MCBRIEN

THE HARPER COLLINS ENCYCLOPEDIA OF CATHOLICISM

THE HARPERCOLLINS ENCYCLOPEDIA OF CATHOLICISM

GENERAL EDITOR

Richard P. McBrien

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

HAROLD W. ATTRIDGE
MICHAEL J. BUCKLEY
JOHN C. CAVADINI
REGINA A. COLL
LAWRENCE S. CUNNINGHAM
JAY P. DOLAN
JOHN R. DONAHUE
REGIS A. DUFFY
KEITH J. EGAN
MICHAEL J. HIMES
ROBERT A. KRIEG
CATHERINE MOWRY LACUGNA
JOHN E. LATHEY
RICHARD A. McCORMICK
THOMAS F. O'MEARA
ROBERT F. TAFT
JOSEPH P. WAWRYKOW

HarperSanFrancisco

A Division of HarperCollins*Publishers*

PUBLICATION STAFF

SENIOR EDITOR John B. Shopp
ASSISTANT EDITOR Steven Anderson
PRODUCTION EDITOR Mimi Kusch
COPYEDITORS Ann Moru, Pam Suwinsky, Nancy Haught
PRODUCTION COORDINATORS Virginia Rich, Jennifer Boynton, Lisa Zuniga
PROOFREADERS Annelise Zamula, Steven Anderson, Beverly M. Brazauskas
EDITORIAL ASSISTANT Judith Kleppe
PHOTO RESEARCHERS Photosearch, Inc.
DESIGN Design Office, Bruce Kortebein, Peter Martin, Mary Faria, Marilyn Perry
DESIGN MANAGER Martha Blegen
TYPESETTER Auto-Graphics, Inc.
TEXT PRINTER AND BINDER R. R. Donnelley & Co.

Scripture quotations are from the New Revised Standard Version of the Bible, copyright © 1989 by the Division of Christian Education of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the USA. Used by permission. All rights reserved; quotations from the documents of Vatican II are reprinted with permission of America Press, Inc., 106 West 56th Street, New York, NY 10019. Copyright © 1966. All rights reserved; the text of the Outline from the English translation of Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults, copyright © 1985, is reprinted with permission of the International Committee on English in the Liturgy, Inc. All rights reserved.

Photograph and illustration credits begin on page 1347.

THE HARPERCOLLINS ENCYCLOPEDIA OF CATHOLICISM. Copyright © 1995 by HarperCollins Publishers Inc. All rights reserved. Printed in the United States of America. No part of this book may be used or reproduced in any manner whatsoever without written permission except in the case of brief quotations embodied in critical articles and reviews. For information address HarperCollins Publishers, 10 East 53rd Street, New York, NY 10022.

FIRST EDITION

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data
The HarperCollins encyclopedia of Catholicism / general editor, Richard P. McBrien ; associate editors, Harold W. Attridge ... [et al.]. — 1st ed.
p. cm.
ISBN 0–06–065338–8 (cloth: alk. paper)
1. Catholic Church—Encyclopedias. I. McBrien, Richard P. II. Attridge, Harold W.
BX841.H37 1995
282'.03—dc20 94–39972
CIP

95 96 97 98 99 RRD(C) 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

This edition is printed on acid-free paper that meets the American National Standards Institute Z39.48 Standard.

CONTENTS

Editorial Board VI

Contributors VII

Foreword by Theodore M. Hesburgh, C.S.C. XVII

Introduction by Richard P. McBrien XIX

Abbreviations XXV

Pronunciation Key XXVI

Time Line XXVII

The HarperCollins Encyclopedia of Catholicism, A–Z 1–1345

Feature Articles:
Anointing of the Sick 57, St. Thomas Aquinas 83,
St. Augustine of Hippo 113, Baptism 133,
Bible 160, Catholic Church 242,
Confirmation 346, Eucharist 481,
Faith 510, God 564,
Grace 577, Holy Orders 620,
Holy Spirit 628, Jesus Christ 695,
Marriage 821, Blessed Virgin Mary 832,
Missions 871, Monasticism 883,
The Papacy 953, St. Paul 972,
St. Peter 990, Prayer 1037,
Reconciliation 1083,
Religious Orders and Congregations 1099,
Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (RCIA) 1119, Christian Spirituality 1216,
Catholicism in the United States of America 1282,
Vatican Council II 1299, Women in the Church 1330

Photograph and Illustration Credits 1347

Sections of Color Illustrations Follow Pages 506 and 730

EDITORIAL BOARD

GENERAL EDITOR

RICHARD P. McBRIEN, S.T.D.
Crowley-O'Brien-Walter
Professor of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

HAROLD W. ATTRIDGE, PH.D.
Professor of New Testament and Dean, College of Arts and Letters
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

MICHAEL J. BUCKLEY, S.J.,
PH.D.
Professor of Systematic Theology
Director, Jesuit Institute
Boston College
Chestnut Hill, Massachusetts

JOHN C. CAVADINI, PH.D.
Associate Professor of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

REGINA A. COLL, C.S.J., ED.D.
Director, Field Education
Department of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

LAWRENCE S. CUNNINGHAM,
PH.D.
Professor and Chair of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

JAY P. DOLAN, PH.D.
Professor of History
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

JOHN R. DONAHUE, S.J., PH.D.
Professor of New Testament
Jesuit School of Theology at Berkeley/Graduate Theological Union
Berkeley, California

REGIS A. DUFFY, O.F.M., S.T.D.
Associate Professor of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

KEITH J. EGAN, PH.D.
Professor and Chair of Religious Studies
Saint Mary's College
Notre Dame, Indiana

MICHAEL J. HIMES, PH.D.
Associate Professor of Theology
Boston College
Chestnut Hill, Massachusetts

ROBERT A. KRIEG, C.S.C., PH.D.
Associate Professor of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

CATHERINE MOWRY LaCUGNA,
PH.D.
Professor of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

JOHN F. LAHEY, C.S.C., J.C.D.
Assistant Professional Specialist
Department of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

RICHARD A. McCORMICK, S.J.,
S.T.D.
John A. O'Brien Professor of Christian Ethics
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

THOMAS F. O'MEARA, O.P.,
PH.D.
William K. Warren Professor of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

ROBERT F. TAFT, S.J., S.E.O.D.
Professor of Oriental Liturgy
Pontifical Oriental Institute
Rome, Italy

JOSEPH P. WAWRYKOW, PH.D.
Associate Professor of History of Christianity
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

CONTRIBUTORS

STEPHEN A. ALLEN, M.M.S., PH.D. CAND.
Medieval Institute
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

CHARLOTTE A. AMES, M.A., M.L.S.
Catholic Americana Librarian
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

MICHAEL F. ANDREWS, S.J., PH.L.
Instructor in Philosophy
Fairfield University
Fairfield, Connecticut

BENEDICT M. ASHLEY, O.P., PH.D.
Professor Emeritus of Moral Theology
Aquinas Institute of Theology
St. Louis, Missouri

HAROLD W. ATTRIDGE, PH.D.
Professor of New Testament and Dean, College of Arts and Letters
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

STEVEN M. AVELLA, PH.D.
Associate Professor of History
Marquette University
Milwaukee, Wisconsin

JOHN F. BALDOVIN, S.J., PH.D.
Associate Professor of Historical and Liturgical Theology
Jesuit School of Theology at Berkeley/Graduate Theological Union
Berkeley, California

KATHARINE S. BARRETT, M.DIV.
Director of Religious Education, Campus Ministry
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

GREGORY BAUM, D.TH.
Professor of Religious Studies
McGill University
Montreal, Quebec, Canada

MICHAEL R. BEGGS, M.A., PH.D. CAND.
Department of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

THOMAS E. BLANTZ, C.S.C., PH.D.
Professor of History
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

JOSEPH BLENKINSOPP, D.PHIL.
John A. O'Brien Professor of Biblical Studies
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

CHRISTOPHER O. BLUM, M.A., PH.D. CAND.
Graduate Program in History and Philosophy of Science
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

THÉRÈSE MARIE BONIN, PH.D.
Assistant Professor of Philosophy
Duquesne University
Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania

JOSEPH A. BRACKEN, S.J., PH.D.
Professor of Theology
Xavier University
Cincinnati, Ohio

PAUL F. BRADSHAW, D.D.
Professor of Liturgy
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

BEVERLY M. BRAZAUSKAS, M.ED., M.A.
Religious Education Consultant
Silver Burdett Ginn
South Bend, Indiana

PAMELA BRIGHT, PH.D.
Associate Professor of Historical Theology
Concordia University
Montreal, Quebec, Canada

MICHAEL J. BUCKLEY, S.J., PH.D.
Professor of Systematic Theology
Director, Jesuit Institute
Boston College
Chestnut Hill, Massachusetts

JEFFREY M. BURNS, PH.D.
Archivist, Archdiocese of San Francisco
Menlo Park, California

DAVID B. BURRELL, C.S.C., PH.D.
Hesburgh Professor of Philosophy and Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

SUSAN M. CALEF, M.A., PH.D. CAND.
Department of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

EDMUND CAMPION, M.A. (CANTAB.)
Associate Professor of History
Catholic Institute of Sydney
Sydney, New South Wales, Australia

KATHLEEN CANNON, O.P., D.MIN.
Concurrent Associate Professor of Theology and Associate Provost
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

GEORGE L. CAREY, PH.D.
Archbishop of Canterbury
Primate of All England and Metropolitan Lambeth Palace
London, England

MARIA LUIZA CARRANO, M.A.
Assistant Professional Specialist
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

JOHN C. CAVADINI, PH.D.
Associate Professor of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

SARA C. CHARLES, M.D.
Professor of Clinical Psychiatry
University of Illinois School of Medicine at Chicago
Chicago, Illinois

KEVIN J. CHRISTIANO, PH.D.
Associate Professor of Sociology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

ANDREW D. CIFERNI, O.PRAEM., PH.D.
Associate Professor of Liturgy
Washington Theological Union
Silver Spring, Maryland

FRANCIS X. CLOONEY, S.J., PH.D.
Associate Professor of Theology
Boston College
Chestnut Hill, Massachusetts

AELRED CODY, O.S.B., S.T.D., S.S.D.
Editor, Catholic Biblical Quarterly
St. Meinrad Archabbey
St. Meinrad, Indiana

REGINA A. COLL, C.S.J., ED.D.
Director, Field Education
Department of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

ADELA YARBRO COLLINS, PH.D.
Professor of New Testament
University of Chicago
Chicago, Illinois

JOHN J. COLLINS, PH.D.
Professor of Hebrew Bible
University of Chicago
Chicago, Illinois

RAYMOND F. COLLINS, S.T.D.
Dean, School of Religious Studies
The Catholic University of America
Washington, D.C.

MARIE A. CONN, PH.D.
Assistant Professor of Religious Studies
Chestnut Hill College
Philadelphia, Pennsylvania

MARTIN F. CONNELL, M.A., PH.D. CAND.
Department of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

JAMES T. CONNELLY, C.S.C., PH.D.
Associate Professor of History
University of Portland
Portland, Oregon

MICHAEL L. COOK., S.J. TH.D.
Professor of Religious Studies
Gonzaga University
Spokane, Washington

M. SHAWN COPELAND, PH.D.
Associate Professor of Theology
Marquette University
Milwaukee, Wisconsin

JAMES A. CORIDEN, J.C.D., J.D.
Professor of Canon Law
Washington Theological Union
Silver Spring, Maryland

ANN HIRSCHMAN COTTINGHAM, M.A.R., PH.D. CAND.
Department of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

STEVEN D. CRAIN, PH.D.
Adjunct Assistant Professor of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

PAUL G. CROWLEY, S.J., PH.D.
Assistant Professor of Religious Studies
Santa Clara University
Santa Clara, California

LAWRENCE S. CUNNINGHAM, PH.D.
Professor and Chair of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

CHARLES E. CURRAN, S.T.D.
Elizabeth Scurlock Professor of Human Values
Southern Methodist University
Dallas, Texas

ROBERT EMMETT CURRAN, S.J., PH.D.
Associate Professor of History
Georgetown University
Washington, D.C.

FREDERICK J. CWIEKOWSKI, S.S., S.T.D.
Professor of Systematic Theology
St. Patrick's Seminary
Menlo Park, California

BRIAN E. DALEY, S.J., D.PHIL.
Associate Professor of Historical Theology
Weston Jesuit School of Theology
Cambridge, Massachusetts

NANCY A. DALLAVALLE, PH.D.
Assistant Professor of Religious Studies
Fairfield University
Fairfield, Connecticut

CORNELIUS F. DELANEY, PH.D.
Professor of Philosophy
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

ANGEL DELGADO-GOMEZ, PH.D.
Associate Professor of Spanish
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

TERRENCE E. DEMPSEY, S.J., PH.D.
Assistant Professor of Artistry and Director, Museum of Contemporary Religious Art
St. Louis University
St. Louis, Missouri

DANIEL DiDOMIZIO, S.T.D.
Professor of Religious Studies
Cardinal Stritch College
Milwaukee, Wisconsin

JOSEPH A. DI NOIA, O.P., PH.D.
Professor of Theology
Dominican House of Studies
Washington, D.C.

WILLIAM J. DOHAR, C.S.C., PH.D.
Associate Professor of History
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

JAY P. DOLAN, PH.D.
Professor of History
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

JOHN R. DONAHUE, S.J., PH.D.
Professor of New Testament
Jesuit School of Theology at Berkeley/Graduate Theological Union
Berkeley, California

MARY ANN DONOVAN, S.C., PH.D.
Professor of Historical Theology
Jesuit School of Theology at Berkeley/Graduate Theological Union
Berkeley, California

LEONARD DOOHAN, S.T.D.
Professor of Religious Studies and Dean, Graduate School
Gonzaga University
Spokane, Washington

MARGARET DORGAN, D.C.M., A.B.
John of the Cross Monastery Hermitage
Orland, Maine

ELIZABETH A. DREYER, PH.D.
Associate Professor of Ecclesiastical History
Washington Theological Union
Silver Spring, Maryland

REGIS A. DUFFY, O.F.M., S.T.D.
Associate Professor of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

CHRISTIAN Y. DUPONT, M.A., PH.D. CAND.
Department of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

KEITH J. EGAN, PH.D.
Professor and Chair of Religious Studies
Saint Mary's College
Notre Dame, Indiana

E. ROZANNE ELDER, PH.D.
Director, Institute of Cistercian Studies
Western Michigan University
Kalamazoo, Michigan

VIRGILIO ELIZONDO, S.T.D.
Professor of Pastoral Theology
Mexican American Cultural Center
San Antonio, Texas

MICHAEL E. ENGH, S.J., PH.D.
Associate Professor of History
Loyola Marymount University
Los Angeles, California

MARY EWENS, O.P., PH.D.
Executive Director, Conrad N. Hilton Fund for Sisters
Los Angeles, California

MICHAEL B. FABRY, M.A., PH.D. CAND.
Systematic and Philosophical Theology
Graduate Theological Union
Berkeley, California

MICHAEL A. FAHEY, S.J., DR.THEOL.
Dean, Faculty of Theology
University of St. Michael's College
Toronto, Ontario, Canada

JAMES W. FELT, S.J., PH.D.
Jesuit Community Professor of Philosophy
Santa Clara University
Santa Clara, California

BARBARA A. FINAN, PH.D.
Associate Professor of Theology
Ohio Dominican College
Columbus, Ohio

MITCH FINLEY, M.A.
Author and Speaker
Spokane, Washington

EUGENE J. FISHER, PH.D.
Associate Director, Secretariat for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs
National Conference of Catholic Bishops
Washington, D.C.

JOSEPH A. FITZMYER, S.J., PH.D.
Professor Emeritus of Biblical Studies
The Catholic University of America
Washington, D.C.

DARLENE K. FLAMING, M.DIV., PH.D. CAND.
Department of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

PETER W. FLINT, PH.D.
Professor of Biblical Studies
Southwestern College
Phoenix, Arizona

GERALD P. FOGARTY, S.J., PH.D.
Professor of Religious Studies and History University of Virginia
Charlottesville, Virginia

J. MASSYNGBAERDE FORD, PH.D.
Professor of New Testament
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

JOHN T. FORD, C.S.C., S.T.D.
Professor of Theology and Associate Dean, School of Religious Studies
The Catholic University of America
Washington, D.C.

MARK R. FRANCIS, C.S.V., S.L.D.
Assistant Professor of Liturgy
Catholic Theological Union
Chicago, Illinois

RICHARD R. GAILLARDETZ, PH.D.
Assistant Professor of Systematic Theology
University of St. Thomas School of Theology
Houston, Texas

CLARENCE GALLAGHER, S.J., J.C.D.
Professor of Oriental Canon Law
Pontifical Oriental Institute
Rome, Italy

MICHAEL O. GARVEY, B.A.
Assistant Director, Public Relations and Information
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

THOMAS W. GEDEON, S.J., B.A.
Executive Director, Retreats International
Notre Dame, Indiana

PHILIP GLEASON, PH.D.
Professor of History
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

GEORGE E. GRIENER, S.J., TH.D.
Assistant Professor of Systematic Theology
Jesuit School of Theology at Berkeley
Berkeley, California

COLLEEN M. GRIFFITH, TH.D.
Lecturer in Pastoral Theology
Boston College
Chestnut Hill, Massachusetts

DANIEL P. GRIGASSY, O.F.M., PH.D.
Assistant Professor of Word and Worship
Washington Theological Union
Silver Spring, Maryland

THOMAS H. GROOME, ED.D.
Professor of Theology and Religious Education Institute of Religious Education and Pastoral Ministry
Boston College
Chestnut Hill, Massachusetts

RICHARD M. GULA, S.S., PH.D.
Professor of Moral Theology
St. Patrick's Seminary
Menlo Park, California

ROGER HAIGHT, S.J., PH.D.
Professor of Systematic and Historical Theology
Weston Jesuit School of Theology
Cambridge, Massachusetts

RONALD P. HAMEL, PH.D.
Senior Associate
The Park Ridge Center
Chicago, Illinois

MICHAEL S. HAMILTON, M.A.
Coordinator, Pew Scholars Program
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

G. SIMON HARAK, S.J., PH.D.
Associate Professor of Theological Ethics
Fairfield University
Fairfield, Connecticut

ROBERT F. HARVANEK, S.J., PH.D.
Professor Emeritus of Philosophy
Loyola University of Chicago
Chicago, Illinois

ADRIAN HASTINGS, D.D.
Emeritus Professor of Theology
University of Leeds
Leeds, England

JOHN F. HAUGHT, PH.D.
Professor of Theology
Georgetown University
Washington, D.C.

JOHN C. HAWLEY, PH.D.
Associate Professor of English
Santa Clara University
Santa Clara, California

PETER HEBBLETHWAITE, M.A. (D. 1994)
Vatican Affairs Writer
National Catholic Reporter
Oxford, England

J. BRYAN HEHIR, TH.D.
Professor of the Practice in Religion and Society
Harvard Divinity School
Cambridge, Massachusetts

JAMES HENNESEY, S.J., PH.D.
Rector, Jesuit Community
St. Peter's College
Jersey City, New Jersey

MARY CATHERINE HILKERT, O.P., PH.D.
Associate Professor of Systematic Theology
Aquinas Institute of Theology
St. Louis, Missouri

KENNETH R. HIMES, O.F.M., PH.D.
Associate Professor of Moral Theology
Washington Theological Union
Silver Spring, Maryland

MICHAEL J. HIMES, PH.D.
Associate Professor of Theology
Boston College
Chestnut Hill, Massachusetts

BRADFORD E. HINZE, PH.D.
Associate Professor of Theology
Marquette University
Milwaukee, Wisconsin

MARK D. HOLTZ, M.M.S., PH.D. CAND.
Medieval Institute
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

FRANCIS J. HOUDEK, S.J., PH.D.
Assistant Professor of Historical and Systematic Theology
Jesuit School of Theology at Berkeley
Berkeley, California

JOHN W. HOUGHTON, PH.D.
Instructor of English
Mary Institute and St. Louis Country Day School
St. Louis, Missouri

JOHN M. HUELS, O.S.M., J.C.D.
Associate Professor of Canon Law
Catholic Theological Union
Chicago, Illinois

GERARD JACOBITZ, M.A., PH.D. CAND.
Department of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

JOSEPH JENSEN, O.S.B., S.T.D.
Associate Professor, School of Religious Studies and Executive Secretary, Catholic Biblical Association
The Catholic University of America
Washington, D.C.

ELIZABETH A. JOHNSON, C.S.J., PH.D.
Professor of Systematic Theology
Fordham University
Bronx, New York

KATHRYN L. JOHNSON, M.PHIL.
Assistant Professor of Historical Theology
Louisville Presbyterian Theological Seminary
Louisville, Kentucky

PHYLLIS H. KAMINSKI, PH.D.
Assistant Professor of Religious Studies
Saint Mary's College
Notre Dame, Indiana

CHRISTOPHER J. KAUFFMAN, PH.D.
Catholic Daughters of the Americas Professor of Church History
The Catholic University of America
Washington, D.C.

EILEEN F. KEARNEY, PH.D.
Associate Professor of the History of Theology
Saint Xavier College
Chicago, Illinois

ANTHONY W. KEATY, M.A., PH.D. CAND.
Department of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

THOMAS G. KELLIHER, JR., M.A., PH.D. CAND.
Department of History
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

DAVID F. KELLY, PH.D.
Professor of Theology and Health Care Ethics
Duquesne University
Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania

EUGENE C. KENNEDY, PH.D.
Professor of Psychology
Loyola University of Chicago
Chicago, Illinois

ROBERT P. KENNEDY, M.A., PH.D. CAND.
Department of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

ROBERT T. KENNEDY, J.U.D.
Associate Professor of Canon Law
The Catholic University of America
Washington, D.C.

ROBERT A. KRIEG, C.S.C., PH.D.
Associate Professor of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

DANIEL KROGER, O.F.M., PH.D.
Professor of Christian Ethics
Our Lady of Angels Seminary
Quezon City, Philippines

JOHN S. KSELMAN, S.S., PH.D.
Associate Professor of Old Testament
Weston Jesuit School of Theology
Cambridge, Massachusetts

HANS KÜNG, DR.THEOL.
Professor of Ecumenical Theology and Director, Ecumenical Institute for Ecumenical Research University of Tübingen
Tübingen, Germany

CATHERINE MOWRY LACUGNA, PH.D.
Professor of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

ALICE L. LAFFEY, S.S.D.
Associate Professor of Old Testament
College of the Holy Cross
Worcester, Massachusetts

JOHN F. LAHEY, C.S.C., J.C.D.
Assistant Professional Specialist
Department of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

MATTHEW L. LAMB, DR.THEOL.
Professor of Theology
Boston College
Chestnut Hill, Massachusetts

DERMOT A. LANE, S.T.D.
Lecturer in Confessional Theology
Irish School of Ecumenics
Dublin, Ireland

JOHN P. LANGAN, S.J., PH.D.
Rose Kennedy Professor of Christian Ethics
Kennedy Institute of Ethics
Georgetown University
Washington, D.C.

MICHAEL G. LAWLER, PH.D.
Professor of Theology
Creighton University
Omaha, Nebraska

DONAL P. LEADER, C.F.C., PH.D.
Academic Director, Marino Institute of Education
Dublin, Ireland

JAMES LE GRYS, PH.D.
Managing Editor, The Thomist
Washington, D.C.

BLAKE LEYERLE, PH.D.
Assistant Professor of Early Christian History
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

ALISON LIDSTAD, M.A.
South Bend, Indiana

GERARD H. LUTTENBERGER, C.M., S.T.D.
Professor of Systematic Theology
Seminary of the Immaculate Conception
Huntington, New York

GARY MACY, PH.D.
Professor of Religious Studies
University of San Diego
San Diego, California

EDWARD J. MALATESTA, S.J., S.S.D.
Director, Ricci Institute
University of San Francisco
San Francisco, California

ELENA MALITS, C.S.C., PH.D.
Professor of Religious Studies
Saint Mary's College
Notre Dame, Indiana

MARTIN E. MARTY, PH.D.
Professor of Religious History
The Divinity School, University of Chicago
Chicago, Illinois

MARCHITA B. MAUCK, PH.D.
Professor of Art History
Louisiana State University
Baton Rouge, Louisiana

RICHARD P. MCBRIEN, S.T.D.
Crowley-O'Brien-Walter Professor of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

RICHARD A. MCCORMICK, S.J., S.T.D.
John A. O'Brien Professor of Christian Ethics
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

ELIZABETH MCDONOUGH, O.P., J.C.D.
Canonical Consultant Archdiocese of Washington
Washington, D.C.

ANNE C. MCGUIRE, M.A., PH.D. CAND.
Department of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

MARY J. McKAY, C.S.J., PH.D.
Assistant Professor of Religious Studies
Mount St. Mary's College
Los Angeles, California

ELIZABETH McKEOWN, PH.D.
Associate Professor of Theology
Georgetown University
Washington, D.C.

GERALD McKEVITT, S.J., PH.D.
Professor of History
Santa Clara University
Santa Clara, California

R. EMMET McLAUGHLIN, PH.D.
Associate Professor of Religious Studies
Villanova University
Villanova, Pennsylvania

PATRICIA McNEAL, PH.D.
Director of Women's Studies
Indiana University at South Bend
South Bend, Indiana

MARY JO MEADOW, S.F.C.C., PH.D.
Professor of Psychology and Director of Religious Studies
Mankato State University
Mankato, Minnesota

JOHN ALLYN MELLOH, S.M., PH.D.
Director, John S. Marten Program in Homiletics and Liturgics
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

MARK MILLER, C.SS.R, PH.D.
Director
Redemptorist Bioethic Consultancy for Western Canada
Edmonton, Alberta, Canada

VINCENT J. MILLER, M.A., PH.D. CAND.
Department of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

GEORGE MINAMIKI, S.J., PH.D.
Associate Professor Emeritus of Classical/Oriental Language and Literature
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

WILSON D. MISCAMBLE, C.S.C., PH.D.
Associate Professor and Chair of History
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

NATHAN D. MITCHELL
Associate Director of Research, Center for Pastoral Liturgy
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

SANDRA YOCUM MIZE, PH.D.
Assistant Professor of Religious Studies
University of Dayton
Dayton, Ohio

DOMINIC V. MONTI, O.F.M., PH.D.
Associate Professor of Ecclesiastical History
Washington Theological Union
Silver Spring, Maryland

CATHERINE M. MURPHY, M.A., PH.D. CAND.
Department of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

JEROME MURPHY-O'CONNOR, O.P., TH.D.
Professor of New Testament
École Biblique et Archéologique Française
Jerusalem, Israel

SUSAN E. MYERS, M.A., PH.D. CAND.
Department of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

W. DAVID MYERS, PH.D.
Assistant Professor of History
Fordham University
Bronx, New York

JOHN J. NAVONE, S.J., TH.D.
Professor of Biblical Theology
Gregorian University
Rome, Italy

PAUL R. NELSON, PH.D.
Director for Worship Evangelical Lutheran Church in America
Chicago, Illinois

JEROME H. NEYREY, S.J., PH.D.
Professor of New Testament
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

JON NILSON, PH.D.
Associate Professor of Theology
Loyola University of Chicago
Chicago, Illinois

LAWRENCE M. NJOROGE, PH.D.
Chair, Department of Education
Catholic University of Eastern Africa
Karen, Nairobi, Kenya

DAVID J. O'BRIEN, PH.D.
Professor of History
College of the Holy Cross
Worcester, Massachusetts

STEPHEN J. OCHS, PH.D.
Chair, History Department
Georgetown Preparatory School
North Bethesda, Maryland

GERALD G. O'COLLINS, S.J., PH.D.
Professor of Fundamental Theology
Gregorian University
Rome, Italy

KEVIN G. O'CONNELL, S.J., PH.D.
Provincial Offices
New England Province of the Society of Jesus
Boston, Massachusetts

MARVIN R. O'CONNELL, PH.D.
Professor of History
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

DAVID K. O'CONNOR, PH.D.
Associate Professor of Philosophy
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

MICHAEL E. O'KEEFFE, PH.D.
Assistant Professor of Religious Studies
Mercyhurst College
Erie, Pennsylvania

JOHN W. O'MALLEY, S.J., PH.D.
Professor of Church History
Weston Jesuit School of Theology
Cambridge, Massachusetts

THOMAS F. O'MEARA, O.P., PH.D.
William K. Warren Professor of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

MARY AQUIN O'NEILL, R.S.M., PH.D.
Director, Mount St. Agnes Theological Center for Women
Baltimore, Maryland

LADISLAS ORSY, S.J., D.C.L.
Professor Emeritus of Canon Law
The Catholic University of America
Washington, D.C.

KENAN B. OSBORNE, O.F.M., DR.THEOL.
Professor of Systematic Theology
Franciscan School of Theology/ Graduate Theological Union
Berkeley, California

CAROLYN OSIEK, R.S.C.J., TH.D.
Professor of New Testament
Catholic Theological Union
Chicago, Illinois

JAMES M. O'TOOLE, PH.D.
Associate Professor of History
University of Massachusetts–Boston
Boston, Massachusetts

RONALD A. PACHENCE, PH.D.
Professor of Religious Studies
University of San Diego
San Diego, California

KIM PAFFENROTH, M.T.S., PH.D. CAND.
Department of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

ROBERT S. PELTON, C.S.C., S.T.D.
Faculty Fellow
Helen Kellog Institute for International Studies
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

PHEME PERKINS, PH.D.
Professor of Theology
Boston College
Chestnut Hill, Massachusetts

MICHAEL PHAYER, PH.D.
Professor of History
Marquette University
Milwaukee, Wisconsin

MARY ALICE PIIL, C.S.J., PH.D.
Professor of Liturgy
Seminary of the Immaculate Conception
Huntington, New York

MICHAEL D. PLACE, S.T.D.
Research Theologian to the Curia Archdiocese of Chicago
Chicago, Illinois

FRANCES FORDE PLUDE, PH.D.
Associate Professor of Communications
Notre Dame College of Ohio
South Euclid, Ohio

ERIC PLUMER, M.A. (OXFORD)
Teaching Fellow
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

JANICE M. POORMAN, M.A.
Assistant Dean, Graduate School
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

MARK L. POORMAN, C.S.C., PH.D.
Assistant Professor of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

STEPHEN J. POPE, PH.D.
Associate Professor of Theology
Boston College
Chestnut Hill, Massachusetts

JEAN PORTER, PH.D.
Associate Professor of Christian Ethics/Moral Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

HERMANN J. POTTMEYER, DR.THEOL., LIC.PHIL.
Professor of Fundamental Theology
Ruhr-Universität
Bochum, Germany

THOMAS J. POUNDSTONE, M.A., PH.D. CAND.
Department of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

F. CLARK POWER, ED.D.
Associate Professor, Program of Liberal Studies
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

WALTER H. PRINCIPE, C.S.B., M.S.D.
Professor Emeritus of Theology
Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies University of Toronto
Toronto, Ontario, Canada

LOUISE PROCHASKA, S.N.D., PH.D.
Assistant Professor of Theology
Notre Dame College of Ohio
South Euclid, Ohio

JAMES H. PROVOST, J.C.D.
Professor of Canon Law
The Catholic University of America
Washington, D.C.

JOHN F. QUINN, PH.D.
Assistant Professor of History
Salve Regina University
Newport, Rhode Island

MARGARET M. QUINN, C.S.J., PH.D.
Archivist, Congregation of Sisters of St. Joseph Brentwood, New York

KATHLEEN L. RILEY, PH.D.
Adjunct Assistant Professor of History
Canisius College
Buffalo, New York

RONALD G. ROBERSON, C.S.P., S.E.O.D.
Formation Team
St. Paul's College
Washington, D.C.

JOHN R. SACHS, S.J., DR.THEOL.
Associate Professor of Theology
Weston Jesuit School of Theology
Cambridge, Massachusetts

ANTHONY J. SALDARINI, PH.D.
Professor of New Testament and Judaism
Boston College
Chestnut Hill, Massachusetts

T. HOWLAND SANKS, S.J., PH.D.
Professor of Theology
Jesuit School of Theology at Berkeley
Berkeley, California

EDWARD B. SCHARFENBERGER, J.C.L.
Judicial Vicar
Diocese of Brooklyn
Brooklyn, New York

DAVID L. SCHINDLER, PH.D.
Gagnon Professor of Fundamental Theology
John Paul II Institute for Studies on Marriage and Family
Washington, D.C.

GERALD W. SCHLABACH, M.A.T.S., PH.D. CAND.
Department of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

SANDRA M. SCHNEIDERS, I.H.M., S.T.D.
Professor of New Testament Studies and Christian Spirituality
Jesuit School of Theology at Berkeley/Graduate Theological Union
Berkeley, California

ROBERT SCHREITER, C.PP.S., DR.THEOL.
Professor of Doctrinal Theology
Catholic Theological Union
Chicago, Illinois

BONAVENTURE SCULLY, C.F.X., M.S.
Adjunct Instructor, Freshman Writing Program
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

MARK SEARLE, DR.THEOL. (D. 1992)
Associate Professor of Liturgical Studies
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

SOPHIA SENYK, O.S.B.M., S.E.O.D.
Professor of Church History
Pontifical Oriental Institute
Rome, Italy

ROBERT W. SHAFFERN, PH.D.
Visiting Assistant Professor of History
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

PHILIP F. SHELDRAKE, M.TH.
Lecturer in Church History
Cambridge Theological Federation
Cambridge, England

ANTHONY F. SHERMAN
Adjunct Professor of Liturgy
Seminary of the Immaculate Conception
Huntington, New York

MICHAEL A. SIGNER, PH.D.
Abrams Professor of Jewish Thought and Culture
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

CONSTANTINE SIMON, S.J., S.E.O.D.
Professor of Church History
Pontifical Oriental Institute
Rome, Italy

KEVIN J. SMANT, PH.D.
Adjunct Associate Professor of History
Indiana University at South Bend
South Bend, Indiana

JOANMARIE SMITH, C.S.J., PH.D.
Professor of Pastoral Theology
Methodist Theological School in Ohio
Delaware, Ohio

RALPH F. SMITH, PH.D. (D. 1994)
Associate Professor of Liturgics
Wartburg Theological Seminary
Dubuque, Iowa

THOMAS A. SMITH, PH.D.
Associate Professor of Historical Theology
Loyola University
New Orleans, Louisiana

MARINA B. SMYTH, PH.D.
Librarian, Medieval Institute
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

GRAYDON F. SNYDER, TH.D.
Professor of New Testament
Chicago Theological Seminary
Chicago, Illinois

THOMAS W. SPALDING, C.F.X., PH.D.
Professor of History
Spalding University
Louisville, Kentucky

J. MICHAEL STEBBINS, PH.D.
Senior Fellow
Woodstock Theological Center
Georgetown University
Washington, D.C.

GREGORY E. STERLING, PH.D.
Assistant Professor of New Testament and Christian Origins
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

WILLIAM R. STOEGER, S.J., PH.D.
Staff Astrophysicist
Vatican Observatory Research Group
Steward Observatory
University of Arizona
Tucson, Arizona

THOMAS F. STRANSKY, C.S.P.
Rector, Ecumenical Institute for Theological Studies (Tantur)
Jerusalem, Israel

JOHN J. STRYNKOWSKI, S.T.D.
Professor of Systematic Theology
Seminary of the Immaculate Conception
Huntington, New York

SUSAN M. ST. VILLE, M.A., PH.D. CAND.
Assistant Professor of Religion
St. Lawrence University
Canton, New York

FRANCIS A. SULLIVAN, S.J., S.T.D.
Professor Emeritus of Theology
Gregorian University
Rome, Italy
and Adjunct Professor of Ecclesiology
Boston College
Chestnut Hill, Massachusetts

ANNE MARIE SWEET, O.S.B., PH.D.
Mount St. Scholastica Convent
Atchison, Kansas

JAMES H. SWETNAM, S.J., D.PHIL.
Professor of New Testament Greek Pontifical Biblical Institute
Rome, Italy

ROBERT F. TAFT, S.J., S.E.O.D.
Professor of Oriental Liturgy
Pontifical Oriental Institute
Rome, Italy

CAROL A. TAUER, PH.D.
Professor of Philosophy
College of St. Catherine
St. Paul, Minnesota

GEORGE H. TAVARD, A.A., S.T.D.
Distinguished Professor of Theology
Marquette University
Milwaukee, Wisconsin

JEAN M. ROGER TILLARD, O.P., TH.D.
Professor of Dogmatic Theology
Dominican Faculty of Theology
Ottawa, Ontario, Canada

MARY KATHERINE TILLMAN, PH.D.
Associate Professor, Program of Liberal Studies
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

THOMAS H. TOBIN, S.J., PH.D.
Associate Professor of Theology
Loyola University of Chicago
Chicago, Illinois

KERN R. TREMBATH, PH.D.
Assistant Chairman, Department of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

ROBERT F. TRISCO, S.T.D., HIST.ECCL.D.
Professor of Church History and American History
The Catholic University of America
Washington, D.C.

EUGENE ULRICH, PH.D.
Professor of Hebrew Scriptures
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

JAMES C. VANDERKAM, PH.D.
Professor of Hebrew Scriptures
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

JEFFREY T. VANDERWILT, M.A., PH.D. CAND.
Department of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

JACINTA VAN WINKEL, M.A.
Associate Professor of Theology
Carlow College
Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania

JAIME R. VIDAL, PH.D.
Associate Professor of Hispanic Ministry
Pontifical College Josephinum
Columbus, Ohio

PATRICIA MARY VINJE, O.C.V., PH.D.
Milwaukee, Wisconsin

BENEDICT VIVIANO, O.P., PH.D.
Professor of New Testament
École Biblique et Archéologique Française
Jerusalem, Israel

JAMES K. VOISS, S.J., S.T.L., PH.D. CAND.
Department of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

ANNE M. VOLK., M.DIV.
Assistant, Sex Offense Services
South Bend, Indiana

CHRYSOGONUS WADDEL, O.C.S.O., S.TH.L.
Professor of Liturgy, Monastic History, and Medieval Spirituality
Our Lady of Gethsemani Abbey
Trappist, Kentucky

MICHAEL WALDSTEIN, PH.D., TH.D.
Assistant Professor of New Testament
Program of Liberal Studies
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

LINDA WALL, M.DIV.
Pastoral Minister
Christ Church Newman Center
St. Cloud State University
St. Cloud, Minnesota

JAMES J. WALTER, PH.D.
Professor of Christian Ethics
Loyola University of Chicago
Chicago, Illinois

JOSEPH P. WAWRYKOW, PH.D.
Associate Professor of History of Christianity
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

JOHN F. WELCH, O.CARM., PH.D.
Professor of Spirituality
Washington Theological Union
Silver Spring, Maryland

JOHN P. WELLE, PH.D.
Associate Professor of Italian
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

JANET M. WELSH, O.P., M.A., PH.D. CAND.
Department of History
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

JAMES F. WHITE, PH.D.
Professor of Liturgical Studies
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

JOSEPH M. WHITE
Research Associate
POLIS Research Center
Indiana University–Purdue University
Indianapolis, Indiana

TODD DAVID WHITMORE, PH.D.
Assistant Professor of Social Ethics
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

CORINNE WINTER, M.A., PH.D. CAND.
Assistant Professor of Theology
St. Ambrose University
Davenport, Iowa

JAMES A. WISEMAN, O.S.B., S.T.D.
Associate Professor of Theology
The Catholic University of America
Washington, D.C.

PAUL J. WOJDA, PH.D.
Assistant Professor of Theology
University of St. Thomas
St. Paul, Minnesota

SUSAN K. WOOD, S.C.L., PH.D.
Associate Professor of Theology
Saint John's University
Collegeville, Minnesota

MICHAEL S. WOODWARD, PH.D.
Professor of History
University of Northern Colorado
Greeley, Colorado

LAWRENCE G. WRENN, J.C.D.
Judicial Vicar
Court of Appeals, Province of Hartford
Hartford, Connecticut

JOHN H. WRIGHT, S.J., S.T.D.
Professor Emeritus of Systematic Theology
Jesuit School of Theology at Berkeley
Berkeley, California

JOHN H. YODER, DR.THEOL.
Professor of Theology
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

KATHERINE TEPAS YOHE, PH.D.
Assistant Professor of Theology
LaSalle University
Philadelphia, Pennsylvania

RANDALL C. ZACHMAN, PH.D.
Assistant Professor of Reformation Studies
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana

FOREWORD

The Catholic Church and the religious tradition it embodies have been twenty centuries in the making. Today we stand on the threshold not only of a new century but of a new millennium. It is particularly fitting, therefore, that this extraordinary compendium of Catholic belief and practice should be published at this time.

The HarperCollins Encyclopedia of Catholicism will afford the many thousands who consult it a splendid opportunity to grasp the full sweep of Catholic life and history: its doctrines and theologies, its religious orders and spiritualities, its liturgies and devotions, its sacraments and creeds, its councils and synods, its literature and art, its music and sculpture, its sacred objects and sacred texts, its rules and regulations, its heresies and schisms, its saints and sinners, its good popes and bad.

One is struck by the enormous sweep of the encyclopedia's content. There are feature articles on major doctrinal and moral issues such as the papacy and grace, abortion and social justice. There are entries on celebrated and obscure saints alike: Augustine of Hippo and Thomas Aquinas, as well as Abbo of Fleury and John Leonardi; Catherine of Siena and Teresa of Ávila, as well as Anastasia and Maria Mazzarello. There seems to be an endless stream of short articles on items many of us older Catholics, with deep roots in the pre–Vatican II period, will have long forgotten about: custody of the eyes, the maniple, interdict, Liber Usualis, and spiritual bouquet, to name only a few. This is a veritable treasury of facts and information. The most assiduous student of Catholicism, inside and outside the Church, will be hard-pressed to name a relevant topic, large or small, that hasn't been included in this book.

I am impressed, however, not only by the encyclopedia's comprehensiveness, but also by its clarity and balance. Definitions are to the point. Descriptions are always pertinent and informative. Explanations are presented objectively, without the intrusion of the author's own opinions or preferences. While the encyclopedia is not slavishly literal when it comes to the Church's official teachings, it takes care to present those teachings in their fullness and, where relevant, to summarize the theological discussions that have so often swirled around those teachings. Although the many hundreds of articles are written by people who are experts in their fields, the presentations are accessible to the average reader, which is most of us. No one, not even a scholar who has been a lifelong Catholic, knows everything there is to know about Catholicism. We all have something to learn or to discover anew. This volume, then, is for everyone, and the editors and the publishers have done well remembering that vast audience for whom it has been written.

Although an encyclopedia of Catholicism, the book is ecumenical in the range of topics it treats, the manner in which its addresses them, and the authors it has selected to write them. I am especially impressed that two of my good friends in the ecumenical world have contributed major articles: George L. Carey, the Archbishop of Canterbury, has written a particularly illuminating piece on Anglicanism, and Martin E. Marty, of the University of Chicago, has produced a wonderfully instructive and fair-minded entry on Protestantism. But other Anglicans and Protestants have also contributed to the book, and so has Rabbi Michael Signer, the Abrams Professor of Jewish Thought and Culture at the University of Notre Dame.

Which raises one final point. I am particularly proud of the fact that so much of the creative thought and scholarly energy that went into this remarkable volume have their source right here at Notre Dame. The general editor, Father Richard McBrien, and the great majority of the associate editors are members of the Notre Dame faculty. Even the few associate editors who are not currently on the Notre Dame faculty once were. Many of the contributors of individual articles are also associated with Notre Dame in one way or another. It is fitting, in my judgment, that the University of Notre Dame should have played so prominent a role in the production of this encyclopedia. Few institutions around the world are so closely identified with Catholicism, and few institutions have so great a responsibility to accurately reflect and effectively communicate the riches of that tradition to a broader public. This book does that very well indeed.

I would be remiss if I did not conclude, on behalf of all who will profit spiritually and intellectually from this encyclopedia, with a word of sincere thanks to the General Editor, Father Richard McBrien. Without his inspiration, his planning, and his long days and nights of writing, rewriting, and editing over a span of years, this wonderful gift to all of us would never have seen the light of day. Scholarship is a lonely task, but good scholarship in a work of high quality and great need is a gift beyond all calculation. But then, as John Henry Cardinal Newman said, "Calculation never made a hero." Richard McBrien, in producing this unique encyclopedia, is indeed a rare hero.

THEODORE M. HESBURGH, C.S.C.
President Emeritus
University of Notre Dame

INTRODUCTION

The purpose of this encyclopedia is to provide a convenient and reliable source of information regarding every aspect of Catholicism, past and present, in clear, accessible prose for the widest possible audience. That purpose may seem, at first glance, too ambitious, but readers will find in this volume some 4,200 carefully edited, alphabetically arranged entries of varying lengths, totaling more than 800,000 words, written by 280 experts covering a vast range of topics in Catholic theology, doctrine, biblical scholarship, history, culture, ministries, governing structures, worship, sacramental life, spirituality, art, architecture, literature, and canon law. Some individual entries are illustrated and the volume itself is enhanced by color and black-and-white photographs, maps, tables, charts, and drawings. The encyclopedia is intended for nonspecialists, including scholars in one field who are nonspecialists in others: teachers and students at all levels, clergy, religious, lay ministers, seminarians, journalists, those in such professions as law and medicine, as well as the general public, Catholic and non-Catholic alike.

In preparing such a resource, we have tried as far as possible to avoid technical language. Where we could not do so, we have taken care to define terms and to explain references with which general readers might not be familiar. When foreign words are used, the language is identified and translated, and, where appropriate, a pronunciation is provided.

We have also tried to make each entry self-sufficient. Throughout the volume we have employed the principle of "one-stop shopping." Readers are usually not required to consult four or five other entries just to understand all the key terms and references in the entry initially consulted. The purpose of the many cross-references, therefore, is only to assist readers who want to have a fuller description and explanation of related topics.

SCOPE

The encyclopedia focuses on a subject that is at once particular and universal. It is particular in that Catholicism refers to a specific religious tradition, a specific religious community, and a specific way of life. But Catholicism is also universal, as the literal meaning of the word suggests. It is in principle open to all reality: to every truth, every value, every culture, every human experience.

Insofar as Catholicism is a particular tradition, community, and way of life, the encyclopedia defines and describes topics that are associated with Catholicism exclusively or at least primarily. Thus, there are entries on religious orders such as the Jesuits, Benedictines, Franciscans, Dominicans, and Carmelites; on popes such as Damasus I, Leo the Great, Gregory VII, Pius XII, John XXIII, and John Paul II; on theological and doctrinal topics such as apostolic succession, papal primacy, infallibility, the seven sacraments, the Immaculate Conception; on saints such as Francis of Assisi, Catherine of Siena, Thomas Aquinas, Elizabeth Ann Bayley Seton, Ignatius of Loyola, and Thérèse of Lisieux; on literature such as Introduction to the Devout Life, Imitation of Christ, Ascent of Mount Carmel, Rule of St. Benedict, and Spiritual Exercises; on devotions such as the Rosary, Stations of the Cross, Benediction, and holy hour; on ecumenical councils such as Nicaea, Trent, Vatican I, and Vatican II; on organizations such as Christian Family Movement, Catholic Theological Society of America, Opus Dei, and the National Conference of Catholic Bishops; on structures such as the College of Cardinals, the Roman Curia, and the World Synod of Bishops; on institutions such as the University of Notre Dame, Georgetown University, St. Patrick's Cathedral, and the Abbey of Our Lady of Gethsemani; on Marian topics such as the virgin birth, Mediatrix, apparitions, the Assumption, and Mariology; and on Eastern Catholicism's rites, churches, liturgies, canon law, and people.

But insofar as Catholicism is a catholic reality—both universal and inclusive—it is open to, and draws from, the spiritual riches of Orthodox, Anglican, Protestant, Oriental, Jewish, Muslim, Buddhist, and other religious traditions. Accordingly, the encyclopedia has entries on Martin Luther, John Calvin, Ulrich Zwingli, Menno Simons, Sergius of Radonezh, Photius, Thomas Cranmer, Moses Maimonides, the Koran, and the ecumenical movement. There are separate entries, for example, on Protestantism, written by Martin E. Marty, and on Anglicanism, written by the Archbishop of Canterbury, George L. Carey. There are entries as well on art, science, music, and literature: on Michelangelo, Raphael, Dante Alighieri, Leonardo da Vinci, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, Czeslaw Milosz, Flannery O'Connor, Evelyn Waugh, and Graham Greene. And there are entries on Catholicism throughout the world: in particular countries, in particular regions, and on particular continents—all with appropriate statistical information.

RANGE OF THE ARTICLES

Readers will find entries that discuss major topics in greater depth, that provide accurate and useful biographical information on a wide assortment of persons, living and dead, and that offer precise information regarding the myriad of details that constitute the nature and function of Catholicism. Thus, in the "A's" alone there are lengthier entries on abortion, Catholicism in Africa, Americanism, Anointing of the Sick, Apostles' Creed, Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary, Catholicism in Australia, and authority. There are biographical entries on Peter Abelard, Lord John Acton, Karl Adam, St. Agatha, St. Agnes, St. Margaret Mary Alacoque, St. Albertus Magnus, Pope Alexander VI, St. Aloysius Gonzaga, St. Alphonsus Liguori, St. Ambrose of Milan, St. Angela Merici, St. Athanasius, and St. Augustine of Hippo. And there are more pointed identifications and explanations of such items as abbey nullius, abstinence, acolyte, ad limina visit, affective prayer, akolouthia, altar society, ambo, amice, anaphora, anathema, angel, annulment, apostasy, apostolic delegate, archimandrite, asperges, and auxiliary bishop. But these are only samples. There are nearly 350 separate entries under "A" alone.

The diversity and variable lengths of the many entries suggest that the volume, although self-described as an encyclopedia, combines the advantages of both an encyclopedia and a dictionary.

FORMAT: ENTRIES, ILLUSTRATIONS, AND TABLES

Each entry has the same basic structure. The entry title is followed by a fragment of a sentence that defines the topic or that indicates what is most important or most central to it. When the entry is biographical, the person's years of birth and death are given first. In a few instances where experts differ, we have allowed inconsistencies to stand, as a reminder that our knowledge of the ancient and medieval world remains imperfect. If the person is a saint, the feast day is given at the end of the entry. When there is need for assistance with pronunciation, the name or item is also spelled phonetically. If it involves a foreign word or words, the etymology is given: the language is identified and the word or words are translated. Just as the encyclopedia employs a "one-stop shopping" approach in each entry, so it presumes nothing in the case of language and terms employed. Cross-references are provided at the end of most entries, and subheads within the entry and brief bibliographies at the end are provided for longer entries. In summary, the encyclopedia always tries to put readers first. Everything is designed to make this resource as easy as possible to use and to understand and as attractive as possible to the eye.

For that reason, the volume is also amply illustrated. There are color and black-and-white photographs and drawings of major monuments, persons, events, and objects. Since Jesus Christ is at the heart and center of the Catholic and Christian faith, he is the one most fully featured in the color photographs. And since his mother, the Blessed Virgin Mary, is also so important a part of Catholic faith, devotion, art, statuary, and music, she, too, is featured in classic and contemporary forms alongside the other great saints of the Catholic tradition.

In addition, there is a time line to assist readers in placing persons and events in the wider context of Church and secular history. Tables accompany various entries to provide both supplementary information and convenient reference points. Thus, the entry on angels has a table listing and describing the nine different categories of celestial beings. The entry on ecumenical council lists all twenty-one councils and provides thumbnail sketches of their proceedings. The very brief entry on pope is followed by an extensive and detailed table that does more than simply list, telephone-directory style, all two hundred and sixty-two popes with the years in which they occupied the Chair of Peter. The list of popes is one of the many unique features of this encyclopedia. The name of each pope is accompanied by a brief sketch of the most important accomplishments of his pontificate or some other form of identification to distinguish him from the many others who have filled the same office. Where there are apparent discrepancies in the numbering of various popes (for example, should it be Pope Felix II or Pope Felix III?), the discrepancies are explained. There is also a list of antipopes under the antipope entry. There is a list of the social encyclicals of the popes under the entry "encyclicals, social"; a complete listing of the Church's liturgical calendar for Sundays and feasts alike under the entry "liturgical calendar"; a listing of patron saints and saints associated with special needs under the entry "saints, patron"; and a detailed, annotated listing of every congregation, tribunal, office, and department of the Roman Curia under the entry of the same name. Entries on hymns, prayers, and creeds are often accompanied by the full or partial text of each.

STYLE

Gender-inclusive language has been employed throughout. We believe that its appropriateness no longer requires explanation or defense. Readers will notice that sometimes the adjective "Roman" modifies the noun "Catholic," and many other times it does not. This is because not all Catholics are Roman Catholic. There are millions of Catholics in various Eastern-rite traditions who are also in communion with the Bishop of Rome and are an integral part of that particular communion of churches known as the Catholic Church. When the reference is limited to Catholics of the Roman or Latin rite, it will read "Roman Catholic." When the reference is to the whole Catholic communion of churches or to the worldwide Catholic community, it will read simply "Catholic." And all this is said without prejudice to the desire of many Orthodox, Oriental, Anglican, and Protestant Christians to embrace the name "Catholic" for themselves as well. "Catholic" is by its very nature an inclusive, not exclusive, term. Although the references in this encyclopedia have the Catholic Church, that is, the communion of churches in union with the Bishop of Rome, in mind, we explicitly embrace those other Christians who wish to be included as well, particularly because so much of the material in this volume is historically antecedent to the East-West Schism with roots in the mutual excommunications of 1054 and to the Reformation within the Western Church in the sixteenth century.

The designations B.C. (before Christ) and A.D. (anno Domino, Lat., "in the year of the Lord") are used in this encyclopedia rather than B.C.E. (before the common era) and C.E. (of the common era) because B.C. and A.D. are still the most widely recognized way of identifying historical dates. We do not thereby depreciate the arguments of those who employ the newer designations on the ground that they display greater sensitivity to the ecumenical and interfaith character of the religious and secular communities today.

Finally, the New Revised Standard Version (NRSV) of the Bible is employed, in almost every instance, throughout the encyclopedia, not only for consistency's sake but also because of the NRSV's standing in both the scholarly and ecclesiastical communities. This newest of translations has been approved for liturgical use in the United States, Canada, and other English-speaking countries.

EDITORS AND CONTRIBUTORS

The 280 contributors and 17 associate editors of this volume represent a wide range of specializations, interests, and experiences on the academic, professional, and pastoral spectra and also a wide range of religious affiliations on the ecumenical and interfaith spectra. Our contributors are Roman Catholic, Eastern-rite Catholic, Anglican, Protestant, and Jewish. Their entries have been submitted from countries all around the globe: Kenya, Italy, France, Germany, England, Ireland, Australia, Canada, Israel, the Philippines, as well as the United States.

The contributors and editors were chosen not only because of their own scholarly and pastoral expertise but also because of their ability to translate their scholarship into accessible language and concepts for the sake of nonspecialist readers. Many of them have already established themselves as scholars of national and international stature, having published numerous books and articles over the years. Others are younger scholars and professionals, some in their early years of teaching and research; others are still at the stage of doctoral studies; and others are in various nonacademic positions, pastoral and professional alike. The contributors also span the attitudinal spectrum. Ideology does not inform the individual entries. Each contributor was specifically charged with the task of being informative, clear, and objective. Personal views and opinions were to be excluded; editorializing was to have no place in the entries; and scholarly debates were to be avoided. Official and theologically mainstream positions were to be preferred. As far as possible, that mandate has been honored by the contributors, the editors, and the publisher alike. This encyclopedia, therefore, has no point of view other than its central, underlying conviction that the multifaceted reality of Catholicism deserves to be examined and explained accurately, fairly, and comprehensively. We believe the encyclopedia has succeeded in that regard.

THE NOTRE DAME CONNECTION

Although this encyclopedia is not the production of the University of Notre Dame, even casual readers will not fail to notice a very strong connection between the volume, its editors, and its contributors, and the university itself. The general editor and thirteen of the associate editors are currently affiliated with Notre Dame. Indeed, twelve of the thirteen are members of the university's department of theology, one the current chair and another the former chair. Of the four other associate editors, three were members of the Notre Dame faculty at the time the encyclopedia was conceived, planned, and launched, and the fourth continues to serve on a regular basis as a visiting faculty member. Given the status of the University of Notre Dame as perhaps the best-known Catholic university in the world and given our own proud identification with it, we believe that the Notre Dame connection enhances the credibility of this volume as a compendium of information regarding the Catholic Church, past and present. On the other hand, we wish to make it clear that the University of Notre Dame has provided no official sponsorship to this project beyond the fact that so many of its editors and contributors are members of the Notre Dame faculty and staff. We are honored, of course, by the contributions of so many Catholic scholars and experts from other Catholic colleges, universities, and seminaries, as well as by the contributions of non-Catholics, Christian and non-Christian alike.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

There remains only the traditionally agreeable task of expressing appreciation to those who, beyond the contributors and editors, have made this encyclopedia possible. Without the inspiration, support, and editorial guidance of those at HarperCollins in San Francisco, there would be no HarperCollins Encyclopedia of Catholicism. We are indebted to many, to be sure, but if any are to be singled out, then surely that list must include John Shopp, our senior editor, who assumed the major editorial and supervisory responsibility on behalf of the publisher, and Steven Anderson, assistant editor, who managed the long and laborious copy-editing process from beginning to end. I should also like to pay a special word of tribute to Janice Johnson, a former executive editor at HarperCollins, who, along with John Shopp, first proposed this project to its eventual general editor in the fall of 1989. On the Notre Dame side of the operation, two names stand out beyond those of the editors themselves. The general editor's secretary, Donna Shearer, managed the project from the outset through correspondence, telephone calls, filing, and various forms of record-keeping—all integrated in a highly sophisticated computerized system, which she alone came to understand and master. Her contribution was at once invaluable and irreplaceable. And the President Emeritus of the University of Notre Dame, Theodore M. Hesburgh, C.S.C., contributed the Foreword. It was through his inspiration and leadership that Notre Dame became the kind of university it is today, and it is his own personal embodiment of the ideals of Catholicism that has set a high standard for all others, inside and outside that community.

We trust that the final product more than amply justifies all the labor and energy that went into this volume since its original conception over five years ago.

RICHARD P. McBRIEN
General Editor

ABBREVIATIONS

OT	Old Testament
NT	New Testament
NRSV	New Revised Standard Version
RSV	Revised Standard Version
KJV	King James Version
NIV	New International Version
St.	Saint
Bl.	Blessed
ch(s).	chapter(s)
v(v).	verse(s)
n(n).	note(s), number(s)
can(s).	canon(s)
D	Denzinger, Enchiridion Symbolorum
DS	Denzinger-Schoenmetzer, Enchiridion Symbolorum
ca.	circa

Arab.	Arabic
Aram.	Aramaic
Arm.	Armenian
Fr.	French
Ger.	German
Gk.	Greek
Heb.	Hebrew
It.	Italian
Lat.	Latin
Old Eng.	Old English
Old Fr.	Old French
Pol.	Polish
Port.	Portuguese
Russ.	Russian
Sp.	Spanish
Slav.	Slavic
Syr.	Syriac

The following abbreviations are used for the books of the Bible:

OLD TESTAMENT

Gen	Genesis
Exod	Exodus
Lev	Leviticus
Num	Numbers
Deut	Deuteronomy
Josh	Joshua
Judg	Judges
Ruth	Ruth
1-2 Sam	1-2 Samuel
1-2 Kgs	1-2 Kings
1-2 Chr	1-2 Chronicles
Ezra	Ezra
Neh	Nehemiah
Tob	Tobit
Jdt	Judith
Esth, Add Esth	Esther, Additions to Esther
1-2 Macc	1-2 Maccabees
Job	Job
Ps(s)	Psalm(s)
Prov	Proverbs
Eccl	Ecclesiastes
Song	Song of Solomon
Wis	Wisdom of Solomon

Sir	Sirach (Ecclesiasticus)
Isa, Dt-Isa, Tr-Isa	Isaiah, Deutero-Isaiah, Trito-Isaiah
Jer	Jeremiah
Lam	Lamentations
Bar	Baruch
Let Jer	Letter of Jeremiah
Ezek	Ezekiel
Dan	Daniel
Pr Azar	Prayer of Azariah
Sus	Susanna
Bel	Bel and the Dragon
Hos	Hosea
Joel	Joel
Amos	Amos
Obad	Obadiah
Jonah	Jonah
Mic	Micah
Nah	Nahum
Hab	Habakkuk
Zeph	Zephaniah
Hag	Haggai
Zech, Dt-Zech	Zechariah, Deutero-Zechariah
Mal	Malachi

NEW TESTAMENT

Matt	Matthew	1-2 Thess	1-2 Thessalonians
Mark	Mark	1-2 Tim	1-2 Timothy
Luke	Luke	Titus	Titus
John	John	Phlm	Philemon
Acts	Acts of the Apostles	Heb	Hebrews
Rom	Romans	Jas	James
1-2 Cor	1-2 Corinthians	1-2 Pet	1-2 Peter
Gal	Galatians	1-2-3 John	1-2-3 John
Eph	Ephesians	Jude	Jude
Phil	Philippians	Rev	Revelation (Apocalypse)
Col	Colossians

PRONUNCIATION KEY

SYMBOL	SOUND	SYMBOL	SOUND
a	cat	ng	sing
ah	father	o	hot
ahr	lard	oh	go
air	care	oi	boy
aw	jaw	oo	foot
ay	pay	oo	boot
b	bug	oor	poor
ch	chew	or	for d	do	ou	how e, eh	pet	p	pat
ee	seem	r	run
f	fun	s	so
g	good	sh	sure
h	hot	t	toe
hw	whether	th	thin
i	it	th	then
i	sky	ts	tsetse
ihr	ear	tw	twin
j	joke	uh	ago
k	king	uhr	her
kh	ch as in German Buch	v	vow
ks	vex	w	weather
kw	quill	y	young
l	love	z	zone
m	mat	zh	vision
n	not

TIME LINE

Catholic and Secular Persons, Events, and Developments

TIME LINE Catholic and Secular Persons, Events, and Developments

CATHOLICISM

1–100		100
Death and Resurrection of Jesus Christ (ca. 33) Paul's three missionary journeys (ca. 46–ca. 58) "Council" of Jerusalem (ca. 49) Local persecutions of Christians: emperors Nero (ca. 64), Domitian (ca. 81–ca. 96), Trajan (ca. 98–117) Peter and Paul martyred in Rome (ca. 64) Destruction of the Temple (70) The Four Gospels (ca. 70–end of century)	Pope Clement I (ca. 91–ca. 101) Primacy of Rome recognized (end of century)	Irenaeus (ca. 130–ca. 200) Pope Victor I (189–98) Didache (uncertain date) Gnosticism (into 3d century), Adoptionism, Docetism (into 3d century), Montanism Development of synods (local and provincial)

WORLD HISTORY

1–100	100
Roman emperors: Tiberius (14–37), Caligula (37–41), Claudius (41–54), Nero (54–68), Domitian (ca. 81–ca. 96)	Roman emperors: Trajan (ca. 98–117), Antoninus Pius (138–61), Marcus Aurelius (161–80), Septimus Severus (193–211)

200	300
Origen (ca. 185–ca. 254)	Pachomius (ca. 290–ca. 347): beginnings of cenobitic life/monasticism	Cappadocians: Gregory of Nazianzus (329–90), Basil (ca. 330–79), Gregory of Nyssa (ca. 330–ca. 395)
Decian (249–51) and Valerian (257–58) persecutions	Athanasius (ca. 296–373)	Jerome (ca. 342–420): the Vulgate
Anthony of Egypt (ca. 251–356): beginnings of eremetical life	Diocletian persecution (303–13)	Pope Damasus I (366–84)
Pope Stephen I (254–57)	Edict of Constantine (313)	Apollinarianism
Cyprian of Carthage (d. ca. 258)	Arianism	Council of Constantinople I (381): Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed
Period of toleration under Roman emperors (258–ca. 300)	Council of Nicaea I (325)	Donatism
Manichaeism (into 4th century)	St. Peter's Basilica constructed (ca. 330)
	Ambrose (ca. 339–97): conversion of Augustine (387)

200	300
Roman emperors: Decius (249–51), Gallus (251–53), Valerian (253– 60), Gallienus (260–68), Diocletian (284–305)	Constantine the Great (306–37): sole emperor
Partition of Roman Empire into West and East (285)	Seat of Roman Empire moved to Constantinople (331)
	Empire splits again into West and East (340)
	Barbarian migrations begin (ca. 375–ca. 568)
	Theodosius the Great (392–95): last ruler of united empire

CATHOLICISM

400

Pelagianism

Augustine of Hippo (354–430)

Patrick (ca. 390–ca. 461): mission to Ireland (ca. 431)

Pope Innocent I (401–17)

Augustine's City of God (412)

Nestorianism

Council of Ephesus (431)

Pope Leo the Great (440–61)

Monophysitism

Council of Chalcedon (451)

Acacian Schism (482–519)

Pope Gelasius I (492–96)

500

Benedict of Nursia (ca. 480–ca. 547)

Monte Cassino founded (ca. 525)

Church of Santa (Hagia) Sophia, Constantinople, consecrated (538)

Council of Constantinople II (553)

Isidore of Seville (ca. 560–636)

Pope Gregory the Great (590–604)

Augustine of Canterbury (d. ca. 605): mission to Britain (596)

WORLD HISTORY

400

Barbarian migrations continue

Visigoths invade Italy (401)

Alaric captures and sacks Rome (410)

Vandals sack Rome (455)

End of Western Roman emperors (476)

Theodoric founds Ostrogoth kingdom of Italy (493)

Clovis, king of the Franks, converts to Christianity (496)

500

Justinian the Great (527–65)

Rome and Naples annexed to Byzantium (553)

Lombards drive Byzantines from northern Italy (565)

600	700	800
Pope Honorius I (625–38)	John of Damascus (ca. 675–ca. 749)	John Scotus Eriugena (ca. 810–ca. 877)
Council of Constantinople III (680–81)	Boniface (ca. 675–754): mission to the Germans (719)	Cyril (826–69) and Methodius (ca. 815–85), "Apostles to the Slavs"
Monothelitism	Iconoclasm controversy (ca. 725–842)	Pope Nicholas I (858–67)
	Pope Stephen II (III) (752–57)	Prince Boris I of Bulgaria accepts Christianity (ca. 864)
	Consecration of Pepin III (d. 768), king of the Franks, as protector of the Romans (754)	Council of Constantinople IV (869–70)
	Council of Nicaea II (787)	Pope Formosus (891–96)
	Pope Leo III (795–816)

600	700	800
Muhammad (570–632)	Christianity in North Africa exterminated by Muslims (by 700)	Charlemagne crowned first Holy Roman emperor (800)
Barbarian migrations end in western Europe (ca. 600)	Charles Martel defeats Arabs in battle of Tours (732)	Arabs sack Rome and damage the Vatican (846)
Arabs conquer Jerusalem (637) and destroy Carthage (697)	Pope Stephen II (III) asks Pepin for protection against the Lombards (754)	Arabs conquer Sicily (878)
	Pepin gives land to pope (Papal States, 756)	Emperor Basil recaptures Italy from the Arabs (880)
	Charlemagne becomes sole ruler of Frankish kingdom (771)

CATHOLICISM

900	1000
Monastery of Cluny founded (909)	Peter Damian (1007–72)	First Crusade (1096–1099)
Hungary is Christianized (ca. 942)	Camaldolese founded (ca. 1012)	Cistercians founded (1098)
Monastery on Mount Athos founded (962)	Anselm of Canterbury (1033–1109)
Poland is Christianized (966)	Pope Leo IX (1049–54)
Pope Benedict VII (974–83)	Monasticism established in Russia (ca. 1051)
Prince Vladimir of Kiev introduces Christianity into Russia (ca. 988)	East-West Schism (1054)
First formal canonization (993)	Pope Nicholas II (1058–61)
	Pope Gregory VII (1073–85)
	Dictatus Papae (1075)
	Carthusians founded (1084)

WORLD HISTORY

900	1000
Arabs expelled from central Italy (916)	Muslims sack the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem (1009)
Otto I crowned Holy Roman emperor by Pope John XII (962)	Battle of Hastings (1066)
Otto II crowned Holy Roman emperor by Pope John XIII (967)	Henry IV excommunicated by Pope Gregory VII (1076)
Otto III crowned Holy Roman emperor by Pope Gregory V (996)	Henry IV is absolved by the pope at Canossa (1077)
	Henry IV again deposed and excommunicated (1080)
	Henry IV storms Rome, imprisons the pope (1084)
	Crusaders capture Jerusalem (1099)

1100	1200
Bernard of Clairvaux (1090–1153)	Lateran Council III (1179)
Peter Abelard (1079–1142)	Notre Dame Cathedral, Paris, consecrated (1182)
Thomas Becket (ca. 1118–70)	Third Crusade (1189–92)
Premonstratensians (Norbertines) founded (1120)	Scholasticism (12th and 13th centuries)
Lateran Council I (1123)	Albigensianism (late 12th century until end of 14th century)
Pope Innocent II (1130–43)
Lateran Council II (1139)
Decree of Gratian (ca. 1140)
Second Crusade (1146–48)
Carmelite order founded (ca. 1154)
Pope Alexander III (1159–81)

1100	1200
Henry V crowned Holy Roman emperor by Pope Paschal II (1111)	Crusaders capture Constantinople, establish Latin empire (1204)
Lothar III crowned Holy Roman emperor by Pope Innocent II (1133)	Pope Innocent III places England under interdict (1208)
Frederick Barbarossa crowned Holy Roman emperor by Pope Hadrian IV (1155)	England and Ireland become papal fiefs (1213)
Thomas Becket murdered in Canterbury Cathedral (1170)	Magna Carta (1215)
	Marco Polo to China (1271–95)
	Crusades formally end (1291)

CATHOLICISM

1200	1300	1400
(continued)
Thomas Aquinas (ca. 1225–74)	Pope Celestine V (1294)	Joan of Arc (1412–31)
Pope Gregory IX (1227–41)	Pope Boniface VIII (1294–1303)	Council of Constance (1414–18)
Papal Inquisition established (1233)	Growth of mysticism	Pope Martin V (1417–31)
Council of Lyons I (1245)	Unam Sanctam (1302)	Council of Basel-Ferrara-Florence-Rome (1431–45)
Augustinian Hermits founded (1256)	Avignon papacy (1309–77)	Pope Pius II (1458–64)
Chartres Cathedral consecrated (1260)	Council of Vienne (1311–12)	Erasmus (ca. 1469–1536)
Meister Eckhart (ca. 1260–1327)	Pope Benedict XII (1334–42)	Spanish Inquisition established (1479)
Duns Scotus (ca. 1265–1308)	Catherine of Siena (1347–80)	Pope Alexander VI (1492–1503)
Dante Alighieri (1265–1321)	Great Western Schism (1378–1417)
Council of Lyons II (1274)

WORLD HISTORY

	1300	1400
	Hundred Years War begins (1337)	Henry V defeats the French at Agincourt (1415)
	Black Death in Europe (1347–49)	Louvain University founded (1425)
	Byzantines lose last possession in Asia Minor to Turks (1390)	Constantine XI Palaeologus, last Byzantine emperor (1448–53)
		Fall of Constantinople to the Turks (1453)
		End of Hundred Years War (1453)
		Gutenberg Bible (1456)
		Lorenzo de' Medici rules Florence (1469–92)
		Moorish kingdom ends in Spain (1492)

Thomas More (1478–1535)

Ignatius of Loyola (1491–1556)

Pope Julius II (1503–13)

Francis Xavier (1506–52): missions to India (1542–45, 1548–49) and Japan (1549)

Lateran Council V (1512–17)

Pope Leo X (1513–21)

Teresa of Ávila (1515–82)

Reformation begins (1517)

Peter Canisius (1521–97)

Pope Hadrian VI (1522–23)

English Reformation begins (1534)

Society of Jesus (Jesuits) founded (1534)

Pope Paul III (1534–49)

John of the Cross (1542–91)

Robert Bellarmine (1542–1621)

Council of Trent (1545–63)

Jesuit mission to Japan (1548)

Francisco de Suárez (1548–1617)

Index of Forbidden Books established (1557)

Pope Pius V (1566–72)

Francis de Sales (1567–1622)

Jesuit mission in China (1582)

1500

Christopher Columbus discovers America (1492)

Pope Alexander VI divides New World between Spain and Portugal (1493)

Explorers: Vasco da Gama (1469–1524), Ferdinand Magellan, (1480–1521), Francis Drake (1540–96)

Michelangelo (1475–1564)

Copernican theory (1512)

Sack of Rome by imperial troops; Pope Clement VII imprisoned (1527)

Thomas More executed (1535)

Mary succeeds Edward VI (1553)

Elizabeth I succeeds Mary (1558)

Roman catacombs discovered (1578)

Gregorian calendar adopted (1582)

Defeat of the Spanish Armada (1588)

CATHOLICISM

1500	1600
(continued)
Pope Sixtus V (1585–90)	Vincent de Paul (ca. 1580–1660)	Pope Innocent XI (1676–89)
Vatican Library opens (1588)	Bernini (1598–1680)	Gallicanism (1682–1789)
Union of Brest (1596)	Baroque Catholicism (ca. 1600–ca. 1750)
	John Eudes (1601–80)
	Jean Jacques Olier (1608–57)
	Blaise Pascal (1623–62)
	St. Peter's Basilica, Rome, consecrated (1626)
	Jacques Bossuet (1627–1704)
	Jansenism (ca. 1640–ca. 1800)
	Chinese rites controversy (1645)
	Trappist order founded (1664)

WORLD HISTORY

1600
Jesuit missionary Matteo Ricci admitted to Peking (1601)
Queen Elizabeth I dies (1603)
First African slaves brought to North America (1619)
Peter Minuit buys island of Manhattan for $24 (1626)
Galileo imprisoned (1633)
Harvard College founded (1636)
Isaac Newton (1642–1727)
Peace of Westphalia (1648)

1700	1800
Baroque Catholicism continues (1700–ca. 1750)	Catholic Romanticism	Loss of the Papal States (187
Pope Clement XI (1700–21)	Johann Adam Möhler (1796–1838)	Pope Leo XIII (1878–1903)
Pope Benedict XIV (1740–58)	Pope Pius VII (1800–23)	Vatican archives opened to scholars (1881)
Jesuits suppressed (1773)	John Henry Newman (1801–90)	Rerum Novarum (1891)
John Carroll, first bishop consecrated in U.S. (1790)	Catholic Emancipation Act, England (1829)	Condemnation of Americanism (1899)
	University of Notre Dame founded (1842)	Missionary renewal
	Pope Pius IX (1846–78)
	Dogma of the Immaculate Conception (1854)
	Syllabus of Errors (1864)
	Vatican Council I (1869–70)

1700	1800
Boston Tea Party (1773)	Thomas Jefferson, U.S. president (1801–1809)	U.S. Emancipation Proclamation (1863)
Declaration of Independence (1776)	Louisiana Purchase (1803)	Dominion of Canada established (1867)
U.S. Constitution (1788)	Napoleon crowned king of Italy (1805), annexes Papal States (1809), is defeated at Waterloo (1815)	Kulturkampf in Prussia (1871)
George Washington, first U.S. president (1789–97)	Charles Darwin (1809–82)
French Revolution (1789)	Karl Marx (1818–83)
Rosetta Stone found in Egypt (1799)	Communist Manifesto (1848)
	Italy proclaimed a kingdom (1861)
	American Civil War (1861–65)

CATHOLICISM

1900

Modernism
Dorothy Day (1897–1980)
Pope Pius X (1903–14)
Karl Rahner (1904–84)
Oath against Modernism (1907)
Pope Benedict XV (1914–22)
Thomas Merton (1915–68)
Code of Canon Law (1917)
Oscar Arnulfo Romero (1917–80)
Pope Pius XI (1922–39)
Lateran Treaty (1929)
Pope Pius XII (1939–58)
Dogma of the Assumption (1950)
Pope John XXIII (1958–63)
Vatican Council II (1962–65)
Pope Paul VI (1963–78)
Humanae Vitae (1968)
Pope John Paul I (1978)
Pope John Paul II (1978–)
Revised Code of Canon Law (1983)
Catechism of the Catholic Church (1992)

WORLD HISTORY

1900

Sigmund Freud (1856–1939)
Commonwealth of Australia established (1901)
New Zealand attains Dominion status (1907)
First World War (1914–18)
Russian Revolution (1917)
Irish Free State established (1922)
Franklin D. Roosevelt elected U.S. president (1932)
Adolf Hitler, German chancellor (1933)
Spanish Civil War (1936–39)
Second World War (1939–45)
United Nations charter (1945)
Cold War (1945–89)
Republic of Ireland established (1949)
John F. Kennedy assassinated (1963)
Vietnam War (1965–73)
Communism collapses (1989)

A

Aaron, high priest and ancestor of all legitimate priests according to Israelite tradition. He was the elder brother of Moses (Exod 6:20; 7:7). Aaron assisted Moses in his mission to Pharaoh, the Exodus from Egypt, and during the wandering in the wilderness. That not all the references to Aaron are favorable (e.g., his role in the golden calf incident, Exod 32–34) reflects the struggles within priestly families resulting in the eventual ascendancy of the Aaronite branch. In Heb 5:1–10 Aaron is the type, or foreshadowing, of Jesus as high priest of the new dispensation. See also priesthood.

Benedictine abbey in Ettal, Bavaria, Germany.

Abba (ah'buh; Aram., "father"), title used to address God, often used in a familiar sense, as in "my father." Such intimate language for addressing God characterized the prayers of Jesus and his followers. The Aramaic term is explicitly attributed to Jesus in the account of his prayer at Gethsemane in Mark 14:36. It may underlie Jesus' address to God now preserved in Greek, e.g., in the Lord's Prayer in Matt 6:9 and Luke 11:2 or the prayer of John 17:1. The Aramaic word was certainly used in the prayers of early Christians, to which Paul refers in Rom 8:15 and Gal 4:6.

abbé (Fr., "father"), abbot or superior of a monastery of men. In the sixth century, the term was applied in France to every person who wore the dress of a secular ecclesiastic. During the following centuries, the use of abbé was further extended to clerics engaged as professors or tutors, even if they were not ordained. See also monastery.

abbess, superior of a group of twelve or more nuns. A term originally used only for Benedictines, it is the feminine form of "abbot" and is an elected office. During the feudal period, abbesses exercised temporal, spiritual, and quasiepiscopal power. They were usually of noble rank and sat in parliaments and councils, recognizing no authority under the pope. At times they governed double monasteries of both monks and nuns. See also abbey; abbot; double monasteries; nun.

abbey, autonomous monastery of at least twelve religious, governed by an abbot or abbess. Benedict of Nursia founded the first abbey at Monte Cassino near Rome in the sixth century. By 1415, there were over fifteen thousand abbeys following his rule. Abbeys were usually established on arable land because they were intended to be self-sufficient centers of prayer, productivity, and communal harmony.

Abbeys were also centers of culture, learning, and social progress. Monks established schools, copied and illuminated manuscripts, improved farming methods, and organized early cooperative farming. They developed the first hospitals in the West because of their care of the sick on pilgrimage. See also monastery.

abbey nullius, an abbey that has territory exempt from the jurisdiction of the local bishop; it is the equivalent of a diocese. The abbot fulfills the responsibilities of the bishop within the territory. Since 1976 there were to be no new such abbeys established; "territorial" abbeys, a similar entity, are allowed in the 1983 code of canon law. See also abbey; abbot nullius; diocese.

Abbo of Fleury, St., ca. 945–1004, abbot of Fleury (Saint-Benoît-sur-Loire), writer, canonist, and monastic reformer. Having entered Fleury as a child, Abbo studied in Paris, Reims, and Orléans, taught in England at Ramsey, and helped Oswald, archbishop of York, to introduce into England the reforms of the monastery of Cluny. After returning to France in 988, he was elected abbot of Fleury. As abbot, he served as a mediator between the king and the pope, also promoting monastic independence from secular and episcopal control. His writings cover a number of subjects, including the relationship of papal and royal power, the history of the popes, lives of the Desert Fathers, logic, grammar, and computus (calendrical science). He was killed in a revolt in 1004 while implementing reforms at the abbey of La Réole. Feast day: November 13. See also Fleury.

abbot (Aram., abba, "father"), the leader of a male monastic community. The abbot is considered a supreme moderator of his religious institute in canon law. He is given a special blessing at his installation. See also monastery; monasticism.

abbot nullius, the leader of an abbey nullius (a territory not under the jurisdiction of the local bishop). The abbot nullius is not only, as an abbot, the ordinary (local authority) of the religious for whom he is responsible, but he is also the ordinary for laypersons living within his jurisdiction. See also abbey nullius.

abbot primate, the leader of the Benedictine order. The position is one that carries with it more moral authority than of power of governance because each Benedictine monastery is virtually independent of the other monasteries and, on most matters, immediately subject to the Holy See. See also Benedictine order.

abbuna (ah-b*oo*n'ah; Arab., "our father"), common Arabic title for a priest, adopted also in Ethiopia (abun) for metropolitans and eminent ecclesiastics.

abdication, an earlier term for the renunciation of ecclesiastical office, used when the prevailing model of office was monarchical. The current term is "resignation," and its use in canon law indicates movement away from such a model. See also resignation.

abduction, impediment of, the canonical prohibition of the retention of a woman against her will for the purpose of eliciting matrimonial consent. Canon law (can. 1089) establishes this action as invalidating a marriage because the consent of the woman is not freely given. The use of the term "rape" for the impediment of abduction is now outdated. See also marriage law.

Abelard, Peter, 1079–1142, French theologian and logician. Born at Le Pallet outside of Nantes in Brittany, Abelard initially intended to pursue a career as a teacher of logic. He studied with the foremost dialecticians of his day: first with the nominalist Roscelin of Compiègne at Loches and later with the Neoplatonist philosopher William of Champeaux in Paris. Abelard's insightful critique of William's philosophical realism brought him fame and students. He taught logic at Melun, Corbeil, Paris, and Mont-Sainte-Geneviève. While teaching, he began publishing commentaries on Aristotle's logical writings.

Abelard's significance as a teacher and twelfth-century intellectual extends beyond his influence on the development of logical theory. His interest in applying methods of dialectical inquiry to Christian doctrine, especially the Trinity, marked a turning point in his life. In ca. 1112 he studied with Anselm of Laon, the most celebrated theologian of the early twelfth century. Dissatisfied with Anselm's methods, Abelard returned to Paris determined to bring systematic and critical inquiry to influence biblical exegesis and the development of doctrine. Henceforth, Abelard was dedicated to teaching both theology and logic.

Another event significantly affected Abelard's life and thought. While teaching at Notre Dame in Paris, Abelard met Heloise, the niece of Fulbert, canon of the cathedral of Notre Dame. He became her tutor, friend, and lover. Héloïse bore a son, Astralabe, and although she and Peter married, Fulbert ordered that Abelard be castrated. In 1118, both Héloïse and Abelard entered cloistered religious life. Abelard's narrative, The Story of My Misfortunes, records their tragic story. For over eight hundred years, this text has provided generations with a powerful and enduring paradigm of star-crossed lovers.

While in residence at the Royal Abbey of St.-Denis (1118–22), Abelard designed the ways in which scientific methods of inquiry and textual analysis could be applied to sacred literature. He composed Sic et Non, a text that, in its prologue, explicitly sets forth guidelines and principles for interpreting difficult or contradictory teachings. He also wrote his first theological treatise on the Trinity, the Theologia Summi Boni (A Theology of the Highest Good). Though the work was condemned at the Council of Soissons (1121), Abelard revised it during the next twenty years, republishing it first as the Theologia Christiana (Christian Theology), and finally as the Theologia Scholarium (Theology of the Scholars).

Despite numerous setbacks, the last decade or so of Abelard's life was especially creative, including a brief period as abbot of St. Guildas, an unruly community near Vannes in Brittany. During the 1130s he wrote prolifically and founded an order of nuns at the Paraclete, the land and oratory along the banks of the Ardusson near Quincy in Troyes. Abelard composed numerous works for them: a treatise on the origin of nuns (Letter 7), a rule of life (Letter 8), a collection of sermons, and one of hymns. He taught them how to read Scripture, urged them to study its languages (Letter 9), resolved a series of questions concerning problematic biblical passages (Problemata Heloissae), and brought his own skill to bear upon the difficult Hexaemeron, the Genesis account of the creation of the universe in six days. At about the same time, Abelard composed a brilliant, literal commentary on Paul's Letter to the Romans, wrote an ethical treatise known as the Scito Teipsum (Know Thyself), and wrote a Dialogue of a Philosopher with a Jew and with a Christian.

Abelard's insistence upon the primacy of dialectic for theological reflection continued to threaten others, and in 1140 his teaching was again the subject of conciliar condemnation, at Sens. Abelard intended to appeal his case to the pope but ill health forced him to abandon the journey to Rome. Befriended by Peter the Venerable, he retired first to Cluny and then to a smaller priory at St. Marcel-sur-Saone, where he died. See also Héloïse; Paraclete, the; Scholasticism; Trinity, doctrine of the. EILEEN KEARNEY abjuration, the formal denial of beliefs contrary to the official teaching of the Catholic Church previously held by non-Catholic Christians before they are received into the Catholic Church. Mandated by the 1917 code of canon law, it is no longer required.

ablution, a ritual of purification or cleansing. Ritual cleansings with water or blood are viewed in many religious traditions as means of purifying persons or objects. In the Roman tradition, the baptismal bath and the Asperges rite of sprinkling holy water on the congregation at the beginning of Mass were associated with a cleansing from sin. Ablutions were also found at the Offertory and Post-Communion in the Mass.

The term "ablution" is no longer used in reformed rites. However, ritual gestures of washing are found at both the Preparation of Gifts and Post-Communion in the Order of Mass. See also asperges; holy water.

abomination of desolation, or "desolating sacrilege," the desecration of the Jerusalem Temple by pagan ruler Antiochus IV Epiphanes in 167 B.C. (Dan 9:27; 11:31; 12:11; 1 Macc 1:54). In Mark 13:14 and Matt 24:15 Jesus utters the phrase, most likely as a prophecy after the fact (Lat., vaticinium ex eventu), in reference either to the attempt of the Roman emperor Caligula to erect his statue in the Temple (A.D. 40) or to the destruction of the Temple by the Roman general Titus in A.D. 70.

abortion, termination of pregnancy at a gestational age or by a method that ordinarily precludes survival of the embryo or fetus.

Historical Background: Catholic Church teaching on abortion has its roots in two disparate sources: the Hebrew tradition and Jewish law as expressed in the Torah, the first five books of the Bible, and classical Greek philosophy, particularly the metaphysics and anthropology of Aristotle.

The Hebrew tradition places heavy weight on one verse of the Torah, Exod 21:22, that is the only Scriptural text explicitly dealing with abortion in Jewish law. (In the text the Hebrew word is yasa', "to go out," and it is consistently translated as "miscarriage," not "abortion.") This text prescribes the penalty to be imposed if, as a result of a fight, a pregnant woman is injured and suffers a miscarriage. The assailant must pay damages (i.e., "fined what the woman's husband demands") for causing the death of the fetus. This penalty is differentiated from the penalty for causing the death of the woman herself, which is a capital crime requiring "life for life" (21:23).

Hebrew scholars have consistently interpreted this text to mean that the fetus is not a full human being as the mother is. Jewish teaching requires a high degree of respect for the potential life of the fetus, but does not regard it as fully human until birth.

The Septuagint (Greek) translation of Exodus (third century B.C.) presents a different version of the situation described in Exod 21:22. The text distinguishes between a formed and an unformed fetus. If the assailant causes the death of an unformed fetus, he must pay a fine. But if the fetus has already taken bodily form, then he is guilty of a capital crime.

The Septuagint translators may have been influenced by Greek philosophy, particularly that of Aristotle. According to Aristotle's philosophy of natural beings, hylomorphism, the soul is the life principle that animates the body. A soul can animate only the sort of body that is appropriate to that soul. Thus a plant is animated by a vegetative soul, an animal by a sensitive soul, and a human body by a rational human soul. In applying this theory to human fetal development, Aristotle concluded that a human fetus could acquire a human soul (that is, be a true human being) only when it had developed human bodily form. Referring to evidence from observation of aborted fetuses, Aristotle set this time at forty days after conception for a male and ninety for a female.

The Jewish tradition of respect for prenatal human life, and the Aristotelian theory of delayed animation of the human fetus, formed the backdrop for Christian views on abortion. However, even in the earliest years of the Christian tradition, abortion at any gestational age was regarded as a grave sin. Documents of the first and early second centuries, for example, the Didache and the Letter of Barnabas, categorically prohibited abortion. Athenagoras (second century) stated that those who use abortifacients are as guilty before God as those who commit homicide. Early Christian writers made their points strongly to distinguish Christian morality from that of the dominant Roman culture.

By the third and fourth centuries, however, there was speculation and debate among Christian scholars as to the time at which the fetus achieves human status. Latin Church Fathers Jerome (d. 420) and Augustine (d. 430) both taught that abortion is not homicide until the "scattered elements" are formed into a body. Basil (d. 379), a Greek Church Father, criticized the "fine distinction" between formed and unformed fetuses as malicious, and described all who procure abortion as murderers. The weight given to the Septuagint translation of Exodus, and the assessment of Aristotle's theory of delayed animation, influenced the course of such debates up to the nineteenth century.

The Significance of Ensoulment: In the early Christian centuries, several theories of the origin of the human soul were propounded. Among these was creationism, which held that each human soul was created out of nothing by God and infused into the developing human embryo at an appropriate time.

By the twelfth century, the creationist view had gained the ascendancy. When Gratian codified canon law (ca. 1140), he explicitly adopted creationism and also stated that the soul is not infused until the fetus is formed. From that time until 1869, Catholic canon law distinguished between the unensouled and ensouled fetus in assessing the gravity of abortion. The penalty for procuring the abortion of an ensouled fetus was excommunication. Up until 1869 no canonical penalty was imposed for abortion of an unensouled fetus, though early abortion was still considered to be a serious sin, just as contraception was.

Aristotle's hylomorphic theory was explicitly incorporated into the theological writings of Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274). In his monumental Summa Theologiae, Aquinas reiterated Aristotle's description of successive souls, first vegetative, then sensitive, then rational, which informed the developing embryo and fetus. The theology and philosophy of Thomas Aquinas have been given official sanction by the Catholic Church, including papal approbation. However, on the matter of the succession of souls animating the human fetus, Catholic authorities today regard Aquinas's views as erroneous.

Catholic teaching continues to maintain the doctrine of the special creation of the human soul by God. In its authoritative teaching, it leans to the view that the soul is infused into the zygote at the time of conception. Removal of the canonical distinction between unensouled and ensouled fetuses in 1869 was related to the clarification at that time of the biological process of fertilization. The new knowledge seemed to give support to acceptance of immediate ensoulment at fertilization.

In its Declaration on Abortion (1974), the Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith asserts that the fertilized egg "would never be made human if it were not human already." However, the congregation also notes the continuing debate on the time of ensoulment, and, in a footnote, recognizes that Catholic authors are still in disagreement on this point.

The Catholic Church does not have an authoritative position on the time of ensoulment that must be held by all Catholics. Rather, while allowing and even encouraging debate on this metaphysical point, the Church asserts a moral position it regards as unquestionable: even though we are not certain when the soul is infused, hence when a human being truly exists, it is gravely sinful even to risk committing murder. Hence it is seriously wrong to terminate the life of a human zygote, blastocyst, embryo, or fetus.

Conflicts with the Mother's Welfare: While the early Christian tradition made some distinction between the formed and the unformed fetus, abortion was sinful in either case. The first deviation from this view, given a situation of danger to the mother, was enunciated in the early fourteenth century. The Dominican theologian John of Naples argued that it would be permissible to abort an unformed or unanimated fetus to save the life of the mother. Since the unanimated fetus was not yet a human being, it was acceptable to sacrifice it in order to save a fully human life. The noted Jesuit theologian Thomas

Sanchez (d. 1610) discussed the matter in detail, supporting John of Naples's position with two main arguments: Since the same procedure kills the fetus and saves the mother, it is permissible if the intended effect is to save the mother. Furthermore, in this situation the fetus can be considered an aggressor against the life of the mother, and thus self-defense justifies taking its life.

Therapeutic abortion to save the life of the mother was not officially condemned by the Catholic Church until the latter half of the nineteenth century. In response to several specific questions directed to it, the Holy Office condemned craniotomy of the fetus to save the mother's life, and later condemned any direct attack on the life of the fetus.

These condemnations have been reiterated by popes in the twentieth century. Pope Pius XI in his encyclical on marriage (Casti Connubi, 1930) stated that no reason can excuse the direct killing of the innocent, and that self-defense could not be invoked since the fetus was not an unjust aggressor. After Vatican Council II (1962–65) described abortion as an "unspeakable crime," Pope Paul VI (in the encyclical that sustained the Church's prohibition of artificial contraception) asserted that "directly willed and procured abortion, even if for therapeutic reasons, [is] to be absolutely excluded as licit" (Humanae Vitae, 1968).

Two apparent exceptions to this absolute prohibition have been approved. These exceptions have been allowed on grounds that the abortion in question is not a direct attack on the fetus, but an indirect and unintended effect of a legitimate medical procedure. Thus the conditions of the double effect principle are satisfied, and the procedure is morally permissible.

The two exceptions are these: If a pregnant woman suffers from uterine cancer, the diseased uterus may be removed even though the surgery places the fetus into an environment where it cannot survive. The death of the fetus is an indirect and unintended effect of surgery to remove a diseased organ, the uterus. In the second case, ectopic pregnancy, surgery prior to viability of the fetus was condemned by the Holy Office in 1902. Later, however, the Jesuit theologian T. L. Bouscaren wrote convincingly (in 1933) that the tube or organ in which the fetus was lodged could be considered pathological. Thus its removal, even with the fetus inside, could be defended on the same basis as the removal of a cancerous uterus. The Church has adopted Bouscaren's position, but in its official documents it has never approved removal of the fetus from within the tube because that would be viewed as a direct abortion.

Alternate Approaches to Conflict Situations: Within mainstream contemporary Catholic theology, several alternate approaches to conflict situations have been proposed. One group of theologians suggests that the approved exceptions to the prohibition of abortion simply express the basic Christian conviction that abortion is wrong except when it is necessary to save a life. Holding to the essence of this conviction is more important than invoking the distinction between direct and indirect intentions. This position has been enunciated publicly even by members of the Catholic hierarchy, including the Belgian bishops in 1973. The statement of Bishop Josef Stimpfle of Augsburg is typical: "He who performs an abortion, except to save the live of the mother, sins gravely."

A second alternate approach retains the principle of double effect but applies it differently. For example, the American moral philosopher German Grisez argues that in case of threat to the mother's life, it is not the death of the fetus but its removal from her body that saves her. One can remove the fetus without intending its death, and hence, according to this interpretation, abortion to save the mother's life is justifiable.

A third approach to conflict situations suggests that we use the same criteria regarding abortion dilemmas that we use in other situations where the Catholic Church justifies the deliberate taking of human life. One comparison involves the concept of aggressor. In dealing with an adult aggressor, one may defend oneself even though the aggressor is not responsible or blameworthy, say if the aggressor were mentally ill or severely retarded. One does not have to submit to an aggressor merely because he or she is incapable of bearing responsibility for his or her actions. Hence, one should not have to submit to the presence of a fetal aggressor who is physically causing one grave harm.

More complex comparisons involve the reasoning used by the Church to justify going to war and killing members of the enemy forces. While a country must have serious reasons for entering into combat, these reasons may include defense of territory or property, defense of basic human rights, and defense of national self-determination. Surrender to the enemy may avert loss of life, but a nation is not morally required to give up all interests other than life itself. Analogously, it could be argued that the pregnant woman's interest in physical or mental health, not simply in life itself, could justify causing the death of a human who is a serious threat to her well-being.

Alternate Views of the Status of the Fetus: Just as Catholic theologians, both historical and contemporary, suggest alternate approaches to conflict situations, so they also present a range of views regarding the ontological status of the embryo and fetus. As noted earlier, speculation as to the time at which the prenatal human becomes a full human being (i.e., is ensouled) extends back at least to Jerome and Augustine.

In contemporary Catholic theology, the predominant view is that ensoulment takes place at conception. This view supports the authoritative moral teaching that human life may not be destroyed at any time after fertilization. Biological information on the reproductive process indicates that the union of egg and sperm marks the beginning of a new human life, genetically distinct from either of its parents, and genetically unique (apart from twinning). The fact that this life has an internal principle that guides its self-development indicates that its soul (life principle) must be present from the beginning. Proponents of this view argue that the human embryo would not have the potential to develop through higher stages to rationality if it did not already possess a rational soul to direct this development.

A growing number of Catholic theologians, however, maintain that it is unlikely that a full human being is present before approximately fourteen days' gestational age. They recognize that biology provides a complex body of data, not easily interpretable in metaphysical terms, and that a careful look at these data supports delayed rather than immediate ensoulment. The biological facts cited are: (1) Up until about fourteen days, twinning of the embryo is possible, and at least through the morola stage, several embryos may aggregate ("recombine") to form one embryo. Thus we do not have an individuated human organism at this stage. An entity open to twinning and recombination cannot have a human soul because souls neither split, fuse, nor expire. (2) Before the process of differentiation begins, the entity has a cellular form of life, where each cell has equal potential to develop into any tissue or organ of the fetus, or more likely, not to become part of the fetus at all. Only through differentiation does the cellular mass come to exhibit the characteristics of a unified human organism. (3) Between fertilization and the completion of implantation, a large proportion of embryos, generally estimated at over fifty percent, are discarded naturally. Jesuit theologian Karl Rahner (d. 1984) asks whether it is reasonable to maintain that over half of all human beings live and die without anyone's knowing of their existence.

The view that ensoulment occurs only after fourteen days' gestation is expanded by other authors, who argue for later ensoulment on the basis of arguments like these: The hylomorphic theory of Aristotle and Thomas Aquinas, approved by the Church, holds that the soul is the life-principle of a body suited to it. A rational or human soul can be infused only into a body that has reached an appropriate level of development. The characteristic of rationality requires some sort of brain structure, since reason operates through the organ of the brain in humans. Authors making this argument differ as to what level of brain structure would be required for the soul to be present.

Such metaphysical opinions do not contradict authoritative Catholic teaching, as noted in the Vatican Declaration on Abortion. It is, however, contrary to Catholic moral teaching to destroy the embryo at any time after fertilization, because one then assumes the risk of killing a possible human being.

Catholic Teaching and Abortion Legislation: Catholic teaching regarding the morality of abortion is clear, but what is demanded of Catholics in the political arena is not so clear. Catholic doctrine does not require Catholics to insist that all their moral values be incorporated into the secular law. Particularly in a pluralist country like the United States, there are Catholic moral teachings—regarding divorce and birth control, for example—that Catholics do not attempt to impose by law.

The Catholic hierarchy has treated abortion differently on grounds that it is the taking of a human life, and that because of the heinousness of killing, it cannot be permitted in a society ruled by law. In a small number of cases, local bishops have tried to enforce this position by declaring that Catholic public figures who defend or support a public policy of choice on abortion may not receive Holy Communion or speak at official Catholic functions.

Catholic bishops as well as theologians disagree as to the appropriateness of such sanctions. Most bishops rely on persuasion and exhortation, regarding them as more effective than penalties imposed on specific individuals.

Within a pluralist society, an individual may utilize political strategies that do not fully express that individual's conscientious moral beliefs, since political deliberation must incorporate questions such as these: What is the best public policy that can be achieved in the current actual situation? Is it better to accept a compromise (prohibition of some abortions, regulation to discourage abortion, energetic efforts to make abortion unnecessary) rather than to insist on an absolute position that cannot prevail? Would an absolute legal prohibition of abortion be unenforceable, hence be like Prohibition, which failed as a move to outlaw alcoholic beverages because it did not represent a consensus? Does an unenforceable law bring about more harm than good, for example, the breakdown of respect for law in general?

The moral teaching of the Catholic Church on abortion is clear. The most effective political role for the Catholic hierarchy, for Catholic public figures, and for Catholics in general, however, is neither clear nor clearly prescribed by Catholic doctrine. See also civil law and morality; medical ethics; reproductive technologies; sexual morality.

Bibliography

Connery, John, S.J. Abortion: The Development of the Roman Catholic Perspective. Chicago: Loyola University Press, 1977.

Coughlan, Michael J. The Vatican, the Law and the Human Embryo. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 1990.

Grisez, Germain G. Abortion: The Myths, the Realities, and the Arguments. New York: Corpus Books, 1970.

Jung, Patricia Beattie, and Thomas A. Shannon. Abortion & Catholicism: The American Debate. New York: Crossroad, 1988.

Noonan, John T., ed. The Morality of Abortion: Legal and Historical Perspectives. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1970.

CAROL A. TAUER

Abraham (Heb., "father of a multitude"), Hebrew patriarch. The traditions about Abram, later Abraham, are contained in Gen 11:26–25:11, beginning with the call to leave his Mesopotamian homeland and go to another country and ending with his death at the age of one hundred and seventy-five. The principal theme is the promise of land and descendants, a theme repeated many times in the course of the ancestral histories. The first is deferred, since Abraham secures only a burial site in Canaan (Gen 23), and the second is assured after Abraham demonstrates heroic faith in his willingness to sacrifice his son Isaac (Gen 22, the akedah, or binding of Isaac). These promises are secured by covenant (Gen 15; 17) but their fulfillment lies in the future. Early Christians also looked to Abraham as their father (e.g., Rom 11:1) and as a heroic model of faith (Gal 3:6–9; Rom 4: Heb 11:8–12). See also patriarch [biblical].

abrogation, the complete revocation of an ecclesiastical law. This can be done expressly by the competent lawgiver (the pope, the local bishop, or other religious authority), by a new law that is entirely contradictory to the standing law, or by new laws that so completely reorganize the subject matter of the law as to make the two incompatible (cf. can. 20).

absence, leave of. See leave of absence [from religious life].

absenteeism, also known as nonresidency, the absence of a cleric from his post, a matter of grave concern to ecclesiastical reformers. From the twelfth to the eighteenth centuries, 10 to 25 percent of all Catholic clergy were absent from their parishes, either illegally or by dispensation, in order to further their education, to hold other employment, or because they held a number of noncompatible benefices (pluralism).

absolutes, moral, ways of being and acting that will always, everywhere, and for everyone be morally obligatory.

Moral absolutes have been questioned from several fronts. Situation ethics has questioned whether it is possible to have any universal norms since each person, action, and situation is unique and discontinuous. In Catholicism, the use of transcendental Thomism has brought a respect for the historicity of human nature and the processive character of knowing.

Official Catholic teachings witness to moral absolutes, and the consensus of moral theologians confirms that witness. Yet the type of norm that can be so regarded is controversial. Catholic moral theology distinguishes two broad types of moral norms, formal and material. The absoluteness of only the latter is questioned.

Formal norms express values that are constitutive of what it means to be human and so are universal among humankind. They are very general and do not have specific content, e.g., "do good and avoid evil," "be just," "be loving," and "do not be selfish."

Another type of formal norm uses synthetic terms (compact value terms) that cover the objective morality of the act by specifying the action and also including the relevant circumstantial factors. Examples are "do not murder," "do not commit adultery," "do not lie," and "do not steal." These norms forbid illicit killing, illicit sex, telling an illicit untruth, or taking what one has no right to. The issue with these terms is how intention and circumstances are to be related so that one can tell which acts of killing count as murder, which appropriations are theft, etc.

Material norms, by contrast, describe actions apart from circumstances: "do not use artificial contraception," "do not masturbate," "do not abort a fetus." Whether this type of norm can be absolute is a point of controversy. Some moralists argue that since material norms do not include circumstantial factors, they point only to actions that generally ought to be avoided as harmful for human nature, but not absolutely so. What is at stake is not the general obligation to avoid these acts, but the nature of the circumstantial factors in the less than ideal situations that count for a justifiable exception to the norm. Official Catholic teaching, however, has specified certain acts as intrinsically evil in themselves and so always immoral independently of circumstances.

Some other material norms, while not absolute in theory, do highlight values that will generally take precedence and, for all practical purposes, ought to be preferred, e.g., "noncombatants are to be immune from attack in war" and "render help to one in extreme distress." These are "virtually exceptionless" material norms because they leave us with no practical options. They protect values that nearly always take precedence even if this precedence cannot be demonstrated absolutely.

So affirming that some norms are absolute does not mean that all are. The critical issues underlying the formulation of a universal, absolute norm are an understanding of human nature and how well we know objective morality in order to express universally what nature demands. See also moral theology.

RICHARD A. MCCORMICK

absolution, the formula used by a priest in the sacramental ritual of Reconciliation. A spoken formula began to appear in the ninth century; until then a laying on of hands by a bishop or priest with no spoken words was the customary sign of reconciliation with God and with the Church. In Western churches the acceptable spoken form of priestly absolution became indicative: i.e., I absolve you; in Eastern churches the acceptable form became subjunctive: i.e., May God forgive you. Both forms, each in its respective rite, are valid. In the Middle Ages, when a spoken form of absolution began to form an integral part of the sacrament, theologians debated whether a priest "declared" sins forgiven, or "caused" such forgiveness. This debate was mirrored in discussions by medieval canon lawyers, many of whom viewed priestly absolution as a judicial act. The Council of Trent (1545–63) taught that priestly absolution was not merely an announcement of the gospel, but an effective part of God's own forgiving grace. In the post–Vatican II renewed ritual, the absolution prayer clearly states this interaction of priestly words and God's grace. The absolution prayer first recalls God's creative work, the salvific work of Jesus, and the effective presence of the Holy Spirit in the Church. Only on the basis of God's saving history does the priest then conclude: I absolve you from your sins. In this prayer both the priest and the penitent participate in the grace of God's saving history. See also confession, auricular; general absolution; Reconciliation.

abstinence, generically speaking, the act of voluntary forbearance. The term can apply to everything from not partaking of alcoholic beverages to restraint in sexual matters as a private act of penance for a certain period of time.

Most commonly in Catholicism the term applies to practice of not eating flesh meats for determined periods. In some religious communities this is done on a regular basis (e.g., certain monastic communities always abstain from meat; others only on certain days of the week). For centuries the Catholic laity abstained from meat products each Friday, but that rule was mitigated in 1966. Catholics now abstain from meat on Ash Wednesday, Fridays during Lent, and on Good Friday.

Orthodox Christians observe a much more rigorous Lenten abstinence that extends beyond meat to dairy products and the use, for example, of certain condiments such as oil on food. See also fasting; penance.

Acacianism, fifth-century split between Rome and Constantinople over a theological document that seemed, to Rome, to make too many concessions to Monophysitism, which held that in Christ there was only one divine nature; also called the Acacian Schism. In A.D. 482, Acacius, patriarch of Constantinope (472–89), tried to resolve the Monophysite controversy by writing, with Peter Mongus, the Henoticon, the Decree of Union, which attempts to state the Church's teaching about Jesus Christ by appealing to the first three ecumenical councils but omitting the Council of Chalcedon. While condemning Nestorius and Eutyches, the Henoticon does not mention the two natures of Christ. It was subsequently promulgated for Egypt by Emperor Zeno (474–91), but it was unacceptable both to Pope Felix III and also to the Monophysite Egyptians. The schism began in 484 when the pope excommunicated Acacius for acknowledging Peter Mongus as the patriarch of Alexandria. Despite the efforts of Acacius's successors to become reconciled with Rome, the schism continued until 519 when it was resolved by Emperor Justin I (518–27). See also Monophysitism.

academic freedom, the protection given to teaching and research in higher education. General agreement exists that higher education needs an atmosphere of freedom in which to accomplish its purpose, but different understandings of academic freedom exist throughout the world and within North America.

General Understandings: Despite these different understandings, higher education within the United States agrees on an operative approach to academic freedom as found in the 1940 Statement of Principles on Academic Freedom and Tenure issued by the Association of American Colleges and the American Association of University Professors (AAUP). Well over one hundred professional academic societies have subscribed to this statement and American colleges and universities accept its principles and incorporate them into their governing documents.

The 1940 statement bases academic freedom on the common good of society, which depends upon the free search for truth and its expression. Academic freedom covers the full area of a professor's work—teaching, research and publication, and extramural utterances. Correlative duties are mentioned in each area. Tenure, which is conferred after a probationary period of no more than seven years in the institution, serves as the primary functional safeguard of academic freedom, but academics in their probationary period enjoy the same academic freedom as tenured faculty members. A tenured professor can be terminated only for "adequate cause" (incompetence, moral turpitude, bona fide financial exigency) in accord with elaborate due-process procedures calling for a faculty committee of peers to judge the case in the first instance, with the final decision made by the governing body on the basis of the record. The 1940 statement recognizes that "limitations of academic freedom because of religious or other aims of the institution should be clearly stated in writing at the time of appointment."

Subsequent AAUP interpretive comments point out that most church-related institutions no longer need or desire any limitations and the organization itself does not now endorse such departures.

The historical context of interference in the hiring and firing of faculty by interests outside the university such as churches, state legislators, or monetary benefactors of the institution shaped the theory and practice of academic freedom as developed by the academy in the United States. This approach to academic freedom is pragmatic, procedural, and partial. The 1940 statement presents no in-depth theoretical discussion of academic freedom, lays heavy emphasis on the procedures and processes to be employed, and covers only the threat to academic freedom coming from people outside the academy. However, the framers of this statement deserve great credit because American higher education has universally approved and accepted what they proposed.

The acceptance of full academic freedom for Catholic institutions of higher learning means that Church authorities cannot directly interfere in the hiring, promoting, tenuring, or dismissing of faculty members. Today the primary tension exists in the area of theology, in which scholars might criticize some aspect of hierarchical teachings. Hierarchical teaching authorities of the Church can declare the positions of a certain professor to be heretical or not in accord with Catholic teaching, but Church authorities cannot directly intervene in the academy.

Just as academic freedom in general finds its justification in the common good of society, so academic freedom for Catholic higher education finds its justification in the common good of the Church. Academic freedom, despite the mistakes that Catholic scholars can and will make, best serves the good of the Catholic Church wherever it is engaged in higher education.

Two different positions, both within the pale of the AAUP approach to academic freedom, exist with regard to the understanding of the competency because of which a Catholic theologian can be dismissed. Catholic theology constitutes a legitimate academic or university discipline with a distinctive methodology, including due respect for hierarchical teaching. A scholar who does not employ the proper method can be judged to be incompetent. Others acknowledge nothing distinctive about the competency of the Catholic theologian as such.

Historical Development: Before 1965 Catholic higher education in the United States did not want academic freedom for itself and strongly opposed academic freedom existing in other American institutions of higher learning. What explains the Catholic opposition to academic freedom in its own colleges and universities and even in secular and other private institutions?

From a theological perspective, Catholics believed they had the truth and the God-given hierarchical teaching authority to proclaim that truth. From a philosophical perspective, Catholic Scholasticism maintained that the human mind can know the truth in general and even the existence of God. A classicism that saw truth as eternal, immutable, and unchangeable supported these theological and philosophical positions. From an educational perspective, Catholic colleges understood themselves as part of the pastoral ministry of the Church, trying to increase the knowledge of faith and ensure the eternal salvation of the students. From a cultural perspective, Catholics tended toward a ghetto mentality and disapproved of the secularism and liberalistic individualism present in American society and illustrated by academic freedom.

By the end of the 1960s and the early 1970s the mainstream of Catholic higher education had fully accepted and incorporated the understanding and practice of academic freedom for itself. The transformation was dramatic, quick, and total. In the summer of 1967 twenty-six leaders of Catholic higher education, meeting as a local region of the International Federation of Catholic Universities under the presidency of Theodore M. Hesburgh of Notre Dame, issued the Land O' Lakes Statement. The opening paragraph clearly makes the point: "To perform its teaching and research functions effectively the Catholic university must have a true autonomy and academic freedom in the face of authority of whatever kind, lay or clerical, external to the academic community itself." Many reasons helped to explain the sudden and massive change with regard to academic freedom. The Second Vatican Council (1962–65) brought about significant changes within Catholicism, especially the recognition of historical consciousness as affecting theology and the understanding of faith so that theology, like the Church itself, is constantly in need of a self-critical attitude. The council passed a historical document accepting religious freedom for the first time (Declaration on Religious Freedom); emphasized the legitimate autonomy and independence of earthly affairs, institutions, and sciences; stressed the need for dialogue with all other people; and even spoke about a lawful freedom of inquiry, thought, and expression (Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, n. 62). Significant changes had also been occurring in Catholic higher education, which from the 1950s onward was becoming more self-critical, more professional, more conscious of its role as a college or university, and more connected with public and other private institutions of higher learning. In the post–World War II period Catholics entered fully into the mainstream of American life and culture and were more accepting of American institutions and practices (without, however, losing their critical awareness). Financial considerations also played a role, for Catholic higher education could not prosper without some government aid. Although government aid to Catholic grammar schools and high schools was ruled to be unconstitutional, the U.S. Supreme Court in the Tilton case in 1971 accepted the constitutionality of government aid for the particular Catholic colleges in question for a number of reasons, including the fact that they do not proselytize and that they accept the principles of academic freedom.

The Current Situation: Since the 1970s the mainstream of Catholic higher education has continued to support the principles and practice of academic freedom, although a very few smaller schools have not accepted full academic freedom. Many theoreticians have supported the general position of Catholic higher education, but a few theologians, philosophers, and educators have strongly disputed the compatibility of academic freedom with Catholic higher education.

The leadership of Catholic higher education has made strenuous and heretofore successful efforts to acquire and sustain the support of the U.S. Catholic bishops for their position. In the contemporary conservative Church climate, with different attempts to control theologians, some bishops have endorsed the need to limit academic freedom. Since 1967 the Vatican has been skeptical about academic freedom and has never firmly approved it, but Church authorities have not interfered with the practice of academic freedom in Catholic higher education in the United States. In 1990 the Vatican finally issued a long-awaited apostolic constitution for Catholic higher education, Ex Corde Ecclesiae. The presidents of Catholic colleges and universities have generally welcomed the document, which, by allowing adaptations to local conditions, customs, and civil law, provides a basis for Catholic institutions to continue as they are. Other commentators point out some problems. The document theoretically limits academic freedom by truth and the common good, sees local bishops not as external to the college or university but as participants in the institution, and includes canonical provisions for those who teach theology in Catholic higher education. The National Conference of Catholic Bishops was given the task of devising norms applicable to Catholic institutions of higher learning in the United States. Meanwhile, Catholic higher education strongly endorses and supports academic freedom, but the future could bring some problems. See also Catholic colleges and universities—statistics; Catholicism and education.

Bibliography

American Association of University Professors (AAUP). Policy Documents and Reports. 1990 ed. Washington: American Association of University Professors, 1990.

Annarelli, James John. Academic Freedom and Catholic Higher Education. New York: Greenwood, 1987.

Curran, Charles E. Catholic Higher Education, Theology, and Academic Freedom. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1990.

Worgul, George S., Jr., ed. Issues in Academic Freedom. Pittsburgh: Duquesne University Press, 1992. CHARLES E. CURRAN

a cappella (ah kah-pel'lah; It., "in chapel [style]"), music sung without instrumental accompaniment; the traditional manner in which plain chant is sung in the liturgy. See also chant, plain.

Acarie, Bl. Barbe, 1566–1618, French mystic. After thirty years of a happy marriage and six children, she entered the Discalced Carmelites as a lay sister and was given the name Mary of the Incarnation. Madame Acarie was a cousin of Cardinal Pierre de Bérulle, and she received spiritual direction from Francis de Sales. More than anyone she was responsible for the introduction into France of the Discalced Carmelite nuns; for this she has been known as the "mother and foundress of Carmel in France." Acarie's three daughters became Carmelite nuns. She was beatified in 1791. See also Carmelite order.

accident, a term used by Scholastic theologians and philosophers (in the eleventh to fourteenth centuries) to refer to the outward appearance of created reality, in contrast to "substance" or essence that gives being to everything that exists. According to these medievals, who were influenced by Aristotle, the way things appear to our senses of sight, touch, taste, smell, and hearing constitute their accidents. The most important accidents are quantity and quality (absolute accidents) and action, affection, and position in space and time (relative accidents). This medieval philosophical division of human reality into accidents and substance helped Thomas Aquinas develop his understanding of Christ's presence in the Eucharist through transubstantiation: the essence or substance of the bread and wine is transformed by the words of consecration at Mass into the essence or substance of the body and blood of Christ, while the accidents, or appearance of bread and wine, remain. See also substance; transubstantiation.

acclamation, a brief phrase or sentence sung or recited by the congregation during a liturgical assembly. The two most important acclamations are the Gospel acclamation, which is comprised of sung Alleluias followed by a verse, often from Scripture, and the Memorial acclamation, an acclamation sung during the Eucharistic Prayer. Acclamations range from one word, "Amen," or "Alleluia," to single-sentence expressions of praise, "Thanks be to God," or "Praise to you, Lord Jesus Christ." Acclamations are not hymns like the Gloria in Excelsis. They are not litanies like the Agnus Dei, responses, or prayers. Instead, they function as a form of praise directly addressed to God or to Christ by the congregation.

accommodation of Scripture. See Scripture, accommodation of.

acculturation, a term from cultural anthropology that is now used in connection with forms of the liturgy. It is one of two possible ways that worship may be adapted. A first way, accommodation, refers to making adjustments in the liturgy without necessarily referring to the culture of a people. Acculturation is a preliminary process in which worship is adapted to a particular culture in an external or a partial way while respecting the unique character of the Roman liturgy. Acculturation may deal with either the stylistic characteristics or with the theological emphasis of the Roman liturgy. Thus, the intellectual and sober expressions of a Roman eucharistic prayer might be changed to a more affective way of addressing God. The theological meaning of the priesthood might be represented by names for leadership in a local culture. After an initial mistrust of anything pagan, the Church began to use certain elements from pagan culture and religion

(e.g., showing reverence by kissing an object or the Christian transformation of a pagan feast). Missionary efforts were sometimes accompanied by attempts at acculturation of worship. Matteo Ricci (d. 1610), for example, received permission in the seventeenth century from Rome to adapt Christian worship to the Chinese language and dress. Vatican II (1962–65) once again encouraged use of the particular genius and talents of various cultures (Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, n. 37). The council gave broad guidelines for such adaptation: anything that is not intrinsically bound to error or superstition and that is in accord with the authentic spirit of the liturgy may be used. See also inculturation.

Achilleus, St. (akh-il-lay'uhs), martyr. Nothing certain is known of this martyr whose tomb was in the Roman catacombs of Domitilla. Feast day (with St. Nereus): May 12.

acolyte (Gk., akolouthein, "to follow"), a minister at the altar who assists the bishop, priest, or deacon. The acolyte's role consists of lighting and carrying candles in the procession and in ministering wine and water at Mass. The acolyte may serve as extraordinary minister of Holy Communion. In the early Church (third and fourth centuries), acolytes also assisted the celebrant in breaking the bread for distribution to the faithful and in carrying Communion to the sick. Canonically, the office of acolyte was termed a minor order until 1972 when Pope Paul VI, in a papal decree known as a motu proprio, reclassified it as a ministry. See also minor orders; server, altar.

acquired right, a vested right, obtained through a completed legal transaction, actually exercised by either a physical or a juridical person (legal entity) in canon law. The canonical tradition affords a measure of protection for acquired rights when new laws are established (e.g., can. 4). See also rights and obligations in canon law.

Acta Apostolicae Sedis (ahk'tah ah-poh-stoh' lee-chay say'dihs; Lat., "Acts of the Apostolic See"), also known by its abbreviation A.A.S., the official journal of the Holy See, containing the laws, pronouncements, and addresses of the pope and the principal documents issued by the various dicasteries, or departments, of the Vatican. In accord with the September 29, 1908, constitution of Pope Pius X, Promulgandi, the A.A.S. has been published regularly since January 1909 as the official publication of the Holy See. It replaced the Acta Sanctae Sedis, which, though similar in content to the A.A.S., lacked its official character.

Universal Church laws are promulgated in the A.A.S.; they ordinarily take effect three months after the date of publication, unless another date is specified or it is evident from the nature of the matter that the law should take effect immediately. Most of the contents of the A.A.S. are not legal in nature and do not require promulgation. See also Holy See.

Acta Sanctae Sedis (ahk'tah sahnk'tay say'dihs; Lat., "Acts of the Holy See"), also known by its abbreviation A.S.S., a monthly journal published in Rome from 1865 through 1908. Like the Acta Apostolicae Sedis, it contained the legislative and administrative acts published by the Holy See, but it lacked the latter journal's official character until Pope Pius X made it "authentic and official" in 1904. The original title of the A.S.S. was Acta ex iis decerpta, quae apud S. Sedem geruntur in compendium opportune redacta et illustrata (Lat., "a compendium of documents produced by the Holy See and appropriately edited and explained"). This title was later abbreviated to Acta Sanctae Sedis. See also Holy See.

Action Française, French political movement begun in the late nineteenth century. Characterized as intensely nationalistic, it emphasized Catholicism as an important component of French culture, even though the most important spokesman for the movement, Charles Maurras (d. 1951), was not a believer. Condemned by Pope Pius XI in 1926, Action Française still had many sympathizers among the French. Its ideas were especially prominent among the leaders of the puppet government of Vichy after the fall of France at the beginning of the Second World War. The movement's chauvinism and anti-Semitism attracted a certain kind of Catholic mind in France that could accept neither the French Revolution nor the rising power of the Left. See also France, Catholicism in.

Acton, Lord John, 1834–1902, English historian. A student of Ignaz von Döllinger at Munich and a member of Parliament for Carlow (1859–65), he collaborated with John Henry Newman in editing The Rambler, a liberal Catholic publication which Acton closed after the "Syllabus of Errors" in 1864. An outspoken critic of Roman curial power, the centralization of authority in the papacy, and the Vatican's preoccupation with the preservation of the Papal States, he strongly opposed Vatican I's declaration of papal infallibility as a threat to individual consciences. His reports from Vatican Council I were published by Döllinger as Letters from Rome on the Council by Quirinus. Acton's lay status preserved him from canonical reprisals after the council. From 1896 to 1901, he was the first Regius Professor of Modern History at Cambridge, where he coordinated the writing of The Cambridge Modern History. See also Vatican Council I.

acts, human, those actions of human beings over which they have dominion, that is, ones they do deliberately. These are actions that are freely chosen and for which the person is responsible. "Human acts" are often distinguished from the "acts of a human," which are not free but are done by humans. The analysis of human acts reveals an extraordinary complexity which, however, should not detract from the essential unity of a person acting. Many aspects of a particular human act may be distinguished: perception of, desire for, deliberation about an end; consent to, decision about, and choice of an end; and implementation of the choice. Each of these distinguishable aspects, and others, may be more or less present in a single human act. Furthermore, in describing a human act three difficulties should be kept in mind. First, providing an exact description of an act as human is not always easy, and this has important implications for morality. For example, although the term "murder" always designates an evil, one may be excused for killing another human during war. Second, the intentional purpose behind an action is essential to its full description. "Eating" can be a mindless activity in front of a television, or part of a family celebration. Third, a "single" human act like eating or murder can also be analyzed into any number of human acts; the lifting of a fork or the pulling of a trigger is a human act, but it is also a part of a larger act.

actual grace. See grace, actual.

actual sin, a deliberate choice of a morally wrong action, as distinct from a sinful habit (vice) and from original sin. Actual sin is a freely chosen activity of the whole personality against the will of God, as manifested in Christian revelation and in the goodness and order of creation. True actual sin, which is serious and not venial in nature, involves, negatively, a refusal to do the good and, positively, the deliberate choice of a moral direction away from God's plan. Knowledge, emotions, and circumstances condition the freedom necessary for actual sin. Unlike Protestantism's emphasis upon an essentially sinful human condition, Catholicism focuses upon the moral specificity of individual human acts and upon the psychological and social context and impact of those acts. See also mortal sin; sin; venial sin.

A.D. (Lat., anno Domini, "in the year of the Lord"), the current designation for the Christian era, based on the calculation of the date of the birth of Jesus by the sixth-century Russian monk Dionysius Exiguus. It is now known that this calculation was off by several years, since Jesus was born before the death of Herod the Great in 4 B.C. In deference to those of other faiths, many now prefer B.C.E. and C.E. See also C.E.

Adalbert of Magdeburg, St., d. 981, missionary and first archbishop of Magdeburg. Sent by Otto the Great to evangelize the Russians under the Christian Princess Olga, he was forced to flee when her pagan son Svyatoslav took the throne. As archbishop of Magdeburg, he was given jurisdiction over the Slavs. Feast day: June 20.

Adalhard, St., also known as Adelard, 753–827, monk, cousin of the emperor Charlemagne, patron saint of gardeners. Born in France, he had a reputation for concern for the poor and the sick and for love of learning and teaching. Feast day: January 2.

Adam (Heb., 'adam, "[hu]man"), the first man. According to Gen 2–5 Adam was created first from the clay of the earth (he is said to have lived for 930 years); from his rib the first woman was later made, also in the image of God. After his wife, Eve, succumbed to temptation, Adam joined her in disobeying the command not to eat of the forbidden fruit and was cursed to work the ground. Adam is mentioned infrequently in the Bible after Gen 5, but Sir 49:16 places him above every creature. In the NT (Rom 5:12–21; 1 Cor 15:21–22) Paul presents a contrast between Adam and Christ: everyone dies as a result of Adam's sin, but in Christ all will be made alive. See also Adam and Eve; Eve; original justice; original sin.

Adam, Karl, 1876–1966, German Catholic theologian. Ordained a priest for the diocese of Regensburg in 1900, he received his doctorate in theology from the University of Munich in 1904 and subsequently published books and articles in patristics, especially on the theology of Augustine of Hippo. After teaching at the University of Munich and the University of Strasbourg, he joined the faculty of the University of Tübingen (1919–48) and immediately found himself at home within the Catholic Tübingen school. Adam's writings helped to prepare the way for the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). The Spirit of Catholicism (1924) presents the Church as a community, specifically, in terms of the Pauline metaphor of the body of Christ. Christ Our Brother (1926), The Son of God (1933), and The Christ of Faith (1954) emphasize the humanity of Jesus Christ. One and Holy (1948) develops an ecumenical theology. Adam's writings were read by Catholics around the world, influencing such people as Dorothy Day, Walter Kasper, Flannery O'Connor, Pope Paul VI, Karl Rahner, and Edward Schillebeeckx.

Adam and Eve, the first human creatures. The story of Adam and Eve, their creation, sin, and demise is recounted in Genesis 2–3. God formed Adam from the clay of the earth and brought him to life by breathing into his nostrils. The name 'ādām, derived from the Hebrew word 'adāmāh (earth), is the generic word for human being and came to be used as a proper name. Eve, Adam's wife, was formed from his rib when no other creature proved to be a suitable companion. Because she was to be the "mother of all the living," her name, hawwah, is derived from the Hebrew word for life, hayyim (Gen 3:20).

Adam and Eve covering their nakedness in shame, a consequence of their sin of disobedience in the garden of Eden; detail from the sarcophagus of a fourth-century Roman prefect, located in the Vatican.

After their creation, God placed Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden, instructing them to care for it and forbidding them to eat of the tree in the middle of the garden. At the persuasion of the serpent, Eve ate of the tree. She gave some of its fruit to her husband, who also ate of it. As a result of their sin of disobedience, Adam and Eve were expelled from the garden and subjected to various afflictions.

Numerous motifs found in other ancient Near Eastern literature are evident in this biblical story that explains not only the origins of humanity, but also marriage, suffering and death, and the afflictions of labor. In Pauline theology, the sin of Adam is seen as the origin of all human sin, an interpretation that gave rise to the subsequent development of the doctrine of original sin (Rom 5:12). See also original sin.

ANNE M. SWEET

Adamnan of Iona, St., or Adomán of Iona (Gaelic), ca. 625–704, ninth abbot of Iona. According to Bede, when Adamnan visited Northumbria in the late 680s he became convinced of the superiority of the nineteen-year cycle for calculating the date of Easter; though his own monastery retained the eighty-four-year cycle, his Easter reform was successful among Irish churches that were not dependent on Iona. Adamnan wrote a Life of Columba (the founder of Iona) and a treatise on the Holy Land, De Locis Sanctis. The Synod of Birr (697) promulgated Cáin Adomnáin, Adomnán's Law, for the protection of clerics, women, and children against acts of violence. Feast day: September 23. See also Iona.

Adam of Marsh, d. 1259, English theologian. A student of Robert Grossteste, in 1247 he became the first Franciscan master at Oxford. Firmly committed to Franciscan piety, in 1241 he urged Pope Gregory IX not to mitigate the Rule of St. Francis. Known for his erudition and reputation, he served the English king Henry III, the popes, and the English episcopate as adviser. His best-known writings are 247 edited letters, which offer considerable insight into the thirteenth-century English church. See also England, Catholicism in; Franciscan spirituality.

Adam of St. Victor, ca. 1110–ca. 1180, liturgical poet. Born in Brittany or Britain and educated at Paris, where he entered the abbey of St. Victor (ca. 1130), he is noted for his composition of liturgical poems known as Sequences, which precede the Alleluia. These poems follow a typological pattern that unites figures within the Hebrew Scriptures with Christian figures, including Mary. He was dependent in his theology on that of Hugh of St. Victor, who held that the visible both reveals and conceals the invisible. See also typology; Victorines.

Adela, St., ca. 734, abbess. She became a nun after the death of her husband and founded a Benedictine monastery near Trier, where she was its first abbess. She is not venerated liturgically. Feast day: December 24.

Adelaide, St., ca. 999, widow of Roman emperor Otto the Great. She helped lead the Roman Empire through three generations, restored monasteries, and worked for the conversion of Slavs. Feast day: December 16.

Ad Gentes Divinitus (ahd jen'tez di-vin'ee-t*oos*). See Decree on the Church's Missionary Activity.

adiaphora (ahd-ee-ahf'uh-ruh; Gk., "things indifferent"), a term for things neither commanded nor forbidden by God. Drawing upon Paul's Letters (e.g., Rom 14:17; 1 Cor 6:12; 8:8; Gal 5:6; Col 2:20), Protestant Reformers used the term to describe nonessential points that they were willing to concede to the Catholics in the interest of peace and union. In the Augsburg Interim Philipp Melanchthon and others accepted the Latin liturgy, Confirmation, the Feast of Corpus Christi, Extreme Unction, fasting, and the jurisdiction of bishops. These concessions led to the adiaphoristic controversies that split the Lutheran church in the second half of the sixteenth century. See also Reformation, the.

Adjutor, St., d. 1131, patron saint of yachtsmen. As a Crusader, he was captured by the Muslims but escaped. He became a monk and lived the life of a recluse. Feast day: April 30.

ad limina apostolorum (ahd li'mee-nah ah-paws-toh-law'r*oo*m). See ad limina visit.

ad limina visit (Lat., ad, "to"; limina, "threshold"), the visit each diocesan bishop is regularly required to make to Rome, where he meets personally with the pope and with various officials of the Roman Curia, the Church's central administration. It originated in pilgrimages made by bishops of the Roman province to the threshold of the tombs of the two great apostles, Peter and Paul, for their veneration. Currently it is a canonical obligation for every bishop who presides over a particular diocese and is to be fulfilled personally by the bishop or, if impeded, by his coadjutor bishop, an auxiliary bishop, or a designated priest of his diocese (Code of Canon Law, can. 400). The visit is considered as strengthening the bond of hierarchical communion and as witnessing to the catholicity of the Church and the unity of the episcopal college, while providing an opportunity for bishops to discuss personally with the pope any particular matters of concern in their own dioceses (Pastor Bonus, 1988, n. 10.28–32; appendix i.) Six months prior to his ad limina visit, the diocesan bishop submits to the Holy See a report on the state of the diocese in accord with the 1988 Directory for the "Ad Limina Visit," issued by the Congregation for Bishops. See also Pastor Bonus.

Adonai (ah'dohn-i; Heb., "Lord"; the plural majestic form used here is translated "My great Lord"), name for God. The culture of the ancient Near East attached particular importance to personal names because they gave access to, and perhaps control over, another. To lose one's name was to lose one's life. Out of profound reverence to God, the name YHWH (pronounced "Yahweh"), which occurs in the Hebrew text of the OT, was never said. In the postexilic period Adonai was gradually substituted for the name Yahweh. In the texts of the Hebrew Bible, the vowel signs proper to Adonai were attached to the consonants YHWH. See also Yahweh.

adoption, a metaphor used to describe the relationship between God and God's chosen people, particularly in Paul's Letters. In Rom 9:4 Paul remarks that Israel enjoyed "adoption," perhaps alluding to passages in which Israel is called the son of Yahweh (e.g., Exod 4:22; Deut 14:1; Isa 43:6; Jer 31:9; Hos 11:1). According to Paul, Christ came so that gentile Christians might also receive the status of God's adopted children (Gal 4:5), evident when they call on God as Father (Gal 4:6). Adoption is received in its fullest sense when redemption is complete (Rom 8:23). Adopted status is intimately connected with the gift of God's spirit (Rom 8:15), a gift for which some have been chosen and foreordained (Eph 1:5).

adoption, impediment of, in canon law invalidating obstacle to a marriage in which an adopted person wishes to marry an adopted parent, grandparent, or sibling (can. 1094). See also marriage law.

Adoptionism, eighth-century doctrine first condemned by Pope Adrian in 794 because of its proclamation of a dual sonship of Christ, one natural, the other adopted. Though its origins go back to the writings of Paul of Samosata, Adoptionism was first officially taught by Elipandus, archbishop of Toledo, Spain (ca. 785), who declared that as the eternally begotten Logos, Christ is the natural Son of God, but that as human and Son of Mary, Christ is merely the adopted Son of God. After much controversy, Charlemagne assembled a council at Frankfurt (794), which summarized the error of Adoptionism as ascribing sonship to a nature instead of to a person and thereby undermining orthodox teaching about the substantial reality of Jesus Christ as truly God and truly human. Even after its initial condemnation by Adrian, Adoptionism made several reappearances and was condemned again by councils at Friuli, Italy (796), Rome (799), and Aix-la-Chapelle (800). Then during both the twelfth and fourteenth centuries, new forms of Adoptionism emerged and were condemned. Pope Alexander III (d. 1181) rejected the Adoptionist formulations of Abelard, Folmar of Trier, and Gilbert of Porrée, who had concluded that Jesus Christ in his human nature was only the adopted Son of God. Finally, two centuries later, even the declaration that Jesus Christ is simultaneously the natural and adopted Son of God was condemned, for espousing any form of Adoptionism would have been implying that the one person of Jesus Christ is in his humanity not truly one with the Father. See also Christology; Incarnation, the; Jesus Christ.

JANICE POORMAN

adoration, one of the highest attitudes of prayer. It is a religious act performed by the whole person, body, mind, and soul, wherein God alone is praised as the supreme source and object of all that exists. Before Vatican II (1962–1965) adoration pertained principally to eucharistic devotion. It was the gazing in reverence upon the exposed or elevated eucharistic bread or wine. Adoration was a component of every Eucharist when the consecrated bread and cup were elevated during the Eucharistic Prayer and before Communion. By extension, adoration was and remains a central part of Forty Hours devotions, Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament, and Holy Hours. Some communities of vowed religious practice a "Perpetual Adoration."

During the late Middle Ages, the theology of eucharistic adoration became quite influential. Religious piety centered on the practices of "ocular communion," receiving Christ through the eyes, if not upon the tongue. The adoration of Christ in his manifestation in the eucharistic elements has been ecumenically troublesome. The sixteenth-century Reformers objected that the Eucharist was instituted by Christ for eating and not for worshiping, that Christ was in heaven and not upon the altar. The Catholic Church teaches that every Eucharist is ordered toward the worship of God and the communion of the faithful, and ultimately, toward salvation in God. Eucharistic adoration can be viewed as a prolongation of the time of Christ's most intimate presence to the Church. However, adoration of the Real Presence must always be secondary to its reception as spiritual nourishment. See also Benediction; Blessed Sacrament; Eucharist; latria.

JEFFREY T. VANDERWILT

Adoro te devote (ah-doh'roh tay day-voh'teh; Lat., "I devotedly adore you"), Latin hymn attributed to Thomas Aquinas (1225–74). Legend suggests that Thomas wrote this hymn, one of five in honor of the Eucharist, for the Feast of Corpus Christi, established by Pope Urban IV in 1264. English texts of this hymn and its traditional tune may be found in most Catholic hymnals (see also Catholic Source Book, Dubuque: Brown-ROA, 1990, p. 329).

Adrian I. See Hadrian I.

Adrian VI. See Hadrian VI.

Adrian of Canterbury, St., d. ca. 710, African who as abbot of Nerida, near Naples, accompanied St. Theodore to England when he had been appointed archbishop of Canterbury. As abbot of Sts. Peter and Paul (later St. Augustine's) in Canterbury for thirty-nine years, he advanced the monastery as a center of learning. Feast day: January 9.

Advent (Lat., adventus, "coming"), the four-week season beginning with First Evening Prayer of the Sunday that falls on or closest to November 30 and ending with First Evening Prayer of Christmas. This season of joyful expectation has a twofold character: it prepares for the commemoration of the Incarnation celebrated during the Christmas season, and it looks forward to Christ's Second Coming at the end of time.

The remote origins of Advent are Spanish and Gallican. The Council of Saragossa (380) reminded the laity of the obligation for daily church attendance from December 17 through January 6. Hilary of Poitiers (d. ca. 367) attests to a Gallican three-week period of preparation for Epiphany. In fifth-century Gaul a three-day-a-week fast began on or near St. Martin's Day (November 11) and extended to Christmas. These pieces of evidence, however, are insufficient to establish the earlier theory that Advent began as a catechumenal period prior to Epiphany baptisms. By 384 in Spanish jurisdictions baptisms took place on Epiphany, but also on Christmas. More probably the pre-festival preparation counterpoised the pagan Saturnalia festivals, a holiday leisure season that church leaders feared could be misused.

The Gallican fasts may have derived from Celtic monastic practices; a synod at Tours (567) prescribed fasts for monks and a council at Macon in 581 ordered an Advent fast for the laity. Gallican Advent, lasting from four to six weeks, took on a penitential character similar to early medieval Lent.

In fourth-century Rome there is a pre-Christmas fast (though not necessarily related to the feast) and Ember days, quarterly fasts. The real architect of Roman Advent practice was Gregory the Great (d. 604), who fixed the season at four weeks (though the Gelasian Sacramentary provides for six Sundays), composed seasonal prayers and antiphons, and arranged the Mass and Office lectionary. Ember day texts and the later-added (seventh-century) "O Antiphons" exemplify joyful preparation for the Nativity.

The Roman liturgy exported to Gaul in the ninth century was enriched there by eschatological themes and also by penitential elements. The fusion of Gallican and Roman Advents returned to Rome by the twelfth century, providing the basis for today's Advent.

General Norms for the Liturgical Year and Calendar preserve the two-fold focus of Advent: the first two Sundays highlight Christ's Second Coming; the last two, incarnational themes, with the fourth Sunday adverting to Mary. See also Christmas; liturgical year. JOHN A. MELLOH advocate, approved expert at canon law appointed by a party or sometimes by judicial mandate to safeguard the rights of a party in a canonical process. Advocates, unlike a proxy, offer professional counsel, make arguments, and may be several. The qualifications are majority age, good reputation, canonical expertise, mandate, and approval by the diocesan bishop, who may allow non-Catholics to serve.

Advocatus Diaboli (ahd-voh-kah'toos dee-ah' boh-lee). See promoter of justice.

Aegidius Romanus (ay-jee'dee-oos roh-mah' noos). See Giles of Rome.

Aelfric, also called "the Grammarian," ca. 950–1020, abbot of Eynsham. Active in the tenth-century English Benedictine reform, Aelfric was educated at Winchester, served as master of the monastic school at Cerne Abbas, and became abbot of Eynsham in 1005.

A distinctive prose stylist, Aelfric wrote several collections of homilies and composed pastoral letters for his contemporary bishops. His Colloquy, a beginner's school text in Latin, gives us many glimpses of everyday life in his time.

During the English Reformation, Aelfric's homilies were used to attack the doctrines of transubstantiation and the Immaculate Conception: this application ignores the historical context of his ideas. See also Benedictine order.

Aelred of Rievaulx, St., ca. 1110–67, abbot of the Cistercian monastery of Rievaulx, England (1147–67). Born at Hexham, Aelred spent several years with the Scottish court before joining the Cistercians in 1134. He is best known for The Mirror of Charity, a defense of the Cistercian life requested by Bernard of Clairvaux, and On Spiritual Friendship, patterned after Cicero's dialogue on friendship. Spiritual friendships are described as inspired by God and a means to holiness. Aelred's meditations on the life of Christ are forerunners of the method of imagining oneself in Christ's presence found in Ignatius of Loyola's Spiritual Exercises. Feast day: March 3.

Aeterni Patris (ay-tair'nee pah'trees; Lat., "Of the eternal Father"), encyclical of Leo XIII, August 4, 1879, calling for the revival of Thomism as the philosophy best able to provide the principles capable of organizing theology into a coherent and unified body of knowledge. Leo required that Thomistic philosophy be taught in seminaries as the foundation for theological studies and that academies for scholarly research in Thomism be established. The encyclical interpreted Thomism through nineteenth-century neo-Thomist lenses; it deprecated post-Cartesian philosophy and modern science as tainted with skepticism and so incapable of attaining truth or entering into a fruitful relationship with theology. See also Aquinas, St. Thomas; Thomism.

affective prayer, prayer that engages the emotions or feelings in a positive, loving way; prayer of the heart. There has been a recovery of interest recently in the affective dimension of prayer in Catholic spirituality. Often in the past, the role of feeling in prayer was misunderstood, neglected, and, in some instances, feared. Feelings were thought to be dangerous, requiring strict forms of control through fasting and self-denial. Recent developments in psychology emphasize the wholeness and integrity of the human person, paving the way for a similar understanding of prayer and the spiritual life. Affections are no longer ignored but nurtured and allowed to work in harmony with other aspects of the human person.

Most of the mystics experienced God in profoundly affective ways. Leading names in the tradition include Augustine, Anselm, Bernard of Clairvaux, Francis of Assisi, Hadewijch of Antwerp, Bonaventure, Teresa of Ávila, and John of the Cross. In the fourth century, Augustine knew how important it was to be moved deeply by the love of God, and in his Confessions he consciously seeks to move his readers to that end.

In the Bible, the Psalms and the Canticle of Canticles are examples of affective prayer. Powerful feelings of love and affection are experienced as in intimate friendship and marital love. The Christian becomes the lover of Christ who seeks God's presence and who is on fire with the desire to do God's will and unconsolable when God seems withdrawn. The soul feels dissolved in God's love and ardently desires that others experience God in a similar way.

In affective prayer, one is touched, moved, affected by divine and human love. Examples of such feelings include compassion for the suffering of Jesus and for others, awe at the beauty of creation, praise, thanksgiving, joy, resolve to live a good life. One might meditate on a text or image and pause when one's heart stirs with feeling and reaches out in love to God. One can experience such feelings, allow them to deepen and to motivate virtuous action on behalf of the world. See also prayer.

ELIZABETH DREYER

affectivity, that aspect of experience that refers to feeling and emotion. Affectivity varies from warm feelings to passion toward an object of desire to revulsion from an object of aversion. Feelings can be fleeting, or can be developed and deepened over a lifetime, or can reflect the basic orientation of one's life. Examples of affectivity that express liking are love, joy, and awe. Aversion produces feelings such as sorrow, fear, anger, and jealousy. Affective interior dispositions are often accompanied by physiological changes such as tears, increased body temperature, rapid heartbeat, or muscle tension. Feelings also provide energy for action. One's affective dispositions provide momentum and zest for life. Affectivity and cognition are inextricably linked and ideally work in harmony and mutual correction. Cognition is associated with reason, knowledge, clarity; affectivity with the will, value, mystery. A common symbol of affectivity is the heart and a frequent name for the Christian God is Love.

affinity. See consanguinity.

affirmative judgment, in canon law judicial pronouncement favoring the rights asserted or declaration sought in the complaint of the petitioner. Only with moral certitude derived from the acts and the proofs may judges render an affirmative decision.

affusion, a method of baptizing a person by pouring water over his or her head. With the passing of time, affusion replaced immersion as the accepted mode of initiation. In the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (RCIA) and in Baptism for Children, affusion is the alternate form of Baptism; both rituals mention immersion first. In some modern fonts, adult candidates stand in a pool of water, partially immersed and water is poured over their heads. See also Baptism.

Africa, Catholicism in. The twentieth century has witnessed the rapid growth of African Catholicism, especially in the sub-Saharan region. To appreciate this increase, it is helpful to view it against overall population increase, total Christian expansion, and the spread of Islam.

Statistics: In 1900 Africa had an estimated population of 108 million. This grew to over 460 million by 1980. Projections in the World Christian Encyclopedia (1982) indicate that by the year 2000, the continent will be the home of over 800 million, nearly 10 percent of humanity.

In 1900 about 10 million Africans (11 percent) were Christian. This figure rose to approximately 203 million or 44 percent in 1980. It is estimated that in 2000, Africa will have a little over 393 million Christians, representing over 48 percent of the continent's population.

There were about 35 million African Muslims (32 percent) in 1900. The number grew to 190 million or 41 percent in 1980. Indications are that as the twentieth century closes, Islam will have 339 million followers, constituting about 42 percent of the continental population.

Africa had only 2 million Catholics in 1900, less than 2 percent of the total. The figure rose to 77 million or 17 percent in 1980. Projections suggest that in 2000, Africa will be the home of 152 million Catholics, or 18 percent. By the year 2000, therefore, Catholicism will have grown from less than 2 to nearly 20 percent, the biggest gain by any single denomination on the continent.

History: The history of Catholicism in Africa may be considered in three main periods. The first saw a vibrant Church in Roman North Africa from the second to the seventh centuries. Little is known of its origins. During the great persecution by the emperor Diocletian (d. 305) beginning in 303, the Church historian Eusebius (d. 340) relates that he witnessed Christians being martyred in the hundreds around Alexandria. This Catholicism produced Clement (d. 215), leader of the school of Christian instruction in Alexandria. Beside providing martyrs and scholars, this Catholicism also contributed to the development of the monastic movement.

Pope John Paul II blesses Catholics during a 1993 visit to Uganda, where there are over 8 million Catholics comprising about 40 percent of the total population.

North African Catholicism was steeped in several theological controversies. Some of its members insisted that those who had given up the faith, especially in times of persecution, needed a second baptism before readmission. Proponents of this view, called Donatists, were vigorously opposed by Augustine of Hippo (d. 430). This Catholicism also contended with the Monophysites, who held that Jesus' human nature was totally absorbed by the divine Person. The monks who had sought solitude in the Egyptian desert were particularly emphatic about Christ's divinity. The Monophysites in North Africa held to their view, even after the Council of Chalcedon (451) taught that Jesus Christ was truly God and truly a human being, whose two natures were united in one divine person.

In the fifth century Roman rule was crumbling in its African frontiers. Hordes of Vandals from Europe arrived in 429 to misrule the territory for over a century. When the Arabs came in the seventh century, bringing with them newly founded Islam, African Catholicism was already in decline. It was soon displaced by the faith of the new rulers.

A second period of Catholicism began in the fifteenth century when Portuguese explorers and traders, accompanied by missionaries, sailed down the West African coast searching for a sea route to India. Along with their desire for wealth and adventure, the Portuguese were also looking for the legendary Prester John, priest and king of Ethiopia in deepest Africa, a reputed sworn enemy of both Islam and "paganism."

The Portuguese crown, at whose behest these mariners sailed, was itself obeying papal orders. In his bull Romanus Pontifex of January 8, 1455, Pope Nicholas V (1447–55) gave all Africa forever to the Portuguese king Alfonso V (1432–81) and his successors "out of [the] plenitude of the Apostolic power." This document gave the monarch permission to enslave all Saracens and "pagans." For the next two centuries, this policy determined Portuguese missionary activity in Africa.

Portuguese caravels sailed the West African coast, with Diego Cão as captain, and reached the Kongo River in 1483. But Cão found neither Christians nor Muslims to be fought. Instead, the captain met Nzinga Nkuwu, king of the Kongo, a polygamist who was willing to work with the strange men from the sea. Shortly, Cão arranged for the Portuguese crown to send builders to enlarge the king's palace.

Nkuwu, having been instructed by the Franciscans, embraced the faith and was baptized in 1491. A subsequent quarrel between Nkuwu and the missionaries saw the latter depart temporarily.

By now the slave trade was fast becoming a menace. Nkuwu's African successor, who took a Portuguese name, Alfonso I (ruled 1506–43), was willing but unable to curb it. His attempts to forge direct diplomatic relations with the papacy failed.

Sailing along the East African coast, Portuguese mariners and missionaries encountered Islam. For two centuries both cross and crescent were locked in battle for the political, commercial, and religious control of the eastern shores.

Aided by the crown, the Portuguese Augustinians built several places of worship along the eastern coast, chief among them a monastery in Mombasa. Since the missionaries found the coast already Islamized, they made few converts. There was little effort to win followers beyond the coastal strip. Hence the friars ended up ministering to Portuguese sailors and their mixed-race offspring.

In 1593 the Portuguese built Fort Jesus in Mombasa, their headquarters. African and Arab resentment against Portuguese rule resulted in an uprising in 1631 led by Dom Jerónimo Chingulia, a former Catholic. Upon reverting to Islam as Yusuf bin al-Hasan, he massacred all but five Portuguese in Mombasa. Over 250 Christians were killed. In 1636 the Augustinian order requested that the Vatican take the first steps to declare the slain Christians martyrs and saints, but the process was soon stopped.

After the Mombasa massacre the Portuguese regained control. But in 1696 Saif bin Sultan of Oman, a staunch Muslim, personally sailed down to Mombasa with three thousand men and attacked Fort Jesus, which fell in December 1698. The Portuguese were finally dislodged from East Africa north of Mozambique, and with them Catholicism.

Between 1500 and 1700 Catholicism failed on both coasts of Africa mainly because it came under the wing of an imperial power that was resented by the people it sought to rule. Moreover, far from lifting a finger against the slave trade, many missionaries compromised the gospel by becoming slaveholders. Also, on the east coast, Islam provided too formidable a challenge and eventually carried the day.

The third and most recent period of Catholicism in Africa began around the 1850s and continues to the present. The middle of the nineteenth century witnessed one of the greatest Catholic missionary awakenings of all time. Many new congregations and missionary associations were started with the aim of evangelizing Africa.

Such was the case of the White Fathers founded by Bishop (later Cardinal) Charles Lavigerie (1825–92), who was appointed bishop of Algiers in 1867. A man of great energy, Lavigerie had a missionary plan of converting Africa, both Muslim and "pagan" alike, from north to south. To facilitate Catholicism's southward expansion, he founded the Pères Blancs (White Fathers) in 1868, today known as the Society of Missionaries of Africa.

Lavigerie, the builder, constructed monumental stone structures such as Notre Dame d'Afrique in Algiers, the Basilica of St. Louis at Carthage, and the Cathedral of St. Vincent de Paul in Tunis. These churches were used by expatriate Catholics during the colonial period until national independence came in the 1950s. Today they are government museums. While Lavigerie's efforts seem to have borne no lasting fruit in North Africa, the labors of his missionaries south of the Sahara are much in evidence in the countless small Christian communities that were founded.

Another group founded to evangelize Africa was the Congregation of the Holy Ghost Fathers, which was reorganized in 1839 by Francis Libermann (1802–52), a French Jew who had converted to Catholicism. Members of his congregation have ministered in West and East Africa since the nineteenth century. One of them, Bishop Joseph Shanahan of southern Nigeria, built the largest private school system in Africa at the turn of the century.

A feature common to missionary groups that have made a major impact in Africa is the contribution of women religious to the proclamation and witness of the gospel. Soon after founding the White Fathers, Lavigerie established the White Sisters, also known as the Missionary Sisters of Our Lady of Africa, with the cooperation of Mother Marie Salome in 1869. And when the Holy Ghost missionaries began their work in East Africa in 1863, they invited the Daughters of Mary from France, and later the Precious Blood Sisters from Germany and the Institute of the Blessed Virgin Mary, commonly called the Loreto Sisters, from Ireland to work alongside them. Archbishop (later Cardinal) Herbert Vaughan (1832–1903) of Westminster founded the Mill Hill Missionaries in 1866 and shortly afterward established the Franciscan Missionary Sisters of St. Joseph. And after Daniel Comboni (1831–81), a diocesan priest, founded the Verona Fathers in 1867, he started the Missionary Sisters of Verona in 1872 for the same African mission field. Canon Joseph Allamano (1851–1926) followed a similar pattern. Having founded the Institute of the Consolata Fathers in 1902, he set up the Consolata Sisters in 1910.

Challenges: African Catholicism faces major challenges. The rate of conversions far outstrips that of ordinations. The result is that many communities cannot celebrate the Sunday Eucharist, often having to wait weeks or even months before a priest can visit. Meanwhile, a catechist leads them in a celebration of the Liturgy of the Word. African Catholicism currently depends on the catechist, but unfortunately not on the Eucharist.

Given this pastoral challenge, African Catholicism has rediscovered small Christian communities comparable to the base ecclesial communities of Latin America. During their plenary meeting in Nairobi in 1976, the bishops of central and eastern Africa (AMECEA) gave pastoral priority to the support of small Christian communities. Characterized by the gift of sharing (koinonia), these churches are reminiscent of the communities Paul mentions in his Letters, e.g., 1 Corinthians and Ephesians.

Another challenge is inculturation. In many respects African Catholicism today resembles that of its founders, especially in art, architecture, liturgy, and theology. The dominance of the European spirit in African Catholicism may have prompted Pope Paul VI to challenge the African Church to cultivate a soul of its own. Speaking to African bishops at Kampala, Uganda, in 1969 the pope said: "You may, and you must have an African Christianity."

Breakaway churches are a major feature of Protestant Christianity in Africa. According to the World Christian Encyclopedia, there were about six thousand independent churches on the continent in the mid-1960s. Remarkably, this phenomenon has hardly affected African Catholicism, a fact acknowledged by Catholic and non-Catholic writers alike. But if African Catholicism has not lost many followers through church breakaways, it has begun to experience considerable desertions to new Christian fundamentalist groups that have been sweeping much of sub-Saharan Africa in the last three decades of the twentieth century.

A further challenge is the place of women in Church and society, a concern expressed by several bishops at a synod of the African Church held in Rome in 1994. If women have lower status than men in many parts of the world, this is eminently true in Africa. To its credit, missionary Catholicism has done much to uplift the African woman, especially through modern education and medicine. Perhaps no one single factor has influenced the improvement of the indigenous woman's lot more than the contribution of women religious from Europe and North America. The African Church faces the task of continuing to address this problem.

In the final decade of the twentieth century, leaders of African Catholicism have spoken up increasingly for social justice. This is a welcome development in a continent where the disparity between rich and poor, and between the powerful and the powerless has been so great. See also Africa, Church in Roman; Donatism; Holy Ghost Fathers; Islam; Portugal, Catholicism in; White Fathers.

Bibliography

Barrett, David B. World Christian Encyclopedia. Nairobi: Oxford University Press, 1982.

Boulaga, Eboussi F. Christianity Without Fetishes: An African Critique and Recapture of Christianity. New York: Orbis Books, 1984.

Donders, Joseph G. Non-Bourgeois Theology: An African Experience of Jesus. New York: Orbis Books, 1985.

Hastings, Adrian. African Catholicism: Essays in Discovery. London: SCM Press, 1989.

Nyamiti, Charles. Christ as Our Ancestor. Harare: Mambo, 1986.

LAWRENCE NJOROGE

Africa, the Church in Roman, the Church in the Roman province of Africa, a province established in the first century by Augustus on the ruins of the old Punic colony. Christianity flourished in Roman Africa in hundreds of communities in what are today the Islamic nations of Tunisia, Algeria, and Morocco. In general, its ecclesiastical divisions followed those of the imperial divisions under Diocletian and stretched from the Gulf of Tunis in the east to the Atlantic in the west: Tripolitana, Byzacena, Africa Proconsularis, Numidia, and Mauretania. The archaeological evidence of these Christian communities is found in an abundance of mosaics, in the extensive catacombs of Hadrumetum (Sousse), and in the ruins of vast basilican complexes near the Mediterranean coast, through the mountains of the interior, to the borders of the Sahara. Just as impressive is the literary legacy of this lively and factious church, reflected in the writings of its bishops, Cyprian of Carthage, Augustine of Hippo, and a host of others, as well as in a confident and articulate laity: martyrs like Perpetua in the second century, and theologians like Tyconius in the fourth century. These Christian communities shared in the urban sophistication, as well as in the rich agricultural development, of the region. They were part of a costention is given by Church leadership to the relationship of various developmental stages of an individual's spiritual growth.

aggiornamento (ah-jawhr-nah-men'toh; It., "bringing up to date"), a term that has become synonymous with the Church renewal initiated by Pope John XXIII and the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). Aggiornamento called for a new openness on the part of the Church toward the world, and toward other Christian churches and non-Christian religions, using "the medicine of mercy" rather than condemnation as the means of promoting the Church's teachings and wisdom. Aggiornamento also called for the internal reform and renewal of the Church, especially in its liturgical life. At the final session of the council, Pope Paul VI offered a new definition: "From now on aggiornamento will signify for us a widely undertaken quest for a deeper understanding of the spirit of the council and the faithful application of the norms it has happily and prayerfully provided." See also Vatican Council II.

Agnes, St., virgin martyr. Nothing is known beyond her third-century death. A century later the daughter of Constantine erected a basilica over her tomb in Rome. Feast day: January 21.

Agnes of Assisi, St., 1197–1253, abbess. Sister of Clare of Assisi, she entered religious life under the inspiration of Francis of Assisi. Feast day: November 16. See also Francis of Assisi, St., agnosticism, the position that confines knowledge to sense experience or the empirically verifiable. Consequently, agnostics, in rejecting positive knowledge of anything beyond sense experience, reject the possibility of supernatural knowledge, especially any knowledge of the existence of God.

While the philosophical underpinnings for agnosticism were in place with the rejection of the speculative by Immanuel Kant (1724–1804), the term itself, coined by T.H. Huxley in 1869, refers to the rejection of metaphysics as "Gnosticism." The nineteenth-century debate focused on the fundamental limitations of human knowing and thus ruled out either positive or negative statements on the existence of God. Consequently, agnosticism is not the same as atheism but is rather a form of scepticism, specifically, a scepticism that rejects metaphysics.

Agnosticism can also appear in company with religious belief as the view that since God is unknown or unknowable, religious faith cannot and should not attempt to engage in apologetics. For the "religious agnostic" of the nineteenth century, the profession of agnosticism was meant to highlight that the "leap of faith" (belief in this unknowable God) is not a rational move, but a position borne of faith alone or moral necessity (the latter being Kant's resolution).

Vatican I (1869–70) reaffirmed the Catholic tradition that God's existence is knowable by natural reason alone (see Wis 13; Rom 1:20). This is not the same as affirming the knowability of God's essence (what God is), which abides as incomprehensible mystery. Rather, the Catholic objection to agnosticism is a theologically grounded refusal to privatize the objective claim of faith upon humanity. See also atheism; faith and reason; God. NANCY DALLAVALLE

Agnus Dei (ahn'yoos day'ee; Lat., "Lamb of God"). 1 Latin title for the litany sung by the congregation at Mass during the final preparations for Holy Communion. Introduced into the Roman rite during the seventh century, the Lamb of God litany accompanies the final preparations of the eucharistic foods. Ordinarily sung three times, the text, "Lamb of God, who takes away the sins of the world, have mercy on us" is concluded the third time with, "grant us peace." 2 Agnus Dei also refers to small pieces of wax cut from the paschal candle, stamped with the image of a lamb, blessed by the pope, and distributed to various individuals during the first year of the pontificate and every seven years thereafter. See also Lamb of God.

Agobard, St., 769–840, archbishop of Lyons. Born in Spain, Agobard moved to Lyons by 792, and became its forty-seventh bishop in 816. Agobard supported a rebellion by the sons of Emperor Louis the Pious and was compelled to take refuge in Italy with one of them, Lothair I, from 835 to 837. Among his works are treatises against the Adoptionist Felix of Urgel and on The Insolence of the Jews. Feast day: June 6. See also Adoptionism; Felix of Urgel.

agrapha (ah'grah-fah; Gk., "unwritten things"), sayings attributed to Jesus but not recorded in the NT. Many were transmitted orally and then preserved in the works of patristic authors such as Justin Martyr and Clement of Alexandria and in apocryphal Gospels such as the Gospel of Thomas.

Agrypnia (ah-grip-nee'ah). See All-Night Vigil.

Aidan of Iona, St., d. 651, monk and bishop of Lindisfarne. Sent from Iona at the request of King Oswald of Northumbria, he was consecrated a bishop in 635, taking Lindisfarne as his see. Since he did not know the English language, the king (who had been recalled from exile among the Irish) translated as Aidan preached. Aidan was a holy man who succeeded in spreading Christianity and monasticism throughout the region, as Bede willingly acknowledged despite his distaste for the Irishman's mistaken views on the dating of Easter. Feast day: August 31. See also Lindisfarne.

AIDS (Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome), a fatal disease resulting from HIV (human immunodeficiency virus) infection. It represents the most serious health disaster in the United States since the influenza epidemic of 1918 and is now worldwide in scope. HIV is spread by sexual contact, parenteral exposure (needle sharing, blood transfusions), and perinatal exposure (transplacental and/or intrapartum transmission).

Pope John Paul II in an address to the Catholic Health Association (Phoenix, September 14, 1987) referred to the "moral obligation and social responsibility to help those who suffer" from AIDS by showing the "compassion of Christ and his Church." The problem of prevention and containment has centered on the means to be used. While stressing the desirability of abstinence as the only medically reliable and morally acceptable means, some Catholics believe that prophylactics are acceptable when all other preventive means will foreseeably fail. The U.S. Catholic bishops, however, have generally opposed this course.

aisle (īl), the areas within a church building on either side of the nave (the main part of the church where the laity sit) between the exterior walls and the columns; also the walkways, defined by pews, extending from the doors to the sanctuary. Some authorities claim the second usage is incorrect, saying that the term "center aisle" is contradictory.

Akathistos (ah-kah'-this-tohs; Gk., "not seated"), ancient Byzantine poem in honor of Mary, comprising twelve poetic refrains (kontakion) each followed by its strophe (ikos), chanted standing (whence the name) during Matins of the fifth Saturday of Lent or on other occasions as a devotional office. It was composed to commemorate the miraculous liberation of Constantinople from the invasions of the Persians and Avars in 626.

akolouthia (ah-koh-loo-thee'uh; Gk., "order," "rite"), Byzantine-rite term for a particular rite or office (the akolouthia of Baptism), for the proper variable parts of the offices of a day or feast (the akolouthia of Christmas), or for the common of a category of saint (the akolouthia of a martyr).

Alacoque, St. Margaret Mary, 1647–90, French mystic, chief founder of devotion to the Sacred Heart. Born a peasant in Burgundy, she entered the Visitation convent at Paray-le-Monial in 1671. She had difficulty adapting to the pace of life in the convent and its active prayer style, and provoked the jealousy of some of the sisters. On December 27, 1673, Margaret Mary began to experience a series of revelations in which Jesus told her about his loving heart. She informed her spiritual adviser that the Lord was asking her to promulgate devotion to the heart of Jesus in reparation for humanity's indifference to God. She also claimed that Jesus told her the approval of her superiors was necessary for all her undertakings so that Satan would not mislead her, because he had no power over those who act out of obedience. She encouraged the reception of the Eucharist on the First Friday of each month in reparation for sins and a prayer vigil every Thursday night in honor of Jesus' agony in Gethsemane. She also asked the Church to observe the feast of the Sacred Heart on the Friday after the Octave of Corpus Christi. Her religious community was initially suspicious of her requests but her confessor, Claude la Colombière, sought ecclesiastical approval for them. Colombière's memoirs disclosed the revelatory origin of Margaret Mary's devotion to the Sacred Heart. She was canonized in 1920. Feast day: October 16. See also First Fridays; Sacred Heart, devotion to the.

Alan of Lille, ca. 1120–1202/3, Cistercian lay brother, theologian, poet, preacher, and canonist. After preaching against heresy in southern France, he lived his final days as a Cistercian lay brother. He was a prolific and original writer highly influenced by the Platonic thought of the time. His works are varied and include allegorical poems, handbooks on sermons and preaching, a dictionary of biblical language, and a work refuting not only Christian heresies, but Judaism and Islam as well.

Alaric, ca. 370–410, Visigothic conqueror of Rome. A former ally, Alaric began to attack the empire in the East ca. 395; unable to take Constantinople, he moved on to Illyria, where he was made imperial magister militum (virtually a military governor) by 401 and received a huge bribe around 407. Satisfied by neither title nor gold, he besieged Rome in 408 and 409. Negotiations for further bribes collapsed in 410, and Alaric sacked the city in August. See also Visigoths.

alb (Lat., albus, "white"), a long white linen tunic worn by priests, deacons, and other ministers for liturgical functions. The alb, which may be fastened at the waist by a cincture, is fashioned after the Greco-Roman tunica talaris, an everyday garment that reached to the ankles. The custom of wearing albs for liturgy was established by the sixth century. See also vestments.

Alba Iulia (yoo lee-ah). See Pseudo-Synod of Alba Iulia.

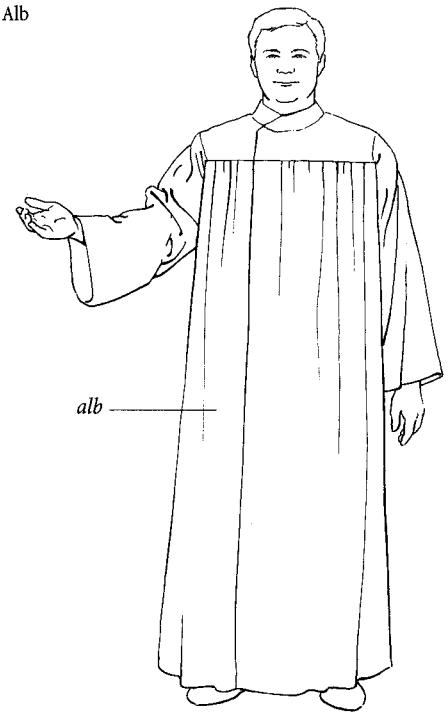
Alban, St., ca. third century, protomartyr of Roman Britain. A pagan soldier at Verulamium (modern St. Alban's), he sheltered a Christian priest during a persecution and was so moved by the Christian message that he was baptized and, posing as the priest, martyred. Feast day: June 20.

Alb



Albanian Byzantine Catholics, Albanian Orthodox or their descendants who became Catholic but retained their Byzantine heritage. The first such community was a small mission along the coast of Epirus, which existed from 1628 until 1765. A second group was established ca. 1900 by a former Albanian Orthodox priest, George Germanos. By 1912 his community numbered about 120 and was centered in the village of Elbasan. In 1938 monks from the Italo-Albanian monastery at Grottaferrata came to assist the community, which by 1945 had about 400 members. The group vanished after 1967 when Albania was declared an atheist state, and there is no indication that it has been reestablished after the fall of Communism.

Alberic of Molesmes, St., d. 1109, a hermit who in 1098, along with Stephen Harding (d. 1134) and Robert of Molesmes (d. 1111), founded a new monastery at Cîteaux, the motherhouse of the Cistercians. Feast day: January 26. See also Cîteaux.

Albert the Great. See Albertus Magnus, St.

Albertus Magnus, St. (Lat., "Albert the Great"), ca. 1200–80, German Dominican bishop, philosopher, theologian, Doctor of the Church, and patron saint of natural scientists.

Life: Albert the Great probably received training in the liberal arts at Padua, where he would have seen newly translated works of Aristotle. Upon entering the Dominican order, probably in his thirties, he studied theology and then lectured in German Dominican priories. In the early 1240s, he went to the University of Paris for further study; there he found more newly available Peripatetic texts (derived from the school of Aristotle), whose contents he absorbed with astonishing rapidity. He was a master of theology at Paris from 1245 until 1248, when he was asked to establish the Dominicans' international house of studies at Cologne. In addition to his speculative genius, Albert possessed diplomatic and administrative skills, so that his teaching and writing were frequently interrupted by practical demands. Besides often being called upon to settle conflicts or give counsel, he was provincial of the German Dominicans from 1254 to 1257, and bishop of Regensburg from 1260 to 1262 (a position he accepted only at the pope's command, resigning as soon as possible). Once rid of the bishopric, he seems to have resumed writing and teaching in various German Dominican houses until shortly before his death, when his memory failed. His unusual scientific interests guaranteed that legends of black magic would grow up around him and that occult books would be ascribed to him. Consequently, his beatification was delayed until 1622, and his canonization until 1931.

Albertus Magnus, teacher of fellow Dominican Thomas Aquinas; fifteenth-century painting by Fra Angelico, Museum of St. Mark, Florence.

Thought: Asked by fellow Dominicans for help understanding Aristotelian physics, Albert undertook to make that and all of Aristotelian learning intelligible to those whose academic language was Latin. Over the course of some twenty years (ca. 1250–70), he paraphrased the known works of Aristotle, together with some spurious works. But he did not simply repeat Aristotle. Rather, he presented the best of the living Peripatetic school, adding whole books when Peripatetics had contributed to sciences about which Aristotle had not written and correcting Aristotle in light of later Peripatetics and of his own occasional experiments and abundant observations (because Dominicans were not allowed horses, Albert had time to examine animals, plants, stones, and the like as he crossed Europe on foot). Furthermore, when faced with philosophical arguments opposed to faith, he respected the autonomy of secular sciences and addressed the arguments philosophically, showing how they were inconclusive or faulty on philosophical grounds, whereas sound philosophy never contradicts revelation. Thus, while a number of his contemporaries toyed with heresy or issued blanket condemnations of the new learning, Albert showed concretely how room could be made for Aristotle within the Church's intellectual tradition.

However comprehensive Albert's explanation of Aristotelian learning, he insisted that it could not represent the whole of philosophy, since complete philosophers must know Plato too. Indeed, most Peripatetics Albert read were somewhat Platonic, with the result that his Aristotelian encyclopedia exhibits Neoplatonic traits. So, too, do his numerous theological works, where Augustine and Pseudo-Dionysius lend their authority to this tendency.

Albert complained that his fellow religious were uninterested in learning about things they thought irrelevant to salvation; he himself cultivated all branches of philosophy, because he found vestiges of the creator in all creatures. He also held that training in these secular sciences was invaluable for theologians. Therefore, in 1259, while heading a commission on study in the Dominican order, he saw to it that Dominican students would be taught philosophy. This was unheard of, since both canon law and the Dominican constitutions made it quite hard for religious to pursue secular studies; still, he himself, though a master of theology, had already dared lecture on Aristotle's ethics and zoology.

Legacy: While Albert has been overshadowed by his most famous student, Thomas Aquinas, this was not always the case: Albert is the only philosopher ever to be called "the Great," and he was called that during his lifetime, contrary to medieval custom. His respect for the autonomy of philosophy and his recognition of the services it could render theology were taken up by Thomas, who studied under Albert from 1246 to 1252, while Albert was lecturing on the Dionysian corpus; Thomas kept a copy of Albert's Dionysian commentaries all his life. Albert's Dionysian and Neoplatonic leanings influenced the Rhineland mystics too, such people as Heinrich Suso, Johannes Tauler, Meister Eckhart, and Jan van Ruysbroeck are his intellectual descendants. And the fifteenth century saw the rise of self-styled Albertists in German, Polish, and Bohemian universities. Feast day: November 15. See also Aquinas, St. Thomas; Aristotle; Dominican order. THÉRÈSE BONIN they may have been influenced by the Bogomils of Bulgaria, who in turn were dependent upon earlier Manichees, or they may have been an independent dualist movement. Their dualism is both cosmological and anthropological. A good God, who created the angels and human souls, and an evil God, Satan, who created the physical world, battle for control of the cosmos. Human salvation is a process of becoming aligned with the good God by liberating the soul from the contamination of the flesh. As a result, they championed an austere asceticism, rejecting all sexual activity and the eating of meat, eggs, and milk and practicing rigorous fasts, sometimes unto death. Their religious beliefs were seen as a challenge to both the secular and the ecclesiastical orders. They refused to bear arms or swear oaths and rejected both the Catholic hierarchy and its sacraments.

Albigensians, dualist heretics, part of the wide-ranging Cathari heresy, who flourished in southern France and northern Italy from the mid-twelfth to the fourteenth century. Their origins are obscure:

They developed their own ecclesiastical organization, dividing their territory into dioceses paralleling the Catholic and distinguishing in their own ranks between the Pure, or Perfect, and their less advanced followers. Only Perfect souls could hope to transcend the cycle of death and reincarnation. Those whom the Perfect deemed fit to achieve their more lofty status were initiated through a rite of laying on of hands, called consolamentum (Lat.). As itinerant preachers, the Albigensians won many adherents among the poor, who were impressed by their sharp renunciation of the world and their condemnation of the wealthy and powerful.

The Catholic Church took a number of measures to regain Albigensian territory. The Cistercian and then Dominican preaching campaign of the late twelfth and early thirteenth centuries proved ineffective, giving way to the Albigensian Crusade and Inquisition, which eventually overcame the Albigensian threat. See also Cathari; Crusades; dualism; Inquisition; Manichaeism. MICHAEL WOODWARD alcoholism, an addiction with genetic, biological, and social dimensions, progressive through varying degrees of dependency. Characteristics include a preoccupation with alcohol, drinking more than intended and over a longer period, giving up important activities to drink, and drinking even though it causes problems. Disposing factors include personal susceptibility (physical/genetic and/or psychological), environmental stress (economic, relational), and the availability of alcohol. The alcoholic becomes increasingly controlling and inflexible, while the habit is enabled by a system of denial and role-playing maintained by family and friends. Alcohol becomes the system's central organizing principle. Dependency is progressively destructive and often fatal.

Researchers reflect that modern culture does not provide a sense of place in the cosmos or a sense of self-assurance. Drugs or alcohol promise to alleviate or numb the corresponding deep feelings of anxiety.

As seen in Augustine's Confessions, no amount of will power, promises, or resolutions can liberate one from such addictive patterns. Thus, successful programs such as Alcoholics Anonymous (AA), founded by Bill W[ilson], have counseled a Twelve-Step program that centers around surrender of the will to a Higher Power and active participation in recovery communities. Some have suggested parallels between such communities and the base communities of Latin America, though the emphases of the base communities on Scripture and structural analysis are absent.

The late Father Ed Dowling told his friend Bill W. of similarities between AA's Twelve Steps and Ignatius of Loyola's "Rules for the Discernment of Spirits." The life of Matt Talbot is often invoked among recovering Catholic alcoholics. See also base communities; discernment of spirits; Talbot, Matt. SIMON HARAK

Alcuin (al'kwin), ca. 730–804, deacon, abbot of Tours, and teacher. Born in Anglo-Saxon Northumbria and educated in the cathedral school at York, Alcuin became its master in 778. Moving to Aachen at Charlemagne's request in 782 to be master of the palace school, he was made abbot of Tours in 796.

An active educator, Alcuin prepared On Grammar, On Rhetoric and the Virtues, On Dialectic, and On Orthography, textbooks melding the best classical and patristic materials. He served the king as a general adviser, drafting royal letters and taking a leading role in the literary circle in which Charlemagne was known as "David," the royal poet, and Alcuin himself as "Flaccus," after the Roman poet Q. Horatius Flaccus (Horace). Alcuin's poem on the church of York survives, along with a number of other verses and an extensive correspondence.

Alcuin also pursued more narrowly theological interests, including regularization of the biblical text and preparation of biblical commentaries. He was once credited with most of the liturgical reforms of Charlemagne's reign, but this position is not now generally accepted. He played a prominent role in the Adoptionist and iconoclastic controversies, setting out the Carolingian party line at the Council of Frankfurt (794) and writing tracts against the Spanish heresy of Adoptionism (that Christ is only the adopted son of God). See also Adoptionism; iconoclasm.

Alexander II [Anselm of Lucca, not to be confused with his nephew, St. Anselm of Lucca, d. 1088], d. 1073, pope from 1061 to 1073. A member of the reforming party of Hildebrand (later Pope Gregory VII) and elected with his support, Alexander renewed and enforced decrees regarding simony and clerical celibacy and forbade lay investiture, pressing forward his agenda with legates sent out widely over Europe. Emperor Henry IV did not confirm Alexander's election but from late 1061 supported the antipope Honorius II (d. 1072). Alexander approved the conquest of England by William I (1066) and encouraged latinization of Greek sees in Italy and the reconquest of Muslim dominions; but he intervened on behalf of the Jews in France and Spain, insisting that they not be mistreated, explicitly invoking the precedent of Pope Gregory the Great (d. 604). See also celibacy, clerical; investiture controversy; Jews, Catholicism and; latinization; simony.

Alexander III [Orlando Bandinelli], ca. 1105–81, scholar, diplomat, and canon lawyer, and pope from 1159 to 1181. Before his election, he taught at the University of Bologna and wrote a famous commentary on the Decretum of Gratian as well as a scholastic treatise, the Sententiae Rolandi Bonoienses Magistri, one of the principal witnesses to the theological school of Abelard (d. 1142). Under Pope Hadrian IV (d. 1159) he served as chancellor (1153) and on numerous occasions as his legate. Although elected by a majority, from 1160 Emperor Frederick Barbarossa supported a succession of three antipopes (Victor IV, Paschal III, and Callistus III), remaining in schism until 1177. From 1162 to 1165 Alexander lived in France, and from 1167 (when Frederick occupied Rome) to 1177, in Benevento. For Alexander's support of the Lombard communes against Frederick, the new city Alessandria was named after him. He is also remembered for having imposed penance (1172) on Henry II for the murder of Thomas Becket. In 1179 he presided over the Third Lateran Council. See also Decretum Gratianum; Lateran councils.

Alexander V [Peter of Candia], ca. 1339–1410, antipope from 1409 to 1410. Born in Crete, he joined the Franciscans and became Master of Theology at the University of Paris (1381). Later, he was named archbishop of Milan (1402) and cardinal and papal legate of Lombardy (1403). Originally obedient to Rome during the Great Schism, Peter opposed Gregory XII's refusal to convene a reform council and helped assemble the Council of Pisa (1409), for which he gave the keynote address. In 1409 the twenty-two cardinals at the council attempted to resolve the schism by deposing the two rival claimants and electing Peter as pope (June 26, 1409). As Alexander V, he sought to weaken his two rivals and end the schism by shrewd distribution of benefits. To strengthen papal authority, Alexander dissolved the council after promising to work for reform. He died ten months later without achieving either unity or reform.

The validity of Alexander's election has not been recognized by the Catholic Church because the Council of Pisa was not convened by a pope. See also Great Schism; Pisa, Council of.

Alexander VI [Rodrigo Borgia], 1431–1503, pope from 1492 to 1503. Born in Valencia, Spain, he was one of the Renaissance popes notorious for lavishness and personal immorality. Despite a private life that produced four children, including Lucrezia Borgia and Macchiavelli's idol Cesare Borgia, Rodrigo was elected pope, reportedly through bribery. He was notable for aggrandizing his family's power through Cesare's military skill and Lucrezia's marriages. As pope he was first allied with Isabella and Ferdinand of Spain and the kingdom of Naples. After Charles VIII of France invaded Italy (1494), Alexander's policies and troops helped drive them out (1495). After 1497 he drew closer to French king Louis XII. With Louis's help, Alexander and Cesare successfully unified the four Papal States under Cesare's control. Alexander's death ended Cesare's rule.

Alexander's open immorality and lavish patronage of the Roman Renaissance sparked a struggle with the Florentine reformer Savonarola, ending in Savonarola's excommunication and execution by fire. Despite his lax morals and unabashed exploitation of the papacy to the advantage of the Borgia family, Alexander VI cannot be completely condemned. He was a generous patron of Renaissance art and architecture, commissioning Michelangelo's Pietà, the restoration of Castel Sant'Angelo, and the refurbishing of the papal apartments. Finally, he promoted the evangelization of the New World and his papal line of demarcation (1493) helped ensure peace between Castile and Portugal in their new colonies in Asia and America. See also Renaissance.

Pope Alexander VI, the most notorious of the "bad popes"; fifteenth-century mural in the Borgia apartment, Vatican.

Alexander VII [Fabio Chigi], 1599–1667, pope from 1655 to 1667. Born in Siena, Fabio was a brilliant student, receiving a doctorate in theology in 1626 and embarking on a diplomatic career in the papal service. Upon becoming bishop of Nardo, he was also ordained a priest. Pope Urban VIII named him papal nuncio to Cologne, and he represented the papacy at the negotiations of the Peace of Westphalia ending the Thirty Years' War (1618–48). Pope Innocent X named him secretary of state in 1651 and made him a cardinal in 1652. In 1655 he succeeded Innocent as Alexander VII. As pope, he patronized scholarship and the arts, commissioning the Bernini Colonnade at St. Peter's, but his papacy was marred by conflict with Louis XIV of France, who seized Avignon and forced Alexander into the Peace of Pisa in 1664. The most significant events of Alexander's reign concerned the Jansenists. As secretary of state he had encouraged Innocent X to condemn the five propositions of Jansenism as found in Cornelius Jansen's Augustinus. These propositions held that human beings cannot fulfill God's commandments without a special grace, and that the operation of grace is irresistible. The brilliant Jansenist Antoine Arnauld, while agreeing that the propositions were heretical, convinced Innocent that they were not actually found in that book. As pope, Alexander went ahead and condemned the Augustinus in 1665. See also Jansenism.

Alexander of Alexandria, St., d. 328, bishop of Alexandria from 312 to 328. After some toleration, he led a local synod (319) to depose Arius, one of his presbyters (priests), for denying the true divinity of Christ. At the Council of Nicaea (325), Alexander, with his deacon Athanasius, decisively opposed the teachings of Arius. Feast day: February 26 (Western); May 29 (Greek); April 22 (Coptic). See also Arianism; Arius; Nicaea, First Council of.

Alexander of Hales, ca. 1185–1245, English Franciscan theologian, known as the "Irrefutable Doctor." Born in England, he was a regent master of theology at the University of Paris beginning in 1220. His entrance into the Franciscan order in 1236 brought the Franciscans his chair in theology. His vast literary production, much indebted to the writings of Augustine, includes numerous disputed questions and a lengthy Gloss on the Sentences of Peter Lombard. The large Summa Theologica ascribed to him is in fact a collaborative work prepared by disciples familiar with his thought. Alexander exerted tremendous influence on Franciscan scholastic theology until the time of Duns Scotus (d. 1308). Perhaps his most significant contribution came in his championing of the Sentences as a favored scholastic teaching text; he is also responsible for the division of the Lombard's chapters into "distinctions." See also Scholasticism.

Alexander of Jerusalem, St., d. ca. 251, bishop and confessor. Together with Theoctistus, bishop of Caesarea, Alexander invited Origen, still a layman, to preach, later (ca. 230) ordaining him priest. A confessor under the persecution of Septimus Severus, Alexander died in prison during the persecution of Decius, the Roman Emperor (249–51). Feast day: March 18 (Western); December 12 (Eastern). See also Origen.

Alexandria, metropolis founded ca. 332 by Alexander the Great at the mouth of the Nile, the most illustrious center of Greek culture in the Roman Empire, and third of the five ancient patriarchal sees (after Rome and Constantinople). Traditionally founded by St. Mark, the see of Alexandria gained prominence through its famous catechetical school (headed by such teachers as Origen and Didymus the Blind), and its succession of powerful bishops, from Dionysius, Peter, and Athanasius to Theophilus and Cyril. The Council of Nicaea (325) ranked the see of Alexandria as second only to Rome, although the Council of Constantinople (381) ranked it third after Constantinople. The see of Alexandria had direct jurisdiction over all of Egypt, Libya, and the Pentapolis, while the Ethiopian church, from its rise in the mid-fourth century, was also dependent on the patriarch of Alexandria.

Alexandrian influence was dominant at the Councils of Nicaea, Constantinople, and Ephesus (431). But when the Council of Chalcedon (451) deposed Cyril's Monophysite successor Dioscorus (444–51, d. 454), the great majority of Alexandrian and indeed Egyptian Christians refused to accept the council and retained their Monophysite sympathies. By 565, the end of the reign of the emperor Justinian, the Coptic church had developed a hierarchy independent of Constantinople or Rome, and it continues, as the Coptic Orthodox church, to represent the great majority of Egyptian Christians to this day. There are three other patriarchal sees of Alexandria: the Coptic Catholic (uniat), the Eastern (Greek) Orthodox, and the Melchite (Melkite) Catholic church. See also Alexandria, school of; Antioch, school of; Athanasius, St.; Chalcedon, Council of; Coptic Catholic Church; Cyril of Alexandria, St.; Egypt; Monophysitism.

DARLENE K. FLAMING

Alexandria, school of, both a theological tradition and the catechetical school (Gk., didaskaleion) with which it was associated. The earliest known Christian teachers in Alexandria were the Gnostics Basilides and Valentinus, who taught in the first part of the second century, but when more orthodox teachers appeared somewhat later—first the shadowy Pantaenus and then Clement of Alexandria (ca. 150–215)—they retained the typical Alexandrian predilection toward speculation, philosophical discourse, and allegorical exegesis. Clement defended the goodness of creation against the Gnostics, teaching that philosophy had prepared the Greeks for Christ as Mosaic law had prepared the Jews. A fragment from the historian Philip of Side (d. after 439) lists Clement, after Athenagoras and Pantaenus, as a teacher in the catechetical school at Alexandria, but it is unclear whether these early figures taught privately or in a school sponsored by the Church.

Clearly, however, Origen, the next teacher on Philip's list, was assigned by the bishop Demetrius to direct a catechetical school. Origen divided the school into two levels, reserving the higher for himself and giving the elementary level to Heraclas, a Christian philosopher who was his student. At odds with Demetrius, Origen left Alexandria permanently ca. 231. Heraclas, who concurred in Demetrius's condemnation and succeeded him as bishop, was appointed in Origen's place, but the school retained Origen's stamp for the rest of its existence. Although generally renouncing some of Origen's more adventuresome speculations (e.g., the preexistence of souls), it retained his emphasis on allegorical exegesis and on the divinity of Christ. The school and the episcopate remained closely linked, four of its directors (Heraclas, Dionysius, Achillas, and Peter) becoming bishops, but with the death of Didymus the Blind (398), who had been appointed director by Athanasius, the school began to fade from view, perhaps a victim of the anti-Origenism of Theophilus (bishop from 385 to his death in 412).

Nevertheless, the distinctive Alexandrian "Word/flesh" (Logos/sarx) Christology, evolved from the time of Athanasius but with roots as early as Clement, survived and developed into the fifth century and later. The most extreme version of this Christology was the heretical doctrine of Apollinarius of Laodicea (d. 392) who taught that the Word simply replaced the human soul in Christ, so that the Christ was without qualification "one nature," that of the Word "incarnate" ("in flesh"). In the fifth century, in the person of Cyril of Alexandria (d. 444), a modified form of this Christology came into conflict with the "two nature," "Word/man" (Logos/anthropos) scheme of the school of Antioch. Cyril succeeded in having Nestorius, patriarch of Constantinople, condemned at the Council of Ephesus (431). Cyril was himself able to compromise with John of Antioch (433), and the spirit of this compromise was upheld in the formula subsequently promulgated by the Council of Chalcedon (451), but a great majority of the Egyptian church rejected Chalcedon and drifted into schism, reaffirming its traditional Christology under the form of Monophysitism. See also Antioch, school of; Apollinarius of Laodicea; Athanasius, St.; Chalcedon, Council of; Christology; Clement of Alexandria; Cyril of Alexandria, St.; Logos; Monophysitism; Origen.

JOHN C. CAVADINI

Alexandrian rite, common if inaccurate name for the liturgical tradition of Egypt, especially the Orthodox Greek rite of the patriarchal see of Alexandria. In the fourth and fifth centuries the pure monastic offices of the desert tradition of Lower Egypt had a seminal influence on the formation of monastic common prayer in the East and the West. After the Council of Chalcedon in 451, the Alexandrian rite continued in use among the Greek-speaking Orthodox of Egypt, while related liturgical uses celebrated in Coptic by the Coptic-speaking monks and populace who rejected Chalcedon developed into the Coptic rite. The Alexandria Greek rite fell into disuse when the Orthodox patriarchate of Alexandria abandoned it in favor of the Byzantine rite around the twelfth century. See also Eastern rites; rite.

Alfred the Great, 849–899, king of Wessex (England). Youngest son of King Aethelwulf, Alfred succeeded his brother Aethelred (871) in the midst of the Danish invasions. Though heavily outnumbered, Alfred eventually forced the Danish king Guthrum to agree to a peace and be baptized (879).

Concerned about ignorance among the clergy and religious, Alfred translated into the vernacular the Pastoral Care of Gregory the Great, Augustine's Soliloquies, Boethius's Consolation of Philosophy, and the first fifty psalms. He also sponsored translations of Orosius's History Against the Pagans and Bede's Ecclesiastical History. A biography by his friend Asser, bishop of St. Asaph's, survives.

Alfrink, Bernard Jan, 1900–87, former cardinal-archbishop of Utrecht and primate of The Netherlands. Ordained in 1924, he was professor of Sacred Scripture at major seminaries (Utrecht, 1933–45; University of Nijmegen, 1945–51) until he was ordained bishop in 1951. He served as archbishop of Utrecht from 1955 to 1976. Created cardinal in 1960, he was a leading progressive at the Second Vatican Council.

alienation of property, the canonical term for the transfer of ownership of Church property by sale, gift, or exchange, of temporal goods, tangible or intangible. Canon law requires approval by various levels of authority, e.g., the diocesan bishop or the Holy See, depending upon the value of the property to be alienated (can. 1291). Without the requisite approvals, the attempted alienation is canonically null and void, often giving rise to Church-state conflicts when the canonically invalid transaction is civilly valid. In addition to the sanction of invalidity, canon law provides that those who attempt to alienate Church property without the requisite approvals are subject to canonical penalties (can. 1296). The same approvals are required for the canonical validity of transactions other than alienation that entail risk of serious harm to the economic condition of the ecclesiastical entity (e.g., parish, diocese, school), also known as a juridical person, such as mortgaging property, making unsecured loans, or accepting gifts with burdensome conditions attached. See also juridical person.

aliturgical days, days of fasting and penance, like Good Friday in the Roman rite, when the Eucharist may not be celebrated. The prohibition goes back at least to the Council of Laodicea in Asia Minor (ca. 360–90), which forbade Mass during Lent except on Saturdays and Sundays. This prohibition has remained in force for all of Lent in most Eastern rites, where the Eucharist is considered festive and incompatible with days of penance. The Byzantine rite has a Presanctified Liturgy or Communion service celebrated on Wednesdays and Fridays of Lent. Most other Eastern rites once had such a service for use at least in monasteries but later abandoned it. Some Byzantine Catholic churches have also abandoned their heritage in favor of Latin usage in this regard. See also fast days; penance.

Allatius, Leo (al-lay'shee-uhs), 1586–1669, Greek Catholic humanist and alumnus of the Greek College in Rome. An outstanding Byzantinist, he held various Vatican posts and was first Custodian of the Vatican Library, for which he collected numerous Greek and Syriac manuscripts. He published numerous, still valuable works in Latin and Italian on the Byzantine church, its liturgy, and church buildings and left innumerable unpublished writings preserved in the Vatican Library.

allegory (Gk., allos, "other"; agoreuō, "speak aloud"), an extended metaphor in which objects, persons, and actions in a narrative serve as symbols for meanings outside the narrative itself. Though the term is not used in the Septuagint, nor does the Hebrew Bible have an exact correspondence, certain texts are generally called allegories, e.g., the allegories of the trees (Judg 9:7–15) and of the vineyard (Isa 5:1–6). In Gal 4:24, Sarah and Hagar refer allegorically to the earthly and heavenly Jerusalem, and the images of Jesus in the Gospel of John (vine, branches, good shepherd) are allegorical. In subsequent interpretation the allegorical sense refers to the deeper symbolic meaning behind the literal meaning of a text (e.g., the Good Samaritan is Jesus coming to the aid of wounded humanity). Allegory develops into a literary genre where a complete theological worldview unfolds in narratives such as Dante's The Divine Comedy or Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress.

alleluia (ah'le-loo'yah; Heb., "Praise God"), expression of praise occurring in the Psalms, in the "heavenly liturgy" of Rev 19:2–6, and sung during Christian worship. Alleluias are sung at Mass before the Gospel (as the Gospel acclamation), and in the antiphons (verses sung before and after psalms and as a refrain between psalm verses) and Psalms of the Liturgy of the Hours. Alleluia is not sung during Lent. See also psalmody; Psalms, the.

All-Night Vigil (Gk., agrypnia; Slav., vsenoshchnoe bdenie), Byzantine-rite monastic vigil, of Palestinian origin, comprising Vespers and orthros (Matins, Lauds), along with the entire Psalter and all nine canticles of the canon of orthros. It is celebrated in monasteries Saturday nights and the vigils of certain feasts and, in abbreviated form, also in Russian parishes.

allocution, papal, an address or talk given by the pope to a department of the Roman Curia or to some other group of persons. Ordinarily a papal allocution does not contain material of legislative import but merely expresses the pope's thoughts or opinions on any particular topic.

All Saints, Feast of, feast celebrated in the West on November 1. Originally the word "saint" was synonymous with "martyr," i.e., someone who witnesses faith in Christ even to death. After a martyr's death, local Christians endeavored to bury the body in a tomb that would be accessible to the faithful. On the anniversary of the martyr's death, Christians would gather to pray and celebrate the Eucharist "in memory of those athletes who have gone before, and to train and make ready those who are to come hereafter" (Mart. Pol., second century). Eventually, the memorial celebration of martyrs occurred in local churches that did not have tombs. By the fifth century, there was already a feast of "all saints" in the East, on the Friday of Easter week. By the eighth century, the church of "St. Mary to the Martyrs" in Rome seems to have celebrated a similar feast. In the ninth century, Pope Gregory IV changed the date of the feast to November 1. From the beginning, those who had endured torture for the faith but had not died ("confessors") were treated with great respect. Eventually Christians who led heroic gospel-inspired lives were often acclaimed after their death as a saint by a local church. The theology and the celebration of the feast emphasize the bond between those Christians already with God and those still on earth. The feast points to our ultimate goal—to be with God. See also saints; saints, devotion to.

All Souls, Feast of, feast celebrated on November 2 since the eleventh century for deceased Christians that they "may rest in peace." At an early date, Christians had the custom of remembering their dead. Third-century Christian writers like Tertullian spoke of an intermediate place of rest where the faithful waited until the final judgment. In the same century there seems to have been some idea of deceased Christians who need purification before seeing God. From the eleventh to the thirteenth centuries, the feast spread throughout Europe until it was finally adopted in Rome. The feast involves several beliefs: that some Christians while dying in peace with Christ might still need some purification, that the prayers and good deeds of the living help those who have died, and that there is an intermediate place between heaven and hell. The Eastern Church has usually insisted upon the need for growth in seeing God as characteristic of this intermediate state while the Roman Catholic Church tended to emphasize the penal character of this state. The liturgy itself is the best guide to the meaning of this feast. The liturgical readings point to Christ as the hope of the living and the dead. The liturgical prayers see new life in Christ as God's promise that enables the Christian to face death with faith and hope. Ultimately the feast complements that of All Saints in proclaiming that all those who love God, whether living or dead, are united in a living communion with Christ and one another. See also communion of saints; eternal life.

almsgiving (Gk., eleemosyne, "pity"), a freewill gift for those in need. The giving of alms is linked to the love or charity commanded by Jesus (Luke 18:22) and to the example of the disciples in the early Church (Acts 9:36; 24:17). Paul encouraged the cheerful giving of alms in his exhortation to the Corinthians on behalf of a collection he was taking up for impoverished members of the Church (1 Cor 9). In the first three centuries, alms were brought to the Eucharist for later distribution by the deacons. By the fourth century, bishops frequently collected offerings and established charitable endowments used for building hospitals and establishing other institutions to help the poor, orphans, widows, the imprisoned, and the sick. Almsgiving is considered a corporal work of mercy by the Church and a penitential act that is especially appropriate during the Lenten season. Like prayer and fasting, almsgiving encourages believers to direct their attention to God, to recall their dependence on God's gifts, and to share in Jesus' ministry of feeding the hungry (Mark 6:34–44; 8:1–10) and healing the sick (Matt 14:34–36). Through the giving of alms, Catholics believe that they are participating in Christ's work to establish God's kingdom of justice and peace. Vatican II (1962–65) reaffirmed the Church's constant tradition of almsgiving in its call for economic solidarity among all peoples of the world (Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, nn. 83–90). See also mercy, corporal works of.

Aloysius Gonzaga, St., 1568–91, patron saint of youth. Heir to an Italian principality, Aloysius was prepared by his father for a military career. In 1581 he joined the court of Philip II of Spain, where he decided to enter the Society of Jesus, a decision his father opposed until 1585, when Aloysius renounced his inheritance to undertake the novitiate in Rome. He studied philosophy at the Roman College and took his final vows in 1587. He then studied theology, but, while nursing the sick during the plague in Rome in 1591, he contracted the disease and died after a three-month struggle. His spirituality was marked by a strong devotion to the Eucharist, interior prayer, and charitable service to others. Aloysius was canonized in 1726 and declared patron saint of youth in 1926 as a model of purity especially for young men who enter holy orders. Feast day: June 21.

Alphege of Canterbury, St., 954–1012, Benedictine monk, abbot near Bath, bishop of Winchester (984), and archbishop of Canterbury (1006). He was captured and killed by the Danes. Feast day: April 19. See also Canterbury.

Alphonsus Liguori, St. (lee-goohr'ee), 1696–1787, founder of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer (Redemptorists) in 1732 and cofounder of the Redemptoristines, a contemplative order, in 1750. He was canonized in 1839 and is the patron saint of moral theologians.

Born of an aristocratic family in Naples, Alphonsus began a career as a gifted lawyer. A crisis from a fixed court case turned him away from worldly "justice" to the Lord's service as a priest. After working among the poorest and most abandoned in Naples, Alphonsus discovered that the peasants of the countryside were even more bereft of spiritual care. Breaking from his close family ties, he founded the Redemptorists in the town of Scala to instruct the country poor in their faith, especially through the preaching of parish missions. Alphonsus expended incalculable energy preaching God's love for all, holding to the teaching that God willed the salvation of everyone and gave grace accordingly. He used his considerable musical and artistic talents to encourage a strong devotional life. He would not allow his preachers to use the flowery preaching style customary at the time, but demanded a simplicity and zeal that could move both the hearts and convince the minds of ordinary people. Although he tried to avoid episcopal office, he was made bishop of Saint Agatha of the Goths, a country diocese northeast of Naples, in 1762 by Pope Clement XIII. There Alphonsus concentrated upon educating his people, reforming his seminary, and developing a strong devotional life among clergy and laity. His care for the poor was never greater than during the winter famine of 1763, when he literally emptied the bishop's residence to feed whoever came. In his diocese alone was there no starvation.

Alphonsus Liguori, outstanding eighteenth-century theologian whose influence on Catholic moral theology continues to this day.

Alphonsus, who vowed never to waste a moment's time, was one of the great Catholic authors of the eighteenth century. He wrote over a hundred works: devotional literature, instructions for priests and religious, responses against enemies of the Church, and his Theologia Moralis. The latter work Alphonsus revised and reprinted nine times during his life. Despite his own personal struggles with scruples, Alphonsus fought a strenuous battle against the rigorist forces of Jansenism, which portrayed God as stern, demanding, and condemnatory. Jansenists made the moral law a harsh, overbearing master and, in horror at human sinfulness, decried frequent reception of the sacraments as unworthy. In contrast, Alphonsus developed his moral theology out of the best tradition of the Church but also with his compassionate experience of common people. In challenging the Jansenist rigorism, or probabiliorism, which effectively demanded a following of the law in virtually all doubtful situations, he also avoided the opposite extreme of permissiveness or laxism. Alphonsus eventually called his position "equiprobabilism," mostly to avoid accusations of a probablism that allowed the following of a moral opinion for which a sound, even if less probable, argument could be constructed. Alphonsus's balanced moral reasoning provided the basis for one prominent stream of Catholic moral theology for the next two hundred years. In 1871 he was declared a Doctor of the Church, a sign of highest praise for his faith-filled contribution to the moral instruction of the faithful. See also equiprobabilism.

MARK MILLER

altar (awl'tuhr), the central table in a church building, the locus of the sacramental presence of Christ.

The Bible: In the OT, the altar is presented as a small mound of stones upon which the flesh of sacrificed animals could be roasted (see Gen 8:20). In Exod 20:24, the commandment to offer sacrifices to God upon an altar is given at the same time the Ten Commandments are delivered. Before the Israelites entered the promised land, they were ordered to tear down the altars of the Canaanites, to destroy their cult (Exod 34:13).

The English word "altar" translates two Greek terms, bômos, the altar of non-Christian cults, and thusiasterion, the altar of God. The distinction originated in the Septuagint where the bômos of idols is contrasted to thusiasterion of Israel's God. God commanded that the altars of the cults of false gods be destroyed (Amos 7:9). Again, in Judg 6:25, Gideon is told to destroy his father's altar to Baal and to erect "an altar to the Lord ... in proper order."

A simply adorned, freestanding altar; during Mass in a church in Puerto Rico.

The altars of false gods are ordered to be struck down, as in Judg 6:25. The altar is a place for God's people to gather, as in Joel 2:17. Ps 26:6 makes the altar the location of God's forgiveness and mercy. In 1 Kgs 13:2, it is the place where God's word is preached, even when that word is a prophecy against Temple authorities.

In the NT, the attitude of Jesus to the Temple cult is unclear. According to the Gospels he never repudiated the ritual worship of his Jewish contemporaries. During the "cleansing of the Temple" (see Matt 21:12–17; Mark 11:15–19; Luke 19:45–48; John 2:14–17) Jesus affirmed the Temple as a "house of prayer," even as he condemned the unjust business practices of the Temple merchants.

Much Christian typology of the altar derives from the book of Revelation. The altar of the heavenly liturgy symbolizes the place of the sacrifice of the Lamb. When the angel offers incense upon the altar, the prayers of God's people are said to ascend (Rev 8: 3). The altar is the place where the sacrifices of the martyrs are conjoined to the sacrifice of Christ: "I saw under the altar the souls of those that who had been slaughtered for the word of God" (Rev 6:9).

Church History: In the first two centuries of the early Church, Christians gathered in "house churches" or Christian "synagogues." Archaeological evidence indicates that the altar was less a cultic "high place" (Lat., ara) than it was a simple, wooden mensa (Lat., "table"). In the house church of Dura-

Europos, an ancient city in the Syrian desert, the altar was situated upon a platform a single step above the rest of the assembly hall. Most likely it was made of wood and it served, as all altars, the functional purpose of providing a place upon which to set the gifts of bread and wine.

From the early third century, Christians erected altars over the burial places of martyrs. On these altars, they celebrated the refrigeria (Lat.), or funeral feasts. The custom led not only to the practice of sealing relics within or beneath altars, but also to the erection of whole churches over the tombs of martyrs. St. Peter's Basilica in Rome is the most famous example.

During the Reformation, the cultic significance of the altar was challenged. Some reformers encouraged the destruction of stone altars, replacing them with wooden "communion tables." Because an altar was understood to be a place of sacrifice, and because the theology of sacrifice in the Eucharist was unacceptable to the sixteenth-century reformers, the idea of stone altars in their churches was abhorrent to them. Catholic response to the Protestant antisacrificial polemic may be seen in the baroque elaboration of altar and reredos behind the altar, triumphantly exemplified in the altars of artists such as Giovanni Bernini (d. 1680).

Altars built in twentieth-century churches are far less grandiose. Environment and Art in Catholic Worship (EACW) states, "The altar, the holy table, should be the most noble, the most beautifully designed and constructed table the community can provide" (n. 71). "The holy table . . . should not be elongated, but square or slightly rectangular, an attractive, impressive, dignified, noble table, constructed with solid and beautiful materials, in pure and simple proportions" (n. 72). Nothing extrinsic to the celebration is to be placed upon the altar—no flowers, candles, crosses, decorations, papers, or cruets. It is to be freestanding, centrally located, and within the visible and audible range of every member of the worshipping community.

The altars in Catholic churches are consecrated in a solemn ceremony conducted by a bishop. They generally contain a small depository of the relics of a saint. They are anointed by the consecrating bishop with chrism, the perfumed oil ordinarily used for Confirmation. Five crosses are traced with chrism upon the table, one in each of the four corners and in the center.

Altars are accorded the honors due a symbol of Christ's presence. At the beginning of Mass, the altar is greeted with a kiss. It may be honored with incense at several times during the Mass. The ordinary reverence for the altar, when the sacrament is not present upon it, is a deep bow. See also Eucharist; priesthood; sacrifice. JEFFREY T. VANDERWILT altar bread, the bread used at the altar for the celebration of the Eucharist. It must be unleavened, made of wheat flour and water, with no additives. It must also have the appearance of real food and be large enough to be broken and distributed to at least some of the communicants present at the Mass. For validity, the bread must be made substantially of wheat flour without notable additives such as honey, eggs, or milk, which would alter its character as bread. In many churches, especially with large congregations, a small flat wafer, called a "host," is the common form of altar bread. In the Eastern churches leavened bread is used. See also host.

altar cloth, a piece of linen that covers an altar completely. The use of altar cloths in Christian liturgy dates to the fourth century. By the eighth century, as many as four cloths were used to protect the altar in case of spillage. The cloth on top came to be known as the corporal, since it held the Body (Corpus) of Christ. In the beginning the altar was simply the wooden table used for the eucharistic meal. Not until the fourth century was it constructed of stone and rendered immovable. In some instances it was free-standing in the middle of the sanctuary, but when the altar was situated against the wall, the cloth that had originally covered the whole altar became the antependium or frontal, since only the altar front could then be covered. After Vatican II (1962–65), when altars again became free-standing, altar cloths returned to their original function of covering the whole table. See also altar.

altar society, a parish group of women who helped care and provide for the altar and the sanctuary area around it. In some parishes the group was also called the "rosary and altar society," or the "tabernacle society." The group assumed responsibility for preparing the sanctuary for Mass and special services. Each society usually elected its own leaders, with one of the parish's priests serving as chaplain.

The altar society decorated and cared for objects and articles used for Mass. Some of their tasks included: dusting and cleaning the area around the altar; polishing the candlesticks; cleaning the linen used for the altar; caring for the priest's vestments; buying flowers; and arranging decorations. The society sometimes organized a festival and other social events to help raise money for the church. Since the Second Vatican Council other parish associations, worship committees, and sacristans have replaced altar societies in most parishes. See also altar; sanctuary.

altar stone. 1 The fixed, immovable table of the altar, which is made of one piece of solid stone. 2 The movable altar, which is a solid slab of stone about eight by ten inches long, inserted into the altar table. The altar stone, in both instances, contains the relics of saints, a custom dating to the early Church when the liturgy was celebrated on the tombs of the martyrs. For a time after Vatican II (1962–65), the use of the altar stone was considered optional, but the revised Code of Canon Law indicates that this custom must be revered (can. 1237.2). See also altar.

altar wine, the wine used at the altar for the celebration of the Eucharist. It must be made from the fruit of the vine, namely, from grapes. It is not permitted to use wine not made from grapes, wine that has become so sour that it has become vinegar, or wine that is diluted with 50 percent or more of water. According to Church law, the use of such wines would render the sacrament invalid, i.e., the wine could not be changed into the Blood of Christ.

A small amount of water is mixed with the wine by the deacon or priest at Mass. Originally this was done to dilute the wine, but Christian tradition assigned it various symbolic meanings; among them are the union of Christ with his people, and the union of the divine and the human in Christ.

Alumbrados (ah-luhm-brah'dohs), Spanish term from the Latin Illuminati for a group of individuals in sixteenth-century Spain claiming direct divine illumination and valuing inward prayer alone. Thinking the sacraments, the saints, and perhaps even Christ superfluous, some experienced mystical trances after which they claimed complete freedom from sin; this was sometimes interpreted as a license for immoral behavior. Followers of Erasmus and even Ignatius of Loyola were arrested by the Inquisition as suspected Alumbrados.

Amalarius of Metz, ca. 775–ca. 850, archbishop and liturgist. Having studied in one of Alcuin's schools (at Aachen or at Tours), Amalarius was archbishop of Trier and then ambassador to Constantinople (813–14). In 835, Louis the Pious appointed him to administer the archdiocese of Lyons in place of the exiled Bishop Agobard. In 838, the Synod of Quiercy, led by the deacon Florus of Lyons and urged on by letters from Agobard, condemned Amalarius's liturgical innovations as well as his claim that the Canon of the Mass includes two sacrifices in sequence, one for the dead and one for all sinners. After the Council of Aachen in 817, Amalarius apparently helped compile collections of rules for canons (diocesan priests attached to a cathedral church) and nuns. His great work is the Liber Officialis (first edition ca. 823), which helped to popularize the allegorical interpretation of Christian worship by granting each detail of vesture and action a mystical significance. See also liturgy, theology of.

Amand, St., ca. 584–ca. 679, monk, missionary, known as "the Apostle of Belgium." Born in France, he became a monk in 604, lived as a hermit, and was consecrated a missionary bishop (with no diocese) in 629. He founded numerous monasteries in Belgium and spent his last years as an abbot. Feast day: February 6.

ambo (Gk., ambon, "pulpit"), Byzantine-rite term for the pulpit and, after the pulpit fell into disuse, for the semicircle on the sanctuary platform jutting out into the nave before the central doors of the iconostasis (altar screen), where the litanies and Gospel are proclaimed. The ambo was originally a huge pulpit in the center of the nave; it and the bema (sanctuary) were the two focal points of the liturgy, and processions back and forth between the two were a standard part of the ritual. The eucharistic liturgy opened and closed at the ambo; litanies, diptychs, and the Scriptures were proclaimed there; and special rites such as imperial coronation, the exaltation of the cross, and the promulgation of councils and their anathemas took place there. Preaching, however, was usually done from the throne in the apse. See also lectern; pulpit.

Ambrose of Milan, St., ca. 339–97, bishop of Milan and Doctor of the Church. Elected bishop when Milan was the seat of the Roman government and he was a still-unbaptized rising government official, Ambrose dedicated himself to scriptural study, theological advocacy, pastoral guidance, and diplomacy, all of which formed his legacy.

Ambrose devoted to his ministry resources from an aristocratic background. Classically educated at a time when knowledge of Greek was declining in the Western Church, he channeled much Eastern Christian theology and especially exegesis into the Latin tradition. His allegorical readings of Scripture, the OT in particular, combined with his rhetorical skill made him a compelling preacher in his time. In his Confessions, Augustine writes that Ambrose's sermons contributed to his decision to be baptized. Ambrose's ethical teaching, notably On the Duties of the Clergy, both continued classical themes and supported the growing ascetical movement, while his contributions to Latin hymnody were substantial in themselves.

In relations with Roman civil authority Ambrose was unyielding. In 386 he physically occupied the Milan basilica to protest and effectively end its government-countenanced use in Arian worship. His opposition helped uphold the exclusion of the pagan Altar of Victory from its traditional place of honor in the Roman senate. In two encounters with Theodosius, Ambrose enforced his position that the emperor was not "above" the Church but "within" it and thus subject to its discipline. As bishop, he deterred the emperor from rebuilding a synagogue destroyed by a Christian mob and subjected him to penance for punishing an unrelated riot with a massacre. Ambrose's authority made his legacy powerful in medieval relations between Church and state. Feast day: December 7. KATHRYN L. JOHNSON

Ambrosiana, a famous library in Milan founded in 1609 by Cardinal Federico Borromeo, cousin of Charles Borromeo. Named after Ambrose, patron saint of Milan, the Ambrosiana contains over ten thousand manuscripts from the fourth to the sixteenth century, written in Latin, Greek, Arabic, and Hebrew as well as in European vernacular languages. Microfilms of its holdings are now housed at the University of Notre Dame.

Ambrosian chant. See chant, Ambrosian.

Ambrosian rite, the liturgical forms associated with the Italian city of Milan. The rite is attributed to Milan's patron bishop, Ambrose (ca. 340–97), but it predates him in development and origin. The Ambrosian rite is similar in most respects to its "sister," the Roman rite. Three significant variations are noted. Baptism is performed by immersion and has included a rite of footwashing. The litany, or Prayer of the Faithful, is chanted by the deacon. The procession of the gifts, the Offertory, precedes the creed and does not follow it as in the Roman rite. The Ambrosian rite has been reformed in recent decades according to the mandate of Vatican II (1962–65).

Ambrosiaster, anonymous fourth-century scriptural commentator. Erasmus (d. 1536) coined the name "Ambrosiaster" when he argued that a commentary on the Letters of St. Paul long attributed to Ambrose must be by another author. A collection of questions on the OT and the NT ascribed to Augustine is also Ambrosiaster's. See also Scripture, interpretation of.

ambry. See aumbry.

ambulatory (Lat., ambulare, "to walk"), covered walkway around the periphery of the apse of a church. The ambulatory permitted access to chapels radiating out from the walkway for Mass or to visit reliquaries housed in the chapel. The twelfth-century ambulatory of St.-Denis (Paris) marks the beginning of the Gothic style of architecture.

amen (ah'men or ay'men; Heb., "firm," "established with certainty"), word said as the formal conclusion to liturgical prayer. Uttering the word constitutes the acceptance of a claim. In the NT, "amen" is frequently attributed to Jesus and is translated, "truly" or "verily," as in the idiom, "Truly, truly, I say to you. . . ." According to Justin Martyr (d. ca. 165), "amen" concludes the prayers of Christians, preeminently the Eucharistic Prayer. Justin gave the word its popular meaning, "so be it" (Gk., genoito). Amen is the chief means by which members of the congregation join themselves to the prayer and praise of the Church.

America, a weekly journal published by the Jesuits of the United States and Canada. Founded in 1909 by the Jesuits of the United States, this periodical reviews literature, education, science, the arts, secular news, and ecclesiastical developments. The journal has been jointly published with the Jesuits of Canada since 1957.

American Board of Catholic Missions, fund-raising organization for the support of the missions. Founded in 1919 and reorganized in 1924, the board, under the supervision of the hierarchy, raises and administers funds for American missions. The board now uses 40 percent of the money collected each year on Mission Sunday for mission work with underprivileged groups; the remainder is allocated for general missionary purposes. See also missions.

American Catholic Historical Association, society to promote the study of Catholic history. Founded in Cleveland, Ohio, in 1919 by Peter Guilday, professor of Church history at The Catholic University of America, with the collaboration of the rector, Bishop Thomas J. Shahan, the association promotes historical scholarship of the Catholic Church. Affiliated with the American Historical Association, it publishes the Catholic Historical Review, originally established by Guilday in 1915. From an original membership of Catholics who were historians, it now includes all those whose interest is Catholic history; two non-Catholics, including one woman, have served as presidents. In 1992, its membership exceeded one thousand.

American Catholic spirituality. See spirituality, American Catholic.

Americanism, an ill-defined movement, associated with efforts to adapt Catholicism to American culture, condemned by Testem Benevolentiae in 1899.

Background: In the 1890s, a series of issues divided the American Catholic Church. First, under the leadership of Archbishop John Ireland of St. Paul, Cardinal James Gibbons of Baltimore, Bishop John J. Keane, first rector of The Catholic University of America, and Monsignor Denis J. O'Connell, rector of the American College in Rome, a group of American prelates sought to accommodate Catholicism to American culture and to Americanize immigrant Catholics. In 1890, Ireland praised the state's right to educate and, in 1891, arranged to lease his parochial schools to the public school board. He also supported the prohibition of the use of German as the language of instruction in German-American parochial schools. German-American Catholics and Archbishop Michael A. Corrigan of New York represented Ireland's plan as surrendering to the state the Church's right to educate. In addition, James Gibbons defended the Knights of Labor, an early labor union, and Ireland was later instrumental in having Edward McGlynn, a priest of New York excommunicated for disobedience and social activism, reconciled to the Church through Archbishop Francesco Satolli. To win Vatican approval of his program, however, Ireland had to agree to accept Satolli as the first permanent apostolic delegate to the American hierarchy in 1893.

A second factor was the support the Americanizing party gave to the separation of Church and state. When Gibbons, as a newly created cardinal, took possession of his titular parish in Rome in 1887, he had praised the American system, which not only guaranteed the Church its freedom, but also provided an opportunity to cooperate with Protestant denominations. In 1893, he, Ireland, and Keane all participated in the World's Parliament of Religions, an early ecumenical meeting in Chicago. Their opponents and the Vatican thought that such gatherings implied religious indifference. Moreover, Pope Leo XIII issued his apostolic letter Longingua Oceani, rejecting the American separation of Church and state as an ideal for other nations. The pope then demanded the resignations of O'Connell from the American College in 1895 and of Keane from The Catholic University of America in 1896.

European Controversy over Americanism: The tension in the United States crossed the Atlantic through the controversy over the thought of Isaac Hecker, founder of the Paulists. Untrained in Thomistic theology, then prevalent in the Church, Hecker frequently used nontechnical language in his writings, especially when speaking of the indwelling of the Holy Spirit. His biography by Walter Elliott, C.S.P., caused little comment in the United States when it was published in 1891. But when it was translated into French in 1897, with an introduction by Félix Klein of the Institut Catholique of Paris, Hecker became the model for the priest of the future, more at home in the marketplace than in the cloister, optimistic that Americans would be converted if only Catholic teaching were presented in a positive light emphasizing "active" over "passive" virtues and even praising "natural" virtues.

The controversy now formally became known as Americanism. Ireland's speeches in favor of the separation of Church and state and of republican government had already been translated in France, where Catholics were then trying, unsuccessfully, to carry out the papal call to rally to the Third Republic. In Italy, translations of his speeches were accommodated to a constitutional monarchy by omitting his references to republican government. The U.S. separation of Church and state, moreover, was transformed into the basis for ending the Roman Question, the dispute between the Holy See and the Italian government over the territorial claims of the Holy See following the loss of the Papal States.

As Europeans debated over Hecker and Americanism, O'Connell delivered a speech at the Fourth International Catholic Scientific Congress at Fribourg, Switzerland, in August 1897. In his "New Idea in the Life of Father Hecker," he distinguished between "political" and "ecclesiastical" Americanism. The first, he argued, flowed from "the order of ideas" in the Declaration of Independence, culminating in the words: "all men are created equal and are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights." He noted that this idea was derived from British and American common law, which acknowledged the rights of subjects even prior to the forming of a government. To this he contrasted Roman public law, which envisioned subjects as recipients of rights from the state. Common law, he argued, so closely approximated the dignity conferred on the Christian in Baptism that the Church could well adopt it as its own.

O'Connell's treatment of "ecclesiastical Americanism" touched on the more delicate topic of relations between Church and state. Although American Catholics had consistently supported the American separation of Church and state, in 1864 Pius IX's "Syllabus of Errors" condemned the proposition that the Church should be separated from the state and the state from the Church. At that time, Bishop Félix Dupanloup of Orléans, France, popularized the distinction that what the pope was condemning was an absolute, a "thesis," to which there could be no exception, but the pope was not making the contrary, the union of Church and state, the Catholic thesis. Rather, the thesis was the harmony that should exist between Church and state and the "hypothesis" was the application of that harmony in the real order. Archbishop Martin J. Spalding of Baltimore used this distinction in a pastoral letter widely distributed in the United States and among Roman officials. Gibbons reflected this distinction in his 1887 address. By 1897, however, a different theological interpretation was dominant. The condemned thesis remained the same as it did for Dupanloup, but now the Catholic thesis became the union of Church and state. The "hypothesis" was whatever could be tolerated while working toward the full implementation of the thesis.

For O'Connell, ecclesiastical Americanism resulted from Hecker's recognition that the First Amendment prevented any church from being established and recognized the Church's freedom. But his interpretation of the "thesis" led him into controversy. While accepting the thesis "of the legal union of Church and state," he declared that in practice it had diminished the Church's freedom. Inconsistently, he then argued that the American hypothesis worked as well for the Church as any other system.

O'Connell's address became a principal interpretation of authentic Americanism, but it joined Ireland's speeches and the biography of Hecker as the targets of increasing attacks. In the spring of 1898, Father Charles Maignen wrote a series of articles in La Vérité challenging the orthodoxy of the Americanists. He claimed that Ireland would soon be deposed and Gibbons given a coadjutor. Keane, he said, had been forced to resign from The Catholic University for heresy, and O'Connell denied the teaching of the Syllabus. As European Catholics debated Americanism, moreover, the United States declared war on Spain. The shift from a war of ideas to a shooting war shaped the final stages of the reaction against Americanism.

Vatican Investigation and Testem Benevolentiae: Maignen published his articles as a book entitled Le Père Hecker: c'est-il un saint? After Cardinal François-Marie Richard of Paris, under the influence of the Sulpicians, denied the book an imprimatur (Lat., "it may be printed"), official ecclesiastical approval for the publication of a book, Maignen obtained one from Father Alberto Lepidi, the Master of the Sacred Palace, who thus appeared to lend the aura of papal approval to Maignen's attacks. Gibbons, Ireland, and Keane wrote protests to Rome, while O'Connell fought the battle personally. On several occasions, he met Lepidi and explained in writing what he meant by Americanism but then found these personal letters published by Maignen in La Vérité.

During the summer of 1898, the Vatican examined several different questions. Leo XIII appointed commissions to investigate Americanism, the orthodoxy of Marie-Joseph Lagrange, and his Révue biblique, and the theories of evolution of Father John Zahm, of the University of Notre Dame. Each of these questions challenged traditional Catholic interpretations of doctrine and were seen by some European observers as closely interrelated. On January 22, 1899, Leo issued his apostolic letter Testem Benevolentiae. He stated that the controversy arose over the translation of the life of Hecker into a "foreign language," but he addressed the letter to Gibbons in Baltimore. Making no mention of Church-state relations, he condemned those who denigrated religious vows or "watered down" doctrine to gain converts. He challenged Hecker's use of the term "active" and "passive" virtues on the grounds that Thomas Aquinas made all virtues active. He commended Hecker's emphasis on the indwelling of the Holy Spirit and quoted the declaration of the Second Council of Orange (529) that the Spirit's illumination was essential for one to consent to the saving gospel. If the pope implied that he thought the Americanists might be semi-Pelagians condemned at Orange, he removed all doubt when he challenged those who praised "natural virtues," which implied that "nature . . . with grace added to it, [was] weaker than when left to its own strength."

The papal letter was a caricature of American thought. In France, Klein termed Americanism a "phantom heresy." The U.S. reaction followed the earlier divisions in the hierarchy. Gibbons, Ireland, and their supporters denied that heresy ever existed. Those archbishops who had been neutral simply acknowledged receiving the letter. But archbishops Frederick Katzer of Milwaukee and Corrigan of New York thanked the pope for thwarting the heresy by exercising his infallible magisterium. In Italy, the bishops of the provinces of Turin and Vercelli, where support was strong for the monarchy, likewise thanked the pope for his "infallible" pronouncement (it was not, in fact, infallible according to the criteria set down by Vatican Council I in 1870).

In the United States, the condemnation of Americanism had two major effects. First, American Catholic support of the First Amendment fell under suspicion until the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). Second, American Catholic intellectual life, only in its infancy, was stifled for more than a generation, especially when Modernism, which bore some similarities, was condemned by Pope Pius X in 1907. See also Church and state; Gibbons, James; Hecker, Isaac Thomas; Ireland, John; Keane, John Joseph; Knights of Labor; O'Connell, Denis Joseph; Spalding, Martin John; Testem Benevolentiae; United States of America, Catholicism in the.

Bibliography

Fogarty, Gerald P. The Vatican and the American Hierarchy from 1870 to 1965. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press/Michael Glazier, 1985.

McAvoy, Thomas T. Great Crisis in American Catholic History, 1895–1900. Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1957. GERALD P. FOGARTY amice (a'miss; Lat., amictus, "cloak"), a rectangular piece of linen worn by a priest or deacon around the neck and shoulders to protect the outer liturgical vestments from soil. During the Middle Ages, the amice, which was worn over the alb or linen tunic, partially covered the head until the stole and chasuble (outer vestment) were in place. The use of the amice is only optional when the alb completely covers the minister's street clothing. See also vestments.

Amice

ampulla (ahm'p*oo*-lah, Lat., "vase"), small jar for liquids. Used in the ancient Church to carry oil from lamps that burned near the tombs of martyrs. Today the term applies to the container of oil used for liturgical and sacramental anointings, e.g., at Baptism and Confirmation. See also chrism; oil; oil of catechumens; oil of the sick.

Anabaptism (Gk., "rebaptism"), a name referring to the conviction that those Christians who were baptized as infants need to be baptized again as adults, since it is only as adults that they can make a true commitment to Jesus Christ. This belief in adult Baptism gained its strongest expressions in the Radical Reformation of the sixteenth century, under the leadership of such figures as Conrad Grebel (1498–1526), Menno Simons (1496–1561), Thomas Munzer (1490–1525), Caspar Schwenckfeld (1489–1561) and Michael Servetus (1511–53). Their respective groups agreed on the following: the baptism of adults as a repentance of sin and a confession of faith in Christ; a necessary joining of faith and good works for salvation; the strict adherence to the specific teachings of the NT as theological and ethical rules for living (e.g., "turn the other cheek"); a refusal of military service owing to the rejection of territorial Christianity and allegiance to a state or government; a refusal to own private property and to charge interest on loans.

Anabaptism flourishes in the 1990s among the Mennonites, the Amish, the Hutterites, the Quakers, and some Baptist denominations. Because of its stress on adult confession of faith, Anabaptism has had a strong influence on shaping the notion that the Church is a voluntary association of deeply committed Christians. See also Baptism; Reformation, the; sectarianism.

Anacletus, St., also known as Cletus, d. ca. 91, traditionally regarded as the third Bishop of Rome, from ca. 79 to 91. He is credited with dividing Rome into twenty-five parishes. Feast day (until 1969): April 26.

analogy, a comparison in the form "A is to B as C is to D," e.g., "God is to the world as the artist is to her work."

All theological language is analogous since we can compare God only to the created things we know; we cannot speak of God except in human terms. The Fourth Lateran Council (1215) declared that "No similarity can be found so great but that the dissimilarity is even greater" (DS 806). Thus every similarity between God and creatures (God is wise; humans are wise) is understood to include a greater dissimilarity (God's wisdom is unlike human wisdom in that it infinitely surpasses it). Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) is particularly well known for developing the role of analogy in theological discourse. See also language, religious.

anamnesis (ah-nam'nee-sis; Gk., "memorial"), liturgical term applied in the Latin rite to the prayer following the consecration of the Eucharist. At one time this prayer in the Latin rite was referred to as the post pridie (Lat., "after the day before") or the post secreta (Lat., "after the secret") prayer. The anamnesis, in which the Church recalls Jesus' death, Resurrection, and Ascension, is a memorial of the whole Paschal Mystery, that redemptive act of Christ which is at the heart of every eucharistic liturgy. The function of the anamnesis is twofold: it recalls something which was done in the past, while at the same time it renders that memorialized action present in the eucharistic celebration. In the Jewish tradition, remembering is always linked with some kind of action. Anamnesis has this sense: it is not only remembering something past, but representing that past action before God so that it becomes present. Thus, the anamnesis serves to bring out a basic aspect of the liturgy: through the Eucharist, the worshiping community both recalls Christ's death and Resurrection and makes Christ's sacrifice sacramentally present on earth. See also Eucharistic Prayer.

Ananias, St. (an-uh-n̲i̲'uhs), a member of the earliest Christian community at Damascus. According to Acts 9:10–18 and 22:12, Ananias, prompted by a divine message, visited Paul after his blinding vision on the Damascus road, restored Paul's sight, and baptized him. Feast day: January 25.

anaphora (a-nah'for-uh; Gk., "offering"), the Canon of the Mass or the Eucharistic Prayer, a term more commonly used in reference to Eastern rites. The anaphora is the principal prayer of the eucharistic liturgy; it extends from the opening dialogue between priest and people to the final doxology and amen. In the anaphora, the Church recalls the whole saving act of Christ by recalling the Last Supper and Christ's sacrificial death; it calls down the Holy Spirit; and it consecrates the bread and wine as the body and blood of Christ. The Church does all this in a spirit of praise and thanksgiving to God. In the West, the revised Roman Missal of Pope Paul VI uses the term prex eucharistica (Lat.), eucharistic prayer; the anaphora in Eastern liturgies is sometimes used more broadly to include additional elements before or after the Eucharistic Prayer. See also eucharistic prayer.

Anastasia, St., ca. 304, martyr commemorated in the Eucharistic Prayer of the Mass. In the late fifth century her relics were transferred to, and venerated in, Constantinople's church of the Anastasis (Gk., "resurrection"), and for many centuries thereafter the pope celebrated Mass in her Roman church each Christmas (her feast day until 1969). Feast day (in the East): December 22.

Anastasius I, St., d. 401, pope from 399 to 401 and friend of Paulinus of Nola and Jerome. Anastasius pronounced against Origen's teaching in three letters, although the precise value of the condemnation, which seems based on relatively slight acquaintance with Origen's writings, is uncertain. He also wrote against Donatism, which insisted on the rebaptism of those who left the Church and later returned, to the Council of Carthage (401). Feast day: April 27. See also Donatism; Origen.

Anastasius Bibliothecarius (bib-lee-oh-tehkahr'ee-uhs), also called Anastasius the Librarian, ca. 815–79, official in the Roman church. Created cardinal ca. 847, Anastasius had been deposed by 854. Briefly antipope during 855, he later became an abbot and papal librarian. He opposed Photius of Constantinople and assisted Western delegates at the Eighth Ecumenical Council, Constantinople IV (869–70). Noted for his knowledge of Greek, he translated the Acts of this, as well as of the Seventh Ecumenical Council, into Latin. See also Constantinople, councils of.

Anastasius of Hungary, St., d. ca. 1040, Bohemian who became the first abbot of St. Martin's in Pannonhalma, Hungary, and later under King Stephen of Hungary the first archbishop of Hungary. Feast day: November 12 (or August 14). See also Hungary, Catholicism in.

anathema (Gk. "accursed," "separated from the fold"), a formula for excommunication. It carries a much stronger connotation than exclusion from eucharistic communion, extending to exclusion from the ecclesial community itself. "Anathema" as used in conciliar canons means that a teaching is condemned as heretical and that its contradictory is defined as revealed truth.

Etymologically, the term originally meant "votive offering," but came to refer to a cursed offering to the anger of God rather than a holy offering to the divinity. The term occurs in the OT with its original positive meaning in Judith 16:19. In Deut 7:26 the term means "set apart for destruction." The Israelites themselves are declared anathema ("devoted to destruction") when they fall into idolatry in Deut 13:17.

Anathema occurs six times in the NT: in Luke 21:5 it carries the original sense of offering in the Temple; in 1 Cor 12:3; 16:22; Gal 1:8–9, and Rom 9:3 it refers to a curse; Acts 23:14 refers to a solemn oath sworn under pain of anathema.

The formula as it appears in Gal 1:8–9 is used by church councils beginning in the fourth century. In this context the word occurs for the first time in the canons of the Council of Elvira (ca. 300), although it is not certain whether it carried the meaning of separation from the ecclesial community. Up until the sixth century, the term referred to a solemn excommunication. In the following centuries metropolitan bishops used it against obstinate sinners and hardened criminals. When minor excommunication was suppressed in 1869, the word "anathema" became equivalent to excommunication.

An anchor-cross with fish, an early symbol for Christ; stone carving in the Roman catacomb of St. Priscilla.

According to the 1917 Code of Canon Law anathema refers to solemn excommunication by which a person is excluded from the community of the faithful, especially if it is assessed with the formulas and the ceremonies contained in the Roman Pontifical (can. 2257). Excommunication, the most severe of penalties, does not affect membership in the Church through the theological virtues and sanctifying grace. Moreover, membership in the Church that results from the indelible character of Baptism is not superseded by the penalty of excommunication. It does cut a person off from external union with the Church, from the external use of sacred things, and also from participation in the spiritual benefits obtained from divine worship. The reference to anathema does not occur in the 1983 Code of Canon Law. See also excommunication. SUSAN K. WOOD anchor-cross, Christian symbol. Frequently found inscribed in marble in catacomb art, the anchor was a symbol of hope (see Heb 6:19–20) in early Christian iconography. Some anchors have shanks that look like crosses; this may have been another meaning attached to the anchor. See also cross.

anchorite, anchoress, a person dedicated to a life of strict solitude and penance. Because they are not allowed to leave their dwellings, anchorites often have their cells attached to the church sanctuary so they may receive the Eucharist through a window; their meals are passed through a different window. In addition to a life of prescribed prayer and fasting, these solitaries study, write books, sew clothing for the poor, and offer spiritual advice to visitors through a veiled window. Prophetic witness and compassion characterize this canonical form of consecrated life. See also monasticism.

Ancyra (ahn-si'ruh), Ankara, city in present-day Turkey. Ancyra was the site of two fourth-century church councils. In 314 a council of bishops met there to discuss the problems of reconciling Christians who had lapsed from their faith during persecution. In 358 a council of anti-Nicene semi-Arians met to condemn extreme Arian views as well as the definitions of the ecumenical Council of Nicaea (325). See also Arianism; Nicaea, First Council of; semi-Arianism.

André Bessette, St., 1845–1937, Canadian Holy Cross laybrother noted for his devotion to St. Joseph. He inspired the building of the Oratory of St. Joseph on Mount Royal in Montreal. Feast day: January 6.

Andrew, St., one of Jesus' first disciples, whose Greek name means "manly." He and his brother, Simon Peter, came from Bethsaida, on the northeast shore of the Sea of Galilee (John 1:44), but they lived at nearby Capernaum (Mark 1:29), where they worked as fishermen (Mark 1:16). As a disciple of John the Baptist, Andrew learned of Jesus, to whom he brought Peter (John 1:40). Andrew is prominent in all lists of the twelve apostles (Matt 10:2; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:14; Acts 1:13).

Andrew appears in several episodes of the NT. Before the feeding miracle, he notes the boy with the loaves and fish (John 6:8). With Philip, the only other apostle with a Greek name, he brings to Jesus the request of the Greeks who seek him (John 12:22). With Peter, James, and John, he asks Jesus about Jerusalem's fate (Mark 13:3).

Second-century apocryphal acts tell of missionary adventures. The Acts of Andrew and Matthias recounts Andrew's rescue of Matthias from cannibals. The Acts of Andrew, surviving in a Latin translation by Gregory of Tours (538–94) and in Greek fragments, reports miracles performed in Greece and Asia Minor. The account of Andrew's crucifixion at Patras, Greece, on an X-shaped cross also circulated independently.

Later legend reports that Regulus translated Andrew's bones to St. Andrews, Scotland. Andrew's head, brought to Rome from Amalfi by Crusaders in 1461, was returned to Constantinople by Pope Paul VI.

Andrew is the patron saint of fishermen, Scotland, Greece, and Russia. Feast day: November 30. See also apostle; Twelve, the. HAROLD W. ATTRIDGE

Andrew Dung-Lac, St., priest and martyr, one of many Vietnamese martyrs killed between 1820 and 1862. Feast day (with others): November 24.

Andrew Kim Taegon, St., the first native Korean priest. The son of Christian converts, he was martyred in 1846 and canonized by Pope John Paul II in 1984. Feast day: September 20. See also Korea, Catholicism in.

Andrew of Crete, St., ca. 660–740, archbishop of Crete. Born in Damascus, then a monk at Jerusalem, he represented Theodore, patriarch of Constantinople, at the Council of Constantinople III (680–81), although he had at first been a Monothelite, believing that there was only one divine will in Christ. One of the greatest orators of the Byzantine church, Andrew delivered elegant homilies on such subjects as the birth and dormition of Mary, the lives of saints and martyrs, and the Gospels. He is especially remembered as a poet; his "Grand Canon" is a penitential work of 250 stanzas. Feast day: July 4 (East). See also Monothelitism.

Andrew of St. Victor, d. 1176, exegete who wrote commentaries on most books of the Hebrew Scriptures. Probably born in England, he went to Paris, where he entered the abbey of St. Victor, later serving as abbot at Wigmore on the Welsh border. He was influenced by Hugh of St. Victor's emphasis on the importance of the literal sense of Scripture as the foundation for understanding the spiritual and moral senses. Like his teacher Hugh, Andrew consulted contemporary Jews, recording their interpretations. Richard of St. Victor wrote De Emmanuele condemning Andrew's acceptance of Jewish teachings about Isa 7:14. See also Scripture, senses of; Victorines.

Andronicus, St., d. fifth century, patron saint of silversmiths. A silversmith by trade, he and his wife Athanasia entered the monastic life in Egypt after the death of their children, his wife assuming the identity of a man. After living separately for twelve years, they went on pilgrimage together to Jerusalem and upon their return joined a monastery near Alexandria. Andronicus, however, had not recognized his companion as his wife. Upon her death in the monastery a note she left behind revealed to him her true identity. Andronicus died a week later and the two were buried together. Feast day: October 9.

angel (Heb., mal'āk, Gk., angelos, "messenger"), a spiritual supernatural being who acts as a messenger of God. Contrary to artistic convention depicting them as winged, angels are represented in the Bible in the guise of human beings. They are sent to announce the birth of a child and its future destiny (Gen 16:11; 18:9–15; Judg 13:3–5; Luke 1:11–20; 2:8–14); they intercede before God and intervene in human affairs sometimes to protect (Gen 22:11; 48:16; Exod 14:19; Ps 91:11), sometimes to execute judgment (2 Sam 24:16; 2 Kgs 19:35; Ezek 9:1–2). This view of angels and their functions probably goes back to the common ancient Near Eastern representation of the heavenly court with the high god surrounded by ministers who discharge these and other functions; compare the prophet Micaiah's vision of the heavenly court in session (1 Kgs 22:19–23) and Isaiah's vision of the enthroned God of Israel surrounded by the seraphim (Isa 6:1–13). Angels are therefore also known as "sons of God," i.e., divine beings (Gen 6:1–4; Job 38:7), and "holy ones." In some instances, e.g., the angel who guides Israel through the wilderness (Exod 23:20–23; 33:2), the distinction between the divine agent and God himself is somewhat blurred.

Conventional depiction of an angel complete with wings and trumpet; in the church of San Angelo in Formis, Capua, Italy.

In the postbiblical period, especially in apocalyptic writings, we find a great increase in the number and activity of angelic beings. At this stage there is a tendency to identify them by name and arrange them in hierarchical order, and a distinction is made between good and evil angels. This is not so apparent in the biblical period when Satan or the adversary is mentioned only in three postexilic texts (Job 1–2; Zech 3:1–2; 1 Chr 21:1). The evil spirits most frequently encountered in postbiblical texts, including the Dead Sea Scrolls, are Belial (Beliar) and Asmodeus, and their numbers coalesce into a mighty army that will be engaged in the final struggle with the forces of good, e.g., in the Qumran War Scroll (1QM 15:1–16:1). Scholars have rightly suspected the influence of foreign ideas, especially from ancient Persia, in these developments.

The NT offers no new perspective on this belief in angelic beings, both good and evil. Jesus speaks often of angels (e.g., Luke 12:8–9), and the angel Gabriel announces the births of the Baptist (Luke 1:11–20) and of Jesus (1:26–38). An angel assists Jesus in his agony in Gethsemane (Luke 22:43), and another angel removes the stone from the tomb of Jesus (Matt 28:2–3). An angel announces the message of the Resurrection to the women who come to the tomb (Matt 28:1–7). Angels are part of the heavenly court at the Last Judgment (Matt 13:39–41; 25:31–46). All of this corresponds to popular Jewish belief at that time, the only dissenters being the Sadducees, who denied the existence of angels.

In later Christian thought speculation on angels was influenced as much by philosophical speculation as by reflection on the biblical materials. Christian theologians writing under the influence of Platonic philosophy tended to view angels as entities intermediate in their degree of perfection between God and the visible, material reality. Speculations along these lines gave rise to theories of the hierarchy of the angels, as, for example, in the writings of Pseudo-Dionysius. In later medieval thought, particularly in the thought of Aquinas, speculation on the nature of angels provided an occasion for much fruitful reflection on the nature of thought and action and the relation of mental states to embodiment in time. The famous quibble over the number of angels that can dance on the head of a pin was intended as a logical exercise and not as a serious problem. See also archangel; guardian angel.

JOSEPH BLENKINSOPP

THE CELESTIAL HIERARCHY

The order of the celestial hierarchy is given in slightly different forms in various early Christian sources, including Ambrose, Jerome, Pope Gregory the Great, Isidore of Seville, and John of Damascus. However, it was Denys (also know as Dionysius) the Areopagite (d. ca. 500) who was given what is closest to a definitive list in his Celestial Hierarchy, where the nine choirs of celestial beings are ranked in three hierarchies, each containing three choirs. In the Middle Ages Denys's speculative doctrine was developed by the Scholastics and found its way into the works of Peter Lombard, Albertus Magnus, Bonaventure, Duns Scotus, and Thomas Aquinas.

I.	1. Seraphim	According to Isa 6:2–7, each in this highest category has six wings: "with two they covered their faces, and with two they covered their feet, and with two they flew." As the seraphs surround the throne of the Lord, they call to one another: "Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts; the whole earth is full of his glory," lines that are incorporated into the liturgy at the beginning of the Eucharistic Prayer.
	2. Cherubim	According to Gen 3:24 and Ezek 28:14, the cherubim function as attendants of God, guarding, for example, the garden of Eden after Adam and Eve had been expelled from it. Representations of two of them in gold were placed in Solomon's Temple at Jerusalem, facing one another at either end of the mercy seat, the cover of the ark of the covenant (Exod 25:18–22).
	3. Thrones	They are mentioned in Col 1:16 as part of God's creation in Christ. According to Jewish legend there are seventy such beings. Some are numbered among the fallen angels. The dominant characteristic of those in heaven is steadfastness. It is through the thrones, Denys the Areopagite says, that God brings his justice to bear upon us.
II.	4. Dominations	Also known as dominions (Col 1:16), according to Denys the Areopagite they regulate angels' duties and through them the majesty of God is manifested. Their emblems of authority are scepters and orbs.
	5. Virtues	According to Hebrew lore, their principal duty is to work miracles on earth. The two angels ("two men in white robes") standing by the apostles at the moment of Jesus' ascension into heaven are traditionally regarded as virtues (Acts 1:10).
	6. Powers	Mentioned in Col 1:16, according to Denys the Areopagite they thwart the efforts of demons to overthrow the world. For Pope Gregory the Great, they preside over the demons. In Eph 6:12, however, they are regarded as evil and under the control of the devil: "the cosmic powers of this present darkness." They are also listed among those who cannot "separate us from the love of God in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom 8:38–39).
III.	7. Principalities	Their principal function, according to tradition, is the protection of religion. According to Denys the Areopagite, they watch over the leaders of the people and inspire them to make right decisions. They are also linked with the powers to include evil as well as good spirits (Eph 6:12; 2:2). The word "principalities" (Gk., archai) is rendered as "rulers" in English.
	8. Archangels	The "chief angels" (Gk.) are, according to Denys the Areopagite, the messengers who bear divine decrees. The word occurs twice in the NT: in Jude 9, where Michael is referred to as the archangel who "contended with the devil," and in 1 Thess 4:16, where there is a reference to "the archangel's call" that will come on the day the Lord returns from heaven. In Christian tradition Gabriel and Raphael are also considered archangels. Gabriel assists Daniel in the understanding of his visions (Dan 8:15; 9:21) and announces the conception of Jesus in Mary's womb (Luke 1:11; 1:26). Raphael is one of the seven archangels (called "angels" in the text) who stands in the presence of God (Tob 12:12, 15). 1 Enoch names the seven as Uriel, Raguel, Michael, Seraqael, Gabriel, Haniel, and Raphael.
	9. Angels	Although referred to frequently in the Bible, very few are actually named, Satan being one. Angels perform many different functions. In addition to those mentioned above for archangels, angels as divine agents execute judgment, lead, protect and heal, and intercede with God on behalf of humans. Guardian angels do not constitute a separate choir.

Angela Merici, St. (may-ree'chee), 1474–1540, founder of the Ursulines. Born in the Republic of Venice, she received a vision in 1506 to found a society of virgins in Brescia. She moved to that city in 1516 and by 1531 had begun to gather young women. In 1535 she formed twenty-five followers into the Company of St. Angela, the first order for the teaching of young girls. No formal vows were taken, but their rule prescribed virginity, poverty, and obedience. Each member remained with her family evangelizing her relatives, acquaintances, and neighbors. St. Angela was canonized in 1807. Feast day: January 27. See also Ursulines.

Angela of Foligno, Bl., ca. 1248–1309, Italian mystic and Franciscan tertiary. Around the age of forty, Angela formed the desire to abandon the worldly life, eventually living as a Franciscan tertiary after the death of her husband and children. Her many visions, recorded by the Franciscan brother Arnold in her Book of Visions and Instructions, include a twenty-step plan of penitence and meditations on the Lord's Prayer, the Eucharist, the Crucified Christ, and the mystical life, the culmination of which is mystical marriage with God. She was beatified in the seventeenth century. Feast day: February 28.

Angelica, Mother, b. 1923, American religious broadcaster and founder of EWTN (Eternal World Television Network). She is a member of the Franciscan Nuns of the Most Blessed Sacrament and was a former member of the Order of St. Francis and of the Discalced Carmelites of Perpetual Adoration. The EWTN studio is on the grounds of Our Lady of the Angels Monastery, which Mother Angelica had established in 1962 in Irondale, Alabama. EWTN's first program was presented on August 15, 1981.

Angelic Doctor, colloquial designation of the Scholastic theologian Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274), who wrote so well and abundantly about the angels and who seemed to approximate their intelligence. See also Aquinas, St. Thomas.

Angelico, Bl. Fra [Fra Giovanni da Fiesole], ca. 1400–55, Florentine painter of the early Renaissance. Nicknamed "Angelico" (the angelic painter), also known as "Il Beato" (It., "Blessed"), he was a Dominican whose paintings of the Virgin were influenced by the theological doctrine of the "garden of the soul" of his prior at San Marco, Antoninus of Florence. Fra Angelico's importance lies in his unparalleled use of color to create a naturalism of pictorial space and atmospheric effects. His notable works include the Annunciation (ca. 1434, Cortona, Italy), Descent from the Cross (ca. 1434, San Marco, Florence), and the frescoes in the monastic cells at San Marco in Florence (1438–45).

Angélique, Mère (mair ahn-jay-leek'). See Arnauld, Jacqueline Marie Angélique.

Angelus, a devotion that honors the Incarnation three times a day at the tolling of church or chapel bells. The name derives from the Latin phrase Angelus Domini ("Angel of the Lord"), which introduces the prayer: "The angel of the Lord declared to Mary, and she conceived of the Holy Spirit." This versicle and response is followed by the Hail Mary, then two more versicles and responses: "Behold the handmaid of the Lord, be it done unto me according to your word." "The Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us." Each of these biblical texts is also followed by a Hail Mary. The devotion is completed by a prayer addressed to God that recalls the "Incarnation, made known by the message of an angel. . . ." During Eastertide, the Angelus is replaced by a similar devotion, the Regina Coeli ("Queen of Heaven").

The origin of this prayer is obscure. Historians seem to agree, however, that the custom began with the practice of the evening tolling of the bell for Compline in monasteries or the tolling of the bell for curfew. The practice may go back as far as the tenth century in England. By the thirteenth century, people were being exhorted to follow the Franciscan custom of reciting three Hail Marys at the ringing of the evening bell. Indulgences were attached to the practice in the fourteenth century. The devotion was finalized as we know it today during the sixteenth century. See also Incarnation, the; Marian devotions.

anger. See capital sins.

Anglicanism, a term that pertains to the Anglican Communion. The communion was described by the Lambeth Conference of 1930 as "a fellowship within the One, Holy, Catholic and Apostolic Church of those duly constituted dioceses, provinces or regional Churches in communion with the See of Canterbury." The archbishop of Canterbury is regarded as "primus inter pares" (Lat. "first among equals") of the Anglican archbishops (primates).

Anglicans comprise between seventy to eighty million members worldwide. As the name suggests, Anglicanism originated in England. Christianity was probably brought to England by soldiers or traders. England's first martyr was Alban (d. ca. 203), a Roman officer who refused to renounce Christ. Early in the sixth century, Celtic missionaries evangelized from the north. Notable among them was St. Columba, who settled on the island of Iona. He died in 597. Exactly eight days later, St. Augustine and a small party of Benedictine monks, sent by Pope Gregory the Great, landed on the Kent coast. After an abortive start, Augustine established his mission with a monastic community at Canterbury.

At the Synod of Whitby (663) the two forms of Christianity, Celtic and Roman, settled their differences, resulting in the unity of the Church under the authority of the pope. Catholic Christianity was further consolidated through the organizing ability of Theodore, appointed archbishop in 669, at the age of 66. He divided England into dioceses and created the parish system, thus providing for sacramental and spiritual nourishment for all people.

In the sixteenth century the Church in England separated from Rome, partly for theological reasons and partly for political ones. The theology of Martin Luther and other Reformers influenced English theologians in Cambridge and Oxford. The issues they debated included: (1) authority—how is it defined and how do papal and biblical authority relate? (2) justification—is faith or works the ground of salvation; are the sacraments the means to, or the results of, salvation? (3) priesthood—what is the relationship between the offering of the Eucharistic sacrifice, the finished work of Christ and the priesthood of the ordained ministry?

Henry VIII's political defiance of the pope and separation from him led to the suppression of Roman Catholicism in Britain. Under Henry and the following sovereigns, deep hostility led to persecution for both Catholics and Protestants. Queen Elizabeth gave protection to a "reformed" Church of England under the temporal authority of the sovereign and with the archbishop of Canterbury its spiritual head. For three hundred years Roman Catholicism was driven underground but it never died out.

England exploited its position as a seafaring nation and settled in many different parts of the world—the West Indies, Americas, Canada, India, and the Far East. Anglican missionaries were among the first to emigrate to minister to the English communities and to win others for Christ. Bishops were appointed and men ordained to build up the Church. By the middle of the nineteenth century, it was evident that there was a need for the many autonomous dioceses to consult with each other. In 1867 the archbishop of Canterbury called a conference at his London home in Lambeth. The Lambeth Conference gathers all bishops together every ten years for fellowship, prayer, and theological discussion. Seventy bishops met at Lambeth Palace in 1867. The 1988 conference called together more than five hundred bishops, who met at the University of Kent and Canterbury Cathedral. Today the Anglican Communion has become worldwide in character. English is no longer the universal language of the communion—Spanish, French, Arabic, and many other languages are spoken in Anglican congregations around the world.

Doctrine: Anglicanism maintains that its doctrine is both catholic and reformed. It is catholic because it holds firmly to Christian fundamentals expressed in the Nicene-Constantinople Creed and in the early Church Fathers and because it retains many of the traditions associated with the Catholic Church. Its liturgy and Ordinal (ordination ritual) testify to this inheritance. Anglicanism is reformed because it affirms the primacy of Scripture in determining doctrine, repudiates the jurisdiction of the pope over the Church of England, and places salvation by faith through grace at the center of its thinking.

In 1888 the third Lambeth Conference set out the Anglican understanding of what is essential to the life and unity of the Church in the so-called Lambeth Quadrilateral. It embraced: (i) the Holy Scriptures as the record of God's revelation; (ii) the Nicene and Apostles' creeds as the rules of faith; (iii) the divinely instituted sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper; (iv) the historic episcopate locally adopted.

The claim to be both reformed and catholic is upheld by a belief that the Church must be as comprehensive as possible. Visitors to different Anglican churches are often struck by the great variations between traditions. Evangelical Anglicans, generally "low church," emphasize preaching. The middle of the way, or broad church, is noted for its affirmation of the mind. The Anglo-Catholic wing, deeply influenced by Cardinal John Henry Newman (d. 1890) and the Oxford movement, is strikingly similar to Roman Catholicism.

Unity: In spite of events that forced Anglicans and Roman Catholics apart, relations today are strong and cordial. At the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), the Catholic Church recognized the closeness of Anglicanism to its own life. Among the separated churches that guard, in part, the Catholic tradition and structures, the Anglican Communion "occupies a special place" (Decree on Ecumenism, n. 13). Dialogues began with the meeting in Rome between Pope Paul VI and Archbishop Michael Ramsey in 1966. The establishment of the Anglican/Roman Catholic International Commission (ARCIC) resulted in statements of agreement on the Eucharist (1971), the ministry (1973), and authority (1976 and 1981). These statements were published in the Final Report of ARCIC, which has been submitted to both churches for response. The Anglican Communion, at the 1988 Lambeth Conference, declared that the statements on the Eucharist and ministry and ordination were "consonant in substance with the faith of Anglicans" and recognized the convergence in understanding on authority. In 1991, the Catholic Church also found much it could agree with but wanted certain points relating to both Eucharistic doctrine and the ministry of the priesthood clarified. A Second Commission (ARCIC II) has made significant progress on shared understanding of justification by faith through grace and on the communion of the Church. The commission is looking now at questions of ethics.

While the dialogue continues to deepen understanding between communions, the Catholic Church acknowledges the "obstacle" to growth in communion occasioned by the Anglican ordination of women to the priesthood and episcopate. The Church of England approved the ordination of women in 1992.

In addition to its dialogue with the Roman Catholic Church, the Anglican Communion is committed to "all round" and "all level" ecumenism. Bilateral international conversations are taking place between Anglicans and Orthodox churches, Lutherans, Methodists, and Old Catholics. Anglicans also play a significant role within the World Council of Churches. In every region of the world, Anglicans seek to develop relationships with other Christians and to live in closer communion on the basis of agreement in faith. See also England, Catholicism in; Episcopal Church.

Bibliography

Sykes, Stephen, and John E. Booty, eds. The Study of Anglicanism. Philadelphia: SPCK/Fortress Press, 1988. GEORGE L. CAREY

Anglican ordination, ordination of priests within the Anglican Communion. Although the Catholic Church formally denied the validity of Anglican ordinations in Pope Leo XIII's bull Apostolicae Curae (1896), as recently as 1994 the practice of the Catholic Church has been to reordain former Anglican priests conditionally, not absolutely. Absolute ordination, i.e., ordination with no canonical or theological reservations, is predicated on the judgment that any previous ordination was certainly invalid. Conditional ordination, i.e., ordination with canonical and theological reservations, is predicated on the judgment that any previous ordination, while probably invalid, could also possibly have been valid. Therefore, in the event that the previous ordination may not have been valid, the individual is reordained in a certainly valid rite, conditionally.

The historical problem is whether ordinations are valid when they have been performed according to the rite adopted in 1550 (the Ordinal), when the medieval rite (the Pontifical) of the Catholic Church was set aside by the authority of the English king Edward VI (1547–53) and the Ordinal composed by the archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Cranmer, was imposed by the king.

Queen Mary to Pope Leo XIII: The question arose under Queen Mary (1553–58) when Cardinal Reginald Pole was reconciling with the Holy See the English clergy ordained under Edward VI. It arose again when Pope Leo XIII (1878–1903) created a commission to examine the problem. The instructions of Julius III (1550–1555) to Cardinal Pole did not decide the value of the Ordinal. Their main concern was that those priests who had married when clerical marriage was authorized by Edward VI could not function as priests unless they abandoned their wives, their marriages being illicit in the case of diocesan clergy and invalid in the case of religious orders. The pope stated the principle that ordinations must have been made "according to the accustomed form of the church," but the practical decisions about whether to accept the orders received under Edward VI were left to Cardinal Pole. There is no evidence that reordination was the rule, though there were some reordinations. The further instructions of Pope Paul IV (1555–59) did not discuss the Anglican Ordinal. But the pope would not recognize clergy whose ordination included the acceptance of the king's supremacy over the Church. He therefore specified that bishops and priests could be admitted as bishops or as priests only if the bishop who had ordained them had himself been ordained according to the old ritual from the time of Henry VIII (before the adoption of the Anglican Ordinal); the old ritual did not affirm the royal supremacy and recognized the authority of the pope.

On two occasions in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries the Holy See did not admit the value of Anglican ordination. But these cases (an anonymous French Calvinist and the case of John Gordon) were so peculiar that they do not warrant a general conclusion.

In the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries several investigations by French and British scholars reached opposite conclusions on the value of Anglican ordinations. In the late 1880s, however, Pope Leo XIII, who was greatly interested in religious developments in England, created a special commission composed of both partisans and opponents of the validity of Anglican orders. This commission reached no conclusion. Pope Leo's bull, Apostolicae Curae (1896), was not its work. It was composed by Cardinal Mazzella on the basis of a draft by the Master of Sacred Palace, the pope's official theologian, by tradition a Dominican. It concluded that lack of proper form and proper intention in the ordinal used at the consecration of Matthew Parker as archbishop of Canterbury in 1559 made Anglican ordinations invalid.

Mid-Twentieth Century to Today: Several more recent events that have thrown new light on the question may be listed: (1) The opening of the relevant archives by Pope John Paul II has made possible a better knowledge of Leo XIII's commission. (2) After the determination of the proper form of ordination by Pope Pius XII in November 1947, and the simplification of rites by Paul VI in June 1968, the Anglican form is much closer to the standard Roman form. (3) Due to the liturgical movement the understanding of intention that was assumed in Apostolicae Curae is no longer shared by the generality of theologians. Thus the two main points of the condemnation of Anglican orders, deficiency of form and deficiency of intention, have lost their standing in sacramental theology. (4) Both Paul VI and John Paul II have received Anglican bishops as bishops and have joined with them in prayer and in blessing the people. (5) The concept of the Church as communion, favored by most theologians, allows for more diversity in the expression of the common faith and in the form of the sacraments than was the case in the theology of the Counter-Reformation. (6) It is generally accepted that in a restored communion there will be room for different "types" of the Church, of which Anglicanism is one. (7) The dialogue between Anglicans and Catholics in the United States has determined that the intent of Leo XIII was not to block further relations; the two churches should study together their conception of the Church.

Thus, the possibility that the validity of Anglican ordinations may be recognized is no longer utopian. See also Anglicanism; Anglican-Roman Catholic dialogue; England, Catholicism in; ordination; Reformation, the.

GEORGE H. TAVARD

Anglican–Roman Catholic dialogue, a series of official meetings and reports designed to foster closer relations between the Anglican communion and the Roman Catholic Church, beginning with the first Anglican–Roman Catholic International Commission (ARCIC) in 1969 and continuing to this day. Building upon the foundation of the "special place" that the Anglican communion was said to occupy in relation to the Catholic Church in the Decree on Ecumenism of Vatican II, Unitatis Redintegratio (n. 13), and as a result of the visit of the archbishop of Canterbury to Pope Paul VI in Rome in 1966, an Anglican–Roman Catholic Joint Preparatory Commission was set up with the task of developing a program for dialogue and cooperation. Its findings were published in the Malta Report of 1968, which spoke of "our quest for the full, organic unity of our two communions." Arising out of this, the Anglican–Roman Catholic International Commission (ARCIC) was established in 1969, with members representing different parts of the English-speaking world and different theological outlooks within both communions.

ARCIC produced three agreed statements, one on the Eucharist (1971), one on ministry and ordination (1973), and one on authority in the Church (1976). While the first two were described by the commission as being "substantial agreements," the third did not go so far as that, but indicated specific problems remaining in the areas of papal primacy, infallibility, and jurisdiction. All three statements were included with some elucidatory notes and comments in the Final Report of the commission published in 1982. It should also be noted that a separate Anglican–Roman Catholic International Commission on the theology of marriage reported in 1975.

While the Final Report was being referred for discussion to the provinces of the Anglican Communion and to the national episcopal conferences of the Roman Catholic Church, a second commission (known as ARCIC II) was appointed in 1983 to continue the work begun by the first and to explore other areas of theological concern. It has issued two statements, one on salvation and the Church (1987) and one on Church as communion (1991).

In 1991 the Vatican Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith issued its definitive judgment on the Final Report. While welcoming the progress that had been made, the Congregation insisted that from the Catholic point of view certain statements and formulations would need to receive greater clarification.

Alongside ARCIC, regional dialogues have also been taking place in different parts of the world. The Anglican–Roman Catholic Consultation in the United States of America (known as ARC/USA) has met regularly since 1965 and issued joint statements from time to time, many of which were collected in the volume Called to Full Unity (1986). ARC/USA has focused mainly on somewhat different issues from those dealt with by ARCIC, including the questions of Anglican orders and of the ordination of women. It is also working on a common eucharistic prayer text for possible use by the two churches in the United States as well as on establishing joint meetings of their bishops. See also Anglicanism; Episcopal Church.

PAUL F. BRADSHAW

Anglo-Catholicism, the name given since the Oxford movement in the nineteenth century to the "high church" party within the Anglican communion. Anglo-Catholics emphasize the historic continuity of the Church of England with its medieval predecessor and interpret official Anglican formularies in a way that is consistent with Catholic doctrine. They lay particular stress on the apostolic succession of the episcopate, the priestly character of the ordained ministry, and the Real Presence of Christ in the eucharistic elements. Their liturgical style closely mirrors contemporary Catholic worship, in the past sometimes even going as far as the abandonment of prescribed Anglican forms. See also Anglicanism; Episcopal Church; Oxford movement.

Anicetus, St., pope ca. 155–66, when Hegesippus, Justin Martyr, Marcion, and Valentinus were all in Rome. Polycarp of Smyrna (d. ca. 155) also visited Anicetus. Although they disagreed over the celebration of Easter, Polycarp (who favored the celebration on Passover) celebrated the Eucharist while in Rome, and the two parted in peace. At the time the Roman church had no special Easter festival but celebrated the resurrection every Sunday. Feast day: April 17. See also Quartodecimans.

Anima Christi (ah'nee-mah krees'tee; Lat., "Soul of Christ"), a prayer from the early 1300s used for private eucharistic devotion after Mass. The prayer's author is not known. Ignatius of Loyola recommended it in his Spiritual Exercises (1541).

ANIMA CHRISTI

Soul of Christ, be my sanctification;
Body of Christ, be my salvation;
Blood of Christ, fill all my veins;
Water of Christ's side, wash out my stains;
Passion of Christ, my comfort be;
O good Jesus, listen to me:
In thy wounds I fain would hide,
Ne'er to be parted from thy side;
Guard me, should the foe assail me;
Call me when my life shall fail me;
Bid me come to thee above,
With thy saints to sing thy love.
World without end. Amen.

[Tr. by Cardinal John Henry Newman]

animism (Lat., anima, "soul"), the belief of primitive peoples that certain natural objects such as animals, trees, and stones are "animated" by spirits. There is even a suggestion of animism in the OT where Jacob sets up a stone pillar at Bethel (Gen 28:18–22) contrary to the frequent biblical condemnations of stone worship (e.g., Hos 10:1–2; Mic 5:12; Deut 7:5). The Catholic doctrine of creation is opposed to animism. Only human beings, not animals and natural objects, are made in the image and likeness of God (Gen 1:26). Although God is present to all creation, there are no "gods of nature" to be worshiped, including human beings.

annates, tax on a benefice's first year of income. Originally this tax was levied by local bishops, but in 1306 Pope Clement V demanded annates from British benefices for the papacy, and during the fourteenth century payment of annates to the papal treasury became common. In the face of increasing opposition, the Council of Trent (1545–63) severely restriced papal annates. Today, annates are due only from a few Italian benefices. See also benefice.

Anne and Joachim, parents of the Virgin Mary, meeting in Jerusalem; fourteenth-century painting by Giotto in the Scrovegni Chapel, Padua, Italy.

Anne and Joachim, Sts., the legendary parents of the Virgin Mary. According to the second-century Protevangelium of James, Joachim is not permitted to offer sacrifice because he has produced no child. Like Hannah in 1 Samuel, Anne has long been barren. Anne and Joachim pray for a child, which Anne vows to dedicate to God's service. When Mary is three years old, they bring her to the Temple where she remains until her betrothal to Joseph at age twelve. The story is repeated in the Gospel of Pseudo-Matthew, an eighth-century Latin work influential throughout the Middle Ages. Feast day: July 26. See also Mary, Blessed Virgin.

Anno, St., 1010–75, German archbishop. Educated at Bamberg, he was appointed archbishop of Cologne in 1056. Immersed in the politics of his time and often embroiled in scandals, especially nepotism, he spent the last year of his life in rigorous penance at the abbey of Siegburg. Feast day: December 4.

Anno Domini (ah'noh daw'mee-nee). See A.D.

Annuario Pontificio (an-yoo-ah'ee-oh pahn-ti-fee'chee-oh; It., "papal yearbook"), official annual publication by the Vatican of a complete list of members of the hierarchy, offices and officials of Roman Curia, and names of dioceses and religious institutes with pertinent statistics. Printed in Italian, it includes historical notes regarding the development of the various departments of the Roman Curia.

annulment, a declaration by a church tribunal system that a marriage was not canonically valid. Perhaps the first thing to be noted about this definition is not so much what it says as what it does not say. It does not, for example, say that an annulment indicates that a relationship, even a loving relationship, never existed between the parties. More importantly, it does not even say that a marriage never existed between the parties, but only that that marriage was not a canonically valid one (in church law, a marriage which is de facto invalid but which was entered with at least one party being in good faith, is known as a "putative" marriage—see can. 1061.3). And finally an annulment does not say that children born of an invalid marriage are illegitimate; the law of the Church (can. 1137) states clearly and unequivocally that all children are to be considered legitimate who are born of either a valid or a putative marriage.

Reasons for Invalidity: A marriage may be invalid according to the Church for one of two reasons: because of a law, or because of a consent that was in some way defective. There are two kinds of laws that render a marriage invalid; the first is called a disqualifying law; the second an invalidating law. The first renders a person ineligible; the second renders the act invalid. A disqualifying law is commonly known, in the field of marriage law, as an "impediment," and the Church recognizes twelve impediments to marriage; that is, twelve situations in which a person, even though naturally capable of marriage, is nevertheless considered disqualified or is rendered ineligible for marriage by Church law. First cousins, for example, are regarded as ineligible for marriage to each other, and if they marry without a dispensation, their marriage is regarded as "invalid." Similarly, a priest or a person who has taken a public perpetual vow of chastity is considered ineligible for marriage by Church law. The twelve impediments (cans. 1083–1094) are nonage, prior bond, disparity of worship, Holy Order, vow, abduction, coniugicide (murder of a spouse), consanguinity, affinity, public propriety, adoption, and impotence. This last, it should be noted, is not an impediment in the strict sense since a truly impotent person (unlike, for example, the first cousins or the priest) lacks a natural capacity for marriage and is not simply rendered ineligible for marriage by a law. Nevertheless, impotence has for centuries been listed as an impediment in Church law and continues to be in the 1983 Code of Canon Law.

The other kind of law that can render a marriage invalid is called an invalidating law. Unlike the disqualifying law, which directly affects the person, an invalidating law directly affects the act and renders that act invalid. A few examples: canon 1108 says that for a Catholic to marry validly, the marriage must be before a priest or deacon; if, therefore, a Catholic marries "outside the church," that is, without the presence of a priest or deacon and without a dispensation having been granted, the marriage is invalid. The same canon requires the presence of two witnesses; if therefore a couple exchanged marital consent before a priest alone, with no one else present, or with only one other person present, the marriage would be invalid. Again, that same canon requires that a Catholic marry not just before any priest or deacon but before one who is legitimately empowered to officiate at the wedding. Should the cleric not be so empowered, the marriage would be regarded as invalid. All of these requirements, incidentally, are called the "form" of marriage. Other examples of invalidating laws are canon 1105 (which lists certain requirements when a marriage is entered into by proxy), canon 1116 (which lists requirements for a valid marriage in extraordinary circumstances such as danger of death) and canon 1156 (which lists the special requirements for the convalidation of a marriage).

Besides these two types of laws, disqualifying and invalidating, the other major factor that can render a marriage invalid is a defective consent. It is axiomatic that "consent makes marriage" so when the consent is substantially defective on the part of one or both spouses, the marriage is invalid. Over the centuries canon law has identified several factors that can result in a defective mental consent. The first is a genuine incapacity either for consent itself (as when a mental disorder has deprived a person either of the basic ability to think rationally or at least of the ability to grasp and appreciate what marriage fundamentally entails) or for the "object" of consent. The object of consent is the thing a person consents to; in this case marriage, or more specifically the essential obligations of marriage. If therefore a person is, for some psychological reason, incapable of fulfilling the essential obligations of marriage, then in canon law, that person is considered to enter marriage with defective consent, because one cannot truly consent to do something which he or she is incapable of doing. If, for example, a marriage breaks down because a homosexual partner finds it impossible to function in a heterosexual relationship, then such a marriage could be declared invalid on the ground that the homosexual suffered from a defect of consent insofar as he or she was incapable of fulfilling the essential obligations of that marriage.

Besides these incapacities either for consent itself or for the object of consent, there are several other consensual defects recognized in law. These are, for example, ignorance about the basic nature of marriage, error about the identity of one's spouse, error caused by fraud regarding some important quality of one's spouse, and error concerning the unity, indissolubility or sacramental dignity of matrimony. There is also simulation, that is the intention to enter either a trial marriage or an open marriage or a childless marriage, or perhaps no marriage at all, as might happen, for example, when the parties go through a marriage ceremony as a mere business arrangement or solely for the purpose of obtaining a citizenship desired by one of the parties. Still another consensual defect that invalidates marriage is the entering into marriage conditionally, that is to say, only if something else, like coming into an inheritance, happens. And a final defect of consent is that caused by entering into a marriage due to force or grave fear. All of these consensual defects are discussed in canons 1095 through 1103 of the Code of Canon Law.

Procedures: Depending on the nature of the invalidity, the Catholic Church uses three different procedures for investigating and declaring invalidity: administrative, informal, and formal.

An administrative procedure is used for a marriage involving a Catholic when the marriage ceremony was "outside the Church," that is before someone other than a priest or deacon and without the Church's having dispensed from that requirement. A Catholic, for example, having no interest in being married in the Church, marries instead before a justice of the peace. This is commonly called a "lack of form" marriage. A ceremony of this kind is considered to be so obviously invalid that it may be declared so without a judicial process but by a simple administrative procedure.

As regards all other marriages, however, the question of their possible invalidity must be investigated by a judicial process, either informal or formal. An informal process, also called a documentary process, may be used in only two situations: (1) when, from a document which is subject to no contradiction or exception, there is certain proof of the existence either of a diriment (invalidating) impediment (one of the twelve mentioned above) or of a defect of legitimate form (as, for example, when the marriage is performed only before the priest and without the two required witnesses), provided it is clear with equal certitude that a dispensation was not granted; and (2) when there is certain proof that, in a proxy marriage, the proxy or procurator was never duly appointed by the spouse to serve as proxy (can. 1686).

Besides these few types of cases, which can be handled by either an administrative or an informal procedure, all other marriage cases are conducted by an ordinary formal procedure. A formal procedure involves extensive testimony from both the petitioner and the respondent, at least where the respondent wishes to participate, as well as from witnesses, and often psychiatric experts as well. A Defender of the Bond, whose duty it is to call to the attention of the court everything that can reasonably be adduced in favor of the validity of the marriage, must also be appointed in every formal trial. And no declaration of invalidity is definitive until a second concordant decision has been given by an appellate court.

Each year United States tribunals give about 36,000 decisions in cases heard in formal trial, about 2,000 decisions following the informal judicial procedure, and about 26,000 administrative decrees of nullity for marriages that were null because of lack of form.

Popular Misconceptions: Cardinal Gasparri (d. 1934), who was probably the most influential canonist of this century, once suggested that the term "null" (on which the term "annulment" is obviously based) be applied only to marriages that are invalid by reason of lack of form. All other marriages that are not valid would be called "invalid" rather than "null." Regrettably, however, this distinction has not been maintained. Had it been, the difference between a declaration of nullity (or annulment) and a declaration of invalidity would be clear, and in general there would be far less confusion regarding this entire matter. When, for example, people hear that a twenty-year marriage of two Catholics, which had taken place in the Catholic Church, is now being declared "null," they imagine that the Church is now saying that that marriage never existed and that the children born of the marriage are therefore illegitimate; which is not at all the case.

Many people seem to be under the impression that when two non-Catholics marry before a rabbi, pastor, minister, or even before a civil magistrate, somehow the Catholic Church does not recognize that marriage as valid. This is false. The Catholic position is that, while a Catholic must marry before an authorized Catholic priest or deacon, all others (except the Orthodox who have a similar regulation) may validly marry before any official recognized by civil law. See also Marriage.

Bibliography

Brown, Ralph. Marriage Annulment in the Catholic Church. 3d ed. Suffolk, England: Kevin Mayhew, 1990.

Robinson, Geoffrey. Marriage, Divorce and Nullity. Victoria, Australia: Dove Communications, 1984.

Wrenn, Lawrence G. Annulments. 5th ed. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1988.

———. Decisions. 2d ed. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1983.

———. Procedures. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1987.

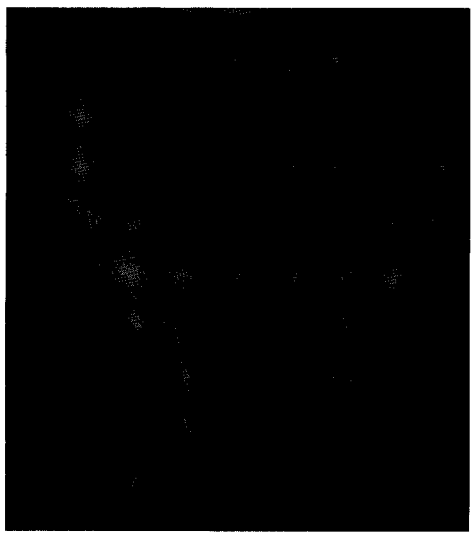
LAWRENCE G. WRENN

Annunciation, the proclamation to Mary that she would be the mother of Jesus. The basic account appears in Luke 1:26–38. The angel Gabriel appears in Nazareth to a virgin who is betrothed to Joseph, of the house of David. Gabriel pronounces what has become the first portion of the Hail Mary prayer: "Greetings, favored one! The Lord is with you!" (Luke 1:28). Gabriel then predicts the birth of Jesus and his eternal rule over the "house of Jacob." Mary, incredulous, asks how it may be, and Gabriel responds by promising that the Holy Spirit will cause Mary to conceive (Luke 1:35). The promise grounds the belief in the virginal conception of Jesus. The interchange between Gabriel and Mary provides the opening for the Angelus prayer: "The angel of the Lord declared unto Mary, and she conceived by the Holy Spirit." Mary's response to Gabriel's promise (Luke 1:38, RSV) expresses her humble submission to God's will: "Behold, I am the handmaid of the Lord; let it be to me according to your word." This response, one of the few direct quotations from Mary in the NT, epitomizes her role as the servant of God.

The archangel Gabriel announcing God's invitation to the Blessed Virgin to become the mother of the Savior; seventeenth-century oil painting by Rubens, located in Vienna.



The Church celebrates the feast of the Annunciation on March 25, nine months before the celebration of the birth of Jesus. See also Mary, Blessed Virgin.

anointing, covering the body or an object with oil. The use of oil as a refreshing unguent was common in the ancient Near East (Deut 28:40; 2 Chr 28:15; Mic 6:15; 2 Sam 12:2). It was also used for medicinal purposes (Isa 1:6; Luke 10:34). Its origin as a sacred rite is not clear, but anointing was used in the consecration of priests (Exod 29:1–9), of the tent of meeting, and of the ark (Exod 30:26). It is also a sign of investment with power. The king is called "the Lord's anointed" (Heb., mashiah, 1 Sam 24:6), and the first kings of Israel were anointed (Saul, in 1 Sam 10:1–8; David, in 1 Sam 16:13; Solomon, in 1 Kgs 1:39). Though prophets or priests conduct the anointing, the true agent is God (1 Sam 10:1) and the person anointed receives God's spirit (1 Sam 16:13). The promise to David in 2 Sam 7:8–16 gave rise to the hope for an ideal Davidic ruler who in the intertestamental literature is called messiah. The Dead Sea Scrolls testify to an pre-Christian expectation of a priestly and a royal "anointed one" (1QS 9:11; 1QSa 2:14). The Gospels portray Jesus' hesitancy to accept the designation "Messiah" (Gk., Christos) without qualification, often by reference to the suffering Son of Man (Mark 8:29–31; 14:61–64). Early creedal formulas (such as Rom 1:1–4, 1 Cor 15:3) and public proclamation (Acts 2:36) call Jesus "the anointed one" (Christ) by virtue of his death and Resurrection. The term quickly becomes virtually a proper name for Jesus (Gal 3:26–27) as the bearer of God's spirit (Luke 4:14–18) and authority. The only NT reference to anointing as a sacred rite is Jas 5:14, where elders of the Church pray over sick people and anoint them "in the name of the Lord." See also Anointing of the Sick.

JOHN R. DONAHUE

Anomoeans (a-noh'mee-uhnz; Gk., anomoios, "unlike"), the most radical group of fourth-century Arians under the intellectual leadership of Aetius and Eunomius. Their doctrine was that the Son, although the full expression of the Father, is radically unlike the Father in all things because the Son is dependent on the Father. See also Arianism.

ANOINTING OF THE SICK

Anointing of the Sick is one of the seven sacraments of the Catholic Church. It is one ritual component of a more extensive ensemble of ritual prayer that is part of the Church's pastoral care for the seriously sick and/or the dying. Since the medieval period this sacrament has been called Extreme Unction (Lat., "last anointing") and has been perceived almost exclusively as part of the ensemble of rites celebrated for the dying Christian. In accordance with the Second Vatican Council (Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, n. 73), the 1972 reformed rite restored the more traditional (premedieval) perspective on this sacrament as the ordinary rite for the strengthening of those whose health is debilitated by physical illness or old age. This change in perspective has been well accepted by the faithful.

THEOLOGY

Sickness, physical decline with age, a person's final journey in death—all of these realities are as much the stuff of mystery as are birth, the full vigor of healthy youth, marriage, and family life. Illness is part of the human condition. Christians are called to the faith-filled acceptance of suffering as a sign of their incorporation into Christ, who took upon himself our human pain (Col 1:22–19). This is no passive act of helpless surrender. Christ's concern for the bodily and spiritual welfare of the sick was a declaration that in his ministry the reign of God was breaking through in a new and definitive manner (Mark 2:1–12).

In inviting all seriously ill Christians to the sacrament of Anointing the Church proclaims its belief in Christ's power over the pain and isolation of grave illness and dying. The Church, in imitation of Christ's example and in obedience to his command, supports and is itself engaged in fighting illness. A holistic vision of the human person, however, calls for medical personnel and Church ministers who look to the comforting of the spirit as well as to the healing of the body. Authentic pastoral care of the sick necessarily comprises both.

Pope Paul VI's apostolic constitution promulgating the reformed rite (1972) stresses a theological dimension of this sacrament far too often neglected, namely, that this holy anointing is not only a ministry to the sick and the dying but also an act of setting those anointed in special state of ministry to the rest of the Church. Like all other sacraments and blessings of persons, Anointing of the Sick institutes the baptized into an ordo (Lat.), or college of ministry. In this instance, those anointed are raised up as particular models of faithful and hope-filled association with Christ in his Passion and death.

THE HISTORY OF THE RITE

The use of oil, the laying on of hands, and ritual prayer for the healing of the sick are rooted in Jewish tradition. Jesus and his disciples (Mark 6:13; Jas 5:13–16) did not invent new symbols and rites of healing but employed traditional forms they invested with new meaning. For at least the first eight centuries of the Church's life, the more formal ritual emphasis was upon the bishop's blessing of oil for the anointing of the sick. It seems that just as ordinary Christians brought the Eucharist from the Sunday celebration to their homes for Communion during the week, so they also brought blessed oil home for use as needed. The bishop and/or other members of the local clergy undoubtedly visited the sick and may well have been the ministers of anointing. For the most part, however, baptized members of the local church were the ordinary ministers of this sacrament.

The gradual clericalization of the rite had much to do with the evolution of the sacrament of Penance, or Reconciliation. Because of the rigorous demands made upon those who entered into public penance during the first eight centuries and the fact that it could be received only once in a lifetime, Christians tended to postpone entrance into this state until close to death. Because the sacrament of Anointing was reserved to those in full communion with the Church, it necessarily needed to be delayed until after deathbed Reconciliation. Thus the development of the continuous rite of Penance, Anointing of the Sick, and Viaticum (the final reception of Holy Communion)—all administered by a priest. Lost in this development was the awareness that the anointing is directed to physical as well as to spiritual healing. From about the beginning of the ninth century until the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), this sacrament was associated almost exclusively with death. The reform of the rite mandated by the council has emerged as one of the more successful and most eagerly accepted aspects of contemporary liturgical renewal.

THE CELEBRATION OF THE RITE

Though medieval rituals make it clear that the anointing of the dying was normatively celebrated with the presence and participation of the local community, the usual practice was individual celebration; that is, few if any other members of the faithful participated. This was especially the case when, as frequently happened, the confession of the dying person preceded the sacrament of Anointing and Viaticum.

The reformed rite clearly calls for the participation of members of the family and other members of the community in the celebration of this sacrament. Except in emergency situations, the rite envisions other ongoing acts of pastoral care that precede anointing. In addition to attending to those concerns of the seriously ill that often make illness an experience of isolation and emotional suffering, e.g., concern for the spouse and children of an afflicted parent, the rite presumes that the Church's members have visited with the sick, prayed with them, and regularly brought them Communion. In this perspective Anointing is the culmination of a series of rites and other acts of pastoral care. Except in emergency situations, pastors and other ministers to the sick should prepare the sick, their relatives, and other members of the community for this celebration as they would prepare for all other sacramental rites that are normatively celebrated with the proclamation of the word, song, and symbol.

The rite provides for the celebration of the sacrament of Anointing within a Mass celebrated in the home or hospital room of the sick person. This requires the permission of the ordinary. In many parishes and homes for the elderly it has become the custom to celebrate with some regularity the Anointing of the Sick within the Sunday and/or daily Eucharist.

A priest administers the sacrament of Anointing of the Sick, signing the forehead and hands with oil while praying: "Through this holy anointing may the Lord in his love and mercy help you with the grace of the Holy Spirit. May the Lord who frees you from sin save you and raise you up. Amen."

The reformed ritual sees the continuous rite of Penance, Anointing, and Viaticum as exceptional. A rite for emergencies is provided for situations when the danger of death from catastrophic injury or illness is sudden and unanticipated or when the priest has been unable to attend the sick until the point of death. Anointing may be repeated when the sick person recovers after Anointing but later becomes sick again or when, during the same illness, the condition of the sick person becomes more serious.

THE SHAPE OF THE RITE

The texts, ritual directives, and pastoral notes in the 1983 edition of the rite are an expanded and more pastorally adapted version of the original Latin edition of this reformed rite (1972) and the provisional English edition (1973). As in all other rites of the post–Vatican II reformed liturgy this sacrament, even when celebrated outside Mass, always includes some proclamation of the word of God. The ritual elements specific and integral to this sacrament are: the prayer of faith, which takes the form of a litany; the priest's laying on of hands, which indicates that the particular person for whom the sacrament is being celebrated is the object of the Church's prayer; and the anointing with the oil of the sick.

While the priest anoints the forehead of the sick person he says: "Through this holy anointing may the Lord in his love and mercy help you with the grace of the Holy Spirit." Then the priest anoints the sick person's hands while saying: "May the Lord who frees you from sin save you and raise you up." These anointings and sentences comprise the essential matter and form of the sacrament. Particularly positive elements of the reformed rite are the thanksgiving over blessed oil or the provision for the priest to bless a fresh supply of the oil of the sick when it is not otherwise available.

ISSUES OF PASTORAL CARE

Contemporary pastoral theology and the insights of the human sciences make us more aware of the needs of the sick and their families and communities, needs to which the Church must attend if the Anointing of the Sick is to be experienced as an authentic element of Christian healing. Sickness places human beings into a state of isolation. The daily fabric of life is altered and broken. Because of this, relationships change: spouses and children go untended, work commitments suffer, ministries are neglected.

The Church's tradition of pastoral care for the sick sets these experiences within a context of faith. This is necessary because the more serious and disorienting the illness, the more it is experiences by the sick and those close to them as an experience of evil and a test of their faith, hope, and love. Thus Anointing of the Sick has never been envisioned as a sacramental event separated from a broader process of pastoral care. It must be stressed that the reformed rite presumes that in nonemergency situations the normal order of rites will be visits to the sick, Communion calls, and, only after the community's ministers have also attended to the sick persons' sense of isolation and concern for those most intimately affected by their illness, the full celebration of the rite for the Anointing of the Sick.

A priest administers the sacrament of Anointing of the Sick in a communal ceremony in church. As he anoints the woman's forehead, he says the words, "Through this holy anointing . . ."

The popular acceptance of this reformed rite has raised a more specific question about who may be anointed. The shift from the perception of this sacrament as a rite for those in danger of death to one for people who are seriously ill has given rise to situations in which there come forward for Anointing, especially at communal Anointing rites celebrated in churches, people who are victims of substance addictions, of temporary or long-standing mental disturbance, or in need of "inner healing." Through and in this rite the Church addresses God's healing and forgiving word and sacramental symbols to those whose actual physical affliction is so serious that their lives and the lives of those near to them need consciously and in a very specific way to find new meaning in terms of the paschal suffering of Jesus Christ. Thus one does not anoint a soldier about to undertake a particularly dangerous mission. Anointing is not meant to replace other sacraments and/or forms of pastoral care such as pastoral counseling, the sacrament of Reconciliation or simpler forms of prayer, or the laying on of hands and blessing.

See also anointing; death and dying; healing; holy oils; oil of the sick; sacrament; Viaticum.

Bibliography

Ahlstrom, Michael, Peter Gilmour, and Robert Tuzik. A Companion to Pastoral Care of the Sick. Chicago: Liturgy Training Publications, 1990.

Fink, Peter. Anointing of the Sick. Vol. 7: Alternative Futures for Worship. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1987.

Gusmer, Charles W. And You Visited Me: Sacramental Ministry to the Sick and the Dying. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1984.

ANDREW D. CIFERNI

anonymous Christianity, a term that describes, from within Christian theology, the positive possibility for the salvation of non-Christians. In general, this term reconciles the Christian claim of the necessity of Christ for salvation with the Christian acknowledgment of God's will for the salvation of all.

As proposed by Karl Rahner (d. 1984), the term is an application of his assertion that humanity has a fundamental transcendental orientation. Any choice for the good, in this view, implies some already operative understanding of, and assent to, the reality of divine revelation. The substance of this term, although not the term itself, appears in the work of Rahner's contemporaries Henri de Lubac (d. 1991) and Hans Urs von Balthasar (d. 1988) and in the documents of Vatican II.

The term "anonymous Christianity" has proven unhelpful in dialogues between Christians and non-Christians, as it is seen by the latter as evidence of a profound paternalism. The term implies that the most significant insights of non-Christian belief systems are, in some a priori sense, Christian. The term is of value only in its original context: it asserts the universality of grace while maintaining that, for Christian theology, grace is always the self-gift of the God of Jesus Christ. See also salvation outside the Church; universal salvific will of God.

Anselm of Canterbury, St., ca. 1033–1109, monk, theologian, and archbishop of Canterbury. Born in Lombardy, he entered the Norman monastery of Bec, where he studied under Lanfranc, eventually serving as prior and then abbot. He succeeded Lanfranc as archbishop of Canterbury (1093). Disagreement about the rights of investiture made relations with the English king difficult, and Anselm spent much of his tenure on the Continent seeking the support of the pope and others.

Anselm was a prolific author of letters, prayers, and theological treatises, and his theological reflections continue to fascinate Catholic and Protestant alike. In his Proslogion (1077–78), for example, he advances what has come to be called the "ontological argument" for the existence of God. The Cur Deus Homo (Lat., "Why God Became Man"), written after he became archbishop, describes Christ's death on the cross as an act of satisfaction, returning to God the honor stolen by human sin. His The Procession of the Holy Spirit (1102) rehearses arguments on the double procession of the Holy Spirit that he employed at the Council of Bari, called to restore the Eastern churches to unity with the West.

Anselm of Canterbury, famous for his succinct definition of theology as "faith seeking understanding"; a school of Della Robbia ceramic, Museo della Collegiata, Empoli, Italy.

Other treatises written toward the end of his life sought to define free will and to show the compatibility of human freedom with divine grace, providence, and predestination. Anselm characterized his theological work as "faith seeking understanding." Beginning with the affirmation of faith, he sought through argument a firmer grasp and deeper appreciation of truths that at the end of the process continued to be held by faith.

Despite the shared commitment to the principled use of reason in theological inquiry, Anselm is only imperfectly styled the "first of the Scholastics." Anselm concentrated on discrete problems, eschewing the construction of comprehensive statements of Christian faith associated with later Scholastics such as Aquinas. Nor did he attempt to adjudicate among conflicting scriptural, patristic, and ecclesiastical authoritative texts, preferring to offer his theology directly in his own voice. Feast day: April 21. See also Canterbury; Scholasticism.

JOSEPH WAWRYKOW

Anselm of Laon, d. 1117, theologian. Perhaps a student of Anselm of Canterbury at Bec, he later established a school at Laon with his brother Randolph that attracted scholars such as William of Champeaux and Peter Abelard. Anselm's writings are known through quotations by his students; these indicate that in his comments on the Bible he summarized the Church Fathers on specific verses and adjudicated their differences. He participated in the development of the quaestio (the process of raising theological questions) as part of biblical commentary and contributed by his work on Paul and the Psalter to the medieval textbook of biblical commentary known as the Glossa Ordinaria. See also Glossa Ordinaria; Scripture, interpretation of.

Ansgar, St., 801–65, bishop and missionary. A Benedictine, he labored in both Denmark and Sweden and is regarded as the Apostle of Scandinavia. Feast day: February 3. See also Scandinavia, Catholicism in.

Ansovinus, St., d. 840, Italian-born hermit and bishop of Camerino, protector of crops. Feast day: March 13.

Anthony Claret, St., 1801–70, bishop and missionary. A Spaniard, he labored in Cuba until his return to Spain as royal confessor. He founded the Claretians, a religious congregation. Feast day: October 24. See also Claretians.

Anthony of Egypt, St., ca. 251–356, often called Anthony the Great or Antony, an early Coptic solitary in Egypt who was considered the prototype of the hermit. Born of prosperous peasant stock, he became a hermit in early adulthood near his home and later retired into the deep desert. Eventually many disciples gathered around him for spiritual guidance. Biographical details rely heavily on the almost contemporary, but stylized, Life of Antony, written ca. 357 by the theologian Athanasius of Alexandria. This widely read work turned Anthony into the hero of early monasticism, the "father of monks." He is the classic representative of the solitary version of early monasticism in Lower Egypt. Solitude was moderated, however, as hermits were accessible to each other and to visitors, including pilgrims, and as they exercised an important social role. Anthony seems to have visited Alexandria at least twice in support of the local church.

The inspiration for his life of withdrawal was not extreme asceticism but radical simplicity, poverty, and charity in imitation of Christ. The anecdotes and words of advice of the desert solitaries, women and men, are preserved in collections known as the Sayings of the Fathers. About a thousand of these sayings are considered authentic, of which almost forty probably date back to Anthony himself. Feast day: January 17. See also hermit; monasticism.

Anthony of Egypt, the first of the Church's hermits and generally regarded as a founder of monasticism; eighteenth-century painting in the Pitti Palace, Florence.

Anthony of Padua, St., ca. 1191–1231, Franciscan friar, preacher, and Doctor of the Church. Born in Lisbon, probably of a family of Crusader knights, Anthony joined the Augustinian Canons Regular as a young man, receiving an excellent theological education at Coimbra. When the remains of the first missionary martyrs of the new Franciscan order were brought there for burial in 1220, Anthony was inspired to follow their example; he transferred to the Friars Minor and sailed for North Africa. Forced to return to Europe due to ill health, he arrived in Italy in 1221 and was assigned to the province of the Romagna, a region in which heretical groups were very active. Anthony's exceptional skills as a preacher and scholar quickly brought him into prominence and he was granted permission by Francis to teach theology to the friars. From 1224 to 1227 he was engaged in a similar mission in southern France. Returning to northern Italy, for the next four years he enjoyed extraordinary success as a preacher. His sermons, which reveal a profound knowledge of Scripture, often focused on social problems.

Anthony of Padua, regarded as one of the greatest preachers of all time, with the biblical word of God; fifteenth-century painting by Alvise Vivarini, Correr Museum, Venice.

Anthony died at Padua in 1231, where a great popular devotion to him sprang up; he was canonized less than a year after his death. Numerous miracles were attributed to him, and he enjoys to this day the reputation as a wonder-worker. His concern for the poor is recalled in the practice of St. Anthony's Bread, contributions from which are devoted to the relief of the needy. Feast day: June 13. See also Franciscan order.

Anthony Zaccaria, St., 1502–39, priest. A popular preacher from Cremona (Italy), he founded the Barnabites. Feast day: July 5. See also Barnabites.

anthropic principle, philosophical idea emanating from contemporary scientific cosmology holding that the universe is peculiarly oriented toward life and consciousness—in the sense that all the conditions for their possibility have been fulfilled. Its apparent triviality is balanced by the recognition that there are thousands of different physical characteristics of the universe and of the laws that describe the processes within it which, if just slightly changed, would render the universe inhospitable to life as we know it. Thus, the laws that describe reality seem to have been "fine tuned" to produce life. Cosmological models are severely limited by such conditions. From a scientific point of view, however, anthropic constraints do not add to those already given in physical and astronomical observations and measurements. But many scientists and philosophers assert that such fine-tuning demands an explanation, and some have proposed arguments for the existence of God based on these observations and measurements. Others go so far as to suggest that our presence, and the presence of life, is the explanation for the universe being the way it is. But this can only be understood in a teleological sense, which is outside the competency of the sciences. From a philosophical point of view it is unclear what can be validly concluded from these tantalizing physical coincidences. A valuable source book is The Anthropic Cosmological Principle, by John D. Barrow and Frank J. Tipler (New York: Oxford University Press, 1986). See also cosmology; five ways of St. Thomas Aquinas; God; philosophy and theology.

anthropology, theological, critical reflection on the origin, purpose, and destiny of human life in the light of Christian belief. In distinction from cultural and physical anthropology, which, as disciplines of a social science, undertake empirical analyses of specific human societies, theological anthropology employs a variety of methods (e.g., transcendental reflection, historical investigation, phenomenological inquiry) in its study of Scripture, the Jewish-Christian tradition, the findings of the social sciences, contemporary life and thought (e.g., philosophy), and the Church's current experience (e.g., worship, communal life, and service). Its primary questions include the following: In the perspective of Christian faith, what does it mean to be a human being, to be made "in the image and likeness of God" (Gen 1:26–27)? How are we to understand evil and sin, as attested to in the Bible (e.g., Gen 3:1–13; 4:8) and experienced by people today? In what ways does God's grace enter into human life, and how is human existence potentially open to God's love and self-disclosure? What is it about being human that points toward the incarnation and redemption of Jesus Christ? In addressing these kinds of questions theological anthropology treats such topics as creation, grace, personal existence, freedom, sin, redemption, history, and the Beatific Vision. As evident in the writings of Augustine (d. 430), Anselm (d. 1109), and Aquinas (d. 1274), theological anthropology has always been a major area within theology. Nevertheless, many theologians would now say that since the Enlightenment and modernity's emphasis on the knowing subject, theological anthropology must be theology's foundation, as it is in the work of Friedrich Schleiermacher (d. 1834) and Karl Rahner (d. 1984). See also grace; human nature; theology. ROBERT A. KRIEG

anthropomorphism, the practice of attributing human characteristics to the deity. Common in all theistic religions, anthropomorphism was offset in Israel by the prohibition of making an image of Yahweh and thereby seeking to exercise some measure of control over him. Analogous and metaphorical language in speaking about God was, nevertheless, inevitable; hence the frequent allusions to, e.g., God's face, eyes, hands, and to God's seeing, hearing, touching, smelling. Some sources, especially the Yahwist (J), are particularly replete with anthropomorphisms, e.g., God walking in the cool of the day (Gen 3:8) or closing the door of the ark after Noah had entered (Gen 7:16). Human emotions, e.g., pity and anger, are also attributed to God (Hos 1:6–7; 8:5), but these should more properly be called anthropopathisms.

anti-Catholicism, prejudice toward Catholicism as an institutional entity. Such prejudice has taken a number of different forms. Post-Enlightenment Europe saw contempt for the ancient Church spawned by the rise of deism and rationalism and taking the form of anticlericalism and/or laws enforcing secular control over schools and charitable institutions once in the hands of the Church. Such attitudes resulted in restrictive legislation over the Church (e.g., priests were forbidden to wear clerical garb in Mexico after 1929) and expulsion of religious orders (e.g., the Jesuits were expelled from Portugal in 1759 and from Spain and its empire in 1767 and were finally suppressed in 1773). Sometimes anti-Catholic sentiments were based on nationalist sentiments as, for example, in post-Reformation England, where Catholicism was seen as "unpatriotically subversive," or in the nineteenth-century United States (with the torching of the Ursuline convent in Charlestown, Massachusetts, in 1834), where "nativism" identified Catholicism with immigrants who were thought to be "un-American." Strains of this prejudice exist down to the present day among, for example, extremist groups like the Ku Klux Klan. It also manifested itself in the 1928 U.S. presidential election, in which New York's Governor Alfred E. Smith was the first Catholic to run for president, and again in 1960, when another Catholic, John F. Kennedy, was a candidate for president. Kennedy won in spite of public opposition from many Protestant ministers. Another form was distrust of the Catholic Church among some intellectuals either because of its perceived political power or because of its antimodern attitudes on issues like population control and the role of women in the Church. It perdures even in the United States, where anti-Catholicism has sometimes been referred to as the anti-Semitism of the intellectuals. Also, tensions exist because of past sociopolitical struggles (e.g., between Rome and the Byzantine East) or because Catholicism is identified with the West (as in some Muslim countries today, like Saudi Arabia and Iran, which restrict or forbid missionary activities).

Long-standing tensions between Catholics and other Christians provide a long history of anti-Catholic sentiments whose effects are mitigated by the recent emphasis on ecumenical dialogue. Because dialogue works both ways, Catholics have also begun to modify some of their own anti-Protestant and anti-Semitic sentiments, partially rooted in the beliefs that Protestants are heretics and Jews, "Christ-killers." A growing appreciation of the universal salvific will of God and of the Catholic Church's own share of responsibility for the existence of prejudice and intolerance have brought about a major change in attitude on all sides. See also anticlericalism. LAWRENCE CUNNINGHAM antichrist, a personified opponent of Christians and of the good who appears in the last times in early Christian apocalyptic theology. While usually thought of in connection with the book of Revelation, the name really occurs only in the Johannine Letters, but the idea is common in Jewish intertestamental literature and in the NT under a variety of names, especially Belial or Beliar (Heb., "wickedness," "worthlessness"; 2 Cor 6:15), perhaps Gog and Magog (Rev 20:8) or the beast (Rev 13:11–18), and perhaps the fourth beast in Dan 7. It is not clear in some texts whether the opponent is the devil or a human figure who represents the devil. In 2 Thess 2:8–9, "the lawless one" accompanies the work of the devil as sign of the last times. In the Johannine Letters, a knowledge of the antichrist is presumed and a group of persons is so labeled because they have seceded from the community (1 John 2:18–23; 4:3; 2 John 7–11) and teach false doctrines. The test applied here is whether they confess that Jesus is the Christ (1 John 2:22) come in the flesh (1 John 4:2; 2 John 7), so the opponents may have held a Gnostic theology of a spiritual Christ who did not really suffer. The number 666, the "number of the beast" (Rev 13:18), may have referred to Nero, but all other attempts to match specific historical figures with this passage, which does not even use the term "antichrist," are pointless. CAROLYN OSIEK anticlericalism, a state of mind and form of social behavior that reflect a negative attitude toward the clergy. Anticlericalism is found both within Catholicism and outside it and has at times been expressed in political movements directed against Catholicism.

Within Catholicism, anticlericalism first appeared during the Middle Ages. Widespread failure on the part of the clergy to bear credible witness to the gospel by their manner of life elicited criticism from Bernard of Clairvaux (d. 1153), as well as from later, more satirical sources like Erasmus (d. 1536).

Today, anticlericalism within Catholicism is coupled with a mistrust of, and hostility toward, perceived abuses within the institutional Church by a clergy who do not hold themselves accountable to those whom they are ordained to serve. Notably, at Vatican II (1962–65), Bishop De Smedt of Belgium protested against clericalism in his objections to the preliminary draft of the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, which he maintained was too clericalistic, triumphalistic, and juridical in its outlook. Subsequently, much anticlerical sentiment within Catholicism developed as a reaction against intransigent and patriarchal institutional structures and corresponding clerical patterns of behavior.

Anticlericalism outside of Catholicism is part of a larger antireligious impulse that targets highly visible religious structures. It views religion as an error (at best) or a danger (at worst) that must be eliminated for the good of society. The antireligious writings of Voltaire (d. 1778) epitomize perhaps the most vitriolic expressions of anticlerical sentiment.

The French Revolution transformed anticlericalism into a political program. Churches were closed and priests, religious, and lay believers were persecuted. The shifting political tides in nineteenth-century France rendered the position of clergy uncertain. The post-Napoleonic government remained hostile to clergy and, in particular, to Jesuits. In 1879 the French senate formally approved this hostility with a series of anticlerical laws.

Italy also experienced a wave of anticlerical sentiment in its efforts to unite as a single nation. Francesco Crispi generated much anticlerical sentiment in Italy and in Europe by arguing that the pope was the single greatest threat to European peace.

Portugal, Mexico, Spain (during its civil war), Germany (under the National Socialist, or Nazi, party), and the former Soviet Union also enacted programs of anticlericalism.

In some cases, of course, the anticlericalist reaction was at least partially justified. When the clergy becomes too closely identified with a repressive political regime, it suffers the punishments inflicted on the regime toppled by revolution. For this reason the Church now actively discourages its clergy from partisan political activities, urging them instead to be vigorous advocates of justice, human rights, and peace, regardless of the political regime (see, for example, Vatican II's Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, n. 76). See also clericalism. JAMES K. VOISS antidoron (ahn-tee' doh-rahn; Gk., "in place of the gift"), unconsecrated blessed bread left over from the prosphoras (eucharistic loaves) prepared during the Prothesis for use at the Byzantine-rite Eucharist. Distributed to the people at the end of the liturgy, for those who do not receive Communion it is "in place of the (consecrated) gifts." See also eulogia; Prothesis.

Antide Thouret, St. Joan, also known as Antida, 1765–1826, French-born founder of the Sisters of Charity of St. Joan Antide. She educated children, ministered to the poor and the sick, and hid priests from persecution by the French revolutionaries. Feast day: August 24.

antimension (an-ti-men'shuhn; Gk., "in place of the mensa, or table"), Byzantine-rite portable altar in the form of a cloth corporal with relics sewn into a small pocket. It usually bears the image of the burial of Jesus, with the Holy Week Triduum burial refrain inscribed around its borders. Always consecrated by a bishop, the antimension was originally destined for use only on unconsecrated altars. Now it is used, together with the eiliton, or Byzantine-rite corporal, on all altars, consecrated or not. Roman-rite priests sometimes adopt it as a portable altar in place of the cumbersome altar stone.

antinomianism, the claim that Christians have been freed by grace from observing the moral law.

This idea has been advanced at several times in the Church's history beginning with the misinterpretation of Paul (rejected by him, Rom. 3:8; 6:15), which understood his denial of the saving efficacy of Mosaic law and his emphasis on the gratuity of grace through faith in Christ as a rejection of the need to observe the moral commandments. Various Gnostic sects taught that the radical division between spirit and matter renders all bodily actions irrelevant to the life of the spirit, thus permitting all forms of licentiousness. See also moral theology.

Antioch, until the rise of Constantinople, the third most important city of the Roman Empire, after Rome and Alexandria. Founded in 300 B.C. by Seleucus I (son of Antiochus, whence its name), Antioch was famous for its magnificent public monuments, buildings, and streets. Its location in the fertile region of the Orontes River in Syria contributed to its prosperity. One of the earliest cities evangelized, with both Jewish and gentile converts (who had an uneasy coexistence according to Gal 1–2), it was the location where the name "Christian" was first used (Acts 11:19–26). Paul's first missionary journey was based there. The Christian community, like the city itself, was divided between Greek speakers and Syriac speakers.

By the time of Ignatius of Antioch, martyred ca. 107, the monoepiscopate seems to have been firmly in place in Antioch. Theophilus, bishop of Antioch, wrote his apology To Autolycus ca. 180, but his writings against Marcion and Hermogenes have not survived; nor have the writings of Serapion, bishop 199–ca. 211, apart from fragments. Origen visited the city, perhaps in the 220s, to meet with Julia Mammaea, mother of the emperor Alexander Severus. During the persecution of the Roman emperor Decius (249–51), the bishop Babylas was martyred; later, Paul of Samosata, bishop from 260, was deposed in 268 for heresy.

At the Council of Nicaea (325), Antioch was represented by its bishop, Eustathius. Its supermetropolitan privileges, fourth after Rome, Constantinople, and Alexandria, were confirmed by can. 6, thus ensuring its status as one of the five patriarchates of the imperial Church (with Jerusalem, from 451, as fifth). Shortly thereafter Eustathius was deposed and exiled (ca. 327) and an Arian bishop installed in his place. A party loyal to Eustathius broke off and remained in schism even in 360, when the anti-Arian Melitius was elected. Melitius was immediately exiled by the emperor Constantius after an openly anti-Arian inaugural homily. When he returned in 362 he found the Eustathians had secured the consecration of a priest, Paulinus, by Lucifer of Cagliari. There were now three rival communities, the Melitian majority and the Eustathian and pro-Arian minorities. Melitius, who presided at the First Council of Constantinople (381) until his death, had the support of the East, while Paulinus and, for a time, his successor Evagrius (388–93) had the support of Egypt and the West, until in 398 the West recognized Flavian, Melitius's successor, as had Theophilus of Alexandria somewhat earlier. The schism persisted until 413 (although no successor to Evagrius was ever appointed); a small group of schismatics would not be reconciled until much later (ca. 482).

Antioch's theological distinction rests on the contributions to scriptural interpretation and preaching by the group of theologians collectively known as the Antiochene "school." Their ardent defense of a "two-nature" Christology was ultimately vindicated at the Council of Chalcedon (451), but Monophysite resistance to Chalcedon spread from Egypt and eventually reached Antioch itself. Severus of Antioch, a moderate Monophysite, was installed as bishop by the emperor Anastasius in 512. He was deposed by Justin I in 518, but due to the efforts of Jacob Baradaeus (ca. 500–78), a strong Monophysite church was established in Asia Minor and Syria. The Persians, who took the city in 540 and again in 611, encouraged the Monophysites; when the Muslims conquered Syria in the seventh century, they found at Antioch a church weakened by division between Jacobite (Syrian Christians who rejected the Council of Chalcedon) and the orthodox, or "Melchite," churches. The city fell to them ca. 637–38. See also Antioch, school of; Ignatius of Antioch, St.

JOHN C. CAVADINI

Antioch, school of, designation for an exegetical and theological tradition centered at Antioch (on the Orontes in Syria) that emphasized the literal interpretation of Scripture and the humanity of Christ. The Antiochene tradition received its classical form and mature articulation in the late fourth and early fifth centuries, but its roots are evident earlier. Paul of Samosata, bishop from 260 until deposed for heresy in 268, taught that Mary gave birth not to the "Word" but to a complete human being, Jesus, whom the Spirit indwelt as in a temple from the time of his baptism. There is no preexistent "Son," only the Logos/Spirit, homoousios (Gk., "of one substance") with the Father—by this Paul meant to deny hypostatic distinctions within the inner life of God. It is likely that Lucian of Antioch (d. 312), one of whose pupils was Arius, advanced his own teaching, which gave the Logos some hypostatic, if subordinate, independence from the Father, against Paul. Lucian, also an excellent biblical scholar, edited the text of the Greek Bible and emphasized a literalist approach to interpretation, later taken up by Eustathius, bishop ca. 324–27, whose sole surviving work, On the Witch of Endor, argues against the allegorizing of Origen. Eustathius, however, was an ardent anti-Arian who returned to a modified Monarchianism related to Paul's and defended the Council of Nicaea on that basis.

In fact, theologically speaking, the Antiochene school received its classical form as a result of its continuing polemic against Arianism. Eustathius had already critiqued Arianism by rejecting the Alexandrian "Word/flesh" Christology it presupposed. The Christ was not simply the Word incarnate or appearing in flesh, but a complete human being indwelt by God's Word (a moderated version of Paul of Samosata's Christology). Diodore of Tarsus (d. ca. 390) and especially his pupil Theodore of Mopsuestia (ca. 350–428) continued to develop this "Word/Man" Christology, countering Arian usage of passages that emphasized Jesus' weakness by arguing that they referred not to the Logos, who was homoousios with the Father and therefore equally God, but to the human being Jesus whom the Logos indwelt as in a temple. This man truly grew in wisdom (Luke 2:52), truly did not know the time of the last judgment (Mark 13:32), etc.; he was the true subject of the predicates of weakness and growth made in the Gospels. Perfectly assumed by the Logos, fully anointed by the Holy Spirit, he truly was the Son of God.

As an ambassador for this Christology, Nestorius (d. ca. 451, patriarch of Constantinople, 428–31) overstated his case, seeming to separate the two subjects in Christ altogether. He was condemned (Council of Ephesus, 431), although the more moderate form of the Antiochene tradition was ably represented by John (d. 441), bishop of Antioch from 429, who was able to compromise with Cyril of Alexandria, and Theodoret of Cyrrhus (ca. 393–ca. 466, bishop from 423), a brilliant exegete, apologist, and theologian who ultimately anathematized Nestorius at the Council of Chalcedon (451). All of these theologians and in addition the Antiochene school's most brilliant and beloved preacher, John Chrysostom (ca. 347–407), retained the school's characteristic preference for the literal sense of the text, seeking to solve difficulties in interpretation not on the basis of allegory but by paying close attention to literary style and rhetorical form, to the individual characteristics and peculiarities of the various biblical books, historical circumstance of the writer, and so forth. See also Alexandria, school of; Christology; Chrysostom, St. John; Ephesus, Council of; John of Antioch; Logos; Lucian of Antioch, St; Nestorianism; Paul of Samasota. JOHN C. CAVADINI

Antiochene rite, the liturgical usages that developed around the metropolis of Antioch (Antakiya in southernmost Turkey, near the coast), main center of ecclesiastical culture and liturgical diffusion in the entire prefecture of Orient, which stretched from Syria through Asia Minor to Thrace (present European Turkey). First seen ca. 380 in patristic documents from the environs of Antioch like the Apostolic Constitutions and the homilies of John Chrysostom (who was a preacher there before he became bishop of Constantinople in 398), the ancient Antiochene liturgical foundations are still clearly visible in the Antiochene-based Armenian, Byzantine, and West Syrian rites and, for certain elements, in other traditions, too. Today the classical Antiochene anaphoral structure (presanctus, sanctus, postsanctus with institution narrative, command to repeat, anamnesis, oblation, epiclesis, intercessions) is often considered an ideal model, and attempts have been made to revive elements of Antiochene cathedral offices, too. See also Eastern rites; rite.

Antipas, St. (an'ti-pahs), an early Christian martyr. According to Rev 2:13, Antipas was a "faithful witness" slain at Pergamum in Asia Minor. Feast day: April 11.

antiphon (an'tih-fahn; Gk., antiphones, "responsively"), a short verse, usually from the Bible, sung at the beginning and end of psalms or canticles or as a refrain between verses. Marian antiphons are not associated with the Psalter, but with devotion to Mary, and are sung at the conclusion of Evening Prayer in the Liturgy of the Hours. The best-known Marian antiphons are the Salve Regina (Lat., "Hail Holy Queen"), Alma Redemptoris Mater ("Loving Mother of the Redeemer"), Ave Regina Coelorum ("Hail Queen of Heaven"), and Regina Coeli ("Heavenly Queen [Rejoice]"). Several antiphons are tied to liturgical processions on special feast days: Pueri antiphonal, a responsorial style of singing used in the liturgy. Two choirs of equal strength chant alternating verses of a psalm or canticle. Antiphonal, or antiphonary, also refers to the liturgical book that contains all the parts of the Liturgy of the Hours sung in choir. See also antiphon.

Hebraeorum ("Children of the Hebrews") on Palm Sunday and Lumen Gentium ("Light of the nations") on Presentation of the Lord (February 2).

antipope, an individual whose claim to be pope is rejected by the Church as invalid. Although this definition is relatively straightforward, it is difficult to apply in practice, because guidelines as to what exactly constitutes an invalid claim to the papacy have fluctuated. Correct election is not an unambiguous indicator: the rules for papal elections have changed over time, and in some cases these rules have been bypassed. Innocent II (1130–43), for example, was elected by a minority of cardinals in a clandestine meeting but is considered a pope. Nor is personal sanctity a definitive factor: the martyr and saint Hippolytus (217–ca. 235) is considered the first antipope, while a legitimate pope, John XII (955–64), was excommunicated and deposed by a Roman synod for gross immorality. See also pope.

anti-Semitism, although the word "Semite" refers to Arabs as well as Jews, a term that has come to mean opposition to Jews specifically. It can take any form from discrimination to the systematic arrest and extermination associated with the Nazis during the Second World War.

Theories about why anti-Semitism has persisted include the Jewish claim to exclusivity as God's chosen people and Jewish dedication to the Law, which isolated them from the society and culture in which they lived.

In the first century the relationship between Judaism and Christianity broke down with the destruction of the Temple and the expulsion of the Christian community from the synagogue. Jewish Christianity became numerically insignificant while the numbers of gentile Christians increased. Throughout the centuries, the relationship of the Church towards anti-Semitism has been both positive and negative. Two faiths, both of which lay claim to exclusive election by the one true God, may find themselves unavoidably in conflict. After Constantine's conversion in 312 and the subsequent links between Church and state, the Jews were regarded as anti-Christian and, therefore, a threat.

LIST OF ANTIPOPES

If an antipope shares the same name and number as a legitimate pope, his number is given in parentheses. The dagger symbol following the dates indicates that there is a separate entry on that particular antipope elsewhere in the encyclopedia.

ANTIPOPE	DATES
St. Hippolytus	217-35†
Novatian	251–58
Felix II	355–65
Ursinus	366–67
Eulalius	418–19
Lawrence	498–99, 501–506
Dioscorus	530
Paschal	687
Theodore	687
Constantine	767–68
Philip	768
John	844
Anastasius Bibliothecarius	855†
Christopher	903–904
Boniface VII	974, 984–85
John XVI	997–98
Gregory (VI)	1012
Benedict X	1058–59
Honorius (II)	1061–64
Clement (III)	1080, 1084–1100
Theodoric	1100–101
Albert	1101
Sylvester IV	1105–11
Gregory (VIII)	1118–21
Celestine (II)	1124
Anacletus II	1130–38
Victor IV*	1138
Victor IV*	1159–64
Paschal III	1164–68
Callistus (III)	1168–78
Innocent (III)	1179–80
Nicholas (V)	1328–30
Clement (VII)	1378–94
Benedict (XIII)	1394–1417
Alexander V	1409–10†
John (XXIII)	1410–15†
Clement (VIII)	1423–29
Benedict (XIV)	1425–?
Felix V	1439–49

*Note that there are two Victor IVs among the antipopes. The second Victor IV took no note of the first one because he was "in office" less than two months.

More recently, from popes Leo XIII in 1880 to Benedict XV in 1916 to an official statement by the Holy Office in 1928, anti-Semitism as well as racism in every form has been condemned by the Church. At the Second Vatican Council the Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions (Nostra Aetate, 1965) stated that "The Church . . . decries hatred, persecution, displays of anti-Semitism, directed against Jews at any time and by anyone" (n. 4). See also Jews, Catholicism and.

KATHERINE S. BARRETT

Antonelli, Giacomo (jah'koh-moh an-tuh-nel' ee), 1806–76, cardinal and papal Secretary of State to Pope Pius IX, 1850–76. He exerted conservative, Ultramontane influence on papal policy, although he opposed the summoning of Vatican I (1869) and thought any statement on papal infallibility unwise. Ordained to the diaconate but not the priesthood, he was more a temporal than a religious leader. As temporal ruler of Rome until 1870, he was nicknamed the "Red Pope." See also Pius IX; Ultramontanism.

Antonia of Florence, St., ca. 1400–1472, Franciscan tertiary and then superior consecutively of three convents in Italy, including the convent of Corpus Christi from 1447 to 1454. Feast day: February 28.

Antoninus of Florence, St., 1389–1459, Dominican, founder in 1436 of San Marco Convent at Florence, and archbishop of Florence from 1446. He was well known for his aid to the poor and to the victims of plagues and famines; his writings on moral theology and canon law were highly influential. Feast day: May 10.

Antony of Egypt, St. See Anthony of Egypt, St.

Antony of Padua, St. See Anthony of Padua, St.

Aphraates, St. (ah-fray'teez), d. ca. 345, ascetic and cleric, earliest known Christian writer in Persia, and first of the Syriac Church Fathers. Twenty-three of his sermons, called "Demonstrations," are preserved. They attest to his belief in the triune God, Christ's victory over Satan, the Real Presence, and the value of asceticism, especially celibacy. Feast day: April 7.

apocalypse (uh-pahk'uh-lips; Gk., "revelation," "unveiling"), a type of revelatory literature. As a literary form, it designates ancient works similar to the Apocalypse, or Revelation, the last book in the canonical order of the NT. Such works typically describe the process through which a human visionary receives secret knowledge about the future and the cosmos from a heavenly being. The revealing figure is usually an angel in Jewish apocalypses and the risen Christ in Christian works. The revelation is often given through symbolic visions or journeys to heaven or other places normally inaccessible to humanity.

Symbolic visions are characteristic of the apocalypses that show an interest in history and emphasize its fulfillment. Both of the canonical apocalypses, Daniel in the OT and Revelation in the NT, belong to this group. Daniel was written in response to the persecution of the Jewish people by Antiochus Epiphanes in the second century B.C. and reviews history from the Babylonian captivity until the end. Revelation was written to articulate the Christian vision of reality in opposition to the ethos of the Roman Empire.

Tours of heaven or the hidden regions of the cosmos are typical of apocalypses that emphasize the heavenly destiny of holy human beings, such as the Jewish work known as the Book of the Watchers, preserved in a collection of apocalypses attributed to Enoch (Ethiopic Enoch or 1 Enoch). A Christian example is the Ascension of Isaiah, according to which thrones and crowns await the righteous in heaven. See also apocalypticism.

ADELA Y. COLLINS

apocalypticism (uh-pahk-ah-lip'ti-si-uhm), a view of the world that emerged in Judaism during the Hellenistic period and had a formative influence on early Christianity. It takes its name from the literary genre "apocalypse," and more specifically from the Apocalypse, or book of Revelation, in the NT. Apocalypses are revelations and take the form of either symbolic visions or tours of heaven. In either case, the meaning of the revelation is typically explained by an angel. The content of the revelation involves both the secrets of the heavenly world and the eschatological future, especially the judgment of the dead. Some apocalypses incline more to the mystical exploration of the heavenly world, others to the future course of history. The latter type, the historical apocalypses, are the only ones represented in the Bible, in the books of Daniel and Revelation. Other apocalypses are attributed to Enoch, Adam, Moses, Abraham, Ezra, and Baruch. It is typical of these books that they are assigned to famous ancient figures, and that the real authors are not named. The Apocalypse of John is an exception in this regard, but later Christians composed apocalypses in the names of Peter, Paul, Mary, and others. The impact of apocalypticism on Judaism around the turn of the era can be seen in the Dead Sea Scrolls, which anticipate a final battle between the forces of light and darkness. It can also be seen in early Christianity. The expectation that Jesus would come as the Son of Man on the clouds of heaven was prompted directly by Dan 7. Paul's notion that Jesus was risen as the first fruits of a general resurrection (1 Cor 15) presupposes an apocalyptic view of history. The apocalyptic element in Christianity was submerged by philosophical concerns in the works of the Church Fathers, but flourished in some circles throughout the Middle Ages (Joachim of Fiore in the thirteenth century is a famous example). See also apocalypse; Joachim of Fiore. JOHN J. COLLINS apocatastasis (un-pahk'uh-tuh-stay'sis; Gk., "restoration"), universal salvation. This term comes from late Jewish prophetic and apocalyptic literature, where it expressed the hope for the restored unity and security the Messiah would bring to Israel (e.g., Mal 4.6 [Septuagint: Mal 3.24]; Acts 3.21). In Christian theology, the term is mainly associated with Origen (d. 254), who used it to express his belief that all created spirits, including the demons, will ultimately be restored to the loving unity with God that was their original state. Although this hope was sharply criticized by many of Origen's opponents, it was shared by such later sympathizers as Gregory of Nazianzus, Gregory of Nyssa, and Ambrose of Milan. A synod held in Constantinople in 543, ratified by the Second Council of Constantinople (553), condemned the thesis that the punishment of sinners, angelic or human, is only temporary. The Catholic Church has understood this to mean one must not claim that the salvation of all is dogmatically certain; however, many modern theologians, Catholic and Protestant, hold one may and indeed should hope that all will be saved. See also salvation; universal salvific will of God.

Apocrypha (uh-pahk'rif-uh; Gk., "hidden things"), books of the OT that are not found in the Hebrew Bible but are included in the Latin Vulgate. There are fifteen such books, or portions of books: 1–2 Esdras, Tobit, Judith, Additions to Esther, Wisdom of Solomon, Sirach (Ecclesiasticus), Baruch, Letter of Jeremiah, Song of the Three Young Men and Prayer of Azariah, Susanna, Bel and the Dragon (these three are Additions to Daniel), Prayer of Manasseh, and 1–2 Maccabees. The Jewish canon was not closed until the late first century A.D. Prior to that time, a much larger body of writings enjoyed authority, and many of these were taken over by the early Christians. Clement of Alexandria cited Tobit, Sirach, and the Wisdom of Solomon as Scripture and Judith and 2 Maccabees as historical sources. Origen accepted Susanna and Tobit. Tertullian even cited the book of Enoch with approval. Jerome advocated the Hebraica veritas (Lat., "the Hebrew truth") and so did not regard these books as canonical. Nonetheless, he translated them and included them in the Vulgate. Augustine favored the larger canon, and his view prevailed through the Middle Ages. The Protestant Reformers denied the canonicity of these books, although they granted their value as spiritual reading. They were still included in the King James Version of 1611, but were frequently omitted in later printings. The Council of Trent declared them canonical in 1546, except for 1–2 Esdras and the Prayer of Manasseh, and this decision is still accepted by the Catholic Church. The disputed books are sometimes called "deuterocanonical." In addition to the books accepted by the Catholic Church, the Greek Orthodox Church accepts 1 Esdras, Psalm 151, the Prayer of Manasseh, and 3–4 Maccabees. The Russian Orthodox Church accepts 1–2 Esdras, Psalm 151, and 3 Maccabees. Modern ecumenical translations of the Bible, such as the New Revised Standard Version, regularly include all these books.

The Apocrypha are distinguished from other Jewish religious writings from the turn of the era that did not win canonical status in the Western Church. Some of these writings, such as the books of Enoch and Jubilees, were regarded as canonical in other churches, notably in Ethiopia. Many of them are classified under the heading pseudepigrapha. See also deuterocanonical books; pseudepigrapha apocryphal Gospels, Christian works that recount the life or sayings of Jesus but are not included in the NT. The production of such popular literature began in the first century but continued throughout the Middle Ages. The Infancy Gospel of Thomas, which portrays the child Jesus as a precocious miracle worker, survives in Greek, Syriac, Latin, and Slavonic. The distinct Gospel of Thomas, discovered at Nag Hammadi in 1945, contains 114 sayings of Jesus. Some sayings are familiar from canonical Gospels or patristic traditions; others were previously unknown. The Gospel of Peter, discovered in 1886, dramatically recounts the Passion, death, and Resurrection of Jesus. The Gospel of the Egyptians survives only in fragments, most in the work of Clement of Alexandria, who complains (Stromateis 3.63; 3.91) that the extremely ascetic Encratites used the work.

JOHN J. COLLINS

Patristic sources mention various Jewish-Christian Gospels. Jerome often cites a Gospel of the Nazareans, apparently an Aramaic text resembling Matthew. Epiphanius mentions a Gospel used by the Ebionites. Origen notes a Gospel of the Hebrews.

Papyrus fragments of unknown Gospels have been discovered in the last two centuries. The most important, Papyrus Egerton 2, contains accounts similar to John.

Some works were formally rejected by the Church, e.g., by the sixth-century Gelasian Decree, which lists Gospels of Matthias, Barnabas, James, Peter, Thomas, Bartholomew, and Andrew, forgeries of Lucian and Hesychius, and books about the childhood of Jesus. See also Decretum Gelasianum; gospel; infancy Gospels. HAROLD W. ATTRIDGE apodosis (ap-oh'dah-sis; Gk., "return, giving back"; Slav., otdanie), Byzantine-rite liturgical "closure" or concluding day of the festive periods (Gk., metheorta, "afterfeasts"). Like Western octaves, these periods follow the nine fixed feasts of the cycle of Twelve Great Feasts, solemnized with a forefeast (Gk., proeortion) of one day, except for Christmas (five days) and Epiphany (four), a metheorton of one to eight days, concluding with an apodosis.

Apollinarianism, composite of views based on the works of Apollinarius of Laodicea, emphasizing the unity of the person of Jesus Christ as one incarnate nature of the divine Logos, and thereby denying the existence of a human soul in him. Because of Apollinarius's literal interpretation of the Johannine text, "the Word became flesh," and because of his strong reaction against Arianism, he developed the Logos-flesh (Gk., sarx) model for the person of Christ, denying that Jesus had a human intellect or rational soul. Apollinarius held that the divine Logos became embodied in human flesh but that Jesus had only one nature. While Apollinarius's friend, Athanasius of Alexandria, never explicitly resolved in his writings the issue of a human center of life and consciousness in Jesus, Apollinarius flatly denied that Jesus had a human soul and two distinct natures. For this reason Apollinarianism was condemned as heresy in 381 by the Council of Constantinople. See also Christology; Incarnation, the; Jesus Christ; Logos.

Apollinaris of Hierapolis, St., apologist and bishop of Hierapolis during the reign of Emperor Marcus Aurelius (161–80), to whom he addressed an apology. All his works are lost. Feast day: January 8.

Apollinarius of Laodicea, ca. 310–ca. 390, theologian and bishop, whose denial of any human center of consciousness (soul) in Christ was condemned as heresy by the first Council of Constantinople (381). Apollinarius was twice excommunicated, once for giving hospitality to Athanasius of Alexandria. Apollinarius was later elected bishop of Laodicea (ca. 361) and became renowned for his opposition to Arianism. His Logos-flesh model of the person of Christ, however, was denounced by Basil of Caesarea and others. Some of Apollinarius's works survive under pseudonyms. See also Apollinarianism.

Apollonia, St., d. 249, deaconess martyred at Alexandria. After having teeth pulled out by torturers, she was burned alive. She is the patron saint of dentists. Feast day: February 9.

apologetics (Gk., apologia, "justification"), that part of theology which seeks to explain what believers do and think to those who do not share their fundamental commitment of faith. In the second century, Justin Martyr (d. 167) and others were called "Apologists" because of their effort to present Christianity to Greco-Roman culture; using the language and concepts of that culture they sought to explain the divinity of Jesus Christ.

One strategy of the apologist is to find a language common to all those concerned. In that language, one tries to show how the actions and the beliefs of faithful believers make sense. This tactic is not always a promising one, as Paul found out in Athens when he spoke to those assembled of God's "raising [Jesus] from the dead" (Acts 17:31). Their reaction could be called a normal human one to such a claim: derision. Yet one aim of apologetics is to alter the inclinations of unbelievers from a negative to at least an inquiring posture.

The second approach is to write about faith in a language accessible to as many people as possible, yet without hesitating to speak with the specific accents of a believer. The Trappist monk Thomas Merton (d. 1968) excelled in this form of apologetics and so made the life of faith accessible to many persons otherwise sceptical of it. But Merton made no "apologies" for his faith; he simply avoided all technical expressions and used images that could convey the depth of his commitment to those unable to use the language of faith.

A classic example of apologetics is Thomas Aquinas's five ways for the existence of God, offered at the beginning of the Summa Theologiae. Thomas clearly does not pretend to begin from a posture of no faith at all, but he does propose arguments accessible to rational persons to show how it is intelligible to believe that God exists. These "five ways" of Aquinas are not proofs that will always convince, but Thomas's intent to show that belief in God was not irrational can be appreciated.

When apologetics is seen as a strategy for persuading others of the reasonableness of one's faith, philosophy is usually considered to be the best tool for executing it. Yet philosophy means different things to different people, so there is no single line of demonstration to show the plausibility of faith. The other approach, that of Thomas Merton, shows that the language of evocative description is as valuable as strict philosophical argument. Apologetics may be more an art than a science, and its best practitioners have always been aware that faith is not the sort of thing that one can talk others into adopting. Human sensibilities can be addressed in a number of ways, any one of which may converge with others to help unbelievers glimpse something of the beauty and veracity of faith. See also faith and reason.

DAVID B. BURRELL

Apologists, those second- and third-century Christian writers who first developed whole works to the informed "defense" (Lat., apologia) of the faith in refutation of pagan accusations and the persecutions to which they gave rise. Among the Greeks, Quadratus's Apology (117–38) to the emperor Hadrian is lost, although fragments are preserved in Eusebius (Ecclesiastical History 5.3). Aristides' Apology (138–47) is best preserved in a Syriac translation. Justin Martyr, perhaps the most important of all the Apologists for subsequent theology, wrote his two Apologiae ca. 153 as well as the Dialogue with Trypho the Jew. Tatian, who studied with Justin, wrote a violently anti-Hellenistic Oration to the Greeks ca. 170, and Athenagoras wrote his Supplication to Marcus Aurelius ca. 177. From about the same time come the three-volume To Autolycus (ca. 180) by Theophilus of Antioch, lost works by Melito of Sardis and Apollinaris of Hierapolis, and, ca. 200, the anonymous Letter to Diognetus. Among Latin works, Tertullian's are the most prominent (Apology, To the Nations, To Scapula, all ca. 200), but the roughly contemporaneous Octavius of Minucius Felix, the seven books of Against the Nations of Arnobius (written ca. 303–10), and On the Deaths of the Persecutors (ca. 315) and The Divine Institutions (ca. 309), both works by Lactantius, are also important. Although some of the Apologists (Tatian, Tertullian, Arnobius, and to a lesser extent Lactantius) reject philosophy and denounce Greco-Roman civilization, most try to show the continuity between the best strands of the pagan philosophical tradition and the proclamation of the gospel, which is held to correct and fulfill them. Often, too, there is an extensive attempt to refute the specific charges (of cannibalism, incest, atheism, and misanthropy) customarily leveled against the Christians. See also apologetics; Justin Martyr, St.; Minucius Felix; Tertullian.

JOHN C. CAVADINI

apostasy (ah-pahs'tah-see; Lat., "defection"), the complete and public rejection of the faith into which one has been baptized and of all the Church's teaching. Apostasy is distinguished from heresy, by which one rejects a part of the Church's teaching while still claiming membership in the Church. According to Roman Catholic canon law, an unrepentant apostate is excluded from the sacraments.

The issue of apostasy and of the relationship between the apostate and the Christian community arose during the second century when some baptized Christians denied Christianity in the face of imprisonment and death. Their denial was considered both a failure in faith and a scandal to other Christians.

In the second and third centuries, some theologians taught that apostasy was an unforgivable sin, perhaps the sin against the Holy Spirit. According to their understanding, an apostate could not be readmitted to Christian communion. By the fourth century, when Christianity had gained public acceptance, the earlier opinion was no longer popular. Augustine of Hippo (d. 430) was a leader in the fight against the Donatists, who taught that Christians who had apostatized in order to avoid martyrdom needed to be rebaptized in order to return to the sacraments. Donatism was condemned as heretical. See also Donatism; heresy.

apostle (Gk., apostolos, "one who is sent out," "messenger"), a function or office within early Christianity. "Apostle" is used in the NT to refer to various individuals and groups in the early Church, and its meaning and the extent of its application were matters of dispute. Paul regularly described himself as an apostle (Rom 1:1; 1 Cor 1:1; 2 Cor 1:1; Gal 1:1). By it he meant someone who was specially called by God and sent out to preach the gospel, in his case particularly to the Gentiles (Rom 11:13). From Paul it is clear that other individual Christians and groups of Christians who had been similarly called and sent to preach the gospel were also recognized as apostles (Rom 16:7; 1 Cor 4:9; 9:5; 12:29; 15:7; 1 Thess 2:6). Paul was adamant, however, about denying the title to Christians who claimed to be apostles but who opposed his preaching (2 Cor 11:13), even though these opponents functioned in ways very similar to his. This same broad view of an apostle is also found in Didache 11.3–6, a Christian instruction from the late first century A.D. In the Pauline traditions of the late first century A.D., Paul continued to be seen as an apostle (e.g. Eph 1:1; 1 Tim 1:1). Paul also attests to a more restricted use of the term. In Gal 1:17–19 and 1 Cor 15:7 the term seems to be limited to a specific group of prominent Jewish-Christians in Jerusalem, perhaps identical with the Twelve (1 Cor 15:5). This more restricted use prevailed in the development of the synoptic tradition. Mark 6:30 seems to identify the "apostles" with "the Twelve" whom Jesus called in 3:13–19 and sent out two by two in 6:7–13. This identification is made quite clear in Matt 10:1 and Luke 6:13. All three synoptic Gospels and Acts give lists of the twelve apostles, although the lists are not in complete agreement (Mark 3:16–19; Matt 10:2–4; Luke 6:14–16; Acts 1:13). The symbolism of the twelve apostles emphasized the continuity of the early Church with the twelve tribes of Israel (Matt 19:28; Luke 22:30). Luke, however, in Acts significantly develops this restricted notion of the twelve apostles. According to him, after Jesus' ascension into heaven, the apostles met to cast lots to choose someone who would take the place of Judas and so bring the number of the apostles once again to twelve (Acts 1:15–26). The lot fell to Matthias. For Luke this new apostle had to be someone who had accompanied Jesus from his baptism by John until his Ascension and who would be a witness to his Resurrection (Acts 1:21–22). Because of this viewpoint Luke does not (with the exception of Acts 14:14) refer to Paul or early Christians other than the Twelve as apostles. In Acts the twelve apostles serve primarily as the group that approved of and ensured the continuity between Jesus and the Jerusalem church, on the one hand, and Paul and the gentile Christian churches of which Luke was a part, on the other hand. In the second century the apostles came to be seen as part of the inspired foundational stage of Christianity but no longer as a contemporary reality in the Church. The term was used primarily, although not exclusively, of the twelve apostles and Paul. Because the apostles were those who had had personal contact with Jesus, appeals were made to them and their authority as touchstones of authenticity during the controversies of the next several centuries. Such appeals were made by all sorts of Christian groups, whether considered ultimately "orthodox" or "heretical." Authorship by an apostle or a close associate of an apostle was one criterion for inclusion of a document in the canon of the NT; traditions were traced back to the apostles as a means of legitimation; the validity of the ministry and organization of various Christian communities was claimed on the basis of apostolic succession of the community leaders. See also disciple; Twelve, the.

THOMAS H. TOBIN

Apparition of the risen Christ to Peter (center) and the other apostles while they were fishing on the Sea of Galilee (John 21:4–8); Byzantine mosaic in the basilica of St. Apollinaris, Ravenna, Italy.

Apostles' Creed, creed according to legend written by the apostles themselves, but this view has been overturned since the research of Lorenzo Valla

THE APOSTLES' CREED

I believe in God, the Father almighty, Creator of heaven and earth.

And in Jesus Christ, his only Son, our Lord; who was conceived by the Holy Spirit, born of the Virgin Mary, suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, died, and was buried. He descended into hell; the third day he rose again from the dead; he ascended into heaven, sits at the right hand of God, the Father almighty; from thence he shall come to judge the living and the dead.

I believe in the Holy Spirit, the holy Catholic Church, the communion of saints, the forgiveness of sins, the resurrection of the body, and life everlasting. Amen.

(1405–57) and Reginald Pecock (ca. 1393–ca. 1461). Nevertheless, the legend does contain a truth: the creed's basic theological formulations date back to the first decades of the Church. Thus, in a loose sense, one can say that the creed conveys the "mind" or "intention" of the apostles.

Origins: The Apostles' Creed is clearly the fruit of the Christian tradition. The earliest text of the Apostles' Creed, as we know it, appears in a treatise Scarapus by the monk Pirminius (or Priminius, d. 753). The creed is, however, mentioned by name in a letter of Ambrose (Epistle 42.5) written in approximately 390. What Ambrose is referring to is the creed that developed out of the Old Roman Creed, which had taken shape by the end of the second century. This earlier statement of belief is evidenced within three sources: (1) the interrogatory creed for Baptism found in Hippolytus's Apostolic Tradition (ca. 215), (2) the creed given by Marcellus, the bishop of Ancyra, to Emperor Julius I (340), and (3) the commentary on the Apostles' Creed (ca. 404) by the monk Tyrannius Rufinus (345–410). In his commentary Rufinus includes the earliest continuous Latin text of the Apostles' Creed as confessed at the Church of Aquileia, and he also notes its differences from the Old Roman Creed. The emergence and authorization of the Apostles' Creed in the West may have occurred through its adoption by Charlemagne (742–814), who imposed it upon his empire. Its widespread use may then have led to Rome's approval of this creedal form.

Structure and Content: The Apostles' Creed is determined by the trinitarian form of 2 Cor 13:13 and Matt 28:19, the form that shapes, too, the Old Roman Creed, the interrogatory creed, the creed of Marcellus, and Rufinus's creed.

The first article, on God, affirms the OT understanding of God as the only God (Deut 6:4–5), who is appropriately spoken of in personal terms and is both transcendent and immanent in history. The second article, on Jesus Christ, incorporates the Church's earliest Christological confessions: Jesus is the "Christ" (Acts 2:36), the "Lord" (1 Cor 12:3), and the "Son of God" (cf. Acts 9:20). It also recites the narrative of the Christ kerygma (1 Cor 15:3–7; Acts 13:16–41). It goes beyond these early proclamations by specifying that this is God's "only Son," that his conception occurred through the "Holy Spirit," and that he "descended into hell." This last clause is not found in the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed.

The third article, on the Holy Spirit, highlights the Spirit's activity in history and in eternity. Unlike the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed, it mentions neither the Spirit's personal existence, nor theSpirit's relation to the Father and the Son. But it does include the clause on the communion of saints, which is not found in the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed.

The overall structure is, therefore, trinitarian, confessing belief in the Father, Son, and the Holy Spirit. It sets the kerygmatic narrative within confessional statements that are both self-involving (i.e., "I believe") and propositional (i.e., declarative statements about the triune God). The Apostles' Creed is terser than the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed but possesses less doctrinal precision.

Function: Since the Old Roman Creed functioned in the baptismal rite beginning in the second century, it is not surprising to learn from Rufinus that the Apostles' Creed was employed at baptisms in the church at Aquileia in the fifth century. It is likely, then, that in the West a version of the Apostles' Creed was being confessed at baptisms and used in catechetical instruction at least by the early 400s. In the Western Church, too, it was recited between the seventh and ninth centuries in the Divine Office, and, since then, it has frequently been recited by the faithful in their daily prayers. By the Middle Ages, the Church in the West was using the full version of the Apostles' Creed at baptisms. Nevertheless, at the Council of Florence (1438–45) Church representatives of the East stated that they had never heard of the Apostles' Creed. Today, the Catholic Church permits the Apostles' Creed to be recited at Masses for children in place of the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed. Moreover, ecumenical discussions have considered the proposal that the Apostles' Creed be regarded as the binding formulation of the Christian faith. See also creeds.

ROBERT A. KRIEG

Apostleship of Prayer, an association of Catholics whose purpose is to foster special devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus. Founded in Vals, France, in 1844 by Francis Gautrelet, a Jesuit, the organization promotes unity among its members through prayer for special monthly intentions. The apostleship publishes the Messenger of the Sacred Heart. See also Sacred Heart, devotion to the.

apostolate, the saving mission of Christ in the world and the participation of Christian faithful in that mission through different roles and functions. Members of the Church hierarchy are designated for participation in, and moderation of, the apostolate through ordination. Laity are called to apostolic participation through Baptism and Confirmation and are commissioned to this task by the Lord himself (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n.33). Spouses and parents participate through marriage, while members of institutes of consecrated life and societies of apostolic life, as well as other Christian faithful, exercise the apostolate through both charism (charismatic gifts) and specific ecclesiastical mandate. See also Church; laity.

Apostolicae Curae (a-poh-stoh'lee-chay koo'ray; Lat., "Of Apostolic Concern"), encyclical of Pope Leo XIII, September 13, 1896, declaring Anglican orders invalid because they were considered defective in both form and intention. The form of ordination employed by the Anglican church beginning with the Ordinal of Edward VI (1550) omitted several necessary elements of the rite (later restored, however, with Archbishop William Laud, d. 1645), and the intention of the ordination as expressed in the Anglican ritual did not include the conferral of the power to offer sacrifice. Those Anglican clergymen, including bishops, who have been received into the Roman Catholic Church in recent years have been conditionally re-ordained (i.e., on the condition that the first ordination may not have been valid). See also Anglicanism; Anglican ordination; Holy Orders; ordination.

apostolic age, a term referring roughly to the lifetime of the twelve apostles. The term itself is a modern one, used to refer to the foundational period of Christianity and corresponding to the period between the death of Jesus (ca. A.D. 30) and the end of the first century or the beginning of the second century A.D.

Apostolicam Actuositatem, (ah-poh-stah'lee-kahm ahk-t*oo*-ah-see-tah'tem). See Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity.

apostolic constitution, a papal document that is solemn in form, legal in content, and ordinarily deals with matters of faith, doctrine, or discipline that are of import for the universal Church or are especially significant for a particular diocese. It is usually issued in the form of a bull, so called because it is issued with a "seal" (lat., bulla), and may be signed by the pope himself, or may begin by stating the pope's name and the purpose of the document and be signed by the Chancellor of the Roman Church or by some other official of an appropriate department of the Roman Curia, the Church's central administration in Rome and the Vatican. See also bull, papal.

Apostolic Constitutions, a sizable collection of Church legislation dating from the late fourth century. Its eight books contain norms pertaining to, among other things, clerical activity and demeanor, Christian moral standards and behavior, early penitential discipline, liturgical celebrations of the Eucharist and other sacraments, ceremonies for feasts, practices regarding fasts, and early Church reactions to heresy and schism. The collection relies on and incorporates portions of other documents, such as the Didiscalia Apostolorum (Lat., "teachings of the apostles") and the Apostolic Canons, and is a valuable reference for information on the early development of the Mass. See also canon law.

apostolic delegate, a specific category of papal legate, namely, a cleric or layman who acts as emissary of the Bishop of Rome to the Church in a particular area or country with which the Holy See does not have diplomatic relations (Code of Canon Law, can. 363.1), or as a representative of the Apostolic See to international councils or conferences or meetings who has voting status at these gatherings (can. 363.2). See also nuncio; papal legate.

Apostolic Fathers, the name given to a group of Greek Christian authors of the late first to mid-second centuries who have been thought to have had historical connections with the apostles. The Apostolic Fathers are our chief source of information about Christianity in the period immediately following the apostolic age. Their writings, which are diverse both in content and in form, include the seven Letters of Ignatius of Antioch, the two Letters of Clement of Rome to the Corinthians (although the second is in fact spurious), a series of visions known as the Shepherd of Hermas, the Letter of St. Polycarp to the Philippians, the Martyrdom of St. Polycarp, the Letter of Barnabas, the Letter to Diognetus, the Didache, or Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, and the fragments of Papias.

Though lacking the literary and theological sophistication of the later Church Fathers, the Apostolic Fathers provide a vivid witness to Christianity at a critical stage in its development, when the Church had to establish boundaries between itself and Judaism on the one hand and paganism on the other, while at the same time maintaining cohesion and unity in the face of internal threats of heresy and schism. In meeting these challenges, the Apostolic Fathers reflect significant growth in ecclesiastical authority, and their references to the sayings of Jesus and the Letters of Paul bear crucial testimony to the development of a sense of Scripture and tradition in the first generations after the apostles. See also Clement I, St.; Didache; Fathers of the Church; Hermas, Shepherd of; Ignatius of Antioch, St.

apostolicity, the fundamental identity of the Church, in faith and ministry, with the Church of the apostles. The faithful continuity of the Church as it develops in space and time with the Church of the NT involves fidelity to what was handed on by the apostles. This, as Vatican II declares, "includes everything which contributes to the holiness of life, and the increase in faith of the people of God, and so the church, in her teaching, life and worship, perpetuates and hands on to all generations all that she herself is and all that she believes" (Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, n. 8). This fidelity does not exclude, but rather requires, growth and development of the Church's understanding of the apostolic faith and authoritative interpretation as new questions arise about its meaning. The Church's apostolicity in faith therefore demands apostolicity in ministry, which means that the pastoral ministry of the apostles is perpetuated by legitimate successors, to whom is entrusted the task of interpreting the word of God for each generation with the assistance of the Holy Spirit. From the second century, the Christian churches have recognized their bishops as the legitimate successors of the apostles. The Catholic, Orthodox, and Anglican churches believe that the apostolicity of the Church requires that it maintain an unbroken succession of apostolic ministry through episcopal ordination. It is the further conviction of the Catholic Church that full apostolicity requires communion with the Bishop of Rome as successor to the chief of the apostles. See also apostolic succession; marks of the Church.

Apostolic Nuncio. See nuncio; papal legate.

Apostolic Penitentiary. See Penitentiary, Apostolic.

Apostolic Pro-Nuncio. See pro-nuncio; papal legate.

Apostolic See, originally, any location in which an apostle was considered to have established a primary center of the early Church. Currently the noun "see" means a diocese or the primary location (seat) of the bishop within a diocese, from which the diocese usually takes its name. In Church law, the term "Apostolic See" or "Holy See" now refers to the See of Rome as a moral entity by divine law and, in practical application, to the pope, Secretariat of State, Council for Public Affairs of the Church, and other departments of the Roman Curia who assist in Church governance and administration (Code of Canon Law, cans. 113; 361). See also Holy See; Roman Curia.

Apostolic Signatura. See Signatura, Apostolic.

apostolic succession, the perpetuation, in the college of bishops, of the pastoral charge given by Christ to the college of the apostles. The Catholic doctrine of apostolic succession is expressed in the statement of Vatican II: "Just as the office which the Lord confided to Peter alone, as first of the apostles, destined to be transmitted to his successors, is a permanent one, so also endures the office, which the apostles received, of shepherding the Church, a charge destined to be exercised without interruption by the sacred order of bishops. The sacred synod consequently teaches that the bishops have by divine institution taken the place of the apostles as pastors of the Church, in such wise that whoever listens to them is listening to Christ, and whoever despises them despises Christ, and him who sent Christ (cf. Luke 10:16)" (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 20).

Basis in the New Testament: The four Gospels are unanimous in their witness that Jesus formed a special group of twelve disciples during his public ministry (Matt 10:1–4; Mark 3:13–19; Luke 6:12–16; John 6:70). All four Gospels and Acts bear witness to the belief of the early Church that these men were sent out by the risen Christ, with the mandate to make disciples by witnessing to his Resurrection (Matt 28:19–20; Mark 16:15; Luke 24:48–49; John 20:21–23; Acts 1:8). Others to whom the risen Christ appeared were given a similar mission; foremost among these was the apostle Paul. While the apostles had a foundational role that no one in the following generations could have, the mandate that Christ had given them to teach, baptize, forgive sins, and pastor the flock, was to be passed on, because such ministry was essential to the life of the Church. During their own lifetimes, the apostles shared their ministry with others, meeting the needs of the churches under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. In the NT we see two kinds of such associates of the apostles: the missionary co-workers, who helped to found new churches, and the resident leaders of the local churches. Indications that such people were expected to carry on the work of the apostles in the following generations are found in the NT, e.g., in the speech of Paul to the elders of Ephesus (Acts 20:18–35), and in the pastoral Letters (2 Tim 2:2; 4:1–8).

Development in the Early Church: The NT indicates that the apostles and their co-workers established a collegial form of leadership in the churches that they founded. A number of men called either "elders" (Gk., presbyteroi) or "overseers" (episkopoi) had the ministry of presiding and teaching in the local communities. This is the system that the first letter of Clement to the Corinthians indicates was still in force at Corinth in the last decade of the first century. According to Clement, the first generation of such men had been appointed by the apostles, and the second generation by "other eminent men," following the rule that the apostles had laid down to provide for successors in this ministry (1 Clem. 44:1–4). Two decades later, the letters of Ignatius of Antioch testify that in Syria and parts of Asia Minor, each church was led by a single bishop, assisted by presbyters and deacons. The development from the earlier collegial form of local leadership to the emergence of the single bishop seems to have taken place gradually during the first half of the second century, somewhat later in the West than in the East.

In the Christian writings of the late-second century we find consistent testimony to the belief that these bishops were the successors of the apostles and were, therefore, the authorized witnesses to the genuine apostolic tradition. This was the chief argument of Irenaeus against the Gnostic heretics (Adversus Hereses 2.3.1–3). It was likewise the argument of Tertullian to prove that heretics have no right to interpret the Scriptures (De Praescriptione Haereticorum 20–21). In these writings the emphasis is on the teaching role of the bishops, succeeding one another in the leadership of the apostolic churches, as witnesses to the apostolic "rule of faith." The Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus (ca. 215) sheds light on another aspect of apostolic succession by describing how a bishop was ordained for his church by the bishops of neighboring churches. This reflects the conviction that in order to share in the apostolic mandate, one had to be ordained by those who already shared it. The ordination prayer recorded by Hippolytus expresses the belief that bishops participate in the powers given by Christ to his apostles, and that the Holy Spirit equips them with the gifts needed for the fulfillment of their ministry (Traditio Apostolica 2–3).

Apostolic Succession by Divine Institution: Vatican II declares that "by divine institution bishops have succeeded to the place of the apostles" (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 20). Catholic theologians do not take this to mean that Christ explicitly determined the episcopal structure of the local churches. Christ did not leave a blueprint for his disciples to follow in the organization of the Church. What is certain is that within a century after the death of the apostles, each church was led by a single bishop, and that these bishops were recognized by all the orthodox Christian churches as the legitimate successors of the apostles and, thus, as guarantors of the authentic apostolic tradition. The argument for divine institution is based on the belief that this development was guided by the Holy Spirit, as part of God's design for the Church. A sound reason for this belief is the fact that from the second century on, Christians everywhere accepted the teaching of their bishops as normative for their faith. It is a basic article of Christian belief that the Holy Spirit maintains the Church in the true faith. A Church that is divinely maintained in the true faith could not have been mistaken when it determined the very norms of its faith. Having good reason to be confident that it was the Holy Spirit who guided the Church in its acceptance of bishops as successors of the apostles, Catholics can also be confident that the development of the episcopal succession also was guided by the Holy Spirit and, in that sense, was of divine institution. See also apostle; bishops, college of; Petrine succession.

Bibliography

Brown, Raymond. Priest and Bishop: Biblical Reflections. New York: Paulist Press, 1970.

Rahner, Karl, and Joseph Ratzinger. The Episcopate and the Primacy. New York: Herder and Herder, 1962. FRANCIS A. SULLIVAN

apostolic visitation, a long-standing Church procedure, now conducted under the auspices of the Congregation for Bishops, which is designed "to correct exercise of the pastoral function of bishops" (Pastor Bonus [1988], n. 79) by gathering information and making recommendations to effect reforms deemed necessary or helpful in a particular diocese. Now most commonly conducted by administrative procedure, apostolic visitations can be instituted for various reasons, such as a specific serious problem or widespread pastoral difficulties, and they can result in paternal correction with a view to amendment or in some public form of punishment.

apparitions of the Blessed Virgin Mary, manifestations or appearances of the mother of Jesus centuries after her death. Apparition is the technical term for an inexplicable appearance of someone, usually someone deceased. While there are instances in Church history of claims regarding apparitions of saints or of Jesus Christ, the most frequent claims are those involving the Blessed Virgin Mary. From the Middle Ages on, as devotion to the Blessed Virgin became an ever more integral part of Catholic devotional life, word of apparitions has spread and given the Church hierarchy new challenges regarding the discernment of spirits. In modern times, each claim is checked by the local bishop, who may also appoint a commission to study the situation. While some apparitions have been recognized by the Church as authentic, such recognition does not mean that belief in the appearance of the Blessed Virgin Mary at a particular place and time is binding on all Catholics. It means only that the Church does not regard belief in the apparition to be misguided or harmful to the faithful.

Four of the most famous and widely recognized apparitions are the appearances of Our Lady of Guadalupe, Our Lady of La Salette, Our Lady of Lourdes, and Our Lady of Fátima. Taken together, they demonstrate what an apparition of the Blessed Virgin Mary most frequently involves.

Our Lady of Guadalupe: On December 9, 1531, an Aztec Indian whose indigenous name was Singing Eagle and whose Christian name was Juan Diego set out for the Catholic church near his home, about five miles north of Mexico City. As he neared the hill consecrated to the Mother Goddess of the Aztecs, he heard strange music, then an unnerving silence. Suddenly the silence was broken by a woman's voice calling to him. The maiden identified herself as the "ever virgin, Mary, Mother of the true God who gives life and maintains it in existence." Juan Diego had no difficulty understanding her, for she spoke in his native language. She expressed her desire for a little house to be built in her honor on the spot and sent Juan Diego with this request to the local bishop.

The Lord Bishop, while reportedly courteous, was not prepared to believe word of such an occurrence without proof, and he sent Juan Diego back to get it. The mysterious lady agreed to give the proof on the following morning, but Juan Diego's uncle fell seriously ill. Thinking it more important to get a priest for his uncle, the go-between tried avoiding another meeting with the lady, but she was too alert for him. Promising that she would care for the ailing uncle, the lady sent Juan Diego to the top of a hill to gather flowers on the December morning. Doubtful of finding any, he went and discovered roses growing in the frosty ground. Gathering them in his native cloak, or tilma, he came down to receive the lady's blessing and go off to confront the bishop. When he had gained entrance to the bishops's quarters once more, Juan Diego opened his cloak to let fall the roses. At that moment an image of the maiden was revealed on the inside of the tilma, an image that is revered to this day as the imprint of the figure of Our Lady of Guadalupe, the name by which she called herself.

It is difficult to overstate the impact of this event: an apparition of the Mother of the Christian God to a native of the new land barely ten years after the conquest of Mexico, with the result that a shrine was built on the spot once dedicated to the Mother Goddess. The report is that within six years, nine million natives were baptized. To this day, the image of Guadalupe is enshrined in her church, surrounded by other paintings depicting the cures believed to have been effected through her intercession. Our Lady of Guadalupe appears as a brown-skinned maiden in a pink robe wearing a turquoise mantle that is covered with stars and outlined in gold. The gown is caught at the waist by a black cincture, symbol of pregnancy for the time. She is surrounded by rays of light and supported by a crescent moon, beneath which is the figure of a small man. The feast of Our Lady of Guadalupe is December 12. She has been proclaimed patron saint of all the Americas.

Our Lady of La Salette: In a similarly out-of-the-way place in France on September 19, 1846, two young cattle herders came home from the fields with the story of seeing a beautiful lady. The two, Melanie Mathieu and Maximin Giraud, reported spotting within a circle of brilliant light the figure of a woman seated and weeping. The lady arose and called them to come near. At first, she spoke to them in French, but then, seeing their confusion, changed to their dialect. She spoke of her son and of his heavy arm that she was worn with holding back. She upbraided their people for working on Sunday and for curses that used the name of her son. She warned of dire consequences that would attend a failure to reform in these matters and admonished the two teenagers to say their prayers faithfully, if only the Our Father and Hail Mary. Then the lady charged them to "make this known to all my people." At that, the lady rose into the air. Such was the account of Melanie and Maximin.

They did not identify the lady as Mary, the Mother of God, though those who heard the story quickly did. As news spread, belief took a variety of forms. People drank from a spring that was discovered at the spot where the lady sat, in the hope that the waters had curative powers. Pieces of the stone on which she reportedly sat were broken off and even ground up to be touched or consumed in the same hope of cures. Cures were claimed. Melanie and Maximin were repeatedly interrogated to test their stories, but they never introduced the slightest variation into the account, according to the reports. Under the direction of Bishop de Brouillard, an intense investigation was launched. It lasted five years and, at times, stirred great controversy. But in November 1851, the bishop authorized what was termed by his proclamation "the cult of Our Lady of La Salette" and he personally laid the cornerstone for the basilica to be built in her honor. Since that time this apparition has passed into the annals of such religious phenomena. Images of Our Lady of La Salette can be recognized by the unusual crucifix she wears, with a hammer suspended below one side of the crossbar, pincers below the other. She has been given the additional title, "Reconciler of Sinners."

Our Lady of Lourdes: The site now famous worldwide for reports of cures was once a simple grotto in the foothills of the French Pyrenees. There on February 11, 1858, a young girl named Bernadette Soubirous, out with her sister and a friend to gather firewood, saw coming toward her from the mouth of the cave a golden-colored cloud enveloping a beautiful young lady. The lady beckoned for Bernadette to approach and signaled with the rosary that hung on her arm for Bernadette to begin to pray. After the recitation of the Rosary, the lady and the cloud went back into the grotto and disappeared. Thus began a series of appearances, eighteen in all, of the person Bernadette called simply, aquero, or "that one," in her native dialect. In the course of these apparitions, the lady gave to Bernadette three secrets, which the young girl was never to reveal. The lady also helped Bernadette to discover a spring nearby and instructed her to drink from it and bathe in it. In one of the later appearances the lady expressed her wish for a chapel on the site to which people would come in procession. Toward the end, she acceded to Bernadette's request to know her name. Though the lady spoke in Bernadette's local dialect, the meaning of her words was not immediately clear to the untutored young girl: "I am the Immaculate Conception," the lady said. As the story spread increasing numbers of pilgrims visited the spot. It became apparent that, in addition to the reconciliation of sinners and the cure of crippled bodies, one of the enduring effects of the story of Lourdes would be an increased commitment to the belief, proclaimed as official teaching just four years before the apparitions began. This was the dogma of the Immaculate Conception, that is, the teaching that Mary the Mother of Jesus was conceived without original sin.

Bernadette Soubirous, also known as Bernadette of Lourdes, has been declared a saint of the Catholic Church. Her feast day is April 16. Representation of Our Lady of Lourdes can be recognized by the white robe girdled by a blue ribbon, white veil and yellow roses on her feet. Over her arm she wears a rosary of white beads with a golden chain. The feast of Our Lady of Lourdes is February 11.

Our Lady of Fátima: In the spring of 1917 three young Portuguese shepherds had an experience that, when publicized, caught the attention of a world at war. Lucia dos Santos and her cousins, Francisco and Jacinta Marto, were privy to six appearances of the Blessed Virgin Mary between May and October of that year. To them the lady also entrusted "secrets," some of which have not been revealed to the world to this day.

The Fátima story began in the spring of 1916 with the appearance of a young man who identified himself as the angel of peace. The figure taught the children to pray and make sacrifices in a specified way, then left them. For a year, the children followed his directions, praying intensely. Then, in May of 1917, while the three tended their flock near the Cova da Iria, they beheld a lady all dressed in white, who shed rays of brilliant light all round her. She told them not to fear. Then she indicated her wish for the children to return on the thirteenth of every month until October, when she would tell them who she was and what she wanted of them. She also told them to pray the Rosary daily. As family and parish members learned of the reported apparition, the children withstood intense pressure to renounce their story. Few would believe that the Blessed Virgin would appear only to tell children to say the Rosary. The lady promised a sign that would convince the skeptics, and the children continued to go to the Cova da Iria on the thirteenth of each month, during which time they were granted apocalyptic visions and prophetic warnings. The lady asked that Russia be consecrated to her Immaculate Heart and requested a communion of reparation on the first Saturday of each month.

The apparitions culminated in a final revelation and the promised sign on October 13, 1917. To the children, the visitor identified herself as "Our Lady of the Rosary." As she left the children's sight, the assembled crowd experienced what has come to be known as the "Miracle of the Sun." According to reports, the sun "danced" in the heavens, with the result that many people fell to their knees in awe. The children, meanwhile, were granted in their ecstasy visions of the Holy Family, the Sorrowful Mother with her Son, and the glorious Lady of Mount Carmel.

The apparition at Fátima was authenticated by the bishop of Leiria on October 13, 1930. Since that time, interest in the story has increased, especially with the coming of the Second World War and the rise of the Soviet Union. Rumors about the famous "third secret," the one that has only been revealed to the popes, abound. Responsible accounts dismiss the stories of popes fainting or keeping the secret locked in their private quarters or on their person. It does seem that the secret has been entrusted from pope to pope, and that each has made a decision about whether or not to reveal it to the world. That is as much as is known.

Our Lady of the Rosary appears in a garment and mantle of white bordered in blue, hands folded in prayer holding a white rosary, and wearing a jeweled crown. Her feast day is October 7.

Other Apparitions: In the twentieth century, claims of apparitions of the Blessed Virgin Mary proliferate. In Ireland, Belgium, Italy, Canada, and the United States, investigations of supposed apparitions have been undertaken. The apparition that recently claimed great attention, however, is in Medjugorje, in the former Yugoslavia. Since 1981, when six children began reporting appearances of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the site has drawn pilgrims and gained devotees from all over the world, despite the refusal of church authorities to authenticate the appearances. Medjugorje, too, involves secrets, prophecies, and admonitions to prayer and penance.

Significance of the Apparitions: While some believers are frequently drawn to reports of the miraculous and the paranormal, professional theologians customarily hesitate to give credence to such seemingly irrational occurrences. The apparitions have been, for that reason, relegated to the realm of what is called "popular religion," especially by theologians and professional educators. Of late, however, liberation theologians, in particular Third World and/or feminist ones, are looking anew at the claimed apparitions and their revelations. From these studies emerge challenging new questions concerning the nature of personal religious experience and its movement into the Church's public worship; the manifestation of the divine intentions for humanity in images and symbols that reach new ages with new cultural settings; the need for the feminine in a world run-down by the triumph of the masculine; the place of apocalypticism in a civilization of comfort; and the tension between the personal testimony of those outside the power structures and the hierarchical assessment of what is good for the whole Church. The history of the apparitions of the Blessed Virgin Mary, a distinctively Catholic phenomenon, provides matter for reflection on religion, no matter the stand one takes on their possibility or validity. See also Fátima; Guadalupe, Our Lady of; La Salette, Our Lady of; Lourdes; Mary, Blessed Virgin; Medjugorje.

Bibliography

Delaney, John J., ed. A Woman Clothed With The Sun, Eight Great Appearances of Our Lady. New York: Doubleday, 1961.

Kselman, Thomas. Miracles and Prophecies in Nineteenth-Century France. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University, 1983.

Walsh, William T. Our Lady of Fatima. New York: Doubleday, 1990.

Zimdars-Swartz, Sandra L. Encountering Mary. New York: Avon Books, 1991.

MARY AQUIN O'NEILL

appetites, concupiscible and irascible, technical terms from Scholastic philosophy that describe the movement of the physical senses toward or away from objects. A concupiscible appetite (desire) is a capacity that inclines one to move toward an object that perceived to be good or to move away from an object seen as harmful. This appetite seeks pleasure in something it does not have. An irascible appetite (passion) is a capacity that seeks to resist what stands in the way of the pursuit of a perceived good. This appetite opposes what is seen as a danger. See also body and spirituality.

apse, the semicircular or polygonal end of basilica-style churches. The altar and the seats for the ministers are usually located in the center of the apse, which is modeled on the Roman architectural design of official buildings. See also basilica.

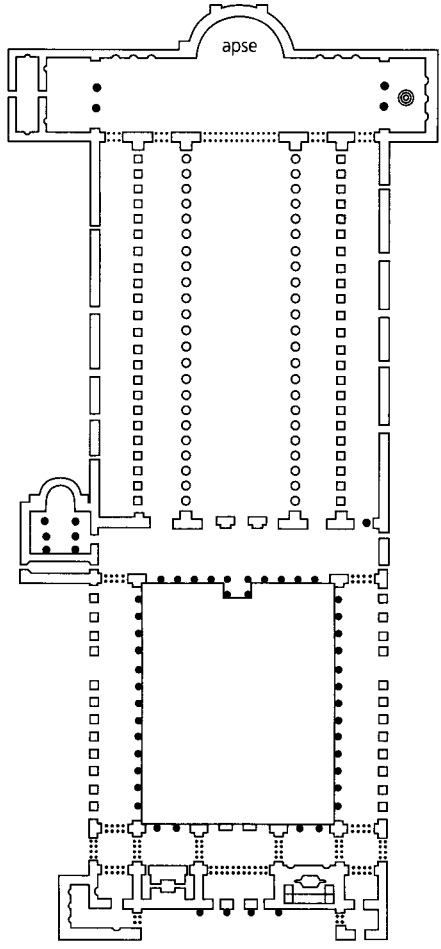
Aquila (ak'wi-luh), author of a mechanically literal revision of the Greek OT ca. A.D. 130. Originally a Gentile, Aquila converted to Christianity, was later excommunicated, then became a proselyte to Judaism. His revision, which could serve as a basis for Jewish-Christian debate, sought to produce a Greek version as faithful as possible to the form of the rabbinic (proto-Masoretic) Bible current in his day. Thus, his version is not very helpful for determining the original Greek of the Septuagint, but it is a very reliable witness to the second-century Hebrew Bible. See also Scripture, versions of.

Aquila and Prisca (Priscilla in Acts), Jewish-Christian converts, with whom Paul first lived in Corinth (Acts 18:1–3). Expelled from Rome under Claudius (A.D. 49), they became important coworkers with Paul, established a house church in Ephesus (1 Cor 16:19) and instructed Apollos (Acts 18:24–26). Paul greets them and their house church in Rom 16:3–5.

Aquileia, Council of, an anti-Arian synod of bishops, convened in 381 by the local bishop of Aquileia, Valerian, and presided over by Ambrose of Milan. Aquileia, located on the Adriatic coast of Italy, was an important city and center of learning during the later Roman Empire (fourth century) and was the seat of a Western patriarchate.

Aramaic, a Semitic language closely related to Hebrew. Imperial Aramaic, the official language of the Persian Empire (550–333 B.C.), is used in the OT in Ezra and Daniel. A later form of the language, related to that of Jewish Targums, was probably the primary spoken language of Jesus.

An apse, or semicircular end of a basilca-style church.



ST. THOMAS AQUINAS

A Dominican friar and Doctor of the Church ("Angelic Doctor," "Common Doctor"), St. Thomas Aquinas (uh-kwī'nuhs) lived ca. 1225–74. His theology has acquired a quasi-official status in the Church through repeated formal endorsements by various popes.

LIFE AND WORKS

Offered by his ambitious father as an oblate to the nearby Benedictine monastery of Monte Cassino, Italy, in 1231 or 1232, the young Thomas received his elementary education there until 1239. He then studied at Naples, encountering Aristotle's natural science and metaphysics, until 1244, when he entered the Order of Preachers. Overcoming family opposition, he went to Paris in 1245, first as a novice and then as a student. In 1248 he went to Cologne for studies under Albertus Magnus until 1252. During this time he was ordained a priest. There (or at Paris, 1252–54) he lectured on the Bible "in a cursory way" as a "bachelor of the Bible."

Returning to Paris in 1252 for further theological studies, Thomas lectured on Peter Lombard's Sentences as a "bachelor of the Sentences," producing his Scriptum Super Sententiis. In 1257 he was admitted as a regent master of theology. He then undertook the threefold functions of a master: commenting on the Bible, something he continued throughout his life; conducting disputed questions (On Truth) and a first set of quodlibetal questions; and taking his turn among the masters for preaching. At this time he also began his Summa Contra Gentiles and defended the mendicant orders against their opponents. From 1259 to 1268 he was at first in Naples; then he taught his Dominican confreres at Orvieto and afterward at their house in Rome, where he began his Summa Theologiae. Several disputed questions (On the Power of God, On Free Choice, On Spiritual Creatures) date from this period, as does the completion of the Summa Contra Gentiles and the Office for the Feast of Corpus Christi, composed for Pope Urban IV. For the same pope Thomas also composed the Golden Chain, compiling texts on the four Gospels from the Latin Fathers and an even greater number from the Greek Fathers and early councils; this work, widely diffused and influential, was very important for Thomas's own theological development.

The years 1268–72, spent in Paris, marked a period of extraordinary activity: Thomas continued his Scripture commentaries, completed a large part of the Summa Theologiae, conducted eight disputed questions and a second series of quodlibetal questions, and wrote again to defend the mendicants. Some scholars have observed a shift in Thomas's thought at this time from a stricter intellectualism to greater attention to affectivity. During this period he also completed a large number of commentaries on Aristotle, written to counteract Averroistic interpretations of Aristotle that were penetrating the university; these were leading some professors to argue by reason to conclusions opposed to faith, even though in such cases they always claimed to adhere to faith as above reason.

From 1272 to 1274 Aquinas was back in Italy, teaching Scripture and theology at the newly founded University of Naples, where he worked to complete the third part of the Summa Theologiae. In December 1273, however, he had a mystical experience whose intensity so overpowered him that he could no longer write. Invited to the Second Council of Lyons in 1274, Thomas fell ill en route, perhaps as the result of an accident, and died on March 7, 1274.

Beside the works already mentioned, he left numerous others, including several treatises on politics, as well as sermons, replies to questions, letters, and prayers. Sweeping condemnations—by Bishop Stephen Tempier of Paris and Archbishop Robert Kilwardby of Canterbury—of 219 philosophical and theological propositions at Paris in 1277 included a few of his teachings. Although this, plus attacks from rival theological schools, slowed the influence of his thought outside the Dominican school, his holiness was officially recognized by his canonization in 1323, and in 1325 the Paris condemnation was revoked insofar as it touched his teachings.

SAINT AND THEOLOGIAN

Nurtured by a deep love of Scripture that was fostered by his desire as a mendicant to lead the gospel life and cherishing the Fathers, especially Augustine (d. 430) and Gregory the Great (d. 604) but also the Eastern Fathers whom he sought to know more and more, Thomas was not only an intellectual genius and energetic scholar, but also a kind, warmhearted friar. His entire existence and ministry of teaching and preaching were fed by a life of deep contemplative prayer. From this prayer came Thomas's great zeal to "give to others what [he] had contemplated"—for him the highest of all activities when done out of charity (Summa Theologiae 2–2.188.6; all references are to this work unless otherwise noted).

It was this same love that led Aquinas, despite opposition from those of the Augustinian school, to use extensively, even daringly, any authors who could lead him to truth, whether they were Christian (Origen, Pseudo-Dionysius, John Damascene), Jewish (Avicebron, Maimonides), Muslim (Avicenna, Averroes), or pagan (Aristotle, Proclus, Cicero). Like his teacher, Albertus Magnus, he saw no opposition between nature and grace or between truths discovered by reason and those revealed by God. It cannot be stressed too much, however, that Thomas intended to be and always was primarily a theologian: even his commentaries on Aristotle were done for theological purposes. To treat him as a philosopher and to extract a "Thomistic" philosophy from the theological context in which Aquinas uses philosophy is a disservice too frequently done by many professing to follow him. Divorced from its living theological context, such a desiccated body of doctrines loses the force and vitality of Aquinas's thought and is at least partly responsible for the current neglect of his teaching in many quarters. Although Thomas Aquinas used Aristotle more than others, his use of so many other sources shows that he was more than an Aristotelian. For example, from Augustine and the Pseudo-Dionysius he received many elements of Neoplatonism, e.g., the doctrines of participation and negative knowledge of God.

THE TRINITARIAN GOD AND CREATURES

For Aquinas, God's very essence is to be Self-subsisting Be-ing (Lat., ipsum esse per se subsistens), Pure Act of Be-ing or Existing and, as such, is the transcendent and unique source of all created existents. This very transcendence of God as Self-subsisting Be-ing means that God, existing beyond all created categories, is not really related to creatures as they are to God, for such a relation would enclose God within the created order.

God's concern for creatures is expressed in many ways: the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit eternally and freely choose to create, conserve, and govern creatures in the natural order by being in them through their divine "essence, presence, and power" (1.8.3); they call and elevate intellectual creatures to share divine life through grace, faith, hope, and love (defined by Aquinas as "friendship with God"); they are present to graced creatures by dwelling in them as objects of their intimate experience in this life—a preparation for the fullness of this presence in the Beatific Vision, an immediate knowledge of God that overflows into love and joy.

Thomas's theology of the missions and indwelling of the trinitarian persons links his study of their interior relational life with the creation and elevation of intellectual persons to share this life. In his later Summa Theologiae he prefers the Word-Love analogy to the Nature-Love analogy when examining the procession of the Word-Son and Holy Spirit. In this analysis he holds that creatures are "spoken" and "loved" into existence within the very same speaking and loving in which the Word-Son and Holy Spirit proceed. While the Father, Word-Son, and Holy Spirit concur in creating and in all other effects, each person acts according to its way of being God: this teaching, often neglected, provides a basis for a strong emphasis on trinitarian vestiges and images in creation, sanctification, and the creature's return to God.

THE HUMAN PERSON ON THE WAY TO GOD

Sacra doctrina (Lat., "sacred doctrine" or "sacred teaching") includes for Aquinas divine revelation, sacred Scripture, and a mode of teaching that is scientific in that the theologian, receiving assured first principles by sharing God's knowledge through faith, can argue to conclusions, thereby finding an order among the truths of faith or discovering new truths. In all this, however, Thomas insists that negative knowledge about God is more certain. While confident that we can make true positive statements about God by using analogies, he shows his awareness of the ineffability of God by qualifying his analogies with "mental genuflections" such as "as it were," "in a certain way," "to some degree" (e.g., he says Christ's Passion was, "as it were, a kind of price by which we were freed" [3:48.4]).

In every case of divine-human cooperation, Thomas solves the problems involved in two such diverse subjects acting together by analogical use of the notion of instrumental causality: God as principal cause uses a human person as "a kind of instrumental cause." This neither takes away God's glory nor eliminates any true human contribution under God. Aquinas thus differs from the Augustinian theologians of his time by giving full value to the created order. Creatures glorify God by achieving the ends God has inscribed in their natures. Except for faith, the human knower needs no special added illumination to guarantee certitude, since God has provided the light of reason as an intrinsic natural power. The human body is an essential part of the human person, who is an integral whole. The soul is the unique substantial form of the person, whose unity derives from the one act of be-ing or existing that the person has in both soul and body. This means that the sensitive appetites can be well ordered within themselves by virtues such as temperance and fortitude that reside in them rather than by having an order imposed from without by the will. Well-ordered passions or emotions flowing from these appetites add to the moral goodness of human acts, which are better performed with such ordered passions than without them.

While recognizing natural ends, Aquinas holds that the natural finalities of human beings and angels are intermediate, not ultimate, because intellectual creatures have a natural desire to "see" God, that is, to know the Divine Essence and Be-ing in Itself and not only through creatures. God freely calls intellectual creatures, who are "capable of God" (Lat., capax Dei, that is, ordered to life with God by more than an obediential potency); the divine graciousness intrinsically heals the defects produced in human beings by original and actual sin and elevates their natures in their essence, powers, and activities so that they can fulfill this otherwise unattainable desire.

Aquinas rejects the Augustinian view that identified original sin with disordered concupiscence. Following Anselm, he maintains that original sin was formally a disorder of the human will through pride, upon which the other disorders followed. Despite these disorders, human nature is not totally corrupted and even one in sin can perform some naturally good acts. By actual sin a person turns away from God and turns toward the creature, which is often the self. Justification is an unmerited gift from God, who by infusing grace intrinsically changes sinners and makes them sharers in the divine nature.

Human persons, both women and men, are created by nature "in the image of God" (Gen 1:27) because, like God, they are intellectual, have free choice, and are the source of their own actions. The person transformed by grace becomes even more fully an image and likeness of the trinitarian God, especially by acts of faith, hope, and love directed toward God (1.93.4–8). In human activity, moral goodness or evil is determined neither by the principle of obligation nor by commandments or obedience; rather, the end of human nature, beatitude, gives us "the reasons of those things [human acts] that are ordered to that end" (1–2.1.intro.). As image of God, the human person is the primary agent of moral choice looking to this end and these reasons, exercising self-counsel and prudence in judging moral goodness and in applying the commandments and laws to individual situations. For Aquinas one is morally bound to follow the final judgment of conscience, even if it is erroneous.

With respect to human persons, when Aquinas discusses whether Eve should have been created at the same time as Adam, he gives opening arguments denying that she should have been. The first of these, quoting a text of Aristotle saying that a woman is a misbegotten male (Lat., mas occasionatus), argues from this that Eve should not have been created from the beginning (1.92.1.1m). Summarizing and accepting Aristotle's teaching as his chief authority in biology, Aquinas's frequently ignored reply continues by indicating that the quotation from Aristotle is insufficient to answer the question. He first makes another statement based on Aristotle: "But with respect to nature as a whole, woman is not something misbegotten, but is intended by nature as ordered to the work of generation." He then adds the fundamental theological reason not found in Aristotle: "The intention of nature as a whole depends on God, who is the author of the whole of nature. Therefore, in establishing nature, God produced not only the male but also the female." Although Aquinas has some other statements about women that are unacceptable today, they should be seen as deficiencies produced by his historical conditioning.

Thomas Aquinas, surrounded by Jesus, the apostles, the saints, and the holy men and women of West and East alike.

Thomas's ordering of moral-spiritual life is positively oriented toward beatitude: he begins with virtues having God as their direct object—faith, hope, and charity—and follows them with the cardinal virtues of prudence, justice, temperance, and fortitude, which are concerned with a person's rightly ordering created things on the way to God. Connected with these virtues are the gifts of the Holy Spirit: for Aquinas the New Law or New Covenant is the inner presence and gifts of the Spirit and only secondarily Scripture and laws. The Holy Spirit's presence and gifts are necessary for a person to live on the high plane of supernatural gospel life. The gift of wisdom, for example, gives an experiential knowledge of God that through intense love can blossom into mystical contemplation, even in the simplest person. Other virtues are linked with these seven major virtues. Only then do vices and sins appear, precisely as opposed to these virtues. Finally come the commandments, which for Aquinas are meant for both instruction and discipline.

CHRIST AND THE SACRAMENTS

Thomas has particular reasons for placing the theology of Christ in the last part of the Summa Theologiae (which, in any case, should be read as an organic whole, not as a series of sequential tracts). Since he states emphatically that in sinful human history God has willed Christ as the absolutely necessary way to salvation, everything he has said previously about moral-spiritual life must be seen as related to Christ. The Scripture commentaries, since they deal with our concrete history, bring out even more clearly this key mediatorial role of Christ.

Thomas's doctrine of esse (Lat., "being"), including its real distinction from essence in created things, enables him to grasp more fully how Christ could have a complete human essence or nature—a full human psychology with all human faculties, powers, knowledge, free will, and passions—without there being a human ontological person. The union is not in essence or nature but in the personal esse of the Word, who subsists or exists in a fully perfect human nature belonging so much to the Word that Thomas will speak of the Son of God as a "person of human nature." Christ saves all human beings not precisely by suffering but by meriting, satisfying, and sacrificing through his loving obedience during his life and especially in his Passion and death; his Resurrection is also saving, not only as an exemplary cause of human resurrection but also as an efficient instrumental cause by which God already raises souls (through justification) and will raise bodies in the resurrection. For Western theology, Aquinas integrates the Resurrection into the saving work of Christ in an original way that recaptures both the Pauline teaching and that of the Greek Fathers.

In the Summa Theologiae Thomas revises his earlier view of the sacraments as primarily remedies for sin; he now sees them chiefly as specific helps for different stages of personal and social life. Thomas teaches that the sacraments are equally signs and causes, a balanced view lost by later theologians when their disputes about sacramental causality led them to neglect the sign-value of the sacraments. Indeed, for Aquinas the sacraments cause precisely by their signifying, and they are acts of worship of God as much as causes of grace in creatures. His view of the sacramental characters of Baptism, Confirmation, and Holy Orders as ways of sharing in the priesthood of Christ and his development of many aspects of the Eucharist have had lasting influence.

It is unfortunate that Aquinas did not complete the Summa Theologiae, since he may well have used his modified view of the sacraments to produce a revised theology of Matrimony; he might also have fashioned a corporate eschatology, which is less fully treated in his other works.

He was canonized by Pope John XXII in 1323, less than fifty years after his death. He was declared a Doctor of the Church by Pope Pius V in 1567. In his encyclical Aeterni Patris in 1879, Pope Leo XIII enjoined Aquinas's thought upon all theological students. The following year he was made patron of all Catholic universities. Feast day: January 28.

See also Thomism.

Bibliography

Chenu, Marie-Dominique. Toward Understanding St. Thomas. Chicago: Regnery, 1964.
Gilson, Étienne. The Christian Philosophy of St. Thomas Aquinas. New York: Random House, 1956.
Principe, Walter. Thomas Aquinas' Spirituality. The Gilson Lecture Series 7. Toronto: Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies, 1984.
Weisheipl, James A. Friar Thomas d'Aquino: His Life, Thought, and Works. 2d ed. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press, 1983.

WALTER PRINCIPE

Aramaic, a Semitic language closely related to Hebrew. Imperial Aramaic, the official language of the Persian Empire (550–333 B.C.), is used in the OT in Ezra and Daniel. A later form of the language, related to that of Jewish Targums, was probably the primary spoken language of Jesus.

archaeology, biblical, the branch of archaeology whose object is to enhance understanding of the Bible. Archaeology is the scientific study of the material remains of past human life and activities in their historical and physical context. Since its raw material is universal, clarity demands subdisciplines with limited foci. The theoretical focus of biblical archaeology is the lands and peoples of the Bible, but in practice the term is reserved for excavations on either side of the Jordan River.

Its origins in a fundamentalist concern to prove the OT right have led some to condemn the term "biblical archaeology," but others have correctly argued that it describes a valid field of research, provided that the Bible offers only inspiration and direction. The Bible cannot limit the scope of research, dictate, or even suggest, conclusions, or lead to neglect of postbiblical periods that have to be dug through. The basic tool of all archaeological assessment is the changing style of artifacts which, through correlations, have been given approximate absolute dates, but modern excavation teams also include botanists, geologists, and zoologists.

Archaeology is the unique source of new data and makes its contribution to the understanding of the Bible in a number of different areas. Surface exploration combined with excavation can establish which sites were occupied at different periods, thus highlighting settlement patterns and stimulating questions concerning routes and resources. Very rarely have inscriptions identifying sites been discovered, e.g., Lachish. Occasionally, as in the case of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, the correspondence of an excavated site to a detailed physical description can make the identification certain.

On the more specific level of material culture, if sufficient data have been assembled, archaeology may permit the recreation of the life-style of a region or period. The volume of water available provides an upper limit for the population of a town or village, whose diet is revealed by agricultural implements and refuse dumps. Imported objects indicate trade connections. Liturgical furniture betrays the type of cultic activity. Construction techniques suggest the level of technology. Variations in decoration and building illustrate the gap between rich and poor. Room sizes determined the probable number of members of a house-church. Roofing and paving bring to life incidents and parables.

The excavation of written material increases the body of comparative material for both linguists and historians. Libraries of cuneiform tablets (e.g., Mari, Ebla) permit the reconstruction of mythologies and economic systems. Inscriptions furnish names and occupations, detail a method of tunnel construction, or date the tenure of office of a Roman official. Biblical texts from Qumran have pushed back the OT textual tradition by one thousand years. A copy of John's Gospel from Egypt (ca. A.D. 150) destroyed the hypothesis that the Fourth Gospel was a late second-century creation. The sectarian documents of the Essenes furnish inside information on the ethos of an ill-known branch of Judaism. Papyrus letters highlight the unique features of NT Letters. JEROME MURPHY-O'CONNOR archaeology, Christian, properly speaking, the search for and scientific study of material remains of early Christianity. These remains consist of Christian locations, such as burial grounds, inscriptions, and buildings. Such remains can first be identified from about the end of the second century. Until that time, Christians used locations, buildings, symbols, art, and other artifacts that cannot be distinguished from remains of the Greco-Roman world.

The first Christians met in the homes of congregational members (Col 4:15; Rom 16:3). Eventually these house churches were modified for more frequent use by the congregation. During the siege of Dura-Europos in 256 A.D. a house church was covered by dirt and debris. That house, the earliest house church than can be identified for certain, had been modified to include a large room for worship, a rostrum, and a decorated baptistery. Another probable house church can be seen in Rome. Early Christians met in an apartment complex fronted by a row of shops. Eventually the congregation built the present-day church of Sti. Giovanni e Paulo in the top two floors of the apartment.

Partial view of a second-century cemetery beneath St. Peter's Basilica, Vatican City, excavated in 1939 and a prime example of Christian archaeology; workers uncovered both pagan and Christian symbols, the latter including a depiction of a woman drawing water on a marble slab and various wall markings that some believe may refer to St. Peter himself.

When ecclesiastical edifices did begin to appear, for the most part they did so in burial situations. The first Christians ate meals with the significant dead—both within the family (as was the custom in Greco-Roman society) and then with martyrs of the church (a martyrium). One of the earliest known martyria consists of a table (mensa) and ledge as found in Bonn, Germany, under the Münster. The first Christian edifices were built over or adjacent to such martyria. This was particularly true in Rome where, under the direction of the emperor Constantine, a number of martyria were extended to make "covered cemeteries." Of particular interest are extant buildings like Santa Agnese, built with an apse around the martyrium and a colonnade extended into the nave in a manner that creates a clerestory. Most important of these Roman covered cemeteries is San Sebastiano, thought by pilgrims to be the final resting place of St. Paul and St. Peter. Early Christians met at the presumed martyrium to eat with St. Peter and St. Paul as well their own significant dead. The actual burial of the apostle Peter occurred near the Vatican Hill in a burial lot for the poor (now called Campo P by archaeologists). In the second century, a niche in honor of Peter was built into a holding wall in Campo P. Eventually a covered cemetery was also built over this burial, except that this building had a double colonnade and an apse constructed like a cross so as to increase access to the burial niche. Archaeological studies have confirmed a presence of Peter's remembrances here, but the remains of Peter have likely disappeared over the centuries. Many of the churches of later Christendom followed the cruciform structure of the original St. Peter's, although most early churches, like San Crisogono of Rome, reflect the structure of those covered cemeteries with a spherical apse.

Thousands of Christian inscriptions from the first four centuries of Christian history have been recovered. The vast majority of these come from grave markers in catacombs, early Christian underground cemeteries. Most of them have been found in the extensive (ninety miles) of catacombs in Rome, though other collections have been assembled from places like Trier, Phrygia, the house church in Dura-Europos, and martyria like that under San Sebastiano and St. Peter's. Christian funerary inscriptions can often be identified by the use of In Pace (Lat. "in peace [with God and each other]") in the place of the pagan Dis Manibus ("to the spirits of the prior dead"). Generally speaking, the inscriptions indicate some aspects of everyday life. According to the names, most early Christians were slaves or had been slaves, yet the inscriptions do not indicate any slave status. Other inscriptions show Christians encouraged a trend toward democratization by dropping the use of noble names.

Early inscriptions also were decorated with symbols. As symbols, the first Christian culture used the lamb, anchor, vase, dove, boat, olive branch, orante or praying figure, palm, bread, good shepherd, fish, and vine and grapes. All of these independent symbols had a pre-Christian history. The first Christians did not offer substitute symbols (they had none!), but they so utilized the ones they borrowed that these images in some way came to represent the nascent Christian faith. Eating together was expressed by bread, fish, vase, vine and grapes, and possibly the good shepherd. Healing was expressed by the community peace symbols: the dove and the olive branch (and eventually the orante). Tension with the dominant culture was expressed by the boat, the anchor, and likely the fish (water symbolized the dominant social matrix). And the hope for good life was expressed by the tree. See also archaeology, biblical.

Bibliography

Frend, W. H. C. History and Archaeology in the Study of Early Christianity. London: Variorum, 1988.

Krautheimer, Richard. Early Christian and Byzantine Architecture. Harmondsworth: Penguin Books, 1975.

O'Conner, Daniel William. Peter in Rome. New York: Columbia University Press, 1969.

Snyder, Graydon F. Ante Pacem: Archaeological Evidence of Church Life Before Constantine. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1985.

GRAYDON F. SNYDER

Archaeology, Pontifical Commission for Sacred, an agency instituted by Pope Pius IX in 1852 which superintends the preservation, exploration, study, care, and protection of those Christian cemeteries, monuments, and churches in and around Rome which date from the first centuries of Christianity. See also archaeology, Christian.

archangel, chief angel, or angel of a higher order. In the later biblical period, and on into NT times, angels begin to be designated by personal names. Preeminent among these angels of a higher order are Michael, patron angel of Israel (Dan 10:13); Gabriel, whose special role is that of messenger (Dan 8:16; Luke 1:19); and Raphael, whose function is to protect and heal (Tob 3:17; 12:15). These and other similar heavenly beings (e.g., Uriel) are prominent in apocalyptic writings (2 Esdr 4:1; 10:28). See also angel.

archbishop, bishop given a higher rank because he heads an archdiocese, has more significant administrative responsibilities in Church affairs, or is being specially honored with the title. See also bishop.

archdeacon. 1 The principal deacon of a Byzantine monastery. 2 An honorific title conferred on Byzantine deacons, sometimes including the right to wear a second orarion or diaconal stole. 3 The title of the principal presbyter of the Chaldean or East Syrian tradition, who functions as master of ceremonies for the bishop at pontifical liturgies. See also deacon.

archdiocese, the principal diocese, headed by an archbishop, in a regional cluster of dioceses known as a province. An archdiocese is centered in a city of greater importance than others in the province or that played a special role in the history of Christianity in the given area. Most often the pastoral leadership of an archdiocese has some supervisory responsibility for the other dioceses within the province, which are called suffragan sees. The archdiocese is the metropolitan see. See also metropolitan; province.

archimandrite (Gk., archimandrites, "chief of a mandra, or fold"), highest ranking Byzantine abbot, sometimes graded according to the importance of the monastery. Originally restricted to the overseer of a group of monasteries, the title was later applied to abbots of the principal monasteries. Some Byzantine churches confer the title on monastic priests as the highest grade below bishop. The highest ranking Russian archimandrites may use certain pontificalia like the crown (miter) and the two episcopal candelabra (dikirion, trikirion) when presiding at the liturgy, and the Melkites confer the title even on nonmonastic and married priests. See also abbot.

architecture. See Catholicism and architecture.

archpriest, title given in some areas to a dean or priest in charge of overseeing the clergy of a district or deanery, or to the principal presbyter of a major church. In the Byzantine rite it is an honorary title (Gk., protoiereus; Slav., protoierej; not to be confused with archiereus, archierej, "bishop"), like "Monsignor," conferred on nonmonastic priests along with the right to wear certain insignia like the gold pectoral cross. A "mitered archpriest" may also wear the crown or miter. The highest grade, protopresbyter, was a rare title held in Russia by only a handful of the highest secular clergy of the court and of the Kremlin cathedrals. See also priest.

Ardo, St., d. 843, monk and biographer of Benedict of Aniane, whom he succeeded as abbot. Feast day: March 7. See also Benedict of Aniane, St.

Argentina, Catholicism in. Catholicism first came to Argentina in 1519 with the expedition of Ferdinand Magellan. The organization of dioceses began in the late 1540s. Throughout its history the Church has been shaped by Spanish cultural and institutional traditions. There are 13 archdioceses and 49 dioceses and almost 30 million Catholics, constituting just over 91 percent of the total population (1994). See also Latin America, Catholicism in.

Arianism, a fourth-century movement declared heretical by the Church at the Council of Nicaea (325) for denying the true divinity of Christ. Arius, the Alexandrian priest from whom the movement derived its name, taught that the primary characteristic of God is to be "unbegotten" (Gk., agennesia). He reasoned that if both the Father and the Son are said to be unbegotten, then it must be said that two separate Gods exist. Such a teaching would be contrary to monotheism, which Arius wanted to uphold in continuity with ancient Jewish belief. He maintained that only the Father is unbegotten, hence truly God, and that the Father created the Son. Hence Arianism's catechetical slogan, "There was once when he [the Son] was not," meaning that the Son came into existence at some point in time, before which the Son did not exist.

Arianism built its arguments upon Scripture passages like Prov 8:22 ("The Lord created me at the beginning of his work") and Col 1:15 ("the firstborn of all creation"). At the same time, Arianism recognized that the Son of God possessed a dignity superior to human dignity. In its view, Jesus Christ was truly Savior through the example he provided.

To counteract the disruptive effects Arianism caused in his empire, Constantine convened a council in Nicaea in 325. The assembled bishops rejected the teaching of Arius, affirming that the Son was begotten, not created, of the Father and "of the same substance" (Gk., homoousios) with the Father. The bishops expressed this teaching in the Nicene Creed, which Arius and two Libyan bishops refused to accept; as a result, they were banished to Illyricum.

Opposition to the Nicene supporters and to the word homoousios resurfaced along three fronts after the council. (1) Eusebius of Caesarea and Eusebius of Nicomedia, loyal to Arianism, sought to replace bishops loyal to Nicaea with bishops loyal to Arianism. (2) The Eastern bishops were concerned that the Nicaean formula, particularly homoousios, repeated an earlier heresy which did not distinguish between the divine Persons. (3) Under the leadership of Aetius and Eunomius of Cyzicus, a radical Arian movement emerged opposing the Nicene party.

Following the death of Constantine (337) and Constans (350), Constantius II, who supported Arianism, ruled the entire empire. During his reign, four reformulations of the formula of faith, known as the Formularies of Sirmium, were proposed. (1) The Eastern bishops promulgated a creed that omitted reference to homoousios (351). (2) In 357, under the leadership of the radical Arian movement, a creed was promulgated stressing the "difference" (Gk., anomoios) between the Son and the Father. (3) In reaction, Basil of Ancyra and George of Laodicea lead another synod (358) which proposed a formula describing the Son as homoiousios (Gk.), "of like substance to the Father". (4) A creed defining the Son as homoios (gk.), like the Father in all things discussed in Scripture, was declared the creed for the entire empire in 359–60. Not until the councils of Constantinople in the East (381) and Aquileia in the West (381), partially through the influential teaching of the Cappadocian Fathers, was the term homoousios reestablished as normative for the entire Church. See also homoousios; Jesus Christ; Nicaea, First Council of. ANTHONY W. KEATY aridity (Lat., aridus, "dry"), a period of spiritual desolation during which a person loses enthusiasm for prayer and meditation. Sometimes considered a test of fidelity initiated by God, aridity may last for only a short time or may extend into months, even years. Spiritual writers counsel patience and persistence during this experience. Above all, one should never discontinue prayer because feelings of joy or other fruits of prayer are temporarily absent. God's grace, though less tangibly evident, is still being lavished. Once aridity passes, people frequently report having an even greater fervor for prayer than before. See also prayer.

Aristotle, 384–322 B.C., Greek philosopher. The son of the court physician of the king of Macedon, he studied and worked from 367–47 B.C. with Plato at the Academy in Athens. A sympathetic yet critical assimilation of Plato's philosophy marks all of Aristotle's thought. He generally emphasized more than Plato the role of sense perception in cognition, was less radical in his criticisms of conventional morality and politics, and resisted the Platonic tendency to unify all science, stressing instead the relative autonomy of the principles underlying inquiries into different subject matters.

Aristotle's own philosophical contributions covered an astonishing range of fields. He founded the systematic study of logic; made profound and still relevant inquiries into such fundamental concepts in the study of nature as cause, motion, time, and space; presented a powerful metaphysical doctrine that culminated in an account of God as the prime mover of the cosmos; developed an approach to ethics and politics that balanced the claims of reason and emotion; and carried out a carefully empirical research program into animal biology. The school he founded, the Lyceum, focused mainly on these last two areas. For three centuries after Aristotle's death his logical, physical, and metaphysical treatises seem to have had little influence, and perhaps to have been virtually unknown. These treatises were then edited and published in the middle of the first century B.C. by Andronicus of Rhodes, the eleventh head of the Lyceum. The treatises became the focus of a penetrating series of Greek commentaries, mostly written over a period of some two centuries by pagan Platonists.

This commentary tradition tended to harmonize Aristotle with Plato, assimilating him into an overarching Neoplatonic scheme of thought, and this Platonized Aristotle was to be the main link to the Catholic tradition. Aristotle's treatises and their Greek commentaries were disappearing in the Christian West by the fifth century. The sixth-century Latin translations by Boethius of two short treatises on ontology and logic, the Categories and On Interpretation, were the only works of Aristotle known in Europe until the middle of the twelfth century. At that time, the treatises and the commentaries began to be rediscovered and translated into Latin, having been preserved and studied (often in Arabic through Syriac) in the Islamic world.

The impact of Aristotle on Catholic thought received new impetus a century later with another round of translations, and culminated in the work of Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274), whose commentaries still represent the pinnacle of Catholic appreciation of Aristotle. Beyond this time, Aristotle's philosophical vocabulary becomes the basic idiom of Scholastic theology and philosophy, so that his independent influence is hard to determine, waxing and waning with Scholasticism. A renewed independent Catholic interest in Aristotle in the twentieth century was fueled by Pope Leo XIII's encyclical of 1879 Aeterni Patris, since his encouragement of the study of Aquinas naturally led to further interest in Aristotle, whom Aquinas referred to simply as "The Philosopher." See also Aquinas, St. Thomas. DAVID K. O'CONNOR ark of the covenant, a sacred box containing the tablets of the law. Moses instructed Bezalel to make the ark (Exod 25:10–21), which he did (Exod 37:1–9), although Deut 10:1–5 reports that Moses made the ark and put in it the tablets of the law. In early traditions the ark symbolized the presence of Yahweh and was a rallying point for Israel's military endeavors (Num 10:35–36; 1 Sam 4–7). David brought it to Jerusalem, thus giving Yahweh a home (2 Sam 6; Ps 132). In the NT the ark is dismissed as part of the old ritual system in Heb 9:4, but is seen as part of the heavenly temple in Rev 11:19.

Arius, ca. 250–336, Libyan theologian whose heretical teachings sparked the fourth-century trinitarian controversies. An ordained presbyter (priest) in Alexandria, Arius taught that the Son was not God as the Father was God, but was created by the Father. This subordinationist teaching resulted in Arius's denunciation to Alexander, the bishop of Alexandria. After Arius was excommunicated by a council of Egyptian and Libyan bishops, he traveled to Palestine and Syria and found support for his teaching among prominent church leaders such as Eusebius of Caesarea and Eusebius of Nicomedia. Arius's teaching, now called Arianism, spread and led to such controversy that the emperor, Constantine, convened an ecumenical council in Nicaea in 325. The council rejected Arius's doctrine and banished him to Illyricum. In 327, Arius accepted a controverted formulation of the faith and presented Constantine with a written statement of his beliefs. Arius died shortly before reinstatement as a presbyter in Alexandria. See also Arianism.

Arius (left), whose name is forever associated with one of the earliest and most divisive heresies of the Church, with the Islamic philosopher Averroës; fourteenth-century painting by Andrea Bonaiuti, Santa Maria Novella, Florence.

Arles, Council of, three different episcopal synods convened in the Greco-Roman city of Arelate, the present-day city of Arles in south central France. The first Synod was convened on August 1, 314, by Constantine, the first ecclesiastical synod convoked by a Roman emperor. It met to resolve a dispute between supporters of the Carthaginian bishop Caecilian, who had been granted communion with Rome and the churches north of the Mediterranean, and supporters of Donatus, whose predecessor had been ordained by the Numidian bishops. The council supported Rome's earlier decision—and the preference of Constantine—to declare the Donatist episcopacy illegitimate. The effect of this council was to exacerbate the Donatist schism in North Africa. A second synod met at Arles in 353 under the Arian emperor Constantius to carry out his intention to condemn Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria. Yet another synod met at Arles around 473 to consider the extreme predestinarian teaching of a Gallic priest, Lucidus, who was compelled to sign a letter of retraction. See also Athanasius, St.; Donatism; predestination.

Armageddon (ahr-mah-ged'uhn), a place-name appearing in Rev 16:16. The Greek text actually reads Harmagedon, identified as a Hebrew word. The most likely interpretation of the name would be "Mount Magedon," usually understood as a reference to the biblical city of Megiddo, a site of famous battles (Judg 4–5; 2 Kgs 9:27). A problem with the interpretation is that Megiddo is not on or near a mountain. The emended reading, Armageddon, could be understood as "City of Megiddo."

Whatever the source of the image, Armageddon has come to symbolize both the place of final confrontation between the forces of good and evil and the confrontation itself. This interpretation is rooted in Rev 16, which describes the gathering of the kings of the East and the unclean spirits sent by the forces of evil, the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet, who come to assault the saints.

Interpreters have debated the significance of the imagery of Revelation throughout Christian history. Some understand the text to predict a literal battle in the end time between Christ and the forces of evil. For them Armageddon is a place, either in Israel or elsewhere, where a decisive battle will take place. Others argue that the text uses imagery to symbolize the eternal confrontation of the forces of good and evil. Still others argue that the author himself assumed that an eschatological battle at a specific place was imminent, but that the struggle continues throughout history. Catholic interpreters have tended to favor a symbolic interpretation. For them, Armageddon refers not a specific site of a battle yet to come but is an evocative allusion to a place where the people of God have often confronted their enemies. That confrontation, in fact, goes on in every age and locale.

In the military rivalry of the cold-war period Armageddon came to symbolize the possibility of total destruction of the world in a nuclear holocaust. Those who have favored a literalist reading of Revelation found support for that reading in such a political and military scenario. See also apocalypse; apocalypticism; eschatology, universal. HAROLD W. ATTRIDGE Armagh, Book of, a collection of texts assembled at Armagh in 807 for its abbot, Torbach. Now at Trinity College, Dublin, the manuscript contains a full NT, the Life of St. Martin by Sulpicius Severus, the Confession of St. Patrick, and several Patrician documents written during the seventh century, when Armagh claimed ecclesiastical supremacy and actively promoted the cult of its (probable) founder. See also Ireland, Catholicism in.

Armenia, Church in. See Armenian Catholic Church.

Armenian Catholic Church, the ecclesiastical community of Armenian-rite Catholics who are in communion with Rome. It is the Catholic counterpart of the Armenian Apostolic Church that was formed after the Council of Chalcedon (451) when the Armenians, for reasons that were as much political as theological, refused to accept the Christological teaching of the council that in Christ there are two natures, one human and one divine, and not only a single divine nature, as the Monophysites held.

Armenian Catholics are descendants of those

Armenian Orthodox Christians of Little Armenia (Cilicia) who, from the end of the twelfth century until 1375, enjoyed political independence. During this same period they came into contact with the Crusaders as they passed through Asia Minor on their way to the Holy Land. As a result, they absorbed from the Crusaders some Latin liturgical usages. An alliance between the Crusaders and the Armenian king contributed to the establishment of a union between the Church of Rome and the Armenian Apostolic Church in 1198. However, the union was not accepted by Armenians outside of Cilicia, and it ended with the conquest of the Armenian kingdom by the Tatars in 1375. The relatively small Armenian Catholic Church is what remains of that union.

At the Council of Florence a decree of reunion with the Armenians was published in 1439. Although it had no immediate results, the document provided the doctrinal basis for the establishment of an Armenian Catholic Church much later.

Catholic missionary activity among the Armenians had begun early, led initially by the Friars of Union, a now-defunct Armenian community related to the Dominicans, founded in 1320. With the passage of time, scattered but growing Armenian Catholic communities began to ask for a proper ecclesial structure and their own patriarch. In 1742 Pope Benedict XIV confirmed a former Armenian Apostolic bishop, Abraham Ardzivian (1679–1749) as patriarch of Cilicia of the Armenians, based in Lebanon, and with religious authority over the Armenian Catholics in the southern provinces of the Ottoman Empire. In the north, they continued to be under the spiritual care of the Latin vicar apostolic in Constantinople. The new patriarch took the name Abraham Pierre I, and all his successors have likewise taken the name Pierre in their ecclesiastical title.

The Ottoman government had placed all Armenian Catholics under the civil jurisdiction of the Armenian Apostolic patriarch in Constantinople. This resulted in serious difficulties for Armenian Catholics and even persecutions until 1829 when, under French pressure, the Ottoman government gave them the right to be organized civilly as a separate group, known as a millet, with an archbishop of their own in Constantinople. In 1846 he was vested with civil authority as well. The anomaly of having an archbishop with both civil and religious authority in the Ottoman capital and an exclusively spiritual patriarch in Lebanon was resolved in 1867 when Pope Pius IX united the two sees and moved the patriarchal residence to Constantinople.

The vicious persecution of Armenians in Turkey at the end of World War I decimated the Armenian Catholic community in that country: 7 bishops, 130 priests, 47 nuns, and as many as 100,000 faithful died. Since the community in Turkey had been drastically reduced in size, an Armenian Catholic synod in Rome in 1928 decided to transfer the patriarchate back to Lebanon (Beirut), and to make Constantinople (now Istanbul) an archbishopric.

There were also a number of Armenian Catholic communities in the section of historic Armenia that came under Russian control in 1828. Pius IX established the diocese of Artvin for all Armenian Catholics in the Russian empire in 1850. But czarist opposition to Eastern-rite Catholicism resulted in the abandonment of the Artvin diocese within forty years. In 1912 the Armenian Catholics in the empire were placed under the distant Latin bishop of Tiraspol. The Armenian Catholic Church was entirely suppressed under Communism, and it was only with the independence of Armenia in September 1991 that communities of Armenian Catholics began to resurface. In October 1991 the Holy See established an Ordinariat for Armenian Catholics in Eastern Europe based in the new republic.

The oldest Armenian Catholic religious order is now the Mechitarist Fathers, founded in Constantinople in 1701. It transferred to the island of San Lazzaro, Venice, in 1717. In 1811 a second foundation of Mechitarists was set up in Vienna. These two communities have long served the entire Armenian nation through their scholarship both in Europe and the Middle East.

The Armenian Sisters of the Immaculate Conception were founded in Constantinople in 1847. The community, whose motherhouse has been in Rome since 1922, is dedicated to the education of Armenian girls.

A brotherhood of priests at Bzoummar, Lebanon, has an extensive library and a seminary that dates back to 1771. For higher theological studies, an Armenian College was founded in Rome in 1883. In 1992 a proposal to open a seminary in Armenia was being considered.

Today the largest concentrations of Armenian Catholics are in Beirut, Lebanon, and Aleppo, Syria. The church has seven dioceses in the Middle East: two in Syria and one each in Lebanon, Iraq, Iran, Egypt, and Turkey. Dioceses have also been established for the growing diaspora to North America,

France, and Argentina. The total membership in 1992 was about 150,000. See also Armenian rite; Chalcedon, Council of; Eastern Catholics and ecumenism; Eastern Catholics and Rome; Eastern churches; Eastern liturgies; Eastern rites. RONALD G. ROBERSON Armenian rite, the liturgical tradition of the Armenian Apostolic (Orthodox) and Catholic churches, which developed in Armenia from the native genius via cultural exchanges with its two principal neighboring churches from the fifth century through the Middle Ages.

Early Armenia, centered around Lake Van (eastern Turkey), was a buffer state between the Byzantine and Persian empires, the two superpowers of late antiquity, and later became the prey of Arab and Turkish invaders. Evangelized by two traditions, the first in the southern provinces in perhaps the second and third centuries from Syriac Osrhoene and Adiabene in the south and the second in the fourth and fifth centuries from Greek Cappadocia to the east under the Apostle of Armenia, St. Gregory the Illuminator (ca. 231–325, an Armenian educated in Caesarea in Cappadocia and consecrated bishop there around 302). Early Armenian liturgy and Bible translations show the traces left by both influences, though the Cappadocian and later Byzantine strains would ultimately predominate.

The earliest liturgical celebrations in Armenia were in Syriac and Greek. From the fifth to the seventh centuries the indigenous Armenian Christian tradition was in the golden age of its formation. This period also saw the conversion of Greater Armenia and the formation of an independent Armenian church, which separated from its neighboring Nestorian (East Syrian) and Chalcedonian (Byzantine) churches after the councils of Ephesus (431) and Chalcedon (451). But the Armenians, more ritually tolerant than their Byzantine neighbors, remained open to outside liturgical influences, which can be observed in several phases. The development of the Armenian alphabet in this period permitted the growth of a native Christian literature, including the liturgy in Armenian. During this golden age the influence of the liturgical tradition of Jersualem is preponderant, above all in the development of the Armenian calendar and lectionary system.

A period of byzantinization followed, from the ninth to the thirteenth centuries, when much of Armenia was under Byzantine dominance. This second wave of Greek influence, noticeable especially in the eucharistic liturgy, has misled some to wrongly consider the Armenian rite a branch of the Byzantine. In fact, it is a fully distinct liturgical tradition.

Then, in the twelfth through fourteenth centuries, as the Armenians came into contact with Crusaders passing through Asia Minor en route to the Holy Land, some Latin liturgical usages were absorbed. This was a freely accepted cultural exchange and cannot be stigmatized like the "latinization" that has occurred in modern times among the Armenians united to the Catholic Church, when pefectly legitimate native traditions such as the unmixed chalice, the creed without the Filioque, the consecratory epiclesis, and the Theopaschite Trisagion were modified to conform to Latin prejudices and misunderstanding. The restoration of the Armenian Catholic liturgical books presently under way under the guidance of the Vatican Congregation for the Oriental Churches has purged the liturgical books of these latinizations.

The Armenian rite is distinguished by its cross-in-square, triple-apsed churches with their stagelike sanctuary and distinctive conical roof on a high drum; the baroque opulence of its vestments; and the haunting beauty of its chant, often with organ accompaniment, unlike other Eastern traditions where all but percussion instruments are banned. Other distinguishing traits are the complicated system of sanctoral commemorations in the calendar, the use of unleavened bread, and the chalice unmixed with water at the Eucharist, and, in the Divine Office, a different division of the hours. The Armenian Orthodox no longer practice the sacrament of the Anointing of the Sick, though it is found in the liturgical manuscripts of the tradition. See also Armenian Catholic Church; Eastern rites; rite.

ROBERT F. TAFT

Arnauld, Antoine (ahr-noh'), 1612–94, Janenist theologian. Known as the "great Arnauld," he came under the influence of Abbé St. Cyran, the leader of the Jansenists. With his De la fréquente communion (On Frequent Communion, 1643) he began a lifelong struggle against the Jesuits. Retiring to Port-Royal in the 1640s, he continued his attacks on the Jesuits and his defense of Jansenism from there for thirty years. In 1655 he argued that the pope had condemned articles not found in Jansen's works, which resulted in his expulsion from the Sorbonne. He died in exile in Brussels after defending the "Gallican Liberties" against Louis XIV (1679). See also Jansenism; Port-Royal Arnauld, Jacqueline Marie Angélique (ahrnoh'), 1591–1661, Mother Angélique, abbess and reformer of Port-Royal. Appointed coadjutor to the abbess of Port-Royal at the age of seven, she succeeded to that post in 1602. In 1608 she experienced a conversion and proceeded to reform that worldly cloister. The community of Port-Royal replaced her as abbess in 1630, but she was still able to effect the appointment of the Jansenist leader Abbé St. Cyran as spiritual director in 1636. In her second term as abbess (1642–55) Port-Royal became the center of the Jansenist movement involving her own brother Antoine Arnauld and the brilliant mathematician Blaise Pascal. See also Jansenism; Pascal, Blaise; Port-Royal.

Arnobius, d. ca. 327, North African apologist and rhetorician. An opponent of Christianity before converting late in life, he wrote the seven-volume Against the Nations during the Great Persecution (303–11). Although his thought is unsystematic and shows little familiarity with Scripture, he argues that Christianity agrees with the best pagan philosophy and rebuts charges that Christians caused the empire's misfortunes. See also Apologists.

Arnold of Brescia, ca. 1100–55, radical Church reformer who argued for the absolute poverty of the clergy and their abandonment of temporal power. Condemned at the Second Lateran Council (1139) and the Council of Sens (1141), he joined forces with the Roman senate and forced Pope Eugenius III from Rome in 1145. Himself driven from Rome in 1154, Arnold was returned, tried, and executed the following year.

Arrowsmith, St. Edmund, 1585–1628, one of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales canonized in 1970. Ordained at Douai in 1612 and sent on the English mission, he joined the Jesuits in 1624 and was executed in 1628. Feast day: August 28. See also Forty Martyrs of England and Wales.

Arrupe, Pedro, 1907–91, Jesuit superior general. Born in the Basque region of Spain, he entered the Society of Jesus in 1927, was ordained in 1936, and served as a missionary in Japan from 1938 to 1965, where he cared for the wounded, sick, and dying after the dropping of the atomic bomb on Hiroshima on August 6, 1945. As superior general of the Society of Jesus (1965–83), he led the Jesuits through the difficult post-Vatican II period of renewal, emphasizing the theme "a faith that does justice." His influence extended beyond the Jesuit order to other religious communities and the Church at large. See also Jesuits.

art. See Catholicism and the visual arts; liturgical art.

artificial insemination, any treatment to fertilize a woman by a means that is a substitute for natural intercourse. In its broadest sense, therefore, it would include in vitro fertilization with embryo transfer (IVF) and gamete intrafallopian transfer (GIFT). These two, however, are generally treated as separate forms of reproductive technology distinct from artificial insemination. In its proper (narrow) sense, artificial insemination refers to the aspiration of semen (obtained either by masturbation, interrupted intercourse, condomistic relations, or various massage techniques, etc.) into the cervical canal. Artificial insemination may occur using the husband's semen (AIH) or that of a donor (AID).

At the level of official Catholic teaching, Pope Pius XII had most to say about the practice of AID. He rejected it utterly. He stated that only the spouses have, by virtue of the matrimonial contract, a reciprocal right to each other's body and generative acts, a right that is, as Pius XII says, "exclusive, nontransferable, inalienable." Pius also appealed to the good of the child in his rejection of AID.

Most Catholic moral theologians have employed these and other supportive arguments to reject AID, though a small minority believe that the procedure is morally acceptable given careful counseling and the fulfillment of other stringent conditions.

Pius XII also rejected AIH in 1949 and 1951. His main reason for rejecting AIH seems to be the dignity of the married partners; he saw AIH as an attack on this dignity.

In 1987 there appeared Donum Vitae, Instruction on Respect for Human Life in Its Origin and on the Dignity of Procreation, from the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. The instruction rejected heterologous insemination (AID) as a "violation of the reciprocal commitment of the spouses and a grave lack in regard to that essential property of marriage which is its unity."

As for homologous artificial insemination (AIH), it rejected it also as "procreation ... deprived of its proper perfection" and an attack on spousal dignity. It appealed to the teaching of Humanae Vitae (1968) about the "inseparable connection, willed by God and unable to be broken by man on his own initiative, between the two meanings of the conjugal act: the unitive meaning and the procreative meaning." Where contraception separates these two meanings by having the unitive while blocking the procreative, "homologous artificial fertilization, in seeking a procreation which is not the fruit of a specific act of conjugal union, objectively effects an analogous separation between the goods and the meanings of marriage."

While rejection of AIH remains official Catholic teaching, the teaching is not accepted by many Catholic people (theologians, bishops, laypeople), much as the central conclusion of Humanae Vitae condemning every act of contraception remains contested by a great majority of the Catholic world. See also bioethics; reproductive technologies.

RICHARD A. MCCORMICK

Ascension, the translation of Jesus to heaven. In the Scriptures, many ancient holy figures were said to be taken up to heaven, especially Enoch (Gen 5:24) and Elijah (2 Kgs 2:1–14). Later, other great figures joined them in being raised to heaven, such as Baruch, Ezra, and Moses. In the Greco-Roman world, heroes as well as emperors renowned for their great deeds were taken to the heavens and exalted as deities (Livy History 1.16.1–8; see Justin, First Apology 1.54; Dialogue with Trypho 69). Thus, ascension to the heavens came to be expected of holy and great persons; it indicated divine approval of them as well as their accession to heavenly power.

The ascension of Christ into heaven, the prelude to his enthronement at the right hand of the Father; twentieth-century painting on linen by Frederick Brown, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York.

Jesus was raised not only to life but also to heaven (Luke 24:50–51; Acts 1:2–12). This act by God acclaims his vindication over his enemies as well as his enthronement at the right hand of God (Acts 2:33–36; Heb 1:3–4). Some versions of the story speak both of prior descent and subsequent ascent (John 6:62), thus articulating more clearly Jesus' original heavenly status. Yet his "descent/ascent" might mean simply his descent into death, followed by his vindication and ascent to God (Eph 4:8–10). Jesus' ascension, then, was first interpreted as God's action on his behalf, bestowing honor that cancelled the shame of the cross. Later it indicated Jesus' accession to heavenly rule as Lord, seated at God's right hand. Finally, as understanding of Jesus as a divine figure matured, Jesus was said to ascend of his own power to the glory he originally had. Since the ancients imagined God in the "heavens," seated on a throne, when Jesus is brought into God's presence, he must "ascend" to where God is. See also Ascension, Feast of; Jesus Christ.

JEROME NEYREY

Ascension, Feast of, the day commemorating Christ's return to heaven forty days after his Resurrection. It is observed on the Thursday before the Seventh Sunday of Easter, and is a holy day of obligation in the universal Church. The Ascension is the final event of Jesus' visible earthly ministry. The Feast of the Ascension may be regarded as the day on which Jesus, in his glorified body, took his seat at the right hand of God. This feast may also be interpreted metaphorically as an expression of the enduring relationship between the transcendent Jesus and the community he left behind. It was through the Ascension that Jesus' supremacy over creation was revealed; it was the Ascension, too, which made possible the sending of the Holy Spirit on Pentecost. Just as the Resurrection expressed the reality of Jesus' triumph over death, revealing Jesus as the Risen Christ, so the Ascension assures believers that Jesus is eternally present with God. After the Ascension, Jesus was no longer present among his followers in a physical sense; paradoxically, the ascended Jesus is forever present in the world. See also Ascension.

Ascent of Mount Carmel. See John of the Cross, St.

ascetical theology, branch of theology concerned with the spiritual life taught in Catholic seminaries in the nineteenth and first half of the twentieth centuries. Its methodology was neo-Scholastic and covered the nonmystical aspects of what, with mystical theology, was also known as spiritual theology. The same materials, including the mystical aspects, are now studied in a course called spirituality or Christian spirituality. The manual most frequently used in ascetical theology during the first half of the twentieth century was Adolf Tanquerey's The Spiritual Life: A Treatise on Ascetical and Mystical Theology, a text used also in novitiates, female and male. See also mystical theology; spirituality, Christian; Tanquerey, Adolf Alfred.

asceticism (Gk., askesis, "exercise"), the practice of religious discipline with an emphasis on self-control and the fostering of virtue. The notion was taken over by Christians from Greek philosophers. Asceticism has affinity with terms like abnegation, mortification, self-denial, renunciation, and penance. Christian asceticism is rooted in a discipleship that is an imitation of Christ, whose life and death served as a model for the ascetics of the deserts of Egypt and Palestine. Other models were John the Baptist and Paul the Apostle. The latter offered his life as a pattern for others. According to Paul, the baptized through their asceticism participate in the dying and rising of Jesus.

Key themes in the Christian life during its first centuries were martyrdom, virginity, and widowhood. After the end of the persecution, self-denial in various forms was a way of living the commitment of the martyrs. Monasticism in the late third century broadened the scope of Christian asceticism. Anthony of Egypt (d. 356) became the personification of the Christian ascetic. His Life written by Athanasius (d. 373) spread word of Anthony throughout the Christian world. This asceticism of the desert sought to restore a fuller humanity through the control of passion and desire. Jerome (d. 420) and John Cassian (d. ca. 435) were also figures whose writings brought the asceticism of the East to the attention of Western Christians. Augustine (d. 430) accented the grace of God but also encouraged self-control. The Rule of St. Benedict taught moderation in asceticism, though in the tradition physical asceticism at times became dominant.

In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries an intense devotion to the humanity of Jesus developed that drew attention to his suffering and death. Franciscans especially spread this theme. The Devotio Moderna movement in the late Middle Ages brought ascetical practices of monasticism into the life of the laity.

Protestantism reacted against ascetical practices like clerical celibacy, though Protestant Pietism tried to find a balance in this rejection of asceticism. Ignatius of Loyola (d. 1556) taught his followers that asceticism is at the service of ministry, and John of the Cross (d. 1591) emphasized an asceticism of the heart as a means of liberating one from the disordered attachments that keep one from the quest for God.

Vatican II (1962–65) marked a reaction against the formalism of asceticism. Fasting, abstinence from meat, and Lenten self-denial no longer received in the Catholic community the same attention they once did. Yet, there is a new interest in the ascetical confrontation of addictions to food, drugs, alcohol, tobacco, and whatever else holds the heart prisoner. In addition, there is a contemporary concern to develop an asceticism that respects modern psychological insights and that is based on the duties of one's life, e.g., the discipline required in parenting and building community. Moreover, wisdom from the tradition points to liberation as asceticism's fundamental role in the Christian life, a freedom to accept and give love. Therefore, asceticism and mysticism are no longer seen as opposites. See also mysticism; spirituality, Christian. KEITH J. EGAN ashes, symbols of penance and reconciliation, at present used in the Roman liturgy only on Ash Wednesday and in the rite for the dedication of a church. The ashes come from the burning of the palms used on Passion Sunday of the previous year. The Christian use of ashes is rooted in the Jewish custom of sprinkling ashes on the head as a sign of repentance. See also Ash Wednesday.

Ash Wednesday, the first day of Lent. On this day, ashes are blessed and applied to the foreheads of the faithful as a sign of penance. In the fourth century, public penitents dressed in sackcloth and were sprinkled with ashes to show their repentance. The practice of public penance gradually died out. By the eleventh century, it had become customary for the faithful to receive ashes at the beginning of Lent, the season of penance in preparation for the celebration of Easter. On Ash Wednesday, ashes may be distributed during Mass, usually after the homily, or outside of Mass; in the latter case, the distribution takes place as part of a Liturgy of the Word. The traditional formula for the placing of ashes on the forehead is, "Remember you are dust and will return to dust." The formula "Turn from sin and live the gospel" is frequently used today. In the Roman calendar, Ash Wednesday is a day of fast and abstinence. See also abstinence; ashes; fasting; Lent.

Asia, spirituality of, an experience of the sacred founded on the Vedic scriptures (1800–500 B.C.) and encompassing several religions—Hinduism, Buddhism, Confucianism, and Taoism. Many Catholics have incorporated elements of Asian spirituality into their own prayer and meditation.

Most spiritual traditions deriving from Hinduism, the major religion of India, are called yogas. Important recent Indian yogas include Ramakrishna's (d. 1886) devotional practices, Ramana Maharsi's yoga of discriminating wisdom, and Sri Aurobindo's (d. 1950) integral yoga which encompasses various schools.

Ramana Maharsi strongly influenced Benedictine monks who established in 1950 a Hindu style Benedictine monastery in southern India. Bede Griffiths (d. 1993) was a member of this community. Their work brought Hindu ideas into both Catholic practice and integrative theoretical work in the United States and Europe. The early yoga of Patanjali (ca. 500 B.C.) also appears in posture, breathing, and mantra (Sanskrit, "sacred word") meditation practices used by Catholics.

Theravadan ("school of elders") Buddhism, begun around 500 B.C. and found mainly in southeast Asia, represents early Buddhist thought. Its practice of vipassana (Pali, "insight"), or insight meditation, has been perceived as being compatible with the teachings of the mystic John of the Cross.

Mahayana ("great vehicle"), or northern Buddhism, incorporated elements of Taoism and Asian folk religion. Its many forms include Zen Buddhism. The Jesuit tradition has developed zen practices, and some Jesuit priests are also zen masters. Some Mahayana Buddhism, influenced by Christian missionaries, has taken on an ecclesial expression.

Most martial arts, used by some Catholics as part of their spiritual practice, developed from Chinese Taoism and Confucianism. Taoist tai chi, meditative posturing, is also popular with some Catholics.

The Trappist monk Thomas Merton (d. 1968) was also strongly influenced by Asian spirituality, but of the Buddhist, not Hindu, variety. See also Merton, Thomas; spirituality, Christian. MARY JO MEADOW Asia Minor, land mass roughly equivalent to modern Turkey, site of some of the earliest Christian communities outside of Palestine and Syria. This is established, e.g., by Paul's Letter to the Galatians, the Letter to the Ephesians, and the account in Acts of Paul's missionary journeys there. 1 Peter was written from Rome to churches in Asia Minor (perhaps ca. 70); the seven churches of the book of Revelation (Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamum, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, and Laodicea) are all in Asia Minor; 2 John indicates the presence of a Johannine community at Ephesus. Ignatius of Antioch passed through Asia Minor on his way to martyrdom in Rome, perhaps toward the end of the reign of Trajan (98–117). Stopping at Smyrna, where he met Polycarp, the bishop, he wrote letters to the churches at Ephesus, Magnesia, Tralles (and Rome); from Troas, he wrote, in addition, to Philadelphia and Smyrna, and to Polycarp (whose own letter to the Philippians is also extant). Earlier in Trajan's reign (112), Pliny, the governor of Bithynia, had written to Trajan inquiring about the proper treatment of Christians. Trajan's answer—that Christianity in itself was a capital offense but that Christians were to be freed if they recanted, that they were not to be sought out, and that no anonymous denunciations were to be accepted—indicates the growing prominence of Christianity in Bithynia.

The Church of Asia Minor is connected to the West through Irenaeus, bishop of Lyons from ca. 178, who was born in Smyrna, knew Polycarp, and could recall Polycarp's reminiscences of Papias (bishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia in the early second century) and his stories about "John" (whether "Apostle" or "Elder" is not clear). Irenaeus echoes Papias's millenarianism. While still a presbyter, Irenaeus presented to Pope Eleutherus, on behalf of the church of Lyons, a defense of the Montanists, the ecstatic, apocalyptic movement that had arisen in Phrygia ca. 170 and that ultimately gained Tertullian as an adherent. In a letter (190) to Pope Victor, Irenaeus also defended the cause of the churches of Asia Minor who wished to preserve their Quartodeciman practice regarding the date of Easter (i.e., celebrating it on the day of Passover), the theology of which is reflected in a homily of Melito of Sardis On the Pasch, written in the last third of the second century. Polycarp, martyred at Smyrna ca. 156, had himself defended this practice in a mid-century visit to Pope Anicetus.

Also in Rome in the mid-second century was Marcion, a shipowner from Sinope in the Pontus, excommunicated from the Roman church ca. 144 for rejecting the Hebrew Bible and its God. In the third century Gregory Thaumaturgus (ca. 210–70), bishop of Neocaesarea in the Pontus from the 240s, wrote a famous encomium on Origen, with whom he had studied ca. 233–38. He had to flee the persecution of the Roman emperor Decius (249–51); later, he participated in the excommunication of Paul of Samosata at a synod in the 260s. The Great Persecution of the early fourth century began with the demolition of the church at Nicomedia in 304 and the burning of its Scriptures. Christian resistance prompted Diocletian's massacre of 268 Christians at Nicomedia; Bithynia was also subjected to terror.

In the Arian controversy the churches of Asia Minor made crucial contributions to the articulation of orthodox trinitarian teaching, most notably in the work of the Cappadocian theologians Basil the Great, Gregory of Nazianzus, and Gregory of Nyssa. The first ecumenical council was held at Nicaea (325); Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia ca. 317–342, was one of the foremost champions of Arius, as was Theogonis of Nicaea (d. before 343) and Asterius the Sophist, a layman from Cappadocia (d. ca. 341). Eusebius was one of the most trusted advisers of Constantine; he baptized Constantine on his deathbed (337). Marcellus of Ancyra (ca. 280–ca. 374) was one of the early defenders of the Nicene Creed, but he was suspected of Modalism and finally condemned by the Council of Constantinople (381), which added the line "whose kingdom will have no end" to the creed against his teaching. Basil of Ancyra (d. after 363, bishop of Ancyra from 336, when Marcellus was deposed), who had been a physician, played a major role in reconciling the most moderate of the Arian party, the homoiousians, with the orthodox Nicenes. Amphilochius (ca. 340–ca. 395), bishop of Iconium from 373 and cousin of Gregory of Nazianzus, played a role in the defense of the divinity of the Holy Spirit.

After the fourth century the prominence of the Church in Asia Minor was eclipsed by controversies centering on Alexandria, Constantinople, and Antioch. Although the councils that grew out of these controversies (Ephesus, 431; the "Robber Council" of Ephesus, 449; Chalcedon, 451) were held there, the churches of Asia Minor never regained their earlier prominence. See also Arianism; Cappadocian Fathers; Constantinople; Eusebius of Caesarea; Gregory Thaumaturgus, St.; Irenaeus of Lyons, St.; Modalism; Montanism; Nicaea, First Council of. JOHN C. CAVADINI asperges (ah-spair'juhs; Lat., aspergere, "to sprinkle"), the ceremony in which a priest sprinkles the congregation with holy water. The name echoes the words of Ps 51: "Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean." Purging with hyssop is a reference to a ceremony of sprinkling mentioned in Exod 12:22 and Lev 14:51. An older translation of "purge" is "sprinkle." This is the ordinary psalm used with the Rite of Sprinkling, as it is now called, except during the Easter Season, when the antiphon Vidi aquam (Lat., "I saw water") is sung. See also holy water.

aspergillum (ah-spair-jil'uhm; Lat., "sprinkler"), the liturgical instrument used to sprinkle people and objects with holy water. The aspergillum, or aspergill, may consist of a silver, brass, or wooden handle with a long brush or hollow pierced orb through which the water is sprinkled. The handle also may be hollow to hold more water. See also holy water.

aspersion, a method of baptism, in which the candidate is sprinkled with baptismal water. In the West, the usual manner of conferring Baptism is through the pouring of water (affusion) on the candidate's head while the baptismal formula is pronounced. Immersion in water is also an approved method of conferring the sacrament. Aspersion is permissible only in exceptional circumstances. See also Baptism.

Aspergillum

aspirant, a title formerly used in some Catholic religious communities for those seeking admission but not yet received formally as postulants or novices. See also novice; postulant.

assembly (Fr., assembler; Lat., assimulare, "to assemble"), liturgical term used to describe the community gathered for worship. The reality expressed by the term is ultimately derived from the Hebrew kāhāl, a word signifying both the divine call summoning the faithful to gather and those who respond to that call as a community, and then from the Greek ekklesia. Originally used by Christians with reference to the local community of Jerusalem, ekklesia soon signified not only the local community but also the universal Church. Vatican II (1962–65) emphasized in its Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy the importance of the assembly by declaring that the liturgical event is, above all else, the place in which the Church's basic reality is manifestly actualized. The liturgical assembly is a community of faith; it is in the prayer of that community that ecclesial faith resides. Christ is present in an active way in the liturgical assembly, presiding at the community's prayer (n. 7). To be complete, liturgical actions must be marked by full participation on the part of all the members, in union with Christ and with one another (n. 14). See also worship.

associate pastor. See parochial vicar.

Association for the Rights of Catholics in the Church, an organization formed by a group of lay Catholics in 1980 in response to the Vatican's censuring of prominent theologians, such as Hans Küng. Its stated goal is to bring about substantive structural change in the Church. Its headquarters is in Delran, New Jersey. It publishes a regular newsletter called Light.

Association of Catholic Trade Unionists (ACTU), a national lay organization of Catholic trade unionists, established to instruct its members in the Church's social and economic teachings and thereby to influence the American labor movement. Begun in 1937 in New York City, its founders were active in the Catholic Worker movement but thought that movement too utopian and not effective in dealing with Communist influence in labor unions. Organized in local chapters in major cities, the ACTU was loosely joined together nationally. The local chapters sponsored schools to provide instruction in papal social encyclicals, public speaking, parliamentary procedure, the ethics of labor, labor history, and industrial relations. The ACTU fought corrupt, racketeering unions and Communist influence in the labor movement. It regularly supported union organizing, striking workers, unions struggling against Communist control, and the spread of the industrial union movement as represented in the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO).

Association of Contemplative Sisters (ACS), an organization formed in 1969 to support the contemplative religious orders. In 1986 the ACS opened its membership to all women who pursue a life of prayer.

associations of the Christian faithful, groupings of the faithful, distinct from religious orders and congregations and from institutes of consecrated life and societies of apostolic life, that exist for religious and/or apostolic ends. They may take many forms, some of which have a closer relationship with Church authority than others, e.g., Association for the Rights of Catholics in the Church, National Federation of Priests' Councils. At times such an association is the genesis of a religious institute. See also Association for the Rights of Catholics in the Church; Association of Catholic Trade Unionists; National Federation of Priests' Councils.

Assumptionists, a congregation of priests with the title Augustinians of the Assumption (A. A.). Emmanuel d'Alzon (1810–80), a priest of the diocese of Nîmes, France, and an Ultramontanist, founded the Assumptionists in 1845 and remained their superior general until his death. He also founded the Oblate Sisters of the Assumption. Several other congregations of women have, through their origins, a kinship with the Assumptionists: the Ladies of the Assumption, Little Sisters of the Assumption, and the Orantes of the Assumption. The ministry of the congregation has been directed to the Christian education of youth, missionary activities, parishes, social apostolates, the Catholic press, and the sponsorship of pilgrimages. The congregation has been much involved in efforts toward Christian unity, especially relations with Eastern churches.

The spirituality derived from d'Alzon was trinitarian and Christological with roots in the French spirituality of the seventeenth century. D'Alzon's writings have been published as Les Cahiers d'Alzon (Paris). Francis Picard, the next superior general, 1880–1903, had a profound impact on the spirituality of the congregation, especially through his Circular Letters.

The Assumptionists conduct Assumption College in Worcester, Massachusetts, founded in 1904. A tornado almost completely destroyed the campus in 1953. A new campus replaced the old. There are undergraduate and graduate programs at the college. In accord with the intellectual goals of the congregation, this Assumptionist college maintains an affiliation with the congregation's Institute of Augustinian Studies and its Institute of Byzantine Studies, both in Paris, France. The headquarters of the Assumptionists is in Rome. KEITH J. EGAN Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the dogma that at the end of her life Mary was taken body and soul into heaven. Promulgated by Pius XII in the papal bull Munificentissimus Deus on November 1, 1950, and celebrated liturgically on August 15, this dogma states that "the Immaculate Mother of God, Mary ever Virgin, when the course of her earthly life was finished, was taken up body and soul into the glory of heaven." In this definition no position is taken on the disputed question of whether Mary actually died, nor are any historical details given. Rather, with the encouragement of 98 percent of the Catholic bishops who affirmed that the doctrine was both possible and opportune, the pope declared the faith of the Church that Mary in the fullness of her historical personality lives now in union with the risen Christ.

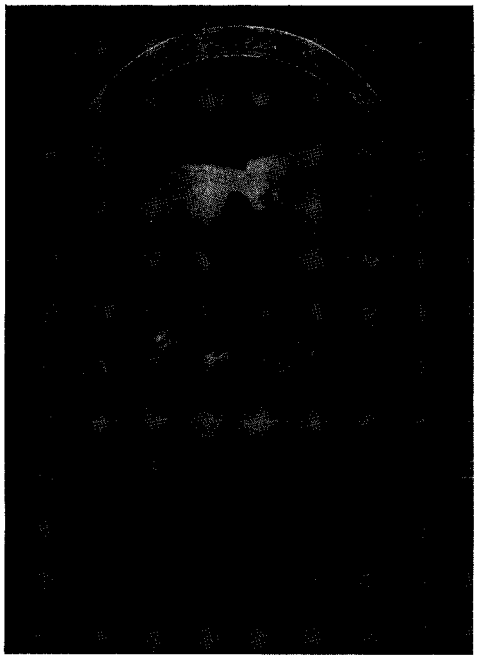
The Blessed Virgin Mary bodily assumed into heaven; sixteenth-century painting by Titian in the church of Santa Maria dei Frari, Venice.



History: Scripture holds no clear evidence for this belief, although the woman clothed with the sun (Rev 12) is interpreted as a significant pointer. Patristic writings are likewise silent. Belief in Mary's Assumption first appeared in the sixth century when her feast day, which like the feasts of all the saints and martyrs celebrated the day of her death, coalesced with an apocryphal narrative (Transitus Mariae) purporting to give details about her death, funeral, empty tomb, and bodily reception into heaven. Then in various Eastern churches and by the mid-seventh century in Rome, Mary's main feast day became a celebration of her bodily assumption into heaven.

Belief in this doctrine developed mainly through preaching and devotional literature. Sermons explored the suitability of the Assumption: in view of Mary's salvific mission as Mother of God, it was fitting that she taste death but not that she undergo the corruption of the tomb. She gave bodily life to Christ as it was within her maternal power to do; fittingly, he returned the favor and gave life to her body, as it was within his divine power.

In the West during the Middle Ages these arguments were augmented by the appeal to Christ's filial piety toward his mother (he obeyed the Fourth Commandment requiring honor for one's parents) and by recoil at the image that the flesh that gave birth to Christ should be "consumed by worms." From the thirteenth century onward, any vacillation between agnosticism or affirmation on the question ended as, using Scholastic reasoning (potuit, voluit, fecit, Lat., "he could [do it], he willed [to do it], he did [it]"), theologians such as Aquinas and Bonaventure validated the belief.

Theology: The papal decree on the Assumption contains an element of interpretation consistently found in subsequent theology. Alluding to the bloody world wars of the twentieth century and the growth of materialism, the document deplores how the destruction of life, the desecration of the human body, and moral corruption threaten to obviate our human sense of our God-given identity. By holding forth the example of Mary, Pope Pius XII intended that "the exalted destiny of both our soul and body may in this striking manner be brought clearly to the notice of all persons," with subsequent growth in virtue and care for others.

The Assumption thus has a universal significance. The religious meaning of this dogma centers on the eschatological victory of God's grace, freely given in Christ, which consecrates and ultimately saves the whole person, both body and soul. God's creation of the new heaven and new earth, inaugurated in the Resurrection of Jesus, comes to further fruition in this woman who embodies the final destiny of all the redeemed in Christ. In her very person she participates in the new life promised to the human race through the word of the Cross. In so doing, she signifies to all persons caught in the struggle of history that the loving power of God will prevail. With this in mind Vatican II writes:

"In the bodily and spiritual glory which she possesses in heaven, the Mother of Jesus continues ... as the image and first flowering of the Church as she is to be perfected in the world to come. Likewise, Mary shines forth on earth, until the day of the Lord shall come, as a sign of sure hope and solace for the pilgrim People of God" (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 68).

Ecumenical Import: As with the dogma of the Immaculate Conception, the Assumption raises difficulties in ecumenical dialogue. The problem lies not so much with the content of the dogmas, which may be seen as acceptable developments in piety, as with their status as dogma. Insofar as both beliefs are promulgated with the full strength of papal authority (indeed, the Assumption is the only dogma proclaimed since the 1870 decree on papal infallibility), and insofar as both are connected with what amounts to anathemas resulting in excommunication for nonbelief, Protestants in particular object that these dogmas as they stand contradict the gospel by binding consciences with matters that are not in Scripture.

One interim step forward has been proposed by the Lutheran/Catholic Dialogue (U.S.A.): if Lutherans do not brand Catholic belief in these dogmas a violation of the gospel and if, insofar as these dogmas were promulgated during the time of division and are not central in the hierarchy of truths, Catholics do not require belief in them by Lutherans, then these dogmas need not be an obstacle to continuing growth in unity. Then greater church life together could provide the context for fresh interpretations acceptable to both communities.

Meanwhile, for the Catholic imagination, both dogmas take very seriously the ideas that life and death are a struggle, that the forces of sin and evil are enormous, and that only by the power of God can anyone ultimately prevail. Each recognizes the critical distance that history still has to travel before salvation is complete and revitalizes hope in the ongoing power of God operating in human persons to renew the face of the earth. Amid the constant hostility of history, the narrative power of these dogmas reminds the Church of the undaunted power of this woman, free in her love for God and others through the power of grace and finding ultimate victory. These dogmas can be professed as prophecy in the midst of the history of suffering. See also Ascension; Mary, Blessed Virgin; resurrection of the body.

Bibliography

Brown, Raymond, et al., eds. Mary in the New Testament: A Collaborative Assessment by Protestant and Roman Catholic Scholars. Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1978.

Graef, Hilda. Mary: A History of Doctrine and Devotion. 2 vols. New York: Sheed & Ward, 1963.

ELIZABETH JOHNSON

astrology, the study of the movement of heavenly bodies in order to predict or interpret individual and communal destinies on earth. Astrology appeared in the Hellenistic world in the third century B.C. as a combination of Chaldean and Egyptian astral religion with Greek mathematics and astronomy. It became influential in every area of human life and thought in the ancient world. Its influence can be seen in some of the imagery of the NT, e.g., the star at Jesus' birth (Matt 2:1–10) and the solar eclipse at his death (Matt 27:45; Mark 15:33; Luke 23:44). Christian opposition to astrology began very early, e.g., Paul's criticism of observance of special days (Gal 4:9–10) and devotion to cosmic powers (Rom 8:38; Col 1:16, 2:8, 20). Patristic writers (Tertullian, Lactantius, Augustine) denounced astrological predictions, often ascribing them to demons. Augustine (d. 430) trenchantly criticized astrology (e.g., City of God 8.19) as a fatalistic system that denies all human freedom. Medieval Western Christianity encountered astrology through Islamic contacts. Many Catholics during the Middle Ages allowed for some astrological influence on human life, including Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) and Dante

(d. 1321). Some of the Reformers rejected astrology (e.g., John Calvin, d. 1564) and others accepted it (e.g., Philipp Melanchthon, d. 1560). Some popes acknowledged it (Julius II and Paul III regularly consulted astrologers; Leo X established a university chair for its study); other popes strongly denounced it (e.g., Innocent VIII). The cumulative results of seventeenth- and eighteenth-century astronomy finally discredited astrology's scientific pretensions. MICHAEL J. HIMES

Athanasia, St., fifth-century anchoress. She renounced the world after allegedly having a vision of St. Julian. St. Daniel sent her to be an anchoress in the wilderness of Egypt. Feast day: October 9.

Athanasian Creed, creed also known as the Quicunque Vult (Lat., "Whoever wishes [to be saved]"), which are its opening words.

Origin: Incorrectly attributed to Athanasius (d. 373) or Ambrose (d. 397), the Athanasian Creed probably originated in southern France, perhaps at the abbey of Lérins, after the Council of Constantinople (381) and before the Council of Chalcedon (451). Originally written in Latin, it was likely formulated by Vincent of Lérins (d. ca. 450), Caesarius of Arles (d. 542), or someone close to one of them. It was fashioned in response to the post-Nicene controversies concerning the person of Jesus Christ, specifically regarding the Incarnation and the relationship between Christ's divine and human na-

THE ATHANASIAN CREED

Whoever wishes to be saved must, first of all, hold the Catholic faith, for, unless he keeps it whole and inviolate, he will undoubtedly perish for ever.

Now this is the Catholic faith: We worship one God in the Trinity and the Trinity in unity, without either confusing the persons or dividing the substance; for the person of the Father is one, the Son's is another, the Holy Spirit's another; but the Godhead of Father, Son and Holy Spirit is one, their glory equal, their majesty equally eternal.

Such as the Father is, such is the Son, such also the Holy Spirit; uncreated is the Father, uncreated the Son, uncreated the Holy Spirit; infinite (immensus) is the Father, infinite the Son, infinite the Holy Spirit; eternal is the Father, eternal the Son, eternal the Holy Spirit; yet, they are not three eternal beings but one eternal, just as they are not three uncreated beings or three infinite beings but one uncreated and one infinite. In the same way, almighty is the Father, almighty the Son, almighty the Holy Spirit; yet, they are not three almighty beings but one almighty. Thus, the Father is God, the Son is God, the Holy Spirit is God; yet, they are not three gods but one God. Thus, the Father is Lord, the Son is Lord, the Holy Spirit is Lord; yet, they are not three lords but one Lord. For, as the Christian truth compels us to acknowledge each person distinctly as God and Lord, so too the Catholic religion forbids us to speak of three gods or lords.

The Father has neither been made by anyone, nor is He created or begotten; the Son is from the Father alone, not made nor created but begotten; the Holy Spirit is from the Father and the Son, not made nor created nor begotten, but proceeding. So there is one Father, not three Fathers; one Son, not three Sons; one Holy Spirit, not three Holy Spirits. And in this Trinity there is no before or after, no greater or lesser, but all three persons are equally eternal with each other and fully equal. Thus, in all things, as has already been stated above, both unity in the Trinity and Trinity in the unity must be worshipped. Let him therefore who wishes to be saved think this of the Trinity.

For his eternal salvation it is necessary, however, that he should also faithfully believe in the incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ. Here then is the right faith: We believe and confess that our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, is both and equally God and man. He is God from the substance of the Father, begotten before the ages, and He is man from the substance of a mother, born in time; perfect God and perfect man, composed of a rational soul and a human body; equal to the Father as to His divinity, less than the Father as to His humanity. Although He is God and man, He is nevertheless one Christ, not two; however, not one because the divinity has been changed into a human body, but because the humanity has been assumed into God; entirely one, not by a confusion of substance but by the unity of personhood. For, as a rational soul and a body are a single man, so God and man are one Christ. He suffered for our salvation, went down to the underworld (ad infernos), rose again from the dead on the third day, ascended to the heavens, is seated at the right hand of the Father, wherefrom He shall come to judge the living and the dead. At His coming all men are to rise again with their bodies and to render an account of their own deeds; those who have done good will go to eternal life, but those who have done evil to eternal fire.

This is the Catholic faith. Unless one believes it faithfully and firmly, he cannot be saved.

tures. It addresses Apollinarianism and Nestorianism and perhaps also Eutychianism, which were condemned at the councils of Constantinople (381), Ephesus (431), and Chalcedon (451), respectively.

Structure and Content: Consisting of forty declarations, it is unlike the tripartite creeds (e.g., the Apostles' and Nicene-Constantinopolitan creeds), in that it consists of two major parts, the first on the doctrine of the triune God and the second on the doctrine of the Incarnation and redemption. The word "substance" is employed in speaking of God. The term "person" is used in reference to the Father, the Son, and the Spirit, and the distinction of the three persons is highlighted. The Holy Spirit is said to be "from" the Father "and" the Son, a formulation that was disputed during the Filioque controversy in the seventh century.

In the second part the narrative of the Christ kerygma (1 Cor 15:3–7) is set within a series of propositions against Christological errors. This part declares that Jesus Christ is fully divine and fully human. His humanity is constituted with a rational soul and human body. Seemingly addressing Eutychianism as well as Apollinarianism, it denies any confusion of natures in Jesus Christ and affirms that the Son of God assumed a full human nature.

The creed's introduction and conclusion assert that belief in this creed is necessary for salvation, and the body of the text includes condemnations of doctrinal errors. (Anathemas are not found in the Apostles' and Nicene-Constantinopolitan creeds.)

Function: It is likely that at the outset the creed was primarily used for instruction, especially of the clergy. By the ninth century it was being employed within the liturgy in Germany, where it was recited by the congregation after the sermon. Eventually, however, it came to be sung at liturgy in the West, even though it did not lend itself to this usage because of its technical style and condemnatory tone. Beginning in the twelfth century, the Eastern Church recognized the creed, but did not put it to regular use, and it was translated into Greek in the fourteenth century. (Since ca. 1780 it has been included in the Greek Horologium, a liturgical book containing portions of the Liturgy of the Hours, though without the Filioque clause.) In the thirteenth century theologians in the West gave it the same authority as the Apostles' and Nicene-Constantinopolitan creeds. Beginning in the seventeenth century, the Athanasian Creed was included in the Russian liturgy. Also in the Western Church it came to be recited in the Liturgy of the Hours and in the liturgy for the Solemnity of the Holy Trinity. See also Apollinarianism; Christology; Eutyches; Incarnation, the Nestorianism; Trinity, doctrine of the.

ROBERT A. KRIEG

Athanasius, St., d. 373, bishop of Alexandria from 328, and the strongest defender of the Council of Nicaea, convoked by Emperor Constantine in 325. A coalition of Oriental bishops led by Eusebius of Nicomedia had supported the Alexandrian priest Arius in his doctrinal dispute with his local superior, Bishop Alexander, regarding the relation of Christ with God the Father. Defeated at Nicaea, the same Eusebian party soon attacked Alexander's successor, Athanasius, questioning the validity of his election and allying themselves with the schismatic Melitians of Egypt. Constantine sent Athanasius into exile in 335 to Trier, but the emperor died in 337 and the exiled bishop returned home. His episcopal opponents, eager to establish themselves in the eye of the administration, continued to deny the legitimacy of Athanasius's tenure of office. They rejected the creed of Nicaea itself as an unsound innovation, preferring a more traditional formulation in line with Arius's own ideas about the Christian doctrine of God. Since this party, denounced as "Arians" by Athanasius, had the support of Constantius II (337–361), son of Constantine, Athanasius had to face the wrath of the imperial administration. In 339 he fled to the West, where Pope Julius I and Constans, another son of Constantine who ruled the Western empire, offered him protection until 346. He fled again in 356 and remained in hiding until 362 with the monks of the Egyptian deserts. Constantius's successor, Julian (361–363), disgruntled with the bishop's pastoral success, sent Athanasius into a fourth exile (362–363). The next emperor, Valens (364–378), also exiled the bishop, but recalled him from this fifth exile (365–366) within a few weeks because of popular discontent. Famous for his theological writings, such as On the Incarnation and the Discourses Against the Arians, Athanasius clarified the notion of Trinity and focused on the central belief in divine Incarnation. He underlined the full divinity of the Holy Spirit, equal to that of the Son, several decades before the First Council of Constantinople (381). Most of his works were addressed to the monks, his friends, whose ideals he exemplified in the Life of Antony, enthusiastically received in both East and West. Feast day: May 2. See also Arianism; Christology; Constantinople, councils of; Incarnation, the; Trinity, doctrine of the.

Athanasius (lower right), one of the greatest theologians and bishops of the early Church and the principal defender of Catholic orthodoxy against the Arians; painting by Luca Signorelli (d. 1523) also depicting the Trinity, the Blessed Virgin, and Augustine of Hippo (lower left).

PAMELA BRIGHT

atheism, the denial of the reality of God. The term possesses an inherent ambiguity both in meaning and in application. The meaning of "atheism" depends upon the "god" that is denied, and the term has been applied for thousands of years to vastly divergent forms and systems of thought. Analyses and histories of atheism have focused upon acknowledged denials or hidden implications of thought. Distinctions are made between atheism, agnosticism, and antitheism; indifference and postulation; and practical and theoretical atheism. The canonical index of ancient atheism comprises some seven or eight figures, but often their "atheism" has proved to be an unsympathetic reading of their thought. Even the early Christians had to defend themselves against the charge of atheism.

Modern atheism, not as an invective against one's enemies but as a signature, emerged in Western civilization during the Enlightenment with such savants as Denis Diderot (d. 1784). It took from Isaac Newton (d. 1727) the universality of mechanics and from René Descartes (d. 1650) the confinement of mechanics to mechanical principles. Matter was recognized as intrinsically dynamic and as comprehensive of all reality. Georg Hegel (d. 1832) recognized that something religiously unique had entered European thought, a philosophy that "defined matter, nature, etc., as that which is to be taken as the ultimate" (Lectures on the History of Philosophy 3.387).

Nineteenth Century: During the nineteenth century, philosophical theism argued its case not so much from nature as from the necessities of human nature; the denials followed suit and fathered an "atheistic humanism." Ludwig Feuerbach (d. 1872) maintained that human consciousness was essentially self-consciousness and argued that God was nothing but the projection of the human species. He was followed and corrected by Karl Marx (d. 1883), who contended that the fundamental human activity was human sensuous activity flowering as revolutionary practice. Religion resulted from contradictions within the social and economic world, which must be revolutionized to destroy the alienation that was God. In the anthropology of Friedrich Nietzsche (d. 1900), the will to power became the central human reality, and God was rejected as a factor limiting the development of the human into the Übermensch (the superman). Nietzsche announced the cultural reality of the death of God, i.e., that "belief in the Christian God has become no longer believable" (The Gay Science 5.343). Though technically agnostic, Sigmund Freud (d. 1939) also found the providential God a projection, but now it was the oedipal projection, out of human weakness, of the protecting and threatening father figure. By the end of the nineteenth century, atheism had defined God as the antihuman. Massive political and social changes with origins in the French Revolution (1789) contributed to a sense of emancipation that countered religious influences, while the churches during that same period became identified with reaction.

Twentieth Century: Three forms of atheism marked the twentieth century. There were those intellectual currents that achieved ideological domination in the totalitarian regimes that controlled great masses of Europe and Asia. In the United States, John Dewey (d. 1952) spoke for an increasingly alienated intellectual culture, arguing that the ethos of scientific inquiry dated belief in God. Existential philosophies found a frankly advocated atheism in Jean-Paul Sartre (d. 1980), casting God both as an internal contradiction and an intolerable limitation of authentic human freedom. Together with these should be included the many forms of positivism that assert that any statements about God are nonsense. During the twentieth century, atheism and its lesser forms (such as agnosticism) have come to characterize hundreds of millions of the world population, constituting one of the fastest growing religious persuasions of the past two hundred years.

The Teaching of the Church: While the Church has historically condemned atheism as sinful when it entails a deliberate suppression of truth, Jesuit theologian Karl Rahner (d. 1984) has noted that the Church only began to deal seriously with atheism as a new, worldwide phenomenon at the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). The Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (n. 16) allows for an atheism that is inculpable, hence, does not exclude one from salvation. Even more important, the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (nn. 19–21) recognizes the urgency of contemporary atheism, the various forms it assumes, its possibility of being a protest against false gods, the sources of its rise, and the contribution to its growth made by a Christianity unfaithful to itself. Increasingly also the Church has condemned the practical atheism embodied in economic exploitation and social injustice. See also agnosticism; Enlightenment, the; Marxism; Nietzsche, Friedrich. MICHAEL J. BUCKLEY

Athenagoras, second-century apologist whose Presbeia (Gk., "Supplication"), addressed ca. 177 to Emperor Marcus Aurelius, pleaded ably for toleration toward Christians, claiming agreement between Scripture and established philosophy and refuting charges that Christians practiced cannibalism and incest. Especially concerned to rebut the charge of atheism, Athenagoras provided an early philosophical defense of the doctrine of the Trinity. See also Trinity, doctrine of the.

Athos, Mount, a peninsula extending south into the Aegean Sea from Macedonia (the northeast coast of Greece). Athos belongs to the Eastern Orthodox Church and is home to twenty autonomous monasteries. Its monastery libraries house collections of important manuscripts. The settlement dates from 962. Neither women nor female animals are permitted on the peninsula.

atonement, biblical view of, reconciliation, the setting of someone at one with another. Reconciliation is not found in the Hebrew Scriptures. In Judg 19:3 the Septuagint (LXX) introduces the Greek verb diallaxai, "reconcile," but the Hebrew says merely "to cause her to return." The notion of reconciliation (Gk., katallagē) is borrowed from the Greek world and denotes the restoration of correct relations between individuals, groups, or nations. It is a social idea, expressing the change from hostility to friendship, from alienation to intimacy. It eventually enters the deuterocanonical Greek writings of the OT (2 Macc 1:5; 5:20; 7:33; 8:29).

In the NT diallassein, katallassein, "reconcile," is used in a secular sense (Matt 5:23–24; 1 Cor 7:11), as in extrabiblical Greek (Mur 115.5). But it also takes on a distinct religious meaning in the Pauline writings, where it expresses an effect of what God has brought about through Christ Jesus for humanity. Through the life, Passion, death, and Resurrection of Christ Jesus, human beings have been "reconciled" with God: "If while we were enemies, we were reconciled to God through the death of his Son, much more surely, having been reconciled, will we be saved by his life" (Rom 5:10). Paul also describes this restored status as one of peace: "Since we are justified by faith, we have peace with God" (Rom 5:1, which peace is explained in terms of reconciliation in vv. 10–11). The apostle also speaks of his own evangelization as a "ministry of reconciliation" (2 Cor 5:18). Paul sees the effect as having not only an anthropological impact, but also a cosmic impact; it affects not only human beings, but even the "world" (Gk., kosmos): "in Christ God was reconciling the world to himself" (2 Cor 5:19; see Rom 11:15). This Pauline notion is extended in the deutero-Pauline writings (Col 1:21; Eph 2:11–18), where it is considered not only vertically (reconciliation between God and human beings), but also horizontally (between Jews and Gentiles).

Though reconciliation or atonement is thus said to be achieved "through the death" or "by the blood" of Christ, such specification should not be understood to give the idea a sacrificial connotation. Pauline and deutero-Pauline writings use such phrases to describe reconciliation as an effect of the Christ-event, but reconciliation does not thereby acquire a sacrificial nuance.

This nuance has often been associated with atonement, because interpreters have mistakenly associated with it hilasmos (Gk., expiation), a different idea found in both the OT (Lev 25:9) and the NT

(1 John 2:2), but wrongly translated in the New Revised Standard Version as the "Day of Atonement" or "atoning sacrifice." It should be the "Day of Expiation" (Fr., Jour de l'Expiation); or "expiation for our sins" (1 John 2:2, NABRNT). Part of the problem here is the systematic theological heritage, which the Oxford English Dictionary describes when it says that atonement means "reconciliation, propitiation, expiation, according to the view taken of its nature" (1. 135). See also redemption. JOSEPH A. FITZMYER atonement, doctrine of, the forgiveness of sin and expiation of human guilt through Christ's loving fidelity, expressed in his suffering, death, and Resurrection, which reconciled humanity with God.

The fact that the Crucifixion took place at the time of the Jewish Passover encouraged the first Christians to recognize Christ as the Paschal Lamb who had been sacrificed (1 Cor 5:7). Connecting his death with another great Jewish feast, the Day of Atonement (Heb., Yom Kippur), they understood Jesus to be the great high priest and victim whose unique self-sacrifice had once and for all expiated sins and brought a new covenant relationship between God and human beings (Heb 4:14-10:39).

The Tradition: In his The Incarnation of the Word of God (De Incarnatione Verbi) Athanasius of Alexandria (d. 373) emphasized human weakness and divine initiative. The word of God first created humans and then, after the fall into sin, recreated them through the Incarnation that culminated in the self-offering of his death. In Cur Deus Homo (Why God Became Man) Anselm of Canterbury (d. 1109) provided what was to prove the most successful Christian treatise devoted explicitly to the atonement. His theory of "satisfaction" presented Christ's freely accepted death as vicariously making amends for the offense to the divine honor caused by human sin. Because of his divinity, humanity, and sinlessness, Christ (and only Christ) could satisfy on humanity's behalf for the infinite dishonor to God that is sin. Faced with the Reformation controversy over the nature of justification, the Council of Trent (1545–63) echoed the language of Anselm and even more that of Thomas Aguinas (d. 1274) in teaching that the sacrifice of the Cross merited human justification and made satisfaction to God the Father.

A Misunderstanding: For centuries, not only Protestants but also Anglicans and Roman Catholics have at times taken "satisfaction" language to an extreme never intended by Anselm. They have misrepresented Christ's atoning death to depict God condemning Jesus as personally burdened with our sins, punishing him as a substitute for guilty humanity, and so being appeased or propitiated by the blood shed on the cross. This view of the atonement takes very seriously sin and the objective nature of what Jesus accomplished through his suffering, death, and Resurrection. Yet it has misunderstood the scapegoat ceremony from the Jewish Day of Atonement (Lev 16:8–10, 20–22), misapplied the fourth suffering servant song (Isa 52:13–53:12), misinterpreted several classical texts from Paul (Rom 8:3; 2 Cor 5:21; Gal 3:13), and ignored the fact that, while sometimes speaking of the divine anger (e.g., Rom 1:18; 2:5, 8; 12:19; 13:4–5; 1 Thess 1:10), the NT never associates that anger with Christ's suffering and death. Ultimately this view directly attributes Christ's Passion to God's vindictiveness rather than to human cruelty.

In fact, instead of passively accepting punishment in humanity's place, Christ acted "for us" and on human behalf (Rom 5:6; 1 Cor 8:11; Gal 1:4) in representatively carrying through his mission with utter fidelity and freely accepting the execution that the world thrust upon him. So, far from needing to manipulate or persuade an angry deity who was "out for blood," Christ was sent by divine love (Rom 8:3; Gal 4:4–5) to reconcile humans with God and with one another (Eph 2:12–18). Accepting for others the suffering that his goodness faced in the world, Christ purified and repaired a moral order defiled by human sin.

In his On the Trinity (De Trinitate 13.11.15) Augustine (d. 430) rightly questioned the view of those Christians who were already misinterpreting atonement as if it meant the Son appeasing the Father's anger and thus winning back divine love for humanity. In contrast, from the outset the Son was sent by the Father to forgive and save fallen human beings. Augustine asked: "Is it necessary to think that being God, the Father was angry with us, saw his Son die for us and thus abated his anger against us? But what then could be the meaning of the words of St. Paul? How shall we respond to his question: if God is for us, will he not give us all things? Unless he had already been 'appeased,' would the Father have given over his only Son for us?"

What then of Christ's blood shed upon the cross? It symbolized and effected not only the expiation of sinful humanity's guilt (Rom 3:25; 1 John 1:7) but also the deliverance from evil (1 Pet 1:18–19) and peace found with God (Col 1:19–20) through a new covenant (Mark 14:24; 1 Cor 11:25). The range of meanings for "blood" in the OT characterizes the full power of Christ's atoning blood. See also blood of Christ; crucifixion; expiation; propitiation; redemption; sacrifice; salvation.

Bibliography

Dillistone, F. W. The Christian Understanding of Atonement. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1968.

Hengel, Martin. The Atonement. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1981.

GERALD O'COLLINS

Atticus, St., d. 425, patriarch of Constantinople from 406. From Sebaste in Armenia, later priest at Constantinople and an opponent of John Chrysostom, he was appointed patriarch by the emperor Arcadius, but after Chrysostom's death Atticus returned his name to the diptychs and restored relations with Rome. He also corresponded with Augustine and expelled the Pelagian Celestius from Constantinople. Feast days: October 11, January 8 (both Eastern). See also Chrysostom, St. John.

attrition, a desire for forgiveness based on fear of God rather than on love for God. Attrition is a technical term found in Catholic theology from medieval times on. Attrition and contrition were generally contrasted, so that the definition of one shaped the definition of the other. In medieval theology, the distinction attrition/contrition arose over the way forgiveness of sin outside sacramental confession was theologically related to forgiveness of sin in sacramental confession. Franciscan and Dominican theologians disputed the theological relationship of attrition and contrition. In medieval Scholastic theology, attrition was considered either from its motive or from its effect. The motive in attrition was often presented as fear of eternal punishment or as horror over one's own evil act; in contrition, the motive was presented as perfect love for God. In effect, attrition was often presented as an antecedent step, disposing one for the sacrament of confession. Of itself attrition did not merit sanctifying grace. Contrition had as its effect the infusion of sanctifying grace. The Council of Trent (1545–63), without settling the theological Franciscan and Dominican dispute, used a fairly common theological view for attrition or "imperfect" contrition (D 1678). Canon 5 of Trent (D 1705) focused on the accusation of some Reformers that the Catholic approach to both contrition and attrition was a good work, nullifying God's grace, and was therefore of no Christian value. This canon must be interpreted by the decree on justification that the bishops of Trent had already formulated (D 1520–83). No new approach to attrition has been proposed in post–Vatican II theology, although there has been study on the relationship of a theology of sin to psychological studies on human motivation. See also contrition; Reconciliation.

KENAN B. OSBORNE

Aubert, Roger, b. 1914, Belgian-born Church historian. Ordained a priest for Malines in 1938, Canon Aubert of the University of Louvain followed his Le Problème de l'acte de foi (Fr., "The Problem of the Act of Faith," 1945) and Le Pontificat de Pie IX (Fr., "The Pontificate of Pius IX," 1952) with other studies of nineteenth century European Catholicism. He has also served as editor of the Nouvelle histoire d'Église (1963–75) and of the Revue d'histoire ecclesiastique.

audience, papal, visits or receptions given by the pope to a person or group of persons who have business with the Holy See or who are pilgrims or visitors to the Vatican. General and public papal audiences are ordinarily held on Wednesdays in the Audience Hall on the south side of St. Peter's Basilica, with semiprivate or private audiences in the papal residence scheduled for other times under the auspices of the Prefecture of the Pontifical Household (Pastor Bonus [1988], n. 181.3). During the summer audiences are held at the pope's summer residence at Castel Gandolfo, fifteen miles outside of Rome. Papal audiences often involve Church hierarchy and curial officials and are conducted in solemn fashion when diplomats from various nations or heads of state are received. See also Pastor Bonus.

auditor, in canon law judicial appointee who, according to mandate, helps the tribunal collect proofs, including examination of witnesses, but may not adjudicate. Judges may appoint another judge or any qualified person specifically approved by the bishop for this function. Since judges of the Roman Rota were originally auditors for cases the popes judged, they retain the title. See also tribunal.

Augsburg Confession (Lat., Confessio Augustana), the primary confession of the Lutheran church. Written by Philipp Melanchthon on the basis of earlier Lutheran statements, it was submitted by seven imperial princes and two imperial cities to the Holy Roman emperor Charles V at the Diet of Augsburg (1530) as an official statement of belief and a defense against charges of heresy. The first part of the confession argued that Lutheran doctrine either agreed with Catholic teaching or held to the true primitive doctrine from which the Catholic Church had departed. It was composed of twenty-one articles on God, original sin, the Son of God, justification by faith alone, ministry, new obedience, the Church, Baptism, the Lord's Supper, confession, repentance, use of the sacraments, ecclesiastical order, humanly instituted rules, civil affairs, Christ's return in judgment, free will, the cause of sin, faith and good works, and veneration of the saints. The second part listed seven reforms of abuses in the areas of Communion of the laity with both bread and wine, the marriage of priests, the Mass, confession, human traditions, monastic vows, and the authority of bishops. A group of Catholic theologians led by John Eck presented a confutation (Confutatio Pontifica) that approved nine articles without exception, approved six in part or with qualifications, and condemned thirteen. The Lutheran response written by Melancthon, the Apology, was accepted by the Lutheran churches in 1537 as the authoritative commentary on the confession and was included in the Book of Concord (1580). See also Lutheranism; Melanchthon, Philipp.

R. EMMET MCLAUGHLIN

Augsburg Interim, a doctrinal formula imposed on the Protestant estates by Charles V (1548) as a temporary (Lat., ad interim) arrangement. Because it essentially expressed Catholic dogma, it was rejected by most Protestants. Because it allowed Communion with both consecrated bread and consecrated wine for the laity and permitted Protestant clergy to retain their wives, it was rejected by most Catholics.

Augustine, Rule of St., rule for religious life attributed in part to Augustine of Hippo (d. 430) outlining a life of love, community, service, and obedience. Though it is cited in some early medieval authors, it was only in the eleventh century that its observance became widespread; at the Fourth Lateran Council (1215) it was accepted as one of the approved rules of the Church, and the new Dominican order adopted it soon thereafter. Promoting a community under the direction of a superior in which property is held in common, it continues to prove attractive to many different religious, to active and contemplative, to male and female alike; over one hundred and fifty communities follow it today. See also Augustine of Hippo, St.

Augustine of Canterbury, St., d. ca. 605, apostle of the English and first archbishop of Canterbury. Pope Gregory the Great sent Augustine, a Roman monk, with forty companions as missionaries to the Anglo-Saxon pagans who had overrun Roman Britain. When his reluctant associates refused to follow Augustine any further than southern Gaul, he returned to Rome, and Gregory sent him back with letters appointing him their abbot. It is not clear when or where Augustine was consecrated bishop.

The mission arrived in Kent in 596 or 597. Bertha, queen of Kent, was a Frankish Christian princess, with a bishop in her household, but King Ethelbert remained unconverted, perhaps fearing that a Frankish mission would be followed by Frankish hegemony. Augustine soon baptized the king and many of the people, and Ethelbert gave him some surviving Roman churches in which to worship. Augustine established new sees in London and Rochester but was unable to reach an understanding with the remaining British Christians. Despite a pagan reaction in Kent after the death of Ethelbert in 616, the English church survived. Feast day: May 27. See also Canterbury; England, Catholicism in; Gregory I, "the Great," St.

Augustinian Canons, also Austin, Black, or Regular canons, originally cathedral clergy living different forms of the common life, who were reformed and united under the Rule of St. Augustine in the twelfth century. At the same time separate congregations of canons (diocesan priests who embraced community life under a kind of monastic rule) were established, including the Victorines and Premonstratensians, the latter being the largest group of such canons today. By the fifteenth century there were over forty-five hundred houses in Europe, their apostolic works including cathedrals, collegiate churches, parishes, hospitals, and schools. See also Augustine, Rule of St.; canons regular.

Augustinian Hermits, or Austin Friars, one of the four great medieval mendicant orders, still active today. Not to be confused with Augustinian Canons, these were groups of hermits brought together under the Rule of St. Augustine in the thirteenth century. Their apostolic rule encouraged a more active and urban involvement; some of their greatest members were scholars such as the theologian Giles of Rome and the canonist James of Viterbo. By the fifteenth century there were perhaps two thousand houses in Europe, though they declined in influence after the Reformation. Martin Luther belonged to the German Reformed Congregation. See also Augustine, Rule of St.; mendicant orders.

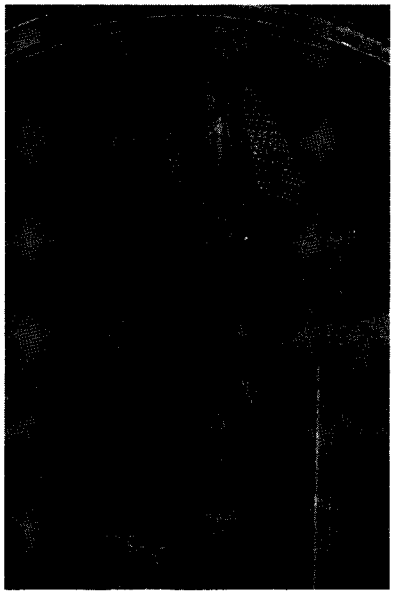
ST. AUGUSTINE OF HIPPO

Bishop of Hippo (North Africa) from 395 and Doctor of the Church, St. Augustine lived 354–430. No other single theologian has exercised as decisive an influence on the shape and character of Western theology, both Catholic and Protestant, as Augustine.

LIFE

The sources for Augustine's life are abundant. They include his Confessions, Retractions, Letters, and autobiographical passages in his early works. Possidius's (d. ca. 440) Life of St. Augustine is also important.

Augustine was born November 13, 354, at Tagaste in Numidia, North Africa, to Monica, a Christian, and Patricius, a pagan until just before his death in 372. He had a brother and at least one sister. His parents scraped funds together for his education, first at Tagaste, then at Madaura (where his studies were interrupted for a year due to lack of funds), and finally at Carthage. At the age of eighteen he took a concubine, to whom he was faithful for the next fifteen years. Adeodatus, their son, was born ca. 373.



Augustine of Hippo, author of the classics Confessions and The City of God; a fifteenth-century painting by Piero della Francesca, National Museum of Ancient Art, Lisbon.

At age nineteen, a reading of Cicero's Hortensius occasioned what must be regarded as a kind of religious conversion to wisdom or "philosophy." Augustine turned to Scripture, but finding it stylistically embarrassing and anything but philosophical, he joined the Manichees, who shared his abhorrence of the OT yet, like Augustine, thought of themselves as following Christ. They claimed to rely upon reason, not authority, and their absolute cosmic dualism seemed a satisfying explanation of the problem of evil.

Augustine returned to Tagaste to teach rhetoric ca. 375 but moved back to Carthage after the death of a friend (ca. 376). In 383 he sailed for Rome, seeking advancement; by the next year, through the good offices of his Manichaean connections and the pagan prefect of Rome, Symmachus, he was appointed professor of rhetoric in Milan, where the imperial court resided. Monica followed a year later, arranged a socially advantageous marriage for her son, and insisted on the dismissal of his concubine, who returned to Africa vowing celibacy. Augustine, however, was unable to wait the two years until his marriage and contracted another liaison.

Progressively disenchanted with Manichaeism, he came under the spell of a loosely connected circle of Christian Neoplatonists in Milan, the most prominent one being the bishop, Ambrose, whose sermons captivated Augustine with their eloquence and with their Origenistic style of allegorical exegesis. He became convinced that the OT was not as crude as he once had thought. After a short period of skepticism, his original teenage conversion to philosophy seemed finally to come to fruition when he was introduced to certain texts of Plotinus and/or Porphyry. Against the Manichees, they explained evil not as an eternal substance coexistant with God but as the privation or corruption of the good, in all respects equivalent with being. The highest level of being was immaterial, and the soul could attain to contemplation by ascending from things bodily, in themselves good, to an apophatic vision of the absolute immaterial Good underlying their form.

Further, Augustine heard stories of the monks and nuns in Italy and Egypt. He read Athanasius's Life of Antony. He became convinced that Christ had made the ascetic, philosophical life that Plotinus taught for a tiny few attainable for the many, educated and uneducated alike. Augustine decided to renounce marriage and career and seek Baptism. In August 386 he retired from teaching and withdrew to a villa at Cassiciacum, where, with his mother, brother, son, friends, and former students, he began what he thought would be his way of life from then on, a communal existence in leisured philosophical conversation. Here he wrote the dialogues On the Happy Life, Against the Academics, On Order, and the Soliloquies.

Returning to Milan in early 387, he took the catechetical course of Ambrose and was baptized at Easter. That same year his mother died and was buried at Ostia (her relics were transferred to Rome in 1430). Augustine returned to Tagaste where he established on his family's estates a quasi-monastic community of educated laymen, but visiting the port city of Hippo in 391, he was acclaimed by the congregation at church and forced to agree to ordination; in 395 he was consecrated bishop. There he presided, preaching, adjudicating cases referred to the bishop's tribunal, polemicizing, and living in community with his clergy, until his death during the seige of Hippo by the Vandals.

CONTROVERSIES

Augustine played a crucial role in three major controversies. Even before his ordination as priest he wrote two anti-Manichaean works, On Genesis Against the Manichees and On the Catholic and Manichaean Ways of Life (388–89), and he continued to produce such works well into his episcopacy, sometimes on the basis of actual public debate or as refutation of a written text (e.g. Against Faustus, 397–98). The Confessions (397–401) themselves may be regarded, in part, as one of Augustine's last—and greatest—anti-Manichaean works.

To the Manichees, the material world was the creation of the powers of evil, and procreation was therefore to be shunned. Augustine taught, on the contrary, the goodness of the Creator and of creation; that marriage was a positive good; and that even if virginity is a higher ideal, Augustine of Hippo, one of the two most influential theologians in the history of the Church (the other being Thomas Aquinas), being consecrated bishop of Hippo in North Africa in 395; sixteenth-century painting by Bergognone, Sabauda Gallery, Turin, Italy.

married persons may be more virtuous than their celibate counterparts. Further, the origin of evil is not to be located in a mythic realm of eternal darkness but is to be found in the perversity of the individual, created will, which freely turns away from God.

DONATISM

Upon Augustine's ordination to the priesthood he became immediately involved in the Donatist controversy, a dispute of long standing in the African church stemming from charges that the consecration of Caecilian as bishop of Carthage in 312 was invalid because one of the bishops consecrating him had handed over the Scriptures to persecutors. Since then the schismatic Donatist church had acquired majority status in North Africa as a kind of indigenous national church, claiming to be the true heir of the theology of Cyprian of Carthage. The Donatists insisted that the sacraments, and especially Baptism and Ordination, were valid only if the ministers of them were free of serious sin. They rebaptized Catholics who wanted to gain admittance to Communion.

Against this rigorist view of the Church as a society of the pure, Augustine argued that the sacraments belong to Christ and his Church, and that as such their validity does not depend upon the holiness of the minister, who may in any event have secret sins impossible to know, and that the Church is a mixed body of sinners, some progressing toward holiness, some lapsing away. Baptism is valid even if administered by a schismatic and need not be repeated upon entrance into the Catholic Church. Augustine further criticized the Donatists for their self-imposed status as a parochial church, separated not only from Rome but from all the other patriarchal sees. Unfortunately, he also gave his approval to the imperial "Edict of Unity" against the Donatists in 405, which made it impossible for Donatists to make valid wills, engage in litigation, or hold office. After the Council of Carthage in 411, at which the Donatist and Catholic bishops engaged in debate, the imperial commissioners decided in favor of the Catholics, and from January 412 the Donatists were declared heretics. Although Augustine argued against the death penalty, he endorsed the right and responsibility of Christian rulers to recall by civil measures those who err.

PELAGIANISM

The third major controversy of Augustine's career was just beginning in 411. Pelagius, a British monk whose spiritual teachings had attracted a following among the Roman aristocracy, had come to Hippo with other refugees fleeing the sack of Rome by Alaric in 410. When his associate Caelestius applied for ordination to the priesthood at Carthage, he was rejected and condemned for teaching, among other things, that all human beings were born with the same degree of freedom that Adam had enjoyed before his sin; that there were sinless people before Jesus; and that newborns did not need Baptism. Whether or not Pelagius himself had adopted such extreme conclusions, bound to be offensive to any North African, Catholic or Donatist, he did teach that perfection was both possible and imperative for human beings and that sufficient freedom to attain it was available to all. Grace was necessary as an aid to freedom, which had been "rusted over" by bad habit, but by "grace" Pelagius meant for the most part something external, the preaching of the law and the gospel. Pelagius found the Confessions wanting, an invitation to mediocrity and even fatalism.

Augustine, informed in 411 by his friend Marcellinus that Pelagius's ideas were spreading in Carthage, responded in 412 with On the Spirit and the Letter, perhaps the best statement of his position against Pelagianism. In Augustine's view the sin of Adam had vitiated human nature to such an extent that, although freedom of choice is retained, people are free only to sin, unable to love the good unless God's grace frees them. He observes quite simply that people are unable to force themselves to love anything, least of all the good; it is incoherent to speak of forced delight. And it is only God's grace, the Holy Spirit shedding charity abroad in people's hearts (Rom 5:5), that moves them to take delight in God such that they are freed to love and thus enjoy the good. Nor are they freed in one bold stroke of choice at Baptism; rather, they enter upon a long course of healing, a kind of convalesence of the heart resulting in an ever enlarging degree of charity. The elect are predestined by God's mercy from eternity to receive such grace; others continue on to the damnation incurred by complicity in sin, unable ever to want and love the good which would itself be their eternal reward.

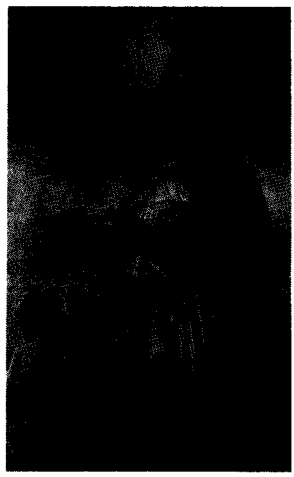
CITY OF GOD

The results of Augustine's reflection on these controversies are integrated into his most comprehensive and mature work, the City of God, begun ca. 412 (completed only ca. 427) in response to charges arising from Alaric's sack of Rome in 410. Pagans alleged that Rome had fallen because the pagan imperial religion had been discontinued. Augustine replied that the rise and fall of empires was nothing unusual in the landscape of human history and went on to critique the character and content of the empire's ideals.

In the City of God, original sin appears as the sin of pride (Lat. superbia), which absolutizes the self as the criterion of value and valuation, assuming for it, in effect, the position of God. This primal sin, Augustine believes, is obsessively reenacted in every particular sin, but it is most clearly glimpsed and most fully realized in social structures of domination such as those of the pagan Roman Empire. Here the primal evil has been transferred from the mythological realm of Manichaean cosmology and the metaphysical realm of Neoplatonic speculation to the realm of time and history. Redemption has been accomplished in the same realm. The Word of God, by assuming the human being Jesus into unity with the Word's person on the basis of no previous merits, becomes incarnate in Jesus, who thus becomes the supreme instance of grace. His death out of love for sinners is his sacrifice, at once a supreme act of worship and God's supreme act of compassion.



Augustine of Hippo, one of the greatest Christian teachers and bishops of all time, whose primary theological focus was on the interaction of God's grace and human freedom, and the call to salvation.

In the Eucharist Christians are invited to be formed, by the worship/compassion that is the sacrifice of Christ, into a new communion or societas. Thus, in keeping with Augustine's anti-Donatist polemic, the sacrament is not dependent for its efficacy on the holiness of the minister; it is itself the true sacrifice of the Lord who invites persons to be "transformed by the renewing of [the] mind" (Rom 12:2; City of God 10.6) away from the world and its ambitions, away from the earthly city and toward the City of God. In its liturgical repetition the Eucharist becomes a locus of the sort of healing the necessity of which Augustine insisted upon, in opposition to the Pelagians.

AGAINST JULIAN

In other, later works these themes threaten to come unraveled. From ca. 420 Augustine engaged in increasingly bitter controversy with Julian, bishop of Eclanum in Italy, who in 418 refused to subscribe to Pope Zosimus's Epistula Tractoria condemning Pelagius. Julian accused Augustine of having elaborated such an exaggerated and physicalist notion of original sin (passed on hereditarily by the concupiscence that Augustine believed to be inevitably involved in intercourse) that he had in effect returned to Manichaeism with its denial of the good of marriage. And, despite Augustine's insistence that there is no salvation apart from Baptism, the objective efficacy of the sacraments seems almost to come undone in the shadow of his massive insistence on the necessity of a mysterious, predestined, and continual inner infusion of grace. He replied that we see so many horrors around us, crippled infants and disfiguring diseases, that, unless Julian is either insensitive or prepared to admit all such evils into paradise and God's original creative intention, we must ascribe them to God's wrath in response to original sin, or God's goodness and omnipotence cannot be defended against the Manichees.

Augustine's theological legacy is thus divided. Theologically, it includes a deep appreciation of the utterly gratuitous yet necessary character of grace; a thoroughgoing (and unprecedented) understanding of the socially mediated character of all aspects of the human being (including sexuality); a consequently thoroughgoing critique of dualistic anthropologies; and a refusal to accept the ugliness of natural and social evil as reflective of God's creative intentions. It includes too On the Trinity (ca. 399–ca. 420) and its influence on all subsequent discussions of trinitarian doctrine in the West; On Christian Doctrine (ca. 397, finished 426), which gave the Middle Ages an educational vision and mandate; and the immense Enarrationes on the Psalms and Homilies on the Gospel of John, which served as substrates for exegetes from the Carolingian period to the Renaissance and later. Yet Augustine's legacy also seems to have included a deep pessimism about the goodness of the sexual act as we know it and about the possibilities of human reformation (and a fortiori, perfection) in general. Some would claim that this, together with his approval of civil disciplinary measures against the Donastists, provided a blueprint for Christian regimes just as repressive as the pagan Roman Empire.

Perhaps the last word, however, should rest with the Confessions. In their psychological realism amounting almost to a phenomenology of subjectivity, they are a foundation stone for Western culture. Yet in their moving evocation of the absolute freedom and benevolence of God's grace, working through but ultimately independent from every cultural form and historical person, they present that grace to each generation as a kind of question mark, challenging all particular cultural forms and projects to resist the idolatry of self-deification. As such, the last word of Augustine's influence has yet to be spoken. Feast day: August 28.

See also Augustine, Rule of St.; Augustinians.

Bibliography

Bonner, G. St. Augustine of Hippo: Life and Controversies. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1963.
Brown, P. Augustine of Hippo. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1967.
Chadwick, H. Augustine. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
Guardini, R. The Conversion of Augustine. Chicago: Regnery, 1960.
Markus, R.A. Saeculum, History and Society in the Theology of St. Augustine. 2d. ed. Cambridge, Cambridge University Press, 1988.
Van der Meer, F. Augustine the Bishop. London: Sheed and Ward, 1961.

JOHN C. CAVADINI

Augustinianism, an approach to theology, rooted in the thought of Augustine of Hippo (d. 430), that gives primacy to the will and to love over the intellect and knowledge, as in Thomism. Augustinianism characterized the Franciscan theology of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, especially that of Alexander of Hales, Bonaventure, and Duns Scotus. But Augustinianism has a negative meaning as well, also rooted in Augustine's theology, namely, an emphasis on human depravity brought about by the original sin of Adam and Eve and the incapacity of individuals to achieve salvation by their own effort. This type of Augustinianism holds that only because of the undeserved mercy of God will some members of the human community, the massa damnata (Lat., "damned mass"), be saved. Babies who die without Baptism are condemned to hell.

Even though these pessimistic elements in Augustine's writings were not fully representative of his outstanding theological achievements, they were incorporated into the theological perspective of the Protestant Reformers, especially Martin Luther and John Calvin, and the seventeenth-century French Jansenists, who placed great emphasis on the depravity of human nature and the moral consequences thereof. See also Augustine of Hippo, St.; Thomism.

Augustinians, popular name for the Order of Hermits of St. Augustine (OSA), a mendicant order spiritually linked to Augustine of Hippo (d. 430). Historical linkage with Augustine has never been established, but the order follows his rule, which calls for unity of heart and mind in God and living a common life according to the evangelical counsels.

During the eleventh and twelfth centuries, the Church attempted to regulate religious life and to organize and centralize the large number of groups that existed. Many independent penitential and eremitic communities at the time followed the Rule of St. Augustine. Pope Innocent IV united some of these groups into one order, the Tuscan Order of the Hermits of St. Augustine in 1243. The members of this "little union" were subsequently united with other groups into the Order of Hermits of St. Augustine by Pope Alexander IV in 1256. This "Grand Union" bound the groups under one prior general in Rome with provincial superiors ruling the various provinces.

By the beginning of the fourteenth century, the order had spread throughout Europe and as far as the Holy Land. They, like other mendicants, served in the active apostolate while maintaining community life and prayer. They numbered more than eight thousand, but during the Black Death more than five thousand members died.

The first constitutions directed the study of Scripture, the teachings of the Church, and the writings of Augustine. Augustine's teaching on the primacy of grace marks the theology developed by Augustinian theologians. Education of the members has been a high priority since the Grand Union. Gregor Mendel, the founder of the science of genetics, was an Augustinian.

Devoted to the Holy See, they defended the papacy repeatedly when it was attacked from within and from without. Augustinians held the office of papal chaplain from 1352 to 1991.

Martin Luther, too, was an Augustinian. While an unknown number of friars followed him, some of his staunchest opponents were Augustinians. In the post-Reformation period, monasteries in Protestant areas were confiscated and were forbidden to accept new members. The entire Augustinian province (territorial organization) in England was destroyed.

During the sixteenth century, Augustinians established missions in South America, the Philippines, India, China, Japan, Africa, and Iraq. Suppressions by civil powers in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries completely destroyed the French province and decimated the order in other countries.

In 1794, the Irish province sent missionaries to the United States, and the new province was approved by Rome in 1796. Since that time other provinces have been established in the United States and Canada. In 1842, Augustinians established a college in Pennsylvania that eventually became Villanova University.

There are more than fifty congregations of sisters that participate in the heritage and tradition of the Augustinian order. Augustinian Cloistered Nuns (OSA) came to the United States from Spain in 1968.

Current apostolates of the Augustinians include secondary and higher education, parish ministry, and retreat work. North American provinces maintain missions in Peru and Japan. See also Augustine of Hippo, St.

REGINA COLL

Augustinians of the Assumption. See Assumptionists.

Augustinus, treatise on grace and human nature based on the most pessimistic writings of Augustine. Written by Cornelius Jansen and published posthumously (1640), Augustinus denied the natural ability of humankind to cooperate in its own salvation, providing a theological foundation for Jansenism. The Jesuits opposed its publication, claiming the book violated papal prohibitions on public discussion of these issues. See also Jansenism.

aumbry (awm'bree), also known as ambry, in a church, a niche or cupboard recessed into the sanctuary wall reserved for the storage of sacred vessels. Typically the aumbry houses the vessels containing the sacramental oils: chrism, the oil of the sick, and the oil of catechumens. Occasionally, as in the pre-Reformation churches of Scotland, the aumbry was used for the reservation of the Eucharist. Some modern church designs accord the aumbry a visual emphasis equal in comparison to the tabernacle.

aureole (Lat., "golden"), an artistic device consisting of a field of light surrounding the whole of a person (a halo surrounds the head only) used in ancient non-Christian and then in Christian art to symbolize the divinity or special status of the one so decorated. The aureole is also known by its Italian name, the mandoria, since it sometimes is in an almond shape. Christian artists have reserved the aureole for representations of the Trinity and Jesus and by extension to Mary, the Mother of Jesus. See also halo.

Australia, Catholicism in. The original Australian Catholics were Irish lay people under penal sentence who arrived as early as 1788 on a group of ships known as the First Fleet. In the penal settlement, lay faith survived until the coming of official chaplains in 1820. The first bishop, J.B. Polding, an English Benedictine, arrived in 1835. In the second half of the century, Irish secular clergy came into power. In 1885, an Irishman, Patrick F. Moran, third archbishop of Sydney, became a cardinal. By then, state financial aid to church schools had been withdrawn throughout most of Australia. Catholics decided to construct their own system, paid for and staffed by themselves. They relied on members of religious orders, principally women, to run the schools, which aimed to provide a place in the classroom for every Catholic child. Thus almost every Australian Catholic was influenced by religious sisters in parish schools. Secondary schools came later, often in central locations and, for boys, staffed by religious brothers. As the number of religious vocations declined after Vatican II (1962–65), the schools were administered by lay teachers. The reintroduction of state aid made this possible without the collapse of what had become an overextended system. To date, Catholic higher education has been minimal.

Catholics and Australian Society: The denial of state aid to their schools, often for openly secularist reasons, provided Catholics a continuing sense of grievance. Australian society was dominated by a British Protestant hegemony which held Irish Catholics at a disadvantage. Because Catholics made up about one-quarter of the total population, however, they exerted pressure on the dominant ideology by force of numbers. Their refusal to accept second-class status destabilized the British imperialist ethos, opening the way to a nationalist sentiment and modern multiculturalism. Catholic resistance generated debates about conscription for military service during World War I, the opposition being led by Catholics Thomas J. Ryan, premier of Queensland, and Daniel Mannix, second archbishop of Melbourne.

The size of the Catholic population and its grievances encouraged the development of the Church as an alternative society. Parish clubs offered a full round of social, dramatic, sporting and other activities, which matched the rich varieties of popular religion available in the sodalities and pious societies. Yet parish life did not force Catholics into isolation from Australian society; often it energized them to make a wider contribution. In a similar way, Catholic hospitals were never for Catholics only; sometimes the only hospitals available, they were open to all. They continue to be an important segment of Australian health care. Likewise, social services, such as the strong St. Vincent de Paul Society, were open to everyone. In politics Catholics found their natural home in the Australian Labor party, where they predominated. Most Catholic prime ministers—the first was James Scullin in 1929—have been Labor members. In recent years, as Catholics entered the middle class, they have become more prominent in non-Labor circles.

This involvement outside the Labor party was accelerated by events in church circles, where Catholic Action on Jocist (Young Christian Workers) models had begun in the 1930s. Growing Communist power within the trade union movement during World War II brought appeals to Catholic Action to develop an anti-Communist force. A lay intellectual, Bob A. Santamaria, fashioned a secret organization, known as The Movement, which had rapid success. Because of constitutional links between unions and the Labor party, The Movement's industrial victories gave it access to political power. Misuse of this power led to public recriminations and in 1955 Santamaria's followers formed their own party, the Democratic Labor party, which delivered Catholic votes to the non-Labor coalition. The political split was paralleled by a split in the Church, with only half of the dioceses continuing to officially recognize The Movement.

Developments in the Church: Bitterness over Church involvement in politics eased during the euphoria of Vatican II. In particular, liturgical reforms were quickly welcomed, although they were implemented in an authoritarian way. The rejection of the encyclical on birth control, Humanae Vitae (1968), showed that authority's grip on lay consciences was slipping. The growth of non-Irish Catholic traditions due to massive national immigration programs meant that Australian Catholicism was becoming pluralistic. Prayer groups and retreat houses have replaced parish sodalities. Feminism flourishes in the remaining convents, which provide significant nonepiscopal leadership. Intellectual life is predominantly literary (history, novels, poetry, films) rather than theological. Social change attracts individual radicals, such as the Aboriginal Shirley ("Mumshirl") Smith, rather than the mass of Catholics. The Catholic Church and its hierarchy are strongly committed to the education and defense of the rights of the Aboriginal population through such organizational vehicles as the Aboriginal and Islander Catholic Council. Having been evangelized by Catholic missionaries in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, the Aborigines today constitute an important part of Australian Catholicism. Meanwhile, anti-Protestantism, once a social glue, is no more. EDMUND CAMPION

Austria, Catholicism in. The Christianization of the area today known as Austria occurred in phases. It began through Roman soldiers, laborers, and merchants mostly in the cities, while rural population remained pagan. Florian, a Roman army officer serving in Noricum (Austria), was martyred in 304 after protesting the killing of Christians during Diocletian's persecution. He is patron saint today of Upper Austria. The so-called Edict of Milan (313) eased life for Christians throughout the Roman Empire, including Austria, but the ensuing migration of un-Christianized masses (known as the barbarian invasions) plunged the Church once again into darkness. In the eighth century Frankish and Irish-Scottish monks evangelized the area and founded numerous monasteries. The victory of Otto the Great over the Magyars in 955 was the end of Christianization and the beginning of the present-day organization of the Catholic Church. During the Reformation more than 80 percent turned Protestant. The House of Habsburg started its own counter-reformation, which brought spiritual renewal but also persecution, exile, and forced conversions. In 1527 and 1683 the Turks were turned back. Josef II's Decree of Tolerance eased conditions for Protestant and Orthodox Christians and for Jews. In the 1960s complete equality was legally established.

Protestantism, which for two hundred years survived in secret, today constitutes 4.9 percent of the population and is mostly Lutheran. Ten percent of the 7.8 million citizens declare themselves without religious affiliation. Eighty percent of the population is Catholic, divided into two church provinces (Vienna and Salzburg) with nine dioceses. Austria's liturgical and biblical renewal movements, led by Pius Parsch, influenced Vatican II. Cardinal Franz Koenig, archbishop of Vienna, was one of the council's leaders. Today, Catholicism in Austria is involved with ecumenical collaboration in works of charity, pastoral endeavors, and the media. Vienna in particular plays an important role as a bridge to the East. JACINTA VAN WINKEL authenticity of teaching, the authoritativeness that the Catholic Church attributes to the teaching of the pope and bishops in matters of faith and morals. Vatican II describes bishops as "authentic teachers, that is, teachers endowed with the authority of Christ, who preach to the people committed to them the faith they must believe and put into practice" (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 25). The phrase "endowed with the authority of Christ" makes it clear that the term "authentic" as used here does not mean "genuine," but "authoritative," and also indicates the source of this authority. This is further spelled out when the council states in the same document: "In matters of faith and morals, the bishops speak in the name of Christ and the faithful are to accept their teaching and adhere to it with a religious assent of soul. This religious submission of will and of mind must be shown in a special way to the authentic teaching authority of the Roman Pontiff, even when he is not speaking ex cathedra" (n. 25).

The term "authentic" is often used, as in the text

just cited, to denote the exercise of magisterium that is authoritative but not infallible. Other examples of this use of the term are found in canons 752 and 753 of the 1983 Code of Canon Law, which speak of authentic teaching by the pope or bishops that calls for "religious submission" on the part of the faithful, but not the firm assent that infallible teaching would require. See also magisterium.

authority, the power to command, exact obedience, enforce laws, judge conduct, etc. Religious authority, however, is a power to influence belief or conduct, but without coercion or threat of harm. Authority in the Catholic Church is based on the authority of Jesus himself and his commission to his disciples: "All authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me. Go therefore and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, and teaching them to obey everything that I have commanded you. And remember, I am with you always, to the end of the age" (Matt 28:18–20) and on belief in the promise of the "Spirit of truth" (John 16:12–15). In the NT this authority is dispersed in a variety of gifts given to different persons—apostles, prophets, teachers, workers of miracles, healers, administrators, and those who speak in tongues—all of which were manifestations of the Spirit for the common good (1 Cor 12:4–31; Eph 4:11; Rom 12:6–8). These were all forms of service for the building up of the Body of Christ. Authority in the NT is service (Gk., diakonia). The apostles, among whom Peter and the Twelve (in whom Peter himself is numbered) are singled out, had particular authority as witnesses to the Resurrection and as the missionary founders of Christian communities. Thus, in later developments, apostolicity was a criterion of authority.

Historical Developments: With the death of the apostles, the various local communities organized themselves in diverse ways. The development of the threefold offices of bishop, presbyter, and deacon was gradual but widespread by the end of the second century. The authority of the bishop was emphasized but this was a spiritual authority and closely linked with the whole community, including the laity, who had a voice in selecting the bishop. It was also tied to the bishops' apostolicity, i.e., their continuity with the apostolic teaching.

When Christianity became the official religion of the Roman Empire in 380, bishops became men of public rank, administrators of justice, defenders of the poor, widows, and orphans. The authority of the Church became more secular and juridical and tended to become authority for its own sake, divorced from the spiritual gifts and from the influence of the community. The more charismatic or spiritual elements were kept alive by the growth of monasticism. Spiritual authority became separated from the hierarchical structure and was found in the holy "men of God," although many bishops were monks or men trained in a monastic tradition and lived accordingly.

The great reform movement of the eleventh century led by Pope Gregory VII attempted to free the Church from its identification with secular society and its domination by local rulers. The pope claimed for the Church a completely autonomous and sovereign system of rights proper to a spiritual society, including papal authority over kings and their kingdoms. This gave rise to the development of canon law and a more juridical notion of authority. From this time on, spiritual or charismatic authority was almost completely identified with the institutionalized offices of the Church.

The Middle Ages witnessed a growth of papal authority that has remained significant in Catholicism. Although some form of primacy had been accorded the Bishop of Rome in the early Church, the great popes of the fifth and sixth centuries such as Leo I (440–61), Gelasius I (492–96), and Gregory the Great (590–604), and of later centuries, especially Gregory VII (1073–85), enhanced the papal claims to supremacy and fullness of power over the universal Church. While asserting the rights of the Church and its legitimate autonomy from the secular powers, the medieval papacy also adopted many of the features of the imperial court, including the language, insignia, style and customs.

Although the centralizing and juridicizing of authority in the Church was the dominant trend from the eleventh to the fifteenth centuries, there were antiecclesiastical spiritual protest movements such as the Spiritual Franciscans, the Lollards, and the Hussites. The movement known as conciliarism, occasioned in part by the Avignon papacy and the Great Western Schism when there were two or more claimants to the papal throne (1378–1418), argued that ultimate authority in the Church lay with an ecumenical council rather than the papacy. These protests culminated in the Protestant Reformation of the sixteenth century.

The challenge to authority posed by the Reformers was a very basic one, since it was not just a questioning of authority in the historical form then existing, but a challenge to ecclesiastical authority in principle. The Reformers insisted that ultimate authority in the Christian community was to be found only in Scripture (Lat., sola Scriptura), not in hierarchical offices. The Catholic response at the Council of Trent (1545–63) and thereafter was to reemphasize unwritten tradition handed down from the apostles as complementing the canonical Scriptures. Subsequently, however, post-Tridentine theologians moved away from a quantitative conception of tradition as content and deposit handed on from the apostles, to an idea of tradition identified with the transmitting organism and residing above all in the magisterium of the Church. Since the sixteenth century, the Catholic Church has practiced a veritable "mystique" of authority, identifying the will of God with the institutional form of authority. In the latter it is God's voice we supposedly hear.

This mystique of authority reached its highwater mark with the definition of papal infallibility at the First Vatican Council in 1870. Since that council was unable to complete its work due to the outbreak of the Franco-Prussian War, an overemphasis on papal authority remained until the Second Vatican Council (1962–65).

Present Status: Conscious of the unfinished agenda of its predecessor, Vatican II deliberately set out to balance the definition of papal authority with a renewed emphasis on the authority of the bishops, individually and collectively (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, Lumen Gentium, n. 18). It also resituated all authority in the larger context of the whole Church, the People of God. The council stressed that all hierarchical authority is "true service," which in the NT is significantly called diakonia (Gk.), or ministry (n. 24). It taught that bishops together with the Roman pontiff are successors to the apostles and as such constitute "one apostolic college," which has been manifested throughout history in synods and ecumenical councils. After repeating the definition of papal infallibility from Vatican I, the council taught that "The infallibility promised to the Church resides also in the body of bishops when that body exercises supreme teaching authority with the successor of Peter," either when gathered in an ecumenical council or dispersed around the world (n. 25). The council urged that the synodal and conciliar tradition "flourish with new vigor" and encouraged the formation of national and regional episcopal conferences (Decree on the Bishops' Pastoral Office in the Church, Christus Dominus, nn. 36–38).

Since Vatican II, this has in fact happened as evidenced by the significant meetings of the Conference of Latin American Bishops (CELAM) at Medellín, Colombia, in 1968; Puebla, Mexico, 1979; and Santo Domingo, Dominican Republic, 1992, and the pastoral letters on national issues of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops in the United States. Thus, authority in the Catholic Church today is more widely distributed than in the recent past. There has also been an attempt to recover the evangelical and charismatic character of authority as found in the early Church. See also magisterium.

Bibliography

Granfield, Patrick. The Limits of the Papacy: Authority and Autonomy in the Church. New York: Crossroad, 1987.

Reese, Thomas J., ed. Episcopal Conferences: Historical, Canonical and Theological Studies. Washington, DC: Georgetown University Press, 1989.

Todd, John M., ed. Problems of Authority. New York: Seabury, 1962.

T. HOWLAND SANKS

authority of Scripture. See Scripture, authority of.

Authorized Version of the Bible. See King James Bible.

autocephalous church (Gk., "himself/itself the head"), one of the Eastern Orthodox churches with canonical and administrative independence from any other church, as distinguished from an autonomous or self-governing church jurisdictionally subject to an external hierarch. Autocephalous churches are in theological, spiritual, and liturgical communion with other Orthodox churches but appoint their own primate bishop who may be a patriarch, archbishop, or metropolitan. Granted by a mother church and recognized by the patriarch of Constantinople, autocephaly can be lost through territorial absorption of a conquered nation with subsequent assimilation of autocephalous and autonomous churches in that territory into the conquering nation's Orthodox church.

auto-da-fé (ou-toh-dah-fay'; Port., "act of faith"), a solemn public ceremony of the Inquisition at which judgment was pronounced on heretics and other sinners. The auto-da-fé included a procession of the condemned along with the bones of dead miscreants and pictures of absent ones. A sermon, announcement of sentence, and public confession followed. A full range of penances were imposed. Heretics were handed over to the secular authority to be burned at the end of the ceremony. Heretics who recanted at the last moment were garroted in an act of mercy. The auto-da-fé took place in southern France, Italy, Portugal, Spain, and their colonies but disappeared after the middle of the eighteenth century. See also heresy; Inquisition.

auxiliary bishop, bishop appointed by the Holy See at the request of the diocesan bishop to assist him in the performance of his duties. Canon law recommends that he also be appointed vicar general or at least an episcopal vicar. See also bishop; diocesan bishop; titular bishop.

avarice, the excessive desire for wealth or possessions; one of the capital sins. The avaricious person regards material riches as ends in themselves rather than means toward a greater good. While wealth or possessions may be considered good things, even gifts from God, attachment to them above all else represents a perversion of values. Avarice is a serious vice because desire for possessions may well lead a person to commit other wrongs in order to gain more money or possessions. Avarice may be indirectly destructive in particular of the development and exercise of the virtues of charity and justice. See also capital sins; detachment; poverty.

Ave Maria (ah'vay mah-ree'ah). See Hail Mary.

Ave Maris Stella (ah'vay mah'ris stel'ah; Lat., "Hail, Star of the Sea"), anonymous hymn in honor of the Virgin Mary. Earliest copies date from the ninth century. Widely popular in the Middle Ages, it has been ascribed to Paul the Deacon and to Venantius Fortunatus, among others. It is still used in Marian offices. The first stanza reads:

Ave maris stella, dei mater alma atque Semper Virgo, felix caeli porta.

Praise to Mary, Heaven's Gate, Guiding Star of Christians' way,
Mother of our Lord and King,
Light and hope to souls astray. See also Marian devotions.

Averroism, Christian philosophical trend from thirteenth-century Paris. Named after Averroës, the most Aristotelian Islamic philosopher, Averroists generally defended Aristotle or common interpretations of Aristotle in matters affecting belief in Genesis, heaven and hell, and providence. They argued that the world has always existed in timeless dependence on God, that humans share a common intellect such that immortality is impersonal, and that God knows creatures universally, not particularly. Since they professed orthodox beliefs but judged them false according to philosophical principles, contemporaries accused them of positing a double truth, whereas they claimed to be simply defending the autonomy of distinct sciences. See also Aristotle.

Avignon (ahv-een-yohn'), city and archdiocese in southeastern France and the seat of the papacy from 1309 to 1377 (a period known as the "Babylonian Captivity" of the papacy) and of rival popes during the Great Schism (1378–1417). Clement V moved the papal court to Avignon because of the dangerous situation in Rome created by the Italian ambitions of the Holy Roman emperor Henry VII and the need to resolve the continuing enmity of King Philip VI of France toward the papacy after his conflict with Pope Boniface VIII. In 1378, Gregory XI transferred the court back to Rome, but the French cardinals rejected the move and elected a rival pope at Avignon, thus instigating the Great Schism.

Claims by some scholars that papal residence on French soil subjected the Church to French control have not generally been accepted. It was not unusual in medieval Europe for the papal court to reside outside of the persistently dangerous city of Rome. During the Avignon papacy, vastly increased expenditures required an overhaul of the Church's financial and judicial machinery, resulting in the most efficient governmental administration in Europe. See also Great Schism.

Ávila, St. Teresa of. See Teresa of Ávila, St.

Azor, John, 1535–1603, Jesuit moral theologian. His treatise on moral theology was organized according to the Ten Commandments instead of the virtues, as had been the traditional practice. See also Commandments, the Ten.

Azymites, (Gk., azymos, "unleavened bread"), name given by Greek Christians to Latin Christians at the time of the schism of 1054 because of the Latin use of unleavened bread in the celebration of the Eucharist, a practice regarded by the Greeks as unscriptural and tending toward heresy. See also bread, eucharistic; Communion, Holy.

B

Baader, Franz von, 1765–1841, German philosopher of religion. After careers in engineering and medicine, Baader turned to philosophy. He composed romantic-idealist systems in which a history of humanity and the cosmos could be fashioned from areas as diverse as medieval mysticism, psychology, and chemistry. His thought anticipated cultural upheavals in Europe and served as an early stimulus to ecumenism among Christian churches.

Babel/Babylon (bay'buhl, bab'uh-lahn), a symbol for the oppressive power of Rome (as the center of the ancient Roman Empire) against Christians (1 Pet 5:13; Rev 14:8; 16:19; 17:5). Though the identification is never made directly, references like the "seven mountains" (Rev 17:9) leave little to the imagination. See also Rome.

Bacon, Roger, ca. 1213–ca. 1292, English Franciscan and scientist. One of the first to teach Aristotle's works at Paris, Bacon believed that all knowledge was implicit in Scripture and unfolded by philosophy and canon law and that knowledge was for the sake of doing good. To make possible the universal spread of Christianity, he sought to reform Christian learning by rejecting what he considered obsolete science, by using mathematical and experimental methods, and by studying Greek and Semitic tongues. His order condemned his teaching for unspecified novelties (perhaps the influence of the ideas of Joachim of Fiore); he never wrote more than sketches of his proposed synthesis. See also Aristotle; Joachim of Fiore.

Badin, Stephen T., 1768–1853, missionary priest, the first Catholic priest ordained in the United States. Born in France, Badin emigrated to the United States during the upheaval of the French Revolution. He continued his seminary studies in Baltimore and was ordained a priest by Bishop John Carroll in 1793. Badin then journeyed to Kentucky where he ministered to numerous Catholics living along the Kentucky, Tennessee, and Indiana frontier. He is regarded as one of the founders of Catholicism in these regions. He was also known for his stern ascetical understanding of Catholicism, which he sought to spread among the Catholic laity. In his later years he worked among Native Americans in the Michigan and Indiana regions. The land he acquired in northern Indiana became the site of the University of Notre Dame and he is buried on campus. See also Notre Dame, University of.

Baius, Michael (bi̱'uhs), also known as Michel de Bay, 1513–89, Belgian theologian. Rejecting the Scholastic formulation of doctrine, he preferred to appeal directly to Scripture interpreted in an Augustinian manner. Pope Pius V's condemnation (1567) of seventy-nine articles drawn from Baius's writings along with the later condemnation of Jansenism gave formal expression to Catholic suspicions of Augustine's teachings on sin, grace, and redemption, suspicions that had their origin in the Augustinianism of Luther, Calvin, and other Protestant Reformers. Some of the more important of Baius's condemned positions were: Fallen humans are determined to evil unless filled with God's charity. Charity is a transitory impulse (and not an habitual gift) of God; it is the sole source of good works. Humans are not free even when filled by God's grace. Concupiscence, even when one acts unwittingly, is sin. All the works of unbelievers are sin. Baius recanted his views and died in communion with the Church. See also Augustine of Hippo, St.; Jansenism.

Baker, Augustine, 1575–1641, English Benedictine spiritual writer. A lawyer by training, Baker converted to Catholicism in 1603 and shortly thereafter became a Benedictine monk. His treatises, based on the teaching of the fourteenth-century English and Rhenish mystics and the later mystics of France and Spain, were posthumously edited and published under the title Sancta Sophia (1657).

baldachino (bahl-duh-kee'noh), a covering or canopy built over an altar. The papal altar in St. Peter's Basilica features a famous baldachino designed by the sculptor Bernini. The term is also used for the ceremonial canopy that was carried over clerics, especially when a priest carried the Blessed Sacrament to the sick, or in procession on a feast day like Corpus Christi. This latter is also called an ombrellino (It.). See also canopy.

Baldwin of Canterbury, d. 1190, Cistercian, archbishop of Canterbury, canonist, and author of a treatise on the Eucharist. The first archbishop of Canterbury to extend the supremacy of his see over Wales, he preached the Third Crusade, on which he died. See also Canterbury; Crusades.

Balthasar, Hans Urs von, 1905–88, Swiss Catholic theologian and cardinal. Having studied at the universities of Vienna, Berlin, and Zurich, he completed his doctorate in Germanistics and philosophy in 1928, with a dissertation titled, "The History of the Eschatological Problem in Modern German Literature." In 1929, he entered the Jesuits, with whom he studied philosophy in Pullach near Munich from 1931 to 1933, and theology in Lyons (Fourvière) from 1933 to 1937. At Pullach, Balthasar came into contact with Erich Przywara (d. 1972) and at Lyons with Henri de Lubac (d. 1991), both of whom were to have a decisive impact on his thinking (although neither of them was actually his teacher). Przywara's work on the analogy of being was the focus of a widely publicized discussion between Przywara and the Reformed theologian Karl Barth. Balthasar's Karl Barth (1951) is an attempt—"joyfully welcomed and approved" by Barth himself—to bring about a rapprochement between Barth and the Catholic tradition concerning the relation between what is called the "analogy of faith" and the "analogy of being." Barth's Christocentrism exercised a lasting influence on Balthasar, though there remained differences between the two regarding the place of philosophical reflection in Christianity. With de Lubac, Balthasar said, he found his "theological home": here he discovered the spirituality-theology of the Church Fathers; the sense of the paradox of the human, according to which the human person is constitutively oriented to grace (the God of Jesus Christ), even as this grace remains absolutely undeserved; and the sense of the catholicity of the Church, and of the Church as communio (Lat., "community").

Bernini's famous baldachino over the high altar in St. Peter's Basilica, Vatican City.

In 1940, given the choice of going either to Rome as a professor at the Gregorian University or to Basel as a chaplain to students, Balthasar chose the latter. Here also began Balthasar's activities as an editor of the "European Series" of the Klosterberg collection, for which he prepared anthologies and did translations. Also at this time (1940), Balthasar met the physician Adrienne von Speyr (1902–67), who became a Catholic under his spiritual direction. The association with von Speyr, whose work Balthasar insisted could not be separated from his own, led in 1945 to the founding of the women's branch of the Community of St. John. Balthasar stressed that this "secular institute" was more important to him than his own writing (though he wrote over 100 books!). At the heart of his theology lay an insistence on the Church's intrinsic openness to the world, and on the role of the laity in realizing the presence of the Church in the world. In 1947, he established the Johannes Verlag, a publishing house whose purpose was to make available the writings of von Speyr and of the Catholic tradition more generally. Also in 1947 began the discussions and painful period of discernment that led to Balthasar's decision to leave the Jesuits in 1950 because the order could not assume responsibility for the Community of St. John. In 1972, together with Jean Daniélou, Henri de Lubac, Joseph Ratzinger, and others, Balthasar founded Communio: International Catholic Review. Its purpose was to assist with the theological-spiritual renewal called for at the Second Vatican Council, and to provide a more conservative counterpoint to the international journal Concilium.

The writings of what may be called Balthasar's "second creative period" find their center in his trilogy, published in fifteen volumes (1961–87): Herrlichkeit (The Glory of the Lord), Theodramatik (Theo-Drama), and Theologik (Theo-Logic). The trilogy is organized in terms of the transcendentals: "A being appears, it has an epiphany: in that it is beautiful and makes us marvel. In appearing it gives itself, it delivers itself to us: it is good. And in giving itself up, it speaks itself, it unveils itself: it is true (in itself, but in the other to which it reveals itself)" ["A Résumé of My Thought," in Hans Urs von Balthasar: His Life and Work, edited by David L. Schindler, San Francisco: Ignatius Press, 1991, p. 4]. Balthasar's theology of mission, the centerpiece of his work, is found in Theodramatik (II/2). Balthasar insisted that his "theological aesthetics" was not a dispensable theological byroad, but perhaps the one possible way to escape the limitations of the more commonly used cosmological and anthropological methods. At the heart of Balthasar's aesthetics lies the love—the "being permitted to be"—which "cannot be surpassed by any additional insight into the laws and necessities of the world" (The Glory of the Lord, p. 633).

Bibliography

Kehl, Medard, and Werner Löser, eds. Hans Urs von Balthasar: The Von Balthasar Reader. New York: Crossroad, 1982.

DAVID L. SCHINDLER

Baltic countries, Catholicism in the. Christianity was brought to the Baltic peoples by invasion and domination by German knights. Throughout history the political status of these countries played an important role in their religious development. The Christianization of Latvia and Estonia (formerly Livonia) came at the hands of the Livonian branch of the Teutonic Knights late in the twelfth century. Lithuania, whose religion was rooted in animism (a deification of nature), was the last European country to accept Christianity. The actual date of its conversion is disputed. Mindaugas, the first grand duke, was baptized in 1251 and accepted a royal crown from the pope in 1253. However, after his assassination in 1263, Christianity was tolerated but the native population returned to the pagan customs of its ancestors. Not until 1386 was a deliberate effort made toward the nation's reconversion.

Both Latvia and Estonia had been influenced by northern European Protestantism; Lithuania, by central and eastern European Catholicism. After conquering Slavic territory, Lithuania became a cultural battleground between the Latin rite and the Orthodox traditions of the East Slavs. Resolution favoring the Latin rite came in 1386. Catholicism flourished in Lithuania under a two-hundred-year shared monarchy with Poland, but with it also came the Polish nobility's dominion over Lithuania.

In 1795 Russia conquered all three Baltic countries. By 1865 the Latin rite was curtailed in Lithuania, and a Lithuanian national movement was subsequently formed as part of the struggle for religious freedom. Meanwhile, as a result of successful Russian Orthodox proselytizing and a strong German-dominated Lutheran church, Latvia and Estonia did not suffer as great a persecution as Lithuania. Following World War I Latvia, then 24 percent Catholic, signed a concordat with the Holy See in 1922, and Lithuania signed one in 1927. Estonia, with only 0.2 percent Catholics, maintained official diplomatic relations.

In June 1940, the Soviets occupied all three countries. The religious life of the people was completely disrupted. Orthodox congregations were created with total allegiance to the patriarch of Moscow. All other ecclesiastical buildings were confiscated, the clergy were persecuted, and all religious instruction was prohibited. Church holidays were abolished, and clergy and congregations were assessed extra taxes, rents, and utility fees.

With the Nazi takeover in June 1941, these countries experienced yet another form of oppression. The churches came under the control of the Nazi commissar. In 1944 the Soviet oppression was reimposed. One-third of all priests in Lithuania and Latvia were deported. In Lithuania Catholic literature was banned (until 1956). Between 1954 and 1968, national cultures reemerged. Atheistic propaganda was toned down. Two bishops were named in Lithuania and 130 priests returned from deportation. However, in 1957 another campaign was waged against religious freedom. Once again churches were closed, and secular holidays replaced Christian feasts.

During the winter of 1989–90, inspired by Soviet President Gorbachev's policy of glasnost (Russ., "openness"), the Baltics once again rebelled against Soviet domination. Lithuania, first under Algirdas Brazauskas and then Vytautas Landsbergis, declared its independence from the Soviet Union.

Over these turbulent years, Latvians and Estonians sustained a strong Lutheran tradition. In Latvia in 1994 there were a half-million Catholics, or less than 20 percent of the total population. In Estonia, however, a recent estimate placed the number of Catholics at only three thousand. Although forcibly deprived of priestly leadership and places of worship, the Lithuanians held on to their Catholic faith, with its rituals, processions, lanterns, and incense. Following this history of oppression, Lithuania claimed in 1994 over 2.5 million Catholics, about 80 percent of the total population. There were two archdioceses and four dioceses. Since the Communist regime was ousted, baptisms once again abounded and Catholic life entered a renewed phase of existence.

BEVERLY M. BRAZAUSKAS

Baltimore, councils of, the seven provincial councils of 1829, 1833, 1837, 1840, 1843, 1846, and 1849, and the three plenary councils of 1852, 1866, and 1884, in which the hierarchy of the U.S. Catholic Church addressed various pastoral challenges facing the young Catholic community in America. These councils had their remote origin in the decree of the Council of Trent (1545–63) that provincial councils, the formal meetings of the bishops of an ecclesiastical province, be held every three years.

A plenary council is composed of bishops from more than one ecclesiastical region. Laws promulgated in its sessions bind the dioceses represented in the plenary council, whereas provincial council legislation affects only the territory of that ecclesiastical province. From 1808 until 1846, Baltimore functioned as the only ecclesiastical province in the United States. Therefore, the first seven provincial councils of Baltimore were practically, though not formally, plenary councils of the United States. It was the responsibility of the bishop of Baltimore to convene councils. Though Bishop John Carroll convoked a provincial council in 1812, the meeting was not held and neither of his successors, Leonard Neale nor Ambrose Marechal, called a council. The persistent urging of John England, bishop of Charleston, South Carolina, convinced Archbishop James Whitefield, Marechal's successor, to convene the First Provincial Council of Baltimore (1829). Six bishops and the apostolic administrator of Philadelphia attended, as well as three lawyers, including the future Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, Roger B. Taney. Taney and his colleagues furnished advice concerning questions of legal incorporation. The decrees of the council reflected the concerns of the U.S. church in regard to the sacramental life of the Church, trusteeism, priestly conduct, the need for Catholic publications, a uniform catechism, and the establishment of Catholic schools. The Second Provincial Council (1833) issued decrees that determined boundaries of dioceses, the process for episcopal appointments, and called for the establishment of seminaries. The next five provincial councils (1837, 1840, 1843, 1846, and 1849), presided over by Archbishop Samuel Eccleston, continued to confront the problems of the growing immigrant Church. Many of the decrees reiterated the legislation of the past but also addressed the anti-Catholicism of the era; they warned against the perils of secret societies, the dangers of the public schools and mixed marriages.

The First Plenary Council met in 1852; six archbishops, twenty-seven U.S. bishops, and the Canadian bishop of Toronto attended. Francis P. Kenwick, archbishop of Baltimore, served as apostolic delegate. The council decreed that the legislation from the seven provincial councils extended to all U.S. dioceses. Though the nation grappled with the issue of slavery, the council made no statement about that impending crisis. The intent of the Second Plenary Council (1866) was to show the unity of Catholics in the aftermath of the Civil War and to respond to the needs of emancipated blacks. Once again, the council proclaimed the indispensability of parochial schools and encouraged parish missions and devotional practices. Archbishop James Gibbons convened the Third Plenary Council (1884); seventy-two prelates attended. The council's decrees called for a Catholic university, a uniform catechism (the Baltimore Catechism), aid to blacks and Native Americans, and better seminary and clergy education, and mandated the establishment of parochial schools. The councils of Baltimore created a strong diocesan organization, brought uniformity to church discipline and worship, and strengthened ties to Rome. See also Baltimore Catechism; parochial school; seminary; trusteeism, lay; United States of America, Catholicism in the. JANET WELSH Baltimore Catechism, catechism approved by the archbishop of Baltimore, Cardinal James Gibbons, on April 6, 1885, as the official text for the religious instruction of Catholic children in the United States. It remained the standard catechism in the United States until the Second Vatican Council (1962–65).

Historical Background: Martin Luther introduced to the Western world of the sixteenth century a concise, question-and-answer handbook of Christian doctrine known as a catechism. This new literary genre served as an influential and effective instrument for spreading the teachings of the Protestant Reformation. The Catholic Church emulated this method of instruction, and the catechism became a basic educational tool of Catholics for the next four hundred years. Peter Canisius (d. 1597), a Dutch Jesuit, produced the first major catechism for Catholics, Summa Doctrinae Christianae (1555), and later composed two other works designed for children. The Council of Trent (1545–63) mandated the writing of a catechism for clergy to assist their teaching and preaching. At the end of the sixteenth century, Italian Jesuit Robert Bellarmine (d. 1621) composed a catechism that was strongly endorsed by church authorities for the next several centuries. Catechisms were written for the Catholic population of various European nations; Edmund Auger (d.

1591) composed a manual for the Church of France; Jerome Ripalda (d. 1618) and Gaspar Astete (d. 1601) wrote catechisms for the Spanish church. English-speaking Catholics learned from catechisms written by Lawrence Vaux (d. 1585), Henry Turberville (d. 1678), and Richard Challoner (d. 1781). The archbishop of Cashel, James Butler, produced a catechism for the Catholics of Ireland, a manual marked by its apologetic and defensive tone.

John Carroll (d. 1815), the first bishop of the United States, looked to the European catechisms for assistance. The "Carroll Catechism" (1785), used in the United States in the late eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, was not written by Carroll but approved by him. This catechism reveals a dependence upon the English tradition of Vaux, Turberville, and especially Challoner. Like the Challoner manual, the first questions posed in the Carroll Catechism were: "Who made you?" and "Why did God make you?"

The nascent U.S. Catholic Church embraced many catechisms for the religious education of its people; local bishops adapted and edited versions of the European catechisms to meet the needs of their dioceses. In 1827, Ambrose Marechal, archbishop of Baltimore, suggested to John England, bishop of Charleston, South Carolina, that the United States needed a common catechism. He also wrote to Cardinal Cappellari, prefect of the Sacred Congregation de Propaganda Fide (Propagation of the Faith), that he feared the multiplicity of catechisms in the United States. Marechal was critical of England's catechism, as well as the works of Bishop Henry Conwell of Philadelphia and the controversial priest, William Hogan. The First Provincial Council of Baltimore (1829) addressed the catechism issue; it forbade the use of unapproved catechisms and mandated that a catechism for all dioceses be prepared and issued with the approbation of Rome. The Propaganda Fide insisted that the American catechism be based upon the Bellarmine Catechism. However, no uniform catechism appeared and the following six councils of Baltimore gave no attention to the common catechism.

After the First Council of Baltimore, record numbers of Irish and German immigrants swelled the Catholic population of the nation. Many Protestants feared this influx of Catholics; U.S. Catholics worried about the religious life of the newcomers. The First Plenary Council of Baltimore (1852) recommended a uniform catechism for the U.S. Church; A General Catechism of the Christian Doctrine was prepared and issued, but it did not satisfy all the bishops, and the episcopal practice of diocesan catechisms continued. The Second Plenary Council (1866) reiterated the importance of the single catechism but the established catechisms prevailed. The push for a standard catechism was not only the concern of the U.S. Church. At the First Vatican Council (1869–70) there was more debate concerning a universal catechism than papal infallibility. The council voted in favor of the universal catechism, but implementation of the proposal never materialized and the question of the universal catechism did not surface again until the late twentieth century.

The Origin of the Baltimore Catechism: Eight months prior to the Third Plenary Council, James Gibbons, archbishop of Baltimore, informed his colleagues that the council's agenda included the question of the uniform catechism. He appointed Joseph S. Alemany, archbishop of San Francisco, to chair a catechism committee composed of six bishops. Gibbons instructed the committee to consider: (1) the expediency of adopting a uniform catechism; (2) its name; and (3) whether the manual should be translated into other languages or other catechisms should be adopted for non-English-speaking Catholics. The Third Plenary Council convened on November 9, 1884; the catechism committee met in special session on November 11. After this meeting the size of the committee was increased and it met again in two special sessions. At this time, Reverend Januarius De Concilio, pastor of St. Michael's Parish in Jersey City and former Seton Hall philosophy and theology professor, accepted the task of writing a catechism. The Italian-born priest spent approximately one week composing the first draft of the manual. Later when the catechism suffered severe criticism, De Concilio minimized his participation in its composition. This hurriedly prepared text was submitted to the plenary session on December 6. The council closed the next day, so the galley proofs of the catechism received little attention. The committee requested that the prelates study the manual and send their suggestions to John L. Spalding, bishop of Peoria. From the end of the council until January 25, 1885, Spalding stayed in New York with the Paulist Fathers. During that time Spalding and De Concilio worked on the catechism; on February 23, Spalding reported to Gibbons that he had received "suggestions from all the archbishops concerning the catechism and have made such changes as seemed desirable." Cardinal John McCloskey of

New York gave his imprimatur to the manual on April 6; on that same day, Archbishop Gibbons issued approval for A Catechism of Christian Doctrine, Prepared and Enjoined by the Order of the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore. The catechism, 72 pages in length, consisted of 421 questions and answers in 37 chapters and followed the sequential order of the Roman Catechism: creed, sacraments, commandments. Spalding, however, was not satisfied with the catechism, and in September 1885 he revised it. He reduced the text to 208 questions in 33 chapters and rearranged and altered the context of the questions. This abridged edition, known as Baltimore Catechism No. 1, was not so widely used as the original text. Like the catechisms utilized prior to the Third Plenary Council, the Baltimore Catechism relied upon other manuals. Only 49 questions and answers are unique to the Baltimore Catechism.

Evaluation of the Baltimore Catechism: At the last session of the Third Plenary Council, several bishops questioned the quality of the proposed catechism. Archbishop Sebastian G. Messmer of Milwaukee recalled that "To several objections raised at the last meeting that the proposed catechism was very imperfect, in fact inferior, answer was made that uniformity was more important and that quite evidently many improvements were to be made in the course of time as experience would show the present deficiencies." Between September 1885 and October 1886 the German periodical Pastoral Blatt published nine articles against the new catechism. The anonymous author criticized the text for both its pedagogical and theological ineptitude. The catechism, according to the author, was unsuitable for children because of its incomprehensible language, the number of yes/no questions (91), the manual's size, and its monotonous style. The author pointed out the theological weaknesses of the text; the catechism considered the Resurrection, the central mystery of faith, in one question—"On what day did Christ rise from the dead?" Divine Providence and the Holy Spirit received scant attention. Although this evaluation of the Baltimore Catechism was valid, the other catechisms of the era merited similar assessments. The archbishops met in 1896 and established a committee to revise the Baltimore Catechism, but no action was taken. By the turn of the century, fifteen new catechisms had appeared, all approved by local bishops. The Baltimore Catechism endured more than fifty years of criticism before it was finally revised. Archbishop Edwin V. O'Hara, founder of the National Catholic Rural Life Conference and champion of the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine, spearheaded the movement for the catechism's revision. In 1936, O'Hara, representing the episcopal conference, invited theologian Francis J. Connell to organize and synthesize the bishops' recommendations for the revision of the catechism. After four drafts, The Revised Baltimore Catechism made its debut in 1941. Three versions went to press; one for young children, a second for first communicants, and a fuller rendition for adults. The revised edition consisted of 515 questions in 38 chapters. It ordered the questions according to creed, commandments, and sacraments. This sequential pattern differed from the original Baltimore Catechism, the Roman Catechism, and the catechetical practice of the early Church. The Baltimore Catechism prevailed as a dominant catechetical tool in the U.S. Catholic Church until the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). See also Baltimore, councils of; catechism; Catechism of the Catholic Church; United States of America, Catholicism in the.

Bibliography

Bryce, Mary Charles. Pride of Place: The Role of the Bishops in the Development of Catechesis in the United States. Washington, DC: The Catholic University of America Press, 1984.

Ellis, John Tracy. "Episcopal Vision in 1884 and Thereafter." U.S. Catholic Historian 4 (1985): 197–222.

Sharp, John K. "How the Baltimore Catechism Originated." Ecclesiastical Review 81 (December 1929): 573–586. JANET WELSH

Bañez, Domingo, 1528–1604, Spanish Dominican theologian. One of the most promising proponents of the Spanish revival of Thomism at Salamanca, Bañez was the defender and spiritual director of Teresa of Ávila. As professor of theology in Salamanca after 1581, he continued the tradition set by Francisco de Vitoria of defending the Indians. Bañez's rejection of Luis de Molina's theology of divine grace encountering human free will through a "middle knowledge" led to the famous controversy De Auxiliis. See also De Auxiliis; grace.

Banneaux, Our Lady of (bahn-oh'), a title for the mother of Jesus taken from apparitions in 1933 to Mariette Beco, of Banneaux, Belgium. These visions were seen as a verification of the Beauraing apparitions. Banneaux became a popular pilgrimage site. In 1942 the local bishop authorized a cult to Our Lady of Banneaux. See also apparitions of the Blessed Virgin Mary; Beauraing, Our Lady of.

banns of marriage, announcement of an intended marriage, made in order to help ascertain that both parties are free to marry. The number and method of such announcements are to be regulated by the national conference of bishops in any given territory (can. 1067). See also marriage law.

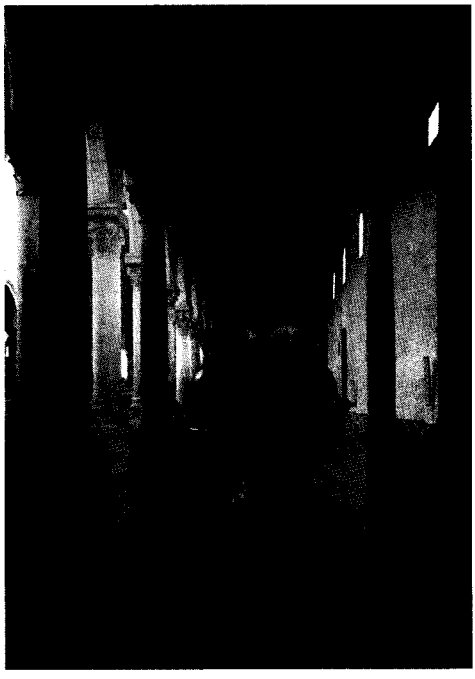
Bapst, John, 1815–87, Swiss-born Jesuit missionary. He was ordained a priest in 1846. After arrival in America in 1848, he ministered to Native Americans in Maine's Jesuit missions. He was the victim of nativist violence at Ellsworth, Maine, in October 1854, when he was tarred, feathered, and ridden on a rail following a controversy about Bible-reading in local schools. He later served as first president of Boston College and superior of the New York-Canada Jesuit mission. In later years, he was haunted by memories of the Ellsworth incident.

baptismal font, a water receptacle where the sacrament of Baptism is celebrated. According to present Church guidelines fonts should allow for immersion of infants at least, and the pouring of water over the entire body of a child or an adult. The Book of Blessings sees portable fonts as exceptional substitutes for stationary ones, which must be constructed out of a suitable material and be clean and beautiful. The water should be running and heated where climate necessitates. There are three possible locations: a separate baptistery, near the entrance of the church, or in the community's midst. See also Baptism; baptistery.

A marble baptismal font in the right aisle of the basilica of Aquileia, Italy.



baptism of blood, a substitute for the sacrament of Baptism in the case of unbaptized adults who are martyred for the faith. Thomas Aquinas held that death for Christ produced the same effect as the sacrament of water. All of the person's sins are remitted, and one is given title to eternal life.

Baptism of blood is only a sacrament by analogy (it is "like" the sacrament of Baptism). It reminds us, however, that faith is always more important than a sacramental ritual. The sacrament is a sign of faith. Without faith, the sacrament is without effect. See also Baptism; martyr; martyrdom.

baptism of desire, a substitute for the sacrament of Baptism in the case of adults of goodwill who, through no fault of their own, did not receive the sacrament. According to the Council of Trent (1545–63), an unbaptized person can achieve eternal salvation by the votum (Lat., "desire") for Baptism. The desire is to lead a good and upright life, even though one does not know the gospel of Christ and of his Church (Vatican II, Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 16). The most obvious example of baptism of desire is the case of a catechumen who dies before receiving the actual sacrament of Baptism. The more general example is that of a morally upright person who is never given the opportunity, or sees the need, for accepting Jesus Christ as savior. See also Baptism; universal salvific will of God.

baptistery, "the area where the baptismal font flows or has been placed. It should be reserved for the sacrament of Baptism and should be a place worthy for Christians to be reborn in water and the Holy Spirit. It may be situated in a chapel either inside or outside the church or in some other part of the church easily seen by the faithful; it should be large enough to accommodate a good number of people" (Christian Initiation: General Introduction, 1973, n. 2274). The Code of Canon Law says that every parish is to have a baptismal font (can. 848). A study of baptisteries from the third century until the present, along with the accompanying rites of Baptism, provides a thorough understanding of the sacrament. See also Baptism.

BAPTISM

Baptism is the sacrament by which one becomes a member of the Christian community. The origin of the word is from the Greek baptein, "to dip, to immerse." Classical Greek used it figuratively as "being overwhelmed," e.g., with suffering. This sense is reflected in Mark 10:38–39 where Christ and the apostles are "baptized" with suffering. The NT uses the term in a technical sense to refer to the religious ceremony of baptism.

BAPTISM IN THE BIBLE

2 Kgs 5:14 relates the story of Naaman, commander of the army of the king of Aram, who immersed himself seven times in the Jordan. The Fathers of the Church would later interpret this gesture to be quasi-sacramental.

For Jews the Torah prescribed ritual baths in the context of purification from ritual impurities: e.g., after touching a corpse (Num 19:19) or after being cured of leprosy (Lev 14:8–9). Thus purified, one was fit for worship. An extension of this concept can be seen in the practice of proselyte baptism required of gentile converts to Judaism. Shortly before NT times, such converts were initiated with rituals of circumcision, baptism, and sacrifice. These rituals made them legally pure and bestowed juridical incorporation as full-fledged Israelites.

The Qumran sect practiced many ritual ablutions. The Manual of Discipline points out that such baths cannot cleanse a person. Only with personal submission to God can perversity be removed and the Spirit of truth come alive. The ritual bath was a token of the sincere inner disposition of the person. While a connection with the baptism of John the Baptist is not excluded, there are marked differences.

The baptism of John, not conferred primarily on Jews, had a unique moral character to it, although it did not produce anything of and by itself. It was called in the Gospels (Mark 1:4; Luke 3:3; Matt 3:11) a baptism of repentance for the forgiveness of sins. John asked for a confession of sins and a manifest conversion; he sought moral purity. John expected his baptism to be superseded; it was provisional, as Matt 3:11 indicates. John expected someone to surpass him who would baptize with the Holy Spirit and with fire. This messianic baptism would inaugurate a new world.

Acts points out that the baptism of John, in contrast to that of Jesus, did not confer the Spirit (1:5; 11:15–16; 19:1–6). Jesus' submission to John's baptism did not indicate his sinfulness but his union with sinful humanity (John 1:32–34). The synoptic accounts (Matt 3:13–17; Mark 1:9–11; Luke 3:21–22) see this as the inauguration of the messianic mission of Jesus. The voice of the Father and the appearance of the Spirit as a dove mark the proclamation of the sonship of Jesus as his investiture with the Spirit, which fulfills the prophecies (Isa 11:2; 42:1; 61:1). Tradition has seen this as the prototype of Christian baptism inasmuch as the believer becomes a child of God through the gift of the Holy Spirit.

The baptism of Paul by the disciple Ananias in Damascus following Paul's dramatic conversion experience on the way to the city (Acts 9:10–19); mosaic in the Palatine Chapel, Palermo, Sicily.

Matt 28:19–20 records the postresurrectional mandate of the Lord to preach the gospel to all nations, teaching them to observe all that Jesus commanded, in effect making new disciples. Mark 16:15–16, while more reserved than Matthew, stresses the condition of faith for baptism. Both passages contain the commission to baptize. While the explicit formula in Matthew might come from the liturgy of the Church, the commandment to baptize and the central meaning of baptism come from Jesus. From its earliest days, the Church celebrated baptism.

John 3:1–21 describes baptism in water and the Spirit as a rebirth from above by the work of God the Father. The clearly formulated necessity of baptism in the Fourth Gospel seems rooted in the actual experience and practice of the apostolic Church.

Acts relates the practice of administering baptism to almost every group or individual who believed in the preaching of the apostles (2:37–41; 8:12–38; 9:10–18; 10:44–48). All those who accepted the preaching of the gospel and abandoned their former ways of life then came forward for "baptism in the name of Jesus" (cf. Acts 2:38; 8:16; 10:48; 19:5; 22:16). These instances probably do not deal with a formula used in baptism but the completion of the conversion process by the acceptance of Christ's claims, the unification with the community founded by Christ and the forgiveness of sins.

Several Pauline passages highlight the meaning of the sacrament and its continuing significance in and for the life of the Christian. The classic Pauline passage is Rom 6:3–11, which sees baptism as a burial with Christ and a rising with him. Three elements characterize Paul's understanding of baptism: it is in Christ Jesus; it is in the Holy Spirit; it is formative of community. Paul proclaims that baptism in Christ establishes a vital union with Christ in the saving events of his history, his dying and rising again. Union with Christ involves the reception of the Spirit of Christ, the Spirit of God (cf. Rom 8:1–17). These two elements meet in Paul's vision of the Church. Baptism for Paul brings into existence and establishes the People of God, formed through union with Christ in his Spirit (cf. 1 Cor 12:12–13; Gal 3:27–29; 4:4–7).

THE LITURGY OF BAPTISM

The NT does not provide us with the exact rite of baptism or the exact formula. It does seem that baptism in the early Church was by immersion. Paul's reference in Rom 6:4 to being "buried" with Christ implies immersion. The account of the Ethiopian eunuch also speaks of a going down into the water and a coming up out of the water (Acts 8:36–38).

BAPTISM IN THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH

The Didache, a late first-century Christian manual, prescribes baptism in living water, that is, in streams and rivers. There is a preference for immersion, although the pouring of water on the head (baptism by infusion) was also accepted when water for immersion was not available.

The second and third centuries could be seen as the great period of development of the rite of baptism. Justin, Tertullian, and Hippolytus of Rome provide us with descriptions of baptism. At the end of his First Apology, Justin remarks that the candidates were instructed to pray and fast. They were then brought to water and their sins washed away. He speaks of a negative effect of baptism, the remission of sins, and a positive effect, an illumination that comes about through faith in Jesus Christ. The baptized were then brought into the midst of the community to partake in the Eucharist.

Tertullian, in On Baptism, describes a renunciation of the devil by those to be baptized, followed by a threefold immersion in water. After this, the newly baptized received milk and honey. Indication is given that the baptismal font was consecrated. After the immersion, the baptized were anointed with oil. There followed the imposition of hands during which the gift of the Spirit was given. Before these ritual actions, however, there was a period of catechumenal preparation during which the authenticity of the conversion was ascertained and also another period of preparation consisting of prayers, vigils, and fasting immediately preceding the baptism.

The Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus indicates a three-year period of formation. An initial examination ascertained if the candidate should be admitted to the catechumenate. Another examination was held before the baptism. At cockcrow, the water was blessed. Little children were baptized first, answering for themselves if they could; otherwise parents or family members answered for them. The bishop blessed the oil of thanksgiving and the oil of exorcism, corresponding to today's chrism and oil of catechumens. The candidates renounced Satan and were anointed with the oil of exorcism. Then each candidate descended into the water with the deacon. The candidate made a threefold profession of faith and each time was immersed. The newly baptized was then anointed with the oil of thanksgiving. Thereafter, the candidates joined the assembly and the bishop imposed his hands upon them, anointed them, and sealed them on the forehead. The bishop then offered the Eucharist. The newly baptized were also given a mixture of milk and honey and a chalice of water as well as the consecrated bread and wine.

The period of the fourth to the sixth centuries was one of deterioration of the rite. The title of catechumen lost its significance. Bishops tried to push catechumens into baptism, which began to be postponed. The bishops tried to maintain the principle of conversion, but they faced an increasingly difficult pastoral problem, and entry into the catechumenate lost its character of a step taken in faith. The meaning of baptism also became blurred. Some catechumens saw it as a right; others saw it as a type of insurance one should obtain at the end of life.

From the sixth century on, reforms were attempted, but by the Middle Ages the catechumenate for all practical purposes no longer existed. Some of the elements (e.g., anointings, profession of faith, renunciation of Satan) of the ancient catechumenate were retained, but more and more they were mixed together into one baptismal rite.

Strong reform efforts were made from the sixteenth to the eighteenth centuries to revive some type of catechumenate, but the efforts often lacked a proper liturgical dimension. Successful reform came in the twentieth century with the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy decreed that the catechumenate be revived. Initiation rites as practiced in mission lands, especially Africa, were offered as a starting point. The result was the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (1972). This rite, known as the RCIA, recognizes that people become Christians through a process. It demands both an adherence to Christ and the active participation of the community in the process. In the United States a final edition of the RCIA appeared in 1988. This ritual also contains a number of rites approved specially for the dioceses of the United States.

The council also asked that the rite for infants be reformed. The Rite of Baptism for Children appeared in 1969. It contains a welcoming rite, a questioning of the parents as to their willingness to undertake their responsibilities, and a signing by the priest, parents, and godparents of the child with the sign of the cross. The celebration of the Liturgy of the Word follows. There is an exorcism, with alternate texts provided, and then the anointing with the oil of catechumens. The actual celebration of the sacrament follows: the blessing of the water, the parents' renunciation of sin and promise of faith, the baptism, anointing with chrism, the clothing with the white garment, the giving of the candle, and the Ephphatha (Gk., "Be opened" [Mark 7:32], an optional rite of blessing the ears and mouth). All process to the sanctuary for the Lord's Prayer and the blessing.

It is noteworthy that the ritual for the baptism of adults resurrected the old Roman catechumenate. The Rite of Becoming a Catechumen celebrates entrance into this order. Through it, inquirers become members of the household of faith. The second stage admits candidates to an intense forty-day period of Lent (thus refocusing the understanding of Lent). The Rite of Election marks this stage. Through it, the catechumens become the elect, those chosen for Easter initiation. The third stage is initiation by Baptism, Confirmation, and Eucharist. The fourth and final period is the postbaptismal or mystagogical period. Part II of the rite deals with the initiation of children of catechetical age who were not baptized as infants.

Most baptisms are, as here, of infants; as the priest pours the water, he says, "[Name], I baptize you in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit."

The manner of administration of the sacrament today is either by immersion or the pouring of water, whichever seems to better ensure that the baptism is not a mere purification but the sacrament of being joined to Christ. Specific instructions are given in the Book of Blessings for making the font ready for immersion.

The ordinary minister of Baptism is a bishop, priest, or deacon. If a person is in imminent danger of death or at the moment of death and no ordinary minister is available, any member of the faithful or anyone with the right intention may, and sometimes must, administer the sacrament. In a case of danger of death, there is a special shorter rite designed particularly for use by catechists and laypersons. If a priest or deacon is available, he should use the abbreviated form found in the revised rite, making changes required by circumstances of place and time. In either instance a small community of at least one or two witnesses should be present. The minister, whether ordinary or extraordinary, must use water either by immersion or pouring while repeating the Trinitarian invocation: "I baptize you in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit." This action should be informed by the intention to baptize the person into the Church.

THEOLOGICAL ISSUES

The sacrament of Baptism has various effects. It incorporates the recipient into the Body of Christ and forms one in his likeness (1 Cor 12:13). Catholics and non-Catholic Christians alike see this as a nonrepeatable action that links all of the recipients in a sacramental bond of unity (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 15). This sacrament pardons all sins, rescues recipients from the power of darkness, and joins them to Christ's suffering, death, and Resurrection (Rom 6:4; Eph 2:6; Col 3:1; 2 Tim 2:11). They become new creations through water and the Holy Spirit and so are then called sons and daughters of God. The baptized are marked with a special character empowering them to share in the priestly function of Christ, especially in the offering of the Eucharist (n. 10).

The institution of the sacrament of Baptism by Jesus Christ cannot be traced to one particular moment. The Church teaches that Christ willed this sacrament to be established and determined its inner meaning. Certainly the early Church believed that the practice of baptism was due to the authoritative command of the Lord.

Regarding the necessity of Baptism, two truths have to be kept in balance: the universality of God's call to salvation in Christ and the apparently unequal response of people to this call. The Church does not know exactly the fate of the unbaptized, but it teaches that baptism of desire (that of one preparing for baptism, or that of a person of goodwill who simply is unaware that God is calling the person to the Church) and baptism of blood (martyrdom) may substitute in the case of water baptism for adults. The salvation of unbelievers remains a matter of theological discussion.

Infant baptism is yet another difficult issue. Normally, in order to receive a sacrament explicit faith and an explicit desire are required. In the case of infants, it is the Church that "supplies" the faith and it is the faith community that nurtures and nourishes that faith as the young child grows into maturity.

Godparents play a significant role in Baptism. This is more of a challenge in today's secular culture. Sometimes parents cannot find godparents who have been fully initiated and are active Catholics.

As a general rule those who have not yet reached the age of reason are to be baptized according to the norms of the Rite of Baptism for Children. Children who have attained the use of reason and are of catechetical age seek initiation either at the direction of their parents or guardians or on their own initiative, with their parents' permission. They are subject to the norms of the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults. At present, within the same family, individuals may be initiated at different times and in different ways depending upon their age, whether or not they have been baptized already in another church, and the extent to which they have been formed in their Christian life.

As a result of the Church's renewed appreciation of the process of initiation and conversion, a new understanding of evangelization has developed that will have a significant impact on the way initiation will be celebrated in the future.

See also baptismal font; baptism of blood; baptism of desire; baptistery; catechumenate; Confirmation; Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults; sacrament; sacramental character; salvation outside the Church.

Bibliography

Beasley-Murray, G.R. Baptism in the New Testament. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1962.
Brown, Kathy, and Frances C. Sokol, eds. Issues on the Christian Initiation of Children: Catechesis and Liturgy. Chicago: Liturgy Training Publications, 1989.
Kavanagh, Aidan. The Shape of Baptism: The Rite of Christian Initiation. New York: Pueblo, 1978.
Morris, Thomas H. The RCIA: Transforming the Church. Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press, 1989.
Osborne, Kenan. The Christian Sacraments of Initiation. New York: Paulist Press, 1987.
Searle, Mark. Christening: The Making of Christians. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1980.
Yarnold, Edward. The Awe-inspiring Rites of Initiation. Middlegreen, England: St. Paul, 1971.

ANTHONY SHERMAN

Barat, St. Madeleine Sophie (ba'rah), 1779–1865, founder of the Society of the Sacred Heart. Guided by Père Varin, a priest recommended by her older brother Louis, Madeleine founded in 1800 in France an institute of women dedicated to the education of girls. Since 1818 the Society has become renowned in the United States for educating daughters of the wealthy. Feast day: May 25. See also Society of the Sacred Heart.

Barbara, St., a popular saint of the Middle Ages. Barbara's birth and death dates are unknown; in fact, her existence is doubtful. According to legend, she was martyred by her own father because of her faith. She is the patron saint of architects and builders and protector of those in danger of dying without the sacraments. Feast day: December 4.

Barbarigo, St. Gregory (bahr-bah-ree'goh), 1625–97, Italian cardinal, ecumenist. He was bishop of Bergamo (1657), cardinal (1660), and then bishop of Padua (1664). Famous for his charities and love of learning, he tried to bring about a reunion with the Greek church. In 1960 he was canonized by Pope John XXIII, one of his successors, as bishop of Bergamo. Feast day: June 17.

Barber, Virgil, 1782–1847, Jesuit priest and educator. Born in Simsbury, Connecticut, he was ordained an Episcopal priest, but in 1816, along with his wife and five children, he joined the Catholic Church. He entered the Society of Jesus the following year; his wife, the Georgetown Visitation convent. In 1822, at Claremont, New Hampshire, he began the first Catholic school in New England. He later taught at Georgetown and other Jesuit colleges.

Barberini, an aristocratic Italian family whose members were important in the papacy of the seventeenth century. The family's fortune was made by the election of Maffeo Barberini as Pope Urban VIII in 1623. He showered his family with wealth and offices. Two nephews, Francesco and Antonio, were made cardinals at the ages of twenty-five and twenty. A brother was made a cardinal despite the fact that he was a Capuchin, and two sisters who were Carmelites were also granted benefices. With the wealth they had gathered, the family founded the Barberini Library and built extensively in Rome. See also Urban VIII.

Bardesanes (bahr-deh-sah'neez), also known as Bar-Daisan, 154–222, Christian writer whose 150 hymns were the first composed in Syriac. Educated at the court of Edessa and converted to Christianity ca. 179, he impressed contemporaries with dazzling gifts as poet, scientist, archer, and philosopher. Although his Dialogue of Destiny argues against Marcionite distinctions between God and the Creator, he was accused by Ephraem the Syrian of Docetism and other Gnostic teachings. The validity of these accusations remains unclear. See also Docetism; Gnosticism; Marcion.

Barnabas, Letter of, Christian treatise attributed by Clement of Alexandria to the Barnabas of the Acts of the Apostles, but now ascribed to an anonymous author of the late first or early second century. The Greek text interprets Jewish Scriptures nonliterally in order to attack the Jews for their formalistic legal observance, which rejected God's true covenant and obscured the witness to Christ.

Barnabas, St. (bahr'nuh-buhs), an early Christian missionary, whose name in Hebrew means "son of consolation." A Levite from Cyprus originally named Joseph, he became a follower of Jesus, sold some property, and donated the proceeds to the apostles (Acts 4:36–37). He introduced Paul to the leaders in Jerusalem (Acts 9:27). He and Paul collaborated in Antioch (Acts 11:22–30), and then journeyed together as missionaries (Acts 13–14; 1 Cor 9:6). They attended the apostolic conference in Jerusalem that settled the question of circumcision for Gentiles (Acts 15; Gal 2:1–10). Subsequently they parted ways, disagreeing over the presence of Mark (Acts 15:39) and over the appropriate form of table fellowship between Jewish and gentile Christians (Gal 2:11–14). Yet Paul continued to use Barnabas as an example of apostolic behavior (1 Cor 9:6). Barnabas and Mark sailed to Cyprus (Acts 15:39), where according to tradition he was stoned to death at Salamis after founding the Cypriote church. The fifth-century Acts of Barnabas expands on the account in Acts.

No certain writings of Barnabas survive. The Letter of Barnabas is the work of an anonymous Christian of the late first or early second century. It offers a lengthy argument about the superiority of Christianity to Judaism and practical moral advice. Tertullian believed, and some modern scholars agree, that Barnabas wrote the NT Letter to the Hebrews, but both Hebrews and the Letter of Barnabas are more extreme in their rejection of Jewish tradition than is likely for Barnabas. Feast day: June 11.

An example of Baroque art: a ceiling painting in the apse of the church of Santa Maria in Vallicella, Italy, depicting the Blessed Virgin in glory.

HAROLD W. ATTRIDGE

Barnabites, Clerics Regular of St. Paul (C.R.S.P.), an order founded in Milan in 1530 by Anthony Zaccaria and others and approved in 1533. Most noted for their work with Charles Borromeo, since the seventeenth century they have concentrated on missions and educating children. See also Anthony Zaccaria, St.

Baronius, Caesar, 1538–1607, cardinal and historian of the Church, author of the influential twelve-volume Annales Ecclesiastici. Born to a noble family, Baronius earned a doctorate in law at Rome (1561), where he participated in Philip Neri's Roman Oratory (diocesan priests living in community without religious vows), later succeeding Neri as its head (1593). It was in response to Neri's order to reply to the Lutheran Church history Centuriae Magdeburgenses that Baronius began his scrupulously detailed, nonpolemical attempt to demonstrate the apostolic foundations for Catholic beliefs and practices. At his death, however, his Annales Ecclesiastici had only reached the year 1198. Volume 11, published in 1605, included a note supporting the claims of the papacy against Spain in Sicily. It so angered the Spanish king Philip III that Baronius probably lost his chance to be elected pope. See also Oratorians; Oratory of Divine Love.

Baroque Catholicism (Port., barocco, "rough pearl"), a renewal of Roman Catholicism that emphasized emotion and displayed action and variety within unity. Traditionally, the Baroque period is dated from 1580 to 1680, but extends, for Catholicism, into the late nineteenth century. Figures of Baroque Catholicism in Spain were Teresa of Ávila and Melchior Cano; in France, Pierre de Bérulle, Margaret Mary Alacoque, Vincent de Paul, and Louise de Marillac. Theology, monastic life, mysticism, and authority, with parallels in art from Mannerism to Rococo (often stimulated by the Church), found new directions and styles: there was an emphasis upon the personal, a desire to explain texts and to arrange the many areas of theology, and an interest in the mystical and the heroic. A new experience of God's vastness, of human potential, and the world's diversity led to a veneration of Christ in his humanity and redemptive love. The Church was a place of grace: there the presence of God inspired and sustained heroic servants of the gospel while the arts depicted a festive Church in heaven. There was a shift toward the individual, as laymen and laywomen pursued intense spiritual lives in society and presented Christianity as a personal life of prayer and service rather than as an institution. Actual grace was a principal theme of the Baroque: grace is a transient force acting in conversion, meditation, and supernatural decisions (this led to "an extrinsicism" of grace, whereby it is regarded as something quantitative and external to the spiritual life of the individual, and a separation of liturgical form from inner intention).

Three focuses of Baroque Catholicism as manifested in spiritual autobiographies, theologies, liturgies, and communities are the self, method, and drama. Spiritual life drew upon the force of actual grace, the stories of the Bible, and the examples of the saints. Methods and exercises of Christian life were central (perhaps mirroring the order of Descartes, Galileo, and Newton) and they would lead to a certain mechanization in prayer and liturgy. Christian thought and life during the Baroque period had a theatrical component as it pondered conversion or heroic ministry. A strong emotional and visual orientation was confirmed by visions, miracles, and conversions. The liturgy became increasingly elaborate, devotions more and more dramatic.

Since the Enlightenment's influence was not extensive in Catholicism, the restoration of Catholicism after 1830 through the religious orders, devotions, and spiritualities continued the Baroque with communities patterned after the Society of Jesus, the Tridentine liturgy of solemn high Mass and Benediction, dramatic devotions to ethnic Baroque saints, prayer as stages of meditation, sharp distinctions between the natural and the supernatural, silent retreats, and miraculous appearances. The metamorphoses of Catholicism in recent decades show that it is Baroque Catholicism (not the Counter-Reformation or Modernity) that is challenged by developments after Vatican II (1962–65). Many of the issues and conflicts within contemporary Catholicism—the balancing of papal absolutism by bishops and their episcopal conferences, the introduction of liturgical forms from early centuries, spiritualities drawn on contemporary psychology and devoid of unhealthy masochism—have challenged Baroque structures and the mentality supporting them. See also devotions; grace; saints, devotion to.

THOMAS F. ÓMEARA

Barth, Karl, 1886–1968, Swiss Protestant theologian known for his insistence upon God's utter transcendence. As a student at the universities of Bern, Berlin, Tübingen, and Marburg, Barth favored "liberal" theology. But in light of his parochial ministry and World War I, he came to reject the theology of his teachers, Adolf von Harnack and Wilhelm Herrmann. Appealing to the Protestant principle of sola Scriptura (Lat., "Scripture alone"), Barth set out to move beyond a reliance on historical-critical methods and to read the Bible on its own terms, so as to discover the God who is "wholly other" than human thought about God.

The first fruit of this endeavor was his commentary entitled Epistle to the Romans (1919), in which Barth argues that, according to Paul, God condemns all human undertakings and saves only those people who trust not in themselves but solely in God. This book and Barth's subsequent writings won him academic appointments at the universities of Göttingen (1921–25), Münster (1925–30), and Bonn (1930–35). In 1933, judging that the claims of Adolf Hitler were idolatrous, Barth joined Germany's "Confessing Church" and helped in the drafting of the Barmen Confession (1934). Deprived of his professorship by the Nazi regime, he returned to Switzerland, where he taught at the University of Basel (1935–67).

In his early years, Barth advocated a "dialectical theology," according to which little can be said about God who, as the divine absolute, cannot be known by the human mind (The Word of God and the Word of Man, 1924). In his middle years, he sought for a way to speak about God that depended not on a natural theology and the "analogy of being," but solely on divine revelation and the "analogy of faith." This effort produced his four-volume (thirteen-part) Church Dogmatics (1932–67), inspired in part by John Calvin's Institutes. In his last years, Barth gave greater recognition to theological anthropology (The Humanity of God, 1956). Barth's thought has influenced both Protestant theologians such as Hans W. Frei, Eberhard Jüngel, Jürgen Moltmann, and Wolfhart Pannenberg, and also Catholic theologians such as Hans Urs von Balthasar, Hans Küng, and Walter Kasper.

ROBERT A. KRIEG

Bartholomew, St., one of Jesus' twelve disciples,

Bartholomew, one of the original twelve apostles, reputed to have preached the gospel in India; fifteenth-century Pier Matteo d'Amelia mural (with the words, "I believe in the Holy Spirit") in the Borgia apartment in the Vatican.

according to the four lists in the NT (Matt 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:14; Acts 1:13). His name in Hebrew means "son of Talmai," but nothing certain is known of him. Some scholars identify him with Nathanael of John 1:45–51, because both are closely associated with Philip. Bartholomew's name appears after that of Philip in the synoptic Gospels, and Nathanael is brought to Jesus by Philip in John. An identification is possible, but unproven.

The earliest Church tradition about Bartholomew is a report from the second-century Alexandrian teacher Pantaenus, preserved in Eusebius (Eccl. Hist. 5.10.3). Pantaenus had visited India, probably the Malabar Coast, which had trading relations with the Roman Empire. There he found a Christian community that revered Bartholomew as its founder and possessed a Hebrew "Gospel of Matthew" that Bartholomew left them.

Several apocryphal works circulated under the name of Bartholomew. Jerome mentions a Gospel of Bartholomew, although he may have simply inferred its existence from Eusebius. The Questions of Bartholomew is a fifth-century work with dialogue between Jesus and his disciples after the Resurrection about such matters as the harrowing of hell and the virgin birth. The Coptic Book of Bartholomew on the Resurrection, also from the fifth or sixth century, contains various loosely connected stories about the death and resurrection of Jesus and his harrowing of hell, along with several hymns. Feast day: August 24. See also apostle; Twelve, the. HAROLD W. ATTRIDGE

Bartholomew's Day Massacre, St., a mass slaughter of Huguenots in Paris and elsewhere beginning on August 24, 1572 (St. Bartholomew's Day). After a failed assassination attempt on the Protestant leader Coligny, who was in Paris for the marriage of the Protestant Henry of Navarre (later Henry IV) to the sister of the Catholic Charles IX, the panicked king, at the urging of his mother Catherine de Médici and the Catholic Guises, ordered the murder of the Protestants in Paris. Thousands of men, women, and children were killed all over France.

base communities, small groups led by laity who gather together for Scripture and Communion services in the absence of a priest. The participants reflect upon the relation of the Bible to their daily lives and, on occasion, make social decisions resulting from these discussions.

Three areas of the Catholic Church in the developing world, independently of one another, have experienced an extraordinary growth of base communities: Latin America, Africa, and Asia. Base communities began in Brazil in 1956 (Barra do Piral Diocese) and were known as "Sunday services without a priest." In 1963, they were developed in the San Miguelito Parish of the archdiocese of Panama. These were creative pastoral efforts motivated by laypersons desiring to support their bishops.

Base communities are not mentioned in the documents of the Second Vatican Council, but appear first in Pope Paul VI's 1975 apostolic exhortation "On Evangelization in the Modern World" (Evangelii Nuntiandi, n. 58). These communities represent a new way of being Church and provide a means for laypeople to become more active participants in a renewed evangelization.

In the rapid growth of base communities there are now many different names applied to them, implying that they mean many things to various groups. However, in a church context they may be described as "basic ecclesial communities." Basic—in the sense that they are a gathering of active laypersons "at the base" of the Church; ecclesial—insofar as they strive for a unity in faith, and a linkage with the institutional Church; community—as an effort to live out a community life in a modern society that rewards individualism and competitiveness. In 1968, at the Medellín (Columbia) Conference of Latin American bishops, base communities were given official encouragement. In 1979 the bishops at Puebla (Mexico) both reviewed the communities and urged an even closer bond with official pastoral leadership. In 1992 the Latin American bishops renewed this support in their sessions in Santo Domingo (Dominican Republic).

On January 30, 1989, the Vatican released the apostolic exhortation "On the Mission of the Lay Faithful in the Church and in the World," signed by Pope John Paul II. This exhortation provides clear support for building these communities throughout the Catholic world (n. 26). Later in the same document base communities are seen as a "notable" help in the formation of lay leadership (n. 61). These sections are placed in the context of an ecclesiology of community that encourages the development of the gifts of all members of the Church.

Base communities not only help the Third World, but have positive implications for the Church in the First World. In the so-called developed world a rugged individualism often leads to deep alienation and mistrust. The Church, by contrast, is moving toward a kind of ministry in which all are responsible for the spiritual and pastoral life in their own small community. In fact, these communities are now growing gradually in the First World. As this happens, the Church is being reborn, not only as a dynamic response to impersonal times but also as a way of incarnating the vision and spirit of the Second Vatican Council. ROBERT S. PELTON

Basel, Council of, 1431–49, final of three Church councils (after Pisa and Constance) meeting from 1431 to 1449 to resolve the crisis of papal authority provoked by the Great Schism (1378–1417). The conciliar movement triumphed at Basel, but internal factionalism and the rehabilitation of papal authority made it a short-lived victory. Pope Martin V called the council to complete the reform work of the Council of Constance but died before it began. His successor, Eugenius IV, sought to undermine the assembly by announcing another council, in Bologna. The council members refused to disperse, invoked the conciliar superiority decreed in Sacrosancta at Constance, and compelled Eugenius to recognize Basel's validity. The participants also forced papal appointees to sign an oath affirming conciliar supremacy and promulgated reforms against simony.

Those at Basel also negotiated independently with Greek envoys to reunite Latin and Greek Christendom. The rejection of Byzantine demands for a council in Italy split the conciliar ranks. A minority of council members, the Greeks, and the pope agreed to hold the Council of Union in Ferrara (1437), effectively restoring papal prestige. After the council was transferred, some in Basel defiantly stayed on and deposed Eugenius (1438), declared conciliar authority a truth of Catholic faith, and elected an antipope, Felix V (1439). The strengthened papacy, however, forced Felix's resignation (1448), and the proceedings at Basel, invalid after the council's transfer to Ferrara, came to an end. See also conciliarism; Constance, Council of; Great Schism.

Basil, Rule of St., term commonly used for two works of Basil the Great (d. 379) that traditionally bear the title, not given them by Basil, of Long Rules (55 in number) and Short Rules (313 in number). Neither is a monastic rule proper, comparable to the Rule of St. Benedict. Instead, they are integral parts of the totality of his ascetical works (Asceticon, Gk., "Ascetical [Teachings]") and arose out of questions posed to him by monastic communities that had arisen already earlier in Cappadocia. Basil continued to respond to similar questions and to edit his responses to the end of his life. His Rules were never understood by Eastern monastics as canonically binding documents, but due to their intrinsic spiritual merit and to the ecclesial authority of their author, they had a profound influence on monasticism in the East and also in the West. An early edition of the Long Rules was translated into Latin in Basil's lifetime.

Basilians, name given since the twelfth century to Greek monks in southern Italy, later to other Eastern Christian monastics. The term refers to Basil the Great (d. 379) and was intended to designate him as the founder and legislator of monasticism in the East as Benedict was in the West. Eastern monks and nuns in their own milieu use no such designation; they are simply monastics. Only when groups of monasteries within various Eastern Catholic churches in the seventeenth century began to be organized into orders did the term Basilians, as part of the official name of such newly centralized monastic groups, come into wide use. In the 1990s there are various orders of Basilians in the Italo-Greek, Ukrainian, and Melkite Catholic churches; to distinguish them, the Congregation for the Oriental basilica, term used to designate certain official buildings in the time of the Roman Empire, later adapted, as was the architectural style of such buildings, for Christian use. The word itself has Greek origins and means "king's hall"; Christian use refers to Christ as the king of kings. Currently the term is used to designate a certain church of historical significance that continues to play an important part in the religious life of at least a particular region. In addition to the major basilicas, all of which are located in Rome, the Holy See honors other significant churches with this title. The insignia of these minor basilicas include a red and yellow striped umbrella (It., ombrellino) reminiscent of those carried over imperial and papal authorities, the papal coat-of-arms over the door, and a bell (tintinabellum) recalling those once used to warn people of the approach of a papal procession.

Churches introduced additional designations in their official names (such as "of St. Josaphat" for the Ukrainian Basilians). See also Order of St. Basil the Great.

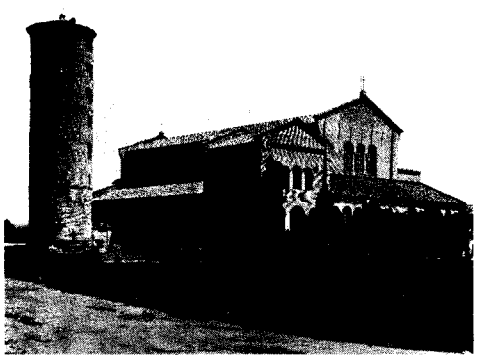
Basilicas are expected to celebrate with greater solemnity than other churches certain feast days related to the Petrine ministry and to commemorate certain historical days in the life of the current pope. In addition they are to be models for liturgical celebration and places of pilgrimage for the faithful. Particular indulgences, unavailable in other churches, may be gained at basilicas.

Minor basilicas in North America include Mission Dolores in San Francisco, California; the Cathedral of St. Augustine in St. Augustine, Florida; Sacred Heart Basilica on the campus of the University of Notre Dame in Notre Dame, Indiana; the Basilica of Notre Dame in Ottawa, Canada; and the Basilica of Notre Dame in Quebec, Canada. See also basilica, major; basilica, minor; basilica, patriarchal.

JOHN LAHEY

The basilica of St. Apollinaris in Ravenna, Italy; Apollinaris was the first bishop of Ravenna.



basilica, major, a principal papal church in Rome. Major basilicas are of ancient origin and have served as places of pilgrimage. Four of them are considered patriarchal basilicas (basilicas traditionally assigned to Eastern patriarchs in union with Rome) as well: St. John Lateran, St. Peter's, St. Paul's Outside the Walls, and St. Mary Major. See also basilica; basilica, patriarchal.

basilica, minor, a church of particular historic, artistic, or devotional importance honored by the pope. The church so honored must be a center for a vibrant faith community where the sacraments are properly celebrated. See also basilica.

basilica, patriarchal, a church known for its antiquity, dignity, and historical importance that has been assigned as a titular church to an Eastern patriarch in union with the see of Rome. The four major basilicas of Rome (St. John Lateran, St. Peter's, St. Paul's Outside the Walls, and St. Mary Major) are also patriarchal, as is the Church of St. Lawrence in Rome, a minor basilica. The churches of St. Francis and of St. Mary of the Angels in Assisi, Italy, are also major patriarchal basilicas. See also basilica.

Basilides (baz-uh-lee'deez), ca. 120–45, Christian Gnostic who taught in Alexandria ca. 132–35 and earlier. He wrote his own Gospel, a biblical commentary (Exegetica), and a book of Odes. Irenaeus, Hippolytus, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, and Eusebius responded to his teachings, which stressed the living Jesus and denied that the Christ, as the word of God, had been crucified. See also Gnosticism.

Basil, "the Great," St., ca. 330–79, bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia (370–79) and one of the Cappadocian theologians whose work brought the Arian controversy to a close. One of nine children (including Macrina the Younger and Gregory of Nyssa) born to Basil the Elder, a teacher of rhetoric, and the wealthy aristocratic Emmelia, Basil was educated first by his father and grandmother (Macrina the Elder), then at Caesarea, Constantinople, and finally Athens. Upon his return in 355 he taught rhetoric, but after a tour of the ascetic settlements in the Middle East and Egypt and after his father's death (358), he renounced his career, was baptized, and joined the ascetic community his sister and mother had founded on a family estate. Basil's monastic rules and the Philocalia date from this period. Ordained presbyter (ca. 362), he came to Caesarea in 364 when his bishop Eusebius required his support against the Arian emperor Valens (364–78). In 368 Basil was acclaimed for his relief efforts during a famine in Cappadocia. Succeeding Eusebius as bishop at his death, Basil's episcopacy was marked by building projects for the relief of the poor and by continuing controversy with the Arians and with the Pneumatomachians, who denied the divinity of the Holy Spirit. His On the Holy Spirit and Against Eunomius substantially advanced the articulation of Nicene orthodoxy; the Hexameron commentary (on the six days of creation) offered a brilliant, moderated critique of allegorical approaches. The Address to Young Men acquired a second life among the Renaissance humanists, who admired its openness to secular education. Basil is a Doctor of the Church. Feast day: January 2 (West, formerly June 14); January 1 (East). See also Arianism; Cappadocian Fathers; Holy Spirit; Pneumatomachians; Trinity, doctrine of the.

Basil of Caesarea, one of the three Cappadocian theologians, shown dictating his doctrine about the divinity of the Holy Spirit and of the Trinity; seventeenth-century painting by Francisco Herrara the Elder, Louvre, Paris.

JOHN C. CAVADINI

Battifol, Pierre (pee-air' bah'ti-fol), 1861–1929, Church historian. Rector of the Institut Catholique at Toulouse, 1898–1908, he worked especially on early Christian doctrine and liturgy but was suspected of Modernist tendencies. He was forced to resign his rectorship at Toulouse and his book on the Eucharist was placed on the Index of Forbidden Books in 1911. His work encouraged the growth of critical studies in France.

Baum, Gregory, b. 1923, Canadian Catholic theologian. As a Jewish youth, Baum escaped Nazi Germany and was educated in Canada. He converted to Catholicism and taught for many years at St. Michael's College of the University of Toronto. At McGill University of Montreal, Baum's work can be described as the theological study of human society. He is author of many works, including Man Becoming (1970).

Baumstark, Anton, 1872–1948, German Catholic orientalist, philologist, and liturgiologist famous especially for his pioneering history of Syriac literature (1922) and the "laws" of liturgical evolution outlined in Vom geschichtlichen Werden der Liturgie (On the Historical Evolution of the Liturgy, 1923) and Comparative Liturgy (1940, 1958). His contribution remains seminal in spite of the inadequacies of some of his theories. A man of boundless energy, he taught at several German and Dutch universities, published 546 works, founded and edited the renowned scholarly journal Oriens Christianus (The Christian East) from 1901 to 1938, and cofounded with O. Casel the Jahrbuch für Liturgiewissenschaft (Yearbook of Liturgical Science). The mark left on modern oriental liturgiology by his writings and those of his students, like H. Engberding, is still felt. Baumstark's involvement with Nazism tarnished his later years.

Bavo, St. (bay'voh), 589–654, Belgian monk. Converted as a widower by Amandus, he founded an abbey on his estate in Ghent. He is patron saint of the dioceses of Ghent (Belgium) and Haarlem (Netherlands). Feast day: October 1.

Bayley, James Roosevelt, 1814–77, American prelate. A nephew of Elizabeth Bayley Seton, he was ordained an Episcopalian priest in 1841. The following year he became a Roman Catholic and in 1844 he was ordained a Roman Catholic priest by John Hughes, the bishop of New York. He was appointed the first bishop of Newark, New Jersey, in 1853. He founded Seton Hall College in 1856 and promoted parochial schools. In 1872 he became the archbishop of Baltimore. He was an advocate of temperance and a promoter of Gregorian chant. See also Seton, St. Elizabeth Ann Bayley.

Baylon, St. Paschal. See Paschal Baylon, St.

B.C./B.C.E., before Christ/before the common era. The neutral designation B.C.E., often preferred to B.C. out of deference to other faiths' different calculations of time, reflects the more ecumenical approach to the study of the OT. Correspondingly, and for the same reasons, C.E. (common era) is used by many in preference to A.D. (Lat., Anno Domini, "in the year of the Lord"). The alternative Jewish calculation is from the (putative) date of the creation of the world, and that of Islam from the hegira (Med. Lat., from Arabic hijrah, "flight") of Muhammed from Mecca to Medina in the year 622. See also A.D.

Bea, Augustine (bay'ah), 1881–1968, Scripture scholar, ecumenist, and leading figure at Vatican II (1962–65). Born in Riedböhringen, Baden, Germany, he entered the Society of Jesus in 1902. From 1928 to 1959 he was professor at the Pontifical Biblical Institute, serving as rector from 1930 to 1949. He was an influential consultant for policy and documents of the Holy See, including the epoch-making papal encyclical Divino Afflante Spiritu (1943). Created cardinal in 1959, he played a significant role at the Second Vatican Council, especially with regard to the documents on revelation, ecumenism, and non-Christian religions (esp. Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions, n. 4). A pioneer Catholic ecumenist, he organized and headed the Secretariate for Promoting Christian Unity (1960–68). See also ecumenism.

beast of the Apocalypse, a complex image of evil found in the book of Revelation. The beast first appears in Rev 11:7, arising from the abyss. In 13:1 the beast, which now arises from the sea, combines features of a leopard, a bear, and a lion and receives its power from Satan, the great dragon, described in Rev 12:3–4. The beast enforces worship of the dragon and it battles the saints (Rev 13:3–8). The great beast from the sea is followed by a beast from the land, which leads inhabitants of the earth astray (Rev 13:11–18). The pair of beasts is also referred to as the beast and the false prophet (Rev 16:13; 19:20).

The imagery of the beast has been applied to various forces, secular and religious, that have been felt to be oppressive throughout the history of the Church. The immediate referent of the image in the historical context of Revelation was apparently the Roman Empire. This identification is particularly clear in Rev 17:3–14, the vision of the harlot riding on the beast, whose seven heads are identified with seven hills. Similarly the number of the beast, 666, mentioned in Rev 13:18, is best understood as a cryptic reference to the name Nero Caesar. See also apocalypse; apocalypticism; Roman Empire.

beatification (bee-a-ti-fi-kay'shuhn), the second step in the process of proclaiming a person a saint. After the Congregation for the Causes of the Saints in Rome has accepted the documents about a holy person from a local church or religious group and has declared that person "venerable," a rigorous investigation of the person's life and writings is made to determine whether he or she demonstrates a heroic level of love and of all other virtues. The Congregation discusses the merits of the case. Evidence for one uncontested miracle wrought through prayers to the holy person must be presented. A thorough examination of the theological and scientific evidence for the miracle is needed if it is to be accepted as proof of divine approval. When all the evidence is gathered, it is presented to the pope in a formal meeting. If the pope is convinced of the candidate's holiness, he issues a decree that it is appropriate to venerate the person as truly holy or blessed.

The ceremony of beatification includes a public declaration of the person's holiness, a papal mass, and the authorization of a prayer to the person beatified. The blessed one is presented to the faithful as an example to be imitated, but the person is not enrolled on the universal calendar of the Church.

A simpler process, called equivalent beatification, involves a thorough historical investigation to determine the validity of the honor paid to a person from a remote historical period. See also canonization; saints.

Beatific Vision, the direct knowing and loving of God after death. Also called the intuitive vision of God, it refers to the unsurpassable and perfect fulfillment of the human person in this union with God. The visual metaphor stresses the absolute, unmediated character of this knowing and loving. However, this unmediated directness, seeing God "face to face" (1 Cor 13:12) or knowing God as God is, does not imply a comprehensive knowledge of God, for, as theologian Karl Rahner (d. 1984) has underscored, God remains ineffable Mystery.

The foundations for this doctrine are present in the NT. Matt 5:8 ("Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God") is classically invoked, along with 1 Cor 13:12. Other texts that contribute to the development of this doctrine include 1 John 3:2; 2 Cor 3:18; and 2 Cor 5:7. The "eternal life" texts of the NT (e.g., Rom 2:7; 6:23; 1 Tim 1:16; John 3:16; 20:31) tie the doctrine to faith in Jesus Christ. Church teaching reached its normative articulation in Benedictus Deus (1336), which describes the Beatific Vision, and the Decree for the Greeks (Council of Florence, 1439), which speaks of seeing God as God truly is. These teachings were restated in later doctrine.

As a particular way of speaking about heaven, the Beatific Vision is the perfect fulfillment of God's gracious self-communication to those who freely accept it, resulting in the most intimate possible union with God. It is thus an individual's final participation in the redemption accomplished by Christ, a redemption of all the "elect" who constitute the communion of saints. As participation in the redemption of the fullness of personal existence, it begins before death, in a gradual assimilation to Christ through love of God and neighbor, with the help of God's grace mediated through faith in Jesus Christ.

The development of the doctrine of the Beatific Vision is closely tied to an understanding of the relationship between grace and nature. Two classic questions are whether the Beatific Vision is the result of a natural desire and whether it is attainable by natural means alone. Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) argued that although the human person possesses a natural desire to know and possess God, this natural desire cannot reach its fulfillment by natural powers alone; it is impossible for a human person to attain such knowledge of God on one's own (Summa Theologiae II–I.5.5). Nor does the existence of such a natural desire require that it be satisfied by God. The Beatific Vision is, therefore, an utterly gratuitous gift of God, offered to a free human person whose nature has already been disposed by God toward such a union by grace. The "nature" involved here is that of a spiritual personhood, the fulfillment of which is human apprehension of God by knowledge and love. Knowing has its finality in a direct intuition of God, an end that coincides with loving God, who is both the "object" and giver of this knowledge.

Beatific Vision thus draws together elements of eschatology, grace, and theological anthropology. These elements find their cohesion in the triune Mystery who is giver of the gift of the Beatific Vision, the gift itself, and the giving of the gift. As the fulfillment of faith in Jesus Christ, who as Son is the actual expression of the Father and the giver of the Spirit with the Father in the life of grace, Beatific Vision therefore implies full personal participation in the trinitarian life of God. Beatific Vision is also essentially a Christological doctrine, in that the union implied, that between a graced human nature that finds its finality in God and a God who is self-communicating love, is already established as a possibility for human persons in the union of human and divine natures in Jesus Christ. The resurrection of Jesus definitively reveals the fulfillment of this union and stands as the central symbol of the Christian hope of being perfectly united with God, seeing God face to face. See also eschatology, individual; eschatology, universal; eternal life; heaven; lumen gloriae; nature and grace. PAUL CROWLEY beatitude, the achievement of the final good that is the fulfillment of spiritual beings in grace. Catholic doctrine holds that this final good is God, who is the end of the natural human operations of knowing and loving. But God is not simply an objective goal of these operations; God is the connatural end of these operations. The promise of the gospel is that people shall participate in the very life of God, so that by human knowing and loving people shall share in the relationship of knowing and loving among the Father, Son, and Spirit that constitutes the life of the Trinity. Though the attainment of this beatitude is beyond the capacities of unassisted human powers, human nature is intrinsically oriented toward God as its ultimate end. Even those who do not explicitly desire God may, through their normal human patterns of life, seek that beatitude which is essentially transcendent. The transcendent beatitude of knowing God is, however, itself a gift of God: God's grace working in and through a human nature already oriented by God toward the final happiness of knowing and loving God. The notion of beatitude thus opens up the panorama of issues involving nature and grace, as well as the finality of human personhood (eschatology). See also Beatific Vision; eternal life; heaven.

beatitudes, declarations of praise or congratulations for a condition or virtue. In the OT the literary form appears primarily in Psalms and in wisdom literature. It may comment on a desirable state, such as living with an intelligent or good wife (Sir 25:8; 26:1) or being chosen by God (Pss 65:4; 84:4). It may also praise virtues, either such generic qualities as fear of the Lord (Pss 1:1; 112:1) and doing justice (Ps 106:3), or more specific acts such as considering the poor (Ps 41:1) and keeping the Sabbath (Isa 56:2). Beatitudes often indicate, as grounds for the congratulations, the rewards that come from the state or virtue being extolled.

Beatitudes introduce Jesus' great sermon in both Matt 5:3–12 and Luke 6:20–23. The different emphases of the two accounts reflect the possibilities inherent in the form. In Luke, Jesus congratulates people for conditions of real poverty, hunger, and desolation by promising them future recompense. The four consolatory Beatitudes are balanced by an equally concrete set of four threatening woes.

In Matthew, Jesus' nine Beatitudes generally praise people for virtues to be cultivated, e.g., poverty of the spirit, meekness, hunger for righteousness. The final two (Matt 5:10–12) praise people for being persecuted. Future rewards still ground the praise, but the dominant function of the passage is to instruct. Matthew's version seems to have undergone more editing than Luke's, although Jesus may have used beatitudes in both ways.

Beatitudes appear elsewhere in the NT (John 13:17; Jas 1:12; 1 Pet 3:14; Rev 16:15) primarily as words of praise for virtues. HAROLD W. ATTRIDGE

Beauduin, Lambert, 1873–1960, pioneer of the liturgical movement in Europe. A Benedictine of the Abbey of Mont-César in Louvain, Beauduin is considered by many to be the founder of the modern liturgical movement. In Manifesto, given at the Malines Catholic Congress in Belgium in 1909, Beauduin called for a greater understanding of the liturgical texts, and for active participation in the liturgy by the faithful. See also liturgical movement.

Beauraing, Our Lady of (boh-rang'), a title for the mother of Jesus taken from apparitions in 1932–33 of Mary to children at Beauraing, Belgium. In 1943 the bishop of Namur authorized a cult to Mary under this title. Many pilgrims have come to this site where the children were believed to have heard secrets never to be revealed. See also apparitions of the Blessed Virgin Mary; Banneaux, Our Lady of.

Bec, Abbey of, Benedictine monastery in Normandy, France. Founded by Hirluin in 1034, Bec prospered under the patronage of the dukes of Normandy (later the kings of England). Its prior, Lanfranc, was friend and counselor of William the Conqueror, who made him archbishop of Canterbury. Lanfranc's successor as prior, Anselm, became abbot of Bec in 1078 and then followed Lanfranc as archbishop.

Bec's wealth made it a target for taxation and occupation from the thirteenth century on, but the community survived. In 1626 the abbey was reformed along Maurist lines; dissolved during the French Revolution, it was reestablished in 1948. See also Anselm of Canterbury, St.; monasticism.

Becket, St. Thomas, ca. 1118–70, archbishop of Canterbury and martyr. After studying in Paris, he returned to England in service to the archbishop of Canterbury as clerk. By 1155 he was the king's chancellor and in 1162 Henry II had him made archbishop of Canterbury, a position he accepted only reluctantly. After a religious conversion, Thomas adopted an austere life, resigned his post as chancellor, and was soon in open conflict with the king, especially over the matter of secular and spiritual jurisdictions. Charged with treason, Thomas fled England for refuge at the French and papal courts. In spite of negotiations, the rift grew wider in 1170 when Henry disregarded Canterbury's prerogatives and had his son crowned king by the archbishop of York. A reconciliation was arranged but Thomas refused to lift the excommunication of episcopal supporters of Henry during the dispute. Convinced it was their king's will, four of Henry's knights assassinated Thomas in Canterbury Cathedral on December 29, 1170. Canonized in 1173, Thomas was the most popular saint in medieval England. Feast day: December 29. See also Canterbury.

Thomas Becket being murdered by knights of King Henry II in Canterbury Cathedral in 1170; from the Playfair Book of Hours, Victoria & Albert Museum, London.

Bede, St. (beed), styled "The Venerable," ca. 673–735, monk and Doctor of the Church. According to the autobiographical note appended to his Ecclesiastical History of the English People, Bede was born in Northumbria on land that later became part of Benedict Biscop's monastery of Wearmouth-Jarrow and was sent to the monastery for his education when he was seven. Educated by Benedict and Ceolfrid, Bede was ordained deacon at nineteen and priest at thirty. Having spent his life at the monastery, he died on the eve of the feast of the Ascension in 735; we have a description of his last days written by his student Cuthbert.

He is best known for the Ecclesiastical History, which surveys events in Britain from the Roman period down to 731. He himself attached greater importance to the exposition of the Scriptures, and his commentaries and homilies were widely read in the Middle Ages. Other works include grammatical and rhetorical studies, scientific and hagiographical treatises, and hymns.

A council at Aachen in 835 referred to Bede as a contemporary doctor; in 1899 Pope Leo XIII pronounced him Doctor of the Church. Feast day: May 25. See also England, Catholicism in.

Beelzebub (bee-el'zay-buhb), a Philistine deity. King Ahaziah sent to "Beelzebub, the god of Ekron" for an oracle (2 Kgs 1:2–16). In a polemic against this "god of the heavenly abode," his name was changed to "Lord of the flies" or "Lord of dung" (Josephus Antiquities 9.19). In the Testament of Solomon the king summons this "ruler of the demons," the highest ranking evil angel still in heaven. Beelzebub confesses that he binds humans, causes destruction, arouses passion, and instigates jealousies (T. Sol. 6:4). In two traditions Jesus is accused of acting in league with this "prince of demons" (Mark 3:22–30 and Matt 12:24–30; Luke 11:15–23). But he argues for liberating victory over this prince of evil powers.

Beghards/Beguines (beg-ahrds'/bay-geens'), lay groups who led lives of prayer, communal living, sharing of goods, and Christian service, especially in times of plague and epidemics. They were named after Lambert le Bégue ("the stammerer"). Founded in the twelfth century in the Low Countries (the Netherlands, Belgium, and Luxembourg), these men (Beghards) and women (Beguines) took no vows, but lived in small groups and earned a living through weaving, dying, and other skilled labor.

In the fourteenth century they aroused ecclesiastical suspicion because of their putative connection with radical groups, and they were condemned by the Council of Vienne in 1311. After a period of reformation they continued their commitments with varying degrees of success. The Beghards did not survive into the modern period, but a few Beguinages (communal dwellings) still exist.

Modern scholarship has shown a keen interest in the Beguines because of their lay character and their focus on the religious experience of women.

Belarusian Byzantine Catholics, a group of Orthodox Belarusians converted at the Union of Brest (1595–96) and received into full communion with the Catholic Church. Although Brest is usually associated with Ukrainians, at first the majority of those adhering to the union were Belarusians.

The union was gradually suppressed, however, with the expansion of Orthodox Russia into the area. In 1839 the czar formally abolished the Byzantine Catholic Church throughout Belarus. When Nicholas II granted more religious freedom in his empire in 1905, about 230,000 Belarusian Catholics came forward. But, not being allowed to form a Byzantine community, they passed to the Latin rite.

After World War I, a community of about thirty thousand Byzantine Catholics emerged in areas of Belarusia that were now part of Poland. An apostolic visitator was appointed for them in 1931, and an exarch in 1940. But after World War II, when the area was absorbed by the Soviet Union, the church was again suppressed and integrated into the Russian Orthodox Church.

Following the granting of religious freedom in the Soviet Union and the subsequent independence of Belarus, Belarusian Byzantine Catholics have emerged once again and have been making efforts to resume a normal ecclesial life. By early 1992, three priests and two deacons were at work and, unlike most of their Roman Catholic and Orthodox colleagues, were celebrating the liturgy in Belarusian. Although gaining legal recognition was proving difficult, at least ten parishes had applied for registration in the newly independent republic.

In 1992 there were about five thousand Belarusian Byzantine Catholics outside their homeland. They have a parish in Chicago and a religious and cultural center in London. See also Brest, Union of; Byzantine rite; Eastern Catholics and ecumenism; Eastern Catholics and Rome; Eastern churches; Eastern liturgies; Eastern rites.

RONALD G. ROBERSON

Belgium, Catholicism in. In the early 300s Christians began to settle in what is today Belgium. In eastern Belgium, Servatius (Sarbatios) became the bishop of Tongeren (Tongres), and in the western region (now in France), Superior was bishop of Bavai (Cambrai). All of Belgium was evangelized by the eighth century, in part due to the efforts of Amandus (d. ca. 675). Charlemagne (ca. 742–814) strengthened the Church and Christian culture, as is evident today in the church at St. Trond and the palace chapel at Aachen (Aix-la-Chapelle). In the Middle Ages, Lutgardis fostered the veneration of the Sacred Heart; Juliana of Liège promoted the Feast of Corpus Christi; and Jan van Ruysbroeck (1293–1381) made lasting contributions to the mystical life. After the Reformation, Archduke Albert and Archduchess Isabella (1598–1633) were such effective leaders of the Catholic restoration that, since the seventeenth century, Belgium has been one of the most Catholic countries in the world.

Belgian Catholics have a strong tradition of vigorous participation in educational, social, and political activities. In 1893 Désiré Joseph Mercier (1851–1926) established the Institut Supérieur de Philosophie at the University of Louvain, the institute whose work in transcendental Thomism influenced many theologians, including Bernard Lonergan and Karl Rahner. As the cardinal-archbishop of Malines, Mercier courageously asserted the independence of Belgium during the First World War. Furthermore, the liturgical renewal in the Catholic Church came about in large part because of the work done beginning in the late 1800s at Belgium's Benedictine monasteries of Maredsous, Mont-César, and Saint-André-lez-Bruges. In 1914 Lambert Beauduin's paper at the liturgical congress at Mechelen came to be regarded as the keynote address of the worldwide liturgical movement. Moreover, in 1925 Canon Joseph Cardijn (named a cardinal in 1965) founded the "Jeunesse ouvrière chretienne" (JOC, or Jocism), the "young Christian workers," which promoted "Catholic Action." This movement prepared the way for today's unfolding of lay leadership and lay ministries in the Church. Although Cardinal Cardijn was influential at the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), no bishop played a more prominent role than Cardinal Leo Josef Suenens, archbishop of Mechelen-Brussels.

As of 1993, out of Belgium's total population of approximately 10 million, over 85 percent are Catholic. There are one archdiocese, the metropolitan see of Mechelen-Brussels, and seven dioceses. See also Beauduin, Lambert; Cardijn, Joseph; Mercier, Désiré Joseph; Ruysbroeck, Bl. Jan van; Suenens, Leo Josef.

ROBERT A. KRIEG

bell, metallic instrument used to call the faithful to worship. In Christian worship, the use of bells, which filled a practical need before clocks became common, dates to the sixth century. From the eighth century on, bells increased in size, eventually requiring campaniles or bell towers. Bells may be blessed in a rite resembling Baptism.

Bellarmine, St. Robert, 1542–1621, Italian cardinal and Doctor of the Church. The first Jesuit professor of theology at Louvain, he defended Catholic doctrine against the Reformation, in part by revitalizing Catholic biblical and patristic studies. His work, although polemical, was more systematic than that of many of his contemporaries. This is evident in his three-volume Controversies, which examines the teachings of the Reformers and gives arguments supporting Catholic theology. This was in contrast to others, who fought Protestantism with dogmatic assertions and polemics. He is perhaps best known for his theory of the indirect temporal power of the papacy. Innovative at that time, his theory asserted that the proper and primary power of the pope is spiritual and justified papal use of temporal power only in matters of spiritual concern. The teaching was considered suspect for limiting papal power. Only the sudden death of Pope Sixtus V in 1590 saved Bellarmine's work from being placed on the Index of Forbidden Books. Bellarmine, however, utilized his theory in defense of papal power in several disputes with civil authorities and played a significant role in the development of the doctrine of papal infallibility. Other works of his include catechisms and spiritual writings. Although the process of his canonization was begun in 1627, for various reasons (including his teachings on papal power) it was not completed until 1930. He was declared a Doctor of the Church in 1931 by Pope Pius XI. Feast day: May 17. See also Counter-Reformation/Catholic Reformation; infallibility; primacy, papal.

St. Robert Bellarmine, sixteenth-century cardinal, theologian, and defender of the Catholic faith against Protestantism.

Belloc, Hilaire, 1870–1953, English writer and critic. After a brief political career (member of Parliament, 1906–10), he wrote political commentary with G. K. Chesterton, defenses of his idiosyncratic understanding of Catholic economic and social teaching, and popular history, as well as essays and light verse.

Beloved Disciple, a designation for the unnamed follower of Jesus who figures prominently in the Fourth Gospel. He is singled out in the account of the Last Supper (John 13:23), the Crucifixion (John 19:26), and the Resurrection (John 20:2; 21:7, 20). This figure has been traditionally identified as John, the son of Zebedee, understood to be the author of the work. Yet an explicit identification is lacking. The figure may simply symbolize the ideal disciple. Or he may have been an important figure in the Johannine community, but not one of the Twelve. See also John the Evangelist, St.

bema (bee' mah; Gk., "platform"), the sanctuary of a Byzantine-rite church, usually an elevated platform at the east end of the building, separated from the nave by the iconostasis, or altar screen. The term is also used for the raised platform formerly in the center of the nave in ancient East Syrian and some West Syrian churches, surrounded by a low wall enclosing seats for the clergy and pulpits for the lectionaries. It was there that the Liturgy of the Word and other services were celebrated. The enclosed sanctuary with the altar was reserved for the strictly eucharistic part of the Mass. See also sanctuary.

Benedicamus Domino (bay'nay-dee-kah'moos doh'mee-noh; Lat., "Let us praise the Lord"), an acclamation to conclude the Liturgy of the Hours. The proper response is "Deo gratias," "Thanks be to God." Sometimes the "Benedicamus Domino" is substituted for the dismissal at Mass. Before the reform of the liturgy following Vatican II (1962–65), during some penitential seasons this acclamation and its response signaled the transition from the end of Mass to one of the hours of prayer, Morning or Evening Prayer, when one of those services immediately followed the Mass. Following the Midnight Mass for Christmas, for example, this dismissal was used since the Office of Morning Prayer could immediately follow that Mass. The acclamation is no longer used as a transition.

Benedicite (bay'nay-dee'chee-tay; Lat., "Bless"), Latin title for the Canticle of the Three Young Men, Dan 3:52–90. Sung by Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, who endured Nebuchadnezzar's furnace, the stars, moon, birds, and even dolphins are encouraged to join the three in praise of God. Nebuchadnezzar II was a Mesopotamian king who threw three of the prophet Daniel's companions into a fiery furnace when they were accused of not serving his gods or worshiping the golden statue he had set up. The canticle is part of the Easter liturgy and Sunday Morning Prayer.

Benedict, Rule of St., the sixth-century monastic code attributed to Benedict of Nursia, patriarch of monasticism in the Latin West. In his Life of Benedict (Dialogues 2.36), Gregory the Great (d. 604) attributes to Benedict a monastic rule "remarkable for its discretion and its clarity of language." The consensus of scholarly opinion continues to support the traditional view that the rule referred to by Gregory is indeed the Rule of St. Benedict. Consisting of a prologue and seventy-three chapters, this relatively brief monastic code draws creatively from multiple sources, chief of which was a version of a somewhat earlier anonymous sixth-century monastic rule, probably from central or southern Italy, known as the Rule of the Master (Lat., Regula Magistri). The arguments in favor of the priority of the Rule of the Master are based on a comparative study of the vocabulary and of the sources utilized by the authors of the two rules, the institutions and practices they describe, and the structure of the two rules and the arrangement of their subject matter.

The Rule of St. Benedict combines both spiritual doctrine and practical norms governing daily life in the monastery. The spiritual doctrine is concentrated in a prologue and the first seven chapters, which concern the nature of cenobitic (communal) life (ch. 1); the role of the abbot or superior of the community and his consultation of the brethren (chs. 2–3); the tools of the monastic craft (ch. 4); and the essential monastic virtues: obedience, restraint of speech, and humility (chs. 5–7). The remaining chapters deal chiefly, but not exclusively, with the practical organization of the life: a liturgical code (chs. 8–20), a penitential code (chs. 23–30 and 43–46), and norms for the structure of the community (chs. 58–63). Other chapters deal with matters such as deans, the dormitory, food and clothing, sleep, work, prayer, and relationships within the monastery and outside; there are also further directives for abbot, prior, and porter, and a final appendix of an exhortatory nature. The rule thus sets up the framework for the living out of the integral Christian life within a form of cenobitic life in unbroken continuity with earlier monastic practice, both Eastern and Western.

Until the early ninth century, diffusion of the rule was generally slow; and in many places its norms were combined with those of other rules. With the Carolingian monastic reforms enacted under the direction of Benedict of Aniane (d. 821), pride of place was accorded throughout Western Europe to the Rule of St. Benedict, which became the chief basis for monastic practice to the present time. The astonishing success of this monastic code is amply demonstrated by the many forms of monastic life to which, according to regional circumstances and historical contexts, it has given rise. Whether within a monastic enclosure in a life characterized chiefly by prayer, work, and the celebration of the liturgy, or in a more active apostolate of Christian charity, such as education and missionary work, these various forms of Benedictine life continue to draw their vitality and inspiration from the Rule of St. Benedict.

See also Benedictine order; Benedict of Nursia, St.; monasticism.

CHRYSOGONUS WADDELL

Benedict II, St., pope from June 684 to May 685. Known for his knowledge of Scripture and love for the poor, he tried, unsuccessfully, to get Macarius, patriarch of Antioch, to recant Monothelitism, a Christological heresy. During his reign, the emperor Constantine IV remitted the mandate that papal elections had to be ratified by the emperor. Feast day: July 2.

Benedict XII [Jacques Fournier], ca. 1280–1342, the third of the Avignon popes, from 1334 to 1342. A French Cistercian monk, learned doctor of theology, and confidant of his predecessor John XXII, he distinguished himself as a tireless and effective inquisitor. Though politically weak, Benedict's pontificate was marked by large-scale attempts at Church reform, which included the reorganization of the Curia and more stringent regulation of the mendicant orders. His bull Benedictus Deus (1336) settled the disputed theological question of what knowledge the souls of the blessed possess prior to the Last Judgment by ruling that such knowledge is a direct, face-to-face vision (known as the Beatific Vision) of the divine essence. See also Avignon; Beatific Vision.

Benedict XIV [Prospero Lorenzo Lambertini], 1675–1758, pope from 1740 to 1758. Educated in theology and law, he was appointed Promoter of the Faith by Pope Clement XI in 1708, and in that capacity published a multivolume work on the canonization of saints (De Servorum Dei Beatificatione et Beatorum Canonizatione), which remains to this day an influential study of the subject. As pope, Benedict pursued a conciliatory policy with the aggressive and belligerent absolutist European nation states. Concordats signed with Naples (1741), Spain (1753), and others conceded papal authority in ecclesiastical appointments, while enabling the Church to maintain a measure of influence in these lands. See also canonization.

Benedict XV [Giacomo della Chiesa], 1854–1922, pope from 1914 to 1922. After earning his doctorate in civil law (1875) and his ordination (1878), della Chiesa was trained as a papal diplomat, joining the secretariat of state as aide to Archbishop Rampolla (1883). He accompanied the papal ambassador first to Spain, where he helped to organize the relief of a particularly violent cholera epidemic. He returned to Rome after Rampolla was named papal secretary of state and cardinal (1887). In 1901 he became undersecretary himself. From 1907 until 1914, he served as archbishop of Bologna. Benedict's pontificate was characterized by the attempt to bring peace both to a war-ravaged Europe and to a Church recently torn by the Modernist crisis, a hope signaled by the first of his twelve encyclicals, Ad Beatissimi Apostolorum (1914), in which he called a halt to the virtual civil war between traditionalists and progressives in the Catholic Church. Though insisting upon his neutrality during World War I, Benedict was perceived by both the Central and Allied powers as complicit with the other. He repeatedly called for an end to the "useless slaughter," but his seven-point peace plan, proposed in 1917, was rejected by both sides. After the war, his encyclical plea for international reconciliation, Pacem Dei Munus (1920), preceded a growth of diplomatic relations between the Holy See and European states. His canonization of Joan of Arc (1920) proved especially helpful in healing relations with France. Benedict also oversaw the promulgation of the 1917 Code of Canon Law, the establishment of the Pontifical Oriental Institute in Rome (1917), and, in Maximum Illud (1919), he called for more adequate training of missionaries and the formation of native clergies. PAUL J. WOJDA

Pope Benedict XV, perhaps the most underrated of the modern popes, who, in his first encyclical, Ad Beatissimi, called a halt to the anti-Modernist crusade conducted by ultraconservative Catholics against progressive Catholics.

Benedict Biscop, St. [Biscop Baducing], ca. 628–ca. 690, abbot and patron saint of English Benedictines. Biscop left the court of Northumbria at age fifteen to become a monk. After visits to Rome, two years in the monastery of Lérins (where he took the name Benedict), and two years as prior at Canterbury, he returned to Northumbria, where King Ecgfrith gave him lands for monastic foundations at Wearmouth and Jarrow. His further pilgrimages (he made six to Rome) enriched those houses with books and paintings. Feast day: January 12. See also Benedictine order.

Benedictine order, the confederation of monasteries adhering to the Rule of St. Benedict and presided over by an abbot primate who resides in Rome.

History: Benedict of Nursia (d. ca. 550) was not the founder of a religious order in the sense of later founders like Francis of Assisi (d. 1226) or Ignatius of Loyola (d. 1556). There is considerable evidence in the rule itself that Benedict was simply intent on transmitting the monastic wisdom of earlier centuries and adapting it to the conditions of the sixth century. Although he clearly expected his rule to be followed in some monasteries other than his own at Monte Cassino, Benedict almost certainly did not foresee the extent to which the rule would eventually spread throughout the entire Christian world. In fact, for the first several centuries after its composition, the rule was often only one of several rules (e.g., the Rule of St. Columban or the Rule of Ferreolus) that would be followed in a given monastery. In that era of the regula mixta (Lat., "mixed rule"), the abbot or abbess would determine just which regulations would obtain on a given issue.

Gradually, however, the Rule of St. Benedict superseded all others, both because of its intrinsic excellence and moderation and because the emperor Charlemagne (d. 814) wished all the monasteries of his empire to be characterized by uniformity of observance under the "Roman rule" of St. Benedict. A decisive step in this direction occurred shortly after Charlemagne's death when his son and successor Louis authorized the monk Benedict of Aniane (d. 821) to enforce a standard observance throughout the northern part of the empire. A key element in this program was the exclusive use of the Rule of St. Benedict, supplemented by "customaries" or "statutes" that specified details of liturgical and disciplinary practice. In fact, this reform was short-lived, falling into disuse with the dissolution of the empire under Louis's quarrelsome sons and the invasions of the Norsemen and Saracens.

Nevertheless, the work of Benedict of Aniane provided a norm to which future generations could and did return. Thus, the tenth century saw the founding of a number of new centers of reform, the most influential of which was the abbey of Cluny, south of Dijon in Burgundy. Under a succession of five particularly capable abbots between the years 927 and 1157, this monastery became the center of an "order" that, by the middle of the twelfth century, had more than three hundred other monasteries under allegiance to the abbot of Cluny. This highly centralized system clearly diverged from the assumption of the rule that each monastery would be independent, headed by its own abbot, but the Cluniac program did have the distinct advantage of keeping its affiliated houses exempt from interference by local feudal lords, whether secular or ecclesiastical.

The liturgical splendor of Cluny, its growing wealth, and the practical disappearance of manual labor as a normal part of the monastic day contributed to the rise of reform orders in the eleventh century, preeminently the Cistercian. The evident success of the Cistercian institutions of visitation (according to which the abbot of a founding monastery would visit each daughter house yearly for the purpose of maintaining discipline) and general chapter (at which all the abbots would meet regularly as a legislative and judicial body responsible for the direction of the order) led the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215 to impose these and some other administrative reforms on the independent houses that were following the Rule of St. Benedict. Thus, in each ecclesiastical province the leaders of all monasteries were to meet in general chapter every fourth year under an elected president, this chapter having powers and duties similar to those of the Cistercians. This directive met with some resistance on the part of monasteries accustomed to the autonomy presumed by the rule, but the reform did take hold with notable success in England, where general chapters regularly formulated and revised statutes for all Benedictine monasteries within that realm.

In countries directly affected by the Protestant Reformation some three centuries later, a majority of the monasteries disappeared. Those that survived were often grouped into national congregations, some of which became centers of European scholarship (especially the Congregation of St. Maur in France), but in the decades following the French Revolution most European monasteries were again closed or even destroyed; scarcely thirty remained in Europe by the end of the Napoleonic era. Revival occurred under the guidance of nineteenth-century abbots like Prosper Guéranger (d. 1875) in France and Maurus Wolter (d. 1890) in Germany, and from these and other European countries foundations were soon made in other parts of the world.

In the late nineteenth century, the desire of Pope Leo XIII (d. 1903) to bring the whole body of Benedictines into some sort of union led to the foundation of the international college of Sant'Anselmo in Rome and the establishment of the office of abbot primate, headquartered there. While the primate does not enjoy ordinary jurisdiction over any of the various Benedictine congregations, he does have some powers of supervision and (depending on the individual elected to fill this office) considerable moral authority.

Present Status of the Order: The Benedictine order is not highly centralized. In fact, to emphasize the note of local autonomy and thereby distinguish the Benedictine from such orders as the Franciscan or Jesuit, it is probably more helpful to speak of it as a confederation than as an order. At the present time, the Benedictine Confederation embraces twenty-one congregations of monks in more than two hundred and fifty monasteries, plus twenty-four major congregations or "federations" of nuns (moniales, Lat., "who take solemn vows") in more than three hundred and fifty monasteries, and thirty-four congregations or federations of Benedictine sisters (sorores, Lat., "women in simple vows") in more than six hundred houses. A congress of abbots is held every four years at Sant'Anselmo in Rome, attended by abbots from throughout the world; the purpose of this gathering is more the learning and sharing of ideas than the passage of definitive legislation, a function more characteristic of the congregational general chapters. Benedictine women have no similar assembly on a worldwide basis but regularly have regional or national assemblies of superiors and elected delegates from the houses of each congregation. According to the Catalogus Monasteriorum O.S.B., in 1990 the total number of professed Benedictine monks was 9,096, of nuns 7,428, and of sisters 10,979.

More important than such statistics, however, is a sense of what characterizes the life of these men and women. While the constitutions of the various congregations may exhibit significant differences one from another, all Benedictines profess allegiance to the Rule of St. Benedict and consequently place great weight on the essential attitudes and practices enshrined in that document: life in community, with each member "supporting with the greatest patience one another's weaknesses of body or behavior" (72:5); ownership of all goods in common; communal praying of the Liturgy of the Hours; prayerful reflection on the scriptures and related literature (lectio divina); and "preferring nothing whatever to Christ" (72:11). On the basis of this spiritual foundation, Benedictines perform a great variety of works, including agriculture, hospitality, education, skilled craftwork, scholarship, counseling, and parochial ministry. Almost all of the monasteries of nuns and some men's monasteries observe strict enclosure, whereas Benedictine sisters and many monks can often be found working at some remove from the monastery itself. Whatever their worksite, they all ideally strive to carry out Benedict's well-known exhortation "that in all things God may be glorified" (57:9). See also Benedict, Rule of St.; Benedictine spirituality; Benedict of Nursia, St.; Cluny; monasticism.

Bibliography

Fry, Timothy, ed. RB 1980: The Rule of St. Benedict in Latin and English with Notes. Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press, 1981.

Kardong, Terrence. The Benedictines. Wilmington, DE: Michael Glazier, 1988.

Rees, Daniel, and Other Members of the English Benedictine Congregation. Consider Your Call: A Theology of Monastic Life Today. Kalamazoo, MI: Cistercian Publications, 1980. JAMES WISEMAN

Benedictine Sisters, women's branch of the Order of St. Benedict (O.S.B.). Benedict of Nursia founded his first monastery in 529 in Italy. He named his sister Scholastica the superior of the women's monastery nearby. His rule served as the norm for women religious until the twelfth century. According to Benedict, the monastic life required only the rule and an abbot, that is, a living interpretation of the rule. Central to the life are community, daily liturgical prayer, meditative reading of Scripture, silent reflection, and some type of productive labor. Because they profess vows that allow them to be less strict than Benedictine nuns, the sisters are not bound to remain in the enclosure nor to chant the entire Divine Office. They profess vows of stability to remain in one priory, of conversion of life, and of obedience according to the rule. The first Benedictine women came to the United States in 1846 from Eichstätt, Germany, and settled in Latrobe, Pennsylvania. Most Benedictine sisters in the United States are involved in education or justice and service ministries. See also Benedict, Rule of St.; Benedictine order; religious orders and congregations; Scholastica, St.

Benedictine spirituality. See Benedictine order.

Benediction (Lat., benedictio, "blessing"), a service of exposition and adoration of the Blessed Sacrament, concluding with a blessing of the people with the Sacrament. Peculiar to the Western Catholic tradition, Benediction originated together with the practice of elevating the consecrated elements for adoration at Mass, the reservation of the Sacrament in public view, and the celebration of the Feast of Corpus Christi. These practices reflect the shift from a symbolic to a realistic understanding of the Eucharist, which began with the eucharistic controversies of the ninth century and reached its apogee in the oath Berengar of Tours (d. 1088), a French scholastic theologian, was required to sign in 1059. Such theological developments were manifestations of a change of mentality that also displayed itself in ritual and devotional changes and the proliferation of legends concerning miraculous hosts. Benediction itself may well have grown out of the older practice of blessing people at the end of a rite with a cross or relic or, in the case of Communion of the Sick, with the Eucharist itself. In the early fourteenth century, this practice was extended to blessing with the Sacrament (exposed in pyx or monstrance) those who gathered at the place of reservation to sing an anthem after Compline. Similarly, a pause for adoration of the Sacrament, introduced into the newly established Corpus Christi processions, concluded with the priest blessing the people with the Sacrament. After the Council of Trent (1545–63) had reaffirmed Catholic belief in the Real Presence, churches tended to be built whose interior lines focused the eye upon the tabernacle (placed directly on the altar), and upon the throne provided at the heart of the reredos for the monstrance. With such developments, Benediction became a regular part of Catholic life from Trent to Vatican II (1962–65). Although not as common a devotion as it once was, a revised "Rite of Eucharistic Exposition and Benediction" is included in the Roman document Holy Communion and Worship of the Eucharist Outside Mass (1973). See also eucharistic devotions; Real Presence. MARK SEARLE

Benedict of Aniane, St., ca. 750–821, official in the government of Pepin III and Charlemagne who became a monk, first at St. Seine and then at Aniane, Languedoc, France. From the latter monastery Benedict's reform spread to other French monasteries. He is known for his opposition to Adoptionism, a Christological heresy, and for his asceticism. Feast day: February 11. See also Adoptionism.

Benedict of Canfield, 1562–1611, English spiritual leader. Born William Fitch, Benedict converted to Catholicism in 1585. Two years later, he became a Capuchin. He is best known for his teaching that the spiritual life consists in discerning and following the will of God.

Benedict of Nursia, St., ca. 480–ca. 547, abbot, founder of Western monasticism, and patron saint of Europe. Our only source for the life of Benedict is the Dialogues of Pope Gregory the Great (d. 604). Gregory's own sources included men who had known Benedict, but it was not his purpose to prepare a detailed biography, and as a result so little is known about Benedict that there has even been debate as to whether the rule that bears his name today is the same one Gregory credits him with writing.

Benedict was born at Nursia, near Spoleto. He studied at Rome, then took up life as a hermit at Subiaco. He left the hermitage briefly to serve as abbot of a nearby cenobitic community. Finding the monks there hostile, he returned to Subiaco to found twelve small monasteries federated on a Greek model. After some years, he abandoned this experiment and founded a single large monastery at Monte Cassino, near Naples. A daughterhouse was later founded at Terracino. Gregory describes Benedict's many miracles and his contacts with notable figures of his day, including the Gothic king Totila, whom he met around 546.

He was buried at Monte Cassino in the same grave as his sister, Scholastica. The monastery was destroyed ca. 577 and rebuilt ca. 720: in the interim, the relics may have been translated to Fleury (Saint-Benoît-sur-Loire). Feast day: July 11. See also Benedict, Rule of St.; Benedictine order; Monte Cassino.

JOHN W. HOUGHTON

Benedict the Moor, St., 1526–89, Franciscan brother and patron saint of African-Americans. Born of black African slaves in Sicily, he was freed at age eighteen and eventually became part of a group of hermits, later becoming their superior. In 1562 the group was ordered by the pope to join an established community, and Benedict chose the Friars Minor of the Observance. Benedict entered as a lay brother, originally serving as cook. He was later chosen to be guardian of the friary and novice master and was sought out by many for his gifts of prayer and counsel. He chose to spend his final days as a cook. Feast day: April 4.

Benedictus (be-nay-dik'tuhs; Lat., "blessed"), the psalm uttered by Zechariah, father of John the Baptist, in Luke 1:68–79. The title derives from the first word of the psalm, which praises God in traditional scriptural language. The Benedictus serves as a canticle Morning Prayer in the Liturgy of the Hours.

benefice, an ecclesiastical office that carries the right of the incumbent to collect revenue for his support. From its earliest days the Church has promoted the ideal of a clergy freed from everyday activities and able to devote its time entirely to spiritual duties. During late antiquity rich landlords were exhorted to support the clergy, and in the Middle Ages feudal lords set aside lands for the incumbents of specific ecclesiastical offices. During the revolutions of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, most of these lands were seized by secular governments, and benefices are rare today. Indeed, the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) and the 1983 code of canon law urged their suppression.

The 1917 code of canon law defined a benefice as "a juridic entity perpetually constituted or erected by the competent ecclesiastical authority, consisting of a sacred office and the right to receive the income from the endowment connected with the office" (can. 1409).

benefit of clergy, legal exemptions and privileges granted to clergy and other religious because of their office. Roman law beginning in the fourth century and then the secular law of many countries in the Middle Ages granted such privileges as clerical immunity from the judgments of lay courts and the exemption of clergy from certain civil duties such as military service and taxation; Church law confirmed and expanded these privileges. Benefit of clergy has vanished from the legal codes of most countries. See also clergy.

Benno of Meissen, St., 1010–ca. 1106, bishop of Meissen and missionary to the Wends. Although he had served as chaplain to Emperor Henry IV, Benno supported Pope Gregory VII against Henry on the question of lay interference in Church appointments and in 1085 was deposed from his bishopric by pro-imperial German bishops. He was reinstated in 1088 by Clement III, an antipope known also as Guibert. In 1097 Benno changed his allegiance from Clement to Pope Urban II and spent his last years as a missionary. His canonization in 1523 evoked a strong denunciation from Martin Luther. Feast day: June 16.

Benoit, Pierre Maurice (ben-wah'), 1906–87, French Dominican biblical scholar. From 1933 he taught at the École Biblique in Jerusalem. He made contributions to form criticism, the theology of inspiration, hermeneutics, and the study of the Septuagint. He was NT editor for the Jerusalem Bible (1956), of the Revue Biblique (1953–68), and of the Dead Sea Scrolls (1971–86). At the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) he played an important role as expert for the documents on divine revelation, religious freedom, ecumenism, and non-Christian religions. See also École Biblique.

Benson, Robert Hugh, 1871–1914, English writer, son of Edward White Benson, archbishop of Canterbury. He was ordained an Anglican priest in 1894, entered an Anglican religious community in 1898, became a Roman Catholic in 1903, and was ordained a Catholic priest in 1904. He published sermons and popular novels on religious themes.

berakah (be-rah-kah'; Heb., "blessing"), the action both of God in endowing human beings with abundant gifts and of human beings in praising God for these gifts and seeking their extension for themselves and for others. God's blessing is both a sign and a means of the divine salvific presence and intervention, by which human beings are invited and brought into communion with God. The human response of praising God through the formula of blessing is a recognition and remembrance of divine gifts in order to further communion with God through the persons or objects included in the blessing. The North American Academy of Liturgy (NAAL) annually confers a Berakah Award on an American liturgical scholar whose writings and teachings have advanced the liturgical movement. See also blessing.

Berchmans, St. John (buhrk'mahns), 1599–1621, Belgian Jesuit scholastic. Born in Diest, he entered the Jesuit order in Mechlin. Excelling in philosophical studies in Rome, he died there shortly after completing his studies. Much loved by his confrères, he is revered today for the simplicity and fidelity of his life. Feast day: November 26.

Berengar of Tours (bair'en-gahr uhv t*oor*), ca. 1000–1088, French theologian. He studied with Fulbert of Chartres and by 1030 was a canon of St. Martin's at Tours, where he began his teaching. About 1040 he found employment with the powerful counts of Anjou at Angers and became archdeacon there (1040–60) and treasurer of the cathedral (1047–53). He achieved a considerable reputation as a teacher and returned to Tours, retiring to Saint-Côme ca. 1080. Berengar became notorious for his eucharistic theology. Although his teaching can be reconstructed from only a few sources, his study of the Eucharist employed the dialectical tools of his age, logic and grammar, thereby preparing the way for Scholasticism. He apparently concluded that the attitudes of the participants are changed in the celebration of the Mass, not the eucharistic species. His doctrine evoked much theological debate and was condemned by synods in 1050, 1051, 1059, and 1079. He accepted the condemnations and died in communion with the Church. See also Eucharist; Real Presence.

Bergson, Henri, 1859–1941, French philosopher. Influenced by empiricism and evolutionism but frustrated with their shortcomings, he sought to defend spirit, intuition, and freedom against materialism, rationalism, and determinism. He contrasted intelligence (the basis of scientific knowledge) with intuition and advocated an integral empiricism combining the two. He described evolution as the creative thrust of an élan vital (Fr., "life force") through history, rather than mere conflict and determinism. He contrasted moralities and religions concerned with group survival with those that sought human unity. He influenced twentieth-century French Catholic thinkers such as Maurice Blondel. See also philosophy and theology.

Bernadette of Lourdes, St. [Marie Bernarde Soubirous], 1844–79, French peasant girl to whom the Blessed Virgin appeared. Bernadette saw visions of Mary at Lourdes beginning February 11, 1858, at age fourteen. Although she grew up weak with asthma and other ailments, and although it was most difficult for her to receive the countless visitors who came to her in search of cures and information about the Blessed Virgin, Bernadette never turned away anyone and never accepted any form of payment. At twenty-two she entered the convent at Nevers and remained there until her death at thirty-five. Her constant humility is characterized by her prayerful cry from Nevers: "Oh! if only I could see without being seen!" Feast day: April 16. See also apparitions of the Blessed Virgin Mary; Lourdes.

Bernadette of Lourdes, known also as Marie Bernarde Soubirous. Her visions of the Blessed Virgin Mary (who proclaimed, "I am the Immaculate Conception") established the small French town of Lourdes as one of the world's most popular pilgrimage sites; canonized in 1933, she is depicted here in a rare photograph.

Bernanos, Georges (buhr-nah'-nohs), 1888–1948, French novelist, dramatist, essayist. Born in Paris, his early Jesuit education was followed by studies in law and literature at the University of Paris and the Institut Catholique. Bernanos was a staunch Catholic and royalist, joining the right-wing Action Française, and spending much of his almost nomadic life supporting monarchist movements in France and abroad. As a Catholic intellectual, his influence was primarily through numerous novels and short stories that captured the moral struggles and achievements of men and women, e.g., The Diary of a Country Priest (1938), The Open Mind (1943) and the Carmelite Dialogues (1949). See also Action Française.

Bernardino of Siena, St., 1380–1444, the most influential and popular Franciscan preacher of fifteenth-century Italy. He was canonized in 1450, only six years after his death. Vicar General of the Friars of Strict Observance (1438), he participated in the Council of Florence (1439). His greatest impact came as an itinerant preacher of moral reform. He also promoted devotion to the Holy Name of Jesus. Feast day: May 20. See also Holy Name of Jesus.

Bernard of Clairvaux, St., 1090–1153, French Cistercian abbot and spiritual writer. Born the third son of a noble family near Dijon, Bernard decided at the age of twenty-one to enter the new and struggling reform monastery of Cîteaux, located a few miles south of his family's estate. Bernard's powers of leadership were already evident at this time, for he persuaded some thirty of his relatives and friends to join him in this venture. Three years later he was sent out as the founding abbot of a new monastery at Clairvaux, which in turn made sixty-eight foundations of its own during the thirty-eight years of Bernard's abbacy.

As abbot, one of Bernard's main responsibilities was the instruction of his monks. The fervor with which he addressed them in his sermons and the inherent excellence of his monastic theology soon led to requests to put his doctrine into writing. His first written work, The Steps of Humility and Pride, was composed at the behest of his own monks, while the Carthusians at the Grande Chartreuse requested his Letter on Love, which he later appended to his short masterpiece On Loving God. Perhaps the best known of all Bernard's works, his eighty-six sermons on the Canticle of Canticles were undertaken at the suggestion of still another Carthusian monk. This unfinished series of sermons is based much more on his own experience than on the text of that book of the Bible. The sermons contain his reflections on such diverse subjects as the reform of the clergy, the death of his brother Gerard, and the errors of Rhenish heretics of his day.

Bernard of Clairvaux, one of the greatest monastic leaders and theologians in the history of the Church, exorcising an evil spirit from a possessed person; sixteenth-century painting by Jorg Breu, from the collection of the Sammlunger des Stifles abbey, Zwettl, Austria.

Bernard's many talents brought numerous other kinds of requests his way. Between 1130 and 1138 he traveled throughout Europe, championing the cause of Pope Innocent II (d. 1143) against a schismatic rival for the papal throne. Two years after the end of the schism, and at the request of his close friend William of St.-Thierry (d. 1148), he wrote a lengthy letter to the pope "Against the Errors of Abelard," that bold Parisian master who, in Bernard's opinion, was guilty of a destructive rationalism in matters of faith. Still later, the first Cistercian pope, Eugenius III (d. 1153), asked Bernard to preach the Second Crusade, whereupon he traveled throughout northern Europe promoting the idea of the crusade among monarchs, the nobility, and the general population; when the crusade failed at the end of 1149, Bernard was widely held responsible and accepted the personal humiliation that ensued.

His final years were largely taken up with the writing of his long work On Consideration, another request of Pope Eugenius III, who desired a comprehensive treatise on papal spirituality. By the spring of 1153 all these labors left Bernard physically exhausted. After acting as mediator of an ecclesiastical dispute at Metz, he returned to Clairvaux a sick man and died there in late summer. He was canonized twenty-one years later and was declared a Doctor of the Church in 1830. Feast day: August 20. See also Cistercian order; Cîteaux; Crusades; monasticism.

JAMES WISEMAN

Bernard of Montjoux, St., ca. 996–1081, patron saint of mountain climbers. He established two Alpine hospices to aid lost travelers in the mountain passes that were named after him: Great Bernard and Little Bernard. Feast day: May 28.

Bernardo Gui (gwee), 1261–1331, inquisitor vilified in Umberto Eco's The Name of the Rose. A Dominican, he was inquisitor of Toulouse from 1307 to 1324, when he was made a bishop. Author of numerous works, his most famous is a handbook for the inquisitor. See also Inquisition.

Bertram, St. Louis. See Bertrand, St. Louis.

Bertrand, St. Louis, 1526–81, a Spanish Dominican recognized for his preaching, missionary zeal in South America (1562–69), and gift of prophecy. He was canonized in 1671, but his feast day, October 9, is no longer observed.

Bérulle, Pierre de (bay-rool'), 1575–1629, cardinal, theologian, and spiritual writer. Of a distinguished family, Bérulle was the leading spiritual director of his time in France, with particular influence at the royal court. He helped introduce the Teresan Carmelites into France. He also established the French Congregation of the Oratory in imitation of Philip Neri in order to help meet the need for clerical education. By his death the Oratory had seventeen colleges. He was also involved in French foreign policy seeking to form a Catholic grand alliance against the Protestants. The process for his beatification was interrupted by the Jansenist controversy and never resumed. See also Oratorians.

Bessarion, John (bes-sair'ee-uhn), 1403–1472, Greek cardinal, theologian, and humanist. As archbishop of Nicaea, Bessarion was instrumental in convincing his fellow Orthodox bishops to accept a short-lived union with Rome at the Council of Florence (1439). Made cardinal (1440), he was a generous patron of humanism in Italy. See also Florence, Council of.

Bethany (beth'uh-nee), a small village on the eastern side of the Mount of Olives, approximately a mile and a half from Jerusalem. The Gospels report that Martha, Mary, and Lazarus lived there (John 11:1–44), that Jesus lodged there at the time of Passover (Matt 21:17; Mark 11:11), and that he dined there at the house of Simon the leper where he was anointed (Mark 14:3; Matt 26:6). The village, now named El-'Aziriyeh, has been a pilgrimage site since the fourth century.

Another Bethany, east of the Jordan River, is mentioned in John 1:28 as the locale of John the Baptist's ministry, but the site has not been identified.

Beza, Theodore, 1519–1605, Calvin's successor as moderator of the Company of Pastors in Geneva (1564–80). Converting to Protestantism, he moved to Geneva in 1548. A prolific author, he had a profound influence on Calvinist theology. See also Calvinism.

Bibiana, St., also known as Viviana, virgin and martyr of unknown location and date. A church in Rome has honored her since the fifth century. Feast day: December 2.

BIBLE

The Bible (Gk., neut. pl., ta biblia, "short writings") is a collection of writings held to be of divine and human origin and accepted by Jews or Christians as authoritative for belief and practice. A Latin derivative, biblia (fem. sing.), appeared in the early Middle Ages and the English, "Bible," was first used in the fourteenth century. Synonymous terms are "Scripture" and "Holy Scripture." The Christian Bible is divided into the Old Testament (OT), or the collection of thirty-nine books from the Jewish tradition, and the New Testament (NT), comprising twenty-seven early Christian works. Jewish scholars often prefer the acronym "Tanakh" to "Old Testament" for the collection of the Torah (the Law), the Nebi'im (the Prophets), and Kethubim (Writings). Christians frequently use "Tanakh," "the Hebrew Bible," or "the Jewish Scriptures" in place of "Old Testament."

CONTENT OF THE BIBLE

Jews and Christians have different views on the content and order of the OT. The traditional names of the books derive usually from their content (e.g., Judges) or from their purported authors (e.g., Amos). In the Jewish canon, which numbers twenty-four books, the five books of the Torah are Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. In the Prophets, the Former Prophets include Joshua, Judges, 1–2 Samuel, 1–2 Kings (double books are counted as one) and the Latter Prophets include the three major prophets Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel and "the twelve" (counted as a single book; Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi). These are followed by the eleven books of the Writings: Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Canticle of Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes (or Qoheleth), Esther, Daniel, Ezra-Nehemiah, and 1–2 Chronicles.

The Roman Catholic OT canon numbers forty-six books in the following order (books marked * are often called "deuterocanonical" by Catholics, but "apocryphal" by Protestants, who do not accept them as canonical). The Pentateuch (Gk., "five scrolls"), which consists of Genesis through Deuteronomy, is followed by the historical books: Joshua, Judges, Ruth, 1–2 Samuel, 1–2 Kings, 1–2 Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, Tobit*, Judith*, Esther (with the Additions*), and 1–2 Maccabees. These are followed by the wisdom books: Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Canticle of Canticles, Wisdom of Solomon* (or simply Wisdom*), and Sirach* (Ecclesiastes*). Next come the prophets: Isaiah, Jeremiah, Lamentations, Baruch* (with the Letter of Jeremiah*), Ezekiel, and Daniel (with the addition of the Prayer of Azariah*, Susanna*, and Bel and the Dragon*), followed by the "minor prophets" in the Jewish order.

The traditional Protestant OT follows the Jewish tradition in content but varies in order. Ruth is inserted after Judges before 1–2 Samuel while

1–2 Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther are added after 1–2 Kings. These historical books are followed by Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Canticle of Canticles (as in the Catholic list but with the omission of Wisdom and Sirach). The listing concludes with the prophets again in the same order as the Catholic canon, but omitting the additions to Jeremiah and Daniel as well as 1–2 Maccabees.

Some Eastern Orthodox Christian groups count as canonical books such as 1 Esdras (2 Esdras in Slavonic and 3 Esdras in the appendix to the Vulgate), the Prayer of Manasseh, Psalm 151, and 3 Maccabees.

Among Christians there is a virtual consensus on the order and content of the twenty-seven books of the NT. Beginning it are the four Gospels: Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John (though the order in the early Church is often Matthew, John, Mark, Luke, i.e., giving precedence to Gospels attributed to apostles). These are followed by the thirteen letters attributed to Paul (or fourteen if Hebrews is considered Pauline): Romans, 1–2 Corinthians, Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, 1–2 Thessalonians, 1–2 Timothy, Titus (these three, known as "the Pastorals," contain pastoral directives to individuals), Philemon, and Hebrews. Then come the "catholic Letters" (so called because they are not written to particular churches): James, 1–2 Peter, 1–3 John, and Jude. The last book is Revelation (also called the Apocalypse).

THE FORMATION OF THE BIBLE

The Bible itself evolved over eleven hundred years and virtually every book includes earlier oral and/or written traditions. Often it is impossible to describe exactly the elements or process of composition. With the flowering of historical criticism of the Bible in the nineteenth century, attention focused on the formation of the Pentateuch. Its present form combines narrative, law, and poetry and its content narrates the primeval history (Gen 1–12), the stories of the ancestors (Gen 12–50), the liberation from Egypt (Exod 1:1–15:21), the wilderness wanderings and sojourn at Sinai (running from Exod 15:22 through Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers), and Moses' farewell (Deuteronomy).

The Documentary Hypothesis, associated principally with Julius Wellhausen (1844–1918), postulated four major traditions for Genesis through Deuteronomy. The Yahwist (J), so called because it uses the name YHWH (Ger., JHWH) for God (see Exod 3:14), begins at Gen 2:1. An anthropomorphic view of God, emphasis on the saving acts of God in history, and vivid realistic narrative style characterize the Yahwist source. Some scholars claim that it was composed at the court of Solomon (ca. 930 B.C.). The other major tradition, the existence of which as an independent source is strongly questioned today, is "the Elohist" (E) (because it uses principally the Hebrew term Elohim for God). It supplements the J narrative and is thought to derive from the Northern Kingdom (Israel) in the eighth century B.C.

In the classical Documentary Hypothesis this national epic, a combination of J and E, underwent a radical transformation by the addition of "D," which is a term for both a source and a movement. The source is often identified with the book of the law found in the eighteenth year of the reign of Josiah (640–609 B.C.; see 2 Kgs 23:2), the substance of which may be Deut 12–26. The "D" editor, who wrote during or shortly after the Babylonian exile (587–539 B.C.), is thought to be responsible for supplanting the original ending of the Pentateuch by the addition of the book of Deuteronomy with its continued warnings about the perils of infidelity to the law in the promised land. This editor or movement also recasts the historical books Joshua through 2 Kings and creates the "Deuteronomistic History," which evaluates the kings of Israel and Judah according to their fidelity to the law. "P" also designates both a tradition (the Priestly tradition) and a editor or group of editors who are responsible for final form of the Pentateuch.

The initial creation story (Gen 1:1–2:4[a]), with its stress on the powerful word of God, is from the P tradition. P is best seen in the whole book of Leviticus and in Exod 25–31. Concern for holiness (see the integration of the Holiness Code, Lev 17–26, into the P narrative), sacrifice, the priesthood, and the cult characterize P. The final composition of the Pentateuch is due to P and is dated by most scholars during the Persian period (522–333 B.C.). Though the Documentary Hypothesis has been modified since the time of Wellhausen, it remains a good working hypothesis for the significant traditions and movements behind the Pentateuch.

The prophetic books underwent similar complex development. Narrative cycles of prophetic figures such as Elijah (1 Kgs 17:1–19:21; 2 Kgs 1:1–2:18) and Elisha (2 Kgs 2:19–8:15) are found in the historical books, but no writings are attributed to them. Prophetic literature begins with the "writing prophets" in the eighth century B.C. The prophetic works are composed mainly of prophetic oracles, collections of sayings from God to the prophet often containing judgment on foreign nations and warnings to Israel or Judah. Though many of the prophetic oracles go back to the named figures (e.g., Amos, Isaiah, and Jeremiah), the existing books are compilations by disciples or prophetic schools often extending for centuries after the original prophet (see Jer 31). For example, "Deutero-Isaiah," Isa 40–55, reflects the Babylonian exile, and "Trito-Isaiah," chs. 56–66, was composed after the return from exile. The collection of the prophetic writings remained somewhat fluid. Sir 49:10 (ca. 190 B.C.) speaks of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and "the twelve." The phrase "the law and the Prophets" appears in the prologue to the Greek translation of Sirach (ca. 132 B.C.). The NT usages (Matt 5:17; 22:40; Luke 24:44, "the law of Moses, the prophets, and the psalms") suggest that the prophetic books formed a distinct collection in the last two centuries before Christ.

Most difficult to describe is the formation of the collection known as the Writings, which comprises mainly Psalms and the wisdom books. Since the psalms are clearly collected into five books in imitation of the Pentateuch, their final edition is postexilic, though many of the individual psalms reflect the preexilic Temple worship. Because of their nature, the collection of wisdom books is almost impossible to characterize. Prov 22:17–24:22, for example, integrates material from Egyptian wisdom traditions dating back a millennium. Wisdom shows clear influence of Hellenistic culture, and emerges therefore after the conquest of Palestine by Alexander the Great in 333 B.C.

Though it is often asserted that the Jewish canon was fixed at the so-called synod of Jamnia (Jabneel on the Mediterranean coast) ca. A.D. 100, debates among Jews continued into the Christian era over books such as the Canticle of Canticles and Ecclesiastes.

Though less complex, the NT went through a lengthy process of formation. Behind the Gospels stand collections of oral traditions about Jesus including sayings (e.g., parables) and narratives (miracle stories and passion narratives). Around the mid-50s of the first century emerged a document scholars call Q, which consisted primarily of a collection of sayings of Jesus. Mark, composed between A.D. 68 and 71, was the earliest written Gospel. Matthew and Luke, composed a decade later, incorporated virtually all of Mark as well as Q. John's Gospel, which emerged around A.D. 100, incorporated earlier traditions that are often different from those in the synoptic Gospels. The Letters of Paul, which occasionally take over earlier materials such as hymns (Phil 2:6–11), words of Jesus (1 Cor 11:23–25), or confessional formulas (1 Cor 15:3–7), were written to specific churches and were not collected as a group until the mid to late second century. Marcion's (d. ca. 160) rejection of the OT and much of the NT and the threat of Gnosticism in the second century were stimuli for the early Church to define its sacred and canonical texts. Though disputes continued in the West about whether Hebrews was canonical and in the East over the book of Revelation, Athanasius in his Easter Letter (A.D. 367) lists as authoritative and canonical the twenty-seven books that form the present NT. For Roman Catholics the decision of the Council of Trent (1545–63), followed explicitly by Vatican I (1869–70) and implicitly by Vatican II (1962–65), defined as canonical the forty-six books of the OT mentioned above and the twenty-seven books of the NT.

LANGUAGES, TEXTS, AND TRANSLATIONS

The Bible was handed down in two principal languages: Hebrew for the OT, except for Ezra 4:8–6:18; 7:12–26; Dan 2:4–7:28; and Jer 10:11, which are in Aramaic, and Greek for the NT. The earliest translations of the OT were into Greek and Aramaic. The Greek version, the Septuagint (Lat., septuaginta, "seventy"), so called because of the legend that it was translated by seventy-two scribes, was completed in Alexandria between 250 and 150 B.C. It was later revised in a literal translation by Aquila (ca. A.D. 128) and more freely by Symmachus (end of second century A.D.). The vast majority of citations and allusions to the OT in both the NT and early Church writings are to the Septuagint. The Hebrew Scriptures were also translated into Aramaic, which gradually became the ordinary language of Palestine after the return from exile. These are called Targums (Aram., "translations"). The oldest of these is a Targum on Job, fragments of which have been found at Qumran.

Though there are more manuscripts for the Bible (about five thousand for the NT alone) than for any ancient classical text, there is no manuscript of any biblical book that dates to the time of its named author. Text criticism is the aspect of biblical studies that seeks to determine among the different readings those that are earliest and closest to the lost original text. Until the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls at Qumran, the earliest OT manuscript was the ninth-century Aleppo codex. At Qumran, however, manuscripts or fragments of virtually every biblical book were discovered. Though different in some respects from the later manuscripts, the Dead Sea Scrolls confirm the great fidelity with which the Hebrew text was handed on.

Though often erroneously asserted, there is no evidence that any NT book ever existed in either Hebrew or Aramaic. Since the language of both ordinary and educated people in the Roman Empire was Greek, the earliest NT manuscripts are Greek papyrus fragments from the early second century. By the late fourth century and throughout the fifth there appear elegant Greek manuscripts of the complete Bible, principally Codex Vaticanus, Codex Sinaiticus, and Codex Alexandrinus. Latin translations begin to appear in the late second century, since the North African writer Tertullian (160–ca. 225) cites the Bible in Latin. This version, called the "Old Latin," which was also used by Cyprian of Carthage (d. 258), was supplanted by the monumental translation of the whole Bible into Latin, the Vulgate (principally by Jerome, 347–420), which became the official version of the Bible for over a thousand years. Other ancient translations were into Syriac, Coptic, and Ethiopic.

Though the early biblical manuscripts often contain lectionary divisions, they appear without division into chapters and verses. The chapters derive from Stephen Langton, archbishop of Paris (d. 1228). Verse numbers were first added to Christian Bibles by Sanctes Pagnini in 1528 and fixed in place by Robert Étienne (Stephanus) in 1555.

Though in the West there were sporadic translations into the vernacular before the Reformation, the return to the Bible advocated by the Reformers and the invention of printing evoked an explosion of translations. Two seventeenth-century translations, the King James Version for Protestants and the Douay-Rheims version for Catholics, achieved virtual canonical status for almost three hundred years. The first Roman Catholic version from original languages was the New American Bible, first issued in 1970, with revision of the NT in 1987 and of the Psalms in 1991. A complete revision of the OT is projected.

THE AUTHORITY OF THE BIBLE

The basis of biblical authority is a conviction formulated differently at different periods that the Bible contains revelation from and about God and God's design for humanity: "All Scripture is inspired by God and is useful for teaching, for reproof, for correction, and for training in righteousness" (2 Tim 3:16). For centuries inspiration was understood as virtual dictation from God to the biblical author. With the rise of historical criticism, more sophisticated theories have been proposed, such as a prophetic or poetic theory of inspiration. The 1965 Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation of Vatican II (n. 7) simply states that the books were composed "through the prompting of the Holy Spirit," leaving open the precise manner of the prompting. Recent theories have suggested that inspiration is a communal or ecclesial charism rather than an individual one. An author or authors hand on those traditions that embody the faith of the community.

A correlate to inspiration is the doctrine of inerrancy. As God's word, the Bible was considered free of all error. Prompted by scientific discoveries about the age of the universe and of humanity and the disclosure of innumerable factual mistakes in the Bible with the rise of historical criticism, the struggle over inerrancy became acute and often bitter. The document on revelation of Vatican II, following Pope Pius XII's encyclical Divino Afflante Spiritu (1943), provided a significant breakthrough by teaching that, prior to any judgment of the truth of a biblical text, due consideration must be given to the literary form (e.g., whether a text is history or poetry) and to the customary modes of speaking in the culture that produced it in order to determine what the sacred writers intended to say and what God wanted to communicate through their words. The council also rejected a fundamentalist interpretation of inerrancy by stating that "the books of Scripture must be acknowledged as teaching firmly, faithfully and without error, that truth which God wanted put into the sacred writings for the sake of our salvation" (n. 11, italics added). History, archaeology, and culturally conditioned worldviews are not the subject of inerrancy.

The major achievement of Vatican II was in the larger area of restoring the authority of the Bible to the Church as a whole. In reaction to the sixteenth-century Reformers (esp. Luther and Calvin) who returned to the Bible as a critical principle against Church doctrine and practice, post-Tridentine Catholicism stressed tradition and magisterium (understood as the official teaching of the pope and the hierarchy) rather than the Bible. A misconception of the Tridentine decrees was that the council taught two sources of revelation, "tradition" and "Scripture." Vatican II avoided the two-source language and gave a definite priority to Scripture. Though sacred Scripture and sacred tradition "flow from the same divine wellspring," sacred Scripture is "the word of God," and the function of tradition is to hand it on in its purity (Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, n. 11). The magisterium is not above the word of God; it is its servant. The liturgical reforms mandated by the council stressed the authority of the Bible by introducing a three-year lectionary cycle, including especially the OT, which was rarely used in the post-Tridentine liturgy. Also, Scripture readings are to accompany the administration of sacraments other than the Eucharist. In the council decrees, the first ministry listed for both bishops and priests is the ministry of the word (Decree on the Bishops' Pastoral Office in the Church, n. 12; Decree on the Ministry and Life of Priests, n. 4), and biblical studies are to be the "soul" of seminary education (Decree on Priestly Formation, n. 16). Laypeople are encouraged to read and study the Bible (Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, n. 22), and the post–Vatican II period was characterized not only by the growth of Catholic biblical scholarship, but by a vast explosion of biblical institutes for religious, clergy, and laity.

INTERPRETATION OF THE BIBLE

As a text from a different culture and in an original language unknown to most readers, the Bible must be intepreted. Hermeneutics (from the Gk., "to translate" or "explain") is the general term for the theory and practice of intepretation. Exegesis (a loanword from the Gk., "drawing out," or "explanation") is the most basic form of interpretation, involving the exposition of a biblical text in its original literary, historical, and religious context, with an array of methods used for reading any ancient text: attention to the grammar, syntax, and style of the ancient languages, concern for literary forms and structure, and study of the historical conditions reflected in the text. Biblical texts, however, like other "classic texts," possess an excess of meanings not intended by their original authors. Also, since the Bible points to the mystery of God and of the divine-human relationship, it makes claims not simply on its original audience but on subsequent generations. The early Church distinguished between the "literal" sense and "spiritual" sense of Scripture, the latter being the divine message behind the letter of the text. This gave rise to the medieval theory of the four senses of Scripture: the literal or plain meaning of the text; the allegorical or theological meaning; the anagogical or eschatological meaning; and the moral or ethical meaning.

While very few contemporary biblical scholars or theologians hold the doctrine of the four senses, the major task of post–Vatican II theology has been to evolve hermeneutical theories that explain how the Bible remains a resource for theology and Church life. Often these involve the search for a central principle within the Bible itself (e.g., covenant, liberation, the option for the poor). More recent theories stress the role of the reader in creating meaning (reader-response criticism), along with awareness of the social context of different readers (e.g., feminist hermeneutics). There is growing admission that biblical texts admit multiple interpretations and that the hermeneutical task demands dialogue between the magisterium and biblical scholars and between biblical scholars, literary critics, and theologians, as well as attention to the lived religious experience of believers and the pastoral practice of the Church (see Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, nn. 8, 11).

See also Bible, Church teachings on the; biblical theology; canon of the Scriptures; inerrancy of Scripture; inspiration of Scripture; Scripture, authority of; Scripture, interpretation of; Scripture and tradition.

Bibliography

Ackroyd, P. R., et al., eds. The Cambridge History of the Bible. 3 vols. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1963–70.

Brown, Raymond E. Responses to 101 Questions on the Bible. Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press, 1990.

Campenhausen, Hans von. The Formation of the Christian Bible. Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1972.

Megivern, James J., ed. Official Catholic Teachings: Bible Interpretation. Wilmington, NC: McGrath, 1978.

Schneiders, Sandra. The Revelatory Text: Interpreting the New Testament as Sacred Scripture. San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1991.

JOHN R. DONAHUE

Bible, Church teachings on the. A recent official summary of Church teachings on the Bible is to be found in The Catechism of the Catholic Church (1992). The summary contains eight points: (1) All of Sacred Scripture is but a single book, which ultimately speaks about Christ. (2) The Scriptures are inspired and contain the word of God. Hence, they can be called the Word of God. (3) God is the author of the Scriptures, whose human authors have been inspired by God and given special assistance in order that their writings teach truth, without error, for the sake of our salvation. (4) The interpretation of Scripture must be especially attentive to what God intends to reveal for the sake of our salvation. (5) The Church receives and respects as inspired forty-six books of the OT and twenty-seven books of the NT. (6) Within the Scriptures the four Gospels hold a central place because Jesus Christ is their center. (7) The unity of the OT and NT derives from God's single plan of salvation and revelation. (8) As the Church venerates the body of the Lord, so it venerates the Scriptures.

Tradition: The catechism's summary affirms that the canon, the complete and authoritative list, of inspired Scriptures includes seventy-two books. This reiterates a teaching expressed in the Decree of Damasus of the Roman synod of 382 and reaffirmed by the Council of Trent in 1546.

The unity of the Scriptures is a very ancient teaching of the Church. Of major significance in the development of the canon was a contention by Marcion, a mid-second century Roman heretic, that there was absolute incompatibility between the OT's God of wrath and the God of Jesus, a loving Father. Marcion accepted as authoritative only a small collection of the writings of Paul and a heavily edited version of the Gospel according to Luke. In reaction to Marcion, defenders of Christian orthodoxy, such as Irenaeus, proclaimed the unity of the fourfold Gospel and asserted the divine origin of the Scriptures of the OT.

In the fourth and fifth centuries, the Manichees denied that God was the author of the OT. In reaction, a number of local church councils in North Africa affirmed that God is the single author (Lat., unus auctor) of the books of the OT and NT. This formula became an important part of the Church's tradition. It was included in the decrees of the councils of Florence, Trent, and Vatican II (Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, n. 11).

Augustine (d. 430) highlighted the unity of the OT and NT when he wrote that "the New Testament lies hidden in the Old; the Old Testament is made manifest in the New." Augustine's teaching was reiterated by Vatican II (1962–65), which explained that the purpose of the Old Covenant was to prepare for the coming of Christ and the kingdom, to announce it and to clarify its meaning (Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, nn. 15–16).

The idea that all of the Scriptures point to Christ has its roots in the NT. Matthew, for example, repeatedly uses a fulfillment formula to express this conviction (Matt 1:22–23). Reflecting the tradition of the manna given to Israel during the Exodus, the Gospel according to John portrays Jesus as the bread of life (John 6). Paul recalls that Adam is a type of the one to come (Rom 5:14). The Letter to the Hebrews portrays Jesus as a high priest according to the order of Melchizedek (Heb 5:6; Ps 110:4). Subsequently, by means of an allegorical reading of the OT, the Fathers of the Church were able to find Christ in virtually every line of the text.

Vatican Council II: Vatican II proclaimed the preeminence of the fourfold Gospel among the Scriptures as a matter of "common knowledge." It explained that the Gospels are "the principal witness to the life and teaching of the incarnate Word, our Savior" (Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, n. 18). Jesus is the incarnate Word and the fullness of revelation.

God's plan of revelation has as its purpose the salvation of humankind. This plan, the council teaches, is realized by deeds and words. The words proclaim the deeds and clarify the mystery contained in them (Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, n. 2). At first transmitted orally, the words were put into writing under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. With God as their origin and testifying to revelation as they do, the Scriptures are received and venerated by the Church as the word of God.

Because of this understanding, the Scriptures enjoy an importance in the life of the Church that the council has described in this way: "the Church has always venerated the divine Scriptures just as it venerates the body of the Lord, since from the table of both the word of God and of the body of Christ it unceasingly receives and offers to the faithful the bread of life, especially in the sacred liturgy. It has always regarded the Scriptures together with sacred tradition as the supreme rule of faith, and will ever do so" (Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, n. 21).

Vatican II's Dogmatic Constitution on Divine

Revelation, promulgated on November 18, 1965, represents the Church's most extensive and most authoritative teaching on the Scriptures. By formulating this teaching in one of its two dogmatic constitutions, the council expressed the importance of the Scriptures in the life of the Church. By calling the constitution Dei Verbum (Lat., "the Word of God"), it indicates how the Scriptures are to be understood, namely, as the message of salvation.

In addition to those aspects of its teaching recalled in the eight-point summary of The Catechism of the Catholic Church, the council highlighted Scripture's relationship with tradition. Commenting on the inspired nature of the Scriptures, the council declared that "the books of Scripture must be acknowledged as teaching firmly, faithfully, and without error that truth which God wanted put into the sacred writings for the sake of our salvation" (Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, n. 11).

Along with its significant teaching on the nature of Scripture, the council had much to say about the members of the Church and the Scriptures. It affirmed that the task of authentic interpretation of Scripture has been entrusted to the teaching office of the Church and that this office is not above the word of God, rather it serves it. Its decree encouraged biblical scholarship, noted the importance of studying the biblical text in its original languages, and highlighted the significance of the Bible's use of different literary forms.

The council urged that all the faithful be provided with easy access to the Scriptures. It drew attention to the Church's multiform ministry of the Word, especially as it is exercised by priests, deacons, and catechists, and it repeatedly underscored the importance of the reading and preaching of the Scriptures in the Church's liturgy. The Scriptures are also, it noted, to serve as the soul of theology.

Before the Council: Vatican II's comprehensive teaching on the Scriptures was the result of a century-long interaction between the Church and modern biblical criticism. A number of encyclicals and various pronouncements by the Pontifical Biblical Commission had expressed the developing teaching of the Church on the Bible during that period.

Leo XIII's encyclical Providentissimus Deus (1893) taught that the Bible was not formally intended to teach natural science, but that it used language as it was commonly spoken at the time of the composition of the various books. The encyclical also taught that the entire Bible was inspired and without error.

Pius X's Pascendi Dominici Gregis (1907) represented a reaction to errors presumed to have come from the Modernists. The encyclical appealed to a doctrine of inspiration it did not otherwise explain. Papal caution continued to be reflected in Benedict XV's Spiritus Paraclitus (1920), which praised the memory of Jerome and commended the efforts of those scholars who used modern methods of interpretation, but issued stern warning against some of the modern interpretive techniques. The pope emphasized that spiritual perfection, the defense of the faith, and effective preaching of the Word were the goals of biblical scholarship.

On the occasion of the golden jubilee of Leo XIII's encyclical, Pius XII issued the encyclical Divino Afflante Spiritu (1943). The pope noted that the Scriptures were relevant even in most difficult times and he taught Catholics that the literal sense of the Scriptures, which is their proper sense, can only be understood within the context of the literary forms and expressions in use at the time that the Scriptures were written.

In 1902 Leo XIII established the Pontifical Biblical Commission. Its early decrees affirmed the general historicity of the biblical texts and the traditional authorship of many of the biblical books. Sancta Mater Ecclesia (1964) was the final decree of this commission, in its pre–Vatican II configuration. The instruction asserted the general historicity of the four Gospels, but demonstrated a far more sophisticated view of history than had been present in earlier commission texts. Since Vatican II the commission has been reorganized and given the task of serving as adviser to the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. See also Bible; Bible and doctrine; inerrancy of Scripture; inspiration of Scripture; Scripture, authority of; Scripture, interpretation of; Scripture and tradition.

Bibliography

Brown, Raymond E., and Thomas Aquinas Collins. "Church Pronouncements." In The New Jerome Biblical Commentary. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall, 1990. Pp. 1166–74.

Collins, Raymond F. Introduction to the New Testament. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1983. Ch. 10, "Rome and the Critical Study of the New Testament." Pp. 356–84.

Megivern, James J., ed. Bible Interpretation. Official Catholic Teachings. Wilmington, DE: McGrath, 1968. RAYMOND COLLINS

Bible, English translations of the. Since most people do not have access to the Bible in its original languages (Hebrew, Aramaic, Greek), the task of producing an exact and readable version in the vernacular languages has always assumed the greatest importance. This task must be undertaken anew at various intervals because of changes in the receptor language and because our knowledge of the original languages and access to new textual material is increasing all the time. Thus, the discovery of the cuneiform texts from Ugarit, beginning in 1929, has greatly increased our knowledge of Hebrew, and the biblical texts from Qumran, including an entire scroll of Isaiah ($1QIs^a$), have greatly enlarged our understanding of the early stages of the transmission of the Hebrew text.

English Versions Before Printing: Until the sixteenth century all translations of the Bible into English were made on the basis of the Latin Vulgate version produced by Jerome at the bidding of Pope Damasus (383–84). We do not know how and to what extent the Bible was read during the Roman occupation of England, but within a century of the mission of Augustine biblical paraphrases were being made by the Anglo-Saxon poet Caedmon. The Venerable Bede (d. 735) produced a translation of the Gospel of John, and a century later Alfred the Great, first king of the English nation, himself translated some psalms into the native tongue. The beautiful Lindisfarne codex of the Gospels in Latin contains an interlinear Anglo-Saxon translation written by the scribe Aldred, and other early interlinear Psalters have survived. Aelfric, writing shortly before the Norman Conquest (1066), produced an abridged version of several OT books and, in his homilies, a good cross-section of biblical passages were translated literally from the Vulgate. After the conquest, translations of different parts of the Bible into Anglo-Norman were produced, generally for aristocratic lords and ladies or for religious houses, but until the thirteenth century little enthusiasm was shown for the vernacular. Latin was firmly established as the language of the educated classes, which, unfortunately, did not include most of the clergy.

The fourteenth century, the century of Chaucer, witnessed a revival of the English language (Middle English) and, from the middle of the century, translations of different parts of the Bible, especially Psalms and the NT. The first complete version of the Vulgate was the work of John Wycliffe (ca. 1330–84) and his associates, of whom the most important was Nicholas Hereford. A first draft, completed in 1384, was unduly literal and was therefore revised in the last years of the century by John Purvey, Wycliffe's secretary. Ecclesiastical opposition to this version was triggered by Wycliffe's protest against papal corruption and espousal of Lollard doctrines, as well as suspicion that the production of a vernacular version was motivated by the desire to find scriptural support for Wycliffe's theological opinions. In any case, Wycliffe's Bible was widely used and retained its popularity into the early sixteenth century.

From the Sixteenth Century to the Present: The invention, or perfection, of the printing press by Johann Gutenberg of Mainz and the printing of the first surviving book in 1457 (a Latin Psalter) radically changed the situation with respect to the use of the Bible in the vernacular. In 1526 William Tyndale translated into English the NT, and in the following years the Pentateuch and Jonah. His Lutheran views, which found their way into the notes and the translation of certain passages, made his work suspect in England, and he died a martyr at the stake in 1536. The previous year saw the appearance of the first complete version from the Vulgate, that of Miles Coverdale, who incorporated much of Tyndale's work. In 1537 John Rogers (alias Thomas Matthew) produced a new version based on the work of Tyndale and Coverdale, which was ordered to be placed in every church in England and thus became the authorized version until it was replaced by a revision commissioned by Archbishop Matthew Parker in 1568. After Mary Tudor ascended the throne in 1553 and reimposed Catholicism, refugees from religious persecution gathered in Geneva and produced a revision of the "Great Bible" of John Rogers, known as the Geneva Bible. It was this version that achieved the greatest popularity for private reading and accompanied the pilgrim fathers to the New World.

The culmination of all these efforts came with the publication of the King James Version (KJV) in 1611, the work of committees including the best scholars in the land. In due course it established itself as the classical version of the Scriptures and was recognized as one of the great masterpieces of English writing. It served unchanged until a Revised Version (RV) was called for in the late nineteenth century, beginning with the NT in 1881. This was followed by an American version in 1901. Important discoveries and advances in knowledge of the textual transmission of the Bible during the following half-century, however, necessitated a revision, resulting in the Revised Standard Version (RSV) commissioned by the National Council of Churches in America and published between 1946 and 1957. More recently (1990) the RSV was again revised, special attention being paid to the elimination where possible of gender-exclusive language. In the form of the Oxford Annotated Bible, the RSV was approved for Catholic use in 1966. The last few decades have seen an abundance of new translations. The most notable of these are the New English Bible (NEB), the work of British biblical scholars, the revised edition of which appeared in 1989; the New American Bible (NAB), produced by members of the American Catholic Biblical Association (1970; revised NT 1987); the Jerusalem Bible (JB) based on the French translation by the faculty of the École Biblique in Jerusalem (1966, rev. ed. 1985); the Jewish Publication Society Bible, completed in 1982; and the New Revised Standard Version (NRSV), completed in 1990, under the direction of the Division of Christian Education of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U.S.A.

The papal encyclical Divino Afflante Spiritu (On promoting biblical studies, 1943) encouraged the study of the Bible in the original languages or in translation and promoted the use of English in the liturgy. The encyclical makes clear the distance traversed since the appearance of the Douay-Rheims version from the Vulgate, the first in English made expressly for Catholics and the work of exiles from religious persecution under Elizabeth I and James I (1582–1609). See also Douay-Rheims Version of the Bible; King James Bible; Lollards; Vulgate.

Bibliography

Bailey, Lloyd R., ed. The Word of God: A Guide to English Versions of the Bible. Atlanta: John Knox Press, 1982.

Meeks, Wayne A., ed. The HarperCollins Study Bible: New Revised Standard Version. San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1993.

JOSEPH BLENKINSOPP

Bible, versions of. See Scripture, versions of.

Bible and art. The use of biblically inspired imagery (including biblical references) has been part of the Catholic tradition since the second century, despite the iconoclastic controversies of the eighth and ninth centuries. Biblical imagery traditionally has been related to the role of Christ in salvation history and has included scenes from Christ's life and OT subjects, the latter seen as the reasons for Christ's mission (Adam and Eve) or as the prototypes of his priesthood and sacrifice (Melchizedek, Abel, Abraham) and Resurrection (Jonah, Daniel).

Biblical art has had no single "best" style or medium. Styles have changed to reflect differing theological understandings and cultural conditions. Many early Christian images were painted on catacomb and house-church walls (e.g., Dura-Europos baptistery) and were often sketchy and unnaturalistic. Late-fourth-century sarcophagi and sculpture reflected Greco-Roman naturalism (e.g., the Cleveland Museum Jonah sculptures). Byzantine-influenced mosaics and icons were hieratic, flattened, and dematerialized. German Gothic images were exuberant and emotional. Netherlandish art was noted for its combination of photographic realism and hidden symbolism, while the Italian Renaissance placed idealized and graceful figures in an ideal and balanced world. The Baroque took the Renaissance forms and introduced passionate drama. Twentieth-century biblical art has employed many styles, with some of the finest modern work belonging to the Expressionists (Rouault, Nolde, Schmidt-Rottluff).

The flight of Mary, Joseph, and the child Jesus into Egypt; Cathedral St. Lazare, Autuo, France.

Biblical imagery relies on many influences; clothing, architecture, and landscape from different periods and locations were often intermingled. Furthermore, biblical narratives were frequently combined with stories from other sources such as the Golden Legend, the apocryphal Gospels, and mystical writings.

TERRENCE E. DEMPSEY

Bible and doctrine, the relationship between Sacred Scripture and the official teachings of the Church. During the first centuries of the Church, the Fathers of the Church used the Scriptures as the principal source for the instruction of the faithful. In the Middle Ages, the Bible was revered as the "sacred page" (Lat., sacra pagina). As such, it was the basis on which theology was developed. When an apologetic approach to the teaching of the Church became popular after the Council of Trent (1545–63), texts from Scripture were used as "proof texts" to support the teaching of the Church. With the development of modern biblical criticism, various papal encyclicals and pronouncements urged Catholic biblical scholars to clarify those passages of the Scriptures that had doctrinal significance.

In these various ways the Church has given expression to its constant conviction that there is a close connection between the Bible and Church teaching. Vatican II (1962–65) stated that "the sacred page [the Bible] is, as it were, the soul of theology" (Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, n. 24; Decree on Priestly Formation, n. 16). Theology rests on the written word of God, together with tradition, because it bears witness to that which God has revealed for the sake of humankind. Vatican II reaffirmed the often repeated dictum of Jerome that "ignorance of the Scriptures is ignorance of Christ" (Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, n. 25; cf. Decree on the Bishops' Pastoral Office in the Church, n. 12). The Church, it said, "has always regarded the Scriptures together with sacred tradition as the supreme rule of faith [suprema fidei suae regula], and will ever do so" (Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, n. 21).

The Scriptures are the "unnormed norm" (Lat., norma non normata) of the experience and expression of Christian faith. The canon of the Scriptures is the context within which Christian doctrine is developed and its critical point of reference. Although it is the entirety of the scriptural canon that is normative for Christian doctrine, and the texts are not to be isolated from their biblical contexts, some biblical texts are more significant for doctrine than others. Texts whose religious value is apparent and that contribute significantly to the Church's process of pedagogy are more important than those whose religious value is not as manifest. A preeminent place is to be accorded to the four canonical Gospels.

Not all of Church doctrine is contained within the Scriptures, nor is Church doctrine to be construed merely as the exposition of the meaning of the Scriptures. Together with tradition, Scripture provides a primary and perpetual foundation for doctrine. Doctrine develops within a context of Scripture and the tradition of the Church's experiences.

As the soul of Christian theology, the Scriptures vivify and give unity to the doctrine of the Church. Consistency within the biblical witness is a major factor in the normative function of the Scriptures. Rather, the Scriptures have a function that is at once constitutive and critical with regard to the doctrine of the Church.

In their constitutive function the Scriptures continue to serve as a principal source of the Church's teaching. Its doctrine develops by means of a continual interfacing between the Church's contemporary situation and its foundational texts. The development of doctrine is to be consistent with the scriptural witness.

Church doctrine is renewed and revivified by means of a return to the Scriptures. Vatican II affirmed, for example, that biblical themes are to be presented first in the exposition of dogmatic theology. It called for a more thorough nourishing of the scientific exposition of moral theology by scriptural teaching (Decree on Priestly Formation, n. 16).

In their critical function, the Scriptures move the Church ever to renew its teaching. Recourse to the Scriptures prevents the Church from developing its teaching in a too narrow or otherwise skewed fashion. Teaching that is inconsistent with the Scriptures must be regarded as an unauthentic expression of the Church's faith. See also doctrine; dogma; magisterium; Scripture and tradition. RAYMOND COLLINS

Bible and ecumenism. Attempts to surmount denominational differences by a return to the Bible as the sole source of belief and practice have characterized Protestantism since the early part of the nineteenth century. Prior to Vatican II (1962–65), Catholics were forbidden to engage in common Bible study with Protestants, or to read translations of the Bible prepared by non-Catholics. Yet, Catholic scholars could not ignore the research of non-Catholic scholars in fields such as archaeology, philology, text criticism, and literary criticism. The biblical scholar Augustine Bea, a major influence on Divino Afflante Spiritu (1943), was a leader in ecumenism prior to and during Vatican II, and became first head of the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity. Vatican II called the Bible the soul of theology (Decree on Priestly Formation, n. 16) and mandated greater use of the Bible in the liturgy and pastoral practice. Today study and use of the Bible bring Catholics and non-Catholics together on all levels. Both critical editions and contemporary translations of the Bible (e.g., New Revised Standard Version and the Revised New American Bible) are the work of Catholic, Jewish, and Protestant scholars. Catholics and Protestants work together and have been presidents of the major scholarly organizations, i.e., the Catholic Biblical Association and the (originally Protestant) Society of Biblical Literature. Church-sponsored ecumenical dialogues have returned to the Bible, only to discover fundamental agreements on issues that had been obscured by centuries of controversy. Most Catholics and mainline Protestant denominations follow the same biblical lectionary cycle, the order of Scripture readings used in the Sunday and daily liturgy. Common prayer centers on the Bible, and Catholic and non-Catholic laypeople participate in group Bible study. See also ecumenical movement; ecumenism.

JOHN R. DONAHUE

Bible and liturgy. Many books of the Bible are the result of setting oral traditions in writing, and they often contain elements drawn from public worship, e.g., Israel's confessions of faith (Deut 6:4–9; 26:3–10). A number of psalms originally accompanied worship in the Temple (e.g., Pss 95–100; 121). In the NT, 1 Peter, Revelation, and even the bulk of Philippians may have originally been liturgies. Prebiblical hymns are employed in the NT, e.g., Phil 2:6–11; Col 1:15–20; Luke 1:46–55. The various traditions of the institution of the Eucharist (1 Cor 11:23–26; Mark 14:22–25; Matt 26:26–29; Luke 22:15–20) show signs of having been used liturgically before they were incorporated into liturgical texts. Theories claiming that the Gospels themselves originated as liturgical readings that were spread out over the year have not met with general acceptance. It is fair to say that public worship influenced the creation of a number of biblical texts.

Jewish Liturgy: The Bible has traditionally played a major role in both Jewish and Christian liturgy. The OT provides the basis for the celebration of major Jewish festivals (Passover, Weeks, Tabernacles, Day of Atonement; see, e.g., Deut 16) as well as the observance of the Sabbath. While it is difficult to date the origins of the synagogue (in either the exile or the postexilic period), it is fairly certain that Scripture played a major role in the Sabbath morning service with readings from the law (Torah) in a fixed cycle of either one or three years and with readings freely chosen from the prophets to accompany them. The synagogue readings were done in descending order. Three passages from Scripture (Deut 6:4–9; 11:13–21; Num 15:37–41) were included in the daily morning and evening recitation of the Shema ("Hear, O Israel").

Christian Liturgy: The first full description of the Sunday Eucharist in Justin Martyr's First Apology (67) reveals that the writings of the prophets and the memoirs of the apostles were read from at least the middle of the second century. In some of the early liturgies (e.g., Apostolic Constitutions 8) four or more readings from Scripture were employed, always ending with the Gospel. Up to the fourth century, books of the Bible were probably read in continuous fashion (Lat., lectio continua), but from the fourth century on the developing calendar of feasts and fast days required a new method of selecting passages to correspond to the celebration of the day. In addition, a number of OT passages were read in conjunction with the NT to show how the old covenant foreshadowed the new. This procedure is called typology. The requirements of the liturgy itself provided an interpretation of the Bible depending on the setting of readings in the liturgical calendar.

A number of elements in Catholic liturgy in addition to liturgical readings have traditionally been biblical (the entrance chant, greeting, responsorial psalm, verse for the Gospel acclamation, Holy, Holy, Lord's Prayer, Lamb of God [indirectly], and Communion chant). Scripture by way of psalms, canticles, readings, and responsories forms the bulk of the Liturgy of the Hours. In the post–Vatican II liturgy every liturgical service, including individual celebration of Penance and Anointing, contains at least some proclamation of Scripture.

In many ways the post–Vatican II liturgy has fulfilled the desire of the sixteenth-century Protestant Reformers for a greater attention to the Bible in public worship. The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (n. 35) mandated greater variety and content of Scripture; this mandate has been put into practice with the current three-year cycle of Sunday readings and two-year cycle of daily readings. See also liturgy, theology of; worship; worship [in the Bible].

JOHN F. BALDOVIN

Bible and theology. See biblical theology.

Bible service, Bible paraliturgies consisting of the public reading of and meditation on Sacred Scripture, along with intervals of prayer and song. To provide for more ample and varied scriptural readings and to highlight the connection of word and rite, the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy of Vatican II (1962–65) encouraged Bible services on solemn feast vigils, Sundays and holidays, and some Advent and Lenten weekdays, especially when a priest is not available; deacons or deputed laity may preside (n. 35). See also biblical spirituality.

Biblia Pauperum (Lat., "Bible of the poor"), a genre popular in the later Middle Ages and into the age of printing, offering a series of illustrations of the life and activity of Christ, as well as of the afterlife. The book was composed of forty sets of illustrations, one set per page. Each set includes two scenes drawn from the OT that anticipate some episode, portrayed between them, from the NT. Brief texts accompany each set of illustrations, providing the appropriate OT prophecies, as well as some material explaining the typological relations between the OT and NT scenes. The precise function of this "Bible" remains debated. Rather than a "picture book" for illiterates, who in any case would have been unable to read the accompanying texts, or an aid for preachers, it seems more likely that the work was developed to stimulate the meditation of a literate and devout audience.

biblical chronology, the historical dating of biblical books, persons, and events. The many chronological markers that punctuate the biblical narrative, especially in Genesis (the birth of patriarchs, the succession of events in the Flood) are undoubtedly fictive and arranged in accordance with a preconceived schema, perhaps based on a 4000-year cycle or world epoch. The 430 years in Egypt (Exod 12:40–41) match exactly the period of the monarchy from the building of Solomon's Temple (1 Kgs 6:1) to its destruction by the Babylonians. The relative chronology of Israelite and Judean rulers, and of events during their reigns, can now be checked against the absolute chronology established for Mesopotamia and Egypt and bolstered by relevant archaeological data.

Apocalyptic writings occasionally calculate the time of the final drama of history (e.g., Dan 12:11–13; Rev 20:1–3), but the figures are often interpreted symbolically; hence attempts to predict the course of the future based on them are misguided.

In the NT, Luke-Acts provides the most chronological data, but much remains uncertain, e.g., the length of the ministry of Jesus and the date of the census under Quirinius, governor of Syria (Luke 2:2). The chronology of the life of Jesus can be established only approximately: he was born before Herod the Great died in 4 B.C. and he died while Pilate was prefect of Judea (A.D. 26–36). Since Paul's Letters rarely refer to events in the Roman world of that time, their dating and chronological sequence have to be determined almost exclusively on internal evidence. See also Bible. JOSEPH BLENKINSOPP biblical commission. See Pontifical Biblical Commission.

biblical criticism (Gk., krisis, "judgment," "decision"), the process of making judgments about the nature of biblical literature, including dating, authorship, historical background, sources, literary form, transmission, and meaning of biblical texts. Though the term is neutral, it often carries a connotation of negative judgments that challenge traditional understandings, e.g., about the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch or whether certain sayings attributed to Jesus were actually uttered by him. A number of specific disciplines come under the umbrella of biblical criticism. Textual criticism seeks to produce a text with the greatest claim to antiquity, i.e., it seeks to establish the original wording or form of the biblical text; source criticism identifies the traditions or written documents an author may have employed; literary criticism is concerned with the style, structure, and distinctive language of a given text; form criticism identifies the formal elements of a text (e.g., is the creation account in Genesis a myth?) and postulates preliterary settings for given forms; redaction and composition criticism focuses on the final product and the activity of the author in editing a previous text (e.g., Matthew's retelling of Mark's Passion narrative), or in composing new material (e.g., the Johannine farewell discourses). The present state of biblical studies witnesses the rise of many new forms of criticism, e.g., rhetorical criticism, which seeks to understand how a text moves its hearers to action or decision, and canonical criticism, which describes the formation of the canon and the function of the canon in the believing community. JOHN R. DONAHUE biblical exegesis, thirteenth-century. The century of Bonaventure, Aquinas, and Henry of Ghent saw great advances in theological science, stimulated by the struggle to meet the challenge posed by the newly translated philosophical writings of Aristotle. Yet, in their approach to the Bible, theologians were quite conservative: the Bible retained its privileged place at the heart of theological inquiry; it was seen as expressing God's truth at many levels of meaning, the literal as well as the various spiritual senses; knowledge of the original biblical languages remained the exception, with theologians preferring to encounter God's word in the Vulgate Latin and its variants.

The Bible was central to the training and teaching of the Scholastic theologian. The advanced student of theology, the "biblical bachelor," was required to lecture on the Bible before being permitted to pass to the final stage of training, lecturing on the Sentences of Peter Lombard. Lectures on the Bible ran quickly over the biblical text, primarily to give the novice theologian better acquaintance with Scripture. Once the requirements of the theological degree were met, the Bible was the sole subject for the lectures of the regent master. At Paris and elsewhere, in these lectures, which explored difficult questions emerging from the biblical text, the custom was to alternate between books of the OT and the NT. Numerous commentaries, many of which are rooted in these classroom exercises, are extant. All the biblical books found their commentators, with the Scholastics showing a special fondness for the sapiential books. The commentaries of the Scholastics display their dialectical skills, knowledge of the readings of earlier commentators, and a concern to highlight the organizational and literary features of the biblical text.

The Bible was also prominent in their more systematic writings, which can be characterized as comprehensive restatements in modern terms of the truths of God found in Scripture. While the Bible was acknowledged to have many levels of meaning, in Scholastic argument the literal level, the meaning conveyed by the words of the text, was preferred.

The century also saw in Scholastic circles some technical advances. Early in the century at Paris, the Latin text was divided into chapters, for ease of reference (the division of chapters into verses came much later); these chapter divisions have been retained in all twentieth-century versions of the Bible. Similarly, especially due to the work of Parisian Dominicans under the leadership of Hugh of Saint Cher, repeated attempts were made at constructing concordances of the Bible, listing all instances of individual words and suggesting their differing applications. Again, the goal was ease of reference, indicative of the perceived need to be adept in handling the biblical text.

Other religious authors shared the Scholastic enthusiasm for the Bible. Indeed, its continued emotional appeal is even more apparent in the works of spiritual authors such as Mechthild of Magdeburg and the nuns of Helfta. The century saw an explosion of spiritual writings. Male and female authors were especially taken by the Gospel depictions of the Passion, and employed biblical language to express their experience of God through the crucified Christ. As in such twelfth-century authors as Bernard of Clairvaux, spiritual authors also saw the religious potential of the rich imagery of the Canticle of Canticles. Especially in Franciscan circles, the hermeneutical theories of Joachim of Fiore (d. 1202) enjoyed a wide following. Joachim had divided human history into three main stages, each of which was under the guidance of a person of the Trinity. Reading the Bible typologically, Joachim foretold the imminent arrival of the age of the Holy Spirit, in which history would attain its perfection. In the course of the continuing debates about spiritual poverty, Franciscan writers employed Joachimite ideas to enhance the position of their order, which, they thought, would play a key role in inaugurating the new age. See also biblical criticism; biblical theology; exegesis; Scripture, interpretation of.

JOSEPH WAWRYKOW

biblical exegesis, twelfth-century. During the twelfth century, the Bible was the most influential book in Europe. Its language, worldview, and doctrine formed the foundation of medieval culture. The developments in biblical exegesis (textual interpretation) that took place during that century transformed not only the practice of exegesis itself but also the nature of the theological enterprise. Interpreting Scripture, once practiced almost exclusively within a monastic culture with its contemplative ambiance, became increasingly open to the ideas and methods of a new breed of scholars, the teachers and students at the cathedral centers of northern France.

At the onset of the twelfth century, biblical exegesis flourished at the Cathedral School of Laon under the leadership of Anselm, who began the process that created a standardized biblical text (Latin Vulgate) and surrounded each passage with selected patristic commentary. In this way the teachers at Laon continued to incorporate traditional exegesis by following the four senses of Scripture: the literal or historical, allegorical or typological, moral, and anagogical. In its final form, this format of the sacra pagina (Lat., "sacred page") was known as the Glossa Ordinaria ("Ordinary Gloss").

However, new methods for exegesis developed as scholars brought a more scientific approach to bear upon the sacred page. For example, techniques used for introducing secular literature to the reader were now extended to the biblical books; the quaestio or "question," with arguments given for and against, gradually developed a formal structure, becoming a distinct genre itself. Hugh of St. Victor was a leader in this movement. His introductory notes On Sacred Scriptures and Writers consciously raised questions of biblical content and exegetical method and, along with his major study of doctrine, the Didascalion, influenced future generations. Hugh placed a great emphasis on the literal, historical meaning of texts, believing this to be the foundation of spiritual exegesis. The next generation at St. Victor continued to promote these ideas. Andrew of St. Victor's work is perhaps the most notable because of his careful integration of Jewish and rabbinic exegesis into his own commentaries on the OT.

That scholars were increasingly self-conscious about exegetical method is nowhere more apparent than with Peter Abelard, Hugh's contemporary. Abelard's perception of the sacred page as a text to be scrutinized, and his vigorous insistence on the primacy of dialectic and inquiry itself as the way to discern the meaning of texts brought a new élan to biblical exegesis. In the prologue to Sic et Non, Abelard presented rules for intepretation, and in his own commentaries on the Hexaemeron (the Genesis account of the six days of creation) and on the Letter to the Romans, he introduced provocative questions, some with equally provocative responses. With Héloïse, Abelard collaborated on a major work of textual analysis dealing only with problematic scriptures (Problemata Heloissae). Abelard's pupil Robert of Melun employed this approach in a collection of questions on the Pauline Letters.

By the end of the twelfth century, the new methods were in place and, although the monastic approach to exegesis continued, its influence was limited. Biblical exegesis in the following centuries belonged to the university scholars, especially the friars who refined and advanced the achievements of twelfth-century theologians. See also biblical exegesis, thirteenth-century; biblical theology; exegesis; Scripture, interpretation of. EILEEN KEARNEY biblical institute. See Pontifical Biblical Institute.

biblical spirituality, the lived experience of Christian faith as it is expressed in, or characterized by, the religious content and perspective(s) of the Bible. Although no generally accepted definition of the term exists, it is used in at least two different ways. First, the Bible as a whole presents a unique faith experience. For the Christian this experience develops throughout the OT into the NT. It is essentially a historically mediated, covenantal relationship between the one creator God and a community who have been saved by God, first from human slavery through Moses and then from sin by Jesus Christ, and who respond to God's saving love by a life of faith, praise, love, and justice. This basic biblical spirituality is diversely realized and expressed in different OT and NT traditions, e.g., with an emphasis on justice in the OT prophets, on missionary zeal in the Letters of Paul, and on contemplative interiority in John's Gospel.

Second, while all authentically Christian spirituality is rooted in, and shaped by, biblical revelation, some historical forms of Christian spirituality are more characterized by explicit reference to the Bible while the biblical rootedness of other traditions is more implicit. The former, e.g., the Benedictine tradition, are sometimes called "biblical spiritualities" in contrast to those that are more ascetical, apostolic, or contemplative. See also spirituality, Christian.

biblical theology, statements about God and God's relation to humanity as found in the Bible, with a secondary sense of a postbiblical theology based on the Bible and using biblical categories and expressions. From the second century until the end of the high Middle Ages, theology (language about God) was primarily dialogue with the Bible. A theologian was a magister sacrae paginae (Lat.), literally an expert in the sacred text (the Bible). With the development of Scholasticism, and especially with the polemics of the post-Tridentine period, theology became increasingly divorced from the Bible among both Catholics and Protestants. The Bible served as an archive of proof-texts for doctrine. Biblical theology as an independent discipline dates to a lecture in 1787 by Johann Gabler calling for an historical and descriptive biblical theology. "Theology" here becomes virtually synonymous with description of religious beliefs and practices. In the 1950s Protestantism, and later Catholicism, were influenced by the "biblical theology movement," which opposed doctrinal synthesis, stressed the distinctiveness of the biblical worldview (over both its environment and later developments) and understood theology in terms of "salvation history" (Ger., heilsgeschichte), i.e., the revelation of God in the history of the people of Israel and the early Church. Pius XII's encyclical on biblical studies, Divino Afflante Spiritu (1943), and Vatican II (1962–65) were a stimulus to a renewal of biblical theology within Catholicism. See also New Testament theology. JOHN R. DONAHUE bidding prayers. See Prayer of the Faithful.

Biel, Gabriel, 1410–95, German scholastic theologian. A member of the Brethren of the Common Life (ca. 1468), he became provost of houses in Butzbach, Hesse (1470), and Urach, Württemberg (1479). He accepted the chair of theology at Tübingen (1484), serving twice as rector, and there completed his influential Commentary on the Four Books of Sentences and Lectures on the Canon of the Mass.

Biel represented the late medieval Via Moderna, a theological movement influenced by William of Ockham's nominalism and opposed to the Via Antiqua associated with Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274). Generally, nominalism rejected Thomistic realism, and the Via Moderna emphasized God's absolute freedom. On justification, Biel believed that God owed salvation to no person but freely agreed to provide grace to those "who do the best that lies within them" (Lat., "facere quod in se est"), thus requiring some human effort as a prerequisite for salvation. Similarly, in sacramental penance Biel demanded some contrition (sorrow grounded in pure love of God as opposed to fear of punishment) as a prelude to absolution. Martin Luther (d. 1546) received his theological training through Biel's tradition but ultimately rejected his tenets in the Protestant Reformation. See also nature and grace; nominalism; Via Antiqua, Via Moderna.

Big Bang, the explosive beginning or origin of the universe as it is modeled in standard twentieth-century cosmological theory. It is pertinent to the question of God's creation of the universe. The universe has been expanding and cooling for about fifteen billion years. We know this from the systematic redshifting of distant galaxies, the presence and equilibrium character of the cosmic microwave background radiation, and the high abundance of helium, as well as the significant abundance of deuterium. That is, as we go back farther and farther into the past, we encounter a succession of ever hotter and denser phases. The past limit to these hotter, denser phases, which is a singularity (where temperature, density, and spatial curvature are infinite), is called "the Big Bang." It is conventionally designated by time $t = 0$. It is not just one point, but is a spacelike manifold of points with these properties. Some have regarded the Big Bang as "the creation event," in the theological sense. But there are strong scientific and philosophical reasons for resisting this identification. Its singular character probably signals a breakdown in the cosmological model itself, particularly in the underlying manifold model of space-time itself; at these extremely high energies, a cosmological model based on a quantized theory of gravity is needed. This would strongly alter key categories, including those of space, time, and event at and near the Big Bang. See also creation; evolution; God; philosophy and theology.

Billiart, St. Julie, 1751–1816, founder of the Sisters of Notre Dame of Namur. Gifted with prayerfulness, skill in teaching religion, and a profound sense of God's goodness, after the French Revolution, Julia trained women to teach poor children. Since its foundation in France in 1804, Julia's institute has produced two independent branches and has spread throughout the world. Feast day: May 13. See also Sisters of Notre Dame de Namur.

Billot, Louis (loo'ee bee-yoh'), 1846–1931, Jesuit philosopher and theologian. He taught at the Gregorian University in Rome for much of his career and was one of the principal figures in the neo-Thomistic revival sponsored by Pope Leo XIII. He became an influential consultant for the Holy Office under Pius X and in 1911 was created cardinal, a dignity he later agreed to renounce as a result of his association with Action Française, a politically reactionary movement that favored monarchy over democracy. A brilliant metaphysician with an extensive knowledge of the work of Thomas Aquinas, Billot wrote numerous theological treatises that represented a movement away from the more historical and philosophical Scholasticism of the nineteenth century and toward a more speculative and deductive approach to theological questions.

bilocation, the capacity to be in two places at one time. Certain saints and other holy persons are reported to have appeared to someone in one location while, in fact, the saint has been in another location hundreds of miles away. Such stories need not be taken at face value. Even traditional theology admits that there can be no true bilocation, because to be in one place by definition means not to be elsewhere. All bilocation is, in fact, seeming bilocation. Explanations of seeming bilocation among the saints range from dismissal as pious imagination, to an appeal to unknown physical forces, to a belief in an authentic miracle where a person appears in a vision while located somewhere else.

While bilocation is discussed in some traditional manuals of spirituality, it is best treated with a healthy attitude of skepticism.

bination, the practice of having a priest preside at the celebration of the Eucharist twice on the same day. Ordinarily a priest may preside at the Eucharist only once a day, but if there is a pastoral need and too few priests, a priest may be given permission to celebrate twice a day or even three times a day (trination) on Sundays and feasts of obligation (can. 905).

binitarianism, the twentieth-century name for the belief that in God there are only two divine Persons, not three. In the NT, a binitarian understanding of God (1 Tim 2:5–6; Rom 4:24; 2 Cor 4:14) stands beside trinitarian statements (Matt 28:19; 2 Cor 13:13). While the former specify God as Father and Son, the latter profess belief in God as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. The Pneumatomachians ("Spirit-fighters") of the second through fourth centuries confessed belief in God as Father and Son, but refused to recognize the full divinity of the Holy Spirit. Their binitarianism was opposed by the First Council of Constantinople (381). In contemporary theology the term is applied to theological positions that deny either the divinity of the Holy Spirit or the divinity of Jesus Christ. See also Trinity, doctrine of the.

bioethics, an interdisciplinary field that probes the ethical dimensions of technological developments in the life sciences. It emerged as a distinct area of inquiry in the United States in the late 1960s and early 1970s. At that time, developments such as heart transplantation, withdrawal of life-sustaining treatment, genetic counseling, the definition of death, experimentation on human subjects, and allocation of scarce resources (especially dialysis) posed moral dilemmas at both individual and public policy levels. Individuals from a variety of disciplines—philosophy, theology, law, the social and biological sciences, and medicine—began to address these and other issues. Of the early players, theologians were among the most prominent (e.g., Joseph Fletcher, James Gustafson, Paul Ramsey, Seymour Siegel, Charles Curran, and Richard McCormick). Their involvement was natural because many of the questions raised by new biotechnological developments were of a religious nature. In addition, both the Catholic and Jewish traditions had long histories of attending to medical-moral matters. Within a relatively brief time, however, as the need arose for public discussion of the issues and for development of public policy, the disciplines of philosophy and law came to dominate the field. This shift greatly influenced the shape of bioethics in the United States. The field has been characterized by a preoccupation with individual rights, the application of universal principles to cases—particularly autonomy, beneficence, and justice—the development of procedures, rationalism, and a focus on problem solving. Since the late 1980s, however, bioethics has been undergoing a gradual transformation in its self-understanding, scope, and methodology.

While bioethics is a relatively new field of inquiry, reflection on moral issues related to the medical realm is not new to Catholicism. Patristic writers of the first centuries and authors of the penitential books of the sixth through eleventh centuries referred to actions having to do with sex and reproduction, particularly those considered sinful. With the development of manuals for confessors in the twelfth century and the increasing professionalization of medicine in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, particular attention was given to the moral obligations of physicians. By the seventeenth century, moral theology had become a discipline in its own right and developed its own textbooks. Within these, topics related to medicine were grouped under discussions of some of the commandments and virtues, the sacrament of Matrimony, and duties of various states of life. A new discipline evolved in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, generally referred to as "pastoral medicine." It included both medical treatises to assist rural pastors and theologians in their work, as well as theological treatises to assist physicians in understanding their ethical responsibilities and the spiritual dimensions of patient care. From the 1940s until the 1960s, throughout Western Europe and North America, the latter type of treatise evolved into a distinct subdiscipline of moral theology, medical ethics. This new discipline focused on an ethical analysis of routine medical procedures encountered by medical professionals. A. Bonnar, J. Healy, G. Kelly, J. P. Kenny, A. Niedermeyer, T. J. O'Donnell, and J. Paquin were among the many noteworthy authors of the time. Pope Pius XII also spoke and wrote extensively on medical moral topics during the 1940s and 1950s.

Prior to Vatican II (1962–65), Catholic medical ethics was characterized by a natural law approach that frequently considered natural biological processes as determinative of what is morally right and by the authoritative teaching of the Church on specific issues. Several principles generally guided moral reflection: sanctity of life, stewardship, the inseparability of the unitive and procreative aspects of intercourse, totality, cooperation, and double effect. Catholic medical ethics since Vatican II has been influenced by developments in the broader realm of moral theology resulting in a variety of methodologies in addition to the natural law approach. See also medical ethics; moral theology. RON P. HAMEL biretta (bir-ret'tah; Lat., birrus, "hooded cloak"), a black square cap worn by clerics. The biretta is four-cornered and topped by a tassel. Birettas coordinate with the color and style of cassock a cleric wears. They vary in color according to the rank of the priest. Cardinals may wear red birettas; bishops, purple; and priests, black. Together with the Roman collar, cassock, and surplice, the biretta traditionally completed the clerical uniform that is worn out of doors, or on pastoral calls. Birettas are no longer commonly worn by priests in the United States.

biritualism, the use of more than one liturgical tradition or rite in the celebration of liturgical services. In late antiquity, before the unification of liturgical usages into clearly distinct rites, there were biritual monasteries, especially in the Holy Land. Today the term generally refers to the practice of Catholic clergy who have received an indult from the Holy See to celebrate the liturgy in a rite other than their own, a practice open to abuse and ritual superficiality and often frowned upon by members of Eastern traditions, though the permission is granted only for pastoral reasons, not for personal gratification. See also Eastern rites; rite.

Biretta

birth control, the attempt to regulate and limit the procreative potential of human sexuality. "Birth control" is often used synonymously with "contraception," which in the Catholic tradition has been understood to mean an interference with the sexual act so that conception does not occur. Sterilization interferes with the sexual power or faculty to produce conception, as in vasectomy. However, in more popular usage contraception often includes sterilization, as illustrated in the often used term "contraceptive sterilization" to indicate the purpose of the sterilization or by the fact that the contraceptive or anovulant pill really constitutes a temporary sterilization, since it suppresses the procreative potential. This article speaks about contraception primarily in the narrow sense, but also logically includes contraceptive sterilization.

Contraception, or birth control, concerns the means to achieve family planning or responsible parenthood. Contraception is also employed in sexuality outside marriage, but this article concentrates on marital sexuality. The hierarchical magisterium teaches that Catholic couples should practice responsible parenthood, but artificial contraception is always wrong. However, the use of the sterile period (the rhythm method, natural family planning, the Billings method) is morally acceptable. Within the Catholic Church not all agree with this official hierarchical teaching.

Historical Development of the Teaching: The writings of John T. Noonan constitute the best source for understanding the historical development of Catholic teaching on contraception. No explicit condemnation of contraception exists in the Scriptures. Most scholars agree that the sin of Onan (Gen 38:8–10) consisted in disobeying his father and not in spilling his seed, even though the word "onanism" came to mean contraception. However, the Christian condemnation of artificial contraception arose quite early. Contraception in the form of coitus interruptus was known in the ancient world, as was the custom of taking some potions to prevent birth. In early Christian times contraception was often associated with prostitution and extramarital sexuality. Potions to prevent birth could also be used to induce abortion and sometimes were perceived to have some connection with magic or superstition. In this context the early Church, as illustrated in Clement of Alexandria (d. ca. 215), accepted the Stoic rule that the procreative purpose of marital sexuality opposed the wasting or damaging of the seed. The teaching arose as a middle position between two Gnostic extremes, one that opposed all use of sex, in imitation of Jesus, and the other that extolled the freedom to use sexuality in any manner. In the fourth century the very influential Augustine of Hippo supported the understanding of sexuality in marriage as justified only by the procreative purpose. Augustine himself, however, and many of the early Church writers held a rather negative view of human sexuality because, in their minds, original sin was transmitted through the sexual act itself, as illustrated by the power of concupiscence in sexuality. Developments in the understanding of marriage and of the meaning of human sexuality occurred among theologians and canonists in medieval and later times with a recognition that procreation was not the exclusive lawful purpose for initiating marital intercourse. Many values such as pleasure and health were mentioned; love was increased through sexual acts, although marital love was not directly related to coitus; procreation included the educational and economic welfare of existing children. Such reasons could justify continence. But the condemnation of contraception remained, with emphasis on contraception's violating the order of nature, which called for the depositing of male semen in the vas of the female. This condemnation also served as the basis for the condemnation of other sexual acts, such as masturbation, and any other type of intercourse, such as anal or oral. The Catholic condemnation of contraception was shared by the Orthodox Church in the East and by Protestants in the West as well as by society at large.

Developments Outside Catholicism: In 1798 Thomas Malthus published his influential An Essay on the Principle of Population, which proposed to check population growth by moral restraints, such as postponing the age for marriage, but did not recommend or consider contraception. Others soon recommended contraception. Proponents of birth control (e.g., Margaret Sanger) ran into strong opposition well into the twentieth century. In the 1950s and 1960s most families in the United States used birth control. The global population explosion gave greater urgency to the use of contraception throughout the world. Truly by the present time a contraceptive revolution has occurred.

The Church of England, at the Lambeth Conference in 1930, became the first church in the West to accept officially the morality of artificial contraception. Soon Protestant churches in the United States and throughout the world strongly supported family planning and birth control. The Eastern Orthodox Church today also accepts contraception as a means of responsible parenthood within marriage.

Many factors help to explain the widespread acceptance of contraception by the 1960s. Developments in medicine and especially public health care of mothers and children dramatically increased the life expectancy of all human beings and especially of young children. The industrial revolution and urban growth created an environment unlike the earlier rural environment in which children tended to be an economic asset. Problems of poverty abounded in the new urban cultures. The role of women changed, with women having more say in family matters and also entering into the workforce in large numbers. Demography pointed out the growing problem of overpopulation in many parts of the world. The introduction of better and more efficient means of contraception significantly influenced the entire development. In the 1950s drug companies introduced progesterone or anovulant pills, which prevent conception by preventing ovulation in women. Later the IUD (intrauterine device) was introduced.

Catholic Reaction to These Developments: Many Catholic couples, especially in France in the early nineteenth century, apparently used contraception. Official Catholic teaching condemned such use, but Pope Leo XIII in his major encyclical on marriage (Arcanum Divinae Sapientiae, 1880) did not even mention contraception. Pope Pius XI in 1930 issued his encyclical Casti Connubii, implicitly responding to the Lambeth Conference, and strongly condemned artificial contraception as intrinsically against nature, since the spouses deliberately deprive the act of its natural ordering to the generation of offspring. Some influential theologians maintain that the pope here proclaimed infallible Church teaching, but the majority refuse to see the teaching as infallible. Pope Pius XII (1939–58) continued to reaffirm strongly the teaching of his predecessor, but his 1951 Address to Midwives sanctioned the use of rhythm or the use of the infertile period when serious medical, eugenic, economic, or social reasons indicate that births should be regulated or avoided. In 1958 he condemned the anovulant pill when used for contraceptive purposes.

The 1960s and Humanae Vitae: Before 1963 no Catholic theologian had ever publicly questioned the magisterium's teaching on artificial contraception. But developments were occurring in the 1960s on many fronts. In 1963 Dr. John Rock, the Catholic physician who helped develop the anovulant pill, wrote a book advocating that the Church accept the pill. In late 1963 and early 1964, Louis Janssens in Belgium, William van der Mark in Holland, Bishop Joseph Mary Reuss in Germany, and Louis Dupré in the United States all called for some change in Church teaching. More theologians and laity joined the growing call for change; some bishops, especially in Holland, seemed very open to change.

On June 23, 1964, Pope Paul VI publicly called attention to the existence of a special commission, originally appointed by John XXIII, that was studying the question of birth control with a mandate to report back to him. During the debates of the Second Vatican Council some council fathers spoke in an open way about change on this issue. Pope Paul VI took the matter of contraception out of the council in the light of the existence of his special commission, but some intense jockeying for position took place in the drafting of the council documents on the family. The long fifth session of the commission meeting in the spring of 1966 produced two theological working papers, one representing the conservative minority and the other the liberal majority. A third document favoring change apparently constituted the official report from the commission to the pope. The bishops on the final commission voted nine in favor, three against, and three doubtful about this document. The National Catholic Reporter obtained the three documents mentioned above and published them in April 1967.

On July 29, 1968, Pope Paul VI released his encyclical Humanae Vitae, which reiterated the condemnation of artificial contraception. The encyclical calls for responsible parenthood and again approves the use of the sterile or infertile period. "[The] Church, calling men back to the observance of the norms of the natural law as interpreted by her constant doctrine, teaches that each and every marriage act must remain open to the transmission of life." The document rejects the positions defended by advocates for a change in the teaching. Evil consequences from contraception would lead to moral laxity and harm the ideal of Christian marriage. The encyclical gives pastoral directives, which among other aspects recognize the pressures faced by married couples and imply that the failure to live up to the teaching might not always be gravely sinful.

Pope Paul VI himself spoke of the lively discussion touched off by Humanae Vitae. Others have spoken of a crisis. Immediately after the encyclical, national conferences of bishops issued statements supporting the papal teaching, but commentators point out three generic approaches found in these different statements. On the right, some bishops' conferences asserted without any qualification that disobedience to the teaching of the encyclical is seriously wrong for Catholics. The U.S. Catholic bishops in their letter "Human Life in Our Day" illustrated the center position. The U.S. bishops recognized the pressures and circumstances that might reduce the moral guilt of those who use contraception. The U.S. pastoral letter affirmed a presumption in favor of noninfallible teaching but also recognized the legitimacy of public theological dissent from such teaching under certain conditions. However, the U.S. bishops did not explicitly endorse the legitimacy of dissent in this case. On the left, some bishops' conferences maintained that after serious study and reflection a Catholic could dissent from the encyclical's teaching on contraception.

The majority of Catholic moral theologians writing and speaking on the topic in the United States and throughout the world have expressed some dissent from the teaching of Humanae Vitae. The dissenting theologians disagreed with the neo-Scholastic natural law theory employed by the encyclical, especially its physicalism whereby the human moral act is identified with the physical structure of the act. For the good of the person or the marriage itself couples should be able to interfere with the sexual act. Many dissenting theologians point out that this teaching belongs in the category of noninfallible teaching and sufficient reasons exist to justify dissent both in theory and in practice. The issue of natural law and of the role of authoritative hierarchical teaching have since come to the fore in the discussion of many other moral and social issues.

A smaller number of theologians have strongly defended the encyclical's reasoning and its conclusions. Germain Grisez, an American Catholic philosopher, and others have adopted a new understanding of natural law to see the malice of contraception as directly going against the basic human good of procreation. Grisez and some others also claim that the teaching of the encyclical is infallible, not based on the encyclical itself but on the fact that its teaching has been taught infallibly by all the bishops of the world.

Catholic laity have increasingly disagreed in practice with the teaching. According to the studies of the National Opinion Research Center in 1963, 45 percent of U.S. Catholics approved of artificial contraception for married couples; in 1974 the figure rose to 83 percent. In practice most confessors do not seem to regard contraception as a major issue. Some sociologists (e.g., Andrew M. Greeley) claim that the encyclical was the reason for massive apostasy and for a notable decline in Catholic religious devotion and belief. On the other hand, natural family planning (NFP), especially with the Billings method, has many adherents who praise it as an effective way of regulating birth that requires the cooperation of husband and wife and does not put the woman at unnecessary risk. Pope John Paul II continued into the 1990s to stress the condemnation of artificial contraception. Dissent by many in practice seems to be somewhat tolerated, but no official acceptance of such dissent has ever been made and some theological dissenters have been censured. Most lay Catholics today seem to have made their conscientious decision for contraception and are at peace with it. However, the credibility of the Church remains at stake because of the gap between hierarchical teaching and pastoral practice.

Additional Issues: Birth control, or contraception, involves many other moral issues. The Catholic tradition has recognized that the condemnation applied to voluntary sexual relations does not apply to involuntary relations, as illustrated by the fact that after rape a woman may attempt to prevent conception.

All recognize that contraception has given human beings more power to control their lives, but power can be abused. Historically, women have borne a disproportionate share of the burden of contraception and of the medical risk connected with it (e.g., the anovulant pill, the IUD, tubal ligation). The strong and the wealthy can often use the power of contraception against the weak and the poor. Some population programs have suffered because of this fact. Even advocates of birth control today generally see voluntary use as the ideal, but government programs of education, incentives, and at times even some limited coercion have been accepted.

The ready availability of contraception has undoubtedly aided the so-called sexual revolution, the growing acceptance of sexual relationships outside marriage, and more irresponsible sexual relations. Proponents of birth control respond that such abuse does not justify doing away with the proper and good use of contraception.

The moral issue of contraceptive use arises very acutely in nonmarital sexuality. Catholic teaching sees sexual relationships in the context of marriage and does not accept any form of nonmarital sexuality. Many blame the ready accessibility of contraception for encouraging nonmarital sexuality and oppose efforts to provide contraceptive information and devices to young people to prevent both pregnancy and diseases such as AIDS. Other Catholics apply the accepted principle of counseling the lesser of two evils to this question. Young people are probably going to be sexually active anyway, and it is a lesser evil to use means to make sure pregnancy and/or sexually transmitted diseases do not occur. The issue of birth control thus has many aspects and continues to spark a lively debate within Catholicism. See also Humanae Vitae; infallibility; magisterium; sexual morality.

Bibliography

Hoyt, Robert G., ed. The Birth Control Debate. Kansas City, MO: National Catholic Reporter, 1968.

Kaiser, Robert Blair. The Politics of Sex and Religion: A Case History in the Development of Doctrine. Kansas City, MO: Leaven Press, 1985.

Noonan, John T., Jr. Contraception: A History of Its Treatment by the Catholic Theologians and Canonists. Enlarged ed. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, Belknap Press, 1986.

Shannon, William H. The Lively Debate: Response to Humanae Vitae. New York: Sheed and Ward, 1970.

CHARLES E. CURRAN

bishop, a priest who enjoys "the fullness of the sacrament of orders" (Decree on the Bishops' Pastoral Office in the Church, n. 15), usually the pastoral leader of a diocese. There are diocesan bishops (also known as ordinaries), who exercise the ministry of "supervision" or "oversight" (Gk., episkopos); and titular bishops, who are either auxiliary bishops, that is, assistants to the diocesan bishop, or coadjutor bishops, that is, assistants to the diocesan bishop but with special faculties and the right of succession (see cans. 376; 381; 403).

Bishops have no clear identity or function in the NT. The word episkopos (pl., episkopoi) occurs only five times (Acts 20:28; Phil 1:1; 1 Tim 3:2; Titus 1:7; 1 Pet 2:25) and seems interchangeable with the title of elder (presbyteros) as in Acts 20:17, 28; 1 Tim 3:2, 5:17; Titus 1:5; and 1 Pet 5:1–3. In some local churches the elders seemed to have formed ruling councils, as in Judaism, and designated one of their own as council president, with specific supervisory responsibilities. Although the task of supervision touched matters of administration, it was primarily concerned with the spiritual realm, namely, with the unity of the local church within itself and with the wider community of churches, and with the transmission of the faith received from the apostles.

A bishop administers the sacrament of Confirmation.

The bishop's role as presider over the Eucharist was so important during the first centuries that when the Sunday Eucharist was presided over by one of the presbyters, a piece of the eucharistic bread consecrated by the bishop in his cathedral was placed into the chalice. As the Church grew numerically and geographically, it became impossible for the bishop to preside over every Eucharist in his local community, so the presbyters (priests) increasingly assumed this function. Today in the Western Church the only function specifically reserved to the bishop is that of ordination to the priesthood and the diaconate.

The rite of ordination notes that the "title of bishop is not one of honor but of function." Since the end of the second century diocesan bishops have exercised three principal functions: teaching (through preaching and explanation of the faith); leading, or shepherding (maintaining the unity of the local church); and sanctifying (through priestly and sacramental ministry). Among these duties, "the preaching of the gospel occupies an eminent place" (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 25).

In the earliest centuries bishops were never transferred to other dioceses. They remained forever the pastor of the local church for which they had been ordained. The creation of titular bishops was another major change from the practice of the early centuries when only one bishop at a time served in a local church.

Moreover, bishops were never regarded as bishops unto themselves, so to speak. By ordination a bishop becomes a member of the college of bishops, whose head is the Bishop of Rome (the pope). The bishops, however, are not vicars of the Bishop of Rome; they are vicars of Jesus Christ himself (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 27). See also Decree on the Bishops' Pastoral Office in the Church; episcopacy.

RICHARD P. MCBRIEN

Bishop, Edmund, 1846–1917, liberal English Catholic liturgical scholar, originally Anglican. A civil servant with no university education, Bishop was a self-taught historian and liturgiologist who spent all his free time in the British Museum and other libraries in Europe, becoming an unequaled connoisseur of liturgical sources. A brilliant writer of considerable acumen and originality, Bishop favored hard-nosed Cambridge scholarship, disdained the Oxford liturgiologists, and did not hesitate to take on accepted theories or their prestigious promoters. His judgment was usually as sure as it was sober. His essays appended to R. H. Connolly's The Liturgical Homilies of Narsai (1909) and the posthumous anthology Liturgica Historica (1918) contain the best of Bishop's writings. A promoter of the English Benedictine revival at Downside, where he is buried, and antagonistic to the Jesuits, Bishop sympathized with many aspects of the Modernist movement and deplored the obscurantism and exaggerated Ultramontanism of its generally far less capable opponents.

bishops, appointment of, the process by which an individual is selected to be ordained a bishop. The process is governed by special norms for the Latin church, and by special laws for the Eastern Catholic churches.

For the Latin church the bishops in a province regularly discuss potential candidates for bishop and draw up a list, which they forward to the Apostolic See through the papal representative (apostolic delegate or papal nuncio).

For the naming of a diocesan bishop or a coadjutor (a bishop who assists the diocesan bishop and has the right to succeed him in office), the papal representative conducts an investigation into the needs of the diocese, the qualifications needed in a new bishop, and the suggestions of bishops in the province for candidates. He does a background check on names under consideration. In addition to the bishops of the province, selected priests and laypersons may also be consulted—all in secret and through individual contacts, not by consulting with groups of people.

The resulting list of three names, called the terna, is forwarded by the papal representative to the Congregation for Bishops, together with a profile of the diocese, background information on each individual, and the papal representative's recommendation. The congregation reviews the candidates, consults with other departments of the Roman Curia, and makes a final recommendation to the pope. The pope makes the final selection.

The papal representative contacts the candidate to ask his acceptance of the appointment. If the candidate consents, he must keep the matter secret until the appointment is announced at the Vatican and by the papal representative. The new bishop has three months to be consecrated, and four months to take charge (possession) of the diocese.

In some countries civil authorities have a voice in the process, either to veto potential candidates or to propose their own terna. The Holy See is gradually rescinding these arrangements. Some European dioceses retain the centuries-old process of selection in which the chapter of canons (similar to the college of consultors) selects the terna, or selects one individual from a terna submitted to them by the Holy See.

The naming of auxiliary bishops is less complicated. The diocesan bishop requesting an auxiliary draws up the list of three names. The Congregation for Bishops reviews the list, and the pope makes the final selection.

In Eastern Catholic churches a similar process is followed for dioceses that are outside the traditional patriarchal territories (e.g., outside Egypt and the Middle East), although if the church has a patriarch, a suggested terna is developed by the patriarch with the Patriarchal Synod.

Patriarchs themselves are selected by the Patriarchal Synod and enthroned (installed) by the synod. Patriarchs must exchange letters of communion with the Apostolic See before they can exercise their office fully.

In Eastern churches headed by a major archbishop the Archiepiscopal Synod elects the archbishop. To be enthroned, he needs letters of communion from the Apostolic See. See also bishop.

JAMES H. PROVOST

bishops, college of, the body of bishops headed by the pope who succeed the college of the apostles in teaching authority and pastoral governance in the Church.

One becomes a member of the college by ordination as a bishop and hierarchical communion with the college's head (the pope) and members. This applies to bishops in charge of dioceses (diocesan bishops), titular bishops (who usually assist diocesan bishops or exercise some office in service to the Church, such as in the Roman Curia), and retired bishops (emeritus bishops).

The college exercises supreme authority in the Church when it acts in an ecumenical council or by collegial action of the bishops scattered around the world acting together with the pope. Usually the pope, as head of the college, determines how it will act, although historically others have taken the initiative, and the action is considered collegial once it is accepted or received by the pope.

Members of the college are expected to show solicitude or mutual concern for all the other members of the college, to assist each other in their pastoral charge in the Church, and to foster the missionary work of the Church everywhere. At times members of the college gather in organized groups to promote this work; for example, in episcopal conferences, particular councils, etc. While these are not actions of the whole college, they do express the collegial bond among bishops and their shared responsibilities as college members. See also bishop; collegiality; communion, Church as.

JAMES H. PROVOST

Bismarck, Otto von, 1815–98, the first chancellor of Germany. A Prussian conservative, he was able to bypass south German Catholic particularism by appealing to nationalism in a war against France in 1870; this led to the creation of modern Germany in 1871. The particularism did not die, however, and the Catholic Center party emerged as the single most powerful political bloc, partly as a result of Bismarck's attack on the Church known as the Kulturkampf (Ger., "culture struggle"). See also Kulturkampf.

black Catholics, Catholics of African descent, also known as African-American Catholics. It would be inaccurate to limit the history of black Catholics to the twentieth century. To do so would disregard the African origins of Sts. Augustine, Benedict the Moor, Moses the Black, and Felicitas, and three popes—Victor I, Militiades, and Gelasius I. It would also overlook the mid-sixteenth-century reappearance of the Church in Africa with the Portuguese, in what is now known as Angola, during the rule of King Alfonso. In the New World, the presence and sacramental lives of hundreds of black Catholics are recorded in the parochial registers in the oldest Spanish colonial settlement in the United States, St. Augustine, Florida, from 1565 to 1763.

Nineteenth Century: The roots of the contemporary movement among black Catholics in the United States lay in the nineteenth century. From 1889 until 1894, under the leadership of Daniel Rudd, black Catholic laity created and sustained a national intellectual and social movement to urge their Church to address the spiritual and temporal needs of black Catholics.

A survey conducted by the 1889 congress of American black Catholics revealed the Church's participation in national customs of segregation, discrimination, and benign neglect. Black Catholic membership in the United States stood at approximately two hundred thousand out of a black population of roughly seven million. There were twenty churches, each with its own primary school; sixty-five other schools providing instruction for approximately five thousand children; and nine orphanages. There were about 150 sisters in two institutes. An early effort to begin a religious congregation of black women, the Sisters of Loretto, failed in 1824. The first successful foundation of a group of black religious women, in 1829, was the Oblate Sisters of Providence in Baltimore, Maryland; it was led by Elizabeth Lange. Henriette Delille and Juliette Gaudin were the founding members of the Sisters of the Holy Family in New Orleans, Louisiana, in 1842. The third community of black sisters, the Franciscan Handmaids of Mary, was founded in 1916 in Savannah, Georgia. Seven young black men were enrolled in Catholic seminaries—a marked improvement over the treatment given Father Augustus Tolton (1854–97), who is generally recognized as the first black American Catholic priest. Since no American seminary would admit him, Tolton prepared for ordination in Rome (1882–86).

Matters discussed by the congresses included civil rights for blacks; the end of racial discrimination in housing, the trades, unions, and professions; the study of African history; cultural development; industrial training and all types of education; ongoing religious instruction for the laity; recruitment of vocations to the religious life and priesthood; and just and equal treatment in the Church.

Twentieth Century: The first renewal of a movement among black Catholics dates from the work of Dr. Thomas Wyatt Turner, who in 1924 established the Federated Colored Catholics (FCC)—an action-oriented lay group, dedicated to ending racial discrimination within Church and society. This period also witnessed the founding, in 1925 by Katherine Drexel, of Xavier University of New Orleans, the only black Catholic university in the United States, and the organization of the fraternal and benevolent society, the Knights of Peter Claver.

The second renewal arose in 1968 in response to the frustration and anger that swept the country at the assassination of Martin Luther King, Jr. Meeting in Detroit in April 1968, a group of black Catholic priests charged that their Church was racist. They called upon the Church to abandon its silence and seize an active moral role in eradicating discrimination and racism. The National Black Catholic Clergy Caucus (NBCCC) and the National Black Sisters' Conference (NBSC) were formed as a result of this meeting. Within two years, the National Office for Black Catholics (NOBC), the National Black Seminarians Association (NBSA), and the National Black Lay Catholic Caucus (NBLCC) were also formed.

Contemporary black Catholics continue to express concerns similar to those of their nineteenth century counterparts. Since the late 1960s some positive changes can be reported, due to the establishment and staffing of national offices of various black organizations, especially those of the NOBC and NBSC, and the gradual emergence of a small cadre of black Catholic scholars in the ecclesiastical disciplines. The NBSC, NOBC, and NBLCC developed and directed workshops and institutes (1) to introduce insights of black culture and black theology; (2) to support ministry to black parishes and social programs; (3) to foster lay leadership and spiritual formation, and (4) to combat racism in the Church. The creative genius of the Reverend Clarence Joseph Rivers led the NOBC to conduct workshops on liturgical adaptation. Such efforts laid the groundwork for the 1987 publication of Lead Me, Guide Me: The African American Catholic Hymnal. In 1979, encouraged by its black members, the Catholic bishops issued a pastoral letter on racism, "Brothers and Sisters to Us." And in 1984 the black bishops themselves issued a pastoral letter on evangelization, "What We Have Seen and Heard." In 1987, the first black Catholic congress in the twentieth century was held in Washington, D.C., and in that same year the NCCB created the Secretariat for African American Catholics.

As of 1993 black Catholics in the United States numbered about 2.5 million, including twelve members of the episcopacy; five hundred sisters; and six hundred priests, permanent deacons, vowed religious brothers, and seminarians. See also Africa, Catholicism in. M. SHAWN COPELAND black fast, penitential practice involving abstinence from all food and drink except bread and water. Such a fast was either a voluntary act of devotion, a religious practice in a particular monastery or convent on certain days, or, in the early Church, an imposed penance for a determined period and for specific faults. See also abstinence; fasting.

Black Friars. See Dominican order.

black Mass, traditional term for the Mass for the Dead (so named because of the black vestments worn by the priest); also a parody of the Eucharist that developed with the rise of Satanism after the twelfth century. Before Vatican II (1962–65), all funerals were celebrated in black vestments. In the 1990s, white is used to remind us of the joy of the Resurrection. See also Mass.

Black Monks. See Benedictine order.

Blaise, St. (blayz), early-fourth-century martyr. He is counted as one of the "Fourteen Holy Helpers," a group of saints who were popular objects of devotion in Germany in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. The list included Barbara, Christopher, and Erasmus. He is thought to have been from Armenia, but events in his life are considered legendary. One story that has him helping a person with a bone caught in the throat is the origin of the custom of having throats blessed on his feast day. In art he is often depicted with a wool-comb, which is thought to have been the instrument of his torture before his beheading. Feast day: February 3. See also throats, blessing of.

Blanchet, François N. (blahn-shay'), 1795–1883, priest and missionary to the Pacific Northwest. After several years as a missionary in the Oregon Territory, he was chosen to be the first archbishop of Oregon City in 1846. He worked tirelessly to promote the spread of Catholicism in the Pacific Northwest by securing personnel and resources from Europe. To facilitate work with Native Americans, he founded the Bureau of Catholic Indian Missions and copyrighted the "Catholic Ladder," an important catechetical tool for Native Americans.

Blase, St. See Blaise, St.

blasphemy, contemptuous language to or about God. In the OT it is punishable by stoning (Lev 24:16). In the NT it is one of the evils that defile a person (Mark 7:21–23; Matt 15:19–20). Jesus' claim to be the Messiah (Matt 26:64–65) and Son of God (John 10:31–36) was considered blasphemous. The attribution of Jesus' authority over demons to Beelzebub is regarded as blasphemy "against the Holy Spirit" (Mark 3:28–29; Luke 12:10), an unforgivable sin. Paul's pre-Christian activity is characterized as blasphemous (1 Tim 1:13); after his conversion his opponents attack and punish him (Acts 13:45; 18:6). The beast will utter blasphemy against God and his saints (Rev 13:1–6). The NT warns against blasphemy (2 Tim 3:2; 2 Pet 2:2) and promises divine judgment upon it (Rev 16:9, 11). Thomas Aquinas regarded blasphemy as a sin against faith by which one attributes to God that which does not belong to God or denies God that which is God's due. In moral theology it is a sin against the virtue of religion.

blessed. See beatification.

Blessed Sacrament, the term used to refer to the Eucharist as preeminent among the seven sacraments. It often more narrowly refers to the consecrated bread as it is reserved outside the celebration of the Eucharist.

Before the twelfth century, the sacred species was reserved privately to be administered to the sick in emergencies. During that century there was significant development of the doctrine of the Real Presence. Accompanying this development was the desire on the part of the faithful to see and worship Christ present in the sacrament.

The liturgical renewal following the Second Vatican Council emphasizes the Eucharist as an action. This has had a number of implications for the reservation of the Blessed Sacrament. The first of these is the stress that is placed on the primary and original reason for reserving the sacred species, that is, the administration of Communion to the sick and dying. Distribution of Communion outside of Mass and the adoration of Jesus Christ as really present under the appearance of bread are secondary reasons.

A hospitalized Catholic receives the Blessed Sacrament from a priest.

Another implication is that the relationship of the Blessed Sacrament to the action of the Mass is always to be made clear. For example, exposition should not occur during the celebration of Mass, and when it occurs after the Mass, the host should be one consecrated at that Mass.

Congregations are also encouraged to place the tabernacle formerly located on the main altar in some appropriate place apart from that altar. These changes notwithstanding, adoration of the Blessed Sacrament is still an approved form of eucharistic devotion. See also Eucharist; eucharistic devotions; Real Presence.

Blessed Sacrament, exposition of the. See exposition of the Blessed Sacrament.

Blessed Virgin Mary. See Mary, Blessed Virgin.

blessing, a liturgical expression of God's generosity and love. Blessings are sacramental signs used by the Church to make holy various objects and occasions in human life. In the Bible, blessings have two aspects: they call down God's gifts on the people and in turn express the people's thanks for the gifts thus bestowed. These two aspects of blessing are found most perfectly in the Eucharist, and the Church's action in other sanctifying prayers is an extension of that central action. A prayer of blessing is accompanied by the raising of the right hand, and the sign of the cross is usually made over the congregation, an individual, or the object being blessed. See also sign of the cross.

Blondel, Maurice (blahn-del'), 1861–1949, French Catholic philosopher. He sought to overcome the division between philosophy and theology without denying philosophy its proper autonomy. L'Action, his doctoral thesis, traced the workings of the human will and its inability to find a natural object equal to its striving. This implied an openness in the human person to the supernatural destiny ascribed to it by Christianity. His work was important to twentieth-century Catholic theology, apologetics, and social action because it challenged conceptions of the supernatural that separated grace from the everyday world and made Christianity seem detached from life, art, and politics. See also philosophy and theology; supernatural.

blood of Christ, the blood that Jesus shed on the cross in atonement for the sins of humankind, and that which is received sacramentally in Holy Communion. In the Bible, blood is identified with the whole living person, not just what flows through the body's veins and arteries. By shedding his blood for the human race, Jesus purchased its eternal redemption (Heb 9:12), for "without the shedding of blood there is no forgiveness of sins" (9:22). By his blood Jesus made expiation for our sins (Rom 3:25), cleansed us (Heb 9:14; 1 John 1:7), purified and delivered us (1 Pet 1:2), sanctified us (Heb 13:12), and justified us (Rom 5:9). The Church has given a eucharistic meaning to the words Jesus said at the Last Supper, "This cup that is poured out for you is the new covenant in my blood" (Luke 22:20). We share in the blood of Christ, and therefore in his life, through the eucharistic cup of blessing (1 Cor 10:16). See also atonement, biblical view of; atonement, doctrine of; Body of Christ; Communion, Holy; crucifixion; expiation; mixed chalice; Precious Blood, devotion to the; propitiation; redemption; sacrifice; unmixed chalice.

boat, incense, the small liturgical vessel used for holding incense. The boat has long been used in art and literature as a symbol of the Church, because several of the first disciples were fishermen. The Church of Rome has often been referred to as the Bark (or Boat) of Peter. See also incense.

Bobbio, monastery in northern Italy. It was founded by the Irish abbot and missionary Columbanus after his expulsion from Gaul in 610 for his criticisms of the royal court and about a year before his death in 615. Guided by able and scholarly abbots, it became an important center of learning with a remarkable library. See also Columbanus, St.

Bobola, St. Andrew (boh'boh-lah), 1591–1657, Polish Jesuit priest. Preacher and director of sodalities (church organizations that promote personal piety and charitable acts), he dedicated himself to pastoral ministries in war-filled Poland. When he was captured by Cossacks and refused to repudiate the Apostolic See (i.e., the papacy), he was tortured and beheaded. Feast day: May 16.

Böckle, Franz, 1921–91, German moral theologian noted for his emphasis on the contingent nature of ethical norms due to the complexities of the human condition.

body. See mind/body.

Incense boat

body, resurrection of the. See resurrection of the body.

body and spirituality. Fundamental to a Catholic understanding of the relationship between human bodiliness and spirituality is the conviction that the bodily and the spiritual belong together. They are not separate realms. The human person is one being in reality. To be holy is to be whole, an integrated person or self. The desire for wholeness is a deep longing of the human heart.

Catholic spirituality affirms the sacramentality of the human body, recognizing it as a sacrament of God's presence and grace. The body receives and expresses the life and love of God. Lived creatively and compassionately, human bodiliness manifests God through feeling, gesture, movement, song, sexuality, speech, stillness of being, and loving action.

A spirituality that proclaims the sacramentality of the body has a strong component of justice. It rejects discrimination against persons who are different. It espouses basic bodily rights for all: the right to adequate food, shelter, clothing, health care, and an environment free from domestic, institutional, or military violence. Recognizing the human body as part of the created order, it promotes ecological awareness to oppose exploitation of the earth and its resources.

A spirituality that values the human body honors the intrinsic relationship between the sensual and the spiritual. It regards sexuality as an expression of God's love in life, a gift to be lived responsibly and sensitively. The integration of sexuality and spirituality is an essential aspect of Christian life.

Catholic and Christian spirituality begins with the mystery of God-made-flesh. From this central tenet, one derives affirmation of the sacredness of the human body, care for one's own physicality, and concern for the well-being of the bodies of others. The God who assumed humanity in the person of Jesus continues to do so in the People of God. The Risen Christ is manifest in and through human bodies. See also sacramentality, principle of; spirituality, Christian. COLLEEN M. GRIFFITH

Body of Christ, term referring to the ways that Christ is present to humanity and to the world. It has a spectrum of interrelated meanings derived from the human body of the historical Jesus. That human body has not been destroyed by death; the risen and glorified Jesus still possesses it at the right hand of God. The mystery of the Father's raising of Jesus means that Jesus will always be one with humankind, but now in a glorified or transformed humanity, i.e., one completely receptive to, and permeated by, the Spirit.

The post-Resurrection appearance narratives of the NT, particularly those of Luke and John, highlight the physical features of Christ's resurrected body, the corporeal reality of the risen Christ. The continuity between the crucified body and the risen body means that Jesus has moved into a divine dimension of existence and yet at the same time, in a very real sense, he remains entirely in this world, though in a new way given him by God. Paul speaks of the risen body as soma pneumatikon (Gk.), "spiritual body" (1 Cor 15:44), by which he does not mean some sort of spiritualized matter or ephemeral substance, but a body existing in the domain of the Spirit. Christ's body, now suffused with the light of God's glory, is the foundation for a new creation. Thus it can be said that the Eucharist is truly the body of Christ; and so, too, is the Church, the place where Christ dwells in the midst of his people, the Body of Christ.

The notion of the body of Christ as present both in the Church and in the Eucharist is developed in the Pauline writings, particularly in 1 Corinthians, Romans, Ephesians, and Colossians. For Paul, Christians constitute one body of Christ, for there is one bread and one body (1 Cor 10:16). As the body is one, so members of the body are one in Christ (Rom 12:5). The Eucharist is a participation in the body of Christ; partaking reinforces union with the Lord Jesus (1 Cor 10:17).

The concept of sharing life with the Lord and with other participants is not a metaphor for Paul; it is real, verging on the physical. Christ and the Church are one person in a real unity so close that it can only be called his Body.

The later Letters (Ephesians and Colossians) expand these ideas and stress the notion of the Church as the fullness of the Body of Christ. Christ is now called the head from whom the whole Body is nourished.

As eucharistic practice changed in the history of the Church, the link between the Church as the Body of Christ and the Eucharist as body of Christ became weaker. But Vatican II (1962–65) retrieved these biblical images and gathered them together once again in the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 7. See also blood of Christ; Church; Eucharist.

KATHLEEN CANNON

Boethius, St. Severinus, ca. 480–524, translator (from Greek into Latin), philosopher, theologian, and Roman statesman. Anicius Manlius Severinus Boethius planned to translate and comment on all of Plato and Aristotle and to show, in Neoplatonic fashion, that their teachings were in harmony (though he preferred Plato's); however, he did not get past Aristotle's treatises on logic, which remained the only Aristotelian texts the Middle Ages knew until the twelfth century. His translation of Porphyry's Isagoge transmitted the problem of universals to medieval thinkers. His theological tractates have enjoyed almost unrivaled authority in matters pertaining to the Trinity and the Incarnation; especially significant was his defining "person" as an individual substance of a rational nature. He composed his best-known work, The Consolation of Philosophy, in a prison near Pavia while awaiting execution, allegedly for treason; this purely philosophical discussion of the problem of evil has had an enormous influence on speculation about God's eternity and about divine foreknowledge and human freedom. Because religious differences among the Eastern empire, Italians, and the Arian king Theodoric seem to have played some part in Boethius's downfall, Pavians have long venerated him as a martyr. Feast day: October 23. See also Aristotle; evil; Incarnation, the; Person, divine; Trinity, doctrine of the.

Boff, Leonardo, b. 1938, a leading exponent of Latin American liberation theology. A native of Brazil and a former Franciscan priest, he has long been concerned with developing an ecclesiology and a Christology for the Latin American church. Boff's theology is permeated by a sacramental view of creation. The 1981 publication Church, Charism and Power, in which he outlined an ecclesiology based on gifts rather than hierarchical structures, led to his being silenced by Rome for a year. Exasperated by the Vatican's persistent efforts to restrict his work, Boff left the Franciscan order and the priesthood in 1992. See also liberation theology.

Bogomils, heretical dualist sect despising matter and its creator as evil and extolling spirit as good. Founded by Bogomil (Bulgarian, "beloved of God") in Bulgaria in the tenth century, they influenced the Cathari. Once widespread in the Balkans, most eventually converted either to Catholicism or Islam. See also dualism.

Bohachevsky, Constantine, 1884–1961, U.S.

Ukrainian Catholic bishop. He was born in Ukraine, ordained priest in 1909, and became bishop in 1924, named apostolic exarch for Ukrainian Catholics in the United States. In 1959, when the exarchate was raised to a metropolitan province, he became the first metropolitan of Philadelphia for the Ukrainians.

Bollandists, group of Jesuit editors of the Acta Sanctorum, a collection of saints' lives. Organized by Jean Bolland (1596–1665) in Antwerp, Belgium, they sought to prepare accurate lives of the saints without legendary or apocryphal material and were influential in the development of modern manuscript studies because of their diligence. Their most famous scholar was Daniel von Papenbrock (d. 1714). Disbanded with the suppression of the Jesuits in 1773, they resumed work in 1837 and continue to publish Acta Bollandiana, a journal of hagiographical information. See also saints.

Bonaventure, St., ca. 1217–74, Franciscan friar, theologian, and Doctor of the Church, known as the "Seraphic Doctor."

Life and Writings: Bonaventure was born at Bagnoregio in the Papal States and christened Giovanni di Fidanza. He studied in the faculty of arts at the University of Paris, where he entered the Franciscan order about 1243. His precocious talent was immediately apparent, and he began to teach publicly in the Franciscan school in 1248, becoming regent master in 1254–55, a time when the university was torn by the bitter quarrel between the secular masters and the mendicants. His writings from this period include his Commentary on the Sentences of Peter Lombard, three biblical commentaries, a series of sophisticated disputed questions, and a theological handbook, the Breviloquium.

Bonaventure, the greatest Franciscan theologian in the history of the Church, at his own funeral in 1274, the same year Thomas Aquinas died; painting by Zurbaran, Louvre, Paris.

Bonaventure's academic tenure was brief, for in 1257 he was elected minister general of an increasingly divided Franciscan order. In this capacity he provided both intelligent and conciliatory leadership for seventeen years, his work shaping the fundamental directions of the order for generations. He systematically codified the general constitutions governing the fractious brotherhood and composed a Life of St. Francis, which became the official biography of the founder in 1266. Most of the writings of his generalate are defenses of the mendicant way of life or spiritual treatises, including the celebrated Journey of the Soul into God. Still, Bonaventure continued to make his primary residence in Paris and so remained active in the intellectual developments there, chiefly through a series of university sermons. His advice was much in demand by the popes of the period, eventually leading to his appointment as cardinal-bishop of Albano in 1273. He took a prominent part in organizing the Second Council of Lyons in 1274, dying while it was in session. Bonaventure's exemplary Franciscan life and the abiding influence of his thought in the Western Church were recognized by his canonization in 1482 and his being declared a Doctor of the Church in 1588.

Thought: Bonaventure's thought is a highly original if eclectic synthesis of historical sources—chiefly Augustine, Denys the Areopagite (Pseudo-Dionysius), and Aristotle—and his own Franciscan interpretation of human experience. Its foundational structure is the classic Neoplatonic circle of emanation, exemplarity, and return. His theological metaphysics is based on the doctrine of the Trinity as the absolute mystery of self-diffusive Good. For Bonaventure the "first person" is the fecund "womb of being," an overflowing fountain of goodness. Out of a boundless desire to communicate self, the Father generates the Word, or perfect expression of his eternal Art; the Spirit is their eminently personal mutual love, completing the circle of giving and return.

Bonaventure views creation as a further overflow and expression of this divine self-communication; in the absolute self-expression of the Word the Father also produces the archetypes of everything he can possibly create. The further decision of God to communicate being to that which is exterior to the inner divine life is thus grounded in the Word. The son who became incarnate in the person of Christ is "the hidden center" of the universe; all of created reality is somehow contained in him as primal expression of God and in its very being points back to him. Following Francis, Bonaventure's universe is symbolic: "Every creature, because it speaks God, is a divine word." Like a stained-glass window, creation is translucent; its significance can be read only because of the divine light that permeates it, making it reflect a source beyond itself. This is the basis of Bonaventure's strong reaction to the radical Aristotelianism increasingly in vogue at Paris in the 1260s; for him, all things are theonomous in their very being. Nothing created can really be autonomous, as if it could somehow be considered in itself; nothing makes sense apart from God.

This fundamentally dynamic structure is especially evident in human beings, because in them creation is reflexively self-conscious. Rational creatures reflect God's being in a heightened manner because their spiritual faculties of memory, intellect, and will are images of the divine Trinity itself. God is thus present within their very being as the ultimate object of all their concrete acts of knowledge and love. However, a sinful humanity has lost sight of its true nature; "curved in on themselves," people were unconscious of their divine source and goal. But by himself assuming human nature, the Word incarnate in Christ has exemplified humanity's true vocation; his self-emptying life has overcome the human tendency toward nonbeing; by uniting themselves to him in his response of love other people can also attain their fulfillment through a process of divinization that is imaged by Bonaventure as a journey of the soul into God.

The self-communication of God to the soul through grace rectifies its faculties through the theological virtues of faith, hope, and love, so that God may be experienced and chosen for God's own sake in all concrete human knowing and willing. In this way, in conformity to the pattern revealed in Christ, the human soul is gradually refashioned into its primal image, finally attaining a total resemblance to its divine source. The theological task cannot be considered apart from this dynamism; its goal is not so much to know facts about God, but, in achieving affective union with God, the wisdom that experiences the realities of which it speaks. Thus all theology is ultimately mystical: the objective knowing characteristic of the intellect must lead to and be transcended by the subjective knowing of love, an experience that is ultimately ineffable, when God is all in all.

There has been a great revival of interest in Bonaventure's theology in the twentieth century; many of its elements have been creatively retrieved by such contemporary thinkers such as Karl Rahner (d. 1984). Its popularity today may be especially due to its holistic character: for Bonaventure nature cannot be divorced from grace, abstract thought from symbolic modes of apprehension, or theology from spirituality. Feast day: July 15. See also Franciscan order; mystical theology; mysticism; Scholasticism.

Bibliography

Bougerol, J. Guy. Introduction to the Works of Bonaventure. Paterson, NJ: St. Anthony's Guild Press, 1964.

Cousins, Ewart. Bonaventure and the Coincidence of Opposites. Chicago: Franciscan Herald Press, 1978.

Hayes, Zachary. The Hidden Center. New York: Paulist Press, 1981.

DOMINIC MONTI

Boniface VIII [Benedict Caetani], ca. 1235–1303, pope from 1294 to 1303. An ambitious and talented administrator, he was a papal diplomat to France and England in the 1270s before being made cardinal in 1281. The architect of the resignation of Celestine V (1294), Boniface set out, after his own election as pope, to restore papal strength, which had faltered under the easily influenced Celestine; he also worked for peace in Europe and revived crusading efforts in the Holy Land.

The assertion of papal power meant inevitable conflicts with secular authorities, mainly with the French king Philip IV. In 1296 Boniface ordered the kings of England and France to cease taxing their clergy without papal authorization. Philip responded by stopping the flow of church contributions from France to Rome, an action that prompted Boniface to temper his formerly belligerent position. During this conflict Boniface managed to make other enemies including the powerful Colonna family and their two cardinals, whose enmity would add to the pope's difficulties. The tenuous peace with Philip was broken in 1301 when the king disregarded Church law and tried a French bishop in a royal court. Boniface's reaction was swift and uncompromising: without reviewing the case the pope warned the king that his unrepented actions would bring dire consequences. These were defined in the famous bull Unam Sanctam (1302), in which Boniface laid out in bold terms the manner in which kings related to spiritual and papal authority. He invoked

Pope Boniface VIII, the quintessential medieval pope who vigorously asserted the primacy of the pope, even over temporal rulers, and who permitted so many statues of himself that his enemies accused him of encouraging idolatry; he is depicted here between two pilgrims in a fresco by the Florentine artist Giotto (d. ca. 1337) in the Lateran Basilica, Rome.

traditional views of papal power but in an extreme and unbending manner: papal authority extended over all creatures in the world, and while the Church wielded the spiritual sword for salvation, the secular power was to wield the temporal sword but in service to the spiritual. Philip, with the support of the Colonna cardinals, called for a general council to try the pope on charges that ranged from heresy to usurpation of the papal throne and the murder of Celestine V. Boniface stood firm and threatened to dismiss the king "like a servant" if need be. Philip boldly sent a contingent of soldiers to Anagni to seize Boniface and bring him to France. The pope was held for three days before the townspeople expelled the French force. Badly shaken by the incident, he returned to Rome where he died a month later.

A strong and determined champion of traditional papal rights, Boniface was also out of step with the times and blind to the powerful nationalism that was rising in Europe and that eventually brought him low. Still, his pontificate was important in other respects: among his many accomplishments were the inauguration of the first Holy Year in 1300, papal legislation for the education of parish clergy, and the expansion of canon law. A patron of art and education, Boniface gave Giotto work in Rome, reestablished the Vatican Library, and founded Rome's university, the Sapienza. See also Celestine V, St.; Holy Year; papacy, the; Unam Sanctam; Vatican Library.

WILLIAM J. DOHAR

Boniface, St. [Wynfrith], ca. 675–754, Anglo-Saxon missionary to the Germans and martyr. A monk from childhood, Wynfrith at the age of forty left his English abbey in 716 to become a missionary in Frisia. Returning in failure, he refused election as abbot and traveled to Rome, where in 719 Pope Gregory II commissioned him as a missionary and named him Boniface.

Boniface preached in Thuringia, Frisia, and Hesse, corresponding frequently with the pope, who consecrated him bishop in 722. In 732, Gregory III raised him to the rank of archbishop; in 738, he became papal legate to Germany. Boniface founded several sees and monasteries, including the abbey of Fulda, and took an active part in Frankish church reform in the 740s.

In 753, Boniface and his companions undertook another mission to Frisia, where they were massacred at Dokkum in 754. Boniface's tomb is at Fulda. Feast day: June 5. See also Germany, Catholicism in.

Book of Hours, liturgical book containing the prescribed prayers for the canonical hours of the day. Such books were often lavishly illuminated in the medieval Church and were considered works of art in their own right. Such a book is also called a breviary or the Liturgy of the Hours. See also breviary; Liturgy of the Hours.

Book of Kells. See Kells, Book of.

Borgia, St. Francis, 1510–72, Spanish Jesuit, friend of Ignatius of Loyola, and third general of the Society of Jesus. He demonstrated an orientation toward religious life from his earliest years. However, his father, the duke of Gandia, prevailed upon him to join the court of Charles V. There he received a royal appointment, eventually becoming Viceroy of Catalonia. After his wife's death in 1565, Francis contributed to the establishment of several schools including the Collegium Romanum. Feast day: October 10, observed regionally.

Borromeo, St. Charles (baw-roh-may'oh) 1538–84, Italian cardinal-archbishop of Milan, reformer, and founder of seminaries. He was born into the wealthy and aristocratic Medici family and was educated in the humanities at Milan and Pavia. When he was twenty-two, his uncle Gian Angelo Medici was elected pope (Pius IV) and within a week Charles, still a layperson, was named a cardinal and appointed archbishop of Milan. Though expected to emulate the luxurious life-style of his family, Charles chose a more moderate way of life, refusing to succumb to the quest for personal power and prestige. During the final session of the Council of Trent, he made significant contributions to the Tridentine Catechism. The death of his older brother in 1562 had a profound impact on him. It is said that, despite the advice of his family to abandon his ecclesiastical career and raise a family, he was moved rather to live an even holier life. Not long after his brother died, Charles was ordained, and when Pius IV died in 1565, he went back to Milan as the city's archbishop and voice of reform. Until his death in 1584, Charles implemented the directives of Trent by opening seminaries, challenging clergy to live more moral lives, establishing a confraternity of Christian doctrine for children and, often with his own funds, attending to the poor and sick, particularly during the plague in 1576. Charles was canonized in 1610. Feast day: November 4.

Charles Borromeo, one of the greatest of the sixteenth-century Catholic reformers, shown here at the right of the enthroned Blessed Virgin (with another great reformer, Ignatius of Loyola, founder of the Jesuits, at her left); a Carlo Maratta (d. 1713) painting in the Chiesa Nuova ("New Church"), Rome.

Bosco, St. John, also known as Don Bosco, 1815–88, founder of the Pious Society of St. Francis de Sales (the Salesians), priest, and patron saint of youth and of Catholic publishers. Born in Turin, Italy, he is remembered especially for his work with homeless boys, whom he served by establishing hospices where they could live, learn trades, and receive spiritual guidance. This ministry prompted two other pastoral accomplishments in his career: the publication of catechetical materials for the instruction of youth under his care and the foundation of a religious community, the Salesians (1859), to assist in the work of training youth. The Salesians were approved by Rome in 1868. Don Bosco was a deeply spiritual person who is said to have had many visions throughout his life. He was particularly devoted to the Blessed Mother. He was canonized in 1934. Feast day: January 31. See also Salesians.

Bossuet, Jacques Bénigne (bah'sway), 1627–1704, preacher, bishop, and Catholic apologist. Born in Dijon, France, he displayed a talent for preaching when he was still a teenager. Educated by Jesuits at Dijon and prepared for the priesthood by Vincent de Paul in Metz, he quickly gained a reputation for his oratorical skills and his defense of Catholicism against Protestants. By all accounts, he was a passionate and articulate preacher whose funeral sermons were particularly popular. He became a bishop in 1669, and throughout his episcopal career he dedicated himself to a variety of apologetic activities, including the publication of several works on Catholic doctrine. Among these, his two-volume work, Histoire des variations des Églises protestantes (1688), is the best known. During this period, he also devoted himself to spiritual writing. Though he vigorously opposed Protestantism, he never gave up hope for reconciliation with the reformers.

Botte, Bernard, 1893–1980, Benedictine monk of Mont César, Belgium, and influential liturgical scholar and teacher. Dom Botte promoted the liturgical movement by his scholarly research and critical editions of early liturgies and by founding a graduate school of liturgical studies at the Catholic University of Paris (1956).

Botticelli, Sandro, ca. 1444–1510, Florentine painter, born Alessandro di Mariano Filipepi. His early paintings were based on secular themes, e.g., Spring and Birth of Venus, which pointed to the triumph of love and reason over brutality. His paintings became religious in his later years, including some frescoes in the Sistine Chapel, depictions of the Madonna, the Nativity, the Last Communion of St. Jerome, and various altar panels. The popularity of his work declined after his death, but was revived in the nineteenth century.

Botulph, St., seventh-century Anglo-Saxon monk. Virtually all that is known of Botulph is the notice in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle for 654 that he built a monastery at Icanhoe: this is often identified as Boston (derived from "Botulph's town"). A popular saint in medieval England, he had, according to legend, a brother named Adulph. Feast day: June 17.

Bourget, Ignace (boor-zhay'), 1799–1885, second bishop of Montreal (1840–78). He was the strongest voice for Ultramontanism (an extreme pro-papal movement) and the neo-Thomistic revival in the Canadian church. He actively recruited religious communities for the diocese and made Montreal a center for Ultramontanism. A major religious revival followed in the wake of his policies and Bourget acquired a reputation as a forceful publicist for papal primacy and centralized jurisdiction. See also Canada, Catholicism in; Thomism; Ultramontanism.

Bouyer, Louis Jean (loo'ee zhahn boo-yay'), b. 1913, French theologian. Born into a Lutheran family in Paris and educated at the universities of Paris and Strasbourg, he renewed his profession of Christian faith in the Catholic Church and was ordained a priest of the Oratorians. A professor in the faculty of theology at the Institut Catholique of Paris and author of numerous books and articles in ecclesiology, liturgy, and spirituality, he initially rendered theological support to Vatican II and its renewal, but in later years his writings became theologically cautious.

bowing, an inclination of the head, or of the head and the body. Liturgically, bowing is a mark of supplication and adoration toward God; bowing can also denote respect or reverence toward persons or things, or express a greeting. Through the years, the use of bows multiplied, but the practice has been greatly simplified in recent Church legislation. The bow of the head is made at the doxology, at the name of Jesus, Mary, or the saint of the day, and at the consecration of the Eucharist. Bowing of the body is made before the altar and at specified times during the Mass.

Boys' Town, a residential program for troubled boys founded near Omaha, Nebraska, in 1917 by Edward J. Flanagan (d. 1948). The nonsectarian institution serves 550 youth on a 1300-acre home campus to which young women were admitted in 1979. Boys' Town gained national fame from the 1938 motion picture Boys' Town, starring Spencer Tracy. Expansion in later years included a research hospital for hearing impairments (1975), an inner-city alternative high school (1983), a nationwide family-home program (1983), a short-term shelter program (1989), training and counseling services, and a $469 million endowment (1991).

Bradwardine, Thomas, ca. 1290–1349, English theologian, mathematician, and confessor to King Edward III. Consecrated archbishop of Canterbury (1349), he died the same year from the Black Plague. Bradwardine's theological writings stressed the irresistible power of divine will and predestination as necessary for salvation, opposing the views of contemporary "Pelagians." See also Pelagianism.

Braig, Karl, 1853–1923, German Catholic theologian. Influenced by the liberal Catholic faculties of Tübingen and Freiburg, Braig's works on Leibniz and Kant were followed by studies on Christ and then by considerations of the nature of Christianity and the dialectic between freedom and modern theology in the Church.

Brazil, Catholicism in. Brazilian Catholics constitute the largest body of Catholics in the world. Catholicism first came to Brazil in 1500. The first diocese was established in 1551. During the colonial period, ending in 1822 when the country gained its independence from Portugal, Catholic missionaries devoted themselves to the protection of the Amazon Indians against exploitation and slavery by governmental and economic interests. The Jesuits were suppressed and expelled in 1782 and other missionaries were expelled as well. Even after the country gained its independence, the Church was subjected to severe anticlericalism and a general decline in religious life. Church and state were constitutionally separated in 1891. The Franciscan order has had an active presence in Brazil since the sixteenth century. Two of the world's best known cardinals are Brazilian Franciscans, Paul Evaristo Arns, archbishop of São Paulo (created cardinal in 1973), and Aloisio Lorscheider, archbishop of Fortaleza (created cardinal in 1976). There are 37 archdioceses and 199 dioceses and over 135 million Catholics, or about 88 percent of the total population (1994). See also Latin America, Catholicism in.

bread, eucharistic, unleavened bread that is consecrated during the Eucharistic Prayer and distributed during the Communion rite at Mass. Unleavened bread recalls the Jewish exile, when bread was made in haste without leavening. New meaning was given to this unleavened bread at the Last Supper, when Jesus blessed, broke, and gave the Passover bread to his disciples. Eucharistic bread recalls this meaning as "the body of Christ," the sacrifice of Jesus offering himself to others by blessing, breaking, and sharing both the bread and himself. The Eucharistic Prayer and the sharing during Communion are the ritual enactments of this meaning. See also Communion, Holy.

bread, the breaking of, an ancient name for the eucharistic celebration. At the Last Supper, Jesus took bread, blessed it, and broke it as he gave it to his disciples (Matt 26:26). Acts 2:42 describes the earliest Christians as devoting themselves to the apostles' teaching, fellowship, the breaking of the bread, and prayers. See also Eucharist.

Brébeuf, St. Jean de (bray-burf'), 1593–1649, French-born Jesuit missionary and martyr of New France who arrived in America in 1625 to evangelize Native Americans. He lived among the Huron for over fifteen years under difficult and challenging circumstances. In 1648 the Iroquois launched a war of extermination against the Huron, their traditional enemies. Refusing to flee when their Huron village was attacked, Brébeuf and his assistant, Gabriel Lalemant, were captured the following year and tortured to death by the Iroquois. Brébeuf was canonized in 1930 with seven other missionaries who are collectively called the North American Martyrs. He is the patron saint of Canada. Feast day: October 19. See also North American Martyrs.

Bremond, Henri, 1865–1933, French priest, spiritual writer, and member of the French Academy. Influenced by Blondel and Newman, friend of Tyrrel and Loisy, Bremond shared in the nineteenth-century revival of Catholic thought. Editor of Etudes before leaving the Jesuits in 1904, Bremond's writings drew upon nontraditional resources such as literature and psychology to describe religious experience, e.g., Poetry and Prayer or the eleven volumes of Literary History of Religious Sentiment in France.

Brendan, St., ca. 486–575, abbot of Clonfert and other monasteries in western Ireland. The eighth-century Navigatio Sancti Brendani describes his marvelous travels over the sea in search of paradise. Brought by the Irish missionaries to Germany and the Low Countries, this work became very popular in medieval Europe, with several vernacular translations, and is suggestive of the ideals of early medieval monasticism. It was later claimed that Brendan had reached North America. Feast day: May 16.

Brest, Union of, an agreement, ratified in 1596, that brought the Orthodox metropolitan province of Kiev into full communion with the Catholic Church.

This union involved the Slavic "Ruthenian" Orthodox Church located within the Catholic Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth. The Orthodox bishops who agreed to it were concerned chiefly with stopping the spread of Protestantism among their faithful, raising the standards of their clergy, and preserving their Byzantine heritage in the face of an expanding Polish Roman Catholicism.

With this in mind, the Orthodox bishops met in Brest in June 1595 and decided to seek union with Rome on the basis of a draft "Articles of Union." Here the bishops called for the preservation of traditional rites and discipline, such as married clergy and Communion under both kinds (consecrated bread and wine), and stipulated that they would not be obliged to observe Latin customs. They claimed the right to choose and ordain their own bishops and requested the implementation of strict regulations to preserve the integrity of their church. They also enumerated a number of measures that should be taken to enhance the status of their faithful within the civil sphere. The hope was that the union would spark a general revitalization of this church by instituting reforms and establishing its status as an equal partner with the Latin Church in the Commonwealth.

After insisting on certain conditions, Rome accepted the proposal and asked that another synod be held to ratify the agreement. But, although the union was supported by the Polish king, opposition arose among certain Orthodox groups. The result was that six of the eight Orthodox bishops attended the second synod at Brest in October 1596 to ratify the agreement, but the other two participated in a simultaneous counter-synod, also in Brest, presided over by a representative of the patriarch of Constantinople. The two synods excommunicated each other, and a violent struggle between the two groups began.

Although not all the envisaged improvements materialized, in the end this new Byzantine Catholic Church gained the allegiance of about two-thirds of the Orthodox in the area and may have had as many as twelve million faithful at its height. But this situation lasted only as long as Catholic governments held sway: with the expansion of Orthodox Russia into the area following the partitions and ultimate absorption of large areas of eastern Poland into the Russian Empire in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, the union was forcibly suppressed and Orthodoxy restored.

Today only a small segment of the original Byzantine Catholic Church established at Brest survives: the Ukrainian and much smaller Belarusian Catholic churches plus a significant number of their faithful outside the homeland. See also Belarusian Byzantine Catholics; Poland, Catholicism in; Ruthenian Catholic Church; Ukrainian Catholic Church.

RONALD G. ROBERSON

Brethren and Sisters of the Common Life, religious communities, promoters of the Devotio Moderna, that flourished from the late fourteenth century until the Reformation. Inspired by Geert de Groote (1340–84), communities of women and men first sprang up at Deventer and Zwolle in the Netherlands under the leadership of Groote's disciple Florens Radewijns (ca. 1350–1400) and later spread into Germany along the Rhine. The communities evolved into two branches: one lived a common life without solemn vows, the other, called the Windesheim Congregation, adopted the rule of the Augustinian Canons Regular. By the mid-fifteenth century there were about one hundred houses of Brethren and Sisters, most with less than a dozen members, and about eighty monasteries of the congregation. Their common life revolved around the reading of Scripture, meditative prayer, and work as copyists of devotional literature.

Their distinctive spirituality came to be known as the New Devotion (Lat., Devotio Moderna), emphasizing interior fervor and simple faith. They encouraged lay spirituality and supported the distribution of vernacular translations of Scripture and devotional works, including the popular Imitation of Christ, attributed to Thomas à Kempis (ca. 1380–1471), a Windesheim canon and novitiate master at St. Agnietenberg, near Zwolle. Although their devotional life anticipated in many ways Protestant concerns, the communities of the Common Life were unable to survive the dismantling of the religious orders during the Reformation. See also Augustinian Canons; Devotio Moderna; Imitation of Christ; Windesheim Congregation. MICHAEL WOODWARD

Brethren of Czech Unity, also known as Bohemian Brethren, a movement that arose among Hussites in Prague in the mid-fifteenth century. Advocating a return to primitive Christianity and strict adherence to Scripture, the Brethren shunned political involvement, the taking of oaths, and the bearing of arms. See also Hus, John.

Brethren of the Free Spirit, the name variously attributed to Waldensians, Beghards, Beguines, and others in the later Middle Ages who claimed independent inspiration and freedom from ecclesiastical authority. They were often charged by inquisitors with teaching a form of Pantheism and a union with God that bypassed the sacramental system. See also Beghards/Beguines; Waldensians.

breviary (breev'ee-air-ee), the liturgical book containing the Liturgy of the Hours, formerly called the Divine Office. The breviary represents a late medieval compilation of several books: the antiphonary or book of short verses (antiphons), psalter or book of psalms, lectionary or book of lessons, martyrology or book of martyrs, and hymnary or book of hymns. It was first fashioned during the eleventh and twelfth centuries to assist the daily prayer of the mendicant orders, whose members could not have been expected to carry such a library on their travels. The breviary contributed to the privatization and clericalization of the Church's daily prayer. It came to be regarded as a prayer book for priests, with the Liturgy of the Hours only for clerics. See also Liturgy of the Hours.

Briant, St. Alexander, d. 1581, priest canonized in 1970 as one of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales. He was admitted to the Society of Jesus while under arrest and unwilling, despite torture, to reveal the whereabouts of his associate, Robert Parsons. Feast day: December 1. See also Forty Martyrs of England and Wales.

Bridget of Sweden, St., 1302/3–73, a mystic from a noble family and major religious figure of the late Middle Ages. As a widow with eight children, she founded the Brigittines, an order of women and men who lived in double monasteries with the abbess as superior. Like Catherine of Siena, Bridget worked for the return of the popes at Avignon to Rome. Her Revelations, in which there is a renewed interest, record her visions, spiritual experiences, and life. Her daughter was St. Katherine of Sweden. She died in Rome and was canonized in 1391. Feast day: July 23.

Brigid of Ireland, St., d. ca. 525, also known as Brigit, Bridget, Bride, with Patrick and Columba a patron saint of Ireland. What little is known of Brigid's life is associated with myth, folklore, miracle stories, and later cultic elements difficult to disentangle. Born near Kildare, Ireland, and said to have been baptized by Patrick, she established a monastery at Kildare, which later became a double monastery of women and men. Irish missionaries carried the cult of Brigid to the Continent and elsewhere. Attempts to identify Brigid with a pagan goddess have not been credible. Feast day: February 1. See also Patrick, St.

Brigittines, the Order of the Most Holy Savior (O.SS.S), an order founded in 1344 by St. Bridget of Sweden (d. 1373). A contemplative order devoted to liturgical worship, it had approximately eighty houses at the beginning of the Reformation. See also Bridget of Sweden, St.

Britto, St. John de, 1647–93, Portuguese martyr. After ordination to the priesthood, he sailed to India with sixteen other Jesuits as the superior of the Madura (India) mission. He was beheaded for trying to evangelize a prince of Malabar. Feast day: February 4. See also India, Catholicism in.

Broadstole

broadstole, a purple or black sash worn by deacons during Lent and Advent. The broadstole is not a true stole, originally having been a chasuble, i.e., the outer vestment worn by the priest at Mass, rolled up lengthwise. It is draped over the left shoulder and clasped beneath the right arm. The broadstole is not commonly in use in the 1990s. See also stole.

brothers, religious, male members of clerical orders or congregations of lay religious communities who take vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. From the very beginning brothers have been an integral part of religious life and often the majority of members in early monastic communities. Members of monastic and religious communities were ordained only when the community had a need for priestly services.

The brother is a consecrated layperson who professes the evangelical counsels of poverty, chastity, and obedience. The cleric is an ordained person who may share the brother's consecration as a member of a religious community. The brother is distinguished from the secular layperson by his consecration, his participation in a particular community, and his participation in a ministry of the Church.

Rather than presenting himself for ordination, the brother freely elects this lay religious state as his way of participating in the Church's faith community. This is the brother's way of responding to a call to live the gospel deeply, radically, publicly, and in community. Women religious choose this same commitment but do not currently have the option to choose the clerical state. Religious life is not a middle way between the clerical and lay conditions of life; rather it is recognized and is considered as a form of life to which some Christians, both clerical and lay, are called by God so that they may enjoy a unique gift of grace in the life of the Church (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, 1964, n. 43). The brother's life is identified, therefore, with following Christ, on the basis of a deliberate choice of the lay state.

The fundamental characteristics of the religious life are three: religious consecration as a complete expression of one's baptismal consecration expressed by vows to live a life of poverty, chastity, and obedience; community life as a manifestation of fraternal community existing in the Church; and specific ecclesiastical missions, participating in the Church's ministry of evangelization, with a variety of apostolates.

Since the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), many brothers have moved from more traditional ministries to a wide variety of other ministries, especially in meeting peace and justice needs. The traditional ministries such as education and health care have not been abandoned but expanded to better meet the needs of the day. Brothers, consecrated and living in community, actively engage in mission and create a unique path among the People of God.

Brothers, like other religious, have opened their communities, in spiritual life-style and in mission, to associate members and to short-term volunteers. This is a natural development as the Church becomes more aware of itself as the People of God, with all its members actively participating. The brothers share their rich traditions and works by including other believers as their associates.

The constituent elements of the life of the brother are the public profession of vows within a community and the apostolic service rendered according to the special vocation and gifts of the community. "Monks," "friars," and "little brothers" are terms used to describe brothers who are members of older orders.

Brothers in the older monastic orders, such as Benedictines, Trappists, and canons regular, and in the more active clerical orders that evolved beginning in the thirteenth century (Franciscans, Dominicans, Jesuits, Redemptorists, Passionists), were termed lay brothers. They were professed community members serving in auxiliary works, assisting the priests of the particular order. Often these lay brothers were uneducated, pious men who performed the menial tasks in the religious community. These brothers did not participate in choir or office but had their own simple common prayer.

Equal membership for brothers in clerical communities has historically been difficult. Some orders such as the Brothers of St. John of God were established for a special apostolic work and included ordained members only as needed for community sacramental purposes. The original Franciscans were termed "friars" with few ordained, the founder himself resisting ordination. Since the sixteenth century, the majority of members in the Franciscan order have been ordained; less educated members serve as domestic lay brothers. St. Francis did not have such a system in mind when he founded the friars to give radical Christian witness.

As religious orders developed, emphasis on ordination precluded equal membership for the brothers, who then became auxiliary, adjunct, or coadjutor members of the community. These classifications or levels of membership in religious communities found definition in the constitutions or rules for the different orders and eventually were written into canon law. This discrimination of community membership of clerics and lay brothers often created a caste system comparable to that of the feudal nobles and peasants.

Since Vatican II, brothers in clerical communities have become better educated and have moved toward equal standing with ordained members. Equal membership for brothers continues to be limited by the Church's prohibition of brothers holding the office of superior in clerical communities. See also religious orders and congregations. BONAVENTURE SCULLY

Brothers of Holy Cross, a society of laymen of the Congregation of Holy Cross, a religious institute founded by Basil Anthony Moreau in 1837 in Le Mans, France. The brothers were founded as the Brothers of St. Joseph by Canon Jacques-François Dujarie in 1820 at Ruille-sur-Loir; later they united with Moreau's association of priests. At the request of the bishop of Vincennes, Indiana, Holy Cross Brothers accompanied Edward Sorin, Holy Cross priest, to the first foundation of the Congregation in North America at Black Oak Ridge, Washington, Indiana, in 1841 and then to Notre Dame du Lac in 1842.

In 1946, the Congregation of Holy Cross split into two societies, brothers and priests. In 1992, there were 848 brothers in countries throughout the world, including Canada, the United States, Chile, Peru, Brazil, Kenya, Uganda, India, Bangladesh, Italy, and France. They serve the Church in a number of ministries, e.g., as teachers (St. Edward's University in Austin, Texas, and many secondary schools), pastoral associates, hospital chaplains, and missionaries.

Holy Cross Brother André Bessette (1846–1937), a porter at the Oratory of St. Joseph in Montreal who cared for the poor and provided spiritual guidance to many, was declared Blessed André Bessette by Pope John Paul II on May 23, 1982. See also Congregation of Holy Cross; Sisters of Holy Cross.

brothers of Jesus, siblings of Jesus, mentioned in the Gospels and in Paul's Letters. Mark records that the villagers of Nazareth remarked: "Is not this the carpenter, the son of Mary and brother of James and Joses and Judas and Simon, and are not his sisters here with us?" (6:3). Matthew's version is identical (13:55). All the Synoptics record "his mother and brothers" standing outside his house (Mark 3:31; Matt 12:46; Luke 8:19). John tells of his brothers who do not believe in him (7:3–5; but cf. 2:12). Paul speaks about the support afforded "the brothers of the Lord" (1 Cor 9:5); he mentions seeing once "James the Lord's brother" (Gal 1:19). Scholarship has tended to interpret these references in three ways: "brother" means stepbrother, i.e., children of Joseph by a previous marriage; "brother" means cousin; and "brother" means true brother, subsequent children of Joseph and Mary. The evidence for "stepbrother" is merely legendary (Infancy Gospel of James 9:2; 17:1). The linguistic evidence for "brother" meaning "cousin" is very thin. We have but one example where a cousin might be called a "brother" (1 Chr 23:22). Moreover, Hegesippus calls a certain Symeon, the second bishop of Jerusalem, "another cousin of the Lord" (Eusebius Ecclesiastical History 4.22.4), distinguishing him from "James the Just," brother of the Lord. No linguistic evidence warrants our interpreting Gospel passages about Jesus' brothers and sisters as his cousins. "Cousins" of Jesus, when noted, were called just that, "cousins," not

"brothers." Therefore NT authors apparently understood Jesus' "brothers" as blood brothers, not as "cousins" or "stepbrothers." See also Jesus Christ; virginity of Mary. JEROME NEYREY

Brothers of St. Patrick (F.S.P.), an Irish religious community whose main apostolic work is teaching and counseling. There are very few members currently in the United States.

Brothers of the Christian Schools, also known as De La Salle Christian Brothers, Fratres Scholarum Christianarum (F.S.C.), an order founded in 1680 by Jean Baptiste de La Salle in Rheims, France, for the education of poor children. De La Salle revolutionized the existing system of education.

Christian Brothers are members of a religious congregation of laymen who do not aspire to become priests (de La Salle excluded priests in 1690) but who devote their lives to serving God's people through education. The brothers profess the vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience and live a communal life of service to others through education.

These brothers are the largest group of lay religious men in the Church dedicated exclusively to education. In the United States, as of 1993, 1,500 brothers serve in eight provinces. Brothers are also located in eighty countries throughout the world.

As lay religious men, the brothers freely choose in their profession to deepen their baptismal consecration, committing themselves to celibacy, to simplicity of life-style, to discernment of God's revelation in a community setting, to service to the poor through education, and to fidelity to their religious congregation.

The Christian Brothers continue their three hundred years of tradition of teaching youth, especially the poor, also serving in allied ministries including family counseling, refugee work, parish, diocesan, and educational professional work, writing and publishing, retreats, and campus ministry.

The brothers sponsor and staff the following colleges and universities in the United States: Christian Brothers University, Memphis; Manhattan College, Bronx, New York; La Salle University, Philadelphia; St. Mary's College of Minnesota, Winona, Minnesota; Lewis University, Romeoville, Illinois; St. Mary's College, Moraga, California; and the College of Santa Fe, Santa Fe, New Mexico. Their national center is located in Romeoville, Illinois. BONAVENTURE SCULLY

Brown, Raymond E., b. 1928, internationally renowned Scripture scholar and leader of biblical renewal in the United States. Ordained a priest of the diocese of St. Augustine, Florida (1953), he is a member of the Society of St. Sulpice, S.S. He received the S.T.D. from St. Mary's Seminary and University, Baltimore (1955), a Ph.D. in Semitic languages from the Johns Hopkins University (1958), the S.S.L. from the Pontifical Biblical Commission (1963), and over twenty honorary doctorates from U.S. universities and from Edinburgh (1972), Glasgow (1978), Uppsala (1974), and Louvain (1976). A professor of New Testament at St. Mary's Seminary (1959–71), and at Union Theological Seminary, New York (1971–90), he retired as Auburn Distinguished Professor Emeritus of Biblical Studies. Active in national and international ecumenical dialogues, he was a member of the Pontifical Biblical Commission (1972–78), and was President of the Catholic Biblical Association (1971–72), the Society of Biblical Literature (1976–77), and the international Studiorum Novi Testamenti Societas (1986–87). In 1983 he was elected to the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. Author of more than twenty-five books on the Bible, most notably major commentaries on the Gospel and Letters of John (Anchor Bible, vols. 29, 29a, 30) and on the birth and death of the Messiah, he is editor, with J. A. Fitzmyer and R. E. Murphy, of The Jerome Biblical Commentary (1968) and The New Jerome Biblical Commentary (1990).

Brownson, Orestes Augustus, 1803–76, the leading American Catholic thinker of his time. Obsessed by religious questions even in his boyhood, he practiced Presbyterianism, Universalism, Unitarianism, and Transcendentalism before becoming a Catholic in 1844. Brownson's Quarterly Review (est. 1844), most of which he wrote himself, was the main channel of his influence. At first, Brownson took a combative line as a Catholic controversialist. But like his friend and fellow convert, Isaac T. Hecker, he believed that Catholicism and Americanism were ideally suited to each other, and in the mid-1850s he adopted a more irenic tone. This liberal phase lasted until 1864, when he stopped publishing his Review. Brownson was a strong Unionist, and the Civil War prompted his major constitutional treatise, The American Republic (1866). After the war, he was overwhelmed by personal grief and discouraged by changes in the religious climate, and the Review, which he revived briefly in the 1870s, reflected his renewed conservatism.

Bruno Hartenfaust, St., ca. 1030–1101, priest, chancellor of Rheims, and founder of a monastery at La Grande Chartreuse near Grenoble that began the Carthusian order. Called to Rome against his wishes in 1090 as adviser to Pope Urban II on matters pertaining to the reform of the clergy, Bruno soon persuaded the pope to allow him to resume his eremitical life. He founded another monastery at La Torre in Calabria, and declined an offer from the pope to become archbishop of Reggio. Feast day: October 6. See also Cistercian order.

Buckley, William F., Jr., b. 1925, a conservative Catholic opinion leader in the United States. One of the founders of the modern American conservative movement, he established America's leading conservative journal of opinion, National Review, in 1955.

bugia (boo'juh), a low candlestick consisting of a small plate and a metal or porcelain socket for the candle. The name comes from Bougie, Algeria, a source of wax. The bugia, which could be carried without the candle dripping on the hand or floor, was used as an additional light for the reading of the Missal at a bishop's Mass. Its liturgical use was abolished in 1968.

Bulgarian Byzantine Catholic Church, the Catholic counterpart to the Bulgarian Orthodox Church, which united with Rome in 1861 to preserve its regional autonomy. Its liturgical language is Old Slavonic. Under Ottoman rule, Bulgarian Orthodox Christians, who twice before had had their own patriarchate, were gradually brought under the control of ethnic Greek bishops as part of a systematic hellenization of their ecclesial life. In 1767 they were placed directly under the jurisdiction of the Greek patriarchate of Constantinople.

In the nineteenth century, when a struggle to obtain ecclesiastical independence from the ecumenical patriarchate was gaining momentum, some influential Bulgarian Orthodox in Constantinople began to consider union with Rome as a solution to their problem. They thought that as Catholics they would be able to retrieve their national ecclesiastical traditions, which they felt Constantinople had denied them.

In 1861 they sent a delegation, headed by the elderly archimandrite Joseph Sokolsky, to Rome to negotiate with the Holy See. These talks were successful: Pope Pius IX himself ordained Sokolsky a bishop on April 8, 1861, and named him archbishop for Bulgarian Catholics of the Byzantine rite. The following June he was recognized as such by the Ottoman government.

But in June 1861, almost immediately after his return to Constantinople, Sokolsky disappeared under mysterious circumstances, was taken to Odessa on a Russian ship, and spent the remaining eighteen years of his life in the Monastery of the Caves at Kiev. It has never been established whether he returned to Orthodoxy and fled or was abducted.

Nevertheless, having successfully identified itself with the Bulgarian nationalist movement, the Bulgarian Byzantine Catholic Church initially gained about sixty thousand members. The Russian government, meanwhile, began to support attempts to establish a separate Bulgarian Orthodox Church within the Ottoman Empire. This effort bore fruit in 1870 when a distinct Bulgarian Orthodox exarchate was set up. This effectively put an end to the movement toward Catholicism, and before the turn of the century, three-quarters of the Bulgarian Byzantine Catholics had returned to Orthodoxy.

Most of those who remained Byzantine Catholic lived in villages in Macedonia and Thrace. Therefore in 1883 the Holy See created a new ecclesiastical organization for them. Apostolic vicariates were established in Thessalonica for Macedonia and in Adrianople for Thrace, while an apostolic administrator with the title of archbishop remained in Constantinople. But the community suffered grievously during the Balkan Wars of 1912–13, and the few surviving members fled to the new Bulgarian kingdom for safety.

Given this new situation, Byzantine Catholics within Bulgaria were reorganized in 1926: the previous ecclesiastical entities were abolished, and a new apostolic exarchate was established in Sofia. This was accomplished on the advice of the apostolic visitator (1925–31) and later apostolic delegate (1931–34) to Bulgaria, Archbishop Angelo Roncalli, subsequently Pope John XXIII. He also supported the opening of an interritual minor seminary in Sofia in 1934, which was directed by the Jesuits until it was closed in 1945.

Unlike most other Byzantine Catholic churches in Eastern Europe, this church was allowed to function openly during the Communist regime in Bulgaria, although it was subjected to many restrictions. In 1991 the membership of the apostolic exarchate was estimated at 15,000. See also Byzantine rite; Eastern Catholics and ecumenism; Eastern Catholics and Rome; Eastern churches; Eastern liturgies; Eastern rites.

RONALD G. ROBERSON

bull, papal (Lat., bulla, "lead seal"), since the thirteenth century, the common term applied to documents stamped with a lead seal, and currently referring to a form of papal document that affects matters of import for a substantial portion of the Church. The lead seal is embossed with the facial imprints of the apostles Peter and Paul on one side and the signature of the pope on the other. Along with silken cords it holds the document together and is used to authenticate it. See also apostolic constitution.

Bullinger, Johann Heinrich, 1504–75, successor to Ulrich Zwingli as pastor of the Great Minster in Zurich. Converted from Catholicism by Zwingli in 1528, he helped compose the First Helvetic Confession (1536) and the Second Helvetic Confession (1566), which were widely influential in the Reformed churches. See also Zwingli, Ulrich.

Bultmann, Rudolf, 1884–1976, NT scholar, founder of NT form criticism. Early in his studies, Bultmann became convinced of the collapse of traditional Lutheran orthodoxy. In search of a solution, he developed two interrelated lines of thought. Following nineteenth-century liberal Protestant scholars, he worked out a historical-critical reading of the NT. He argued that distinct literary forms in the Gospels were shaped by the social situation and experiences of the early communities (History of the Synoptic Tradition, 1921) and that canonical texts should be seen as part of the religious life of late antiquity (Theology of the New Testament, 1951). As a critical historian, Bultmann assumed the world was a closed causal system in which God had no influence; no miracles were possible, no Incarnation, atonement, or Resurrection. All these were myths no longer believable in the modern age.

Bultmann's second line of thought, in this case opposed to nineteenth-century liberal Protestantism, argued that the true function of NT myths was to challenge human beings to an authentic self-understanding under God's redeeming Word, Jesus Christ. From this perspective, "demythologizing" the NT was a mode of interpreting myth, not a simple rejection of it. Bultmann understood these two lines of thought as an application of the principle "simultaneously justified and sinner" (simul iustus et peccator) to knowledge. In this application historians remain bound to the sinful construction of a closed objective world while, at the same time, being freed from this sin by the existential encounter with Jesus, the Word of God preached by the Church. The content of faith could not be formulated because dogmatics would remythologize God's Word and deprive it of its absolute lordship.

Bultmann is the single most influential NT scholar of the twentieth century. Many prominent professors at German universities are his students. His writings, translated into many languages, still have a great impact. Catholic scholars have been working for some decades with insights of Bultmann's historical-critical work (see Vatican II, Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, n. 19, for a positive evaluation of form-criticism). They tend, however, to be skeptical of Bultmann's sharp disjunction between faith and historical reason and of his refusal to formulate the content of faith. See also biblical criticism; form criticism.

MICHAEL WALDSTEIN

Burchard of Worms, ca. 965–1025, canonist who made an extensive collection of Church law in twenty books called Decretum Collectarium (or Decretum Burchardus). Appointed bishop of Worms by Emperor Otto III in the year 1000, his Decretum brought greater order to the study of canon law and was a source for later canonists, including Gratian. The last two books of the Decretum also circulated as separate treatises because of their practical nature: Book 19 provides a guide to the sacrament of Penance and Book 20 is a summary of doctrine with particular attention given to eschatology, or last things: judgment, heaven, hell, purgatory. See also canon law.

Burghardt, Walter J., b. 1914, American theologian, editor, and homilist. Ordained a priest in the Society of Jesus (1941); Ph.D., The Catholic University of America (1957); professor of patristics, Woodstock College, Maryland (1946–74) and The Catholic University of America (1974–78), he served as managing editor of Theological Studies (1946–67) and then as editor in chief (1967–90). Senior Fellow of Woodstock Theological Center, he is the author of nine volumes of homilies.

burial, Christian, the rituals and prayers that accompany the interment of a Christian and express the Christian belief in eternal life with God.

The cultures of the ancient world, as a rule, had a profound respect for the dead, and their burial rituals supported this belief. In the Hebrew Scriptures there is a concern for decent burial of Jews and non-Jews (e.g., Gen 23; 2 Sam 21:13–14). Early Christian funerary art showed a firm conviction that the deceased had the prospect of a place of refreshment, light, and peace with Christ. The sacraments of Baptism and Eucharist, in particular, focused on the death and Resurrection of Jesus as the model for Christian belief about life after death, and the Eucharist was called "the medicine of immortality." Unlike their pagan contemporaries, Christians were encouraged to rejoice and give thanks for their dead in the belief that they were with God. The bodies and burial sites of early Christian martyrs, in particular, were the source of great reverence and celebration.

Aside from the common customs of sharing a funeral meal at the tomb of martyrs and the washing and clothing of the corpse, early Christians seem to have initially had no particular burial rituals. There is a Roman ritual of the seventh century (Ordo 49) that directs that the Eucharist be given to a dying person and the narrative of Christ's death read; after death, the body was to be brought to the church, where psalms were prayed, and then carried in procession to the cemetery. But even by the ninth century, there was no universal Christian ritual of burial; local churches still followed their own customs in the matter. There was a shift, in the medieval period, from the joyful thanksgiving for the life of a Christian to a deepening concern about the judgment of God. The prayers of the burial Mass reflect this view of death as an ordeal, especially in the sequence Dies Irae (Lat., "Day of Wrath"), a highly imaginative and apocalyptic account of the last judgment.

Although an initial reform of the rites of burial was authorized in 1969, a definitive revision was issued in the United States in 1989. The new rituals deal with the three specific moments involved in the death of a Christian: the time before the funeral Mass, the Mass itself, and the committal rituals after the Mass. In the United States, the "wake" of a deceased Christian has retained its importance even though it is now usually held in a funeral parlor rather than at home. The basic structure of the vigil rituals follows the Liturgy of the Word: a gathering song and opening prayer, reading, psalm of response, the Gospel, and homily, followed by prayers of intercession and the Lord's Prayer.

Two possible rituals are offered for the funeral itself, one with and one without a Eucharist. The funeral Mass takes its specific character from the reception of the body at the door of the church with its reminders of Baptism (the sprinkling with holy water, the lighting of the Easter candle, etc.), the suggested readings from Scripture, and the final commendation, which emphasizes the shared hope of all Christians because of the death and Resurrection of Christ. The committal rituals likewise insist on this hope in Christ while recognizing the sorrow of family and friends for the death of a loved one. See also funeral Mass; wake service. REGIS A. DUFFY

Burke, John Joseph, 1875–1936, American Paulist priest, a founder and first general secretary of the National Catholic Welfare Council from 1919 to 1936. As general secretary, he promoted the participation of the laity in the public life of the Church and won particular praise for his efforts to regularize relations between the Vatican and the Mexican government. See also National Catholic Welfare Conference.

burse (Lat., bursa, "purse"), most commonly, the container used to convey the corporal—a square piece of linen on which the bread and wine are placed—to and from the altar. The burse, which came into use during the eleventh century, is used infrequently in the 1990s. "Burse" can also refer to the leather case used to carry the host to the sick or elderly, or to a fund providing for the education of seminarians. See also corporal.

buskin (bus'kin; Old Fr., bouzequin, "half-boot"), silk stockings worn by a bishop during solemn or pontifical liturgies. The buskin covers the foot, reaching up and over the calf. Buskins vary in color according to the liturgical season. They are never black, because buskins are not worn during Lent or at funeral Masses. Their use is optional today.

Butler, Alban, 1710–73, English Catholic priest, best known for his scholarly interest in the saints. His book The Lives of the Saints required thirty years of research. He also taught philosophy and theology at English College in Douai, France. See also saints.

Butzer, Martin, also known as Martin Bucer, 1491–1551, German Protestant Reformer. A member of the Dominican order, Butzer became an early follower of Luther after seeing him at the Heidelberg Disputation (1518). Called to Strassburg in 1523 to help lead the Reform movement there, he was instrumental in establishing a Reformed church. John Calvin, who lived in Strassburg from 1538 to 1540, learned much from Butzer. Concerned by the eucharistic controversy that divided the Lutherans and the followers of Zwingli, Butzer negotiated a compromise, the Wittenberg Concord (1536), that allowed some southern German states to enter the Lutheran military alliance. Butzer has been accused of theological superficiality and lack of principle as a result. Despite his irenic efforts abroad, he was committed to suppressing dissent in Strassburg. In 1549, after the military defeat of the Protestants in the Schmalkaldic War, he fled to England where he died. See also Reformation, the.

Byzantine Catholic Church of the Diocese of Krizhevci (kreez'chev-see), formerly known as the Yugoslavian Byzantine Catholic Church, the ecclesiastical community of Byzantine-rite Catholics who are in communion with Rome and whose principal concentration is in Croatia. It is the Catholic counterpart of the Serbian Orthodox Church in the former Yugoslav federation.

The first Byzantine Catholics in Yugoslavia were Serbians living in Croatian territory under Hungarian control in the early seventeenth century. In 1611 they were given a bishop who functioned as Byzantine vicar of the Latin bishop of Zagreb. His headquarters were at Marcha monastery, which became a center of efforts to bring Serbian Orthodox faithful into full communion with Rome.

After a period of tension with the local Latin bishops, the Serbs in Croatia were given their own diocesan bishop by Pope Pius VI on June 17, 1777, with his see at Krizhevci. He was made suffragan at first to the primate of Hungary and later (1853) to the Latin archbishop of Zagreb.

The diocese of Krizhevci was extended to embrace all the Byzantine Catholics in Yugoslavia when the country was founded after World War I. The diocese then included five distinct groups: ethnic Serbs in Croatia, Ruthenians who had emigrated from Slovakia around 1750, Ukrainians who emigrated from Galicia in about 1900, Macedonians in the south of the country who became Catholic because of nineteenth-century missionary activity (they now have their own apostolic visitator), and a few Romanians in the Yugoslavian Banat.

In 1992 it was estimated that the diocese of Krizhevci had a total membership of just under fifty thousand. However, given the fact that Yugoslavia has broken up into a number of independent republics, a new arrangement for Byzantine Catholics in the various successor states may be required. See also Byzantine rite; Eastern Catholics and ecumenism; Eastern Catholics and Rome; Eastern churches; Eastern liturgies; Eastern rites. RONALD G. ROBERSON

Byzantine chant. See chant, Byzantine.

Byzantine Italy, historically the area controlled by the exarchate of Ravenna (roughly northern Italy east of the Apennine watershed from Ravenna to Ancona) plus southern Italy (the toe and heel of the peninsula plus Sicily) from the Byzantine conquest (535–53) until the fall of Bari to the Normans in 1027. In classical times southern Italy, known as Magna Graecia, had a flourishing Greek culture in cities like Syracuse in Sicily.

In the Byzantine period, Byzantine Orthodoxy predominated there, and Byzantine monasticism flourished. The overthrow of Romulus Augustulus, last Roman emperor in the West, in 476, left Constantinople as the only imperial authority. In 488 the Ostrogoths invaded Italy, establishing the center of their kingdom in Ravenna in 493. Under Emperor Justinian I (527–65) the Byzantines restored imperial power in a war that caused much suffering to the local population. In the north the Lombard invasion of 568 left only the area under Ravenna to the Byzantines, though they retained Magna Graecia as both the Lombards and the papacy inexorably moved south. Ravenna was lost to the Lombards in 751, but the Byzantines consolidated their hold on Sicily, confiscating papal estates there and transferring it to the ecclesiastical control of the patriarchate of Constantinople.

Arab control of Sicily in the tenth century gave way to the Normans, who established their kingdom in southern Italy and Sicily in the eleventh. Meanwhile the Byzantine church, reinvigorated by an influx of Greek-speaking Christian refugees from the Arab takeover of the Middle East, many of them monks, continued to flourish in Magna Graecia throughout the Norman period, with hundreds of Byzantine monasteries, some of them major foundations like St. Salvatore at Messina, Sicily, and Patir of Rossano in Calabria on the mainland. The copyists in monastic scriptoria have left behind numerous invaluable Italo-Greek liturgical manuscripts in which scholars identify distinct Italo-Byzantine liturgical usages in Otranto and the Siculo-Calabrian region. The Latin conquest of Constantinople in 1204 put an end to Byzantium as a world power, but in Norman Italy cultural and ecclesial contacts with Constantinople continued and even intensified in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries.

Though Greek-based dialects are still spoken in some isolated rural areas of the peninsula, the decline of the Normans brought decadence to the Byzantine monasteries, cradle of Italo-Byzantine ecclesiastical culture, and by the fifteenth century the Byzantine churches and monasteries in southern Italy had succumbed to latinization.

Soon, however, the Byzantine rite would revive in Magna Graecia as a result of an influx of Orthodox Albanians fleeing the Turkish domination of their country in the fifteenth century. In 1596 they received papal recognition within the Catholic communion, where they have preserved their Byzantine rite until today. ROBERT F. TAFT

Byzantine rite, sometimes called the "Greek rite," the liturgical system of the Orthodox and Byzantine Catholic churches, called "Byzantine" because it originated in the Orthodox patriarchate of Constantinople (Byzantium). In the Middle Ages the other Chalcedonian Orthodox patriarchates of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, weakened by schism and conquests and no longer able to maintain their own traditions, adopted the Byzantine rite, making it the sole liturgical tradition of Eastern Orthodoxy. Like the Roman rite, this liturgical synthesis is a hybrid, created when Constantinopolitan and Palestinian monastic elements synthesized during the ninth through fourteenth centuries in the monasteries of the Orthodox world. A unique symbolic matrix renowned for the sumptuousness of its ceremonial and liturgical symbolism and heritage of the imperial splendors of Constantinople before the eighth century, the Byzantine rite is by far the most widely used Eastern liturgical tradition. Its history went through seven stages: (1) Paleo-Byzantine origins (third–fourth centuries), (2) the "Imperial Age" or "Golden Age" (fifth–sixth centuries); (3) the "Dark Ages" and iconoclasm (610–ca. 850); (4) the Studite era (ca. 800–1204); (5) the neo-Sabaitic synthesis following the Latin occupation of Constantinople in 1204–61; (6) the period of uniatism and latinization from the end of the sixteenth century; and (7) the modern renewal.

Origins and Golden Age: We know little of the origins of the rite of Byzantium, a suffragan see in the prefecture of Orient before it became the new capital of Constantinople in 330. But Antioch was the major see in the prefecture, and the earliest extant Constantinopolitan liturgical sources bear unmistakable Antiochene traits.

In the sixth through seventh centuries, especially under Justinian I (527–65), the Byzantine rite became "imperial," acquiring ever more ritual splendor and theological explicitation, especially as a result of the Christological controversies, via the addition of new feasts, the creed, and several new immortal chants (Trisagion, Cherubicon, etc.). Its evolution was especially marked by the stational processions (i.e., from church to church) of the capital: entrances, processions, and accessions have come to characterize all Byzantine liturgy.

Iconoclasm and the Studite Reform: With the seventh century began a period of decline, as the "Dark Ages" and then iconoclasm (726–843) forced the Church to turn inward and consolidate its tradition. Liturgical creativity was limited to liturgical interpretation, as a more representational, narrative vision of the liturgical rites was integrated into Byzantine liturgical theology by Patriarch St. Germanus I (ca. 730).

The victory of Orthodoxy over iconoclasm in 843 stimulated a veritable liturgical reform: changes in the Euchologion (Sacramentary) under Patriarch St. Methodius I (843–47); new Holy Week and Easter services from the same symbiosis with Palestinian usages that would create the new monastic offices; new church music; and a new church architecture and iconography. Most important, the defeat of iconoclasm, basically a monastic victory, inaugurated the period of monastic dominance in the Orthodox church. This was largely due to the leadership of St. Theodore of Stoudios (d. 826) and his followers, who in 799 took over and revivified the dying Monastery of Stoudios, inaugurating the Studite era from about 800 until the Latin conquest of Constantinople in 1204–61.

The monks of Stoudios gradually synthesized the Horologion (Book of Hours) of the imported Palestinian office of the Monastery of St. Sabas with the Euchologion of Constantinople to create the hybrid "Studite" office: Palestinian monastic psalmody and hymns grafted onto the skeleton of litanies and prayers from the Cathedral Office of Constantinople. This period is characterized by the creation of the canon of orthros (Matins) via a massive infusion of new liturgical poetry into the offices. Gathered into new anthologies, the Oktoechos, Triodion, Pentekos- tarion, and Menaion, these monastic compositions from Palestine and Constantinople constitute the backbone of the new liturgical books still in use today. It is in this same period that the first Studite Typika or custom books appear to regulate the use of this new synthesis, which represents the victory of monastic popular devotion over a more spiritualist and symbolic approach to liturgy.

This popular spirituality was communicated to the masses through the ritual celebration of the liturgy and its setting, the Middle Byzantine church building and its representational art programs that developed at the turn of the tenth century. These had unitary decorative schemes, which were feasible only in churches so small that the whole decorated interior could be seen at one glance.

This reduction in church size, caused by the economic crisis of the period, also affected the liturgy. As churches became smaller, liturgical life became more compressed, more private. The splendors of the urban stational and basilical rites destined for the thoroughfares, public squares, and great basilicas of the metropolis were now played out in a greatly reduced arena. Monasticization played its part in this too: monastic liturgy is a stay-at-home rite, confined to the buildings of the monastic complex. This compression of liturgical activity was accompanied by a shift toward greater symbolization as rites lost their original purpose and survived only as symbolic relics. The classic example is the once-great public entrance procession of the liturgy, which was reduced to ritual turns within the interior of a now tiny nave and in which the appearances of the sacred ministers were symbolically reinterpreted as epiphanies of Christ.

By the end of this period there were new liturgical books, a new Divine Office, new liturgical music, new iconography, new architecture and liturgical arrangement of the church, and new mystagogy to interpret it all: the Middle Byzantine synthesis was complete.

The Neo-Sabaitic Ascendancy: With the early breakdown of Studite cenobitism after the Fourth Crusade (1204) and the rise of hesychast monasticism on Mount Athos begins the final phase of the history of the rite, characterized by the abandonment of the Studite offices in favor of the more austere neo-Sabaitic usages of Palestinian monasticism as restored in the twelfth century.

The Studite office, adopted throughout the Byzantine monastic world, had undergone a second wave of Sabaitic influence in Palestine. The result, codified in the Sabaitic Typika, was adopted on Mount Athos, where it received its final form under Philotheos Kokkinos, hegumen of the Great Lavra and later patriarch of Constantinople (1353–55, 1364–76). This neo-Sabaitic rite spread in the wake of the reform movement propagated by the Athonite hesychasts under Philotheos's leadership. By the end of Byzantium with the fall of Constantinople to the Turks in 1453, this rite was in use throughout the Orthodox world except southern Italy and Rus', which retained Studite usages longer.

Latinization and Modern Renewal: Later changes in the Byzantine rite are minor and do not modify the substance of this neo-Sabaitic tradition except among Byzantine-rite Catholics, who underwent a dolorous period of liturgical and spiritual latinization, a true erosion of their religious heritage, as a consequence of their union with the Catholic Church. In modern times a renewed sense of the necessity of preserving and restoring this Eastern patrimony has led to numerous calls for renewal from the Holy See and Vatican II, calls often ignored by the Byzantine Catholics themselves, long comfortable with their hybrid traditions, ignorant or even distrustful of their true historic heritage, and often eager to distinguish themselves from their Orthodox counterparts. Nevertheless, slow but real progress toward renewal has been made since the 1940s with the excellent new Vatican editions of the liturgical books. See also Eastern rites; rite.

Bibliography

Taft, Robert F. The Byzantine Rite: A Short History. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1991.

Schulz, H.-J. The Byzantine Liturgy. New York: Pueblo, 1986.

ROBERT F. TAFT

Byzantine style, a type of architecture characterized by roofing a square area with a dome on pendentives or vaults springing upward toward one another from four piers to join in a circle or drum on which the dome rests. Perfected in Justinian's Hagia Sophia (537), the system was developed on a greatly reduced scale thereafter in much smaller middle and late Byzantine "cross-in-square" churches in which the central square, roofed by a dome raised on a drum over four supporting piers, is extended out by wings on all four sides, often similarly roofed with domes on drums. Medieval churches of this type are still found all over Greece and the Balkans. See also Catholicism and architecture.

C

Frances Xavier Cabrini, first American citizen to be canonized a saint.

Cabrini, St. Frances Xavier, 1850–1917, patron saint of immigrants and first U.S. citizen to be canonized. Born in Lombardy, Italy, Maria Francesca Cabrini desired to be a sister but was refused entrance into two religious communities due to her delicate health. In 1880, Bishop Domenico Galmini encouraged her to establish a new congregation. The Institute of the Missionary Sisters of the Sacred Heart won papal approval (1887) and grew rapidly. In 1889, Archbishop Michael Corrigan of New York invited Mother Cabrini and five of her sisters to his diocese, but when they arrived Corrigan rescinded his invitation and suggested that they return to Italy. The sisters remained and Cabrini established numerous hospitals, schools, orphanages, and convents throughout the United States, as well as foundations in Central and South America. Mother Cabrini was canonized in 1946. Feast day: November 13.

Cabrol, Fernand, 1855–1937, French liturgical scholar, Benedictine monk of Solesmes, France. Appointed prior of Farnborough, England, in 1890, he became abbot in 1896. He is chiefly remembered for the impetus he gave to liturgical scholarship. Together with M. Ferotin and H. Leclercq, he launched the Monumenta ecclesiae liturgica (Lat., "liturgical monuments of the Church") and the Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie (Fr., "Dictionary of Christian archaeology and liturgy"), begun in 1903 and completed in 1953.

Caesarea (sez-uh-ree'uh; called Caesarea Maritima to distinguish it from Caesarea Philippi), a major city on the eastern coast of the Mediterranean built by Herod the Great (37–4 B.C.) and named after his patron, Augustus Caesar; it was the only major seaport between Egypt and Syria. In NT times, it was the site of Peter's preaching (Acts 10:24–48) and the residence of the Roman governor, thus the place of Paul's two-year imprisonment and trial (Acts 24–26) before his being sent to Rome. Later it was a major Christian Byzantine city and center of learning where the famous biblical scholar Origen lived for many years. Its massive remains are only partially excavated; work will continue for many years.

Caesarea Philippi (sez-uh-ree'uh fil-ip'pi), city rebuilt by Herod Philip, son of Herod the Great, named after himself and his patron, Caesar Augustus, on the site of an older Greek city sacred to the god Pan, near the sources of the Jordan River on the south side of Mount Hermon, at the northern edge of his kingdom, Gaulanitis (present Golan). Little is known of the city, since systematic excavations are just beginning. Matt 16:13–20 and Mark 8:27–30 place Peter's confession of faith in the surrounding countryside. The location continued as an early Christian city under the name Paneas, whence its present name, Banias.

Caesarius of Arles, St., ca. 470–542, archbishop of Arles from ca. 500. He presided over the Council of Orange (529), at which semi-Pelagianism (which held that the first step toward salvation is taken without grace) was condemned. He composed works on grace and on the Trinity but is most remembered as a pastor and preacher whose sermons skillfully adapted the teaching of Augustine for his congregations of new and uneducated converts. Feast day: August 27. See also Orange, Council of; semi-Pelagianism.

Caesarius of Heisterbach, ca. 1180–ca. 1240, Cistercian monk and writer. His many writings include sermons and homilies, narrative accounts of miracles, and histories, including lives of Cistercian saints. See also Cistercian order.

Caesaro-papism, a political system whereby a lay ruler is given complete sovereignty over royal and sacerdotal (priestly) powers within a designated realm. The lay ruler exercises authority over doctrine and ecclesiastical polity traditionally reserved for ecclesiastical authorities. The historical precedent for this arrangement was set during the Roman Empire, when the emperor, as the divinely appointed vicegerent of God, was given complete responsibility for ensuring the peace and stability of the empire. Given the importance of theological disputes and ecclesiastical politics following the Peace of Constantine in 313, Roman emperors began to assert their authority over the faith of the Church and the right to control ecclesiastical appointments beginning in the fourth century.

Caesaro-papism became a practical reality in the fifth century when Emperor Zeno, in an effort to unify the empire, made concessions to the Monophysites against the Orthodox beginning in 482. Caesaro-papism reached its zenith in the policies of Justinian I (527–65) and remained a governing principle of Byzantine rulers for a millennium. Due to countervailing developments in Western ecclesiology, Caesaro-papism contributed to the tensions between Rome and Constantinople that eventually resulted in schism.

Although traditionally associated with the authority of the Byzantine emperor over Eastern patriarchates, elements of Caesaro-papism are apparent in the policies of the Russian czars, in the post-Reformation claim that the religion of the king determines the religion of a people (Lat., cuius regio, eius religio), and in some forms of Josephinism, Febronianism, and Gallicanism. See also Church and state.

MICHAEL O'KEEFFE

Cafasso, St. Joseph, 1811–60, Italian moral theologian, diocesan priest, patron saint of prisoners. An opponent of Jansenism, he encouraged and supported John Bosco in his ministry to young boys and came to be known as the second founder of the Salesians. He won renown for his work with prisoners and those awaiting execution. Feast day: June 23. See also Bosco, St. John; Salesians.

Cahensly, Peter Paul, 1838–1923, German Catholic layman. He helped to establish a Catholic Society for German Immigrant Passage, the St. Raphaelsverein. In 1891, representatives of European St. Raphael societies met in Lucerne, Switzerland; they petitioned the Vatican to ensure the spiritual welfare of immigrants by establishing national parishes in the new homelands. Cahensly presented the Lucerne Memorial to Pope Leo XIII; it fueled a controversy in the United States between advocates of the national parish and the Americanist clergy. The Americanists judged the memorial as foreign interference in American ecclesiastical affairs and labeled this action "Cahenslyism." See also Americanism; national parish.

Cajetan, St., 1480–1547, Italian cofounder of the Theatine order. A diocesan priest who was concerned about the devotional life of the clergy as well as the general state of the Church, he founded in 1524, with Pietro Caraffa (later Pope Paul IV) and two other priests (Paul Consiglieri and Boniface da Colle), a congregation of clerics living under vows in community, but still engaged in pastoral work, especially ministry to the poor and the sick. Such congregations are known as clerks regular. Feast day: August 7. See also clerks regular; Theatines.

Cajetan [Thomas de Vio], 1469–1534, Dominican Thomist theologian. Born Giacomo de Vio of Gaeta and called Gaetamo, or Cajetan, from his birthplace, he took the name Thomas upon entering the Dominican order in 1484. After studying in Naples and Bologna and teaching at Padua (1493) and Pavia (1497), he was made procurator general of the Dominicans (1501) in Rome, where he began his magisterial commentary on Aquinas's Summa Theologiae (1507–22). Master general of the Dominicans from 1508 to 1518, seeking to reform the theological and community life of the order, he was made cardinal by Leo X in 1517, partly in recognition of his support for the full authority of the pope over councils. While serving as papal legate to the Diet of Augsburg (1518) to gain German support for a crusade against the Turks, he met with Luther but failed to change his mind about the sacraments or indulgences. Cajetan reached the height of his ecclesiastical influence with the election in 1522 of Hadrian of Utrecht as pope, under whom he hoped for reform of bishops, clergy, and religious orders. After the election of Clement VII (1523), he devoted himself to three years of scriptural study (1524–27), convinced that the Reformers could only be answered effectively on the basis of the literal meaning of Scripture alone, checked against the Hebrew and Greek. Cajetan produced a series of biblical commentaries on the Psalms (1527), the Gospels (1527–28), Acts and the Letters (1528–29), the Pentateuch (1531), the historical books (1532), the wisdom literature (1533–34), and Isa 1–3 (1534). His writings against Zwingli (1525), the remarriage of Henry VIII (1530), and the Augsburg Confession (1531–32) are marked by their empathy for the concerns of the Reformers and their arguments based on Scripture alone, earning the respect of Erasmus and even Luther (who said, "Cajetan, in his later days, has become Lutheran") and the deep suspicion of his more conservative contemporaries. He died on August 10, 1534, while preparing his commentary on the prophets. See also Dominican order; Reformation, the; Scripture and tradition. RANDALL C. ZACHMAN

Calasanz, St. Joseph, 1556–1648, Spanish founder of the Clerks Regular of Religious Schools in 1621. After renouncing family property and ecclesiastical status, Joseph went to Rome and began teaching poor children. Because of internal dissension, the new order was dissolved in 1646 by Pope Innocent X and made into a society of diocesan priests subject to bishops. The order is known today as the Order of the Pious Schools (Sch.P.), or Piarists. In 1993 there were less than one hundred Piarist priests in the United States. Feast day: August 15.

calced. See discalced.

Calixtus [name of pope]. See Callistus.

Callahan, Patrick Henry, 1865–1940, American Catholic business executive. President of the Louisville Varnish Company for thirty years, Callahan became known for his policy of sharing profits with employees. After chairing the Knights of Columbus Committee on War Activities, he cofounded the Catholic Association for International Peace in 1926. A prohibitionist, he opposed Al Smith in his campaign for the presidency of the United States in 1928. Callahan served on various national boards during Franklin D. Roosevelt's first two terms.

Callistus I, St., d. 222, pope from ca. 217 to 222. Originally a slave, Callistus was sent to the mines for being Christian (although Hippolytus, his enemy, hints at suspicious circumstances). Victor I granted him a pension upon his release. Callistus had charge of the present Catacomb of St. Callistus as Pope Zephyrinus's deacon. Elected his successor, Callistus was tolerant toward clergy who were twice married or who had sinned, which earned him the ire of Tertullian and Hippolytus, who accused him also of too readily readmitting sinners to communion. Hippolytus charged Callistus with Patripassianism (the belief that God the Father also suffered on Calvary), although Callistus excommunicated Sabellius. He was probably martyred. Feast day: October 14. See also Patripassianism.

calumny, the communication of falsehoods about another person, with a consequent injury to the other's reputation and good name. It is a sin against justice, charity, and truthfulness that demands a retraction of the falsehood and a sincere effort to restore the good name of the injured party. Calumny differs from detraction in that detraction injures another by telling truths about the other. On the other hand, calumny is practically indistinguishable from slander. See also detraction; justice; slander; truthfulness.

Calvary, Mount (kal'vuh-ree), Latin translation of Golgotha (Aram., "place of the skull," probably a place of execution), the site of Jesus' crucifixion (Matt 27:33; Mark 15:22; John 19:17; Luke 23:33 gives only a Greek translation). Outside the walls at the time (John 19:20), it was incorporated into the city about thirty years later. After A.D. 134 the emperor Hadrian built there a temple of Venus, which was torn down by Constantine to make way for his monumental Church of the Resurrection, whose courtyard enclosed the site, today part of the Crusader Church of the Holy Sepulchre.

Calvert, Cecil, 1605–75, second Lord Baltimore, founder of Maryland. Educated at Oxford and a convert to Catholicism, he carried out the plans of his father, George Calvert, to found a colony where religious toleration and separation of Church and state would prevail. Because of the Puritan upheaval in England, he was obliged to remain at home to protect the interests of a colony he never saw. Under his instructions, Maryland in 1649 passed the first act of religious toleration in the English-speaking world.

Calvert, Charles, 1637–1715, third Lord Baltimore, governor of Maryland. He was sent in 1661 by his father, Cecil Calvert, to Maryland as governor. After his father's death in 1675, his authoritarian policies and favoritism toward relatives and Catholics provoked a rebellion in 1689 that occasioned the loss of the colony by the Calverts, thereby ending toleration for Catholics, Calvert, George, ca. 1579–1632, first Lord Baltimore, founder of Maryland. Born in Yorkshire, educated at Oxford, he rose in British politics through the influence of Robert Cecil. In 1525 he resigned as secretary of state upon his conversion to Catholicism. Though awarded the title "baron of Baltimore" in the Irish peerage, he sought his fortune in the New World. When his attempt to found a colony in Newfoundland failed, he asked the king for a land grant on the Potomac River, where Catholics and Protestants might live together peacefully. Though he died before the Maryland charter passed, his plans were carried out by his sons. He was a man of great integrity, imagination, and political skill.

Calvert, Leonard, 1610–47, first governor of Maryland. He was sent by his brother Cecil, second Lord Baltimore, to plant the colony of Maryland, where the first settlers landed on March 25, 1634. Though attacked by Puritans and other enemies, he succeeded in establishing the colony of Maryland, where there was tolerance for Catholics and Protestants alike.

Calvin, John, 1509–64, French/Swiss Protestant Reformer. Born to a lay official of the Catholic Church in Noyon, France, Calvin began to study for the priesthood at Paris in 1523. In 1528 his father ordered Calvin to turn to the study of law, which he did at Orléans and Bourges. He was introduced to humanism by Melchior Wolmar, who was also favorable to Lutheranism. With the death of his father in 1531 Calvin returned to Paris to pursue classical studies and Hebrew. At the same time he was undergoing a slow conversion to Protestantism, a process that was completed by 1533. Feeling increasingly threatened in Paris, he left in 1534, resigned the benefices that had financed his education, and proceeded to wander through France, Germany, and Italy.

In 1536 he published the first edition of his Institutes of the Christian Religion in Basel, a work that would grow with each republication during his lifetime and that became the classic statement of Reformed Protestant theology. Passing through Geneva in 1536, he was threatened by the local reformer Guillaume Farel with divine punishment should he not remain and take up the task of reform in the city. He accepted the mission but was forced to leave the city in 1538 by opposition to his rigorous religious policies. He moved to Strassburg, where he was influenced by Martin Butzer. In 1540 Calvin married Idelette de Bure, the widow of an Anabaptist whom Calvin had converted. Recalled to Geneva in 1541 after his supporters got the political upper hand, Calvin started to put into practice his vision of the Church. Though facing opposition throughout most of his remaining years and though holding no political office, Calvin came to exercise remarkable influence in Geneva. As a result it became a model of the godly city to reformed Protestants.

Through his writing and extensive correspondence Calvin's influence extended throughout Europe, but particularly in his native France. Calvin was perhaps the greatest biblical commentator of his age and he held Christians to a strict biblical standard. In worship, discipline, and doctrine, nothing commanded in Scripture was to be ignored; nothing beyond what Scripture expressly ordained was to be accepted. As a result the simplified form of worship introduced in 1542 was a radical departure from the Catholic Mass, which Calvin considered idolatry. Since Calvin could not find the Catholic hierarchy in the NT, he replaced it (1541) with four biblically attested offices—deacon, elder/presbyter, teacher, and pastor. The lay elders/presbyters remain a distinctive element in Calvinism and give their name to the Presbyterian churches. Geneva's church was governed by a consistory composed of clergy and lay elders who maintained strict moral and religious control over the entire population. This discipline found its most prominent victim in Michael Servetus, who was burned at the stake for blasphemy in 1553. Calvin is best known, however, for his unyielding espousal of full double predestination, that is, that God in eternity has infallibly decreed who will be saved and who will be damned.

See also Calvinism; Reformation, the.

R. EMMET MCLAUGHLIN

Calvinism, a religious and theological orientation (also called the Reformed movement) within Protestantism that originated with the French Reformer and theologian John Calvin (1509–64), developed in the work of subsequent theologians, and is manifest today in the life of many Reformed (non-Lutheran) churches. Trained in theology and law, Calvin became convinced in 1533 that he was called by God to renew the Church. After fleeing from Noyon, France, to Basel, Switzerland, in 1535, he wrote the first edition of his Institutes of the Christian Tradition in 1536 and thereafter continued to revise and expand it until its last edition in 1559. This systematic exposition of Christian belief articulates the principles essential to Calvinism. These include the following: (1) Scripture, consisting of the unity of the OT and NT, is the necessary and sufficient source for understanding the Christian faith. (2) God is absolutely sovereign; his will determines both the ends and the means of all that occurs in human salvation. (3) As a result of the Fall, humankind is totally depraved. It lacks free will, and human actions in themselves are always sinful. (4) Faith brings the gifts of justification and sanctification. (5) God predestines the elect to heaven and the reprobate to hell. (6) God's grace is irresistible, and hence those who are elected necessarily do God's will. (7) The Church is supreme over the state. (8) The sacraments, namely, Baptism and the Eucharist, are external signs of an inner reality, but they do not bring about this reality.

The rigidity of Calvin's teachings led in the late 1600s to a theological controversy in Holland over the doctrine of predestination. Theodore Beza (1519–1605) argued for "supralapsarianism" (i.e., that God intended the Fall). Dirck Coornhert (1522–90) maintained "infralapsarianism" (i.e., that God's election came after the Fall). Jacob Arminius (1560–1609) softened Calvin's teachings on predestination, human freedom, and the irresistible character of grace. In response to Arminius's thought, the Synod of Dort (1618–19) upheld the stricter position in its "five points of Calvinism" concerning God's unconditional election, Christ's atonement only for the elect, humankind's complete depravity, the irresistibility of grace, and the saint's final perseverance. Arminius's views were, however, eventually accepted by the Methodist and Baptist churches.

In the eighteenth century, Jonathan Edwards (1703–58) taught Calvinism in New England. Though he preached a rigid view of predestination, he moderated this doctrine by the fact that he encouraged all people to dispose themselves to personal religious experiences (e.g., at religious revivals). In the twentieth century, Karl Barth (1886–1968) renewed Calvin's teachings, especially emphasizing Scripture as the source for theology, the sovereignty of God, and the depravity of the human condition apart from grace.

Along with being a set of theological principles, Calvinism is also a Protestant form of life. In the 1500s Calvin's community of Geneva not only flourished but also inspired the growth of other Calvinist or Reformed churches. Giving direction to Calvinism, or the Reformed movement, were the First Helvetic Confession (1536) and the Second Helvetic Confession (1566), which reiterated the central doctrines of Calvinism. Calvinism spread throughout Switzerland, Germany, France (i.e., the Huguenots), the Netherlands, Scotland (led by John Knox), England (i.e., the Presbyterians and Congregationalists), and eventually North America. See also Protestantism; Reformation, the; Reformed churches.

ROBERT A. KRIEG

Camaldolese, Congregation of Monk Hermits of Camaldoli, religious order founded by Romuald in the eleventh century as a reformed Benedictine community. Primarily a contemplative order, the Camaldolese emphasize fasting, silence, and solitude, along with manual labor. The order is unique in combining the communal monastic life-style with the independent life of the hermit, so that monks or nuns have the opportunity for solitary silent prayer and the hermits the advantages of fellowship and obedience to a superior. Though each house is placed under the rule of a superior, Camaldolese houses are generally independent of one another. St. Romuald never wrote a rule; the Camaldolese customs were drawn up in the eleventh century by Peter Damian and Rudolf and important reforms were introduced in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries by Ambrose Traversari and Paul Giustiniani. See also Romuald, St.

Camara, Dom Helder, b. 1909, retired archbishop of Recife in northeastern Brazil. A relentless advocate for social reform in this impoverished area, he often created tensions among government and Church officials because of his solidarity with the poor. He is known worldwide for his efforts to bring the plight of Third World peoples to the attention of affluent nations. An outspoken proponent of nonviolent social change, he emerged in the second half of the twentieth century as a renowned symbol of the Catholic Church's commitment to social justice and peace.

Camerlengo (kah-mair-lehn' goh; It., "chamberlain"), a title held by the cardinals who hold offices with specific financial duties. The two offices are the Camerlengo of the Holy Roman Church and the Camerlengo of the College of Cardinals.

The Camerlengo of the Holy Roman Church is the cardinal who presides over the Camera Apostolica, the Vatican office that takes charge of the property and financial administration of the Holy See during a vacancy in the papacy. He is assisted by a vice-camerlengo who is an archbishop.

The Camerlengo of the College of Cardinals is the cardinal who oversees the financial assets of the College of Cardinals and records the business of consistories, i.e., official meetings of the College of Cardinals, called by the pope and conducted in his presence. See also Cardinals, College of.

Camillus of Lellis, St., 1550–1614, founder of the Order of Camillians and patron saint of hospitals, nurses, and the sick. After having spent his youth as a soldier, Camillus entered the Capuchins as a novice in 1575. But because the coarse clothing of the order continually reopened his war wounds, he was rejected. He returned to the hospital where he had earlier been treated (San Giacomo in Rome), becoming influenced by Philip Neri, its head. He gathered followers into an order around 1582 and was ordained in 1584. The order had 330 members in fifteen cities at his death. He was canonized in 1746. Feast day: July 14.

Campaign for Human Development, a national education-action program of the Catholic Church in the United States. In 1969 the National Conference of Catholic Bishops (NCCB) established the campaign, whose funding derives from annual collections in Catholic churches. Some funds from the collection are distributed in communities where they are raised. Remaining funds are forwarded to the national office for distribution. Two types of grants are available: education programs to spread awareness of poverty and the need for its elimination and action programs for direct assistance. Organizations receiving grants must demonstrate a firm commitment to participation of the poor in planning and operating programs. In 1988 the bishops made the campaign a permanent annual national collection.

Campion, St. Edmund, 1540–81, the most famous of the Jesuit martyrs of England and Wales. A graduate of Oxford, in 1553 Edmund had taken both the Oath of Supremacy acknowledging the queen as head of the Church in England and deacon's orders according to the Anglican Ordinal. He subsequently converted to Catholicism and in 1569 left England for Dublin. In 1573 he entered the Jesuit novitiate in Prague and was ordained in 1578. Campion left Prague in 1580 to open a Jesuit mission in England, where he ministered to many underground Catholic families before being captured in 1581. He was imprisoned in the Tower of London and was tortured on the rack several times. Before being executed for high treason, Campion declared his loyalty to the queen in temporal matters and his gratitude to God for his martyrdom. Feast day: December 1.

Edmund Campion, Jesuit martyr executed in 1581 for his defense of the pope against the English crown.

Campus Crusade for Christ, a Protestant evangelistic organization. Founded by former businessman William "Bill" Bright in Los Angeles in 1951, Campus Crusade aggressively encourages college and high school students and teachers to convert to a nondenominational, evangelical, "born again" form of Christianity. The organization's best-known evangelistic tool is its "Four Spiritual Laws" pamphlet, a simplified explanation of sin, atonement, and justification by faith. Campus Crusade has influenced young people from all backgrounds and denominations. Because Campus Crusade has turned some Catholics toward Protestant churches, it is regarded with caution on Catholic college and university campuses. As of the early 1990s, Campus Crusade has forty thousand paid and volunteer staff at work in 152 countries around the world, with 4,500 in the United States alone.

Cana Conference, a marriage enrichment program that urged the preservation of Catholic marital and family values through a program of education. Cana began in New York in 1943 with a retreat given to eleven couples by Jesuit John P. Delaney. Delaney's description of the retreat in an article in America popularized the idea of a special program for the married. The name Cana was conferred on the budding program when Father Edward Dowling hosted similar gatherings in St. Louis. Whatever uniformity was imposed on the Cana program came from the efforts mounted in the archdiocese of Chicago under Father (later Msgr.) John Egan. Although Egan did not begin the program in Chicago, he was selected to head it by Cardinal Samuel Stritch in 1946. The sheer size of the Chicago see, coupled with Egan's own personal dynamism, made the archdiocese the unofficial Cana leader in the nation. Egan and his co-workers soon were in demand in other dioceses seeking to emulate Chicago's success with the program. Out of Cana eventually emerged a premarital course of instruction called Pre-Cana.

Cana's format was a single day of conferences consisting of three talks, a roundtable discussion based on queries from a question box, and the renewal of the couple's wedding vows. The primary focus of the conferences was husband-wife relationships, but later sessions were devoted to parent-child relationships and parent-teenager relationships. Cana reached its peak in the 1950s. However, it declined in the 1960s, and its chief remnant is the Pre-Cana program, which developed into a marriage preparation program for engaged couples. See also Marriage Encounter; Marriage.

Canada, Catholicism in. Catholics have played an active role in Canadian history from its beginning, from the first European explorations of the northern half of the North American continent in the sixteenth century, through the founding of the first permanent settlements by Europeans in the seventeenth century and the establishment of Canada as a sovereign nation in the nineteenth century (1867), to the present. These earliest explorers and settlers were French Catholics; subsequent waves of immigration brought other Catholics from England and Ireland, Germany, Italy, Ukraine, Poland, the Philippines, and elsewhere. While Canada does not have an official state religion, Catholics by far form the largest single religious group. As of the 1991 census, about twelve and a half million Canadians describe themselves as Catholic (about 46 percent of a total population of approximately twenty-seven million Canadians). Of these, just over six million are French-speaking Catholics. For comparative purposes, just under ten million Canadians are Protestant; of these, the largest group is formed by members of the United Church (just over three million), followed closely by the Anglicans (just over two million).

Canada has two sets of Catholic bishops. There are fourteen metropolitan sees serving the Latin church: Edmonton, Halifax, Kingston, Moncton, Montreal, Ottawa, Quebec (primate), Regina, Rimouski, St. Boniface, St. John's, Sherbrooke, Toronto, and Vancouver; there is also an archdiocese of Winnipeg. The small but thriving Ukrainian Catholic community (approximately one hundred thousand in number), which began its migration in earnest at the end of the nineteenth century, has a separate episcopal hierarchy; its Metropolitan See is located in Winnipeg.

For most of Canadian history, the legal rights of Catholics to practice their religion have been well-protected. Under French rule in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, the rights of Catholics were firmly entrenched. In 1763, with the Treaty of Paris that terminated the Seven Years' War, the last of France's mainland North American territories passed into British control, and the situation of Catholics became more tenuous. The passage of the Quebec Act (1774), however, brought relief: on the condition that they take an oath of loyalty to the Crown, Catholics were now free to participate fully in civil life and to practice their religion without restraint. Catholics have thrived indeed in Canadian political life. Catholics have served as prime minister, the highest office in the Canadian federal parliamentary system, and as premier, the highest office in the provincial governments. A signal honor was the appointment in 1959 of a Catholic as governor general, the Queen's official representative in Canada; Georges Vanier, whose son Jean founded the l'Arche communities for the mentally handicapped, was only the second Canadian to hold the position.

In Canada, education falls under the purview of the provincial governments (in the Canadian Confederation, there are ten provinces, Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia, and two territories, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories). Educational prospects for Catholics in their own schools have been mixed. In some provinces, those with healthy Catholic populations, the provincial governments have supported parochial schools with tax relief; hence, in Quebec and Ontario, for example, there are vigorous Catholic school systems catering to the needs of many thousands of elementary and high school students. Elsewhere, as in Manitoba, the provincial governments have offered little in the way of financial and other support, and Catholic schools have been forced to rely wholly on the generosity of parents and local parishes.

There are some Catholic colleges and institutions of higher learning. The founding of colleges mirrors immigration patterns; hence, some colleges in Quebec were established quite early in the history of what would become Canada. Again, university education falls under provincial control, and Catholic colleges are often attached to the provincially-funded universities. For example, in Western Canada, St. Paul's College, a Jesuit institution, is affiliated with the University of Manitoba in Winnipeg.

In significant ways, Catholicism in Canada in the waning years of the twentieth century is similar to that in the United States. Vocations to the priesthood, and even more precipitiously for nuns, are declining. The laity continues to follow its own counsel in sexual and moral matters. Attendance at Sunday Mass has declined. The Canadian church has also been buffeted by revelations of sexual abuse of minors by priests, and the bishops are trying to become more responsive to the needs of the victims. Perhaps because of the Canadian penchant for moderation and civility, the "liberal-conservative" disputes that have marked the U.S. Catholic Church have, however, been more muted in Canada.

Catholicism and the Search for Canadian Identity: Canadian Catholic history, however, does differ profoundly from that of the United States in one crucial respect. The debate over language and culture that has coursed throughout Canadian history has left its mark on the Church as well. The search for a distinctive Canadian identity has been much complicated by the historical rivalry between France and England, with its North American repercussions. Canadians have tended to be divided by their founding cultures. One novelist has described French and English Canada as "two solitudes," a phrase that aptly conveys the insularity and, at times, mutual incomprehension of the founding peoples. In present-day Canada, the search for identity has been further complicated by nationalist stirrings in the province of Quebec: the call for Quebec's separation from the rest of Canada, which has been made off and on in recent decades, has stimulated increased reflection by all Canadians about the future shape of the country. Similarly, the many other ethnic groups that have contributed to the development of the nation, and who while now English-speaking are only imperfectly described as "English," also seek recognition of their role. To maintain unity, Canada is now officially a bilingual country, reflecting the historical contribution of French and English settlers. Government services are now available throughout the country in English and French. In recognition of all its peoples, Canada is also an avowedly multicultural country, cherishing the many distinctive cultures that have constituted the Canadian mosaic. It remains to be seen whether the government's recent championing of a bilingual, multicultural policy will sufficiently meet the concerns and aspirations of different Canadians.

The role of religion in Canadian history has been complex. The Church undoubtedly facilitated the maintenance of the distinctive French Canadian culture after the establishment of British rule over the former French North American territories in the eighteenth century. For many in Quebec until quite recently, being French Canadian and being Catholic were synonymous. By the same token, the Catholicism of Quebec proved a lightning rod for anti-French sentiments elsewhere in Canada. Especially in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, some in the ruling elites in English Canada tended to closely associate Anglo-Saxon "virtue" with Protestantism and, correspondingly, to despise Catholicism (and the French) as backward and superstitious. Fortunately, in a more ecumenical age, such notions have disappeared, or at least find less frequent public expression.

Yet, the history of the Catholics in Canada is more than the history of the French Canadians; about half of Canada's Catholics are of non-French descent. Perhaps surprisingly, although subject to the same misapprehension and bigotry, these Catholics, who settled in English Canada, did not as a rule identify with their French co-religionists. Rather, while all the while proudly maintaining their own Catholic identity, in their search for acceptance these Catholic immigrants to English Canada more usually assimilated the anti-French sentiments of the dominant culture.

It is often observed that Canada can boast the only city in the world, Winnipeg, in the western province of Manitoba, with three separate Catholic archdioceses: a French-speaking archdiocese in St. Boniface, a suburb of Winnipeg that is the largest French-Canadian settlement in the Western provinces; the English-speaking archdiocese of Winnipeg; and the Ukrainian Catholic archeparchy and metropolitan see. The situation in Winnipeg is, perhaps, a microcosm of the Canadian Catholic experience. In itself it recalls the waves of Catholic migration to Western Canada, first of French Canadians and then of Catholics from the British Isles, Ukraine, and elsewhere. The establishment of a separate archeparchy for the Ukrainians recognized the distinctiveness of their Eastern-rite church and has done much to preserve Ukrainian culture in the new world. But, the situation in Winnipeg also reflects the more ambiguous, perhaps less hopeful, side of Canadian cultural and religious life. The archdiocese of St. Boniface was the first of the three, established in the nineteenth century to foster the work of French Catholics in developing the West; it produced an impressive string of talented leaders. The heavy influx of non-French Latin-rite Catholics led to the creation early in the twentieth century of the separate archdiocese of Winnipeg. While again demonstrating a sensitivity to their different cultural past and aspirations, this also suggests the unwillingness of these Catholics to remain under the supervision of a French-speaking archbishop. Catholics constitute, in 1994, 45 percent of the total population of over 26 million. The largest concentration of Catholics is in Quebec. See also England, Catholicism in.

Bibliography

Murphy, Terrence, and Gerald Stortz, eds. Creed and Culture: The Place of English-Speaking Catholics in Canadian Society, 1750–1930. Montreal and Kingston: McGill-Queen's University Press, 1993.

JOSEPH WAWRYKOW

candle, symbol of divine light, purity, and holiness. Though originally candles were functional, providing light in the dark catacombs, their principal use was symbolic. Burning votive candles honored graves of martyrs and images of saints, who were thought to be in some way present there, themselves sharing divine life and light. Lighted candles are held by Christians renewing their baptismal promises, carried before bishops and clergy in processions, carried before the Gospel, and placed at the altar to designate Christ's presence. Finally, the paschal candle stands as a striking symbol of the Risen Christ, Light of the world. See also paschal candle; votive candle.

Candlemas, a feast, originally commemorating the purification of the Blessed Virgin and now called the Presentation of Our Lord, celebrated on February 2 with the blessing of candles. Both Christologi-cal and Marian themes are reflected in the texts of the day's office and eucharistic liturgy. The feast, which is first mentioned in Egeria's fourth-century descriptions of worship in Jerusalem, apparently spread to Rome at an early date. The use of candles was introduced in Jerusalem in the mid-fifth century by a Roman matron. Although the Christmas season officially ends after the Epiphany (January 6) with the feast of Our Lord's Baptism, Candlemas is sometimes identified as the formal ending of the Christmas cycle. See also Presentation.

Canisius, St. Peter (kah-nee'shuhs), 1521–97, Jesuit catechist and missionary, canonized a saint and declared a Doctor of the Church (1925) for defending and reestablishing Catholicism in Reformation Germany. Born in the Netherlands, Peter studied theology in Cologne (1536–46), joined the devout circle of priests surrounding the Carthusian Lanspergius, and entered the Society of Jesus (1543). After working in Italy, he returned to Germany, where his deep piety and inexhaustible energy earned him the title "Second Apostle of Germany after Boniface." Despite his conflicts with Catholics and Jesuit superiors, Canisius organized the German Jesuit province (1556–69) and established a network of Jesuit colleges which anchored the revival of German Catholic piety and learning. Most important, Canisius's popular and enduring catechism, Institutiones Christianae Pietatis (1558–59), defined an effective method of German lay religious education by outlining Catholic doctrine in a concise question and answer format. Feast day: December 21. See also Germany, Catholicism in.

Cano, Melchior, 1509–60, Spanish Dominican theologian. After studying under Francis de Vittoria in Salamanca (1527–31), he taught at Valladolid (1533–42) before moving on to Alcalá, succeeding de Vittoria at Salamanca in 1546. A zealous supporter of the Inquisition in its attacks on heresy and Erasmian humanists, he was also a determined critic of the Jesuits. At the Council of Trent, he opposed concessions to the Protestants on the Eucharist. Orthodoxy and personal antipathy involved him in long clash with Bartholomew Carranza, archbishop of Toledo. Cano's theology was marked by an unscholastic literary style and extensive use of early Christian authors. His De Locis Theologicis categorized and ranked the sources of doctrine for succeeding generations of Catholic theologians: Scripture, oral tradition, the Catholic Church, Church councils, the Roman Church, early Christian authors, theologians, reason, philosophers, and human history. See also theology.

canon [liturgical], characteristic liturgical unit of Byzantine-rite orthros (Matins), which is comprised of nine odes, each one a series of poetic stanzas or refrains on the theme of one of the nine biblical canticles once distributed throughout the week at orthros, with all nine chanted only at the Saturday All-Night Vigil. In the eighth century, the poetic canons began to replace the scriptural canticles. Today ode 2 is always omitted except in Lent. See also eucharistic prayer.

canon [title], an ecclesiastical title that refers to a diocesan priest attached to a cathedral and to a member of certain religious orders. A cathedral canon is a member of the college of priests whose duty it is to celebrate solemn liturgical functions in a cathedral or collegial church. A canon regular is a member of a specific kind of religious order. See also canoness; canons regular.

canoness, in the early Middle Ages, the designation for a woman living in religious community under a rule, but without taking perpetual vows. Abbeys of secular canonesses were valued by princes who used them as safe haven for their daughters. After the sixteenth century, these abbeys generally functioned as residences for noblewomen. In the wake of the eleventh-century renewal effort of Pope Gregory VII, some communities of secular canonesses adopted the Rule of St. Augustine. These groups, and others formed in tandem with congregations of canons regular, became regular canonesses. Regular canonesses are nuns, living a life of prayer and taking perpetual vows. See also abbey; canon [title]; canons regular; religious life.

canonical defect. See defect, canonical.

canonical doubt. See doubt [canonical law].

canonical election. See election, canonical.

canonical faculties. See faculties, canonical.

canonical form, the requirement that all Catholics be married before a properly authorized Catholic minister and two witnesses. Usually the minister is a priest or deacon who is authorized to perform marriages by virtue of his office or by delegation from the pastor or bishop. Church law allows a lay minister to officiate if the bishops of a country request authorization from the Holy See. In interfaith marriages; i.e., between a Catholic and a non-Christian, Catholics may receive a dispensation from this obligation and marry in any public forum. See also marriage law.

canonical hours. See Liturgy of the Hours.

canonical mandate. See mandate to teach.

canonical mission, authorization to exercise governing power in the Church; used in some instances for other formal authorizations, such as to preach or teach.

The pope receives his mission upon acceptance of election as pope; others receive their missions from competent authority. Prior to Vatican II, canonical mission was seen as the source of power for bishops. Since the council, bishops are understood to receive the functions of teaching, sanctifying, and governing with ordination to the episcopate; canonical mission specifies the persons on behalf of whom bishops exercise these functions with binding force.

Similarly, others receive a share in governing power through canonical mission, either in the conferral of an ecclesiastical office (such as pastor, diocesan official, etc.) or by delegation for a specific task.

Catechists in missionary areas can also receive a canonical mission. This places them in charge of a community, with responsibilities that go beyond catechizing.

Canonical mission is sometimes used for the authorization to preach or teach. Until Vatican II, teaching was considered a dimension of the Church's power of jurisdiction. Teachers in government schools in Germany and other countries bound by treaty (concordat) with the Holy See need a canonical mission to teach Catholic religion. Since 1932, a canonical mission is required to teach theology or related fields on ecclesiastical faculties (which grant degrees on authorization of the Vatican). The proposal to extend this to teachers in other institutions resulted in the 1983 code's requirement of a "canonical mandate." See also mandate to teach; theologian.

JAMES H. PROVOST

canonical penance, an elaborate form of sacramental reconciliation in the early centuries of the Church intended for serious, public sinners. It required public acts of penance by an order of penitents. The whole community was involved in the process of reconciliation by its prayers of intercession. In the West, penitents were reconciled to the Church after a period of penitence on Holy Thursday, and in the East on Good Friday. Since canonical penance was offered to the individual only once in a lifetime, many people put it off until the time of death. In the early Middle Ages this form of public penance was gradually replaced by the individual, private confession introduced to Europe by Irish monks. See also Reconciliation.

canonicity. See canon of the Scriptures.

canonist, a practitioner or scholar of canon law, holding the degree of license (J.C.L.) or doctor (J.C.D.) of canon law, or doctor of both canon law and civil law (J.U.D.). The degree of license confers the right to teach canon law in seminaries and comparable faculties. It is comparable to a master's degree in the United States. Canonists work in marriage tribunals and other Church offices, or they teach canon law in seminaries and universities.

canonization, the process whereby the Church declares a person to be a saint and worthy of veneration by the faithful.

History: The early Church believed that martyrs who gave their lives for Christ attained eternal life. The Church commemorated the anniversary date of their death not in mourning but in joy. Confessors, those who suffered for the faith during the persecutions but were spared death, were also venerated. In time, Christians who lived an exemplary life, especially those who practiced great austerity and penance (in the spirit of the martyrs), were added to the list of those honored.

Eventually, the Church venerated others: e.g., holy bishops, missionaries, virgins, and Doctors of the Church. There was as yet no formal process whereby a person was declared a saint. Popular opinion added innumerable names to the list (Gk., kanōn) of those honored as saints. Each locality had its own patron saints. Abuses arose and the Church began to regulate the process. While the devotion of the people still initiated the process, bishops assumed the responsibility for making the official declaration of sainthood. The life of the holy person and a record of alleged miracles were studied, and upon the bishop's affirmation a feast day was assigned to be celebrated within the diocese.

The pope, in his role as chief pastor, became involved in canonizations because it was perceived as adding prestige to the process. According to one source, the first saint for whom records of canonization exist is St. Udalricus, canonized in 973. However, it is generally agreed that the first formal papal canonization was of Ulric, bishop of Augsburg, who died in 973 and was canonized by John XV in 993 at the Lateran Basilica in Rome.

Since that time, the process has become more formalized. In 1234, Gregory IX decreed that papal canonization was the only legitimate one. Sixtus V in 1588 entrusted the Sacred Congregation of Rites with the responsibility of processing candidacies for canonization. In 1983, Pope John Paul II issued the apostolic constitution Divinus Perfectionis Magister ("Divine Teacher and Model of Perfection"), which revised and simplified the norms and procedures. The Congregation for the Causes of Saints is responsible for the process.

Process: A preliminary step in the process is the introduction of the cause by a petitioner who writes to the bishop. The bishop then assigns a postulator who investigates the life and writings of the person. The postulator is a person, ordained or lay, who is expert in theological, canonical, and historical matters as well as familiar with the workings of the Congregation. The results of this investigation, a biography, and all published writings are presented to the bishop. Alleged miracles are investigated by experts.

The bishop or his delegate then oversees the questioning of witnesses and the investigation of writings. The bishop is responsible for consulting regional bishops, the faithful, experts called to testify, and the pope. All of the documents, The Acts of the Cause, are sent to Rome where they are reviewed by the Congregation for the Causes of Saints.

The juridical process involves beatification and canonization. If, after a person has been beatified, additional miracles are alleged, a further process of investigation and verification is undertaken. Upon a positive completion of this process, the pope issues a bull of canonization declaring the blessed to be a saint and extending veneration of the saint to the whole Church. An elaborate and solemn ceremony celebrates the canonization. See also beatification; saints; saints, devotion to. REGINA COLL canon law, the law of the Church. The word "canon" is from the Greek word for "rule" and refers to a given ecclesiastical law. Canon law is concerned with matters that touch upon the mission of the Church and upon the relationships within the Catholic communion. These subjects include such matters as norms for the celebration of the sacraments and public worship, for the preaching of the gospel, for the organization of clerical and religious life, for Catholic education, for the use and administration of Church property, for procedures in the adjudication of conflicts, for the allocation of penalties, and for the rights and obligations of the Christian faithful.

The laws of the Church are related to, but not commensurate with, either moral law or Catholic doctrinal teaching. Some of the matters canon law touches upon are purely disciplinary and are subject to change on the part of the Church; indeed many of these have changed in the course of the Church's history. Some of these laws might also be dispensed from, i.e., suspended by proper authority for due cause in a given instance. Other laws are considered to reiterate natural law (discoverable by reason in the created order) or divine positive law (given by revelation) and are considered to be unchangeable. Although canon law itself asserts that the ultimate source of certain canons is natural or divine law, it is helpful to refer to commentators in order to ascertain the origin and force of a given law.

Universal and Particular Laws: Canon law includes both laws that are universal and those that are particular. The universal laws are laid down for everyone everywhere while the particular hold force only for a given territory (e.g., a diocese) or for a given group of the faithful (e.g., members of a religious order). The supreme authority of the Church (i.e., the college of bishops in union with the head of that college, the pope, or the pope as the head of that college) is the ecclesiastical source of universal laws.

The universal laws for the Catholic Church are found first of all in two codes of canon law, both recently promulgated. The first is the Code of Canon Law (1983), which holds legislation for the Western Catholic Church. The second is the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches (1990), established for those Eastern churches in full communion with Rome.

In addition to the universal law found in these codes, universal laws are found in the liturgical books of each rite. Liturgical laws, for the most part, are not included in either Eastern or Western codifications. There are as well universal laws that are agreements with civil governments.

Universal laws are also found in other legislative texts dealing with various matters, e.g., the election of the pope or the organization of the Roman Curia. Universal laws are usually promulgated in the official Vatican journal, Acta Apostolicae Sedis (The Acts of the Apostolic See), and usually take effect two months after the date of the issue in which they are printed; at times other methods of promulgation and a shorter or longer hiatus (Lat., vacatio legis) between promulgation and effective date are employed.

Particular laws are those enacted for a certain territory or given group of the faithful, e.g., for a given diocese or religious institute. These are legislated by the authority competent to do so and must be promulgated in accord with the laws governing the group.

Historical Development: Canon law has developed historically from a number of sources. Writers from the post-NT era (ca. 95) produced "church orders" treating of such matters as the organization of the early Church and the manner in which the sacraments should be celebrated. The writings of early Church Fathers added to Church laws as well. Church councils, both local and worldwide, have dealt not only with doctrinal issues, but also with concerns touching disciplinary matters; these added to the body of canon law and continued to do so even into the twentieth century. Responses from the Roman see to questions raised by unforeseen situations also augment the law. In the history of the Church a growing degree of sophistication accompanied the collecting of, and commenting upon, Church laws. Of particular note is the canonist Gratian (d. 1140), whose collection was not only the most complete but also the most scientifically organized of the Middle Ages and was used as a common text until the first codification of canon law in 1917.

Although there had been a procedure put into place for the continuous updating of the 1917 code of canon law at the time of its promulgation, that procedure was never used and many modifications of the code made the status of numerous laws confused. More importantly, it was necessary to rethink the very role of law in the life of the Church. Consequently, when Pope John XXIII announced in 1959 his intention to call an ecumenical council (Vatican II), he also announced the revision of the code of canon law. The later task was not, and could not, be thoroughly addressed until the council had deliberated. Pope Paul VI gave the revising commission its charge, and ten principles that were to guide the revision were approved by the Synod of Bishops in October 1967. Among these principles can be found a concern for the necessity for law in the life of the Church so long as the law is used in a pastoral manner, a concern that the law be implemented in accordance with the principle of subsidiarity, and a concern for protecting the rights of the faithful. The revision itself was completed under Pope John Paul II, who promulgated the new code on January 25, 1983, the anniversary of John XXIII's announcement of the revision. The new code went into effect on the first Sunday of Advent, November 27, 1983. Although the Eastern Catholic churches had never had a complete codification of their laws, a commission was established to revise those that had been codified and to complete the process of codification. The Eastern code was promulgated on October 18, 1990, and went into effect on October 1, 1991. Although the Latin text remains normative in both codes, there are approved English translations for the United States done by the Canon Law Society of America. See also canon law, interpretation of; Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches.

Bibliography

Code of Canon Law. Latin-English ed. Washington, DC: Canon Law Society of America, 1983.

Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches. Latin-English ed. Canon Law Society of America, 1991.

Coriden, James, Thomas Green, and Donald Heintschel, eds. The Code of Canon Law: A Text and Commentary. Commissioned by the Canon Law Society of America. New York and Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press, 1985.

JOHN LAHEY

canon law, interpretation of, the understanding and application of the rules and regulations of the Church. It is used in two distinct senses: (1) Official and authoritative interpretation is given by the lawmaker or someone empowered by the lawmaker (can. 16). Such authoritative interpretations have the force of law. Judicial and administrative decisions do not have the same power of precedent in interpreting canon law as they do in civil law. In other words, there is no doctrine of stare decisis (Lat., "let the decision stand") in canon law. (2) All other persons who attempt to understand the meaning of the Church's canons or rules and their application to individual situations do so in accord with a set of principles or guidelines. Some of these are expressly stated in the code of canon law, while others are drawn from the Church's canonical tradition.

The first step in interpretation is to discern the authority of the source of the rule and the force of its obligation. Then one searches out the accepted canonical meaning of the terms used in the particular setting and in this area of the law. "Ecclesiastical laws are to be understood in accord with the proper meaning of the words considered in their text and context" (can. 17). It is of fundamental importance to determine the literary genre being employed, e.g., doctrinal declaration, exhortation, recommendation, or command. If the meaning is still doubtful or obscure, one looks for parallels, i.e., other places in the canons where the same topic is treated or the same language used. The circumstances in which the law was made (its legislative history and pastoral context) and the purpose for which it was made are of vital importance in understanding the law; canonists say "the purpose of the law is the soul of the law." Closely associated with the purpose of the law is another interpretive source: "the mind of the legislator," i.e., the intention of the Church in proposing the rule.

The Code of Canon law also asserts a principle of strict or narrow interpretation. Laws that include a penalty or restrict the free exercise of rights or that are exceptions to more general norms are subject to strict interpretation (can. 18). That is, they are narrowly construed and applied in as limited a manner and scope as reasonably possible.

In canon law the actions of the community affect the force of the law. "Custom is the best interpreter of laws" (can. 27). This means that the practice of the community of believers confirms and clarifies the meaning of the law. The way that a rule is actually applied by the faithful over time is the best indicator of its meaning. This "sense of the faithful" has another side: the doctrine of reception. When the community accepts a new rule and abides by it, the rule is confirmed by the people's actions in conformity with it. When the community does not recognize or receive the rule in practice, then the rule is without effect.

The overarching principle of canonical interpretation is that stated in the final canon of the code (can. 1752): the salvation of souls is always the supreme law of the Church. The law is to be understood and applied to the spiritual benefit of the people, and never to their detriment.

The principles of epikeia (Gk., "act of justice"), canonical equity, pastoral discretion, and oikonomia (Gk., "economy") must also be brought to bear in the interpretation of canon law. See also canon law; economy, principle of; epikeia; reception of law.

JAMES CORIDEN

canon law, rights and obligations in. See rights and obligations in canon law.

Canon Law Society of America, a professional association of canon lawyers and persons interested in canon law. Founded in 1939, it is dedicated to promoting pastoral ministry, cooperates in the renewal of church law, encourages canonical research and study, responds to practical needs, and facilitates cooperation and dialogue.

The society holds annual national conventions, publishes books and a newsletter, sponsors workshops and symposia, and provides referral services through its executive coordinator. It is governed by a board of governors formed of elected officers and consultors.

Since 1965 it has worked to implement Vatican II reforms and collaborated in the critique of drafts for the new Code of Canon Law. The society has developed a "due process" plan for protecting and vindicating rights in the Church. The society works to educate Catholics about the new Code of Canon Law (1983). It has published English translations of the 1983 Latin code and 1990 Eastern code and sponsored a major commentary on the 1983 code. See also canon law.

Canon of the Mass, the central prayer of the Eucharistic Liturgy, more commonly referred to as the Eucharistic Prayer since Vatican II (1962–65). The word "canon" is Greek in origin and means "measuring rod" or "rule." It thus conveys the sense of an established norm. "Canon of the Mass" was the phrase used to describe the single Eucharistic Prayer that prevailed in the Western Church from the Middle Ages until the introduction of new eucharistic prayers after Vatican II. It has its roots in the fourth century and underwent minor modifications throughout later centuries. Traditionally known as the Roman Canon, it is referred to now as Eucharistic Prayer I. See also Eucharist; eucharistic prayer.

canon of the Scriptures (Gk., kanōn, "norm," "standard"), an authoritative corpus of writings considered normative for faith. In this sense the word appears to have been first used by Athanasius in his Decrees of the Synod of Nicaea (ca. 350). The traditional view is that the Pentateuch, or Torah, was "canonized" by Ezra and the "men of the Great Assembly" after the Babylonian exile, and that the other two parts of the tripartite Hebrew Bible were given final form at the Council of Jamnia (Yavneh) after the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. It is now acknowledged that this view is greatly oversimplified.

The first text claiming an authority that can retrospectively be called canonical is Deuteronomy, the first edition of which is generally dated to the reign of Josiah (640–609 B.C.) and the final version to the Babylonian exile some seventy years later. The book of the law administered by Ezra in the mid-fifth century B.C. (Ezra 7:14, 21, 25–26) was probably not the entire Pentateuch, though the Pentateuch must have achieved its more or less final form not much later in the Persian period. This compilation enjoyed the highest authority as the word of God communicated to Israel through Moses, its human author. Indeed, Sirach, or Ecclesiasticus (24:23), identifies the Torah with personified wisdom, the firstborn of creation.

The designation of the historical books (Joshua through 2 Kings) as Former Prophets is explained by the conviction of later compilers that the writing of the national history was a prophetic prerogative. Additions to the Latter Prophets (Isaiah through Malachi) continued to be made as late as the second century B.C., while the third part, or Writings, was not fixed at least until early Christian times. The propriety of including certain books (Ecclesiastes, or Qoheleth, and Canticle of Canticles) was debated during the Yavnean period following the fall of Jerusalem (A.D. 70), but there was nothing resembling a council at which the biblical canon was fixed. The threefold division of the Hebrew Bible is first attested in the prologue to the Greek translation of Sirach (Ecclesiasticus) which speaks of the law, the prophets, and the other writings. About two centuries later, the Jewish historian Josephus lists the five books of Moses, thirteen prophetic books, and four books containing hymns and precepts (presumably Psalms, Proverbs, Canticle of Canticles, and Job) as the authoritative writings of his people (Against Apion 1:37–41). The first complete Jewish list of biblical books with their putative authors appears in the Babylonian Talmud (b. B. Bat. 14b–15a).

During the apostolic and subapostolic periods Christians appropriated the Jewish Scriptures and added writings of their own. Most Christian churches, however, read the Scriptures in the Old Greek translation known as the Septuagint, which contained additional books and arranged the contents in a different order. Disregarding the division between Prophets (Nebi'im) and Writings (Ketubim), the translators set out the books according to literary genre, i.e., historical, poetic and didactic, prophetic. The term Septuagint (LXX) reflects the legendary account of the origins of this version in Aristeas (ca. 100 B.C.), according to which the translation was made at one time over a period of seventy-two days by seventy or seventy-two translators brought to Alexandria at the instance of Ptolemy II Philadelphus. In point of fact, the translation was made over a long period of time, beginning with the Pentateuch in the third century B.C. It should be added that the understanding of the Septuagint as a distinct Alexandrian canon is no longer widely accepted.

Defining the Canon: In the early days of Christianity there was no fixed and closed canon; witness the fact that NT authors refer to apocryphal (deuterocanonical) writings in much the same way as to other biblical books. The need to define more precisely which books were to be accepted as scriptural arose from the requirements of controversy with Jews, as in the polemical writings of Justin in the mid-second century. The process was hastened by the reaction to the Gnostic Marcion, expelled from the Church about the same time, who rejected the OT and all early Christian writings with the exception of Luke (minus the infancy Gospel) and ten Pauline Letters. Controversy over acceptance of a shorter or longer (Alexandrian) list of biblical books continued throughout the first four centuries and, residually, later. Origen, Athanasius, and Jerome argued for the shorter list, Augustine for the longer. The Council of Trent (1545–63) decided for inclusion of the deuterocanonical books, partly on the basis of Church usage, and partly in response to the Reformers' rejection of them. (One reason was appeal to 2 Macc 12:46 in support of the doctrine of purgatory.) This is no longer a burning issue; some recent versions (e.g., the NRSV) include the deuterocanonical books.

The Canon of the New Testament: The NT as we have it, comprising twenty-seven books, did not win general acceptance until the fourth century, and in fact the term "New Testament" referring to a corpus of early Christian writings is not attested until well into the second century. One of the main reasons for the acceptance of certain books and the rejection of others was apostolic authorship; hence the status of Hebrews was uncertain due to doubts about its Pauline authorship. Equally important, however, were ecclesiastical, and especially liturgical, usage and an assessment of the book's conformity with the rule of faith. Hence several Gospels attributed to apostles, e.g., the Gospel of Thomas and the Gospel of Peter, were rejected; in some quarters the Gospel of John was suspect due to its popularity with Gnostic groups; and eventually consensus coalesced around four Gospels and four Gospels alone that were thought to be composed either by apostles or their associates. For similar reasons many Acts of apostles (e.g., Acts of Paul and Thecla, Acts of Peter) were excluded from canonicity and thirteen Pauline Letters were accepted. Due to its popularity among millenarian groups, Revelation was for a long time treated with suspicion. It can be said, finally, that canonicity is no longer a divisive issue among the churches, and questions of authorship of NT books is a matter of free discussion among Catholic scholars. See also extracanonical writings.

Bibliography

Beckwith, Roger T. The Old Testament Canon of the New Testament Church and Its Background in Early Judaism. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1985.

Blenkinsopp, Joseph. Prophecy and Canon: A Contribution to the Study of Jewish Origins. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1977.

Metzger, Bruce. The Canon of the New Testament: Its Origin, Development, and Significance. Oxford: Clarendon Press; New York: Oxford University Press, 1987. JOSEPH BLENKINSOPP canon penitentiary, diocesan priest, appointed by the bishop, with the power to absolve from automatic censures (Lat., latae sententiae) that are not reserved to the Holy See, e.g., the procuring of an abortion (can. 508). See also cathedral chapter; Penitentiary, Apostolic.

canons regular, members of a clerical religious institute, as distinct from monastic, mendicant, and apostolic institutes. Most of them adopted the Rule of St. Augustine. Originating in the Middle Ages, at first the canons regular did not generally engage in the care of souls. They came together for prayer and life in community. Today they are active in many kinds of apostolic work, including parishes, missions, teaching, and the liturgical apostolate. Fewer than a dozen orders of canons exist today. Chief among them are the Premonstratensians (Norbertines), the Canons Regular of St. Augustine, and the Canons Regular of the Holy Cross (Crosiers). See also Augustinian Canons; Crosier Fathers and Brothers; Norbertines.

Canons Regular of Premontré. See Norbertines.

canopy, a large covering. In Christian usage, the term may refer to a covering over the altar area (also called a baldachino; It.) or the portable covering (also called a baldachino or ombrellino; It.) carried over a priest who processes with the Eucharist; the latter use is rapidly becoming obsolete. See also baldachino.

Canossa, northern Italian fortress and site of a temporary reconciliation between Pope Gregory VII and the excommunicated emperor Henry IV. In 1076, while en route to a council in Germany to depose the emperor, Gregory was intercepted by Henry who, simulating penitence, asked for and received papal absolution. See also Gregory VII.

cantata, musical term describing a composition written to be sung (usually by solo voices and a choir), as opposed to one written to be played (a sonata). The composition, usually inspired by biblical material, is more common in the Reformed tradition (especially in Lutheran circles) than in the Catholic tradition.

Canterbury, cathedral city in Kent, England; mother church of Anglicanism and seat of the archbishop of Canterbury. In 597 St. Augustine (d. 605) established a Benedictine mission in England. The mission was successful and a monastery established. The present Cathedral of Christ Church, built by Archbishop Lanfranc (d. 1189), is the third building on the site. Excavations in 1993 revealed the remains of a Saxon church, proving an unbroken continuity of worship on the site since the time of Augustine of Canterbury.

As spiritual leaders of the mother church of England, the archbishops of Canterbury have played significant roles not only in the affairs of the Church but in affairs of state. The formidable men who have sat in the seat of Augustine include Anselm (d. 1109), whose contribution to philosophy, theology, spirituality, and secular life may be unrivaled. In medieval history and spirituality, the impact of Thomas Becket (d. 1170) added to the luster of Canterbury. His bold defiance of the power of the state led to his murder at the hands of four knights sent by King Henry II (December 29, 1170). Such was the sanctity and devotion that Becket inspired that the interior of the Cathedral was adapted to make the building more suitable as a place of pilgrimage. Geoffrey Chaucer's (d. 1400) masterpiece, The Canterbury Tales, is evidence of the enthusiasm that Becket's martyrdom produced.

In the sixteenth century, Archbishop Thomas Cranmer (d. 1556) was the compiler of the Book of Common Prayer, widely regarded as one of the greatest liturgical treasures of the Anglican Communion. Although at the Reformation the Holy Catholic Church in England became the Anglican Church of England, an unbroken line of 103 archbishops has served the people of England. The Cathedral attracts more than two million visitors a year. The archbishop of Canterbury resides in Canterbury and London (Lambeth Palace) and, since the growth of the Anglican Communion, is spiritual head of more than seventy million Anglicans in thirty-five provinces. Anglican links with the Catholic Church in England are strong and growing stronger. See also Anglicanism; England, Catholicism in.

GEORGE L. CAREY

canticle, a biblical poem apart from the Psalms, often used in liturgical services, especially in the Liturgy of the Hours. Canticles, especially frequent in the OT (e.g., Exod 15:1–19; Deut 32:1–43) but also found in the NT (e.g., Luke 1:46–55; 68–79; 2:29–32), are usually appended to the biblical Psalms in Eastern-rite liturgical Psalters, a practice seen even in some manuscripts of the Septuagint, the Greek OT.

Canticle of Canticles. See Song of Songs.

Cantius, St. John, 1390–1473, preacher, Scripture scholar, patron saint of Poland and Lithuania. Born in Kanti, Poland, he was noted for his scholarship (he held the chair of theology at Cracow), preaching, and concern for the poor. Feast day: December 23.

cantor, the person who intones the first note(s) of a musical composition or who serves as the musical leader for congregational singing. Cantors are common both in the performance of the monastic office and in parish liturgies, especially since the reforms of the Second Vatican Council (1962–65).

Canute, St., d. 1086, king and patron saint of Denmark. Having unsuccessfully employed military force to press his claim to the English throne (his uncle, King Canute, had reigned there), he was killed by Danish rebels, including his brother Olaf, who opposed his policy of taxation and tithes. Feast day: January 19.

Capistrano, St. John, 1386–1456, preacher, monastic reformer, and associate of Bernardino of Siena. Of noble background, Capistrano studied law and served as a magistrate before joining the Observant Franciscans in 1415. For the rest of his career he promoted monastic reform in the Franciscan order and elsewhere. A remarkable preacher, Capistrano spoke against the Fraticelli in Italy and the Hussites in central Europe. At the end of his life he preached and helped lead a crusade against the Turks, during which he died. He was canonized in 1690. Feast day: October 23.

capitalism, one of the two major economic systems—the other being socialism—addressed in modern Catholic social teaching, which extends from Pope Leo XIII's encyclical Rerum Novarum (1891) through Pope John Paul II's Centesimus Annus (1991). The identifying characteristics of capitalism are the private ownership of the means of production and a free market where the goods of production may be sold for profit. Modern Catholic social teaching is unequivocal in insisting that a market economy, properly ordered by concern for the common good, is a positive phenomenon because it contributes to the material well-being of persons and recognizes their dignity as free moral agents. Whether a particular economic system designated as capitalist is acceptable or not depends on whether concern for the common good is adequately structured into the society as a whole through juridical measures that limit the market.

John Paul II is clear on this point in Centesimus Annus, when he raises the question of whether the collapse of socialism means that capitalism is "victorious." The answer, he says, depends on what one means by capitalism. If one means "a system which recognizes the fundamental and positive role of business, the market, private property and the resulting responsibility for the means of production," the answer is yes. If one means "a system in which freedom in the economic sector is not circumscribed within a strong juridical framework which places it at the service of human freedom in its totality," then the answer is no (Centesimus Annus, n. 42). The latter constitutes "consumer society," which attempts to defeat Marxism through pure materialism by showing that a free market can fulfill a greater satisfaction of material needs than communism, while still excluding spiritual values (n. 19). See also Catholic social teachings.

TODD D. WHITMORE

capital punishment, infliction of the death penalty on persons convicted of serious crimes. It has been part of legal systems from antiquity on. It is called for in the Hebrew Bible as a punishment for murder, for striking or cursing one's parents, and for kidnapping (Exod 21:12–17) as well as for bestiality, for sorcery, and for sacrificing to alien gods (Exod 22:18–20). Reliance on the death penalty virtually disappeared from the Jewish tradition, both as a result of the loss of political autonomy and as result of heightened procedural barriers in the rabbinic period. Christians experienced the death penalty as an element of religious persecutions, but the major theologians (Augustine of Hippo, Thomas Aquinas, the Reformers) did not attack its legitimacy as such. However, capital punishment became a target for social critics in the aftermath of the Enlightenment. In the period since 1945 most Western societies have either completely abolished it or have drastically restricted its application. It often serves as an instrument of coercion in the hands of regimes that violate human rights on a large scale (Iran, South Africa, the former Soviet Union). Catholic teaching has been reluctant to condemn capital punishment in principle; but most recent popes and bishops have favored abolition and have appealed for clemency in particular cases. The major difficulties with justifying capital punishment as a contemporary practice are: (1) doubts about its necessity or usefulness as a means of preserving public order; (2) the possibility of error in the judicial process; (3) the repellent and inhumane character of the act; (4) its incompatibility with the teaching of Jesus on forgiveness; (5) inconclusive evidence on its effectiveness as a deterrent. For these and similar reasons, capital punishment has been rejected by the U.S. (1980) and Philippine (1992) bishops, even though there was strong public support in both societies for imposing the death penalty as a response to greatly increased crime. See also consistent ethic of life.

JOHN P. LANGAN

capital sins, those vices (pride, envy, anger, sloth, avarice, gluttony, and lust) that are the wellsprings from which sinful thoughts, behavior, and omissions arise. They are also called the "seven deadly sins." It is more precise to think of the capital sins as dispositions toward sinning rather than as sins properly speaking; that is, they are tendencies in our character that threaten moral goodness by predisposing us to sin. Pope Gregory the Great (d. 604) first used the designation "capital" to describe certain sins as being major, while Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) employed "capital" as a metaphor to designate those sins that were the source or fountainhead for other sins, from the Latin caput, "head." Over the centuries there have been differences about which sins should be included in the list of capital sins, the proper number of such sins, and the order in which they should be listed.

The enumeration of capital sins had its origin in the first centuries of Eastern monasticism, where lists were drawn up of vices harmful to monastic life. The Egyptian monk Evagrius Ponticus (d. 399) gave some precision to the various lists by defining eight malicious attitudes that engendered sin. John Cassian (d. 435) introduced the practices of Eastern monasticism to the West and with that knowledge came the roster of capital or deadly sins. The list of John Cassian was modified by Gregory the Great and this version is very close to the list as we know it. Gregory, however, specified eight, not seven, sins by distinguishing pride from vainglory. He also sought to make the list applicable to the lives of all Christians and not just those who lived in monasteries. It was Gregory's influence and prestige that ensured the popularity of listing the capital sins, although variations on the number and ordering of the sins continued. Peter Lombard (d. 1160) used Gregory's list and his was the source for Thomas Aquinas, who merged pride and vainglory to establish the seven capital sins we know today. A decision of the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215 to make annual confession of all mortal sin obligatory gave further prominence to the seven capital sins. To assist the worthy reception and administration of the sacrament, the list of capital sins, along with the Ten Commandments, became a common device for the penitent's examination of conscience and the confessor's inquiry into a person's life. Thus, the capital sins became a part of the ordinary experience of popular piety within Catholicism.

Notable in the long history of artistic acknowledgment of the seven deadly sins are Chaucer's inclusion of a long sermon on the capital sins in "The Parson's Tale" in his Canterbury Tales and Dante's utilization of the capital sins in his description of the terraces of purgatory in the Divine Comedy. Giotto and Lorenzetti created frescoes portraying the capital sins, while Bosch and Brueghel the Elder illustrated the seven deadly sins on canvas. See also avarice; gluttony; pride; vice.

KENNETH R. HIMES

Capitania, St. Bartolomea, also known as Capitanio, 1807–33, Italian-born cofounder of the Sisters of Charity of Lovere, an order devoted to the care of the poor and the sick, and to the education of children. Feast day: July 26.

cappa magna (Lat., "great cape"), a flowing cloaklike vestment with a train and hooded shoulder cape worn by bishops and cardinals. With the liturgical reforms mandated by the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), its form has been simplified (the cardinal's cappa is no longer made of watered silk and the train has been shortened) and its use has been restricted. Cardinals may wear it on solemn occasions, but only outside Rome. Bishops may also wear it on solemn occasions, but the pope no longer wears it.

Cappadocian Fathers, a designation taken from the name of the Roman province in east-central Asia Minor to apply to the remarkable group of theologians produced by the vigorous church there in the fourth century. Traditionally, the Cappadocian Fathers are Basil the Great, who became bishop of the capital Caesarea in 370, along with two persons he appointed to help him control the Church in the province: his brother Gregory, as bishop of Nyssa, and his friend Gregory of Nazianzus, as bishop of Sasima. All participated in the theological refutation of Arianism in the form developed by Eunomius, who was born in Cappadocia but, as a heretic, was usually not counted as one of this group. Sometimes the controversialist Amphilochius of Iconium is praised as "the fourth Cappadocian," but increasingly that term is reserved for Macrina, sister of Basil and Gregory of Nyssa. See also Basil, "the Great," St.; Gregory of Nazianzus, St.; Gregory of Nyssa, St.; Macrina, St.

Capreolus, John, ca. 1380–1444, Dominican theologian and noted interpreter of Thomas Aquinas. A native of Languedoc, he received the licentiate in theology from the University of Paris in 1411. His most famous work is the Defensiones, in which he defends the thought of Aquinas from the attacks of other prominent theologians such as Duns Scotus and Durandus of Saint-Pourçain and promotes the view that the Summa Theologiae offers the definitive statement of Thomas's thought. See also Aquinas, St. Thomas.

Capuchins (It., cappuccino, a pointed monastic hood), an independent reform branch (O.F.M. Cap.) of the Order of Friars Minor (Franciscans). The Capuchin reform began in 1525 in the Marches, Italy. The friars of this area had maintained resistance against what they considered the watering down of the Rule of St. Francis of Assisi, which dates from the early thirteenth century. By the sixteenth century, the Friars Minor, or Franciscans, consisted of the so-called Observants, who refused a fixed revenue but allowed secular agents to accept and use money for them, and the Conventuals, who accepted money without such intermediaries. The leader of the reform was Matteo di Bassi, who obtained verbal authorization from Pope Clement VII (d. 1534) to observe the rule literally by a strict interpretation of the vow of poverty, to depend on daily alms, to wear a habit with a pointed hood (which they considered the original habit of Francis), and to lead an evangelical life of both preaching and hermetical solitude. This reform movement quickly became detached from the Observants, who strongly opposed the reformers. After a somewhat complicated history of papal approval and disapproval, Pope Paul III (d. 1549) solemnly approved the Capuchins in 1536. Today, the Capuchins still form one of the three families of First Order Franciscans. See also Franciscan order.

Cardijn, Joseph, 1882–1967, Belgian cardinal, founder of the Young Christian Workers (known popularly as the Jocists). Imprisoned by the Nazis during the Second World War, he played a prominent role at the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), where his writings and pastoral example helped shape the council's teachings on the role of the laity in the Church and in the world. See also Jocists.

cardinal, title given to a member of the group, known as the College of Cardinals, that act as the pope's closest advisers in governance of the universal Church and serve as papal electors. The title may have originated from cardo (Lat., "hinge"), indicating a significant, permanent administrative official of a church, parish, or diocese, or it may have developed from incardinare (Lat., "to hang on a hinge") and the functioning of bishops and priests outside their own parishes or sees, specifically, in certain Roman basilicas and related parish churches during the latter part of the first millennium. See also Cardinals, College of.

Cardinals, College of, the juridic collegial body, composed of cardinals, that provides for election of the pope and that assists the pope in governing the universal Church on matters of great import, by participation in consistories, formal meetings of cardinals in the presence of the pope (Code of Canon Law, can. 349).

As part of the ecclesiastical reforms of the eleventh century, the bishops and priests who were cardinals of the church of Rome gained increased significance, became a collegial body, and in 1059, were deputed by Pope Nicholas II (d. 1061) as electors of the pope. The order of cardinal deacon, those deacons who had care of the poor in the seven districts of Rome, was also added to the College of Cardinals during that era. In 1586, Pope Sixtus V set the maximum number of cardinals at seventy, representing the seventy elders of Moses, but this limit was abrogated by Pope John XXIII in 1958. Though not previously required by legislation, with the promulgation of the 1917 Code of Canon Law the dignity of cardinal could be conferred only on a priest or bishop, and in 1962 John XXIII determined that all cardinals then and henceforth would be ordained as bishops. In 1965, Pope Paul VI formulated special norms for oriental patriarchs, bishops of major Eastern sees and heads of their rites, who were elevated to the College of Cardinals. In 1970, he determined that cardinals who had reached the age of eighty would remain members of the College but would cease to hold positions in the Roman Curia and would lose the right to elect the pope, concomitantly losing the right to enter the conclave for such an election. In 1973, Pope Paul VI set a limit of 120 on the number of cardinals who were eligible to elect the pope.

The pope alone appoints cardinals by publishing a decree of their names in the presence of the College of Cardinals. From the time of publication of this decree, those created cardinals are bound to the duties and possess the rights of cardinals, unless for some reason such as danger to the created cardinal the pope reserves the person's name in pectore (Lat., "in the breast") or in petto (It.), that is, "in secret" (can. 351).

The College of Cardinals has three orders—cardinal-bishop, cardinal-priest, and cardinal-deacon. Cardinal-bishops are those to whom the pope assigns the title of one of six neighboring dioceses of Rome and oriental patriarchs who have been named to the college but retain title to their own patriarchal see. Cardinal-priests are assigned titles to churches in the city of Rome, and cardinal-deacons are assigned title to what were formerly aid stations attached to churches in Rome and staffed by deacons during the late Middle Ages. Cardinal-bishops and cardinal-priests have no jurisdiction over their titular dioceses and churches but are expected to promote their welfare insofar as possible (can. 357).

As a collegial body, the College of Cardinals has a dean and an assistant dean, both of whom are elected by and from the cardinal-bishops and who must be approved by the pope and are required, thereafter, to reside in Rome. The dean presides over the college; the assistant dean presides when the dean is impeded. In either case, the presider acts as the first among equals and possesses no jurisdiction over the other cardinals (can. 352). By long-standing tradition, as well as by law, the dean of the College of Cardinals holds title to the diocese of Ostia, the seventh of the neighboring sees of Rome, in addition to his other titular church (can. 350.4). The dean, or, if impeded, the assistant dean, ordains to the episcopate the person elected pope if he is not already a bishop. The oldest cardinal-bishop may do so if both the dean and assistant dean are impeded. The first cardinal-deacon announces the name of the newly elected pope and, likewise, invests metropolitan bishops with the pallium, a symbol of authority worn about the neck, on behalf of the pope (c. 355).

Cardinals primarily assist in governance of the universal Church by their direct and close relationship to the pope as well as through various meetings with him and the other cardinals (can. 353). They are sometimes commissioned by the pope to represent him at solemn celebrations in the role of legatus a latere (Lat., "representative from the side"), or alter ego, and they also function as special envoys with competence over those matters entrusted to them by the pope (can. 357.2–3). See also cardinal; conclave; consistory; papal election; papal legate; Roman Curia.

ELIZABETH MCDONOUGH

cardinal virtues (Lat., cardo, "hinge"), prudence, justice, fortitude, and temperance, called "cardinal" because they are hinges on which many lesser virtues turn. In Nicomachean Ethics, the Greek philosopher Aristotle (d. 322 B.C.) organizes his discussion of the virtues around four broad traits of character that, in his view, are necessary to living a fully virtuous life. Prudence, or practical wisdom, the most important of all the cardinal virtues, enables its subject to discern the specific course of action that will best fulfill the requirements of a virtuous life in a particular situation; justice disposes to render the fairness due to each person; fortitude enables its subject to pursue the good in the face of contrary fears; temperance enables an individual to maintain a correct balance, and to observe appropriate limits, in the pursuit of sensual pleasures. This fourfold division proved to be of central significance for subsequent reflection on the virtues, becoming the classical form for organizing accounts of the virtuous life. As such, it appears in the writings of the Roman statesman and philosopher Cicero, as well as in the writings of early Christian theologians such as Gregory the Great and Augustine.

In his Summa Theologiae, Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) analyzes the cardinal virtues from two perspectives. In one way, they represent qualities of character that must all be present if someone's actions are to be virtuous in the fullest sense, so that, for example, an action must embody fairness and firmness of soul, as well as moderation, in order to be a fully virtuous action. In another way, they are distinctive virtues having to do with specific areas of human life; when he considers them from this perspective, Aquinas generally follows the analysis of Aristotle. Aquinas follows the classical and Christian authors in asserting that the cardinal virtues are necessary to living a good life, whether that is seen from a purely natural or a distinctively Christian point of view. Hence, the four cardinal virtues, together with the three theological virtues of faith, hope, and charity, form the integrating framework by which Aquinas organizes the detailed moral analysis of the second part of the second volume of the Summa Theologiae.

Subsequent Catholic moral theology followed the lead of Aquinas in taking the framework of the cardinal and theological virtues as the basis for organizing the ideals and duties of the Christian life. However, these virtues were increasingly seen as organizing principles for moral laws, and their function as ideals of character was increasingly lost. The movement away from Scholastic moral theology towards a more scriptural and theological understanding of the moral life since the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) had as one of its consequences a loss of interest in the framework of the cardinal and theological virtues. However, the renewed interest in virtue as a category of the moral life has led to a revival of interest in the cardinal virtues among philosophers as well as among moral theologians. See also fortitude; justice; prudence; temperance; virtue.

JEAN PORTER

Caritas International, a worldwide conglomerate of national Catholic charity-relief organizations that provide money and other kinds of assistance to those in need. The American branch of Caritas International is Catholic Relief Services (CRS), based in New York, which provides aid to victims of earthquakes, floods, droughts, and other natural disasters. Through CRS, American Catholics give aid to more than 18 million needy people in over eighty countries.

Carmel, Mount, a mountain range in Israel that extends from above Haifa for about fifteen miles southeast to the Samaritan hill country. From the days of the Phoenicians Mount Carmel has been regarded as a holy place. Isa 35:2 speaks of the "majesty of Carmel." Mount Carmel was the site of the confrontation between Elijah and the four hundred and fifty prophets of Baal (1 Kgs 18). Prehistoric caves are along the modern Wadi el-Mugharah above the Plain of Sharon. The Carmelite order had its origins ca. 1200 in a ravine at the Wadi-'ain-es-shiah on the western slope of Mount Carmel. See also Carmelite order; Elijah.

Carmelite order, an order of religious whose origins go back to ca. 1200, when penitent lay hermits formed a community at the Wadi-'ain-es-shiah, a ravine on a western slope of Mount Carmel about three miles south of Haifa. Between 1206 and 1214 these hermits received from Albert, patriarch of Jerusalem, a formula of life. Its themes were a following of Jesus in a solitude supported by community (individual cells surrounding an oratory), silence, daily Eucharist when possible, continual prayer, especially the psalms, manual labor, and the usual eremitic asceticism, with no mention of pastoral ministry. The formula initiated the basic tension in Carmelite life: solitude and community. Entry into the ranks of the friars later added ministerial community to that tension. Pope Gregory IX imposed corporate poverty on the hermits. Conditions in the Latin Kingdom forced some Carmelite hermits ca. 1238 to migrate to Cyprus, Sicily, England, and southern France.

In Europe the hermits confronted a dominant religious movement, the friars. In 1247 Pope Innocent IV approved a revision of the formula (now a rule) that allowed the hermits to settle in towns, effectively enrolling the Carmelites among the mendicants. Despite internal opposition to the abandonment of the eremitic life by the prior general Nicholas the Frenchman and others, the Carmelite friars spread rapidly to the towns of Europe. By the end of the thirteenth century the Carmelites were on their way toward becoming a student order like the Dominicans and the Franciscans. The Second Council of Lyons (1274) had put the future of the Carmelites and the Augustinian Friars on hold, but both orders received approval from Pope Boniface VIII in 1298.

Mary and Elijah: The Carmelites identified themselves with the Virgin Mary from their beginnings. The oratory on Mount Carmel was dedicated to her, and the Carmelites became known as the Brothers of Our Lady of Mount Carmel, whom they saw as their patroness. Eventually July 16, the feast of Our Lady of Mount Carmel, became the patronal feast of the order. The brown scapular, worn in honor of Mary, was not part of a literary tradition till late in the Middle Ages. Without a known founder, the Carmelites learned to look to Elijah as their "father"; Mount Carmel is a location sacred to the memory of this prophet. The fourteenth century saw the elaboration of a literary tradition in which Elijah is the inspiration and "founder" of the order. Later much energy was wasted on defending a literalist interpretation of this Elijan mythology, but Teresa of Ávila and John of the Cross had a profound respect for Elijah, and the Carmelite liturgy still celebrates July 20 as his feast day. Carl Jung called Elijah a "living archetype." Modern Carmelites are exploring further this archetype of Carmelite life.

After the rule, the most crucial text in medieval Carmelite spirituality was the Institution of the First Monks, composed about 1370 by Philip Ribot, the provincial of Catalonia. This text describes Carmelite life as a withdrawal from ordinary activities, a purification of the heart, and union with God in love, all this seen a journey in the spirit of Elijah. These are the roots of the Carmelite mystical tradition that would flourish in the sixteenth century with Teresa of Ávila and John of the Cross and in the seventeenth century with the Touraine reform. It is likely that Teresa and John had access to the Institution.

Reform and the Origin of the Carmelite Nuns: During the late Middle Ages the Carmelites, like other religious orders, attempted reform. In northern Italy they banded together as the Mantuan Congregation, which affirmed the solitude of the rule, poverty, and community life and forsook Pope Eugene IV's mitigation of the rule. The Carmelites' most important reformer prior to Teresa was John Soreth (d. 1471). Under Soreth the Carmelite nuns got their start. Since the thirteenth century women had associated themselves in various ways with the Carmelite friars, but the Carmelites did not establish a second order, of women, until 1452. With Teresa of Ávila Carmelite women became a primary manifestation of Carmelite life.

Genuine and lasting reform of Carmelite life was due to the genius of Doña Teresa de Ahumada—Teresa of Ávila (d. 1582). From an appreciation of Carmelite lore during the thirteenth century and out of her own religious experience, Teresa initiated in 1562 a series of foundations for women, small enough to ensure the solitude necessary for Carmelite contemplative life. Teresa then enlisted John of the Cross (d. 1591) as a collaborator in the reform of Carmelite women and men. However, the Discalced Carmelites became a separate order only in 1593 (O.C.D.). The original branch of the order, known as the Ancient Observance (O. Carm.), underwent a renewal in the seventeenth century called the Touraine reform, which like the Teresian reform influenced Carmelite life down to the twentieth century.

Modern Carmelites: The Carmelites underwent the same tribulations that other religious orders endured during the nineteenth century. However, two young nuns signaled with their holiness a new day for Carmelite women and men, Thérèse of Lisieux (d. 1897) and Elizabeth of the Trinity (d. 1906). In the middle of the twentieth century, Edith Stein and Titus Brandsma, both killed in Nazi concentration camps in 1942 and later beatified, manifested the vibrancy of the Carmelite charism and its call to foster a more contemplative Church. Today Carmelites of the Ancient Observance and the Discalced Carmelites have friars, nuns (Second Order), and Third Order Regular congregations of women as well as laity affiliated with their orders. The laity were known in the past as Third Order Secular Carmelites, now as lay or secular Carmelites. Most cloistered Carmelite women are under the governance of the local bishop. There is a congregation of men known as the Carmelites of the Blessed Virgin Mary the Immaculate situated in India (C.M.I.). See also Elizabeth of the Trinity, Bl.; hermit; John of the Cross, St.; mendicant orders; Simon Stock, St.; Stein, Bl. Edith; Teresa of Ávila, St.; Thérèse of Lisieux, St.

Bibliography

Egan, Keith J. "The Spirituality of the Carmelites." In Christian Spirituality, vol 2, edited by Jill Raitt. New York: Crossroad, 1987. Pp. 50–62.

———. "Carmelite Spirituality." In The New Dictionary of Catholic Spirituality, edited by Michael Downey. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1993. Pp. 117–25.

Smet, Joachim. The Carmelites: A History of the Brothers of Our Lady of Mount Carmel. 4 vols. Darien, IL: Carmelite Spiritual Center. 1975–85. Vol. 1 revised 1988. KEITH J. EGAN

Carmelite Sisters, an order founded by St. Berthold in about 1154 in Palestine. Permission for Carmelites to accept women into the Carmelite Second Order was granted in 1452, and the monastery of Our Lady of the Angels was founded in Florence, Italy.

The Carmelite rule demands strict poverty, a vegetarian diet, and solitude. In the sixteenth century, the demands of the Carmelite rule had become somewhat relaxed, and Teresa of Ávila, Anne of Jesus, and John of the Cross returned some of the Carmelites, then known as the Discalced, to their original severity. The Discalced Carmelites are among the best known cloistered women religious and follow a life of prayer and penance. They meditate for two hours daily and pray for priests and for the work of the Church.

The first Discalced Carmelites in the United States founded a convent at Port Tobacco, Maryland, in 1790. This convent was also the first foundation of women religious in the thirteen colonies. In addition to convents in the United States, the Discalced Carmelites have foundations around the world.

The Calced Carmelite nuns follow a "mitigated rule," less severe than that of the Discalced. They are still a cloistered order and dedicated to a contemplative life. They make altar breads and do needlework in order to support themselves, and pray in particular for priests, religious, and all in church ministries. The first United States Calced Carmelite community was founded in Allentown, Pennsylvania, in 1930. See also Carmelite order.

Carmelites of Mary Immaculate (C.M.I.), a Syro-Malabar Catholic religious congregation of men founded in India in 1831 by three diocesan priests, including Kuriakose Elias Chavara, under the protection of the Discalced Carmelite vicar apostolic of Verapoli (a diocese in Kerala, India), and Bernardino Baccinelli, who gave them their name and constitutions. Membership in 1994 is over one thousand men. Only about fifty serve in the United States and Canada. See also Carmelite order; Eastern Catholic religious.

Carmelite spirituality. See Carmelite order.

carnival (Lat., carnem levare, "put away meat"), the period of festivity prior to the beginning of Lent. It is a custom in many Catholic countries to observe the days before Lent as a period of dancing, parties, and public parades before the penitential season begins. Carnival ends with Mardi Gras (Fr., "Fat Tuesday"), and Lent begins with Ash Wednesday.

Carolingian reform, reform of society and Church carried out in Frankish lands by Charlemagne (d. 814) and his successors. The territories Charlemagne inherited and conquered had a patchwork of laws and traditions. To provide some structure to hold these realms together, he and his successors and their supporters reshaped the institutions of government and reformed the life of the Church. In the reign of Charlemagne's father, Chrodegang had already provided a rule for diocesan clergy. Later ecclesiastical reforms included a monastic revival, displacement of the Gallican liturgy by the Roman, establishment of a new provincial and diocesan structure (accompanied by development of the parish), provision of an educated clergy, and legislation for collection of the tithe. See also Charlemagne.

Carpatho-Russian Catholics. See Ruthenian Catholic Church.

Carroll, Charles, 1737–1832, American Catholic statesman. Born in Annapolis, Maryland, and educated in Europe, he was probably the richest man in the colonies. He induced Maryland Catholics, through his debate with the Tory Daniel Dulany in 1773, to espouse the patriot cause. As a representative of Maryland, he was the only Catholic to sign the Declaration of Independence. He helped frame the state constitution guaranteeing religious freedom and, as a Federalist, was one of the two senators sent by Maryland to the first Congress in 1789. Active in industry and agriculture, an original director of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, he died at the age of ninety-five.

Carroll, Daniel, 1730–96, American Catholic statesman. The older brother of Archbishop John Carroll, he was educated by the Jesuits in Maryland and France. A wealthy planter and merchant, he was elected frequently to the state senate and twice to the Continental Congress. He was (with Thomas FitzSimons) one of two Catholics to help frame and sign the United States Constitution and was one of the original six members elected to the House of Representatives from Maryland. Appointed by President George Washington, he was the most active commissioner in planning the national capital.

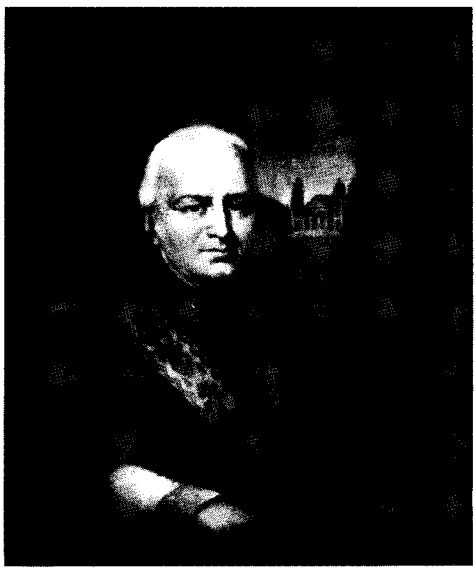
Carroll, John, 1736–1815, first Catholic bishop in the United States. Born in Upper Marlboro, Maryland, educated at Jesuit academies in Maryland and France, he entered the Society of Jesus in 1753 and was ordained a priest in 1761. With the suppression of the Jesuits in 1773 he returned to Maryland to serve as a missionary. In 1776 he was chosen by the Continental Congress to accompany a mission to Canada. In 1783 Carroll took the lead in organizing the Catholic clergy in the United States and in 1784 was chosen by Rome as superior of the American mission. When the Holy See allowed the clergy to elect a bishop, the lot fell to Carroll and Baltimore was named in the pontifical brief Ex Hac Apostolicae of November 6, 1789, the first Catholic see in the United States. Carroll was ordained bishop at Lulworth Castle in England on August 15, 1790.

In 1791 Carroll held the only synod of his twenty-five year episcopacy. He played a leading role in the founding of Georgetown College and St. Mary's Seminary in 1791, the first Catholic university and seminary in the new nation. Under him were also established the Carmelite and Visitation nuns and the Sisters of Charity. In 1805 he negotiated the restoration of the Society of Jesus in the United States. He was also active in the creation of many secular institutions and organizations devoted to education and philanthropy, the Library Company of Baltimore being the one of which he was proudest.

John Carroll, first bishop of the U.S. Catholic Church, appointed to the see of Baltimore in 1789; undated engraving.



Carroll published frequently in his early years when he was concerned about presenting Catholics and Catholic belief in a favorable light to Protestant Americans. His most ambitious literary effort was An Address to the Roman Catholics in the United States (1784).

Carroll encouraged lay trustees to build churches, and despite the problems visited upon him by several bodies of trustees who sought to usurp the bishop's authority over the temporal affairs of the Church—in New York, Philadelphia, Charleston, and even Baltimore—he never repudiated the system.

To Carroll had fallen the awesome task of adjusting an ancient faith to a new political order, which he accomplished with remarkable serenity and skill. He was architect of the Maryland tradition in American Catholicism: in his devotion to American principles, such as religious freedom and separation of Church and state, his broad ecumenism, his strong sense of public service, and the measure of independence he exercised in his relations with the Holy See while manifesting a strong attachment to the person of the pope as a symbol of unity. He was esteemed by Catholics and Protestants alike. See also United States of America, Catholicism in the. THOMAS SPALDING

Carta Caritatis (kahr'tah kahr-ee-tah'tis; Lat., "Charter of Charity"), constitution of the Cistercian order presented to Pope Callistus II in 1119 and finalized ca. 1155. Often attributed to Stephen Harding (d. 1134), abbot of Cîteaux, it is probably the result of his work as well as years of practice within the order itself. See also Cistercian order.

Carthage, former Phoenician colony in North Africa destroyed and then rebuilt by Rome, influential center of early Latin Christianity. Renowned for its martyrs, Perpetua and companions in 203 and Cyprian, martyr bishop in 258, Carthage experienced a lively and sophisticated church life reflected in the works of Tertullian in the first decades of the third century. It also hosted many Church councils of the mid-third century and was the locale of the disputed election of Caelician (311) in the aftermath of the Diocletian persecution. The resulting schism between Donatists and Catholics was not resolved for more than a century, even after the Council of Carthage (411) under the leadership of Augustine. Carthage fell to the Vandal invaders (439) under their king, Genseric. The Catholics were restored when the Arian Vandals were conquered by the Byzantine general, Belisarius (534), but the virtual end of Christianity in Carthage was signalled by the destruction of the city (698) by Islamic forces under the Arab general, Hassan ibn Al-Numan. See also Africa, the Church in Roman; Cyprian of Carthage, St., Donatism.

Carthusian order (O. Cart.), an order of men and women that emphasizes solitude and silence in the search of God in the context of monastic community. Fidelity to its eremitic ideals has led to this Carthusian boast: "They have never been reformed because they have never been deformed." Through the centuries this life of solitude elicited profound respect from deeply religious figures like William of Saint-Thierry, who, after a visit to the Charterhouse of Mont-Dieu, admiringly dedicated to them his enormously popular Golden Letter; Thomas More, who lived at the London Charterhouse for four years; John of the Cross, who wanted to leave the Carmelites for the Carthusians until Teresa of Ávila persuaded him otherwise; David Knowles, who composed some of his finest prose in honor of the London Carthusians martyred under Henry VIII; and Thomas Merton, who pondered departure from the Trappists so that he could become a Carthusian monk.

Origins: In 1084 Bruno (1030–1101), born at Cologne and dean of the cathedral school at Rheims, founded the Carthusians at a deserted and remote place in the Chartreuse mountain area in the French Alps about thirty miles from Grenoble. This monastery has been known as La Grande Chartreuse and is to this day the motherhouse of the Carthusians. Bruno, who founded another monastery in Calabria, wrote no rule since he wished his followers to follow the Benedictine rule. Bruno's writings and those of Guigo I (1109–36), the fifth prior of La Grande Chartreuse, are the foundational documents of the Carthusians and orient the order to a solitude that is for the sake of being alone with God. Guigo's Customs, a description of practice rather than proposed ideals, has served since its composition as the basic legislation governing Carthusian life. Guigo was a friend of Bernard of Clairvaux and Peter the Venerable. The order reached its peak of expansion at the time of the Reformation.

Women became Carthusians about 1145, when an ancient monastery of nuns at Prebayon, near Orange, France, impressed by the holiness of the Carthusian life, requested that they be affiliated with the order. Carthusian women lead an austere, simple, eremitic life of prayer within community structures like those of the men. Once she is finally professed and has completed her twenty-fifth year, a Carthusian nun may receive the rite of Virginal Consecration, which makes her a witness to the spousal relationship of Christ with the Church.

The supreme authority in the Carthusian order is the general chapter held at La Grande Chartreuse, whose prior is the minister general of the order. In the local charterhouses, the name for Carthusian monasteries, the officers are prior, vicar, procurator, and novice master with feminine variants for the nuns.

Setting and Life-style: The buildings at charterhouses are arranged to ensure a contemplative solitude. The cloister monks live in individual hermitages along a cloister that leads to the communal areas of the monastery. A hermitage of a cloister monk has an enclosed garden and is usually a two-story structure with four rooms where the monk spends most of his day. On the first story there is a workshop and an area for the storage of wood. On the second floor is a small Hail Mary room, so called because the monk pauses here to recite this prayer. The next room is where the cloister monk prays alone at an oratory, studies alone at a desk with bookshelf, and eats alone at a dining table. A large window in this room invites the monk to contemplate God's creation. Cloister monks are ordained to the priesthood but do not engage in ministry outside the monastery. Brothers, who are full members of this contemplative community, spend more time in manual labor than do the cloister monks. The brothers live in cells with workshops nearby. Besides these two categories of Carthusian life there are donate brothers, who have fewer obligations than the others and make a promise rather than take vows. The Carthusian nuns have the following forms of membership: choir religious, lay religious, and donate sisters.

The genius of Carthusian life lies in its unique and happy combination of communal gatherings and solitude. The community activities prevent solitude from degenerating into individualism and harmful isolation. Common areas of the monastery include the church, chapterhouse, refectory, and library. Community is further fostered by walks together through the countryside. The cloister monks take a long walk once a week. The brothers, who in their work share more of a common life, do so once a month. Twice each year the walk lasts a whole day.

Liturgy: The Carthusians have a distinctive rite that originated with the liturgy of Lyons used in the twelfth century in the diocese of Grenoble. The Carthusian liturgy is simple and sober, as befits an order committed to solitude and silence. The Carthusians recite much of the Divine Office in their hermitages but gather in the middle of the night to chant Matins and Lauds. On Sundays and special feast days more of the Office is recited in common. Carthusians have special devotion to Mary. Each day they recite the Office of the Blessed Virgin.

Despite the anonymity of their life, a number of Carthusians have become well-known authors. Besides Bruno and Guigo I, there were Guigo II (d. 1188), who composed the widely read Ladder of Monks; Ludolph of Saxony (d. 1378), author of a very influential Life of Christ; and Denis the Carthusian (d. 1471), prolific author whose mystical writings became very popular. The Carthusian libraries have been unique depositories of spiritual writings that have enriched both the monks and those for whom Carthusians have written.

The Charterhouse of the Transfiguration, Arlington, Vermont, is the only Carthusian monastery of men in North America. A handful of Carthusian monasteries of women exist in Italy, France, and Spain. See also Bruno Hartenfaust, St.; John of the Cross, St.; Knowles, David; Merton, Thomas; More, St. Thomas; William of Saint-Thierry. KEITH J. EGAN Carthusian spirituality. See Carthusian order.

Casanova, St. Leonard, also known as Leonard of Port Maurice, 1676–1751, patron saint of parish missions. An Italian Franciscan, he preached missions and retreats throughout Italy and was an ardent promoter of the Stations of the Cross devotion. Feast day: November 26.

Casel, Odo (oh'doh cas'uhl), 1886–1948), liturgical scholar and theologian. A Benedictine monk of Maria Laach and a major theologian of the twentieth-century liturgical movement, he elaborated a "theology of mystery" that understood the liturgy, especially the Mass, as the Church's representation of the Paschal Mystery. See also mystery; Paschal Mystery.

Casimir, St., 1458–84, patron saint of Poland and Lithuania. A member of the Polish royal family, he led a life of prayer, devotion to charity, and penance, resisting his family's desire that he marry. He died in Lithuania while on a royal visit and was buried in Vilna, where his tomb was much venerated. He was canonized in 1522. Feast day: March 4. See also Baltic Countries, Catholicism in the; Poland, Catholicism in.

Cassian, St. John, ca. 365–ca. 435, one of the most important early monastic figures in the West. Formerly a monk in Bethlehem and Egypt and deacon in Constantinople, he established two monasteries near Marseilles ca. 415. His Institutes and Conferences, expositions of Egyptian monasticism, strongly influenced the Rule of St. Benedict. Feast day: July 23. See also Benedict, Rule of St.

Cassiodorus, Flavius Magnus Aurelius (cas-ee-oh-dohr'uhs), ca. 485–ca. 580, statesman, scholar, and monastic founder. Cassiodorus served several Ostrogothic kings of Italy; after the collapse of their kingdom, he founded a monastery called Vivarium. His many translations and commentaries, along with the community library and scriptorium, were meant to preserve classical and Christian learning.

cassock, straight, ankle-length robe with long sleeves traditionally worn by clergy as ordinary dress and under their liturgical vestments. Color and trim indicate rank. The pope wears white; cardinals wear black with scarlet trim; bishops wear black with red trim; and priests wear solid black. Priests who belong to a religious community wear the habit proper to their community, instead of the cassock. The use of the cassock has declined since the Second Vatican Council (1962–65).

Cassock

Castel Gandolfo, hill town on the shore of Lake Albano eighteen miles southeast of Rome. Named for an early medieval family (Gandulfi) who had a fortress (It., castello) there, the town is now best known for a villa commissioned by Pope Urban VIII and designed by Carlo Maderno (ca. 1629–30) that is the summer residence of the pope.

In 1930 the Vatican Observatory moved its telescope from the Vatican to the summer villa where the astronomical observatory still remains under the supervision of the Jesuits.

The entire estate, together with the papal villa, belongs to the Vatican City State and, hence, is considered by the Italian government to enjoy extra territorial status. See also Vatican City State.

Casti Connubii (kah'stee kah-noo'bee-ee; Lat., "pure marriage"), "On Christian Marriage," encyclical letter of Pope Pius XI issued in 1930 affirming the Christian doctrine of marriage as chaste, monogamous, and faithful, emulating the Church's relationship to Christ. The encyclical's strong condemnation of contraception was the official Catholic response to its limited approval by the Lambeth Conference of 1930. This encyclical, together with the 1917 Code of Canon Law, is credited with introducing as a secondary end of marriage the mutual help of the spouses (procreation was the primary end). Casti Connubii inspired moral theologians to begin reflecting on the significance of marital love in assessing the morality of sexual acts, particularly contraception, which was then generally considered to be violative of both the primary and secondary ends of marriage. See also birth control.

A papal audience at Castel Gandolfo, the pope's summer residence in the hills just outside of Rome.

casuistry (Lat., casus, "a case"), the method of bringing general moral principles or norms to bear on particular cases for the purposes of informing conscience and guiding conduct. Such attention to the circumstantial features of moral action has long been a part of Christian moral inquiry, a natural consequence of the ongoing attempt to apply the broad scriptural imperatives of love and forgiveness, and the abstract precepts of natural and divine law, to the specific situations of everyday life. Early examples of casuistry may be found in the NT (cf. Mark 2:23–28; Luke 20:20–26; 1 Cor 7–8), and among early Christian writers (cf. Tertullian, On Spectacles; Augustine, On Lying); however, casuistry as a formal system developed only after the emergence and subsequent ecclesiastical regulation of universal private penance from the seventh to tenth centuries. Following the mandates of the Fourth Lateran Council (1215), making annual confession obligatory, and the Council of Trent (1551), requiring penitents to confess sins with respect to kind, number, and circumstance, specific courses in and manuals of "cases of conscience" were developed to train clerics charged with the pastoral duty of hearing confessions. With only slight modification this approach characterized Catholic moral theology until the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). Historically, casuistry has been criticized for, on the one hand, its tendency to moral laxism, and, on the other hand, a hairsplitting scrupulosity, Pascal's Provincial Letters (1656–57) giving voice most famously to the former. Recent moral theology has stressed the importance of biblical, systematic, and spiritual theology as the indispensible contexts for a casuistic approach. See also moral theology.

catacomb art, decoration, mainly painting and incising on marble, found in the underground Christian cemeteries of antiquity. Of uneven artistic quality, the painting, epigraphy, and artifacts are valuable clues to early Christian beliefs. The scientific study of catacomb art began in the nineteenth century when Christian archaeology gained prominence. See also archaeology, Christian.

Mural depicting Christ's multiplication of the loaves; Catacomb of St. Callistus, Rome.

catacombs, subterranean cemeteries constructed by Christians from about the late second to the early fifth centuries. Although there were catacombs elsewhere, the majority are in Italy, and especially Rome, where several hundred miles of catacombs survive. Cemeteries were required by law to be outside city living quarters, and thus the catacombs were constructed along the roads leading to the city, especially in the north and southeast, in layers of soft clay rock called tufa. Since all burial places were protected by law, the catacombs were free from molestation and developed into an elaborate system of galleries, rooms, and corridors, dug and maintained at Church expense. Niches for tombs were cut into, and parallel to, the walls. Occasionally there were burials in the floors or, for prominent Christians, in tombs placed in recesses carved out of the walls. Many of the catacombs were adorned with frescos. Shafts admitted light and air, an especially important feature as the popularity of eucharistic celebrations at the tombs of the martyrs grew (fourth century).

The oldest surviving catacomb is that of St. Callistus on the Appian Way, part of which, including the Crypt of the Popes, dates from the late second and early third centuries. Use of the catacombs for burial stopped after the Gothic invasions of the fifth century began to make burial outside the walls impractical. By the ninth century, most of the relics of the martyrs had been translated to churches, and the existence of the catacombs was forgotten until 1578. They remain a remarkable testimony to the determination of the early Church to afford all of its members a decent burial, wealthy and indigent alike. See also burial, Christian. JOHN C. CAVADINI catafalque (kah-tah-fawlk'; Lat., catafalicum, "siege-tower"), the stand or framework supporting the coffin at funerals. It is another name of the castrumdoloris, the middle coffin (of three) in which the pope is buried. The catafalque is placed outside the sanctuary of the church, and the coffin is covered with a white pall symbolizing the white robe of baptism. See also funeral mass.

The Catacomb of Pope St. Callistus I, on the Appian Way outside of Rome; the oldest surviving catacomb.

catechesis (Gk., katechein, "to echo"), a ministry of the word (Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, n. 24). Originally the term applied to the oral instruction given adults and children before Baptism (Acts 18:25; Rom 2:18; Gal. 6:6). Sharing the Light of Faith: The National Catechetical Directory (1979) refers to catechesis as "the efforts which help individuals and communities acquire and deepen Christian faith and identity through initiation rites, instruction, and formation of conscience. It includes both the message presented and the way in which it is presented" (n. 5). More than the acquisition of knowledge, catechesis involves awakening, nourishing, and developing faith. Although this ministry is normally exercised by specially designated and trained individuals, it is ultimately the responsibility of the whole faith community. See also religious education.

catechetics (Gk., katechein, "to echo"), a systematic study of catechesis. The words "catechesis" and "catechetics" are often used interchangeably.

However, catechesis refers to the process of forming one in a faith community, while catechetics is the study of how to do catechesis. Catechesis can be found in the NT; catechetics emerged only in the twentieth century. With Vatican II's richer understanding of revelation (Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation), the catechist's responsibility broadened. No longer is catechesis simply involved with a deductive passing on of the deposit of faith. Catechists need to be trained in the human as well as the ecclesiastical sciences.

Progress in interdisciplinary fields during the twentieth century had a tremendous effect on catechetics. The works of Joseph Jungmann, Johannes Hofinger, D. S. Amalorpavadass, Pierre-André Liégé, and Francis H. Drinkwater helped reclaim the centrality of the liturgy for catechesis. The developmental theories of Jean Piaget, Erik Erikson, Lawrence Kohlberg, and James Fowler helped to determine the appropriate ages for the distribution of doctrinal material. A praxis method of education, based on experiential and inductive learning, forms the basis of mainline catechetical texts. The acknowledgment that the goal of catechesis goes beyond the mere acquisition of knowledge to a living, conscious, and active faith (Sharing the Light of Faith: The National Catechical Directory, n. 32) demands an awareness of and involvement in the social, moral, and public life of the faith community.

During the second half of the twentieth century graduate programs in religious studies at Catholic universities and colleges began to offer professional degrees to people preparing for catechetical ministry. Diocesan offices were established for the sole purpose of directing catechetical ministries, and parishes made commitments to the ongoing formation of its catechists as well as of adults in general. See also religious education. BEVERLY M. BRAZAUSKAS catechism (Gk., katechein, "to echo"), a manual of religious instruction using simple language and a question-and-answer format. According to the General Catechetical Directory, its object is "to convey in summary and practical form the documents of revelation and of Christian tradition, as well as the main elements which must be of service for catechetical activity, that is, for personal education in the faith" (n. 119). After the Reformation and with the invention of the printing press, catechisms became the primary tool and method of religious instruction until recent times. Emphasis was placed on the role of the intellect and on memorization. The material was sequentially organized by creed, commandments, and sacraments. The best-known example in the United States is the Baltimore Catechism, originally commissioned by the bishops in 1885. A Catechism of the Catholic Church was released by the Vatican in 1992. See also Baltimore Catechism.

Catechism of the Catholic Church, also known as the Universal Catechism, a compendium of Catholic teaching originally published in French, with the approval of Pope John Paul II, on October 11, 1992. It was prepared by a papal commission of twelve cardinals and bishops, under the direction of Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, head of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. The Catechism is intended to guide bishops in formulating local catechetical programs. It is divided into four parts: Profession of Faith, the Celebration of the Christian Mystery, Life in Christ, and Christian Prayer. Emphasis is placed respectively on the Apostles' Creed, the seven sacraments, the Ten Commandments, and the Lord's Prayer.

The document originated after the 1971 publication of the General Catechetical Directory, which some cardinals considered too vague. In 1986, Pope John Paul II appointed the commission, which submitted a provisional text to the world's bishops in 1989. The draft met with considerable criticism during the review period because its content seemed not to reflect recent developments in theology and biblical studies. Various revisions were initiated in response to these criticisms. The official English translation, originally scheduled for publication in 1993, was delayed until 1994 largely because of objections from some conservative Catholics that the translation reflected too much sensitivity to feminist concerns.

catechist (Gk., katechein, "to echo"), someone commissioned by the Church "to hand down" its faith tradition. Although parents, parish priests, and the faith community at large are to be engaged in catechesis, the term "catechist" usually refers to the designated and specially trained person who introduces catechumens, candidates, and/or young people to the faith.

catechumen (Gk., katechein, "to echo"), an unbaptized person undergoing instruction and formation in preparation for Baptism. An inquirer, after hearing the mystery of Christ proclaimed (evangelization), embraces a process of conversion leading to Christian initiation (catechumenate). A catechumen enters into a formation period with other catechumens and members of a faith community. This period provides the catechumen with time to experience and learn about the Christian life. Among those related to the catechumen during this period are a godparent, sponsor, catechist, pastor, and, most importantly, the faith community itself. The term "catechumen" is strictly reserved for those who are unbaptized; those already baptized and seeking full communion are called "candidates." See also Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults.

catechumenate (Gk., katechein, "to echo"), the second period in the process of Christian initiation. After a period of initial inquiry about the faith, interested persons publicly state their intention before the Church and become catechumens. It is at this time that they are "joined to the Church and are part of the household of Christ" (Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults, n. 18) and enter the catechumenate. This rite, also known as the RCIA, was restored in 1972, in accordance with the mandate of the Second Vatican Council (Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, n. 64) and by decree of Pope Paul VI.

During the catechumenate catechumens not only study the doctrines of the faith but are introduced to the prayer life and apostolic works of the community. It is formation in the whole of Christian life. Catechumens are assigned sponsors who assist them in the process of initiation by praying with and for them, accompanying them to various activities, as well as answering their many questions. At their regular sessions they are introduced to the person of Jesus Christ and to conversion to a Gospel life-style through scriptural studies and prayer. In addition to the lectionary, the Creed and the Lord's Prayer constitute the content of catechesis during this period.

Since they are as yet unable to share fully in the eucharistic banquet, catechumens are usually dismissed from the Sunday assembly after the Liturgy of the Word and prior to the Liturgy of the Eucharist. They depart to continue their study of the lectionary.

There is no determined length for the catechumenate. The process continues until the catechumens are ready to request Baptism and the Church is willing to accept them. At that point they celebrate the rite of election and enter the period of election, usually coinciding with the season of Lent. See also Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults.

BEVERLY M. BRAZAUSKAS

Cathari (Gk., katharos, "pure, clean"), general definition for various sects, including Novatianists, Manichaeans, and especially dualist heretics in southern France and northern Italy active between the twelfth and fourteenth centuries, known also in France as Albigensians. Cathar dualism expressed itself in two forms: "absolute" dualism, which claimed the existence of two rival and eternal powers of Good/Spirit and Evil/Matter, and "mitigated" dualism, which claimed that Evil/Matter was inferior to and would be overcome by the Good/Spirit. Critical of the Church, which it viewed as corrupt, the medieval Cathari were eventually overcome by preaching, a crusade against them, and the Inquisition. See also Albigensians; dualism.

Catharinus, Ambrosius [Lancelot of Politi], ca. 1484–1553, Italian Dominican theologian and bishop active at the Council of Trent from 1545–1547. One of the earliest and most prolific Catholic opponents of Martin Luther, he emphasized the teaching authority of the Church and a reliance on Scripture and early Christian authors.

cathedra (kath-ay'drah; Lat., "chair"), technical term for an episcopal throne and, by extension, episcopal authority. It is also used, less frequently, to refer to the academic chair held by a professor. A diocesan bishop's church is called a cathedral because it houses his episcopal chair. See also cathedral.

cathedral (Lat., cathedra, "chair") the church where the bishop presides over the liturgy and, by symbolic extension, over his diocese. So named for the chair where the bishop exercises his authority, the cathedral in time became the locus of episcopal administration. His supporting clergy became part of the cathedral staff as canons who had certain responsibilities for divine worship. The position of canon never became customary in the United States.

With the reemergence of cities in the Middle Ages, cathedrals became great centers of urban life (e.g., the Gothic cathedrals of the Ile de France) and the place where schools were erected and maintained. Today, cathedrals are usually conspicuous for their size and central locations, although in some places other churches overshadow cathedrals; in Rome St. Peter's Basilica is far better known than the cathedral of St. John Lateran. See also basilica.

cathedral chapter, the body of diocesan priests, known as canons, responsible for the spiritual and temporal concerns of the diocesan cathedral. The cathedral chapter was for the most part a European institution with origins in the Merovingian period (ca. eighth century); its authority, not only over the cathedral but over the diocese itself, was considerable by the time of the Council of Trent (1545–63). The members of the chapter, for example, governed the diocese during a vacancy of the see and served as electors of the diocesan bishop. One member of the chapter has always had an important spiritual function, namely, the canon penitentiary, with the power to absolve from automatic censures (Lat., latae sententiae) that are not reserved to the Holy See, e.g., the procuring of an abortion. In dioceses where there is no cathedral chapter, the bishop is required by canon law to appoint a diocesan priest to fulfill this function (can. 508.2). Even in dioceses that have a cathedral chapter, a college of consultors is to be established (can. 502). See also chapter; consultors, college of.

cathedraticum, the tax that was to be paid by parishes to the bishop under the 1917 code of canon law. According to that code, it was to be a sign of submission to the authority of the bishop, and as such was mainly a symbolic gesture. In some dioceses, however, it developed into a larger financial payment. The 1983 code allows bishops to impose a moderate tax for diocesan needs, but "only after hearing the diocesan finance council and the presbyteral council" (can. 1263).

Catherine Labouré, St. See Labouré, St. Catherine.

Catherine of Alexandria, St., d. ca. 310, patron saint of philosophers, young unmarried women, preachers, nurses, and craftsmen, and one of the Fourteen Holy Helpers, a group of saints notable for their answering of prayers, especially for cures from disease and at the hour of death. Venerated in the East since the ninth century, Catherine's life is largely a matter of legend. Joan of Arc was thought to have heard Catherine's voice. Upon Catherine's death by beheading, after a wheel of torture (known as Catherine's wheel) broke, her body was supposedly carried by angels to Mount Sinai. She is widely depicted in painting, stained glass windows, literature, and other art forms. Feast day: November 25 (dropped from the liturgical calender in 1969).

Catherine of Bologna, St., also known as Catherine de'Vigri, 1413–63, patron saint of artists. A member of the Poor Clares, she is said to have experienced visions of Christ and Satan. Her vision of Mary with the infant Jesus in her arms has been reproduced often in art. Feast day: March 9.

Catherine of Genoa, St., 1447–1510, Italian mystic. Born Caterinetta Fieschi, she underwent a spiritual conversion as a married laywoman in 1473. Henceforth, she devoted her life to serving the poor and sick in a Genovese hospital. Her spiritual teachings concern the purification of the soul. Feast day: September 15.

Catherine of Siena, St., 1347–80, mystical writer and Doctor of the Church. Born in Siena, Italy, she experienced her first mystical vision at the age of seven and soon after pledged virginity to Jesus. Young Catherine spent many hours in prayer at home and frequently attended morning Mass in the neighboring church of St. Dominic. As Catherine reached adolescence, her family arranged suitors for her. When she declined marriage, her family discharged the domestic help and assigned Catherine excessive household duties that curtailed her prayer. One day, while Catherine stole away from chores to pray in her room, her father reported seeing a dove hover over her head. Taking this as a sign from heaven, her father permitted Catherine to live the life of prayer and fasting which she desired. In 1365 she received the Dominican habit and continued to live a life of seclusion in the family home. In 1368, during a mystical vision, she became espoused to Christ and received a mandate to undertake an apostolic life. Catherine cared for the sick at La Scala Hospital and visited prisoners on death row, accompanying them to the gallows. She trained a growing company of disciples, some of whom were priests. Around 1370 she began a cycle of letters of spiritual instruction, which gradually evolved into a critique of political and ecclesial conditions. She favored a crusade against the Turks and lamented the clergy's low standard of morality. The Dominicans summoned her to a general chapter in 1374 to defend her public profile. Having proved her position, the chapter appointed Raymond of Capua as her director. With Raymond she preached a crusade of repentance throughout Italy. While preaching at Pisa in 1375 Catherine stopped to pray in the Church of St. Christina. There, while she knelt before the crucifix, Christ spoke to Catherine and she received the stigmata, bleeding wounds similar to those of the crucified Christ. Between 1376 and 1378 she mediated a treaty between Florence and the papacy. In June of 1376 she also met with Pope Gregory XI at Avignon, France, to convince him to return the papal court to Rome. For seven generations French popes ruled the Church from the royal palaces of Avignon. Although Gregory reinstated the Curia at Rome, he died before he could return.

Catherine of Siena, one of the few women to have been named a Doctor of the Church and who played an important role in resolving the Great Schism of the fourteenth century, depicted here receiving the stigmata; sixteenth-century painting by Domenico Beccafumi, National Gallery, Siena, Italy.

Between 1377 and 1378, amid much unrest, Catherine composed The Dialogue, a book describing her understanding of the Church and the sacraments. The basic theme of her spirituality was the creative and saving love of God, symbolized by the Blood of Jesus.

During the reign of Gregory's successor, Urban VI, there was a dual papacy in Rome and Avignon. In November 1378, Urban VI summoned Catherine to Rome to negotiate an end to the Great Schism. Catherine traveled with her companions to Rome and lodged next to the Church of the Minerva, but the arduous journey so weakened her health that she spent her last months in great suffering. In imitation of Jesus she offered her pain as an immolation for others. She was declared a Doctor of the Church in 1970. Feast day: April 29. See also Avignon; Dominican spirituality. PATRICIA M. VINJE

Catherine Tekakwitha, Bl. See Tekakwitha, Bl. Kateri.

Catholic (Gk., katholikos, "universal"; adverbial phrase, kath' holou, "on the whole"), member of the Catholic Church. The term, first used in Christian literature by Ignatius of Antioch (d. ca. 107) in his Letter to the Smyrnaeans (n. 8.2), refers also to the Catholic Church itself as well as to the orthodox faith that is embraced and proclaimed by Catholics. The word is commonly used in opposition to "Protestant," but is, in fact, more directly opposed to "sectarian," which pertains to a part of the Church that has separated itself from the worldwide Church and from the world itself.

Thus, Augustine of Hippo (d. 430) contrasted the separatist and sectarian movements of his time, especially Donatism, with the Catholic Church that is both universal and orthodox in its faith. In his letter to Honoratus, a Donatist bishop, he wrote: "Do you happen to know why it should be that Christ should lose his inheritance, which is spread over the whole world, and should suddenly be found surviving only in the Africans, and not in all of them? The Catholic Church exists indeed in Africa, since God willed and ordained that it should exist throughout the whole world. Whereas your party, which is called the party of Donatus, does not exist in all those places in which the writings of the apostles, their discourse, and their actions have been current" (Epistle 49, n. 3).

Cyril of Jerusalem (d. 386) was even more explicit: "The Church is called 'Catholic' because it extends through all the world . . . because it teaches universally and without omission all the doctrines which ought to come to man's knowledge . . . because it brings under the sway of true religion all classes of men, rulers, and subjects, learned and ignorant; and because it universally treats and cures every type of sin . . . and possesses in itself every kind of virtue which can be named . . . and spiritual gifts of every kind" (Catechetical Lectures 18. 23).

The word "Catholic" was incorporated into the creeds along with the other notes of the Church: one, holy, and apostolic. It appears in the Creed of Cyril of Jerusalem, the Creed of Epiphanius, and, of course, in the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed that is still recited in the liturgy today.

However, the use of the word "Catholic" became divisive after the East-West Schism of the eleventh century and the Protestant Reformation of the sixteenth. The West claimed for itself the title Catholic Church, while the East, which broke the bonds of unity with Rome, appropriated the name Holy Orthodox Church. After the Reformation split, those in communion with Rome retained the adjective Catholic, while the churches that broke with the papacy were called Protestant. Some of them now insist that the adjective "Catholic" applies also to many other Christians who regard themselves as evangelical, reformed, and Catholic alike.

The Second Vatican Council (1962–65) broadened the notion of catholicity to include churches outside the Catholic Church (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 8), and spoke of them as possessing varying "degrees" of catholicity (Decree on Ecumenism, n. 3). See also Catholic Church; Catholicism.

RICHARD P. MCBRIEN

Catholic, life of a, how an ordinary Catholic experiences the reality of Catholicism from Baptism to death. Since Catholicism is essentially a sacramental religion, the ordinary Catholic's life is shaped and framed in large measure, but not exclusively, by the reception of the sacraments.

Most Catholics are baptized in infancy, usually a few weeks or months after birth. In their early childhood years they receive rudimentary instruction in their faith from their parents, usually through teachings of, and about, familiar rituals (the sign of the cross), symbols (crucifixes, medals, holy cards), and prayers (Lord's Prayer, Hail Mary), through attendance at Mass, and through explanations and stories evoked by holy pictures and books portraying Jesus, the saints, and various Bible stories. Around the age of seven, also known as the "age of reason," a young Catholic begins a year-long instruction in preparation for the reception of First Holy Communion. In most cases, the parents are also involved, or should be, in the process of preparing their children for First Penance, or Confession, and Confirmation. The children continue their religious instruction and formation in parish religious education classes or in parochial school. Between the ages of twelve and sixteen most receive the sacrament of Confirmation, after which many tend to disengage from formal religious education. Others continue through parish programs for high-school students and in Catholic high schools. At varying ages a Catholic will enter into marriage, receiving the sacrament of Matrimony after a period of formal preparation. A few will enter a religious community of women or men, and others will enter a seminary to study for the ordained priesthood. In the normal course of events, a young Catholic seminarian will receive the sacrament of Holy Orders around age twenty-five. As the young married couple begins to raise a family, they reenter the process of preparing for Baptism, Reconciliation, First Eucharist, and Confirmation by participating in their own children's process of instruction and formation. Throughout the years the ordinary Catholic will have the Eucharist at the center of his or her religious life. The Eucharist is, according to the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), the summit and the fountain of the whole Christian life (Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, n. 10).

When serious sickness enters individuals' lives, the Church offers them yet another sacrament, the Sacrament of the Anointing of the Sick, formerly known as Extreme Unction (Lat., "last anointing"). The last sacrament in actuality, however, is Viaticum (Lat., lit., "on the way with you," "[food] for a journey"), the final reception of the Eucharist, or Holy Communion, before death.

Many other Catholics enter the Church at a later age. They are traditionally called "converts." Oftentimes, a non-Catholic decides to become a Catholic because of his or her marriage to a Catholic and the desire to share fully in the religious experience of the spouse and children. Those who enter the Catholic Church later in life do so through the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (RCIA), restored by Pope Paul VI in 1972 under mandate from the Second Vatican Council.

Many Catholics serve in various ministerial roles throughout their lives: as young altar servers at Mass, as lectors (readers of Scripture at Mass), ministers of the Eucharist (distributors of Holy Communion under the species of both bread and wine), directors of religious education (DRE's), catechists, youth ministers, ministers to the elderly, permanent deacons, and the like. Whether one is ordained, religiously professed, or lay makes no difference. "Everything" that the Second Vatican Council said about the nature and responsibilities of the People of God "applies equally to the laity, religious, and clergy" (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 30).

In the final analyis, however, Catholic life isn't just about sacramental and ministerial life within the Church. It is about life in the world beyond the Church, and especially about fidelity to the gospel as it applies to our relationships with one another. Catholics are called to a life of justice and compassion, honesty and courage, peacemaking and forgiveness. The ordinary Catholic finds enough guidance for a lifetime not only in the gospel but in the social teachings of the Church as well. See also Catholic social teachings; religious education; Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults; sacrament; sacramentals.

RICHARD P. MCBRIEN

Catholic Action, a movement of Catholic laity first suggested by Pope Pius X and actively encouraged by Pope Pius XI in his 1931 encyclical Quadragesimo Anno. This pope sought "the participation of the laity in the apostolate of the hierarchy" in order to turn society back to its Christian foundations. Pius XI envisioned nonpolitical organized lay works directed toward the reform of society through legislation and institutional reconstruction.

In the United States there were many organizations that participated in this movement and that were distinguished by their reliance upon the hierarchy. Closely associated with clerical control were organizations such as the National Councils of Catholic Men and Women and the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine, which bishops mandated for their respective dioceses. The Legion of Decency (1934) evaluated the moral content of motion pictures and recommended what was suitable for Catholic viewing. The Sodality of the Blessed Virgin, the Catholic Interracial Councils, and Serra International existed with hierarchical approval, but without direct charter from the local ordinary.

Often inspired by European movements, more autonomous associations also emerged and were promoted by priests such as Raymond A. McGowan, Donald Kanaly, and others. These included the Grail movement (1921); Young Christian Students (1925); Young Christian Workers (1925); the Catholic Worker, founded by Peter Maurin and Dorothy Day (1933); the Christian Family Movement (men's group in 1943, couples in 1947); and Friendship House (Toronto in 1930, New York City in 1938). Led by Pat and Patricia Crowley, the Christian Family Movement proved particularly wide-reaching and popular. See also Christian Family Movement.

MICHAEL E. ENGH

Catholic Biblical Association of America (CBA), a scholarly society for the service of the faith through the promotion of biblical scholarship. Its beginning was occasioned by a meeting of Catholic Scripture scholars called by Bishop Edwin V. O'Hara in 1936 to plan a revision of the Challoner-Rheims NT; the group quickly moved toward formation of a permanent association, which came into existence on October 3, 1936, at a meeting of about fifty scholars. Edward P. Arbez was elected its first president. A constitution and by-laws were adopted in 1937. It was incorporated in the District of Columbia in 1941 and reincorporated in 1958. Initially the CBA was under the patronage of the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine (CCD). O'Hara's aim of revising the Challoner-Rheims NT, based on the Vulgate, was realized by the publication, in 1941, of the CCD NT; in the meantime work had begun on revising the OT, again based on the Vulgate. But in 1943 the publication of Divino Afflante Spiritu encouraged a switch to a totally new translation of both OT and NT from the original languages; the result was the New American Bible, published in 1970; a further revision of the NT was published in 1987 and a revision of the Psalter in 1991.

The CBA publishes the Catholic Biblical Quarterly (begun in 1939), the Catholic Biblical Quarterly Monograph Series (first volume in 1971), and Old Testament Abstracts (since 1978). General and regional meetings are held. Qualifications for membership are scholarly rather than creedal and many non-Catholics are numbered among the CBA members.

Catholic Biblical Quarterly (CBQ), the official scholarly publication of the Catholic Biblical Association of America. Publication was begun in 1939 and has been continuous ever since. CBQ contains articles designed to provide scholarly exchange on biblical and related matters; it also provides an extensive book review section in the same areas.

CATHOLIC CHURCH

The Catholic Church (Gk., katholikos, "universal"; kyriakon, "belonging to the Lord"; ekklesia, "assembly") is the worldwide Church that recognizes the Bishop of Rome, the pope, as "the perpetual and visible source and foundation of the unity of the bishops and of the multitude of the faithful" (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 23). There are approximately one billion Catholics in the world, by far the largest body of Christians and the largest single religious community on the earth.

THE SCOPE OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH

The universal Catholic Church is in principle (if not always in reality) a college of local churches (parishes, dioceses, regional churches, patriarchates, and national churches), whose unity is rooted in the presence of the Holy Spirit, a common faith in Jesus Christ, the celebration of the Eucharist and the other sacraments, and the visible unifying ministry of the Bishop of Rome. The Catholic communion encompasses eight distinct Catholic traditions: Armenian, Byzantine, Coptic, Ethiopian, East Syrian (Chaldean), Maronite, Roman, and West Syrian. Some of these have more than one local expression. For example, the Chaldean and Syro-Malabar churches are both expressions of the East Syrian tradition, and the Ukrainian and Melkite churches are expressions of the Byzantine tradition.

Before the sixteenth century this worldwide church was simply the Catholic Church. The adjective "Catholic" had its origin in Ignatius of Antioch (early second century) and was found also in the writings of the early Fathers of the Church and in the creeds. When the authority of the Bishop of Rome became a source of contention between West and East in the eleventh century and between Catholics and Protestants in the sixteenth, the adjective "Roman" served to distinguish those Christians who remained in union with Rome from those who did not.

However, the adjective "Roman" tends to confuse rather than define the reality of Catholicism since it is not the Roman primacy that gives Catholicism its distinctive identity within the family of Christian churches, but the Petrine primacy. Indeed, it was in Jerusalem, not Rome, that the Petrine primacy was first conferred and exercised. The adjective "Roman" applies more properly to the diocese of Rome than to the worldwide Church that is in union with the Bishop of Rome.

According to the Second Vatican Council's Decree on Ecumenism, the Catholic Church includes more than Catholics alone. Those other Christians "who believe in Christ and have been properly baptized are brought into a certain, though imperfect, communion with the Catholic Church" (n. 3). Consequently, the worldwide, or universal, Church is at once identical with the Catholic Church and larger than the Catholic Church. However, even as it recognizes this wider dimension of the universal Church, the Catholic Church continues to teach that the Catholic Church and its traditions are normative for other Christian churches and traditions. Only those who "accept her entire system and all the means of salvation given to her" are "fully incorporated into the society of the Church" (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 14).

NEW TESTAMENT BEGINNINGS

One must always remember that the history of the Catholic Church is a history not only of leaders and major institutional events, but a history of the Catholic people. What follows, therefore, is only a framework for identifying, describing, and interpreting persons and events that have shaped and influenced the development of the Catholic people.

Since the Catholic Church does not see itself as simply one Christian denomination among many in the universal Church or as merely a product of the Counter-Reformation of the sixteenth century, it situates its beginnings in the NT itself, with Jesus' gathering of his disciples and, following the Resurrection, his commissioning of Peter to be the chief shepherd and foundation of the Church (Matt 16:13–19; Luke 22:31–32; John 21:15–19). Given the symbolism of keys as instruments for opening and closing the gates of the kingdom of heaven, the conferral of the power of the keys upon Peter clearly suggests that he was given an imposing measure of authority by the Lord. On the other hand, special authority over others is not clearly attested. Indeed, Peter is presented elsewhere as consulting with the other apostles and even being sent by them (Acts 8:14), while he and John act almost as a team (3:1–11; 4:1–22). Nevertheless, there seems to be what biblical scholars call a trajectory of images relating to Peter and his ministry that sets him apart within the original company of disciples and explains his ascendancy and that of his successors throughout the early history of the Church. He is portrayed as the fisherman (Luke 5:10; John 21:1–14), as the shepherd of the sheep of Christ (John 21:15–17), as an elder who addresses other elders (1 Pet 5:1), as proclaimer of faith in Jesus, the Son of God (Matt 16:16–17), as receiver of a special revelation (Acts 1:9–16), as one who can correct others' doctrinal misunderstandings (2 Pet 3:15–16), and as the rock on which the Church is to be built (Matt 16:18). These biblical images were later enriched by others: missionary preacher, great visionary, destroyer of heretics, receiver of the new law, gatekeeper of heaven, helmsman of the ship of the Church, coteacher and comartyr with Paul.

Although founded on the rock of Peter, the Church of the NT was diverse and pluralistic in character. Despite many differences from place to place, however, certain common elements of belief and practice existed: faith in Jesus as Messiah and Lord, the practice of baptism and the celebration of the Eucharist, the apostolic preaching and instruction, the practice of communal love, and the expectation of the coming reign of God. There was freedom in all other matters.

By the end of the first century the Church had begun to establish itself throughout the eastern and northeastern Mediterranean. Beginning in Jerusalem it moved north and west through the missionary journeys of St. Paul and others to modern-day Syria (Damascus, Antioch), modern-day Turkey (Ephesus, Colossae), Greece (Corinth, Philippi, Thessalonia), and Rome, where a large Christian community existed from at least the middle of the century.

As the Church spread through the Greco-Roman world, it adapted itself to contemporary social, political, and cultural forms and structures, particularly the organizational and administrative patterns that prevailed in the areas of missionary activity. It adopted the organizational divisions of the Roman Empire (dioceses, provinces) and identified its own center with the empire's (Rome). This decision was supported by the tradition that Peter had founded the Church in Rome and that he and Paul were martyred and buried there. By the latter half of the second century there were synods and councils and the emergence of the monarchical episcopate (one bishop governing each diocese).

FROM CONSTANTINIANISM TO MONASTICISM

The Church continued to change and develop in response to various crises and heresies. In the controversy with Gnosticism, defenders of Catholic orthodoxy like Irenaeus (d. ca. 200) appealed to the faith of local churches founded by the apostles (apostolic succession), and especially the faith of the Roman church, which was by now clearly associated with Peter and Paul. During the first five centuries, the church of Rome gradually assumed preeminence among all the local churches. It intervened in the life of distant churches, took sides in theological controversies, was consulted by other bishops on doctrinal and moral questions, and sent delegates to distant councils. The local church of Rome came to be regarded as a kind of final court of appeal as well as the focus of unity for the worldwide communion of churches. The correlation between Peter and the Bishop of Rome became fully explicit in the pontificate of Leo I (440–61), who claimed that Peter continued to speak to the whole Church through the Bishop of Rome.

One of the defining events in these early centuries of the Church's history was the conversion of the emperor Constantine I (306–37) in the year 312. Thereafter, pagan practices were suppressed and the Church and its clergy received privileged status. Some sectarian Protestants have pointed to this development as the beginning of "Constantinian Catholicism," a pejorative term. Christian commitment would no longer be tested by persecution and martyrdom, and the Church itself was now vulnerable to the negative influences of the secular culture.

The strongest protest against Constantinianism, however, came not from the sectarians but from monks. The quintessential countercultural movement, monasticism took hold almost immediately within the Church. Bishops were recruited from among those who had some monastic training. Not surprisingly, the new-style bishops brought with them some traits of their monastic background: celibacy and a certain antiworldly asceticism. Already separated from the laity by legal status and privilege, some of the hierarchy drew even further away by reason of divergent spiritualities.

Monasticism reached its high point in the West in the middle of the sixth century with the founding of Monte Cassino by Benedict of Nursia (d. 547). Although devoted primarily to work and prayer (Lat., ora et labora), monks were also directly involved in the missionary expansion of the Church into England, Ireland, Scotland, and Gaul (France) between the fifth and seventh centuries, and by the eighth century former mission countries, like England, were sending missionaries to the still-pagan regions of Europe. By the middle of the eleventh century, following the restoration of political stability in Europe, monks had largely withdrawn from temporal and ecclesiastical affairs and returned to their monasteries. Under the impact of this monastic renewal, new religious orders were founded (e.g., Franciscans, Dominicans, Cistercians, Jesuits).

THE DOCTRINAL CONTROVERSIES OF THE EARLY CHURCH

As the new monastic movement was taking root, the Church was racked with doctrinal controversies over some of the most basic elements of its faith: the nature of God, the divinity of Christ, the meaning of the redemption, and the divinity of the Holy Spirit. Arianism held that the Son of God was only the greatest of creatures. The Council of Nicaea condemned this belief in 325, declaring that the Son and the Father are of the same divine substance (Gk., homoousios). The First Council of Constantinople (381) condemned Apollinarianism, which held that Christ had no human soul, and Macedonianism, which denied the divinity of the Holy Spirit. The Council of Ephesus (431) condemned Nestorianism, which held that in Christ there is only one nature, a human nature, and that the human Jesus is separate from the divine Word, or Logos. At the opposite end of the doctrinal spectrum, Monophysitism (Gk., "one nature") held that Christ's human nature was completely absorbed by the divine person, so that in Christ there is only one nature, a divine nature. This elicited the Christological definition of the Council of Chalcedon (451): Jesus Christ has two natures, the one divine and the other human, united in one divine person "without confusion or change, without division or separation." This stress on balance (both/and rather than either/or) has been a hallmark of Catholic teaching from its beginning.

The same balance was maintained in the great debates about nature and grace. Against Pelagianism, which held that salvation can be achieved through human effort alone, Augustine of Hippo (d. 430) insisted on the primacy of grace without denying human responsibility. In the seventeenth century, the Church would also condemn Quietism, which held that we can do nothing on our own spiritual behalf. The Scholastics argued that grace and nature are not opposed, but that grace builds on nature.

CRISES AND REFORMS

Around the same time as these doctrinal controversies were being resolved, German tribes began migrating through Europe with no effective control. These "barbarian invasions" lasted some six hundred years and changed the face of Catholicism from a largely Greco-Roman religion to a broader European religion. Catholic devotion, spirituality, and organizational structure were reshaped by the militaristic and feudal character of the Germanic culture. Christ was portrayed as the most powerful of kings; the place of worship was described as God's fortress; monks were regarded as warriors of Christ; the profession of faith became an oath of fidelity to a kind of feudal lord; and Church officials, wearing the trappings of temporal authority (e.g., ring, staff, headgear), were seen more as political than pastoral leaders. The line between the sacred and the temporal became so blurred, in fact, that emperors, kings, and princes began arrogating to themselves the right to appoint bishops. This led to the investiture controversy, eventually resolved in favor of the Church through the persistent efforts of Pope Gregory VII (d. 1085).

At the beginning of the eighth century, with the eastern emperor no longer able to aid the papacy against the aggressive Lombards in northern Italy, the pope turned to the Franks for help. The new alliance led to the creation of the Holy Roman Empire, culminating in the crowning of Charlemagne (d. 814) in 800. After the empire's eventual collapse, however, the papacy fell into the hands of the corrupt Roman nobility and the Church entered what historians have called the "dark ages" of the tenth and eleventh centuries. The papacy regained its footing under the reformer Gregory VII, who dealt decisively with three major abuses: simony (the selling of spiritual goods), the alienation of Church property (allowing ownership to pass from the Church to private hands), and lay investiture. Papal prestige reached its highest point in the Middle Ages during the pontificate of Innocent II (1198–1216), who fully exploited the Gregorian claim that the pope has supreme, even absolute, power over the whole Church. Boniface VIII (1294–1303) took that claim one step further and asserted dominion over the temporal order as well in the famous papal bull Unam Sanctam (Lat., "One Holy") of 1302.

Canon law was codified to support the new claims. The Church became increasingly legalistic in its theology, moral life, spirituality, and sacramental administration, especially with regard to marriage, viewed more as a contract than as a covenant. By the middle of the thirteenth century the papal-hierarchical model of the Church was securely in place, and it would dominate Catholicism until the Second Vatican Council some six centuries later. Newly elected popes were crowned like emperors—a practice discontinued by Pope John Paul I in 1978.

Meanwhile, through a series of unfortunate and complicated political and diplomatic developments in the eleventh century, a major breach occurred between the church of Rome and the church of Constantinople. The excommunication of the patriarch of Constantinople, Michael Cerularius (d. 1058), by papal legates in 1054, and the Fourth Crusade (1202–1204) and the sack of Constantinople by Western knights dealt the crucial blows to East-West unity.

Catholicism in medieval Europe (eighth through fifteenth centuries) represented by major Christian centers (e.g., Rome, Paris), universities (e.g., Paris, Oxford, Bologna), and monastic foundations (e.g., Monte Cassino, Cluny, Citeaux, Clairvaux, Fulda, St. Gall, Bec).

THE REFORMATION AND COUNTER-REFORMATION

The process of disintegration continued within the West as well. First, there was the confrontation between Boniface VIII and Philip the Fair (d. 1314) over the latter's power to tax the Church. After asserting his jurisdiction over the emperor in the bull Unam Sanctam, the pope was arrested and died a prisoner. Then there were the financial abuses during the subsequent "Babylonian Captivity" of the papacy at Avignon, France (1309–78), the rise of anticlericalism in reaction to papal taxes and of conciliarism in opposition to the new claims of papal power, and, finally, the Great Schism of 1378–1417 in which there were three different claimants to the papacy at one time.

But there were other, more immediate causes of the Reformation that followed: the corruption of the Renaissance papacy of the fifteenth century, the divorce of popular piety from sound theology and of theology from its biblical and historical roots, the debilitating effects of the Great Schism, the rise of the nation-state, the too-close connection between Western Catholicism and Western civilization and culture, and the powerful personalities of the Reformers themselves, especially Luther, Calvin, and Zwingli.

The Catholic Church's official response to the challenge of the Reformation was vigorous, if belated. The centerpiece of the Counter-Reformation was the Council of Trent (1545–63), conducted largely under the leadership of Pope Paul III (1534–49). The council reaffirmed those traditional Catholic teachings that had been rejected or attacked by the Protestants: the importance of human effort in salvation, the place of tradition alongside Sacred Scripture, the seven sacraments, including the ordained priesthood, the authority of the hierarchy, and so forth. The council also instituted the Index of Forbidden Books and it established seminaries for the education and formation of future priests. The post-Tridentine Church continued to emphasize those doctrines, institutions, and devotions that the Reformers had most directly challenged: veneration of the saints, devotion to Mary, eucharistic adoration, and the hierarchy and the priesthood. Catholic missionary activity was reduced in countries where Protestantism flourished, but the Catholic faith was carried abroad by the two Catholic sea powers, Spain and Portugal. The Dominicans, Franciscans, and the newly established Jesuits brought Catholicism to India, China, Japan, Africa, and the Americas. The Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith was founded in 1622 to oversee these new missionary enterprises.

POST-REFORMATION MOVEMENTS

Tensions between Rome and France were exacerbated by the rise of Jansenism in France at the beginning of the seventeenth century. Drawing much of their inspiration from Augustine but taking his theology to an extreme, the Jansenists tended to view human nature as totally corrupt and developed a spirituality that was excessively rigorous and puritanical. When Rome finally moved against Jansenism, many in France took it as an affront to the independence and integrity of French Catholicism. Gallicanism (from the original Latin word for France, "Gaul") surfaced as an essentially nationalistic movement, but with clear theological overtones. It asserted that only a general council has supreme authority in the Church and that all papal decrees are subject to the consent of the whole Church as represented in such a council. Gallicanism was condemned by the First Vatican Council (1869–70), which taught that infallible teachings of the pope are irreformable, that is, not subject to the consent of any higher ecclesiastical body or authority.

The Catholic Church in northern Europe, especially in the Catholic states of Germany, was also severely challenged by an eighteenth-century movement known as the Enlightenment. The movement was characterized by a sometimes uncritical confidence in the powers of human reason, an optimistic view of human nature, and a passion for human freedom. At the same time, it displayed an often hostile attitude toward religion and the supernatural and against all authority other than that based on reason. Although it influenced Protestantism far more than it did Catholicism, the Enlightenment stimulated advances in theological and biblical scholarship, in the education of the clergy, in the promotion of popular education, and in the struggle against religious superstition.

If the Enlightenment marked the beginning of the end of an unhistorical Catholic theology, the French Revolution of 1789 marked the end of medieval Catholicism. The feudal, hierarchical society on which medieval Catholicism had been based abruptly disappeared. In uprooting the clerical system, the French Revolution forced the French clergy to look to Rome and the papacy for support. Since Rome was "beyond the mountains," the new dependence of French Catholics on the papacy gave rise to an ultraconservative movement known as Ultramontanism. Perhaps the greatest hidden benefit of the French Revolution was what some have called the "grace of destitution." By stripping the French church of most of its wealth and power, the Church was free once again to pursue its basic mission of preaching the gospel and serving people in fidelity to its central teachings.

Not only in France but also in Germany, the French Revolution provoked a counterreaction among many intellectuals who returned enthusiastically to the values of the past, including those of Catholicism, which they extolled now as the mother of art and the guardian of patriotism. This countermovement was known as Romanticism. There emerged from it a rigid traditionalism that was distrustful of all critical thinking and speculation in theology and that looked to Rome for authoritative answers to all questions.

THE WINDS OF MODERNITY

The popes of this time—Gregory XVI (1831–46) and Pius IX (1846–78)—condemned the winds of change and modernity, nowhere more forcefully than in the latter's Syllabus of Errors (1864). Although Pius IX persuaded the bishops of the First Vatican Council to define papal primacy and papal infallibility, he lost the Papal States (September 1870) and the papacy's last bit of political power. It was only with the Lateran Treaty of 1929 (renegotiated in 1983) that the pope's temporal rights to the Vatican territory were legally recognized.

The nineteenth century also witnessed the rapid development of industrialization and the rise of many new social problems, including the worsening condition of workers. Too long wedded to, and identified with, traditional social, political, and economic powers, the Church began to lose the loyalty of the working classes. Partly to attract them back to the Church and partly to restore stability to the social order, Pope Leo XIII (1878–1903) issued a major encyclical, Rerum Novarum (Lat., "Of New Things") in 1891, defending the rights of workers to form unions, to earn a just wage, and to work under humane conditions. Catholic social teachings were developed in subsequent decades by popes Pius XI, Pius XII, John XXIII, Paul VI, and John Paul II, as well as by the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) and individual conferences of bishops. John Paul II marked the hundredth anniversary of Rerum Novarum with an encyclical of his own, Centesimus Annus ("The Hundredth Year") in 1991.

Just as the Catholic Church was buffeted by "new things" on the economic front, so, too, was it challenged anew intellectually. Although not really a single movement but a cluster of movements, Modernism emerged at the beginning of the twentieth century as a major threat to traditional Catholic orthodoxy, as formulated and interpreted by neo-Scholasticism. Modernism was condemned in 1907 by Pope Pius X (1903–14) through a decree of the Holy Office, Lamentabili, and an encyclical, Pascendi, and in 1910 bishops, pastors, and theologians were required for many years thereafter to swear to an oath against Modernism. Theologians and biblical scholars were forbidden to use the resources of modern scholarship in their research, writing, and teaching, and if they did, they were reported ("delated") to Rome through a spy network the pope himself encouraged. Many were silenced, removed from their positions, suspended from the priesthood, or even excommunicated. Because of the virulence of the anti-Modernist campaign, Catholic scholarship sunk into decline for fifty years, not recovering until just before the Second Vatican Council. Ironically, several of the Modernists' principal positions were later reflected in the teachings of that council and in some contemporary Roman decrees; namely, that the truths of Scripture and the dogmas of the Church are affected by history and must be interpreted in light of historical circumstances and that there is a development of dogma.

With the election of Pope Benedict XV (1914–22) the anti-Modernist era came to an end, and the First World War began. In these turbulent years the Catholic Church continued to move into the modern world. The liturgical movement, later endorsed by Pope Pius XII's encyclical Mediator Dei in 1947, began to close the gap between altar and congregation. Catholic biblical scholarship received crucial support from the same pope in his encyclical Divino Afflante Spiritu in 1943. The social apostolate was given impetus by a series of papal pronouncements, including Pius XI's Quadragesimo Anno (1931). The lay apostolate was promoted by popes Pius XI and Pius XII. The ecumenical movement had a more difficult time, especially in light of Pius XI's negative encyclical Mortalium Animos in 1929, but pioneers like Yves Congar were preparing the way for Vatican II. Finally, the missionary movement, which had experienced a major revival in the nineteenth century with as many as eight million converts, became increasingly independent of colonial and European influence. Both Pius XI and Pius XII stressed the importance of establishing native clergies and native hierarchies in mission lands.

THE SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL AND THE POSTCONCILIAR CHURCH

No event in the twentieth century, or indeed in the modern era, has shaped and influenced the Catholic Church more substantially than the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). Convened by Pope John XXIII (1958–63) for the sake of updating the Church (It., aggiornamento), the council effectively brought the era of Tridentine Catholicism to an end.

Among the council's distinctive teachings, in contrast to beliefs prevalent before Vatican II: (1) The Church is, first and foremost, a mystery, or sacrament, and not primarily an organization or institution. (2) The Church is the whole People of God, not just the hierarchy, clergy, and religious. (3) The Church's mission includes action on behalf of justice and peace and is not limited to the preaching of the word and the celebration of the sacraments. (4) The Church includes all Christians and is not limited exclusively to the Catholic Church. (5) The Church is a communion, or college, of local churches, which are not simply administrative subdivisions of the Church universal. (6) The Church is an eschatological community; it is not yet the kingdom of God. (7) The lay apostolate is a direct participation in the mission of the Church, and not simply a sharing in the mission of the hierarchy. (8) There is a hierarchy of truths; not all official teachings of the Church are equally binding or essential to the integrity of Catholic faith. (9) God uses other Christian churches and non-Christian religions in offering salvation to all humankind; the Catholic Church is not the only means of salvation. (10) The dignity of the human person and the freedom of the act of faith are the foundation of religious liberty for all, over against the view that "error has no rights."

The history of the Catholic Church since Vatican II has been shaped largely by the Church's efforts to come to terms with the various challenges and opportunities that council presented and at the same time to remain faithful to its distinctive Catholic identity. These efforts have not been without great difficulty. Although the majority of Catholics, especially those who have had the advantage of an education, have been generally responsive to the council's teachings, a vocal minority continued to resist and oppose them, at least implicitly. Pope Paul VI agonized over the divisions in the postconciliar Church. To some extent, Pope John Paul II (elected in 1978) unwittingly exacerbated them by seeming to encourage the discontented minority to believe that elements of pre–Vatican II Catholicism could somehow be restored. The long and still-evolving history of the Catholic Church clearly suggests that it cannot.

WHAT CATHOLICS BELIEVE

There are individual entries throughout this volume on various aspects of Catholic doctrine, theology, and spirituality. There is also a substantial entry on "Catholicism" that elaborates three of the principal characteristics of the Catholic tradition: sacramentality, mediation, and communion. What follows here are some highly abbreviated expressions of Catholic teachings.

1. Jesus Christ is the fullest revelation of God. That revelation is available in Scripture and tradition alike, not as two separate and distinct sources, but as rooted in a single source, which is the word of God. The response to this revelation is what we mean by faith. Catholicism rejects fideism (the belief that faith has no rational component) as well as rationalism (the view that we can believe only what can be rationally demonstrated to be true).
2. God created the world, so it is good. There is no question of an ongoing battle between two coequal (or nearly coequal) forces: God and Satan. The forces of evil have been overcome once and for all in Jesus Christ. The created order, although fallen and wounded by original sin and the actual sins of humankind, is nevertheless redeemed by Christ and renewed by the Holy Spirit.
3. Although God alone saves us, we cannot be saved without our own cooperation. This teaching is encapsulated in a formula attributed to Ignatius of Loyola (d. 1556); namely, that we should pray as if everything depended upon God, and work as if everything depended upon ourselves.
4. Grace really transforms and sanctifies us. Our sins are not simply covered over. We have become new creatures in Christ and temples of the Holy Spirit.
5. Jesus Christ is our Redeemer, who is truly divine and human. Because he is divine, his suffering, death, and Resurrection on our behalf are of infinite value. And because he is human, we are taken up with him into the mystery of redemption.

LARGEST CONCENTRATIONS OF CATHOLICS BY COUNTRY
OVER 10 MILLION

Brazil	135,160,000	Germany	28,599,000
Mexico	83,815,000	Peru	20,380,000
United States	56,399,000	Venezuela	18,638,000
Italy	55,728,000	Zaire	18,583,000
Philippines	52,325,000	India	14,585,000
France	47,625,000	Canada	11,972,000
Spain	37,039,000	Chile	10,761,000
Poland	36,616,000	Nigeria	10,587,000
Colombia	31,298,000	Ecuador	10,081,000
Argentina	29,965,000

SOURCE: 1994 Catholic Almanac (Huntington, IN: Our Sunday Visitor Publishing Division, 1993).

6. The God who created us and who redeemed us is a triune God: creator, redeemer, and sanctifier; Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Each person is God, and yet there is only one God.
7. Mary is the Mother of God and the Mother of the Church. She is the firstborn of those who have been redeemed and is a type, or symbol, of the Church through her faith in, and readiness to abide by, the word of God. The Church does not place Mary on a coequal basis with her Son, nor does it require its members to believe in any of the apparitions attributed to her by others.
8. The Church is necessary for salvation because it is the Body of Christ, continuing his mission for the sake of the coming reign of God. Although it will not come about until the end of history, God's reign is already present in mystery, in the Church and in the world. God wills the salvation of all.
9. The Church is essentially sacramental, signifying and celebrating the presence and activity of God through the seven sacraments, especially the Eucharist.
10. We are called to live in accordance with the gospel in our own individual lives and also to contribute to the common good in the world around us. The sources of morality are to be found not only in the Bible and the official teachings of the Church, but also in every human heart (natural law).
11. We are all destined for eternal happiness in heaven, but it is at least conceivable that some few may totally and with full deliberation reject the gift of salvation. Hell is for them the state of eternal absence from God. For others a period of purification, called purgatory, may be necessary to prepare them for the vision of God. The once-popular belief that infants who die without Baptism enter a state of natural happiness known as limbo is not an official teaching of the Church, and no Catholic is bound to hold to it.
12. The Catholic Church has assumed many different organizational forms throughout its history. Although there is a fundamental equality of members by reason of Baptism, some are given special ministerial responsibilities. For Catholics the Bishop of Rome has a unique ministerial function: to stand in Peter's place as the proclaimer of faith to the universal Church and as an instrument of unity.

The story of the Catholic Church is ongoing. Its destiny is the reign of God in all its fullness. Its present is that of a pilgrim's existence, "at the same time holy and always in need of being purified, and incessantly [pursuing] the path of penance and renewal." Its abiding mission is "to show forth in the world the mystery of the Lord . . . until at the last it will be revealed in total splendor" (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 8).

See also Catholicism; Church.

Bibliography

Bokenkotter, Thomas. A Concise History of the Catholic Church. Rev. ed. Garden City, NY: Image Books, 1990.

Congar, Yves. Divided Christendom: A Catholic Study of the Problem of Reunion. Trans. by M. A. Bousfield. London: Geoffrey Bles, 1939.

Congar, Yves. After Nine Hundred Years: The Background of the Schism Between the Eastern and Western Churches. Trans. by the Russian Center of Fordham University. New York: Fordham University Press, 1959.

McBrien, Richard P. Catholicism. Rev. ed. San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1994.

Rogier, Louis J., ed. The Christian Centuries: A New History of the Catholic Church. 3 vols. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1964, 1968; Paulist Press, 1978.

RICHARD P. MCBRIEN

Catholic Church Extension Society, U.S. missionary society. At the turn of the century, Father Francis Clement Kelly traveled the United States in search of funds for his poor parish in rural Lapeer, Michigan. On this journey he discovered the dire state of the Church in the West and South. On October 18, 1905, Kelly and a group of bishops and laypersons established the Catholic Church Extension Society to meet the Church's needs in rural and impoverished areas. Since its foundation, the society has built more than ten thousand churches; it offers emergency relief, contributes to the salaries of church personnel, and subsidizes campus ministry, seminarian education, and evangelization programs in the United States, Puerto Rico, American Samoa and Guam. The society publishes a magazine, Extension Magazine, and presents the annual Lumen Christi Award for outstanding missionary service.

Catholic colleges and universities—statistics. While there has been no systematic statistical worldwide study of Catholic colleges and universities, it is estimated that there are approximately 450 postsecondary Catholic educational institutions that would answer to the description of "college" or "university" as the terms are applied in the United States. For the purposes of a recent study by the Vatican Congregation for Catholic Education, the estimate was 900 such institutions, but these included such things as seminaries, vocational schools, and finishing schools.

United States—History: The first Catholic college in the United States was Georgetown University in Washington, D.C., founded in 1789 and chartered by Congress in 1815. Its 1993 enrollment was 11,985 students.

Between 1789 and 1849, 42 Catholic colleges were founded in the United States, 18 by bishops of dioceses, 18 by religious communities, 5 by diocesan priests as private ventures, and 1 college that folded soon after its founding. Between 1850 and 1900, 152 colleges for men were founded, with the vast majority of them (98) started by religious communities. From 1901 to 1955, another 73 were founded. From 1956 on, the rate slowed dramatically to only 3 colleges founded by religious communities and 1 by the bishop of a diocese. For the schools founded between 1850 and 1899, just under 30 percent survived; for those begun between 1900 and 1955 about 36 percent survived, compared to a 20-percent survival rate for non-Catholic institutions.

FOUNDING DATES AND ENROLLMENT OF TWELVE LEADING AMERICAN CATHOLIC COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES

Name	Founded	1993 Enrollment
Georgetown	1789	11,985
St. Louis	1818	11,747
Fordham	1841	14,500
Notre Dame	1842	10,000
Villanova	1842	11,100
Holy Cross	1843	2,712
Dayton	1850	10,658
Santa Clara	1851	7,750
Seton Hall	1856	9,700
Boston College	1863	14,455
St. John's/N.Y.	1870	19,105
Catholic University	1887	6,749

Most Catholic colleges for women had their roots in secondary educational academies. A significant number of such academies were begun between 1829 and 1852, all but three by women's religious communities. The first Catholic college for women, College of Notre Dame of Maryland, was founded in 1895.

The first Catholic college to admit women was St. John's College in New York, which opened extension classes in "pedagogy" for men and women in 1908. Marquette began the popular tradition of summer school for women religious in 1909. Marquette also broke the gender barrier for Catholic professional education for women when it granted a law degree to a woman in 1909.

Because one of the significant missions of the early Catholic colleges was the education of clerics, the curriculum was centered on the classics. Later, the curriculum expanded to include studies in commerce and the professions. In 1869, Notre Dame became the first Catholic college to open a law school; Georgetown and Catholic University followed suit in 1870 and 1895, respectively. St. Louis University opened the first Catholic medical school in 1842; Georgetown opened its medical school in 1851.

Contemporary Statistics: The Official Catholic Directory, 1992, reports that there were 659,155 students enrolled in 235 Catholic colleges and universities in the United States in 1992, up from 650,314 in 1991 and compared to 533,086 students in 237 institutions in 1981. The largest Catholic university is St. John's in New York, with 19,105 students. New York is the state with the greatest number, with 28 Catholic colleges and universities enrolling 107,490 students; Pennsylvania has 26 with 71,878; Illinois has 17 with 51,630.

The 1991 report of the Association of Catholic Colleges and Universities (ACCU) is a wide-ranging study of U.S. Catholic colleges, universities, and institutions it classifies as "professional/specialized" or "corporate," such as seminaries. The ACCU study reports that there are 229 Catholic colleges and universities with 609,350 students, in relation to 1,656 other independent institutions that enroll a total of 2,758,660 students. Findings of interest about Catholic colleges and universities in relation to other independent institutions of higher education are included in the accompanying tables.

GEOGRAPHY OF U.S. HIGHER EDUCATION

	Northeast	Midwest	South	West
All higher education	23%	25%	29%	22%
Catholic higher education	45	34	12	9
All independents	41	24	23	12

LEVEL AND ATTENDANCE

	Catholic	Other
UNDERGRADUATE
Full-time	55.2%	61.5%
Part-time	22.4	15.4
GRADUATE
Full-time	6.9	11.6
Part-time	15.5	11.5

RACE, ETHNICITY, AND CITIZENSHIP STATUS

	Catholic	Other
Black, non-Hispanic	6.0%	8.5%
American Indian/ Alaskan Native	0.3	0.4
Asian/Pacific Islander	2.4	3.4
Hispanic	7.7	5.7
White, non-Hispanic	81.3	77.1
Non-resident alien	2.4	5.0

GROWTH IN ENROLLMENT: 1982–88

	Catholic	Other
Full-time	0.6%	3.9%
Part-time	9.3	5.7
TOTAL	3.8	4.4

FULL-TIME SHARE OF TOTAL ENROLLMENT

Catholic	Other
62.1%	73.1%

CLASSIFICATION OF CATHOLIC INSTITUTIONS (ACCORDING TO CARNEGIE REPORT)

	No. of Institutions	% Dist.	Total Enrollment	% Dist.	Average Enrollment
Research/Doctoral	11	5%	127,072	21%	11,552
Comprehensive	100	44	366,561	60	3,666
Liberal Arts	91	40	103,007	17	1,132
Two-year	24	10	12,023	2	501
Prof./Spec./Corp.	3	1	687	0	229
TOTAL	229	100	609,350	100	2,661

CHANGE IN MINORITY AND NON-RESIDENT ALIEN ENROLLMENT

	Catholic	Independents	Public
Native American	11.6%	10.0%	5.2%
Asian/Pacific Islander	47.3	65.5	37.2
Black, non-Hispanic	0.1	8.8	0.9
Hispanic	5.3	25.7	31.6
Non-Resident Alien	10.4	8.8	8.7
TOTAL CHANGE IN MINORITIES	8.0	20.7	15.5

WOMEN'S SHARE OF TOTAL ENROLLMENT

Catholic	Other
59.0%	51.9%

AVERAGE EDUCATIONAL & GENERAL EXPENDITURES & TRANSFERS FOR FISCAL YEAR 1989

	Number	Avg. E&G
Catholic Institutions	208	$22,057
Other Independents	1129	23,291

Bibliography

Leahy, William P. Adapting to America: Catholics, Jesuits, and Higher Education in the Twentieth Century. Washington, DC: Georgetown University Press, 1991.

Petit, Joseph. Enrollment for Fall, 1988 and Finances and Student Aid Year Ending June 30, 1989 at U.S. Catholic Colleges and Universities. Washington, DC: American Catholic Colleges and Universities, 1991.

Power, Edward J. Catholic Higher Education in America: A History. New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1972.

MARK POORMAN

Catholic Daughters of the Americas, charitable organization for women founded by the Knights of Columbus in 1903. Its aims are the preservation of the Catholic faith, the intensification of patriotism, the spiritual and intellectual development of Catholic women, and the promotion of charitable projects. Membership in 1991 numbered about 150,000. See also Knights of Columbus.

Catholic education. See Catholicism and education.

Catholic Foreign Mission Society of America. See Maryknoll.

Catholicism, a Christian tradition, community, and way of life that emphasizes the universality of the Church and of its faith and at the same time recognizes the Bishop of Rome, the pope, as "the perpetual and visible source and foundation of the unity of the bishops and of the multitude of the faithful" (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 23).

There are Anglican, Protestant, Orthodox, and Oriental Christians who also identify themselves with Catholicism. By way of contrast they insist on the use of the adjective "Roman" to describe those Catholics who acknowledge the primacy of the Bishop of Rome. For such Catholics, however, the adjective "Roman" tends to confuse rather than define the reality of Catholicism. The history of the Church begins with Jesus' gathering of his disciples and with the post-Resurrection commissioning of Peter to be the chief shepherd and foundation of the Church—in Jerusalem, not in Rome. Therefore, it is not the Roman primacy that gives Catholicism its distinctive identity within the family of Christian churches, but the Petrine primacy. The adjective "Roman" applies more properly to the diocese, or see, of Rome than to the worldwide Church that is in union with the Bishop of Rome.

The Catholic Reality: Catholicism, so defined, is not a reality that stands by itself. The word "Catholic" is a qualification of Christian, and Christian is a qualification of religious, and religious is a qualification of human. Thus, Catholicism refers to a community of persons (the human dimension) who believe in God and shape their lives according to that belief (the religious dimension) and who believe God to be triune and Jesus Christ to be the Son of God and the redeemer of humankind (the Christian dimension).

As the name itself suggests, Catholicism is characterized by a radical openness to all truth and to every value. It is comprehensive and all-embracing toward the totality of human, religious, and Christian experience. Its direct opposite is not Protestantism but sectarianism, a way of being Christian that separates itself from the worldwide Church and from the world itself lest the purity of its faith and moral witness be compromised or sullied. Catholicism, therefore, is not limited to any one culture, national or ethnic group, school of theology, or spirituality. It is a way of being Christian that is characterized by a both/and rather than an either/or approach: nature and grace, faith and reason, Scripture and tradition, faith and works, authority and freedom, unity and diversity. Thus, Catholicism is a moral universe of laws but also of dispensations, of rules but also of exceptions, of respect for authority but also of respect for freedom of conscience, of high ideals but also of minimal requirements, of censures and excommunications but also of absolution and reconciliation.

Sacramentality, Mediation, and Communion: Catholicism is marked by other characteristics, but none so central or so distinctive as its commitment to the theological principles of sacramentality, mediation, and communion. None of these theological principles is more characteristic of Catholicism or more central to its identity than the principle of sacramentality. The Catholic vision sees God in all things: persons, communities, movements, events, places, objects, the world at large, the whole cosmos. The visible, the tangible, the fleshly, the finite, and the historical are actual or potential carriers of the divine presence. Indeed, Catholicism holds that it is only in and through these material realities that we can encounter the invisible and spiritual God. No fleshly reality is more central or crucial to this process of encounter than the Word made flesh himself. Jesus Christ is the great sacrament of our encounter with God, and the Church, in turn, is the sacrament of our encounter with Christ. At the opening of the second session of the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) Pope Paul VI referred to the Church, in fact, as "a reality imbued with the hidden presence of God." The seven sacraments, furthermore, are the signs and means by which that ecclesial encounter with Christ is effected and celebrated. But it is in our encounter with one another—the sacrament of the neighbor—that we most frequently encounter Christ within his Body, the Church.

Catholicism, therefore, insists that grace (the presence of God within us) actually enters into, transforms, and elevates our human nature in its fullest sense. We are sinners, to be sure, but more fundamentally we are temples of the Holy Spirit, new creatures in Christ. We are not simply justified by a declarative act of God; we are interiorly sanctified by grace.

For Catholicism, the world, too, is essentially good, though fallen, because God is present to it. Although fractured and fragmented, the world has the capacity for ultimate unity because of the gift and abiding presence of the Holy Spirit who is the source of all unity.

A corollary of the principle of sacramentality is the principle of mediation. A sacrament not only signifies the invisible presence of God, but it also causes what it signifies. Thus, God is not only present in material realities; God also works through these realities instrumentally, as means of the divine plan of salvation. Jesus Christ is God's first and most fundamental instrument or means of salvation. He is the one Mediator between God and humans. The Church, which is the Body of Christ, participates in the same work of mediation through the sacraments, the priesthood, the intercession of the saints, especially the Blessed Virgin Mary, the services of all kinds of ministers, and the use of sacred objects and rituals.

Finally, there is the principle of communion, which affirms that our way to God and God's way to us is not only mediated but also essentially and necessarily communal. Catholicism's sense of sin is corporate, and so, too, is its understanding of redemption. Nowhere is this communal vision more strikingly expressed than in the official social teachings of the Catholic Church: in papal encyclicals, conciliar documents, episcopal pronouncements, and the like. For Catholicism, the encounter with God is mediated through a community of faith. And that is why for Catholicism the mystery of the Church has always had so significant a place in its theology, doctrine, pastoral practice, moral vision, and devotional life. It is here, at the point of Catholicism's understanding of itself as Church, as a community of faith, that we come to the heart of the distinctively Catholic understanding, expression, and practice of Christian faith. For here, in Catholic ecclesiology, we find the convergence of these three theological principles of sacramentality, mediation, and communion. The Church is the sacrament of Christ, mediating salvation within a worldwide communityoffaith.*Seealso*Catholic,lifeofa;Catholic Church; sacramentality, principle of.

Bibliography

Cunningham, Lawrence. The Catholic Faith: An Introduction. New York: Paulist Press, 1987.

Happel, Stephen, and David Tracy. A Catholic Vision. Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1984.

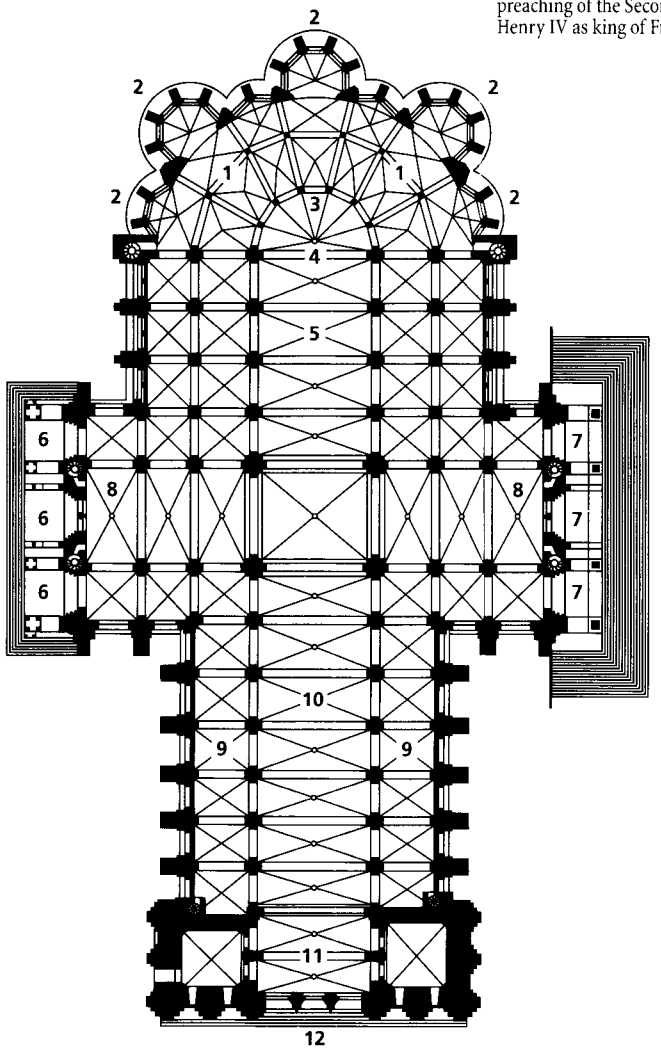
Lubac, Henri de. Catholicism: A Study of the Corporate Destiny of Mankind. Translated by Lancelot Sheppard. New York: Sheed & Ward, 1958.

McBrien, Richard P. Catholicism. Rev. ed. San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1994.

RICHARD P. MCBRIEN

Catholicism and architecture. Throughout its history Catholicism has shaped church architecture, and, in turn, architecture has shaped worship experience. The house church at Dura-Europos, Syria (231), represents the earliest type of structure dedicated to Christian worship, an ordinary domestic residence renovated by removing a wall to enlarge an assembly room and by the addition of a canopied baptismal font in a separate room. The practical simplicity of house churches for small neighbor-

The floorplan of the famous Gothic Chartres Cathedral, about 40 miles southwest of Paris, begun in 1194 and completed in 1240. Renowned for its spires, its stained-glass windows, and the sculptures on the portals, the cathedral was the site of the preaching of the Second Crusade (1146) and the crowning of Henry IV as king of France (1594).

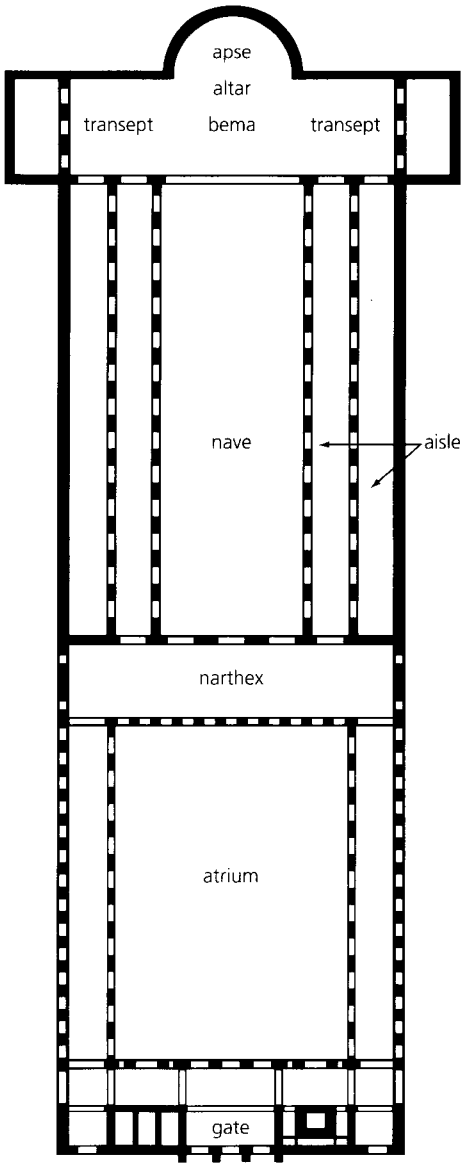


hood communities gave way in the fourth century under the patronage of Emperor Constantine to grandiose public buildings, adopting the scale and opulence of imperial architecture such as basilicas, public baths, and imperial tombs. Sanctioned as the state religion, Christianity appropriated a courtly processional ritual well served by the longitudinal imperial basilica and enthroned images of Christ as emperor in the apse at the altar end of the building.

At least four distinctively different types of Christian basilicas emerged, responding to specific community needs: (1) cemetery churches in covered cemeteries filled with tombs and used for banquets to celebrate anniversaries of deaths; (2) martyrial basilicas built above the tomb of a martyr with a transept (a tall transverse hall) distinguishing the commemorated tomb site from the nave and apse, such as at Old St. Peter's in Rome; (3) shrine churches incorporating rotundas to emphasize sites significant in the life of Christ, such as the church of the Nativity in Bethlehem or the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem; and (4) episcopal or congregational churches, large gathering places for the celebration of the Eucharist such as St. John of the Lateran in Rome, which had no burials, no martyrium, and no commemoration of any site. Baptisteries, such as at the Lateran in Rome (ca. 315) or the Baptistery of the Orthodox in Ravenna (ca. 451), in which catechumens descended into the cleansing waters of death with Christ, derived from central plan imperial tomb architecture and possibly the Roman baths.

Yearning for the prestige and splendor of fourth-century Constantinian Rome, Charlemagne (d. 814) revived early Christian architectural styles throughout the Frankish kingdom and imposed Roman liturgical norms. The introduction of Roman stational liturgies (liturgies associated with specific churches in Rome, known as "stational churches," the most famous of which are the basilicas of St. Mary Major and St. John Lateran), the ordination of large numbers of monks, and the development of a tariff penance system among Irish monks, by which uniform penances were assigned, led to a multiplication of altars to meet requirements of stational liturgies, daily Mass celebration, and the increase of Masses offered for expiation of sin. As the plan of the monastery church of St. Riquier at Centula (790–799) or the Monastic Plan of St. Gall (ca. 820) demonstrate, previously uncluttered spaces became filled with numerous altars, each with separate dedications, often screened off from each other.

Religious pilgrimages, especially to Santiago de



The floorplan of a basilica. The bema is the platform and sanctuary area on which the altar is situated. The narthex is the antichamber to the nave.

Compostela in Spain in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, encouraged on an even more extensive scale the building of the immense solid "romanizing" churches, which would accommodate large numbers of pilgrims coming to venerate relics collected by the churches precisely to attract visitors. Again, unencumbered spaces were made more complex, now by the addition of auxiliary chapels flanking the transept and apse for the exposition of relics on altars. The late eleventh-century "pilgrimage plan" of St. Sernin in Toulouse, a cross-shaped basilica with its new continuous aisle around the whole church for more orderly pilgrim traffic, and its proliferation of additional chapels exemplifies this type.

A view of the exterior of the basilica of St. Vitalis in Ravenna, Italy; Vitalis was a third-century Italian martyr about whom almost nothing is known.

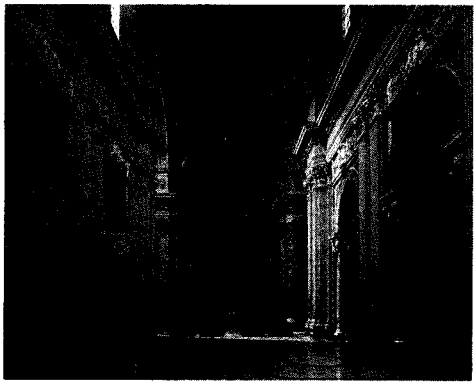
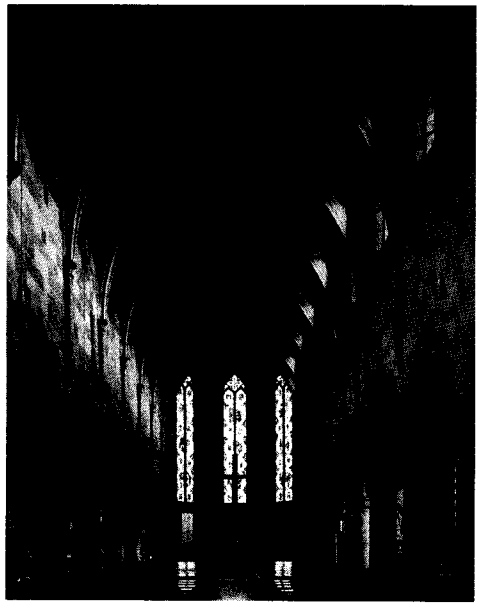
Advent of Gothic Style: The royal abbey church at St.-Denis, north of Paris (dedicated in 1144) introduced a new architectural vision. Using structural forms already known in the Romanesque period, pointed arches, ribbed groin vaults, flying buttresses, and stained glass, Abbot Suger sought to express Neoplatonic philosophical ideas combined with theological notions of luminosity and geometric harmony. His aim was to convey symbolically the beauty of the jewelled heavenly city of Jerusalem, as described in Revelation (Apocalypse), and the Johannine image of Christ as light. A Gothic "dematerialized" or "spiritual" architecture resulted, light and airy, in which the walls seemed to disappear, lifting the heart and spirit to the transcendent. The cathedrals at Chartres (begun 1145) and Amiens (begun 1220) became the models for churches throughout Europe.

The contemplative and mystical role of Gothic architecture as quiet revelation of God's order and perfection began to give way by the fifteenth century in Italy to political needs of the papacy to reassert its authority and power. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, church architecture, in particular St. Peter's, became a means of proclaiming papal and Roman preeminence in the face of challenges from Protestant opposition. Renaissance architects Bramante (d. 1514) and Michelangelo (d. 1564) began rebuilding Old St. Peter's, work continued by Carlo Maderno (d. 1629) with additional architectural and sculptural projects under the direction of Gian Lorenzo Bernini (d. 1680). Bernini's canopy over the tomb of St. Peter (1624–1633) and his sculpture of the Chair of St. Peter triumphantly celebrate the supremacy of the Bishop of Rome and the Roman Catholic Church. This Baroque visual language of unrestrained energy and pageantry, triumph and superiority, provided a legacy of ecclesiastical architectural vocabulary that persisted through the mid-twentieth century.

The interior of the church of St. Ignatius in Rome.



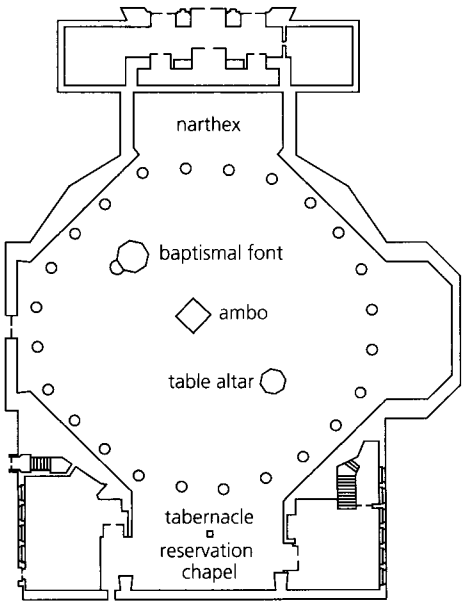
St. Paul's Church, Esslingen, Germany; the stark interior of this thirteenth-century Gothic church is said to be typical of the churches of the Dominican order.



The liturgical movement in the mid-nineteenth century, emerging in monastic centers in France, Belgium, and Germany, led to a systematic study of the Church's liturgy, laying the groundwork for Pope Pius XII's encyclical on the liturgy, Mediator Dei in 1947, and the reforms initiated by Vatican II. Principles and guidelines outlined in the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (1963), the U.S. Bishop's 1978 document "Environment and Art in Catholic Worship," and the ongoing revisions of the liturgy of the sacraments, particularly the catechumenate in the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults, have shifted the role of church architecture from Catholic Counter-Reformation polemical theater to the original idea of the building as the "house for the church."

Contemporary church design reclaims preeminence for spaces designed to assist the liturgy celebrated by the assembly. Prominent baptismal fonts invite descent into the earth and lavish bathing. The altar is relocated among the people. Chapels for individual reconciliation and eucharistic reservation take secondary place, clarifying a distinction between devotional piety and the assembly's corporate worship as reflection of a eucharistic theology of active celebration by the assembly. See also Baroque Catholicism; basilica; Gothic style liturgical architecture; liturgical art. MARCHITA B. MAUCK

Church of Our Lady of Loretto, Saint Mary's College, Notre Dame, Indiana; the floorplan reflects the liturgical renewal of the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). The community (seated on both sides of the altar) and the altar ministers are clearly visible to one another; the altar is in the central place of prominence, separated from the ambo from which the word of God is proclaimed; the baptismal font is at the entrance, underscoring the connection between Baptism and Eucharist.



Catholicism and culture. Culture is a complex human symbolic system, rooted fundamentally in language, reflecting the broadest social values and political worldview of a given people at a given period in time. The explicit use of the term "culture" became current in theological discussion only with the rise of the social sciences. The word "culture," for example, never appears in conciliar documents before Vatican II (1962–65). The relationship of the Catholic faith to such symbolic systems has both historical and theoretical components.

Historical Considerations: Viewed historically, as Christianity emerged and developed in the Roman Empire it related to the predominant culture of classical antiquity in a number of ways. Because from its beginnings it was an outcast and persecuted religious movement, Christianity was forced into an antagonistic or countercultural position: to choose the Church was, in essence, to choose against many values, especially the sociopolitical values of the predominant society. Nonetheless, many within the Church (e.g., the second-century apologists) argued that this did not have to be the case. Some, like Justin Martyr, argued that the pagan culture of antiquity carried intimations of God's revelation and, further, that Christians could be—if allowed—valuable citizens of the empire. Other writers borrowed freely from pagan philosophical ideas and vocabulary to express the meaning of the gospel in a culturally intelligible language. Early Christianity had to define itself both in terms of, and in contrast to, its parent religion, Judaism. The NT itself overtly reflects the attempts to come to grips with its Jewish past and Jewish culture.

In his own day, Augustine of Hippo (d. 430) argued (in On Christian Doctrine) that Christians had the right to use pagan learning for the good of the gospel, just as in the Confessions he stated baldly that in the writings of the Neoplatonists he found every true thing except "the name of Christ." After the birth of Christ, however, Christianity had a particular right to the inheritance of pagan culture, which it had come to replace at the end of time, as The City of God also so eloquently argues. Augustine's attitudes prevailed over earlier attempts to place Christianity in an antagonistic position toward pagan culture.

This tension between the Church as countercultural and as culture-dependent has marked Christianity from its beginnings. After the Peace of Constantine in the early fourth century, the Church borrowed heavily from the classical world in everything from law and administration to language and philosophy. In both the West and the East there developed a close relationship between Church and state—a relationship known as Caesaro-papism in the East. In the West, medieval popes claimed parity with, and eventually superiority over, secular rulers. Even such countercultural movements as monasticism did not escape the interpenetration of civil culture and religious ideas.

In the High Middle Ages a poet such as Dante Alighieri (d. 1321) well illustrates the complexity of the relationship of culture and Catholicism. Dante's Divine Comedy marries Christian revelation to pagan learning in a fashion already made acceptable by the theological tradition of Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) and, in a different manner, Bonaventure (d. 1274) from whom Dante borrowed freely. Nonetheless, Dante's great poem is also a plea for the papacy to remove itself from civil governance in favor of the Holy Roman Emperor so that the Church could be free from the power entanglements that had shamed and harmed it in the previous centuries. Dante, in short, both appreciated and was worried about the interpenetration of culture and religion.

The increased centralization of Church life after the Council of Trent in the sixteenth century as well as the resistance of the Church both to the rise of the Enlightenment and to newer, more revolutionary, ideals produced a Catholicism that was both unflinchingly Roman in tone and reactionary in its politics. The notion that "Europe is the Faith and the Faith is Europe" reflected a wildly romantic view of earlier European history as well as a rather simple-minded correlation between a particular culture ("Europe") and the gospel message (the "Faith"). But this view gripped the imagination of many Catholics even to our own day. The anti-Modernist position of Catholicism before the Second Vatican Council can be well understood as an attempt of the Church to resist the Modernist culture that flowed from the Enlightenment.

Early modern attempts to express the faith in different cultural forms for different cultural situations did not meet with easy acceptance in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Jesuit missionaries like Matteo Ricci in China and Roberto DeNobili in India attempted to provide both a vernacular worship and a diverse expression of Christian doctrine, but they met both incomprehension and resistance in Rome.

It was only in the colonial period of the nineteenth century that scholars began to reflect on the necessity of expressing the Christian faith in forms culturally appropriate for non-European Christians. These early attempts at "missionary accommodation" were timid enough (e.g., utilizing indigeneous forms of architecture or art), but they were the first steps that would lead to detailed attempts, in our time, to inculturate the gospel.

After Vatican II, as Karl Rahner noted, Catholicism entered the era of the World Church (Ger., Weltkirche) which not only marked the end of the European-centered Catholic Church, but raised (and continues to raise) the issue of what an African or Indian or Chinese Catholicism would look like.

Theoretical Considerations: It only takes a moment's reflection to realize that Christian doctrine itself is culturally conditioned in the sense that it is expressed in language, itself a product of culture. We need not identify the faith with culture but, as Pope Paul VI made abundantly clear in his 1975 exhortation On Evangelization in the Modern World (Evangelii Nuntiandi), "the building up of the Kingdom cannot avoid borrowing the elements of human culture or cultures" (n. 20).

One could look at the larger phenomenon of Catholicism itself and say that it is a culture that can be described in its own right and as different from, for example, Islamic, Buddhist, or Reformed Protestant culture. Those reflections mean that the constant task of the Church is to be self-reflectively critical in asking whether its culture or cultural expressions faithfully reflect the mysteries of God's revelation in Christ.

Such critical reflection cuts across every ministry in the Church. The need for critical self-reflection is as urgent for the pastoral worker (Do these strategies advance the gospel?) as it is for the theologian (Does that say what the gospel says?), the preacher (Can people hear what I say?), or the contemplative (Is my life a credible witness to the gospel?).

The Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (Gaudium et Spes, 1965) insisted in its second chapter that people need to participate in the growth and development of human culture, which is the vehicle of human expression and longing. Such participation is consistent with, and indeed a part of, the Christian doctrines of creation and incarnation.

The council also recognized that culture, as a human construct, can carry within it forces and ideas that are dehumanizing and prone to sin and degradation. For that reason, the Church, bearer of the gospel tradition, must also be ready to critique, to transform, and, when necessary, to reject those aspects of human culture that are in conflict with the gospel.

More difficult to assess is the relationship of Catholicism to "high" culture: the world of the arts, ideas, philosophy, social studies, technology, and the hard sciences. In the past (e.g., in the High Middle Ages) there was a close correlation between high culture and the Catholic faith. That is certainly not the case today. Modern and postmodern culture is autonomous (it possesses its own claims and criteria of credibility) and secularized (it does not appeal to the perspective of transcendence). Ignorance of, or hostility toward, this culture would make the Church sectarian, while acquiesence to its worldview would produce a theological sentimentalism that could not endure.

The third strategy, vigorously pursued by most Catholic thinkers of the modern period, has argued for a sustained dialogue between the world of faith and secular culture; an acknowledgment that profane culture also is a bearer of insight and constructive human advances; a willingness to cooperate in what human good the high culture of our time points to or has achieved. The worst mistake would be for the Church to think that culture can only learn from it; it must have the humility and clarity to recognize that culture also teaches. That is why Gaudium et Spes (n. 62) argued that theological inquiry should not be divorced from a "close contact with its own era."

Well over a generation ago, the Protestant theologian H. Richard Niebuhr, in Christ and Culture (1951), set out five ways in which culture and Christianity interact. They were ideal types and do not always hold up under close scrutiny. What is clear, however, is that Church and culture have a complex relationship: Church expresses itself in culture, but also critiques culture and attempts to transform it. Precisely because the Church expresses itself in cultural forms, it must be alert to the hidden presuppositions of a culture (i.e., the ideology of a given culture) it may assume but that are not always openly recognized or articulated. Contemporary debates over the "Roman" character of Catholic authority, for example, are really arguments over the degree to which an ideology of power is operative in Church governance.

Since the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), the Church has taken a much more consciously explicit attitude toward the need for Catholics to work for the increased humanization of culture. This attitude derives from the incarnational and sacramental character of Catholicism. The writings of Pope John Paul II, in particular, have focused on human dignity and Christian personalism as expressions of human culture in essential harmony with the Christian message.

Future Prospects: As the Catholic Church moves toward a new millennium, it faces a number of challenges and opportunities brought to the fore by new cultural upheavals. At the level of science and technology, there is a range of issues ranging from moral questions about biotechnologies to evangelization issues raised by new information technologies. Politically, there is the prospect of an entirely new concept of Europe, which could range as far east as the Urals. The tensions between developed and underdeveloped countries is, as it has been for a generation or more, a central concern of the Church. To that concern one must also be sensitive to the rise of militant forms of fundamentalist religion, like Islam, which do not share the values of postmodern culture.

In the last analysis, however, the great problematic for theology and culture is to understand how the gospel lives in, and is transformative of, human culture. In that sense, the whole history of the Church and of theology can be seen as a continuing effort to bring the gospel into critical dialogue with culture. What Pope Paul VI wrote in 1975 is true today and will be true tomorrow: "Evangelization loses much of its force and effectiveness if it does not take into consideration the actual people to whom it is addressed, if it does not use their language, their signs and symbols, if it does not answer the questions they ask, and if it does not have an impact on their concrete life" (Evangelii Nuntiandi, n. 64). See also acculturation; inculturation.

Bibliography

Niebuhr, H. Richard. Christ and Culture. New York: Harper & Row 1951.

Shorter, A. Towards a Theology of Inculturation. Maryknoll, N.Y.: Orbis Books, 1988.

Tillich, Paul. Theology of Culture. New York and London: Oxford University Press, 1959.

LAWRENCE S. CUNNINGHAM

Catholicism and economics. See capitalism; Catholic social teachings; Marxism.

Catholicism and education. An abiding commitment to scholarship and learning has always marked the history of Catholicism; the partnership between Catholicism and education is as old as Christianity itself. The most frequent title for Jesus in the NT is "teacher"; it portrays him as "the truth" (John 14:7), as "the wisdom of God" (1 Cor 1:24), and as giving disciples the mandate to "go . . . make disciples of all nations, . . . teaching them . . ." (Matt 28:19–20). Since NT times, the Church has been involved in education, teaching and learning within each context of time and place.

Grounds for the Partnership: The Jewish context of Christianity provided deep roots for a commitment to education and scholarship. As the canonical corpus of Jewish sacred writings emerged during the Second Temple period (ca. 400 B.C.), Jews became "people of the book." The synagogues were centers for systematic study of the sacred texts, and rabbis taught that such scholarship was akin to prayer and worship; its purpose was wisdom and holiness of life.

Christianity inherited this Jewish appreciation for scholarship, and Catholicism came with at least three theological warrants of its own for commitment to education: (1) an optimistic but realistic anthropology that recognizes both the brokenness and inherent goodness of human existence, and thus encourages holistic education that promotes people's potential to be the glory of God as fully alive (Irenaeus, d. ca. 200); (2) a this-worldly as well as an otherworldly understanding of salvation that recognizes God's saving action in Jesus Christ as improving the quality and promise of life both here and hereafter, thus recommending humanizing education as an aspect of fulfilling this saving work; and (3) the conviction that reason and revelation are essential partners in the life of Christian faith. This third and perhaps central warrant for the partnership has prompted Catholicism throughout its history to pick a careful path between the extremes of fideism and rationalism. Instead of favoring either "blind faith" or the sufficiency of reason alone, it has been convinced that understanding and faith, reason and revelation need and enhance each other. Though there has always been support for Tertullian's defiant stance that "Jerusalem has no need of Athens" (The Prescription of Heretics 7), Catholicism has favored a more balanced view, well summarized in a classic statement of Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274): "Just as grace does not destroy nature but perfects it, so sacred doctrine presupposes, uses, and perfects natural knowledge" (Summa Theologiae 1a. 1.8.–2).

A Christian Paideia: The early Apologists (ca. 120–220) used their classical education to present Christian faith in a compelling way to the learned; they posed Christianity as the true and ultimate philosophy. At Alexandria, a group of scholars began to forge a "Christian paideia" (Gk., "pedagogy"), a synthesis of "the gospel" and secular learning into a Christian humanism. Under the leadership of Clement (ca. 150–ca. 215) and then Origen (ca. 185–ca. 254), this "school" educated people in both Christian faith and the best of classical culture, convinced that the latter could be "stirrups to reach the sky" of spiritual wisdom (Origen). Some two centuries later, Augustine (354–430) reiterated and deepened this appreciation of secular scholarship, arguing that as the Israelites had taken booty from Egypt, so Christians should take as their own the best of pagan learning.

As Augustine lay on his deathbed, the Vandals were already at the gates of Hippo; thereafter uncultured tribes swept over the empire and the rich tradition of Greek and Roman scholarship was severely threatened. But the vestiges of education and enlightenment were kept alive and then revived by the Church.

The Celtic monasteries remained beacons of learning during those "dark ages." Irish monasticism had a particular commitment to scholarship and especially to copying manuscripts in order to preserve the classic texts of Western culture. The great monasteries of Clonard, Durrow, and Clonmacnoise were like modern-day universities with as many as three thousand students, and the abbey of Kildare under Brigid (d. ca. 523) was a center of learning, culture, and peacemaking. Columba (Columkille, ca. 521–97), educated at Clonard, founded the great monastic center of learning at Iona (an island off Scotland) that became a seedbed for the revival of education throughout Europe.

Carolingian Renaissance and the Universities: Charlemagne (ca. 742–814) became king of the Franks in 771 and sole emperor of the West in 800; during his reign he pacified and extended the empire to include most of western Europe, with its palace at Aachen. A brilliant politician and military leader, he was also committed to Church reform; his rule epitomized "Christendom," the unified worldview that saw the religious and secular as aspects of the same reality of God's reign in history. But Charlemagne recognized that military might alone could not pacify his huge empire and reform the Church; education was essential if his civilizing and Christianizing legacy was to survive. In this he was assisted by the Anglo-Saxon scholar Alcuin of York.

Alcuin (735–804) was educated at the cathedral school of York and in 778 became its master. (York was founded from Lindisfarne, which had been founded from Iona.) He met Charlemagne at Parma in 781; thereafter began one of the most significant partnerships in Western history. Together they were the moving forces behind the Carolingian Renaissance, which revived education and marked the end of the "dark ages."

Alcuin moved from York to Aachen and established a very effective palace school. It educated many of the future leaders of Church and state, and its curriculum became the model for all schools in the Carolingian Renaissance. Before Charlemagne, many Benedictine monasteries were centers of learning (e.g., Tours in France, Monte Cassino in Italy, Jarrow in England, and Fulda in Germany), but such monastic schooling was for future monks. Likewise some great cathedral schools predated Charlemagne (Canterbury, Seville, Liege, Utrecht, Cologne, Paris, and Orléans) but they were only to educate future priests. Now with his famous decree of "universal education" of 787 (likely written by Alcuin), Charlemagne ordered all monasteries and cathedrals to sponsor schools open to everyone in the empire who desired education.

The Carolingian schools favored a Socratic method for teaching the seven liberal arts as revived by Alcuin at the palace school. The liberal arts were divided into the trivium, a study of classical texts through grammar, rhetoric, and dialectic, and the more advanced quadrivium of music, arithmetic, geometry, and astronomy. All these arts were cumulatively to prepare students to study Sacred Scripture and the patristic literature of the Church; thus, the ultimate purpose of the whole curriculum was spiritual wisdom. Through the monastic and cathedral schools of the Carolingian Renaissance the Church became the primary educator of the Western world; many of them were precursors for the universities of the High Middle Ages.

Around 1150, the first of the great universities began to emerge at Salerno and Bologna, dedicated to the study of medicine and law, respectively. The University of Paris followed shortly thereafter, and then Oxford, Cambridge, Padua, Pisa, Salamanca, Lisbon, and many other great universities that continue to this day.

The universities began as loose-knit guilds of teachers and students. They were called "general schools" because they welcomed all who wished to study, they prepared people to teach the knowledge they acquired, and they were to serve all of Christendom. Gradually they organized themselves as juridical corporations with "faculties" of teachers and "nations" of students. The great universities came to have four faculties—theology, law, medicine, and arts, the last seen as essential preparation for studying the other three.

Though the emperor or a local ruler often gave a university official recognition and guaranteed protection and safe passage to its teachers and students, the whole university movement was extensively the work of the Church. Most universities had a rector or chancellor who was ecclesially appointed; their power to grant degrees was by papal charter; most of the professors were clerics, especially Dominicans, Franciscans, and Augustinians, and likewise many of the students; and Catholicism lent the common faith and language that enabled faculty and students from diverse cultures to work together.

The Church could sponsor the university movement because of the new synthesis of faith and reason being forged by its own theologians of the time. The rediscovery of Aristotle, especially at the beginning of the second millennium, encouraged a more scientific and systematic theology. From Anselm (d. 1109) onward, such Scholastic theology took its place at the very heart of the university as the "queen" of the sciences and provided the "sacred canopy" for the investigation of a unified universe in the others.

An Uneasy Alliance: Though the Church's schools and universities of the late Middle Ages spawned the great Renaissance of the next era, the Church's relationship with this movement of cultural retrieval and growth was an uneasy one. The Renaissance revived the classical learning of Greece and Rome and championed a humanism centered on the dignity and value of the individual person. This encouraged freedom of intellect and will unfettered by creeds of faith or by Church directives. Though threatened at first, the Church's own traditions of a positive anthropology and appreciation of reason enabled it to appropriate the Renaissance spirit in its educational ministry. The Ratio Studiorum (Lat., "method of studies") of Ignatius of Loyola, for example, was suffused with Renaissance humanism and rationality. The work, issued in 1599, divided the program of studies into three divisions: letters (Latin and Greek), philosophy, and theology.

The Protestant Reformation was launched by Martin Luther (1483–1546) when he published his Ninety-five Theses on October 31, 1517. Though the Reformers favored revelation over reason as the source of truth (sola Scriptura, Lat., "Scripture alone"), the Renaissance challenge to Church authority encouraged emphasis on individual interpretation of Scripture. This in turn became a major impetus for universal literacy in the Western world.

The Reformation also encouraged the replacement by the state of the Church as primary educator. For his reform movement to succeed, Luther recognized the need to wrest control of education from the Church of Rome. Condemning the cathedral and monastery schools as "unchristian" and "tools of the devil," he wrote his famous educational manifesto of 1524, urging civil rulers to establish government-funded and -sponsored schools for the welfare of both state and Church. This encouraged what later became the "national school system" throughout Europe, though the separation between "public" and Church education was not widely effected until well into the nineteenth century.

Education in the Catholic Counter-Reformation: Prior to the Reformation, the Dominicans, Franciscans, and Augustinians had papal approval to be involved in education as a function of their ministry, and Geert de Groote (1340–84) had founded the Brethren of the Common Life in 1376, likely the first order of vowed religious brothers dedicated to educating the common people. In the post-Reformation period, however, the Church approved a great number of new teaching orders of men and women, beginning with the Ursulines, founded in 1535 by Angela de Merici (1474–1540), and the Jesuits of Ignatius of Loyola (1491–1556), which received papal approval in 1540.

The Council of Trent (1545–63), in fact, discouraged women's religious orders from participating in the educational ministry of the Church. However, the faith and persistence of many great women, who often knowingly functioned contrary to the expressed directives of the Church, prevailed over papal opposition and led gradually to approval.

Some of the notable women's orders dedicated to teaching that emerged in this era were: the Congregation of Notre Dame, cofounded in 1598 by Alix le Clerc with her pastor Peter Fourier; the Visitation Sisters, cofounded in 1610 by Jane Frances de Chantal (1572–1641) and Francis de Sales; the Institute of the Blessed Virgin Mary (Loretto Sisters), founded ca. 1615 by Mary Ward (1585–1645); the Daughters of Charity, cofounded ca. 1633 by Louise de Marillac (1591–1660) and Vincent de Paul; the Sisters of St. Joseph founded in 1650 by John Peter Medaille. Likewise, many new teaching orders of religious men emerged, most notably: the Oratorians (1575), the Vincentians (1625), the Sulpicians (1642), and the Brothers of the Christian Schools founded by Jean-Baptiste de La Salle in 1684.

The Modern Era: Through these and many other religious orders, the Church continued to be a major influence on education down to the present. From the seventeenth to the nineteenth centuries they helped to forge many of the "national school systems" of Europe. With the revival of the missionary movement in the nineteenth century (from the pontificate of Gregory XVI, 1831–46, onward), these orders brought their commitment to education throughout the world and particularly to the developing countries. Their pedagogy, especially of the women's orders, was an enlightened one that anticipated or reflected the personalist and humanizing pedagogies of great educational reformers like John Amos Comenius (1592–1670), Johann Heinrich Pestalozzi (1746–1827), and Friedrich Wilhelm Froebel (1782–1852).

The Enlightenment era of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries brought a deeper and more critical rationalism than ever before. Its driving conviction was that the triumph of critical reason and free thinking over "common sense" and authority would solve, with ever evolving progress, most human problems and bring true happiness. The Enlightenment's skepticism and "deism" (natural religion based on reason) challenged the whole fabric of Christianity, and its battle cry of "dare to think" (Immanuel Kant) challenged the authority of Scripture and of the Church's magisterial role. As with its predecessor, the Renaissance, the Church was defensive at first and has ever remained a bit cautious toward the Enlightenment; but it came to recognize that its own traditions enabled it to appropriate the asset of critical reason to its faith life and education. At Vatican I (1869–70) Catholicism reiterated its age-old conviction that "Faith and reason . . . are . . . mutually advantageous. . . . Right reason demonstrates the foundations of faith . . . and faith . . . sets reason free" (Dogmatic Constitution on the Catholic Faith). Much of the scriptural, historical, theological, and pastoral scholarship that encouraged the aggiornamento (It., "updating") of the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) reflected the critical methods and canons of the Enlightenment period. And Vatican II in its introduction to the Declaration on Christian Education reiterated Catholicism's ancient partnership with education, insisting that because of "the mandate she has received from her divine Founder to proclaim the mystery of salvation to all," the Church always has a "role to play in the progress of education" and in seeing to it that every person's "inalienable right to an education" is duly honored.

Catholicism and Education in the United States: Throughout history, there is likely no more compelling instance of Catholic commitment to education than the school system created by the U.S. Catholic community. The story of American Catholic education goes back to the very first Catholic settlers in the New World.

Outside of the original colonies, Spanish missionaries from the sixteenth to nineteenth centuries created a system of mission centers whose purpose included the education of the native peoples. As early as 1606, Spanish Franciscans opened a formal school in St. Augustine, Florida, with the stated purpose "to teach children Christian doctrine, reading, and writing."

Likewise, the first French missionaries and explorers who came into the Great Lakes region and Mississippi Basin from Montreal and Quebec understood their mission work to include education. The first French-sponsored Catholic formal school for boys was opened by Franciscans in New Orleans in 1718, and the Ursulines opened a school there for girls in 1727.

In the thirteen original colonies, the English settlers vigorously opposed education for and by Catholics, who constituted a small minority (ca. twenty-five thousand in 1776), largely of indentured laborers and servants. In 1642 the Massachusetts Bay Colony enacted a law that required a school in every settlement lest, through inability to read the Bible, "Ye Olde Deluder Satan" led people astray. Thereafter and throughout the colonial period of a century and a half, each colony had a common school system, but one controlled by the Protestant churches and clergy. A Protestant ethos and an overt anti-Catholic bias permeated the whole curriculum (e.g., the McGuffey readers). Even into the late 1700s, the few Catholic schools run by Jesuits, Franciscans, and Ursuline sisters received no public support and much opposition, while the Protestant denominational schools had full freedom and public funding.

Independence (1776) and the Bill of Rights (1791), with its guarantee of religious liberty, coupled with a major influx of Catholic immigrants from Europe (the Catholic population rose to six million by 1850), brought new opportunity and need for Catholic education. Catholics in the colonies began to challenge the Protestant control and curriculum of the common school, which they saw as a serious threat to the faith of their children.

At first many Catholic bishops favored a truly "public" school system, free of undue Protestant influence. This was also the intent of such educational leaders as Horace Mann (1796–1859)—a nonsectarian school system supported by the public. However, this "secularization" of the schools met with stiff opposition from the Protestant establishment. Spearheaded by such bishops as John Hughes (1797–1864) of New York, Catholics began to establish their own schools and petitioned the states for the same funding already enjoyed by other denominational schools and academies. The predictable outcome was that one state after another prohibited state funds to all denominational schools. This refusal of public funds, coupled with the presence of organized anti-Catholic sentiment in "nativist" groups like the Know-Nothing Society of the 1850s (founded to eradicate "foreign influence, Popery, Jesuitism and Catholicism"), prompted U.S. Catholics and the episcopacy to establish their own independent school system.

U.S. Catholic education was made possible by the generosity of Catholic parents and parishioners and especially by the religious orders of women and men who emerged to staff the schools for a minimum living allowance. Between 1840 and 1900 more than sixty European religious orders of women and men came to teach in the United States. Likewise the emergence of the first American sisterhoods gave major impetus to the parochial school system. The Sisters of Charity of St. Joseph were founded by Elizabeth Ann Seton (1774–1821) ca. 1809; the Dominican sisters of St. Catherine were founded in Kentucky in 1822; the Oblate Sisters of Providence were founded in Baltimore in 1829, the first congregation of African-American sisters to take vows in the United States; the Servants of the Immaculate Heart of Mary were founded in 1845 at Monroe, Michigan.

The Catholic bishops of the United States assembled at the First Plenary Council of Baltimore (1852) urged that every parish build a parochial school, a plea reiterated by the Second Plenary Council (1866). But the Third Plenary Council (1884), of Baltimore Catechism fame, was even more legislative and decreed that "near each church, where it does not exist, a parochial school is to be erected within two years. . . . All Catholic parents are bound to send their children to the parochial school."

Though this mandate of Baltimore III was never fully realized because of financial and other constraints, it lent new impetus to the founding of parochial schools. By 1900 there were as many as 3,500 Catholic elementary schools in the country (about 45 percent of the 8,000 parishes). By 1920 this number had doubled to 6,551 schools with 41,581 teachers and 1,759,673 pupils. Catholic elementary school enrollment doubled twice again until it reached an all-time high in the mid-1960s with 4.5 million children enrolled. Similarly, the secondary schools grew from approximately 100 in 1900 to 1,552 by 1920, to 2,119 in 1940, and 2,392 in 1960 with an enrollment of almost 1 million students.

In 1789 the great John Carroll (1735–1815) of Baltimore, first bishop of the United States, founded the first Catholic institution of higher education at Georgetown, later confided to the Jesuits. During the nineteenth century religious orders opened some 200 Catholic colleges for men in the United States. Among the early ones that have survived and grown into renowned colleges and universities were St. Louis University (1818), Fordham (1841), Notre Dame (1842), Villanova (1842), Holy Cross (1843), Santa Clara (1851), and Boston College (1863). Colleges for women were slower to emerge, but among the first were Notre Dame of Maryland (1873), St. Mary's, Indiana (1894), Trinity College, Washington, D.C. (1897), and the College of New Rochelle (1904).

Present and Future: In 1991–92 there were 8,508 Catholic elementary and secondary schools in the United States, with a combined enrollment of 2.5 million students. The decline from the high of 5.5 million students in the 1960s is due, at least in part, to the decrease in numbers of vowed religious to staff the schools, thus requiring higher tuition. (The United States is the only Western democracy to refuse public funding to such schools.) In 1964, 85 percent of faculty and staff were vowed religious; in 1992, 87 percent of full-time faculty were lay women and men, 11 percent sisters, and 3 percent brothers and priests.

In spite of cutbacks in enrollment and ever-rising costs, contemporary research indicates that U.S. Catholic schools continue to be very successful educational ventures. In their 1987 study, Public and Private Schools, James S. Coleman and Thomas Hoffer found that Catholic-school students do better than their public-school peers in reading, mathematics, and verbal skills. Likewise, minority and other disadvantaged students at Catholic high schools have higher achievement levels and lower drop-out rates than in public schools, and a greater percentage go on to college. Coleman and Hoffer propose that the greater success of Catholic schools over public ones (with far more budget) is due to the "social capital" of the religious community that surrounds the school. After twenty-five years of chronicling the life of American Catholic education, Andrew Greeley offers a similar thesis, that it is the "community-forming" component of Catholic schools that explains their effectiveness. See also academic freedom; Catholic colleges and universities—statistics; parochial school; religious education.

Bibliography

Buetow, Harold A. A History of Catholic Schooling in the United States. Washington, DC: National Catholic Education Association, 1986.

Power, Edward J. Main Currents in the History of Education. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1970.

Sawicki, Marianne. The Gospel in History: Portrait of a Teaching Church. New York: Paulist Press, 1988.

Ulich, Robert. Three Thousand Years of Educational Wisdom. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1971. THOMAS GROOME

Catholicism and journalism. Catholic weekly and daily publications are a result of the nineteenth-century expansion of journalism. England's weekly The Tablet began publication in 1840; Holland's Catholic daily De Tijd in 1845; the Vatican's L'Osservatore Romano in 1861; and France's La Croix in 1883.

Catholic Journalism in the United States: In the United States, the earliest efforts in Catholic journalism were affected by the immigrant communities they served. An interesting exception was a short-lived bilingual (English and French) newspaper, Michigan's first, called the Michigan Essay, or Impartial Observer. Established in 1809 by Father Gabriel Richard, pastor of St. Anne's parish in Detroit, the four-page publication relieved his sacristan of extra duty as town crier. Welcoming contributions from all "gentlemen of talent," regardless of creed, the newspaper's columns consisted largely of reprints of stories from secular periodicals, an advertisement for St. Anne's school, and a promise that a future issue would include an essay on "Nine Days' Devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus."

Bishop John England of Charleston, South Carolina, founded the first advertently Catholic newspaper in the nation, the weekly United States Catholic Miscellany (1822), and this publication continued, closely supervised by England's successors, into the final days of the Civil War. Nevertheless, during its nearly half-century history, the Miscellany was sufficiently influential and challenging to spawn numerous imitations, most of them edited by laypersons. While the American bishops of this era applauded the growth of a Catholic press, they were disconcerted by the independence of these lay editors. This ambivalence, lasting well into the next century, found its way into a pastoral letter issued from the bishops' 1837 meeting in Baltimore. "We feel disposed," they wrote, "to exhort you to sustain with better efforts those journals, which, though not officially sanctioned by us, still are most useful to explain our tenets, to defend our rights and to vindicate our conduct." By the end of the nineteenth century, Catholics in America were reading more than two hundred and fifty such journals.

The establishment of the Catholic Press Association (CPA) in 1911 made possible numerous improvements in Catholic journalism, not the least of which was the formation of a news service for Catholic newspapers. Independent of ecclesiastical control, the CPA included priests and members of religious orders, but for the first three decades of its existence, laypeople presided. After World War I, the American bishops reorganized their first corporate institution, the National Catholic War Council into the National Catholic Welfare Council (NCWC), which included a press department. In 1919, by mutual agreement, the CPA's news service joined the NCWC press department, simultaneously expanding its subscriptions and ceding editorial control to the national hierarchy. The CPA remains an indispensable organization for Catholic journalists today, providing a variety of services and professional education programs to a network of more than three hundred publications in the United States and Canada.

Catholic colleges and universities played a significant role in the expansion of the Catholic press. Marquette University established a department of journalism in 1910, and the University of Notre Dame established a chair in journalism in 1912. An educated Catholic readership was increasingly stimulated by the emergence of national magazines providing distinctive commentary on politics, culture, and the faith. Salient among these were America, a Jesuit magazine founded in 1909, and Commonweal, founded by laypeople in 1924, both of which survive today. The Catholic World, a monthly begun in 1865, still publishes under the name The New Catholic World. By the 1950s, the total circulation of Catholic periodicals in North America had reached 15 million, a figure that would nearly double by the closing of Vatican Council II in 1965.

Postconciliar Developments: The Second Vatican Council had remarkably little of interest to say about journalism. Cardinal John Heenan, archbishop of Westminster, went so far as to pronounce its Decree on the Instruments of Social Communication (Inter Mirifica) the council's "greatest failure." Nevertheless, the excitement surrounding the council itself and its firm commitment to the free flow of information as later expressed in Communio et Progressio (the 1971 pastoral instruction on the application of Inter Mirifica) deeply affected the operations of America's Catholic newspapers and magazines. "For many editors," wrote A. E. P. Wall, formerly of the Catholic Review in Baltimore, "the council was a signal to broaden the scope of their coverage of the news and to publish articles exploring such controversial subjects as the role of authority, homosexuality, [and] the ordination of women to priesthood." These subjects and, since the U.S. Supreme Court decisions of the early 1970s, abortion continue to fascinate postconciliar editors, reporters, and columnists. One effect of this absorption, whether intended or not, is a discourse that strikingly relies on conventional American political categories, so that, for example, the "liberal" National Catholic Reporter (a national weekly based in Kansas City, Missouri) is arrayed against the "conservative" Wanderer (a national weekly based in St. Paul, Minnesota).

Whatever these postconciliar developments in Catholic journalism have done or failed to do for the Church in the United States, they have not increased readership. In 1965 the CPA reported that the combined circulation of Catholic newspapers, magazines, and newsletters in North America had reached 28,944,724. Three decades later, and despite a remarkable growth in the Catholic population, that figure stood at 27,348,517. See also America; Catholic Press Association; Catholic World, The; Commonweal; Decree on the Instruments of Social Communication, National Catholic Reporter; Osservatore Romano; Tablet, The; Wanderer, The. MICHAEL GARVEY Catholicism and mass media. Catholicism interacts with mass media through official church statements concerning mass media, Catholic media activity, and media coverage of the Catholic Church. Throughout its history the Catholic Church has utilized various modes of communication—oral tradition, medieval manuscripts, and the printed word. In the twentieth century modern modes of social communication (newspapers, film, radio, and television) have become major components of popular culture throughout the world. As early as 1896 a film projector was demonstrated at the Vatican. In 1931 a radio station was established there and Pius XI was the first pope to use the medium. The first papal encyclical, Vigilanti Cura, wholly devoted to the motion picture appeared in 1936. In 1957 Pope Pius XII's encyclical Miranda Prorsus, concerned with radio and television, spoke of the pastoral problems posed by modern communications media.

In 1963 the Vatican II Decree on the Instruments of Social Communication (Inter Mirifica) called modern means of social communication "marvelous technical inventions from creation." This document noted that an interdependent world had a need for, and a right to, information. Bishops were called to oversee media activities in their dioceses. The council directed a Vatican commission to initiate international consultation and to publish a pastoral instruction to "ensure that all the principles and rules of the council on the means of social communication be put into effect."

The pastoral instruction Communio et Progressio, published in 1971, and the document Aetatis Novae, issued by the Pontifical Council for Social Communications in 1992, reflected on the revolution in human communications that had occurred in the two decades since the earlier instruction. Both documents pointed out that communications media are powerful instruments for progress. The role of media is noted in the formation of public opinion—agenda-setting, as media experts call it. These church documents stressed the justice of equal access for all to information and media channels. Also noted were the need for special training in media techniques and the special affirmation necessary for media professionals of good will.

Communio et Progressio sees the Church maintaining lines of communication with the whole human race and building closer communion within the Church itself. Aetatis Novae cites newer mass media technologies (satellites, cable television, videocassettes, compact discs, computerized image-making) as "new languages." Communio et Progressio is "rooted in a vision of communication as a way toward communion" and holds that media should be at the service of dialogue with the world. "The dialogue also involves support for media artists; it requires the development of an anthropology and a theology of communication. . . ." Aetatis Novae concludes: "It is not enough to use the media simply to spread the Christian message and the church's authentic teaching. It is also necessary to integrate that message into the new culture created by modern communications . . . with new languages, new techniques and a new psychology."

The 1992 document cited a need for a pastoral plan of social communications. "Catholic media work is not simply one more program alongside all the rest of the church's activities; social communications have a role to play in every aspect of the church's mission." An appendix to the document offers guidelines for designing such a pastoral plan and a process for implementing it.

Catholic Media Activity: Global mass media content is heavily influenced by media activities in the United States: Hollywood film techniques, Cable News Network's on-the-spot coverage, and American advertising and marketing. The economics of mass media are also moving to the American model as many nations alter their media from government-sponsored to commercially-based systems.

Communications scholars have long debated the realities of "media effects" or the precise way media influence audience choices and values. Of special concern has been the impact of violence in media programming and its effect on culture. Music has been a significant aspect of programming, with the advent of rock music and the combination of sound and sight in music videos. Minorities, senior citizens, and women are often under-represented in media.

It has become obvious that mass media reflect popular culture and that the dynamics of myth, ritual, and storytelling are at work within media viewers as they interact around the world with dramas, situation comedies, and soap operas. Theologians have discussed this in terms of the religious imagination. Indeed, media scholars and theologians have begun a systematic dialogue on these topics under the guidance of the Gregorian University in Rome and the Jesuit Center for the Study of Communication and Culture in London. Joint conferences have been held with subsequent book publications.

Many religious communities have had members trained in mass media techniques, and a communications office exists in most dioceses. Catholic universities and colleges have programs of study in communications with many summer programs available.

Organizations exist to unite Catholic media personnel: the International Organization for the Press (UCIP); for cinema (OCIC); and for radio and television (UNDA). An annual World Communications Day often elicits an address by the Holy Father on the significance of media.

After regional hearings in the United States, an annual national communications collection was established, with a portion of the proceeds remaining in the local diocese for its own communication efforts. This funding has been used to sponsor the production of selected materials for international broadcast and cassette distribution. Some of this national funding helped establish the Catholic Television Network of America (CTNA), a satellite system linking many dioceses for program delivery and teleconference meetings. In addition, a number of dioceses operate closed circuit television systems for extensive educational and pastoral tasks.

Media Coverage of the Catholic Church: In 1991 the Knights of Columbus and the Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights, two conservative organizations, commissioned a study of U.S. news coverage of the Catholic Church to be undertaken by the Center for Media and Public Affairs. The study examined a sample of nationally influential media outlets during three five-year time blocs. The study used content analysis, with the final sample numbering 1,876 news items. Subject categories included sexual morality, church authority and dissent, ecumenism and church-state relations, and the use of descriptive language.

The study found that opinions in the media "were tilted against the church's teaching on issues involving sexual morality and authority relations within the church and its involvement in secular politics (aside from support for church statements opposing war). Only on the relatively noncontroversial issue of ecumenical outreach did the church receive support from a majority of sources."

The Catholic Church is sensitive to the influence of mass media in society—as information shared, as storytelling, and as news source. The continuing challenge is to utilize media creatively and honestly to build a faith community and to advance its mission in the world. See also Catholicism and culture; Catholicism and journalism.

Bibliography

Coleman, John, and Miklos Tomka, eds. "Mass Media." Concilium: International Review of Theology, Winter 1993.

Communication Research Trends, A Quarterly Information Service from the Centre for the Study of Communication and Culture, St. Louis.

Soukup, Paul A. Communication and Theology: Introduction and Review of the Literature. London: World Association for Christian Communication, 1983.

FRANCES F. PLUDE

Catholicism and music. This entry examines the Roman Catholic tradition of liturgical music specifically, but also refers to music of the Byzantine church and Reformed churches.

The history of church music is a chronology of musical developments, but it also includes liturgical dimensions, such as the shape of worship and the interplay of rite and music. Music ministries shed light on specific musical developments.

Jewish Worship: Ancient Near Eastern language usage employed the same verb for speaking and singing, indicating "to execute vocally." Because no clear distinction between speech and song existed, it is difficult to speak of "music" as a separate category. The heightened speech of proclamation of the Scriptures and prayers in Jewish worship bore the stamp of rhythm and incipient melody.

The Jerusalem Temple, local synagogues, and homes of believers were the loci of Jewish worship in Jesus' time. Temple singers and musicians, a large professional staff, rendered psalms and other poetic texts musically, the congregation responding with refrains.

Synagogue worship, centered on scriptural study and proclamation and the offering of prayers, had two focal worship elements: the proclamation of the Shema (Heb., "hear") and the chanting of the Amidah (Heb., "standing"; Eighteen Benedictions) with responses from the congregation. These texts, like readings from the Law and Prophets, were cantillated. After the Temple was destroyed in A.D. 70, professionals took a larger role in the synagogue, where the cantor's art music developed. Synagogal musical elements, like domestic ritual song, initially were of a folk style.

Early Christianity: Early Christians continued Temple worship (Acts 3:1) and synagogue prayer (Acts 13:14), but gradually developed a distinctive Christian domestically centered cult. Obviously familiar with Jewish lyrical expression, they could have continued similar "musical" expression. The NT itself gives an indication of Christian worship's lyrical quality by reference to hymn fragments (1 Pet 1:3–5; Phil 2:6–11), acclamations ("Hosanna," "Marana tha") and song (Rev. 4). Early Christian vocal "music," clearly nonprofessional, supported and elaborated the word proclaimed in a flexible service.

From the second to the third centuries vocal lyricism characterized the proclamation of readings, improvisation of prayers and communal responses in the domestic churches. Vocal music predominated; the use of instruments in pagan cults and the association of instruments with immorality led to their gradual banning in Christian worship.

During this period Christians began to develop distinctive musical texts and forms. Despite Pauline references to psalms (Col 3:16; Eph 5:19), the first irrefutable evidence we have showing psalm usage in worship, perhaps to counteract heterodox hymns, is from the late second and third centuries. Original compositions, nonbiblical psalms called psalmi idiotici (Lat., "idiotic psalms"), also emerge, as well as the hymn form.

Fourth to Seventh Centuries: The legalization and imperialization of Christianity, after Constantine's victory, dramatically transformed worship. The locus of Christian worship shifted from home to basilica, a public gathering space. Professional clerics emerged as leaders of the now public prayer of Roman society. Music, too, underwent considerable changes.

Specially designated cantors appeared, first mentioned in Canon 15 of the Canons of Laodicea (343–381), an early collection of ecclesiastical law. A forerunner of a schola cantorum (Lat.), a school for liturgical singers, developed in Rome. The Pilgrimage of Egeria (end of fourth century) attests to choirs of boys in Jerusalem, and Ephraem the Syrian (d. 373) notes the worship role of choirs of women.

From the beginning, music specialists engaged the assembly in sung prayer and added artistic embellishment. With the gradual distancing of formal worship from the people, spatially and linguistically, music personnel became performers rather than leaders of song. In the West, monasteries cultivated boy choirs, professionally trained, which later took over the assembly's song. In some localities and for various reasons—nighttime dangers and association with pagan cults are two—women choirs were forbidden and disappeared altogether when communal singing ceased in the early Middle Ages.

Christian hymnody as a specific musical genre received impetus from Hilary of Poitiers (d. 367), Ambrose (d. 397), and Prudentius (d. ca. 410) in the West and Ephraem in the East. Despite some prohibitions against using nonbiblical texts, hymnody became an important element in worship, especially in the Divine Office. Ambrose, the "Hammer of the Arians," used hymnody to combat heretical catechetical hymns.

In the Byzantine church, a rigid structure determined its musical shape. The Apostolic Constitutions (380) witnesses to psalmic congregational refrains and a sung Kyrie eleison (Gk., "Lord, have mercy") response to prayers. As the liturgy developed, sung formulas increased and were frequently repeated during the service, creating a dialogue among celebrant, clergy, and congregation.

Early on, the Byzantine Mass admitted a certain number of hymns, such as the Trisagion (a refrain, "Holy God, holy and mighty, holy and immortal, have mercy on us") and the Cherubic hymn. Byzantine hymnography flourished from the fifth to eleventh centuries, when ecclesiastical authority forbade including new compositions in worship. The mid-fifth century saw a new poetic form develop, the Kontakion, a hymn that resembled a poetic sermon, setting forth the narrative of the feast with rhetorical flourish. In the seventh century, the Kanon (a series of nine odes or canticles) all but replaced the Kontakion. This new poetic hymn form was structurally more diverse and often linked verbally to liturgical texts.

From ecclesiastical centers in Constantinople, Toledo, Milan, Metz, and Rome styles of plainsong emerged: Greco-Byzantine, Mozarabic, Ambrosian, Gallican, and Old Roman. An expanding body of specific Christian music developed, complex in nature, requiring special training for its execution.

The emergent distinction between word and music, previously unknown, allowed for music-less worship; prayer and song texts could be recited silently by the prayer leader. Music became a separable element of the rite.

Eighth to Eleventh Centuries: Pepin III (d. 768) and Charlemagne (d. 814) orchestrated the importation of Roman chants and liturgy in Frankish lands. The mandated Roman liturgy did not displace Gallican music and texts; rather Roman and Gallican music and texts fused together, resulting in so-called Gregorian chant. Musical elaborations of the chant, the sequence and the trope, can be credited to ninth and tenth-century professionals. These Latin hymnic chants never achieved the prominence of Byzantine hymnography.

Though early "popular" musical styles were easily admitted into a fluid liturgy, standardization of music, in a language generally unavailable to the people, created the need for music for the people. The new nonliturgical vernacular song appeared as an occasional addition to the liturgical rite, but more often in popular devotions. What Bede (d.

735) called "devotional and religious songs" developed and flourished.

Polyphony was born during this era, originating as organum (Lat., "ornamentation"), a second musical line matched note for note with the chant, usually a musical fourth or fifth higher. Creative musicians developed more complex polyphonic forms, obscuring the liturgical texts themselves. Music was triumphing over the liturgy.

An opposite movement paralleled musical elaboration—the total disappearance of song in worship. Published books included chants in appendices and the thirteenth-century full missal presumed the possibility of the presiding minister's taking all liturgical roles, reducing sung texts to silent recitation.

Twelfth to Fifteenth Centuries: Once the possibility of simultaneously singing two musical (though parallel) lines was realized, it was a short step to two-, three- and four-part singing, involving different melodies. Simple ornamentation (organum) led to florid elaboration, and rhythmic advances supplanted plainsong's nonmetered rhythm. This musical verticality and rhythm found an ally in the Gothic architecture of the period. Concomitantly, musical leadership shifted from monasteries to urban cathedrals. For example, the Notre Dame School in Paris developed a novel style of organum in which the tenor part in shorter, metered notes moved in contrary motion to the parallel parts. Again, the motet, a thirteenth-century development, consisted of a rhythmically-modified plainsong in the lowest part, to which were added two higher original melodies in faster moving rhythm. Gradually, vernacular texts were added in the upper voices, making textual comprehension impossible. Motets sometimes replaced the chant gradual (the psalm sung after the Lesson, or Pauline Letter) and alleluia, but became more popular in Office responsories.

In the fourteenth-century Byzantine church, whose chant is more formulaic than Western plainsong, a new florid style also developed. Called "kalophonic," the style affected all chant genres. Although the codified Byzantine liturgy remained almost unchanged from the eleventh century to the present day, musical ornamentation continued. Often ornamented style led to the shortening of texts, and the unchecked embellishment eliminated textual intelligibility.

Though professionals shaped the choral tradition of the cathedrals, ordinary people continued a flourishing vernacular devotional hymn and song tradition. Popular music was confined to nonliturgical settings; the official chant, Latin language, and professionalism of ministries moved the assembly to become spectators at worship.

Sixteenth to Nineteenth Centuries: Though the Protestant reforms of the sixteenth century were theologically rooted, they created musical transformations. Martin Luther's (d. 1546) strong belief in the universal priesthood shifted musical ministry especially to the congregation by introducing vernacular hymns and chants. Popularly styled religious hymns, often textually nonliturgical, found a significant place in worship. Luther himself was responsible for many metered psalm translations. In contrast, Ulrich Zwingli (d. 1531), a trained musician, eliminated music from the Zurich churches, considering it a secular invasion. John Calvin (d. 1564) banned textually unintelligible polyphony and distracting instruments, but, like Luther, encouraged monophonic singing, especially of the psalms, which led to prayer and served God's word.

The Council of Trent (1545–63), seeking to correct musical abuses, emphasized the need for intelligibility (apparently on the part of the clergy who could understand Latin) and musical restraint. It banned nonchurchly vernacular songs and worldly and lengthy organ compositions. Trent implicitly affirmed a style of composition wherein music serves the text.

Spurred by the Reformers' example, vernacular hymnals began to appear. The mainly devotional and catechetical hymns of German diocesan hymnals were used at Mass (e.g., a postsermon hymn). The 1605 Mainz Cantual permitted substituting hymns for the proper texts of the liturgy. Within two centuries, hymns replaced the ordinary chants, giving rise to what is called the Singmesse (Ger., "sung Mass"). Though this development restored congregational sung participation, it was not an integration of music and rite; it signaled singing at Mass, rather than a sung liturgy.

Baroque styles influenced the Latin compositions that found a place in some of the reform movements. English polyphonic settings of Morning and Evening Prayer and Holy Communion were composed. Lutheran chorale motets appeared, and chorale cantatas reached a zenith with the works of J.S. Bach (d. 1750). Despite Tridentine decrees, restraint was abandoned, as evidenced by operatic vocal works and massive compositions that overshadowed the liturgy itself.

Churches had lost preeminence in musical leadership by the mid-eighteenth century. Art-music, e.g., Mass settings composed for the concert hall, held its ground as a new Catholic reform emerged, urging the return to Gregorian chant and Palestrina-styled polyphony. The Society of St. Caecilia was a chief proponent of this restoration.

In the United States, while New England pilgrims relied initially on English hymnals, the Bay Psalm Book gained ascendency in the late seventeenth century and retained primacy. Camp meetings were another center of musical activity, where secular folk tunes joined with religious texts and replaced the staid Puritan psalter with heartier group song. This style had a gradual influence on some Protestant worship. Catholic immigrants brought their own hymnals, stamped with European influence of the post-Baroque concerto style and Viennese classical form.

The Caecilian movement, seeking objectivity of expression, challenged lush romantic composition. It found strong support in midwest German communities, where it fostered revival of older German hymns, though they were still relegated to devotional services.

The Twentieth Century: Pope Pius X issued various instructions that, in principle, held to music as an integral part of worship and urged the participation of the people in the liturgy. At the same time he reiterated the ban against the use of the vernacular song.

The Vatican II Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy restated the position of Pius X that congregational participation is desirable and that music, integral to worship, should serve the text, but it also underscored the connection between rite and music.

The 1972 publication "Music in Catholic Worship" by the U.S. Catholic Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy was a watershed document that gave impetus to restoring the tradition of musical participation of the assembly, especially through singing liturgical texts. Universa Laus, an international group researching liturgical music and singing, published guidelines in 1980 under the title "The Music of Christian Ritual." The document strongly supported the subordination of music not just to liturgical text, but to ritual action. Ritual music embraces distinct categories: music alone, music wedded to text, music joined with ritual action, music wedded to a text accompanying a rite. This ritual approach, currently under much discussion, requires an understanding of both the macro- and micro-structures of worship to determine which music can be genuinely integral to, and servant of, worship. See also chant, Byzantine; chant, Gregorian; liturgical music.

Bibliography

Foley, Edward. "Liturgical Music." In The New Dictionary of Sacramental Worship. Ed. Peter E. Fink. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1990. Pp. 854–70.

Gelineau, Joseph. Voices and Instruments in Christian Worship: Principles, Laws, Applications. Trans. Clifford Howell. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1964.

Quasten, Johannes. Music and Worship in Pagan and Christian Antiquity. Trans. Boniface Ramsey. Washington, DC: National Association of Pastoral Musicians, 1983.

Routley, Erik. The Music of Christian Hymns. Chicago: GIA Publications, 1981.

Wellesz, Egon. A History of Byzantine Music and Hymnography, 2d ed. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1961.

Werner, Eric. The Sacred Bridge II: The Interdependence of Liturgy and Music in Synagogue and Church During the First Millennium. New York: Ktav Publishing, 1984.

JOHN A. MELLOH

Catholicism and politics. See Church and state.

Catholicism and psychology/psychiatry. The history of the relationship between Catholicism and the scientific disciplines of psychiatry and psychology parallels and reflects that of these clinical disciplines themselves. The latter, insofar as they have generated research-based theories and humane therapies for mental illness, are an outgrowth of the efforts of pioneers such as Phillipe Pinel (1745–1826) in France and William Tuke (1732–1822) in England, to "loosen the chains," that is, to remove the restraints from institutionalized patients and to pioneer "moral" treatment modes.

History of Psychiatry and Psychology: The early history of American psychiatry, begun through its acknowledged founder, Benjamin Rush (1745–90), a signer of the Declaration of Independence, and later spurred by the efforts of such figures as Dorothea Dix (1802–87), was, like the country itself, largely a Protestant enterprise. It emphasized the construction of small, private "asylums," such as the Friends Hospital in Philadelphia (1817) and Connecticut's Hartford Retreat (1822).

Later in the century, larger public institutions were erected to meet the demands of the increasing numbers of mentally ill. These included many immigrants beset with the stress of adapting themselves to a new and at times difficult, if not hostile, social environment, especially for Catholics. "Moral" treatment, with its gentle attention to the care and rehabilitation of the individual, deteriorated and a more impersonal style of "custodial" care became the norm.

In tandem with this, a better understanding of mental functioning and mental illness began to develop, especially in Germany, in which experimental psychology began to separate itself from philosophical psychology under such figures as Wilhelm Wundt (1832–1920), and the systematic classification of the manifestations of mental illness was begun by Emil Kraepelin (1856–1926). The latter work enabled the identification of basic symptoms, modes of onset, and the course of mental illness.

At the same time, Sigmund Freud (1856–1939) began to publish his seminal works on the unconscious and its relationship to the conscious manifestations of mental illness. In the United States, Swiss psychiatrist Adolph Meyer (1866–1950) initiated his work at Johns Hopkins Hospital in Baltimore, Maryland. The latter focused on the patient's life history and the origin of mental illness as a function of the individual's interaction with specific life stressors. Drawing on Freud's insights, Meyer and other psychiatrists and psychologists oversaw a convergence of both disciplines on a more dynamic understanding of the meaning and treatment of mental illness.

Catholic Attitudes Toward Psychiatry and Psychology: Psychiatry emerged as a new speciality in medicine just as psychology embraced the experimental method of physics. The former, strongly influenced by the work of Freud, seemed a threat to the Catholic views of the human person, the nature of sin, moral responsibility, and sexual morality. The latter, attempting to quantify and measure behavior as hard science did other phenomena, was thought to have by-passed traditional Catholic views on the soul. It is not surprising that the Church, still reeling from the challenges of the Enlightenment a century earlier, viewed both of these movements as further evidences of a "modern" world that had lost its vision and faith.

Nonetheless, as Catholics settled into American society, they began to produce a new generation, some of whose members, although few in numbers, would make their way into these growing professions. For example, Father Edward Pace studied under Wundt and established an experimentally oriented psychology department at the American bishops' fledgling Catholic University of America in 1892. Two years later, in an example of an altogether too typical reaction, a priest-philosopher wrote that anybody who wished to have anything to do with this new psychology "must commit a formal dogmatic error in his Christian faith."

Psychiatry, and especially psychoanalysis, were similarly condemned by Church leaders, largely on the basis of misunderstanding Freudian therapy as sprung from a corrupt, pansexual interpretation of personality that obliterated sin. As late as 1953, Monsignor, later Cardinal, Pericle Felici, a highly placed curial official, wrote a widely disseminated article suggesting that any Catholic who voluntarily undertook psychoanalytic treatment committed a mortal sin. Popular pamphlets heaped scorn on psychiatry as if it were the enemy of Catholic life and practice.

Catholic laypersons, including Leo Bartemeier, M.D. (1895–1982), Francis Braceland, M.D. (1900–85), and John Cavanagh, M.D. (1904–82) were among those who entered and became leaders in psychiatry and proved instrumental in helping the Church to revisit and to revise its harsh a priori rejection of the field. Bartemeier, for example, already president of the International Psychoanalytic Association, became at mid-century president of the American Psychiatric Association, as did Braceland a few years later.

Their example and success, along with the emergence of a new literature written by Catholic professionals for a better educated generation of American Catholics, contributed to the Church's new respect for, and acceptance of, psychiatry. In 1953, Pope Pius XII authored an address for the Fifth International Congress on Psychotherapy and Clinical Psychology in which, with certain cautions about the reality of sin, he gave what amounted to his blessing to the once roundly condemned dynamic psychotherapies.

It was several years, however, before the American Catholic Psychological Association, established largely through the influence of Father William C. Bier, as a parallel professional companion organization to the American Psychological Association, transformed itself into an ecumenical Psychologists Interested in Religious Issues (1936) and later under that title, into Division 36 of the national association.

In similar fashion, the Guild of Catholic Psychiatrists (1950) had been founded to allow a forum for Catholics to explore and discuss issues relating to psychiatry and religion. These structures were at first embattled against ecclesiastical skepticism and disapproval. As Catholics matured in American culture, as Church attitudes, accelerated by the work of Vatican Council II (1962–65), were transformed, and as professional psychiatry and psychology became more receptive and responsive to religion as a significant factor in human life, the role of these separate organizations has diminished significantly.

As the last decade of the twentieth century began, Catholics were extensively involved in the professions of psychology and psychiatry. The Church itself, aided by such pioneering developments as the summer institutes on psychiatry and religion begun in 1953 at St. John's University in Collegeville, Minnesota, and the burgeoning interest by the clergy in counseling, had dropped most of its straw-man criticism, and it accepted and widely employed the professions' techniques of assessment and treatment in its own internal life as well as its pastoral work. See also Jung, Carl Gustav; psychology and spirituality.

Bibliography

Myers, D. C., and M. A. Jeeves. Psychology Through the Eyes of Faith. Washington, DC: Christian College Coalition, 1987.

Wulff, D. M. Psychology of Religion: Classic and Contemporary Views. New York: Wiley, 1991.

EUGENE C. KENNEDY AND SARA C. CHARLES

Catholicism and the social sciences. Until the second half of the twentieth century, Catholic authorities tended to regard the social sciences with mixed emotions. Respect for the obvious utility of social analysis in performing the mundane tasks of a worldwide organization was combined with suspicion that such learning relied heavily on non-Christian conceptions of human nature and experience. Some imagined that the social sciences could prove useful in arriving at the technical knowledge necessary to implement the social doctrine of the Church. The more discernible feeling, however, was one of trepidation. Religious belief presumably would erode when confronted by models for science that confined inquiry to empirical observation of the material world.

Distinctively Catholic Approaches: More optimistic Catholics saw potential gains in the social sciences, even if the precise contributions varied by discipline. The Catholic study of politics, for example, would shun treatment of issues like state power and elite domination. In their places, Catholic theorists were charged with examining how governments could be shaped to promote the common good while cultivating in individual citizens a habit of virtue. A Catholic economics, for its part, would abandon familiar expectations of market competition and class conflict. Instead, Catholic students of the economy in the first half of the twentieth century were to follow the lessons of the social encyclicals, Rerum Novarum (1891) and Quadragesimo Anno (1931). Catholic societies could then plan how workers, managers, and owners together might cooperate in the interests of greater human welfare. Yet, practical value notwithstanding, these ideals largely muted the scientific element of each discipline and in the end subordinated its results to the official teachings of the Church.

A Sociography of Religious Practice: In Western Europe, and particularly in France and Belgium, harnessing social science to the temporal work of the Catholic Church took a somewhat different turn. Eventually the steady labors of scholars like Gabriel Le Bras (1891–1970) and Fernand Boulard (1898–1977) produced a unique style of research, one that came to be known as sociologie religieuse (Fr., "religious sociology"). More the practice of geography than of sociology, research in the mode of sociologie religieuse was typified by the meticulous tabulation of statistics on ecclesiastical activities such as baptisms and church marriages across decades and sometimes centuries. When painstakingly mapped over parishes, localities, and departments, the figures revealed a historical portrait of whole regions moving through a process of religious declension that was dubbed "dechristianization."

Minutely detailed and relentlessly descriptive, the findings of these European researchers ordinarily were not arranged into a general theory of cultural change. Rather, sociologie religieuse was social investigation with a pastoral mission. An American Jesuit, Joseph H. Fichter (1908–94), beginning in the 1950s extended and improved this style of research through his comprehensive studies of parish life. As moderate as Fichter's publications appear four decades later, in their day they were controversial enough to provoke at least one bishop to request suppression of his writings.

Attitudes of the Church Toward Sociology: The official Church long approached sociology with special skepticism. The bulk of the Church's concerns apparently were associated with objections to the "positive philosophy" of Auguste Comte (1798–1857), the French theorist who gave the discipline its name. Comte, a true disciplinary imperialist, had predicted that his fledgling study of society would one day stand at the head of the sciences. By synthesizing human knowledge, sociology would force religion from its privileged social position. Moreover, the practitioners of this new and final science, according to Comte, would come to occupy the status of priests in a renewed secular rite. All things considered, there was a lot in the excesses of Comte's theory to make the traditionally faithful nervous.

So one finds in a textbook recommended to undergraduate students in Catholic colleges during the 1930s (Paul J. Glenn, Sociology: A Class Manual in the Philosophy of Human Society [St. Louis: B. Herder, 1935]), a condemnation of the legacy of Comte and Herbert Spencer (1820–1903) as "an evil thing," for it "rules out God, makes humanity divine, and establishes the 'service of humanity' (humanitarianism) as the only religion" (p. 6; emphasis in the original). Modern sociology "is wrong," the author insists, "is evil, is an affront to the mind and a damage to the soul . . ." (p. 8).

In the period before the Second World War, while Catholic scholars were reacting to the antireligious allergens in sociology's intellectual heritage, the discipline's own establishment veered in a militantly secular direction, endorsing the conviction that a commitment to science precluded belief in the supernatural. This trend left it to priests like Paul Hanly Furfey (1896–1992) of The Catholic University of America and Raymond W. Murray (1893–1973) of the University of Notre Dame to champion a "sacred sociology." Friction between the religious and secular camps peaked with the 1938 founding of an autonomous American Catholic Sociological Society (ACSS).

Within twenty years, the increasingly rapid assimilation of Catholics into the American mainstream eased tensions, while a softening of positivism among American social scientists undermined the felt need to continue with an identifiably Catholic sociology and its attendant parallel structures. Indeed, the ACSS survives today as the Association for the Sociology of Religion, an ecumenical affiliation devoted to the social scientific study of religion.

The distance separating Catholicism and the social sciences has certainly diminished with time. The United States Catholic Conference today maintains its own research office, and a number of the larger dioceses in the United States now assign permanent staffs of social scientists to "pastoral research and planning." Nevertheless, most large-scale social research on the Catholic Church and its members around the world is conducted by researchers based in academic settings, without the sponsorship of the national hierarchy. Despite important efforts by the priest-sociologist Andrew M. Greeley (b. 1928), it is still not common for the Catholic Church expressly to commission professional survey research through universities or academic research centers. See also Catholic social teachings.

Bibliography

Fichter, Joseph H. One-Man Research: Reminiscences of a Catholic Sociologist. New York: Wiley, 1973.

Greeley, Andrew M. The Catholic Myth: The Behavior and Beliefs of American Catholics. New York: Scribner, 1990.

Salvaterra, David L. American Catholicism and the Intellectual Life: 1880–1950. New York: Garland, 1988.

KEVIN J. CHRISTIANO

Catholicism and the visual arts. Catholicism's impact on the visual arts pervades the Christian tradition from the late second and early third centuries to modern times. Its range embraces everything from grassroots populism to imperial patronage to high points of episcopal and papal court patronage during the Renaissance and Baroque periods.

Contrary perhaps to modern presumptions, early Christian imagery did not illustrate Scripture. Using a visual shorthand, simple austere catacomb images such as Moses striking the rock, Noah and the ark, or the three youths in the fiery furnace served to remind viewers of God's fidelity to God's people. Christological images of Christ as the Good Shepherd or the miracles (in which Christ is often not represented) recalled Christ's saving power rather than illustrated his life. There are no catacomb images of the Passion or Crucifixion.

A shift in perception from pastoral representations of Christ as the Good Shepherd to Christ as an imperial king occurs beginning with the reign of Constantine in the fourth century. Imperial patronage produced monumental churches with apse paintings and mosaics of Christ enthroned in Rome, Jerusalem, Constantinople, Milan, and by the sixth century, in Ravenna. This was conceptual art that pointed toward theological dogma and affirmed conciliar pronouncements. Roman examples include the fifth-century mosaic of Christ enthroned and flanked by the apostles in Santa Pudenziana and the fifth-century Marian mosaic program at St. Mary Major following the Council of Ephesus of 431 that affirmed Mary as Theotokos, Mother of God.

Twentieth-century depiction of the crucifixion by the English painter Graham Sutherland (d. 1980); part of the Vatican collection of modern religious art.

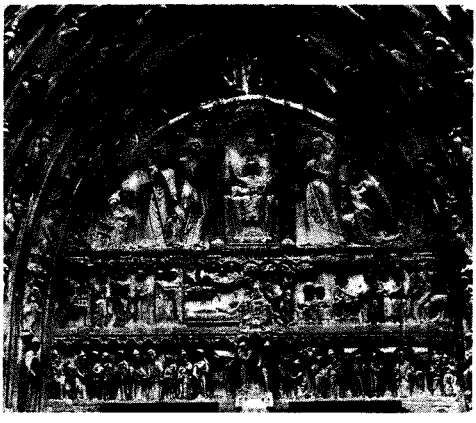
A need for liturgical books by Irish missionaries of the seventh and eighth centuries led to the establishment of monastic artistic centers in Ireland and England for book production. The Lindisfarne Gospels and the Book of Kells with their pages alive with the writhing dragons and complex interlace patterns of the Hiberno-Saxon style, attest to the sophistication of these scriptoria.

Lavishly illustrated Bibles appeared in the ninth century. The Alcuin Bible, the Moutier-Grandval Bible, and the San Callisto Bible, produced for the Carolingian court, continued the early Christian practice of selecting themes that allude to theological truths rather than illustration. OT scenes prefigure NT events. Apocalyptic images of Christ as the Lamb emphasize the redemptive act of Christ's Passion, death and Resurrection, Christ's final triumph.

Religious imagery appealing directly to the laity emerged in the eleventh century in the sculptural decoration of churches along the French pilgrimage routes to Santiago de Compostela in northwest Spain. Here popular religiosity, steeped in miracle and marvel, found expression in the great portal programs that are theophanies of salvation, exemplified by the Last Judgment at Autun (1130–35) or the Mission of the Apostles at Vezelay (1120–32).

Throughout the twelfth and thirteenth centuries popular piety focused on the Virgin, to whom all Gothic cathedrals were dedicated and about whom countless sculptures, stained glass windows, manuscript illuminations, tapestries, and goldsmith work were produced. Mary became the vehicle of access to the Lord whose divinity rendered Christ remote, both theologically and literally. A pervasive sense of unworthiness and penitential discipline excluded the laity from Communion, except on rare occasions. Popular meditations on the Passion of Christ emphasizing his suffering humanity, attributed to the Rhineland Dominican mystic Henry Suso (1295–1366), underlie the emergence of a new Marian iconographic theme, the Pietà (It., "pity"), Mary seated with the dead Christ in her lap.

Tympanum depicting the enthronement of the Blessed Virgin; west facade, south entrance (St. Anne Gate), Notre Dame Cathedral, Paris.



Michelangelo to the Present: The majestic pontificate of Julius II (1503–13) swept up in its militant reform juggernaut artists and architects who, with Julius, defined the High Renaissance and whose works undergirded his imperial ambitions and spiritual fervor. Julius's vision of a magnificent new St. Peter's began with the demolition of the early Christian basilica and new plans by the architect Bramante for a project that would extend through twelve architects, including Michelangelo, and twenty-two popes. The first major monument for the new church was to be Julius's own tomb designed by Michelangelo. Of this grandiose project, occupying forty years of Michelangelo's career, only the sculptures of two slaves and Moses were completed.

Michelangelo's Sistine Chapel ceiling (1508–12), commissioned by Pope Julius, exuberantly celebrates the creation, fall of humanity, and redemption, including the renowned Creation of Adam scene. As Michelangelo worked in the Sistine Chapel, Raphael (1483–1520) began a series of frescoes in the Vatican Palace, the most famous of which is the School of Athens. Michelangelo completed the chapel decoration twenty years later with his brooding Last Judgment (1534–41) painted in the midst of the Reformation crisis.

The Catholic Counter-Reformation swiftly appropriated a visual language of both architectural grandiosity and spiritual intensity. Gian Lorenzo Bernini's (1598–1680) projects at St. Peter's Basilica, the canopy over the tomb of St. Peter (1624–33), the piazza and colonnade (1657) whose arms, Bernini said, reach out like Mother Church, and the immense sculpture of the Chair of St. Peter (1657–52) all proclaim the primacy of Peter, celebrating the supremacy of the Bishop of Rome and the Roman Catholic Church. Painter Domenikos Theotocopoulos (1541–1614), called El Greco, captured the spiritual ecstacy of the Catholic Reformation in a flame-like agitated style, plumbing the depths of the soul's search for union with God. El Greco introduced new themes of the Tears of St. Peter and the Repentant Magdalen, reflecting Catholic insistence on the grace of repentance in the face of sin, a theological polemic of the time.

The Counter-Reformation marks the last great burst of artistic energy and vibrancy by Catholicism. Within the Catholic milieu, a hiatus of some three hundred fifty years settles in until post-World War II, when several remarkable church commissions occurred in France. These included the church at Assy, which commissioned works by Roualt, Lipchitz, Lurçat, and Richier; the Dominican chapel at Vence designed by Matisse; and the church of Notre Dame du Haut at Ronchamp by Le Corbusier.

The renewed but still tentative dialogue between the Church and artists, begun in the 1940s, continues at a cautious pace as new churches are built and older ones renovated in response to new guidelines from liturgical deliberations at the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) and subsequent revisions of the rites calling for ritual spaces and art that engage the assembly in active participation. See also Bible and art; Counter-Reformation/Catholic Reformation; liturgical art. MARCHITA B. MAUCK catholicity, the Church's attribute of being universal, destined for all of humanity, and endowed with the fullness of the means of grace. The word "catholic" is derived from the Greek term meaning "according to the whole." Catholicity refers both to the inner completeness of the Church, and thus to the rich variety of its components, and also to its openness to all of humanity and its extension throughout the world as one Church consisting of many particular churches in communion with one another.

Vatican II describes catholicity as the gift of universality by virtue of which the Church strives energetically and constantly to bring all of humanity with all its riches back to Christ its head in the unity of his Spirit (cf. Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 13). As other aspects of catholicity it mentions the variety of gifts with which the Spirit endows members of the Church, as well as the distinctive traditions that characterize the particular churches. The council insists that such legitimate differences are to be protected by the central authority, which promotes the communion by which these different traditions enrich the catholicity of the Church without diminishing its unity. A further claim to universality is made when the council declares that every human person either belongs to the Church or is related to it (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 13). This relatedness is based on the universal offer of grace by which all are called to salvation. This call involves an objective orientation toward the Church, of which the person may not be aware. See also Catholic; Catholicism; marks of the Church. FRANCIS A. SULLIVAN

Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights, Catholic civil rights organization founded by the Jesuit Virgil Blum of Marquette University in 1973. Convinced that adverse Supreme Court rulings on education issues were the result of anti-Catholicism, Blum formed the organization as the first independent civil rights organization in American history intended specifically to defend the religious freedom and rights of Catholics. Headquartered in Milwaukee, the league exposed and re-butted Catholic defamation in print or in the electronic media, vigorously promoted pro-life activities, and pressed for freedom of choice in education. One commentator referred to the league as a "Catholic B'nai B'rith." See also anti-Catholicism.

catholic Letters, a term used to refer to seven NT Letters: James, 1–2 Peter, 1–3 John, and Jude. They are called "catholic" (Gk., katholikos, "universal," "general") because they were addressed to a general audience or to an otherwise unidentifiable community (2 John) or individual (3 John). 1–3 John reflect the disputes dividing the Johannine tradition at the end of the first century A.D. about the humanity of Jesus and the obligations of love. The Letter of James, purportedly written by James, "the Lord's brother" (Gal 1:19), is a series of moral exhortations steeped in Jewish wisdom traditions and probably written in the last quarter of the first century A.D. 1 Peter, while claiming to have been written by the Apostle Peter, dates more likely from the late first century A.D. and is a general exhortation to newly baptized Christians about how they should lead their new lives. 2 Peter and Jude have so much in common that there must be a literary relationship between them. Most think that 2 Peter depends on Jude. Although the author describes himself as "Jude, . . . brother of James" (Jude 1:1), the Letter probably comes from the end of the first century A.D. and is a general exhortation meant to serve as a warning against ungodly Christians. 2 Peter is primarily concerned with the question of theodicy and defends God's providence and the certainty of God's final judgment. Because it depends on Jude, it probably comes from the early second century A.D. See also pastoral Letters. THOMAS H. TOBIN catholicos, originally the chief bishop of a local church, subordinate to and dependent on a patriarch. The title is now practically interchangeable with patriarch. Among Catholic patriarchs the title "catholicos" is held by the Chaldean and Armenian patriarchs. The Armenian Orthodox Church has two catholicosates (Etchmiadzin, Cilicia) and two patriarchates (Jerusalem, Constantinople), both dependent on the catholicos of Etchmiadzin. See also patriarch [ecclesiastical].

Catholic press. See Catholicism and journalism.

Catholic Press Association, the association of Catholic newspapers, magazines, and general publishers and their staff members in the United States and Canada. Founded in Columbus, Ohio, in 1911, the Catholic Press Association seeks to assist its members in publishing works of high quality. With over three hundred members, it holds an annual convention and several annual regional conferences, and sponsors special awards programs. The Catholic Press Directory, its annual publication, provides a complete listing of Catholic newspapers, magazines, and newsletters in the United States and Canada. See also Catholicism and journalism.

Catholic social teachings, papal, conciliar, and synodal teachings on the political, social, economic, and international order. To analyze Catholic social teachings it is first necessary to distinguish them from the Catholic social tradition. The distinction is necessary for two reasons. First, the social teachings are a relatively late development in Catholic theology, dating from the nineteenth century. Second, the social teachings themselves do not include major figures in the Catholic tradition, some of whom are responsible for the basic ideas developed in the social teachings.

The Catholic social tradition is rooted in the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures as well as in the patristic writings, notably those of Augustine (d. 430). The tradition finds unique expression in the Middle Ages, particularly in the work of Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274). The Spanish Scholastics Francisco de Vitoria (d. 1546) and Francisco Suarez (d. 1617) adapted it to the rise of the nation-state and the collapse of the medieval Christian commonwealth. In the nineteenth century Luigi Taparelli d'Azeglio (d. 1862) prepared the way for the papal teachings that are today recognized as Catholic social teachings.

The social tradition, therefore, is broader and older than the social teachings. It provides a framework and an intellectual legacy from which the more recent social teachings draw. The tradition is a point of reference against which the social teachings are tested, even as the latter develop beyond the tradition by applying it to new issues and questions.

Catholic social teachings are composed of papal statements and conciliar or synodal documents. The social teachings originated with Pope Leo XIII (d. 1903) and continue through the teaching of John Paul II (elected 1978). While there may be some dispute about exactly which documents constitute the social teachings, an overwhelming consensus would support the following order: Leo XIII's Rerum Novarum (1891), Pius XI's Quadragesimo Anno (1931), Pius XII's Pentecost Address (1941) and Christmas Messages (1939–57), John XXIII's Mater et Magistra (1961), and Pacem in Terris (1963), Vatican II's Dignitatis Humanae (Declaration on Religious Freedom, 1965) and Gaudium et Spes (Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, 1965), Paul VI's Populorum Progressio (1967) and Octogesima Adveniens (1971), the World Synod of Bishops' Justitia in Mundo (1971), Paul VI's Evangelii Nuntiandi (1975) and John Paul II's Laborem Exercens (1981), Sollicitudo Rei Socialis (1987), and Centesimus Annus (1991). Particularly in the teaching of John Paul II there are documents that have distinctive social themes but that are not usually classified under the social teachings.

While the social tradition has an extensive biblical foundation, the social teachings from 1891 through 1963 were principally structured in philosophical terms, drawing heavily upon a natural law philosophy of the person and society. Beginning with the documents of Vatican II and continuing in the social teachings of John Paul II, there is a greater reliance upon biblical categories joined with social philosophy. The strong philosophical tenor of the social teachings had a dual purpose: first, philosophical categories were used as mediating language, designed to explicate the broadly defined social vision of the Scriptures and relate them to the complexity of contemporary social issues; second, the philosophical language provided a method of addressing the wider civil society in categories that do not presuppose the perspective of Catholic faith.

Both the principal analytical categories of the social teachings and their historical development can be sketched as a means of understanding the content of the teachings and their role in the life of the Church and society. Nine basic ideas provide an insight into the structure of the social teachings.

Concepts and Principles: First, the foundational concept of the social teachings is the sacredness or dignity of the human person. The social ministry of the Church exists to protect and promote human dignity. The dignity of the person can be expressed in philosophical terms based on the spiritual nature of the person, rooted in the capacity for knowledge and love; it can also be expressed in theological terms: the person as the image of God. The dignity of persons sets them apart from the rest of the created order. Creation exists to be of service to the person—to every person, because all share the same intrinsic dignity. This strong emphasis on the uniqueness of the person has come under some criticism recently, because its anthropocentric focus seems to some to omit sufficient regard for the cosmos, particularly the care of the environment. Environmental issues are now reflected in Catholic social thought, but they do not displace the singular status given to the human person.

Second, the social teachings draw a direct line from human dignity to human rights and duties. Human rights are moral claims to goods of the spiritual and material order that are necessary to protect and promote human dignity. Duties are responsibilities that flow from the person's status as a creature (duties toward God) and from the social bonds one has in the human community (duties toward others). The use of human rights language in Catholic social teachings has grown steadily from the time of Pius XII through that of John Paul II. A complex history lies behind the Church's relationship to human rights categories. The natural law tradition has a strong conception of the social nature of the person and a primary emphasis on the duties each person must fulfill to God and others. The natural rights tradition, rooted in the major social philosophers of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, has at its foundation an individualistic conception of the person and a view of rights as the means of protecting individual freedom and autonomy. The encyclical Pacem in Terris of Pope John XXIII provided an expansive view of human rights that did not resolve the philosophical differences of the two traditions, but did offer a way to find some common ground on the importance of human rights as a way to support human dignity. John Paul II's address to the United Nations (1979) built upon and enriched the teachings of Pacem in Terris. In his teachings, John Paul II accords particular emphasis to the link between the right of religious freedom and the spiritual nature of the person.

Third, a central dimension of Catholic social philosophy is its stress on the social nature of the person. Society and state are natural extensions of the social nature of the person. This perspective, along with the different view of rights already indicated, distinguishes Catholic social thought from the social contract conception of society. In the latter position the stress on the autonomy of the individual in full possession of his or her rights leads to a view of society in which obligations to others are only those freely undertaken. The more organic conception in Catholic thought conceives of the person as a member of multiple social communities: the family, civil society, and the human community. Society is the product of the full range of relationships—political, economic, cultural, and legal—that shape the social fabric of life at the local, national, and international level. The state is one dimension of society; it is the center of political authority in society. Among the institutions that arise from the social nature of the person, the state holds a unique role. A fundamental issue in Catholic thought, as in political philosophy generally, is that of the moral responsibilities entrusted to the state and the moral restraints placed upon it. Determining the right relationship of society and state is the burden of the next two pairs of concepts in Catholic social thought.

Fourth, the society-state distinction is a complement to the distinction of the common good and public order. The common good, a central idea in Catholic thought, is the complex of spiritual, temporal, and material conditions needed in society if each person is to have the opportunity to develop his or her human potential. These conditions encompass goods as different as religious freedom, economic growth, security, education, and cultural values. The concept of the common good is rooted in the social nature of the person and in the rights of the person. Because the person is a social being, there is need of a social context—the common good—if the person is to be supported and provided with the means to pursue his or her individual good. Each person needs the support of the common good, and each person and group should test his or her specific goals and objectives in light of the wider needs of the common good. Finally, the common good is intrinsically tied to the rights of the person in the sense that the fulfillment of the common good entails the satisfaction of basic rights for each person in society.

The concept of public order is of more recent vintage in Catholic teaching, finding its authoritative expression in the conciliar Declaration on Religious Freedom, Dignitatis Humanae. The public order is that part of the common good that properly belongs to the state. It is constituted by the goods of public peace, public morality, and the enforcement of basic standards of justice. The guarantee of these three goods can require the use of coercive force; hence it belongs properly to the political authority in society. The effect of distinguishing the terms common good and public order is to limit the role of the state, to make clear that the achievement of the common good is a responsibility of the whole society—individuals, groups, and social institutions—not simply the role of the state.

Fifth, the society-state relationship is evaluated in Catholic thought by the principle of subsidiarity and the concept of socialization. Subsidiarity finds its authoritative definition in Pius XI's encyclical Quadragesimo Anno. The principle seeks to preserve as much freedom in society as possible, by contending that responsibility for addressing social questions should begin with the local or smallest institutional authority and be referred to the state only when it becomes clear that other institutions cannot fulfill the need. There is a presumption, therefore, not to appeal to the state first in addressing the problems of society. At the same time, the purpose of the principle is not to prevent the state from exercising responsibility in society. The state has positive moral responsibilities and is the ultimate guarantor of the rights of the person in society.

This responsibility is made clear by the way Pope John XXIII complemented the principle of subsidiarity by the idea of socialization in the encyclical Mater et Magistra. Socialization is the product of increasing complexity in society, generated by the growing involvement of the state in the socioeconomic order. The pope saw this enhanced role of the state as a method of satisfying human rights. He judged this growth of state activity to be compatible with subsidiarity. Since Mater et Magistra, subsidiarity and socialization are used in tandem to determine what the appropriate role and function of the state should be in society.

Sixth, in the social space beyond the control of the state in society Catholic teaching locates the role of intermediate associations, often termed voluntary associations in Western society. These groups come together by the choice of citizens; while not under the auspices or control of the state, they exist for public purposes. Examples include labor unions, professional societies, political parties, and cultural or ethnic associations. They exercise a public role beyond the capacity of any individual, and they contain the power of the state, often acting as a buffer between the citizen and the state.

In summary, therefore, the crucial society-state relationship is governed in Catholic thought by three elements: the common good–public order distinction, the subsidiarity-socialization relationship, and the role of intermediary associations.

Seventh, permeating the entire structure of Catholic social teachings is their theory of justice. The ideas are rooted in Aristotle but have been reshaped by Aquinas and by Pius XI's Quadragesimo Anno. The theory of justice distinguishes commutative, distributive, and social justice, with the latter category providing the dominant framework for the social teaching.

Eighth, a postconciliar addition to the social teachings is the "option for the poor." The theme arose from the Church in Latin America, particularly from the theology of liberation. Since the early 1970s it has made its way into the vocabulary of papal teaching. John Paul II speaks of "a preferential but not exclusive option for the poor." The phrase, in either of its formulations, conveys the idea that special attention to the needs of the poor is a moral obligation for individuals, for the Church, and for society as a whole. Within a concern for the welfare of all in society (the common good) there should be systematically weighted concern to respond to the voice and the needs of the poor.

Ninth, John Paul II uses the concept of solidarity as a central theme in his social teaching. The idea found expression in the social teachings of Pius XII, but the development of it in Sollicitudo Rei Socialis and in Centesimus Annus goes extensively beyond the earlier teaching. John Paul II sees solidarity as analogous to charity; it assumes in his teaching the status of virtue. The principal role solidarity has is to direct the dynamic of interdependence, which is reshaping the socioeconomic life of societies and the international community. In a world of increasing interdependence, a vision of solidarity is needed as the foundation for just relationships.

Historical Development: The historical evolution of the social teachings can be divided into the papal encyclicals, on the one hand, and the contribution of the Second Vatican Council and subsequent international synods of bishops, on the other.

Papal social teachings can be divided into four periods: (1) the response to the Industrial Revolution; (2) the response to the nuclear age and international interdependence; (3) the response to postindustrial societies; and (4) the social teachings of John Paul II. The responsive nature of the teachings highlights the fact that in most instances the social teachings have emerged from the pastoral experience of the Church, seeking to direct the ecclesial community in light of major social challenges.

The response to the Industrial Revolution is the theme joining Rerum Novarum, Quadragesimo Anno, and the Pentecost Address of 1941. The papal teachings focused on the dignity of human work and the rights of the working person. The papal teachings defended the intrinsic dignity of each person, articulated a body of rights that protected the person in the workplace (including the right to a just wage and the right to form unions), and affirmed a duty of the state to protect workers. Themes set forth in Rerum Novarum were repeated and extended in John Paul II's Laborem Exercens and Centesimus Annus. In responding to the Industrial Revolution, the popes consistently sought to distinguish Catholic social teachings from Marxism, on the one hand, and liberal capitalism, on the other.

The consequences of the Second World War established the setting for the second stage of the social teachings. The onset of the nuclear age and the emergence of global interdependence set the context for the social teachings of Pius XII, John XXIII, and Paul VI. The social teachings of this period are built on the Christmas Messages of Pius XII, particularly his teachings on human dignity, on democracy, and on the ethic of war. Both John XXIII and Paul VI develop this foundation in new ways. Both placed more stringent restraints on the use of force, and both emphasized the moral problem of the condition of the developing countries in the global economy. In this second stage of development the papal teachings shift their basic focus from the nation to the international community. In Paul VI's phrase, the social question had become a worldwide issue. As the scope of the problem expanded, so did the concepts of the moral teachings: they spoke of an international common good and international social justice. Both concepts were designed to test the relationship between the traditional notion of national interest and the rapidly developing international interest.

In the third stage of development the social teachings focused upon the problems of postindustrial society. The apostolic letter Octogesima Adveniens of Paul VI and Centesimus Annus of John Paul II both distinguished between the kinds of social questions facing the developing countries and those facing the industrialized democracies. Paul VI spoke of the new social questions rooted in advanced technology, mass communications, and an increasingly bureaucratized society. In these societies the dominant moral issues were not primarily the absence of material goods, but questions that were spiritual and cultural, bearing upon the quality of human life in highly organized, secular, technocratic societies.

The fourth stage of the social encyclical tradition is the teachings of John Paul II. The scope of his concerns and the amount of attention he has given to "the social question" makes independent treatment of his writings necessary. John Paul II has authored clearly identifiable social encyclicals, e.g., Laborem Exercens, Sollicitudo Rei Socialis, and Centesimus Annus. He also makes extensive use of social categories in documents that are not contained neatly in the social tradition, e.g., Redemptor Hominis (1979) and Veritatis Splendor (1994). John Paul II's social teachings exhibit both continuity and change in relationship to his predecessors. He addresses many of the same topics of the earlier tradition and relies on the teachings of earlier encyclicals. But his work is distinctive in the way he blends the dominant philosophical arguments with a much greater reliance on the Scriptures. He also extends the style of Gaudium et Spes, making extensive use of Christological and ecclesiological categories; his teachings are distinguished by their emphasis on human rights, religious freedom, and the imperative of addressing the international dimensions of "the social question."

In addition to this progressive development within the framework of the social encyclicals, the other dimension of the social teachings in the twentieth century has been the contribution of the Second Vatican Council and the Third and Fourth International Synods (1971–74). The principal text, Gaudium et Spes of Vatican II, provided an ecclesiological foundation for the social teachings, which had never been specifically articulated in the social encyclicals. In its stress (n. 76) on the Church's obligation to defend the dignity of the person, Gaudium et Spes tied Catholic ecclesiology to the full range of moral issues addressed in the papal social teachings. The Synod of 1971, in its document Justitia in Mundo ("Justice in the World"), intensified the link of ecclesiology and social teachings, describing the social ministry as a constitutive dimension of the Church's work.

In summary, the past century of Catholic social teachings has remarkably enhanced the Catholic social tradition, addressing "the social question" on a consistent basis in its local, national, and international dimensions. See also Church; Church and state; social justice.

Bibliography

Calvez, J. Y., and Perrin, J. The Church and Social Justice: The Social Teaching of the Popes from Leo XIII to Pius XII (1878–1958). Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1961.

Coleman, J. A., ed. One Hundred Years of Catholic Social Thought: Celebration and Challenge. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1991.

Dorr, D. Option for the Poor: A Hundred Years of Catholic Social Teaching. Rev. ed. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1992.

Hollenbach, D. Claims in Conflict: Retrieving and Renewing the Catholic Human Rights Tradition. New York: Paulist Press, 1979.

O'Brien, D. J., and Shannon, T. A. Catholic Social Thought: The Documentary Heritage. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1992.

J. BRYAN HEHIR

Catholics, statistics on. The statistics in this article are for the year 1990 and have been taken from the Statistical Yearbook of the Church (Vatican City, 1992). The information is taken from reports from 2,588 out of 2,761 patriarchal or metropolitan sees, archdioceses, and prelatures that are known as ecclesiastical jurisdictions.

NUMBER OF PARISHES

Parishes are listed as administered by a priest, entrusted to a nonpriest, or vacant, i.e., with no appointed administrator.

Area	Priest	Nonpriest	Vacant
Africa	8,485	354	128
Asia	16,265	131	338
Europe	134,812	920	446
Central America	7,627	81	11
North America	24,954	467	63
South America	17,574	525	241
Oceania	2,302	57	24
Worldwide	212,019	2,535	1,251

CLERGY

Since the Second Vatican Council, the number of lay ministers has dramatically increased. While the Statistical Yearbook does list the number of permanent deacons, it does not list the number of laypeople who serve in parishes, hospitals, and schools. The table is therefore incomplete.

Area	Bishops	Priests	Deacons
Africa	494	20,392	275
Asia	584	33,855	92
Europe	1,435	224,606	4,505
Central America	254	16,929	775
North America	538	65,510	10,410
South America	799	36,443	1,377
Oceania	106	3,431	91
Worldwide	4,210	403,173	17,525

Area	Diocesan Priests	Religious Priests
Africa	10,287	10,112
Asia	18,799	15,056
Europe	156,312	68,294
North America (including Central America)	51,234	31,205
South America	18,274	18,169
Oceania	2,790	2,641
Worldwide	257,696	145,477

MINISTRIES OF HELP

Hospitals, dispensaries, and leprosaria are among the ministries of the Church. The Church also conducts institutions such as orphanages and nursing homes for the elderly and disabled.

Area	Hospitals	Dispensaries	Homes for the Aged/ Disabled
Africa	898	3,591	402
Asia	1,005	3,117	835
Europe	1,565	2,564	6,812
Central America	288	1,658	377
North America	745	149	942
South America	1,022	3,056	1,411
Oceania	152	165	239
Worldwide	5,675	14,300	11,018

BAPTISMS AND MARRIAGES

This list provides statistics on baptisms, marriages, and mixed marriages (between a Catholic and a non-Catholic).

Area	Baptisms	Mixed Marriages	Marriages
Africa	2,799,470	203,546	40,901
Asia	2,463,222	442,187	56,789
Europe	3,067,784	1,188,190	92,313
Central America	2,943,133	501,827	3,381
North America	1,245,918	261,235	120,110
South America	5,471,800	1,014,560	15,799
Oceania	140,142	21,310	17,913
Worldwide	18,131,469	3,980,061	347,206

NUMBER OF CATHOLICS BY CONTINENT

The fourth column indicates the percentage of Catholics in the total population of a given area. In this table, unlike in others, Central, North, and South America are listed together.

Area	Population	Catholics	Percentage
Africa	638,121,000	88,899,000	13.9
Asia	3,149,064,000	86,012,000	2.7
Europe	713,908,000	285,294,000	40.0
The Americas	723,648,000	461,264,000	63.7
Oceania	26,497,000	7,031,000	26.6
Worldwide	5,251,238,000	928,500,000	17.7

ORDINATIONS TO THE PRIESTHOOD

A comparison of statistics for 1985 and 1990 indicates that the number of ordinations to the priesthood has risen in all areas except North America and Oceania.

Area	1985	1990
Africa	492	716
Asia	645	959
Europe	2,097	2,456
Central America	271	426
North America	612	517
South America	640	820
Oceania	65	44
Worldwide	4,822	5,938

NUMBER OF CATHOLICS PER PRIEST

The number of Catholics per priest varies widely on each continent. The average figures for different regions as a whole are given in this table.

Area	Catholics per Priest
Africa	4,358
Asia	2,541
Europe	1,270
Central America	7,748
North America	1,023
South America	7,276
Oceania	1,294
Worldwide	2,303

PASTORAL CENTERS

Pastoral centers include parishes, quasi-parishes, missions, and occasionally a section of a parish. This table gives the number of such centers and the average number of members in each.

Area	Centers	Catholics
Africa	80,841	1,100
Asia	54,274	1,585
Europe	153,731	1,856
Central America	22,388	5,391
North America	28,824	2,325
South America	59,677	4,443
Oceania	4,906	1,436
Worldwide	404,641	2,295

RELIGIOUS CONGREGATIONS AND SECULAR INSTITUTES

All who are not ordained are lay members of the Church. Some of these belong to religious congregations or secular institutes. The overwhelming majority of members of secular institutes are women; there are only 538 male members worldwide.

Area	Male Religious	Female Religious	Members of Secular Institutes
Africa	5,963	42,429	423
Asia	6,637	112,127	861
Europe	28,525	448,348	24,834
Central America	2,416	36,333	505
North America	10,279	136,222	1,129
South America	6,246	93,098	3,082
Oceania	2,460	13,554	46
Worldwide	62,526	882,111	30,880

NUMBER OF CATHOLIC ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY SCHOOLS

The Catholic Church has a long history of educational ministry. Worldwide there are more than 24 million elementary-school students, 12 million secondary-school students, and 2.8 million college and university students in Catholic educational institutions.

Area	Elementary	Secondary
Africa	23,650	4,449
Asia	12,608	7,572
Europe	18,422	9,933
Central America	4,194	1,857
North America	8,668	1,658
South America	8,578	5,070
Oceania	2,428	661
Worldwide	78,548	31,200

Catholics United for the Faith (CUF), ultraconservative lay Catholic association. It was founded by H. Lyman Stebbins in 1968, following the controversy over Pope Paul VI's encyclical on birth control. CUF encourages loyalty to the pope and the magisterium. By 1986, the by-then international association had 15,000 members, with headquarters in New Rochelle, New York. CUF publishes reviews of Catholic literature and actively opposes Catholic individuals and movements with whom it disagrees.

Catholic Theological Society of America (CTSA), professional organization of U.S. and Canadian Catholic theologians, founded in 1945. It has as its purpose, "within the context of the Roman Catholic tradition, to promote studies and research in theology, to relate theological science to current problems, and to foster a more effective theological education, by providing a forum for an exchange of views among theologians and with scholars in other disciplines." (CTSA Constitution, a. 1).

Active membership is open to all who possess doctoral degrees in theology or related studies, and who are or have been actively engaged in teaching or research in various religious disciplines. Exceptional cases can be considered for active membership. Associate membership is open to those who have completed at least the course requirements for a doctorate. Honorary membership can be given to recognize special service to the society. Total membership in 1992 was about 1,450, including nearly 25 percent women. The CTSA annually confers the John Courtney Murray Award (formerly the Cardinal Spellman Award) for "distinguished achievement in Theology." The Proceedings of the annual convention appear toward the end of each year.

Catholic Truth Society, an organization for the dissemination of information about, and defense of, Catholicism. It was founded in England in 1884 by Bishop Herbert Vaughn and layman James Britten; its stated aims were to provide devotional and educational works to Catholics and to provide non-Catholics with reliable information about Catholicism. Branches were later started in most of the English-speaking world.

Catholic University of America, The, national Catholic university in Washington, D.C. After John Lancaster Spalding, bishop of Peoria, and others inculcated the need for a university on a higher level than the existing Catholic institutions, and after Mary Gwendoline Caldwell offered a substantial sum of money, the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore (1884) decreed that a "principal" or advanced seminary be established under the control of the American hierarchy as the kernel of a complete university and a distinguished center of learning. In spite of some episcopal opposition, Pope Leo XIII approved the project in 1887 and two years later sanctioned the statutes and conferred pontifical status. The bishop of Richmond, John J. Keane, was appointed the first rector, and Washington, D.C., was selected as the site. Incorporated in 1887 under the laws of the District of Columbia, the university opened on November 13, 1889, with ten professors (half of them recruited in Europe) and forty-six clerical students. Subsequently, fifty-six religious congregations of men built houses of study in the vicinity. Besides the original school of theology, two more schools, embracing philosophy, letters, the mathematical, physical, biological, and social sciences, and law, were organized in 1895, when laymen were first admitted.

At first intended exclusively for graduate studies, the university admitted undergraduate men to every school except theology in 1905. Administrators and professors helped the Sisters of Notre Dame de Namur to found Trinity College for women nearby. Catholic Sisters College was established on a separate but neighboring campus in 1911 for the training of teachers, and eventually more than thirty houses of study were opened by congregations of women religious. Women were first admitted to graduate studies in 1928, to undergraduate study in education in 1950 (when Sisters College was discontinued), and to the other undergraduate departments shortly thereafter. In 1993 the university consisted of ten schools: architecture and planning, arts and sciences, engineering, law, library and information science, music, nursing, philosophy, religious studies, and social service. It grants pontifical degrees in three disciplines: sacred theology, canon law, and philosophy; it has the only departments of biblical studies, canon law, and church history among Catholic universities in the United States. It houses the national offices of the American Catholic Historical Association, the American Catholic Philosophical Association, the Canon Law Society of America, the Catholic Biblical Association, and others.

As the capstone of the American Catholic educational system, the university set up programs of affiliation for seminaries in 1907 and for colleges and high schools in 1912, in order to improve and standardize instruction. As a research institution the university itself became a charter member of the Association of American Universities in 1900. Its third rector, Denis J. O'Connell, was elected the first president of the [National] Catholic Educational Association in 1904, and his successor, Thomas J. Shahan, was president of the National Conference of Catholic Charities from its founding until his retirement. Bishop Shahan, who had the longest tenure (1909–28) as rector (or president), also began building on the campus the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception, the foundation stone of which was laid in 1920. Several learned journals were established by or at the university; those still being published there are the Catholic Historical Review (since 1915), Primitive Man, now the Anthropological Quarterly (since 1928), The Jurist (since 1941), The Americas, the Review of Metaphysics, and the Living Light.

Never adequately endowed, the university has suffered from financial stringency since its earliest years. Conservative and German-American Catholics were long reluctant to support it. In 1903 Pope Pius X authorized the first national collection to be taken up in all the parishes of the United States; it has since been an annual source of income.

The chancellor of the University ex officio was the archbishop of Baltimore until 1947 and since then has been the archbishop of Washington. The Board of Trustees now consists of equal numbers of clerical and lay members. All the nine rectors up to 1967 were or became bishops; in 1969 the first lay president was appointed. See also United States of America, Catholicism in the. ROBERT TRISCO

Catholic Worker movement, lay apostolate in service of the poor founded in 1933 by Dorothy Day and Peter Maurin in New York City. Although Day credited Maurin with the idea of the movement, it was Day who managed to find ways of embodying his ideals. She began a newspaper, Catholic Worker, that sold for a penny a copy. She also opened a "house of hospitality" on Mott Street in New York City where not only were a soup kitchen and beds provided for the poor, but where workers and intellectuals could meet and hold "round-table discussions." Later, she began a farm commune. As the Catholic Worker movement spread across America, the concept of a newspaper, a house of hospitality, and support for rural life continued to define the movement.

The Catholic Worker movement was a gathering of diverse people. Those who joined were cosmopolitan scholars and reformers who identified themselves with the disinherited. They embraced a life-style of voluntary poverty and focused their attention on economic and social changes that were consistent with the goals of Christian personalism, a philosophical orientation that stresses the value and dignity of each individual human person.

The Catholic Worker movement was never dependent on the institutional Church for financial support. It also rejected the institutional power of the state. Catholic Workers did not participate in government nor depend on it to correct social injustice. Rather, the Catholic Worker movement viewed itself as a leaven for the creation of a new social order and professed Christian personalism as the solution to economic, social, and political injustice. Catholic Workers under the leadership of Dorothy Day also consistently opposed the United States' war efforts from World War II through the Vietnam War. See also Day, Dorothy M.; Maurin, Peter; pacifism; personalism, Christian. PATRICIA MCNEAL

Catholic World, The, a U.S. Catholic periodical. Founded by the Paulist Fathers in 1865, it was one of the first journals to consider the wider context of the Catholic Church in America and to engage progressively culture and society. It has been published as New Catholic World since 1972.

Catholic Youth Organization (CYO), the umbrella organization that oversees youth activities in most dioceses in the United States. Founded in 1930 in Chicago by the auxiliary bishop Bernard J. Sheil, the CYO sought to solve the "youth problem" of the 1930s by offering young people worthwhile activities. It incorporated existing programs such as scouting, day camps, and vocational training with a heavy emphasis on athletics, including track meets, swim meets, golf tournaments, and parish-based sports leagues for basketball and baseball. In April 1931, the CYO gained much notoriety by hosting a citywide boxing tournament. In 1932, a CYO center was built in downtown Chicago to provide a Catholic alternative to the YMCA. In 1934, an attempt was made to create a national CYO, but only the archdioceses of Chicago, Los Angeles, and San Francisco cooperated. The Chicago CYO held national tournaments, which succeeded in publicizing the CYO throughout the country. In May 1938 the first annual national conference was held in Chicago. Since that time CYO has expanded to most dioceses, where the CYO name has become synonymous with parish sports. But the CYO also continues to oversee homes for children, summer camps, and other youth work.

Caussade, Jean-Pierre de, 1675–1751, French Jesuit spiritual writer and spiritual director in the mystical tradition. He is celebrated for defending mysticism (knowledge of God through personal prayer experience) in the wake of Quietism, a doctrine of passivity in prayer and action, condemned in 1687. He preached acceptance of God's will. See also mysticism; Quietism.

C.E., common era. Together with B.C.E. (before the common era), C.E. is used by many in preference to A.D. (Lat., anno Domini, "in the year of the Lord") out of deference to other faiths and their different periodizations of history. This more neutral designation is, however, based on the same calculation of the date of the birth of Jesus as is A.D. See also A.D.

Cecilia, St., second- or third-century martyr who died in Rome during a time of religious persecution. As a young girl, Cecilia fasted, prayed, and pledged her life to God. However, her father arranged a marriage to the patrician Valerian. On their wedding night Cecilia informed Valerian about her pledge, and he allowed Cecilia to remain a virgin. She opened her house for prayer and spiritual direction, and hundreds were converted through her influence. Cecilia is honored as patron saint of music because of the song for God in her heart. Feast day: November 22.

CELAM (Sp., Consejo Episcopal Latino-Americano), Conference of Latin American Bishops. Established in 1956 with statutes approved in 1974, CELAM represents twenty-two Latin-American national bishops' conferences. Its aim is to coordinate the work of church activities in Central and South America, focusing on the adaptation of the teachings of Vatican Council II (1962–65) to the spiritual, social, and economic needs of the people. General conferences at Medellín, Colombia (1968), and in Puebla, Mexico (1979) resulted in affirming Christian base communities, in protesting the oppression of the poor, and in promoting creative strategies for spreading the faith. A general conference in Santo Domingo, Dominican Republic, in 1992 addressed the challenge of the evangelization of the Americas. See also Latin America, Catholicism in.

celebrant. See presider.

celebret (sel'ah-bret; Lat., "let him celebrate"), a commendatory letter certifying that a priest is in good standing so that he can be permitted to celebrate the Eucharist in churches where he is unknown. The letter must be written by the priest's bishop or religious superior and dated within a year of presentation. The presentation of the celebret by a visiting, unknown priest is not strictly required. Canon law says he may be permitted to celebrate the Eucharist without a celebret if it can be prudently judged that he is in good standing with the Church.

Celestine V, St. [Peter of Marrone], 1215–96, the only pope to resign his office, having served only five months, July 5 to December 13, 1294. At the time of his election, Peter of Marrone had been a Benedictine hermit for almost sixty years. By his holy life, he attracted many followers and inspired a movement of reformed Benedictines with thirty-six priories by 1294. After two years of deadlock over the election of a successor to Pope Nicholas IV, the cardinals turned in desperation to the devout Peter. He accepted his election as a divine call, taking the name Celestine V. But lacking formal training in law and administration, the eighty-year-old pope became the pawn of the French crown and other factions. Attempting to prevent further mayhem, Celestine issued a bull on December 10 declaring the legality of papal resignation and then resigned three days later. Feast day: May 19.

Celestius, fifth century, associate of Pelagius and condemned by councils from 411 (Carthage) to 431 (Ephesus). He denied that infant baptism was for forgiveness of sins, rejecting the doctrine of original sin altogether. See also Pelagianism.

celibacy, clerical, a way of life characterized by a priest's perpetual renunciation of marriage for the sake of the reign of God. The development of clerical celibacy as a discipline in the Western Church is related to, but distinct from, the emergence of vows in monastic and other religious communities. The history of this development is complex and has been shaped by diverse values and concerns.

Historical Development: Prior to Christianity, perpetual celibacy was generally not valued. In gentile cultures virginity was required of women who consecrated themselves to the service of female deities, but this consecration was not perpetual. For men, perpetual celibacy was not customary and in some cases was censured with civil penalties. Although among Jews virginity was highly valued for unmarried women, it was not seen as a way of life. To be unmarried and childless was considered a matter of shame. An exception to this norm was the ascetical Essene community at Qumran.

Christianity introduced a new perspective. The Gospels indicate that the unmarried state is a reflection of the heavenly kingdom (Luke 20:36), where there is no marriage. Coupled with the imminent expectation of the Second Coming of Christ, this teaching contributed to a positive evaluation of perpetual celibacy as a witness to and preparation for the coming reign of God. Celibacy as a way of life appeared in the first century in the Church; however, it was recognized as a distinctive option because, "not all can accept this teaching" (Matt 19:11–12). Paul recognized the tension surrounding this teaching. Although he advocated celibacy for those who could embrace it, he also acknowledged that the grace of celibacy was not given to all. Those who could not live such a life were to marry to avoid sin (1 Cor 7:1–9, 27–28, 36).

Celibacy as a perpetual life-style option may have achieved the status of a movement in the late third century when hermits retreated to the desert to devote themselves to prayer. The subsequent development of community life in support of prayer and asceticism provided the foundations of monasticism. The rise of a celibate monastic life-style spurred discussion about requiring celibacy of all clergy.

During the first three centuries of the Church there was no universal law or common consensus governing celibacy for bishops, priests, and deacons. All were permitted to contract marriage, and many did. There were tensions over the issue of married clergy, however. The Synod of Gangra (ca. 345) condemned a false asceticism whereby worshipers boycotted celebrations presided over by married clergy. Bishops who abandoned their wives for the sake of their own piety were censured with excommunication. On the other hand, there were also early movements directed toward the imposition of celibacy as a discipline upon the clergy. At the Council of Nicaea (325), Bishop Hosius of Cordoba advocated celibacy as a requirement for all clergy. In this he was promoting as a universal rule the conclusions of the Council of Elvira (300), which he had attended. But Nicaea rejected Hosius's position.

Legislation on celibacy did begin to surface in local councils, however, in part as a response to disagreements in the Church about the requirement that all clergy be celibate. A preliminary development was the exclusion of marriage after ordination (councils of Ancyra, 314, and Neocaesarea, ca. 320). A second restriction resulted from an interpretation of the requirement of monogamy. A cleric could not remarry following the death of his spouse.

The legislation on celibacy took different turns in the Eastern and Western churches. The Eastern churches, under the burgeoning monastic influence of the fourth century, promoted celibacy. In the face of a subsequent backlash against this trend, the Eastern churches moderated their legislation, allowing priests, deacons, and other clerics to live in marriage if contracted prior to ordination. Bishops, however, were forbidden to marry. This legislation was confirmed at the Trullan Synod (692) and has remained operative in the East and for Eastern churches in union with Rome. Today priests and deacons of the Melkite, Maronite, Armenian, Ruthenian, and Romanian churches may marry prior to ordination.

The requirement of celibacy for clergy in the West was effected by a series of local councils, as well as by a growing body of papal teachings. Following the Council of Elvira's decree requiring celibate clergy, various popes from Damasus I (366–384) to Leo I (440–461), as well as European and African councils, issued similar directives.

Despite what developed as a fairly consistent body of teaching, the contemporary practice of the clergy was less than uniform. In the period of social instability following the decline of Charlemagne's empire in the tenth century, church discipline, and with it the observance of celibacy, flagged. This precipitated both a moral and an economic crisis for the Church. A clergy known to be in violation of church discipline gave scandal to the faithful and undermined the ability of the Church to promote social order. At the same time, clergy with children could erode the financial base of the Church by the secularization of church lands through inheritance. Pope Benedict VIII (1012–24) enacted legislation to protect the lands of the Church from this process, but disorder in the observance of celibacy continued. Subsequent popes acted against these trends. However, it was Gregory VII (1073–85), and his program of reform, who is credited with bringing about a more consistent observance of the obligation.

The period of the Reformation posed renewed challenges to the discipline of celibacy. Although at first Martin Luther did not support a married clergy, his views eventually changed. In 1522 he condemned celibacy. Calvin's views were more moderate. While holding that celibacy is an acceptable means of serving God, he argued that it is of no greater value than married life.

These developments generated much discussion at the Council of Trent (1545–63). On the subject of the relative merits of the married and celibate ways of life, Trent distinguished between the objective superiority of celibacy as a way of life that witnesses to beatitude for those who are called to it, and the subjective detriment of attempting to live such a life if not called to it. With respect to clerical celibacy, however, the council upheld the value of retaining the obligation to celibacy for the sake of the service of the Gospel. Significantly, however, Trent recognized that the laws governing celibacy for clergy were church laws rather than divine laws. Consequently, it conceded that these laws could be changed should the Church ever decide to do so. Trent's retention of the law was an affirmation of the value of celibacy, not a rejection of the value of marriage.

Contemporary Issues: Discussion of celibacy has always been deeply influenced by the cultural norms and religious and philosophical perspectives of those engaged in the discussion. This is no less true today. Three perspectives in particular have shaped the discussion of clerical celibacy from Vatican II to the present. First, historical consciousness had led to the awareness that principles of church order are shaped by historical circumstances and are subject to change. Second, greater understanding of human psychology has led to questions regarding the impact of celibacy on the human development of the clergy. Thirdly, the realization that many non-European cultures in which the Church is establishing itself view celibacy negatively has prompted questions concerning the value of retaining celibacy as an absolute and universal requirement for ordained ministry in the Roman Catholic Church.

The second of these influences can be felt in the Vatican II (1962–65) decrees "On the Appropriate Renewal of the Religious Life," "On Priestly Formation," and "On the Ministry and Life of Priests." Pope Paul VI (1963–78) adverted to historical consciousness and questions of cultural diversity as the occasions for writing his encyclical on clerical celibacy, Sacerdotalis Caelibatus (Lat., "Priestly Celibacy," 1967). One significant point in this document is the provision for the possibility of married ministers in other denominations entering into full communion with Rome and continuing the practice of priestly ministry as priests in the Catholic Church, even though married. The World Synod of Bishops in 1971 reaffirmed Paul VI's insistence on the requirement of celibacy while also affirming the legitimacy of the papal granting of exceptions in extraordinary circumstances. Pope John Paul II has repeatedly declared his support for Paul VI's position and in 1980 the Vatican authorized "pastoral provisions" granting dispensation from the obligation of celibacy for a limited number of Episcopal priests who entered into communion with Rome.

The consistent teaching that celibacy will remain a requirement for clergy in the Western Church has not diminished the discussion by clergy and laity over the possibility of change. Indeed, the declining number of priests in active ministry, the exemption from the requirement of celibacy for married clergy who enter the Catholic Church after having been ordained in the Episcopal Church, and reported instances of de facto nonobservance of the requirement by clergy in various parts of the world, especially in Africa and Latin America, suggest that the discussion will continue. See also counsels, evangelical; priesthood; vows; vows, private; vows, public.

Bibliography

Bassett, William, and Peter Huizing, eds. Celibacy in the Church. New York: Herder and Herder, 1972.

Schillebeeckx, Edward. The Church with a Human Face: A New and Expanded Theology of Ministry. New York: Crossroad, 1985.

Vogels, Heinz-Jürgen. Celibacy: Gift or Law?: A Critical Investigation. Kansas City, MO.: Sheed & Ward, 1993. JAMES K. VOISS

Celsus, Platonist, author of the oldest extant pagan polemic against Christianity, True Doctrine (ca. 178). It survives only as citations in Origen's Against Celsus (248). Celsus ridiculed Christianity as novel, parochial, irrational, and quarrelsome, a subversive movement founded by a sorcerer and proselytizing the uneducated. He provides important evidence for the diversity of second-century Christianity, but also for the growing prominence of the Great Church, i.e., the major Christian centers of the Mediterranean world. See also Origen; Plato.

Celtic cross. See cross, forms of the.

Celtic spirituality, a Christian tradition that valued monasticism, nature, aceticism and solitude. It flourished in Ireland (the most significant and best documented center), parts of the British Isles, and Brittany from approximately the fifth century to, in Ireland, as late as the twelfth century, when traditional structures gave place to Rome-inspired reforms. From Ireland, monastic colonies spread to Scotland, Northumbria, and across much of Western Europe. Church organization was monastic rather than diocesan. A distinctive feature, therefore, of Celtic spirituality was the social as well as religious importance of monasticism, possibly influenced by the flexibility of the Egyptian tradition. Monastic "towns" were mixed settlements of men, women, celibates and married people, that fulfilled political, social, economic, educational, as well as religious, functions. The closeness of religion to the life of the people was also reflected in a profound sense of the presence of God all around them. Celts were a rural people, close to the land and the sea. Even after the coming of Christianity, the wealth of Celtic prayers and poetry is marked by powerful natural imagery. Celtic spirituality also valued solitude, often accompanied by a vigorous asceticism, pursued on lonely headlands and islands. There was also voluntary exile far from home and familiar landscapes. This wandering of individual ascetics and groups led many Celts, albeit reluctantly at times, to evangelize the people among whom they settled. Celtic spirituality paid close attention to the spiritual needs of the individual, whether monastic or lay. Hence, the widespread practice of spiritual guidance known literally as "soul friendship." See also Ireland, Catholicism in; spirituality, Christian.

PHILIP SHELDRAKE

cemetery. See burial, Christian.

cenobite (sen'oh-bit). See monk.

censer. See thurible.

censorship, the prohibition of publications, speeches, or activities thought to be offensive to, or violative of, morality. It is the nature of human law to ensure stability and to promote the common good. Where the public expression of certain ideas was thought to threaten public order, legitimate authority acted to suppress such expression. The Catholic Church has sometimes exercised its teaching authority in matters of faith and morals by an effort to suppress objectionable materials or at least to warn Catholics of the immoral or disruptive content of these materials. Historically the Church has exercised its pastoral role in several ways: proactively, by requiring that Catholics seek ecclesiastical approval of material to be published; negatively, by publishing its Index of Forbidden Books or of movie ratings in diocesan newspapers.

The Catholic Church's position on censorship has been softened considerably since Vatican II (1962–65). The Index was abandoned in 1966. Much of what is commonly called censorship today is actually persuasion, as the individuals or groups involved do not have the authority to enforce the standards they advocate, for example, in nonviolent picket lines, boycotts, and letters to the editor. See also Index of Forbidden Books; Legion of Decency.

censure, in canon law a medicinal penalty, i.e., one that seeks the correction of the wrongdoer rather than the repair of damage done the community. Although some censures may result automatically (Lat., latae sententiae) from the commission of an ecclesiastical crime, the 1983 code has greatly reduced the number of automatic penalties, so that most censures will be imposed by sentence (Lat., ferendae sententiae), and even automatic ones will frequently be announced so that those affected will be aware of them. An individual must be warned before censure is imposed so that there may be time for a change of heart. Because a censure seeks this change of heart, there is no time limit on a censure, but it should be lifted when there has been demonstration of reform. Depending upon given circumstances, the censure may be one of excommunication, suspension, or interdict. See also penal law.

centering prayer, nondiscursive meditation technique, considered to be the practice of the Desert Fathers. It has two major forms: Benedictine, taught by John Main, and Cistercian, popularized by Thomas Keating and Basil Pennington. Cistercian teachers consider it a method for the prayer called The Cloud of Unknowing, a loving attentiveness to God, which The Cloud's author, whose name has been lost, said is "by invitation only."

As Cistercians teach centering prayer, one sits comfortably to calm oneself and then begins to repeat a sacred word silently. When one feels grounded in a loving attitude toward God, one drops the word and waits in silence. Whenever the mind wanders, one returns to the sacred word to center again.

At the end of practice, one might say a prayer slowly and attentively. Two daily practice periods of about twenty minutes each are recommended.

Two major problems have been reported with this form of prayer. First, voluntary emptying of the mind can lead to fuzziness if one is not attentive. Secondly, subconscious thoughts sometimes surge into the mental emptiness created in centering prayer, and meditators have no techniques for managing them.

As John Main taught centering, one keeps attention on a sacred word, preferably not an English one that can more easily produce thought. The word is silently repeated until one can no longer say it. This maintains a solidly focused meditation, and helps prevent the difficulties encountered in the Cistercian method. See also prayer.

Centesimus Annus (Lat., "The Hundredth Year"), social encyclical issued in 1991 by Pope John Paul II to commemorate the one hundredth anniversary of Pope Leo XIII's encyclical Rerum Novarum (Lat., "Of New Things"). Centesimus Annus reaffirms previous papal pronouncements that the social teachings pertain to the Church's evangelizing mission and are "an essential part of the Christian message" (n. 5; see also n. 54). But, again, the Church has no specific programs to propose. Instead, it offers its social teachings as "an indispensable and ideal orientation" (n. 43). The social message of the Gospel "must not be considered a theory, but above all else a basis and motivation for action" (n. 57). At the center of the message is always the dignity of the human person (n. 53; also nn. 47, 54–56), a point the pope had made already in his first encyclical, Redemptor Hominis (Lat., "Redeemer of humankind"). It also reaffirmed the Church's preferential option for the poor (nn. 11; 57) and the importance of the Church's own witness to its social teachings (n. 57). In addition, the encyclical is significant for the positive assessment it makes of democracy: "The church values the democratic system inasmuch as it ensures the participation of citizens in making political choices, guarantees to the governed the possibility both of electing and holding accountable those who govern them and of replacing them through peaceful means when appropriate" (n. 46). See also Catholic social teachings; democracy; Rerum Novarum.

certitude, moral, the quality of a person's knowledge of something to the extent that all reasonable fear of error is excluded. It is the teaching of the Church that truth can be known while also recognizing that there are different kinds of truth claims and different degrees of confidence with which people can hold a claim regarding the knowledge they have. Put positively, moral certitude allows an individual to give firm assent to what is known. It can be distinguished both from doubt (the inability to either confirm or deny something to be true) and from probability (something is likely to be true but an alternative is plausible). Moral certitude requires that any alternative conviction be less than plausible, otherwise it would not be reasonable for a person to exclude the danger of error. While moral certitude does not eliminate all possibility of error, it is so unlikely that fear of error can be put to rest. Moral certitude thus stands between a probable judgment and the certitude called absolute or metaphysical, wherein error is not only excluded as unlikely but is impossible.

While the area of fundamental principles may admit of absolute certitude, the knowledge striven for in the formation of conscience at the practical level is either moral certitude or, more commonly, probable judgment. In matters of canon law judges are ordinarily held to the standard of moral certitude in their pronouncements.

Cerularius, Michael (ser-oo-lahr'ee-uhs), ca. 1005/10–1059, Byzantine Orthodox patriarch of Constantinople (1043–58). In the 1050s, a period of tension between Constantinople and Rome, Emperor Constantine IX sought an alliance with Rome against the Norman penetration into southern Italy. When talks with the papal legate Humbert broke down, mutual excommunications resulted on July 16, 1054. Though some date the East-West schism from this rupture, the break was not finalized until the Crusades. Exceptionally powerful and popular with the common people, Michael was perceived as a threat and removed from office by Emperor Isaac I Comnenus.

Chad, St., d. ca. 672, Anglo-Saxon monk and bishop. Disciple of Aidan, Chad followed his brother Cedd as abbot of Lastingham. Appointed bishop of York by King Oswy (665), he was removed by Theodore of Tarsus (669), who restored Wilfrid to York, reconsecrating Chad to be bishop of Lichfield. Feast day: March 2.

chair, presidential. See presidential chair.

Chalcedon, Council of (451), the greatest of the first four general councils of the Church, it expressed in clear terms the Church's scriptural and traditional faith in the unity (one person) and distinction (two natures) of Christ. In the fourth century and, in particular, at the first two councils (Nicaea I in 325 and Constantinople I in 381), the central challenge was to maintain the full divine and the full human reality in Christ. Toward the end of the century, however, some heretical movements were helping to bring up the question of Christ's unity. This question of the unity as well as the distinction of natures in Christ was also raised by those who explored the basis for believing that the eternal Word or Son of God was born, as man, from Mary and died on the cross. How could one justify, for example, the popular Marian title of Theotokos (Gk., "God-bearer," "Mother of God"), which is dated at least as early as Origen (ca. d. 254), and which affirmed that Mary conceived and gave birth to the Son of God and not just to Christ's humanity? The new challenge was to legitimate the Christological intuition embodied in this Marian title: the preexistent Word of God was and is the one final subject in Christ.

Nestorius (d. 451), a monk from Antioch who became patriarch of Constantinople, stressed the distinction at the level of Christ's human and divine natures (Gk., physeis), while allowing for some "conjunction" (Gk., synapheia) at the level of Christ's "person" (Gk., prosōpon or hypostasis). Initially he preferred to call Mary "Christ-bearer" but eventually agreed to use the title of Theotokos. He repudiated the view (attributed to him by his critics) of a separation between the two natures in Christ and hence a double sonship (the Son of God and the son of Mary existing independently yet linked together by a merely moral or accidental unity of mutual love). Nestorius's great opponent, Cyril of Alexandria (d. 444), emphasized Christ's unity (Gk., henōsis) and championed the Marian title of Theotokos, but was not really able to interpret satisfactorily the distinction between Christ's divinity and humanity. The difference between the two patriarchs' views was also made problematic by the fact that the key terms of physis, hypostasis, and the term preferred by the Antiochenes, prosōpon, were not clearly defined.

The Council of Ephesus: The debate came to a head in 431 when Cyril opened the Council of Ephesus. It declared Mary to be Theotokos, recognized Cyril's teaching in his second letter to Nestorius as being consonant with the creed from the Council of Nicaea, and excommunicated Nestorius. Shortly thereafter the bishops who were gathered around the patriarch of Antioch produced the Formula of Reunion (accepted by Cyril in 433) which called Christ "of one substance (consubstantial) with the Father as regards his divinity and of one substance with us as regards his humanity," and spoke of Christ's one person (prosōpon) and two natures (physeis).

The Council of Ephesus helped move toward a fuller appreciation of the Nicene Creed. In the context of the early fourth century that creed had been important for the doctrine of the Trinity: the Son is of one being or substance (Gk., homoousios) with the Father. Now its significance for the doctrine of Christ and his incarnation could be seen: a double (divine and human) set of attributes (on the one hand, "true God from true God," "consubstantial with the Father" and, on the other hand, "who became incarnate, was made man, suffered and rose again on the third day") was confessed as belonging to one and the same subject ("We believe in the one Lord Jesus Christ, the only begotten Son of God"). The way was prepared for the teaching of the Council of Chalcedon.

Chalcedon: The immediate occasion for this council came from Eutyches (d. ca. 454), a leading monk of Constantinople who apparently taught that the unity in Christ was such that only one nature or physis remained in Christ after the incarnation, the human nature being absorbed or swallowed up by the divinity. Drawing on the Scriptures, the earlier Church councils, Cyril's second letter to Nestorius, the Formula of Reunion, Cyril's letter accepting it and, in particular, a letter written in 449 by Pope Leo the Great (d. 461) to the patriarch of Constantinople, the council affirmed the one person (prosōpon or hypostasis) of Christ in his two natures (physeis), human and divine. It specified that "the one and the same Christ, Son, Lord and Only begotten" had been made known in these two natures which, without detriment to their full characteristics, continue to exist "without confusion or change, and without division or separation," while belonging to only one person. In other words, the unity of Christ exists on the level of person, the duality on that of natures. Through the unity of subject in Jesus Christ, the eternally preexistent Son of the Father is also the Son of the Blessed Virgin Mary. "Without confusion or change" was aimed to exclude the current error of Eutyches in merging Christ's two natures; "without division or separation" was intended to exclude the error which had been attributed to Nestorius of separating the two natures.

Subsequent councils would add footnotes to Chalcedon by using the term "hypostatic union" to interpret the personal unity of Christ and by insisting on the integrity of his humanity entailing a human (as well as a divine) will. In regulating language about Christ, Chalcedon had lasting success. Its terminology of "one person in two natures" became normative even into the twentieth century. Its teaching effected a brilliant synthesis between the Alexandrians, who highlighted Christ's unity, and the Antiochenes, who defended the duality of Christ's distinct natures. The subject who acts is one (divine) person; what he does reveals the two natures through which he acts. See also Christology; ecumenical council; Ephesus, Council of; Monophysitism; Nestorianism.

Bibliography

Grillmeier, Aloys. Christ in Christian Tradition. Vol. 1. Rev. ed. London: Mowbrays, 1975.

Kelly, J. N. D. Early Christian Doctrines. 5th ed. London: A. & C. Black, 1977.

GERALD O'COLLINS

Chaldean Catholic Church, the ecclesiastical community of Chaldean rite (also called East Syrian rite) Catholics who are in communion with Rome and whose largest concentration of members is in Baghdad, Iraq. It is the Catholic counterpart of the Assyrian Church of the East, which broke with Rome after rejecting the teaching of the Council of Ephesus (431) that in Christ there is only one divine person, not two persons, human and divine, as the Nestorians held.

As early as the thirteenth century, Catholic missionaries—primarily Dominicans and Franciscans—had been active among Assyrian Christians. This missionary effort led to a series of individual conversions of bishops and brief unions, but no permanent community was formed.

In the mid-fifteenth century a tradition of hereditary patriarchal succession (passing from uncle to nephew) took effect in the Assyrian Church. As a result, one family dominated the church and untrained minors were being elected to the patriarchal throne.

When such a patriarch was elected in 1552, a group of Assyrian bishops refused to accept him and decided to seek union with Rome. They elected the reluctant abbot of a monastery, Yuhannan Sulaka, as their own patriarch and sent him to Rome to arrange for a union with the Catholic Church. In early 1553 Pope Julius III proclaimed him Patriarch Simon VIII "of the Chaldeans" and ordained him a bishop in St. Peter's Basilica on April 9, 1553.

The new patriarch returned to his homeland in late 1553 and began to initiate a series of reforms. But opposition, led by the rival Assyrian patriarch, was strong. Simon was soon captured by the pasha of Amadya, tortured, and executed in January 1555. This initiated a long struggle between Chaldeans and Assyrians in which the Chaldeans eventually got the upper hand. It is now estimated that the Chaldean Catholic Church is three times as large as the Assyrian Church of the East.

The Chaldean Catholics suffered heavily from massacres during World War I (1918) when four bishops, many priests, and about seventy thousand faithful died.

The location of the patriarchate shifted back and forth among several places over the centuries but gained a measure of stability after it was set up at Mossul in 1830. In 1950 it moved to its present location in Baghdad after substantial migration of Chaldean Catholics from northern Iraq to the capital city. Since the nineteenth century the patriarch has had the title "of Babylon of the Chaldeans."

Chaldean candidates for the priesthood study at St. Peter's Patriarchal Seminary in Baghdad. It no longer grants advanced degrees.

Two religious orders are unique to the Chaldean Catholic Church. The Antonine Monks of St. Hormisdas (founded 1830) combine a monastic community life with pastoral ministry. The Chaldean Daughters of Mary Immaculate (founded 1922) work mostly in schools and orphanages.

As of 1992 the largest concentration of these Catholics is in Baghdad, Iraq. There are ten Chaldean dioceses in Iraq, four in Iran, and seven others in the Middle East, as well as a diocese in the United States. Altogether the church has about 500,000 faithful. See also Chaldean rite; Eastern Catholics and ecumenism; Eastern Catholics and Rome; Eastern churches; Eastern liturgies; Eastern rites; East Syrian rite; Ephesus, Council of.

RONALD G. ROBERSON

Chaldean rite, also called East Syrian or Assyro-Chaldean rite, the liturgical tradition of the Chaldean and Syro-Malabar Catholic churches and their Orthodox counterpart, the Assyrian "Church of the East." This rite is the descendant of the ancient liturgical heritage of the Church of Mesopotamia in the Persian Empire. See also Eastern rites; East Syrian rite; rite.

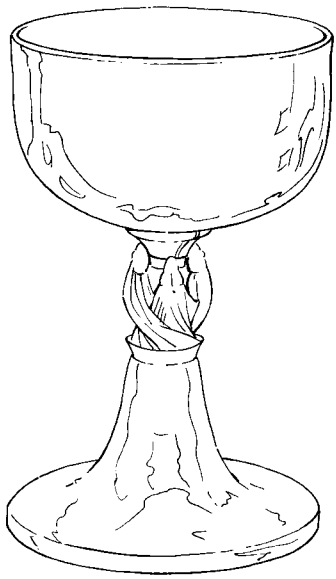
chalice, the cup used for wine and Precious Blood at Mass. The chalice recalls various scriptural passages in which Jesus associates the use of a cup with himself in a new way: the disciples will "drink the cup" that Jesus drinks from (Mark 10:38); at the Last Supper, the cup contains the wine that is "my blood," and when he is to be crucified, he prays that "this cup" be taken from him. These various meanings are gathered together at Eucharist, and both religious and liturgical significance is attached to a cup or goblet when it is referred to as a chalice. See also mixed chalice; unmixed chalice.

Challenge of Peace, The, the U.S. Catholic bishops' 1983 pastoral letter on war and peace, with a particular focus on the problem of the possession and use of nuclear weapons. The letter addresses the problem of nuclear warfare within the context of a biblically-based understanding of peace as right relationship with God, neighbor, and, ultimately, all of creation. The bishops draw upon the just-war tradition to help specify how the United States can help bring about that right relationship in a world disordered by superpower rivalry. On the question of the use of nuclear weapons, the bishops assess three possibilities: counterpopulation bombing, first use (against military targets), and limited nuclear war. They reject counterpopulation bombing because it would directly take the lives of noncombatants. They reject first use and limited nuclear war out of a concern that any use of nuclear weapons will escalate and therefore be disproportionate to the end of a just peace. On the question of deterrence, they outline a "strictly conditioned moral acceptance" of the practice. Not all deterrence policies are to be condemned, but they must meet certain strict conditions. Deterrence is legitimate only in the context of negotiations and progress towards disarmament. This is the only way that a deterrent policy can be said to be moving in the direction of true peace.

The other noteworthy contribution of the pastoral letter is its recognition—even though the document's own reasoning uses just-war theory—of pacifism as a complement to the just-war tradition. See also Catholic social teachings; just-war doctrine; peace.

Chalice



Challoner, Richard, 1691–1781, bishop, vicar apostolic of the London district (1758–81), and leader of English Catholics. Born of Presbyterian parents in Lewes (Sussex), Challoner was converted to Catholicism in youth, studied and taught at Douai (1705–30), and revised the Douay-Rheims Bible translation, which remained the standard for Catholics until the Confraternity Version (begun 1936). The latter is the predecessor of the New American Bible. See also Scripture, versions of.

chamberlain. See papal chamberlain.

chancel (Lat., cancellus, "balustrade"), often synonymous with "sanctuary," it is that portion of the church building immediately surrounding the altar and the pulpit. The chancel can extend from the space in front of the altar to include also the choir. It can be set off from the congregational space by a rise of several steps. See also sanctuary.

chancellor, diocesan, principal archivist of a diocesan curia, a notary by law. Every diocesan bishop is expected to appoint one. The chancellor primarily systematizes, safeguards, and authenticates curial acts though particular law may determine otherwise. In the United States, broad governance faculties are personally allotted many ordained chancellors by delegation. Because such governance powers belong to vicars general by office, and because not only a priest but anyone of good character in full

Church communion may be chancellor, the practice of granting broad governance faculties is now less common. Particular law may adapt or modify tasks of chancellors and distribute work volume among vice-chancellors and other notaries, freely appointable and removable. See also diocesan curia.

chancery, diocesan office wherein records called acts of the curia are to be collected, systematized, and safeguarded.

The broad scope of curial operations recorded and sometimes administered through the chancery in many dioceses invites its colloquial designation as the "bishop's office." Functions may include, for example, executing policies and procedures regarding personnel, finances, education, and construction; coordinating special diocesan projects and ministries; and corresponding with Church and secular authorities.

Diocesan bishops frequently rely on their chancery for canonical advice, communications, statistical data, public relations assistance, and disciplinary matters. Chancery personnel always include the chancellor and, if needed, vice-chancellors, other notaries, and secretaries. See also diocesan curia.

Chanel, St. Peter, 1803–41, priest and first martyr in Oceania. Born, educated, and ordained a Marist priest in France, he went as a missionary to the New Hebrides in Oceania in 1936. He was murdered by a chieftain on the island of Futuma when the latter heard that his son was to be baptized. Feast day: April 28.

chant. See Catholicism and music.

chant, Ambrosian, the repertory of liturgical chant associated with the Ambrosian rite, or the liturgy of the Church of Milan. Distinct from the corpus of Gregorian chant, the Ambrosian chants exhibit a recognizably more ancient musical style than their Roman counterparts. The chant, like the liturgical rites it served, both conserves a local tradition distinct from Rome's and embraces foreign elements and idioms, some from Oriental sources. Transmitted orally until the twelfth century, the melodies range from spartan simplicity (psalm antiphons) to extreme prolixity (Mass alleluias with melismas, i.e., passages sung to one syllable of text, of some three hundred notes). See also Ambrosian rite; Catholicism and music.

chant, Byzantine, traditional Greek liturgical chant of the Byzantine rite, a monophonic vocal music unaccompanied by musical instruments, preserved in manuscripts with a musical notation called "ekphonetic." Byzantine hymnody flourished in the fifth and sixth centuries with the development of the kontakion (poetic refrains), especially under St. Romanos the Melodist at Constantinople in the first half of the sixth century, and with the development of the canon of orthros (Matins, Lauds) in the seventh. Later composers like John Koukouzeles continued the tradition up to the fourteenth century. The old chant has been largely replaced by modern compositions. The Byzantine-rite Slavs also had a form of Byzantine chant called znamennyj, now often neglected in favor of modern polyphony outside monastic and peasant usage, where the old prostopenie or "plainchant" can still be heard. See also Byzantine rite; Catholicism and music.

chant, Gregorian, the plain chant of the Roman rite, named after Pope Gregory the Great (d. 604), although he probably had little or nothing to do with its composition. The present form of Gregorian chant is based on the older chant of Rome, with subsequent pruning of long florid passages and the incorporation of other elements from the eighth- and ninth-century Gallican liturgy of Carolingian France. Gregorian chant was diffused throughout the Frankish Empire at this time as part of the romanizing policy of the imperial court. It eventually supplanted most other forms of local or regional plain chant, but was itself influenced by the traditions it supplanted. Keeping pace with the evolution of the Roman-rite Mass and Divine Office, the ancient repertory of texts and melodies has been progressively enriched up to modern times.

Gregorian chant is monodic, i.e., one vocal part or melodic line predominates, needs no instrumental accompaniment, and its scales or modes run from D, E, F, and G, rather than from C or A, as in modern music. The form in which it is known in the 1990s is traceable only to ca. 900, when its various kinds of musical notation began to emerge. Since the fourteenth century, it is printed in square notes on a staff of four lines. With the rise of polyphony (music with two or more independent melodic parts sounded together) and measured music (music using metric units between two bars on the staff), the Gregorian chant tradition entered upon a serious decline compounded, after the Council of Trent (1545–63), by the publication of the Medicean edition (so called because it was published by a press owned by the famous Medici family of Rome) of the Mass and Divine Office chants (1614 and 1615). The editors recast the ancient melodies of Gregorian chant with a view to making them conform to Renaissance ideas of Latin prosody. Neumes (two or more notes sung to a single syllable) assigned to weak syllables and word-endings were simplified or else shifted to accented syllables; compound neumes and melismas (passages sung to one syllable of text) suffered major amputations; the various shapes of the notes were taken to imply differences of length in the rhythm; tropes and sequences, which abounded from the ninth century onward, were, with few exceptions, abolished; and a multitude of ancient antiphons and responsories were eliminated from the newly edited repertory. This defective edition was used well into the early twentieth century and served as a model for regional editions of liturgical choral books. Meanwhile, nineteenth-century scholarship was making significant progress in the recovery of the tradition, particularly at the French Abbey of Solesmes.

With the encouragement of the abbot, Dom Prosper Guéranger (d. 1875), and in the context of the liturgical revival initiated at Solesmes, monks of the abbey, under the direction particularly of Dom Pothier and Dom Mocquereau, began editing chant books based on a careful study of ancient manuscripts. Of particular importance was the facsimile reproduction of a number of these manuscripts in the series Paléographie musicale grégorienne (begun in 1889), as well as numerous books and monographs that served everywhere to stimulate further research. However, the establishment of a musical text is one thing, its interpretation another; and scholars have frequently challenged Solesmes theories concerning the rhythmic interpretation of the chant—theories that have continued to evolve up to the present. Since the turn of the century, Solesmes has played the principal role in the editing of the official Roman rite chant books; and post-Vatican II (1962–65) chant books continue to reflect the advances made at Solesmes in the study and interpretation of the ancient manuscripts. See also Catholicism and music; Solesmes. CHRYSOGONUS WADDELL chant, Mozarabic (mohts-ah'rah-bik), the body of liturgical chant sung by churches of the Iberian peninsula and associated with the Mozarabic rites. Scholars suggest that these chants, like the liturgical rites for which they were composed, date from the eighth century. Extant manuscripts date from the tenth and eleventh centuries, just prior to the rite's suppression in 1085. Comparatively more melismatic (singing many notes for one syllable) than their Roman counterparts, the Mozarabic chants exhibit a unique Oriental flavor. Of more than twenty surviving ancient manuscript sources, only five exhibit decipherable notation. See also Catholicism and music; Mozarabic rite.

chant, plain, or plainsong, a form of monophonic and rhythmically free melody, generally of ecclesiastical origin. The Latin term, cantus planus, served in the thirteenth century to distinguish Gregorian chant from music that was polyphonic and measured. The term has been used since in a wider sense to include the unison nonmetrical melodies proper to churches of both West and East: in the West, Ambrosian, Old Roman, Gregorian, Mozarabic, Gallican, and Beneventan chant; in the East, Byzantine, Armenian, and Syrian chant. By extension, the term also covers liturgical melodies with vernacular texts but based on classical plain chant models, as, for example, Anglican plain chant.

Chantal, St. Jane Frances de, 1572–1641, French spiritual leader. Born Jane Frances Fremyót, she married Baron Rabutin-Chantal when she was twenty. As a young widow she formed a spiritual friendship with Frances de Sales. In 1610 they cofounded the Visitation Sisters. Jane's spiritual writings are primarily in the form of letters. Her spirituality centers on the dual aspects of charitable love—devotion to God and neighbor. Her teachings urge that the practice of simple contemplative prayer fosters the virtues that allow one to serve others. Feast day: August 21. See also Francis de Sales, St.; Visitation order.

chantry. 1 The endowed office or duty of a priest to celebrate Masses for a deceased person or persons. 2 The chapel (often attached to a church, but sometimes free-standing) where such Masses were said. Officiants who held such offices were often called "chantry priests." Such benefices and places were common in the late Middle Ages. See also benefice.

chapel, place of worship with a separate altar in a cathedral, a large church, an institution (school, convent, prison, hospital, etc.), a private home, or an airport. The principal difference between a church and a chapel is that a church is for the use of all the faithful, whereas a chapel, or oratory, is, according to canon law, "for the benefit of some community or assembly of the faithful" (can. 1223).

chapel of ease, place of worship with a separate altar, for the sake of parishioners who live too far away from their parish church, or to absorb an overflow from the parish church.

chaplain, a priest who is responsible for the spiritual and pastoral welfare of a particular group. Chaplains serve institutions that are not connected with a local congregation. Chaplains originally were appointed to provide spiritual guidance and perform religious services in the chapels of leading families and royalty.

In the United States, chaplains serve a variety of institutions. The army chaplaincy began during the American Revolution, and the first Roman Catholic military chaplain was appointed in 1824. Chaplains are also appointed for service in hospitals, schools, prisons, convents, and lay religious institutes (see cans. 564–72).

chaplet (Fr., chapeau, "hat"). 1 A garland of flowers used as a crown. 2 A string of beads, often used of the beads of a rosary. A chaplet was five decades (50 beads), while the complete rosary was fifteen decades (150 beads). Smaller strings of ten beads of a rosary are also known as chaplets. See also Rosary.

chapter, an assembly of women or men from a religious institute. The word originated with the monastic practice of assembling daily to listen to a reading of a chapter from a monastic rule. A superior also transacted business at these sessions; hence the legal character of chapters. This assembly took place in the chapterhouse. There are various kinds of chapters. A general chapter represents the entire, perhaps worldwide, religious institute. A provincial chapter consists of representatives of a province, while a local chapter is a meeting of an individual monastery or house. Canons 631–33 of the Code of Canon Law contain the Church's general legislation on chapters. The constitutions of a religious institute specify the character of the chapters in that institute. Chapters promote the active participation of members of a religious institute in the life and welfare of an institute. The chapter of faults is not one of these canonically established meetings. See also chapter of faults; general chapter.

chapter, cathedral. See cathedral chapter.

chapter of faults, an ancient monastic custom that called for a meeting of religious, often in the chapter room or house, to manifest their failings to the superior in the presence of the community. The accusation of one monk's faults by another was also part of the tradition. The modern form of the chapter first appeared in the ninth and tenth centuries. Most orders except the Jesuits had some form of this exercise. Jansenism gave a punitive cast to this manifestation of conscience. Since the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), most religious orders and congregations have omitted this exercise from their constitutions. See also chapter; monasticism.

character, moral, the collection of the ways of acting, responding, and construing situations that bestows a pattern of strengths and weaknesses on an individual's moral life. Moral character is understood as the individual's enduring personality, a way to evaluate the individual as a moral agent with characteristic virtues and faults.

One's moral character is distinguished from the sacramental character bestowed by certain sacraments (Baptism, Orders), by virtue of which individuals gain a certain standing within the Church community. Sacramental character need not be grounded in, or expressed by, any particular qualities of the personality of the individual who possesses it, although ideally it will be. Because it is bestowed in a particular sacramental act, sacramental character is received once by the individual receiving the sacrament, even though it may develop and unfold throughout life. Hence, it is to be understood in a quasijuridical way. Moral character, on the other hand, is essentially equivalent to one's personality, and, as such, it emerges over the course of a lifetime in a way that is best understood in psychodynamic developmental terms. See also sacramental character.

character, sacramental. See sacramental character.

charism (kair'iz-uhm; Gk., "gift"), divine spiritual gift to individuals or groups for the good of the community. The word was introduced with this meaning by Paul. "To each is given the manifestation of the Spirit for the common good. . . . All these [gifts] are activated by one and the same Spirit, who allots to each one individually just as the Spirit chooses" (1 Cor 12:7, 11). Although some charisms are extraordinary, such as prophecy or healing, most are powers for the ordered growth of the Christian community. Preaching, teaching, administration, and generosity are important charisms; love is the greatest of all.

Having received charisms from the Holy Spirit, each Christian has the power and the responsibility to exercise some office or render some service in the Church. Charisms originate with the Spirit working directly in the baptized, so they can challenge the institutional Church and call it to renewal. Some see charismatic movements as essentially opposed to institutional ordering, but such is not the case. The Catholic Church considers the ecumenical movement the fruit of a charism working among many Christian churches.

Charisms given to one person can become embodied in a large group, such as a religious institute. The unique gift of the founder or foundress is given to every member from one generation to the next. Through these unmerited gifts, the Spirit continues to call the Church to dynamic growth and to renewed fidelity to Christ. See also gifts of the Holy Spirit; grace; Holy Spirit.

Charismatic Renewal movement, contemporary spiritual movement that claims to be inspired by the charisms (gifts) present in some of the early Christian communities and associated with the feast of Pentecost. These charisms include words of wisdom, words of knowledge, healings, prophecy, speech in new languages ("tongues"), and interpretation of such speech (1 Cor 12:4-11). Since the late 1960s the claim to, and emphasis upon, charisms has become increasingly common among Catholics and is more generally accepted by the leadership of the Church.

In varying degrees charisms have been present throughout Christian history. Some theologians, including Augustine (d. 430), thought that speaking in tongues had ceased. However, the gifts of spiritual knowledge, miracles, and prophecy continued to be attested in lives of the saints and chronicles of ecclesiastical and monastic renewal movements.

Emphasis upon charisms, including the gift of tongues, has been especially strong among Protestant groups such as the Moravians of the eighteenth century (who influenced John Wesley, the founder of Methodism) and during the Second Great Awakening of the nineteenth century in the United States. The first decades of the twentieth century witnessed the formation of distinct Pentecostal denominations within Protestantism.

At the Second Vatican Council in 1963 the bishops discussed a draft paragraph "on the charisms of the faithful" proposed for the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (Lumen Gentium). Sicily's Cardinal Ruffini, among others, argued that charisms mentioned in the NT were a bridal present to the early Church and had ceased playing a significant role in the ordinary life of Christians. Others, especially Belgium's Cardinal Leo-Josef Suenens, argued that these gifts were vitally important for the building up of the ecclesial body. The council eventually adopted the latter view (Lumen Gentium, n. 12).

Charismatic renewal within the Catholic Church followed closely upon the council. In 1967 groups of Roman Catholics at the University of Duquesne in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and later at the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor and at the University of Notre Dame in Indiana spoke of experiencing the broad spectrum of charisms. The experience quickly extended itself in prayer groups and, in some cases, lay-led charismatic communities. Catholics participated in organizing regional, national, and international offices and conferences. From its beginning, charismatic renewal among Catholics has had an ecumenical orientation, but its alliances have been with the most conservative Protestant groups. The Charismatic Renewal movement grew rapidly among Catholics through the 1970s, remained steady in the 1980s, but in recent years has declined. In some cases, it has been the victim of internal conflicts over the exercise of authority.

Twelve major charismatic communities from various parts of the world formed the Catholic Fraternity of Charismatic Covenant Communities and Fellowships (canonically recognized in 1990), which has since been joined by other communities. See also charism. MICHAEL WALDSTEIN charity, a theological virtue (along with faith and hope), the highest form of Christian love, whose originating source and ultimate end is God. Although charity in its principal sense is the love we direct towards God—a whole-hearted love awakened, sustained, and fortified by God's own prevenient love for us—it stands as well for the love of neighbor as ourselves, continuously informed and nourished by that love. It is additionally the proper name for the third and most important of the theological virtues. The Latin root of charity, caritas, is the term employed most consistently by the Vulgate to render the Greek agapē, the dominant word for love in the NT, where it comprises in its most fundamental sense the love of God bestowed through Christ and the Holy Spirit upon humankind, as well as the love required of human beings for both God and one another (cf. 1 John 4:7–21). Among early Christian writers charity functions in a broad sense as the summary principle and metaphor of the Christian life as a whole; it is to be the wellspring of all religious and moral motivation. Only with Augustine (d. 430), to whom tradition gives the title Doctor Caritatis (Doctor of Charity), do the first signs of a systematic account of the concept appear. Charity is the complete love of God, which both unifies and perfects the other virtues (cf. Morals of the Catholic Church 1.2).

Consequently, all sin is in some sense or degree an offense against and corruption of charity. Still the most influential treatment of charity remains that of Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274), whose reflections blend scriptural and early Christian theological sources with the philosophical insights of Aristotle. In the sections of his monumental Summa Theologiae expressly devoted to the three theological virtues (faith, hope, and charity), Aquinas describes charity as our friendship with God, citing the words of Jesus recorded in John's Gospel, "I do not call you servants any longer, . . . but I have called you friends" (John 15:15; Summa Theologiae 2–2.23.1). As a genuine friendship (cf. Aristotle Nicomachean Ethics, Book 8), charity is our love of God for God's own sake, based on the common fellowship in God's eternal happiness extended to us in Jesus (cf. 1 Cor 1:9). It is a love whose motive force is the Holy Spirit, working within us in full cooperation with our own voluntary capacities (Summa Theologiae 2–2.23.2). Thus, it is through charity that we are made participants, however imperfectly in our present state, in the trinitarian life of God. Though its formal object and final end is God, charity reaches out to the neighbor as well, including even the enemy and the sinner, who are loved for God's sake (23.1). Indeed, all the more particular and immediate goods of life, and hence the moral and intellectual virtues that direct and order the pursuit of those goods, may be brought under the activity of charity, which completes and perfects them by referring them to the greatest good, which is God (1 Cor 13:1–3; Summa Theologiae, 2–2.23.7–8). Charity is therefore the greatest of the virtues, because it both conjoins us to God and directs all our activity toward the eternal happiness promised us (23.5–6). While it may grow by intensity within us (24.4–8; cf. Council of Trent, Session VI), charity does not render us free from all sinfulness and may, as a consequence of gravely sinful acts, be seriously weakened, if not lost (24.10–12). See also agape; love. PAUL J. WOJDA

Charlemagne (shar'luh-mayn; Fr., "Charles the Great"), ca. 742–814, Frankish king and, from 800 to 814 first emperor of what was later called the "Holy Roman Empire." Son of Pepin III ("the Short") and Bertrada, he inherited, with his brother Carloman, a share of his father's kingdom, and on Carloman's death in 771 became its sole ruler. By 774 he had subdued the Lombards and was thenceforth known as "King of the Franks and Lombards," and as such he exercised enormous influence over the Holy See. His dominion was enlarged by his extensive military campaigns against the Saxons (772–85, with sporadic revolts thereafter until 797); his conquest of the Spanish March, a territory in northern Spain (801); his wars against the Avars (796); and his victories over the Danes and the Charlemagne, the first Holy Roman emperor, who exerted a profound influence on the Church, appointing bishops and mandating reforms of the liturgy, monasteries, and the clergy; ninth-century statue in the church of St. John the Baptist, Muestaire, Switzerland.

Slavs. In recognition of these victories and of his role in protecting the Holy See, and partly in opposition to the claims of the Byzantine emperor that he was the true temporal ruler of Christendom, Charlemagne was crowned "Emperor of the Romans" by Pope Leo III on Christmas Day, 800.

Charlemagne's importance in the life of the Western Church was immense. His ideal for a united and prosperous commonwealth based on a vision of renewed learning and of religious unity succeeded because he was, in effect if not in title, virtually the head of the Church in his domain (which encompassed the Holy See), controlling all episcopal appointments, promulgating liturgical and monastic reforms as well as disciplinary reforms for clerics, and summoning and presiding at Church councils. The most important of these was the Council of Frankfurt (794), which condemned Adoptionism, a Christological heresy, and attacked the Second Council of Nicaea (787) for supposedly sanctioning image worship. Already surnamed "Great" (magne) by 840, the Middle Ages looked back on Charlemagne as an ideal ruler and in some circles he was venerated as a saint (on January 28). See also Holy Roman Empire.

Charles II, 1630–85, king of Great Britain and Ireland. He was declared king while in exile in Scotland in 1649, but his invasion of England was rebuffed by Cromwell's army in 1651, after which he fled to the Continent. Upon his restoration in 1660, Charles attempted to establish toleration for dissenting Puritans and recusant Catholics in Declarations of Indulgence (1662, 1672) but was defeated by Parliament, which established Anglicanism in the Act of Uniformity (1662) and excluded Catholicism by the Test Act (1673). Charles professed the Catholic faith on his deathbed. See also England, Catholicism in; Puritanism.

Charles V, 1500–58, Holy Roman emperor from 1520 until his abdication in 1556. Ruler of one of the largest empires in history, including Germany, Italy, the Low Countries, Spain, and the Spanish colonies around the world, he combated Protestantism and pushed for reform of the Catholic Church. See also Holy Roman Empire.

Charles Borromeo, St. See Borromeo, St. Charles.

Charles Lwanga, St. See Lwanga, St. Charles.

Charles Martel, ca. 690–741, Frankish "Mayor of the Palace" and grandfather of Charlemagne. The real ruler of the Frankish realm after 718, Charles supported the work of St. Boniface. His victory at Poitiers (732) helped halt Muslim advances and earned him the name "Martel" (Fr.), "Hammer." Charles left the throne vacant when the last of his puppet kings died. See also Boniface, St.; Charlemagne; Franks.

Chartres, cathedral of, Gothic-style cathedral in Chartres, a city southeast of Paris. Rebuilt after a fire in 1194, the church is known both for the grandeur of its architecture and the beauty of its exterior sculpture. The stained-glass windows are justly famous. Chartres was both an important trade center and pilgrimage site in the medieval period.

chastity, the virtue by which human sexuality is ordered to its proper purpose. In the past, chastity often was identified with continence and with abstinence from immoral sexual desire and pleasures. It was understood to involve renunciation or control. With the renewal of moral theology called for by the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), chastity has come to be seen in a more positive light. More than continence, it is the virtue that pursues the integration of the true meaning of human sexuality and intimacy, whether one is married or not. Chastity involves an attitude of reverence for the mystery of human sexuality, for one's body, and for one's sexual partner. Chastity never separates sexuality from love. The pursuit of solitary sexual pleasure or treating one's spouse as nothing more than a sex object are both violations of chastity. The pursuit of chastity, whether in thought or deed, is not always easy. It is a fundamental attitude that directs and orders human sexuality whether one is married, single, or celibate. See also purity; sexual morality; temperance; vows.

Chartres, the quintessential Gothic cathedral, famous for its stained-glass windows and exterior sculpture.

chasuble (chaz'uh-buhl; Lat., "little house," "hooded cloak"), the outer liturgical vestment worn by the presider at Mass. In the Greco-Roman world, the chasuble was a large cone-shaped cloth with a hole for the head worn as the outer garment. Because it completely covered the person, it was called casula (Lat., "little house"). When men's fashions changed after the barbarian invasions of the fifth and sixth centuries, the clergy retained the older style, and the chasuble became associated with clerical use. By the ninth century, the presentation of the chasuble to newly ordained priests had become part of the ordination ritual. Chasubles may be made of any suitable material. Traditionally, the chasuble is a symbol of charity. See also vestments.

Chasuble

Chateaubriand, François René (sha-toh-bree-ahnd'), 1768–1848, French Romantic writer and diplomat. His first book, Essay on the Revolutions (1797), included an account of his religious struggles and a rationalist attack on Christianity. Later, reconciled to the Church, he wrote The Genius of Christianity (1802), an apologetic work that defended Christianity on intellectual, aesthetic, and ethical grounds.

Chavez, Cesar, 1927–93, union organizer. Born in Arizona, he moved with his family to California where he picked crops as a migrant worker. In 1958 he formed the National Farm Workers Association. He led a two-year boycott of table grapes (1968–70), after which the growers agreed to collective bargaining. Throughout these years Chavez was openly supported by many Catholics who identified with his cause (Sp., La Causa) on religious grounds, including nuns, brothers, priests, and bishops. At the time of his death, many called him a saint.

cheirotonia (ki-rah-toh-nee'uh; Gk., "extending the hand"), ancient term for appointment to an office, used by Christians for the rites of ordination. In later usage the term was usually restricted to ordination to major orders. The Greek synonym cherothesia ("imposition of hands") was used for other ordinations and blessings. See also ordination.

Chenu, M.-D. [Marie-Dominique], 1895–1990, French Dominican theologian. He entered the Order of Preachers of the French province in 1913. After receiving a doctorate at the Angelicum (Rome, 1920), he taught history of doctrines and introduction to theology at Le Saulchoir in Belgium, which moved to Étiolles (southeast of Paris) in 1937–39. He served as rector of Le Saulchoir from 1932 to 1942, where he led a talented group of Dominican scholars applying historical method to the study of Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) and to all theology. Much of their work appeared in two journals he edited, the more comprehensive Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques (Review of the philosophical and theological sciences) and the more specialized Bulletin thomiste (Thomist bulletin). His privately circulated book, Une école de théologie: Le Saulchoir (A school of theology: the Saulchoir, 1937), described their approach in his trenchant, sometimes witty style. At that time, in part from fear of Modernism, historical studies in theology were viewed with suspicion, especially by the speculatively oriented Thomists who dominated the field and whose antihistorical fixations Chenu criticized. They influenced the Vatican to place the unpublished work on the Index of Forbidden Books (1942), and Chenu was deposed as rector of Le Saulchoir.

Undaunted by criticism or injustice from Church authorities and always loyal to the Church as the People of God, Chenu continued his research and publishing in medieval and contemporary theology, including several editions of La théologie comme science aux XIIIème siècle (Theology as science in the thirteenth century), Introduction à l'étude de s. Thomas d'Aquin (Introduction to the study of St. Thomas Aquinas, 1950), and La théologie au douzième siècle (Theology in the twelfth century, 1957, only partly translated into English), a book widely used by medievalists in every field, written during a period when, together with Yves Congar and Henri de Lubac, he was forbidden by Church authorities to teach.

One reason for this action was Chenu's involvement in new theologies and apostolic movements. His historical studies had led him to see the importance of contemporary events and movements for theology, leading him from 1934 on to link theology, sociology, spirituality, and mission in his writing and teaching, and to encourage movements such as Catholic Action and the priest-worker movement. Important works in this area included Spiritualité du travail (Spirituality of work, 1941) and Pour une théologie du travail (Toward a theology of work, 1955). Historical studies and contemporary concerns constantly fed each other.

Invited by a French missionary bishop to be his theological adviser at the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), Chenu exercised significant influence, especially on the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (Gaudium et Spes, 1965), whose emphasis on "the signs of the times" and whose openness to the values of creation and the constantly developing world were consonant with his thought.

After the council he continued to write and speak in the same vein, becoming increasingly critical of what he saw as attempts to blunt the cutting edge of the council's advances and as a retreat from the confidence it had shown that the Church and its theologians must remain in vital contact with the events of history. In his latter years he remained intellectually vigorous, warmly encouraging others by personal interviews and letters. WALTER PRINCIPE

Cherubicon, Byzantine-rite Great Entrance refrain, opening hymn of the eucharistic half of the liturgy, sung during the transfer of gifts to the altar. Strictly speaking, Cherubicon is the proper name of the ordinary refrain used on most days ("We who mystically represent the Cherubim and sing the thrice-holy hymn to the life-giving Trinity, let us now lay aside all worldly care to receive the King of All invisibly escorted by the angelic hosts! Alleluia!"), but the name has come to be used for the other refrains that replace the Cherubicon on Holy Thursday, Holy Saturday, and in the Presanctified Liturgy. Emperor Justin II introduced the Cherubicon into the liturgy of Constantinople in 573–74. See also Great Entrance.

cherubim. See angel.

Chesterton, Gilbert Keith, 1874–1936, English novelist, poet, essayist, dramatist, biographer, journalist, and apologist. Educated in London, Chesterton is considered the ultimate Edwardian man of letters. Although much remembered for his Father Brown detective stories, begun in 1911, Chesterton was a prolific writer—witty, urbane, and a master of paradox. Writings such as The Man Who Was Thursday and his biographies of Thomas Aquinas and Francis of Assisi were immediately successful and reflected his growing commitment to Christianity. Chesterton was formally received into the Catholic Church in 1922. He received several honorary degrees, Fellowship in the Royal Society of Literature, and became Knight Commander with Star, Order of St. Gregory the Great. See also apologetics.

Chevetogne (shev'tohn), Benedictine Monastery of the Holy Cross in the Ardennes, Belgium, where the liturgical offices are celebrated in both the Roman and Byzantine rites. Founded in 1925 at Amay-sur-Meuse, Belgium, by Dom Lambert Beauduin (1873–1960), noted pioneer of the ecumenical and liturgical movements, the monastery moved to its present site in 1939. The monastery houses an international community dedicated to fostering Christian unity and ecumenical dialogue. Since 1926 its quarterly Irénikon, the first Catholic review devoted to ecumenism, has played a seminal role in the formation of an ecumenical spirit among Christians.

Children of Mary, a broad term indicating membership in one of many sodalities or confraternities dedicated to the Blessed Virgin Mary. These sodalities generally have the intention of combining personal piety with a social apostolate. Probably the first such group was the Children of Mary sodality founded in the thirteenth century by Peter de Honestis. In the sixteenth century, the Jesuits also formed various sodalities dedicated to Mary whose mission was the spiritual formation of children and young adults. These Jesuit-led Sodalities of Our Lady continue to this day, with the goal of fostering allegiance to the pope and service to the Church. In 1847 the Daughters of Charity and the Vincentian Fathers revived the Children of Mary movement with the approval of Pius IX. This revival had the purpose of promoting devotion to the Miraculous Medal, whose design was revealed in 1830 by the Blessed Virgin to Catherine Labouré, a Daughter of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul. See also confraternities; sodality.

Children's Crusade, mostly legendary account of French and German children who in 1212, after the failure of the Fourth Crusade, journeyed to Italy hoping to be led dry-shod across the Mediterranean to the Holy Land, like another Exodus.

Chile, Catholicism in. Catholicism first came to Chile in the early sixteenth century and the first diocese was established in 1561. Early missionary efforts were more successful with the Indian population in the northern and central regions of the country than in the south, where the Church was hindered by the campaign to secure independence from Spain. Church and state were constitutionally separated in 1925. There are five archdioceses and seventeen dioceses and over 10.7 million Catholics in Chile, comprising approximately 80 percent of the total population (1994). See also Latin America, Catholicism in.

chiliasm. See millenarianism.

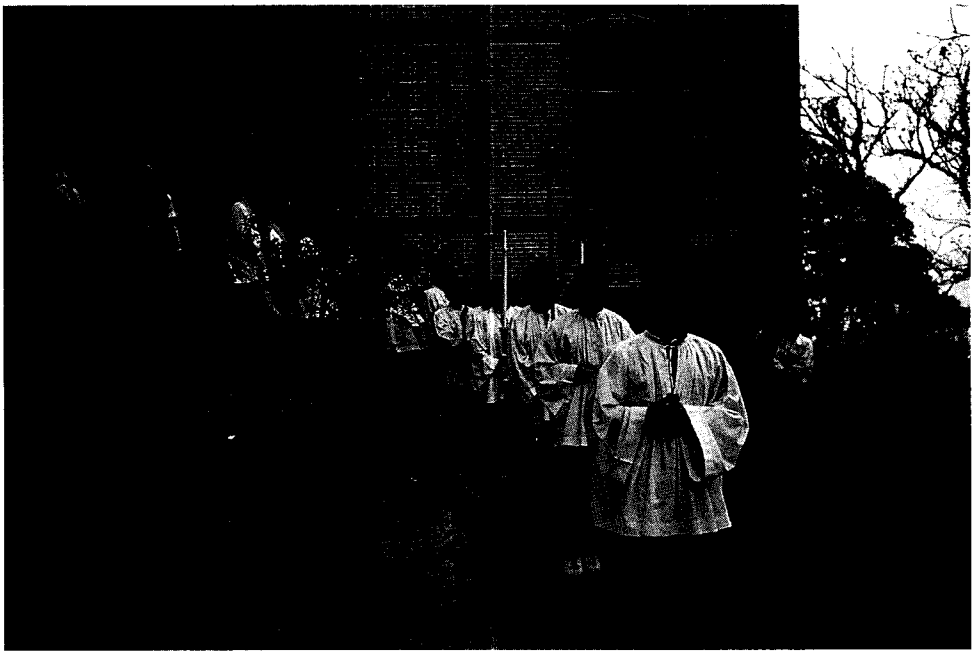
China, Catholicism in. With the largest population and longest uninterrupted history, China continues to represent the greatest challenge offered to Christianity by any country. Nestorian monks from Persia, the first Christian presence history records in the Middle Kingdom, entered China in the seventh century. After some growth in succeeding centuries, the communities they had established gradually disappeared. Franciscan missionaries founded Catholic communities in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, but these also did not survive. The intense efforts of Jesuit missionaries from the late sixteenth to the end of the eighteenth century to engage in dialogue with Confucian literati, as well as with simpler folk, achieved some notable successes. This dialogue ended with the Chinese rites controversy and the suppression of the Society of Jesus (1773). Hostility toward and persecution of Christians, both native and foreign, by some segments of the Chinese population have continued almost without interruption. The dedication of Catholic missionaries of other religious communities during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, joined to the Catholic and Protestant efforts of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, represents the most concentrated evangelizing effort in the history of Christianity. The results achieved by 1949, the year of the Communist domination of all of China, included the establishment of Christian educational, health, and other social institutions throughout the country. At that time only some four million Catholics and fewer than a million Protestants, who together comprised less than one percent of the population, embraced the Christian faith.

Potrait of a Chinese convert to Christianity by Sir Godfrey Kneller, Kensington Palace, London.



Procession of Chinese priests at the Sheshan Basilica Cathedral near Shanghai, China.

In the 1950s the Communist government created the Three-Self movement for Protestants (self-administration, self-financing, self-propagation), the Catholic Patriotic Association, and analogous associations for Taoists, Buddhists, and Muslims in order to maintain strict control over believers in the five officially recognized religions. As a consequence, underground movements of both Catholics and Protestants continue to resist government control over Christian life. The Christian churches are thus interiorly divided by circumstances created by government control. The tension between publicly sanctioned Catholics and underground Catholics is particularly strong because of the government's prohibition of any official contact between Chinese Catholics and the Holy See. Many Catholics strongly criticize and bitterly reject those who, in order to conduct worship and other religious activities openly, reluctantly submit to government restriction.

Yet in spite of such tensions, including the expulsion of thousands of missionaries between 1949 and 1954 and violent persecutions during the Cultural Revolution (1966–76), Protestants and Catholics, in both the public and underground sectors, have experienced unprecedented membership growth. It is estimated that the Catholic faithful currently number some ten million and the Protestant faithful number probably forty million. The Catholic Church in the 1990s includes 113 dioceses with 64 China-appointed bishops, 30 unofficial bishops whose names have been made known through public reports of arrests, and probably some 20 other unofficial bishops; 900 priests, half of whom have been ordained during the past twelve years; 740 candidates in government-approved seminaries; 200 students in twelve preparatory seminaries; 1,000 sisters in some forty government-approved convents; and almost four thousand public churches and chapels. Growth continues in spite of the harassment of the official and nonofficial communities, the church's material poverty, and paucity of intellectual resources.

During the past fifty years, Christians in China have persevered in their faith. Those who have opposed government religious policy endure the loss of freedom, possessions, social position, and often health and life itself. Their suffering has attracted others to respect and often embrace Christianity.

The Church in China has begun to have a Chinese character. For the first time after centuries of Christian life, all church leaders are Chinese. Foreign Christian friends, including Chinese living outside mainland China, when invited to do so, are sharing their material, intellectual, spiritual, and pastoral resources to assist Chinese Christian communities to develop. The development of the church in China is, as it ought to be, in Chinese hands. Perhaps future generations of Chinese Christians will be able to undertake a serious dialogue with Confucianism, Taoism, and Buddhism, the triple root of traditional Han Chinese culture. It is to be hoped that Catholics and Protestants will cooperate to create genuinely Chinese expressions of Christian faith, liturgy, and spirituality.

Because of the persistent repression of religion in China under the Communist regime, there are no statistics available beyond the fact that there are in the 1990s twenty archdioceses, ninety-two dioceses, and twenty-nine prefectures apostolic (missionary territories that have not yet been made dioceses with their own bishops). In 1949, the year of the Communist takeover, there were between 3.5 million and 4 million Catholics, mostly in major cities such as Shanghai, or only about 0.7 percent of the total population of just over one billion. See also Chinese rites controversy; Ricci, Matteo.

Bibliography

Latourette, Kenneth Scott. A History of Christian Missions in China. New York: Russell and Russell, 1967.

Myers, James T. Enemies Without Guns: The Catholic Church in the People's Republic of China. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

———. Forces for Change in Contemporary China. Columbia, SC: University of South Carolina Press, 1993.

Tang, Edmond, and Jean-Paul Wiest, eds. The Catholic Church in Modern China. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1993.

EDWARD J. MALATESTA

Chinese rites controversy, a bitterly fought argument in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries over the legitimacy of several accommodations of Catholic teaching to Chinese culture. In the sixteenth century Western missionaries operating under Portuguese patronage arrived in the open port of Macao, but it was not until 1583 that the Ming dynasty reversed its long-standing ban on foreign clergy, allowing some Jesuits to enter the country. The leader of this mission, the humanist Matteo Ricci, finally managed to establish himself in Beijing in 1601.

The policies Ricci established for his fellow Jesuits allowed new converts to continue practicing certain Confucian and ancestral rites that pervaded the major sectors of Chinese society: the family, the schools, and the government. The basic Confucian virtue of filial piety dictated that all serve their ancestors "in death as they did in life"; at regular intervals a family performed a ritual reverence (kowtow) and offered sacrifices before the home shrines commemorating their deceased. The periodic rites of the scholarly class in honor of Confucius were similar in nature, but the canonical status of his writings in the Chinese schools and government bureaucracy had gradually elevated these ceremonies to the level of a state cult. Ricci's position was based on the judgment that these rituals were not idolatrous, but essentially civil and social in nature. Related to the issue of rites was a terminological question: Ricci believed it legitimate to use the terms of the Chinese sacred writings, Tien (heaven) and Shangti (Supreme Lord), to convey the Christian concept of God.

Problems arose when Spanish missionaries, chiefly Dominicans and Franciscans, arrived from the Philippines in the 1630s. They were appalled by what they saw as religious syncretism and made clear to their own converts their opposition to these accommodations. The result was a prolonged and acrimonious controversy that eventually involved two congregations of the Roman Curia, the major religious orders, and the courts of China and the European powers.

An initial denunciation of the Jesuit methods to Rome resulted in a largely negative verdict on the rites by the Holy Office in 1645, but a Jesuit appeal clarifying the rationale of their practices led to a more nuanced decision in 1656. Furthermore, an instruction from the Vatican bureau Propaganda Fidei (Propagation of the Faith) three years later seemed to be quite open to accommodations. Divergent reactions to these decrees by missionaries led to papal clarifications in 1704 and 1715 that were largely negative regarding the legitimacy of the rites because of their alleged "superstitious character." Because missionaries continued to circumvent these restrictions, a definitive statement proscribing the rites was issued by Benedict XIV in 1742; all missionaries would have to take an oath to observe it.

Some historians attribute the decline of the Chinese mission in the eighteenth century to these negative decisions, although the reasons for this were certainly more complex. The issue was finally reopened in the twentieth century; in 1939 Pius XII declared that the Confucian and ancestral rituals were essentially social in nature and therefore "licit and commendable" practices. See also China, Catholicism in; Ricci, Matteo. DOMINIC MONTI

chirotony (kee-rah'toh-nee). See cheirotonia.

choice, moral, that component of a complete human act bearing on the election of a possible means to a desired end. In the concrete pursuit of any end perceived and judged by the acting person to be both good and attainable (e.g., health), a plurality of means to that end naturally presents itself (e.g., diet, exercise, medicine), upon and between which a person must deliberate and eventually choose. Catholic moral philosophy, deeply influenced by Thomas Aquinas (cf. Summa Theologiae 1–2.13), has traditionally held the act of choice to be both free and responsible. Morally right choice is ultimately dependent upon the knowledge of those ends that are truly good for the human person.

choir, a group within the liturgical assembly especially entrusted with the ministry of song. The choir emerges out of the schola cantorum (Lat., "school of singers") of the Middle Ages. Modern choirs owe their existence both to nineteenth-century English Protestant efforts to reinvigorate sung liturgy and, in Catholic circles, to the efforts of the Solesmes movement, a revival of liturgical music centered in a French Benedictine monastery during the same period. The term also refers to that portion of the church where clergy are seated during liturgical rites. To be seated "in choir" is to be arranged in two groups that face each other across the central aisle of a church.

chorbishop (Gk., chorepiskopos, "country bishop"), known in the East after the second century and in the West from the sixth, a bishop who assisted the local bishop by ministering to the needs of communities in the countryside surrounding the diocesan seat. Though chorbishops had faculties and privileges not shared by ordinary presbyters and could vote in synods, they could not ordain presbyters or deacons, and it does not seem that they had formal episcopal jurisdictions. The order died out in the twelfth century except as an honorific title but is still conferred today on leading presbyters in the West Syrian and Maronite churches. See also bishop.

Chorniak, Orestes, 1883–1977, Hungarian-born Ruthenian Catholic priest and early supporter of the Ruthenian Catholic hierarchy in the United States. He left the Catholic Church in 1937 in protest at the Vatican-decreed compulsory celibacy for the Ruthenian American clergy. He joined the newly formed Carpatho-Russian Greek Catholic Diocese of the Eastern Rite of the U.S.A. and was consecrated its first bishop by the patriarch of Constantinople.

chrism (kriz'uhm; Gk., chrisma, "anointing"), the oil of olives mixed with perfume. Chrism is blessed by the bishop every year at the Chrism Mass, which usually takes place on Holy Thursday, although it may be celebrated at some other convenient time during Holy Week. Chrism is used in the postbaptismal anointing, Confirmation, priestly and episcopal ordinations, and during the dedication of churches and altars. Long treated with great reverence by the Church, chrism is often reserved in a special place in the church sanctuary with the oil of the sick and the oil of catechumens. The strengthening effect and fragrance of the oil reflect the presence of the Holy Spirit when one is anointed with it. Chrism has also been associated with the coronation of kings. Its symbolism is both royal and priestly. Chrism traditionally was made from the oil of the olive, but in the 1990s vegetable, seed, or coconut oil may be used. See also holy oils.

Chrism Mass. See chrism.

chrismal (kriz'muhl; Gk., chrisma, "anointing"), the small cylindrical metal jar in which holy oils are kept. These oils, which are used in the conferring of sacraments, are the oil of catechumens, oil of the sick, and chrism. Formerly, the term "chrismal" was used variously to designate a cloth wrapped around relics, the wax-soaked linen cloth used on a newly consecrated altar, a type of pyx (a receptacle for carrying Holy Communion to the sick), and the white robe of the newly baptized. See also chrism; holy oils.

chrismation (kriz-may'shuhn; Gk., chrisma, "anointing"), anointing with the holy oil of chrism. Although "chrismation" can be used to mean any anointing, the term is used liturgically to refer to the Eastern church rite that is related to the Western sacrament of Confirmation. See also chrism; Confirmation; holy oils.

Christ (Gk., christos, "the anointed one"), equivalent of the Hebrew title "messiah." Upon ascending the throne, an Israelite king was anointed with oil by a high priest or prophet (1 Sam 10:1; 16:13; 3 Kgs 1:39), and afterward he was called the anointed one, the messiah (1 Sam 24:7, 11; 26:9, 11, 16, 23). After the Babylonian exile, priests, too, were anointed (Exod 29:7; Lev 8:12). During the two centuries before Jesus of Nazareth, at least some Jews began to expect the imminent arrival of a divine kingly figure (Dan 7:13; 1 Enoch 37–71). According to the Gospels, Jesus' disciples acknowledged him as "the Christ," "the anointed one" (Mark 8:29; Acts 5:42; 9:22). Among Jesus' followers, this use of "Christ" as a title soon shifted, however, so that "Christ" became a proper name for Jesus (Gal 1:6; Heb 9:11). Jesus was then referred to as "the Christ" (Rom 5:6), "Christ Jesus" (Acts 24:24), and "Jesus Christ" (Mark 1:1). In the years after the death and Resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth, some Jews acknowledged other individuals as the messiah (e.g., Bar Kochba, who led an insurrection and died in 135). See also Christology; Jesus Christ.

christening, term used for the rite of baptism. It emphasizes the fact that, by the rite of baptism, one becomes a Christian and is given a name that is publicly proclaimed to the community. In adult initiation, the giving of the name takes place at the Rite of Acceptance into the Order of Catechumens. See also Baptism.

Christian (Gk., christos, "the anointed one"; Lat., -ianus, "belonging to"), follower of Christ. Initially, after Jesus' death and Resurrection, his followers called themselves the "brethren" (Acts 1:16), "disciples" (Acts 11:26), "believers" (Acts 2:44), and "those of the Way." But within ten years or so, the name "Christian" was applied to the disciples by people who did not belong to their communities. The use of this name apparently began at Antioch of Syria in approximately A.D. 40 (Acts 11:26; cf. 26:28). Having heard the disciples speak about Christ, nonbelievers may have mistaken the title "Christ" for a name. Adding the hellenized Latin suffix -ianus to "Christ," outsiders spoke of the "Christians," a name parallel to such names as the "Caesarians," i.e., those loyal to Caesar, and the "Herodians," i.e., the supporters of Herod (cf. Mark 12:13). By the time of Nero's persecutions (A.D. 64), this name was Rome's official name for Jesus' followers (Tacitus Annals 15.44). In the situation of martyrdom, believers took pride in being seen as followers of Jesus (Luke 21:12). 1 Peter (late first century) encourages the community to be ready to suffer "as a Christian" (1 Pet 4:16). Also, in his letter to the emperor Trajan regarding the Christians (A.D. 112), Pliny the Younger asks whether Jesus' followers should be punished "for the name," that is, simply because they refuse to deny that they are Christians. Prior to his martyrdom, Ignatius of Antioch (d. ca. 107) wrote that he wanted not only to be called "Christian" but also found to be one (Ign. Rom. 3.2). As the use of the name "Christian" became more widespread, non-Christians became confused about its origin, mistaking its root for the Greek word for "good," chrestos, and, as a result, they referred to Jesus' followers as Chrestiani, "those belonging to the good one." ROBERT A. KRIEG

Christian Brothers. See Brothers of the Christian Schools.

Christian Democratic parties, a worldwide political movement with representation in sixty-six countries on five continents. These parties stem from the revolutionary upheavals of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries and have deep roots in Catholic social teaching. Born in an effort to defend believers' social and political rights, to combat secularism, and to give Catholics a political voice, Christian Democratic parties today have all but severed their formal relations with the Vatican. West Germany's Christian Democratic Union, for example, is nondenominational with a sizeable Protestant membership. Although most numerous in Europe and Latin America, Christian Democratic parties exist in Africa and Asia as well. See also Church and state.

Christian Family Movement (CFM), a lay couples' social action movement that uses Belgian cardinal Joseph Cardijn's (d. 1967) "observe-judge-act" method of Catholic Action, which he incorporated into the Young Christian Workers organization he founded in 1925. CFM attempts to transform the family environment, thereby making family life easier. The basic unit of CFM is the cell, which is made up of six couples who meet regularly to observe their environment, judge whether or not what they observed is in accordance with the Gospel message of Jesus, and act to lessen the distance between reality and the Gospel ideal. Special emphasis is placed on action; groups are not mere study clubs. Like other Cardijn-inspired groups, CFM is a "like to like" apostolate, which in CFM's case means family ministering to family.

CFM grew out of a number of Catholic Action groups operating in the mid-1940s in Chicago, New York, South Bend, and Milwaukee. In 1949, a national organization was formed, with Chicago chosen as CFM headquarters. The first executive couple was Pat and Patty Crowley, whose charismatic leadership so dominated the movement that they came to be known as Mr. and Mrs. CFM. The same year, CFM published its basic guide for establishing a CFM cell, For Happier Families. Each year the national office published an inquiry booklet which examined a specific topic that local groups were to adapt to their own needs. An annual convention was held at the University of Notre Dame. The movement enjoyed remarkable success during the 1950s, peaking in 1963. CFM declined during the 1960s, but continues to exist, enjoying renewed success among Spanish-speaking groups in the Movimiento Familiar Cristiano (MFC). CFM has been very influential in promoting other family movements, most notably Cana Conferences and Marriage Encounter. See also family.

JEFFREY M. BURNS

Christian initiation, the various stages and periods that constitute the full and paradigmatic form for becoming a member of the Christian community. This communal process has a twofold goal: personal commitment to Christ in a way of life based on the gospel, and integration into the ecclesial community.

The process consists of four periods of formation: the precatechumenate, the catechumenate, the period of enlightenment and purification, and mystagogia. Movement from one period to the next is marked by a liturgical rite. These rites are Acceptance into the Order of Catechumens, Enrollment of Names, and Celebration of Initiation, respectively. See also Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults.

Christian Life Communities. See sodality.

Christmas, solemnity of the liturgical year celebrated on December 25 to commemorate the incarnation of the divine Word at the birth of Jesus Christ. Christmas is second in importance only to the annual celebration of Easter. Christmas has three proper Masses: at midnight, dawn, and during the day. The single-day solemnity spills over to an octave, which extends eight days after Christmas to January 1, the Solemnity of Mary, Mother of God. The Sunday within the octave is the Feast of the Holy Family. The Christmas season or cycle begins with Evening Prayer I or First Vespers of December 24 and the evening vigil Mass and concludes on the Sunday after Epiphany, the Feast of the Baptism of the Lord. The Christmas season is preceded by a four-week period of vigil and preparation known as Advent, which begins on the fourth Sunday before December 25.

Although the actual day of Christ's birth is not known, the date for its celebration was designated as December 25 by the early fourth century in Rome and celebrated liturgically as such. One hypothesis for the introduction of a Roman feast of Christ's birth on that date suggests that December 25 was celebrated as the birthday of the invincible or unconquered sun god (Lat., dies natalis Solis Invicti), which Emperor Aurelian established in 274 in honor of the Syrian sun god. To counter worship of the pagan god in favor of Christ, the true "sun of justice," the church of Rome located the feast of Christ's birth on that same day.

Another hypothesis locates the origin of Christmas at a time when the cult of the sun was particularly strong in Rome and Christ-as-sun symbolism was deeply rooted in the Christian consciousness. Third-century theologians who were trying to calculate the date of Christ's birth, with no help from Scripture, turned their attention to the equinoxes and solstices. Popular opinion held that John the Baptist was conceived on the autumn equinox and born on the summer solstice on June 24. Since Luke 1:26 states that Christ was conceived six months after John, he must have been conceived at the spring equinox on March 25 and born nine months later on December 25. Whatever the historical inspiration, the old pagan feast provided a convenient day to celebrate the birth of Christ. December 25 was in place in the West by the fourth century for the Solemnity of the Incarnation. In the East, January 6 was celebrated as the Solemnity of the Epiphany (manifestation) and focused on both the nativity and baptism of the Lord. The focus of this feast in the West was the visit of the Magi. See also Incarnation, the.

DANIEL P. GRIGASSY

Christocentric ("Christ-centered"), the tendency to direct one's faith, prayer, and theology primarily toward the person and work of Jesus Christ, in distinction from a theocentric tendency (e.g., focused on the triune God) or an anthropocentric tendency (e.g., centered on the presence and action of grace in human life). See also Christology.

Christology (Gk., christos, "anointed one"; logos, "word about"), critical theological reflection upon the Christian confession that Jesus of Nazareth is the Christ (Mark 8:29; Acts 2:26; 10:36; Col 2:6). It answers the questions: Who was/is Jesus? Why was/is he believed to be the anointed one, the Messiah? What did/does he bring about for the eternal well-being, the salvation, of human beings? In what sense can he be said to be the savior of all people?

Christology has developed in the Church as a result of both internal factors (e.g., the demands of intellectual integrity, confessional disagreements, heretical movements) and also external factors (e.g., dialogue with Jewish belief and exchanges with other religions). These factors have challenged Christians to articulate for themselves and for others an understanding of their belief in Jesus Christ, especially as this belief is conveyed in Scripture, creeds, and conciliar formulations.

In the first centuries of the Church, this endeavor was taken up by such individuals as Athanasius, Cyril of Alexandria, and Pope Leo the Great, as well as by the councils of Constantinople (381), Ephesus (431), and Chalcedon (451). In the Middle Ages, questions about the identity and mission of Jesus Christ were treated by such scholars as Anselm, Abelard, and Thomas Aquinas within a systematic or ordered form. As these considerations were refined within Scholasticism, a distinction was made between questions about the "person" of Jesus Christ and questions about the "work" of Jesus Christ. The former topic was called Christology in the narrow sense, and the latter was termed soteriology. Within this framework, it can be said that the great Protestant Reformers (e.g., Martin Luther and John Calvin) contributed primarily to soteriology, for they provided new interpretations of what Jesus Christ has done for humankind.

Since the Enlightenment the conceptual framework in which Christians critically reflect on their belief in Jesus Christ is no longer that of Scholasticism (or neo-Scholasticism) but a mode of thought influenced by the turn to the knowing subject and the rise of historical consciousness (with the fashioning of historical-critical methods of investigation). Within this perspective, one no longer draws a sharp distinction between Christology and soteriology, since this division is seen as artificially separating who Christ was/is from what he did/does. A distinction is, however, drawn today between functional Christology and ontological (or classical) Christology. The former concentrates on Jesus' aims and message and also what he brought about through his life, death, and Resurrection, and the latter focuses on Jesus' identity in ontological or metaphysical terms, especially as seen in the light of his Resurrection.

Other current distinctions should be noted. One occurs between "high" Christology and "low" Christology, that is, between a Christology that stresses the divinity of Jesus Christ and a Christology that highlights his humanity. Moreover, another distinction is made between two approaches to reflecting upon the mystery of Jesus Christ. A Christology "from below," or an "ascending" Christology, begins with the humanity of Jesus Christ and/or a historical reconstruction of Jesus' message, ministry, and destiny and then proceeds to consider Jesus' Resurrection and relationship with God. A Christology "from above," or a "descending" Christology, starts with an understanding of the triune God and the mystery of God's self-disclosure within creation and history and then moves to reflection upon God's entering into history in Jesus Christ (the Incarnation), his ministry, and his suffering, death, and Resurrection.

To explore the mystery of Jesus Christ from various vantage points, there has recently emerged an interest, especially among feminist theologians, in recovering Spirit Christology, which had a place in the reflections of the early Church. The Spirit of the risen Christ was poured out on all who believe, women as well as men, thereby breaking down all artificial divisions between people. This type of Christology is meant to complement the Logos Christology that has predominated in the West since Augustine. This Christology emphasized the divinity of Christ (the pre-existent Word of God who became flesh). See also Jesus Christ. ROBERT A. KRIEG

Christopher, St., patron saint of travelers. His birth and death dates are unknown. According to the Roman martyrology, while sent to bear travelers across a river, he nearly drowned carrying a child who turned out to be Jesus Christ. Christopher then went to Lycia to convert unbelievers and comfort those facing martyrdom for the faith. A Roman emperor, Decius (d. 251), tried to burn Christopher at the stake, but Christopher survived the flames unscathed, which perhaps led to the popular belief that looking upon an image of Christopher would protect one from harm that day. Christopher was eventually martyred by beheading. He is invoked against water, tempests, and plagues. Given the dubiousness of his existence, his feast day is no longer observed.

Christophers, apostolic movement founded by Father James Keller in 1945. Their motto, "Be not overcome by evil, but overcome evil with good," expresses their desire to encourage each person, through daily activities, to bring Christ's love and truth to the world. One does not become a "member," and there are no meetings or dues. Instead, followers take on personal responsibility at a practical level to bring the message of Christ to all areas of literature, government, entertainment, and business. The Christophers use many forms of media, including print, radio, and television, to bring their message to the world. Prestigious Christopher Awards are conferred annually on authors, film and television producers, and others who further sound moral principles through various communications media.

Christ the King, Feast of, celebration of Christ's kingship on the last Sunday of Ordinary Time. Instituted in 1925 by Pope Pius XI to counteract atheism and secularism, this feast may be termed an "idea feast" because it celebrates no specific event in salvation history, but rather honors Christ's sovereignty over all persons, families, nations, and the whole universe. In particular, the feast affirms the messianic kingship of Christ, who redeemed humanity by the blood of the Cross. This feast duplicates the original kingship feast, the Ascension, which celebrates Jesus' exaltation and crowning with heavenly glory. The last Sunday of Ordinary Time was chosen to highlight the feast's eschatological thrust. See also kingship of Christ.

Christus Dominus (krees'toos doh'mee-nuhs). See Decree on the Bishops' Pastoral Office in the Church.

Chrodegang, St., ca. 715–66, archbishop of Metz. Chief minister of Charles Martel, Chrodegang continued St. Boniface's reforms of the Frankish church after his appointment as bishop of Metz (742). Promoted to archbishop, he wrote a rule for the common life of the diocesan clergy that was influential in the later reforms of the pastoral life of diocesan priests. Feast day: March 6. See also Boniface, St.; Charles Martel.

Chromatius, St. (kroh-may'ztee-uhs), d. 407, bishop of the north Italian city of Aquileia from 387 to 407. As a member of an ascetic community that included his mother, brother, and sisters, Chromatius lived in Aquileia as a presbyter (priest) when Rufinus and then Jerome lived there (368–73). While still a presbyter, Chromatius participated in the anti-Arian Council of Aquileia (381). Feast day: December 2. See also Aquileia, Council of.

chronology, biblical. See biblical chronology.

Chrysologus, St. Peter (kris-ahl'loh-guhs), ca. 406–50, bishop of Ravenna and Doctor of the Church. He was a famous preacher; his extant sermons are the basis for his title of Doctor of the Church. Feast day: July 30.

Chrysostom, St. John, ca. 349–407, patriarch of Constantinople, and Father and Doctor of the Church. The surname "Chrysostom" (Gk., "golden mouth") was given to him in the sixth century, and has largely supplanted his given name.

His early life combined classical learning and Christian asceticism: a student of philosophy and rhetoric, he also spent six ascetic years upon the mountains. Ill health brought him back to Antioch where he assumed pastoral duties. Ordained deacon in 381 and priest in 386, he served as preacher in the principal church of the city until 397. Most of his surviving literary work dates from this period.

John Chrysostom, the most prolific of the Fathers of the Church and patron saint of preachers; giving money to the poor; painting by Mattia Preti, National Museum, Valletta, Malta.

In 397 John was chosen to succeed Nectarius as bishop of Constantinople. Although initially popular, his sweeping program of reforms quickly antagonized his episcopal colleagues, local monastic leaders, the new aristocracy, and the imperial family. After 399, he was swept up into the Origenist controversy, which allowed his enemies to attack him. In June 403, Theophilus of Alexandria convened the Synod of the Oak, which condemned Chrysostom on twenty-nine charges. The emperor Arcadius ratified the decision and exiled him to Bithynia, but popular riots caused his immediate recall. Two months later, however, he was again exiled, first to Cucusus in Lesser Armenia and then to the remote village of Pityus. Compelled by his guards to march in ill health under the hot sun, John Chrysostom died on September 14, 407.

In 438, Theodosius II brought Chrysostom's body back to Constantinople, where it remained until 1204 when the Venetians sacked the city and sent his relics to Rome. The choir chapel of Saint Peter's now houses his grave.

The most prolific of the Fathers, Chrysostom has left us ascetical, apologetic, and polemical treatises as well as letters. His place as Doctor of the Church is owed not to works of speculative theology but to explication of Scripture, which followed the historico-grammatical method of the school of Antioch. An admired stylist, he wrote homilies that often stirred his congregation to tears and applause. He is the patron saint of preachers. Feast day: January 27. BLAKE LEYERLE

Church (Gk., kyriakon, "belonging to the Lord"; ekklesia, "assembly"), the Christian community, also known as the Body of Christ, the People of God, and the Temple of the Holy Spirit. In its earliest phase the young Christian community did not view itself as distinct from Judaism. Upon the admission of Gentiles to the company of disciples, however, a sharp distinction between Church and Judaism did emerge.

The Church and the Churches in the New Testament: The Church of the NT was diverse and pluralistic in character. Indeed, the word "church" applied to the great Church, or Church universal, and to local churches alike. Thus, there were at least three kinds of post-Pauline communities: those reflected in the pastoral letters (1 Timothy, 2 Timothy, and Titus), with their emphasis on teaching, structures, pastoral care, and apostolic succession; those reflected in Ephesians and Colossians, with their emphasis on the Church as the body and bride of Christ as well as his fullness (Gk., pleroma); and those reflected in Luke-Acts, which stresses both the institutional and the charismatic aspects of the Church, but with particular emphasis on the role of the Holy Spirit. There were also two forms of Johannine communities, both emphasizing the equality of disciples living in community under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. There was also a community related to 1 Peter, heavily influenced by Jewish symbolism, which perceived itself as the new Israel and the new People of God. The community of Matthew, a mixture of Jews and Gentiles, revered both Mosaic law and Peter. A strongly Jewish community associated with the Letter of James practiced works of piety on behalf of widows and orphans. And there were still other communities identified with Mark, Hebrews, and Revelation, as well as those connected with non-NT writings, such as the Didache, 1 Clement, and the letters of Ignatius of Antioch.

There were differences also by reason of place. Thus, the mother church in Jerusalem was marked by vigorous apostolic activity, supported by healings and miracles, the sharing of goods among the members, and a rich liturgical and prayer life, both in the Temple and in the private homes. This community maintained its close links with Judaism, especially through its strong attachment to the Temple and its continuation of Jewish practices. There were disputes between Jewish and Greek members over the care of widows (Acts 6:1–6) and there was the great debate over the need for circumcision and the observance of Jewish dietary laws (15:1–31).

The church at Antioch was a mixed group of people: former Jews and former pagans ("Greeks") alike. It was a model of harmony between them (Gal 2:1–14). Here for the first time the followers of Jesus Christ were called Christians. They held regular meetings at which large congregations were "instructed" (Acts 11:26). Prophets and teachers were active (13:1–3) and the gifts of the Spirit were evident (11:27; 15:32).

The church at Corinth was predominantly pagan in origin, charismatic in structure (1 Cor 1:5–7; 12:8–11), and marked by human weaknesses, particularly of a sexual kind (1 Cor 5; 6:12–20). The charismatics often created confusion (1 Cor 14), serious disorders erupted at the Eucharist because of the behavior of the rich (11:20–34), and partisan groups attached themselves to individual missionaries (1:11; 3:4–5, 22). On the other hand, there was vigorous apostolic preaching and instruction (2 Cor 3:4–4:6), and worship was at the center of its life (1 Cor 11:17–34), especially Baptism and Eucharist (1:13–16; 6:11; 10:1–11, 16–22). It was a church conscious of its communal bond with other local churches and in particular with the church of Jerusalem, for which the great collection was taken up (1:2; 7:17; 11:16; 16:1, 19; 2 Cor 1:1; 8:24; 12:13; 13:12).

Despite these local differences, certain common elements existed: faith in Jesus as Messiah and Lord, the practice of Baptism and the celebration of the Eucharist, the apostolic preaching and instruction, the practice of communal love, and the expectation of the coming reign of God. There was freedom in all other matters.

The Church located itself between the coming of the kingdom, or reign, of God in Jesus Christ and its full realization at the end of history. Its mission "between the times" is to proclaim, celebrate, signify, and serve the coming reign of God: kerygma (Gk., "message"), leitourgia ("liturgy," "public work"), marturia ("witness"), and diakonia ("service").

The Postbiblical Church: As the Church spread through the Roman Empire, it adapted itself to contemporary social and political structures. By the latter half of the second century there were synods and councils and the emergence of the monarchical episcopate (one bishop governing each diocese). The self-understanding of the Church (ecclesiology) was developed in response to various crises and heresies. Over against Gnosticism, Novatianism, and Donatism, the Fathers taught that the Church is the unique sphere of the Holy Spirit and that the truth of its faith and preaching is guaranteed by apostolic succession centered on the Church of Rome (Irenaeus); that orthodoxy alone is an insufficient basis of unity with the one Church and that true unity requires unity with the bishops (Cyprian); that the holiness of the Church is derived from God, not from the members, that schism is diametrically opposed to the reality of the Church as a community of love, that the Church is a mixed community of good and bad alike, and that there is a distinction between the invisible Church, those who truly belong to Christ, and the visible Church, those who belong outwardly to Christ (Augustine).

From the Middle Ages through the nineteenth century the emphasis shifted to the Church's governing structures and jurisdiction. The Church's self-understanding in this period was shaped in large part by its reaction against the challenges to papal authority raised by lay investiture, conciliarism, the Reformation, and Gallicanism and other national movements. An exaggerated notion of papal authority bordering on absolutism emerged.

A new ecclesiology appeared in the twentieth century under the impact of the liturgical, biblical, and ecumenical movements, culminating in the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). For the council the Church is a mystery, or sacrament ("a reality imbued with the hidden presence of God" [Pope Paul VI]), the People of God, a servant community, an ecumenical community, a collegial community, and an eschatological community. And it has but a single intention: that the reign of God may come (Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, n. 45)—a reign of justice and peace as well as of holiness and grace (n. 39). See also Catholic Church.

Bibliography

Cwiekowski, Frederick J. The Beginnings of the Church. New York: Paulist Press, 1988.

Dulles, Avery. Models of the Church. New York: Doubleday, Image Books, 1978, revised edition, 1987.

Küng, Hans. The Church. Translated by Ray and Rosaleen Ockenden. New York: Sheed & Ward, 1967. RICHARD P. MCBRIEN church, domestic. See domestic church.

Church and state. The need for the Catholic Church to develop a body of principles to order its relationship with civil political authority arose in the earliest days of its history. NT texts testify to the fact that the leadership of the ecclesial community and its members felt the need for guidance in determining how to evaluate the role of the civil power and how to direct Christian life in relationship to the demands of political authorities. In broad outline it is possible to distinguish the following major stages of development of Church-state teaching: the Church and the Roman Empire; the Church in the medieval Christian republic (Respublica Christiana); the Church confronting the post-Reformation nation-state; the Church and nineteenth-century liberalism; and twentieth-century Catholic teaching before and after Vatican II (1962–65).

The end product of this evolutionary development is the teaching of Vatican II on Church-state relations, found principally in Dignitatis Humanae

(the Declaration on Religious Freedom). The conciliar text both draws from the history and constitutes a development beyond the history.

Historical Development: The Church's encounter with the Roman Empire produced a basic principle that has sustained the Catholic tradition since then. The principle affirms that all human authority is rooted in God, but that God has entrusted temporal authority to the state and spiritual authority to the Church. The classical formulation of the principle is found in Pope Gelasius I's letter to the emperor Anastasius in 492. From the fifth century on "the Gelasian dyarchy" is central to Catholic political thought.

While the structure of the Gelasian principle is clear—two kinds of authority, each distinct in its own realm but expected to collaborate for the human and spiritual welfare of people—the history of Church-state relations manifests a continuing struggle for primacy by one power or the other. The medieval contribution to this normative doctrine is found in two sources. Pope Gregory VII (d. 1085), a reforming pope often in conflict with temporal rulers, affirmed the principle of the freedom of the Church as the basic guideline for Church-state relations. John of Paris, a thirteenth-century theologian (d. 1306), played a crucial role in the development of Catholic theory. On one hand, he resisted some of the canon lawyers who argued that all authority was entrusted to the Church, which then granted temporal authority to the state. On the other hand, John affirmed the primacy of the spiritual power in cases of conflict between Church and state. By the end of the Middle Ages, the Gelasian dyarchy, the freedom of the Church, and the primacy of the spiritual principle were the three lasting ideas in Catholic teaching.

The collapse of the Respublica Christiana (the medieval Christian republic), the rise of the nation-state, and the consequences of the Reformation shattered the framework within which Church-state theology had been articulated for a thousand years. In addition, the Peace of Augsburg (1555) established the principle cuius regio, eius religio, i.e., the religion of the prince is the religion of the place. The Treaty of Westphalia (1648) ending the Thirty Years' War accepted the principle in formulating the terms of peace. From this principle of the unitary religious state, territorial settlements based on Catholic or Protestant states took shape in Europe. Although the principle was secular in origin, Catholic theology developed along parallel lines; in states where Catholics were the majority, it called for the legal establishment of the Catholic Church and legal restraints on the public manifestation of other religious communities. In this situation of legal establishment and legal intolerance, non-Catholics were not to be coerced to accept the faith and they were permitted to profess and follow their faith privately; what was prohibited were public manifestations of faith and any effort to spread a faith other than Catholicism. Undergirding the entire structure of state religion was the concept that "error has no rights," i.e., wrong doctrine has no right to be publicly acknowledged or legally protected.

The post-Reformation position found expression at Vatican I (1869–70) in the "thesis/hypothesis" formula. The thesis, i.e., that which should prevail, was the institution of legal establishment and legal intolerance. The hypothesis designated situations that the Church would "tolerate" because the achievement of the thesis was either impossible or disruptive of public life in society. The thesis/hypothesis approach was in possession in Catholic teaching until the Second Vatican Council displaced it. The persistence of this conclusion was remarkable because the premises of the teaching were being recast, beginning with Pope Leo XIII (d. 1903) and continuing through the pontificate of John XXIII (d. 1963). Vatican II confirmed the change and promulgated it as Catholic teaching on Church and state. The development of the teaching was effected at two levels: first, through incremental changes made in papal teaching by Leo XIII and Pius XII; second, through the broader and deeper critique of Catholic teaching carried forward by theologians, principally the American Jesuit John Courtney Murray (d. 1967), but also including European theologians like Yves Congar, Pietro Pavan, and Jacques Leclercq. The following survey relies heavily on Murray's work.

Leo XIII opened the Church-state question to development even though he held fast to the thesis/hypothesis conclusion. His contribution was to restore the Gelasian perspective even while recasting its content. In the medieval framework the spiritual and temporal powers were both part of a single society. Leo XIII recognized that the collapse of medieval society meant that the contemporary formulation of the Gelasian principle had to be made in terms of two societies, each with its own authority and law. This move then led to Leo XIII's second contribution: he placed the citizen at the intersection of the two societies, spiritual and temporal, and argued that the authorities of Church and state had a duty to collaborate lest the citizen be confronted by conflicting claims on his or her conscience.

Leo XIII opened a path for change in the teaching, but did not change it. Pius XII came closer to changing both the premises and the thesis/hypothesis conclusion, but stopped just short of the latter. He did, however, move the argument beyond Leo XIII's formulation in three ways. First, in his Christmas addresses, Pius XII shaped a more expansive theory of human rights than one could find in Leo XIII's pronouncements; particularly as he specified rights of the political-civil order, he opened the way for a right to religious liberty. Second, Pius XII had a more activist conception of the citizen's role in society; the citizen was not only the reason for Church-state cooperation, the citizen was to be the architect of the collaborative relationship. Third, in a distinct departure from Leo XIII, Pius XII set limits to the role of the state in society; a century of experience with various forms of totalitarian rule brought Catholic teaching to a greater appreciation of the need for constitutional restraint on the modern state. The cumulative effect of these three changes was sufficient to produce a change in the thesis/hypothesis conclusion. Pius XII advanced to the threshold of such a change in a 1953 address Ci Riese, but he never took the final step.

John XXIII made the change; without extensive argument or even acknowledgment of the significance of his statement he simply affirmed in Pacem in Terris (1963) the right of the person "to practice his religion privately and publicly."

Vatican II: It remained for the Second Vatican Council, in the Declaration on Religious Freedom and the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, to set forth the new state of the question in Catholic teaching on Church and state. The elements of the position are the following: (1) the role of the Church in the political order is to defend the dignity of the human person; (2) every person has the right to religious freedom: no one is to be coerced to believe and no one is to be prohibited from expressing his or her belief personally or socially, as long as the demands of just public order are met; (3) the Church endorses the idea of a constitutional state, one limited by law; (4) the state is responsible for public order in society; the whole society is responsible for the common good; (5) the basic principle that should govern Church-state relations is the freedom of the Church. The combined effect of these principles is that the thesis/hypothesis formula has been displaced, the Gelasian dyarchy has been reaffirmed, and the Church has made a clear, unequivocal statement in principle affirming the right of every person to religious liberty.

The Teaching of John Paul II: John Paul II has made extensive use of and built upon the two Church-state texts of Vatican II. He has developed his teaching in tandem with a vigorous pastoral-diplomatic style of leadership. This double impact on Church-state relations, as a teacher and a diplomatic actor, is the background in light of which three themes can be summarized. First, the pope's repeated support for the right to religious liberty; John Paul II describes religious freedom as "the source and synthesis" of other human rights (Centesimus Annus, n. 47). From Pius XII to John Paul II there has been a profound shift in Catholic teaching; Pius XII never clearly affirmed the right at all, but it has become a hallmark of John Paul II's social teaching.

A second theme is the pope's vigorous support for democracy. On this subject John Paul II is building upon the work of Pius XII's Christmas addresses and John XXIII's Pacem in Terris. On one hand, he places the Church solidly behind the political institutions of democracy. On the other hand, John Paul II fears that some believe democracy must be founded on "agnosticism and skeptical relativism" (Centesimus Annus, n. 46). In his support for democracy, he ties it directly to the need for an objective order of moral truth.

Finally, John Paul II's support for democracy and the constitutional state does not mean he endorses a minimalist role for the state in society. Particularly in the economic order, he seeks to balance the principle of subsidiarity—which restrains state initiatives—with specific responsibilities the state retains in the service of human rights.

Catholic teaching on Church and state undoubtedly will continue to develop; as it does so the remarkable advances made in the period from Leo XIII through John Paul II will be seen as a time of profound change and rich insight. See also Americanism; Declaration on Religious Freedom; Gelasius I, St.; Gregory VII, St.; John of Paris; Murray, John Courtney; Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World.

Bibliography

Keogh, D. "Church and State." In Modern Catholicism: Vatican II and After, edited by A. Hastings. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991. Pp. 289–302.

Murray, J. C. "The Problem of Religious Freedom." Theological Studies 25 (1964): 503–75.

_____. "The Issue of Church and State at Vatican II." Theological Studies 27 (1966): 580–606.

Tierney, B. The Crisis of Church and State 1050–1300. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1964.

Williams, G. H. The Contours of Church and State in the Thought of John Paul II. Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 1983.

J. BRYAN HEHIR

Church councils. See ecumenical council.

churching of women, devotional practice of blessing women following childbirth. Known from the Middle Ages to the nineteenth century as the purification of women, it has roots in the OT practice of ritualistic purification after childbirth (Lev 12:1–8). The modern rite, found in the Book of Blessings, is not mandatory and contains no reference to childbirth as unclean. The blessing after childbirth, as it is now called, is not given, however, when the child is illegitimate. The rite includes a reading from Scripture, a psalm, a prayer of thanksgiving, and a prayer of blessing. See also women in the Church.

CHURCHING OF WOMEN
PRAYER OF BLESSING

"O God, author and sustainer of human life, from your goodness your servant [name] has received the joy of becoming a mother. Graciously accept our thanks and give ear to our prayers: defend this mother and child from every evil, be their companion along their pathway through life, and welcome them one day into the joys of your eternal home."

Church Militant, in the doctrine of the communion of saints the spiritual union that Christians have with one another on earth, as distinct from the spiritual union of Christians in purgatory (Church Suffering) and in heaven (Church Triumphant). The modern term, employed by the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), is pilgrim Church. See also communion of saints.

Church Suffering, in the doctrine of the communion of saints the spiritual union that Christians have with one another in purgatory, as distinct from the spiritual union of Christians on earth (Church Militant) and in heaven (Church Triumphant). The modern emphasis is less on the suffering of those in purgatory than on their sure hope of salvation. See also communion of saints; purgatory.

Church Triumphant, in the doctrine of the communion of saints the spiritual union that the Christian saints have with one another in heaven, as distinct from the spiritual union of Christians on earth (Church Militant) and in purgatory (Church Suffering). The union of the Church on earth with the Church in heaven is most fully realized in the Eucharist. See also communion of saints; heaven.

Church Unity Octave, eight days of prayer for the religious unity of all Christians and all people, celebrated annually from January 18, the Feast of St. Peter's Chair, to January 25, the Conversion of St. Paul. The observance originated in 1908 in the Anglican Communion under Paul J. Francis of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States. In 1909, seventeen members of the Society of the Atonement, led by Francis, were received into the Catholic Church. The octave was blessed by Pope Pius X in 1909. Subsequent popes have also encouraged observation of the octave, notably Pope Benedict XV, who in 1916 extended the observance to the universal Church. In 1921, Cardinal Dougherty of Philadelphia presented a resolution to the U.S. hierarchy that the octave be observed in all dioceses throughout the United States. It is observed today especially in the Catholic, Anglican, and Orthodox churches. See also ecumenism.

ciborium (si-bohr'ee-*oo*m; Lat., cibus, "food," or Gk., kiborion, "cup"), a covered metal cup holding hosts for Communion of the faithful. The interior must be gold-plated. The cup, similar to the chalice, developed from the pyx. Earlier, the term "ciborium" referred to a stone, wooden, or metal canopy over the altar. See also Communion, Holy; pyx.

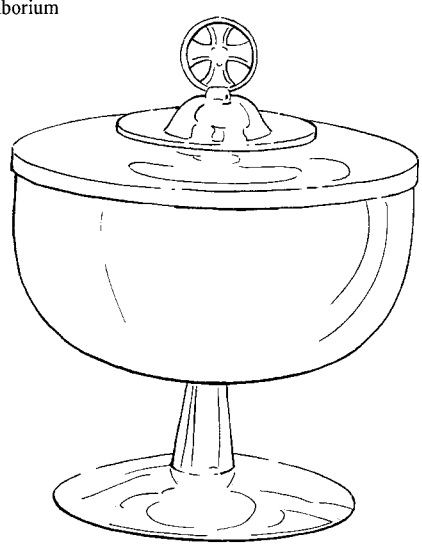
Ciborium



Cincture

cincture (sink'chuhr; Lat., cingulum, "girdle"), a rope-like cord tied around the waist to hold the priest's or deacon's alb in place. It may be decorated with tassels at each end. It is usually white, but may follow the liturgical color of the day. It has symbolized priestly chastity. A new fitted-style alb has rendered the cincture unnecessary. See also vestments.

Circumcellions (Lat., circum cellas, "around [the] shrines"), members of a violent North African religious and social protest movement of the fourth century. Donatist in allegiance but feared by many Donatists as well as Catholics, they gathered around the martyrs' shrines, often appropriating supplies stored there. Styling themselves Agonistici ("Fighters") and crying "laudes Deo" ("praises to God"), they ambushed creditors, landowners, imperial agents, and Catholic prelates, sometimes kidnapping them, sometimes demanding martyrdom at their hands. See also Donatism.

circumcision, a religious or cultural practice in which the foreskin of the penis is cut off or incised. It was practiced among some Northwest Semitic groups and Egyptian priests in the third millennium B.C. In the Bible, Israel is commanded to circumcise males on the eighth day after birth (Lev 12:3) as a sign of the covenant between God and Israel (Gen 17:9–14) and as a boundary between Israel and uncircumcised nations (Judg 14:3; 1 Sam 14:6). Circumcision was frowned upon in Greco-Roman culture and suppressed during persecutions (1 Macc 1:60–61). Thus it became an important indicator of Jewishness. Metaphorically circumcised hearts and ears are obedient to God (Deut 10:16; 1QH 18.20; Rom 2:29). In the NT Paul argues against the necessity of circumcision for gentile followers of Jesus (Gal 5:2–12; Rom 2:25–29).

circumincession (Lat., circumincedere, "to move around," or circuminsedere, "to sit around," Gk., perichoresis), mutual interdependence of natures or persons. First used in Christological controversies to signify the relationship between divine and human natures in Christ, circumincession came into prominence in trinitarian theology to explain the interdependence among the three divine Persons. Although the term is not used in Scripture, the idea is found in John 17:21; 10:38; and 14:11.

In Latin trinitarian theology, circumincession means that the three divine Persons, by virtue of their interdependence and essential unity, share intellect, will, and freedom; they act entirely in concert as one God. In the more dynamic Greek theology, the Godhead originates with God the Father and is passed to Son and Spirit, yet the divine unity is shared by the three Persons in the ceaseless exchange of love and life. In both theologies, each divine Person must be thought of in relation to the other divine Persons. See also Trinity, doctrine of the.

circumstances, moral, aspects of an action that are distinguishable from its object. In Catholic moral theology the morality of an action—whether it is morally right or wrong—has been derived from the so-called fonts of morality. These fonts were seen as three: the object of the act, the end, and the circumstances. Seven circumstances are usually listed: status of the agent, quality or quantity of object (e.g., grave or slight theft), place, means, motive, manner, and time. Sometimes circumstances alter the very meaning of the action, hence its morality. For instance, traditional theology has not viewed taking another's property when one is in extreme need (circumstance) as theft. At other times circumstances do not affect the morality of the action at all, for example, whether one uses a gun or a knife in a murder.

Cistercian order, an order of monks in the Benedictine monastic tradition. In 1098 twenty-one monks and Robert, their abbot, left the Benedictine abbey of Molesmes in Burgundy to follow the Rule of St. Benedict to the letter, to sacrifice centuries of customs and devotional accretions for the sake of evangelical simplicity. At Cîteaux (Lat., Cistercium), near Dijon, in Burgundy, they established a "school of charity" that balanced solitude and community, prayer and manual labor. Simplicity governed everything from their undyed woolen habits and their diet to their liturgy and their architecture. The Cistercian Eucharist and Divine Office took about half the time of the elaborate contemporary Benedictine liturgy. When the Cistercians replaced the original wooden buildings with stone, the Burgundian Romanesque abbeys were unpainted and devoid of representational carvings. They accepted no child oblates, had no schools or parishes, and tried to avoid direct involvement in feudal society.

When, in 1113, Cîteaux founded a second monastery, the new autonomous abbey did not sever all ties with the motherhouse, as had been the previous custom. Instead, a system of "filiation" required the abbot of the motherhouse to visit annually each of the daughterhouses. The first foundation outside France was made in Italy (1120), and abbeys soon appeared in Germany (1123), England (1129), Slovenia (1135), Scotland (1136), Spain and Wales (1140), Ireland (1142), Denmark, Sweden, and Bohemia (1143), Norway (1146), Portugal (1153), and Poland and Hungary (1179). By 1151 there were 333 Cistercian men's abbeys; a century later, 647.

Uniformity of custom and discipline—juridical, liturgical, and even architectural—was maintained by annual visitations and by an annual general chapter of all Cistercian abbots, a system that later served as a model for other religious groups. The founders' ideals found expression in brief accounts of the early monks' experiences, especially in the frequently revised Charter of Charity, and in the decrees of the general chapter.

"Bearded laymen" were early admitted as lay brothers. These usually illiterate conversi (Lat., "converted") lived in quarters separate from the monks, recited a simple office consisting mostly of repetitions of the Lord's Prayer, and worked and managed monastic farms (granges) located at a distance from the abbeys. The lay brotherhood allowed uneducated men to share a way of life much admired by twelfth-century people. Houses of nuns and lay sisters soon followed. A few were founded by Cistercian abbots; some were officially incorporated by the order on condition of enclosure, but most simply adopted the Cistercian habit and usages without being juridically affiliated with the order.

Spirituality and Theology: Much of the Cistercians' spectacular diffusion can be attributed to Bernard of Clairvaux (1090–1153). The dominant figure of the early-twelfth-century Church, Bernard articulated in sermons, letters, and treatises a theology of reformed monasticism that expressed the ideals of the Cistercian founders—as did the works of William of Saint-Thierry (d. 1147/48), Aelred of Rievaulx (d. 1166/67), Guerric of Igny (d. 1157), and a host of Cistercians whose treatises, scriptural commentaries, letters, biographies, and edifying tales carried Cistercian ideals to contemporaries and subsequent generations. Using the resources, vocabulary, and methods common to their day, they created a distinctively Cistercian spirituality marked by a thorough knowledge of Scripture, heard at liturgy and read and pondered privately in lectio divina (spiritual reading); familiarity with patristic works; a clear concept of the human person, made in the image and likeness of God but deformed through sin, and a pattern of return through conversion (turning away from absorption with self and things); physical, mental, and spiritual asceticism; and, through grace, loss of self-centeredness in an experience of God. Through participation in Christ by the action of the Holy Spirit, they believed, the divine likeness and, therefore, full humanity may be restored to the human person. Thus, the person can become by grace what God is by nature.

As early as Isaac of Stella (d. ca. 1167) some Cistercians attempted to reconcile the theology of the cloister with the theology of the schools, using terminology new to monastic life. As universities became the focus of European intellectual life, Cistercian houses of studies were founded in 1245 at Paris, and later at Montpellier (1260), Toulouse (1280), and Oxford (1281), and then Würzburg, Cologne, Prague, Leipzig, Vienna, Heidelberg, Cracow, and Louvain. Pope Benedict XII, a Cistercian monk, made university training a keystone in his plan for Cistercian reform in the bull Fulgens sicut stella (1335).

After the Middle Ages: After the Reformation's suppression of monasticism in Britain, Scandinavia, and Protestant areas of northern Germany and the Low Countries, Cistercians in Catholic countries regrouped into congregations by language, nation, or province. Regional variations led, especially in France, to a "war of observances" between "ancients," who defended the evolution of the order, and "abstinents," who sought to restore what they considered the primitive "strict" observance. Of the houses within the strict observance, the most influential was the abbey of La Trappe under its once commendatory abbot, Armand-Jean Bouthillier de Rancé (d. 1700), whose monastic reform was noted for its rigorous asceticism. Other reformers fostered the collection of early Cistercian literature.

The Enlightenment and the revolutionary fervor unleashed in France led to the suppression of monastic life in France (1791), Austria-Hungary (1782), Spain and Portugal (1835), Switzerland (1846), and Italy (1870), although some communities of nuns survived by moving inconspicuously into towns. A band of monks from La Trappe took temporary refuge in Switzerland, and from there colonies of refugees made their way to Russia, Germany, Belgium, England, Spain, Canada, and the United States. In the nineteenth century the revival of congregations maintained a distinction between "original" and "strict" observances. At papal insistence, three of the strict observance congregations were united in 1892 as the Order of Cistercians of the Strict Observance (popularly called "Trappists"). These monks and nuns were strictly cloistered, observed almost perpetual silence, and abstained from meat, fish, eggs, and dairy products.

Early-twentieth-century French Trappist writers emphasized prayer, simplicity of life, and fraternal love in community more than heroic austerity. The American Trappist Thomas Merton (d. 1969) brought Cistercian spirituality to the attention of a wide readership. Postwar vocations and post–Vatican II renewal resulted in a rapid expansion in the Americas and the Third World. Trappists reclaimed the early Cistercian ideals, adopted vernacular liturgy, and set about translating the works of Bernard of Clairvaux and other Cistercians into modern languages. New constitutions allowed diversity of observances in an order now at home in Europe, North and South America, Asia, Africa, and Oceania and have given Cistercian nuns a greater voice in the governance of the order.

There are now two orders of Cistercians: the Cistercians of the Strict Observance (O.C.S.O. or O.C.R.), and the Cistercians of the Common Observance, known simply as the Order of Cistercians (O. Cist.). Strict Observance houses were first founded in Canada and the United States in the mid-nineteenth century: Petit Clairvaux in Nova Scotia (1825); Gethsemani Abbey in Kentucky (1848); and New Melleray Abbey in Iowa (1849). In the United States there are seventeen Strict Observance houses (five of them for women). Canadian and American houses of the order of Cistercians followed in 1928, and there are now five American monasteries of this observance (one for women). In Canada there are seven Strict Observance houses (two for women) and one men's monastery of the order of Cistercians. Worldwide there are one hundred Trappist houses of monks and sixty-nine monasteries of nuns. In the Common Observance there are sixty-nine houses of monks and ninety-one houses of nuns. See also Trappists.

Bibliography

Bouyer, Louis. The Cistercian Way. London: Mowbray, 1958.

Lekai, Louis J. The Cistercians: Ideals and Realities. Kent, OH: Kent State University, 1977.

Louf, Andre. The Cistercian Way. Kalamazoo, MI: Cistercian Publications, 1989.

Pennington, M. Basil. The Cistercian Spirit. Spencer, MA: Cistercian Publications, 1970.

E. ROZANNE ELDER

Cistercian spirituality. See Cistercian order.

Cîteaux (Lat., Cistercium), the motherhouse of the Cistercian order in Burgundy, France. Founded in 1098 by Robert of Molesmes (d. 1111), Alberic of Molesmes (d. 1109), and Stephen Harding (d. 1134) in order to provide a stricter and more primitive form of monastic life based on the Rule of St. Benedict, Cîteaux gained ecclesiastical credibility through its connection with Bernard of Clairvaux (d. 1153), who entered the monastery as a novice in 1112 with thirty other young noblemen of Burgundy, including his own brothers. The monastery of Cîteaux was lost to the order in 1791 at the time of the French Revolution, but was restored to it in 1898. See also Cistercian order.

City of God, book of Augustine of Hippo. Augustine began this work after the sack of Rome by the Vandals in A.D. 410, and continued writing from 413 to 427. The massive treatise is divided into twenty-two books. The first ten treat the polytheism of the Romans and the ancient philosophers of Greece. The final twelve books deal with the biblical doctrines of creation, the unfolding of the Christian dispensation, and the return of all things to God.

Augustine's work may be the first great philosophy/theology of history of the West. It has been enormously influential in its insistence on a direction to history and for its theme that all of human culture was a preparation for, and an anticipation of, God's revelation in Christ. See also Augustine of Hippo, St.

civil disobedience, a practice rooted in the idea that, under certain circumstances, it is morally legitimate and even mandatory to disobey the law of the state. The presumption is that there are obligations that transcend one's loyalty to the state. In cases where loyalty to the state and fidelity to the transcendent source of one's moral obligations conflict, civil disobedience may be required.

In Catholic thought, there are two dominant theological approaches to the idea of civil disobedience. The first is that of natural law theory. According to this theory, the natural law is God's eternal law inscribed in the heart of the human person and discerned by reason. The role of civil law is to reflect, as best as possible, the natural law. Civil laws that contradict natural law are illegitimate. In such cases, it is legitimate to disobey the civil law. The key resource for this approach to civil disobedience is Thomas Aquinas's "Treatise on Law" in the Summa Theologiae.

The second theological approach to civil disobedience emphasizes the eschatological kingdom of God. The task of the Christian is to live in accordance with Jesus' claim that the reign of God is already among us. This requires not only the rare case of civil disobedience, but a way of life that sets itself at odds with any earthly government. It is a more countercultural approach than that of the natural law theory, and is expressed in the Catholic Worker movement and the writings of Dorothy Day (d. 1980). See also Church and state; civil law and morality; conscience.

civil law and morality. The relationship of these two constitutes one of the most contentious and least understood aspects of American democratic life. On the one hand, some people believe that public policy (law) ought to be completely neutral where morality is concerned. The rallying cry of this group, often stamped by a strongly libertarian philosophical set of assumptions, is "You cannot and should not legislate morality." At the other extreme is a group that would immediately translate their moral convictions into law. Their rallying cry is "There ought to be a law."

It seems clear that there is some relationship between morality and legality. For example, if fetal life is to be regarded as disposable tissue, clearly abortion ought not be on the penal code, except to protect women against irresponsible tissue-scrapers. If, however, fetal life is to be regarded as human life, then there is the possibility that taking such life should be on the penal code and prohibited. The word "possibility" is used because in pluralistic democracies moral tenets must pass yet other tests.

It is generally admitted that when individual actions or policies have ascertainable consequences on the maintenance and stability of society (some would say "the public order," others more broadly "the common good"), they are the proper concern of society. But when should this concern take the form of public policy?

Many contemporary Catholic philosophers and theologians argue that the practical relationship of morality and law is best understood in terms of feasibility. In We Hold These Truths (1960), John Courtney Murray describes the notion of feasibility: "A moral condemnation regards only the evil itself, in itself. A legal ban on an evil must consider what St. Thomas calls its own 'possibility.' That is, will the ban be obeyed, at least by the generality? Is it enforceable against the disobedient? Is it prudent to undertake the enforcement of this or that ban, in view of the possibility of harmful effects in other areas of social life? Is the instrumentality of coercive law a good means for the eradication of this or that social vice? And, since a means is not a good means if it fails to work in most cases, what are the lessons of experience in this matter?" (pp. 166–67).

Conscientious public servants must constantly reassess the circumstances in which judgments of feasibility are made. What was not feasible in the past may gradually have become so at a different time. Furthermore, in matters of basic moral concern, a judgment of present nonfeasibility does not justify public passivity on the part of the public servant. There remains the duty of public leadership via persuasion. Furthermore, the law itself may have a pedagogical effect and change hearts and minds. See also Church and state. RICHARD A. MCCORMICK

Civiltà Cattolica, journal of Catholic thought published by Italian Jesuits. Founded at Naples, Italy, in 1850, it is unique among Catholic journals for its close but autonomous relationship to the Holy See. Edited by a consortium of Jesuits, it provides a Clare of Assisi, founder of the Poor Clares and a close associate of Francis of Assisi (also depicted here); mural in the church of St. Clare, Assisi, Italy.

Catholic viewpoint on contemporary social, religious, political, and cultural issues.

Clare of Assisi, St., ca. 1193–1253, founder of the Poor Clares, a religious community of women. Clare was born in Assisi, Italy, and learned of Francis and his group of friars, who were traveling from town to town, begging and preaching the gospel. She refused an arranged marriage and sought advice from Francis. In 1212 he received her commitment to follow the gospel and promised to care for her as he did his own friars. After a short stay with Benedictine nuns, Clare settled at a house attached to San Damiano, a church that had been recently rebuilt by Francis. There she served as superior until her death. Among those who joined her were her sisters, Agnes and Beatris, and her mother, Ortolana. Throughout her life she fought to maintain the Franciscan ideal of rigorous poverty for the Poor Clares while the friars were accepting modifications of their original rule. Clare was canonized in 1255. Feast day: August 11. See also Francis of Assisi, St.

Claretians, Missionary Sons of the Immaculate Heart of Mary (CMF), founded in 1849 by Anthony Mary Claret. They received papal approval in 1924. When the Dominicans and Franciscans were suppressed in Spain, Claret gathered diocesan clergy to continue the work of catechizing and preaching. At first they took no vows; since 1862 they have taken simple vows of poverty, celibacy, and obedience. They also take an oath to persevere and not to accept any honor without permission. There are two provinces in the United States. The U.S. Claretians publish U.S. Catholic and SALT magazines. See also Anthony Claret, St.

Claudel, Paul, 1868–1955, French poet and playwright. After a powerful religious experience in 1886, he embraced the Catholic faith, an event that would have a profound influence on his writing. Active in the diplomatic service of France, he was elected to the French Academy in 1946 and was much honored as a preeminent voice of French literature.

Claver, St. Peter. See Peter Claver, St.

Clemens, Franz Jakob, 1815–62, a leader of the neo-Scholastic revival in Germany. His works written in Latin in the 1850s argued for an exclusive role for Scholasticism in explaining revelation. He began the controversy over nature and grace (a struggle over idealist and Scholastic theologies) with J. E. Kuhn of the Tübingen school. After political activity in Germany and professorships at Bonn and Munster, he assumed a position in Rome, where he taught Matthias J. Scheeben.

Clement I, St., also known as Clement of Rome, d. ca. 101, traditionally regarded as the fourth bishop of Rome, from ca. 91 to 101, and likely author of the letter known as 1 Clement. Sent ca. 96 from the Roman church to the church at Corinth, it instructs the Corinthians to reinstate elders improperly deposed. In Clement's view, the apostles had established "bishops" (Gk., episcopoi, used interchangeably with presbyteroi, "elders") and "deacons" in all places, and neither they nor their successors were to be deprived of office. Clement offers no defense for intervening in the Corinthians' affairs and expects the letter carriers to report on the outcome, but neither does he appeal to Roman privilege. Clement adduces the holy persons of the Hebrew Bible as examples for Christian virtues, emphasizing hospitality, faith, and humility, and makes use of many Christian writings (especially 1 Corinthians) later regarded as Scripture. Clement's second "letter" (2 Clement, actually a homily) is spurious. Feast day: November 23 (West); November 24 or 25 (East). See also apostolic age; Apostolic Fathers; apostolic succession; bishop.

Clement V [Bertrand de Got], ca. 1260–1314, pope from 1305 to 1314. Born in France, he became archbishop of Bordeaux in 1299 and was elected pope following the turbulent reign of Boniface VIII. Avoiding strife-ridden Rome, in 1309 Clement moved the papal court to Avignon, inaugurating the "Babylonian Captivity" of the papacy, which lasted until 1378. Easily influenced, he was no match for Philip IV of France, and in 1311 when he suppressed the Knights Templar for alleged sodomy, blasphemy, and heresy, he turned their French properties over to Philip. Among his positive accomplishments are the convening of the Council of Vienne (1311), the strengthening of canon law, and the founding of the universities of Orléans and Perugia. See also Avignon; Knights Templar; Vienne, Council of.

Clement VII [Giulio de Medici], 1478–1534, pope from 1523 to 1534. An illegitimate son of the dominant family of Florence, the Medici, he was named cardinal-archbishop of Florence in 1513 by Pope Leo X, also a Medici. In 1523 he was elected to succeed Hadrian VI. A typical Renaissance pope, more political than theological, Clement proved ineffective in dealing with the Protestant Reformation. He resisted calling a council to reform the Church and to respond to the Protestants. Clement's refusal to grant Henry VIII a divorce provided the occasion for the English Reformation.

Clement of Alexandria, ca. 150–ca. 215, theologian and head of the Alexandrian catechetical school. Born Titus Flavius Clemens, he studied in several philosophical schools before settling in Alexandria. In 202, he was forced to flee the city under persecution. Little is known of the remainder of his life, although his presence was noted in Caesarea and Antioch. Clement tried to reconcile Greek philosophy and the Christian faith. He considered philosophy as preparatory for the Christian revelation. His principal writings include Protrepticus, "An Exhortation to the Greeks"; Paedagogus, "The Instructor"; and Stromateis, "Miscellanies." In the first, he encourages pagans to accept the Christian faith. The second contains ethical instructions for Christians whose tutor is the Logos. The third book is made up of loosely woven threads of contemplation for the more enlightened Christian. His name was assigned to December 4 (feast day) in some early martyrologies but was excised in 1586 by Pope Sixtus V because he questioned the orthodoxy of certain of Clement's writings. See also Alexandria, school of; Logos; philosophy and theology.

Clementines, formally known as the Constitutions of Clementine, the decrees enacted by Pope Clement V (1305–14) and the Council of Vienne (1312), promulgated as an authentic collection of laws by Pope John XXII in 1317. Their historical importance lies in their forming a part of the Corpus Iuris Canonici, the chief collection of canon law in force before the first Code of Canon Law of 1917. See also canon law.

Cleophas, St. (klee'uh-fuhs), or Cleopas, a disciple who met Jesus on the Emmaus road (Luke 24:18). He is sometimes identified with Clopas, husband of one of the women at the Cross (John 19:25). Feast day: September 25.

clergy, an ecclesiastical state, or status, distinguished from that of the laity. The clergy consists of persons who are deputized for the sacred ministry by the sacrament of Holy Orders. There are three ranks of the clergy: deacons, presbyters (priests), and bishops. A person becomes a cleric by diaconal ordination when he is incardinated into a diocese or other particular church, or into an institute of consecrated life or other society of clerics. Ordination confers a sacramental character that can never be lost, but the clerical state can be lost by the declaration of the invalidity of sacred ordination, by the penalty of dismissal from the clerical state, or by a rescript from the Apostolic See, given to deacons only for serious reasons and to presbyters only for very serious reasons.

Clerics are bound by canon law to observe special disciplinary requirements, among them to pray the Liturgy of the Hours daily, to make an annual retreat, and to show reverence to, and obey, the Bishop of Rome and their own ordinary (diocesan bishop). They are also obliged to observe celibacy unless, in the case of permanent deacons (and also presbyters and deacons in the Eastern churches), they are already married when they are ordained. Clerics are prohibited from exercising certain functions and professions, including the holding of public offices that entail the exercise of civil power. Permanent deacons are exempt from many of the clerical obligations. See also bishop; deacon; presbyter; priest.

clergy, regular, clergy who are members of religious orders. They are so called because they are obligated to follow the rule (Lat., regula) of their religious order. The term is contrasted with "diocesan clergy" and "secular clergy," i.e., clergy who are attached to a diocese and are not members of a religious institute.

clergy, secular, clergy attached solely to a diocese. Secular clergy are not members of a religious institute or society of apostolic life, so they are not considered "regular," i.e., obliged to follow a rule (Lat., regula) of religious life. Because they do not withdraw from the world (Lat., saeculum) in the same way religious vow to do, they are called "secular." Almost all secular clergy are diocesan clergy.

cleric. See clergy.

clericalism, a term coined ca. 1865 in Italy to describe a supposed system employed by clergy to oppose Italian unity. It also refers to attitudes and behaviors of clergy designed to underscore the privileged status of priests and bishops. The term enjoyed some currency in both France and Italy in the nineteenth century because it provided a convenient label by which those who mistrusted religion in general, and the Catholic Church in particular, could advance an antireligious agenda. The supposed aim of the clericalist system was the subjugation of civil government to the control of the pope through the influence of local bishops and priests. The term later expanded in meaning to include any perceived incursion of religion into public affairs, particularly those involving attempts to gain power over the state.

Since Vatican II (1962–65), the term has taken on another, more common meaning. Less an accusation leveled at the Church by hostile outsiders, the term is now most often employed by Catholics themselves to designate a vision of church that emphasizes its institutional, patriarchal structures and the privileged position of clergy over the laity, and especially over women. See also anticlericalism; clergy.

Clericis Laicos (clair'i-chees lay'i-kohs; Lat.), bull promulgated February 1296 by Pope Boniface VIII. The title comes from the opening words: "In the past laymen (laicos) were extremely violent toward the clergy (clericis)." At the time, contrary to canon law, the kings of England and France had resorted to taxing the clergy to raise funds for military ventures. In this bull, Boniface threatened to excommunicate any lay lord who taxed the clergy without the pope's consent and to depose any clergy who payed such taxes. In the face of economic pressure, Boniface later granted both monarchs permission to tax their clergy. See also Boniface VIII.

clerks regular, groups of Catholic clergy who take religious vows and are committed to a variety of pastoral ministries. The concept of clerks regular arose within the sixteenth-century reform movements, especially in Italy, through the creation of a series of men's religious orders like the Barnabites, the Camillians, the Caracciolini, Clerks Regular of the Mother of God, the Piarists, the Somaschi, the Theatines, and the largest and best known of the clerks regular, the Company of Jesus (the Jesuits). This list is taken from the Annuario Pontificio, but some other congregations have identified themselves with the clerks regular. See also Barnabites; Cajetan, St.; Calasanz, St. Joseph; Camillus of Lellis, St.; Jerome Emiliani, St.; Jesuits; Theatines.

Clermont, Council of (1095), reform council called by Pope Urban II at which he inaugurated the First Crusade. The council also confirmed the Truce of God for all Christendom and clarified other issues such as lay investiture of bishops, Lenten fasting, and the reception of Communion under both kinds, that is, the consecrated bread and consecrated wine. See also Urban II, Bl.

Cletus. See Anacletus, St.

Climacus, St. John, 570–649, monk, hermit, and, later, abbot of Sinai monastery. He practiced a spiritual discipline of self-denial and wrote that perfection requires mastery over feelings and emotions. His best-known work is Ladder of Paradise, which deals with monastic life. His feast day, March 30, is no longer observed universally.

Clitherow, St. Margaret, 1556–86, one of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales canonized in 1970. Converting to Catholicism after her marriage in 1571, she was arrested in 1586 for hiding priests and was put to death. Feast day: October 21. See also Forty Martyrs of England and Wales.

cloister, the areas of a convent or monastery reserved exclusively for religious; also the body of laws governing entering and leaving these areas. Cloister law is obligatory in established houses of men and women religious. Entrance of persons of the opposite sex is prohibited except for spouses of heads of state. In women's convents, Church dignitaries and men whose professional services are needed may be admitted. Members of cloistered orders are usually not permitted to live outside the cloister. See also convent; monastery.

The Renaissance cloisters of La Badia Benedictine monastery in Fiesole, Italy, just outside of Florence.

Cloud of Unknowing, The, English contemplative work by an anonymous monk, possibly Carthusian, of the fourteenth century. Conversant with the mystical tradition of Pseudo-Dionysius and incorporating anecdotes from everyday life, the Cloud outlines the need to withdraw from the world of sensation and to enter the cloud of forgetting, or unknowing, in order to reach God in love. Other works of the same author include The Book of Privy Counsel and free translations of Pseudo-Dionysius and Richard of St. Victor. See also Denys the Areopagite.

Clovis, ca. 466–511, king of the Franks. Succeeding his father Childeric I ca. 481 as ruler of a small barbarian tribe, by his death he was master of most of France. Clovis was converted to Christianity by his wife, Clotilde; he and thousands of his followers were baptized by St. Remigius. See also Franks; Remigius, St.

Cluny, French Benedictine monastery founded near Mâcon in Burgundy in 909 by William the Pious, Duke of Aquitaine. Cluny was the center of monastic reform during the tenth and eleventh centuries and was known for its concentration on communal prayer and the expansion and elaboration of the liturgy. Technically the property of Sts. Peter and Cluny, located in Burgundy, France, one of the most important monasteries in the history of the Church; it became the center of widespread monastic reform in the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth centuries.

Paul, Cluny emphasized the choral Office and the singing of psalms (the monks sang the whole Psalter every week and read the whole Bible every year), with little concern for manual labor. By the mid-twelfth century there were over one thousand Cluniac monasteries, including both new establishments and reformed Benedictine houses. Eventually eclipsed by newer orders, Cluny was suppressed in 1790 by the French Revolution. See also Benedictine order.

coadjutor bishop, special bishop-assistant to a diocesan bishop. Distinguished from an auxiliary by appointment at the initiative of the Holy See, the right of immediate succession, and the manner of taking office (comparable to a diocesan bishop), he is normally appointed for circumstances that are personal to the diocesan bishop, like age, health, or special responsibilities.

By law the coadjutor is to be appointed a vicar general and is a prime policy consultant and administrative collaborator to the diocesan bishop. Like the auxiliaries, he performs pontifical and other uniquely episcopal functions that are not habitually to be entrusted by the diocesan bishop to any except bishops. See also bishop; diocesan bishop.

coat-of-arms, an artistic representation consisting of shield, headgear, motto, and various liturgical ornaments and insignia to designate the person and rank of an ecclesiastical personage. First used by secular nobles, the Church's hierarchy adopted coats-of-arms in the late Middle Ages and have used them ever since. Distinguishing features on the papal coat-of-arms are the tiara and keys; for cardinals, the red hat; for patriarchs, archbishops, and bishops a green hat, but with differing numbers of tassels. Lesser prelates, major superiors, priests, and religious may also have their own coats-of-arms, but this is rare.

Coat-of-arms

Code of Canon Law, a codification of canons, or laws, of the Latin-rite Roman Catholic Church. Until the twentieth century, Church law, called canon law, was assembled in large, cumbersome collections. This made knowledge and interpretation of the law difficult, especially in pastoral practice. To remedy this, Pope Pius X in 1904 acceded to the wishes of many bishops and established a pontifical commission to codify Church law, akin to the modern civil law codes in Europe. The first Code of Canon Law was promulgated by Pope Benedict XV on Pentecost Sunday, May 27, 1917, and it took effect the following Pentecost, May 19, 1918.

The second Code of Canon Law was promulgated by Pope John Paul II on January 25, 1983, exactly twenty-four years after Pope John XXIII had called for the revision of the first code; it took effect on November 27, 1983.

The 1917 code consisted of 2,414 canons organized in five parts, called "books": general norms, persons, things, processes, and delicts (ecclesiastical crimes) and penalties. The second code of 1983 was revised considerably, both in content and structure, in light of the theological renewal and disciplinary reforms begun at Vatican II (1962–65) and carried out chiefly under the papacy of Pope Paul VI. Consisting of 1,752 canons, the 1983 code is organized in seven books: general norms, the People of God, the teaching office of the Church, the office of sanctifying in the Church, the temporal goods of the Church, sanctions in the Church, and processes.

The code is universal law, binding all Latin-rite Catholics who are at least seven years old and who are mentally competent. The Eastern-rite Catholic churches collectively have their own code, known as the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches. It was promulgated by Pope John Paul II on October 18, 1990, and took effect October 1, 1991. Unlike the Latin code, the Eastern code is not divided into "books"; the 1,546 canons are gathered into thirty "titles." See also canon law; Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches. JOHN M. HUELS

Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches, the codification of the ecclesiastical laws that are common to all twenty-one of the Eastern Catholic churches. The word "Eastern" is to be understood historically rather than geographically; it refers to those churches that originated in the Eastern part of the Roman Empire. Members of these churches have since emigrated in large numbers to the West, so that in the 1990s "Eastern" churches are to be found worldwide. The code directly concerns only those Eastern churches that are in full communion with Rome. It is not binding on other Eastern Christians, nor does it affect the Latin Church except in a number of specific instances.

With the promulgation of this code in October 1990, the Catholic Church completed the revision of its law that had been in process since the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). The Code of Canon Law, promulgated for the Latin Church in 1983, the apostolic constitution, Pastor Bonus (1988), with its revised legislation on the Roman Curia, and finally the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches now constitute a new and complete collection of law for the whole of the Catholic Church. Pope John Paul II expressed the desire that this body of legislation be studied as a whole by all the Catholic churches.

The Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches contains only those laws that are common to all the Eastern Catholic churches. Other matters are left to be decided by the particular law of each individual church. The common Eastern canons are based on the ancient disciplinary patrimony of those churches that have their origin in Alexandria, Antioch, Armenia, Chaldea, and Constantinople. The "sacred canons" that came out of these ancient traditions constitute the common foundation for the canonical discipline of all the Eastern churches.

The codification of the canon law of the Eastern churches dates to 1929, when Pope Pius XI constituted a commission of cardinals to examine the question under the presidency of Cardinal Pietro Gasparri, who had organized the first Latin Code of Canon Law, promulgated in 1917. The work of codification was begun in 1935 and continued until the Second Vatican Council (1962). Between 1949 and 1957 Pope Pius XII promulgated part of this revised law, for example, the law on marriage, on procedure, on monastic institutes, and on the hierarchical structure of these churches. When Pope John XXIII called the Second Vatican Council, work on the revision of Eastern law was suspended. In 1972 Pope Paul VI set up a new commission to revise and complete the work. This commission was composed of the patriarchs and other heads of the Eastern Catholic churches plus a number of cardinals from the Roman Curia. A college of seventy consultors was appointed, consisting largely of bishops and priests of the Eastern churches. Some Orthodox observers were also invited to cooperate in the revision. The president of the commission was Cardinal Joseph Parecattil, archbishop of Ernakulam, of the Syro-Malabar Church in Kerala, India.

At the inauguration of the work of this commission, Pope Paul VI established two guiding principles to direct the process of codification: the canon law of the Eastern Catholic churches was to be revised according to the principles of the Second Vatican Council, and in complete fidelity to the ancient patrimony of Eastern church discipline. The commission completed its work in 1988, and on October 18, 1990, Pope John Paul II, for the first time in history, promulgated a code of canon law for all the Eastern Catholic churches. It came into force on October 1, 1991.

The new Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches is systematically arranged, not in seven books like the Latin Code, but in thirty titles, which is more in harmony with the structure of traditional Eastern canonical collections.

Characteristics of the Code: The Second Vatican Council, in its Decree on Eastern Catholic Churches, prescribed that the ancient discipline concerning the sacraments of the Eastern churches should be restored where necessary. The sacramental legislation of the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches differs considerably from that of the Latin Code. This is particularly clear where the sacraments of Christian initiation are concerned.

The Eastern code preserves the ancient ecclesial tradition of ministry by both celibate and married clergy. It also has its own way of dealing with missionary activity and with ecumenism. In penal law, too, there are many important differences between the two codes. For example, in accordance with Eastern tradition, all penal sanctions have to be imposed directly by Church authorities.

Another important feature is that the ancient synodal structure of Church government has been revived. The Second Vatican Council prescribed that the powers of the Eastern patriarchs should be restored and that the patriarch with his synod should be the highest authority within the patriarchal church. The new Eastern code has legislated this change. Legislative power now resides in the episcopal synod of the patriarchal church, and all the bishops of the patriarchal church are members of this synod. Judicial power also resides in the episcopal synod, though recourse to the primatial See of Rome remains possible. The patriarch possesses extensive administrative power, which he exercises with the consent or counsel of his permanent synod—a council of five bishops with the patriarch as president. Similar concern for synodal structure can be seen in the legislation on Major Archiepiscopal and Metropolitan Churches. See also canon law; Eastern churches; Eastern rites. CLARENCE GALLAGHER codex, the forerunner of the modern book, in which sheets of papyrus or vellum (animal skin scraped to produce a smooth writing surface) are sewn together so that they open into pages. First appearing in the second century A.D., the codex is superior to scrolls in its durability, ease of storage, and the ease with which it may be opened and read. Both sides of the writing material may be used. It was employed early in Christian history for copies of Scripture.

Codex Iuris Canonici (koh'deks yoo'rees kah-nahn'ee-chee). See Code of Canon Law.

Codex Sinaiticus, a fourth-century manuscript of the Greek Bible, discovered by Constantin von Tischendorf at the monastery of St. Catherine on Mount Sinai (Egypt). He found some leaves of the OT in 1844, and the NT in 1859. Though the codex includes the whole NT, much of the OT is missing. Three hundred forty-seven of its leaves (199 OT and 148 NT) are in the British Museum, forty-three are in the University Library at Leipzig, and fragments of three leaves are said to be in the Library of the Society of Ancient Literature in St. Petersburg. In 1975 twelve more leaves were reported to be among the more than four thousand new manuscripts found after a fire at St. Catherine's monastery.

Codex Vaticanus, a fourth-century manuscript of the Greek Bible, probably of Egyptian origin now in the Vatican Library. Codex Vaticanus is missing Gen 1:1–46:8; 2 Sam 2:5–7, 10–13; Pss 105(Septuagint; Hebrew 106):27–137(138):6. It apparently never included 1–2 Maccabees. All NT Scripture after Heb 9:14 is missing.

Cody, John Patrick, 1907–82, bishop of Kansas City (1956–61), archbishop of New Orleans (1964–65), then Chicago (1965–82). In New Orleans he played an active role in the excommunication of prominent Catholics who supported racial segregation. In June 1965 he succeeded Cardinal Albert Meyer as archbishop of Chicago and in 1967 was made a cardinal by Pope Paul VI. His style of governing the large and very active archdiocese met with a great deal of criticism, especially from priests who enjoyed greater latitude under his predecessors. The last years of his life were mired in controversy about his financial stewardship, and there were persistent rumors that the Vatican wanted to remove him from office. However, he died in office.

Colet, John, ca. 1466–1519, English humanist and reformer. Beginning with his lectures on St. Paul (1497), Colet advocated a return to primitive Christian discipline, influencing Thomas More and Erasmus's Christian humanism. As dean of St. Paul's Cathedral (1504–19) he combined humanist studies and piety in an influential educational curriculum. See also humanism, Catholic.

Colette, St., 1381–1447, reformer of Poor Clare nuns, a Franciscan order. Born Nicolette Boilet, the daughter of a carpenter at Corbie abbey in France, she was inspired by a vision of St. Francis to restore the Poor Clares to their original austerity. She founded and restored convents in northern Europe. One branch of the Poor Clares is called Colettines. Feast day: March 6. See also Colettines; Poor Clares.

Colettines, Poor Clare nuns who embrace the reforms of St. Colette. In the early fifteenth century, Colette of Corbie began the restoration of the Second Order of St. Francis to its original rigor of poverty and prayer. Colettines came to Cleveland, Ohio, in 1877 and spread across the United States. See also Colette, St.; Poor Clares.

collateral line, the manner in which one person is related to another by blood relationship. It describes all blood relationships except those of descendants and ancestors. Canon law prohibits marriages up to and including the fourth degree (of closeness) of the collateral line. See also consanguinity; marriage law.

Collect, the opening prayer of the Mass. The Collect, now called in English the Opening Prayer, takes place at the end of the introductory rites of the Mass, just before the Liturgy of the Word. The name "collect" derived from the concept of the priest collecting the prayer of those assembled and offering it to God in the name of the congregation. The Opening Prayer is usually addressed to the First Person of the Trinity and concludes, as do all Christian prayers, through the Son in the unity of the Holy Spirit.

collection, the offering of money for the support of the Church and its ministers, given by the faithful during the liturgy. The collection usually takes place at the time of the offertory or Preparation of the Gifts. In ancient times, the wealthy gave money while the others brought what they could contribute to the life of the Church, such as animals, cheese or bread, other kinds of produce, or cloth. Regardless of what is offered, the collection fulfills the biblical mandate to return thanks to God by offering part of what we have. The collection also reflects the responsibility of all members to contribute to the support of the Church and to provide for needy members of the community. This tradition is rooted in the OT and in first-century Judaism. The NT speaks of a great collection gathered from the gentile churches to relieve the distress of fellow Christians in Jerusalem (Acts 4:37; 11:27–30; Gal 2:10). See also offertory.

college of bishops. See bishops, college of.

College of Cardinals. See Cardinals, College of.

college of consultors. See consultors, college of.

College Theology Society (CTS), a professional organization of primarily North American theology and religious studies teachers of college or university undergraduates, founded in 1954 as the Society of Catholic College Teachers of Sacred Doctrine. The organization's original purpose was to provide mutual support among Catholic undergraduate religion teachers. Through the early 1960s, the society concerned itself with professional training for teachers of sacred doctrine and the undergraduate religion curriculum. The Second Vatican Council (1962–65) precipitated the society's reorientation to a less narrowly defined "Catholic" focus, reflected in the 1967 change of name to College Theology Society (CTS). In 1969, the CTS joined with six other professional organizations, including the American Academy of Religions (AAR) and the Catholic Theological Society of America, to form the Council of Societies for the Study of Religion. The CTS declined a 1971 invitation to merge with the AAR; its unique focus on undergraduate pedagogy as well as certain Catholic concerns with academic freedom and ecclesial loyalty motivated its decision to remain a separate organization. The CTS has produced a variety of publications. Proceedings (1954–) publishes articles that reflect annual meeting themes. Magister (1957–65), Sacred Doctrine Notes (1966–67), and College Theology Notes (1968) were newsletters that addressed the members' teaching and professional interests. From 1969 to 1970 the CTS sponsored the Journal of Ecumenical Studies. Its current journal Horizons began publication in 1974. The articles reflect the CTS's two major interests: the academic study of religion and the translation of scholarship for the undergraduate classroom. See also Catholic Theological Society of America.

SANDRA Y. MIZE

collegiality, a doctrine that asserts that the worldwide episcopate, together with and under the pope as its head, has supreme authority and bears pastoral responsibility for the Church as a whole. By virtue of their receiving the episcopal office by sacramental means and in hierarchical communion with the pope, bishops become members of a college and thereby assume responsibility for the care not only of their own particular churches but for the whole Church (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, nn. 22, 23). Two documents of Vatican II, the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (Lumen Gentium) and the Decree on the Bishops' Pastoral Office in the Church (Christus Dominus), while not using the noun "collegiality," describe episcopal governance in the Church as "collegial" (fifteen times) and see the hierarchy unified into a "collegium" (thirty-seven times). The reality of collegialitas is also described by Vatican II in the words ordo, corpus, and fraternitas (Lat., "order," "body," and "fraternity").

As the order of the initial chapters of Lumen Gentium indicates, one cannot understand episcopal collegiality (ch. 3) without situating this function in light of the Church's origin in the triune God (ch. 1) and in light of the fact that it is the entire People of God who constitute the Church (ch. 2). The Church is not primarily hierarchy; it is the People of God chosen by the Blessed Trinity. Furthermore, because of the nature of their pastoral care bishops cannot reach decisions apart from the dynamic process of listening and responding to the people. The Church is a sacrament of the unity of God with human beings.

Collegiality is one expression of the communion that exists in the Church; it is closely related to the catholicity of the Church. Teaching about collegiality was stressed at Vatican II to complement the doctrine never completed at Vatican I about the role of bishops. Vatican II states in Lumen Gentium, "Together with its head, the Roman Pontiff, and never without this head, the episcopal order is the subject of supreme and full power over the universal Church" (n. 22). It also notes, "One is constituted a member of the episcopal body by virtue of sacramental consecration and by hierarchical communion with the head and members of the body." Episcopacy is not a "jurisdictional creation of the papacy" but an outgrowth of the communion of the Church and the nature of ordination.

Strictly speaking, the term "collegiality" should be restricted to the collegiality of bishops. However, in popular usage, it is sometimes used loosely to describe the fact that in the Church the laity too should be consulted and have a role in decision making. It would be better to describe that fact by the term coresponsibility.

The final report of the Extraordinary Synod of Bishops (December 7, 1985) adds further comments about the nature of episcopal collegiality. It notes, "The ecclesiology of communion provides the sacramental foundation of collegiality. Therefore the theology of collegiality is much more extensive than its mere juridical aspect. The collegial spirit is broader than effective collegiality understood in an exclusively juridical way" (2.C.4). The text notes that there are partial realizations of collegiality that are authentically sign and instrument of the collegial spirit such as the synod of bishops, the episcopal conferences, the Roman Curia, and visits by bishops to the see of Rome.

How collegiality is concretely expressed in the Church has been the topic of some concern among those who feel papal centralism occasionally hampers the free and effective exercise of episcopal collegiality. It is not always clear that collegiality has received a full "reception" by the Church. Another question about collegiality is how those bishops not in full communion with the Church of Rome share in this ministry. See also bishops, college of; communion, Church as; conciliarity; ecumenical council; episcopal conference; primacy, papal. MICHAEL A. FAHEY

Colman of Lindisfarne, St., ca. 670, bishop and abbot of Lindisfarne who defended the Irish eighty-four-year Easter cycle at the Synod of Whitby. Rather than submit to the Roman system, he retired first to Iona, then to the island of Inishboffin off the west coast of Ireland, from which he founded the monastery of Mayo. Feast day: February 18. See also Lindisfarne; Whitby, Synod of.

Colman of Stockerau, St., d. 1012, Irish or Scottish pilgrim executed as a spy in Stockerau, near Vienna. He is one of the patron saints of Austria. Feast day: October 13.

Colombière, St. Claude La, 1641–82, French Jesuit priest best known for promoting the popular devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus, with Margaret Mary Alacoque. Later sent as Catholic chaplain to the Duchess of York, he was charged with treason in 1678 and contracted tuberculosis while imprisoned in London. He was canonized in 1992. Feast day: February 15. See also Sacred Heart, devotion to the.

Colonna, Vittoria, 1490–1547, Renaissance poet who inspired a circle of pious reformers and artists, including Gasparo Contarini and Michelangelo.

colors, liturgical, a sequence of colors for vestments and liturgical objects during church seasons and feasts. The association of particular colors with seasons and feasts developed for varied historical and psychological reasons. It seems natural to associate red with blood, green with growth, white with purity, etc., but the color usage in Christian worship shows historical variance. Vestment color in the first millennium was not significant. A preference for white developed and perdured. Twelfth-century Jerusalem Augustinian canons prepared the first sequence of colors, proposing black at Christmas and Marian feasts and blue for Epiphany and Ascension. Color sequences, however, developed locally; wearing magnificent vesture for festivals, irrespective of color, was common. A generally accepted pattern gradually developed in the medieval West, and Pope Innocent III (1198–1216) set white for feasts, red for martyrs, black for penitential seasons, and green otherwise. In 1570 the missal of Pope Pius V mandated a color sequence similar to what is in use today. Though more noble vestments may be used on special occasions irrespective of color, the major norms are white for Easter and Christmas seasons and non-Passion feasts of the Lord and for feasts of Mary, angels, and nonmartyred saints; red for Passion Sunday, Good Friday, and Pentecost and for celebrations of the Passion and feasts of apostles, evangelists, and martyrs; green during Ordinary Time; violet during Lent and Advent; rose for Gaudete and Laetare Sundays; and white for funeral services. See also liturgical year; vestments. JOHN A. MELLOH

Columba, St., 521–97, also known as Colm, Columcille, and Colum, Irish monk, abbot, and missionary. After forming a monastery in his native Ireland, he and twelve companions embarked on a mission to the island of Iona off the coast of Scotland in 563. An aggressive missionary to the Picts and deeply involved in the social life of both Scotland and Ireland, he was also a poet and a scribe. Three of his Latin poems survive. His Vita, written by Adamann, was widely read in the medieval period. Feast day: June 9.

Columban Fathers and Brothers, also known as St. Columban's Foreign Mission Society (SSC), a religious community founded in Ireland in 1917 to establish a seminary to train secular priests for missionary work in China. It became a pontifical society in 1924. Members were sent to China, where they worked until they were expelled in 1952. The Columbans have missions in the United States, Australia, the Philippines, Korea, and South America. The general headquarters are in Dublin, Ireland. The American headquarters are in St. Columbans, Nebraska. The procurator general is in Rome.

Columbanus, St., ca. 543–615, Irish monk, traveler, and founder of monasteries. In his travels he founded such monasteries as Luxeuil and Bobbio. He also wrote a monastic rule, a penitential, and numerous letters. Feast day: November 23. See also Bobbio; Luxeuil.

Columbus, Christopher, 1451–1506, Italian-born European explorer whose voyages were primarily responsible for the establishment of permanent contact between the Eastern and Western hemispheres. The son of a weaver, Columbus became a sailor at age fourteen and eventually entered the service of Portugal, becoming familiar with its Atlantic explorations. He became convinced that the Indies could be reached by sailing westward, and after his plans were rejected in Portugal, convinced Queen Isabella of Castile to underwrite the voyage that led to his landing in the New World on October 12, 1492. He engaged in three further voyages of exploration and was named governor of the territories he had explored, but his poor administration and ill treatment of the natives led to his recall, and he died in poverty. In spite of his flaws, Columbus seemed sincerely impelled by a desire to spread the Christian faith, as shaped and influenced by Franciscan apocalyptic mysticism. The five-hundredth anniversary of his "discovery of America" generated much controversy, however. Some view him today as an instrument of colonialism and exploitation. Others, especially in the Italian community, continue to regard him as an international hero. The Knights of Columbus take their name from him.

Columkille, St. See Columba, St.

Commandments, the Ten, also known as the Decalogue, a collection of ten short guidelines for human conduct presented in Exod 20:2–17 and Deut 5:6–21 as God's direct revelation on Mount Sinai/Horeb to Moses and Israel. Unlike any other part of the revealed law in the Hebrew Scriptures, the Decalogue is described as spoken directly by God to the people of Israel and written directly by God's own hand on two stone tablets. Most commentators have held that the first tablet contained the commandments directly referring to God while the second tablet contained those governing the social order. A few have recently postulated that both tablets were identical, the second tablet functioning as a second copy of a contract.

The requirements of the Decalogue are not unique to Israel. As concrete commandments, the entire second tablet can be found in other sacred texts from the ancient Near East. Besides the uniqueness of the commandments on the first tablet, what distinguishes the Decalogue is that these commandments are nowhere else so concisely and forcefully expressed, and never in a context of being revealed directly by God. Neither does any other ancient code focus on the exclusive claims of a god upon a particular people.

The most distinguishing characteristic of the Ten Commandments is their consistent use of the apodictic form: they are brief, unconditional imperatives, usually prohibitions, complete in themselves without any explanation. They contrast sharply with the more typical casuistic form of law characterized by an elaboration of conditions that distinguish cases.

Though some differences in the two versions of the Decalogue may be attributed to accidents in transmission, most variants appear deliberate. Because the community seems to have allowed such amendments, it appears that the original and authoritative form of the commandment can still be found in the common elements of the different forms. The divergent material is comprised of amplifications, implications, and exhortations. Details in the Decalogue that presuppose settled conditions may thus be expansions of the original commandment.

That there are "ten" commandments is expressed in Deut 4:13, 10:4, and Exod 34:28. The text leaves some room for flexibility in numbering. The debate is centered on what is included in the first and tenth commandments. Does the first commandment contain prohibitions of worshiping other gods and a prohibition of images? Does the tenth commandment include a prohibition of coveting one's neighbor's wife along with a prohibition of coveting his property? There are legitimate arguments for seeing both as comprising two distinct commandments, which would yield eleven or even twelve, not ten commandments. Catholics and Lutherans combine what the Greek Orthodox, Calvinists, and Anglicans divide in the first commandment. Reverse positions are held on the tenth. Orthodox Judaism counts what Christians consider to be the preface as the first commandment, while holding combined versions of both the first (their second) and the tenth commandments. Most Catholic Scripture scholars today agree that the division of the first commandment is most appropriate, but since the other enumeration was used by Augustine (d. 430), followed by Aquinas (d. 1274), adopted by the Council of Trent (1543–65), and used for centuries in catechisms, it is difficult to foresee a change on this matter.

The Commandments as Understood by Ancient Israel: Prologue: "I am the Lord your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of slavery." This preface to the commandments sets the law within the context of God's redemptive action. By putting proper emphasis on the prologue and the surrounding covenant framework, one avoids the mistake of treating the Decalogue as separable from the covenant instead of as an integral part of it. The Decalogue was important to ancient Israel as an expression of its relationship with Yahweh. It was not treated as an expression of an abstract moral order.

(1a) "You shall have no other gods before me." The first commandment is a claim for Yahweh's exclusiveness. It is a call to monolatry, not monotheism. Only later would Israel claim that Yahweh alone has existence.

(1b) "You shall not make for yourself an idol. . . ." Concerning the extent of the first commandment, the question turns upon whether the prohibition of idols, or images, is distinct from the first commandment or whether it is merely an elaboration of its implications. If it is a separate commandment, then it would serve a function distinct from the prohibition of worshiping other gods and forbid images of Yahweh himself. If it only prohibits idols of other gods, then it is not regulating any matter distinct from the initial prohibition and thus serves simply as a negative complement designed to bolster Yahweh's preeminence over all other gods.

Most Scripture scholars see the prohibition of idols as originally forbidding images of Yahweh. In contrast to numerous archaeological findings of idols of neighboring gods, the absence of images of Yahweh, especially in the Temple, indicates that this is how ancient Israel understood it. No people in such an environment would have naturally worshiped an imageless God unless they were commanded not to make a representation. However, the present form of the commandment with its reference to jealousy appears to ban only idols of other gods. Most scholars attribute this confusion to the work of an editor who, by inserting the reference to a jealous God, incorporated this distinct prohibition within the framework of the first commandment.

What could be the purpose of such a command? Among other things, it underscores the difference between God and every part of God's creation. It implies that Yahweh is a transcendent God who is revealed when and where God wills. It guards against false and inadequate images of God. Furthermore, Yahweh could not be identified or tied with any particular object or place, not even the ark or the Temple. It was because of this that faith in God could survive the exile and true worship could be restored.

(2) "You shall not make wrongful use of the name of the Lord your God." The original purpose of this commandment is not clear. There is no textual reason to believe that it was an injunction against profanity, as it is popularly viewed today. Others ascribe to it the prohibition of a variety of sinful uses of Yahweh's name such as divination, blasphemy, imprecation, and magic. The seriousness of the accompanying threat, that God will not hold innocent the one who commits this wrong, possibly explains why the Hebrew people developed circumlocutions to avoid using the divine name. The Hebrews held seriously the obligation to carry out a vow made in God's name. It was the misuse of this command that Jesus sought to correct in Matt 5:33 and 23:16. Jesus teaches that a person's personal word should be as strong an obligation as any oath.

(3) "Remember the Sabbath day and keep it holy." This is the first of two commandments expressed in positive form. It could just as easily be expressed, "Do not work on the Sabbath." The core of this commandment is identical in both versions. Similarly, both versions make it clear that work must be balanced by rest and relaxation. However, different doctrinal bases are supplied for observing the Sabbath. In Genesis, God set the example of resting on the seventh day of creation. In Deuteronomy, the Sabbath is in remembrance that before the Exodus the Israelites lived a life of forced labor. These two explanations, highlighting the doctrines of creation and redemption, vividly expose the two theological foundations on which the whole Decalogue is built.

(4) "Honor your father and your mother." Since most parallels to this commandment in the Hebrew Scriptures have a negative form, many have argued for an original negative form in the Decalogue. Modern catechists, following Paul's admonition to children to obey their parents in Eph 6:1–3, have tended to view this commandment as though it were addressed to children. The commandment, however, concerns the responsibilities of adult Israelites. It charges them to look after their aged parents in their need and weakness.

Jesus upheld this responsibility when he criticized the legalistic practice of dedicating one's resources to God in a way that removed one's responsibility to parents (Mark 7:10–12). In protecting the aged, this commandment indicates that human value lies in something other than productivity. The principle underlying this rejection of function-based worth would later be extended to apply, not only to one's parents, but all the aged, the weak, the ill, and orphans, widows, aliens, and the poor. In the NT, Paul writes that whoever does not provide for relatives and especially for members of the immediate family has denied the faith and is worse than an unbeliever (1 Tim 5:8).

(5) "You shall not murder." The scope of this commandment is difficult to capture. Clearly the Hebrews did not take "murder" as applying to all killing, because they participated in holy wars and practiced capital punishment. Ancient Israel clearly saw the commandment as applying to both accidental homicide and self-defense. Israel later developed an elaborate plan of cities of refuge to help overcome the obvious moral difficulties of holding someone legally responsible for either of these two acts. It appears that what the commandment initially forbade was any unauthorized claim to the right of life or death over a fellow Israelite. In the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus extended the scope of this commandment to include hatred (Matt 5:22).

(6) "You shall not commit adultery." In ancient Israel, this commandment only forbade sexual intercourse with a married woman. It did not seek to impose sexual fidelity on the husband. Its concern was probably with paternity: protecting the husband's name by assuring him that his children would be his own. That is why the crime of adultery is extended to include the lack of proof of virginity at marriage (Deut 22:21). As with the ban on killing, Jesus made this commandment much more radical by expanding it to include lustful thoughts (Matt 5:28).

(7) "You shall not steal." The prohibition of more traditional theft would be taken care of by the tenth commandment. The Hebrews understood this commandment as a prohibition of kidnapping (Exod 21:16). This understanding keeps the commandment consistent in seriousness with the commandments that surround it because the breaking of those three warranted the death penalty at this stage of Israel's history. Stealing in general, however, was punished by means of fines and restitutions.

(8) "You shall not bear false witness against your neighbor." The original aim of this commandment was to ensure truthful witness in the law courts (Exod 23:1; Deut 19:16–19). The trial of the accused was conducted at the town's gates by drawing upon whatever male Israelites were present. Because the accused was presumed guilty upon the testimony of two witnesses, and since the sentence was executed immediately with no chance for appeal, guaranteeing the truthfulness of testimony was essential. The scope of this commandment naturally expanded to demand integrity in all types of relationships.

(9) "You shall not covet your neighbor's wife." (10) "You shall not desire your neighbor's house...." What drives the argument to divide this final commandment into two is the repetition of the prohibition. In both versions the verb is repeated with different objects following. Deuteronomy also uses two distinct verbs: "covet" and "desire." In Exodus a man's wife ranks with his servants and animals as forming part of his "house." In Deuteronomy she is listed first and separately from the prohibition of desiring his house.

Most significant about this prohibition, however, is its emphasis on a subjective element. One must not only not steal another's house or wife, one must not even desire or covet them.

New Testament: There are more explicit references to the commandments in the NT than in the entire Hebrew Scriptures, but all ten are never listed together. When a rich man asked Jesus what he must do to inherit eternal life, Jesus cited five commandments from the second table, but not in the usual order. Jesus also inserts "do not defraud" from Deut 24:14 into the traditional list (Mark 10:19). In general, the lack of complete citation of the Decalogue and conflations of it with other sources of law make it clear that the Decalogue had not yet acquired either the set form or the overarching significance that it would acquire in later Christianity.

While the Sermon on the Mount cites and reinterprets the prohibitions of murder and adultery, it does this in a context not of reinterpreting the Decalogue alone, but of Jewish law in general. Those two commandments are not given any more authority than the marriage laws cited from Deut 24:1 (Matt 5:31) or the conflation of Num 30:3 and Deut 23:22 concerning oaths (Matt 5:33). Jesus' famous twofold summary of the law, to love God and neighbor, is a compilation of the Shema and the Holiness Code, though it functions well as a summary of the Decalogue.

Paul consistently rejects the law as a means of salvation. Instead, it is what convicts sinfulness and highlights the need for grace. Once that point is established, however, Paul does see some positive role for the law. In Rom 13:8–10, four commandments from the second table, as well as an all-inclusive reference to "whatever other commandments there may be," are seen as being summed up by the imperative to love one's neighbor as oneself. However, nowhere in Paul is there an explicit directive to follow the law in order to live the obedient life, as was the case in later Reformed dogmatic theology.

Church History: The Decalogue played a significant role in Judaism at the beginning of the common, or Christian, era. Scrolls discovered at Qumran contained the Decalogue, along with other traditional biblical passages. The Decalogue was read in synagogue services until the second century. The early connection of the Decalogue with the natural law, inherited from Jewish dialogue with Gentiles, loosened the commandments' original integral connection to the covenant. The Church's emphasis shifted from speaking of the Decalogue's relevancy in terms of discipleship to its relation to the natural law. Debate often centered on why they were revealed if they could be known by reason. For Aquinas, all the precepts of the Decalogue are capable of being known by the exercise of natural human reason with the exception of the Sabbath commandment's designation of a specific day.

The significant role of the Decalogue in the Christian Church began in second-century catechesis. Augustine established the format used in Catholic catechisms to this day when he saw the theological virtue of faith as summarized by the creed and sacraments, hope by the Lord's Prayer, and charity by fulfillment of the Decalogue. In the Roman Catechism adopted at the Council of Trent in 1563, as in almost all Catholic catechisms, the Decalogue serves as the foundation for presenting Christian morality. The Decalogue is treated as a fairly comprehensive code in which it is possible to find a niche for almost every kind of offense. The new Universal Catechism (Catechism of the Catholic Church) published in 1992 continues this use of the Decalogue as the framework within which it conveys its modern moral teaching.

Though much of the justification for this catechetical dependence on the Decalogue is rooted in Augustine and confirmed by citations of Aquinas, it is not the heart of either of their understandings of Christian ethics. They saw the twofold law of the gospel as fulfilling the Decalogue, not vice versa. In Augustine's noting that the Decalogue is summarized in the two precepts of charity, his point was that the commandments require a new mode of observance: that what distinguishes Christian observance of the Decalogue is love, not fear. Catechesis must stress this internalization. Specification of sins must be subordinated to the practice of virtue. Similarly for Aquinas, the law does not take the primary place in Christian ethics, certainly not in any extrinsic sense.

The breakthrough book that has enabled modern Catholic moral theology to escape the legalistic understanding of the Decalogue was Bernard Häring's The Law of Christ (1954). It marked the beginning of a shift away from the Decalogue's emphasis on "boundary-defining" moral norms that establish minimum requirements in the form of prohibitions and a shift to "goal commandments" consistent with the Sermon on the Mount and the Great Commandment (John 13:34).

Häring does not reject the value of the Decalogue, but rejects it as the basis for structuring and developing the Christian life. He does not say that the Decalogue does not apply to the Christian. He sees it as an enduring expression of the natural law and as a part of NT law. The goal commandment of loving others as Jesus loves us includes the boundary-defining norms of the Decalogue. See also moral theology; natural law.

Bibliography

Collins, Raymond F. Christian Morality: Biblical Foundations. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1986.

THOMAS POUNDSTONE

Commandments of the Church, also known as Precepts of the Church, moral and ecclesiastical precepts enjoined on all Catholics by the Church. While any law that the Church issues for its members may be referred to as a commandment, this term refers to a set of precepts spelling out specific behaviors enjoined on Catholics that have been accepted, in some form, since the Middle Ages and that were explicitly mentioned by Peter Canisius in 1555 and Robert Bellarmine in 1589. These precepts are intended to preserve good order in the Church, to maintain discipline, and to offer a distinct character to its members. Since they are moral and ecclesial in nature, they do not require internal motivation. The Commandments are fulfilled when the actions are performed, regardless of the motivation. Although they are concerned with external behaviors, these behaviors are also meant to foster the spiritual development of the faithful.

Form and Number: While there are minimal behaviors expected of members of the Church, the form or the number of the Commandments has never officially been defined.

Scripture and the early history of the Church give no evidence of a formal body of commandments for Christians beyond the Ten Commandments and the Two Great Commandments preached by Jesus. In the fourth century, however, documents indicate that the Church began to insist on certain behaviors expected of members: attendance at Mass on Sundays and special feasts, receiving the sacraments of Penance and Communion, and not celebrating marriage during certain seasons. Ninth-century prayerbooks provide lists of obligations imposed by ecclesiastical law to be used in preparation for confession.

Throughout history, the three practices already mentioned were linked together and proposed as minimal obligations for Church members. Eventually other obligations were added. The number varied from five to ten. Antoninus of Florence listed ten Commandments, spelling out the three mentioned in greater detail and adding: to abstain from acts prohibited under pain of excommunication; to avoid excommunicated persons; and not to assist at Mass celebrated by clerics who publicly lived in concubinage.

Peter Canisius listed five and Robert Bellarmine, six. Canisius wrote so often and so strongly on the Commandments of the Church in the sixteenth century that it was thought that he had formulated them. Canisius's list includes observance of feast days appointed by the Church; reverent attendance at Mass on Sundays and holy days of obligation; observance of obligatory days of fasting and abstinence; and annual confession and reception of Communion at Easter. Bellarmine combined the first two of Canisius into one Commandment and added two others: contribute to the support of the Church, and do not solemnize marriage during prohibited times. Germany follows Canisius in listing five Commandments of the Church, as does most of Latin America. France and Italy follow Bellarmine. Other lists have included the obligation of parents to provide a Catholic education for their children.

The Council of Trent (1545–63) says nothing regarding the Commandments of the Church as a body of laws, but it does recommend them in a general way. They are not mentioned in the catechism published by order of that council. Neither does the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) make any mention of the Commandments of the Church.

The six Commandments accepted for the United States by the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore in 1886 were those published in England in the nineteenth century. The Catechism of Christian Doctrine lists the Commandments of the Church as: (1) to keep holy Sunday and holy days of obligation by hearing Mass and refraining from servile work; (2) to keep the days of fast and abstinence appointed by the Church; (3) to go to confession at least once a year; (4) to receive Communion at least once a year at Easter time; (5) to contribute to the support of one's pastor; and (6) not to marry within the third degree of kindred or to solemnize marriage during forbidden times. The Catechism of the Catholic Church (1992) lists five precepts of the Church, making no mention of marriage (nn. 2041–43).

Regarding Individual Commandments: The first Commandment of the Church is the only one that is related to the Ten Commandments. It specifies how Catholics are to keep the third Commandment of God, to keep holy the Sabbath day. The Commandment regarding fast (one full meal per day; no eating between meals) and abstinence (no meat all day) has been modified in recent years. In the past, Catholics were forbidden to eat flesh-meat on Fridays and were required to fast on Fridays during Advent, the weekdays during Lent, and on the vigils of great feasts. Now only Ash Wednesday and Good Friday are days of fast and abstinence, and only Fridays during Lent are days of abstinence. Catholics are encouraged, however, to abstain from meat every Friday. The third Commandment of the Church requiring confession once a year refers only to persons guilty of serious sin. It is meant to reconcile the serious sinner with the community. Venial sins need never be confessed. The sixth Commandment concerning forbidden times to celebrate marriage refers to a law that banned the celebration of marriage during the seasons of Advent and Lent. This law was repealed in 1964. Since 1965, nuptial Masses may be celebrated during those seasons and the nuptial blessing may be given. See also abstinence; confession, auricular; Easter duty; fast days; fasting; Sunday observance. REGINA COLL commentator, a "special minister" who exercises a genuine liturgical function by providing "meticulously prepared," brief "explanations and commentaries with the purpose of introducing the faithful to the celebration and preparing them to understand it better" (General Instruction on the Roman Missal, 68). Critical for introducing Vatican II reforms, this ministry is no longer much in evidence.

Commission for Latin America. See Pontifical Commission for Latin America.

commissioning, the public act of installing laymen and laywomen into ministries that do not require ordination. These ministers may be commissioned for a single occasion or for a longer duration of service. Extraordinary ministers of the Eucharist, lectors, and catechists are among those commonly designated for service by commissioning. See also ministry.

common error, theory in canon law that addresses an incorrect judgment by a given community of faithful concerning the presence of proper authorization for a given minister. Under certain specified circumstances, the Church "supplies" for the lack of authorization, thus protecting the faithful from improper ministrations. Thus, if a validly ordained priest visiting from another diocese lacks faculties (i.e., authorization from the local bishop) to hear confessions yet announces to people assembled for Mass that he will hear confession before or after Mass, the community is led to the erroneous judgment that the priest does have the authority to hear confessions. The Church supplies it in this case, for the good of the people (can. 144.1). This theory has roots in Roman law.

common good, "the sum of those conditions of social life by which individuals, families, and groups can achieve their own fulfillment in a relatively thorough and ready way" (Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, n. 74). The concept underscores the basic claim in Catholic teaching that the person is fundamentally social. This is as opposed to certain modern understandings of the person as fundamentally autonomous and separate from society, entering into society by contract only because it is to the individual's advantage. The concept of the common good, in contrast, forms the basis for both societal claims on the individual and individual claims on society. If society is to provide the conditions for fulfillment for individuals, families, and groups, then all persons must contribute to society. However, since society does have the obligation to provide support for persons, individuals have a claim on society to provide that support. Therefore, the concept of the common good regulates the reciprocal relationship between person and society in Catholic social teaching. It is important to note that ultimate fulfillment for the person is union with God. Society provides only the concrete conditions for that fulfillment.

What constitutes more precisely the conditions for fulfillment will vary from society to society depending on what is possible culturally, politically, and economically. This is why Catholic social teaching does not endorse any one political or economic system, but critiques each system in terms of whether it provides the conditions for a human fulfillment that is ultimately theological. See also Catholic social teachings.

TODD D. WHITMORE

common life, the sharing of life together as brothers or sisters in religious communities. This involves residing under the same roof, taking meals together, recreating together, sharing goods and property, and, of course, praying together. Common life as such also exists in families and is an option even for diocesan priests, who do not take religious vows (can. 280). Common life is both a right and an obligation for members of a religious community, but religious can be excused from it under certain circumstances. Under special circumstances a competent Church authority might prohibit a religious from full participation in the common life.

Commonweal, a biweekly journal published by the Commonweal Foundation of New York. Founded in 1924 by Michael Williams to create space for Catholic views in American culture, the periodical solicits reviews of public affairs, religion, literature, and the arts from lay and religious, Catholic and non-Catholic contributors.

communal penance service. See penance service, communal.

communicatio idiomatum (kah-m*oo*-nee-kah'tzee-oh id-ee-oh'mah-toom; Lat., "the exchange of attributes"), the teaching that those properties proper to God and also those properties proper to a human being may both be predicated of Jesus Christ in such a way that what is human can be attributed to the divine nature and what is divine can be attributed to the human nature. This exchange of properties is possible because Jesus Christ is one person possessing both a divine nature and a human nature, which, though remaining distinct, are united in the one person. For example, one can say that the Son of God died on the cross, and also that the son of Mary rose from the dead. However, in making statements like these, it must be kept in mind that since the two natures remained distinct, the divine nature itself did not die and that the human nature itself did not have the power to overcome death. This paradoxical teaching was initially developed by such fourth- and fifth-century theologians as Origen, Athanasius, and Cyril of Alexandria. It was included by Pope Leo the Great in his Tome and was reiterated by the Council of Chalcedon (451). See also Jesus Christ.

communicatio in sacris (kah-m*oo*-nee-kah'tzee-oh in sah'krees). See intercommunion.

communion, Church as, the nature of the Church as a community rooted in, and expressive of, the communal life of the triune God. The Christian word "communion" is a translation from the Greek term koinonia used by Paul to indicate sharing, fellowship, or close association. Paul frequently combines the word communion with a modifier, "by the Holy Spirit." His conviction is that Christians, through the Holy Spirit, enjoy communion with the triune God and are also "in communion" with other baptized Christians. Communion therefore has a vertical dimension (contact with God) and a horizontal dimension (bonding with other Christians). Basically communion is the effect of God's mercy and faithfulness shown toward those to whom the gift of faith is bestowed. This closest union of humans with God and with one's neighbors is accomplished through the Holy Spirit.

Sharing in the body and blood of Christ in Eucharist at the celebration of the Lord's Supper is regarded as a special moment in the Church's celebration of its life. Eventually the word "communion" came to be used by Christians principally to refer to reception of the Eucharist seen as a high point in sharing the gifts from God. But Paul's original usage was far more inclusive. The early Latin translations of the Greek Bible rendered that NT term as communio, societas, participatio, or communicatio. The last Latin term is used in ex-communicatio, the state in which one is outside the full fellowship of the Church, or the practice of communicatio in sacris, ecumenical sharing in the sacramental life of another church.

The communion that Christians experience within the Church was expressed in a variety of ways from earliest times, such as letter writing, offering of money to needy Christians, bishops' participating at regional gatherings, their laying on of hands at the consecration of bishops in neighboring churches, mutual consultation about disciplinary and doctrinal issues, and shared eucharistic fellowship with other Christians in distant churches. The custom of breaking off a piece of the eucharistic bread before the communion rite (the fractio panis) and sending it to neighboring churches was intended to express visibly the communion that exists among churches.

The term "communion" later appears in creeds such as Jerome's Confession (378) regarding belief in the communio sanctorum, originally meaning belief that Christians share in the communion of "holy things" (especially Baptism, Eucharist, Scripture) but eventually coming to refer mainly to the communion of saints, the vibrant relationship by which living Christians remain in prayerful and affective contact with those who have entered eternal life.

More recently, especially by theologians working to restore visible unity to the Church, ecumenical dialogue has stressed the notion of "communion" ecclesiology. This "communion" ecclesiology (in contrast to ecclesiologies stressing the Mystical Body of Christ, the Church as a perfect society, or the People of God) places special emphasis on the local, particular church and tries to understand its relationship with the churches scattered throughout the world, some of which are not in "full communion" with them. Communion ecclesiology is sensitive to the fact that, despite the divisions within the Church, there is a fundamental unity or communion through Baptism, but not necessarily full, visible communion. See also Church; collegiality; communion of saints; ecclesiology; excommunication; koinonia.

MICHAEL A. FAHEY

Communion, Holy, phrase describing the culmination of the Eucharistic Liturgy, that is, the reception of the body and blood of the Lord under the forms of bread and wine. In some circumstances, Holy Communion can also be received outside of the Eucharistic Liturgy (e.g., when no priest is available to celebrate the Eucharist on a Sunday or when someone is ill or dying.)

The concept of communion can be traced to the NT where it describes the intimate bond of unity that Christians have among themselves because of their common life in the Lord through Baptism. Christians share in the same spiritual realities because of their membership in the one Body of the Lord. Thus communion describes the very life of the Church itself. But as St. Paul makes clear, to share in the bread and the cup of the Lord's Supper is to share in his body and blood (cf. 1 Cor 10:16–22). Thus, through the Eucharist, Christians have communion with the Lord and with one another.

Distribution of Holy Communion (by Bishop Moses Anderson, S.S.E., auxiliary bishop of the archdiocese of Detroit).

This concept of the Eucharist as the source of communion with the Lord and the Church was part of Christian consciousness until the Middle Ages. All those present at the Eucharist participated in the action of taking Communion. Only public sinners, who were doing penance before reconciliation, did not partake. Excommunication was part of their public penance and continued until reconciliation by the bishop.

Theological controversies in the early Middle Ages led to increasing concentration on the presence of the body and blood of the Lord under the forms of bread and wine. This was accompanied at times by an attitude of extreme realism regarding the elements of bread and wine. The consequence was intensified reverence for the consecrated bread and wine, causing a growing sense of unworthiness to receive the Eucharist and an actual decline in reception. The Fourth Lateran Council (1215) had to insist that the faithful receive the Eucharist at least once a year at Easter. But the concentration on communion with the Lord in the Eucharist also led to obscuring communion with the Church as a consequence of reception.

Despite attempts throughout the centuries to encourage more frequent reception of Holy Communion, only since Vatican II (1962–65) has this become the case. Liturgical and theological studies before and after the council recovered the ancient notion of the Eucharist as a meal at which the Lord presides and nourishes his people with his body and blood, furthering communion with himself and among themselves. Participation in the eucharistic liturgy is incomplete without the reception of Holy Communion. The ancient principle of the Eucharist as the source of the Church's unity has been rediscovered and is emphasized in official documents and catechesis.

The 1983 Code of Canon Law reiterates the discipline of Lateran IV regarding reception of the Eucharist once a year at Easter, though it allows for the fulfillment of the obligation at some other time for a just cause. The code also permits a second reception of Holy Communion on the same day, but only at a celebration of the Eucharist. See also Eucharist; Real Presence. JOHN J. STRYNKOWSKI communion of saints, the faithful on earth, in purgatory, and in heaven. The communion of saints is formed by the Holy Spirit into one body participating in Christ's life by Baptism. It is mentioned in the third article of the Apostles' Creed and probably dates from the late fourth century.

All who share the one spirit through the one baptism become one body in Christ (1 Cor 12:12–13), also called "the Mystical Body of Christ" (Pius XII, Mystici Corporis [1943]). All the faithful on earth, in purgatory, and in heaven share the common life of the body (Vatican II, Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, nn. 49–51).

Manifestations of the common life of the communion of saints on earth are union with the ecclesiastical community (i.e., one is joined to a local community in union with its bishop, and so in union with the Church universal, built on Peter and his successors); participation in the sacraments, particularly the Eucharist; other forms of common prayer, including prayer for one another; common service to others; and the love produced and urged by the Spirit, who animates the ecclesiastical community in its sacramental participation, prayer, and service.

Prayer for the dead is an ancient custom (2 Macc 12:43–46) by which the faithful on earth and in heaven care for those in purgatory. Tertullian speaks of suffering after death (On the Resurrection of the Body 43), which he understood might be relieved by the intercession of the living, and mentions the practice of offering the Eucharist for the dead (On Monogamy 10), as does Augustine (Confessions 9.12.32). In systematizing earlier teaching on purgatory, Gregory I (d. 604) teaches clearly that the prayers of the faithful on earth and of the saints in heaven could aid in obtaining the release of those in purgatory (Dialogues 4.40).

In the medieval period, prayers for the dead, while retaining their intercessory character, also became strongly associated with the notion of satisfying the penalty for forgiven sin. At this time the system of indulgences developed as a method of applying one's suffrages to the dead to hasten their release. The Council of Florence (1439) explained suffrages as "the sacrifice of the Mass, prayers, alms and other religious activities which, according to the laws and customs of the Church, the faithful normally offer" (DS 1304). The Council of Trent (1563) affirmed that "a purgatory exists and the souls detained in it can be assisted by the suffrages of the faithful" (DS 1820).

Those in heaven are in a position to assist not only those in purgatory but also the faithful on earth, who have honored the saints in heaven and sought their intercession from the earliest days of Christianity. Honor of the saints includes imitation of them, prayers addressed to them, reverence given to their relics, and the right use of images. Prayer asks the intercession of the saints with God, and honors God's holy creatures, so giving honor to the Creator, the source of all holiness. Reverence to relics and images is paid not to these material realities but to whom or what they represent, and so to the faithful in glory (Council of Trent, DS 1821–25). See also Church; eschatology, individual; eschatology, universal; indulgences; prayers for the dead. MARY A. DONOVAN

Communion Service, the practice, new to Catholicism (apart from Good Friday), of communal distribution of Communion outside the context of the Mass. The liturgy of the Communion Service is governed by the Roman Rite of Distributing Holy Communion Outside Mass. 1: The Long Rite with the Celebration of the Word (1973), and was originally intended as an exceptional usage "when Mass is not celebrated or when Communion is not distributed at scheduled times" (n. 26). However, with the shortage of priests, it has become the usual form of Sunday celebration in an increasing number of parishes. To meet the new situation, the Congregation for Divine Worship issued a Directory for Sunday Celebrations in the Absence of a Priest (1988). In 1991, the U.S. Catholic bishops approved an Order for Sunday Celebrations in the Absence of a Priest for use at Sunday Communion services in the United States. See also Communion, Holy.

Communion under both kinds, the practice of receiving the body and blood of the Lord under the forms of bread and wine. Jesus himself at the Last Supper gave bread and wine to his disciples after declaring the former to be his body and the latter his blood. Christians continued this practice, though with adaptations according to circumstances (e.g., it was simpler to bring the Eucharist to the sick in their homes only under the form of bread). But in the West, theological controversies in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries led to the reception of the Eucharist under the form of bread alone. Controversialists insisted that one had to receive the Eucharist under both forms in order to be saved. Other theologians responded that the Lord was present under either form in the entirety of his being, both body and blood (the doctrine of concomitance). Thus while the practice of Communion under both kinds continued in the East, in the medieval West it gradually disappeared.

Reformers in the sixteenth century declared Communion under one form to be contrary to the scriptural norm. The Council of Trent (1545–63) reaffirmed the doctrine of concomitance and the Church's authority to restrict reception of the Eucharist to one form, that of bread. However, Vatican II (1962–65) called for the reestablishment of Communion under both kinds. The restoration of this practice enables participants in the eucharistic liturgy to experience the abundance of the Lord's self-gift in his body and blood through both sacramental signs of bread and wine. See also Communion, Holy. JOHN J. STRYNKOWSKI

Communism, the system of social organization based on the common ownership of property. The term is associated with the social, political, and economic doctrines of Karl Marx (d. 1883) and Vladimir Lenin (d. 1924) and the international political movement based on those doctrines. For Marx, Communism was the inevitable culmination of the historical process of class conflict, a process moving forward in stages through a series of revolutions, each stage successively eliminating the prior characteristic forms of domination. The final revolution, from capitalism to Communism, would occur when the increasingly disenfranchised working class (the proletariat) organized to seize the ownership of industry. A brief period of socialism (dictatorship of the proletariat) would be followed by the definitive end of all domination in a classless, propertyless, and stateless society of equals. Lenin subsequently shaped Communism as an international political movement by emphasizing the central role of the Communist party as the instigator of revolution, and the export of Communist doctrine to developing nations. Because of its explicit denigration of spiritual and religious values as illusory ideologies, which in practice has often led to the persecution of the Church and the abuse of basic human rights, Communism as both a social theory and political movement has been repeatedly condemned in Catholic social teaching.

With the collapse of the Berlin Wall in November 1989, Communism as a coherent, global political movement began to unravel. The Soviet Union itself went out of existence. The Church and many former Communist countries found themselves faced with a new threat: nationalism and ethnic rivalries. See also Marxism. PAUL J. WOJDA community Mass, the public Mass celebrated by religious or canons, bound to the Divine Office in choir. While no special form for the Mass exists, it is proper to celebrate with singing and full participation of all community members, exercising the functions proper to their order or ministry. See also conventual Mass.

commutation, the changing of certain obligations imposed upon either a physical person or a juridical person (legal entity). Obligations may have been imposed due to conditions of a benefaction or by way of penance or reparation. The impossibility of or serious inconvenience in fulfilling the obligations or any other just reason allows proper Church authority to change obligations to more suitable ones in canon law. See also rights and obligations in canon law.

Compline (Lat., complere, "to complete"), the official night office that concludes the Liturgy of the Hours and signals the end of day. The pre–Vatican II office was invariable, the chief elements being a short lesson, Confiteor (Lat., "I confess"), three psalms and responsory, hymn, canticle, and Marian antiphon. The present brief office, intended to be prayed before retiring, begins with an examination of conscience, a variable hymn and psalm, a short lesson, invariable response, and the Canticle of Simeon. The Sunday options may be used daily. See also Liturgy of the Hours.

Complutensian Polyglot Bible, an edition of the Bible with accompanying translations sponsored by Cardinal Ximenes and produced at Alcalá (Lat., Complutum) in Spain (1521–22) in six folio volumes. The first four volumes contained the Hebrew OT, the Greek Septuagint, and the Latin Vulgate in parallel columns, and the Aramaic Targum Onqelos at the bottom of the page. The NT (volume 5) contained the Greek text and the Latin Vulgate, and volume 6, a Hebrew grammar and a Hebrew-Aramaic dictionary. See also Scripture, versions of.

Comunione e Liberazione (kah-m*oo*-nee-oh'nay ay lee-bavr-ah-tsee-oh'nay; It., "Communion and Liberation"), Catholic renewal movement founded and led by Father Luigi Giussani (b. 1922). In 1993 the movement claimed 90,000 members in Italy and 10,000 in other countries. In 1954, Giussani, then professor of Protestant and Orthodox theology at the Milan seminary (Venegono), decided to become a high school religion teacher, convinced that Christian life among young people was suffocating under moralism. When a group of students formed around him, he first organized them within Catholic Action, an Italian lay movement, but in 1956 founded Gioventù Studentesca (It., "Student Youth") on different principles: Christian life was to take place where students lived and worked; female and male students were to pray and work together; lay mission was to be seen as flowing from Baptism, not from the bishops' call for helpers.

In the early 1970s the phrase "Communion and Liberation" came to express the group's guiding intuition. In the student unrest of 1968 the majority of Gioventù Studentesca left to embrace Marxist liberation movements. The manifesto "Communion and Liberation" proposed that true liberation flows from communion with Christ, from a visible ecclesial communion that can transform daily life.

Comunione e Liberazione is a loosely organized movement without formal membership. Two communities sprang from it and have been canonically recognized: the Fraternità di Comunione e Liberazione ("Fraternity of Communion and Liberation"), recognized in 1982, with 25,000 members as of 1993, is designed for adults who want to make a lifelong commitment to the movement; Memores Domini ("Those Who Remember the Lord"), recognized in 1988 (with 800 members in 1993; 600 novices), live lay lives in celibacy, poverty, and obedience. Generally conservative in orientation, like its Spanish counterpart, Opus Dei, Comunione e Liberazione has often found itself in conflict with the Italian hierarchy and other Catholics who are more positively disposed to the reforms of the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). See also Opus Dei.

MICHAEL WALDSTEIN

concelebration, term commonly used to designate the participation of more than one ordained minister in a liturgical celebration, though in fact any liturgical service is a concelebration of all the baptized participants in the celebration of their common mystery of faith. Ministerial concelebration originally meant the participation of presbyters in the liturgy of their bishop. The Greek term to concelebrate (sylleitourgein) is also commonly used for the Church's liturgy as a concelebration with heavenly service of the angelic powers. Today the narrower, technical sense of the term "concelebration" usually refers to several priests acting together in the administration of the same sacrament, most commonly in the consecration of the Eucharist, an ancient practice restored in the Roman rite following Vatican II. Authors distinguish between this "real" concelebration, consisting in the coconsecration of the sacrament, and "ceremonial" concelebration, in which more than one minister actively participates wearing priestly vestments, but only one recites the sacramental formulas. Such distinctions, based on a rationalistic Western view of ritual in which only words express symbolic meaning, are foreign to the early sources.

Historically, one can distinguish three kinds of eucharistic concelebration: (1) sacramental, verbal coconsecration, as in the Roman, Byzantine, Coptic Catholic, and Maronite rites. Since Vatican II this form has been growing among the Armenian and Syro-Malabar Catholics, too; (2) distributive concelebration, as in the Armenian, Coptic, East and West Syrian, and Ethiopian traditions, in which the ministers share the prayers and actions but do not recite the same prayers together, not even the consecration; and (3) coordinated celebration, in which each priest consecrates his own bread and wine at a separate altar. This custom, admitted in the West Syrian and Ethiopian rites, is actually a form of synchronized multiple Eucharists, not a concelebration.

Sacramental forms of concelebration are also practiced for the Anointing of the Sick in the Byzantine rite and are provided for in Armenian and Coptic sources, too. In addition to the bishop's Eucharist, concelebration is common at other pontifical celebrations (vespers, vigils, Presanctified Liturgy, etc.) in the East. See also Eucharist.

ROBERT F. TAFT

conciliarism, also known as "conciliar theory," a view emanating from canonists of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries according to which an ecumenical council is regarded as being the highest authority in the Church, superior even to the pope. Earliest forms of conciliarism considered a general council as a representation of the whole Church, not as an assembly of autonomous bishops. The word "conciliarism" encompasses the history and theology surrounding the debates among those canonists and later controversies associated with the Great Schism of 1378–1417 when more than one pope claimed to be the legitimate authority.

Historically conciliarism was an attempt to limit papal immunity and to require greater accountability on the part of the pope. It also was haunted by the theoretical possibility of the pope being in error, even in heresy or schism. Marsilius of Padua (ca. 1278–1342/3) is regarded as the founder of conciliarism. He argued for a kind of "democratic" Church in which the people would exercise a kind of sovereignty.

The Great Schism gave practical importance to the theoretical discussion about conciliarism since it offered a means of solving the uncertainties about who was the legitimate pope. Other theologians associated with conciliarism were Jean Gerson, John of Paris, Pierre d'Ailly, and others at the University of Paris.

The decree Haec Sancta, promulgated at the fifth session, April 6, 1415, of the Council of Constance (1414–18) taught that "this synod holds its power directly from Christ; all persons, of whatever rank or dignity, even a pope, are bound to obey it in matters relating to faith and to the end of the schism as well as to the reform of the Church in its head and in its members." As such this assertion was not novel or unheard of in the canonical tradition. It was an attempt to describe certain limitations of papal powers. The exact canonical status of this decree is disputed, some holding that it was not ecumenical, others claiming that it had only a temporary pertinence.

Conciliarism reached a high point at the Council of Basel (1431–38), which asserted the supremacy of a council over a pope. Catholic theologians generally do not consider this a truly ecumenical council because it did not represent the Church universal (only fourteen bishops and abbots were present) and did not receive papal approbation. (The council moved subsequently to Ferrara and then to Florence—both in Italy.)

What differentiates conciliarism from collegiality or from current teaching about the role of an ecumenical council is that it fostered independence from the pope, whereas collegiality views the collective episcopacy as acting in union with the pope, and ecumenical councils are convoked and presided over now by a pope. Gallicanism, whose influence especially in France was strong even at the time of Vatican I (1869–70), is correctly seen as an ecclesiological attitude akin to conciliarism. See also Church; communion, Church as; conciliarity; Constance, Council of; democracy in the Church; ecumenical council.

MICHAEL A. FAHEY

conciliarity, or synodality, the ongoing process by which the Church comes together through its representatives in synods or meetings to pray, seek advice, and reach practical decisions. Conciliarity describes the synodal character of the Church; the term should not be confused with conciliarism and it refers to an ecclesial reality far more comprehensive than collegiality.

The term in recent usage seems to have entered English through French (conciliarité or synodalité), which in turn was an attempt to express what Russian Orthodox calls sobornost (from the Slavonic word sobor, meaning "council"), whose adjectival form sobornaja translates the word "catholic" in the Nicene Creed. For the Russian Orthodox writer A. Khomiakov, sobornost unites the faithful, assists them in the reception of doctrine, and undergirds the infallibility of the Church.

In modern times, since the establishment of the World Council of Churches (Amsterdam, 1948) and the sessions of Vatican II (1962–65), interest in the conciliar structure of the Church has come to the fore. Since 1965, there have been numerous ecumenical discussions about the nature and demands of "conciliar fellowship." The Louvain meeting of Faith and Order (1971) began to study conciliarity described as "the coming together of Christians—locally, regionally or globally—for common prayer, counsel and decision, in the belief that the Holy Spirit can use such meetings for its own purpose by reconciling, renewing and reforming the Church by guiding it towards the fullness of truth and love." Faith and Order's meeting in Salamanca (1973) stated: "The one Church is to be envisioned as a conciliar fellowship of local churches which are themselves truly united. In this conciliar fellowship, each local church possesses, in communion with the others, the fullness of catholicity, witnesses to the same apostolic faith, and, therefore, recognizes the others as belonging to the same Church of Christ and guided by the same Spirit." See also Church; collegiality; communion, Church as; conciliarism; ecumenism; sobornost; synods.

MICHAEL A. FAHEY

conclave (Lat., cum clavis, "with key"), the meeting of cardinals held to elect a pope. It also refers to the separate, locked portion of the Vatican where the election occurs, in which the cardinals remain day and night until the election is completed. The conclave originated in 1271 when local authorities at Viterbo, Italy, wearied by a delay of two years and nine months, confined the cardinals in limited quarters with minimal resources and services until a new pope was chosen. The right to elect the pope belongs solely to those cardinals who are less than eighty years old, but a limited number of specifically designated persons, called conclavists, may enter and remain in the conclave. These include, for example, the secretary of the College of Cardinals, the master of pontifical ceremonies, some priest-religious as confessors, two doctors, and one or several assistants as sacristans, who prepare the altar and vestments for liturgical celebrations. Cardinals may not be accompanied by private ministers except by reason of special health needs. All officials and ministers of the conclave take an oath of secrecy for, during, and after the conclave regarding each and all things directly or indirectly related to it. Cardinals who leave the conclave due to illness, as affirmed by doctors and a majority of the electors, may be readmitted upon recovery, but the election continues in their absence. The conclave concludes after announcement of the name of the new pope to the people by the senior cardinal-deacon. See also Cardinals, College of; papal election.

ELIZABETH MCDONOUGH

concomitance, the teaching that Christ is present in the entirety of his being under each form of the Eucharist, either the bread or the wine. Thus, under the form of the bread Christ is present in his body and blood and the same is true for his presence under the form of wine. Since body and blood are constitutive elements of human nature together with the soul, the Church teaches that Christ is present in the fullness of his human nature, including his soul, and since as person he is divine, the Church teaches that he is present in his divine nature as well. This doctrine was given its definitive formulation by the Council of Trent in 1551. See also Communion under both kinds; Real Presence.

Concord, Book / Formula of, foundational Lutheran confessional statement. The Formula of Concord (1577) resolved the theological differences that divided Lutherans after Luther's death. Composed of twelve articles (on original sin, free will, righteousness of faith, good works, law and gospel, third use of the law, Holy Communion, Christ, the descent into hell, ceremonies, predestination, and condemnation of sectarians), the formula formed part of the Book of Concord (1580), which contained the Augsburg Confession and other statements of belief. In some ways the counterpart of the decrees of the Council of Trent, the Book of Concord became legally binding in most Lutheran states. See also Lutheranism.

concordance, alphabetical listing of all words in a given book, with a phrase identifying the context. For concordances to the original texts of the Bible, see J. A. Fitzmyer, An Introductory Bibliography for the Study of Scripture (Rome: Biblical Institute, 1990). B. Metzger, New Revised Standard Version Exhaustive Concordance (Nashville: Nelson, 1990), is an example of a concordance to a version of the Bible in English.

concordat, an agreement between the Holy See and a political body made to safeguard certain rights of the Church. There is nothing in the code of canon law that negates any existing agreements. The study of these matters constitutes part of the ius publicum externum (external public law) of canon law as contrasted with the study of the more extensive ius publicum internum (internal public law). An example of a concordat is the Lateran Treaty of 1929. See also Lateran Treaty.

concupiscence, desire. The term "concupiscence" has been used in two senses throughout most of the history of the Catholic moral tradition. In one sense, concupiscence is identified with desire in a morally problematic sense, and more particularly, with morally problematic forms of sexual desire. But Scholastic moral theology, following the analysis of Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274), also defined concupiscence in a more general and morally neutral sense, i.e., as equivalent to any desire grounded in an organism's responses to its own needs and its environment. So understood, concupiscence is the passion of desire for the good, and is immediately linked with the passions of love, joy or delight, and sadness. Concupiscence is understood in this context to be the soul's passionate movement toward whatever is perceived to be lovable; joy or sadness follows, depending on whether the desired object is attained or not. Concupiscence is contrasted with the will, which is understood as the faculty by which the individual desires and moves toward the good because of the judgment of the intellect. This contrast did not imply that concupiscence was contrary to the will in the concrete operations of the psyche. Indeed, Aquinas held that all human action is necessarily grounded in the will, which can be influenced by concupiscence and the other passions only through the medium of the intellect. See also free will; sexual morality; temperance.

concupiscible appetites. See appetites, concupiscible and irascible.

condign merit (kahn'din; Lat., [con]-dignus, "worthy"), a human entitlement to a divine reward, based upon God's acceptance of human actions that are performed with the aid of grace. This merit, grounded in the value of Christian activity, stands in contrast to merit de congruo (Lat.), which is a reward (of grace or heaven) given out of "fittingness," solely out of divine generosity, and with less reference to human activity. Merit de condigno makes no human claim in strict justice upon divine gifts or rewards but does suggest a human claim upon further grace and heaven by graced human activity. Condign merit flows from the free, graced actions of an individual who is citizen and heir of the reign of God.

Although some of the late-medieval theologians claimed that the first arrival of grace to an individual, i.e., justification, might be merited by good actions, graced or not, after the Council of Trent (1545–63) Catholic theologians have taught clearly that human beings in no way merit God's free gift of initial grace. While the concept of merit calls attention to the real contribution of our human freedom and activity, it also holds that the Christian life and its activities are gifts of God. See also merit.

conditional baptism, the celebration of Baptism with the condition "If you are not already baptized. . . ." This may occur in two instances: (1) there exists a doubt about the fact of one's baptism that cannot be resolved even after serious investigation, e.g., no record or witness can be found; and (2) after serious investigation, a doubt exists whether the baptism, which can be determined to have occurred, was valid in view of a defect regarding the use of water (matter) or the required words (form). See also Baptism.

condonation, the acceptance of an act without necessarily indicating approval. The code of canon law, for example, speaks of the condonation by one spouse of another's adultery (can. 1152). This indicates a willingness not to separate (as the law would allow), but it certainly does not indicate approval.

conference of bishops. See episcopal conference.

Conference of Major Superiors of Men, official organization of the major superiors of men in the United States, founded in 1956. It includes all major superiors of priests' and brothers' religious communities. The statutes of the conference are approved by Rome. The purpose of the conference is primarily to promote the spiritual and apostolic life of the religious communities. It also provides opportunities for cooperation among religious communities and with the hierarchy and serves as a national voice for religious superiors. In 1994 there were 269 major superiors representing communities with a combined membership of about 30,000. See also Council of Major Religious Superiors of Women Religious; Leadership Conference of Women Religious; major moderator in religious institute.

confession, auricular, the private confessing of one's sins to a priest. There is no clear evidence of private or auricular confession either in Scripture or during the early Church period, when the ritual of Penance itself was public and the sins of a penitent were publicly known. Only in the late sixth century, when the Celtic form of sacramental Reconciliation became popular, did the issue of private confession to a priest become an integral part of the sacrament. As this Celtic form became both widespread throughout the Church and eventually adopted officially by the Lateran Council of 1215, theologians and canonists began to formulate their teaching on the basic components of auricular confession. In their teaching, the most important element of one's confession, whether public or private, is this: a baptized Christian who has sinned must acknowledge, i.e., confess, sinfulness. A person must candidly accept responsibility for personal sin; one must admit that one is a sinner. This is the starting point for every aspect of "confession of sin." Such an admission of sin must be "integral," i.e., it must include all serious sins. A person cannot select only certain sins for Penance and reject others. This is the basic meaning of an "integral" confession of sins.

At the time of the Reformation, the leadership of the Catholic Church was accused of "inventing" private confession of sin. At the Council of Trent, the bishops responded by stressing first of all the "integral" element in one's confession of sin (D 1679). They clearly allowed that such a confession of sin could be public, although this form was not required by divine law (D 1683). In the corresponding canon, they stressed that private confession of sin to a priest was neither a human invention nor alien to the command of Christ (D 1706). At the time of Trent, theologians and canonists taught that the private confession in an act of perfect contrition of itself took away all sin. The theological relationship between such an internal private confession and contrition of sin, on the one hand, and the sacramental confession of sin to a priest, on the other, was disputed by theologians and canonists. The bishops at Trent did not attempt to resolve this relational issue, leaving it open to further investigation. However, the bishops maintained the necessity of confessing one's mortal sins annually to a priest, as prescribed by the Fourth Lateran Council (1215).

In the post–Vatican II (1962–65) sacramental rite of Penance the stress on the social nature of all sin helps one understand theologically the need for confession of sin to a priest. Sin is presented as an offense against both God and the community. Consequently, Reconciliation is reconciliation with both God and the community. Since every sin has a social dimension, every confession of sin or act of Reconciliation must also have a social dimension. The Christian community, therefore, must play a role in the reconciliation of sinners, and this is done, generally, through an official Church leader, i.e., a bishop or priest. In the early Church, when the procedure was public, it was the bishop or priest who, in the name of God and of the community, accepted a sinner back into the community. In a later period of Church history, when the procedure had become private, it was once again an official of the Church community who accepted a sinner back into a community. With the renewal of Vatican II, the communal or public nature of the priest's role in Reconciliation is more apparent, particularly in the communal forms of celebrating this sacrament. Form II involves the reconciliation of several penitents with individual confession and absolution, while form III allows for general confession and absolution of several penitents. However, even in the more private form (form I) the priest does not act alone, but in the name of the Church community.

There remains, however, a serious theologically unresolved issue regarding auricular confession. In the case of general absolution, although all sins are forgiven, a penitent is required to confess serious sins to a priest at the next private confession. Theologians currently have not presented a clear reason for this canonical regulation. See also general confession; Reconciliation; seal of confession.

KENAN B. OSBORNE

confessional, a place where priest and penitent celebrate the sacrament of Reconciliation. In the patristic period, the final rites of sacramental Reconciliation took place in a church, except in case of death. The beginnings of the Celtic form of Penance give no clear indication of place. Eventually, the church became the ordinary place for the sacrament. Confessionals, as we know them today, began in Milan in the sixteenth century with Charles Borromeo. The confessional was mandated by the Council of Trent (1545–63). In current canon law, a confessional room is the proper location. A place for anonymous confession must always be provided (can. 964). See also confession; auricular; Reconciliation.

confessor (Lat., confiteri, "to declare openly"), in the early Church a name for those who had suffered imprisonment or torture for the faith without actually being killed. Later it came to refer more generally to any saint who was not a martyr. See also martyr.

Confiteor (kahn-fee'tay-ohr; Lat., "I confess"), an optional part of the introductory rites at Mass in the Roman rite. The Confiteor, which was once part of the prayers recited at the foot of the altar at the beginning of Mass, grew out of the medieval apologiae, prayers of unworthiness said by the clergy during the procession to the altar.

CONFIRMATION

Confirmation is a sacrament in the Christian initiation process. At present it may be celebrated as part of the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults or as a sacrament separate from Baptism, in the case of those baptized as infants. The difference in these two experiences raises questions as to the meaning of the sacrament when celebrated apart from Baptism and the Eucharist. A brief survey of its historical development followed by a discussion of the present reforms sheds some light on the problem and points to possible future directions.

PRIMITIVE CHURCH

While Scripture shows the importance of the act of Christian initiation and its relationship to the gift of the Holy Spirit, it provides no evidence for a specific rite of Confirmation. The Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus (third century) indicates that initiation took place within one celebration consisting of several ritual moments: (1) a water bath; (2) an anointing by a presbyter with consecrated oil; (3) laying on of hands by the bishop, accompanied by a prayer; (4) an anointing on the head by the bishop with the same oil used for the anointing by the presbyter; and (5) the kiss of peace. Scholars differ as to the meaning of the anointing by the bishop, but the fact that the bishop had a significant role in the initiatory process affected future developments.

By the fifth century, the anointing by the bishop had become associated with the coming of the Holy Spirit. This may have been connected to fourth- and fifth-century controversies concerning the Holy Spirit. It is also during this period that the word "confirmation" appears, stressing the bishop's role in an initiation process over which he has not presided. While there is evidence that some Western bishops were "confirming" those baptisms presided over by a presbyter, the practice was not universal. The East continued to hold for the unity of the sacraments of initiation by permitting presbyters to complete the process.

MEDIEVAL PRACTICE

Throughout the Middle Ages, changes in local church structure affected the initiation process. Lack of sufficient bishops in outlying areas raised the question of how initiation should be completed. Unlike in the East, the majority of churches in the West opted to retain the final anointing by the bishop. Thus, the practice of delaying full initiation until such time as a bishop was available became common outside Rome. But at no time in the early medieval period can it be said that initiation practices were uniform throughout the Western Church. By the ninth century, however, theological reflection on the practice of delayed anointing by a bishop had already led to the interpretation that the Spirit was conferred by the imposition of hands and chrismation (anointing with oil).

SCHOLASTIC THEOLOGY

Medieval theologians had both a rite independent of Baptism, celebrated by a bishop, and a theological tradition associating this rite with the gift of the Holy Spirit as a background for their debates concerning the number of sacraments. They focused on the anointing with chrism, consecrated oil, and its accompanying prayer as the most important element in the rite. Convinced that the Spirit was given in Baptism, they sought to distinguish these separate conferrals of the Spirit. Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) clearly articulated the unique gift of the Spirit in the sacrament of Confirmation in his Summa Theologiae. Baptism was the sacrament of Christian birth, Confirmation the sacrament of Christian growth or maturity. The matter for the sacrament according to Thomas was the chrism. The form of the sacrament was the words: "I sign you with the sign of the cross and confirm you with the chrism of salvation in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit."

FROM TRENT TO THE MODERN PERIOD

Tridentine discussions of the sacrament of Confirmation accepted the Scholastic position stated by Thomas Aquinas and yielded one change in the ritual, namely, the bishop's placing his hand upon the head of the candidate as he anointed the forehead with chrism. The Tridentine rite of Confirmation consisted of (1) a collective imposition of hands by the bishop, accompanied by a prayer for the sevenfold gifts of the Holy Spirit; (2) an anointing with chrism by the bishop, whose hand rested on the head of the individual as he anointed the forehead with oil and spoke the formula "I sign you . . . "; (3) a slight blow on the cheek accompanied by the words "Peace be with you"; and (4) a prayer for the indwelling of the Holy Spirit.

Throughout this period, the practice of receiving Confirmation prior to the reception of First Eucharist continued. It was with the call by Pius X in the 1910 decree from the Congregation of Rites Quam Singulari that a radical change in practice was set in motion. In this decree, First Confession was placed prior to the reception of First Eucharist and both were received at the age of reason (approximately seven years).

Thus, at the time of the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), the practice was to baptize infants and provide First Confession along with First Eucharist at the age of seven and Confirmation at a later age (about ten). The delay in the reception of Confirmation until an age of ten or more coupled with a theology that stressed Confirmation as a sacrament of maturity set the stage for a catechesis that stressed growth in the faith as synonymous with making a mature, adult commitment. One became a "soldier in Christ's army," ready to profess and defend the faith. The sacrament of Confirmation took on the aspect of a puberty rite or a graduation exercise.

The sacrament of Confirmation (conferred by Bishop Joseph Charron, C.PP.S., former auxiliary bishop of the archdiocese of St. Paul and Minneapolis, now bishop of Des Moines, at St. Stephen's Church, Anoka, Minnesota).

REFORMS OF THE SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL

The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (Sancrosanctum Concilium) called for the revision of the sacraments of initiation (nn. 64–71), specifically the restoration of the ancient process of initiation of adults (nn. 64–66). This revision resulted in the promulgation in 1972 of the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (RCIA). The constitution also called for the revision of the rite of Confirmation so that it might be seen within the context of an initiation process (n. 71). A revised Rite of Confirmation was promulgated in 1971.

RITE OF CHRISTIAN INITIATION OF ADULTS

The sacrament of Confirmation as celebrated in the adult rite of initiation (which includes children of catechetical age [RCIA, n. 3]) is one moment in a unified celebration of initiation. This initiation liturgy is to be "celebrated by parish priests . . . at the Easter Vigil" (RCIA, n. 17). While other times may be chosen due to need, they should fall within the octave of Easter or at least in the season prior to Pentecost. Confirmation may be delayed but only for "serious reason" (RCIA, n. 24). When such delay occurs, the priest who baptized may confirm if the bishop is not available. Again, the time for such celebration should be in keeping with the paschal character of the sacrament. If a Sunday in the Easter season is not available, then preference is to be given to a Sunday in Ordinary Time.

The parish priest who presides at the Easter Vigil celebrates the sacraments of initiation. If the numbers to be initiated are large, he may be assisted by other priests in the ritual of confirming the candidates. It is presumed that the local bishop will preside at the Easter Vigil in the cathedral and therefore will also preside over the sacraments of initiation celebrated that evening.

The celebration of Confirmation follows the presentation of the lighted candle in the baptismal component of the rite. The presider addresses the newly baptized, reminding them that they are to "share in the outpouring of the Holy Spirit" (RCIA, n. 233). He then "holds his hands outstretched over . . . those to be confirmed" and says a prayer for the sevenfold gift of the Holy Spirit. Each candidate goes to the presider (accompanied by the godparents, who place a right hand on the candidate's shoulder), who anoints the forehead of the candidate with chrism in the sign of the cross saying, "Be sealed with the Gift of the Holy Spirit" (RCIA, n. 235). The presider then says, "Peace be with you," to which the newly confirmed answers, "And also with you."

The introduction to the act of Confirmation and the prayer during the laying on of hands both speak of the coming of the Spirit, permitting an interpretation that the Spirit does not come until Confirmation. Yet, the rhythm of the entire body of ritual moments in this one liturgical event overpowers any such interpretation of a "moment" of Baptism or a "moment" of Confirmation. One is initiated during the course of an evening of celebration that culminates as the newly initiated take their place around the eucharistic table and offer the Eucharist for the first time as members of the faith community.

RITE OF CONFIRMATION

The Rite of Confirmation (RC) as celebrated with children baptized as infants is a sacrament seeking a theology, for several significant problems result from its separation from the unity of the original initiation process. To understand fully the problems raised by the present practice of the rite of Confirmation as received by children or young adults, it is necessary to view it in light of the norms set by the RCIA. Here, in the introduction to the collection of rituals, the ancient order of Baptism, Confirmation, Eucharist is the norm (RCIA, n. 2). The introduction further indicates that initiation is a process or a "spiritual journey" (RCIA, n. 5) that takes place "within the community of the faithful" (RCIA, n. 4). An individual begins the process as a catechumen journeying through the various stages with others in the catechumenate. The journey climaxes in the celebration of the sacraments of Baptism, Confirmation, and the Eucharist at the Easter Vigil. However, if pastoral necessity demands, the sacraments may be celebrated at another time but must be celebrated in a single liturgical event (RCIA, n. 8).

The revised sacrament of Confirmation for children baptized as infants was promulgated in August 1971 by Paul VI's Apostolic Constitution on the Sacrament of Confirmation. This text along with the introduction to the ritual provide a direction for present theological reflection on the state of the sacrament. Paul VI stresses the ancient sequence of the sacraments of initiation: "The faithful are born anew by baptism, strengthened by the sacrament of confirmation, and finally are sustained by the food of eternal life in the Eucharist." The introduction to the Rite of Confirmation speaks of those to be confirmed as either "adult catechumens who are to be confirmed immediately after baptism" or as "children" who are to be prepared "for the fruitful reception of the sacraments of confirmation and Eucharist" by parents "with the help of catechetical institutions" (n. 3). It is evident from the above that the revised rite considers as normative the reception of First Eucharist prior to Confirmation and the confirmation of children at the age of reason. However, exceptions are permitted: "For pastoral reasons, however, especially to strengthen the faithful in complete obedience to Christ the Lord and in loyal testimony to him, episcopal conferences may choose an age which seems more appropriate, so that the sacrament is given at a more mature age after appropriate formation" (n. 11).

In addition to continuing to stress the need to adhere to the ancient order of the sacraments of initiation, the Rite of Confirmation offers further connections to infant baptism by suggesting that the godparent at Baptism be the sponsor at Confirmation, candidates renew their baptismal promises, and the sacrament be celebrated within Mass. Unlike the adult rite, which speaks first of the local priest as the minister of the sacraments of initiation at the Easter Vigil, the Rite of Confirmation speaks of the bishop as the ordinary minister (RC, n. 7). The rite does introduce the possibility of associating other priests with the bishop in the administration of the sacrament (RC, n. 8).

The revised Rite of Confirmation attempts to clear up the confusion between the imposition of hands and the anointing with chrism. Paul VI definitively states the following in his apostolic constitution: "The sacrament of confirmation is conferred through the anointing with chrism on the forehead, which is done by the laying on of the hand, and through the words: Be sealed with the gift of the Holy Spirit." This anointing with chrism follows the collective laying on of hands with prayer for the coming of the Spirit. The hand of the bishop no longer rests on the head of the candidate, thus eliminating one confusing element found in the Tridentine rite. The rite concludes with the bishop saying, "Peace be with you," to which the newly confirmed responds. Eliminated is the confusing "blow on the cheek" from former rites.

See also Baptism; catechumenate; chrism; Holy Spirit; Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults; sacrament; sacramental character.

Bibliography

Austin, Gerald. The Rite of Confirmation: Anointing with the Spirit. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1985.

Kavanagh, Aidan. Confirmation: Origins and Reform. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1988.

MARY A. PIIL

confraternities, associations, almost exclusively lay, dedicated to acts of public worship and/or Christian doctrine. While such groups had canonical prescriptions under the old Code of Canon Law, the present code deals with groups under the general rubric of "Associations of the Christian faithful" (can. 298). Such groups, many with a long history going back into the late Middle Ages, are distinguished from religious orders by their absence of vows. Historic confraternities did everything from caring for condemned prisoners and assisting the poor to teaching catechism and burying the dead. Typically, they had their own chapels, patronal feast days, and extra-liturgical ceremonies.

In the contemporary Church those associations that derive from a private impulse should be reviewed by competent authorities in order to gain recognition (can. 299.3) and none may assume the adjective "Catholic" without such authority (can. 300). Only competent ecclesiastical authority may establish associations for the teaching of doctrine in the name of the Church or for the end of public worship; only such associations may be recognized as "public associations" in canon law. See also associations of the Christian faithful.

Confraternity of Christian Doctrine (CCD), official organ for the catechetical instruction of the Catholic laity. First proposed in the period of Catholic Reform in the late sixteenth century, it was reborn through the efforts of Pope Pius X, whose encyclical Acerbo Nimis (1905) called for a renewed approach to religious instruction and the establishment of the CCD in every Catholic parish.

In the modern U.S. Church the CCD was established as an independent apostolate in 1935 with a national director and a publishing arm. CCD was seen as the means of instructing youth (and their parents) who did not have the advantage of Catholic schooling. This catechetical effort was (and is) closely tied to the administrative structure of the office of the U.S. bishops, which still coordinates such educational efforts.

Today, the CCD is practically synonymous with parish catechetical and religious education programs. Most are headed by professionally trained directors of religious education (DRES) who are responsible for the selection, formation, and supervision of lay catechists. See also catechesis; catechetics; religious education.

Congar, Yves, b. 1904, French Dominican theologian, cardinal, and ecumenist. Perhaps the most influential Catholic theologian of this century prior to Vatican II (1962–65), Congar broke new ground in Catholic theology regarding the Church (ecclesiology), specifically concerning the episcopacy, tradition, ministry, laity, and ecumenism (all of which constituted, in addition to liturgy, the agenda of the Second Vatican Council). Early in his life he met pioneers of the ecumenical movement, important historians of medieval theology, Russian Orthodox refugees, advocates of new Protestant thinking, and French intellectuals who were seeking a contemporary Catholic theology. At the time of his ordination as a Dominican priest in 1930, he decided to devote himself to the renewal of the history of ecclesiology. He was convinced that meticulous historical research into the cultural forms of Church life could help to revitalize the Church itself. Historical contextualization would disclose the underlying, perduring reality of the Church but, at the same time, show what could and should be discarded for the sake of renewal. In 1937, Congar began a series of reports on ecumenism, and for decades he published surveys of books and articles on the Church.

He spoke at countless meetings, large and small, on the ecumenical movement and he preached a moving series of sermons on ecumenism at Sacré-Cœur in Paris in January 1936. That week was seen as a watershed for Catholic involvement in the ecumenical movement, which until then was a Protestant movement. Congar attended the great ecumenical conferences of 1937 at Oxford and Edinburgh, and a year later Chrétiens Désunis (Divided Christendom) appeared—the first major expression of Catholic ecumenical theology. He preached the Week of Christian Unity every year from 1936 to 1964 in France and elsewhere. He served in World War II as a medical orderly and was a prisoner of war. His first major book after the war was True and False Reform in the Church (1950), a markedly ecumenical treatment of church renewal and of Martin Luther. The book was withdrawn from circulation upon orders from the Vatican. Three years later he produced his large study, Lay People in the Church.

Yves Congar, French Dominican theologian generally regarded as the greatest ecclesiologist of the twentieth century.

In 1954 growing threats from the Vatican led to his removal from teaching, lecturing, and publishing. While in exile at the École Biblique in Jerusalem, he wrote The Mystery of the Temple, a study of the biblical sources of the Christian community.

Congar's work expresses both theological and historical gifts. He emphasized the essential sacramentality of Catholicism exemplified in his theology of Mary, the Church, and the Eucharist. Drawing on Eastern theologians and on Catholic thinkers in conversation with German Idealism, he offered in Tradition and Traditions (1966) a history of the doctrine of tradition and a theology of tradition viewed as the organic life of the Church as it continually reflects on revelation, both past and present. L'Eglise de S. Augustin a l'epoque moderne (1970, The Church from St. Augustine to the Modern Era) sums up Congar's basic vocation as it traces through fifteen centuries dozens of forms of Church life that range from the liturgical role of abbesses to the expansion of Roman curial congregations. An incapacitating nervous disease that developed in 1965 has not hindered him from publishing studies on Vatican II (including his diaries), an insightful revision of his earlier work on lay ministry, and a multivolume study on the Holy Spirit, I Believe in the Holy Spirit (1979). He was named a cardinal in 1994.

Bibliography

Jossua, Jean Pierre. Yves Congar. Chicago: The Priory Press, 1968 [with a bibliography of Congar's writings up to 1968].

Lauret, Bernard, ed. Fifty Years of Catholic Theology: Conversations with Yves Congar. Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1988.

Nichols, Aidan. Yves Congar. Wilton, CT: Morehouse Publishers, 1989.

THOMAS F. O'MEARA

congregation, one of several categories of juridically equivalent departments, or dicasteries, of the Roman Curia. Each congregation is composed of cardinals and bishops only, is headed by a cardinal prefect or an archbishop president, and is assisted by a secretary, subsecretaries, administrative staff, and consultors. According to Pastor Bonus (1988), there are nine congregations: For the Doctrine of the Faith; For the Eastern (Oriental) Churches; For Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments; For the Causes of Saints; For Bishops; For the Evangelization of Peoples (Propagation of the Faith); For the Clergy; For Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life; On Seminaries and Institutes of Studies (Catholic Education). See also Pastor Bonus; Roman Curia.

Congregationalism, a movement, originally within Puritanism, founded on the conviction that the primary ecclesial polity should be the local assembly of Christians, whose faithfulness to Jesus Christ spiritually manifests the universal Church. In this view institutional structures, especially hierarchical ones, are incompatible with the Gospels. It appeals to the biblical account of Jesus exclaiming that where two or three are gathered in his name, he is there among them (Matt 18:20). Interpreting this text in the light of the modern idea of democracy, Congregationalism maintains that all members of the Church should have the opportunity for an equal voice in the life and worship of the Church. In this regard, it emphasizes the priesthood of all those who are baptized (1 Pet 2:5, 9).

This movement arose in England in the sixteenth century, in large part through the efforts of Robert Browne (1550–1633), whose views were shared by the separatists Henry Barrow (1550–93), John Greenwood (d. 1593), and John Penry (1559–93). In North America, Congregationalism initially assumed two forms. The "Pilgrims" of the Plymouth Bay Colony separated from the Church of England and the Puritans of Massachusetts Bay remained in communion with the Church of England. Today, Congregationalism stresses each person's experience of God, the life of the assembly, and the preaching of the word of God. It is reluctant to make creedal or doctrinal statements. It recognizes two sacraments, Baptism and the Lord's Supper, though it does not require Baptism for membership.

In 1957 many Congregational churches in the U.S. merged with other Protestant bodies to form the United Church of Christ. In England and Wales the greater part of the Congregational Church united in 1972 with the Presbyterian Church of England to form the United Reformed Church. See also Protestantism; Reformation, the. ROBERT A. KRIEG

Congregation for Bishops, a department of the Roman Curia originally established by Pope Sixtus V in 1588 and known as the Sacred Consistorial Congregation. It became the Sacred Congregation for Bishops when the Roman Curia was reorganized by Pope Paul VI in 1967 and retained that title (without Sacred) in the 1988 reorganization of the Curia by Pope John Paul II. It has oversight in all matters pertaining to the constitution, division, union, and suppression of particular churches (i.e., dioceses), except for missionary areas subject to the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples, and it also establishes military ordinariates. Its wide range of responsibilities includes moderating all aspects of episcopal appointments; assisting bishops in the correct exercise of their pastoral functions; conducting apostolic visitations; handling ad limina visits; establishing episcopal conferences and reviewing their decrees as required by law; dealing with personal prelatures; and relating specifically to the Pontifical Commission for Latin America (Pastor Bonus, 1988, nn. 75–84). See also bishop; Pastor Bonus; Roman Curia.

Congregation for Catholic Education, also known as the Congregation for Seminaries and Institutes of Studies, a department of the Roman Curia founded in 1588 by Pope Sixtus V with oversight of universities in Rome, Bologna, Paris, Salamanca, and Louvain. After 1870 its competence was restricted specifically to Catholic universities and this role was confirmed in the curial reorganization of Pope Pius X in 1908. In 1915, Pope Benedict XV renamed it the Congregation for Seminaries and Universities, and Pope Paul VI renamed it again in 1967 as the Congregation for Catholic Education. Its current title was given by Pope John Paul II in 1988. This congregation has responsibility for formation of all clergy, especially regarding the program of study for seminarians (Pastor Bonus, 1988, nn. 112–13). It is also responsible for promotion and organization of Catholic education, including establishing norms for governance of Catholic schools. In addition, it has concern for Catholic universities, and it erects, approves, and ratifies the statutes of ecclesiastical universities and institutes. See also Catholic colleges and universities—statistics; Catholicism and education; Pastor Bonus; pontifical universities; Roman Curia; seminary.

Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments, a department of the Roman Curia that moderates sacred liturgy, safeguards valid and licit celebration of sacraments, furthers effective liturgical action (especially concerning the Eucharist), revises liturgical texts and reviews translations thereof, establishes commissions for liturgical music, chant, and art, and regulates sacred relics. It also examines nonconsummatum (unconsummated) marriage cases and cases of nullity of sacred orders (Pastor Bonus, 1988, nn. 62–69). This congregation evolved from divisions and combinations of formerly autonomous congregations. The Congregation for Divine Worship and the Congregation for the Discipline of the Sacraments were united by Pope Paul VI in 1975 as the Congregation for the Sacraments and Divine Worship. In 1984 Pope John Paul II reestablished them as separate congregations, but four years later, in his apostolic constitution Pastor Bonus, he reunited them again as the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments. See also Roman Curia; sacrament; worship.

Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life, a department of the Roman Curia founded in 1586 by Pope Sixtus V with oversight of pontifical institutes both of men and of women whether religious institutes (Code of Canon Law, cans. 607–709), secular institutes (cans. 710–30), or societies of apostolic life (cans. 731–46) in the areas of government, discipline, studies, property, and legislation. It establishes pontifical institutes (can. 589) and judges the suitability of establishment of diocesan institutes by bishops (can. 579). In addition, it can establish conferences of major superiors (cans. 708–9) and has competence over both the eremitical life, i.e., that of monks living by themselves (can. 603), and the order of virgins (can. 604), as well as those associations of the faithful (cans. 298–329) that have been founded with the intent of becoming institutes of consecrated life or societies of apostolic life (Pastor Bonus, 1988, n. 111). See also apostolate; consecrated life; religious institute; Roman Curia; secular institute.

Congregation for Seminaries and Institutes of Studies. See Congregation for Catholic Education.

Congregation for the Causes of the Saints, originally the Sacred Congregation of Rites, a congregation of the Roman Curia established by Pope Sixtus V in 1588 to regulate both divine worship and the beatification and canonization of saints. In 1969 Pope Paul VI divided the Congregation of Rites into the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Congregation for Causes of Saints, giving the latter a new structure with three offices (judicial, Promotor General of the Faith, and historical-judicial). In 1983 this congregation was again internally reordered and, simultaneously, the norms for conducting investigations for canonizations were entirely reformed. In addition to making recommendations to the pope on specific canonizations subsequent to completion of required procedures, it decides on conferral of the title "doctor" on a given saint and is responsible for the authentication and preservation of sacred relics (Pastor Bonus, 1988, nn. 72–74). See also beatification; canonization; relics; Roman Curia; saints.

Congregation for the Clergy, a congregation of the Roman Curia instituted by Pope Pius IV in 1564 as the Sacred Congregation for Interpretation of the Council of Trent (1545–63), commonly referred to as the Congregation of the Council until given its present title by Pope Paul VI in his reorganization of the Roman Curia in 1967. In 1988 Pope John Paul II expanded its oversight duties and added to it a Pontifical Commission on the Preservation of Artistic and Historic Patrimony (Pastor Bonus, nn. 99–104). The congregation has three offices. One is responsible for matters concerning the holiness of life, the intellectual and pastoral renewal, and the equitable distribution, or assignment, of the clergy around the world, including the obligations of Masses and pious foundations for use in the charitable, missionary, and other works of the Church (nn. 93, 95–97). Another has competence over preaching and the organization and promotion of religious instruction, including catechisms (n. 94). Yet another is responsible for all matters pertaining to ecclesiastical goods and property as well as their administration (n. 96). See also catechism; clergy; pious foundation; Roman Curia.

Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, a congregation of the Roman Curia originally established by Pope Paul III in 1542 as the Sacred Congregation of the Universal Inquisition (not to be confused with the Spanish Inquisition). Its purpose was to safeguard the faith, proscribe false doctrines, and defend the Church from heresy. The pope endowed the cardinals assigned to it with unlimited competency in matters of faith and morals for all Christians. In 1588, Pope Sixtus V changed its name to the Sacred Congregation of the Holy Inquisition, gave it first rank in the Roman Curia, and located it in its current headquarters near the Basilica of St. Peter. In 1908, Pope Pius X changed the name to Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office and united it with what was then the curial Section on Indulgences, but in 1917 Pope Benedict IV transferred the Section on Indulgences to the Sacred Penitentiary. He simultaneously suppressed the Congregation for the Index as a separate curial department and made it a subsection of the Holy Office. In the reorganization of the Roman Curia by Pope Paul VI in 1967, this congregation was renamed the Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith and, since the mid-1980s, it, along with the other congregations of the Roman Curia, has no longer been referred to as "sacred." The 1988 reorganization of the Curia by Pope John Paul II did not change the name of this congregation, and its proper function continues to be the promotion and safeguarding of faith and morals (Pastor Bonus, n. 48).

The Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith is charged with fostering scholarship with a view to a deepened understanding of the faith and an ability to respond to new initiatives in science and culture. It also assists bishops in their roles as authentic teachers and doctors of the faith (nn. 49–50). It has oversight of publications that deal with faith and morals, including oversight of documents touching on these matters that are published by other departments of the Roman Curia (n. 54). It investigates and reproves writings that seem contrary or dangerous to the faith, after affording authors the opportunity of an explanation and after appropriate warning to the competent ordinary, i.e., diocesan bishop or other religious superior (n. 51). It also handles ecclesiastical offenses against the faith and against morals and violations related to celebrations of the sacraments, and can provide for canonical sanctions if necessary (n. 52). Finally, it has the authority to grant privilege-of-the-faith dispensations (dissolving of marriage between a baptized and an unbaptized person) from the natural bond of marriage. The Pontifical Biblical Commission and International Theological Commission are subentities of this congregation (nn. 53, 55). In its functioning, the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith proceeds either administratively or judicially according to its own special norms. It is assisted by consultors representing the entire Catholic world, though not always reflecting its rich diversity, and its final decisions are underscored by the approval of the pope himself. See also faith; heresy; Inquisition; International Theological Commission; Pontifical Biblical Commission; Privilege of the Faith; Roman Curia.

ELIZABETH MCDONOUGH

Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples, also known as Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, a commission of cardinals established by Popes Pius V and Gregory XIII for the Orient, with its range of responsibility later expanded to include Protestants in Europe. It was given the title Propagation of the Faith by Pope Clement VIII in 1599, and Pope Paul VI gave it the present name when he reorganized the Roman Curia in 1967. This congregation directs and coordinates the evangelization of all peoples and missionary cooperation throughout the world, fosters missionary vocations, cares for the education of catechists and clergy, supervises the establishment of churches as well as the delineation of territorial boundaries for future dioceses, and organizes distribution of subsidies for missionary works. In several of these areas of responsibility it works with the Congregation for the Oriental Churches, the Congregation for Catholic Education (on seminaries and institutes of studies), and the Congregation for Bishops. See also evangelization; Roman Curia.

Congregation for the Oriental Churches, Vatican congregation of the Roman Curia with responsibility for all Eastern-rite Catholics and churches everywhere and over all Catholics of whatever rite in traditionally Eastern Christian countries. Apart from matters that are the responsibility of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith and the Sacred Apostolic Penitentiary, this jurisdiction is almost all-inclusive, extending even to mixed cases involving both Eastern and Latin Catholics. So the Oriental Congregation, as it is usually called, is for the Catholic East the Roman Curia in microcosm. The congregation was established by Pope Benedict XV on May 1, 1917, but its origins go back to 1573, when Gregory XIII set up a Congregation for Greek Affairs, later absorbed into the new Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith in 1622. From time to time this congregation established special commissions for Eastern questions, among them the important Commission for the Correction of the Greek Euchologion (1636–45), expanded by Clement XI in 1719 into the Congregation for the Correction of the Books of the Oriental Church. From these commissions and their successor, the Special Commission for Liturgy, have come the universally acclaimed Roman editions of the Eastern liturgical books, used by Catholics and Orthodox alike. The congregation, comprising all Eastern Catholic patriarchs and major archbishops, the cardinal prefect of the Pontifical Council for Christian Unity ex officio, and other cardinals and hierarchs appointed by the pope, is presided over by a cardinal prefect assisted by the secretary, always an archbishop. But the day-to-day work of the congregation is carried out by those latter two full-time officials and their assistants, aided, for particular questions, by consultants and special commissions appointed by the pope. The congregation offices occupy the second floor of the Congregation Palace on the Via della Conciliazione leading from the Tiber to St. Peter's. See also Eastern Catholics and Rome; Eastern Catholics and Vatican II.

ROBERT F. TAFT

Congregation for the Propagation of Faith. See Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples.

Congregation of Holy Cross (C.S.C), a religious institute of priests and brothers founded by Father Basil Anthony Moreau in 1837 in Le Mans, France. The congregation was formed when the Brothers of St. Joseph, founded by Canon Jacques-François Dujarie in 1820 to provide primary education, joined with the auxiliary priests of Le Mans, founded by Moreau in 1833 to assist diocesan clergy. The congregation took its name from its first community center at Sainte Croix, a suburb of Le Mans, and not the holy Cross. Edward F. Sorin and six other congregation members established the first foundation in North America at Notre Dame, Indiana, where the school was granted a charter as the University of Notre Dame du Lac in 1842.

After a split in 1946, the congregation consists of a society of priests (known historically as the Salvatorists) and a society of brothers (Josephites). As of 1992, there were 1,842 members, 998 priests, and 844 brothers in the United States, Canada, Kenya, Uganda, India, Bangladesh, Chile, Peru, Brazil, Haiti, France, and Italy, with the majority in the United States and Canada. Members currently work in universities (University of Notre Dame, University of Portland, St. Edward's University, King's College, Stonehill College), schools, parishes, foreign missions, and various individual apostolates. Outstanding members of the congregation have included

Father Julius Nieuwland, discoverer of synthetic rubber; Father Theodore M. Hesburgh, president of Notre Dame from 1952 to 1987; and Father Patrick Peyton, founder of the family Rosary movement.

In 1841, Moreau also founded a religious institute of women known as the Marianite Sisters of Holy Cross, but Rome would not grant approval for their incorporation, so they became an autonomous community in 1857. See also Brothers of Holy Cross; Sisters of Holy Cross.

Congregation of the Holy Ghost. See Holy Ghost Fathers.

Congregation of the Priests of the Sacred Heart. See Sacred Heart, Congregation of the Priests of the.

congregations. See sisters, congregations of.

Congress, Eucharistic. See Eucharistic Congress.

congruism. See Suarez, Francisco de.

Conrad of Constance, St., d. 975, bishop of Constance from 934, remarkable among medieval bishops for his aversion to secular politics. Feast day: November 26.

consanguinity, blood relationship between two persons described by lines (the type of relationship) and degrees (the closeness of relationship). Type and closeness of blood relationship constitute impediments to marriage in canon law (can. 1091). All relationships in the direct line (ancestors and descendants) are prohibited; in the collateral line (common ancestor, but no direct descendency) the fourth degree and closer (e.g., uncle-niece, first cousins, brother-sister) cannot marry. Each degree represents one generation. Thus, a great-grandmother is related to her great-grandson in the third degree. There are three persons involved, excluding the root. It is possible to receive a dispensation from this impediment in the collateral line up to, but not including, the second degree (brother-sister or half brother–half sister). See also marriage law.

conscience, the whole self trying to make judgments about who one ought to be and what one ought to do or not do. It is a person's "most secret core and sanctuary" where one is "alone with God" (Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, 1965, n. 16). Traditionally, conscience has been spoken of as the subjective norm of morality. This means that conscience is the person's final, or supreme, arbiter of right and wrong. Its judgments must be followed because they reflect convictions and internalized values that set the boundaries within which one acts with integrity. To say, "My conscience tells me" means, "I hold this conviction as true and must live by it lest I betray my truest self."

With conscience, our moral strength is inside us. The moral awareness of the obligation to be good and to do what is right is not imposed from without, but it arises from within our being. To transgress internalized boundaries of value and conviction would be to act contrary to a God-given guide and thereby to lose integrity. Moral conscience, then, is not a feeling or a special faculty; nor is it the unconscious superego.

The judgment of conscience has its roots in the innate human inclination to know and to do the good. This innate capacity gives rise to the lifelong task of discovering and appropriating moral value through the process of forming conscience. The formation of conscience is a community achievement. While the judgment of conscience is always made for oneself (what I must do), it is never formed by oneself. Convictions are shaped, and obligations are learned, within the communities that influence us.

The freedom to follow one's judgment of conscience presupposes that one has sincerely searched for the moral truth pertaining to the issue one is facing. Therefore, Catholics have the duty to inform conscience by consulting sources of moral wisdom: human sources, such as corporate and personal counsel; Christian sources, such as Scripture, especially the words and deeds of Jesus, and the tradition of theological reflection; and Catholic sources, especially the teaching of the magisterium to which Catholics are to give the presumption of truth. The goal of forming conscience is to commit one's freedom to what is right and good so that, in judging and acting, one identifies with what one does. The moral decision becomes a commitment of the self to value.

Since people are not always sensitive to the many personal and social factors that influence judgments, the conscience that is formed can err. Even when one sincerely searches for truth, one may still miss the objective moral order that leads to human fulfillment. Yet the traditional teaching on the sanctity and dignity of conscience is not only that conscience can go astray without losing its dignity, but also that one must follow even an erring conscience that one has taken reasonable care to inform. The judgment of conscience, then, does not guarantee that one is doing the objectively right thing. It only assures that one acts with integrity and according to what one understands to be right.

A mature conscience takes responsibility before God for its judgments. It does not pin one's soul on another, and so abdicate responsibility. The teaching of conscientious objection (associated with military service) applies when one does not obey an order, if obeying the order would violate conscience and damage integrity.

Following conscience requires that one searches for truth, discerns what is right and good, and then acts according to what one understands that truth to be. In this way, following conscience is being true to the call from the "core and sanctuary" of one's heart where one is "alone with God." See also authority; civil law and morality; moral theology; prudence.

RICHARD M. GULA

conscience, examination of, the act of calling to mind one's sins, usually in preparation for the sacrament of Reconciliation. Sometimes referred to as examen when done apart from private confession, this practice requires an honest evaluation of one's spiritual and moral faults. An examen may and should be made frequently, focusing either on particular problems with living a virtuous life or on general tendencies toward failure in responding to God's grace. An examination of conscience before confession is a special kind of examen in that it disposes penitents to express sorrow for their sins and to resolve not to repeat their failings. It is also a time to remember particular sins committed since one's last confession so that they can be related accurately to the confessor. In making an examination of conscience, it is helpful to review prayerfully the commandments of God and the precepts of the Church. Once a pattern of failings in one's sinfulness is identified, the penitent can continue examining his or her conscience by turning to Scripture passages that encourage conversion from repeated sins. When the sacrament of Reconciliation is celebrated in large groups with an opportunity for individual private confession, the examination of conscience can be made in the context of a proclamation of the Word, a homily, and, often, a guided reflection on specific aspects of Christian holiness. In these cases, penitents should take additional time to personalize this exercise. See also conscience; Reconciliation.

conscientious objection, the claim that a citizen should be exempted from obligatory military service on the grounds of moral conviction. It may arise in two forms.

Since the First World War Western democracies have come to recognize that for citizens morally opposed to all participation in war (the position usually called "pacifist"), respect for their religious liberty calls for government to dispense them from obligatory military service, usually while demanding from them some other form of service to the nation. Such "humane provision" for the objector is approved in Vatican II's Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (n. 79). In the United States, Selective Service regulations since 1940 have provided for such persons to be assigned to nonmilitary service "of national importance" once the authenticity of the person's convictions has been validated. The U.S. Catholic bishops' pastoral letter "The Challenge of Peace" (1983) recognized (nn. 73–79, 119–21) that such pacifism may be a valid Christian calling; this was a new development, because Pope Pius XII had rejected conscientious objection in 1956.

Within the majority just-war tradition, on the other hand, all participation in war cannot be condemned. Yet it may be morally imperative in a particular case to refuse to serve in an unjust war, or to use an illegitimate weapon, or to obey an unjust order. The term "selective conscientious objection" has come to be used to label this possibility. Logically it should be more congenial to Catholics. In principle this possibility was always implied by the just-war tradition, but practically it only came alive for numbers of American draftees during the Vietnam War. No government has given this position legal status.

In "Human Life in Our Day" (1968) and in "The Challenge of Peace" (n. 118), the National Conference of Catholic Bishops called for the recognition of both kinds of objection. See also conscience; just-war doctrine; pacifism.

JOHN H. YODER

consecrated life, a form of Christian existence undertaken by sacred ministers and laypersons who have made a public profession, recognized and sanctioned by the Church, of the evangelical counsels of poverty, chastity, and obedience. For members of religious institutes the consecration takes the form of public vows (can. 607.2). Sometimes vows are also taken by members of secular institutes (can. 712) and some societies of apostolic life (can. 731.2). It is important to note that those who do make a special consecration of their lives do not form a third state between clergy and laity (see Vatican II, Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 43), although they do have a distinct place in the Church as a community of holiness and mission (n. 44). See also counsels, evangelical; religious institute; secular institute; society of apostolic life; vows; vows, public.

consecrated virgin, a form of religious life rooted in the sacraments and contemplative prayer and lived under the scrutiny of a spiritual director chosen by the candidate and a canonical director selected by the diocese. Espousal with Christ is the foundation and charism (gift) of this vocation.

The diocesan bishop admits a candidate into the ecclesial order of virgin and consecrates her according to the rite of the Church after approving her rule of life. The rite of consecration used to be a sacrament. In the first centuries of the Church the virgins chanted the Letters and Gospels at liturgy. See also consecrated life; consecration; virginity.

consecration, the term traditionally used to describe the moment of the Eucharistic Prayer at which the presider recites the words of the Lord over the bread and wine so that they become his body and blood. The priest who presides at the Eucharist acts in the person of Christ and so it is Christ himself who, through the power of the Holy Spirit, transforms the bread and wine into his body and blood as the gift of himself to his people. Although the entire Eucharistic Prayer is consecratory, the bread and wine are traditionally understood to be changed into the body and blood of Christ at the recitation of the Lord's words of institution. See also eucharistic prayer; Real Presence.

consent, marital, the free and irrevocable giving of self by one person to another for the purpose of establishing the marital covenant. In canon law it is consent that constitutes marriage. The consent can be placed only by those capable of so doing, e.g., someone without the ability to live out the marital covenant is not capable. In addition, canon law regulates certain conditions under which Catholics must exchange this consent, e.g., the necessary officiant, and prohibits some from placing consent, e.g., those in Holy Orders. See also Marriage; marriage law.

consequentialism, a view of moral reasoning and a way of justifying actions that are apparently forbidden or wrong. It has affinities with, but is distinct from, utilitarianism and proportionalism. Like utilitarianism, it regards the consequences of an action as constitutive of the rightness or wrongness of the action; but it is not committed to the utilitarian claim that nonmoral consequences are the sole determining factor. Thus it can build on Aquinas's position that consequences are among the circumstances that determine the morality of an action and the commonsense view that consequences have moral as well as nonmoral aspects. Consequentialism is narrower in focus than proportionalism, which holds that an action is to be justified by "a proportionate reason," of which consideration of consequences is only one. Consequentialism directs our attention to one of the most fundamental concerns of our practical thinking, namely, the results of our actions. This is a major source of its appeal. Also, it avoids the maximizing and hedonistic aspects of utilitarianism, even while it gives up the utilitarian effort to provide one decision-procedure for ethics and to reduce all normative principles to the Principle of Utility.

Consequentialism has elements that are clearly part of the Catholic tradition; but when it is taken as a unique basis for ethical reasoning, it strikes most observers as a dangerous oversimplification. It is perhaps best seen as the statement of a needed corrective to the excessive ridigity and complexity of older forms of moral theology. See also proportionalism; utilitarianism. JOHN P. LANGAN consignatorium (kon-seen'nuh-tor'ee-uhm; Lat., consignare, "to seal"), also known as chrismarium, a container for holding holy oils. During the first Christian millennium it was a room or building used for the conferral of Confirmation. The latest reference to it is in a twelfth-century Roman Pontifical. See also chrism.

consistent ethic of life, a moral framework to protect human life. The idea of a "consistent ethic of life" is usually associated with a proposal first made by Cardinal Joseph L. Bernardin of Chicago in 1983. In a series of addresses Cardinal Bernardin set forth a framework drawn from Catholic moral theology that was designed to relate several issues of concern to the Church in a single moral perspective.

The consistent ethic had two different sources. First, societal conditions, particularly technological changes and increasing interdependence within and among states, create a range of threats to human life. The issues of abortion, capital punishment, modern warfare, euthanasia, and socioeconomic issues of justice all pose distinct challenges to protecting human life and promoting human dignity. While each question along the spectrum of life is in itself a distinct problem, the premise of the consistent ethic is that a relationship exists among these issues.

Second, in analyzing the nature of these threats to life, the consistent ethic proposal draws upon the structure and key concepts of Catholic moral theology. A principal purpose of the consistent ethic has been the effort to provide an explicit, systematic connection between the Church's positions on abortion and euthanasia (pro-life issues) and its positions on social ethics (human rights, peace, social justice). The consistent ethic is designed to test the Catholic moral vision in terms of two questions: which issues are defined as moral concerns, and how moral principles are used across a spectrum of issues. It is also designed to provide a means for the Catholic community to engage the broader civil society on these same issues. See also abortion; capital punishment; just-war doctrine; social justice.

Bibliography

Bernardin, J. Consistent Ethic of Life. Kansas City, MO: Sheed and Ward, 1988.

J. BRYAN HEHIR

consistory (Lat., consistere, "to stand together"), from Roman times, the antechamber of the imperial palace; also, a term designating meetings with the emperor; now refers to a formal gathering of cardinals convoked and presided over by the pope (Code of Canon Law, can. 353.1). Consistories may be ordinary or extraordinary, as well as private or public. Ordinary consistories, which include at least all the cardinals present in Rome, involve consultation on serious matters or the carrying out of solemn acts that, nevertheless, occur with some frequency or regularity. Extraordinary consistories, to which all the cardinals are summoned from around the world, are convened when special needs of the Church warrant it. Ordinary consistories are usually secret but are often opened or closed with a papal allocution, which is later published and outlines the substantive matters treated. Such is the case when new cardinals are created in consistory and subsequently made known to the public. Ordinary consistories are public when related to the canonization of saints or the reception of foreign dignitaries, in which case other prelates, legates, and invited guests are admitted to the ceremonial formalities surrounding their celebration (can. 353.1). See also Cardinals, College of.

Consortium Perfectae Caritatis (kahn-sawr' tzee-uhm pair-fek'tay kah-ree-tah'tihs; Lat., "Association of Perfect Charity"), a support organization for the development of religious life according to Vatican Council II (1962–65) guidelines. Established in 1971, it is committed to gospel values, fidelity to the Holy See, community life centered in the Eucharist, corporate apostolates, and common religious garb. See also Decree on the Appropriate Renewal of the Religious Life.

Constance, Council of, 1414–18, sixteenth ecumenical council of the Church and second of three reform councils (with Pisa and Basel) called to deal with the crisis of papal authority provoked by the Great Schism (1378–1417). Pisa had worsened the schism by creating a third pope (Alexander V and his successor, the notorious John XXIII, who are not recognized as legitimate popes by the Catholic Church because of doubts about Pisa's validity) to rival Gregory XII and the Avignon claimant, Benedict XIII. Reluctantly convoked by John XXIII through Emperor Sigismund's pressure and led by Pierre d'Ailly and Jean Gerson, Constance sought the abdication of all three claimants to the papacy, but John XXIII, supported by the numerically superior Italians, refused. The council then changed the voting procedure from individuals to national blocs, with England, Germany, France, Italy, and later Spain each having one vote. John fled, but the participants pronounced themselves (in the decree Sacrosancta) a general council receiving authority from Christ directly, without papal approval, and binding on all Christians, even the pope. John XXIII was imprisoned and deposed for simony (1415), upon which Gregory XII resigned (1415). After deposing Benedict XIII (1417), the council elected Pope Martin V (November 11, 1417).

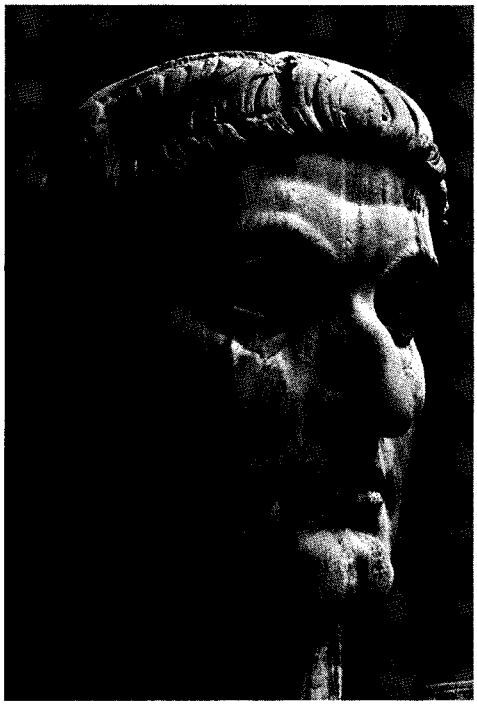
Only the decree Frequens, which demanded new councils at regular intervals, represented a significant effort at reform. As to heresy, Constance condemned 267 teachings of the Englishman John Wycliffe (ca. 1329–84). Wycliffe's Bohemian follower

John Hus (1369–1415) consented to attend, but despite the emperor's guarantee of safe conduct, Hus was imprisoned, condemned for heresy, and burned at the stake (July 6, 1415). See also conciliarism; Great Schism. W. DAVID MYERS

Constantine, Edict of (313), sometimes called the "Edict of Milan," a document that granted toleration to all religions, including Christianity. On the basis of agreements reached at a meeting in Milan between Constantine and his coemperor Licinius, a letter, not technically an edict and not issued from Milan, was written to all provincial governors ordering religious toleration, including freedom of worship for Christians. The letter also mandated the return of all confiscated Church property, thus recognizing the Church as a legal entity, able to own and dispose of property. The text is preserved, in two variant forms, by Lactantius (On the Deaths of the Persecutors 48) and Eusebius of Caesarea (Ecclesiastical History 10.5). See also Constantine the Great.

Constantine the Great, ca. 288–337, Roman emperor from 306 to 337. Son of Constantius Chlorus and Helena, at his father's death he was acclaimed emperor at York (in present-day England) by the troops, perhaps after being appointed by his father. He rapidly consolidated power over the West, taking Rome in 312 after defeating his brother-in-law Maxentius at the Milvian Bridge. In 313 he and his coemperor in the East, Licinius, granted religious toleration to all and restored confiscated property to Christians. From 314 his relationship with Licinius deteriorated, until in 324, when Licinius attempted renewed persecution of the Christians, he was defeated and Constantine became sole ruler of the empire.

Constantine the Great, the first temporal ruler to grant official status to the Church in the famous Edict of Constantine in 313; marble sculpture in the Palazzo dei Conservatori, Rome.



Constantine was not baptized until just before his death, yet he regarded himself as a Christian, perhaps even from the time of his battle against Maxentius, when both Lactantius and Eusebius report he adopted a Christian standard (incorporating the Chi-Rho monogram in some form) for his army after instruction from a dream or heavenly vision. He rebuilt Byzantium and established it as his capital, Constantinople, dedicated in 330. His legislation was consistently pro-Christian, including immunization of the clergy from certain taxes, observance of Sunday as a public holiday, establishment of episcopal tribunals, and establishment of the right of the Church to manumit slaves. His conviction that the well-being of the empire was connected to the unity of the Church prompted him in 316 to hear the appeal of the Donatists personally (and to enforce his verdict against them when violence erupted) and also to summon and attend the Council of Nicaea (325) in an effort to resolve the burgeoning controversy in the East over Arius. Although at first he enforced its decrees, toward the end of his life he veered closer to the Arian position, pardoning Arius and his ally Eusebius of Nicomedia and in 336 even exiling Athanasius. But for his decisive patronage of the Church, for his humanitarian projects for debtors and the poor (especially children), and for his subvention of projects of church building among other things, he is venerated in the East as a saint. Feast day: May 21. See also Arianism; Constantine, Edict of; Constantinople; Helena, St. JOHN C. CAVADINI

Constantinople, the traditional seat of Eastern Christianity. The emperor Constantine the Great (d. 337) transferred the capital of the Roman Empire from Rome to Constantinople in 330, building it on the site of the Greek city of Byzantium. Located on both sides of the Bosporus (linking the Black Sea and the Mediterranean Sea) in modern northwest

Turkey, Constantinople eventually became the largest and most splendid medieval European city. It remained the capital of the Eastern empire until 1453, when it fell to the Turks. However, it was the capital of the Latin empire from 1204 until 1261 following its capture by Crusaders. From 1453 until 1923 it was the capital of Turkey, under the name Istanbul. (In 1923 the Turkish capital was transferred to Ankara.)

Byzantium had a Christian community beginning probably in the second century. At first its bishop was subject to the see of Heraclea, but after the imperial capital was moved there and it became "New Rome," the bishop of Constantinople took his place of honor alongside the bishops of Alexandria, Antioch, and Rome. At the First Council of Constantinople (381), the local bishop was second only to the Bishop of Rome, and in 451, against the objections of Pope Leo the Great, the Council of Chalcedon's canon 28 granted Constantinople patriarchal status equivalent to Rome's, since both were imperial cities. Because of the council's action, the pope withheld his endorsement of the council's proceedings until March 21, 453, but even then he declared canon 28 invalid on the ground that it contravened the canons of the Council of Nicaea (325). Since the sixth century the patriarch of Constantinople has been recognized as the Ecumenical Patriarch of the East.

Tensions between Rome and Constantinople continued after the Council of Chalcedon, with the final breach traditionally linked with the year 1054 when Michael Cerularius, the patriarch of Constantinople, and his supporters were excommunicated by Pope Leo IX. The patriarch had shut down the Latin churches in Constantinople and launched an attack on the Western use of unleavened bread in the Eucharist. The bull of excommunication was dramatically laid on the altar of the Church of Santa Sophia (Hagia Sophia) in full view of the congregation. A week later the patriarch responded with counteranathemas. On December 7, 1965, at the conclusion of the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), a joint declaration by Pope Paul VI and Ecumenical Patriarch Athenagoras I was read out deploring the mutual anathemas of 1054 and the schism that followed them. See also Asia Minor; Byzantine Italy; Byzantine rite; Byzantine style; Constantine the Great; Constantinople, councils of; Crusades; Great Schism; Hagia Sophia; primacy, papal; Rome. RICHARD P. MCBRIEN

Constantinople, councils of, four church councils held in Constantinople between 381 and 870. The First Council of Constantinople (May to July 381), also called the Second Ecumenical Council, reiterated the Council of Nicaea's teaching on Christ's equality with God (against Arianism), recognized the full humanity of Jesus Christ (against Apollinarianism), and declared the divinity of the Holy Spirit (against the Pneumatomachians). The council was convoked by Emperor Theodosius I, who wanted to unite the Church on the basis of the Nicene faith, thereby ending the controversy over Arianism. In attendance were 186 bishops from the East (of whom 36 were considered "heretical"), but there were no bishops from the West and no representatives of Pope Damasus I. It was presided over by Meletius, bishop of Antioch (who died during the council), and then by Gregory of Nazianzus. It granted Constantinople honorary precedence over all churches except Rome. This council is usually credited with the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed (a longer version of the original creed of Nicaea), which was, in fact, formulated a few decades later.

The Second Council of Constantinople (May 5 to June 2, 553), the Fifth Ecumenical Council, posthumously condemned the "Three Chapters," i.e., Theodore of Mopsuestia (d. 428), Ibas of Edessa (d. 457), and Theodoret of Cyrrhus (d. ca. 458), on the grounds of Nestorianism. Motivated by the desire to reach a reconciliation with the Monophysites (who had been alienated by the Council of Chalcedon), Emperor Justinian I had issued an edict (543–44) condemning the three Antiochene theologians. Pope Vigilius disapproved of this edict, since it undermined the teaching of Chalcedon, which had not condemned Theodore of Mopsuestia. To resolve the ensuing controversy, Justinian I convened the council, which was attended by 165 bishops, almost entirely from the East. Vigilius did not attend, and afterward he was coerced into accepting the council's condemnation of the Three Chapters. The churches of Milan and Aquileia were so displeased with the pope's acceptance of the condemnation that each temporarily severed its ties with Rome.

The Third Council of Constantinople (November 7, 680, to September 6, 681), the Sixth Ecumenical Council, declared that Jesus Christ possessed both a human will and a divine will. Faced with the continuing adherence to Monothelitism (that Christ had only a divine will) in the East, Pope Agatho held a synod at Rome early in 680 and received confirmation of the teaching that Jesus Christ had two wills. In light of this decision, Emperor Constantine

IV immediately convoked a council of the bishops from Constantinople and Antioch. Agreeing with Agatho and the synod, the council reiterated the doctrine of the Council of Chalcedon and specified that the doctrine of the two natures implicitly affirms Christ's two wills, which function together in perfect moral harmony. The council also condemned the leaders of Monothelitism, including Macarius, the patriarch of Antioch, and the former pope Honorius I (d. 638).

The Fourth Council of Constantinople (October 5, 869, to February 28, 870), the Eighth Ecumenical Council in the view of the Catholic Church, condemned Photius, the former patriarch of Constantinople, in part because of his opposition to the inclusion of the Filioque clause in the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed. The council was convoked by Emperor Basil I to resolve the controversy surrounding Photius. It was attended by 103 bishops, most of whom were aligned with Rome. This council is not regarded as authoritative by the Orthodox Church, which instead recognizes the council of 879–80 in Constantinople, which approved of Photius and annulled the decision of the council of 869–70. See also Apollinarianism; Arianism; Holy Spirit; Monophysitism; Monothelitism; Nicene Creed; Pneumatomachians. ROBERT A. KRIEG constitution, conciliar, the most solemn and formal type of document issued by an ecumenical council (Code of Canon Law, cans. 337–41). For the most part they deal with doctrinal matters, but they also treat matters of discipline or of other great significance. Vatican Council II (1962–65) promulgated a Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (Sacrosanctum Concilium), a Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (Lumen Gentium), a Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation (Dei Verbum), and a Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (Gaudium et Spes). See also ecumenical council; Vatican Council II.

constitution, apostolic. See apostolic constitution.

Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (Lat., Sacrosanctum Concilium, "This holy council"), the first major official document of the Second Vatican Council, issued on December 4, 1963. It is a preamble for the entire work of the council that followed. Four themes govern the document: a renewed pastoral concern, an emphasis upon missionary adaptation, the first expression since Trent (1545–63) of a clear desire for liturgy in the vernacular and the desire for clarified and simplified rites. Additionally, two significant principles emerged within the document. These principles indelibly marked the character of subsequent liturgical reform. The first is the statement that "the liturgy is the summit toward which the activity of the Church is directed; it is also the fountain from which all her power flows" (n. 10). With this statement, the council fathers clearly located the liturgical life of the Church within the Church's entire apostolate. A Church without prayer would be but another social service organization; a Church without commitments to the circumstances of people's lives could not be worshiping in the true spirit of Christ. The second principle is stated: "Pastors of souls must ... realize that, when the liturgy is celebrated, something more is required than the laws governing valid and lawful celebration. It is their duty also to ensure that the faithful take part fully aware of what they are doing, actively engaged in the rite and enriched by it" (n. 11). This principle, "full and active participation," is the single most cited norm governing the revision of rites following the council. Its importance lies in the fact that, for the first time, the Church has officially described the importance of the entire celebratory event of the liturgy.

Questions of validity had once dominated theological discussions of the liturgy. Were sacramental rites conducted according to the will of Christ and the Church? If they were minimally in accord with that norm, they were deemed effective, if not always licit. This new principle indicates the Church's desire that sacramental events must be celebrated in such a manner as not to hinder their reception by individuals, no matter what their cultural, physical, or mental conditions. The affective or subjective dimension of sacramental celebration cannot be ignored. Because God desires to save all people, so must the Church. And, because God desires to meet people in and through the sacraments and other liturgical rites of the Church, the Church must not hinder, even as it must regulate, the circumstances of that meeting.

Among the specific reforms recommended by the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy are the promotion of liturgical studies in seminaries, religious houses, universities, and among the faithful (nn. 15–19); the establishment of diocesan liturgical commissions (n. 45); the inclusion of more Scripture in the liturgy (nn. 24, 35); the exercise of different ministerial roles by the laity (n. 29); the active participation of the congregation in word and song, preferably in the vernacular language (nn. 30, 54); the restoration of the biblically and liturgically based homily at most Masses (nn. 35, 52) and of the prayers of the faithful (n. 53); and the reception of Communion under both kinds, body and blood, for all the faithful (n. 55).

The Constitution also restored the catechumenate (n. 64) and called for a revision of the rites of all the sacraments and sacramentals (nn. 66–79), as well as that of the consecration of virgins (n. 80) and the rite of burial, which is to express more clearly the paschal character of death, and particularly the hope of resurrection (n. 81). The sacrament known as Extreme Unction, for example, is no longer to be administered exclusively for those at the point of death and may fittingly be called the sacrament of the Anointing of the Sick (n. 73).

The Constitution simplified the Divine Office, or Liturgy of the Hours, making Morning and Evening Prayer the two "hinges" upon which the prayer of the day is to turn (nn. 83–101). It also restored Sunday and feasts of the Lord to their central importance, while leaving the feasts of saints to local churches except in those cases where the individual saints have a universal significance (nn. 102–11).

Finally, the constitution recommended that singing should no longer be limited to the choir and clergy (nn. 112–21) and that sacred art and sacred furnishings should always "worthily and beautifully serve the dignity of worship" (n. 122). See also liturgy, theology of; worship.

Bibliography

Braza, L., and A. Bugnini, eds. The Commentary on the Constitution and on the Instruction on the Sacred Liturgy. New York: Benziger Brothers, 1982.

Flannery, Austin, ed. Vatican Council II: The Conciliar and Post-Conciliar Documents. Northport, NY: Costello, 1984. Vol. 1, pp. 1–36.

Jungmann, J. A. "Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy." In Commentary on the Documents of Vatican II, edited by H. Vorgrimler. New York: Herder and Herder, 1967. Vol 1, pp. 1–88. JEFFREY T. VANDERWILT constitutions, religious, the stable, proper law of a religious institute. In addition to being regulated by the common or universal canon law of the Church, each religious institute has its own law, proper to itself. This law articulates the purposes for which a given institute exists and the general and particular means it uses to achieve its ends. As the theology of religious life regards each institute as having a particular charism or gift given to the Church, canon law sees that different institutes must have leeway within the general laws to express different particular gifts and often refers certain matters to a given institute's proper law. These proper laws and any changes thereto must receive approval from Church authority. They should articulate elements that remain stable in the life of the given institute. See also religious institute.

consubstantiation, the theory that the substance of bread and wine remain together with the body and blood of Christ in the eucharistic sacrament. From the earliest times, the liturgy, preaching, and theology had taught that the bread and wine are changed into the body and blood of Christ. Medieval theologians explained this as a change in the substance of the bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ (transubstantiation). Some writers, including Duns Scotus and the nominalists, did not consider consubstantiation to be contrary to the Scriptures or God's omnipotence but rejected it because of Church teaching affirming transubstantiation (Lateran IV, 1215).

Martin Luther favored the theory of consubstantiation, using as an analogy the Incarnation in which the divine and human natures coexist unchanged. He maintained that the bread and wine form a sacramental unity with the body and blood of Christ. In 1551 the Council of Trent rejected the theory of consubstantiation and reaffirmed the doctrine of transubstantiation. See also Real Presence; transubstantiation.

consultor. 1 Generally, an authority whose advice and sometimes consent is solicited or required, individually or as a member of a college. Roman curial offices frequently rely on consultors. Roman Congregations consult experts in their respective fields, individually and in council. The Apostolic Signatura calls upon its consultors for clarifications on the law and opinions in specific cases.

2 A member of an official papal study commission (Lat., coetus), such as the Pontifical Commission for the Revision of the Code of Canon Law.

3 In diocesan contexts, a member of the college of consultors. See also consultors, college of; peritus.

consultors, college of, mandatory diocesan consultative body of six to twelve priests (or bishops) selected by the diocesan bishop from among presbyteral council members for a five-year term. It is principally a transitional or temporary governing board when a see is vacant or impeded and its functions are strictly stated in canon law. As a board of financial trustees, it advises the bishop on naming and removing the finance officer. With the finance council, its consent is required for acts of extraordinary administration and for the alienation of Church property. See also consultor.

consummated marriage, marriage in which sexual intercourse, freely engaged in by both parties, has taken place. This intercourse, an act open to procreation, is a sign of that communion of the whole of life between spouses that marriage is, and in a sacramental marriage it is also a sign of the union of Christ and the Church (Eph 5:32). The medieval argument about whether consent or consummation made the marriage resulted in the theory that, although consent made the marriage, intercourse established the marriage in a more stable manner. See also Marriage; marriage law.

Contarini, Gasparo, 1483–1542, lay reformer and cardinal. A Venetian noble made cardinal in 1535, he is best known for his efforts at administrative reform within the Catholic Church and his mediating efforts between Catholics and Protestants at Regensburg (1541). His compromise theological formulations were rejected by both sides.

contemplation, prayer in which reasoning and structure give way to a simple focus on God's presence. It is traditionally distinguished from active meditation. In the West, such distinctions derive from the monastic lectio divina (Lat.), prayerful reflection on Scripture. Later medieval writers distinguished four stages in this process. Reading led to meditation, a ruminative repetition of a word or phrase until mind and heart were filled with it. Prayer, as conversation with God, followed naturally. Sometimes this led into contemplation, or simply "being present" to God. In practice, contemplation takes different forms. Some writers, such as Ignatius of Loyola, use "contemplation" both in the traditional sense and to describe the use of imagination in praying with Scripture.

Classical expressions, such as that of John of the Cross or The Cloud of Unknowing, may appear narrow by assuming the necessity of a monastic or solitary context for contemplation. However, they suggest important features of the experience that do remain valid. First, contemplation is not a method of prayer to be chosen at will. Contemplation is a gift into which one is drawn. Second, contemplation is associated with questions of life-style and attitude; it is a way of being, not merely of praying. Third, contemplation involves the deepest levels of one's desire where hopes, needs, and personal identity fuse, as it were, with the all-embracing presence of God's love. Fourth, familiar methods of prayer cease to satisfy. The experience is one of relative stillness and receptivity rather than activity.

Contemplation does not bypass Scripture or Jesus but is fed by them. Contemplation is not totally passive, for desire still operates and choice is still possible. Often there are few or no words in prayer, yet it is simplistic to say that contemplation is totally "wordless" or "imageless" in all circumstances. See also meditation; prayer. PHILIP SHELDRAKE contemplative life, a life characterized by solitude and prayer, which dispose one toward contemplation. Ancient and especially medieval monasticism perceived its way of life as contemplative; nuns and monks were called contemplatives. Medieval interest in the mystical life perceived the contemplative life as mystical in orientation. For some men and usually for women the enclosure was seen as a necessary safeguard of the contemplative life. Post–Vatican II developments have shown an interest in a broader conception of the contemplative life for laity and religious yet one that retains the solitude necessary for living in the presence of God. See also contemplation; mysticism.

continence, a term that pertains to partial or complete abstention from sexual activity, but whose usage is not uniform. Sometimes the word is meant to signify mere material abstinence from sexual acts. In this sense, the term is entirely different from chastity, which is a virtue inclining one to moderate sexual expression according to right reason illumined by faith. At other times continence is taken to mean the persevering will to maintain chastity amid difficulties. Continence in this second sense lacks the perfection of chastity, which connotes facility. But goodwill is present, leading some theologians to call it "the diminished virtue of chastity." See also sexual morality.

contraception. See birth control.

contract, canonical, a contract recognized by Church law. As a general principle, canon law follows the secular laws of the applicable jurisdiction with respect to contracts. In a Church court, therefore, judgments concerning contracts would be made on the basis of the secular law in question. Exceptions to this rule are instances where the secular law violates natural or divine law, e.g., if the secular law would not permit ecclesiastical institutions to make contracts.

contrition, a desire for forgiveness of sins. Since medieval times, contrition has often been divided into two types: perfect contrition, based on the love of God; and imperfect contrition, sometimes called "attrition," based on fear of hell and the horror of one's own evil. Medieval discussion focused on a process for justification with Peter of Poitiers's form finally becoming standard: contrition, confession, absolution, and satisfaction. Franciscan theologians considered contrition only as an integral part of the sacrament of Penance; Dominican theologians considered it an essential part of the sacrament. In the Reformation the relationship of contrition to good works became a major source of dispute. In current Catholic theology, God's gift of grace is the basis for all contrition, which is considered an ever-present aspect of one's Christian life. Therefore, contrition is not simply an individual act but a lifelong process. See also attrition; confession, auricular; imperfect contrition; perfect contrition; Reconciliation.

contumacy, in canon law contempt for the law, the defiant disposition of one who knowingly persists in crime or delinquency in contempt of Church authority. Inexcusable delay in answering a summons or following an order of the court could result in a declaration of contumacy. In penal law, contumacy may be inferred from repeated offenses.

By its obstruction of the institutes of justice through recidivism or dilatory subterfuge, contumacy wounds both the offender and the Church community. Penalties aim at reconciliation and restitution and are not imposed without warning. Even if the offender should cease from contumacy, compensation may be required for any detriment to individuals or the community.

convalidation, ratification of a canonically invalid marriage. In simple convalidation this is done by means of a new act of consent. Convalidation always presupposes that the parties once attempted and still intend marital commitment. The attempted marriage, nevertheless, was invalid due to a defect of consent, certain impediments, or, if at least one party was Catholic, failure to comply with canonical form.

Before convalidation, invalidating factors must have ceased or been dispensed from. Then at least the Catholic parties must renew their consent in some manner, depending upon the invalidating factor: its nature, public or private character, and apparentness to each party. See also marriage law.

convent (Lat., conventus, "assembly," "meeting"), an association of religious; also, the building in which they reside. The term originally applied to congregations of twelve or more professed men or women. The Council of Trent (1545–63) included smaller houses in its definition by distinguishing between major convents (twelve or more professed members) and minor convents (fewer than twelve). The term is not found in the 1983 Code of Canon Law, which prefers to speak of institutes, houses, or monasteries of nuns (cans. 573–709). The word is used in the constitutions of some male and female mendicant orders. In its most common contemporary usage, it refers to residences of religious women who are bound together by vows to a religious life under a superior. In a less precise usage, it refers to the parochial residence of the teaching sisters of a parish school.

conventual Mass, the celebration of the Eucharist to which women and men in religious orders and congregations are obliged by their rule or constitutions. This is usually a daily obligation. This daily celebration of the Eucharist is meant to be the source and summit of the common search for holiness in religious communities. See also Eucharist; eucharistic spirituality; Mass.

Conventuals, a branch of the Franciscan order taking its name from the large urban friaries or convents that were increasingly characteristic of Franciscan life after the mid-thirteenth century. As the order settled down from its earlier itinerant life-style, friars increasingly adopted a life-style characteristic of regular canons, with a daily routine centered on the Liturgy of the Hours; friars generally spent most of the day in their convents, with the faithful gathering for services in their churches. The needs of these larger communities led to certain modifications in the original practice of strict poverty legislated in the Rule of St. Francis; after 1322, the Franciscans accepted papal privileges to own and administer their property and handle money like the other mendicant orders. As the Observant reform began in the later part of the century, there was increasing pressure to return to a more primitive tradition. The term "Conventual" was actually first applied during the resulting controversies in the early fifteenth century to those friars whose communities wished to remain with the more mitigated style of life rejected by the reform party. Finally, the Conventual and Observant friars were separated into two independent congregations in 1517. The Conventuals have continued to favor adaptation of the Franciscan way of life in order to serve the current pastoral needs of the Church. See also Francis, Rule of St.; Franciscan order.

conversi (Lat., "the changed"), old term for monks, known as lay brothers, not obliged to attend choir services, i.e., not bound to the chanting of the Divine Office. The vocation of the conversi was attractive to the illiterate because they were not obliged to participate in the celebration of the Liturgical Hours. Their work usually involved some form of manual labor. See also choir; lay brother; monk.

conversion, the profound transformation of mind, will, and heart toward God. Although conversion is often associated with entry into a particular religion or denomination, its fundamental meaning rests in that personal transformation whereby a person lives by a profoundly new assessment of what is important and valuable. Conversion generally is associated with religious acknowledgment of God. In the Christian understanding, religious conversion is a response to the awesome presence of God's grace and self-revelation. Beside religious conversion, however, one may also distinguish several other types. Intellectual conversion occurs, for example, when a thinker no longer limits the "real" only to what can be seen or empirically verified. Moral conversion involves the transformation of one's behavior, for one chooses what is truly valuable rather than satisfies spontaneous, unreflected desires. And affective, or psychic, conversion is the ongoing process of taking responsibility for the state of one's feelings, including those urges and drives in one's subconscious that lead to compulsive, addictive, or other harmful behavior. Each of these conversions, as transforming, enables individuals to begin to become the kind of persons that God intends but that sin prevents humans from being—self-constituting, responsible, good, and holy. Conversion opens up the horizon out of which we think and act by challenging the slavery due to sin (Rom 6:6), which darkens the mind, distorts the will, and suffocates the heart. Religious conversion, a gift of grace, opens a person to the ultimate horizon, the promise of union or friendship with God. See also discipleship. MARK MILLER convert (Lat., convertere, "to turn around"), one who has turned to belief in Christ or to religious faith. In popular, though inaccurate, Catholic usage, a convert is a former non-Catholic Christian now practicing Christian faith as a Catholic. See also conversion; discipleship.

Conway, Katherine, 1853–1927, journalist and educator. She served as managing editor for the Boston Pilot (1905–8), managing editor for Boston's The Republic, adjunct professor at St. Mary's College, Notre Dame, Indiana, and recipient of the University of Notre Dame's Laetare Medal (1907). Conway's numerous essays and novels emphasized the traditional role of Catholic women. See also Laetare Medal.

Cooke, Terence J., 1921–83, cardinal-archbishop of New York. Ordained in 1945, Cooke became secretary to Cardinal Francis Spellman (1958), and advanced from chancellor to auxiliary bishop and vicar general, succeeding Spellman as archbishop of New York in 1968. Credited with great administrative and financial skills, he was especially revered for his personal spirituality.

cooperation in evil, concurrence with another in a sinful external act. Such concurrence may be either moral or physical in character.

Cooperation was traditionally divided into formal and material. Formal cooperation is that wherein the cooperator consents to the evil action of the other and thus directly intends it. Therefore, there is concurrence with not only the evil act but with the evil intent.

Material cooperation is that whereby one provides a certain aid for another without either explicitly or implicitly sharing the evil intent. For instance, one steadies the ladder for the robbers entering another's house to rob it. Material cooperation can be immediate (in the act itself, e.g., one helps the robbers carry the stolen safe) or mediate (one sells a gun to a suspicious individual). Furthermore, material cooperation may be proximate or remote depending on whether the cooperator's action is causally proximate or remote to the wrongful act. It may be necessary or unnecessary depending on whether the evil effect can be produced without the cooperation or not.

All theologians condemn formal cooperation since it involves one in approval of another's wrongdoing and therefore immediately activates one's own attitudes toward good and evil. Material cooperation is ordinarily wrong because one is bound not to fortify a neighbor in wrongdoing by becoming a partner to the externalization of his or her evil designs. Under certain conditions, however, it becomes morally permissible. First, one's own contribution must not be the evil act itself (one must not, e.g., join a killing stab-fest). Second, there must be a proportionate reason for contributing to the wrongdoing. Whether the reason is morally justified will depend on many factors: the nature of the evil, the proximity and necessity of the cooperation, etc. These concrete considerations are often very complex and mean that, while the general principles are clear, in practice this is the most difficult question in all of moral theology. RICHARD A. MCCORMICK cope (Lat., cappa or capa, "cape"), an ankle-length cloak worn by a bishop or priest at ceremonies other than Mass. Usually made of silk, it is draped over the shoulders and fastened, chest-high, with a clasp. The remnant of a hood, shaped like a shield, adorns the back. See also vestments.

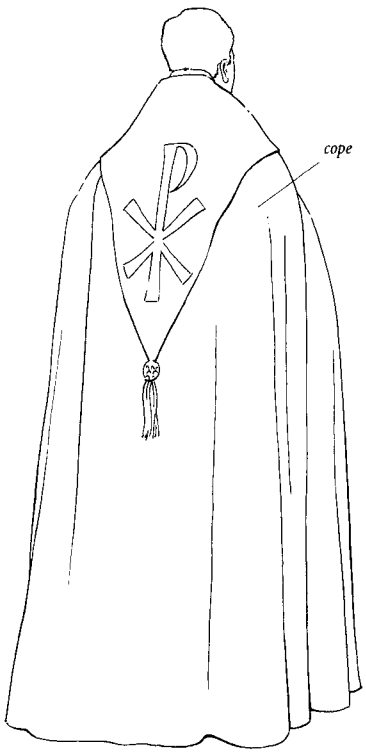
Cope



Copleston, Frederick C., 1907–94, historian of philosophy. After studying at Oxford, he joined the Society of Jesus in 1930 and was ordained in 1937. Professor of the history of philosophy at Heythrop College (where he also served as principal, 1970–74), the Gregorian University in Rome, and the University of London, he authored the highly praised, multivolume History of Philosophy, covering the full scope of philosophical development from the pre-Socratics (sixth and fifth centuries B.C.) to Jean-Paul Sartre (d. 1980).

Copt, Coptic (Arab., gupt, from gypt in Aigyptos; Gk., "Egyptian"), terms for the original Egyptians, the remnant of those who successfully resisted the Islamization of that land. Coptic was the native language of Egypt before the Arab conquest of 640 and the consequent Arabization led to its disappearance as a living tongue. Coptic existed in several dialects, one of which, Bohairic, has survived as the liturgical language of Coptic Christians. Coptic literature, which flourished from the third century until the Arab conquest, mostly in the Sahidic dialect, was largely a monastic and popular literature or translations from the Greek. Greek was the language of the upper strata of Egyptian society, the intellectuals of Alexandria and the coast, some of whom, like Athanasius (d. 373), wrote in Coptic as well. Anthony of Egypt (d. 355) and Pachomius (d. 347) wrote in Coptic, but the greatest Coptic writer was Shenute of Atripe (d. ca. 457), abbot of the White Monastery at Atripe near modern Sohag. See also Coptic Catholic Church; Coptic rite.

Coptic Catholic Church, the ecclesiastical community of Coptic-rite Catholics who are in communion with Rome. Coptic Catholics are based in Egypt (the Arabic derivation of the word "Copt" means Egyptian). The Coptic Catholic Church is the Catholic counterpart to the Coptic Orthodox Church, which has never accepted the teaching of the Council of Chalcedon (451) that in Christ there are two natures, human and divine, and not only one divine nature, as the Monophysites held.

A formal reconciliation between the Catholic and Coptic Orthodox churches took place with the signing of the document Cantate Domino by a Coptic delegation at the Council of Florence on February 4, 1442. But because this act was not supported in Egypt, it had no practical results.

Catholic missionaries began to work more intensely among the Copts in the seventeenth century, with the Franciscans in the lead. A Capuchin mission was founded in Cairo in 1630, and in 1675 the Jesuits began missionary activity in Egypt. During the same century a number of lengthy but fruitless theological exchanges took place between Rome and the Coptic Church.

In 1741 a Coptic bishop in Jerusalem, Amba Athanasius, became Catholic. Pope Benedict XIV appointed him vicar apostolic of the small community of Egyptian Coptic Catholics, which at that time numbered no more than two thousand. Although Athanasius eventually returned to communion with the Coptic Orthodox Church, a line of Catholic vicars apostolic continued after him.

In 1824, under the mistaken impression that the Ottoman viceroy wished it to do so, the Holy See erected a patriarchate for Coptic Catholics, but for now it only existed on paper. The Ottoman authorities permitted the Coptic Catholics to begin building their own churches in 1829.

In 1895 Leo XIII reestablished the patriarchate, and in 1899 he appointed Cyril Makarios as Patriarch Cyril II "of Alexandria of the Copts." Cyril had presided over a Catholic Coptic synod in 1898 that introduced a number of Latin practices, but he became embroiled in controversy and felt compelled to resign in 1908. The office remained vacant until 1947, when a new patriarch was finally elected, and the line that continues today began.

While the offices of the patriarchate are located in Cairo, the largest concentration of Coptic Catholics has always been in Upper Egypt. In more recent times, however, there has been some migration to other parts of the country.

Most candidates for the priesthood are trained at St. Leo's Patriarchal Seminary in Maadi, a suburb of Cairo. There are also minor seminaries at Tahta and Alexandria. More than one hundred Coptic Catholic parishes administer primary schools, and some have secondary schools as well. The church maintains a hospital in Assuit, a number of medical dispensaries and clinics, and several orphanages.

There are no Coptic Catholic monasteries that would rival the Coptic Orthodox monastic tradition, but there are religious orders modeled on Western apostolic communities involved in educational, medical, and charitable activities. The Coptic Congregation of the Preaching of Saint Mark was founded in 1959, and there are also Coptic branches of the Franciscans, Jesuits, and Lazarists. There are also two Coptic Catholic orders of sisters, the Egyptian Religious of the Sacred Heart and the Coptic Sisters of Jesus and Mary. In 1992 the church had six dioceses with about 200 priests and 180,000 faithful, making it by far the largest Catholic church in Egypt. See also Chalcedon, Council of; Copt, Coptic; Coptic rite; Eastern Catholics and ecumenism; Eastern Catholics and Rome; Eastern churches; Eastern liturgies; Eastern rites. RONALD G. ROBERSON

Coptic rite, the liturgical traditions of the Coptic Orthodox and Catholic churches of Egypt, the modern form of the ancient Alexandrian rite as it developed among the Coptic-speaking Christians of Egypt in the period following the division of the Egyptian church after the Council of Chalcedon in 451. Egyptian Christianity began in Hellenic Alexandria, but by the third century there were numerous Coptic-speaking converts, and the Scriptures and liturgy had been translated into the native tongue. But it was monasticism that solidified Coptic Christianity as a native counterbalance to the cosmopolitan, theologically sophisticated Hellenic church of Alexandria, whose speculative, spiritualizing intellectualism stood in marked contrast to the popular, traditionalistic piety of the peasant and monastic Upper Egypt south of the Delta, a largely oral culture transmitted through sayings, proverbs, and ritual, rather than theological treatises. This monastic culture, concrete and ascetic, created the liturgy, offices, and spirituality of the Coptic rite. In the aftermath of the Council of Chalcedon those who had rejected its decisions suffered fierce persecution by the orthodox Chalcedonians until the Arab conquest of 640. This period sealed the separation of the two traditions and put an end to Greek dominance of Egyptian Christianity forever. The Coptic patriarchate, forced to flee Alexandria, took refuge in the Monastery of St. Macarius in the desert of Scetis, the present Wadi an-Natrun halfway between Cairo and Alexandria. Today's Coptic rite is basically the monastic usage of Scetis somewhat modified by later reforms. Coptic Orthodox patriarch Gabriel II Ibn Turayk (1131–45) reduced the number of anaphoras (the central prayer of the Eucharist, including the consecration, anamnesis, and Communion) to the present three (St. Mark/Cyril, St. Basil, St. Gregory), and Gabriel V (1409–27) composed a Liturgical Order to unify divergent usages. These regulations still govern the Coptic rite.

The present Coptic rite has been strongly marked by this history. Its liturgical language is Bohairic, the Coptic dialect of Lower Egypt. Its spirituality and offices are strongly monastic, popular, ascetic; its liturgy and offices highly penitential, contemplative, long, solemn, even monotonous, with much less speculative poetry, symbolic splendor, and sumptuous ceremonial than, for example, the Byzantine rite. See also Coptic Catholic Church. ROBERT F. TAFT

Corbie, daughterhouse of Luxeuil founded in 657 and richly endowed by Bathild, the Anglo-Saxon wife of Clovis II. With an extensive library and an important scriptorium, it remained a strong cultural center under the Carolingians. See also Luxeuil.

Corcoran, James A., 1820–89, priest, theologian, educator, and editor. A native of Charleston, South Carolina, and trained in Rome, Corcoran taught theology at seminaries in Charleston (1844–61) and Philadelphia (1870–89). He was editor of the United States Catholic Miscellany (1848–61) and a founding editor of the American Catholic Quarterly Review (1876). The outstanding American expert on conciliar legislation, he was the U.S. representative in preparing for the First Vatican Council (1869–70) and a peritus (Lat., adviser) to Archbishop Martin Spalding of Baltimore. See also Vatican Council I.

Coredemptrix, title describing the Blessed Virgin Mary's role in the world's salvation. The title is rare today because of its pastoral and ecumenical difficulties. A three-stage progression marked the growth of this view of Mary: (1) By her consent at the Annunciation and by her actual maternity, Mary gives life to Christ and, therefore, brings redemption into the world (from the patristic era). (2) By offering Christ in the sacrifice on the cross and by suffering in her heart the wounds he receives in his flesh, she actively shares in the redemptive work of her Son at its most critical moment (early medieval era). (3) By her maternal mercy and intercession in heaven, she continues to distribute the fruits of Christ's redemption to unworthy sinners (late medieval era). Given the misunderstanding that this title occasions, seeming to reduce Christ to being one-half of a team of redeemers, Vatican II deliberately omitted it from its Marian teaching. See also Mary, Blessed Virgin; redemption.

Cornelius, St., pope and martyr. A Roman priest elected as Bishop of Rome in 251 after the Decian persecution of 250, he held out the right of forgiveness (against the rigorists) to those who renounced their faith in time of persecution. He died in exile in 253. Feast day: September 16.

coronation, papal, the crowning of a pope with the tiara at the beginning of his term of office. The tiara is a beehive-shaped headdress with a triple crown, formerly used for certain nonliturgical papal ceremonies. The bishops of Rome began wearing the tiara in the third century. At first the tiaras were simple in design, but by the time of the Renaissance they were made of precious metals and ornamented with costly jewels. The coronation of the pope was modeled after the coronation of secular royalty. This was not unfitting since the pope was a temporal as well as a spiritual ruler. Pope Paul VI (1963–78) sold his tiara and gave the proceeds to the poor. Since then, the popes have chosen to be installed rather than crowned in order to emphasize the essentially spiritual role of the papacy today.

corporal (Lat., corpus, "body"), an approximately twenty-inch-square white linen cloth placed on the altar under the chalice, paten, and host. Together with the pall, the corporal derives from the uppermost of two earlier full-length altar cloths. Its name indicates its role of holding the eucharistic body of Christ.

corporal works of mercy. See mercy, corporal works of.

Corpus Christi, Feast of, Solemnity of the Body and Blood of Christ on the Sunday following Trinity Sunday. This feast originated in the diocese of Liège, France (1246), based on revelations of the French nun Juliana of Mont-Cornillon (1192–1258). Enthusiastic acceptance in Europe led to universal promulgation by Pope Urban IV in 1264. From its inception, the feast celebrated both the body and blood of Jesus Christ. In a sense, it duplicates the eucharistic focus of Holy Thursday, highlighting the redemptive effects of the sacrament. A prominent feature of the feast since the fourteenth century has been a eucharistic procession. Current legislation allows a procession immediately after Mass in which the host to be carried has been consecrated, or after a lengthy period of public adoration. The procession may take place on or near the feast day itself. See also blood of Christ; Body of Christ.

Corpus Iuris Canonici (kohr'puhs yoor'is kuh-nahn'ee-chee; Lat., "Body of Canon Law"), collection of Church laws firmly established by the sixteenth century and used as a text and primary reference until the 1917 code of canon law. It includes Gratian's Decree followed by various collections of papal decretals. See also canon law; Code of Canon Law.

Corrigan, Michael Augustine, 1839–1902, American prelate. Born in Newark, New Jersey, educated at Mount St. Mary's College in Emmitsburg, Maryland, and the Roman Urban College, he served first as director of the seminary at Seton Hall College in South Orange, New Jersey (1864–69), and then as president of the institution. From 1873 to 1880 he was bishop of Newark, then was coadjutor to Cardinal John McCloskey of New York for five years before succeeding him as archbishop. During his long administration of the archdiocese (1885–1902) he developed and consolidated many charitable institutions, schools, a seminary, and ethnic parishes to meet the growing needs of the pluralistic Catholic population. He also became the leader of the conservative forces in opposition to the "Americanists," especially in his disciplining of Edward McGlynn and in his promotion of parochial education. See also Americanism.

Cor Unum (Lat., "one heart"), an international organization founded by Pope Paul VI in 1971 to coordinate Catholic relief services and to disseminate necessary information worldwide.

Cosmas and Damian, Sts., martyrs. Nothing certain is known of these men. According to legend they were twin brothers who left their native Arabia in order to practice medicine. Exemplary Christians, they died in the persecution of Diocletian in 303. With St. Luke, they are the patron saints of physicians. Feast day: September 26.

cosmology, the empirical science that seeks to understand the origin, evolution, and large-scale structure of the universe. The reigning cosmological theory is the "Big Bang" model, which proposes that the entire universe—space itself—is expanding out of a "singularity," an initial state of infinite density. Based on the observed rate of expansion (measured by how fast galaxies appear to be receding from one another), the model estimates the visible universe is from ten to twenty billion years old. As cosmologists continue to debate the validity of the model in light of new data, scientific evidence that the visible universe had an origin in time should not be seen as evidence for creation. Moreover, science is in principle incapable of detecting an absolute beginning for all that exists. For example, cosmologists cannot rule out the possibility that the universe endlessly expands and contracts. See also Big Bang; creation.

Couderc, St. Teresa, 1805–85, French-born founder of the Congregation of Our Lady of the Retreat in the Cenacle (R.C.), devoted to giving retreats for laywomen. Feast day: September 26.

Coughlin, Charles Edward, 1891–1979, priest and political activist. Born in Hamilton, Ontario, Coughlin became a member of the Basilian Fathers and was educated at St. Michael's College (Toronto). He was ordained in 1916. In 1923, he became a diocesan priest, subject to the authority of the bishop of Detroit. In 1926 Coughlin established a parish in Royal Oak, Michigan, a suburb of Detroit and a center of Ku Klux Klan activity. After a cross burning at his church, The Shrine of the Little Flower, Coughlin convinced a Detroit radio station, WRJ, of the necessity for a program to offset religious bigotry. Coughlin's melodic and authoritative voice soon captured the attention of the nation. By 1932, Coughlin's weekly audience numbered an estimated forty million listeners and he became known as "the Radio Priest." His broadcasts shifted from religious themes to political and economic issues. Though initially an enthusiastic supporter of President Franklin D. Roosevelt, by 1934 Coughlin was railing against Roosevelt's policies. Coughlin believed that the Roosevelt administration was infiltrated by Communists and controlled by international bankers. He organized the National Union for Social Justice (1934), which provided the foundation for the Union Party (1936), and he established the weekly newspaper, Social Justice (1936). When Coughlin's broadcasts became saturated with anti-Semitic and pro-Nazi and fascist rhetoric, his credibility was destroyed. After Pearl Harbor, Coughlin, pressured by his bishop and the U.S. government, withdrew from public life and returned to parish work in Royal Oak. See also Church and state. JANET WELSH council, official gathering of Church leaders and representatives that assists in the process of decision making within the Church. Councils of bishops have a particular role in the governance of the Church. Ecumenical councils are supreme exercises of the collegial authority of bishops. Current canon law allows only the pope as head of the episcopal college to call an ecumenical council, though not all ecumenical councils have, in the past, been called by the pope. The pope has, as well, the sole responsibility to set the council's agenda and to approve the decisions of the council.

In addition to the worldwide gathering of bishops in an ecumenical council, gatherings of bishops and ecclesiastical superiors may occur on a national (plenary) level or regional (provincial) level. Examples of nonecumenical councils of the Church are those held at Arles in France (314), Milan in Italy (355), Pisa in Italy (1409), and the three plenary councils of Baltimore (1852, 1866, 1884). The word "council" is also applied to other groups of clergy, religious, and laity that offer advice on financial and pastoral matters. See also ecumenical council.

council, finance. See finance council.

council, provincial. See provincial council.

Council for Promoting Christian Unity. See Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity.

Council for the Family. See Pontifical Council for the Family.

Council for the Interpretation of Legislative Texts. See Pontifical Council for the Interpretation of Legislative Texts.

Council for the Laity. See Pontifical Council for the Laity.

Council of Major Religious Superiors of Women Religious, an organization of superiors of active apostolic women's congregations in the United States, it is parallel in canonical status with the Leadership Conference of Women Religious (LCWR). Approved by the Holy See in 1992 and representing about 10 percent of active congregations, it is a more traditional grouping of religious that works closely with the Church hierarchy in fostering communally lived profession of vows and community-based ministries. See also Consortium Perfectae Caritatis; Leadership Conference of Women Religious.

councils of Baltimore. See Baltimore, councils of.

counseling, pastoral. a specialized aspect of the practical face-to-face response of the Church's ministers to the human problems and possibilities of its members. This discipline is rooted in the traditional "cure [or care] of souls." These roughly synonymous words imply not only modes of dealing with the troubled individuals but a generalized and, to some degree, institutionally committed attitude of concern and responsibility for the spiritual well-being of believers.

Care of the Soul: Soul, in this formulation, was considered to mean the spiritual principle that identifies the individual and, while essentially eternal, is conditioned by and tested through the field of time. Pastoral counseling is a manner of dealing with the person, that unity of soul and body to which "soul" refers in an extended sense. Pastoral counseling aims, then, not only at leading the soul to holiness but to integrating the disordered and compromising emotional conflicts that characterize men and women in what is commonly referred to as "the human condition."

This mission has been associated, in traditions as different in orientation and practice as those of philosophers and tribal medicine men, with "healing," that is, with restoring tranquillity to and making whole again the spirits of those seeking assistance. Socrates sought to be iatros tes psuches (Gk.), a healer of the soul, the words that, reformulated, are recognized in the title "psychiatrist."

While figures such as Socrates and, later, Cicero in his De Consolatione offered what might be termed natural wisdom about the gains and losses of life, strong dogmatic and moral theological notes were introduced in the practice of the great religious traditions, which viewed the "care of souls" as one of their primary obligations. The wedding of the insights and styles of psychological and psychiatric therapy for emotional disturbance with traditional pastoral responses occurred in the latter third of the twentieth century. These dimensions defined pastoral counseling as a distinctively modern phenomenon.

Modern pastoral counseling descends, in the Catholic as well as other traditions, through, and has been modified by, complex interactions of history and culture as well as steadily unfolding theological exploration and debate. The latter have centered on human nature as well as the meaning and implication of various doctrinal positions and practices, such as those concerning Penance, for the ultimate healing of the soul, which is salvation.

Spiritual Direction: The art of "spiritual direction," as it has been known, was a true precursor of pastoral counseling. This practice reflects, in its fashions and traditions, a history of Catholic spirituality, including, for example, the evolutionary and shifting perceptions of institutional Catholicism's authority over the souls of individual Catholics.

Spiritual direction was at one time linked closely with the sacrament of Penance (now Reconciliation) and ordered almost exclusively to the sanctification of "souls," as individual Catholics have commonly been described in the vocabulary of pastoral practice. Tension arose as this personal pursuit of holiness came to be measured by the individual's "obedience" or "docility" to the authority of the institutional Church as expressed through the latter's ecclesiastical leaders, structures, and regulations.

Pastoral counseling developed an identity separate from spiritual direction as a result of the gradual and hesitant acceptance within Catholicism of the legitimacy of psychiatric and psychological theories and therapies in identifying and treating what were once classified as "spiritual" problems. For example, "scrupulosity," once considered and dealt with as a torment of souls excessively sensitive to religious obligations, came to be recognized as fundamentally a problem of obsessive-compulsive behavior requiring treatment by psychological methods.

Such an understanding does not, in the richest meaning of pastoral counseling, eliminate or preclude the spiritual impact or significance of such an experience. Indeed, it is essential for an understanding of pastoral counseling to recall that every spiritual experience has psychological effects, just as every psychological state has spiritual effects.

Catholic and Protestant Approaches: The American Protestant tradition pioneered the use of scientific counseling as a psychologically based adjunct in pastoral work. Influenced by Carl Rogers, and such students of his as Seward Hiltner at Princeton, client-centered or nondirective counseling became its dominant methodology. This approach implemented a democratized, American emphasis on the inborn capacity of individuals to identify and deal with their emotional problems, setting them against more traditional advice giving from experts or the expectations of institutional authority.

In Roman Catholicism, counseling for Catholics and its use by parish priests was successfully introduced through a series of books that carefully demonstrated its compatibility with Church teaching and organizational practices. Thus Father Charles A. Curran (not to be confused with the theologian of the same first and last names), a student of Rogers, employed Thomistic philosophical categories to explain client-centered therapy in his Counseling in Catholic Life and Education (1952). This became the text in the pastoral counseling program for its priests that was initiated and underwritten by the archdiocese of Chicago in 1956. This was soon replicated at The Catholic University of America (1959) as well as in seminaries, institutes, and in other institutions of higher learning.

In American Protestantism, pastoral counseling rapidly developed into a specialty that distinguished itself from traditional pastoral work, provoking intense conflict about ministers who, in effect, became professional, fee-compensated therapists dealing almost exclusively with psychological problems. While such a distinction has not occurred on any large scale within Catholicism, which has continued to associate most counseling with pastoral settings, the influence of such Protestant-originated programs as clinical pastoral education in seminary training has been extensive.

Pastoral counseling had, by the last decade of the twentieth century, become an accepted aspect of Catholic life. Some of its techniques were joined again to the sacrament of Reconciliation when the practice of the latter was reformed in the mid-1970s, with debatable results, to incorporate counseling-like settings as an alternative to the traditional confessional box.

Pastoral counseling remains closely related to formal parish and educational settings in the Catholic tradition. Significant issues, such as those concerning its focus, professional standards, govern-ing theories, and capacities for adequate self-monitoring and supervision demand ongoing review and exploration. See also Catholicism and psychology/psychiatry; soul; spiritual direction.

Bibliography

Kennedy, Eugene C., and Sara Charles. On Becoming a Counselor: A Basic Guide for Non-Professional Counselors. New York: Continuum, 1990.

EUGENE C. KENNEDY AND SARA C. CHARLES

counsels, evangelical, ideals, known as poverty, chastity, and obedience, given by Jesus to those who would live perfect Christian lives. In their efforts to appropriate the austere and sometimes obscure ethical sayings of Jesus as presented by the NT and read in the context of the Hebrew Scriptures, the early churches adopted two complementary strategies for translating these texts into practical moral codes.

They tended to equate the minimal moral demands of the Christian life, which were seen as absolutely necessary for salvation, with the basic requirements of natural law; these latter were in turn equated with the Ten Commandments. Seen in this context, Jesus' more austere demands could be interpreted as ideals rather than as absolute commands. At the same time, the early churches created institutional structures within which individuals who wished to put the ideals of Jesus' morality into practice could attempt to do so. These structures gave rise to monasticism and other forms of organized religious life. The teachings of Jesus by which these communities tried to live came to be summarized as the evangelical counsels of poverty, chastity (which in this context is equivalent to celibacy), and obedience, so called because they were seen as Jesus' invitations to a more perfect imitation of him rather than as commands placed on all Christians. The exact meaning of these counsels has of course varied considerably, in correspondence with the different forms of religious life that have flourished within the Church. See also chastity; obedience; poverty.

Counter-Reformation/Catholic Reformation, European Catholic spiritual, intellectual, and institutional renewal of the late fifteenth and sixteenth centuries enabling the Catholic Church to recover from the Protestant Reformation and establishing Catholic practice and theology until the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). Historians debate whether this renewal was primarily a reaction to nascent Protestantism (Counter-Reformation), an independent inner renewal of Catholic Christianity (Catholic Reformation), or whether both the Protestant and Catholic Reformations developed from a single reforming impulse. The emerging modern consensus is that the inner renewal of fifteenth- and sixteenth-century Christian life produced both Protestantism and the Catholic Reformation and that the impulse to renewal was employed successfully by the Catholic Church to thwart Protestant advances in sixteenth- and seventeenth-century Europe (Counter-Reformation).

The demand for "reformation of head and members" that also brought about the Protestant Reformation attacked clerical immorality, especially concubinage, and fiscal and moral abuses throughout Western Christendom, but particularly in Rome. The Counter-Reformation ultimately intertwined separate strands of reform. Spontaneous lay and clerical spiritual renewals forced reluctant ecclesiastical institutions to recognize and incorporate them into the structure of Catholicism, which managed to moderate and tame the most extreme and independent elements. Finally, Catholic princes in Spain, France, Italy, and Germany, seeking to bolster their own realms by championing papal authority, provided the political and military force to implement reforms over wide territories. Despite the religious impulses of the Catholic Reformation, its success, like that of the Protestant Reformation, depended on the support of secular rulers.

Catholic Reformation: Spiritually, reform impulses can be traced as far back as the founding of the influential Brethren of the Common Life by Geert de Groote (d. 1384) and they gradually spread throughout Europe. In the fifteenth century, new devotional tracts appeared, notably the Imitation of Christ. In sixteenth-century Italy, the Roman Oratory of Divine Love (diocesan priests living in community without vows) inspired influential churchmen such as Giovanni Pietro Carafa (later Pope Paul IV) and saints such as Philip Neri to distinguish themselves by their charity and holiness. Indeed, the Catholic Reformation was also distinguished by the numerous saints it produced. At the same time, the new Christian humanism, associated particularly with Desiderius Erasmus (d. 1536), Gasparo Contarini (d. 1542), and Jacopo Sadoleto (d. 1547), and laymen such as Thomas More (d. 1535), provided an accessible and pious alternative to the technical complexity of Scholastic theology, culminating in the work of the French bishop Francis de Sales (d. 1622) at the end of the century. In Spain, John of the Cross (d. 1591) and Teresa of Ávila (d. 1582) spurred a renewed interest in mysticism.

Religious orders such as the Benedictines, Augustinians, Franciscans, Dominicans, and Carthusians experienced reforming movements, and new orders arose. The Theatines (1524) grew out of the Roman Oratory, the Capuchins (1528) emerged from the Franciscans, while the Somaschi (1532), the Barnabites (1530), and the Ursulines (1535) distinguished themselves in charity, missionary work, and teaching. Among the most significant of the new orders was the Society of Jesus (1540), founded by Ignatius of Loyola (d. 1556) to propagate Catholicism; the order soon moved to the forefront of its defense.

Reforming prelates emerged to support individual efforts. In Spain, the humanist Cardinal Francisco Jiménez de Cisneros (d. 1517) institutionalized Catholic renewal by vigorously reforming religious orders, furthering clerical education, and also employing the Inquisition extensively to combat heresy and persecute Jews and Moors.

Counter-Reformation: In Rome, only decisive papal initiative could eliminate corruption and clerical immorality. Pope Paul III (1534–49) appointed reforming cardinals and convened the Council of Trent (1545). Paul IV (1555–59) severely curtailed fiscal abuses and brought the Curia and the hierarchy under strict control, forcing bishops to reside in their dioceses and using the Roman Inquisition to investigate moral and doctrinal corruption. He also combated Protestantism and heresy through the Index of Forbidden Books. Pope Pius IV (1559–65) concluded the Council of Trent and began to implement its measures. Pope Pius V (1566–72) continued the Tridentine reforms, made monastic austerity the model for episcopal life, issued a uniform missal and breviary, and strengthened the Roman Inquisition. In a direct challenge to Protestant Reformers, the pope championed Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) as a Doctor of the Church and a model for Catholic theology. These popes also established the future direction of Catholicism by elevating eminent reformers to the hierarchy, such as the humanist Sadoleto and the future saints Charles Borromeo (d. 1584, the model of a Counter-Reformation bishop), Francis de Sales, and Robert Bellarmine (d. 1621).

Corruption in the fifteenth century and theological challenges in the sixteenth had led to demands by Protestants (especially Martin Luther) and Catholics alike for a new ecumenical council, a goal fitfully but finally fulfilled without the Protestants at the Council of Trent (1545–63). Meeting in three separate sessions (1545–47, 1551–52, and 1562–63), Trent undertook both moral reform and doctrinal clarification, defining the central tenets of contemporary Catholicism. Against Protestantism, the council upheld papal primacy and proclaimed Scripture and tradition to be equal fonts of revealed truth. Trent also clarified the Catholic doctrine of the seven sacraments and of justification, refuting Protestantism by reaffirming the Scholastic theologies of the Middle Ages. The council attacked abuses by requiring bishops to reside in their dioceses and strengthening their authority, establishing seminaries to provide clerical education, curbing concubinage, and by reforming prayer books and catechisms. Finally, the council advocated censorship to limit the influence of suspect ideas.

Catholic reforms ultimately required the support of European princes. Royal enforcement in Spain and governmental sponsorship or acquiescence in Italian lands guaranteed success. In France, religious war and near disintegration of the kingdom resulted, but Catholicism finally triumphed when Henry IV agreed to become Catholic in return for the French crown (1593). The military power and staunch Catholicism of the Habsburg emperors enabled the Counter-Reformation to stem the Protestant tide and reconvert (often forcibly) much of Germany and central Europe, especially Bohemia, Austria, and Hungary.

The age of the Catholic Reformation and the Counter-Reformation also included the conquest and conversion of the New World and missions to India, China, and Japan, making Catholicism a worldwide religion. Internal European missions along with literary and artistic revivals created a distinctive but sometimes insular Catholic culture and ethos that would endure until the mid-twentieth century. See also Brethren and Sisters of the Common Life; Erasmus, Desiderius; Inquisition; Jesuits; missions; Oratorians; Oratory of Divine Love; Protestantism; Reformation, the; religious orders and congregations; Trent, Council of.

Bibliography

Delumeau, Jean. Catholicism Between Luther and Voltaire: A New View of the Counter-Reformation. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1977.

Evennett, H. Outram. The Spirit of the Counter-Reformation. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1968.

Iserloh, Erwin, Joseph Glazik, and Hubert Jedin. Reformation and Catholic Reformation. In H. Jedin, History of the Church, vol. 5. New York: Seabury Press, 1980.

Jedin, Hubert. A History of the Council of Trent. 2 vols. St. Louis: Herder, 1957–61.

O'Malley, John W. The First Jesuits. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1993.

W. DAVID MYERS

court, ecclesiastical. See tribunal.

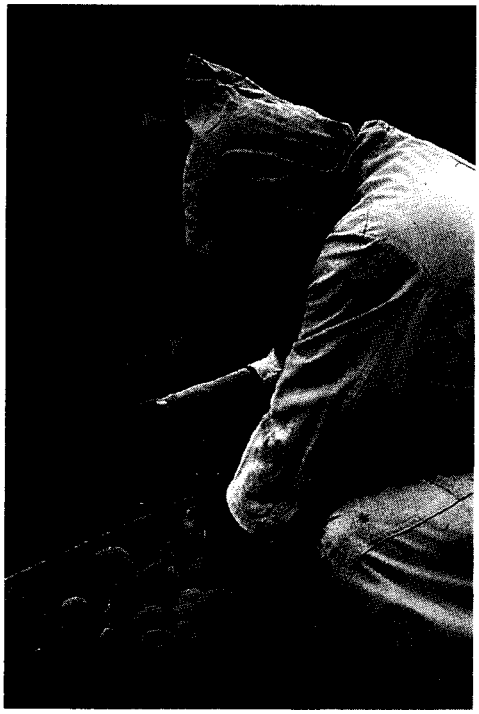
covenant, an agreement between two parties. In the OT there are two kinds. The first is unconditional; that is, an outright grant is made by one party to the other as a reward for faithfulness. Examples are the agreement between the Lord and Abram in Gen 15, Phinehas in Num 25, and David in 2 Sam 7. The second kind is conditional; that is, continuation of the agreement depends on fulfilling its requirements, as in the Sinai covenant between the Lord and Israel. Jeremiah anticipated a new covenant (Jer 31:31) after the old one failed. The NT presents the gospel as this new covenant or testament, as indicated by Jesus' words at the Last Supper (e.g., Luke 22:20), Paul's message to the Corinthians (2 Cor 3:6–18), and the Letter to the Hebrews (Heb 8:7–13; 9:15–16).



A cowl, worn over the head by a Trappist monk at work in the fields.

cowl, traditionally, a hood on a monk's habit. It originated from the large hooded work-cloak of laborers in late imperial times (fifth century), gradually acquiring the spiritual function of creating an atmosphere of solitude for each monk. See also monk.

Cranmer, Thomas, 1489–1556, archbishop of Canterbury and English Reformer. Made archbishop of Canterbury in 1532, he sought under Henry VIII to reform the Church of England in a decidedly Lutheran direction, culminating in the Ten Articles (1536), the Bishop's Book (1537), the English Bible (various editions appearing after 1535), the English litany (1544), and the Homilies (published in 1547). Under Edward VI, Cranmer came to be influenced by Calvin's theology, especially his understanding of the Eucharist and critique of images, as reflected in the Book of Common Prayer (1549), The True and Catholic Doctrine of the Lord's Supper (1549), and especially the Book of Common Prayer of 1552 and the Forty-two Articles of 1553. He was executed by Mary Tudor on March 21, 1556, publicly recanting his recantations concerning transubstantiation and papal supremacy. See also Anglicanism; England, Catholicism in; papacy, the; Reformation, the; transubstantiation.

creatio ex nihilo (kray-ah'tzee-oh eks nee'hih-loh, or, frequently, nik'uh-loh; Lat., "creation from nothing"), a phrase indicating creation's dependence upon God. "From nothing" signifies that God's action alone brings the created order into existence. See also creation.

creation, the divine causality by which God made the entire universe out of nothing and continuously sustains it. Without being wedded to any scientific explanation of how this was accomplished, belief in creation affirms the radical gift character of existence, for all things receive their being from God.

Christian belief in creation stems from Israel's faith. The one living God who had brought the Jews out of the land of Egypt was also, upon reflection, the maker of heaven and earth. Freely adapting the cosmogonic myths of surrounding peoples, Israel expressed this in the great dramatic narrative of Gen 1. "In the beginning," by the power of the divine word, God created earth, sky, and sea with all their creatures, culminating on the sixth day in the human male and female made in God's image. And everything was good. The rest of the OT sees the world as belonging to God and telling of God's glory; the resulting religious response of admiration and praise is given voice in the Psalms (8, 19, 24, 104) and wisdom literature.

The NT links creation with Jesus Christ, the Word of God through whom all things were made (John 1:3) and himself the firstborn of all creation (Col 1:15). This enables Christians to interpret salvation as renewal of the original creation rather than a separate enterprise.

Patristic theology emphasized that God creates the world out of nothing (Lat., ex nihilo) to counteract the Greek idea that God was simply a world architect who created by rearranging preexisting matter. That would make matter independent of divinity and compromise the radical dependence of the world upon God. Properly speaking, ex nihilo undermines the analogy of making, for "nothing" is not something that already exists from which something else can be made. Use of this term points to the fundamental difference between God's creative act and the making activity of creatures and underscores divine transcendence.

By the time the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed took shape in the fifth century, the fundamentals of the Christian doctrine of creation had become clear. Against dualism, which posited good and evil principles for the universe and considered matter to be evil and unworthy of being God's creature, the doctrine of creation holds that one triune God is the "Maker of heaven and earth, of all that is seen and unseen." Against Pantheism, which blurred the distinction between God and the world, the doctrine of creation declares that God is Maker, Creator, Originator of the world out of nothing. Against the view that the world was a necessarily occurring emanation, the creation doctrine holds that God creates in the sheer exuberance of freedom. Finally, against absenteeism, the doctrine of creation affirms that the Holy Spirit, "Lord and Giver of life," remains actively and intimately present to the world, connecting, renewing, and drawing all things to their goal.

Michelangelo's sixteenth-century masterpiece depicting the creation of Adam; ceiling of the Sistine Chapel, Vatican City.

The doctrine of creation is part of a cosmic vision that sees the world as ultimately reliant on the transcendent God, who fashions it in the freedom of divine love and dwells within it, energizing all existence. God is the ultimate source, ground, and goal of the world and humanity, while in their own autonomy creatures are endowed with the power to collaborate in the ongoing course of history.

As Israel drew on the cosmology of the ancient Near East to express its creation faith, and as patristic and medieval theology used the cosmology of the Greeks, the challenge today is to express this truth in ways coherent with the cosmology of contemporary science. See also cosmology; creationism; evolution.

ELIZABETH JOHNSON

creation-centered spirituality, a view of Christian life as a celebration of the divine creative will in the universe. The believer is called to cooperate in this divine activity in all areas of life. While the reality of sin is acknowledged, it is not conquered by withdrawal from the world. Rather the believer is called to embrace the world and its creative process by active engagement with it. Redemption is seen as an integral part of divine creation, rather than as a separate divine activity necessitated by the reality of sin.

Proponents of creation-centered spirituality find its origins in ancient spiritual traditions, especially in the cultures of matriarchal societies and indigenous peoples. These cultures model a way of life lived in solidarity with both nature and humankind. Within Catholicism men and women such as Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274), Pierre Teilhard de Chardin (d. 1955), Rosemary Ruether, Thomas Berry, and especially Matthew Fox have contributed to the development of creation-centered spirituality, which challenges the body/spirit dualism prevalent in much of Western spirituality. This spirituality is distinctively incarnational as it proclaims the divine presence in the material as well as the spiritual realm. Holiness is sought in the lives of ordinary people as they embrace the world by their labor and their relationships with others and with the planet.

Creation-centered spirituality also rejects the sexist dualism found in Western culture. According to creation-centered spirituality, women's immediacy to the life process reveals the life-affirming values characteristic of a healthy spirituality: harmony with nature, nonviolence, and cooperation.

Creation-centered spirituality is not without its critics. Some theologians note its diminishment of the sense of divine transcendence; others object to its rigid dichotomy between sin and grace, and claim that both poles are always present in the fabric of life. Defenders of creation-centered spirituality, on the other hand, point to the Christian humanism of Thomas Aquinas and the incarnational theology of the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) in support of it. DANIEL DI DOMIZIO creationism, based on a fundamentalist reading of Genesis, the doctrine, in opposition to the biological theory of evolution, that living organisms are the products of "special" divine creation. The most radical form asserts a "young" earth (less than ten thousand years old), six twenty-four-hour days of creation, and a worldwide flood responsible for the fossil record. Less radical forms accept evidence for an "ancient" earth: the "gap" theory proposes that millions of years separate the creation "in the beginning" from a second creation that occurred over a six-day period; the "day-age" theory (or "progressive creation") identifies the days of creation with geological eras. All forms assert the special creation of an original human pair.

Creationism as a political-religious movement (primarily American and Protestant) has gone through two stages. Key figures in the first stage (roughly the 1920s) were William Jennings Bryan (1860–1925), who spearheaded the fight to halt the teaching of evolution in public schools, and George McCready Price (1870–1963), whose book denying the antiquity of the fossil record, The New Geology (1923, rev. ed. 1926), made Price the most prominent scientific voice among creationists despite his lack of formal scientific training. The second stage, or "scientific creationism," is associated with Henry M. Morris (b. 1918), an engineer who coauthored with John C. Whitcomb, Jr., The Genesis Flood (1961), updating Price's work. In 1970, Morris established the Institute for Creation Research, which since 1981 has offered graduate degrees in science, indicative of recent efforts to cast creationism as a scientific alternative to evolutionary theory. See also creation; evolution. STEVEN D. CRAIN Traditional crèche with the figures of St. Joseph, the child Jesus, and the Blessed Virgin Mary; fifteenth-century Florentine sculpture by Antonio Rossellino, Metropolitan Museum, New York.

crèche (kresh; Fr., "manger," "crib"), popular name for a Nativity set displayed in homes and churches during the Christmas season. The custom derives from the early practice (1223) of Francis of Assisi celebrating Christmas in a barn with animals and straw. Such representations of Christ's birth are now almost universal in Catholicism. See also Christmas.

credence table (Lat., credere, "to believe"), a small table, or shelf in the wall, near the altar. It holds the paten, chalice, small basin, and finger towel for the celebration of the Eucharistic Liturgy. It may hold cruets and unconsecrated bread if these are not presented by the faithful.

Credo of the People of God, profession of faith pronounced by Paul VI at St. Peter's Basilica, June 30, 1968, at the close of the "Year of Faith," the nineteenth centenary anniversary of the martyrdom of Sts. Peter and Paul. The Credo reaffirms the fundamental truths of the Catholic faith, especially those truths most questioned by modernity. It reiterates the articles of the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed by stating them in traditional pre-Vatican II (1962–65) theological language and elaborating on them in relation to Christian life today. For the text, see The Pope Speaks 13 (1968).

creeds (Lat., credo, "I believe"), also called "symbols of faith," concise, authorized statements of the essential tenets of religious belief that a believing community employs primarily in its worship and initiation rites. One meaning of the Greek term symbolon ("sign") in the expression "symbol of faith" is "token," in the sense of "name." This meaning indicates the basic purpose of creeds: they serve as tokens, names, that identify God, the believer, and the community of belief.

The use of the term "symbol" may have also come about because symbolon may mean "sign" in the sense that for Christians the threefold interrogatory creed for Baptism, by its very form, symbolizes the triune God. It is possible, moreover, that "symbol" originated because the Greek word symbole ("collation") refers to a creed as a collection of a community's articles of religious belief.

Creeds are highly developed within Christianity, and yet they also exist within other religious beliefs as well. Judaism has the confession of the one God in the Shema (Deut 6:4) and the confession of God's saving work in the profession regarding the "wandering Aramaean" (Deut 26:1–11). Islam possesses the Shahada, which declares that only God is God and that Muhammad is the messenger of God. Hinduism employs the Gayatri Mantra (Rigveda 3.62.10), which professes "the resplendent glory of Savitr." Buddhism relies on the Triple Refuge (in the Buddha, the doctrine, and the community of believers).

Christianity possesses many kinds of creeds, if "creed" be understood as a broad category encompassing NT confessions, creeds in a narrow sense, doctrines, and (denominational) confessions of belief. The NT evinces simple confessions, for example, "Jesus is the Christ" (Acts 2:26), binitary confessions (Rom 1:3–4), trinitarian confessions (Matt 28:19), and the Christ kerygma (1 Cor 15:3–7). Along with these formulations, the early Church gradually fashioned fuller articulations of the faith. These include the "rules of faith" (e.g., of Ignatius, Irenaeus, and Tertullian), the trinitarian interrogatory creeds (e.g., of Hippolytus), the Old Roman Creed, and the "ecumenical creeds," namely, the Apostles' Creed, the Nicene Creed, and the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed, the doctrine of Chalcedon, the Athanasian Creed, and the Creed of the Third Council of Constantinople.

Beginning with the Reformation, the Christian churches fashioned even more precise (denominational) confessions of belief. The Lutheran church upholds the Augsburg Confession (1530) and the Formula of Concord (1577). The Reformed (Calvinist) church is defined by the First Helvetic Confession (1536), the Second Helvetic Confession (1566), and the Canons of the Synod of Dort (1619). The Catholic Church identifies itself with the dogmatic decrees of the Council of Trent (1563) and the constitution Ineffabilis Deus, on the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary (1854). The Greek and Russian churches attest to the Orthodox Confession (1643) and the Longer Catechism of the Russian Church (1839). In the twentieth century, the formulating of creeds has continued with the Barmen Confession (1934), Pope Paul VI's Credo of the People of God (1968), and the World Council of Church's Lima Document on Baptism, Eucharist, and Ministry (1982).

In Christianity, the creeds function in a variety of specific contexts, including at liturgy as a communal confession of belief (e.g., the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed), at Baptism as a declaration of an individual's new identity within the community (e.g., Hippolytus's interrogatory creed), in private prayer as confession (e.g., Acts 2:36), during catechetical instruction (e.g., the Apostles' Creed), as the norm for theological inquiry (e.g., the doctrine of Chalcedon), within ecumenical dialogue (e.g., the Augsburg Confession), and amid political-social opposition to the Church (e.g., the Barmen Confession).

For the texts of the creeds, see J. Neuner and J. Dupuis, The Christian Faith, rev. ed. (1992); J. Leith, Creeds of the Churches (1982); J.N.D. Kelly, Early Christian Creeds (1972); P. Schaff, The Creeds of Christendom, 3 vols. (1919). See also Apostles' Creed; Athanasian Creed; Nicene Creed. ROBERT A. KRIEG cremation, the reduction of a dead body to ashes by burning. A common form of disposal of bodies after death in many cultures, it was traditionally shunned by Christians and actually forbidden to Catholics during the modern period, except in case of public necessity.

The traditional resistance to cremation was largely based on a resistance to the pagan or anti-Christian ideology associated with cremation and not to the practice itself. The new Code of Canon Law (can. 1176.3) has substantially modified the older restriction, stating that cremation is not forbidden "unless it has been chosen for reasons which are contrary to Christian teaching."

crib, Christmas. See crèche.

crime, impediment of, in canon law the invalidating obstacle to a marriage where one of the parties has murdered a spouse in order to be free to marry or where both parties have cooperated in the murder of a spouse (can. 1090). These actions are considered so heinous that the dispensation that would allow such a marriage must be given by the Holy See. The older form of the impediment included the prohibition of marriage after an adulterous relationship. Although this is still morally unacceptable, the impediment is removed in the current code. See also marriage law.

Crispin and Crispinian, Sts., d. third century, patron saints of shoemakers and leatherworkers, a trade they practiced by night while preaching, teaching, and baptizing converts by day in Gaul (France). Beheaded by order of the emperor Maximian. Feast day: October 25.

criticism, biblical. See biblical criticism.

Cromwell, Oliver, 1599–1658, lord protector of England. In the English Civil War he led the "New Model Army" successfully against the Royalists (1645) and the Scots (1648), after which Charles I was executed, with Cromwell's approval (1649). Eventually coming into conflict with Parliament, which attempted to establish intolerant Presbyterianism, Cromwell dismissed it in April 1653. Made "Lord Protector" by the army on December 16, 1643, he ruled the Commonwealth with a combination of Puritan zeal for godliness, religious toleration, and often ruthless determination. See also Protestantism; Puritanism; Reformation, the.

Cromwell, Thomas, ca. 1485–1540, Earl of Essex. First rising to prominence under Cardinal Wolsey, he transferred his allegiance to Henry VIII after Wolsey's fall in 1529 and strongly advocated royal supremacy over the Church. Named vicar general in 1535, he became the chief counselor to the king in all ecclesiastical matters, consistently advising Henry toward a Lutheran reform of the Church and a political alliance with the Protestant German princes. He arranged for the visitation and dissolution of the lesser and greater monasteries (1536, 1539). His arrangement for the marriage of Henry VIII to Anne of Cleves (1540) proved less successful and led to his downfall. In spite of being named Earl of Essex by Henry on April 7, 1540, he was arrested and beheaded for treason on July 28, 1540. See also dissolution of the monasteries; Reformation, the.

Crosier

crosier (kroh'zhur), the crook-shaped staff carried in procession by archbishops and bishops and some abbots and abbesses. Its original significance is unknown, but it is often taken as a symbol of the bishop's pastoral or shepherding role.

Crosier Fathers and Brothers (O.S.C.), also known as Canons Regular of the Order of the Holy Cross, a community of canons regular (clergy who adopted a monastic rule of life) founded in Belgium in 1210 by Theodore De Celles to serve the spiritual and pastoral needs of the People of God while living in community and praying the Liturgy of the Church together. The Crosiers in the twentieth century live in small communities of priests and brothers as equal members sharing communal prayer and ministries. They retain in their rule the spirit of Augustine (d. 430) with a tradition of devotion to the Cross.

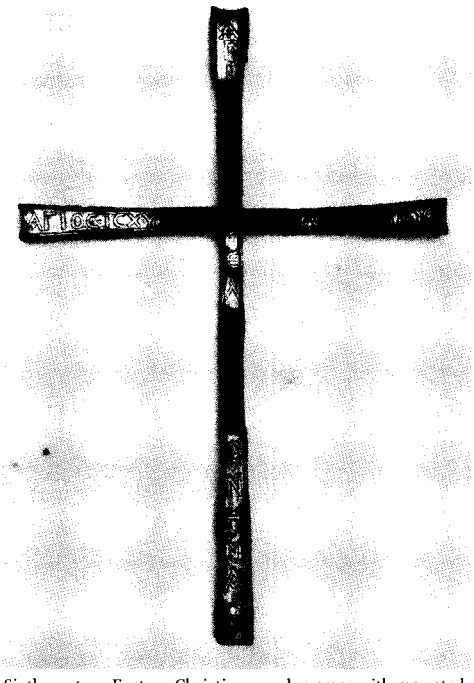
Crosiers arrived in the United States in 1910. They conduct missions in Irian Jaya, Indonesia. Their ministries include parishes, campus ministry, and education. See also canons regular.

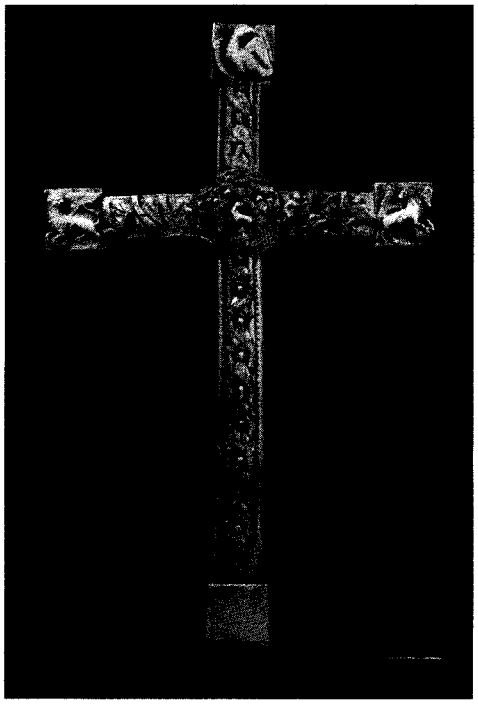
cross, an instrument of execution and symbol of redemption. The Roman cross, consisting of a stake to which was affixed a horizontal beam, was carried by the victim to the site of execution. Crosses could appear in either a T-shape or in the more familiar Christian form, with the crossbeam slightly below the top of the upright.

As a penalty reserved for lower-class criminals, the cross connoted shame and disgrace (Gal 5:11; Phil 2:8; Heb 12:2) that scandalized pagans (1 Cor 1:18). Paul, however, boasts of Christ's Cross (Gal 6:14), in which God's salvific power was present (1 Cor 1:17) and through which God effected reconciliation with all (Col 1:20). Hence the heart of Paul's preaching is Christ crucified (1 Cor 1:23; 2:2).

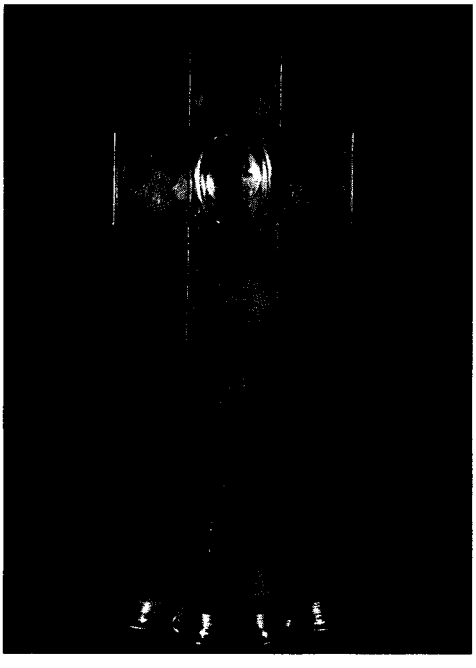


Sixth-century Eastern Christian wooden cross with mounted silver found near Antioch, Syria; Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York.

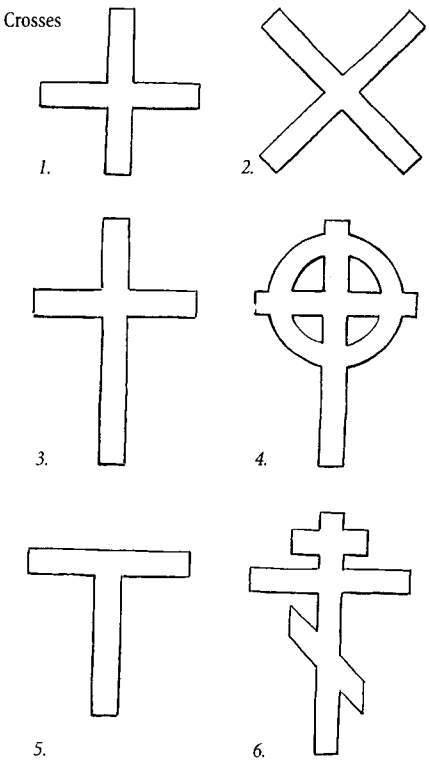
Twelfth-century English cross of walrus ivory; Cloisters Collection, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York.



The gold reliquary cross of Pope Urban V (d. 1370); in St. Vitus Cathedral, Prague, Czech Republic.



Celtic cross; the Muirdeachs Cross, Monasterboice, County Louth, Ireland.



1. Greek cross. 2. St. Andrew's cross. 3. Latin cross (the most common shape of the cross in Catholicism). 4. Celtic cross. 5. Tau (Gk., "t") cross. 6. Byzantine cross.

In the NT the Cross symbolizes both the act of redemption and the imitation of Christ, whose followers are to take up their own crosses daily (Matt 10:38; Mark 8:34; Luke 9:23; 14:27).

The practice of signing oneself with the cross is mentioned by Tertullian in the second century. Feasts associated with the Cross are the Exaltation of the Cross on September 14 and the feast of the Finding of the Cross, commemorating its discovery around 326 by Helena, mother of the emperor Constantine, until 1960 celebrated on May 3. See also crucifixion; sign of the cross.

cross, forms of the. Christian iconography knows various forms of the cross. An ancient usage, based on the Greek tau, looks like the letter T; the form of the cross with the vertical extending above the horizontal arm (†) is the more common. Other forms include such shapes as the St. Andrew's cross, which looks like the letter X, as well as shapes that have been ornamented in one fashion or another, including the Maltese cross, the Crusader's cross, the Celtic cross, or the ancient Chi/Rho cross. See also cross.

cross, pectoral. See pectoral cross.

cross, processional, an image of the cross mounted upon a pole, carried at the head of liturgical processions. The processional cross may or may not bear a corpus (Lat.), an image of the crucified Jesus. Sometimes fashioned of precious metals, some processional crosses are among the most precious works of art possessed by the Church. The cross is borne aloft by a liturgical minister called a crucifer, or crossbearer. Protocol for liturgical processions demands that there be only one processional cross and that it be carried in front of all else, save an incense bearer when there is one. On the most formal occasions the processional cross is accompanied by two candlebearers.

cross, relics of the, objects of devotion connected with the Passion of Christ. Various, not always compatible, legends attribute the finding of the True Cross to Helena, the mother of the emperor Constantine. What we know factually is that from the middle of the fourth century, the records relate that the church of Jerusalem claimed to possess the True Cross and that parts of it had already been dispersed to other parts of the Christian world as relics. The late-fourth-century pilgrim Egeria mentions a feast commemorating the finding of the Cross. Subsequent claims to possess fragments of the Cross have met with great skepticism, although such relics are still exhibited around the Christian world.

The Church's feast of the Finding of the Cross (May 3) was suppressed by Rome in 1960 as part of the reform of the liturgical calendar. See also relics.

cross, sign of the. See sign of the cross.

cross, veneration of the, homage paid to the central Christian symbol. Such homage exists at a number of levels: (1) the common practice of bowing before the cross, which is ordinarily exhibited in a church; (2) the kissing of a cross or the corpus on the cross in various ceremonies or as an act of devotion; and (3) as part of the liturgical service of Good Friday, where there is a presentation of the cross, which is then kissed as part of the liturgical celebration of the death of the Lord. This last liturgical practice was known in the fourth century in Jerusalem and was part of Roman usage by the eighth century. See also cross.

Crowley, Patricia (Patty), b. 1913, and Patrick F., 1911–74, Catholic activists. Instrumental with others in founding the Christian Family Movement in 1943, they served on the Papal Birth Control Commission, 1965–66. Patty received her A.B. degree in French and history at Trinity College, Washington, D.C. (1936); Patrick received his A.B. from the University of Notre Dame (1934) and a law degree from Loyola University of Chicago (1937). They were married in 1937. See also birth control; Christian Family Movement.

crown, episcopal, Byzantine-rite liturgical mitre, an imitation of the Byzantine imperial crown. Once worn only by the pope of Alexandria, its use became more general from the Middle Ages and is now conceded to the highest ranks of presbyters, both secular (mitred archpriests, protopresbyters) and monastic (archimandrites). Other rites (Coptic, Ethiopian) use a similar crown or have adopted a Western-style mitre (Armenian, East and West Syrian, Maronite). See also mitre.

Christ crowned with thorns; fifteenth-century oil painting by Antonello da Messina, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York.

crowning, liturgical (Gk., stephanoma, from stephanos, "crown"), Byzantine-rite marriage ritual in two parts, the betrothal and the crowning of the spouses with ritual crowns, often of precious metal. A traditional element of pre-Christian weddings, the crowning was reinterpreted by John Chrysostom (d. 407) as a sign of the victory over concupiscence and had become a customary part of the Byzantine marriage ritual by the end of the sixth century. See also Marriage, liturgy of.

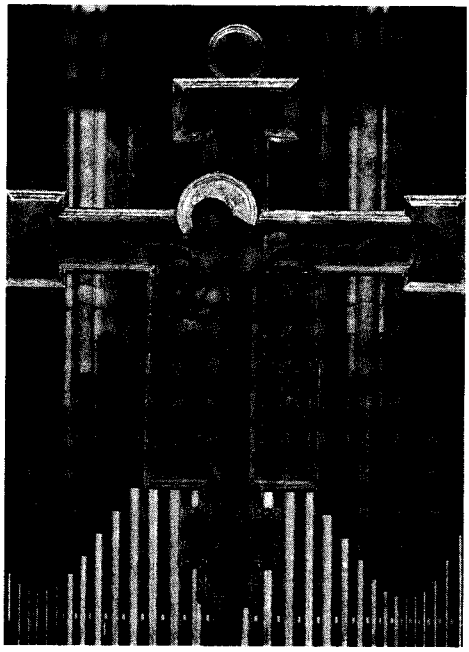
crown of thorns, an element of the Passion of Jesus. Before his crucifixion, Jesus was mocked and scourged by Roman soldiers. Deriding his claims to be king of the Jews, they clothed him in purple and placed on his head a crown woven of thorns or briers (Matt 27:29; Mark 15:17; John 19:2). See also Passion, the.

crucifix, a cross that bears the image of the crucified Christ; a common devotional object in Catholic churches (usually over the altar) and households.



Late-twelfth-century French copper and enamel crucifix; Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York.

The portrayal of Christ on the cross was absent in the first centuries of Christian art. During the time of Constantine (early fourth century), the cross was presented as a sign of Christ's triumph over death at Easter. It was in the thirteenth century that sculpted figures of Christ on crosses attained greater realism Thirteenth-century crucifix by Cimabue; in the church of St. Dominic, Arezzo, Italy.

Medieval crucifix; twelfth- or early-thirteenth-century northern Italian sculptured crucifix inspired by the "Volto Santo" of Lucca and located in a monastery near Treviso, Italy.

in depicting the physical details of his Passion and became common fixtures on the altar table. Contemporary renderings have recovered the theological emphasis of the early crucifixes, sometimes showing a risen Christ on the cross. See also cross.

crucifixion, a method of execution of criminals. Crucifixion was used by Phoenicians and Persians and adopted by Romans, who regarded it as the most shameful form of execution, reserved for slaves and aliens. In a crucifixion the victim carried a beam to the site of execution, where it would be affixed as a crossbeam to an upright stake. The victim, stripped of all clothing, would normally be nailed or bound to the crossbeam at his wrists, his feet nailed to the upright through the ankles. His buttocks would rest on a small stake or board to prolong his agony. Death came slowly, often after several days, usually by exhaustion and asphyxiation, as the weight of the body prevented breathing. Death could be hastened by breaking the knees (as in John 19:31–32), preventing the victim from raising himself to relieve pressure on the diaphragm.

Panel from the Isenheim Altarpiece, Matthias Grünewald's sixteenth-century masterpiece; Unterlinden Museum, Colmar, France.

Jesus' Crucifixion took place on a Friday at the beginning of (Matthew, Mark, Luke) or just before (John) Passover. Jesus was first scourged by Roman soldiers (Matt 27:27–31; Mark 15:16–20; John 19:1–2), then led to the place of execution, Golgotha. Since Jesus was too weak to carry his own cross, Simon of Cyrene was pressed into service (Matt 27:32; Mark 15:20; Luke 23:26). Jesus was crucified between two criminals (Luke 23:33; John 19:18), more specifically, brigands (Matt 27:38; Mark 15:27). An inscription on the cross indicated that Jesus' crime was political, involving a claim to be king of the Jews (Matt 27:37; Mark 15:26; Luke 23:38; John 19:19–22). See also cross. HAROLD W. ATTRIDGE cruets (Medieval Fr., cruette, "little jug"), small flasks made of glass, metal, ceramic, or clay, holding water and wine for the celebration of the Eucharistic Liturgy. Together with unconsecrated bread, they may be presented to the priest by two of the faithful before the Preparation of the Gifts (formerly the Offertory).

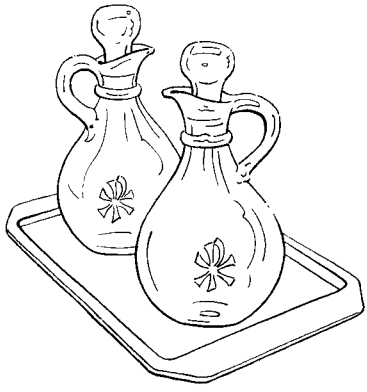
Crusades, a series of wars fought under the banner of Christ either for the recovery of or in defense of Christian lands. As pious as it was military in its origins, crusading began in the eleventh century with Christian campaigns against Muslim expansion in Spain and Sicily. In late 1095 Pope Urban II (d. 1099) summoned the nobles of the West to the First Crusade in partial response to the Byzantine emperor's plea for defense against the Seljuk Turks. But the impelling force of this and other early crusades was the liberation of Jerusalem and the Holy Land from Muslim rule. To attract crusaders the popes offered indulgences, assurances that those who carried the cross merited the remission of temporal punishment due to sin. The First Crusade (1096–99) was a military success, as Western armies moved from victories in the East to Jerusalem in 1099. Christian states were established in the conquered territories to secure the victories, but these were troubled with divisiveness from the start. The Second Crusade (1146–48) was summoned by the pope and preached by Bernard of Clairvaux to recapture the fallen kingdom of Edessa, though without much effect. Jerusalem had held its own for years until 1187 when it fell to Saladin and prompted the Third Crusade (1189–92) under the leadership of the formidable Emperor Frederick I. He died en route to the Holy Land and left the campaign in the hands of Richard the Lion-Hearted, whose hard-fought battles resulted only in a diplomatic victory promising safe passage to Christian pilgrims from Jaffa to Jerusalem. The Fourth Crusade (1202–4) signaled a portentous turn in the movement from Christian warfare aimed at the recovery of the Holy Land for spiritual motives to sheer economic enterprise. Its only successful battles were fought in Christian Constantinople and its victory saw the establishment of a Latin empire there, only widening the rift between Christian East and West. The Fifth Crusade (1217–21) was a bizarre affair as well, when Emperor Frederick II, while excommunicated, carried the cross to impressive victories. From that point on Western princes fought lesser campaigns against Muslim strongholds in Jerusalem and Egypt.

Cruets



The idea of the crusade never really disappeared but during the later Middle Ages political and economic developments in the West made the prospect of distant and costly crusades less popular in spite of repeated papal efforts to rouse Western princes. Similarly, the Western states were increasingly unable to resolve their own differences sufficiently to liberate and defend the Holy Land. The redirection of Christian campaigns against Western heretical sects (as in the Albigensian Crusade, 1209–19) and enemies of the papacy under the name of crusade inevitably weakened the movement's original ideals. On the positive side, they promoted cultural, technological, and economic exchanges and fostered the growth of the great military orders, including the Hospitallers and the Knights Templar. See also Albigensians; Constantinople; Holy Land; Hospitallers; Islam; Jerusalem; latinization. WILLIAM J. DOHAR crypt (Lat., crypta, "vault," "cave"), an underground area excavated directly beneath a sanctuary or choir. In the Middle Ages crypts were formed when larger cathedrals were erected over the vestiges of earlier church buildings. In the early centuries of the church they were also used as burial places and for worship.

Cuba, Catholicism in. Evangelization of Cuba began in the early sixteenth century. Cuba became independent of Spain in 1902 following the Spanish-American War. In 1961, after Fidel Castro brought the country under Communist rule, the University of Villanueva was closed, 350 Catholic schools were brought under government control, and more than 130 priests were expelled. There are two archdioceses and five dioceses in Cuba with over 4.4 million Catholics, comprising about 40 percent of the total population (1994). After Castro came to power, many Cuban Catholics fled to the United States, with the highest concentration in Florida. See also Latin America, Catholicism in.

Cuius regio, eius religio (koo-yuhs ray'jee-oh, ay'uhs rel-ij'ee-oh; Lat., "whose region, his religion"), political formulation from the Peace of Augsburg (1555) legalizing secular control of religion in both Catholic and Protestant areas. Under its terms the current political ruler of any given city or principality in the empire had the right to determine the religion of all its subjects, though the choice was limited to Catholicism or adherence to the Augsburg Confession. Individuals who refused to accept the religion of their rulers were allowed to emigrate upon paying a fee. Prince-bishops who converted to Protestantism, however, could not change the religion of their territories. See also Reformation, the.

cult (Lat., cultus, "tilling," "cultivation," "worship," "reverence"), a system or community of religious worship and ritual. Catholic teaching has traditionally distinguished between public and private cult. Public cultic acts are referable only to God, the saints, or the beatified, according to the 1983 Code of Canon Law (can. 1187), and are performed in the name of the Church by persons legitimately designated (can. 834). Private cultic acts are rituals that do not meet one or more of the above characteristics. Since the time of Pope Urban VIII (1623–44), the Church has prohibited public cultic recognition of figures prior to their beatification.

The anthropological, sociological, and psychological study of religious phenomena expands the contemporary definition of cult. "Cult" may refer to the public existence or behavior of any group, religious or non-religious, that exhibits some of the following characteristics: focus on individual concerns; indifference to the world; privatized or ecstatic religious experience; syncretistic doctrines of a mystical, esoteric, or psychic nature; a charismatic leader; lack of formal criteria for membership; weak organizational structure; a preference against rigorous ethical demands; tolerant stance toward other religious groups; transient existence. Cults may exhibit less formal organization and allow for more spontaneous individual expression (audience cults) or may be formally structured to provide services related to self-mastery (client cults).

Social scientists have further identified certain factors that contribute to the emergence of cults: breakdown in traditional social structures, social alienation, and weak institutional churches. See also liturgy; worship. CATHERINE MURPHY culture. See Catholicism and culture.

Cunegund, St., also known as Cunegunda, ca. 978–1033, empress, patron saint of Lithuania and Poland. After the death of her husband Henry II, emperor of Germany, she became a Benedictine nun and devoted the rest of her life to prayer and care of the sick. Feast day: March 3.

Cuomo, Mario Matthew (qwoh'moh), b. 1932, governor of New York State 1983–94. Cuomo received his B.A. summa cum laude from St. John's College in 1953, received an LL.B. cum laude from St. John's University in 1956, and was a member of its law school faculty from 1963 to 1973. He was New York secretary of state from 1975 to 1979 and lieutenant governor from 1979 to 1983. Cuomo delivered a major address on religion and politics at the University of Notre Dame on September 13, 1984, considered by some the most important and influential address on the subject ever given by a U.S. Catholic layperson.

Cupertino, St. Joseph of. See Joseph of Cupertino, St.

Cur Deus Homo (Lat., "Why God Became Man"), an extended treatise of the last decade of the eleventh century on the work of Christ, cast in the form of a dialogue between its author, Anselm of Canterbury, and his disciple and fellow monk, Boso. Seeking to overcome doubts about the compatibility of the Incarnation and affirmations about the love, justice, mercy, and wisdom of God, Anselm argues that only the voluntary acceptance of the penalty owed for human sin by an agent who is both God and human can fully satisfy for sin. Criticisms of Anselm's account of satisfaction as too legalistic are thought to be overstated, because they neglect the love that motivates God's initial ordination of people to eternal life and Christ's death on the cross. See also Anselm of Canterbury, St.

curate (Lat., cura, "care"), older title for parochial vicar; the office involved in the care of souls. See also parochial vicar.

Curé d'Ars [Jean-Baptiste Marie Vianney], 1786–1859, French priest, confessor, patron saint of parish priests. He was born and grew up during the Napoleonic era. Because of religious persecution at that time, he had to make his First Communion secretly. He was drafted into Napoleon's army but, because of ill health, he found himself absent without leave and branded a deserter. In 1815, he was ordained even though he had been dismissed from the seminary for failing his examinations and for his inability to learn Latin. After serving as an associate for three years in the parish at Ars, he became pastor (Fr., curé) in 1818. He soon became famous as a spiritual counselor and confessor. It is said that he spent up to eighteen hours a day hearing confessions. He was canonized in 1925. Feast day: August 4.

curia, collective papal or diocesan governing agency. The term includes both persons and offices assisting the pope or diocesan bishop in their respective pastoral, governing, and administrative responsibilities. "Curia" alone often implies the Roman Curia, which assists the pope in matters of service and governance beyond the diocese of Rome. Each diocesan curia comparably assists the diocesan bishop in local affairs.

Jean-Baptiste Vianney, the Curé d'Ars, a model of the parish priest totally devoted to his congregation without regard for personal recognition or reward.

The Latin word probably meant a Roman tribal subdivision or its meeting place, the Roman senate house itself, or simply assembly. From medieval times, Church usage has evolved to include persons and offices within Roman Congregations, chanceries, tribunals, and other agencies. See also diocesan curia; Roman Curia.

Curia, Roman. See Roman Curia.

Curran, Charles E., b. 1934, Catholic moral theologian. Since 1958, a priest of the diocese of Rochester, New York, and a former seminary professor in that diocese, he was for many years professor at The Catholic University of America (1965–91). In 1968 he led the public dissent against Humanae Vitae (the encyclical prohibiting birth control by artificial means) in the United States, an incident that many believe played a role in the decision by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith (July 25, 1986) that Curran could "no longer be considered suitable or eligible to exercise the function of a professor of Catholic theology." Author of many books, including The Living Tradition of Moral Theology (1992) and Faithful Dissent (1986), he was elected president of the Catholic Theological Society of America (CTSA), the Society of Christian Ethics, and the American Theological Society. In 1972 he won CTSA's annual John Courtney Murray Award for "distinguished achievement in theology." Since 1991 he has been Elizabeth Scurlock University Professor of Human Values at Southern Methodist University.

Cursillo movement (Sp., cursillo, "little course"), a renewal program, originating in Spain in 1949. It focuses on Christ as the center of the spiritual life and all human activity. The movement grew out of an idea, first advanced at the monastery of San Honorato, to teach local Catholics the importance of Christ in their lives. Since then, Cursillo has grown into an international movement, introduced into countries all over the world. The point of Cursillo is to help Catholic Christians network with one another in the context of shared prayer, spiritual reading, and discussion. One becomes part of the movement by attending a "little course," a structured program of three courses, each taking three days. During this time the method of the movement is learned. After completing this exercise, cursillistas (those having made their Cursillo) are encouraged to gather from time to time (if convenient, every week) to pray, hear a teaching, and discuss Scripture. These gatherings are called ultreyas or "fourth day" to suggest the ongoing nature of renewal in Christ. The community emphasis of the movement conveys a strong sense of Church: people gathered in Christ's name as members of the universal Body of Christ.

Cushing, Richard James, 1895–1970, archbishop of Boston, 1944–70; cardinal, 1958. A man with an outgoing personality, Cushing superintended the growth of the Church in the Boston area in the post–World War II period. A prodigious fund-raiser, he built new parishes and Church institutions at a frenetic pace. He also supported foreign missionary work, especially in Latin America. He was influential in local and national politics, particularly through his friendship with the Kennedy family. He played a minor role at the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), helping draft the council's statement on Catholic-Jewish relations (the Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions) and lending crucial support to the Declaration on Religious Freedom.

custody of the eyes, the practice of lowering or diverting one's gaze to protect the imagination and the memory from sights that might tempt one to greed, lust, or idle curiosity.

custom, term in canon law used in connection with certain limited, specified circumstances where the actions of a community can become the source of law for that community. It is also a principle of interpreting canon law that articulates that the best way to understand a law is to see how it is observed by the community (can. 27).

Cuthbert, St., ca. 634–87, Anglo-Saxon monk and bishop. After an active monastic ministry, Cuthbert retired to a hermitage on the island of Farne (676). Elected bishop of Hexham (684), he exchanged sees with the bishop of Lindisfarne and resumed pastoral work until his death. His relics were moved from Lindisfarne to Durham to protect them from Viking raids. Feast day: March 20.

Cyprian of Carthage, St., d. 258, bishop of Carthage, martyred under the Roman emperor Valerian, and a founder of Latin theology. Born in Cardinal Richard Cushing, archbishop of Boston (1944–70), one of the most ecumenical and mission-minded bishops in U.S. Catholic history and a strong supporter of religious liberty at the Second Vatican Council.

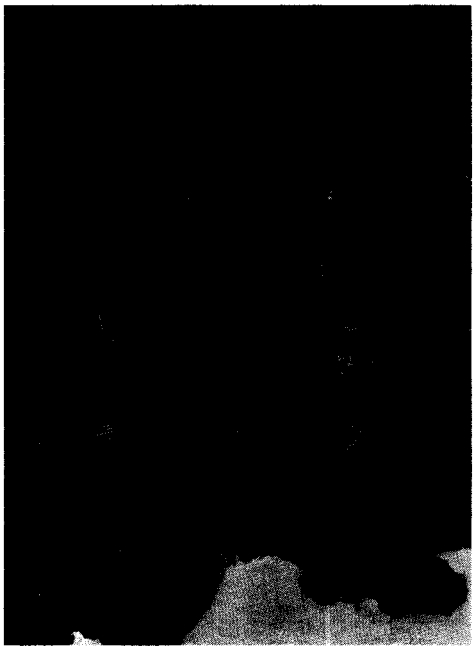
Carthage and converted to Christianity in middle life (ca. 245), Cyprian devoted the early years of his conversion to the study of Scripture and Christian writers like Tertullian. Cyprian was ordained presbyter and soon after elected bishop of Carthage (249) just before the edicts against the Christian Church by the Roman emperors Decius (250–51) and Valerian (257–60). In a community often divided between "rigorist" and "laxist" attitudes to those who apostatized, Cyprian authored a voluminous correspondence and twelve theological treatises and presided over seven Church councils from 251 to 256. His works provide invaluable information about theological and institutional developments in the African church in the mid-third century, particularly on Baptism, the Holy Spirit in the Church, and ascetical theology. On the Unity of the Church, written in 251, argues for the unity and the universality of the Church against local factionalism on one side and against schisms provoked by the rigorist teaching of Novatian. The fourth chapter of the treatise has been transmitted in two versions, one insisting on the primacy of the see of Peter, while the other version is silent on this issue. The problem of the two versions reflects not only the dispute between Cyprian and Pope Stephen I on the question of the rebaptism of heretics and schismatics, but also it is a witness to the close ties between the Roman see and the African churches. A constant referent for both Donatists and Catholics in the fourth and fifth centuries, Cyprian was included in the Roman festal calendar on September 16 by Pope Damasus I. See also Africa, the Church in Roman; Carthage; Donatism; lapsi; persecutions; primacy, papal; Stephen I, St. PAMELA BRIGHT

Cyprian, third-century bishop of Carthage in North Africa, known for his writings on the unity of the Church, including the oft-quoted statement, "One cannot have God for a father who does not have the Church for a mother"; early-fourteenth-century detail from the Sant Cebria de Cabanyes Church, Museo Episcopal de Vic, Osana, Catalonia, Spain.



Cyril and Methodius, Sts., 826–69 and ca. 815–85, "Apostles of the Slavs" and patron saints of Europe. Constantine (only later, from 868, was he called "Cyril") was the youngest of seven children born to a senatorial family in Thessalonica. Methodius, his brother, is known only by his religious name. Constantine was educated in Constantinople at the imperial university, acquired a reputation as a philosopher, and was ordained priest, appointed librarian at Hagia Sophia, and in his mid-twenties made professor of philosophy at the imperial university. Ca. 855 he joined his brother, who after a government career had become a monk at a monastery in Bithynia.

At the request of Ratislav, Duke of Greater Moravia, the emperor Michael III commissioned the brothers as missionaries (862). Constantine invented a Slavonic alphabet (Glagolithic, not, as formerly thought, Cyrillic), and the brothers translated not only the Gospels, the Psalter, and Pauline Letters, but also the liturgy. Traveling to Rome in 868, they obtained the approval of Pope Hadrian II for the Slavonic liturgy and had three of their disciples ordained priests. At Rome Constantine became a monk and, named "Cyril," died shortly thereafter. Methodius, continuing the work alone, was consecrated bishop by Hadrian II in 869, although opposition to him caused his exile for three years. Pope John VIII was able to gain his release (873). In 880 he reauthorized the Slavonic liturgy, restricted or prohibited in 873. Near the end of his life, Methodius translated the remainder of the Bible, except for Maccabees. Feast day: May 11 (East); February 14, formerly March 9 and then July 7 (West). See also Old Church Slavonic. JOHN C. CAVADINI

Cyril of Alexandria, St., ca. 375–444, patriarch of Alexandria and Doctor of the Church. Best known as a Christological thinker, he was honored by both Chalcedonian and Monophysite traditions, by those who accepted the teaching of the Council of Chalcedon (451) that Jesus Christ has both a human and a divine nature, and by those who affirmed only one nature, namely, the divine.

He succeeded his uncle Theophilus as patriarch of Alexandria in 412. His early rule was marked by serious violence toward Jews and pagans, including the fatal attack on the philosopher Hypatia, probably by supporters of Cyril. Both theologically and temperamentally inclined toward ascetic views, Cyril supported the growth of Egyptian monasticism.

Though he was a trinitarian thinker in the tradition of Athanasius and the Cappadocians, Cyril's principal contribution was to Christology. He was a vigorous opponent of Nestorius, who held that there were two persons in Christ, one human and one divine, and that Mary was only the Mother of the human Jesus, not the Mother of God (Gk., Theotokos). With Cyril's strong support, the Council of Ephesus deposed Nestorius from the patriarchate of Constantinople in 431. Thereafter, Cyril was sometimes willing to compromise in theological formulas, but his own focus remained constant: on the initiative of God's action in Jesus Christ, in whom the divine Word had humbled itself (see Phil 2) and so divinized the humanity of Jesus that death's hold was broken. Indeed, the Council of Chalcedon in 451 appealed to Cyril's authority in its own teaching on the Incarnation. In later centuries both orthodox and Monophysite theologians in the East continued to find good reason to claim his inheritance. Feast day: June 2 (West); June 9 (East). See also Chalcedon, Council of; Christology; Ephesus, Council of.

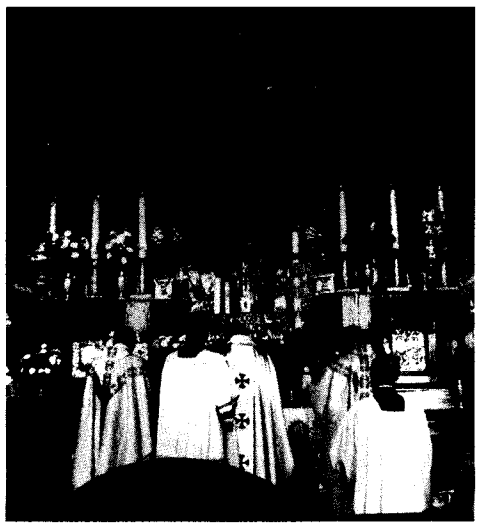
KATHRYN L. JOHNSON

Cyril of Jerusalem, St., ca. 315–ca. 386, bishop of Jerusalem from 348 to 386. He was banished three times (357–59; 360–62; ca. 367–78) over jurisdictional and property disputes at the hands of pro-Arian authorities (Acacius, bishop of Caesarea, and later the emperor Valens), although he was not himself a strict Nicene until sometime after the Council of Antioch (363), when he moved from the homoiousion (Gk., the Son is of a similar substance with the Father) position to acceptance of the homoousion (Gk., the Son is of the same substance with the Father). Gregory of Nyssa, traveling to Jerusalem to question Cyril, found him orthodox in 379, and he was regarded as such at the Council of Constantinople (381). But he is principally remembered for his brilliant catechesis, preserved in a series of twenty-three homilies addressed to baptismal candidates (homilies 2–19) and to those just baptized (homilies 20–24; some scholars attribute these to Cyril's successor, John). The homilies explain the meaning of the Christian mysteries using a typological exegesis of Scripture, and they are important evidence for Palestinian liturgical practice in the fourth century. Cyril was made a Doctor of the Church in 1882. Feast day: March 18. See also Arianism; Nicaea, First Council of.

Czestochowa, Our Lady of (ches-tah-koh'vah), a famous icon in Czestochowa, Poland. The icon was brought to Czestochowa from Ukraine in 1382 by Prince Ladislaus Opolszyk, who built a chapel and founded a monastery of Pauline monks to care for it. After the monastery withstood an attack of anti-papal Swedes in 1655, Our Lady of Czestochowa was proclaimed the Queen of Poland in 1656. Since then the icon has served as a symbol of Polish nationalism and religious liberty.

According to tradition, the three cuts on the cheek of the image of Mary were caused by Hussite bandits in 1430. Tradition also claims that St. Joseph built the tablet and St. Luke painted the icon, although historians consider the icon to be a ninth-century Greek or Greek-Italian work that was restored in the thirteenth century in Angevin, Naples. Over a million pilgrims visit the site each year. See also Poland, Catholicism in.

The icon of Our Lady of Czestochowa, religious and national symbol of Poland, located in the monastery of Jasna Gora ("Hill of Light"), above the city of Czestochowa in south-central Poland (during the celebration of the Eucharist by Pope John Paul II, June 1991).



D

d'Ailly, Pierre (dī-yee'), 1350–1420, French Scholastic theologian and cardinal. As a professor and chancellor of the University of Paris, he championed the calling of a Church council to overcome the Great Schism. He believed that Church councils were superior to popes and denied the infallibility of both popes and councils. See also conciliarism; Great Schism.

dalmatic, the outer vestment worn by the deacon at Mass or in processions. It derives from a white tunic worn in second-century Dalmatia. Since the twelfth century, it has followed the day's liturgical colors. Variations have included closed or open sides; ample or cut sleeves; ankle or knee length. See also vestments.

Damasus I, St., ca. 304–84, pope from 366 to 384. He was appointed deacon by his predecessor Liberius, but his election as Bishop of Rome was contested and subsequently marred by violence because he had served the antipope Felix II while Pope Liberius was still alive but in exile. Damasus promoted the organization of the cult of the martyrs, restoring and decorating their tombs with his own marble inscriptions. He secured from the emperor Gratian the right of Western bishops to appeal directly to the pope (378), customarily designated Rome the "Apostolic See," and rebutted the claims of the see of Constantinople (381), relegating it to a rank second to Rome and applying Matt 16:18 to Roman primacy. In 383 he appointed St. Jerome his secretary and commissioned him to revise the Latin Bible, thus inaugurating the translation later known as the Vulgate. Some of Damasus's letters survive, including the Tome of Damasus, but the medieval attribution of the Liber Pontificalis to Damasus is incorrect. Feast day: December 4. See also Constantinople; primacy, papal; Rome; Vulgate.

Damian, St. See Cosmas and Damian, Sts.

Damian, St. Peter. See Peter Damian, St.

Damien, Father [Joseph de Veuster], 1840–89, Belgian-born missionary to Hawaii. The son of prosperous peasants, he was professed a member of the Congregation of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary (the Picpus Fathers) in 1860. Three years later, he left Belgium for the Sandwich Islands (now Hawaii), where he was ordained in 1864. Initially responsible for several districts on the islands of Hawaii and Molokai, he volunteered to serve lepers in the Kalaupapa colony on Molokai in 1873 and worked there for sixteen years as pastor, physician, counselor, sheriff, and undertaker. Damien also founded two orphanages at the colony. He contracted leprosy in 1884, worked until March of 1889, and died one month later. A posthumous investigation exonerated him of charges of moral wrongdoing rumored during his life. In 1936, his remains were removed to Louvain.

Father Damien, nineteenth-century Belgian missionary to lepers on the island of Molokai in Hawaii.

damnation, eternal banishment from the face of God resulting from a definitive and final rejection of divine grace. Damnation, understood as the subjection of those who die in sin to eternal punishment, is well attested in Scripture, especially in the NT (e.g., Matt 3:12; 5:22; 13:42; Mark 9:43; Luke 13:28; 2 Thess 1:9). Theologians agree that damnation is essentially the loss of the Beatific Vision, that is, exclusion from the presence of God, but there has been some debate as to whether or not additional punishment is entailed. Such figures as Origen, Jerome, and Gregory of Nyssa thought that the "fires of hell" should be understood symbolically for the psychological suffering entailed by the alienation from God. Others, such as Augustine and Aquinas, maintained the imposition of additional torments derived from the created order, the "positive punishments of hell." The official magisterium has never authorized one of these options over the other, nor has the Church ever affirmed the actual damnation of any individual. Nevertheless, damnation has consistently been regarded by the Church as a distinct and real possibility following from the principles of retributive justice and personal freedom. If human freedom is taken seriously, and the proper end of humanity is understood as union with God in love, there must exist the possibility of a free rejection of God's self-offer, as well as the responsibility for such an action once it has been taken. See also hell; reprobation. GERARD JACOBITZ dance, liturgical. See liturgical dance.

danger of death, a canonical factor that allows for the suspension of an ecclesiastical law. For example, any priest, even one under censure, can administer the sacrament of Reconciliation to a dying person. The authority to dispense from marriage impediments is also considerably expanded. Such provisions allow the fullest possibility for those in danger of death to receive the Church's ministry. A person need not be actually dying; it is sufficient that a person be in danger of dying.

Daniel the Stylite, St. See Simeon Stylites, St.

Daniélou, Jean (zhohn dahn-yeh-loo'), 1905–74, bishop, cardinal, and French Jesuit patristics scholar. A professor at the Institut Catholique in Paris, he was a key figure in the movement reintroducing the resources of the early Church known as the "New Theology." His translation of Gregory of Nyssa's Life of Moses opened the important series Sources Chrétiennes, which he edited with Henri de Lubac, his mentor.

Daniélou's life mirrored his scholarly engagement with the question of Christianity and culture. As a peritus (Lat., "expert") at Vatican II, he was consulted on the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (Gaudium et Spes). In his later years he often spoke polemically against what he saw as the secularism of the post–Vatican II Church.

Dante Alighieri, 1265–1321, Italy's greatest poet and a major figure in world literature. His best-known poem is La commedia, later called The Divine Comedy when Dante became known as the "divine poet." The Divine Comedy has three divisions: the Inferno (Hell), Purgatorio (Purgatory), and Paradiso (Paradise). It explores life as journey using symbols of the next life. The Inferno confronts evil; the Purgatorio is a journey of liberation until Dante becomes "free, upright, whole" (canto 27); Paradiso culminates in the contemplation of the divine. Classical stories and symbols abound, but the journey is Christian to the core. The composition of this poem in Italian had a definitive and immediate effect on European literature and on literature since, e.g., on the poetry of T. S. Eliot. This poem is filled with wide-ranging erudition—ancient classics, history, philosophy, theology, and contemporary politics. Dante's use of imagery and story is powerful and compelling. Dante was born in Florence, a city of expanding horizons during his youth. In his writings he honored his teacher, Brunetto Latini, and his friend, Guido Cavalcanti. Dante credited Beatrice, whom he first saw when both were nine years old, with being the inspiration of his life and work. He celebrated Beatrice in The New Life, The Banquet, and in The Divine Comedy, where Beatrice takes the place of Virgil as Dante's guide through Paradiso. Dante wrote an immense amount of poetry and prose, yet readers worldwide think of Dante as the poet of The Divine Comedy.

Dark Ages, obsolete term for the era in western Europe from the fall of Rome (fifth century) to the Renaissance; now sometimes used for the first six centuries of that period. The phrase reflects the Renaissance attitude that these centuries lacked the light of classical culture. In fact, though the barbarian invasions destroyed most of Roman civilization, the Church preserved much classical learning, especially in the monasteries, and even Roman government in the episcopal sees. By A.D. 800, Charlemagne, a descendant of barbarian Franks, was crowned by the pope and proclaimed a renewed empire based in northern Europe.

dark night, the, a symbol in the mystical tradition. Remembering Moses' experience of darkness (Exod 20:21), writers like Gregory of Nyssa developed a symbolism of darkness for the divine encounter. Denys the Areopagite (Pseudo-Dionysius) through his Mystical Theology became the major resource for darkness as the symbol of encounter with divine incomprehensibility. The most compelling use of dark night in the tradition has been by John of the Cross (d. 1591) in his poem "Dark Night" and in his commentaries on this poem, The Ascent of Mount Carmel and The Dark Night. In these commentaries John enumerates his signs for the transition from meditation to contemplation (Ascent 2.13; Dark Night 1.9). This experience is of the impotence of human effort and of the wholly gifted character of contemplation. This liberation of the human person takes place on the level of sense (dark night of) and the spirit (dark night of), a division of the human person according to Scholastic philosophy in the sixteenth century. John of the Cross considers the entire human journey to God as night: the purification of attachments, night as a journey of faith, and night as encounter with God as mystery (Ascent 1.2.1). Today some apply John's symbolism of dark night to corporate experiences. See also John of the Cross, St.

Darwinism, the theory of evolution by natural selection proposed by Charles Darwin (1809–82) in The Origin of Species (1859). According to the theory, the various species of plant and animal life have arisen through a gradual process of natural selection spanning eons and beginning with the simplest forms of life. The immediate challenge of Darwinism was to the literal interpretation of the biblical account of creation. Therefore, the public battle against Darwinism was fought by fundamentalist Protestants in the famous Scopes trial (1925) in Dayton, Tennessee. Their antievolutionary views today are known as "scientific creationism."

In his encyclical Humani Generis (1950) Pope Pius XII rejected polygenism, descent of the human race from more than one couple, in favor of monogenism, descent of the human race from a single couple. At the same time, he allowed for the development of a so-called moderate evolutionism. The Church's official position, therefore, is that any scientific explanation of the origin and development of the human species is acceptable so long as it does not exclude God from the creative process and, in particular, God's role in the creation of the human soul. See also creation; creationism; evolution.

Daughters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul (D.C.), religious community of women founded in France in 1633 by Vincent de Paul and Louise de Marillac. It began as a group of women devoted to assisting the poor. Because they were not originally founded as a consecrated religious community, they avoided the confines of the cloister and were able to work actively among the poor. The community was given papal approval in 1668. They quickly expanded their mission to include other European countries. In 1809 they were established at Emmitsburg, Maryland, by Elizabeth Ann Seton. Unlike other religious communities, the Daughters of Charity profess their vows for only a year at a time. Today the community is present throughout Europe, Asia, Africa, and North and South America. In 1994 there were nearly fifteen hundred Daughters of Charity in the United States engaged in teaching; hospital work; day care; social services; justice and peace apostolates; ministry to unwed mothers, the elderly, and the dying; and parish work. See also Seton, St. Elizabeth Ann Bayley; Vincent de Paul, St.

Daughters of Isabella, a Catholic women's organization. Originating as a ladies' auxiliary of the Knights of Columbus, Russell Council No. 65 of New Haven, Connecticut, the Daughters of Isabella (DI), Circle No. 1, was incorporated in the state of Connecticut on March 7, 1904. Like the Knights it is a Columbian society, but its ceremonials depict the role of Queen Isabella of Spain in the voyages of Christopher Columbus. The society has expanded throughout the United States, Canada, Mexico, and the Philippines. Another DI Circle originated in Utica, New York, but because the New Haven group had been incorporated, the Utica Circle ultimately became the Catholic Daughters of the Americas (CDA). In 1992 the DI numbered nearly 100,000 while the CDA membership was almost 150,000. See also Knights of Columbus.

Daughters of Wisdom (D.W.), a congregation of religious women begun by Louis Grignion de Montfort and Marie Louise Trichet in France in 1703, with the intention of caring for the sick among the poor. In the early twentieth century, following the institution of anticlerical laws in France, they founded communities in New York, Maine, Connecticut, and Virginia. The Daughters of Wisdom, today a pontifical institute, run hospitals and clinics as well as institutions for abandoned and retarded children. They also serve in parishes and retreat centers, where they continue to live their founders' vision, the insight that Jesus is the Wisdom of God. See also Montfort, St. Louis Grignion de.

David, the most important king of Israel. Of the tribe of Judah and the city of Bethlehem, David rose to prominence under Saul, Israel's first king. David became king around 1010 B.C. and ruled the united tribes from Hebron for seven years. He made Jerusalem his religious and political capital until his death around 970 B.C. Known as a poet, he is credited with a dirge in 2 Sam 1, as well as many psalms. The promise of the prophet Nathan that God would maintain David's line forever (2 Sam 7:5–16) grounded later messianic hopes. According to the NT, those hopes were fulfilled in Jesus, who was descended from David (Matt 1:6–17; Luke 1:27; Acts 2:22–36; Rom 1:3; Rev 5:4).

David, St., or Dewi, sixth-century abbot and bishop of Menevia, Wales. Little but legend is known of this patron saint of Wales. He was apparently bishop and abbot of a monastery at the place now called St. David's in Pembrokeshire. Many ancient Welsh churches were dedicated to him. Feast day: March 1.

Dawson, Christopher, 1889–1970, English historian. A convert to the Catholic Church in 1914, he spent his life as both an academic and independent scholar. He was the first holder of the Stillman Chair of Roman Catholic Studies at Harvard University in 1958. His strong conviction that European civilization was dependent on the Christian faith and the influence of the Catholic Church was best expressed in his work The Making of Europe (1932).

Day, Dorothy M., 1897–1980, journalist, pacifist, and cofounder of the Catholic Worker movement.

Dorothy Day, cofounder of the Catholic Worker movement and one of the leading Catholic laywomen of the twentieth century.

After the birth of her only child, Tamara, she abandoned her Bohemian lifestyle in Greenwich Village and converted to Catholicism in 1927. Five years later, Day met the French peasant philosopher and teacher Peter Maurin, and her life changed forever. Maurin provided her with an understanding of the meaning of the Church and her position in it. Together they founded the Catholic Worker movement, a community of laypeople from all walks of life.

Day's belief centered on Christian personalism, a philosophical orientation that stresses the value and dignity of each individual human person. Attempting to make this Worker ideal available to every individual who desired it, she started a newspaper. She entitled it Catholic Worker, to announce a Catholic presence and concern for the poor and the oppressed. Day witnessed daily to this concern by embracing voluntary poverty and establishing a house of hospitality and a farming commune.

Day's unique contribution was her proclamation of Catholic pacifism as the ideal response to war. The Catholic Worker was the first Catholic group in American history to claim such a position. Through the influence of Robert Ludlow, who edited the Catholic Worker, and Ammon Hennacy, who brought an activist dimension to the movement, nonviolence was integrated into the pacifist position and encouraged lay initiative in changing the social order by performing direct actions on behalf of peace and social justice. Day and the Catholic Worker movement were committed to pacifism and nonviolence and were the heart of the American Catholic peace movement during the Vietnam War, assisting in the formation of other groups such as the American Pax Association, the Catholic Peace Fellowship, and Pax Christi USA. See also Catholic Worker movement; Maurin, Peter; pacifism; personalism, Christian.

PATRICIA MCNEAL

day of recollection, a day spent in a quiet space to collect one's thoughts and feelings about life. Many parishes and retreat centers have designed thematic programs that span all or part of a day. Unlike retreat programs, days of recollection are not residential, nor do they require overnight accommodation. They are conducted for groups of all sizes and have minimal housing and meal requirements. The experience provides an opportunity for prayerful reflection and the social environment for faith-sharing among participants. Topics can cover, among others, Sacred Scripture, family life, devotion to Mary, Lent and Advent, Eucharist, marriage, reconciliation, and prayer.

day of the Lord, an expression for a time of judgment in the prophets. Isa 24:17–23 describes terror, the pit, and the snare; Joel 2:30–32, a day of portents with the sun darkened and the moon turned into blood. Mal 4:5–6 predicts that Elijah will precede the day. Such predictions inspired the imagery of judgment day in the NT (Matt 24; Mark 13; Luke 21; Rev 19–20).

d'Azeglio, Luigi Taparelli (dah-zayl'-yoh), 1793–1862, Jesuit philosopher and social thinker. Ordained in 1820, six years after the Society of Jesus was restored, he became the first rector of the reopened Roman College (1824) and served as editor of Civiltà Cattolica (1850–62). His major five-volume study of the natural law (1840–43) was a forerunner of modern sociology. He is credited with anticipating the move toward internationalism in the mid-twentieth century and with having influenced Pope Leo XIII's social encyclical Rerum Novarum ("On the Condition of the Working Person," 1891). See also Civiltà Cattolica; Rerum Novarum.

d'Azeglio, Massimo Taparelli (dah-zayl'yoh), 1798–1866, Italian writer, painter, and statesman. Under Pope Pius IX, d'Azeglio espoused a progressive political program supportive of social morality and the supremacy of law. He served as diplomat, premier of Sardinia, envoy to Rome, and governor of Milan.

D.D., Doctor of Divinity, degree, usually honorary, given to bishops in the United States.

deacon, a member of the diaconate, one of the three forms of the sacrament of Holy Orders. The diaconate recently was restored in Latin-rite Catholicism as a permanent and distinct ministry with its own proper function.

The origins of the diaconate are found in the NT period. A reference to what developed into the office of deacon may be found in the reference to "ministers" (Gk., diakonoi) associated with the "overseers" (episkopoi) in Phil 1:1. Another reference is found in Rom 16:1, where Phoebe is named as a "minister" (diakonos) of the church at Cenchreae. 1 Tim 3:8–10; 12–13 describe the qualities of those who would fulfill this office. The reference to "women" in v. 11 of the same passage seems to refer to women deacons, though it is possible that wives of deacons are meant. In none of these passages do we find a clear description of the precise role of the deacon. Earlier interpreters sometimes saw the institution of the diaconate in Acts 6:1–6. Recent critical studies see rather an indication of the early Church's creating new structures in response to the needs of a growing community, not the specific institution of the diaconate. The post-apostolic letters of Ignatius of Antioch (d. ca. 107) have several references to the offices of bishop, presbyters, and deacons in local churches of Asia Minor.

History: The diaconate flourished in the second and third centuries. While diaconal functions varied in different places, ministries of charity, liturgy, and diverse forms of ministry of the Word were common. In some areas deacons were the principal administrative agents of the bishops; their importance in this capacity often exceeded that of the presbyters. In the third and fourth centuries the diaconate in the West began to decline for several reasons: tensions arose between deacons and presbyters because bishops were often chosen from the ranks of deacons; as the Eucharist became more the focus of ministry, the role of presbyters, who presided at Eucharist, became more important than the role of the deacon; and monastic centers took over some of the deacon's charitable responsibilities. Increasing emphasis on celibacy and lack of support for full-time deacons also contributed to the decline of the diaconate. Fourth-century councils emphasized the inferior status of deacons vis-à-vis presbyters and insisted on prior reception of the diaconate before ordination to the priesthood or episcopate. By the seventh century the diaconate in the West became a transitional step for candidates for priesthood. The deacon's role was almost exclusively liturgical. So it remained until the sixteenth century.

The Council of Trent (1545–63) reaffirmed the place of the diaconate in Church order, though its call for a restoration of the diaconate was never implemented. Vatican Council II (1962–65) sought the restoration of the diaconate as a permanent and distinct ministry in the Church. The council not only desired to restore a ministry that was present in apostolic times, but also to grant the grace of the office to those doing diaconal work and to provide ministers for basic functions of Church life. Vatican II's Decree on Eastern Catholic Churches (1964) called for a reintroduction of the diaconate as a permanent office in those churches where it had fallen into disuse.

Vatican II: The texts of Vatican II and the decrees of Pope Paul VI, which implemented the call for a restored diaconate, point to three areas of diaconal ministry. Reflecting early Church tradition, the ordained deacon's basic ministry is to represent and promote the Church's call to service and to be a sign of Christ's own serving mission. The deacon is to function as minister of the word in preaching and in such ministries as catechetical instruction, retreat ministry, or counseling. The deacon's liturgical ministry is to be a visible reminder of the link between the Church's liturgy and its service of others in the name of Christ. The relationship between the various aspects of the deacon's ministry will vary according to local needs. A deacon may be authorized to exercise a limited leadership role in designated pastoral responsibilities in the absence of a priest. Deacons may also serve in the development of small Christian communities. The ministry of the deacon is not to replace the call of all the baptized to share in the serving mission of the Church; rather, it should promote the service role of the entire community.

The order of diaconate in the Catholic Church is at present restricted to men, though women engage in many of the pastoral activities associated with diaconal ministry. The transitional diaconate continues to exist in the Latin rite for candidates for priesthood. See also bishop; deacon, woman; Holy Orders; ordination; priesthood. FREDERICK J. CWIEKOWSKI deacon, permanent, one ordained to the diaconate for life. Although considered for many centuries in the West a separate order within the ancient threefold ministry of the Church, the diaconate was used almost solely as a step on the way to ordination to the presbyterate or priesthood. The Eastern churches, both Catholic and Orthodox, retained the practice of ordaining someone a deacon with the intention that the person would continue in the ministry of a deacon as a lifelong mission and not proceed to ordination as a priest.

Vatican II (1962–65) restored the permanent diaconate in the West. Sometimes incorrectly called a "lay deacon," a permanent deacon is understood in canon law to be a cleric and hence is required to be attached (incardinated) to a diocese and subject to the laws governing clerics, though with some exceptions. The most visible of these is that a married man may be ordained to the permanent diaconate. However, no one ordained to the diaconate can marry subsequently (or remarry upon the death of his wife). In addition, a permanent deacon is neither obliged to wear clerical clothing nor restricted as to occupations. He should ordinarily derive his own financial support from his secular occupation. See also deacon; deacon, transitional.

deacon, transitional, one ordained to the diaconate with the expectation of being ordained to the priesthood after a limited period of time. While a transitional diaconate had existed in the West since the seventh century, the present term came into use after the restoration of the permanent diaconate at the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). See also celibacy, clerical; deacon; deacon, permanent; Holy Orders; ordination.

deacon, woman, one group of ministers in the early Church. Rom 16:1 refers to Phoebe as the diakonos (Gk., "deacon") of the church at Cenchreae, though her role is not specified. A second reference to women deacons may occur in 1 Tim 3:8–13. In the context of a description of qualifications of deacons, one sentence (v. 11) concerns qualifications of women. The meaning of the verse is debated; more probably it refers to women deacons; less likely does it refer to wives of deacons. Pliny the Younger, writing in the early second century, refers to women deacons (Lat., ministrae).

Evidence from the patristic period is difficult to summarize. Ministry of women deacons, sometimes called deaconesses in patristic documents, varied from place to place. The ministry of women deacons flourished in the early Church, more so in the East than in the West. The Council of Chalcedon (451) speaks of their ordination. In the early centuries of the Church, women deacons were prominently engaged in liturgical ministry to women and children in the community. Singularly important was their preparation of women catechumens and their role in baptismal anointing of women. As infant baptism replaced adult baptism, the role of women deacons diminished. In Western Christianity their role ceased to exist around the sixth century; in Eastern Christianity women deacons continued to function until the eleventh century.

In contemporary Catholicism, women engage in a variety of pastoral ministries historically associated with the diaconate. The 1976 Vatican declaration against ordination of women to priesthood did not extend to women in the diaconate. See also deacon; Holy Orders; ordination; ordination of women.

FREDERICK J. CWIEKOWSKI

deaconess. See deacon, woman.

dead, prayers for the. See prayers for the dead.

Dead Sea Scrolls, a collection of fragmentary manuscripts in Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek, copied ca. 225 B.C.–A.D. 135 and belonging to Jewish groups at Qumran and other sites near the Dead Sea. The majority of scrolls, about 800, were discovered in eleven caves immediately west and north of the Qumran settlement, while others were found at Masada, Murabbaat, and Nahal Hever. Cave 1, discovered by an Arab Bedouin in 1947, yielded complete scrolls of the book of Isaiah and the Rule of the Community, plus large fragments of five other manuscripts. Formal excavations in the cave unearthed small fragments of some seventy more manuscripts. The main cave (Cave 4) containing 575 manuscripts was discovered in 1952, and the last (Cave 11) in 1956. The dating of the manuscripts is secured independently by archaeological, paleographical, and radiocarbon analysis, as well as by literary similarity with other Jewish works of this period (from Jubilees and Daniel to the NT and Mishnah).

Many of the scrolls contain works common to the wide spectrum of late Second Temple Judaism (biblical, liturgical, apocryphal, pseudepigraphical texts), while some reflect the beliefs and perspectives particular to a devout, ascetic, priestly, Torah-centered (the Rule of the Community, the Zadokite Document, Some Works of the Torah) and apocalyptic (the Rule, the War of the Sons of Light Against the Sons of Darkness) community. Most scholars, with some exceptions, identify the community with the little-known Essenes. With proper qualifications this is the most cogent hypothesis developed over the past generation. There is no mention of Jesus Christ nor any specific link with Christianity in the scrolls, though Christianity, along with rabbinic Judaism, emerged from the rich spectrum of Judaism illuminated by the scrolls. See also Essenes; Masoretic Text; Qumran. EUGENE ULRICH deanery, or vicariate forane, optional supraparochial grouping, usually of neighboring parishes, to promote more effective pastoral care. Organized under a priest (or bishop) called a vicar forane (or dean, or archpriest) named or approved by the diocesan bishop after appropriate consultation, the deanery is adaptable to personal, geographical, and demographical exigencies. As historically conceived, it may help extend episcopal solicitude to outlying areas or, as often today, where isolation more likely results from urban, sociocultural, or health-related conditions. More than a supervisor, the dean may have broad faculties, for example, to encourage clerical development and morale, promote interparochial cooperation, and allay intraparochial conflicts.

dean. See vicar forane.

Dearden, John F., 1907–88, cardinal-archbishop, leader at Vatican II and in the postconciliar U.S. Church. After seminary studies in Cleveland, Ohio, and Rome, he was ordained in 1932 and earned a doctorate in theology from the Gregorian University in 1934. He served as instructor and rector at St. Mary's Seminary, Cleveland. Ordained bishop in 1948, he served as coadjutor bishop and, after 1950, as bishop of Pittsburgh before promotion to archbishop of Detroit in 1959. He participated in Vatican Council II (1962–65), was elected first president in 1966 of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops, and was created cardinal in 1969. He was a strong supporter of the Vatican Council II reforms. See also National Conference of Catholic Bishops.

death and dying, the irreversible process of decline and termination of human life. The theological understanding of death and dying has been shaped by the biblical record and the philosophical traditions of Western Civilization. In the OT, death is most often portrayed as the passage of the person from the land of the living to sheol (Heb.), the dark, cheerless realm of the dead where there can be no happiness and no praise of God (Ps 6:5; Isa 38:18). The later books come closer to the Greek philosophical notion of death as the separation of soul and body (Wis 3:1–5; 4:15), though eternal life came to be understood, not in terms of the immortality of the soul but in terms of the resurrection of the body (Dan 12:2). NT perspectives incorporate these views, understanding death as the enslaving consequence of sin (Rom 5:12; 6:23), yet additionally as that power decisively overcome by the death and resurrection of Jesus (Heb 2:14; 2 Tim 1:10). Drawing on these sources, Catholic theology has traditionally viewed death as a consequence of original sin (Council of Trent, D 788, 793). More recent reflections, influenced by contemporary philosophy, have also emphasized death, and correlatively one's lifelong preparation for it, as a definitional event in the life of the Christian. In the face of death, one's essential disposition toward the mystery of God is disclosed as either an obedient and humble acknowledgment of one's finitude and dependence, or as a rebellious and ultimately self-defeating assertion of one's autonomy. See also Anointing of the Sick; eternal life; resurrection of the body.

De Auxiliis (day awg-zil'ee-ees; Lat., "concerning the helps" [toward salvation]), a sixteenth-century theological controversy over grace and free will. The controversy began in Spain with a debate started by the Dominican Domingo Bañez, in response to the Jesuit Luis de Molina's theology of God's grace and its influence, when encountering human freedom, on the individual. The Dominicans saw themselves as true followers of Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274), holding for an efficacy of divine grace that moves free will freely; the Jesuits also understood themselves as Thomists even as they focused upon human freedom. The controversy was held in a series of meetings attended by Clement VIII (d. 1605) and Paul V (d. 1621); it ended in 1607 with papal permission for both sides to teach their theologies. See also free will; grace.

decade. See Rosary.

Decalogue. See Commandments, the Ten.

declaration, conciliar, a statement of less weight than a conciliar constitution indicating the current position of the Church concerning topics of contemporary interest, which may be developed and revised with the passage of time. Vatican Council II (1962–65) issued the declarations On Christian Education (Gravissimum Educationis), On Religious Freedom (Dignitatis Humanae), and On the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions (Nostrae Aetate). See also ecumenical council; Vatican Council II.

Declaration on Christian Education (Lat., Gravissimum Educationis, "The most serious [importance] of education"), one of the sixteen documents of Vatican II. Promulgated on October 28, 1965, the declaration focuses on the education of the young in the home, the school (including colleges, universities, and seminaries), and the Church (through catechesis and liturgy), but the greatest emphasis is on schooling. The declaration, originally conceived as a constitution on Catholic schools, insists that education must be broadly humane, open to scientific advances, and concerned with nurturing personal maturity and social responsibility. It is different from other conciliar documents in that it deals only with a few basic principles and leaves their development to the postconciliar process. The pertinent documents of implementation are the General Catechetical Directory, issued by the Sacred Congregation for the Clergy in 1971; Catholic Schools; Lay Catholics in Schools: Witness to Faith; and The Religious Dimension of Education in a Catholic School, issued by the Sacred Congregation for Catholic Education in 1977, 1982, and 1988, respectively; and the Catechism of the Catholic Church, issued by the Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith in 1992.

Declaration on Religious Freedom (Lat., Dignitatis Humanae, "Of the dignity of the human [person]"), one of the sixteen documents of Vatican II. Promulgated on December 7, 1965, the document was first intended as a chapter on Church-state relations in the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (Lumen Gentium), as a chapter on religious freedom in the Decree on Ecumenism, and later as an appendix of that decree. At the council's third session (1964) it was given independent status as a separate schema (proposal), to be revised by the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity. A key drafter was the American Jesuit theologian John Courtney Murray, who had previously been silenced by the Vatican for his views on Church and state and religious liberty.

This was the most controversial document produced by the council because it raised the question of doctrinal development. In light of so many strong condemnations of the principle of religious freedom in previous papal teachings from the Middle Ages and the nineteenth century (esp. Pope Pius IX's "Syllabus of Errors," 1864), it seemed theologically impossible for the council to take a new doctrinal stance on this issue. The schema elicited intense opposition from conservative forces at the council, led by Cardinal Alfredo Ottaviani, prefect of the Holy Office.

The declaration is a landmark document because it explicitly intended "to develop the doctrine of recent popes on the inviolable rights of the human person and on the constitutional order of society" (n. 1); it acknowledged for the first time in official Catholic teaching the fact of religious pluralism without condemning or bemoaning it; it defined the role of government as constitutional and limited in function, namely, the protection and promotion of human rights and duties, and disavowed any sacral function for it; and it affirmed the freedom of the Church, rather than its privileged legal status, as "the fundamental principle in what concerns the relations between the Church and governments and the whole civil order" (n. 13).

The declaration grounded its teaching not only on the dignity of the human person but also on revelation. The act of faith is, of its very essence, a free act. Jesus Christ himself never compelled anyone to believe in him. His manner was always meek, humble, and patient. His miracles were intended to rouse faith in his hearers and to confirm them in faith, not to coerce them. Taught by Christ's example, the apostles followed the same way (nn. 9–12).

Religious freedom, rooted in freedom of conscience, demands personal immunity from all manner of compulsion and restraint in everything pertaining to the making or rejecting of an act of religious faith (n. 9). But such freedom also demands autonomy for religious bodies in matters concerning their own organization, governance, and spiritual mission and immunity from coercion in the public expression of their religious faith, that is, in what concerns worship, religious observances and practices, the proclamation of religious faith, and the declaration of the social, economic, and political implications of religious faith (n. 13). This freedom can only be limited when it interferes with public order, that is, when the public peace, commonly accepted standards of public morality, or the rights of other citizens are threatened (n. 7). See also Murray, John Courtney; religious liberty.

RICHARD P. MCBRIEN

Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions (Lat., Nostra Aetate, "In our age"), one of the sixteen documents of Vatican II. Promulgated on October 28, 1965, the declaration was originally intended as a chapter in the Decree on Ecumenism. It was also to have been concerned principally with the Jews because this was a matter of personal concern to Pope John XXIII. However, that idea proved unworkable not only because of the political situation of Christian Arabs in the Middle East, but also because of the Church's own broader vision of the religious world beyond it, reflected, for example, in Pope Paul VI's encyclical Ecclesiam Suam (1964).

The declaration acknowledges that the human community is one because it comes from the creative hand of the one God (n. 1) and that variations in religious faith and practice are simply a reflection of the rich diversity that characterizes humankind itself: "The Catholic Church rejects nothing which is true and holy in these religions. . . . [They] often reflect a ray of that truth which enlightens all persons" (n. 2). Consequently, the declaration encourages "dialogue and collaboration" with the followers of other religions in order to promote common spiritual, moral, social, and cultural values.

The declaration praises Hinduism's emphasis on contemplation, asceticism, meditation, and trust in God (n. 2), Buddhism's recognition of the insufficiency of the material world (n. 2), and Islam's belief in the one God, its reverence for Jesus as a great prophet, its honoring of Mary, his mother, its high moral standards, and its commitment to prayer, almsgiving, and fasting (n. 3).

But the greatest emphasis is placed on Christianity's relationship to Judaism, in which the beginnings of the Church's faith and election are to be found. Thus, "the Jews still remain most dear to God because of their fathers, for he does not repent of the gifts he makes nor of the calls he issues" (n. 4).

The declaration directly challenges the prejudice that all Jews are somehow responsible for the death of Christ and, therefore, are to be reviled throughout history as "Christ-killers." What happened to Jesus, the council declares, "cannot be blamed upon all the Jews then living, without distinction, nor upon the Jews of today. Although the Church is the new people of God, the Jews should not be presented as repudiated or cursed by God, as if such views followed from the holy Scriptures" (n. 4). This principle should always be reflected in the Church's catechetical instruction and preaching.

The Church "deplores the hatred, persecutions, and displays of anti-Semitism directed against the Jews of any time and from any source" (n. 4). Indeed, we cannot pretend to love God if we reject our brothers and sisters who are created in God's image (n. 5). "As a consequence, the Church rejects, as foreign to the mind of Christ, any discrimination against persons or harassment of them because of their race, color, condition of life, or religion" (n. 5).

The declaration has had a decidedly positive impact on Catholic-Jewish relations since Vatican II, promoting theological dialogue, joint prayer, and collaboration in social ministry. See also Jews, Catholicism and; salvation outside the Church.

RICHARD P. MCBRIEN

decree, one of any number of types of official proclamations issued by a competent authority, most often by papal or episcopal authority. The decree of an ecumenical council is its most solemn form. See also constitution, conciliar; declaration, conciliar.

decree, conciliar, a doctrinal or pastoral statement concerning a specific group of people or Church matter and sometimes containing directives for renewal or reform. Vatican Council II (1962–65) issued nine decrees, including On Ecumenism (Unitatis Redintegratio), On the Apostolate of the Laity (Apostolicam Actuositatem), and On the Appropriate Renewal of the Religious Life (Perfectae Caritatis). See also ecumenical council; Vatican Council II.

Decree on Eastern Catholic Churches (Lat., Orientalium Ecclesiarum), Second Vatican Council document on Eastern-rite Catholic communities and one of the shortest conciliar decrees. Debated at Vatican II in October 1964 and approved on November 20, it deals with particular churches, preservation of the spiritual heritage of the Eastern Churches, Eastern patriarchs, sacraments, divine worship, and relations with the separated brethren.

The document insists on equality of rites, avoidance of latinization, and the fostering and restoration of the Eastern heritage, all of which must be understood against the background of centuries of Latin ecclesiastical and cultural imperialism against Eastern Catholics throughout the world, a discrimination that was especially prejudicial in North America. The text reflects the actual state of the Catholic Church as a basically Western Church with several minority satellite communities enjoying a special status and special rites, rather than a communion of several sister churches, each one an equally particular church. Noteworthy in this context is the provisional nature of the decree: it applies only to Eastern Catholic churches (title and n. 30), thus abandoning any pretense that Eastern Catholicism represents the whole of Eastern Christendom.

Though silent on Eastern traditions threatening to entrenched Latin prejudices such as married clergy, the decree is in many ways a notable document containing several progressive elements. Most remarkable, with implications hardly appreciated at the time, is the affirmation that Eastern Catholic communities are distinct churches (not just "rites") enjoying the same rights and obligations, including the right and obligation to spread by preaching the gospel (n. 3). Therefore, Eastern hierarchies should be established where needed (n. 4), and these churches have the right and duty "to govern themselves" according to their own traditions (n. 5). Astonishingly, the decree specifies these as follows: "The rights and privileges . . . which existed in the time of union between East and West" (n. 9). Where necessary, new patriarchates should be established (n. 11).

Several statements on liturgy are also noteworthy: the Eastern liturgical heritage is to be preserved, but also modernized (nn. 6, 12), an invitation that contained the seeds of future friction between local churches and Rome. There are unexpected advances, too, such as the explicit recognition of the Eastern practice that the Sunday or holy day precept can be fulfilled by attendance at the cathedral offices (n. 15), of the fact that the Divine Office is not a prayerbook but liturgy (n. 22), and of the age-old custom of vernacular liturgy (n. 23) under the control of the local church authorities (and, therefore, not of Rome).

Failure to implement some of the positive elements of this decree in the aftermath of Vatican II remains a major source of friction between Rome and, especially, the Ukrainian, Melkite, and Syro-Malabar Catholic churches. See also Eastern Catholics and Rome; Eastern Catholics and Vatican II.

ROBERT F. TAFT

Decree on Ecumenism (Lat., Unitatis Redintegratio), one of the sixteen documents of the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), and the most authoritative charter of the Catholic Church's active participation in the one ecumenical movement. Promulgated on November 21, 1964, its ecclesiological positions shifted the Catholic understanding of the one Church of Christ, of the relationship between the Catholic Church and the other churches, and of attitudes and methods in "the restoration of unity." The shift is from a former ecclesiology of Catholic self-sufficiency and the unification model of "return" (to the Catholic Church) to that of an ecclesiology that acknowledges the incompleteness of the Church and the need for one another in the one, but still divided, fellowship or Church. Ecumenism is not a return to the past but a common search for future reconciliation.

The decree describes the understanding of the fundamental invisible and visible unity of the Lord's "one Church and one Church only" as the expression of the undivided Trinity. This Church "subsists in" the Catholic Church but is not coextensive with it, because "outside its visible borders," i.e., in other Christians and their communions, exist "elements and endowments which together build up and give life to the Church itself" (n. 3).

Division among Christians "openly contradicts the will of Christ, scandalizes the world, and damages . . . the proclamation of the gospel" (n. 1). Nevertheless, there already is a real communion between Christians because of what God has done and does to and through them; this communion is imperfect because of what they have done and continue to do to each other—"a real but imperfect communion" among all Christian communions (n. 3).

Ecumenism in practice demands the "continual reformation" of the pilgrim Church and the continual conversion—"change of heart and holiness of life"—of each Catholic (nn. 6, 7). A loving understanding of each other's communion through dialogue, an ecumenically oriented formation and education, and a common search into the word of God foster mutual understanding and esteem. And common witness to the Servant Lord is strongly encouraged through cooperative action, especially in social matters (n. 12).

The decree describes the principal historical divisions in the Christian family—in East and West. The Eastern churches have the right to govern themselves according to their own traditions and historical developments. The Eastern liturgical and monastic traditions, spiritualities, and church disciplines, and "complementary rather than conflicting" theological formulations should be respected, for they contribute to the comeliness of the one Church and to its witness (n. 17).

For the Christian communions of the West, the decree proposes a program for dialogue. The commitment to Christ as Lord and Savior, the reverence for Holy Scripture, the baptismal liturgy and celebration of the Lord's Supper, or Eucharist, the apostolic witness to the gospel in social action—all provide points of agreement among Catholics and their Anglican and Protestant sisters and brothers in Christ.

The basic theological and pastoral positions of the decree motivated and guided the post–Vatican II Church. The experience is officially expressed in the 1983 Code of Canon Law, and in the 1993 Ecumenical Directory, issued by the Pontifical Council for Christian Unity. "The will of Christ binds the Church to promote the restoration of unity" (can. 755). Ecumenism, in the words of the 1985 Synod of Bishops, "inscribes itself deeply and indelibly in the consciousness of the Church." See also Church; ecumenical movement; ecumenism; unity of the Church.

THOMAS F. STRANSKY

Decree on Priestly Formation (Optatum Totius, Lat., "the wish of the whole [Church]"), 1965 document of Vatican Council II. The decree contains directives and counsels concerning the formation of candidates for priesthood in light of the council's teaching and pastoral concerns. The document is meant to be read in conjunction with the council's Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, and the Decree on the Ministry and Life of Priests. The Decree on Priestly Formation was intended to do for Vatican II what the Council of Trent's Decree on Seminaries (1563) did for the needs of the Church four hundred years earlier. This decree of Vatican II holds to proven norms but adapts according to the orientations of the council and the pastoral needs of the present. The text treats, at different lengths, seven topics: the need for each nation or rite to have its own "Program for Priestly Formation" drawn up by the episcopal conference and revised at regular intervals; suggestions on fostering priestly vocations; the necessity of major seminaries in preparing candidates for the basic responsibilities of pastoral ministry; directives for spiritual formation of priestly candidates; the revision of ecclesiastical studies in the light of Catholic teaching and contemporary pastoral needs; the incorporation of pastoral concerns into all aspects of priestly training; and the need for continuing education beyond the seminary program. The decree begins and ends with a reminder of the role of the priest in the renewal of the Church, a concern of the council. See also priesthood.

FREDERICK J. CWIEKOWSKI

Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity (Lat., Apostolicam Actuositatem, "The apostolic activity"), one of the sixteen documents of Vatican II. Promulgated on November 18, 1965, the decree was originally a much longer document, comprehensively examining all aspects of the lay apostolate. Some of that material was transferred to the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, the Decree on the Church's Missionary Activity, and other documents.

Like the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (n. 33), the decree rejects the notion that the lay apostolate is simply a participation in the apostolate of the hierarchy (Catholic Action). Rather it "derives from [the laity's] Christian vocation" (n. 1) and from their sacramental incorporation into the Body of Christ. They are "assigned to the apostolate by the Lord himself" (n. 3). Indeed, the laity "share in the priestly, prophetic, and royal office of Christ and therefore have their own role to play in the mission of the whole People of God in the Church and in the world" (n. 2).

Although the decree situates the lay apostolate firmly in the temporal sphere, namely, the family, culture, economics, the arts and professions, politics, and international relations (n. 7), it does not exclude the laity from direct participation in the internal life of the Church (ch. 3). They "exercise their apostolate both in the Church and in the world, in both the spiritual and temporal orders" (n. 5). They do this either as individuals or as members of organizations and associations (ch. 4) and in cooperation with the hierarchy and clergy (ch. 5). See also laity.

RICHARD P. MCBRIEN

Decree on the Appropriate Renewal of the Religious Life (Lat., Perfectae Caritatis, "Of perfect charity"), one of the sixteen documents of the Second Vatican Council. Promulgated on October 28, 1965, the decree called for the renewal of religious orders and congregations that involved two processes: "(1) a continuous return to the sources of all Christian life and to the original inspiration behind a given community and (2) an adjustment of the community to the changed conditions of the times" (n. 2).

The document calls on congregations and orders to study Scripture and the spirit of the founders for guidance as they adapt to the current demands of society and the Church. In accord with the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (Lumen Gentium, 1964) this decree deals with the way that members of religious congregations and orders follow the universal call to holiness preached by Jesus.

Among the adaptations called for were modifying the papal cloister according to the conditions of time and place; doing away with outdated customs; and revising constitutions, directories, custom books, books of prayers, and ceremonies to bring them into harmony with the documents of the council. The decree states that religious habits should correspond to requirements of health and be suited to the conditions of time and place and to the services required by those who wear them.

The most significant change recommended did not concern exterior adaptations but demanded a renewal of spirit that could enliven exterior changes. This document marked the beginning of dramatic changes in the style of living and ministries of the members of religious congregations and orders. See also religious life; religious orders and congregations.

REGINA COLL

Decree on the Bishops' Pastoral Office in the Church (Christus Dominus, Lat., "Christ, the Lord"), 1965 document of Vatican Council II. It focuses on practical applications of the council's teaching on the office of bishops. The decree is to be read in conjunction with the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, ch. 3. The decree focuses on three basic areas of episcopal responsibility. The first chapter deals with the bishops' collegial responsibility for the universal Church and their relationship with the pope. Special mention is given to the synod of bishops. The decree calls for a reorganization of the departments of the Roman Curia, with membership representative of the universal Church and more frequent recourse to the advice of laypersons.

The second chapter looks to the bishop's responsibilities in the local diocese. His teaching role, one of his principal duties, is to take account of contemporary needs and opportunities. In describing the bishop as pastor, the decree looks to the role of diocesan councils and the bishop's relations with priests, with special attention to religious.

The third chapter deals with the cooperation of bishops responsible for the Church in a particular region and calls for the use of synods and councils to serve that purpose. Specific attention is given to the nature and authority of the episcopal conference.

The decree emphasizes bishops' responsibilities and duties, with minimal attention to prerogatives and rights. This reflects the council's teaching that service is at the heart of episcopal ministry. See also bishop.

FREDERICK J. CWIEKOWSKI

Decree on the Church's Missionary Activity (Lat., Ad Gentes Divinitus, "To the nations"), one of the sixteen documents of Vatican II. Promulgated on December 7, 1965, this decree was promoted especially by missionary bishops in an effort to draw attention to the challenge of evangelizing the Third World and to attract financial and personnel support from the bishops of Europe and America. The document presupposes the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church and the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, but it differs from both in that they speak of the "mission" of the Church in its comprehensive sense of preaching the gospel in word, sacrament, witness, and service to the whole human community, Christian and non-Christian alike, while this decree is concerned with one important aspect of that total mission, namely, "preaching the gospel and planting the Church among peoples or groups who do not yet believe in Christ" (n. 6). The distinction is between the "mission of the Church" and "the missions." In both senses, "the whole Church is missionary" in its very nature (n. 35). The immediate purpose of missionary activity in the latter sense is the establishment of a local church with its own native hierarchy (n. 6; ch. 3).

Wherever missionaries go, however, they are not to impose an alien cultural reality from outside, but to recognize and preserve "whatever truth and grace are to be found among the nations, as a sort of secret presence of God" (n. 9). This pastoral principle is rooted in the theological principle of the incarnation (n. 10). See also missions. RICHARD P. MCBRIEN

Decree on the Instruments of Social Communication (Lat., Inter Mirifica, "Among astonishing [inventions]"), one of the sixteen documents of Vatican II. Promulgated on December 4, 1963, before the council's theology had fully developed, the decree tended to adopt a moralistic and maternalistic tone (nn. 1–2). The first chapter insists on the primacy of the moral order in the world of communications and art and on the competence of Church authorities in making pertinent moral judgments. The second and final chapter exhorts the faithful to establish and support a Catholic press and to promote good films, radio, and television.

A much lengthier, less narrow Pastoral Instruction on the Means of Social Communication, Communio et Progressio, was issued in 1971. It noted that it would be "impossible" to lay complete blame on the media for declining moral standards (n. 22) and that the development of public opinion requires the free flow of information not only in society (nn. 24–47), but also in the Church (nn. 114–21).

Decree on the Ministry and Life of Priests (Presbyterorum Ordinis, Lat., "the order of priests"), 1965 document of Vatican Council II. The decree concerns the ministry of priests in light of the council's teaching and the pastoral circumstances of the day. Even though presented in the juridical form of a decree, the statement also contains an elaboration of the council's teaching on priests given in article 28 of the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (1964). The decree reflects the council's intent to expand the notion of priestly ministry from one focused largely on ministry of the sacraments to a broader threefold ministry of God's Word, sacraments, and community leadership.

The decree develops the notion of priestly ministry in terms of four relationships of priests discussed in the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church. By sacramental ordination, the priest is said to act "in the person of Christ the head" in the exercise of the threefold ministry. The ministry of the priest is to be understood also in terms of his relationship to the body of bishops, with which he shares the one priesthood of Christ; to other priests, with whom the priest is united by a sacramental bond; and to the laity for whom the priest functions as pastor, even though he is one with the faithful by virtue of a common baptism and with whom he shares a common call to discipleship. The decree teaches that the priest's holiness is achieved precisely through the ministry he exercises. See also priesthood.

decretal, a letter of precept issued by a pope in response to a doubt or question. Decretal letters had the binding force of law and were gathered in collections of canon law. First issued by popes in the late fourth century, papal decretals were a major source of canon law in the Middle Ages. See also canon law.

Decretum Gelasianum (day-kray'toom gel-ahs-ee-ah'noom), Latin ecclesiastical text from possibly the sixth century. The name of the last section, De Libris Recipiendis et Non Recipiendis (Lat., "On Books to Be Received and Not to Be Received"), is sometimes used for the whole; this part includes an early biblical canon. It was erroneously ascribed to Pope Gelasius (492–96) among others. See also canon of the Scriptures.

Decretum Gratianum (day-kray'toom grahtz-ee-ah'noom; Lat., "Gratian's Decree") a private, unofficial collection of canon law and related canonical sources, with commentaries, compiled ca. 1140 by the monk John Gratian. Comprising the first part of the Corpus Iuris Canonici (Lat., "Body of Canon Law"), it remained an important source of canon law until the Code of Canon Law of 1917. See also canon law; Gratian.

dedication of churches, a solemn form of blessing of new churches performed by the diocesan bishop or a bishop or presbyter (priest) delegated by him. The Rite of Dedication of a Church and an Altar is found in the Roman Pontifical, a book of ceremonies performed by a bishop.

The rite begins before the church is built, with the blessing of the site of the new church and the blessing and laying of the foundation stone. After the building is completed, the dedication itself consists of four parts: (1) the entrance into the church; the handing over of the church to the bishop by those involved in building it; the sprinkling of holy water on the people, the walls of the church, and the altar; (2) the Liturgy of the Word; (3) the prayer of dedication, the anointing of the church walls and altar with sacred chrism, the incensation of the altar and church, the covering of the altar with the altar linens, and the lighting of the candles on the altar; and (4) the celebration of the Eucharist.

A dedication, like a blessing, is a sacramental. Churches, especially cathedral and parish churches, should be dedicated and not merely blessed since they are set aside permanently for divine worship.

defect, canonical, some aspect of a person, a thing, or a legal act that indicates some legal deficiency. A defect of form with respect to marriage, for example, indicates that the required manner of entering into marriage was not followed; a defect with respect to Holy Orders was spoken of in the 1917 code and indicated some characteristic of an individual that made him unsuitable for ordination or for the exercise of ordained ministry.

defender of the bond, qualified canonist whom the diocesan bishop must appoint and whose presence is mandatory in cases of nullity or dissolution of marriage or of nullity of sacred orders.

The acts of such cases are invalid without the participation of the defender of the bond. He or she must ensure that all arguments that reasonably can be adduced against the nullity or dissolution are proposed and clarified. Required for the office is at least a licentiate in canon law. See also Holy Orders; marriage law.

Defender of the Faith, a title conferred by the pope on individuals who distinguish themselves as exponents of the Catholic faith. The title was first conferred by Pope Leo X on King Henry VII of England in 1521 in recognition of his treatise in defense of the doctrine of the seven sacraments against Martin Luther. In 1544 Parliament authorized the title for Henry and all of his successors in the British monarchy.

de fide (day fee'day; Lat., "[a matter] of faith"), a theological note describing a doctrinal proposition's relationship to divine revelation. Doctrines of the Church that are held to be de fide are doctrines the Catholic Church teaches are contained in divine revelation. These doctrines are taught infallibly by the magisterium and as such should elicit from the faithful an assent of faith. Doctrinal propositions that are solemnly defined by the pope or an ecumenical council are taught as de fide definita, "of defined faith." Some theologians assert that teachings can be taught as de fide ecclesiastica, "of ecclesiastical faith." These are doctrinal propositions that may not be found directly in divine revelation but that are necessary for the preservation of revelation and are, therefore, also taught infallibly. See also doctrine; dogma. deification, a theological theme also known as divinization. Judaism emphasized the transcendence of God, but the Incarnation gave Christians an intimation of accessibility to the divine. Paul said: "For in him we live and move and have our being" (Acts 17:28). Elsewhere in the NT it is said: "You . . . may become participants of the divine nature" (2 Pet 1:4). Clement of Alexandria's words became a commonplace: "The Word of God became man that you may learn from man how man may become God." Eastern theology has been very much at home with this theme. Not so in the West, where theologians have striven to avoid any hint of pantheism or affirmation of the preexistence of souls. Theologians have, therefore, been careful to speak of participation in the divine through grace. Yet, contemporary theologians Karl Rahner and Hans Urs von Balthasar have come closer to the Eastern language of deification. See also grace.

Deipara (day-ee-pahr'ah; Lat. translation of Gk., Theotokos, "God-bearer"), title applied to Mary at the Council of Ephesus in 431 to attest that she is truly the Mother of God, and not of the human Jesus alone. Although the intent of Ephesus was Christological, the claim that Mary was Deipara hastened the development of Mariology and encouraged the proliferation of Marian feasts. It is now regarded as the fundamental principle of Mariology. See also Ephesus, Council of; Theotokos.

deism, a view of God that maintains the concept of an intelligent creator-deity while rejecting any notion of divine revelation. Deism takes many forms, from views that include the idea of divine providence to those that negate any concern on God's part for human beings.

The combination of the discoveries of Galileo and Newton with the Enlightenment's exaltation of rationality prepared the ground for deism's postulation of a deity who merely set the universe in motion (the divine clock-maker). Deism holds that human reason alone leads to the principles of natural religion and morality without needing recourse to divine revelation. This view, therefore, rejects as unnecessary and untenable Christian doctrines on the Trinity, the Incarnation, and grace.

Deism first appeared in seventeenth-century Britain and France. In America, Ethan Allen and Thomas Paine produced deistic works in the eighteenth century, and the writings of Benjamin Franklin and Thomas Jefferson indicate an affinity for deism. See also God; revelation.

Dei Verbum (day'ee vair'boom). See Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation.

Delanoue, St. Jeanne, also known as Joan Delanoue, 1666–1736, founder of the Sisters of St. Anne of Providence of Saumur. A French businesswoman, she had a conversion experience at the age of thirty, closed her shop, and began to minister to orphans. She later entered religious life and in 1704 founded her own community to carry on her ministry to those in need. She was canonized in 1982. Feast day: August 16.

delegation of jurisdiction. See jurisdiction.

Delp, Alfred, 1907–45, German Jesuit theologian, sociologist, and martyr. A student of Karl Rahner, he was ordained a priest in 1938. While pursuing a degree in sociology at the University of Munich, he served as a consultant for the journal Stimmen der Zeit ("Voices of the Time"). In his parochial ministry, he boldly preached against Nazism and clandestinely assisted Jews to flee Germany. In 1942, at the request of his Jesuit superior, he joined the German Resistance group, the Kreisau Circle, and collaborated in drafting plans for a new German democracy founded on principles of social justice. Arrested along with the Circle's other members on July 28, 1944, he was convicted of treason by a People's Court and hanged in Berlin-Plötzensee. Delp's writings include his doctoral dissertation on Martin Heidegger, Tragic Existence (1935).

de Maistre, Joseph (duh-may'strah), 1754–1821, French diplomat, apologist, advocate of traditionalism and Ultramontanism. A fervent royalist, he opposed the French Revolution and Enlightenment philosophy. Arguing that reason was incapable of discerning the moral and religious truths upon which society rests, he asserted that these had been revealed divinely and were handed on through tradition. Society lacks stability without the support of revealed religion, he argued. In Du Pape (1819), the charter document of Ultramontanism, he argued that society requires a unifying principle: the king for civil society and the pope for the Church. Social harmony requires the alliance of the two. See also traditionalism, Catholic; Ultramontanism.

democracy (Gk., "rule by the people"), a system of government in which all the people share in the activities of governance. Basic to democracy, especially as practiced in the United States, are certain inalienable rights: freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of religion, freedom of assembly, freedom of election, due process of law, and so forth. "The protection and promotion of the inviolable rights of persons ranks among the essential duties of government," the Second Vatican Council declared (Declaration on Religious Freedom, n. 6). "At the same time," the council pointed out elsewhere, "the choice of government and the method of selecting leaders is left to the free will of citizens" (Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, n. 74).

Although the Catholic Church has never officially expressed a preference for one form of government over another, Pope John Paul II came close to making such an endorsement in his encyclical marking the one hundredth anniversary of Pope Leo XIII's Rerum Novarum: "The church values the democratic system inasmuch as it ensures the participation of citizens in making political choices, guarantees to the governed the possibility both of electing and holding accountable those who govern them, and of replacing them through peaceful means when appropriate" (Centesimus Annus [1991], n. 46).

democracy in the Church, the full participation by members in governing the Church either directly or through representatives. This idea remains somewhat controversial.

The Catholic Church is not a democracy, but neither is it a monarchy, a continuation of the Roman Empire, or a multinational corporation. It is a church, and as such has a unique constitution as the People of God and Body of Christ, in which Christ alone is the head and power derives from him.

There are many democratic elements in Catholic Church tradition. Some religious orders such as the Dominicans most closely resemble democratic practices, where decisions are made by the members, frequently through a search for consensus.

On a more fundamental level, the understanding of the Church as communion, which requires participation and shared responsibility, provides an important foundation for the application of certain democratic practices within general church life. Church law already provides for some of this by attention to rights, structures for participation, and concern for accountability.

The fundamental equality of all the baptized, affirmed by Vatican II (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 30), is expressed in the canons for the Latin church (can. 208) and for Eastern Catholic churches. So, too, are lists of the rights and obligations of all the faithful (cans. 208–31). This attention to rights, even though still only in a beginning stage and without well-developed structures for their protection and vindication, is a characteristic of democratic concerns today.

Structures of the Church: Structures for participation in the inner life of the Church are organized around the practice of consultation. Parish and diocesan pastoral councils and diocesan synods, while not mandatory, are gaining greater acceptance and carry the potential for improved involvement in mission. Presbyteral councils, parish and diocesan finance councils, and colleges of consultors are required structures that participate in the governance of the Church. The law provides improved potential for representative participation in provincial and plenary councils.

In one sense the college of bishops is a democratic expression insofar as bishops are considered to "represent" their dioceses. The bishops, together with the pope, share responsibility for the pastoral governance of the Church, even exercising supreme power within the Church when they act as a college.

The principle of accountability of officeholders is also accepted in church law, although procedures to assure this accountability remain primarily hierarchical. That is, officeholders are accountable to their superiors, not to the members of the Church.

The hierarchical structure of the Church, founded in divine law, limits the practice of democracy within the Catholic Church. Although the pope is elected by the college of cardinals, who theoretically represent the clergy of the diocese of Rome, the selection of other church leaders is not democratic. Power in the Church does not derive from the consent of the governed but, ultimately, from Christ; Christ's presence, however, is assured through sacraments and charisms, as well as office. In the Church, mission has priority over individual interests, but all share a common responsibility for that mission, though with various particular responsibilities. See also Church.

JAMES H. PROVOST

demon (Gk., daimon, "spirit"), a spirit, either good or bad, especially one associated with cosmic forces. The concept of malevolent spirits arose in the ancient world from a dualist cosmology, the polarity of good and evil, light and darkness, God and Satan. In the Jewish-Christian tradition this belief is well illustrated by the Testament of Solomon. Here we find different physical, psychological, social, and cosmic disorders attributed to an amazing number and variety of spirits. Archaeologists have discovered numerous artifacts that were used as prophylactics against demons, e.g., amulets, also bowls with protective spells and incantations inscribed on the inside of the vessels. The Hebrew Scriptures give little emphasis to evil spirits until the postexilic period. The NT bears witness to them, especially in Mark. They are noticeably absent from John. In Revelation we see the activity of both good and malevolent spirits (e.g., Rev 5:6; 16:14). Although the existence of demons has been presupposed by the Catholic Church, there is no dogmatic teaching on the subject. Many modern theologians attribute demonic activity to psychiatric disorders. See also demonic possession.

demonic possession, a phenomenon where the psychic power of a demon takes over the personality of a human recipient so that she or he is incapable of voluntary action (in contrast to demonic obsession, where the person can still exercise volition). Possession frequently manifests bizarre symptoms, such as histrionic behavior, incoherent speech, uncontrollable physical movements, and extraordinary feats of physical strength. The patient may be self-destructive or destructive to others or to material objects. Demonic possession is a common cultural phenomenon among less sophisticated religious groups. It is often attributed to mass hypnosis or experimentation with the occult. The OT records only one explicit case of demonic possession (Tob 3:7–9), but the NT portrays Jesus ministering to many who are purported to be possessed by demons; while the synoptic Gospels, especially Mark, portray many cases of demonic possession, no cases are specifically recorded in the Pauline corpus or in the Gospel of John. The two cases in Acts 16:16 and 19:13–19 relate to non-Christians. Modern biblical research, studying the pertinent texts from an anthropological point of view, often interprets the phenomenon as the manifestation of repressed feelings of oppression, both personal and social. See also exorcism [in the Bible].

demythologization, the theory that biblical myths can be interpreted according to the understanding of existence that they enshrine (i.e., their anthropology). A literal translation of the German term entmythologizierung, demythologization is associated with the theology of Rudolf Bultmann (d. 1976). Bultmann began with the dilemma of how post-Enlightenment men and women could relate to a biblical picture of a prescientific "three-storied universe" (i.e., God in heaven above, humans on earth, demons below the earth). Myth for Bultmann is not "untruth" but language about the divine, explaining the divine in human terms. For example, God's transcendence is thought of in spatial terms, "up there." Resurrection appearances, narratives of the transfiguration and ascension, and statements about Jesus returning on the clouds of heaven are mythic. When demythologized, such statements speak of human existence in relation to God, for example, that one must live through grace rather than through achievement or that one must always be open to the transcendent or future action of God, even when that future is threatening.

Bultmann's project was linked to the existentialist philosophy of Martin Heidegger (d. 1976). Bultmann believed that one achieves "authentic" existence only through a radical faith based on the proclamation of the reality of the Cross, which challenges us to complete trust in a self-sacrificing God, so that knowledge of specific events of Jesus' life is not essential to faith. Though Bultmann highlighted the historical and cultural distance between the biblical text and subsequent history, and underscored the need for a consistent theory of interpretation, both his existentialist philosophy and his ahistorical approach to Jesus have been largely superseded in recent years. See also myth. JOHN R. DONAHUE

Denifle, Heinrich S. (hin'rik den'ih-flay), 1844–1905, Dominican medievalist. Born in the Tyrol (Austria), he preached and taught philosophy and theology in Graz, Austria, from 1870 to 1880. In 1880 he was called to Rome to collaborate on a new edition of the works of Thomas Aquinas commissioned by Pope Leo XIII. He served as one of three assistant papal archivists, where he promoted access to Vatican source materials. He wrote in the areas of mysticism, Scholasticism, and the history of the universities in the Middle Ages and on Martin Luther.

Denis, St., also known as Denys and Dionysius, d. ca. 250, bishop associated with the founding of Paris. Denis was confused with Dionysius the Areopagite (see Acts 17:13–14) in medieval France. His cult was centered in the abbey of St.-Denis, the burial place of French kings. He is patron saint of France. Feast day: October 9.

de Nobili, Robert, 1577–1656, Jesuit missionary in South India. In the adaptation controversy he opposed the prevalent method of conversion that required converts to assume European customs, arguing that missionaries should adapt to the customs of the land as far as possible. Pope Gregory XV approved this approach in 1623. See also India, Catholicism in.

denunciation, the reporting to the proper ecclesiastical superior of some scandal or offense occurring in the exercise of ministry, the handling of church finances, or the personal lives of clerics and religious. The concern of canon law is that such reporting is to receive a hearing that is fair to all parties concerned, including the accused. On the one hand, no one is to be deprived of his or her good name without a proper and fair process and, on the other hand, it is the responsibility of authorities to deal with abuses for the common good.

Denys the Areopagite, also known as Dionysius or Pseudo-Dionysius, pseudonymous writer of the late fifth or early sixth century who adopted the name of the famous Pauline convert (Acts 17:34). His identity and details of his life are unknown. His writings, originally in Greek, influenced major figures in the development of medieval Western mystical theology, such as John Scotus Eriugena (d. ca. 877), Richard of St. Victor (d. 1173), Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274), Bonaventure (d. 1274), Meister Eckhart (d. 1327), and the author of The Cloud of Unknowing. Arguably, Western theologians took some Neoplatonic aspects of Denys's thought out of context. Denys was not concerned with the technicalities of subjective mystical experience but summed up the patristic tradition of mystical theology. All believers are "mystics" because they are plunged into the mystery of Christ through baptism, exposure to Scripture, and participation in liturgy. The soul eventually passes beyond sign and concept to be grasped by the divine mystery of love and is thus transformed.

Of Denys's five known works, The Divine Names, The Mystical Theology, and The Celestial Hierarchy were particularly influential in the West. Denys is associated primarily with the so-called negative or apophatic theology, which emphasizes that one must ultimately pass beyond definitions and images of God into silence and darkness because God is beyond all names. However, Denys also wrote about what is called positive or kataphatic theology, which emphasizes what can be affirmed about God and concerns God's self-disclosure in creation, Scripture, and liturgy. There is no justification for understanding these theologies as alternative ways; for Denys, they are inextricably linked. See also mystical theology; mysticism; Neoplatonism. PHILIP SHELDRAKE

Denzinger, Heinrich Joseph, 1819–83, Catholic theologian and teacher at Würzburg, Germany. He is best known as compiler of the Enchiridion Symbolorum (1854), a comprehensive collection of official ecclesiastical statements. See also Enchiridion Symbolorum.

Deo gratias (day'oh grah'tsee-ahs; Lat., "Thanks be to God"), a liturgical acclamation sung or recited by the assembly in response to blessings or dismissals. The Deo gratias is thus sung at the conclusion of Mass, at the Liturgy of the Hours, and at other occasional rites or blessings. During the Easter season an Alleluia is appended.

deontology (Gk., deon, "duty"), the study of moral obligation, commonly known as duty or obligation ethics. The term is not consistently defined and used in contemporary discourse.

In contrast to teleology, deontology is a way of thinking about right and wrong on the basis of an action's conforming to a moral principle or duty independently of the consequences. Principles play a major role because, as products of natural law, they express and measure obligations, duties, prized values, basic goods, or rights.

This theory holds that certain actions are right or wrong in themselves by virtue of intrinsic features. For example, telling the truth and keeping promises are always right, and killing the innocent is always wrong. When intrinsically evil acts are the major moral term in a principle, that principle functions as a moral absolute so that no set of intentions, circumstances, or consequences could alter the objective morality of those acts.

Immanuel Kant (d. 1804), with his categorical imperative (respect persons as ends in themselves), is the major philosopher associated with deontology. Even though Catholic morality has strong teleological elements in some areas, its conclusions have been understood deontologically.

The strength of this theory is that it preserves consistency in the moral life and holds a pluralistic society together by giving a common point of reference for shared expectations and duties. A weakness is that it gives no guidance on what to do when moral principles appear to be in conflict. Also, it does not take into account the numerous contextual factors that influence the meaning and value of actions. Deontology needs to be complemented by considerations from teleology and an ethics of virtue. See also moral theology; teleology. RICHARD GULA deposit of faith, generally understood to be the teaching of Jesus Christ as found in Scripture and in the apostolic tradition. The precise import of this term for Catholic theology is best understood when the "deposit" is seen as an inexhaustible treasure of which the Church is the trustee. This treasure comes to expression in the Scriptures, in written tradition (council documents, encyclicals, etc.), and in the sacramental life of the Church.

The content of this deposit is not primarily a complex of religious truths or propositions. Rather, the content is the person of Jesus Christ; Jesus Christ is the "treasure" of Christian faith, a living resource in which revelation and salvation are coextensive. According to the tradition of the Church, revelation came to an end with the death of the last apostle and, therefore, nothing can be added to or subtracted from this deposit. This is so because the fullness of the revelation of God is given only in the person of Jesus Christ.

History: "Deposit of faith" appears as a technical term at the close of the sixteenth century, in the language of the Council of Trent (1545–63), and was formally included in the vocabulary of the magisterium in the documents of Vatican I in the late nineteenth century (D 1800, 1836). Its use at Vatican I (1869–70) reflects a battle between the culture of the time and the Church's self-understanding. The seventeenth-century Enlightenment had already given birth to revolutions against the monarchical rule exemplified by the Roman Catholic Church's governing structure. Furthermore, the notion of a fixed body of truth that had always and everywhere been infallibly put forth began to crumble under the rise of historical consciousness. In the polemical atmosphere of the late nineteenth century, the Church's response was to explicate the term in a restrictive sense, denoting an atemporal and propositional understanding of the tenets of a faith under siege.

By the time of Vatican II (1962–65), the impact of resulting theological movements such as the French "New Theology," which refocused attention on Scripture and the patristic period as primary theological resources, was inescapable. Drawing on a historical understanding of tradition, Vatican II returned to the NT notion of the deposit (Gk., parathēkē) of faith as a sacred trust ("guard what has been entrusted to you," 1 Tim 6:20; also 2 Tim 1:12, 14). While the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (n. 25) speaks of bishops drawing upon the "treasury of revelation," this treasury is not the "property" of the magisterium. Under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, this sacred deposit (Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, n. 10) is entrusted to the Church as a whole. Setting aside an earlier positivistic understanding of infallibility, Vatican II views the Church as the trustee of an inexhaustible treasure, and its authentic expositor. This exposition takes many forms, from study of the Scriptures, to the rearticulation of doctrine, to the faithful celebration of the Eucharist. The sacred trust that is the Incarnation of God is a truly immeasurable deposit, preserved by the Church only by its continuous witness to the life, death, and Resurrection of Jesus Christ. See also doctrine; dogma; faith; revelation; tradition. NANCY DALLAVALLE

De profundis (day proh-foon'dees; Lat., "out of the depths"), title for Psalm 130: "Out of the depths I cry to you, O Lord. Lord, hear my voice!" In Christian use the psalm is closely associated with occasions of death, mourning, and penitence. This psalm is sung at funerals and during the Office for the Dead, with its typical antiphon: "Grant them eternal rest O Lord, and may light perpetual shine upon them."

derogation, in canon law the partial abolition of a law. Although not to be presumed (can. 21), derogation takes place when a new law expressly says it abolishes the old, entirely reorders the subject matter of the law, or is contrary to the old law (can. 20).

Descartes, René (day-kahrt'), 1596–1650, French philosopher. Educated by Jesuits, he eventually moved to Holland, where he wrote his most important works: Discourse on Method (1637), Meditations on First Philosophy (1641), Principles of Philosophy (1644), and The Passion of the Soul (1649). Descartes inaugurated modern critical thinking by doubting everything he had received from tradition or sense experience, seeking to establish true and certain knowledge only by means of that which could not be doubted. Because he could doubt everything except the fact that he doubted, he was certain that he existed as a thinking substance: "I think, therefore I am." Because he could not doubt without an idea of perfection, then the perfect substance, God, must exist, otherwise neither the thinking substance nor its idea of God would exist. And since God is not a deceiver, all clear and distinct ideas must be certainly true, while what our senses tell us about extended substance (our bodies and nature) must be reliable, if not certain. See also philosophy and theology.

descent of Christ into hell, the sojourn of Jesus Christ among the dead after his death. To understand the meanings of this expression, one must distinguish between its use in Scripture and its use in tradition.

In the NT this motif conveys the conviction that Jesus truly died prior to going beyond death to new life. In the OT "hell" (Heb., Sheol) is a realm not of punishment but simply of all the deceased. In general, to say that "one descended into hell" is simply to say that one died. The purpose of this motif in the NT, then, is to declare that Jesus really did die and yet was not ultimately overcome by death (Matt 27:52, 63; Luke 23:43; Acts 2:24–31; Rom 10:6–9; Eph 4:9–10; Col 1:18). When 1 Pet 3:18–20 states that "in the spirit" Jesus Christ "went and made a proclamation to the spirits in prison," it is attesting to Jesus' victory over sin and death. 1 Pet 4:6 does not specify the bearer of the good news to those who have died.

In tradition, the motif of Christ's descent into hell grew in meaning. In the second and third centuries, its soteriological significance was discussed by Ignatius of Antioch, Justin Martyr, Hermas, Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, and Origen. It was basically interpreted to mean that Christ visited hell in order to free from Satan's grasp the souls of the righteous who had died prior to the Resurrection. Although the motif was not part of the Old Roman Creed (second century), it is contained in the Apostles' Creed (A.D. 400) and the Athanasian Creed (early fifth century). It is not, however, contained within the Nicene Creed (325) and the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed (early fifth century). Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) understood the expression to mean that Christ brought salvation to the dead who were united with him by their faith that had expressed itself in love. John Calvin interpreted Christ's "descent into hell" to mean the culminating point of his suffering, his complete abandonment by God. In sum, Christ's descent into hell is an article of faith whose minimal meaning is that Jesus Christ truly died but whose full meaning is not agreed upon in the Church. See also Jesus Christ. ROBERT A. KRIEG desecration, an act that violates the sacred character of a place or object. Churches, oratories, private chapels, and cemeteries that have been dedicated or blessed are desecrated by actions performed in them that are seriously harmful and scandalous. After the local ordinary (diocesan bishop) determines that desecration has occurred, a special rite of reparation must be performed there before other acts of worship may be resumed.

The Blessed Sacrament is desecrated by discarding it or using it for a sacrilegious purpose. The penalty for willful desecration of the consecrated bread or wine is automatic excommunication reserved to the Apostolic See (can. 1367).

desert, a physical reality and a symbol of the human encounter with evil and grace. The Exodus of Israel was a journey from slavery in Egypt to the promised land. This journey in the desert became a model for God's liberation of the person and community. Elijah's journey to Horeb/Sinai was another model for life's spiritual journey. John the Baptist and Jesus in the desert are examples of the liberation from illusion and the encounter with the divine that can occur in the desert. Origen saw Israel's journey through the desert as a type of the journey to God. From the late third century women and men went out to the desert in Egypt and Palestine. They faced the demons of the desert and discovered also the presence of God. The personification of this experience was Anthony of Egypt, whose biography composed by Athanasius stirred the hearts of countless God-seekers including Augustine of Hippo. John Cassian's Conferences and Institutes made the wisdom of the desert available to the West and had a special impact on the Benedictine rule. The desert is a place where solitude and community confront each other, where the solitude necessary for human life, in the imagery of theologian Henri Nouwen, renders compulsion into compassion. Desert and solitude, symbols for the encounter between the human and the divine, have a special place in the modern quest for God through the example of Charles de Foucauld in the Sahara and Thomas Merton in his hermitage. See also Foucauld, Charles de; hermit; Merton, Thomas; monasticism.

Desert Fathers and Mothers, spiritual leaders in the Christian monastic movement during the late third and fourth centuries in Egypt and Palestine. These spiritual leaders included Anthony of Egypt, Macarius of Egypt, Abba ("father") Moses, Abba Poemen, Ama ("mother") Sarah, and Ama Syneletia. Male and female ascetics of the time sought wisdom about the spiritual life from these experienced women and men. Their wisdom has been preserved in collections of pithy sayings and stories known as the Sayings of the Elders. See also desert; hermit; monasticism.

design, argument from, attempts to demonstrate the existence of God from the order found in nature. The first premise observes that natural objects that lack intelligence accomplish specific goals regularly. Acorns invariably become oak trees. Accomplishing these goals often requires the complex cooperation of many different elements, as does the human eye when it sees. The second premise states that order implies the existence of a designer. The order in a watch implies the existence of a watchmaker. The conclusion, then, claims that the order in nature implies the existence of its designer, God. See also five ways of St. Thomas Aquinas.

desire(s), the willing of a particular good represented to imagination and not yet possessed. The morality of a desire depends on the morality of the imagined act and whether the desire is absolute or conditional. If the imagined act is wrong, so is the desire. If the desire were fulfilled as soon as the opportunity presented itself (absolute), then the desire would be of the same moral gravity as the act itself; if conditional, then the desire is not sinful if the condition removes the evil of the external object, e.g., the desire to eat meat if it were not a day of abstinence.

Desmaisières, St. Mary Michael, 1809–65, born in Spain, founder of the Institute of the Handmaids of the Blessed Sacrament and of Charity, a community devoted to the care of unchaste women. Feast day: August 24.

De Smet, Pierre Jean, 1801–73, Belgian-born Jesuit missionary and writer who evangelized Native American tribes in the Midwest and Pacific Northwest and served often as an agent of the U.S. federal government.

despair, the abandonment of hope. Depending upon the reason for one's despair and the degree of one's responsibility, despair may be legitimate, sinful, or pathological. Theologically, despair is the abandonment of one's supernatural objective. Among the possible motives for such despair is the belief that one's sins are too heinous for God's mercy or that one's weaknesses are so great that one will not have sufficient grace to sustain one's conversion. Sins against hope are simultaneously sins against faith, demonstrating the interrelatedness of the theological virtues. Temptations to despair are not uncommon in the spiritual life and are vividly described by St. John of the Cross's metaphor of the "dark night."

detachment, a theme in Christian spirituality that has at times been expressed in negative terms like self-denial and mortification, too often communicating a rejection of the goodness of creation. More correctly, detachment is a process of liberation from or a prevention of a disordered relationship to a person or a thing. In modern society twelve-step movements have discovered the need for detachment from that to which one is addicted, since addiction is an enslavement to something or someone. Total abstinence from some substances like drugs and alcohol are necessary so that one may attain the freedom needed to lead a fully human life. All religions require of their adherents self-discipline attained through detachment from whatever keeps one from a proper relationship with the divine. Detachment is freedom from things that prevent spiritual growth. In the Christian tradition detachment is rooted in the life and death of Jesus of Nazareth and in what Jesus taught his disciples about a God and neighbor-centered life. One needs to be detached from whatever impedes love of God and love of neighbor. Monasticism emphasized detachment from wealth, one's will, and sexual expression through the vows of poverty, obedience, and chastity. In this tradition the practice of detachment is meant to make one available for prayer, service, and/or ministry. Christian tradition at its best demands not extraordinary physical asceticism but, according to John of the Cross, a detachment that is a freedom of the heart. See also asceticism.

detraction, an act of taking away something from the good name or reputation of another with the intention of lessening that person's standing in the view of others. Detraction may involve envy or malice and may be the result of representing another's worth or merit as less than it actually is. Modern usage reserves detraction for the unnecessary revelation of true but hidden details of another's life that harm the victim's reputation, while deliberate lies that have a damaging effect are called calumny. Detraction is a sin against both charity and justice because revealing the truth is not only damaging but unnecessary. The degree of the sinfulness of detraction is determined by the level of damage done to the victim's reputation. Others participate in the sinfulness of detraction by listening eagerly or questioning the detractor to initiate or prolong harmful conversation. See also calumny; slander; truthfulness.

deuterocanonical books, books in the Greek translation of the OT but not in the Hebrew Scriptures. Jews and Protestants designate them (and three other works: 1–2 Esdras and the Prayer of Manasseh) Apocrypha and do not include them in their Bibles. In the Catholic Bible, the deuterocanonical books are Tobit, Judith, Wisdom of Solomon, Sirach, Baruch (of which the Letter of Jeremiah is ch. 6), and 1–2 Maccabees. Also included are passages in Esther and Daniel additional to what is found in the Hebrew or Aramaic original: 107 verses spread over six additions in Esther, and in Daniel the Prayer of Azariah and the Song of the Three Young Men (3:24–90); Susanna (ch. 13); and Bel and the Dragon (ch. 14). Some of these books were written in Hebrew (Sirach, 1 Maccabees, and perhaps others) or Aramaic (Tobit), but their originals were lost until modern discoveries of parts of them among the Dead Sea Scrolls and other finds. These books were written at different times between about 300 B.C. (Tobit) and perhaps the first century A.D. (Wisdom of Solomon). In reaction to Protestant doubts about them, the Council of Trent (1545–63) declared them sacred and canonical. See also Apocrypha.

Deutinger, Martin, 1815–64, German philosopher. A disciple of Franz von Baader and influenced by Friedrich Schelling, as a professor in Munich he developed a philosophical system of God and being, a critique of Schelling, and an original aesthetics. He was disappointed by the rise of neo-Scholasticism.

De Vaux, Roland, 1903–71, French Dominican biblical scholar and archaeologist. From 1933 he taught at the École Biblique in Jerusalem. He excavated at Tell el-Far'ah (biblical Tirza), and then became a figure of international renown as excavator and editor of the Dead Sea Scrolls (1949–71). He was the general and OT editor of the Jerusalem Bible (1956) and author of over thirteen books, including Ancient Israel: Its Life and Institutions (1958–60, Eng. 1961) and History of Israel (1971–73, Eng. 1978), as well as works on OT sacrifice and Qumran. He was the leading Catholic OT scholar and archaeologist of his day. See also École Biblique.

development of doctrine. See doctrine, development of.

devil, a personified spiritual creature who freely sinned and is eternally damned. The Catholic Church teaches the following about the devil: devils are spiritual creatures, subordinate to God and created good by God; they freely sinned and are responsible for their own eternal damnation; they have limited power in the world, but Christ's death and Resurrection are victorious over that power; humans do experience their evil influence, but cannot distinguish it from the corruption that has resulted from human sins through the ages.

The devil depicted as a fallen angel with wings, tail, and monstrous-looking head; portion of a fifteenth-century Fouquet painting, Condé Museum, Chantilly, France.

The devil is not an important figure in the OT. The word appears in only five books, and is mentioned only once in four of them. The snake in the account of the temptation of Adam and Eve in Genesis was not meant to symbolize the devil. Most likely it was introduced as a trickster to awaken Eve's curiosity. God cursed it because, to the Hebrews of the writer's time, serpents were used in pagan worship. Later Jewish and Christian writers applied the figure of the snake to the devil. In the story of Job, the character called Satan (Heb., "adversary") acts as a court-appointed prosecutor empowered by God to present human failings before the heavenly judge's bench. Satan is not equal to God, nor is he a malevolent power.

The devil is much more active in the NT. Besides the terms for devil and demon, Gospel writers also used terms such as Evil One, Father of Lies, or Murderer from the Beginning. The devil has limited power to cause some sicknesses, to take possession of persons' bodies, and to tempt to sin. However, it cannot cause moral wrongs or corruption, does not know Christ's true identity, and must obey the word of Christ and his disciples. The lessons from the NT about the devil are these: it is not a figment of Jesus' imagination or a personification of human sins; there is not a clear distinction between a single principle demon and other devils; it is difficult to separate the corruption that results from devils and that which results from human sin; the coming of Jesus has overcome all forms of evil, even though the demons continue to exercise limited power in the world.

Christian theologians in the first centuries reflected on the devil's activities and often personified human evil as if it were the devil because they wanted to communicate the seriousness of a particular heresy or pagan cult.

Reference to the devil appears very seldom in official Catholic statements of faith. In the first document of the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215, the opening words refer to Christian faith in God as Creator of all things, visible and invisible, including the devils, who made themselves evil by their own power. The crucial statement refers to God, and the implication is that the devils are not the source of evil nor are they equal to God. The devil is not mentioned in any official Christian creed. See also Satan. LOUISE PROCHASKA devolution, in canon law the passing on of certain unperformed responsibilities to higher authorities. The word also refers to a type of appeal that does not suspend an original decision.

Devil's Advocate. See Promoter of the Faith.

Devotio Moderna (Lat., "Modern Devotion," "New Devotion"), a spiritual-renewal movement with origins in fourteenth-century Holland that laid great stress on the inner life of the individual. The name "Devotio Moderna" was probably first used in the early fifteenth century by Henry Pomerius. The movement looked for inspiration to Geert de Groote (1340–84), with beginnings in the Lowlands but spreading to Germany and elsewhere. Its most characteristic text was The Imitation of Christ. Sisters and brothers, not members of religious orders except some groups of canons, lived in small communities, women and men separately. Their spirituality was Christocentric, with an emphasis on Scripture, meditation, and a strong, nonmystical interior life. See also Groote, Geert de; Imitation of Christ; Thomas à Kempis.

devotions, nonliturgical prayer forms that promote affective (and sometimes individualistic) attitudes of faith. They may also suggest a more effective response to personal religious needs than liturgical prayer. Familiar devotions in the pre–Vatican II period (before 1962) were, for example, the Miraculous Medal novena, devotions to the Sacred Heart and the Sorrowful Mother, Stations of the Cross, and the Rosary. (The singular form of the term "devotion" usually refers to the affective dimension of faith. Devotions [plural] are often thought to foster devotion.)

As a general rule, when liturgical prayer and ritual are less accessible to people's understanding and participation, there is usually an increase in devotions. In the early Middle Ages, when understanding and participation in the Eucharist had begun to decline sharply, popular devotions to the Eucharist began to develop. Scholars point, for example, to the medieval desire "to see the Host." People would run from church to church in order to look at the elevated consecrated host and cup during Mass in the belief that this would prolong youthfulness and provide other benefits. A more balanced devotion was prayer before the Eucharist reserved in the tabernacle (receptacle holding the Host). Such devotions arose from praiseworthy sentiments of adoration for the eucharistic presence of Christ, but they sometimes tended to become highly privatized exercises of piety that had little connection with the meaning and celebration of the Eucharist.

Devotions and Popular Religion: Devotions might best be understood as a form of popular religion or of personal piety. Popular religion is a bridge between, on one hand, the more formal celebrations and the intellectual teaching of the faith and, on the other, the appropriation and expression of that faith in the ordinary culture of a particular historical period. Pilgrimages, for example, are a form of popular religion that makes sense even to illiterate Christians because they concretize some of the basic tenets of the faith (repentance, conversion, etc.) and stimulate popular expressions of prayer (e.g., recitation of certain prayers, making part of the journey barefoot or on one's knees). Devotional piety emphasizes the affective aspects of redemption (e.g., the incarnation of Christ becomes more accessible to some people under the form of the Christmas crib). Liturgical worship may, in fact, encourage popular expressions of devotion (e.g., the use of holy water as derived from the blessed waters of Baptism, devotion to the reserved Eucharist as an extension of its celebration). Some scholars note that liturgical developments such as those of Holy Week in the church of Jerusalem in the fourth century would have been regarded as devotions by modern standards.

As liturgy became increasingly removed from the comprehension and participation of most people, popular devotions took their place. The U.S. Catholic bishops, for example, faced with the problem of ministering to vast numbers of nineteenth-century Catholic immigrants, strongly fostered the devotional life of parishes as one way of helping these displaced Christians maintain contact with their faith. Thus, it was common to see many people reciting the Rosary during Mass in the pre–Vatican II period. People who might not regularly participate in the Eucharist would often take part in novenas. Even before the reforms of Vatican II, the liturgical movement in the United States sought to bring Catholics into a more active participation in worship and to connect it with the mission of the Church to the larger world. To counteract the pervasive influence of devotions, attempts were made in more liturgically minded parishes to reintroduce Sunday evening prayer and to encourage families to celebrate the anniversary of important sacramental events such as Baptism.

Current Teaching: Vatican II reaffirmed the legitimacy of devotions approved by the Church but laid down the principle that devotions should be in harmony with the worship of the Church and should derive from and lead back to that worship since liturgy "by its very nature far surpasses any of them" (Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, n. 13). Some years later, Pope Paul VI noted that conciliar directives had been difficult to implement, especially in regard to devotion to Mary. The problem was twofold, he argued: some parishes have suppressed popular devotions while others have simply inserted them into the liturgy (e.g., the novena within the Mass). The pope also insisted on the connection between the historical and cultural context of a particular church as a key to its development of appropriate devotions. Finally, Paul VI maintained that authentic devotions should lead to a more committed gospel life. A historical example of this might be the devotion of the early Church, and the North African church in particular, to the cult of martyrs. This devotion was usually celebrated in the liturgy on the anniversary of the martyr's death and served to encourage other Christians to witness to their faith even to the death, if need be. See also eucharistic devotions; Marian devotion; novena; pilgrimage; Rosary; Sacred Heart, devotion to the.

Bibliography

Duffy, Regis. "Devotio Futura: The Need for Post-Conciliar Devotions." In A Promise of Glory, edited by M. Downey and R. Fragomeni. Washington, DC: Pastoral Press, 1992. Pp. 163–83.

REGIS A. DUFFY

Devout Life, Introduction to the. See Introduction to the Devout Life.

d'Herbigny, Michel (dair-been-yee'), 1880–1957, French Jesuit ecumenist and Vatican expert on Russia. After the publication of his book on Vladimir Solov'ev entitled Michael Soloviev: Russian Newman, he became the first Jesuit rector of the Pontifical Oriental Institute. He was consecrated bishop by the nuncio in Berlin (the later Pope Pius XII) in semi-secrecy because of the anti-Catholic regime in the Soviet Union. He made three trips to Soviet Russia where he ordained four other bishops secretly. For reasons still unknown, he fell into disgrace in 1937 and died in obscurity.

diabolical possession. See demonic possession.

diaconate. See deacon.

dialogue Mass, a pre–Vatican II (1962–65) low Mass in which the congregation responded vocally to the presider, taking the parts that normally were recited quietly by the altar servers. In the 1950s dialogue Masses were introduced in many parishes as a way of fostering congregational participation. After the publication of Vatican II's Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, as the new missal was being prepared, reformed ritual elements gradually were introduced. These included the vocal recitation of parts of the Proper and Ordinary, acclamations, responses to dialogical formularies, and prayers, such as the Amen at the eucharistic doxology. Although not termed dialogue Mass, the interim Mass had similar characteristics. The term "dialogue Mass" is no longer in use.

Diaspora (di-as'pohr-ah), also called the Dispersion, the scattering of the Israelite/Jewish people from their homeland. The process began with the exiles of Israelites in the 730s and 720s B.C. and continued with the dispersion of Judeans in the 590s and 580s B.C. Major settlements in the Diaspora were in Babylon and Egypt, but eventually there were Jewish centers throughout the Mediterranean lands and farther east in Mesopotamia. Jews in the Diaspora often maintained contact with the motherland through pilgrimages for festivals (see Acts 2:5–11) and payment of the Temple tax. The Letter of James (1:1) is addressed to the "twelve tribes in the Dispersion."

Diatessaron (di-ah-tes'sah-ron; Gk., "through four"), a second-century harmony of the Gospels, i.e., a continuous narrative drawn from all four Gospels. The Syrian apologist Tatian, who was for some time a pupil of Justin Martyr in Rome, composed this account of the life and teachings of Jesus as a conflation of the four Gospels known to him. The original text of the Diatessaron, written in either Greek or Syriac around A.D. 170, does not survive. The work is known from a few fragments as well as a commentary on it by the Syrian father Ephraem (d. 373). Its influence extended to the many Gospel harmonies and popular lives of Jesus written in late antiquity and in the Middle Ages. See also gospel; synoptic Gospels, problem of.

dicastery (Gk., dikastēs, "judge," "law court"), generic term for an agency of Church government, especially a bureaucratic subdivision of the Roman Curia. At present the dicasteries of the Roman Curia include the Secretariat of State, Congregations, tribunals, councils, offices, commissions, and committees. See also Roman Curia.

Dictatus Papae (dik-tah'tuhs pah'pay; Lat., "Pronouncement of the Pope"), a series of statements placed in the register of Gregory VII, dated March 1075, describing a papacy with vast powers in both the religious and secular spheres. Included are such claims as: "The Roman pontiff alone is rightly called universal"; "That he [the pope] may depose emperors"; and "That he himself may be judged by no one." The Dictatus Papae is generally considered a collection of chapter titles for an unfinished canon law compilation. See also Gregory VII.

Didache (dih'dah-kay; Gk., "the teaching"; The Teaching of the Lord to the Gentiles Through the Twelve Apostles), an ancient book of basic instructions for Christians that drew upon very early traditions and combined material from a number of different sources. The subject matter and the variegated style and source material of the Didache make it very hard to determine either a date or a point of origin. Estimates run from mid-first century to (less probably) late second century, and from Egypt to (more probably) Syria.

The structure of the Didache includes: the teaching of the "Two Ways" (chs. 1–6), liturgical instructions (chs. 7–10), disciplinary matters related to prophets, bishops, deacons, divisions in the community, and the Eucharist (chs. 11–15), and a concluding warning against the antichrist and encouragement to remain faithful until the Second Advent (ch. 16).

The "Two Ways" incorporates Matthean material from the Sermon on the Mount but has a strong literary relationship with the Qumran Manual of Discipline. In this it is joined by the Letter of Barnabas and the Doctrina Apostolorum ("The Teaching of the Apostles"). These connections have raised the issue of the interrelatedness of this literature and have drawn scholars to reexamine the strong influence of its Jewish heritage upon earliest Christianity.

The liturgical instructions have also generated much interest. Baptism is to be by immersion when possible and threefold affusion when necessary. Fasting is undertaken on Wednesdays and Fridays. There are two very ancient eucharistic prayers, perhaps modeled upon Jewish meal prayers, thus raising the possibility that the Last Supper was not the only pattern for this ritual. See also apostolic age.

Didascalia Apostolorum (dee-duh-scal'ee-uh uh-pahs-toh-lohr'um; Lat., "The Teaching of the Apostles"), a document on Church order composed in Greek (first half of third century) but preserved in its entirety only in Syriac. It focuses on bishops, but includes instruction on such things as deacons, deaconesses, widows, spouses, children, Easter, the abrogation of the ceremonial Law, and retention of the Decalogue. Regarding forgiveness of sins, it is remarkably lenient for its time. See also apostle.

Didymus the Blind, ca. 313–98, theologian appointed head of the Alexandrian catechetical school by Athanasius. His students included Gregory of Nazianzus, Jerome, and Rufinus. Blind from age five but a prolific writer, his staunch anti-Arianism is evident in his On the Holy Spirit. His surviving exegesis, strongly Origenistic, includes commentaries on Genesis, Job, and Zechariah, while many other works survive only in fragments due to a posthumous condemnation for Origenism (Constantinople II, 553). See also Alexandria, school of.

Diekmann, Godfrey, b. 1908, American Benedictine monk and liturgical scholar. For more than twenty-five years, beginning in 1938, he edited the influential periodical Worship (then called Orate Fratres). A peritus (Lat., "expert") at Vatican Council II (1962–65), he also served on the postconciliar commission responsible for the reform of Roman Catholic worship.

Dies irae (dee'ez ee'ray; Lat., "Day of Wrath"), title for the sequence hymn, "Day of Wrath, O day of mourning." Attributed to Thomas of Celano (d. 1260), the chant was synonymous with funeral liturgies until the reform of the funeral rite following Vatican II (1962–65). The text is based upon Zeph 1:14–16 and presents a vivid picture of the apocalypse and last judgment. One of the most renowned melodies of the Gregorian chant repertoire, it was adapted by many composers and occurs in more than one symphony, e.g., Berlioz's Symphonie fantastique. An English translation of this hymn with its traditional melody can be found in the Episcopal Hymnal (1928).

Dignitatis Humanae (deen-yee-tah'tees hoo-mah'nay). See Declaration on Religious Freedom.

dignity. See human dignity.

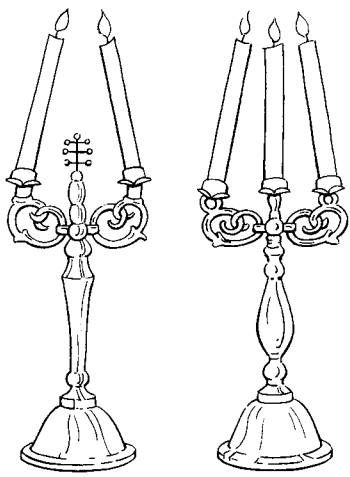
dikirion, trikirion (di-keer'ee-ahn, tri-keer'ee-ahn; Gk.), the two- and three-branch episcopal candelabras used by Byzantine-rite bishops to impart solemn blessings during liturgical services. The trikirion, with three (tri) candles (kerion) in honor of the Trinity is held in the right hand, the dikirion with two (di) for the divine and human natures of Christ in the left. There is evidence that the liturgical use of candles in imparting blessings dates back to at least the tenth century.

dimissorial letters, the documents presented to the ordaining bishop attesting to the fact that a candidate for Holy Orders has received the necessary preparation and has those qualities required for ordination. The letters must be issued by the bishop of the diocese to which a diocesan candidate is attached or incardinated or by the major superior of the institute in which the religious-community candidate is ascribed. These letters are not necessary when a diocesan candidate is ordained by his own bishop.

Dikirion Trikirion



diocesan bishop, pastoral and legal head and representative of a diocese. Although law and papal decree reserve certain powers, the diocesan bishop possesses all legislative, administrative, and judicial authority required for his office by divine right and not as a delegate of the pope. Through such authority, he exercises within his diocese the threefold pastoral office of teaching, sanctifying, and governing.

The diocesan bishop must form a unique bond with his priests and foster vocations. His strong relationship to the diocese through stable residence, pastoral visitation, liturgical presence, teaching, and preaching also embraces specific administrative and disciplinary responsibilities. He must also foster ecumenism. See also bishop; Decree on the Bishops' Pastoral Office in the Church.

diocesan curia, a collective body of persons and agencies assisting the diocesan bishop in governing the diocese. The bishop appoints all officeholders, who are bound to fidelity and confidentiality. Their assistance is administrative or judicial in nature, legislation belonging to the bishop. Included are vicars general, episcopal vicars, chancery and tribunal officials, and a finance officer, but the notion is more expansive. Any agency involved in diocesan administration might be considered part of the curia, typically, departments of religious education, liturgy, finance, and social action. Coordination of the curia may be entrusted to a moderator who must at least be a priest and most appropriately a vicar general. See also curia; diocese.

diocesan pastoral council, representative and consultative pastoral planning organization of Christian faithful under the authority of the diocesan bishop. The pastoral council is to be established wherever circumstances recommend it. As a permanent institution, it should represent the sociocultural, professional, and occupational breadth and diversity of the diocese, especially the laity. Members themselves serve fixed terms determined by the statutes. While not a decision-making body, it investigates, evaluates, and offers practical advice on the pastoral activity of the diocese. The bishop presides over, and should convoke, the council at least once a year. The council ceases when the see is vacant. See also council; diocese; pastoral council.

diocesan right, status of a religious institute for which a diocesan bishop has responsibility. Although every religious institute has the pope as its first superior, a diocesan community looks primarily to the authority of its bishop rather than to that of the Holy See. See also religious institute.

diocesan synod, group of Christian faithful (laity, religious, and priests) to be convoked, when warranted, by the diocesan bishop to collaborate with him for the good of the entire diocese. Implicit is the aim of prudent lawmaking through the bishop, as sole legislator, presiding over a responsible and articulate consultative body (see cans. 460–68). Extensive participatory representation is especially ensured by those obliged or permitted in law to be convoked as voting consultants. Others are invited as observers, even if non-Catholic. Free, active, and frank discussion is expected prior to any legislative promulgation by episcopal decree. Suspension or dissolution of the synod is a matter for the bishop's prudent judgment. See also synods.

diocese, a Catholic community, usually circumscribed territorially, established by the supreme Church authority, entrusted to the pastoral care of a bishop, and possessing all the constitutive marks of the Church. Among several types of particular churches, in and from which the universal Catholic Church exists, the diocese is the most typical. More than an administrative subdivision of the universal Church, it is a fully constituted church in communion with other particular churches.

The diocesan bishop, collaborating with his priests, forms a pastoral bond with the Catholic community through shared sacramental life. From this communion, eucharistically centered, flows the apostolic mission of the diocese. To foster communion and further its mission, the diocese is subdivided into parishes, usually territorial, and other configurations.

Governing the diocese as its head, the diocesan bishop also represents it in the communion of particular churches and in juridical affairs. Legitimately erected, a diocese is a juridical person under the law itself. See also diocesan bishop; eparchy.

Diodore of Tarsus (di̲'uh-dohr), d. ca. 390, bishop of Tarsus (378–90) and founder of the Antiochene school of exegesis, which eschewed allegory in favor of history and typology. His pupils included Theodore of Mopsuestia and John Chrysostom. Diodore was a fervent anti-Arian recognized by Theodosius I as a standard of orthodoxy, but his writings have mostly perished because Theodore, who taught Nestorius, was posthumously condemned (Constantinople II, 553). See also Antioch, school of.

Diognetus, Letter to (di̲-ahg-nee'tuhs), early Christian apologetic writing, perhaps from the second century, that tersely refutes pagan religion as idolatrous and Jewish practice as ritualistic. In contrast, it elegantly commends the faith of Christians, the "third race" and soul of the world who accept God's revelation in Christ and return God's love.

Dionysius Exiguus (eks-ig'yoo-uhs), ca. 500–550, monk. "Little Dennis"—the adjective indicates his humility rather than his stature—came to Rome from Scythia. A friend of Roman monk Cassiodorus, he prepared a collection of canons, revised the system for calculating the date of Easter, and introduced the A.D. system of dating, later popularized by Bede.

Dionysius of Paris, St. See Denis, St.

Dionysius the Carthusian, ca. 1402–71, theologian and mystic called Doctor Ecstaticus because of his visions and renown as a teacher of contemplation. Born at Ryckel, Belgium, he studied at the University of Cologne, receiving the degree of Master of Arts in 1424. He then entered the Carthusian charterhouse at Roermond, where he lived until his death. Dionysius was a theologian of vast reading and a prolific writer whose works fill over forty volumes, a virtual encyclopedia of medieval theology. He wrote commentaries, his preferred genre, on Scripture, Pseudo-Dionysius, Boethius, Climacus, and Cassian, among others. His commentary on the Sentences of Peter Lombard is intriguing because it was written outside of the university. He also paraphrased the Summa Theologiae of Thomas Aquinas and wrote many treatises at the request of those consulting him on religious questions. In his De Contemplatione (On Contemplation), Dionysius follows the apophatic tradition that strips away conceptual apprehension of God so that one might reach God through love. Nevertheless, his teaching on contemplation was highly speculative, in contrast to the anti-intellectual mysticism of much of late medieval spirituality. He accompanied Nicholas of Cusa on his mission in 1451 aimed at the reform of the Church in Germany. See also contemplation.

Dionysius the Great, d. 264/5, bishop of Alexandria from 247 to 264/5, succeeding Heraclas as head of the catechetical school and then as bishop. A pupil of Origen, he was accused, but later exonerated, of tritheism by Pope Dionysius (260–68). He readmitted lapsed Christians, did not require rebaptism of those baptized by heretics or schismatics, and denied John's authorship of Revelation. Feast day: November 17. See also Alexandria, school of; lapsi; Origen.

Dioscorus (di-ahs'kuh-ruhs), d. 454, patriarch of Alexandria from 444 to 451. Supporting the one-nature (Monophysite) Christology of Eutyches, he presided at the "Robber Synod" at Ephesus (449), which deposed Flavian, bishop of Constantinople. When Eutyches was condemned by the Council of Chalcedon (451), Dioscorus was himself deposed, excommunicated, and exiled. He is venerated in the Monophysite churches. See also Ephesus, Robber Council of; Eutyches; Monophysitism.

diptychs (dip'tiks; Gk., diptychon, "folded together"), a hinged folder formed from two panels of wood or metal upon which were inscribed the names of Christians both living and dead to be included in the Eucharistic Prayer. The word now refers not to a physical object but to that portion of eucharistic prayers where intercessions for the ill, the dying, Church leaders, political authorities, saints, and the deceased are said.

direction, spiritual. See spiritual direction.

diriment impediment, term used in the 1917 code of canon law to refer to a class of marriage impediments that render the celebration of marriage illicit (i.e., against the law) but not invalid (i.e., not recognized by the law as existing). The present code (1983) does not use the term, though it requires a bishop to give permission for the licit celebration of a marriage in some situations similar to those formerly called diriment impediments. See also marriage law.

discalced (Lat., "unshod"), term applied to religious orders or branches of orders whose members do not wear shoes. The custom of going without sandals had roots in Matt 10:10. This injunction by Jesus was followed by early Eastern monks, Francis of Assisi, and the Spanish Discalced Franciscans founded by Peter of Alcantara. The name Discalced was used of those Carmelites who became a new order in 1593 after the deaths of Teresa of Ávila and John of the Cross. Calced, meaning shod, was used of the original Carmelite order, now known as Carmelites of the Ancient Observance. The distinction between calced and discalced was also used of branches of the Trinitarians and Passionists. Discalced religious, especially in intemperate climates, have worn sandals.

discernment of spirits, the prudent evaluation of the presence or absence of God, or the presence of an evil spirit, in making decisions and carrying them out. It was initially described in Gal 5, 1 Corinthians, 1 Thess 5 and 12. John Cassian (d. 435), John Climacus (d. 649), Ignatius of Loyola (d. 1556) and others further developed the notion. The term "spirits" refers to the movements of the human will. Whether the source of movement is God or some evil spirit, it is filtered through the complicated morass of past and present human experiences. The interior movements convey feelings of consolation or desolation, and usually some training is necessary to help a person learn how to decipher whether or not a consolation or desolation is from God. A spiritual director can teach a person to assess how temporary emotional distress that ends in an enduring sense of peace is "good," whereas spiritual favors that initially delight the soul but then end in confusion are not positive. The spiritual director can also teach how turning away from deeply ingrained bad habits may cause long-term desolation even though this inner movement has been initiated by "good" spirits.

Discernment is an ongoing process, but is particularly necessary at peak moments when one is beginning a serious attempt at prayer, experiencing extraordinary or mystical phenomena, or making vocational and career decisions. Even though God's movements in the soul are a mystery, the gift of prudence, along with practical experience, helps the believer to cooperate with the inspirations of grace. See also prudence.

disciple (Lat., "one who learns"), pupil who follows, shares the life of, and imitates a master, the normal way in ancient times to learn anything from a trade to a philosophy. Prophets sometimes had disciples (Isa 8:16; 50:4). In the NT, John the Baptist and the Pharisees have disciples (Matt 9:14; Mark 2:18), but disciple is the name most frequently given to those around Jesus who accept him as master, both the wider circle (Matt 5:1; Luke 6:17; 19:37) and the smaller, inner circle (Mark 3:7; 4:34; Matt 10:10), sometimes explicitly the Twelve (Matt 10:1). In general, Matthew tends to call the Twelve "the disciples" (Matt 5:1 is an exception), while Mark, Luke, and John use it often for an indeterminate group, Luke generally reserving the name "apostles" for the Twelve. Even where the word does not occur, persons who travel with Jesus (Luke 8:1–3) or listen to his teaching in faith (Luke 10:39) are disciples. The Christians of Jerusalem are disciples (Acts 6:1–7). Though women are included elsewhere, the feminine form occurs only for Tabitha (Acts 9:36). Though sometimes the same persons act in both roles, the role of disciple (learner) and that of apostle (representative) are distinct. See also apostle; discipleship.

discipleship, the following of Jesus by women and men of faith. They were called disciples and apostles in the NT and in Christian tradition. The NT frequently calls Jesus Rabbi or Teacher. One who learned from a teacher was a disciple. In a general sense the Scriptures refer to disciples as those who believe the teaching of Jesus (Acts 9:1, 20). In a more specialized sense the disciples are those who followed Jesus, like the seventy (or seventy-two) sent on mission by Jesus (Luke 10:1, 17). Jesus called the disciples to follow him, to become a new family, a family of service, to pray with him as at Gethsemane, to die and to rise with him, and Jesus commissioned his followers to make disciples "of all nations" (Matt 28:19). Discipleship is the whole matrix of activities and values that derive from close association with Jesus. At core, discipleship is identification with the dying and rising of Jesus and issues in the imitation of Christ that is initiated at Baptism and nourished at the eucharistic table.

Throughout the Christian tradition discipleship has again and again been affirmed as the primary paradigm for being a dedicated Christian. Martyrdom quickly was perceived as committed discipleship. Ignatius of Antioch (d. ca. 107) saw his impending death as making him a true disciple of Jesus. Virginity became another way to follow Christ. Toward the end of the third century the monastic movement got under way when women and men withdrew to the deserts of Palestine and Egypt as followers of Jesus. Monasticism called this following of Jesus vita apostolica (Lat.), "the apostolic life," a discipleship that looked to the earliest followers of Jesus for inspiration. Francis of Assisi (d. 1226) and other friars saw their life and ministry as a response to the invitation of Jesus to "Come, follow me." Eventually in the tradition, a popular notion of discipleship restricted this model for Christian life to religious and clergy.

With the Reformation, Protestantism restored the notion of discipleship to the whole Christian community; however, the more narrow sense of discipleship continued to predominate in Catholic thinking until the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). The modern classic exposition on discipleship is Dietrich Bonhoeffer's The Cost of Discipleship (Eng. trans., 1949). See also disciple; imitation of Christ; Imitation of Christ. KEITH J. EGAN Disciples of Christ, an American religious body that originated in 1811 through the work of Alexander Campbell (d. 1866), a former Presbyterian who emigrated from Scotland. Originally a group within Presbyterianism, the Disciples of Christ were organized as a separate religious communion in 1827. The doctrine and practice of its members were largely influenced by John Glas, who seceded from the Church of Scotland in 1728, and Robert Sandeman, who spread Glas's views in New England. The Scriptures are the sole basis of faith; all credal statements are rejected. The churches are congregationally organized, believer's baptism is practiced, and the Lord's Supper is the chief act of worship every Sunday. The Disciples of Christ are dedicated to the causes of Christian education and Christian unity. In Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa, they are known as the Churches of Christ. Their membership, as of 1993, is reputed to be over two million people. In addition to Disciples of Christ and Churches of Christ, they are sometimes referred to as Campbellites.

Dismas, St., d. first century, traditionally known as the good thief crucified with Christ on Good Friday and to whom Jesus promised salvation (Luke 23:39–43). He is the patron saint of prisoners. Feast day: March 25 (observed on the second Sunday of October in U.S. prison chapels).

disobedience, civil. See civil disobedience.

disparity of cult, impediment of, in canon law invalidating obstacle to a marriage of a Catholic with an unbaptized person. This is often dispensed by diocesan authorities, provided that the Catholic party promises to remain Catholic and to raise the children as Catholics; the non-Catholic party must be informed of the promise. See also marriage law.

dispensation, the relaxation of a law in a particular instance. Canon law foresees the possibility that in a given instance the observance of the law might not bring about those values the law seeks to serve. While maintaining the permanence of the law itself, the canonical system offers the possibility of exemption from its application. A dispensation requires a reason sufficient to the seriousness of the given law, together with permission given by the authority competent to make a dispensation from that law.

Vatican II taught that diocesan bishops, because of their responsibility for the universal Church, are able to dispense from universal law. The Code of Canon Law acknowledges this. The law in question, however, must not be procedural or penal or reserved to another authority (can. 85). In circumstances where communication with the Holy See is impossible, the dispensing power of bishops is even broader. A bishop may also delegate another to perform some of his duties in this regard. Other officials in a diocese or in a religious institute also have power to dispense from some of their respective laws. See also economy, principle of.

dissent, a judgment of disagreement with an official Church teaching or practice. An understanding of dissent and its place in the life of the Catholic Church requires an understanding of the various levels of authoritative Church teaching and the appropriate response to them. When the Church, through the pope or the bishops with the pope, uses its fullest authority to propose a matter of revealed faith or morals, it acts infallibly. The proper response to such teaching is an act of faith. Such pronouncements are relatively rare.

Noninfallible Teaching: Declarations that do not use the fullest authority of the Church are known as authoritative but noninfallible acts of the magisterium. Such acts constitute the ordinary, day-to-day teaching of the Church. This teaching is said to enjoy the presumption of truth rooted in the fact that the pope and bishops have been commissioned to teach and enjoy the guidance of the Holy Spirit in fulfilling this commission. The strength of this presumption can vary considerably since there is a broad range of subjects that can be proposed authoritatively and their status can vary. Some enjoy greater certainty than others. For instance, universal moral principles are proposed more authoritatively than their applications.

The proper response to authoritative noninfallible teaching is said to be "religious submission of mind and will" (Lat., obsequium religiosum). The exact meaning of this phrase is disputed. In the first half of the twentieth century it was understood as a true internal assent, closely akin to intellectual obedience. After Vatican II (1962–65), in which past errors were both implicitly (in the rehabilitation and use of condemned theologians) and explicitly admitted, many theologians began to understand the proper response to authoritative but noninfallible teaching as a kind of docility of mind and will that did not exclude a critical component and the possibility of dissent. This possibility became even clearer as a result of a number of ecclesiological emphases introduced by Vatican II. Some of these are: the notion of Church as the People of God, the ecclesial reality of other non-Catholic Christian churches, the historical nature of the Church, the place of laypeople in the Church, and collegiality.

Humanae Vitae: The question of dissent became highly visible and practical with the publication of the encyclical Humanae Vitae in 1968. Many Catholics—including theologians and priests—could not accept the central assertion of that document (the intrinsic immorality of every contraceptive act). Such dissent was viewed by some authorities as illegitimate and, if public, punishable. Others viewed it as a dimension of the critical responsibility of Catholics and as an indispensable part of the teaching-learning process of the Church. The U.S. bishops in their pastoral letter "Human Life in Our Day" (1968) viewed dissent as legitimate under three conditions: (1) it is based on serious reasons; (2) it is respectful of teaching authority; and (3) it does not cause scandal.

Dissent is usually individual; but it can be, and has been, public and organized. Where dissent is both public and organized, it carries with it special risks and hence demands special warrants. They are that other forms of dissent are ineffective and/or an unopposed error would cause grave harm. Restorationist attitudes prevalent since 1980 in the Vatican have tended to view any dissent as unacceptable. See also doctrine; dogma; magisterium; theologian; theology. RICHARD A. MCCORMICK dissolution of marriage, termination by the pope of certain marriages between a baptized and a nonbaptized person (the so-called Petrine Privilege), of certain marriages between two nonbaptized persons (the so-called Pauline Privilege), or of nonconsummated marriages, even of two baptized persons, for just cause on request. See also marriage law; Privilege of the Faith.

dissolution of the monasteries, the suppression of monasticism in England in 1535–40. Henry VIII, pressed for money, ordered the confiscation of the over three hundred English monasteries in order to acquire their immense wealth. The money was primarily used to pay off war debts, but some was applied to education and other reform measures.

divine law, God's governance of the universe. More narrowly, divine law refers to divine positive law, God's ordinances known through revelation.

According to Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274), such divine law is necessary for four reasons: (1) human beings are directed to a fulfillment that exceeds their natural capacity, hence they are in need of a law above natural and human law; (2) human judgment is uncertain and, therefore, the laws proceeding from it are inadequate for guidance; (3) human laws can regulate only outward conduct, whereas the perfection of virtue requires regulation of interior acts; and (4) human legislation cannot forbid or punish all wrongdoing but reaches only to criminal acts (Summa Theologiae 1–2.91.4).

Divine law has two main divisions, corresponding to the two Testaments of the Bible: the Mosaic Law, given to Moses on Mount Sinai for the Jewish people, and the evangelical law promulgated by Jesus, above all in his Sermon on the Mount. The evangelical differs from the Mosaic in that it directs persons to eternal life, guides the interior acts of the mind as well as outward acts, and motivates observance through love rather than through fear.

Divine law comprises moral, ceremonial, and judicial precepts. The evangelical law has abrogated the ceremonial precepts pertaining to the forms of Jewish worship through the institution of the Church and its sacraments. And it has replaced the judicial precepts, the detailed civil laws of Israel, with a love of justice animated by the love revealed in Christ and given through grace. ROBERT P. KENNEDY

Divine Liturgy, Byzantine-rite eucharistic service and its formularies, two of which, from Constantinople, are in common use: the Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom and the Liturgy of St. Basil. The Jerusalem Liturgy of St. James is also used on occasion. Though the name "Divine Liturgy" is sometimes borrowed by other Eastern traditions, it is proper only to the Byzantine Eucharist. See also Eucharist.

Divine Office. See breviary; Liturgy of the Hours.

Divine Praises, a series of praises beginning with "Blessed be God" commonly used at Benediction before reposition of the Host. They are usually recited in the vernacular with the assembly repeating the phrases of the presider. Probably compiled by Louis Felici ca. 1779 as prayer to atone for blasphemy and profanity, Pope Pius VII attached indulgences to them in 1801. Additions to the original series include: Immaculate Conception in 1856, Sacred Heart in 1897, St. Joseph in 1921, the Assumption in 1950, the Precious Blood in 1960, and the Holy Ghost in 1964. See also Benediction.

DIVINE PRAISES

Blessed be God.
Blessed be his Holy Name.
Blessed be Jesus Christ, true God and true man.
Blessed be the Name of Jesus.
Blessed be his Most Sacred Heart.
Blessed be his Most Precious Blood.
Blessed be Jesus in the Most Holy Sacrament of the Altar.
Blessed be the Holy Spirit, the Paraclete.
Blessed be the great Mother of God, Mary most holy.
Blessed be her holy and Immaculate Conception.
Blessed be her glorious Assumption.
Blessed be the name of Mary, Virgin and Mother.
Blessed be St. Joseph, her most chaste spouse.
Blessed be God in his angels and in his saints.

Divine Word, Society of the. See Society of the Divine Word.

divinization. See deification.

Divino Afflante Spiritu (Lat., "Inspired by the Holy Spirit"), encyclical of Pope Pius XII of September 30, 1943, on the promotion of biblical studies. It was described as the Magna Carta of biblical renewal, and followed the anti-Modernist opposition to Leo XIII's cautious approval of biblical research. The encyclical directs exegetes to describe the literal sense of Scripture, i.e., "what the writer intended to express." They are to use historical-critical methods to study the sources and forms of expression used by the sacred writers, along with their cultural and historical contexts. When describing the theology of each book of the Bible, exegetes and preachers should avoid the unrestrained use of "figurative" senses (e.g., allegory and typology). Despite sustained conservative opposition, the directives of Divino Afflante Spiritu were incorporated by Vatican II (1962–65) into the Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation (Dei Verbum, 1965). See also Bible, Church teachings on the.

divorce, termination of a marriage in civil law by court decree or judgment. While the Church has no dispute with legitimate state interest in the marital status of parties, the canonical effects, i.e., the legal consequences in Church law, do not automatically follow from any civil divorce proceeding. As far as the Church is concerned, the presumption that the parties are married continues. (The same presumption remains after a civil annulment.) In practice, the Church usually accepts a civil authority's disposition of the incidents of a marriage, such as the continuing obligations to the spouse or to children. The Church, however, finds the termination of a marriage to be, in most circumstances, impossible because it is against the dominical command (found in Matt 19:6; Mark 10:9): "what God has joined together let no one separate." This teaching does not, however, forbid the faithful from obtaining a civil divorce or living apart from a spouse, especially in those instances when continuing conjugal life would bring harm to one of the parties or to children.

The most common way for a divorced person to be able to marry again in the Church while the former spouse is still living is to obtain an annulment from a Church tribunal. Such an action follows an examination of the union and a declaration that it is not considered to be a marriage in Church law. An annulment does not attempt to affix blame or affect the legitimacy of any offspring. Virtually all dioceses in the United States expend considerable resources for this ministry. In some cases the Church sees itself capable of dissolving a marriage by a process called the Privilege of the Faith, which arose from an understanding of certain scriptural passages.

Those who have divorced and remarried without Church approval should not, as a general rule, receive Communion. However, a former law that excommunicated people in such circumstances (established in the nineteenth century by American bishops solely for Catholics in the United States) has been abolished. The pastoral leaders of the Church, especially Pope John Paul II, have emphasized the Church's obligation to relate in a pastoral and understanding way to those who have suffered the trauma of divorce. At the same time there is concern among Church leaders to improve both marriage preparation and support for the married in order to lessen the frequency of divorce. See also annulment; dissolution of marriage; marriage law; Privilege of the Faith. JOHN LAHEY, EDWARD SCHARFENBERGER

Docetism, theological doctrine claiming that Christ had merely the appearance (Gk., dokein, "to seem") of a physical body, without corporeal reality. It was explicitly condemned by Ignatius of Antioch early in the second century. The roots of Docetism seem to be linked to a belief that materiality, including human flesh, is evil. The doctrine thus found many allies among Gnostics of the second and third centuries and among Pelagianists of the fifth century. Among the strongest adversaries of Docetism were those early Christians who defended the orthodox view of the full humanity of Jesus Christ: Polycarp of Smyrna, Irenaeus, and Tertullian. See also Christology; Incarnation, the; Jesus Christ.

Doctors of the Church, canonized saints officially recognized by the pope or an ecumenical council as eminent teachers of the faith. Of the eight original Doctors, four were from the West (proclaimed in 1298)—Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine of Hippo, and Gregory the Great—and four were from the East (1568)—Athanasius, John Chrysostom, Basil the Great, and Gregory of Nazianzus. The following have been added: Thomas Aquinas (1567); Bonaventure (1588); Anselm of Canterbury (1720); Isidore of Seville (1722); Peter Chrysologus (1729); Leo the Great (1754); Peter Damian (1828); Bernard of Clairvaux (1830); Hilary of Poitiers (1851); Alphonsus Liguori (1871); Francis de Sales (1877); Cyril of Alexandria, Cyril of Jerusalem (1882); John of Damascus (1890); the Venerable Bede (1899); Ephraem the Syrian (1920); Peter Canisius (1925); John of the Cross (1926); Robert Bellarmine (1931); Albertus Magnus (1932); Anthony of Padua (1946); Lawrence of Brindisi (1959); Teresa of Ávila, Catherine of Siena (1970). See also theologian; theology.

doctrine (Lat., doctrina, "teaching"), an official teaching of the Church. A doctrine that is taught definitively, that is, infallibly, is called a dogma. Every dogma is a doctrine, but not every doctrine is a dogma. Official teachings are promulgated by official teachers and teaching bodies, that is, by the magisterium: ecumenical councils, popes, and regional or national bodies of bishops, including local, regional, and international synods.

One finds official teachings already in the NT, usually identified with the kerygma (Gk., "message"), that is, the core of Christian faith that is proclaimed. Paul speaks, for example, of handing on what he himself received concerning the death and Resurrection of Christ (1 Cor 15:3–5; see also Acts 2:36). The word of God is the norm of every official teaching. Therefore, the "teaching office is not above the word of God, but serves it, teaching only what has been handed on, listening to it devoutly, guarding it scrupulously, and explaining it faithfully" (Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, n. 10).

Since doctrines normally are not protected by the charism of infallibility, they are subject to error as well as other linguistic and conceptual deficiencies deriving from the limitations of the culture and circumstances in which they were initially formulated. As such, doctrines are subject to critical evaluation by those competent to offer it. The process by which doctrines are modified or supplanted is called doctrinal development. The evolution of the official teachings of the Church on religious liberty, culminating in Vatican II's Declaration on Religious Freedom, is a classic example of such development. See also doctrine, development of; dogma; magisterium.

RICHARD P. MCBRIEN

doctrine, development of, the progressive development in the Church's understanding of its faith. The problem raised by the development of doctrine (and especially of defined doctrine, known as dogma) is to explain how it is possible for the Church later to define a truth that was not always expressly taught as divinely revealed in the original apostolic teaching. Catholic doctrine teaches that public revelation concluded with the death of the last apostle (D 1502, 3421), so this postapostolic teaching cannot constitute new revelation. Moreover, it is necessary to demonstrate the actual identity between later expositions and the apostolic exposition even when the terminology of the teaching did not exist during the apostolic age.

The reason revelation is closed at the end of the apostolic period is that revelation culminates in Christ, and the apostolic generation coincides with the life of those who were eyewitnesses to Christ's life, death, and Resurrection. After this period the Church cannot teach new truth, but only bear witness to what was received from Christ.

The Church cannot only continue to repeat what it has received, but must strive to understand what it has received and teach it in ever-changing cultural contexts. This growth in understanding becomes dogmatic development when it is infallibly defined by the Church's magisterium as a revealed truth (D 1792). What is defined must be objectively and demonstrably contained in the deposit of faith.

Theories of Development: There is no uniform Catholic theory of how, exactly, this new teaching is contained in the original revelation. Two theories have received acceptance within the Church. First, within a propositional view of revelation, one which sees revelation as consisting of a series of statements, new propositions are a logical development and are implicitly contained in the verbal expressions of primitive faith.

Another theory traceable to the work of J. S. von Drey, J. A. Moehler, John Henry Newman, and M. Blondel, sees development as a supernaturally guided continuity in doctrine. This view is particularly adaptable to the view of revelation in Vatican II (1962–65), where revelation is no longer identified with propositions, but with the mystery of Christ himself. Propositions are only imperfect, partial, and often culturally circumscribed expressions of this mystery. Faith is assent, not only to propositions, but to the mystery they intend. From this perspective, doctrinal development is the coming to consciousness of that which was implicitly contained within that mystery. What was formerly not explicitly believed is declared as belonging to the original revelation even though it may be difficult to demonstrate this historically or through logical syllogistic reasoning. There are definite connections between earlier teaching and more recent development, but the manner of asserting this connection is no longer a demonstration of logical development.

Rather than a process of logical deduction, the process is one of seeing how the new teaching fits in with the totality of what is believed by an analogy of faith. The final determination that the development forms a part of the totality of faith is the authentic teaching authority of the magisterium, which defines it as such.

The development of doctrine is acknowledged as a reality by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith's Mysterium Ecclesiae (1973). See also doctrine; revelation.

SUSAN K. WOOD

dogma (Gk., "what seems right"), a definitive, or infallible, teaching of the Church. The promulgation of a dogma is the prerogative of an ecumenical council, including the pope, or of the pope acting as earthly head of the Church, apart from a council.

It was not until the eighteenth century that the term "dogma" acquired its present meaning. The notion was formally adopted by the First Vatican Council (1869–70) and in the 1917 Code of Canon Law (cans. 1323.2; 1325.2; 2314.1). According to Vatican I, a dogma must meet the following conditions: (1) it must be contained in Sacred Scripture or in the postbiblical tradition of the Church and as such considered part of divine revelation; (2) it must be explicitly proposed by the Church as a divinely revealed object of belief; and (3) this must be done either in a solemn decree or in the Church's ordinary, universal teaching.

Every dogma is a doctrine, but not every doctrine is a dogma. It is no easy matter to determine the difference between the two, and there is no list of dogmas to which all Catholics would agree, bishops and theologians included.

The formal and deliberate rejection of a dogma is an act of heresy. This is not to say, however, that dogmas are beyond critical evaluation or immune from development. Not every dogma was originally expressed in the best form. A dogma can reflect "the changeable conceptions of a given epoch" (Mysterium Ecclesiae, 1973) and as such is open to improvement and development. See also doctrine; infallibility; magisterium.

RICHARD P. MCBRIEN

Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation (Lat., Dei Verbum, "Word of God"), one of the sixteen documents of Vatican II and one of two such dogmatic constitutions (the other being the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, Lumen Gentium), promulgated on November 18, 1965. The schema (draft document) prepared for the first council session (October–December 1962) reflected the conservative theology of the Holy Office (under Cardinal Ottaviani). Through the direct intervention of Pope John XXIII this schema was tabled and the preparation of a new draft was assigned to a mixed commission of conservatives and progressives. Prior to final approval, the schema was discussed in the third and fourth sessions of the council.

Dei Verbum made several important statements: (1) it characterized revelation as a personal communication between God and humans, manifest in deed as well as in word (n. 6); (2) it rejected the popularly understood "two source" theory of revelation (Scripture and tradition) in favor of a more nuanced position holding that, though they both "flow from the same divine wellspring," Scripture is the word of God, while tradition faithfully hands it on (n. 9); (3) it understood inerrancy not as the guarantee of literal historicity but as the truth that God "wanted put into the sacred writings for the sake of our salvation" (n. 11); (4) it approved of historical critical methods of exegesis (n. 12); (5) it stated that the Church is nourished from the table of both the word of God and of the body of Christ (n. 21). See also Bible, Church teachings on the.

JOHN R. DONAHUE

Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (Lat., Lumen Gentium, "the light of nations"), one of the sixteen documents of Vatican II (1962–65). Never before has the Church presented its self-understanding and its mission so comprehensively in a dogmatic document. Together with the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (Gaudium et Spes), the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church characterizes Vatican II as the council of the Church about the Church.

The History of the Constitution: Vatican Council I (1869–70) had already prepared a schema, or proposed decree, about the Church; however, it was not able to act upon all of this document. In the dogmatic constitution Pastor Aeternus, it did, however, decide on those parts of the schema that concern the papacy's juridical primacy and the infallibility of its teaching office. But this isolated definition of papal authority expressed a one-sided juridical and centralist ecclesiology.

In the twentieth century, theology sought a more balanced ecclesiology. It discovered the essence of the Church as mystery and community, and it also gained a new appreciation for the mission of the laity, whose apostolate in Catholic Action had attained worldwide significance. From 1960 through 1962 the Preparatory Theological Commission drafted the schema De Ecclesia, which was discussed by the council in December 1962. Because of the council Fathers' criticism of De Ecclesia, the doctrinal commission drafted the schema Lumen Gentium, which was discussed by the council in the autumn of 1963. Then the council decided to integrate a revised schema about Mary into Lumen Gentium. Amended proposals generated a further draft, which was voted upon in detail in the autumn of 1964. The most important result of the conciliar debate was that the document's first chapter about the mystery of the Church was no longer followed by the chapter about the hierarchical structure of the Church, but by a new chapter about the People of God.

In November 1964 Pope Paul VI sent a "preliminary explanatory note" to the council intended to eliminate the objections of the minority who held that the document's expressions about the college of bishops stood in opposition to the teaching of Vatican I about the juridical primacy of the pope. On November 21, 1964, the council decreed the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (Lumen Gentium) with a vote of 2,151 to 5.

The Composition of the Constitution: The constitution consists of sixty-nine articles arranged in eight chapters: "The Mystery of the Church," "The People of God," "The Hierarchical Structure of the Church and the Episcopate in Particular," "The Laity," "The Universal Call of Holiness in the Church," "Religious," "The Eschatological Nature of the Pilgrim Church and Its Union with the Church in Heaven," and "The Blessed Virgin Mary, Mother of God, in the Mystery of Christ and of the Church."

The Teaching of the Constitution: The first chapter, on the Church as mystery, is foundational. At the outset is the definition of the Church that unites Lumen Gentium with the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (Gaudium et Spes): "The Church, in Christ, is in the nature of the sacrament, a sign and instrument, that is, of communion with God and of unity among all people" (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 1). Thus the Church is not a goal in itself, but stands in the service of the universal and reconciling mission of Jesus Christ.

The mission of the Church is determined accordingly in God's universal plan of salvation, and this mission is linked, as Paul said, with "mystery" and "sacrament." Since the first judgment of Abel, God gathers together all people, in particular through the calling of the people of Israel, through Jesus Christ and through the descent of the Holy Spirit. The Church is the seed and the beginning of the reign of God on earth (nn. 2–5).

In place of an abstract or juridical definition of the Church, the council describes the essence of the Church in biblical images and metaphors as the work of the triune God: as a field, a building, a family, and the temple of God in the Holy Spirit, as well as flock, spouse, and Body of Christ (nn. 6–7).

While many people today see the Church only as an external organization, the council underlined the unity in tension that characterizes the Church both as the work of God and also as the community of human beings. "The visible society and the spiritual community, the earthly Church and the Church endowed with heavenly riches, are not to be thought of as two realities. On the contrary, they form one complex reality which comes together from a human and a divine element." Thus a realization is possible that is important for the reform of the Church. "The Church, clasping sinners to her bosom, at once holy and always in need of purification, follows constantly the path of penance and renewal" (n. 8).

The polarity of external form and divine activity in the Church also makes it possible to overcome confessional narrowness. The sole Church of Christ, "constituted and organized as a society in the present world, subsists in the Catholic Church. . . . Nevertheless, many elements of sanctification and of truth are found outside its visible confines" (n. 8). Finally the council declares the option of the Church for the poor.

The second chapter, on the Church as the People of God, has brought about a new awareness that we are all the Church. This chapter presents the common calling and mission of every member of the Church before consideration is given to any differentiation of office. All baptized persons participate in the common priesthood and in the priestly, prophetic, and kingly office of Christ. The whole body of the faithful cannot err in matters of belief. The Holy Spirit distributes special graces among the faithful of all social strata in the Church, and through their use of these gifts the faithful share in the building up of the Church. The Church is the community of the faithful. The diversity in the local churches contributes to the catholicity of the Church.

The third and fourth chapters specify the roles of the pastors and the laity. In complementing Vatican I, the council teaches that the responsibility for the whole Church is entrusted to the college of bishops, whose visible head is the pope. It underlines the specific responsibility of the bishops in their own particular churches. The Church is a community of particular churches; "it is in these and formed out of them that the one and unique Catholic Church exists" (n. 23). The council restores the diaconate as a proper and permanent rank of the hierarchy.

The specific role of the laity arises from the laity's place in the family, in the work place, and in society. Since the Church is sent to witness to the gospel in the world, the Christian witness of the laity in society is essential for the Church. As members of the Church, laypersons also assume responsibility for the Church and in their parish.

The fifth and sixth chapters, on the call to holiness, belong together. All members of the Church are called to give witness by means of their holy lives to the liberating power of the reign of God. Those in religious communities can give this witness in an especially clear manner through their living of the evangelical counsels.

The seventh and eighth chapters, on the pilgrim Church, Mary, and the saints, also form a unity. The Church is still on the way to its completion. It is both gift and challenge. To the Church belong also its deceased members. The deceased who are still en route to their final perfection need our solidarity, and those who have already reached perfection, the saints, join in solidarity with us. This solidarity is especially evident in Mary's motherly care for us. See also Church; Vatican Council II.

Bibliography

Hastings, Adrian, ed. Modern Catholicism: Vatican II and After. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.

Vorgrimler, Herbert, ed. Commentary on the Documents of Vatican II. Vol. 1. New York: Herder and Herder, 1967.

HERMAN J. POTTMEYER

Doherty, Catherine de Hueck, 1900–1985, social reformer. A child of Russian nobility, and driven by her experiences of the Communist Revolution of 1917, she dedicated her life to following the "gospel without compromise." Emigrating to Canada, she founded two social apostolates: Friendship House, located in Toronto and several U.S. cities to promote interracial justice, and Madonna House, a rural community in Combermere, Ontario.

Döllinger, Johann J. I. von (der'lin-ger), 1799–1890, German-born Church historian and theologian. A critic of Protestant and liberal historiography, Döllinger wrote a history of Martin Luther and the Lutheran Reformation. He defended theologians' freedom of inquiry and their vocation to lead by influencing public opinion. He became increasingly critical of what he considered growing papal absolutism and the revival of Scholastic theology. His book on papal and conciliar authority, written under the pseudonym Janus, was placed on the Index of Forbidden Books (1869). For his outspoken rejection of the First Vatican Council's decree on papal infallibility, he was excommunicated by the archbishop of Munich (1871) and lost his professorship (1872) but not his support from the Bavarian kingdom. See also infallibility.

dolus, a quality partaking of maliciousness and deceit. The presence of dolus is a factor in judging actions. The differing translations of the Latin word dolus between the two major English translations of the code of canon law (namely, maliciousness and deceit) are indicative of the complex meaning of the term.

Dom, abbreviation of Dominus (Lat., "Master"), a title given to professed monks of the Benedictine and some other monastic orders. Among the Trappists it is used only of abbots. See also abbot; monk.

dome, large hemispherical ceiling or roof of a building, especially of a church. Dome interiors are often decorated to represent the cosmos or heaven.

domestic church, the family as the most basic unit of the Church. The family has been called the domestic church by the Second Vatican Council's Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (1964, n. 11), Pope Paul VI's apostolic exhortation Evangelii Nuntiandi (On Evangelization in the Modern World, 1975, n. 71), and in Pope John Paul II's apostolic exhortation Consortium Socialis (On the Family, 1981, n. 21). The term suggests that the community of faith begins in the home, in the family unit. It is the family unit that begets new members of the Church. It is in the family unit that the faith is first transmitted by word and by example, both within and beyond the home. Accordingly, "there should be found in every Christian family the various aspects of the entire Church" (Pope Paul VI). See also family.

domestic prelate. See Honorary Prelate of His Holiness.

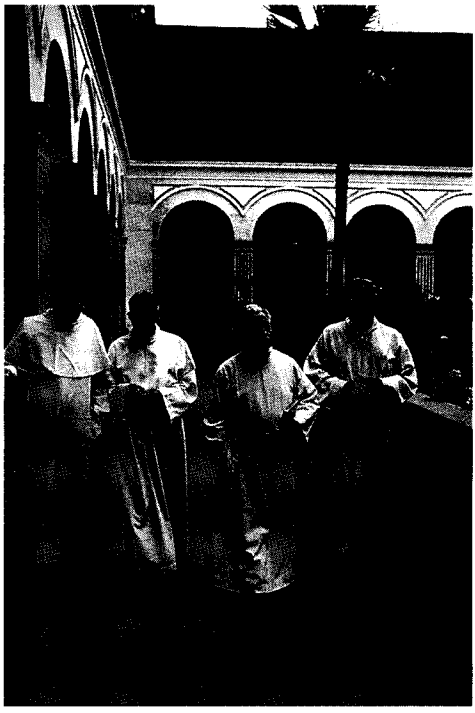
domicile (Old Fr., "dwelling-place"), canonical residency, or the diocese or parish one belongs to for the purposes of canon law. It is the usual place in which a Catholic receives the ministrations of the Church. It is acquired by moving to a given place with the intention of remaining there permanently or actually living in a given place for five years. See also quasi-domicile.

Dominican order, officially known as the Order of Preachers (O.P.), a religious order of priests and brothers founded in 1216 by Dominic de Guzman for the purpose of the ministry of the Word, to teach and preach the gospel. It is part of a larger association, the "Dominican Family," which includes cloistered nuns, sisters in active ministry, secular institutes, the Dominican Laity, and various confraternities; these groups are autonomous but united under the Master of the Order.

Dominican friars in the Convento de Santo Domingo, Lima, Peru. The order is devoted especially to preaching (hence its name, Order of Preachers), as well as to teaching, missions, research, and parish ministry.



Dominic believed that for preachers of the gospel to be credible they must return to the "apostolic life," in which the preachers were freed by their poverty from the care of property to travel and preach, as described in the Bible. At the same time he was convinced that priests must be men of profound, contemplative prayer and charity, who would support one another as brothers (friars) in their difficult work.

To offer the gospel to others effectively, the local communities of this brotherhood share a way of living devoted to the contemplation of God in liturgical worship, private prayer, and study of God's Word. They are freed for this devotion by the practice of poverty and asceticism. Study as a means of sanctification as well as of ministry was a special contribution of Dominic to religious life.

Government of the Order: The order is governed according to the Rule of St. Augustine and constitutions, which can be modified in all respects except the fundamental elements just mentioned, namely, the commitment to poverty, prayer, and study. The basic unit of the order is the priory, headed by a chapter of the brethren, who elect a first brother or prior. Periodically, the priors of communities along with elected delegates meet in a provincial chapter that elects a prior provincial and his council, who then govern the province for a term. Again at intervals, the provincials and elected delegates from the provinces meet in a general chapter that periodically elects a Master of the Order, who with his council governs the order for a term.

The government of Dominican friars differs from that of monks who are vowed to a local monastery ruled by an abbot or Father, and from that of more modern orders, like the Jesuits, whose government is vertical, with assigned rather than elected offices.

History: The Dominican order has never been divided into branches but has undergone four major historical phases. The first period (1216–1347) was marked by a rapid expansion to about twenty thousand members, and featured brilliant successes in the medieval universities, with theologians and philosophers like Albertus Magnus (ca. 1200–1280) and his pupil Thomas Aquinas (ca. 1225–74) (both now Doctors of the Church), Peter of Tarantaise (Pope Innocent V, d. 1276), and the biblical scholar Hugh of St. Cher (ca. 1200–1263). These thinkers did much to show how the findings of science and philosophy could be used to present the gospel in a systematic and coherent way. The plague of 1347, called "The Black Death," brought an end to this period.

The second period lasted until the Protestant Reformation (1347–1517). It began with a decline in membership and religious discipline but took a positive turn in the successful reform movement, which returned the order to its original commitment to poverty, prayer, and study, inspired by Catherine of Siena (ca. 1347–80) and led by Raymond of Capua (1330–99), who established houses of discipline in many provinces. This reform polarized provinces into observants, who followed a stricter rule, especially with regard to poverty, and conventuals, who allowed for the holding and use of property. Observant congregations outside the provincial structure were erected because of the reform. The period was characterized, however, by a great increase in the numbers of nuns, and produced mystics such as Catherine of Siena, Meister Eckhart (ca. 1260–1327), John Tauler (ca. 1300–1361), and Henry Suso (ca. 1295–1366). Thus, the order had fostered two lasting spiritualities: an apostolic and reform-oriented spirituality (Catherine of Siena and Girolamo Savonarola, d. 1498), and an inward-oriented "negative" spirituality, such as that of Meister Eckhart.

The third period began with the loss of the provinces of Northern Europe to the Reformation (ca. 1530) and lasted until the French Revolution (1789). It was a time of the expansion of missions to the New World and the Far East. It saw a revival of Thomism, especially in Spain, with the development of a teaching on human rights and social justice by theologians such as Francis de Vitoria (ca. 1485–1546) and Bartolomé de las Casas (1474–1566). During this time Dominicans played a major role at the Council of Trent (1545–63), and debated with the Jesuits over the nature of predestination, grace, and free will.

The fourth period lasted until Vatican II (1962–65). It began with a decline of membership from about thirty thousand to three thousand Dominicans as a result of the French Revolution and Napoleonic wars, but then witnessed the revival of the order by Henri Lacordaire (1802–61), the expansion of the order in the United States and Canada, the tremendous growth of the active sisters, and the revival of Thomism by Pope Leo XIII in 1879. The order furthered countless schools and centers in Thomism but also pioneered theologies of ecumenism, liturgy, and pastoral life as well as biblical studies. Dominican theologians such as Yves Congar (b. 1904) greatly contributed to Vatican II.

After Vatican II, the order revised its constitutions in 1968. This renewed the fundamentals of the spirit of its founder, especially by fully restoring the order's democratic, elective form of government. As of 1993, the Dominicans had about 7,500 members, and, despite a decline in vocations in the decade after 1968, it has expanded throughout the world so that it now carries out its mission in forty-eight provinces and in eighty-six countries.

The Dominicans in the United States were founded by Dominic Fenwick in 1805, and in the 1990s have four provinces (there are also provinces in Canada and Mexico) with headquarters in New York, Oakland (CA), Chicago, and New Orleans. They publish a number of periodicals, conduct schools of theology in Berkeley, California, Washington, D.C., and St. Louis, Missouri, direct Providence College in Providence, Rhode Island, and work in dozens of parishes, hospitals, and universitycenters.Seealso Aquinas, St. Thomas; Augustine, Rule of St.; Catherine of Siena, St.; Dominican spirituality; Dominic de Guzman, St.; religious orders and congregations.

Bibliography

Hinnebusch, William A. The History of the Dominican Order. 2 vols. Staten Island, NY: Alba House, 1966, 1973.

Tugwell, Simon, ed. Early Dominicans: Selected Writings. Classics of Western Spirituality. New York: Paulist Press, 1982.

BENEDICT M. ASHLEY

Dominican Sisters. See Sisters of St. Dominic.

Dominican spirituality, the mode of Christian prayer and life developed in the Order of Preachers, founded by Dominic de Guzman (d. 1221). Dominic's concern was to revive the apostolic life portrayed in the Gospel of Matthew and directed to preaching. This could best be supported by a fraternal community living a contemplative life of liturgical and private prayer, by asceticism, especially poverty, and by devotion to the study of the word of God. Dominic was devoted to Christ in his Passion, to the Eucharist, and to Christ's mother, Mary.

History: The tradition was further shaped by Albertus Magnus (ca. 1200–1280) and his pupil Thomas Aquinas (ca. 1225–74). Aquinas emphasized our dependence on God even as he understood "grace as perfecting nature." Christian holiness consists in union with God through the Incarnate Word by the grace of the Holy Spirit realized in the actions of the theological virtues of faith, hope, and love, which inform and unite the Christian journey. Growth in faith, hope, and love demands a balanced development of the moral virtues. The heights of sanctity and mystical life are open to all the baptized, and can be achieved through the guidance and empowerment of the Holy Spirit acting through seven "gifts" urging Christians to prayer's union with God and to the service of one's neighbors. Aquinas summed up this ideal in the maxim, "Contemplare, et contemplata aliis tradere" (Lat.), which means "To gaze with love on God, and then to share what has been seen with others."

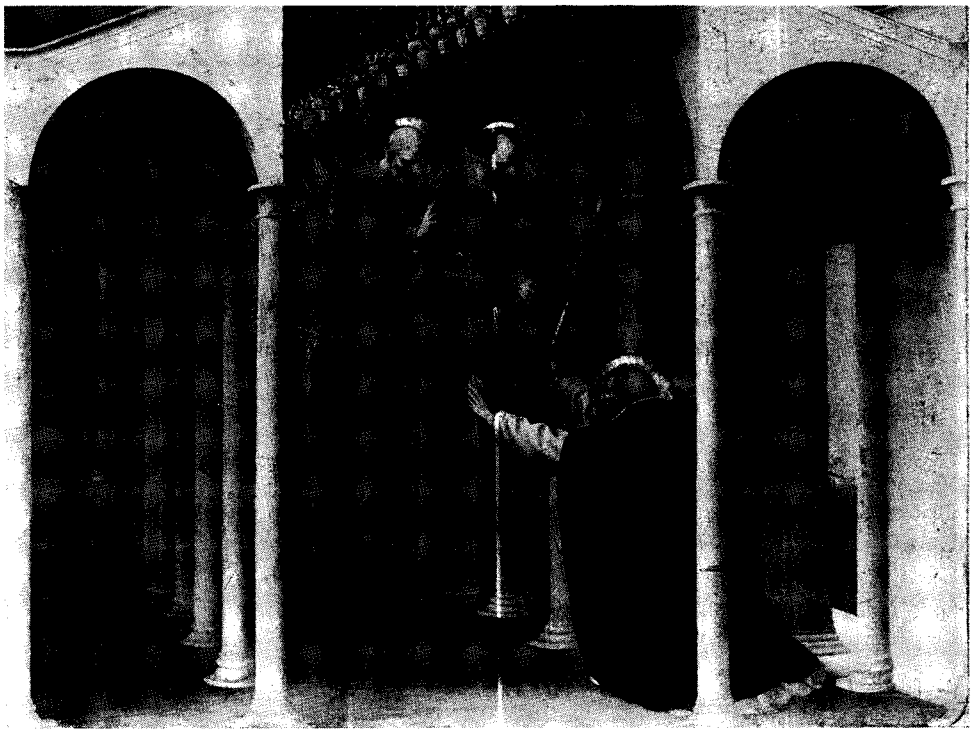
From Catherine of Siena's (ca. 1347–80) and Girolomo Savonarola's (1452–98) concern for ecclesiastical reform, this spirituality also took on a social dimension; this characteristic sparked the concern for human rights of Francisco de Vitoria (ca. 1485–1546) and Bartolomé de las Casas (1474–1566) and influences theology of social justice and liberation in the 1990s. This balanced and outgoing spirituality has dominated the Dominican tradition, but it has been complemented by an inward-looking spirituality that stems from the Neoplatonism of the Pseudo-Dionysius (ca. 500) through Albertus Magnus (ca. 1200–1280) and Meister Eckhart (ca. 1260–1327). This "negative theology" of detachment from created reality empties the soul for the interior birth of the Word. Through Eckhart's Dominican disciples John Tauler (ca. 1300–1361) and Henry Suso (ca. 1295–1366), it influenced the Lowland (Netherlands, Belgium, and Luxembourg), Spanish, and French schools of mysticism, as well as Protestantism through Martin Luther (d. 1546) and German idealism.

In the twentieth century, the Dominicans Juan Arintero (1860–1928) and Reginald Garrigou-Lagrange (1877–1964) have been notable for their defense of the universal vocation of all Christians to mystical contemplation through the gifts of the Holy Spirit.

A sometimes overlooked aspect of this spirituality is that it has found expression also in the fine arts through painters like Fra Angelico (1387–1455) and Fra Bartolomeo de la Porta (1472–1516), and in the twentieth century the pioneer of the encounter between modern and Christian art, Pierre M.-A. Couturier (1897–1954). See also Dominican order; spirituality, Christian.

BENEDICT M. ASHLEY

Dominic, founder of the Dominicans, beholding an apparition of Sts. Peter and Paul; early-fifteenth-century painting by Fra Angelico, Louvre, Paris.



Dominic de Guzman, St., ca. 1170–1221, founder of the Order of Preachers (Dominicans). Born in Caleruega, Spain, and educated at Palencia, he became a canon of the newly reformed cathedral chapter of Osma. While accompanying Bishop Diego of Azevedo to Denmark and Rome in 1203 and 1205, he was motivated to oppose the advance of the Albigensian heresy in southern France, founding a community of nuns at Prouille (1206) and a community of mendicant, itinerant preachers in Toulouse (1215) under the Rule of St. Augustine. The latter community received full papal approbation as the Order of Preachers in 1216.

Dominic, traveling on foot, founded communities of his brethren and nuns in France, Italy, and Spain. After undertaking another preaching mission in northern Italy, he died in Bologna in 1221, unable to fulfill his lifelong dream of becoming a foreign missionary. Gregory IX, who knew him personally, canonized him in 1234. Contemporaries testified to his fidelity to the apostolic life of poverty and chastity, to his compassionate love for sinners, and to his joyful fraternal leadership. His special love for Mary is demonstrated in the legend that he initiated devotion to the Rosary. The constitutions of his order, written under his presidency by the organizational chapters (assemblies) of 1220 and 1221 at Bologna, gave Dominicans an elective, fraternal form of community life, fostered by contemplation of divine truth in liturgy and study, all directed to evangelical preaching. Emphasis on sanctification by study and elective government are Dominic's special contributions to religious life. Feast day: August 8. BENEDICT M. ASHLEY

Dominus vobiscum (doh'mee-nuhs voh-bees' k*oo*m; Lat., "The Lord [be] with you"), a liturgical greeting. Said by a presider to a liturgical assembly, the common response is "Et cum spiritu tuo" (Lat., "And with your spirit"). The current English version of the Mass translates the phrase "And also with you."

Domitilla, Flavia, niece of the emperor Domitian (81–96). She and her husband, Flavius Clemens (consul in 95 and cousin of Domitian), were probably Christians; charged with atheism and adoption of Jewish ways, they were punished (95) with death (Clemens) and exile (Domitilla). It is disputed whether the Catacomb of Domitilla, a Christian burial place from the second century, was land originally owned by Flavia, or by another Flavia, niece of the emperor Titus, also exiled as a Christian. Feast day (until 1969): May 12. See also catacombs.

Donation of Constantine, the emperor Constantine's supposed bequest to Pope Sylvester (314–35) of temporal dominion over Italy and other Western regions. Included in the False Decretals and Gratian's Decretals, it enjoyed widespread authority until the mid-1400s when its authenticity was questioned by Aeneas Sylvius (later Pius II) and refuted by Nicholas Cusanus, Reginald Pecock, and Lorenzo Valla. See also Constantine the Great; Decretum Gratianum; False Decretals.

Donatism (doh'nuh-tizm), North African schismatic sect of the fourth and fifth centuries tending to moral rigorism; it is named for Donatus, the movement's institutional organizer. The schism arose from the contested election of Caecilian as bishop of Carthage in 311, on the grounds that his consecrator had been a traditor, one who "handed over" the Scriptures during the time of the Diocletian persecution. In 313 a commission appointed by Miltiades, Bishop of Rome, decided against the Donatists, who then appealed unsuccessfully to a synod at Arles in 314 and to the emperor Constantine in 316. Fueled by anti-imperial sentiment and social unrest in North Africa, the schismatic church prospered despite persecution, Tyconius (d. ca. 400) being its only notable theologian. Despite the work of opponents such as Optatus of Milevis (d. ca. 370) and Augustine of Hippo (354–430), the schism lingered until the Moslem conquest of North Africa in the seventh century.

Theologically, the sect held the Church to a rigid standard of holiness, insisted that sacraments conferred by traditores were invalid, and that those who communicated with traditores were also infected with sin. In effect, the Donatists formed their own church and rebaptized converts to it. See also schism.

Donne, John, 1572–1631, English metaphysical poet, Anglican preacher, Dean of St. Paul's Cathedral, London. Born in London of a Roman Catholic family, Donne studied at Oxford and Cambridge Universities as well as at the Inns of Court in London. He accepted a secretarial post to Sir Thomas Egerton that lasted until the discovery of his secret marriage to Egerton's niece, which led to his dismissal and imprisonment in 1601.

A few years earlier, Donne had abandoned Catholicism for Anglicanism. Ultimately, he was ordained, and became Dean of St. Paul's. Donne's sermons and poetry are remarkable achievements, combining deep passion with brilliant wit and intellectual rigor, e.g., the Holy Sonnets and the Divine Poems.

Dooley, Thomas A., III, 1927–61, Catholic physician known for his heroic medical work in Southeast Asia. Born in St. Louis, Missouri, he attended the University of Notre Dame (1943–44, 1946–48) and St. Louis University School of Medicine (1948–53). Having served as a medical corpsman in the U.S. Navy (1944–46), he was commissioned into the Navy Medical Corps as a physician in April 1953. From August 1954 to May 1955, he assisted the Navy's evacuation of refugees in North Vietnam by tirelessly working in the camps that aided hundreds of thousands of Vietnamese fleeing from the North to the South. In 1956, Dooley resigned from the Navy, assembled a small medical staff, and opened a privately funded medical clinic in a remote area of Laos. In 1958, he established an independent organization, Medico, Inc., which eventually founded nineteen clinics in thirteen nations in need of medical assistance. Diagnosed with cancer in August 1959, he continued to work vigorously in Laos while making fund-raising trips to the United States. After a brief hospitalization, he died in St. Louis.

Dormition of Mary, literally the falling asleep of Mary, or Mary's death. Although a fifth-century feast is still celebrated in the East, contemporary theology, particularly in the West, accents the glorification of Mary's body in the Assumption rather than the circumstances surrounding her death. See also Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

Dorothy, St., d. ca. 303, virgin and martyr of questionable historicity. She is said to have died during the reign of Diocletian. Her feast, formerly on February 6, is no longer observed.

Douay-Rheims Version of the Bible, an English translation of the Latin Vulgate prepared by Gregory Martin. The NT translation was published at Rheims (1582) and the OT in Douay (1609). Bishop Richard Challoner revised it several times (NT: 1749, 1752; OT: 1750, 1763), modernizing the English and providing explanatory notes. This version was used by English-speaking Roman Catholics for two centuries. See also Scripture, versions of.

double effect, principle of, a traditional guideline for determining the morality of an action based on the distinction between what is directly willed or only indirectly willed. This distinction has been used to help resolve many practical conflict situations where an evil can be avoided or where a more or less necessary good can be achieved only when another evil is reluctantly caused. In such situations the evil caused in the course of doing good has been viewed as justified under four conditions: (1) The action from which evil results is good or indifferent in itself; it is not morally evil. (2) The intention of the agent is upright, that is, the evil effect is sincerely not intended. (3) The evil effect must be equally immediate causally with the good effect, for otherwise it would be a means to the good effect and would be intended. (4) There must be a proportionately grave reason for allowing the evil to occur. When these four conditions are fulfilled, the resultant evil would be an unintended by-product of the action, that is, only indirectly willed, and it would be justified by the presence of a proportionately grave reason.

The so-called double-effect principle has been taken over and used extensively in official documents of the magisterium. For instance, Paul VI states in Humanae Vitae: "Equally to be excluded, as the teaching authority of the Church has frequently declared, is direct sterilization, whether perpetual or temporary, whether of the man or of the woman." The term "direct" refers to a sterilization intended as a means or an end. If it was caused as an unintended effect of a therapeutic procedure, it is said to be indirect. Some contemporary theologians question the decisive character of the distinction.

RICHARD A. MCCORMICK

double monasteries, monastic foundations comprised of both women and men that enjoyed some popularity, especially in the West, from the rise of cenobitic (communal) monasticism in the fourth century to the end of the twelfth century. Notable early medieval monasteries were in Gaul (France) and in England; the Order of Sempringham established by St. Gilbert in the twelfth century also favored the double monastery. While strictly segregated in their living quarters, men and women did share common liturgical facilities and were normally under the rule of a woman superior. Frequently prey to the suspicions of the Church hierarchy, their eventual suppression may have been due as much to the uneasiness ecclesiastical and lay authorities felt about powerful women superiors as to doubts concerning the ethical propriety of religious women and men living in such close proximity. See also monasticism.

doubt [canon law], in canon law the inability of an individual to make a judgment between two probable opinions. Doubt is not the same thing as error, i.e., a mistaken judgment, and so canonical theory requires that the opinions formed have some basis for probability. When the doubt concerns the meaning of a given law or the very existence of the law, it is called doubt of law. Between 1983, when the revised code of canon law was promulgated, and 1994, there was a doubt of law whether women and girls could be altar servers. That doubt was resolved by the Holy See in the affirmative in 1994. In such a case, the Code of Canon Law (can. 14) holds that the law does not bind, which explains why so many parishes legitimately allowed girls to serve at the altar before 1994. When the doubt concerns some fact, i.e., when the individual lacks sufficient information to fulfill the law, canon 14 allows ordinaries, i.e., certain authorities within a diocese or religious order, to dispense from any associated requirements. For example, a man must be at least sixteen and a woman fourteen in order to marry. But in an individual case, the age of one or both of the parties might not be clear. If a particular dispensation is reserved to higher authority, ordinaries may still dispense as long as they are in the habit of granting such dispensations. See also error [canon law]; ignorance [canon law].

doubt, moral, mental uncertainty regarding the morality of a contemplated action or lack of action. An individual possessing certain knowledge of the moral law may still have practical uncertainty about its specific application. Moral theologians disagree about the degree of certainty required for moral action. See also certitude, moral.

Dougherty, Dennis, 1865–1951, American cardinal-archbishop. Educated in Philadelphia and Rome, he was ordained (1890) and assigned to St. Charles Seminary, Philadelphia. After episcopal ordination (1903), he served as bishop of Nueva Segovia, Philippines; bishop of Buffalo (1915); archbishop of Philadelphia (1918); and was created cardinal (1921). Known as "God's bricklayer," he greatly expanded the institutional church in Philadelphia.

dove (Gk., peristera), a Byzantine-rite tabernacle, in the form of a dove, for reserving the eucharistic species, often suspended by chains from a ciborium or baldachino above the altar. See also tabernacle.

doxology (dahks-ah'luh-jee; Gk., doxa-logia, "praise-words"), any ascription of praise to God. Doxologies conclude liturgical prayers, the most solemn of which is the concluding doxology of the Eucharistic Prayer: "Through him [Christ], with him, in him, in the unity of the Holy Spirit, all glory and power is yours almighty Father, for ever and ever. Amen." The following doxology concludes psalms during the Liturgy of the Hours: "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Spirit: As it was in the beginning, is now and ever shall be, world without end. Amen." Doxologies also form the final verse of many hymns, following the example of the Roman office hymns.

dread, an emotional state that arises when a person encounters freedom. The concept was developed by the existentialist thinker Søren Kierkegaard in his book The Concept of Dread (1844). Dread must be distinguished from fear. Fear is an emotion concerning a particular object, like an illness. Unlike fear, dread concerns no particular thing. Dread arises in the face of a profound awareness of freedom that promises both new possibilities as well as the uncertainty of the unknown. Theologically, the concept of dread can be used to explain the sinner's attraction and resistance to the freedom promised by God's grace. See also freedom; free will; grace.

Drexel, Bl. Katherine, 1858–1955, American Missionary. She was the daughter of a wealthy, Philadelphia banker. Pope Leo XIII encouraged the young heiress to devote both her fortune and her life to the poor. She entered the Sisters of Mercy but felt called to do missionary work among black and Native Americans. In 1891, she founded the Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament for Indians and Colored People (S.B.S.); the congregation's mission concerns the education of African and Native Americans. Drexel established many schools on Indian reservations and instituted the first and only Catholic University designed for African-Americans, Xavier University,

New Orleans (1925). She was beatified in 1988. Feast day: March 3.

Drey, Johann Sebastian (drī), 1777–1853, German theologian. Ordained in 1801, he was professor of theology at the University of Tübingen from 1817 to 1846. Founder of the Tübinger theologische Quartalschrift in 1819, Drey wrote articles on such issues as revision in theology, the nature of Catholicism, revelation, and mysticism. His Kurze Einleitung in das Studium der Theologie ("Brief Introduction to the Study of Theology," 1819) emphasized the ecclesial context, mystical roots, and practical orientation of all theology. His three-volume work on apologetics (1838–47) established him as one of the founders of the modern discipline of fundamental theology. See also apologetics.

dry Mass, a rehearsal of the Mass, its prayers and actions, without the Eucharistic Prayer or the use of bread, wine, or their vessels. In the Middle Ages, the missa secca (Lat., "dry Mass") or memoria ("memorial") was sometimes regarded as "quasisacramental." It was viewed as a substitute for the Mass when the Mass was not allowed, e.g., when no priest who had fasted was available or in territories under interdict or edicts of excommunication.

dualism, term with multiple meanings referring to diverse doctrines that posit some form of coexisting, opposing principles, entities, forces, or distinctions as basic components of the world or of human life. The term has been applied ontologically, and has also been used to define or describe epistemological and moral categories and distinctions. For example, a central feature in Platonic thought is the radical separation of the eternal world of forms from the temporal world of particulars or individual things. In Platonism, the world of ideas is known by the mind whereas the particulars appear to the senses.

In the history of the Christian religion, the prevalence of dualism is often ensconced in questions dealing with the origin or coexistence of good and evil. On one level, doctrine reflects a radical dualism when two irreducible and opposing principles—one good, the other evil—are believed to be coequal and coeternal. Some Manichaean groups from the third century held this view, envisioning a primeval conflict between two ultimate forces—Light and Darkness. On the moral level, this struggle between good and evil is understood as taking place within each individual.

A more prevalent and influential understanding of dualism holds that there is only one primordial principle, cause, or creator, namely, the good. Evil, a second principle, is inferior and at some point in history, usually the end of time, will be conquered by good. Various groups followed this view, for example, the Gnostics, Cathars, and Bogomils.

Contemporary dualistic doctrines generally refer to the problem of knowledge, for example, Descartes's teaching on the opposition between mind and matter, or Kant's distinction between the noumenal and the phenomenal world. See also Manichaeism; mind/body. EILEEN KEARNEY

Dubourg, Louis Guillaume Valentine, 1766–1833, bishop of New Orleans. Born in Santo Domingo (Haiti), raised in Bordeaux, and educated at the seminary of St. Sulpice in Paris, he was ordained a priest in 1788. Fleeing the French Revolution, he lived in Spain before coming to Baltimore in December 1794; DuBourg soon thereafter joined the Society of St. Sulpice. He founded St. Mary's College, was president of Georgetown College, and was a close confidant of Elizabeth Ann Seton. He was bishop of New Orleans from 1815 to 1825, when he resigned his see and returned to France.

Duchesne, Louis (doo-shayn'), 1843–1922, priest and historian. Born in France, Duchesne developed an interest in Christian antiquity from his archaeological studies in Rome. In 1877 he assumed the chair of Church History at the Institut Catholique in Paris where one of his students was the famous Modernist Alfred Loisy. In 1885 he resigned his post when his lectures on the development of pre-Nicene doctrine and his questioning of the apostolic foundation of French dioceses drew criticism. His historical investigations into the nature of early Christianity favored the notion of development and continued to be unsettling to ecclesiastical authorities, who placed his three-volume Histoire ancienne de l'église chrétienne (Fr., "Ancient History of the Christian Church") on the Index of Forbidden Books during the Modernist crisis. See also Index of Forbidden Books; Modernism.

Duchesne, St. Rose Philippine, 1769–1852, French missionary and educator. She entered the Visitation order in 1788, but religious persecution spawned by the French Revolution forced the order into exile. After the Concordat of 1801, she joined the Congregation of the Religious of the Sacred Heart (called in the 1990s the Society of the Sacred Heart). As a missionary to the United States, she established at St. Charles, Missouri, the first convent of the Religious of the Sacred Heart in America (1818) and founded many schools and orphanages. She labored among the Potawatomi tribe at Sugar Creek, Kansas (1841); they called her "Woman Who Prays Always." Duchesne, known for her holiness and sacrificial life, was canonized in 1988. Feast day: November 18. See also Society of the Sacred Heart.

due process, canonical processes appropriate to protect rights and obtain justice. The major concerns regarding due process in canon law are twofold. The first is that there be established processes for the protection of the rights of those involved. The second is that those processes be, in fact, available and followed. Concern for the rights of individuals should be accompanied by concern for the good of the community. The community is, of course, strengthened when individual rights are respected and justice is obtained in any given instance. In cases where there appears to be a conflict of rights, due process should protect the rights of all concerned.

Canon law has complex and well-developed norms for protecting the rights of those involved in judicial proceedings and in many administrative processes as well. In addition, canonical equity (the virtue that seeks justice) should be part of any application of the law. Often, however, administrative proceedings do not have as many clear formal safeguards for the protection of rights as judicial processes do. Because of this, there has been concern for the development of norms and appeal processes so that the justice the law seeks may be obtained. See also rights and obligations in canon law.

Duffy, Francis P., 1871–1932, military chaplain. Ordained in 1896, Duffy taught philosophy at St. Joseph's Seminary (Dunwoodie, NY) and edited the New York Review (1905–8). Serving in the New York National Guard—"Fighting 69th Regiment"—he was decorated by the American, Canadian, and French governments. He became famous as America's best-known chaplain, recording his experiences in Father Duffy's Story (1919). As pastor of Holy Cross Church, he helped prepare New York Governor Alfred E. Smith's reply to questions about Catholic loyalty to American ideals during the presidential election campaign of 1928. A memorial to Father Duffy, erected in New York's Times Square in 1937, was the first statue of a Catholic priest built on public property in New York State.

dulia (Gk., "service"), the honor that is given to those who deserve respect. In Catholic theology it is traditionally associated with the honor given to the saints, who manifest in a unique way the activity of God in their lives. Dulia, therefore, honors God by recognizing the presence of God manifest in the lives of the saints. It is distinguished from latria (Gk.), which is the worship that Christians render to God alone, and hyperdulia, which is the special honor given to the Blessed Virgin Mary because of her unique role as the Mother of God. See also hyperdulia; latria.

Dulles, Avery Robert, b. 1918, U.S. Jesuit theologian specializing in ecclesiology and the theology of revelation. He has taught at Woodstock College in Maryland, The Catholic University of America, and Fordham University. He served as president of the Catholic Theological Society of America (1974–75) and received its Cardinal Spellman Award for Theology (1970).

Dulles pioneered the use of models in Catholic theology in his Models of the Church (1974) and later in Models of Revelation (1983). His ability to describe the characteristics of different groups of theologians sympathetically and to discover new avenues of dialogue are hallmarks of his work.

Duns Scotus, John. See Scotus, John Duns.

Dunstan, St., ca. 908–88, Anglo-Saxon abbot and archbishop. A cousin of the kings of Wessex and an accomplished artisan, he was active at court and in the reform of English monasticism. Around 943, King Edmund made Dunstan abbot of Glastonbury; ca. 959, King Edgar appointed him archbishop of Canterbury. Feast day: May 19. See also Canterbury; monasticism.

Dupanloup, Félix Antoine Philibert (doo-pahn-loo'), 1802–78, bishop and educator. As a priest in Paris from 1825 to 1837, he developed new catechetical methods, which he applied successfully to higher education as rector of the seminary of Saint-Nicolas du Chardonnet from 1837 to 1845. As bishop of Orléans (1849–78), he defended Catholic interests in public policy, securing in 1850 the right of the Church to operate private schools in France. Although a proponent of the independence of the Papal States, he was the leader of the "inopportunists" at the First Vatican Council (1869–70) and absented himself rather than vote for the doctrine of papal infallibility. Subsequently, he did accept it. See also infallibility; Vatican Council I.

Durandus of Saint-Pourçain, ca. 1275–1334, Dominican, bishop, and Scholastic theologian called Doctor Modernus and Doctor Resolutissimus. A critic of Thomas Aquinas, he was censured by his order and Pope John XXII, but vindicated by Benedict XII after his death. His teachings remained popular into the sixteenth century. See also Scholasticism.

Durocher, St. Marie-Rose, 1811–49, founder of the Sisters of the Holy Names of Jesus and Mary, an order dedicated to Christian education. She was born near Montreal, Quebec. Feast day: October 6. See also Sisters of the Holy Names of Jesus and Mary.

Dymphna, St., ca. seventh-century Irish maiden, patron saint of the mentally ill. Legend has it that she escaped from her father by running to Belgium. Her relics were found in the thirteenth century at Gheel. An asylum stands at this site. Feast day: May 15.

Dyophysites (Gk., dyo, "two,"; physeis, "natures"), the name used by Monophysites to refer to Christians (i.e., Catholics, Protestants, and Orthodox) who accept the doctrine of Chalcedon (451), namely, that Jesus Christ has both a divine and a human nature, existing in one divine person. See also Chalcedon, Council of; Monophysitism.

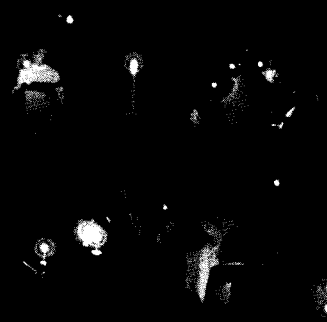
E



Eadmer, ca. 1060–ca. 1130, monk at Canterbury. Secretary to Anselm, Eadmer wrote a biography of him as well as a chronicle of contemporary events. See also Anselm of Canterbury, St.; Canterbury.

Ea Semper, papal bull of 1907 that severely restricted the rights of the Greek Catholic Church in the United States. The Ruthenian bishop was not granted jurisdiction but was made dependent on the local Latin hierarchy. Priests were to remain celibate and were forbidden to administer Confirmation. Preference was given to the Latin rite in mixed marriages. The Ruthenian community expressed outrage and more moderate legislation was introduced in 1914 with the decree Cum Episcopo.

Easter, the feast of the Resurrection of Christ, the oldest and most important Christian celebration, also called Pascha (Gk., "Passover").

Since the Council of Nicaea (325) Easter has been celebrated on the Sunday following the full moon after the vernal equinox (between March 22 and April 25). Catholics and many Eastern Christians celebrate Easter on different days because each follows a different calendar: the Gregorian in the West, and the Julian in the East. The date of Easter determines the dates of other movable feasts, such as the Ascension and Pentecost, as well as the number of weeks before Lent and after Pentecost.

The Easter season begins on Easter Sunday and extends until Pentecost, fifty days later. The first eight days after Easter are known as the Octave of Easter. The paschal candle, which is blessed at the Easter Vigil, is lighted at Mass during the entire Easter season, and the water that is also blessed at the Easter Vigil is used for Baptism throughout the Easter season. The Easter season is also the time for the newly baptized (neophytes) to continue their catechetical formation, known as mystagogia (Gk., "mystagogy").

The Jewish Passover represents the fusion of two originally separate festivals: a spring sacrifice of nomadic shepherds (Passover) and a Canaanite agricultural festival (Unleavened Bread), adopted after the Hebrew settlement in Canaan. In the first century, as today, the developed Passover feast remembered Israel's redemption from slavery; rabbinic tradition also saw the feast as one of hope for final redemption. This Passover celebration provided the context for the Last Supper of Jesus with his disciples and the events leading to his Crucifixion and Resurrection.

By the second century, the Church began to celebrate a Christian Passover (Pascha), a modulation of Jewish themes. Celebrating in memory and hope a unitive feast of both the Cross and the Resurrection, the Church identified Jesus as the Paschal Lamb of the New Covenant, gave thanks for deliverance from sin and final death, and awaited ultimate redemption. The primitive Pascha was not focused exclusively on the Resurrection, but on the totality of redemption in Christ.

There is second-century evidence from Asia Minor, whose churches followed the Johannine chronology celebrating Pascha on 14 Nisan regardless of the day, indicating that the feast primarily celebrated more than the death of Jesus as an isolated moment. Incarnation, Passion, death, Resurrection, and glorification, i.e., the total work of redemption, were celebrated, symbolically epitomized in the Cross as the locus of victory.

Divergent Practices: Churches celebrating Pascha on 14 Nisan, known as Quartodecimans (Lat., "fourteen"), were a minority. Other churches opted for a dominical (Sunday) celebration, because of the strong linkage of Sunday with eucharistic celebration; the weekly Sunday Eucharist is the earliest liturgical celebration. Heated disputes concerning the observance of Easter and the pre-Easter fast erupted in the late second century. Differences in the calendars used (e.g., solar, lunar, Jewish, Babylonian, etc.), as well as computation methods for dating Easter, along with scanty and at times historically inaccurate textual evidence make it impossible to draw definitive conclusions about the day on which Easter was celebrated in the first two centuries of the Church. What is clear is that churches in Palestine and Alexandria celebrated the dominical Pascha without reference to the practice in Rome. There is evidence that both the Quartodecimans and dominical adherents agreed that the celebration of completed redemption in Christ was the content of the feast.

During the fourth century in Jerusalem, a major center for pilgrims, the celebration of Easter included a three-day (Triduum) period of preparation. On what is called Holy Thursday, the Last Supper account was read at the Eucharist. The events of the Passion of Jesus were liturgically commemorated in the city at the various places (known as stations) that were associated with those events. On what is called Good Friday, there was a veneration of the cross and a "three hours" service to commemorate Jesus' three hours on the cross. New members were initiated into the Church through the sacraments of Baptism, Confirmation, and Eucharist on the eve, or vigil, of Easter. This has set the pattern for the observance of Holy Week to the present.

Easter, as a living symbol rather than a commemoration, is not a series of gospel representations, but rather the passage of God's people in Christ through death to new life. The full and proper recovery of the unity of the feast remains pastorally challenging. See also Easter Vigil; liturgical year; Quartodecimans; Resurrection of Christ. JOHN A. MELLOH

Easter duty, also called the "Eucharistic Precept," the obligation of Catholics to receive Holy Communion at least once each year, usually during the Easter season. From the sixth century onward, various Church councils enacted legislation requiring reception of Communion at Easter time. This developed as a safeguard against neglect of the Sacrament. The Fourth Lateran Council (1215) promulgated this as law for the Latin church. The Council of Trent (1545–63) and the 1917 and 1983 codes of canon law preserve this obligation with some minor variations. The requirement to receive Communion "in the Easter season" has been variously interpreted. The 1983 code specifies the period from Palm Sunday to Pentecost Sunday. In the United States, this has been extended to include the period from the first Sunday of Lent until Trinity Sunday, which is the first Sunday after Pentecost. See also Communion, Holy; Easter; Paschal season.

Eastern Catholic cardinals, members of the College of Cardinals who belong to one of the Eastern Catholic churches. Originally a dignity, or honor, conferred on priests of the local church of Rome and the bishops of its surrounding dioceses, the cardinalate was only gradually extended to Latin bishops outside Rome, who received the title of a Roman church. The merely honorary assignment to a Roman church was designed to maintain an historical link with the original practice of naming pastors of these churches as cardinals. Except for the two Greek bishops who remained faithful to the Union of Florence (1439), Bessarion of Nicaea and Isidore of Kiev, no other Eastern Catholic cardinals were named until the second half of the nineteenth century. In the twentieth century some Eastern Catholic patriarchs have resisted accepting the cardinalate, maintaining rightly that it was a Latin church dignity of the patriarchate of the West, and hence lower than the dignity they already possessed as patriarchs and heads of their Eastern churches. At Vatican II (1962–65) the issue of precedence between cardinals and patriarchs was avoided by giving the patriarchs separate seating, and the newly reformed Catholic canon law is silent on the issue. In the history of the Church there have been only eighteen Eastern Catholic cardinals, the most recent appointment in 1994. See also Cardinals, College of.

Eastern Catholic liturgical languages, the official languages in which Eastern-rite liturgies are celebrated. These are dead languages except for Arabic, Romanian, Hungarian, and Albanian. Each rite has one "official," traditional liturgical tongue (Grabar for the Armenian rite; Syriac for the Chaldean, West Syrian, Maronite rites; Coptic for the Coptic rite; Ge'ez for the Ethiopian rite) except the Byzantine, which is supranational and plurilingual (Greek, Old Slavonic, Romanian, Hungarian, Arabic, Albanian). But in the twentieth century the vernacular has been introduced almost everywhere except among the Russians and the Greeks, who celebrate in Old Slavonic and the Greek of Christian antiquity. See also liturgical language.

Eastern Catholic patriarchates, Eastern Catholic churches with a patriarchal form of government, an autonomous, self-governing federation of dioceses under the jurisdiction of a chief bishop, called "patriarch," and his synod. There are six such patriarchates: Alexandria of the Copts (residence in Cairo), Alexandria-Antioch-Jerusalem of the Melkites (one titulary, resident in Damascus), Antioch of the Maronites (Bkerké, Lebanon), Antioch of the Syrians (Beirut), Babylon of the Chaldean (Baghdad), Cilicia of the Armenian (Beirut). The two largest Eastern Catholic churches, the Ukrainian and Syro-Malabar, have requested the Holy See to grant them patriarchal status. In 1994 the request had not yet been granted. See also Latin patriarchates; patriarch [ecclesiastical]; patriarchate.

Eastern Catholic religious, men and women belonging to religious orders or congregations of the Eastern Catholic churches. Such nonmonastic religious are a relatively modern development. Even today in the non-Catholic Eastern churches, the only form of religious life is the monastic. From the early seventeenth century onward in many Eastern Catholic churches the need was felt for religious personnel dedicated to preaching, religious instruction, and other pastoral and charitable works; these concerns and the example of apostolic work carried out by Western religious led to the foundation of new religious congregations. The first such institutes, based on native traditions, attempted to retain as many elements of monastic life as could be combined with a centralized structure and an active mission. Examples are the Ukrainian Basilians and the Lebanese Maronite order (Maronite Antonians), founded in 1695 and in 1770 divided into Baladites and Aleppites. Similar to these are the Chouerite and Salvatorian Basilians (Basilian Order of St. John the Baptist) among the Melkites, founded respectively in 1697 and 1707; the Chouerites since 1829 are divided like the Antonians into Baladites and Aleppites.

The object of these institutes was to serve their churches in parishes and otherwise. A Chouerite monk founded the first Arabic printing press in the Ottoman empire. These Maronite and Melkite religious have retained a strong imprint of Eastern monastic spirituality; eremitism is prominent among the Antonians. These congregations were long considered monastic, but after the publication in 1952 of the motu proprio of Pius XII, Postquam Apostolicis Litteris, promulgating canon law for religious in the Eastern churches, they were declared to be "nonmonastic religious orders" (December 16, 1955).

Recent Developments: Since the nineteenth century new congregations have arisen in all the Eastern Catholic churches, often closely influenced by Latin-rite congregations and devoted to similar works, active or contemplative. Numerous institutes exist, especially in the Syro-Malabar Church, such as the Congregations of Carmelite Brothers of the Immaculate Virgin Mary (founded 1855), the Sisters of Adoration of the Blessed Sacrament (founded 1908), the Franciscan Clarist Congregation of Kerala (founded 1888), and the Sisters of the Sacred Heart (founded 1976 through the fusion of three local institutes). Congregations in other Eastern Churches include the Bethany Sisters of the Syro-Malankar Church (founded 1925); the Sisters, Servants of the Immaculate Virgin, in the Ukrainian Catholic Church (founded 1892); the Society of Missionaries of St. Paul, founded in the nineteenth century on the model of the White Fathers, and the Congregation of Our Lady of Perpetual Help, founded in 1936, in the Melkite Church; in Romania the Sisters of the Holy Mother of God, founded in 1921, carried on an apostolate clandestinely under the Communist regime.

A number of Western congregations have Eastern-rite branches. Such are the Redemptorists and the Salesians, both of whom have branches serving the Ukrainian Catholic Church. Before 1948 the Assumptionists, the Brothers of the Christian Schools, the Conventual Franciscans, and the Jesuits had houses for their members of the Romanian Catholic Church. See also hermit; monasticism; religious; religious life; religious orders and congregations; religious profession.

SOPHIA SENYK

Eastern Catholic sanctoral, the calendar of saints commemorated liturgically in the Catholic Eastern rites. Some Eastern sanctorals still bear the traces of early liturgical calendars, when the cycle of celebrations was centered on the week, and not on fixed dates. The Chaldean calendar, for instance, traditionally has favored Fridays for the commemoration of saints, whereas the Armenian calendar excludes saints' feasts on Sundays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, which are dedicated to other commemorations. Such calendars now have a mixed system, with commemorations also on set dates. Though Eastern Catholics have generally accepted Western saints into their sanctoral—some, like the Maronites, on a massive scale—they did not immediately venerate those Eastern saints who had lived outside of the Roman communion after the separation of the churches that occurred gradually after 1054 and accelerated in the thirteenth century. The traditional cutoff point for the veneration of Orthodox saints was the rejection by the Orthodox of the Decree of Union at the Council of Florence (1439). The Decree had held that, although Latin and Greek saints expressed their faith differently, because they were saints they were always in substantial agreement with one another. Catholics in communion with Rome were thereby permitted to venerate such popular Orthodox saints as Sergius of Radonezh (d. 1392) because he had lived before the Orthodox rejection of the Decree of Union. Some Eastern Catholics, however, venerate Orthodox saints who lived long after the Florence date. See also Eastern churches; saints, devotion to.

ROBERT F. TAFT

Eastern Catholics and ecumenism, primarily the relationship between Eastern Catholics (groups of Orthodox Christians who have entered into union with the see of Rome beginning at the end of the sixteenth century) and their Orthodox counterparts in Eastern and Western Europe, the Middle East, and the Americas.

The Eastern Catholic churches originated in highly diverse circumstances. Except for the Maronites, they resulted from a split within an Eastern or Oriental Orthodox Church where one part became Catholic but retained most of its original liturgical, canonical, and theological tradition. In most cases this split was partially due to Catholic missionary activity among the Orthodox (sometimes with the support of Catholic governments controlling Orthodox populations), which gained momentum after the failure of the reunion Council of Florence (1438–45).

Although this policy, now known as uniatism, was intended to foster unity between Eastern and Western Christians, in fact it weakened the Orthodox churches and created new divisions within them. Thus the policy intensified a feeling among the Orthodox of being innocent victims of Catholic aggression.

For centuries most Eastern Catholics and Orthodox shared the isolation and mutual hostility that existed generally between the Catholic and Orthodox churches. It was only in the 1960s that Catholic-Orthodox relations began to improve.

Vatican II and Beyond: One of the documents of Vatican II, the Decree on Eastern Catholic Churches (Orientalium Ecclesiarum, 1964), said that Eastern Catholics have a special duty to promote unity among Eastern Christians by observing the principles set forth in the Decree on Ecumenism (Unitatis Redintegratio) and by remaining faithful to their authentic Eastern heritage.

Relations between Orthodox and Eastern Catholics improved after the council, particularly in parts of the Middle East and the diaspora (Western Europe and the Americas). However, many Orthodox continued to view the existence of the Catholic churches as a negation of their ecclesial reality and as instruments of Catholic proselytism. Some still called for the abolition of these churches as a precondition for any fruitful dialogue.

The collapse of Communism created new problems. Some of the largest Eastern Catholic churches, especially in Ukraine and Romania, had been suppressed and forced to become Orthodox by the Communists in the late 1940s. Consequently they were absent at Vatican II, and none of its documents was published in those countries. This, along with the perception that the Orthodox had collaborated with the Communists in their destruction, explains why, when Eastern Catholics emerged from the catacombs at the end of the 1980s, it was difficult for them to assume a positive attitude toward the Orthodox. Confrontations with Orthodox over repossessing the churches that had been taken from them at the time of the suppressions complicated the situation. Although Pope John Paul II has encouraged Eastern Catholics to adopt the conciliar ecumenical teachings, most agree that it will take time for such changes in attitude to take root.

All this has prompted the international Catholic-Orthodox theological dialogue, which had been in progress since 1980, to focus on the question of uniatism and the existence of the Byzantine Catholic churches. It has been elaborating a common position that rejects uniatism as a contemporary model for unity, while affirming the right of Eastern Catholic churches to exist in freedom. See also Decree on Eastern Catholic Churches; Eastern Catholics in the diaspora; Orthodox Christianity; uniatism.

RONALD G. ROBERSON

Eastern Catholics and Rome, the relationship between the papacy and those Eastern-rite Christians, pejoratively called "uniates," who entered into or renewed their union with Rome beginning with the Crusades (1095–1291), during the period of missionary expansion at the end of the fifteenth century, and during the period of Tridentine Catholicism (1563–1962).

History: Tensions between center and periphery, endemic to any large centralized system, have been especially acute between Rome and the Eastern Catholic churches. This history began with the Maronites during the Crusades and peaked with Jesuit attempts to enforce latinization of liturgy, ecclesiastical law, and structure on the Syro-Malabarians and Ethiopians in the sixteenth century. Ethiopia was closed to the Catholic Church for centuries, and large numbers of Syro-Malabar Catholics went into schism in 1653 to escape Jesuit domination. Roman policy toward the Catholic East was dominated, implicitly, by a sense of Latin superiority and tutelage mixed with support and help. The Roman approach to Eastern liturgical customs, canon law, and hierarchical structures and autonomy gradually evolved from latinization with tolerance of what could not be latinized, while safeguarding the "superiority" of the Latin rite, to, in the eighteenth century, genuine esteem and nurturing of the Eastern traditions, though still in a context of paternalism and control.

Such attitudes were not limited to the Latins. In fact, the Latins were more interested in submission than uniformity, and tolerated ritual diversity, which they considered secondary to submission.

The Byzantines, on the other hand, impugned Armenian and Latin uses at the Council in Trullo (692). During the azyme controversy, when the East regarded the Latin use of unleavened bread in the Eucharist as invalidating the rite, Patriarch Michael I Cerularius (1043–58) tried to impose Greek usages on the Latins in Constantinople, as he had done with the Armenians, and closed their churches when they refused.

Shift of Attitudes: A new era dawned with the bulls of Pope Benedict XIV, Etsi pastoralis (1742) and Demandatum caelitus (1743). Since that time there has been slow but consistent progress, despite setbacks encountered by Eastern Catholic hierarchs at Vatican Council I (1869–70) under Pope Pius IX.

In 1894 Benedict XIV's norms were restated and reinforced by Pope Leo XIII's Apostolic Constitution Orientalium dignitas, considered the Magna Carta of Eastern Catholicism. It shows great solicitude for the conservation and nurturing of the Eastern heritage, forbids all forms of latinization, and sets strict limits on the activities of Latins in the East. Since that time, this has been the official, if often ignored, teaching of the Holy See.

Vatican II (1962–65) opened another new chapter. Council Fathers spoke out in defense of an unambiguous affirmation of the autonomous patriarchal structure of the Eastern Catholic churches, of their right to rule their own affairs and to expand through missionary activity. Certain Eastern ideas advanced at the council remain unrealized in the post–Vatican II Church: a truly effective synodality, the provision of adequate hierarchical structures for the Eastern Catholic churches throughout the world, and the proposal that the Roman Curia assume its proper place within a healthy ecclesiology. See also Eastern churches. ROBERT F. TAFT Eastern Catholics and Vatican II. A new chapter in modern Catholic history was written when for the first time dissenting non-Latin voices were heard and heeded at a Church council, and when several council Fathers, Western and Eastern, spoke to defend the autonomous patriarchal structure of the Eastern Catholic churches and their right to rule their own affairs, and called for a more open approach to Orthodoxy as the "missing partner" at the council. The most electrifying interventions were those of the Melkite bishops, especially Patriarch Maximus IV. Maximus played a key role at Vatican II (1962–65). Speaking always with dignity and courtesy, but with great firmness and unambiguous clarity, he defended the Eastern heritage and argued for a Church that is catholic in reality and not just in name.

The Melkite bishops proposed many important items on the Vatican II and postconciliar agenda: liturgy in the vernacular, eucharistic concelebration, and Communion under both species (consecrated bread and consecrated wine); the permanent diaconate; the establishment of what ultimately became the Synod of Bishops held periodically in Rome, as well as the Secretariat (now Pontifical Council) for Christian Unity; new attitudes and a more ecumenical vocabulary for dealing with other Christians, especially with the Orthodox churches; the recognition of Eastern Catholic communities as "churches," rather than "rites." In the case of other Eastern Catholic churches, factors such as Communist persecution, insignificant numbers, or a latinized mentality rendered such changes unlikely, though individual bishops such as Ignatius Ziade, Maronite archbishop of Beirut, and Isaac Ghattas, Coptic Catholic bishop of Luxor-Thebes, gave voice at Vatican II to the aspirations of these churches. Their Eastern heritage enabled these bishops to distinguish what is essential (i.e., Catholic) from what is contingent (i.e., Latin) in Catholicism, and to witness to another, complementary way of seeing things as a counterbalance to Latin Catholic unilateralism.

Certain Eastern ideas advanced at the council remain unrealized in the post–Vatican II Church: that collegiality should be operative not just among bishops, but on the diocesan level, between the bishop and his presbyterate; that the laity, especially women, should be given their proper dignity and role in Church life; that adequate hierarchical structures be provided for Eastern Catholics worldwide; that a more compassionate approach, like the Orthodox "principle of economy," be taken regarding the remarriage of unjustly abandoned spouses; that the date of Easter be resolved in ecumenical agreement with other churches; that the Roman Curia assume its proper place within a healthy ecclesiology, no longer operating as a substitute for the College of Bishops or assuming the incommunicable powers that belong by divine right to the Bishop of Rome alone. See also Decree on Eastern Catholic Churches; Eastern churches; Maximus IV Sayegh; Vatican Council II. ROBERT F. TAFT

Eastern Catholics in North America, two groups: Catholics of Slavic origin and those of non-Slavic descent. Of the latter, there exist groups of Maronites, Melkites, Chaldeans, Romanians, Armenians, and Italo-Albanians.

Non-Slavic Eastern Catholics: The Maronites and Melkites emigrated from formerly Syrian Lebanon and today's Syria (hence the misleading term Syrian Greek Catholics, previously used for the Melkites in the United States). The Chaldeans mostly originate from Iraq. While the Melkites and Maronites speak Arabic, the Chaldeans speak Soureth, an Aramaic dialect. The first Middle Eastern emigrants arrived toward the end of the nineteenth century. They settled at first in the northeastern industrial centers and around Detroit and Chicago, although today they also live in other areas.

The Maronites are the most numerous after the Slavs, and constitute the only Eastern church that has no Orthodox counterpart. In 1993 they numbered about 53,000 with some fifty-four parishes. Originally under the jurisdiction of the local Latin bishops, they received a bishop of their own in 1962. Later in 1971, the diocese of St. Maron was created for them with its see first in Detroit and later in Brooklyn.

The Chaldeans are the Catholic counterpart of the Assyrian Church of the East. Their union dates from the sixteenth century when this church of the Nestorian Christological tradition split over the question of the rights of succession to the patriarchate. Some emigrated at the end of the last century; others more recently were forced to leave as a result of the Kurdo-Iraqi war of the 1960s and 1970s. In 1985 the diocese of St. Thomas the Apostle of Detroit of the Chaldeans was created for them. In 1993 they numbered about 52,000 in some fourteen parishes.

Unlike other Middle Eastern Christians, the Melkites, like the Slavs, are of the Byzantine rite. As a church with its own particular customs and jurisdictional structure, they have been in communion with Rome since the eighteenth century. Their Orthodox counterpart is the patriarchate of Antioch. Mostly prosperous merchants in the Middle East, where they still form the largest Catholic community, they founded their first church in Brooklyn. One time heavily latinized and under the control of the local Latin hierarchy, they began to rapidly rediscover their ecclesiastical identity during Vatican II. They have made great strides. In 1966 they received their own bishop. In 1976 the separate diocese of Newton, Massachusetts, was created for their faithful who in 1993 numbered 26,500 in forty-four parishes.

In the United States in 1993, there were about 38,500 Armenian Catholics divided among six parishes. Since 1972 they are under the jurisdiction of an apostolic visitor. In 1981, an apostolic exarchate was created for them and they received their own bishop. The Romanian Catholics are non-Slavic Byzantines, who mostly emigrated from what was Hungarian Transylvania before the First World War. Their first parish in the United States dates from 1916; their first fraternal organization from 1919. As of 1993 they numbered only about 5,000 faithful in sixteen parishes. After repeated requests, they were granted an apostolic visitor in 1975, who resigned two years later. In 1987 the diocese of St George of Canton of the Romanians was established for them in Ohio. Many third-generation Romanian Americans have become members of Roman Catholic parishes.

Although Latin-rite Albanians have a few ethnic parishes in the United States, the Italo-Albanians, or Arberesh of the Byzantine rite, were assimilated into the Italo-American community and have no parish of their own.

Slavic Eastern Catholics: Eastern-rite Catholics of Slavic descent in the United States derive mainly from the mass emigration of eastern Slavs from both sides of the Carpathian mountains, within the Austro-Hungarian Empire. This began at the end of the 1870s and continued until the First World War. They settled mostly in the industrial centers on the East Coast and in the mining areas of Pennsylvania. Known collectively at first as Ruthenians, some of them retained this name; others eventually identified themselves as Russians, Ukrainians, Carpatho-Russians, Slovaks, and Carpatho-Rusyns.

From the beginning, church affairs among them were troubled. Internal difficulties included lay control of the parishes, disciplinary problems among the clergy, and growing disputes regarding ethnic identity. External problems stemmed from the lack of comprehension with which they and their clergy were met by otherwise capable members of the local Roman Catholic hierarchy. Particularly irksome to the American bishops, many of whom wished to integrate their faithful into American society, was the married status of the Ruthenian clergymen. Likewise, most of the Ruthenian clergymen did not willingly sever jurisdictional ties with bishops of their rite in Europe.

In 1891, Alexis Toth, a Ruthenian Catholic priest from Hungary, was refused permission to function as a priest in the archdiocese of St. Paul, Minnesota, by Archbishop John Ireland and entered the Russian Orthodox Church, which eagerly accepted the new convert together with his parish. His example was followed by 25,000 Ruthenian Catholics and later by more than 200,000 others. This caused the Orthodox Church in America to grow at the expense of Eastern Catholicism. In 1907, Soter Ortynsky, a Basilian monk, was appointed the first bishop for the Ruthenian Greek Catholics in America. The appointment of Ortynsky, a Galician, exacerbated ethnic sensibilities between the Ruthenians from Hungary who rejected him as a foreigner and those from Polish culturally dominated Galicia, who began to consider themselves Ukrainians. In 1916 two administrators were appointed. In 1924 two exarchates were created, with separate bishops for Ukrainians and Ruthenians. Property disputes caused a second wave of difficulties, while in 1929 many more left the Catholic Church when the decree of the Holy See Cum Data Fuerit was promulgated, obliging celibacy for the Ruthenian clergy in the United States.

In 1993 the Ukrainians numbered about 145,400. They have a metropolitan in Philadelphia, four dioceses, and 206 parishes. They are less Americanized than the Ruthenian group because a new wave of emigration after the Second World War added to their numbers and increased their ethnic consciousness. In 1993 the Ruthenians were estimated at about 243,800 faithful in four dioceses and 258 parishes, headed by a metropolitan with his see near Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. Among them are groups of ethnic Hungarians, Slovaks, and Croatians.

Russian Catholics have three parishes under the jurisdiction of the local American hierarchy in New York, San Francisco, and Los Angeles. There is also a Belorussian parish in Chicago.

Eastern Catholics in Canada: In Canada the Ukrainians are strongest, with about 202,000 faithful (as of 1993), followed by the Maronites and Melkites. The Ukrainians settled mostly in the Western provinces and in Toronto. There is no Ruthenian counterpart in Canada, but there does exist a more ethnically conscious group of Slovak Catholics of the Byzantine rite who (in 1993) numbered about 30,000 and have their own diocese. See also Armenian Catholic Church; Chaldean Catholic Church; Italo-Albanian Catholic Church; Maronite Catholic Church; Melkite Catholic Church; Ruthenian Catholic Church; Slovak Byzantine Catholic Church; Ukrainian Catholic Church.

Bibliography

Attwater, Donald. The Christian Churches of the East. Milwaukee, WI: Bruce Publishing, 1961.

Magocsi, Paul Robert. Our People; Carpatho-Rusyns and their Descendants in North America. Toronto: Multicultural History Society of Ontario, 1984.

Procko, Bohdan P. Ukrainian Catholics in America. Washington, DC: University Press of America, 1982.

Roberson, Ronald G. The Eastern Christian Churches. Rome: Pontificium Institutum Studiorum Orientalium, 1990.

CONSTANTINE SIMON

Eastern Catholics in the diaspora, Eastern Catholics who have emigrated from their historic homelands in eastern Europe and the Middle East. Virtually all of the Eastern Catholic churches have experienced emigration of their faithful, especially to the Americas. Where these new communities are small, Catholics of the various Eastern traditions remain under the pastoral care of local Latin bishops. However, where numbers warrant, the Holy See through the Congregation for the Oriental Churches has erected special ecclesiastical jurisdictions for Eastern Catholics so that they may be able to preserve their own heritage.

As of 1993, eight Eastern Catholic churches had dioceses outside the region of their historic homeland. The Maronites had dioceses in Argentina, Brazil, the United States, Australia, and Canada for 1,400,000 diaspora faithful. Melkite jurisdictions had been set up in Brazil, the United States, Canada, Mexico, Australia, and Venezuela to cover almost 500,000 members. The Ukrainian diaspora numbering over 700,000 had eparchies in the United States, Canada, Great Britain, Australia, Germany, France, Brazil, and Argentina. For the approximately 110,000 Armenians there were jurisdictions in France, Greece, Argentina, the rest of Latin America, Romania, and the United States. The Romanians (5,000), Ruthenians (243,000), and Chaldeans (52,000) had diaspora dioceses only in the United States, and the Slovaks only in Canada (30,000).

Eastern churches, those Christian churches of Eastern rite that had their origins in the eastern half of the Roman Empire, or beyond the Empire's eastern frontiers in Armenia, Mesopotamia within the Persian Empire, Ethiopia, and the Malabar Coast of southwest India. In the course of history, theological and jurisdictional controversies led these churches into separation from the Western or Latin Catholic Church: the East Syrian Church of Mesopotamia after the Council of Ephesus in 431; the Armenian, Syrian, Coptic, and Ethiopian churches following the Council of Chalcedon in 451, and the Byzantine Orthodox Church via a process of gradual estrangement that was consummated during the Crusades.

Several unsuccessful attempts were made to heal this breach, most notably at the councils of Lyons II (1274) and Florence (1439). The Maronite Church—it is the only Eastern church that is exclusively Catholic, with no Orthodox counterpart—reaffirmed its communion with Rome in the Middle Ages, after coming into contact with the Crusaders, and since the end of the sixteenth century small groups of faithful from all the other churches have entered, in some cases under political duress, into union with Rome to constitute the Eastern Catholic churches, sometimes called "uniates," a term now considered pejorative. See also uniatism.

Eastern Code of Canon Law. See Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches.

Eastern liturgies, the seven liturgical traditions or "Eastern rites" in use in the Orthodox and Eastern Catholic churches: Armenian, Byzantine, Coptic, Ethiopian, East (Assyro-Chaldean) and West (Antiochene) Syrian, and Maronite. Eastern liturgies are notable because of their length; because of their frequent use of incense; because they are always sung; and because parts of the service are hidden from view within a sanctuary enclosed by a curtain or barrier. The sumptuousness of their symbolism, vestments, and ceremonial—the beauty of their chant, and the rich iconography of their churches—combine to make an almost overwhelming sensible impact on the worshiper. On a deeper, interior level, these rites are characterized by their transcendental, eschatological spirit and profound sense of mystery and awe; by the richly developed trinitarian, Christological, and Marian theology of their prayers and hymns; and by their strong monastic stamp.

In the first seven centuries of Christianity, before the Islamic conquests, Eastern liturgies underwent notable growth and development, paralleling the growth of the Church and the need to respond to the theological problems of the time. Western Christianity was much less dynamic in this early period, and its liturgies more conservative. The widespread notion that Eastern liturgies almost always reflect an older, apostolic form of Christian worship is unfounded. See also Eastern rites; liturgy; rite.

Eastern rites, the distinct liturgical families or traditions of the Eastern Christian churches and the spiritual heritage of which these liturgical traditions are the supreme—but not the only—ecclesial expression. Like the Roman rite, most Eastern rites are composite traditions that synthesize various strains of influence. In the first seven centuries of Christianity, before the Islamic conquests, Eastern Christianity was preeminent intellectually and culturally, developing a rich and theologically sophisticated patristic literature especially in Greek, Syriac, and Armenian. The liturgies of these churches still reflect the trinitarian, Christological, and Marian theological controversies and subtleties of that epoch, as well as the later influence of medieval monasticism. As intermediate church structures developed after the fourth century, uniting scattered local churches in one geographical area into ecclesial federations usually called patriarchates or catholicosates, the diverse liturgical usages within these zones of jurisdiction were gradually consolidated to form the present Eastern rites. The principal church centers of the Eastern Empire that were most influential in the process of unifying local usages into the seven extant rites were Constantinople for the Byzantine rite, Alexandria and later the desert monasteries in Egypt for the Coptic rite, Antioch and Jerusalem for the West Syrian and Maronite rites, and Edessa for the Chaldean, Maronite, and Armenian rites. Other rites, formed outside the limits of the empire but influenced by the great imperial sees combined with native elements, include the Armenian rite, which originated in usages from Syriac Mesopotamia and Greek Cappadocia; the Ethiopian rite from Alexandria and Syria; and the East Syrian rite from Edessa, a Mesopotamian metropolis within the Empire, and Nisibis and Seleucia-Ctesiphon in Persian Mesopotamia.

Before Vatican II (1962–65) the term "rite" was used by Catholics as a synecdoche for the ecclesial communion to which one belongs canonically. Thus, one spoke of "changing rites," or of "belonging to" a rite. This gave the false impression that Eastern ecclesial traditions differ from the Latin only in ritual; since Vatican II the term Ecclesia sui iuris (Lat.), i.e., a distinct church with its own ecclesial heritage and self-government, is used to denote all churches of the Catholic communion, including the Latin. See also Eastern churches; rite.

ROBERT F. TAFT

Eastern Schism, the common, if inaccurate, term used to denote the interruption of ecclesial communion between the Eastern and Western churches, especially the separation between the Eastern, i.e., Byzantine Orthodox, and Western, i.e., Latin Catholic churches. The first divisions were provoked by the Christological disputes of the fifth century. The Assyrian Church of the East was separated following the condemnation of Nestorianism at the Council of Ephesus in 431, and the Oriental Orthodox churches (Armenian, Coptic, Ethiopian, Syrian Orthodox) in the aftermath of the condemnation of Monophysitism by the Council of Chalcedon in 451. The division between the two great churches of the Eastern and Western Empire, the Byzantine and Latin, was a process of slow estrangement with several periods of tension (such as the so-called Photian Schism in the mid-ninth century and the Schism of Michael Cerularius in 1054), but was not consummated until the Crusades (1095–1291) and the Orthodox rejection of the Decree of Union of the Council of Florence (1439).

Though generally called "the Eastern Schism" in Western writings, responsibilities for the breach were shared. The West's share consisted mainly in confronting the East in the eighth and ninth centuries with an expanding concept of papal authority, the establishment during the Crusades of Latin hierarchies in traditionally Eastern Christian territories in competition with already existing Eastern churches, and the Latin conquest and occupation of Constantinople in the Fourth Crusade (1204–61). The Orthodox were responsible for similar aggressions, such as the Byzantine conquest of Italy (535–53) and the annexing of Sicily to the patriarchate of Constantinople, the incorporation of Illyricum into the patriarchate of Constantinople in the ninth century, and pogroms against the Latins at Constantinople shortly before the Fourth Crusade.

In the centuries following the failure of Florence these divisions were exacerbated by Catholic proselytism, especially during the era of missionary expansion from the sixteenth century, and by the creation, sometimes with the help of the secular arm, of "uniate" churches via the incorporation of sections of Eastern churches into the Roman communion. On the Orthodox side there was the persecution of the Catholic Church in areas, like Poland, that fell under Russian domination in the partitions of 1772–1815. Since Vatican II (1962–65) the Catholic and Orthodox churches are coming once again, gradually and with many setbacks along the way, to recognize one another as "sister churches" already in partial, if imperfect, communion. See also Crusades; Florence, Council of; schism; unity of the Church.

ROBERT F. TAFT

Easter Vigil, a nocturnal vigil or watch, the third part of the Easter Triduum of the Passion and Resurrection, celebrating Christ's victory over death, held on Holy Saturday night. Dating from at least mid-second century, this is one of the oldest Christian celebrations. This "mother of all vigils" (Augustine, Sermon 219) is a culmination of the entire Church year, an encapsulation of the Paschal Mystery and a rehearsal of salvation history in word and song.

By the third century, and especially in the fourth, the vigil was the primary time for initiation in many churches; the newly baptized stood as living icons of the resurrected Christ. Gradually the lighting and blessing of the new fire and paschal candle were introduced.

The Easter Vigil today consists of a brief light service, a service of the word, solemn Baptism and Confirmation, and Eucharist. The Roman Missal directs that the vigil take place after nightfall and end before dawn. The light service, derived from the ancient practice of evening lamplighting, proclaims that Christ is Light through the lighting and blessing of the new fire, paschal candle, and the Easter proclamation, the Exsultet. Seven readings from the Hebrew Scriptures (two are required, one of which is Easter Vigil Mass, during the light service when all hold a lighted candle to proclaim that Christ is the Light of the World.

Exod 14), with psalmic responses and collects, form the service of the word. The Gloria follows the last reading, and the Eucharist begins with the normal Liturgy of the Word. The 1969 ordo changed Pope Pius XII's 1955 revision, in which the vigil including Baptism preceded the Eucharist. The 1955 rites better emphasized the vigil aspect of the service. The baptismal rites include the litany of saints, blessing of the water, renunciation of Satan and profession of faith, water baptism, clothing with a white garment, giving of the Christ-light, and Confirmation. The congregation renews their baptismal promises in solidarity with the newly initiated. The Eucharist proceeds as usual with proper texts for the day. See also Easter; Holy Week; Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults. JOHN A. MELLOH

East Syrian rite, liturgical tradition of the Chaldean and Syro-Malabar Catholic churches, and of the corresponding Orthodox church, the Holy Apostolic Catholic Assyrian Church of the East, from which the rite derives. This church, sometimes called "Nestorian," separated from the other churches over the condemnation of Nestorianism at the Council of Ephesus in 431. The rite, which originated among Syriac-speaking Christians in the Mesopotamian church under the Persian Empire, is celebrated in the Eastern variant of classical Syriac.

The Mesopotamian church was centered in the catholicosate of Seleucia-Ctesiphon on the Tigris River, about thirty miles south of Baghdad, Iraq. A synod held there in 410 unified the liturgical usages of Mesopotamia to form the basis for this rite. Rich in ecclesiastical poetry by famous Syriac Fathers like Ephraem (d. 373), Marutha of Maipharkat (d. ca. 420), Narsai (d. 502), Babai the Great (d. 628), this rite is noted for the pure spirit of adoration expressed in prayers that ask for nothing but the privilege of glorifying God. The rite underwent several adjustments throughout history, most notably the reform under Catholicos Isho Yahb III at the Upper Monastery of Mar Gabriel on the Tigris, in Mosul, in 650–51. The Liturgy of the Hours has preserved the combination of cathedral and monastic usages synthesized in this monastery, and the chief eucharistic prayer, the Liturgy of Addai and Mari, is one of the most ancient Christian liturgical texts still in use.

Medieval liturgical commentaries enrich our understanding of this tradition and its history, and notable liturgical compositions continued through the thirteenth century. The liturgical disposition of the church building was distinguished by an enclosed sanctuary reserved to the eucharistic anaphora (the central eucharistic prayer), and a bema, or large platform, in the center of the church where the Liturgy of the Word and other offices were celebrated. See also Chaldean Catholic Church; Syro-Malabar Catholic Church. ROBERT F. TAFT

