation, Rahner explained that when people live their ordinary lives in fidelity to the truth discovered in the depths of their hearts, they are responding to God's self-offer in Christ whether they are aware of that or not. Grace encompasses all persons and seeks to touch or heal their lives at a depth.

The Belgian theologian Piet Fransen (1983) described grace in psychological categories. How did grace touch consciousness? He emphasized that God's grace promotes an interior harmony by transforming, deepening, and healing freedom with all of its powers, hopes, and impulses.

Emphasizing the social and political dimensions of grace, the Flemish Dominican Edward Schillebeeckx maintains that the Christian experience of God's saving presence has to be rethought in a world of secularization and excessive, senseless human suffering. Grace and salvation are to be found in fragmentary experiences where the flourishing of humanity is encouraged and nurtured and in human efforts to protest and resist evil as well as to stand in solidarity with those who suffer ("God's cause is the human cause").

Liberation theologians criticize an overly individualistic approach to grace and translate the traditional Catholic emphasis on grace as mediated and the importance of human cooperation into social and structural terms. Gustavo Gutiérrez, Leonardo Boff, Juan Luis Segundo, and others probe the meaning of grace as the liberating power and presence of God in the context of the social and political "disgrace" of Central and South America.

Feminist liberation theologians have begun to reflect on grace both in psychological categories more descriptive of the experience of conversion for women and in social terms of critiquing patriarchal systems and structures. In many varied contexts, liberation theologians insist that the conversion that grace empowers is both a gift and a task that has been entrusted to human beings and specifically to Christian communities.

Recent theological reflection is beginning to grapple with the mystery of God's presence throughout the cosmos as the broader context for a theology of grace. In dialogue with the natural sciences and the growing ecological movement, theologians are extending their reflections on grace to include God's relationship with all forms of life in this universe and beyond. The mystery of God's love and presence extends beyond human experience or the history of salvation (no matter how broadly defined) to the mystery of God's creation.

See also deification; free will; Holy Spirit; justification; nature and grace; Pelagianism; predestination; sanctification.

Bibliography

Boff, Leonardo. Liberating Grace. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1979.
Fransen, Piet. The New Life of Grace. New York: Seabury, 1969.
Haight, Roger. The Experience and Language of Grace. New York: Paulist Press, 1979.
Rondet, Henri. The Grace of Christ. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1966.
Schillebeeckx, Edward. Christ: The Experience of Jesus as Lord. New York: Crossroad, 1980.

MARY C. HILKERT

grace, actual, divine assistance given for a particular need or action. Following the Council of Trent (1545–63), treatises on grace were divided into two parts: sanctifying or habitual grace (the inner, permanent transformation of the human person or soul), and actual grace (the divine assistance that moves the person to do good). Disputes ensued (lasting until Vatican II [1962–65]) regarding the existence, necessity, and gratuity of actual grace, its further subdivisions, its compatibility with human freedom, and the notion of merit.

The theology of actual grace attempted to preserve the twofold teaching of the Church that grace is absolutely necessary for every salutary human act (against Pelagianism and semi-Pelagianism) and yet that grace can be resisted (against Jansenism). The danger was that grace gradually came to be viewed as a quantity through which God moves or elevates the human soul, rather than as the relationship between God and human persons. Contemporary theologians note that the mystery of grace comprises both God's self-gift and God's enabling human beings to be open to, and faithful to, that relationship. See also grace; Jansenism; merit; Pelagianism; semi-Pelagianism.

grace, cooperating, the action of the Holy Spirit that enables the human response to God's initial action in the divine-human relationship. Totally dependent on the prior initiative of God (operating grace), cooperating grace empowers the human response in both initial conversion and the ongoing living of the Christian life. See also grace.

grace, habitual, another term for sanctifying grace, or the abiding presence of God in the soul. Drawing on the Aristotelian term "habit," Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) identified sanctifying grace as "habitual" to explain the profound effect that God's friendship has on the human person. Being drawn into participation in the divine life of love, human persons are transformed at the core of their being—recreated in love. In classic terminology, grace elevates and heals human nature, vivifying the personality in a new way, giving it new capacities (virtues, gifts, charisms) that enable the human person to enter into relationship with God and Christian discipleship. This "state of grace" or "habitual grace" (terms popular from the seventeenth to the twentieth centuries) is a dynamic life-principle given to the person, an orientation to act in accord with the love with which God has first loved us and with the Spirit of the Risen Christ dwelling within us. See also grace; grace, sanctifying.

grace, operating, a term used to emphasize the priority of God's free initiative in the divine-human relationship, as distinct from the subsequent gift that enables and elicits human response (cooperating grace). Operating grace can refer either to a principle of life (God's love effects justification and sanctification) or an activity (God moves the human person to act). See also grace.

grace, sacramental, the self-communication of God that takes place through the celebration and reception of the sacraments. The sacraments are more than signs bereft of content. They are effective signs or announcements of God's power and love and God's desire to confer a particular kind of help and presence based on the way God communicated to humankind in Christ. Thus, in the sacrament of Anointing, Christ's continuing work is seen of healing the sick through the ministry of the Church; in Reconciliation, the grace of God's forgiveness is conferred and celebrated; and in the Eucharist, the grace of the presence of Christ is received in the context of the worshiping community. See also grace; sacrament.

grace, sanctifying, the effect of the self-communication of God by which we are made holy, transformed into "participants of the divine nature" (2 Pet 1:4). To speak of grace as sanctifying is to focus not only on the forgiveness of sins, but also on other aspects of the mystery of the divine-human relationship: becoming adopted children of God, incorporation into Christ, friendship with God, participation in the divine life, and the indwelling of the Trinity.

The Protestant Reformers claimed that sins, personal and original, are forgiven in Christ but with a righteousness that remains an "alien righteousness." The Council of Trent (1545–63) insisted that the essence of justification consists not only in the forgiveness of sins, but in the sanctification and renovation of the inner person by God's love. The person ceases to be a sinner and "becomes just" (DS 1528).

Using Scholastic categories, Catholics spoke of sanctifying grace as "infused" or "inherent" in the human person. Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) had described the transformation of the human person in love as "habitual grace"—the radical vitalization of the human soul in such a way that human persons are truly drawn into friendship with God and can be said to be in the "state of grace." One can grow in grace through a life of virtue; God's gifts become our merit. According to Trent, it is possible to lose sanctifying grace by grave (mortal) personal sin. The relationship with God can be restored through the sacrament of Penance (now called Reconciliation). See also grace; Holy Spirit; sanctification.

MARY C. HILKERT

grace at meals (Lat., gratia, "thanks"), the practice of prayer before the sharing of food. The grace acknowledges God as the source of all blessings, especially of food and of other forms of material and psychological sustenance. Graces express the desire that Christ will be present in the communion of meal-sharing, that he will bless both the food and the sharers of food.

A simple, yet common, Catholic grace is used before meals: "Bless us, O Lord, and these your gifts which we are about to receive from your goodness. Through Christ our Lord. Amen."

grace, efficacious, grace that always produces its effect. From the sixteenth to the twentieth centuries grace was viewed largely in mechanical categories expressing modes of moving the human will. In terms of this "actual grace" an extensive dispute arose over predestination and the relationship between grace and human freedom (De Auxiliis controversy, 1597–1607). If God's grace were infallibly efficacious, i.e., if it always achieved its effect, how could the freedom of the human person be preserved? Emphasizing human freedom and responsibility, Luis de Molina (d. 1600) maintained that God's grace is sufficient for salvation, but only becomes efficacious upon its acceptance by the human person. God's decree of predestination to salvation logically follows upon a divine foreknowledge of a person's merits. Domingo Báñez (d. 1604) stressed in his theology of grace a divine movement and argued that those who are predestined receive "efficacious" grace to respond freely to the offer of salvation, a grace in time prior to the decisions or actions of the human person. A Vatican examination permitted both positions. The relationship between grace and human freedom remains an open theological question to this day. See also De Auxiliis; grace.

grace of happy death, dying in the state of grace. Prayer for the "grace of final perseverance" recognizes that our relationship with God is utterly dependent on God's initiative and fidelity. While noting that we cannot have absolute certitude about final salvation, the Council of Trent (1545–63) exhorts "a most secure hope" that God will bring to perfection what God has begun. See also death and dying.

grace of office, one of the diverse charisms or gifts that the Holy Spirit bestows on church ministers to be used for the sake of the common good (1 Cor 12:7). The charism for leadership in the Christian community, publicly recognized and commissioned through ordination, enables the ordained to exercise the ministry to which they have been called. See also ordination.

Gradual (Lat., gradus, "step"), the psalm verse(s) sung between the first lesson (scriptural reading) and the Alleluia or Tract (a psalm sung "straight through" without a responsory) in the Mass prior to its revision following Vatican II (1962–65). Originally sung "on the steps" of the chancel, the Gradual has been replaced by the responsorial psalm. Gradual also refers to the liturgical books in which one finds the chants for Mass.

Graham, Aelred, 1907–84, English Benedictine, ecumenist, and spiritual writer. He advanced a spirituality that bridges both Western (Catholic) and Eastern (Buddhist) traditions.

Grail, international women's movement. Founded by Dutch Jesuit Jacques van Ginneken in 1921, it is dedicated to the development of laywomen's leadership in the Church. Lydwine van Kersbergen and Joan Overboss established Grail in the Chicago archdiocese in 1940. Its headquarters moved later to Loveland, Ohio.

Granada, Luis de, 1504–88, Spanish Dominican preacher and spiritual author. He pioneered methods of interior mental prayer adapted to the needs of laypeople. His treatises On Prayer (1544) and Sinner's Guide (1567) were popular throughout Europe, influencing Francis de Sales and Vincent de Paul.

Gratian (gray'shen), twelfth-century Italian jurist who taught canon law at Bologna during the 1130s and 1140s and died sometime before 1160. Around 1140, Gratian completed his Concordia Discordantium Canonum (Lat., "Concordance of Discordant Canons"), also known as the Decretum. This massive compilation of nearly 4000 canonical rulings, gathered into 101 distinctiones ("distinctions") and 36 causae ("cases"), quickly became the standard canon law textbook and continued in use until the Church's legal reforms of 1917. See also canon law; Decretum Gratianum.

Gravissimum Educationis (grah-vi'see-moom ed-joo-kah-tsee-oh'nees). See Declaration on Christian Education.

gravitas materiae (grahv'i-tahs mah-teer'ee-ay; Lat., "gravity of matter"), the gravity or importance of the basic meaning of an action. For a sin to qualify as a serious sin, three requirements were ordinarily demanded: grave matter, sufficiently full knowledge, and full consent. Only those violations that caused serious harm to persons or to the social order were viewed as grave matters and were likely to involve serious sin. See also mortal sin; sin.

Great Church, a term used in late antiquity and modern Greek for the principal church of an area, the cathedral or church of the bishop. It was used without further specification for the first cathedral of Constantinople, and for the two later churches, also called Hagia Sophia, on the same site. By extension, it was also used to refer to the Church of Constantinople. Some theologians use the term to designate the Church Catholic, the universal Church and its orthodox traditions. See also cathedral; Church; Hagia Sophia.

Great Doxology, a fourth-century liturgical hymn that opens with the words "Glory to God in the highest heaven, and on earth peace among those whom he favors" of Luke 2:14. The chant is used liturgically in the Western Mass, and, in the East, in Matins (except among the Maronites), as well as in Compline in some traditions. It is called "great" to distinguish it from the "lesser" doxology or "Glory be to the Father. . . ." Later Byzantine nomenclature, which distinguishes between the "great" Gloria (Lat., "Glory [to God]") chanted at festive Matins celebrated on feasts and the "lesser" one at ferial Matins and Compline celebrated on weekdays, without a special feast, is erroneous. The Great Doxology is substantially the same in both cases. The Gloria at ferial Matins is a late development. See also doxology; Gloria in Excelsis.

Great Entrance, or "Major Introit," the transfer of gifts or offertory procession of the Byzantine and Armenian Eucharists, formerly found in the West Syrian rite. One of the principal symbolic rites of the Byzantine liturgy, the Great Entrance comprises the opening ritual act of the second, eucharistic half of the service. In this solemn procession, performed during the chant of the Byzantine Cherubicon hymn, the clergy carry the gifts of bread and wine from the prothesis, or altar of preparation, to the main altar. The ritual prefigures Christ's coming to us in the sacrament of his body and blood, and is called "great" to distinguish it from the first or "Little Entrance," which opens the Liturgy of the Word. See also introit; Little Entrance.

Great Lent, Byzantine-rite term for Lent, to distinguish from the other three Byzantine "Lents" or penitential periods before the feasts of Christmas, Sts. Peter and Paul (June 29), and Dormition (Assumption, August 15). Great Lent, as in other Eastern traditions, begins on the Monday before Western Ash Wednesday and ends before Holy Week, which is not considered a part of Lent. See also Lent.

Great Schism, 1378–1417, also known as the Great Western Schism, period of crisis in the Church in which two and then three rival popes claimed papal authority. (The term "Great Schism" is also sometimes used to refer to the division between Eastern and Western Christendom after 1054, when papal legates and the patriarch of Constantinople mutually excommunicated each other.)

After the death of Pope Gregory XI in 1378, who had returned the papacy to Rome from Avignon in 1377, his successor's election was interrupted by violence among the citizenry, who demanded an Italian pope. Panic-stricken, the cardinals elected Bartolomeo Prignano as Pope Urban VI (April 8, 1378). Despite his piety and administrative skills, Urban's unstable behavior and determination to increase papal authority alienated many cardinals, who then raised doubts about his election's validity. Abandoning Rome, virtually the same college that elected Urban now rejected him and chose Cardinal Robert of Geneva as Pope Clement VII (September 10, 1378). England, the Holy Roman Empire, and most of Italy sided with Urban VI, while France, Sicily, Scotland, Naples, and Spain championed Clement in Avignon. Among monasteries, religious orders, bishoprics, and even parishes, confusion reigned as appointees from each camp contended for the same authority.

The spirit of conciliarism, a movement with roots in the early thirteenth century, resurfaced with new force in response to the crisis. Adherents argued that since a general council had supreme authority in Christendom, even over the pope, a general council should be convened at once to resolve the problem. In 1409 cardinals from both obediences (the Roman, Gregory XII, and the Avignon, Benedict XIII) called the Council of Pisa, which deposed both Benedict XIII (Clement's successor) and Gregory XII (Urban's successor, following Boniface IX and Innocent VII), and elected Alexander V (1409). Neither Benedict nor Gregory accepted the council's decision, leaving the Church now with three popes instead of two. Finally, with the help of the Emperor Sigismund, the Council of Constance (1414–18) was convened and it deposed Alexander's successor, John XXIII. Gregory resigned, Benedict fled, and Martin V was elected. See also conciliarism; Constance, Council of; Eastern Schism; papacy, the. W. DAVID MYERS

Great Week, traditional name for Holy Week in the Christian East since the fourth century. It is still the common term for Holy Week in the Byzantine rite. See also Holy Week.

greca (grek'ah; It., "Greek"; perhaps a corruption of Eng., "great coat"), a long overcoat worn by European clergy over the cassock. It is suggested that because the coat resembled one worn by Greek or Byzantine clergy it assumed the name greca.

Greek Catholic Church, the Catholic counterpart to the Greek Orthodox Church in Greece and Turkey. The creation of such communities became possible after 1829 when Ottoman sultan Mohammed II removed his non-Latin Catholic subjects from the civil authority of the Orthodox patriarchs.

A Latin priest, John Marangos, began missionary work among the Greek Orthodox in Constantinople in 1856 and eventually formed a very small group of Byzantine Catholics. In 1878 Marangos died and was succeeded by Polycarp Anastasiadis, a former student at the Orthodox Theological School at Halki. In the 1880s Byzantine Catholic communities were also formed in two villages in Thrace.

In 1895 the French Assumptionist Fathers began work in Constantinople, where they founded a seminary and two small Greek Byzantine parishes. These Assumptionists were distinguished above all for the valuable scholarly studies they produced on the Eastern churches.

In 1911 Pope Pius X created an apostolic exarchate for the Byzantine Catholics in Turkey and named Isaias Papadopoulos as first bishop. He was succeeded in 1920 by Bishop George Calavassy (d. 1957). It was his task to oversee the immigration of virtually the entire Byzantine Catholic community of Constantinople to Athens and those of the two villages in Thrace to a town in Macedonia. This was part of a general exchange of populations that took place between Greece and Turkey in the 1920s. In view of this new situation, the Holy See erected a separate apostolic exarchate in Athens for Byzantine Catholics in Greece in 1923.

Although their appearance in Greece caused tension with the local Orthodox hierarchy, these Greek Catholics were determined to serve their neighbors by works of charity and social assistance. In 1944 they founded Pammakaristos hospital in Athens, which became known as one of the best in the nation.

The Greek Orthodox Church continues to oppose the existence of this church, which it views as a gratuitous creation of the Catholic Church in Orthodox territory. It is still illegal in Greece for Catholic priests to dress in a way typical of Orthodox clergy. In 1975 a new bishop was appointed for the Byzantine Catholics in Greece over the strong objections of the Orthodox archbishop of Athens.

The community remains very small, numbering in total about 2,350. In Greece, most of the faithful live in Athens, while in Turkey there is still one small parish in Istanbul. Currently eleven priests serve in Greece and one in Istanbul. All of them are celibate and originally of the Latin rite. See also Byzantine rite; Eastern churches; Eastern rites; Greek Catholics; Greek rite. RONALD G. ROBERSON Greek Catholics, term used, especially in the Austro-Hungarian Empire, for Ruthenian and Romanian Byzantine or "Greek-rite" Catholics, to distinguish them from "Latin-rite Catholics." After Greece became an independent country in 1830 the term "Greek Catholics," which could also refer to Catholic citizens of Greece regardless of rite, became a source of confusion. In the twentieth century the term "Byzantine Catholics" largely replaced "Greek Catholics," but the latter name has become current again in the 1990s, especially in areas where Byzantine Catholic churches, suppressed by the Communists after World War II, have recovered their freedom. See also Ruthenian Catholic Church; uniatism.

Greek College, the Pontifical Greek College of St. Athanasius, oldest of the Roman colleges for Eastern Catholic seminarians, located in Rome. Erected by Pope Gregory XIII in 1576, the college has been administered by various groups of clergy, most notably the Jesuits (1591–1602, 1621–1773, 1890–97). Closed for lack of funds in 1803, the college was reopened in 1835, then reformed and assigned by Pope Leo XIII, in 1897, to the Belgian Benedictines, who are still in charge of it. Its early alumni, not just ethnic Greeks but other "Greek (i.e., non-Latin) Catholics," included Albanians, Melkites, Romanians, and Slavic Ruthenians. The college has produced many notable alumni, including such Greeks as Leo Allatius (1586–1669), versatile scholar and Vatican librarian, and Peter Arcudius (ca. 1562–1633), controversialist and defender of the union of the Orthodox with Rome. Later, separate colleges were opened for such "Greek Catholic" nations as the Ruthenians (1897), Russians (1929), and Romanians (1936). Today the Greek College serves both Latin and Byzantine Catholic seminarians from Greece, as well as the Melkites and Italo-Albanians.

Greek rite, older synonym for the Byzantine rite. The earlier name dates back to the pre–Vatican II period (before 1962) when "Greek rite (or Mass)" and "Latin rite (or Mass)," common if inaccurate names for the Byzantine and Roman rites, were correlative contrasting terms in Latin ecclesiastical nomenclature. See also Byzantine rite.

Greeley, Andrew Moran, b. 1928, priest, sociologist, novelist, and columnist. Ordained priest in the archdiocese of Chicago in 1954, Greeley earned a Ph.D. in sociology from the University of Chicago in 1961 and served as director of the National Opinion Research Center in Chicago from 1961 to 1973. Since 1978 he has been professor of sociology at the University of Arizona and since 1991 professor of social science at the University of Chicago. He is the author of many works of nonfiction and fiction, including Unsecular Man (1974), The Communal Catholic (1976), and The Cardinal Sins (1981), and is one of the most widely quoted Catholics in America.

Greene, Graham, 1904–91, English novelist, critic, and playwright. One of the premier English men of letters in the twentieth century, he converted to the Catholic faith in 1926. His struggles with religious faith in a bleak world are best reflected in a trilogy of "Catholic" novels: The Power and the Glory (1940), The Heart of the Matter (1948), and The End of the Affair (1951), although there had been hints of these interests in his 1938 novel, Brighton Rock. Similar religious themes occur in two of his plays: The Living Room (1953) and The Potting Shed (1958).

In his later career, he was increasingly a religious skeptic, once describing himself as a "Catholic atheist." His later fiction reflected his restless travels, his commitment to left-wing politics (as well as a persistent antipathy toward the United States), and his continuing interest in issues of heroism as a form of saintliness and the ambiguity of human existence. He published the first volume of his autobiography in 1971 (A Sort of Life), with a second volume in 1989, Ways of Escape.

Gregorian calendar, the modern calendar. By the thirteenth century mathematicians had become aware that the Julian calendar (introduced by Julius Caesar) with its 365 1/4 days, made the year eleven minutes too long, producing a growing inconsistency between the real vernal equinox and the calendar. Since Easter and the moveable feasts of the Christian calendar were based upon the vernal equinox, the liturgical calendar was becoming increasingly inaccurate. Efforts were made at the councils of Constance (1414–1417) and Basel (1431–38) to reform the calendar, but it was only during the reign of Pope Gregory XIII (1572–85; hence the name) that a resolution of the Council of Trent on the calendar was finally put into effect. In 1582 the ten days between October 4 and 14 were dropped. This system was quickly accepted by Catholic countries, but Protestant and Orthodox lands resisted. Russia only adopted the Gregorian calendar after the Revolution of 1917.

Gregorian chant. See chant, Gregorian.

Gregorian Masses, the custom of celebrating Mass for thirty consecutive days at the request of a donor who makes an offering for a deceased person. The purpose is to seek God's deliverance of the deceased from purgatory. The custom derives from the Church's belief that the celebration of the Eucharist is efficacious for the living and the dead.

Gregorian reform, the movement of Church renewal beginning in the tenth century but associated with its most ardent champion, Pope Gregory VII (1073–85). Invigorated by the monastic reforms of houses like Cluny and Gorze in the tenth century and the wide religious revival of Europe at the time, the reformers turned their attentions to freeing the Church from compromising secular entanglements. Lay investiture was a general concern of these reformers as they sought to end this ritualization of secular involvement in religious affairs. Two specific issues, however, were at the heart of the reform agenda: simony, the buying or selling of Church offices, and clerical marriage. Celibacy was urged on all religious and clerics as a worthy aim for all consecrated in service to God; it was also designed to prevent the troublesome inheritance of Church properties by clerical offspring.

History: The reform was given new impetus and real direction by Leo IX (1049–54), who sought to eradicate widespread abuses in the Church by beginning with the papacy itself. He reformed election procedures, defined the role of cardinals, appointed reformers to key positions in the Church, and summoned provincial councils for the implementation of reforms. A successor, Nicholas II (1058–61), continued in a similar vein, but it was Gregory VII's pontificate that determined the course of ecclesiastical reform for the next half century.

A determined reformer and single-minded in his views regarding secular encroachments, Gregory insisted that all religious offices were under the dominion of the Church, over which he ruled as St. Peter's successor. As Gregory's recorded statements on the papacy, the Dictatus Papae, suggest, the ecclesial principles of Gregory's program were traditional but couched in strong and sometimes unyielding terms. His personality contributed more than his statements to his long and bitter feud over lay investiture with the headstrong Emperor Henry IV (1056–1106). Unused to compromise, Gregory ended his campaign in flight from Rome and an apparent failure.

The movement was given new life by Urban II (1088–99), a man every bit as determined as Gregory but abler as a politician. In the course of his campaign against lay investiture and other abuses, he excommunicated the kings of France and England. The struggle that was at the heart of the reform officially ended when a compromise was reached between the two sides and formalized in the Concordat of Worms (1122). There it was agreed that ecclesiastical elections would be free and canonical and that investiture would come from a spiritual lord. Secular rulers retained certain rights of presentation to vacancies and participated to a degree in elections. Other important results of the reform period included collections of laws and treaties generated by both sides of the debate leading up to Gratian's Decretum in the twelfth century and new developments in royal administration and theories of power. The papacy was a stronger institution after the reform period and the boundaries of authority between Church and state were articulated in ways that would influence political history for the rest of the Middle Ages. See also canon law; Dictatus Papae; Gregory VII; investiture controversy; papacy, the; simony; Urban II, Bl. WILLIAM J. DOHAR

Gregorian Sacramentary, a collection of prayers, prefaces, and some rubrical material of the Roman Church originally collected at the time of Gregory I (seventh century). In its original form it presented the liturgy celebrated at the Lateran, i.e., the papal liturgy. Various attempts during the sixth and seventh centuries to produce a sacramentary which would combine both the papal liturgy and the less formal presbyteral liturgy (represented by the Gelasian Sacramentary) had failed to bring about unity. Charlemagne, in his attempt at unifying the empire, saw a single liturgy as a possible aid. The Gregorian Sacramentary was not popular outside Rome. Gradually, a sacramentary comprised of elements from both the ancient Gregorian Sacramentary and an edition of the Gelasian Sacramentary was adopted in northern Italy and France. This hybrid sacramentary is evident in Roman usage by the tenth century and is the forerunner of our present sacramentary. See also sacramentary.

Gregorian University, formally known as Pontifical Gregorian University, Jesuit university in Rome. Founded as the Roman College by Ignatius of Loyola and Francis Borgia in 1551 and constituted by Pope Julius III in 1553, it was confirmed and established as a university by Pope Gregory XIII in 1582. Closely associated with the university, yet autonomous, are the Pontifical Biblical Institute, a center for biblical studies in Rome, and the Pontifical Oriental Institute, also in Rome, which deals with the history, traditions, and theology of the Eastern churches.

The university has faculties of theology, canon law, philosophy, ecclesiastical history, missiology (dealing with evangelization), and social sciences. There are institutes of psychology, religious sciences, and spirituality (concerned with Christian life and practice), a center of social communications, a center of Marxist studies, and a school of advanced Latin letters. The departments are all at postgraduate level.

The university is under the direction of the Society of Jesus (Jesuits). The Grand Chancellor of the Gregorian and associated institutes is the cardinal-prefect for the Sacred Congregation for Catholic Education. The Vice-Grand Chancellor is the general of the Jesuit order. The rector is the equivalent of university president.

In 1992, of the 294 faculty members, 162 were Jesuits, 104 were diocesan priests or members of other religious orders, 6 were nuns, 11 were laymen, and 11 were laywomen. The student body of 3,000 students from more than 100 countries included 615 women, of whom 287 were laywomen. Most of the men were either seminarians in training for the priesthood or priests and religious seeking advanced degrees, but their members also included 147 laymen.

Some of the Gregorian's publications include: Gregorianum, Studia Missionalia, Periodica de re morali canonica liturgica, Archivum Historiae Pontificiae, Analecta Gregoriana, and Miscellanea Historiae Pontificiae. JOHN NAVONE

Pope Gregory the Great, one of the most influential popes in the history of the Church, known for the guidelines he set down for the pastoral ministry of bishops, his liturgical reforms, and the development of Gregorian chant; tenth-century ivory panel.

Gregory I, "the Great," St., ca. 540–604, pope from 590 to 604. Gregory was born into an aristocratic Roman family related to the Anicii. His ancestors included popes Felix III (II) (483–92) and Agapitus I (535–36), and his father, Gordianus, was a senator. Ca. 572 Gregory was appointed Prefect of the City of Rome, but in 574–75, after his father's death and the retirement of his mother, Silvia, into religious life as a widow, he disbursed his fortune, converted the family home in Rome into a monastery (St. Andrew's), and retired there as a monk (not as abbot). Subsequently, Pope Pelagius II ordained him deacon and sent him as apocrisarius (Lat., official representative) to Constantinople, where he stayed from 579 to 586, debating the patriarch Eutyches on the resurrection of the body, attempting to secure the support of the emperor Maurice for the beleaguered populace of Italy, and living in a circle of conversation with other Latin clerics such as Leander of Seville (ca. 540–ca. 600) also resident in the capital. Recalled to Rome, Gregory returned to St. Andrew's, but at Pelagius II's death (590, of plague) was elected pope. He set about encouraging the people, preaching, and organizing penitential processions to pray for advertence of the plague. To Maurice's dismay, he negotiated independently with the Lombards, arranging settlements that restored peace to a ravaged countryside (on terms, however, that refused to destroy the Lombards by taking advantage of their own internal feuds).

Gregory's writings were enormously influential in the Middle Ages and later. Most influential among his exegetical writings is the great Moralia on Job, a compendium of Gregory's spiritual teaching, begun in Constantinople. The Forty Homilies on the Gospels (590–91) are examples of his popular preaching; the Homilies on Ezekiel (593–94) are examples of more learned exegetical discourse addressed to an audience of clerics and monks. Homilies on the Canticle of Canticles and a Commentary on the First Book of Kings also survive. But Gregory's most famous works may be the nonexegetical ones, the Dialogues and the Pastoral Rule. The latter, addressed to bishops, was widely read in all subsequent ages, including the Reformation. It sets out a vision of pastoral care that is adapted to the individual needs of the people, rooted in personal example and preaching, and characterized by the blend of contemplative renewal and social service so peculiarly Gregory's. The Dialogues describe the miracles and deeds of Italian saints, most notably St. Benedict (Book II). The letters of Gregory's papacy are preserved in the Registrum Epistolarum; the degree of his involvement in the Gregorian Sacramentary is disputed. He is a Doctor of the Church. Feast day: September 3 (formerly March 12). See also bishop.

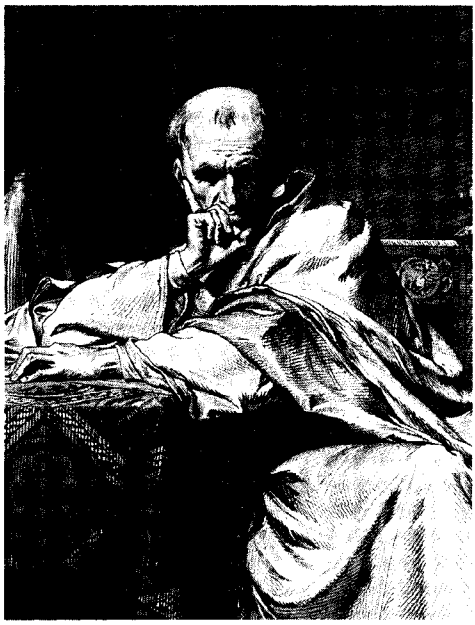
JOHN C. CAVADINI

Gregory II, St., 669–731, pope from 715 to 731. A supporter of the Benedictine order and of the missions of St. Boniface, Gregory rebuked Emperor Leo III the Isaurian for his iconoclasm (727). Feast day: February 13.

Gregory VII, St. [Hildebrand], ca. 1020–85, pope from 1073 to 1085, one of the most influential popes of the Middle Ages. Born in Tuscany, Hildebrand came to Rome at an early age, took minor orders, and became chaplain to Pope Gregory VI. After Gregory VI's death, he entered a Cluniac monastery, possibly even Cluny itself, but was soon called back to Rome, becoming an important figure in reformist circles.

Pope Gregory VII, whose pontificate is the great turning point between first- and second-millennial Catholicism; in increasing the temporal as well as the spiritual power of the papacy, he transformed the Church itself into a legal institution with a monarchical form of government.



As pope, Gregory was an ardent reformer and stubborn idealist, concentrating on clerical reform. At synods in 1074 and 1075, Gregory reaffirmed his predecessors' rulings against simony and clerical marriage, dispatching special legates throughout Europe to ensure that these rulings were enforced. At the synod of 1075, Gregory also issued a general ban on lay investiture. This ban brought Gregory into conflict with the German emperor Henry IV, during which Henry attempted to depose Gregory, and Gregory in turn excommunicated Henry, leading to the dramatic temporary reconciliation at Canossa. In 1084, Henry seized Rome and placed a candidate of his own on the papal throne. Gregory escaped through Norman intervention but remained a captive of the Normans and died in exile.

During his pontificate, Gregory expanded the authority of the Roman see. Through his influence, the Spanish church abandoned its own liturgy for the Roman. His emphasis on the purity of the clergy increased the moral standing of the papacy. Feast day: May 25. See also celibacy, clerical; investiture controversy; simony.

Gregory IX [Ugolino da Segni], ca. 1148–1241, pope from 1227 to 1241. Gregory, nephew of Innocent III, spent much of his reign in conflict over

Pope Gregory IX, although a strong supporter of the young Dominican and Franciscan orders and of the new universities in Paris and Toulouse, was distracted by political conflicts with the emperor Frederick II. Here he approves the first collection of papal decretals; painting by Raphael, in the Raphael Rooms, Vatican City.

papal rights with Emperor Frederick II. An ardent reformer, he oversaw as patron of Raymond of Peñafort important developments in canon law, championed the cause of the early Franciscans, and entrusted the Inquisition to the Dominicans. See also Inquisition.

Gregory X, Bl. [Tedaldo Visconti], 1210–76, pope from 1271 to 1276. While on pilgrimage in the Holy Land and not yet a priest or cardinal, Tedaldo Visconti was elected pope in 1271 after a lengthy vacancy. Though papal-imperial tensions marked much of his reign, his real interests lay in the liberation of Jerusalem, reunion with the Eastern Church, and continued ecclesiastical reform. Some reforms were achieved at the Second Council of Lyons, which he convened in 1274, but the pope's designs for a successful crusade and reunion with Constantinople were not realized. Feast day: January 9. See also Constantinople; Crusades; Jerusalem; Lyons II, Council of.

Gregory XI [Pierre-Roger de Beaufort], 1329–78, pope from 1370 to 1378. The last French pope, he was also the last of the Avignon popes before the Great Schism of 1378. Despite his personal will and Catherine of Siena's entreaties, he hesitated to return the papacy to a politically turbulent Rome. However, in 1376, after two failed attempts, he left Avignon and reached Rome in January 1377. His untimely death in 1378, the predominance of French cardinals, and Roman demands for an Italian pope led to the controversial election of 1378 and the following schism. See also Avignon; Catherine of Siena, St.

Gregory XIII [Ugo Buoncompagni], 1502–85, pope from 1572 to 1585. As pope Gregory pushed a militant Counter-Reformation with great success in Poland, the Low Countries, and Germany. He celebrated a Te Deum, the traditional way for celebrating a great victory, for the St. Bartholomew's Day Massacre, but victory in France came only after his death. Within the Catholic Church he implemented the decisions of the Council of Trent (1545–63), supported reforming efforts by the Jesuits, Capuchins, and Philip Neri, and founded a number of colleges to educate the clergy. In 1582 he promulgated the modern Gregorian calendar. See also Bartholomew's Day Massacre, St.; Counter-Reformation/Catholic Reformation; Gregorian calendar; Trent, Council of.

Gregory XVI [Bartolomeo Alberto Cappellari], 1765–1846, pope from 1831 to 1846. A Camaldolese monk, he wrote a defense of papal sovereignty and infallibility in 1799, became a cardinal in 1826, and was prefect of the Propagation of the Faith. He centralized much Church activity in the Holy See, especially missionary activity. An opponent of political and theological liberalism, he condemned F. R. de Lamennais, L. Bautain, and G. Hermes. He was a determined reactionary who resisted attempts at reform of papal government and insisted that the independence of the Church required maintenance of the Papal States, twice calling on Austrian troops to suppress revolts. He is remembered for having banned railways in his domain, denouncing them as a dangerous modern invention.

Gregory of Nazianzus, St., also known as Gregory Nazianzen, ca. 329–90, one of the Cappadocian Fathers, bishop, and Doctor of the Church. Son of the bishop of Nazianzus in Cappadocia, Gregory was educated broadly in Christian writings, including Origen's, and in Greek philosophy. His career in the Church was politically uneven and personally painful, but his clarity of theological exposition won him the epithet "the Theologian," a celebration specifically of his teaching about God, which he shares with John the Evangelist.

Gregory Nazianzus, one of the most influential defenders of Catholic orthodoxy at the Council of Constantinople in 381; during the council he was appointed bishop of Constantinople, but he resigned before the end of the year and returned home to Nazianzus.

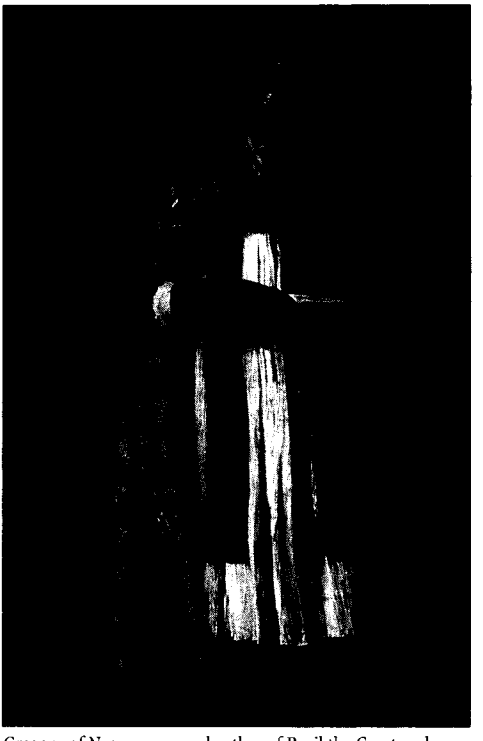
Gregory's intense but troubled friendship with Basil of Caesarea (Basil the Great) shaped much of his life. He accompanied Basil to Pontus on his ascetic retreat but found it uncongenial, despite their progress on the Philocalia, a digest of Origen's works. When Basil as bishop pressured Gregory to help him resist Arianism in Cappadocia by becoming bishop of insignificant Sasima, Gregory felt a betrayal still evident even through the eloquence of his funeral oration for his friend. His brief time (379–81) as bishop of the beleaguered orthodox community at Constantinople, including the time of the meeting of the second ecumenical council there, also ended in acrimony, ecclesiastical confusion, and his withdrawal again to Nazianzus. Finally, he departed even from that responsibility to a life of seclusion. From his letters and from his voluminous poetry, Gregory's responses to the events of his life are known with unusual fullness for the fourth century.

It was in his theological orations, particularly the Five Orations on the Divinity of the Word, that he most clearly displayed his ability to bring resources from his classical education together with his incisive presentation of Christian doctrines. His refutation of Eunomian claims to know God's essence developed a view of God's incomprehensibility crucial for Orthodox theology. On the Trinity, he was clearer than Basil about the deity and procession of the Holy Spirit—clearer, by his own account, than was the NT—and he took the lead in providing arguments against Apollinarianism. Feast day: January 2 (West); January 25 and 30 (East). See also Cappadocian Fathers; Christology; Trinity, doctrine of the.

KATHRYN L. JOHNSON

Gregory of Nyssa, St., ca. 335–ca. 395, bishop and theologian. The youngest and the least prominent of the three Cappadocian Fathers, neither "doctor" nor "theologian" of the Church, he lacked Basil the Great's eminence as a monastic legislator or Gregory of Nazianzus's crispness of orthodox expression; on topics like the possibility of universal salvation, he remained close enough to the Origenist heritage to arouse concern among some theologians. Twentieth-century theology, however, has been increasingly interested in the individual subtlety of his positions and the evocative power of his spiritual writings.

The younger brother of Macrina and Basil, Gregory received his wide-ranging education from them and his own efforts, rather than in the secular schools as did Basil. After a foray into marriage and work as a rhetor, he accepted his brother's appeal for help with anti-Arian resistance in Cappadocia and so was ordained bishop of Nyssa in 372. Although disappointing to Basil as an administrator and providing at least a pretext of mismanagement to allow Arians temporarily to depose him, Gregory was effective in Church politics. Active in synods and local elections, he played a role at the Council of Constantinople in 381 and emerged into his greatest productivity after Basil's death.



Gregory of Nyssa, younger brother of Basil the Great and one of the Cappadocian theologians, who championed the teaching of the Council of Nicaea (325) on the divinity of Jesus Christ and that of the Council of Constantinople (381) on the divinity of the Holy Spirit.

In addition to sharing with Basil and Gregory of Nazianzus in the theological refutation of Eunomius, he wrote an important brief catechism and an explanation of God's unity which grounds the Christian affirmation in the oneness of divine operation. His explication of the creation of humanity, with an intricate treatment of the imago Dei, was meant to supplement Basil's Hexaemeron. Especially intriguing is his Life of Moses, which treats the ascent of Mount Sinai both as narrative and as mystical experience in order to suggest never-ending growth in enjoyment of God: here both Gregory's indebtedness to Origen and his creative transformation of that heritage are clearly evident. Finally, it is in Gregory's works that the otherwise-silent theological voice of Macrina can be heard. Feast day: March 9. See also Cappadocian Fathers; Christology; imago Dei; Trinity, doctrine of the. KATHRYN L. JOHNSON

Gregory of Palamas, St. See Palamas, St. Gregory.

Gregory of Rimini, d. 1358, Augustinian Hermit, philosopher, and theologian. Philosophically a nominalist and thoroughly steeped in the writings of Augustine of Hippo, he emphasized the corruption of human nature, the incapacity of free will, the need for grace, and predestination. See also Augustine of Hippo, St.; nominalism.

Gregory of Tours, St., 538–94, bishop of Tours (573–94) famous for his History of the Franks covering events from creation to 591, but especially focusing on the rise of Frankish power, the years 580–91 in particular. Gregory's other surviving works, mostly hagiographical, are considered much less reliable than the History. Feast day: November 17. See also Franks.

Gregory Thaumaturgus, St. (thaw-muh-tuhr' guhs; Gk., "wonder-worker"), ca. 210–ca. 270, bishop of Neocaesarea (ca. 240–70). A pupil of Origen (to whom Gregory addressed his famous Thanksgiving) and later teacher of Macrina the Elder (grandmother of Basil and Gregory of Nyssa), he is an important link between Origen's generation and the flowering of Cappadocian theology. Later lives, including one by Nyssa, credit him with miracles, hence his name. Feast day: November 17. See also Cappadocian Fathers; Origen.

Gregory the Illuminator, St., also known as the Enlightener, ca. 231–ca. 325, apostle and patron saint of Armenia. As bishop of Ashtishat, he organized the Church in Armenia, established a native clergy, and evangelized the people. Feast day: September 30.

gremial (greh'mee-uhl; Lat., "lap"), a small, silk apron or lapcloth. The gremial was laid upon a bishop's lap during liturgical rites to protect the bishop's garments from stains during anointings and the distribution of ashes, palms, or candles.

Gremillion, Joseph, 1919–94, pastor, Vatican official. A priest of the diocese of Shreveport, Louisiana, ordained in 1943, he served as the first secretary of the Pontifical Commission (now Council) for Justice and Peace, 1967–74. He also served as director of the Institute for Pastoral and Social Ministry at the University of Notre Dame, 1983–86, and remained at Notre Dame engaged in research and writing until his death. He was author or editor of more than a dozen books, including Journal of a Southern Pastor (1957).

Grey Friars, the popular name of the Franciscan order in England, so called from the color of their habit, which distinguished them from the members of other mendicant orders. In 1224 the first Franciscans arrived in England, immediately establishing themselves in the ecclesiastical, commercial, and intellectual centers of the country: Canterbury, London, and Oxford. Their evangelical way of life and preaching soon made them immensely popular, and by 1250 there were some fifty houses with over twelve hundred friars in the country. Franciscan theologians, such as John Duns Scotus (d. 1308), were prominent at Oxford, and John Peckham eventually became archbishop of Canterbury (1279–92). The English province was dissolved by Henry VIII during the Reformation, when a number of friars suffered martyrdom. A second province was established in the seventeenth century, which survived despite penal laws for two hundred years; new foundations of Observants and Capuchins were established in the mid-nineteenth century. The medieval name survives in Greyfriars College, Oxford. See also Franciscan order.

Grey Nuns, officially known as the Sisters of Charity, a pontifical congregation of religious women, founded in Montreal in 1738 by Marie Marguerite d'Youville. When Madame d'Youville and three companions rented a house to care for the poor and ill, Montreal scoffed at the efforts of the widow of the disgraced François d'Youville. In derision, the group was called les soeurs grises (Fr., "the drunken nuns"), a title they embraced and transformed by adopting a grey (Fr., gris) habit in 1755. The Grey Nuns formally became a religious community under King Louis XV in 1753 and received papal approval in 1865.

The Sisters of Charity comprise six autonomous congregations: the original foundation in Montreal (S.G.M.); the Grey Nuns of St. Hyacinthe, near Montreal (S.G.S.H.); the Grey Nuns of Quebec (S.C.Q.); the Grey Nuns of the Cross, Ottawa (S.G.C.); the Grey Nuns of the Sacred Heart, Philadelphia (G.N.S.H.); and a separate group based in Pembroke, Ontario, the Grey Sisters of the Immaculate Conception. The Grey Nuns are known for their work among the poor, the orphaned, the aged, and the mentally ill (especially the Quebec congregation) and for their schools and hospitals.

Griffiths, Bede, 1906–93, English Benedictine priest, missionary, and ecumenist. His ministry took him to India (1955), where he attempted to adapt Eastern spiritual practices to Christianity.

Grignion, St. Louis Mary (green'yohn). See Montfort, St. Louis Grignion de.

Groote, Geert de, 1340–84, Dutch reformer and spiritual writer. Influenced by the Carthusians, he sought to counteract the moral laxity of the clergy in the diocese of Utrecht. His followers gathered into communities of Brethren and Sisters of the Common Life. See also Brethren and Sisters of the Common Life.

Grosseteste, Robert, ca. 1170–1253, scientist, theologian at Oxford, and bishop of Lincoln from 1235. Of poor origin, he was in his early career deeply interested in scientific endeavors, augmenting traditional accounts of the sciences by personal observation. After mid-life, his interests shifted to theology; he lectured at Oxford and had a special concern for the Franciscans such as Adam of Marsh attached to the university. Rare among medieval theologians for a knowledge of Greek, he translated anew Pseudo-Dionysius, and his translation of the complete Nicomachean Ethics of Aristotle was highly valued. As bishop of Lincoln, he demonstrated a genuine concern for pastoral care and reform.

Grotius, Hugo, 1583–1645, Dutch jurist and statesman, known as "the father of international law." A child prodigy, Grotius served as attorney general of Holland before being exiled as a result of conflict between conservative and liberal Calvinists. An intellectual disciple of the Spanish Jesuit theologian Francisco de Suarez (d. 1617), Grotius was noted for his recognition of a natural law conforming to divine law but recognizable without the assistance of revelation because of its self-evidence or a consensus about its requirements. In addition to natural law, nations are governed by volitional laws dependent upon the consent of the governed. Grotius's notion of volitional law formed the basis for later developments in positive international law. See also just-war doctrine; natural law.

Grottaferrata, Abbey of, Byzantine Catholic monastery in the Alban Hills eleven miles southeast of Rome. Founded by the Italo-Byzantine monk Nilus of Rossano in 1004, before the Eastern Schism which broke communion between the Catholic and Orthodox churches, this abbey is notable for being the only Byzantine monastery in unbroken communion with Rome since before the schism. The last surviving institution of the numerous medieval Greek monasteries that once dotted southern Italy and Sicily, Grottaferrata was reformed under Pope Leo XIII in 1881, after a period of latinization and decline. The famous collection of Greek manuscripts in its library includes some of the oldest extant Byzantine liturgical codices. Most of the abbey's vocations come from the Italo-Albanian Catholic Church of Calabria and Sicily, and the monks run a minor seminary for this church.

grotto (It.,"cavern"), an artifical structure made to look like a cave or a natural recess. Caves and other natural recesses are often associated with religious sites. The cave at Lourdes (France) where the Virgin is believed to have appeared to Bernadette Soubirous in the last century has been frequently reproduced at churches and retreat centers as devotion to Our Lady of Lourdes spreads.

Guadalupe, Our Lady of, apparition and icon of the Blessed Virgin Mary, considered as the empress, patron saint, and mother of the Americas. The first apparitions were reported to have taken place between December 9 and 12 of 1531 in Tepeyac, a poor area on the periphery of Mexico City. She appeared first to the Amerindian Juan Diego, then to his dying uncle Juan Bernardino (whom she healed), and finally, miraculously painted on the mantle of Juan Diego, to the bishop and others present. The icon remains in the Basilica of Our Lady of Guadalupe at Tepeyac, where millions from the Americas and around the world go on pilgrimage every year. Scientific investigations have attested to the authenticity of the cloth and to the unexplainable nature of the painting. Many miracles continue to be attributed to her, yet the greatest is the ongoing response of the people. In order to appreciate the full religious impact of Guadalupe, it is necessary to situate it historically and anthropologically.

The famous grotto of Our Lady at the University of Notre Dame in Indiana, where throughout the day and night students and others come to pray.

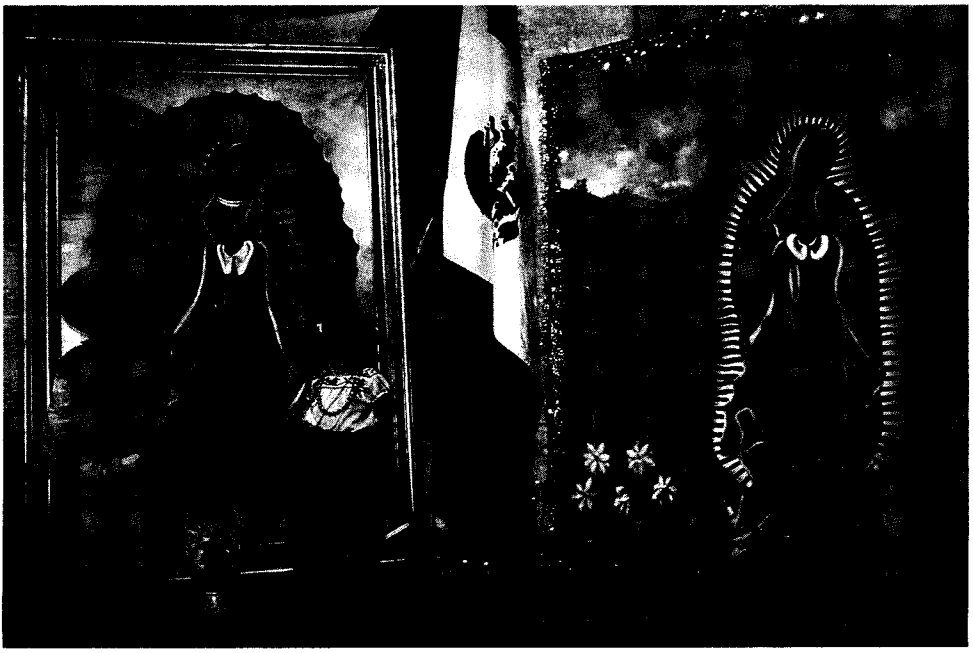
Historical Background: The devastating and unequal encounter in the early sixteenth century between the European and the Amerindian worlds was a clash between the two cruel and violent empires: the Iberian Christians of Europe and the Aztec Nahuatls of the Americas. The culture of the former was based on the anthropology of reason, individual struggle, and conquest while that of the latter was based on the anthropology of ritual, cosmic communion, and submission to the gods. Both killed: the Spanish slaughtered natives to conquer land and reap profits from gold; the Aztecs performed human sacrifice for the sake of cosmic harmony.

Militarily, the Iberians proved to be more powerful than the Amerindians and no compromise between the two worlds seemed possible or desirable. With the bloody defeat of the Aztec Empire in 1521, the entire Amerindian world was defeated. The conquered had no option but to submit or die and their numbers were decreasing drastically. At this moment of collective death the totally unsuspected event of Guadalupe took place at Tepeyac. For the defeated peoples of the Americas, it functioned as a resurrection event—no longer victory or defeat but the birth of a new people. Some may argue about what really happened at Tepeyac in 1531, but there is no doubt about its phenomenal effects: the Mestizo Church of the Americas was born.

The Apparition: Our Lady of Guadalupe spoke to Juan Diego in Nahuatl, with its rich religious imagery, but her message was new both to the Amerindians and Iberians alike. The Aztecs had demanded human sacrifice and the missioners had spoken of judgment, punishment, and eternal damnation, but she spoke to Juan Diego of love, compassion, and hospitality.



At a festival of Our Lady of Guadalupe in Mexico, reproductions of the image of Our Lady visible on the cloak of the peasant Juan Diego after she appeared to him in 1531.

She presented herself to Juan Diego as the Mother of God, but Juan Diego in turn presented her to the bishop as the mother of Our Savior, Jesus Christ.

In the depiction of Our Lady of Guadalupe, based on Juan Diego's report of the apparition, she is neither a native goddess nor a European Madonna, but combines both in a new way. Her dress is European while the decorations on the dress are indigenous and her face is Mestizo. She appears very human, but her whole self radiates divinity. She appears pregnant and over her womb appears the Nahuatl symbol for the new center of the universe: Christ, who through her will be profoundly incarnated in the soil that is the collective consciousness of the new humanity.

Theological Meaning: In her, the two anthropologies come together so as to produce something totally different than either of the two had been able to achieve independently: the change is from the absolute exclusion of the other as other for the sake of ethnic/religious unity to the inclusion of otherness for the sake of new life. In the Mestizo Mother of the Americas, irreconcilable differences are not only reconciled but a new "beyond exclusion existence" is introduced, one that will destroy the very basis of cruel violence produced by any exclusion-based existence. She does not demand sacrifice or victims, but only confidence and acceptance of her universal motherhood. She says to Juan Diego: "Do not be afraid, you have nothing to fear. Am I not here, your compassionate mother?" Through the apparition at Guadalupe, the most original aspect of the kingdom of God as lived and proclaimed by Jesus of Nazareth was effectively introduced into the New World. It marked the profound anthropological birth of the truly new Christian humanity of the Americas. In Latin American Catholicism today she is both the feminine aspect of the face and heart of God, which was absent from the Christianity of that period, and the Mother of Jesus in the Americas: the mother of the new man or woman of the Americas. Feast day: December 12. See also apparitions of the Blessed Virgin Mary; Latin America, Catholicism in.

Bibliography

Elizondo, Virgilio. La Morenita: Evangelizer of the Americas. San Antonio, TX: MACC Publications, 1974.

Lafaye, J. Quetzalcoatl and Guadalupe. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1976.

Rodriguez, J. Our Lady of Guadalupe: Faith and Empowerment Among Mexican American Women. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1993.

Sylvest, Edwin. Nuestra Señora de Guadalupe: Mother of God, Mother of the Americas. Dallas, TX: Bridwell Library (Southern Methodist University), 1992.

VIRGILIO ELIZONDO

guardian angel, spiritual being who protects a person. Pious Catholic belief assigns to each person a special angel who watches over the bodily and spiritual health of that person. Based on affirmations in the NT (e.g., Matt 18:10; Acts 12:15), the belief has been widespread but never a part of Church dogma. The Matthean text has led to a close association of guardian angels and the protection of children in both prayer and art. There is a liturgical observance in honor of such angelic guardians on October 2 in the Roman calendar of feasts. See also angel.

Guardini, Romano, 1885–1968, German Catholic theologian and leader of the liturgical renewal. Born in Verona, Italy, he grew up in Mainz, Germany, was ordained a priest (1910) and received a Ph.D. from the University of Freiburg im Breisgau (1915). After further studies at the University of Bonn, he was appointed the first professor of Catholic theology at the University of Berlin (1923) and simultaneously assumed leadership of the influential Catholic youth association "Quickborn." He was removed from his professorship by the Nazi regime in 1939, but after the war was awarded academic positions at the University of Tübingen (1945–48) and the University of Munich (1948–63).

Guardini is recognized as one of the great theologians of the twentieth century, one who anticipated the changes begun at the Second Vatican Council

A guardian angel; seventeenth-century Domenichino painting, Gallerie Nazionali di Capodimonte, Naples, Italy.

(1962–65). He was the author of more than sixty books and over one hundred articles, including The Spirit of the Liturgy (1918), The Lord (1937), and The End of the Modern Age (1950). He received numerous awards, among them the Peace Prize of the German Publishers (1952), the Great Cross of Service of the Bundes Republic of Germany (1959), and the Erasmus Award (1962). Shortly before his death he was offered the cardinal's hat by Pope Paul VI, but he respectfully declined.

Guéranger, Prosper (gay-rahn-zhay'), 1805–75, restorer of the Benedictine order at the abbey of Solesmes (1837) in France. His multivolume Liturgical Year renewed interest in the spirituality of worship. See also liturgical movement; Solesmes.

Guibert, Joseph de, 1877–1942, French Jesuit priest and theologian. De Guibert is known for contributions to mystical and ascetical theology, and founded Revue d'ascétique et de mystique (currently Revue d'histoire de la spiritualité). From 1922 until his death, he taught mystical theology at the Gregorian University in Rome. See also mystical theology.

guilds, professional associations. In the medieval period each of the skilled crafts (e.g., masons, blacksmiths, apothecaries) formed associations to maintain standards of work and to oversee the training of apprentices. These associations had their own patron saints, their own forms of charity, and, frequently, their own chapels and meeting halls. In some ways they were precursors of modern labor unions. Beyond mutual benefits, the guilds often contributed to the larger needs of society, as attested by their donations to the decoration of medieval cathedrals like Chartres.

More recently the term has been taken to mean any church organization dedicated to a special skill, service, or devotion.

guilt, moral, the condition of accountability or culpability that is incurred by committing sin. Guilt in moral theology results from a deliberate violation of the moral law. It involves both the state of being at fault, or guilty, and the state of just liability to punishment. Guilt as a moral concept should be distinguished from guilt feelings of distress that follow a transgression, although they may be experienced by people who have committed no transgression. Guilt feelings may be healthy or pathological. See also sin.

Günther, Anton, (guhn'tair), 1783–1863, Austrian philosopher and theologian. Ordained in 1820, he developed a form of ontological argument that deduced the existence of God from an analysis of self-consciousness. He viewed the threefold creation of the human person as spirit, nature, and human person, an image of the Trinity. His books were placed on the Index of Forbidden Books in 1857 for being semi-rationalist, i.e., reducing supernatural truths to truths of reason. Günther founded an influential theological school in the mid-nineteenth century, one interested in the modernization of theology and opposed to the ascendant neo-Scholastic model of theology. After the First Vatican Council, some of his followers joined the Old Catholics. See also Old Catholics; rationalism.

Gutiérrez, Gustavo, (*goo*s-tahv'oh goo-tee-air'-ehz), b. 1928, Peruvian Catholic theologian often credited with the founding of Latin American liberation theology. After receiving a diploma in medicine, Gutiérrez studied philosophy, psychology, and theology at the Catholic University of Lima, the University of Louvain, and the University of Lyons, which awarded him a Ph.D. in theology (1959). During studies at Rome's Gregorian University, he was ordained a priest for the diocese of Lima in 1959. Returning to Lima in 1960, Gutiérrez served as a pastor and simultaneously taught theology at the Catholic University of Lima. In 1968 he was a theological adviser at the Second General Conference of Latin American Bishops (CELAM II) in Medellín, Colombia. Author of numerous books and articles on Christian faith and the plight of the poor, his book A Theology of Liberation (1971) inaugurated the development of the liberation theologies of Latin America. See also Latin America, Catholicism in; liberation theology.

Guyon, Madame Jeanne Marie, 1648–1717, French mystic. As a young widow, she became a controversial spiritual guide. Her teaching and writing stressed that the love of God requires great detachment and passivity. She greatly influenced Jean de Caussade and François Fénelon. See also Quietism.

gyrovagi (gi-roh-vah'gee; Gk, gyros, "circle"; Lat., vagari, "to wander"), wandering monks. Mentioned in the Rule of St. Benedict (ca. 540) as the "worst kind" of monk, the term refers to those who do not maintain stability in a single monastery. See also wanderer.

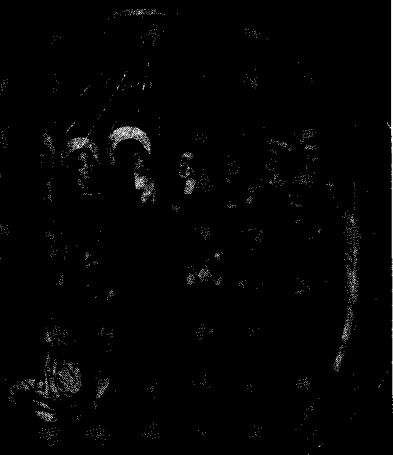
H



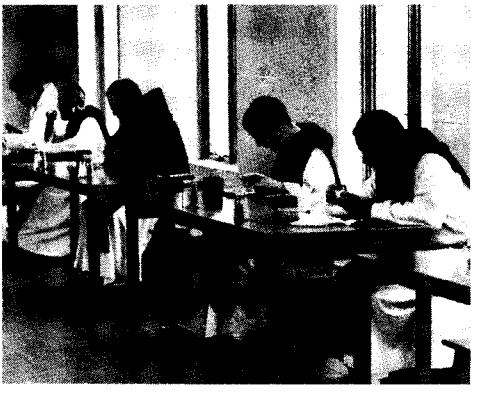
Haas, Francis Joseph, 1889–1953, educator, bishop, and government official. A priest of the archdiocese of Milwaukee, Haas received a doctorate in sociology from The Catholic University of America in 1922. He served on the faculty of St. Francis Seminary in Milwaukee, was director of the National Catholic School of Social Service in Washington (1931–35), and was dean of the School of Social Science at Catholic University (1937–43). Appointed to numerous government positions, he was a member of President Franklin Roosevelt's National Labor Board and President Truman's Committee on Civil Rights and chair of the Fair Employment Practices Committee in 1943. Named bishop of Grand Rapids, Michigan, in 1943, he served until his death in 1953.

habit, the distinctive clothing worn by members of religious orders. "Religious are to wear the habit of the institute made according to the norm of proper law [their respective constitutions] as a sign of their consecration and as a testimony of poverty" (Code of Canon Law, can. 669). As religious orders and congregations were established, their founders usually required the members to wear some simple uniform garb. Often it reflected the contemporary dress of the period. In the case of women's congregations, the habit was frequently an adaptation of what widows were wearing at the time.

Vatican II (1962–65) reiterated the need for simplicity in the choice of a habit. It further stipulated that habits "should meet the requirements of health and be suited to the circumstances of time and place as well as to the services required by those who wear them" (Decree on the Appropriate Renewal of the Religious Life, n. 17). In many cases this has been interpreted as requiring only that some sign of religious commitment be visible.

Religious orders that still require a habit have adopted a simple street-length black dress and short black veil. Religious orders of men, on the other hand, have long been required to wear the dress of secular clergy (a black suit and Roman collar) outside their residence or place of ministry. Members of those congregations who still wear a habit at home or at work continue to wear the traditionally distinctive habit of their order. See also religious life; religious orders and congregations.

Trappist monks in habit, eating a meal in silence.



habit, moral, a disposition toward certain virtuous or sinful acts. To understand the significance of the concept of habit in traditional moral theology, as it developed from the writings of Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) in particular, one must be familiar with the main lines of Scholastic philosophical psychology. According to this theory, the rational capacities of intellect and will, as well as the passions, are indeterminate in that they must be given some definite content and form in order to function properly. For example, communication presupposes the possession of certain rational capacities by every human being, but in order to communicate with others, one must develop these capacities so that one acquires habitual knowledge of a language, together with an ability to use this knowledge in the proper way. This knowledge may be more or less accurate, and one's skill in using it may be more or less complete; some habitual knowledge and facility in the use of language is necessary to communication, but the relevant habits may be badly formed, even though they are sufficient to enable some degree of communication.

If they are well formed, the habits that qualify the human capacities for knowledge, passionate response, and action are known as virtues. In this sense, the concept of virtue expands the usual definition of a morally good quality to include such purely intellectual qualities as wisdom and understanding. In the more properly moral sense, a virtue is a habit qualifying those powers of the human soul that result directly in action, namely, the passions, will, and the practical intellect. At the same time, these powers can be qualified in ways that are ultimately destructive and deforming, rather than perfecting; in that case, the habits in question are vices rather than virtues. See also vice; virtue. JEAN PORTER

Hadewijch of Antwerp (hayd'wich), a thirteenth-century Flemish Beguine (a semimonastic) and mystic. Her Poems in Stanzas, Poems in Couplets, Visions, and Letters display a familiarity with Scripture, Christological and trinitarian theology, courtly love literature, music, astronomy, and numerology. Hadewijch's mysticism of love is characterized by theological precision, poetic genius, and human experience. See also Beghards/Beguines; mysticism.

Hadrian I, or Adrian, d. 795, pope from 772 to 795. A deacon before being elected pope, Hadrian faced various assaults by the Lombard king Desiderius; the pope's appeals to Charlemagne for help resulted in Charlemagne's conquest of the Lombards in 774. Charlemagne's subsequent gifts of lands helped complete the Papal States. Hadrian supported the iconophile Second Council of Nicaea (787) and helped end the Adoptionist heresy in Spain. In support of Frankish church reforms, he gave Charlemagne in 774 a collection of canons and decrees, the "Dionysio-Hadriana," based on earlier work of Dionysius Exiguus. See also Adoptionism; Charlemagne; iconoclasm; Nicaea, Second Council of; Papal States.

Hadrian VI [Adrian Florensz Dedal], 1459–1523, pope from 1522 to 1523. Born in Utrecht, Holland, Hadrian was the last non-Italian pope before John Paul II, elected in 1978, and the first reforming pope of the sixteenth century. The election to the papacy of this student of the Brethren of the Common Life, professor of theology at Louvain, and tutor to the future emperor Charles V raised the hopes of reformers among both Catholics and Protestants. In his twenty months as pope his efforts to reform the Church were thwarted by the Roman Curia and his overtures to the Protestants were rebuffed.

Haec Sancta (hayk sahnk'tah; Lat., "This Holy"), decree of the Council of Constance, promulgated April 1415, declaring the council legitimately assembled with authority directly from Christ. Authorized to end the Great Schism and reform the Church, it could thus demand obedience from all Christians, including the pope. See also Constance, Council of; Great Schism.

haggadah, also spelled ag(g)adah (Heb., nagad, "to tell, show"), refers to the nonlegal material in rabbinic literature. It includes various narratives and folktales, biblical interpretations, moral and wisdom teachings, sermonic materials, and rabbinic stories. Haggadah is usually treated as less authoritative than halakah, the rabbinic system of laws.

Hagia Sophia (hah-gee'ah saw-fi̱'ah; Gk., "Holy Wisdom"), also called Sancta Sophia or Saint Sophia, the name of several Greek Orthodox church buildings, especially the two cathedral churches built on the same site in Constantinople (today Istanbul, Turkey). The name, Hagia Sophia, originally only Sophia (Gk., "wisdom"), is attested ca. 430 for the earlier Constantinople cathedral of that name. The term Sophia, from the second century used for the second Person of the Trinity, refers to Christ as "Wisdom of God" (cf. Luke 12:49; 7:35). The first Hagia Sophia—actually the second church built on the site—burned down in the Nika Revolt of 532. The new Hagia Sophia, which is still standing, was commissioned by Emperor Justinian I and inaugurated in 537. The largest surviving church of antiquity and, at the time, one of the largest structures ever built, it is considered one of the greatest buildings in the history of architecture. Its dome-on-pendentives solution for roofing the large, unobstructed space of the nave established what is known as the "Byzantine style." Justinian's Hagia Sophia played a central role in Byzantine imperial and church ceremonial, and had a determinative influence on the formation of the ritual and symbolism of the Byzantine rite. The alterations demanded by later strengthening and repairs of the building have not substantially altered its original design. Four minarets were added when the building was turned into a mosque of the same name (Ayasofya Camii) after the fall of Constantinople to the Turks in 1453. Hagia Sophia, secularized since 1934, is now a museum. See also Constantinople.

View of the cupola and interior of the sixth-century Hagia Sophia basilica in Constantinople (now Istanbul).

ROBERT F. TAFT

hagiography (hay-gee-ah' gruh-fee; Gk., hagios, "holy"; graphein, "writing"), biographical narratives, largely of the saints. Beginning with the records (Lat., acta) of early judicial processes of martyrs, through stories of the actual martyrdom (Lat., passiones), to later narratives of the virtues and miracles of the saints, there has been an enormous body of literature over the millennia devoted to the lives of the saints. The most characteristic form of this literature is the legendum (Lat., pl. legenda), a story written to be read (Lat., legere, "to read") at liturgical services on the saint's feast day.

The historical evolution of these texts has led to an entire field of study to establish their historical core, the different genres of writing, and the evidence they give of different spiritualities. See also saints.

Hagiology (hah-gee-ah'-loh-jee; Gk., hagios, "holy"), also called Hagiody, the Armenian Srbasac'at'iwn (sorb, "holy") or liturgical chant sung during the Great Entrance of the Armenian Patarag or Eucharist, so-called because the chant normally concludes with the hymn, "Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts" of Isa 6:3.

Hail, Holy Queen. See Salve, Regina.

Hail Mary, a popular Catholic prayer based on the angel's greeting spoken to the Virgin Mary at the Annunciation (Luke 1:28), and on Elizabeth's greeting when Mary visited her (Luke 1:42). "Hail Mary" translates the original Latin title of the prayer, Ave Maria. Sometimes referred to as the Angelic Salutation, forms of this prayer date from the eleventh century in the West and perhaps from as early as the sixth century in the East. The Hail Mary said today was not popular until the sixteenth century. During the Crusades, Mary was invoked with this prayer for success in efforts to recapture the Holy Land. From 1568 until 1955, this prayer was part of the Divine Office (Liturgy of the Hours) offered daily by monks and clergy. Most Catholics are familiar with the Hail Mary from its use in praying the Rosary. In the five-decade Rosary, the Hail Mary is recited ten times in each of the decades as one meditates on the mysteries of Jesus' ministry and redeeming activity. The Hail Mary is still found in the Little Office of the Blessed Virgin Mary, and its inclusion there can be dated from the eleventh century. See also Annunciation; Marian devotion.

THE HAIL MARY

Hail Mary, full of grace:
The Lord is with thee.
Blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb, Jesus.
Holy Mary, Mother of God,
pray for us sinners,
now and at the hour of our death.
Amen.

Haiti, Catholicism in. Catholicism first came to this Caribbean republic with the expedition from Spain led by Christopher Columbus in 1492. Capuchins and Jesuits were the principal missionaries to Haiti in the eighteenth century. Catholicism has faced many problems in Haiti, including the abject poverty of its people, the lack of an adequate native clergy, oppressive governments, and the persistence of superstition among the people, including the practice of voodoo. It is the only country in modern times, however, where a priest (of the Salesian order) has been elected president, Jean-Bertrand Aristide, in 1991. He was driven from the country the same year by a military coup, but was restored to power in 1994. Under pressure from the Vatican, he resigned from the priesthood the same year. There are 2 archdioceses and 7 dioceses and almost 6 million Catholics in Haiti, comprising approximately 90 percent of the total population (1994). See also Latin America, Catholicism in; voodoo.

halakah (Heb., halak, "to walk"), denotes a rabbinic legal ruling or statement and also the system of laws that make up the rabbinic way of life. Halakah derives from biblical interpretation, Jewish custom, and rabbinic reasoning and is usually contrasted with haggadah, the nonlegal material in rabbinic literature.

Hallinan, Paul J., 1911–68, archbishop and progressive leader at Vatican II. Born in Painesville, Ohio, he attended the University of Notre Dame and was ordained a priest for the diocese of Cleveland in 1937. He did parish work before serving as an Army chaplain and winning a Purple Heart for service in World War II. After the war, he held a number of diocesan posts and served as national chaplain for the Newman apostolate on non-Catholic university campuses. In 1958 he was named bishop of Charleston, South Carolina, and, in 1962, he became the first archbishop of Atlanta. He won national recognition during the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) as an advocate of liturgical renewal and ecumenical dialogue and as a spokesman for civil rights and international peace. Regarded as an emerging leader of the Church in the United States, he died at the age of 57.

halo, a ring or circle of light surrounding the head of a holy person and various artistic representations of Christ. The use of the halo is not original to Christianity. The Greeks and later the Romans employed it to signify deity or close association with the gods. Drawing upon the liturgical symbolism of light, Christians began to associate this image with God's grace mediated through Jesus Christ as early as the third century. At first, only Jesus was depicted with a halo, but, by the fifth century, this honor was extended to angels and saints, particularly the Blessed Virgin Mary.

hands, imposition of, a liturgical gesture found in the OT, continued in the NT, and still used by the Church today. It expresses identity and solidarity between the one imposing hands and the one receiving the imposition. It is employed for blessing, healing, invocation of the Holy Spirit, and conferral of office and authority. It is the principal gesture in the rite for ordination of deacons, presbyters and bishops. Evidence for the use of this gesture for appointment to office in the Church is found in the NT (cf. 1 Tim 4:14). It symbolizes and effects communion among ordained ministers. See also blessing; healing; ordination.

happiness, the complete fulfillment of all one's desires. All persons seek happiness but differ in their conceptions of what will lead to it. The Catholic Church teaches that happiness consists in being united with God, the ultimate goal of human existence. Unity with God is achieved through knowledge and contemplation of God as God is. We come at least to partial knowledge of God by acting in accord with the virtues and by conforming our will to the will of God. Complete knowledge of God, and thus complete happiness, is not attainable in this life.

Harding, St. Stephen. See Stephen Harding, St.

Häring, Bernard, b. 1912, German Redemptorist priest and moral theologian. He taught moral theology at the Alfonsian Academy in Rome before his retirement in 1988. Häring has written extensively, lectured throughout the world in many different languages, and is reputed by many to be the most significant Catholic moral theologian of the time. His three-volume Law of Christ, published originally in German in 1954 and translated into more than fifteen languages, signaled a new approach to Catholic moral theology. Häring has called for a biblically based, liturgically celebrated, pastorally sensitive, dynamic morality stressing conversion and responsibility. He has disagreed with some hierarchical teachings on sexual and medical morality.

hatred, the hostility or malevolence aroused by and directed against those persons, things, or events perceived to be evil, harmful, or in some other way repugnant. Hatred of God, neighbor, or oneself is directly contrary to the love required of Christians by Jesus (Matt 22:37–40), a love that is to encompass even one's enemies (Matt 5:43). Hatred is condemned as gravely sinful both for the evil actions that characteristically flow from it and for its debilitating effects on the sinner, hatred in the latter sense understood as the corruption of charity, the highest of the Christian virtues. While hatred of sin has been held permissible, hatred of the sinner has not.

healing, restoration to health. In antiquity healing had two aspects: professional medicine and faith healing. Some of the most prominent medical figures were Hippocrates (469–399 B.C.), Erasistratus (third century B.C.), Herophilus (third century B.C.), Galen (129–99 B.C.), and Celsus (A.D. 14–37). Medical schools were founded, e.g., by Asclepides of Bithynia in Rome (ca. 40 B.C.). However, nonprofessional medical practices also prevailed. Patients interceded with the gods and goddesses of healing; healing sanctuaries were abundant. Methods of healing included exorcism, the use of herbs, incubation in a temple, dedication of models of the affected parts in the sanctuaries, and the use of amulets, prayers, charms and incantations. In the OT the priests are the custodians of public health, adjudicating, for example, cases of leprosy. Many of the Levitical laws with reference to diet, health, sexual practices, quarantine, and Sabbath rest were seen as God's concern for physical health. But professional doctors and pharmacists were also respected (Sir 38:1–15). The Talmud contains a long line of rabbi-physicians. In the NT, especially in Mark, Jesus is represented as a healer of multiple physical diseases and also psychiatric conditions, but he does not use magical practices. He heals by voice command and he often touches a physically ill patient but not a demoniac. The early Church continued Jesus' healing ministry, and the structure of the Gospel of Luke parallels closely the structure of Acts so that this ministry is thrown into high relief. Oil was often used in healing (Mark 6:13; Jas 5:14). The Christian Church was one of the first communities to found hospitals, and its religious sisters have been foremost in devoting their lives to the ministry of healing. See also faith healing. J. MASSYNGBAERDE FORD

Healy, Timothy Stafford, 1923–92, Jesuit priest, educator, and president of the New York Public Library (1989–92). As professor of English with a doctorate from Oxford, Father Healy taught at Fordham University, City University of New York (where he was also vice chancellor), and Georgetown University. He also served as president of Georgetown University (1976–89). See also Georgetown University.

heart (Heb., lēb, lêbab), the locus of emotion, passion and appetite; also, and primarily, the seat of intellection and interior dialogue (e.g., "the fool has said in his heart, 'there is no God,'" Ps 14:1). In this sense, therefore, it corresponds more to our idea of mind than of heart (e.g., Prov 16:9). While ancient Israel did not develop a distinct concept of the soul as the core of personality analogous to the Greek psychē, the idea comes to expression in other ways, including frequent allusions to the heart. The heart is the center of the moral life; one can therefore have a deceitful (Isa 44:20) or a clean and upright heart (Pss 32:11; 51:10). The "hardening of the heart" (e.g., Pharaoh, Exod 7:3.) denotes a condition of religious and moral insensitivity. See also Immaculate Heart of Mary; Sacred Heart, devotion to the.

heaven, the perfect and final completion of human life in union with God. The Christian doctrine of heaven is dependent upon the Church's faith in the Resurrection of Jesus Christ. As the personal participation in the Resurrection of Christ, heaven is the result of acceptance of God's grace in one's life. (Hell, by contrast, is the utter loss of God through a definitive repudiation of that same grace).

Scriptural Basis: The Christian tradition of speaking of final union with God as "heaven" finds its roots in Semitic cosmology. The OT represents heaven as a celestial sphere that is the home of God (Gen 1:1; 1:8; Isa 66:1; Pss 2:4; 11:4; 139:8), although this cosmology is not unique to the biblical tradition. God is surrounded by a heavenly court with whom he takes counsel (1 Kgs 22:19; Isa 6:3–8; Ps 82). This Hebraic image of heaven is implied in the NT, especially at Jesus' baptism (Mark 1:9–11, Matt 3:13–17, Luke 3:21–22, John 1:29–34). More precisely, heaven is the place where the Father of Jesus dwells (Matt 3:17; 6:9; 10:32). Heaven is eventually understood to be the finality of salvation, a salvation that includes the history of the cosmos (Rev 21:1). Jesus' preaching of the "kingdom of heaven" (Matt 3:2) evokes not only the transcendent dimension of God's glory, but the essentially interpersonal, social, and historical dimensions of human personhood that find their ultimate fulfillment in union with God. Heaven is thus not a radical interruption of these dimensions of human personhood; rather, the entirety of human personhood is taken up into God in the glory of risen life which bears the name heaven. Biblical anthropology stresses the unity of spiritual personhood represented in the integral relationship between body and soul. The biblical doctrine of resurrection speaks of the resurrection of the dead (Acts 4:2; 1 Cor 15:42; Rev. 20:5), i.e., of the entire spiritual person, not simply the resurrection of the material body or the immortality of the spiritual soul. At the same time, there is foundation in Scripture for the view that the soul, separated from the body, enjoys the presence of God and is thus in heaven (Wis 3:1–3; Matt 10:28; 2 Cor 5:1–10).

Church Teaching: The Church's teaching concerning heaven has generally, though not always, construed heaven as a spiritual "place" or state of being. It is construed as a place because the intrinsic relationship between soul and body, even a glorified body, implies some notion of location. It is construed as a state of being because the spiritual person is said truly to exist beyond death in life with God. In ordinary Church teaching, then, heaven is the place or state of being in which the just enjoy the direct intuitive knowledge of God in company with the elect, the communion of saints. This knowledge has also been called the Beatific Vision, the direct spiritual apprehension and delight in God without any material mediation, a state that, apart from the experience of Jesus, can only be attained beyond death. Pope Benedict XII (Benedictus Deus, 1336) declared that the souls of the just could attain such a state immediately upon death and before the final general judgment and the resurrection of the body.

Although there is no definitive teaching of the magisterium that would give us a "proper picture" of heaven, the Council of Lyons (1274) refers to souls being received in heaven, and the Council of Florence (1439) refers to a state of the elect where God will be seen as God truly is. The Church has clearly distinguished its conception of heavenly glory from Gnostic and certain Greek philosophical notions of a state of immortal bliss enjoyed by a disembodied soul by affirming that the entire human person, body and soul, ultimately participates in eternal beatitude in heaven. At the same time, ordinary Church teaching has made regular use of some Greek notions, including the distinction between body and soul, when making statements about personal salvation.

As a doctrine dependent upon the Resurrection of Christ, heaven can also be understood as a consequence of the "hypostatic" union of the divine and human natures in Jesus Christ, a doctrine that implies that human nature is created for union with God. Jesus' own resurrection is thus seen as the human acceptance and divine pledge of this union. According to theologian Karl Rahner (d. 1984), Jesus' entry into glory was not, therefore, entry into a preexisting place called heaven, but in fact the establishment of "heaven" in its most radical sense, as the fulfillment of the human possibility for union with God. See also Beatific Vision; beatitude; eschatology, individual; eternal life; immortality; lumen gloriae; salvation. PAUL CROWLEY

Hebblethwaite, Peter, 1930–94, English Catholic journalist and Vaticanologist. Ordained a Jesuit in 1963, he left the Society of Jesus to marry in 1974. A former editor of the Jesuit periodical The Month, he served as Vatican Affairs correspondent for the National Catholic Reporter in the United States (1979–94) and was a regular contributor to The Tablet in London. He was author of several books on the Catholic Church, including biographies of Popes John XXIII (1984) and Paul VI (1993).

Hebrews, according to the Table of Nations in Genesis (10:21), descendants from Eber, son of Shem. The ethnic term "Hebrew" is more often used by foreigners than by Israelites (e.g., Gen 39:14; Exod 1:16; 1 Sam 4:6), and in some instances it may denote a social category more inclusive than the ethnic term "Israelite." In the early Christian context it refers to Hebrew- or Aramaic-speaking Christians (e.g., Acts 6:1), and later still simply to Jews.

Hecker, Isaac Thomas, 1819–88, founder of the Missionary Society of St. Paul the Apostle, the Paulists. Born in New York of German immigrant parents, he left school at an early age. He worked in the family business until a profound religious experience led him to search for a more committed life at Brook Farm and Fruitlands, New England utopian communities, before joining the Catholic Church in 1844. A short time later, he entered a European seminary to study for the priesthood with the Redemptorist order. He returned to the United States in 1851, where he joined a band of English-speaking priests offering parish missions. Anxious to convert Americans to Catholicism, he authored two original works of apologetics, Questions of the Soul and Aspirations of Nature. In 1857, he went to Rome to seek support for a more energetic apostolate among English-speaking Americans. After a painful conflict with his Redemptorist superiors, Hecker and his associates were permitted the freedom to establish a new religious community, the Missionary Society of St. Paul the Apostle, the Paulists.

A leader of the new community until his death, Hecker presented public lectures, initiated a monthly review, The Catholic World, and launched a publishing company, while his priests staffed a parish in New York and continued parish missions. Hecker, anxious to arouse enthusiasm for the non-Catholic apostolate, was disappointed by the internal preoccupations of Church policy, especially at the First Vatican Council (1869–70), which he observed in Rome. Soon after, he became ill, traveled extensively in Europe and the Near East, then returned to resume leadership of the Paulists. In his later years he developed his uniquely American spirituality, ideas that led to controversy after his death in 1888. In 1899 Pope Leo XIII condemned "Americanism," a body of ideas associated with Hecker through a controversial biography written by his Paulist protégé, Walter Elliott. Hecker's emphasis on evangelization, together with his affirmation of freedom, reason, and democracy, made him the premier witness to a distinctively American Catholicism. See also Americanism; Paulists. DAVID O'BRIEN

Hedwig, St., ca. 1174–1243, aristocrat and religious. After a tumultuous life as wife of the Duke of Silesia (and mother of his seven children), she retired to a Cistercian convent to lead a life of prayer and solitude. Her reputation as peacemaker and prophet led to an early canonization (1267). Feast day: October 16.

Hefele, Karl Joseph, (heh'uh-lay), 1809–93, German bishop and Church historian. He was ordained in 1833 and in 1836 he began teaching Church history at the University of Tübingen, succeeding J. A. Möhler. He served as rector from 1852 to 1853. His seven-volume Konziliengeschichte (1855–74) treats regional and ecumenical synods in their historical settings down to the mid-fifteenth century. He was appointed bishop of Rottenburg in 1869. At the First Vatican Council he was one of the leading opponents of the effort to define the doctrine of papal infallibility. Nevertheless, he resisted pressure by the Old Catholics to join their ranks. Although he was the last German bishop to do so, he promulgated the conciliar decrees in his diocese. See also infallibility; Vatican Council I.

Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich, 1770–1831, German philosopher. He studied philosophy and theology at Tübingen and was greatly influenced by Immanuel Kant and Johann Gottlieb Fichte. He taught at Jena (1800–06), initially with Friedrich Wilhelm Schelling as a colleague, but developed his philosophical system of dialectical idealism in opposition to the latter's "philosophy of identity." After directing the Gymnasium in Nuremberg (1807–16) and teaching at the University of Heidelberg (1816–18), he settled at the University of Berlin (1818–31). Hegel's philosophy has had enormous impact on Western thought in almost all areas, not least religion. He attempted to overcome all oppositions in thought and reality, even that between subject and object, not by positing identity, as Schelling had, but by recognizing nonidentity as an inherent element of final or absolute identity. He traced this dialectical unfolding of thought and being through all its manifestations by empirical observation in his Phenomenology of the Mind (1807) and then, reversing the procedure, sought in the Science of Logic (1812–16) and Encyclopedia of Philosophical Science (1817, 1827, 1830) to deduce, in an a priori (Lat., "from the former") way, all existing realities from initial indeterminate identity culminating in absolute knowledge by absolute spirit. Absolute knowledge finds expression in three forms: sensually, in art; representationally, in religion; and in its full conceptual form, in philosophy. Thus revelation finds no real place within Hegel's system. Although in his early writings he sought to reconcile oppositions through love, his mature system sees the reconciliation of opposites as the dialectical work of reason. Thus it is a fully rationalistic philosophical replacement of religion.

Hegel's influence has been especially pronounced on Protestant theology, particularly the Tübingen school (Ferdinand Christian Bauer, David Friedrich Strauss), but he has also had an impact on German Catholic theology, especially that of Karl Rahner (d. 1984). MICHAEL J. HIMES hegumen (hey-goo'men; Gk., hegoumenos, "leader"), the abbot or superior of a Byzantine monastery, generally one of lesser rank than a monastery governed by a superior with the title "archimandrite." Some Byzantine churches confer the title "hegumen" on monastic priests as a purely honorific rank. See also abbot.

Hegesippus, St. (hej-uh-sip'puhs), ca. 110–ca. 180, early Church historian. His five books of "Memoirs," written in Greek, defended the Church against Gnosticism. Feast day: April 7.

Hehir, J. Bryan (hay'uhr), b. 1940, social ethicist and counselor to the U.S. Catholic bishops. Hehir was ordained a priest for the archdiocese of Boston in 1966 and received a Th.D. from Harvard University in 1977. He has served as counselor for the United States Catholic Conference since 1973, and was staff director for the bishops' pastoral letter "The Challenge of Peace" in 1983. A MacArthur Fellow (1984–89), he has been Kennedy Professor of Christian Ethics (1988–92), associate vice president (1991–92), and senior research scholar (1984–92) at Georgetown University. He is the author of many articles on the Church in international relations. Since 1992 he has been pastor of St. Paul's Church, Cambridge, Massachusetts, and Professor of the Practice in Religion and Society at Harvard Divinity School.

Heidegger, Martin, 1889–1976, a major German philosopher and innovator in art, psychology, theater, and theology. Heidegger grew up in a Catholic world of parish church, Jesuit novitiate, and seminary. His university studies in neo-Kantianism and Husserlian phenomenology were complemented by an acquaintance with medieval mystics and Tübingen Catholic theologians. Beyond influencing the development of existentialism, he was in fact "a thinker of Being" much indebted to idealist, medieval, and Greek philosophers and theologians. Hostile to Catholicism in the Nazi decades (1933–45), after the war he turned toward meditation on Being in landscape, culture, art, and poetry. He influenced, among Protestant thinkers, Rudolf Bultmann, Paul Tillich, and Heinrich Ott. Catholics influenced by him include Erich Przywara, Alfred Delp, Karl Rahner, Hans Urs von Balthasar, Johannes Baptist Lotz, Gustav Siewerth, and Max Müller, all of whom drew Heideggerian motifs into dialogue with the thought of Thomas Aquinas and/or with the work of theologians who were preparing for Vatican II (1962–65). Heidegger's thinking assisted theology in understanding the personal nature of grace, the disclosing manner of revelation, the historicity of salvation, and the historical pluralism of theology and dogma.

Heiler, Friedrich, 1892–1967, German Protestant theologian and ecumenist. As a student at the University of Munich, Heiler converted from Catholicism to Lutheranism as he was completing his doctoral studies (1918). He was appointed a professor of the history of religions at the University of Marburg (1920), where he remained until his retirement (1960). Committed to ecumenical and interreligious dialogue, he advocated the reunion of Catholics and Protestants in an "evangelical Catholicism," and he was active in the International Congress for the History of Religions.

Heilsgeschichte (hilz'ge-shik-tah; Ger., "salvation history"). See salvation history.

Helena, St., ca. 250–ca. 330, mother of the emperor Constantine. Of low social origin, she was dismissed by Constantine's father, Constantius Chlorus, in 292, when he married for political reasons the stepdaughter of Augustus Maximian. On Constantine's accession in 306, however, she regained a position of honor, as Augusta. She is venerated for her foundation of churches, her service to the poor, and her journey (326) to Palestine, where she discovered, as she believed, Christ's cross. Feast day: August 18. See also Constantine the Great; invention of the cross.

Heliand, ninth-century Old Saxon poem retelling the gospel story in alliterative verse for pastoral purposes.

hell, the eternal loss of God. God has created the world in order to bestow divine life upon it in a personal relationship of love. This relationship begins here and now in the life of grace and reaches its perfection in the kingdom of heaven, the life of glory. Because humans are free, they can turn away from God, refusing to enter into a relationship of love, and live accordingly. This denial is the heart of sin and the ultimate reason why hell is a possibility, for hell is simply the final state of one who has utterly and deliberately refused to live one's life with God. Church teaching says that the soul of a person who dies in a state of mortal sin goes directly to hell (Benedictus Deus, 1336; Council of Florence, 1439). While moral theologians have perhaps been careless over the centuries in designating certain actions as mortally sinful, the Church has never taught that anyone has, in fact, died in such a state.

Biblical Images: In the context of the gospel of God's universal saving love (1 Tim 2:4), hell can be understood as a self-chosen state of alienation from God and not simply as a subsequent punishment inflicted by God. Indeed, Christ is the revelation that God's justice and judgment are precisely merciful love. It is not God who rejects the sinner, but the sinner who rejects God. God does not torture the sinner or seek retribution. The biblical images about the torments of hell are not to be interpreted literally. Symbolically they refer to the suffering that is inherent in the state of sin itself. To turn away finally and completely from God, who alone can give peace, healing, and life, inevitably means suffering and death. Hell, therefore, does not refer to a place created by God, into which God will cast sinners. Hell is a creation, or better, a kind of "anticreation" of the sinner. As the opposite of heaven, an eternal communion of love with God and all the saints in the new creation, hell is best conceived as the state of being utterly alone in self-chosen isolation. Hell is the state of a person who definitively rejects God. Heaven means to be finally and completely drawn out of oneself in love; hell means to be utterly absorbed and trapped in oneself.

Thirteenth-century mosaic of hell with Satan, demons, and other fallen creatures; baptistery, Florence, Italy.

Heaven and Hell: While the possibility of hell is a proper part of the gospel, it should not be viewed as an equal alternative to heaven. The possibility of hell stands in sharp contrast to the reality of heaven. NT texts that deal with judgment, heaven, and hell are not to be interpreted fundamentalistically. They must be understood according to the dynamics of the eschatological and apocalyptic genres that they exemplify. They are not eyewitness reports of the final judgment. They express the ultimate seriousness and eternal significance of choices made here and now. With theologians such as Rahner (d. 1984) and von Balthasar (d. 1988), it is appropriate to speak of a fundamental asymmetry between human sin and God's abundant grace, a theme central to Pauline theology as well. Because of the power of God's love, as revealed in Christ's victory over sin and death, the Church's hope is that all humanity will be saved. This hope, which can not be stated as a foregone conclusion in a theory of universal salvation (apocatastasis), is expressed in the liturgy of the Eucharist: "Remember our brothers and sisters who have gone to their rest in the hope of rising again. Bring them and all the departed into the light of your presence." Likewise, while the Church has canonized many saints, affirming that there are human beings in heaven, it has never affirmed that there is, in fact, a single human being in hell. See also damnation; last things; reprobation; Satan. JOHN R. SACHS

Hellenism, the language and categories of ancient Greek culture. Alexander the Great (d. 323) aimed to make Greek culture universal, and although his empire did not survive his death, his project of hellenization was continued by the states that were its heirs. By the first century the Romans in turn had inherited a world in which, at least in the East, Greek was the koiné, or common language, and an eclectic blend of Platonism and Stoicism the common philosophical denominator. The Jews, especially in the Diaspora but also in Palestine itself, were no less affected than other peoples. Although resisting polytheism and its cult and generally living in separate communities, they used the Greek language, had a Greek translation of the Scriptures (Septuagint), and developed philosophical articulations of biblical teaching (Aristobulus, third to second century B.C.; Philo of Alexandria, ca. 20 B.C. to A.D. 50). Thus the alleged opposition between "Jewish thought" and "Hellenism" underlying eighteenth- and nineteenth-century debates about the contamination of the "gospel" with Greek thought is a category mistake. The Gospels themselves were written in Greek, and if the doctrine of the "Word" in the Prologue to John's Gospel has Hellenic reso-nances, this does not make it any less Jewish in provenance.

Doctrinal Development: The charge of contamination of the gospel with Hellenism refers largely, however, to doctrinal developments of the fourth and fifth centuries, which presuppose a kind of Stoicized Platonist natural theology based on God's incorporeality, immutability, infinity, and impassibility, attributes that at times seem to be only indirectly related, and perhaps even opposed, to the picture of God in the Scriptures. This development began in an apologetic context, with teachers like Justin Martyr (d. ca. 165) whose aim was to demonstrate the compatibility of Christian doctrine with the best of Greek thought, and was furthered in a polemical context, in which teachers like Origen (d. 254) attempted to articulate a philosophical Christianity over against the spiritualized systems of the Gnostics. These philosophical commitments were then carried over into the doctrinal formulations of the next two centuries, and it is to these formulations that the charge of contamination of the gospel with Hellenism is most often leveled. Were the controversies about the Trinity and Christ actually controversies about points of philosophical teaching essentially unrelated to the gospel? And thus the formulations themselves based on irrelevant, but canonized, philosophical distinctions?

In evaluating this charge, which has been directed especially against Catholicism because of its continued commitment to "natural" theology, it must be remembered that the gospel cannot exist apart from a cultural matrix and that, as already noted, there was no feature of Greco-Roman culture that was not to some degree "hellenized." It would be odd, therefore, if Greco-Roman Christianity were not hellenized to some extent; if it had existed in thought forms and categories unintelligible to the culture at large, it could hardly have laid claim to proclamation of the gospel. From this perspective, the blanket charge of "hellenization" is tautological.

The question is better put to individual figures within their own individual contexts: in each case, how did they use the categories and language they inherited? Was there any way in which, by their very use of these categories, the categories were transformed or even critiqued? Did the recontextualization of metaphysical language into uniquely Judeo-Christian genera, such as the homily, transform that language? Questions such as these, which one must ask of any particular enculturation of the gospel, are much more likely to lead to useful assessments of the Christianity of Greco-Roman antiquity and of the doctrinal formulations that come from it. See also Catholicism and culture; philosophy and theology.

JOHN C. CAVADINI

Héloïse, ca. 1100–ca. 1163, wife of Peter Abelard and abbess of the Paraclete, a community of nuns in Troyes, France. One of the most intriguing people of the twelfth century, Heloise was famous for both her passionate relationship with Abelard and her learning. She is widely recognized for her distinctive teaching on the ethics of pure love, and for her singular influence on the formation of Paraclete literature (e.g., the rule). See also Abelard, Peter; Paraclete, the.

henotheism (he-noh'thee-iz-uhm), a belief that recognizes the existence of several gods but regards one particular god as the god of one's family or tribe, leaving the other gods without practical significance.

Henoticon, formula of union between Orthodox and Monophysites drawn up in 482 between Acacius and Peter Mongus, patriarchs of Constantinople and Alexandria, an initiative of the emperor Zeno. It condemned Eutyches and Nestorius, but sidestepped the question of the number of natures in Christ and failed to mention Leo's Tome. Pope Felix III (II) excommunicated Acacius for concessions to Monophysitism. See also Acacianism; Monophysitism.

Henry II, St., 973–1024, German king and Holy Roman emperor (crowned 1014). A pious, energetic monarch much concerned with the reform and expansion of the Church, he founded the see of Bamberg as a center for missions to Slavic lands. Feast day: July 13.

Henry IV [emperor], 1050–1106, Holy Roman emperor from 1056 to 1106. The opponent of Pope Gregory VII, Henry desired to maintain imperial authority and clashed with the Gregorian reform's efforts to free the Church from lay control. Excommunicated by Gregory (1076), Henry humbled himself at Canossa and was absolved (1077). His struggle with the papacy continued until his death. See also Gregory VII; Holy Roman Empire.

Henry IV [king], 1553–1610, king of France from 1589 to 1610. Despite his being Protestant, Henry succeeded to the throne of France. Having converted to Catholicism in 1593, he issued the Edict of Nantes (1598) granting Protestants toleration and ending the wars of religion. He was assassinated in 1610 by a Catholic.

Henry VIII, 1491–1547, king of England from 1509. Second son of Henry VII, he was educated in the Renaissance humanist tradition, displaying skills in languages, music, and theology. His treatise on the seven sacraments (1521) against Luther won for him the title of "Defender of the Faith" from Pope Leo X. He later came into conflict with Clement VII over his attempt to dissolve his marriage with Catherine of Aragon, who had failed to bear him a son. Upon revocation of the case to Rome in 1529, Henry took the advice of Thomas Cranmer to appeal the case to the universities of Europe. Ultimately, he was declared the "supreme head on earth of the Church of England" in 1534, for which he was excommunicated by Clement VII. With Cranmer as archbishop of Canterbury and Thomas Cromwell as vice-regent, Henry pursued an antipapal, moderately Lutheran course of reform, culminating in the dissolution of the monasteries (1536, 1539), the Ten Articles (1536), the Bishop's Book (1537), and the English Bible (1535) with various other editions following); during his reign, such Catholics as Thomas More and John Fisher were executed. His personal Catholic piety, however, emerged in the Six Articles (1539) and the King's Book (1543). His reign ended in the direction of reform with the English Litany (1544), the suppression of chantries and foundations (1545), and the entrusting of the education of his son Edward VI to Protestants. See also Anglicanism; England, Catholicism in; Reformation, the.

Henry VIII, king of England from 1509 to 1547, whose divorce of Catherine of Aragon and marriage to Anne Boleyn in 1533 precipitated the break between the Church of England and the papacy.

Henry of Ghent, d. 1293, the leading secular theologian at the University of Paris in the final quarter of the thirteenth century, regent master from 1276–92; the "solemn doctor," author of a large Summa of established questions as well as many quodlibetal (Lat., "whatever one pleases") questions, i.e., those that were raised spontaneously by students and other teachers. Thorough in his approach to important theological problems, he usually considers a wide range of biblical, patristic, and philosophical authorities, quoted at length, in the presentation of his own position. Important on his own right for the attempt to uphold an "Augustinian" epistemology and metaphysics in the face of the newly-translated Aristotle, he also sheds considerable light on Duns Scotus (d. 1308), who used Henry as a foil in developing his own teaching. A new critical edition of Henry's Summa, in preparation in 1994 will doubtless restore him to his rightful prominence in the history of Christian thought. See also Paris; Scholasticism.

Henry Suso, Bl., ca. 1295–1366, Dominican preacher and mystic. Having entered the Dominican order in Constance at the age of thirteen, he experienced a conversion at age twenty-eight, perhaps under the influence of Meister Eckhart. His later defense of Eckhart would cause him much trouble. His own mystical theology was more cautious, making clear (as Eckhart's did not) that mystical union with God did not entail the loss of personal identity. His most important works are the Little Book of Eternal Wisdom, Horologium Sapientiae, and his autobiographical Life of the Servant. He was beatified in 1831. Feast day: March 15. See also mysticism.

heresy, the obstinate denial or doubt, on the part of a baptized person, of a truth that must be believed by divine and catholic faith. The First Vatican Council (1869–70) declared that by divine and catholic faith all those things must be believed that are contained in the word of God, whether written or handed down, and have been proposed by the Church, whether by solemn judgment or by its ordinary universal magisterium, as divinely revealed and to be believed as such (DS 3011). This faith is called "divine" because it embraces truth that is divinely revealed and is, thus, a response to God as revealer. It is called "catholic" because it is the assent to what has been definitively proposed for belief by the supreme teaching authority of the Catholic Church. This authority pronounces a solemn judgment when the pope or an ecumenical council defines a truth as a "dogma of faith." The assent of faith is also given to revealed truths that have never been defined but which Catholic bishops throughout the world, together with the pope, consistently teach as definitively to be held with divine faith.

In Catholic canon law, heresy is a crime of which only baptized Christians can be guilty. The "obstinacy" that is an essential component of heresy distinguishes it from inculpable error in belief. In the modern Catholic Church, other Christians are not considered guilty of heresy because it is presumed that they err in good faith in rejecting certain truths that the Catholic Church holds as dogmas of faith. However, in the past, the terms "heresy" and "heretics" were used more widely, of beliefs at variance with the orthodox faith and of those holding such beliefs.

Heresy has played a providential role, in the course of Church history, by obliging the Church to clarify its understanding of revealed truth in order to identify and reject erroneous interpretations of the faith. Thus, the Arian heresy of the fourth century led to the definition of the true divinity of the word of God. The Nestorian and Monophysite heresies of the fifth century led to the clarification of Church teaching concerning the unity of person and distinction of natures in Christ. Similarly, the errors of Pelagius obliged the Church to clarify its teaching about original sin and the necessity of divine grace for the keeping of the divine law.

It is axiomatic that there is no heresy that does not contain some element of truth. In its negative reaction to what it recognized as erroneous in a heretical position, the Church has sometimes so insisted on the contrary of that error as to neglect an aspect of the truth that the heresy actually upheld. Subsequent reflection has sometimes led to a more objective appreciation of the elements of truth contained in doctrines that the Church had condemned as heretical. See also dogma. FRANCIS A. SULLIVAN heresy [canon law], the obstinate post-baptismal denial or doubt of a truth that must be believed with catholic and divine faith (can. 751). Such truths, known as dogmas, are spoken of in canon 750 as those contained in Scripture or tradition that have been proposed as divinely revealed either by the Church's solemn magisterium (teaching office) or by its ordinary and universal magisterium. See also dogma; magisterium.

Hergenröther, Joseph, 1824–90, German canonist and Church historian. A professor at the University of Würzburg and a consultor for Vatican I (1896–70), he was made cardinal in 1879 and first prefect of the Vatican Archives. Noted for his three-volume manual of Church history (1869) and extensive Byzantine studies, he opposed the views of Johann Döllinger, a Church historian who rejected the dogma of papal infallibility as taught by Vatican I and was subsequently excommunicated. See also Vatican Council I.

Hermas, Shepherd of, a second-century apocryphal apocalypse. The Shepherd consists of five visions, twelve commands, and ten parables. Traditional scholarship has argued for a very early (ca. 100) provenance for the first four visions written by Hermas, while the fifth vision and the commands and parables are believed to have been provided by an anonymous author in the mid-second century (ca. 140–50). Both authors employ apocalyptic allegory throughout and drew heavily from Jewish literary traditions.

Testimony by the Muratorian Canon suggests that some Christians sought its inclusion in the NT. Its prominence was certainly enhanced by its close association with Rome; however, its lack of widespread acceptance precluded such a development.

The Shepherd has a strong ethical emphasis underlying its allegorical stylistic conventions. Repentance is a major theme, particularly for sins committed after Baptism. The conclusion that these sins could only be pardoned once had an impact upon Catholic theology for centuries.

In the first four visions, the Church, which appears in the form of an old woman who develops into a young maiden, calls Hermas to repentance. Her appeals are punctuated by warnings of imminent persecution and danger. The fifth vision introduces the moral instruction of the second portion of the Shepherd. An angel of penance disguised as a shepherd first provides commands, or precepts, on faith, charity, chastity, prayer, good works, prophets, and desires and then concludes with the parables. The first five stress the avoidance of pride and the need to provide for the poor. The last five renew the call for penance on a communitywide and individual basis. See also apostolic age; Muratorian fragment. MIKE R. BEGGS hermeneutics (huhr-muh-n*oo*'tiks), the theory and/or practice of interpretation, particularly of biblical texts. The problem of interpretation arises from the fact that the meanings of certain classical, even normative, ancient texts of the Christian tradition, especially the Bible, are obscured for modern readers. Interpretation is the process of overcoming the obstacles created by linguistic, cultural, and intellectual distance so that the ancient text can become meaningful in the contemporary believing community. The process of interpretation involves three moments that are distinct but interactive. Exegesis is the process of establishing the meaning of the text in the context in which it was written. This involves the use of various methods for establishing an authentic text, translation, historical investigation, and literary and theological analysis. The reader is able to base interpretation on a valid understanding of the text's own intentionality. Criticism is the process of determining how the text invites and guides the reader's interaction with it. Thus, historical criticism investigates how, and how well, the text conveys data about the past to the reader. Literary criticism investigates how the text engages the reader through narrative or other genres and how effectively it does so. Ideological criticism unmasks how a text carries and reinforces certain worldviews and power agendas and how this affects readers. Appropriation is the actual experience of understanding, of achieving transformative meaning, in and through engagement with the text.

Hermeneutical theory proposes an understanding of texts and how they function and of the interaction of reader with text through exegesis, criticism, and appropriation. Hermeneutical practice is the art and science of interpreting ancient texts, i.e., of rendering them meaningful in the present in a way that is faithful to, but does not imprison them in, their original settings. See also Scripture, interpretation of. SANDRA M. SCHNEIDERS

Hermes, Georg (hair'meez), 1775–1831, German philosopher and theologian. Ordained in 1799, he was appointed professor of dogmatic theology at Münster in 1807. He accepted a position at the newly founded University of Bonn shortly after the publication of the first part of Einleitung in die christ-katholische Theologie (1819), which treated the philosophical presuppositions of knowing the truth, God, and revelation. After Hermes's death, his writings were condemned and placed on the Index of Forbidden Books by Pope Gregory XVI for being semi-rationalist, i.e., reducing supernatural truths to truths of reason. See also rationalism.

hermit (Gk. erēmia, "desert"), one who embraces a solitary life. Christian hermits appeared in the deserts of Egypt and Palestine at the end of the third century. The dangers, physical and spiritual, associated with living alone, however, prompted a move within monasticism toward a cenobitic (communal) life. Yet, a great variety of eremitic life thrived among early Christians and again from the tenth to the twelfth centuries. These hermits developed an intense devotion to Jesus, a deep life of prayer, and great austerity. The best known of the hermits of the early Church was Anthony of Egypt (d. 356), about whom Athanasius (d. 373) wrote an influential biography. See also anchorite, anchoress; Anthony of Egypt, St.; desert; monasticism.

Hermits of St. Augustine, Order of. See Augustinians; Augustinian Hermits.

heroic virtue, the exemplary practice of Christian virtues so that one becomes a model and ideal of Christian discipleship. All Christians are called to live virtuously. They should cultivate habits that demonstrate the power of God's grace in their lives. Virtue (Lat., virtus, "strength") becomes heroic when the cardinal and theological virtues exceed the demands of simple compliance. The cardinal virtues are prudence, justice, fortitude, and temperance. The three theological virtues are faith, hope, and love. Before someone is canonized, heroic virtue must be proved. See also virtue.

Hesburgh, Theodore Martin, b. 1917, Holy Cross priest, president of the University of Notre Dame for thirty-five years (1952–87), and perhaps the most admired American Catholic of his generation. Born in Syracuse, New York, he studied for the priesthood at the University of Notre Dame, the Gregorian University in Rome, and at Catholic University in Washington, D.C. He was ordained a priest of the Congregation of Holy Cross (C.S.C.) in 1943 and earned a Ph.D in theology from The Catholic University of America in 1945. Seasoned by service as chaplain to returning World War II veterans at Notre Dame's "Vetville," as classroom teacher and theology department chairman, and as vice president for three years, Hesburgh took over as president of Notre Dame in 1952 and led the university through a period of unprecedented growth. By the time he retired in 1987, student enrollment had almost doubled; some three dozen new buildings had been erected; the annual operating budget increased from $9 million to $200 million, and the endowment from $10 million to $450 million. Qualitative improvement matched quantitative growth, as reflected in rising academic credentials among entering freshmen, enhanced scholarly productivity by faculty members, and the development of new graduate programs. Hesburgh's leadership quickly attracted attention beyond the Notre Dame campus. He has served on scores of national and international bodies, including fourteen presidential commissions. As a charter member of the Civil Rights Commission, and its chairman for three years, Hesburgh established himself as a leading champion of racial justice. He has received over one hundred honorary degrees, and countless other awards, including the nation's highest civilian honor, the Medal of Freedom. At Notre Dame, the main library and a center for international and peace studies are named for him. In 1994, at the age of 77, he was elected head of Harvard University's Board of Overseers. See also Notre Dame, University of. PHILIP GLEASON

Theodore M. Hesburgh, C.S.C., for thirty-five years president of the University of Notre Dame (1952-87) and one of the most influential Catholic leaders in U.S. history.

Hesychasm (Gk., hesychia, "quiet," "stillness," "peace"), a general name for the contemplative tradition of Eastern Orthodox Christianity but one with a number of specific meanings. It can mean a hermit as distinguished from a cenobitic monk; interior prayer as found among the monks in the East from the fourth century onward and passed on orally for many centuries; prayer of the heart; wordless and imageless prayer; use of the Jesus Prayer along with rhythmic breathing; and interior prayer that makes use of the Jesus Prayer and that leads to vision of divine light as described in the theology of Gregory of Palamas (d. 1359). The Philocalia, compiled by Macarius of Corinth (d. 1805) and Nicodemus (d. 1809), is an early modern collection of Hesychast texts that has had a wide influence, e.g., on the Russian The Way of a Pilgrim and even on Western Christian spirituality. The Hesychast tradition seeks not mystical phenomena or even ecstasy but, like the best of Western mysticism, divine love that inflames the human heart with love of God and neighbor and brings humanity to its fullness. See also mysticism.

Hexapla, a compilation by Origen (d. ca. 254) of the available Hebrew and Greek OT text and translations. Surviving only in fragments, the Hexapla contained the Hebrew consonantal text, a transcription into Greek letters, and four Greek translations (Aquila, Symmachus, the Septuagint, and Theodotion) of the OT. See also Origen; Septuagint.

hierarchy (Gk., "rule by priests") the ordered body of clergy (bishops, priests, deacons), or more usually, of bishops alone. The term is generally employed only by those who adopt the "Catholic principle" of ecclesial order, namely, by Catholics, Anglicans/Episcopalians, and Eastern Catholic and Orthodox Christians, who regard the threefold hierarchical order of bishop, priest (presbyter), and deacon as divinely instituted by Christ and, therefore, a permanent structural feature of ecclesial life. Contemporary theologians interpret the hierarchical constitution of the Church in light of the principles of legitimate diversity, collegiality, authority as service, and the Church as the whole People of God. See also bishop.

hierarchy of truths, a principle that recognizes the relative importance assigned to various Christian doctrines. While the phrase has become popular since Vatican II (1962–65), the principle has functioned throughout the Church's history. The specific phrase originated from a speech delivered by Italian archbishop Andrea Pangrazio of Gorizia-Gradisca and is found in the Decree on Ecumenism (1964) of the Second Vatican Council. "When comparing doctrines with one another, [Catholic theologians] should remember that in Catholic doctrine there exists an order or 'hierarchy' of truths, since they vary in their relation to the foundation of the Christian faith" (n. 11). The text concerns ecumenical relations. While acknowledging that all truths must be believed with the same faith and kept with equal fidelity, the council concedes that all truths are not equally important. To enhance ecumenical dialogue and assist the churches in their mutual quest for truth, the council acknowledges the importance of weighing the truths of the faith. This action ensures that what is peripheral does not obscure what is essential, and conversely, what is constitutive is not judged as fleeting. The affirmation of a hierarchy of truths offers a framework that promotes legitimate diversity while ensuring essential unity. See also doctrine; dogma.

Hieratikon (hi-uhr-ah-tee-kawn'; Gk., hieratikos, "priestly"), Byzantine "Sacerdotal," or liturgical book used by the priest and deacon, containing the prayers and litanies needed for the celebration of the Eucharist, Vespers, and Matins. The contents of the Hieratikon are excerpted from the larger Euchologion or complete Byzantine Sacramentary. The Hieratikon is also also called Hierotelestikon (hierotelestia, "sacred service") or Liturgikon ("liturgical [book]"). See also Euchologion; sacramentary.

hierodeacon (hi'uhr-oh-dee-kahn; Gk., hieros diakonos, "holy deacon"), Byzantine term for a deacon who is also a monk. See also deacon; monk.

hieromonk (hi'uhr-oh-muhnk; Gk., hiereus, "priest"), Byzantine term for a monastic priest. See also monk; priest.

High Church, originally those in the Church of England who refused to switch their loyalties from James II to William III (1688) and who held Catholic-leaning views of Church, sacraments, and priesthood. The term was later applied to the Oxford movement of the nineteenth century and especially to Catholicizing tendencies in Anglican worship. Now used of liturgies marked by ritual solemnity. See also Anglicanism; Anglo-Catholicism; Oxford movement.

High Mass, one of three modes formerly used to celebrate the Tridentine Mass. The High Mass was sung, unlike the Low Mass, which was spoken in a quiet voice. High Mass was celebrated without additional assisting ministers, unlike the Solemn High Mass, which was sung and required the presence of a deacon and a subdeacon. The distinction among Low, High, and Solemn High Mass was dropped after the Second Vatican Council. However, the underlying principle of progressive solemnization, reserving more elaborate ceremonies for higher festivals and occasions, remains as valid in the 1990s as formerly. See also Low Mass; Mass; Solemn High Mass.

high priest, the head of the priests at the Temple in Jerusalem. After the Babylonian exile the high priest was the head of the Jewish nation within a foreign empire; in the second and first centuries B.C., the Jewish king was also the high priest. The office became a political appointment in 37 B.C., and it ceased altogether with the Roman destruction of the Temple in A.D. 70. In Heb 3:1 and 9:1–28, Christ's saving work is portrayed metaphorically as that of a high priest on the Day of Atonement. After the early second century A.D. the epithet "high priest" is occasionally applied to a bishop, as it is to the pre-Israelite priest Melchizedek (Gen 14:18–20) in the Canon of the Roman Mass. See also priesthood.

Hilarion, St., ca. 291–ca. 371, early Christian monastic figure. Born in Palestine, Hilarion converted to Christianity at Alexandria. From Anthony he learned the ways of the eremitic life. He tried to escape fame by moving to distant places. From Epiphanius, who knew Hilarion, Jerome took information for a biography of Hilarion. See also Anthony of Egypt, St.; Jerome, St.

Hilary of Poitiers, St., ca. 315–ca. 367, bishop of Poitiers, expounder of the doctrine of the Trinity against Arianism and, since 1851, a Doctor of the Church. His exile from modern France to the eastern Mediterranean exposed him to the resources of biblical interpretation in the Origenist tradition, which he used especially in his Christological reading of the Psalms, and to the intricacies of Greek theology in the battles following Nicaea. While Hilary's devotion to anti-Arian defense of the deity of Christ and the Holy Spirit has given him the sobriquet "Athanasius of the West," his positions were marked by flexibility of terminology, openness to multiple ways of resisting Arian conclusions (including some homoiousian positions), and a distinctive perspective on the Trinity and the person of Christ. Feast day: January 13. See also Arianism; Christology; Trinity, doctrine of the.

Hilda, St., 614–80, Anglo-Saxon abbess. A Northumbrian princess baptized by Paulinus (627), Hilda later founded and presided over the double monastery at Whitby. Feast day: November 17. See also double monasteries.

Hildebrand. See Gregory VII, St.

Hildegard of Bingen, St., 1098–1179, German nun, mystic, and scholar. Having entered religious life as a child, Hildegard founded the Benedictine convent of Rupertberg near Bingen in 1147. Renowned for her visions, related in the Scivias, Hildegard was a theologian, physician, and composer as well as an energetic reformer. Feast day: September 17.

Hillenbrand, Reynold Henry, 1909–79, priest, social activist, and liturgical pioneer. His priestly career in the archdiocese of Chicago was devoted to making the principles of social justice embodied in the papal encyclicals a reality among U.S. Catholics. This was at the heart of his endeavors in liturgical reform, Catholic Action, and the Christian Family Movement. A dynamic and charismatic figure, Hillenbrand had a profound impact on a generation of Chicago's priests and laypersons. See also Catholic Action; Christian Family Movement; liturgical movement.

Hilton, Walter, d. 1396, one of the English Mystics. He lived as a hermit before becoming an Augustinian canon at Thurgarton Priory. His most famous work in English is Scale of Perfection, which describes the stages of conversion in the soul. His other writings include Epistle to a Devout Man in Temporal Estate, The Song of Angels and various writings in Latin. See also English Mystics.

Hincmar of Reims, ca. 806–82, archbishop, canonist, and theologian. Appointed archbishop of Reims (845) by King Charles the Bald, Hincmar was the implacable opponent of Gottschalk of Orbais. Chaotic Carolingian politics involved Hincmar in a number of other controversies, including attacks on various members of the royal family and several disagreements with Pope Nicholas I. See also Gottschalk of Orbais.

Hippolytus, St. (hip-pahl'i-tuhs), ca. 170–ca. 236, ecclesiastical writer and martyr. Photius asserted that Hippolytus was a disciple of Irenaeus. As a presbyter at Rome, he fiercely opposed Sabellianism. He attacked Pope Zephyrinus (198/9–217) and Pope Callistus (217–22) and is thought to have established himself as an antipope to the latter. He diverged from the Roman bishops in both doctrine and practice: he promoted a Logos doctrine that involved a change in the relations between the Father and the Word and refused forgiveness to those who sinned after Baptism. During his joint exile with Pope Pontian (230–35) under Emperor Maximinus, he was reconciled to Rome. His body was brought back to Rome by Pope Fabian (236–50) in 236 and given a martyr's burial. His Refutation of All Heresies (attribution disputed by some) blames Greek philosophy as the origin of Christian heresies. His Apostolic Tradition is a valuable source for the liturgical practice of the Roman church in the second and third centuries. Feast day: August 13. See also Irenaeus of Lyons, St.; Sabellianism.

Hirscher, Johann Baptist (heer'shuhr), 1788–1865, German theologian. Ordained in 1810, he began teaching moral and pastoral theology at the University of Tübingen in 1817; in 1837, he accepted a position at the University of Freiburg. Hirscher called for extensive changes in the liturgy of the Eucharist: use of the vernacular, Communion under both species, and suppression of private Masses. He also urged that mandatory celibacy for priests be rescinded. He published a three-volume work on moral theology, discussing the moral life in terms of the realization of the kingdom of God, and two popular catechisms. His advocacy of church reform and his conciliatory posture to the German state led authorities to put his works on these matters on the Index of Forbidden Books in 1849. See also moral theology.

history, theology of, interpretation of history from the perspective of faith in the triune God. History is the medium through which the people come to understand and appropriate themselves through interaction and self-giving and rising above the self; history is thus the arena of persons' self-transcending encounters with one another and with God. For the Christian, this encounter with God has taken place preeminently in the life, death, and Resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth and continues in the community through the power of the Spirit. Human history becomes the ongoing story of the self-donating love of the triune God and the response in freedom of the human community. The response finds expression within the personal and structured relationships that bind human beings together in a matrix of meaning and values we call culture. A theology of history includes critical discernment of culture in the light of the gospel, a reading of the "signs of the times."

Sacred and Secular History: The Christian tradition understands God as active in human history: Yahweh parted the sea and entered into covenantal relationship with Israel; Jesus of Nazareth incarnated the revelation of God in his life, death, and Resurrection; the Holy Spirit gathers the community to become the presence of God in the world and leads it toward fulfillment. The Pauline tradition saw Jesus as the new Adam, inaugurating a "new creation"; early apologists, reflecting on Jesus Christ as incarnate Logos present in Jewish prophecy and pagan wisdom, identified Christianity as the necessary continuation and fulfillment of human history; Augustine (d. 430) especially in the City of God, underscored the dialectic between the history of salvation and profane political history; medieval disagreement about the motive of the Incarnation (Was the Incarnation motivated by the sin of Adam? Aquinas answered yes, Bonaventure no) revealed differences in the tradition about the integral unity of profane and sacred history.

Secularization accelerated the distinction of general history from salvation history; the collapse of the medieval worldview, the turn to the subject, and the discovery of history as inner element of all created reality mean that today a theology of history has all history—human activity, events, and cultures—as its object.

Pierre Teilhard de Chardin (d. 1955) proposed a teleological, evolutionary approach, grounded in the Incarnation; Karl Rahner's (d. 1984) transcendental framework saw history as the medium of human self-realization through freedom that finds its fulfillment in the radical openness of Jesus of Nazareth to God's self-communication; political and liberation theologians, drawing on eschatology, focus on the God of the future to awaken creativity in transforming cultural and political structures as components in the fulfillment of history.

An explicit appreciation of history as integral component of all created reality, not merely as a chronology of divine or human events, is a modern presupposition with consequences for theology: Christianity can be understood only in relationship to history; theology and dogma are historical realities and are subject to critical and contextual interpretation. See also City of God; Joachim of Fiore; salvation history; Teilhard de Chardin, Pierre.

GEORGE GRIENER

Hochland (hohk'lahnd; Ger., "highland"), a German Catholic journal of culture and religion. Around 1900, German Catholicism underwent a literary revival, a reaction to both Prussian and Vatican repressive measures. Carl Muth founded Hochland in 1903 as a journal that would focus on areas ranging from religion to the arts; it reported widely on topics such as neo-Scholasticism, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Rembrandt, and Richard Strauss. It became Neues Hochland in 1972.

Hofbauer, St. Clement Mary, 1751–1820, Redemptorist priest and Apostle of Vienna. Born in Moravia, Hofbauer studied for the priesthood at the University of Vienna. After ordination in 1784, he joined the Redemptorist order, which he served in various capacities throughout Europe for twenty-four years. Expelled from Warsaw in 1808 by Napoleon I, he returned to Vienna where he worked for the spiritual renewal of the city. Feast day (no longer observed universally): March 15.

Hogan Schism, a conflict between lay trustees and their bishop, which took place at St. Mary's Cathedral, Philadelphia. In 1820 the trustees of St. Mary's corporation appointed an Irish priest, William Hogan, as rector. Late in 1820, when the new bishop, Henry Conwell, arrived, Hogan resisted the bishop's authority and prevented his use of the cathedral. The bishop first suspended and then excommunicated Hogan. During the dispute Hogan proposed establishing a self-governing American Catholic Church. In response to the schism, Pope Pius VII issued the apostolic brief Non Sine Magno in 1822 forbidding trustees the power to appoint and remove pastors. See also trusteeism, lay.

Holcot, Robert, ca. 1290–1349, English Dominican and theology master at Oxford. He displayed a broad erudition, both classical and Christian, in his most popular works, including an important commentary on Wisdom. Holcot tended to favor the theological opinions of William of Ockham, although bound by his order to follow Aquinas. See also William of Ockham.

holiness, a spiritual quality derived from participation in the life of God who is the source of all holiness. God's creatures sense the existence of this holiness by its effects. Holiness is experienced as empowerment that is accompanied by feelings of awe and attraction. In sensing a holy presence one is struck by the realization, "I am not like this." God's greatness is overpowering, but even more importantly, God is incomprehensible. The sense that the holiness of God is a different kind of goodness than human goodness is the foundation of the doctrine of holiness. The immensity of God's goodness triggers a sense of unworthiness in the perceiver who realizes any previous conceptions of goodness pale in the face of "radical holiness."

Simultaneously, the presence of God instigates positive feelings, such as love and beatitude or mercy and peace. The experience of this facet of holiness counterbalances the experience of unworthiness, inspiring an individual to praise or thank God, or perhaps ask for mercy. It is important to note that such actions of praise or expiation do not make a person holy. The response of the creature to God is the result of holiness, not the cause of holiness. In the Christian revelation, the power and presence of God is revealed as love. The Christian is asked to respond to the revelation of God's love, but the ability to respond to this invitation is not automatic. God infuses the virtues of faith, hope, and love that enable believers to turn their whole lives toward God.

The believer's response to God's love can take many forms, such as gratitude and humility, love of neighbor, or the promotion of a just social order. These virtuous acts may be performed with varying degrees of love. The more these actions are informed by love, the more perfect is the holiness. The emphasis is not on the actions performed but on the love with which they are performed. This love, in turn, depends on the degree to which the individual is open to the love of God.

Although there must be concern for overcoming personal sins and imperfections that thwart one's complete response to God, or hamper service towards one's neighbor, the Church's sense of holiness discourages a selfish preoccupation with the perfection of one's soul.

All Christians are called to holiness (see Vatican II's Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, 1964, ch. 5). The Church on earth fosters holiness through the celebration of the sacraments, the teachings of Jesus, and the fellowship of believers. See also grace; sanctification. PATRICIA M. VINJE

Holiness, His, a title now restricted in Catholic practice to the pope. For the first several centuries it was used of all bishops, but after the beginning of the seventh century it was restricted to patriarchs. Since the fourteenth century it has been used only of the pope. See also pope.

holiness of the Church, the attribute that qualifies the Church as a people consecrated to the worship and service of God and endowed with gifts of divine grace. Vatican II declared it to be a matter of faith that the Church is indefectibly holy. The council based this belief on the biblical teaching that Christ united the Church to himself as his body and bride and endowed it with the abiding gift of the Holy Spirit (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 39). The council also described the church as "marked with a genuine though imperfect holiness" (n. 48). Thus, one must say that while the Church has a genuine holiness that it cannot lose, this holiness will always be imperfect during the Church's earthly pilgrimage.

There are three aspects of the Church's holiness: first, the objective holiness of its formal elements; second, its consecration as a priestly people; and third, the personal holiness of its members. The Church is structured by such formal elements as the word of God, sacraments, and ministry. These elements enable the Church to be an effective instrument for the holiness of its members. This holiness "is constantly shown forth in the fruits of grace which the Spirit produces in the faithful" (n. 39). On the other hand, "the Church, embracing sinners in her bosom, is at the same time holy and always in need of being purified, and incessantly pursues the path of penance and renewal" (n. 8). Though the pilgrim Church will always consist of saints and sinners, sin will never so prevail as to deprive the Church of its gift of holiness. See also marks of the Church.

Holland, Catholicism in. See Netherlands, Catholicism in the.

holy cards, small printed cards containing pious sentiments or depicting popular religious figures. Widely distributed after the advent of printing, the cards are used as mementos of religious events, to foster a particular devotion, or as a means of remembrance, e.g., for a deceased person. The subject matter is diverse but some tend toward the sentimental.

Holy cards, depicting (from top to bottom) the Sacred Heart of Jesus, the Holy Spirit descending upon the Blessed Virgin Mary to conceive the child Jesus, a guardian angel protecting a young child, and a traditional prayer to one's guardian angel.

Holy Communion. See Communion, Holy.

Holy Cross Fathers. See Congregation of Holy Cross.

holy days of obligation, certain days throughout the liturgical year that are dedicated to recalling important events connected with the life of Jesus Christ or persons linked to him. On these days Catholics "are bound to participate in the Mass . . . [and] . . .abstain from those labors and business concerns which impede the worship to be rendered to God, the joy which is proper to the Lord's Day, or the proper relaxation of mind and body" (can. 1247).

Although Sunday is the primary "holy day of obligation" for Catholics, the term is generally used for the particular days to which the canonical obligation is attached. Already in the second century local churches dedicated certain days to the remembrance of their martyrs. The fourth century saw the beginnings of feasts dedicated to the birth of the Lord: in the East the Epiphany and in the West Christmas. By the fifth century these feasts had become universal.

Other feasts developed as well to commemorate other mysteries of the Lord, his Mother and saints of particular importance (e.g., John the Baptist, Peter, and Paul). As these feasts multiplied through the centuries, popes and synods of bishops attempted to bring order among them to distinguish the most important and clarify the obligations attached to them. The multiplication of holy days also demanded their reduction in number, first attempted in the fifteenth century. Only after 1642, however, when Pope Urban VIII discouraged bishops from establishing new obligatory feasts, were genuine attempts at reduction made.

The 1917 Code of Canon Law recognized ten holy days of obligation, which are also listed in the 1983 code: Christmas (December 25), Epiphany (January 6), Ascension (Thursday of the sixth week of Easter), Corpus Christi (Thursday after Trinity Sunday), Holy Mary Mother of God (formerly the Feast of the Circumcision of the Lord, January 1), Immaculate Conception (December 8), Assumption (August 15), St. Joseph (March 19), Sts. Peter and Paul (June 29), All Saints (November 1). Conferences of bishops have authority to abolish or transfer certain holy days of obligation with the approval of the Holy See. Consequently, there is considerable diversity throughout the Catholic Church regarding the number of holy days of obligation actually retained in a particular nation.

In the United States, the National Conference of Catholic Bishops has removed the obligation from the feasts of St. Joseph and Sts. Peter and Paul and has transferred Epiphany and Corpus Christi to the nearest Sunday. In accord with canon 86, a local bishop can also dispense the members of his diocese from the obligation attached to a holy day if he judges that the dispensation "will contribute to the spiritual good of the faithful." A pastor can also do so in individual cases "for a just reason and in accord with the prescriptions of the diocesan bishop" (can. 1245). See also feasts, liturgical; Sunday.

JOHN J. STRYNKOWSKI

Holy Door (Lat., Porta Sancta), a door in St. Peter's Basilica in Rome that is ceremoniously opened only at the beginning of each Holy Year. Holy doors in the basilicas of St. Paul's Outside the Walls, St. John Lateran, and St. Mary Major are opened simultaneously. See also Saint Peter's Basilica.

Holy Family, the family consisting of Jesus, his mother, Mary, and Joseph, regarded as the model for all Catholic families. The feast of the Holy Family is celebrated on the Sunday after Christmas or, if there is no Sunday within the octave, on December 30.

Holy Father, a title of the pope. The Latin equivalent, Beatissimus Pater, means "The Most Holy Father," but the title, first used in English in the 1830s, is usually employed in the shorter form. See also pope.

Holy Ghost Fathers, the Congregation of the Holy Ghost under the Protection of the Immaculate Heart of Mary (C.S.Sp.), popularly called the Spiritans. Originally founded in France by Claude Francois Poullart des Places in 1703, they were almost eliminated during the French Revolution but were refounded in 1848 when the Congregation of the Immaculate Heart of Mary merged with the Congregation of the Holy Ghost. Francis Mary Libermann was the first superior of the united congregation. They came to the United States in 1873 to work with Catholic immigrants. There are five provinces in France, Ireland, Portugal, Germany, and the United States.

Holy Ghost. See Holy Spirit.

Holy Grail, legendary vessel of medieval romances, variously associated with the eucharistic cup of the Last Supper or the dish of the Paschal lamb, which provided spiritual benefits to those who beheld it.

holy hour, a paraliturgical eucharistic devotion involving adoration of the exposed Blessed Sacrament for a one-hour period. Holy hours include time for silent reflection, communal prayer, and sometimes a homily. Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament concludes the devotion. A partial or full indulgence may be received for this pious practice. An individual can also make a holy hour on his or her own. It involves time spent before the Blessed Sacrament, meditating on Scripture, reading a spiritual book, and praying, silently or according to some prescribed form. See also Blessed Sacrament; eucharistic devotions.

Holy Innocents, the children massacred in Bethlehem by Herod the Great in an attempt to destroy the child Jesus (Matt 2:16–18). Since the sixth century, the link between these children's fate and the birth of Christ (December 25) has been stressed through their liturgical commemoration as martyrs on December 28.

Holy Land, a designation for Israel. The Bible documents the special character of the land by revealing that the Lord promised it to Abraham and his offspring and that they later gained it through conquest (Numbers, Joshua). There the temples were built, God was worshiped, and the events of the OT transpired. The facts that Jesus lived, died, and rose in it and the earliest events of Christian history took place there led to its being called the Holy Land in the Middle Ages. From the fourth century Christians made the sacred sites in the land the goal of pilgrimages.

Holy Name of Jesus, popular devotion, vigorously preached by the fifteenth-century Franciscan Bernardino of Siena as a way of combatting blasphemy. The devotion became a staple of Catholic piety among, e.g., the Jesuits, and later fostered pious groups like the Holy Name Society founded precisely to honor the name of God. See also Holy Name Society.

HOLY ORDERS

Holy Orders is the sacrament by which one is received into the ministry of the diaconate, priesthood, or episcopacy in the Church. According to Catholic teaching, the sacrament of Holy Orders is a divinely instituted structure of the Church of Christ. Reception of the sacrament signals the Church's belief that the candidate is united with the ministry of Jesus and the apostolic Church and empowered to minister in the name and power of Christ in the Church and in the world. The ordained is also commissioned to represent the Church to itself and to the world. In practice and in understanding, Holy Orders has undergone profound changes from its origins in the NT period to the developments of the Second Vatican Council (1962–65).

NEW TESTAMENT ORIGINS

It is a tenet of Catholic belief that the origins of what has come to be called the sacrament of Holy Orders are to be found in the ministry of Jesus and in the developments of the early Church described in the NT. Contemporary biblical scholarship confirms the idea that Jesus called disciples to follow him and that among them a group of twelve served as a symbolic representation of the twelve tribes of Israel and of the fulfillment of God's promises dawning in Jesus and his ministry. After Jesus' death and Resurrection the Twelve exercised a collective leadership among the first believers and a key role in the founding decisions of the early Church.

Alongside the Twelve are many other examples of ministerial leadership in the early Church: the Hellenist leaders of Acts 6; James and the presbyters (Gk., presbyteroi, "elders") in Jerusalem; Paul and local leaders of the Pauline communities; the second-generation apostolic delegates Timothy and Titus and local church leaders, presbyters, and "overseers" (Gk., episkopoi) to be set up under their direction; and presbyters in the communities of the Letters of John. Paul's Letters indicate the presence of yet other types of ministers in the early Church: apostles, prophets, and teachers have a special prominence, but there are other ministers as well (1 Cor 12; Rom 12; 16). The clearest indications of attempts to set up a deliberate structure of ministry are present in the Pastorals (1–2 Timothy and Titus).

NT evidence suggests there were different ways in which Church leaders emerged or were appointed. In light of subsequent developments some indications are especially significant. In Acts 6 seven Hellenists are chosen by the community and presented to the apostles, who pray and lay hands on them. While the exact meaning of this gesture is not evident, texts from the Pastorals (1 Tim 4:14; 2 Tim 1:6) may provide clearer antecedents for later ordination rites.

THE PATRISTIC CHURCH

Between the end of the first century and the early third century the notion of an ordered ministry in the Church came more clearly into focus. Clement of Rome, writing ca. A.D. 96 to promote church order at Corinth, refers to a deliberate provision for a succession of ministers from the apostles. While historical scholarship fails to find evidence for so precise an ordering, it is important to recognize the early Church conviction that later ministers stand in continuity with the ministry of Jesus and the apostles.

Letters of Ignatius of Antioch (d. ca. 107) make a distinction between the offices of overseer and presbyter and promote a threefold Church order of overseer (forerunner of the later bishop), presbyter (forerunner of the later priest), and deacon. It is Tertullian (d. ca. 220) who first uses the terms "ecclesiastical order" or "priestly order" to differentiate overseers, presbyters, and deacons from the body of the laity. Tertullian's understanding of orders and ordination is influenced by the notion of a juridical charge for a function in a Church structured according to responsibilities and powers.

A different approach to orders is present in the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus (d. ca. 236), written in Rome about 215. Ordination rites described in this document refer to the imposition of hands and prayer for the gift of the Spirit empowering the overseer, presbyter, or deacon for the ministry to be received. Hippolytus also recognizes the role of the whole community in the selection of the overseer, if not the other offices as well. Though the influence of Hippolytus was widespread, the Latin-speaking churches tended to view orders more as an institutional structure rather than, as in Greek-speaking churches, a Spirit-guided ministry for the Church.

Two other developments in these early centuries are important. The gradual application of the OT typology of priesthood, first to the overseer and later to the presbyter, served as a prism through which these orders would be understood. Second, changing Church needs served to alter the roles of the two offices. The overseer/bishop was the focal point of ministry in the earliest centuries, both in his leadership in the local community and in his ministry in the wider community of churches. Presbyters functioned as a council of advisers to the bishop, and deacons assisted the bishop both in administrative tasks and in the liturgy. As the Christian population grew, the presbyter, identified increasingly as priest, came to assume many of the responsibilities of the bishop in the local community, in leadership and in liturgy, with a corresponding lessening of his role as adviser to the bishop. Bishops, for their part, became more involved with administrative and judicial responsibilities both in the Church and in society and less immediately identified with the normal liturgical life of the community. Further, with the increased importance of presbyters, the role of the deacons was reduced to liturgical functions and the order came to be seen as a transition to priesthood.

THE MEDIEVAL PERIOD

These practical developments and the increased numbers of monks and priests whose principal ministry centered on church worship influenced the medieval understanding of orders. Three developments are especially important. The first came in the tendency to understand Holy Orders largely in terms of the power of the priest to consecrate the body and blood of Christ in the sacrifice of the Mass and to administer the other sacraments. The sacramental character associated with ordination was seen as a configuration to Christ, the priest, with power to act in Christ's name when pronouncing the consecratory words. Theologians found support for this theological view in the writings of Jerome (d. 420), who, thinking there was no clear distinction between presbyters and overseers in the NT, taught that the two were equally priests. As the essence of priesthood was thought to consist in power over the Eucharist, the distinction between bishop and priest was regarded as a disposition of Church authority. This touches a second development.

Only in the twelfth century was the notion of sacrament clarified and Holy Orders recognized as one of the seven sacraments of the Church. Discussion continued, however, on what was included in the sacrament of Holy Orders. The common, though not unanimous, opinion held that there were seven orders: porter, exorcist, lector, acolyte, subdeacon, deacon, and priest. It was widely recognized that the first four of these, the minor orders, and the subdiaconate were ecclesiastical institutions and not strictly sacraments. A majority view held that episcopacy was also not a part of the sacrament of Holy Orders but rather a position conferred by ecclesiastical jurisdiction. A minority view, held by canonists and some theologians, affirmed that episcopacy did belong to the sacrament of Holy Orders; some pointed to the power the bishop held in the Body of Christ, the Church.

A third significant development came in the influence of the sixth-century Neoplatonic Syrian author who wrote under the pseudonym of Dionysius (Denys) the Areopagite, the Athenian convert of Paul (Acts 17:34). His writings, thought from the pseudonym to be from the first century and therefore accorded great authority, espoused a hierarchical view of the Church as participating in and reflecting the divinely ordered structure of the entire universe. As there were three orders in the angelic hierarchy, so there were three orders in the clerical hierarchy—bishops, priests, and deacons—and three orders in the lay hierarchy—religious, laity, and catechumens. In this schema of understanding, higher orders influenced lower. And when the catechumenate dissolved, laity were perceived as passively receiving grace from the clergy.

These developments contributed to an understanding and practice of orders that was emphatically cultic, clerical, and hierarchical. This approach was challenged by the Reformation.

THE COUNCIL OF TRENT

The Reformers took issue with several of these developments, most especially in the emphasis on the Mass as an unbloody sacrifice to the neglect of ministry of the word, on the distinction between clergy and laity, and on the teaching of a divinely ordered hierarchy within Church ministry. These complaints reflected Reformers' concern to preserve the gratuity of divine grace, the priority of the Word, and ministry of the word. Trent's teaching, both in its doctrinal statements and in its reform measures, was largely a defense of existing practices as a response to the challenges of the Reformers and not a complete theology of orders.

The principal teachings of the council may be summarized as follows. First, the council defended the existence of a visible and external priesthood with the power of consecrating the body and blood of the Lord and forgiving sins in Christ's name. Neither the responsibility of preaching nor that of community leadership is emphasized in the dogmatic teaching of the council. Second, the council taught that Holy Orders, as one of the seven sacraments instituted by Christ, confers grace on those who receive it. Third, the council defended the hierarchical structure of major and minor orders in the Church and taught that bishops are superior to priests. The council did not settle the question as to whether the episcopacy shares in the sacrament of Holy Orders. Fourth, the council upheld the distinction between the baptized and ordained in the Church. It did not deny, but made no mention of the priesthood of all believers so insisted upon in the writings of the Reformers.

The dogmatic teaching of the council was accompanied by disciplinary decrees that included such matters as directives on preaching and pastoral care. But it was the dogmatic teaching of Trent that guided Catholic perception of orders until the mid-twentieth century.

VATICAN II

The Second Vatican Council (1962–65), drawing upon Church tradition and recent biblical, liturgical, and historical studies, marks a major development in Catholic thought and practice with regard to the sacrament of Holy Orders. Fundamental to its teaching on Holy Orders is the council's basic teaching on the Church and the Christological basis for that understanding. By Baptism all the faithful are called to be a priestly people who, by the Spirit of Christ, continue the threefold mission of Christ as prophet, priest, and servant of the kingdom of God (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, chap. 1). All the faithful have a share in the mission of the Church and in the worship of the Church. The notion of the priesthood of the faithful is invoked specifically as the basis for the faithful's participation in the offering of the Eucharist (n. 10). The reassertion of the priesthood of all believers is a major element in conciliar teaching on the sacrament of Holy Orders. The post-Tridentine tendency to see the laity as passive recipients of the ministry of the ordained has been corrected. Vatican II does teach that, though there exists an essential difference between the priesthood of the ordained and the priesthood of all the faithful, the two are nonetheless related one to the other and both share in the one priesthood of Christ. The relationship between the priesthood of the faithful and the ordained priesthood, however, is not fully developed.

Conciliar teaching on Holy Orders looks to all three forms of the sacrament. The council teaches that the fullness of priesthood and so of the sacrament of Holy Orders resides in the episcopacy (n. 21). This represents a shift from the previous tendency to see orders in terms of priesthood and signals a retrieval of the patristic view of the bishop's role over the medieval view that episcopacy was not a sacrament but a role of jurisdictional authority within the Church. Further, by sacramental ordination the bishop receives the threefold ministry of preaching and teaching, of sanctifying, and of governing (n. 27). This latter teaching constitutes another change from the medieval view that, while sacramental ordination provided the basis for the sanctifying ministry, the responsibilites of preaching, teaching, and governing were matters of jurisdiction. All three roles, grounded in sacramental ordination, are seen as a ministry of service exercised in hierarchical communion with the episcopal college of which the pope is head.

Priest and deacon share in the one sacrament of Holy Orders, though each in its own way. The priest, by virtue of sacramental ordination, shares in the threefold ministry of Christ as minister of God's word, as minister of sacraments, and as pastoral guide of the community (n. 28). This more comprehensive understanding of priestly ministry contrasts with Trent's linking priesthood so closely with Christ's sacrifice on the cross. While the priest is truly such by ordination, the priest exercises ministry in dependence on the bishop and in union with the entire presbyterate of the diocese.

The deacon receives the sacrament of Holy Orders as one who ministers in conjunction with the bishop and the body of priests. The areas of the deacon's ministry are three: ministry of liturgy, ministry of the word, and ministry of charity. Vatican II provided for the restoration of the diaconate as a permanent order in the ministry of the Church (n. 29).

In 1972 Paul VI abrogated minor orders and the subdiaconate in the Latin Church and replaced the latter with the lay ministries of lector and acolyte.

CONCLUSION

The sacrament of Holy Orders, like the Church itself, is a complex reality, both human and divine, which shows in its history both continuity and dramatic developments in response to different needs and changing understandings.

The principal line of continuity comes in the Catholic conviction that apostolic ministry is a divinely constituted element of Church. The sacrament of Holy Orders, in its different forms, reminds the Church in each age that Christ, present through the Spirit, is the ultimate authority and source of Church order. The ordained minister is a sacramental representation of the Christ, in whom the Church is founded and in whose Spirit the Church continues to maintain its core identity. The ordained minister is also a representative of the Church to itself, a community of people worshiping the Father through Christ in the Spirit, a community that, in the Spirit, continues the mission of Christ to be sign and instrument of God's unity with humankind and, in that unity, of humankind's being one in a reconciliation and peace that last unto eternity. Theological understandings of Christ in his humanity as sacrament of God and of the Church as sacrament of Christ are basic to recent understanding of Holy Orders as a sacrament of Christ to the Church and, always within the body of the faithful, as sacrament of the Church to the world.

The sacrament of Holy Orders is also a historical reality and, as such, influenced by developments in practice and in theological understanding. Both factors will no doubt continue to affect the sacrament of Holy Orders in decades and centuries to come.

See also bishop; clergy; deacon; episcopacy; hierarchy; major orders; ministry; minor orders; ordination; presbyter; priesthood; sacrament; sacramental character.

Bibliography

Cooke, Bernard. Ministry to Word and Sacraments: History and Theology. Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1976.

O'Meara, Thomas Franklin. Theology of Ministry. New York: Paulist Press, 1983.

Osborne, Kenan B. Priesthood: A History of Ordained Ministry in the Roman Catholic Church. New York: Paulist Press, 1989.

Power, David N. Ministers of Christ and His Church: Theology of Priesthood. London: Geoffrey Chapman, 1969.

FREDERICK J. CWIEKOWSKI

Holy Name Society, lay Catholic men's association established to promote devotion to the name of Jesus and the sanctification of its members. A Spanish Dominican friar, Diego of Victoria, founded the society in the fifteenth century, calling it the "Confraternity of the Name of God." Much of the society's growth in the United States resulted from the efforts of another Dominican, Father Charles H. McKenna.

During the late nineteenth century, the society functioned as an important association for promoting the Catholic faith among immigrants to the United States. Only men were allowed to join. In 1896, the U.S. Catholic bishops received permission from the Vatican to establish a Holy Name association in every parish. By 1910 the society had about 500,000 members. It organized parades and rallies not only to spread public devotion to Jesus' name but also to demonstrate Catholic strength, indicative of the Catholic triumphalism of the period.

Many such societies organized events to nurture their members' piety. They would receive Communion once a month as a group, followed by a "Communion breakfast," to which a guest speaker usually was invited. By 1963, the society claimed a worldwide membership of about five million. With many of the changes brought about by the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), interest in the Holy Name Society waned. In many parishes other associations of parishioners have replaced it.

Holy Names, Sisters of. See Sisters of the Holy Names of Jesus and Mary.

Holy Office, originally a tribunal for final appeals and papal causes established by Pope Paul III in 1542 and reorganized by Pope Sixtus V in 1587. It became the Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith under Pope Paul VI in 1967 and retained that title when Pope John Paul II reorganized the Roman Curia in 1988. See also Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith; Inquisition.

holy oils, oils consecrated by a bishop or priest to be used in the sacraments of initiation, (Baptism, Confirmation, and Eucharist), ordination, or the Anointing of the Sick. Ordinarily the oils are consecrated by the bishop at the Chrism Mass celebrated on Holy Thursday morning.

Holy Places, sites in the Holy Land (modern Israel) reputed to be associated with Jesus. Among the most popular objects of pilgrimage: the Cenacle (Upper Room), the Via Dolorosa (Way of the Cross), the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, and the Mount of Olives. See also Holy Land.

Holy Roman Empire, European state founded by the German king Otto I in 962 as a successor to Charlemagne's empire. The borders of the empire underwent many changes, but its core was the German principalities, Austria, and Bohemia, with parts of Italy and the Netherlands incorporated into the empire at various times. Emperors were elected by the more powerful princes and were originally crowned by the pope in Rome, a practice discontinued in 1562. After the fifteenth century, the emperor was almost always a member of the Austrian Hapsburg dynasty. Emperor Francis II dissolved the empire in 1806. See also Charlemagne.

Holy Saturday, the day before Easter Sunday. In the ancient Church, Christians marked this Saturday by fasting in preparation for the Easter festival to follow. Then, after sundown, they commenced a vigil that lasted all night and concluded with Baptism and Eucharist at dawn. In the Middle Ages, however, many of the services attached to the Easter Vigil were transferred to Holy Saturday morning. In 1951, Pope Pius XII restored the ancient Easter Vigil, paving the way for Holy Saturday to return (after the Holy Week reforms of 1956) to its ancient character as a day of preparation. See also Easter Vigil; Holy Week.

Holy See (Lat., sancta sedes, "holy chair"), a term apparently related to ceremonies for installing the bishop of Rome, it now refers only to the Apostolic See, namely, the pope and those persons and departments of the Roman Curia which assist in governance and administration of the universal Church (Code of Canon Law, can. 361). It also refers to the visible and moral position of the pope as pastor of the universal Church and to the Church as a moral entity which exists by divine law and possesses certain juridical rights and obligations (can. 113). See also Apostolic See; papacy, the; Roman Curia; Vatican City State.

Holy Sepulchre, Church of the, Jerusalem basilica built over the site traditionally regarded as the tomb of Christ. Originally erected by the emperor Constantine early in the fourth century, the church was destroyed and rebuilt several times. The present church, which dates from the early nineteenth century, is administered, not always harmoniously, by various Christian denominations.

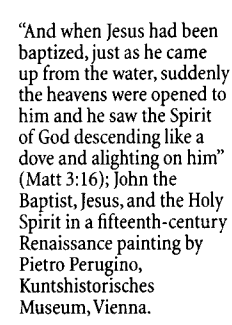
Holy Shroud, ancient burial cloth, also known as the "Shroud of Turin" because it has been kept in the cathedral of Turin, Italy, since 1578. It became the center of much controversy and speculation that the cloth might be the burial garment of Jesus of Nazareth. Dated to the fourteenth century by carbon-14 testing in 1988, the shroud nevertheless remains the object of scientific study and religious sentiment. The linen wrap, measuring 14 feet 3 inches by 3 feet 7 inches, survived a fire in the 1500s with burn marks and apparent drippings of molten silver. The shroud bears the distinct imprint of the body of a man crucified according to procedures remarkably like those used for the execution of Jesus as recorded in biblical testimony. Forensic pathologists have confirmed that the injuries sustained by this man include scourging, puncture wounds around the head, facial bruises, a stabbing in the chest, and the piercing of wrist areas just below the palms. The crux of current controversy involves the cause of the mysterious imprint, which remains unexplained. Theories of the imprint's origin include a bright flash of scorching light emanating from the shroud victim's body. For some Christians who are intrigued by the shroud, recent scientific study has failed to resolve the issue of whether this cloth should be regarded as authentic or a forgery. See also crucifixion.

The Holy Shroud, venerated since the mid-fourteenth century as the burial cloth of Jesus and bearing the imprint of his body; preserved in the Cathedral of St. John the Baptist in Turin, Italy, since 1578.

HOLY SPIRIT

The Holy Spirit (Heb., ruah; Gk., pneuma) is the third Person of the Trinity. The Christian understanding of God affirms that God's unity is tripersonal. The God whom Jesus called Father is revealed and present to us in the incarnation of the Word and the gift of the Holy Spirit. To say that the Holy Spirit is the third person of the Trinity, however, does not satisfy the desire for greater comprehension; if anything, it brings awareness of the degree of mystery involved in efforts to understand the person and work of the Holy Spirit.



"And when Jesus had been baptized, just as he came up from the water, suddenly the heavens were opened to him and he saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove and alighting on him" (Matt 3:16); John the Baptist, Jesus, and the Holy Spirit in a fifteenth-century Renaissance painting by Pietro Perugino, Kuntshistorisches Museum, Vienna.

SPIRIT OF JESUS/BIBLICAL WITNESS

Although the Bible is the fundamental source of knowledge about God, there is no systematic doctrine of the Trinity in either the OT or the NT. The sacred writings of Israel neither express nor imply any understanding of plurality in God. God does many things in the lives of the people of Israel, but the God of Israel is one. The power of the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob is present in the spirit that stirs the waters of creation, as well as in the strength and courage of the priests, prophets, and kings who guide, reproach, and inspire the people of Israel; but this power cannot rightly be equated with the third Person of the Trinity. Efforts to isolate passages where the spirit of Yahweh is mentioned so that one might come to an understanding of the third Person of the Trinity are misleading at best.

Nevertheless, one of the factors in Jesus' understanding of God was the OT metaphor of God's Spirit. According to the Jewish tradition, the spirit of Yahweh functions as the creative and life-giving energy of God, as well as the power of Yahweh that comes to rest on the judges, kings, and prophets anointed to guide and challenge God's people. The spirit of Yahweh is thus God's presence at work in the lives of God's people, especially in those called to lead the community to live according to God's will.

Among the thematic links between the OT and the NT was the expectation of an ideal leader who would be anointed with God's Spirit and thus be able to definitively establish God's rule in Israel (Isa 42:1–4; 61:1–2). The NT reveals that Jesus is not only conceived by the power of the Holy Spirit (Luke 1:35), but that he is the one anointed by the Spirit of God (Matt 3:13–17; Mark 1:9–13; Luke 3:21–22) to proclaim in his person the presence of God's reign. The biblical affirmation that Jesus is the Christ, that is, that Jesus is the anointed one of Yahweh, is one of the most significant pneumatological affirmations (affirmations concerning the Holy Spirit) in the Bible.

God anoints Jesus of Nazareth with the Spirit. The resultant identification of Jesus with God brings the Christian understanding of God to a new and decisively different level. God is preeminently present in Jesus of Nazareth. In the context of Jesus' death and Resurrection, this divine presence is sent to dwell within and to empower the small band of disciples who experienced the Risen Lord. This Spirit of Jesus becomes at Pentecost (Acts 2:1–4) the unity of the otherwise disparate believers and the pneumatic presence of the Risen Lord enabling all who believe to remain faithful until the Lord Jesus comes again (Rev 22:17–21). It is the power of the Spirit of the resurrected Lord Jesus that unites and animates the Christian community even today.

Thus the biblical witness concerning God's Spirit points to the elusive, energizing, and universal presence or activity that the Christian community has come to affirm as that of the divine Person who (together with the Son) is sent by the Father as the means of human union with God.

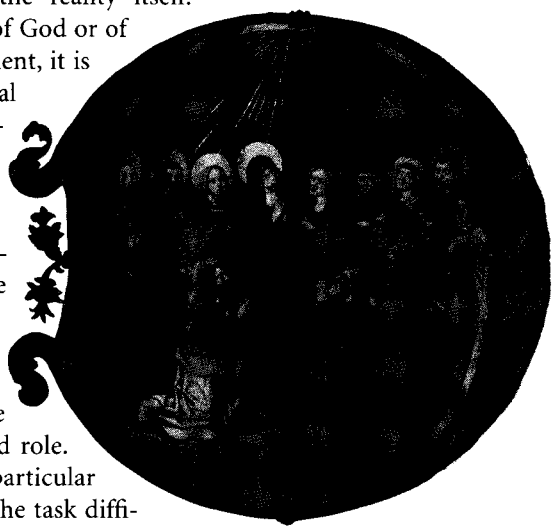
SPIRIT OF GOD/DOCTRINAL DEVELOPMENTS

Belief in the one God who is Father, Son, and Spirit is the central truth of all Christian theology and the core reality of Christian living. In an attempt to name the specific personal identity and unique role of the Holy Spirit one encounters the most basic and foundational questions of theology: Who is God? How do persons experience God? The Christian community maintains that it is Jesus of Nazareth, born of Mary by the power of the Spirit, who is the revelation of God. In the life, death, and Resurrection of Jesus is found the specifically Christian answer to the question of God's identity. The Christian community also maintains that it is God's gift of the Holy Spirit that enables human relationship with God. Persons are one with the triune God insofar as they accept the gift of divine grace, that is, the sanctifying presence of the Holy Spirit. Thus, Jesus reveals God's identity, and the Holy Spirit makes human relationship with God possible.

Knowledge of God's reality and experience of God's presence are inseparable. Although there is a logical and necessary distinction between who God is and how people experience God, there is no real separation between the two. There is no knowledge of the triune God apart from oneness with that Holy Mystery. In like manner there is no awareness of the lordship of Jesus without a corresponding intimacy with the Holy Spirit. Thus, whatever is said of Jesus has an impact on an understanding of the Spirit, just as whatever is understood of the Spirit influences what can be said of Jesus. The Spirit is the transcendent power given by God within whom believers recognize the historical person who is God's self-revelation. The Spirit is the intangible presence that enables believers to touch God in the humanity of Jesus.

In like manner, pneumatology (the theology of the Holy Spirit) is distinct (but inseparable) from both trinitarian theology and Christology. There is no pure or isolated doctrine of the Spirit that develops independently from the other central doctrines of the Church. Since all theology of the Holy Spirit is intrinsically related to Christology and trinitarian theology, extreme caution must be taken in making any definitive claims about the manner of the Spirit's being and activity. The theological model that a community of believers chooses to make central in an explication of the Holy Spirit will need to be correlated with the analogies that particular community (or individual) uses in Christology and trinitarian theology.

The existence of models or metaphors for talking about the reality of God made manifest and present in the person of Jesus and the power of the Spirit need not suggest that nothing true can be said about the mystery of God. The need for analogical language in theology does require, however, a degree of pluralism in theology; otherwise a metaphorical explanation can be mistaken for the reality itself. Although no one conceptual model of God or of the Holy Spirit can hope to be sufficient, it is nonetheless true that not all theological efforts are equally satisfactory. Selectivity is needed about any proposed models for understanding the Holy Spirit.



"When the day of Pentecost had come, they were all together in one place. . . . All of them were filled with the Holy Spirit and began to speak in other languages, as the Spirit gave them the ability" (Acts 2:1, 4); The Coming of the Holy Spirit by the Master of Osma (ca. 1460), in the Osma-Soria Chapter House, Soria, Spain.

Christian theology in the West, however, has not tended to err on the side of saying too much about the Holy Spirit. Unfortunately, the greater danger seems to be the absence of serious theological reflection on the uniqueness of the Spirit's person and role. Both the nature of theology and the particular manner of being of the Spirit make the task difficult. Efforts to focus theological inquiry on the Spirit's person and function are hampered by the fact that the Spirit is less an object of interest or a focus of inquiry than the focusing power of all theological speculation as well as the source of all prayerful commitment. There is a kind of self-effacing quality to the Spirit's manner of being within and among persons that often leads to a benign neglect of the Spirit's unique role in the knowledge of and union with the God of Jesus. The Spirit is God's gift enabling recognition and acceptance of the lordship of Jesus. Thus, both knowledge of Jesus and commitment to God can be enriched insofar as one becomes more explicitly attentive to the unique role of the Holy Spirit in one's life as a Christian.

The most succinct statement of the Christian community's understanding of the Holy Spirit is found in the third article of the Nicene Creed (the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed, or creed of the Council of Constantinople, 381). In the first article of the creed the Christian community asserts its faith in the Father who is creator; in the second article the community affirms its belief in the Incarnate Word who redeems; in the third article the Church proclaims its commitment to the Spirit in whom the unity of God as well as the unity of the community with God rests.

In 325 the creed of the Council of Nicaea stated that orthodox faith included belief "in the Holy Spirit," but it did not further specify who the Spirit is or how the Spirit works in the lives of the faithful. During the decades that followed Nicaea the question of the Spirit's divinity came to the fore in a series of theological debates between those who followed the Pneumatomachians in denying the divinity of the Spirit and those who followed the Cappadocians (Basil, Gregory of Nazianzus, and Gregory of Nyssa) in affirming that the Spirit is God. Thus, the Council of Constantinople added a series of affirmations about the Spirit's full lordship as well as the Spirit's role in the mystery of salvation. The Catholic Church thus prays in its Sunday eucharistic celebration: "We believe in the Holy Spirit, the Lord, the giver of life, who proceeds from the Father and the Son. With the Father and the Son he is worshiped and glorified. He has spoken through the Prophets. We believe in one, holy, catholic and apostolic Church. We acknowledge one baptism for the forgiveness of sins. We look for the resurrection of the dead, and the life of the world to come."

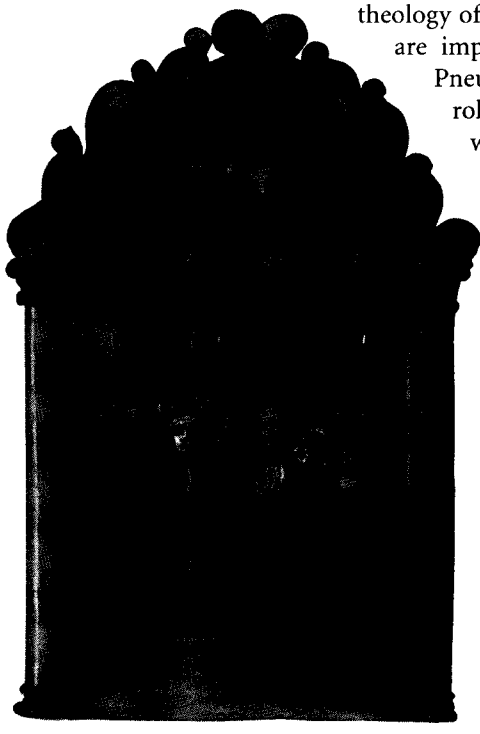
The Council of Constantinople and all subsequent theological reflection link the Spirit to the formation of the Christian community, the experience of salvation through Baptism, and the hope for future glory. The creed suggests that the Spirit works within believers as the source of their union with one another, as a means of their oneness with God through the baptismal initiation commitment, and as the promise and impetus of their glorious transformation in the resurrection of the dead.



The Holy Spirit descending as a dove upon the Blessed Virgin Mary and the apostles, early fifteenth-century illustration in the Missale Romanorum; Tarazona Cathedral archives, Zaragoza, Spain.

SPIRIT OF COMMUNION/ECCLESIOLOGY AND GRACE

Most of what could be said about the Holy Spirit usually remains implicit in ecclesiology (the study of the Church) and theological anthropology (the doctrine of grace). Since the Spirit has been given to humanity as the source of unity with God and among God's people, the theology of grace and the theology of the Church are implicitly theologies of the Holy Spirit. Pneumatology seeks to make explicit God's role in the experience of communion—with one another and with God.

The Holy Spirit is the animating principle of the Church of God which has the Lord Jesus as its head. The Nicene Creed's statement of Christian belief in (that is, commitment to) the "one, holy, catholic and apostolic Church" summarizes the Catholic Church's understanding of the role of the Spirit in the community of the baptized; it summarizes the pneumatology implicit in Catholic ecclesiology. The characteristics delineated in the phrase "one, holy, catholic and apostolic" are known as the marks of the Church. The Holy Spirit's function is to endow the community with these qualities and to enable the members of the Church to cooperate with one another in making these essential aspects more fully realized in the community.

The oneness or unity of the Church is a way of asserting that the baptized are united in the Spirit so that they can be one with each other and with Jesus in their common commitment to proclaim God's reign. The Pauline image of Church as the Body of Christ (1 Cor 12:12–31) reminds believers that they are one in Christ because they have been anointed by the one Spirit who is manifested differently according to the various gifts and ministries received (1 Cor 12:1–11). Diversity is not a detriment to unity insofar as the Spirit is its source. The Spirit of God makes people one in Christ, but not at the cost of personal uniqueness with regard to distinct roles in the community. It is particularly important to remember that the unity occasioned by the presence of the Holy Spirit is the unity of the diverse. Thus the Spirit of Jesus is as much the cause of appropriate diversity as the cause of unity. Divisiveness among members of the Catholic Church as well as the division among the various denominations of Christian communities are signs of the lack of the fullness of God's Spirit.

The holiness that characterizes the Church is also the gift of the Spirit. The Church is the temple of God because God's Spirit dwells in it (1 Cor 3:16–17). The sacramental life of the Church celebrates and intensifies the experience of being called to this intimacy with the triune God. The Catholic Church identifies seven paradigmatic moments of Christian life to celebrate sacramentally: Baptism, Confirmation, Eucharist, Reconciliation, Anointing of the Sick, Holy Orders, and Matrimony. Each of the seven is an occasion for experiencing the ongoing presence of the Holy Spirit.

The link between the Catholic celebration of Confirmation and the Holy Spirit is particularly rich in symbolism. Confirmation (originally part of the baptismal initiation rite itself) celebrates the presence of the Spirit and raises the community's consciousness of God's power at work in the lives of the baptized. Confirmation is not, as is sometimes erroneously thought, the first moment of a Christian's experience of the Spirit. If there is a "first" sacramental experience of the Spirit, that moment occurs at Baptism. The baptismal commitment itself, however, is a celebration and confirmation of God's prior presence in the baptized and the Church's means of welcoming that person into the life of the Christian community.

Reflection on the implications of the holiness of the Church is the focus of theological discussion on the mystery of grace. The Christian's participation in the life of God (the grace of holiness) is the effect of the presence of the gift of God who is the Spirit of union. One of the principal themes in the doctrine of grace concerns the manner in which the efficacious grace of God works with the inalienable freedom of the individual person. Efforts to articulate the mystery of the life of faith often stumble on the presumed conflict that must exist between the grace of God and the exercise of human freedom. Although numerous texts have been written to address the dynamic of God's gracious activity in the lives of free persons, all theological speculation eventually must acknowledge that the unity of the divine and the human in the experience of grace is the effect of the gift of the Holy Spirit. The Spirit makes individuals one with God without diminishing God or destroying persons.

The third mark of the Church, catholicity, is perhaps the most easily misunderstood of the four. The term "catholic" does not refer to the Catholic Church in its difference from other Christian churches, but to the wholeness or oneness of the Church. It is a reiteration of the mark of unity but draws attention to the need for the Church to be inclusive—racially, culturally, and sexually. In addition, the catholicity of the Church serves as a reminder that the particularity of this or that local Christian community is not a threat to the universal Church. The Spirit is the divine presence who enables the particular to have universal significance.

The fourth characteristic of the Church, apostolicity, says that the Church is a missionary body called to fidelity to the fundamental mission of Christ, that is, to proclaim the presence of God's reign. Church members share the task of the apostles; they are called and enabled to pass on the faith of the apostolic community and to continue the proclamation of the Good News until the Risen Lord comes in glory. The Holy Spirit is the bond of union not only with the Church of the apostles, but also with the Church of the last days.

SPIRIT OF ALL CHRISTIANS/ECUMENICAL REFLECTIONS

Although there are numerous theological nuances that distinguish the efforts of theology to name the person and work of the Holy Spirit, Christians of all denominations generally understand the Holy Spirit as the personal gift of the Father of Jesus, the gift who enables relationship with God. There are, however, a few significant differences that require some comment.

Catholics and Protestants can be distinguished from the Eastern Orthodox tradition in their inclusion of the phrase "and the Son" in the Nicene Creed to identify the manner in which Western Christian theology has tended to explain the Spirit's procession from the Father. The theological debate around this issue (the Filioque controversy) has been an aspect of the ecumenical efforts of the Eastern Orthodox and the Catholic churches.

Although less sharply defined, Catholic understanding of the doctrine of grace also notably differs from the usual Protestant understanding. In the Catholic tradition great emphasis has been placed on the real change that occurs in graced persons as a result of God's salvific activity on their behalf. The traditional distinction between uncreated grace (God) and created grace (God's effect in the lives of the justified) has sometimes led Catholics to so stress the latter that they appear to reify and quantify grace rather than affirm its fundamental reality, namely, the actual presence of God in persons.

A related matter concerns the question of whether uncreated grace can best be understood as the presence of the Holy Spirit or as the indwelling of the triune God. Is the experience of grace the experience of the Spirit's unique (or proper) work in salvation or is grace only attributed to the Spirit? In other words, does the Spirit function in one's life in a specific manner that communicates the Spirit's unique personal identity in the triune God?

All Christian theology struggles with the desire to say something meaningful about God and God's relationship with humans in Jesus and the Spirit. Sometimes the limits of the language distract searchers from the truth. There are two common affirmations about the Holy Spirit that may easily be misinterpreted.

First, to say that the Spirit is the source of union with God and with one another in Christ is not to say that the Spirit is not also the source of plurality. As noted above, the Spirit unites without destroying or diminishing real difference. The personal distinctiveness of the divine Persons is not denied by their communion; the infinite difference between God and humans is never obliterated; the diversity of gifts within the Christian (and broader human) community is a blessing.

Second, to say that the Spirit is the third Person of the Trinity is not to say that the Spirit is in any sense subordinate to the first and the second divine Persons—unless one is willing to also affirm a similar dependence of the others on the Spirit. Too often Christian theology speaks of God and Jesus and presumes that all has been said. The difficulty in being definitive about the elusive, energizing, and universal presence of God's Spirit is no reason for silence. The silence to which believers are called is the silence of prayerful adoration of the Mystery who envelops their being.

See also Confirmation; Filioque; God; pneumatology; spirituality, Christian; Trinity, doctrine of the.

Bibliography

Congar, Yves M. J. I Believe in the Holy Spirit. 3 vols. Trans. by David Power. New York: Seabury, 1983.
Heron, Adasdair I. C. The Holy Spirit. Philadelphia: Westminister, 1983. BARBARA A. FINAN

holy souls, the just persons in purgatory. The term is a popular designation for those who are still in purgatory being cleansed of the last remains of sin before entering heaven. It is a pious designation often associated with All Souls' Day, November 2. See also purgatory; soul.

Holy Spirit, sin against the. See sin against the Holy Spirit.

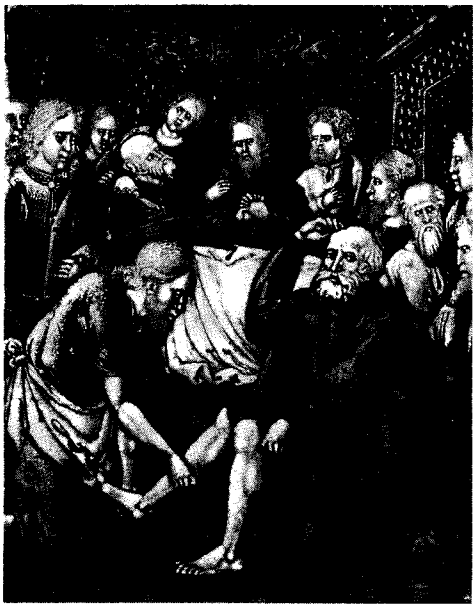
Holy Thursday, the day before Good Friday. Its traditional English name, "Maundy Thursday," comes from a Latin phrase linked to the ceremony of foot washing (Mandatum novum, "a new command"; see John 13:34). Foot washing appeared in the Holy Thursday liturgy at Rome during the thirteenth century. The Holy Thursday services resulted from a complex historical evolution to which three distinct liturgies contributed: the public reconciliation of penitents (no longer used, but attested in seventh-century sources); the blessing of holy oils (the "Chrism Mass," which appears in eighth-century sources and is still celebrated today); and the commemoration of the Last Supper (attested already in the late fourth century). The Missal of Paul VI (1970) restores the evening Mass of the Lord's Supper as the principal liturgy of Holy Thursday, the solemn beginning of the Easter Triduum. During the Chrism Mass (now celebrated earlier in Holy Week) priests renew their commitment to service and celibacy. See also Holy Week.

Christ washing the feet of his disciples on Holy Thursday to set an example of ministry for them (John 13:3-20); sixteenth-century French painted enamel, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York.



holy water, water blessed and used for prayer, both private and liturgical. Recalling the water of Baptism, holy water is placed in fonts and in small containers at entrances to churches. Holy water is sprinkled in blessing of both people and objects. See also font, holy water.

Holy Week, the last week in Lent, immediately preceding Easter. It is marked by solemn liturgical celebration of Christ's Passion. In spite of the elaborate passion chronologies found in the Gospels, Christians of the first three centuries made no attempt to imitate in their liturgies the literal details of Jesus' last days (entry into Jerusalem, the Last Supper, arrest and trial, crucifixion). Each year, instead, they remembered Christ's suffering, death, and Resurrection in a single unified liturgical celebration known as Pascha (Gk., Christian "Passover," or Easter). This yearly paschal observance occurred either, according to Jewish reckoning, on a fixed day of the lunar month (14 Nisan) or on the following Sunday. Eventually, the ancient Jewish date (14 Nisan) was rejected, so that "Christian Passover" (Easter) would always fall on Sunday, the Lord's Day.

Historical Development: During the fourth century, decisive changes occurred in the way Christians celebrated Easter. The earlier, unified celebration of Pascha (preceded by a short period of preparatory fasting) was split into a series of liturgies that imitated or reenacted the events of Jesus' final week. This development occurred, quite naturally, in Jerusalem, where Jesus was believed to have spent that week and where numerous shrines had grown up "on the very sites" where the holy events had happened. A travel diary kept in 383 by a European woman named Egeria during a pilgrimage to Jerusalem provides many details about these Holy Week liturgies. According to Egeria, the ceremonies for Palm Sunday, Holy Thursday, Good Friday, and Holy Saturday were especially noteworthy. On Palm Sunday afternoon, an elaborate procession began outside Jerusalem at the Mount of Olives. The bishop "reenacted" the role of Christ, while children waved palm fronds and the procession wound through the entire city. On Holy Thursday night, after the Eucharist had been celebrated in the afternoon, the events of Jesus' agony were reenacted: the prayer in Gethsemane, the arrest, the appearance before Pilate. Further representational liturgies occured on Good Friday, beginning with veneration of the cross for four hours before noon and followed by a solemn afternoon Liturgy of the Word that concluded with a reading of the Passion according to John. The Easter Vigil—which focused on the celebration of Baptism—began in midafternoon on Holy Saturday, with the final preparation of the adult catechumens. That night, while the catechumens were being baptized, the rest of the faithful kept vigil. Then, when the neophytes were led into church, everyone joined in the celebration of Eucharist.

This shrine-centered pattern of "representational" services soon caught on everywhere, even among communities that could claim no immediate historical connection with the sites where the original events had occurred. By the fifth and sixth centuries, the influential churches of Constantinople and Rome had imported these services, which then spread to other ecclesial communities within their jurisdictions. In the medieval West, the links between the liturgies of Holy Week and their "original times and places" were obscured. In 1956, Pope Pius XII sought to remedy this situation, and further reforms followed at Vatican Council II (1962–65). See also Easter; Easter Vigil; Egeria, Pilgrimage of; Good Friday; Holy Thursday; Palm Sunday.

NATHAN D. MITCHELL

Holy Year, proclaimed by the pope as a propitious time for pilgrimage and other observances by those who wish to grow in holiness of life and to obtain a solemn plenary indulgence. Originally celebrated every one hundred years, as was its precursor in Judaic tradition, the Jubilee year, the Holy Year gradually came to be observed every twenty-five years unless special occasions warranted additional celebrations. An ordinary Holy Year now begins the evening of December 24 with the opening of the Holy Door at St. Peter's in Rome and the doors of three other basilicas that were traditional cites for pilgrimage: St. Paul's Outside the Walls, St. John Lateran, and St. Mary Major. Local ordinaries now designate cites for pilgrimage outside Rome and dispense those observing the jubilee from conditions, decreed by papal proclamation, which they are unable to fulfill. The focus of Holy Years in recent times has been upon the celebration of God's forgiveness and mercy. See also indulgences.

homily, formerly called a "sermon." Vatican II's Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy gives pride of place to the liturgical homily, esteemed as a part of the liturgy itself (n. 52). The content of the homily may be drawn from the Scriptures or the liturgical texts of the day, taking into account the mystery celebrated and the needs of the hearers. The homily is directed toward entering more deeply into mystery so that the assembly, nourished for Christian living, is formed for witness in the world.

Homobonus, St. (Lat., "good man"), d. 1197, patron saint of tailors and clothworkers. Italian-born merchant known for his charity and concern for the poor. He was one of the few lay saints canonized in the Middle Ages who was neither a martyr nor a king. Feast day: November 13.

homoousios (Gk., "the same substance," "consubstantial"), a term meaning that Christ is equal in status with the Father and, thus, is truly God, used at the Council of Nicaea (325) to define the proper understanding of the divinity of Christ. A nonbiblical term, homoousios had been used in controversial and even heretical ways previous to 325. Nevertheless, the Council of Nicaea used homoousios against the Arians, who denied that the Son was equal in status to the Father. Opponents of the council later said that Christ was homoiousios, that is, "similar in substance" to the Father. See also Arianism; Nicaea, First Council of.

homosexuality, sexual attraction to persons of the same gender. There is no scientific agreement about the exact percentage of the human population who are homosexual in orientation. Estimates suggest that 5 to 10 percent of the population are gay (male homosexual) or lesbian (female homosexual). Similarly, there is no agreement as to the source or cause of homosexuality. Recent studies suggest that its origin may be genetic in nature. Other studies have focused on psychological or environmental causes. It is generally agreed that homosexuality is not a condition that is freely chosen. (Homosexual activity that occurs in isolated settings, such as prison, and is transitory in nature, should not be equated with true homosexuality.) While the Christian tradition has rejected homosexual activity as immoral, it is only in recent years that science and Church teaching have accepted the distinction between a homosexual orientation and overt homosexual activity. Though there is some debate as to how to describe the moral significance of a homosexual orientation, it is clear that a gay or lesbian person has the same human dignity as a heterosexual person. There is no moral guilt associated with being homosexual.

The reason homosexual activity is objectively immoral is that it lacks the finality that is proper to human sexuality. Traditionally Catholic teaching has grounded its understanding of human sexuality in the Genesis vision of man and woman coming together to be "as one body." In other words, heterosexual genital expression is normative. And while homosexual activity could be an expression of a certain type of love, it excludes the possibility of transmitting life. In recent years the pastoral application of this teaching has been marked by a greater sensitivity to the individual homosexual and by a less judgmental and censorious approach. An individual's subjective culpability is judged with prudence, while the objective norm is maintained.

As in other areas of moral discourse, there are some who disagree with this teaching. Some argue that homosexuality is another way of being human; therefore, homosexual activity is natural and good. Another position affirms that heterosexual relationships are the normative ideal. In the love of man and woman human sexuality finds its fulfillment. This ideal is not possible for all persons. For that reason homosexual activity can be accepted as a lesser evil. While morally permissible, it would be lacking in fullness. A third position would reject heterosexuality as normative and would evaluate homosexual activity in the same manner as it would heterosexual activity, by using relational criteria. If these criteria are met, then such activity would be morally acceptable. On several occasions the Church's hierarchical magisterium has rejected all three of these positions and reaffirmed previous teaching. At the same time it has called on the pastors of the Church to provide effective pastoral care for those who are homosexual. See also sexual morality.

MICHAEL D. PLACE

Honorary Prelate of His Holiness, until 1968 known as Domestic Prelate, a title of honor given to a priest by the pope to recognize his distinguished service to the Church or because of an important office he holds, such as vicar general. He has the title of Monsignor or Reverend Monsignor. He belongs to the pontifical family and the pontifical chapel group. For ceremonial purposes he wears a purple cassock and purple silk sash with fringes, unpleated surplice, black biretta with black tuft; on solemn but nonliturgical occasions, he wears a black cassock with red piping and other ornaments, purple sash and fringes of silk at both ends of the sash. The honor and its customs have largely fallen out of favor since the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). See also monsignor.

Honorius I, d. 638, pope from 625 to 638. Born in Campagna, son of the consul Petronius, he was an able pastor and administrator but is most remembered for his role in the Monothelite controversy, which debated whether there was one will or two in Christ. Replying (634) to Sergius, patriarch of Constantinople, Honorius injudiciously referred to "one will" in Christ; in a second letter, he rejected the formula "two wills" although strongly defending the Council of Chalcedon's (451) doctrine of two natures. For this he was condemned at Constantinople III (680–81), a condemnation affirmed by Pope Leo II. He has come to serve as one of the principal arguments against papal infallibility, although his teaching was clearly orthodox in intent and used language condemned only subsequently. Furthermore, he was not teaching in a solemn or definitive manner for the universal Church. See also Constantinople, councils of; Monothelitism.

Honorius III [Cencio Savelli], d. 1227, pope from 1216 to 1227. Old and frail when elected pope, he was determined to continue the reform program of his predecessor, Innocent III, and supported evangelical missions in Spain and the Baltics. He approved the Dominican, Franciscan, and Carmelite rules and mobilized the friars for preaching and Church reform. An accomplished administrator, Honorius added to the corpus of canon law and reorganized papal finances. He was perhaps too trusting of his former pupil Frederick II and crowned him emperor despite his unfulfilled promises to go on crusade.

Honorius Augustodunensis, or Honorius of Autun, ca. 1080/90–ca. 1156, theologian. A prolific writer, he wrote a handbook on Christian doctrine, an interpretation of the liturgy, and a work on cosmology and geography. He taught that the cause of the Incarnation was the predestination of humanity to deification, not the Fall. See also predestination.

hope, one of the three theological virtues that direct the human person toward union with God. In traditional Catholic theology, hope is identified as one of the virtues, together with faith and charity, by which the human person is oriented toward personal union with God in the Beatific Vision. It cannot be acquired by human efforts, but like the other theological virtues, must be bestowed directly by God. Specifically, hope is the enduring orientation of the human will toward final union with God, considered as a goal that can be attained with God's help, but without divine help impossible to attain. Hope was traditionally said to presuppose faith, since it is impossible to hope for the attainment of a goal unless one is aware of its existence and believes in it as a real possibility. At the same time, hope was said to be both prior to, and less perfect than, charity (the love of God for God's own sake) apart from whatever benefits God bestows on us. The theological virtue of hope was contrasted with two opposing vices, despair and presumption; despair leads the individual to conclude that one cannot attain salvation, even with God's help, or else to assume that God will not offer help, whereas presumption leads the individual to believe that one is sure of salvation, or can attain it readily through one's own efforts.

Developments in contemporary theology have called the presuppositions of this conception of hope into question at a number of points. Nonetheless, almost all Catholic moral theologians would agree that an attitude of hopefulness in God, or at least in some form of goodness that transcends the individual, is an integral component of a good human life. See also faith; theological virtues.

JEAN PORTER

Hopkins, Gerard Manley, 1844–89, English Jesuit priest and poet. Hopkins studied with Walter Pater at Oxford and was converted from Anglicanism to Catholicism by John Henry Newman in 1866. Ordained in 1877, he served as parish priest in Liverpool and later as professor of classics at University College, Dublin. He had forsworn poetry and burned his early verse upon entering the novitiate, but in 1875 he resumed with "The Wreck of the Deutschland," pondering God's role in the drowning death of five Franciscan nuns. Hopkins was characteristically influenced by Ignatian spirituality and Duns Scotus (d. 1308). His work stresses the Incarnation and its implications for the Mystical Body, individuality, the grandeur of creation, and Ignatian imagery; late poems ponder the dark night of the soul. His poetry contains innovative rhythms but remained unpublished until 1918.

Hormisdas, St., d. 523, pope from 514 to 523. He ended the thirty-five-year-old Acacian Schism in 519. His formula for union, the Libellus Hormisdae, signed by the patriarch of Constantinople (John II) and approximately 250 Eastern bishops, reaffirmed the teachings of the Chalcedonian formula and of Leo's Tome and condemned Acacius. Feast day: August 6. See also Acacianism.

Horologion (haw-roh-loh'gee-ahn; Gk., "timepiece," "Book of Hours"), Byzantine-rite Book of Hours. Unlike the Western breviary, an anthology with all the elements needed for the Divine Office, the Horologion contains only the "ordinary" or invariable parts of the Byzantine Divine Office, the celebration of which requires the employment of other liturgical books such as the Psalter and the propers of the temporal cycle (Oktoichos) and of the fixed (Menaion) and movable (Triodion, Pentecostarion) feasts. The native Office of Constantinople had no separate Book of Hours, and the Horologion derives from the Sabaitic Office of Jerusalem, of which there are manuscripts extant from the ninth century. The present Byzantine Horologion contains a composite office formed from the fusion of the old Palestinian monastic Horologion with the prayers and litanies of the Constantinopolitan Office in the Euchologion or Sacramentary of that church. The synthesis, a central process in the formation of the Byzantine rite, began in the Studite monasteries of Constantinople at the end of the ninth century, but was not completed until the fourteenth century. See also Liturgy of the Hours.

Hosanna (hoh-zahn'uh; Heb., "May God save"), word that concludes the final portion of the Sanctus ("Holy, holy, holy") during the Eucharistic Prayer. First found in Psalms (see Ps 118:25–26), "Hosanna" is said to have been a word with which the crowd acclaimed Christ's last entry into Jerusalem (Matt 21:9, Mark 11:9, John 12:13). Hosanna entered Christian liturgical use from at least the second century (see Didache 10:6).

Hosius, Stanislaus, 1504–79, cardinal and leader of the Polish Counter-Reformation. First as bishop of Culm (1549) and then as bishop of Ermland (1551), Hosius had great success in suppressing Polish Protestantism. His Confessio Fidei Catholicae became the standard of orthodoxy; thirty-two editions were published during his lifetime. See also Counter-Reformation/Catholic Reformation.

hospice movement, the development of physical and emotional resources for the compassionate care of the terminally ill and their families. The modern movement began in 1967 when Dame Cicely Saunders opened St. Christopher's Hospice, London. Earlier precedents took place in the nineteenth century at Saint Mary's Hospital, Dublin, and in 1905 when the Sisters of Charity inaugurated St. James Hospice, London. The first hospice in the United States opened in 1974 at New Haven, Connecticut. In two decades the North American Hospice movement has grown rapidly with nearly two thousand hospices serving almost a third of a million patients in the United States. In the Middle Ages hospices were small institutions that served the ill, the elderly, and travelers. Some modern hospices provide care in the home while others serve patients and their families in residential centers. Hospice is a celebration of life in the face of death offering medicinal, emotional, and spiritual support for the terminally ill and their families. See also death and dying.

hospitality, minister of, one charged with overseeing and enhancing the Church's ministry of hospitality. Greeters, ushers, parish administrators, musicians, deacons, pastors, and presiders, are all, in some sense, ministers of hospitality. Their respective roles include ensuring, at every gathering of the church, that no one is hindered from worshiping God because of external obstacles. The ministry of hospitality is a biblical value, originating in the ancient Semitic ethic of "welcoming the stranger." It continued in monastic communities, which were, by rule, required to maintain lodgings for guests, travelers, and pilgrims. In many contemporary Christian communities, the ministry of hospitality is interpreted in broad and inclusive terms by maintaining facilities that are accessible to the physically disabled, by interpreting printed materials for the sightless and spoken portions of the liturgy for the hearing-impaired, and by providing food for the hungry and clothes and housing for the poor.

Hospitallers, or Knights of St. John, a military order of crusading monks. Originating around 1070 in Jerusalem for the management and defense of a hospital for Christian pilgrims, they received papal recognition in 1113 as a separate order. Along with the Knights Templar, Hospitallers formed the army of the Crusader states, at the same time continuing to build hospitals and serve the sick and wounded. After the fall of Acre in 1291, the Hospitallers transformed themselves into a powerful navy based at Rhodes and then Malta that fought pirates and Turks in the Mediterranean. Present Knights continue to supervise hospitals. See also Crusades; Knights Templar.

host, the eucharistic bread. The term derives from the Latin hostia, "victim," thus recalling Christ as the Paschal Lamb sacrificed for all. Hostia was used as one of several names for the eucharistic bread in the Middle Ages and remains untranslated in most languages today. See also Communion, Holy.

Hours [Canonical], the obligatory times of daily liturgical prayer, also known as the Liturgy of the Hours. According to ancient tradition, there were seven Canonical Hours: Matins and Lauds, Prime, Terce, Sext, None, Vespers, and Compline. In 1971, following Vatican Council II, the number of hours was reduced and their contents simplified. See also breviary; Liturgy of the Hours.

house church, the gathering of Christians in NT times for worship in a fellow member's house (Acts 2:46; 12:12; Rom 16:5; 1 Cor 16:19; Col 4:15). There may have been a connection between the role of householder and that of presbyter (Titus 1:6; 1 Tim 3:4). Since some of the houses were owned by women (1 Cor 1:11; Acts 12:12), questions arise regarding the ministerial role of women in the NT.

Howard, St. Philip, 1557–95, Earl of Arundel, one of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales canonized in 1970. Under the inspiration of Edmund Campion, he began in mid-life to take his Catholicism more seriously. Arrested for his beliefs and condemned to death as a traitor in 1589, he died in prison in 1595. Feast day: October 19. See also Forty Martyrs of England and Wales.

Hrosvit (rohz-veet'), ca. 935–1001/3, poet and nun. She was well read in Scripture, the Church Fathers, and Latin poetry, Christian and classical, especially Terence, on whose style she modeled her own plays. The first Christian dramatist to follow classical forms, she invented the form of plays in rhymed prose.

Hubert, St., d. 727, patron saint of hunters. He turned to religious life after his wife died, and he became a priest in Maastricht and a bishop of Liège. It is alleged that he did so because, while hunting one day, he had a vision of a crucifix between the horns of a stag. Feast day: November 3.

Hügel, Friedrich von, 1852–1925, baron, biblical critic, theologian, and philosopher. Born in Italy of an Austrian diplomat and a Scottish aristocrat, he was educated privately in several European cities, settling in England in 1867. Of frail health and deaf, he traveled widely throughout his life, becoming the friend of many distinguished religious thinkers, Catholic (e.g., Maurice Blondel) and Protestant (e.g., Ernst Troeltsch). In 1905, he founded the London Society for the Study of Religion. He championed the need for the Church to come to terms with critical biblical and historical scholarship and with modern science; he was himself a noted biblical exegete. He was closely associated with most of the principal "Modernists," including Alfred Loisy and George Tyrrell, but escaped condemnation because of his lay status and prominent social position. Esteemed for his character and as a spiritual director, he was an influential figure in English religious life. His principal works are The Mystical Element of Religion (2 vols., 1908), Essays and Addresses on the Philosophy of Religion (first series: 1921; second series: 1926), and The Reality of God (his undelivered Gifford Lectures, 1931). See also Modernism.

Hugh of Cluny, St., also Hugh of Semur, 1024–1109, abbot. Son of the Count of Semur and Arenberge, Hugh entered the monastery of Cluny in 1038 and became abbot in 1049. Active in ecclesiastical affairs, Hugh also began construction of a new abbey church at Cluny and founded the first convent of Cluniac nuns. Feast day: April 29. See also Cluny.

Hugh of Lincoln, St., ca. 1140–1200, Carthusian and bishop of Lincoln. At the request of King Henry II, he established the first Carthusian house in England. A defender of Church liberties, he also was known for his charity. His tomb became an important pilgrimage site. Feast day: November 17.

Hugh of St. Victor, ca. 1090–1141, theologian, biblical exegete, and founder of the Victorine tradition of thought and spirituality, which influenced such later Scholastics as Peter Lombard and Bonaventure. Hugh brought the ascetic, contemplative life of the monastery together with the new dialectical discoveries in the schools. In his writings he provided a program for theological studies based on Scripture. Didascalicon: On the Love of Reading, following the De Doctrina Christiana (On Christian Doctrine) of Augustine, provided a guide to the use of philosophy and liberal and practical arts as preparation for reading the Bible. Books 4–6 introduce Hugh's exegetical theory. History, allegory, and tropology are three successive disciplines of study as well as senses of Scripture. Each has distinct methods and a specific order for reading the appropriate books of Scripture. History is the foundation, not only as literal sense of Scripture but also as the historical narrative of the divine interaction with humanity. Hugh's program for reading Scripture is expanded in On the Sacraments of the Christian Faith, which was among the first major comprehensive statements of theology in the Middle Ages. Structured according to a historical framework, it records the works of creation in six days and the works of restoration commencing with the Incarnation. Therefore, Hugh's sacramental theology, understanding "sacrament" in a broad sense as a "visible sign of invisible grace," develops within a biblical narrative framework. Complementing his dialectical works are the works about mystical contemplation such as On the Ark of Noah and The Contemplation of the Soul; Hugh based these works on his study of the Celestial Hierarchies of Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite, on which he also commented. See also sacrament; Scripture, interpretation of; Scripture, senses of; Victorines. MICHAEL A. SIGNER

Hughes, John Joseph, 1779–1864, archbishop of New York. Born in Ireland, Hughes emigrated to the United States in 1817. After ordination to the priesthood in 1826 he served as pastor in Philadelphia and earned a reputation as a forceful apologist for Catholicism. He was named coadjutor-bishop to John Dubois of New York in 1838. In 1842 he succeeded Dubois as bishop of New York and was named its archbishop in 1850. Hughes gained a national reputation as a fighter for the rights of immigrant Catholics. He was a strong advocate of Catholic schools. An autocratic prelate, he opposed the lay trustee system and promoted the clerical control of the Church. His most visible legacy is St. Patrick's Cathedral, whose construction began under Hughes in 1858. See also Saint Patrick's Cathedral; trusteeism, lay.

Hughes, Philip, 1895–1967, Church historian. Born in Manchester, England, he was educated at Ushaw College and the University of Louvain. After his ordination for Salford (Manchester) in 1920 and a period of research in the Vatican Archives, he served as parish priest in his diocese and then as archivist of Westminster Cathedral (London). He emigrated to the United States in 1955 to become professor of history at the University of Notre Dame. The most celebrated of his many historical works is The Reformation in England (1950–54), and he is known to a wider public through his A Popular History of the Catholic Church (1947).

Huguenots (hyoo' geh-nots), a term for French Protestants, perhaps derived from Eidgenossen (Ger., "confederates, conspirators"), which in French-speaking Geneva became eiguenotz. The term was in common use after the conspiracy of Amboise (1560) in which Protestant nobles sought to kidnap the French king Francis II. The Edict of Nantes (1598) gave them freedom of worship, but this was revoked under Louis XIV (1685). Final legal recognition came only in the nineteenth century.

human act. See acts, human.

Humanae Vitae (hoo-mahn'ay vee'tay; Lat., "Of human life), the 1968 encyclical of Pope Paul VI that reaffirmed the condemnation of artificial contraception for Catholics. The first part mentions new aspects of the question and reaffirms the competency of the Church and its hierarchical magisterium to teach on these matters. The pope infers that a majority of the papally appointed commission to study contraception came out in favor of a change in Catholic teaching, but after prayer and discussion the pope now gives his reply. The second part recognizes the importance of conjugal love and calls for responsible parenthood but condemns artificial contraception. Natural law shows the inseparable connection, willed by God and unable to be broken by human beings on their own initiative, between the unitive and the procreative meaning of the sexual act. The rhythm method, or natural family planning, is acceptable because it makes legitimate use of a natural disposition and does not impede the development of natural processes. The pope also mentions some grave consequences of artificial birth control. The third part gives practical directives recognizing that the teaching is somewhat difficult and requires encouragement and effort by individuals, families, and society at large. Pope Paul VI referred to the "lively discussion" sparked by his encyclical; others have called it a crisis for the Church. In any case, Paul VI was so distressed by the negative reaction that he issued no more encyclicals during the remainder of his pontificate, which ended with his death some ten years later. See also birth control.

human dignity, the idea that the human person has an intrinsic worth. In Catholic teaching, this idea is grounded in the claim that all persons are created in the image of God. A person's dignity, therefore, transcends any social order. Such dignity forms the basis of the claim that persons have inherent rights that society cannot grant and must not violate. Because the person is both a political and an economic being, human dignity grounds both political rights—for instance, the freedom of speech—and economic rights—for example, the right to a living wage. The insistence on human dignity as the foundation of Catholic social teaching is especially strong in the writings of Pope John Paul II, beginning with his first encyclical, Redemptor Hominis (1979). See also Catholic social teachings.

Humani Generis (hoo-mah'nee jayn'-air-uhs; Lat., "Of the human race"), an encyclical issued by Pope Pius XII in 1950. It attempted to halt new theological and pastoral trends (particularly among French theologians writing on nature and grace, original sin, ecumenism, and liturgical renewal), to show errors in contemporary philosophy and science (existentialism, historicism, evolutionism), and again to propose Thomism as the true Christian philosophy. Although some of its concerns were valid, the encyclical too readily condemned approaches that proved to be important preparations for Vatican II (1962–65), where they found some measure of vindication. The encyclical is also important for the claims it made in behalf of the teaching authority of papal encyclicals. It asserted that when a pope carefully pronounces on a controverted theological subject, it "can no longer be regarded as a matter of free debate among theologians." This statement later was included in the first draft of the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church at Vatican II and was rejected. See also encyclical; supernatural.

humanism, Catholic, sixteenth-century movement, largely inspired by Erasmus of Rotterdam (ca. 1469–1536), to utilize the results of humanistic scholarship in philology and text criticism as an instrument of Church reform. The work of these humanists concentrated on biblical studies, patristic scholarship, and ethical studies as a counterforce to what they saw as the decadence of Scholastic learning. Catholic humanists (and those connected with the Reform; Calvin was a trained humanist) had an enormous influence both on the Catholic reform of the sixteenth century and on those connected with the Reformation (e.g., the production of the King James Bible would not have been possible without the efforts of the humanists).

In the modern period there was an attempt to fuse human learning and revelation into a Christian humanism that would paint a broad picture of human existence and destiny. This effort was an attempt to rethink nontheistic views of humanism reflected in the work of such thinkers as Jean-Paul Sartre. Such works as Louis Bouyer's Christian Humanism (1959) and the earlier work of Jacques Maritain's True Humanism (1938) are representative. The sort of "cosmic" humanism of Teilhard de Chardin (d. 1955) has had a limited but persistent appeal. The thought and teachings of Pope John Paul II, elected to the papacy in 1978, have been characterized by a view of humanism derived from a blend of philosophical personalism and Thomism.

The somewhat cautious use of "humanism" in the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (Gaudium et Spes, 1965) at Vatican II reflects the cooption of the word by "secular" humanists and by Marxists (n. 7). Vatican II, however, did want to enter into dialogue with those currents of thought (n. 55). See also Erasmus, Desiderius; humanism, secular. LAWRENCE CUNNINGHAM humanism, secular, modern philosophical world-view marked by some or all of the following characteristics: ethical relativism, denial of the transcendent, evolutionary view of humankind, cultural pluralism, optimistic view of human nature, and emphasis on the post-Enlightenment virtues of rationality, equality, and freedom.

Critics argue that such a philosophy is an ersatz religious ideology that governs much of the thinking of our intellectual elites to the detriment of more traditional views, especially those expressed in Judaism and Christianity. See also humanism, Catholic.

human nature, the comprehensive term for the characteristic principles, properties, and ends that in their totality define the human being. Catholic thought has traditionally relied upon Sacred Scripture and human experience as explored in the theological and philosophical traditions of Western Civilization as the primary sources for reflection on human nature. At the heart of this reflection is the conviction that human nature can be fully understood only in the revelation of divine grace. Human nature, as chosen and created by God, is fundamentally ordered toward God as its final end and highest good.

However, human nature is also wounded nature; it bears the marks of sin, understood as both the absence and rejection of God's grace. The rejection of God's grace obscures both the signs and the knowledge of our relationship with God. The capacity for either accepting or spurning God's gracious gift of self manifests a freedom of choice, as does the capacity for moral deliberation and responsibility in the face of both God and neighbor.

Human nature may also be comprehended in terms of a range of inclinations or desires, some of which are shared by other animals (e.g., for food and procreation). Human nature is distinguished, however, by the person's possession of both intelligence (the capacity to know the truth), and love, which unifies and perfects desire in our movement toward God and neighbor. Human nature is, finally, social. The variety of goods that perfect it, preeminently justice and friendship, are achievable only within participation in the life of a community. See also nature; nature and grace. PAUL J. WOJDA human rights, claims that persons have on society simply on the basis of their being human. The force of the idea of human rights is that no social institution can, with legitimacy, fail to recognize and respect those rights. In Catholic teaching, such rights are grounded philosophically in the concept of the dignity of the human person. All persons have an inherent dignity that transcends social structures. This idea of human dignity is further backed by the theological doctrine of imago Dei (Lat.): all persons are born in the image of God. It is this theological grounding that gives force to the claim that persons have transcendent worth.

The idea of human dignity grounded in the imago Dei doctrine supports both civil rights and economic rights. Civil rights are those rights that make up the core of the liberal democratic state, for instance, freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, and the right to a fair trial. These are often termed "negative rights" because they constitute protections against infringement on individual freedom. Economic rights are often termed "positive rights" because they require constructive action, and not mere protection, on the part of the state. Included are the rights to employment, a just wage, housing, and other basic material needs. According to Catholic teaching, human dignity requires both protection from an overextended state and the support of governmental institutions. The principle of subsidiarity (that nothing should be done by a higher agency that can be done as well, if not better, by a lower agency) regulates when the state is intruding and when it is providing necessary support for persons.

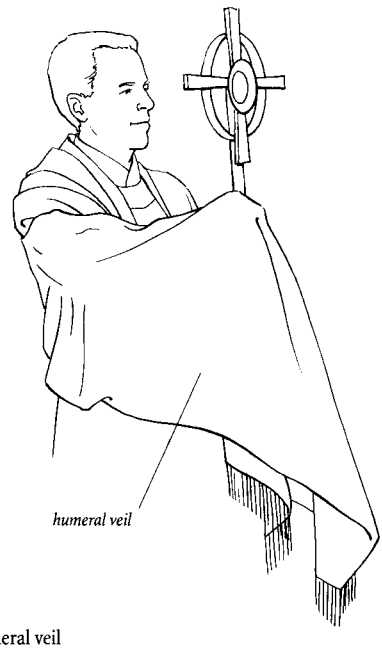
Under criticism that the idea of human dignity grounded in the imago Dei doctrine stressed the individual at the expense of the community, recent U.S. Catholic documents have offered the more inclusive idea that human rights are the "minimum conditions for life in community" (U.S. bishops' pastoral letter, "Economic Justice for All," 1986, nn. 79–84). See also Catholic social teachings.

TODD D. WHITMORE

Humbert of Silva Candida, ca. 1000–1061, cardinal and reformer. As a representative of the pope, he formally excommunicated Patriarch Keroularious (Cerularius) in Constantinople in 1054, an act which many regard as the beginning of the split between East and West. He also drafted the oath on the Eucharist that Berengar of Tours was required to swear in 1059. His several treatises against simony proved influential in the investiture controversy. See also Berengar of Tours; Great Schism; investiture controversy; simony.

humeral veil, a rectangular silk or brocade shawl worn around the shoulders and used to cover the hands. Its liturgical use was confined to the Solemn High Mass in which the subdeacon held the paten with it from the offertory to the Lord's Prayer. In eucharistic processions and devotions, it is used for holding the sacramental container, e.g., ciborium, monstrance.



Humeral veil

Humiliati (hoo-mil-ee-ah'tee; Lat., humiliatus, "humbled"), twelfth-century lay movement that promoted poverty as a way of life in imitation of Christ, as well as service to the poor. Having grown rich and lax itself, it was suppressed in 1571 after one of its members assaulted Charles Borromeo, who was trying to reform the group.

humility (Lat., humus, "earth," humilis, "low"), the Christian virtue that may be popularly defined as knowing one's place and taking it. Considered a moral virtue by Thomas Aquinas, humility avoids inflation of one's worth or talents on the one hand, and avoids excessive devaluation of oneself on the other. Humility requires a dispassionate and honest appreciation of the self in relationship to others and to God. In effect, humble people recognize the limitations as well as the possibilities of the lives God has given them and they are willing to work within these personal parameters in order to be the unique creatures God has created them to be. In this, they praise God and demonstrate obedience to the divine will. Arrogance and false pride are the opposites of humility. The finest examples of humility are Jesus and Mary. Jesus did not consider his divinity something to grasp at. Instead, he "emptied himself and took the form of a slave" (Phil 2:6–8). Mary, the Mother of God, displayed humility when, at the Annunciation, she proclaimed that she was God's servant, and, even though she could not understand the angel's message, she joyfully accepted God's will (Luke 1:34–38).

Hungarian Byzantine Catholic Church, Catholics in Hungary who adhere to the Byzantine liturgical, canonical, theological, and spiritual tradition.

Most of these Catholics are not ethnic Hungarians but are descended from the many Byzantine Christians of other nationalities who settled in Hungary over the centuries and eventually became Hungarian-speaking. Nevertheless, many maintain that there is at least a partial link between this community and the significant Byzantine Church that existed in Hungary in the Middle Ages. Indeed, there were several Byzantine monasteries in Hungary in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, but all of them were destroyed during the thirteenth-century Tatar invasions.

It was in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, due to the widespread population shifts caused by the Turkish invasions, that communities of Byzantine Serbs, Ruthenians, Slovaks, and Greeks moved into the area. Most of them eventually became Catholics but retained their Byzantine heritage. In the eighteenth century a number of Hungarian Protestants became Catholic and chose the Byzantine rite, again adding to the number of Byzantine Catholics in the country. They were placed under the jurisdiction of non-Hungarian Byzantine bishops.

Because a significant community of Byzantine Catholics otherwise entirely integrated into Hungarian society now existed, the question of the use of Hungarian in the liturgy became pressing. But such a proposal was resisted by Church authorities. For this reason, the first Hungarian translation of the liturgy of John Chrysostom had to be published privately in 1795. Through the nineteenth century several other liturgical books were published in Hungarian, still without the approval of the ecclesiastical authorities.

In 1900 a large group of Hungarian Byzantine Catholic pilgrims in Rome presented Pope Leo XIII with a petition requesting that a separate Byzantine diocese be established in the country with the right to use Hungarian in the liturgy. Finally, in 1912 Pope Pius X erected the diocese of Hajdúdorog for Hungarian Byzantine Catholics. But he made Greek the obligatory liturgical language and gave the priests three years to learn it. World War I intervened, however, and the requirement to use Greek was never enforced. The use of Hungarian gained ground and gradually by the 1930s all the main liturgical texts had been translated.

In 1923 an apostolic exarchate was set up at Miskolc for twenty-one Ruthenian parishes formerly in the diocese of Presov that remained in Hungarian territory after Czechoslovakia was created. They were provided with a distinct identity because they used Slavonic in the liturgy. By the 1940s, however, they had all begun to use Hungarian, and consequently the apostolic exarchate since that time has been administered by the bishop of Hajdúdorog.

Originally, the diocese of Hajdúdorog included only areas of the country in which Byzantine Catholics were concentrated. But in 1968 its jurisdiction was extended to include all Byzantine Catholics in Hungary, who now number about 250,000. There is a seminary at Nyiregyháza.

The rather small number of Byzantine Hungarians who emigrated to North America have a few parishes. They are included in the Ruthenian dioceses in the United States and in the Ukrainian dioceses in Canada. See also Byzantine rite; Eastern churches; Eastern rites. RONALD G. ROBERSON

Hungary, Catholicism in. The Christian faith was accepted by the Magyars in what is now Hungary at the end of the tenth century, and it was institutionalized by St. Stephen I (d. 1038), who promoted the formation of dioceses. Throughout the Middle Ages, Church and state were closely connected as the archbishops of Esztergom crowned the kings, who, in turn, had the authority to name bishops, create dioceses, and control Church property. During this time, the Franciscans and Dominicans had a strong influence on Church life, and Elizabeth of Hungary and Thuringia (1207–31) gained recognition for her work with the poor and the sick. In the sixteenth century the Jesuits played a key role in the Catholic restoration. In the 1700s the domination of the Church by Maria Theresa and Joseph II (Josephinism) created tensions between the Church and the state that existed into the twentieth century. After the Second World War, the Church suffered under Communist rule. Catholic organizations were disbanded beginning in 1946, and on December 26, 1948, Cardinal József Mindszenty (1892–1975) was arrested and eventually sentenced to life imprisonment. (During the uprising of 1956, Mindszenty moved to the U.S. embassy, where he remained until September 1971, when he was allowed to leave Hungary. He died in Vienna four years later.) In 1950 the government suppressed the religious orders, imprisoning approximately ten thousand brothers, priests, and sisters, and it authorized a national "Progressive Catholic" church. The government's opposition to the Vatican's appointment of bishops was formally resolved in 1964 in an agreement with the Holy See. Sharp tensions between the state and the Church continued until a new accord was signed on February 9, 1990. The Catholic Church has three archdioceses and eight dioceses in Hungary. It is estimated as of 1993, that Catholics constitute more than 60 percent of the nation's almost 11 million people. See also Mindszenty, József. ROBERT A. KRIEG

Hus, John, ca. 1369–1415, Czech priest, theologian, preacher, and rector of the University of Prague (1409). Influenced by John Wycliffe's ideas about Church reform, Hus led the reform movement that ultimately expelled German influence from the University of Prague. Hus (and his followers) rejected transubstantiation, demanded Communion in both kinds, and claimed that reprobate priests (including popes) forfeited their authority within the Church. Excommunicated in 1410, Hus was summoned to the Council of Constance (1414) where, despite an imperial guarantee of safe conduct, he was arrested and burned as a heretic (July 6, 1415). His execution helped ignite a revolution against the medieval Church in Bohemia. See also Communion under both kinds; transubstantiation.

Huvelin, Henri, 1838–1910, French pastor and acclaimed spiritual director. Among his penitents were Charles de Foucauld and Friedrich von Hügel. This saintly, learned priest influenced many. See also Foucauld, Charles de; Hügel, Friedrich von.

Hyacinth, St., 1185–1257, Dominican missionary to the Slavs and patron saint of Poland. Born into a noble family, Hyacinth became a Dominican about 1220. Though the details of his life are unknown, he is remembered for his extensive missionary work from Poland to possibly as far east as Tibet. Feast day: August 17. See also Poland, Catholicism in.

hylomorphism (Gk., hule, "matter"; morphe, "form"), an Aristotelian philosophical theory regarding all material being made up of two coprinciples: prime matter (the principle of indetermination) and substantial form (the principle of determination). Catholic theology, from the thirteenth century, utilized this theory to explain the constitution of human beings as a composite of body (matter) and soul (form). Theology has also applied the theory to the sacraments: Each sacrament is constituted by a basic element, the "matter" (e.g., water for Baptism, bread and wine for the Eucharist) and a clarifying word, the "form" (e.g., "I baptize you...;" "This is my Body..."). See also sacrament.

hymnal, the liturgical book containing hymns and other music for worship. Hymnals contain psalms (strophic or nonstrophic), versified nonbiblical texts with tunes (hymns), musical settings of liturgical acclamations, or other liturgical texts accompanied by music for various rites and ceremonies of the Church.

hymns (Gk., hymnos, "song in praise of gods or heroes"), nonbiblical religious texts set to music. Used both in the liturgy (Mass and Divine Office) and in popular devotions, sacred songs have a long history in the Catholic tradition. Their general use dates back at least to the fourth century. Some of the most famous theologians of the Church (Thomas Aquinas, d. 1274; John Henry Newman, d. 1890) have contributed to the hymnic tradition. See also liturgical music.

Hypapante (hee-puh-pahn-tee'; Gk., "meeting"), Byzantine feast of the Meeting of Our Lord, celebrated on February 2; one of the Twelve Great Feasts of the Byzantine rite. Hypapante corresponds to the Western feast of the Presentation, and though the Byzantine Church lists it as a festivity of Mary, it celebrates the meeting of Jesus with God's people represented by Simeon and Anna in Luke 2:22–38. A Presentation feast is first seen in Jerusalem, ca. 384, on February 14, the fortieth day after Epiphany (January 6), which was the original Nativity feast in the East. The Hypapante feast gradually spread to other Eastern churches, and with the Eastern adoption of Western Christmas on December 25, its celebration was moved to February 2. Emperor Justinian I (527–65) decreed its celebration throughout the empire. See also Presentation.

hyperdulia (Gk., huper, "more than,"; dulia, "service"), the special honor Catholics render to the Blessed Virgin Mary. It is distinguished from latria (Gk.), which is the worship that Christians render to God alone, and dulia, which is the honor given to the saints. Mary is uniquely honored because of her role as the Mother of God. See also dulia; latria.

hypostasis (Gk., hypo, "under"; stasis, "standing"; hence "substructure," "substance"), the objective essence of something, according to Aristotle and the Neoplatonists. The term functions in this way in the NT (e.g., "the exact imprint of God's very being," Heb 1:3). Elsewhere the word was also used for "confidence" or "assurance" (Heb 3:14; 11:1; 2 Cor 11:17).

In the theological discussions of the third and fourth centuries hypostasis was used at times in distinction from ousia, "being," in order to speak of the three hypostaseis ("persons") of God in one being. This language was accepted by the Church at the Council of Nicaea (325). In the Christological discussions of the fourth and fifth centuries the term had a variety of meanings until Pope Leo the Great distinguished between Christ's hypostasis, "unity of person," and his physeis, "natures." Accepting this distinction, the Council of Chalcedon (451) declared that Christ is "one person and one hypostasis possessing two natures, physeis." Hence, for the council "person" and hypostasis are almost synonymous. They differ in that "person" accentuates the relational character of personal existence, and hypostasis stresses the unifying principle of individuation. See also hypostatic union; Incarnation, the; person of Christ.

hypostatic union, the uniting of the divine nature and the human nature of Jesus Christ in one person, or hypostasis (Gk.). This notion is meant to illumine the mystery of Christ's personal unity, while at the same time safeguarding the Church's insight regarding the mystery of Jesus Christ's two natures, his full divinity and full humanity.

The early Church could not remain silent regarding the personal unity or individuation of Jesus Christ. If it were to acknowledge the two natures of Christ without affirming their union in a single, integrated person, this silence could be interpreted to mean: that Jesus Christ was some kind of dualistic being similar to a split or psychotic personality (Adoptionism and Nestorianism); that Christ's human nature was subsumed into his divine nature (Monophysitism, Apollinarianism, Eutychianism); or that in Jesus Christ some essential aspect of human nature was missing and replaced by an attribute of the divine nature (Monothelitism). Faced with one-sided ("heretical") solutions to the complex issue of the individuation of Jesus Christ, the Church gradually developed the notion of the hypostatic union.

As presented in the NT, Jesus Christ is clearly a single subject, one self-agent. This apostolic witness attests to the mysterious reality of the unifying point, the hypostatic union, that is constitutive of the person of Jesus Christ. This insight was elaborated into the theory of the hypostatic union by Cyril of Alexandria (d. 444), who built on the work of Athanasius and the Cappadocian Fathers (Basil the Great, Gregory of Nazianzus, and Gregory of Nyssa). This teaching was accepted by the Council of Chalcedon (451). In recent years the theologian Karl Rahner (d. 1984) shed new light on the hypostatic union in his reflections on the direct proportionality between grace and freedom. See also Chalcedon, Council of; Incarnation, the; Jesus Christ; person of Christ.

ROBERT A. KRIEG

I

ichthys (ik'thuhs). See fish.

icon (Gk., ikona, "image"), a painted panel with representations of Christ, the Blessed Virgin Mary, or a saint used mainly in the official liturgy of the Eastern Christian tradition and in the decoration of its churches. After a period of reaction against the use of such images (iconoclasm), the Second Council of Nicaea (787) affirmed the legitimacy of icons and their veneration.

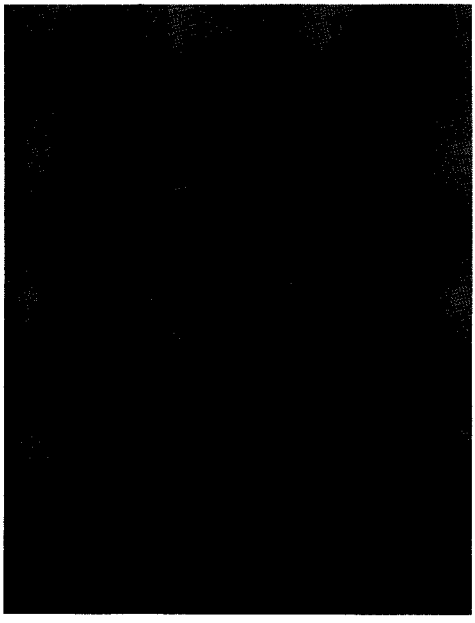
The theological view of such images is that they are windows into the eternal world of revelation and that they capture, albeit imperfectly, the realities of which the gospel speaks, including the NT affirmation that Christ is the icon (image) of God.

In the Eastern tradition the painting of icons is seen as a ministry within the Church.

Perhaps the most famous icon of modern times is that of Our Lady of Perpetual Help in Rome. See also Catholicism and the visual arts; iconoclasm; iconography.

iconoclasm, in general, destruction of religious images, but especially that sponsored by iconoclast Byzantine emperors extending from the reign of Leo III (717–41) to the restoration of images in 843. For reasons not entirely clear, Leo ordered the destruction of images, including that of Christ over the Chalke palace gate (726). By 730, the iconophile patriarch Germanus was forced to resign. Persecution began. Popes Gregory II and III protested, as did John of Damascus, but Leo's son Constantine V (741–75) confirmed and extended the policy, attempting to provide a theological and ecclesial basis for it at the Council of Hiereia (754). Against arguments urging the incarnational basis for representation of Christ, the council insisted that such representation was either Nestorian (since it divided the two natures in Christ, only one of which could be represented) or Eutychian (since, if it claimed to include and so circumscribe the divine, it was guilty of confusing the natures). Only the Eucharist was an adequate representation of Christ.

The head of Christ; detail from a seventeenth-century Byzantine icon by Emanuel Lambardos, Paul Canellopoulos Collection, Athens.



Persecution grew brutal. Iconophile monks faced the choice of marrying or being exiled and blinded. Constantine's son Leo IV (775–80), however, relaxed the persecution, and subsequently the empress Irene arranged a complete reversal of imperial policy. She convened Nicaea II (787, the last council to be regarded as ecumenical by both East and West), restoring images and defining their veneration. Due to a faulty translation of its acts, the Frankish bishops argued against the council, although Pope Hadrian I supported it. In the East, with the accession of Leo V (813–20), Nicaea II was annulled (815). Persecution was renewed, especially under Emperor Theophilus (829–42), yet the iconophiles, led in part by Theodore the Studite, had a stronger political basis and a more articulate theoretical foundation this time. In 843 the empress Theodora restored the icons, celebrating on the first Sunday of Lent a feast still kept in the Eastern churches as the "Feast of Orthodoxy."

Theologically, the controversy is a sequel to the Christological controversies of the fifth through the seventh centuries. Iconoclasm is related to the Monophysitism increasingly popular in imperial circles since the Council of Chalcedon (451). At one point its proponents argued that Christ's flesh, even after the Incarnation, was not subject to normal human limitations. The triumph of iconoclasm would thus have been the triumph of Docetism, a denial of the reality of redemption and of the foundation for any explicitly Christian art. See also icon; Libri Carolini; Monophysitism; Nicaea, Second Council of.

JOHN C. CAVADINI

iconography, a system or collection of religious symbols. Art history has demonstrated that large-scale religious art (cathedral sculpture, paintings in church) usually reflects a symbolic language, the elements of which are often thematically linked. The study of such symbolism is important for the history of theology. See also Catholicism and the visual arts; icon; iconoclasm.

iconostasis (i-kahn-ah'stuh-sis; Gk., "icon stand"), Byzantine-rite sanctuary screen, covered with icons, which separates the sanctuary from the rest of the church. Access to the sanctuary is provided by three doors, the central or "Royal Doors," used only during services and only by those in major orders, and the "deacon's doors" on either side of the Royal Doors. The Royal Doors are decorated with icons of the Annunciation and the four evangelists, symbols of the Incarnation of Christ and his Word, mysteries of Word and sacrament communicated through those doors during the liturgical celebrations. The deacon's doors bear images of the protodeacon and martyr St. Stephen, and of the archangels Michael or Gabriel wearing Byzantine diaconal vestments, since deacons are considered to represent the angels of the heavenly liturgy. On the iconostasis, to the right of the Royal Doors there is always an icon of Christ; and to the left, one of the Mother of God bearing the Christ Child. Over the doors is usually depicted the Last Supper or the communion of the apostles. Other images, depending on the space available, might include the feast of the patron saint of the church, the Twelve Great Feasts, or the Twelve Apostles, all arranged according to a prescribed order and symbolism. Now the most characteristic element of the liturgical disposition of the Byzantine church, the iconostasis evolved from the custom of hanging icons on the original Byzantine sanctuary chancel, a structure similar to the Western sanctuary enclosures of the epoch. It usually consisted of a low marble barrier about four feet high, surmounted by a row of small columns topped by an architrave or marble beam. It impeded access to the sanctuary, but not visibility. The fully developed opaque iconostasis barrier did not replace the earlier templon or open chancel until after the fourteenth century. See also icon; sanctuary. ROBERT F. TAFT idealism, a central direction of modern philosophy, emphasizing abstract, universal ideas over material, particular reality. Expanding on the philosophies of Descartes, Kant, and Johann Fichte, idealism places all things within a process where the abstract, universal ideal is becoming present in the real. Intellectual and cultural ideas appear in philosophy, science, politics, art, and religion. Philosophy provides insight into the structures of consciousness that mirror the unfolding of divine and human life in one history. First appearing in Friedrich Schelling's writings after 1800 and prominent in Hegel (d. 1831), idealism influenced Catholic theologians at Tübingen and Munich in the nineteenth century. Attacked by the anti-Modernist measures of the Vatican and discredited by World War I, its influence survived in the works of German and French philosophers of the twentieth century, among thinkers like Pierre Teilhard de Chardin (d. 1955), Paul Tillich (d. 1965), and Karl Rahner (d. 1984), and in some motifs of Vatican II (1962–65) such as sacramentality and the Church as People of God. See also philosophy and theology.

Iconostasis separating choir and apse from the central nave of St. Mark's Basilica, Venice; depicted are four apostles, John the Baptist, and the Blessed Virgin Mary (on the far side of the cross).

idolatry (Heb., 'abōdāh zārāh, "alien cult"), in the OT, the worship of a deity other than Yahweh represented in some visible form—usually a sculpture in the round or in relief; the use of such representations in the worship of Yahweh. The prohibition in the Decalogue against making images is explained by the function of such representations, which was to make the deity present and available. Throughout most of the biblical period, however, the use of images in worship was a normal part of popular religion, as may be deduced from the historical narrative, the denunciations of prophets (esp. Hosea, Jeremiah, Ezekiel), and the recurrent reforms aimed at eliminating them (e.g., 2 Kgs 23:4–14). The strongest polemic against idolatry so understood is found in Deuteronomy and is summarized in the Shema ("Hear, O Israel." Deut 6:4–9), the central confession of faith in Judaism. In early Christian times idolatry only became problematic in those cases where Christians occupied a public office requiring them to take part in civic or imperial practices of worship, or partaking of meat offered to alien deities (1 Cor 8:1–13; 10:14–22). The term is more often used figuratively, meaning excessive concern with created things, e.g., food, sex, or wealth (e.g., Eph 5:5; Col 3:5). See also images.

Ignatian spirituality. See Jesuit spirituality.

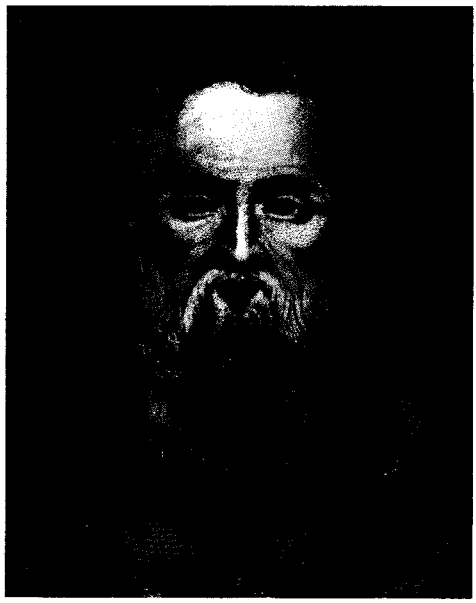
Ignatius of Antioch, St., ca. 35–ca. 107, bishop and martyr, one of the Apostolic Fathers. He became bishop of Antioch ca. 69. During Trajan's persecution he was condemned as a Christian and then taken to Rome to be executed. On his journey he wrote seven Letters, which are a major source for early Church doctrine and organization. The first four Letters were written at Smyrna and sent to the churches of Ephesus, Magnesia, Tralles, and Rome. The last three were written at Troas and sent to the churches of Philadelphia and Smyrna, and to Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna.

St. Ignatius of Antioch, Apostolic Father, second-century bishop and martyr whose letters to various churches in the ancient Christian world serve as a major source of information regarding the faith, life, and structure of the early Church.



Against Docetism, which held that Jesus Christ only "seemed" (Gk., dokein) to be human, Ignatius stressed the reality of both the divinity and the humanity of Christ: the Eucharist is "the flesh of our Savior Jesus Christ," and the eucharistic sacrifice has as its locus the Church. The bishop represents Christ and is both the high priest of the liturgy and the authorized teacher of the community. Ignatius attested to the primacy of the church of Rome and to the roles of Peter and Paul in its founding. He was the first writer to use the term "Catholic Church" as a collective designation for Christians, and among the first to attest to the monoepiscopacy, i.e., the rule by one bishop over each diocese.

Ignatius was resolved to bear ultimate witness to Christ by suffering martyrdom. When brought to Rome, he was taken to the Colosseum and thrown to the lions. Feast day: October 17 (Roman Catholic and Antioch); December 17 (Anglican); December 20 (Greek). See also Apostolic Fathers.

Ignatius of Loyola, St., 1491–1556, founder of the Jesuits. Ignatius was born at the family castle of Loyola in the Basque province of Guipuzcoa. Originally intended for a career in the Church, he was placed in his late teens in the household of the royal treasurer and there entered the service of the viceroy of Navarre. Until 1521 his personal ideals and values were those of one committed to a career at court and in the military. In that year, while recovering from wounds sustained in the defense of Pamplona in Navarre (May 20, 1520), he underwent a radical religious conversion.

Long months of painful convalescence were followed by almost a year as a beggar at Manresa near the Benedictine monastery of Montserrat. It was here that he first experienced and then began to write his Spiritual Exercises, a manual for spiritual growth based on the gifts and graces given to him by God over the course of a year. This culminated in a series of mystical experiences that developed in Ignatius an ever-deepening gift of spiritual discernment.

After a brief sojourn in the Holy Land (1523), where he hoped to spend the rest of his life as a pilgrim, Ignatius returned to his native Spain to begin formal education with young schoolboys. Educationally he moved from Barcelona to Alcala and Salamanca and finally to Paris where he completed his studies in philosophy and theology (1528–35). In 1534 Ignatius and his companions pronounced vows of chastity and poverty along with promises to work in the Holy Land. In 1537, while awaiting passage to the Holy Land, he and several of his companions were ordained priests. Because war between Venice and the Ottoman Empire prevented their passage to the Holy Land, Ignatius and the group committed themselves to the service of the Church in the person of Pope Paul III (November 1538). After a lengthy period of prayer and deliberation at Venice, the group, led by Ignatius, petitioned the pope to establish a new religious order, the Society of Jesus. Subsequently, on September 27, 1540, Pope Paul III issued the papal bull Regimini Militantis Ecclesiae, which formally established the Society of Jesus.

Ignatius of Loyola, founder of the Jesuits, portrayed in his soldier's armor; during a period of forced inactivity because of a wound, he read the lives of Christ and the saints and decided to become a soldier of Christ.

Despite strenuous objections on his part, Ignatius was unanimously elected first general of the Jesuits. The last fifteen years of his life were devoted to composing the Constitutions of this new order. Though failing in health, he remained a steadfast administrator of the burgeoning order. He died quietly and unexpectedly at Rome in the early morning of July 31, 1556. He was canonized by Gregory XV on May 22, 1622.

His major works, the Spiritual Exercises, the Constitutions of the Society of Jesus, the Autobiography, and a collection of almost six thousand letters are characterized by a Christocentric apostolic fervor and by a notable quality of spiritual discernment. In his spiritual doctrine he emphasizes the integration of contemplation and action, affect and rationality, prayer and service. His constant injunction to his followers, one he followed in his own life (Autobiography 98) was to "find God in all things." Feast day: July 31. See also Jesuits; Jesuit spirituality; Spiritual Exercises.

FRANK J. HOUDEK

ignorance, a lack of knowledge in someone who is capable of having such knowledge. Discussions of ignorance are concerned with whether and to what degree blame can be attributed to agents who lack knowledge but perform morally wrong actions. Aristotle's and Thomas Aquinas's treatises are the origins of the Catholic position. One can be ignorant of a law or be ignorant of a fact. In ignorance of law, one lacks knowledge about the existence of a law or its meaning; in ignorance of fact, one is ignorant of some condition of an action that would bring it under a law that one knows to exist. See also invincible ignorance; vincible ignorance.

ignorance [canon law], a person's or a community's lack of knowledge about either a law or certain facts pertaining to a given situation covered by a law. Canon law presumes that persons and communities know the law, as well as facts pertinent to the law (can. 15). Although ignorance of the law does not excuse one from it, such ignorance may mitigate certain effects with respect to canonical penalties. See also error [canon law].

IHS, Christian inscription found frequently in art. The initials are a compression of the Greek word for Jesus.

Ildephonsus, St., ca. 610–67, archbishop of Toledo from 657 to 667. Four treatises of his survive, including On the Perpetual Virginity of Blessed Mary and De Viris Illustribus (On Famous Men), his most important work, which focuses entirely on Hispanic bishops. Feast day: January 23.

illegitimacy, the status of someone born outside a valid marital union. Canon law specifically exempts those born in a putative marriage; thus, those who obtain marriage annulments do not thereby declare their children illegitimate in canon law. Canon law formerly barred illegitimate children from certain offices, e.g., the priesthood; universal law no longer retains any such prohibitions, although certain particular laws (e.g., of a given religious order) might retain some such restraints. See also marriage law.

illiceity [canon law], the quality of being contrary to canon law. If an action contrary to law is deliberate, it may also be also sinful. Such an action, whether deliberate or not, does not necessarily render the act invalid. An action can be at the same time valid and illicit. Thus, a suspended priest, forbidden by his bishop to preside at Mass, nevertheless celebrates a valid Mass if he chooses to disobey the bishop's order. It is a "real" (valid) Mass, but the priest may commit a sin in celebrating it. See also liceity [canon law]; validity [canon law].

illuminative way. See ways of the spiritual life.

images, material representations of a deity fashioned to be objects of worship. The prohibition of images in the Decalogue (Exod 20:4–6; Deut 5:8–10) includes anything in the cosmos that could be the object of worship. Though not stated explicitly, it also implies the prohibition of making an image of Yahweh, analogous to the prohibition of using the divine name for improper purposes. Since antiquity the function of the image in the religious sphere is to make the deity present, and therefore available; the implication is that Yahweh is not a deity who can be controlled for the worshiper's own purposes. The command was not always observed, as the biblical texts (e.g., Judg 17:1–6; 1 Kgs 12:28–29) and archaeological data abundantly attest. According to the Priestly view (the narrative and legal portions of the Pentateuch composed by priests), the human being alone serves as the divine image and therefore as God's representative on earth (Gen 1:26–27). In all three monotheistic religions (Judaism, Christianity, Islam) iconoclastic movements attest to the importance that continued to be attributed to the prohibition. See also idolatry.

images, miraculous, devotional pieces of art that pious tradition insists possess supernatural powers of healing or of performing prodigies (e.g., icons that weep). See also icon.

imago Dei (Lat., "image of God"), theological concept that denotes the likeness of the human creature to God. According to Gen 1:26, humanity was created "in [God's] image, according to [God's] likeness." Found sparsely in the Hebrew Scriptures, the word "image" was used often in Pauline writings in the NT to interpret Christ's work and became central to early Christian reflections on the human condition, the meaning of redemption in Christ, and hope for humankind. This usage resonates the language of likeness and imaging for Christian readers shaped by Platonic schemes of the relation between levels of being.

Early theologians did not consistently separate "image" from "likeness" in interpreting human existence, and they saw the image of God variously in the human intellect, the capacity for moral decision, and the ability to rule over creation; but these theologians usually agreed it implied a kinship between God and humankind and a call for the imitation of God. Christ, as the one who is the image according to which humanity was made, was seen to meditate the likeness to God both in creation and redemption.

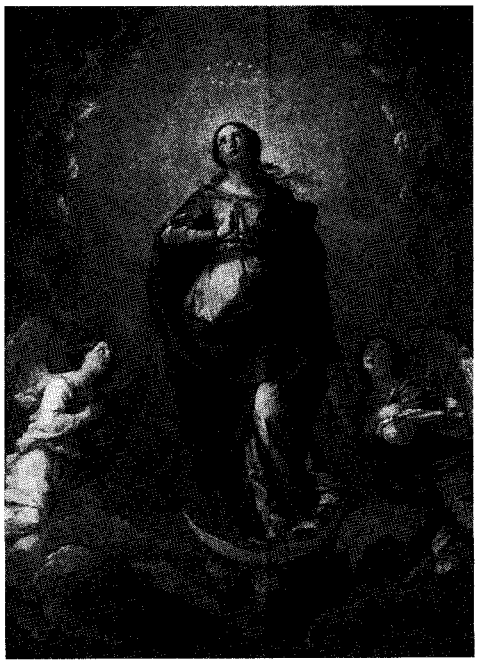
imitation of Christ, a central theme in the Christian life by which all Christians are called to conform their whole lives to Christ's. Although connected with discipleship, the imitation of Christ had a distinctive development. Discipleship emphasizes following Jesus; imitation speaks to conformity with Jesus. Imitation of Christ became explicit with the Apostle Paul, who often wrote of life in Christ. Baptism for Paul was the initiation of the Christian's imitation of the dying and rising of Jesus. The early Church honored martyrs as imitators of Christ.

Imitation of Christ, begun in Baptism and nourished at the Eucharist, is always in the context of community (Church). It is never mere reproduction of actions from the life of Christ. Imitation of Christ is, in fact, a graced activity, the work of the Holy Spirit. Reacting to a literalist notion of imitation, Martin Luther emphasized Christ as gift more than as object of imitation. All forms of the Christian life—single, married, priestly, religious—are a call to imitate Christ, to be conformed to Jesus, the way, the truth, and the life (John 14:6). Paul expresses the profound nature of the imitation of Christ with these words: "I have been crucified with Christ; and it is no longer I who live, but it is Christ who lives in me" (Gal 2:19–20). See also discipleship; Imitation of Christ.

Imitation of Christ, a book attributed to Thomas à Kempis (d. 1471) and thought to be the widest-read religious text, second only to the Bible. Published in 1472, its first two sections offer compact and proverb-like advice for the spiritual life. The third portrays conversations between a devout person and Christ. The fourth section offers meditations to increase devotion toward the Eucharist. The work continually emphasizes the difference between the glories and pleasures of the world and the humility and suffering proper to those following Christ. Instead of discussing the higher experiences of prayer in the contemplative life, Imitation is directed toward those still struggling with ordinary obstacles to the spiritual life. It helps beginners develop an interior life and offers practical methods for overcoming vices and growing in virtues. Love alone makes burdens light, freeing people from worldly affection so that they can find both God and themselves. See also Thomas à Kempis.

Immaculate Conception, the dogma that the Blessed Virgin Mary was free from original sin from the first instant of her existence. Officially taught by Pope Pius IX after consultation with the world's bishops, it was promulgated in the papal bull Ineffabilis Deus on December 8, 1854, the day that remains its liturgical feast. This dogma holds that the Blessed Virgin Mary "was, from the first moment of her conception, by the singular grace and privilege of almighty God and in view of the merits of Jesus Christ the Savior of the human race, preserved free from all stain of original sin." This is not to be confused with the virginal conception, which refers to Jesus' being conceived by Mary without male intervention. Nor does it mean that Mary was conceived virginally. Rather, it is a belief about her original sinlessness in union with God.

The Blessed Virgin Mary was immaculately conceived, that is, without sin, because she was destined to be the Mother of God; The Immaculate Conception by Guido Reni (d. 1642), Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York.



History: The Immaculate Conception is not found explicitly in Scripture, although the dogmatic definition appeals to certain biblical texts that by extension can support it: promised victory over the serpent (Gen 3:15); the angel's greeting Mary as "favored" or "full of grace" (Luke 1:28); Elizabeth's tribute, "blessed are you among women" (Luke 1:42). The doctrine is also unknown throughout the patristic era, although the Eve-Mary antithesis with its death-life, sin-grace polarity sets the stage.

In the East, tradition about Mary's special holiness developed slowly. There, too, starting in the seventh century, a feast of her Conception was celebrated. These two traditions coalesced in the West in eleventh-century England where a feast of Mary's Immaculate Conception was introduced. Opposition to this feast brought the doctrine under critical discussion for the first time.

The main objection stated by theologians such as Anselm (d. 1109), Bernard (d. 1153), Aquinas (d. 1274), and Bonaventure (d. 1274) was that it removes Mary from the company of those needing salvation, thus detracting from the universality of Christ's redemptive work. These theologians were willing to grant that Mary was sanctified in the womb, but argued that she had to be touched by original sin for at least one instant in order to be redeemed by Christ's grace.

Duns Scotus (d. 1308) resolved these objections with his insight that Christ can save in two ways. In one, he rescues from sin those already fallen. In the other, he preserves someone from being touched by sin even for an instant. This is uniquely the case with Mary, whose being conceived without original sin demonstrates Christ's redemptive power. Given this reasoning the Council of Trent (1545–63) deliberately excluded Mary from its decree on original sin and taught in its decree on justification that she was free from all sins throughout her entire life.

Subsequently, the doctrine developed in liturgy, art, and piety. In the spirit of the age the U.S. bishops (1846) chose Mary under the title of her Immaculate Conception to be patroness of their relatively new country. Marian apparitions also encouraged belief. In Paris (1830) Catherine Labouré had a vision of Mary standing on a globe with rays of light streaming from her hands, surrounded by the words, "O Mary conceived without sin, pray for us who have recourse to thee." Crafted to show this vision, a medal known as "miraculous" became a widely used devotional object. Following the dogmatic definition, Bernadette Soubirous in Lourdes, France (1858), also saw a vision of a lady, who named herself, "I am the Immaculate Conception." The place of this encounter became and remains a center of pilgrimage where the sick in particular are welcomed, some allegedly being cured in waters welling up from a natural spring.

Theology: The religious meaning of this dogma centers on the victory of God's grace, freely given in Christ. Sin is universal, and the whole human race is in need of salvation. This is offered because of God's love and mercy poured out in the life, death, and Resurrection of Jesus Christ, prior to any merits or deserving works on the part of human beings. The dogma of Mary's original sinlessness celebrates God's victory over the powers and principalities of this world as this woman comes into existence. In her very being, through the mercy of God, the grip of evil is broken. To the Catholic imagination it is fitting that grace be freely given to her from the first moment of her existence because of her role in being the faith-filled mother of Jesus. Her yes to God brought Christ into the world, through whom the ancient sin of Adam and Eve is overturned. That God generously graces Mary, enabling her living union with God from her beginning even while not removing her from the sufferings of history, is congruent with divine mercy. It also signifies the good news that for the Church and for every human being, grace is more original than sin. See also Mary, Blessed Virgin; original sin. ELIZABETH JOHNSON

Immaculate Heart of Mary, a Marian devotion promoted in the seventeenth century by John Eudes, who linked it with devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus. It was particularly strong during the pontificates of Pius VII (1800–23) and Pius XII (1939–58), who consecrated the world to the Immaculate Heart of Mary in 1942. See also Sacred Heart, devotion to the.

Traditional depiction of the Immaculate Heart of Mary, a devotion to the Blessed Virgin fostered by John Eudes in seventeenth-century France and popularized by the apparition of Mary at Lourdes in 1858 and later by Pope Pius XII (d. 1958).

Immaculate Heart of Mary, Servants of the. See Sisters, Servants of the Immaculate Heart of Mary.

immersion, first ritually indicated manner of baptism, whereby the individual is lowered bodily into a pool of water. Today's ritual allows for either total or partial immersion, i.e., submersion of the whole body or, in the case of adults, immersion of the head only. See also Baptism.

imminence of the end, in eschatological thought, the idea that the time of the promised return of Jesus Christ is fast approaching. The Gospels speak variously of Jesus' Second Coming, which will initiate a period of final judgment and culminate in the coming of the kingdom of God in its fullness, as heralded by calamitous human and natural events such as wars, famines, and earthquakes (Matt 24:1–25:46; Mark 13:1–37; Luke 21:5–36). Certain passages indicate that these things will be witnessed by the generation of Jesus' first disciples (Matt 16:28; 24:34; Mark 13:30; Luke 9:27; 21:32). The expectation is qualified, however, by statements that the time of the Second Coming is known by God alone (cf. Matt 24:32–44). See also apocalypticism; eschatology, universal; Second Coming.

immolation, theory developed during the Middle Ages that the sacrifice of Christ must be represented in some visible way during the eucharistic celebration. Various moments of the Mass were discussed as possible points for the immolation, e.g., the breaking of the consecrated bread or Communion. The theory was developed at a time when Christians saw the Mass as a dramatic replication of Christ's Passion. See also Eucharist; Mass; sacrifice of the Mass.

immortality, immunity from death. By excluding death, immortality points to endless life, but it does not indicate in what that life consists. Hence, it is not the same as "eternal life," the life of God shared with men and women who have been saved by the death and Resurrection of Jesus Christ. For even the damned would have immortality, but not eternal life.

The NT describes God as "he alone who has immortality" (1 Tim 6:16), for God alone by God's own nature excludes all possibility of death. Through the power of the risen Christ, "those who belong to Christ" (1 Cor 15:23) will share his triumph over death even in their bodies. Paul, speaking of the Resurrection, says: "The dead will be raised imperishable, and we will be changed. For this perishable body must put on imperishability, and this mortal body must put on immortality" (1 Cor 15:52b–53).

The late OT book the Wisdom of Solomon speaks of the final lot of the just in terms of immortality: "The souls of the righteous are in the hand of God, and no torment will ever touch them. In the eyes of the foolish they seemed to have died, and their departure was thought to be a disaster, and their going from us to be their destruction; but they are at peace. For though in the sight of others they were punished, their hope is full of immortality" (Wis 3:1–4).

The teaching that immortality belongs to the nature of the human soul, which for this reason survives separation from the body, was common among Greek philosophers (e.g., Plato, Phaedo 105–7) and maintained by Christian thinkers after them (e.g., Aquinas, Summa Theologiae 1.75.6). They understood the soul to be the intrinsic principle of human life, vivifying the body and thus making it capable of vital activity like sensation and movement. In addition, the soul was the basic principle of intellectual and volitional activity, which manifested a radical independence of matter in abstract thinking and free choice. It was this that led them to see the soul as capable of existing in itself, apart from a material counterpart. Furthermore, as a spiritual principle, the soul is not made up of parts into which it could be dissolved. Thus, being able to exist in itself and not being subject to corruption or dissolution, it is by nature immortal.

Philosophical reasoning, however, is not the basis for the Christian hope of immortality. This rests on Christ's victory over death. Nevertheless, the natural immortality of the soul is not unrelated to eternal life. Grace presupposes and builds on nature. Therefore, it is reasonable that God would create something not naturally subject to death to be the immediate recipient of eternal life. At the resurrection of the body, the immortal soul communicates eternal life to the whole person, so that both body and soul share in it, and the whole person becomes immortal. See also eternal life; soul. JOHN H. WRIGHT impanation, word first used in the late eleventh century to describe the opinion of those who held that the body of Christ was present, but hidden, in the eucharistic bread, as his divinity was hidden in his human flesh. It was later used to describe theories of consubstantiation. See also Real Presence.

impassibility of God, one of the metaphysical attributes of God, derived from Greek philosophy and appropriated by classical theology, which holds that God is not subject to metaphysical change. In Christology, impassibility was ascribed to Christ's divine nature, while passibility was ascribed to Christ's human nature. Some contemporary theologians have rejected the idea of God's impassibility, claiming that a God who is unaffected by God's relationship to creation is incompatible with the biblical presentation of God. See also God.

impeccability. See sinlessness of Christ.

impediment, in canon law an obstacle to the licit and/or valid performance of an act. Some impediments are grounded merely in Church laws and can, in theory, be dispensed, e.g., marriage between a Catholic and a non-Christian. Some of these are, in fact, seldom dispensed, e.g., marriage between first cousins. Other impediments are based in divine or natural law and cannot be dispensed, e.g., marriage involving one or both parties who are already validly married to a third or fourth party.

imperfect contrition, sorrow for sin that is motivated by fear of punishment or by the horror of evil, rather than by love for God. Augustine (d. 430) used the phrase, "faith perfected by charity," and in medieval Scholasticism this idea was transferred to contrition: grace [charity] "perfects" contrition. In this view, whenever contrition was motivated by love for God and included an aversion toward sin, sanctifying grace was infused into the soul. If contrition did not include the infusion of sanctifying grace, it was "imperfect." Therefore, "imperfect contrition" is understandable in Scholastic theology on the basis of "perfect contrition," not vice versa. In contemporary theology, the issue of motive as regards sin and conversion is considered on the basis of psychological studies on human motivation. Given these studies, contrition cannot be understood as a single act, but only as an ongoing process in the life of a Christian. See also attrition; confession, auricular; perfect contrition; Reconciliation.

imperfections, human acts that are neither sinful nor meritorious in and of themselves. Moral theology identifies three types of imperfections: 1) a good act performed without a wholehearted love of God, according to the capacity of the human agent; 2) an objectively sinful act performed without sufficient deliberation; or 3) a deliberate choice to act in a way that is less than perfect but not against the law of God, such as relaxing at home instead of visiting the sick. One's concern to correct imperfections must not foster perfectionism. See also perfection; venial sin.

imposition of hands. See hands, imposition of.

impotence, impediment of, in canon law marital impediment based on the physical or psychological inability to have sexual relations. This inability is an impediment grounded in the traditionally Catholic understanding of the purpose of marriage and cannot, therefore, be dispensed. To qualify as an impediment, however, the inability must be perpetual, i.e., incurable by ordinary means, and must antedate the marriage. If there is any doubt about the perpetuity of impotence in a given case, the marriage is to be allowed. Impotence may be absolute, i.e., toward any person of the opposite sex, or relative, i.e., toward only one particular person. See also Marriage; marriage law.

imprimatur (im-pree-mah'toor; Lat., "it may be printed"), the approval given by the competent ordinary (usually the diocesan bishop of the author or of the place of publication) to publish certain specified types of books. In addition to catechetical works, textbooks dealing with theology, canon law, Sacred Scripture, Church history, and other sacred sciences are to have an imprimatur. Canon law recommends that all books covering these subjects be given this approval, but only requires it of textbooks (strictly understood) and books sold or distributed in a church. The competent ordinary is the local ordinary (cf. can. 134.2) of the author or of the place where the books are published. A local ordinary is to consult with a censor learned in the matters covered by the book for assurance that the book conforms to Church teaching before granting or refusing this approval, and the censor is to give his or her opinion in writing. See also imprimi potest; nihil obstat.

imprimi potest (im-pree'mee poh'test; Lat., "it can be printed"), the permission required for a religious to publish writings dealing with faith and morals. This permission does not preclude the possible requirement for approval of a given text by the local ordinary (diocesan bishop). The particular law of a religious institute determines which major superior is competent to give this permission. See also imprimatur; nihil obstat.

imputation (Lat., imputare, "to ascribe"), the soteriological view that God ascribes to those human beings who have faith in Jesus Christ the obedience and righteousness possessed by Jesus Christ himself, even though these human beings are themselves disobedient and alienated from God. This idea was adopted by Martin Luther in his teaching on justification. In its extreme form, the theory of imputation maintains that God simply declares sinners to be just and that no change occurs within human beings. In its moderate form, it holds that God declares sinners to be just and simultaneously gives them the grace to become holy. See also grace; justification; nature and grace.

incardination, the canonical bond that exists between a cleric and a given diocese or institute of consecrated life. Canon law allows no cleric to be without this bond and the supervision of a bishop or other ecclesiastical superior that is joined to it. The bond arises at the time of ordination to the diaconate, when a person becomes a cleric. It is possible to transfer subsequently to a different diocese or institute of consecrated life and thus be excardinated, i.e., sever the former bond and be incardinated in the second diocese or institute, i.e., establish a new bond. See also excardination.

Incarnation, the (Lat., caro, "flesh"; hence, "enfleshing"), the assuming of a human nature by God, specifically by the Logos, the divine Word. This notion can be understood to refer to the moment when God became a human being at the conception of Jesus in his mother, Mary. It can also refer to the abiding reality of the hypostatic union of the divine nature and the human nature in Jesus Christ. In both cases the notion is meant to exclude misinterpretations of the mystery of Jesus Christ, for example, that, on the one extreme, Jesus Christ was simply God in the appearance or guise of a human being (Docetism) or that, on the other extreme, Jesus Christ was simply a human being who was so filled with the Holy Spirit as to seem divine (Adoptionism). The doctrine of the Incarnation upholds the paradoxical mystery that Jesus Christ is one divine person (Gk., hypostasis) possessing both a divine nature and a human nature.

New Testament: The NT attests to the mystery of the Incarnation. Key texts include: "the Word became flesh" (John 1:14); "Christ Jesus, who ... emptied himself, taking the form of a servant, being born in human likeness" (Phil 2:5–8); "God sent his Son, born of a woman" (Gal 4:4–5); and "He was revealed in flesh, vindicated in spirit" (1 Tim 3:16).

Just what the NT means by "flesh" has been the source of long-standing controversy. The Alexandrian school in the early Church, influenced by Platonic thought, at times put forth the view that the Son of God assumed some human attributes but not the whole reality of a human being. However, this interpretation has no basis in the NT, since "flesh" in the texts cited above is synonymous with "human nature." Moreover, the entire testimony of the Gospels regarding Jesus' person and activities leaves no doubt that his followers knew him as a full human being.

Doctrinal Development: As the early Church reflected on the reality of the Incarnation, it found itself having to defend this mystery from reductionistic or simplistic explanations. Along with Docetism and Adoptionism, there were the theories that Jesus Christ possessed only one nature (Monophysitism), lacked a human soul (Apollinarianism), possessed two distinct natures without being one person (Nestorianism), became one nature after the Incarnation (Eutychianism), and possessed only a divine will (Monothelitism). The Church rejected each of these views and upheld the doctrine of the Incarnation in the series of councils that began with the Council of Nicaea (325) and ended with the Third Council of Constantinople (680–81). Another theory that threatened the doctrine, especially in the nineteenth century, was kenoticism, which maintains that in the Incarnation the Son of God emptied himself of his divinity so completely that Jesus lacked a divine nature. This radical view is incompatible with the Christian understanding of the mystery of redemption.

While the Incarnation pertains specifically to Jesus Christ, it does shed light both on the mystery of God and also on the mystery of human life. In the Incarnation God is shown to be so devoted to creation and humankind as to enter completely into the human situation, knowing firsthand its joys, limitations, and burdens. Simultaneously, the Incarnation discloses the essence of being human, namely, openness to God and the longing to enter into relationship with God. This orientation discloses the potential goodness that is inherent in human nature, fallen but redeemed.

Unresolved Questions: Over the centuries, theologians have debated a number of unresolved issues regarding the Incarnation, including the following. Would the Incarnation have occurred if Adam and Eve had not sinned? Are creation and redemption wholly separate acts of God, or are they two distinct, yet connected, acts of God? Further, could any one of the three divine Persons become flesh, or was it most appropriate that the Second Person of the Trinity be born of the Virgin Mary? Also, is there a sense in which it is permissible to say that the Incarnation occurred not just at the moment of Jesus' conception but also in the course of his entire life? Moreover, what is the relationship between the Incarnation and Jesus' suffering, death, and Resurrection? Questions of this sort can be helpful for the Christian faith because they can stimulate prayer, reflection, and insight into the fathomless mystery of God's becoming a human being in Jesus Christ. See also Adoptionism; Apollinarianism; Docetism; hypostatic union; Jesus Christ; kenosis; kenotic theories; Monophysitism; Monothelitism; Nestorianism.

ROBERT A. KRIEG

incense (Lat., incendere, "to burn"), the aromatic gums of resinous trees that are burned upon coals in a brazier or thurible. Incense is used during processions and to honor sacred objects such as the altar, the Gospel book, the eucharistic bread and wine, and the bodies of Christians, both living and dead. At the Liturgy of the Hours, incense is burned as a sign of prayer, the sacrifice of praise. The first attested Christian use of incense appears in the account of the funeral of Peter of Alexandria (d. 311). See also thurible; thurifer.

inclusive language, words and phrases that designate all members of a group by avoiding "false generics" such as "man" when both males and females are intended. Controversy about inclusive language in liturgical and biblical texts has arisen in English-speaking churches because present English usage is androcentric (i.e., understands the male to be the normative human person). Androcentrism is reflected in the use of "man" to denote both human being and male—and in the use of male pronouns only, whenever generic ones are required. This pattern of male-centered language arises from a patriarchal social order that views males as dominant and "superior," while treating women as lesser, inferior beings. It is increasingly seen as incompatible with the equal dignity of men and women as human persons. In 1990 the U.S. Catholic bishops issued criteria opposing liturgical language that seems to exclude the equality and dignity of each person.

inculturation, the process by which individuals learn their group's culture through experience, observation and instruction; and also the process by which the gospel is adapted to a particular culture. The Second Vatican Council (1962–65) made the first detailed statement about the relationship of the Church to diverse cultures in the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (n. 58). In order to evangelize, pastoral initiatives need to be carried on from within the cultures of humankind (Pope Paul VI, "On Evangelization in the Modern World," [Evangelii Nuntiandi] 1975).

Through inculturation the Church endeavors to reformulate Christian life and doctrine within the thought-patterns of each people. Efforts to achieve such integration have not been easy. There have been both successes and failures. The Vatican was not supportive of Father Matteo Ricci (1552–1610), as he developed the Chinese rites. However, in 1982, Pope John Paul II praised Ricci for "building between the Church and the Chinese culture a bridge that seems still solidly anchored and secure" (address at the Gregorian University on the occasion of the 400th anniversary of the arrival of Father Ricci in China). Also, in spite of earlier hesitations, Pope John Paul II named Sts. Cyril and Methodius the co-patrons of Europe in 1980.

Although the Second Vatican Council initiated serious efforts toward inculturation, much work remains to be done to achieve what is implied in Acts 10:34–36: "Then Peter began to speak to them: 'I truly understand that God shows no partiality, but in every nation anyone who fears him and does what is right is acceptable to him.'" See also Catholicism and culture. ROBERT S. PELTON inculturation, liturgical, the process of adaptation in which worship creatively employs the cultural heritage of a particular people. Their local ritual and symbolic forms and systems are invested with Christian meaning. Inculturation, therefore, differs from acculturation in that the latter only incorporates those native rituals and symbols which are seen as compatible with the Roman liturgical tradition. Acculturation purifies and reorientates, while inculturation is more confident about the congruence between the native culture and Christian worship. Vatican II (1962–65) called for this process to be done under the competent authority (the national conference of bishops) and with the assistance of experts (Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, n. 40). This marked a significant change from the historical imposition of the sober Roman liturgy in countries like Spain and Gaul or in countries later evangelized by the Western Church. In the post-Vatican II Church, there has been notable success in inculturating the liturgy in certain areas of Africa and elsewhere. See also acculturation; Catholicism and culture.

indefectibility, the Church's "inability to fail" in its mission of teaching the authentic message of the gospel. The basis for this belief is found in the NT: the Church is built upon a rock (Matt 16:18); the Holy Spirit has been sent to the apostles to lead them to all truth (John 14:16); Christ will be with his apostles even to the end of the world (Matt 28:30). Such texts do not mean that individual Christians will not fail in their commitment to Christ; as long as people are sinful, reform will be needed in the Church. Nor do such texts mean that theological and doctrinal changes will not be needed in the Church; as new questions emerge, the gospel will have to be expressed in new thought-forms. In this regard, indefectibility means that the Church will always be faithful to teaching the essential message of the gospel. Closely related to, but different from, indefectibility is the concept of infallibility, which means that, when teaching definitively on a matter of faith or morals, the Church will never fall into error about the fundamental meaning of the gospel. See also infallibility.

indeterminism, the philosophical and scientific doctrine denying determinism, according to which a given cause or set of causes necessarily brings about the same effect. For each theory of determinism there is a contradictory species of indeterminism. Controversy exists over how much human choices are determined by physical and psychological factors. Less controversial is the physical theory that subatomic processes are indeterministic; the theological implications of microphysical indeterminism are unclear.

Index of Forbidden Books (Lat., Index Librorum Prohibitorum, abbreviated ILP), list of books Catholics were forbidden to read or even possess except under specified circumstances. Penalty for noncompliance was excommunication. Books on the Index were forbidden because they were thought to contain materials contrary to faith and/or morals. The Index was established in 1557 by Pope Paul IV and was later overseen by a special curial office (Congregation of the Index) founded by Pope Pius V in 1571. In 1917 supervision passed to the Holy Office. The Index was abolished by Pope Paul VI in 1966 because it was by then regarded as inconsistent with the freedom of inquiry encouraged by the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), especially in its Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (n. 62).

India, Catholicism in. Catholicism in India employs a complex, multiritual worship with diverse origins. A significant community of Christians has lived on the southwest Malabar coast of India since the fourth century. They trace their roots, according to a strong but unprovable tradition, to the extensive Indian missionary activity of the Apostle Thomas, whose presumed tomb is venerated near Madras. These "Thomas Christians" existed for many centuries as a self-contained and fully inculturated church with strong ties to the (Nestorian) Assyrian Church of the East in what is now Iraq and Iran.

The Portuguese arrived in India at the end of the fifteenth century and soon initiated a process not only of integrating the Thomas Christians into the Catholic Church, but also of compelling them to give up many of their own traditions and conform to Latin practices. This triggered a schism between those who accepted these changes (now the Syro-Malabar Catholic Church) and those who broke with Rome and formed what would become the Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church.

The coming of the Portuguese also marked the beginning of extensive Catholic missionary activity in India and the formation of a parallel Latin Catholic Church based in areas under Portuguese control. The Jesuit Francis Xavier arrived in Goa in 1542 and with his companions gave strong impetus to the Catholic mission, especially through publishing and educational activity. Several other Catholic missionary communities began work in the subcontinent before 1600, when the rate of conversions peaked. Largely unsuccessful missions were also sent to the empire of the Great Mogul in the north and to other regions as far away as Tibet. The mission declined sharply, however, as the Portuguese presence waned and after the Jesuits were expelled from Portugal and its possessions in 1759.

Aware of Portuguese weakness, the Holy See began to set up vicariates apostolic in other parts of India under the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. Tensions soon arose between these new mostly Italian jurisdictions and the regular Portuguese hierarchy. This led to the long-standing practice of double jurisdictions in some areas, and even to a virtual schism between the two groups in the mid-nineteenth century. The problem was finally resolved in 1886 when a new concordat provided for the establishment of a regular hierarchy throughout India.

A second Eastern Catholic Church came into being in Kerala in 1930 when two bishops of the Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church were received into full communion with Rome, forming the Syro-Malankar Catholic Church. In the following decades it experienced rapid growth.

In recent times, there have been some difficulties in the relationship between the Eastern and Latin churches in India because of the limitations imposed on the Eastern Catholics concerning the establishment of pastoral structures for their faithful outside Kerala and the ability to engage in missionary activity in other parts of India. These limitations were removed by Pope John Paul II in 1987.

In 1993 in India there were 150 dioceses and over 14,000 priests serving just under 14 million Catholics. See also Syro-Malabar Catholic Church; Syro-Malankara Catholic Church; Thomas Christians.

RONALD G. ROBERSON

indifferentism, the belief that the differences that separate Christian denominations or Christianity itself from other religions are of no real significance. All religions are understood as being equally capable or incapable of displaying divine truths.

Indifferentism became an important issue in the nineteenth century when it was perceived to characterize theological liberalism. Indifferentism was explicitly condemned by a series of popes in the nineteenth century.

Current Church doctrine holds that Christianity most fully embodies the saving grace of God, with Catholicism as the norm for the interpretation and realization of the Christian tradition (Vatican II, Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, 1964, nn. 13–16). Other religions can mediate salvation through what is true and holy within them (Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions, 1965, n. 2). See also salvation outside the Church.

indissolubility of marriage, an essential property of marriage that excludes any potential for its dissolution either by the mutual consent of the spouses (intrinsic indissolubility), or by an ecclesiastical or civil authority (extrinsic indissolubility).

Catholic belief and practice uphold both types of indissolubility in all sacramental and consummated marriages, i.e., marriages lawfully celebrated between two baptized persons and consummated "in a human manner" (knowingly and willingly) through sexual union. If at least one of the partners is Catholic, lawful celebration means "according to Catholic canon law"; if both are from another Christian community, a demonstrable manifestation of consent is enough. The scriptural foundation for this indissolubility is in Jesus' sayings against divorce (e.g., Mark 10:2–9) and in Paul's assertions of marriage as the symbol of Christ's union with his Church (Eph 5:21–33).

In the case of marriages sacramentally celebrated (both spouses were baptized) but not consummated (e.g., because of impotency), and of marriages nonsacramentally but lawfully contracted (at least one of the spouses was not baptized), the Catholic Church still honors an intrinsic indissolubility, but is willing to lend its authority, in rather restrictive circumstances, to bring about the termination of the marital bond, always for the sake of some benefit accruing to an individual believer (freedom, peace of conscience, practice of faith). A specific precedent can be found in the Scriptures: Paul freed believers from unbelieving spouses who wished to separate or kept disturbing the peace (1 Cor 7:12–15). See also annulment; Marriage. LADISLAS M. ORSY individualism, the term generally given to the wide variety of attitudes, theories, and doctrines associated with a belief in the underived and absolute value of the individual. The rise of modern individualism owes something to the historical Christian emphasis on the sanctity and dignity of the person (cf. Matt 10:30), though the often exaggerated distinction drawn by modern individualism between the individual and community—particularly in the moral, social, and economic spheres—is inconsistent with the traditional Christian belief in the inherently social nature of the person, the unity of humankind, and the ultimate dependence of the individual upon God.

indulgences, the remission of temporal punishment for sin, in response to certain prayers or good works (cans. 992–97). In this canonical description, indulgences are neither the remission of sin itself nor the remission of eternal punishment due to sin. Indulgences remit only temporal punishments, also called "remnants" or "vestiges" of sin. It is God, through the Church, who remits the temporal punishment. Both the history and the theology of indulgences are complicated. In the NT baptism is described as a new birth, a new creation, a burial and resurrection with Jesus. In Baptism all sin is removed. That Christians who committed certain serious sins after Baptism should undergo a ritual of Reconciliation gradually became normative. After Baptism and Reconciliation, Christians continued to experience both temptation and sin. To resist this call to sin, they prayed and performed penitential works. They also prayed and fasted for each other. These prayers and fastings were seen as helpful because of their connection to Christ. The Christian belief in the abundance of God's forgiving love through Jesus and the unity of all Christians in a communion of saints forms the major foundation of the theology of indulgences. When tariff penance began to establish itself in the Western Church from the ninth century onward, various penances that a person would find difficult to fulfill were commuted, e.g., into a specified number of prayers or a specified amount of alms. This gave rise to a mathematizing of Penance: e.g., a set number of fast days equalled a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. With the beginning of the Crusades under Urban II (1088–99), indulgences became both popular and monetary. Christians, unable to take part in the Crusades personally, could share in the merits of the Crusades by almsgiving. Those who personally took part in the Crusades received a plenary indulgence at the moment of death, i.e., all the temporal punishment still due to their forgiven sins was declared remitted. The bull of Clement VI (1343) mentions a "treasury of merits," which Church authority dispenses. Luther strongly objected to the connection of indulgences to the merits of saints and to the merits of Jesus Christ. In Luther's view, indulgences were good works, denying two fundamental theological issues: the absolute gratuity of God's grace and the full efficacy of Jesus' redemptive act. In its response to Luther, the Council of Trent (1545–63) defended indulgences on the basis of Church tradition (D 1835). Theologically, Trent used Matt 16:19 and 18:18 as the scriptural proof. At Vatican II (1962–65) a reformulation of both the theology and practice of indulgences was requested. Paul VI wrote a response, Indulgentiarum Doctrina (AAS 59, 1967, nn. 5–24), in which he tried to avoid any commercial overtones, substituted the term "treasury of satisfactions" for "treasury of merits," marginalized indulgences as they relate to Christian spirituality, stated that plenary indulgences are connected with one's deliberate rejection of all sin, even venial, and made the use or nonuse of indulgences completely voluntary. See also merit; purgatory; sin. KENAN B. OSBORNE indult, permission given by the Holy See for nonobservance of a requirement of canon law. Such a permission might be by way of dispensation (relaxation of the law in a given instance), privilege (a favor granted to certain a person, physical or juridical), or faculty (capacity to perform certain acts). An indult may be given for a specified period of time or in perpetuity. See also dispensation; faculties, canonical.

Ineffabilis Deus (in-ef-ahb'i-lis day'oos; Lat., "The Ineffable God"), the constitution of Pope Pius IX, issued on December 8, 1854, defining the dogma of the Immaculate Conception. See also Immaculate Conception.

inerrancy of Scripture, the common teaching of the Church that the Scripture teaches truth, without error, for the sake of salvation. This doctrine is a corollary of the doctrine of inspiration: "Since everything asserted by the inspired authors or sacred writers must be held to be asserted by the Holy Spirit, it follows that the books of Scripture must be acknowledged as teaching firmly, faithfully and without error that truth [veritatem . . . sine errore] which God wanted put into the sacred writings for the sake of our salvation" (Vatican II, Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, n. 11).

The conciliar teaching, explicitly cited in the Catechism of the Catholic Church (1992), reflects the earlier teaching of Popes Leo XIII (Providentissimus Deus, 1893) and Pius XII (Divino Afflante Spiritu, 1943). Moreover, it identifies the inerrancy of Scripture as a function of the fact that Scripture is the word of God and that by means of the Scriptures truth is taught for the sake of salvation.

Understanding what is meant by "truth put into the sacred writings for the sake of our salvation" is the key to understanding what is meant by the inerrancy of Scripture. Leo XIII had affirmed that "the sacred writers or more truly the Spirit of God, who spoke through them, do not offer a scientific explanation of nature but sometimes describe and treat the facts either in a figurative manner or in the common language of the times" and added that this principle is also applicable to the biblical authors' way of dealing with history.

Echoing his predecessor, Pius XII declared that "no error exists" when the sacred writer "followed sensible appearances" (as Thomas Aquinas put it), or spoke either metaphorically or in the common manner of the day, or when the true sense of a particular passage remains uncertain.

During the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), the Pontifical Biblical Commission's instruction "The Historical Truth of the Gospels" (1964) put the truth and authority of the Gospels in their proper light. The instruction noted that the truth of the Gospels must be understood according to the norms for rational and Catholic hermeneutics and reiterated the fact that "the sacred writers employed the way of thinking and writing which was in vogue among their contemporaries." With regard to the reliability of these Scriptures, the instruction underscored the importance of the various stages of tradition and the fact that the sacred authors occasionally synthesized and/or adapted the traditions within which they were writing.

According to the council fathers, the truth of the Scriptures, which witnesses to the truth of God, is an expression of the "condescension" (as Chrysostom put it) of divine wisdom. The language of Scripture is adapted to "our weak human nature," that is, to our human situation (Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, n. 13). The truth of the Scriptures is consonant with God's truth, that is, with divine fidelity and self-revelation for the sake of the salvation of humankind. See also inspiration of Scripture. RAYMOND COLLINS infallibility, a charism (or gift of the Spirit) that ensures "immunity from error" in the Church's definitive teachings on matters of faith and morals. In its fullest sense, infallibility is a divine attribute: only God is infallible, totally immune from error. If infallibility is to be predicated of anyone else, it can only be in a very restricted sense.

Teaching of the First Vatican Council: The constitution Pastor Aeternus of the First Vatican Council (1869–70) described the "infallible magisterium of the Roman Pontiff" in the following words: "when the Roman Pontiff speaks ex cathedra, that is, when ... as the pastor and teacher of all Christians in virtue of his highest apostolic authority he defines a doctrine of faith and morals that must be held by the Universal Church, he is empowered, through the divine assistance promised him in blessed Peter, with that infallibility with which the Divine Redeemer willed to endow his Church."

The first thing to be noted about this definition is that it does not say that "the pope is infallible"; rather, it states that the pope is "empowered" with the infallibility that Christ conferred on his Church. Thus, in teaching with infallibility, the pope exercises a power that essentially belongs to the Church and that he utilizes on behalf of the Church. Second, the council did not define what "infallibility" is, but only the way in which the pope is to exercise it. Third, while the council states that the pope can exercise infallibility, it does not exclude the possibility that others can also use this power along with the pope (see below). Fourth, an exercise of infallibility is a use of the highest authority the pope possesses; thus, he is speaking in his official capacity as "the pastor and teacher of all Christians," not as an individual theologian. Fifth, "a doctrine of faith and morals that must be held by the Universal Church" is not simply a matter of ecclesiastical governance or canonical discipline, but a matter directly connected with revelation (though theologians still debate about the nature of this connection). Sixth, the pope is able to exercise infallibility not because of his personal intellectual abilities or theological knowledge, but because of the "divine assistance" promised by Christ to Peter and his Church. Finally, the council stated that such "definitions of the Roman Pontiff are irreformable of themselves and not from the consent of the Church." This statement was directed against the proponents of Gallicanism, who maintained that papal decisions did not go into effect unless and until they were ratified by the Church.

Teaching of the Second Vatican Council: Lumen Gentium, the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church approved by the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), clarified Vatican I's teaching on infallibility in several important ways. First, Vatican II indicated that the college of bishops, either assembled in council or dispersed throughout the world, could teach infallibly in communion with the pope. In this regard, it is important to note that bishops do not individually exercise infallibility, but only corporately as members of the college of bishops in communion with the pope. Second, Vatican II described the object of infallibility as "co-extensive with the deposit of revelation." Third, while Vatican II indicated that the pope and the bishops must take "every suitable means" to give expression to the message of revelation, "they do not admit any new public revelation as pertaining to the divine deposit of faith." Finally, the council insisted that Catholics should give a "loyal submission of intellect and will" not only to teachings given under the aegis of infallibility, but also to "the authentic teaching authority of the Roman Pontiff, even when he does not speak ex cathedra" (n.25).

Infallibility Debates: Few doctrines have given rise to as much debate as infallibility. At the time of Vatican I, at least one-fifth of the bishops in attendance had misgivings about promulgating the proposed teaching on infallibility. Many of these bishops felt that a definition was unnecessary and would only cause difficulty for Catholics and strain ecumenical relations with other Christians; other bishops felt that a definition was premature, insofar as a clearer theological explanation of the doctrine was needed; a few bishops had serious reservations about the truth of the proposed definition. Although the definition of Vatican I was generally accepted by Roman Catholics (with the exception of a small group that left to form the "Old Catholic Church"), some of the problems about infallibility voiced at Vatican I are still being debated today.

Some aspects of this debate could be resolved by a more careful use of terms. For example, "infallibility," immunity from error, must not be confused with "impeccability," immunity from sin. Thus, "infallibility" does not imply that popes cannot sin. Similarly, infallibility is not "omniscience," knowledge about everything. Thus, the pope and the college of bishops can teach with infallibility only in the very restricted area of revelation. Moreover, the exercise of infallibility is rare; the only generally acknowledged use since the time of Vatican I is the declaration of Mary's Assumption by Pope Pius XII in 1950.

Other aspects of infallibility continue to be the subject of theological debate. For example, since Vatican II, the biblical basis for the pope's exercise of infallibility (in Matt 16:18 and parallel texts) has been widely debated. Theologians also disagree about the "extent" of infallibility. Some feel that many of the Catholic Church's teachings should be considered as definable under infallibility. Many others have warned of the danger of "creeping infallibility" and point to the fact that Vatican II did not exercise infallibility. Still others have questioned how doctrine can develop if the Catholic Church's teaching is considered "irreformable." Such debates are likely to continue in the future. In any case, the doctrine of infallibility is much too complicated to be summarized in the simple sentence "The pope is infallible." See also magisterium.

Bibliography

Cwiekowski, Frederick J. The English Bishops and the First Vatican Council. Louvain: Publications Universitaires, 1971.

Empie, Paul C., T. Austin Murphy, and Joseph A. Burgess, eds. Teaching Authority and Infallibility in the Church. Lutherans and Catholics in Dialogue VI. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1978.

Hennesey, James. The First Council of the Vatican: The American Experience. New York: Herder and Herder, 1963.

O'Gara, Margaret. Triumph in Defeat: Infallibility, Vatican I, and the French Minority Bishops. Washington, DC: The Catholic University of America Press, 1988.

Sullivan, Francis A. Magisterium: Teaching Authority in the Catholic Church. New York and Ramsey, NJ: Paulist Press, 1983.

JOHN T. FORD

infancy Gospels, popular accounts of the "hidden years" of Jesus and his family. The most important of this popular Christian genre are the Infancy Gospel of Thomas and the Infancy Gospel of James. The first dates from the second century and survives in numerous languages. It portrays Jesus as a precocious miracle worker from ages two through twelve. The Infancy Gospel of James, or Protevangelium Jacobi, also composed in the second century, tells of the childhood of Mary and of Jesus' miraculous birth. These two works served as the basis for the eighth-century Gospel of Pseudo-Matthew, a Latin work influential throughout the Middle Ages. An Arabic infancy Gospel, dependent on the Infancy Gospel of Thomas, was known to Muhammed. An Armenian infancy Gospel expands on the Protevangelium Jacobi. Numerous other derivatives were composed during the Middle Ages and afterward. See also gospel.

infant baptism, the baptism of children before the age of reason. In both the East and the West this practice is traditional. The Apostolic Tradition (ca. 220) directs that children should be baptized before the adults. Those who can speak should do so for themselves, otherwise the parents or someone else should speak for them. Cyprian of Carthage (ca. 250) insisted that no one born should be deprived of God's grace.

Historical Development: During the fourth century the practice of baptising infants declined. Baptism of both adults and children was postponed because of apprehension about future sins and the fear of public penance. At that time the sacrament of Penance was received only once in a lifetime. Since Baptism forgives all sins, some delayed it for as long as possible. The Church Fathers expressed concern about this practice because Baptism is necessary for salvation.

The baptism of an infant with water and the words, "I baptize you in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit."

In response to Pelagianism, which was understood as denying original sin and making Baptism unnecessary, the Council of Carthage (418) emphatically stated that newborn infants should be baptized. The council taught that babies who are unable to commit any sin personally are nonetheless to be baptized for the forgiveness of sins.

The Council of Vienne (1312) taught that Baptism granted to infants both grace and the virtues. The Council of Florence (1442) wanted infants to be baptized quam primum commode (Lat., "as soon as is convenient").

The Reformation surfaced conflicting views on the practice. The Anabaptists denounced Luther's retention of infant baptism and rebaptized adults who had been baptized in infancy. Calvin's predestinatinarian view made the question of infant baptism moot. The Council of Trent (1545–63) reiterated the teaching of the Council of Carthage.

Vatican II to Today: Vatican II (Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy) requested a revision of the rite, resulting in the Rite of Baptism for Children (1969). An instruction issued by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith (1980) provided two principles: (1) Baptism, which is necessary for salvation, is the sign and means of God's prevenient love, which frees us from original sin and communicates to us a share in the divine life. The gift of these blessings to infants must not be delayed. (2) Assurances must be given that the gift thus granted can grow by an authentic education in the faith and Christian life in order to fulfill the meaning of the sacrament. As a rule, these assurances are to be given by the parents or close relatives, although various substitutes are possible within the Christian community. But if these assurances are not really serious, there can be grounds for delaying the sacrament; if they are nonexistent, the sacrament should be refused.

Infant baptism presumes continued sharing of the experience of faith and ongoing religious education. Aware that the infant believes through the faith of the Church, the Rite of Baptism highlights the role of parents and godparents. The local community is challenged to hand on and nourish the faith it has received from the apostles.

In the Rite of Baptism for Children, a ritual is provided in case of danger of death. It is sufficient in the absence of the ordinary minister to baptize with water: "[Name] I baptize you in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit." The parish priest should be notified and, if the infant survives, the Rite of Bringing a Baptized Child to the Church should be celebrated. See also Baptism.

ANTHONY SHERMAN

infidel (Lat., infidelis, "unfaithful"), in the literal sense, a person who does not have faith in God's revelation. Traditionally, a distinction is made between positive infidels, those who have formally refused the Christian faith when it was sufficiently presented to them, and negative infidels, those who have never been introduced to or adequately taught about God's revelation and, therefore, do not have explicit Christian faith because of ignorance. It is possible, therefore, that negative infidels possess implicit belief in divine revelation. Strictly speaking, infidels are not atheists, since atheists deliberately deny all forms of belief in God. In the Middle Ages the term was used in a broader sense, applying at times to Jews, Muslims, and "pagans." See also salvation outside the Church.

infinity of God, one of the metaphysical attributes of God, signifying that God is without end, limit, termination, or determinant. It means that God is superior to all created, finite things. The idea of God's infinity first became important during the thirteenth century with Thomas Aquinas and Bonaventure. In addition to describing the divine essence, infinity is a property that applies to all other attributes. For example, divine knowledge is omniscient; divine power is omnipotent. The attribute of infinity has also been used as a basis for God's incomprehensibility, which has meant that theological discourse about God is incapable of circumscribing God. See also God.

infused knowledge, a knowledge given to a human or angelic consciousness directly and immediately by God. This knowledge may include ideas, concepts, words, feelings, or intuitions that do not come from empirical experience or intellectual deduction from sense data.

The topic arises in relation to the knowledge of Jesus Christ. Passages in the Gospels implied that Jesus had a special inner knowledge (e.g., Luke 2:46–52). Medieval theology (Alexander of Hales) posited three kinds of knowledge in Jesus: (1) human empirical knowledge acquired through the senses; (2) a beatific knowledge which overflowed from the incarnate presence of the Logos in the human mind of Jesus of Nazareth; (3) infused knowledge, that is, intelligible forms impressed directly upon Jesus' consciousness by God. Whether others, such as the prophets, inspired biblical writers, Mary, Joseph, visionaries, or saints, also had infused knowledge has been a matter of speculation over the centuries. The Church has not taught definitively on the subject, and Catholics are free to take whatever position they find persuasive. See also angel; Jesus Christ.

infused virtue. See virtue, infused.

infusion. See affusion.

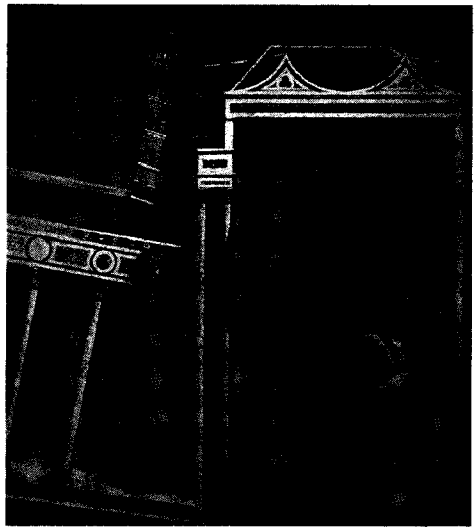
In Hoc Signo Vinces (ihn hawk seen'yoh vihn' chez; Lat., "You will conquer in this sign"), a message to the Emperor Constantine from Christ and the reported cause of his conversion to Christianity in 312. Christ told him in a dream to paint the Chi-Rho symbol (the first two letters in Greek of "Christ") on his soldiers' shields to ensure victory in battle. After winning the Battle at the Milvian Bridge, the emperor is thought to have converted. See also Constantine the Great.

initiation. See Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults.

Innocent I, St., d. 417, pope from 401 to 417 and staunch defender of the prerogatives of the Apostolic See in matters of doctrine and Church discipline. When John Chrysostom appealed for Innocent's intervention against Theophilus, patriarch of Alexandria, Innocent supported him, breaking communion with Alexandria and Antioch. He also supported the African bishops' condemnation of Pelagianism (417), succeeded in separating eastern Illyricum from the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of Constantinople, and played an important role in securing an imperial decree against Donatism in 404. His letters provide evidence for the sacrament of Anointing and for the separation of Confirmation from Baptism. Feast day: July 28. See also Anointing of the Sick; Chrysostom, St. John; Confirmation; Donatism; Pelagianism.

Innocent III [Lotario di Segni], 1160–1216, pope from 1198 to 1216. Lotario studied theology and law under the greatest scholars of his day. In 1190 his uncle, Clement III, made him a cardinal and in 1198 at age thirty-seven he was elected pope. His reign is considered the summit of the medieval papacy. By dint of his personality, intellect, and diplomatic skill, Innocent was able to match theories of papal power with concrete and extensive application. For him the papacy was based on moral, not temporal, authority and his pastoral office required him to champion the cause of Christ whenever required. Insisting on the title Vicar of Christ, Innocent unhesitatingly intervened in the affairs of sovereigns for moral reasons. He forced Philip of France to take back his wife and put England under interdict when King John refused to accept the papal appointment to the archbishopric of Canterbury. Innocent extended papal authority to Scandinavia, Spain, the Balkans, Cyprus, and Armenia, but his highest achievements were in Church reform. He summoned the greatest reform council of the Middle Ages, Lateran IV (1215). Innocent endorsed the early constitutions of Dominicans and Franciscans and supported Cistercian evangelization in Russia. He strengthened papal authority over episcopal in the extensive use of legates and reserved certain cases for his own tribunal. He attempted to use means such as these to combat heresy but reluctantly summoned a crusade against the Albigensians in southern France in 1209. See also Albigensians; Crusades; Lateran councils; papacy, the; Vicar of Christ.



Pope Innocent III, one of the greatest of the medieval popes, depicted here (with Francis of Assisi, whose new order he approved) asleep and dreaming; fourteenth-century painting by Giotto, Basilica of St. Francis, Assisi, Italy.

Innocent IV [Sinibaldo Fieschi], d. 1254, pope from 1243 to 1254. A Genoan nobleman and a brilliant canonist, he was elected pope following an eighteen-month vacancy. The major challenges of his pontificate include the continued reform of the Church, the Crusades, the Mongol invasion of Hungary, and especially the conflict with the Hohenstaufen emperor Frederick II. Innocent formally deposed Frederick at the First Council of Lyons (1245), which he convoked to reform the Church and which finally resolved the conflict with the empire. Even after Frederick's death in 1250 the papacy struggled haplessly for political stability in Italy. In 1252 Innocent approved the use of torture by the Inquisition. See also Inquisition; Lyons I, Council of.

Innocent V, Bl. [Peter of Tarentaise], ca. 1224–76, pope from January 21 to June 22, 1276. As a Dominican professor of theology, he published a widely used commentary on the Sentences of Peter Lombard dependent on that of his teacher Thomas Aquinas. As cardinal-bishop of Ostia (1273), he took part in negotiations to end the schism with the Eastern Church at the Second Council of Lyons (1274). Feast day: June 22. See also Lyons II, Council of; Sentences.

Innocent X [Giovanni Battista Pamphili], 1572–1655, pope from 1644 to 1655. He opposed the religious toleration provided in the Treaty of Westphalia (1648), sought to unite the Catholics of Ireland against the English, and in 1653 condemned five articles drawn from Cornelius Jansen's Augustinus. See also Jansenism.

Innocent XI, Bl. [Benedetto Odescalchi], 1611–89, pope from 1676 to 1689. He condemned the four Gallican Articles (1682), approved by the French clergy asserting their rights and privileges while limiting those of the pope, and the doctrines of Miguel de Molines (1687), urged frequent Communion and confession (1679), and devoted himself to resisting the Turkish advance into Europe. He was beatified in 1956. Feast day: August 12. See also Gallicanism.

inopportunists, the party at Vatican Council I (1869–70) who regarded the definition of papal infallibility unwise, not because they disbelieved the doctrine but because they regarded its timing as "inopportune." The term describes the position of most of the bishops who opposed the definition, with Bishop Dupanloup of Orléans as their head. Rather than vote against the doctrine when it was brought to a final vote, most of the inopportunists absented themselves. See also infallibility; Vatican Council I.

Inquisition, a now defunct institution in Catholicism for the eradication and punishment of heresy. The Fourth Lateran Council (1215) called for secular authorities to help in the eradication of heresy. In 1231 Pope Gregory IX issued a papal bull, Excommunicamus, establishing procedures for identifying heretics in various parts of Europe. At first, largely under the direction of Franciscans and Dominicans, traveling tribunals went into Germany, France, and Italy to examine those suspected of formal heresy. Punishment for such crimes ranged from public penances to imprisonment and, for those who were obdurate, the death penalty carried out by secular authorities. In 1252 Pope Innocent IV permitted torture to be used in the seeking out of the truth. These traveling tribunals met everything from compliance to resistance as they carried out their investigations. By the fourteenth century, the tribunals had lost most of their vigor.

The so-called Spanish Inquisition was a creation of the Spanish monarchs Ferdinand and Isabella in 1479. The aim of this highly centralized office was to seek out heretics and to ferret out converted Jews (Sp., Marranos) and Muslims (Moriscos) who still covertly practiced their own religion. The Spanish Inquisition was most vigorous in the late sixteenth century but as an institution it lasted in Spain until 1834, when it was abolished by monarchical decree.

The Roman Inquisition was established as a papal congregation by Pope Paul III in 1542 as part of the Church's response to the Protestant Reformation. It was the final tribunal of the Church dealing with matters of heresy. It also examined and proscribed heretical books through a list (the Index of Forbidden Books) of books that Catholics could not read without special permission.

The record of imprisonment, torture, and execution connected with the Inquisition has been a blot on the history of the Church. Its most famous victim was the Italian astronomer and mathematician Galileo (d. 1642). Despite attempts by some historians to put the phenomenon into larger historical perspective, the popular picture of the Inquisition as despotic, narrow, and cruel has persisted in the popular imagination to the extent that the very word "inquisitorial" has an ominous ring to it.

The Roman Congregation of the Inquisition was active until modern times. In 1966, after the Second Vatican Council, the Index of Forbidden Books was abolished (it is no longer stipulated in the new Code of Canon Law promulgated in 1983), and the congregation was renamed by Pope Paul VI in 1965 the inscriptions, early Christian, writings, carvings, engravings, etc., usually in cemeteries or churches, that were very common from the fourth century on but are also well attested in the third century and perhaps as early as the first. Mostly in Latin or Greek, they are important evidence for the character and spread of early Christianity. Inscriptions are considered Christian if their content is obviously Christian or if they use symbols typically Christian, such as the anchor, Alpha and Omega, Chi-Rho monogram, palm branches, victor's crown, etc. Christian epitaphs commonly evince hope in the resurrection, but the occupation of the deceased and date of death are rarely mentioned until well into the fourth century. See also anchor-cross.

Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith (CDF) as part of the papal reorganization of the Roman Curia. See also Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith; Galileo; heresy. LAWRENCE CUNNINGHAM

I.N.R.I., Christian inscription, often found on crucifixes, that stands for the Latin phrase, "Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews" (Iesus Nazarenus Rex Iudaeorum). According to John's Gospel this was the phrase Pilate had written on Jesus' cross (19:19).

The Chi Rho, the first two letters (x, p) in the Greek word for "Christ," remains a common Christian inscription, especially after the emperor Constantine the Great claimed to have had a vision of the two letters in the sky during his victorious battle against his rival Maxentius at the Milvian Bridge in 312; on a Christian sarcophagus, in the Lateran Museum, Rome.

inspiration of Scripture, the doctrine that ultimately affirms that the Scriptures are "the word of God." The terminology derives from 2 Tim 3:16–17: "All scripture is inspired by God [Gk., theopneustos] and is useful for teaching, for reproof, for correction, and for training in righteousness, so that everyone who belongs to God may be proficient, equipped for every good work." Elsewhere in the NT, Jesus is described as proclaiming that David uttered the psalms (Ps 110:1) by the power of the Holy Spirit (Matt 22:43; Mark 10:36), and 2 Pet 1:21 affirms that "men and women moved by the Holy Spirit spoke from God."

Although the passage from 2 Timothy made explicit reference only to the Scriptures of the OT, the Fathers of the Church, convinced of the unity between the NT and the OT, used similar language to describe the Scriptures of the NT and OT. Clement of Alexandria (d. 215), for example, wrote about the inspired writings (Gk., hai theopneustoi graphai). Some Fathers of the Church spoke about God as the "one author" of Scripture. Their teaching was that God was the source of the writings of both the OT and the NT.

Doctrinal Development: The dogmatic tradition of the Church has been reaffirmed in all the papal encyclicals that deal with the Bible. The tradition was authoritatively summed up in Vatican II's assertion that, "Holy Mother Church, relying on the belief of the apostles, holds that the books of both the Old and New Testaments in their entirety, with all their parts, are sacred and canonical because, having been written under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, they have God as they author and have been handed on as such to the Church herself" (Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, n. 11).

According to the dogmatic tradition, it is the Scriptures themselves that are inspired. Scholastic theology, and especially Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274), interpreted the traditional doctrine of the inspiration of the scriptural text by means of an analogy with the divine inspiration of prophets. Thus Catholic theology, and its expression in various magisterial and conciliar pronouncements, commonly spoke about the "inspired authors" as a way to explain how the scriptural text was inspired.

Under pressure from the Enlightenment and various tendencies to interpret the Scriptures in a merely human fashion, nineteenth-century theologians began to examine the doctrine of inspiration in a more systematic fashion. A common explanation was that God is the principal efficient cause of the Scriptures and that its human authors are the instrumental cause. In some circles, Catholic as well as Protestant, a notion of plenary verbal inspiration seemed compelling, but the theory as generally presented is all too simple, almost implying that God virtually dictated the words of Scripture. The insights provided by modern biblical scholarship as to how the various books of the Bible came to be written demands a far more sophisticated notion of inspiration.

The doctrine implies (1) that the entirety of the canonical Scriptures comes from God in a way distinct from the way that all things have been created by God or that gifted poets can be said to be inspired; (2) that those who actually wrote the Scriptures did so in a truly human fashion; (3) that the Scriptures of the OT and NT are foundational with regard to Israel and the Church; (4) that the Scriptures are inspired in their origin and inspiring in their effect; and (5) that the truth to which the Scriptures attest is given for the salvation of humankind. See also inerrancy of Scripture; Scripture, authority of; Scripture, senses of; sensus plenior. RAYMOND COLLINS installation, the formal initiation into Church office. Canon law specifies that a diocesan bishop show the papal letter of appointment to the diocesan College of Consultors. In a new diocese that lacks consultors, the candidate must present such a letter to the clergy and people present in the cathedral. This action, called in canon law "taking possession of the see," must take place within a specified period of time from the date of appointment. It is fitting that the celebration of the Eucharist be joined to it. Inauguration into other offices is governed by the letter of appointment or by particular law.

Institut Catholique (Fr., "Catholic Institute"), a Catholic institution of higher studies that replaced the theology faculty of the University of Paris abolished in the French Revolution of 1789. The institute, legally established in 1875, was a center of critical historical and theological scholarship that was characterized by some conservative Catholics as Modernist. Its faculty included the Church historian Louis Duchesne (d. 1922) and the biblical scholar Alfred Loisy (d. 1940). More recent faculty members have included Louis Bouyer and Jean Daniélou (d. 1974). In the 1990s the Institut is also a center for liturgical studies. See also Paris.

institute, religious. See religious institute.

institute, secular. See secular institute.

institution, words of, the words of Jesus at the Last Supper over the bread and wine as used in the celebration of the Eucharist. These words are given with some variations in Matt 16:26–29; Mark 14:22–25; Luke 22:15–20; and 1 Cor 11:23–24 and are understood as Jesus' interpretation of his death. In most of the earliest eucharistic prayers some form of these words are used in the central prayer of blessing and praising God. The actual text of these words in the Mass combines elements from these four sources. See also Eucharist.

instruction, an official explanation concerning the proper implementation of a Church law. Given by the authority competent to oversee matters concerning the law in question, it can neither add to, nor delete from, the law in question; its purpose is explanatory.

instructor, in canon law the tribunal official whose responsibility it is to collect the proofs of a case and present them to the judge. See also tribunal.

instruments, tradition of the, the rite in ordinations during which the bishop hands to the newly ordained some symbol of the office he will exercise. In 1947 Pope Pius XII settled the centuries-old controversy as to whether the handing over of the instruments was essential for the validity of the ordination by determining that the imposition of hands and the prayer that follows alone are necessary. See also ordination.

insufflation, ritual gesture of breathing into or upon an individual or object, often associated either with an exorcism or the coming of the Holy Spirit. Used frequently in the early Church, this practice has all but disappeared in modern times except in the blessing of the water at the font during the Easter Vigil and in the consecration of chrism on Holy Thursday. See also blessing; exorcism.

Integralism, a nineteenth- and early-twentieth-century ultraconservative movement in France that opposed ecumenism and modern biblical studies and theology. More broadly, it refers to the attitudes of the Integralists. Pope Leo XIII's encyclical Aeterni Patris (1879) encouraged a more critical form of Catholic scholarship. In response, Integrisme (Fr., "Integralism") developed in France to protect against the possibility of doctrinal deviations in Catholic teaching. This movement secretly investigated and censured scholars whose work it disapproved. After the condemnation of Modernism by Pope Pius X in 1907, Integrisme achieved some organizational permanence as the Sodalitium Pianum (1909), essentially a spy network to monitor and then to discredit theologians, biblical scholars, and even bishops whom it considered dangerous to the faith.

Pope Pius X's successor, Benedict XV, denounced the practices of the Integralists in his first encyclical Ad Beatissimi (1914) and in 1921 suppressed the Sodalitium Pianum permanently.

Although the organized form of Integralism no longer exists, its spirit lives on in those movements that seek to discourage theological inquiry and to suppress and punish those who propose ideas about Catholicism different from their own. See also Pius X, St.; traditionalism, Catholic; Ultramontanism.

intention, moral, act of the will in regard to the end of a moral action. For an act to be moral, and not merely an action that a human does, it must proceed freely from the will. The good, which is the proper object of the will, can be striven for in itself and for the sake of itself or as the reason of the choice of the means. When the will is moved to an end as acquired by the means, it is called the intention of the agent. For Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274), the movement of the will to the end (intention) and its movement to the means (choice) are one and the same thing (Summa Theologiae 1–2.12.4). In the handbooks of moral theology, intention is considered one of the three sources of morality, along with the object and the circumstances of an action, though these terms are understood differently by different authors. If the object or the end of the action considered in itself does not already possess morality, then the intention of the agent can confer morality on the action. However, if the action is viewed as intrinsically evil, no intention can make the action morally right. Thus, one may not do moral evil in order that the good end of the agent result.

intention, sacramental, the desire or will to receive or administer a sacrament that affects the validity of the sacrament. The desire not to receive a sacrament, for example, always makes the latter invalid. The validity of the sacraments of Matrimony, Reconciliation, and Anointing of the Sick depends on the positive intention of the subject to celebrate the sacrament and receive the particular grace it offers. However, this is not the case with infant Baptism and Confirmation. Since faith and incorporation in the Church are understood as pure gifts of God, these sacraments can be validly received before the age of reason and without a specific positive intention. Ministers, provided that they are able to celebrate the sacrament, must at least have a minimal desire of doing what the Church intends in order to celebrate it validly; that is, they must intend to celebrate the religious rite as prescribed by the Church. See also sacrament.

Inter Mirifica (in'tair meer-ee'fee-kah). See Decree on the Instruments of Social Communication.

intercession, an act of prayer in which one seeks the help of God for a special favor. Intercessory prayer relies on the power of God to whom one prays through Jesus Christ to give what one truly needs (Rom 8:34). Intercession also may be made through Mary and the other saints. See also prayer.

intercommunion, sharing in liturgical worship, especially the Eucharist, between Catholic and non-Catholic Christians. Before Vatican II (1962–65), intercommunion was expressly forbidden. The council's Decree on Ecumenism, however, made possible a change in attitude and practice by recognizing first of all that the Catholic Church is in communion, though imperfect, with non-Catholic churches and ecclesial communities and that the liturgical actions of these bodies can be used by the Holy Spirit as sources of grace.

More particularly the decree (cf. n. 8), while cautioning against using intercommunion indiscriminately as a means for reestablishing unity, takes note of two principles. The first is that common worship presupposes unity in faith. The second is that the sacraments are sources of grace. While common worship cannot ordinarily be practiced because of division in doctrine, in some circumstances it is possible and even necessary because it is a means of salvation.

Since Vatican II numerous dialogues on the local, national and international levels between the Catholic Church and other churches and ecclesial communities have revealed much common understanding on a variety of doctrines and issues. This has led to proposals from theologians and ecumenists for the establishment of intercommunion in order to foster the movement toward unity. Some non-Catholic churches and communities have embarked upon intercommunion among themselves.

The Holy See, while recognizing increasing convergence in doctrinal understanding, considers the agreement achieved thus far as insufficient to warrant full intercommunion. However, the 1983 Code of Canon Law does establish some norms for its practice in particular circumstances. Canon 844 permits Catholics who do not have access to a Catholic priest to receive Penance, Eucharist, and Anointing of the Sick "from non-Catholic ministers in whose churches these sacraments are valid." This can be done "whenever necessity requires or genuine spiritual advantage suggests." This permission can most obviously be utilized in relation to the Eastern churches not in union with Rome since the Catholic Church recognizes all of their sacraments to be valid. Occasions for the exercise of this permission could be illness, danger of death, or residence in a region where there are no Catholic priests.

Catholic ministers may also administer Penance, Eucharist, and Anointing of the Sick to members of non-Catholic Eastern churches "if they ask on their own accord . . . and are properly disposed." These sacraments can also be administered to members of other churches who uphold the validity of these sacraments. The Holy See, however, has not identified those churches. But the canon does state that Catholic ministers may administer the sacraments to Christians who do not belong to the Eastern churches or churches similar to them if "they cannot approach a minister of their own community and on their own ask for it." However, they have to share in the Catholic faith regarding these sacraments and be properly disposed.

The canon urges that no general norms be established by a bishop or a bishop's conference without consultation with the non-Catholic church or community affected by the norms. See also ecumenism; Eucharist; sacrament. JOHN J. STRYNKOWSKI interdict, ecclesiastical penalty that prohibits a person from ministerial participation in public worship and from reception of the sacraments and sacramentals. Although the current law views interdict as a penalty to be imposed on persons, the previous law saw it as a penalty that might be inflicted within the boundaries of a place, e.g., a parish. If the interdict has been officially declared or imposed as the result of a juridical proceeding, the interdicted person is to be prevented from engaging in ministerial acts at the celebration of the Eucharist. If this is not possible, the celebration is to cease.

intermediate state, the condition of the human person between death and resurrection of the body. In 1336 Pope Benedict XII solemnly declared (Benedictus Deus) that purified souls during this interval enjoy the Beatific Vision, that those needing purification are purified, and that any dying in mortal sin suffer in hell. See also Beatific Vision; soul.

internal forum, the realm of conscience where God's grace, forgiveness, and peace are experienced. Communications in the internal forum are characterized by complete confidence. Canonists distinguish the internal forum from the "external forum," which is the arena of the Church's public governance, and wherein communications are official and a matter of record.

"Internal forum solutions to irregular marriages" refers to the pastoral reconciliation of those who have experienced the tragedy of divorce and have remarried. The ordinary process of reconciliation of the divorced and remarried is in the external forum. One of the parties to the original marriage petitions for an annulment of the marriage in a Church court. After careful investigation and weighing of evidence, the ecclesiastical judges decide whether or not the first marriage was valid or invalid, and, consequently, whether the petitioner can enter a second union.

When it seems that the original marriage was canonically valid or when it is not possible to obtain a judicial decision on its validity, reconciliation to the sacraments of Penance and Eucharist can be achieved through the internal forum. This is essentially a moral discernment, usually involving a pastoral advisor, based on the state of conscience of those in the second marriage. It is not a canonical process, and it represents an exception to the Code of Canon Law (can. 1085.2).

Internal forum solutions to otherwise insoluble marriage situations are very widely accepted in pastoral practice.

For background and bibliography confer The Jurist 30 (1970) pp. 1–74; 40 (1980) pp. 128–196; and 50 (1990) pp. 573–612. See also conscience; external forum. JAMES CORIDEN

International Commission on English in the Liturgy (ICEL), a body established by the English-speaking hierarchies of the world to supervise translation of Latin liturgical texts into English and to propose English adaptations in accordance with conciliar and postconciliar directives. The initiative was taken by archbishops Grimshaw of Birmingham, England; Hurley of Durban, South Africa; Young of Hobart, Australia; and Hallinan of Atlanta, Georgia, in 1963. ICEL consists of an episcopal board, with representatives from each of the eleven member conferences, which directs and reviews the commission's work; an advisory committee, whose members represent a range of pertinent competencies and national origins, and which supervises and reviews the work of the various working subcommittees; and the subcommittees, which in turn do the actual work of translation, prepare new texts, and plan the layout of liturgical books. Since 1965, ICEL's executive secretariat has been located in Washington, D.C. See also liturgical language.

International Theological Commission, an organization of theologians established by Pope Paul VI in 1969. The First World Synod of Bishops (1967) had suggested the formation of a body "composed of theologians of diverse schools . . . whose duty it will be, acting with all lawful academic freedom, to assist the Holy See, and especially the Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of Faith, in connection with questions of greater importance." Other goals specified by Paul VI included contributions to "ecumenical dialogue" and to "the art of teaching, which is termed kerygmatic, and our ability to proclaim the message of Divine Revelation and human salvation."

The commission is composed of thirty theologians, with statutes definitively approved by Pope John Paul II in 1982. It is not part of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, although its cardinal-prefect presides, appoints the influential general secretary, and influences the choice of topics and the appointment of members. Nearly every year since 1969 its annual week-long meetings and subsequent implementation of decisions reached there have produced documents giving substantive but cautious theses or essays on topics suggested by the pope, the Curia, bishops' synods, or the members themselves.

The commission has been subject to significant criticism: its limited meetings and restricted topics mean that "questions of greater importance" are usually settled by the pope or Curia without the commission's help; appointed members—exclusively male, practically all Western, mostly clerics, two-thirds European, mainly from ecclesiastical institutions—are hardly "theologians of diverse schools"; consensus statements, usually reflecting official Vatican opinions, fail to represent the vitality or richness of the legitimate theological pluralism Paul VI "willingly allowed" in his inaugural address to the commission; the commission has not seriously addressed the ecumenical and pastoral teaching issues Paul VI set as its goals. See also theologian; theology. WALTER PRINCIPE interpretation of canon law. See canon law, interpretation of.

interpretation of Scripture. See Scripture, interpretation of.

interstices, an interval or period of time that must elapse between reception into the diaconate and reception into the presbyterate (six months), and between reception into the ministry of acolyte and reception into the diaconate (six months). The reason for such an interval is to provide the candidate with a suitable period of time in which to exercise the responsibilities given before receiving new responsibilities. See also Holy Orders.

intinction, the practice of dipping consecrated eucharistic bread (leavened or unleavened) into consecrated wine in order to provide the faithful with Communion under both species (bread and wine). The practice, first noted in seventh-century Spain, has been common in the East since the ninth century. It was abandoned in the West when Communion under the species of wine was discontinued. In accord with the liturgical renewal of Vatican Council II, the Sacred Congregation of Rites, on March 7, 1965, restored intinction as one of four methods of providing the faithful with Communion under both forms. See also Communion, Holy; Communion under both kinds.

intrinsic evil. See evil, intrinsic.

Introduction to the Devout Life, a popular guide to the spiritual life by Francis de Sales (d. 1622). The text was developed from letters of spiritual direction given in 1607 to Mme. de Charmoisy, wife of the Duke of Savoy, when she returned to court after a leave of several months. She was anxious not to fall away from the spiritual life recently begun under Francis's direction. The text's ninety-five short chapters provide balanced instructions and meditations to help those living secular lives grow in love of God and others. The Introduction focuses on the purification of motives and the gradual development of virtuous habits. It uses examples from Scripture, the Christian spiritual tradition, and everyday life. Among the topics covered are the need for a guide, reception of the sacraments, annual retreats, spiritual dryness and consolations, poverty of spirit amid wealth, proper behavior at parties, friendship, and instructions for married persons. See also Francis de Sales, St.

introductory rites, those actions and words that initiate a particular liturgical celebration. Thus, the gathering of candidates, sponsors, participants, and liturgical ministers at the church door for the sacraments of initiation (Baptism, Confirmation, Eucharist) and the opening words of greeting and of explaining the purpose of the celebration constitute an introductory rite.

Introit (in'troyt; Lat., "entrance"), entrance prayer consisting of a short antiphon (verse that is said before and after the prayer), a verse from the Psalms, the simple doxology ("Glory be to the Father"), and the repetition of the antiphon. As the first element in the Roman Mass before the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), it was sung as the ministers entered the church. Since the Introit is no longer a part of the Roman Catholic Mass, its place is usually taken by an entrance hymn sung by the entire congregation. See also Great Entrance.

invalidity [canon law], the quality of not being legally recognized. In canon law it is presumed that acts are valid until the contrary is proven; thus, a marriage is presumed valid until proven otherwise. Canon law attaches to certain acts the pain of invalidity if they are not done in a specified manner. See also illiceity [canon law]; liceity [canon law]; validity [canon law].

invention of the cross (Lat., invenire, "to find"), the finding of the True Cross. According to a legend, Helena (d. ca. 330), the mother of Emperor Constantine, found the True Cross of Christ while on pilgrimage in Jerusalem. In 350, Cyril of Jerusalem assured catechumens that the church in Jerusalem possessed the cross. Today, the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem contains a relic of the cross. From the seventh century until 1960 a liturgical commemoration known as the Invention of the Cross was observed on May 3. See also cross, relics of the; Helena, St.

investiture controversy, late-eleventh- and early-twelfth-century debate concerning relations between Church and state. In the early Middle Ages, lay lords frequently chose candidates to fill vacant bishoprics. During the consecration ceremony, the bishop-elect would pay homage to the lay lord and was invested by him with both the lands attached to the bishopric and the episcopal crosier and ring. What lay rulers viewed as a method of ensuring the loyalty of their bishops, Church reformers saw as an undesirable intrusion of secular leaders in religious matters.

In 1075, Pope Gregory VII issued a decree forbidding such lay investitures. This decree was opposed by the German emperor Henry IV, and in the ensuing conflict, Gregory excommunicated Henry and Henry called a council of German bishops to depose Gregory. The excommunication was lifted in 1077 and reinstated in 1080. In 1084, Henry drove Gregory from Rome and placed his own candidate on the papal throne.

The early decades of the twelfth century saw many attempts to end the quarrel between pope and emperor. A compromise was finally reached in 1122 at the Council (or Diet) of Worms between Pope Callistus II and Emperor Henry V: the emperor gave up the power to appoint bishops and to invest with the ring and crosier, while retaining the right to receive the homage of the bishop in exchange for the lands of the bishopric. See also Gregory VII, St.

invincible ignorance, a type of ignorance that cannot be removed even with diligence. Discussions of invincible ignorance are concerned with excusing a person from moral responsibility for performing an action that is objectively morally wrong. Ignorance of this kind does not imply subjective fault because the agent is either not aware of a moral obligation that applies in the situation or is unaware of the circumstances or conditions of the action. If ignorance remains after making every reasonable and prudent effort to discover the moral obligations and circumstances that apply to the action, then the person is inculpably ignorant. Several factors determine if a reasonable effort was made, e.g., the seriousness of the action, the availability of resources to consult, and the ability of the person to understand the circumstances of the act. Because a person cannot will what is unknown, the action that results from invincible ignorance is involuntary and, therefore, sinless. See also ignorance; vincible ignorance.

invitatory, in the Latin breviary, Psalm 95 ("Venite"), used to open the first Canonical Hour of the day (Matins). The Liturgy of the Hours, as reformed by Vatican II, uses the invitatory to open either Lauds or the Office of Readings and permits the use of alternative psalms (24, 67, 100). See also breviary; Liturgy of the Hours; Matins.

in vitro fertilization (IVF), the extracorporeal fertilization of an ovum and its subsequent transfer to the uterus. The first birth of an IVF baby occurred in 1978. Since that time techniques and success rates have improved and many thousands of babies have been born via IVF. Success rates vary, but they have been reported up to 25 percent per cycle of treatment.

Most centers doing IVF stimulate the ovaries with clomiphene citrate, human menopausal gonadotropin, or combinations of these so that multiple eggs are produced. Pregnancy rates rise when more than one preembryo is transferred. IVF involves coincubating sperm and eggs for twelve to eighteen hours to allow fertilization to occur. After an additional forty-eight to seventy-two hours, the preembryo(s) is transferred to the uterine cavity. Implantation should begin in the next two to three days and verification of pregnancy is possible within two weeks after transfer.

There are several medical indications for IVF. A very common one is tubal damage or destruction. Another is pelvic endometriosis that has failed conservative therapy. Anomalies of the uterus or of the reproductive tract are also accepted indications. IVF can be performed with the husband's sperm (homologous IVF) or that of a donor (heterologous IVF).

Church Teaching: The Church's official response to the new reproductive technologies is found in the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith's Instruction on Respect for Human Life in Its Origin and on the Dignity of Procreation (Donum Vitae, 1987). The instruction rejects heterologous IVF as a violation of the unity of marriage and an infringement of the rights of the child by depriving the child of a filial relationship with parental origins. By disrupting familial relationships, it can be a "source of dissension, disorder and injustice in the whole of social life."

The instruction also rejects homologous IVF. It returns to the analysis of Humanae Vitae on contraception, specifically to the "inseparable connection, willed by God and unable to be broken by man on his own initiative, between the two meanings of the conjugal act: the unitive meaning and the procreative meaning." Just as contraception separates these two meanings (pursuing the unitive while blocking the procreative), so in an analogous way IVF separates them (pursuing the procreative without the unitive). The instruction sees this as procreation "deprived of its proper perfection" and not in conformity with the dignity of the spouses.

Many theologians have expressed reservations about the use of third parties in procreative procedures and would very likely support the instruction's rejection of heterologous IVF. The same is not true of homologous IVF. Many would judge this so-called simple case to be morally justifiable as a last resort. They would view procreation "deprived of its proper perfection" as a departure from the ideal, but not as morally wrong. Even more radically, many would question the inseparability of the unitive and procreative as applied to every act.

IVF should not be viewed as an isolated technique. It is part of a multifaceted technology that is constantly evolving and brings into play some basic human values. For that reason it deserves constant public oversight. See also bioethics; reproductive technologies.

RICHARD A. MCCORMICK

Iona, important monastery founded ca. 565 by Columba, Irish abbot and missionary, on the island of Hy, off the west coast of Scotland. It soon became the center for Irish missionary activity in Scotland and northern England, as well as a channel for cultural contacts between Ireland and these areas. See also Columba, St.

irascible appetites. See appetites, concupiscible and irascible.

Ireland, Catholicism in. St. Patrick, a Roman missionary, is traditionally believed to have converted the Irish people to Christianity in the early fifth century (ca. 432). Although Patrick baptized thousands, paganism persisted in parts of Ireland for at least one hundred and fifty years after his death.

Early History: Patrick organized the Church around an episcopal structure, but monasteries became dominant in the decades after his death. Among Ireland's most noteworthy monks were St. Columkille (d. 597) and St. Columbanus (d. 615). From his monastery on the island of Iona, Columkille evangelized the peoples of Scotland and northern England. Columbanus traversed continental Europe, founding houses that became renowned as centers of scholarship.

Monasteries were often under the control of laymen who were descendants of the house's founder. Periodically, efforts were undertaken to reorganize the Irish Church around dioceses and parishes. In response to pressure from Rome and from domestic reformers, a synod was convened in 1111 that divided the island into provinces and dioceses. The naming of St. Malachy as archbishop of Armagh in 1132 and papal legate in 1140 bolstered the reform movement further. In 1152 the Synod of Kells redrew diocesan boundaries: the island was divided into four provinces—Armagh, Dublin, Cashel, and Tuam.

Beginnings of English Authority: In 1155 Pope Adrian IV, an Englishman, issued Laudabiliter, a bull encouraging the English king to subdue Ireland and reform the Church there. The king, Henry II, ignored the pope's recommendation. Twelve years later, an Irish chieftain asked Henry to come to Ireland to help him defeat his rival. Henry refused, but Richard de Clare, a Norman knight nicknamed "Strongbow," came to the chieftain's aid. In 1171 Henry went to Ireland to assert his authority. He confirmed Strongbow and other nobles in their titles in return for their recognition of his lordship over Ireland. The Normans were never able to control the whole island; much of the north and west remained under the control of Gaelic chieftains. The Church developed very differently in the two regions. In the Pale—the Norman-dominated region around Dublin—the reforms that had begun in the previous decades continued. Parishes were established and tithing was encouraged. In the Gaelic areas, the monasteries remained formidable.

In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries the Church's fortunes declined. Bishops and priests became more worldly; monks became more lax; and the laity followed the clergy's lead. There were some signs of renewal as well. The Franciscans reformed themselves in the fifteenth century and established dozens of Observant houses across the island. Observants argued for a return to the spirit of poverty, in opposition to the Conventualists, whom they regarded as lax.

In 1534 Henry VIII broke with Rome and declared himself head of the Church of England. In 1536 the Dublin Parliament recognized Henry as the head of the Church of Ireland. Henry's viceroy persuaded some bishops and noblemen within the Pale to accept the change. Henry's successor, Edward VI, appointed Calvinists to key bishoprics in Ireland, a policy that antagonized many of the Irish. When Mary I took power in 1553, most Irish supported her efforts to reestablish Catholicism. Five years later, Elizabeth I revived the Church of Ireland. For much of her reign Elizabeth contended with rebellions by Irish chieftains such as Hugh O'Neill, who battled the English for nine years before surrendering in 1603.

In 1607 O'Neill and ninety other Ulster nobles fled to the continent fearing imprisonment. James I expropriated their lands and invited thousands of Scottish Presbyterians and English Anglicans to settle there. In 1641 Catholic forces capitalized on the civil war ravaging England and launched another uprising. Much of the fighting occurred in Ulster where angry peasants killed hundreds of Protestant planters. Oliver Cromwell came to Ireland in 1649, laying waste to Drogheda and Wexford. In 1652 he decreed that Catholics would only be allowed to own land in Connaught, the westernmost and least fertile region of Ireland. All priests were ordered to leave Ireland and the Mass was proscribed.

With the Restoration of 1660, persecution of Catholics eased but Cromwell's land settlement was not modified. Irish Catholics' hopes rose when James II, a Catholic convert, succeeded to the throne in 1685. James called for religious toleration and appointed a Catholic viceroy. In 1688 a Protestant coalition invited James' son-in-law, William of Orange, to depose him. James fled to France but then landed in Ireland in a bid to regain the throne. James was routed in the Battle of the Boyne in 1690, and fled again to France.

Oppression and Revival: In the years following, a series of penal laws were enacted against Catholics. Under these statutes, bishops and regular clergy were banished; Catholic laymen were not allowed to vote, hold political office, purchase land, or serve as lawyers or military officers. In the last quarter of the eighteenth century these laws gradually were dismantled. By 1793 all restrictions on Catholics—except the ban on holding office—had been lifted. In 1829 the government dropped that barrier in response to lobbying by Daniel O'Connell's Catholic Association.

In the early years of the nineteenth century the Church experienced a great revival. New churches were erected throughout the island. The number of priests and religious increased dramatically. Maynooth College, established in 1795, offered high caliber training to hundreds of seminarians. Newly established religious communities—the Christian Brothers, the Sisters of Mercy, the Sisters of Charity and others—expanded rapidly and staffed a network of Catholic schools, orphanages, and hospitals.

While the Potato Famine of 1845–49 wrought destruction throughout Ireland, the Church emerged even stronger in its aftermath. After the famine Ireland had a considerably smaller and more affluent population that was more manageable for the Church. The Church was also strengthened by the appointment of Paul Cullen as archbishop of Armagh in 1849. Roman trained, Cullen was an able administrator who improved discipline at all levels of the Church during his thirty-year tenure.

In the 1880s the bishops backed the home rule campaign of Charles Stewart Parnell, a Protestant landlord. The hierarchy withdrew its support from him in 1890 when his affair with Catherine O'Shea became public. Nationalists continued to press for home rule legislation for the next twenty-five years. In 1916 Patrick Pearse led the Easter Rising in Dublin, which failed but paved the way for Irish autonomy. In 1921 the British divided Ireland into two semi-independent states: the six Protestant-dominated counties in Ulster became Northern Ireland, and the twenty-six southern counties became the Irish Free State (the Republic of Ireland after 1948).

Church and State: Because the Free State was overwhelmingly Catholic, its leaders decided to frame much of the state's public policy around Catholic teaching. In 1925 divorce was outlawed and in 1930 a censorship board was established. In 1937 Eamon de Valera drafted a new constitution that was heavily influenced by Catholic moral and social teaching. Although Catholicism was not declared the established religion, the constitution recognized Catholicism's "special position" in Irish society.

Through the 1970s the Church remained a very powerful force in Irish society. Surveys taken in 1971 indicated that 96 percent of Catholics were regular churchgoers. By the 1980s, however, the Church's influence was waning. Mass attendance rates were dropping—especially in the urban areas. In 1985 the government enacted a liberal contraceptive law over the strenuous objections of the bishops. In 1986 it tried unsuccessfully to legalize divorce. While an anti-abortion amendment was added to the constitution in 1983, pressure increased on the government to liberalize the law. See also Celtic spirituality; Maynooth College; Patrick, St.

JOHN F. QUINN

Ireland, John, 1838–1918, archbishop of St. Paul. Born in Ireland, settled in St. Paul, Minnesota Territory, seminary trained in France, he was ordained in 1861. Brief service as chaplain in the Union Army was followed by parochial work in St. Paul, where he was renowned for his eloquence and his civic leadership, especially as a temperance advocate and a sponsor of agricultural colonies for indigent immigrants. First as coadjutor, then bishop, and finally, from 1888, first archbishop of St. Paul, he presided over the vast expansion of Catholicism across the Upper Midwest. Deeply committed to the rapid assimilation of immigrant Catholics into American culture, he was the leader of the "Americanist" party within the hierarchy, favoring a greater spirit of accommodation between Catholic faith and American culture, which involved him in many bitter controversies. The collection of his major addresses, The Church and Modern Society (1904), is the best introduction to his thought. See also Americanism.

Irenaeus of Lyons, one of the greatest bishops and theologians of the early Church, best known for his defense of the faith against the Gnostics and his development of the notion of apostolic succession.

Irenaeus of Lyons, St., ca. 130–ca. 200, bishop of Lyons from ca. 178 to ca. 200. A native of Smyrna who as a youth knew Polycarp, he moved west, probably to Rome, where he may have studied with Justin Martyr. Later at Lyons, he served as official representative of that church to Pope Eleutherius, presenting the Letter of the Martyrs of Lyons and urging toleration of the Montanists in Asia Minor (177). He may already have been bishop at this point; if not, he was elected upon his return, successor to the martyred Pothinus. The last historical act attributable to Irenaeus is his correspondence with Pope Victor objecting to his treatment of the Quartodecimans of Asia Minor (190). The tradition that he was martyred is late (Gregory of Tours, d. 594).

Irenaeus is a great watershed in the history of theology, the first to provide a coherent rationale for a Christian Bible including both OT and NT and the first to offer a comprehensive account of Christian belief in God's universal providential and redemptive economy. He is the first great spokesman of the Great Church, the emerging orthodox consensus among churches as far away as Nisibis and Rome, Carthage and Alexandria. His most famous work, Against Heresies, is an anti-Gnostic treatise in five books, fully preserved apart from Greek fragments only in a Latin translation (Books 4 and 5 are also in Armenian). Irenaeus teaches that there is no secret doctrine apart from the rule of faith, publicly handed down and guaranteed by the continuous succession of bishops. Against Gnostic depreciation of the material order, he teaches that Christ, as the Incarnation of God's Word and in the Resurrection as the perfection of the Spirit's work, "recapitulates" God's loving intentions in creating the world, revealing its destiny and providing the "first fruits" of that destiny. Against Gnostic separation of the (evil) Creator God of the Jews from the Father of Jesus, Irenaeus teaches a doctrine of growth and development, of God's progressive teaching in a plan desired to bring humanity to its fullest maturity and freedom in Christ, the Second Adam. Feast day: June 28. See also apostolic succession; Gnosticism; recapitulation.

JOHN C. CAVADINI

irenicism (i-ren'i-siz-uhm; Gk., irene, "peace"), conciliatory methods of healing Church differences as opposed to polemics or argument. Pope Pius XII, in the encyclical Humani Generis (1950), warned against a "false irenicism" that would smooth over doctrinal differences among churches as a means of achieving unity or harmony. See also ecumenism.

Irish spirituality. See Celtic spirituality.

Irish tariff penance, a form of forgiveness of sin, originating in Irish monasticism probably in the sixth century, in which a specific penance was assigned for each sin and its frequency, probably followed by absolution. It is not certain that absolution followed, because this form of penance differed from canonical penance, i.e., the penance conferred within the sacrament of Penance (Reconciliation). The Irish tariff penance was based on contemporary Irish monastic practice in which monks would discuss their spiritual life and its failings with another monk or with the abbot, who would in turn suggest a penance and then pray that God might forgive the sins. The practice was extended to laypeople through the monks who offered them spiritual direction. Many scholars conclude that the modern practice of auricular confession (confession of sins to a priest in private) derives from this development.

The term "tariff" is derived from the schedule of penances applied to each sin that was listed in the penitential books developed to assist the monks in assigning appropriate penances. See also confession, auricular.

irregularity, in canon law a permanent impediment or legal obstacle either to the reception of Holy Orders or to the exercise of Holy Orders already received. The dispensation from many irregularities is reserved to the Holy See, although some can be dispensed by the person's bishop or religious superior.

Isaac, Israelite patriarch, son of Abraham and Sarah. The name in Hebrew means "he laughs." Gen 21–27 tells of his birth, his brother Ishmael, God's demand that he be sacrificed, his wife Rebekah, and his sons Jacob and Esau. The NT highlights his special birth (Gal 4:28) and his binding for sacrifice (Heb 11:17–20). See also patriarch [biblical].

Isaac Jogues, St. See Jogues, St. Isaac.

Isabella of Castile, 1451–1504, queen of Spain from 1474 who, with her husband Ferdinand of Aragon, created a unified Catholic Spain. The last Muslim state fell in 1492. In that same year all Jews were required to convert or emigrate. The Muslims were placed under the same requirement in 1502. Isabella was deeply religious and drove the reform of the Spanish church under Ximénez de Cisneros, employing the Spanish Inquisition as an important weapon for political and religious unity. Isabella personally commissioned Columbus and was committed to the conquest and evangelization of the New World. Her zeal and accompanying intolerance have made attempts at canonization in the 1990s controversial. See also Inquisition; Spain, Catholicism in.

Isidore of Kiev, ca. 1385–1464, Greek-born Orthodox metropolitan of Kiev and All Rus' and an active proponent of the Union of the Orthodox and Catholic churches at the Council of Florence. Born in Monemvasia in the Peloponnesus, Isidore became a monk there, then abbot, and in 1434 was sent by Byzantine emperor John VIII to the Council of Basel to arrange for a union council. In 1436 he was ordained Metropolitan of Kiev and All Rus', and thus head of the Orthodox Church in Kievan Rus' and Muscovy (the Moscow patriarchate was created in 1589). He arrived in Moscow in 1437, only to leave for the Council of Ferrara-Florence, where he arrived in 1438 and became one of the six official Greek Orthodox spokesmen at the council. He signed the Decree of Union in 1439 and never retracted. Created a cardinal that same year, he returned to Kiev and Moscow, where he proclaimed the Union in 1441. But the Union was ultimately rejected in Rus' and Muscovy, and Isidore was imprisoned. He escaped and returned to Italy, where he subsequently held many high offices in the Catholic Church. Sent as papal legate to Constantinople, Isidore proclaimed the union there on December 12, 1452, fought and was wounded in the siege of the city, and was taken prisoner at its fall on May 29, 1453. He escaped to Rome where he died, still faithful to the Union of Florence, in 1464. See also Florence, Council of.

Isidore of Seville, St., ca. 560–636, encyclopedist, historian, archbishop of Seville (ca. 600–36), and Doctor of the Church. His life spans the transition of the Visigothic kingdom of Spain from an Arian to a Catholic kingdom (589), and his life and work were dedicated to the diffusion of a uniform and literate Catholicism throughout the realm. His presidency over the Fourth Council of Toledo (633) enabled it to serve as the basis for the characteristic and uniquely Visigothic symbiosis between episcopacy and monarchy. Isidore was the most learned person of his age, a crucial link between the learning of antiquity and the Middle Ages. His Etymologies is an encyclopedia of received knowledge on all subjects, including theology. His Chronica Majora and History of the Kings of the Goths, Vandals, and Sueves are indispensable sources for the history of Spain, and his Three Books of Sentences are an influential synthesis of Augustinian and Gregorian teaching. The De Ecclesiasticis Officiis is a crucial source for the Mozarabic liturgy and the customs of the Visigothic church. Feast day: April 4. See also Fathers of the Church; Spain, Catholicism in.

Isidore the Farmer, St., 1070–1130, Spanish saint. A simple married peasant who worked his entire life for a wealthy landowner, he was known for his piety, love of the poor, and the care of animals. Feast day: May 15.

Islam, one of the three great religions of the West, with historical connections both to Judaism and Christianity. Founded in the Arabian peninsula by the Prophet Muhammad (A.D. 570–632), who received direct revelations from God over a period of twenty years and codified these revelations in the Qur'an, the holy scriptures of the religion, Islam is unremittingly monotheistic. The word "Islam" means "submission" to God.

Elements of Islamic Faith: Islam rests on five "pillars": (1) The confession of faith: "There is no God but God and Muhammad is the messenger of God"; (2) The obligation to pray five times a day (Friday noon prayers are communal); (3) A tithe of wealth for the poor; (4) A rigorous fast (from food and drink and abstinence from sex from sunup to sundown) once a year during the ninth month of the calendar (Arab., Ramadan); (5) A pilgrimage (called the Hajj) to Mecca once in the lifetime of a pious Muslim.

Although there is no formally established clergy in Islam, there is a class (the ulama) of religious scholars and recognized leaders in a given community (the mullahs). The main task of the religious scholar is to comment on and interpret the legal tradition (Shariah) of Islam for the faithful.

Disputes over the succession to the Prophet caused a split in Islam, which resulted in two main groups of Muslims: Sunni (who in the 1990s account for over 80 percent of Muslims) and Shi'ites. There is also a lively, but relatively small, mystical tradition whose followers are known as Sufis.

The rise of Islam in the seventh century, fueled by its assertive missionary attitude, saw its ascendency both into the Middle East and into Europe and the Far East. In the 1990s it is the second largest religion in the world (after Christianity), with more than 900 million adherents. Current demographics tend to show Islam as overtaking Jews numerically in the United States early in the twenty-first century. Muslims also make up significant minorities in some Western countries (largely through immigration), such as France and Italy.

Islam's largest struggle is to reconcile Islamic thought with the rise of modernity. Sharp divisions exist between those who wish for a total Islamic society and those who try to accommodate their faith with the rise of modern industrial and capitalistic societies.

Catholic-Islamic Relations Today: Until the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) relations between Islam and the Catholic Church were marked by mutual hostility. From Islam's origin in the sixth century and lasting in various places until the fifteenth century (with the capture of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453), there were Muslim invasions of the Holy Land (including the Holy Sepulchre), Central Europe, Italy, Spain, and North Africa. These provoked various Christian efforts at resistance and expulsion, principally through the Crusades (1095–1291), which, in turn, generated profound anti-Western and anti-Christian sentiments in the East.

Vatican II, however, acknowledged that Muslims "are related in various ways to the People of God." Indeed, Muslims hold "first place" among those who "acknowledge the Creator." They profess "the faith of Abraham" and along with Catholics "adore the one and merciful God" (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, 1964, n. 16). Moreover, God looks upon Muslims "with esteem." Although they do not recognize Jesus as divine, they revere him as a prophet and they honor Mary, his mother, as well. Muslims are also people who "prize the moral life, and give worship to God especially through prayer, almsgiving, and fasting." The council urged both sides to forget the past and to "strive sincerely for mutual understanding," making "common cause for safeguarding and fostering social justice, moral values, peace and freedom" (Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions, 1965, n. 3).

Since the council the Catholic Church has established the Pontifical Council for Inter-Religious Dialogue (originally called the Secretariat for Non-Christians when established in 1964 by Pope Paul VI). Attached to the Pontifical Council is the Commission on Religious Relations with Muslims, established in 1974. A Vatican-sponsored meeting of Christians and Muslims was held in Tripoli, Libya, in 1976, and another interfaith assembly involving Catholics and Muslims met in Assisi, Italy, in 1988 with Pope John Paul II in attendance. Various religious orders such as the Franciscans and Missionaries of Africa have also fostered contacts with Muslims in Africa and other parts of the Muslim world.

See also Crusades; Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions.

LAWRENCE CUNNINGHAM

Israel, collective name of twelve tribes, descendants of Jacob. The first datable occurrence of the name "Israel" occurs on a stele erected by Pharaoh Merneptah in the late thirteenth century B.C. that commemorates the defeat of several cities and a people called Israel ("Israel is laid waste, his seed is not"). This has been taken as proof that Israelites had begun to settle in the land by that time. The biblical name for this people is "sons of Israel." i.e., Israelites, members of a group claiming descent from an ancestor called Israel. This is the name bestowed on Jacob after his struggle with a supernatural being at the Jabbok ford (Gen 32:22–32; cf. 35:9–10). The name is here connected with the idea of struggle or strife (Gen 32:28), but the real etymology remains obscure. The original settlement area of the Israelites was the central hill country around Bethel and Shechem. After the death of Solomon the name was used of the Northern Kingdom, distinct from the Davidic kingdom of Judah. The ideal of a united people organized as a twelve-tribal entity persisted, and the term is often used in this sense, e.g., in Psalms and Ezra–Nehemiah. The land itself is rarely called Israel, the more common appellation being the land of Canaan; but in the State of Israel today the designation "land of Israel" ('eres yiśra'ēl) is preferred to Palestine, a name that reflects the Philistine presence from the eleventh century B.C. and was in common use from Roman times. In the NT, "Israel" refers to the Jewish people as a whole (e.g., Luke 1:54; John 1:31; Acts 1:6) or the chosen people inclusive of Christians (e.g., Rom 9:6).

JOSEPH BLENKINSOPP

Italo-Albanian Catholic Church, Catholics of the Byzantine tradition in Calabria and Sicily, Italy.

Southern Italy and Sicily had a strong connection with Greece in antiquity and for many centuries there was a large Greek-speaking population there. In the early centuries of the Christian era, although most of the Christians were of the Byzantine tradition, the area was included in the Roman patriarchate, and a gradual but incomplete process of latinization took place.

During the eighth century, the Byzantine emperor Leo III removed this region from papal jurisdiction and placed it within the patriarchate of Constantinople. There followed a strong revival of the Byzantine tradition in the area. But the Norman conquest of the region in the early eleventh century resulted in its return to the Latin patriarchate. By this time the local Byzantine church was flourishing, and there were hundreds of monasteries along the coasts of southern Italy. The Normans, however, discouraged Byzantine usages in their lands, and the Greek bishops were replaced by Latin ones. This marked the beginning of a process that led to the almost total absorption of the Byzantine faithful into the Latin Church.

This decline was reversed in the fifteenth century with the arrival of two large groups of Albanian immigrants who had fled their country following its conquest by the Turks. Those from the northern part of Albania, where the Latin rite was prevalent, were quickly absorbed into the local population. But those from the Orthodox south of the country remained loyal to their Byzantine traditions. At first they met with little understanding from the local Latin bishops. Although in the sixteenth century popes intervened in favor of the Byzantines—in 1595 an ordaining bishop was appointed for them—the community continued to decline.

The situation began to improve in the eighteenth century. In 1742 Pope Benedict XIV published the bull Etsi Pastoralis, which was intended to buttress the position of the Italo-Albanians in relation to the Latins. It paved the way for more progressive legislation—and recognition of the equality of the Byzantine rite with the Latin—in the next century.

Italo-Albanian seminaries were founded in 1732 in Calabria and in 1734 in Palermo. Seminarians in advanced theological studies in Rome reside at the Greek College.

Today there are two dioceses for the Italo-Albanians of equal rank: the diocese of Lungro (in Calabria) was founded in 1919, has twenty-seven parishes, and has jurisdiction over continental Italy. The diocese of Piana degli Albanesi, founded in 1937, covers all of Sicily and has fifteen parishes. Alongside these two dioceses is the monastery of Santa Maria di Grottaferrata, just a few miles from Rome, which, having been founded in the eleventh century, is the only remnant of the once-flourishing Italo-Greek monastic tradition. Since 1937 the abbot has been a bishop with jurisdiction over the monks of the monastery and local faithful. Total membership of these three jurisdictions in 1993 came to about 62,000. See also Byzantine Italy; Byzantine rite; Eastern churches; Eastern rites.

RONALD G. ROBERSON

Italo-Greek Catholics. See Italo-Albanian Catholic Church.

Italy, Catholicism in. The Catholic religion has profoundly affected Italian culture. The area that comprises the modern state of Italy did not form a political unit until 1870. Nevertheless, the historical development of Catholicism in the Italian peninsula has influenced the direction of the Church while the Church has helped to shape many aspects of modern Italian society, culture, and politics. The overwhelming majority of popes have been Italian and so, too, those who make up the central administration of the Church in the Roman Curia.

From the Origins of Christianity to the Later Middle Ages: Although a small Christian community existed in Rome before the middle of the first century, it was only after the Edict of Constantine in 313, which put an end to the persecution of Christians, that the Church began to grow in Italy. Organized into regional dioceses, the Church assumed a position of leadership among the local populations during the decay of the Roman Empire and the so-called barbarian invasions. Benedict of Nursia founded monasteries at Subiaco and Monte Cassino and developed the Benedictine rule (ca. 529–34) as a guide not only to the spiritual life but also to the economic organization of the monastic communities that proved invaluable in the preservation of learning.

The early Middle Ages in Italy (500–1000) witnessed political struggles between the newly arrived immigrant peoples, especially from Germany, and the Church, which sought to incorporate them within existing structures of governance. Germanic kingdoms in Italy (the Lombards) gave rise to a heretical Arian church alongside the older Catholic organization. Tensions between Rome and the Byzantine emperors came to a head in the eighth century. After the collapse of Byzantine military power in central Italy, the papacy turned to the Franks for protection against the Lombards. In 754 Pope Stephen II solicited the aid of the Frankish King Pepin III, entrusting him with the task of defending Rome and with taking back from the Lombards the exarchate of Ravenna. After defeating the Lombards, Pepin gave the territory of Ravenna to the Church thus creating the Papal States, whose control by Rome also stems from the forged Donation of Constantine. Pepin's son Charlemagne conquered the Lombards and was crowned Roman emperor by Pope Leo III in 800. While this move liberated the papacy from Byzantine control, for the next five centuries Italy would be marked by conflict between the papacy and the emperors who succeeded Charlemagne as heirs to what later became known as the Holy Roman Empire.

The eleventh and twelfth centuries witnessed the growth of various heresies in Italy along with numerous evangelical movements. Francis of Assisi (1182–1226) led a spiritual revolution that was to have profound effects on the development of Christianity and on Italian culture. New mendicant, or preaching, orders such as the Franciscans and the Dominicans ministered to the urban communities and combated heretical teachings. Dante Alighieri (1265–1321) wrote the Divine Comedy, which expresses the truths, sentiments, and beauty of Catholicism along with presenting a scathing attack on ecclesiastical abuses. Due to the anarchical conditions prevailing in Italy, the popes took up residence at Avignon in France from 1309 to 1378.

From the Renaissance to the Unification of Italy. From the mid-fourteenth until the mid-sixteenth centuries, the Middle Ages gave way to the Italian Renaissance. In the mid-fourteenth century, the fear caused by the Black Death sparked a revival of religious feeling that is reflected in the art and literature of the period. The Florentine humanists of the fifteenth century centered at the court of the Medicis developed Neoplatonism, a philosophy indebted to Christianity. The Renaissance popes were active patrons of the great artists of the period (Michelangelo, Raphael) and exercised temporal power over much of central Italy. The French invasion in 1494 took advantage of Italian political disunity and led to several centuries of warfare among the French, Austrian, and Spanish monarchies for control of the Italian peninsula. The Council of Trent (1545–63), called to respond to the challenge of the Protestant Reformation, stifled the development of Italian art, science, and philosophy and marked the end of the Renaissance in Italy.

In the following centuries Italy remained disunited with large areas under the control of France, Spain, and Austria. The eighteenth century was a difficult period in the life of the Church, which had come under attack for its complicity with the European monarchies and aristocracies. The spirit of the French Enlightenment and eventually the French Revolution spread to Italy and led to the abolition of clerical privileges, the suppression of monasteries, and the seizure of Church property.

The nineteenth century in Italy was marked by the movement for liberty, independence, and national unification known as the Risorgimento. The series of wars that freed the peninsula from foreign domination, together with the political movement toward unity, culminated in the declaration of the unified kingdom of Italy in 1861. Rome became the capital of the new Italian state after it was acquired by the new republic of Italy in 1870. The First Vatican Council (1869–70) asserted papal infallibility in spiritual matters while the loss of Rome and of the Papal States terminated the temporal power of the papacy. The ensuing struggle between the Church and the new Italian state was intense. The popes refused to recognize the legitimacy of the state and urged all Catholics not to participate in Italy's nascent parliamentary democracy. For their part, successive Italian governments worked to further reduce the influence of the Church and tolerated widespread anticlericalism. Despite these difficulties, the period of the Risorgimento also saw the growth of some three hundred new religious congregations in Italy and the birth of the modern Catholic movement.

The Twentieth Century: Fascism (1922–43) suppressed all democratic freedoms but made a historical agreement with the Church and the papacy. The Lateran Treaty of 1929 conceded privileges to the Church in return for its support of the Fascist regime led by Benito Mussolini, whose imperialistic, dictatorial, and racist policies created dissension among the Catholic clergy and laity. After Mussolini's downfall (1943) many Catholics took part in the Resistance movement and after the war joined the Italian Christian Democratic Party, which dominated Italian politics from 1948 until 1993, when widespread corruption undermined its political influence. Italy became a Republic in 1946 and its new constitution stipulated that Church-state relations would continue to be regulated by the Lateran Treaty—although this was later redefined in 1985. Catholicism was no longer to be the official religion of Italy, there was to be no more mandatory religious instruction in government schools, and the clergy were no longer to be paid by the Italian government.

Pope John XXIII revitalized the Church through the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) and brought it into line with the momentous changes affecting modern life. His encyclicals Mater et Magistra ("Mother and Teacher," 1961) and Pacem in Terris ("Peace on Earth," 1963) address social justice, global interdependence, and the scourge of modern warfare. Despite a decline in participation in Catholic religious life, Catholicism remains a vital force in Italy today. Its contributions to Italian society can be seen in the development of Christian base communities, in the popularity of Catholic youth groups, in the health of the Catholic press and media, in Catholic education, and in the continuing, although increasingly critical, respect for the moral authority of the pope and for Catholic social teaching.

There are 1 patriarchate (in Venice), 58 archdioceses, and 158 dioceses in Italy. Catholics constitute almost 98 percent of a population of nearly 58 million. See also Byzantine Italy; Lateran Treaty; Papal States; Renaissance; Rome; Vatican City State.

JOHN P. WELLE

Ite, missa est (ee'teh, mee'sah est; Lat., "Go, this is the dismissal"), the formula that concluded the Roman Mass for centuries. It took its name from the Latin missa (variant of missio, "dismissal"). English translations of the Roman Missal (1970) provide several dismissal formulas. The most commonly used is, "The Mass is ended, go in peace." See also Mass.

Ives, Levi Silliman, 1797–1867, prominent Catholic convert. Episcopal bishop of North Carolina, 1831–52, he converted to Catholicism under the influence of the Oxford movement. Unable to continue in the ministry, he founded an orphanage in New York City and served as president of the Society of Saint Vincent de Paul.

Ivo of Chartres, St., ca. 1040–1115, bishop of Chartres whose canon law compilation was the standard text of Church law in northern Europe until it was surpassed by Gratian's. Ivo's writings on the episcopal office contributed to resolving the investiture controversy. Feast day: May 20 or 23. See also investiture controversy.

J

Jacob, Israelite patriarch, son of Isaac and Rebekah. The name in Hebrew means "he overreaches." Gen 25–33 tells of Jacob's birth, his winning of his brother Esau's birthright, his vision at Bethel, his wives Leah, Rachel, Zilpah, and Bilhah, his twelve sons, his wrestling with God, and his change of name to Israel. See also patriarch [biblical].

Jacob of Nisibis, St., early fourth century, first bishop of Nisibis, present at the Council of Nicaea (325). Revered by Armenian and Syrian Christians as a theologian, his works, if any, have not survived. Feast day: July 15. See also Nicaea, First Council of.

Jacob of Voragine. See Golden Legend, The.

Jacopone da Todi (yahk-oh-poh'nay dah toh' dee), ca. 1230–ca. 1306, Franciscan brother and poet. Jacopone became a Franciscan after the death of his wife. He lived austerely and composed laudi (Lat., religious poems or songs), but his authorship of the Marian hymn Stabat Mater has been questioned. He sympathized with Franciscan Spirituals and was imprisoned for doing so.

James I, 1566–1625, king of England. Succeeding his mother, Mary, Queen of Scots, as king of Scotland in 1567, in 1603 he succeeded Elizabeth I as the first Stuart king of England and was greeted on his arrival by the Millenary Petition of the Puritans. At the Hampton Court Conference (1604), James responded to the mention of Presbyterianism by pronouncing, "No bishops, no king." His failure to bring promised relief to the Catholics led to the Gunpowder Plot (1605), bringing about stricter laws against Catholics who refused to attend the services of the Church of England (recusants). He reestablished the episcopacy in Scotland in 1610 and issued the Book of Sports, allowing sports on Sunday, in 1618, earning the strong resentment of Puritans and Presbyterians, which, combined with his refusal to compromise with Parliament, set the stage for the Civil Wars under Charles I. See also Presbyterianism; Puritanism.

James, St. [brother of Jesus], a prominent figure in the early Church. Mark 6:3 records Jesus' villagers acknowledging that he has four brothers (James, Joses, Judas, and Simon) and sisters (see Matt 13:55). Although John 7:3–5 and Mark 3:31 indicate that Jesus' brothers did not believe in him, Acts and Paul's Letters indicate that James, at least, became a disciple and a high-ranking person in the early Church. Luke records that after the death of James (son of Zebedee), another James becomes prominent, who is James the brother of the Lord. In the lists of Jerusalem's bishops, he is regularly named first (Eusebius Ecclesiastical History 4.5.3–4). Hence he is presumably the figure in Acts 12:17 and 15:14. This is the "James, the Lord's brother" whom Paul visited in Jerusalem (Gal 1:19) and of whom Paul testifies that the Lord appeared to him (1 Cor 15:7). He is sometimes called "James the Less" for his shortness, but also "James the Just" for his piety: "The charge of the church passed to James the brother of the Lord . . . called the 'Just' by all men from the Lord's time to ours, since many were called James, but he was holy from his mother's womb" (Eusebius Eccl. Hist. 2.23.4–7). He is credited with authorizing the mission to the Gentiles and thus became Paul's patron. And he is the alleged author of the Letter to James. Ananias the high priest had James arrested and executed: "He convened the Sanhedrin and brought before them a man named James, the brother of Jesus who is called Christ . . . and delivered them up to be stoned" (Josephus Antiquities 20.200; Eusebius Ecc. Hist. 2.23.22). Feast day: May 3. See also apostle; brothers of Jesus; Twelve, the. JEROME NEYREY

James of Nisibis, St. See Jacob of Nisibis, St.

James the Great, St. [son of Zebedee], one of the twelve apostles. With his brother John, he was a fisherman whom Jesus called among his first disciples (Matt 4:21; Mark 1:19; Luke 5:10). The list of apostles in Mark 3:17 reports that Jesus gave James and John the nickname "sons of thunder." According to the synoptic Gospels, James, along with his brother and Simon Peter, was among Jesus' closest followers. Jesus brought these three with him into the home of Jairus, whose daughter he raised (Mark 5:37; Luke 8:51). The same three accompany Jesus at his Transfiguration (Matt 17:1; Mark 9:2; Luke 9:28), ask him about the end time (Mark 13:3), and fail him in Gethsemane (Matt 26:37; Mark 14:33). James and John ask Jesus whether to call down fire on Samaritans who reject him (Luke 9:53), and they request seats of honor on his right and left when he sits in royal glory (Mark 10:35–37; but Matt 20:20–21 attributes the request to their mother).

James died a martyr under the persecution of Jesus' followers launched by King Herod Agrippa I between A.D. 42 and 44 (Acts 12:1–3). An expanded version of James's miracles and martyrdom appears in the sixth-century Apostolic History of Abdias. Later traditions report that James preached in Spain or that his body was transferred from Jerusalem to Compostela in Spain, which became a major pilgrimage site in the Middle Ages.

James is the patron saint of pilgrims, Spain, Guatemala, and Nicaragua. Feast day: July 25. See also apostle; Twelve, the.

James the Less, St. [son of Alphaeus], one of the twelve apostles. The son of Alphaeus (Matt 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:15) is sometimes identified with James "the Less," whose mother, Mary, was present at the Cross (Mark 15:40). Feast day: May 3. See also apostle; Twelve, the.

Jane Frances de Chantal, St. See Chantal, St. Jane Frances de.

Jansen, Cornelius, also known as Jansenius, 1585–1638, Flemish theologian, author of the Augustinus. After an exhaustive study of all of Augustine of Hippo's writings and especially of his anti-Pelagian writings, Jansen began to write the Augustinus in 1628. It was not published until 1640, two years after his death. (In 1636 Jansen had been ordained bishop of Ypres.) The work became very controversial because it seemed to contain ideas on grace and free will that were closer to Protestantism than to the Catholic tradition. Protestants had insisted on the principle of sola gratia (Lat., "grace alone"), while Catholics taught that human beings must cooperate with God's grace through good works. Five propositions were extracted from the Augustinus (two that were actually there and three that were compressions of material). The propositions emphasized the absolute necessity and irresistible character of grace, leading critics to conclude that the book was denying free will, promoting moral rigorism, and generating pessimism about the possibility of salvation. The propositions were condemned by Pope Innocent X in 1653. They became the basis of a movement, centered principally in France, known as Jansenism. See also Augustinus; Jansenism; nature and grace; salvation.

Jansenism, a seventeenth-century Catholic reform movement originating in the Low Countries and France, which expanded into Habsburg lands and Italy during the eighteenth century. Basically Augustinian in theological orientation, Jansenism was pessimistic about human nature without God's grace, demanded strict asceticism, fought the centralizing tendencies of Tridentine Catholicism, and rallied opponents of French absolutism, whose proponents from Richelieu to Louis XIV assisted ecclesiastical authorities in suppressing Jansenism. Regarded as an extreme but legitimate branch of the Catholic Reformation, Jansenism raised important questions about Catholic theology, papal authority in theological matters, and the relation of individual conscience to that authority.

History: Jansenism originated in Bishop Cornelius Jansen's Augustinian treatise, Augustinus, affirming God's absolute predestination based on human nature's incapacity to perform good works without grace. Accused by Jesuits of violating the papal ban on discussion of such topics and of Calvinist leanings, the Augustinus was published posthumously in 1640 and condemned by the Inquisition in 1641. Jansen's thought became a basis for piety through the Abbé de Saint-Cyran, an opponent of Cardinal Richelieu's absolutism and principal spiritual guide to the Cistercian convent of Port-Royal and its patrons the Arnauld family, including the convent's abbess Angelique Arnauld. Antoine Arnauld defended Saint-Cyran's rigorism in his Fréquente Communion (1642) and launched an attack on Jesuit moral theology.

Richelieu's successor, Mazarin, sought to destroy Port-Royal, now the center of the movement, and along with the Jesuits persuaded Pope Innocent X to condemn the five propositions on grace and human nature attributed to Jansen (Cum Occasione, 1653). Antoine Arnauld countered that Jansen's Augustinus itself did not contain the condemned ideas, while Blaise Pascal attacked Jesuit moral theology in his Provincial Letters (1656). Pope Alexander VII then issued Ad Sanctam Beati Petri Sedem (1656), specifically condemning Jansen. Arnauld responded, distinguishing between droit (admitting the papal "right" to condemn the propositions) and fait (silence on the "factual" issue of whether the ideas were really Jansen's). Alexander finally forced all French ecclesiastical personnel to sign a formulary admitting both droit and fait (Regiminis Apostolici, 1665) and exiled the Port-Royal nuns or deprived them of the sacraments.

Port-Royal's supporters later sought compromise with Pope Clement IX to permit signing the formulary while leaving open the question of droit and fait. Recurring controversy forced Antoine Arnauld into exile in the Low Countries. Arnauld's ally Pasquier Quesnel published his highly Augustinian Nouveau Testament avec des réflexions morales (Fr., "New Testament with Moral Reflections," 1694), leading to arrest in 1703. Jansenist resurgence led to renewed pressure by Louis XVI on Pope Clement XI, who issued Unigenitus Dei Filius (1713), condemning 101 propositions taken specifically from Quesnel, eliminating the question of fait and concentrating on papal rights (droit). French Jansenist bishops effectively rejected the papacy on the issue of droit by appealing to a general council. Forced by the king to accept the bull in 1714, the French Jansenist party gradually withered after the death of sympathetic archbishop Noailles of Paris in 1729, but at Utrecht, a schism produced the Jansenist Church of Holland (1723), which still survives in the twentieth century as a branch of the Old Catholic Church. See also Arnauld, Antoine; Arnauld, Jacqueline Marie Angélique; Augustinianism; Jansen, Cornelius; nature and grace; Old Catholics; Port-Royal; predestination; Saint-Cyran, Abbé de. W. DAVID MYERS Janssens, Louis, b. 1908, professor emeritus of moral theology at the Catholic University of Louvain, Belgium. He is known for his contributions to a personalist approach to morality.

Januarius, St., d. ca. 305, bishop of Benevento, Italy, and patron saint of Naples. Almost nothing else is known of him. The frequent liquefaction of his blood, preserved in a vial as a relic, each year draws large crowds to the cathedral of Naples, where it is kept. Feast day: April 21 (East); September 19 (West).

Japan, Catholicism in. Catholicism in Japan dates from the landing of Francis Xavier in Kagoshima in southern Japan on August 15, 1549. The Jesuits were the first to preach the gospel in Japan. Some feudal lords accepted the faith with an eye toward foreign trade, since the Jesuits were closely aligned with the Portuguese merchants from Macao. Many subjects followed the lords into the Church. The number of missionaries was never large, but the number of converts is reported to have reached to 300,000.

Early History: In 1587, Toyotomi Hideyoshi, the powerful lord who fought to unify the country, at first favorable to the missionaries, turned against them. He issued an edict ordering them to leave Japan, but it was not enforced for some time. In 1597, twenty-six Christians, including four Spanish missionaries, one Mexican, and one Portuguese, were crucified on a hill in Nagasaki (they were canonized in 1862). Meantime, the Dominicans and Franciscans arrived from the Philippines. In 1614, the Tokugawa regime issued an edict banishing Christianity. Thousands died for the faith, and only a small number of Christians survived. They went underground and kept their faith without any priests.

Catholics at prayer in Japan, a country with more than 124 million people, of whom less than 500,000 are Catholics, or .35 percent of the total population.

From this period until the opening of Japan by Commodore Matthew Perry in 1853, Japan was closed to Christianity. Members of the Paris Foreign Mission Society were the first to reenter the country. On March 17, 1865, at Nagasaki Father Bernard Petitjean discovered a group of "hidden Christians," who were descendants of the early Christians and had kept the faith through the early persecutions. Eventually, an estimated 20,000 Christians were found. The government again ferreted out the Christians and persecuted them. This action stopped at the insistence of the Iwakura mission, sent by the new Meiji government to seek amicable relations with the Western countries.

When the edicts against Christianity were abolished by the government, other missionary orders entered the country. Many French-speaking religious congregations of women followed and started schools for girls. New vicariates and dioceses were established.

Modern Developments: At the turn of the twentieth century, there were an estimated 55,000 Catholics. The Church grew slowly and the number of native priests and sisters increased. During the 1930s, nationalism put great stress upon the Church. A crisis of conscience arose when the government forced all nationals to bow in front of state Shinto shrines. After repeated objections from the Church, the government declared that worship at the shrines was civil and not religious in character. The government continued to curtail the activities of all religious personnel. In 1941, the foreign ordinaries resigned and were replaced by Japanese bishops. At the time, the number of Catholics was about 120,000, more than half of whom lived in Nagasaki, where the second atom bomb was dropped toward the end of the Second World War (1945).

After the war, diplomatic relations were established in 1952 between Japan and the Vatican; in 1958, the Apostolic Delegate (personal representative of the pope) was elevated to the rank of Internuncio (special legate of the pope, lower than a nuncio, or regular ambassador, but higher than an Apostolic Delegate). Converts, especially from the upper middle class, entered the Church. In this era, many Christian writers arose, notably Endo Shusaku and Sono Ayako among the Catholic writers. The number of Catholics grew gradually and around 1960 it neared the number of Catholics before the outbreak of the persecution in the seventeenth century. In 1990, there were 428,830 Catholics out of a population of 123,642,000.

Bibliography

Jennes, Joseph. A History of the Catholic Church in Japan. Rev. enl. ed. Tokyo: Oriens Institute for Religious Research, 1973.

Laures, Johannes. The Catholic Church in Japan: A Short History. Tokyo and Rutland, VT: Tuttle, 1954.

GEORGE MINAMIKI

J.C.D., Juris Canonici Doctor (Lat.), Doctor of Canon Law, pontifical academic degree that attests to one's knowledge of canon law.

J.C.L., Juris Canonici Licentia (Lat.), Licentiate in Canon Law, academic degree (roughly equivalent to a master's degree) given in the subject of canon law.

Jean-Baptiste de La Salle, St. See La Salle, St. Jean-Baptiste de.

Jedin, Hubert, 1900–80, Church historian. Educated at Breslau, Munich, Freiburg, and Rome, he was ordained in 1924 and began a teaching career that culminated with his appointment as professor of medieval and Church history at the University of Bonn in 1949. His unparalleled knowledge of sixteenth-century sources resulted in many scholarly works, most notably the monumental Geschichte des Konzils von Trient (History of the Council of Trent, 1951–57).

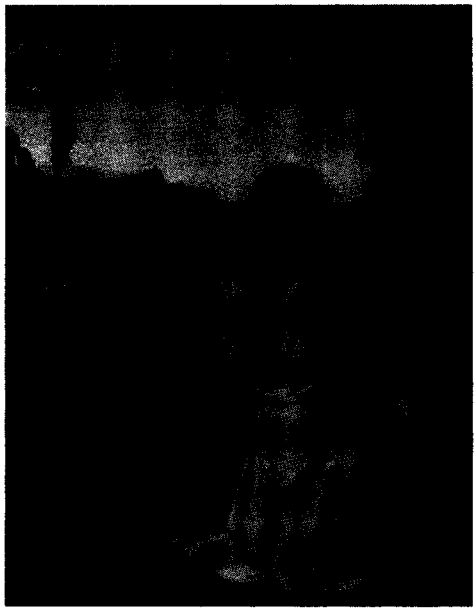
Jehovah's Witnesses, members of a millennialist Protestant sect formally known as the Watchtower Bible and Tract Society. Organized by Charles Taze Russell in New York in the 1870s, the group was originally known as Russellites, Millennial Dawnists, or International Bible Students. Russell taught that Christ's return was imminent, at one time setting the date at 1914, and his writings acquired prophetic status among his followers. When Russell died in 1916, Joseph "Judge" Rutherford became president, modifying Russell's doctrines and instituting a tightly controlled central bureaucracy.

Jehovah's Witnesses regard the Bible as a body of literal instructions to believers, and their distinctive interpretations support a unique pattern of practices and beliefs. All Witnesses are expected to spend substantial time preaching door-to-door, and they circulate millions of copies of their publications each year. They reject the doctrines of the Trinity and Christ's divinity. They refuse blood transfusions, based on the OT proscription against eating blood (Lev 3:17). Witnesses also reject nationalistic activities such as military service, standing for anthems, and flag salutes. Coupled with their aggressive proselytizing, marked by a virulent anti-Catholicism, Jehovah's Witnesses have experienced a great deal of persecution worldwide. In the United States and Canada, Witnesses have fought and won a number of important court victories on religious liberty issues.

In the early 1990s there were 4.3 million Jehovah's Witnesses (890,000 in the United States). Their greatest growth in recent decades has been in traditionally Catholic nations, and perhaps half of their membership worldwide consists of former Catholics. Witnesses tend to attract members from the working and lower-middle classes. In the United States this has included large numbers of African-Americans. See also millenarianism.

MICHAEL S. HAMILTON

Jerome, St., also known as Eusebius Hieronymus,



Jerome, not only the most famous biblical scholar in the history of the Church but also a devoted monk and ascetic, with the traditional lion at his feet; fifteenth-century Pietro Perugino painting, Kunsthistorisches Museum, Vienna.

ca. 340–ca. 420, Church Father, the greatest biblical scholar of his age. Jerome was born at Stridon, in Dalmatia, and, after a splendid education at Rome, traveled widely. In 374 following a dream in which a heavenly judge accused him of being a Ciceronian rather than a Christian, he devoted himself to biblical studies and a severe asceticism. In 379 Jerome was ordained a priest and in 382 became secretary to Pope Damasus, who encouraged him to revise the Old Latin Bible. Following Damasus's death in 384 he left Rome, eventually establishing a monastery at Bethlehem with the support of a wealthy follower, Paula. Here he completed his work on the Bible, which included a translation of the OT directly from the Hebrew that superseded the Old Latin Version, which had been based upon the Greek Septuagint. The resultant Bible, the Vulgate, became the standard of the Roman Catholic Church and Jerome's most influential achievement. He also wrote commentaries on biblical books (most notably those of the prophets), translated works of various Greek Fathers (e.g., Eusebius), and compiled a catalog of Christian authors. As a controversialist he fiercely opposed Pelagianism, Arianism, and Origenism and staunchly defended clerical celibacy, the cult of the saints, and the doctrine of Mary's perpetual virginity. His correspondence, especially with Augustine, is of profound historical interest. Since the eighth century he has been honored as one of the four great Doctors of the Western Church. Feast day: September 30. See also Vulgate.

Jerome Emiliani, St. (em-eel-ee-ahn'ee), 1483–1537, Venetian saint. After a soldier's career, he was ordained a priest and devoted his life to the sick and especially to abandoned children. He founded the Somaschi Fathers. Feast day: February 8.

Jerusalem (Heb., "the foundation of [the god] Shalem"), capital of the modern state of Israel, a city sacred to Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. In ca. 1000 B.C. it was taken by David, who made it the center of Jewish life by bringing into it the ark of the covenant, which Solomon enshrined in a temple. Restored many times, this Temple was completely rebuilt by Herod the Great (37–4 B.C.). Here Jesus was presented as a child; to it he came on pilgrimage; and from it he expelled the money changers. In ca. A.D. 30 he was crucified and buried outside the walls in an abandoned quarry; the site is now covered by the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. The Romans destroyed the Temple in A.D. 70, and Jews were forbidden to live in the city beginning in A.D. 135, when its name was changed to Aelia Capitolina. Monasteries and churches proliferated in the fourth century when Jerusalem became a center of pilgrimage for all Europe. A specifically Catholic presence is first attested in the ninth century when Charlemagne built a hospice for Latin-speaking pilgrims. In the eleventh century it was staffed by Benedictines. During the Latin Kingdom (1099–1187) this hospice developed into the great hospital of the Knights of St. John. The Crusaders established a Latin patriarchate, which disappeared with the Latin rite when Saladin captured Jerusalem in 1187. The Franciscan Custody of the Holy Land was set up in 1335 and gradually secured Catholic access to the holy places through unceasing negotiation and persistance to the point of martyrdom. In the second half of the nineteenth century the Latin patriarchate was reestablished, the Sisters of St. Joseph of the Apparition founded schools and hospitals, and the Dominicans founded the École Biblique, the first Catholic institution to specialize in biblical studies. See also École Biblique; Jerusalem rite.

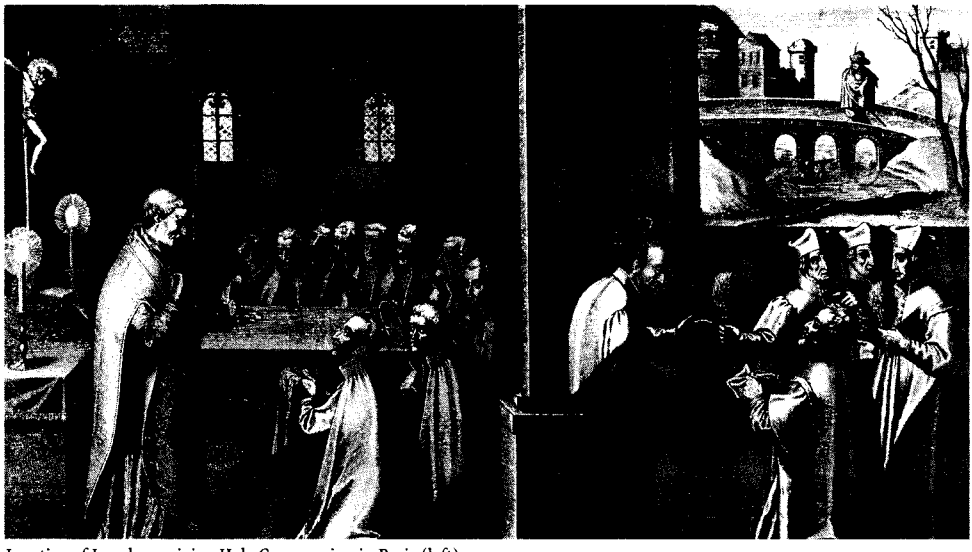
JEROME MURPHY-O'CONNOR

Jerusalem Eucharistic Congress, the first International Eucharistic Congress (1893) to be held outside Europe and a major turning point in Catholic policy toward the Christian East. Carefully prepared by Assumptionist experts on the Christian East and by the papal legate Cardinal Langénieux of Rheims, the congress led directly to Pope Leo XIII's two historic documents of 1894, Praeclara Gratulationis and Orientalium Dignitas; the latter has been considered the Magna Carta of Eastern Catholicism. These papal documents used a new language in speaking of the distinct patrimony and ecclesial autonomy of the Christian East, and in resolutely opposing latinization. In intellectual Catholic circles in the West this new openness gave rise to new scholarly journals and other initiatives dealing with the Christian East. See also Eucharistic Congress.

Jerusalem rite, the Greek liturgical traditions of the patriarchate of Jerusalem before they were supplanted by the Byzantine rite through a gradual process completed by the end of the thirteenth century. Though no longer extant as an independent liturgical tradition, the Jerusalem rite influenced almost every other rite in Christendom, and elements such as its Horologion or Book of Hours and its eucharistic Liturgy of St. James are still in use in other churches. The destruction of Jerusalem in the revolt of Bar Kochba in 135 brought an end to Aramaic Judeo-Christianity in the Holy Land. Thereafter, the bishops and liturgy of the rebuilt city were Greek. With the Peace of Constantine in 313 and the rediscovery of the Holy Places, Jerusalem became a magnet for pilgrims from every corner of the Christian world, who brought home with them the memory of the dramatically impressive liturgical services they had participated in there. These services are described in such fourth-century sources as the travel diary of the Spanish nun Egeria (384) and the contemporary catechetical homilies attributed to Jerusalem bishops Cyril or his successor John II. These sources not only provide early evidence of Holy Week services and stational (processional) liturgy. They also reveal a new view of liturgy, strongly anamnetic, focused on the memorial of Jesus' saving activity in his incarnate life on earth—e.g., Baptism as a ritual reenactment of Jesus' baptism rather than as rebirth in the Spirit (John 3:3–7) or dying and rising in Christ (Rom 6:3–5)—and a topographical resurrectional symbolism centered on the Church of the Anastasis or Holy Sepulchre in the Jerusalem cathedral basilica. This symbolism would later be transferred to other Eastern traditions, whose churches would be interpreted as Jerusalem writ-small, their sanctuary the Holy Sepulchre in microcosm, its altar the tomb where Jesus' body lay. This mimetic and historicizing salvation-history vision of the liturgical services has remained an integral aspect of Eastern liturgical interpretation. From Jerusalem comes Holy Week at Easter and the feast of the Mother of God on August 15. Jerusalem developed the first lectionary system, which by the fifth century had already been translated into Armenian, then into Syriac, Georgian, and Arabic. Jerusalem liturgical usages became a major component in the formation of the West Syrian rite, and its Liturgy of St. James provided the framework of the West Syrian and Armenian Eucharists. From the ninth century the Byzantine Liturgy of the Hours and Holy Week lectionary undergo strong Jerusalem influence, while at the same time the byzantinization of Jerusalem usages had already begun. Indeed, much of the liturgical poetry so characteristic of the Byzantine rite was composed in the Monastery of St. Sabas in the Judean desert beyond Jerusalem, in the revival that followed the Persian depredations of 614. The Byzantines ultimately adopted the Palestinian Horologion or Book of Hours, and the present Byzantine Divine Office is a composite of Constanti-



Ignatius of Loyola receiving Holy Communion in Paris (left), where he founded the Jesuits in 1534, and shown with five of his Jesuit companions (right).

nopolitan and Jerusalem usages. The destruction of the Holy Sepulchre by Caliph al-Hakim in 1010, followed by the fall of Jerusalem to the Seljuks in 1072 and the resulting Crusades, which established a Latin Patriarchate of Jerusalem in place of the Greek one from 1099–1291, gradually confirmed the Jerusalem rite as an independent tradition. See also Byzantine rite; Jerusalem. ROBERT F. TAFT Jesuits, popular name for members of the Society of Jesus (S.J.), a religious order founded by Ignatius of Loyola (1491–1556) and canonically established by Pope Paul III on September 27, 1540, with the bull Regimini Militantis Ecclesiae. The Jesuits' unofficial motto is "For the Greater Glory of God" (Ad majorem Dei gloriam), a phrase or idea found over one hundred times in their Constitutions.

The purpose of the order stated in the bull was to engage in active ministry for "the progress of souls in Christian life and doctrine and the propagation of the faith." The Jesuits were not founded to oppose the Reformation, as is often said, but in 1550 they explicitly adopted opposition to the Reformation as a major objective, especially in northern Europe. Jesuits such as Peter Canisius (d. 1597) in Germany and Piotr Skarga (d. 1612) in Poland were outstanding in revitalizing Catholicism in those areas.

In some ways similar to older orders, the Jesuits from the beginning had features that were quite distinctive, e.g., the greater authority vested in the superior general, the private rather than communal recitation of the liturgical hours, wearing street clothes rather than a distinguishing religious habit, the elimination of regular and frequent chapters (deliberative meetings of membership), a special vow "concerning missions" to go anywhere in the world when sent by the pope on pastoral assignment. Such features were the structural articulation of the Jesuits' intense dedication to ministry, which helped inaugurate in Catholicism a new era of the so-called apostolic orders of both women and men.

Two other factors gave the Society a special character. The Spiritual Exercises of Ignatius of Loyola provided the Jesuits with a unique handbook of spiritual principles and methods useful in all their ministries and activities. When after 1548 the Jesuits undertook on a large scale the running and staffing of schools, they created a ministry no other order had ever professedly undertaken, which soon became their foremost pastoral instrument. Within the Society, teaching consolidated the commitment to learning insisted upon by the first members and made it systemic.

History: Ignatius, while studying at the University of Paris (1528–35), attracted nine other students to form the nucleus of the future Society. In 1541 Ignatius was elected superior and soon thereafter set about writing the Constitutions, which were substantially completed by 1552 and officially ratified by the first General Congregation in 1558.

The Society grew rapidly, with about one thousand members by the death of Ignatius in 1556, about 16,000 by 1615, and about 22,600 in 1773. Aside from its other ministries, by 1615 it ran 450 high schools and universities and 55 seminaries, and by 1773 about 670 schools and 175 seminaries.

Jesuits became confessors to monarchs, and they entered into theological controversy with other Catholics, most notably in the seventeenth century against the Jansenists, who stressed moral austerity in contrast with the more realistic approach of the Jesuits. Their success made them easy targets for their enemies, culminating in the suppression of the order by Pope Clement XIV in 1773. A clause in the papal decree allowed a tenuous survival in parts of Poland and Lithuania. Pope Pius VII fully restored the order on August 7, 1814.

The Jesuits tried to begin where they had stopped in 1773, even though they had only a few documents like the Exercises and Constitutions to guide them. They again grew rapidly, to about fifteen thousand members by 1900. The Society currently numbers about twenty-four thousand, of which some four thousand are preparing for ordination and about three thousand are "temporal coadjutors," full members who will not be ordained. There are over four thousand Jesuits in the United States.

Missions: The missionary character of the order manifested itself almost immediately when Francis Xavier was sent to India, where he arrived in 1542 and was joined by some fifty others by 1555. In 1549 a few Jesuits arrived in Brazil. In a few years the number of Jesuits in Brazil grew to twenty-five, and that same year Xavier laid the foundations for a flourishing mission in Japan that lasted until persecutions in the seventeenth century.

In time the Jesuits surpassed the other orders in the number of men serving outside Europe, about 3,300 by 1750. Their "reductions" (supervised colonies) for the Guaraní Indians in present-day Paraguay and their adaptation to Chinese culture and religious customs were their two most innovative missionary ventures, both of which they were forced to abandon by 1750. In the 1990s, there are about 1,170 Jesuits in Africa, 1,900 in East Asia, 1,500 in Eastern Europe, 3,500 in Latin America.

Jesuits landed on the southeastern coast of present-day United States in 1566 but left in 1572. In the immense territories of New France and Louisiana, the French Jesuits began to work in 1611, and Jacques Marquette accompanied Louis Joliet in 1673 in the exploration of the Mississippi River. In 1634 Andrew White arrived from England with the first settlers of Maryland, where by 1770 there were twenty-three Jesuits, including John Carroll, who in 1789 became, in Baltimore, the first bishop of the United States. Eusebio Kino (d. 1711) established missions in present-day Arizona.

Spirituality, Theology, Learning: Jesuit spirituality is fundamentally derived from the Spiritual Exercises, the Constitutions, and other writings by Ignatius and his closest collaborators, especially Jerónimo (Jerome) Nadal (d. 1580). An expression of the message of the Gospels, framed in the belief and practice of the Catholic Church, it has some special characteristics.

Among these is a movement inward, constituted especially by growing sensitivity to one's relationship to God as manifested in the soul through "consolation" and "desolation," as explained in the Exercises. This aspect of the Jesuits' spirituality accounts for their commitment to retreats, spiritual direction, and other "ministries of interiority."

Another is a movement outward, in service to the world and to other human beings. The writings of Ignatius and his colleagues defined the purpose of the Jesuits as "the help of souls." Although especially intent upon helping people to a better relationship with God through preaching, hearing confessions, and teaching contemplation and other forms of prayer, the Jesuits were also much concerned with improving the physical situation of those to whom they ministered by establishing orphanages, women's asylums, and other works of social assistance. This tradition grounded a new commitment to "the service of the faith and the promotion of justice" adopted by the Jesuits in 1974–75 as central to their mission today and an essential aspect of their spirituality.

The Society has produced a large number of important theologians, beginning with Peter Canisius, Robert Bellarmine (d. 1621), and Francisco Suárez (d. 1617), and continuing to the present. Among recent Jesuits, the best known are Pierre Teilhard de Chardin (d. 1955), Bernard Lonergan (d. 1984), and Karl Rahner (d. 1984). Consistently characteristic of Jesuit theologians has been a notably positive understanding of the relationship between grace and human endeavors.

Jesuits have been outstanding scientists and mathematicians, and Jesuit schools gave to Calderon, Moliére, and other great dramatists their first training in theater. Robert Southwell (d. 1595) and Gerard Manley Hopkins (d. 1889) were Jesuit poets. In the 1990s in the United States the Jesuits sponsor twenty-eight colleges and universities, as well as forty-five high schools. Around the world they publish hundreds of popular and scientific journals, including in English Theological Studies, New Testament Abstracts, The Heythrop Journal, The Way, America, and Thought. See also Francis Xavier, St.; Ignatius of Loyola, St.; Jesuit spirituality; Spiritual Exercises.

Bibliography

Bangert, William V. A History of the Society of Jesus. St. Louis: The Institute of Jesuit Sources, 1972.

Ignatius of Loyola. The Constitutions of the Society of Jesus. Translated with introduction and commentary by George E. Ganss. St. Louis: The Institute of Jesuit Sources, 1970.

———. Ignatius of Loyola: Spiritual Exercises and Selected Works. Ed. George E. Ganss. New York: Paulist Press, 1991.

O'Malley, John W. The First Jesuits. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1993.

O'Malley, John W., John W. Padberg, and Vincent T. O'Keefe. Jesuit Spirituality: A Now and Future Resource. Chicago: Loyola University Press, 1990.

JOHN O'MALLEY

Jesuit spirituality, the spiritual vision and values communicated by Ignatius of Loyola (d. 1556) to the Society of Jesus and elaborated by the Society of Jesus over the 450 years of its life. This vision and these values shape the apostolic priorities, the choice of ministry and mission, the community life and prayer, and the decision-making processes of the entire Society of Jesus and its individual members. This spirituality is grounded in the Spiritual Exercises of Ignatius of Loyola, a manual of spiritual growth and development drawn from the actual experience of Ignatius himself.

Elements of the Spirituality: Jesuit spirituality, as grounded in the Spiritual Exercises and articulated in the Constitutions of the Society of Jesus, displays the following facets: (1) A high degree of Christocentrism: The Christ of the Gospels is preeminent in Jesuit spirituality. The Spiritual Exercises are structured to generate and nurture a deepening and affective bond with the living Christ. (2) A sense of collaboration with the action of God in the world: The Spiritual Exercises communicate a belief that God is vigorously at work in the world for the well-being of the human family and that God needs human collaboration to accomplish this work. Jesuit spirituality, therefore, has a major focus on service in collaboration with God for the well-being of others. (3) Spiritual discernment in decision making: The Spiritual Exercises presume that the action of God in the world is discernible from subjective experience and objective criteria. Jesuit spirituality inculcates principles and practices of spiritual discernment to ascertain the origin, rhythm, patterns, and direction of individual and communal experience and to choose options that support and collaborate with God's action in the world. (4) Magnanimity and generosity of response: The Spiritual Exercises were developed in medieval Spain in an environment of chivalry and romance, an environment that expected great and courageous deeds simply for their own sake. Jesuit spirituality embodies this in the Ignatian magis (Lat., "more"), a generous and magnanimous service of God and the human family. (5) Fraternity and companionship in service: The Society of Jesus was formed out of a desire to maintain the fraternity and fellowship that Ignatius and the first companions enjoyed. This was a fraternity based on shared experience of Jesus Christ in the Spiritual Exercises. The early Jesuits called themselves "friends in the Lord" and viewed themselves as a fraternity whose bond of union was a shared affective commitment to Christ in apostolic service. This is a central facet of Jesuit spirituality. (6) Finding God in all things: Spiritual integration is a constant theme of the Spiritual Exercises and the Constitutions of the Society of Jesus. Therefore, the integration of prayer and service, contemplation and action, affect and reason is a hallmark of Jesuit spirituality. This characteristic of Jesuit spirituality is best stated by Ignatius's famous dictum, "to find God in all things." It is further articulated by Jerome Nadal (d. 1580), one of Ignatius's first companions, who styled the Jesuit as "a contemplative in action." In short, Jesuit spirituality is Christocentric, apostolic, discerning, generous, and fraternal. It is an integrated spirituality that allows and encourages the whole Society of Jesus and the individual Jesuit to seek God in the entire fabric of life, prayer, and ministry. See also Ignatius of Loyola, St.; Jesuits; Spiritual Exercises; spirituality, Christian.

FRANK J. HOUDEK

Jesus [name], name derived from the Greek rendering of the Hebrew Yĕhôšûa'. It means "Yahweh saves" or "Yahweh is salvation." Its popular etymology comes from Yēšûă', meaning "salvation," which is alluded to in Matt 1:21. It was a common Jewish name in the pre-Christian era and it was the name given to Jesus of Nazareth by his parents. The name carries the promise of salvation for humanity. In the NT it is used as a synonym for the person of Jesus and it is in his name (i.e., in the power of his name) that the disciples baptize and work miracles. Peter's speech as recorded in Acts proclaims that salvation is given only in Jesus, "for there is no other name under heaven . . . by which we must be saved" (Acts 4:10, 12). See also Christ; Jesus Christ.

JESUS CHRIST

Jesus Christ is the person called Jesus of Nazareth, recognized by Christians as the Christ, who was crucified on a cross, rose from the dead, and is proclaimed as the Son of God incarnate. He is perceived to be personally active as embodied Spirit in the visible community called the Church and in the world. The purpose of Christian doctrine, morality, spirituality, and Scripture is knowledge and experience of the living person of Jesus Christ.

The renewal of Catholicism that took place at the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) initiated a recovery of the centrality of Christ to the Church. Though the council was principally an ecclesiological event, the renewal that took place at Vatican II was animated in part at least by a refocusing of the primacy of Christ in the life, mission, and ministry of the Church.

The great documents of the Second Vatican Council are held together by strong Christological statements. For example, the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church points out that Christ is "the one mediator" between God and humanity and "the head of that body which is the church" (nn. 8, 7). The Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World describes Christ as "the goal of human history, the focal point of the longings of history and of civilization, the center of the human race, the joy of every heart, and the answer to all its yearnings" (n. 45; see also nn. 10, 22). The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy highlights the Paschal Mystery of Christ as the norm guiding the revision of the liturgy (n. 107). The Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation says that "Jesus perfected revelation by fulfilling it" through his life, death, Resurrection, and sending of the Spirit of truth (n. 4).

This Christocentric focus, however, was not developed in any detail at the Second Vatican Council. Because of this lacuna, the post–Vatican II period has witnessed a veritable springtime of Christological reflection and practice in the life of the Church at all levels: encyclicals, synods, commissions, the theological community, and pastoral practice. For instance, Pope John Paul II in his first encyclical, Redemptor Hominis ("Redeemer of Humankind," 1979), points out that "Jesus Christ is the chief way for the Church" (n. 13). The 1985 Extraordinary Synod, commemorating the twentieth anniversary of Vatican II, suggests with striking candor that "The Church becomes more credible if it speaks less about itself and more and more preaches Christ crucified (1 Cor 2:2) and witnesses to him by its life." The International Theological Commission and the Pontifical Biblical Commission have published a variety of documents on Christology since Vatican II. The theological community has turned out more monographs on the person of Jesus Christ in the three postconciliar decades than in the previous three hundred years.

"They spat on him, and took the reed and struck him on the head. After mocking him, they stripped him of the robe and put his own clothes on him. Then they led him away to crucify him" (Matt 27:30–31); the Passion of Christ; twentieth-century French expressionist painting by Georges Rouault.

THE PARAMETERS OF CHRISTOLOGY

Clearly the person of Jesus Christ stands at the center of Christian faith and theology. The parameters of the mystery of Christ, however, need to be mapped out. Christology, the study of the person of Jesus Christ, is the part of theology that seeks to answer the question of who Jesus of Nazareth is, past and present. The sources of Christology are the Scriptures, the Christian tradition, and contemporary human experience.

Broadly speaking, the mystery of Jesus Christ embraces two distinct but closely related elements: the Christ event and the universal significance of the Christ event. The Christ event came into being at that particular time in history when Jesus of Nazareth became known as the Christ, that is, the Messiah, the anointed one of Yahweh whom the Jewish world foretold and awaited. When a small group of women and men came together to confess that Jesus as Christ, Christianity was born. The Fourth Gospel concludes its reflection on Jesus by telling us: "these are written so that you may come to believe that Jesus is the Christ" (20:31; see also Acts 9:22). This earliest expression of the Christ event is expanded into other equally important creedal statements such as: Jesus is Lord (Rom 10:9; see also 1 Cor 12:3; 8:6; Acts 2:36; Phil 2:11), Jesus is the wisdom of God (1 Cor 1:24; Col 1:15–16; Heb 1:3), Jesus is the Son of Man (Mark 2:28; 8:31; 13:26), Jesus is the Son of God in power (Rom 1:3–4), and Jesus is the Word of God made flesh (Rev 19:13; 1 John 1:1; John 1:1, 14).

These early confessional statements in turn are developed into elaborate theological narratives concerning the universal significance of the Christ event (e.g., Col 1:15–20; Eph 1:3–10). The particularity of the Christ event, rooted in the history of Jesus, therefore gives way to a new awareness of the universality of the significance of Jesus of Nazareth. Indeed, it is precisely the particularity of the Christ event that mediates the universal significance of Christ for the world.

The universal significance of the Christ event lights up understanding of God, the self, and the world. This universal significance of the Christ event is loosely present in the NT and is spelled out in greater detail in the Christian tradition through reflection on Christian practice.

The interplay between history and interpretation, between human experience and theological understanding, between the practice of discipleship and contemplation is at the heart of Christology. A crucial and critical influence bringing about the transition from the experience to the interpretation is the ongoing presence of the Spirit of Christ in the Christian community, a presence released by the Resurrection of Jesus, which effected the movement in the first place from the Jesus of history to the Christ of faith. The proper object of Christology, therefore, is not simply the historical Jesus or the Gospels but rather the crucified and risen Christ who is present as Spirit in the Christian community and in the world through word, sacrament, Christian practice, and human experience.

A study of the NT data, especially the Gospels, presents its own problems. There is no single portrait of Jesus in the NT. Indeed the Gospels display a variety of perspectives on the life, death, and Resurrection of Jesus. Further, the Gospels, written some thirty to sixty years after the death of Jesus, do not give a strictly historical account of the life of Jesus; instead, they contain theological portraits written by a community of faith to foster faith. In addition, there is no agreed approach among Scripture scholars to the study of Christ in the Gospels. The 1983 document from the Pontifical Biblical Commission entitled "Scripture and Christology" outlines eleven different approaches to the Gospels and indicates that these approaches have both strengths and weaknesses.

"He is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of all creation; for in him all things in heaven and on earth were created, things visible and invisible" (Col 1:15–16); the glorified Christ; twelfth-century Byzantine mosaic in the south gallery of the Hagia Sophia, Istanbul (Constantinople), Turkey.

The development of the universal significance of the Christ event begins in the NT period, especially after the destruction of the Temple in Jerusalem in the year 70, and continues into the patristic era through the Middle Ages right up to the present moment in the life of the Christian community. If Jesus Christ is the Lord, the Son of God, the Word made flesh, then this has important theological consequences for the way people see God, other persons, and the world around them.

The broad terms of reference of the universal significance of the Christ event have been laid down in the NT and the great Christological councils of the first five centuries. The import of these Christological councils, especially their technical language, is in continual need of historical retrieval and theological transposition. This need arises out of the ongoing desire to understand God, the human person, and the world.

THE GENESIS OF THE CHRIST EVENT

The Christ event is grounded in the historical life of Jesus as given in the NT. The problems associated with tracking down the historical life of Jesus, such as the distance between the time when the Gospels were written and the actual events they describe as well as the explicitly theological nature of the Gospels, should not lead to a position of historical skepticism. On the other hand, one cannot simply read the Gospels as if they give a blow-by-blow account of the life of Jesus. A middle way can be found between historical skepticism and fundamentalism that recognizes that some reliable historical data can be gleaned from the Gospels by means of the historical-critical method.

A helpful guide, though by no means an exhaustive one, is the 1964 instruction from the Pontifical Biblical Commission "The Historical Truth of the Gospels." This instruction indicates the presence of at least "three stages of tradition" within the Gospels that must be taken into account in any search for the historical foundations of the Christ event. These are the original words and deeds of Jesus, the oral proclamation of the words and deeds of Jesus in the light of his death and Resurrection by the Church, and the gathering together of the preaching of Jesus and the Church into the written form of the Gospels as we have them today.

"And when they had crucified him, they divided his clothes among themselves by casting lots; then they sat down there and kept watch over him. Over his head they put the charge against him, which read, 'This is Jesus, the King of the Jews'" (Matt 27:35–37); Christ on Calvary, Jean Fouquet illustration in the Book of Hours of Etienne Chevalier, Condé Museum, Chantilly, France.

The early life of Jesus was lived in relative obscurity in Nazareth for a period of about thirty years, with the exception of a brief appearance at the age of twelve in the Temple in Jerusalem at the feast of Passover (Luke 2:41–52). Jesus first emerges in Galilee in association with John the Baptist and submits to John's baptism. This event marks the beginning of his public ministry. He appears as a prophet within the long line of prophets, declaring "the time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand; repent and believe in the gospel" (Mark 1:14).

The announcement of the reign of God is central to the mission and ministry of Jesus. It locates the life of Jesus within a Jewish matrix and an apocalyptic context. The reign of God is a special kind of symbol representing the dynamic action of God within creation and history, giving life a purpose and goal, namely, the restoration of right relationships between God and humanity and the world.

The parables of Jesus, a form of wisdom discourse, are ways of introducing his audience to the meaning and implications of the coming reign of God. Some parables describe the sudden discovery of the reign of God (Matt 13:44–46); others focus on the reversal of values that the reign of God brings (Matt 10:39; 20:25–26); and still others are an injunction to a new kind of practice (Matt 25:31–46).

The miracles of Jesus, especially the healing miracles, which are prominent in the ministry of Jesus, are expressions of the triumph of the reign of God in the present, pointing to the promise of a new order coming through the preaching and practice of Jesus.

A call to faith and conversion are key elements in the preaching and practice of Jesus concerning the coming reign of God. Also central to the coming reign of God was the setting up by Jesus of a new table fellowship among the socially and religiously marginalized people of Palestine, like tax collectors and sinners. This new table fellowship symbolized the inclusive character of the coming reign of God.

Alongside this announcement of the reign of God, Jesus issued an invitation to discipleship, forming new communities of equality among women and men, rich and poor, religious and nonreligious people alike. Within this call to discipleship he gathered a small group whom he describes as "the Twelve," representing the twelve tribes of Israel as part of the eschatological end time of the reign of God.

This kingdom-centered mission of Jesus is animated in particular by his personal experience of God as Abba ("Father"), described by some as the source and ground of Jesus' message, practice, and ministry as a whole. The Abba experience in turn provides a strong sense of sonship in Jesus' life.

These words and deeds of Jesus gradually brought him into conflict with the religious and political leaders of the day. Jesus, for example, is criticized for breaking the Sabbath, for claiming to forgive sins, for calling God his father, for eating and drinking with sinners, for setting himself above the authority of Moses, for casting out demons with the help of Beelzebul (Matt 12:24), and for promising salvation.

Inevitably the possibility of death begins to emerge, just as it had for previous prophets within Judaism. The fate of other prophets was a reminder to Jesus of what could happen to him (see Luke 13:34).

The journey from Galilee up to Jerusalem at the time of the Passover is a significant turning point in the ministry of Jesus. The growing conflict with the religious and political leaders of the day comes to a head in Jerusalem with the incident of Jesus casting out those who are buying and selling in the Temple (Mark 11:15–17).

After this incident, the pace and significance of events gather momentum, making it difficult to gauge with any degree of accuracy the precise historical details. There is the Last Supper which, it must be emphasized, comes as a final meal in a series of suppers celebrated within the public ministry of Jesus. Jesus, aware of the mounting tension, associates the Last Supper with his imminent death, the restoration of the covenant with Israel, and the coming eschatological banquet of the reign of God. Following the Last Supper there is a period of prayer in Gethsemane, the betrayal by Judas, the arrest by an armed band, the trial before Pontius Pilate, and finally his death on the cross.

For his disciples Jesus' crucifixion comes as a serious moment of crisis: their hopes are dashed, their faith is shattered, and many return to their previous occupations. On "the third day," however, Jesus is experienced in a new way as personally present to his disciples, restoring and transforming their faith, empowering and sending them forth to preach the good news. The Resurrection of Jesus "by its very nature cannot be proved in an empirical way" (Pontifical Biblical Commission, "Scripture and Christology," [1983]). Yet there is strong evidence for the reality of the Resurrection in terms of the new postcrucifixion experiences, the change (more than psychological) effected in his disciples, a new confidence and sense of mission in his disciples, the existence of different resurrection kerygmata (Gk., "proclamations") and resurrection narratives in all four Gospels, and the empty tomb tradition. The language of the Resurrection, not to be confused with the language of resuscitation, is metaphorical, embracing elements of change within continuity, identity within personal transformation, newness within sameness. The elements of transformation are captured consistently by the eschatological language of exaltation, glorification, living again, ascension, and pentecost.

This historical and corporate experience by the disciples of Jesus' life, death, and Resurrection is the basis of the Christ event. The resurrection experience in particular is the catalyst effecting the recognition of Jesus as the Christ who is the Lord, the Son of God, the Word made flesh. The application and transformation of titles from the Hebrew Scriptures to Jesus provide the initial concepts for articulating the disciples' experience of the personal messiahship and divinity of Jesus.

What is most influential throughout the NT period is the underlying presence of the paradoxical but creative unity of the death and Resurrection of Jesus. The words and deeds of Jesus take on a new meaning in the light of his death and Resurrection. The personal Resurrection of Jesus stands out as the fulfillment of Jewish hopes and the dawning of a new age. The meaning of the close relationship between God as Father and Jesus as Son gradually unfolds through the impact of the Resurrection.

THE UNIVERSAL SIGNIFICANCE OF THE CHRIST EVENT

As the early Church moved out into the world of Hellenistic culture, it was forced to move from functional accounts of the Christ event (emphasizing the redemptive activities of Christ) to ontological descriptions (emphasizing the "being" of Christ). These ontological descriptions are a further step in defining the universal significance of the Christ event. While this was happening implicitly in the biblical accounts of the messiahship and divinity of Jesus, it became quite explicit from the second century onward.

The challenge of translating the doctrinal implications of Jewish-Christian categories into Hellenistic categories became pressing in the second century. The process of transposition was guided by a variety of factors such as fidelity to the NT data, the preservation of ecclesial unity, liturgical experience, and theological reflection on Christian practice and human experience.

The key category facilitating this cultural adaptation in the second century was that of the Logos (Gk., "the word," or "the truth"), a concept common to both Judaism and Hellenistic philosophy. Jesus is now understood as the Logos, that is, the key to the meaning of both Jewish history and the philosophical world of Hellenistic thought. This breakthrough enabled Christianity to hold its own in the second-century world of Hellenistic culture. Jesus was proclaimed as the answer to the philosopher's search for truth.

At the same time the relationship between Jesus as the Logos and God the Father began to become an issue. Adherence to the absolute oneness of God gave rise to a subordination of Jesus the Logos. Finding suitable language to describe Jesus became a major problem. Questions about the the bodily humanity of Jesus surfaced in some circles. These complex issues continued in the third century and were only fully resolved in the fourth century with the challenge made by Arius.

Arius, a priest in Alexandria, struggled with the identity of Jesus and ended up describing Jesus as half God and half human. In effect, Jesus as the Logos was like one of the hero gods of the ancient world, an emanation from the one true God. The Logos in Jesus, therefore, was not truly God, not really equal to God the Father; there was a time when the Logos did not exist; the Logos was created in time by God out of nothing. The full divinity of Jesus now appeared to be compromised. A council was convened by the emperor Constantine in the year 325 at Nicaea.

The Council of Nicaea condemned Arius, rejected the subordination of the Logos to the Father, and stated as part of its creed that the Son "is true God from true God, begotten not made, of one substance/being [Gk., homoousios] with the Father." Although Nicaea provided a point of departure for future discussions, the actual issues raised by Arius did not go away.

Some, mainly from Alexandria (e.g., Athanasius), stressed the union in Jesus between the Logos and flesh (Gk., sarx), giving rise to what became known as Logos-sarx (Word-flesh) Christology, with the main focus on the divinity of Jesus. Others, largely from Antioch (e.g., Theodore of Mopsuestia), highlighted the distinction between the human and the divine in Jesus, giving rise to what was known as Logos-anthropos (Word-human) Christology, which concentrated on the humanity of Jesus. This tension between the humanity and divinity of Jesus came to a head in a controversy between representatives from these schools.

Nestorius, an Antiochene monk, refused to call Mary "bearer of God," Theotokos, insisting instead on the title "bearer of Christ," Christotokos. Though the context is Mariological, the underlying issue is Christological. Nestorius's position implies a dualism of person in Jesus.

Cyril of Alexandria disagreed with Nestorius. Both appealed to Rome. A council was held at Ephesus in 431. Nestorius was condemned and Cyril's position was affirmed; namely, that there is a real union, a "hypostatic union" between the eternal Logos in Jesus and the human nature of Jesus. Ephesus did not produce a creed; instead it sought to settle a dispute, with little success. Increasing concern was expressed about the humanity of Jesus.

Another council was convened at Chalcedon in 451. This well-attended council gathered the threads from previous discussions and councils, especially Nicaea, and knitted them together into a new synthesis that affirmed the full divinity and full humanity existing as a unity in the person of Jesus Christ. Chalcedon stated that "our Lord Jesus Christ is one and the same Son . . . perfect in Godhead . . . perfect in humanity, truly God (Lat., vere Deus), truly a human being (vere homo), of one being (Gk., homoousios) with the Father . . . of one being (homoousios) with us as to his being human . . . made known in two natures, without confusion, without change, without division, without separation . . . concurring in one Person (Prosopon) and one independence (hypostasis)."

Chalcedon was a council of checks and balances. By far the most influential council in the history of Christology, Chalcedon provided the framework for subsequent discussion and debate, becoming the touchstone of orthodoxy right up to the present. The language of Chalcedon, namely, one Person, hypostasis, two natures, divine and human, continued to need refinement and this took place in subsequent centuries. At the same time Chalcedon was careful to use the inclusive Latin term homo ("human being") and not the male term vir ("man")—a matter of no small importance for twentieth-century feminist theology.

In spite of the balance of Chalcedon, not everybody accepted its teachings. Although it remains the norm, traces of Monophysitism in one form or another have persisted down through the centuries. Monophysitism denied the existence of a human nature in Christ, thereby exaggerating his divinity at the expense of his humanity.

The dogma of the Incarnation became the focus of Christological discussion in the Middle Ages. For example, Anselm (d. 1109) and Aquinas (d. 1274) argued that God became human in order to repay the debt to God created by human sin. In contrast Duns Scotus (d. 1308) suggested that the Incarnation was built into creation and that, therefore, it would have taken place irrespective of the reality of sin, a view that has become popular in twentieth-century Christology.

Another area receiving attention in the Middle Ages concerned the knowledge that Christ possessed. According to Aquinas, Christ enjoyed the direct vision, or experience, of God (Beatific Vision) during his earthly life as well as having infused knowledge (independent of sense experience) and experiential knowledge (strictly sense experience). This view of Aquinas has prevailed by and large down through the centuries right up to the middle of the twentieth century in Catholic theology.

In broad terms, classical Christology continued to hold a center-stage position through the Reformation and Counter-Reformation periods right up to the twentieth century in Catholic circles. In the middle of the twentieth century, from 1951 onward, classical Christology was challenged. The major influences were the delayed impact of the Enlightenment, Enlightenment, whose insights had been rejected by the Church and excluded from its theology, and the rise of historical consciousness, the retrieval of Chalcedon through studies commemorating its fifteen-hundredth anniversary in 1951 and, above all, the renewal of biblical studies.

CONTEMPORARY CHRISTOLOGY

By far the most significant development in contemporary Christology has been a recovery of the full humanity of Jesus in a manner that respects at the same time his divinity. The humanity of Jesus is seen as the key to a proper understanding of his divinity.

A major voice in the renewal of Catholic Christology was that of Karl Rahner (d. 1984), who argued that the Council of Chalcedon should be read as a beginning and not as an end. Rahner also critiqued the presence of Monophysitism in so much Christological thinking over the centuries. In particular Rahner showed how the Incarnation can be understood as the unique point of contact within history between God's gracious descending self-communication to the world and humanity's dynamic movement of ascending self-transcendence toward the divine. In the person of Jesus Christ, God and humanity come together in perfect unity.

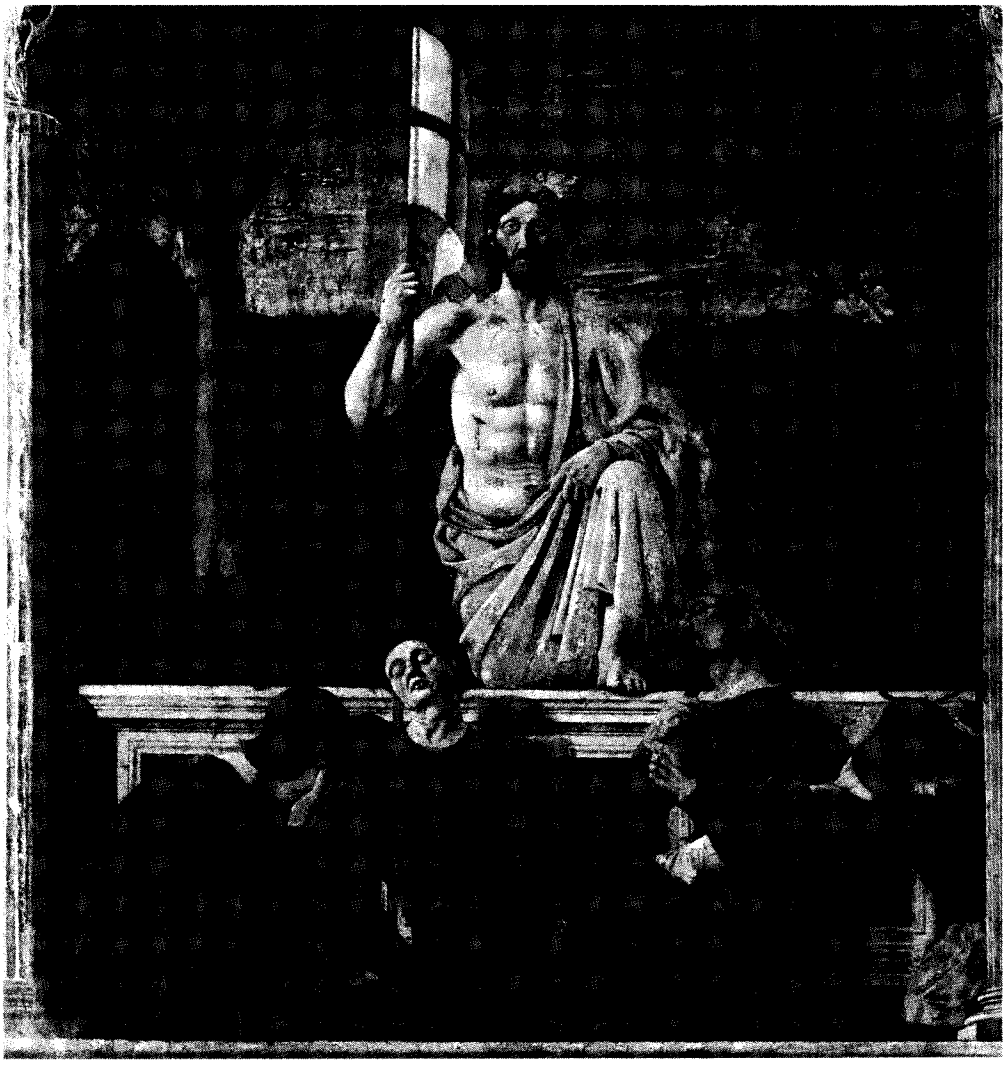
At the same time Rahner was rethinking classical Christology, the new quest for the historical Jesus came to the fore in 1953. This search for the historical Jesus of the Gospels complemented the renewal of interest in the humanity of Jesus.

Two very distinct Christological streams emerged in Catholic theology in the 1960s and 1970s, namely, incarnational and paschal Christologies.



"For fear of him the guards shook and became like dead men. But the angel said to the women, 'Do not be afraid; I know that you are looking for Jesus who was crucified. He is not here; for he has been raised, as he said'" (Matt 28:4–6); Piero della Francesca's fifteenth-century painting of the Resurrection, in the Pinacoteca Comunale, Sansepolcro, Italy.

It is no mere coincidence that the language of these streams is quite evident in the final documents of the Second Vatican Council. Though Vatican II did not develop in any detail a systematic Christology, it did make significant Christological statements. Indeed the Second Vatican Council is not as Christologically deficient as some have suggested.

While it has always been part of the Christian tradition to say that Jesus reveals God to the world, the Second Vatican Council went a step further, pointing out that the same Jesus "fully reveals man to man himself and makes his supreme calling clear" (Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, n. 22). In the same document the council also highlights the humanity of Jesus, noting that the "human nature as He assumed it was not annulled. . . . He worked with human hands, He thought with a human mind, He acted by human choices, and loved with a human heart" (n. 22). Further, Vatican II reunited the lost links between Christology and eschatology by emphasizing that Christ is the ground and goal of humanity, history, and creation (nn. 45, 10, 25, 2) and that the Paschal Mystery is the key to the future of the world (n. 25; see also the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, nn. 6, 18; Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, nn. 49, 51). Perhaps even more significant, Vatican II effects a shift from an exclusivist Christology to an inclusivist Christology by acknowledging the spiritual and moral values of the other world religions (Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions, nn. 2–4).

In the post–Vatican II period Christology has moved to the center of the stage in Catholic theology. At least three particular developments should be noted briefly. The first of these is the existence of liberation Christologies in Latin America. The point of departure for liberation Christology is the widespread presence of so much poverty and injustice in the Third World. Against this background it points out that Jesus came "to bring good news to the poor . . . to proclaim release to the captives and recovery of sight to the blind, to let the oppressed go free" (Luke 4:18). From this perspective liberation Christology proceeds to focus on the primacy of practice, especially the practice of liberation, within the life of Jesus. The cross of Christ is perceived to symbolize the solidarity of God with the suffering of humanity and the Resurrection reveals the triumph of that divine solidarity.

Closely related to liberation Christology is the rise of feminist Christology. Certain forms of feminism have been able to reread the NT in a way that is liberating for women and men alike. Feminist Christology retrieves the neglected presence of women in the ministry of Jesus and exposes the existence of a critique of patriarchy implicit in the preaching and practice of Jesus. The appearances of the risen Christ to women is stressed and the commissioning of the two Marys to go and tell the disciples that Christ has risen from the dead is also highlighted (Matt 28:1–10). Above all, the early baptismal formula, "There is no longer Jew or Greek, there is no longer slave or free, there is no longer male or female; for all of you are one in Christ Jesus" (Gal 3:28), is singled out as an ongoing challenge to the Christian community today.

A third development is the ever increasing focus on the possibility of an ecological Christology. A new conversation has been initiated between Christology and contemporary cosmologies. Such a dialogue can be found to be present in the NT, especially in the wisdom Christologies of the Pauline corpus (Phil 2:6–11; Rom 8:19–23; Eph 1:3–14; Col 1:15–10) and the synoptic Gospels, and the Logos Christology of John and early Hellenistic theology. This conversation has released a new appreciation of the cosmic Christ in the world. Within this perspective the intrinsic unity of creation and incarnation stressed by Irenaeus (d. ca. 200), Duns Scotus (d. 1308), and Teilhard de Chardin (d. 1955) takes on new meaning and provides a foundation for an ecological Christology in the future.

By way of conclusion it must be stressed that Christology is ultimately about a new awareness of the mystery of the hidden God revealed in the person of Jesus. In the end Christology must be judged by its ability to light up the incomprehensible reality of God's presence and action in the world. Christology does this in at least two ways. First of all, the mystery of Christ reminds one that God has drawn near to humankind in the shape and form of the humanity of Jesus. The human being as other is the Logos of God's self-revelation, especially the humanum of the crucified and risen Christ. Because the eternal Word of God was made flesh in Jesus, the apparent gulf between heaven and earth, between God and humanity, between the sacred and the secular has once and for all been overcome, so that now in the light of the mystery of Christ people are able to glimpse heaven on earth, find God in humanity, and discover the sacred within the secular.

Second, Christology also lights up the mystery of God by disclosing God as Father, Son, and Spirit. The Abba experience of Jesus, the drama of the cross, the outpouring of the Spirit, and the unique Christian insight that God is love (1 John 4:16) are stepping stones to the trinitarian consciousness of the early Church. The present renaissance of trinitarian theology taking place in the works of European scholars like Walter Kasper and U.S. scholars like Catherine Mowry LaCugna and Elizabeth A. Johnson is indicative of the theocentric character of Christology and represents the flowering of the renewal of Christology since Vatican II.

See also Arianism; Ascension; Chalcedon, Council of; Christology; crucifixion; God; hypostatic union; Incarnation, the kingdom of God [in the Bible]; Logos; Monophysitism; Monothelitism; Nestorianism; preexistence of Christ; redemption; Resurrection of Christ.

Bibliography

Fitzmeyer, Joseph A. A Christological Catechism. 2d ed. New York: Paulist Press, 1991.
Johnson, Elizabeth A. Consider Jesus. New York: Crossroad, 1990.
Krieg, Robert A. Story-Shaped Christology. New York: Paulist Press, 1988.
Lane, Dermot A. Christ at the Centre. New York: Paulist Press, 1991.
_____. The Reality of Jesus. New York: Paulist Press, 1975.
Meier, John P. A Marginal Jew. 2 vols. New York: Doubleday, 1991, 1994.
Senior, Donald. Jesus: A Gospel Portrait. Rev. ed. New York: Paulist Press, 1992.
Thompson, William M. The Jesus Debate. New York: Paulist Press, 1985. DERMOT A. LANE

Jesus Prayer, the name of a prayer addressed to Jesus, sometimes also linked to a special method of prayer involving physical techniques. The text of the Jesus prayer is: "Lord Jesus Christ, have mercy on me, a sinner." The prayer itself, used extensively in contemporary Orthodox Christianity, dates from around the sixth or seventh centuries. Its origin is probably Greek and it served as a salutory invocation of the Holy Name and a petition for divine pardon. The development of the prayer's association with a specialized praying technique is more difficult to trace. Some believe that this use of the prayer did not occur until the fourteenth century. The method involves controlled breathing, bowed head and concentration upon one's heart, not unlike meditation techniques common in raja yoga, an Indian meditation tradition. These physical aspects of the Jesus Prayer, however, are not practiced today by the Orthodox. See also prayer.

Jewish Christianity, a term somewhat fluid in reference partly because the earliest Christians were all Jews and partly because, even in the case of gentile converts, early debates about the terms of admission were debates not about admitting Gentiles to a new religion but to a form of Judaism. The question in both cases, until ca. 100, was which form of Judaism represented the true Israel. Between ca. 70 and ca. 90, Christians began to be expelled from synagogues as heretics (somewhat later, a curse against them was included in the synagogue liturgy). With the expansion of gentile churches, most Christians differentiated themselves from "the Jews," arguing that Christians, not the Jews, were the heirs of the promises made to the patriarchs and that observance of the Sabbath, circumcision, ceremonial laws, etc., was never meant literally or was meant as a punishment for the incident of the golden calf (Exod 32).

This left in an awkward position Jewish Christians who still observed the law, as the earliest Christians had done, but who were heretics to orthodox Judaism. They soon diminished in prominence, sometimes merging with Gnostic or other heretical sects, sometimes regarded as heretical simply because of their increasingly unfamiliar, but ancient, practice. Their groups are given various names (Ebionites, the most significant group; Cerinthians, Elkesaites, Hemerobaptists, Nazareans, Symmachians), and fragments of Jewish-Christian literature survive (Gospel According to the Hebrews, perhaps a revision and translation of Matthew; Gospel of the Ebionites; Gospel of the Nazareans). The Pseudo-Clementine literature incorporates the Acts of Peter and the Preaching of Peter. Most Jewish Christians were located in the Transjordan, where, according to Eusebius, they fled from Jerusalem at the beginning of the Jewish War (66). See also Judaism.

JOHN C. CAVADINI

Jews, Catholicism and. The history of Catholic-Jewish relations is coterminous with the history of the Church itself. Jesus and the apostles were Jewish, acknowledged the Bible of Israel as Sacred Scripture, and adhered to Jewish practice in worship and religious life. The attitude of Christians toward Jews who continued to observe their ancestral faith tradition of Judaism became increasingly ambiguous over the centuries.

On the one hand, Church law and patristic theology insisted that the Jewish people be protected, since they witnessed to the authenticity of the Bible of Israel (which came to be known as the Old Testament). On the other hand, the people of Israel, albeit God's chosen, had missed their moment, "blind" as they were to Christian claims concerning Jesus as their Messiah. Although medieval canon law made it an excommunicable offense for Christians to disrupt Jewish prayer, it legislated restrictions on the Jewish community economically, politically, socially, and religiously.

Negative Developments: Large-scale violence by Christians against Jews first occurred throughout Europe with the Crusades, beginning in 1096. Along with it came an escalation of anti-Jewish rhetoric and theologizing, so that, beginning in the twelfth century, Talmuds were burned, and Passion plays and the blood libel (the notion that Jews ritually murder Christians) proliferated in the fourteenth century. This same period saw the expulsion of the Jewish communities of most of western Europe (with some exceptions, such as Italy and Poland), culminating in the exile of the ancient Jewish communities of Spain in 1492. Most of the lies against, and stereotypes of, Jews and Judaism developed and spread in societies, such as England, that were largely lacking in Jewish populations.

The Protestant Reformation did not attempt to reform these ancient Christian animosities toward Jews. Nor did the Enlightenment succeed in shedding light on the dark images of Jews that were harbored by vast numbers of Europeans. The pseudo-scientific racial theories of the late eighteenth and nineteenth centuries found widespread acceptance, perhaps because the protective pole of the Church's traditional theological stance was effectively neutralized as a moral force in society at large.

In the twentieth century the Nazi Holocaust (Heb., Shoah) saw an attempt to muster the full resources of a modern, highly technical state to the goal (Ger., Endlosung) of murdering an entire people. When the death camps were liberated, a new vocabulary, with such words as "genocide," had to be invented to describe this new reality.

Vatican II: In 1965 the Second Vatican Council's Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions (Nostra Aetate) implicitly took up the Holocaust's challenge to Catholic teaching by mandating strict guidelines for Catholic biblical interpretation and catechesis. "The Jews must not be presented as rejected by God or accursed as if this followed from Sacred Scripture. . . . Now, as before, God holds the Jews most dear for the sake of their fathers: God does not repent of gifts made nor calls issued" (n. 4). As Pope John Paul II summarized the council, the Jews remain "the people of God of the Old Covenant never revoked by God."

Official Catholic teaching today boldly affirms God's continuing covenantal love for the Jewish people, and calls on all Catholics to respect the integrity and spiritual fecundity of the Jewish faith. The Catholic Church approaches the Jewish people today in a spirit of repentance and dialogue, not triumphalism. See also Judaism. EUGENE J. FISHER

Joachim, St. See Anne and Joachim, Sts.

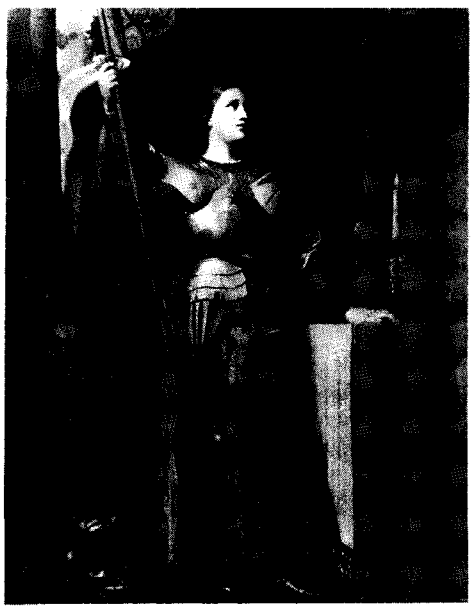
Joachim of Fiore, ca. 1135–1202, Italian monk and exegete. Joachim, who had been a Cistercian monk and abbot in southern Italy, founded at Fiore his own order, the Florensians, which received papal approval in 1196. He is most famous for his original exposition of Scripture in which he divides salvation history into three ages: (1) the age of the Father, characterized by the married state; (2) the age of the Son, characterized by the clerical state; and (3) the age of the Spirit, by the monastic state. Although Joachim gave no exact dating for these stages, his work was used by later writers, notably the Franciscan Gerard of Borgo San Donnino in his Introduction to the Eternal Gospel (1254), to argue that the age of the Spirit was imminent. Joachim's schema has since often been used to read current political events as signs of the end times.

Joan, "Pope," medieval fable. According to one version of this legend, which seems to date from the thirteenth century, Pope Leo IV (d. 855) was succeeded by a Pope Joan, rather than by the historical Benedict III. This Joan, the story goes, was actually a learned woman who, traveling in men's clothing, came from Athens to Rome and began an ecclesiastical career. When she eventually gave birth during a papal procession, her secret was revealed, and she was removed from office and punished. The story was generally accepted as fact until the sixteenth century.

Joan of Arc, St., 1412–31, a patron saint of France. A peasant girl, in the midst of the Hundred Years' War she began to experience a series of supernatural visions that convinced her that she had a divine mission to save France from the English. By 1429 she had convinced the dauphin Charles VII to allow her to lead an expedition to relieve the siege of the city of Orléans and persuaded Charles that same year to receive formal coronation as king of France. Taken prisoner in a campaign against the Burgundians, French allies of the English, she was burned at the stake by the English for witchcraft. Pope Callistus III declared her innocence in 1456, and she was canonized in 1920. Feast day: May 30. See also France, Catholicism in.

Joan of Arc, fifteenth-century French national heroine who is credited with saving France at the battle of Orléans; depicted here in her suit of white armor and bearing a banner with a symbol of the Trinity and the words, "Jesus, Maria."



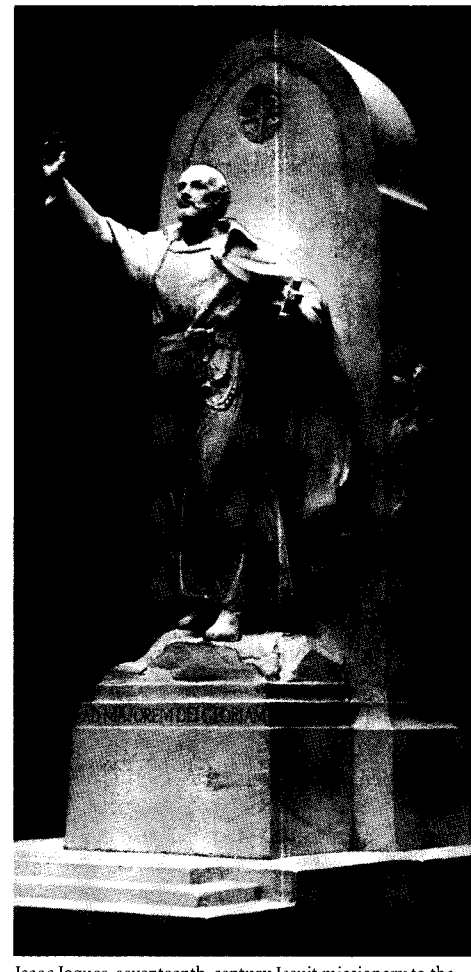
Joaquina de Vedruna de Mas, St., 1783–1854, founder of the Carmelite Sisters of Charity. Born of a noble Spanish family, she married, was widowed, and founded a religious community to teach the young and care for the sick. Feast day: August 28.

Jocists (Fr., Jeunesse Ouvrière Chrétienne, "Young Christian Workers"), a post-World War I Belgian Catholic Action movement that became popular in France and the United States in the late 1920s and 1930s. Established by Cardinal Cardijn (d. 1967), the Jocists encouraged their lay members to see the workplace as an opportunity for evangelization. By the way they conducted themselves, Jocists believed that they could be living examples of Catholic faith in action, thereby spreading the gospel and encouraging non-Catholics to consider conversion to the Church. In effect, Jocists attempted to create an apostolate of their employment and to do their best to incorporate Christian values into the work environment. See also Cardijn, Joseph.

Jogues, St. Isaac (zhog), 1607–46, Jesuit missionary. Born in France, Jogues entered the Jesuits in 1624 and arrived in New France in 1636, where he worked in missions among the Hurons along Lake Superior. Rather than escape the attacking Mohawks in 1642, Jogues and his lay associate, René Goupil, chose captivity with their Huron companions. Goupil was quickly killed, but Jogues was tortured until adopted as a slave by a Mohawk woman.

With the aid of the Dutch, one year later he escaped to New Amsterdam. Feted upon his return to France, Jogues again volunteered for missionary work among the Mohawks in 1646. On the day after his arrival at the village of Ossernenon near present-day Auriesville, New York, he was felled by a hatchet blow from an Iroquois warrior who feared Jogues as a sorcerer causing the ruin of the corn crop. Jogues and seven companions were canonized in 1930 and proclaimed the patron saints of Canada in 1940. Feast day: October 19. See also North American Martyrs.

Johannine Comma, the words "in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit, and these three are one. And there are three who testify on earth" (1 John 5:7–8). They are found in some Latin manuscripts dating before A.D. 1000 and were adopted into the Sixto-Clementine version of the Vulgate. Their authenticity is repudiated by modern textual critics, especially as the context speaks of the three witnesses as "the Spirit, the water and the blood" (1 John 5:8).



Isaac Jogues, seventeenth-century Jesuit missionary to the New World (Canada and northern New York) and one of the North American Martyrs; the Latin inscription on the New York State memorial reads: "To the greater glory of God."

John I, St., d. 526, pope from 523 to 526. The Gothic king Theodoric, an Arian, forced John to travel to Constantinople to persuade the emperor Justin to annul his anti-Arian decrees. Only partially successful, John was imprisoned by Theodoric upon his return. He died in prison. Feast day: May 18. See also Arianism.

John XII [Octavian], ca. 936–64, pope from 955 to 964. Known for his corrupt life-style, John gained control of much of Italy at the price of imperial interference in papal elections. Forced from Rome because of a conflict with Emperor Otto I, he returned in 964 but died soon after deposing Leo VIII, who had been elected in his absence.

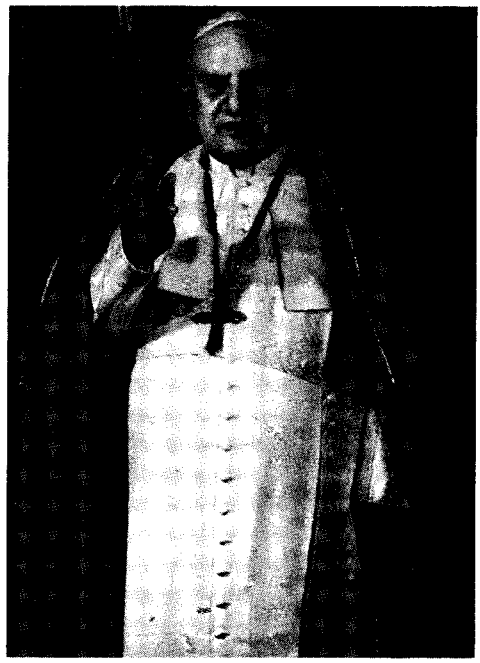
John XXII [Jacques Duèse], 1244–1334, the second Avignon pope, from 1316 to 1334, and the one who authorized the canonization of Thomas Aquinas. When he assumed the papacy, after teaching law and serving as bishop of Avignon, John furthered the centralization of Church administration and reformed papal finances. His papacy was contentious, marked by continual battles with the emperor, Louis of Bavaria, and with the Franciscans over the poverty question. During his last three years of life John preached that the saints will not enjoy the Beatific Vision until after final judgment, a view condemned by his successor. See also Avignon.

John XXIII [Angelo Giuseppe Roncalli], 1881–1963, pope from 1958 to 1963. He is perhaps the greatest, certainly the most beloved, pope of modern times; convener of the Second Vatican Council. After twenty-five years as a papal diplomat in Bulgaria, Turkey, and France, and six as patriarch of Venice, Angelo Roncalli was elected pope just before his seventy-seventh birthday. He was not expected to do more than keep the papal chair warm for Giovanni Battista Montini, then archbishop of Milan and later Pope Paul VI. Yet within six months John XXIII astonished the world by calling an ecumenical council.

Even more astonishing was the kind of council he envisaged. It was not called to condemn errors—though he did not deny they were numerous enough. "Nowadays men are condemning them of their own accord," he said, noting that these errors vanished like mist in the morning sun. The Church today needed the medicine of mercy more than severity. So his council would be pastoral and would try to express the substance of the faith in new language. The project was ecumenical from the outset because it concentrated minds on the gospel.

John's own outgoing personality gave vast resonance to these themes. He was accessible and friendly, seeing no reason to emulate the formal aloofness of his predecessor, Pius XII. John strolled in the Vatican Gardens. He visited the Regina Coeli prison for Christmas and recalled the arrest of one of his numerous relatives. He disarmed traditional enemies like the Communists. He made grace seem natural. Above all, he was open to the Holy Spirit, his only "superior." His alertness to the Holy Spirit in the modern world led him to speak of the "signs of the times." He saw the Spirit at work in the end of colonialism, the emancipation of the working class, and the promotion of women in society. This provided the method of Gaudium et Spes, the council's Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World.



Pope John XXIII (d. 1963), one of the greatest and most beloved popes in the entire history of the Church, best known for calling the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) and for initiating a period of major renewal and reform of the Catholic Church; this official Vatican photo was taken in 1958, just after his election to the papacy.

The Pope and the Council: John thought in images. We are not born to be "museum-keepers, but to cultivate a flourishing garden of life," he said. He expressed this sense of burgeoning new life in the Church by calling the council "a new Pentecost." This implied far more than the juridical observation that the Holy Spirit would "assist" the ecumenical council. In John's mind, the council was an event of the Holy Spirit in which the whole Church was involved. Everyone was urged to say his "prayer for the council": "Renew thy wonders in this day, as by a New Pentecost."

This, though it aroused enthusiasm, could not set the agenda. For him the purpose of the council was the aggiornamento (It., "updating") of the Catholic Church. This would, of itself, set off ecumenical vibrations leading toward what he called "the recomposition of the whole mystical flock of Christ." He knew this would involve "a change in mentalities, ways of thinking and prejudices." The council's language should "shed light on and remove misunderstandings, and it should dissipate error by the force of truth."

However, John appeared to approve of the texts prepared by the Curia for the council. Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger declared later that the pope "had not envisaged the possibility of rejection and expected a rapid and painless vote in favor of projects that he had read through and welcomed with full approval." The implication is that Pope John sided with the minority at the first session and was upset by the rejection of such excellent draft documents. But this view cannot be sustained. Although Pope John approved in general of the prepared texts, he was not deeply attached to them and was prepared to see them dropped without any deep sense of personal loss. They would do—until something better came along. In any case, the council was sovereign.

On September 11, 1962, John broadcast to the world and asked: "Has there ever been an ecumenical council which was not a way of self-renewal through an encounter with the Risen Jesus, the glorious and immortal King, whose light illumines the whole Church for the salvation, joy and glory of all peoples?" The question was rhetorical. There was also a new note. It would be illuminating and helpful to present the Church "in the underdeveloped countries as the Church of all, and especially of the poor." This provided the impetus for the opening chord of the pastoral constitution Gaudium et Spes.

One last idea was slotted into place in this broadcast. From Cardinal Leo-Josef Suenens of Belgium Pope John had learned to distinguish between the Church ad intra and the Church ad extra. It helped to clarify two sets of problems the council would have to deal with: internal questions (the nature of the Church, worship, ecumenism, etc.), and external questions (war, peace, birth control, hunger, etc.).

The Last Months: Just over a week later, on September 23, 1962, X-ray examinations revealed that Pope John was suffering from stomach cancer. Nothing was said publicly, but he realized that if the council lasted more than one session, he would not be able to see it through. He said to a friend: "At least I have launched this big ship—others will have to bring it into port."

But he still had time to overcome the theory, defended by Cardinal Alfredo Ottaviani (d. 1979), head of the Holy Office, that "error has no rights." The abandonment of this thesis was a precondition of the council's treatment of ecumenism, religious liberty, and non-Christian religions. This issue dominated the first session of the council, the only one Pope John knew. He intervened rarely, but always decisively, to ensure joint commissions so that the minority (mostly from the Curia) would be able to accept the council's verdict without being humiliated.

During this autumn of 1962 the Cuban missile crisis brought the United States and the Soviet Union close to war. Pope John's message to heads of state—broadcast on Vatican Radio on October 25—made the front page of the Soviet newspaper Pravda the next day under the banner headline: "We beg all rulers not to be deaf to the cry of humanity." This was unheard of. John's appeal enabled Nikita Krushchev, the Soviet leader, to back down without losing face. It encouraged Pope John to compose his last will and testament, the encyclical Pacem in Terris on universal peace. Then he could die, before the gaze of the whole world, offering his life for the success of the council, whose outline and spirit he had so clearly laid down. See also aggiornamento; Mater et Magistra; Pacem in Terris; Vatican Council II.

Bibliography

Hebblethwaite, Peter. Pope John XXIII: Shepherd of the Modern World. Garden City, NJ: Doubleday, 1985.

Zizola, Giancarlo. The Utopia of Pope John XXIII. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1978.

PETER HEBBLETHWAITE

John XXIII [Baldassarre Cossa], ca. 1370–1419, antipope from 1410 to 1415, second pope of the Pisan line, who ruled a large part of the Church during the last years of the Great Western Schism. He was elevated to cardinal in 1402 and was instrumental at the Council of Pisa (1409) in the election of Alexander V, whom he succeeded the following year. He convened the Council of Constance in 1414, but withdrew when he realized it would call for his own resignation. For years canonists disagreed about the legitimacy of his papacy. As an antipope, he is to be distinguished from the better-known modern pope, John XXIII (d. 1963), who convened the Second Vatican Council. See also antipope; Constance, Council of; Great Schism; Pisa, Council of.

John Bosco, St. See Bosco, St. John.

John Cantius, St. See Cantius, St. John.

John Capistrano, St. See Capistrano, St. John.

John Cassian, St. See Cassian, St. John.

John Chrysostom, St. See Chrysostom, St. John.

John Climacus, St. See Climacus, St. John.

John de Brébeuf, St. See Brébeuf, St. Jean de.

John Eudes, St. See Eudes, St. John.

John Fisher, St. See Fisher, St. John.

John Gualbert, St., ca. 995–1073, abbot and founder of the Vallumbrosan congregation. A Florentine knight who adopted the monastic life, John became a hermit in the forest of Vallumbrosa, near Florence (ca. 1030). Here he founded a monastery under the Rule of St. Benedict, with additional provisions to emphasize poverty. Feast day: July 12. See also Benedict, Rule of St.; Vallumbrosan order.

John Moschus. See Moschus, John.

John Nepomucen, St. (nep-uhm'oo-sen), 1350–93, martyr and patron saint of the Czechs. As vicar general of Prague, he disputed with King Wenceslaus IV of Bohemia over the administration of the abbey of Kladruby. Seized by royal troops, he was tortured and drowned. Feast day: May 16.

John of Antioch, d. ca. 441, bishop of Antioch and supporter of his friend Nestorius. Ordered to the Council of Ephesus (431) to explain that support, he arrived after Nestorius's condemnation for teaching that Jesus Christ was a human person as well as a divine person. In response, he called a rival council vindicating Nestorius and condemning Cyril of Alexandria, who had championed the condemnation of Nestorius. A later reconciliation with Cyril in 433 caused a schism with many Eastern Nestorian churches.

John of Ávila, St., 1499–1569, spiritual adviser of Teresa of Ávila, John of the Cross, Francis Borgia, and Peter of Alcántara, among others. A Spanish priest devoted to a life of austerity, he preached so strongly against the rich that he was imprisoned for a time by the Inquisition at Seville. After his release he continued preaching all over Spain and was immensely popular. Feast day: May 10.

John of Damascus, St., ca. 675–ca. 749, Greek theologian and Doctor of the Church. An Arab Christian, he succeeded his father and grandfather as a minister to the caliphs, but after 700 retired to the monastery of St. Sabas near Jerusalem, where he was ordained a priest. John is known principally for his extensive theological works, especially On the Orthodox Faith, a brilliant compilation and synthesis of Greek theology that became enormously influential in the medieval West, being used by Peter Lombard, Thomas Aquinas, and others. John's other works include homilies, ascetic writings, polemical and dogmatic treatises, as well as poetry, some of which is incorporated into the Greek liturgy. His defense of the veneration of images against iconoclasm developed into a highly original spiritual teaching centered on the Incarnation and on the imaging of Jesus by the saints. John teaches the Real Presence, and also Mary's exemption from sin and her Assumption. Feast day: December 4. See also Fathers of the Church; iconoclasm.

John of God, St., 1495–1550, patron saint of the sick and of hospitals. Portuguese soldier, slave overseer, shepherd, and finally peddler of religious books in Gibraltar, he was spiritually overcome while hearing a sermon by John of Ávila in 1538. Filled with such guilt over his life, he appeared to everyone to have gone mad. By 1540 he began to devote himself more calmly to helping the sick and poor and opened a hospital in Grenada that was the beginning of the Brothers Hospitallers (Brothers of St. John of God). Feast day: March 8. See also Hospitallers.

John of Kanti, St. See Cantius, St. John.

John of Matha, St., 1578–1618, cofounder with Felix of Valois of the Order of the Most Holy Trinity (Trinitarians). Born in France, he lived for a time as a hermit under the spiritual direction of Felix, to whom he confided his desire of founding a religious order to recover Christian captives from the Muslims by nonviolent means. Upon papal approval of the order, John became its first superior. Feast day: February 8. See also Trinitarians.

John of Paris [Jean Quidort], d. 1306, Dominican theologian. Trained in theology at the University of Paris, he wrote over twenty works, including an important defense of Thomas Aquinas against Franciscan attack. He is undoubtedly best known for his Tractate on Regal and Papal Power (1302–3). This work shuns the extremism of much contemporary political theory, refusing to make either the spiritual or the temporal authority subservient to the other. Rather, following Aquinas, John insists that when functioning properly, each should operate autonomously. As the Vicar of Christ, the pope is the source of spiritual authority on earth; the ecclesiastical hierarchy is commissioned by Christ to promote the attainment, in the next life, of the human person's supernatural end, i.e., life with God in heaven. Temporal authority, on the other hand, is in origin and justification independent of the pope: rooted in natural law, it is designed to facilitate the realization in this life of ends natural to being human. Only if there is a breakdown in one sphere of activity, John adds, should the other authority intervene. The tone, as well as the content, of the treatise is moderate: it offers little indication that its composition coincided with the struggle for supremacy between the French king, Philip the Fair, and Pope Boniface VIII. See also Church and state.

John of Parma, ca. 1208–89, Franciscan friar and minister general of the order from 1247 to 1257. A famous reformer, theologian, and preacher, John was forced to resign as minister general in 1257 because of his Joachimite (Joachim of Fiore) sympathies. See also Joachim of Fiore.

John of Salisbury, 1115–80, bishop and philosopher. Educated at Paris, John served as secretary to Thomas Becket. He was later elected bishop of Chartres (1176). His Metalogicon is one of the first medieval commentaries on Aristotelian logic; he also wrote the Policraticus, or Statesman's Book, and lives of Anselm of Canterbury and Becket. See also Becket, St. Thomas.

John of St. Thomas, 1589–1644, Dominican philosopher and theologian, champion of the thought of Thomas Aquinas. Of noble descent, John Poinsot had a varied career, as university professor (at Alcalá), advisor to the Spanish Inquisition, and confessor of King Philip IV of Spain. His major works, which proved highly influential in later Thomism, include a large philosophical study covering formal and material logic and natural philosophy and a similar theological work broadly patterned on Aquinas's Summa Theologiae. Although his reading of Aquinas has its detractors, the teaching on signs in the first part of John's great philosophical work has brought him renewed interest from semioticians. See also Thomism.

John of the Cross, St., 1542–91, Doctor of the Church, reformer of the Carmelite order, and one of the greatest of Catholic mystics and Spanish poets. He entered the Carmelite order in 1563, taking the name of John of St. Matthias. He studied in Salamanca (1554–68) and was ordained in 1567. That same year, John met Teresa of Ávila, who persuaded him to collaborate in the reform of the order. On November 11, 1568, his name changed to John of the Cross, he assumed the Primitive Rule and helped to found the first monastery of the reform. He was subsequently rector of the college at Alcalá and then confessor of the Carmelite nuns at Incarnation in Ávila, where Teresa was prioress. Kidnapped by Carmelites hostile to the reform, he was harshly imprisoned in Toledo where he began to write his greatest poetry. He escaped from this prison and continued to write mystical poems and to compose lengthy commentaries upon a few of them, his Scholastic theology becoming a hermeneutic of the religious experience contained in these art objects.

John of the Cross, sixteenth-century mystic, cofounder of the Discalced Carmelites, and author of such spiritual classics as the Ascent of Mount Carmel and Dark Night of the Soul.

John held various positions within the reformed ("Discalced") Carmelites and underwent significant persecution at the end of his life.

Writings and Teachings: Besides his poetry, various compilations of maxims and counsels, and letters, John wrote three (or four) major treatises: The Ascent of Mount Carmel–The Dark Night of the Soul, The Spiritual Canticle, and The Living Flame of Love, describing with profound insight the movement of the person into contemplation and union with God, of becoming "God by participation" (Ascent of Mount Carmel 11.5.7). The "dark night" provides the metaphor for the purification through which the person journeys, night distinguished by that which is being purified (senses and spirit), the agency predominating (active and passive), the formal purification (privation of appetite, faith, communication of God), and the finality achieved (contemplation and union with God).

The night of the senses brings about the purification of motivation from the dominance of pleasure and satisfaction, either actively, through the choices made under the guidance and motivation of Christ, or passively, when satisfaction is gone and one continues to follow the movements of grace even through there seems to be no recompense. Gradually out of this night emerges a contemplative prayer that is peaceful and without images.

The night of the spirit, the night of faith, is far more demanding than the night of the senses. The issue here is not so much a question of motivation as of support systems: the concepts, the systems of meaning, the symbols and structures by which reassurance is forthcoming. Faith alone becomes the ultimate guide. This night is a purification of all other sources of security and guidance, either actively, as a person takes faith increasingly as the guide of his or her life, or passively, when the supports drop away from one's consciousness and there is only the experience of emptiness, impurity, weakness, abandonment, and death. If the night of the senses is the experience of the desert, the night of the spirit is the experience of the Cross.

The night of the senses terminates in contemplation; the night of the spirit terminates in transformation or union with God. Within this state of habitual union, the soul will occasionally experience the acts of love that are the activity of the Holy Spirit with which the soul is now united and "made one with it, loves most sublimely" (Living Flame 1.2).

John of the Cross was canonized in 1726 and declared a Doctor of the Church in 1926. Feast day: December 14. See also Carmelite order; dark night, the; Primitive Rule; Teresa of Ávila, St.

MICHAEL J. BUCKLEY

John Paul I [Albino Luciani], 1912–78, pope from August 26 to September 28, 1978. He left his mark on the papacy first by his choice of a double-barreled name as a debt of gratitude to his two predecessors, John XXIII and Paul VI. He admitted that he did not have the wisdom of heart of Pope John nor the culture of Pope Paul. He knew that popes John and Paul were popularly contrasted, with John symbolizing openness to all people of good will while Paul was perceived as a hesitant worrier. John Paul's choice of name meant a refusal to separate them.

The second achievement of his brief reign was to simplify the papal style. John Paul banished the tiara and the sedia gestatoria (Lat., portable chair) and simply inaugurated his pastoral ministry as supreme pastor.

His thirty-three-day pontificate did not provide enough evidence to show how he would have developed. He was himself a skilled catechist with a talent for communication. But on his only sortie from the Vatican he revived the sedia gestatoria (in response to popular demand) and denounced false notions of creativity that led to liturgical excesses.

Pope John Paul I, who served only thirty-three days in the papacy, dispensed with the centuries-old tradition of being crowned like a temporal sovereign and instead was invested with the simple pallium, worn around the neck as a symbol of an archbishop's pastoral office, and the miter; he is shown here being carried on the traditional sedia gestatoria as he prepared to enter the Lateran Basilica, his cathedral church as Bishop of Rome.

His death, probably late on the night of September 28, 1978, was made needlessly mysterious by the Vatican claim that he was found by his Irish priest-secretary. This was false. He was found by Sister Vincenza, his housekeeper. Nor was his last reading The Imitation of Christ. The Vatican manipulated the story for public relations purposes, thus giving rise to extravagant theories about the "real" cause of death. The truth is, John Paul died prematurely because he needed treatment for serious health problems and did not seek or receive it.

Ordained in 1935, appointed bishop of Vittorio Veneto in 1958, then patriarch of Venice in 1969, he was the author of Illustrissimi, a series of letters to historical and fictional characters. He was the first pope born of working-class parents.

PETER HEBBLETHWAITE

John Paul II [Karol Wojtyla], b. 1920, pope since 1978. He is the first non-Italian pope since the Dutchman Hadrian VI in 1523, the first ever Polish pope, and at fifty-eight the youngest pope since Pius IX in 1846. He considered the name Stanislaus, after the patron saint of Cracow, where he had been archbishop since 1963. In the end, he followed the example of his predecessor and chose John Paul II.

The Pope and History: For John Paul II, his election to the papacy was providential, a compensation for Polish sufferings in the nineteenth century, and then under Nazism and Communism. His mission would be to bring the insights and values of the suffering Church of the East to the comfortable churches of the West and to put a stop to postconciliar drift.

He made saints Cyril and Methodius coequal patron saints of Europe alongside St. Benedict. He meant that the Church needed to, in his words, "breathe with two lungs," combining the Latin tradition of order and law with the more mystical Greek tradition. These ideas were expressed in the encyclical Slavorum Apostolorum (1985, the first encyclical on Europe).

On his first visit home in 1979 he prayed that the Holy Spirit might renew the face of the earth, of "this earth" (Pol., ziemen) he added, meaning Poland. Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev's visit to the Vatican on December 1, 1989, just as the Berlin Wall was torn down, seemed like the answer to the pope's prayer.

The Ukrainian Catholic Church, brutally suppressed by Stalin in 1946, emerged from the underground after 1989 with four million adherents and recovered more than three thousand churches and other properties. Gorbachev's successor, Boris Yeltsin, was able to overcome the coup of August 1991 thanks in part to the shortwave transmitter of Radio Blagovest, a Moscow-based Catholic radio station.

These dramatic events confirmed John Paul's sense of providential purpose. The failed assassination attempt on May 13, 1981, seemed to be further evidence that he was right. John Paul forgave his assailant, Mehemet Ali Agca, in prison.

In December 1991 John Paul held a Roman synod to celebrate the Church's victory over what he called "the greatest attempt to destroy Christianity since the Roman Emperor Diocletian." Monstrous tyranny had been overcome by nonviolent means. The Soviet empire was the first in history to fall to spiritual power.

But to pursue this grandiose vision, the rest of the Church had to be in disciplined good order. John Paul had a different agenda from that of the Western Church. Debates about the ordination of married men or of women or about contraception and sexual morality seemed to him trivial compared with the great cosmic struggle in which he was engaged.

Pope John Paul II, the first Slav ever elected to the papacy and the most widely traveled pope in history.

The Pope and the World: The next problem came from Islam, the only other religious force capable of rivaling Christianity. But John Paul II sought cooperation rather than confrontation—hence, his relative indulgence toward Iraq's President Saddam Hussein during the Persian Gulf War of 1991. John Paul refused to see it either as a Muslim jihad (Arabic, "holy war") or a Christian crusade. After it was over, he was thanked by the Organization of Muslim States for his evenhandedness.

If John Paul's grand design was to succeed, the place of Israel would have to be assured and the Palestinian problem resolved. John Paul was the first pope to visit the chief synagogue in Rome, where he talked about "Abraham, our father in faith." In 1992 he took the first steps toward the diplomatic recognition of Israel.

After Vatican II many Catholics believed that the papacy would be less monarchical and more collegial in style. John Paul II disappointed this expectation. The Church in his pontificate has become more centralized, not less so. The appointment of bishops has been tightly controlled. In Austria, Switzerland, Brazil, and elsewhere, "unpopular" bishops have been appointed. Right-wing movements like Opus Dei and Communion and Liberation (Comunione e Liberazione) have been encouraged.

These moves have been based on an analysis of the state of the postconciliar Church, which John Paul believed was undergoing a crisis of identity. Ecumenism had blunted the edges of Catholic identity: the remedy was to stress those things that divided Catholics from other Christians—papal infallibility, Mariology, defense of Paul VI's encyclical on birth control (Humanae Vitae), and the presentation of homosexuality as a "disorder." Priestly identity was also reasserted: the Catholic priest was to be celibate for life, dressed in clericals, spiritual, and "above" or at any rate "out of" politics. Nuns were to resume wearing their habits. Theologians were to be docile and not raise awkward questions.

John Paul has carried these policies around the world in the more than one hundred twenty countries to which he has gone "on pilgrimage." This wholly unprecedented papal jet-travel has been the most striking external feature of his papacy, and the sight of him kissing the tarmac at airports has become familiar on television. The effects of the papal visits has depended entirely on the local situation.

On his travels, John Paul has shown his mistrust of liberation theology. Two documents in 1984 and 1985 from Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, prefect of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, the Vatican doctrinal watchdog, left no doubt that the pope believed liberation theology was tainted with Marxism. Yet John Paul admitted, in a 1986 letter to the Brazilian bishops, that once purified of Marxism, it could be "legitimate and necessary."

The general public was overawed by the pope's superstar quality. His visit to Britain in May-June 1982 was a triumph. John Paul walked up the aisle of Canterbury Cathedral alongside Dr. Robert Runcie, the Anglican archbishop. It seemed that a new era was dawning in Catholic-Anglican relations, underpinned by the solid theological agreements reached by ARCIC (the Anglican/Roman Catholic International Commission). Yet in December 1991 Cardinal Ratzinger, the head of the powerful Vatican Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, gave a negative verdict on the ARCIC agreements and showed no understanding of their method.

On July 15, 1992, Pope John Paul had an operation to remove a benign intestinal tumor. It reduced the intensity of his activity, but he was still able to go to Santo Domingo for the fifth centenary of Columbus' explorations. The question of resignation briefly resurfaced, as it did again in 1994 when he twice fell and broke bones in his arm and leg. But resignation will only happen if John Paul is incapacitated. Otherwise, he is fascinated by the year 2000, when, if he lives, he will be 80. He had declared the 1990s the decade of evangelization. John Paul fulfilled his mission when he said in New York in October 1979: "We are an Easter people, and alleluia is our song."

His major encyclicals include Laborem Exercens (1981), Sollicitudo Rei Socialis (1988), and Centesimus Annus (1991), all on social justice. See also Centesimus Annus; Laborem Exercens; Poland, Catholicism in; Ratzinger, Joseph; restorationism; Sollicitudo Rei Socialis.

Bibliography

John Paul II. Sources of Renewal: The Implementation of Vatican II. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1980.

———. Crossing the Threshold of Hope. Ed. Vittorio Messori. New York: Knopf, 1994.

Williams, George Huntston. The Mind of John Paul II: Origins of His Thought and Action. New York: Seabury Press, 1981.

PETER HEBBLETHWAITE

John the Baptist, St., an eschatological preacher and precursor of Jesus. According to Luke 1:5–80, John, a cousin of Jesus, was of priestly descent, son of Zechariah and Elizabeth. Luke 3:1 reports that in the fifteenth year of Tiberius (A.D. 28), John emerged preaching repentance and practicing baptism. Matt 3:7–10 and Luke 3:7–9 record John's diatribes against sinners. All the Gospels (Matt 3:11–12; Mark 1:7–8; Luke 3:15–18; John 1:24–28) report John's proclamation of a stronger one to come. The synoptic Gospels report that Jesus was baptized by John. John was executed by Herod Antipas, ruler of Galilee, because of his prophetic denunciation of the ruler's morals (Matt 14:3–12; Mark 6:17–29; Luke 3:19–20). The Jewish historian Josephus (Antiquities 18.5.2) generally confirms the data about John's message and martyrdom.

John the Baptist, wearing "clothing of camel's hair with a leather belt around his waist," prepared "the way of Lord" and made "his paths straight" (Matt 3:3–4); painting by Luca Signorelli (d. 1523).

Traditions in the Gospels contrast the ministries of John and Jesus. John insisted on ascetical practice (Matt 3:4; Mark 1:6), while Jesus was more lenient (Mark 2:18; Matt 11:16–19). Jesus apparently respected John (Matt 11:11; Luke 7:28), applied Mal 3:1 to him (Matt 11:10; Luke 7:27), and explicitly identified him as Elijah (Matt 11:14; Mark 9:11–13).

Followers of John constituted a community after his death that in some areas rivaled early Christians (Acts 18:25; 19:1–7). John is the patron saint of monks. Feast day: June 24.

John the Evangelist, St. [son of Zebedee], one of the twelve apostles and traditional author of the Fourth Gospel. With his brother James he was a fisherman who was among Jesus' first disciples (Matt 4:21; Mark 1:19; Luke 5:10). According to Mark 3:17, Jesus gave John and James the nickname "sons of thunder." In the synoptic Gospels John, along with his brother and Simon Peter, are among Jesus' closest followers. They accompanied Jesus at the raising of the daughter of Jairus (Mark 5:37; Luke 8:51) and at the Transfiguration (Matt 17:1; Mark 9:2; Luke 9:28). They questioned Jesus about the end time (Mark 13:3) and failed him in Gethsemane (Matt 26:37; Mark 14:33). John and James asked Jesus whether to call down fire on Samaritans who rejected him (Luke 9:53), and requested seats of honor on his right and left when he would come in royal glory (Mark 10:35–37; but Matt 20:20–21 attributes the request to their mother). John reported to Jesus the disciples' rebuke of an exorcist who used Jesus' name (Mark 9:38; Luke 9:49). In Luke 22:8 he went with Peter to prepare the Passover supper.

John played a leading role in the first Christian community in Jerusalem, as Paul attests (Gal 2:9). He is listed in Acts as second to Peter among the disciples in the upper room (Acts 1:13). He accompanied Peter to preach in the Temple, where the two were arrested (Acts 3–4). John traveled with Peter to Samaria to examine the new converts there (Acts 8:14–25).

Writings: John is traditionally associated with five books of the NT. He is often identified as the Beloved Disciple of the Fourth Gospel (John 13:23; 19:26; 20:2; 21:7, 20), but the identification is not explicit and remains uncertain. A John wrote the book of Revelation from the island of Patmos (Rev 1:4, 9). He is identified with John the Apostle as early as Justin Martyr (Dialogue with Trypho 81), but he seems to view the twelve apostles as a distinct group of the past (Rev 21:14). 1 John 1:1–5 implies that its author was an eyewitness of Jesus, but the author remains anonymous. 2–3 John were written by an "elder" who enjoyed some status, but he is also anonymous.

These attributions were debated even in the early Church. A Roman presbyter named Gaius and a group called the Alogoi denied the authorship of the Fourth Gospel by John (Irenaeus Against Heresies 3.11.9). Dionysius of Alexandria in the third century disputed the authorship of Revelation (Eusebius Ecclesiastical History 7.25.1–27).

Activities: The NT reports the martyrdom of James (Acts 12:2), but says nothing of John's death, (unless one accepts the identification with the Beloved Disciple, whose death is implied in John 21:23). Two sources of the eighth and ninth centuries (George Hamartolos; the epitome of the Chronicle of Philip of Side) report that both James and John died as martyrs, but this may be an inference from Mark 10:39.

John the Evangelist, traditionally regarded as the author of the Fourth Gospel, holds his Gospel showing its opening words (in Latin), "In the beginning was the Word"; above his head is his symbol, the eagle; ninth-century Carolingian ivory plaque, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York.

Second-century traditions record activity of John at Ephesus in Asia Minor. Irenaeus, writing around 185 (Against Heresies 3.3.4; 5.33.4; also in Eusebius, Eccl. Hist. 5.20.5), reports the testimony of Polycarp and Papias, elders prominent in the early second century. Polycrates of Ephesus (in Eusebius Eccl. Hist. 5.24.3) also reports that John was there as "a priest, wearing the sacerdotal plate." Eusebius records other traditions to the same effect (Eccl. Hist. 3.18.1; 3.20.9; 3.23.4; 5.18.14). It is possible that some traditions may have confused John the Apostle with an "elder John" active in Asia Minor in the late first or early second century according to Papias (Eusebius Eccl. Hist. 3.39.4).

Tertullian (On the Proscription of Heretics 36), at the end of the second century, reports that John went to Rome in the time of Domitian (A.D. 81–96) where he was dipped unscathed into boiling oil.

Several groups later declared to be heretical claimed the legacy of John. Christians with extreme ascetical or "encratite" tendencies composed the Acts of John around A.D. 200. These reported on John's activity in Ephesus and his peaceful death. Gnostics and Manichaeans appropriated and modified this work. Gnostics also composed the Apocryphon of John, a dialogue of the risen Jesus with his disciples in which he reveals cosmic mysteries.

John is often represented with an eagle, symbolizing the etherial quality of his Gospel. Feast day: December 27. See also apostle; evangelist; Twelve, the.

HAROLD W. ATTRIDGE

John Vianney, St. See Curé d'Ars.

Jordan River, a river that runs from the Hermon range, north of the Sea of Galilee, down the Rift Valley and into the Dead Sea. It traverses a length of more than two hundred miles. It formed the eastern boundary of the promised land and features prominently in the story of the conquest of the land by Joshua and many other incidents in the OT. For Christians its primary association is with the preaching of John the Baptist and the baptism of Jesus.

Josaphat Kuncevych, St. (joh-sah-faht' koon-say'vich), 1580–1623, bishop-martyr, the first Eastern saint to be formally canonized by the Catholic Church. Born in Volodymyr Volyns'kyj in Ukraine, in 1604 he entered the Holy Trinity monastery in Vilnius, where he led a life of deep prayer and asceticism. Named archbishop of Polock (Polotsk) in 1617, he was tireless in preaching and in promoting adherence to the Union of Brest, which concluded in 1596 when some of the Ruthenian hierarchy and faithful entered into union with Rome. He was killed by opponents of the Union of the Ukrainian-Belorussian Church with Rome. He was beatified in 1643 and canonized in 1867. Feast day: November 12.

Joseph, St., husband of Mary, the mother of Jesus. In the NT Joseph is mentioned as the father of Jesus in John 1:45 and 6:42, in Luke 4:22, and in Luke's genealogy of Jesus (Luke 3:23). Otherwise he appears only in the infancy narratives of Matt 1–2 and Luke 1–2. Both (Matt 1:2–16, 20; Luke 1:27; 3:23–38) report that he was of Davidic descent. Luke indicates that, although his native town was Bethlehem, he and Mary lived in Nazareth. They returned to Bethelem to register for a census (Luke 2:1). Matthew suggests that they lived in Bethlehem and only moved to Nazareth after return from their flight to Joseph, the husband of the Blessed Virgin Mary and the foster father of Jesus, shown here in his carpenter's workshop surrounded by the tools of his trade; fifteenth-century Flemish painting by Robert Campin, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York.

Egypt (Matt 2:22–23). Joseph was a carpenter (Matt 13:55), a trade followed by Jesus (Mark 6:3). Joseph disappears from the NT after the holy family's pilgrimage to Jerusalem (Luke 2:42–52), and it is likely that he died before Jesus' public ministry.

Apocryphal works embellish the scriptural details. The second-century Protevangelium of James claims that Joseph was an aged widower with children when he married Mary, thus resolving the problem that Jesus' siblings presented for belief in Mary's perpetual virginity. It also relates the miraculous sign by which Joseph was chosen to be Mary's husband. The Infancy Gospel of Thomas describes Joseph's difficulties with his precocious son. The fourth-century History of Joseph the Carpenter tells of Joseph's death.

Joseph was declared patron saint of the Universal Church by Pope Pius IX. Feast day: March 19; feast of Joseph the Worker: May 1. HAROLD W. ATTRIDGE

Josephinism, an eighteenth-century effort of the Austrian emperors to subordinate the Church to national interests. The name is derived from Joseph II, Holy Roman emperor (1765–90). Under Enlightenment influences that were more extreme than Gallicanism, the Austrian government, beginning with Prince Kauntiz, minister under Maria Theresa (the wife of Emperor Francis I and mother of Joseph II) and becoming more rigorous under Joseph II (d. 1790), instituted a policy of state control of all Church affairs. This policy was in force until 1850, when it was rescinded by Francis Joseph I. Josephinism tolerated other religions, refused to recognize the corporate nature of the clergy, and abrogated the contemplative religious orders. Under this policy, the state effected certain reforms of ecclesiastical abuses and bettered the support of the clergy, but many spiritual and pastoral goals of the Church were frustrated. See also Austria, Catholicism in; Church and state; Gallicanism.

Josephite Fathers and Brothers, St. Joseph's Society of the Sacred Heart (S.S.J.), an American religious congregation of priests and brothers dedicated to developing leadership in the African-American community. Founded in England in 1866 by Cardinal Herbert Vaughan (d. 1903), the Josephites were established in Baltimore in 1893 by five men who had belonged to an English missionary group. Joseph R. Slattery is credited as the founder. The original group included Charles R. Uncles (1859–1933), the first African-American man trained and ordained in the United States (ordained in 1891). They work primarily in the southern states of the United States, in rural and inner city parishes and other specialized ministries. In 1992 the membership included 160 priests and 12 brothers.

Joseph of Arimathea (air-uh-muh-thee'uh), a wealthy councillor responsible for Jesus' burial. In all four Gospels (Matt 27:57; Mark 15:43; Luke 23:50–51; John 19:38), Joseph asks Pilate for Jesus' body, which he places in a new rock tomb. Matthew and John make him a disciple. Mark and Luke simply say that he awaited the kingdom of God.

Joseph of Cupertino, St., 1603–63, Franciscan known as the "Flying Friar." An ecstatic, Joseph was famous for levitating during Mass or at other times of great devotion, once in front of Pope Urban VIII. An embarrassment during his lifetime, he was canonized in 1767. Feast day: September 18 (no longer observed).

journal, spiritual, a daily record or timely account of important events in one's spiritual life, especially experiences that mark progress in one's quest for deeper union with God. Journal writing is practically as old as Christianity itself. Augustine's Confessions exemplifies this practice. In modern times, some secular writers like Ira Progoff, who developed the "intensive journal method" in 1966, have explored new approaches to keeping spiritual journals. The value of a journal lies in the prayerful and disciplined self-reflection required for its composition and its use for those under spiritual direction.

journalism. See Catholicism and journalism.

Journet, Charles (shahr zhoor-nay'), 1891–1975, Swiss theologian and cardinal. His greatest contribution to theology was a massive four-volume study in ecclesiology, The Church of the Word Incarnate, a theological consideration of the Church analyzed according to the categories of Aristotelian causality: material, formal, efficient, and final.

Journet Ibars, St. Teresa [of Jesus], 1843–97, Spanish-born founder of the Little Sisters of the Abandoned Aged, a community devoted to the service of the elderly poor. Feast day: August 26.

Jovinian, d. ca. 406, Milanese monk and antias-cetic teacher condemned by Jerome, Pelagius, Augustine, Ambrose, Pope Siricius, and the emperor Honorius, who exiled him in 398. Deferring to the grace of baptism, equal in all, he denied that virginity was a state intrinsically higher than marriage and that eschatological rewards were arranged hierarchically according to states in life (e.g., virgin, widow, wife); and he denied Mary's perpetual virginity. See also virginity; virginity of Mary.

Joyful Mysteries of the Rosary. See Mysteries of the Rosary.

Jubilee, a Catholic journal that emphasized aesthetics and spirituality. From 1953 to 1968 its pages introduced U.S. Catholics to progressive movements in Europe, brought access to modern tastes in liturgical art, and emphasized monastic and lay movements. It prepared many readers for the changes of Vatican II (1962–65) and furthered the liberal inclinations of Catholics after World War II.

Jubilee, Year of, every fiftieth year, in which, according to Jewish law, the land was to lie fallow, mortgage debts remitted, and slaves freed. The theological meaning of the jubilee was that all life and land belongs to God. The term "jubilee" has been used in Catholicism since 1300 in connection with the Holy Year, a year in which the pope grants special spiritual benefits (indulgences) for those who make a pilgrimage to Rome and perform other religious acts. See also Holy Year.

J.U.D., Juris Utrius Doctor (Lat.), Doctor of Both Laws, academic degree that attests to knowledge of both canon and civil law.

Judaism, the religious perspectives, practices, and way of life of the Jewish people over the centuries. It is not a biblical or Talmudic term, but appears first as a Greek term, Judaismes, in 2 Macc 2:21, 8:1; 14:38, where it represents that which Jews "remained faithful to" as opposed to adopting Hellenistic practices and beliefs. Similarly, Paul uses it to speak of his "former way of life in Judaism" (in which he felt he excelled) before he joined the Church (Gal. 1:13–14).

Biblical and Rabbinic Traditions: The Greek term, Judaismes, finds no Hebrew equivalent in either biblical or rabbinic literature. It was not until the medieval period (e.g., Ibn Ezra's twelfth-century commentary on Deut 21:13) that the Hebrew term, Yahadut, appeared. It is this term that is most frequently used today in Hebrew. Perhaps the most correct Jewish term to describe the body of Jewish teachings is Torah ("teaching"), derived from the term for the Pentateuch but extended over time to include later commentaries and rulings as well.

While "Judaism" has a philosophical nuance, "Torah" carries the divine, revelatory connotations of Jewish tradition. Jewish sacred history, according to the Torah, begins with God's call to Abram (Gen 12) and covenant with Abraham and Sarah's descendants (Gen 17). The beginnings of this sacred history and the terms of God's subsequent covenants with God's people, Israel, are contained in the Hebrew Bible, which Christians call Old Testament but which Jews call Tanakh, after its major portions: Torah (the Pentateuch), Nebi'im (Prophets), and Kethubim (Writings). Jews read the entire Pentateuch plus selections from the Prophets each year during synagogue services.

For Jews, the biblical period closed with the last of the minor prophets, and the ancient sacrificial rites ceased with the destruction of the Jerusalem Temple by the Romans in A.D. 70. In place of the latter, there arose the practice of prayer, study and mitzvoth, obligatory religious deeds based upon interpretations of biblical commandments, such as the observance of food purity or kashruth laws, or deeds of charity.

After the Jews were driven by Roman armies from the land of Israel, Jewish teachers ("rabbis") continued to debate the application of the mitzvoth to the daily life of the Jewish people, in the process infusing even the most commonplace activities (such as eating and resting) with sacred significance. In this way, Judaism developed as a tradition in which the home became the Temple on the Sabbath, and the dinner table the Holy of Holies of the Temple. The literature of the rabbinic debates, set down over some six hundred years beginning with the Mishnah at the end of the second century, came to be known as the Talmud, which exists in two major forms, that of Babylon (the Bavli) and that of Jerusalem (Yerushalmi).

Over the centuries many attempts have been made to define the essence of Judaism. Talmud Bavli (Šabb. 31a) recounts the response of the Pharisee Hillel to the challenge of a heathen to teach him the Torah while standing on one leg. "What is hateful to you do not do unto your neighbor," Hillel replied. "That is the whole of the Torah. The rest is commentary: Go and study" (see Tob 4:15; Matt 7:12; Luke 6:31). Jesus' answer (Mark 12:29–31) to the same question first evokes a central Jewish prayer, the Shema (Deut 6), and adds to it the climactic verse of the covenant laws of Lev 19, thus linking love of God to love of neighbor in classically Jewish fashion.

While rabbinic tradition is much more concerned (as is Sacred Scripture) with meaningful narrative (haggadah, Heb., stories and sayings) and prescriptive practice derived from covenantal law (halakah, Heb., "the Way") than with attempts to develop systematic doctrine, there exists a rich literature of philosophical theology in response to Greek, Roman, Christian, Persian, Muslim, and other intellectual challenges as well. Writing in the twelfth century in a Muslim-dominated environment but with Christianity also evidently in mind, Moses Maimonides drew up thirteen basic principles of Jewish faith, a listing recited by Orthodox Jews to this day. Consideration of this list provides insights into the commonalities of the Jewish and Catholic traditions and into the difference between the deepest beliefs of the two ancient faith communities.

Maimonides's thirteen principles can be abbreviated as belief in God's (1) existence, (2) unity, (3) incorporeality, and (4) eternality; (5) belief that God alone is to be worshiped; (6) belief in prophecy and (7) that Moses is the greatest of the prophets; belief that the Torah is (8) divine and (9) unchanging; belief that God (10) knows the thoughts and deeds of every person and (11) will reward goodness and punish evil; and belief (faith, trust) in (12) the coming of the Messiah and (13) the resurrection of the dead.

Again, Maimonides's awareness of the looming presence of Judaism's sibling Abrahamic faiths, Christianity and Islam, historically if not religiously, is close to the surface here. One does not know how much emphasis Maimonides would have placed on God's incorporeality or Moses' greatness as a prophet, without the Christian claim of Incarnation, on the one hand, or the Muslim claim about Muhammad as the "seal of the prophets," on the other. But it is a question worth pursuing.

Communal and Prayer Life: Communal and prayer life in Judaism, as indicated above, have developed around two major Jewish institutions. One is the home and the other is the synagogue (gathering place for joint worship, Torah study, and community services such as burial societies). Indeed, so important is the study of the mitzvoth that popular alternate names for synagogues have been such terms as the Hebrew beth ha midrash (house of study) and the Yiddish schul (Old German, "school"). Synagogue worship features elements quite familiar to Catholics: readings from Scripture alternating with prayers (often psalms), commentaries on Scripture, prescribed gestures, and a hymnody similar to Gregorian chant.

There is, however, no festival meal in the synagogue service (though some congregations do one as a matter of convenience for their members today) or altar table there. The table at which the Sabbath meal is celebrated weekly and the Passover (Heb., pesach) meal is celebrated annually is in the Jewish home, which for this sacred time becomes a renewal site of the Exodus and a foretaste of the olam ha ba (Heb., "the world to come"). Jewish ritual celebrates God in song and word as Lord of creation and of sacred history. Over the centuries it has adapted itself to the particular needs of the people. While maintaining a sense of continuity with the ritual of biblical Israel, Jewish ritual has been able to interpret and reinterpret Jewish historical circumstances, whether joyful or tragic, always coming back to praise of the sanctity of God's Name (Heb., Qadosh/ Kiddush ha Shem). The Christian liturgical cycle is based upon that of the Jewish people, with Easter/ Pesach and Pentecost/Shavuoth the most obvious examples of the historical linkage.

Just as Christian liturgy has developed over the centuries, so has Jewish liturgy. The Jewish liturgical cycle of feasts praises God at once for God's gracious deeds of salvation in history (e.g., freedom from slavery in Egypt, the free gift of God's Torah) and for the passage of the seasons. The autumn, for example, sees the High Holy Days of Rosh Hashana and Yom Kippur, respectively, New Year and Day of Atonement. Marked by fasting and a sense of penitence, these feasts focus on the final judgment and require reconciliation. They are followed by the lesser, but liturgically rich feasts of Sukkoth (Tabernacles, Booths—an agricultural celebration of the harvest and a time of covenant-renewal for Jews) and Simchat Torah ("Rejoicing of the Torah," which celebrates the conclusion of reading the entire Pentateuch and beginning again with Genesis). The latter festival is marked by dancing with the Torah scrolls in joyful celebration—hardly the "burden of the law" image that Christianity has had of Judaism over the centuries. Also joyful is Purim, which comes in February or March. Like Hanukkah, which celebrates the victory of the Maccabees and rededication of the Jerusalem Temple in 165 B.C., Purim joyfully celebrates the deliverance of the Jewish people, this time from a threatened massacre by the Persians through the intervention of Esther. On the other hand, "The Ninth of Av" commemorates the destruction of the Temple and subsequent Jewish tragedies, such as the expulsion from Spain in 1492, while the more recent holy day Yom Hashoah memorializes the victims of the Nazi Holocaust.

Over the centuries, Judaism has developed rich mystical and spiritual traditions alongside its more philosophical and halakic traditions. These are embodied in such medieval classics as the Zohar (Heb., "book of splendor") and popular religious movements such as that of the Hasidim (Heb., "the pious ones"), which originated in Eastern Europe in the sixteenth century.

Twentieth-Century Judaism: Modern Judaism, like modern Christianity, reflects a range of responses to the challenges of the Enlightenment and of its own internal reforming movements. In the United States today, the major branches are Reform, which, put simply, translated the liturgy into the vernacular and relativized many of the ancient halakah of Israel to the options of the individual; Conservative, which represents a movement away from Reform and back toward traditional Orthodox practice. It has been argued that modern Orthodoxy, developing in reaction to the former two movements, may be more strict than its medieval counterpart. Each grouping, of course, has subgroups, so that some Conservative congregations are virtually Orthodox in practice while others tend toward the Reform. None of these three major movements are by any means static. Many Reform Jewish congregations today use more Hebrew in their worship than earlier Reform congregations would have allowed, while among the Orthodox there are those who are varyingly open to considering "modern" or contemporary ideas, such as dialogue with Christians and non-Orthodox Jews.

Likewise, there are various other distinct groups, ranging from those who have little or no synagogue affiliation of any sort ("secular" Jews) but who do identify closely with the Jewish community and base their lives on Jewish moral values, to those such as some of the contemporary Hasidim who have little to do with any other Jews, including the Orthodox. A very influential subgroup in the larger community may be found among Reconstructionist Jews, an offshoot of Conservative Judaism which has few congregations, but whose thinking has influenced many rabbis within both Reform and Conservative Judaism.

Critical to any understanding of contemporary Judaism must be an awareness of the influence on Jewish identity and spirituality of the Holocaust (Shoah) and the rebirth of a Jewish State in the land of Israel after a hiatus of almost two millennia. With the possible exception of the writing of the Talmud and the expulsion of the Jews from Spain in 1492, no historical events of Jewish history since the close of the biblical period have ever had as profound an impact on Jewish beliefs and practice as these two events of the twentieth century.

It is far too early to predict how the Judaism(s) of the twenty-first century and beyond will incorporate these new realities into the sacred history of the people Israel. But that incorporation will be of more than academic interest to the development of Catholicism, which has, by definition, always been interwoven with the fate of God's people Israel, with whom Christians are adopted heirs (Rom 8:12–17; Gal 4:1–7) and with whom, in the words of the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), Catholics share an unbreakable "spiritual bond" (Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions, n. 4). See also Jews, Catholicism and.

Bibliography

Fisher, Eugene, ed. The Jewish Roots of Christian Liturgy. Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press, 1990.

Flannery, Edward. The Anguish of the Jews. Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press, 1985.

Greenberg, Irving. The Jewish Way: Living the Holidays. New York: Summit Books, 1988.

Heschel, Abraham Joshua. Israel: An Echo of Eternity. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1969.

Strack, H. L., and G. Stemberger. Introduction to the Talmud and Midrash. Edinburgh, Scotland: T. & T. Clark, 1991.

Wylen, Stephen M. Settings of Silver: An Introduction to Judaism. Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press, 1989.

EUGENE J. FISHER

Judas Iscariot, treasurer of the twelve apostles (John 13:29), the one who betrayed Jesus. His name in Hebrew probably means "man from Kerioth." For unclear motives, he betrayed Jesus for thirty pieces of silver (Matt 26:14–16; Mark 14:10–11; Luke 22:3–6; John 13:2, 27). His death has been described either as a suicide (Matt 27:5) or an accident (Acts 1:18). See also Twelve, the.

Judas Maccabeus (joo'duhs mak-uh-beh'uhs), leader of the second-century Jewish revolt against Greek domination. 1–2 Maccabees depict the struggle for religious freedom against King Antiochus. Hanukkah commemorates its success.

Jude, St., one of the twelve apostles. There are only three brief mentions of an apostle named Jude in the NT. Luke 6:16 and Acts 1:13 speak of "Jude, son of James," and John 14:22 notes that "Judas, not the Iscariot" asked Jesus a question. Curiously two lists of apostles do not contain Jude but mention a certain Thaddaeus (Mark 3:16–17; Matt 10:2–4). These few texts imply that Jude was an obscure figure who is mentioned eleventh in the list of apostles and easily confused with a host of better-known persons also named Jude. Hence, Jude the apostle is often twinned in legends with one or another of these Judes. There is a Jude, an ancestor of Jesus (Luke 3:30), a Galilean revolutionary (Acts 5:37), the owner of a house where Paul stayed (Acts 9:11), an emissary to Antioch (Acts 15:22), the brother of Jesus (Mark 6:3), and finally the apostle. Sometimes Jude the apostle is thought to have a double name, Jude Thaddaeus, because Thaddaeus replaces Jude in the apostolic lists in Mark and Matthew. Sometimes he is confused with Jude, brother of the Lord, and stories about that Jude attach themselves to the apostle. But we have no reliable information about this obscure figure. Ancient legends mention his work in Mesopotamia and Persia; in the liturgy he is paired with Simon. Only in this century has Jude become the object of a popular devotion as a patron and helper of hopeless causes. Feast day (with Simon): October 28. See also apostle; Twelve, the.

JEROME NEYREY

Jude [brother of Jesus], name included in Mark's list of the four brothers of Jesus (6:3; see Matt 13:55). He is presumably included among the "the brothers of the Lord" who gathered with the eleven apostles and Mary after the Lord's Ascension (Acts 1:14). Thus he is presented not as an unbeliever (Mark 3:31; John 7:3–5), but as a disciple of his brother Jesus. The Letter of Jude is written by a certain "Jude, servant of Jesus and brother of James" (v. 1). Scholars identify the author as Jude, brother of Jesus. Nevertheless, this seems to be a pseudonymous attribution, for the author of that document is considered a scribe with considerable Greek language skills and wide knowledge of esoteric Jewish writings, skills unthinkable for an artisan in a peasant village. But the early Church thought highly enough of Jesus' two brothers, Jude and James, to consider them proper and likely authors of authoritative letters. Some traditions from eastern Syria near Edessa (the Gospel of Thomas, the Acts of Thomas) identify Jude with the apostle Thomas, also known as Judas Thomas. Since Thomas is a twin ("Didymus," John 14:22), he would presumably be Jesus' twin brother. But this late and quite local tradition is improbable for the historical identity of Jude. Finally, Eusebius records an account about Jude's grandsons, who were taken before the emperor Domitian: "There still survived of the family of the Lord grandsons of Jude, who was said to have been his brother according to the flesh, and they were delated as being of the family of David. . . . But when they were released they were the leaders of the churches, both for their testimony and for their relation to the Lord" (Ecclesiastical History 3.20.1, 6). See also brothers of Jesus.

JEROME NEYREY

judge, canonical, qualified cleric or, if permitted by the conference of bishops, a layperson appointed by the diocesan bishop to serve for a definite time period adjudicating trials in the Church's judicial system. Judges must have an unimpaired reputation and at least a canonical licentiate (J.C.L.). Laypersons may only serve, when necessary, on a collegiate (three- or five-judge) tribunal. See also tribunal.

judgment, general, the doctrine that God, in the person of Jesus Christ, will pronounce a definitive judgment upon the moral quality of each person's life at the Second Coming (Gk., Parousia). In Christian eschatology, this doctrine of a general judgment has an important place because of its relationship to the Second Coming and the general resurrection of all the dead.

The background for the Christian doctrine of a general judgment developed from antecedent ideas in the OT (e.g., 4 Ezra) and the NT (e.g., Rom 2:5–13; 1 Cor 3:11–15). Both Greek anthropology, with its insistence upon the immortality of the human soul, and the Jewish theology of eschatological judgment have contributed to the historical development of the doctrine. Thus the tension between the Jewish interest in a collective judgment and the Greek concern for the fate of the individual soul led to the later Christian doctrine of a dual judgment, a general and a particular judgment.

The notion of a collective judgment pronounced by Jesus Christ at the end of time is found from the second century A.D. onward in all versions of the earliest creeds. In such creedal statements the concept of a final judgment is exclusively related to the idea of a collective or general judgment. The idea of a particular judgment, while implicit in many Scriptural texts and early conciliar teachings, did not have the character of an explicit Christian teaching until quite late in the medieval period (Benedictus Deus, 1336). See also eschatology universal; judgment, particular; last things. DONAL LEADER judgment, particular, divine judgment of the moral character of a person's life rendered immediately following death. According to Christian eschatology, God assigns the person to heaven, hell, or purgatory on the basis of this judgment.

Though the notion of a general judgment reflects an OT eschatology that looks to a future divine judgment of peoples and nations, the Christian theological concept of a particular judgment reflects the interest in the fate of the individual soul after death found in Greek anthropology. Both Justin (d. ca. 165) and Irenaeus (d. ca. 200) argued for some kind of judgment occuring immediately after death. Yet for much of the Church's history, the notion of a particular judgment remained vague. Disputes between the Latin and Greek churches, however, gave impetus to the theological discussion of the question. In the Second Council of Lyons (1274), the doctrine of a particular judgment is implied, though not stated. Pope Benedict XII in the decree Benedictus Deus (1336) affirmed that persons who die are immediately assigned to heaven, hell, or purgatory. This traditional teaching concerning the particular judgment has been affirmed by Vatican II (Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, n. 17). Contemporary theologians stress the anthropological character of the notion of a particular judgment so that it is understood as the final realization of the fundamental ethical option of a person made during life on earth. Thus, the notions of a general and a particular judgment together show the relationship between moral action on earth and the finality of human existence beyond death. See also eschatology universal; judgment, general; last things.

judicial vicar, qualified priest appointed by the diocesan bishop to judge cases in his name. Introduced in the 1983 code of canon law as a title interchangeable with the traditional Latin officialis, it illustrates the vicarious nature of the ordinary (nondelegated) judicial power through which his vicar constitutes one tribunal with the bishop.

Jugan, Bl. Jeanne, 1792–1879, founder of the Little Sisters of the Poor. In 1845 she received an award from the French Academy for her work in ministering to the poor. Feast day: August 30. See also Little Sisters of the Poor.

Julian of Norwich, Bl., ca. 1342–ca. 1420, English mystic. She lived a life of solitude as an anchoress in a cell attached to the Church of St. Edmund and St. Julian in Norwich, East Anglia. At the age of thirty, and seemingly near death due to illness, she received sixteen mystical visions on the Passion of Christ and the Trinity (described in her Book of Showings, also known as the Revelations of Divine Love), on the love of God, the Incarnation, redemption, sin, penance, and divine consolation.

Through the development of images of the Creator as father and mother, of Jesus as brother, savior, and mother, and of the Spirit as spouse, Julian faced the reality of sin, the struggle between good and evil, and the mercy of God, particularly experienced in the Church's sacramental celebrations. Julian created a unique language combining special words and images to develop her mystical doctrines. Her work was influenced by the English mystic Walter Hilton (d. 1396) and the anonymously written The Cloud of Unknowing.

At the time of her death her reputation for sanctity was already widespread. Visitors from all over Europe were attracted to her monastic cell. Although she is popularly called "Blessed," there has never been any formal ecclesiastical confirmation of this title. However, those devoted to her memory and example observe May 13 as her feast day. See also anchorite, anchoress; Cloud of Unknowing, The; English Mystics; Hilton, Walter.

Julian the Apostate, ca. 331–63, emperor. With his family eliminated by internecine quarrels, this nephew of Constantine was raised under Christian influence but repudiated it in favor of a Neoplatonic paganism of sacrifice and austerity. In his two-year reign he rescinded laws supporting the Church or taking sides in Christian quarrels, restricted teaching of classical literature to those believing in its gods, and planned the rebuilding of the Jerusalem Temple, whose destruction some Christians had seen as a sign of their supersession of Judaism.

Julius I, St., d. 352, pope from 337 to 352 and defender of Nicene orthodoxy. Julius sheltered Athanasius (339) and convened a council of over fifty bishops at Rome that declared Athanasius the rightful bishop of Alexandria (341). The Council of Sardica (343) approved the right of bishops condemned by local councils to appeal to Julius as Bishop of Rome. Feast day: April 12. See also Athanasius, St.; Nicaea, First Council of.

Julius II [Giuliano della Rovere], 1443–1513, pope from 1503 to 1513. He benefited from the nepotism of his uncle, Pope Sixtus IV, and later acquired the papacy through diplomatic skill and bribery. Notorious for extending papal temporal authority through warfare, he also liberated Italy from foreign domination, for which subsequent generations of Italians were grateful. He was a renowned Renaissance patron of Michelangelo, Raphael, and Bramante, and commissioned Bramante to prepare plans for the new St. Peter's and assisted at the laying of the cornerstone in 1506. He decided to finance the building through the "sale" of indulgences, which Martin Luther challenged.

Jung, Carl Gustav, 1875–1961, Swiss psychologist. Concerned with religious questions from youth, Jung chose medicine over the ministry and pursued psychological studies under E. Bleuler and Sigmund Freud. Eschewing Freud's foundation of neurosis solely in sexuality, Jung emphasized the symbolic, clusters of (complex) associations, psychological types, forms of the subconscious, and archetypes. All of this made him sympathetic to religion. In the liturgy, symbols, and saints (particularly Mary) and the demonic, he found forms of the collective (religious) unconscious of humanity; there, too, the Trinity was complemented by Mary or the Devil (a quaternity), and the shadow competed for attention in the formation of identity. In contrast to Freud's dismissal of religion, Jung found sympathetic interest among Catholics whose basic view of nature and grace was receptive to the role of psychology in theology. The English Dominican Victor White (d. 1960) pioneered the work of relating the psychological dimension to Catholic life, and this direction has continued in the work of Ira Progoff (a proponent of journal-writing) and in studies of Jung and mystics like Meister Eckhart and Teresa of Ávila.

Jungmann, Joseph Andrew (yoong' mahn), 1889–1975, Austrian Jesuit priest and liturgical and catechetical scholar. Ordained in 1913, he served as professor of pastoral theology at Innsbruck University, Austria, 1925–75, where he edited the theological journal Zeitschrift für Katholische Theologie. Author of many books and articles on the history of liturgy and catechetics, he is best known for his two-volume The Mass of the Roman Rite: Its Origins and Development (1949).

Junipero Serra, Bl. See Serra, Bl. Junipero.

juridical person, an artificial entity distinct from the human persons who form it, manage its affairs, or benefit from its activity. Created by ecclesiastical authority, a juridical person is the equivalent in canon law to a corporation. It is established for an apostolic purpose, with the capacity for continuous existence, and with rights of its own to acquire property, enter into contracts, and sue or be sued in Church courts. Some entities (e.g., diocese, parish, religious institute), once formed, are juridical persons as a matter of law; others (e.g., a Catholic hospital or university) may be constituted juridical persons by a decree of ecclesiastical authority (e.g., diocesan bishop, Holy See). Public juridical persons are closely supervised by, and act in the name of, ecclesiastical authority; private juridical persons enjoy considerable autonomy in the management of their affairs.

jurisdiction, the power of governance in the Church. Authority within the Church is exercised in many ways and not all acts that concern the exercise of authority require jurisdiction in the proper sense. Jurisdiction is a technical term describing a particular type of authority necessary for the governance of the Church.

Although there is some current debate whether or not jurisdiction and the power of governance are the same, both the current (1983) and former (1917) codes of canon law equate them (can. 129, 1983; can. 196, 1917). While older canonical theory saw two sources of power in the Church, one stemming from Holy Orders, the other from jurisdiction, current theory, since Vatican II, sees the power of jurisdiction as based in sacramental ordination and activated by being properly chosen for a given office. Laypersons are allowed by present canon law to participate in the exercise of jurisdiction, e.g., one may sit as judge on a three-judge court (the other two judges must be clerics).

Currently the power of governance is classified under the headings of executive, legislative, and judicial. The pope, as successor to Peter and head of the college of bishops, has full jurisdiction in the universal Church, although those who assist him in this governance exercise jurisdiction on a day-to-day basis. Each diocesan bishop has that jurisdiction needed to govern the local church and is assisted by those who exercise that power on a day-to-day basis. Major superiors in pontifical clerical institutes also exercise the power of governance.

Jurisdiction for some acts may be delegated to another priest but there are special rules governing such delegation. Some faculties given, e.g., for the hearing of confessions, were in former law called jurisdiction, but are currently called simply "faculties." See also authority. JOHN F. LAHEY jus gentium (Lat., "law of nations"), that part of international law that has its basis in the customary behavior of nations rather than written agreement. For instance, many nations recognized the immunity of noncombatants from warfare well before its adoption by the Geneva conventions.

justice ministry. See social ministry.

justice, the regulative principle and key, or cardinal, virtue of the social order, directing persons to render each person his or her due. More specifically, justice requires that equals be treated equally and unequals unequally, but in proportion to their relevant differences. Most debates about justice are disagreements about what are the relevant differences between persons.

Christian understandings of justice include this philosophical understanding, but they approach it from within the broader context of one's relationship with the God who frees humankind from sin and then forms a covenant with all people. The U.S. Catholic bishops write, "The quest for justice arises from loving gratitude for the saving acts of God and manifests itself in the wholehearted love of God and neighbor" ("Economic Justice for All," 1986, n. 39). From a Christian perspective, love of God and neighbor enlivens the just community. This is because the acts that God has performed for humankind can never be reciprocated. The only appropriate response on the part of the Christian community is thankfulness. Because the gap between God's acts and human efforts can never be closed, the responsive gratitude is unending, continually revitalizing the just community.

The covenant with God does require specific patterns of behavior between persons in community and between communities. It is at this point that a Christian perspective intersects with a more strictly philosophical approach to justice—Thomas Aquinas understands justice to be "the strong and firm will to give each his due" (Summa Theologiae 2–2.58.1)—but without losing the broader context of love of God and neighbor. The necessity of specifying more precisely what constitutes each person's due has led to the elaboration of three primary types of justice: commutative, distributive, and social.

Commutative Justice: Commutative justice requires fairness in agreements and exchanges between persons or groups. Such agreements and exchanges can take place either between owners of capital or between owners and employees. In the first case, commutative justice might lead, for example, to laws against monopolies, which lead to unfair advantages between businesses. In another example, commutative justice is behind requirements for adequate food labeling, so that the consumer knows what she or he is receiving when buying the product.

In the case of relationships between employers and employees the focus of commutative justice is first of all on the just wage. Employers are required to pay their workers a wage sufficient for a life of dignity for the family of the wage earner. Secondly, the employer must provide working conditions adequate to the human dignity of the workers. This includes reasonable safety in the workplace and working hours that allow time for rest and time with family. In return, employees owe their employers diligent and productive work.

Distributive Justice: Distributive justice focuses on the question of the allocation of social resources, wealth, and power. Debates over which persons should receive how much of society's resources are grounded in the problem of justice itself. Equal persons are to be treated equally and unequal persons unequally, but in proportion to their relevant differences. Who is equal, and in what way? In what way are they different that is relevant to differential treatment by society? Three main bases for differential treatment dominate the philosophical literature: arithmetical equality, merit, and need. Different social theories combine these considerations in different ways. Modern Catholic teaching has drawn on all three.

Arithmetical equality, which Aristotle emphasizes, suggests that each person should receive goods from society in arithmetical proportion to what she or he contributes. This concept of distributive justice backs an understanding of the social order as stratified. It is reflected in the encyclical Rerum Novarum (1891): "it is not to be supposed that all can contribute in the same way" (n. 27), neither is it supposed that all are to receive from the social order in the same way. Persons receive in proportion to their social station.

Consideration of merit enters into Catholic social teaching in its emphasis that both owners of the means of production and workers contribute to the social order. The key means of recognizing merit in Catholic teaching is the affirmation of the right to private property. Such affirmation allows persons to retain the fruits of their labor.

There has always been an emphasis on human need in Catholic consideration of distributive justice. This is strongly reflected in modern teaching. Even Rerum Novarum, with its understanding of society as stratified, states, "Justice demands that the interests of the poorer populations be carefully watched over by the administration" (n. 27). In more recent documents, particularly the social encyclicals of Pope John Paul II, and through the influence of liberation theology, the emphasis on human need has been crystallized in the concept of the "option for the poor."

Social Justice: Modern Catholic social teaching has shifted in the relative weight it gives to each of the considerations of arithmetical equality, merit, and need. In brief, an increased emphasis on need, a developing stress on the right of workers to private property and ownership of the means of production, and more definite criteria for limiting how much property one may own, have led to the virtual disappearance of any emphasis on arithmetical equality. The result is a more egalitarian view of society.

This trend toward egalitarianism coincides with the emergence of the concept of social justice in Catholic teaching. The concept is first mentioned in Pope Pius XI's encyclical, Quadragesimo Anno (1931). It accents the point that in a just arrangement all persons are active participants in the institutions that constitute society. As a result, social justice requires recognition of the mutual obligation of individual and society: the individual has an obligation to contribute to society through participation and society has the obligation to order its institutions so that such participation is possible. The primary form of social injustice is the exclusion or marginalization of persons from participation in the life of the society. See also Catholic social teachings; social justice.

TODD D. WHITMORE

justification, God's gracious act of rendering a sinful human being holy and endowed with grace (in Catholic and Orthodox doctrines) or as acceptable to God (Lutheran). Justification appears as a central theological theme in Paul's Letters, particularly in Romans and Galatians. Various writings in the NT describe it not only as a favorable juridical declaration by God regarding men and women, but also as an inner presence of the Spirit of Jesus in people following upon their conversion to him (John 14; Rom 8). In the Gospels and the Pauline Letters, the citizen of the reign of God is a member of the household of God, a new creation, one who has passed from death to life. In Catholic doctrine, justification is an event where God in freedom and love brings an individual person into a new relationship and a new form of life that can and will flourish in the present and future reign of God. There is a certain pluralism and complexity in the Catholic understanding of justification because it concerns God's presence and action on earth amid the lives of individuals, and this active presence of God not only brings faith and love but healing and forgiveness for sin.

In medieval theology God's justification concludes with sanctification, the gift of a new life principle, "grace." Against the Reformers' theologies of external imputation, the Council of Trent (1545–63) held that justification is not simply a judicial declaration about someone who remains evil in God's eyes but that, through the merits of Christ, a person is transformed and made holy even as their personal sins and original sin alike are forgiven and removed (although the effects of sin, such as illness, death, and proneness to further sin, remain).

Justification by faith or by works, as well as justification conditioned by finite freedom and by the cooperation of human activity and freedom—these were from the sixteenth through the twentieth centuries dominant topics of theological systems and of arguments between Protestants and Catholics; they were also frequently and bitterly debated between schools and churches within the two groups. Theological discussions within the ecumenical movement since World War I have brought surprising agreement in the theology of justification. We know now that neither Aquinas nor the Council of Trent held for justification initially or mainly by human works, and that Luther himself spoke of an inner change and of a life fruitful in the love of neighbor. Catholicism has in recent decades reemphasized the sovereign plan and activity of God in Church, sacraments, and Christian life; Protestant churches more frequently develop the idea of grace as a principle of Christian life in individuals, Church, and society. Because this topic ponders the mystery of how God is present in fallen human life, justification remains a fundamental theological issue and is still the central issue underlying differences in the Christian churches. See also faith; grace; sanctification.

THOMAS F. O'MEARA

Justin Martyr, St., d. ca. 165., Apologist and martyr. Born at Flavia Neapolis in Palestine, Justin studied with Stoics, Peripatetics (Aristotelians), Pythagoreans, and Platonists, but finally, moved in part by the courage of the martyrs, he embraced Christianity, "the only safe and worthy philosophy." He taught at Ephesus, where ca. 135 he debated Trypho, a Jew (recorded later in Dialogue with Trypho the Jew). Moving to Rome, he continued to teach wearing the philosopher's cloak, writing a First Apology addressed to Emperor Antoninus Pius (138–61) and a briefer Second Apology protesting recent executions. Other writings, now lost, are known by title. Justin was the first Christian to consistently use philosophical categories in elaborating an orthodox doctrine of revelation, admirably balancing the primacy of revelation in Christ with an articulation of a revelation universally present. He understood human reason as a seedlike participation in God's reason or Logos, fully manifest only in Christ. Junius Rusticus (prefect 162–68) had Justin beaten, then beheaded. Feast day: June 1. See also Apologists; philosophy and theology.

Justinian, Code of, revision of Roman law published by the emperor Justinian I (483–565) in 529. Together with the Novellae (new laws), the Digest, and the Institutes (passages from classical jurists), it forms the Corpus Juris Civilis (Lat., "Body of Civil Law"), which was highly influential in the later development and understanding of canon law. See also canon law.

Justinian I, 483–565, Byzantine emperor from 527 to 565, famous for his brilliant achievements on a variety of fronts. He recaptured enough of the Western empire to ensure Roman domination of the Mediterranean. His legal reforms produced codes of legislation (together known as the Corpus Juris Civilis) that served the empire until its fall in 1453 and thereafter continued to influence both civil and canon law in the West. Justinian's famous building projects included the rebuilding of the basilica of Hagia Sophia at Constantinople (still standing). He was also personally accomplished as a theologian and hymn writer. He called the fifth ecumenical council (Constantinople II, 553) as part of an ongoing, but finally unsuccessful, attempt to reconcile the Monophysites. See also canon law; Constantinople, councils of; Hagia Sophia.

just-war doctrine, the approach that claims that war, despite its coercive and destructive character, is morally justifiable in certain circumstances and under certain limitations. The just-war doctrine thus differs from pacifism, which denies that war is ever morally justifiable; from a holy war or crusade, in which war is seen as divinely authorized and required and in which usually there is little concern about limiting the means and the scope of warfare; and from Realpolitik, in which war is primarily a means to advance national interest. In the just-war approach, moral justification is needed (because of the enormous harms and risks inflicted on others) and is possible (because of the weighty public values of justice, peace, and order that are at stake). Contemporary application of the theory will not be credible for those who hold very negative moral evaluations of either the international order as a whole or of the particular nation-states that are invoking the theory.

Conditions for a Just War: The just-war doctrine lays down the conditions that must be met if a particular war is to be justified and if the prima facie presumption against the use of force is to be overridden. These conditions fall into two main groups: (1) jus ad bellum (Lat., "right to [go to] war") criteria, which state the conditions that must be met before hostilities can be rightly begun; (2) jus in bello (Lat., "[what is] right in a war") criteria, which are to be observed in the way war is conducted. The major jus ad bellum criteria (which are formulated in somewhat different ways in different sources) are (a) just cause, which traditionally included the undoing of injustices and the recovery of things unjustly taken but which is now effectively restricted to defense against aggression; (b) competent authority, which has usually meant national governments but which in the twentieth century has come to include international bodies maintaining collective security; (c) right intention, which excludes revenge and hatred of the enemy; (d) last resort, which requires that it be clearly established that nonviolent methods of dispute resolution will not resolve the conflict without grave damage to moral-political values of fundamental importance; (e) proportionality, which requires that the values being defended and the goals that are achievable are sufficiently important to outweigh the harms that can reasonably be foreseen; (f) a reasonable hope of success, which excludes a resort to force in which defeat is highly likely and so in which there is little prospect of actually defending the values that are at stake; (g) comparative justice, which broadens criterion (a) above so that, in the uncertainties and complexities of a specific dispute, judgment considers the whole range of issues between the contending parties. The major jus in bello criteria are (a) discrimination and (b) proportionality. The principle of discrimination or noncombatant immunity is an application of the general prohibition against killing the innocent; it forbids the direct killing of civilians and persons not actually engaged in combat. Both proponents and critics of "total war" have argued that the practice of total war in modern societies makes the distinction between combatants and noncombatants useless. Applying the principle of discrimination in combat situations, where civilians are also present and are likely to be harmed, involves using the principle of double effect. The principle clearly forbids attacks aimed at the destruction of population centers, as Vatican II affirmed (Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, 1965, n.80). The principle of proportionality forbids practices within warfare that would inflict harm on either military participants or civilians that would be unnecessary or excessive. It is generally held that the principle of proportionality rules out the use of weapons of mass destruction, whether these be conventional or nuclear, biological, or chemical.

This body of principles or criteria constitutes the applicable or working part of the just-war doctrine. It has been developed from military and diplomatic practice, and most of it has been incorporated in international law. It can be applied without reliance on theological premises or on religious practices and attitudes.

Understandings of the Just-War Doctrine: The just-war doctrine should be seen as both a specific response to the political and military history of the West and a work of practical reason restraining the use of force. The elaboration of non-Western analogues to the just-war doctrine is still in its early stages. The just-war doctrine, which has roots in the classical world and in the Hebrew Scriptures, was given its most influential formulation by Augustine, who saw warfare justified as love's response to the plight of the neighbor threatened by force. Thomas Aquinas accepted the legitimacy of war waged in self-defense. Just-war teaching, or an equivalent set of attitudes and norms, was the dominant view of the churches both in the East and in the West, with the exception of some groups shaped by the radical Reformation (Mennonites, Moravian Brethren, Quakers), who drew directly on the pacifist teachings in the NT. The major theological expositions of just-war theory (Augustine, Aquinas, Francisco de Vitoria, Francisco de Suarez) antedate the rise of modern democratic and participatory political systems and were intended to guide rulers and their advisors rather than social critics, citizens, and soldiers. As a result, they do not clearly address the issue of selective conscientious objection, which is now seen to be a clear implication of the theory in a democratic society. Selective conscientious objection, rejected by Pope Pius XII (1939–58) and not recognized in U.S. law, was clearly affirmed by Vatican II (1962–65). The just-war doctrine is acceptable to those theological traditions that combine respect for reason and for established social institutions (Catholicism, Anglicanism) and to those that employ a sharp contrast between a world in which the power of human sinfulness needs to be restrained and a realm of divine grace and peace (Orthodoxy, Lutheranism, Calvinism). It is less acceptable to more perfectionist and individualistic traditions that stem from the radical Reformation or the Enlightenment. Challenges to just-war teaching have arisen within the older churches, including Catholicism, as a result of the increased destructiveness of warfare in the twentieth century and as a result of religious and theological forms of renewal that aim at an unmediated conformity to early Christian teaching and practice, in which neither the norms of the just-war doctrine nor military institutions are to be found. See also conscientious objection; double effect, principle of; pacifism; peace; peace movement, Catholic.

Bibliography

Childress, James. "Just War Theories." Theological Studies 39 (1978): 427–45.

Johnson, James T. Just War Tradition and the Limitation of War. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1981.

———. Can Modern War Be Just? New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1984.

Russell, F. H. The Just War in the Middle Ages. London: Cambridge University Press, 1977.

U.S. Catholic Bishops. The Challenge of Peace: God's Promise and Our Response. Washington, DC: United States Catholic Conference, 1983.

JOHN P. LANGAN

K

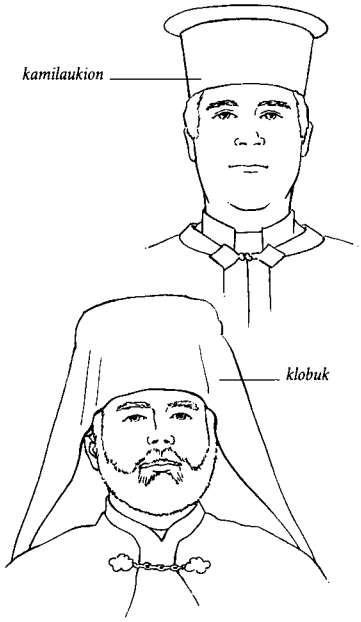
Kaam, Adrian van, b. 1920, Dutch-born priest (Congregation of the Spiritans), psychologist, and founder/director of the Institute of Formative Spirituality at Duquesne University in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. He is the author of many books, including Religion and Personality (1964).

kamilaukion (kah-mee-lahv'kee-ahn; Gk., "covering the neck"), also called kalymaukion, the cylindrical hat, called kamilavka in Slavic usage, worn by Byzantine-rite clergy in major orders. Monks wear the same hat with a veil over it (Russ., klobuk).

Kane, Theresa, b. 1936, American Sister of Mercy. As president of the Leadership Conference of Women Religious, she addressed Pope John Paul II at the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington, D.C., on his first pastoral visit to the United States (1979), requesting that all Catholic ministries be open to women.

Kant, Immanuel, 1724–1803, Prussian (German) philosopher. In moral theology, Kant's insistence that freedom is central to ethical discourse and that moral questions are independent of metaphysics and religion has affected the course of discussion in many ways.

Kamilaukion, Klobuk



For Kant, morality is independent of the empirical conditions that attend human action. These conditions yield only hypothetical imperatives, i.e., contingent demands that spring from directing oneself to goals. Although all action occurs because of desires for goals, the only basis of morality is the goodness of the will legislating to itself the intrinsic demands of freedom; hence, an act is moral only insofar as it is done for the sake of duty or, in Kant's words, fulfills the categorical imperative. Consequences, therefore, have no moral weight in Kantian ethics.

Those who agree with Kant that actions are right or wrong regardless of consequences belong to a school of thought often called deontology, from the Greek deon, "duty." Among the most notable Catholic deontologists are German Grisez and John Finnis, who have combined Kant's methodology with elements of Thomas Aquinas's (d. 1274) ethical system to arrive at a comprehensive list of basic goods (e.g., life, truth, friendship) that one must respect as absolutely inviolable in order to respect one's own freedom and thus make progress as an authentic human being.

Kant's teaching that knowledge of moral norms is independent of metaphysical or religious beliefs has generated considerable debate, especially in Europe, about whether Christian faith contributes anything distinctive to ethical thought and, if so, whether this contribution concerns only the motivation of the agent. See also moral theology. ROBERT P. KENNEDY

Kanti, St. John of. See Cantius, St. John.

Kasper, Walter, b. 1933, German Catholic theologian and bishop. Ordained a priest for the diocese of Rottenburg-Stuttgart (1957), he received his doctorate in theology from the University of Tübingen (1961). He was professor of theology in Münster (1964–70) and in Tübingen (1970–89), a member of the Vatican's International Theological Commission, and theological secretary for the Extraordinary Synod of Bishops in Rome (1985). He was ordained the bishop of Rottenburg-Stuttgart on June 17, 1989. His writings include Jesus the Christ (1974) and The God of Jesus Christ (1982).

Kateri Tekakwitha, Bl. See Tekakwitha, Bl. Kateri.

Katherine Drexel, Bl. See Drexel, Bl. Katherine.

kathisma (kah'thiz-mah; Gk., "seat," "session"),

Byzantine-rite liturgical poetry attached to the psalmody of the liturgical hours, once recited while the monks sat for a brief respite from the long psalmody. By extension, the term is also used for the sections of psalmody which this poetry accompanies. The Byzantine psalter is divided into twenty kathismata, each comprising about nine psalms subdivided into three antiphons, also called doxai or "glorias," because each antiphon ends with the "Glory be to the Father. . . ." See also psalmody; Psalter.

Keane, John Joseph, 1839–1918, Irish-born American prelate and educator. Ordained in 1866, he was appointed bishop of Richmond and administrator of the vicariate apostolic of North Carolina in 1878. In 1886 he was chosen to be the first rector of the not-yet-opened Catholic University of America; in 1887 he was formally appointed by the Board of Trustees. He assembled the first faculty, drafted the statutes, and planned the first two buildings. He was untiring in soliciting funds and students, and by the lectures and sermons he delivered across the country, he drew widespread attention to the new institution. Like his friend Archbishop John Ireland of St. Paul, Keane was an "Americanizer" in the hierarchy and upheld the liberal or progressive side in the numerous controversies dividing the Catholic Church in the United States and the university faculty. He was widely criticized by conservatives for his active participation in the World Parliament of Religions in Chicago in 1893. He was also opposed by German professors and journalists but was supported by the chancellor of the university and archbishop of Baltimore, Cardinal James Gibbons. Having lost the confidence of the apostolic delegate, Archbishop Francesco Satolli, however, Keane was dismissed from the rectorship by Pope Leo XIII on September 15, 1896, though he remained a trustee of the university.

After a period of two and a half years in Rome in various positions, he returned to the United States in 1899. On August 18, 1900, he was appointed archbishop of Dubuque, where he promoted Catholic education, especially St. Joseph's (now Loras) College, held four synods, and tried to safeguard his people against socialism and anarchism. He also carried on a vigorous campaign against alcohol and its attendant evils and personally criticized the mayor of Dubuque and the saloonkeepers. He was elected president of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America in 1907. From 1908 on, his physical health and mental faculties deteriorated, and in 1911 he resigned his see. He continued to reside in Dubuque until his death seven years later. See also Americanism.

ROBERT TRISCO

Kells, Book of, a magnificently illustrated manuscript of the Gospels dating from around the year 800; it is now in the library of Trinity College, Dublin (most recently bound in four volumes corresponding roughly to the separate Gospels). It was probably copied and illustrated in the monastery of Kells (County Meath), although some say it was produced in Iona and brought to Kells when the Vikings raided Iona. The text is of the Irish mixed-Vulgate type. The lavish ornamentation and several full-page illustrations reveal a wide range of artistic influences. See also Ireland, Catholicism in.

Kemble, St. John, 1599–1679, one of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales canonized in 1970. Ordained at Douai in 1625, he worked on the English mission for over fifty years until his execution. Feast day: August 22. See also Forty Martyrs of England and Wales.

Kempe, Margery, ca. 1373–d. after 1433, author

The cover of the Book of Kells, a highly ornamented manuscript of the Gospels, named after the monastery of Kells in Ireland, where they were copied ca. 800; the four Evangelists are represented by the biblical figures, drawn from Rev 4:7, of the man (Matthew), the lion (Mark), the ox (Luke), and the eagle (John); located in Trinity College, Dublin, Ireland.

of The Book of Margery Kempe. She described in unusual mystical language her pilgrimages to holy places, including Canterbury and the Holy Land, and summarized her discourses with several spiritual directors. Under the direction of the Carmelite William of Southfield, Margery sought spiritual advice from the anchoress Julian of Norwich.

Kempis, Thomas à. See Thomas à Kempis.

Kennedy, Eugene Cullen, b. 1928, psychologist and writer. Kennedy received his B.A. from Maryknoll College in 1950, an S.T.B. from Maryknoll Seminary in 1953, and a Ph.D. from The Catholic University of America in 1962. Professor of psychology at Maryknoll College, Glen Ellyn, Illinois, from 1960 to 1969 and at Loyola University in Chicago from 1969 to 1991, he married Sara Connor Charles, M.D., in 1977. He is the author of more than forty books and many articles and columns on the Church, human behavior, and politics, including The Pain of Being Human (1972), Tomorrow's Catholics, Yesterday's Church (1988), and a television play about Pope John XXIII, I Would Be Called John (PBS, 1987). He received the Thomas More medal in 1972.

Kennedy, John Fitzgerald, 1917–63, first Catholic president of the United States. Of Irish ancestry, Kennedy graduated from Harvard University in 1940. He was elected as a Democrat from Massachusetts to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1946 and to the U.S. Senate in 1952.

In 1960 Kennedy ran for the presidency and faced concerted opposition because of his religion. He partly defused the issue by insisting that his religion was a private matter and that his constitutional duties would always come first. His election seemed to shatter the last political barrier to America's acceptance of Catholics.

Kennedy's "New Frontier" administration, while full of promise, had accomplished relatively little by the time of his assassination in Dallas, Texas, in 1963. His administration did establish the Peace Corps and the Alliance for Progress to provide economic aid to Latin America. Kennedy also worked for racial integration in the South, a goal carried through by his successor, Lyndon Johnson.

John Fitzgerald Kennedy, first Catholic president of the United States, shown here with his wife, Jacqueline, during the 1960 election campaign.

kenosis (ken-oh'sis; Gk., "emptying"), a term referring to the "emptying" of Jesus' divinity through the Incarnation. Although the Greek noun is not found in the NT, the verb translated "he emptied himself, taking the form of a slave" is used in the Christ hymn of Phil 2:5–11. Recent interpreters, both Catholic and Protestant, propose an "Adamic" interpretation. Unlike Adam, who disobeyed God by seeking equality with God (Phil 2:6; see Gen 3:4), Jesus (the "last Adam," see 1 Cor 15:45) took the form of a slave by submitting to God's will. Kenotic theology stresses the radical humanity of Jesus, often, according to its critics, to the detriment of the creedal affimation "true God and true man." See also Incarnation, the.

kenotic theories, various interpretations of the Incarnation as the condescension or self-emptying (Gk., kenosis) of the divine Logos. The term is taken from Phil 2:5–11. The two most important advocates of kenotic Christology in the nineteenth century were Gottfried Thomasius (d. 1875) and Charles Gore (d. 1932). Assuming that the full humanity of Jesus Christ required a limited human consciousness, they claimed that the incarnation of the Logos resulted in the temporary cessation of the Logos's divine attributes such as omniscience, omnipresence, and omnipotence. Although these radical views were abandoned in the early twentieth century, moderate forms of kenotic Christology were presented by Karl Barth (d. 1968) and Karl Rahner (d. 1984). See also Christology; Incarnation, the; Logos.

kerygma (key-rig'muh; Gk. "proclamation," "public notice"), term used in the NT for both the act and the content of the proclamation of the good news of God's saving activity manifest in the life, teaching, death, and Resurrection of Jesus (see 1 Cor 1:21; 2:4; 15:14; Rom 16:25; 2 Tim 4:17). The preaching of Peter and Paul in Acts has been called "kerygmatic sermons" (Acts 2:14–39; 3:13–26; 4:10–12; 5:30–32; 10:36–43; 13:17–41). Faith and conversion are the proper response to the kerygma. Kerygma is contrasted to didache (Gk., "teaching") or instruction about the implications of the Christ event, and to parenesis (Gk.), ethical admonitions. The term "kerygmatic theology" is used of the work of Karl Barth (d. 1968), Rudolf Bultmann (d. 1976), and Emil Brunner (d. 1966), major Protestant scholars who sought to restore the Pauline and Reformation stress on the proclaimed word.

Ketteler, Wilhelm Emmanuel (ket'ler), 1811–77, German bishop and pioneer in Catholic social teaching. He studied law, was a member of the Catholic circle in Munich, was ordained in 1844, and appointed bishop of Mainz in 1850. Outspoken on social questions, he opposed the emerging Kulturkampf (Ger., "culture struggle") against the Church and the effects of secularization. He criticized liberalism and socialism in light of the teachings of social Catholicism. His argument on labor, which he drew from the natural law ethics of Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274), provided the basic framework for the papal encyclical Rerum Novarum (1891). At the First Vatican Council (1869–70) he opposed the definition of papal infallibility. See also Rerum Novarum.

Kevin, St., d. ca. 618, Irish abbot and monastic founder. Apart from his association with the monastery of Glendalough (Wicklow) and his cult there, little is known of him. Feast day (in Ireland): June 3.

keys, power of the, a reference to Jesus' commission of Peter and the authority thereby granted. Matt 16:13–20 reports Peter's declaration of Jesus as the Messiah, and Jesus' response, granting to Peter the keys of the kingdom, an image of stewardship. Jesus builds the metaphor using the language of Jewish legal interpretation of Scripture. Whatever Peter "binds" as a legal obligation on earth is bound in heaven; whatever he looses is loosed in heaven. Peter is thus chief interpreter of God's law. See also papacy, the; Peter, St.

Kierkegaard, Søren, 1813–55, Danish philosopher and religious thinker, generally considered the father of modern existentialism. Born in Copenhagen, the son of a devout Lutheran businessman, Kierkegaard studied at the university and in 1840 received his diploma in theology. Beginning in 1843, Kierkegaard wrote numerous books in which, in opposition to the widespread Hegelian philosophy of his day, he emphasized personal decision as determinative of individual existence. For Kierkegaard, the most profound personal decision is that of faith. His influence has been more pronounced on Protestant theologians than on Catholics. See also Existentialism.

Kilian, St., d. 689, bishop and martyr. An Irish monk who went to the Continent, he became bishop of Würzburg (Germany), where he was murdered after a dispute with the king. Feast day: July 8.

Kilwardby, Robert, ca. 1215–79, Dominican theologian at Oxford, archbishop of Canterbury (from 1273), and cardinal in Italy (1278). Famed for his knowledge of the Church Fathers, he wrote, among other works, an important commentary on the Sentences of Peter Lombard and a treatise on the classification of the sciences. See also Canterbury; Sentences.

King, Philip J., b. 1925, Catholic biblical scholar. A priest of the archdiocese of Boston (ordained, 1949), he was professor of Biblical Studies at St. John Seminary, Brighton, Massachusetts (1958–74), and is currently professor of Biblical Studies at Boston College (since 1974). He was director of the W. F. Albright Institute of Archaeological Research in Jerusalem (1972–76) and is the only scholar to have been president of the three major learned societies in the fields of Bible and archaeology: the American Schools of Oriental Research (1976–82), the Catholic Biblical Association of America (1982), and the Society of Biblical Literature (1988). He is the author of American Archaeology in the Mideast (1983), Amos, Hosea, Micah: An Archaeological Commentary (1988), and Jeremiah: An Archaeological Companion (1993).

kingdom of God [in the Bible], an image of God's sovereign authority and its consequences. The emphasis in the image is on the activity of God's rule, not the realm over which it is exercised.

Old Testament: Although the only explicit use of the phrase "kingdom of the Lord" in the OT appears in Chronicles (1 Chr 28:5; 2 Chr 13:8; see also 1 Chr 17:14), the image of God as king is widespread. The image rests on ancient Israelite tradition. Yahweh was envisioned as the royal master of his territory and, eventually, of the whole world. Hymnic language frequently celebrates his reign (1 Kgs 22:19; Pss 22:28; 47:2; 93:1; 97:1; 99:4; Isa 6:5; Zeph 3:15). God's sovereignty has already been manifested in the establishment or reestablishment of Israel (Exod 15:18; Deut 33:5; Obad 20–21). Some texts emphasize the perpetuity of God's reign (Exod 15:18; Pss 145:13; 146:10); others speak of its future coming (Isa 24:23; Obad 21; Zech 14:9). God's reign can connote various things, including the establishment of justice (Ps 99:4), defense of the helpless (Ps 146:5–10), and liberation of the oppressed (Ps 97:10). The full implementation of this reign of justice and peace is viewed by some of the prophets to be a reality of an ideal future (Zech 14:16–9).

The eschatological orientation of the book of Zechariah is intensified in the book of Daniel, which makes a sharp distinction between the empires of Persia and Seleucid Syria that have oppressed Israel and the final, eternal kingdom of the saints. Dan 7 symbolically portrays this hope with its image of the "son of man" who receives royal authority from God as a representative of God's people (Dan 7:27).

Daniel's expectation is shared by other Jewish apocalyptic works (e.g., As. Mos. 10:1), which may occasionally envision God's future reign as a restored Davidic kingdom (Pss. Sol. 17:23). The Kaddish prayer, which probably originated in the period of the Second Temple, contains a petition that God establish his kingdom. Such hopes, with their obvious political implications, continue alongside affirmations of God's universal and eternal sovereignty (Pss. Sol. 5:18; 17:1–4; 1 Enoch 84:2). Jewish Targums, as well as wisdom texts (Wis 10:10), emphasize the cosmic reality and ethical implications of God's rule.

New Testament: The richness of the image found in the OT and Jewish tradition is reflected in the synoptic Gospels, where God's kingdom or reign is the central theme of Jesus' message. Expressions vary; Matthew uses the reverential "kingdom of the heavens," while Mark and Luke use "kingdom of God," but the content is the same.

The theme of God's imminent reign characterizes the proclamation of John the Baptist (Matt 3:2), who emphasized the need to repent in the face of the coming judgment (Matt 3:10; Luke 3:9). Jesus followed in John's footsteps (Matt 4:17; Mark 1:15), but developed the image of the kingdom in his own way. God's reign remained a reality still to come in its fullness (Matt 16:28; Mark 9:1; Luke 9:27), and Jesus taught his disciples to pray for its arrival (Matt 6:10; Luke 11:2). Upon its arrival God's reign would vindicate the poor (Luke 6:20; Matt 5:3 moralizes the beatitude) and the persecuted (Matt 5:10). It would be a festive time in the company of Israel's patriarchs (Matt 8:11–12; Luke 13:28–29). Yet God's reign was already in the midst of the disciples (Luke 17:20). It was being manifested in Jesus' exorcisms (Matt 12:28; Luke 11:20) and his disciples' healings (Matt 10:7–8; Luke 9:2; 10:9).

To enter the service of God's rule in the company of Jesus required sacrifice. Money could be an impediment (Matt 19:23–24; Mark 10:23–24; Luke 18:24–25), as could family (Matt 10:37–38; Luke 14:25–33), and adult pride (Matt 18:3–4). That some have "made themselves eunuchs," presumably by voluntary celibacy, is proposed as an acceptable sacrifice for the kingdom (Matt 19:12).

Jesus taught of the gracious yet demanding reign of God in his complex, evocative, and challenging parables. God's reign was like a hopeful sower, a lowly mustard bush acting like a cedar of Lebanon, insidious leaven, an unscrupulous treasure hunter, a fishnet (Matt 13:24–48). It can be imaged in the decisions of an employer (Matt 20:1–16) or a banqueter (Matt 22:2–14; Luke 14:15–24). In such images Jesus described God's often surprising presence in human affairs and invited a response to it.

Outside the synoptic Gospels, the kingdom of God forms part of the apostles' preaching (Acts 8:12; 14:22; 19:8; 20:25; 28:23). Paul emphasizes the future reality of the kingdom (1 Cor 15:24) to which Christians have been called (1 Thess 2:12) and which they will inherit if they avoid sin (1 Cor 6:9–10; Gal 5:21). Christ's followers will inherit not in "flesh and blood" but when transformed by resurrection (1 Cor 15:50). Yet Paul can occasionally refer to God's reign as present, manifested not in word but in power (1 Cor 4:20), consisting not of dietary observances but of justice, peace, and joy (Rom 14:17). Jas 2:5 recalls the Beatitudes' promise of the kingdom to the poor.

Later works of the NT emphasize the present reality of God's kingdom, often identifying it with the Church. Matthew's version of Peter's commission (Matt 16:18–19) makes the connection explicit. Col 1:13 celebrates Christians' incorporation into the kingdom of God's Son and Heb 12:28 affirms that they have received a "kingdom that cannot be shaken." The Fourth Gospel mentions the kingdom of God as something to be entered through the rebirth of Baptism (3:3–5). Jesus also refers to his kingdom as distinct from those of this world (John 18:36). The book of Revelation celebrates the establishment of God's kingdom (Rev 11:15; 12:10) in the form of a priestly community (Rev 1:6; 5:10).

Bibliography

Chilton, Bruce. The Kingdom of God in the Teaching of Jesus. Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1984.

Perrin, Norman. The Kingdom of God in the Teaching of Jesus. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1963.

Schnackenburg, Rudolf. God's Rule and Kingdom. New York: Herder and Herder, 1963.

HAROLD W. ATTRIDGE

kingdom of God [theology of], a scriptural metaphor describing God's redemptive and life-giving rule over creation and over human history in particular. In the OT, God is the King who rules over Israel (Deut 33:5), the nations (Ps 22:28), and the entire created order (Ps 103:19), and whose sovereign direction of history is manifest in the history of Israel, from the Exodus and conquest of Canaan to the Babylonian exile and return. Israel recognized the reign of God in the early part of its history as the absence of war, material prosperity, and freedom from oppression by other nations. This understanding was deepened and extended by the prophets, who looked forward to the day when God would assert divine sovereignty not only by delivering Israel from bondage and establishing it as a nation, but also by effecting a new relationship between God and the people of Israel, pouring the spirit of the Lord upon them and transforming their hearts (Jer 31:31–34; Ezek 36:24–31). After the exile and subsequent national misfortunes, the apocalyptic writers came to recognize that the full establishment of God's kingdom would come only with the completion of the course of history, when God would destroy all the powers of evil and resurrect the just, granting them everlasting life (Dan 7:27; 12:2).

Present and Future Kingdoms: This apocalyptic expectation appears in the NT when Jesus proclaims the urgent necessity for conversion, since "the time is fulfilled and the kingdom of God has come near" (Mark 1:15). On the one hand, the kingdom is already present with Jesus' appearance, though in a hidden, mysterious way (Mark 4:30–32), as indicated by his overthrowing of the reign of Satan through healings and exorcisms (Mark 3:27; Luke 11:20). On the other hand, the full realization of the kingdom will come only with the future return of Christ (Mark 13:26–27), as the present age is still engaged in a struggle with the power of Satan (Luke 4:5–6; John 12:31). The advent of the kingdom is good news for sinners, offering forgiveness for the repentant (Luke 15:11–32). For the poor, it brings an end to suffering (Luke 6:20–21). The Christian community experiences the kingdom in the new life in Christ granted through the infusion of the Spirit (Rom 14:17), though this new life will be perfected only at the Second Coming of Christ, when the just will reign with Christ forever (Rev 22:5).

Christian life and theology are marked by this tension between the present kingdom and the future kingdom. The pilgrim Church is not identical to the kingdom of God, though it is the sacramental sign of God's presence and activity in history. The Church is called to continue Jesus' mission, to proclaim the kingdom and to work toward its establishment. There is another tension in that the kingdom is God's creation, yet it depends also on the Church's activity. The kingdom of God is not identifiable with any political program or social utopia of human making, but the faithful are not permitted to be passive or indifferent to situations not in accord with God's reign. They are called upon to cooperate with the work of the Spirit by striving to bring about the kingdom of God in all its dimensions, personal and social (Vatican II, Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, n. 39). See also apocalypticism; eschatology individual; eschatology universal; kingdom of God [in the Bible]; salvation history.

JAMES LE GRYS

King James Bible, also called the Authorized Version, the first complete printed Bible in English, so called because it was mandated by King James I of England in 1604. Translated by a committee of English scholars, it was begun in 1607 and published in 1611. The basis for the new translation was the Bishops' Bible (1568), which was itself a revision of the Great Bible (1539). The lineage of the King James Bible can ultimately be traced back to the first English translation of the NT in 1526 (and about half of the OT in 1530–31) by William Tyndale. Along with the Book of Common Prayer, the King James Bible has shaped the piety of Anglican and Protestant English-speaking Christians for three centuries. See also Bible, English translations of the; Scripture, versions of.

kingship of Christ, a designation that celebrates the absolute and supreme authority of Jesus Christ affirmed by the NT (Mark 11:9–10; 13:26; 15:29–39; John 19:1–22; Col 1:12–20). The title became important for Catholics in 1925, when Pius XI, in the face of rising nationalism and Fascism, instituted the feast of Christ the King to reassert Christ's sovereignty over all forms of political governance. The feast is now celebrated by Catholics on the last Sunday of the liturgical year, or the Sunday before Advent.

Christ is celebrated as king in two ways. First, Christ is the messianic king, the redeemer who has obtained salvation for all human persons by his life, death, and Resurrection. Through Christ and in the Spirit, we enter into the kingdom of God. Second, the title affirms that all persons and all human institutions are subordinate to Christ. Primary allegiance must be given to Christ and the kingdom of God.

Although intended to challenge the absolutism of political sovereigns, recent scholarship has stressed the ecclesiological implications of the title. For example, because the Church is not the kingdom of God, but the initial budding forth of the kingdom (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 5), the Church must remain the servant of the kingdom. The task of the Church is not to draw all persons into itself, but to usher in the kingdom by serving its sovereign Lord whenever and wherever God is actively present. See also Christ the King, Feast of.

Kino, Eusebio Francisco (kee'noh), 1645–1711, Tyrolian-born Jesuit missionary priest and explorer in Spain's service. After an unsuccessful colonizing and missionary venture in Baja California, he founded numerous Spanish missions among the Pima Indians of Pimería Alta (northern Sonora, Mexico, and southern Arizona) that resulted in the conversion and hispanization of thousands of native peoples.

Kirby, St. Luke, d. 1582, one of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales canonized in 1970. Ordained in 1577 and sent on the English mission in 1580, he was tried along with Edmund Campion and Alexander Briant for conspiracy against the queen and executed in 1582 after extensive torture. Feast day: May 30. See also Forty Martyrs of England and Wales.

kiss of peace, the mutual greeting of baptized Christians during the eucharistic liturgy, as a sign of their love and unity. As a liturgical greeting, the kiss of peace is mentioned by Justin Martyr (second century), although the NT Letters may also allude to its use (see Rom 16:16; 1 Pet. 5:14). In the East (and in some ancient Western rites), the kiss is exchanged when the gifts of bread and wine are brought to the altar (see Matt. 5:23). In the Roman and Ambrosian (Milanese/north Italian) rites, the kiss occurs shortly before the Agnus Dei and Communion.

Kleist-Lilly version. See Bible, English translations of the.

Kleutgen, Joseph (kloyt'gen), 1811–83, German philosopher and theologian. A Jesuit, he taught ethics at the University of Freiburg beginning in 1837. In Die Theologie der Vorzeit (3 vols., 1853–60) and Die Philosophie der Vorzeit (2 vols., 1860–63) he commended the Scholastic method and criticized the teachings of G. Hermes, A. Günther, and J. B. Hirscher and the German philosphical tradition of I. Kant, F. Schelling, and G. W. F. Hegel. At the First Vatican Council (1869–70) he contributed to the dogmatic constitution on revelation, De Fide Catholica. In 1878 he became professor of dogmatic theology at the Gregorian University in Rome. Kleutgen is often credited with influencing the composition of the first draft of Pope Leo XIII's encyclical commending the teachings of Thomas Aquinas, Aeterni Patris (1879). See also Aeterni Patris; Vatican Council I.

kneeling, the posture of praying on one's knees. Particularly during private and devotional prayer, kneeling emphasizes adoration of God and the presence of Christ in the Eucharist. The attitudes of penitence, adoration, and humility are associated with kneeling.

Knights of Columbus, a Catholic fraternal society. Incorporated in Connecticut on March 29, 1882, the Knights of Columbus (K of C) was founded by Father Michael J. McGivney at St. Mary's Church in New Haven. The young priest, concerned with the plight of widows and their families, emphasized the insurance feature. Because Christopher Columbus symbolized the Catholic foundations of the New

Although primarily an international fraternal insurance society with over 1.5 million members, the Knights of Columbus also provide a kind of honor guard at ecclesiastical ceremonies, as shown here processing into a church in full regalia of plumed hats, capes, and swords.

World, the Knights proudly proclaimed him their patron as a way of grounding their legitimacy in an atmosphere frequently charged with anti-Catholicism.

The Columbian ceremonials were intended to attract young Catholic men who may have drifted into the Masons, a society prohibited by the Catholic Church. By 1910 the order had expanded into every state, all the provinces of Canada, and into Mexico, the Philippines, and Puerto Rico. Over the years it has established its character as a Catholic antidefamation society eager to assert its loyalty to Church and country.

Among its cultural interests are such projects as the Vatican Film Library at St. Louis University and its Catholic advertising program. It has established a strong presence in Rome: K of C playgrounds, Vatican radio and television projects, and programs associated with the renovation and renewal of St. Peter's Basilica. The order's Vicarius Christi Foundation yields more than $2 million annually for the pope's private charities.

With over 1.5 million members and over $20 billion of insurance in force in 1992, the order contributes nearly $100 million annually to charitable projects and almost 200 million hours of volunteer work.

A blend of faith and fraternalism, the K of C represents a distinctively conservative rendering of what it means to be Catholic and American.

CHRISTOPHER J. KAUFFMAN

Knights of Labor, a nineteenth-century labor union that included many Catholics. Founded in 1869, this union stressed organizations of the crafts until it shifted to an industrial union in the 1880s. Its agenda included an eight-hour working day, occupational-safety regulations, the abolition of child labor, and equal pay for women. It was originally a secret fraternal society, but Terence V. Powderly, a Catholic machinist and mayor of Scranton, Pennsylvania (1878–84), became grand master worker of the union in 1879 and reformed its ritualistic character. Powderly was eager to dispel prejudice against the union among episcopal leaders who condemned it as a secret society. In contrast to the archbishop of Quebec, who had prompted a Vatican condemnation of the union in 1884, Archbishop James Gibbons of Baltimore defended the Knights in a strong letter of protest to the Congregation for Propagation of Faith (Propaganda Fide) in Rome, urging that the condemnation not be extended to the United States. The letter emphasized that a condemnation would be considered a blow to social justice and religious liberty as well as impair Catholic workers' loyalty to the Church. Not only did James Gibbons's letter prevent a Vatican condemnation of the Knights, but it was also one of the influential factors that prompted Pope Leo XIII to issue the social encyclical Rerum Novarum (1891), a defense of the rights of labor to form associations.

The Knights of Labor were eventually eclipsed by the rise of trade unionism and officially terminated in 1917.

Knights of Malta, a military religious order, known officially as the Military Hospitaler Order of St. John of Jerusalem, of Rhodes, and of Malta. After a long history of hospice work and military efforts on behalf of pilgrims in the Holy Land dating at least to the twelfth century, the organization today is both a religious order (with a core of vowed members from whom the master general is chosen) and a symbolic sovereign state accredited to the Holy See and a few other countries. The Malta Palace in Rome is the order's headquarters. It enjoys extraterritoriality along with a few other properties. Both laypeople (chosen for their power and wealth as a general rule) and clerics have affiliated with the organization in order to support its charitable works, which focus on hospital work and the maintenance of ambulance services in various parts of the world.

Knights of the Holy Sepulchre, fraternal organization, also known as the Equestrian Order of the Holy Sepulchre of Jerusalem. While the historical origins are cloudy, there is evidence of honorary knights connected to the Franciscans and to Jerusalem's Church of the Holy Sepulchre since the fifteenth century. Until 1847 the Latin patriarch received knights into the confraternity, but that privilege has now passed to Roman control. Currently, the confraternity is under the leadership of a curial cardinal. The order admits both men and women into various ranks. Membership is bestowed as an honor on influential Catholics who aid in the work of the Church. The standard regalia of the confraternity includes a white cape and a red crusader cross of Jerusalem. See also Holy Sepulchre, Church of the.

Knights Templar, monastic military order that was founded in the twelfth century; also known as the Poor Knights of Christ and of the Temple of Solomon. Their rule may well have been developed by Bernard of Clairvaux (d. 1153). For over one hundred years they had a presence in the Holy Land and fought bravely in the various Crusades. They engaged in a building program and were seen as the protectors of pilgrims. Their great accumulated wealth was held in Parisian and London "temples." The order was suppressed in 1312 after an inquisitorial process, managed by Pope Clement V and Philip the Fair of France, that involved torture and forced confessions. The charges of sodomy, atheism, and blasphemous behavior leveled against the Templars have been vigorously debated by historians, but the innocence of the Templars is now generally recognized.

Knock, Our Lady of (Gaelic, Cnoc Mhuire, "Hill of Mary"), a Marian title associated with a reported apparition of the Virgin Mary in the small village of Knock in the region of Connemara, County Mayo, Ireland. In 1879 Mary allegedly appeared to fifteen villagers on the gable end of the local parish church. Thereafter, the place became a center of Marian devotion and pilgrimage, and an important symbol of Irish Catholicism. Knock now has an airport to facilitate international pilgrimages.

Knowles, David, 1896–1974, Benedictine Regius Professor of Modern History, University of Cambridge. His writings on English monastic history received much acclaim for content and style.

Knox, John, ca. 1513–72, Scottish Reformer. After the execution of George Wishart by Cardinal Beaton in 1546, Knox worked to bring reform to Scotland through his own preaching. Exiled in France, England, Frankfurt, and Geneva, he returned to Scotland in 1559 at the invitation of the nobility and preached throughout the country for reform, culminating in the reforming Parliament of 1560, which approved the Scots Confession drafted by Knox with six fellow pastors. Other important works are The Book of Discipline (1560), the Treatise of Predestination (1560), the Book of Common Order (1556–64), and the History of the Reformation of Religion Within the Realm of Scotland (1584). See also Presbyterianism; Reformation, the Knox, Ronald Arbuthnott, 1888–1957, English writer and biblical translator. The son of an Anglican bishop, he was ordained an Anglican priest in 1910, became a Roman Catholic in 1917, and was ordained a Catholic priest in 1919. Catholic chaplain at Oxford from 1926 to 1939, he translated the Latin Vulgate into English.

Knox Bible. See Bible, English translations of the.

koinonia (Gk., "fellowship," "communion"), the communion experienced by Christians. In the NT it refers to communion with God (1 John 1:3,6), the Son (1 Cor 1:9), and the Holy Spirit (2 Cor 13:14) as well as the committed communion among believers (Acts 2:42–47). See also communion, Church as.

Kolbe, St. Maximilian, 1894–1941, Polish Franciscan, founder of the Militia of Mary Immaculate. Imprisoned at the Nazi concentration camp in Auschwitz (1936), he volunteered to take the place of a young father condemned to execution (1941). Feast day: August 14.

kontakion (kahn-tah'kee-ahn; Gk., "scroll"), Byzantine-rite liturgical refrain. Formerly, kontakion was the name for a series of poetic religious refrains, e.g., the Akathistos Hymn. Now it more commonly refers to the refrain that follows the sixth ode of the canon of Matins, the first of the liturgical hours, prayed during the middle of the night, or to the last in a series of refrains proper to a day or feast.

Maximilian Kolbe, Polish priest who exchanged his life for another's in Auschwitz during the Second World War.

Koran (also spelled Qur'ān; Arab., "recitation"), the scripture of Islam, dating to the prophet Muhammad (570–632), who is said to have transcribed these teachings over twenty years as they were dictated to him by an angel. This sacred book is said to be a perfect copy of the original tablet preserved in heaven. As a result, Muslims regard the Koran as the infallible Word of God, which must not be interpreted but taken literally, as expressed in Arabic. The authoritative text is the one compiled by the prophet's third caliph (successor), Uthman (644–56). It consists of 114 chapters (sūras), which include verses from the OT, haggadah, NT, and NT Apocrypha. The Koran teaches an absolute monotheism, from which springs belief in the unity of all people who believe in God and which rejects all gods other than Allah. According to Muslim belief, God is also revealed to Jews and Christians, who fail, however, to acknowledge him. The Koran requires complete obedience (islām) to God and his teachings. See also Islam.

Korea, Catholicism in. Although some Catholics may have been on the Korean peninsula (divided after 1948 into the nations of North Korea and South Korea) before it was closed to foreigners in the sixteenth century, the real introduction of Catholicism to Korea came in 1784 through lay converts. A priest who arrived ten years later found four thousand Catholics who had never had the ministry of a priest. By the middle of the nineteenth century there were fifteen thousand Catholics in Korea, but four separate persecutions later in the century reduced that number drastically. One hundred and three martyrs of those persecutions were canonized by Pope John Paul II during his pastoral visit to South Korea in 1984.

In 1883, when Korea's borders were opened once again to foreigners, its government granted freedom of religion. The Catholic hierarchy in Korea was established in 1962, but since the Korean War of 1950–53 there have been no reports of Catholic life in Communist North Korea. The Forty-fourth International Eucharistic Congress was held in Seoul, South Korea, October 5–8, 1989. In the 1990s there are two dioceses in North Korea, and three archdioceses and eleven dioceses in South Korea. Catholics in South Korea comprise a little more than 6 percent of the total population of some 43 million.

Kostka, St. Stanislaus, 1550–68, Polish youth who died as a Jesuit novice. He studied at the Jesuit college in Vienna and was known for his piety. He walked 350 miles to Dillengen, Germany, to enter the order there despite intense family opposition. Peter Canisius, provincial of Upper Germany, sent him to Rome where he was received into the Jesuits in 1567. He died nine months later. He is one of the patron saints of Poland. Feast day: November 13.

Kraus, Francis Xavier (krows), 1840–1901, German historian of the Church and art. Ordained in 1894, he became professor of the history of Christian art in Strasbourg in 1872 and of Church history in Freiburg in 1878. He wrote extensively on the history of the Church and of Christian art. His diaries are an important source for the history of the Church in the nineteenth century. See also Catholicism and the visual arts.

Krizhanich, Jurij (yoo'ree krih'sahn-itch), 1618–83, Croatian-born linguist, missionary, and early precursor of the Slavophiles, mid-nineteenth-century Russian intellectuals who preferred Slavic culture to Western culture. He entered Russia in 1659, planning to convert it to Catholicism. He advocated a common Slavic language and the political union of all Slavs.

Kuhn, Johann Evangelist (koon), 1806–87, German theologian. Ordained in 1831, he became a professor of NT exegesis at Giessen in 1837 and at Tübingen in 1839. In 1838 he published Das Leben Jesu ("The Life of Jesus"), which offered a critique of Protestant D. F. Strauss. The next year he became professor of dogmatic theology at Tübingen until 1882. He wrote the four-volume Katholische Dogmatik (1846–68).

Kulturkampf (kool'tuhr-kahmpf; Ger., "culture struggle"), a Church-state dispute in Germany during the 1870s. A major episode in modern German history, the Kulturkampf erupted between 1874 and 1878 as a "battle of cultures." Anti-Church liberals in the Prussian parliament attacked the influence of the Catholic Church in matters such as education, marriage, and papal authority. Although conservative, the German chancellor Otto von Bismarck joined in the attack. German Catholics rallied around their bishops and priests, many of whom had been banned from parish service, forcing Bismarck to seek ways to reconcile the Church with the state after the death of Pope Pius IX in 1878. See also Germany, Catholicism in; Pius IX.

Küng, Hans, b. 1928, Swiss Catholic theologian and ecumenist. Küng was ordained a priest in 1954 and received his doctorate from the Institut Catholique at the Sorbonne (Paris) in 1957. He has been professor of theology at the University of Tübingen since 1960 and director of the Institute for Ecumenical Research at Tübingen.

Küng is the author of some twenty-five books on ecclesiology, Christology, interreligious dialogue, and other pastoral questions, including Justification: The Doctrine of Karl Barth and a Catholic Reflection (1964); The Council, Reform and Reunion (1961); Structures of the Church (1964); The Church (1967); Infallible? An Inquiry (1971); On Being A Christian (1976); Does God Exist? (1980); Christianity and the World Religions: Paths of Dialogue with Islam, Hinduism, and Buddhism (1986); Global Responsibility: In Search of a New World Ethic (1991).

From the beginning of Küng's scholarly career, a Vatican dossier was compiled on him. Despite this, Küng was invited by Pope John XXIII to be a peritus (Lat., "expert") at Vatican II. In 1967 the Vatican's Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith initiated official proceedings against Küng and forbade The Church to be translated or discussed. Around the same time Küng published Infallible? An Inquiry, which generated a worldwide debate and prompted condemnations by several national groups of bishops. After a series of other investigations and censures, on December 18, 1979, the Sacred Congregation issued a declaration against Küng's teaching and, judging that he no longer could be considered a Catholic theologian, withdrew his canonical mission to teach Catholic theology. CATHERINE MOWRY LACUGNA

Professor Dr. Hans Küng, a Swiss diocesan priest who, in spite of his censure by the Vatican in 1979, remains one of the Catholic Church's leading theologians and ecumenists.

Kurisumala Ashram, a Syro-Malankara Catholic monastery in Kerala, India. The ashram was founded in 1958 by Belgian Trappist Father Francis Maheiu, called Francis "Acharya" (spiritual guide), aided by the English Benedictine Bede Griffiths (d. 1993). Their ideal was to create a monastic life at once authentically Indian and faithful to the Eastern Christian traditions of South India. The ashram, a popular spiritual center for Christians and Hindus alike, has successfully integrated Indian elements into the West Syrian liturgy, and adopted traditional Indian forms of dress, asceticism, and simplicity of life. See also monastery; Syro-Malankara Catholic Church.

Kyr (keer; Gk., kyrios, "Lord"), title for a bishop in Old Slavonic and some modern Slavic languages, especially common among Ruthenians and Ukrainians. Vladyko ("Master") is the corresponding title in Russian usage. See also bishop.

Kyrie eleison (kee'ree-ay ay-lay'ee-suhn; Gk., "Lord, have mercy"), an early brief prayer for divine mercy, used as a response to diaconal prayers in the Eastern churches. In the Western churches, it was used as an independent rite: three Kyrie eleisons, three Christe eleisons ("Christ, have mercy"), three Kyrie eleisons. Today it is part of the introductory penitential rite used in various ways.

Kyrios (kih'ree-aws). See Lord.

L

Laberthonnière, Lucien (loo-see-en' lah-bair-tohn-yair'), 1860–1932, French Catholic philosopher and theologian. An ordained priest of the Oratorians (1886) and professor of philosophy from 1887, he sought to reconcile philosophy and theology through his personalist thought and was accused of Modernism. Many of his writings were placed on the Index of Forbidden Books. See also Modernism.

Laborem Exercens (lah-bohr'em eks-air'chenz; Lat., "Doing work"), "On Human Work," third encyclical letter of Pope John Paul II. Issued on September 14, 1981, to commemorate the ninetieth anniversary of Leo XIII's Rerum Novarum, the encyclical sought "to call attention to the dignity and rights of those who work, to condemn situations in which that dignity and those rights are violated, and to help guide the [contemporary] changes so as to ensure authentic progress by man and society" (n. 1). It sees human work as an act of cocreation with God (n. 4) and as an expression of self-realization (n. 6). This is the basis for a spirituality of work (n. 25). Insisting on the priority of labor over capital (n. 12), the pope condemns a "rigid" capitalism that sees private ownership as an "untouchable 'dogma' of economic life" (n. 14). On the contrary, "the first principle of the whole ethical and social order [is] the principle of the common use of goods" (n. 19). See also work, theology of.

Labouré, St. Catherine, 1806–76, French mystic and initiator of devotion to the Miraculous Medal. An uneducated peasant girl, Zoé Labouré entered the Sisters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul in 1830. Within months she took the name Catherine and moved to Paris. On July 18, the Blessed Virgin Mary is said to have appeared to her for several hours in the convent chapel. On November 27 Mary again appeared and asked her to have the vision before her struck as the Miraculous Medal. Several other visions followed until September 1831. Her confessor, M. Aladel, promoted devotion to the Miraculous Medal while Catherine's identity remained virtually unknown until her death. She was canonized in 1947. Feast day: December 30. See also Miraculous Medal.

Catherine Labouré, French Sister of Charity whose visions of the Blessed Virgin Mary gave rise to devotion to the Miraculous Medal, which depicts Mary standing on a globe with shafts of light coming from her hands.

Labre, St. Benedict Joseph, 1748–83, ascetic and beggar. After trying unsuccessfully to join various religious orders, he devoted his life to making pilgrimages to Europe's many religious shrines, sustaining himself by begging alms. He was particularly devoted to the Blessed Sacrament. His feast, no longer observed universally, is April 16.

Lacordaire, Henri (on-ree' lah-kohr-dair') 1802–61, French Dominican preacher. Trained in law, he was ordained a priest for the archdiocese of Paris (1827), where he gained national recognition for his preaching in the cathedral of Notre-Dame (1835–36). After making a retreat with Dom P. Guéranger in Rome, he joined the Order of Preachers and subsequently restored the Dominican order in France, suppressed since 1790. His preaching in apologetics resulted in his widely read Conférénces de Notre-Dame de Paris (4 vols., 1844–51).

Lactantius, ca. 250–ca. 325, Latin Apologist and teacher of rhetoric under Diocletian. His conversion to Christianity compelled him to leave the court when persecution began (303). His works include The Divine Institutions, the first Latin attempt at a systematic, philosophical theology. Although Lactantius was not a profoundly consistent thinker, his style gained the admiration of Jerome who (followed by the Renaissance humanists) compared him to Cicero. See also Apologists; philosophy and theology.

ladder, spiritual, a symbol in Christian spirituality derived chiefly, though not exclusively, from Gen 28:12. Jesus connected himself to Jacob's ladder (John 1:51). This ladder now symbolizes God's descent into human life through revelation and self-communication and also the human ascent to God as a spiritual journey.

Ladislaus of Hungary, St., 1040–95, king of Hungary from 1077 to 1095. In 1083, he successfully promoted the canonization of King Stephen I of Hungary. Working tirelessly to spread the faith among his subjects in Croatia and Dalmatia, in 1091 he founded the bishopric of Zagreb. In the investiture struggle in which lay princes claimed the right to invest bishops with the ring and staff and to receive homage from them, he sided with the papacy, Gregory VII and Victor III. He died while preparing for the First Crusade. Feast day: June 27. See also Hungary, Catholicism in.

Lady, Our, a common title used by Catholics for the Blessed Virgin Mary. It is traditionally employed when speaking about the importance of Mary as model, advocate, and protectress, in contrast, for example, to the title "Mother of God," which pertains to her divine maternity, and the "Blessed Virgin," which is often associated with important Marian events. See also Mary, Blessed Virgin.

lady chapel, a separate chapel in a cathedral or large church, devoted to the Blessed Virgin Mary in which her sculpted or painted figure over an altar is conspicuous. Such devotional chapels were especially prominent in English cathedrals. See also cathedral; chapel.

Laetare Medal (lay-tahr'ay), medal awarded annually by the University of Notre Dame to an outstanding American Catholic and announced on Laetare (Lat., "Rejoice") Sunday, the fourth Sunday of Lent. Established in 1883, the medal, a solid gold disk inscribed with the words, "Truth is great and will prevail," has honored men and women in many fields, including John Gilmary Shea (1883), John Fitzgerald Kennedy (1961), and Dorothy Day (1972). See also Notre Dame, University of.

Laetare Sunday (Lat., laetare, "rejoice"), the fourth Sunday of Lent, so-called from the first word of the Introit (the antiphon of the Roman Gradual). Laetare, taken from the Latin translation of Isa 66:10, sets a tone of joyful anticipation of the Easter mystery, as do the permitted rose-colored vestments. See also Gaudete Sunday.

Laetare Medal, the award given annually to an American Catholic by the University of Notre Dame in recognition of distinguished service to the gospel and the Church.

Laetentur Coeli (lay-ten'tuhr chay'lee; Lat., "The heavens rejoice"), decree of union between Latin and Byzantine communions (July 6, 1439). The Council of Florence, occasioned by the desire of the embattled Greek church to secure aid against the Turks, who were advancing against Constantinople, promulgated Laetentur Coeli to reunite Latins and Byzantines. The decree cautiously proclaimed the spiritual supremacy of the pope and carefully stipulated that the Latin insertion of Filioque (the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son) in the Nicene Creed implied no subordination of the Holy Spirit, as the Byzantine church contended. Despite the decree's cautious attempt at union, the Byzantine church in Constantinople almost immediately rejected it. John Bessarion (d. 1472), archbishop of Nicaea, and some of the younger Greek bishops continued to favor the union, but it ceased entirely with the capture of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453. See also Florence, Council of.

LaFarge, John, 1880–1963, American Jesuit priest, journalist, and promoter of interracial justice. He worked for fifteen years as a pastor in rural Maryland and then as writer for America magazine and other journals. A popular public lecturer, he wrote many books on the Catholic position on civil rights and race relations.

Lagrange, Marie-Joseph Albert, 1855–1938, French Dominican biblical scholar. Born in Bourg-en-Bresse, he completed a law degree before entering the Dominicans in 1879. After ordination in 1883, and graduate study in Vienna, he founded in 1890 the École Biblique, the first modern Catholic school of biblical and archaeological research. The approach was moderately critical, supporting, e.g., source criticism of the Pentateuch with evidence from archaeology. Its historical method was the union of document and monument. At first Lagrange focused on the OT, and received encouragement from Pope Leo XIII. But under Pope Pius X he fell into disfavor. To avoid controversy he switched to NT studies. In 1892 he founded the Revue Biblique; in 1900 the monograph and commentary series Études Bibliques. Both continue publication in the 1990s. A prolific author, he produced over 30 books, 248 articles, and more than 1,500 reviews. In addition to full-scale commentaries on Judges (1903), Mark (1911), Romans (1916), Galatians (1918), Luke (1921), Matthew (1923), and John (1925), he produced works on the NT canon and textual criticism, messianism, intertestamental Judaism,patristics,historicalmethod,apologetics, and a widely translated life of Christ. In 1935 he returned to France, where he died in 1938. He has been reburied in Jerusalem. He received posthumous vindication in 1943, in the encyclical of Pius XII on biblical studies, Divino Afflante Spiritu. The story of his struggle and triumph is the paradigmatic heroic model of Catholic intellectual life in the twentieth century, a pattern for pioneers who came after. The cause of his beatification is in active process. See also École Biblique; Revue Biblique.

BENEDICT T. VIVIANO

laicization, the process used in legally returning a cleric to the status of a layperson. Although the Catholic understanding of Holy Orders includes the notion that the sacrament is unrepeatable, thus "once a priest always a priest," the ordained may be released from the rights and obligations of the clerical state and be treated as a layperson. The validity of the ordination might not be at question here, but there are other considerations that render such a release appropriate.

The most common process used for laicization is initiated by the cleric himself. In the years immediately following Vatican II (1962–65) large numbers of priests discerned a necessity for leaving the ordained ministry and continuing their Christian lives as laypersons. Their decisions were facilitated by a process, approved by Pope Paul VI, that required that their reflections on their original decision to seek ordination and reasons for the requested change be submitted to the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. Large numbers of priests took advantage of this process. From the beginning of the pontificate of Pope John Paul II in 1978, however, the number of such laicizations has decreased considerably. New norms were issued in 1980 and in 1988 the matter was placed in the hands of the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments. Recently there has been a modest increase of such permissions.

Laicization may also be used as a penalty when a cleric has abused his responsibilities. This usage results from a formal ecclesiastical trial or from an administrative decree of the Holy See. See also clergy.

JOHN F. LAHEY

laity (Gk., laos, "people"), the Christian faithful. The word originally referred to the early Christian community as the new "chosen people." Eventually it was used for the nonclergy, distinguishing them as the common, uneducated dependents of the clerical, governing elite. In modern usage "laity" is a term that refers to over 98 percent of the Catholic Church, the faithful who are consecrated to the Lord by the sacraments of initiation. In that sense, however, the term "laity" applies to every member of the Church, clergy and religious included.

Laity in the Early Church: All early Christians referred to themselves as the newly chosen people of God. Jesus called most of his disciples and all of the apostles from the Jewish laity. Many famous missionaries in the NT were laity—Aquila and his wife Priscilla, Junia, Nereus and his sister, and a host of others. Early communities were organized in the homes of lay leaders like Mary and Nympha. In fact, Christianity was from the beginning a lay movement, and as it developed, laity held key leadership roles, presiding over communities, preaching, teaching, and celebrating rituals of prayer and worship. While there were always dedicated Christians who served the community and others who consecrated themselves as ascetics, almost two hundred years passed before some of the faithful began to be called "priests" and three hundred and fifty years before others would organize themselves as monks or religious.

The positive description of the faithful as the people of God (Gk., laos theou) lasted about two hundred years. However, some early Christian writers, like Clement of Rome, Origen, and Clement of Alexandria, used the pejorative word laikos in a way that suggested incompetent masses of the common people, in contrast to their leaders.

Laity in History: Three developments in the early Church had negative effects on laity: the development of clergy, the growth of monasticism, and the disdain for the material world. Like any other organization, as Christianity expanded and developed, it became more structured, and some members took on specific roles for the community. First, there were teachers and prophets, then elders and overseers (or bishops), and later priests and monks. Under the influence of the Roman emperors who made Christianity the state religion, the leadership of the Church became hierarchical and separated itself from the ordinary people. By the third to fourth centuries the Church was divided into three groups: clergy, religious, and laity; the clergy were considered the most important, and laity the least.

In the persecutions of the early centuries, those who gave their lives for the Lord in martyrdom were respected as saints. After the persecutions, the saintly gave their lives to the Lord in monasticism and through consecrated virginity and asceticism. Thus, monks and religious came to be as greatly respected as the clergy, while the laity remained at the lowest spiritual level.

Laity were not only considered the lowest rung on the ladder of Church membership, but, under the influence of philosophical movements (e.g., Neoplatonism), many in the Church began to think that anything material was bad and only the spiritual was good. Since laity spent every day of their lives dealing with the material aspects of life—work, politics, family, sex—they were seen to be at a disadvantage for spiritual growth. The subordination of laity in the Church continued for over eighteen hundred years.

Laity in Vatican Council II: Although laity did not play a very active role at the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), they were perhaps its prime beneficiary. Conciliar emphases on community, service, holiness of all the baptized, new understandings of vocation, openness to the world, participatory government, broader views of ministry, and the need for world transformation all stressed the increased importance of lay life in the Church.

Since the council's conclusion in 1965, and as a result of its teachings, laity have found new opportunities to be involved in the life of the Church by collaborating in parish and pastoral councils and local, regional, and national task forces; by ministering as directors of religious education, youth ministry, social service, and in leadership roles in spiritual movements; by appreciating the religious dimensions of their ordinary daily efforts in work, family life, civic and social involvement. Local church life now looks different, as the faithful become accustomed to a more highly visible role for the laity.

Although the council's call to upgrade the role of laity in the Church was clear, the faithful, whether laity, religious, or clergy, still tend to interpret the teaching in different ways: as a call to the laity to increase their help to the pastor in his work, to be a "leavening" influence in the contemporary world, to dedicate themselves to social justice, to minister to the needs of Church communities, or to courageously discover new ways of serving the Lord in changing times.

Laity in the Contemporary Church: In 1987 the Catholic Church held a World Synod on the Laity. Many laity were invited as observers; others came as personal advisers or experts for bishops. The synod and its final document stressed the laity's equality with clergy and religious in the Church's life of communion and mission. It saw the specific vocational role of the laity as one of ministry to the world in the ordinary circumstances of daily life. Subsequently, emphasis has been given to the importance of baptismal vocation, the universal call to holiness, the charisms given to every person, the common call to build community, the common priesthood of all the faithful, and a lay-centered Church. Thus, the synod led the Church full circle, recalling the essential contribution the laity made to the growth of the early Church and summoning all to participation in the mission and ministries of the Church today. See also Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity; lay ministries; lay spirituality.

Bibliography

Doohan, Leonard. The Lay Centered Church. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1984.

Finn, Virginia Sullivan. Pilgrims in this World. New York: Paulist Press, 1990.

John Paul II. "Apostolic Exhortation on the Laity" (Christifideles Laici). Origins 18 (1989): 561–95.

Osborne, Kenan B. Ministry: Lay Ministry in the Roman Catholic Church. New York: Paulist Press, 1993.

Parent, Remi. A Church of the Baptized. New York: Paulist Press, 1987.

Rademacher, William J. Lay Ministry. New York: Crossroad, 1991.

LEONARD DOOHAN

Lalement, St. Gabriel, 1610–49, Jesuit missionary and martyr. Born in France, he volunteered for missionary work among the Hurons in Canada, serving as assistant to Jean de Brébeuf. Both priests were tortured and killed by the Iroquois. They were canonized as two of the Martyrs of North America in 1930. Feast day: October 19.

Lallemant, Louis, 1587–1635, French Jesuit spiritual authority. Although he himself did not write, his students' notes were preserved and published sixty years after his death and had a great influence on the spiritual formation of Jesuits. He emphasized docility to the Holy Spirit as well as the close union between prayer and action. Isaac Jogues (d. 1646), one of the North American Martyrs, was one of his disciples.

Lalor, Teresa, 1769–1846, founder of the American branch of the Visitation order. Born in Ireland, she emigrated to Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, in 1794. In 1797 she cofounded, with Father Leonard Neale, a religious community. After Neale became president of Georgetown in 1798, Lalor established an academy near the college. In 1816 Pius VII formally recognized Lalor's community. See also Visitation order.

lamb, paschal. See paschal lamb.

Lambeth, London palace of archbishops of Canterbury since the thirteenth century. Across the Thames from Parliament, Lambeth has been the site of many meetings of English bishops. Since 1867, it has given its name to the decennial worldwide synod of Anglican bishops—though the "Lambeth Conference" now meets in Canterbury. See also Canterbury.

Lamb of God, a symbolic designation for Jesus. The use of the epithet probably arose from its application to Jesus of Isa 53:7, cited in Acts 8:32 and alluded to in 1 Pet 1:19. The testimony of John the Baptist, according to John 1:29, 36, highlights the phrase. A similar image, using a different Greek term, appears in Revelation (e.g., Rev 5:6–13; 7:9–17). All these uses portray Jesus as a sacrificial victim, whose death effects expiation for sin. This phrase (Lat., Agnus Dei) is used during the Mass just before the Communion, with precisely these connotations.

Lamennais, Félicité Robert de (lah-men-nay'), 1782–1854, French priest, advocate of Catholic liberalism, traditionalism, and Ultramontanism. Anticipating Modernism, he insisted that reliance on individual reason leads to skepticism and that the common consent of all humanity, which he believed was informed by primordial revelation, was the norm of truth. Convinced that union with civil power hinders religion, he opposed Gallicanism, advocated Ultramontanism, religious liberty, and separation of Church and state. This engendered antipathy among Gallican bishops who sought his condemnation. His political liberalism and theory of common consent were condemned in 1834 by Pope Gregory XVI. The excesses of his opponents embittered him, and he left the Church. See also Gallicanism; Ultramontanism.

Lamentabili, a decree issued by the Holy Office under the authority of Pope Pius X on July 3, 1907, condemning sixty-five propositions associated with "Modernism" concerning the nature of the Church, revelation, biblical exegesis, the sacraments, and the divinity of Jesus Christ. Its full Latin title is Lamentabili sane exitu ("A lamentable departure indeed"). Although not mentioned by name, the propositions reflected the views of several Catholic theologians, particularly Alfred Loisy (d. 1940), George Tyrrell (d. 1909), Éduoard Le Roy (d. 1954), and Albert Houtin (d. 1926). Lamentabili was preceded by the apostolic letter Testem Benevolentiae, which condemned Americanism on January 22, 1899, and was followed by the encyclical Pascendi Dominici Gregis on September 8, 1907, which characterized "Modernism" as the "synthesis of all the heresies." In 1910 a widespread effort to root out "Modernism" was initiated with the Pontifical letter, known as a motu proprio, entitled Sacrorum Antistitum, which contained the oath against Modernism. See also Modernism; oath against Modernism; Pius X, St.

Lamy, Jean Baptiste, 1814–88, bishop (1853–75) and archbishop (1875–85) of Santa Fe, New Mexico. The French-born Lamy was the founding missionary of the Catholic Church throughout the southwestern United States and was later memorialized in Willa Cather's novel Death Comes for the Archbishop (1927).

Lanfranc of Bec, ca. 1010–89, monk and archbishop of Canterbury. Italian by birth, Lanfranc was a recognized expert in law and theology and prior of the monastery of Bec in Normandy, when William the Conqueror appointed him archbishop of Canterbury (1070). Lanfranc supported the doctrine of Christ's eucharistic Presence against the attacks of Berengar of Tours. See also Bec, Abbey of; transubstantiation.

Langton, Stephen, d. 1228, theologian and archbishop of Canterbury. He studied at Paris, where he lectured on Scripture and the Sentences of Peter Lombard. He supported papal authority and ecclesiastical privilege in England, promulgating the reforms of Lateran Council IV (1215). See also Canterbury; Lateran councils.

language, liturgical. See liturgical language.

language, religious, language designed to describe God. God's transcendent nature makes speaking about God in human language exceedingly difficult. Religious language attempts to meet this challenge.

One form of religious language is mythological, portraying God as a particular character in a narrative. In the book of Exodus (6–14), for example, God is described as a powerful agent who inflicts disasters on the Egyptians, parts the waters of the Red Sea, and instructs Moses on what he should say and do.

Another form of religious language is metaphor, a nonliteral figure of speech that describes the unfamiliar in terms of the familiar. The Bible frequently uses metaphors to describe God. God is called "my rock" (Ps 28), a "light" (Ps 27), and a "shepherd" (Ps 23). In a literal sense God is not a rock, a light, or a shepherd. Rather, these words describe something unfamiliar, namely God, with characteristics that are familiar. Closely associated with metaphor is another figure of speech, the simile. The parables of the NT make use of similes to describe God. God's kingdom is like a mustard seed (Mark 4:31), like leaven (Matt 13:33), or like a treasure buried in a field (Matt 13:44).

Analogy, a third form of religious language closely analyzed by Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274), involves stretching the use of a word to describe a unique situation. To say that "God knows" describes the unique activity of God by comparing God's activity with a human activity. However, God's knowledge is both like and unlike human knowledge. Like human knowing, God truly understands. Unlike human knowing, God does not depend upon experience and reason for knowledge. Thus, the verb "to know" is used analogously, not literally, to describe God's activity. See also analogy; myth; theology.

ANTHONY W. KEATY

Laodicea, Canons of, rules derived from a fourth-century local council in the Roman province of Asia that are part of the basis for canon law. The council is of uncertain date (most likely the later part of the fourth century), but its canons form part of the earliest collections of canon law.

Lapide, Cornelius à (lah'pi-day), also known as Cornelius Cornelissen van den Steen, 1567–1637, Flemish author of commentaries on all canonical books except Job and Psalms. After studies at Douay and Louvain, he entered the Jesuits, was ordained (1595), and taught Scripture at Louvain (1596–1616) and at the Roman College (1616–36). His commentaries were characterized by allegorical and mystical exegesis, with extensive quotations from the Church Fathers and medieval theologians.

lappets (lap'its; Mid Eng., "flap"), decorative folds or flaps on a garment or hat. In ecclesiastical vesture, lappets are the two linen strips that extend from the bottom of the rear panel of the bishop's mitre. Lappets are often decorated with Christian symbols and end in decorative tassels.

lapsi (Lat., pl. of lapsus, "fallen"), in a technical sense, those Christians who denied their faith during the Decian persecution (249–51) by offering sacrifice to pagan gods, burning incense during pagan rites, or by obtaining certificates that witnessed to their doing so. In general, it refers to persons who have fallen from the practice of their faith. See also Libellatici.

L'Arche (lahrsh; Fr., "ark"), communities of physically and mentally disabled persons and those who live, work, and pray with them. Founded in France in 1964 by Canadian philosopher Jean Vanier, the movement attempts to lead people to appreciate and be enriched by the human dignity and spiritual gifts of disabled persons. The name of the movement derived from the house used by members of the first community, called "Noah's Ark." Catholic in its origins, the movement is now ecumenical and interfaith in character and is without any canonical links with the Church.

La Salette, Our Lady of, a Marian title associated with a reported apparition in a small village in southeastern France. On September 19, 1846, two children, Melanie Mathieu-Calvat and Maximin Giraud, claimed they had a vision, while tending cattle, of the Blessed Virgin Mary. Mary, who was weeping, told the children to deliver a message: unless there was repentance from widespread religious apathy, Mary would allow the judgment of her Son against a sinful world to take place. The children were then given a secret and told to pray. In the valley where the apparition allegedly occurred, a spring began to flow and miraculous cures associated with its waters were reported.

In 1851, after a five-year investigation, the bishop of Grenoble proclaimed the legitimacy of the apparition and authorized the cult of Our Lady of La Salette. Although approved by the Church, the events surrounding La Salette are private revelations. Catholics are not required to give assent to the apparition itself or to the revelations allegedly disclosed at La Salette. See also apparitions of the Blessed Virgin Mary; La Salette Fathers.

La Salette Fathers, the Missionaries of Our Lady of La Salette (M.S.), founded in 1852 for the numerous pilgrims to the Shrine of Our Lady of La Salette in France. The institute was approved by Rome in 1890. Since their founding, the La Salette Fathers have established foundations in the United States and Canada, as well as in Belgium, Poland, and Brazil. The spirit of the congregation, which is one of prayer and sacrifice, is intimately connected with Our Lady's appearance on the Mountain of La Salette. La Salette Fathers are trained to lead people away from evil and toward repentance and divine mercy. See also La Salette, Our Lady of.

La Salle, St. Jean-Baptiste de, 1651–1719, founder of the Brothers of the Christian Schools, an order composed of laymen devoted to education, and patron saint of all teachers. Devoting himself at first to the education of the poor in charity schools, he later established normal schools to train teachers, boarding schools for the middle classes, and special schools for delinquents. La Salle insisted upon the combination of religious and secular instruction. His Duties of a Christian (1703) has gone through more than two hundred and fifty editions. La Salle was canonized in 1900. Feast day: May 15. See also Brothers of the Christian Schools.

Las Casas, Bartolomé de, 1474–1566, Spanish Dominican author and missionary. Traveling to the New World in 1502 and appalled by the treatment of the native population, he sought to reform the early Spanish colonial practice. In 1515 he was named Protector of the Indians by the king of Spain. Thwarted in his efforts, he went to Spain and joined the Dominican order (1523). He returned to the New World bringing the new laws of 1542–43 that were designed to alleviate the exploitation of the Indians. Meeting with meager success, he was back in Spain after 1547, where he wrote extensively. His most famous work was the Brevísima relación de la destrucción de las Indias (1552), which was a response to the justification of the conquest of the New World by the historian Sepulveda in De Justis Belli Causis. Las Casas argued for the humanity of the conquered peoples against those who viewed them as children or not fully human.

Last Adam, Paul's Christological model according to which Christ is seen as the last (heavenly) Adam (1 Cor 15:45), both undoing and salvifically redoing the sinful actions of the first (earthly) Adam (see Rom 5:12–21). See also Adam; Adam and Eve.

last days, the calamitous time heralding the imminent return of the victorious Christ, described in the NT with traditional apocalyptic imagery as a period of cataclysmic and destructive events of the human and natural orders: wars, famines, widespread immorality and lawlessness, earthquakes, plagues, the appearance of false prophets and messiahs, and the persecution of the faithful (e.g., Matt 24:3–28; 2 Tim 3:1–9). Through these tribulations the fidelity of the people of God will be tested and then reach its fulfillment in the realization of the kingdom of God. See also apocalypticism; kingdom of God [in the Bible].

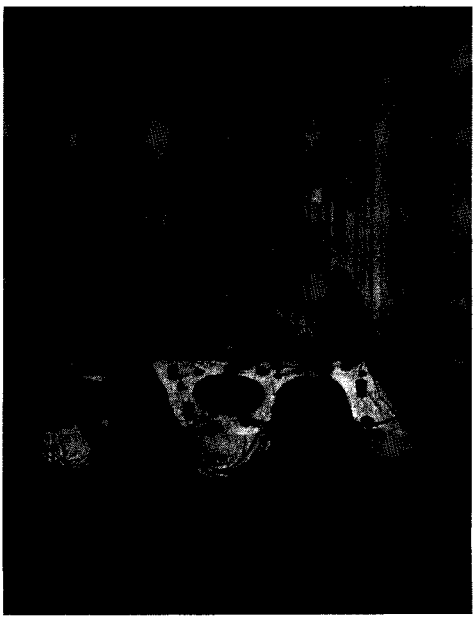
Last Gospel, John 1:1–14, read at the conclusion of the Tridentine Mass, the Latin Mass rite in use before the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). The Last Gospel was omitted during Lent, at vigils, on the Sundays of major feasts, and on Christmas at the Mass of the Day, where it had already been read as the Gospel. With the termination of the Tridentine Mass by the council, the Last Gospel disappeared from the liturgy of the Mass.

last judgment. See judgment, general; judgment, particular.

Last Rites, the sacramental rites and other prayers that may, in whole or part, be employed in pastoral care for the dying. In exceptional circumstances, such as emergency, Last Rites may be one continuous rite of Penance, Anointing, and Viaticum. In ordinary circumstances, Viaticum is the sacrament for those close to death. The commendation of the dying person to God through prayer has traditionally been an element of these rites. Prayers for the dead can be said by a minister attending to the family and friends of the person who has died. Sacraments are never administered to the dead. See also Anointing of the Sick.

Last Supper, a term describing the final meal Jesus celebrated with his disciples on the evening before his death (1 Cor 11:23–25; Mark 14:22–25; Matt 26:26–29; Luke 22:15–20; see John 13–17 and Didache, 9:1–5), which Paul calls "the Lord's supper" (1 Cor 11:20) or the partaking of the table of the Lord (1 Cor 10:21). The term "Last Supper," however, is never used in the NT. Though there is no verbatim unanimity in the accounts of the Last Supper, all contain words spoken over the bread and over the cup, with clear statements indicating that the bread is the body of Jesus (to which Luke and Paul add "for you") and that the wine is the blood of the covenant (Mark, Matthew) or the new covenant "in my blood" (Luke, Paul).

Jesus, the twelve apostles, and attendants at the Last Supper on the night before Jesus' crucifixion; fifteenth-century oil painting by the Dutch artist Dieric Bouts, in St. Peter's College, Louvain, Belgium.



Though the synoptic Gospels describe a Passover meal, Paul does not say this explicitly (but see 1 Cor 5:7), and in the Johannine chronology Jesus eats the meal before the feast of Passover (13:1–2) and dies on the "day of preparation" for the Passover (John 19:14). One proposal to resolve this discrepancy holds that John follows the older, lunar priestly calendar (found also at Qumran) while the synoptic Gospels follow the official calendar. Other proposals suggest that the meal was not really a formal Passover meal, but a celebratory meal in anticipation of the feast. Despite uncertainty about the precise event, the meal continues Jesus' practice of announcing God's reign by celebratory meals, especially with sinners. In all traditions the meal anticipates or prophetically enacts the death of Jesus for others and points to the future reign of God. See also Eucharist.

JOHN R. DONAHUE

last things, the "four last things": death, judgment, heaven, and hell. In Catholic theology, the doctrine of the "last things" brings theological reflection to bear on the ultimate finality of the human person. This kind of reflection defines the theological category of eschatology. Christian eschatology asserts and defends the notion of personal survival after death. Hence, the theological consideration of the "last things" addresses the questions of death, the judgment of the person at the moment of death (particular judgment), the collective judgment of the human community at the Second Coming (general judgment), the Resurrection of the body, and the Second Coming of Christ (Gk., Parousia).

Traditional Catholic teachings concerning the last things were not fully elaborated until the work of the medieval theologian Hugh of St. Victor (d. 1141) and Pope Benedict XII's decree Benedictus Deus (1336), which affirmed that the particular judgment and its consequences follow immediately the moment of death. The Council of Florence (1439) and the Council of Trent (1563) approved these doctrines as official teachings of the Church.

In 1979 the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith and in 1992 the Catechism of the Catholic Church reaffirmed traditional Catholic teachings concerning the resurrection of the body and the immediate judgment of the human person following death. Modern Catholic theology stresses the continuity between the end of human life and human action in the present. A key element in the reorientation of traditional eschatology was German theologian Karl Rahner's (d. 1984) highlighting of the relationship between a person's fundamental option during life and the character of his or her death as a climactic realization of the profoundly personal and inalienable responsibility for the self. See also eschatology individual; eschatology universal; heaven; hell; judgment, general; judgment, particular.

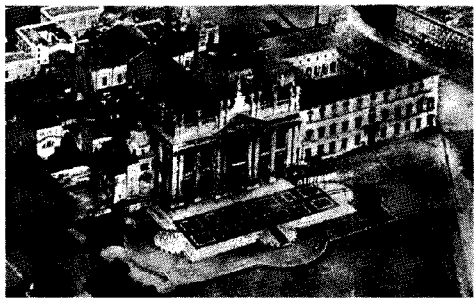
latae sententiae (lat'tay sen-ten'tsee-ay; Lat., "concealed sentence"), an automatic penalty attached to a given ecclesiastical crime. In the recent revision of the code of canon law (1983) the number of such penalties has been greatly reduced, because of concern that each individual case, with its own particular circumstances, be examined before any kind of censure be imposed. Certain actions, however, are considered so reprehensible that it is deemed appropriate that particular penalties be attached to their commission (e.g., apostasy, heresy, schism, profanation of the Eucharist). In addition, although these penalties are said to be automatic, certain conditions, mostly relating to the culpability of the delinquent, must also be verified before their application. See also ferendae sententiae; penal law.

Lateran Basilica, part of the Lateran complex on Mount Celio in Rome, the episcopal seat of the pope as Bishop of Rome, and the highest-ranking Catholic church. The basilica, originally known as the Church of the Savior, was first built in the early fourth century on a site formerly occupied by the palace of the Laterani, a noble Roman family. The property was donated to the Church by Constantine.

The Lateran Basilica, formerly Constantine's imperial palace and now one of the four major basilicas of Rome and the pope's cathedral as Bishop of Rome; its full title is the Patriarchal Basilica of the Most Holy Savior and St. John the Baptist at the Lateran.



The basilica and papal dwelling served as the official residence (Lat., patriarchum) of the popes from the fourth century until the removal to Avignon in 1309. During that time, the basilica suffered from earthquakes (443, 896) and barbarian attacks (455, 700s). It was rebuilt regularly and rededicated to St. John the Baptist in 905. Fires destroyed the building in 1308 and 1360, after which the basilica remained largely in a state of disrepair until the late 1500s, when Pope Clement VIII commissioned a baroque renovation. The façade dates to 1735. See also basilica; Rome.

Lateran councils, five ecumenical councils held at the Lateran Palace in Rome between 1123 and 1517. Lateran I (1123), the ninth ecumenical council, was convened by Pope Callistus II to ratify the settlement on lay investiture achieved in the Concordat of Worms (1122). Over three hundred bishops and six hundred religious heads issued twenty-two disciplinary canons representing major aspects of the Gregorian reform, including prohibitions against simony and clerical marriage.

Lateran II, the tenth ecumenical council, was convoked in 1139 by Innocent II to heal the Church of the schism of 1138. Championed by Bernard of Clairvaux, Innocent found wide support for his claim to the papacy and ratified it by convening the council. Lateran II reaffirmed the traditional reform agenda of the Gregorian period but added its own disciplinary canons reflecting the changing world of the twelfth century: condemned were usury, tournaments, and the monastic study of medicine and civil law. Heretical followers of Arnold of Brescia were likewise condemned.

Forty years later the papacy emerged from another schism and Lateran III, the eleventh ecumenical council, was convened by Alexander III to promote unity in the Church and deal with abuses. Among its reforms were the requirement of a two-thirds majority among the cardinals for papal elections and the establishment of grammar teachers in cathedral schools for the education of poor scholars.

Lateran IV (1215), convoked by Innocent III as the twelfth ecumenical council, was the greatest of the Lateran councils and the most important ecclesiastical assembly of the Middle Ages; it was often referred to by medieval writers as "The Great Council." The council achieved an impressive representation of Christendom with bishops and religious superiors from all parts of the Church, East and West; great nobles represented the sovereigns of Christian kingdoms. The council sat for only three sessions in two weeks during which seventy canons representing major concerns of doctrine and discipline were approved. A profession of faith headed the canons in order to clarify orthodox belief and condemn the opinions of Joachim of Fiore, the Cathars, and Waldensians. The council affirmed transubstantiation and made mandatory for all Christians annual confession and Communion. Bishops were to add theology masters to the grammarians in their cathedrals stipulated by Lateran III for the enhancement of clerical education. They were also obliged to hold annual provincial councils in order to implement the council's decrees. The council also dealt with the place of nonbelievers in Christian society and ordered identifiable clothing for Muslims and Jews.

Lateran V (1512–17) was convoked by Julius II but was attended mainly by Italian bishops to deal with an antipapal council recently held in Pisa. Julius died shortly after the council was opened and the assembly was continued under his successor, Leo X. The council was in many ways a missed opportunity for the major reforms needed in the Church; the fathers contented themselves mainly with minor but useful changes in ecclesiastical administration. Ominously, the assembly closed only a few months before Martin Luther posted his theses at Wittenburg. See also ecumenical council; Gregorian reform; Innocent III; investiture controversy; Reformation, the. WILLIAM J. DOHAR

Lateran Treaty, agreement signed on February 11, 1929, between the Holy See and the Italian government settling the "Roman Question," which had resulted from the fall of the city of Rome as the last territory of the Papal States. The Holy See was financially compensated for the loss of property, the Vatican City State was established as a political entity, or sovereign state, independent of Italy, and a concordat was agreed upon that guaranteed and regulated the role of the Church in the life of Italy, making it the official religion of the country. The concordat was renegotiated and formally ratified on June 3, 1985. Catholic instruction is no longer mandatory in government schools, and the clergy are no longer paid salaries by the government. See also Papal States; Vatican City State.

Latin America, Catholicism in. After Christopher Columbus reached the West Indies in 1492, the Catholic kings of Spain and Portugal asked the pope to grant them title to the lands of the New World. This request included a desire to extend the dominion of the Catholic faith. On May 4, 1493, Pope Alexander VI granted these petitions in his bull Inter Caetera and consequently missionary work became a priority for the kings. In the bull Universalis Ecclesiae (July 28, 1508) Pope Julius II gave universal patronage to the Spanish crown. In 1569 King Philip II established inquisitorial tribunals in Spanish America in order to assure purity of faith and doctrine. The Church became thereby one of the principal agents of civil power in the Americas.

Early Missionary Efforts: As soon as the news of Christopher Columbus's voyage to America had spread throughout Europe, the other European countries outside of Spain—Portugal, England, France, Italy, Belgium—responded to the fresh opportunities for missionary and economic expansion (the two interests unfortunately were not always to be separated). Religious orders like the Franciscans, Dominicans, and Jesuits committed themselves almost immediately to bring the gospel to these newly discovered shores. The Franciscans focused their efforts on Mexico, Ecuador, and Bolivia; the Dominicans, on Peru and Colombia; the Jesuits, on Paraguay and Brazil. In many instances, the missionaries functioned as rulers of the Indians, often without regard for royal officials or bishops.

But this initial phase of missionary work came to an end in 1530 when King Charles I of Spain forbade foreign priests from going to his American territories without special royal permission. That prohibition marked the beginning of the Hispanicization of Latin America and of the Latin American Catholic Church for centuries to come. The new dioceses were erected in accordance with the ritual and customs of the cathedrals of either Toledo or Seville and their liturgical and sacramental practices were patterned after those of Seville.

A period of stagnation and conflict within and between the religious orders, between the orders and the bishops, and between the bishops and the royal officers followed the initial period of missionary enthusiasm and achievement. After 1640 the missionary efforts of both Jesuits and Franciscans lagged, either for lack of missionaries or for lack of training centers. In 1673, however, the Jesuits were granted royal permission to enlist missionaries from Germany, with Hispanicized names.

In 1752 and 1754 a new set of royal decrees removed the religious from most of their Indian parishes and in 1767 the Jesuits themselves were suppressed. As time passed, people began wondering why the religious were there at all, so little did they have to do any longer. That situation changed, however, with the struggle for independence and the emergence of new states.

With the independence of Spanish America beginning in 1808, the politico-ecclesiastical balance was changed. Although religion was not the cause of the revolutions, shortcomings in the Church, such as its vast wealth, contributed to them. The great leader for Latin American independence, Simón Bolívar, was in favor of separating Church and state; however, the basis of the early opposition to the Catholic Church was largely political and not religious. By the mid-nineteenth century the position of the Catholic Church in Latin America had become very unstable. Since 1950 there has been a strong tendency toward a "free Church–free state" relationship. As the Second Vatican Council began in 1962 the Catholic Church was in a weakened position in Latin America. However, after the council the Church began to renew itself. Whereas the majority still identify themselves as Catholics, in recent years other religious denominations, especially the Pentecostal and evangelical churches, have grown substantially through proselytism.

Inculturation: Although the Catholic faith was introduced in Latin America near the end of the fifteenth century, it did not take root in the native cultures until near the end of the twentieth century.

A Palm Sunday procession of Otavalo Indians portraying Christ riding the donkey into Jerusalem; in Cotacachi, Ecuador, a South American country with some 10 million Catholics.

However, almost from the beginning there has been a type of popular religiosity that has reflected indigenous culture in varying ways. A much closer look at the relations between such popular religiosity and official teaching and pastoral practice was pursued in greater depth after the Second Vatican Council.

With some exceptions, the pastoral practices during these hundreds of years have largely reflected those of the European missioners. The Latin American countries were looked upon as colonies. Among the striking exceptions to this attitude was that of Fray Antonio de Montesinos, who was sent by the Spanish crown to the Americas in 1510. He accused his Spanish congregation of mortal sin because of their mistreatment of the Indians. Another missioner, Fray Bartolomé de las Casas (1474–1566), after initially agreeing with the Spanish plan of conquest and forcible conversion, radically changed his thinking in view of his own pastoral experience. He eventually was named "Protector of the Indians" and said that wars of conquest against Indians were "unjust, perverse and tyrannical." The sixteenth century had many such clergymen who committed themselves to the cause of the Indians. A number of these were Dominican and Franciscan missionaries. However, toward the end of the sixteenth century the clergy, both religious and diocesan, became lax in their defense of the natives. Many Jesuits remained faithful to the cause of the indigenous, but in 1767 they were expelled from Latin America. Thus, until the mid-twentieth century the Church in many ways collaborated with the elite power structure. It accepted the principle of Church-state cooperation and social inequality, which included a type of fatalism preached to the poor.

It was with the close of World War II that significant changes were initiated in the Latin American Church. The so-called cold war, which pitted Marxist-Leninism against Christianity, forced Church leaders to reevaluate both their ideas and pastoral practices. Papal teachings on social justice, lay movements such as Catholic Action, and the Cursillos de Cristiandad assumed great importance. The Latin American Church was being prepared for important changes.

CELAM: Although the Latin American bishops met in Rome in 1899, it was not until 1955 when they came together in Rio de Janeiro to form CELAM (the Conference of Latin American Bishops) that they established a permanent transnational structure. From this point on they were to have regular meetings every ten years. However, it was not until the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) that CELAM assumed real strength. A key motivator was Bishop Manuel Larrain of Chile. He did everything possible to bring the Latin American Church together and to integrate the pastoral theology of Vatican II with the cultures of the continent. In 1963 he was elected president of CELAM. Pope Paul VI supported these efforts and this support continued under Pope John Paul II. The Vatican representative who consistently collaborated in this process was Cardinal Antonio Samore (d. 1983).

Vatican II brought the first clear effort by the Church to become a "World Church," i.e., one that seriously integrates its values within the various cultures. CELAM followed the methodology in the council's Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World by studying the facts, reflecting upon them, and then making recommendations. This was a bottom-up rather than a top-down approach. Unfortunately, Bishop Larrain died in an auto accident in 1966. Nonetheless, CELAM's momentum could not be stopped as it prepared for an extraordinary session at Medellín, Colombia, in 1968.

During these same years other developments affected the emerging identity of Latin American Catholicism. One was the influx of missionaries, both clerical and lay, from other countries. A specific example was the papal request in 1961 that religious orders of the United States send 10 percent of their members to Latin America. These were joined by many from other countries.

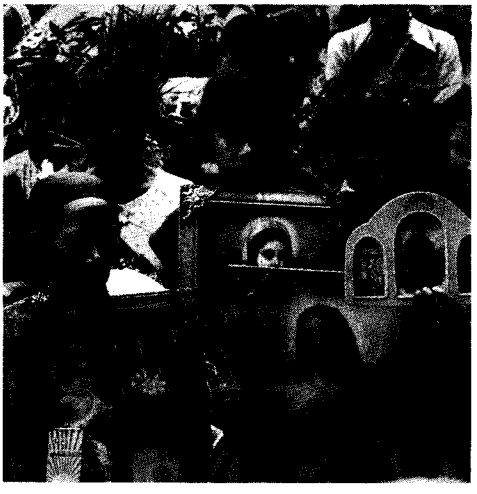
Within CELAM itself there were established departments, publications, and training centers. A parallel organization of religious, CLAR (Latin American Conference of Religious), was also initiated. Research centers and intellectual networking became common.

Medellín: In 1966 the officials of CELAM decided that at the 1968 extraordinary conference at Medellín there would be pastoral representatives from apostolic sectors rather than merely canonical representatives from ecclesiastical regions. This meant that the Church would be judged primarily in terms of its pastoral experience. This would have a great impact on the methodology and outcome of the Medellín conference. Part of this methodology included an ever-increasing social analysis throughout the continent. This led to a much sharper awareness of the "realities" of Latin America. The bishops realized that there was widespread "institutionalized injustice." The Church itself was part of this and was now being called to make the option for the poor. Evangelization and lay participation were to be emphasized, especially through grass-roots communities. Finally, the statements on justice, peace, and poverty were the strongest ones of the sixteen sections of the Conclusions. Gradually the Church was becoming "Latin American."

Puebla: Eleven years later, in 1979 in Puebla, Mexico, it was judged important to review the process of pastoral integration since Medellín. Some leaders were concerned that the basic commitments of Medellín were in danger of being weakened. Others felt that there were misunderstandings of the Medellín agreements. In the end, however, the delegation reconfirmed Medellín and moved it modestly forward. Pope John Paul II, who was present in the first days of Puebla, expressed ecclesiological and pastoral concerns, particularly as they related to the role of the magisterium. However, the theme at Puebla, "Evangelization Today and Tomorrow in Latin America," had its roots not only in the Second Vatican Council but also in the document Evangelii Nuntiandi of Paul VI (1975). Consequently Pope John Paul II drew heavily upon this document, and the conference proved to be a unifying force. It accepted the assumptions of Medellín and reiterated the preferential option for the poor. It challenged both official leadership and the grass roots to collaborate in facing the monumental tasks of Latin America. This was a positive step ahead.

From the time of Medellín an inductive pastoral analysis assumed greater prominence. In pastoral circles this was known as liberation theology. There were to be many discussions and reviews of this kind of theologizing, which culminated in two instructions from the Vatican, in 1984 and 1986.

A religious festival in Brazil, the Latin American country with the largest Catholic population in the world (over 135 million); the people are carrying pictures of Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and the pope.



Finally, in 1986 John Paul II wrote to the Brazilian bishops saying that liberation theology is "not only opportune, but also it is useful and necessary." Still, some tension would continue between the deductive and inductive approaches to theology.

Santo Domingo and Beyond: The year 1992 marked the Quincentenary of the introduction of the Catholic faith into Latin America. It was also the occasion for CELAM IV—the assembly of the Latin American bishops during October, in Santo Domingo, Dominican Republic. The theme of the assembly was "A New Evangelization for a New Culture." As the conference began there were differences between those who were committed to the present authority structures as a significant factor in improving the social order and those who strongly supported more grass-roots input in seeking an alternative plan of society. How these differences are negotiated over the long term will determine the ultimate effect of a "new" evangelization and inculturation. In the latter part of the twentieth century the Catholic Church in Latin America moved strongly in the direction of a deeper inculturation. This will have a significant influence on the future of the Church on that continent.

The latter part of the twentieth century has proved to be a time of great suffering for the Latin America Church. As pastoral leaders, both clerical and lay, became conscious of great injustice in their societies, they spoke out. In doing this many of these leaders were aware that they were risking their lives. The best known of these pastors was Archbishop Oscar Romero of El Salvador, who was assassinated as he celebrated Mass on March 24, 1980. Other examples include the six Jesuit priests and two laywomen killed in El Salvador in 1989 and the four U.S. women (three religious, one a laywoman) murdered in that same country in December 1980. However, there were many other deaths of deeply Christian campesinos (people of the land) who served as catechists and proclaimers of the word. There is some dispute as to the political influence in such religious sacrifices. However, many believe that this suffering has purified the Latin American Church and brought it to a new level of maturity. See also base communities; Guadalupe, Our Lady of; liberation theology; Spain, Catholicism in.

Bibliography

Eagleson, John, and Philip Scharper, eds. Puebla and Beyond: Documentation and Commentary. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1979.

Keough, Dermot. Church and Politics in Latin America. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1990.

Richard, Pablo. Death of Christendoms, Birth of the Church: Historical Analysis and Theological Interpretation of the Church in Latin America. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1987.

ROBERT S. PELTON

latinization, the imposition or imitation of Latin-rite liturgical customs and principles and the resulting erosion or dilution of the Eastern Catholic liturgical traditions. Liturgical rites have always influenced one another. "Latinization" has been considered a contaminating influence because it has been seen as forced or unnatural, and therefore destructive of the liturgical ethos and spirit of the Eastern rite in question—e.g., the introduction of exposition of the Blessed Sacrament in a rite that traditionally elicits devotion by concealment of the mysteries. The issue is not which spirit is better, but which is native to a people that deserves to be left in peace with its own heritage. During the Crusades (1095–1291) and the Portuguese colonization of India (after 1498, when Vasco da Gama arrived), this latinization was imposed on Eastern Catholics who were in communion with Rome. In the twentieth century, it was more often the result of Eastern Catholics uncritically imitating Latin ways out of a sense of inferiority or inadequate knowledge and appreciation of their own heritage. This practice was induced by the expressed Catholic policy of the praestantia ritus Latini (Lat., "superiority of the Latin rite").

The term "latinization" is also used to describe the way in which Latin missionaries and schools in the East have served, deliberately or unwittingly, to move Eastern Christians, Catholic or Orthodox, away from their native churches to the Latin rite. These practices did not begin to change until condemned by the 1743 constitution Demandatam of Pope Benedict XIV. Orientalium Dignitas of Pope Leo XIII in 1894 set strict guidelines to control the activities of Latin clergy in the East, and both these forms of latinization have been forbidden by the explicit and often repeated—though widely ignored—policy of the Holy See. See also Crusades; Latin rite; Roman Catholic; Roman rite.

ROBERT F. TAFT

Latin Mass. See Tridentine Mass.

Latin Patriarchate of Jerusalem, a Roman Catholic ecclesiastical circumscription (limited area) with jurisdiction over Latin Catholics, their institutions, and the Catholic-controlled Holy Places, in Israel, Jordan, Cyprus, and the Gaza strip. It was established during the Crusader occupation of the Holy Land (1099–1187). When the Holy City fell to Saladin in 1187, the patriarchs resided in what was left of the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem until 1291. Thereafter the patriarchate survived as the purely honorific title of absentee patriarchs resident in Rome. The patriarchate was reestablished at Jerusalem in 1847, and the present patriarch Michel Sabbah (since 1987), a native Palestinian, is the first non-Italian incumbent. The Orthodox and Catholic Melkites (Byzantine-rite Catholics) have traditionally viewed the patriarchate as a Western intrusion responsible for weaning away their faithful.

Latin patriarchates, Western Catholic ecclesiastical jurisdictions, under the pastoral authority of a patriarch. In the West, between the ninth century and modern times the purely honorific title "patriarchate" was assigned to Latin sees like Aquileia (later transferred to Venice) and Lisbon. The title was also held by Latin bishops imposed on Eastern patriarchal sees during the Crusader occupation (1099–1187). After the Latin occupation these titles were maintained for a time as Catholic titular sees but were later suppressed. Missionary jurisdictions like the patriarchates of the West Indies (1524) and East Indies (1886) were also established. Although the Latin Patriarchate of Jerusalem was reestablished in 1847, the only real Western patriarch is the pope. See also patriarch [ecclesiastical]; patriarchate.

Latin rite, popular though inaccurate name for the religious usages (liturgical, canonical, monastic) of the Church in the Roman Catholic West. Apart from North Africa, the West became "Latin" only when the gradual shift from Greek to Latin in the liturgy was completed in Rome in the fourth century.

The Latin Rites: The Latin Church leaders were more interested in submission than ritual uniformity, and were relatively more tolerant of ritual diversity, than were the Byzantines. Liturgically, the West maintained a pluralistic polity, and historically there were several non-Roman Latin rites: African, Ambrosian (Milanese), Aquileian, Celtic, Gallican, Iberian (Mozarabic of Toledo and Braga of Portugal), some of which are still in limited use in the 1990s. Originally, Roman liturgical usages prevailed only in the area around Rome and in "Suburbican Italy," i.e., southern Italy and the islands of Sicily, Sardinia, and Corsica. The rest of Italy had distinct local uses not only in metropolitan sees like Milan and Aquileia but in over forty other centers. Local usages in southern Gaul and the Iberian peninsula under the Visigoths evolved into the Gallican rites. North Africa was also Latin but not Roman in rite; Norway followed the rite of Nidaros; Ireland had its Celtic rituals.

Geographical Extension of Latin Rites: Latin usages extended throughout the West and into North Africa west of Egypt, as well as in Pannonia, Illyricum, and Thrace. In the latter three areas, ruled in the seventh and eighth centuries by vassals of Byzantium, the Latin bishoprics had all but disappeared except along the Dalmatian and Albanian coastline. There were also numerous Latin-rite colonies in the East, chiefly merchants from the Italian mercantile cities and mercenaries in the Byzantine imperial service, but the churches serving them were under the jurisdiction of the local Byzantine hierarchy until the Crusaders implanted Latin ecclesiastical jurisdictions in the East.

Later Predominance of the Roman Rite: Roman uses gradually came to predominate throughout Europe in the eighth and ninth centuries under the Carolingian and Ottonian emperors. In the seventh century, Roman missionaries under Augustine of Canterbury had implanted the Roman rite in the British Isles, where it evolved local uses such as those of Sarum, Hereford, York, Bangor. In the eighth century, Rome-oriented missionaries from Britain returned to the Continent to reform the Gallican Church and evangelize the Germans. They brought with them a Roman liturgy, fostering the further amalgamation of Roman usages with local Gallican and Visigothic customs to form the Franco-Germanic-Roman synthesis that was reintroduced to Rome in the late tenth century and is the immediate ancestor of the Roman rite. See also rite; Roman Catholic; Roman rite.

Bibliography

Klauser, T. A Short History of the Western Liturgy. London, New York, Toronto: Oxford University Press, 1969.

Vogel, C. Medieval Liturgy. Trans. and rev. by W. Storey and N. Rasmussen. Washington, DC: The Pastoral Press, 1986. ROBERT F. TAFT latria (la'tree-uh; Gk., latreia, "worship"), the worship or adoration owed to God alone. It is commonly contrasted with dulia (Gk.), which is the honor given to the saints, and hyperdulia (Gk.), which is the special honor given to the Blessed Virgin Mary because of her unique role as the Mother of God. See also dulia; hyperdulia.

Latrocinium (lah-troh-chee'nee-uhm). See Ephesus, Robber Council of.

Latter-day Saints. See Mormons.

Latvia, Catholicism in. See Baltic countries, Catholicism in the.

Lauds (Lat., "praise"), Morning Prayer, the official morning office of the Liturgy of the Hours, signaling the beginning of the day. Lauds and Vespers are the chief, or hinge, hours of each day. The office, prayed as the new day dawns, recalls the Resurrection of Jesus, the True Light enlightening all (see John 1:9), the Sun of Justice (Mal 4:2), arising on high (Luke 1:78). Chief elements of Lauds are a hymn, two psalms and an OT canticle, a short reading and responsory, the Canticle of Zechariah, intercessions, and the Lord's Prayer. See also Liturgy of the Hours; Morning Prayer.

lavabo (lah-vah'boh; Lat., "I will wash"), an ablution, or ritual washing. During the preparation rite, after the bread and wine have been placed on the altar, the presider washes his hands in a small basin. He may pray silently while doing so: "Lord, wash away my iniquity, cleanse me from my sin."

lavra (lahv'rah; Gk., laura, "city lane," "monastery"), originally a community of semi-reclusive monks under the direction of one spiritual father or superior. The monks lived as solitaries in scattered cells, usually in a wilderness or desert area, within walking distance of common monastic buildings. These included a church where the monks would gather for services on weekends and feasts. In later times the term "lavra" came to mean any large Greek Orthodox monastery, even one following a cenobitic (community) rule. See also monastery.

law. See canon law; natural law.

law, favor of. See favor of law.

law, penal. See penal law.

Lawrence, St., d. 258, deacon of Pope Sixtus II and martyr mentioned in the Canon (Eucharistic Prayer) of the Roman Mass. He was admired by Ambrose, Prudentius, Augustine, and others. They repeat the story that, when asked by the Roman prefect to surrender the Church's riches, Lawrence assembled the poor, to whom he had distributed the Church's possessions, and said that they (the poor) were the Church's real treasure. For this, according to tradition, he was roasted alive on a gridiron. Most scholars believe he was beheaded. In Rome the basilica of St. Lawrence-Outside-the-Walls is dedicated to him. Feast day: August 10.

Lawrence, third-century deacon known for his kindness to the poor and the most famous of Rome's postapostolic martyrs, enthroned with saints and donors; fifteenth-century Florentine painting on wood by Fra Filippo Lippi, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York.

Lawrence of Brindisi, St. (brin'duh-zee), 1559–1619, Capuchin Franciscan. Scholar, papal emissary, missionary preacher, religious reformer, and writer, he retired from active life in 1618 only to be sent by papal authority to Lisbon, where he died. He was named a Doctor of the Church in 1959. Feast day: July 21.

Lawrence of the Resurrection, 1614–91, religious name of Nicholas Herman, a Discalced Carmelite brother in Paris. Previously a soldier, he became a cook as a Carmelite. Abbé de Beaufort posthumously published a collection of Lawrence's sayings and letters which in English is known as The Practice of the Presence of God.

Lawrence O'Toole, St., 1128–80, archbishop of Dublin. After a monastic formation, he assumed the see of Dublin in 1162. Active in clerical reform and as an intermediary between the Irish and English, he was conspicuous not only for his reforming spirit, but also for his personal austerity and charity. Feast day: November 14.

Lawrence Ruiz, St. (roo-eez'), ca. 1600–1637, martyr. A married Filipino of Chinese extraction, he accompanied Dominican friars on a mission to laxism, a moral system that permits an individual experiencing moral doubt to take the options representing more liberty, provided some degree of probability about its moral rectitude exists. It is considered a perversion of the contemporary moral system of probabilism, which held that one can safely follow a moral opinion only if it is proposed by someone having sufficient theological authority and standing. Laxism and several conclusions following from it were condemned by Pope Alexander VII in 1665 and 1666 and Pope Innocent XI in 1679. It was also strongly opposed by Jansenism, a seventeenth-century French movement that favored a strict and rigorous approach to the moral law. See also Jansenism; probabilism.

Japan. He was martyred in Nagasaki with his companions. Feast day: September 28.

lay (Gk., laos, "people"), adjective denoting the nonclerical or nonordained members of the Church. Canon law recognizes that the lay members of Christ's faithful have certain rights and obligations (cans. 208–31). See also laity.

lay apostolate, the ministry provided by those members of the Church who are not ordained. In virtue of their baptism, lay Christians share the vocation of the original apostles of Jesus, that is, to witness to Jesus Christ and to promote the salvation of all people. They accomplish this apostolate primarily by living according to Christian principles and also by speaking for those principles. The lay apostolate can be exercised within the family, within Church communities, and in the context of professional and social relationships. Its goal is the sanctification of individuals and the renewal of the temporal order. According to Vatican II (1962–65), "The lay apostolate . . . is a participation in the saving mission of the Church itself" (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 33), and not simply a participation in the work of the hierarchy, known as Catholic Action. See also apostolate; laity.

lay brother, a member of a male religious community who is fully incorporated in the religious institute and is not ordained. This phrase has two connotations. In many instances, the adjective "lay" intensifies "brother," emphasizing only that a brother is a nonclerical religious. In traditional usage, lay brothers were members with less education who were destined to the service of manual labor. The lay brotherhood originated in monastic orders; the brothers were to relieve the clerical monks of any tasks that would hinder their study and ministry. This monastic model was adopted in various ways by other religious communities. See also brothers, religious.

lay ministries, official and unofficial roles of service or leadership carried out by nonordained persons in the Church. Although laypeople have been closely linked to the Church's mission and service from earliest times (see, e.g., Rom 16:1–16), their properly ministerial role was recognized anew by Vatican Council II, especially in its Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (1963, n. 14), its Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (1964, nn. 30–38), and its Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity (1965, esp. nn. 2–3). As the council repeatedly emphasized, lay participation in roles of leadership and service is rooted in Baptism, a sacrament that gives all believers a share in the priestly, prophetic, and royal ministry of Christ. Lay ministries are often, though not exclusively, liturgical in nature. (Nonliturgical roles of service and leadership are performed, for instance, by lay teachers and catechists, by hospital administrators or members of a pastoral-care team, by campus ministers, by directors of diocesan offices, by pastoral associates, etc.). Since Vatican Council II, laypersons have become increasingly visible in liturgical roles such as reader, acolyte (altar-server), cantor, and extraordinary minister of Communion. In some places, laypeople are also entrusted with the ministry of preaching. The basis for this is found in the 1983 Code of Canon Law (can. 766), which says that laypeople may be allowed to preach in church if it is necessary or (in particular cases) advantageous. Decisions about preaching by laypersons are in the hands of the various national episcopal conferences. See also laity; ministry.

Laynez, James, 1512–65, Spanish Jesuit theologian, one of the original seven members of what became the Society of Jesus, and general of the order in 1558. He was active at the Council of Trent (1545–63) and his contribution was decisive in establishing the council's position on the key doctrine of justification against Protestantism. See also Jesuits.

lay spirituality, the practice of life in the Spirit by the Christian people (Gk., laos). In early Christianity, laos included all the baptized, with their different gifts for building up the community. Soon, the adjective laikos designated the people in contrast to their leaders. By the Middle Ages, those desirous of a radical Christian life had recourse to rich institutional models of holiness developed by clerical-monastic or mystical elites. Ordinary Christians tended to eucharistic devotion, veneration of relics and sacred places, and participation in popular feasts that often mixed religious fervor and superstitious ancestral customs. After the Reformation, doctrine, sacrament, and tradition set the norms for Catholic personal piety. In modern times, the Church used Marian devotions, pilgrimages, and Catholic Action to foster corporate lay presence as it defended Western ecclesial interests amid secularization and industrialization. Twentieth-century biblical, liturgical, and patristic revivals, supported by Vatican II (1962–65), have encouraged Catholic laity to develop their own diverse mystical, prophetic, and creation-centered spiritualities.

Whether traced through influential figures, religious movements, or the daily reality of ordinary believers, Christian life involves a dialectical relation of opposition and participation in the world and in history. Any study of contemporary lay spiritualities in Catholicism involves this tension as well as the role of the universal Church with its various cultural manifestations, including the evolution of base communities, new religious groups, prophetic forms of political witness, ethical questions of sexuality, power, and justice, the women's movement, and openness to ecumenism and interreligious dialogue. See also laity; spirituality, Christian.

PHYLLIS H. KAMINSKY

lay trusteeism. See trusteeism, lay.

Lazarists, also called Vincentians, Congregation of the Mission (C.M.), an order founded by St. Vincent de Paul (1625) of diocesan priests devoted to preaching missions to the poor, foreign missions, training clergy, and Catholic education. They have been joined with the Daughters of Charity under one superior general since St. Vincent founded both orders. See also Vincentians.

Lazarus, a friend of Jesus' from Bethany. According to John 11:1–44, Lazarus, the brother of Martha and Mary, died in Jesus' absence. Jesus came to Bethany and after discussion with Lazarus's sisters raised him from the dead. Lazarus is also the name of the poor beggar in a parable recounted in Luke 16:19–31.

Lazarus Saturday, the Saturday before Palm Sunday, commemorating Jesus' raising Lazarus from the dead (John 11:11–44). Noted in the Jerusalem calendar in the fourth century, it is still celebrated in several Eastern-rite Lenten calendars in the 1990s, where it comprises the final day of Lent before Holy Week begins. See also Lazarus.

Leadership Conference of Women Religious, one of two official organizations of the major superiors of women in the United States. The conference was founded in 1956, and its statues were approved by Rome in 1959. The purpose of the conference is primarily to promote the spiritual and apostolic life of the religious communities, and also to promote collaboration among the communities and with the hierarchy, and to serve as a national voice for the major superiors. In 1994 there were approximately 800 members. The other conference is called the Council of Major Superiors of Women Religious, established in 1992. See also Conference of Major Superiors of Men; Council of Major Superiors of Women Religious.

leave of absence [from religious life], unofficial term used to indicate a period of vocational discernment spent away from one's religious community. A religious on such a leave might request and receive an indult of exclaustration, which would alter his or her official status. The term also applies to diocesan priests who leave the active ministry for a time.

Le Brun, Pierre, 1661–1729, French liturgist and Oratorian priest. He taught at Saint-Magloire Seminary in Paris. His commentaries on the Mass aroused controversy. In them he defended the proposition that an epiclesis, the prayer that calls down the Holy Spirit, is necessary for the eucharistic consecration. See also epiclesis.

lectern, or ambo, the place from which the word of God is proclaimed. A focal point for the assembly during the Liturgy of the Word, the lectern is a stationary reading stand reserved for the scriptural readings, responsorial psalm, and the Easter Proclamation (Exsultet); it may be used for the homily and general intercessions.

lectio continua (lek'zee-oh cohn-tin'oo-uh; Lat., "continuous reading"), a reference to the liturgical practice of sequential reading of the books of Scripture. Collections of patristic homilies following the order of the biblical books constitute the principal evidence for early Church practice. The liturgical reforms that followed Vatican II (1962–65) restored lectio continua in both the Sunday and weekday lectionaries. See also lectionary.

lectio divina, (Lat., "divine reading"), a meditative reading of Sacred Scripture leading to prayer. Such reading enjoyed an important place in Christian and monastic practice well into the Middle Ages. Monastic codes, such as the Rule of St. Benedict, assign to lectio daily periods as long as two to three hours. In time this meditative reading came to include, in addition to the Bible, biblical commentaries, patristic writings, and treatises dealing with the spiritual life, often of a moralizing nature. In current usage the term is often applied loosely to any meditative reading done with a view to the enrichment of one's spiritual life. See also meditation.

lectionary, the book containing the scriptural lessons appointed for public reading at Mass according to the liturgical calendar.

The concept of the lectionary dates to the synagogue, which had readings appointed for feasts and Sabbaths. The extent to which the Church borrowed from Jewish lectionaries is unclear; the Exodus reading for Passover is, however, used for Pascha (the Christian Passover). Early methods of identifying appointed lessons, or pericopes, included marginal notations of the beginning and ending in the Scriptures, a separate list of scriptural references (capitulary), a book of lessons, or written texts, included with Mass prayers (Lat., missale plenum, "full missal").

Before the Council of Nicaea (325) a lectionary existed only for feasts; Sunday readings followed lectio continua, i.e., continuous reading from a chosen book, read in portions until the book was finished. Several lessons from both testaments with interspersed psalms were used; gradually, three lessons became standard in the Mozarabic, Gallican, Milanese, and Armenian rites. At Constantinople (fifth century) and Rome (sixth century) the lessons were reduced to two.

The revised lectionary of 1969 provides for three lessons on Sundays and feasts. Three annual Sunday cycles apportion the synoptic Gospels semi-continuously; John's Gospel, generally reserved for feasts and seasons, also fills in when the Marcan readings end. The first lesson, usually from the Hebrew Scriptures, is paired with the Gospel and is followed by a responsorial psalm. The second, a lesson taken from one of the Pauline Letters, follows a semi-continuous pattern of readings without reference to the Sunday or feast. Feast day and seasonal readings are often discrete, rather than continuous, readings. The Roman lectionary has been widely adopted by other Christian traditions, with minor adjustments. See also liturgical year. JOHN A. MELLOH lector, or reader, one who proclaims at Mass the first or second reading from Scripture, other than the Gospel. In the absence of a deacon, the reader may carry the Gospel book in procession and lead the general intercessions. Previously, lector was a "minor order," preparatory to the ordained priesthood; today it is termed a "ministry," and may be committed to the laity. See also ministry; minor orders.

Leen, Edward, 1885–1944, Irish priest and spiritual author. A member of the Congregation of the Holy Ghost, his career included administrative service to Blackrock College and to his own community. He was best known for his many popular books on the spiritual life, including In the Likeness of Christ (1936).

Lefebvre, Marcel (mahr-sel' luh-fev'), 1905–91, French prelate and schismatic. Ordained a Holy Ghost priest (1929), he did missionary work in France and Africa. Named bishop in 1947, he served as vicar apostolic of Dakar (Senegal) and later as apostolic delegate of all of French-speaking Africa. He attended the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) but refused to sign some of the conciliar documents. Disenchanted with postconciliar directions, he opened a traditionalist seminary in Switzerland in 1970. His vehement rejection of the council led, finally, to his suspension a divinis (Lat., "from all priestly and episcopal powers") in 1976. After a period of reconciliation and negotiation with the Vatican, he again split with Rome over the questions of his right to ordain bishops and the autonomy of his movement within the Church. After his excommunication in 1988 for ordaining bishops without papal authority, his movement split into those who returned to Roman obedience (including the Society of St. Peter) and those who remain committed to his schismatic course. See also Fraternity of St. Peter, Priestly.

Lefèvre d'Étaples, Jacques (luhr-fev' day-tahl'). See Faber, Jacobus.

legalism, a moral attitude that identifies Christian morality with the observance of laws. Legalism has its origin in nominalism, a fourteenth-century philosophical theory that denied the existence of universal concepts, such as human nature. If morality is not rooted in universal human nature (as nominalists hold), then morality can only be based on divine commands as expressed in rules and laws. Legalism was dominant in Catholic moral theology and practice until the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), which emphasized Scripture, the mystery of Christ, and salvation history as a more appropriate basis for making moral decisions. See also laxism; moral theology.

legate, papal. See papal legate.

Léger, Paul-Emile (lay-zhay'), 1904–91, cardinal-archbishop of Montreal. He resigned from that post in 1967 to work for twelve years among lepers and impoverished and disabled children in Africa. Léger was ordained priest in 1929 and archbishop in 1950 and created a cardinal in 1953. Founder of the Fame Pereo Institute for Lepers and the Center for the Rehabilitation of the Handicapped in Cameroon, he was widely regarded as one of the most saintly members of the Church's hierarchy in his day.

Legion of Decency, an organization established in 1934 by the U.S. Catholic bishops to promote quality motion pictures. As a guide for parents who were selecting films for their children, the National Legion of Decency in 1936 established a classification system for motion pictures, based upon their moral suitability. Since 1968, the United States Catholic Conference Department of Communications' Office of Film and Broadcasting has provided ratings and reviews of motion picture, television, and video releases for Catholic newspapers and has published weekly guides. It also maintains Preview Line, a telephone information service. Ratings include: A-I (general patronage); A-II (adults and adolescents); A-III (adults); A-IV (adults, with reservations); and O (morally offensive). See also Catholicism and the visual arts.

Legion of Mary, lay Catholic association founded in Dublin, Ireland, in 1921 by Frank Duff (1889–1980) and others. Duff had been inspired by his long association with the St. Vincent de Paul Society, of which he had been an active member.

Organized along strict hierarchical lines, the Legion borrows the language of ancient Rome: an individual group is a presidium; a district is a curia; the next level is the comitatus, which is organized into a senatus, which answers to the general headquarters in Dublin known as the concilium. The Official Handbook of the Legion of Mary (many editions translated into various languages) is the guiding text of the group.

Found in most parts of the Catholic world, the Legion stresses a Marian spirituality inspired largely by the writings of Louis Grignion de Montfort (d. 1716). Weekly attendance at meetings and regular time spent in a variety of apostolic activities shape the spiritual discipline of the group. Active in religious work in all parts of the world, especially in Third World countries, the Legion's delegate to Africa in the 1950s, Edel Quinn, has had her cause for canonization introduced in Rome. See also Marian devotion; Montfort, St. Louis Grignion de.

Lellis, St. Camillus de. See Camillus of Lellis, St.

Lent (Mid. Eng., lenten, "springtime"), the forty days (not including Sundays) of fasting, prayer, and penitence before Easter. The origins—and duration—of Lent are related to the development of Easter. During the first three centuries most Christians prepared for Easter by fasting for only two or three days. In some places, this "paschal fast" was extended to the entire week before Easter (the period now known as "Holy Week"). In Rome this paschal fast originally may have lasted three weeks, but by the fourth century it had developed into a "Lent" of forty days.

This Roman Lent (in its earlier three-week form) was linked to the pastoral and liturgical preparation of catechumens for baptism at the Easter Vigil. Until recently this baptismal motif was thought to explain, fully, the origins of Lent—and also to show why the paschal fast was calculated "backward" from Easter Sunday (first, two days; then a week; then three weeks [at Rome]; then forty days, the length of Jesus' fast in the desert [Luke 4:1–13] and the length of the modern Lent). But recent research has shown that the development of Lent was also influenced by another forty-day fasting tradition, an ascetical one based on imitation of Jesus' life, which began immediately after the feast of Epiphany

(January 6, and on other dates where it is not observed as a holy day of obligation). This post-Epiphany fast (popular among monks) emphasized prayer and penance, themes that made sense especially after infant baptism began to prevail in the fifth and sixth centuries. Following Vatican II (1962–65), the renewal of the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults helped restore the ancient Lenten baptismal motif. See also Baptism; Easter; Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults. NATHAN D. MITCHELL

Leo I, "the Great," St., d. 461, pope from 440 to 461. Little is known of his life before his election, although he was a highly placed deacon during the tenure of his two immediate predecessors. A vigorous and articulate advocate of papal prerogative, he rejected the canon of the Council of Chalcedon (451) that declared Constantinople and Rome equal in dignity, and he advanced papal claims over all Western provinces. But it was not only his theory that fostered the prestige of the papacy, but his own pastoral courage and genius. He personally met the Vandals as they approached to take the city in 455, pleading on behalf of the populace. His homilies, on matters both doctrinal and disciplinary, were elegant and clear. He is perhaps best remembered, however, for his intervention in the Christological controversies of the East. Both parties, the Monophysites associated with Eutyches and the Dyophysites headed by Flavian, patriarch of Constantinople, actively sought his judgment. His Tome to Flavian, which condemned Eutyches and affirmed a doctrine of two natures, one person in Christ was accepted by Chalcedon as a standard of Christological orthodoxy. He was made a Doctor of the Church in 1754. Feast day: November 10 (formerly April 11, West); February 18 (East). See also Chalcedon, Council of; Christology; Constantinople; Dyophysites; Eutyches; Monophysitism; Tome of Leo.

Pope Leo the Great, fifth-century pope who substantially increased the ecclesiastical and political prestige of the papacy, rooting its supreme and universal authority in the unbroken succession of popes from the time of St. Peter.

Leo II, St., d. 683, pope from 682 to 683. He is remembered principally for his ratification of the acts of Constantinople III (680–81), which condemned Pope Honorius I (d. 638). Leo's statement, however, did not accuse Honorius of heresy, but only of permissiveness with regard to a heresy regarding the will of Christ (Monothelitism). Feast day: July 3. See also Honorious I; Monothelitism.

Leo III, St., d. 816, pope from 795 to 816. Forced from Rome by relatives of his predecessor Hadrian I, he returned with Charlemagne in 800 and crowned him emperor of the West on Christmas Day. He worked with Charlemagne against the Spanish Adoptionists but resisted the addition of the Filioque (Lat., "and from the Son") to the Nicene Creed. He was active in building and renovating churches in Rome. Feast day: June 12. See also Adoptionism; Charlemagne; Filioque; Holy Roman Empire.

Leo IV, St., d. 855, pope from 847 to 855. Leo IV did much to repair the city of Rome after the Muslim attacks of 846, including the erection of a forty-foot wall surrounding St. Peter's and much of Vatican Hill, creating the "Leonine City." The Asperges (sprinkling of holy water at Mass) and the Octave of the Assumption have been attributed to him. Feast day: July 17.

Leo IX, St. [Bruno of Egisheim], ca. 1002–54, reformer and pope from 1049 to 1054. Having studied at Toul where he was bishop in 1026, Bruno was a supporter of Cluny's monastic renewal; he subsequently devoted himself to the reform of the entire Church. His chief concerns were secular interference with Church appointments and clerical marriage. Called the "Apostolic Pilgrim," Leo implemented his reforms by traveling extensively and appointing some of the greatest reformers of his day, including the future Gregory VII, to positions of authority. His final years as pope were troubled by schism with the Eastern Church. Feast day: April 19. See also celibacy, clerical; Eastern Schism; investiture controversy.

Leo X [Giovanni de Medici], 1475–1521, son of Lorenzo the Magnificent and pope from 1513 to 1521. Leo's patronage of the arts, his entanglements in the wars between France and Spain, a planned crusade against the Turks, as well as extensive building (including St. Peter's) strained papal finances and led to the indulgences against which

Martin Luther complained. Leo's attempts to suppress Luther were futile, including the issuing of Exsurge Domine, as were his half-hearted efforts to reform the Church at Lateran V (1512–17), an ecumenical council originally convened by his predecessor, Pope Julius II (d. 1513). See also Lateran councils; Luther, Martin.

Leo XIII [Gioacchino Pecci], 1810–1903, pope from 1878 to 1903. He is best known for his social encyclical Rerum Novarum (1891), generally regarded as the first major document of modern Catholic social teachings. Pius IX's Syllabus of Errors (1864) had declared war on the contemporary world and democracy, but Leo sought pragmatic reconciliation with his time. As nuncio to Belgium, he had witnessed the start of the industrial revolution; as bishop of Perugia (1846–78; cardinal, 1853), he had encouraged scholars. As pope, he defused the Kulturkampf ("culture struggle" with the Church) in Germany and Switzerland, secured the withdrawal of anticlerical legislation in Chile, Mexico, and Spain, and restored diplomatic relations with Brazil, Colombia, and Russia. Despite, perhaps because of, the loss of temporal power in 1870, heads of state began to visit the Vatican and invite it to arbitrate international disputes. Leo called on French Catholics, traditionally monarchist, to rally to the Republic. He attempted in Rerum Novarum to speak for downtrodden workers, condemning impartially socialist collectivism and laissez-faire capitalism and asserting strongly the right to private property.

A Reinvigorated Papacy: Leo dreamed of restoring Christian unity under the leadership of a reinvigorated papacy. His vision was welcomed by Russian Orthodox thinkers like Vladimir Soloviev. But the condemnation of Anglican orders, pronounced "absolutely null and utterly void" by Apostolicae Curae (1896), was a setback to his ecumenical hopes.

Leo saw the need to revive Catholic scholarship. The Vatican Observatory for astronomical study was modernized. Thomism was made the basis of seminary teaching in Aeterni Patris (1879). Though an improvement on previous eclecticism, the motives of some neo-Thomists were suspect. Leo half-opened the Vatican archives to bona fide scholars and famously declared that "the Church has nothing to fear from the truth." His encyclical intended to encourage biblical studies, Providentissimus Deus (1893), used a narrow concept of inspiration, but he created the Biblical Commission and assigned it relatively liberal members.

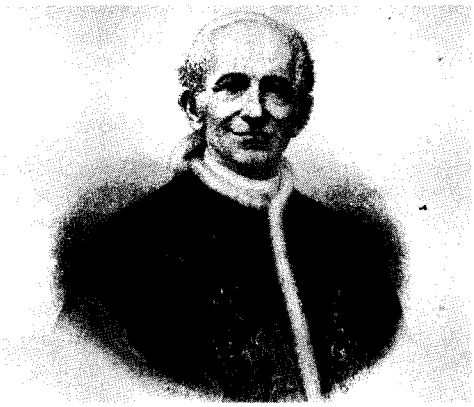
The Pope and America: Leo's weaknesses became apparent in his handling of U.S. Affairs. American Catholics were divided over the Knights of Labor, some denouncing it as a secret society while Archbishop John Ireland defended it on the grounds that the Church should be allied with the workers rather than with kings or princes. Cardinal James Gibbons took part in the World Parliament of Religions in Chicago in 1893, intended to illustrate the basic unity of belief shared by all the great world religions. But Leo condemned a similar attempt at the Paris exhibition of 1900. Denunciations and quarrels led to Longinqua Oceani (1895), which praised some aspects of the Church in the United States but warned against idealizing the separation of Church and state.

More misunderstandings about the life of Father Thomas Hecker, founder of the Paulists, led to Testem Benevolentiae (1898), which condemned the notion of adapting doctrines to the modern world and criticized "activism" and the peril of "indifferentism." A case could be made for saying that Leo had France in view rather than the United States.

Sixty-eight years old when he was elected pope in 1878, Leo lived to be ninety-two. "We elected a Holy Father," said one rueful cardinal, "not an Eternal Father." His pontificate showed that the papacy could be effective without temporal power, but his liberal impulses were not deeply rooted and were easily reversed by his saintly, but very conservative, successor, Pius X. See also Aeterni Patris; Americanism; Anglican ordination; Rerum Novarum; Thomism.

PETER HEBBLETHWAITE

Pope Leo XIII, the first pope in modern times to show an openness to scientific and scholarly progress and best known for his pioneering social encyclical Rerum Novarum (1891), on the condition of workers in the new industrial age.



Leonardi, St. John (lee-uh-nard'ee), 1542–1609, Italian religious founder. After ordination (1572), he started a catechetical confraternity as well as a small congregation of clerks regular devoted to the reform of priestly life. He helped found the Roman College (now the Pontifical Gregorian University) and the Propaganda Fide, the Vatican Congregation in charge of missionary activity (today called the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples or for the Propagation of the Faith). He died nursing plague victims in Rome. Feast day: October 9.

Leonardo da Vinci, 1452–1519, Italian Renaissance artist. Leonardo studied in Florence with Verrocchio, from 1481–99 was court painter and engineer for the duke of Milan, and in 1517 retired to France where he died in 1519 as court artist to Francis I. In addition to remarkable scientific contributions in anatomy, biology, physics, and hydrology, Leonardo introduced into Renaissance painting figures emerging from darkness into light (It., chiaroscuro); a mysterious misty atmosphere (sfumato) in the Virgin of the Rocks and the Mona Lisa; and was the first to visually explore the psychology of the inner life as seen in the apostles thrown into confusion in the Last Supper.

Leonine Prayers, vernacular prayers ordered by Pope Leo XIII (d. 1903) in 1886 to be recited by priests and people after Mass, consisting of three Hail Marys, the Salve Regina, a collect, and a prayer to St. Michael the Archangel. Pope Pius XI (d. 1939) ordered their continued recitation for the conversion of Russia. The practice of reciting the prayers after Mass was discontinued in 1964.

Leonine Sacramentary, the earliest surviving book of prayers for use in the liturgy of the Roman rite. It is also known as the Verona Sacramentary. Called "Leonine" because its author was long thought to be Pope Leo I (440–461), the book's manuscript actually dates from the seventh century. The Leonine Sacramentary was not an official liturgical book but a private collection of material possibly intended for use in parishes. It contains texts needed by those presiding at Eucharist (e.g., Opening Prayer; Prayer over the Gifts; Prayer After Communion; but no text of the Eucharistic Prayer), as well as formulas for "occasional services" such as ordinations. The book follows the civil calendar. See also sacramentary.

Leontius of Byzantium (lee-ahn'shee-uhs uhv bi-zan'tsee-uhm), ca. 500–43, Byzantine monk and theologian of the New Laura monastery (Palestine). He supported the doctrine of Chalcedon against Monophysitism, defended Origenism (which was condemned by Emperor Justinian I in 543), and took issue with the theology of Theodore of Mopsuestia. He introduced the notion of enhypostasia (Gk., "in person") into Christology. According to this view, the divine Person of Christ included all the attributes of perfect humanity. See also enhypostasia; hypostatic union; Incarnation, the.

Lepanto, Battle of, Mediterranean sea battle in October 1571 in which the combined military forces of Spain, Venice, and the papacy defeated the Turks. The victors credited the Virgin Mary as patroness of their success and celebrated a feast in her honor on October 7.

Lérins (Lerinum, Île de St.-Honorat), an island monastery off the Gallic (French) coast between Antibes and Fréjus. Founded in the first decade of the fifth century by Honoratus, a Gallic aristocrat, it produced several of southern Gaul's leading bishops and writers. A monastic community exists there to the present day. See also Vincent of Lérins, St.

Le Saulchoir. See Saulchoir, Le.

Lessius, Leonhard, 1554–1623, Jesuit theologian. Born near Antwerp, he studied at Louvain (1567) and taught philosophy at Douai (1574–81) and at Louvain (1585–1600). He became embroiled in the debate between the Dominicans and the Jesuits over the efficacy of grace, defending the Molinist position that grace is given in light of God's foreknowledge of the predisposition of free will. His position was condemned in 1587 by the Louvain theological faculty, led by Michael Baius, but supported by other universities, until Pope Sixtus V silenced the dispute. See also De Auxiliis; grace; Molinism.

Lestonnac, St. Jeanne de, also known as Joan de Lestonnac, 1556–1640, founder of the Religious of Notre Dame of Bordeaux. Born in France, she entered religious life after the death of her husband. The Cistercian life, however, proved too arduous and she left and formed her own community, devoted first to plague victims and then to the teaching of young girls. Feast day: February 2.

letter, a form of written communication, also called an epistle. Letters were widely used in the ancient world as a means of communication. Although no OT document is written in letter form, the use of letters is mentioned a number of times in the OT, and several OT documents contain letters embedded in them (e.g., 2 Chr 2:3–10, 11–16; Ezra 4:11–16; Jer 29:4–23). Of the twenty-seven documents in the NT, twenty-one are basically in letter form. Paul used letters extensively to supervise the communities he had founded. The letter was also used by other early Christian writers (1 Clement, Ignatius of Antioch, Polycarp).

Levite, a descendant of Levi, one of the twelve sons of Jacob (i.e., Israel; Gen 29:34; 35:23). It is often assumed that, after losing title to land, the tribe of Levi took over priestly duties, but the origins of the Levites as a priestly caste remain obscure. Moses was born of Levitical parents (Exod 2:1) and Aaron, his brother according to genealogical tradition, became the ancestor of the principal priestly family. As a second and subordinate order of clergy, Levites are not unambiguously attested before the Babylonian exile in the sixth century B.C. Their functions were to assist the priests in the sacrificial rituals (e.g., Num 1:50), take care of the sanctuary (1 Chr 23:28), and instruct the people in the law (e.g., Neh 8). In the course of time the Temple guilds (Asaph, Heman, Jeduthun) responsible for the composition and rendition of liturgical music were also classed as Levites (e.g., 1 Chr 25). See also priesthood.

Lex Ecclesiae Fundamentalis (Lat., "The Fundamental Law of the Church"), a proposal submitted as part of the post-Vatican II reform of canon law to provide the Church with a legal constitution. Although the proposal was not accepted, many of its laws dealing with the rights and obligations of individual Christians and of various groups of Christians were later incorporated into the revised code of canon law (1983).

Lex orandi, lex credendi (leks ohr-ahn'dee, leks kray-den'dee; Lat., "the law of worship is the law of belief"), a fifth-century axiom of Prosper of Aquitaine. Prosper, in writing against certain Pelagian heretics who did not believe in the need for God's grace, pointed out that the Church throughout the world prayed for people's needs in the prayers of the faithful in the liturgy (e.g., in the Good Friday liturgy, for unbelievers and heretics). Such authentic worship always points to true doctrine. Against these same heretics Augustine had earlier taught that in the worship of the Church one sees Christ in the Holy Spirit at work.

But there are certain criteria for applying this rule: first, this worship must be connected to the presider's role in worship; second, it must be connected to the apostolic tradition; and third, it must be universally used. An example that is frequently given is the opening greeting in the liturgy, "The Lord be with you." This greeting of the presider is found in the Scriptures and is used in the worship of the Eastern and Western churches. Therefore, this prayer is not simply a wish on the presider's part. It is an assurance that the risen Christ is one with his people. Another example would be the liturgy of initiation into the Church, i.e., Baptism, Confirmation, Eucharist. This liturgy clearly teaches among other things that everyone needs to benefit from Christ's sacrifice on the cross and that the Church is a community gathered by Christ through the Holy Spirit. See also doctrine; worship.

Libellatici (lee-bel-aht'i-chee; Lat.), those Christians during the Decian persecution (249–51) who avoided both martyrdom and outright sacrifice to the gods by purchasing the required certificate (libellus) testifying that sacrifice had been accomplished. They were readmitted to communion only after penance, but a penance less severe than that assigned to the sacrificati (those who had actually sacrificed).

liberalism, a general philosophical perspective which places emphasis on preserving and promoting the freedom of the individual person as the highest value in human life. Liberalism has influenced political, economic, personal, and religious aspects of the modern world. Rooted in the Enlightenment's belief in the free and scientific inquiry of individual persons, it has customarily provided a significant challenge to political and ecclesiastical authority. In the area of economics, liberals in the United States have generally supported government regulation of business, while conservatives have favored the limiting of government involvement.

Liberalism often employs the concept of rights to affirm the prerogatives of the individual within society. John XXIII affirmed the existence of the "natural rights" of persons in his 1963 encyclical Pacem in Terris.

liberation spirituality, a style of Christian life and prayer that is founded on the awareness of God's liberating activity in human history, especially on behalf of oppressed peoples. The context of liberation spirituality is sociopolitical. God's liberating concern for the Hebrew slaves in Egypt (Exod 3–12) is viewed as the paradigm of the spiritual life of the Christian community. The believer undergoes conversion to a new way of seeing and responding to the divine presence. The Scriptures are interpreted as the story of God's option for the lowly. Even the traditional staples of the spiritual life—prayer, piety, and discernment—find their meaning within this sociopolitical setting.

Since the 1960s Latin American theologians such as Gustavo Gutiérrez, Jon Sobrino, and Leonardo Boff have been widely recognized proponents of liberation spirituality. Similar visions of spirituality have been proposed by Native Americans, African-Americans, and feminists. See also liberation theology.

liberation theology, the form of theological inquiry that takes as its first principle and ordering idea the emancipation of oppressed peoples from unjust political, economic, or social subjection. "Liberation theology" currently describes a diverse array of practical theologies—feminist, black, and Hispanic, among many others—each of which attempts to understand and articulate the Christian faith from the perspective of its own group's particular experience of the struggle to overcome oppression. However, the term's original referent is the politically and socially conscious theology that first emerged in Latin America during the 1960s and 70s, and which received its perduring and most exemplary presentation in Peruvian theologian Gustavo Gutiérrez's Theology of Liberation (Eng. trans., 1973).

Origins: Liberation theology arose in its Latin American context principally as a moral reaction to the widespread and collective suffering of that area's poor, a suffering whose proportions and consequences were decried as unjustifiable assaults on human dignity. Politically, liberation theologians rejected the idea that such large-scale impoverishment was a tragically necessary stage in the economic development of the region. Relying on the insights of social and political theorists, often Marxists, they pointed instead to the debilitating dependence of Latin American countries on the industrialized and essentially self-interested nations of the north as the primary explanation for the region's chronic underdevelopment. Theologically, liberation theologians rejected the notion that such suffering was God's will and dismissed purely charitable initiatives as inadequate responses to the cries of the poor for justice. Emphasizing the politically charged character of the biblical witness, they challenged both individual Christians and the established Church order to adopt a more critical stance toward oppressive regimes, and to take up the cause of the poor, thereby working for the transformation of unjust social structures.

Growth: Among other important factors contributing to the emergence of liberation theology in Latin America is the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), which challenged the worldwide Church to make its own the "joys, hopes, griefs and aspirations of humanity, and especially the poor" (Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, n. 1) and to draw more deeply from the font of Scripture in its earthly mission of transforming the world (Decree on Priestly Formation, n. 16). The encyclical letters of Popes John XXIII and Paul VI on the social questions of the day (Mater et Magistra, 1961; Pacem in Terris, 1963; Populorum Progressio, 1967) reinforced the general direction of the council, and lent further weight to the possibility of a theologically informed socio-economic critique. On another level, the "political theologies" then emerging in Europe were introducing to Catholic theology the analytic techniques of contemporary social sciences (economics, sociology, political theory) in ways that would prove highly beneficial in the development of liberation theological method. Of special significance in the rise of liberation theology is the 1968 meeting of the Second General Conference of Latin American Bishops (CELAM) in Medellín, Colombia, where the teachings of Vatican II were applied to the Latin American church in a manner that deeply reflected the influence of liberation theologians.

Themes: (a) Preferential option for the poor. Solidarity with the victims of unjust oppression—in the form of a concrete commitment to or actual involvement in their emancipatory struggles for justice—remains the fundamental starting point of liberation theology. This identification with the oppressed has been expressed, in the Latin American context, as a "preferential option for the poor," what Gutiérrez describes as the "first act" of liberation theology, the necessary prelude to the more theoretical "second act" of systematic reflection.

Active concern for the poor and marginalized is of ancient vintage within the Christian tradition; what is new in liberation theology is the privileged role given to the experience and perspective of the oppressed themselves in articulating the theological ground and ethical entailments of that concern. As part of an overall recasting of traditional theological method, liberation thinkers insist that the central claims of the Christian faith (e.g., about the existence and nature of God, the identity of Jesus Christ, the work of the Holy Spirit, and the nature of the Church) be tested "from below," against the experience of the powerless and the oppressed, and that ultimately such claims cannot be ratified apart from that standpoint.

(b) Unity of theory and practice. Committed methodologically to transforming as well as better understanding the reality of the oppressed, liberation theologians seek continually to relate perception to action. Critical reflection on the intersections of theory and practice (praxis, Gk.) in the light of faith underscores the importance of "doing" as well as "seeing" the truth. Consequently, liberation theologians favor the concepts and insights of political and social thinkers over the tools of philosophical speculation to describe and interpret reality.

(c) Ideology critique. The critical, or "prophetic," task of liberation theology is to unmask the false ideologies concealing oppressive systems of economic and social privilege, and in their place to construct alternative liberating ideologies informed by the vision of a social order free of such inequities. Forms of church order and theological analysis indifferent to the just claims of the oppressed, or overtly hostile to their concrete liberation, are sharply criticized as complicit in such oppressive systems.

(d) Use of Scripture. At the theological center of liberation thought is an interpretation of the biblical drama of creation and redemption as disclosing a God who, in the people of Israel and the person of Jesus Christ, liberates; who takes the side of the poor and vulnerable; who is intimately involved in their historical struggle for justice. Israel's release from bondage in Egypt (Exod. 1–20), the prophetic denunciation of oppression (cf. Amos); and the Gospel portrayals of Jesus' ministry among the outcast (cf. Matt 25:31–46), figure prominently in liberation readings of the Bible. Of more than simply historical interest, the biblical texts, read "from below," constitute the theological basis for present hope—and action.

Critical Reaction: Liberation theology has provoked a great deal of controversy. Two official Vatican documents on liberation theology, in 1984 and 1986, note an "insufficiently critical" borrowing of Marxist concepts (e.g., class struggle), and warn of the danger of reducing faith to politics. While recognizing the legitimacy of liberation as a theological theme, the documents criticize liberation theology for its single-minded focus on the institutional dimension of sin, to the virtual exclusion of the individual; and for undermining church authority by identifying the hierarchy as members of the privileged class. Despite such criticisms Pope John Paul II affirmed, in a 1986 letter to the Brazilian bishops, the "useful and necessary" character of liberation theology. See also base communities; Latin America, Catholicism in; theology.

Bibliography

Gutiérrez, Gustavo. A Theology of Liberation. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1973.

Hennelly, Alfred T. Liberation Theology: A Documentary History. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1990.

McGovern, Arthur. Liberation Theology and Its Critics. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1989.

PAUL J. WOJDA

Liberatore, Matteo (mah-tay'oh lee-bair-uh-tohr'-ay), 1810–92, Jesuit philosopher and theologian. In 1850 he became a member of the neo-Thomistic revival spearheaded by the coeditors of the newly founded journal La Civiltà Cattolica. His writings systematized nineteenth-century Thomism, which, he contended, was the only philosophical system capable of resolving the problems being raised by modern philosophy.

Liber de Causis (lee'bair day kow'zees; Lat., "Book of Causes"), twelfth-century Latin translation of an anonymous, probably ninth-century Arabic text. A monotheistic reworking of parts of Proclus's Elements of Theology, it influenced speculation about angelic cognition and about the relation between divine and created causality. See also angel; five ways of St. Thomas Aquinas.

Liberius, d. 366, pope from 352 to 366. The Arian emperor Constantius deposed Liberius (355) for refusing to endorse the condemnation of Athanasius. His health progressively harmed by a harsh exile in Thrace, Liberius eventually submitted and was then readmitted to his see. He was forced to sign a formulary, either the Arianizing formula of Sirmium of 357 or (more probably) the essentially orthodox formula of Sirmium of 351. His acts and correspondence after the death of Constantius (361) evince an unqualified support for the Nicene Creed. He was listed in the fifth-century Hieronymian Martyrology (Martyrology of St. Jerome), with a feast day of September 23, but his name does not occur in any later calendars. See also Athanasius, St.; Nicene Creed.

Liber Usualis (Lat., "book for general use"), a Roman-rite book containing chiefly Mass and Divine Office chants of the principal liturgical days. First published in 1896 (revised editions in 1903, 1934), this compilation also includes Mass and Divine Office texts, the whole being excerpted from the Roman gradual, antiphonal, missal, and breviary. See also chant, Gregorian.

Libri Carolini (lee'bree kair-oh-leen'ee; Lat., "Caroline Books," i.e., the books of Charlemagne), Carolingian retort, written between 790 and 793, to the iconophile teachings of the Second Council of Nicaea (the Seventh Ecumenical Council, 787). The Franks took little interest in the early phases of the iconoclastic controversy, which dominated Byzantine life from 725. The Italians, however, were violently iconophile, and a papal synod condemned iconoclasm in 731, provoking retaliation by the iconoclastic Eastern emperor Leo III, who removed four provinces from the papal jurisdiction. This action, in turn, contributed to the papacy's increasing dependence upon the Frankish king rather than the Byzantine emperor as its protector. Thus when the Empress Irene called for an ecumenical council to reject iconoclasm, Pope Hadrian I was happy to send legates and endorse the results.

When the Greek decrees of the council were translated into Latin, however, the pope's Frankish protectors were aghast. Part of their reaction stemmed from the fact that the Latin translation was faulty, obscuring the careful Greek distinctions between veneration and worship, between saint and image. But the Franks had historically been less exuberant than the Greeks in their use of holy images (other than the Cross), and they also saw the political gain to be won by questioning the orthodoxy of the Byzantines.

The four books of the Libri attack the council on every conceivable front, beginning with a condemnation of the imperial styles used by Irene and her son as sacrilegious. Later chapters discuss what makes a council universal and offer a biblical and logical refutation of the actual Nicene teachings. An embarrassment to the pope, the Libri were ignored by the Byzantines.

Scholarly opinion as to the authorship of the Libri is divided. There is almost universal agreement that Charlemagne himself was not the real writer, though manuscript evidence indicates that the final draft may have been read aloud to him for his comments. Alcuin of York is known to have written a letter on the subject of iconoclasm, but he was in Northumbria for most of the period during which the Libri were composed. Certain Visigothic characteristics of the text have made Theodulf of Orléans the leading candidate. See also Charlemagne; iconoclasm; Nicaea, Second Council of. JOHN W. HOUGHTON liceity [canon law], canonical term describing the status of a sacrament vis-à-vis the law of the Church. It is often used with another juridical term, "valid," or efficacious. A sacrament is licit or legal if the provisions of the law regulating its celebration have been followed; it is illicit if the opposite is true. For example, it is the law in the Roman rite to celebrate the Eucharist using unleavened wheat bread. If leavened wheat bread is used, the eucharistic matter is considered illicit, although the validity of the sacrament in this case cannot be questioned. See also sacrament; validity of sacraments.

licentiate (Lat., licentia, "permission"). 1 Medieval academic degree allowing the recipient to lecture from approved books (a doctor could write and publish his own works). 2 Modern ecclesiastical academic degree granted between the bachelor's degree and the doctorate. See also J.C.L.; S.S.L.; S.T.L.

Liebermann, Bruno (lee'bair-mahn), 1759–1844, an important figure in the renewal of German pastoral life in the nineteenth century. Ordained in 1783, he was a pastor, lecturer in dogmatic theology, and cathedral preacher. As regent and professor for the new seminary in Mainz, he developed innovative pastoral approaches for the formation of priests and furthered an ecclesial piety among the laity. He also worked to retain biblical and contemporary philosophical ideas within a neo-Scholastic framework.

life, origins of. The first organisms are thought to have arisen from inorganic compounds more than four billion years ago. There is no direct evidence for the origins of life because the first forms of life were too small and too easily degenerated to be preserved in the fossil record. Neither is there evidence of spontaneous generation in the present that could corroborate a theoretical explanation of the origins of life. Experimenters have duplicated the atmospheric conditions at the time of the origins of life and have shown that the spontaneous production of amino acids can result from a spark of electricity or a ray of ultraviolet light. Accepted theory holds that amino acids thus formed eventually accumulated to form an organic broth from which self-replicating life arose. However, the origins of the genetic code remain unknown. From this most primitive form of life, the divinely-guided process of evolution by natural selection brought about the higher life forms. Pope Pius XII, in Humani Generis (1950), taught that the theory of evolution is to be viewed with caution outside the proper scope of biology. In particular, he reaffirmed the doctrine of creation and the immediate creation of the human soul by God. "The teaching of the Church," he wrote, "does not forbid that the doctrine of evolutionism, insofar as it inquires into the origin of the human body from already existing and living matter, be, according to the present state of human disciplines and sacred theology, treated in research and discussion by experts on both sides." See also creation; creationism; evolution.

ligamen, impediment of (Lat., "a binding"), invalidating obstacles to a new marriage by someone currently married. A person is bound by an existing marriage. Because the prohibition is based upon the understanding that an essential property of marriage is indissolubility, the impediment cannot be dispensed from. See also indissolubility of marriage; marriage law.

Liguori, St. Alphonsus. See Alphonsus Liguori, St.

limbo (Lat., limbus, "hem," "edge"), place or state of natural happiness for the nonbaptized dead. At issue is the reality of original sin and the necessity of Baptism for salvation. In response to Pelagius (d. ca. 425), who taught that Baptism was not necessary for salvation, Augustine (d. 430) contended that unbaptized children who die are condemned to hell, though they do not suffer all its pains because they are not guilty of personal sin. Medieval theologians, wishing to mitigate the harshness of Augustine's position, postulated the existence of limbo. Limbo, they held, is a place or state where unbaptized persons enjoy a natural happiness, though they remain excluded from the Beatific Vision. Some incorrectly identify this limbo with the hell of the Apostles' Creed where, according to tradition, Christ spent the interval between Good Friday and Easter Sunday.

Modern theology, when it does not reject the notion outright, questions the theological premises upon which limbo is based. It is difficult, if not impossible, to reconcile the concept of limbo with the Christian affirmation of God's universal salvific will and the fundamental solidarity of redeemed humanity. Besides, the notion generates obvious pastoral difficulties where the death of infants is concerned.

Neither officially defined nor abrogated by the Church, this theological postulate plays no role in contemporary Catholic theology. Instead, contemporary theology and church practice stress the fundamental solidarity of redeemed humanity and the universal salvific will of God. See also universal salvific will of God.

Linacre, Thomas, ca. 1460–1524, English physician and humanist. Influential friend of John Colet, Desiderius Erasmus, and Thomas More, he was physician to Henry VII and Henry VIII and founder of the Royal College of Physicians in 1518. The Linacre Quarterly, the official journal of the National Federation of Catholic Physicians' Guilds, published continuously since 1932, is named in his honor.

Lindisfarne, island off the east coast of Northumbria, where Aidan in 635 established a monastery and his bishopric. Enjoying a succession of saintly bishops, it remained an important religious and cultural center until Viking raids forced the transfer of the see to the mainland, eventually to Durham. See also Aidan of Iona, St.

Linus, St., d. ca. 78, traditionally regarded as the immediate successor to Peter as Bishop of Rome in all early episcopal lists; sometimes identified with the Linus of 2 Tim 4:21. Feast day: September 23.

lion, biblical symbol of courage and strength. It represents Mark the Evangelist in Christian iconography. See also Mark, St.

litany (Gk., litanea, "supplication"), a form of prayer made up of a series of petitions or invocations to which the faithful respond. Litanies, which can be found in Jewish worship, have been part of the Christian tradition from its earliest days. Pope Gregory the Great (590–604) restricted the use of litanies to feast days; only the Kyrie (Gk., "Lord, [have mercy]") was retained for use at every Mass. The most widely used litany apart from the regular liturgy of the Eucharist is the Litany of the Saints, recited, for example, at the Easter Vigil and at ordination ceremonies. See also Litany of the Saints.

Litany of the Saints, a prayer invoking many holy people. The Litany of the Saints is actually composed of two parts. In the first, a series of holy people is named by the leader; the second part consists of a series of petitions. The faithful participate by making appropriate responses. The Litany of the Saints, which has traditionally been used as part of the Forty Hours devotion and to accompany various processions, is most commonly heard at the Easter Vigil and at ordination ceremonies in the Roman Catholic Church. Though the Christian practice of calling upon the saints for assistance also dates to the days of the martyrs, a lengthy catalog of saints, such as is found in the first part of the litany, is a later development. One of the most ancient examples of a litany of saints dates from the seventh century in Rome. From Rome, the use of the litany spread to England, Ireland, and other countries.

literal sense of Scripture, the meaning that emerges from the biblical words themselves in their literary and historical context. Pius XII's encyclical on biblical studies, Divino Afflante Spiritu (1943), further describes it as that sense that the author intended (n. 34). Attention to the literal (or literary sense) has nothing to do with the literalism of fundamentalists, since the literal sense can be metaphorical or mythic, and proper attention to literary form is one of the prime criteria for finding the literal sense. In church tradition it is often contrasted to the spiritual sense, but according to Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) "nothing necessary to faith is contained in the spiritual sense that scripture does not put forward elsewhere in the literal sense" (Summa Theologiae 1.1.10). See also Scripture, senses of.

Lithuania, Catholicism in. See Baltic countries, Catholicism in the.

Little Brothers of Jesus, a congregation of mostly lay brothers founded in Algeria by René Voillaume in 1933 and inspired by the example of Charles de Foucauld (1858–1916). Although de Foucauld wrote the rule for the Little Brothers, the ascetic contemplative never saw the creation of his community. The ideal, realized by Voillaume and other priests who were attracted to the rule, incorporates contemplative spirituality into a ministry of simple living and manual labor, largely in the blue-collar work force. The brothers live in small communities and their goal is to proclaim the gospel on the job by the way they live and work. See also Foucauld, Charles de.

Little Entrance, or "Minor Introit," in the Byzantine Eucharist, a ritual procession in which the Gospel book is carried from the altar through the church and back to the altar again. Today a purely ceremonial procession that introduces the Liturgy of the Word and symbolizes Christ's coming as Logos (Word), it is a ritual remnant of the original introit (entrance) of clergy and people into the church at what was once the beginning of the liturgy, before the addition of the three antiphons (refrains) that now precede it. The Armenian Eucharist has a similar procession with the Gospel book. The entrance is called "little" to distinguish it from the "Great Entrance," or transfer of gifts before the anaphora, the central prayer of the eucharistic liturgy. See also Great Entrance.

Little Flower of Jesus, the. See Thérèse of Lisieux, St.

Little Office of the Blessed Virgin Mary, an abridged version of the common office of the Blessed Virgin Mary that may have developed in conjunction with a Saturday Mass in honor of Mary, composed by Alcuin (d. 804). By the tenth century, the office was recited daily, and after it was reorganized by Peter Damian (d. 1072), its use became common during the twelfth century. Once binding on religious and diocesan clergy, the office became a matter of private devotion only under Pope Pius X (1903–14). It is currently recited by certain nonclerical religious institutes and by individual members of the laity. The new Liturgy of the Hours (formerly the Divine Office) provides for a Saturday memorial of the Blessed Virgin during Ordinary Time, and the texts for it are drawn almost entirely from the Little Office. See also breviary; Liturgy of the Hours.

Little Sisters of the Poor (L.S.P), a religious community for women founded in 1839 at St. Servan, France, by Jeanne Jugan (d. 1879) and two women companions. Other women joined them and they formally organized themselved into a congregation dedicated to caring for the infirm and indigent elderly. By 1854 the original group had grown to five hundred sisters and had spread beyond the borders of France into England and Belgium. In the 1990s this international community specializes in geriatrics and gerontology, and includes almost four thousand members worldwide, with more than five hundred in the United States.

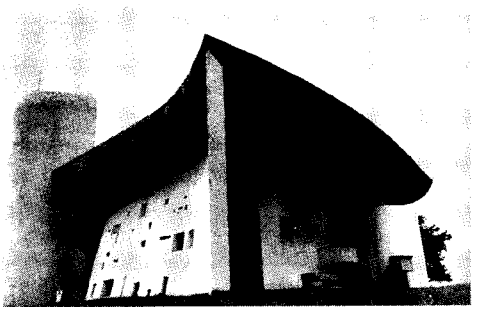
liturgical architecture, the study and practice of designing and building structures worthy to house the Church and to serve its rites. The church must first be understood as an assembled community, and secondarily as the building in which that community gathers. While liturgical architecture is primarily concerned with the second notion, it must also be interested in the first insofar as houses for the Church's worship shape and influence gathered communities, their self-understanding, and intentions for the worship of God. Those changes in liturgical architecture that have occurred from age to age correlate with changes in Christian self-understanding.

The nave and apse of Notre-Dame Cathedral in Paris, originally built in the twelfth century and restored in the nineteenth, one of the world's most celebrated examples of Gothic architecture.

The Early Christian Period: During the first to fourth centuries Christians met in the homes of wealthy Church members. The Eucharist was observed in the dining room, the largest room of the domus (Lat., "house"). Despite the notion that early Christians baptised in lakes or rivers, baptismal pools were more often built in the siderooms of the Christian domus, and have been found to exist in the early Christian synagogue of Dura-Europos. At this time Christian worship and its architecture centered around the domestic table, the water-bath of baptism, and the funeral meals, refrigeria (Lat., "cold meals"), of the cemeteries.

The Post-Constantinian Basilica: Following Constantine's conversion to Christianity (312), public buildings, or basilicas, were given over to the Christian communities. The basilical design was virtually a wholesale importation of the architecture of the courthouses of Roman magistrates. The basilicas were built on a longitudinal axis with a wide central nave surrounded by clerestory windows in the upper gallery. On either side of the nave, there was a narrower, columned aisle. At the head of the nave, an apse, a round extension of the nave, provided a place for the seating of the bishop and lesser clergy. The altar was generally placed in the center of the nave. A waist-high wall came to be built around the altar to discourage the crowd from disrupting the liturgy. In the same general area, an ambo or pulpit was erected several feet above the floor. The basilical style represents the aspiration of the Church to rise from its marginal status into the mainstream of Roman civic life as a uniquely powerful political and religious institution.

The Monastic Churches of the Middle Ages in the West: Monastic styles of worship, with their emphasis on the Liturgy of the Hours and the attendant frequency of Masses in monastic communities, indelibly marked the development of Romanesque and Gothic styles. Both architectural styles are essentially elaborations upon the basilical style. Four characteristics stand out: (1) the exaggeration of the seating for the clergy in the expansion of the choir space, (2) the increase in number of altars and side chapels to accommodate the many priests of the abbey who desired to celebrate a private daily Mass, (3) the vaulted arches of the Gothic churches and (4) the invention of the flying buttress, which enabled churches to become the skyscrapers of the late



An example of modern liturgical architecture; the Church of Notre Dame du Haut in Ronchamp, France (a view from the southeast).

Middle Ages, extending skyward and admitting an unprecedented amount of natural light. The church buildings of the Middle Ages were built to support a clericalized liturgy and to project a hierarchical understanding of the cosmos and the place of human beings within it.

The Modern Period: The best church buildings of the modern period represent a renewal in the understanding of liturgical architecture. Buildings must serve and not hinder the gathering of the Church into a single, unified body. They ought not themselves distract from the activity of that ecclesial body, but should enhance it. Modern building materials such as reinforced concrete expand the possible shapes of buildings, their floor plans, and their sight lines. Modern Catholic churches are supposed to be designed around the sacramental centers for worship: ambo, altar, font, assembly, and the presidential chair used by the presiding priest, corresponding with the fundamental symbols by which the modern Catholic assembly is said to experience the presence of Christ. Architects and architectural consultants who desire to serve the modern Catholic Church will incorporate these values into their designs. See also Catholicism and architecture.

Bibliography

Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy. Environment and Art in Catholic Worship. Washington, DC: NCCB, 1978.

Macauley, David. Cathedral: The Story of Its Construction. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1973.

White, James F. Protestant Worship and Church Architecture. New York: Oxford, 1964.

JEFFREY T. VANDERWILT

liturgical art, the study, design, and creation of images in service to Christian revelation, the human expression of encounter with God or the holy.

Early History: In the first Christian century there were reservations about the use of images because of the Hebraic injunction against "graven images" and the constant concern about idolatry. One of the earliest purposes of Christian artistic imagery, in addition to human and faith development, was religious education. Artistic images visually portrayed persons and narrated events from salvation history in order to edify and instruct the viewer. However, with the Christological controversies of the fourth through the eighth centuries regarding the humanity and divinity of Christ, it became more difficult for artists to visually portray and narrate these saving persons and events in a manner that would satisfy the various parties to the theological debates.

The iconoclastic controversies of the eighth and ninth centuries were especially critical in the development of Christian art, and of liturgical art in particular. On the one side were those who shared the historic Hebraic skepticism about imagery; on the other were those who shared the Greco-Hellenistic appreciation for beauty. The emerging influence of Islam in Europe added pressures against the use of imagery, since Islam also opposed the veneration of images. It was the Second Council of Nicaea (787) that officially resolved the controversy in favor of the use of images (icons), although iconoclastic tendencies did not disappear and would reemerge with new intensity at the time of the Protestant Reformation in the sixteenth century.

Christian Art as Liturgical: To call Christian art "liturgical" suggests that such works of art are not ends in themselves, but represent liturgical acts, that is, acts of corporate public worship (which is liturgy) and of personal prayer and devotion linked with the public worship of the Church. Early Christian art of the first three centuries includes murals, mosaics, and "graffiti," short prayers inscribed on the walls of tombs. There were representations of Noah's ark and simple symbolic figures such as loaves and fishes. An especially popular image was that of the Good Shepherd, depicting Christ as a youth supporting a lamb across his shoulders. He becomes a model for pastors. Elsewhere Christ is depicted as a teacher, instructing the apostles about the mission they are about to embark upon. He becomes thereby a model for bishops. Following the conversion of Constantine in the fourth century, the figure of Christ came more closely to resemble that of the emperor. Christ is depicted enthroned, scepter in hand, crowned, and enrobed in imperial garb. He became thereby a model for medieval popes.

Such images of Christ the King, rooted in an imperial culture, persist to the present day. This points up an important facet of liturgical art, as for Christian art in general: its materials and media, its use of symbols and conceptual metaphors convey the particularities of Christian peoples in various individual cultures, historical periods, and regions even as the art strives to embody the more universal truths of God's redemption wrought by Christ for all humanity.

One can consider the liturgical arts by media: (1) icons and paintings, (2) statuary, (3) furnishings and appointments, and (4) vesture and textiles. To be sure, music is also a liturgical art, but that is the subject of another entry.

Icons and Paintings: The two-dimensional arts—iconography, painting, and mosaic—are among the oldest of Christian arts. Works in these media tend to be figures of Christ, the Mother of God, the apostles, and saints. They are presented as manifestations (epiphanies) of the divine in the human, the eternal in the temporal. In the East, the icon in particular draws one into a higher, heavenly order of being. Human figures are presented in static tableaux. Events are presented as interventions of the divine into the human order. In the West, the best preserved works of art of the eighth and ninth centuries are small objects such as illuminated manuscripts, splendid book covers, ivory carving, and metalwork. From the tenth until the fifteenth centuries the use of images supported the catechetical mission of the Church to a largely illiterate population. Paintings and icons appeared on the walls of cathedrals, churches, chapels, refectories, and chapterhouses, and were incorporated onto the enameled cases which preserved valued relics and into liturgical furnishings such as the reredos (a decorative wall, screen, hanging, or metalwork behind and above the altar). Great theologians like Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) viewed art, like philosophy, as a handmaiden of theology.

From the late Middle Ages into the Renaissance (fourteenth to mid-seventeenth centuries), human figures were presented in movement, on pilgrimage, or as manifestations of the sacred. Saints were superimposed upon landscapes, medieval fortresses, or city squares replete with city halls and Gothic cathedrals—scenes that would be familiar to the audiences. Other art-forms like dance and drama served similar educational and spiritually formational purposes.

With the Renaissance, however, there was a shift away from the sacramental (the experience of the infinite in and through the finite) to a celebration of the beauty of nature and of the human body. Although some of history's most magnificent artistic works were produced during this period, and under papal patronage (for example, Michelangelo's Sistine ceiling, 1508–13, supported by Pope Julius II, d. 1513), much of the contemporary art was regarded as secular, even pagan. Thus, the Reformers cleansed the walls of churches, removed all images and statues, and shifted the focus from visual expression to the written and spoken word of God.

In 1563 the Council of Trent (1545–63) decreed that images were to be produced by Christian artists and placed in churches for teaching purposes. Distortions of this central purpose, e.g., the display of human nudity, were to be avoided. Art, therefore, was not "for its own sake" (ars gratia artis, Lat.), but for the sacred meaning that lay beyond it. It was a means to a higher end. At the same time, the council's guidelines did inspire other forms of art, even if apologetical and even polemical in character. Doctrines and practices condemned by the Reformers were depicted with renewed emphasis: the Sacrifice of the Mass, the sacrament of Penance, the holy souls in purgatory, the corporal works of mercy, and in particular the Blessed Virgin Mary.

Statuary: The Eastern churches do not use statuary in their vocabulary of aesthetic expression. In the West, since the Carolingian period (eighth and ninth centuries) the carving of holy figures, saints, or angels in wood or in stone (presently also in plastics) has found acceptance. Some have suggested that liturgical statuary ought not limit itself only to the presentation of historical pageants or the saints, but might also express common human experiences that impart an understanding of the divine regard for human beings, e.g., a mother embracing her child, or a figure leaping loose from its chains. A vivid example of such art is Giovanni Bernini's carving of Teresa of Ávila in ecstasy (St. Peter's in Rome). There the mystic is depicted almost completely enthralled by a rapture that borders on the sexual. Many Catholics maintain small private shrines for the display and veneration of saints or holy men and women. Such practices extend the presence of the entire Christian community, especially its important historical figures, into the community and everyday life of the contemporary Christian household. They may also be signs or tangible reminders of God's protective presence over the family and its belongings.

The risen and triumphant Christ, enthroned in heavenly majesty with the saints (the Latin inscription reads, "The Lord preserves the Church from shame"); fresco in the Church of Santa Pudenziana, Rome.

Furnishing and Appointments: Liturgical arts also include the skills and crafts with which liturgical furnishings are created and adorned. For centuries chairs and pulpits, altars and rood screens have been the stages upon which the biblical dramas have been enacted. Ironworking and stonecarving or masonry have played a role. Metal work has wrought beautiful chalices, patens, and thuribles (used for incensing sacred persons and objects, including the altar). Contemporary sensibilities and liturgical guidelines prefer an aesthetic simplicity in instruments of worship.

The guiding liturgical principle is that the worshipping assembly's attention should be centered on what is most important, namely, the celebration of the Eucharist and everything that leads up to, and flows from, it. Accordingly, the focal points are the altar table, the baptismal font, the ambo (lectern), and the presider's chair. Statues and other images of the saints, stations of the cross, or other images of popular devotion (e.g., banners, vigil lights, the Communion rail) are not to distract one's attention from the main worship space.

The altar is accorded the primary place. It is that around which the community gathers for the Eucharist. The altar symbolizes Christ who is simultaneously altar, priest, and victim. It is a place of both sacrifice and celebratory feasting.

The baptismal font is rich in the symbolism of flowing water, the source of new life in Christ. It is to be large enough to accommodate the baptism of adults, the immersion of infants, and the celebration of the Easter Vigil, and at the same time visually linked with the altar, so that the journey from font to altar may become an image of the Christian journey itself.

The ambo is the place from which the word of God is proclaimed and interpreted. As such, it is dignified in appearance, but never distractingly ornate. The positioning and the appearance of the presider's chair reflects the presider's function as the one who calls the community to worship and leads it in prayer and who represents Christ's presence to the assembly.

The holiness of the assembly itself is also acknowledged in the plants and flowers, the special lighting, and the festive colors that reflect the season and the occasion.

Vesture and Textiles: The primary vesture (coverings) for both altar and ministers is made of white linen. The baptismal alb, or white robe, represents the putting on of Christ and the sharing in his Easter glory. Chasubles (the presider's outer vestment) and other vestments fulfill their function by their color, design, and enveloping form. Hanging banners communicate primarily through patterned embroidery, abstract images, or simple variations in texture of color rather than through verbal messages.

Twentieth Century: In his encyclical Mediator Dei ("On the sacred liturgy," 1947), Pope Pius XII (d. 1958) urged Christian artists to steer a middle course between modernism and traditionalism. But in 1952 an Instruction on Sacred Art from the Holy Office (in the 1990s called the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith) reaffirmed the more restrictive guidelines of the Council of Trent.

During the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) Pope Paul VI (d. 1978) celebrated a special Mass for artists (May 4, 1964) and called for a revival of the close bond between artists and the Church. Perhaps the strongest affirmation of the use of contemporary art for liturgical purposes came from the U.S. Catholic Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy in its instruction on Environment and Art in Catholic Worship (1978).

The discussion about liturgical art since the Second Vatican Council has centered on the relative merits of the traditional (i.e., Trent to Vatican II) and of the contemporary (Vatican II and beyond). Should new churches have stained-glass windows or clear windows? Should there be a Communion rail? Where should the tabernacle be located? Should there be statues in and around the sanctuary? Should there be side-altar chapels? Where should the baptismal font be located and how should it be constructed? How should the various ministers, including altar servers, be vested?

But at least the fundamental question faced by the Church in the first eight or nine centuries seems to have been settled. It is not whether the Church should employ various forms of art in its liturgy, but rather what kind of art should it employ. "Christians have not hesitated to use every human art in their celebration of the saving work of God in Jesus Christ," the U.S. Catholic Bishops' document on Environment and Art in Catholic Worship (1978) points out, "although in every historical period they have been influenced, at times inhibited, by cultural circumstances. In the resurrection of the Lord, all things are made new. Wholeness and healthiness are restored, because the reign of sin and death is conquered" (n. 4). See also altar; ambo; baptismal font; Byzantine style; Catholicism and music; Catholicism and the visual arts; Gothic style; liturgical music; presidential chair; vestments.

Bibliography

Lowrie, Walter. Art in the Early Church. New York: Norton, 1969.

Regamey, Pie-Raymond. Religious Arts in the Twentieth Century. New York: Herder and Herder, 1963.

U.S. Catholic Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy. Environment and Art in Catholic Worship. Washington, DC: United States Catholic Conference, 1978. (Reprinted in The Liturgy Documents: A Parish Resource, edited by Mary Ann Simcoe, pp. 265–92. Chicago: Liturgy Training Publications, 1985.)

JEFFREY T. VANDERWILT

liturgical books, collections of officially approved liturgical texts (prayers, songs, readings). They sometimes include directions written in red (rubrics) for specific liturgical ministers. The Eastern churches and Western churches with a strong liturgical tradition (Roman, Anglican, some Protestant) have well-developed liturgical books. Liturgical books can be grouped according to services, e.g., eucharistic celebration or initiation. Eucharist and daily prayer (Divine Office) books can also be classified with reference to ministries: books for presiders (usually prayer texts), for deacons and other readers (usually scriptural texts), for cantors and psalmists (various song collections).

Historical Development: The earliest liturgical accounts seem to indicate that the Bible, from which the lessons were read, was the only book employed. As a system for readings developed over time, beginnings and endings of readings were listed in a book called the Comes, the forerunner of the lectionary. The evangeliary containing only Gospel pericopes (passages) developed later. As the Divine Office took on a fixed form, collections of biblical lessons, patristic sermons, and acts of the martyrs read at prayer gave rise to separate books: Office lectionary, homilary, and legenda (Lat., "material to be read"). Other Office books included the Psalter, ordered and arranged for singing; the Liber responsorialis, a responsory collection; and the Antiphionale, containing psalmic antiphons.

Prayer texts, originally improvised, became stereotypical over time and were written down. Little books (libelli), employed as memory aids for prayer leaders of domestic Eucharists, grew into sacramentaries, prayer collections used at various sacramental celebrations. Early sacramentaries had few, if any, ceremonial directions. Elaborate papal rites brought ordinals, collections of ceremonial directions, into existence.

The early ninth century saw the beginnings of the pontifical, employed at services where the bishop's ministry was required. More significant, however, was the development of the missal, a compilation of the presider's sacramentary, the readers' book(s), and the musicians' song books. This book, convenient for private celebrations in which the priest took all but the server's part, was detrimental to worship as a truly corporate act, for eventually the presider was expected to read sotto voce (It., "in a low voice") all the parts assigned to other ministers, even while enacted by others.

Vatican II's Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (1963) mandated the wholesale revision of all Roman books "as soon as possible" (n. 25). By 1973 the Latin editions of major books were introduced, categorized under missal, Office (Liturgy of the Hours), ritual, and pontifical. The Roman Ritual's sacramental celebrations appeared in separate volumes.

The work of conciliar commissions resulted in published revisions of the following rites: (1) missal—Order of Mass and Lectionary (1969), Sacramentary (1970); (2) ritual—Baptism of Children, and Marriage (1969), Funerals (1969, revised 1985), Religious Profession (1970), Adult Initiation (1971), Pastoral Care of the Sick (1972), Eucharistic Cult (1973), Penance (1973), Blessings (1984); (3) pontifical—Ordinations (1968), Consecration of Virgins and Abbatial Blessings (1970), Blessing of Oils (1970), Confirmation (1971), Institution of Readers and Acolytes (1972), Church Dedication (1972); (4) Liturgy of the Hours (1971).

The revised books are marked by extensive introductions of a theological, liturgical, and pastoral nature. See also liturgical reform.

JOHN A. MELLOH

TEMPORAL CYCLE (PROPER OF TIME)

CHRISTMAS CYCLE

First Sunday of Advent	(the Sunday falling on or closest to November 30)
Second Sunday of Advent
Third Sunday of Advent	(also popularly known as Gaudete Sunday, from the first word of the old Latin Introit prayer for this day)
Fourth Sunday of Advent
Holy Family	(the Sunday after Christmas; celebrated on December 30 if Christmas and its octave fall on a Sunday)
Epiphany	(the Sunday falling between January 2 and January 8)

ORDINARY TIME-I

Sundays in Ordinary Time	(Ordinary Time, thirty-three or thirty-four weeks in duration, begins on Monday after the Sunday following January 6 and continues until Tuesday before Ash Wednesday inclusive, resumes on the Monday after Pentecost, and ends before Evening Prayer of the First Sunday of Advent.)
Baptism of the Lord	(the Sunday following Epiphany)

EASTER CYCLE

First Sunday of Lent	(the Sunday following Ash Wednesday)
Second Sunday of Lent
Third Sunday of Lent
Fourth Sunday of Lent	(also popularly known as Laetare Sunday, from the first word of the old Latin Introit prayer for this day)
Fifth Sunday of Lent	(formerly known as Passion Sunday)
Passion Sunday	(also known as Palm Sunday)
Easter Triduum	(Holy Thursday, Good Friday, Easter Vigil)
Easter Sunday
Second Sunday of Easter
Third Sunday of Easter
Fourth Sunday of Easter
Fifth Sunday of Easter
Sixth Sunday of Easter
Seventh Sunday of Easter
Pentecost Sunday

ORDINARY TIME-II

Trinity Sunday	(Solemnity of the Holy Trinity)
Body and Blood of Christ	(Solemnity of Corpus Christi)
Christ the King	(the thirty-fourth and last Sunday in Ordinary Time)

SANCTORAL CYCLE (PROPER OF SAINTS)

SOLEMNITIES, FEASTS, AND MEMORIALS [S,F,M]

January 1	Octave of Christmas; Solemnity of Mary, Mother of God [S]
January 2	Sts. Basil the Great and Gregory of Nazianzus [M]
January 4	St. Elizabeth Ann Seton (United States) [M]
January 5	Bl. John Neumann (United States) [M]
January 17	St. Anthony, abbot [M]
January 21	St. Agnes [M]
January 24	St. Francis de Sales [M]
January 25	Conversion of Paul, Apostle [F]
January 26	Sts. Timothy and Titus [M]
January 28	St. Thomas Aquinas [M]
January 31	St. John Bosco [M]
February 2	Presentation of the Lord (also known as Candlemas Day) [F]
February 5	St. Agatha [M]
February 6	St. Paul Miki and companions [M]
February 10	St. Scholastica [M]
February 14	Sts. Cyril and Methodius [M]
February 22	Chair of Peter, Apostle [F]
February 23	St. Polycarp [M]
March 7	Sts. Perpetua and Felicity [M]
March 19	St. Joseph, Husband of Mary [S]
March 25	Annunciation [S]
April 7	St. Jean-Baptiste de La Salle [M]
April 25	St. Mark, Evangelist [F]
April 29	St. Catherine of Siena [M]
May 2	St. Athanasius [M]
May 3	Sts. Philip and James, Apostles [F]
May 14	St. Matthias, Apostle [F]
May 26	St. Philip Neri [M]
May 31	Visitation [F]
(Thursday before the Seventh Sunday of Easter)	Ascension
June 1	St. Justin [M]
June 3	St. Charles Lwanga and companions [M]
June 5	St. Boniface [M]
June 11	St. Barnabas, Apostle [M]
June 13	St. Anthony of Padua [M]
June 21	St. Aloysius Gonzaga [M]
June 24	Birth of John the Baptist [S]
June 28	St. Irenaeus [M]
June 29	Sts. Peter and Paul, Apostles [S]
(Friday after Corpus Christi)	Sacred Heart [S]

July 3	St. Thomas, Apostle [F]
July 11	St. Benedict [M]
July 15	St. Bonaventure [M]
July 22	St. Mary Magdalene [M]
July 25	St. James, Apostle [F]
July 26	Sts. Joachim and Anne, parents of Mary [M]
July 29	St. Martha [M]
July 31	St. Ignatius of Loyola [M]
August 1	St. Alphonsus Liguori [M]
August 4	St. John Vianney [M]
August 6	Transfiguration [F]
August 8	St. Dominic [M]
August 10	St. Lawrence, Deacon and Martyr [F]
August 11	St. Clare [M]
August 15	Assumption [S]
August 20	St. Bernard [M]
August 21	St. Pius X [M]
August 22	Queenship of Mary [M]
August 24	St. Bartholomew, Apostle [F]
August 27	St. Monica [M]
August 28	St. Augustine [M]
August 29	Beheading of John the Baptist [M]
September 3	St. Gregory the Great [M]
September 8	Birth of Mary [F]
September 9	St. Peter Claver (United States) [M]
September 13	St. John Chrysostom [M]
September 14	Triumph of the Cross [F]
September 15	Our Lady of Sorrows [M]
September 16	Sts. Cornelius and Cyprian [M]
September 21	St. Matthew, Apostle and Evangelist [F]
September 27	St. Vincent de Paul [M]
September 29	Michael, Gabriel, and Raphael, Archangels (also known as Michaelmas Day) [F]
September 30	St. Jerome [M]
October 1	St. Theresa of the Child Jesus (the Little Flower) [M]
October 2	Guardian Angels [M]
October 4	St. Francis of Assisi [M]
October 7	Our Lady of the Rosary [M]
October 15	St. Teresa of Ávila [M]
October 17	St. Ignatius of Antioch [M]
October 18	St. Luke, Evangelist [F]
October 19	Sts. Isaac Jogues and Jean de Brébeuf, and companions [M]
October 28	Sts. Simon and Jude, Apostles [F]
November 1	All Saints [S]
November 2	All Souls
November 4	St. Charles Borromeo [M]

November 9	Dedication of St. John Lateran [F]
November 10	St. Leo the Great [M]
November 11	St. Martin of Tours [M]
November 12	St. Josephat [M]
November 13	St. Frances Cabrini (United States) [M]
November 17	St. Elizabeth of Hungary [M]
November 21	Presentation of Mary [M]
November 22	St. Cecilia [M]
November 30	St. Andrew, Apostle [F]
December 3	St. Francis Xavier [M]
December 7	St. Ambrose [M]
December 8	Immaculate Conception [S]
December 12	Our Lady of Guadalupe (United States) [M]
December 13	St. Lucy [M]
December 14	St. John of the Cross [M]
December 25	Christmas [S]
December 26	St. Stephen, First Martyr [F]
December 27	St. John, Apostle and Evangelist [F]
December 28	Holy Innocents [F]

See also liturgical year.

liturgical commission, a diocesan body charged with assisting and advising the local bishop on liturgical matters. In the United States, the Federation of Diocesan Liturgical Commissions meets periodically to coordinate the research and activities of the local commissions. These liturgical commissions were mandated by the Second Vatican Council's Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (1963, nn. 44–46).

liturgical dance, rhythmical movements and steps set to dance forms to express embodied prayer in public worship. While gesture and movement have always been a part of the Roman liturgy, dance movement is of recent development, rooted in the desire to incorporate into the liturgy cultural elements that can validly express faith. Little has been done on the official level, except in The Missal for the Diocese of Zaire, which incorporates rhythmic movements and dance in the rite. Dance, like any other liturgical art form, has a ministerial function, i.e., the visible expression of the prayer of the assembly. If genuinely liturgical, it engages and expresses the entire human person and leads the assembly into the mystery celebrated; it should avoid the merely ostentatious, theatrical, and the purely entertaining.

liturgical language, a comprehensive term for both the verbal and nonverbal components of ritual acts or liturgical events. Broadly considered, liturgical language includes both words and deeds, metaphoric speech, and symbolic gesture. It is thus communicative, performative, and metaphorical.

The basic qualities of liturgical language are derived, first, from the fact that rituals are acts of communication (acts by which someone "says" something "to" someone "about" something; acts that transmit meanings and values through verbal and nonverbal codes). As communication, liturgical language should be intelligible and inclusive, capable of using human speech and gesture to put believers in touch with divine realities. (The sublimely sacred aspect of liturgical language derives not from some esoteric source, but from the conviction that ordinary human language can, through the power of metaphoric word and deed, disclose ultimate mystery.)

Secondly, liturgical language is performative. The words and deeds used in worship do not merely "describe," they do, perform, and enact. To borrow the traditional language of Catholic theology, liturgical language "accomplishes what it symbolizes" ("effects what it signifies"). When spouses vow love and fidelity to each other in the ritual of marriage, they really enact the nuptial covenant—they do not merely describe it. Pronouncing the vows actually marries the couple.

Thirdly, liturgical language is metaphorical. Following the strategy of all metaphor, liturgical speech creates conflict between two apparently irreconcilable fields of meaning (one literal, the other poetic), and so opens up fresh horizons of meaning and possibility that exceed the limits of literal or conceptual discourse. See also exclusive language; inclusive language. NATHAN D. MITCHELL liturgical law, the provisions of canon law pertaining to the structure and ordering of the liturgical life of the Church. Liturgical law strives for the harmonious unity of Christian worship within the churches. Not to be confused with rubricism (a slavish fidelity to the rules, or rubrics, of liturgical celebration), adherence to liturgical norms signals a concern to maintain the quality of liturgical rites as they express the faith of the entire Christian community. The sources for liturgical law are similar to those for canon law, though somewhat broader in scope and application. There are five sources for the liturgical ordinances: (1) the dogmatic decrees of Vatican Council II (1962–65), (2) the liturgical books themselves, (3) the Code of Canon Law, revised in 1983, (4) the Roman Curia, and (5) local custom and the regulations of the diocesan bishop.

The Decrees of Vatican II: The fundamental document currently directing and shaping the liturgical lives of Catholics today is the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, Sacrosanctum Concilium, promulgated on December 4, 1963. The norms and standards established by the council in this document, such as the ones regarding full and active participation or the adaptation of liturgical forms to bear the Christian message more clearly to a modern world, govern and color the interpretation of all subsequent norms and liturgical revision.

The Liturgical Books: The typical editions of liturgical rites and their authorized translations carry in themselves the force of law. Most liturgical rites begin with lengthy introductions called "praenotanda." The praenotanda outline the rite, its significance within Christian worship, who may celebrate it and under what circumstances. The praenotanda then describe the normative performance of the rite as well as any optional portions. Within the texts of rites themselves are found "rubrics," descriptions of gestures or actions which may or must accompany the rite.

The Code of Canon Law: Book Four of the Code of Canon Law (1983), "The Office of Sanctifying," covers the sacraments, other acts of divine worship, and "sacred times and places." Part One, on the sacraments, reiterates norms issued in the various liturgical books, but emphasizes the administrative aspects of the sacramental disciplines: e.g., who may or may not be married in the Church, how sacramental acts are to be recorded. Part Two covers remaining acts of public worship: sacramentals, the Liturgy of the Hours, funerals, veneration of saints, images, relics, and sacred vows. Part Three, regarding sacred times and places, establishes norms for ecclesiastical architecture, the ranking of churches, cathedrals, shrines, and basilicas, the regulation of cemeteries, feast days, and days of penance.

The Roman Curia: Although the supreme authority for the regulation of rites belongs to the pope and the college of bishops, the pope alone or through his curia can issue liturgical directives and official interpretations of liturgical norms. The Roman Curia publishes editions of the liturgical books and approves the translations of rites for local churches. Two Vatican congregations now regulate the liturgical life of the Catholic Church: the Congregation for the Oriental Churches regulates the liturgical life of the churches of the Eastern rites while the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments regulates the liturgy for the remainder of the Church.

Local Custom and the Episcopal Ordinary: The local ordinary (the bishop, apostolic vicar, or abbot) is the primary liturgist in any local church. To the ordinary is given the authority to oversee the liturgical life of the diocese. The ordinaries are the "custodians of the whole liturgical life of the church entrusted to them" (can. 835.1). Local custom and the ordinary determine when local observances take precedence over the calendar of the universal Church. Along with the liturgical commission of the diocese, the bishop may regulate such matters as liturgical music, liturgical art and architecture, the liturgical ministries of lector, ministers of the Eucharist, and servers. The local bishops in the United States have formed a conference of bishops, the National Conference of Catholic Bishops, which has its own Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy (BCL). The BCL assists the U.S. bishops in maintaining the unity of U.S. churches through studies of the liturgical life of parishes, the publication of periodical literature, and the preparation of U.S. editions of the liturgical books. Local parishes and religious communities may, within the limits allowed to them, observe liturgical events or prepare local calendars that reflect the genius and gifts of the particular community. Such events might include the anniversary of the dedication of a church, the observance of the patronal feasts, or the maintenance of a parish necrology. See also Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments; Congregation for the Oriental Churches; Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy.

JEFFREY T. VANDERWILT

liturgical movement, the period of growing interest in liturgy and liturgical reform that led up to the promulgation of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (1963) at Vatican II. Though considerable research into the history of liturgy was done in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and though a number of interesting reform initiatives were undertaken under the influence of the Jansenists and of the Enlightenment, the history of the liturgical movement is usually related in three phases, beginning in the first half of the nineteenth century.

Monastic Phase (1833–1903): The origins of the liturgical movement may be traced to the phenomenon known as "New Catholicism," which arose spontaneously in a number of European countries in response to the destruction wrought by the French Revolution, the Napoleonic wars, and the rise of secular states. In England, it was manifest in the Oxford movement and is associated especially with the name of E. B. Pusey (1800–82); in Denmark with N. S. F. Grundtvig (1783–1872); in Germany, with the Catholic theologian J. B. Möhler (1796–1838) and the Lutheran pastor Wilhelm Loehe (1837–72); and in France with the Benedictine Prosper Guéranger (1805–75). What all these figures had in common, and what inspired the beginnings of the liturgical movement, was the twofold conviction that, first, the source of all evils in the modern world was the eclipse of community by the rise of individualism; and that, second, the balance between individual and community could be restored by a return to past models.

Guéranger refounded the abbey of Solesmes in 1833 with the intention of countering the secularist spirit of the age with a living model (albeit monastic) of a community of believers devoted to worshiping God in the liturgy of the Church. It would edify visitors by the beauty and dignity of the services, and by the stability, regularity, and discipline of the offices. A wider public was reached by Guéranger through his publications, especially l'Année liturgique (Fr., "The Liturgical Year"), fifteen volumes of commentary on the feasts and seasons of the year, begun in 1841.

Guéranger's ideas found a fertile reception in Germany, where the abbey of Beuron was founded in 1867. From Beuron sprang the abbeys of Maredsous (1872) and Mont-César (1899) in Belgium and Maria Laach (1892) in Germany, which served not only to exemplify the splendors of the liturgy, but as centers of historical research and popular promotion of the liturgy. The historical scholarship of these abbeys succeeded in pushing past the medievalism of Guéranger's restoration to establish the patristic period as the model for liturgical renewal.

Pastoral and Theological Phase (1903–47): Although Pius X is generally credited with launching the twentieth-century liturgical movement, his motivations were more closely connected with the nineteenth century and with the desire to restore ecclesial and social life to the (idealized) medieval model in the face of the secularizing and anticlerical spirit of the age. It was precisely to rally the faithful against the spirit of the age that his initiatives regarding Gregorian chant (1903), frequent Communion (1905), earlier First Communion (1910), and a relaxed Eucharistic fast for the sick (1911) were taken. For Pius X, "active participation" in the liturgy, which he described as "the indispensable source of the authentic Christian spirit," had a social and political goal: the rallying of the Catholic faithful as a step toward an eventual restoration of a Catholic state.

For Lambert Beauduin (1873–1960), however, the goal of liturgical renewal was a recovery of the sense of the mystery of the Church. In 1909 he gave a famous address to the Eucharistic Congress at Malines and in the same year began a series of "liturgical weeks" for clergy. He also founded a periodical, La vie liturgique (Fr., "liturgical life"), known since 1911 as Quéstions liturgiques et paroissiales (Fr., "liturgical and parochical questions"), a title expressing the new constituency—the parish—to which the liturgical movement was turning.

Thus the Belgian abbeys began to promote a popular liturgical apostolate, a task in which they were joined, in Germany, by the Oratory at Leipzig and by the monks of Beuron and Maria Laach, and in Austria by Pius Parsch and the canons regular of Klosterneuberg, to mention only the best known.

At Maria Laach, particularly, the work of serious liturgical scholarship proceeded apace. Alongside historical studies, Maria Laach, under Abbot Herwegen, fostered a new development of liturgical theology. The way for this had already been prepared by J. B. Möhler's writings on patristic ecclesiology in the nineteenth century, but a new beginning was made with Odo Casel's patristic studies, focusing on the Kultmysterium, or the Paschal Mystery as realized in the sacramental liturgies of the Church. Casel's "mystery theology," together with the writings of Herwegen and Romano Guardini, a German diocesan priest-scholar, came to bring a new and deeper appreciation of the centrality of liturgy in the life of the Church.

In the United States, the liturgical movement was initiated by the German-speaking Benedictines of St. John's Abbey in Collegeville, Minnesota, most notably Virgil Michel. The American movement was more popular than scholarly, but its particular contribution, made under Michel's leadership, was to combine the liturgical movement with the social justice movement. While he did not share the reactionary social and political views of Guéranger and Pope Pius X, Michel very much shared their conviction that the liturgical movement was a means to awaken the baptized to a sense of their solidarity in Christ and to their responsibilities towards society at large.

The Reform Phase (1939–63): Under National Socialism, when the Church in Germany was largely confined to its sacramental ministry, many considered the liturgy to play an indispensable role in awakening and fostering a sense of Christian identity. The German bishops approved the liturgical movement as an apostolate to German Catholic youth, but not as a parochial apostolate. As a result, there were growing pressures for changes that would make the liturgy more effective, such as the restoration of the Easter Vigil and a wider use of the vernacular. At the same time many German bishops and clergy were suspicious of the movement and attempted to have it suppressed. Because the hierarchy of Greater Germany was divided, appeal was made to the new pope, Pius XII, to intervene. The result was the encyclicals Mystici Corporis (1943) and Mediator Dei (1947), which took the image of the Church as the Body of Christ as their starting point and offered a first formal endorsement (along with a series of warnings about excesses in theology and practice) of the liturgical developments since Pius X.

But while Pius XII's encyclicals ratified the work of the previous phase, a new phase had already begun. Previously the aim of the liturgical movement had been to bring the people to the liturgy. With the German pastoral-liturgical proposals for change and the growing sense in postwar Europe of the need for a new approach to pastoral work based on the liturgy, the aim now became to bring the liturgy to the people. Increasingly, the work of teaching people about the liturgy was accompanied by a list of desirable changes that would bring the liturgy closer to the people: reform of the calendar, and especially of Holy Week; breviary reform for the clergy; wider use of the vernacular; simplification of rubrics; a fuller presentation of liturgical symbols; Mass facing the people.

In 1943, the Centre de pastorale liturgique (Fr., "center for pastoral liturgy") was set up in Paris to coordinate efforts in France, while a German equivalent was established at Trier in 1947. These centers provided coordination not only for their own countries, but across national boundaries. International congresses brought liturgical scholars and promoters together annually from 1951 onward. With encouragement from Rome, where Pius XII had set up a secret commission in 1948 to advise him on the feasibility of a general reform of the liturgy, the agenda of liturgical reform, based on historical and theological research into the liturgy, gradually grew. Pius XII had himself begun to implement some of these changes with a series of reforms, including a new Latin psalter, permission for evening Mass, general relaxation of the eucharistic fast, bilingual rituals, and restoration of the Easter Vigil and of the Order of Holy Week.

With this third phase of the liturgical movement, the original goal of reanimating the faithful for reconstruction of the social order tended to be forgotten. The aims became those of deepening Christian life in the increasingly unchurched world of Catholic Europe and fostering ecumenism. Such, at least, were the goals set at the beginning of Vatican II's liturgy constitution (n.1) to guide the reforms that it would launch. Since these reforms had been thoroughly researched and discussed since World War II, the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy was the first document to be debated by the council. It was promulgated on December 4, 1963. See also Beauduin, Lambert; Benedictine order; Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy; Maria Laach; Mediator Dei; Michel, Virgil; Solesmes; worship.

Bibliography

Botte, Bernard. From Silence to Participation: An Insider's View of Liturgical Renewal. Washington, DC: Pastoral Press, 1988.

Franklin, R. W., and Robert Spaeth. Virgil Michel: American Catholic. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1988.

Koenker, Ernest B. The Liturgical Renaissance in the Roman Catholic Church. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1954. MARK SEARLE liturgical music, term now frequently used to designate the usually sung music integral to the Roman rites reformed by Vatican II (1962–65). Prior to the council, the generic term "sacred music," designating music that, by its inspiration, function, or use expresses a connection to faith, was the preferred phrase in universal Roman documents. Other designations include the term "church music," that is, music employed in worship by various Christian churches throughout history, and "religious music," referring to any music with a religious theme (e.g., popular "Christian rock," spirituals, Buddhist chants, etc.)

Church Teachings: Pope Pius X's 1903 motu proprio document entitled Tra le Sollicitudini called for the assembly's participation in worship's song (then, Gregorian chant), viewing music as an integral part of the liturgy. Asserting that music's primary role was to clothe the words of the liturgy, the document assigned the role of "handmaid of the liturgy" to sacred music.

Vatican II's Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy speaks of the "ministerial," rather than ancillary, function of music, which, intimately connected with liturgical action, can make prayer more pleasing or rites more solemn and promote unity among the congregants (n. 112). In keeping with the conciliar insistance on true participation in liturgical rites, the constitution encourages new compositions with "qualities proper to genuine sacred music" (n. 121) and musical indiginization (n. 119), while still encouraging the use of Gregorian chant, "specially suited to the Roman liturgy" (n. 116).

Musicam Sacram, the 1967 instruction, written to clarify previous documents and eliminate various perceived problems, defines music as sacred "insofar as it is composed for the celebration of divine worship and possesses integrity of form" (n. 4a). Sacred music embraces Gregorian chant, ancient and modern polyphony of various styles, instrumental music, and the "sacred, i.e., liturgical or religious, music of the people" (n. 4b). The instruction advocates singing at public eucharistic celebrations, especially on Sunday, and specifies "degrees of solemnity" for sung Masses. The first degree includes presider's prayers and greetings with their responses; the second degree adds the Kyrie, Gloria and Agnus Dei, Creed, and intercessions; the third enumerates entrance and Communion processionals, responsorial chant and alleluia, songs at the preparation of gifts, and the scriptural readings themselves (n. 28–30). The thrust of the document's directives can be described as "singing the liturgy," similar to the sung liturgies of many Eastern churches, where the liturgical texts themselves are sung or chanted.

By way of contrast, the 1972 document, "Music in Catholic Worship," a statement on music prepared by the U.S. Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy, offers guidelines to "foster interest with regard to music in the liturgy" (Intro.). Beginning with a "theology of celebration," the document then treats liturgical planning and the place of music in celebration, offering criteria for musical, liturgical, and pastoral judgments. The document considers the structure of the eucharistic rite and then applies stated principles. Avoiding specificity regarding "degrees of solemnity," it speaks of the importance of singing acclamations (Alleluia, Sanctus, Memorial Acclamation, Great Amen, Lord's Prayer, Doxology), processional songs (entrance and Communion), responsorial psalms, and chants of the ordinary, "now treated as individual choices" either spoken or sung (Kyrie, Gloria, Lord's Prayer, Lamb of God, Creed). Other songs for which there are no specified texts nor any requirement for a spoken or sung text are treated under "supplementary songs." The pastoral orientation and goal of establishing musical participation moves in the direction of highlighting congregational song, rather than the chants of the presider. See also Catholicism and music. JOHN A. MELLOH liturgical reform, the process of altering liturgical laws, customs, texts, and ceremonies, usually as a result of conciliar, papal, or local (episcopal) legislation. Prior to the fourth century, Christian liturgy was characterized by creativity, improvisation, and local variation. Since Church unity was not thought to depend upon rigid "uniformity," local customs—especially in the choice of liturgical prayers, Scripture readings, hymns and music—varied widely. Even an important text like the Eucharistic Prayer could be improvised according to the individual presider's abilities. Ministerial competence, shared faith, and respect for cultural diversity established the parameters within which early liturgies developed. Textual and ritual rigidity were not required.

History: From the fourth century on, this spirit of liturgical freedom led to a veritable revolution, during which the forms of Christian worship were creatively adapted to the cultural and religious traditions of the Greco-Roman world. Elements of secular court ceremonial were imported into the liturgy (e.g., the vesting of liturgical ministers; the use of lights and incense to honor persons or objects); the venue of worship shifted from homes or small buildings to large, public spaces like basilicas; secular festivals were "baptized" for Christian purposes (e.g., the winter feast of Sol Invictus [Lat., "Unconquered Sun"] was absorbed into the festival of Christmas). In short, Christian liturgy was routinely reformed by a process of creative cultural adaptation through which both liturgy and culture were enriched and infused with fresh ideas.

In time, this process took on a more "official" character, as popes like Gregory I (d. 604) worked to reorganize the liturgy of the Roman church following the collapse of the empire and the expansion of Christianity into northern and central Europe. Reformers like Gregory, however, respected local custom and permitted liturgical variation in jurisdictions outside their own, so long as no essential matters of faith were jeopardized.

Historically, however, liturgical reform has not been a one-way street. The Roman liturgy has not only been a source of reform, it has also been an object of reform, as it was in the eighth to the tenth centuries, when Franco-Germanic adaptations reshaped the Roman rite (which Charlemagne had imported into his empire). Indeed, these inculturated Franco-Germanic elements (evident especially in the liturgies of Holy Week, baptism, and ordination) eventually made their way back to Rome, where they influenced the liturgy of the papal court and helped shape the "modern" Roman rite.

The Roman liturgy of today is itself the result of four major reform movements: those of Pope Gregory VII (1073–85); Pope Innocent III (1198–1216); the Council of Trent (1545–63); and Vatican Council II (1962–65). All these movements shared a common goal: to renew worship by returning to its ancient biblical and patristic sources. Gregory, Innocent, and Trent sought to accomplish this renewal by eliminating cultural or ethnic diversity and by bringing worship in European churches under strictly centralized Roman control. By contrast, Vatican II's Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (1963, nn. 37–40) recognizes that worship must be adapted to the varying temperaments and traditions of peoples. See also inculturation; liturgical movement.

NATHAN D. MITCHELL

liturgical seasons. See liturgical year.

liturgical year, the annual cycle of seasons and feasts that celebrates the Paschal Mystery (Christ's life, death, Resurrection and Ascension). The unfolding of the entire Christian story makes its power available once again in each retelling.

The smallest unit of the liturgical year is the liturgical day, made holy through the Eucharist and the Liturgy of the Hours. Liturgical days are divided into four degrees of celebration: solemnities, feasts, obligatory memorials, and optional memorials. The source and center of the liturgical year is the Paschal Mystery, which the Church celebrates every day but most especially on the first day of the week known as the Lord's Day or Sunday, the first of all holy days.

Easter Cycle: Easter Sunday is the first of all Sundays and has its own octave. The Easter season extends fifty days beyond Easter Sunday to Pentecost Sunday, the "fiftieth day," when the Church remembers the sending of the Holy Spirit and the commission to preach and evangelize all nations. To prepare for the Easter Vigil and Easter Sunday, the Easter Triduum is a sacred period of three days beginning with the evening Mass of the Lord's Supper on Holy Thursday, climaxing at the Easter Vigil and closing with Evening Prayer on Easter Sunday. It is considered the culmination of the entire liturgical year. The Easter fast is observed everywhere on Good Friday and on Holy Saturday, if possible, until the Easter Vigil, the mother of vigils in which the Church celebrates Christ's life, death, and Resurrection in the sacraments of initiation: Baptism, Confirmation, and Eucharist. A forty-day period of preparation for the celebration of the sacred Triduum and the Easter cycle, known as the season of Lent, begins on Ash Wednesday and ends on Holy Thursday. Baptismal and penitential themes are woven through the lectionary, the presidential prayers at Eucharist, and the Liturgy of the Hours.

Christmas Cycle: In a similar way, the annual commemoration of Christ's birth on December 25, second only to Easter, has its own octave and cycle of feasts following that date, as well as a time of preparation before it. The Christmas cycle runs from Christmas Eve to the Sunday after Epiphany or after January 6 if Epiphany is transferred to a Sunday (as in the United States). To prepare for Christmas and its cycle, the season of Advent, beginning on the fourth Sunday before December 25, is observed primarily in a spirit of joyful expectancy and hope with its penitential character remaining secondary. The first weeks of Advent look to Christ's second coming in glory on the last day; December 17–24 focus on the immediate preparation for his birth in Bethlehem.

Ordinary Time: The Easter and Christmas cycles of feasts, with their times of preparation and their festal endings, are the two supporting pillars of the liturgical year. Outside the limits of these two cycles of feasts are thirty-three or thirty-four neutral weeks known as Ordinary Time or Time of the Year, which extends from the Monday after the feast of the Baptism of the Lord to and including the Tuesday before Ash Wednesday. Ordinary Time resumes on Monday after Pentecost and ends before Evening Prayer on the Saturday before the first Sunday of Advent. During Ordinary Time, the fullness of Christ's mystery is celebrated in all its aspects. Two cycles of feasts (Easter and Christmas), together with Ordinary Time and other solemnities and feasts of the Lord, are also known as the Temporal Cycle or Proper of Time, which is always privileged over other solemnities, feasts, and memorials. The last Sunday of the year escalates to the Solemnity of Christ the King, which anticipates the fulfillment of all time when Christ will be all in all.

As the yearly cycle unfolds the Paschal Mystery of Christ, it also attends to the anniversaries of the saints, holy men and women who continue to serve as models for gospel living. The Sanctoral Cycle, or Proper of Saints, honors the memory of Mary, the martyrs, and other saints while always reaffirming the centrality of the mysteries of Christ in the celebration of their lives. See also liturgical calendar; Paschal Mystery; worship. DANIEL P. GRIGASSY liturgy (li'tur-jee; Gk., leitourgia, "work of the public"), the public and official prayers and rites of the Church. The term signifies that worship is an activity of the whole Church, laity and clergy alike. Liturgical worship is a corporate gesture of praise, neither originating in nor directed toward any one individual person or group. Instead, it finds its source and goal in the common glorification of God whose saving works are accorded universal significance. See also worship.

Liturgikon (Gk., "liturgical [book]"), a Hieratikon or Byzantine-rite liturgical book containing the deacon's and priest's parts for Eucharist, Vespers, and Matins. See also sacramentary.

liturgy, theology of, a systematic reflection on the process and components of worship given to God by a community gathered in Christ's name and by the power of the Holy Spirit. A theology of liturgy is distinguished from the theology of sacraments by its larger concerns, that is, not only about sacraments but also about any worship offered in the Church's name (e.g., the office of psalms, readings and prayers that individuals and communities pray).

Elements: The theology of liturgy begins with an examination of the celebrations of worship (praxis) rather than theories about these celebrations. This follows the actual history of worship in the first Christian communities: they prayed, baptized, and celebrated the Eucharist together before they reflected on the meaning of what they were doing. This preference for praxis is also a reminder that it is God's action in the community through the Holy Spirit that enables the community to have honest worship. Furthermore, authentic worship always leads to true doctrine. A second point is the contribution of the human sciences to this theology. Since worship is done by human beings who are shaped and affected by their familial and educational background and their cultural and historical heritage, the theology of liturgy must take into account the research and findings of such disciplines as anthropology, sociology, and psychology. These disciplines continue to probe, for example, the honest and dishonest use of rituals by communities and individuals, the ways in which communities renew themselves through ritual, and the cultural forces in a society that can aid or obstruct worship.

Theology and Worship: A Catholic theology of liturgy gives great importance to the connections between the gathered church community and its worship. The human sciences reinforce this concern by pointing to the ways in which community is shaped by cultural and societal rituals. The Church discovers its essential doctrine and its mission to the world in the actions and prayers of worship. Liturgy also speaks of God's nature, which is revealed, above all, in the ways in which God has freely chosen to save humankind. Liturgy is a grateful response for God's saving work in Christ's death on the cross and much more. A theology of liturgy learns about this redeeming God especially on the feasts of the Holy Trinity, of Christ, and of the Holy Spirit and in the celebration of the sacraments. Liturgical theology also acknowledges that worship is only possible because God is present. This theology studies the ways in which Christ is present in the Eucharist, in the person of the presiding minister, in the prayers and songs, in the readings of Scripture, and in the worshiping assembly itself.

The liturgical year also provides a rich source of reflection on God's gift of time, and its purposes. Liturgical theology studies how worship helps Christians to be aware of how God saves in time and to understand the meaning of the end of time. Finally, liturgical theology examines the nature of a full, conscious, and active participation by the whole community in God's praise and how this can be facilitated in particular cultures and situations. See also liturgy; worship. REGIS A. DUFFY

Liturgy of Addai and Mari (ah-dī; mah'ree), the earliest Syriac anaphora (central prayer of the eucharistic liturgy), which is one of the oldest and most studied eucharistic prayers. Its clear Semitic stamp reflects the ethos of early Judeo-Christianity uninfluenced by the Hellenic Christian culture of the Roman Empire. It follows the East Syrian anaphoral structure, which orders the components thus: divine praise, Sanctus, intercessions, epiclesis (the prayer calling down the Holy Spirit)—with no Words of Institution ("This is my body, this is my blood"). This presumed lacuna has provoked an enormous literature with as yet no universally accepted solution to the ongoing debate. See also anaphora.

Liturgy of St. Basil, one of the two eucharistic formularies of the Byzantine rite, along with the Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom. Once used frequently, it is now celebrated only on Sundays in Lent, the feast of St. Basil (January 1), Holy Thursday, Holy Saturday, and the vigils of some major feasts. Its long and beautiful anaphora (eucharistic prayer), which served as the model for the Roman Fourth Eucharistic Prayer (there are four Eucharistic Prayers available as options for the presider in the Mass of the Roman rite), is characterized by its lengthy narration of salvation history and by a highly developed trinitarian theology. In addition to the Byzantine edition of the Basil anaphora there is also a more ancient and shorter Egyptian edition, often called "Egyptian Basil," extant in both Greek and Sahidic. But the Basil anaphora is an Antiochene, not an Egyptian-type prayer, so the Egyptians probably borrowed it from the churches in Cappadocia, modern-day Turkey. Though scholarly opinion varies, it is agreed that the longer edition of the Basil anaphora is an expansion of the shorter, that the prayer mirrors the ideas and style of Basil the Great (d. 279), and that he wrote one, or the other, or both redactions. At any rate, scholars long ago disproved the popular legend that Basil composed his liturgy by abbreviating the Liturgy of St. James. There are variant versions of the Basil anaphora in several Oriental languages. See also anaphora; Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom.

Liturgy of St. James, the ancient Greek eucharistic liturgy of the no-longer extant Jerusalem rite, a fragment of which is cited by Eusebius of Caesarea ca. 317–25. Contrary to popular legend, the extant Greek edition of James, heavily byzantinized even in its earliest ninth-century manuscript, is in no way one of the most ancient representatives of the apostolic liturgy. The liturgy is still used occasionally in the Byzantine rite. There are widely variant editions of the James liturgy in several Oriental languages. The Syriac edition forms the basis for the West Syrian eucharistic structure. See also Jerusalem rite.

Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom, main Eucharist formulary of the Byzantine rite and the most widely used Eastern eucharistic liturgy. It follows the same structure as the Byzantine Liturgy of St. Basil, though the text differs. The Chrysostom anaphora (central eucharistic prayer) has primitive traits that are certainly older than the saint of that name, and computer analysis of the text has demonstrated with a high degree of probability that John Chrysostom, a priest at Antioch until he became bishop of Constantinople (398–404), took the Antiochene Anaphora of the Apostles and expanded its text via the addition of certain theological elaborations to create the anaphora that now bears his name. But there is no basis for attributing the other prayers of this liturgy him. Though the Chrysostom anaphora is a relatively short, even austere prayer of great antiquity, without the exaggerated rhetorical devices of some later Greek prayers, it is a text of great beauty and symmetry, replete with features characteristic of classical prose style. Its anaphoral structure follows the Antiochene order of praise, Sanctus ("Holy, holy, holy"), narration of salvation with the Words of Institution ("This is my body . . . This is my blood"), anamnesis (prayer commemorative of the Passion, death, and Resurrection of Jesus), oblation (prayer of offering), epiclesis (prayer calling down the Holy Spirit), intercessions. Notable is the absence of the "command to repeat" ("Do this in memory of me") before the anamnesis.

There is also a variant Armenian edition of the Chrysostom liturgy. See also anaphora; Liturgy of St. Basil.

Liturgy of St. Mark, the native Egyptian anaphora, or eucharistic prayer, attributed in Greek to St. Mark, in Coptic to St. Cyril of Alexandria. It has the traditional characteristics of the fully developed Egyptian anaphora, with double epiclesis, intercessions before the Sanctus ("Holy, holy, holy"), Sanctus without Benedictus ("Blessed is He who comes in the name of the Lord"), with the components ordered as follows: praise, intercessions, Sanctus, epiclesis I (prayer calling down the Holy Spirit), narration and Words of Institution, ("This is my body ... This is my blood"), epiclesis II. Greek fragments of the text are extant from the fourth and fifth centuries. See also anaphora.

Liturgy of the Eucharist, name for the whole Mass, i.e., the celebration of praise and thanksgiving for God's gift of salvation achieved through the death and Resurrection of Christ, as well as for the second main part of the Mass, including the people's offering, the Eucharistic Prayer, and the Communion rite. In the early Church the Eucharist took place within a meal, as at the Last Supper. By Paul's time, a meal preceded the Eucharist in some places. Second-century descriptions of this liturgy note the reading of Scripture and the offering of bread and wine by the people, followed by an improvised prayer of thanksgiving (Gk., eucharistia) to God for Christ's self-gift on the cross. The structure of the Roman Catholic Eucharist today is: introductory rite (including the penitential rite), readings and prayers, homily, intercessory prayers, Creed (on Sundays and major feasts), presentation of the gifts, Eucharistic Prayer, Communion rite, dismissal. See also Eucharist; Mass.

Liturgy of the Hours, the public prayer of the Church for praising God and sanctifying the day. It is also known as the Divine Office. It consists of an Office of Readings, Morning and Evening Prayer, Daytime Prayer, and Night Prayer.

Daily Prayer in the NT and Early Church: The daily gatherings of Christians for public prayer has a rich historical foundation in the NT. Jesus was said to attend to the communal prayer of the synagogue (Luke 4:16). He commanded prayer to the disciples (Matt 5:44, Mark 13:33, Luke 6:28, 18:1) and gave them a model from which to fulfill that command (Matt 6:9–13, Luke 11:2–4). According to the Acts, the apostles gathered in daily and in "constant" prayer (Acts 2:46, 20:36–38, 21:5). Until persecution prevented them, they attended the daily worship of the Jerusalem Temple (Acts 3:1). Paul exhorted fellow Christians to "pray without ceasing" (1 Thess 5:16–18, Eph 6:18). From the third century, evidence suggests that Christians gathered regularly in the morning and evening for daily services. According to Tertullian (North Africa, early third century) these daily gatherings were supplemented by prayers made in private to mark the passage of the day: at rising, at the third, sixth, and ninth hours, upon retiring and, interrupting sleep, during the night. These various hours of prayer came to signify events within the life of Christ.

Therefore, according to the Apostolic Tradition, the third, sixth, and ninth hours signified the hours of Christ's Passion. According to Tertullian, prayer at night (the vigil) disciplined Christians for the Second Coming of Christ, who, it was said, would come "as a thief in the night." Morning and evening prayer also presented Christ to the believer. He who is "Light of World" was seen to rise with the sun and to illumine the darkness of the night of sin with "the splendor of his radiant face."

Daily Prayer in the West: The history of Christian prayer from the fourth century is a history of conflicting tendencies: the pious attempt to honor the injunction to pray duly circumscribed by the demands of the anatomical and social bodies, their needs for commerce and material sustenance. This conflict is evident in the divergence between two historical types of daily prayer, conveniently called "cathedral" and "monastic."

Monastic styles of daily prayer are marked by the following characteristics: a relatively larger number of offices prayed in common, an increase in the number of different psalms sung during any given office, all-night vigils and a greater variety in the texts sung during the weekly cycle. For example, the Office of St. Benedict included the entire Psalter in each weekly round of prayer. In some Egyptian communities of the fourth century, the anchorites (monks) were said to recite 150 psalms each day from memory.

By contrast, the majority of Christians, even during the "Golden Age" of monasticism (the fourth and fifth centuries), lived in cities and attended to daily commercial pursuits. For these Christians, the cathedral forms of prayer were more suitable.

Cathedral offices were shorter, included fewer, if any, psalms, and the psalms that were included varied little from day to day. The chief hours were Morning and Evening Prayer. Night vigils preceded major feasts and Sundays. Nonbiblical songs (such as the Roman office hymns attributed to Ambrose) became quite popular. The cathedral offices concluded with litanies and the benediction of the bishop.

The history of daily prayer in the West is finally a history of the conflation of these two types. During the Middle Ages the number of hours became set at the following: Vespers, Compline, Matins, Lauds, Prime, Terce, Sext, and None. The central act of each hour was the chanting of psalmody (as many as twelve psalms during Lauds). Vespers, Compline and Lauds each came to be associated with a proper gospel canticle: the Magnificat, Nunc Dimittis, and Benedictus respectively. The Te Deum was sung at Matins on high feast days. Most hours were preceded by a hymn. Between the psalms and the reading from Scripture (or hagiographic writings), some of the most elaborate and difficult of the Gregorian chants, the responsories, were sung. The Office in the West, because of its length and difficulty and because of its enactment in Latin (even while the vernacular languages were emerging), came less and less to interest the laity. The Hours came to be seen as the preserve of clerical professionals, the typifying activity of either the monks and nuns or the canons and choirs, i.e., clergy attached to the cathedral specifically for the purpose of maintaining the daily prayer.

Two developments further fortified the clerical nature of the Office. The twelfth-century invention by the mendicant friars of the breviary as a distinct liturgical book permitted the Office to be recited in private and according to the convenience of the priest, who rarely observed the hours at their given times. The French prelate, Cardinal Richelieu (1585–1642), prime minister of the court of King Louis XIII, boasted that he could dispose of the Office in one sitting every other day. He read the first day's office from eleven at night until midnight; the second day's from midnight until retiring. The laity preferred not to leave prayer in the hands of clergy alone. Such as they could, and with the assistance of concerned pastors, various devotions, including condensed versions of the breviary, were offered to the laity. For example, the most popular Catholic devotion, the Rosary with its fifteen decades of prayers, was at origin a self-conscious abbreviation of the Psalter with its 150 psalms.

Daily Prayer since Vatican II: The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (Sacrosanctum Concilium) addressed the reform of the Liturgy of the Hours. The council (1962–65) decreed: (1) The Hours were to be observed at their proper times. (2) Vespers (Evening Prayer) and Lauds (Morning Prayer) "are the two hinges on which the daily Office turns." Despite the mixed metaphor, they are to be seen as the "chief hours of prayer." (3) Compline is to "mark the close of the day." (4) Matins is to become a "floating hour." Renamed the Office of Readings, it may be observed at any time of day. (5) The hour of Prime is no longer to be observed. (6) Of the three minor hours, Terce, Sext, and None, "outside of choir" only one need be observed (as Daytime Prayer). (7) Pastors are to see that at least some portion of the Hours is observed in their parishes. The council suggested that Sunday Vespers might be celebrated in parishes. Since the reform of the breviary, the Liturgy of the Hours now also exhibits the following features: (1) The Psalter is distributed over three weeks instead of just one; (2) the lectionary has been expanded; (3) the Liturgies of the Hours may be officially observed by any gathering of Christians, whether or not a priest or deacon is present; and (4) the Offices generally follow this structure: hymn, two psalms, and a canticle (OT at Morning Prayer; NT at Evening Prayer); each psalm may be concluded with a prayer. A proper responsory follows the Scripture lesson. The Gospel canticle is sung (Benedictus or Magnificat). The Office concludes with intercessions, the Lord's Prayer, concluding collect and benediction. Morning Prayer may begin with the Invitatory Psalm, Ps 95, should it be the first liturgical service of the day. Compline (Night Prayer) consists of a hymn, one psalm, a short reading, response, Nunc Dimittis, prayer, and blessing. The remaining hours were similarly streamlined.

The Liturgy of the Hours, when properly prayed and celebrated, nurtures the deeper intuitions that the value of incessant prayer instills: the sacramentality of time and the joyful expectation of the establishment of God's dominion among humankind. The Liturgy of the Hours also inspire among Christians the performance of daily deeds of charity and justice. Finally, the practice of daily prayer in the company of others delivers Christians from the need to devise ways to express their own needs and desires to God. Alternatively and at its best, the public prayer of the Church delivers humanity to a God who calls people out of themselves and into the mystery of infinite love. See also breviary; liturgy; prayer; worship.

Bibliography

Campbell, S. "Liturgy of the Hours." In Peter Fink, New Dictionary of Sacramental Worship. Collegeville, MN: Glazier, 1987.

Jones, C., G. Wainwright, E. Yarnold, and P. Bradshaw. "The Divine Office." In The Study of Liturgy. 2d ed. London: Oxford, 1992.

JEFFREY T. VANDERWILT

Liturgy of the Word, that part of the Mass from the first reading until the Prayer of the Faithful. Liturgies of the Word, even when abbreviated, typically precede the celebration of all sacraments and sacramental blessings, e.g., weddings, funerals, baptisms, blessings of objects or persons. Not merely the public reading of ancient texts, the Liturgy of the Word is described as one of four focal points for the presence of Christ to the Church (Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, n. 7). Along with his presence in the Eucharist, in the worshiping assembly, and in the person of the priest, Christ is understood by Catholics to be present also through the proclamation of God's word. That word is understood to be preeminently, but not entirely limited to, the Scriptures. God's word is also discerned in the words preached to and received by the assembly and in the Prayers of the Faithful, a proclamation and rehearsal of the Church's concern for others. The Liturgy of the Word during the Mass on Sundays and solemnities includes a reading from the OT, the singing of a portion of a psalm, a reading from one of the Letters of Paul or the book of Revelation, a Gospel acclamation and the Gospel lesson. The lessons, so-called, are followed by the homily, the Creed, and the Prayer of the Faithful. On weekdays there are two readings, first from either the OT or NT, and a psalm is sung. The Gospel acclamation and the Gospel follow. On weekdays the homily may be shortened, and the Creed is omitted, though the Prayer of the Faithful is retained. The readings for Mass are found in the lectionary, the published compendium of Scripture texts assigned to each day and feast of the liturgical year. The Entrance rite is often considered part of the Liturgy of the Word. The Liturgy of the Word is separable from the Liturgy of the Eucharist and may be observed independently. See also Eucharist; Liturgy of the Eucharist. JEFFREY T. VANDERWILT local church, the Body of Christ in a particular place, that is, a parish, a diocese, a region, or a nation, also known in canon law as a particular church. Before Vatican II (1962–65) local churches were viewed as administrative divisions (dioceses) and subdivisions (parishes) of the Church universal. The council corrected this overemphasis on the Church universal at the expense of the local church: "This Church of Christ is truly present in all legitimate local congregations of the faithful which, united with their pastors, are themselves called churches in the New Testament. For in their own locality these are the new people called by God, in the Holy Spirit and in much fullness" (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 26).

In the beginning the church of Jerusalem was the whole Church. The notion of local church developed as the Church moved to other communities (1 Cor 1:2; 16:1, 19) and to smaller communities within these urban centers. One example was the so-called house church (Acts 2:46; 12:12; 1 Cor 16:19; Col 4:15), in which the local Christian community gathered for the Eucharist (1 Cor 11:18–21). Eventually the Church adopted the political framework employed by the Roman Empire, dividing itself into dioceses, provinces, and the like.

In the Code of Canon Law particular churches are "first of all" dioceses (can. 368). Other examples include a territorial prelature or abbacy (can. 370) and an apostolic vicariate or prefecture (can. 371). Particular churches are also grouped into provinces and regions (cans. 431–59). The code refers to a parish as "a definite community of the Christian faithful established on a stable basis within a particular church" (can. 515). See also diocese; parish; prelature, territorial. RICHARD P. MCBRIEN local ordinary, title for an individual who holds one of a certain class of offices within the Church. Although in common parlance the term often refers to the bishop of a diocese, canon law includes a greater number of officeholders under this title. Canon 134 gives a taxative list. The term includes the pope, diocesan bishops, vicars general and episcopal vicars of a diocese, and those in charge of groups legally equivalent to a diocese (e.g., a vicariate apostolic).

The law frequently uses the term "local ordinary" and reserves certain powers to those who hold an office so designated. All of these officeholders have executive power of governance. See also ordinary.

logia (sing., logion, Gk., "short sayings"), a term used to describe brief statements of Jesus, proverbs, or pronouncements (e.g., Mark 2:17, 27; Luke 19:10), in contrast to longer parables and discourses.

Logos (Gk., "word," "speech," "reason"), according to Heraclitus, the rational principle that governs the universe and, according to Plato, the transcendent source (also called the nous) of the rational principles that shape creation. In the OT, the Logos is personified wisdom who is manifest in creation (Prov 8:1–36; Wis 7:22–30; 9:1–2). The Platonists of Alexandria conceived of the Logos as the divine intermediary between God and the world. Integrating these views, Philo (20 B.C.–A.D. 50) spoke of the Logos as the divine intention operating at the heart of creation. It is the power of creation and the means through which we know God. In John's Gospel, the Logos is neither a rational principle nor an intermediary agent, but God's preexisting Word who formed creation and became flesh in Jesus Christ (John 1:1–14). The early Church writers Ignatius of Antioch, Justin Martyr, Clement of Alexandria, and Athanasius employed the notion of Logos to shed light on the mystery of God's self-revelation in Jesus Christ. But, as Irenaeus warned, logos-language can be pushed into Gnosticism. See also Christology; Incarnation, the.

Loisy, Alfred (lwah-see'), 1857–1940, French biblical scholar and Modernist. He attempted to construct an apologetic response to the concerns of his time. Making a sharp distinction between the material and supernatural worlds, he denied that dogmas have any correspondence with the realities that they attempt to express. Advocating critical biblical exegesis, he proposed that the Bible be interpreted as any other historical document rather than as a privileged expression of faith. His teachings seemed to be the object of condemnation in Pope Pius X's encyclical Pascendi in 1907; he was excommunicated in 1908. If his positions were extreme, they anticipated later theological developments concerning revelation, Scripture, and the development of doctrine. See also Modernism.

Lollards, adherents of a medieval English heresy (Lollardy) initiated by John Wycliffe (d. 1384). The derivation of the name is unclear. It may have come from Middle Dutch, lollen or lullen, "to mumble." In any case, it was intended as a term of opprobrium, to mean, for example, "mumblers of prayers." After the execution of Sir John Oldcastle (1417), it became a lower-class movement. The Lollards criticized the corruption of the clergy, rejected Catholic sacraments and the cult of the saints, and emphasized preaching and reading Scripture, which they translated into English. See also Wycliffe, John.

Lombard, Peter, ca. 1100–60, theologian, also known as the Lombard, and as the Master of the Sentences. Born in Lombardy (northern Italy), Peter studied theology in France, at Reims, St. Victor, and Notre Dame in Paris (ca. 1134). He remained in Paris teaching theology at Notre Dame, and in 1144 or 1145 he became canon of the cathedral. By 1156, Peter was archdeacon of Paris, and was elected bishop of the city in 1159.

The Lombard's historical significance is due to the extraordinary influence he exerted on the development of theology as a science. He wrote many sermons, an early gloss on the Psalms (ca. 1138), and a Pauline commentary (1134–41). In 1147 and 1148, he participated in two ecclesial investigations of Gilbert of Poitiers. By 1157–58, Peter completed the final draft of a four-volume collection of Sentences, a text that provided students and teachers of theology with a systematic and comprehensive overview of Christian doctrine that was brief, timely, and accessible. The format, method, and questions or distinctions of the Sentences shaped theological discussion for centuries: book 1 examines the Trinity; book 2 considers creation, grace, and sin; book 3 presents the Incarnation, redemption, and virtue; and book 4 covers the sacraments and eschatology. From the early thirteenth century to the middle of the seventeenth century, students of theology were required to comment on all or part of this text. Once integrated into the curriculum, the Sentences soon became a primary focus of theological study, second only to the Bible. See also Scholasticism; theology.

Lombards, Germanic tribe that invaded northern Italy in 568, establishing a kingdom centered around Pavia. Expanding southward, the kingdom reached its peak in the eighth century. When the Lombards threatened Rome in 772, Charlemagne intervened and seized the Lombard crown. A Lombard state survived in Benevento until the eleventh century.

Lonergan, Bernard J. F., 1904–84, Jesuit philosopher and theologian. Canadian born, he entered the Society of Jesus in 1922 and was ordained in 1936. He received his doctorate in theology at the Gregorian University in Rome in 1936 and taught there from 1953 until 1965 when he returned to Regis College, Toronto. He was Chauncey Stillman Professor of Roman Catholic Studies at Harvard Divinity School, 1971–72, and taught at Boston College from 1975 until 1983. He returned to Canada and died the next year.

Influence of Augustine and Aquinas: His work was dedicated to an ever more adequate understanding of both human intelligence and the mysteries of Christian faith. His Grace and Freedom: Operative Grace in the Thought of St. Thomas Aquinas (1971) traced the developments of speculative theology on grace from Augustine to Aquinas, set out the terms and relations in the notion of operative and cooperative grace, and presented an as yet unsurpassed analysis of Aquinas's theories of causation, operation, divine transcendence, and human liberty.

From Augustine, Lonergan learned that Christian conversion to Jesus Christ as Lord involves intellectual and moral dimensions, as well as the religious dimension. He reflected on Augustine's narratives of his intellectual conversion to the truth, moral conversion to goodness, and religious conversion to God revealed in Christ Jesus (Confessions 8–9). For Lonergan this threefold conversion process of Augustine becomes in Aquinas the basis for the intellectual, moral, and theological virtues (Summa Theologiae 1–2. 55–67; 2–2. 1–170). To understand the systematic breakthrough in the theology of Aquinas, Lonergan realized that he had to reach up to the mind of Aquinas by undergoing himself what he would later term "intellectual conversion."

Lonergan's Verbum: Word and Idea in Aquinas (1967) sets out the basic terms and relations operative in the cognitional theory of Aquinas and also shows how those terms and relations are derived from the human experiences of questioning, understanding, and judging. Insight into images generates understanding and this understanding expresses itself in concepts. Human understanding is not content with mere thinking. People want to know what is really true, so questions of truth emerge, and only when they grasp the sufficiency of the evidence do they reach judgment of truth or falsity. Lonergan shows that what Aquinas terms "the light of active intellect as a created participation in divine light" is, in fact, the human capacity to raise even more questions. As Augustine saw that human hearts are restless until they rest in God, so for Aquinas human minds are restless until they rest in God.

Insight and Method: Insight: A Study of Human Understanding (1957) transposes the cognitional theory Lonergan learned from Aquinas into contemporary contexts. The book is an invitation to the reader to appropriate his or her own conscious acts of experiencing, understanding, judging, and deciding. The first part sets out insight as activity, showing how attention to acts of understanding enables the reader with Lonergan to correlate methods of the natural and human sciences in such a way as to arrive at an understanding of a coherent and open worldview designated as "emergent probability." The second part builds on the reader's own self-appropriation as a knower, showing how genetic and dialectical methods operate in a cognitionally grounded metaphysics, ethics, and natural theology. Insight demonstrates how human understanding does, in fact, consist in related and recurrent operations, and that failure to attend to and understand those operations has led to the dialectical contradictions in modern cultures, philosophies, and theologies. The program of the book is succinctly stated by Lonergan: "Thoroughly understand what it is to understand, and not only will you understand the broad lines of all there is to be understood, but also you will possess a fixed base, an invariant pattern, opening upon all further developments of understanding" (Insight, p. xxviii).

Reason and faith, as Lonergan learned from Aquinas, are intrinsically related. From his discoveries in Insight Lonergan advanced to Method in Theology (1972), in which he shows that his notion of transcendental method can restructure how theology is done. Transcendental method is neither Cartesian nor Kantian but involves sets of related and recurrent operations of understanding and acting yielding cumulative and progressive results. After treating the human good, meaning, and religion, the book develops the notion of functional specialties in theology. There are three types of specialties: (1) Field specialties continually divide and subdivide the fields of data to be investigated, as when biblical, patristic, medieval, and Reformation fields become genera to be ever further subdivided. (2) Subject specialties classify the results of the investigations in order to teach those results, as when departments are separated into areas such as Hebrew history, early Christian antiquities, Christian theology, ethics, etc. (3) Functional specialties differentiate the successive stages in the process from data to results.

Lonergan's writings in whole or in part have been translated into all the European languages as well as several Asian ones. There are ten Lonergan research centers in North America, South America, Europe, Australia, and the Philippines. The Lonergan Research Institute in Toronto publishes a regular newsletter and directs the publication of his Collected Works by the University of Toronto Press in twenty-two volumes. Almost three hundred dissertations have been written on Lonergan's thought and methods, with more than a third published in whole or in part. Two journals are devoted to advancing Lonergan's method: Method: A Journal of Lonergan Studies and Lonergan Workshop, published by the Lonergan Institute at Boston College. See also philosophy and theology; theology

Bibliography

Crowe, Frederick E. Lonergan. Collegeville, MN.: Liturgical Press, 1992.

Lonergan, Bernard J. F. Insight: A Study of Human Understanding. 5th rev. ed. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1992.

———. Method in Theology New York: Herder and Herder, 1972.

MATTHEW L. LAMB

Longinqua Oceani (lawn-jink'kwuh oh-shee-ahn'ee), Pope Leo XIII's apostolic letter of January 6, 1895, to the U.S. Catholic Church. The pope said he completed the work of the Third Plenary Council (1884) by appointing an apostolic delegate in 1893. Acknowledging the growth of the Church in the United States, he regretted its lack of public patronage and warned against idealizing the U.S. separation of Church and state. See also Americanism; Church and state; United States of America, Catholicism in the.

Lopez, Gregory, 1611–91, first native Chinese Catholic bishop. A Dominican, he was ordained a priest in 1656 and consecrated a bishop in 1685; he was promoted to the new diocese of Nanking but died before taking office.

Lopez y Vicuña, St. Vicenta Maria, 1847–96, Spanish-born founder of the Daughters of Mary Immaculate for Domestic Service, a congregation dedicated to helping young working women. Feast day: December 26.

Lord, English translation of several Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek terms denoting a human or deity with power or authority. The most important term in Hebrew is 'ādôn, "lord, master, owner." In the OT it most frequently denotes a human master except for the specific form 'ādōnāi, which is almost exclusively reserved for divine lordship. The meaning of 'ādōnāi is disputed: some think it means "my Lord" while others contend for "Lord of all." It is frequently juxtaposed with the much more common Tetragrammaton (yhwh), the four consonants conventionally vocalized as "Yahweh" and translated as "LORD." In tandem the two terms are rendered as "Lord GOD," "Lord" for 'ādōnāi and "GOD" for yhwh. In the postexilic period, 'ādōnāi began to displace the Tetragrammaton, especially in speaking. When Jews translated their Scriptures into Greek, they left the Tetragrammaton in Hebrew or paleo-Hebrew characters, even though they vocalized a surrogate word, e.g., 'ādōnāi. Later Christian scribes replaced the Hebrew consonants with the Greek word kyrios, "Lord."

NT authors, especially in the Pauline corpus and Luke-Acts, use the Greek kyrios, which was common in the Hellenistic world. The most important development is the application of the absolute use of kyrios ("the Lord" or "Lord" rather than "my lord") to Christ. While the historical Jesus may have been called "lord" as a title of respect (Aram., mārā'î or mārî, "my lord"), it was the early Aramaic-speaking Christian community that first used "Lord" confessionally. The initial usage was probably tied to his Parousia (1 Cor 16:22 [Aramaic phrase preserved]; Rev 22:20 [same Aramaic phrase translated into Greek]) and then applied retroactively to his Resurrection and exaltation (Phil 2:6–11; Acts 2:36) and finally to his earthly ministry (Luke). NT texts use it to affirm the transcendent status of Jesus Christ without claiming full equality with God—that awaits the councils of Nicaea (325) and Chalcedon (451). See also Jesus Christ.

GREGORY E. STERLING

Lord, Daniel A., 1888–1955, Jesuit priest, editor, and pamphleteer. As director of the Sodality of the Blessed Virgin, the largest Catholic youth organization in the United States, he revitalized the group and edited its journal, the Queen's Work. See also sodality.

Lord of Hosts, an ancient title of God in the OT, especially in the prophetic books (e.g., Isa 1:9). God leads the Israelite armies, the "hosts," to victory (e.g., Exod 7:4). Since the ark of the covenant was regarded as God's place of earthly enthronement, it was brought into battle by the Israelites (1 Sam 4:4). God also commands all of the forces of creation (Ps 89:6–8). In the NT, the title occurs in Rom 9:29 and Jas 5:4.

Lord's Prayer, a prayer, also known as the "Our Father" or "Pater Noster," that Jesus taught his disciples. Two forms of the prayer survive in the NT. Luke 11:2–4 has a shorter form, omitting the words "who art in heaven," the petition that God's will be done, and the request for deliverance from evil. Matt 6:9–13, part of the Sermon on the Mount, preserves a longer version, on which most modern forms are based. Some manuscripts of Matthew also contain a doxology ("for thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever"), common as the conclusion of the Lord's Prayer in Reformed traditions and now used as a separate communal prayer after the Lord's Prayer in the Roman Mass.

That early Christians prayed in imitation of Jesus is clear from Paul, who notes the use of an address to God as Father at Rom 8:15 and Gal 4:6. This Christian practice may indicate the use of the Lord's Prayer or one of its petitions. Early Christian use of the prayer in the Matthean form is attested at the end of the first century in the Didache, which stipulates that it be used three times a day (Did. 8.2.3).

The heart of the prayer is a petition that God make the kingdom, or divine sovereign authority over humankind, a present reality. In the interim, the petitioner asks for physical sustenance, reconciliation with God and neighbor, and preservation from temptation and evil.

The prayer is an important part of the Mass, the Rosary, and other forms of Catholic devotion.

Lord's Supper. See Eucharist.

Loreto, House of, a stone structure located in the Italian city of Loreto on the Adriatic coast, purported to be the house of the Blessed Virgin Mary. Now incorporated into a basilica, the original 403-square-foot building was said to have been transported by angels from Nazareth to three other sites before finally arriving at Loreto. Since then, it has attracted countless pilgrims, including Pope John XXIII. Though the tradition of the house's Palestinian origin and miraculous translocation is regarded today as unhistorical, visitors still may gain the indulgences granted for pilgrimages to Lourdes or to the Holy Land.

Loretto, Sisters of. See Sisters of Loretto at the Foot of the Cross.

Lough Derg (lahg darg). See Saint Patrick's Purgatory.

Louis I, "the Pious," 778–840, Holy Roman emperor. The last surviving legitimate son of Charlemagne, Louis, crowned in 813, became sole emperor at Charlemagne's death in 814. He furthered Church reform and sponsored Slavic missions. The latter part of his reign was overshadowed by struggles among his sons. With papal support, Lothair, the eldest, briefly (833–34) dethroned Louis. See also Holy Roman Empire.

Louis IX, St., 1214–70, king of France from 1226 to 1270. As king, Louis showed integrity and justice in his royal administration, dealing firmly with unruly vassals and reforming France's judicial system. His success on crusade in 1249 was short-lived, though he turned to crusading again in 1270, dying in Tunisia. A devout Catholic, Louis built Sainte-Chapelle in Paris as a worthy reliquary for the Crown of Thorns, which he acquired in 1239. He was canonized in 1297; feast day: August 25. See also Sainte-Chapelle.

Louis XIV, 1638–1715, king of France from 1643 to 1715. Known as the "Sun King," Louis devoted himself to establishing an absolute monarchy over a united and uniform France. This led him to support the Gallican Articles (1682), which asserted the rights of the French church against Rome, to revoke the Edict of Nantes (1685), which granted toleration to Protestants, and to suppress the Jansenists, a morally rigorist group at odds with the leadership of the French church. See also Gallicanism; Jansenism.

Louis de Granada. See Granada, Luis de.

Lourdes (loordz), a town in the southwest of France associated with an important Marian shrine. Between February 11, 1858, and July 16, 1858, the Blessed Virgin Mary is said to have appeared to Bernadette Soubirous eighteen times at the grotto of Massabielle. Although by March twenty thousand pilgrims had gathered to witness the apparition, Mary was visible only to Bernadette.

On February 24 Bernadette was instructed to bathe and drink from a spring that began to flow on the following day. Since then, the bath at Lourdes has been associated with miraculous healings. On March 24 Bernadette was instructed to have a chapel built in honor of the Blessed Virgin, and on the following day Mary identified herself as the Immaculate Conception, confirming for many Pius IX's declaration of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception that had taken place on December 8, 1854.

The physically disabled are wheeled to the grotto at Lourdes, France, in the hope of receiving a cure from its sacred waters or at least some measure of spiritual strength and comfort from the Blessed Virgin Mary, who appeared there to Bernadette Soubirous in 1858.

After extensive review, the bishop of Tarbes proclaimed the legitimacy of the apparitions and authorized the cult of Our Lady of Lourdes in 1862. Bernadette entered the Sisters of Charity and Christian Instruction at Nevers in 1865 and died in 1879. She was beatified in 1925 and canonized in 1933.

Lourdes continues to serve as one of the most important pilgrimage sites in the world, attracting over two million visitors each year. Of the reported five thousand cures, fifty-eight have been declared miraculous by Church officials. Although clearly an important shrine for many, and the subject of papal encyclicals by Pius XI, Pius XII, and John XXIII, the events surrounding Lourdes remain private revelations. Catholics are not required to give assent to the apparitions themselves or to the healings associated with Lourdes. See also apparitions of the Blessed Virgin Mary; Bernadette of Lourdes, St. MICHAEL O'KEEFFE

Louvain, University of, the oldest continuously operating Catholic university in the world. Located in Louvain, Belgium, it was founded by Pope Martin V in 1425 through the efforts of John IV, duke of Brabant. Adrian of Utrecht (1459–1523) studied at the university, became a professor of theology and also rector of the university, and then was eventually elected Pope Hadrian VI in 1522. Erasmus of Rotterdam also studied there for a time (1517–21), refusing a professorship. The university subsequently flourished under Archduke Albert and Archduchess Isabelle (early seventeenth century). In 1857 the American College was established for the training of priests for North America, and in 1893 Désiré Mercier founded the Institut Supérieur de Philosophie at the university. The university's extensive library, dating to the eighteenth century, was tragically destroyed by the German military in World War I and again in World War II. It has been in part restored and is again internationally renowned. In 1968 the university separated into two autonomous units: the Flemish-speaking Katholieke Universiteit te Leuven (the largest university in Belgium) remained in Louvain (Leuven), and the French-speaking Université Catholique de Louvain was established at Ottignies (Louvain-la-Neuve).

love, in its most general sense, the experience and expression of the strong desire for those persons or things in which one takes a particular joy or delight. The roots of the specifically Christian concept of love are to be found in the interplay between the traditions of Greek philosophical speculation on human nature and the paradigmatic theological meditations on the drama of creation and redemption recorded in both Hebrew and Christian Scriptures. In its most characteristic OT usage, love (Heb., 'ahabah) signifies a quality or state of personal attachment marked by unwavering fidelity, such as that between a husband and wife, or, importantly, the "steadfast love" both expressed by God and required of Israel under the terms of their covenant relationship (Deut 6:5; cf. Isa 54:5). The concept is generally translated in the Septuagint by the Greek agapē, which more accurately conveys the notion of preferential love than either of the more common Greek words for love, eros (connoting sexual love), and philia (friendly affection). Subsequently adopted by the NT, agapē is used there, fundamentally, to describe the boundless love of God (John 3:16), who is proclaimed as love itself (1 John 4:16), the source and model for the love enjoined by Jesus upon his disciples (Matt 5:48). Agapē is the love that is to bind and distinguish the Christian community (1 Cor 12–13) and against which individual behavior will ultimately be judged (Matt 25:31–46). Love as the human longing for God, and as the disinterested seeking of the neighbor's good, were incorporated by later tradition, influenced by Neoplatonic philosophy, under the concept of caritas (Lat., "charity"). See also agape; charity. PAUL J. WOJDA

Low Church, originally those in the Church of England who accepted the 1688 settlement of William of Orange. They favored the inclusion of Puritans and dissenters within the Church, but not the inclusion of Catholics (recusants). In the nineteenth century, the term came to designate the more "evangelical" or Protestant wing of the Church of England. Today it is used more broadly to refer to those who prefer informality and immediacy in liturgical celebrations. See also Anglicanism; Reformation, the.

Low Mass (Lat., Missa lecta), the simplest of three forms of the Tridentine Mass, the Latin Mass rite in use before the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). Unlike both the High and Solemn High Mass, the Low Mass was celebrated by a single priest, sotto voce (It., "in a low voice"), assisted by a single server. During the middle part of the twentieth century, permission was given for the singing of suitable hymns by the assembly during the celebration of a Low Mass. Otherwise, the people's silent prayers could have been accompanied by quiet organ music. The Low Mass could be said in the presence of a congregation or semiprivately, with the presence of a single server. With the liturgical reforms of Vatican II, there is no longer a distinction among Low Mass, High Mass, and Solemn High Mass. The term Low Mass is no longer used. See also High Mass; Mass; Solemn High Mass.

Low Sunday, the Sunday after Easter. It is called "low" in contrast to the "high" feast of Easter the preceding Sunday. Also called Dominica in albis depositis (Lat., "Sunday [when] the white clothes are put aside"), because it was on this Sunday that newly baptized Christians were to put away their white baptismal albs (tunics) for more ordinary attire. Since the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) this Sunday is called the Second Sunday of Easter.

Loyola, St. Ignatius of. See Ignatius of Loyola, St.

Lubac, Henri de (loo'bahk), 1896–1991, French Jesuit theologian and cardinal. Educated in the renewed Thomism of Maurice Blondel, Pierre Rousselot, and Joseph Maréchal, de Lubac sought to revitalize and expand Catholic theology by studying patristic theology, where he found the diversity he considered essential to Catholicism. He cofounded Sources chrétiennes, an important series of patristic texts with translations. During the Second World War he combatted Nazi attempts to encourage anti-Semitism among French Catholics. One of his important theological contributions was his attack on narrow neo-Scholastic theologies of the supernatural, which, misinterpreting patristic and Scholastic thought, separated Christianity from secular concerns. Despite postwar conflicts with the Vatican, he produced important studies on atheism, Buddhism, medieval biblical exegesis, and the sacramental nature of Catholicism. He defended Teilhard de Chardin from condemnation and participated in Vatican II as peritus (Lat., "expert"). After 1970, he found some post-conciliar developments unsettling and became increasingly fearful and even reactionary.

Among his many scholarly works translated into English are Catholicism: A Study of the Corporate Destiny of Mankind (1950); The Mystery of the Supernatural (1967); Augustinianism and Modern Theology (1969); and The Sources of Revelation (1968). Some of his most important works, however, were not translated, for example, Corpus Mysticum (1944) and Exégèse Médiévale (1959). See also Nouvelle Théologie; supernatural. VINCENT MILLER

Lubachivskyj, Myroslav Ivan (mee'roh-slahv ee-vahn' loo-bah-chiv'skee), b. 1914, metropolitan of Halych, archbishop of Lviv. Ordained a priest in 1938, in 1979 he became metropolitan of Philadelphia for the Ukrainians and in 1980 was elected coadjutor with right of succession to the metropolitan of Halych, Joseph Slipyj. He was created a cardinal on May 25, 1985.

Lucernarium (loo-chen-ah'ree-uhm; Lat., "lamplighting service"), ancient term for cathedral Vespers, the sundown office at the lamplighting hour, corresponding to the ancient Greek name lychnikon. It comprised, with Matins, one of the two major cathedral services that opened and closed the day (the notion that Vespers begins the liturgical day and Compline closes is a later monastic development). The purpose of the service was to thank God for the day's graces and seek divine pardon for its sins. Its basic symbol was light, the evening lamp symbolizing Christ, the Light of the World, so the service opened with a light ritual. This was followed by other elements, such as the vesperal psalm 140/141 plus an offering of incense. The service concluded with litanies, a blessing, and dismissals. See also Vespers.

Lucerne Memorial, a document presented to Pope Leo XIII by Peter Paul Cahensly in 1891, expressing European concern for the spiritual welfare of immigrants (especially Germans) in the United States and calling for the establishment of national parishes for German-speaking Catholics. See also Cahensly, Peter Paul; national parish.

Lucian of Antioch, St., d. 312, priest at Antioch and martyr whose revisions of the Septuagint (Gk. OT) and NT became standard. Allegedly a disciple of Paul of Samosata, he was more likely his opponent, elaborating against him an anti-Monarchian subordinationist Christology that probably influenced Arius. He was tortured and martyred January 7, 312. Feast day: January 7 (West); October 15 (East). See also Arianism; Monarchianism; subordinationism.

Lucifer (Lat., lux, "light," ferre, "carry," literally "light-bearer"), alternate name for Satan, the leader of the rebellious angels (see Rev. 12:7–9). The Vulgate and King James Version translation of the Hebrew hll ("to flash forth light" in Isa 14:12) describe the king of Babylon's fall from power and glory. Christians applied it to Luke 10:18, where Jesus speaks about Satan falling like lightening from heaven. See also Satan.

Lucy, St., d. 304, virgin and martyr. Martyred during the persecution of Diocletian, she is the patron saint of persons suffering from eye disorders and is portrayed carrying a tray containing two eyes. Her name was introduced into the Canon of the Mass by Pope Gregory I (d. 604). Feast day: December 13.

Ludolph of Saxony, ca. 1300–78, Carthusian author whose Life of Christ was widely read and studied in the late Middle Ages and sixteenth century, influencing Ignatius of Loyola and Teresa of Ávila. First a Dominican and master in theology, Ludolph became a Carthusian in 1340.

Lugo, John de (loo'goh), 1583–1660, Spanish Jesuit theologian and cardinal. He taught at Valladolid in Spain from 1616 to 1621, then at Rome, where he achieved international recognition as a theologian; he was created a cardinal in 1643. Although influential as a moral theologian, he also wrote on the Eucharist and the act of faith, maintaining that saving faith is possible for all, including non-Christians.

Luke, St., a companion of Paul and traditional author of the Third Gospel. Paul mentions Luke as his "fellow worker" in Phlm 24. He is called the "beloved physician" in Col 4:14 and Paul's sole companion in 2 Tim 4:11. The Pauline authorship of the latter two works has been disputed, but even if inauthentic they probably contain reliable information about Paul's entourage. Some have also identified Luke with the Lucius mentioned in Acts 13:1 and Rom 16:21, but that is unlikely.

The tradition of the early Church adds biographical details and attributes to Luke both the Third Gospel and Acts. A prologue to the Third Gospel dating to the late second century (often labeled the anti-Marcionite prologue) notes that Luke was a Syrian physician from Antioch who wrote his Gospel in Achaea (Greece) and lived as a celibate to the age of eighty-four, when he died in Boeotia. The Muratorian Canon, a list of NT books probably from the late second century, names Luke as author of the Third Gospel. Irenaeus (Against Heresies 3.1.1; 3.14.1) attributes both Gospel and Acts to Luke and argues that Luke is the person intended by the first-person references in Acts.

The so-called we-sections of Acts (Acts 16:10–17; 20:5–15; 21:1–18; 27:1–28:16; and 11:28 in one manuscript) have occasioned considerable debate. They are probably parts of a travel diary, written by a companion of Paul who assisted in his second and third missionary journeys to Macedonia and Greece, who accompanied Paul on his final trip to Jerusalem, and, after the apostle's arrest, accompanied him to Rome.

Luke, author of the Third Gospel and the Acts of the Apostles, in the act of writing, with his biblical symbol, the ox, overhead (Rev 4:7); illustration from the early-eighth-century Lindisfarne Gospels, British Museum, London.

The relationship between the author of the travel diary and the author of Acts is debated. Some doubt the natural inference that they are identical, because of the ignorance or lack of clarity displayed by Acts about several aspects of Paul's life and teaching, surprising in a close companion of the apostle. Yet the recollections of the author of Acts, probably written in the late first century, could well have been colored by time and the contemporary concerns of the Church.

The author of Acts, whether or not the diarist, was clearly the author of the Third Gospel. The opening of Acts refers to the Gospel and is dedicated to the same person. Both share stylistic similarities and thematic concerns. Their author was clearly a man of considerable literary talent, who obviously had Hellenistic rhetorical training. He was probably born to a Greek family and may have been among the "God-fearing" Gentiles (Acts 10:2, 35; 13:6, 26) who were attracted to Paul's preaching. There is no significant literary evidence of his having had medical training.

Luke, whose emblem is the ox, is the patron saint of doctors, artists, and butchers. Feast day: October 18. See also evangelist. HAROLD W. ATTRIDGE

Lull, Bl. Ramón, also known as Raymond Lull, ca. 1232–1316, Franciscan tertiary and lay missionary to Muslims. He learned Arabic, adopted Sufic elements, argued in the style of Muslim theologians, promoted the study of Semitic languages, and wrote numerous books (including theological treatises in his Catalan vernacular). He also wrote mystical poetry and is considered the forerunner of Teresa of Ávila (d. 1582) and John of the Cross (d. 1591). Feast day: September 5. See also Islam; mysticism.

Lumen Gentium (loo'men jen'tzee-*oo*m). See Dogmatic Constitution on the Church.

lumen gloriae (Lat., "light of glory"), Scholastic term for the supernatural perfecting of the human power of knowing through which the intellect is made capable of the immediate vision of the divine essence (the Beatific Vision). The expression, which originates in the theology of Bonaventure and Thomas Aquinas (see especially Summa Theologiae, 1.12.5–2) has biblical antecedents in Ps 36:9, "For with you is the fountain of life; in your light we see light," and Rev 22:5, "They need no light of lamp or sun, for the Lord God will be their light, and they will reign forever." Because human beings, according to the state of nature, are infinitely removed from the divine essence, the light of glory must be regarded as a divine gift that elevates human reason beyond its natural state to the state of glory. As such, the light of glory represents the culmination of a threefold process beginning with the light of reason (lumen rationis) and progressing through the light of faith (lumen fidei), which elevates reason and makes it capable of supernatural faith. See also Beatific Vision; heaven.

lunette (Fr., "little moon"), a small circular glass receptacle in which a consecrated Host may be exposed in a monstrance for the purposes of eucharistic devotions. It is also called a lunula, or a luna. See also Benediction.

lust. See capital sins.

Luther, Martin, 1483–1546, leader of the German Reformation, a movement that ultimately led to a break between Protestantism and Catholicism in the Western Church. He remains a source of controversy insofar as his life and work continue to generate both reform and division.

Luther in Catholic Context: Born at Eisleben, Germany, Luther was educated at Erfurt and Magdeburg in preparation for a career in law. Following a near-death experience he vowed to become a monk. He entered the Augustinian order in July 1505 and was ordained to the priesthood on April 3, 1507, by Erfurt's suffragan bishop. On the advice of the vicar of the Augustinian order, Luther went to Wittenberg in 1511. He received his Doctor of Theology on October 19, 1512, and began to teach Bible at the university.

Martin Luther, the leading figure in the Protestant Reformation, began as an Augustinian monk troubled by the corruption he saw in the Church, especially in Rome itself; oil-on-wood painting by Lucas Cranach the Younger (d. 1586), Uffizi Gallery, Florence, Italy.

The move from Erfurt to Wittenberg was crucial in Luther's formation as a teaching theologian. His lectures on Psalms, Romans, Galatians, and Hebrews (1513–17) led to insights that became the foundation for his career as a Reformer and established many of the issues to which Catholic scholars continue to respond. Luther's arguments against indulgences and his understanding of grace and faith posed a threat to the theological underpinnings of the Church's sacramental system and to the economic and ecclesiastical links between Germany and Rome.

In July 1518, the first official Catholic response to Luther's teaching was made by the Dominican Sylvester Prierias, commissioned by Pope Leo X to refute Luther. Prierias summarized the issue between Luther and Rome: "Whoever does not rest on the doctrine of the Roman Church and of the Roman Pontiff as the infallible rule of faith from which even Sacred Scripture draws its strength and authority is a heretic." The indulgence dispute thus led to the more basic problem of authority which has continued to characterize Lutheran and Catholic division.

In a series of ecclesiastical and political moves between 1518 and 1521 Luther was ordered to explain and finally to renounce his teaching. Three critical treatises written in 1520 crystallized his theological positions. The Address to the Christian Nobility invited civil rulers to undertake reforms in the Church as "emergency bishops." The Babylonian Captivity attacked sacramental teaching, reducing the number of sacraments and denying the doctrine of the Sacrifice of the Mass. The Freedom of the Christian Man challenged ecclesiastical authority.

A papal bull in 1521 excommunicated Luther. On May 26, 1521, he was condemned as an outlaw by the German emperor. While confined for safety at Wartburg castle, he translated the NT into German. It was a decisive contribution to the evangelical movement. The availability of the Bible in the vernacular rooted Protestant theology in Scripture. Catholic response to Luther did not address the relationship between biblical interpretation and doctrinal tradition until the twentieth century.

Political developments allowed Luther to return to public life and teaching. He married the former nun Katherine von Bora in 1525, symbolizing his repudiation of monasticism and the obligation of celibacy for clergy. Luther continued to function as pastor, preacher, teacher, and leader of the Reformation until his death.

Luther as Source of Division and Reform: Luther was clearer than many of his followers about his desire to reform, not split, the Church. He hoped for a general council to resolve issues, but by the time the Council of Trent began in 1545, the opportunity for constructive change had passed. The negative response at Trent precluded any sympathetic Catholic assessment of Luther or the reform movement.

Catholic scholarship thus moved slowly from an early, uncritical condemnation of Luther to renewed interest in his life and work and recently to appreciation of his contributions in theology. Research in the twentieth century can be summarized in three phases. The first began with Henrich Denifle's 1904 work condemning Luther as a person and accusing him of being a pseudoreformer who made no contributions to theology. A few years later Hartmann Grisar reinforced this approach by portraying Luther as mentally ill. English-speaking Catholic scholars were strongly influenced by Denifle and Grisar.

Joseph Lortz's history of the Reformation, which appeared in 1939–40, and a study of Catholic interpretation of Luther by Adolf Herte in 1943 signaled a decisive shift to a second phase in Luther research. These works took Luther's life and work seriously in the context of Church history and biography. Their efforts opened the door for Catholics to see Luther as a religious figure and to hold the late medieval Church accountable for its role in the schism. At the same time appreciation for Luther's theology emerged, especially in relationship to late Scholastic theology. The underlying assumption in this phase was that Luther could be affirmed only to the extent that he was Catholic.

The third phase, ecumenical reassessment, is characterized by the systematic study of Luther without apologetic intentions, the desire to discern points of agreement or consensus, and the willingness to learn from Luther as a theologian. Earlier revisionist research excused the divisive consequences of his life and work but did not admit to any essential contribution by Luther to Catholic tradition. Catholic theology today has moved to consideration of Luther as a resource for the faith and life of the whole Church. His teaching is explored in the context of a new understanding of the sixteenth century. Reevaluation of the Council of Trent in light of the Second Vatican Council has also fueled renewed interest in Luther as a Reformer.

The clearest example of changing perspectives is the treatment of Luther and Lutheran theology in official international and U.S. Roman Catholic–Lutheran dialogues. Key areas of historical divergence such as Eucharist and ministry, teaching authority and papal infallibility, Mary and the saints, as well as the role of justification in salvation, have been reopened. As long as such reassessment is in progress, the prospect for further convergence remains. See also Lutheranism; Protestantism; Reformation, the.

Bibliography

Kittelson, James. Luther The Reformer. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1986.

Obermann, Heiko A. Luther: Man Between God and the Devil. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1989.

Todd, John M. Luther: A Life. New York: Crossroad, 1982.

RALPH F. SMITH

Lutheran–Catholic dialogue, theological conversations between official representatives of the Lutheran churches and the Catholic Church. Dialogue began in 1965 based on contacts made at the Second Vatican Council. International-level dialogue has addressed mutually agreed upon topics: "The Gospel and the Church" (1972); "The Eucharist" (1978); "Ways to Community" (1980); "All Under One Christ: Statement on the Augsburg Confession" (1980); and "The Ministry in the Church" (1981).

Dialogues in the United States between theologians appointed by the Bishops' Committee for Ecumenical Affairs and the U.S.A. National Committee of the Lutheran World Federation also began in 1965. Ground-breaking papers and agreed statements have been issued on: "Status of the Nicene Creed as Dogma of the Church" (1965); "One Baptism for the Remission of Sins" (1966); "Eucharist as Sacrifice" (1967); "Eucharist and Ministry" (1970); "Papal Primacy and the Universal Church" (1974); "Teaching Authority and Infallibility in the Church" (1978); "Justification by Faith" (1985); and "The One Mediator, the Saints, and Mary" (1992). Dialogue on Scripture and tradition began in 1992.

While dialogue team members at both the international and U.S. levels have been able to arrive at agreed statements and recommendations, the results of the dialogues have not been received by Vatican and Lutheran church authorities in such a way that concrete ecclesiastical actions have thus far resulted. See also Lutheranism.

Lutheranism, evangelical reform movement inspired by Martin Luther (1483–1546). Its central theological principle is justification by grace through faith. It also affirms: grace alone (Lat., sola gratia), faith alone (sola fide), and Scripture alone (sola Scriptura). Lutheranism is defined by formal acceptance of the confessional teachings in the Book of Concord (1580), especially the Augsburg Confession (1530). The term distinguishes it from other forms of Protestantism (e.g., Reformed, Calvinist, Anabaptist). Under the authority of lay rulers, which replaced papal authority in sixteenth-century Germany and Scandinavia, Lutheranism undertook ecclesiastical reform. Today Lutheranism refers to a body of doctrine, a worldwide communion of churches, and forms of piety.

Liturgy: In liturgy Lutheranism retains many traditional Catholic forms (e.g., order of the liturgy, liturgical year, observance of saints' days, vestments, use of the crucifix). Sacraments are defined as means of grace instituted by Christ, with Christ's promise of grace, employing a physical element. Under this definition two sacraments were affirmed: Baptism and Eucharist. The practice of infant baptism was continued. In the Eucharist, medieval understandings of sacrifice were rejected and replaced by emphasis on fruitful reception of grace in the Communion of the faithful, under both kinds, i.e., consecrated bread and wine. Against Reformers such as Ulrich Zwingli, Lutheranism affirmed the Real Presence of Christ in the sacrament, "in, with, and under" the forms of bread and wine, by the power of God's word. Absolution was also affirmed as sacramental in both private and public forms. Ordination was affirmed as sacramental in a limited sense. The celebration of marriage and confirmation continued and anointing of the sick has been recovered in some places as important rites of the Church, not as sacraments.

Lutheranism is characterized by a strong emphasis on preaching as the proclamation of God's word through both law and Gospel. It is also known for its vigorous musical tradition in hymns and liturgical music (e.g., J. S. Bach). Commitment to education, primary, secondary, college, and seminary, is characteristic. The ongoing use of Luther's Small Catechism and Large Catechism characterizes its catechetical instruction. Lutheranism has been a major contributor to modern scientific biblical scholarship.

Piety: The piety of Lutheranism is focused on the atoning work of Christ for sinners and the faith of believers. Lutheran orthodoxy (seventeenth century) concentrated on correct doctrine. Lutheran Pietism (eighteenth and nineteenth centuries) rebelled against this intellectual emphasis and stressed personal conversion and holiness of life (sanctification) among believers. Pietism fostered active mission movements that spread Lutheranism to Africa, India, and Asia in the nineteenth century. Pietism also exerted strong influence among European Lutherans who immigrated to North and South America and Australia in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.

With some 60 million adherents in 1994, Lutheranism constitutes the largest form of Protestant Christianity. It is organized in state churches in Germany and Scandinavia. Elsewhere it follows various patterns. The Lutheran World Federation facilitates cooperation among 105 of its independent churches. Once separatist in its outlook, Lutheranism in the twentieth century has become an active ecumenical partner with the Catholic and other Christian churches. See also Luther, Martin; Protestantism; Reformation, the. PAUL R. NELSON

Luxeuil, important monastery founded ca. 590 by the Irish abbot and missionary Columbanus in the Vosges; it became the motherhouse for a series of reformed monasteries in Gaul. See also Columbanus, St.

Lwanga, St. Charles (lah-wahng'ah), martyr. One of twenty-two Christians (both Catholic and Protestant) martyred in Uganda in 1885–86. Canonized as a group in 1964, they are honored as the "proto-martyrs" of black Africa in the Roman calendar. Feast day: June 3.

Lydwina, Bl., 1380–1433, patron saint of skaters. Born in Holland, she was injured as a young girl while ice-skating and remained an invalid for life, enduring great suffering and eventual blindness. She is said to have experienced visions and to have required little food or sleep. Feast day: April 14.

lying, communicating something other than what one believes (speech contrary to the mind's thought). The essence of lying is the misrepresentation to an audience of one's judgment, not of the state of affairs. Someone who states a truth, believing it false, is lying.

Until recently most theologians taught that lying is an intrinsically evil act. Today, many distinguish between false speaking and lying, such that lying would include only those intentional falsehoods that tend to disrupt the trust necessary for good human relations. See also mental reservation.

Lyons, Rite of, the liturgical rite of the archdiocese of Lyons in France. This rite dates from Charlemagne's imposition of the Roman rite upon his empire in the 800s. Distinctive features include a rite for testing the wine between the reading of the Letter (Epistle) and the Gospel, ash-colored vestments in Lent, and special blessings on farmland each Sunday from May 3 to September 14.

Lyons I, Council of (1245), thirteenth ecumenical council of the Church. Convoked by Innocent IV after fleeing Rome before the advancing armies of the emperor Frederick II, the assembly sat for three sessions from June through July and addressed the major issues of the day: clerical abuses, the liberation of Jerusalem, the Latin Empire of Constantinople, and the Mongol threat to eastern Europe. The most urgent business was Frederick II's persecution of the papacy and seizure of papal lands. After issuing a warning and receiving no response from the emperor, Innocent excommunicated and deposed Frederick, the first deposition of an emperor in nearly two centuries. See also Constantinople; Jerusalem; Papal States.

Lyons II, Council of (1274), fourteenth ecumenical council of the Church, summoned by Gregory X to accomplish reunion with the Greek Church, the liberation of the Holy Land, and reform of the Church. Over five hundred bishops, sixty abbots, and a thousand other clerics and lay representatives attended, including Albertus Magnus and Bonaventure. The political backdrop of the council was the end of the Hohenstaufen dynasty, so troublesome to the papacy, and the ascendancy of Charles of Anjou as king of Sicily, who had ambitions to restore the Latin Empire of Constantinople. In hopes of receiving military and political support, the Greek emperor and delegates gave their full assent to the Roman faith, including the Filioque. Unaccepted in Byzantium, the reunion lasted only as long as the emperor lived, and crusading efforts similarly proved ineffectual. See also Constantinople; Eastern Schism; Filioque; Holy Land.

M

Mabillon, Jean (mah-bee-yohn'), 1632–1707, Maurist scholar. Mabillon's most famous work is his De Re Diplomatica (1681), which has served as a basis for the scientific method of documentary criticism. Other works include critical editions of the works of St. Bernard, lives of Benedictine saints, and a study of Gallican liturgy. See also Maurists.

Macarius of Egypt, St., ca. 300–ca. 390, saintly monk who knew Anthony of Egypt, a founder of monasticism. He is to be distinguished from Macarius of Alexandria (fourth century) and Macarius, bishop of Jerusalem (d. ca. 334). He went into the desert at about age forty and lived near Anthony. He was considered a miracle worker by many.

Macedonianism, one name for the doctrine that denies the full divinity of the Holy Spirit on the grounds that Scripture does not provide sufficient basis for believing that the Holy Spirit is a divine Person. The title refers to Macedonius, bishop of Constantinople in the mid-fourth century. He was mistakenly credited with leadership in a sect that viewed the Holy Spirit as a creature or as an intermediate being between God and creatures. The teaching was condemned at the Council of Constantinople (381). See also Holy Spirit.

Machiavelli, Niccolò, 1469–1527, Florentine humanist and writer. Machiavelli served the restored Florentine republic from 1498 to 1512, when the Medici family returned to power. To regain their favor, he dedicated The Prince to the unofficial Florentine ruler, Lorenzo de Medici. Often considered on the basis of The Prince a champion of amoral, unscrupulous government, his Discourses on the Ten Books of Livy reveals a man of strong republican convictions who distinguished between the goals of private and public good and the means to achieve them. Although conventional in his personal beliefs, Machiavelli blamed Catholicism and the pope for Italy's disunity and chaos.

MacRae, George Winsor, 1928–85, Jesuit, American NT scholar. Educated at Boston College, Louvain, Johns Hopkins, and Cambridge, his scholarship focused on the Fourth Gospel and on editing Coptic Gnostic texts from Nag Hammadi (Egypt). Committed to ecumenism, he was the first tenured Stillman Professor of Roman Catholic Studies at Harvard Divinity School, where he served as acting dean at his death.

Macrina, St., ca. 327–79, older sister of Basil the Great (Basil of Caesarea) and Gregory of Nyssa. Gregory's Vita attests to the holiness of Macrina's "philosophical life" and her influence on the family. After persuading Basil, attracted to secular pursuits by his education in Athens, to serve the Church instead, she convinced their widowed mother to form, with the family's servants, an ascetic community in which Macrina assumed leadership. While no writing of hers is known, she appears plausibly as the theological teacher in Gregory's On the Soul and the Resurrection. Feast day: July 19.

Madonna, the (It., "My Lady"), a designation for the Blessed Virgin Mary. It is commonly used with reference to statues and pictures of her, particularly in the West, where she is portrayed holding the Christ Child. See also Mary, Blessed Virgin.

Magdalene, St. Mary. See Mary Magdalene, St.

Magdeburg Centuriators, the author of the first Protestant history of the Church. Under the direction of Matthias Flacius, Protestant historians published the Historia Ecclesiae Christi (Lat., "History of the Church of Christ"; 1559–74) to prove the errors of Catholicism. Although it was tendentious and filled with errors, its critical use of original documents (with which it took many liberties, however) was a milestone in Church history. Caesar Baronius's Annales Ecclesiastici (1588–1607) was the Catholic response. See also Baronius, Caesar.

Magi (Gk., magos, "wise person," "interpreter of dreams"; pl. magi), the astrologers who, led by a star, visited Jesus in Bethlehem (Matt 2:1–12). They came from the East, most probably Arabia, Mesopotamia, or Babylon, and symbolize the manifestation of Christ to the Gentiles. People assumed that they were three in number because they brought three gifts—gold, frankincense, and myrrh. Tertullian is the first to call them kings (see Isa 60:3–6; Ps 72:10) and in later tradition they are given names Melchior, Balthasar, and Gaspar. Their purported relics are in the Cologne Cathedral.

magic, the belief that certain forms of ritualized human behavior can produce effects that are beyond the power of natural causes. This occurs usually by "forcing" supernatural powers to behave in accordance with the will of the person who possesses the required esoteric knowledge. Magic is usually perceived as good ("white" magic) or evil ("black" magic) according to the helpful or harmful ends pursued by the practitioner, but in the Catholic moral tradition reliance upon magic is considered a sin against the First Commandment. This is to be distinguished, of course, from the use of "magic" as a form of entertainment in which there is no recourse to supernatural forces.

The Magi, traditionally known as the Wise Men from the East, pay homage to the newborn Savior with gifts of gold, frankincense, and myrrh; fifteenth-century Gothic painting by Stefan Lochner, Altar of the Patron Saints, Cologne Cathedral, Germany.

magisterium (mahg-i-stair'ee-oom), teaching office and authority of the Catholic Church; also the hierarchy as holding this office. In classical Latin, magisterium meant the role and authority of one who was a "master" in various senses of the term. In medieval usage, it generally referred to the role of the teacher; thus, Thomas Aquinas uses the term magisterium to refer to the teaching role both of the university professor and of the bishop. However, in modern Catholic usage the term has become identified with the office and authority to teach that is proper to the pope and bishops. Even more recently, the hierarchy itself is spoken of as "the magisterium." When their teaching is described as "authentic," this term does not mean "genuine," but "authoritative."

Theologians have a teaching authority based on their mastery of their subject, but only those ordained to the episcopate share in the authority Christ gave to the apostles to teach in his name. In the NT one already finds the principle of succession in a teaching office entrusted to those with pastoral care for the faith of the Christian community (see Acts 20:17–35; 2 Tim 2:2).

Since it belongs to the nature of the Christian Church to be a people united in the profession of the apostolic faith, it has to have a common creed and a common understanding of its faith. When conflicts arise as to the terms of its creed or when new questions are raised that demand authoritative answers, it is part of God's design that in every age there should be successors of the apostles with pastoral authority to act as judges in matters of faith (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 25). As Vatican II insists, this does not mean that bishops are above the word of God, but that they listen to it, guard it, and explain it faithfully, by divine commission and with the help of the Holy Spirit (Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, n. 10).

Bearers of Magisterium: Each bishop with pastoral responsibility has authority regarding the teaching of Christian doctrine in his diocese. The bishops of a nation or region can exercise their teaching function collegially in episcopal conferences or in regional synods. The whole episcopal college is the bearer of supreme magisterium, which it exercises both when dispersed throughout the world and when gathered in an ecumenical council. The pope, as head of the episcopal college, can exercise the supreme teaching authority that resides in this college.

The Object of Magisterium: Both Vatican councils have described the object of magisterium as "matters of faith and morals." This means that pastoral teaching authority is limited to what pertains to Christian faith or to the practice of the Christian way of life. There are two ways in which something can belong to this object: either as contained in revelation (whether explicitly or implicitly) or as so connected with revelation as to be necessary for the defense or explanation of some revealed truth. The latter kind of matter is described as the "secondary object" of magisterium.

The Exercise of Magisterium: The major distinction here is between the definitive and the nondefinitive exercise of pastoral teaching authority. Only the supreme teaching authority (the episcopal college or the pope as its head) can settle a question of faith definitively, that is, in such a way that the judgment thus rendered can never be rescinded. Ecumenical councils or popes are said to "define" a doctrine when the manner in which they express their judgment leaves no doubt about their intention to oblige the universal Church to an irrevocable assent to the doctrine thus taught. The consensus of the whole episcopal college, in its ordinary teaching throughout the world, proposing a point of doctrine as definitively to be held, is also a definitive exercise of magisterium.

The teaching authority, or magisterium, of the Church is but a limited, error-prone participation in the teaching authority of Jesus Christ himself; seventeenth-century Rembrandt etching of Christ in the role of a teacher.

It is only the definitive exercise of magisterium that is understood to be infallible, that is, to enjoy a special assistance of the Holy Spirit that prevents such teaching from being erroneous and thus leading the whole Church into error in its faith. Propositions taught in a definitive way as expressing revealed truth are termed "dogmas of faith." It is such a dogma, defined by the First Vatican Council, that when the pope speaking ex cathedra (Lat., "from the chair") defines a dogma of faith for the universal Church, he enjoys in that act the same infallibility that ecumenical councils have in dogmatic definitions. It is a matter of ordinary Catholic teaching, but not a dogma of faith, that the whole episcopal college, and the pope as its head, speak infallibly also when they express definitive judgments about matters that are necessarily connected with revelation. However, at the present time there is no clear consensus among Catholic theologians as to what is included in the secondary object of infallible teaching. This is the case especially with regard to matters of the natural moral law.

All the subjects of magisterium, including ecumenical councils and popes, can also exercise their teaching function in a nondefinitive way. The most obvious examples of such teaching are found in papal encyclicals. While these letters often contain much that has already been definitively taught, they have not been used by the popes to define new dogmas, but rather to teach in a nondefinitive way. The same is true of the documents of Vatican II, since this council chose not to define any new dogma.

While this nondefinitive "ordinary" teaching does not enjoy infallibility, it is authoritative and calls for a response described in official documents as religious obsequium, a Latin term that has been translated both as "submission" and as "respect." This is best understood as an attitude of willingness to accept the teaching and to do one's best to convince oneself of its truth. It is called "religious," since it is based on belief in the divine origin of the teaching authority. However, despite genuine willingness and sustained effort, a person might be unable to give sincere mental assent to some point of nondefinitive teaching. In such a case, an individual's nonassent does not signify a failure to give religious obsequium to the authority of the magisterium. See also doctrine; dogma; hierarchy; infallibility; magisterium and morality.

Bibliography

Örsy, Ladislas. The Church: Learning and Teaching. Wilmington, DE: Michael Glazier, 1987.

Sullivan, Francis A. Magisterium: Teaching Authority in the Catholic Church. Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press; Dublin: Gill and Macmillan, 1983.

FRANCIS A. SULLIVAN

magisterium and morality, a reference to the official teaching function of the Church in the area of morality. Before the relationship can be clarified, the very notion of magisterium must be put in historical perspective. Until the nineteenth century the term did not mean what is now called the magisterium.

History: In the early Church, there were didaskaloi (Gk., "teachers") whose activity was more catechetical than speculative. In the second and third centuries the schools began to appear and with them a certain element of theological speculation. But from this period that which characterized the bishop was the cathedra (Lat.), or chair. This episcopal authority, symbolized by the bishop's chair, was the guarantor of the transmission of the apostolic message. This was not conceived as a juridical authority. The tradition or transmitted truth was the true authority.

The Middle Ages witnessed the full development of the schools. At this time a distinction was formulated between teaching that is pastoral and teaching that is scientific. Thus, Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) distinguished two magisteria, the pastoral and the scientific. The latter rested on scientific competence, whereas the former was tied to public office (prelature). Theological faculties judged doctrinal theses. In the nineteenth century a growing unilateralism began to occur with the teaching function centered more and more on the Bishop of Rome, the pope. This development reached its zenith in the encyclical Humani Generis (1950), when Pius XII stated that once the Supreme Pontiff expressed a judgment about a matter hitherto controverted, "that matter . . . can no longer be held to be a question of free debate among theologians." Unquestioning obedience became the norm. While the Church has always taught morality, the teaching function has been in different hands at different stages of history. At the present time the term "magisterium" refers, for all practical purposes, to the hierarchical magisterium alone, especially that of the pope.

Popes, at least from the time of Gregory XVI (1831–46) and Pius IX (1846–78), have been conscious of their teaching authority in the area of morals. Pius X states in Singulari Quadam (1912) that all human actions "in so far as they are morally good or evil, that is, agree with, or are in opposition to, divine and natural law, are subject to the judgment and authority of the Church." It is clear that "authority of the Church" refers to the pope. Similar statements are found in the pronouncements of Pius XI, Pius XII, John XXIII, and Paul VI. For instance, Pius XII states in Magnificate Dominum (1954) that the power of the Church extends to "the whole matter of the natural law, its foundation, its interpretation, its application."

Current Teaching: Vatican II (1962–65), with its keen historical sensitivity and the ecclesiological shifts in emphasis it introduced, was not so sweeping. It stated in the second part of the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (where urgent moral problems are treated) that interpreters had to be aware of "the changeable circumstances which the subject matter, by its very nature, involves" (Abbott-Gallagher, Documents of Vatican II, footnote 2). The council further noted that "it happens rather frequently, and legitimately so, that with equal sincerity some of the faithful will disagree with others on a given matter" (n. 43). This legitimate pluralism is to be expected if even official teachers do not have all the answers, a point explicitly made by the council when it stated: "The Church, as guardian of the deposit of God's word, draws religious and moral principles from it, but it does not always have ready answers to particular questions" (n. 33).

This appropriate modesty was clearly stated in the pastoral letter of the U.S. bishops "The Challenge of Peace" (1983). The bishops note that when they deal with applications of more general moral principles "prudential judgments are involved based on specific circumstances which can change or which can be interpreted differently by people of good will." They conclude that their judgments of application are "not binding in conscience."

It can be said, therefore, that in the contemporary Church there is a much greater awareness of the need to take account of all the experience and wisdom in the Church before formulating official teaching. Failure to do so means that the presumption of truth that accompanies official teaching is weakened, and the teaching office rendered less credible.

Moral Teachings: The Church's teaching function roots in the Catholic conviction that the apostles and their successors were commissioned to transmit the deposit of faith. In the Council of Trent (1545–63) the formulation "in matters of faith and morals" was used to describe the Church's competence. The term "morals" is a tricky phrase and clearly did not mean what it is taken to mean now. Rather it most likely referred to the practices and customs of the apostolic Church, some of which were doctrinal in character, others disciplinary and ceremonial. A similar phrase reappears in a document of Vatican II. It reads as follows. "Although the individual bishops do not enjoy the prerogative of infallibility, they can nevertheless proclaim Christ's doctrine infallibly. This is so, even when they are dispersed around the world, provided that while maintaining the bond of unity among themselves and with Peter's successor, and while teaching authentically on a matter of faith or morals, they concur in a single viewpoint as the one which must be held conclusively" (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 25).

This text raises many problems of interest. One is whether the Church can propose moral positions infallibly. The question may be raised as follows. On the one hand, the magisterium claims competence with regard to questions of the natural moral law. On the other, Vatican II states that the charism of infallibility is coextensive with the "deposit of divine revelation" (n. 25). This would seem to exclude from infallibility those moral positions that are not revealed. If that is the case, the magisterium can be competent in concrete moral questions without being infallibly competent.

This question remains a disputed one, but it is hardly very practical since, in the view of most theologians, the magisterium has never taught infallibly on the level of concrete morals, nor would such authority be required for the Church to fulfill its mandate to provide moral guidance. See also infallibility; magisterium.

Bibliography

Curran, Charles, and Richard A. McCormick. Readings in Moral Theology No. 3: The Magisterium and Morality. New York: Paulist Press, 1983.

RICHARD A. MCCORMICK

magnanimity (Lat, magnanimitas, "greatness of soul"), the virtue that disposes one to accomplish great and even heroic deeds for honorable and just causes, though never for personal honor or reward. In the Catholic perspective magnanimity includes the recognition that one's achievements have been made possible by the grace of God.

Magnificat (mahg-ni'fee-caht; Lat., "it praises"), the hymn of Mary in Luke 1:46–55. The Latin title derives from the opening word of the hymn in the Vulgate. Delivered by Mary at her visit to Elizabeth, the Magnificat lauds God's salvific power manifested in the overthrow of the mighty, the vindication of the lowly, and the divine mercy perpetually shown to Israel.

The hymn imitates the content and style of the Song of Hannah in 1 Sam 2:1–10, another exultant prayer by a woman to whom God had shown special favor. Some manuscripts and patristic sources attribute the hymn to Elizabeth, whose situation as an aged and barren woman miraculously allowed to conceive closely paralleled that of Hannah. Yet the preponderance of the manuscript evidence favors the traditional attribution to Mary. The phrase in Luke 1:48b, "From now on all generations will call me blessed," is particularly appropriate for her.

The hymn has long played a major role in the Liturgy of the Hours. In the East it is sung in the morning as part of the office of Lauds. In Western liturgies it is used at Vespers, or Evening Prayer.

Maimonides, Moses (mi̲-mahn'i-deez), 1135–1204, Jewish philosopher and theologian. Having learned the Peripateticism (Aristotelianism) of his native Spain, Maimonides settled near Cairo and became a physician and head of the Jewish community there. His Guide of the Perplexed, translated into Latin ca. 1240, explained to young scholars the interpretation of unphilosophical biblical terms. Showing that philosophical arguments contrary to Scripture were inconclusive and that biblical teachings could not be disproved, he underscored the dangers of using invalid arguments merely because their conclusions happen to agree with Scripture. Such Christians as Albertus Magnus (d. 1280), Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274), and John Duns Scotus (d. 1308) imitated his procedures. See also Albertus Magnus, St.; Aquinas, St. Thomas; Aristotle; Scotus, John Duns.

Maistre, Joseph de. See de Maistre, Joseph.

major basilica. See basilica, major.

major moderator in a religious institute, superior of an entire religious institute or of a significant part of an institute. These superiors are called by different names depending upon the particular law of a religious community, e.g., superior general, abbot, mother general, father general, master general, president, provincial superior, regional superior.

major orders, the orders of subdiaconate, diaconate, and priesthood. The term was used in the Latin rite from medieval to recent times to distinguish these orders from minor orders. In response to Reform critiques, the Council of Trent (1545–63) defended the role of major orders, though subdiaconate and diaconate then functioned only as stages toward priesthood. Since Vatican Council II (1962–65) the diaconate has been restored as a permanent order in the Church, with a transitional diaconate maintained for candidates for priesthood. The order of subdeacon has been eliminated, its basic functions being given to the lay ministries of reader and acolyte. See also Holy Orders; minor orders.

major superior. See major moderator in a religious institute.

Malabar Catholics. See Syro-Malabar Catholic Church.

Malachy, Prophecies of, a sixteenth-century forgery attributed to St. Malachy (d. twelfth century) concerning the popes beginning with Celestine II (1143–44). Each pope is given a short Latin epithet. The epithets of popes up to 1590 are formulated on the basis of a family, baptismal, or place name, but those of popes after 1590 become distinctly vague. The final prophecy concerns "Petrus Romanus," saying that in the final persecution of the Holy Roman Church there will reign Peter the Roman, who will feed his flock among many tribulations, after which the seven-hilled city will be destroyed and the dreadful Judge will judge the people. The prophecies have generated many commentaries and defenses of their authenticity, continuing into this century. See also Malachy of Armagh, St.

Malachy of Armagh, St., ca. 1094–1148, archbishop of Armagh active in reforming the Irish church according to Roman practices. Friend of Bernard of Clairvaux (who later wrote his Life), he introduced the Cistercians to Ireland with the foundation of Mellifont Abbey in 1142. Feast day: November 3. See also Cistercian order; Ireland, Catholicism in.

Malta. See Knights of Malta.

Maltese cross. See cross, forms of the.

Mandaeans, a Gnostic sect. In the second century it was present east of the Jordan River, and today is found in southern Iraq and Iran. It believes that the redeemer, the "Manda da Hayyê," enlightens human beings, thereby freeing their souls from the imprisonment of their bodies and leading them into the heavenly realm. Though this sect opposes Christianity, it may have Christian origins. Its writings speak with respect of the John the Baptist. Its holy book is the Ginza Rba ("treasure") from the seventh century. See also Gnosticism.

mandate to teach, a requirement for those who teach theological disciplines in institutes of higher studies. The mandate is required by canon 812 of the 1983 Code of Canon Law.

A teacher with a mandate teaches with the authorization of the Church but does not teach "in the name of the Church," which is restricted to pastoral leaders (bishops, and priests and deacons when they give a homily, etc.).

The mandate is not a grant of governing power, such as the canonical mission, nor does it delegate a teacher to act on behalf of a church official or the Church itself. Some consider the mandate to be similar to the "mandate" in Catholic action, whereby an apostolic activity by laypersons participates in the apostolate of the hierarchy. Others consider the mandate a type of certification by competent church authority that the teacher is acceptable to church officials.

The mandate applies to teachers of theological disciplines but not to teachers of other subjects, and to teaching in institutions of higher studies subject to church authorities, or concerning which there is an agreement (concordat) with the secular government.

Some episcopal conference norms (e.g., in Germany) specify the procedures for granting and withdrawing the mandate. Where no such legislation is in effect, the determination of what authority is competent to grant or remove the mandate, the procedure to be followed, and the institutions for which it is required, are resolved on a case-by-case basis. See also canonical mission; theologian.

JAMES H. PROVOST

Mandatum (mahn-dah'toom; Lat., mandatum, "commandment"), optional foot-washing rite of the Evening Mass of the Lord's Supper on Holy Thursday. The term is derived from John 13:34 ("I give you a new commandment [Lat., mandatum novum], love one another as I have loved you") when Jesus washed his disciples' feet on the night before he died. Not a pantomime of a past event for its own sake, the rite embodies Jesus' call to service. The presiding priest approaches the designated people, pours water over each one's feet, and dries them with a towel. An unspecified number of people representative of the assembly sit for the rite. Conflicts regarding the gender of those designated to have their feet washed strain the rite and threaten its future. See also Holy Thursday.

mandyas (mahn-dee'ahs; Gk., "mantle"), black monastic mantle, corresponding to the Western cappa, worn by Byzantine-rite monks. A Byzantine bishop's "choir dress" also includes a more elaborate mandyas of blue or purple cloth decorated with lateral stripes called "rivers" (Gk., potamoi) and, at its four corners, with rectangles of stiff ornamented cloth. The black mandyas of a Byzantine abbot (archimandrite) is distinguished from an ordinary monk's by these four ornaments. The mandyas is worn with its four corners joined at the wearer's throat and feet. See also cappa magna.

Mandyas

Mani. See Manichaeism.

Manichaeism, a dualistic religion, essentially Gnostic in character, founded explicitly as a world religion by Mani in Mesopotamia in the third century A.D.

History: In 240/41, at the age of 24, Mani claimed to have received his apostolate from the angel al-Taum to preach the final divine revelation of Zoroaster, Buddha, and Jesus. He took his message first to India. Returning to Persia, he was summoned to the court of Shapur I. Shapur's war on Rome in 241 spread Manichaeism to the West. But under Bahram, Shapur's successor, Zoroastrianism assumed dominance. Mani was accused of heresy, and at 60, thrown into jail; he died twenty-six days later (March 276/77).

His message, however, spread: "I have come from the land of Babel to make my cry heard throughout the whole world" (Turfan Fragment M4). It spread along the silk-trade routes far into China; at the beginning of this century, Manichaean literature was discovered in Turfan (in northwest China). In the West, Manichaeism spread through Syria and came to Egypt in the third century. From Egypt, it spread into Africa Proconsularis, where Augustine was an auditor from 373 to 383, and thence into Spain.

In 302, Diocletian issued the first Western anti-Manichaean edict; its sanctions were extreme. Despite persecution, three thousand leaves of Manichaean text, found in 1930 in Egypt's Fayyūm (a basin located south of the Delta on the west side of the Nile), prove the movement's resilience. A letter of Pope Leo I (444) tells us that Manichaeans numbered among the clergy. In the Middle Ages, types of Manichaean belief were still current among the Paulicians, Bogomils, and Cathars.

Elements: Like other Gnostic systems, Manichaeism rests on a dualistic concept of the world's structure. A radical duality between Light and Darkness, Good and Evil, existed from the beginning. An initial time of complete separation of the two kingdoms ended when Darkness attacked Light and brought about the middle time of mixture, which now reigns. A third, end time will restore the initial separation.

The Manichaean myth of this struggle involves a Primal Human, who emanated from the Father of Greatness. Sent to battle against Darkness, he is defeated. While he is unconscious, Darkness swallows his soul, the five luminous elements (i.e., light, wind, fire, water, and air). With this soul, Darkness gives birth to matter. When Primal Human awakes, he cries out for deliverance. It is to this cry that all Manichaeans must respond until the end of the age. The Living Spirit leads the Primal Human back to the Paradise of Light, but the soul, the five luminous elements, remain engulfed in matter; it is the work of the elect to free them. Light particles reside particularly in vine-growing fruits and vegetables and in semen. Humans were formed by the rulers of Darkness; procreation is of demonic origin.

Manichaean morality rests on this theoretical foundation. Believers are to abstain from contact with matter. They renounce property, work, rest, war, hunting, business, and agriculture. They must show zeal in spreading knowledge of salvation. This ethic was enabled by a two-tiered church membership. The elect lived these precepts strictly. Traveling and preaching, they observed the three symbols: of the mouth, abstention from blasphemy, meat, and wine; of the hands, abstention from work and the destruction of plants and animals; and of the lap/breast, abstention from sexual contact. While practicing extensive fasting, they partook of ritual meals: in an atmosphere of prayer and hymnody, they liberated light particles through reverential eating of vine-growing fruits, especially melons.

Auditors, in turn, lived a laxer life. They might farm, butcher animals, and even marry, but were to avoid procreation and to fast on Sundays. By the auditors' bringing the elect their food, the elect could eat in ritual purity. In return, the elect prayed for the auditors, that they would become incarnate in the soul of an elect, who, at death, would enter immediately into the Kingdom of Light.

Unlike other religious founders, Mani not only wrote at least seven works, but also translated them into the languages of those he evangelized. Of these, fragments exist or can be extracted from authors such as Augustine. See also Albigensians; Cathari; dualism; Gnosticism. BLAKE LEYERLE maniple, a short, colored, silk vestment formerly worn by priests over the left forearm. Originally used as a handkerchief, the maniple came to be worn solely as an ornament. Its use was officially discontinued in 1967, as part of the liturgical reforms mandated by the Second Vatican Council (1962–65).

Maniple

manna, the food providentially made available to the Israelites in the wilderness (Exod 16:4–36; Num 11:4–9), generally identified with the waferlike excretions of insects that feed on the sap of the tamarisk tree. In the NT it becomes a type, or foreshadowing, of Christ as the living bread from heaven (John 6:31–65) and of the Eucharist (1 Cor 10:3). See also Eucharist.

Manning, Henry Edward, 1808–92, English cardinal, archbishop of Westminster, and prominent Anglican archdeacon. Talented in administration and a champion of workers, Manning was a reformer both as an Anglican and, after his conversion in 1851, as a Catholic. Influenced by the Oxford movement, variably friend and foe of John Henry Newman, he founded the Oblates of St. Charles and made major contributions to Catholic elementary education and social reform in England and Ireland. He served with royal commissions on housing and education and was a consultant of Pope Leo XIII for the encyclical Rerum Novarum (On the Condition of the Working Person). Defender of diocesan clergy and advocate of papal infallibility and temporal power, Manning was a leading figure at the First Vatican Council (1869–70). Eternal Priesthood is his best-known book. See also Newman, John Henry; Vatican Council I.

Mansi, Giovanni Domenico, 1692–1769, Italian theologian and Church historian who founded an academy for Church history and liturgy in Lucca, where he was archbishop from 1765. His collection of the acts of the councils up to 1440, Sacrorum Conciliorum Nova et Amplissima Collectio (thirty-one volumes, 1759–98), remains unmatched in its completeness.

manualists, name given to the authors of the theological manuals, or textbooks, written primarily for seminary instruction that came to constitute a unique theological genre in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. This genre had important antecedents in the penitential manuals and Summae Confessorum of the Middle Ages, which were basic handbooks for confessors. The development of this genre was furthered by the reforms of the Council of Trent (1545–63) regarding the training and education of the clergy. The late seventeenth and eighteenth centuries saw the rise of the dogmatic method and of theological texts that avoided convoluted Scholastic questions in favor of systematizing and explaining Catholic doctrine. The manuals of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries were characterized by a remarkable uniformity in organization in which speculative concerns and creative inquiries gave way to pedagogical clarity. The following structure of a topic was typical: thesis, state of the question, historical proofs, rational proofs, solution of difficulties (response to adversaries), official teachings of the Church, corollaries (Lat., scholia), and practical applications. A great value was placed on massive, encyclopedic systematizations of the entire Catholic doctrinal tradition. This approach was exemplified in the nine-volume manual of the Roman theologian Giovanni Perrone, Praelectiones Theologicae (1835–42). This theological genre received its most developed expression under the inspiration of the neo-Thomistic revival of the late nineteenth century. The manuals of this period had two goals: first, to offer a defense of the Catholic faith against the rationalism inspired by the Enlightenment, and, second, to offer a systematic, internally coherent presentation of Catholic doctrine that could be seen as an alternative to the problematic systems inspired by philosophical idealism. In dogmatic theology the prominent manualists included D. Palmieri, C. Pesch, H. Dieckmann, J. M. Hervé, and J. Salaverri. The more significant manualists in moral theology included A. Sabetti, J. McHugh, D. Prümmer, E. Genicot, H. Davis, and M. Zalba. See also manuals, moral; moral theology; theology. RICHARD R. GAILLARDETZ manuals, moral, textbooks on moral theology distinct from those in systematic theology. They originated in the sixteenth century. Thereafter special treatises, e.g., on justice, began to appear by authors such as Domingo Báñez, Dominic de Soto, Leonhard Lessius, Luis de Molina, and John de Lugo. The most famous moral textbook of the seventeenth century was H. Busenbaum's Medulla Theologiae Moralis. It went through several hundred editions between 1645 and 1770 and became the basis for pastoral practice nearly everywhere. Alphonsus Liguori's moral tomes were commentaries on Busenbaum, and his work was succeeded by authors such as Gury-Ballerini, Gury-Sabetti, Gury-Ferreres, et al.

Such works were the predecessors of the modern manuals of moral theology used throughout the world, chiefly in seminaries. Some better-known manuals include those of the following: A. Lehmkuhl, T. Aertnys, A. Ballerini, H. Noldin, E. Genicot, A. Vermeersch, B. H. Merkelbach, D. Prümmer, F. Hurth, H. Jone.

Since Vatican II (1962–65) there has been a concerted attempt to link moral theology with its scriptural and systematic sources. As a result, the older manuals have largely been replaced, notwithstanding their compassionate prudence and practical wisdom. See also manualists; moral theology.

Mar (mahr; Syr., "Lord, sir"), ecclesiastical title for a saint or bishop in the Syriac and derived traditions.

Maranatha (mah-rah-nah-thah'; Aram., "Our Lord has come," "Our Lord, Come"), prayer. The prayer in Greek in Rev 22:20, "Come, Lord Jesus!" strongly supports the second rendering. Such prayers (1 Cor 16:22; Did. 10:6) attest the intense expectation among early Christians of Jesus' imminent return. See also Mary, Blessed Virgin.

Marcellinus, St. (mahr-sel-een'uhs), d. ca. 304, pope (296–304) and martyr. Although mentioned in the Roman eucharistic canon, little reliable information is known about him. He is said to have complied with an order from the emperor Diocletian to hand over copies of the Scriptures and also to have offered incense to the gods, for which acts he was dropped for a time from the official list of popes. He may have abdicated or been deposed before his death. Feast day (with Peter, exorcist and martyr): June 2.

Marcellus I, St., d. 309, pope from 306 to 308, elected four years after the death of his predecessor Marcellinus due to confusion resulting from Diocletian's persecution. Marcellus reorganized Rome's parishes. Exiled by Maxentius (Western emperor, 300–12), he died in exile on January 16 and is buried in the cemetery of Priscilla on the Via Salaria. He is sometimes confused with another Marcellus who died on October 4 or 7 and is buried in the cemetery of Balbina on the Via Ardeatina. Feast day: January 16.

Marcellus of Ancyra, ca. 280–ca. 374, bishop of Ancyra who attended the Council of Nicaea (325). He defended the Son as homoousios (Gk., "of one substance") with the Father but interpreted this to mean that Son and Spirit were temporary distinctions that would not subsist after God was "all in all" (1 Cor 15:24–28). He was condemned by the Council of Constantinople (381), and the clause "his kingdom will have no end" was added to the creed against him. See also Constantinople, councils of; homoousios; Nicaea, First Council of.

Mar Charbel, 1828–98, also known as St. Charbel (or Sharbel) Makhlouf, priest-monk of the Lebanese Maronite order. A hermit and mystic renowned for holiness, from 1875 until his death he lived as a solitary in a hermitage dependent on the Monastery of St. Maron at Annaya, Lebanon. He was canonized in 1977.

Marcion, ca. 85–ca. 160, one of the most formidable heretics ever faced by the Church. He was opposed by virtually all the Church Fathers. Born in Asia Minor, Marcion came to Rome ca. 140 and joined the Church there, perhaps also at this time coming under the influence of the Gnostic teacher Cerdo. In 144 he was excommunicated by the Roman Church for heresy. Undaunted, he established his own church, similar in organization and rites to the Catholic Church, to which it soon became a serious rival, spreading throughout the empire.

Marcion's central belief was that the God of love revealed in Jesus Christ was utterly different from the God of law revealed in the OT. Christianity was thus not the fulfillment of Judaism, but its replacement. In place of "the Law and the Prophets," Marcion offered "the Gospel and the Apostle," a radically edited version of Luke's Gospel and ten of Paul's Letters. Marcion's proposed canon accelerated the Catholic Church's efforts to establish its own. In rejecting the creator of the OT, Marcion rejected creation itself as well, regarding matter and the body as evil. Consequently, he affirmed a Docetic Christology that denied the reality of Jesus' human body and practiced a rigorous asceticism. See also canon of the Scriptures; creation; Docetism.

Maréchal, Joseph (mah-ray-shahl'), 1878–1944, Belgian Jesuit philosopher and a founder of Transcendental Thomism. His major work is the five-volume Le Point de depart de la metaphysique, which traced problems in modern thought to the breakdown of Scholasticism and attempted to develop a new synthesis between modern and medieval thought. Influenced by Maurice Blondel (d. 1949) and phenomenology, he asserted that Kant's critical philosophy could be reconciled with Thomism if the intellect was conceived as a dynamic, rather than static, faculty. His other important work includes a study on the psychology of mysticism. He significantly influenced twentieth-century Catholic theology through the work of fellow Jesuits Bernard Lonergan (d. 1984) and Karl Rahner (d. 1984). See also philosophy and theology; transcendental Thomism.

Maredsous, Benedictine monastery in Belgium. Its abbots have included Placidus Wolter and Columba Marmion. Among its monk scholars were Germain Morin, Ursmer Berlière, and Cyril Lambot. See also Marmion, Joseph Columba.

Margaret Mary Alacoque, St. See Alacoque, St. Margaret Mary.

Margaret of Scotland, St., ca. 1050–93, queen of Malcolm III of Scotland. Raised in the court of England's Edward the Confessor, she was celebrated for her pious and charitable life and for her support of church reform. Feast day: November 16.

Maria Goretti, St. See Goretti, St. Maria.

Maria Laach, an ancient Benedictine abbey in Germany founded in 1093. Under Abbot Herwegen it became a center of liturgical scholarship with such scholars as Odo Casel (d. 1948) and K. Mohlberg, and it was a major center of the liturgical movement.

Marialis Cultus (mahr-ee-ahl'is kool'-tuhs; Lat., "Marian Cult"), "For the Right Ordering and Development of Devotion to the Blessed Virgin Mary," apostolic exhortation of Pope Paul VI issued on February 2, 1974. It seeks to shape and guide devotion to the Blessed Virgin in light of the theological, liturgical, and spiritual renewal promoted by the Second Vatican Council. For example, while the encyclical encourages devotion to the Rosary, it points out that the Rosary is not to be recited during Mass (n. 48). The encyclical also underscores the ecumenical dimension of Marian devotion as well as its necessary connection with the struggle for social justice, so eloquently expressed in Mary's prayer, the Magnificat. See also Marian devotion.

Maria Monk, alleged author of a nineteenth-century book (The Awful Disclosures) purporting to reveal the secrets of convent life. Her lurid story, a best-seller of anti-Catholic propaganda, had little factual basis but has been reprinted many times and is still quoted on occasion in anti-Catholic literature.

Mariana, Juan de, 1536–1624, Spanish Jesuit theologian and historian whose De Rege et Regis Institutione (On the King and the Institution of the King) argued for regicide. Opponents ascribed this view to the Jesuits as a whole.

Marian Academy. See Pontifical Marian Academy.

Marian devotion, an attitude of piety or veneration toward Mary, often expressed in acts of devotion. Vatican II's Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (Lumen Gentium) views Mary not only as Mother of God, but also as a type and mother of the Church, exemplar of faith, sign of hope, and preeminent member of the communion of saints. Because of her privileged position, the Church accords her special veneration both within the liturgy and without.

The liturgical cult and Marian devotional exercises are to be generously fostered, never losing sight of the unique and sole mediation of Christ (nn. 67, 60). Pope Paul VI's 1974 apostolic exhortation Marialis Cultus elaborates the seminal notions of Lumen Gentium, setting out "certain principles designed to give Marian devotion new vitality" (n. 40). After considering Marian liturgical feasts, the exhortation stresses the intrinsic trinitarian and Christological character of Marian devotion, makes special mention of the Person and action of the Holy Spirit, urges an explanation of Mary's place in the Church, underscores the importance of biblical themes, signals genuine ecumenical concern, and encourages openness to the findings of the social sciences. Explicitly treated are two Marian devotions, the Angelus and the Rosary.

Marialis Cultus seeks to ground Marian devotion within an orthodox faith and practice, avoiding the extremes of Marian minimalism or maximalism. The minimalist approach exaggerates divine initiative toward Mary and devalues the human response; thus, Mary is not venerable, for that detracts from God's work in Jesus. The maximalist approach overplays Mary's human response at the expense of the divine, resulting in a deemphasis of Christ's salvific mediation. See also Marialis Cultus; Marian feasts; Mary, Blessed Virgin. JOHN A. MELLOH

Marian feasts, liturgical celebrations honoring Mary in both Eastern and Western traditions. Marian feasts have always enjoyed distinctive importance, above the commemorations of other saints.

While early liturgical history evidences no specific Marian feasts, celebrations of the birth and infancy of Jesus showed Marian dimensions. The Council of Ephesus (431), in formally approving Mary's title of Theotokos (Gk., "bearer of God"), gave impetus to the rise of Marian feasts. The Jerusalem church celebrated "Mary, Mother of God" outside Bethlehem on August 15; the feast was later transferred and became a feast of Mary's death or dormition. Sixth-century Roman churches celebrated Mary on January 1 and Syrian and Byzantine churches honored the Mother of God on December 26. From about the same time Spanish churches honored her on December 18, a week prior to Christmas. The Jerusalem church originated in the sixth century the feasts of Mary's birth (September 8) and the Presentation in the Temple (November 21) and probably the Annunciation (March 25). By the seventh century, the Jerusalem feasts were celebrated not only in the Byzantine empire, but also in Rome.

The fifteen Marian feasts of the revised Roman calendar honor Mary's role in the birth and life of Jesus, celebrate grace in her own life, or hail her as the model of Christian living and an instrument of grace. Among these feasts are four solemnities (Mary, Mother of God, January 1; Annunciation, March 25; Assumption, August 15; Immaculate Conception, December 8), three feasts (Presentation of the Lord, February 2; Visitation, May 31; Birth of Mary, September 8), four memorials (Queenship of Mary, August 22; Our Lady of Sorrows, September 15; Our Lady of the Rosary, October 7; Presentation of Mary, November 21), and four optional memorials (Our Lady of Lourdes, February 11; Immaculate Heart of Mary, Saturday after the Second Sunday of Pentecost; Our Lady of Mount Carmel, July 16; Dedication of the Basilica of St. Mary Major, August 5). In the United States, the memorial of Our Lady of Guadalupe, December 12, is a feast day. See also Marian devotion; Mary, Blessed Virgin. JOHN A. MELLOH Marianists, the name commonly used for the religious congregation of priests known as the Society of Mary (S.M.) and brothers, known as Brothers of Mary, founded in Bordeaux, France, in 1816 by Father William Chaminade, and for the congregation of sisters founded in 1816 by Adele de Batz de Trenquelleon, known as the Congregation of the Daughters of Mary Immaculate (F.M.I.), in cooperation with Father Chaminade. Both communities evolved from sodalities, organizations devoted to prayer and good works, dedicated to the Virgin Mary. To counteract certain effects of the French Revolution, they committed themselves to a strong community life and the education of youth. In 1993 the women's group numbered 400 worldwide and men's group 1,700. The Marianists sponsor the University of Dayton (Ohio), St. Mary's University in San Antonio, Texas, and Chaminade University in Honolulu, Hawaii.

Marian maximalism, an exaggeration of the role and spiritual powers of Mary in the work of redemption and salvation. Also known as Mariocentricism, it places Mary at the center of the mystery of redemption on a coequal basis with Jesus Christ. Consequently, there is no limit to the veneration given her.

Marian minimalism, a disparagement of the role and spiritual powers of Mary in the work of redemption and salvation. Also known as Mariophobia, it fears that veneration of Mary would detract from the central role of Jesus Christ in redemption and from the glory owed to God alone.

Marian Year, a period of twelve months set aside by papal proclamation as a time of renewed devotion to Mary as Mother of God. From the time of the Council of Ephesus (431), when Mary was affirmed as Theotokos (Gk. "God-bearer"), the Church has encouraged honoring Mary as contributing to the adoration of the triune God. Most recently (1987), Pope John Paul II proclaimed a Marian Year and issued an encyclical, Redemptoris Mater, calling for renewal of Marian spirituality. The National Conference of Catholic Bishops in the United States responded by publishing new prayers and rites for the celebration of Marian devotions in the form of litanies, invocations, hymns, and processions, as well as Liturgies of the Hours and Rosary celebrations. See also Marian devotion.

Marie-Rose Durocher, St. See Durocher, St. Marie-Rose.

Marillac, St. Louise de, 1591–1660, founder, with Vincent de Paul, of the Sisters of Charity. After being widowed, she aided Vincent by taking young women into her home to train them to work with the poor. When this group took vows as the Sisters of Charity, Louise became their first superior. Feast day: March 15. See also Daughters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul; Vincent de Paul, St.

Mariolatry, the worship (Lat., latria) of Mary. Because God alone deserves worship, divine honors given to creatures, even one so elevated as Mary, would be objectively sinful. According to Catholic theology the angels and saints may be given dulia (veneration) only, while Mary, greatest of the saints, may receive hyperdulia (special veneration). See also Marian devotion.

Mariology, a branch of theology that focuses on the person and role of the Blessed Virgin Mary in the Church and in the work of redemption. There is an incipient Mariology already in the NT and in the writings of the early Fathers of the Church, but for Thomas Aquinas and other medieval authors it was simply an appendix to Christology. Beginning in the seventeenth century, however, Mariology became a separate theological treatise, a trend that intensified in the nineteenth century with the definition of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception (1854) and especially during the pontificate of Pius XII, who defined the dogma of the Assumption (1950). The Second Vatican Council (1962–65) rejected the separate-treatise approach and situated the schema on Mary within the document on the Church (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, ch. 8), viewing her as a type of the Church, a model of faith, and the preeminent member of the communion of saints. See also Mary, Blessed Virgin.

Marists, a family of religious congregations dedicated to missionary work and education. In 1816 Jean-Claude Colin founded at Lyon, France, the Society of Mary (S.M.), a community of priests and brothers. An original member of that group, Marcellin Champagnat, founded the Marist Brothers of the Schools (F.M.S.) in 1817. Jeanne-Marie Chavoin organized a group of women in 1824 that became the Marist Sisters, or the Congregation of Mary (S.M.). These three Marist congregations include about three thousand members worldwide. Father Colin and his brother established a third order for lay people, from which later sprang the Marist Missionary Sisters.

Maritain, Jacques, 1882–1973, French Thomist philosopher. Reared a liberal Protestant, he studied under the philosopher Henri Bergson (d. 1941). Maritain and his wife, Raïssa (1883–1960), a Russian Jewish poet, became Catholics in 1906 and ardent disciples of Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274). After teaching in Paris at the Institute Catholique (1914–33), he taught at the Institute of Mediaeval Studies in Toronto (1933–45) and at Princeton University (1948–56). He also taught briefly at Columbia University, the University of Chicago, and at Notre Dame. He was French ambassador to the Vatican, 1945–48. From 1961 he lived with the Little Brothers of Jesus in Toulouse and joined their congregation in 1970.

Among Maritain's more than sixty books, The Degrees of Knowledge and Creative Intuition in Art and Poetry are characteristic. His democratic political philosophy influenced Catholic social thought after World War II. The Peasant of the Garonne bemoaned the aftermath of Vatican II (1962–65). See also neo-Thomism; Thomism.

Maritain, Raïssa, 1883–1960, poet and philosopher. A Jew born in Russia, she converted, with her husband, Jacques Maritain, to Catholicism. She collaborated extensively in his scholarly endeavors. See also Maritain, Jacques.

Marius Victorinus, ca. 283–after 362, rhetorician whose conversion to Christianity ca. 355 influenced Augustine. Marius gave up his chair after the emperor Julian forbade Christians to teach (362). His commentaries on Paul are the first written in Latin. His brilliant but heavily Neoplatonic trinitarian works were not widely influential after his death. See also Augustine of Hippo, St.; Neoplatonism.

Mar Ivanios (mahr ee-vahn'yohs), 1882–1953, Syro-Malankara archbishop who initiated the union of the Syro-Malankara Catholics with Rome in 1930. A leading bishop (1925) and metropolitan (1928) of the independent Syro-Jacobite church of India under the catholicos (Eastern patriarch), he initiated contacts with Rome with the approval of other Jacobite leaders. The only ones ultimately to join him in uniting to Rome were the men and women religious of the Order of the Imitation of Christ, which he founded as a Jacobite, and his suffragan bishop Mar Theophilos and a few other followers. See also Syro-Malankara Catholic Church.

Mark, St., the author of the Second Gospel. According to Catholic tradition, the author of the Second Gospel was John Mark. According to the Acts of the Apostles, his mother, Mary, owned a house in Jerusalem in which the earliest Christian community gathered (Acts 12:12). Barnabas and Saul (Paul) visited Jerusalem in order to bring a contribution to the poor of the community, who were suffering because of a famine (Acts 11:27–30). When they returned to Antioch, they took John Mark with them (Acts 12:25). He assisted them as they proclaimed the gospel in Cyprus (Acts 13:1–12). But when they arrived by ship in the city of Perga on the southern coast of Asia Minor (modern Turkey), John Mark left them and returned to Jerusalem (Acts 13:13). Later, after returning to Antioch, Paul and Barnabas decided to make a journey to visit the communities that they had founded. Barnabas wanted to take John Mark with them, but Paul objected since he had not persevered during the first journey. This led to a split between Barnabas and Paul; Barnabas traveled to Cyprus with John Mark, and Paul set out for Syria and Cilicia with Silas (Acts 15:36–41).

In the Letter of Paul to Philemon, Mark is mentioned among the fellow workers of Paul who send greetings (Phlm 24). In the Letter to the Colossians, whose Pauline authorship is disputed, Mark is mentioned as the cousin of Barnabas. The Christians of Colossae are urged to receive him hospitably, if he comes to them (Col 4:10). In 2 Timothy, which is attributed to Paul, but probably not actually written by him, Timothy is asked to bring Mark to Paul, since he is useful for the apostle's ministry (2 Tim 4:11).

Mark, the Evangelist known as the interpreter of Peter, shown with the first page of Mark's Gospel, in an illustration from the ninth-century Gospel Book of Bishop Ebo of Reims.

The first letter attributed to Peter presents itself as written in "Babylon," i.e., Rome (1 Pet 5:13). "Babylon" is a nickname for Rome, since Rome destroyed Jerusalem, as did the Babylonian Empire. In the same verse, Mark is mentioned as the "son" of Peter. The term is either an expression of affection or an indication that Peter was Mark's father in the faith. This indication that Mark was in Rome with Peter is probably connected with the tradition that Mark took notes that recorded Peter's reminiscences of the teaching and deeds of Jesus. This tradition was written down by Papias of Hierapolis, according to Eusebius, who also said that Mark was Peter's "interpreter" (Ecclesiastical History 3.39.15).

Eusebius also recorded the tradition that Mark was the first to bring the Christian faith to Egypt, that he made known there the gospel that he had written, and established churches in Alexandria (Eccl. Hist. 2.16.1–2). Eusebius portrays Mark as the first bishop of Alexandria (Eccl. Hist. 2.24). In later tradition, Mark is also associated with Venice. Feast day: April 25. See also evangelist. ADELA Y. COLLINS marks of the Church, the four "notes" that the Creed of Constantinople (more popularly known as the Nicene Creed) attributes to the Church, describing it as one, holy, catholic, and apostolic. The term "marks," or "notes," of the Church reflects the apologetic argument developed in confessional controversy, whereby Christians attempted to prove their Church to be the "one true Church" on the grounds that it alone possessed all the properties that the Church of Christ must have. The supposition of such an argument was that the marks or notes would be visible to all, easily verified, found in the true Church alone, and hence apt to demonstrate which of the various churches was the true one. It also involved the necessity of showing that the other churches did not manifest these marks, at least in the degree that would be required of the true Church.

Apologetics: Louvain theologian Gustave Thils has written the history of this apologetic argument, focusing on the problems that have led to its being largely discarded. The most serious of these was that the description of the notes that must be verified in the true Church tended to be modeled on the qualities that the apologist's own church possessed. Thus the premises of the argument would be established in function of the conclusion to be demonstrated. To give an obvious example: a Catholic controversialist would include in his definition of the unity of the Church, the requirement that the universal Church must be united under one supreme pastor. In fact, in some Catholic manuals, the four notes were practically reduced to the requirement that the true Church must be the one governed by the Bishop of Rome.

Another problem with the apologetic use of the marks of the Church was that it restricted the consideration of the four creedal properties of the Church to their visible or empirical aspects, because it was only in this respect that they could serve to identify the true Church. However, there is much more to the oneness, holiness, catholicity, and apostolicity of the Church than what can be seen of them.

In view of the problems inherent in the apologetic argument, theologians now more commonly discuss the four notes of the creed as properties of the Church, taking into account all their aspects, whether they are empirically verifiable or knowable only by faith. These theologians insist that as the Church itself is a mystery of faith, so also each of its properties shares in its nature as mystery. Theological discussion begins, therefore, with what we believe about the Church and seeks a deeper understanding of the Church precisely as one, holy, catholic, and apostolic.

One approach is to show how each of these properties is rooted in the nature of the Church as People of God and Body of Christ animated by the Holy Spirit. The oneness of the People of God is called for by the oneness of God whose people it is; its holiness by God's holiness; its catholicity by the universal salvific will of God; and its apostolicity by the fact that its mission comes ultimately from the Father who sent his Son into the world. The Church, as the Body of Christ, must likewise be one and holy in order to resemble its head; its catholicity is founded in the role of Christ as the one mediator of salvation for all of humanity; its apostolicity in its sending by the Risen Christ. Finally, it is the Holy Spirit who effectively brings about and maintains the Church's unity, holiness, catholicity, and apostolicity. The abiding gift of the Holy Spirit provides the guarantee that the Church is indefectibly one, holy, catholic, and apostolic.

The Marks of the Church as Challenges to the Church: While the gifts that Christ has bestowed on his Church cannot be lost, they can be obscured, diminished, imperfectly realized. Each of these properties is a gift definitively given, but is also a task to be achieved. Because the Church is one, it must work to overcome divisions and to achieve full communion. Because it is holy, it can never give up the struggle against its own sinfulness or give up the practice of penance and purification. Because it is catholic, it must strive to become present in every place where the gospel is still unknown. Because it is apostolic, it has to examine itself constantly to see whether it is being wholly faithful to the message and mission it has received from the apostles.

It follows that during its earthly pilgrimage, each of the Church's properties is both an object of faith and a test of faith. While Catholics believe that the Church is one, they see how divided it is and how slow is the progress being made toward reunion. While Catholics believe the Church is holy, they experience the sinfulness of God's people in ourselves. While Catholics believe the Church is catholic, statistics tell them that Christians are a diminishing minority of the world's people. While Catholics believe the Church is apostolic, they cannot help remarking on the many contrasts between the Church of today and the Church of the apostles.

However, Catholics cannot reconcile the Church of their profession of faith with the Church of their experience by imagining that there are two churches: one the ideal church of the creed and the other the real church of everyday life. Nor can Catholics settle for the idea that it is only when the Church has arrived at the kingdom of God that it will really be one, holy, catholic, or apostolic.

What Catholics say about the Church in the creed is an expression of Christian hope, grounded in the promises of the Lord, that the Church will enter into the kingdom as the one, holy, universal People of God. What Catholics say is also a profession of faith about the Church as it is now, during its earthly pilgrimage. Finally, it is a call to Catholics to take their part in the task laid upon the Church, to strive to be ever more fully the one, holy, catholic, and apostolic Church that they believe it already to be. See also apostolicity; catholicity; Church; holiness of the Church; unity of the Church.

Bibliography

Sullivan, Francis A. The Church We Believe In: One, Holy, Catholic and Apostolic. Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press, 1988.

FRANCIS A. SULLIVAN

Marmion, Joseph Columba, 1858–1923, abbot of Maredsous and influential spiritual author. Marmion was a spiritual guide to many, including the Belgium philosopher and bishop Cardinal Désiré Joseph Mercier (d. 1926). A Christ-centered spirituality is evident in his books Christ the Life of the Soul and Christ in His Mysteries. Marmion's reputation for holiness grew much after his death. See also Maredsous; Mercier, Désiré Joseph.

Maronite Catholic Church, an Eastern-rite Catholic community of Antiochene origin that has no Orthodox counterpart.

History: The history of the Maronites of Lebanon began in the late fourth century when a group of disciples gathered around the charismatic figure St. Maron. They later founded a monastery located midway between Aleppo and Antioch. In the fifth century the monastery was noted for its defense of the Christological doctrine of the Council of Chalcedon (451) espousing the two natures of Christ, one human and one divine.

Due to the Muslim invasions of the seventh century, the monks were compelled to move with their band of followers into the remote mountains of Lebanon, where they lived in relative isolation for centuries. It was during this period that they began to develop a distinct identity as a church and to elect their own head, who took the title of Patriarch of Antioch and All the East.

The Maronites came into contact with the Latin Church in the twelfth century, when the Crusader Kingdom of Antioch was founded. In 1182 the entire Maronite nation formally affirmed its union with Rome. But there is a strong tradition among the Maronites that their church never lacked communion with the Holy See.

Patriarch Jeremias II became the first Maronite patriarch to visit Rome when he attended the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215. This marked the beginning of close relations with the Holy See and a strong latinizing tendency.

The Maronite homeland was conquered by the Turks in the sixteenth century, and a long period of Ottoman domination began. By the nineteenth century the Western powers, especially France, began to offer protection to the Maronites. A massacre of thousands of them in 1860 provoked intervention by French military forces. The French formally took control of Lebanon after World War I.

When France granted Lebanon independence in 1944, it attempted to provide for the safety of the Maronite community by leaving behind a constitution guaranteeing that there would always be a Maronite president. The civil war that erupted in Lebanon in 1975 revealed, however, that the community's future remains precarious. Indeed, many thousands of Maronites have been leaving Lebanon for the West.

Structures: There is a Maronite patriarchal seminary at Ghazir and a diocesan seminary at Karm Sadde, near Tripoli. Advanced theological education is provided at the University of the Holy Spirit in Kaslik. A Maronite College was founded in Rome in 1584.

There are three Maronite monastic orders: the Lebanese Maronite Order, the Maronite Order of the Blessed Virgin Mary, and the Antonine Maronite Order. There is also an apostolic community, the Maronite-Lebanese Missionaries (Kreimists). Maronite women's orders include the Antonine Sisters, the Religious of the Lebanese Maronite Order, the Sisters of the Holy Family, the Sisters of Saint Thérèse of the Child Jesus, and the Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament of the Eucharist.

The Maronite patriarchs have resided at Bkerke, near Beirut, since 1790. In 1994 there were ten dioceses in Lebanon and six other jurisdictions in the Middle East. There are also Maronite dioceses in Argentina, Brazil, the United States, Australia, and Canada. In total, the Maronite Church has almost three million members. See also Antioch; Eastern churches; Eastern rites; Maronite monks; Maronite rite.

RONALD G. ROBERSON

Maronite College, one of the oldest of the pontifical Roman colleges for Eastern Catholic seminarians. Founded as a hospice by Pope Gregory XIII in 1581, it was converted into a seminary under the direction of the Jesuits from 1584 until their suppression in 1773. Since then it has had a precarious existence, having been closed, reopened, and closed again several times. The building remains in use in 1994. In the Jesuit period it produced brilliant scholars like the orientalists and liturgiologists Joseph Simon Assemani (1687–1768) and his nephew Joseph Aloysius Assemani (1710–82), whose works are still used today.

Maronite monks, Lebanese monks of the Maronite Catholic Church. The Maronite church was monastic in its roots, and its monks, following the Eastern model, resided in independent monasteries. Often called "Antonines" after Anthony of Egypt, a founder of monasticism, the Maronite monks are organized into religious congregations on the Western model: the Lebanese Maronite order (O.L.M.); the Mariamites or Maronite Order of the Blessed Virgin Mary (O.M.M.), an offshoot from the former; and the Maronite Antonine Order of Mar Isaya (O.A.M.). Though no longer strictly monastic orders, the Maronites have in the twentieth century seen a revival of traditional anchoritic (secluded monastic) life among some of their members, and they have given the Church a new hermit-saint in Mar Charbel. See also Mar Charbel; monk.

Maronite rite, the liturgical usages of the Maronite Catholic Church native to Lebanon. Often viewed as a latinized variant of the West Syrian rite, the Maronite rite is in fact an independent liturgical tradition related to but not identified with either the West Syrian or Chaldean rites. The Greek cities of Jerusalem and Antioch within the Eastern Empire, and Edessa, the cradle of Syriac Christian culture, were the three chief centers of liturgical creativity contributing to the formation of the Syriac liturgies. The Maronite rite originated as a monastic liturgy in Syria. It seems to have been an independent branch of the Edessene tradition developed by the Chalcedonian Syriac-speaking communities which established themselves independently of the Greek-speaking Mediterranean coastal region and preserved their ancient Syriac usages. Most of these Syriac-speaking Chalcedonian Orthodox ultimately adopted the Byzantine rite. The ancient Syriac usages were preserved by the monks who had taken refuge in the mountains of Lebanon at the beginning of the eighth century, laying the foundation for the Maronite church and rite. Living together with the Monophysites who developed the West Syrian tradition, the Maronites were heavily influenced by their usages. The Maronite calendar and Liturgy of the Hours are very closely related to the West Syrian. After coming into contact with Latin Catholics during the Crusades (1095–1291), the Maronite rite underwent progressive latinization, especially in the sanctoral (feasts of saints) and in the vestments and other externals of the eucharistic liturgy. But this latinization did not affect the Divine Office and the temporal cycle of the liturgical year, which retained their traditional shape. In the twentieth century the Maronite liturgy was restored, and Syriac has been gradually abandoned as the liturgical language in favor of Arabic or, in lands outside the homeland, other vernaculars. See also Maronite Catholic Church.

ROBERT F. TAFT

Marquette, Jacques, 1637–75, French Jesuit missionary and explorer. After his priestly ordination in 1666, he sailed from France to become a missionary to Native Americans. He spent several years evangelizing numerous tribes around the Great Lakes and helped found missions at Sault Ste. Marie and at St. Ignace (both in present-day Michigan). In 1673 Marquette accompanied Louis Jolliet on his exploration of the Mississippi River as far south as the mouth of the Arkansas River; he also founded a mission at Kaskaskia in Illinois. After falling ill, he decided to return to New France, but died enroute to Sault Ste. Marie.

marriage, form of, the manner of entering into a marriage. Until the sixteenth century Catholics in the West could marry simply by exchanging consent. In view of the abuses caused by clandestine, or secret, marriage and to protect spouses from desertion, the Council of Trent (1545–63) required a certain public procedure for Catholics entering into marriage. Though particulars have changed over the years, present legislation is substantially the same as then. Catholics are to marry in the presence of a properly authorized minister and two witnesses. See also Marriage; marriage law; Tametsi.

Marriage, liturgy of, the rite that celebrates and consecrates the union of a man and a woman in the sacrament of Matrimony. The 1969 reformed Rite of Marriage provides three ritual options: a rite for celebrating marriage during Mass, a rite for celebrating marriage outside of Mass, and a rite for celebrating marriage between a Catholic and an unbaptized person. A fourth entry offers optional texts for use in the wedding Mass or in the Marriage rite when celebrated outside of Mass. Common features of the three ritual options include the entrance rite, the Liturgy of the Word, the rite of Marriage, general intercessions, and the concluding rite.

The entrance rite is described in general terms, suggesting a flexible and adaptable approach to the action of entry and gathering of the assembly. The bride and groom are free to determine the pattern of entry in their preparation of the liturgy, based on local custom and aesthetic sensibility. After the entrance procession, the presider extends a word of welcome and then prays an opening prayer. The assembly then sits for the Liturgy of the Word, during which assigned readers proclaim two or three Scripture readings. The first is from the OT and the second from a NT Letter or the book of Revelation. The third reading is taken from one of the four Gospels and read by a priest or deacon, who then gives a homily drawn from the sacred texts. After the homily, the actual rite of Marriage begins with the presider's invitation to the bride and groom to state their intentions. Three questions are posed concerning freedom of choice, fidelity, and perpetuity, and the acceptance of children and their Christian formation. The declaration of consent and exchange of vows is followed with the blessing and exchange of rings.

Whether the rite of Marriage is celebrated during or outside of Mass determines what follows. Within the context of Mass, general intercessions and the liturgy of Eucharist—with the nuptial blessing after the Lord's Prayer—lead into the Communion rite, concluding rite, and dismissal. When the rite of Marriage is celebrated outside of Mass, general intercessions follow upon the blessing and exchange of rings. The nuptial blessing, the Lord's Prayer, general blessing, and dismissal conclude the rite. See also Marriage.

DANIEL P. GRIGASSY

MARRIAGE

Since the thirteenth century marriage has been recognized officially as one of the seven sacraments of the Catholic Church. Marriage is described in the revised Code of Canon Law as a "covenant by which a man and a woman establish between themselves a partnership of their whole life and which of its own very nature is ordered to the well-being of the spouses and to the procreation and upbringing of children" (can. 1055). This description, which follows the Second Vatican Council's Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (n. 48), provides headings to examine both marriage and the sacrament of marriage.

MARRIAGE

Everyone has probably been to and been moved by a wedding. For a valid marriage, however, only one wedding moment truly counts, the solemn moment of giving consent. After each partner has declared the willingness to take the other as husband or wife ("to have and to hold, from this day forward, for better, for worse, for richer, for poorer, in sickness and in health, until death do us part"), they are pronounced husband and wife. If their free consent is missing or is seriously flawed, there is no marriage, for free consent establishes marriage (can. 1057). An apparent marriage is null or invalid from the moment a seriously flawed consent is given. A later declaration of nullity, called an annulment, does not make such a marriage invalid; it merely declares that it was always invalid, despite appearances to the contrary.

Since the consent of the spouses establishes a marriage, in common with the other Western churches the Catholic Church teaches that the spouses, not the witnessing priest or deacon, are the ministers of the sacrament. The Orthodox churches of the East, on the other hand, teach that the presiding priest is the minister. Though in the Catholic Church he may not be the minister of the sacrament, the presiding priest plays a central liturgical role in the wedding ceremony, accepting and blessing the marriage on behalf of the Church.

What is the marriage that free consent establishes? An ancient Roman definition, found in the Digesta of the emperor Justinian, has dominated the answer to this question in the West. "Marriage is a union of a man and a woman, and a communion of the whole of life" (23.2.1). Marriage is a union of, and a communion between, a man and a woman by which they establish, as the canon law asserts, "a partnership of their whole life." The phrase "whole life" is ambiguous. It can mean as long as life lasts, and then it implies that marriage is a lifelong commitment. It can mean everything that the spouses have, and then it implies that nothing is left unshared between them. Over the years, both meanings have been so interwoven that marriage is looked upon as the union of a man and a woman sharing throughout the whole of their lives all their goods (see the concluding section).

Marriage, then, is a partnership of the whole of life between a man and a woman. But what is the partnership for? Again, in both the other Western and the Catholic traditions, there is no doubt. Marriage has two ends, the well-being of the spouses and the procreation and upbringing of children. For many years in the Catholic tradition, these two ends of marriage were categorized as secondary and primary, respectively. Where a conflict between the ends arose, the personal and marital well-being of the spouses, the secondary end, had to yield to the primary end of the procreation of children. The Second Vatican Council (1962–65) significantly altered that tradition.

The council taught, in the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, that both marriage and the marital love of the spouses "are ordained for the procreation and education of children, and find in them their ultimate crown" (n. 48). It refused, however, to employ the traditional primary/secondary end terminology. It taught that procreation "does not make the other ends of marriage of less account" and that marriage "is not instituted solely for procreation" (n. 50). That the omission of the traditional terminology was the result of deliberated choice was demonstrated beyond doubt when revised canon 1055, cited above, repeated the council's nonhierarchical formulation.

Marriage, therefore, is a loving partnership of the whole of life, established by the free consent of the spouses, and ordered equally to the mutual well-being of the spouses and to the procreation and nurture of children. When such a marriage is between two believers, the Catholic Church teaches, it is also both covenant and sacrament.

MARRIAGE AS COVENANT AND SACRAMENT

Since marriage is established by the consent of the spouses, it was traditionally considered under the legal heading of contract. Since the Second Vatican Council, however, it has come to be considered more under the religious heading of covenant. For Christians of all denominations, "covenant" echoes both the covenant between God and God's people and the covenant between Christ and his people, the Church. "Covenant," however, is not merely a biblical word; it is also a personal word. Covenants engage people and the mutual services of people; they are forever; they are religious realities, witnessed by God; they can be made only by adults who are mentally, emotionally, and spiritually mature. The designation of a marriage between Christians as a covenant, a common designation today in all the Christian churches, is intended to imply the religious fact that it is not only an echo of the two biblical covenants, but also an extension and a participation in both. It is precisely this idea that situates it also as sacrament.

Religions are always striving to find ways to image God and God's relationship to the human world. Since the ancient Israelites' idea of their special relationship to God, arising out of the covenant, was absolutely central to their self-understanding, it is not difficult to understand that they would search out a human reality to symbolize the covenant relationship. Neither is it difficult to understand why the reality they chose was the human covenant of marriage. The prophet Hosea was the first to speak of marriage as the image and symbol of the covenant between God and God's people.

The sacrament of Marriage being performed by a Catholic couple in the presence of a priest and two witnesses in San Juan Capistrano, California.

Hosea interprets his marriage to his wife, Gomer, a marriage superficially like any other marriage, as a prophetic symbol, announcing and making explicit in representation the covenant union between God and Israel. As Gomer left Hosea for other lovers, so also did Israel leave its God for other gods. As Hosea waits faithfully for Gomer's return and takes her back without recrimination, so, too, God waits for and takes back Israel. The marriage of Hosea and Gomer is dealt with as symbol and image of the relationship between God and Israel. In both covenants, the relationship has been damaged, even violated. But Hosea's human action images and reveals God's divine action of abiding and steadfast love. His action announces and makes explicit not only Hosea's faithfulness to his marriage, but also God's faithfulness to the covenant with Israel.

Hosea's prophecy introduces into religious history a clear, if mysterious, meaning about marriage. Beside being a secular institution, it is also a religious and prophetic symbol, announcing and making explicit in representation the abiding and steadfast love between God and Israel. Lived into from this perspective, lived into in faith, as Christians say today, marriage is a two-storied reality. On a first story, it signifies the mutual covenant love of this man and this woman; on a second story, it signifies in representation the mutual covenant love of God and God's people. This two-storied view of marriage becomes the Christian view. Jewish prophetic symbol becomes Catholic sacrament.

The classical Catholic definition of a sacrament, an outward sign instituted by Christ to give grace, can now be more fully explicated with respect to marriage. To say that a marriage between Christians is a sacrament is to say that it is a two-storied reality. On a first story, the ordinary human story, it announces and makes explicit the communion of life and love between a Christian man and woman. On a second story, the religious and symbolic story, it announces and makes explicit in representation the communion of life and love between Christ and Christ's people, the Church.

The partners entering into any marriage say to one another before witnesses: "I love you and I give myself to you." Christian partners entering into the sacrament of marriage say that too, but they also say more. They say: "I love you as Christ loves the Church, and I give myself to and for you as Christ gives himself to and for the Church." A sacramental marriage is, therefore, more than the civil marriage of a man and a woman; it is more than human covenant. It is also a religious marriage and covenant. God and God's Christ are present in it, theologically third partners in it, from its beginning.

This presence of grace in its most ancient Catholic sense, namely, the presence of the gracious God, is not something extrinsic to the covenant of sacramental marriage. It is something essential to it; without it the marriage is neither Christian or sacramental. Of course, Christian marriage announces and makes explicit the mutual love of a Christian man and woman. It also announces and makes explicit in representation their love for Christ, as well as their covenant to make their marriage an image and a symbol of Christ's steadfast covenant with his Church. It is in this sense that it is a sacrament, an outward sign in the human world of the presence of the God who is Grace. This two-storied meaning is what the Catholic Church intends when it teaches that the marriage covenant has been raised by Christ the Lord to the dignity of a sacrament.

MARRIAGE FOR THE WHOLE OF LIFE

In the contemporary world, it has become fashionable to be cynical about the marital promise "until death do us part," because, it is said, unconditional promises covering a period of some fifty years are just not possible. To promise to do something next week is one thing; to promise to do it fifty years from now, when so much will have changed, is another. Only conditional promises, made on the condition that nothing substantially changes in either spouse, can be made with any binding weight. At least, so runs the argument. The Catholic Church does not accept that argument, responding that marriage, especially sacramental marriage, is indissoluble (can. 1056).

The bride and groom receive the Eucharist under both species, consecrated bread and wine, in Cali, Colombia.

Following its interpretation of Jesus' Gospel words (Mark 10:11–12; Matt 5:32; 19:19; Luke 16:18), the Catholic Church teaches that a man and a woman marry for as long as life lasts. The Catholic Church regards it as self-evident that loving covenant creates a moral obligation to be faithful to one's covenant word. This is what both covenant and love mean. Covenant creates a relationship in which one binds oneself to keep one's word; love, by its very nature, tends to be lifelong.

The claim that the marriage vow "until death do us part" is impossible to make is false. It is perfectly possible for a man and a woman to commit themselves unconditionally, for commitment is a statement of present intention, not of future circumstance. It is false that they are helpless when and if one or the other wavers in marital commitment, even if one or the other or both have changed. It is entirely possible that principles freely chosen and lovingly embraced can continue to be freely chosen and lovingly embraced fifty years hence, even in substantially changed circumstances.

An example is the soldier going off to war. Like all other men and women, soldiers value life, liberty, and happiness. They do not value, however, just any life; they value the life of honor. They have freely chosen the principle of honor and, at any cost, they remain faithful to that principle.

That same choice has been made and continues to be made by those men and women who have freely committed themselves in marriage, not only to one another but also to love and honor, and who have willed to be faithful "until death do us part." For spouses in a sacramental marriage, their love of, and covenant with, one another is enhanced by their mutual love of, and their faithful commitment to, God in Christ.

The love that is at the root of sacramental marriage is the same love that is at the root of covenant, "steadfast love and faithfulness" (Exod 34:6). It is with such love that God loves Israel and Christ loves the Church. It is such love that is enjoined upon Christian husbands, who are to love their wives "as Christ loved the church and gave himself up for her" (Eph 5:25). We can be sure that the same love is also required from Christian wives. Christian spouses are to love one another steadfastly and faithfully.

This steadfast love, traditionally called fidelity, makes sacramental marriage exclusive and permanent (can. 1056). Christian marriage is indissoluble because Christian love is steadfast and faithful and indissoluble. Indissolubility is a quality of Christian marriage because it is, first and foremost, a quality of Christian love. If marital love exists only in germ on a wedding day, and it surely does, then so also does indissolubility exist only in germ. Marital love, the mainspring of indissoluble partnership of the whole of life, is not a given in a Christian marriage. It is an ongoing challenge, an eschatological challenge theologians call it, to which the spouses are called to respond as followers of the Christ who is for them the sacrament and the Incarnation of God.

Though the Catholic Church teaches that all marriages are indissoluble, in practice it does dissolve valid marriages. It dissolves nonsacramental marriages in the ancient procedure known as the Pauline Privilege, first enunciated by the Apostle Paul (1 Cor 7:15). It also dissolves valid marriages that have not been consummated (can. 1142). It never dissolves marriages that are both sacramental and consummated (can. 1141). These marriages are held to be absolutely indissoluble; only these marriages, in practice, are held to be for the whole of life.

See also annulment; indissolubility of marriage; Marriage, liturgy of; marriage, spiritual; marriage law; Privilege of the Faith; sacrament.

Bibliography

Fischer, Kathleen R., and Thomas N. Hart. Promises to Keep: Developing the Skills of Marriage. New York: Paulist Press, 1991.

Kasper, Walter. Theology of Christian Marriage. New York: Crossroad, 1981.

Lawler, Michael G. Secular Marriage: Christian Sacrament. Mystic, CT: Twenty Third Publications, 1985.

Schillebeeckx, Edward. Marriage: Secular Reality and Saving Mystery. New York: Sheed and Ward, 1965.

Tetlow, Elizabeth M. and Louis M. Partners in Service: Towards a Biblical Theology of Christian Marriage. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1983. MICHAEL G. LAWLER marriage, spiritual, symbolism from Christian mysticism expressing the highest union with God. This imagery for union with God appeared in early Greek and Jewish sources. In the latter the Lord took Israel as bride (Hos 2:19). Jesus referred to himself as bridegroom (Matt 9:15). In the early Jewish tradition commentators on the Song of Songs saw the young woman and man as symbolic of union between the Lord and Israel. Christian commentators extended that symbolism to the union of Christ with the Church and then to the individual. The Incarnation is the paradigm and source of a theology of this nuptial symbolism. Origen (d. 254), Gregory of Nyssa (d. 395), and Bernard of Clairvaux (d. 1153) were key articulators of this symbolism. Classical expression of this mystical symbolism awaited Teresa of Ávila (d. 1582) and John of the Cross (d. 1591). The former described this marriage symbolism in The Interior Castle with the spiritual espousals or betrothals taking place in the sixth mansion and spiritual marriage as transforming union in the seventh mansion. The latter is habitual, deeper loving union. For John of the Cross's comparison of spiritual espousals and spiritual marriage, see The Spiritual Canticle (22) and The Living Flame of Love (3.24–7). See also Bernard of Clairvaux, St.; Carmelite order; Gregory of Nyssa, St.; Incarnation, the; John of the Cross, St.; Origen; Teresa of Ávila, St.

Marriage Encounter, a marriage enrichment program developed by Father Gabriel Calvo in Barcelona, Spain, in the early 1960s. The encounter consists of a married couples' retreat weekend in which the couple seeks to deepen their relationship with one another and with God through personal reflection, dialogue with each other, and dialogue with other couples. The encounter employs various techniques such as journal writing, structured dialogue, group discussion, and "love letters," in which each partner in the couple reveals his or her deepest self to the other in the light of God's grace. The goal of the encounter is to deepen the marital bond and to encourage more open communication between the couple.

From Spain the encounter quickly spread to Latin America, Mexico, and in 1966 to the United States, where it was first introduced in Miami, Florida. The first English-speaking encounter took place at the 1967 annual convention of the Christian Family Movement at the University of Notre Dame. Since then, thousands of couples have experienced the encounter. Two groups promote Marriage Encounter: Worldwide Marriage Encounter, which is predominantly Catholic, and National Marriage Encounter, which is ecumenical. See also Christian Family Movement; Marriage.

marriage law, norms and legal reasoning related to marriage. The Catholic Church justifies its legislating with respect to marriage because of its theological understanding of the sacredness of marriage. The Church's laws regarding marriage deal only with the marriages of Catholics and those who are married to, or seek to marry, Catholics. The laws are, in some cases, based on aspects of marriage that are, in Catholic teaching, considered of divine institution and hence unchangeable by the Church (e.g., marriage's indissolubility); in other cases, the laws are based on considerations that admit to change and are of solely human origin (e.g., the requirement that the marriage take place before the parish priest).

The norms cover such matters as preparation for marriage, capacity to enter into marriage, the proper manner of celebrating marriage, record keeping of marriages celebrated within the Church, and certain rights and obligations of the spouses. The norms also consider the circumstances under which marital rights might be modified and the proper procedures to be used in seeking a dissolution or annulment of a marriage.

Matrimonial jurisprudence is the legal reasoning that considers how the theological and legal understanding of marriage is to be applied in a given instance or in cases similar to it. Such jurisprudence is used in the solution of cases within the ecclesiastical courts.

Post–Vatican II Developments: Marriage law has developed considerably ever since Vatican II (1962–65) in the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (n. 48) asserted the personalist end of marriage as well as the procreative end. This development is reflected especially in the jurisprudence used in cases dealing with annulments of marriage. In particular, the capacity to fulfill the personalist end together with adequate decision making prior to entering into this personalist relationship became matters of greater concern in the review of a marriage done by marriage tribunals. These concerns have led to changes within the code of canon law itself, specifically with regard to the capacity for marriage. Canon 1095 considers marital capacity and the proper discretion to be taken in making a decision to marry. The understanding of capacity to wed found in this canon developed directly from cases in which tribunals considered the meaning of the obligations of marriage in light of the teaching of the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World.

These newer avenues of investigation have given rise to a greater number of successful applications for annulment. The larger number of successful annulments has led, in turn, to a larger number of applicants. The consequently larger number of annulments granted has also caused some to criticize marriage tribunals for laxity, although the causes of increased annulments are more likely to be found in developing theology and canonical jurisprudence, together with the willingness of more people to apply.

Another significant development in marriage law has arisen from increased ecumenical contacts and activities in the postconciliar age. Although Catholics in a mixed or interfaith marriage must still promise to do all they can to raise the children Catholic, non-Catholics are no longer required to make such a promise. In addition, the bishop may allow the marriage ceremony to take place in the rite of the non-Catholic's religion. See also annulment; indissolubility of marriage; Marriage. JOHN F. LAHEY

Marsilius of Padua, ca. 1275–1342, political theorist who attacked monarchical papal ecclesiology in his famous work The Defender of the Peace (1324). Rejecting centuries of claims about the divine origin of the Church, he insisted that whatever rights it possesses are granted the Church at the will of the state. He also undercut the authority of popes within the Church, giving the primacy to general councils in ecclesial affairs. When his teachings were condemned by John XXII in 1327, he was protected by the pope's enemy, Emperor Louis of Bavaria. See also conciliarism.

Martha, St., NT figure who, with her sister Mary, received Christ into her home (Luke 10:38) and witnessed the raising of Lazarus from the dead (John 11:1–46). Later hagiographical tradition links her, her sister (identified with Mary Magdalene), and Lazarus with the evangelization of Provence in France. Feast day: July 29.

Martha/Mary story, a story that appears only in Luke's Gospel (10:38–42). It has been commented upon extensively in the contemplative tradition affirming the primacy of prayer and contemplation. Both women were disciples who offered hospitality to Jesus—Martha provided food and other courtesies, but Mary, who chose the "better part" of hospitality, "sat at the Lord's feet and listened to what he was saying." The story is remarkable as a revelation of women as disciples and as an affirmation of listening to Jesus. See also discipleship.

Martin de Porres, St. (mahr'tin deh pohr'ez), 1579–1639, Dominican lay brother. From his convent in Lima, Peru, he cared for the sick, ministered to the poor, and had a special ministry to African slaves. Of mixed blood himself, he is the patron saint of interracial justice. Feast day: November 3.

Martin I, St., d. 655, pope from 649 to 653 and martyr. After being elected pope Martin convoked a council that condemned Monothelitism (649), a Christological heresy. Emperor Constans II, a Monothelite, had Martin arrested and brought to Constantinople. Already ill, Martin was first imprisoned, then exiled to the Crimea, where he died. Feast day: April 13 (formerly November 12). See also Monothelitism.

Martin de Porres, patron of interracial justice, a Dominican lay brother who was devoted to the poor and to slaves brought to Peru from Africa; he was canonized by Pope John XXIII in 1962.

Martin IV [Simon de Brie], 1210–85, pope from 1281 to 1285. An ambitious servant of the Church and crown, his election was assured by the king of Sicily. Martin spent much of his pontificate promoting Sicily's interests in Constantinople at the expense of peace with the Eastern Church.

Martin V [Oddo Colonna], 1368–1431, pope from 1417 to 1431. Elected at the Council of Constance to replace the three rival claimants deposed by the council, he provided strong leadership to rebuild Church unity, consolidating power at Rome and reestablishing his authority in the Papal States. A moderate conciliarist, Martin undertook to implement many of the reforms issued at Constance, opposing those limiting papal power. His hopes of ending the schism with the East went unfulfilled. See also Constance, Council of; Great Schism.

Martini, Carlo Maria, b. 1927, Italian cardinal. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1944 and was ordained a priest in 1952. After receiving his doctorate in theology at the Pontifical Gregorian University, Rome, and then a doctorate in Sacred Scripture at the Pontifical Biblical Institute, also in Rome, he became professor and then rector of the Pontifical Biblical Institute (1969–78) and rector of the Pontifical Gregorian University (1978–79). In 1980 he was appointed archbishop of Milan and was made a cardinal in 1983. Since 1987 he has been president of the Council of Episcopal Conferences of Europe. A biblical scholar and spiritual writer, he is the author of over forty books, including Ignatian Exercises in the Light of St. John (1981), Reflections on the Church: Meditations on Vatican II (1987), Through Moses to Jesus: The Way of the Paschal Mystery (1988), Women in the Gospels (1990), and Perseverance in Trials: Reflections on Job (1992). In the 1990s he is frequently mentioned as a likely successor to Pope John Paul II. If Martini were elected, he would be the first Jesuit pope in history.

Martin of Braga, St., ca. 515–80, bishop. Having introduced monasticism to Galicia, in the northwest of Spain, Martin was ordained bishop of Dumium (556), then became archbishop of Braga (before 572). He presided over the Second Council of Braga (572) and wrote (among other works) a treatise against pagan superstitions. Feast day: March 20.

Martin of Tours, St., ca. 316/17–97, patron saint of France and a founder of Western monasticism. Martin's life is known primarily from the biography written by Sulpicius Severus, who shared the account with Martin before the saint's death on November 8, 397. Martin was born to pagan parents, became a catechuman at age twelve, took a military oath at fifteen, and was baptized at eighteen. The emperor Julian granted him a discharge from military service at Worms in 356. Martin took up the monastic life in Milan. Later, after Hilary of Poitiers returned from exile, Martin moved to Gaul and established the first French monastic community south of Poitiers in 360–61. He became the bishop of Tours on July 4, 371, lived at the cathedral for a time, and then resumed his monastic existence outside the town. He protested the execution of Priscillian, ca. 386. A huge crowd attended his burial in Tours, and many miracles were reported at the site. Feast day: November 11. See also monasticism.

martyr (Gk., martys, "witness"), a person who has given up his or her life for the Christian faith. Many martyrs died in the persecutions before Constantine's edict of toleration (313). The shedding of one's blood in the face of persecution was seen as a kind of second baptism in which one's sins were forgiven and salvation assured. The custom of the celebration of the martyr's "birthday," usually on the date of death, began in the second century. Later theologians established three criteria for proclaiming a person a martyr: (1) physical death occurred; (2) the death was the result of malice toward Christian life and truth; and (3) it was undergone voluntarily in defense of Christian life and truth. See also martyrdom; martyrology.

martyrdom, death as a result of refusal to renounce or compromise one's faith and thus the "witness" par excellence to one's faith. In the book of Revelation (ca. 95) the word "martyr" (Gk., "witness") is used of those who have shed their blood for Jesus (2:13; 17:6), and the word is used in this sense in the earliest extant account of a Christian martyr, The Martyrdom of Polycarp (ca. 157). Like the slightly later Letter of the Churches of Lyons and Vienne (ca. 177) describing the sufferings of Christians there, it is a letter meant to be read publicly, probably liturgically, and circulated to other churches. The veneration of the martyrs often included celebration of the Eucharist at the martyr's tomb on his or her "birthday," i.e., anniversary of death; already

The martyrdom of Stephen, the first martyr; he was despised perhaps as much by Jewish Christians, who were opposed to his bringing the gospel to non-Jews in the Greek-speaking world, as by non-Christian Jews, who opposed his preaching of Christ as the Messiah; painting in the Church of St. Mary of the Purification, Bologna, Italy.

Cyprian of Carthage (d. 258) regards this practice as ancient. In many places a funerary banquet accompanied the celebration.

Martyrs were inspired by the story in 2 Macc 6:18–7:41 (cf. 4 Macc) of Eleazar and the woman with seven sons, whose heroic refusal to comply with anti-Jewish laws resulted in torture and death. The martyrs regarded their passion as a share in the Passion of Christ, who suffered with the martyr and enabled him or her as an "athlete of Christ" to endure and triumph in combat with the devil. Those confessing the faith in defiance of the authorities were regarded as Spirit-filled and thus as able to forgive sins in the name of Christ, both in their life on earth and subsequently in heaven. Unbaptized persons who died for the faith were regarded as baptized by the shedding of their own blood.

Accounts of martyrs' deaths are preserved in two basic types, the "passion" or narrative account, such as that of Polycarp or the Passion of Perpetua and Felicitas (ca. 203), and the "acts" of the martyr, an account of the trial, sentence, and execution, e.g., the Acts of Justin Martyr (ca. 165), of the Scillitan martyrs (ca. 180), of Cyprian of Carthage (ca. 258).

Cult of Martyrs: In the fourth century the cult of the martyrs was greatly expanded. The funerary banquets were gradually suppressed but the commemorative liturgies were amplified with vigils, readings, chants, and panegyrics; churches were built on the site of the martyrs' tombs, and these became frequented by pilgrims; the relics of the martyrs were themselves honored and sometimes translated from their original burial site to a repository in a church or basilica (the first remains to be so translated were those of the martyr Babylas of Antioch, ca. 351). The martyr's body was (and is still) venerated as a temple of God. As persecutions ceased in the Roman Empire (although they continued in Persia), ideals of virtue or asceticism as spiritual equivalents of martyrdom were developed, and persons who were not martyrs came to be venerated as saints. But the refusal of the martyrs to apostasize in the face of physical death continued to be regarded as the witness to faith par excellence and was one of the primary reasons for the survival, spread, and eventual triumph of the Church. See also martyr; martyrology; Passion, the; Roman Martyrology.

JOHN C. CAVADINI

martyrology, a list of the feast days of saints with all applicable names for any given date, unlike a church calendar, which usually gives only one name per day. A martyrology gives some biographical data with each name, such as place of origin, death, or burial. Other important dates are sometimes noted, e.g., dates of discoveries and translations of relics, of episcopal consecrations, of birth, of the dedications of churches to the saint. The most influential martyrologies in Western history were the Martyrologium Hieronymianum, attributed to Jerome and the source of all medieval martyrologies, and the Roman Martyrology, which emerged at the end of the Middle Ages. Monastic reading from the martyrology at daily chapter (community assembly) led to an increase in the number and kinds of lists. See also martyr; martyrdom; Roman Martyrology.

Marxism, the philosophy and political system proposed by Karl Marx (1818–83). Rejecting idealism and skepticism, Marx held that nothing exists except matter that develops dialectically by a conflict of forces producing higher syntheses through violent revolutions. Hence, human history is a struggle between social classes that arise from technological progress in the mode of economic production. The mode of "industrial capitalism," based on private property and advanced technology, inevitably develops an organized labor force conscious that it is being exploited by nonproductive capitalists, who raise profits by reducing wages, or seizing colonies for cheap labor. This internal "contradiction" of capitalism will generate wars and finally revolution. The workers will control the means of production in a socialist state, but will be forced to defend themselves through rule by a vanguard Communist party ("dictatorship of the proletariat"). Once these counterforces have been liquidated, communism will arise as a classless, anarchistic (cooperative), nonviolent, democratic society based on economic abundance and a materialist education free of religious ideology.

Marxism has received many interpretations, ranging from emphasis on democratic and humanistic gradualism (i.e., an incremental movement toward democracy and respect for human rights) to apologies for the necessity of violence and dictatorship, as in the Marxist Leninism of the former Soviet Union, now largely discredited, and Maoist China. From Pope Leo XIII's time (d. 1903), the Church has condemned Marxist atheism, materialism, violence, and violation of human rights, but has also agreed with much of Marx's criticism of unregulated capitalism. Liberation theology has been influenced by Marxism's advocacy of the rights of the poor and its critique of systemic economic injustices. See also Catholic social teachings; communism; liberation theology. BENEDICT M. ASHLEY

Mary, Gospel of, a second-century apocryphal account of Mary (Magdalene) comforting the other grieving disciples and her report of secret teachings she had received, including an account of the soul's journey past hostile powers. The male disciples challenge her words as being strange and deny that the Savior would confide in a woman. See also apocryphal Gospels; Mary Magdalene, St.

Mary Clopas, St., one of the women at the Cross, wife of Clopas, (John 19:25). She may be the mother of James "the Less" and Joseph (Matt 27:56; Mark 15:40). If Clopas is Joseph's brother, mentioned in Eusebius (Ecclesiastical History 3.11; 4.22), this Mary would be the Blessed Virgin's sister-in-law. Feast day: April 9.

Maryknoll, Catholic Foreign Mission Society of America (M.M.), foreign missionary society based in the United States. Concern among American Catholics for the foreign missions began to intensify in the early twentieth century. At this time two diocesan priests, James A. Walsh of Boston, Massachusetts, and Thomas F. Price of Raleigh, North Carolina, promoted the idea of an American Catholic foreign mission society among prominent members of the American hierarchy. The hierarchy officially approved the concept at their annual meeting in 1911, and with the authorization of Pope Pius X, Maryknoll was established that year with Walsh and Price as its cofounders. Its name is derived from the hill, or knoll, on the property in New York State where Fathers Walsh and Price first purchased land. Both had a special devotion to the Blessed Virgin Mary.

Modeled on the French organization the Foreign Missionaries of Paris, Maryknoll priests are secular priests who do not take religious vows. The first Maryknoll mission was in China in 1918, and by the time of World War II there were missions scattered throughout the Far East. Maryknoll established missions in South America in 1942 and in Africa four years later. Maryknoll attracted many young men, and by 1965 there were 1,240 members in the society. Included in the society were brothers, laymen who wished to devote their lives to the foreign missions. A parallel society of women religious, officially known as the Maryknoll Sisters of St. Dominic, was also founded in 1912 by Mother Mary Joseph (Molly Rogers, Bishop Walsh's secretary). Maryknoll has been active in mission education since its founding, and most laypeople first hear about Maryknoll through the society's magazine, Maryknoll (formerly Field Afar).

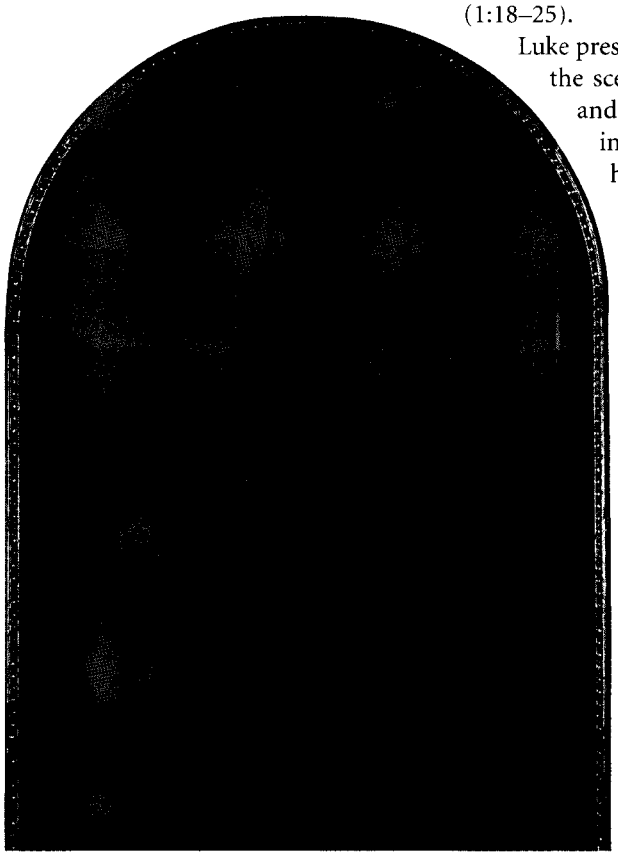
In 1994 there were 602 priests and 49 brothers serving in twenty-four countries in Asia, Africa, and Latin America. There were 774 sisters serving in twenty-nine countries worldwide. Four hundred lay missioners (men, women, and families) have also served since 1975, when the Maryknoll Lay Mission Program was established. In 1994 there were 148 lay missioners serving in seventeen countries. The Lay Mission Program was founded as a coequal Maryknoll group in August, 1994. See also clergy, secular; Maryknoll Sisters; missions. JAY P. DOLAN

BLESSED VIRGIN MARY

The Blessed Virgin Mary is the first-century Jewish woman who was the mother of Jesus; now a preeminent member of the communion of saints. The image of Mary in its many forms is woven throughout the life of the Church and her importance is expressed in doctrine, liturgy, piety, and theology.

BIBLICAL PICTURE

The NT depicts Mary in various ways. Mark's Gospel casts her along with Jesus' brothers in a negative light, placing them outside the crowded circle of those who form his eschatological family which is based on faith (3:20–35). In Matthew's Gospel this negative connotation is removed. His infancy narrative depicts Mary fulfilling the ancient promise that a virgin would conceive and bear a son who would be Emmanuel (Heb.), "God with us." While the annunciation of this news is given to Joseph, Mary's husband, Mary is the one with child from the Holy Spirit (1:18–25).



The Madonna and Child with John the Baptist; sixteenth-century Renaissance painting on wood by Raphael, Louvre, Paris.

Luke presents a highly positive portrait of Mary. In the scene parallel to Mark's, with the brothers and the crowded house, she is now included in the eschatological family of those who hear the word of God and do it (8:19–21). His infancy narrative depicts her story in scenes of literary artistry: the angel Gabriel's annunciation along with her willing response; the encounter with the pregnant Elizabeth; her canticle, the Magnificat, praising God for the great things done for her and for those who are poor and lowly; the birth scene in a stable in Bethlehem because there was no room in the inn; the visit of the shepherds; the presentation of Jesus in the Temple where she hears the prophecy of her own future suffering (chs. 1–2). Luke concludes his portrait of Mary by placing her in the upper room in Jerusalem after the Ascension of Jesus, where with the rest of the post-Easter community she prays and awaits the coming of the Holy Spirit (Acts 1:14). She is thus a woman of faith and member of the earliest Christian community.

John's Gospel depicts "the mother of Jesus" (he never uses her name) in two highly symbolic scenes. At the beginning of Jesus' ministry she attends the wedding feast at Cana, bringing the lack of wine to Jesus' attention and instructing the servants to obey his word (2:1–11). At the end, she, along with Mary Magdalene, some other women, and "the disciple whom Jesus loved," stands by the cross of Jesus. His mother and beloved disciple are entrusted into each other's care, the nucleus of the new community of believing disciples (19:25–27).

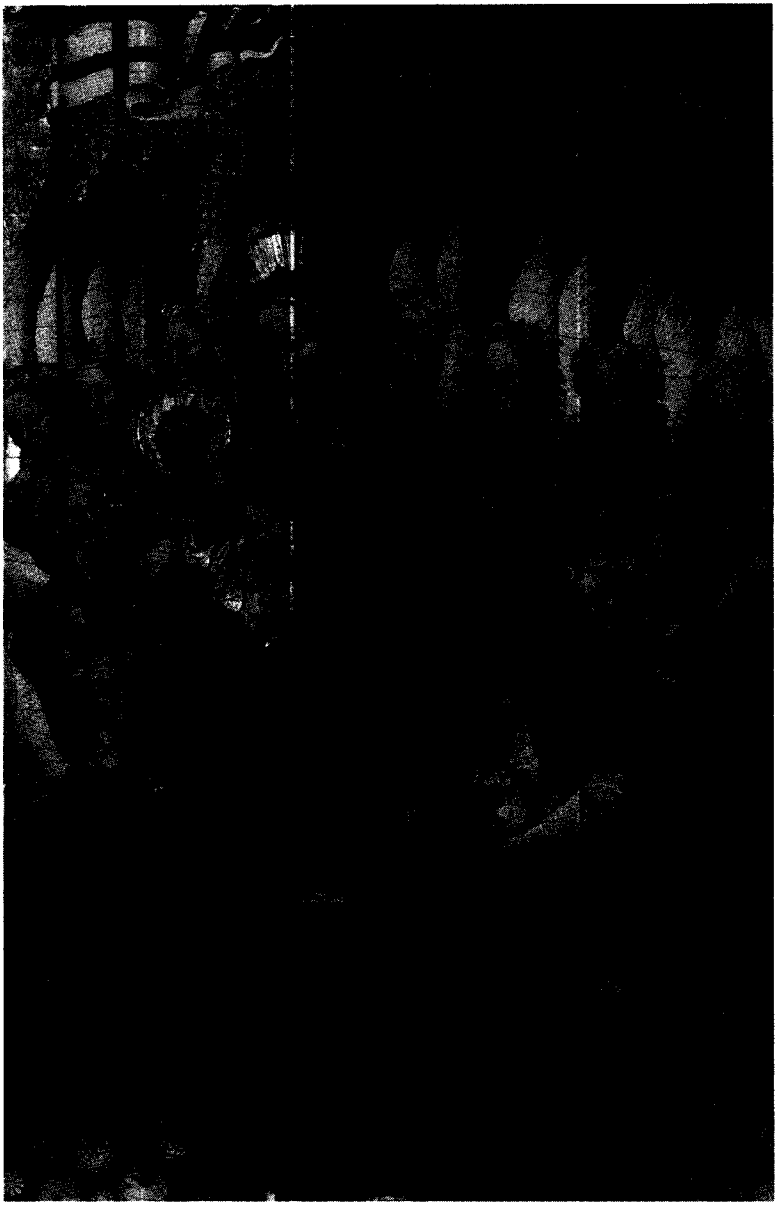
HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT

Biblical depictions of Mary were conflated in the following centuries, so that various images of the woman of faith, the virgin who gave birth to the Messiah, and the woman at the cross reinforced each other. Additional material was added from the book of Revelation's parable of a woman clothed with the sun giving birth to a son of destiny amid apocalyptic agonies (ch. 12, originally intended to depict collectively the People of God); and from apocryphal writings, most notably the Protevangelium of James, which gives a legendary account of her parentage, youth, and marriage. The Marian symbol as it grew through history is an amalgam of various sources.

Patristic theology contains relatively little about Mary, but three themes steadily emerged. She is the new Eve who, by her obedience, overturns the ancient mother's disobedience, bringing into the world not death but the life that is Christ. Her virginity in conceiving Christ, which is biblically attested, remains when she gives birth to Christ and forever after. And her maternity of the Word-made-flesh makes it legitimate to address her as Theotokos (Gk.), "God-bearer," or Mother of God.

This last belief came under scrutiny in the fifth century in a dispute over the unity of Christ. Nestorius, the patriarch of Constantinople, argued that since Christ had two distinct natures, human and divine, the latter indwelling the former, Mary could be called the Mother of Christ but not the Mother of God. Against this the Council of Ephesus (431) ruled that since there was only one divine person in Jesus Christ, it could truly be said that Mary was the Mother of God. Although the focus of this decision was on Christology, it gave a major impetus to Marian devotion.

In Western medieval piety and theology, the image of Mary as mediatrix of God's grace to unworthy sinners came to the fore. The idea that Mary had a maternal influence over God, that she could turn away Christ's just anger and obtain mercy for sinners had already been accepted in the East, as seen in the popularity of the Theophilus legend. In this story a man bargains his soul away to the devil to gain a lucrative job. Near death he implores Mary to get back the contract, which she does after contending with the devil. Theophilus dies forgiven and avoids eternal hell. Translated into Latin in the eighth century, this story exercised great influence on the West's notion of Mary's power to save.



The Blessed Virgin Mary, Mother of the Lord, shown here with a choir of angels, all bejeweled with white harts, the personal symbol of King Richard II; late fourteenth-century Flemish-school painting on wood, National Gallery, London.

Her privileges grew in a way commensurate with her powers. The principle that God could gift Mary in a certain way, should do so, and therefore did (Lat., potuit, decuit, fecit) shaped theological reflection. She was called the aqueduct along which divine grace flows to earth, the neck between the Head and the Body of Christ, "mediator with the Mediator," Mother of mercy, and refuge of sinners; she was approachable because of her maternal love. The doctrines of her Immaculate Conception and Assumption gained ground. People showed their devotion through pilgrimages, veneration of her images, dramatizing stories of her miracles and apparitions, and a wealth of new prayers. Prayers such as the Hail Mary and the Rosary, still in use, date from this period.

The Protestant Reformers criticized the luxuriant growth of this devotion, deploring the lack of trust in God's graciousness communicated through Christ alone. The response of the Council of Trent (1545–63) was muted. It simply taught that it was good and useful to invoke the saints and called upon each local bishop to correct abuses. Subsequent centuries saw renewed growth of the Marian tradition in the Catholic Church. The Immaculate Conception (1854) and the Assumption (1950) were declared dogmas by papal decrees, which elicited strong criticism from Protestants. A new series of reported apparitions (at La Salette, Lourdes, Fátima, and many more), pious books such as The Glories of Mary by Alphonsus Liguori (d. 1787), papal encyclicals, customs such as wearing the miraculous medal and scapular, Marian years, Marian congresses, and new feasts (the Queenship of Mary) all kept Mary paramount in the Catholic mind.

On the eve of Vatican II theologians were divided into at least two factions: those who wished to use the occasion of the council to define yet another Marian dogma and those who, in accord with twentieth-century theological renewal and ecumenical dialogue, wished to realign the Marian tradition more in accord with Scripture, liturgy, and the patristic tradition.

VATICAN II

The council decided in its closest vote to incorporate its teaching on Mary into the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (Lumen Gentium), thus ending Marian theology's isolation and rooting it firmly in the mainstream of the truths of faith. Entitled "The Role of the Blessed Virgin Mary, Mother of God, in the Mystery of Christ and the Church," ch. 8 of this constitution situates Mary in the midst of the communion of saints, those whose example and prayer in heaven give courage and consolation to the pilgrim Church on earth (ch. 7) and all of whom live in the light of Christ (ch. 1).

A preface to this chapter connects Mary to Christ and the Church by noting that Mary is "one with all human beings in their need for salvation" at the same time that she is a "preeminent and altogether singular member of the Church" (n. 53). In relation to Christ, her life was lived as a "pilgrimage of faith" from his birth to his death as she actively cooperated with the work of salvation through free faith and obedience (n. 58). In relation to the Church, she is a member who stands as a model and excellent exemplar of faith, charity, and union with Christ. Taking up the thorny matter of her mediation, the chapter notes that calling upon her within a rightly ordered faith as Advocate or Mediatrix does not detract from the sole mediation of Christ but rather shows forth his power, since his mediation gives rise among creatures "to manifold cooperation which is but a sharing in this unique source" (n. 62). The chapter closes with teaching about the proper devotion directed toward Mary. It differs essentially from the adoration given to God alone but shows reverence to her as the God-bearer. In preaching and practice two extremes are to be avoided: narrow-mindedness, on the one hand, and exaggeration or vain credulity, on the other (n. 67). In the end the Church looks to Mary in hope, for she is the first flowering of what the pilgrim People of God are destined to become.

On balance this chapter steered a judicious middle course between opposing views. Its structure, which places Mary in relation to Christ and the Church, and its insights into her faith continue to shape the Marian tradition, being utilized in every postconciliar magisterial instruction about Mary, such as Paul VI's apostolic exhortation Marialis Cultus (On Marian Devotion, 1974) and John Paul II's encyclical Redemptoris Mater ("Mother of the Redeemer," 1987).

DOCTRINE

The Church teaches four major doctrines about Mary, two ancient and two modern. Stemming from the patristic period are beliefs in her virginity (before, during, and after the birth of Christ) and divine maternity, the latter summed up in the title Mother of God. The Immaculate Conception (Mary was conceived without original sin) and Assumption (she was taken into heaven body and soul at the end of her life) were officially declared dogmas in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, respectively.

LITURGY

In every celebration of the Eucharist there is a remembrance of Mary along with the apostles, martyrs, and all the saints. The pilgrim Church joins them in praising God and hopes one day to share their joy before the face of God. Throughout the liturgical year, which begins with the first Sunday of Advent, the Church also honors Mary in differently ranked liturgical celebrations comprised of four solemnities, three feasts, and a number of memorials. The solemnities are Immaculate Conception (December 8), Mary Mother of God (January 1), Annunciation of the Lord (March 25), and Assumption (August 15). The feasts are Presentation of the Lord (February 2), Visitation (May 31), and Birth of Mary (September 8). Memorials include Our Lady of Guadalupe (December 12), Queenship of Mary (August 22), Our Lady of Sorrows (September 15), Our Lady of the Rosary (October 7), Presentation of Mary (November 21), and other optional memorials.

DEVOTION

In addition to liturgical remembrance Catholics honor Mary by prayers and practices, both private and public, such as the rosary, pilgrimages, and veneration of icons. Developing the teaching of Vatican II, Paul VI wrote the apostolic exhortation Marialis Cultus in 1974. In it he lays down theological principles and practical guidelines by which the legitimacy of any aspect of Marian devotion may be judged.

The principles stem from basic creedal truths. Honoring Mary should occur within the bounds of a rightly ordered faith and thus not overshadow the one triune God: Father, Son, and Spirit. It should keep clearly in view that Christ alone is the merciful Savior and one Mediator between God and human beings. It should give due recognition to the working of the Holy Spirit in the gift of grace. And it should give expression to the newly recognized connection between Mary and the Church.

The guidelines are drawn from the biblical, liturgical, ecumenical, and anthropological developments endorsed by the council. Honoring Mary should be imbued with the Scriptures, not just a text or symbol here or there but the great biblical themes of salvation history. Since the liturgy is the golden norm of Christian piety, devotion to Mary should harmonize with its spirit, themes, and seasons. Ecumenically, care should be taken lest a wrong impression be given to other Christian churches, even unintentionally, especially with regard to Christ's unique role in salvation. Culturally, practices should cohere with the mores of a people, such as the emergence of women today into all fields of public life. All of these principles and guidelines should be used to judge the adequacy of traditional devotional practices or the formation of new ones.

THEOLOGY

The amount of attention given to the theology of Mary (Mariology) by itself has waned since the council, with Marian themes now integrated into the theologies of Christ and the Church. The central theological image is that of Mary as a woman of faith, preeminent among the disciples, the first of the redeemed in Christ. While not significant on the world stage, her simple human life shows forth the victory of God's grace. Her historical role as the mother of Jesus, while unique, is interpreted through the lens of graced existence, which she shares in solidarity with all the people of God. Only in this way can she be a model, or symbolic embodiment, of the Church.

From the vantage point of systemic poverty, liberation theology builds on this image to interpret Mary as a peasant, village woman, a woman of the people who has particular care for the poor, a point emphasized by John Paul II in Redemptoris Mater. In her Magnificat she sang of the liberation coming from God, who puts down the mighty from their thrones and exalts the lowly, fills the hungry with good things but sends the rich away empty (Luke 1:52–53). And she paid the price in suffering: giving birth while homeless, fleeing from a murderous ruler, becoming a refugee in a strange land, being the mother of an unjustly executed son. Criticizing the passivity of the traditional image of Mary held out as a model for women, feminist theology interprets the biblical scenes to highlight her as a free woman, active, courageous, and intelligent, a point emphasized by Paul VI in Marialis Cultus. In this view the dogmas of the Immaculate Conception and Assumption also attest to the goodness of women's human nature, capable of grace and glory.

Ecumenically, in addition to these two Marian dogmas, a main point of contention is the Catholic practice of invoking Mary as well as other saints and asking her to "pray for us." This seems to overshadow Christ as the sole Mediator and historically, in fact, such was the case. Catholics respond that within a rightly ordered faith this is an expression of our solidarity in the communion of saints, analogous to asking other living persons to pray for us. But it persists as an issue where the churches diverge.

For all the cultural, class, gender, and theological differences that are evident in the interpretation of Mary, it remains the case that remembering her, thanking God for her, drawing on her example, and asking for her prayers is an abiding and deeply rooted characteristic of the Catholic community.

See also apparitions of the Blessed Virgin Mary; Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary; communion of saints; Immaculate Conception; infancy Gospels; Magnificat; Marialis Cultus; Marian devotion; Marian feasts; Mariology; Mediatrix; Mother of God; Theotokos.

Bibliography

Anderson, H. George, J. Francis Stafford, and Joseph Burgess, eds. The One Mediator, the Saints, and Mary. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1992.

Brown Raymond, Karl Donfried, Joseph Fitzmyer, and John Reumann, eds. Mary in the New Testament. New York: Paulist Press; Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1978.

Donnelly, Doris, ed. Mary, Woman of Nazareth. New York: Paulist Press, 1989.

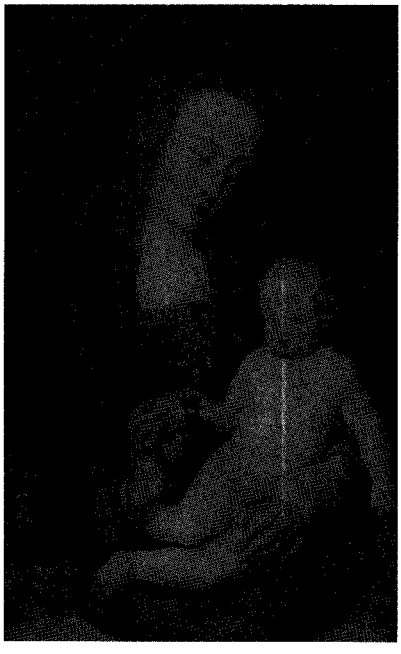
Gebara, Ivone, and Maria Clara Bingemer. Mary, Mother of God, Mother of the Poor. Maryknoll, New York: Orbis Books, 1989.

Graef, Hilda. Mary, A History of Doctrine and Devotion. Combined ed. Westminster, MD: Christian Classics, 1985.

ELIZABETH A. JOHNSON

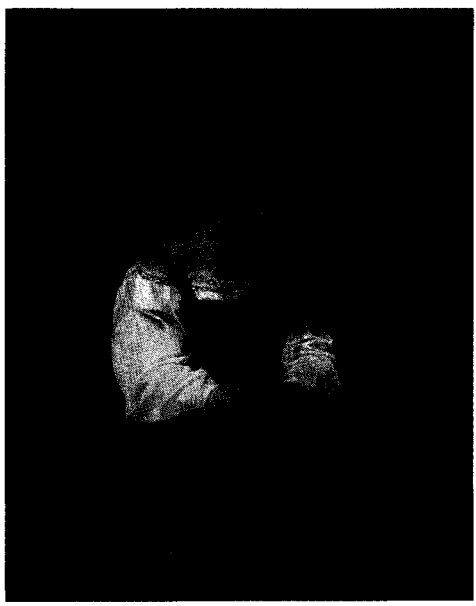


The Blessed Virgin Mary hands a pomegranate to the child Jesus; Renaissance painting by Hans Holbein the Elder (d. 1524), Kunsthistorisches Museum, Vienna.

Maryknoll Sisters (M.M.), a religious order for women founded at Ossining, New York, by Mary Josephine Rogers in 1912. Inspired by the missionary zeal of her Protestant friends at Smith College, Rogers associated herself closely with the work of Father James A. Walsh, a leader in the emerging missionary movement among American Catholics. Father Walsh gathered the first women who would be the nucleus of the Maryknoll Sisters. By 1920 they were officially established as the Foreign Mission Sisters of St. Dominic. Today they are known as the Maryknoll Sisters of St. Dominic. The following year the first group of sisters went to China. In the 1990s they serve in missions in over twenty countries and include over eight hundred members. See also Maryknoll.

Mary Magdalene, St. (Magdalene, "of Magdala"), a follower of Jesus. According to Luke 8:2 she was healed of demon possession by Jesus, then was among the women who accompanied and supported Jesus and the twelve apostles. She was present at the Crucifixion (Matt 27:56; Mark 15:40; John 19:25) and was among the women who came to Jesus' tomb on Easter morning (Matt 28:1; Mark 16:1; John 20:1). Matt 28:9–10 and John 20:14–18 record Jesus' appearance to her.

Mary Magdalene, close friend and disciple of Jesus and one of the first and most important witnesses of his Resurrection; painting by Caravaggio (d. 1610), Doria Pamphili Gallery, Rome.



Later traditions erroneously equated Mary with the sinful woman of Luke 7:36–50 who anointed Jesus, and with Mary of Bethany, who also anointed Jesus (John 11:1–12:8; Luke 10:38–42).

Mary Tudor, 1516–58, daughter of Henry VIII and Catherine of Aragon and queen of England from 1553. A devout Catholic, Mary became queen in 1553 after quelling the Protestant plot to place Lady Jane Grey on the throne. Her initial leniency toward Protestants hardened after the Thomas Wyatt plot of 1554. Marrying the Catholic Philip of Spain in 1554, she invited Cardinal Reginald Pole to England to reconcile the country with the papacy. After reinstating heresy laws, executions immediately followed, including those of Thomas Cranmer, Nicholas Ridley, and Hugh Latimer, earning for her the name of "Bloody Mary." The persecutions, along with her inability to have children, her marriage to Philip, and the failure of his campaign against France in 1558 all combined to alienate her from the English people. See also England, Catholicism in; Pole, Reginald.

Mas de Vedruna, St. Joaquina de. See Joaquina de Vedruna de Mas, St.

Masons. See Freemasonry.

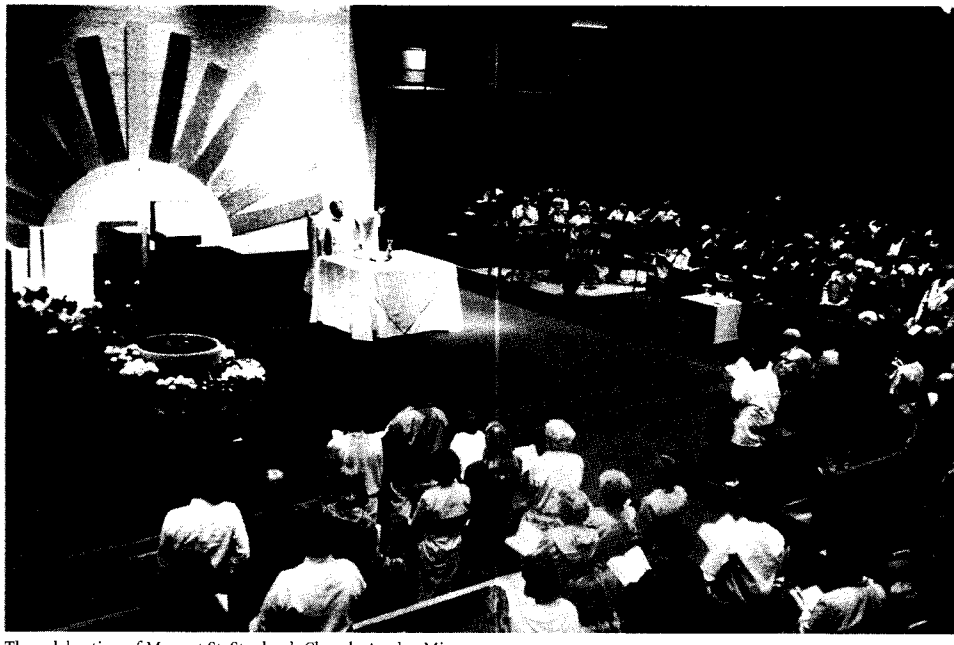
Masoretic Text, the received text of the Hebrew Bible used in synagogues, in scholarship, and for most modern translations. The term derives from the Masorah (Heb., msr, "hand over, transmit") or notes written in the margins by the Masoretes (medieval Jewish Bible scholars). Through their Masorah and their vocalization and punctuation, they sought to ensure special care in the transmission of the biblical text. The Dead Sea Scrolls from a millennium earlier show both that the biblical text existed in several forms in antiquity and that the consonantal form of the Masoretic Text faithfully preserves one of those forms for each book.

Mass (from the old Lat. dismissal rite, ite, missa est, "Go, the Mass is [ended]"), the traditional name for the Eucharist, that is, the celebration of the death and Resurrection of Christ in praise and thanksgiving for all that God has done to save humankind. As early as the second century, there is evidence of a basic structure for this celebration of the Eucharist:



The celebration of Mass at St. Stephen's Church, Anoka, Minnesota; unlike the Gothic churches of the pre–Vatican II era, the architectural layout of this church invites people to worship as a community, with the priest and altar facing everyone in clear view and with the baptismal font and Paschal candle within the sanctuary to underscore the connection between Baptism and the Eucharist.

a service of Scripture readings, psalm prayer and preaching, the people's offering of bread and wine with an improvised prayer of praise and thanksgiving for God's work of salvation, followed by a Communion rite. Each section became more elaborated with the passage of time.

The basic elements of the Mass of the Roman rite today are introductory rite (including the penitential rite), readings and prayers, homily, intercessory prayers, creed (on Sundays and major feasts), presentation of the gifts, Eucharistic Prayer, Communion rite, and dismissal. See also Eucharist; Tridentine Mass.

Mass, conventual. See conventual Mass.

Mass for the People (Lat., Missa pro Populo), Eucharist offered for the intentions of the faithful. Diocesan bishops, pastors, and others with similar responsibilities are obliged to offer Mass for the intentions of the people entrusted to their pastoral care on Sundays and holy days of obligation (cf. cans. 381, 388, 534). See also Mass.

Massillon, Jean-Baptiste, 1663–1718, French bishop and renowned preacher. In 1681, he joined the Oratory of St. Philip Neri and quickly earned a reputation for his eloquent and spiritually moving sermons, especially during Lent and at funerals. He became bishop of Clermont in 1718.

Mass of the Catechumens, that part of the Mass that includes the introductory rites and the Liturgy of the Word. After the Liturgy of the Word, the catechumens, those preparing for Baptism, are kindly dismissed from the assembly and go to another place for instruction on the word of God. The baptized remain in the main worship space for the Liturgy of the Eucharist (preparation of the altar and the gifts, Eucharistic Prayer, Communion rite, and closing rite). The catechumens leave the church to physically express their separateness from the body of the baptized and their vigilance and anticipation of baptism at the Easter Vigil, when they will be fully incorporated into the Body of Christ by sharing in the Eucharist for the first time. See also Eucharist; Liturgy of the Word.

Mass of the Faithful, the part of the Mass that follows the Liturgy of the Word (Scripture readings, homily, and general intercessions). It extends from the "preparation of the gifts" (bringing of bread and wine to the altar) to the dismissal of the assembly after Communion. Known since Vatican Council II as the Liturgy of the Eucharist, the Mass of the Faithful derived its name from the fact that catechumens were excluded from the most sacred parts of the ritual. Only the baptized (called "the faithful") could be present for the consecration of the bread and wine and for Communion. See also Eucharist.

Mass of the Presanctified, the rite used on days when the Mass is not celebrated, but eucharistic bread is distributed. The term itself has not been used in the Roman rite since 1955. Good Friday is the only day in the year when the assembly partakes of the Eucharist reserved from the Mass of the Lord's Supper on Holy Thursday. A similar practice in communities without a priest is called for in the Directory for Sunday Celebrations in the Absence of a Priest (1988), which is open to ongoing theological debate. See also Good Friday; Presanctified Liturgy.

Mass stipend, offering given for the celebration of the Eucharist. Canon law has strict regulations controlling every aspect of this custom in order to avoid even the appearance of "trafficking in Masses." The custom has been viewed as one way of providing financial support for ordained ministers. See also stipend.

master/mistress of novices, director of formation in men's and women's novitiates. The director is responsible for the spiritual formation of those preparing to profess vows in religious communities (novices). New styles of novitiates have developed since Vatican II (1962–65), but directors remain key to the spiritual vitality of these communities. See also novice; novitiate.

master of ceremonies, the liturgical minister charged to assure the reverence and dignity of liturgical rites. The master of ceremonies assists the presider and other ministers prior to and during liturgical rites, particularly the more complex or solemn liturgies.

Master of the Sacred Palace, title given to the priest who functions as personal theologian to the pope. Traditionally, that person is a member of the Dominican order since, it is believed, St. Dominic himself was the first to hold the post. A member of the papal household, the Master also serves as theologian to the papal Secretariat of State and other offices in the Roman Curia.

masturbation, self-manipulation of sexual organs for erotic pleasure or to achieve orgasm. Long a taboo topic in Western culture, masturbation was described as the cause of various maladies such as insanity and eye disease. Beginning in the 1940s scientific studies demonstrated the prevalence of incidents of masturbation among men and women. In the 1990s, with certain caveats, masturbation is viewed benignly by the human sciences.

Until recently the Church's hierarchical magisterium and theologians agreed that masturbation is an objective moral evil. To pursue sexual pleasure or orgasm in a manner not associated with marital intercourse that is love-giving and open to the creation of new life violates the will of God and is immoral. Though factors such as the existence of a compulsive habit might mitigate subjective or personal guilt, the act itself is always regarded as wrong. Many Catholics have questioned this understanding. While agreeing that masturbatory activity lacks the interpersonal and procreative dimensions of male-female sexuality, they would propose that there could be circumstances in which masturbation would not be an objectively evil action, for example, for semen testing or in procedures to overcome sterility. Furthermore, they do not view every masturbatory act as a serious matter at all stages of development.

The Church's hierarchical magisterium, in particular the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, has generally responded negatively to such proposals. See also chastity; sexual morality. MICHAEL D. PLACE

Mater et Magistra (mah'tair et mahg-is'trah; Lat., "Mother and Teacher"), "Christianity and Social Progress," encyclical of Pope John XXIII. Issued on May 15, 1961, the seventieth anniversary of Leo XIII's Rerum Novarum, the encyclical moved the discussion of state intervention in the economic order to a new level of clarity and development. The pope argued that the role of the state needs to be understood in light of three contemporary factors: the impact of technological change, the rise of the welfare state, and the growing aspirations of people to participate in the political process (nn. 46–50). From the confluence of these elements, John XXIII pointed to the notion of socialization, that is, "the growing interdependence of citizens in society giving rise to various patterns of group life and activity and in many instances to social institutions established on a juridical basis" (n. 59).

The principle of socialization complements the principle of subsidiarity, first articulated in Pope Pius XI's Quadragesimo Anno (1931). The latter holds that nothing should be done by a higher agency that can be done as well, if not better, by a lower, subordinate agency (Mater et Magistra, n. 53). In U.S. political terms, the principle of subsidiarity supports a policy of leaving to state and local governments and voluntary agencies what otherwise might be taken up by the federal government. The principle of socialization, on the other hand, views state and local governments and voluntary agencies as often incapable by themselves of addressing increasingly complex problems, e.g., health care, that transcend state and local boundaries.

materialism, scientific, a philosophical position asserting that all phenomena (including consciousness) can be explained adequately solely in terms of matter. It denies or is agnostic concerning the existence of spirit and excludes teleology (purpose) from the universe, explaining all reality in terms of deterministic, efficient causality. Although indebted to classical materialism and sixteenth-century philosophy, it gained popularity with eighteenth-century advances in science, especially chemistry, which was able to explain phenomena solely in terms of matter. The assumptions of scientific materialism have become problematic for modern physics. Scientific materialism is incompatible with Catholicism because it denies human freedom and the existence of the supernatural. See also grace; supernatural.

Matilda, St., d. 968, widow of German king Henry the Fowler and founder of several Benedictine abbeys. Matilda was known for her liberality during her twenty-three years as wife of the king and during her widowhood. When her son Otto became emperor, he accused his mother of giving state revenues to the poor. Before her death she was vindicated and reconciled with her son. Feast day: March 14.

Matins (ma'tins; Lat., matutinus, "morning"), formerly the predawn or night hour of the Liturgy of the Hours. Matins was chanted or recited in choir around midnight, in the first half of the night, or at the end of the night before dawn. The 1971 reform of the Liturgy of the Hours changed the term to the Office of Readings, which may be prayed at any time of the day. The rite begins with an invitation to prayer, followed by a hymn, three psalms with antiphons, a verse, a biblical reading with a responsory, then a reading from the Church Fathers or the lives of the saints, and a responsory. A closing prayer and dismissal conclude the rite. See also Liturgy of the Hours.

matrimony. See Marriage.

matter, that which is, apart from form. It is the reality underlying all visible things before they are determined to be this kind of thing or that. Although some forms of Christian spirituality have been ambiguous in affirming the value of matter, often overstating the dichotomy between matter and spirit and undervaluing material, fleshly existence, the Church consistently has insisted that God created matter and has excluded movements that attributed a negative value to matter. Such movements include Manichaeism, Gnosticism, Docetism, and Albigensianism (e.g., Lateran IV; Florence). The opposite tendency—materialism—has also been condemned. Although the material world is flawed by sin, it is not intrinsically corrupted. Its initial state was paradisaical, and it will be perfected again in the end (Rev 21:1). Many central Catholic doctrines affirm the goodness of matter: creation ex nihilo; the Incarnation; Catholicism's sacramental view of reality, which asserts that God touches human lives through created things; the Resurrection and Ascension of Christ; the resurrection of the body. The history of the Catholic theology of matter reveals syntheses with different schools of thought: from the Neoplatonic influence in the patristic period, to Thomas Aquinas's adaptation of Aristotle's doctrine of hylomorphism. Such syntheses continue today, with ongoing efforts to incorporate the insights of evolutionary thought and modern physics into a theology of matter. See also creation; hylomorphism.

matter of a sacrament. See sacrament, matter of a.

Matthew, St., traditional author of the Gospel bearing his name, probably because the call of the tax collector Levi in Mark 2:14 and Luke 5:27–28 becomes the call of Matthew in Matt 9:9, who is also referred to as "the tax collector" in Matt 10:3. Also in the account of the dinner that follows, Mark 2:15 and Luke 5:29 specify its location in "his" (Levi's) house, while Matt 9:10 seems to presuppose knowl-

Matthew, one of the twelve apostles and the Evangelist traditionally regarded as the author of the First Gospel, whose message is that in Jesus Christ the reign, or kingdom, of God has drawn near and will remain with the Church until the end of time; illustration in the early ninth-century Evangelarium (Gospel book) of Charlemagne.

edge of the story by simply saying "in the house." The name occurs in all lists of the Twelve (Matt 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13), while Levi does not, but only Matthew's Gospel associates the name with the call of a tax collector. Matthew and Levi may be two names for the same person, in which case Matthew is son of Alphaeus and brother of the other James (not the son of Zebedee), or two different people confused in the traditions. The second-century scholar Papias first mentions Matthew as a collector of sayings of the Lord written in Hebrew and translated by others into Greek. This has given rise to the modern search for a Hebrew original of Matthew's Gospel. However, it is highly unlikely that the present Gospel of Matthew is either such a translation or the product of a Galilean tax collector; it is more probably the work of an educated Hellenistic Jew well versed in rabbinic scholarship. See also apostle; evangelist; gospel.

Matthew of Aquasparta, ca. 1238–1302, regent master of theology at the University of Paris (1277–79), minister general of the Franciscan order (1287–79), adviser to popes, and cardinal (beginning in 1288). A prolific author, his works include a commentary on the Sentences of Peter Lombard, numerous sermons, and a number of disputed questions on a wide range of topics.

Matthew Paris, ca. 1199–1259, Benedictine monk, historian, chronicler, hagiographer, poet, and ecclesiastical critic. His major work, the Chronica Maiora, is a history in Latin of the world from creation to 1259; he also wrote several saints' lives in French verse.

Matthias, St., the apostle chosen to replace Judas. Acts 1:15–26 recounts the selection process. Peter addressed the brethren assembled in Jerusalem. He stipulated that Judas's replacement should be an eyewitness of Jesus from the time of the baptism by John. Two candidates were put forward, Joseph Barsabbas, also called Justus, and Matthias. After the disciples prayed, they cast lots and the choice fell to Matthias.

Nothing certain is known of the apostolic activity of Matthias. Eusebius (Ecclesiastical History 1.12.3) reports that he was one of the seventy disciples (Luke 10:1), but this is probably an inference from the NT. The apocryphal Acts of Andrew and Matthias tells an imaginative tale of Matthias's mission to a nation of cannibals where he was taken prisoner and then rescued by Andrew. The story is preserved in Latin by Gregory of Tours as a preface to his version of the Acts of Andrew and in an Anglo-Saxon poem "Andreas" attributed to Cynewulf. Whether it belonged to the original Acts of Andrew is disputed.

A Gospel According to Matthias is mentioned by Origen (Homily in Luke 1) and Eusebius (Eccl. Hist. 3.25.6) and condemned in the sixth-century Gelasian Decree (3.1). Clement of Alexandria (Stromata 2.9.45.4; 3.4.26.3; 7.13.82.1) cites the Traditions of Matthias, which is probably a separate work. According to Hippolytus (Refutation 7.20.1), the Basilidian Gnostics appealed to secret traditions handed down from Matthias to support their doctrine.

Matthias supposedly suffered martyrdom either at Colchis or in Jerusalem. His relics are venerated in St. Matthias's Abbey in Trier. Feast day: May 14. See also apostle; Decretum Gelasianum; Twelve, the.

HAROLD W. ATTRIDGE

Maundy Thursday. See Holy Thursday.

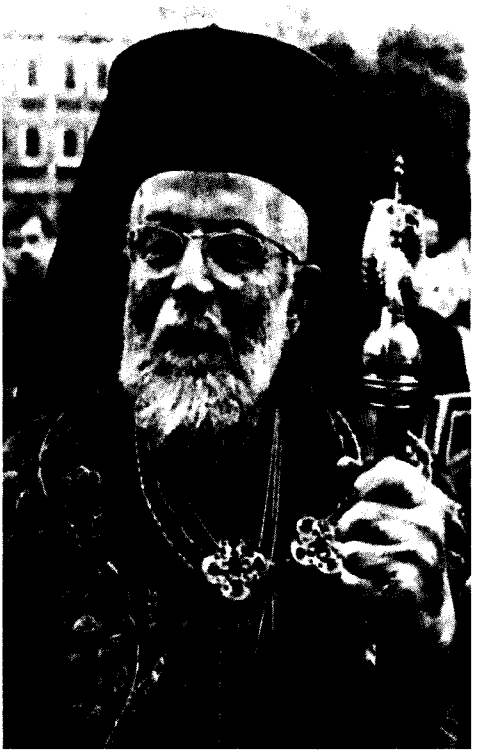
Maurice, St., 1114–91, French Benedictine abbot of Carnoet. He joined the Cistercian monks and was elected abbot soon after his profession. Feast day: October 13. There is an Armenian martyr of the fourth century with the same name.

Maurin, Peter [Pierre Aristide], 1877–1949, philosopher, teacher, and cofounder of the Catholic Worker movement. Maurin, a French peasant, left the Christian Brothers, a religious community of men, and joined Le Sillon, a lay movement whose goal was to Christianize modern democracy. To escape the draft in France, he emigrated to Canada in 1909. These experiences helped Maurin to form his philosophy of Christian personalism, a philosophical orientation that stresses the value and dignity of each individual human person. He proclaimed this philosophy in his "easy essays." In 1932 he sought out Dorothy Day (d. 1980) and together they founded the Catholic Worker movement. See also Catholic Worker movement; Day, Dorothy M.; pacifism; personalism, Christian.

Maurists, Benedictine monks of the Congregation of St. Maur, founded in 1621 and part of a French reform movement dedicated to strict observance of the rule, education, preaching, and historical scholarship. Maurist scholars such as Jean Mabillon (d. 1707) and Edmond Martène (d. 1739) studied the history of the Benedictines as well as works of the Fathers, monuments of the Church, and asceticism, making great advances in the field of manuscript studies and the related sciences of paleography and numismatics. Suppressed by the French Revolution in 1790, the Congregation was formally dissolved by Pope Pius VII in 1818. See also Mabillon, Jean.

Maurus, St., sixth-century monk and patron saint of coppersmiths. A member of the monastic community at Monte Cassino under Benedict of Nursia, Maurus is said to have rescued a boy named Placid from drowning by walking on the water. The Benedictines celebrate the feast of Maurus and Placid on October 5 (formerly January 15).

Maximus IV Sayegh, 1878–1967, Melkite Catholic patriarch (1947–67) and cardinal (1965), one of the most quoted council fathers of Vatican II (1962–65). From the start of the council the content and élan of his interventions gave import to the Eastern Catholic minority at the council. At the first session, Maximus's opening speech on October 23, 1962, set the tone for the Melkite criticism of the restricted Latin vision of the Church. He refused to speak in Latin, which was, he insisted, the language of the Latin church, but not of his church nor of the Catholic Church. He refused to follow protocol and address "their Eminences," the cardinals, before "their Beatitudes," the Eastern patriarchs. In his ecclesiology, patriarchs, the heads of local churches, did not rank behind cardinals, whom he considered to be second-rank dignitaries of one "local church," the Latin church. He also urged the West to allow the vernacular in the liturgy, following the lead of the East, "where," he said, "every language is, in effect, liturgical." He concluded that the matter of the use of the vernacular should be left to the local churches to decide. See also Eastern Catholics and Rome; Eastern Catholics and Vatican II.



Maximus IV Sayegh, the leader of the Eastern Catholic minority at the Second Vatican Council (1962-65), who reminded the Latin-rite majority that the Catholic Church is larger than the Roman Catholic Church.

Maximus, "the Confessor," St., ca. 580–662, Byzantine theologian. During a peripatetic life divided between Palestine (perhaps), Constantinople, Carthage, Rome and sites of exile, he became a defender and developer of the Chalcedonian tradition against Monenergism and Monothelitism, two Christological heresies that effectively denied the full humanity of Christ but were imperially favored compromises with the powerful Monophysite community that continued to hold that in Christ there is only one divine nature.

Maximus was critically and creatively appreciative of controversial expressions of Christian theology. In his hands, the legacies of Origen, Evagrius of Pontus, the Cappadocian Fathers, and Denys the Areopagite had their ambigua (Lat., "ambiguities") addressed, their difficulties eased or corrected, and their theological contributions anchored within the Church's developing doctrinal heritage. His own vision was at once cosmic and Christocentric, with God's purpose the unification of all creation in loving communion. For fallen humanity this goal required the incarnation of the Word of God, so that in Christ the human will could act freely and fully in harmony with the divine. The Christian's participation in the reunification thus begun had, in Maximus's view, ascetic consequences and an ecstatic character. His work was honored especially in Eastern monastic circles, which favored his preferred literary device: the "century," a hundred terse paragraphs written as much to invite the reader's contemplation as to develop a sustained argument. Despite their elusiveness, his works have been increasingly recognized in recent decades in the West for the power and range of their synthesis. Feast day: August 13 (West), January 21 and August 13 (East). See also Christology; Monenergism; Monothelitism.

KATHRYN JOHNSON

Mayne, St. Cuthbert, 1544–77, one of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales canonized in 1970. Raised a Protestant, he was ordained at Douai in 1575 and sent as a missionary to Cornwall; he was executed in 1577. Feast day: November 29. See also Forty Martyrs of England and Wales.

Maynooth College, also known as St. Patrick's College, the principal Catholic seminary in Ireland, located at Maynooth, County Kildare, fifteen miles northwest of Dublin. Maynooth was established in 1795 by the Irish Parliament at the urging of the Catholic bishops and English prime minister William Pitt. Although funded by the government, it quickly became a center for Irish nationalism. Maynooth professors were also known as rigorists in theological matters. The college remained financially insecure until 1845 when Prime Minister Robert Peel arranged for its annual grant to be trebled. While most Maynooth graduates have worked in Ireland, a considerable number have served in England, the United States, and Third World countries. In 1966 a college for lay students was established.

Mazarin, Jules, 1602–61, cardinal and prime minister of France (1643–61). An Italian, he continued the work of Richelieu in building the French state, putting France's interests before those of the Church or the papacy. He was tolerant of Protestants for political reasons, but agreed to measures against the Jansenists, moral rigorists at odds with the French hierarchy.

Mazzarello, St. Maria, 1832–81, Italian nun. As a girl, Maria belonged to the Pious Union of Daughters of Mary Immaculate. With the help of John Bosco, Maria became the first superior general of the Daughters of Our Lady Help of Christians (Salesian Sisters), a congregation devoted to the education of poor girls. Feast day: May 14.

Mazzuchelli, Samuel, 1806–64, Dominican missionary. A native of Milan, Italy, he came to the United States as a missionary in 1828. The young Dominican completed his studies for the priesthood and was ordained in Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1830. His first mission covered the territory of the Upper Peninsula of Michigan and northeastern Wisconsin. He built the first Catholic church in Wisconsin (Green Bay), established a school for the Memoninee Indians, and compiled for the Winnebago people a prayer book in their own dialect. From 1835 until his death, he labored in the lead-mining region of the Upper Mississippi Valley. He served as chaplain for Wisconsin's first territorial legislature, designed and directed the construction of numerous churches and public buildings, established Sinsinawa Mound College (1846), and founded the Sinsinawa Dominican Sisters (1847). Mazzuchelli wrote an account of his missionary activities, Memoirs (1844). He died in Benton, Wisconsin, while ministering to the sick. See also Sisters of St. Dominic.

McAuley, Catherine, 1778–1841, founder of the Sisters of Mercy. Born in Dublin, she established a House of Mercy for the poor in Dublin in 1827, and, with encouragement from the local archbishop, founded a religious community in 1831 to serve the poor, the sick, and the distressed. She was declared Venerable by Pope John Paul II in 1990. See also Sisters of Mercy; Warde, Frances.

McAvoy, Thomas Timothy, 1903–69, priest of the Congregation of Holy Cross, historian, and archivist. A professor at the University of Notre Dame and a prolific author, McAvoy made the study of American Catholic history a viable and respected scholarly field. His major work, The Great Crisis in American Catholic History, 1895–1900, examined the issue of Americanism. See also Americanism.

McBrien, Richard P., b. 1936, ecclesiologist. Ordained for the archdiocese of Hartford, Connecticut (1962), he received a doctorate in theology from Gregorian University, Rome (1967). He has been professor at Pope John XXIII National Seminary, Weston, Massachusetts (1965–70), professor of theology (1970–80) and director of the Institute of Religious Education and Pastoral Ministry at Boston College (1975–80), and chair of the department of theology at the University of Notre Dame (1980–91). Since 1980 he has been Crowley-O'Brien-Walter Professor at Notre Dame. He is the author of fifteen books, including Catholicism (1980, 1994), and general editor of this volume. Past president of the Catholic Theological Society of America (1973–74), he received its John Courtney Murray award in 1976.

McCloskey, John, 1810–85, cardinal-archbishop, the first U.S. cardinal. He attended Mount St. Mary's Seminary, Emmitsburg, Maryland, and was ordained in 1834. After studies in Rome (1835–37), he was assigned to ministry in and around New York City. He was appointed coadjutor bishop of New York (1844), bishop of Albany (1847), and archbishop of New York (1864). His years as archbishop were marked by institutional growth of the Catholic community as symbolized by the construction of St. Patrick's Cathedral, dedicated in 1879. He was promoted to cardinal (1875), the first American so honored. See also Saint Patrick's Cathedral.

McCormick, Richard Arthur, b. 1922, Jesuit priest and one of the Church's leading moral theologians. McCormick entered the Society of Jesus in 1940, was ordained in 1953, and received his S.T.D. in 1957 from the Gregorian University in Rome. Since 1986 he has been John A. O'Brien Professor of Christian Ethics at the University of Notre Dame. He is the author of many books and articles on moral theology and medical ethics, including the award-winning The Critical Calling: Moral Dilemmas Since Vatican II (1989) and the widely read "Notes on Moral Theology," which appeared for twenty-two years in Theological Studies. Past president of the Catholic Theological Society of America (1969–70), he received its Cardinal Spellman Award in 1969.

McGlynn, Edward, 1837–1900, priest and social reformer. Born in New York City and trained in Rome, McGlynn became an activist and renowned advocate for social and economic reform, ultimately as a proponent of Henry George's tax theory as a means of achieving economic democracy. In 1886 he was suspended by his archbishop, Michael A. Corrigan, for his ideological support of George. Ultimately excommunicated by Rome, McGlynn continued his national influence through the Anti-Poverty Society, which he cofounded in 1887. In 1892 he was restored to the priesthood by the pope's special delegate, who found nothing in McGlynn's teaching contrary to Church doctrine. He served his last years in Newburgh, New York.

McKenzie, John L., 1910–91, OT scholar and one of the most significant figures in the biblical renewal both before and after Vatican II (1962–65), especially through The Two Edged Sword: An Interpretation of the Old Testament (1956). He entered the Jesuits in 1928, was ordained in 1939, and left the Jesuits and was incardinated in the diocese of Madison, Wisconsin in 1974. He taught at West Baden College, a Jesuit theologate in Indiana, (1942–60), Loyola University, Chicago (1960–65), the University of Notre Dame (1966–70), and De Paul University (1970–78).

McManus, Frederick R., b. 1923, liturgical scholar and priest of the archdiocese of Boston. Ordained in 1947, he has been professor of canon law at The Catholic University of America since 1958 and a major contributor to the field of liturgical law. A member of the Liturgy Commission at Vatican II, he was a founding member of the Advisory Committee of the International Commission on English in the Liturgy (ICEL). He has served as editor and contributor to scholarly journals and has received several honorory degrees, awards, and appointments.

McQuaid, Bernard John, 1823–1909, bishop. Raised by the Sisters of Charity at St. Patrick's Orphanage and ordained in 1848, he became rector (1853) of the cathedral in the diocese of Newark, New Jersey. He founded the state's first parochial school and Seton Hall College and Seminary, where he served as president (1856–68). As the first bishop of Rochester, New York, he created an extensive parochial school system and established St. Andrew's Preparatory Seminary (1870) and St. Bernard's Seminary (1893). During the Americanist crisis he led, along with Archbishop Michael Corrigan, the conservative faction of U.S. bishops who were opposed to the accommodation of Christian faith to American culture. See also Americanism.

Mechthild of Hackeborn, St., 1241–ca. 1299, German nun and mystic. As teacher, choir director, and assistant to her sister Gertrude, abbess of Helfta, Mechtilde contributed to the monastery's development as a center of spirituality. Mechtilde's spiritual vision, including devotion to the Sacred Heart, spread beyond Helfta through the dispersion of Gertrude the Great's account of her life in The Book of Special Grace (Liber Specialis Gratiae). Feast day: November 16.

Mechthild of Magdeburg, St., 1212–ca. 1282, Beguine and later nun at the great convent of Helfta. Her Flowing Light of the Divinity, which describes her many visions and religious experience, is important as one of the earliest treatises on the spiritual life in the vernacular (low German, subsequently translated into high German and Latin). Feast day: November 19. See also Beghards/Beguines.

medals, small disks of various shapes, usually made of metal, worn on a neck chain either under or outside the clothing or as a lapel pin. Such medals can depict either a figure of divinity (most commonly Christ or the dove of the Holy Spirit), Mary, or one of the saints, usually including either a pious phrase or Christian symbols.

Medellín (med-ay-een'), a city in Colombia, location of the Second General Conference of Latin American Bishops (CELAM, the acronym for Conferencia Episcopal Latinoamericana) in September 1968. Medellín has become almost synonymous with that conference and its documents. CELAM II sought to relate the teachings of the Second Vatican Council to the Church's life and mission in Latin America. It adopted the notion of liberation in its discussion of injustice and criticized both the inequality among Latin America's social classes and the economic policies of "First World" nations. While urging that the poor not become violent in their struggle for justice, it also recognized the "institutional violence" of political-economic systems. CELAM II called for the Church to stand in solidarity with the poor. The documents are available in The Church in the Present-Day Transformation of Latin America in the Light of the Council (Washington, DC: United States Catholic Conference, 1973). See also Latin America, Catholicism in; liberation theology.

media. See Catholicism and mass media.

mediator (Lat., medius, "in the middle"), one who acts as a liaison between different parties or who attempts to reconcile contending groups. Though there is no corresponding Hebrew term, the idea is strong in the OT. Priests are mediators between the holy God and profane human life, and bring offerings before God (Deut 26:1–4). Moses acts as mediator when he speaks on behalf of God (Exod 4:21–23), delivers the law from Sinai (Exod 19:16–25), or intercedes for the sinful people (Exod 32:30–34). The prophets are mediators of God's word (Isa 6:6–13; Jer 1:6–9; Ezek 3:1–11). The term appears six times in the NT, twice in the context of the Jewish law delivered through a mediator (Gal 3:19–20), and in the important creedal statement of 1 Tim 2:5, "For there is one God; there is also one mediator between God and humankind, Christ Jesus, himself human, who gave himself a ransom for all." In Heb 12:24 (see 8:6; 9:15), Jesus as priest and victim is "the mediator of a new covenant."

Mediator Dei (Lat., "Mediator of God"), an encyclical letter on the liturgy issued by Pope Pius XII on November 20, 1947. This encyclical was the third in a remarkable series of documents through which Pius XII laid the groundwork for the eventual reform and renewal of church life in the areas of ecclesiology (Mystici Corporis, 1943), biblical studies (Divino Afflante Spiritu, 1943), and worship. Mediator Dei contains four principal parts. Part I deals with the nature, sources, and evolution of the liturgy. Part II includes a detailed discussion of the Eucharist and encourages fuller participation by the faithful in its celebration. Part III focuses on the Liturgy of the Hours (Divine Office) and the church year, while Part IV contains a series of pastoral directives. In spite of its sometimes cautious tone, Mediator Dei gave, in effect, papal approval to the liturgical movement that had begun in Europe a century earlier, especially in the pioneering work of liturgists like Prosper Guéranger (1805–75) of the Benedictine abbey of Solesmes. As the first papal encyclical ever devoted entirely to the topic of worship, Mediator Dei inaugurated a new period of liturgical history in the Catholic Church. Prior to this time, papal documents focused primarily on educating people about the liturgy's rites and symbols. But Mediator Dei established a pastoral and theological basis for reforming the liturgy. Indeed, such reforms began appearing just four years later, when Pope Pius XII restored the Easter Vigil (February 9, 1951). See also liturgical movement.

Mediatrix (mee-dee-ay'triks; Lat., medius, "in the middle"), a title popularly applied to Mary in recognition of her role in salvation. First used in the eighth century, it became a more common designation for Mary by Catholics by the seventeenth century. In traditional Mariology, Mary was regarded as the Mediatrix for three reasons. First, because of the specific holy acts she performed during her life, Mary was regarded as the Coredemptrix (Lat.) who cooperated with the plan of God. Second, through her continual intercessions, Mary was seen as the dispensatrix (Lat.) who distributed and applied the graces of Christ. Finally, Mary's ontological mediation was perceived to be rooted in her divine motherhood and the fullness of grace she possessed from the moment of her conception.

The Second Vatican Council (1962–65) noted, however, that Mary's role in humanity's salvation is entirely subordinate to that of Christ, who is "the one Mediator" for all (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 62). See also Mary, Blessed Virgin.

medical ethics, the recognition, classification, justification, and assimilation of the value dimensions in the practice of medicine. These dimensions include the virtues of the medical professional, as well as the rights and wrongs of acts and practices.

Only in the twentieth century did truly systematic Catholic treatises on medical ethics appear. Included in this group would be Charles McFadden's Medical Ethics, Gerald Kelly's Medico-Moral Problems, Thomas O'Donnell's Morals in Medicine, and Edwin Healy's Medical Ethics. The approach of these authors built heavily on the moral theology textbooks used at the time. Most of the subjects covered related to either the Decalogue (Ten Commandments) or the sacraments.

In 1969 Daniel Callahan and psychiatrist Willard Gaylin founded the Institute of Society, Ethics, and the Life Sciences, now known as The Hastings Center, in New York State. In 1971 André Hellegers founded the Joseph and Rose Kennedy Institute for the Study of Human Reproduction and Bioethics, now known as The Kennedy Institute of Ethics, in Washington, D.C. These sister institutes brought together theologians, philosophers, physicians, lawyers, and nurses for the sustained and systematic study of medical ethics. They were the precursors of other such centers around the world and have given shape and impetus to research and reflection in the Catholic community. See also bioethics.

Medical Mission Sisters (M.M.S.), a congregation of female medical personnel founded in 1925 in Washington, D.C., initially to care for Muslim women in India. Anna Dengel, an Austrian woman who studied medicine, was frustrated when sisters were prohibited by canon law from helping her in surgery and obstetrics. With the encouragement of missionary bishops, she founded the congregation and was instrumental in obtaining a change in canon law so that her sisters could practice medicine in its full scope. In 1993 there were about seven hundred sisters, two hundred and eighty from India, working in India, the United States, Africa, Asia, and Latin America, engaged in healing ministries that include agricultural and community development, the empowerment of women, and the support of Islamic peoples, as well as medical ministries. The generalate is in London.

Medical Missionaries of Mary (M.M.M.), a congregation founded in Ireland in 1937 by an Irish woman, Mary Martin, to provide medical care, particularly for women and children. Fortunately, Vatican restrictions on medical training for sisters had just been lifted. Clinics, general and maternity hospitals, and leprosaria were established. The emphasis today is on primary health care, nurses' training, and the care of AIDS patients. In 1993 this international community of more than four hundred members from thirteen countries works in Nigeria, Liberia, Kenya, Tanzania, Uganda, Malawi, Angola, Ethiopia, Sudan, Brazil, and the United States. About one-sixth of the members are African. The motherhouse is in Drogheda, Ireland.

Medina, Bartolomeo (meh-deen'uh, bahr-toh-loh-may'oh), 1527–80, Spanish Dominican theologian. In a commentary on Thomas Aquinas in 1577, he was the first to propose probabilism by holding that, when two opinions concerning the moral licitness of an action are both probable, the one less probable may be followed if it is held by wise theologians and supported by good arguments. See also probabilism.

meditation, mental prayer of surrendered silence and listening. Discursive meditation, thinking about religious material, Scripture, or devotional reading, is a beginner's technique. Lectio divina (Lat., "divine reading") may be practiced discursively. Pure meditation involves abandoning discursive thought for simple awareness. It has two major characteristics: sustained attention to its object and bright, clear awareness. Meditation has two basic forms: concentration and awareness.

Concentration practice, an imaging technique, holds attention on a single chosen object. One gently returns to the object whenever the mind wanders. The object can be mental, visual, or auditory, such as a sacred word, an icon, or a chant. Concentration practice produces great serenity and gradually transforms the mind into its object. It is used in centering prayer techniques. One must avoid falling into a comfortably foggy state that is relaxing but abandons clarity.

In awareness practice, a nonimaging technique, one tries to maintain continuous, alert attentiveness to all one's experiences. One must not "tune out" repetitious experiences or lose clear focus, and one must neither reject nor encourage any particular experience. This practice may bring unfinished psychological business into awareness; suitable techniques safely manage this eruption. Awareness practice purifies the mind of contents incompatible with experiencing God. This form is found in Christian vipassana (Pali, "insight") practice.

At heart, meditation is a spiritual practice to bring one to union with God. However, it may also produce medical and psychological benefits, such as reduced heart rate and blood pressure, more restful sleep, less emotional turmoil, greater ability to concentrate, and improved self-control. See also prayer. MARY J. MEADOW Medjugorje (med-joo-gaw'ree), a village in the Catholic Croatian region of what was formerly Yugoslavia. On June 24, 1981, six Croatian youths reported a vision of the Blessed Virgin Mary. Since then the apparitions have allegedly continued both at the original site and at the village church of St. James. The visionaries claim to have seen, heard, and touched Mary and to have been given ten secret messages related to world events. Mary has called for greater faith, prayer, penance, fasting, and personal conversion.

Although no official judgment has been made regarding the authenticity of the apparitions, some bishops have spoken favorably about the new devotion, and in 1986 John Paul II approved travel to Medjugorje for prayer, fasting, and conversion. By contrast, the local bishop, Pavao Zanic, dismissed the apparitions as a case of "collective hallucination" and accused the Franciscans of exploiting the situation for self-interest. By the early 1990s, however, pilgrimages to Medjugorje began to compete in popularity with those to Lourdes and Fátima, even though a violent civil war in the area disrupted the flow of visitors. See also apparitions of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

Meinrad, St., d. 861, a Benedictine priest, renowned for his holiness, who taught near Zurich and later assumed the life of a hermit. An abbey in Einsiedeln, Switzerland, stands on the site of his last hermitage. Feast day: January 21.

Mekhitarists, or Mechitarists, the name for Armenian Catholic monks in two congregations, of Venice and Vienna, following a rule modeled on that of St. Benedict. The order was founded at Constantinople in 1701 by the monk Mekhitar (1676–1749) (Arm., Mxit'ar, "Consoler," "Paraclete"), an Armenian Orthodox vadarpet (priest-monk with the honorary title "doctor"). In 1702 he transferred the congregation to Morea in the Peloponnesus, then under Venetian rule, and in 1717 to the Island of San Lazzaro in Venice. A promoter of church unity, it seems that Mekhitar considered himself in communion with both the Armenian Orthodox and Catholic churches, and apparently he and his monks became exclusively Catholic only after moving to the Catholic Venetian dominions. In 1772 dissensions caused a split, with some monks breaking off to found a separate congregation, centered in Vienna since 1809. The scholarship and publications of the Mekhitarists have rendered an enormous service to the cultural renaissance of the Armenian nation. See also monasticism.

Mel, St., d. ca. 488, first abbot-bishop of Ardagh, in Ireland. He is reputedly one of the four missionary-nephews of St. Patrick. Feast day: February 6.

Melanchthon, Philipp (meh-lank'tuhn), 1497–1560, Lutheran theologian and Reformer. Called to teach Greek at Wittenberg in 1518, he became Luther's follower and by 1521 had produced the first comprehensive statement of Reformation theology, the Loci Communes Rerum Theologicarum (which he reedited in 1535, 1544, and 1559). He also composed the Augsburg Confession (1530) and its Apology (1531) against the Catholic Confutation (1530), which remain to this day the central Lutheran confessions. Melanchthon's irenic personality and clarity of thought and expression suited him well for this work—he attended or submitted opinions for every major colloquy attended by the Lutherans—but made him less able to handle situations of leadership and conflict. Although others suspected his resolve, he never lost the trust and deep affection of Luther. When Luther died in 1546, Melanchthon naturally emerged as the leader of the Lutheran Reformation, but he quickly undermined his influence by his response to the Augsburg Interim (1548) after the defeat of the Protestants in the Schmalkaldic War (1545–46), allowing for the reimposition of Catholic ceremonies by the emperor as matters of indifference (Gk., adiaphora). Other controversies erupted concerning the Lord's Supper, justification, good works, election, and free will, bringing pain and sadness to his later years from "the rage of theologians." See also Lutheranism; Protestanism; Reformation, the.

Melania, "the Elder," St., ca. 342–ca. 410, and Melania, "the Younger," St., ca. 383–ca. 439, ascetics; among the wealthy Roman matrons who shared the fourth century's explosion of interest in ascetic life and the sites of the Bible and so, with prominent churchmen as advisers and friends, left the structures of aristocratic family life to travel among holy figures and settle in the Holy Land. "The Elder," widowed young, visited Egyptian saints before founding a double monastery with Rufinus on the Mount of Olives. Her granddaughter, "the Younger," entered ascetic life with her husband; together, they distributed their own wealth as they founded monasteries at Augustine's home at Tagaste in North Africa and then entered monastic communities in Bethlehem with Jerome. When widowed, Melania "the Younger" established another monastery in Jerusalem. Feast days: Melania, "the Elder," June 8; Melania, "the Younger," December 31.

Melchizedek (mel-ki'zed-ek), a Canaanite priest-king, whose name means "My king is Zedek" (a Canaanite deity). According to Gen 14:18–20, Melchizedek, the king of Salem and priest of God Most High (El Elyon), blessed Abram after his victory over a coalition of four kings. Ps 110:4 cites Melchizedek as the model for the Davidic king. In the NT, the Letter to the Hebrews (7:1–28) interprets both OT texts and finds in Melchizedek a model of Christ, the High Priest of the new covenant. Later exegetical traditions found in Melchizedek's offer of bread and wine to Abram a foreshadowing of the Eucharist. In fact, he is mentioned explicitly in Eucharistic Prayer I (the old Roman Canon of the Mass).

Melitian Schisms. See Melitius of Antioch, St.; Melitius of Lycopolis.

Melitius of Antioch, St., d. 381, originally bishop of Sebaste, then, from 360 to 381, of Antioch. His orthodoxy, the cause of his being thrice exiled from Antioch, was suspect to another group of orthodox, old partisans of Eustathius, bishop of Antioch deposed by the Arians ca. 327. Lucifer of Cagliari (d. ca. 370) ordained one Paulinus for them, thus initiating the schism, sometimes called Melitian, at Antioch. Melitius presided over the Council of Constantinople until his death. Supported unwaveringly by Basil, but not by Athanasius or the West, Melitius was vindicated when the Eustathian party recognized his successor. Feast day: February 12. See also Arianism; Nicaea, First Council of.

Melitius of Lycopolis, d. early fourth century, schismatic bishop of Lycopolis in Egypt. He opposed the leniency of Peter of Alexandria (bishop 300–11) toward Christians lapsed under persecution. He began to ordain bishops schismatically, was deposed by an Egyptian council (ca. 306), but continued in schism even after the martyrdom of Peter. The Council of Nicaea (325) attempted reconciliation, but this failed when, with Arian encouragement, the Melitians opposed Athanasius's election (328) and the renewed schism persisted for several centuries. This "Melitian Schism" is to be distinguished from that associated with Melitius of Antioch. See also lapsi; Nicaea, First Council of.

Melito of Sardis, St., d. ca. 190, bishop of Sardis and prolific writer. He traveled in Palestine and was a Quartodeciman, i.e., he celebrated Easter on the fourteenth of Nisan, date of the Jewish Passover. His writings, which include "On the Pasch," may have influenced Irenaeus, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, and Origen. Feast day: April 1. See also Quartodecimans.

Melkite Catholic Church, the Byzantine Catholic counterpart to the Orthodox patriarchate of Antioch, concentrated in Lebanon and Syria. Other Byzantine Catholic communities within the boundaries of the Orthodox patriarchates of Jerusalem and Alexandria are also included in this church.

Origin and Early History: The word "Melkite" comes from the Syriac and Arabic words for king and was used to refer to those in the Middle East who shared the Christological faith professed by the Byzantine emperor in accord with the Council of Chalcedon (451), as opposed to those who did not accept the Chalcedonian definition.

While there was little opposition to Chalcedon in the Jerusalem patriarchate, only a minority accepted it in Alexandria (those opposed gave rise to the Coptic Orthodox Church) and about half accepted it in Antioch (those contrary evolved into the "Jacobite" or Syrian Orthodox Church). The Chalcedonian Orthodox patriarchates of Antioch, Jerusalem, and Alexandria gradually adopted the Byzantine liturgical tradition of Constantinople.

Jesuits, Capuchins, and Carmelites had been engaged in missionary activity among the faithful of the Orthodox patriarchate of Antioch since the mid-seventeenth century. Although a number of these (including some bishops) formally become Catholic, by and large they remained mixed with Orthodox communities. Strictly speaking, the Melkite Catholic Church originated in a schism that took place within the patriarchate of Antioch in the early eighteenth century. This division was exacerbated by a rivalry between the cities of Aleppo and Damascus.

Patriarch Athanasios III Debbas, who died on August 5, 1724, had designated as his successor a Cypriot monk named Sylvester. His candidacy was supported by the Aleppo party and the Constantinople patriarchate. But on September 20, 1724, the Damascene party elected as patriarch a strongly pro-Catholic man who took the name Cyril VI. A week later, the patriarch of Constantinople ordained Sylvester as patriarch of Antioch. The Ottoman government recognized Sylvester, while Cyril was deposed and excommunicated by Constantinople and compelled to seek refuge in Lebanon.

In 1729 Cyril's election as patriarch of Antioch was recognized as valid by Pope Benedict XIII. But it was only in 1744 that Cyril was given the pallium, a woolen vestment worn around the neck, as a sign of full communion with Rome.

In the beginning this new Catholic community was limited to what is now Syria and Lebanon. But later Melkite Catholics began to immigrate to Palestine and especially to Egypt after that country rebelled against Turkish control. For this reason the Melkite Catholic patriarch was given the additional personal titles of patriarch of Jerusalem and Alexandria in 1838.

At first the Ottoman government had been very hostile to this new church and took strong measures against it. But conditions improved with the passage of time. In 1848 the government formally recognized the Melkite Catholic Church, and the patriarchate itself was moved to Damascus from Holy Savior Monastery near Sidon, Lebanon, where it had been established by Cyril VI after he fled there. This was followed by a period of growth, enhanced by the popular perception that the Melkite Church was becoming a focus of Arab resistance against the Turks. The Orthodox patriarchate of Antioch, on the other hand, was viewed by many as dependent upon Constantinople and therefore upon the Ottoman government.

In the nineteenth century the Melkite Church experienced tensions in its relationship with Rome because many Melkites felt that their Byzantine identity was being threatened by those who favored greater integration into the Roman Catholic Church. This uneasiness was symbolized at Vatican I (1869–70) when Melkite patriarch Gregory II Youssef voted against the constitution Pastor Aeternus, which defined papal infallibility and universal jurisdiction.

Vatican II to Today: At the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), Melkite patriarch Maximus IV Sayegh spoke forcefully against the latinization of the Eastern Catholic churches and urged a greater receptivity to the oriental Christian traditions, especially in the area of ecclesiology. Some Melkite bishops, including Patriarch Maximus IV, have supported the idea that, in the event of a reconciliation between the Catholic and Orthodox churches, their church should be reintegrated into the Orthodox patriarchate of Antioch.

Today there are five Melkite Catholic male religious orders, all of them with headquarters in Lebanon. Three of them are of monastic origin but later became involved in active ministry: the Basilian Order of the Most Holy Saviour (Salvatorians) was founded in 1683, the Basilian Order of Saint John the Baptist (Saorites) was founded at the beginning of the eighteenth century, and the Basilian Aleppine Order was separated from the Salvatorians in 1829. The Melkite Paulist Fathers were founded in 1903 as a missionary community modeled on the White Fathers. More recently, the Monastery of the Resurrection has been established in Lebanon for the purpose of living out the Eastern monastic ideal.

Three Melkite women's communities correspond directly to the men's orders: the Salvatorian Sisters of the Annunciation, the Basilian Saorite Sisters, and the Basilian Aleppine Sisters. Of more recent foundation are the Missionaries of Our Lady of Perpetual Help and the Sisters of Our Lady of Good Service.

Melkite religious orders are involved in many pastoral efforts in the parishes, schools, and centers for social assistance. A number of them have followed the faithful into the emigration.

St. Anne's Seminary in Jerusalem, under the direction of the White Fathers, was the main seminary for the Melkite Church until it had to be closed in 1967 because of the political situation. Candidates for the priesthood now study at the patriarchal seminary of Raboué, Lebanon. Moreover, the Melkite Paulist Fathers direct an important theological institute at Harissa, and run a well-known publishing house.

Today the Melkite Catholic Church is one of the largest and most prosperous Catholic communities in the Middle East. It is the largest Catholic Church in Syria and second only to the Maronites in Lebanon. Smaller communities are found throughout the region.

Significant emigration from the Middle East in recent years has created flourishing Melkite communities in the West. Dioceses have been established in Brazil, the United States, Canada, Mexico, Australia, and Venezuela. Altogether in 1994 the Melkite Catholic Church had just over a million members. See also Antioch; Byzantine rite; Eastern churches; Eastern rites.

Bibliography

Descy, Serge. The Melkite Church: An Historical and Ecclesiological Approach. Newton, MA: Sophia Press, 1993. RONALD G. ROBERSON

Memorare (mem-ohr-ahr'ay; Lat., "remember"), an intercessory prayer to Mary by an unknown author. Appearing in texts from the fifteenth century, it begins, "Remember, most gracious Virgin Mary." It was made popular by Claude Bernard (1588–1641) and its use was promoted by Pope Pius IX, who attached indulgences to it in 1846.

MEMORARE

Remember, most gracious Virgin Mary, that never was it known that anyone who fled to your protection, implored your help, or sought your intercession was left unaided. Inspired by this confidence, I fly to you, O Virgin of virgins, my mother. To you I come; before you I stand, sinful and sorrowful. O Mother of the Word Incarnate, despise not my petitions, but in your mercy, hear and answer me. Amen.

memorial, a liturgical day commemorating a saint or blessed (one not yet canonized but already beatified). Memorials are designated "optional" or "obligatory" depending upon the saint's significance for the Church. Memorials are lower in rank than feasts or solemnities. They are never observed during Holy Week, Easter Week, or the week before Christmas. See also feasts, liturgical; solemnity.

memorial acclamation, the acclamation sung by the assembly during the Eucharistic Prayer immediately following the Institution Narrative, the passage from the NT that describes Christ's institution of the Eucharist at the Last Supper. The most common acclamation—"Christ has died. Christ is risen. Christ will come again."—indicates the vivid and active recollection ("memorial") of the saving events of Christ's life and ministry made by the Church at Mass.

Menaion (men-ay'awn; Gk., "lunar," i.e., "monthly"), Byzantine-rite liturgical book containing the liturgical propers for the major hours (on ordinary days, Matins and Vespers) of the fixed cycle, i.e., those days that fall on a fixed date in the calendar. Arranged in twelve volumes, one for each month, the cycle begins with the Byzantine New Year on September 1.

mendicant orders, also known as friars, religious with the privilege of begging (Lat., mendicare) in the dioceses where they are established since they were vowed to corporate poverty as well as to the personal poverty of monks. The Benedictine domination of monasticism in the West gave way in the twelfth century to new varieties of monasticism.

These new forms of religious life and the urbanization of Europe paved the way for the introduction of the mendicant orders at the beginning of the thirteenth century under the inspiration of Francis of Assisi (d. 1226) and Dominic de Guzman (d. 1221), founders of the Franciscans and the Dominicans. The friars (from the Lat., fratres, "brothers") became evangelists carrying out the pastoral mission outlined by the Fourth Lateran Council (1215). The friars were the preachers, confessors, and theologians needed by this mission. The friars were also mobile, as distinguished from other monks who remained in monasteries. They were also centralized and international. Moreover, they modified monastic observances to facilitate study and ministry.

The success of the friars raised opposition among bishops and clergy. The two ablest friars of the thirteenth century, Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) and Bonaventure (d. 1274), spearheaded the defense of the friars. At the Second Council of Lyons (1274) the Dominicans and the Franciscans received full approval. The Carmelites and the Augustinian Hermits, who became friars in 1247 and 1256, respectively, were to continue till final provisions could be made; they received full approval in 1298. After Lyons II other mendicants had to cease accepting candidates until they died out. The bull Supra Cathedram in 1300 set a pattern for mendicant and episcopal relations by requiring friars to seek licenses from bishops to preach and hear confessions in their dioceses. The Servites also became mendicants, and in 1578 Pope Gregory XIII accepted others as mendicants, e.g., the Minims and Mercedarians. See also Augustinian Hermits; Dominican order; Franciscan order; Mercedarians; Minims; Servites.

KEITH J. EGAN

Menno Simons, 1496–1561, leader of the Mennonites. Troubled by infant baptism and the Catholic Eucharist, Menno, a priest, was rebaptized in 1537 and became the leader of a group of Anabaptists who would later be known as the Mennonites. See also Anabaptism; Mennonites.

Mennonites, a pacifistic branch of sixteenth-century Anabaptism. Taking their name from Menno Simons, one of the early leaders, the Mennonites practiced believers' (adult) baptism. Because they held to a complete separation of Church and state, they refused to serve the state in any way. To maintain the purity of the community they used the ban. Seeing the "world" as corrupt, they withdrew from it. Since the Mennonites suffered merciless persecution in western Europe, they emigrated to Russia, South America, and North America. See also Anabaptism; Menno Simons; sectarianism.

mental prayer. See meditation.

mental reservation, the addition of a modifying phrase in the mind of a speaker that restricts the meaning of spoken words. The dilemma between the absolute prohibition of lying and the duty to keep a secret gave rise eventually to the doctrine of mental reservation. Some taught the permissibility of strict mental reservation, in which one mentally added a qualification to which the audience had no access. This teaching was condemned by Pope Innocent XI in 1679. However, broad mental reservation, involving the use of equivocal language that was intended to deceive, yet that had a secondary meaning available to the audience, was permitted by virtually all Catholic writers. This teaching has all but disappeared from contemporary moral theology because the conflict between the duty to speak the truth and to preserve secrets is approached differently. See also lying; truthfulness.

Mercedarians, a religious order founded in Spain ca. 1220 by Peter Nolasco dedicated to Our Lady of Mercy (Merced). Originally a Crusader military order whose members vowed to accept captivity in exchange for Christian prisoners, it later became a clerical order with apostolates to the sick and imprisoned. See also Crusades; Nolasco, St. Peter.

Mercier, Désiré Joseph (mair'see-ay), 1851–1926, cardinal-archbishop of Malines (Belgium). Following Pope Leo XIII's encyclical Aeterni Patris (1879), he sought to harmonize Aquinas's philosophy with contemporary thought. He argued for the independence of philosophy from apologetic concerns and founded the Institut Supérieur de Philosophie, Louvain, as a center of neo-Thomism. As archbishop, he presided over the Malines Conversations (1921–25), which explored the conditions for union between Catholics and Anglicans. See also philosophy and theology; Thomism.

mercy, active compassion toward another in unfortunate circumstances; an essential form of Christian charity. Mercy requires not only a feeling of sympathy but also an intention to ease the other's misfortune if possible. Mercy is based on a recognition of the shared human condition before God and a willingness to do one's duty to alleviate the suffering of others. Acts that express mercy are categorized as spiritual and corporal works of mercy. The corporal works of mercy require the Christian to feed the hungry, give drink to the thirsty, clothe the naked, shelter the homeless, visit the sick and the imprisoned, and bury the dead (Matt 25:34–40). The spiritual works of mercy are concerned with preserving the faithful in their faith and maintaining harmony in personal relationships; they enjoin Christians to counsel the doubtful, instruct the ignorant, admonish the sinner, comfort the sorrowful, forgive injuries, bear wrongs patiently, and pray for the living and the dead. See also charity; justice; mercy, corporal works of; mercy, spiritual works of.

mercy, corporal works of, actions directed toward fulfilling the physical and related needs of a neighbor. The emphasis is not on specific actions but on an overall attitude toward people in a disempowered condition. Matt 25:34–40 and Isa 58:6–10 are the scriptural sources for the teaching on the corporal works. A relationship with God is judged in terms of behavior toward the lowly. There is a close relationship between social justice and the works of mercy. Justice serves the rights of individuals and the demands of the common good. Mercy is loving gratuity.

The corporal works of mercy are as follows: (1) To feed the hungry: The hungry are those starved for food, but besides giving food to the poor, Christians are called to improve the economic and social structures so as to eliminate poverty and bestow a sense of dignity on the marginalized. Fasting as a means of fostering empathy with the poor and sharing a meal with the poor create attitudes that diminish the sense of social alienation suffered by the poor. (2) To give drink to the thirsty: Alleviating thirst includes providing unpolluted water for poverty-stricken areas and restoring ecological balance. This work of mercy also serves those seeking righteousness, which seeks to accomplish the will of God by going beyond a mere fulfillment of law. (3) To clothe the naked: The naked are those stripped of human dignity and power, as well as those in need of sufficient clothing, bedding, and necessary tools for labor or work. Undertaking any measures that meet the immediate needs of the poor and instituting changes that address this state of physical and psychological impoverishment are central to this particular work. Treating all people with dignity and sensitivity on a daily basis is an important application of this act of mercy. (4) To visit the imprisoned: Captivity takes a variety of forms. Imprisonment for political, criminal, and religious reasons are overt forms. Victims of domestic violence, sexism, racism, and class distinction also experience oppression and captivity. Measures to release political and religious prisoners and intervene in cases of domestic violence constitute this work of mercy. Opportunities for education, counseling, job training, and religious services in prisons provide hope and a constructive outreach for the incarcerated. (5) To shelter the homeless: Street people, migrants, refugees, orphans, and foster children are counted among the homeless. Alienated, marginalized, abused, and misunderstood people suffer a state of emotional dispossession, and those totally lacking belief in God suffer a sense of exile. For all these forms of homelessness, providing shelter entails fostering a sense of belonging to others. (6) To visit the sick: Supplying companionship and housekeeping for the sick, elderly, and homebound, and accommodating the needs of the physically and mentally disabled are principal avenues of serving the sick. Meeting the needs of the emotionally troubled or sharing kind words with a stranger or friend in need comes under this work of mercy. (7) To bury the dead: Providing companionship, pastoral counseling, and professional advice to the dying and the family of the dying are considered part of burying the dead. Spiritual direction and religious ritual also play a key role at the time of death. Helping survivors forgive themselves and others for unfinished business in major relationships is of particular importance. See also mercy; mercy, spiritual works of.

PATRICIA M. VINJE

mercy, spiritual works of, acts of charity and compassion rooted in Scripture and the constant practice of the Church on behalf of those with special emotional and spiritual needs. As manifestations of mercy, they are done freely, without the obligatory demands of justice. Like all acts of mercy, they are acts of love, but they may initiate discomfort as well as comfort. These seven expressions parallel the corporal works of mercy. (1) To admonish the sinner (Matt 18:15–20; Col 3:5–17; 1 Thess 5:12; 2 Thess 3:15): Believing that sin can lead a person away from God and neighbor, the first act of mercy risks telling a person what he or she may not wish to hear. Admonishment may take the form of good example or of disciplinary action. (2) To instruct the ignorant (Rom 11:25; 1 Cor 10:1; 1 Tim 4:6–16; 2 Tim 4:1–5; 1 Thess 4:13): The goal of instruction is to inform and to correct misunderstandings and prejudices based on ignorance and fear. Instruction helps people to see things from a different point of view and invites them to conversion and transformation. (3) To counsel the doubtful (Luke 24:36–53; John 20:26–29): Doubt assumes various forms: doubt about one's faith, about oneself, and about one's relationships with others. Counsel may also take various forms: direct spiritual advice, good example, patient presence to the other. (4) To comfort the sorrowful (John 11:19; 1 Thess 4:13–18): It requires an empathetic presence and attentiveness to meet the emotional needs of another. The energy and time that one shares with the bereaved, the lonely, or the alienated focus on those actions and attitudes that strengthen and empower them to grow through their struggles. (5) To bear wrongs patiently (Matt 16:24; Jas 5:7–11): It requires fortitude to endure strain, stress, and evil without causing more suffering and evil. Humility and a sense of reality help a person keep the underlying needs of others in mind when their needs are inadequately or inappropriately expressed and when there are no immediate or easy solutions. (6) To forgive all injuries (Matt 6:15; 18:21–35; Col 3:13): Injuries are harmful acts received from another that often generate bitterness, resentment, and a spirit of vindictiveness. Love and forgiveness can transform an injurious event by restoring health and integrity to a relationship or at least by mitigating the injurious effects. (7) To pray for the living and the dead (Jas 5:16; Col 1:3,9; 2 Macc 12:45): The act of intercession for the living and the dead unites the prayers of the Church on earth with the ongoing intercession of Jesus and the saints in heaven and is expressive of the permanent bond that unites all Christians in the communion of saints. See also mercy, corporal works of.

PATRICIA M. VINJE

Mère Angélique. See Arnauld, Jacqueline Marie Angélique.

Merici, St. Angela. See Angela Merici, St.

merit, a term denoting just reward from God; used in Catholic theology since Tertullian (d. ca. 225) to indicate the human contribution to salvation. Discussed extensively in the Middle Ages, the Catholic affirmation of merit was bitterly contested during the Reformation, revealing differing conceptions of justification and grace. Reaffirmed at Trent (1545–63) and championed throughout the Catholic Reformation as implied by biblical discussions of "reward," merit has been criticized by more recent Catholic theologians as predicated on an overly legalistic view of God-human relations.

Theological Development: The principal reward of merit is eternal life, life with God in heaven. Catholic theologians of various stripes agree that good acts performed in this life can be meritorious of heaven, provided these acts are done in grace. The schools disagree, however, why precisely morally good acts done in grace are meritorious of eternal life. In Aquinas (d. 1274) and his followers, the emphasis is on grace as the transformative power of the Holy Spirit, who moves people to morally correct action. As the Spirit's, grace is of great intrinsic value, elevating the human act, which it makes possible, to equal value to the reward rendered by God; here, theologians speak of "condign" merit. While they, too, speak of condign merit, Duns Scotus (d. 1308), William of Ockham (d. 1347), and their followers prefer to describe grace as something created, as a created habit. Nothing created can be equal of itself in value to God, nor can it necessitate anything from God, including God's reward. That good acts done in grace are condignly meritorious is due, rather, to a further decision by God to accept these graced good works as if they were condignly meritorious of eternal life.

Catholic theologians have speculated about other possible rewards of human merits. A guiding metaphor is life as a "journey," which begins with the individual in the state of sin, then moving into the state of grace, performing good actions that keep one in grace and moving closer to life with God, and finally reaching the culmination of the journey in the next life, in heaven. Many theologians insist that the first step on the journey, the movement into the state of grace, can itself be meritorious. From the twelfth century on and repeated by Scotus, Ockham, and the young Thomas Aquinas, this affirmation was closely connected to the axiom facientibus quod in se est (Lat., "to those who do their best, God does not deny grace"), that is, God grants first grace to those who make the effort to reform their lives. Here, theologians speak of a "congruent" merit. Because the actions of one who lacks grace must by necessity fall short in value of any reward given by God, there is no condign merit at this stage of the journey. Rather, grace is granted as a reward only by the mercy of God: it befits God, it is congruent with the mercy of God, to recognize any effort at reformation in this way. The Aquinas of the Summa Theologiae abandoned this position; in the light of his reading of certain treatises of Augustine against the Massilians (later known as "semi-Pelagians"), who had themselves advanced an early version of the facientibus, Thomas came to describe the first step to God as itself due to the wholly unmerited grace of God that achieves the conversion of the sinner. He restricts talk of a "congruent" merit to the state of grace. One and the same moral act can be viewed from two angles: as due to God's grace, it is condignly meritorious; as the result of the correct use of human freedom, it is meritorious congruently.

Theologians gave much less attention to the role of merit in keeping a person in the state of grace; distinctive positions on perseverance in grace are thus revealing. Scotists, Ockhamists, and Thomists agree that good actions done in grace have a secondary reward: in addition to eternal life, they also merit the increase of habitual grace. For Scotus and Ockham, the increase of habitual grace is simply equivalent to persevering on the right path to God. The Aquinas of the Summa Theologiae adds, however, that a second grace, distinct from habitual grace, is needed to keep one in the state of grace and on the road to God; this grace is wholly unmerited, granted solely in accordance with God's saving will for the individual. This grace of perseverance, which permits the individual to overcome the temptations that arise from the remnants of past acts and stands at the head of every good act, is again probably championed by Thomas in the light of his reading of Augustine's later writings. See also condign merit; grace; justification; salvation; sanctification.

JOSEPH WAWRYKOW

Merry del Val, Rafael, 1865–1930, cardinal and diplomat. Son of a Spanish marquis and diplomat and an English mother, he studied in England, Belgium, and Rome, where he was ordained. In the papal diplomatic corps, he served in London, Berlin, Vienna, and Canada. In 1903 Pope Pius X named him cardinal and papal secretary of state, in which office he served until 1914. Noted for his personal integrity, he was politically unpopular in France. Though he was reputed an extremist in the struggle against Modernism, some think he may actually have moderated Pius X's policies. See also Modernism; Pius X, St.

Mersch, Émile (ay-meel' mairsh), 1890–1940, Jesuit philosopher and theologian. He contributed significantly to the early-twentieth-century renewal in ecclesiology occasioned by a return to biblical and patristic images of the Church. Mersch produced a massive two-volume study of the historical development of the doctrine of the Mystical Body and a draft of another two-volume dogmatic synthesis of the same subject, published posthumously. Mersch was killed in an air attack during the early years of the Second World War.

Merton, Thomas, 1915–68, Trappist monk, author, peace activist, and ecumenist. A precocious and undisciplined youth with no religious education, he proclaimed himself an atheist and pursued a hedonistic life-style. After an academically and morally disastrous year at Cambridge University, Merton attended Columbia University in New York. He toyed with communism but became progressively attracted to Catholicism through reading and discussion. Baptized a Catholic in 1938, he astonished his friends by entering the Cistercian (Trappist) Abbey of Gethsemani in Kentucky three years later. As a young monk he wrote a dramatic autobiography, The Seven Storey Mountain, which became a best-seller and a classic. It made Merton a religious figure of international prominence and established him as a Catholic writer. During the next twenty years he wrote prolifically on a vast range of topics.

Thomas Merton, Trappist monk and peace activist, whose writings have exercised a wide and profound influence on Catholic and secular thought in the second half of the twentieth century.

His earlier books dealt exclusively with religious matters such as prayer, asceticism, and interior growth. Later writings ventured into controversial issues connected with social problems and Christian responsibility: race relations, violence, war, economic injustice. Merton's ecumenical concerns predated and intensified ideas of Vatican II on interreligious understanding. He interpreted the great religions of the East to Catholics. Thomas Merton's accidental death occurred while he was attending a conference in Bangkok on December 10, 1968. He is regarded as a spiritual master, a brilliant religious writer, and a man who embodied the quest for God and human solidarity in the modern world.

messiah (Gk. transliteration messias of Heb. mashiakh; Gk., christos, "anointed one"), title used for the Israelite king (2 Sam 1:14) and for the high priest (Lev 4:3; cf. Zech 4:14). Kings and high priests were appointed at God's command by having their heads anointed with oil (1 Sam 9:15–10:1; 16:1–13; 2 Kings 9:3; Lev 8:12). Other figures appointed by God were occasionally spoken of as anointed by God, such as Cyrus (Isa 45:1) and prophets (1 Kings 19:16; Isa 61:1). Psalms speak often of a favored, anointed (Davidic) king (Pss 2, 45, 89, 132). The prophets seldom speak of an anointed one but they often look forward to an ideal ruler (Isa 7, 9, 11; Jer 23:5–6; Mic 5:2–4). The book of Daniel alludes to two anointed ones (probably the high priests Joshua and Onias III) as rulers (9:25–26).

In the Greco-Roman period, the rise of Jewish apocalyptic eschatology brought with it the expectation of a variety of "messianic" or angelic figures sent by God to intervene decisively in history and bring about the end of evil. A distinction should be made between figures explicitly called "anointed one" (messiahs in a strict sense) and similar figures called "Son of Man," "Chosen One," "Righteous One," "Branch of David," "Prince," etc. (messianic figures in a loose sense). Scenarios concerning God's intervention in the world varied greatly and did not always include a messianic figure. Such figures were understood as an ideal Davidic king or Levitical high priest or as heavenly intermediaries. For example, Daniel 7 speaks of a heavenly figure "like a son of man." Jubilees 31 and the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs hope for descendants of Judah and Levi. Various Dead Sea Scrolls speak of two anointed ones of Israel and Aaron, as well as of a Prophet like Moses, a Branch of David, Prince of the Congregation, and Melchizedek. Psalms of Solomon 17 looks forward to an anointed one, as do the late first century A.D. apocalypses 4 Ezra and 2 Baruch. The Similitudes of Enoch (Enoch 37–71) speaks of a son of man, chosen one, and righteous one. Later rabbinic Judaism settled on a Davidic·Messiah, who would appear at the end of the world. During the first centuries B.C. and A.D. a number of popular leaders claimed to be prophets or messiahs sent by God to lead Israel to freedom.

The centrality of Jesus in the NT caused eschatological thought to focus on the Messiah and other royal and eschatological figures. Jesus was identified early as Messiah (Christ), son of David, prophet, Son of Man, and Son of God (a royal title). Paul's Letters in the 50s already use "Christ" as a name (Rom 1:1, 7–8; 5:8 and often) rather than as a title (Rom 9:5). The Gospels understand Jesus as the Christ (Mark 1:1; 8:29) and contain reflections on Jesus as son of David (Mark 12:35–37; Matt 1–2; Luke 1–2), King of the Jews (Mark 15:32; Matt 2:2), and Savior (Luke 2:11). Because Jesus was executed by the Romans, early Christians used Isa 53 and other passages to develop the figure of a suffering Messiah (Mark 8:31; Luke 24:26; Acts 3:18; 26:23) who subsequently rose from the dead. The expectation that Jesus the Messiah will return at the end of the world permeates the NT, though the returning Messiah is sometimes called by other titles (Mark 13:26; 1 Thess 4:16; 1 Cor 15:23; Rev 20:4). See also Christ; Jesus Christ; titles of Christ. ANTHONY SALDARINI metania (me-tah'nee-ah; Gk., metanoia, "change of mind," "penance"), penance. Metania, or metany, also refers to the reverential bow or prostration used in the Byzantine rite upon entering the church, or in reverence to an icon or relic. It is called "metania" because it is often performed repeatedly as a penance, especially by monks. See also penance.

metanoia (me-tah-noy'ah; Gk., "change of heart"), a conversion from sin to God. In Catholic theology, metanoia includes sorrow for sin, amendment of sinful ways, and satisfaction or payment of the penalty for sin when possible. See also conversion.

metaphysics (Gk. "beyond the physical"), philosophical science of being or the study of first principles governing existence. According to Parmenides and Plato, physical realities persist in being what they are because of unchangeable, immaterial being. For Aristotle, metaphysics, as first philosophy, seeks to understand being as that which makes any being real. In medieval Christianity, both Aquinas and Duns Scotus related metaphysics to certain doctrines of Christian faith, explaining how all of creation depends on the existence of God. Today, Catholic theologians hold that the being of God is the object of human desire and first principle of existence. See also philosophy and theology.

metempsychosis, otherwise known as the transmigration of souls or reincarnation, name given to the doctrines of various religions and philosophies that posit both the preexistence of the human soul before union with the body and the soul's subsequent return to life on earth in human, animal, or inanimate form. See also reincarnation; soul.

Methodism, an evangelistic renewal movement composed of various churches numbering about 55 million members in over 100 countries, as of 1994. In general, the principle prevails that the best governed churches are autocephalous churches in individual nations, and churches in mission territories tend to become independent in time. Most are represented in the World Methodist Council.

The origins of Methodism are in the life and work of John Wesley (1703–91), a priest of the Church of England. Beginning with the Holy Club in Oxford, Methodism represented a disciplined or methodical approach to the Christian life in a time of great laxity in English Christianity. After a fruitless missionary experience in Georgia, Wesley returned to England. In 1738, after a particularly intense religious experience, he began preaching to the coal miners and other workers in the fields and wherever he could gain a hearing. His gifts as a preacher were equaled by those as an organizer. Where converts were made, he immediately developed a system of pastoral supervision, usually administered by laypeople.

Throughout his long life, Wesley remained a priest of the Church of England and never desired separation from it. His vision of the people called Methodists was basically that of a third order within the state church and for this he prescribed "Rules." Wesley's evangelistical zeal was matched by a strong emphasis on sacramental life. In the time of the Enlightenment, he represented a countercultural movement, insisting on "constant," i.e., frequent, Communion and faithful attendance to the other means of grace: Scripture, prayer, the Lord's Supper, fasting, and Christian conference (spiritual direction). In many ways, it was a Catholic reaction within the Church of England, coupled with evangelical zeal.

Basically a pragmatic traditionalist, Wesley often turned to his background as a patristics scholar to find solutions for contemporary problems. In worship, this meant a revival of the agape as a love feast, the vigil as watch night, and a great devotion to hymn singing. He published the first Anglican hymnal in 1737 and his brother Charles Wesley (1707–88) produced a prodigious amount of hymnody. Much of it was theological treatises set to music, such as the 1745 Hymns on the Lord's Supper.

John Wesley agreed with medieval theologian Peter Lombard (d. 1160) that bishops and presbyters were not different orders. He argued that only ordained presbyters could celebrate the Eucharist and so, when English bishops were unwilling to ordain men for North America, he took this step himself in 1784. He also provided an ordinal with rites for deacons, elders, and "superintendants." Three years later, American Methodists changed this last term to bishops. Most of American Methodism has been episcopal, with a strong connectional emphasis in contrast to the prevailing American congregationalism. Methodist bishops have the power of appointment to the order of elder.

Various black Methodist churches split from the American Methodist Church in the nineteenth century, and the Methodist Episcopal Church divided in 1844 over slavery. Many of these divisions have been healed as issues shift. English Methodism has never had bishops, but European Methodism and most mission territories reached by North Americans have. Methodists in many parts of the world, beginning in Canada in 1925, have joined in mergers with other churches. A distinctive feature has been the strong social conscience of American and English Methodism, generally expressed through a liberal agenda. In the United States in 1994, 126 colleges and universities reflect Methodist origins. Methodist theology has been deeply involved in the ecumenical movement. See also Protestanism; Reformation, the. JAMES F. WHITE Methodist-Catholic dialogue, theological conversations between delegates appointed by the World Methodist Council and the Vatican Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity (now the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity) since 1967. Each partner in these discussions is represented by bishops, presbyters, and laypeople from various continents.

To date, a series of reports at five-year intervals have been submitted to the respective churches. Topics such as the mission of the Church, evangelism, social problems, morality, ecclesiastical discipline, and spirituality have been the subjects of these reports. More extensive work began on the Eucharist and ministry. Both sides have agreed that bread and wine in the Eucharist become "efficacious signs of the body and blood of Christ," yet transubstantiation remains a stumbling block to further accord. Both sides affirm an apostolic ministry within the wider ministry of the whole Church, but disagree on how historical the current concepts of apostolic succession are and how essential they must remain for the life of the Church.

More recent discussions have been concerned with the Holy Spirit and ecclesiology, resulting in "Towards an Agreed Statement on the Holy Spirit" in 1981 and "Towards a Statement on the Church" five years later. In the early 1990s discussion revolves around the topic "The Apostolic Tradition," particularly with aspects of the apostolic faith and ministry and ministries.

Other regional discussions between Methodists and Catholics have occurred at regular intervals in the United States, the United Kingdom, and New Zealand. Both partners are deeply involved in World Council of Churches projects such as Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry (1982) and the resulting discussions. See also Methodism. JAMES F. WHITE Methodius of Olympus, St., d. 311, theologian, probably bishop of Olympus in Lycia. He practiced allegorical exegesis after the method of Origen but attacked some of Origen's teachings (e.g., on the resurrection body). His Symposium survives in the entire original Greek and other works survive in translation, but his scriptural commentaries, a major rebuttal of Porphyry (an anti-Christian philosopher), and many other works are lost. Feast day: September 18 (West); June 20 (East). See also Origen; Porphyry.

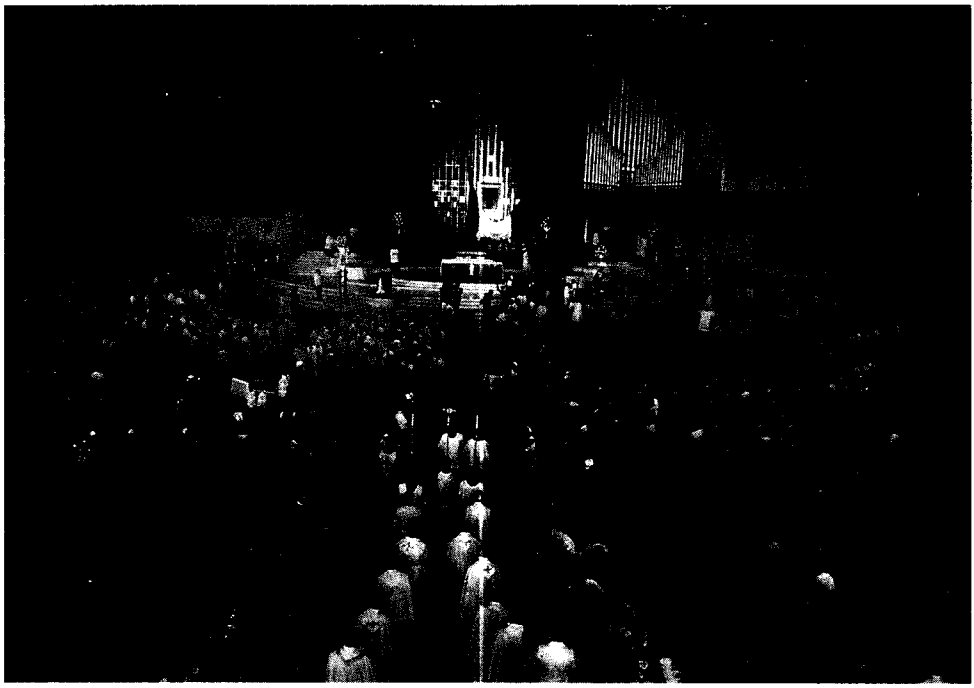
metropolitan, adjective referring to the chief local church of a region or to its bishop. Most often a metropolitan see is based in a city important because of its size, history, or political status. This see is headed by an archbishop who has certain responsibilities for governance in the dioceses attached to the archdiocese. Although in the West these responsibilities are very limited, in the Eastern churches they are greater. The metropolitan archbishop is given the pallium, the same stolelike vestment worn by the pope, as a sign of union with the Roman church and, through that church, with the universal Church. See also archbishop; pallium.

Metz, Johannes, b. 1928, German Catholic theologian. Ordained a priest for the diocese of Munich-Freising, he served as a professor of theology at the University of Münster from 1963 until his retirement in 1993. Author of numerous writings on theology and politics, he is credited with coining the term "political theology" to emphasize the close connection between faith and the temporal order.

Mexico, Catholicism in. The Christian faith was brought to the Aztecs and the many other tribes of the region now known as Mexico (formerly, "New Spain") from Spain in the 1500s by Augustinian, Dominican, Franciscan, and Jesuit missionaries. The peoples residing in the central plateau accepted the Church's teachings, and in 1530 Mexico City became a diocese. On December 9, 1531, the evangelization of New Spain received a lasting impetus when Juan Diego is reported to have received a vision of the Virgin Mary at Tepeyac, a hill northwest of Mexico City. By her words and countenance, Our Lady of Guadalupe conveyed that the indigenous peoples of Latin America could embrace Christian belief as fully as the peoples of Europe. Early evangelization was also aided by the exemplary lives and visionary leadership of Fray Juan de Zumárraga (1468–1548), the bishop of Mexico, and Don Vasco de Quiroga (ca. 1470–1565), the bishop of Michoacán. The Tribunal of the Inquisition, established in Mexico City in 1571, worked (for the next three hundred years) to keep the faith from incorporating pagan beliefs and practices and also to prevent the spread of Protestantism.



The faithful gathered for the celebration of the Eucharist, as the procession of clergy and other altar ministers enters the Basilica of Our Lady of Guadalupe, Mexico City.

Eighteenth and Nineteenth Centuries: As Spain declined as a world power in the eighteenth century, so, too, did its support for the Catholic Church in Mexico. As a result, evangelization waned and ecclesiastical discipline became lax. The misconduct of ecclesiastical officials eroded the Church's credibility among the people. Acting on controversies within Europe, the Spanish government expelled the Jesuits from Mexico in 1767, thereby weakening or eliminating their educational institutions and other apostolates. Nevertheless, the University of Mexico, established by the Jesuits in 1553, continued to develop. The country was also served well by the newspaper Gaceta de México (Sp., "Mexican Gazette"), founded in 1720 by Juan Ignacio de Castorena y Ursúa (1668–1733), who eventually became the bishop of Yucatán.

During Mexico's wars of independence (1810–21), the Church's hierarchy wanted to maintain Mexico as the Viceroyalty of Spain. However, some priests like Miguel Hidalgo y Costilla (1753–1811) and José María Morelos y Pávon (1765–1821) assumed leadership among the revolutionaries. After independence from Spain on September 28, 1821, the Mexican empire headed by Augustín de Iturbide regarded the Catholic faith as one of the pillars of the society and the state. Soon after the Mexican republic was established (1823), the government negotiated a concordat with the Holy See concerning Church-state relations, thereby ending the practice of patronato real (Sp., "royal patronage"). Yet conflicts persisted regarding the actual working relationship between the Church and the state. After the revolution that started in 1854, a new federal republic was founded on a liberal constitutional charter (1857) that ended special privileges and secularized Church property. The liberal government of Benito Juárez, which came to power after the War of Reform (1858–61), severed official ties with the Vatican. While the subsequent relations between the government and the Catholic Church were in general hostile, tensions lessened during Porfirio Díaz's dictatorship (1876–1910).

Twentieth Century: After the revolution that began in 1910, President Venustiano Carranza sponsored the constitution of 1917 that called for the separation of Church and state. The Catholic Church was virtually suppressed under the political leadership of Plutarco Elías Calles, who controlled the Mexican government from 1924 until 1934. As Mexico's president (1924–28, 1931), Calles's policy against the Church was so severe from 1926 through 1929 that in response the clergy went on strike. However, Calles kept the churches open without priests, who either went into hiding or were persecuted. Mexican Catholics in some regions revolted against the government by joining the militant organization Cristeros, named because of its motto, Vivo Cristo Rey! (Sp., "Long live Christ the King"). One martyr of the government's repression was the Jesuit priest Miguel Pro (b. 1891) who was executed by a firing squad on November 23, 1927. (He was beatified by Pope John Paul II on September 25, 1988, at St. Peter's in Rome.) In 1929 Calles organized the Partido Revolucionario Institucional (Institutional Revolutionary Party) that since then has been Mexico's dominant political party. The government of Lázaro Cárdenas (1934–40) ended the persecution of the Church and instituted a more lenient policy toward the Church. Nevertheless, according to law the Church was forbidden to own property and establish schools, priests were disfranchised and forbidden to wear clerical attire in public, and religious processions were prohibited.

In the early 1970s, President Luis Echevarría Álvarez sought to revive the spirit of the revolution of 1910 by opening the government to wider popular representation, and in this endeavor he received public support from liberal Catholic bishops, priests, and lay leaders. As a result, relations between the government and the Church were improved, even though some conservative Catholics resisted reform efforts. A new phase in the cooperation between the Catholic Church and the Mexican government commenced on February 17, 1990, when the government and the Vatican agreed to exchange permanent personal representatives. In September 1992, after a lapse of 131 years, full diplomatic relations between the Holy See and Mexico were resumed. The Mexican government now sends an ambassador to the Vatican and receives an apostolic nuncio, an official diplomatic representative of the Holy See. Legal restrictions against the Church were also lifted.

A young Mexican girl portrays the Blessed Virgin Mary on her way to Bethlehem to give birth to the Savior, in Las Posadas, Jocotopec, Mexico.

In 1993, 90 percent of Mexico's approximately 90 million people are nominally Catholic. There are fourteen archdioceses and fifty-seven dioceses. While Catholicism remains strong among the Mexican people, some Mexicans have responded positively in recent years to the evangelization and recruitment of Protestant churches, especially the fundamentalists, as well as the Mormon church. See also Guadalupe, Our Lady of; Latin America, Catholicism in.

Bibliography

Callcott, W. H. Church and State in Mexico, 1822–1857. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1926.

Braden, C. S. Religious Aspects of the Conquest of Mexico. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1930.

ROBERT A. KRIEG

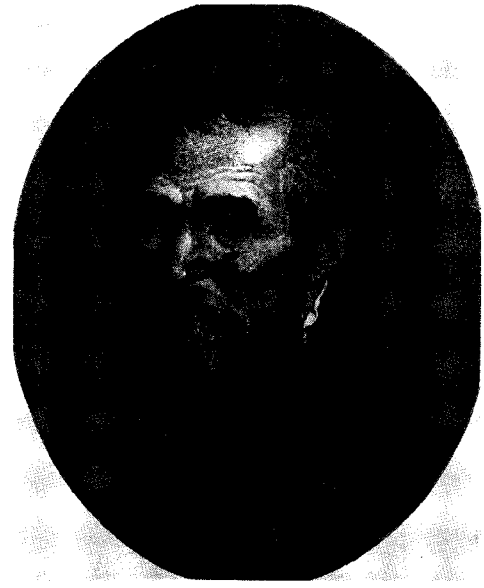
Meyer, Albert Gregory, 1903–65, cardinal-archbishop of Chicago (1958–65). A native of Milwaukee, he was appointed bishop of Superior, Wisconsin, in 1937, archbishop of Milwaukee in 1953, and archbishop of Chicago in 1958, becoming a cardinal the following year. Meyer was a reserved and dutiful bishop, ponderous in speech and cautious in action. His prominence as a figure in the U.S. hierarchy came during his years in Chicago when he attacked the evils of racism in the Church and gave support to priests involved in civil rights and ecumenical activities. A biblical scholar, he was also an important American figure at Vatican II, aligning himself with the progressive wing at the council.

Michael the Archangel, St., the leader of the ranks of angels and the guardian and protector of the people of Israel (see Dan 10; 12). Michael is also depicted in Jude 9 as having conducted warfare with the devil over the body of Moses. According to early Christian custom and cult, Michael defeated Satan and his followers and banished them from heaven. The feast of archangels Michael, Gabriel, and Raphael is celebrated on September 29, also known as Michaelmas Day. See also angel.

Michael the Archangel, traditionally regarded as the guardian of Christian armies against the enemies of the Church (thus the sword in hand) and as the protector of individual Christians against the power of Satan, especially at the moment of death; fifteenth-century Florentine sculpture by Andrea della Robbia, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York.

Michel, Virgil, 1888–1938, a Benedictine monk of St. John's Abbey, Collegeville, Minnesota, and an American liturgical pioneer. After initial contacts with the liturgical movement in Europe, he founded the influential liturgical periodical Orate Fratres (now, Worship), as well as The Liturgical Press. Michel's editorials constantly linked the liturgy, social justice, and other areas of contemporary living and critiqued excessive American individualism. He promoted the liturgical movement in the United States by lecturing widely and by writing a textbook series (Christ-Life Series) that attempted to integrate liturgy and life. See also liturgical movement.

Michelangelo [Michelangelo Buonarroti], 1475–1564, Italian High Renaissance sculptor, painter, architect, and poet. He was recognized as a genius by his contemporaries, who called him the divino (It., "divine one"). Michelangelo's work reflects Renaissance humanism, particularly the Neoplatonic philosophy encountered among the intellectuals at the Medici court, and the Catholic Reform movement, beginning with the preaching of the Florentine Dominican Savonarola and culminating in the profound personal faith of Michelangelo's later years. The heroic David (1505), the Moses (1513–15, part of the tomb for Pope Julius II), and the sculptures for the Medici tombs in San Lorenzo in Florence (1524–34) embody the tension between action and repose, the dualism of body and spirit that preoccupied the artist. The recently cleaned paintings of the Sistine Chapel ceiling (1508–12), together with the Last Judgment on the end wall (1536–41), brilliantly depict the creation of the world, the fall of humanity, and the ultimate reconciliation of all creation to God. Architectural commissions include the Capitol of Rome (1537–39) and the new design for St. Peter's Basilica (1546–64).



Michelangelo, the most famous and most accomplished Catholic artist in history. He produced the Pietà, the sculptures of David and Moses, the frescoes on the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel, and the designs for St. Peter's Basilica.

His self-portrait in the flayed skin of St. Bartholomew in the Last Judgment and Michelangelo's face as that of Joseph of Arimathea in an unfinished Pietà for the artist's own tomb (ca. 1555) intimately show the aged Michelangelo dependent on God's mercy, yearning for union with God. See also Catholicism and architecture; Catholicism and the visual arts; Saint Peter's Basilica.

Middle Ages, the historical period that spans the milennium between the collapse of the Roman Empire in 476 and the birth of the modern world at the end of the fifteenth century (others date it to the beginning of the twelfth century). As a historical concept, it is the invention of fifteenth-century humanists who regarded the time between the glories of Rome and their own rebirth of classical culture as a long middle age of darkness and superstition. The pejorative lables of "medieval" and "Gothic" are as inaccurate as was the excessively romantic view of the Middle Ages popular in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. In its broadest terms medieval Europe emerged as the combined result of Rome's classical legacy, barbarian settlements within the boundaries of the old empire, and the Christian religion. Christian and political expansion were often coterminous and fostered the broad unity of Christendom stretching from Britain to Byzantium until Constantinople's fall in 1453 and the subsequent division of Christendom during the Reformation. Its limits were also fixed by the rise of non-Christian religions such as Islam and the internal tensions between the spiritual and temporal destinies of Christian nations. The Middle Ages witnessed the birth of Europe, the rise of most modern European states, and the development of many European cultural, political, and social institutions. These include Romance languages and vernacular literature, bicameral forms of political government, much of canon and civil law and their judicial structures, the Christian intellectual life, the university, religious life, and ecclesiastical institutions including the papacy. The Gothic cathedral is the artistic triumph of medieval engineering and design. See also canon law; Holy Roman Empire; papacy, the; Rome; Scholasticism.

WILLIAM J. DOHAR

midrash (Heb., "inquiry, interpretation"), most properly rabbinic biblical interpretation, used more loosely for the process and results of all inner biblical, Jewish, and Christian interpretation. The word is used three times in the Bible with uncertain meaning (2 Chr 13:22; 24:27; Sir 51:23). The Dead Sea Scrolls use "midrash" to mean instruction, judicial inquiry, study of the law, and biblical interpretation. Rabbinic midrashim (pl.) are collections of interpretations arranged either verse by verse or thematically in sermonic compositions. Midrashic interpretations of biblical passages are scattered throughout other works. Many writings are called midrashic in the wider sense, including biblical books and passages that interpret earlier ones, Greek and Aramaic translations of the Bible (Septuagint and Targums), Qumran pesharim, Jubilees, the Genesis Apocryphon, and many passages of the NT.

Migne, Jacques-Paul (meen'), 1800–75, publisher. Ordained in Orléans in 1824, he moved to Paris and in 1836, fearing censorship, set up his own publishing house, Ateliers Catholiques, to produce an affordable, complete, 2,000-volume library for priests and educated laity. Though an 1868 fire prevented the completion of this project, he helped renew patristics with a 221-volume Latin patrology extending from Tertullian (d. ca. 225) to Innocent III (d. 1216) and a 161-volume Greek patrology extending from Pseudo-Barnabas (first century) to the Council of Florence (1438–45). He copied the best editions or had new ones made; many have yet to be superseded.

Milan, Edict of. See Constantine, Edict of.

military ordinariate, Church structure established to bring pastoral care to members of the military and their dependents. In brief, the military ordinariate functions like a diocese whose membership is determined not on the basis of residence within certain geographic boundaries, but on the basis of membership in the military service. Headed by a bishop who is assisted by a staff comparable to that of a diocesan bishop, the ordinariate oversees the religious care of military personal and their dependents worldwide. The priests who serve are drawn from a number of dioceses and religious communities; their ecclesiastical superiors have released them for such service. In the military of the United States these chaplains hold rank as officers. Before the creation of the military ordinariate, the archbishop of New York was the head of the military vicariate, whose offices were connected with the archdiocesan offices. Now bishop and offices are separate and independent from the archdiocese.

millenarianism, within Christian eschatology, the belief in the future establishment of a thousand-year period (the "millennium") either in preparation for, or subsequent to, the Second Coming of Christ. During this time, it is held, the martyrs and all the saints will be raised to life and share in Christ's messianic reign. Based largely on interpretations of Rev 20:1–15, the history of the teaching has been long and controversial. Recurrent literal readings of the text, especially in the second century and in the later Middle Ages, have never found favor within Catholic theology (cf. Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologiae 3.77.1–4), which has tended instead to stress the allegorical meaning of the passages, the millennium symbolizing the temporal duration of the Church, from Christ's Resurrection to the final judgment (cf. Augustine City of God 20.7–9). See also eschatology, individual; eschatology, universal.

Mill Hill Missionaries (M.H.M.), known officially as St. Joseph's Society for Foreign Missions, religious order founded in 1866 in England by Cardinal Herbert Vaughan. The society came to the United States in 1951. Its main purpose is to train and provide priests for ministry in foreign missions. It currently operates in twenty-one mission territories in Africa, Asia, and South America. Headquarters is located in London and the American headquarters is in St. Louis. See also Vaughan, Herbert.

Mill Hill Sisters, officially known as the Franciscan Missionaries of St. Joseph (F.M.S.J.), a congregation founded in 1883 by Alice Ingham in England originally to work in parish and charity ministries. These sisters received their popular name from the location of a seminary in London, where they collaborated with the Mill Hill priests. When the Mill Hill priests invited these sisters to join them in Malaysia in 1894, they became missionaries. An important work has been the nurturing of indigenous communities of sisters in Malaysia, Ecuador, Kenya, and the Philippines, but only in recent years have indigenous women joined the Mill Hill Sisters' congregation. In the 1990s about two hundred and fifty sisters minister in England, Scotland, Ireland, the United States, Kenya, and Ecuador. The generalate is in Manchester, England. See also Mill Hill Missionaries.

Milosz, Czeslaw (ches'law mee'wawsh), b. 1911, Lithuanian-born Polish poet and man of letters. After an early diplomatic career and exile in France, he came to the United States in 1960. He is emeritus professor of Slavic languages at the University of California (Berkeley). Author of the antitotalitarian work The Captive Mind (1950), he is the premier poet in the Polish language. His work gained him the Nobel Prize for literature in 1980.

mind/body, the philosophical problem of whether or not a valid substantial distinction can be drawn between the human mind and the human body. The question is a practical one because it bears on our survival as human persons after death. Is there a soul, or mind, that continues to exist after the body no longer exists? Although there are important historical and philosophical differences between the framing of this question in terms of "mind" or "soul," the pivotal divide is basically between some form of naturalism and some form of dualism. Naturalism construes human beings as complex physical systems that are continuous with the rest of the natural order, whereas dualism locates the distinctively human in a spiritual principle (a mind or a special kind of soul) that is discontinuous with the natural order and, therefore, capable of survival after separation from the body.

Most traditional accounts of distinctiveness and survival are grounded in dualistic accounts of mind or soul. On the other hand, many in the Christian tradition today construe distinctiveness and survival in terms of salvation history and the resurrection of the body without invoking the core metaphysical distinction of mind and body. Belief in eternal life is not based finally on philosophy but on the gospel of Jesus Christ. See also eternal life; immortality; resurrection of the body; soul.

Mindszenty, József (joh'zef mind-zen'tee), 1892–1975, Hungarian cardinal and active anti-Communist. Arrested by the Hungarian government in 1948, he pleaded guilty to the charge of treason after being drugged by his captors. Sentenced to life in prison, he received asylum in the United States embassy during the failed Hungarian uprising of 1956. As relations between Hungary and the West, including the Vatican, began to improve, his presence in Hungary became something of an embarrassment. In 1971 the Vatican arranged for his departure from Hungary to Rome, and in 1974 he relinquished his title as primate of Hungary. He became a symbol of anti-Communist sentiment in the United States and a heroic figure for conservative Catholics. See also Hungary, Catholicism in.

Minims (O.M.), a religious order of men founded by Francis of Paola in 1435 with an accent on humility and a Franciscan orientation. Minims in Latin means "the least." A second order of nuns and a third order of lay members were founded later. The order's headquarters is in Rome. See also Francis of Paola, St.

minister, extraordinary. See extraordinary minister of the Eucharist.

minister, ordinary. See ordinary minister.

ministry (Lat., ministerium, "service"), the public service rendered by members of the Church. Ministry is the work of those gifted with charisms and appointed by the Church to act in the name of Christ and of the Church with a view to continue the mission of Christ in the Church and in the world. In a more general sense, the term also designates works of service in the Church or in the world done in the name of Christ by any of the baptized. Throughout the Church's history, and especially since Vatican II (1962–65), ministry has undergone profound changes in response to new needs and new situations.

The Beginnings of Ministry: It is the belief of the Church that ecclesial ministry has its beginnings in the ministry of Jesus, who proclaimed the saving presence of the kingdom of God and called others to be associated with him in his God-given mission. Gospel accounts of post-Resurrection appearances make it clear that experience of the Risen Jesus involved a call to mission in his name.

The earliest documents of the NT, the Letters of Paul, show both that all the baptized are called to continue the mission of Christ and that certain persons have, by the gift (charism) of the Holy Spirit, a recognized ministry (Gk., diakonia) within the community to assist it in its life and mission. Names and roles of ministries vary greatly, though they are all seen as gifts of the Spirit and meant to build up the community of the faithful (1 Cor 12:4–11; 28–30; Rom 12:4–8). There are ministries of the word, of healing and of leadership; there are missionary leaders and local leaders. There is ample evidence for the role of women in ministry: in the founding of churches, in leadership roles, in teaching roles and as prophets, and in public worship.

Other NT documents give further evidence of the widespread presence of various specific ministries in the Church. In the pastoral Letters there are indications of efforts to describe the qualities needed for ministers and to order them for the good of the community.

Ministry in the Tradition of the Church: A wide variety of ministries continued to exist in the Church in its early centuries. In addition to bishops, presbyters, and deacons, there were, among others, teachers, prophets, widows, women deacons, confessors, doorkeepers, lectors, acolytes, and gravediggers. The type and exercise of ministry differed from place to place according to local need. Two dynamics of ecclesial ministry that continued to recent times began in the patristic period: the tendency of clerical roles to absorb ministry and the continuing birth of new expressions of ministry to respond to new needs.

With the rise of monasticism, many church ministries were taken over by monastic communities both of men and of women. Further changes came in response to the needs of developing feudal culture and again with the rise of urban society in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. Guilds organized for works of mercy and the care of the urban poor. When existing church structures were unable to respond to the needs of the masses, mendicant orders of laity, women and men, and clergy emerged and adapted new ministries of evangelization and care of the poor. Because many mendicants operated under the aegis of papal directives, tensions rose sometimes between ministries related to local episcopal structures and those of religious orders, especially as regards preaching responsibilities. It was tension, in part, between evangelical ministry and clerically dominated liturgical ministry that influenced debates between Reformers and the Catholic hierarchy in the sixteenth century.

In response to Reform focus on the ministry of the word and opposition to separation of clergy and laity, the Council of Trent (1545–63) defended the clerical ministries of minor orders, subdiaconate, diaconate, and priesthood. Sacramental ministry was based on the power of orders and preaching, teaching, and governing ministries on the power of jurisdiction. All were restricted to clerics. Yet post-Tridentine Catholicism also was marked by a multiplicity of religious orders of women and men and lay organizations that undertook ministry in many forms: education on all levels; health care; care for the poor; spiritual direction and counseling; missionary efforts; and care for the social, economic, and religious needs of immigrants. Even with the increasing clerical centralization in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, new forms of lay ministry continued to develop among various groups: youth, families, workers, students, and those in the communications media.

Vatican II: The watershed of contemporary Catholic understanding of ministry came in Vatican Council II (1962–65). Developments, in both practice and theory, that had emerged in the decades before the council received official recognition. Basic to its understanding of ministry in the Church is the council's recognition that all the faithful, by Baptism and Confirmation, are called to take an active responsibility for the community and mission of the Church. All the baptized participate in the mission of Christ, who was himself the minister of God's presence and purpose in the world. Several Vatican II documents—the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, and the Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity—speak of the Church's call, especially to the laity, to serve in the name of Christ the many needs of humankind in the world.

Other conciliar positions also contribute to current Catholic understanding of ministry, in both its specific and general sense. In several instances the council recognized that the Holy Spirit guides and directs the Church in communion and in ministry by both hierarchic and charismatic gifts. The council restored the permanent diaconate, in part, to grant the grace of office to those who were in fact doing diaconal ministry. Recalling ancient traditions of the Church, the council promoted the role of lay ministries in the liturgy of the Church, thus reversing the medieval and post-Tridentine restriction of liturgical ministries to clerics and those preparing to be clerics. It also recognized, most especially in the Decree on the Church's Missionary Activity, the contribution made by lay ministers of various types who contribute to the growth of the Church and the fulfillment of its mission. The call for a revised catechumenate involved a further recognition of the role of nonordained ministries in the Church.

Most of the council's explicit teaching on ministry focused on the ordained ministries of episcopacy, priesthood, and diaconate. In this teaching the council made significant shifts from previous Catholic understanding. The council's express teaching on lay ministries is ambivalent. At times it sees lay ministries in terms of Church functions to which laity are appointed by the hierarchy or which laypeople exercise only because there are too few or no clerics. In other instances, the council recognizes ministries that have their basis in a divine call and make a necessary contribution to the growth of the community.

Post-Vatican II: The tentative directions of the council have been pursued in subsequent papal documents, the revised code of canon law in 1983, and in the statements of various episcopal conferences. Pope Paul VI abrogated minor orders and the subdiaconate in 1972 and assigned the liturgical functions of the subdeacon to the lay ministries of lector and acolyte, restricting these ministries to men. The pope also invited the establishment of other ministries according to need. In his 1975 statement on evangelization, Pope Paul VI clearly recognized the place of nonordained ministries in the Church and suggested that norms for them be guided by the origins of the Church, its present needs and those of humankind. Pope John Paul II addressed the issue of ministries in the Church in his 1989 document on the laity, Christifideles Laici.

Developments in the actual function of church ministries have outpaced their official recognition in the Church. Lay ministries function in many areas of the life of the Church: religious education; pastoral work; liturgy and music; the catechumenate; care for the youth, the elderly, the sick; social ministry; spirituality; evangelization; and parish administration. While a rite of ordination is presently restricted to deacons, priests, and bishops and the formal rite of installation is reserved to those entering the canonical ministries of lector and acolyte, various types of rituals have been adopted to recognize the women and men who engage in lay ministries. The increasing presence of women in ministry has major implications not only as regards numbers but also in the understanding and practice of ministry.

In the face of rapid developments in ecclesial ministry, conclusions are premature. Certain directions do emerge, however. All the baptized share in the responsibility to build up the community and carry on the mission of the Church in the world. In this broad sense, all the baptized share in the ministry of the Church. Within this wider meaning is the more specific meaning of public ministry in the name of the Church. The Catholic Church recognizes, in the specific sense of public ministry, the presence of both ordained and lay ministry in the Church. The development of the latter is one of the more significant features of twentieth-century Catholic church life. See also Church; laity; priesthood.

Bibliography

Cooke, Bernard. Ministry to Word and Sacraments: History and Theology. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1976.

Lawler, Michael G. A Theology of Ministry. Kansas City, MO: Sheed & Ward, 1990.

O'Meara, Thomas Franklin. Theology of Ministry. New York: Paulist Press, 1983.

Osborne, Kenan B. Ministry: Lay Ministry in the Roman Catholic Church. New York: Paulist Press, 1993.

Power, David N. Gifts That Differ: Lay Ministries Established and Unestablished. New York: Pueblo Publishing, 1980.

Schillebeeckx, Edward. The Church with a Human Face: A New and Expanded Theology of Ministry. New York: Crossroad, 1985.

FREDERICK J. CWIEKOWSKI

minor basilica. See basilica, minor.

minor orders, the orders of porter, lector, exorcist, and acolyte. For many centuries minor orders functioned as transitional ministries for those preparing for diaconate and priesthood. These orders have their origins in the ministries that, responding to diverse local pastoral needs, developed without set pattern in the third and fourth centuries. Porters had maintenance and security responsibilities; lectors read during worship; exorcists assisted at rites of initiation and repentance; subdeacons assisted the deacons; acolytes, initially, served as secretaries and messengers for the bishop. There were also other ministries, varying in different places, such as psalmists, teachers to instruct catechumens, orders of widows and virgins, and those who buried the dead. In time, these ministries became increasingly regulated, reduced in number, and eventually reserved to candidates for priesthood. By the time of the Council of Trent (1545–63), the minor orders were four: porter, lector, exorcist, and acolyte. The order of subdeacon, with its obligations of the Liturgy of the Hours (breviary) and celibacy, came to be regarded in the West as a major order.

The Second Vatican Council called for a revision of the ceremonies of the rites of these orders in the Latin Church. In 1972 Paul VI abrogated the four minor orders and replaced the subdiaconate with the lay ministries of lector and acolyte, though reserving their reception to men. The revised Code of Canon Law of 1983 authorizes men and women, even if they are not lectors or acolytes, to fulfill certain of their functions when designated ministers are lacking and the needs of the Church call for them. See also Holy Orders; major orders; subdeacon.

FREDERICK J. CWIEKOWSKI

Minucius Felix, third-century Latin Christian Apologist. A Roman advocate, possibly of African origin, Minucius wrote the Octavian, a sophisticated defense of Christianity modeled on Cicero's On the Nature of the Gods. This stylized debate between the young pagan Caecilius and the Christian Octavius on the providence of God and the end of the world was much admired by Jerome, the influential biblical scholar.

miracles [in the Bible], divine actions performed directly by God or through human beings that provoke wonder and amazement. The biblical vocabulary is much more diverse than the English "miracle." Key Hebrew terms in the OT include 'ôt, "sign," which emphasizes the function of the action or specified object; môpēt, "wonder, portent, miracle," most frequently associated with God's wonders in Egypt; and nīpĕlā'ôt, "great deeds," which stresses the extraordinary character of the deed. The psalmists regularly praise God for divine nīpĕlā'ôt. The actions or objects to which these terms refer are often but not always "miraculous," e.g., both the plagues in Egypt as well as Isaiah and his children are called "signs and wonders/portents" ('ōtôt and môpĕtîm [Deut 4:34; Isa 8:18]). NT texts employ a variety of Greek terms: sēmeion, "sign," points to the significance of the event and is the word for miracle in John; teras, "wonder," is associated with sēmeion in the NT and draws attention to the extraordinary character and even terror of the deed; dynamis, "deeds of power," accents the divine source; ergon, "work," has a specialized meaning, primarily in Johannine texts, indicating the miraculous activity of God and Jesus. The NT uses the verb thaumazō, "to be amazed," to express the reaction of bystanders. As in the OT, the NT terms sometimes refer to nonmiraculous events or objects. The biblical text, therefore, presents miracles within a broad frame of reference.

Three Clusters of Miracles: There are three major clusters of miracles in the Bible. The most important in the OT is the series of acts by which Yahweh delivered Israel from Egypt and led the people to Canaan. These demonstrate Yahweh's sovereignty over the gods of Egypt and care for Israel through the control of the forces of nature. A second collection appears in the Elijah-Elisha stories, which present the confrontation between Yahwism and Baalism. The last major set consists of the miracles of Jesus and the early Church, which are linked with the inbreaking of the eschatological kingdom.

Since many of these stories were told orally before they became part of texts, scholars have used form criticism to analyze them. Most miracles in the OT are sagas or legends celebrating Israel's origin and heroes. NT scholars group miracles into the large category of "miracle story" and then subdivide it into exorcisms, healings, epiphanies (i.e., the manifestations of divinity), rescue miracles (stories of deliverance from danger), gift miracles (extraordinary provisions), and rule miracles (reinforcement of religious rules). The basic pattern of a miracle story is threefold: a description of the problem, the miracle, and confirmation.

NT authors use miracle stories to make specific theological points. Mark's Gospel counterbalances miracle stories in the first half with the Cross in the second half. The message is that Jesus' true identity as the Son of God is recognized at the Cross. Matthew's fondness for systematic collections is evident in the ten miracles of chapters 8–9, which show that Jesus the Messiah is not only a teacher (the Sermon on the Mount) but a miracle worker. Luke-Acts connects miracles with the Spirit in the unfolding of salvation history. The seven "signs" in the first half of John are set beside related discourses as events that reveal Jesus' true identity.

The historicity of biblical miracles has been disputed, especially since the Enlightenment. The Catholic Church upholds the general reality of Jesus' miracles as signs of the kingdom, while permitting historical investigation to make independent judgments about specific miracle stories. See also miracles [theology of]. GREGORY E. STERLING miracles [theology of], unusual and unexpected manifestations of the presence and power of God in human history. The First Vatican Council (1869–70), in its Dogmatic Constitution on the Catholic Faith (Dei Filius, ch. 3), affirms that, along with the internal help of the Holy Spirit, God wanted to join external demonstrations to divine revelation. These divine deeds, miracles, and prophecies are certain signs of that revelation made understandable to all. The council listed Moses and the prophets Christ the Lord, and the apostles as primary examples of miracle workers. With the development of modern science and the Enlightenment insistence on the autonomy of reason, miracles, along with the revelation they are intended to demonstrate, have been strongly questioned as nothing more than mythic stories from a primitive past. While not adhering to an earlier apologetic notion that miracles "prove" anything (such as Jesus' divinity) in a strict empirical sense, contemporary biblical criticism does recognize that miracles are integral to God's self-communication (or revelation) as recorded in the Judeo-Christian biblical witness. In other words, miracles belong to the substance of the proclamation about God's saving action in Christ. There are three foundational miracles, on the basis of which all other claims to the miraculous must be tested. They are Creation, Exodus, and Resurrection.

Creation—The Wonder of Human Existence: The philosophical question as to why things exist receives its biblical answer in the personal self-involvement of God in the shaping of human history from its very beginning. The Scriptures do not include the modern concept of "nature" with its Newtonian ideas of constancy and fixity that do not allow interventions or contraventions of nature's "laws." Such a view is questioned today even by science. In the Bible, the world and all that is in it belongs to God. There is no hard and fast distinction between nature and history. The world is the arena of God's surprising and unexpected actions. The sin of Adam and Eve has consequences for the relationship between humans and the rest of creation (Gen 3:15). God is everywhere interacting with the created world. A miracle (for which there is no word in Hebrew) is a "sign" (Heb., 'ôt), a "wonder or portent" (môpēt), an "unusual or unexpected event" (pālā') that manifests the presence and power of God.

Exodus—The Power and Will of YHWH to Save: The biblical notion of miracles cannot be understood apart from the centrality of faith. While the miracle stories exhibit the characteristics of popular tradition, as would be expected, their purpose is not to dwell on the phenomenal character of the miraculous as such but to call the community to faith in YHWH, who is Lord of all that exists. The "miracle" of the Exodus is the covenant, God's personal relationship to the people and the consequences that it bears for their relationships to one another. "Signs" like the burning bush, "wonders and portents" like the plagues in Egypt, "unusual and unexpected events" like crossing the Red Sea, while containing a historical core or factual base, are primarily intended to manifest and communicate this new and wonderful relationship of YHWH with the beloved community of Israel.

Resurrection—The Final Transformation of Creation: For the Christian, all of God's promises are fulfilled in the death and Resurrection of Jesus. This is the final and definitive action of God for the sake of the whole of reality. It is a divine embrace that reaches back to the very origins of the universe, affirms the history of Israel culminating in the history of Jesus, and reaches forward to the final transformation of all things in Christ. For the believer, the miracle lies in God's all-inclusive and transforming love. It is within this embrace that one must locate the miracles of Moses and the prophets, of Jesus in his historical ministry, and of the apostles in the continuing life of the Church.

The Christian Scriptures, like the Hebrew Bible, have no word for miracle. They speak of a "sign" (Gk., sēmeion; Heb., 'ôt), a "wonder or portent" (teras; môpēt), a "work of power" (Gk., dynamis), and frequently in John a "work" (ergon). However, the notion of "signs" as things that legitimate Jesus' ministry or prove his divinity is rejected (Mark 8:11–12) unless it is understood as a God-given sign pointing beyond itself to the central miracle of Jesus' death and Resurrection (Matt 16:1–4; Mark 8:11–13; Luke 11:16, 29–32; 12:38–42, 54–56; John 2:18–22; 6:25–34). This is the interpretation of the Evangelists. For Jesus, in his historical ministry, there can be no question that he was perceived to be a healer of infirmities and an exorcist who had the power to drive out demons. These miracles are not unique, as can be seen from parallel stories in rabbinic and Hellenistic literature and from Jesus' response to the charge (Mark 3:22–30) that he casts out demons by the prince of demons: "... by whom do your own exorcists cast them out?" (Matt 12:27b; Luke 11:19b). What is important is Jesus' understanding of his miracles as signifying the arrival of the kingdom of God and so the triumph of the Spirit of God over Satan: "But if it is by the Spirit of God that I cast out demons, then the kingdom of God has come to you" (Matt 12:28; Luke 11:20). The miracles are authentic signs of the kingdom when faith is integral to the experiences either of those healed or their intercessors (see, e.g., Matt 8:5–13; 15:21–28; Mark 5:21–43; 9:14–29; 10:46–52; Luke 7:36–50; 17:11–19). This idea is developed, particularly in John, so that explicit faith in Jesus Christ is required for the signs or works to be adequately seen or understood. The important thing, then, is not just the phenomenon but the personal relationship with Jesus that it points toward (John 20:29, 31).

There are many today who can accept the fact that Jesus was a healer and exorcist, but who cannot accept the so-called nature miracles because they appear to contravene the "laws" of nature. Certainly, stories of miraculous feedings, walking on water, and raising the dead appear more mythic than factual to the contemporary mind. There can be a certain freedom of belief with regard to their factual character, but they, too, must remain integral to the Church's proclamation of the Risen Lord, who has power over all our fears and uncertainties and finally over death itself (1 Cor 15:24–27). Have miracles continued since the time of Jesus? Paul claims as a firsthand witness that he and others, too, worked miracles (Rom 15:18–19; 1 Cor 12:9–10; 2 Cor 12:12; Gal 3:5). There is no reason to think that miracles have not occurred even to the present day. But their authenticity depends on whether, with Paul, they serve to proclaim "the good news of Christ" (Rom 15:19). See also apologetics; faith; miracles [in the Bible].

Bibliography

Fuller, R. H. Interpreting the Miracles. London: SCM Press, 1963.

Kee, H. C. Medicine, Miracle, and Magic in New Testament Times. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1986.

Lewis, C. S. Miracles. New York: Macmillan, 1947.

Monden, Louis. Signs and Wonders: A Study of the Miraculous Element in Religion. New York: Desclee, 1966.

Moule, C. F. D., ed. Miracles: Cambridge Studies in Their Philosophy and History. London: A. R. Mowbray, 1965.

MICHAEL L. COOK

Miraculous Medal, religious sacramental. Inspired by the visions of Catherine Labouré in 1830, a medal in honor of the Immaculate Conception was struck in 1832. One side depicted the Blessed Virgin Mary standing on a globe crushing a serpent's head; on the other side was the letter M, under which were the twin hearts of Jesus (circled by thorns) and Mary (pierced by a sword), circled by twelve stars. The figure of Mary had the invocation, "O Mary, conceived without sin, pray for us who have recourse to thee." Many miracles were attributed to the devotion, which accounts for its name.

The medals were extraordinarily popular before the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), and their use was encouraged by the Church. The popularization of the devotional use of the medal was a particular

The Miraculous Medal, struck in 1832 in honor of the Immaculate Conception, a dogma defined by the Church in 1854, is called miraculous because of the miracles that were said to have been performed for the benefit of those who wore it.

apostolate of the Vincentian Fathers. See also Labouré, St. Catherine.

Mirari Vos (mee-rah'ree vohs; Lat., "You wonder"), encyclical letter of Pope Gregory XVI, August 15, 1832, condemning (without mentioning by name) the social and political principles espoused in L'Avenir, the Catholic newspaper edited by F. de Lamennais, C. Montalembert, and J. Lacordaire, e.g., social liberty, separation of Church and state, and freedom of religion and of the press.

Mishnah (Heb., "repetition, study"), the authoritative, early-third-century collection of rabbinic legal teachings assembled by Rabbi Judah the Prince and his colleagues. Laws and disputes concerning tithes, festivals, marriage, civil law, sacrifices, and ritual purity are collected, expanded, and systematized so that the details of the law form a coherent whole that reflects the rabbinic view of an orderly and sanctified world.

Missal, General Instruction of the Roman. See General Instruction of the Roman Missal.

Missal, Roman. See Roman Missal.

missalette (mi-sah-let'), a small missal or booklet to assist the assembly in following the words and actions of the Mass. Because monthly or seasonal missalettes with musical selections are often printed on recycled paper and may break down quickly with frequent use, these pamphlets may stand in marked contrast to the presider's grand liturgical books. Successful attempts to restore integrity to the assembly's liturgical books have been made with the publication of dignified music books, which at the same time supply scriptural readings and pastoral aids for catechesis and evangelization. See also Roman Missal.

Missa pro populo. See Mass for the People.

missiology, a specialization within theology that focuses on the missionary activity of the Church toward non-Christians. Drawing upon anthropological and cultural data, missiology studies the pertinent teachings and norms of the Church as well as the history, present condition, and methods of missionary activity (Decree on the Church's Missionary Activity, n. 26). See also missions.

mission, the purpose for which the Church has been "sent." Mandated by Christ to preach the gospel to every nation, the Church sees itself as sent, like Jesus, to bring the good news of God's love to people throughout the world. This task implies and requires that the Church give witness to this love by works of charity, teach the implications of this love by proclaiming respect for each human person and an ethic based on God's love, and celebrate this love in public and private worship. The organization of the Church exists to support the Church's mission. Areas of the world that have received the gospel relatively recently are at times called "mission" lands. See also Church; missions.

mission, parish. See parish mission.

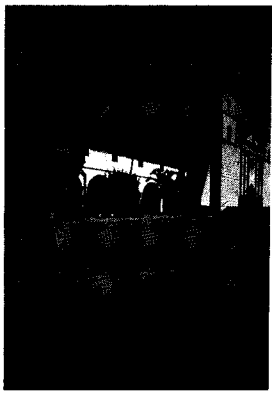
Missionary Sisters of Our Lady of Africa (M.S.O.L.A.), sometimes called "The White Sisters" because of their white habits, a congregation founded in Algiers, North Africa, by Archbishop (later Cardinal) Charles Lavigerie in 1869 to care for orphans and provide medical care, combatting in particular eye diseases. Twenty-two indigenous sisterhoods have been founded by these sisters. As of 1993 they worked in seventeen countries in Africa, empowering women, training leaders, and doing pastoral work. There are about fourteen hundred members, from twenty-four different countries. Half of those in formation are Africans. The generalate is in Frascati, Italy.

Mission Helpers of the Sacred Heart (M.H.S.H.), a congregation founded in Baltimore, Maryland, in 1890 by Mary Frances Cunningham and Anna Hartwell to teach religion to African-American children who were not allowed to attend classes with white children. Evangelization and catechetics have always been the focus of the group. In the early years of the twentieth century they began work in catechizing the deaf. By 1993, about 120 members worked in pastoral ministry, catechetics, telecommunications, parish visiting, and hospital ministry, among both minority and majority populations. They minister in several dioceses in the United States, in Puerto Rico, and in Venezuela. The motherhouse is still in Baltimore.

MISSIONS

Missions, or simply mission, is what the Church does for the sake of furthering God's reign in the world; more specifically, the announcing the gospel to those who have not heard it, either in one's own country (home missions) or abroad (foreign missions). Missions also sometimes refers to parish renewal programs. The term is now used most frequently in the singular form "mission." "Evangelization" and "evangelize" are roughly equivalent terms for "mission" and "missionary activity."

Missionary activity goes back to Jesus himself, who sent out disciples two by two to proclaim his message (Matt 10:1–15; Mark 5:7–13) to Israel and commissioned the Eleven to carry his gospel to all nations (Matt 28:19–20). The Acts of the Apostles can be read as a highly idealized account of the earliest missionary movement in Christianity. Paul is presented as the greatest of the early missionaries.



The Old Mission in Santa Barbara, California, a monument to the missionary efforts of Spanish clergy to bring the gospel to the New World. In 1994 the largest number of U.S. Catholics was in the state of California—over 7.5 million.

MISSION HISTORY

The Church has carried out its mission in a variety of ways and with differing levels of intensity throughout history. In the earliest period, monks and occasionally bishops were the missionaries. Some of these are commemorated as "apostles" to their specific regions: St. Augustine, to England; St. Patrick, to Ireland; St. Boniface, to Germany; and Sts. Cyril and Methodius, to the Slavic peoples. An alternative method in this period, used especially by the Merovingian kings (sixth–ninth centuries), was forced mass conversions as a policy for the pacification of northern European tribes.

In the medieval period, argument and moral persuasion were used to convert Jews and Muslims by figures such as Raymond of Peñafort (d. 1275) and Ramón Lull (d. ca. 1315). Forced conversions of Jews were common, however, in the same period. The thirteenth century saw the first European missionary forays into China, especially by the Franciscans. Nestorian missionaries had reached there earlier, however.

The so-called voyages of discovery, beginning in the 1490s ushered in a new missionary era, associating mission with imperial conquest. In 1493 Pope Alexander VI divided the new territories discovered by Christopher Columbus between Portugal and Spain, with the mandate to convert the peoples in the New World (the Caribbean islands, Central and South America) to Christianity. Christianity spread to Latin America and parts of Asia and Africa, with the missionaries, drawn mainly from the mendicant religious orders (Franciscans, Dominicans, Augustinians), serving as agents of the crown. Some missionaries, however, such as Bartolomé de las Casas (d. 1566), criticized imperial policy.

The newly founded Jesuits contributed important figures to mission; principal among them was Francis Xavier (d. 1552), considered the patron saint of Catholic missions along with Thérèse of Lisieux (d. 1897). The Jesuit Matteo Ricci (d. 1610) and companions used European technology and the adoption of Chinese ways and thought patterns to launch a successful mission in China. This mission came to an end in the Chinese rites controversy, i.e., whether Chinese rites of ancestor veneration could be incorporated into Christianity. Pope Clement XI decided against the rites in 1704 and 1715, but these decisions were overturned by Pope Pius XII in 1939.

In 1622, Pope Gregory XV founded the Vatican office called the Sacred Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith (De Propaganda Fide; commonly known as the Propaganda; renamed Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples in 1969) to centralize missionary activity and to provide for those new churches where the hierarchy had not yet been established. Missionary activity went into decline immediately before the French Revolution, especially with the suppression of the Jesuits (1773).

The modern missionary period begins with Europe's expansion into Africa and Asia at the beginning of the nineteenth century. A host of religious orders were founded to carry out missionary work (e.g., the Marists for the South Pacific, the White Fathers for Africa). National missionary societies were also founded (e.g., the Columbans in Ireland, Maryknoll in the United States).

The United States was itself considered a mission territory by the Propaganda until 1908, although American religious men and women had already been sent out to missions abroad. U.S. missionary efforts grew between the two world wars as the Propaganda entrusted more than thirty mission territories to American missionaries. But the largest U.S. missionary wave came after World War II, when Pope Pius XII appealed for U.S. missionaries to go to Latin America to help save that continent from Communism. This wave peaked in 1968 with more than 9,600 U.S. missionaries abroad. By 1992, there were fewer than 6,000 U.S. foreign missionaries.

Up to World War II, most U.S. missionaries were men and women religious, with the Jesuits and Maryknoll providing the largest numbers. Beginning in the late 1950s, a significant number of diocesan priests began to serve as foreign missionaries. Since the 1960s many laymen and laywomen have become missionaries, either in association with religious orders or in independent lay mission organizations.

MODES OF MISSIONARY ACTIVITY

Missionary activity in the modern period is carried out in a number of ways. First among these is a direct proclamation of the message of Jesus Christ. Throughout the nineteenth and twentieth centuries education, medicine, and social development have also been modes for carrying out mission. While this has brought Christianity and improved the lot of many people, it has often led to confusing Christianization with Westernization, both in the minds of missionaries and those they reached.

A priest gives absolution to a penitent in Joballar, Dominican Republic, where evangelization began almost immediately after the arrival of Christopher Columbus in 1492 and where there are now over 6.5 million Catholics, or more than 91 percent of the population.

These methods continue to be used, but with more caution. Since the 1960s other methods have been emphasized. Among these are dialogue with non-Christian religions, the witness of Christian life (especially in areas where other forms of missionary work are not permitted), and solidarity in the liberation of the poor from oppression. In all instances, there is a greater emphasis on allowing the message of the gospel to be expressed in forms known to, and appropriate in, the culture where it is being proclaimed. This is known as the process of "inculturation." Missionaries now recognize that conversion is a much slower and more complex process than was once imagined.

MISSIONARY ORGANIZATION

Through long periods of the Church's history there was no systematic organization of missionary activity. Papal patronage was often sought for undertaking missionary work, but this was not necessary. Secular rulers often provided both protection and material support.

The medieval religious orders used their own internal structure of provinces and houses to provide organization. From 1622, the Propaganda assigned geographical regions to different orders, a practice that continued into the 1960s. The Propaganda continues to collect and distribute funds through the Pontifical Aid Societies (Society for the Propagation of the Faith, the Holy Childhood Association, Society of St. Peter the Apostle) to aid newer and poorer churches. These societies each have a national and a diocesan organization and also carry out mission education as well as collect funds.

The religious orders worked largely independently of one another in their missions. In 1950 the Propaganda authorized setting up national mission secretariats for coordinating services, training, and publication.

Such a secretariat was established in the United States and continued until 1969. It was replaced in 1970 by the U.S. Catholic Mission Council, which jointly represented the U.S. bishops and men and women religious. This continued until 1976, when the bishops withdrew their support and consolidated their efforts within the Missions Committee of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops. In 1982, the U.S. Catholic Mission Association was established as a means of communication among religious orders, lay mission associations, and interested individuals.

CATHOLIC MISSION TEACHING

Although missionaries had developed manuals for mission activity at various points in history, comprehensive thinking and teaching about mission began with Pope Leo XIII (d. 1903), who wrote six encyclicals relating to mission, most of them on specific issues. On the academic side, the discipline of missiology began among Protestants in the latter half of the nineteenth century, with the first Catholic professorship of missiology established at Münster, Germany, in 1911. Faculties of missiology were established subsequently at the Gregorian and Urban universities in Rome and in other European universities.

Contemporary mission teaching dates from Pope Benedict XV's encyclical Maximum Illud (1919). It reminded Catholics that the purpose of missionary activity was to bring about the conversion of souls and to provide the Church in other lands with its own native leadership as quickly as possible. These themes of conversion and establishing the Church were elaborated upon in missiology down to the time of Vatican II (1962–65). Pope Pius XI (d. 1939) carried Benedict XV's policies forward with his encyclical Rerum Ecclesiae (1926) and by ordaining Chinese, Indian, and Japanese bishops. Pius XII (d. 1958) continued in the same vein with two encyclicals, Evangelii Praecones (1951) and Fidei Donum (1957). There was in these works a growing emphasis on what would later be called inculturation.

The watershed in mission teaching came with the Second Vatican Council. Three important developments took place. First, a more dynamic understanding of the Church in itself and in relation to the world was presented in the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (Lumen Gentium, 1964) and the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (Gaudium et Spes, 1965). The Church no longer saw itself as separated from the world, but as deeply engaged in it. A theological balance was likewise restored by making proper distinctions between the Church and the reign of God (the two are not identical) and between Christ's Church and the Catholic Church (the former "subsisting" in the latter).

The second development was the relation of the Church to mission. The Decree on the Church's Missionary Activity (Ad Gentes Divinitus, 1965) roots the basis for mission not so much in the Church or even in the Great Commission (Matt 28:19–20), but in the dynamic activity of the Trinity itself in the world, through the sending of the Second Person in the Incarnation, and in the sending of the Holy Spirit following the Resurrection. The Church participates in this sending inasmuch as it is sacrament of God in the world. The Church is thus by its very nature missionary; or put another way, the Church does not have missions, it is mission. Missionary activity is therefore not the work of a designated few but is incumbent upon all the baptized.

The third development affecting mission was a new attitude toward other great religious traditions, expressed in Lumen Gentium and Ad Gentes Divinitus, but especially in Nostra Aetate (The Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions, 1965). The good things found in other religions are affirmed, and it is now taught that those who follow those traditions and through no fault of their own do not know Christian faith, achieve some measure of salvation. What exactly the council fathers meant by this remains controverted and has opened a debate about the relation of Christianity to other religions. Its effect has been to support dialogue with other religions, but it has also called into question for some people whether Christianity should attempt to convert members of other religions at all.

The most influential postconciliar document for mission has been Pope Paul VI's apostolic exhortation on evangelization in the modern world, Evangelii Nuntiandi, published in 1975. It provides an extensive reflection on what evangelization is and how it takes place. It emphasizes not only the evangelization of individuals, but also of cultures. It also gives cautious support to liberation theologies and small ecclesial communities if properly understood. For many, Evangelii Nuntiandi remains the handbook for modern missionary activity.

"Inculturation" grew as a concept in the 1970s and was first used in a papal document in Pope John Paul II's Catechesi Tradendae in 1979. John Paul II also issued an encyclical on mission in 1991, Redemptoris Missio. It reiterates conciliar and postconciliar teaching, with a special emphasis on proclamation as the central mode of evangelization. He has also urged a "New Evangelization" in Christian countries that have lost the fervor of earlier commitment, especially in western Europe and Latin America.

Contemporary mission thought rests on the triad of evangelization, inculturation, and liberation. Evangelization is about the bringing of the gospel into a culture. But the process is not complete without inculturation, the gospel's taking root and assuming the form of the culture. And that cannot happen until there is a genuine "renewal of humanity" (Paul VI) that is brought about by the liberation of the poor from their oppression.

See also Church; evangelization; inculturation; liberation theology.

Bibliography

Jenkinson, William, and Helene O'Sullivan, eds. Trends in Mission: Toward the 3rd Millenium. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1991.

Motte, Mary, and Joseph R. Lang, eds. Mission in Dialogue. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1982.

Scherer, James A., and Stephen B. Bevans, eds. New Directions in Mission and Evangelization. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1992.

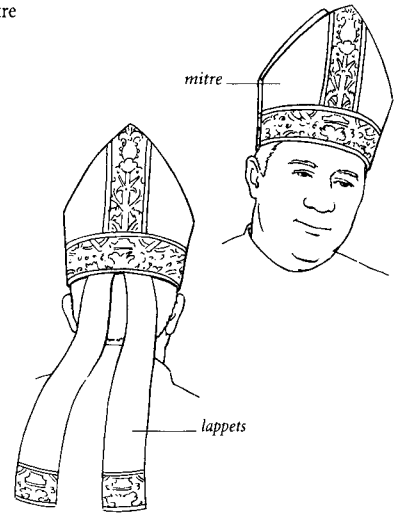
ROBERT SCHREITER

Mit brennender Sorge (miht bren'nen-dehr zawr'gay; Ger., "With searing anxiety"), papal encyclical attacking Nazism. This scathing denunciation by Pope Pius XI of racism and other unchristian tenets of Nazism was smuggled into Germany and read from all pulpits in March 1937. The encyclical infuriated Nazi leaders, who were caught wholly offguard and afterward stepped up their already intense pressure against the Church and its priests. See also Nazism.

mitre (mi'tuhr; Gk.; Lat., mitra, "headband"), the headcovering that bishops and some abbots wear during liturgical rites. Two triangular pieces of stiffened material are sewn together on the sides with an opening for the head at the base. Two strips of fringed material, known as fanons or lappets, hang from the back base of the mitre. Three forms may be worn: a high mitre with jewels, a shorter less ornate mitre made of gold cloth, or a simple mitre covered with white silk or linen. The mitre is removed whenever its wearer leads the assembly in a spoken or sung prayer.

mixed chalice, the chalice or cup of wine prepared for Eucharist by mixing a small amount of water with the wine. Early liturgical texts refer to it in rubrics or directions before the mixing or in the prayers that accompany it. The ritual action spawned allegorical interpretations: the water is the baptized people whose sins are absorbed into the saving blood of Christ; both water and blood flowed from the side of the crucified Christ; water and wine represented the human and divine natures in Christ. Some Reformed churches reject this practice, while the Roman Catholic Church retains it. See also unmixed chalice.

Mitre



mixed marriage, a marriage between a Catholic and a person of another faith. Church law shows a reluctance to allow a Catholic to marry a non-Catholic because of fear concerning the difficulty of such a marriage. A distinction is made between a mixed marriage in which the non-Catholic partner is baptized and a marriage in which that spouse is not. In both cases, however, the bishop's approval is required after the Catholic partner has promised to remain faithful to Catholicism and to raise the children Catholics. The non-Catholic need not make such a promise but must be told of the other's promise. Permission may be given for the ceremony to take place with non-Catholic rites. See also marriage law.

mixed religion, impediment of, a marriage impediment found in the 1917 Code Canon of Law that forbade marriage between a Catholic and a baptized non-Catholic. That impediment did not invalidate the marriage, but simply forbade it. The present code of canon law (1983) still requires a Catholic to obtain permission to marry a non-Catholic, although the condition is no longer considered an impediment. It is common to give such permission as long as the Catholic promises to remain faithful to the Church and to do all within his or her power to raise the children as Catholics. See also marriage law.

Modalism, an extreme form of Monarchianism, called Sabellianism in the East and Patripassianism in the West, and condemned by Dionysius of Alexandria (d. ca. 264) because of its exaggerated emphasis on the unity of the divine Being. According to Modalists, God is triune only in that creation, redemption, and sanctification represent three manifestations of God in history. Modalists deny any real distinction of the divine Persons, holding that Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are merely modes, aspects or energies of the one divine Person, who exercises three distinct functions on behalf of humanity. As a reaction to subordinationist beliefs of the second century, many early Modalists emphasized the unity of God so as to oppose any view that the Son is God only in a secondary or subordinate way. The resulting view, however, affirmed that the distinctions among Father, Son, and Spirit belong entirely to the economy of salvation, not to the eternal essence of God. Early opponents of Modalism, notably Tertullian in the third century and Augustine in the fifth century, attempted to correlate the events of salvation history with the divine Being through the development of a doctrine of appropriations and a theology of divine relations emphasizing the eternal, ontological relations of Father, Son, and Spirit. Today, locating the unity of God either within only one of the divine Persons or within a substance shared by them remains highly problematic. The perennial struggle between orthodox trinitarian theology and Modalism seems to revolve around the difficulty of speaking about the oneness of God while maintaining three real relations in God. See also Monarchianism; Trinity, doctrine of the. JANICE POORMAN moderator of the curia, priest or bishop appointed by the diocesan bishop where expedient to assist him as coordinator of diocesan administration and as curial supervisor. This optional office may be particularly suitable for larger dioceses with complex administrative tasks, but in the case of larger dioceses, it is recommended that the vicar general hold the office. See also diocesan curia.

Modernism, the name given to the doctrinal and disciplinary crisis in the Catholic Church in the early years of the twentieth century, a crisis that was created by the efforts of Catholic intellectuals to reconcile Catholic faith with modern rationality and that eventually, in 1907, provoked Pope Pius X to condemn these efforts as heretical.

Modern rationality mediated by industrialization (science, technology) and democracy (emancipatory reason) challenges the world religions, including Christianity, by threatening to secularize their sacred Scriptures, invalidate their metaphysical concepts, and undermine their traditional hold on society. The first temptation of these religions is to resist modern rationality. The Catholic Church did so in the course of the nineteenth century (see Pius IX's "Syllabus of Errors" of 1864). When intellectuals among believers try to reconcile their faith with modern culture, they often embrace modern rationality uncritically and then are unable to defend the foundation of their faith. At the turn of the century, Catholic intellectuals challenged traditional Catholicism with their scientific approach to the biblical books, their repudiation of classical metaphysics, and their call to the laity to become politically active independently of the hierarchy.

Pope Pius X believed that these challenges represented a dangerous movement guided by a heretical theology that he called Modernism. In the decree Lamentabili (1907) he condemned a long list of Modernist opinions, and in his encyclical Pascendi Dominici Gregis (1907) he presented a striking theological synthesis drawn from the ideas of various Modernist authors that defined the essential nature of the modern heresy. Modernism, according to Pascendi, was derived from two false principles. The first was the rejection of metaphysical reason, which led to skepticism regarding the rational proofs for God's existence. The second, the rejection of "the supernatural" (God's gratuitous self-communication in divine revelation), led to the idea that Christian doctrine was derived from religious experiences responding to people's deep psychological needs. Since the synthesis created by the encyclical did not as such exist in the minds of any of the Modernist authors, they thought they had been gravely misunderstood.

Biblical Modernism: Rome defended the historical veracity of the biblical books against the biblical scholars who relied more on symbolic or allegorical interpretations. In 1907, a new guideline strengthened the authority of the Pontifical Biblical Commission. The most famous biblical scholar condemned as a Modernist was Alfred Loisy (d. 1940). In response to Adolf von Harnack's liberal Protestant proposal that reduced Christianity to a simple, original message and rejected later Christian beliefs as extraneous additions, Loisy defended the Catholic tradition by showing that the Christian message was a living force that unfolded its meaning in the early Church and summoned forth new responses in subsequent history. Rome put Loisy's work on the Index of Forbidden Books as an example of vitalism and immanent evolutionism that ignored the conceptual truth contained in divine revelation. After his excommunication Loisy left the Catholic faith to embrace a more general belief in the universal divine presence. To this day historians disagree whether Loisy still held to the Catholic faith when he was condemned by Rome, or whether he was already skeptical of biblical revelation.

Theological Modernism: The best-known speculative authors condemned as Modernists were the French philosopher Lucien Laberthonnière (d. 1932) and the English theologian George Tyrrell (d. 1909). Following the modern (Kantian) rejection of metaphysics, Laberthonnière turned to Maurice Blondel's philosophy of action, which held that truth was implicit in human willing and choosing. Yet while Blondel (d. 1949) protected the gratuity of divine revelation, Laberthonnière seemed to assign human religious creativity to the vital forces immanent in humanity. A similar turn to immanent vitality was taken by Tyrrell, who sought to make the Church and its message more credible in modern culture. For him Christian truth was founded on religious experience and was articulated in symbols and rituals. The Church moving through the ages was an evolving historical community sustained by the religious experiences of its members. In the age of democracy, Tyrrell argued, the Church should be guided by the free discussion among its members rather than by an ecclesiastical magisterium. After dismissal from his religious order and excommunication, Tyrrell became increasingly hostile to what he called "Romanism" or "the Roman heresy." Two well-known Modernists in England, Tyrrell's friends Baron Friedrich von Hügel (d. 1925) and Maude Petre, both laypeople, escaped condemnation and remained believing Catholics.

Social Modernism: In his own review and later through a political organization, the Italian priest Romolo Murri promoted the concept of Christian democracy, in which Catholic laypeople, freed from intellectual and disciplinary control of the hierarchy, would assume Christian responsibility for their society. Rome condemned these liberal ideas as Modernist. Murri was suspended from his priestly function in 1907 and excommunicated in 1909. In France, similar democratic ideas were promoted by Marc Sangnier's Sillon movement, dissolved by Pius X in 1910.

Rather than a system, Modernism was an intellectual orientation of Catholics who wrestled with the questions posed by modernity. This orientation was successfully crushed by the ecclesiastical condemnations, the anti-Modernist oath demanded of every priest prior to ordination (a rule no longer in force), and the notorious spying organization Sodalium Pianum, directed by Monsignor Benigni, which was later suppressed by Pope Benedict XV. Since then theological progress has been made, especially during and after Vatican Council II (1962–65), but the religious questions raised by modernity have not yet received their definitive answers. See also Benedict XV; Pius X, St.

Bibliography

Loome, T. M. Liberal Catholicism, Reform Catholicism, Modernism. Mainz: Matthias Grunewald, 1979.

Ranchetti, M. The Catholic Modernists. London: Oxford University Press, 1969.

Reardon, B. M. Roman Catholic Modernism. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1970.

Vidler, A. R. A Variety of Catholic Modernists. London: Cambridge University Press, 1970.

GREGORY BAUM

Modernism, oath against. See oath against Modernism.

modes, Gregorian, arrangement of the notes of the musical scale of chant according to certain set patterns. See also chant, Gregorian.

Möhler, Johann Adam (mer'luhr), 1796–1838, major German theologian and doctrinal historian. He taught Church history at the University of Tübingen and is considered the central figure of the important Catholic Tübingen School. In his early but widely read Die Einheit in der Kirche ("The Unity of the Church," 1825), Möhler drew on themes from romantic idealism to treat the Church as a living tradition and an organic unity. In addition to his many writings in patristics and Church history, his Symbolik (1832) provided a comparative analysis and assessment of the beliefs of, and basic differences between, Protestants and Catholics. Appointed professor in Munich in 1835, he lectured for only three years before his death. Möhler's ecclesiology and understanding of tradition had considerable influence at Vatican II, through the work of twentieth-century Tübingen theologians and the French Dominican Yves Congar. See also Congar, Yves; Tübingen.

Mohrmann, Christine, 1903–88, Dutch historian of primitive Christianity and specialist in early Christian Latin. Her Atlas of the Early Christian World (co-authored with F. van der Meer; Eng. ed., 1958) is still a standard reference work. In 1947 she launched Vigiliae Christianae, a scholarly, ecumenical journal of Christian life and language.

Molina, Luis de, 1535–1600, Spanish Jesuit theologian. He entered the Jesuits in 1553 and later taught philosophy and theology. Preeminent among Catholic moral theologians of his day, Molina is best known for his Concordia, or Harmony of Free Will with the Gifts of Grace (1588), in which he reconciled divine grace with human free will through a process of scientia media (Lat., "middle knowledge"), according to which God foreknows specific human acts in different hypothetical situations and then confers grace according to foreseen merits. He was opposed by the Dominican theologian Domingo Báñez. The ensuing controversy between the Jesuits and the Dominicans about grace and human abilities (known as De Auxiliis) led to papal silencing of all involved parties. See also Báñez, Domingo; De Auxiliis; Molinism.

Molinism, the theory of Luis de Molina, a seventeenth-century Spanish Jesuit theologian, concerning the relationship of divine grace to free will. This theology emerged during a time that saw a greater emphasis upon the human being, humanist education, and new theories of meditation and religious life. Molina's theology, appearing in Concordia, or Harmony of Free Will with the Gifts of Grace (1588), highlighted human freedom, deemphasized divine grace prior to freedom, and fashioned a novel theory of God's knowledge of future events. Particularly novel was his theology of a "middle knowledge": in the vast realm of free human decisions God sees every decision in all its conditions and ramifications and so grasps all possible arrangements, but God leaves the individual choice of direction to human freedom. Dominicans beginning with Domingo Báñez argued that this did not represent the real teaching of Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274), who viewed grace as a prior, efficaciously divine force, albeit in a real human freedom. This Spanish debate began the wider controversy De Auxiliis (lit., "concerning the helps" [toward salvation]), which ended in Rome in 1607. Issues were left undecided and Molinism was allowed to be taught alongside various Thomisms and other Catholic systems. The Society of Jesus espoused Molinism until Jesuit theologians in the twentieth century (Henri de Lubac, Karl Rahner) recovered and newly emphasized patristic and modern theologies. See also De Auxiliis; grace.

THOMAS F. O'MEARA

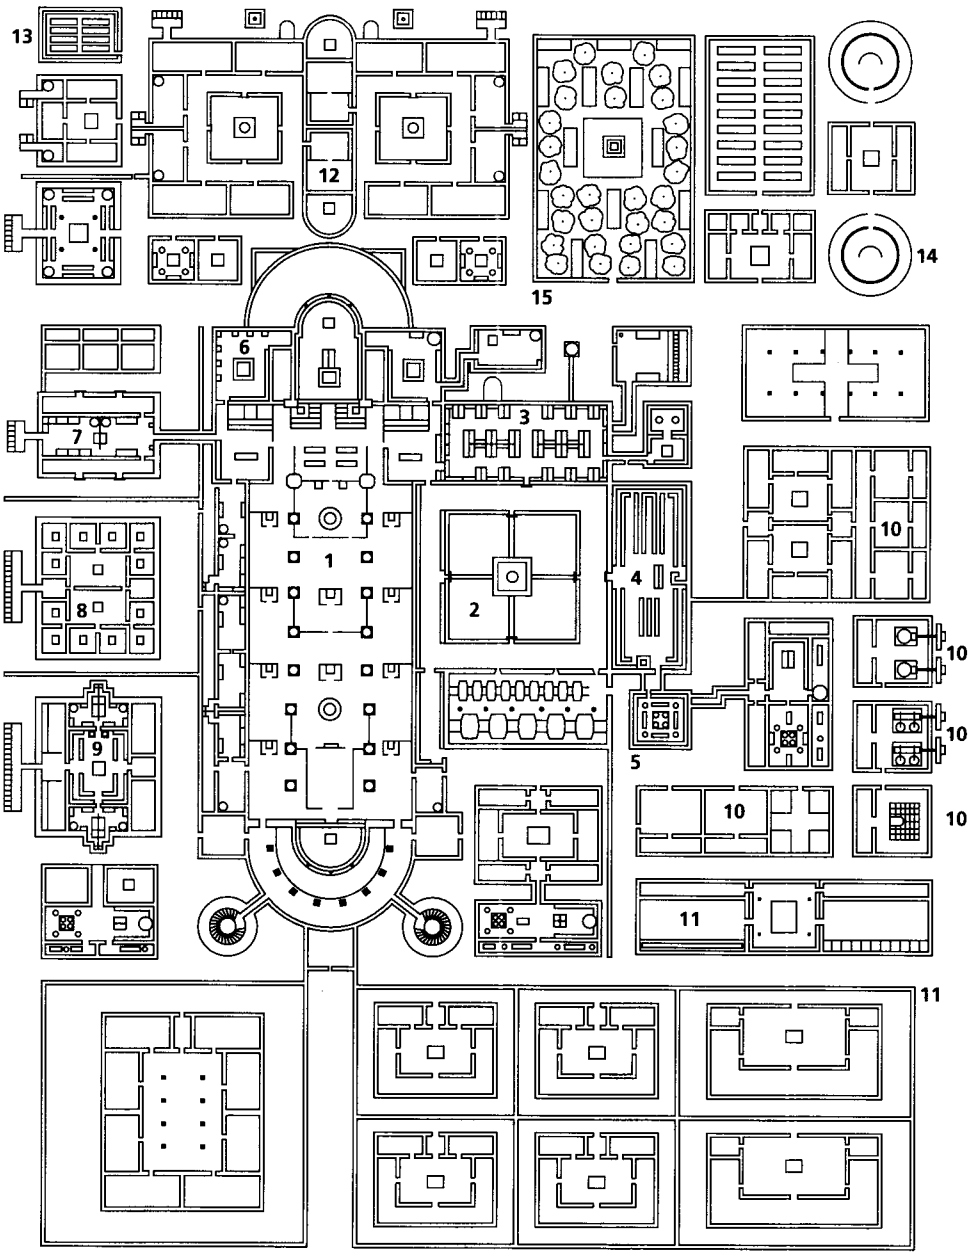
Molinos, Miguel de, 1640–97, Spanish spiritual director and writer. He was called a Quietist because he advanced a spirituality of self-abandonment before God that required complete annihilation of one's will. Because of the disruptive effects of this teaching in convents, he was condemned and, even after he repudiated his ideas, imprisoned for life. See also Quietism.

Monarchianism, designation for certain second- and third-century teachings emphasizing God's oneness in divine rule (Gk., monarchia) at the expense of God's trinitarian character. Following the German theologian Adolf von Harnack (d. 1930), scholars distinguish "Modalist Monarchianism" from "Dynamic Monarchianism." Tertullian (the first to use the designation "Monarchians") and Hippolytus attacked the former, first taught by Noetus of Smyrna (ca. 200), then at Rome by his pupil Epigonus, by Praxeas (ca. 200), and by Sabellius (ca. 220), whose name became especially associated with this heresy ("Sabellianism"). For the Modalists, "Father," "Son," and "Holy Spirit" were merely names for modes or manifestations of one and the same God. Their critics allege they maintained that in Jesus the Father was incarnate, suffered, and died, "Son" being merely the name of the one God when incarnate. They were thus mocked as "Patripassianists," i.e., for teaching that the Father suffered.

The Dynamic Monarchians (also called Adoptionists) preserved God's monarchy by denying that "Son" was the name of anything divine—it was merely the designation of a man, Jesus, after his receipt of divine power (Gk., dynamis) at his baptism. Ancient critics accused such teachers, including Theodotus the Leather Merchant (ca. 190), Theodotus the Banker, Artemon (ca. 230–50; all of whom taught at Rome), and Paul of Samosata, of "psilanthropism," i.e., of teaching that Jesus was "merely a human being," adopted into his stature as God's son. See also Adoptionism; God; Modalism; Patripassianism; Sabellianism; Trinity, doctrine of the.

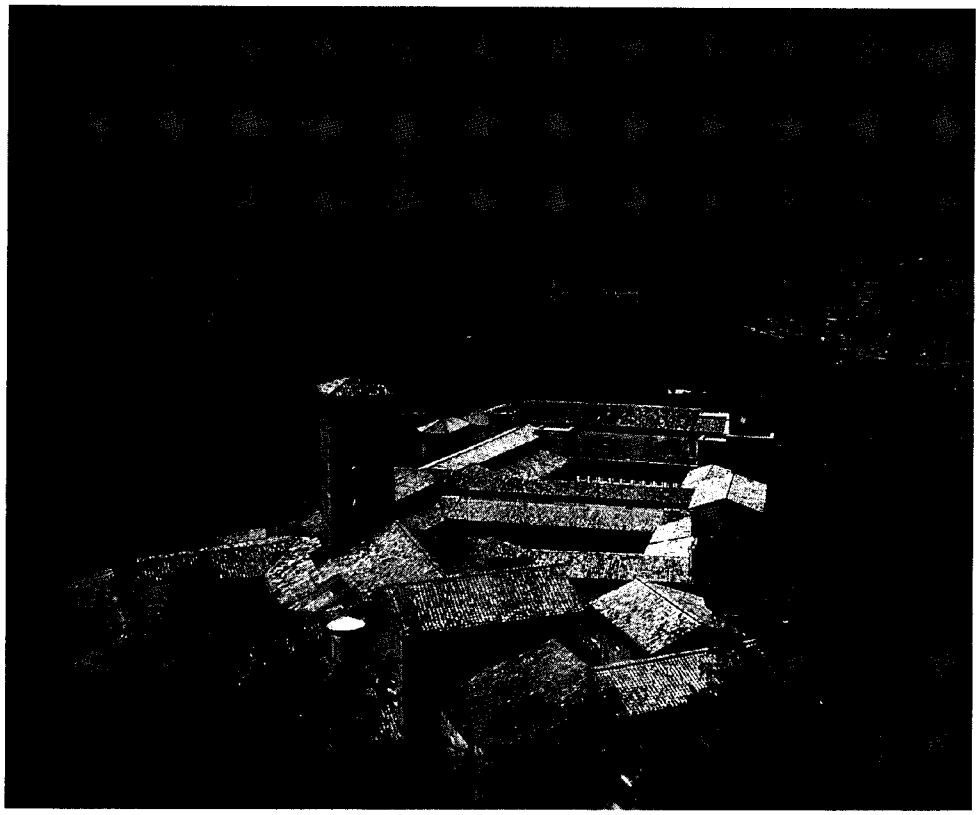
JOHN C. CAVADINI

monastery (Gk., monos, "alone"; "hermit's cell" or "group of protected cells"), currently designated in the 1983 Code of Canon Law as the dwelling place of monks (can. 613), clerics living a communal life (can. 613), or nuns (cans. 609, 614). In the West, the term is generally reserved for Benedictine houses or houses derived from the Rule of St. Benedict. Defining characteristics of a monastery are separation from the world; the monk's permanent attachment to the place of profession; virtual autonomy of government of the individual house (cans. 586, 591–96); and commitment of members to a classical monastic rule. Monasteries are commonly designated



1 church
2 cloister
3 dormitory
4 refectory
5 kitchen
6 scriptorium
7 abbot's house
8 school
9 guest house
10 workshop
11 barns and stables
12 infirmary-novitiate
13 gardens
14 poultry houses
15 cemetery-orchard

The plan for an ideal monastery, developed ca. 820 at the Benedictine abbey of St. Gall in modern-day Switzerland, reconstructed by Walter Horn and Ernest Born from the manuscript in the library of St. Gall. The monastery site was to have been 480 feet by 640 feet, housing 120 monks and 170 serfs. This plan, although never realized in stone, exercised a major influence on monastic construction in subsequent centuries.



St. Scholastica Monastery in Subiaco, Latium, Italy. Scholastica (d. ca. 543) was the sister of Benedict of Nursia, one of the founders of Western monasticism. She established this monastery only a few miles from Benedict's Monte Cassino.

by the superior's rank (abbey, priory) or the work undertaken therein (mission, house of studies). While all monasteries are named in honor of a sacred mystery or a patron saint, they are more often known by the name of the local town. See also monasticism.

monastic spirituality, the whole complex of attitudes and practices that characterize the life of men and women living according to a monastic rule. Although St. Anthony of Egypt (d. 356) is often called "the father of monks," monastic spirituality cannot properly be understood without reference to its roots in the NT and in the history of the Church prior to Anthony. Many early Christians who desired to follow the gospel in a particularly intense way embraced celibacy "for the sake of the kingdom" (cf. Matt 19:12). This later came to be regarded as an essential component of monastic spirituality, so much so that many scholars believe that the original Greek word for "monk," monachos (Lat., "one living alone"), referred not to a hermit but to someone living without a spouse.

Another essential component from the beginning was a significant degree of retirement from the world. Anthony's early biographer, Athanasius (d. 373), notes that already before Anthony there were many ascetics living near the outskirts of villages in Middle Egypt; what differentiated Anthony from the others was that he set out for "the faraway desert" and lived in almost complete solitude for some years before emerging to give instruction to those who wanted to embrace this way of life. Critics of the monastic movement have often judged such retirement harshly as being fueled by an unchristian, Platonic disdain for the temporal order, but in its original intent it served as a way of simplifying one's life, thereby enabling the monk or nun to focus more sharply on the clear challenge of the gospel, putting on the mind of Christ. This is why references to the great commandments of love of God and neighbor recur so frequently in early monastic literature, as in the Ascetikon of Basil the Great (d. 379).

Other integral aspects of monastic spirituality are the meditative pondering of the Scriptures (Lat., lectio divina), the ideal of constant mindfulness of God (memoria Dei), poverty (at least in the sense of the communal ownership of goods), obedience to a spiritual guide (who came to be known as abbot or abbess in monastic communities), and, for those living in community (as distinct from hermits), regular periods of common prayer (called the opus Dei in the Rule of St. Benedict).

Benedict (d. ca. 550) assumed in his rule that the life of prayer and work would be practiced within the enclosure of the monastic precincts, but already in the early Middle Ages the pressing needs of society often called monastics out of their cloisters to serve as missionaries, preachers, and Church reformers, with the result that long ago there arose great diversity in the kinds of work undertaken by monastic men and women. The call of Vatican II (1962–65) for members of all religious orders to return to the spirit of their founders has led to vigorous discussion among monastics as regards what kinds of work and life-styles are genuinely compatible with monastic life. See also Benedict, Rule of St.; monasticism; spirituality, Christian. JAMES WISEMAN

Monenergism, a seventh-century Christological heresy that posited only one divine energy, or action, in Christ. It was developed by Sergius (d. 638), patriarch of Constantinople, in an attempt at theological reconciliation with the Monophysites, who persisted in their belief that in Christ there is only one divine nature, a position condemned by the Council of Chalcedon (451). Monenergism was the companion heresy to Monothelitism, which held that there is only one divine will in Christ. Monenergism and Monothelitism were condemned by the Third Council of Constantinople in 681. See also Constantinople, councils of; Monophysitism; Monothelitism.

Monica, St., ca. 331–87, mother of Augustine of Hippo. She lived in North Africa near Carthage, where she generously served the poor while raising her own family. She became concerned about young Augustine's dissolute life-style and prayed constantly for his conversion. She followed him to Rome in 383 and later to Milan, where she came under the influence of Ambrose, its bishop, and eventually witnessed her son's conversion. She died at Ostia, in Italy, while traveling back to Africa with her son. Her feast day is August 27. See also Augustine of Hippo, St.

monitum, an official "warning" (Lat.). The term may be used when an official warning is given regarding a particular teaching or when an author is suspected of error on matters of doctrine. The same term is also used to indicate one of the warnings that must clearly be given a person in the process used before a penalty or sanction is imposed.

monk, a word commonly used to refer to any vowed member of a religious community of men adhering to the monastic rule of life. Derived from the Latin word monachus, a transliteration of the Greek for "one who lives alone," the term has been applied broadly and imprecisely throughout history to hermits and members of religious communities alike. Early medieval monastic reforms designated it as appropriate to Benedictines, Cistercians, and Carthusians, but not to less strictly contemplative groups. Such precision of usage was never the norm, however, and after the Reformation precise application became even more elusive. In modern practice, "monk" is also used to designate male members of non-Christian religious bodies, e.g., Buddhist monks. See also monasticism.

Monks of St. Hormisdas, the Antonine Order of St. Hormisdas of the Chaldeans, a Chaldean Catholic monastic congregation, founded in 1880 by Gabriel Dembo beside the ruins of the ancient East-Syrian monastery of Rabban Hormuzd near Alqosh in northern Iraq. The order follows a rule and organization borrowed from the Maronite Antonine monks. See also monk.

monogenism, the theory of human origin from one individual. The Bible seems to suppose monogenism (Gen 1–3; Rom 5), but, scientifically, polygenism seems more probable. The inspired biblical texts seem to say only that humankind is one in nature, sin, and grace. Although Pope Pius XII's encyclical Humani Generis (1950) supported monogenism, Catholics are not required to hold such a position today. See also creation; evolution; original sin.

monophony (Gk., "one voice"), music that consists of one melodic line as opposed to polyphony, which has several melodic lines. See also liturgical music.

MONASTICISM

Monasticism (Gk., monos, "one, alone") is an institutionalized form of ascetic religious life in which individuals take vows of poverty, chastity, obedience, and (as in the Benedictines) stability, separating themselves from society either singly (eremitic form) or in community (cenobitic form). The goal of monasticism is to pursue, under the guidance of a formal rule, a life of prayer and work for the glory of God, for personal sanctification, and for the good of the Church and the world.

BACKGROUND

Although Anthony of Egypt (d. ca. 356) is generally regarded as the founder of monasticism, having given away all of his possessions and devoted himself to a life of asceticism in the desert, monasticism has its roots in the earliest Christian tradition. The care of widows mentioned, e.g., in 1 Tim 5:3–16 seems to have been institutionalized by the second century as a kind of "order" in which women lived on the alms of the community and were responsible for intercessory prayer and service (see Polycarp Philippians c. 4). By the end of the third century, "Sons and Daughters of the Covenant," celibates who practiced austerities in their own homes and offered spiritual leadership in the churches, populated Syria. The Greek word monachos, "monk," which begins to appear in papyri in the fourth century, may derive from the designation used of these Syriac-speaking ascetics, the "single ones" (Gk., monos, "one"). The origins of monasticism may have been influenced by the Essenes or the Therepeutae, both Jewish groups, as suggested as early as the fourth century by Eusebius of Caesarea. Others postulate Manichaean influence, observing the ascetic character of the Manichaean elect, who scorned the things of the world and pursued a life of severe austerity.

Sometimes the influence of Buddhist monasticism is even suggested. Palladius, the fourth-century monastic historian, wrote a treatise on the Indian brahmin ascetics, De Gentibus Indiae et Bragmanibus (On the People of India and the Brahmins). Surely traditions of non-Christian asceticism, especially the Neoplatonic, were also influential as the monastic movement gained ground.

THE DESERT TRADITION

Monasticism is in its origins Egyptian, lay, Coptic-speaking, and of peasant roots. In ca. 285 Anthony of Egypt retired to the desert to encounter the demons who were said to inhabit those waterless places. He soon attracted disciples. He came out of the desert ca. 305 to organize these disciples under a rule according to regular patterns of life, although Anthony's contemporary Pachomius (d. 347) is generally credited with giving the movement its communal character. Anthony returned to the desert five years later, and for the next forty years his influence as a spiritual leader grew. He was a strong supporter of the teaching of the Council of Nicaea (325) that Jesus Christ was of the same substance (Gk., homoousios) as God the Father, and not simply the greatest of creatures, as Arius had held. He also became thereby a close associate of Athanasius, one of the staunchest defenders of the Nicene dogma. Indeed, the most important text for understanding Anthony and the beginnings of monasticism is the Life of Anthony, written by Athanasius just after Anthony's death.

Anthony, however, was only the leading figure in the first wave of those withdrawing from society. The life of an anchorite (Gk., anachoresis, "withdrawal") was largely a reaction against the gradual establishment of Christianity following the triumph of the emperor Constantine (d. 337) over his rival Maxentius in 312. Ironically, many Christians protested against the newly privileged status of the Church conferred immediately thereafter by Constantine. They warned that Christians would become too comfortable in their new situation and would no longer proclaim and live by the high moral demands of the gospel. In its origins, therefore, monasticism had a prophetic edge to it. It also had an almost immediate impact on the Church. Bishops began to be recruited from among those with some monastic training. Athanasius (d. 373), a disciple of Anthony, was an outstanding example.

Sayings and anecdotes of the various desert Christians were collected in the fifth century and circulated, in various forms, under the title Sayings of the Fathers. The desert tradition spread outside the Nile valley to other locations, especially into Palestine, which produced a rich literature and deeply rooted monastic tradition of its own. Pachomius was the first to organize monks into a communal (cenobitic) life; by the mid-fourth century there were eleven Pachomian monasteries in Egypt, including two for women, all emphasizing obedience to a superior and a highly regimented community life of prayer and work.

Basil the Great (d. 379) reinterpreted monasticism to make it more pastoral, that is, concerned especially with care for the poor, and to place it in the milieu of urban life. With Gregory of Nazianzus (d. 390), he took up the "philosophic" life of retirement and prayer in 358, spending time at various Eastern monasteries. A theorist of cenobitic monasticism, Basil produced rules and commentaries promoting a vision of a community of shared goods inspired by Acts 4:32–35 that have been one of the principal sources of monastic discipline to this day.

THE RISE OF WESTERN MONASTICISM

Eastern monasticism was transferred to the West when Martin of Tours (d. 397) established a monastery near Poitiers in 362. The promotion of monasticism was spread through Martin's biography, written by Sulpicius Severus about the time of Martin's death. But several other factors were influential in its taking root in the West. Ambrose (d. 397), in Milan, and Jerome (d. 420), first in Rome and later in Palestine, promoted monasticism along with a number of ascetic women. Ambrose's knowledge of Greek put him in touch with the theology of the East and he himself wrote on ascetical subjects and encouraged the development of monasteries in northern Italy. Jerome had taken up the life of a hermit for four or five years in Syria before being ordained a priest in ca. 380. After the death in 384 of Pope Damasus, whom he had served as secretary, Jerome returned to the East, settling in Bethlehem where he ruled a newly founded monastery.

Eusebius (d. 371), bishop of Vercelli, had also lived in the East for a time in exile. When he returned he preached ascetic ideals for his clergy and lived with them under a common rule. The work of John Cassian (d. 435) was another important factor in the acceptance of monasticism in the West. Trained in the East, he mediated its spirituality to the West after he settled and established a monastic foundation at Marseilles. His Conferences and Institutes had a particularly strong impact on the later Benedictine tradition. Augustine of Hippo (d. 430) applied ideas about the ascetic life he had learned in Milan (see his Confessions 8 for references to The Life of Anthony and other sources he had encountered there). He also had a firsthand acquaintance with Roman monasteries. In North Africa he encouraged the life of those styled servi Dei (Lat., "servants of God," celibate laymen who practiced the sharing of goods), supported the communal life of women ascetics, and also promoted the vita apostolica, or the communal life of the bishop with his cathedral clergy.

Western monasticism, however, was given its distinctive shape by Benedict of Nursia (d. ca. 550). After a period as a hermit, he established a community at Monte Cassino in ca. 529 under a rule of poverty, chastity, obedience, and stability. In the final chapter of his Rule he acknowledged the influence of John Cassian's Conferences and Institutes as well as the various vitae (Lat., "lives," biographies) of the early monks and the Rule of St. Basil, which he probably knew in a Latin translation by Rufinus. The Rule of St. Benedict especially commends the reading of Scripture and itself quotes Scripture profusely. It depends heavily on an early anonymous work, three times as long, known as the Regula Magistri (Lat., "The Rule of the Master"). According to Benedict, the purpose of the monastery is to honor God by worship and to benefit the community by prayer. But since the monastery had to be self-sustaining, the monks were also required to work in the fields and to do other manual labor. Thus, the essence of the Rule of St. Benedict was ora et labora (Lat., "pray and work").

In his Dialogues (ca. 594), Pope Gregory the Great (d. 604) praised Benedict's rule for its discernment and clarity of language, but it remained only one of many rules in the West until the early medieval period, when Charlemagne (d. 814) imported it into the land of the Franks in order to establish a degree of uniformity among the monastic establishments in his kingdoms. The systematization of the Rule of St. Benedict in the West is due mainly to a monk entrusted by Charlemagne with his projects of monastic reform, Benedict of Aniane (d. 821), whose monastery in the Languedoc became a center for reform. His Capitulare Monasticum was approved at the Synod of Aachen in 817; he also compiled a catalogue of all monastic rules then known to him, the Codex Regularum Monasticorum et Canonicarum. Largely through his foundational efforts, by the tenth century the Rule of St. Benedict was normative in the West, except in Ireland.

THE CELTIC TRADITION

Monasticism was at the heart of early Irish Christianity, introduced by Patrick (d. ca. 461). It had a strongly ascetic character, emphasizing fasting, penance, and the ascetic discipline of peregrinatio (Lat., "wandering," "exile"), which explains why Irish monasticism had outposts in Scotland, England, and on the continent as far south as Italy (e.g., Bobbio). The Irish monks had a keen interest in evangelization, and in Ireland the faith was spread not from cities, since Ireland was not urbanized at all, but from monastic centers, from which preaching radiated out to surrounding populations. The bishops themselves were associated with monasteries. The Rule of St. Benedict, however, never gained a foothold in Ireland.

LATER WESTERN DEVELOPMENTS

The role of the monastery as the center of scholarship developed only gradually. Benedict was concerned that his monks should be sufficiently literate to read the Bible and the Fathers of the Church. Later, with the Carolingian renaissance, many of the monks were relieved of manual labor and were encouraged to devote themselves to scholarly pursuits. One of the most practical was the copying of the texts of the classics of Western civilization.

Medieval monasticism may be viewed, in shorthand, by the four "Cs": Cluny, Camaldolese, Carthusians, and Cistercians. Cluny, founded in 910, is a Burgundian monastery that in the eleventh and twelfth centuries was a center of monastic and of Church reform. From Cluny many dependent monasteries were founded and many older monasteries (even Monte Cassino) were reformed. The repression of simony and the enforcement of celibacy, mandated by Pope Gregory VII (d. 1085), were ideals inspired by this monastic reform movement. The Cluniacs were known as the "Black Monks" from the color of their cowls. As they became more successful and more powerful, they in turn became the object of criticism from the "White Monks" of the Cistercian reform.

The Camaldolese were a monastic movement that combined the communal life of the Benedictine rule with the eremetical life of the solitary living singly in a cell. Inspired by Romuald (d. 1027) and Peter Damian (d. 1072), both from Ravenna, the movement emphasized what almost seems an oxymoron: missionary, cenobitic, and eremetical existence. The Camaldolese had a long history of monastic exchange with the larger culture, and among their number were Gratian (codifier of canon law), Lorenzo Monaco (Renaissance painter), and Ambrogio Traversari (fifteenth-century humanist and theologian).

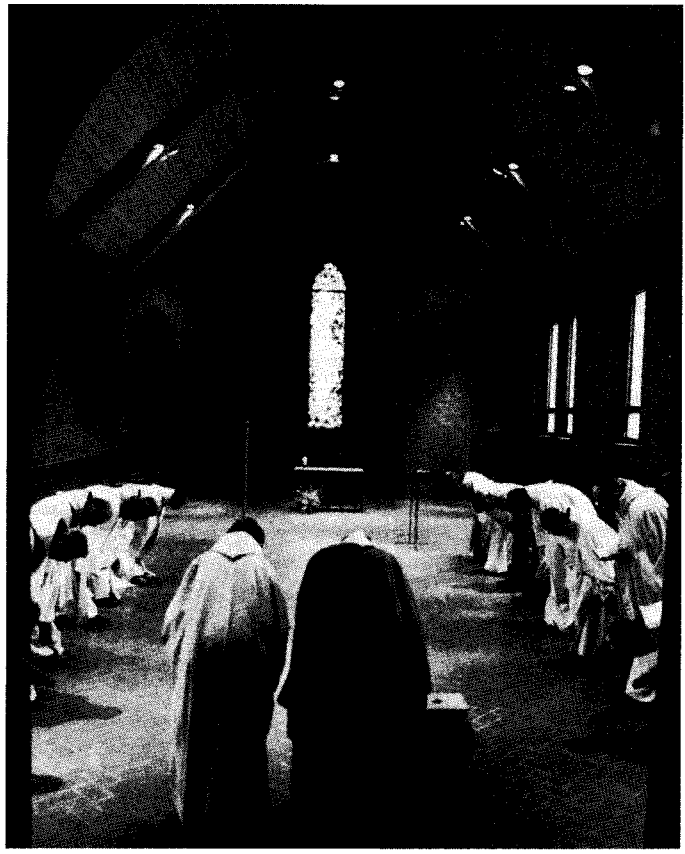
The Carthusians were founded by Bruno (1032–1101), whose vision of reform for monasticism emphasized withdrawal from the world, solitary living combined with some elements of the cenobitic life inspired by the Rule of St. Benedict, contemplative prayer, and silence. It has always been a small order, but its monks have contributed much to spiritual literature, often anonymously. They pride themselves on having never needed a reform of their life—numquam reformata quia numquam deformata (Lat. "never reformed because never deformed").



Trappist monks at St. Bernard's monastery, Snowmass, Colorado, bow during the singing of the Divine Office; Trappists are in the Cistercian tradition of monasticism, dating back to the late eleventh century.

Finally, the Cistercians were founded as a reform of the Benedictines at Citeaux ("Cistercium") in Burgundy ca. 1098. By the thirteenth century it numbered 750 houses in Europe. Among its early founders was Bernard of Clairvaux (d. 1153), who is often called the "last of the [Church] Fathers," as well as the admonisher of popes for their use of temporal power. The Cistercians put a high premium on the cenobitic life, agricultural labor, uniformity of discipline for all houses, and a high degree of monastic culture. Beside Bernard, they produced a number of important spiritual writers whose influence would be felt for centuries after. In the seventeenth century, Cistercian life was reformed under Armand de Rancé at the monastery of La Trappe, thus giving the name "Trappist" to the strict branch of the current Cistercian family.

Western monasticism suffered major losses during the Reformation, although the decrees of the Council of Trent (1563) requiring all monasteries to be affiliated with congregations fostered a renewal that gave rise to the traditions of learned monasticism associated with the Maurists (the French Benedictine congregation of St. Maur) and of missionary work associated with other congregations. But the French Revolution (1789) suppressed all monastic life in France, and similar restrictions elsewhere, up to and including those imposed by Communism, have made the history of modern monasticism a story of repression and reconstruction.

A revival, however, did take place in the mid-nineteenth century in almost all of the countries of western and central Europe, and monastic life was carried to North America and elsewhere, continuing to spread throughout the twentieth century.

LATER EASTERN DEVELOPMENTS

Unlike the West, monasticism in the East had never divided into different orders. There remained two main forms of one tradition: those in community (Lat., coenobium), within a common enclosure, and a small group of individuals (Lat., lavra, "street," "alley") living both a community and an individual life.

Monasticism had spread with Christianity itself to the Slavic countries: in Kiev, where Prince Vladimir (d. 1015) became an ardent promoter and builder of monasteries, and then in Radonezh, near Moscow, where Sergius, Russia's most revered saint, and his brother Stephen founded in 1354 the famous monastery of the Holy Trinity and reestablished the monastic life in Russia that had been lost in the Mongol invasions. Altogether Sergius founded forty monasteries before his death in 1392. A secularization of the monasteries took place in 1764 when the wealth of the large monasteries caught the attention of Peter the Great. But, as in the West, a strong revival of monasticism took place in the nineteenth century, continuing until the virtual elimination of monasticism in Russia with the Communist Revolution of 1917. But with the collapse of Communism after 1990, yet another revival was underway.

See also Anthony of Egypt, St.; Augustine, Rule of St.; Basil, Rule of St.; Benedict, Rule of St.; Benedictine order; Camaldolese; Carthusian order; Cistercian order; Cluny; double monasteries; monastery; monastic spirituality; religious orders and congregations; Russia, Catholicism in; Trappists.

Bibliography

Burton-Christie, D. The Word in the Desert: Scripture and the Quest for Holiness in Early Christian Monasticism. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.

Chitty, D. The Desert a City. Oxford: Blackwell, 1966.

Knowles, David. Christian Monasticism. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1961.

Lawless, G. Augustine of Hippo and His Monastic Rule. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1987.

LeClerq, Jean. The Love of Learning and the Desire for God: A Study of Monastic Culture. New York: Fordham University Press, 1982.

Pennington, M. Basil. Monastic Life: A Short History of Monasticism and Its Spirit. Petersham, MA: St. Bede's Publications, 1989.

Voobus, A. History of Asceticism in the Syrian Orient. 2 vols. Louvain: Secretariat du Corpus Scriptorum Christianorum Orientalium, 1958, 1960.

JOHN C. CAVADINI

Monophysitism (Gk., mono "one"; physis, "nature"), the view held by those who claim that, after the Incarnation, Christ had only one (divine) nature. The earliest forms of Monophysitism were not condemned as heretical but rather were espoused by Alexandrians following the lead of Cyril. After condemning Nestorius for promoting a view that, according to Cyril, would lead to the error of implying two persons in Christ, Cyril adopted the formula, "the one nature of the Incarnate Word." Cyril attributed this phrase, which is actually Apollinarist in origin, to his predecessor, Athanasius of Alexandria. Cyril's use of an ambiguous Greek word for "nature," however, led to further confusion that was eventually clarified at the Council of Chalcedon (451). To avoid the danger of any implication of two distinct persons in Jesus Christ, Chalcedon justified Cyril's usage but adopted earlier trinitarian terminology refering to "two natures" in the one person of Jesus Christ without mixture or confusion. After the Council of Chalcedon, some Monophysites, like the archimandrite Eutyches, continued to hold the position that Christ's humanity is subsumed by his divinity in such a way that only one nature exists. However, for many of those initially involved in the so-called Monophysite revolt or schism, rejection of the Chalcedonian formulation was hardly revolutionary or schismatic. Followers of Severus of Antioch, for example, clearly maintained the integrity of the two natures in Christ after the Incarnation, but sought to clarify further the Christological language used by Chalcedon. Monophysitism hardened into a schismatic movement when its proponents refused obedience to the proscriptions of the Second Council of Constantinople (553), which called for unconditional acceptance of Chalcedon's formula. See also Chalcedon, Council of; Christology; hypostatic union; Incarnation, the; Jesus Christ; Nestorianism.

JANICE POORMAN

monotheism, belief in one, personal, transcendent deity as opposed to belief in and worship of many deities (polytheism), or worship of one deity without denying the existence of others (henotheism), or belief that the deity is indistinguishable from the world (pantheism). In the religion of Israel the beliefs of those (priests, prophets, sages) who gave us the OT were different from what people were actually thinking and doing in the religious sphere of their lives. At the level of popular religion, both biblical texts and archaeological data attest to the belief that, while Yahweh was the principal deity for Israel, the existence and efficacy of other deites (El, Baal, Asherah) were also acknowledged; hence the frequent denunciations of such beliefs and practices in the prophetic literature (esp. Hosea, Jeremiah, Ezekiel) and in the historical record (e.g., 1 Kgs 18; 2 Kgs 1:1–4; 17:7–20; 23:4–14). There is also evidence for the assimilation of characteristics and attributes of Yahweh to those of other deities (syncretism) and for belief in the territorial restriction of the jurisdiction of deities in general, including Yahweh (e.g., 1 Sam 26:19; 2 Kgs 5:15–19; Ps 137:4). The link between deity and territory was broken in principle during the Babylonian exile in the sixth century B.C., with the development of belief in Yahweh as creator and sustainer of the world. This belief comes to expression most clearly in the exilic Isaiah (e.g., Isa 40:12–26; 42:5; 44:24) and in the Priestly source (the narrative and legal portions of the Pentateuch composed by priests), especially the creation narrative in Gen 1:1–2:3. See also God.

JOSEPH BLENKINSOPP

Monothelitism (Gk., monos, "one"; theleis, "will"), a seventh-century heresy that held that Jesus Christ possessed only a divine will. In an effort to reconcile the Monophysites with the Church, Pope Honorius I (625–38) followed the advice of Sergius, the patriarch of Constantinople (610–38), and spoke of Christ as possessing "one will." This expression was adopted in the Ecthesis (Gk., "exposition of faith"), a Monothelite document probably drafted by Sergius and then promulgated by Emperor Heraclius in 638. It was opposed by Sophronius of Jerusalem. Though synods in Constantinople (638 and 639) confirmed the teaching of only one will in Christ, the Lateran Synod of 649 condemned it. This decision was confirmed by the Third Council of Constantinople (680–81), which declared that Christ possesses two wills, one divine and one human, as well as two natures. The council also posthumously excommunicated Pope Honorius. See also Constantinople, councils of; Honorius I; Monophysitism.

monsignor (Fr., "my lord"), an honorary ecclesiastical title ordinarily bestowed by the pope on diocesan clerics in recognition of service rendered to the Church. Monsignors are designated as members of one of three ranks: Apostolic Prothonotaries, Honorary Prelates of His Holiness the Pope, or Chaplains of His Holiness the Pope. The honorary title is sometimes given in the United States to the vicar general of a diocese, but many dioceses have abandoned the practice of conferring honorary titles on priests, regarding it as an inappropriate relic of the past. In some European nations, the title "monsignor" is commonly used in reference to bishops. See also prelates of honor.

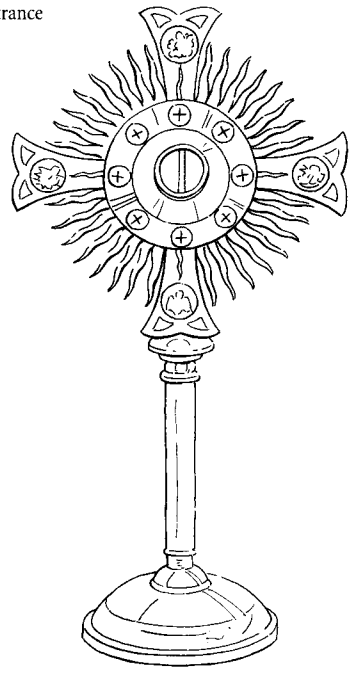
monstrance (mon'struhnts), a vessel used to expose to view the eucharistic bread. The monstrance is usually made of a precious metal. It has a broad base, a stem with a node, and a round opening usually surrounded by some design. A round flat window—known as a lunula, luna, or lunette—encases the consecrated Host. The monstrance is placed on the altar or in some place of reverence for adoration during the rite of exposition and benediction of the Blessed Sacrament and is sometimes carried in processions. The use of this vessel originated in fourteenth-century France and Germany, where eucharistic devotion outside of Mass flourished. The term "monstrance" and its synonym, "ostensorium," derive from the Latin verbs monstrare and ostendere, which mean "to show" or "to display." Reminiscent of the earlier ostensorium or reliquary, which was a glass cylinder for the viewing of the whole or part of a martyr's body, the monstrance houses the Real Presence of the body of Christ, the premier martyr, and provides a secure and reverent place for a prolonged exposition of the host. See also Benediction; Blessed Sacrament; eucharistic adoration; Real Presence.

Monstrance



Montalembert, Charles René, 1810–70, French historian, developer of Catholic social doctrine. A devout Catholic influenced by contacts with English liberalism and associated with Félicité de Lamennais and Henri Lacordaire, Montalembert worked vigorously to reconcile Catholicism with democratic liberalism.

Montanism, a mid- to late-second-century apocalyptic and charismatic movement within Christianity that threatened to undermine traditional authorities such as Holy Scripture and the office of bishop. Montanus emerged in Phrygia ca. 155–60 claiming to be directly inspired by the Holy Spirit. As the Holy Spirit incarnate he recruited numerous followers including two prophetesses, Maximilla and Priscilla, whose prophecy was regarded as the first fruits of the eschatological outpouring of the Spirit (Joel 2:28–32). They prophesied a speedy end of the world and preached the need to restore rigorous ascetic practices to Christianity. Most of their writings have been destroyed, but the accusations recorded by Eusebius and Epiphanius indicate the Montanist doctrines were not readily susceptible to attack on matters of dogma. Therefore, the Church stressed traditional sources of authority and raised character issues in order to combat the Montanists. However, their extreme asceticism continued to have strong appeal and attracted their most famous convert, Tertullian, ca. 207. See also apocalypticism; charism; Tertullian.

Monte Cassino, the chief monastery of the Benedictine order, situated on a prominent mountain midway between Rome and Naples. It was here that Benedict of Nursia (d. ca. 550) wrote his monastic rule ca. 540. The buildings were destroyed several times in the course of the centuries, most recently during World War II, but they have been restored. See also Benedict of Nursia, St.

Montfort, St. Louis Grignion de, 1673–1716, French priest and mission preacher. Ordained in 1700, he first became a hospital chaplain but a few years later abandoned that ministry and began preaching missions. Not long before his death, he founded the Missionaries of the Company of Mary, known today as the Montfort Fathers. His manuscript, discovered in 1842 and entitled "True Devotion to Mary," gained great popularity. His feast day, April 28, is no longer observed universally. See also Montfort Fathers.

Montfort Fathers, Missionaries of the Company of Mary, also known as the Society of Mary of Montfort (S.M.M.), a group founded in France in the early eighteenth century by Louis Grignion de Montfort. Although founded as a preaching and missionary society, the Montfort Fathers established seminaries in the mid and late nineteenth century—a ministry they have continued to the present. Throughout its history, the community has fostered a special devotion to the Blessed Virgin Mary. In 1903 the Montfort Fathers established their first house in the United States and later began publishing the Queen of All Hearts magazine. See also Montfort, St. Louis Grignion de.

Month's Mind Mass, a memorial Mass one month after the date of death or burial of a person with the explicit intention of keeping the deceased in mind. The practice is reminiscent of early observances of anniversaries of the deceased, marked with Masses celebrated at regular intervals beyond the date of death. Mass was ordinarily said at the graveside, followed by a meal in the cemetery. When such an observance became impossible due to frequency and cultural shifts restricting its occurrence, the custom of donating a stipend or a fixed amount of money to the clergy for the celebration of the Month's Mind Mass became an acceptable substitute. See also prayers for the dead.

Montserrat, mountain near Barcelona that is the site of a Benedictine monastery founded at the beginning of the eleventh century. Ignatius of Loyola went to Montserrat in 1522 after his recovery from the wound that led to his conversion. The monks there are celebrated for their scholarship and especially for their interest in sacred music. See also Ignatius of Loyola, St.

Mont-Saint-Michel, a Benedictine monastery originating in the late tenth century on an island off the coast of Normandy. Its abbey, an exquisite example of Medieval French architecture, became a prison during the French Revolution and later a museum. A religious community was recently restored to the abbey.

moral certitude. See certitude, moral.

morality, magisterium and. See magisterium and morality.

morality plays, medieval dramas with a heavily didactic character. These plays, the most famous being Everyman, typically contrast virtues and vices in a heavily allegorical manner.

moral law and civil law. See civil law and morality.

moral matter, that aspect of a human act that makes the act what it is, e.g., a theft rather than a murder.

moral person. See juridical person.

moral theology, the theological discipline that studies the moral life and action of Christians. Catholic insistence that the human person is an image of God with intellect, free will, and the power of self-determination, the importance of works as well as faith, and the practice of the sacrament of Reconciliation have given great importance to morality. Catholic insistence on reason and theology in general contributed to the development of a reflexive, thematic, and critical study of moral life called moral theology. All Catholics are called to discern and make responsible human judgments, but moral theology as a discipline seeks a systematic, coherent, and adequate understanding of all aspects of the moral life and actions of the Christian.

Content and Method: Moral theology discusses not only the morality of particular actions but also the basic orientation, motivation, and imagination of the person; the virtues, attitudes, and dispositions that should mark the Christian person (e.g., hopeful, just, compassionate); the values that should be present in society (e.g., justice, concern for the poor); the principles that direct our lives (the preferential option for the poor, the Golden Rule); and the concrete norms that give greater specificity to decision making (the obligation to tell the truth), conscience formation, and discernment. Casuistry, which determines the morality of a particular action or case in relationship to general principles and to other cases, has been developed at great length in the Catholic tradition, but moral theology includes more than just casuistry. Moral theology has typically been divided into general moral theology, which deals with those principles and aspects common to all moral life and issues, and special moral theology, which deals with the particular areas of concern such as personal, sexual, medical, and social ethics.

The method of Catholic moral theology finds moral wisdom in Scripture, tradition, hierarchical Church teaching, human reason, and experience, with official Church teaching and human reason (natural law) constituting distinctive Catholic emphases. This discipline is related to three publics—the Church, the academy, and society or the world in general. The discipline of moral theology traditionally found its home in the seminary and was aimed at training priests for their ministry. In more recent years, especially in the United States, moral theology has been taught as an academic discipline in Catholic colleges and universities and as ministerial preparation for service in the Church. Whereas ministerial preparation sees the discipline primarily from a more pastoral perspective, colleges and universities view moral theology in a more academic light. Until the mid-1960s the teachers of moral theology were priests who taught especially in the seminary or theologate. Today religious women and lay women and men are professors of moral theology, often in colleges and universities but also in some seminaries.

Historical Development: Moral theology as a separate discipline distinct from all other theology came into existence at the end of the sixteenth and the beginning of the seventeenth centuries. The first six hundred years of Christian existence are referred to as the patristic age since the Fathers of the Church, most of whom were pastors, were the major authors. In their writings they often discussed particular moral issues (lying, participation in the military, sexuality), but primarily from a pastoral perspective and did not elaborate a systematic discipline of moral theology. The Libri Poenitentiales (Lat., "Penitential Books") came into existence in the sixth century and flourished until the eleventh century. They were attempts to guide priests in giving a precise penance for each particular sin confessed in the rite of private penance that came into existence at this time. Systematic theology as a discipline began to develop in the twelfth century and Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) stands as the most significant Catholic theologian to propose an integrated discipline of theology; the consideration of morality is found in the second part of his Summa Theologiae. Subsequent theologians wrote commentaries on the work of Aquinas. At the same time a new genre of practical handbooks geared to the sacrament of Penance arose and flourished, the Summae Confessorum; these often dealt with subjects according to an alphabetical arrangement with no attempt at systematic presentations.

After the Council of Trent (1545–63), with its call for all Catholics to celebrate the sacrament of Penance once a year and its establishment of seminaries to prepare priests, the Institutiones Theologiae Moralis came into existence, originally within the Society of Jesus, to help prepare confessors to serve as judges in the sacrament of Penance. These books, which became the standard textbooks of moral theology until the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), provided a brief discussion of the principles of fundamental moral theology and of particular aspects of the moral life, arranged according to the Ten Commandments and the seven sacraments. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries a serious controversy arose between laxists and rigorists, which was settled by the moderate approach of Alphonsus Liguori (d. 1787), who was later named a saint, a Doctor of the Church, and the patron saint of moral theologians.

These textbooks of moral theology, with their heavy emphasis on casuistry, constituted a marvelous pastoral adaptation to the needs of a particular time, but they did not constitute an adequate and comprehensive approach to moral theology. The renewal of moral theology before, during, and after the Second Vatican Council called for a number of different emphases in an attempt to develop a more adequate moral theology—a life-centered, rather than an exclusively act-centered approach; a strong dependence on Scripture and on all theology; an emphasis on the total Christian life and not just its minimum requirements; an ecumenical dialogue with other Christians and all religions; a critical openness to dialogue with contemporary philosophical ethics; a more positive appreciation of the human and empirical sciences; and a strong emphasis on the social mission of the Church. See also magisterium and morality; theology.

Bibliography

Curran, Charles E. Toward an American Catholic Moral Theology. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1987.

Grisez, Germain. The Way of the Lord Jesus. Vol. 1: Christian Moral Principles. Chicago: Franciscan Herald Press, 1983.

Gula, Richard M. Reason Informed by Faith: Foundations of Catholic Morality. New York: Paulist Press, 1989.

Mahoney, John. The Making of Moral Theology: A Study of the Roman Catholic Tradition. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1987.

CHARLES E. CURRAN

moral virtues. See cardinal virtues.

Thomas More, who suffered martyrdom rather than deny the pope in favor of King Henry VIII, wearing the symbol of his office as Lord Chancellor, a post he resigned after opposing the king in the matter of his divorce from Catherine of Aragon.

More, St. Thomas, 1478–1535, Lord Chancellor of England, executed for refusing to accept King Henry VIII's supremacy over the Church in England. More studied law at Oxford and was a close friend of Erasmus. He refused to sign an oath that declared Henry's marriage to Catherine of Aragon invalid and that repudiated the pope. He resigned as chancellor in 1532 and was imprisoned in 1534. Though he remained silent regarding the Act of Supremacy, he was convicted on perjured evidence and beheaded on July 6, 1535. More was a humanist who argued for moral and social reform through education and sacred literature. His most famous works include Utopia, a social satire written in 1516, and his letters from the Tower of London, which reveal a deep devotion to the suffering Christ. More maintained an affection for Henry VIII to the end and hoped that his death would somehow serve the king. Feast day: June 22. See also England, Catholicism in.

Mormons, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, founded by Joseph Smith, Jr., (1805–44) at Manchester, New York. In 1827 Smith announced that in a divine revelation he had received a sacred text, the Book of Mormon. Over the next few years, Smith, with the help of Sidney Rigdon, organized churches in Ohio, Missouri, and Nauvoo, Illinois, where Smith was killed in 1844. In 1846–47 Brigham Young (1801–77) led the Mormons to Salt Lake City, Utah, which became the church's permanent headquarters. Polygyny was instituted in 1852 but was officially ended in 1890.

Mormonism is polytheistic, claiming that human beings can develop into gods. It acknowledges the divinity of Jesus Christ but insists that every person is responsible for his or her salvation, which is attained by undergoing Mormon baptism and living according to the laws of the church. In this view, traditional Christians lack the true faith, for they have not been touched by the authentic Spirit. Mormonism permits baptism by proxy, thereby assuring the possibility of the salvation of people who died without the Mormon baptism. In areas where Mormons are numerous, Catholics have found it very difficult to enter into ecumenical relationships with them.

Morning Offering, prayer of devotion. It is the practice of beginning the day with a prayer by means of which one offers the day to God and accepts, as from the hands of God, all that comes in the course of the day.

Inspired by Christ's requests to Margaret Mary Alacoque, the devotion was begun by a Jesuit, Father Gaurelet, in 1844 and has been popularized since 1860 by the Apostleship of Prayer (League of the Sacred Heart). See also Apostleship of Prayer; Sacred Heart, devotion to the.

MORNING OFFERING PRAYER

"O Jesus, through the immaculate Heart of Mary, I offer You all my prayers, works, joys and sufferings of this day, for all the intentions of Your Sacred Heart, in union with the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass throughout the world, in reparation for my sins, for the intentions of all our associates, and for the general intention recommended this month."

Morning Prayer, part of the Liturgy of the Hours. Formerly called Lauds (Lat., laus, "praise"), it is prayed in the early morning hours to praise God for the beginning of another day. One of the two hinges on which the day's prayer pivots, along with Evening Prayer or Vespers, Morning Prayer begins with an invitation to prayer. A hymn of praise is sung followed by a morning psalm, an OT canticle, and another psalm of praise, each with an antiphon. A passage from Scripture is read and a homily may be given, followed by silence, a responsory, and the Canticle of Zechariah or the Benedictus (Luke 1:68–79). Prayers of intercession consecrate the day and its work to God. The Lord's Prayer follows immediately. A concluding prayer, blessing, and dismissal close the rite. See also Liturgy of the Hours.

Morse, St. Henry, 1595–1645, English Jesuit martyr. Ordained in Rome, he was arrested after returning to England. Released from prison and banished in 1630, he returned again to England, where he worked for fifteen years, only to be arrested and executed for high treason in 1645. Feast day: December 1.

Mortalium Animos (mohr-tahl'ee-oom ahn'ee-mohs; Lat., "souls of mortals"), encyclical of Pope Pius XI, issued January 6, 1928, that negatively assessed the nascent ecumenical movement and insisted that Catholicism could not be considered on a par with other religions.

mortal sin (Lat., mors, "death"), a violation of God's will (the moral order) that is considered so serious that it brings death to the soul, the rupture of the relation of the individual to God. For the commission of such a sin traditional theology has required three conditions: grave matter (Lat., gravitas materiae), sufficiently full knowledge, and full consent or freedom. Any significant diminution in one of these conditions would usually render the sin less than mortal. For truly mortal sins, the Church's law demands (outside of emergency situations) specific confession for forgiveness. There are references in Scripture (Matt 12:31; Mark 3:29; Luke 12:10) to a sin "against the Spirit" or an "eternal sin" that is not forgiven, but these remain the object of continuing theological debate.

Since the mid-1960s theologians have been somewhat uncomfortable with the sharp and neat categorization of sins as either mortal or venial. Some have suggested that a more realistic division would be mortal, serious, or venial (slight). In this division serious sins would indeed be more than slight (everyday failures) but not such as to rupture the relationship with God; this would be similar to situations in which families suffer rather severe tests but still survive intact. Other theologians have insisted that any serious moral act, whether virtuous or sinful, derives its seriousness from the degree of liberty in the act. Only an act that also involves, beyond explicit freedom of choice, self-disposing fundamental freedom is a serious moral act in the sense of a mortal sin or a conversion from it. It is often difficult to know whether such freedom was involved or not. This constitutes another reason why individuals are in no position to judge others before God. See also fundamental option; gravitas materiae; sin; venial sin. RICHARD A. MCCORMICK mortification (Lat., mors, "death"; facere, "to make"), the process of "killing" sinful desires and practices in order to draw closer to God. While mortification suggests a denial of illicit and even licit pleasures that might distract one from the demands of the gospel, it is also a discipline that is self-imposed and joyfully embraced. Jesus invited Christians to this sort of self-discipline when he told the disciples that following him meant denying one's very self and taking up the Cross (Matt 16:24). Paul echoed Christ's teaching in Romans (8:13). As the practice is commonly understood, the object of mortification is the senses. If, for example, one is easily tempted to the sin of theft, mortification might involve denying oneself the otherwise legitimate pleasure of browsing in a store. To take the act of mortification a step further, this person might choose to donate a prized possession, legally purchased, to the poor. The goal of mortification is to create a sense of detachment from inclinations that habitually lead to sin. The practice requires patience and prayer and is best undertaken with the help of a spiritual director. In every case, excess should be avoided. See also penance.

mosaics, art form consisting of colored pieces of glass (called tesserae, Lat.) pressed into soft plaster to form pictures. Such art was widely used in church decoration, especially in the Byzantine Church and in Italy during the so-called Italo-Byzantine period. See also Catholicism and the visual arts.

Moschus, John, ca. 550–619, a monk who traveled to monasteries in Palestine, Egypt, Cyprus, and Rome. His Spiritual Meadow, with its monastic lore, became immensely popular as a devotional manual and was expanded and revised by others after his death.

Moses, the leader of the Exodus and lawgiver of the OT. He was born in Egypt, perhaps ca. 1300 B.C., and was rescued from the death sentence on Israelite male babies by being placed in a basket on the Nile. There the pharaoh's daughter found him and raised him in the palace. After he killed a man, he fled Egypt and hid in Midian, where he married Jethro's daughter Zipporah and served him as shepherd. At the burning bush the Lord commissioned Moses to return to Egypt and lead the people into the wilderness. He did so, and after the ten plagues he led them across the Reed (Red) Sea and to Mount Sinai (the site of the burning bush), where the covenant was made with the Lord. Despite frequent complaints from the people, he led the nation through the wilderness for forty years, but was not permitted to enter Canaan because of his disobedience (Num 20). He died at age 120, after addressing the people and viewing Canaan from Mount Nebo. Because Moses is the major character in Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy, and because he is pictured as writing (e.g., Exod, 24:4), he came to be considered the author of these books already in OT times and eventually of Genesis as well. He acted as prophetic spokesman for the Lord and served as a model for a succession of prophets (Deut 18:15–22). In Matthew and John, Jesus is pictured as a new Moses, and Peter, James, and John see Moses during the Transfiguration. Moses represents the old covenant in these works, in Paul's Letters, and in Hebrews.

Sixth-century Byzantine mosaic of the head of John the Apostle and Evangelist; in the Church of St. Apollinaris, Ravenna, Italy.

Michelangelo's Moses, on the tomb of Pope Julius II (d. 1513), in the Church of St. Peter in Chains, Rome.

motet. 1 A thirteenth-century composition in which words were added to fragments of Gregorian melodies. 2 In the sixteenth century, a four- or five-voiced sacred musical composition using a Latin text and usually sung without accompaniment. See also Catholicism and music.

Mother Angelica. See Angelica, Mother.

Mother of God (Gk., Theotokos), a title applied to Mary at the Council of Ephesus in 431. Nestorius had claimed that Jesus was two persons, one divine and the other human, and as such Mary was not properly to be called Theotokos, "Mother of God," but Christotokos, "Mother of Christ." Under the leadership of Cyril of Alexandria, the fathers of Ephesus rejected Nestorius's position, claiming that Jesus, although fully human in nature, was a divine person. Consequently, Mary was truly the Mother of God. The title was upheld by the Council of Chalcedon in 451. See also Ephesus, Council of; Mary, Blessed Virgin.

mother of Jesus, the primary role of Mary in the history of salvation. References to Jesus' mother in the NT are shaped primarily by theological concerns about the mission and identity of her son. Paul mentions her to emphasize the saving entry of God's Son into human existence: "God sent his Son, born of a woman, born under the law, in order to redeem those who were under the law, so that we might receive adoption as children" (Gal 4:4–5; similar bipolar formulations in Phil 2; 2 Cor 5:21; 8:9; Rom 1:3–4). Mark locates the meaning of being Jesus' "mother" or "brother" in relation to following Jesus (Mark 3:31–34; cf. Matt 12:46–50; Luke 8:19–21, 11:27–28) and emphasizes that mere knowledge of Jesus' family relations can be an obstacle to faith (Mark 6:3; cf. Matt 13:55; John 6:42). For Matthew, Jesus' birth from a virgin fulfills the promise of "God with us" (Matt 1:18–25; Isa 7:14). For Luke, it constitutes the high point of divine interventions in history, following the pattern of Samuel's birth from the barren Hannah (Luke 1:47–55; 1 Sam 2:1–10). The criterion that to be Jesus' "mother" one must "hear the word of God and do it" (Luke 8:28) is fulfilled by Mary in becoming Jesus' mother (Luke 1:38; 2:19, 51; cf. 10:39). John never names her "Mary" (though the name "Mary" appears to have symbolic resonances in 11:1–53, 19:25 and 20:11.16) but, as in other cases, such as "the Beloved Disciple," uses a standard phrase that expresses her role: "the mother of Jesus" or, more poignantly, "the mother" (19:26). He gives her a prominent place at the beginning (2:1–12) and at the end (19:25–26) of Jesus' public ministry as "the woman," the nucleus of the new community that flows from Jesus. The sign of the woman in Rev 12:1–6 refers to this community (see 12:17), though a reference to the individual mother of the Messiah may also be included. See also Mary, Blessed Virgin. MICHAEL WALDSTEIN

Mother of the Church, a title conferred on the Blessed Virgin Mary by Paul VI on November 21, 1964, in response to a number of bishops who felt that the significance of Mary had not been sufficiently stressed by the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). The title accents Mary's role as mother of all Christians through her role as mother of the Savior. See also Mary, Blessed Virgin.

Mother Teresa. See Teresa of Calcutta, Mother.

motu proprio (moh'too proh'pree-oh; Lat., "on his own initiative"), papal document originating from the pope's own office. Such a document might be used to address several different kinds of matters. Many of the changes brought about by Vatican II (1962–65) were given practical application by this type of document.

Mount Carmel. See Carmel, Mount.

Mount Carmel, Our Lady of. See Our Lady of Mount Carmel.

movable feasts, solemnities and feasts whose annual dates vary, depending on the date of Easter. Twelve such dates shift each year: Epiphany (in countries where it is not observed as a holy day of obligation, e.g., the United States), Baptism of the Lord, Ash Wednesday, Easter Sunday, Ascension Thursday, Pentecost Sunday, Trinity Sunday, Solemnity of the Body and Blood of Christ (Corpus Christi), Solemnity of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, Solemnity of Christ the King, First Sunday of Advent, and Feast of the Holy Family.

Mozarabic chant. See chant, Mozarabic.

Mozarabic rite (mohts'ah-rah-bik), the liturgical order of the churches of the Iberian peninsula. The term "mozarabic" refers to Christians living in Muslim lands, though the formation of the Mozarabic liturgies predates the Islamic conquest. Isidore of Seville (d. 636) is the earliest witness to the practices of the Hispanic churches. The Roman rite generally followed the Christian reconquest of the peninsula, entering Catalonia during the eighth century; Avalon, Castile, and León, late in the eleventh. The Mozarabic rite was suppressed in 1085, when Toledo, the primatial see of Spain, was recaptured and the Roman rite was imposed on Spain by the newly appointed French archbishop. Because of the restoration efforts of Cardinal Jiménez de Cisneros in the fifteenth century and Cardinal Lorenzana in the late eighteenth, a form of the Mozarabic rite was restored to a chapel of the Cathedral of Toledo, Spain, where it is observed in the 1990s. See also rite.

Mozarabs, Christians living in Spain under Muslim rule from the invasion in 711 until 1492. See also Mozarabic rite.

Mozart, Wolfgang Amadeus, 1756–91, Austrian composer. Mozart's early experiences of performed music and his first position as composer came from the court of the prince-archbishop of Salzburg. His church music includes over twenty Masses or parts of Masses (including the unfinished Requiem), several settings of litanies and parts of the Divine Office (now called the Liturgy of the Hours), eighteen organ sonatas for use during the Mass, and many individual pieces like the well-known Ave Verum and Exsultate, Jubilate. Although sympathetic to the Enlightenment's critique of Church power, his religious music displays not only a delicate maturity but a joy and exuberance born of, and suited to, late Baroque Catholicism.

Mundelein, George W., 1872–1939, cardinal-archbishop of Chicago (1915–39). A vigorous centralizer, Mundelein astutely drew power into his hands and imposed a strict uniformity in archdiocesan discipline, especially with priests. This was aided by the development of an effective minor and major seminary program. He also improved the financial condition of the Chicago see, expanded its programs of elementary and higher education, and attempted to curtail some of the independence of ethnic groups. He deliberately used the trappings of power and ecclesiastical pomp to accentuate the status of Catholics in Chicago and was known as a supporter of President Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

Munificentissimus Deus (moon-i-fi-chen-tees' i-moos day'oos; Lat., "The Most Munificent God"), the apostolic constitution issued by Pope Pius XII on November 1, 1950, defining the dogma of the bodily Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary into heaven. See also Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

Münster, Sebastian, 1488–1552, Hebraist and geographer. A Franciscan who converted to Lutheranism around 1524, as professor of Hebrew at Basel he published works on geography and cosmography. His Biblia Hebraica (1534–35) provided the Hebrew text of the OT and a Latin translation that was widely influential.

Müntzer, Thomas, also Münzer, 1488/9–1525, radical reformer and revolutionary. A Catholic priest, then Lutheran minister at Zwickau (1520) and Allstedt (1523), Müntzer relied on direct divine revelation and sought an apocalyptic purge of Church and state. Caught up in the Peasants' War (1524–25) he was captured, tortured, and executed.

Muratorian fragment, a list of scriptural books from the early Church. The fragment, discovered in 1740, survives in a corrupt Latin translation from a Greek work composed between the second and fourth century A.D. The list, the beginning of which is lost, includes Luke, John, Acts, twelve Pauline Letters, Revelation, Jude, and 1 and 2 John. It acknowledges the Wisdom of Solomon and the Apocalypse of Peter, although noting that some exclude the latter from public reading. It allows the Shepherd of Hermas to be read, but not in public, and it rejects a pseudo-Pauline Letter to the Laodiceans and the works of heretics. See also canon of the Scriptures.

Murphy, Roland E., b. 1917, leading OT scholar and pioneer in biblical renewal. Ordained a Carmelite priest (1942) he received the S.T.D. (1948) and M.A. degree in Semitics (1949) at The Catholic University of America, and the S.S.L. from the Pontifical Biblical Institute (1958). He taught Semitic languages (1949–55) and Old Testament (1956–70) at Catholic University, and is presently George Washington Ivey Emeritus Professor of Biblical Studies at Duke University, where he taught from 1971 to 1987. He is former president of the Society of Biblical Literature and Catholic Biblical Association. The author of major studies of OT wisdom literature, he is editor, with R. E. Brown and J. A. Fitzmyer, of The Jerome Biblical Commentary (1968) and The New Jerome Biblical Commentary (1990).

Murphy-O'Connor, Jerome, b. 1935, Dominican biblical scholar. Born in Ireland and ordained a Dominican in 1960, he received his Th.D. at the University of Fribourg, Switzerland (1962), and his S.S.L. from the Pontifical Biblical Commission, Rome (1965). Beginning as a lecturer in 1967, he has been professor of New Testament at the École Biblique et Archéologique Française, Jerusalem, since 1972. He is author of many books, including The Theology of 2 Corinthians (1991), The Holy Land: An Archaelogical Guide (1992), and Paul: A Critical Life (1995). See also École Biblique.

Murray, John Courtney, 1904–67, American Jesuit theologian, the most important contributor to Catholic reflection on Church and state and the question of religious liberty in the twentieth century. His early work, written in the early to mid-1940s, focused on ecumenical and interfaith cooperation and argued that persons of different faiths could collaborate in the post-World War II reconstruction of the social order. In the late 1940s he turned his attention to the question of Church and state, and began to make the case that constitutionally protected religious freedom was consistent with Catholic teaching. Conflict on this point with Cardinal Alfredo Ottaviani, head of the Holy Office, led, in 1954, to the request by Murray's superiors that he refrain indefinitely from writing on Church-state relations. He turned his attention to a range of social issues and brought together the writings in We Hold These Truths (1960).

John Courtney Murray, Jesuit priest, one of the leading twentieth-century Catholic theologians in the United States and the principal architect of the Second Vatican Council's Declaration on Religious Freedom.

His work on Church and state received new life when, at the intervention of Cardinal Francis Spellman of New York, he was invited to be an expert (Lat., peritus) at the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). Here, he was instrumental in the drafting of the Declaration on Religious Freedom (1965), which affirmed religious freedom as a human right for all and the freedom of the Church as the fundamental principle governing relations between the Church and governments. Murray's later writing, cut short by his death, began to apply the concept of religious freedom internally to the Church. See also Church and state; Declaration on Religious Freedom; religious liberty.

TODD D. WHITMORE

music. See Catholicism and music; liturgical music.

Muslims. See Islam.

mustum (Lat., "new [unfermented] wine"), the unfermented juice of ripe grapes. It may validly be substituted for altar wine, but its use is illicit without permission from the Apostolic See. Priests who are recovering from alcoholism and who cannot take even a small amount of wine, as by intinction (dipping the consecrated host into the wine), may seek permission through their ordinary (diocesan bishop) to use mustum instead of wine. See also wine, eucharistic.

mutual aid society, a benevolent organization founded to provide aid to needy parishioners or to raise funds for the establishment of new parishes.

mystagogy (Gk., muein, "to teach a doctrine, to instruct into the mysteries"), the period of special instruction on the sacramental life immediately following catechumenal formation and initiation into the Christian community. The period of instruction is also known by its Greek form, mystagogia. The catechumenal process that began to evolve in the second century in the Eastern and Western churches instructed candidates on the Christian moral life and God, Christ, and the Spirit. The Scriptures were explained and the catechumens were taught how to pray. During this period, which could last three years or longer in some communities, the catechumens were probably not permitted to take part in worship, except the Liturgy of the Word, the first part of the Eucharist. Some scholars have suggested that secrecy was maintained by the baptized on the inner life of worship in the community. Thus, the Holy Saturday vigil celebrations, during which these candidates were initiated through Baptism, anointing, and the Eucharist into full participation in the life of the Christian community, had not been previously explained. The mystagogia were instructions or homilies on these sacraments, usually given by the bishop in the early Church to the neophytes in the week following their initiation. Among the mystagogical homilies still extant are those of Cyril of Jerusalem, Theodore of Mopsuestia, Ambrose, John Chrysostom, and Augustine.

In today's practice, the period of mystagogia explains how the new Christian is to live the new life into which he or she has been initiated. According to the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults, the period should begin at Easter and should continue for "a suitable period." See also Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults.

Mysteries of the Rosary, fifteen incidents from the life of Jesus or Mary that are divided into three groups and meditated upon while reciting the Rosary. When prayed publicly, a mystery is usually announced before reciting each decade of the rosary. The three groups of mysteries are (1) the joyful mysteries: the Annunciation, the Visitation (Mary's visit to Elizabeth), the birth of Our Lord, the Presentation of Jesus in the Temple, and the finding of Jesus in the Temple; (2) the sorrowful mysteries: the agony of Jesus in the garden, the scourging of Jesus at the pillar, the crowning of Jesus with thorns, the carrying of the cross, and the Crucifixion and death of Jesus; and (3) the glorious mysteries: the Resurrection of Jesus, Jesus' ascension into heaven, the descent of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost, the Assumption of Mary into heaven, and the coronation of Mary as Queen of Heaven.

Three-Stage Development: The development of the mysteries took place in three stages, which roughly correspond to the development of the Rosary itself.

The first stage occurred in the twelfth century when it became customary to cite a phrase referring to an important incident in the life of Jesus or Mary before the recitation of a psalm. Although originally intended to supplement the praying of the psalms, the psalms were eventually discontinued, and the phrases that once introduced the psalms developed into brief reflections on the Annunciation, Jesus' life, death, Resurrection, and the glorification of Jesus and Mary in heaven. Retaining the original structure given by the psalms, the reflections were organized in groups of 50 and usually consisted of 150 meditations.

The second stage occurred in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. While initially limited to the joy of the Annunciation, it soon became customary to focus on other Marian joys. Often, the recitation of each joy was accompanied by a "Hail Mary." For example, one would recite 50 joyful meditations accompanied by 50 "Hail Marys." During the fourteenth century, parallel developments took place concerning Mary's sorrows and her heavenly joys. Once again, the number of sorrows and heavenly joys multiplied, and were accompanied with "Hail Marys." Eventually, it became common to recite 50 earthly joys, 50 earthly sorrows, and 50 heavenly joys in conjunction with 150 "Hail Marys."

The final stage occurred during the fifteenth century. As long as the meditations were sets of 50, those who used them had to be literate and possess a text, since it was impossible to recall 150 separate meditations. In order to make the meditations universally accessible, their number was reduced to 15; 5 for each set, combined with 150 "Hail Marys." Now the meditations functioned as focal points for the recitation of the "Hail Marys," which had now evolved into the Rosary by being combined with the "Our Father" and the "Glory be to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. . . ."

This structure, first recorded in Our Dear Lady's Psalter (1483), is used today. It is now customary to focus on particular mysteries during certain days of the week: the joyful mysteries on Mondays and Thursdays, the sorrowful mysteries on Tuesdays and Fridays, and the glorious mysteries on Wednesdays, Saturdays, and Sundays. See also Rosary.

MICHAEL O'KEEFFE

Mysterium Ecclesiae (mis-stehr'ee-oom ek-klayz'ee-ay; Lat., "Mystery of the Church"), "Declaration in Defense of the Catholic Doctrine on the Church Against Certain Errors of the Present Day," declaration issued by the Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith on June 24, 1973, in response to Hans Küng's Infallible? An Inquiry (1970). The declaration is remarkable for its recognition that even dogmatic pronouncements are historically conditioned and must be interpreted in light of the language, concepts, and circumstances of the time in which they were formulated. On the other hand, it rejects a "dogmatic relativism" that holds that such pronouncements "cannot signify truth in a determinate way, but can only offer changeable approximations. . . ."

Mysterium Fidei (mis-tehr'ee-um fi'day-ee; Lat., "Mystery of Faith"), encyclical on the Eucharist by Pope Paul VI in 1965 to counter erroneous opinions and practices that had arisen. The encyclical noted that there are many ways in which Christ is present in the Church and that this presence is in every case real. But the encyclical maintained that Christ's presence in the Eucharist is real par excellence because it is substantial, the Eucharist being the presence of the whole Christ, divine and human. The encyclical also reaffirmed the doctrine of transubstantiation. See also Real Presence; transubstantiation.

mystery, a term that refers to the infinite incomprehensibility of God. God is not provisionally mystery, God is essentially mystery; not just unknown, but unknowable, literally incomprehensible. While "mystery" is also used in Catholic theology to refer to those things that merely confound the finite intellect, mystery in its most fundamental sense refers to the permanent character of God's incomprehensibility. Even in the Beatific Vision, God will remain mystery.

In the NT, mystery (Gk., mustērion; Lat., mysterium) is used in reference to God's saving plan for human history (Col 1:1–2:6; Eph 1–3). Similarly, in the early Church, the rites of the Easter Vigil are called mysteries, as rites that incorporate the believing community into salvation history. In this use, mystery is linked with a providential plan that gradually is being revealed.

The theologian Karl Rahner (d. 1984) orders the second of these two related understandings of mystery to the first. Rahner insists that there is only one fundamental mystery with two aspects: the mystery that is the being of God and the mystery that is the saving presence of the incomprehensible God in human history. All positive knowledge exists only in reference to this unfathomable mystery of God's life with us, a mystery that is expressed by three mutually implicated doctrines of the faith: the Trinity, the Incarnation, and the doctrine of grace. These three doctrines are formally declared by the Church to be mysteries in the strict sense (Lat., mysteria stricte dicta), terminology that refers to Vatican I's assertion (1869–70) that some doctrines of the faith are products of divine revelation, not deducible from human reason alone; See also faith and reason; God; sacrament. NANCY DALLAVALLE mystery plays, a form of medieval European religious drama that evolved out of liturgical services after the tenth century. Mystery plays were performed during festal seasons; in them biblical subjects were acted out in cycles before outdoor audiences. Dramas with an ethical theme were called morality plays.

mystic, a person whose experience of the presence of God is intense, direct, and transforming, but not necessarily accompanied by extraordinary phenomena. Mystics experience a deep communion of love and of knowledge with God and, in God, with other people and all reality. Today, the mystical potential of all Christians is increasingly emphasized. See also mysticism.

mystical marriage. See marriage, spiritual.

mystical theology, a systematic reflection on the deepest levels of human experience of God. In the early Church, and consistently in Eastern Christianity, all theology was regarded as "mystical," as no sharp division was made between religious experience and doctrine. In the West, during the later Middle Ages, a growing separation arose between experience and intellectual knowledge. By the nineteenth century, "mystical theology" became a discipline concerned with the higher reaches of contemplation. Mystical theology was distinguished from "ascetical theology," which was concerned with "ordinary" Christian life. Contemporary theologians reject such distinctions and favor a reintegration of spirituality with doctrinal and moral theology. See also mysticism; theology.

mystical vision, a dimension of mystical experience. In the narrow sense, it refers to ecstatic phenomena, for example, apparitions of Jesus Christ, angels or saints, experienced by some, but by no means all, mystics. More broadly, it refers to the general transformation of consciousness and deepened awareness associated with mysticism. See also mysticism.

Mystici Corporis (mis'ti-chee kohr'pohr-is; Lat., "Of the Mystical [Body] of Christ"), encyclical of Pope Pius XII, issued on June 29, 1943. Although the encyclical described the relationship of head and members in hierarchical and juridical terms, it also emphasized the interior reality of grace and the role of the Holy Spirit as the soul of the Mystical Body of Christ. Thus, it is composed of both hierarchical and charismatic elements, which "complement and perfect one another." "Real" membership in the Church, however, belongs only to those who have been baptized, profess the true faith, and are in union with the pope. Therefore, the Mystical Body of Christ is identical with the Catholic Church. This teaching was modified by the Second Vatican Council (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 8). See also Body of Christ; Church.

mysticism, in Christian terms, an element of religion involving the explicit experience of the immediate presence of God. Despite the large body of modern literature on mysticism, the term is notoriously difficult to define.

The Problem of Definition: Definition involves three related factors. First, mysticism exists in all world religions. Therefore, a major question is whether there is something, "mysticism as such," that transcends the boundaries of particular religions and is open to generic definition. However, attempts at inclusive definitions are often criticized as inadequate in relation to specific traditions.

Second, the implication that there is a common "mystical core" in all religions raises serious questions about the possibility of distinguishing experiences from interpretation. In fact, they are interdependent because one can only experience within a framework of meaning. Thus, Christian mysticism is the way it is because mystics experience what they do within, rather than despite, a framework of Christian belief. Christian mystics may be said to be those who believe in and practice their faith with particular intensity. One attitude to this inclusiveness also determines whether to limit the term "mystic" to persons who speak of firsthand experiences, for example, Julian of Norwich (d. ca. 1420), or to include writers whose style is more theoretical, for example, Bernard of Clairvaux (d. 1153).

Third, if mysticism is defined as an explicit experience of God, is it limited to particular kinds of experience that are valid in every context? In fact, while mystical experience has a quality of immediacy, it is in some sense a mediated experience because it is always particular and contextual. It is not only within a faith tradition but also within the framework of the mystic's individual consciousness, temperament, life-style, and ideas about God, the world, and the self.

Context also implies historical factors. Mystics live at particular times and in particular places. The history of Christian mysticism includes a variety of different emphases because of specific social, historical, and religious conditions. For example, the emergence of a more Christ-centered mysticism during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries can only be properly understood in relationship to general shifts in religious and cultural sensibilities and contemporary reform movements in the Church.

The Basis of Christian Mysticism: Christian mysticism is rooted in the baptismal call of all Christians to enter into the divine mystery through exposure and response to the Scriptures, liturgy, and sacraments. This, rather than an interest in subjective experiences, was the understanding of "mysticism" in the early Church. The anonymous fifth- or sixth-century writer, known as Denys the Areopagite, whose works had such an influence on medieval Western mystical theology, sums up this early tradition. This approach underlines that mysticism, in its most general sense, is potentially a dimension of every Christian life. It also emphasizes that mysticism is a baptismal gift rather than something achieved through individual effort.

Yet, some people have intense experiences that are more usually described as "mystical" and have reached a deep level of communion with God. The latter is more important because not all mystics experience ecstacy, visions, or other altered states. On their own, these are not reliable indicators of mysticism. Equally, mysticism, even in the narrow sense, is essentially a process or way of life rather than isolated experiences. It is the Christian life lived with a particular commitment and intensity.

The word most frequently used by mystics and commentators to describe the heart of Christian mysticism is "union." However, union with God is, in some degree, the precondition of all spiritual development, rather than simply its deepest level. In addition, mystical union has often been understood in terms of human passivity and absorption. Apart from the difficulty of relating this factor, without qualification, to Christian understandings of the relationship of God to the human person, it does not correspond to the lives of the great mystics. Rather, the deep union of, say, Bernard of Clarivaux, Francis of Assisi (d. 1226), or Catherine of Siena (d. 1380) led them into greater activity and service of others. It may also be the case that the narrower understanding of union reflects the religious culture of male celibates who generated most of the language of mystical theology. Either a much broader understanding of "union" with God is needed or one must seek other, less exclusive, phrases such as "an immediacy of divine presence."

Types of Mysticism: In all Christian mysticism there is a movement toward greater simplicity and stillness and a growing realization of the inadequacy of human images for God. However, because mysticism is always particular and contextual, it is possible to speak of various types of Christian mysticism in which the emphases differ. No typology of Christian mysticism will be totally adequate but the most common types usually involve some variation on a simple, twofold distinction between the way of imagelessness, stillness, and wordlessness (apophatic) or the way of imaging God by the use of imagination or words (kataphatic). This distinction derives ultimately from Denys the Areopagite. Thus, Meister Eckhart (d. 1327) or the author of The Cloud of Unknowing would be in the first category and Julian of Norwich or Francis of Assisi would be in the second. In fact, there is no basis in Denys for such an absolute distinction because, for him, God is revealed in and through images and yet is always beyond them.

There is a balance between images and imagelessness in all Christian mysticism. The mysticism of "unknowing" or imagelessness cannot bypass the role of Christ, "the image of the unseen God," in the Christian life. Equally, Christ-centered mysticism employs imagination and imagery merely as doorways into divine presence where one is, ultimately, simply to be. Finally, while someone like Ignatius of Loyola (d. 1556), the sixteenth-century founder of the Jesuits, may be seen as espousing a "mysticism of service" in a special way, no Christian mystic would suggest that one can leave behind the demands of charity and service of others in pursuit of purely introspective and isolated contemplation. See also contemplation; English Mystics; mystical theology.

Bibliography

Dupré, Louis The Deeper Self: An Introduction to Christian Mysticism. New York: Crossroad, 1981.

Egan, Harvey. What Are They Saying About Mysticism? New York: Paulist Press, 1982.

Katz, Stephen, ed. Mysticism and Religious Traditions. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.

McGinn, Bernard. The Foundations of Mysticism: Origins to the Fifth Century. New York: Crossroad, 1991.

Woods, Richard, ed. Understanding Mysticism. New York: Doubleday, 1980.

PHILIP SHELDRAKE

myth (Gk., mythos, "word," "speech," "story," "fiction"), a traditional story that deals with a character or characters from remote antiquity who are more than merely human. For Aristotle, myths encapsulate the truth "that the divine holds nature as a whole in its embrace." Fictional elements were added "with a view to the persuasion of the many and to the use [of myths] in laws and in what is advantageous [for the city]" (Metaphysics 12.8). Augustine (d. 430), like other Christian apologists, criticizes Roman civic-mythical religion on the grounds that peace or happiness is the goal of a community. If such a goal is not to be imaginary, the first demand to be made of a religion is that it be true (City of God 4.27; 6.1–8).

Some modern theologians continue to assess myth negatively. For Rudolf Bultmann (d. 1976), all forms of speech that objectify the nonobjective God, including stories or dogmas, are mythical. By contrast, God is the nonobjective challenge heard in the moment of decision. Demythologizing reverses objectivation: it allows the word of God to be heard. Others assess myth more positively. Karl Rahner (d. 1984) sees the tension between myth and concept as arising from the very nature of human knowledge: no transcendental knowledge is possible without "phantasms," images created by the mind but rooted in sense experience. On similar premises Hans Urs von Balthasar (d. 1988) sees myth as story, realized in worship and ritual, arising from both human longing and divine self-communication, irreducible to concepts. Carl Jung (d. 1961) maintains the permanent validity of myths as expressions of the collective unconscious.

Some contemporary biblical critics adopt a literary-sociological paradigm. Émile Durkheim's (d. 1917) pioneering sociological work has shown that in all societies religion and myth are central regulative institutions. As an agnostic, Durkheim understood religions as mythical (fictional) symbol-systems regulating the moral progress of society. Only society itself was real. On the more radical premise that all "reality" is socially constructed, some literary-sociological approaches to the Bible see the Christian myth in its various forms as one such construction, beyond the distinction between fact and fiction. These samples of reflection on myth point to issues that have been central in recent debates.

Historical-critical studies have shown the Bible to be deeply rooted in mythical traditions. In appropriating these studies, Catholic theologians have tended to resist attempts to reduce faith to metaphysical truth or existential decision. They have also resisted attempts to reduce faith to a symbol system expressing and furthering social values: the distinction between truth and fiction is relevant for a communal faith that acknowledges the gift of peace and happiness in the person of Jesus Christ. See also Bultmann, Rudolf; Scripture, interpretation of.

MICHAEL WALDSTEIN

N

name of Jesus. See Jesus [name].

Name of Jesus, feast of the, a day no longer commemorated as a separate feast in the Roman liturgical calendar of Vatican II. January 1, the Solemnity of Mary, Mother of God, recalls the conferral of the name of Jesus. The feast of the Name of Jesus originated in 1721 and was suppressed in 1969 as part of a general effort to eliminate duplication of feasts and to highlight the feasts that celebrate the central mystery of redemption.

Nantes, Edict of, grant of toleration to French Protestants (1598). Issued by Henry IV, the edict allowed Huguenots to worship in certain areas, granted civil liberties, and provided fortified cities of refuge. In the seventeenth century these concessions were eroded until Louis XIV revoked the edict (1685). See also Huguenots.

narthex. See vestibule.

National Assembly of Religious Women (NARW), successor in 1978 to the National Assembly of Women Religious, founded eight years earlier by Sister Ethne Kennedy. The assembly is a visible and vocal network of feminist women and men of Catholic and other traditions who share a vision of a world of peace with justice. NARW's agenda addresses a broad range of justice issues affecting women and children. Participation of people in decisions that affect their lives is emphasized. Social analysis is adopted as a tool for social change. NARW encourages collaboration with other women's groups to build coalitions for action on local, national, and international levels. Organized into local groups, members gather to discuss issues and use their collective power to effect justice in Church and society. The national office provides current resources and program materials; publishes annual reports and the bimonthly newsletter Probe, and sponsors workshops and annual national conferences.

National Black Catholic Congress, an organization founded in 1986 to encourage participation of black, or African-American, Catholics in the Church. The NBLC drafted the National Black Catholic Pastoral Plan in 1987. The central office is in Baltimore, Maryland.

National Black Sisters' Conference (NBSC), an organization of African-American nuns. It was founded in August 1968 by an international gathering of 155 black Roman Catholic sisters from 79 different religious congregations. By 1993, the NBSC provided a forum through which some 500 black sisters cooperate across congregational lines to confront individual and institutional racism in the Church, religious congregations of women, and society.

National Catechetical Directory, also known as Sharing the Light of Faith (1977), guidelines adapted from the General Catechetical Directory (1971) to the pastoral experience and needs of the U.S. Catholic Church; approved by the National Conference of Catholic Bishops after extensive consultation and review. It presents catechesis as a lifelong process, the stages of which are tailored to the experiential level of catechumens. See also catechesis; catechetics.

national Catholic churches, various church groups, distinguished by nationalities, that separated from the Roman Catholic Church. In the eighteenth century some Dutch Catholics in Utrecht separated from Rome because of their pro-Jansenist leanings. The nineteenth century saw certain national churches arise in Germany, Switzerland, and Austria because of a resistance to the doctrine of papal infallibility proclaimed at the First Vatican Council (1870). In the United States, some churches separated from Rome mainly because of ethnic discontent. The most important of these was the Polish National Church (1897) and a smaller group of Croats in 1924.

European churches of this type are also called Old Catholic churches. They accept the authority of the first eight ecumenical councils, have a vernacular liturgy, and a married clergy and episcopate. They entered into full communion with the Church of England (Anglican) in 1932. In the 1990s formal dialogue was started between the Polish National Church and the Roman Catholic Church. See also Old Catholics; Polish National Church.

National Catholic Coalition for Responsible Investment (NCCRI), a joint project of concerned Catholic organizations founded in 1973. Its purpose is to educate Catholic institutions about corporate social responsibility in their investments.

National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice (NCCIJ), a federation of Catholic Inter-racial Councils (CIC) established in the United States in 1960 to bring Catholic teachings to bear on racial and ethnic issues. John LaFarge (d. 1963), a Jesuit, founded the first of these councils in 1934.

National Catholic Educational Association (NCEA), voluntary organization of more than fourteen thousand Catholic educational institutions and educators. Founded in 1904 as the Catholic Educational Association, it changed its name in 1927. The main purpose of the NCEA is to improve Catholic education at all levels. The association holds an annual convention and publishes a quarterly journal.

National Catholic Register, a weekly newspaper published by Twin Circle Publishing Company of Denver and Los Angeles. First published in 1955, its positions reflect a conservative point of view on theological, pastoral, and social issues.

National Catholic Reporter, a weekly newspaper published by NCR Publishing Company of Kansas City, Missouri. Founded in 1964 by Michael Greene, it provides analysis and commentary on secular and church news. The weekly is owned and edited by laypeople. Its positions on current pastoral, theological, social, and political issues are progressive in orientation.

National Catholic Welfare Conference (NCWC), the precursor of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops (NCCB). Founded in 1919, it was designed to draw all the bishops of the United States into voluntary consultation on matters of common interest and to provide an organizational framework for the participation of the laity in the national public life of the Church. The bishops of the midwestern sees of Cincinnati, Cleveland, Chicago, and Detroit chaired the conference through most of its history. The conduct of its daily business was left to the discretion of the general secretary and his staff in Washington, D.C. The plan for drawing the laity into national federations of men and women had uneven results. Catholic men's organizations resisted pressure to affiliate with the NCWC. Catholic women responded with some enthusiasm, and their volunteer efforts were among the more notable achievements of the organization. With the establishment of the NCCB in 1966, the NCWC passed out of existence.

National Conference of Catholic Bishops (NCCB), the organization of the U.S. hierarchy mandated by Vatican II. It is empowered as a canonical body to make policy, subject to Vatican review, for the Church in the United States. Since its organization in 1966, the conference has made major decisions regarding the English liturgy, sacramental practices, religious education, and church discipline. The body of U.S. bishops also exercises public influence on a national and international level through its civil incorporation as the United States Catholic Conference (USCC). The USCC has been the source of policy statements and practices pertaining to a range of public issues, including nuclear war, the economy, and abortion. Participation in the assembly of the NCCB is limited to bishops. Until the debate over the proposed pastoral letter on women (1992), there had been a noteworthy degree of consensus among the bishops on most major issues. This consensus has been created through discussion and negotiation rather than being imposed from the top down. The NCCB/USCC has its national headquarters in Washington, D.C. Its activities are administered by a general secretary and staffed by professionals who may be nuns, priests, or laypersons. It has maintained continuity with its predecessor, the National Catholic Welfare Conference, by making the welfare of the family a consistent foundation for its public policy considerations. It has carried forward the ambitions of those Catholic leaders of an earlier period, who saw the importance of creating a central forum for coordinating the activities of the Church in the United States. See also episcopal conference. ELIZABETH MCKEOWN

National Council of Catholic Men (NCCM), a federation of all lay male societies in the United States. It was conceived by the organizers of the National Catholic Welfare Council in 1920. The chief national success of the NCCM lay in its sponsorship of the radio program "The Catholic Hour." After Vatican II and a short-lived merger with the National Council of Catholic Women, the NCCM concentrated its efforts largely on assisting its affiliates to develop and carry out religious and social programs on the local level.

National Council of Catholic Women (NCCW), a federation of existing women's societies organized in 1920 under the National Catholic Welfare Council. The NCCW has come to define its mission as the support, education, and empowerment of all Catholic women. Currently, the council is engaged in a variety of issues, including housing, racism, the environment, and international peace.

National Federation of Priests' Councils (NFPC), an association of more than 110 priests' councils, religious congregations, and other priests' associations, founded in Chicago in 1968. Stated purposes of the federation include the promotion of collaborative efforts to advance the Church's social teachings, the development of national and universal perspectives in Church and ministry, and a commitment to the renewal of priestly life. National headquarters are in Chicago, Illinois.

National Office of Black Catholics, an organization founded in 1970 to make the Church's presence more effective in the black, or African-American, community and to foster participation of black Catholics in the Church. The central office is in Washington, D.C.

national parish, a parish whose membership is based not on geographical boundaries, but on belonging to a given ethnic group. National parishes have been common in the United States during those periods of immigration when, for a significant number of Catholics, English was a second language. Among the more common national parishes in the United States, for example, are those for Italian-, Polish-, German-, Spanish-, and French-speaking Catholics.

nativism, a form of xenophobia directed especially at Catholic immigrants to the United States in the nineteenth century. Nativists prompted the burning of the Charlestown (Massachusetts) Convent (1834), the Philadelphia riots (1844), and the formation of the Know-Nothing movement (1850s). The Civil War eased nativist tendencies, but massive immigration in the late nineteenth century rekindled the movement. Nativists spurred the formation of the American Protective Association (1887), the resurgence of the Ku Klux Klan, and immigration restrictions in the 1920s. See also anti-Catholicism.

Nativity, feast of. See Christmas.

natural family planning, any of several nonartificial methods that make use of a woman's physical symptoms to determine her fertile period each month, used in spacing the births of children. As a method of birth control natural family planning is accepted by the Catholic Church because it does not involve disruption either of the act of sexual intercourse or of the natural process of conception. One form of natural family planning was the so-called rhythm method of past decades, which relied upon a calendar calculation of fertility based upon menstrual cycles and was sometimes inaccurate as a result. In its most complete modern form, also called the symptothermal method, natural family planning involves daily charting of a woman's basal body temperature (taken immediately upon awakening), the shape and position of her cervix, and the quantity and consistency of vaginal mucus, in addition to menstrual cycle and sexual activity data. This method is said to have enjoyed great success among married couples whether they are attempting to achieve or avoid pregnancy.

Natural family planning is of particular interest to Catholics as a nonartificial method of spacing births. Official Catholic moral teaching unequivocally condemns abortion and still regards artificial means of birth control as unacceptable for a variety of reasons, although this latter teaching, reaffirmed in Humanae Vitae (1968), remains controversial. Traditionally, children have been regarded as gifts from God to the married couple and to human society in general, and their conception was not to be inhibited by methods that disrupt the normal biological processes of the female, e.g., by the use of the contraceptive pill. Methods such as the so-called morning-after pill and the intrauterine device are regarded as abortifacients, which act by preventing the fertilized egg from being implanted in the uterus. Because human life is held by Catholic teaching to be sacred from the time of conception, these methods constitute the direct and unjustified termination of human life. Use of condoms is disallowed, according to this teaching, because such use prevents the sexual act from being completed in the manner ordained by God. For the same reason, premature withdrawal by the male (Lat., coitus interruptus) is not permitted. Natural family planning, by contrast, makes use of naturally occurring periods of infertility when practiced as a method of spacing children. Proponents of the method argue that the beneficial nature of the method is not limited to its acceptability as a means of birth control, but involves as well the good effects brought about by shared responsibility for decision making about the appropriateness of sexual intercourse on a particular occasion. The periodic abstinence necessitated by natural family planning is also considered to be beneficial by its practitioners, because abstinence during the woman's fertile period allows spouses to find other ways to express their love and reminds them of the importance of nonsexual reaffirmations of their commitment to each other. See also birth control. ALISON LIDSTAD natural law, the sum of those universally binding moral principles that can be discerned by human reason, understood as analogous to a legal code. The natural law has been understood in a variety of different ways by its proponents and opponents alike.

History of the Natural Law: the Classical Period. The natural law tradition originated in the late Roman Republic, through the reflections of political thinkers like Cicero (d. 43 B.C.), as well as many of the early Church Fathers. Following Aristotle (d. 322 B.C.), these thinkers attempted to evaluate the institutions of society according to what is natural to the human person, in contrast to the conventions of particular societies. What distinguished the natural law tradition from Aristotelianism, however, was its different account of what is natural to the human person. Whereas Aristotle had argued that barbarians, slaves, and women are naturally incapable of independent moral judgment, and therefore are justly subject to the authority of male citizens, the natural lawyers insisted that all mature, normal human beings are equal in their fundamental capacities for moral virtue, and that the institutions of domination structuring society are therefore unnatural. In this light, slavery, property, the state itself, and even marriage in its actual form were all seen as problematic.

Nonetheless, it was held that these institutions enjoy limited moral legitimacy, on the grounds that they represent necessary compromises with the natural ideals of equality and noncoercion. For example, the state, which maintains public order, was legitimated on the grounds that only through its exercise of force can the state protect the weaker members of society from the oppression of the strong; thus, through its violations of the ideals of noncoercion and equality, the state was paradoxically justified because it secured the nearest approximations to these ideals possible in an imperfect world.

The main lines of the account of the natural law sketched above would have been generally accepted by Christian as well as non-Christian political theorists in this period. It was given its most influential Christian expression, at least in the West, by Augustine (d. 430), who appropriated it to lay the foundations for what would later develop into the theory of the just war.

Medieval Period: Throughout the Middle Ages, the tradition of the natural law continued to function primarily as a means by which to evaluate the central institutions of society against the criteria of equality and noncoercion, ideals that could never be realized fully in this world, but could nonetheless be approximated. The natural law tradition could and did function either as a force for conservatism or as an impetus for reform. For some thinkers, it served to justify structures of dominion, on the grounds that one could now do no better, but for others, it provided a set of criteria by which to challenge at least some aspects of these same institutions, on the grounds that even in this postlapsarian world, one could approximate natural equality more nearly than one actually does. At the same time, medieval thinkers also appealed to the natural law in ways that are familiar to Catholics today, as a source for evaluating the morality of sexual and medical actions against the criterion of what is proper to human biological nature. But these sorts of arguments did not have the centrality that they later came to have.

Medieval natural law theory is associated above all with the figure of Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274), who provided one of the most complete influential accounts of this tradition in the medieval period. However, the association of medieval natural law with Aquinas can be misleading, since he attempted to synthesize this tradition with the recently rediscovered moral and political theory of Aristotle. As a result, the Catholic theory of natural law after Aquinas was perhaps less inclined to see the central institutions of society as being problematic and needing paradoxical justification than was the Augustinian natural law tradition of the Middle Ages itself.

Modern Period: After the Reformation and the Enlightenment, the natural law tradition divided into two strands. Under the influence of philosophers such as Thomas Hobbes (d. 1679) and John Locke (d. 1704), it was incorporated into the political thought of the Enlightenment as the basis for the emergent doctrine of universal human rights.

Within the Catholic community, under the influence of the reforms in moral theology and penitential practice mandated by the Council of Trent (1545–63), the natural law was increasingly applied to questions of personal morality, and as a result, its distinctively political character was increasingly obscured. It was during this period that Catholic natural law reasoning took on the characteristics that are most commonly associated with the natural law today. During this period the natural was increasingly contrasted with the unnatural, which was straightforwardly prohibited, rather than with the conventional, which could be ambiguously tolerated. Correlatively, the natural was increasingly equated with the given biological structures of the human species, particularly the structures of the human person, which were then seen as unconditionally normative.

The Natural Law Today: Official magisterial statements still incorporate the understanding of the natural law that emerged within the Catholic community after the Counter-Reformation. However, very few moral theologians today would accept the conception of the natural law just described. It is widely seen as both philosophically untenable, in its assumption that there is an essential human nature that is normative for all times and places, and theologically suspect, in that it seems to leave little room for Scripture and Church tradition in Christian moral reflection.

Nonetheless, almost every Catholic moral theologian would agree that the natural law tradition is essentially valid and important for contemporary moral reflection. This tradition would be understood today as including at least the claim that there is a core of universally binding moral precepts that can be discerned, at least in principle, through human reason unaided by special revelation. The foundations of this invariant core, its content, and its extent are widely debated. See also faith and reason; moral theology.

Bibliography

Carlyle, Sir Robert Warrand, and Alexander James Carlyle. A History of Mediaeval Political Theory in the West. 3d ed. Edinburgh: William Blackwood and Sons, 1923.

d'Entreves, Alessandro P. Natural Law: An Introduction to Legal Philosophy. London: Hutchinson and Company, 1970.

Troeltsch, Ernst. The Social Teachings of the Christian Churches. Trans. Olive Wyon. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1931; reprinted by Westminster/John Knox Press, 1981.

JEAN PORTER

natural rights, those fundamental rights grounded in the dignity of the human person and pertaining therefore to all persons. Human dignity is based on the imago Dei doctrine that the human person is created in the image of God.

Natural rights cannot be revoked legitimately by any governmental or other social power. However, this does not mean that these rights are without limit. For instance, while the right to private property is a natural right, it is limited by concern for the common good.

In addition to the right to private property, the Catholic tradition lists as natural rights the right to life and bodily integrity; the right to work, a just wage, and adequate working conditions; and the right to religious belief, among others. The recognition of both those rights considered to be "civil rights" (for instance, the right to associate) and those considered "economic rights" (for instance, the right to food) means that the Catholic understanding of natural rights encompasses both liberal democratic and socialist understandings. The document that spells out these rights most clearly is Pope John XXIII's encyclical, Pacem in Terris (1963). See also Catholic social teachings; human rights; imago Dei; right to die; right to life.

natural theology, the study of God solely through the use of human reason. Typically, theology relies upon God's revelation for knowledge about God, as in the doctrines of the Trinity and the Incarnation. Natural theology, however, works independently from the content of revelation. Processes observable by any human person, along with human reason, provide the sources for the knowledge of God gained by natural theology.

One of the traditional concerns of natural theology has been to show that human reason unaided by revelation can arrive at the conviction that God exists. Natural theology has offered several proofs for the existence of God. Anselm's (d. 1109) ontological proof, the five ways of Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274), and Cardinal Newman's (d. 1890) moral argument are some of the most famous proofs for God's existence.

Religious and philosophical objections have been raised concerning the possibility of practicing natural theology. The religious objection states that the act of faith is its own justification and that rational demonstration has no place in justifying faith. This position is known as fideism. The philosophical objection, of which Immanuel Kant (d. 1804) is the most prominent representative, argues that human reason is limited to that knowledge which comes from sense experience. This limitation to human knowledge makes any proof that God exists impossible. In opposition to these objections, the First Vatican Council affirmed in 1870 that human reason can know of God's existence with certainty (Dei Filius). See also faith and reason; philosophy and theology; Vatican Council I.

nature (Lat., natura; Gk., physis), that which is basic and unifying in anything existing independently of human action or chance, contrasted to what in it is superficial or transient; also, the total visible creation. Greek philosophers sought to discover the dynamic essential structure of things as the principle of their stability and activities, classifying them into species of elements, compounds, and vegetable and animal organisms, with special interest in the question, "What is the human person?" These became the fundamental questions of science. Theology extends this questioning to ask, "What is the nature of God?"

Because scientific and theological answers to such questions, even when true, are partial and inadequate, some philosophers claim we can never know the natures or essences of things, but only their behaviors, measurements, or appearances. Others denounce "essentialism," i.e., the denial of the reality of activity, change, and process. In fact, activity, change, and process presuppose the relative stability of acting, changing units such as atoms, molecules, and other organisms independent of human thought and manipulation.

When theology speaks of "one divine nature in Three Persons," "Christ's human and divine natures," or "the natural law," these concepts are derived by analogy from our knowledge of material objects, but must not be understood univocally and reductively. God's "nature" is not an "object" but the pure act of absolute personal life, wisdom, and love. Similarly the "nature" of human persons differs from that of nonpersonal objects in its subjectivity (self-consciousness), freedom, and historicity. See also nature and grace. BENEDICT M. ASHLEY nature and grace, a traditional Catholic distinction. It is intended to emphasize that grace (the relationship of friendship with God and the radical transformation of the person that results from that divine love) is totally gratuitous; it is neither owed to human beings, nor is it something we could obtain through our own capacity. In the Scriptures, the basic distinction drawn is not between nature and grace, but rather between persons as graced and persons in sin. Augustine of Hippo (d. 430) uses the terminology of nature and grace in some of his writings, but more frequently he contrasts grace and sin.

Historical Development: The systematic development of the distinction occurred during the Scholastic period when Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) drew on Aristotle's notion of nature to speak of the divinizing power of grace (recipients of grace "become participants of the divine nature"; 2 Pet 1:4). Aristotle explained reality in terms of a system of natures with inbuilt capacities that empower operations to achieve the final end (Gk., telos) of the nature. Because the final end of human nature is union with God, Aquinas concluded that a "renovation" of human nature was necessary in order for human beings to reach their goal. Habitual or sanctifying grace is precisely this new life-principle. It enables human persons to operate at the level of knowing and loving that is beyond their own power through the virtues of faith, hope, and love. By the central Thomistic expression that "grace builds on nature," Aquinas meant that grace transforms human nature so that human persons can participate in the divine nature, yet human nature retains its powers and individuality.

Unfortunately, in later centuries the Thomistic distinction became a clear separation of two orders. To preserve the gratuity of grace, Thomas Cajetan (d. 1534) spoke of "pure nature" with its own finality. In response to the Baianist and Jansenist positions that grace was a necessary completion of humanity, the theological hypothesis of "pure nature" took hold. Grace, while necessary to heal and elevate human nature, was considered totally extrinsic to human nature or experience.

Modern Period: The twentieth-century renewal of biblical and patristic studies enabled theologians to restore the focus of the theology of grace to God's self-communication—the offer of a share in the trinitarian life of love extended to humankind. Henri de Lubac (d. 1991), Karl Rahner (d. 1984), and other Catholic theologians proposed alternative ways of preserving both the inner desire for grace and the sheer gratuity of God's offer. De Lubac stressed that relationships between persons are never "deserved" or "owed," even among human beings. Rahner used the term "supernatural existential" to explain that the offer of grace, located in the depths of every human heart, remains sheer gift. In Rahner's view, "pure nature" remains an important hypothetical concept to remind us that human beings could have been created differently and to protect the gratuity of grace, but it is not, and has never been, the state of any historical human being. Pope Pius XII's encyclical Humani Generis (1950) reaffirmed Catholic teaching on the gratuity of grace.

The return to biblical, relational, historical, and personalist categories of language for grace has offered various new perspectives incorporating distinction and interplay, but the key point remains: relationship with God is sheer gift, not something "owed" to human beings. See also grace; supernatural. MARY C. HILKERT nave (Lat., navis, "ship"), ecclesiastical architectural term referring to the space between the church entrance and the sanctuary; this space includes the main aisle and the space for congregants to sit or stand. Typically, the supporting pillars distinguish the nave from the side aisles.

Nazarene, a designation for Jesus. The NT uses two related Greek forms, Nazarenos (Mark, Luke) and Nazoraios (Matthew, Luke, John, Acts). Both probably identify Jesus as a resident of Nazareth, although the latter may relate Jesus to a Jewish sect. The term came to be used of early Christians as well (Acts 24:5).

Nazareth, a village in Galilee. Nazareth was a small village to the north of the Jezreel Valley (the Plain of Esdraelon) near Sepphoris, an important provincial center. The NT records that it was Jesus' home as a youth (Matt 2:23; 4:13; Mark 1:9; Luke 4:16).

Nazism, German fascism under Adolf Hitler, from 1933 until 1945. A combination of differing ideologies, Nazism was held together by its core of anti-Semitic racism and by the adulation of Hitler, who took over the National Socialist party after World War I, but experienced little or no political success until the worldwide depression of the 1930s. Named chancellor in January of 1933, Hitler was able to achieve dictatorial powers partly because of the Catholic Center party, which supported the Enabling Act of April 1933, giving Hitler emergency powers. The Catholic Center party thought its support would have a moderating influence on his future actions. On July 8, three days after the dissolution of the Catholic Center party, a Concordat was signed between Germany and the Vatican that was to have protected the Church's rights under Fascism but failed to do so. Almost four years later Pope Pius XI issued an encyclical letter Mit brennender Sorge in which he scathingly denounced Nazism as racist, neo-pagan, and anti-Christian. See also Fascism; Germany, Catholicism in.

negative way, an approach to theology that emphasizes that all language about God is radically inadequate. Because God is revealed in creation and in human experience, it is possible to speak of God using human categories such as "goodness." However, God transcends all such concepts. Therefore, the path to a deeper knowledge of God is one of "negation," whereby one denies that any name, affirmation, or image is God. Historically, this approach originates in elements of Neoplatonist philosophy adopted by the sixth-century theologian known as Denys the Areopagite, who had considerable influence on both Eastern and Western Christianity. See also Denys the Areopagite; language, religious; mysticism; Neoplatonism.

neophyte (Gk., neophutos, "new growth, new convert"), the newly baptized. As a baptismal term, it dates back to third- and fourth-century Greek Christian usage (the Latin churches spoke of infantes; see 1 Pet 2:2). It has recently been recovered by the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (1972). See also Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults.

Neoplatonism, a philosophical school beginning with Plotinus (205–70) that was the dominant philosophical trend in late antiquity, shaping the thought of Christian and pagan alike. Plotinus regarded himself as an interpreter and systematizer of Plato, drawing out what was implied or "veiled" in Plato's thought and reconciling contradictions. To this end Plotinus drew heavily upon his wide reading in the philosophical tradition, freely using Aristotelian, middle-Platonic, and Stoic thinkers, many of whom had themselves commented on Plato. In addition, he incorporated traditional religious elements, so that his "Platonism" was highly syncretistic, in some ways a summation of classical ideals, and thus of widespread appeal.

Plotinus's Enneads describes a system focused on three hypostases (substances): the One, fount of all being but itself beyond being and predication; Mind, emanating eternally from the One as its image, containing the eternal ideas on which the sensible universe is modeled; and World-Soul, which penetrates and enlivens the sensible world on the basis of the rational principles it receives in its generation from Mind. Against the Gnostics, Plotinus taught that the sensible universe is not evil. Evil is equivalent to nonbeing, but even matter, in itself a kind of nonbeing and therefore evil, participates in the form, beauty, and intelligibility of the whole universe. Thus consideration of even the sensible world can direct the soul to the contemplation of Mind and, ultimately, beyond speech and thought, of the One.

Plotinus's successors Porphyry (ca. 232–ca. 305, biographer of Plotinus), Iamblichus (ca. 250–330, who strongly influenced the emperor Julian), and Proclus (410–85, most famous for his Platonic Theology) extended and even further enlarged the syncretism of Plotinus, especially in a religious direction. The thought of Church Fathers from the Cappadocians and Pseudo-Dionysius in the East to Augustine and Boethius in the West turned Neoplatonic themes to Christian use and served to transmit a Christian/Neoplatonic synthesis to the Middle Ages. See also Plato; Plotinus. JOHN C. CAVADINI neo-Scholasticism, a term used for the revival, from 1860 to 1960, of the philosophical tradition of the medieval and baroque universities. After the rise of the Enlightenment, Catholic theology found difficulty in using the empiricist and idealist philosophies to express orthodox theological concepts. By 1850 some were suggesting that a return to the "Scholastic" tradition of the older Catholic universities might be the best solution. This received papal approbation in Leo XIII's encyclical Aeterni Patris (1879), which held up the "Christian philosophy" of Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) as the best model of a philosophia perennis (Lat., "perennial philosophy") for all Catholic education but urged that it be freed of obsolescent elements and that it assimilate the best of modern thought.

Catholic schools were quick to accept forms of neo-Scholasticism, but two difficulties remained: (1) the need for historical research and analysis to understand the authentic thought of Aquinas and the other great Scholastics; and (2) the discovery of the proper way to assimilate modern thought without distortion of the old. The period from 1870 to Vatican II (1962–65) made progress in these two areas, but resulted in a wide spectrum of interpretation of what an authentic and creative Thomism might be, ranging from the "existential Thomism" of Jacques Maritain (d. 1973) and the "historical Thomism" of Etienne Gilson (d. 1978) to the "traditional Thomism" of Reginald Garrigou-Lagrange (d. 1964) and the "transcendental Thomism" of Joseph Marechal (d. 1944) and Bernard Lonergan (d. 1984). These differences centered on how or whether the "turn to the subject" that underlies modern philosophy since Descartes (d. 1650) can be reconciled with the Aristotelian epistemology of Aquinas. Differing explanations of the relation of the modern empirical sciences to metaphysics contributed to this spectrum of interpretations.

The enforced teaching of what were often eclectic or grossly oversimplified versions of Thomism led to a reaction favoring a "return to patristic thought" or adaptations to contemporary pragmatism, existentialism, phenomenology, process philosophy, Marxism, or hermeneutic and analytic philosophy. Vatican II opened the door to better solutions.

By the time of the council the weaknesses of neo-Scholasticism were generally recognized by Catholic theologians: its lack of historical perspective and the eclectic confusion of Thomism with the alien doctrines of Francisco de Suarez (d. 1617), Duns Scotus (d. 1308), René Descartes (d. 1650), G. W. Leibniz (d. 1716), Immanuel Kant (d. 1804), and idealism; its failure to deal adequately with the findings of modern science and to recognize human historicity and subjectivity; and its teaching methods that tended to conceptualism, while neglecting to ground principles and definitions in experience.

On the other hand, neo-Scholasticism did provide Catholic theology with a common philosophical language that facilitated teaching and dialogue; it offered clarity in definition and argumentation; and it provided some metaphysical grounding for those natural truths that prepare for Christian faith, namely, the existence of God, the spirituality of the human soul, and the natural moral law.

In the end, however, the documents of Vatican II largely avoided dependence on technical neo-Scholastic terminology and argumentation, even though the Decree on Priestly Formation (1965) continues to recommend the philosophia perennis (n. 15) and the guidance of Aquinas in systematic theology (n. 16). See also philosophy and theology; Scholasticism; theology; Thomism. BENEDICT M. ASHLEY neo-Thomism, the various interpretations of the thought of Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) intended to enable it to assimilate the best of modern thought. Neo-Thomism developed after 1860, and especially after Pope Leo XIII's 1879 encyclical Aeterni Patris. The movement was particularly strong in France during the first half of the twentieth century. See also Thomism.

Nepomucen, St. John. See John Nepomucen, St.

Nereus, St. (nay'ray-uhs), Roman martyr of unknown date whose commemoration is linked with St. Achilleus. Feast day: May 12.

Neri, St. Philip. See Philip Neri, St.

Nestorianism, the heretical belief that there were two separate persons in Christ, one divine and the other human, in contrast to the orthodox teaching that in Christ there is only one divine Person.

Nestorius (d. ca. 451) was bishop of Constantinople from 428 to 431. His pastoral zeal for orthodoxy led him to reject both Arianism and Apollinarianism, according to which the one Person (Christ) had only one nature (the divine). In contrast, Nestorius insisted that Christ had two natures (human and divine) that were always distinct but conjoined in a metaphysically unique manner. His affirmation agreed with the eventual orthodox position that the two natures of Christ were not synthesized or (con)fused in his one Person, but disagreed with it in that it denied the hypostatic union of the two natures in the one divine Person.

Three implications of Nestorius's Christology led to its denunciation prior to, and at, the Council of Ephesus (431). The first had to do with salvation: If the human nature of Christ is metaphysically unique, then it is not the same as humanity, and hence has no capacity to save humanity. The second implication had to do with the Eucharist: If Christ is not consubstantially divine and human, then there is no way in which the physical elements in Holy Communion can impart spiritual life to humans. Finally, the third implication had to do with Mary: If Christ's two natures were conjoined in a metaphysically unique manner, then Mary could not have been Theotokos (Gk., "God-bearer") since by definition the "borne" cannot be metaphysically different from the "bearer." This third consequence precipitated the charges against Nestorius that led to his removal from the see of Constantinople. See also Apollinarianism; Arianism; Chalcedon, Council of; Christology; Ephesus, Council of; hypostatic union; Theotokos. KERN R. TREMBATH

Nestorius, d. ca. 451, heretical bishop of Constantinople (428–31). He was an Antiochene monk who possibly had studied under Theodore of Mopsuestia. Theodosius II, prompted by his reputation as a preacher, appointed him to the see of Constantinople in 428. Declaring himself a defender of orthodoxy, he opposed the use of Theotokos (Gk.), "God-bearer," for Mary, which sparked a violent controversy not only because of the Christological implications, but also because of the growing devotion to the Virgin. Cyril of Alexandria and the Egyptian monks sided against Nestorius. His teaching was condemned in 430 by a Roman synod and in 431 by the Council of Ephesus. He was deposed and sent back to the monastery at Antioch from which he was later exiled. In 435 his writings were condemned, so few fragments of his letters and sermons survive. However, one of his writings, the Bazaar of Heracleides, discovered in 1895, has prompted some reevaluation of Nestorius's claim to orthodoxy. See also Antioch; Christology; Cyril of Alexandria, St.; Ephesus, Council of; Nestorianism; Theotokos.

Ne Temere (nay tem-air'ay; Lat., "Do not fear"), papal decree issued in 1908 by Pope Pius X requiring all Roman Catholics to marry before a properly authorized priest and two witnesses.

Netherlands, Catholicism in the. Christian presence in what is now the Netherlands dates to Roman times (ca. sixth century), when the Rhine was the northern boundary of the empire. Irish monks (Willibrord, d. 739, and Boniface, d. 754) evangelized the north. Willibrord became bishop of Utrecht in 695, and it was the only bishopric until modern times. In the ninth century Normans sacked cities and ejected the clergy. During the Middle Ages monastic life flourished, preserving Christian culture.

The Reformation had a profound effect on Holland. William of Orange's overthrow of Spanish rule brought the rejection of Catholicism in the north and gradual acceptance of Calvin's doctrine. Catholic churches became Dutch Reformed; statues were destroyed and frescoes painted over. Catholics practiced their faith in hiding. The southern provinces remained overwhelmingly Catholic, but the Netherlands was considered a Protestant country, both by its own government and by Rome. It lost its hierarchy in 1580 and was administered by the Vatican office of the Propagation of the Faith until 1853. From 1583 until 1795 the Catholic Church was subjected to severe penal restrictions. In 1702 a minority of Catholics associated with Jansenism, a French movement that stressed human sinfulness and imposed a rigorous moral code, were censored by Rome and later formed the Church of Utrecht (also known as Old Catholics) in 1724. By 1853 the self-emancipation of Dutch Catholics had begun in earnest, by means of a Catholic press, schools, and political life.

Before World War II nearly 40 percent of the Dutch population was Catholic. With Vatican II a period of renewal began, especially in catechetics, ecumenism, and pastoral methodology. The National Pastoral Council's proposal of a married priesthood was unacceptable to Rome. Appointments of very conservative bishops since the 1970s, intended to overcome divisions, served instead to exacerbate the situation. A synod of the Dutch bishops, held in the Vatican in 1980, was unsuccessful in resolving the problem of polarization. A once flourishing Catholic Church declined under the weight of pastoral demoralization and frustration.

In 1993 there are over 5.5 million Catholics in the Netherlands, or under 37 percent of the total population. There are six dioceses and one archdiocese. See also Alfrink, Bernard Jan; Old Catholics.

JACINTA VAN WINKEL

Network, national Catholic lobby to promote social justice legislation in the United States. Founded in 1971 by forty-seven women religious, it is a nonprofit membership organization of women and men that seeks just access to economic resources, fairness in national funding for the poor and others in need, and justice in global relationships. Beyond lobbying, it provides print and electronic resources and organizes educational programs and internships.

Neumann, St. John Nepomucene, 1811–60, U.S. bishop. Born in Bohemia and educated at Prague's Charles-Ferdinand University, he was ordained a priest for the diocese of New York in 1836. After ministering in western New York, he joined the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer (Redemptorists) in 1842 and served in his order's churches in Baltimore and Pittsburgh. Appointed bishop of Philadelphia in 1852, he presided over the diocese's rapid development. He had gained admiration for his humility and saintliness by the time of his death. He was beatified in 1963 and canonized in 1977. Feast day: January 5.

New American Bible. See Bible, English translations of the.

New Jerusalem Bible. See Bible, English translations of the.

Newman, John Henry, 1801–90, English cardinal, Catholic and Anglican apologist, and man of letters. Born in London and raised with Bible religion, Newman experienced conversion at age fifteen: luminous awareness of himself and God, impressions of creed and dogma, and a calling to single life. He studied classics and mathematics at Trinity College, Oxford, there developing his evangelical beliefs along Calvinist lines. Ordained an Anglican priest, he became vicar of the university church, St. Mary the Virgin. Fellow and tutor of Oriel College, Oxford, he was influenced by rationalist scholars whose methods included logic and evidences to prove religious matters. Patristic studies, Joseph Butler's Analogy of Religion, friendships, illness, and his sister's death gradually separated him from the liberal leanings of Oriel, centering him in high church or Anglo-Catholic tradition. In 1832 he published The Arians of the Fourth Century and, on a Mediterranean voyage, wrote many religious poems (Lyra Apostolica). Recovering from a grave illness in Sicily, he returned to England to become leader of the Oxford movement.

Religious Odyssey: From 1833 to 1841, Newman defended the Via Media of the Anglican

Cardinal John Henry Newman, one of the great Catholic thinkers of the nineteenth century; he was largely responsible for the renewal of interest in the writings of the Fathers of the Church and for a deeper appreciation of the role of the laity in the development of doctrine.

Communion. The far-reaching "Tracts for the Times against Popery and Dissent" were complemented by his Parochial and Plain Sermons delivered at St. Mary's. He published Lectures on the Prophetical Office viewed relatively to Romanism and Popular Protestantism, and became editor of the movement's journal, The British Critic. His and the movement's last tract, the ninetieth, proposing a Catholic reading of the "Thirty-nine Articles," was denounced by church and university. This blow, other disappointments and doubts, and further study of the early Church resulted in Newman's resignation from his position and clerical status. After years of intellectual and spiritual struggle, Newman became a Catholic in 1845 while completing An Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine, which showed continuity from the Church of antiquity to the Catholic Church of the nineteenth century.

Newman went to Rome to study theology for Catholic priesthood, entered and brought to England the Oratory of St. Philip Neri, published two novels of conversion, Loss and Gain (1848) and Callista (1855), and two volumes on ecumenical relations in England, Lectures on Certain Difficulties felt by Anglicans in submitting to the Catholic Church (1850) and Lectures on the Present Position of Catholics in England (1851).

From 1851 to 1858, Newman founded and presided over the Catholic University of Ireland, justifying Catholic liberal education in The Idea of a University. In 1859 he founded the Birmingham Oratory School for boys, became editor of The Rambler, and published "On Consulting the Faithful in Matters of Doctrine" (1859). He was reported to Rome for it and asked to resign the editorship.

Newman's Reemergence: After four years of relative silence, Newman was aroused by Charles Kingsley's published accusation that Newman and the Roman Catholic clergy were indifferent to truth and cultivated deception. Newman responded with the Apologia pro Vita Sua (1864), disclosing the history of his religious opinions from childhood and magnificently defending both reason and authority. Enthusiastic response from Anglicans and Catholics reinstated Newman in the public mind. In 1865 he published "The Dream of Gerontius," a long poem about immediate life after death, and "Letter to Pusey" on Marian devotion. His most philosophical work, An Essay in Aid of a Grammar of Assent (1870), aimed at justifying religious faith by describing how ordinary minds reach certitude.

Newman declined the invitation by bishops and pope to serve as theological consultant for the First Vatican Council. As a Catholic, he believed in papal infallibility but opposed its conciliar definition, saying the Church was not yet ready and episcopal intrigue for the doctrine was too dominant. His "Letter to the Duke of Norfolk" (1875) defended both the doctrine of infallibility and the freedom of the Catholic conscience. His last major contribution to ecclesiology was the 1877 preface to The Prophetical Office, now retitled The Via Media, in which he detailed the Church's three offices and their interrelations: the prophetic, exercised by theologians; the priestly, by laity; the governing, by pope and bishops.

In 1878 Newman became first honorary fellow of Trinity College, Oxford. In 1879 Pope Leo XIII made him cardinal and, in accepting, Newman singled out as his lifelong work the battle against the usurpations of reason in matters of religion. After physical decline, Newman died in 1890. Newman's Letters and Diaries (posthumously published from 1961 to 1984), when complete, will comprise thirty-one of his nearly eighty published volumes.

Thought and Spirituality: A thinker of great assimilative power, originality, and genius, Newman is one of the foremost stylists of the English language. His writings are rich in psychological subtlety, illustration, and satire. He was interested in the personal character of all mental acts; the influence of mind upon mind; the sacred duty of developing one's gifts; and liberal education as the cultivation of the healthy mind.

Newman's spirituality emphasized conscience as the connecting principle between self and God, the Holy Spirit's indwelling in individuals and Church, the gospel "Image of Christ," God's particular providence, devotion to Mary and the saints, and patience. He celebrated the reality of the invisible world, the sacramentality of the visible world, the holiness of everyday life in consistent fulfillment of one's duties, through friendship and personal influence, not so much by words as by actions.

Newman's thought had significant influence on the Second Vatican Council, particularly his ecclesiology, ecumenism, theory of doctrinal development, defense of conscience, and theology of the laity. Pope John Paul II declared him "venerable" in 1991. See also Anglicanism; Anglo-Catholicism; doctrine, development of; Oxford movement; sensus fidelium.

Bibliography

Bouyer, Louis. Newman: His Life and Spirituality. London: Burns & Oats, 1958.

Lash, Nicholas. Newman on Development: The Search for an Explanation in History. Shepherdstown, WV: Patmos Press, 1975.

Newman, John Henry. Newman the Theologian: A Reader. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1990.

MARY KATHERINE TILLMAN

Newman movement, the network of organizations for Catholic students on secular college and university campuses. Committed to providing pastoral care and religious education for Catholic students, the Newman movement also represents Catholicism to the wider university community. The first Newman club, named in honor of John Henry Newman (d. 1890), was formed at the University of Pennsylvania in 1893, with similar organizations soon developing at other schools. Chaplains were appointed by and responsible to local bishops and received minimal national coordination. Many bishops feared that too much Catholic religious activity at non-Catholic schools would encourage Catholics to attend them, to the disadvantage of Catholic colleges. This attitude changed gradually, and in 1962 Newman clubs were recognized as part of the Church's national educational effort. A federation of Newman clubs was formed in 1915, and today it is part of the United States Catholic Conference.

New Testament. See Bible.

New Testament theology, a branch of biblical theology that attempts to describe historically and to synthesize what the NT says about God and God's relation to humanity. An important contribution of New Testament theology has been the production of numerous biblical dictionaries that describe the literary heritage, historical background, and contextual meaning of fundamental NT concepts, e.g., justification, redemption, grace. In the 1950s German Protestant scholars, especially Joachim Jeremias and W. G. Kümmel, proposed synthetic NT theologies, organized around the teaching of Jesus or the religious perspective of particular authors (especially Paul and John). Rudolf Bultmann (d. 1976) produced the most influential work, Theology of the New Testament. Bultmann first described the evolving faith and practice of the early Church and then argued that this faith came to its most authentic expression in the Pauline teaching on the justification of the sinner through grace by faith. He then interpreted this in terms of existentialist philosophy as the move from unauthentic to authentic existence. Despite justifiable criticisms, Bultmann's work remains a model for the proper method of NT theology: solid exegesis of the text, awareness of the historical setting and development of NT traditions, a conscious and philosophically grounded theory of interpretation, and sensitivity to the religious questions of a given age. Within the last two decades NT theology has turned away from synthesis and concentrated on individual NT traditions (e.g., the theology of Q) and on particular Bible books, especially those previously considered to be the least theological, e.g., the synoptic Gospels. See also biblical theology.

JOHN R. DONAHUE

New Theology. See Nouvelle Théologie.

New Zealand, Catholicism in. Catholics have composed about 15 percent of the total population of New Zealand throughout most of its pakeha (Maori, "white") history. Early missionaries were French, usually Marist Fathers, yet the Church quickly took on an Irish tone. The first bishop, Jean Baptiste Pompallier, arrived in 1838. The dioceses of Auckland and Wellington were formally established in 1860, followed by Dunedin in 1869 and by Christchurch in 1887. Missions to indigenous Maoris, first in rural areas and later in cities, were given high priority. Marist and Mill Hill priests specialized in this apostolate. From the last quarter of the nineteenth century, the principal pastoral strategy was to build the parish school. Each parish supported its own school, which aimed to find a place in the classroom for every Catholic child. Schools were staffed by religious, principally women, so that women religious made up some three-quarters of total church professionals. Lay teachers now staff the schools, which are integrated into the national system. There is also a strong tradition of Catholic hospitals and social services. Most Catholics were working class and supported the Labour party. The first Labour government (1935) was headed by a Catholic, Michael Savage. In recent years, this traditional political alignment has diminished as Catholics entered the middle class. A Jocist (Young Christian Workers) movement, founded in Belgium in 1925 and begun in New Zealand in the 1940s, provided lay leadership to the post–Vatican II Church, as the sense of the Church as a clerically led parallel society faded. The best-known New Zealand Catholic of modern times is James K. Baxter, poet and civil dissident. In the 1990s Catholics constitute 15 percent of the total population of more than 3.5 million.

EDMUND CAMPION

Nicaea, First Council of, the first ecumenical or universal council of the Church. It met from late May until late August, A.D. 325, in the city of Nicaea, located in modern-day Turkey, and defined orthodox trinitarian belief.

The council was convened by the emperor, Constantine, to resolve several controversies, the chief of which was the controversy created by the presbyter (priest) Arius. Arius taught that the Son is not God in the same way as the Father is God. To be divine means above all to be unoriginated, or to have no origin. The Son and the Father could not both be unoriginated, since there is only one God. Thus, only the Father is unoriginated and truly God; the Son originates from the Father. Although the Son exceeds all other creatures in perfection, nevertheless, the Son has the status of a creature in relation to the Father.

Excommunicated in 320 from his home diocese of Alexandria by a synod of Egyptian and Libyan bishops, Arius traveled to Syria and Palestine and found support from Eusebius of Caesarea and Eusebius of Nicomedia, who helped promote Arius's teaching.

Estimates of the number of bishops who attended the council range from 228 to 318. The number 318, mentioned by Ambrose and Hilary of Poitiers, is thought to symbolize the 318 servants of Abraham mentioned in Gen 14:14 and not to represent the actual number of participants. Among those in attendance was the deacon Athanasius, the future bishop of Alexandria and a leading anti-Arian spokesperson. No official minutes of the council were kept. Knowledge of the proceedings comes from later writings of three conciliar participants, Eustathius of Antioch, Athanasius, and Eusebius of Caesarea.

To make its opposition to Arianism explicit, the council formulated a creed containing expressly anti-Arian elements, followed by a series of Arian beliefs to which those who subscribed were declared anathema. Specifically, the council in the creed declared the Son "from the substance of the Father," and "begotten not made," "of one substance with the Father" (Gk., homoousios). With these phrases, and especially with the term homoousios, the council stipulated the proper interpretation of the Son's divinity. The Son is truly God, just as the Father is truly God.

In addition to the Arian controversy, the council decided against the practice of celebrating Easter on the date of the Jewish Passover, as was the custom of certain Eastern churches. Twenty canons (rules) resolving questions of specific Church practices were also passed. Several canons concerned the status within the Church of Christians who had lapsed during persecutions. Others provided regulations related to clerical life and practice. Three canons outlined the selection procedures for future bishops, as a response to the practices of the schismatic bishop, Melitius, who had ordained bishops without consulting his fellow bishops.

At the council's conclusion, two bishops, Secundus of Ptolemais and Theonas of Marmarica, refused to sign the council's creed and, along with Arius, were banished to Illyricum. Controversy over the use of homoousios in the creed continued until the Council of Constantinople (381).

The creed of Nicaea was expanded into the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed that is today recited by the congregation at Mass. See also Arianism; homoousios; Jesus Christ; Nicene Creed.

ANTHONY W. KEATY

Nicaea, Second Council of, seventh ecumenical council of the Church. Convened in 787, it restored the practice of icon veneration and affirmed belief in the value of intercession by saints. The Byzantine empress, Irene, in the name of her young son, Constantine VI, convened the council with the support of Pope Hadrian I. Political disturbance forced a change of location from Constantinople to Nicaea where three hundred bishops deliberated for three weeks (eight sessions), from September to October 787. Although opposed by the Frankish king, Charlemagne, the Western Church recognized the acts of the Second Council of Nicaea on January 26, 880. This was the last ecumenical council to be recognized by the Eastern Church. See also ecumenical council; iconoclasm.

Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed. See Nicene Creed.

Nicene Creed, also known as the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed, a statement of Christian belief, originally formulated by the Council of Nicaea in 325 and later affirmed, with modifications, by the Council of Constantinople in 381. The Council of Nicaea was called, in part, to end the controversy created by Arianism. The gathered bishops produced the Nicene Creed to insure unity in fundamental beliefs. The creed consists of three sections—one section for each Person of the Trinity—and concludes with four statements contradicting the central tenets of Arianism. The council based the creed upon an already existing baptismal formula. Traditionally ascribed to Eusebius's church at Caesarea, scholars are unsure as to the precise origins of the baptismal formula.

In composing the Nicene Creed, the bishops made two significant insertions into the text of the baptismal formula, namely: "that is, from the substance of the Father" and "true God from true God, begotten not made, of one substance with the Father." These two insertions make clear that the Son is equal in status with the Father, since the Son is of the same substance as the Father. Not intended to replace local baptismal formulas, the creed was a test of orthodoxy for bishops.

This creed issued at the Council of Nicaea is not the creed that is popularly known as the Nicene Creed. What is commonly called the Nicene Creed is the creed affirmed by the Council of Constantinople in 381 and called the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed. Traditionally thought to have been based upon the creed issued at Nicaea, the creed affirmed at Constantinople is now thought to have been derived from a baptismal formula used by the church in Antioch or Jerusalem. Longer than the creed issued at Nicaea, the creed of Constantinople includes a fuller treatment of the Holy Spirit by affirming the divine status of the Holy Spirit, which certain Christian groups called Pneumatomachoi denied. The identification of the creed of Constantinople with that of Nicaea occurred at the Council of Chalcedon (451), where the bishops understood the Council of Constantinople as essentially affirming the faith of Nicaea with an expanded teaching on the Holy Spirit.

The creed of Constantinople was incorporated into baptismal and eucharistic liturgies. By the sixth century, the creed affirmed at Constantinople had become the baptismal creed used in the Eastern churches. In the sixth century, Rome began using the Constantinople version for its baptismal creed, with other Western churches soon adopting this practice. During the Middle Ages, the creed from Constantinople was eventually displaced as a baptismal creed by the Apostle's Creed. The Constantinople version was incorporated into the eucharistic liturgies in the East soon after the Council of Chalcedon and was made official by an ordinance of the emperor Justin II in 568. In the West, the third council of Toledo (589) in Spain introduced the practice of reciting the Constantinople creed at the Eucharist. Rome eventually adopted the practice in the eleventh century. The Latin text of the creed used in the West added the phrase, "and the Son" (Lat., Filioque), so that the creed read that the Holy Spirit "proceeds from the Father and the Son." The Eastern churches maintained the more primitive practice, refusing to add "and the Son." This difference in creeds became a major source of tension between the Eastern and Western churches. See also Arianism; Constantinople, councils of; creeds; Filioque; Jesus Christ; Nicaea, First Council of. ANTHONY W. KEATY

NICENE CREED

We believe in one God,
the Father, the Almighty,
maker of heaven and earth,
of all that is seen and unseen.
We believe in one Lord, Jesus Christ,
the only Son of God,
eternally begotten of the Father,
God from God, Light from Light,
true God from true God,
begotten, not made, one in Being with the Father.
Through him all things were made.
For us men and for our salvation
he came down from heaven:
by the power of the Holy Spirit
he was born of the Virgin Mary, and became man.
For our sake he was crucified under Pontius Pilate;
he suffered, died, and was buried.
On the third day he rose again in fulfillment of the Scriptures;
he ascended into heaven and is seated at the right hand of the Father.
He will come again in glory to judge the living and the dead, and his kingdom will have no end.
We believe in the Holy Spirit, the Lord, the giver of life, who proceeds from the Father and the Son.
With the Father and the Son he is worshiped and glorified.
He has spoken through the prophets.
We believe in one holy catholic and apostolic Church.
We acknowledge one baptism for the forgiveness of sins.
We look for the resurrection of the dead, and the life of the world to come. Amen.

Nicholas I, St., d. 867, pope from 858 to 867. Nicholas was elected pope the same year that the legitimate patriarch of Constantinople, Ignatius, was deposed in favor of Photius. The resulting controversy was one of several that preoccupied Nicholas. In a noted pastoral letter to the Bulgar khan, he tried to bring the newly Christianized Bulgars into allegiance to Rome. Feast day: November 13. See also Photius.

Nicholas of Cusa, 1401–64, German theologian, mathematician, and reformer. Following a successful ecclesiastical and academic career, he was made a cardinal in 1448. Best known for his negative approach to God as expounded in On Learned Ignorance, Nicholas made substantial contributions to mathematics, science, philosophy, and Church reform.

Nicholas of Lyra, ca. 1270–1349, Franciscan master of theology at Paris and influential biblical commentator. Renowned for his knowledge of Hebrew, Lyra drew extensively from rabbinic exegetes, especially Rashi. He glossed the entire Scriptures according to the literal sense in his Postilla Litteralis, insisting with earlier Scholastics that in argument only the literal sense can be used. He also wrote a much shorter spiritualizing gloss, Postilla Moralis, for devotional and pastoral use, which similarly proved popular in the later Middle Ages. See also Scripture, senses of.

Nicholas of Myra, St., d. ca. 350, patron saint of sailors and children, as well as of Greece, Sicily, and Russia, and bishop from whom the Santa Claus tradition developed. Born somewhere in Asia Minor, he became bishop of Myra, where he was famous for his holiness and pastoral zeal. He was imprisoned during the persecution of the emperor Diocletian and was alleged to have been present at the Council of Nicaea (325), but his name appears on none of the lists. Legends developed around him after his death, and his popularity in the West increased greatly when his relics were brought to Italy in 1087 and his shrine at Bari became one of the great pilgrimage centers of all Europe. Stories of his miracles led to the practice of gift giving in his name at Christmas and to the change of his name, St. Nicholas, into Sint Klaes by the Dutch and then to Santa Claus. Feast day: December 6. See also Christmas; Santa Claus.

Nicholas of Tolentino, St., 1245–1305, Augustinian friar and patron saint of mariners. Born in Italy, he was an exceedingly popular preacher and confessor and was especially devoted to the sick and the poor. He is depicted in paintings by Raphael and others, often with a basket of bread, called St. Nicholas's Bread, that was distributed to the sick or to women in labor. Feast day: September 10.

Nicodemus (nik-oh-dee'muhs), a Pharisaic leader sympathetic to Jesus. In the Fourth Gospel, Nicodemus is instructed about entry into the kingdom (John 3), protests that one accused must have an opportunity to respond (John 7:50–51), and participates in Jesus' burial (John 19:39). The fourth-century Gospel of Nicodemus recounts Jesus' harrowing of hell.

Nietzsche, Friedrich (nee'chee), 1844–1900, German philosopher. The son of a Lutheran pastor, Nietzsche was appointed to the chair of classical philosophy at the University of Basel when only twenty-four. He became an intimate associate of Richard Wagner, with whom he later broke violently, and through him was introduced to the pessimistic philosophy of Arthur Schopenhauer. After teaching at Basel for ten years (1869–79), he resigned because of increasingly ill health. For the next ten years he traveled in Germany, Italy, and Switzerland, always alone and incessantly writing. In 1889 he collapsed into madness from which he never recovered.

Nietzsche is both one of the most insightful critics of modernity and one of the most influential opponents of religious belief. An acute analyst of psychological motivation, he attempted to trace "the genealogy of morals," demonstrating that morality is an attempt by the powerless to control the creative energies of the powerful. He attacked bourgeois European and especially German society of his time as controlled by a "slave morality" based in the "resentment" of the weak for the strong. His proclamation that "God is dead" was intended to force his contemporaries to realize that disbelief in Christian doctrine inevitably undermines the Christian ethic. Most humans, he argued, find it impossible to live with the impersonality and indifference of a Godless world; thus, one must become "superhuman." His principal works are The Gay Science (1882), Thus Spake Zarathustra (1883–85), Beyond Good and Evil (1886), The Genealogy of Morals (1887), and The Anti-Christ (1888). See also faith and reason; Modernism; philosophy and theology. MICHAEL J. HIMES nihilism (ni'uhl-iz-uhm; Lat., nihil, "nothing"), a philosophical position that denies the meaningfulness of morality and human existence. Nihilists maintain that moral decisions cannot be justified by rational argument but result from emotion or social pressure. Existentially, nihilists despair over life's emptiness. See also despair; hope.

Night Prayer. See Compline.

nihil obstat (nee'hil ahb'staht; Lat., "Nothing stands in the way"), term indicating approval for given process to proceed. It is often used for the approval given to a book by a censor prior to a bishop's granting of an imprimatur (Lat., "It may be printed"). See also imprimatur; imprimi potest.

nimbus. See halo.

Noah, a figure of primordial history. According to Gen 5:28–9:29, God preserved the righteous Noah, son of Lamech, from the Flood. The NT recalls that event (Matt 24:37–38; Luke 17:27–28) and remembers Noah as righteous and faithful (2 Pet 2:5; Heb 11:7). His preservation foreshadowed baptism (1 Pet 3:20).

Nobili, Robert de. See de Nobili, Robert.

Noble Guards, aristocratic bodyguards of the pope, founded in 1801. They were distinguished by their plumed helmets and military dress. Made up of seventy-seven men of the Roman nobility, the corps was dissolved by Pope Paul VI in 1970. They are not to be confused with the Swiss Guards, founded in 1505, who still serve the pope. See also Swiss Guard.

Nocturn (nok'tuhrn; Lat., nocturnus, "by night"), the first service in the Liturgy of the Hours, formerly called Matins. Nocturn is prayed in monasteries at the beginning of the new day between midnight and daybreak, at times divided into first and second Nocturns at two intervals through the night. The term may also be used, although precariously, in reference to one or the other of two readings in the Office of Readings, the first from Scripture, the second from the Fathers of the Church, ecclesiastical writers, or lives of the saints. See also Liturgy of the Hours.

Noetus, a native of Smyrna condemned ca. 200 by a local synod of presbyters. He taught the earliest form of the antitrinitarian Monarchianism, i.e., that there is only "one ruler" in God. See also Monarchianism.

Nolasco, St. Peter, ca. 1189–1258, French-born founder in 1218 of the Mercedarians (Order of Our Lady of Mercy) in Spain, an order dedicated originally to offering its own members in exchange for slaves, and later, to helping the sick and the imprisoned. Feast day: January 31. See also Mercedarians.

nominalism, a philosophical theory developed in the fourteenth century that denies the existence of universal concepts and principles apart from the human mind. For example, resemblance among human beings does not mean they share a common human nature. Nominalists hold that only individual things, like particular human beings, actually exist.

Nominalism had its most profound effect on moral theology. If there are no universal moral principles rooted in human nature, all that remains are individual laws and rules created by the absolutely free (and perhaps arbitrary) will of God. Morality, therefore, is simply conformity to the will of God as expressed in commands.

The most famous nominalist was the Franciscan friar William of Ockham (ca. 1285–1349), whose nominalist school opposed traditional Thomism. See also legalism; moral theology.

nonconformism. See Free churches.

nonconsummation of marriage. See consummated marriage.

None (nohn; Lat., nona hora, "ninth hour"), the last of the three daytime hours of prayer, or minor hours, in the Liturgy of the Hours. It is now called Midafternoon Prayer. None marks the ninth hour from dawn, or 3 P.M., when 6 A.M. is considered the first hour. None is preceded by Terce, the third (Lat., tertia) hour, at approximately 9 A.M., now known as Midmorning Prayer, which is followed by Sext, the sixth (sexta) hour, around noon. Sext is known now as Midday Prayer. See also Liturgy of the Hours.

Norbert, St., ca. 1080–1134, founder of the Premonstratensians (Norbertines) and archbishop of Magdeburg from 1126. Ordained a priest in 1115, Norbert was famed for his preaching, and in 1121

he and his followers founded the Canons Regular of Prémontré. Feast day: June 6. See also Norbertines.

Norbertines, known also as the Order of the Canons Regular of Prémontré (O. Praem.), Premonstratensians, and as White Canons (from the color of their habit), an order founded by St. Norbert in 1120 at Prémontré near Loan, France. It adopted the Rule of St. Augustine with variations. Norbert was a friend of Bernard of Clairvaux, which resulted in Cistercian influence on the Norbertine way of life. Canonesses have constituted a Second Order of nuns from the time of St. Norbert and eventually Third Order members were associated with the Norbertines. In the United States a Norbertine abbey at De Pere, Wisconsin, sponsors St. Norbert's College. See also canons regular; Norbert, St.

North American College, a residence in Rome, Italy, for American Catholic priests and seminarians studying at various Roman theological universities. Founded in 1859 by Pope Pius IX, it was located in a seventeenth-century monastery on Via dell'Umiltà. A new spacious facility was dedicated in 1953 on the Janiculum Hill overlooking St. Peter's Basilica and the Vatican City palaces. It has a very active and loyal alumni and these include over 150 bishops and more than a dozen cardinals. The rector of the college has often served as a liaison between American bishops and the Vatican. The college has served as a host to countless numbers of American Catholics who have visited Rome as tourists and pilgrims. It has also hosted many notable Americans, including seven U.S. presidents. The building on Via dell'Umiltà is now used exclusively by American priests doing graduate work in Rome and by bishops and priests in continuing education.

North American Martyrs, six French Jesuit priests and two laymen donnés (assistants) who were killed by the Iroquois between 1642 and 1649 and who were canonized in 1930. They were, at Ossernenon (Auriesville, N.Y.), Sts. René Goupil, donné and surgeon (d. 1642); Isaac Jogues, priest (d. 1646); John de la Lande, donné (d. 1646); and, in Canada, the priests Anthony Daniel (d. 1648); John de Brébeuf (d. 1649); Gabriel Lalemant (d. 1649); Charles Garnier (d. 1649); and Noël Chabanel (d. 1649). They were caught in the middle of a fierce Iroquois-Huron rivalry, in which the French and English took sides. There are shrines to the martyrs at Midland, Ontario, and Auriesville, New York.

Jean de Brébeuf and Gabriel Lalement, two of the eight French Jesuits who are collectively called the North American Martyrs, being tortured at the stake by Iroquois Indians near Georgian Bay, Canada, in 1649.

Feast day: October 19. See also Brébeuf, St. Jean de; Jogues, St. Isaac; Lalement, St. Gabriel.

Nostra Aetate (nohs'trah ay-tah'tay). See Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions.

notes, theological, qualifying phrases employed in pre–Vatican II manuals of theology to indicate the positive degree of authority one might attach to a theological proposition or thesis. The negative counterparts are called theological censures. The fundamental purpose of the notes was to safeguard the faith and prevent confusion between binding doctrines and theological opinions. Understood in the broadest sense, theological notes can be traced back to the very origins of Christianity in which it became necessary to distinguish between the authentic apostolic message and that which was opposed to it. Designations regarding divine truth and heresy were used quite broadly well into the Middle Ages and did not receive their more specialized meanings until after the Council of Trent (1546–63).

The Counter-Reformation saw the first systematized gradations of theological notes and censures in the works of theologians like Melchior Cano (1509–1560) and Francisco Suarez (1548–1617). Here we find the practice of identifying the varying degrees to which a proposition may be said to agree or conflict with divine revelation. A teaching was taught as de fide (Lat.), "of the faith," if it was believed to be found explicitly in divine revelation. A doctrinal proposition was considered de fide definita, "of defined faith," if it was solemnly defined by the pope or an ecumenical council. The rejection of a de fide definita teaching was denoted as heretica, a "heretical" proposition. One may find notes identifying teachings that "border on the faith" (proxima fidei) or that are "theologically certain" (theologice certa), and censures regarding teachings involving "proximate error." The lowest level of authority was that of a probable opinion. The flourishing of neo-Scholasticism in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries brought with it an expansion of this system, identifying subtle distinctions by the employment of lesser notes that specified the safety or danger of a theological position. See also theology.

RICHARD R. GAILLARDETZ

notes of the Church. See marks of the Church.

Notre Dame, University of, the most famous Catholic university in the world. Located just outside South Bend, Indiana, it was founded in 1842 and 150 years later had just over ten thousand undergraduate, graduate, and professional students and a full-time faculty of about nine hundred.

In reaching its sesquicentennial in 1992, Notre Dame passed through several stages. Like other American Catholic colleges, it was modeled on European secondary schools, such as the French lycée, and throughout the nineteenth century it remained a combination secondary and collegiate institution. But Edward F. Sorin, the French missionary priest who founded Notre Dame and shaped its development for half a century, greatly admired American ways and was quick to adopt them. When Sorin died in 1893, collegiate programs in the humanities, natural sciences, engineering, law, and commercial subjects were well established, and Notre Dame already enjoyed a national reputation among American Catholics.

Key leadership in the next era came from John A. Zahm and James A. Burns, both priests of the Congregation of Holy Cross, the religious community that established and operated Notre Dame. As U.S. superior of the community (1898–1906), Zahm sent his younger confrères to graduate school, thus laying the groundwork for true university development in the future. His protégé, Burns, built on that foundation when he became president of Notre Dame in 1919. He eliminated the preparatory academy, attracted foundation support, conducted the first great fund drive, and built up the lay faculty. The impetus his reforms lent the university was redoubled by the success of Knute Rockne's football teams, which gave Notre Dame national visibility and made it a familiar symbol of American Catholicism.

The University of Notre Dame's Main Building with its famous Golden Dome, and Sacred Heart Basilica to its left, as seen from the Hesburgh Library.

Academic growth, though slowed by the Great Depression, picked up in the late 1930s with the arrival of several prominent refugee scholars from Europe. Graduate work, begun in 1918 in the summer school and carried on mainly at the master's level, was reorganized in 1944 and grew consistently thereafter; by 1992, twenty-three departments offered doctoral programs. By the same date, externally funded research, which began with defense-related work during World War II, amounted to about $25 million annually. World War II training programs for Navy personnel also marked the beginning of Notre Dame's involvement in ROTC programs, under which some six hundred undergraduates now receive scholarship assistance.

Three Holy Cross priests have guided Notre Dame's development since World War II. Systematic fund-raising and the building program began in the presidency of John J. Cavanaugh (1946–52), but during Theodore M. Hesburgh's unprecedented thirty-five-year term (1952–87) Notre Dame was transformed in physical facilities, financial resources, faculty size and quality, and academic prestige. In 1967, juridical control of the university was transferred from the Congregation of Holy Cross to an autonomous, lay-dominated board of trustees, but the president of the university must be a Holy Cross priest. In 1972 women were admitted to the formerly all-male undergraduate body. Edward A. Malloy succeeded Father Hesburgh as president in 1987. See also Hesburgh, Theodore Martin.

PHILIP GLEASON

Notre Dame Cathedral, located in Paris, one of the most famous churches of Catholic Christianity. It is built on the site of a Gallo-Roman temple, which was replaced by a Frankish cathedral in 528. The present structure, a monument of the early Gothic style, was begun by Bishop Maurice de Sully in 1163; although basically completed by 1250, construction continued for another eighty years. Much of the original artwork fell victim to eighteenth-century alterations and severe vandalization during the French Revolution of 1789; in 1845 a neo-Gothic "restoration" was begun. The church has witnessed many events of French history, including the coronation of Napoleon in 1804. See also France, Catholicism in; Paris.

Notre Dame Sisters, international congregation of apostolic women religious dedicated to education and other ministries according to local need. Founded in 1833 in Bavaria by Mary Theresa Gerhardinger, the congregation drew inspiration from the Rule of St. Augustine and devoted its initial energies to educating poor girls. The School Sisters came to the United States in 1847 and taught children of German immigrants principally in the upper Midwest. In 1993 there are over eight thousand members in thirty-two countries, with the most recent expansion in Kenya and Guatemala. The members continue to educate, that is, to help people develop their gifts for a better world. When accepting new apostolic fields, they prefer to work among the poor, especially women and youth. See also School Sisters of Notre Dame; Sisters of Notre Dame de Namur.

Nouvelle Théologie (Fr., "New Theology"), a French Catholic theological movement of the 1940s that sought to overcome the limitations of neo-Scholastic theology through a return to biblical, patristic, and medieval theological sources. It reintegrated pastoral experience with theology, challenged the dominant rationalistic exegesis of Scripture, and investigated the development of dogma. Pope Pius XII's encyclical Humani Generis (1950) was aimed at ending this movement, but the Nouvelle Théologie proved to be an essential preparation for Vatican II (1962–65), where its methods were vindicated and its theological approaches adopted.

Novatianism, rigorist movement that arose at Rome in response to the restoration of Christians who had apostatized during the Decian persecution (249–51). Led by Novatian, a presbyter (priest) who in 251 became a rival bishop (antipope) to Cornelius in Rome, they refused to readmit into communion the lapsed, i.e., those who had compromised with paganism under persecution. Although theologically Orthodox, the Novatianists were excommunicated because of their schismatic origin and their refusal to grant pardon or penance for any serious sin. The Council of Nicaea (325) gave the terms under which they could be readmitted into Catholic communion. Scattered Novatian communities survived into the seventh century. See also Nicaea, First Council of.

novena (noh-vee'nah; Lat., novem, "nine"), a public or private devotion repeated nine successive times. The succession may consist of continuous days (nine days prior to a special feast), specific weekdays (nine Mondays), or specific days of the month (nine First Fridays). Public novenas consist of specified prayers recited in common, often followed by Benediction; they may precede or follow Mass. Novenas may be made for special intentions and may be repeated without limit. Devotional novenas arose in France and Spain in the early Middle Ages as a preparation for Christmas, though novenas of mourning were known much earlier. See also devotions.

novice, individual in a probationary period preparing for first vows in a religious institute. Both the general law of the Church and the particular law of a religious community regulate the qualities needed before a person can be admitted as a novice. See also novitiate; religious institute.

novitiate, probationary period preparatory to initial incorporation of persons (novices) into a religious institute. The period must last at least one year, be supervised by a formation staff, and take place in a religious house approved by the highest authority of the institute for this purpose. The major moderator may approve another house of the community to be used for part of the year. The program is to instruct the novices in the meaning of the vows that they are about to take, the spiritual life, and the history and particular charism of the given institute. See also religious institute; vows.

nullity, legal nonexistence. Canon law presumes that acts have been validly accomplished. It is possible, however, to prove that acts have not been done in such a way that the law should acknowledge them. Marriage, Holy Orders, and a given ecclesiastical procedure are examples of such acts whose nullity might be proven. See also validity [canon law].

number of the beast (666). See beast of the Apocalypse.

nun, in the strict sense, women in religious orders who take solemn vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. Nuns observe the papal cloister and live a life of silence, contemplation, and prayer. Choir nuns chant the Divine Office daily. Vatican II (1962–65) called for modifying the cloister, eliminating outmoded customs, and modifying the habit.

The word "nun" is also popularly used for women in religious congregations who take simple vows and who do not observe the cloister. It is also used as a synonym for "sister." See also religious life; sisters, congregations of.

Nunc Dimittis (nuhnk dee-mit'tis; Lat., "now you are dismissing [your servant]"), title of the Canticle of Simeon (Luke 2:29–32). The hymn is sung at Vespers in the East and at Compline in the West. See also Simeon.

nunciature (nuhn'see-ah-choor; Lat., nuntius, "messenger"), the diplomatic headquarters of a papal nuncio or pronuncio, that is, of a legate who represents the pope to a civil government and who enjoys ambassadorial status in the nation to which he is sent. See also nuncio; papal legate.

nuncio (Lat., nuntius, "messenger"), a specific type of papal legate (Code of Canon Law, cans. 363–67) who represents the Apostolic See to a state or civil government and also represents the pope to particular churches in that state or nation, in contrast to papal legates (called apostolic delegates) who relate only to particular churches. A papal legate promotes relations with a state or civil government and holds the title of nuncio if he has the rank of ambassador and also acts as dean of the diplomatic corps. If he has the rank of ambassador but is not dean of the diplomatic corps, his title is pronuncio. If he lacks ambassadorial rank, the legate's title is internuncio. As the representative to the particular churches, a nuncio is not subject to the jurisdiction of any bishop but acts in a spirit of cooperation with each bishop as well as the episcopal conference. He is also instrumental in the selection of new bishops. See also papal legate.

nuptial blessing, the blessing given by the priest on behalf of the Catholic Church to the spouses at a wedding. "Nuptial" is derived from the Latin nubere, which literally means "to marry [a man]." The blessing applies, therefore, directly only to the bride. When the nuptial blessing first appeared in the Roman liturgy of Marriage, it was exclusively a bridal blessing and, though the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) prescribed that it be amended to reflect the equal obligation of both spouses to remain faithful, the blessing in the revised Catholic rite retains traces of bridal focus. Immediately after the Lord's Prayer at Mass, or after the Prayer of the Faithful outside of Mass, the priest extends his hands over the couple and prays that they may grow in love of and fidelity to one another and to Christ, of whom they are to be living examples. See also Marriage.

nuptial Mass, the Mass within which the wedding of Catholics traditionally takes place. It has marriage-related readings from the OT and NT along with prayers for the spouses and their future children. It also includes, after the Lord's Prayer, the special nuptial blessing from which it takes its name. See also Marriage; Marriage, liturgy of.

O

O Antiphons, a series of seven antiphons, each beginning with the invocative "O," appointed for the Magnificat at Vespers celebrated between December 17 and 23. The texts are a mosaic of biblical verses from prophetic and wisdom books. Already known to Amalar of Metz (d. ca. 850), both texts and music probably date from the eighth or even the seventh centuries.

The O Antiphons are O Sapientia (Wisdom), O Adonai (Lord), O Radix Jesse (Root of Jesse), O Clavis David (Key of David), O Oriens (Radiant Dawn), O Rex Gentium (King of All Nations), and O Emmanuel (literally, God-with-us). See also Advent.

oath, an invocation of God's name in witness to the truth of a statement. An oath may be either assertory, referring to the validity of a past or present fact, or promissory, referring to the reliability of a future commitment. The taking of oaths, especially ecclesiastical oaths of office, is often surrounded with solemnity and ritual. Oaths are not to be taken or imposed lightly. The swearing of an oath imposes the weight of a new and different religious obligation with more substantial ramifications than those implied by either a profession of faith or a simple promise to fulfill an accepted responsibility. See also promise.

oath against Modernism, an oath once required of clerics prior to the reception of the subdiaconate, as well as by all those appointed confessors, preachers, pastors, canons, seminary professors, religious superiors, and officials in Roman congregations and diocesan curias. Incorporated into the pontifical letter of Pius X titled Sacrorum Antistitum (September 1, 1910), the oath was conceived as a method to unmask any clerics who might attempt to evade the proscriptions of views the same pope had previously condemned as "Modernism, the synthesis of all heresies." The first part of the oath required agreement to five distinct affirmations taught explicitly or implicitly by the First Vatican Council (1869–70): (1) that God can be known and proved to exist by arguments of natural reason; (2) that external signs of divine revelation, specifically miracles and prophecies, bring with them certainty, and are adapted to all persons and all times, including the present; (3) that the Church as an institution was founded by Christ; (4) that there exists a constant deposit of faith, so that the avowal that dogmas change from one generation to the next and with a meaning different from that taught by the Church is heretical; and (5) that faith involves a real assent of the intellect to truth revealed from an external source, rather than a blind and inherent sense brought to the surface of human consciousness by a morally ordered will. By swearing the second part of the oath a cleric promised submission to the teachings of the decree of the Holy Office, Lamentabili (July 3, 1907), which condemned sixty-five Modernist propositions on the nature of the Church, on revelation, on the person of Christ, and on the sacraments, and of the papal encyclical Pascendi Dominici Gregis (September 8, 1907), which elaborated on these themes. The imposition of the oath was considered juridically a personal ratification by Pius X of his earlier authoritative decisions. It was imposed throughout the Catholic world, and only about forty of those asked to swear it refused to do so. The only notable exception occurred in Germany, where professors in the state faculties of Catholic theology, not engaged in the pastoral ministry, were, at the behest of the German bishops, dispensed. The oath against Modernism was rescinded by a decree of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith (the former Holy Office) in July 1967. The official text of Sacrorum Antistitum is printed in Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1910), 2:655–80 (the oath itself, 669–72). An English translation can be found in American Catholic Quarterly Review 35 (1910): 712–31. See also Modernism; Pius X, St.

MARVIN R. O'CONNELL

oath of fidelity, an official promise to preserve communion with the Church, carry out the duties of office, preserve the deposit of faith, foster the Church's common discipline, and obey and collaborate with bishops. The Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith issued the oath of fidelity, which took effect March 1, 1989. Most provisions of this new oath repeat canons in the 1983 Code of Canon Law. The oath also draws on a longer version that new bishops must take, which emphasizes fidelity to the pope.

This oath is to be taken when assuming certain church offices. Vicars general, episcopal, and judicial are bound to take the oath; other diocesan officials are not. Pastors, rectors of seminaries, and seminary theology and philosophy teachers must take the oath of fidelity, but not other parochial leaders or seminary teachers and administrators. Candidates for the diaconate must take it, but not candidates for presbyteral ordination. Rectors of ecclesiastical universities (which grant Vatican-sanctioned degrees) and of Catholic universities properly so-called, are bound to take it; other university administrators are not. Teachers of disciplines that deal with faith and morals are bound to take the oath if they teach in seminaries, ecclesiastical universities, and other universities under direct church control; teachers in other universities do not seem to be so bound. Superiors in clerical religious institutes and clerical societies of apostolic life are to take a slightly modified version; other superiors are not bound to take it. See also profession of faith.

JAMES H. PROVOST

obedience, the submission of one's will and conduct to an authority. This submission is unconditional to God, but conditional to humans. In the OT morality centers on obedience to the will of God (Deut 1–4; Eccl 12:13). Persons are charged with observing the commandments of the Lord (Gen 17:9; Exod 19:5). The very heart of sin is disobedience (Gen 3:1–7). A similar emphasis is present in the NT, as is clear in the submission by Jesus of his life to God. This is especially clear in John where Jesus did not come to do his own will but the will of him who sent him (John 4:34; 6:38; 10:18; 12:49; 15:10). In Paul, Christ's obedience is the source of our salvation, just as disobedience was the source of sin.

All obedience is founded on authority that is understood to be derived from God and ordered to the good (John 19:11). Therefore, obedience to God includes obedience to duly established human authorities. Since human authorities share God's authority in different ways, obedience to such authorities takes on different forms (e.g., child to parents, pupil to teacher, citizen to the state, believer to Church authority) and is subject to differing requirements, conditions, and limits.

In the Church religious men and women vow obedience in imitation of Christ crucified. Diocesan priests promise obedience to their bishop. At times in the Church's history these bonds have been distorted by overstatement, much as in modern times obedience can be minimized by an imbalanced exaltation of autonomy. See also authority.

ALISON LIDSTAD

Oberammergau (oh-bair-ahm'air-gow), a village in Bavaria where, since 1634, the villagers have performed a passion play every ten years in the summer to express their gratitude for the ending of a plague in 1633. In 1680 the play was switched to decimal years. For the 350th anniversary the play was also held in 1985, at which time some lines were reworded in order to eliminate anti-Semitic implications.

oblates (Lat., oblatus, "offered"), persons associated with religious communities. In the early Middle Ages, the term was applied to children "offered" to a monastery by their parents and raised there, often with the understanding that they would remain bound to the monastic way of life as adults. Later, the term was applied as well to adults who did not take vows, but who chose to live in close connection to a monastery, integrating the spirit of the monastic rule into their daily lives. Groups of such "secular oblates" persist today in various forms. In modern usage, members of several religious congregations founded since the Council of Trent (1545–63) are also referred to as oblates, e.g., the Oblates of Mary Immaculate and the Oblates of St. Francis de Sales. See also religious life; religious orders and congregations.

Oblates of Mary Immaculate (O.M.I.), a congregation of men founded in 1816 by Charles Joseph de Mazenod in Aix-en-Provence, France. The Oblates received episcopal approbation in 1818, but conflicts with local bishops concerning the validity of their vows moved them to seek and receive papal approbation in 1826. They were first known as Missionaries of Provence, then as Oblates of St. Charles. The name change to O.M.I. occurred when papal approbation was secured.

Strong opponents of Jansenism and supporters of papal infallibility, the Oblates take the three vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience and add a fourth, a vow of perseverance until death, even if circumstances force the congregation to disperse. Originally founded for parochial and mission work, the Oblates also established seminaries for the improvement of clergy education. The first such seminary was founded in Marseilles in 1826. Others were established in Asia, Africa, Europe, and North America. Missions were founded in Canada in 1841 and in the United States the next year. Oblates in the United States formed a separate province in 1883.

Today the Oblates conduct missions, retreat houses, and parishes and emphasize ministry to the poor and most abandoned. They care for Marian shrines, including the Shrine of Our Lady of the Cape, Quebec, Canada. They assist the diocesan clergy in the care of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington, D.C. The generalate is in Rome.

Oblates of St. Francis de Sales (O.S.F.S.), a religious community of priests and brothers founded in 1871 in Troyes, France, by Father Louis Brisson. The community's rule is according to the spirit of St. Francis de Sales who, 160 years earlier, had been asked to found a group of men in the spirit of the women's Order of Visitation. The oblates' main works are education, foreign missions, and pastoral ministry. The motherhouse is in Rome. There are seven provinces: French, Austrian, American, German, Dutch, Swiss, and Italian. See also Francis de Sales, St.

oblations (Lat., oblatio, "offering"), the gifts that the participants in the Eucharist present for use in the liturgy (bread and wine) or—in accord with ancient practice—for distribution to the poor and sick. Offerings are also made for the Church and clergy. See also offertory.

obligation, holy days of. See holy days of obligation.

obligation, moral, the state of being bound or required as a moral agent to perform an action. Obligation binds someone to restrict and direct personal freedom by making a choice. Obligation arises from the human person's status as a free creature: because God is Creator, existence has the character of a debt to God; and because persons can control their actions, they are accountable for how they direct themselves. Moral obligation imposes itself from within, i.e., from human nature directed by reason and will to participation in God.

O'Brien, John Anthony, 1893–1980, priest, convert maker, author. A priest of the diocese of Peoria, he gained prominence early in his ministry by creating an extensive center for Catholic students at the University of Illinois. After 1940, he lived as author-in-residence at the University of Notre Dame. His writings—forty-five books and hundreds of pamphlets—were apologetical and pastoral in orientation. The Faith of Millions (1938) was his most popular work; many others dealt with timely topics such as evolution and the need for Catholic scholarship. He was also active in convert work, i.e., in encouraging non-Catholics to join the Catholic Church. He did so not only through his writings but also through street preaching, especially throughout the American South.

occasion of sin, a place, thing, or relationship likely to lead a person into sin. In Catholic moral theology discussion of responsibilities concerning occasions of sin usually focuses upon occasions of serious (mortal) sin. The principle involved is that since Christians have an obligation to avoid serious sin, they are obliged by reason of prudence to avoid whatever will lure them into sin or is likely to provide an easy opportunity for sin. Thus, someone might know by experience that association with a certain group will probably involve using drugs or engaging in sexual misconduct. Moralists argue that voluntarily choosing to associate with such persons would be wrong. The assumption is that the likelihood of sin would be removed, or greatly reduced, were the individual not exposed to this particular occasion of sin.

Catholic moralists distinguish between proximate and remote occasions of sin based on whether the probability of doing evil is great (proximate) or slight (remote). Occasions of sin are also distinguished as necessary or voluntary occasions of sin. To voluntarily place oneself in the proximate occasion of serious sin is considered morally wrong. A necessary occasion of sin is one that cannot be avoided because of other obligations. To enter into a necessary occasion of sin as part of one's job, for example, would not ordinarily be considered immoral. But, as always, it depends upon the circumstances.

Variations in judgment about what constitutes an occasion of sin indicate that occasions of sin are relative to particular persons, communities, and cultures. See also sin. DANIEL KROGER occult compensation, the act by which a person secretly takes what belongs to her or him from the goods of one in debt to her or him. While not against strict justice, it was and is viewed as ordinarily illicit for several reasons. First, one takes the law into one's own hands. Public order demands that such claims generally be settled openly. Second, if the sum is great, the solvency of the debtor may be unjustifiably jeopardized. Third, one may imprudently risk prosecution, with damage to one's own reputation and that of others (family, profession, business firm).

Occult compensation was and is regarded as licit:

(1) if that which is owed is owed in strict justice (not only out of gratitude, for example); (2) if the debt is morally certain; and (3) if there is no other way of recovering the debt.

Ockham, William of. See William of Ockham.

O'Connell, Denis Joseph, 1849–1927, American bishop and key figure in the Americanist controversy. Born in Ireland, but raised in South and North Carolina, he was ordained in Rome for the diocese of Richmond, Virginia, in 1872. He was rector of the American College in Rome (1885–95) and was influential in establishing the apostolic delegation (1893). His partisan support of Cardinal James Gibbons and Archbishop John Ireland led Pope Leo XIII to demand his resignation as rector. He played a key role in the controversy over Americanism. In 1903, he began an undistinguished rectorship at The Catholic University of America. Named auxiliary bishop of San Francisco in 1909, he became bishop of Richmond in 1912. In 1926, he resigned and was named titular archbishop of Mariamne, a defunct see in Syria. See also Americanism; Gibbons, James; Ireland, John.

O'Connell, William Henry, 1859–1944, archbishop of Boston, 1907–44; cardinal, 1911. O'Connell's career represented a major step in the "romanization" of the American hierarchy in the twentieth century. He was influential in local politics and society, but lost his influence within the Church over a 1920 financial scandal involving archdiocesan personnel, particularly his priest-nephew, who was also discovered to have been secretly married.

O'Connor, Flannery, 1925–64, American Catholic writer. Born and raised in the South, she created brilliant fictional characters of fundamentalist convictions and habits. These characters formed the stories (what she called "the very large letters") with which she challenged the self-assurance of her Catholic and secular readers ("the near-blind"). Her stories expressed her sense of sacrament and of the possibility of redemption in the midst of the strangeness of ordinary life. She published two novels, Wise Blood and The Violent Bear It Away, and two collections of short stories before her death at age thirty-nine of lupus.

O'Connor, John J., b. 1920, cardinal-archbishop of New York since 1984 and the most influential Flannery O'Connor, twentieth-century novelist from the American South whose literary work reflects the Catholic principle of sacramentality, that is, of seeing the presence and activity of the divine in the human and of penetrating through the material world to its spiritual ground and source.

member of the American Church hierarchy. Ordained a priest in 1945, consecrated a bishop in 1979, and created a cardinal in 1985, he served as chief of chaplains for the U.S. Navy, attaining the rank of rear admiral. He holds a Ph.D. in political science from Georgetown University (1970) and served on the U.S. bishops' committee that produced the 1983 pastoral letter "The Challenge of Peace."

octave (ok'tiv; Lat., octavus, "eighth"), a period of eight consecutive days that extends the celebration of a solemnity. The Christian year has two solemnities with octaves: Easter and Christmas. Easter's octave derives its tone from the celebration of Christ's life, death, and Resurrection, as well as from the attention given to the neophytes, those newly baptized at the Easter Vigil. The eighth Sunday of Easter, or Pentecost Sunday, concludes what has been called the great octave of eight Easter weeks. The Christmas octave concludes with the Solemnity of Mary, Mother of God, on January 1.

October Devotions, devotions to the Blessed Virgin Mary during the month of October, regarded as the month of Our Lady because the Feast of Our Lady of the Rosary was celebrated on October 7. The devotions can take various forms, but almost always include the public recitation of the Rosary and Benediction and various Marian hymns.

Octogesima Adveniens (ahk-toh-jay'zi-mah ahd-vayn'ee-enz; Lat., "the eightieth anniversary"), "A Call to Action," apostolic letter of Pope Paul VI, written to Cardinal Maurice Roy, president of the Council of the Laity and of the Pontifical Commission for Justice and Peace. The letter was issued on May 14, 1971, eighty years after the publication of Leo XIII's Rerum Novarum. Although the letter covers many topics, its distinctive contribution may have been its recognition that the social teachings of the Church have a political as well as an economic dimension (nn. 46–47).

odes, a ninefold series of poetic refrains of the Byzantine-rite liturgy, modeled on the themes of nine biblical canticles. These odes, called the "canon," now a characteristic element of Byzantine orthros (Gr., "dawn") or Matins, replaced in the Divine Office the original biblical canticles on which they are based. The second ode of the canon is always omitted outside of Lent. Furthermore, Lenten ferial (weekday) canons have fewer odes, often three, which is why the book of Lenten propers is called the Triodion or "[book] of three odes." See also canticle.

Odes of Solomon, a collection, perhaps from the second century, of forty-two Christian hymns preserved in Syriac, perhaps originally written in Greek. The Odes were once characterized as Gnostic, but the absence of cosmic dualism and the reverence for the OT and for God as Creator rule out such an interpretation. Rich in baptismal imagery, the Odes probably had a liturgical use.

Odilia, St., d. ca. 720, abbess. Other than her founding and presiding over a nunnery (later a pilgrimage site) at what is now Odilienberg in the Vosges Mountains, little is known about her. Her role as patroness of the blind derives from a legend that she was born sightless. Feast day: December 13.

Odilo of Cluny, St. (oh'duh-loh), 962–1049, fifth abbot of Cluny. During Odilo's abbacy, Cluniac usages spread throughout France, Italy, and Spain. He was noted for his charity, selling his monastery's treasures to feed the poor in famine. He also established the Feast of All Souls. Feast day: April 29 (for Benedictines). See also Cluny.

odious law, in canon law a law falling into the category of those that are to be considered "hateful" and consequently to be interpreted as narrowly as possible. Laws establishing penalties, providing exceptions to the law, or limiting rights are so considered.

odium theologicum (oh'dee-oom tay-oh-loh'jee-koom; Lat., "theological hatred"), a term used to describe the bitterness with which theological disputes are sometimes argued.

Odo of Cluny, St., 879–942, second abbot of Cluny. Under his able leadership Cluny grew in size and prosperity. He wrote hymns, moral treatises, and a life of St. Gerald. Feast day: November 18 (April 29 for Benedictines). See also Cluny.

Oesterreicher, John Maria, 1904–93, founder and director of the Institute of Judeo-Christian Studies at Seton Hall University, South Orange, New Jersey (1953–93). Born a Jew, he converted to Catholicism under the influence of the writings of Cardinal John Henry Newman (d. 1890). Ordained in Vienna in 1927, he opposed Adolf Hitler and the Nazi movement and was forced to leave his native Austria in 1938, moving to the United States two years later. He served as a consultor of the Vatican Secretariat for the Promotion of Christian Unity (1961–68) and contributed to the Second Vatican Council's Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions (Nostra Aetate).

offertory (awf'uhr-tohr-ee), a transitional rite in the Mass in which the gifts of bread and wine are presented with the collection of money or other goods. The rite bridges the Liturgy of the Word with the Liturgy of the Eucharist. Since the reform of Vatican II, the preferred term for this rite is the Preparation of the Altar and the Gifts. The term "offertory" is no longer used as a noun, only as an adjective. The actual offering of the bread and wine takes place within the Eucharistic Prayer or Canon of the Mass. The purpose of the presentation rite is simply to prepare the altar, the gifts, and the community for the offering that is to come during the Eucharistic Prayer. See also Eucharist.

office, a stable ministerial position within the Church. Some ministerial positions are always necessary for the Church and are considered to have been established by divine law; others, while useful and even necessary for the Church at a given time and place, have been established by human law. The former includes such positions as bishop, pope, and priest (presbyter); the latter includes those such as finance officer or music minister. In the 1917 Code of Canon Law, officeholders were limited to the clergy alone, because "office" was strictly defined; it included the exercise of jurisdiction, the governing power within the Church. Because clerics alone could possess jurisdiction, positions requiring it were limited to them alone. In the current code (1983) the term "office" is understood in a broader sense; any permanent ministry for the good of souls is considered to be an office. Broadening the definition of office not only allows members of the laity the opportunity to hold office, but also places additional positions under many of the same norms as clerical offices, thus protecting the rights of lay ministers. See also ministry.

Office, Divine. See breviary; Liturgy of the Hours.

Office, Holy. See Holy Office.

offices of Christ (Lat., officium, "dutiful action"), Christ's saving roles as prophet, priest, and king. As prophet, Jesus Christ reveals the Father's will (John 17:3; Matt 11:27). As priest, he mediates between God and humankind (Heb 4:14–7:28). As king, he is the bearer of God's kingdom, possessing a sovereignty above all earthly rulers (John 18:37; Rev 5:13). Reference to Christ's offices developed in the late Middle Ages and was elaborated especially by the Reformer John Calvin (1509–64). See also Jesus Christ.

officialis (oh-fee-chee-ahl'lis). See judicial vicar.

O'Hara, Edwin Vincent, 1881–1956, bishop, educator, and sociologist. Ordained for the diocese of Oregon City (now Portland), he promoted Catholic education and labor reform in Oregon and served as the first chairman of the National Catholic Rural Life Bureau. As bishop of Great Falls, Montana (1930–39) and of Kansas City, Missouri (1939–56), he was active in revising the Baltimore Catechism and a new English translation of the Bible. See also Baltimore Catechism.

oil, substance extracted from olives after the harvesting in late summer and one of the principal agricultural products of Palestine during the biblical period and after. In addition to secular uses in food preparation and as an unguent, it was used in the anointing of kings (1 Sam 10:1; 2 Kgs 9:3) and priests (Lev 8:30) and was an important ingredient in certain sacrifices (Lev 2:4).

oil of catechumens, oils used to anoint catechumens during the Christian initiation process. This anointing takes place either at the Easter Vigil or on Holy Saturday. Children are anointed during the rite of infant Baptism. The purpose of the oil, made from the olive or other plant, is to "give wisdom and strength to all who are anointed with it" (Prayer for Anointing of the Catechumen). See also chrism; holy oils.

oil of the sick, oil used for the Anointing of the Sick. It is generally consecrated by a bishop on Holy Thursday but may be blessed by a priest in an emergency. Its purpose is stated in the prayer from the Rite of Anointing of the Sick: "Make this oil a remedy for all who are anointed with it; heal them in body, in soul, and in spirit, and deliver them from every affliction." See also chrism; holy oils.

oil stocks, a storage container for holy oils. The case has three compartments, each marked with an initial indicating the chrism, oil of the catechumens, and oil of the sick. Many churches display the holy oils in an ambry, a boxlike structure placed in a prominent position in the church near the baptismal font. See also chrism; oil of catechumens; oil of the sick.

Oktoechos (awk-toy'ee-kaws; Gk., "eight-toned"), Byzantine-rite liturgical book containing the liturgical propers (prayers assigned to particular Sundays and feasts) of the mobile cycle (i.e., those whose date depends each year on the date of Easter) throughout the liturgical year except for the cycles of Lent, Easter, and Pentecost, which are found in separate books, the Triodion and Pentekostarion. In the Oktoechos the proper texts for each day of the week, Sunday through Saturday, are arranged according to eight musical tones. Since not only the music but also the texts for each tone differ, the Oktoechos contains fifty-six complete daily propers. The Oktoechos cycle takes eight weeks to complete, one week per tone, and is repeated throughout the year from All Saints' Day on the first Sunday after Pentecost, until fully replaced in Lent by the propers in the Triodion. The Oktoechos also overlaps with the monthly Menaion propers for the Divine Office. The Byzantine liturgical ordo or Typikon contains the rules regulating the precedence of these competing propers. In present Greek usage, this complete cycle of the "Great" or "New Oktoechos" is often called the Paraklitike, the name "Oktoechos" reserved to the Sunday propers only. The West Syrian rite also has an Oktoechos. See also proper, liturgical; Proper of the Mass.

Olaf, St., 995–1030, patron saint of Norway. He became king in 1016 and attempted to Christianize the land. The zealous harshness of his methods alienated many, however, and a revolt deposed him from the throne in 1029. Although unpopular in his lifetime, Olaf was later venerated as a champion of Norwegian unity, independence, and Christianization. See also Scandinavia, Catholicism in.

Old Catholics, schismatic Catholic churches, also known as "National Catholics." There are three such groups of Catholics in the West who have separated themselves from papal authority: Dutch Old Catholics, centered in Utrecht; small groups of German, Dutch, and Austrian Catholics who went into schism in the nineteenth century over the issue of papal infallibility; Polish Catholics who separated from Rome because of ethnic tensions in the United States.

Old Catholics keep formal relationships with the Church of England. Recent ecumenical efforts, especially between Rome and the Polish National Church, have sought to heal the schism. See also National Catholic churches.

Old Church Slavonic, or Old Bulgarian, earliest literary language of the Slavs. It originated as a southeastern dialect of Late Common Slavic but continues to undergo modernization and russification. Like Latin in the West, it long functioned as a supranational language in the Slavic world, and was the official liturgical language of all Slavic Byzantine-rite churches until the second half of the twentieth century, when some of them began to introduce the vernacular. See also liturgical language.

Old Roman Creed, a short, trinitarian confession that originated in the church of Rome in approximately A.D. 150 and eventually developed into the Apostles' Creed. Its content was similar to Hippolytus's interrogatory baptismal creed. See also Apostles' Creed; creeds.

OLD ROMAN CREED

Do you believe in God, the Father almighty?

Do you believe in Jesus Christ, the Son of God, who was born of the Virgin Mary by the Holy Spirit, has been crucified under Pontius Pilate, died [and was buried], who on the third day rose again, alive, from the dead, ascended into heaven and took his seat at the right hand of the Father, and shall come to judge the living and the dead?

Do you believe in the Holy Church and the resurrection of the body in the Holy Spirit?

[The text is from The Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus, ca. 215, which is based on the Old Roman Creed. The format is still used today in the sacrament of Baptism and is recited by the entire congregation at the Easter Vigil and on Easter Sunday. Other early creeds, e.g., the Creed of Marcellus (340), also considered to be based on the Old Roman Creed, add the words "the forgiveness of sins" and "life everlasting" in the third paragraph. The Creed of Rufinus (ca. 404) adds only "the forgiveness of sins."]

Old Testament. See Bible.

Olga, St., d. 969, widow of the Grand Duke of Kiev, honored as one of the earliest of Russia's Christian people. Prior to her conversion, Olga was known as a barbarous woman. A missionary journey to Kiev, made at her request around 959, failed. Her grandson, Vladimir, was more successful at promoting the new faith in Russia. Feast day: July 11. See also Russia, Catholicism in.

Olier, Jean-Jacques, 1608–57, French priest and founder of the Society of St. Sulpice (Sulpicians). He is best known for his establishment of the seminary at Saint-Sulpice parish in Paris and other seminaries founded by members of his society. His spiritual teaching is in the tradition of St. Vincent de Paul and St. John Eudes. Sulpicians today are still engaged in seminary education. See also Sulpicians.

Olives, Mount of, a hill overlooking Jerusalem on the east. Jesus approached Jerusalem for the last time over the mount (Matt 21:1; Mark 11:1) and wept upon seeing the city (Luke 19:41). He foretold Jerusalem's destruction on the mount (Matt 24:3; Mark 13:3–4) and from it ascended to heaven (Luke 24:50; Acts 1:12).

Olivi, Petrus Joannis, ca. 1248–98, Spiritual Franciscan and writer of exegetical and doctrinal treatises. Born in Languedoc, Olivi entered the Franciscan order at the age of twelve, later attending the University of Paris. Consulted by the pope in 1279 on the controversial matter of Christ's poverty, Olivi's conclusions drew opposition from the moderate members of his own order, and the General Chapter of 1282 condemned his writings. Reinstated five years later, he had already become the intellectual champion of the Spiritual Franciscans. In later years, as the controversy raged, his writings were suspect once again. See also Franciscan order; Spiritual Franciscans.

ombrellino (ohm-brel-lee'noh; It., "little umbrella"), a canopy, usually made of white silk with gold fringe, carried over the Eucharist in procession.

omnipotence of God, the attribute of God that God is all-powerful. This divine attribute means, strictly speaking, that there can be no limits on what God can do. However, this strict meaning is rarely invoked in theology. As soon as one asks whether God can do anything, for example, commit a sin, one realizes that there must be some boundaries on the assertion that God is all-powerful. The most common way of formulating those boundaries has been a logical one: it would make no sense to say that God could do things that were self-contradictory or incompatible with the nature of divinity, such as sin. By invoking logic in this way, one does not limit God's power by another force, but by the bounds of sense or meaning. Thus, God cannot be said to be able to do anything at all, but only what is consonant with being God. See also God.

omniscience of God, the attribute of God that God is all-knowing. God knows all things past, present, and future, but God knows everything from the standpoint of eternity. The idea that there could be something hidden from God offends theological sensibilities.

The greatest difficulties in understanding God's knowledge have to do with how God knows the future. The normal way of formulating this question leads quickly to a picture of predestination in which God "already knows" what will take place. But a future known to God and therefore predetermined by God is antithetical to human freedom, which to some extent must leave the future open-ended. Theologians have sought different ways to correct this picture without compromising God's omniscience, notably by reminding us that God's knowledge is eternal while events take place in time. We can never expect to know how it is that God knows all there is to know. See also God.

omophorion (oh-moh-faw'ree-ahn; Gk., "borne on the shoulder"), Byzantine-rite pallium, the symbol of episcopal office worn around the neck. Though similar in form and worn in the same way, it is much wider and longer than the Western pallium. Once reserved to patriarchs and metropolitans, it is now worn by all bishops. There is also a less ancient "small omophorion," a broad, short stole that the bishop wears over his black monastic mantle (mandyas) at lesser services, when not fully vested, or, when celebrating the Eucharist, from the Gospel until Communion. See also pallium.

Onesimus, St. (oh-nee'si-muhs; Gk., "beneficial"), a slave. Paul wrote to Philemon on behalf of Onesimus. He may have been bishop of Ephesus in the early second century. Feast day: February 16.

ontological argument, a proof for the existence of God arguing from the nature of being. The term comes from Immanuel Kant (1724–1804), who used it to distinguish this form of argument from arguments for God's existence that begin with the world, so-called cosmological arguments. The most famous example of an ontological argument comes from the eleventh century in Anselm's Proslogion. In this work, Anselm sought a "single formula" whose own logical structure would contain a proof for God's very existence. The formula was to name God as "that than which nothing greater can be thought." Anselm proceeded to show how anyone using that expression would have to be speaking of a perfect being whose very perfection would entail that it exist not only in the human mind (as an idea of God) but also exist "in reality." See also five ways of St. Thomas Aquinas; God.

ontologism, the idea that the human intellect has a direct, intuitive perception of Being and that this Being is God. Ontologism was condemned by the Holy Office in 1861 because it confuses natural and supernatural knowledge. Ontologism is associated with N. Malebranche (d. 1715), V. Gioberti (d. 1852), and A. Rosmini-Serbati (d. 1855).

ontology (Gk., on-logos, "study of that which is"), a branch of metaphysics that deals with being in general. Other philosophical disciplines investigate the identifying characteristics of a limited set of beings while ontology considers the underlying principles present in all existing things simply because they exist.

Ontological thinking was more characteristic of pre–Vatican II neo-Scholastic theology and philosophy than it is of present-day theology and philosophy. See also metaphysics; philosophy and theology.

Opening Prayer. See Collect.

Optatum Totius (ahp-tah'tahm toh-tsee'uhs). See Decree on Priestly Formation.

Optatus of Milevis, St., d. ca. 370, bishop of Milevis in Numidia, Roman Africa. Around 366 Optatus authored a Catholic defense, in six books, against the treatise on Baptism by Parmenian, the Donatist bishop of Carthage. With a seventh book added in 385, Optatus argues for the validity of Catholic Baptism and the unity and universality of the Church. Much admired by Augustine of Hippo, Optatus's work is enhanced by a collection of church documents appended to his book. Feast day: June 4. See also Africa, the Church in Roman; Donatism.

optimism, in Catholic theology the confidence that, despite the corrosive and debilitating effects of sin and evil, human beings and the world are essentially good. Optimism ultimately is grounded in faith and hope in the one supremely good God, through whose salvific grace all things are created. See also hope.

Opus Dei (Lat., "work of God"). 1 phrase used to indicate the liturgical prayer of the Hours in monastic communities. 2 Religious movement founded by Monsignor Josemaría Escrivá de Balaguer (1902–75) in Spain. Begun as a pious association of laypeople (and clergy) dedicated to their sanctification and that of society, the movement went through various phases. Declared a Pious Union in 1941, it became a secular institute in 1947 (with final approbation in 1950). Pope John Paul II established it as a personal prelature in 1982. It has both priestly and lay members.

The current structure of the organization has various levels of commitment: (1) Numeraries, who are celibate, live in the organization's centers and work full-time at the apostolate. (Female numeraries do administrative/domestic chores for the houses.) (2) Oblates embrace a celibate life but live outside the centers. (3) Supernumeraries, who are married members, live independently, and have professional careers. (4) Cooperators support the work of the organization but do not have formal ties to it.

The spirituality of Opus Dei is shaped by Escrivá's work The Way (1935; enhanced edition 1939), which is a series of 999 spiritual maxims. Often criticized for their alleged secrecy, their theological conservatism, and their rigorous spirituality, Opus Dei members have sometimes been controversial in the Church. They sponsor university faculties in Spain, Rome, and Latin America and student residences in widespread areas of the world. Their founder was beatified by Pope John Paul II in 1992. See also prelature, personal; Spain, Catholicism in.

opus operantis (oh'puhs oh-pur-ahn'tis). See ex opere operantis.

opus operatum (oh'puhs oh-pur-ah'toom). See ex opere operato.

oracle, a generic term corresponding to several Hebrew expressions for a prophetic utterance of well-being, judgment, or information about the future. The frequent introductory formula, "Thus says Yahweh," indicates that the oracle communicates a divine message verbatim by means of a specially designated intermediary. See also prophet.

Orange, Council of, council convened in 529 by Caesarius of Arles, to resolve a century of Gallic debates concerning divine grace. Orange (Arausio) is in southern France. This "council" was actually a small gathering of bishops who met for the consecration of a basilica. Caesarius, supported by a letter of Pope Felix III, presented to the assembly a list of twenty-five capitula (Lat., "chapters"), which generally upheld Augustine's teachings on original sin, the need for grace, and predestination. The approval of these propositions represented the final rapprochement between Augustine's doctrine of grace and the Gallic church. Many of fifth-century Gaul's leading theologians (John Cassian, Vincent of Lérins, Faustus of Riez) had refused to endorse fully Augustine's predestinarianism, thereby incurring the suspicion of having harbored Pelagian sentiments. The bishops of Orange accepted Augustine's teaching of the absolute priority of grace to any human striving, but rejected the harshest implications of Augustine's teaching on predestination, explicitly rejecting, as Augustine had, predestination to evil. See also grace; predestination; semi-Pelagianism.

orans (Lat., "one praying"), the symbol of a human figure with outstretched arms representing a praying or interceding person. In the Roman catacombs, the figure is found on Christian tombs, sometimes combined with that of the Good Shepherd or with biblical scenes, signifying prayer as a means to salvation. See also catacombs.

orarion (aw-rah'ree-ahn), Byzantine-rite deacon's stole, a long narrow band of vestment cloth worn over the left shoulder, and (except among the Russians) wrapped around the body under the right arm, with the two ends of the stole extending to the floor in back and front. The origin of the name is obscure. See also stole.

