III. Paul's visit to Jerusalem; a short visit it was. He came by sea to the port that lay next to Jerusalem. He sailed from Ephesus (v. 21), and landed at Cæsarea, v. 22. He went up, and saluted the church, by which, I think, is plainly meant the church at Jerusalem. It was a very friendly visit that he made them, in pure kindness to testify his hearty goodwill to them. The increase of our new friends should not make us forget our old ones, but it should be a pleasure to good men, to revive former acquaintance. He took care to keep up a good correspondence with them, that they might both congratulate and wish well to one another's comfort and success. It was but a short visit. He went up, and saluted them, and made no stay among them. It was designed but for a transient interview. God's people are dispersed and scattered; yet it is good to see one another sometimes.

IV. His return through those countries where he had formerly preached the gospel. He went and spent some time in Antioch, whence he was first sent out to preach among the Gentiles, ch. xiii. 1. He went down to Antioch, to refresh himself with the sight of the ministers there; and a very good refreshment it is to a faithful minister to have for awhile the society of his brethren. Thence he went over the country of Galatia and Phrygia in order, where he had preached the gospel, and planted churches. These country churches (for such they were, Gal. i. 2, and we read not of any city in Galatia where a church was) Paul visited in order as they lay, watering what he had been instrumental to plant, and strengthening all the disciples. Paul's countenancing them was encouraging them; but that was not all: he preached that to them which strengthened them. Disciples need to be strengthened. Ministers must do what they can to strengthen them by directing them to Christ, whose strength is perfected in their weakness.

Verses 24-28

The sacred history leaves Paul upon his travels, and goes here to meet Apollos at Ephesus.

I. Here is an account of his character.

1. He was a Jew, born at Alexandria in Egypt, but of Jewish parents.

2. He was a man well fitted for public service. He was an eloquent man, and mighty in the scriptures. He had a great command of language: He came to Ephesus, being mighty in the scriptures, having an excellent faculty of expounding scripture. He was not only ready in the scriptures, able to quote texts offhand, and tell you where to find them, but he was mighty in the scriptures. He understood the sense and meaning of them, he knew how to make use of them and to apply them, how to reason out of the scriptures, and to reason strongly.

3. He was instructed in the way of the Lord; that is, he had some acquaintance with the doctrine of Christ, had obtained some general notions of the gospel and the principles of Christianity. He was taught something of Christ and the way of salvation by him. Those that are to teach others must first be themselves taught the word of the Lord, not only to talk of it, but to walk in it. It is not enough to have our tongues tuned to the word of the Lord, but we must have our feet directed into the way of the Lord.

4. Yet he knew only the baptism of John. He knew the preparing of the way of the Lord, rather than the way of the Lord itself. He had himself been baptized

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

—there, but he himself entered into the synagogue—merely taking advantage of the vessel putting in there. and reasoned with the Jews—the tense here not being the usual one denoting continuous action (as in ch. 17:2; 18:4), but that expressing a transient act. He had been forbidden to preach the word in Asia (ch. 16:6), but he would not consider that as precluding this passing exercise of his ministry when Providence brought him to its capital; nor did it follow that the prohibition was still in force. 20. when they desired him to tarry—The Jews seldom rose against the Gospel till the successful preaching of it stirred them up, and there was no time for that here. 21. I must . . . keep this feast—probably Pentecost, presenting a noble opportunity of preaching the Gospel. but I will return—the fulfilment of which promise is recorded in ch. 19:1.

22. And when he had landed at Cæsarea—where he left the vessel. and gone up—i.e., to Jerusalem—and saluted the church—In these few words does the historian despatch the apostle's FOURTH VISIT TO JERUSALEM after his conversion. The expression "going up" is invariably used of a journey to the metropolis; and thence he naturally "went down to Antioch." Perhaps the vessel reached too late for the feast, as he seems to have done nothing in Jerusalem beyond "saluting the Church," and privately offering the sacrifice with which his vow (vs. 18) would conclude. It is left to be understood, as on his arrival from his first missionary tour, that "when he was come, and had gathered the church together, he rehearsed all that God had done with him" (ch. 14:27) on this his second missionary journey.

23. Ch. 21:16. PAUL'S THIRD AND LAST MISSIONARY JOURNEY—HE VISITS THE CHURCHES OF GALATIA AND PHRYGIA. and after he had spent some time there—but probably not long. he departed—little thinking, probably, he was never more to return to Antioch. went over all . . . Galatia and Phrygia in order—visiting the several churches in succession. See on ch. 16:6. Galatia is mentioned first here, as he would come to it first from Antioch. It was on this visitation that he ordained the weekly collection (I Cor. 16:1, 2), which has been since adopted generally, and converted into a public usage throughout Christendom. Timotheus and Erastus, Gaius and Aristarchus, appear to have accompanied him on this journey (ch. 19:22, 29; II Cor. 1: 1), and from II Corinthians we may presume, Titus also. The details of this visit, as of the former (ch. 16:6), are not given.

24-28. EPISODE CONCERNING APOLLOS AT EPHESUS AND IN ACHAIA. This is one of the most interesting and suggestive incidental narratives in this precious history. 24, 25, a . . . Jew named Apollos—a contraction from Apollonius. born at Alexandria—the celebrated city of Egypt on the south-eastern shore of the Mediterranean, called after its founder, Alexander the Great. Nowhere was there such a fusion of Greek, Jewish, and Oriental peculiarities, and an intelligent Jew educated in that city could hardly fail to manifest all these elements in his mental character. eloquent—turning his Alexandrian culture to high account. and mighty in the scriptures—his eloquence enabling him to express clearly and enforce skilfully what, as a Jew, he had gathered from a diligent study of the Old Testament Scriptures. came to Ephesus—on what errand is not known. This man was instructed in the way of the Lord . . . knowing only the baptism of John—He was instructed, probably, by some disciple of the Baptist, in the whole circle of John's teaching concerning Jesus, but no more: he had yet to learn the new light which the outpouring of the Spirit at Pentecost had thrown upon the Redeemer's death and resurrection; as appears from ch. 19:2, 3.

ADAM CLARKE

likely that it was at Cenchrea that Paul took shipping for Syria, as it would be more convenient for him and a shorter passage to embark at Cenchrea in order to go by the Aegean Sea to Syria than to embark at the Lecheum and sail down into the Mediterranean.

19. He came to Ephesus. Where it appears he spent but one Sabbath. It is supposed that Paul left Aquila and Priscilla at this place, and that he went on alone to Jerusalem, for it is certain they were at Ephesus when Apollos arrived there. See vv. 24 and 26. Ephesus was, at the time in which Paul visited it, one of the most flourishing cities of Asia Minor. It abounded with the most eminent orators and philosophers in the world, and was adorned with the most splendid buildings. Here was that famous temple of Diana, reputed one of the seven wonders of the world. This city is now under the dominion of the Turks and is in a state of almost entire ruin.

21. I must . . . keep this feast. Most likely the Passover, at which he wished to attend for the purpose of seeing many of his friends and having the most favorable opportunity to preach the gospel to thousands who would attend at Jerusalem on that occasion. The whole of this clause, I must by all means keep this feast that cometh in Jerusalem, is wanting in some MSS. Without this clause the verse will read thus: "But he bade them farewell, saying, I will return again unto you, if God will." And this he did before the expiration of that same year, chap. xix. 1, and spent three years with them, chap. xx. 31, extending and establishing the church at that place.

22. Landed at Caesarea. This must have been Caesarea in Palestine. Gone up. To Jerusalem, though the name is not mentioned; but this is a common form of speech in the Evangelists, Jerusalem being always meant when this expression was used. For the word "to go up" is often used absolutely to signify "to go to Jerusalem"; e.g., "Go ye up unto this feast: I go not up yet," John vii. 8; "But when his brethren were gone up, then went he also up unto the feast," v. 10; "There were certain Greeks . . . that came up to worship," John xii. 20. Saluted the church. That is, the church at Jerusalem, called emphatically The church because it was the first church—the mother or apostolic church; and from it all other Christian churches proceeded. Went down to Antioch. That is, Antioch in Syria, as the word is generally to be understood when without addition; so Caesarea is always to be understood Caesarea in Palestine when without the addition of "Philippi."

23. In order. Kathexes, a word peculiar to Luke. See his Gospel, chap. i. 1; viii. 1; and his history of the Acts, chap. iii. 24; xi. 4, and the place above—the only places where this word occurs in the New Testament. It properly signifies "in order, distinctly, particularly." If Paul went up to Jerusalem at this time, which we are left to infer, for Luke has not expressed it (v. 22), it was his fourth journey thither.

24. A certain Jew named Apollos. It is strange that we should find a Jew, not only with a Roman name, as Aquila, an "eagle," but with the name of one of the false gods, as Apollos. Born at Alexandria. This was a celebrated city of Egypt built by Alexander the Great, from whom it took its name. It was seated on the Mediterranean Sea. It was in this city that Ptolemy Soter founded the famous academy called the Museum, in which a society of learned men devoted themselves to philosophical studies. Some of the most celebrated schools of antiquity flourished here; and here was the Tower of Pharos, esteemed one of the seven wonders of the world. An eloquent man. Having strong rhetorical powers; highly cultivated, no doubt, in the Alexandrian schools. Mighty in the scriptures. Thoroughly acquainted with the law and prophets, and well skilled in the Jewish method of interpreting them.

25. This man was instructed in the way of the Lord. He was "catechized," initiated, in the way, the "doctrine," of Jesus as the Christ.

MATTHEW HENRY

only with the baptism of John, but was not baptized with the Holy Ghost.

II. We have here the employment and improvement of his gifts at Ephesus.

1. He there made a very good use of his gifts in public. He was willing to be employed (v. 25): Being fervent in the Spirit, he spoke and taught diligently the things of the Lord. Though he had not the miraculous gifts of the Spirit, he made use of the gifts he had. We have seen how Apollos was qualified with a good head and a good tongue: he was an eloquent man, and mighty in the scriptures. Let us now see what he had further to recommend him as a preacher; and his example is recommended to the imitation of all preachers. He was a lively affectionate preacher; he had a good heart; he was fervent in Spirit. He had in him a great deal of divine fire as well as divine light. This appeared both in his forwardness to preach when he was called to it, and in his fervency in his preaching. He preached as one in earnest, and that had his heart in his work. Many are fervent in spirit, but are weak in knowledge, and, on the other hand, many are eloquent enough, and mighty in the scriptures, but they have no life or fervency. Here was a complete man of God, full both of divine knowledge and of divine affections. He was an industrious laborious preacher. He spoke and taught diligently. He took pains in his preaching, and he did not offer that to God, or to the synagogue, that either cost nothing or cost him nothing. He taught diligently, accurately, exactly; everything he said was well-weighed. He was an evangelical preacher. Though he knew only the baptism of John, yet that was the beginning of the gospel of Christ, and to that he kept close; for he taught the things of the Lord Christ, the things that tended to make way for him. He was a courageous preacher: He began to speak boldly in the synagogue, as one who, having put confidence in God, did not fear the face of man. In the synagogue, where the Jews not only were present, but had power, there he preached the things of God.

2. He there made a good increase of his gifts. Aquila and Priscilla expounded to him the way of God more perfectly. Aquila and Priscilla heard him preach in the synagogue. They encouraged his ministry, by a diligent and constant attendance upon it. Thus young ministers, that are hopeful, should be countenanced by grown Christians. Finding him defective in his knowledge of Christianity, they took him to them and expounded to him the way of God more perfectly. They did not despise him themselves, or disparage him to others; did not call him a young raw preacher, not fit to come into a pulpit. They communicated what they knew to him, and gave him a clear, methodical account of those things which before he had but confused notions of. See an instance of truly Christian charity in Aquila and Priscilla. Aquila did not undertake to speak in the synagogue, because he had not such gifts for public work as Apollos had; but he furnished Apollos with matter, and then left him to clothe it with acceptable words. Instructing young Christians and young ministers privately in conversation is a piece of very good service. See an instance of great humility in Apollos. He was a very bright young man, of great parts and learning, and one mightily cried up and followed; and yet, finding that Aquila and Priscilla could speak intelligently and experimentally of the things of God, though they were but mechanics, he was glad to receive instructions from them, to be shown by them his defects and mistakes. Young scholars may gain a great deal by converse with old Christians, as young students in the law may by old practitioners. Apollos, though he was instructed in the way of the Lord, did not rest in the knowledge he had attained. Those that know much should covet to know more. Here is an instance of a good woman doing good with the knowledge God had given her in private converse.

III. Here is his preferment to the service of the church of Corinth. Paul had set the wheels a-going at Corinth. Many were stirred up by his preaching to receive the gospel, and they needed to be confirmed. Paul was gone and now there was a fair occasion in this vacancy for Apollos to set in, who was fitted rather to water than to plant. His call to this service. He himself inclined to do: He was disposed to pass into Achaia. Apollos thought there might be some work for him, and God disposed his mind that way. His friends encouraged him to go; they gave him letters of recommendation. Though those at Ephesus had a great loss of his labours, they did not grudge those in Achaia the benefit of them; but, on the contrary, used their interest in them to introduce him. His success in this service. Believers were greatly edified: He helped those much who had believed through grace. Those who believe in Christ, it is through grace that they believe; it is not of themselves, it is being fervent in the spirit—His heart warm, and conscious, probably, of his gifts and attainments, he burned to impart to others the truth he had himself received. he spake and taught diligently—rather, 'accurately' (it is the same word as is rendered "perfectly" in vs. 26).

26. speak boldly in the synagogue, whom when Aquila and Priscilla heard—joying to observe the extent of Scripture knowledge and evangelical truth which he displayed, and the fervency, courage, and eloquence with which he preached the truth. they took him unto them—privately—and expounded unto him the way of God more perfectly—opening up those truths, to him as yet unknown, on which the Spirit had shed such glorious light. (In what appears to be the true reading of this verse, Priscilla is put before Aquila, as in vs. 18, on which see; she being probably the more intelligent and devoted of the two.) One cannot but observe how providential it was that this couple should have been left at Ephesus when Paul sailed thence for Syria; and no doubt it was chiefly to pave the way for the better understanding of this episode that the fact is expressly mentioned by the historian in vs. 19. We see here also an example of not only lay agency (as it is called), but female agency of the highest kind and with the most admirable fruit. Nor can one help admiring the humility and teachableness of so gifted a teacher in sitting at the feet of a Christian woman and her husband.

27, 28. And when he was disposed—'minded,' 'resolved'—to pass into Achaia—of which Corinth, on the opposite coast (see on vs. 1), was the capital; there to proclaim that Gospel which he now more fully comprehended. the brethren—We had not before heard of such gathered at Ephesus. But the desire of the Jews to whom Paul preached to retain him among them for some time (vs. 20), and his promise to return to them (vs. 21), seem to indicate some drawing towards the Gospel, which, no doubt, the zealous private labors of Priscilla and Aquila would ripen into discipleship. wrote, exhorting the disciples to receive him—a beautiful specimen of 'letters of recommendation' (as ch. 15: 23, 25-27, and see II Cor. 3:1); by which, as well as by interchange of deputations, etc., the early churches maintained active Christian fellowship with each other. when he was come, helped them much—was a great acquisition to the Achaian brethren. which believed through grace—one of those incidental expressions which show that faith's being a production of God's grace in the heart was so current and recognized a truth that it was taken for granted, as a necessary consequence of the general system of grace, rather than expressly insisted on. (It is against the natural order of the words to read them, as BENGEL, MEYER, and others, do, 'helped through grace those who believed.')

ADAM CLARKE

Being fervent in the spirit. Being full of zeal to propagate the truth of God, he taught diligently, "accurately" (so the word should be translated), the things of Christ as far as he could know them through the ministry of John the Baptist; for it appears he knew nothing more of Christ than what John preached.

TODAY'S DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE:

Apollos, a Jew "born at Alexandria," a man well versed in the Scriptures and eloquent (Acts 18:24; NIV, "learned"). He came to Ephesus (about A.D. 49), where he spake "boldly" in the synagogue (18:26), although he did not know as yet that Jesus of Nazareth was the Messiah. Aquila and Priscilla instructed him more perfectly in "the way of God"—i.e., in the knowledge of Christ. He then proceeded to Corinth, where he met Paul (Acts 18:27; 19:1). Very useful in watering the good seed Paul had sown (1 Cor. 1:12), he was instrumental in leading many to Christ. His disciples were much attached to him (1 Cor. 3:4-7, 22). He was with Paul at Ephesus when he wrote the First Epistle to the Corinthians; and Paul makes kindly reference to him in his letter to Titus (3:13). Some have supposed that he was the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews.

26. They took him unto them. This "eloquent man, and mighty in the scriptures," who was even a public teacher, was not ashamed to be indebted to the instructions of a Christian woman, in matters that concerned not only his own salvation but also the work of the ministry in which he was engaged.

27. When he was disposed to pass into Achaia. There is a very long and important addition here in the Codex Bezae, of which the following is a translation: "But certain Corinthians, who sojourned at Ephesus, and heard him, entreated him to pass over with them to their country. Then, when he had given his consent, the Ephesians wrote to the disciples at Corinth, that they should receive this man. Who, when he was come . . ."

Which had believed through grace. These words may refer either to Apollo or to the people at Corinth. It was through grace that they had believed, and it was through grace that Apollo was enabled to help them much.

MATTHEW HENRY

God's gift to them. Those who through grace do believe, yet still have need of help. Faithful ministers are capable of being in many ways helpful to those who through grace do believe, and it is their business to help them. Unbelievers were greatly mortified. Their objections were fully answered, their mouths were stopped, and their faces filled with shame (v. 28): He mightily convinced the Jews, and that publicly. He did it earnestly, he took pains to do it. He did it effectually and to universal satisfaction. If the Jews were but convinced of this—that Jesus is Christ, even their own law would teach them to hear him. The business of ministers is to preach Christ. The way he took to convince them was by the scriptures; thence he fetched his arguments. Ministers must be able not only to preach the truth, but to prove it and defend it, and to convince gainsayers with meekness and yet with power.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

For he mightily convinced the Jews—The word is very strong: 'stoutly bore them down in argument,' 'vigorously argued them down', and the tense implies that he continued to do it, or that this was the characteristic of his ministry. showing by the scriptures that Jesus was Christ—Rather, that the Christ (or Messiah) was Jesus. This expression, when compared with vs. 25, seems to imply a richer testimony than with his partial knowledge he was at first able to bear; and the power with which he bore down all opposition in argument is that which made him such an acquisition to the brethren. Thus his ministry would be as good as another visitation to the Achaian churches by the apostle himself (see I Cor. 3:6) and the more as, in so far as he was indebted for it to Priscilla and Aquila, it would have a decidedly Pauline cast.

ADAM CLARKE

28. He mightily convinced the Jews. "He vehemently confuted" the Jews; and that publickly, not in private conferences, but in his public preaching; shewing by the scriptures of the Old Testament, which the Jews received as divinely inspired, that Jesus, who had lately appeared among them and whom they had crucified, was the Christ, the promised Messiah, and that there was salvation in none other; and that they must receive Him as the Messiah in order to escape the wrath to come.

CHAPTER 19

Verses 1–7

Ephesus was a city of great note in Asia, famous for a temple built there to Diana, which was one of the wonders of the world: thither Paul came to preach the gospel while Apollos was at Corinth (v. 1); while he was watering there, Paul was planting here, and went on in the new work that was cut out for him at Ephesus with the more cheerfulness and satisfaction, because he knew that such an able minister as Apollos was now at Corinth, carrying on the good work there. Paul having gone through the country of Galatia and Phrygia, having passed through the upper coasts, came to Ephesus, where he had left Aquila and Priscilla, and there found them. He met with some disciples there, who professed faith in Christ as the true Messiah, but were as yet in the first and lowest form in the school of Christ, under his usher John the Baptist. They were in number about twelve (v. 7).

I. How Paul catechised them.

1. They did believe in the Son of God; but Paul enquires whether they had received the Holy Ghost,—whether they had been acquainted with, and had admitted, this revelation? This was not all; extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghost were conferred upon the apostles and other disciples after Christ's ascension. Had they participated in these gifts? "Have you received the Holy Ghost since you believed? Have you had that seal of the truth of Christ's doctrine in yourselves?" There are graces of the Spirit given to all believers, which are as earnests to them. But many are deceived in this matter, thinking they have received the Holy Ghost when really they have not. As there are pretenders to the gifts of the Holy Ghost, so there are to his graces and comforts; we should therefore strictly examine ourselves, Have we received the Holy Ghost since we believed? The tree will be known by its fruits. Do we bring forth the fruits of the Spirit? Do we walk in the Spirit?

2. They owned their ignorance in this matter: Whether there be a Holy Ghost is more than we know. That there is a promise of the Holy Ghost we know from the scriptures and that this promise will be fulfilled in its season we doubt not. We have not so much as heard whether the Holy Ghost be indeed yet given. The gospel light, like that of the morning, shone more and more, gradually; not only clearer and clearer, but further and further.

3. Paul enquired how they came to be baptized, if they knew nothing of the Holy Ghost. Unto what then were you baptized? This is strange and unaccountable. What! baptized, and yet know nothing of the Holy Ghost? Ignorance of the Holy Ghost is as inconsistent with a sincere profession of Christianity as ignorance of Christ is. Let us often consider unto what we were baptized, that we may live up to our baptism.

4. They own that they were baptized unto John's baptism, that is, they were baptized in the name of John, by some disciple of his, that ignorantly kept up his name as the head of a party. As it is here expressed, unto John's baptism.

5. Paul explains to them the true intent and meaning of John's baptism, as principally referring to Jesus Christ. Those that have been left in ignorance, or led into error, by any infelicities of their education, should be compassionately instructed and better taught, as these disciples were by Paul. He owns that John's baptism was a very good thing, as far as it went: John verily baptized with the baptism of repentance. He shows them that John's baptism had a further reference. They should believe on him who should come after him, that is, on Christ Jesus,—that his baptism of repentance was designed only to prepare the way of the Lord, whom he directed

Vss. 1-41. SIGNAL SUCCESS OF PAUL AT EPHESUS.

1-3. while Apollos was at Corinth—where his ministry was so powerful that a formidable party in the Church of that city gloried in his type of preaching in preference to Paul's (I Cor. 1:12; 3:4), no doubt from the marked infusion of Greek philosophic culture which distinguished it, and which the apostle studiously avoided (I Cor. 2:1-5). Paul having passed through the upper coasts—'parts,' the interior of Asia Minor, which, with reference to the seacoast, was elevated. came to Ephesus—thus fulfilling his promise (ch. 18:21). finding certain disciples—in the same stage of Christian knowledge as Apollos at first, newly arrived, probably, and having had no communication as yet with the church at Ephesus.

Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed?—rather, 'Received ye the Holy Ghost when ye believed?' implying, certainly, that the one did not of necessity carry the other along with it (see on ch. 8:14-17). Why this question was asked, we cannot tell; but it was probably in consequence of something that passed between them from which the apostle was led to suspect the imperfection of their light.

We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost—This cannot be the meaning, since the personality and office of the Holy Ghost, in connection with Christ, formed an especial subject of the Baptist's teaching. Literally, the words are, 'We did not even hear whether the Holy Ghost was (given); meaning, at the time of their baptism. That the word 'given' is the right supplement, as in John 7:39, seems plain from the nature of the case.

4. Then said Paul, John . . . baptized with the baptism of—water unto —repentance, saying unto the people, that they should believe on him which should come after him—i.e., who should baptize with the Holy Ghost. The point of contrast is not between John and Christ personally, but between the water baptism of John unto repentance, and the promised baptism of the Spirit from the hands of his coming Master unto new life. As to all the facts, or at least the significancy, of this baptism, which made the whole life and work of Christ another thing from what it was conceived to be before it was vouchsafed, these simple disciples were unenlightened.

CHAPTER 19

1. Paul having passed through the upper coasts. That is, through those parts of Asia Minor that lay eastward of Ephesus, such as Galatia, Phrygia, and probably Lycaonia and Lydia; and it is in reference to Ephesus that these are called the upper coasts.

2. Have ye received the Holy Ghost? It is likely that these were Asiatic Jews, who, having been at Jerusalem about twenty-six years before this, had heard the preaching of John and received his baptism, believing in the coming Christ, whom John had proclaimed; but it appears that till this time they had got no further instruction in the Christian religion. Paul, perceiving this, asked them if they had received the Holy Ghost since they believed. For it was the common privilege of the disciples of Christ to receive not only the ordinary graces but also the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Spirit, and thus the disciples of Christ differed from those of John and of all others. John baptized with water; Jesus baptized with the Holy Ghost. We have not so much as heard whether. That is, they had not heard that there were particular gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit to be received. They could not mean that they had not heard of the Holy Spirit; for John, in his baptism, announced Christ as about to baptize with the Holy Ghost, Matt. iii. 11; Luke iii. 16. But they simply meant that they had not heard that this Spirit, in His gifts, had been given to or received by anyone.

4. That they should believe on him which should come after. John baptized them with the baptism of repentance; this was common to all the baptisms administered by the Jews to proselytes. But telling them that they should believe on Him who was coming was peculiar to John's baptism.

them to: Behold the Lamb of God. He was only the harbinger,—Christ is the Prince. His baptism was the porch which you were to pass through, not the house you were to rest in.

6. When they were thus shown the error they thankfully accepted the discovery, and were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus, v. 5. When they came to understand things better, they desired to be baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus, and were so. It does not therefore follow hence that there was not an agreement between John's baptism and Christ's, for those that were here baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus had never been so baptized before.

II. How Paul conferred the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghost upon them, v. 6. Paul solemnly prayed to God laying his hands on them. God granted the thing he prayed for: The Holy Ghost came upon them, and they spoke with tongues and prophesied. They had the Spirit of prophesy, that they might understand the mysteries of the kingdom of God themselves, and the gift of tongues, that they might preach them to every nation and language. Oh, what a wonderful change was here made on a sudden in these men! those that but just now had not so much as heard that there was any Holy Ghost are now themselves filled with the Holy Ghost.

Verses 8–12

Paul is here very busy at Ephesus.

I. He begins, as usual, in the Jews' synagogue.

1. Where he preached to them: in their synagogue (v. 8). Where there were no Christian assemblies yet formed, he frequented the Jewish assemblies. Paul went into the synagogue, because there he had them together, and had them, it might be hoped, in a good frame.

2. What he preached to them: The things concerning the kingdom of God among men, the great things which concerned God's dominion over all men and favour to them, and men's subjection to God and happiness in God. Or, more particularly, the things concerning the kingdom of the Messiah. He gave them a right notion of this kingdom, and showed them their mistakes about it.

3. How he preached to them. He preached argumentatively: he disputed; gave reasons, and answered objections, that they might not only believe, but might see cause to believe. He preached affectionately: he persuaded. Paul was a moving preacher, and was master of the art of persuasion. He preached undauntedly, and with a holy resolution: he spoke boldly.

4. How long he preached to them: For the space of three months, which was a competent time allowed them to consider of it.

5. What success his preaching had among them. There were some that were persuaded to believe in Christ. Many continued in their infidelity, and were confirmed in their prejudices against Christianity. Now that he settled among them, and his word came more closely to their consciences, they were soon weary of him. They had an invincible aversion to the gospel of Christ themselves: they were hardened, and believed not. They did their utmost to raise and keep up in others an aversion to the gospel. They spoke evil of that way before the multitude, to prejudice them against it. Though they could not show any manner of evil in it, yet they said all manner of evil concerning it.

II. When he had carried the matter as far as it would go in the synagogue of the Jews, he left the synagogue. They drove him from them by their railing at those things which he spoke concerning the kingdom of God: they hated to be reformed, hated to be instructed, and therefore he departed from them.

1. When Paul departed from the Jews he took the disciples with him, and separated them. Lest they should be infected with the poisonous tongues of those blasphemers, he separated those who believed, to be the foundation of a Christian church. When Paul departed there needed no more to separate the disciples; let him go where he will, they will follow him.

2. When Paul separated from the synagogue he disputed daily in the school of one Tyrannus. He had by this separation a double advantage. (1) That now his opportunities were more frequent. In the synagogue he could only preach every sabbath day (ch. xiii. 43), but now he disputed daily. (2) That now they were more open. To the synagogue of the Jews none might come but Jews or proselytes; Gentiles were excluded. In the school of Tyrannus, both Jews and Greeks attended his ministry, v. 10. Some think this school of Tyrannus was a divinity-school of the Jews, and such a one they commonly had in their great cities besides their synagogue; they called it Bethmidrash, the house of enquiry. But

5. When they heard this. As there is no evidence in the New Testament of persons being rebaptized, unless this be one, many criticisms have been hazarded to prove that these persons were not rebaptized. I see no need of this. To be a Christian a man must be baptized in the Christian faith; these persons had not been baptized into that faith, and therefore were not Christians; they felt this, and were immediately baptized into the name of the Lord Jesus.

6. They spake with tongues, and prophesied. They received the miraculous gift of different languages, and in those languages they taught to the people the great doctrines of the Christian religion; for this appears to be the meaning of the word prophesied, as it is used above.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

Mark the diversities. How did these twelve men enter into the larger life? They heard the teaching, they obeyed, they were baptized into the name of Jesus. Then Paul laid on his hands and they received the Holy Spirit. In the tenth chapter we find Peter was talking to Cornelius and he received the Spirit immediately and was baptized, not before but after receiving the Spirit. The Spirit bloweth where He listeth. We must not take any illustration in this book, and make it an abiding rule, for if so, there will be as many schools as there are stories in the Acts of the Apostles. We cannot base a doctrine of the Spirit's methods upon any one story. Upon the whole of them we can base the doctrine of the Spirit's method, and that may be stated thus. Not according to human ideas, or human laws formulated by any story; but in many ways, through the laying on of hands, and without such laying on; in answer to water baptism, before water baptism; so comes the Spirit. The important matter is that we have this Spirit, without whose presence and illumination we cannot preach this Christ, or teach Him. May it be ours to press to the highest height, and the fullest knowledge, that we may lift all those whom we teach on to this highest level.—The Acts of the Apostles

8. Spake boldly . . . three months. We have often remarked that Paul in every place made his first offers of salvation to the Jews, and it was only when they rejected it that he turned to the Gentiles; see chap. xviii. 6. And the same line of conduct he pursues here; he goes to the school of Tyrannus, at least a public place to which all might resort, when they obstinately rejected the gospel in the synagogue.

9. When divers were hardened. When "some" of them were hardened; several no doubt felt the power of divine truth, and yielded consent. Our term divers, one of the most bald in our language, has too general a meaning for this place.

Separated the disciples. Paul and those converted under his ministry had doubtless been in the habit of attending public worship in the synagogue, but on the persecuting conduct of these Jews, he and his converts wholly withdrew from the synagogue and took a place for themselves; and constantly afterwards held their own meetings at a schoolroom, which no doubt they hired for the purpose.

Disputing and persuading. Holding conversations with them in order to persuade them of the truth of the doctrine of Christ.

MATTHEW HENRY

others think it was a philosophy-school of the Gentiles, belonging to one Tyrannus. Some convenient place it was, which Paul and the disciples had the use of, either for love or money.

3. Here he continued his labours for two years. These two years commence from the end of the three months which he spent in the synagogue (v. 8); therefore he might justly reckon it in all three years, as he does, ch. xx. 31.

4. The gospel hereby spread far and near (v. 10): All those that dwelt in Asia heard the word of the Lord Jesus; not only all that dwelt in Ephesus, but all that dwelt in that large province called Asia, of which Ephesus was the head city. There was great resort to Ephesus from all parts of the country, which gave Paul an opportunity of sending the report of the gospel to all the towns and villages of that country. They all heard the word of the Lord Jesus. Some of all sects, some out of all parts both in city and country, embraced this gospel, and entertained it, and by them it was communicated to others.

III. God confirmed Paul's doctrine by miracles, v. 11, 12. Why did he not work miracles at Thessalonica, Berea, and Athens? Or, if he did, why are they not recorded? But here at Ephesus we have the proofs of this kind which he gave of his divine mission. They were special miracles. God exerted powers that were not according to the common course of nature. Or, they were not only (as all miracles are) out of the common road, but they were even uncommon miracles. God wrought something above the common road of miracles. It was not Paul that wrought them but it was God that wrought them by the hand of Paul. He was but the instrument.

3. He not only cured the sick that were brought to him, or to whom he was brought, but from his body were brought to the sick handkerchiefs or aprons. We read of one that was cured by the touch of Christ's garment when it was upon him, and he perceived that virtue went out of him; but here were people cured by Paul's garments when they were taken from him. Christ gave his apostles power against unclean spirits and against all manner of sickness (Matt. x. 1), those to whom Paul sent relief had it in both cases: for the diseases departed from them and the evil spirits went out of them.

We have here in these verses two remarkable instances of the conquest of Satan, not only in those that were violently possessed by him, but in those that were voluntarily devoted to him.

I. Here is the confusion of some of Satan's servants, some vagabond Jews, that were exorcists, who made use of Christ's name in their diabolical enchantments.

1. The general character of those who were guilty of this presumption. They were Jews, but vagabond Jews. They strolled about to tell people their fortunes, and pretended by spells and charms to cure diseases, and bring people to themselves that were melancholy or distracted. The superstitious Jews, to put a reputation upon these magic arts, wickedly attributed the invention of them to Solomon. And Christ seems to refer to this (Matt. xii. 27), By whom do your children cast them out?

2. A particular account of some at Ephesus that led this course of life. They were seven sons of one Sceva, a Jew, and chief of the priests, v. 14. Their father was a chief of the priests, head of one of the twenty-four courses of priests. One would think the temple would find both employment and encouragement enough for the sons of a chief priest.

3. The profaneness they were guilty of: They took upon them to call over evil spirits the name of the Lord Jesus; not as those who had a veneration for Christ and a confidence in his name, as we read of some who cast out devils in Christ's name and yet did not follow with his disciples (Luke ix. 49), but as those who were willing to try all methods to carry on their wicked trade. They said, We adjure you by Jesus whom Paul preaches; not, "whom we believe in, or depend upon," but whom Paul preaches; as if they had said, "We will try what that name will do."

4. The confusion they were put to in their impious operations. The evil spirit gave them a sharp reply (v. 15): "Jesus I know, and Paul I know; but who are you? What power have you to command us in his name, or who gave you any such power? What have you to do to declare the power of Jesus, seeing you hate his instructions?" The man in whom the evil spirit was gave them a warm reception, leaped upon them, overcame them and prevailed against them, so that they fled out of the house, not only naked, but wounded. A warning to all those who name the name of Christ, but do not depart from iniquity. The same enemy that overcomes them with his

this continued . . . two years—in addition to the former three months. See on ch. 20:31. But during some part of this period he must have paid a second unrecorded visit to Corinth, since the one next recorded (see on ch. 20:2, 3) is twice called his third visit (II Cor. 12:14 13:1). See on II Corinthians 1:15, 16, which might seem inconsistent with this. The passage across was quite a short one (see on ch. 18:19). Towards the close of this long stay at Ephesus, as we learn from I Corinthians 16:8, he wrote his FIRST EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS; also (though on this opinions are divided) the EPISTLE TO THE GALATIANS. (See Introduction to those Epistles.) And just as at Corinth his greatest success was after his withdrawal to a separate place of meeting (ch. 18:7-10), so at Ephesus. so that all they which dwelt in—the Roman province of—Asia heard the word of the Lord Jesus, both Jews and Greeks—This is the "great door and effectual opened unto him" while resident at Ephesus (I Cor. 16:9, which induced him to make it his headquarters for so long a period. The unwearied and varied character of his labors here are best seen in his own subsequent address to the elders of Ephesus (ch. 20:17, etc.). And thus Ephesus became the "ecclesiastical center for the entire region, as indeed it remained for a very long period" [BAUMGARTEN]. Churches arose at Colosse, Laodicea, and Hierapolis eastward, either through his own labors or those of his faithful helpers whom he sent out in different directions, Epaphras, Archippus, Philemon (Col. 1:7; 4:12-17; Philemon 23). 11, 12. God wrought special—no ordinary—miracles by the hands of Paul—implying that he had not been accustomed to work such. So that from his body were brought unto the sick handkerchiefs or aprons, . . .—Cf. ch. 5:15, 16, very different from the magical acts practiced at Ephesus. "God wrought these miracles" merely "by the hands of Paul"; and the very exorcists (vs. 13), observing that the name of Jesus was the secret of all his miracles, hoped, by aping him in this, to be equally successful; while the result of all in the "magnifying of the Lord Jesus" (vs. 17) showed that in working them the apostle took care to hold up Him whom he preached as the source of all the miracles which he wrought.

vagabond Jews—simply, 'wandering Jews,' who went from place to place practicing exorcism, or the art of conjuring evil spirits to depart out of the possessed. That such a power did exist, for some time at least, seems implied in Matthew 12:27. But no doubt this would breed imposture; and the present case is very different from that referred to in Luke 9:49, 50.

We adjure you by Jesus whom Paul preacheth—a striking testimony to the power of Christ's name in Paul's mouth. 14-17. seven sons of . . . Sceva . . . chief of the priests—head, possibly, of one of the 24 courts. the evil spirit answered, Jesus I know—'recognize'—and Paul I know—'know intimately,' in contrast to them, whom he altogether disowns—but who are ye? And the man in whom the evil spirit was—Mark the clear line of demarkation here between "the evil spirit which answered and said" and "the man in whom the evil spirit was." The reality of such possessions could not be more clearly expressed. leaped on them . . . so that they fled . . . naked and wounded—This was so appalling a testimony at once against those profane impostors and in favor of Paul and the Master whom he preached, that we wonder not that it spread

10. By the space of two years. The schoolhouse of Tyrannus was Paul's regular chapel; and it is likely that in it he taught Christianity, as Tyrannus taught languages or sciences.

All they . . . in Asia heard the word. Meaning probably the Proconsular Asia. Jews and Greeks. For, although he ceased preaching in the synagogues of the Jews, yet they continued to hear him in the school of Tyrannus.

11. God wrought special miracles. Miracles of no "ordinary" kind, i.e., extraordinary miracles.

12. Handkerchiefs or aprons. Probably the sudaria were a sort of handkerchiefs, which in travelling were always carried in the hand for the convenience of wiping the face; and the simikinthia were either the sashes or girdles that went about the loins. These, borrowed from the apostle and applied to the bodies of the diseased, became the means in the hand of God of their restoration to health. The diseases departed from them, and the evil spirits went out of them. Here there is a most evident distinction made between the diseases and the evil spirits; hence they were not one and the same thing.

13. Certain of the vagabond Jews, exorcists. "Certain of the Jews who went about practicing exorcisms." Vagabond has a very bad acceptation among us; but literally vagabundus signifies a "wanderer," one that has no settled place of abode.

14. Seven sons of one Sceva. It has been often remarked that in our Lord's time there were many of the Jews that professed to cast out demons; and perhaps to this our Lord alludes, Matt. xii. 27.

15. Jesus I know, and Paul I know. In the answer of the demoniac, the verb is varied: I "acknowledge" Jesus, and "am acquainted with" Paul; but of whom are ye?

16. And the man in whom the evil spirit was. Thus we find that one man was more powerful than these seven brothers, so that he stripped them of their upper garments and beat and wounded the whole! Was not this a proof that he derived his strength from the evil spirit that dwelt in him?

MATTHEW HENRY

temptations will overcome them with his terrors. If we resist the devil by a true and lively faith in Christ, he will flee from us; but if we think to resist him by the bare using of Christ's name, as a spell or charm, he will prevail against us.

5. The general notice that was taken of this (v. 17): This was known to all the Jews and Greeks also dwelling at Ephesus. It was the common talk of the town. Men were terrified: fear fell on them all. In this instance they saw the malice of the devil whom they served, and the power of Christ whom they opposed. God was glorified; the name of the Lord Jesus was the more magnified; for now it appeared to be a name above every name.

II. Here is the conversion of others of Satan's servants.

1. Those that had been guilty of wicked practices confessed them, v. 18. Many that had believed and were baptized, but had not then been so particular as they might have been in the confession of their sins, came to Paul, and confessed what evil lives they had led, and what a great deal of secret wickedness their own consciences charged them with. They showed their deeds, took shame to themselves and gave glory to God and warning to others. Where there is true contrition for sin there will be an ingenuous confession of sin to God and to man whom we have offended when the case requires it.

2. Those that had conversed with wicked books burnt them (v. 19): Many also of those who used curious arts, that traded in the study of magic and divination. These, having their consciences more awakened than ever, brought their books together, and burnt them before all men. Ephesus was notorious for the use of these curious arts. It was therefore much for the honour of Christ and his gospel to have such a noble testimony borne against those curious arts, in a place where they were so much in vogue. Thus they showed a holy indignation at the sins they had been guilty of. Those very things were now detestable to them, as much as ever they had been delectable. Thus they showed their resolution never to return to the use of those arts. Being steadfastly resolved never to make use of them, they burnt them. Thus they put away a temptation to return to them again. Those that truly repent of sin will keep themselves as far as possible from the occasions of it. Thus they prevented their doing mischief to others. It was the safest course to commit them all to the flames. Those that are recovered from sin themselves will do all they can to keep others from falling into it. Thus they showed a contempt of the wealth of this world; for the price of the books was cast up, and it was found to be fifty thousand pieces of silver. Probably they had cost them so much; yet, being the devil's books, they did not think this would justify them in being so wicked as to sell them again. Thus they publicly testified their joy for their conversion from these wicked practices. These converts joined together in making this bonfire, and made it before all men. They chose to do it together, by consent, and to do it at the high cross (as we say), that Christ and his grace in them might be the more magnified.

III. Here is a general account of the progress and success of the gospel (v. 20): So mightily grew the word of God, and prevailed. It is a blessed sight to see the word of God growing and prevailing mightily. To see it grow extensively, by the addition of many to the church. When still more and more are wrought upon by the gospel, then it grows; when those that had been most stiff in their opposition to it, are brought into obedience to it, then it may be said to grow mightily. To see it prevail extensively. When strong corruptions are mortified, evil customs of long standing broken off, and pleasant, gainful, fashionable sins are abandoned, then it prevails mightily; and Christ in it goes on conquering and to conquer.

I. Paul is here brought into some trouble at Ephesus, just when he is forecasting to go thence.

1. How he laid his purpose of going to other places, v. 21, 22. He was a man of vast designs for God, and was for making his influences as widely diffusive as might be. He designed a visit to the churches of Macedonia and Achaia, v. 21. There he had planted churches, and now is concerned to visit them. He purposed in the spirit, either in his own spirit, or by the direction of the Holy Spirit, who was his guide in all his motions. He purposed to go and see how the work of God went on in those places. Thence he designed to go to Jerusalem, to visit the brethren there, and thence he intended to go to Rome, to go and see Rome. It was an expression people commonly used, that they would go and see Rome, would look about them there, when that which he designed to "all the Jews and Greeks at Ephesus, that fear fell on them," and that "the name of the Lord Jesus was magnified."

19, 20. many that believed came and confessed . . . their deeds—the dupes of magicians, etc., acknowledging how shamefully they had been deluded, and how deeply they had allowed themselves to be implicated in such practices. Many of them . . . which used curious arts—The word signifies things 'overdone'; significantly applied to arts in which laborious but senseless incantations are practiced. brought their books—containing the mystic formularies. and burned them before all—The tense, here used graphically, expresses progress and continuance of the conflagration.

counted the price . . . and found it fifty thousand pieces of silver—probably about $10,000 (presuming it to be the drachma). From their nature they would be costly, and books then bore a value above any standard we are familiar with. The scene must have been long remembered at Ephesus, as a strong proof of honest conviction on the part of the sorcerers and a striking triumph of Jesus Christ over the powers of darkness. The workers of evil were put to scorn, like Baal's priests on Carmel, and the word of God mightily grew and prevailed [Hows].

21, 22. After these things were ended—completed, implying something like a natural finish to his long period of labor at Ephesus. Paul purposed . . . when he had passed through Macedonia and Achaia, to go to Jerusalem . . . After I have been there, I must see Rome also—Mark here the vastness of the apostle's missionary plans. They were all fulfilled, though he "saw Rome" only as a prisoner.

ADAM CLARKE

17. The name of the Lord Jesus was magnified. They saw that there was a sovereign power in the name of Jesus which could not be imitated by these lying exorcists; they therefore reverenced this name, and despised those pretenders.

19. Which used curious arts. From the use of this word in the Greek writers we know that it signified "magical arts, sorceries, incantations." Ephesus abounded with these. Brought their books together. When it is said they brought their books together, we are to understand the books which treated of these curious arts. And burned them before all. These must have been thoroughly convinced of the truth of Christianity and of the unlawfulness of their own arts.

20. So mightily grew the word of God and prevailed. It is probable that it was about this time that Paul had that conflict which he mentions in 1 Cor. xv. 32, "If after the manner of men I have fought with [wild] beasts at Ephesus." See the note there. It means some severe trials not here mentioned, unless we may suppose him to refer to the ferocious insurrection headed by Demetrius, mentioned at the end of this chapter.

21. Paul purposed in the spirit. Previously to this he appears to have concerted a journey to Macedonia and a visit to Corinth, the capital of Achaia, where he seems to have spent a considerable time (see 1 Cor. xvi. 5-6), and afterwards to go to Jerusalem. But it is likely that he did not leave Ephesus till after Pentecost (1 Cor. xvi. 8). And he resolved if possible to see Rome, which had been the object of his wishes for a considerable time. See Rom. i. 10, 13; xvi. 23. It is generally believed that during this period, while at Ephesus, he wrote his First Epistle to the Corinthians.

MATTHEW HENRY

was to see the Christians there. The good people at Rome were the glory of the city which he longed for a sight of. He sent Timothy and Erastus in to Macedonia, to give them notice of the visit he intended them. For the present he stayed in Asia.

2. How he was seconded in his purpose, and obliged to pursue it by the troubles which at length he met with at Ephesus. It was strange that he had been quiet there so long; yet it should seem he had met with trouble there not recorded in this story, for in his epistle he speaks of his having fought with beasts at Ephesus (1 Cor. xv. 32). And he speaks of the trouble which came to them in Asia, near Ephesus, when he despaired of life, 2 Cor. i, 8, 9.

II. But, in the trouble here related, he was worse frightened than hurt. In general, there arose no small stir about that way, v. 23. Let us view the particulars of it.

1. A great complaint against Paul for drawing people off from the worship of Diana, and so spoiling the trade of the silversmiths that worked for Diana's temple.

(1) The complainant is Demetrius, a silversmith. The most advantageous branch of his trade was making silver shrines for Diana, v. 24. Some think these were medals stamped with the effigies of Diana, others think they were representations of the temple, with the image of Diana in it in miniature, all of silver. Those that came from far to pay their devotions at the temple of Ephesus bought these little temples or shrines, to carry home with them. See how craftsmen, and crafty men too above the rank of silversmiths, make an advantage to themselves of people's superstition.

(2) The persons he appeals to are not the magistrates, but the mob; he called the craftsmen together, with the workmen of like occupation, and these he endeavoured to incense against Paul.

(3) His complaint and representation are very full. He lays it down for a principle that the making silver shrines for the worshippers of Diana was very necessary to be kept up (v. 25): "You know that by this craft we have our wealth." It is natural for men to be jealous for that by which they get their wealth; and many have set themselves against the gospel of Christ, because it calls men off from those crafts which are unlawful, how much wealth soever is to be obtained by them. He charges it upon Paul that he had dissuaded men from worshipping idols. He had asserted, Those are no gods which are made with hands, v. 26. Could any truth be more plain and self-evident than this, The workman made it, therefore it is not God? Yet this must be looked upon as an heretical and atheistical notion, and Paul as a criminal for maintaining it. The consequence of it was that not only at Ephesus, but almost throughout all Asia, he had persuaded and turned away much people from the worship of Diana. There are those who will stickle for that which is most grossly absurd and unreasonable, if it have but human laws, and worldly interest on its side. He reminds them of the danger which their trade was in of going to decay. "If this doctrine gains credit, we are all undone, and may even shut up shop; this our craft will be set at nought." He pretends a mighty zeal for Diana: Not only this our craft is in danger. All his care is lest the temple of the great goddess Diana should be despised, and her magnificence should be destroyed; and he would not see the diminution of the honour of that goddess, whom all Asia and the world worship. See what the worship of Diana had to plead for itself. It had pomp on its side; the magnificence of the temple was the thing that charmed them. It had numbers on its side; All Asia and the world worship it; and therefore it must needs be the right way of worship, let Paul say what he will to the contrary.

2. The popular resentment of this complaint. They showed, (1) A great displeasure against the gospel and the preachers of it. They were full of wrath (v. 28). The craftsmen went stark mad when they were told that their trade and their idol were both in danger. (2) A great jealousy for the honour of their goddess: They cried out, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians. Let Paul say ever so much to prove that those are no gods which are made with hands, we will abide by it that, Great is Diana of the Ephesians. We must and will stand up for the religion of our country." Much more should the servants of the true God do so. (3) A great disorder among themselves (v. 29): The whole city was full of confusion—the common and natural effect of an intemperate zeal for a false religion.

3. The proceedings of the mob under the power of these resentments.

(1) They laid hands on some of Paul's companions, and hurried them into the theatre (v. 29). Those

So he sent into Macedonia . . . Timotheus and Erastus—as his pioneers, in part to bring "them into remembrance of his ways which were in Christ" (I Cor. 4:17 and I Cor. 16:10), partly to convey his mind on various matters. After a brief stay he was to return (I Cor. 16:11). It is very unlikely that this Erastus was "the chamberlain of the city" of Corinth, of that name (Rom. 16:23). he himself stayed in—the province of—Asia for a season—i.e., at Ephesus, its chief city. (Asia is mentioned in contrast with Macedonia in the previous clause.) 23. the same time—of Paul's proposed departure. about that—'the'—way—So the new religion seemed then to be designated (ch. 9:2; 22:4; 24:14).

24-26. silver shrines for—'of'—Diana—small models of the Ephesian temple and of the shrine or chapel of the goddess, or of the shrine and statue alone, which were purchased by visitors as memorials of what they had seen, and were carried about and deposited in houses as a charm. (The models of the chapel of our Lady of Loretto, and such like, which the Church of Rome systematically encourages, are such a palpable imitation of this heathen practice that it is no wonder it should be regarded by impartial judges as Christianity paganized.) gain to the craftsmen—the master-artificers. Whom he called together with the workmen of like occupation—rather, 'with the workmen (or fabricators) of such articles,' meaning the artisans employed by the master-artificers, all who manufactured any kind of memorial of the temple and its worship for sale. ye see and hear—The evidences of it were to be seen, and the report of it was in everybody's mouth. that not alone at Ephesus, but almost throughout all Asia, this Paul hath . . . turned away much people—Noble testimony this to the extent of Paul's influence! saying that they be no gods which are made with hands—The universal belief of the people was that they were gods, though the more intelligent regarded them only as habitations of Deity, and some, probably, as mere aids to devotion. It is exactly so in the Church of Rome. 27. So that not only this our craft is in danger . . . but . . .—i.e., 'that indeed is a small matter; but there is something far worse.' So the masters of the poor Pythoness put forward the religious revolution which Paul was attempting to effect at Philippi, as the sole cause of their zealous alarm, to cloak the self-interest which they felt to be touched by his success (ch. 16:19-21). In both cases religious zeal was the hypocritical pretext; self-interest, the real moving cause of the opposition made. also the temple of the great goddess Diana . . . despised, and her magnificence . . . destroyed, whom all Asia and the world worshippeth—It was reckoned one of the wonders of the world. It was built about 550 B.C., of pure white marble, and though burned by a fanatic on the night of the birth of Alexander the Great, 356 B.C., was rebuilt with more splendor than before. It was 425 feet long by 220 broad, and the columns, 127 in number, were sixty feet in height, each of them the gift of a king, and thirty-six of them enriched with ornament and color. It was constantly receiving new decorations and additional buildings, statues, and pictures by the most celebrated artists, and kindled unparalleled admiration, enthusiasm, and superstition. Its very site is now a matter of uncertainty. The little wooden image of Diana was as primitive and rude as its shrine was sumptuous; not like the Greek Diana, in the form of an imposing huntress, but quite Asiatic, in the form of a manybreasted female (emblematic of the manifold ministrations of Nature to man), terminating in a shapeless block. Like some other far-famed idols, it was believed to have fallen from heaven (vs. 35), and models of it were not only sold in immense numbers to private persons, but set up for worship in other cities [Hows]. What power must have attended the preaching of that one man by whom the deathblow was felt to be given to their gigantic and witching superstition! 28, 29. Great is Diana of the Ephesians—the civic cry of a populace so proud of their temple that they refused to inscribe on it the name of Alexander the Great, though he offered them the whole spoil of his Eastern campaign if they would do it [STRABO in Hows]

22. So he sent into Macedonia. He desired Timothy to go as far as Corinth, 1 Cor. iv. 18, and after that to return to him at Ephesus, 1 Cor. xvi. 11; but he himself continued in Asia some time longer, probably to make collections for the poor saints in Jerusalem. Erastus, mentioned here for the first time, appears to have been the chamberlain of either Ephesus or Corinth; see Rom. xvi. 23. He was one of Paul's companions and is mentioned as being left by the apostle at Corinth, 2 Tim. iv. 20.

23. No small stir about that way. Concerning the gospel, which the apostles preached; and which is termed "this way," chap. ix. 2.

24. Silver shrines for Diana. It is generally known that the temple of Diana at Ephesus was deemed one of the seven wonders of the world and was a most superb building. It appears that the silver shrines mentioned here were small, portable representations of this temple, which were bought by strangers as matters of curiosity and probably of devotion. Brought no small gain. There were many made, many sold, and probably at considerable prices.

25. By this craft we have our wealth. The word signifies not only "wealth," but also "abundance." It was a most lucrative trade; and he plainly saw that, if the apostles were permitted to go on thus preaching, the worship of Diana itself would be destroyed, and consequently all the gain that he and his fellows derived from it would be brought to nought.

26. This Paul hath persuaded and turned away much people. From the mouth of this heathen we have in one sentence a most pleasing account of the success with which God had blessed the labors of the apostles: not alone at Ephesus, but almost throughout all Asia, they had persuaded and converted much people. For they had insisted that they could be no gods which are made with hands, and this the common sense of the people must at once perceive.

TODAY'S DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE:

Diana—so called by the Romans; called Artemis by the Greeks—the "great" goddess worshiped among heathen nations under various modifications. Her most noted temple was that at Ephesus. It was built outside the city walls, and was one of the seven wonders of the ancient world. "First and last it was the work of 220 years; built of shining marble; 342 feet long by 164 feet broad; supported by a forest of columns, each 56 feet high; a sacred museum of masterpieces of sculpture and painting. At the center, hidden by curtains, within a gorgeous shrine, stood the very ancient image of the goddess, on wood or ebony reputed to have fallen from the sky. Behind the shrine was a treasury, where, as in 'the safest bank in Asia,' nations and kings stored their most precious things. The temple as St. Paul saw it subsisted till A.D. 262, when it was ruined by the Goths" (Acts 19:23-41).—Moule on Ephesians; Introd.

29. The whole city was filled with confusion. Thus we find the peace of the whole city was disturbed, not by an apostle preaching the gospel of Christ, but by one interested, unprincipled knave who did not even plead conscience for what he was doing; but that it was by this craft he and his fellows got their wealth, and he was afraid to lose it.

MATTHEW HENRY

whom they seized were Gaius and Aristarchus. Gaius was of Derbe, ch. xx. 4. Aristarchus is also there spoken of, and Col. iv. 10. They came with Paul from Macedonia, and this was their only crime, that they were Paul's companions.

(2) Paul, who had escaped being seized by them, when he perceived his friends in distress, for his sake would have entered in unto the people. It was an evidence of a generous spirit, and that he loved his neighbour as himself.

(3) He was persuaded from it by the kindness of his friends. The disciples suffered him not, for it better became him to offer it than it would have become them to suffer it. Others of his friends interposed, to prevent his throwing himself thus into the mouth of danger, v. 31. They were certain of the chief of Asia. Whether they were converts to the Christian faith, or whether they were only well-wishers to Paul, as an ingenuous good man, we are not told, only that they were Paul's friends. It is a friendly part to take more care of the lives and comforts of good men than they do themselves. Paul was overruled by his friends to obey the law of self-preservation, and has taught us to keep out of the way of danger as long as we can without going out of the way of duty. We may be called to lay down our lives, but not to throw away our lives.

(4) The mob was in a perfect confusion (v. 32): Some cried one thing and some another, the assembly was confused. The truth was the greater part knew not wherefore they had come together. Upon such occasions, the greatest part come only to enquire what the matter is: they follow the cry, follow the crowd, increase like a snowball, and where there are many there will be more.

(5) The Jews would have interested themselves in this tumult, but now at Ephesus they had not interest enough to raise the mob, and yet, when it was raised, they had ill will enough to set in with it (v. 33): They drew Alexander out of the multitude, called him out to speak on the behalf of the Jews against Paul and his companions: "You have heard what Demetrius and the silversmiths have to say against them, as enemies to their religion; give us leave now to tell you what we have to say against him as an enemy to our religion." The Jews put him forward to do this, and therefore what he designed to say is called his apologizing to the people, not for himself in particular, but for the Jews in general. Now they would have them know that they were as much Paul's enemies as they were. Alexander beckoned with the hand, desiring to be heard against Paul; for it had been strange if a persecution had been carried on against the Christians and there were not Jews at one end or the other of it: if they could not begin the mischief, they would help it forward. Some think this Alexander had been a Christian, but had apostatized to Judaism, and therefore was drawn out as a proper person to accuse Paul; and that he was that Alexander the coppersmith that did Paul so much evil (2 Tim. iv. 14), and whom he had delivered unto Satan, 1 Tim. i. 20.

(6) This occasioned the prosecutors to drop the prosecution of Paul's friends, and to turn it into acclamations in honour of their goddess (v. 34): When they knew that he was a Jew, and, as such, an enemy to the worship of Diana, they were resolved not to hear him, and therefore set the mob a shouting, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians; whoever runs her down, be he Jew or Christian, we are resolved to cry her up." This was all the cry for two hours together; and it was thought a sufficient confutation of Paul's doctrine, that those are not gods which are made with hands. Thus the most sacred truths are often run down with nothing else but noise and clamour and popular fury.

4. The suppressing and dispersing of these rioters, by the prudence and vigilence of the town clerk. With much ado he, at length, stilled the noise, so as to be heard, and then made a pacific speech to them.

(1) He humours them with an acknowledgment that Diana was the celebrated goddess of the Ephesians v. 35. They needed not to be so loud and strenuous in asserting a truth which nobody denied. Everyone knows that the city of the Ephesians is a worshipper of the great goddess Diana. The temple of Diana at Ephesus was a very rich and sumptuous structure, but the image of Diana in the temple was had in greater veneration than the temple, for they persuaded the people that it fell down from Jupiter, and therefore was none of the gods that were made with men's hands. Because this image of Diana had been set up time out of mind, and nobody could tell who made it, they made the people believe it fell down from Jupiter. "Now these things," says the town clerk very gravely, "cannot be spoken against; they have obtained such universal credit that you need having caught Gaius and Aristarchus—disappointed of Paul, as at Thessalonica (ch. 17:5, 6). They are mentioned in ch. 20:4; 27:2; Rom. 16:23; I Cor. 1:14; and probably III John 1. If it was in the house of Aquila and Priscilla that he found an asylum (see I Cor. 16:9), that would explain Romans 16:3, 4, where he says of them that "for his life they laid down their own necks" [Hows]. rushed . . . into the theatre—a vast pile, whose ruins are even now a wreck of immense grandeur [SIR C. FELLOWES, Asia Minor, 1839] 30-34. when Paul would have entered in—with noble forgetfulness of self—unto the people —the demos, i.e., the people met in public assembly. the disciples suffered him not—The tense used implies only that they were using their efforts to restrain him; which might have been unavailing but for what follows. And certain of the chief of Asia—lit., 'And certain also of the Asiarchs.' These were wealthy and distinguished citizens of the principal towns of the Asian province, chosen annually, and ten of whom were selected by the proconsul to preside over the games celebrated in the month of May (the same month which Romanism dedicates to the Virgin). It was an office of the highest honor and greatly coveted. Certain of these, it seems, were favorably inclined to the Gospel, at least were Paul's "friends," and knowing the passions of a mob, excited during the festivals, "sent (a message) to him desiring him not to adventure himself into the theater."

they drew Alexander out of the multitude, the Jews putting him forward—rather, 'some of the multitude urged forward Alexander, the Jews thrusting him forward.' As the blame of such a tumult would naturally be thrown upon the Jews, who were regarded by the Romans as the authors of all religious disturbances, they seem to have put forward this man to clear them of all responsibility for the riot. (BENGEL'S conjecture, that this was Alexander the coppersmith, II Tim. 4:14, has little to support it.) beckoned with the hand—cf. ch. 13:16; 21:40. would have made his defence—'offered to speak in defense.'

But when they knew he was a Jew, all with one voice, for the space of two hours, cried out, Great is Diana . . .—The very appearance of a Jew had the opposite effect to that intended. To prevent him obtaining a hearing, they drowned his voice in one tumultuous shout in honor of their goddess, which rose to such frantic enthusiasm as took two hours to exhaust itself.

35-41. when the town-clerk—keeper of the public archives, and a magistrate of great authority. had appeased—'calmed'—the people—'the multitude'—which the very presence of such an officer would go far to do. he said . . . what man . . . knoweth not that the city of the Ephesians is a worshipper of the great goddess Diana—lit., 'the neocoros or warden.' The word means 'temple-sweeper'; then, 'temple-guardian.' Thirteen cities of Asia had an interest in the temple, but Ephesus was honored with the charge of it. (Various cities have claimed this title with reference to the Virgin or certain saints) [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. and of the image which fell down from Jupiter—'from the sky' or 'from heaven.' See on vs. 27. "With this we may compare various legends concerning images and pictures in the Romish Church, such as the traditional likenesses of Christ, which were said to be 'not made with hands' " [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. Seeing that these things cannot be spoken against . . .—Like a true

Rushed . . . into the theatre. The theatres, being very spacious and convenient places, were often used for popular assemblies and public deliberation, especially in matters which regarded the safety of the state.

31. Certain of the chief of Asia. Some of the "Asiarchs." The Asiarchs were those to whom the care and regulation of the public games were entrusted; they were a sort of high priests, and were always persons of considerable riches and influence. These could not have been Christians, but they were what the sacred text states them to have been, his friends; and foreseeing that Paul would be exposed to great danger if he went into the theatre amidst such a tumultuous assembly, they sent a message to him, entreating him not to go into danger so apparent.

32. Some . . . cried one thing, and some another. This is an admirable description of a tumultuous mob, gathered together without law or reason; getting their passions inflamed, and looking for an opportunity to commit outrages, without why or wherefore—principle or object.

For the assembly was confused. Ecclesia, the same word which we translate "church"; and thus we find that it signifies any assembly, and that only the circumstances of the case can determine the precise nature of the assembly to which this word is applied.

33. They drew Alexander out of the multitude, the Jews putting him forward. From this and the following verses it is pretty evident that this Alexander was brought forward on this occasion by the Jews, that he might make an oration to the multitude, in order to exculpate the Jews, who were often by the heathens confounded with the Christians; and cast the whole blame of the uproar upon Paul and his party. He was probably chosen because he was an able speaker; and when he beckoned with his hand to gain an audience, the Greeks, knowing that he was a Jew and consequently as much opposed to the worship of Diana as Paul was, would not hear him.

35. When the townclerk. Literally, the "scribe." Is a worshipper of the great goddess Diana. The word neocoros, which we translate "worshipper," signified at first, among the ancient Greeks, no more than "sweeper of the temple," and answered nearly to our "sexton." In process of time the care of the temple was entrusted to this person. At length the neocori became persons of great consequence, and were those who offered sacrifices for the life of the emperor. Whole cities took this appellation, as appears on many ancient coins and medals; and Ephesus is supposed to have been the first that assumed this title. Of the image which fell down from Jupiter. The original image of the Ephesian Diana was supposed to have descended from heaven, which intimates that it was so old that no person knew either its maker or the time in which it was formed; and it was the interest of the priests to persuade the people that this image had been sent to them as a present from Jupiter himself.

not fear contradiction."

(2) He cautions them against all violent and tumultuous proceedings, which their religion did not need (v. 36): You ought to be quiet, and to do nothing rashly. A very good rule this is to be observed at all times, both in private and public affairs; not to be hasty and precipitate in our motions, but to be calm and composed, and always keep reason in the throne and passion under check. We ought to be quiet and to do nothing rashly; to do nothing in haste, which we may repent of at leisure.

(3) He wipes off the odium that had been cast upon Paul and his associates (v. 37): "You have brought hither these men. What can you prove upon them? They are not robbers of churches. They have offered no violence to Diana's temple or the treasures of it; nor are they blasphemers of your goddess. Why should you prosecute those with all this violence who do not inveigh with any bitterness against you? Since they are calm, why should you be hot?" It was the idol in the heart that they levelled all their force against, by reason and argument; if they can but get that down, the idol in the temple will fall of course. Those that preach against idolatrous churches have truth on their side, with meekness instructing, not with passion and foul language reproaching, those that oppose themselves; for God's truth needs not man's intemperate heat.

(4) He turns them over to the regular methods of the law. A great mercy it is to live in a country where provision is made for the keeping of the peace, and the administration of public justice, and herein we of this nation are as happy as any people. If the complaint be of a private injury, let them have recourse to the judges and courts of justice. If Demetrius and the company of the silversmiths find themselves aggrieved, let them bring their action, and the matter shall be fairly tried, and justice done: The law is open, and there are deputies, whose business it is to hear both sides, and in their determination all parties must acquiesce, and not be their own judges, nor appeal to the people. If the complaint be of a public grievance it must be redressed, not by a confused rabble, but by a convention of the states (v. 39): If you enquire anything concerning other matters it shall be determined in a lawful assembly called together in a regular way by those in authority. Private persons should not intermeddle in public matters, we have enough to do to mind our own business.

(5) He makes them sensible of the danger they have run themselves into by this riot (v. 40): "It is well if we be not called in question for this day's uproar, for there is no cause whereby we may give an account of this concourse. Let the matter go no further, for it has gone too far already." Most people stand in awe of men's judgment more than of the judgment of God. How well were it if we would thus still the tumult of our disorderly appetites and passions with the consideration of the account we must shortly give to the Judge of heaven and earth for all these disorders! We are concerned to manage ourselves as those that must give account.

(6) When he has thus shown them the absurdity of their riotous meeting, he advises them to separate with all speed (v. 41): he dismissed the assembly. See here how the overruling providence of God preserves the public peace, by an unaccountable power over the spirits of men. Thus the world is kept in some order, and men are restrained from being as the fishes of the sea, where the greater devour the less. Considering what an ungovernable, untameable wild beast the mob is, when it is up, we shall see reason to acknowledge God's goodness that we are not always under the tyranny of it. See how many ways God has of protecting his people. Perhaps this town clerk was no friend at all to Paul, yet his human prudence is made to serve the divine purpose.

legal man, he urges that such was notoriously the constitution and fixed character of the city, with which its very existence was all but bound up. Did they suppose that all this was going to be overturned by a set of itinerant orators? Ridiculous! What did they mean, then, by raising such a stir?

For ye have brought hither these men, which are neither robbers of churches—'temple-plunderers,' or sacrilegious persons. nor yet blasphemers of your goddess—This is a remarkable testimony, showing that the apostle had, in preaching against idolatry, studiously avoided (as at Athens) insulting the feelings of those whom he addressed—a lesson this to missionaries and ministers in general.

if Demetrius have a matter—of complaint—against any man, the law is open—rather, 'the court-days are being held.' and there are deputies—lit., 'proconsuls' (see on ch. 13:7); i.e., probably, the proconsul and his council, as a court of appeal. if ye inquire—'have any question.' concerning other matters—of a public nature.

For we—the public authorities—are in danger of being called in question—by our superiors.

37. These men . . . are neither robbers of churches. "Spoilers of sacred places." As his design evidently was to appease and conciliate the people, he fixed first on a most incontrovertible fact: These men have not spoiled your temples, nor is there any evidence that they have even blasphemed your goddess.

38. If Demetrius . . . have a matter against any man. If it be any breach of law, in reference to Demetrius and the artists, the law is open, or rather, "the judges are now sitting"; so the words may be understood. And there are deputies, "proconsuls," appointed to guard the peace of the state, and to support every honest man in his right. Let them implead one another; let the one party bring forward his action of assault or trespass, and the other put in his defense; the laws are equal and impartial, and justice will be done to him who is wronged.

39. But if ye enquire any thing concerning other matters, in which the safety of the state or the national worship is concerned, know that such a matter is not the business of the mob; it must be heard and determined in a lawful assembly, one legally constituted and properly authorized to hear and determine on the subject.

40. For we are in danger. Popular commotions were always dreaded by the Roman government. One of the Roman laws made all such commotions of the people capital offenses against those who raised them. "He who raises a mob shall forfeit his life." If such a law existed at Ephesus—and it probably did, from this reference to it in the words of the town clerk or recorder—then Demetrius must feel himself in great personal danger, and that his own life lay now at the mercy of those whom he had accused, concerning whom he had raised such an outcry and against whom nothing disorderly could be proved.

41. He dismissed the assembly. Another proof that the word ecclesia, which we generally translate "church," signifies an assembly of any kind.

Verses 1–6

I. Paul's departure from Ephesus. He had tarried there longer than he had done at any one place. Now it was time to think of removing, for he must preach in other cities also; but after this we never find him breaking up fresh ground again, for in the close of the next chapter we find him made a prisoner, and so continued, and so left, at the end of this book. Paul left Ephesus soon after the uproar had ceased, v. 1. His removal might somewhat appease the rage of his adversaries, and gain better quarter for the Christians there. Some think that before he now left Ephesus he wrote the first epistle to the Corinthians, and that his fighting with beasts at Ephesus, which he mentions in that epistle, was a figurative descr p-

CHAPTER 20

Vss. 1-12. PAUL FULFILS HIS PURPOSE OF PROCEEDING AGAIN TO MACEDONIA AND GREECE—RETURNING THENCE, ON HIS ROUTE FOR JERUSALEM, HE REVISITS PHILIPPI AND TROAS—HIS MINISTRATIONS AT TROAS. This section of the apostle's life, though peculiarly rich in material, is related with great brevity in the History. Its details must be culled from his own Epistles. 1, 2. departed—after Pentecost (I Cor. 16:8). to go into Macedonia—in pursuance of the first part of his plan ch. 19:21). From his Epistles we learn; (1) That, as might have been expected from its position on the coast, he revisited Troas (II Cor. 2:12; see on ch. 16:8). (2) That while on his former visit he appears to have done

CHAPTER 20

1. After the uproar was ceased. The tumult excited by Demetrius apparently induced Paul to leave Ephesus sooner than he had intended. He had written to the Corinthians that he should leave that place after Pentecost, 1 Cor. xvi. 8; but it is very probable that he left it sooner.

tion of this uproar. He did not leave them abruptly, but took leave of them solemnly: He called unto him the disciples, and embraced them, took leave of them (saith the Syriac) with the kiss of love. Loving friends know not how well they love one another till they come to part, and then it appears how near they lay to one another's hearts.

A. T. ROBERTSON:

2. "Those parts (ta mere ekeina). We have no way of knowing why Luke did not tell of Paul's stay in Troas (2 Cor. 2:12), nor of meeting Titus in Macedonia (2 Cor. 2:13 to 7:16), nor of Paul's visit to Illyricum (Rom. 15:19) to give time for 2 Corinthians to do its work (2 Cor. 13), one of the most stirring experiences in Paul's whole career when he opened his heart to the Corinthians and won final victory in the church by the help of Titus who also helped him round up the great collection in Achaia. He wrote 2 Corinthians during this period after Titus arrived from Corinth. The unity of 2 Corinthians is here assumed. Paul probably met Luke again in Macedonia, but all this is passed by except by the general phrase: "had given them much exhortation" (parakalesas autous logoi polloi). Literally, "having exhorted them [the Macedonian brethren] with much talk" (instrumental case). "Into Greece" (eis ten Hellada). That is, Achaia (18:12; 19:21), and particularly Corinth, whither he had at last come again after repeated attempts, pauses, and delays (2 Cor. 13:1). Now at last the coast was clear and Paul apparently had an open door in Corinth during these three months, so completely had Titus at last done away with the opposition of the Judaizers there.

—Word Pictures in the New Testament

II. His visitation of the Greek churches, which he had planted, and which appear to have laid very near his heart. He went first to Macedonia (v. 1), according to his purpose before the uproar (ch. xix. 21); there he visited the churches of Philippi and Thessalonica, and gave them much exhortation, v. 2. He had a great deal to say to them, and did not stint himself in time. He stayed three months in Greece (v. 2, 3), that is, in Achaia, for thither also he purposed to go, to Corinth, and thereabouts (ch. xix. 21).

III. The altering of his measures. Paul was about to sail into Syria, to Antioch, but he changed his mind, and resolved to return to Macedonia, the same way he came. The reason was because the Jews, expecting he would steer that course as usual, had waylaid him, designing to be the death of him.

IV. His companions in his travels when he went into Asia; they are here named, v. 4. Sopater of Berea, it is likely, is the same with Sosipater, who is mentioned Rom. xvi. 21.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

no missionary work there, he now went expressly "to preach Christ's Gospel," and found "a door opened unto him of the Lord" there, which he entered so effectually as to lay the foundation of a church there (6, 7). (3) That he would have remained longer there but for his uneasiness at the non-arrival of Titus, whom he had despatched to Corinth to finish the collection for the poor saints at Jerusalem (I Cor. 16:1, 2; II Cor. 8:6), but still more, that he might bring him word what effect his first Epistle to that church had produced. (He had probably arranged that they should meet at Troas.) (4) That in this state of mind, afraid of something wrong, he "took leave" of the brethren at Troas, and went from thence into Macedonia.

It was, no doubt, the city of PHILIPPI that he came to (landing at Nicopolis, its seaport, see on ch. 16: 11, 12), as appears by comparing II Corinthians 11: 9, where "Macedonia" is named, with Philippians 4:15, where it appears that Philippi is meant. Here he found the brethren, whom he had left on his former visit in circumstances of such deep interest, a consolidated and thriving church, generous and warmly attached to their father in Christ; under the superintendence, probably, of our historian, "the beloved physician" (see on ch. 16:40). All that is said by our historian of this Macedonian visit is that "he went over those parts and gave them much exhortation." (5) Titus not having reached Philippi as soon as the apostle, "his flesh had no rest, but he was troubled on every side: without were fightings, within were fears" (II Cor. 7:5). (6) At length Titus arrived, to the joy of the apostle, the bearer of better tidings from Corinth than he had dared to expect (II Cor. 7:6, 7, 13), but checkered by painful intelligence of the efforts of a hostile party to undermine his apostolic reputation there (II Cor.). (7) Under the mixed feelings which this produced, he wrote—from Macedonia, and probably Philippi—his SECOND EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS (see Introduction to II Corinthians); despatching Titus with it, and along with him two other unnamed deputies, expressly chosen to take up and bring their collection for the poor saints at Jerusalem, and to whom he bears the beautiful testimony, that they were "the glory of Christ" (II Cor. 8:22, 23). (8) It must have been at this time that he penetrated as far as to the confines of "Illyricum," lying along the shores of the Adriatic (Rom. 15:19). He would naturally wish that his second Letter to the Corinthians should have some time to produce its proper effect ere he revisited them, and this would appear a convenient opportunity for a northwestern circuit, which would enable him to pay a passing visit to the churches at Thessalonica and Berea, though of this we have no record. On his way southward to Greece, he would preach the Gospel in the intermediate regions of Epirus, Thessaly, and Bœotia (see Rom. 15:19), though of this we have no record. he came into Greece—or Achaia, in pursuance of the second part of his plan (ch. 19:21). 3. And there abode three months—Though the province only is here mentioned, it is the city of CORINTH that is meant, as the province of "Macedonia" (vs. 1) meant the city of Philippi. Some rough work he anticipated on his arrival at Corinth (II Cor. 10:1-8, 11; 13:1-10) though he had reason to expect satisfaction on the whole; and as we know there were other churches in Achaia besides that at Corinth (II Cor. 1:1; 11:10), he would have time enough to pay them all a brief visit during the three months of his stay there. This period was rendered further memorable by the despatch of the EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS, written during his stay at Corinth and sent by "Phœbe, a servant [deaconess] of the Church at Cenchrea" (see on ch. 18:3), a lady apparently of some standing and substance, who was going thither on private business. (See on Rom. 16:1 and Introduction to Epistles to Romans.) And when the Jews laid wait for him, as he was about to sail into Syria—He had intended to embark, probably at Cenchrea, the eastern harbor of the city, for Palestine, on his route to Jerusalem, the third part of his plan (ch. 19:21). But having detected some conspiracy against his life by his bitter Jewish enemies as at Damascus (ch. 9:22-25) and Jerusalem (ch. 9:29, 30), he changed his plan and determined "to return" as he had come, "through Macedonia." As he was never more to return to Corinth, so this route would bring him, for the last time, face to face with the attached disciples of Berea, Thessalonica, and Philippi. 4, 5. there accompanied him into—the province of—Asia, Sopater of Berea—The true reading, beyond doubt, is, 'Sopater [the son] of Pyrrhus of Berea.' Some think this mention of his father was to distinguish him from Sosipater (the same name in fuller form),

ADAM CLARKE

A. T. ROBERTSON:

1. "After the uproar was ceased" (meta to pausasthai ton thorubon). Literally, after the ceasing (accusative of articular aorist middle infinitive of pauo, to make cease) as to the uproar (accusative of general reference). Noise and riot, already in Matt. 26:5; 27:24; Mark 5:38; 14:2; see also Acts 21:34; 24:18. Pictures the whole incident as bustle and confusion. "Took leave" (aspamenos). First aorist middle participle of aspazomai, old verb from a intensive and spao, to draw, to draw to oneself in embrace either in greeting or farewell. Here it is in farewell as in 21:6. Luke here condenses what was probably a whole year of Paul's life and work as we gather from 2 Corinthians, one of Paul's "mighty and powerful" letters as his enemies called them (2 Cor. 10:10). "This epistle more than any other is a revelation of Paul's own heart: it is his spiritual autobiography."

2. He came into Greece. Into "Hellas," Greece properly so called, the regions between Thessaly and Propontis, and the country of Achaia. He did not, however, go there immediately. He passed through Macedonia, v. 1, in which he informs us, 2 Cor. vii. 5-7, that he suffered much, from both believers and infidels; but was greatly comforted by the arrival of Titus, who gave him a very flattering account of the prosperous state of the church at Corinth. A short time after this, being still in Macedonia, he sent Titus back to Corinth, 2 Cor. viii. 16-17, and sent by him the Second Epistle which he wrote to that church, as Theodoret and others suppose. Some time after, he visited Corinth himself, according to his promise, 1 Cor. xvi. 5. This was his third voyage to that city, 2 Cor. xii. 14; xiii. 1.

3. Abode three months. Partly, as we may suppose, at Corinth; from which place he is supposed to have sent his Epistle to the Romans, because he continued longer here than at any other place, and mentions several of the Corinthians in his salutations to the believers of Rome. When the Jews laid wait for him. Paul had determined to go by sea to Syria, and from thence to Jerusalem. This was the first object of his journey, and this was the readiest road he could take; but, hearing that the Jews had laid wait for him, probably to attack his ship on the voyage, seize his person, sell him for a slave, and take the money which he was carrying to the poor saints at Jerusalem, he resolved to go as much of the journey as he conveniently could by land. Therefore he returned through Macedonia and from thence to Troas, where he embarked to sail for Syria on his way to Jerusalem. The whole of his journey is detailed in this and the following chapter.

4. And there accompanied him. Rather, says Bishop Pearce, "there followed him as far as to Asia"; for they were not in his company till he set sail from Philippi and came to them at Troas, in Asia, whither they had gone before and where they tarried for him, v. 5. Into Asia. These words are wanting in two MSS. Some think that they embarrass this place; for how these could "accompany" him into Asia, and "go before him," and "tarry for him" at Troas, v. 6, is not so very clear. Mr. Wakefield gets rid of the difficulty by reading the verse thus: "Now Sopater of Berea accompanied him; but Aristarchus and Secundus of Thessalonica, Gaius of Derbe, Timothy (of Lystra), and Tychicus and Trophimus of Asia, went before, and tarried for us at Troas."

Sopater of Berea. Sopater seems to be the same as Sosipater, whom Paul mentions as his kinsman, Rom. xvi. 21. Some MSS. add Pyrrhou, "Sopater the son of Pyrrhus." Aristarchus of Thessalonica. This person occurs in chap. xix. 29, and is mentioned there as a Macedonian. He attended Paul in his journey to Rome, chap. xxvii. 2, and was his fellow laborer, Philemon, v. 24, and his fellow prisoner, Col. iv. 10-11. Secundus is mentioned nowhere but in this place.

MATTHEW HENRY

Timothy is reckoned among them, for though Paul, when he departed from Ephesus (v. 1), left Timothy there, yet he soon followed him, and accompanied him, with others here named. Now, one would think, this was no good husbandry, to have all these worthy men accompanying Paul, but so it was ordered, 1. That they might assist him in instructing such as by his preaching were awakened and startled; wherever Paul came, the waters were stirred, and then there was need of many hands to help the cripples in. 2. That they might be trained up by him, and fitted for future service.

V. His coming to Troas. They went before, and stayed for him at Troas (v. 5). We should not think it hard to stay awhile for good company in a journey. Paul made the best of his way thither. Luke was now in company with him; for he says, We sailed from Philippi (v. 6), and the first time we find him in his company was here at Troas, ch. xvi. 11. The days of unleavened bread are mentioned only to describe the time. He came to them to Troas, by sea, in five days, and when he was there stayed but seven days. There is no remedy, but a great deal of time will unavoidably be lost in travelling to and fro, by those who go about doing good, yet it shall not be put upon the score of lost time. Paul thought it worth while to bestow five days in going to Troas, though it was but for an opportunity of seven days' stay there.

Verses 7–12

We have here an account of what passed at Troas the last of the seven days that Paul stayed there.

I. There was a solemn religious assembly of the Christians that were there. 1. The disciples came together, v. 7. Though they read, and meditated, and prayed, and sung psalms, apart, and thereby kept up their communion with God, yet that was not enough; they must come together to worship God in concert, and so keep up their communion with one another. There ought to be stated times for the disciples of Christ to come together; though they cannot all come together in one place, yet as many as can. 2. They came together upon the first day of the week, which they called the Lord's day (Rev. i. 10). This is here said to be the day when it was their practice to come together in all the churches. The first day of the week is to be religiously observed by all the disciples of Christ; and it is a sign between Christ and them. 3. They were gathered together in an upper chamber (v. 8); they had no capacious stately chapel, but met in a private house, in a garret. As they were few, and did not need, so they were poor, and could not build, a large meeting-place; yet they came together, in that despicable inconvenient place. It will be no excuse for our absenting ourselves from religious assemblies that the place of them is not so decent nor so commodious as we would have it to be. 4. They came together to break bread, that is, to celebrate the ordinance of the Lord's supper. In the breaking of the bread, not only the breaking of Christ's body for us, to be a sacrifice for our sins, is commemorated, but the breaking of Christ's body to us, to be food and a feast for our souls, is signified. It was the custom of many churches to receive the Lord's supper every Lord's day, in concert, in a solemn assembly, to testify their joint concurrence in the same faith and worship.

II. In this assembly Paul gave them a sermon, a long sermon, a farewell sermon, v. 7. 1. He preached to them. The preaching of the gospel ought to accompany the sacraments. 2. It was a farewell sermon, he being ready to depart on the morrow. When he was gone, they might have the same gospel preached, but not as he preached it; and therefore they must make the best use of him that they could while they had him. 3. It was a very long sermon: He continued his speech until midnight; for he had a great deal to say, and knew not that ever he should have another opportunity of preaching to them. There may be occasion for ministers to preach, not only in season, but out of season. We know some that would have reproached Paul for this as a long-winded preacher, that tired his hearers; but they were willing to hear: he saw them so, and therefore continued his speech. We wish we had the heads of this long sermon, but we may suppose it was for substance the same with his epistles. The meeting being continued till midnight, there were candles set up, many lights (v. 8). This might prevent the reproach of their enemies, who said they met in the night for works of darkness.

III. A young man in the congregation, that slept at sermon, was killed by a fall out of the window, but raised to life again; his name signifies one that had good fortune, and he answered his name.

1. The infirmity with which he was overtaken.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

mentioned in Romans 16:21. But that they were the same person seems more probable. of the Thessalonians, Aristarchus—See on ch. 19:29. and Secundus—of whom nothing else is known. Gaius of Derbe—Though the Gaius of ch. 19:29 is said to be of "Macedonia," and this one "of Derbe," there is no sufficient reason for supposing them different persons; on the contrary, Romans 16:23 (cf. with III John 1, where there is hardly any reason to doubt that the same Gaius is addressed) seems to show that though he spent an important part of his Christian life away from his native Derbe, he had latterly retired to some place not very far from it. and Timotheus—not probably of Derbe, as one might suppose from this verse, but of Lystra (see on ch. 16:1); both being so associated in his early connection with the apostle that the mention of the one in the previous clause would recall the other on the mention of his name. and of Asia, Tychicus and Trophimus—The latter was an Ephesian, and probably the former also. They seem to have put themselves, from this time forward, at the apostle's disposal, and to the very last been a great comfort to him (Eph. 6:21, 22; Col. 4:7, 8; ch. 21:29; II Tim. 4:12, 20). From the mention of the places to which each of these companions belonged, and still more the order in which they occur, we are left to conclude that they were deputies from their respective churches, charged with taking up and bringing on the collection for the poor saints at Jerusalem, first at Berea, next at Thessalonica, then at Philippi [Hows], where we gather that our historian himself rejoined the party (from the resumption at vs. 5 of the "us," dropped at ch. 16:17), by whom the Philippian collection would naturally be brought on

5, 6. These going before—perhaps to announce and prepare for the apostle's coming. tarried for us at Troas. And we sailed . . . from Philippi after the days of unleavened bread—(i.e., the Passover). This, compared with I Corinthians 16:8, shows that the three months spent at Corinth (vs. 3) were the winter months. came . . . to Troas—for the third and last time. (See on ch. 16:8, and on vs. 1.) in the five days—As it might have been done in two days, the wind must have been adverse. The vivid style of one now present will be here again observed. where we abode seven days—i.e., arriving on a Monday, they stayed over the Jewish sabbath and the Lord's Day following; Paul occupying himself, doubtless, in refreshing and strengthening fellowship with the brethren during the interval. 7. upon the first day of the week, when the disciples came together—This, compared with I Corinthians 16:2, and other similar allusions, plainly indicates that the Christian observance of the day afterwards distinctly called "the Lord's Day," was already a fixed practice of the churches.

Paul preached—discoursed. The tense implies continued action—'kept discoursing.'

8. there were many lights in the upper chamber—not a mere piece of graphic detail by an eyewitness [HACKETT, HOWS], but mentioned, probably, as increasing the heat and contributing to drowsiness [WEBSTER and WILKINSON], as the next clause seems to show. 9. in a—'the'—window—or window-seat, of recess.

ADAM CLARKE

Gaius of Derbe. This is supposed to be the same who is mentioned in chap. xix. 26, and who is there called "a man of Macedonia," of which some suppose he was a native, but descended from a family that came from Derbe; but as Gaius, or Caius, was a very common name, these might have been two distinct persons. One of this name was baptized by Paul at Corinth, 1 Cor. i. 14, and entertained him as his host while he abode there, Rom. xvi. 23. And Timotheus. This was the same person of whom mention is made, chap. xvi. 1, and to whom Paul wrote the two Epistles which are still extant; and who was a native of Lystra, as we learn from the above place. Tychicus . . . of Asia. This person was high in the confidence of Paul. He styles him "a beloved brother and faithful minister in the Lord," whom he sent to the Ephesians, that he might know their affairs, and comfort their hearts, Eph. vi. 21-22. He sent him for the same purpose, and with the same commendations, to the Colossians, Col. iv. 7-8. Paul seems also to have designed him to superintend the church at Crete in the absence of Titus; see Titus ii. 12. He seems to have been the most intimate and confidential friend that Paul had. Trophimus. Was an Ephesian. He accompanied Paul from Ephesus into Greece, as we see here; and from thence to Jerusalem, chap. xxi. 29. He had no doubt travelled with him on other journeys, for we find, by 2 Tim. iv. 20, that he was obliged to leave him sick at Miletus, being then, as it is likely, on his return to his own kindred at Ephesus.

6. Days of unleavened bread. The seven days of the Passover, in which they ate unleavened bread. See the account of this festival in the notes on Exodus xii. It is evident, from the manner in which Luke writes here, that he had not been with Paul since the time he accompanied him to Philippi, chap. xvi. 10-12; but he now embarks at Philippi with the apostle and accompanies him to Troas and continues with him through the rest of his journey.

7. Upon the first day of the week. What was called "the Lord's day," the Christian Sabbath, in which they commemorated the resurrection of our Lord, and which among all Christians afterwards took the place of the Jewish Sabbath. To break bread. To break the Eucharist, as the Syriac has it; intimating by this that they were accustomed to receive the Holy Sacrament on each Lord's day. It is likely that, besides this, they received a common meal together. Some think the agape, or "love feast," is intended.

Continued his speech until midnight. At what time he began to preach we cannot tell, but we hear when he concluded. He preached during the whole night, for he did not leave off till the break of the next day, v. 11, though about midnight his discourse was interrupted by the fall of Eutychus. Paul must have preached a sermon not less than six hours long. But it is likely that a good part of this time was employed in hearing and answering questions.

8. Upper chamber. The pious Quesnel supposes that the smoke issuing from the many lamps in this upper chamber was the cause of Eutychus falling asleep; and this, he says, the apostle mentions in charity to excuse the young man's appearing negligent.

MATTHEW HENRY

He presumptuously sat in the window, unglazed perhaps, and so exposed himself; whereas, if he could have been content to sit on the floor, he had been safe. He slept, nay, he fell into a deep sleep when Paul was preaching, which was a sign he did not duly attend to the things that Paul spoke of. The particular notice taken of his sleeping makes us willing to hope none of the rest slept, though it was sleeping time and after supper.

2. The calamity with which he was seized herein: He fell down from the third loft, and was taken up dead. Some think that the hand of Satan was in it, and that he designed it for a disturbance to this assembly and a reproach to Paul. Others think that God designed it for a warning to all people to take heed of sleeping when they are hearing the word preached. We must look upon it as a bad sign of our low esteem of the word of God. We must do what we can to prevent our being sleepy, get our hearts affected with the word we hear to such a degree as may drive sleep far enough.

3. The miraculous mercy shown him in his recovery to life again, v. 10. It proved an occasion of that which was a great confirmation to his preaching. Paul fell on the dead body, and embraced it, thereby expressing a great compassion to, and an affectionate concern for, this young man. Such tender spirits as Paul had are much affected with sad accidents of this kind, and are far from judging and censuring those that fall under them. As a sign it represented the descent of that divine power upon the dead body, for the putting of life into it again, which at the same time he inwardly, earnestly, and in faith prayed for. He assured them that he had returned to life. Various speculations this ill accident had occasioned in the congregation, but Paul puts an end to them all: "Trouble not yourselves, for his life is in him." He returned to his work immediately after this interruption (v. 11): He came up again to the meeting, they broke bread together in a love-feast, and they talked a long while, even till break of day. Paul did not now go on in a continued discourse, as before, but he and his friends fell into a free conversation. They knew not when they should have Paul's company again, and therefore made the best use they could of it when they had it, and reckoned a night's sleep well lost for that purpose. Before they parted they brought the young man alive into the congregation, and they were not a little comforted, v. 12. It was matter of great rejoicing among them, not only to the relations of the young man, but to the whole society.

Paul is hastening towards Jerusalem. He had called at Troas, and now he makes a sort of coasting voyage, no doubt endeavouring to make every place he came to the better for him.

I. He sent his companions by sea to Assos, but he himself was minded to go afoot, v. 13. He would foot it to Assos: and, if the land-way which Paul took was the shorter way, yet it is taken notice of by the ancients as a rough way. That way Paul would take, 1. That he might call on his friends by the way. Or, 2. That he might be alone, and might have the greater freedom of converse with God and his own heart in solitude. Or, 3. That he might inure himself to hardship, and not seem to indulge his ease. We should use ourselves to deny ourselves.

II. At Assos he went on board with his friends. There they took him in.

III. He made the best of his way to Jerusalem. His ship passed by Chios (v. 15), touched at Samos, they tarried awhile at Trogyllium, the seaport next to Samos, and the next day they came to Miletus, the seaport that lay next to Ephesus; for (v. 16) he had determined not to go to Ephesus at this time, for he hasted, if it were possible for him, to be at Jerusalem on the day of pentecost. He had been at Jerusalem about four or five years ago (ch. xviii. 21, 22), and now he was going thither again to pay his continued respects to that church. He aimed to be there by the feast of pentecost because it was a time of concourse, and the feast of pentecost had been particularly made famous among the Christians by the pouring out of the Spirit. Men of business must fit themselves to set time (with submission to Providence) and strive to keep it, not suffering ourselves to be diverted from it. It is a pleasure to us to be with our friends; it diverts us, nothing more; but we must not by it be diverted from our work. When Paul has a call to Jerusalem, he will not loiter away the time in Asia, though he had more and kinder friends there.

Verses 17–35

fell down from the third loft—'story'—and was taken up dead—"The window projected (according to the side of the room where it was situated) either over the street or over the interior court; so that in either case he fell on the hard earth or pavement below."

10-12. Paul . . . fell on him—like Elisha (II Kings 4:34).

his life is in him—now restored; cf. Mark 5:39. broken bread and eaten—with what a mixture of awe and joy after such an occurrence! and eaten—denoting a common repast, as distinguished from the breaking of the eucharistic bread. and talked a long while, even till break of day. How lifelike this record of dear Christian fellowship, as free and gladsome as it was solemn! ((See Eccles. 9:7.)

13-38. CONTINUING HIS ROUTE TO JERUSALEM, HE REACHES MILETUS, WHENCE HE SENDS FOR THE ELDERS OF EPHESUS—HIS FAREWELL ADDRESS TO THEM. 13, 14. we . . . sailed (from Troas) unto Assos; there . . . to take in Paul: for so had he appointed, minding himself to go afoot—'to go by land.' (See on Mark 6:33.) In sailing southward from Troas to Assos, one has to round Cape Lectum, and keeping due east to run along the northern shore of the Gulf of Adramyttium, on which it lies. This is a sail of nearly forty miles; whereas by land, cutting right across, in a southeasterly direction, from sea to sea, by that excellent Roman road which then existed, the distance was scarcely more than half. The one way Paul wished his companions to take, while he himself, longing perhaps to enjoy a period of solitude, took the other, joining the ship, by appointment, at Assos. came to Mitylene—the capital of the beautiful and classical island of Lesbos, which lies opposite the eastern shore of the Ægean Sea, about thirty miles south of Assos; in whose harbor they seem to have lain for the night. 15, 16. came the next day over against Chios—now Scio: one of the most beautiful of those islands between which and the coast the sail is so charming. They appear not to have touched at it. next day we arrived—'touched' or 'put in'—at Samos—another island coming quite close to the mainland, and about as far south of Chios as it is south of Lesbos. tarried—for the night—at Trogyllium—an anchorage on the projecting mainland, not more than a mile from the southern extremity of the island of Samos. next day we came to Miletus—on the mainland; the ancient capital of Ionia, near the mouth of the Meander. For Paul had determined to sail by—or 'sail past'—Ephesus—He was right opposite to it when approaching Chios. because he would not spend time in Asia—the Asian province of which Ephesus was the chief city. for he hasted, if . . . possible . . . to be at Jerusalem the day of Pentecost—as a suitable season for giving in the great collection from all the western churches, for keeping the feast, and clearing his apostolic position with the Church, then represented in large number at Jerusalem. The words imply that there was considerable ground to doubt if he would attain this object—for more than three of the seven weeks from Passover to Pentecost had already expired—and they are inserted evidently to explain why he did not once more visit Ephesus. 17. from Miletus he sent to Ephesus, and called the elders of

9. There sat in a window. This was probably an opening in the wall, to let in light and air, for there was no glazing at that time; and it is likely that Eutychus fell backward through it down to the ground, on the outside.

10. And Paul . . . fell on him. Stretched himself upon him, in the same manner as Elisha did on the Shunammite's son, 2 Kings iv. 33-35; though the action of lying on him, in order to communicate warmth to the flesh, might not have been continued so long as in the above instance.

11. Had broken bread. Had taken some refreshment, in order to their journey. And talked a long while. Having "familiarly conversed," for this is the import of the word, which is very different from the dielezeto, of the seventh verse, and the dialegonmenou, of the ninth, which imply solemn, grave discourse.

13. Sailed unto Assos. Assos, according to Pausanias, Eliac. ii. 4, and Pliny, Hist. Nat. xxxvi. 27, was a maritime town of Asia. The passage by sea to this place was much longer than by land; and therefore Paul chose to go by land, while the others went by sea. Intending to take in Paul. "To take him in again," for it appears he had already been aboard that same vessel, probably the same that had carried them from Philippi to Troas, v. 6.

14. Came to Mitylene. This was a seaport town in the isle of Lesbos.

15. Over against Chios. This was a very celebrated island between Lesbos and Samos, famous in antiquity for its extraordinary wines. At this island the apostle did not touch. Arrived at Samos. This was another island of the Aegean Sea. It does not appear that they landed at Samos; they passed close by it, and anchored at Trogyllium. This was a promontory of Ionia, which gave name to some small islands in the vicinity of Samos. Came to Miletus. Miletus is famous for being the birthplace of Thales, one of the seven wise men of Greece. Anaximander was also born here, and several other eminent men.

16. To sail by Ephesus. Not to touch there at this time. To be at Jerusalem the day of Pentecost. That he might have the opportunity of preaching the kingdom of God to multitudes of Jews from different places, who would come up to Jerusalem at that feast; and then he no doubt expected to see there a renewal of that Day of Pentecost in which the Spirit was poured out on the disciples and in consequence of which so many were converted to God.

up to Ephesus, he could never have got away from them. These Paul sent for, that he might instruct and encourage them to go on in the work to which they had laid their hands.

It is a very pathetic and practical discourse with which Paul here takes leave of these elders, and has in it much of the excellent spirit of this good man

I. He appeals to them concerning both his life and doctrine, all the time he had been in and about Ephesus (v. 18): "You know after what manner I have been with you." They all knew him to be a man of a serious, gracious, heavenly spirit, that he was no designing self-seeking man. He could not have been carried on with so much evenness and constancy in his services and sufferings, but by the power of divine grace. The temper of his mind, and the tenor both of his preaching and conversation, were such as plainly proved that God was with him of a truth.—He likewise makes this reference to his own conduct as an instruction to them to follow his example: "You know after what manner I have been with you; in like manner be you with those that are committed to your charge when I am gone."

1. His spirit and conversation were excellent and exemplary. (1) He had conducted himself well all along, from the very first day that he came into Asia. He appeared from the first day they knew him to be a man that aimed not only to do well, but to do good. He was a man that was consistent with himself. Take him where you would he was the same at all seasons, he did not turn with the wind nor change with the weather, but as uniform like a die, which, throw it which way you will, lights on a square side. (2) He had made it his business to serve the Lord. He never served himself, nor made himself a servant of men, nor was he a time-server. (3) He had done his work with all humility of mind. He never took state upon him, nor kept people at a distance, but conversed as freely and familiarly with the meanest, for their good, as if he had stood upon a level with them. He was willing to stoop to any service. (4) He had always been very tender, affectionate, and compassionate, among them; he had served the Lord with many tears. Paul was herein like his Master; often in tears. In his preaching, what he had told him before he told them again, even weeping, Phil. iii. 18. So near did they lie to his heart that he wept with those that wept, which was very endearing. (5) He had struggled with many difficulties among them. He went on in his work in the face of much opposition, many temptations, trials of his patience and courage. These befell him by the lying in wait of the Jews, who still were plotting some mischief or other against him. Those are the faithful servants of the Lord that continue to serve him in the midst of troubles and perils, that care not what enemies they make, so that they can but approve themselves to their Master, and make him their friend.

2. His preaching was likewise such as it should be, v. 20, 21. (1) He was a plain preacher: delivered his message so as to be understood. This is intimated in two words, I have shown you, and have taught you. He did not amuse them with nice speculations, nor lose them in the clouds of lofty notions and expressions; but he showed them the plain truths of the gospel, and taught them as children are taught. (2) He was a powerful preacher, which is intimated in his testifying to them; he preached as one upon oath. He preached the gospel, not as a hawker proclaims news in the street (it is all one to him whether it be true or false), but as a conscientious witness gives in his evidence at the bar. (3) He was a profitable preacher. He studied that which was profitable unto them, which had a tendency to make them wise and good, wiser and better, to reform their hearts and lives. He preached such things as brought with them divine light, and heat, and power to their souls. It is not enough not to preach that which is hurtful, but we must preach that which is profitable. Paul aimed to please only in order to profit. (4) He was a painstaking preacher; he preached publicly, and from house to house. He was neither afraid nor ashamed to preach the gospel publicly, nor did he grudge to bestow his pains privately, among a few, when there was occasion for it. Ministers should in their private visits, and as they go from house to house, discourse of those things which they have taught publicly. And, especially, they should help persons to apply the truth to themselves and their own case. (5) He was a faithful preacher. He preached everything that he thought might be profitable, and kept back nothing. He declined not preaching whatever he thought might be profitable, though it was not fashionable, nor to some acceptable. He did not keep back reproofs, when they were necessary, for fear of offending; nor did he keep back the preaching of the cross, though he knew it was to the Jews the church—As he was now some forty miles south of Ephesus, we might think that more time would be lost by sending thus far for the elders to come to him, than by going at once to Ephesus itself, when so near it. But if unfavorable winds and stormy weather had overtaken them, his object could not have been attained, and perhaps he was unwilling to run the risk of detention at Ephesus by the state of the church and other causes. Those here called "elders" or "presbyters," are in vs. 28 called "bishops." (See note there.) The identity of presbyters and bishops in the New Testament is beyond all reasonable dispute. 18. Ye know ... after what manner I have been with you at all seasons—For the Christian integrity and fidelity of his whole official intercourse with them he appeals to themselves.

19. Serving the Lord—Jesus—with all humility ... and many tears and temptations—Self-exaltation was unknown to him, and ease of mind: He "sowed in tears," from anxieties both on account of the converts from whom he "travailed in birth," and of the Jews, whose bitter hostility was perpetually plotting against him, interrupting his work and endangering his life.

20. kept back—timidly withheld from fear of consequences. nothing that was profitable—edification directing all.

"bishops," v. 28. By the presbyteroi, "presbyters or elders," here we are to understand all that were in authority in the church, whether they were bishops or overseers, or seniors in years, knowledge, and experience. The elders were probably the first order in the church; an order which was not so properly constituted, but which rose out of the state of things. From these presbuteroi the episcopoi, overseers or superintendents, were selected. Those who were eldest in years, Christian knowledge, and experience would naturally be preferred to all others as overseers of the Church of Christ. From the Greek word come the Latin presbyterus, the English "presbyter," the French prestre, and our own term "priest"; and all, when traced up to their original, signify merely an elderly or aged person, though it soon became the name of an office rather than of a state of years. Now as these elders are called "bishops," in v. 28, we may take it for granted that they were the same order; or rather, that these superintendents of the Church were indifferently called either "presbyters" or "bishops."

19. Serving the Lord with all humility. This relates not only to his zealous and faithful performance of his apostolic functions, but also to his private walk as a Christian, and shows with what carefulness this apostle himself was obliged to walk in order to have his calling and election as a Christian ratified and made firm.

20. I kept back nothing. Notwithstanding the dangers to which he was exposed and the temptations he must have had to suppress those truths that were less acceptable to the unrenewed nature of man, or to the particular prejudices of the Jews and the Gentiles, he fully and faithfully, at all hazards, declared what he terms, v. 27, the whole counsel of God.

ALBERT BARNES:

"With all humility." Without arrogance, pride, or a spirit of dictation; without a desire to "lord it over God's heritage"; without being elated with the authority of the apostolic office, the variety of the miracles which he was enabled to perform, or the success which attended his labors. What an admirable model for all who are in the ministry; for all who are endowed with talents and learning; for all who meet with remarkable success in their work! The proper effect of such success and of such talent will be to produce true humility. The greatest endowments are usually connected with the most simple and childlike humility.

"And with many tears." Paul not infrequently gives evidence of the tenderness of his heart, of his regard for the souls of men, and of his deep solicitude for the salvation of sinners (Phil. 3:18; 2 Cor. 2:4). The particular thing, however, here specified as producing weeping was the opposition of the Jews. But it cannot be supposed that those tears were shed from a apprehension of personal danger. It was rather because the opposition of the Jews impeded his work, and retarded his progress in winning souls to Christ. A minister of the gospel will feel, and deeply feel for the salvation of his people. He will weep over their condition when he sees them going astray, and in danger of perishing. He will be specially affected with opposition, because it will retard his work, and prevent the progress and the triumph of the gospel. It is not because it is a personal concern, but because it is the cause of his Master. "And temptations." Trials arising from their opposition. We use the word "temptation" in a more limited sense, to denote inducements offered to one to lead him into sin. The word in the Scriptures most commonly denotes "trials" of any kind.—Popular Commentary a stumbling-block and to the Greeks foolishness. (6) He was a catholic preacher. He testified both to the Jews and also to the Greeks. Though he was born and bred a Jew, and was trained up in their prejudices against the Gentiles, yet he did not therefore confine himself to the Jews and avoid the Gentiles; but preached as readily to them as to the Jews. And, on the other hand, though he was called to be the apostle of the Gentiles, and the Jews had an implacable enmity against him upon that score, yet he did not therefore abandon them as reprobates. Ministers must preach the gospel with impartiality; for they are ministers of Christ for the universal church. (7) He was a truly Christian evangelical preacher. He did not preach philosophical notions, nor did he preach politics, but he preached faith and repentance. These he urged upon all occasions. [1] Repentance towards God. He preached repentance as God's great command (ch. xvii. 30), that men should repent, and turn to God, and do works meet for repentance (so he explains it, ch. xxvi. 20); and he preached it as Christ's gift, in order to the remission of sins (ch. v. 31). [2] Faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ. We must by repentance look towards God as our end; and by faith towards Christ as our way to God. Our repentance towards God is not sufficient, we must have a true faith in Christ as our Redeemer and Saviour. For there is no coming to God, as penitent prodigals to a Father, but in the strength of Jesus Christ as Mediator.

II. He declares his expectation of sufferings and afflictions in his present journey to Jerusalem, v. 22–24. Now, behold, I go bound in the spirit to Jerusalem, which may be understood either, (1) Of the certain foresight he had of trouble before him. He was in full expectation of trouble, and made it his daily business to prepare for it. Or, (2) Of the strong impulse he was under to go this journey: "I go bound in the spirit, that is, firmly resolved to proceed, and not from any humour or design of my own. I go led by the Spirit, and bound to follow him wherever he leads me." He does not know particularly the things that shall befall him at Jerusalem. God had not thought fit to reveal them to him. It is good to be kept in the dark concerning future events, that we may be always waiting on God and waiting for him. We know not the things that shall befall us nor what a day, or a night, or an hour, may bring forth; and therefore must refer ourselves to God, let him do with us as seemeth good in his eyes. Yet he does know in general that there is a storm before him; for the prophets in every city he passed through told him, by the Holy Ghost, that bonds and afflictions awaited him. He fixes a brave and heroic resolution to go on with his work. It was a melancholy peal that was rung in his ears in every city, that bonds and afflictions did abide him; yet by the grace of God he was enabled to go on with his work. Let us take it from his own mouth here (v. 24): "None of these things move me." Paul is here an example,

(1) Of holy courage and resolution. He made nothing of them: None of these things move me; I make no account of them. He did not lay these things to heart, Christ and heaven lay there. They did not drive him off from his work; he did not tack about, and go back again, when he saw the storm rise, but went on resolutely. They did not deprive him of his comfort. In the midst of troubles he was as one unconcerned. Those that have their conversation in heaven can look down, not only upon the common troubles of this earth but upon the threatening rage and malice of hell itself, and say that none of these things moved them, as knowing that none of these things can hurt them.

(2) Of a holy contempt of life: Neither count I my life dear to myself. Life is sweet, and is naturally dear to us. All that a man has will he give for his life. Yet to an eye of faith it is comparatively despicable; it is not so dear but it can be cheerfully parted with for Christ.

(3) Of a holy concern to go through with the work of life, which should be much more our care than to secure either the outward comforts of it or the countenance of it. Two things this great and good man is in care about, and if he gain them it is no matter to him what becomes of life: [1] That he may be found faithful to the trust reposed in him, that he may finish the ministry which he has received of the Lord Jesus, may do the work, which he was sent into the world about, or, rather, which he was sent into the church about. And may not do his work by halves. The apostleship was a ministry both to Christ and to the souls of men; and those that were called to it considered more the ministry of it than the dignity or dominion of it. This ministry was received from the Lord Jesus. He entrusted them with it, and from him they received their charge; for him they do their

21. Testifying both to Jews and . . . Greeks—laboring under a common malady, and recoverable only by a common treatment—repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ—See on ch. 5:31. REPENTANCE, as distinguished from faith, is that state of the "honest and good heart" which arises from a discovery of one's contrariety to the righteous demands of the divine law. This is said to be "toward God," because seeing Him to be the party dishonored by sin, it feels all its acknowledgments and compunctions to be properly due to Him, as the great Lawgiver, and directs them to Him accordingly; condemning, humbling itself, and grieving before Him, looking also to Him as its only Hope of deliverance. FAITH is said to be "toward our Lord Jesus Christ," because in that frame of mind just described it eagerly credits the testimony of relief divinely provided in Christ, gladly embraces the overtures of reconciliation in Him, and directs all its expectations of salvation, from its first stage to its last, to Him as the one appointed Medium of all grace from God to a sinful world. Thus we have here a brief summary of all Gospel preaching. And it is easy to see why repentance is here put before faith; for the former must of necessity precede the latter. There is a repentance subsequent to faith, the fruit of felt pardon and restoration. It was this which drew the tears with which the Saviour's feet were once so copiously moistened. (Luke 7:37, 38, 47; and cf. Ezek. 16: 63.) But that is not the light in which it is here presented. 22, 23. And now, behold, I—"I"—is emphatic here. bound in the spirit—cf. ch. 19:21. This internal pressure, unattended with any knowledge of "what was to befall him there," was the result of that higher guidance which shaped all his movements.

Save that the Holy Ghost witnesseth in every city . . .—by prophetic utterances from city to city, as in ch. 11:4; 21:10, 11. Analogous premonitions of coming events are not unknown to the general method of God's providence. They would tend to season the apostle's spirit.

24. But none of these things move me, neither . . .—In this noble expression of absolute dedication to the service of Christ and preparedness for the worst that could befall him in such a cause, note (1) his jealousy for the peculiar character of his mission, as immediately from Christ Himself, on which all the charges against him turned; (2) the burden of that Gospel which he preached—GRACE; it was "the Gospel of the Grace of God."

ADAM CLARKE

21. Testify both to . . . Jews, and . . . Greeks. He always began with the Jews; and in this case he had preached to them alone for three months, chap. xix. 8-10, and left their synagogues only when he found, through their obstinacy, he could do them no good. Repentance toward God. As all had sinned against God, so all should humble themselves before Him against whom they have sinned. But humiliation is no atonement for sin; therefore repentance is insufficient unless faith in our Lord Jesus Christ accompany it. Repentance disposes and prepares the soul for pardoning mercy, but can never be considered as making compensation for past acts of transgression. This repentance and faith were necessary to the salvation of both Jews and Gentiles, for all had sinned and come short of God's glory.

22. I go bound in the spirit. Either meaning the strong influence of the Divine Spirit upon his mind or the strong propensity in his own will, wish, and desire to visit Jerusalem; and in this sense "to bind" is sometimes used. But it appears more consistent with the mind of the apostle, and with that influence under which we find that he constantly acted, to refer it to the influence of the Holy Ghost.

24. None of these things move me. I consider them as nothing; I value them not a straw; they weigh not with me.

Neither count I my life dear. I am not my own; my life and being are the Lord's. He requires me to employ them in His service; I act under His direction, and am not anxious about the issue.

Finish my course with joy. "My ministerial function." We have already met with this word in application to the same subject, chap. xiii. 25. And the apostle here adds, by way of explanation, even that "ministry, which I have received of the Lord." The words with joy are omitted by several MSS.

MATTHEW HENRY

work, in his name, in his strength. The work of his ministry was to testify the gospel of the grace of God. It is a proof of God's goodwill to us, and a means of his good work in us; it shows him gracious towards us, and tends to make us gracious, and so is the gospel of the grace of God. Paul desired not to live a day longer than he might be instrumental to spread the knowledge of this gospel. [2] That he may finish well. He cares not when the period of his life comes, nor how, so that he may but finish his course with joy. He looks upon his life as a course, a race, so the word is. This intimates that we have our labours appointed us, and our limits appointed us, for we were not sent into the world to be here always, but to pass through the world, nay, to run through it, and it is soon run through. He counts upon the finishing of his course, and speaks of it as sure and near. Dying is the end of our race, when we come off either with honour or shame. He is full of care to finish it well. He thinks nothing too much to do, nor too hard to suffer, so that he may but finish well, finish with joy. We must look upon it as the business of our life to provide for a joyful death, that we may not only die safely, but die comfortably.

III. Counting upon it that this was the last time they should see him, he appeals to their consciences concerning his integrity.

1. He tells them that he was now taking his last leave of them (v. 25): I know that you all, among whom I have been conversant preaching the kingdom of God, shall never see my face again. Paul here speaks it with assurance, that these Ephesians should see his face no more; and we cannot think that he who spoke so doubtfully of that which he was not sure of (not knowing the things that shall befall me there, v. 22) would speak this with so much confidence unless he had had a special warrant from the Spirit to say it. He would never have said thus solemnly, Now, behold, I know it, if he had not known it for certain. We ought often to think of it, that those who now are preaching to us the kingdom of God will shortly be removed and we shall see their faces no more. Yet a little while is their light with us; it concerns us therefore to improve it while we have it, that when we shall see their faces no more on earth, yet we may hope to look them in the face with comfort in the great day.

2. He appeals to them concerning the faithful discharge of his ministry among then (v. 26). (1) He challenges them to prove him unfaithful: I am pure from the blood of all men, the blood of souls. "You cannot say but I have given warning, and therefore no man's blood can be laid at my door." If a minister has approved himself faithful, he may have this rejoicing in himself, I am pure from the blood of all men. (2) He therefore leaves the blood of those that perish upon their own heads, because they had fair warning given them, but they would not take it. (3) He charges these ministers to look to it that they took care and pains, as he had done. I take you to record this day. As sometimes the heaven and earth are appealed to, so here this day shall be a witness, this parting day.

3. He proves his own fidelity with this (v. 27): For I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God. He had preached to them nothing but the counsel of God, and had not added any inventions of his own; "it was pure gospel, and nothing else." The gospel is the counsel of God. This counsel of God it is the business of ministers to declare as it is revealed, and not otherwise. He had preached to them the whole counsel of God. As he had preached to them the gospel pure, so he had preached it to them entire. He had not wilfully nor designedly avoided the declaring of any part of the counsel of God. He had not declined preaching upon the most difficult parts of the gospel, nor declined preaching upon the most plain and easy parts of it; he had not shunned preaching those doctrines which he knew would be provoking to the watchful enemies of Christianity, or displeasing to the careless professors of it. And thus it was that he kept himself pure from the blood of all men.

IV. He charges them as ministers to be diligent and faithful in their work.

1. He commits the care of the church at Ephesus to them, who, though doubtless they were so numerous that they could not all meet in one place, are yet called here one flock, because they not only agreed in one faith, but in many instances they kept up communion one with another. To these elders or presbyters the apostle here commits the government of this church, and tells them that not he, but the Holy Ghost, had made them overseers—bishops of the flock. "You that are presbyters are bishops of the Holy Ghost's making." Now that they begin to be fledged they must learn to fly themselves, and to 25-27. I know that ye all . . . shall see my face no more—not an inspired prediction of what was certainly to be, but what the apostle, in his peculiar circumstances, fully expected. Whether, therefore, he ever did see them again, is a question to be decided purely on its own evidence.

I am pure from the blood of all men—(Ch. 18:6; and cf. I Sam. 12:3, 5; Ezek. 3:17-21; 33:8, 9).

To testify. "Earnestly, solemnly, and strenuously to assert, vindicate, and prove the gospel of the grace of God," not only to be in itself what it professes to be, but to be also the power of God for salvation to everyone that believes.

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

According to the verse before us the apostle regarded life as a race which he had to run. Now, the more quickly a race is run the better: certainly, length is not the object of desire. The one thought of a runner is how he can most speedily reach the winningpost. He spurns the ground beneath him: he cares not for the course he traverses except so far as it is the way over which he must run to reach his desired end. Such was life to Paul: all the energies of his spirit were consecrated to the pursuit of one object—namely, that he might everywhere bear testimony to the gospel of the grace of God; and the life which he lived here below was only valued by him as a means to that end. He also regarded the gospel, and his ministry in witnessing to it, as a sacred deposit which had been committed to him by the Lord himself. He looked upon himself "as put in trust with the gospel"; and he resolved to be faithful though it should cost him his life. He says he "desired to fulfill the ministry which he had received of the Lord Jesus Christ." Before his mind's eye he saw the Savior taking into His pierced hands the priceless casket which contains the celestial jewel of the grace of God, and saying to him, "I have redeemed thee with My blood, and I have called thee by My name, and now I commit this precious thing into thy hands, that thou mayest take care of it, and guard it even with thy heart's blood. I commission thee to go everywhere in My place and stead, and to make known to every people under heaven the gospel of the grace of God." All believers occupy a somewhat similar place. We are none of us called to the apostleship, and we may not all have been called to the public preaching of the Word of God; but we are all charged to be valiant for the truth upon the earth, and to contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints. Oh, to do this in the spirit of the apostle of the Gentiles!—The Treasury of the New Testament

25. Ye all . . . shall see my face no more. This probably refers simply to the persons who were now present, concerning whom he might have had a divine intimation that they should not be found in life when he should come that way again. Or it may refer only to Ephesus and Miletus. From the dangers to which he was exposed it was, humanly speaking, unlikely that he should ever return; and this may be all that is implied. But that he did revisit those parts, though probably not Miletus or Ephesus, appears likely from Phil. i. 25-27; ii. 24; Philemon 22; Heb. xiii. 19-23. But in all these places he speaks with a measure of uncertainty: he had not an absolute evidence that he should not return, but in his own mind it was a matter of uncertainty. The Holy Spirit did not think proper to give him a direct revelation on this point.

26. I am pure from the blood of all. If any man, Jew or Gentile, perish in his sins, his blood shall be upon him; he alone shall be accessory to his own perdition. I am blameless, because I have fully shown to both the way to escape from every evil.

27. I have not shunned to declare. "I have not suppressed or concealed" anything, through fear or favor, that might be beneficial to your souls. This is properly the meaning of the original word. All the counsel of God. All that God has "determined" and revealed concerning the salvation of man—the whole doctrine of Christ crucified, with repentance towards God, and faith in Jesus as the Messiah and great atoning Priest. In Isa. ix. 6, Jesus Christ is called the wonderful Counsellor, which the Septuagint translate "the messenger of the great counsel." To this the apostle may have referred, as we well know that this version was constantly under his eye. Declaring therefore to them the whole counsel of God, the whole of that counsel or design of God, was in effect declaring the whole that concerned the Lord Jesus, who was the Messenger of this counsel.

28. Made you overseers. "Appointed you bishops," for so we translate the original word in most places where it occurs: but "overseers" act without him, for the Holy Ghost had made them overseers. The Holy Ghost in them qualified them for, and enriched them to, this great undertaking, the Holy Ghost fell upon them, ch. xix. 6. The Holy Ghost also directed those that called, and ordained, them to this work in answer to prayer.

2. He commanded them to mind the work to which they were called. Dignity calls for duty; if the Holy Ghost has made them overseers of the flock, they must be true to their trust. (1) They must take heed to themselves in the first place, must walk circumspectly. "You have many eyes upon you, some to take example by you, others to pick quarrels with you, and therefore you ought to take heed to yourselves." Those are not likely to be skilful or faithful keepers of the vineyards of others that do not keep their own. (2) "Take heed to the flock." Ministers must not only take heed to their own souls, but must have a constant regard to the souls of those who are under their charge. "Take heed to all the flock, that none of them wander from the fold or be seized by the beasts of prey; that none of them be missing." (3) They must feed the church of God, must lead the sheep of Christ into the green pastures, must lay meat before them, must feed them with wholesome doctrine, and must see that nothing is wanting that is necessary in order to their being nourished up to eternal life. There is need of pastors, not only to gather the church of God, but to feed it by building up those that are within. (4) They must watch (v. 31), as shepherds keep watch over their flocks by night; watch against everything that will be hurtful to the flock, and watch for everything that will be advantageous to it.

3. He gives them several good reasons why they should mind the business of their ministry.

(1) Let them consider the interest of their Master, and his concern for the flock, v. 28. It is the church which he has purchased with his own blood. "It is his own; you are but his servants to take care of it for him. Your carelessness and treachery are so much the worse if you neglect your work, for you wrong God. And, if it be the church of God, he expects you should show your love to him by feeding his sheep and lambs." He has purchased it. Therefore it ought to be dear to us, for it was dear to him, because it cost him dear, and we cannot better show it than by feeding his sheep and his lambs. This church of God is what he has purchased with his own blood. In consideration of this, therefore, feed the church of God, because it is purchased at so dear a rate. Did Christ lay down his life to purchase it, and shall his ministers be wanting in any care and pains to feed it?

(2) Let them consider the danger that the flock was in of being made a prey to its adversaries, v. 29, 30. "You are concerned to take heed both to yourselves and to it." Here are reasons for both. [1] Take heed to the flock, for wolves are abroad, that seek to devour (v. 29): I know this, that after my departure grievous wolves shall enter in among you. Some understand it of persecutors. They thought, because, while Paul was with them, the rage of the Jews was most against him, that, when he had gone out of the country, they would be quiet: "No," says he, "after my departure you will find the persecuting spirit still working." Ministers must take a more than ordinary care of the flock in times of persecution. It is rather to be understood of seducers and false teachers. Probably Paul has an eye to those of the circumcision, who preached up the ceremonial law; these he calls grievous wolves. While Paul was at Ephesus, they kept away, for they durst not face him; but, when he was gone, then they entered in among them. [2] Take heed to yourselves, for some shepherds will apostatise (v. 30): "Also of your ownselves, shall men arise speaking perverse things. They will pervert some sayings of the gospel to make them patronize their errors. But it is to draw away disciples after them, to make a party for themselves." Some read it, to draw away disciples after them—those that are already disciples of Christ draw them from him to follow them. But, though there were some such seducers in the church of Ephesus, yet it should seem by Paul's Epistle to that church that that church was not so much infested with false teachers as some other churches were; but its peace and purity were preserved by the blessing of God on the pains and vigilance of these presbyters.

(3) Let them consider the great pains that Paul had taken in planting this church (v. 31): "Remember that for the space of three years I ceased not to warn everyone night and day with tears." Paul, like a faithful watchman, had warned them, and by the warnings he gave men, he prevailed with them to embrace Christianity. He warned everyone; besides the public warnings he gave in his preaching, he applied himself to particular persons according as he saw their case with the sacred text, in rendering the word "overseers," whereas it ought here, as in all other places, to have been 'bishops,' in order that the fact of elders and bishops having been originally and apostolically synonymous, might be apparent to the ordinary English reader, which now it is not [ALFORD]. The distinction between these offices cannot be certainly traced till the second century, nor was it established till late in that century. to feed the church of God—or, 'the Church of the Lord.' Which of these two readings of the text is the true one, is a question which has divided the best critics. The evidence of MSS. preponderates in favor of 'THE LORD'; some of the most ancient Versions, though not all, so read; and Athanasius, the great champion of the supreme Divinity of Christ early in the fourth century, says the expression 'Church of God' is unknown to the Scriptures. Which reading, then, does the internal evidence favor? As 'Church of God' occurs nine times elsewhere in Paul's writings, and 'Church of the Lord' nowhere, the probability, it is said, is that he used his wonted phraseology here also. But if he did, it is extremely difficult to see how so many early transcribers should have altered it into the quite unusual phrase, 'Church of the Lord'; whereas, if the apostle did use this latter expression, and the historian wrote it so accordingly, it it easy to see how transcribers might, from being so accustomed to the usual phrase, write it 'Church of God.' On the whole, therefore, we accept the second reading as most probably the true one. But see what follows.

which he hath purchased—'made His own,' 'acquired—with his own blood—'His own' is emphatic: 'That glorified Lord who from the right hand of power in the heavens is gathering and ruling the Church, and by His Spirit, through human agency, hath set you over it, cannot be indifferent to its welfare in your hands, seeing He hath given for it His own most precious blood, thus making it His own by the dearest of all ties.' The transcendent sacredness of the Church of Christ is thus made to rest on the dignity of its Lord and the consequent preciousness of that blood which He shed for it. And as the sacrificial atoning character of Christ's death is here plainly expressed, so His supreme dignity is implied as clearly by the second reading as it is expressed by the first. What a motive to pastoral fidelity is here furnished!

29, 30. after my departing shall grievous wolves enter in among you—Two classes of coming enemies are here announced, the one more external to themselves, the other bred in the bosom of their own community; both were to be teachers, but the one, "grievous wolves," not sparing, i.e., making a prey of the flock; the other, simply sectarian "perverters" of the truth, with the view of drawing a party after them. Perhaps the one pointed to that subtle poison of Oriental Gnosticism which we know to have very early infected the Asiatic churches; the other to such Judaizing tendencies as we know to have troubled nearly all the early churches. See the Epistles to the Ephesians, Colossians, and Timothy, also those to the seven churches of Asia (chs. 2 and 3). But watchfulness against all that tends to injure and corrupt the Church is the duty of its pastors in every age.

31. by the space of three years—speaking in round numbers; for it was nearer three than two years.

ADAM CLARKE

or "inspectors" is much more proper. The persons who examine into the spiritual state of the flock of God, and take care to lead them in and out and to find them pasture, are termed "superintendents." That "bishop" and "presbyter," or "elder," were at this time of the same order, and that the word was indifferently used of both, see noticed on v. 17. Feed the church of God. This verse has been the subject of much controversy, particularly in reference to the term of God, in this place, and concerning it there is great dissension among the MSS. and versions. Three readings exist in them, in reference to which critics and commentators have been much divided; viz., "the church of God," "of the Lord," "of the Lord and God."

F. B. MEYER:

"Take heed unto yourselves, and to all the flock." There are many lessons in this verse:

(1) The Christian worker must not neglect his own soul. He must take heed to himself, as well as to the flock. Our temptation is to neglect our close walk with God in our eagerness to save others.

(2) The overseer, elder, or bishop, is not set over the flock, but is in it. Note the force of the Greek, as given in RV: the flock in the which they are made bishops. So to the end of life the most eminent of God's servants must remember that he is but a saved sinner, needing the blood and righteousness of Christ as much as the weakest of his flock; and he also must lie down in green pastures, and be led beside still waters.

(3) The office of the minister is given by the Holy Ghost. It is He who lays on him the burden of souls, and equips him for his work. He, too, is willing to direct and use. How awful and solemn the responsibility!

(4) Notice that the Church is distinctly asserted to be God's. "Feed the church of God." We are his people and the sheep of his pasture. His by choice, by purchase, by the drawing of the Holy Ghost. We must get a right understanding of this doctrine of the Church, that she has been taken out of the world to be God's peculiar possession and delight.

(5) The purchase money of the Church is here said to be God's own blood. It is a remarkable expression. It stands alone in the Word of God, but brings out very distinctly the thought that the entire Godhead achieved man's redemption in the offering of the cross. We are dear to God, and must give Him the benefit of his great expenditure!

—Great Verses Through the Bible

29. After my departing. Referring most likely to his death, for few of these evils took place during his life. Grievous wolves. Persons professing to be teachers; Judaizing Christians, who, instead of feeding the flock, would feed themselves, even to the oppression and ruin of the church.

30. Also of your own selves. From out of your own assembly shall men arise, speaking perverse things, teaching for truth what is erroneous in itself and perversive of the genuine doctrine of Christ crucified. To draw away disciples. To make schisms or rents in the church, in order to get a party to themselves.

31. Therefore watch, and remember. The only way to abide in the truth is to watch against evil, and for good; and to "keep in mind" the heavenly doctrines originally received. By the space of three years. The Greek word here does not necessarily mean three whole years; it may be months more or less. In chap. xix. 8 and 10, we have an account of his spending "two years and three months" among them; probably this is all that is intended.

case called for it. He was constant in giving warning; he warned night and day; his time was filled up with his work. He was indefatigable in it; he ceased not to warn. He warned those that were righteous not to turn from their righteousness, as he had warned them when they were wicked to turn from their wickedness. He spoke to them about their souls with a great deal of affection and concern: he warned them with tears. As he had served the Lord, so he had served them, with many tears, v. 19. Thus free had he been of his pains; and why then should they be sparing of their pains in carrying it on?

V. He recommends them to divine direction and influence (v. 32): "And now, brethren, I commend you to God." Paul directs them to look up to God with an eye of faith, and beseeches God to look down on them with an eye of favour.

1. See here to whom he commends them. He commends them to God, begs of God to provide for them, and encourages them to cast all their care upon him: "Whatever you want, go to God. Let this be your comfort, that you have a God to go to, a God all sufficient." From whomsoever we are separated, still we have God nigh unto us. He commends them to the word of his grace, by which some understand Christ: he is the word (John i. 1). He is here called the word of God's grace, because from his fulness we receive grace for grace. Paul commends them not only to God and to his providence, but to Christ and his grace. It comes to much the same thing, if by the word of his grace we understand the gospel of Christ. "You will find much relief by acting faith on the providence of God, but much more by acting faith on the promises of the gospel." He commends them to the word of God's grace, not only as the foundation of their hope and the fountain of their joy, but as the rule of their walking: "I commend you to God, as your Master, and to the word of his grace. Observe the precepts of this word, and then live upon the promises of it."

2. See here what he commends them to the word of God's grace for. They had received the gospel of the grace of God, and were entrusted to preach it. Now he recommends them to that, for their edification: "It is able to build you up. Though you are already furnished with good gifts, there is that in it with which you need to be better acquainted and more affected." Ministers must aim at their own edification as well as at the edification of others. The most advanced Christians, while they are in this world, are capable of growing. For their glorification: It is able to give you an inheritance among all those who are sanctified. The word of God's grace gives it, not only as it gives the knowledge of it, but as it gives the promise of it, the promise of a God that cannot lie; and by the word, the Spirit of grace is given (ch. x. 44), to be the seal of the promise. Heaven is an inheritance which gives an indefeasible right to all the heirs. This inheritance is secured to all those, and those only, that are sanctified; for as those cannot be welcome guests to the holy God that are unsanctified, so really heaven would be no heaven to them; but to all that are sanctified, that are born again, it is as sure as almighty power and eternal truth can make it. We cannot expect to be among the glorified hereafter unless we be among the sanctified here.

VI. He recommends himself to them as an example of indifference to this world. He had recommended them to God for spiritual blessings, which are the best blessings; but what shall they do for food for their families. "As to these," Paul says, "do as I did."

1. He never aimed at worldly wealth (v. 33): "I have coveted no man's silver, or gold, or apparel." There were many in Ephesus who were rich, and made a very good appearance. Paul was not ambitious to live like them. We may take it in this sense: I never coveted to have so much silver and gold at command as I see others have. I neither condemn them nor envy them. I can live comfortably and usefully without living great. He knew how to want and how to be abased. He was not greedy to receive from them, silver, or gold, or apparel; so far from being always craving that he was not so much as coveting. "Whose kindness have I coveted, or asked? Or to whom have I been burdensome?"

2. He had worked for his living, and taken a great deal of pains to get bread (v. 34): "Yea, you yourselves know that these hands of mine have ministered to my necessities, and to those that were with me." Paul was sometimes reduced to necessities, and the want of the common supports of life. What an unthinking, unkind, and ungrateful world is this, that could let such a man as Paul be poor in it! He desired no more than to have his necessities supplied. When he was to earn his bread, he did it by a manual occupation. Paul had a head and a tongue that he might

32. I commend you to God. Instead of to God, several MSS. have "to the Lord"; neither reading makes any difference in the sense.

And to the word of his grace. The doctrine of salvation by Christ Jesus.

Being made children of God by faith in Christ Jesus, and sanctified by His Spirit, they have a right to the heavenly inheritance; for only the children of the family can possess the celestial estate. Thus we find they must be saved by grace and be made thereby children of God; be sanctified by His Spirit; and then, being prepared for, they are removed in due time into the heavenly inheritance.

33. I have coveted no man's silver. And from this circumstance they would be able to discover the grievous wolves and the perverters; for these had nothing but their own interests in view, whereas the genuine disciples of Christ neither coveted nor had worldly possessions. Paul's account of his own disinterestedness is very similar to that given by Samuel of his, 1 Sam. xii. 3-5.

34. These hands have ministered. It was neither "sin nor discredit" for the apostle to work to maintain himself, when the circumstances of the church were such that it could not support him. Still many eminent ministers of God are obliged to support themselves and their families, at least in part, in the same way, while indefatigably testifying the gospel of the grace of God.

have got money by, but they were these hands, saith he, that ministered to my necessities. Paul puts these presbyters (and others in them) in mind of this, that they may not think it strange if they be thus neglected. The less encouragement they have from men, the more they shall have from God. He worked not only for himself, but for the support of those also that were with him. This was hard indeed. It had better become them to have worked for him. But so it is; those that are willing to take the labouring oar will find those about them willing they should have it.

3. Even then, when he worked for the supply of his own necessities, yet he spared something out of what he got for the relief of others; for this he here obliges them to do (v. 35): "I have shown you all things, that so labouring you ought to support the weak." Understand it of their helping to support the sick, and the poor, and those that could not labour, because it agrees with Paul's exhortation (Eph. iv. 28): Let him labour, working with his hands, that he may have to give to him that needeth. We must labour in an honest employment, not only that we may be able to live, but that we may be able to give. This might seem a hard saying, and therefore Paul backs it with a saying of our Master's. An excellent saying it is, and has something of a paradox in it: It is more blessed to give than to receive. It is more blessed to give to others than to receive from others; not only more blessed to be rich, and so on the giving hand, than to be poor, and so on the receiving hand (everyone will own this); but more blessed to do good with what we have, be it much or little, than to increase it and make it more. The sentiment of the children of this world is contrary to this; they are afraid of giving. They are in hope of getting. Clear gain is with them the most blessed thing that can be; but Christ tells us, It is more blessed to give than to receive. It makes us more like to God, who gives to all, and receives from none; and to the Lord Jesus, who went about doing good. It is more blessed to give our pains than to receive pay for it. It is more pleasant to do good to the grateful, but it is more honourable to do good to the ungrateful, for then we have God to be our paymaster.

After the parting sermon that Paul preached to the elders of Ephesus we have here the parting prayer and tears.

I. They parted with prayer (v. 36): And, when he had thus spoken, he kneeled down, and prayed with them all. It was a joint prayer. He not only prayed for them, but prayed with them, prayed with them all. Public prayers are so far from being intended to supersede our own secret prayers, that they are designed to quicken and encourage them. It was a humble reverent prayer. This was expressed by the posture they used: He kneeled down, and prayed with them, which is significant both of adoration and of petition, especially petition for the forgiveness of sin. It was a prayer after sermon. He had committed the care of the church at Ephesus to those elders, and now he prays that God would enable them faithfully to discharge this great trust reposed in them. He prayed for the flock that the great Shepherd of the sheep would take care of them all, and keep them from being a prey to the grievous wolves. Thus he taught these ministers to pray for those they preached to. It was a parting prayer. It is good for friends, when they part, to part with prayer, that by praying together just at parting they may be enabled to pray the more feelingly one for another when they are separated. Paul here followed the example of Christ, who, when he took leave of his disciples, after he had preached to them, prayed with them all, John xvii. 1.

II. They parted with tears, and most affectionate embraces, v. 37, 38. They all wept sorely. He that was so often in tears while he was with them (v. 19, 31), no doubt shed many at parting. But the notice is taken of their tears: They all wept sorely; there was not a dry eye among them. These were tears of love and mutual endearment. They fell upon Paul's neck, and kissed him. Those that are most living are commonly best beloved. Paul, who was a most affectionate friend himself, had friends that were very affectionate to him. That which cut them to the heart thus was that word which Paul spoke, that he was certain they should see his face no more. When they are told that they shall see his face no more in this world, that it is a final farewell they are now giving and taking, this makes it a great mourning. When our friends are separated from us by death, this is the consideration with which we raise up our mourning, that we shall see their faces no more; but we complain not of this as those that have no hope. Though we shall see their faces no more in this world, we hope that so labouring—as I have done, for others, as well as myself—ye ought to support the weak, and to remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he—'how Himself'—said, It is more blessed to give than to receive—This golden saying, snatched from oblivion, and here added to the Church's abiding treasures, is apt to beget the wish that more of what issued from those Lips which "dropped as an honeycomb," had been preserved to us. But see on John 21:25.

36-38. he kneeled down and prayed with them all . . .—Nothing can be more touching than these three concluding verses, leaving an indelible impression of rare ministerial fidelity and affection on the apostle's part, and of warm admiration and attachment on the part of these Ephesian presbyters. Would to God that such scenes were more frequent in the Church!

ADAM CLARKE

35. I have shewed you all things. The clause should be read thus—"I have showed you in all things." It is more blessed to give than to receive. That is, the giver is more "happy" than the receiver. Where or on what occasion our Lord spake these words we know not, as they do not exist in any of the four Evangelists. But that our Lord did speak them Paul's evidence is quite sufficient to prove. The sentiment is worthy of Christ.

37. Fell on Paul's neck. Leaned their heads against his shoulders and kissed his neck. This was not an unusual custom in the East.

38. That they should see his face no more. This was a most solemn meeting, and a most affecting parting. The man who had first pointed out to them the Lord Jesus Christ, by whom they had been brought into so glorious a state of salvation, is now going away, in all likelihood to be seen no more till the day in which the quick and dead shall stand before the throne of judgment.

As the disciples are stated to have come together on the first day of the week, we may learn from this that ever since the apostolic times the "Lord's day," now the Christian Sabbath, was set apart for religious exercises, such as the preaching of God's holy Word and celebrating the sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

ALBERT BARNES:

"The words of the Lord Jesus." These words are nowhere recorded by the evangelists. But they did not pretend to record all his sayings and instructions (John 21:25). There is the highest reason to suppose that many of his sayings which are not recorded would be treasured up by those who heard them; would be transmitted to others; and would be regarded as a precious part of his instructions. Paul evidently addresses the elders of Ephesus as if they had heard this before, and were acquainted with it. Perhaps he himself had reminded them of it. This is one of the Redeemer's most precious sayings; and it seems even to have a peculiar value from the fact that it is not recorded in the regular and professed histories of his life. It comes to us recovered, as it were, from the great mass of his unrecorded sayings; rescued from that oblivion to which it was hastening if left to mere tradition, and placed in permanent form in the sacred writings by the act of an apostle who had never seen the Savior before his crucifixion. It is a precious relic, and the effect of it is to make us regret that more of his words were not recovered from an uncertain tradition, and placed in a permanent form by an inspired penman. God, however, who knows what is requisite to guide us, has directed the words which are needful for the welfare of the church, and has preserved by inspiration the doctrines which are adapted to convert and bless man.

"It is more blessed to give." It is a higher privilege; it tends more to the happiness of the individual and of the world. The giver is more blessed or happy than the receiver. There is pleasure in the act of giving when it is done with pure motives. It promotes our own peace; is followed by happiness in the recollection of it; and will be followed by happiness for ever. That is the most truly happy man who is most benevolent. He is the most miserable who has never known the luxury of doing good, but who lives to gain all he can, and to hoard all he gains. Those who give from a pure motive God will bless. They will be rewarded, not only in the peace which they shall experience in this life, but in the higher bliss of heaven (Matt. 15:34-36).

We may also remark that this is a sentiment truly great and noble. It is worthy of the Son of God. It is that on which he himself acted when he came to give pardon to the guilty, comfort to the disconsolate and the mourner, peace to the anxious sinner, sight to the blind, hearing to the deaf, life to the dead, and heaven to the guilty and the lost. Acting on this, he gave his own tears to weep over human sorrows and human guilt; his own labors and toils to instruct and save man; his own life a sacrifice for sin on the cross. Loving to give, he has freely given us all things. Loving to give, he delights in the same character in his followers, and seeks that they who have wealth, and strength, and influence, should be willing to give all to save the world. Imitating his great example, and complying with his command, the church shall yet learn more and more to give its wealth to bless the poor and needy; its sons and its daughters to bear the gospel to the benighted heathen; its undivided and constant efforts to save a lost world. Here closes this speech of Paul; an address of inimitable tenderness and beauty. Happy would it be if every minister could bid such an adieu to his people, when called to part from them; and happy if, at the close of life, every Christian could leave the world with a like consciousness that he had been faithful in the discharge of his duty. Thus dying, it will be blessed to leave the world; and thus would the example of the saints live in the memory of survivors long after they themselves have ascended to their rest.—Popular Commentary to see them again in a better world, and to be there together for ever and with the Lord.

III. They accompanied him unto the ship that they might have a little more of his company and conversation, and see the last of him. Loth to part bids oft farewell. But this was a comfort to both sides, that the presence of Christ both went with him and stayed with them.

CHAPTER 21

I. How much ado Paul had to get clear from Ephesus, intimated in the first words of the chapter, after we had gotten from them. Paul was loth to leave them, and they were loth to part with him, but so it must be.

II. What a prosperous voyage they had thence. They came with a straight course to Coos—the next day to Rhodes,—thence to Patara, a famous port, the metropolis of Lycia (v. 1); here they very happily found a ship sailing over into Phenicia, the very course they were steering, v. 2. Providence must be acknowledged when things happen thus opportunely. This ship that was bound for Phenicia (that is, Tyre) they took the convenience of, went on board, and set sail. In this voyage they discovered Cyprus, the island that Barnabas was of, and which he took care of, and therefore Paul did not visit it, but we left it on the left hand (v. 3), sailed upon the coast of Syria, and at length landed at Tyre, for there the ship was to unlade her burden.

III. The halt that Paul made at Tyre.

1. At Tyre he found disciples. Wherever Paul came, he enquired what disciples were there, and associated with them; for we know what is the usage with birds of a feather. When Christ was upon earth, though he went sometimes into the coast of Tyre, yet he never went thither to preach the gospel there. But, after the enlarging of the gospel commission, Christ was preached at Tyre, and had disciples there.

2. Paul, finding those disciples at Tyre, tarried there seven days. He stayed seven days at Troas (ch. xx. 6), and here so many days at Tyre, that he might be sure to spend one Lord's day with them.

3. The disciples at Tyre were endowed with such gifts that they could by the Spirit foretell the troubles Paul would meet with at Jerusalem; for the Holy Ghost witnessed it in every city, ch. xx. 23. God saw fit to have it much prophesied of before, that people's faith, instead of being offended, might be confirmed. Foreseeing his troubles, out of love to him, they begged of him that he would not go up to Jerusalem. Therefore they said to him, by the Spirit, that he should not go up. It was not at all their fault to think so, but it was their mistake, for his trial would be for the glory of God and the furtherance of the gospel, and he knew it.

4. The disciples of Tyre, though they were none of Paul's converts, yet showed a very great respect to Paul. Though they had had but seven days' acquaintance with him, they all came together, with their wives and children, solemnly to take leave of him. We should pay respect, not only to our own ministers, but we must, as there is occasion, testify our love and respect to all the faithful ministers of Christ. It is good to train up children in a respect to good people and good ministers. No doubt, gracious notice was taken of the children of the disciples at Tyre, that honoured an apostle, as Christ accepted the hosannas of the little children. We should be good husbands of our opportunities, and make the utmost we can of them for the good of our souls. They brought Paul on his way, that they might have so much the more of his company and his prayers.

5. They parted with prayer, as Paul and the Ephesian elders had done, ch. xx. 36. We kneeled down on the shore and prayed. As he was much in prayer so he was mighty in prayer. Those that are going to sea should commit themselves to God by prayer, and put themselves under his protection, as those that hope, even when they leave the terra firma, to find firm footing for their faith in the providence of God. They kneeled down on the shore, though we may suppose it either stony or dirty, and there prayed. Where he lifted up his prayer, he bowed his knees. Mr. George Herbert says, Kneeling never spoiled silk stockings.

6. They parted at last (v. 6): When we had taken our leave one of another, we took ship, and they returned home again. Paul left his blessing behind him with those that returned home, and those that stayed sent their prayers after those that went to sea.

IV. Their arrival at Ptolemais (v. 7): We came to

CHAPTER 21

Vss. 1-16. SAILING FROM EPHESUS, THEY LAND AT TYRE, AND THENCE SAILING TO PTOLEMAIS, THEY PROCEED BY LAND TO CÆSAREA AND JERUSALEM. 1. we were gotten—'torn'—from them—expressing the difficulty and pain of the parting. with a straight course—running before the wind, as ch. 16:11. unto Coos—Cos, an island due south from Miletus, which they would reach in about six hours, and coming close to the mainland. the day following unto Rhodes—another island, some fifty miles to the southeast, of brilliant classic memory and beauty. thence unto Patara—a town on the magnificent mainland of Lycia, almost due east from Rhodes. It was the seat of a celebrated oracle of Apollo. 2. And finding a ship—their former one going no farther, probably—to Phœnica—See on ch. 11:19. went abroad—One would almost think this extracted from a journal of the voyage, so graphic are its details. 3. when we . . . discovered—'sighted,' as the phrase is—Cyprus, we left it on the left hand—i.e., steered southeast of it, leaving it on the northwest. sailed into—'unto'—Syria, and landed at Tyre—the celebrated seat of maritime commerce for East and West. It might be reached from Patara in about two days. there the ship was to unlade her burden—which gave the apostle time for what follows.

4-6. finding disciples—finding out the disciples,—implying some search. They would expect such, from what is recorded, ch. 11:19. Perhaps they were not many; yet there were gifted ones among them. who said to Paul . . . that he should not go up to Jerusalem—See on ch. 20:23; also on vss. 11-14.

they all brought us on our way with wives and children . . . and we kneeled down on the shore and prayed—See on ch. 20:36-38. Observe here that the children of these Tyrian disciples not only were taken along with their parents, but must have joined in this act of solemn worship. See on Ephesians 6:1.

ADAM CLARKE

Besides its being the day on which our blessed Lord rose from the dead, the practice of the apostles and the primitive Church is an additional reason why we should religiously celebrate this first day of the week. They who, professing the Christian religion, still prefer the Jewish Sabbath have little to support them in the New Testament.

CHAPTER 21

1. Came with a straight course. Having had, as is necessarily implied, wind and tide in their favor. Coos. An island in the sea. It was famous for being the birthplace of Hippocrates, the most eminent of physicians, and Apelles, the most celebrated of painters. Rhodes. Another island in the same sea, celebrated for its Colossus, which was one of the seven wonders of the world. This was a brazen statue of Apollo, so high that ships in full sail could pass between its legs. It was the work of Chares, a pupil of Lysippus, who spent 12 years in making it. It was 106 feet high and so great that few people could fathom its thumb. It was thrown down by an earthquake about 224 years before Christ, after having stood 66 years. Patara. One of the chief seaport towns of Syria.

2. Phoenicia. A part of Syria.

3. Cyprus. See the note on chap. iv. 36. Tyre. A city of Phoenicia, one of the most celebrated maritime towns in the world. There the ship was to unlade her burden. The freight that she had taken in at Ephesus she was to unlade at Tyre, to which place she was bound.

4. Who said to Paul through the Spirit. We cannot understand this as a command from the Holy Spirit not to go up to Jerusalem, else Paul must have been highly criminal to have disobeyed it. Through the Spirit must either refer to their own great earnestness to dissuade him from taking a journey which they plainly saw would be injurious to him—or if it refer to the Holy Spirit, it must mean that if he regarded his personal safety he must not at this time go up to Jerusalem. The Spirit foretold Paul's persecutions, but does not appear to have forbidden his journey; and Paul was persuaded that in acting as he was about to do, whatever personal risk he ran, he should bring more glory to God by going to Jerusalem than by tarrying at Tyre or elsewhere. The purport of this divine communication was, "If you go up to Jerusalem, the Jews will persecute you, and you will be imprisoned." As he was apprised of this, he might have desisted, for the whole was conditional. Paul might or might not go to Jerusalem; if he did go, he would be persecuted and be in danger of losing his life.

5. When we had accomplished those days. That is, the seven days mentioned in the preceding verse. And they all brought us on our way, with wives and children. It is not likely that Paul, Silas, and Luke had either wives or children with them; and it is more natural to suppose that the brethren of Tyre with their wives and children are those that are meant. These, through affection to the apostles, accompanied them from their homes to the ship; and the coming out of the husbands, wives, and children shows what a general and affectionate interest the preaching and private conversation of these holy men had excited. Kneeled down on the shore, and prayed. As God fills heaven and earth, so He may be worshipped everywhere: as well, when circumstances require it, on the seashore as in the temple. We have already seen, in the case of Lydia, that the Jews had proseuchas by the riversides; and an observation in Tertullian seems to intimate that they preferred such places, and in the open air offered their petitions to God by the seashore.

6. Taken . . . leave. "Having given each other the kiss of peace," as was the constant custom of the Jews and primitive Christians.

MATTHEW HENRY

Ptolemais. Paul begged leave to go ashore there, to salute the brethren. He would not pass by them without paying his respects to them, and he abode with them one day; better a short stay than no visit.

Verses 8–14

We have here Paul and his company arrived at length at Cæsarea, it being the place where the gospel was first preached to the Gentiles, and the Holy Ghost fell upon them, ch. x. 1, 44.

I. Who it was that entertained Paul and his company at Cæsarea. He seldom had occasion to go to a public house, but, wherever he came, some friend or other took him in, and bade him welcome. "We that were of Paul's company went where he went, and came to Cæsarea." Those that travel together through this world will separate at death, and then it will appear who are of Paul's company and who are not.

1. They were entertained by Philip the evangelist, whom we left at Cæsarea many years ago, after he had baptized the eunuch (ch. viii. 40), and there we now find him again. He was originally a deacon, (ch. vi. 5). He was now and had long been an evangelist. He had a house at Cæsarea and he bade him and them very welcome to it: We entered into the house of Philip the evangelist, and we abode with him.

2. This Philip had four maiden daughters, who did prophesy, v. 9. It intimates that they prophesied of Paul's troubles at Jerusalem, or perhaps they prophesied for his comfort and encouragement.

II. A plain and full prediction of the sufferings of Paul, by a noted prophet, v. 10, 11. 1. Paul and his company tarried many days at Cæsarea. What cause Paul saw to tarry so long there we cannot tell; but we are sure he did not stay either there or anywhere else to be idle. 2. Agabus the prophet came to Cæsarea from Judæa; this was he of whom we read before, who came from Jerusalem to Antioch, to foretell a general famine, ch. xi. 27, 28. See how God dispenseth his gifts variously. To Paul was given the word of wisdom and knowledge, by the Spirit, and the gifts of healing; Agabus, and to Philip's daughters, was given prophecy, by the same Spirit—the foretelling of things to come. So that that which was the most eminent gift of the Spirit under the Old Testament, the foretelling of things to come, was under the New Testament quite outshone by other gifts. It should seem as if Agabus came on purpose to Cæsarea, to meet Paul with this prophetic intelligence. 3. He foretold Paul's bonds at Jerusalem: By a sign, as the prophets of old did. Agabus took Paul's girdle, and with it bound first his own hands, and then his own feet. That which we see usually makes a greater impression upon us than that which we only hear of. By an explication of the sign: Thus saith the Holy Ghost, So shall the Jews at Jerusalem bind the man that owneth this girdle, and, shall deliver him into the hands of the Gentiles. Paul had this express warning given him of his troubles, that he might prepare for them.

III. The great importunity which his friends used with him to dissuade him from going to Jerusalem, v. 12. "Not only those of that place, but we that were of Paul's company, besought him with tears that he would not go up to Jerusalem." Here appeared a commendable affection to Paul. Good men that are very active sometimes need to be dissuaded from overworking themselves, and good men that are very bold need to be dissuaded from exposing themselves too far. Yet there was a mixture of infirmity, especially in those of Paul's company, who knew he undertook this journey by divine direction. But we see in them the infirmity incident to us all; when we see trouble at a distance, we can make light of it; but when it comes near we begin to shrink, and draw back.

IV. The holy bravery with which Paul persisted in his resolution, v. 13.

1. He reproves them for dissuading him. Here is a quarrel of love on both sides. They love him dearly, and therefore oppose his resolution; he loves them dearly, and therefore chides them for opposing it: What mean you to weep and to break my heart? Their weeping about him broke his heart. It was a temptation to him, it began to weaken his resolution. "I know I am appointed to suffering, and you ought to encourage me. You, with your tears, break my heart, and discourage me. Has not our Master told us to take up our cross? And would you have me to avoid mine?" It was a trouble to him that they should so earnestly press him to that in which he could not gratify them without wronging his conscience. As he was much in tears himself, so he had a compassionate regard to the tears of his friends. But now it breaks his heart, when he is under a necessity of denying the request of his weeping friends. It

7. when we had finished our course—completing the voyage—from Tyre, we came—which they would do the same day—to Ptolemais—anciently called Accho (Judg. 1:31), now St. Jean d'Acre, or Acre. and saluted the brethren, and abode . . .—disciples gathered probably as at Tyre, on the occasion mentioned (ch. 11:19). 8-10. next day we [that were of Paul's company] departed—(The words in brackets are omitted in the best MSS. They were probably added as the connecting words at the head of some church lessons.) and came to Cæsarea—a run along the coast, southward, of some thirty miles.

Philip the evangelist—a term answering apparently very much to our missionary [Hows], by whose ministry such joy had been diffused over Samaria, and the Ethiopian eunuch had been baptized (ch. 8). one of the seven—deacons, who had "purchased to himself a good degree" (I Tim. 3: 13). He and Paul now meet for the first time, some twenty-five years after that time. the same man had four daughters . . . which did prophesy—fulfilling Joel 2:28 (see ch. 2:18). This is mentioned, it would seem, merely as a high distinction divinely conferred on so devoted a servant of the Lord Jesus, and probably indicates the high tone of religion in his family. tarried there many—'a good many'—days—Finding himself in good time for Pentecost at Jerusalem, he would feel it a refreshing thing to his spirit to hold Christian communion for a few days with such a family. there came down from Judea—the news of Paul's arrival having spread —a certain prophet . . . Agabus—no doubt the same as in ch. 11:28.

11-14. So shall the Jews bind the man that owneth this girdle . . .—For though the Romans did it, it was at the Jews' instigation (vs. 33; ch. 28:17). Such dramatic methods of announcing important future events would bring the old prophets to remembrance. (Cf. Isa. 20:2, etc.; Jer. 13:1, and Ezek. 5:1, etc.). This prediction and that at Tyre (vs. 4) were intended, not to prohibit him from going, but to put his courage to the test and when he stood the test, to deepen and mature it. we and they at that place (the Cæsarean Christians) besought him—even with tears, vs. 13—not to go to Jerusalem.

Then Paul answered, What mean ye to weep and to break mine heart—Beautiful union of manly resoluteness and womanly tenderness, alike removed from mawkishness and stoicism!

ADAM CLARKE

7. We came to Ptolemais. This was a seaport town of Galilee, not far from Mount Carmel, between Tyre and Caesarea, where the river Belus empties itself into the sea. It was at first called Accho, and belonged to the tribe of Asher, Judg. i. 31. It was enlarged and beautified by the first of the Egyptian Ptolemies, from whom it was called Ptolemais. This place terminated St. Paul's voyage.

8. We that were of Paul's company. This clause is wanting in some MSS.

Philip the evangelist. One of the seven deacons, who seems to have settled here after he had baptized the eunuch. See on chap. viii. 40.

9. Four daughters, virgins, which did prophesy. Probably these were no more than teachers in the church, for we have already seen that this is a frequent meaning of the word prophesy; and this is undoubtedly one thing intended by the prophecy of Joel, quoted in chap. ii. 17-18 of this book.

10. Agabus. See the note on chap. xi. 28.

11. Took Paul's girdle, and bound his own hands. This was no doubt a prophet in the commonly received sense of the term; and his mode of acting was like that of the ancient prophets, who often accompanied their predictions with significant emblems. Jeremiah was commanded to bury his girdle by the river Euphrates, to mark out the captivity of the Jews, Jer. xiii. 4. For more examples of this figurative or symbolical prophesying, see Isaiah xx; Jer. xxvii. 2-3; xxviii. 4; Ezekiel iv; xii. Into the hands of the Gentiles. That is, the Romans, for the Jews had not, properly speaking, the power of life and death. And as Agabus said he should be delivered into the hands of the Gentiles he showed thereby that they would attempt to destroy his life. This prediction of Agabus was literally fulfilled; see v. 33.

12. Besought him not to go up to Jerusalem. For they all understood the prophecy to be conditional and contingent, and that it was in Paul's power to turn the scale.

was an unkind kindness thus to torment him with their dissuasions. When our friends are called out to sufferings, we shall show our love rather by comforting them than by sorrowing for them. But observe, These Christians at Cæsarea, if they could have foreseen the particulars of that event, would have been better reconciled to it for their own sakes; for, when Paul was made a prisoner at Jerusalem, he was presently sent to Cæsarea (ch. xxiii. 33), and there he continued at least two years (ch. xxiv. 27), and he was a prisoner at large, as appears (ch. xxiv. 23). The church at Cæsarea had much more of Paul's company and help when he was imprisoned than they could have had if he had been at liberty. That which we oppose, as thinking it to operate much against us, may be overruled by the providence of God to work for us.

2. He repeats his resolution to go forward, notwithstanding: "What mean you to weep thus? I am ready to suffer whatever is appointed for me. I am willing to suffer, and therefore why are you unwilling that I should suffer? For my part, I am ready." "I was told at first what great things I must suffer," ch. ix. 16. "I am prepared for it. I can bid it welcome. I can, through grace, not only bear it, but rejoice in it." (1) See how far his resolution extends: I tell you, I am ready not only to be bound, but to die at Jerusalem. It is our wisdom to think of the worst that may befall us, and to prepare accordingly. (2) See what it is that makes him willing to suffer and die: it is for the name of the Lord Jesus. All that a man has will he give for his life; but life itself will Paul give for the service and honour of the name of Christ.

V. The patient acquiescence of his friends in his resolution, v. 14. 1. They submitted to the wisdom of a good man. "When he would not be persuaded, we ceased our importunity. Paul knows best his own mind, and what he has to do, and it becomes us to leave it to himself. No doubt, Paul has a good reason for his resolution, and God has gracious ends to serve in confirming him in it." It is good manners not to over-press those in their own affairs that will not be persuaded. 2. They submitted to the will of a good God: We ceased, saying, The will of the Lord be done. They did not resolve his resolution into his stubbornness, but into his willingness to suffer, and God's will that he should. This may refer, (1) To Paul's present firmness; he is inflexible, and in this they see the will of the Lord done. (2) To his approaching sufferings: "If there be no remedy the will of the Lord Jesus be done. We leave it to God, we leave it to Christ, and therefore we do, not as we will, but as he will." God is wise, and knows how to make all work for good, and therefore "welcome his holy will." Not only, "The will of the Lord must be done, and there is no remedy"; but, "Let the will of the Lord be done, for his will is his wisdom." When a trouble is come, this must allay our griefs, that the will of the Lord is done; when we see it coming, this must silence our fears, that the will of the Lord shall be done.

I. Paul's journey to Jerusalem from Cæsarea, and the company that went along with him. They took up their carriages, their bag and baggage, like travellers or soldiers, and were their own porters. If they could have persuaded Paul to go some other way, they would gladly have gone along with him; but if he will go to Jerusalem, they do not say, "Let him go by himself then"; but, "Let us go and die with him." Thus Paul's boldness emboldened them. Certain of the disciples of Cæsarea went along with them. The less while that Paul is likely to enjoy his liberty the more industrious they are to improve every opportunity of conversation with him. They brought with them an honest old gentleman that had a house of his own at Jerusalem, in which he would gladly entertain Paul and his company, one Mnason of Cyprus (v. 16), with whom we should lodge. Such a great concourse of people there was to the feast that it was a hard matter to get lodgings; the public houses would be taken up by those of the better sort, and it was looked upon as a scandalous thing for those that had private houses to let their rooms out at those times. Every one then would choose his friends to be his guests, and Mnason took Paul and his company to be his lodgers. He shall be welcome to him, whatever comes of it. This Mnason is called an old disciple—a disciple from the beginning. He had been long a Christian, and was now in years. It is an honourable thing to be an old disciple of Jesus Christ, to have been enabled by the grace of God to continue long in a course of duty, steadfast in the faith. And with these old disciples one would choose to lodge; for the multitude of their years will teach wisdom.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

What, then, did these men and Luke mean when they said to him: "through the Spirit, that he should not set foot in Jerusalem"? We must interpret that declaration of the fourth verse by other declarations. In the previous chapter (v. 23), Paul said that "in every city the Holy Spirit testifieth unto me, saying that bonds and afflictions abide me." In verse 11 of this chapter we find Agabus prophesying in the Spirit, not telling him that he was not to go, but declaring that if he should go, then he would be bound and imprisoned. When these men in Tyre told Paul not to go, their advice was the result of the Spirit's foretelling that if he went, he would suffer. Taking the whole story into account, we are not warranted in believing that the Spirit declared that he was not to go; but that the Spirit told him that he was going to suffering and to prison. These disciples at Tyre, when they heard it, when they were informed by the Spirit and by spiritual interpretation, of the difficulties that awaited him, urged him not to go. The Spirit said that bonds awaited Paul, and their advice was really advice to falsify the teaching of the Spirit. I do not think they meant it in that way; they had not thought the situation out. Now the Spirit could never instruct men to give advice to one which, if followed, would be an attempt to escape the very pathway of suffering that the Spirit indicated was lying ahead of him. I believe, then, that at this point Paul was true to the deepest facts, and that he was right.

There is great comfort in this chapter for us. Recognizing that such things do occur, understanding the story by our own experience, is there not a test by which we may finally decide which conviction is according to the mind of the Spirit of God? I think that there is. It is the test of motive. The motive of the conviction that took possession of the minds of all these people, Luke included, was a very high motive. It was love for Paul. Paul's motive was an infinitely higher motive. It was love for the Lord and passion for the accomplishment of His purpose. The last and final test for those who are submitted to the Spirit, who are seeking His guidance, who believe they have the light of His revelation, is always that of motive. There may be motives which in themselves are very high, which become wrong, because there ought to be the infinitely higher motive.—The Acts of the Apostles

I am ready not to be bound only—'If that is all, let it come.' but to die . . .—It was well he could add this, for he had that also to do.

15, 16, we took up our carriages—'our baggage'—and went up to Jerusalem—for the fifth time after his conversion, thus concluding his third missionary tour, which proved his last, so far as recorded; for though he accomplished the fourth and last part of the missionary plan sketched out (ch. 19:21)—"After I have been at Jerusalem, I must also see Rome"—it was as "a prisoner of Jesus Christ." went with us . . . and brought with them—rather, 'brought us to'.

One Mnason of Cyprus, an old disciple . . .—not an aged disciple, but probably 'a disciple of old standing,' perhaps one of the 3000 converted on the day of Pentecost, or, more likely still, drawn to the Saviour Himself during His lifetime. He had come, probably, with the other Cyprians (ch. 11:20), to Antioch, "preaching the Lord Jesus unto the Grecians," and now he appears settled at Jerusalem.

ADAM CLARKE

13. I am ready not to be bound only. He was resolute and determined, but was under no constraining necessity.

14. The will of the Lord be done. May that which is most for His glory take place! They plainly saw from the prophecy what would take place if Paul went to Jerusalem, and everyone saw that he had power to go or not to go.

15. Took up our carriages. We made ourselves ready, packed up our things, got our baggage in order.

16. And brought with them one Mnason. It is not very likely that they would bring a man with them with whom they were to lodge in Jerusalem. Therefore the text should perhaps be read as Bishop Patrick proposes: "There went with us certain of the disciples of Caesarea, bringing us to one Mnason, with whom we were to lodge." This is most likely, as the text will bear this translation. But it is possible that Mnason, formerly of Cyprus, now an inhabitant of Jerusalem, might have been down at Caesarea, met the disciples, and invited them to lodge with him while they were at Jerusalem; and having transacted his business at Caesarea, might now accompany them to Jerusalem. His being an old disciple may either refer to his having been a very early convert, probably one of those on the Day of Pentecost, or to his being now an old man.

MATTHEW HENRY

II. Paul's welcome at Jerusalem. 1. Many of the brethren there received him gladly, v. 17. The word here used concerning the welcome they gave to the apostles is used concerning the welcome of the apostles' doctrine, ch. ii. 41. They gladly received his word. We think if we had Paul among us we should gladly receive him; but it is a question whether we should or no if, having his doctrine, we do not gladly receive that. 2. They paid a visit to James and the elders of the church (v. 18): "The day following, Paul went in unto James, and took us with him." It should seem that James was now the only apostle that was resident at Jerusalem. They forecasted to have an apostle at Jerusalem because there was a great resort thither from all parts. James was now upon the spot, and all the elders were present. He saluted them. The proper signification of salutation is, wishing salvation to you. And such mutual salutations very well become Christians, in token of their love to each other and joint regard to God.

III. The account they had from him of his ministry among the Gentiles, and their satisfaction in it. He gave them a narrative of the success of the gospel in those countries where he had been employed: He declared particularly what things God had wrought among the Gentiles by his ministry, v. 19. Not what things he had wrought, but what God had wrought by his ministry. It was not I, but the grace of God which was with me. He declared it particularly, that the grace of God might appear the more illustrious in the circumstances of his success. Hence they took occasion to give praise to God (v. 20): When they heard it, they glorified the Lord. Paul ascribed it all to God, and to God they gave the praise of it. They gave glory to the grace of God, which was extended to the Gentiles. They did not envy him, nor were they jealous of his growing reputation, but, on the contrary, glorified the Lord. If God be praised, Paul is pleased.

IV. The request of James and the elders to Paul, or their advice rather, that he would gratify the believing Jews by showing some compliance with the ceremonial law, and appearing publicly in the temple to offer sacrifice. The ceremonial law, though it was by no means to be imposed upon the Gentile converts, yet it was not become unlawful as yet to those that had been bred up in the observance of it. It was dead, but not buried; dead, but not yet deadly.

1. They desired him to take notice of the great numbers there were of the Jewish converts: Thou seest, brother, how many thousands of the Jews there are who believe. They called him brother. Though they were conformists and he a nonconformist, yet they were brethren, and owned the relation. The number of the names at first was but one hundred and twenty, yet now many thousands. Let none therefore despise the day of small things; for, though the beginning be small, God can make the latter end greatly to increase. And this account of the success of the gospel among the Jews was, no doubt, as grateful to Paul as the account which he gave them of the conversion of the Gentiles was to them; for his heart's desire and prayer to God for the Jews was that they might be saved.

2. They informed him of a prevailing infirmity these believing Jews laboured under: They are all zealous of the law. They believe in Christ as the true Messiah, but they know the law of Moses was of God, they have found spiritual benefit in the institutions of it, and therefore they can by no means think of parting with it. This was a great weakness to be so fond of the shadows when the substance was come. But see, The power of education and long usage, and especially of a ceremonial law. The charitable allowance that must be made in consideration of these. Their being zealous of the law was capable of a good construction, which charity would put upon it; and it was capable of a good excuse.

3. They gave him to understand that these Jews were ill-affected to him, v. 21. Paul himself could not get the good word of all that belonged to Christ's family: "They are informed of thee that thou not only dost not teach the Gentiles to observe the law, but dost teach all the Jews who are among the Gentiles to forsake Moses, not to circumcise their children nor to walk after the customs of our nation." It was true that Paul preached the abrogation of the law of Moses, taught them that it was impossible to be justified by it. But it was false that he taught them to forsake Moses; for the religion he preached tended not to destroy the law, but to fulfil it. But even the believing Jews, having got this notion of Paul, that he was an enemy to Moses, were much exasperated against him. The elders here present, loved and honoured him, and called him brother, but the people could hardly be induced to entertain a favour-

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

17-40. PAUL REPORTS THE EVENTS OF HIS THIRD MISSIONARY JOURNEY—IN THE TEMPLE, PURIFYING HIMSELF FROM A JEWISH VOW, HE IS SEIZED BY A MOB AND BEATEN TO THE DANGER OF HIS LIFE—THE UPROAR BECOMING UNIVERSAL, THE ROMAN COMMANDANT HAS HIM BROUGHT IN CHAINS TO THE FORTRESS, FROM THE STAIRS OF WHICH HE IS PERMITTED TO ADDRESS THE PEOPLE. The apostle was full of anxiety about this visit to Jerusalem, from the numerous prophetic intimations of danger awaiting him, and having reason to expect the presence at this feast of the very parties from whose virulent rage he had once and again narrowly escaped with his life. Hence we find him asking the Roman Christians to wrestle with him in prayer, "for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake, and for the love of the Spirit, that he might be delivered from them that believed not in Judea," as well as "that his service which he had for Jerusalem (the great collection for the poor saints there) might be accepted of the saints" (Rom. 15:30, 31). 17-19. the brethren received us gladly—the disciples generally, as distinguished from the official reception recorded in vs. 18. Paul went in with us unto James; and all the elders were present—to "report himself" formally to the acknowledged head of the church at Jerusalem, and his associates in office. See on ch. 15:13. Had any other of the apostles been in Jerusalem on that occasion, it could hardly fail to have been noted. he declared particularly—in detail—what God had wrought among the Gentiles by his ministry—as on previous occasions (ch. 14:27; and see Rom. 15:15); no doubt referring to the insidious and systematic efforts of the Judaizing party in a number of places to shrivel the Church of Christ into a Jewish sect, and his own counter-procedure. 20-25. they glorified the Lord . . .—constrained to justify his course, notwithstanding the Jewish complexion of the Christianity of Jerusalem.

A. T. ROBERTSON:

There were undoubtedly a great many thousands of believers in Jerusalem and all Jewish Christians, some, alas, Judaizers (Acts 11:2; 15:1, 5). This list may include the Christians from neighboring towns in Palestine and even some from foreign countries here at the Feast of Pentecost, for it is probable that Paul arrived in time for it as he had hoped. But we do not have to count the hostile Jews from Asia (v. 27) who were clearly not Christians at all. "All zealous for the law" (pantes zelotai tou nomou). Zealots (substantive) rather than zealous (adjective) with objective genitive (tou nomou). The word zealot is from zeloo, to burn with zeal, to boil. The Greek used zelotes for an imitator or admirer. There was a party of Zealots (developed from the Pharisees), a group of what would be called "hot-heads," who brought on the war with Rome. One of this party, Simon Zelotes (Acts 1:13), was in the number of the twelve apostles. It is important to understand the issues in Jerusalem. It was settled at the Jerusalem Conference (Acts 15 and Galatians 2) that the Mosaic ceremonial law was not to be imposed upon Gentile Christians. Paul won freedom for them, but it was not said that it was wrong for Jewish Christians to go on observing it if they wished. We have seen Paul observing the passover in Philippi (Acts 20:6) and planning to reach Jerusalem for Pentecost (20:16). The Judaizers rankled under Paul's victory and power in spreading the gospel among the Gentiles and gave him great trouble in Galatia and Corinth. They were busy against him in Jerusalem also and it was to undo the harm done by them in Jerusalem that Paul gathered the great collection from the Gentile Christians and brought it with him and the delegates from the churches. Clearly, then, Paul had real ground for his apprehension of trouble in Jerusalem while still in Corinth (Rom. 15:25) when he asked for the prayers of the Roman Christians (vv. 30-32). The repeated warnings along the way were amply justified.

—Word Pictures in the New Testament

18. Went in with us unto James. This was James the Less, son of Mary and cousin to our Lord. He appears to have been bishop of the church in Jerusalem and perhaps the only apostle who continued in that city. We have already seen what a very important character he sustained in the council. See chap. xv. 13. All the elders were present. It appears that they had been convened about matters of serious and important moment; and some think it was relative to Paul himself, of whose arrival they had heard, and well knew how many of those that believed were disaffected towards him.

19. Declared particularly. He no doubt had heard that they were prejudiced against him, and by declaring what God had done by him among the Gentiles, showed how groundless this prejudice was; for were he a bad man, or doing anything that he should not do, God would not have made him such a singular instrument of so much good.

20. How many thousands. "How many myriads," how many times 10,000. This intimates that there had been a most extraordinary and rapid work even among the Jews; but what is here spoken is not to be confined to the Jews of Jerusalem, but to all that had come from different parts of the land to be present at this Pentecost.

They are all zealous of the law. The Jewish economy was not yet destroyed, nor had God as yet signified that the whole of its observances was done away. He continued to tolerate that dispensation which was to be in a certain measure in force till the destruction of Jerusalem, and from that period it was impossible for them to observe their own ritual. Thus God abolished the Mosaic dispensation by rendering, in the course of His providence, the observance of it impossible.

21. Thou teachest . . . to forsake Moses. From anything that appears in the course of this book to the contrary, this information was incorrect; we do not find Paul preaching thus to the Jews. It is true that in his Epistles, some of which had been written before this time, he showed that circumcision and uncircumcision were equally unavailable for the salvation of the soul, and that by the deeds of the law no man could be justified; but he had not yet said to any Jew, "Forsake Moses, and do not circumcise your children." He told them that Jesus Christ had delivered them from the yoke of the law; but they had, as yet, liberty to wear that yoke if able thought of him; for it is certain the least judicious are the most censorious, the weak-headed are the hot-headed.

4. They therefore desired Paul that he would by some public act make it to appear that the charge against him was false, and that he did not teach people to break the customs of the Jewish church, for he himself retained the use of them.

(1) They conclude that something of this kind must be done: "What is it therefore? What must be done? The multitude will hear that thou art come to town. When they hear thou art come, they must needs come together, expecting to hear thee." Now something must be done to satisfy them that Paul does not teach the people to forsake Moses, and they think it necessary, For Paul's sake, that his reputation should be cleared. For the people's sake, that they may not continue prejudiced against so good a man. For their own sake, that since they knew it was their duty to own Paul their doing it might not be turned to their reproach.

(2) They produce a fair opportunity which Paul might take to clear himself: "Do this that we say unto thee. We have four men, Jews who believe, and they have a vow on them, a vow of Nazariteship for a certain time; their time has now expired (v. 23), and they are to offer their offerings according to the law, when they shave the head of their separation, a he-lamb for a burnt-offering, a ewe-lamb for a sin-offering, and a ram for a peace-offering. Now Paul having so far of late complied with the law as to take upon him the vow of a Nazarite, and to signify the expiration of it by shaving his head at Cenchrea (ch. xviii. 18), they desire him but to go a little further, and to join with these four in offering the sacrifices of a Nazarite: "Purify thyself with them according to the law; and be at charges with them, in buying sacrifices for this solemn occasion, and to join with them in the sacrifice." This, they think, will effectually stop the mouth of calumny, and everyone will be convinced that Paul did not teach the Jews to forsake Moses, but that he himself kept the law.

5. They enter a protestation that this shall be no infringement at all of the decree lately made in favour of the Gentile converts (v. 25): "As touching the Gentiles who believe, we have written and concluded that they observe no such things; but only that they keep themselves from things offered to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled, and from fornication." They knew how jealous Paul was for the preservation of the liberty of the converted Gentiles, and therefore expressly covenant to abide by that. Thus far is their proposal.

V. Here is Paul's compliance with it. Though he would not be persuaded not to go to Jerusalem, yet, when he was there, he was presuaded to do as they there did, v. 26. Then Paul took the men, and the very next day, purifying himself with them, and not with multitude nor tumult, as he himself pleads (ch. xxiv. 18), he entered into the temple, to signify the accomplishment of the days of purification to the priests. Now it has been questioned whether James and the elders did well to give Paul this advice, and whether he did well to take it. Some have blamed this occasional conformity of Paul's, as indulging the Jews too much in their adherence to the ceremonial law, and a discouragement of those who stood fast in the liberty wherewith Christ had made them free. Had it not been better to take pains with their people to convince them of their error, and to show them that they were made free from the law? To urge him to encourage them in it by his example seems to have more in it of fleshly wisdom than of the grace of God. Others think the advice was prudent and good. It was Paul's avowed principle, To the Jews became I as a Jew, that I might gain the Jews, 1 Cor. ix. 20. He had circumcised Timothy to please the Jews. Those that are weak in the faith are to be borne with, when those that undermine the faith must be opposed. It is true, this compliance of Paul's sped ill to him, yet this is not a sufficient ground to go upon in condemning it: Paul might do well, and yet suffer for it. Integrity and uprightness will be more likely to preserve us than sneaking compliances. And when we consider what a great trouble it must needs be to James and the presbyters, that they had by their advice brought Paul into trouble, it should be a warning to us not to press men to oblige us by doing anything contrary to their own mind.

Verses 27–40

We have here Paul brought into a captivity which we are not likely to see the end of. When we see the beginning of a trouble, we know not either how long it will last or how it will issue.

they pleased. He had shown them that their ceremonies were useless but not destructive; that they were dangerous only when they depended on them for salvation.

22. The multitude must needs come together. Whether this refers to a regular convocation of the church or to a tumult that would infallibly take place when it was heard that the apostle was come, we cannot pretend to say; but it is evident that James and the elders wished some prudent steps to be taken in order to prevent an evil that they had too much reason to fear.

23. We have four men which have a vow. From the shaving of the head, mentioned immediately after, it is evident that the four men in question were under the vow of Nazariteship, and that the days of their vow were nearly at an end, as they were about to shave their heads; for during the time of the Nazariteship the hair was permitted to grow, and shaven off only at the termination of the vow. Among the Jews it was common to make vows to God on extraordinary occasions, and that of the Nazarite appears to have been one of the most common; and it was permitted by their law for any person to perform this vow by proxy. See the law produced in my note on Num. vi. 21. "It was also customary for the richer sort to bestow their charity on the poorer sort for this purpose; for Josephus, Ant., lib. xix, c. 6, s. 1, observes that Agrippa, on his being advanced from a prison to a throne by the Emperor Claudius, came to Jerusalem; and there, among other instances of his religious thankfulness shown in the Temple, he ordered very many Nazarites to be shaven, he furnishing them with money for the expenses of that, and of the sacrifices necessarily attending it."

24. Be at charges with them. Or rather, "be at charges for them"; help them to bear the expense of that vow. Eight lambs, four rams, besides oil, flour, etc., were the expenses on this occasion. See the notes on Numbers vi. Thou . . . walkest orderly, and keepest the law. Perhaps this advice meant no more than, Show them, by such means as are now in your power, that you are not an enemy to Moses; that you do still consider the law to be holy, and the commandment holy, just, and good. Paul did so, and bore the expenses of those who, from a scruple of conscience, had made a vow, and perhaps were not well able to bear the expense attending it. Had they done this in order to acquire justification through the law, Paul could not have assisted them in any measure with a clear conscience. But as he did assist them, it is a proof that they had vows rather referred to a sense of obligation and the gratitude due to God for mercies already received than to the procuring of future favors of any kind.

25. As touching the Gentiles. See the notes on chap. xv.

26. To signify the accomplishment. "Declaring" the accomplishment. As this declaration was made to the priest, the sense of the passage is the following, if we suppose Paul to have made an offering for himself, as well as the four men: "The next day Paul, taking the four men, began to purify, set himself apart, or consecrate himself with them. Entering into the Temple, he publicly declared to the priests that he would observe the separation of a Nazarite, and continue it for seven days, at the end of which he would bring an offering for himself and the other four men, according to what the law prescribed in that case." But it is likely that Paul made no offering for himself, but was merely at the expense of theirs. However we may consider this subject, it is exceedingly difficult to account for the conduct of James and the elders, and of Paul on this occasion. There seems to have been something in this transaction which we do not fully understand.

I. We have here Paul seized.

1. He was seized in the temple, when he was there attending the days of his purifying, and the solemn services of those days, v. 27. It was not till the seven days were almost ended that he was taken notice of. In the temple, where he should have been protected, as in a sanctuary, he was most violently set upon by those who did what they could to have his blood mingled with his sacrifices. The temple did they themselves thus profane.

2. The informers against him were the Jews of Asia, not those of Jerusalem—the Jews of the dispersion, who were most exasperated against him. Those who seldom came up to worship at the temple in Jerusalem themselves, yet appeared most zealous for the temple, as if thereby they would atone for their habitual neglect of it.

3. The method they took was to raise the mob. They stirred up all the people. Those are fittest to be employed against Christ and Christianity that are governed least by reason and most by passion.

4. The arguments wherewith they exasperated the people against him were popular, but very false and unjust. They cried out, "Men of Israel, help." The enemies of Christianity, since they could never prove it to be an ill thing, have been always very industrious to put it into an ill name, and so run it down by outrage and outcry. What is wanting in right is made up in noise.

5. They charge upon him both bad doctrine and bad practice.

(1) They charge upon him bad doctrine. Though not here at Jerusalem, yet in other places, nay in all places, he teaches all men, everywhere; as if, because he was an itinerant, he was a ubiquitary: "He spread to the utmost of his power certain damnable and heretical positions." [1] Against the people of the Jews. He had taught that Jews and Gentiles stand on the same level before God, and neither circumcision avails anything nor uncircumcision; nay, he had taught against the unbelieving Jews that they were rejected (and therefore had separated from them and their synagogues). Those commonly seem most jealous for the church's name that belong to it in name only. [2] Against the law. His teaching men to believe the gospel as the end of the law, and the perfection of it, was interpreted as preaching against the law. [3] Against this place, the temple. Because he taught men to pray everywhere, he was reproached as an enemy to the temple. Paul had himself been active in persecuting Stephen, and putting him to death for words spoken against this holy place, and now the same thing is laid to his charge. He that was then made use of as the tool is now set up as the butt of Jewish rage and malice.

(2) They charge upon him bad practices. They charge it upon him that he had himself polluted it. He has brought Gentiles also into the temple, into the inner court of the temple, which none that were uncircumcised were admitted to come into. Paul was himself a Jew, and had right to enter into the court of the Jews. And they, seeing some with him there that joined with him in his devotions, concluded that Trophimus an Ephesian, who was a Gentile, was one of them. Did they see him there? Truly no. They had seen him with him in the city, and therefore they supposed that Paul had brought him with him into the temple, which was utterly false. Innocency is no fence against calumny and false accusation. Evil men dig up mischief, and go far to seek proofs of their false accusations, as they did here. By such unjust and groundless suggestions have wicked men thought to justify themselves in the most barbarous outrages. Paul thought to recommend himself to their good opinion by going into the temple, and thence they take an occasion to accuse him. If he had kept further off them, he had not been so maligned by them.

II. We have Paul in danger of being pulled in pieces by the rabble. The execution shall be of a piece with the prosecution, all unjust and irregular. Therefore, as those who neither feared God nor regarded man, they resolved to knock him on the head immediately.

1. All the city was in an uproar, v. 30. The people heard a hue-and-cry from the temple, and were up in arms. All the city was moved, when they were called to from the temple, Men of Israel, help. Just such a zeal the Jews here show for God's temple as the Ephesians did for Diana's temple, when Paul was informed against as an enemy to that (ch. xix. 29): The whole city was full of confusion.

2. They drew Paul out of the temple, and shut the doors. In dragging him furiously out of the temple they showed a real detestation of him as one not fit to be looked upon as a member of the Jewish nation. They pretended a veneration for the temple. They condemned Paul for drawing people from the temple,

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

27-30. the Jews . . . of Asia—in all likelihood those of Ephesus (since they recognized Trophimus apparently as a townsman, vs. 29, embittered by their discomfiture (ch. 19:9, etc.).

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

Note the charge against Paul. The "Jews from Asia" knew him by sight, as they had seen him in Ephesus and elsewhere; and possibly some of them had been fellow passengers with him from Miletus. No wonder that they construed his presence in the Temple into an insult to it. If Luther or John Knox had appeared in St. Peter's, he would not have been thought to have come as a worshiper. Paul's teaching may very naturally have created the impression in hot-tempered partisans, who could not draw distinctions, that he was the enemy of Temple and sacrifice.

It has always been the vice of religious controversy to treat inferences from heretical teaching, which appear plain to the critics, as if they were articles of the heretic's belief. These Jewish zealots practiced a very common method when they fathered on Paul all which they supposed to be involved in his position. Their charges against him are partly flat lies, partly conclusions drawn from misapprehension of his position, partly exaggeration, and partly hasty assumptions. He had never said a word which could be construed as "against the people." He had indeed preached that the law was not for Gentiles, and was not the perfect revelation which brought salvation, and he had pointed to Jesus as in himself realizing all that the Temple shadowed; but such teaching was not "against" either, but rather for both, as setting both in their true relation to the whole process of revelation. He had not brought "Greeks" into the Temple, not even the one Greek whom malice multiplied into many. When passion is roused, exaggerations and assumptions soon become definite assertions. The charges are a complete object lesson in the baser arts of religious partisans; and they have been but too faithfully reproduced in all ages. Did Paul remember how he had been "consenting" to the death of Stephen on the very same charges? How far he had traveled since that day!

—Expositions of Holy Scripture

took Paul, and drew him out of the temple; and forthwith the doors were shut—that the murder they meant to perpetrate might not pollute that holy place.

ADAM CLARKE

27. The Jews which were of Asia. These pursued him with the most deliberate and persevering malice in every place, and it appears that it was through them that the false reports were sent to and circulated through Jerusalem.

28. This is the man, that teacheth. As much as if they had said: This is the man concerning whom we wrote to you, who in every place endeavors to prejudice the Gentiles against the Jews, against the Mosaic law, and against the Temple and its services.

Brought Greeks also into the temple. This was a most deliberate and malicious untruth. Paul could accomplish no purpose by bringing any Greek or Gentile into the Temple; and their having seen Trophimus, an Ephesian, with him, in the city only, was no ground on which to raise a slander that must so materially affect both their lives. Josephus informs us, War, lib. v, c. 5, s. 2, that on the wall which separated the court of the Gentiles from that of the Israelites was an inscription in Greek and Latin letters which stated that no stranger was permitted to come within the holy place on pain of death. With such a prohibition as this before his eyes, was it likely that Paul would enter into the Temple in company with an uncircumcised Greek? The calumny refutes itself.

30. They took Paul. They tumultuously seized on him; and drew him out of the temple, out of the court of the Israelites, where he was worshipping. And . . . the doors were shut; the doors of the court of the Gentiles, probably and yet, when he himself was very devoutly worshipping in the temple, they drew him out of it. The officers of the temple shut the doors. Lest the crowd should by the running in of more to them be thrust back into the temple, and some outrage should be committed, to the profanation of that holy place.

3. They went about to kill him (v. 31), for they fell a beating him (v. 32), resolving to beat him to death. Now was Paul, like a lamb, thrown into a den of lions. No doubt, he was still of the same mind as when he said, I am ready not only to be bound, but to die at Jerusalem.

III. We have here Paul rescued out of the hands of his Jewish enemies by a Roman enemy. Tidings were brought of the tumult to the chief captain of the band. Somebody that was concerned not for Paul, but for the public peace and safety, gave this information to the colonel, who had always a jealous and watchful eye upon these tumultuous Jews, and he is the man that must be instrumental to save Paul's life, when never a friend he had was capable of doing him any service. The tribune, or chief captain, got his forces together with all possible expedition, and went to suppress the mob: He took soldiers and centurions, and ran down to them. He had them near at hand, and he ran down unto the multitude; for at such times delays are dangerous. The very sight of the Roman general frightened them from beating Paul. They were deterred from that by the the power of the Romans from which they ought to have been restrained by the justice of God. God often makes those to be a protection to his people who yet have no affection for his people. The shepherd makes use even of his dogs for the defence of his sheep. The governor takes him into custody. He rescued him, not out of a concern for him, but out of a concern for justice, because he ought not to be put to death without trial. He therefore takes Paul out of the hands of the mob into the hands of the law (v. 33): He took him, and commanded him to be bound with two chains, for he demanded who he was, and what he had done. This violent taking of him out of the hands of the multitude, they laid to the charge of the chief captain as his crime (ch. xxiv. 7): The chief captain Lysias came with great violence, and took him out of our hands.

IV. The provision which the chief captain made to bring Paul to speak for himself. One had almost as good enter into a struggle with the winds and the waves, as with such a mob; and yet Paul made a shift to get liberty of speech among them.

1. There was no knowing the sense of the people; for when the chief captain enquired concerning Paul some cried one thing, and some another, so that it was impossible for the chief captain to know their mind, when really they knew not either one another's mind or their own. Those that will hearken to the clamours of the multitude will know nothing for a certainty.

2. There was no quelling the rage and fury of the people; for when the chief captain commanded that Paul should be carried into the castle, the tower of Antonia, where the Roman soldiers kept garrison, near the temple, the soldiers themselves had much ado to get him safely thither, the people were so violent (v. 35): When he came upon the stairs, leading up to the castle, the soldiers were forced to take him up in their arms, and carry him, to keep him from the people, who would have pulled him limb from limb if they could. When they could not reach him with their cruel hands, They followed, crying, Away with him, v. 36. Take him out of the land of the living (so the ancients expound it), chase him out of the world.

3. Paul at length begged leave of the chief captain to speak to him (v. 37): As he was to be led into the castle, he said unto the chief captain, "May I speak unto thee?" What a humble modest question was this! Paul knew how to speak to the greatest of men, yet he humbly begs leave to speak to this commander.

4. The chief captain tells him what notion he had of him: Canst thou speak Greek? Art not thou that Egyptian who made an uproar? It seems, there had lately been an insurrection somewhere in that country, headed by an Egyptian. The captain here says that he led out into the wilderness four thousand men that were murderers. It happened in the thirteenth year of Claudius, about three years ago. The ringleader of this rebellion had made his escape, and the chief captain concluded that Paul could not be a criminal of less figure than this Egyptian. See how good men are exposed to ill will by mistake.

5. Paul rectifies his mistake concerning him, by informing him particularly what he was. I am a man who is a Jew; I am of Tarsus, a city of Cilicia, to be carried into the castle—rather, perhaps, 'the barracks,' or that part of the fortress of Antonia appropriated to the soldiers. The fort was built by Herod on a high rock at the northwest corner of the great temple area, and called after Mark Antony.

35, 36. Away with him—as before of his Lord (Luke 23:18; John 19:15).

37-40. Art not thou that Egyptian . . .—The form of the question implies that the answer is to be in the negative, and is matter of some surprise: 'Thou art not then . . . .?' madest an uproar . . .—The narrative is given in JOSEPHUS (Jewish War, ii, 8. 6; and 13. 5), though his two allusions and ours seem to refer to different periods of the rebellion.

to prevent Paul from getting any succor from his friends in the city, for their whole proceedings show that they purposed to murder him. They brought him out of the court of the Israelites, that court being peculiarly holy, that it might not be defiled by his blood; and they shut the court of the Gentiles, that they might have the opportunity unmolested of killing him in that place, for the court of the Gentiles was reckoned to be less holy than that of the Israelites.

31. The chief captain of the band. The Roman tribune, who had a troop of soldiers under him which lodged in general in the castle of Antonia, which was built at the angle where the northern and western porticoes of the outer court of the Temple were joined together. This castle was built by John Hyrcanus, high priest of the Jews. It was at first called Baris, and was the royal residence of the Asmoneans, as long as they reigned in Jerusalem. It was beautified by Herod the Great and called Antonia, in honor of his friend Mark Antony. By this castle the Temple was commanded, as it stood on higher ground. Josephus describes this castle, War, b. v. c. 5, s. 8, "as having four towers, from one of which the whole temple was overlooked; and that one of the towers was joined to the porticoes of the temple, and had a double pair of stairs from it, by which soldiers in the garrison were used to come down with their arms to the porticoes, on the festival days, to keep the people quiet; for, as the temple was a guard to the city, so this castle was a guard to the temple." The name of this chief captain, or tribune, was Claudius Lysias, as we learn from chap. xxiii. 26.

32. Ran down unto them. Ran down the stairs to the porticoes mentioned above.

33. To be bound with two chains. To be bound between two soldiers, his right hand chained to the left hand of the one, and his left hand to the right of the other.

36. Away with him. That is, Kill him; dispatch him! for so much this phrase always means in the mouth of a Jewish mob.

38. Art not thou that Egyptian? The history to which Claudius Lysias refers is taken from Josephus, Ant., l. xx, c. 7, s. 6, and War, l. ii, c. 13, s. 5, and is in substance as follows: An Egyptian, whose name is not known, pretended to be a prophet, and told his followers that the walls of Jerusalem would fall down before them if they would assist him in making an attack on the city. He had address enough to raise a rabble of 30,000 men, and with these advanced as far as the Mount of Olives. But Felix, the Roman governor, came suddenly upon him with a large body of Roman troops, both infantry and cavalry. The mob was speedily dispersed, 400 killed, 200 taken prisoners, and the Egyptian himself, with some of his most faithful friends, escaped, of whom no account was ever afterwards heard. As Lysias found such an outcry made against Paul, he supposed that he must be some egregious malefactor, and probably that Egyptian who had escaped, as related above. Learned men agree that Luke refers to the same fact of which Josephus speaks; but there is a considerable difference between the numbers in Josephus and those in Luke, the former having 30,000, the latter only 4,000. The small number of killed and prisoners, only 600 in all according to Josephus, leads us to suspect that his number is greatly exaggerated, as 600 in killed and prisoners of a mob of 30,000, routed by regular infantry and cavalry, is no kind of proportion; but it is a sufficient proportion to a mob of 4,000. Dean Aldridge has supposed that the number in Josephus was originally 4,000, but that ancient copyists, mistaking the Greek delta, "four," for lambda, "thirty," wrote 30,000, instead of 4,000. There is another way of reconciling the two historians, which is this: When this Egyptian impostor at first began to make great boasts and large promises, a multitude of people, to the amount at least of 30,000 weary of the Roman yoke, from which he promised them deliverance, readily arranged themselves under his banners. As he performed nothing that he promised, 26,000 of these had melted away before he reached Mount Olivet; this remnant the Romans attacked and dispersed. Josephus speaks of the a citizen of no mean city. Whether he means Tarsus or Rome is not certain; they were neither of them mean cities, and he was a freeman of both. Though the chief captain had put him under such an invidious suspicion, he did not render railing for railing, but mildly denied the charge, and owned what he was.

6. He humbly desired a permission to speak to the people. He sues for it as a favour, which he will be thankful for: I beseech thee, suffer me to speak to the people. The chief captain rescued him with no other design than to give him a fair hearing. He desires he may have leave immediately to defend himself; for it needed no more than to be set in a true light.

7. He obtained leave to plead his own cause, for he needed not to have counsel assigned him, when the Spirit of the Father was ready to dictate to him, Matt. x. 20. The chief captain gave him license (v. 40). He had that justice done him by the chief captain which he could not obtain from his countrymen the Jews. This licence being obtained the people were attentive to hear: Paul stood on the stairs. A sorry pulpit it was, and yet better than none. There he beckoned with the hand unto the people, made signs to them to be quiet, and so far he gained his point that there was made a profound silence. When the cause of Christ and his gospel is to be pleaded, there ought to be a great silence, that we may give the more earnest heed, and all little enough. Paul addressed himself to speak: he spoke unto them in the Hebrew tongue, that is, in their own vulgar tongue, to which he hereby owned not only an abiding relation, but an abiding respect.

stood on the stairs—"What nobler spectacle than that of Paul at this moment! There he stood, bound with two chains, ready to make his defense to the people. The Roman commander sits by, to enforce order by his presence. An enraged populace look up to him from below. Yet in the midst of so many dangers, how self-possessed is he, how tranquil!" number he had in the beginning; Luke, of those that he had when he arrived at Mount Olivet. That were murderers? Sicarii, "assassins." They derived their name from sica, a sort of crooked knife, which they concealed under their garments, and privately stabbed the objects of their malice.

39. I am a man which am a Jew. A periphrasis for "I am a Jew." Of Tarsus . . . no mean city. In the notes on chap. ix. 11, I have shown that Tarsus was a city of considerable importance, and in some measure a rival to Rome and Athens; and that, because of the services rendered to the Romans by the inhabitants, Julius Caesar endowed them with all the rights and privileges of Roman citizens. When Paul calls it no mean city he speaks a language that was common to those who have had occasion to speak of Tarsus. Xenophon calls it "a great and flourishing city."

40. Paul stood on the stairs. Where he was out of the reach of the mob and was surrounded by the Roman soldiers. Beckoned with the hand. Waving the hand, which was the sign that he was about to address the people. He spake unto them in the Hebrew tongue. What was called then the Hebrew, viz., the Chaldaeo-Syriac; very well expressed by the Codex Bezae, "in their own dialect."

Never was there a more unnatural division than that in this chapter; it ends with a single comma! The best division would have been at the end of the twenty-fifth verse.

CHAPTER 22

I. With what an admirable composure he addresses himself to speak. There appears no fright, but his mind is sedate and composed. There appears no passion. He breaks out into no angry expressions.

II. What respectful titles he gives even to those who thus abused him: "Men, brethren, and fathers (v. 1). To you, O men, I call; men, that should hear reason, and be ruled by it; men, from whom one may expect humanity. You, brethren of the common people; you, fathers of the priests." Thus he lets them know that he was one of them. Though we must not give flattering titles to any, yet we ought to give titles of due respect to all; and those we would do good to we should endeavour not to provoke. Though he was rescued out of their hands, and was taken under the protection of the chief captain, yet he does not fall foul upon them. Hear you my defence; a just and reasonable request, for every man that is accused has a right to answer for himself.

III. The language he spoke in, which recommended what he said to the auditory: He spoke in the Hebrew tongue, that is, the vulgar language of the Jews, which, at this time, was not the pure Old Testament Hebrew, but the Syriac, a dialect of the Hebrew. It showed his continued respect to his countrymen, the Jews. By this it appears he is a Jew. What he said was the more generally understood. To speak in that language was indeed to appeal to the people. When they heard that he spoke in the Hebrew tongue, they kept the more silence. The chief captain was surprised to hear him speak Greek (ch. xxi. 37), the Jews were surprised to hear him speak Hebrew, and both therefore think the better of him. Many wise and good men are therefore slighted only because they are not known.

Paul here gives an account of himself not only to satisfy the chief captain that he was not that Egyptian he took him to be, but the Jews also that he was not that enemy to their law and temple they took him to be.

I. What his extraction and education were. 1. He was one of their own nation. "I am verily a man who is a Jew. I am a sincere friend to your nation, for I am one of it." 2. He was born in a creditable reputable place, in Tarsus, a city of Cilicia, and was by his birth a freeman of that city. This was, indeed, but a small matter to make any boast of, and yet it was needful to be mentioned at this time to those who insolently trampled upon him. 3. He had a learned and liberal education. He was brought up in Jerusalem, the principal seat of the Jewish learning, and at the feet of Gamaliel, and therefore he could not be ignorant of their law, nor be thought to slight it because he did not know it. 4. He was in his early days a very forward and eminent professor of the Jews' religion. (1) He was an intelligent professor

1, 2. when they heard . . . the Hebrew tongue—see on ch. 21:40—they kept the more silence—They could have understood him in Greek, and doubtless fully expected the renegade to address them in that language, but the sound of their holy mother tongue awed them into deeper silence.

3. a Jew of Tarsus, brought up in this city, at the feet—See on Luke 10:39—of Gamaliel—(See on ch. 5:24); a fact of great importance in the apostle's history, standing in the same relation to his future career as Moses' education in the Egyptian court to the work for which he was destined.

1. Men, brethren, and fathers. A Hebrew form of expression for "brethren and fathers," for two classes only are addressed.

Hear ye my defence. "This apology of mine." In this sense the word "apology" was anciently understood; hence the "Apologies" of the primitive fathers, i.e., their defenses of the Christian religion. And this is its proper literal meaning; but it is now used only as implying an excuse for improper conduct.

2. When they heard that he spake in the Hebrew tongue. He had probably been traduced by the Jews of Asia as a mere Gentile, distinguished only by his virulence against the Jewish religion.

3. I am verily a man which am a Jew. A periphrasis for "I am really a Jew." He shows that he could not be ignorant of the Jewish religion, as he had had the best instructer in it which Jerusalem could produce. Feet of Gamaliel. See a full account of this man in the note on chap. v. 34. It has been generally supposed that the phrase brought up at the feet is a reference to the Jewish custom, viz., that the disciples of the rabbins sat on low seats, or on the ground, whilst the rabbin himself occupied a lofty chair. But we rather learn, from Jewish authority, that the disciples of the rabbins stood before their teachers. Kypke therefore contends that at the feet means the same as "near," or "before," which is not an unfrequent mode of speech among both sacred and profane writers.

of their religion. He minded his business at Gamaliel's feet, and was there taught according to the perfect manner of the law of the fathers. What departures he had made from the law were not owing to any confused or mistaken notions of it, for he understood it to a nicety. Paul had as great a value for antiquity, and tradition, as any of them had; and there was never a Jew of them all that understood his religion better than Paul did, or could better give an account of it. (2) He was an active professor of their religion: I was zealous towards God, as you all are this day. Many that are very well skilled in the theory of religion are willing to leave the practice of it to others, but Paul was as much a zealot as a rabbi. Here he compliments his hearers that they all were this day zealous towards God; he bears them record (Rom. x. 2) that they have a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge. Though this did by no means justify their rage, yet it enabled those that prayed, Father, forgive them, to plead, as Christ did, For they know not what they do.

II. What a fiery furious persecutor he had been in the beginning of his time, v. 4, 5. He mentions this to make it the more plainly to appear that the change which was wrought upon him, when he was converted to the Christian faith, was purely the effect of a divine power. Immediately before that sudden change was wrought in him he had the utmost antipathy imaginable to Christianity. He may have a further view in it to invite and encourage those people to repent, for he himself had been a blasphemer, and a persecutor, and yet obtained mercy. Let us view Paul's picture of himself when he was a persecutor. 1. He hated Christianity with a mortal enmity: I persecuted this way unto the death. He breathed out slaughter against them, ch. ix. 1. When they were put to death, he gave his voice against them, ch. xxvi. 10. He persecuted it to the death, that is, he could have been willing himself to die in his opposition to Christianity, so some understand it. He would contentedly have lost his life in defence of the laws and traditions of the fathers. 2. He did all he could to frighten people from this way, and out of it, by binding and delivering into prison both men and women. Now that he himself was bound, he lays a particular stress upon this part of his charge against himself, that he had bound the Christians, and carried them to prison; he likewise reflects with a special regret that he had imprisoned not only the men, but the women. 3. He was employed by the great sanhedrim, the high priest, and all the estate of the elders, in suppressing this new sect, v. 5. When they heard that many of the Jews at Damascus had embraced the Christian faith, they resolved to proceed against them, and could not think of a fitter person to be employed in that business than Paul. They therefore sent him, and letters by him, to the Jews at Damascus, here called the brethren, ordering them to be assisting to Paul in seizing those among them that had turned Christians, and bringing them up prisoners to Jerusalem, to be punished, and that they might either be compelled to retract, or be put to death for a terror to others. "Such a son," says Paul, "I was at first, just such as you now are. I know the heart of a persecutor, and therefore pity you, and pray that you may know the heart of a convert, as God soon made me to do."

III. In what manner he was converted. It was not from any natural or external causes. It was the Lord's doing, and the circumstances of the doing of it were enough to justify him in the change; and none can condemn him for it, without reflecting upon that divine energy. He relates the story of his conversion here very particularly, as we had it before (ch. ix), aiming to show that it was purely the act of God. 1. He was as fully bent upon persecuting the Christians just before Christ arrested him as ever. He made his journey, and was come nigh to Damascus (v. 6), and had no other thought than to execute the cruel design he was sent upon. 2. It was a light from heaven that first startled him, a great light, which shone suddenly round about him, and the Jews knew that God is light, and that such a light as this shining at noon, must be from God. It shone upon him in the open road, at high noon, and so strongly that it struck him to the ground (v. 7), and all that were with him, ch. xxvi. 14. 3. It was a voice from heaven that first begat in him awful thoughts of Jesus Christ. The voice called to him by name, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? And when he asked, Who art thou, Lord? it was answered, I am Jesus of Nazareth, whom thou persecutest, v. 8. 4. Lest it should be objected, "How came this light and voice to work such a change upon him, and not upon those that journeyed with him?" he observes that his fellow travellers saw indeed the light, and were afraid; but, though the light made them afraid, they heard not

According to the perfect manner. That is, according to that strict interpretation of the law, and especially the traditions of the elders, for which the Pharisees were remarkable. That it is Pharisaism that the apostle has in view when he says he was taught "according to the most exact manner" is evident; and hence, in chap. xxvi. 5, he calls Pharisaism "the most exact system," and under it he was zealous towards God, scrupulously exact in every part of his duty, accompanying this with reverence to the Supreme Being.

4. I persecuted this way. This doctrine, this way of worshipping God and arriving at a state of blessedness. Binding and delivering into prisons. See on chap. viii. 3; ix. 2.

5. The high priest doth bear me witness. He probably referred to the letters of authority which he had received from the high priest and the whole estate of the elders, "the whole of the presbytery," that is, the Sanhedrin; and it is likely that he had those letters to produce. This zeal of his against Christianity was an ample proof of his sincerity as a Pharisaical Jew.

the voice of him that spoke to Paul. Now faith comes by hearing, and therefore that change was wrought upon him that heard the words, and heard them directed to himself, which was not wrought upon those who only saw the light. 5. He assures them that when he was thus startled he referred himself entirely to a divine guidance: "What shall I do, Lord? Let the same voice from heaven that has stopped me in the wrong way guide me into the right way," v. 10. And immediately he had directions to go to Damascus, and there it shall be told thee all things which are appointed for thee to do. The extraordinary ways of divine revelation, by visions, and voices, and the appearance of angels, were designed only to introduce and establish the ordinary method by the scriptures and a standing ministry. The voice here tells not Paul what he shall do, but bids him go to Damascus, and there it shall be told him. 6. As a demonstration of the greatness of that light which fastened upon him, he tells them of the immediate effect it had upon his eyesight (v. 11): I could not see for the glory of that light. It struck him blind for the present. Condemned sinners are struck blind by the power of darkness, and it is a lasting blindness, but convinced sinners are struck blind, as Paul here was, not by darkness, but by light: but it is in order to their being enlightened. Those that were with Paul were not blinded, as he was. They, having their sight, led Paul by the hand into the city. Paul, being a Pharisee, was proud of his spiritual eyesight. The Pharisees said, Are we blind also? John ix. 40. Paul was thus struck with bodily blindness to make him sensible of his spiritual blindness.

IV. How he was confirmed in the change he had made, and further directed what he should do, by Ananias.

1. The character here given of Ananias. He was not a man that was any way prejudiced against the Jewish nation or religion, but was himself a devout man according to the law; and thence advanced further to the faith of Christ. He had a good report of all the Jews that dwelt at Damascus. This was the first Christian that Paul had any friendly communication with.

2. The cure immediately wrought by him upon Paul's eyes. He came to him (v. 13); and, to assure him that he came to him from Christ, he stood by him, and said, Brother Saul, receive thy sight. Power went along with this word, and the same hour he recovered his sight, and looked up upon him, ready to receive from him the instructions sent by him.

3. The declaration which Ananias makes to him of the favour which the Lord Jesus designed him above any other.

(1) In the present manifestation of himself to him (v. 14): The God of our fathers has chosen thee. This powerful call is the result of a particular choice; his calling God the God of our fathers intimates that Ananias was himself a Jew by birth. This God of our fathers has chosen thee that thou shouldst know his will. Those whom God hath chosen he hath chosen to know his will, and to do it. That thou shouldst see that Just One, and shouldst hear the voice of his mouth, and so shouldst know his will immediately from himself. It was a distinguishing favour, that he should see Christ here upon earth after his ascension into heaven. Stephen saw him standing at the right hand of God, but Paul saw him standing at his right hand. Stephen saw him, but we do not find that he heard the voice of his mouth, as Paul did. Christ is here called that Just One; for he is Jesus Christ the righteous, and suffered wrongfully. Those whom God has chosen to know his will must have an eye to Christ, and must see him, and hear the voice of his mouth.

(2) In the after-manifestation of himself by him to others (v. 15): "Thou shalt be his witness unto all men, Gentiles as well as Jews, of that thou hast seen and heard." Paul so particularly relating the manner of his conversion here and ch. xxvi, we think that he frequently related the same narrative in his preaching for the conversion of others; he told them what God had done for his soul, to encourage them to hope that he would do something for their souls.

4. The counsel he gave him to join himself to the Lord Jesus by baptism (v. 16): Arise, and be baptized. He had in his circumcision been given up to God, but he must now by baptism be given up to God in Christ. (1) The great gospel privilege which by baptism we have sealed to us is the remission of sins: Be baptized and wash away thy sins; that is, "Receive the comfort of the pardon of thy sins in and through Jesus Christ, and receive power against sin," for our being washed includes our being both justified and sanctified. (2) The great gospel duty which by our baptism we are bound to is to call on the name of

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

The blaze struck all the company to the ground (Acts 24:14). Prone on the earth, and probably with closed eyes, their leader heard his own name twice sounded, with appeal, authority, and love in the tones. The startling question which followed not only pierced conscience, and called for a reasonable vindication of his action, but flashed a new light on it as being persecution which struck at this unknown heavenly speaker. So the first thought in Saul's mind is not about himself or his doings but about the identity of that Speaker. Awe, if not actual worship, is expressed in addressing Him as Lord. Wonder, with perhaps some foreboding of what the answer would be, is audible in the question, "Who art thou?" Who can imagine the shock of the answer to Saul's mind? Then the man whom he had thought of as a vile apostate, justly crucified and not risen as his dupes dreamed, lived in heaven, knew him, Saul, and all that he had been doing, was "apparelled in celestial light," and yet in heavenly glory was so closely identified with these poor people whom he had been hunting to death that to strike them was to hurt Him!

A bombshell had burst, shattering the foundation of his fortifications. A deluge had swept away the ground on which he had stood. His whole life was revolutionized. Its most solid elements were dissolved into vapor, and what he had thought misty nonsense was now the solid thing. To find a "why" for his persecuting was impossible, unless he had said (what in effect he did say), "I did it ignorantly." When a man has a glimpse of Jesus exalted to heaven, and is summoned by Him to give a reason for his life of alienation, that life looks very different from what it did, when seen by dimmer light. Clothes are passable by candlelight that look very shabby in sunshine. When Jesus comes to us, His first work is to set us to judge our past, and no man can muster up respectable answers to His question, "Why?" for all sin is unreasonable, and nothing but obedience to Him can vindicate itself in His sight.—Expositions of Holy Scripture

12. Ananias, a devout man, according to the law, having a good report of all the Jews which dwelt there—One would not know from this description of Ananias that he was a Christian at all, the apostles object being to hold him up as unexceptionable, even to the most rigid Jews.

13-15. The God of our fathers hath chosen thee—studiously linking the new economy upon the old, as but the sequel of it; both having one glorious Author. that thou shouldest . . . see that—'the'—Just One—cf. ch. 3:14; 7:52. hear the voice of his mouth—in order to place him on a level with the other apostles, who had "seen the [risen] Lord."

16. be baptized and wash away thy sins—This way of speaking arises from baptism being the visible seal of remission.

ADAM CLARKE

14. And see that Just One. The Lord Jesus, called the Just One in opposition to the Jews, who crucified Him as a malefactor; see the note on chap. vii. 52. This is an additional proof that Jesus Christ did actually appear unto Saul of Tarsus.

15. Thou shalt be his witness unto all. You shall proclaim Christ crucified to both Jews and Gentiles.

16. Arise, and be baptized. Take now the profession of Christ's faith most solemnly upon you by being baptized in the name of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Wash away thy sins. Let this washing of your body represent to you the washing away of your sins, and know that this washing away of sin can be received only by invoking the name of the Lord.

MATTHEW HENRY

the Lord, the Lord Jesus; to acknowledge him to be our Lord and our God, and to apply to him accordingly. We must wash away our sins, calling on the name of the Lord; that is, we must seek for the pardon of our sins in Christ's name. (3) We must do this quickly. Why tarriest thou? Our covenanting with God in Christ is needful work, that must not be deferred. Why should not that be done at the present time that must be done some time, or we are undone?

V. How he was commissioned to go and preach the gospel to the Gentiles. This was the great thing for which they were so angry at him, and therefore it was requisite he should for this produce a divine warrant. This commission he did not receive presently upon his conversion, for this was at Jerusalem. 1. He received his orders to do it when he was at prayer, begging of God to appoint him his work and to show him the course he should steer. He was at prayer in the temple, which was to be called a house of prayer for all people; not only in which all people should pray, but in which all people should be prayed for. Paul's praying in the temple was an evidence that he had a veneration for the temple. It would be a great satisfaction to Paul afterwards, in the execution of this commission, to reflect upon it that he received it when he was at prayer. 2. He received it in a vision. He fell into a trance (v. 17). In this trance he saw Jesus Christ (v. 18): I saw him saying unto me. 3. Before Christ gave him a commission to go to the Gentiles, he told him it was to no purpose for him to think of doing any good at Jerusalem; so that they must not blame him, but themselves, if he be sent to the Gentiles. "Make haste," says he, "and get thee quickly out of Jerusalem"; thou wilt find they will not receive thy testimony concerning me. As God knows before who will receive the gospel, so he knows who will reject it. 4. Paul renewed his petition because they knew what he had been before his conversion, and therefore must ascribe so great a change in him to the power of almighty grace. Thus he reasoned, both with himself and with the Lord, and thought he reasoned justly (v. 19, 20): "Lord," says he, "they know that I was as bitter an enemy as any of them to such as believed on thee, that I imprisoned them and beat them in every synagogue. Particularly in Stephen's case; they know that when he was stoned I was standing by, consenting to his death, and kept the clothes of those that stoned him. If I appear among them, preaching the doctrine that Stephen preached and suffered for, they will no doubt receive my testimony." "No," says Christ to him, "they will not; but will be more exasperated against thee as a deserter." 5. Paul's petition for a warrant to preach the gospel at Jerusalem is overruled (v. 21): Depart, for I will send thee far hence, unto the Gentiles. God often gives gracious answers to the prayers of his people, not in the thing itself that they pray for but, in something better. It is God that appoints his labourers both their day and their place, and it is fit they should acquiesce in his appointment, though it may cross their own inclinations. Paul hankers after Jerusalem: to be a preacher there was the summit of his ambition; but Christ designs him greater preferment. So often does Providence contrive better for us than we for ourselves. Paul shall not go to preach among the Gentiles without a commission: I will send thee. And, if Christ send him, his Spirit will go along with him, and give him to see the fruit of his labours. He was sent to places at a distance. Surely they would see that they had no reason to be angry with Paul for preaching among the Gentiles, for he was compelled to it, by an overruling command from heaven.

Verses 22–30

Paul was going on with his account of himself. But, whatever he designs to say, they resolve he shall say no more to them: They gave him audience to this word. Hitherto they had heard him with patience and some attention. But when he speaks of being sent to the Gentiles they cannot bear it. Upon the mention of this, they have no manner of patience, but forget all rules of decency and equity.

Now here we are told how furious the people were against Paul, for mentioning the Gentiles as taken into the cognizance of divine grace.

I. They interrupted him that nobody might hear a word he said. Galled consciences kick at the least touch; and those who are resolved not to be ruled by reason commonly resolve not to hear it if they can help it.

II. They clamoured against him as one that was unworthy of life. They cried out with a confused noise, "Away with such a fellow as this from the earth, it is not fit that he should live." Thus the men calling on the name of the Lord—rather, 'having called,' i.e., after having done so; referring to the confession of Christ which preceded baptism, as ch. 8:37.

17-21. it came to pass . . .—This thrilling dialogue between the glorified Redeemer and his chosen vessel is nowhere else related. when I was come again to Jerusalem—on the occasion mentioned in ch. 9:26-29. while I prayed in the temple—He thus calls their attention to the fact that after his conversion he kept up his connection with the temple as before.

get . . . quickly out of Jerusalem—cf. ch. 9:29—for they will not receive thy testimony . . .

And I said, Lord, they know . . .—'Can it be, Lord, that they will resist the testimony of one whom they knew so well as among the bitterest of all against Thy disciples, and whom nothing short of resistless evidence could have turned to Thee?'

Depart for I will send thee far hence unto the Gentiles—i.e., 'Enough; thy testimony is not to be thrown away upon Jerusalem; the Gentiles, afar off, are thy peculiar sphere.'

22, 23. gave him audience to this word . . . then . . . Away with such a fellow from the earth . . .—Their national prejudices lashed into fury

ADAM CLARKE

17. When I was come again to Jerusalem. It is likely that he refers to the first journey to Jerusalem, about three years after his conversion, chap. ix. 25-26 and Gal. i. 18. I was in a trance. This circumstance is not mentioned anywhere else, unless it be that to which himself refers in 2 Cor. xii. 2-4, when he conceived himself transported to the third heaven; and if the case be the same, the appearance of Jesus Christ to him and the command given are circumstances related only in this place.

19. I imprisoned and beat in every synagogue. This shows what an active instrument Saul of Tarsus was in the hands of this persecuting priesthood, and how very generally the followers of Christ were persecuted, and how difficult it was at this time to profess Christianity.

20. When the blood of thy martyr Stephen was shed. See on chap. vii. 58; viii. 1. All these things Paul alleged as reasons why he could not expect to be received by the Christians; for how could they suppose that such a persecutor could be converted?

21. I will send thee far hence unto the Gentiles. This was the particular appointment of Paul; he was the apostle of the Gentiles. For though he preached frequently to the Jews, yet to preach the gospel to the Gentiles and to write for the conversion and establishment of the Gentile world were his peculiar destination. Hence we find him and his companions travelling everywhere. None of the apostles travelled, none preached, none labored as this man; and, we may add, none was so greatly owned of God. Next to Jesus Christ, Paul is the glory of the Christian Church. Jesus is the Foundation; Paul, the master builder.

22. They gave him audience unto this word. Namely, that God had sent him to the Gentiles. Not that they refused to preach the law to the

that have been the greatest blessings of their age have been represented not only as the burdens of the earth, but the plague of their generation. The ungodly Jews here say of Paul that it was not fit he should live; and therefore he must be removed, that the world may be eased of the burden of him.

III. They went stark mad against Paul, and against the chief captain (v. 23); as men whose reason was quite lost in passion, they cried out and howled; they cast off their clothes. They thus showed how ready they were to stone him; those that stoned Stephen threw off their clothes, v. 20. Or, they rent their clothes, as if he had spoken blasphemy; and threw dust into the air, in detestation of it. All they intended was to make the chief captain sensible how much they were enraged and exasperated at Paul.

IV. The chief captain took care for his safety, by ordering him to be brought into the castle, v. 24. A prison sometimes has been a protection to good men from popular rage. Paul's hour was not yet come, and therefore God raised up one that took care of him.

V. He ordered him the torture. He ordered that he should be examined by scourging, that he might know wherefore they cried so against him. Herein he did not proceed fairly; he should have singled out some of the complainants, and should have examined them, what they had to lay to the charge of a man that could give so good an account of himself. It was proper to ask them, but not at all proper to ask Paul, wherefore they cried so against him. No man is bound to accuse himself, though he be guilty, much less ought he to be compelled to accuse himself when he is innocent. Is this a fair or just occasion to scourge Paul, that a rude tumultuous mob cry out against him, but cannot tell why or wherefore?

VI. Paul pleaded his privilege as a Roman citizen, by which he was exempted from all trials and punishments of this nature (v. 25): As they bound him with thongs he made no outcry against the injustice of their proceedings against an innocent man, but let them understand the illegality of their proceedings against him as a citizen of Rome. He said to the centurion that stood by, "Is it lawful for you to scourge a man that is a Roman, and uncondemned?" The manner of his speaking plainly intimates what a holy security and serenity of mind this good man enjoyed, not disturbed either with anger or fear in the midst of all those indignities that were done him, and the danger he was in.

VII. The chief captain was surprised at this, and put into a fright. He had taken Paul to be a vagabond Egyptian. How many men of great worth and merit are despised because they are not known! The chief captain had centurions, under-officers, attending him, ch. xxi. 32. One of these reports this matter to the chief captain (v. 26): Take heed what thou doest, for this man is a Roman. They all knew what a value was put upon this privilege of the Roman citizens. The chief captain would be satisfied of the truth of this from his own mouth (v. 27): "Tell me, art thou a Roman? Art thou entitled to the privileges of a Roman citizen?" "Yes," says Paul, "I am." The chief captain compares notes with him upon this matter, and it appears that the privilege Paul had as a Roman citizen was more honourable than the colonel's; for the colonel owns that his was purchased: "I am a freeman of Rome; but with a great sum obtained I this freedom." Says Paul, "I was free-born." He pleads it for his own preservation, for which end not only we may but we ought to use all lawful means. This put an immediate stop to Paul's trouble. Those that were appointed to examine him by scourging departed from him (v. 29). The colonel himself was afraid when he heard he was a Roman, because he had bound him in order to his being beaten. Thus many are restrained from evil practices by the fear of man who would not be restrained from them by the fear of God. See here the benefit of human laws and magistracy, and what reason we have to be thankful to God for them. By the general support of equity and fair dealing between man and man, they have served to check the rage of wicked men. Therefore this service we owe to all in authority, to pray for them, because this benefit we have reason to expect from them. The governor, the next day, brought Paul before the sanhedrim, v. 30. He first loosed him from his bands, and then summoned the chief priests and all their council to come together to take cognizance of Paul's case, for he found it to be a matter of religion. This Roman, who was a military man, kept Paul in custody, and appealed from the rabble to the general assembly. We may hope that hereby he intended Paul's safety, as thinking the chief priests and elders at the mention of a mission to the Gentiles, they would speedily have done to him as they did to Stephen, but for the presence and protection of the Roman officer.

24-26. examined by scourging—according to the Roman practice. that he might know wherefore they cried so—Paul's speech being to him in an unknown tongue, he concluded from the horror which it kindled in the vast audience that he must have been guilty of some crime.

Paul said to the centurion that stood by—to superintend the torture and receive the confession expected to be wrung from him. Is it lawful for you to scourge a man that is a Roman . . .—See on ch. 16:37.

27-29. art thou a Roman?—showing that this being of Tarsus, which he had told him before (ch. 21:39) did not necessarily imply that he was a Roman citizen. With a great sum obtained I this freedom—Roman citizenship was bought and sold in the reign of Claudius, we know, at a high price: at a subsequent date, for next to nothing. But to put in a false claim to this privilege was a capital crime. I was [free] born—born to it, by purchase, or in reward of services, on the part of his father or some ancestor. chief captain feared . . .—See on ch. 16:38.

Gentiles and make them proselytes, for this they were fond of doing, so that our Lord says they compassed sea and land to make a proselyte; but they understood the apostle as stating that God had rejected them and called the Gentiles to be His peculiar people in their place, and this they could not bear. Away with such a fellow. According to the law of Moses, he who attempted to seduce the people to any strange worship was to be stoned, Deut. xiii. 15. The Jews wished to insinuate that the apostle was guilty of this crime and that therefore he should be stoned, or put to death.

23. Cast off their clothes. Bishop Pearce supposes that shaking their upper garments is all that is meant here, and that it was an ancient custom for men to do so when highly pleased or greatly irritated; but it is likely that some of them were now actually throwing off their clothes, in order to prepare to stone Paul. Threw dust into the air. In sign of contempt and by way of execration. Shimei acted so in order to express his contempt of David, 2 Sam. xvi. 13, where it is said he "cursed [him] as he went, and threw stones at him"; or, as the margin, he "dusted him with dust." Their throwing dust in the air was also expressive of extraordinary rage and vindictive malice. The apostle, being guarded by the Roman soldiers, was out of the power of the mob; and their throwing dust in the air not only showed their rage, but also their vexation that they could not get the apostle into their power.

24. Examined by scourging. As the chief captain did not understand the Hebrew language, he was ignorant of the charge brought against Paul and ignorant also of the defense which the apostle had made. As he saw that they grew more and more outrageous, he supposed that Paul must have given them the highest provocation; and therefore he determined to put him to the torture, in order to find out the nature of his crime.

25. And as they bound him. They were going to tie him to a post, that they might scourge him. Is it lawful? The Roman law absolutely forbade the binding of a Roman citizen.

28. With a great sum obtained I this freedom. So it appears that the freedom, even of Rome, might be purchased and that it was sold at a very high price. But I was free born. It has been generally believed that the inhabitants of Tarsus, born in that city, had the same rights and privileges as Roman citizens in consequence of a charter or grant from Julius Caesar. Pliny tells us that Tarsus was a free city. And Appian says that Antony "made the people of Tarsus free, and discharged them from paying tribute." These testimonies are of weight sufficient to show that Paul, by being born at Tarsus, might have been free born and a Roman.

29. After he knew that he was a Roman. He who was going to scourge him durst not proceed to the torture when Paul declared himself to be a Roman. A passage from Cicero throws the fullest light on this place: "Whosoever he might be whom thou wert hurrying to the rack, were he even unknown to thee, if he said that he was a Roman citizen, he would necessarily obtain from thee, the Praetor, by the simple mention of Rome, if not an escape, yet at least a delay of his punishment."

30. He . . . commanded . . . all their council to appear. Instead of "to come," which we translate, to appear, "to assemble," or "meet together" is the reading of several MSS.; this reading is most probably the true one. As the chief captain wished to know the certainty of the matter, he desired the Jewish council, or Sanhedrin, to assemble and examine the business thoroughly, that he might know of what the apostle was accused. As the law would not permit him to proceed against a Roman in any judicial way but on the clearest evidence, and as he understood that the cause of their enmity was something that concerned their religion, he considered the Sanhedrin to be the most proper judge and therefore commanded them "to assemble."

would do him justice, and clear him; for their court governed by rules of equity. That which he is here said to aim at is the gratifying of his own curiosity: He would have known the certainty wherefore he was accused of the Jews.

CHAPTER 23

Verses 1–5

Perhaps he thought if he were brought before the sanhedrim at Jerusalem he should be able to deal with them to some good purpose, and yet we do not find that he works at all upon them.

I. Paul's protestation of his own integrity. Paul appeared here,

1. With a good courage. He was not at all put out of countenance upon his being brought before such an august assembly, but he earnestly beheld the council. When Stephen was brought before them, they thought to have faced him down, but could not, such was his holy confidence. Now that Paul was brought before them he thought to have faced them down, but could not, such was their wicked impudence.

2. With a good conscience. He said, "Men and brethren, I have lived in all good conscience before God unto this day." He had always been a man inclined to religion; always put a difference between moral good and evil. He was no designing man, who cared not what he did, so he could but compass his own ends. Even when he persecuted the church of God, he thought he ought to do it. Though his conscience was misinformed, yet he acted according to the dictates of it. He seems rather to speak of the time since his conversion, since he fell under their displeasure. "Even to this day, I have lived in all good conscience before God." He had aimed at nothing but to please God and do his duty. See here the character of an honest man. He sets God before him, and lives as in his sight. He makes conscience of what he says and does, though he may be under some mistakes. He is universally conscientious; and those that are not so are not at all truly conscientious. He continues so, and perseveres in it: "I have lived so until this day." Whatever changes pass over him, he is still the same, strictly conscientious.

II. The outrage of which Ananias the high priest was guilty: he commanded those that stood by to smite him on the mouth (v. 2). The high priest was highly offended at Paul. His protestation of his integrity was provocation enough to one who was resolved to run him down. When he could charge him with no crime, he thought it was crime enough that he asserted his own innocency. In his rage he ordered him to be smitten, and to be smitten, on the mouth as having offended with his lips, and in token of his enjoining him silence. If therefore we see such indignities done to good men, nay, if they be done to us for well doing and well saying, we must not think it strange: Christ will give those the kisses of his mouth (Song. i, 2) who for his sake receive blows on the mouth.

III. The denunciation of the wrath of God against the high priest; God shall smite thee, thou whited wall, v. 3. Paul did not speak this in any sinful heat or passion, but in a holy zeal against the high priest's abuse of his power, not at all with a spirit of revenge. He gives him his due character: Thou whited wall; that is, thou hypocrite—a mud-wall, trash and dirt and rubbish underneath, but plastered over, or white-washed. Those that daubed with untempered mortar failed not to daub themselves over with something that made them look not only clean, but gay. He reads him his just doom: "God shall smite thee, shall bring upon thee his sore judgments, especially spiritual judgments." He assigns a good reason for that doom: "For sittest thou pretending to judge me after the law, and yet commandest me to be smitten before any crime is proved upon me, which is contrary to the law?" It is against all law, human and divine, natural and positive, to hinder a man from making his defence, and to condemn him unheard. It is inexcusable in a high priest that is appointed to judge according to the law.

IV. The offence which was taken at this bold word of Paul's (v. 4): Those that stood by said, Revilest thou God's high priest? See here then, What a hard game Paul had to play, when his enemies were abusive to him, and his friends were ready to find fault with his management. These were disgusted at Paul for giving him his due.

V. The excuse that Paul made for what he had said, because he found it was a stumbling-block. Though he had taken the liberty to tell the high priest his fault, yet, when he found it gave offence,

CHAPTER 23

Vss. 1-10. PAUL'S DEFENSE BEFORE THE SANHEDRIM DIVIDES THE RIVAL FACTIONS, FROM WHOSE VIOLENCE THE COMMANDANT HAS THE APOSTLE REMOVED INTO THE FORTRESS.

1. Paul, earnestly beholding the council—with a look of conscious integrity and unfaltering courage, perhaps also recognizing some of his early fellow pupils.

I have lived in all good conscience before God until this day—The word has an indirect reference to the 'polity' or "commonwealth of Israel," of which he would signify that he had been, and was to that hour, an honest and God-fearing member.

2. the high priest . . . commanded . . . to smite him on the mouth—a method of silencing a speaker common in the East to this day [HACKET]. But for a judge thus to treat a prisoner on his trial, for merely prefacing his defense by a protestation of his integrity, was infamous.

3, 4. God shall smite thee—as indeed He did; for he was killed by an assassin during the Jewish war (JOSEPHUS, Jewish War, ii. 17. 9). thou whited wall—i.e., hypocrite (Matt. 23:27). This epithet, however correctly describing the man, must not be defended as addressed to a judge, though the remonstrance which follows—"for sittest thou . . ."—ought to have put him to shame.

ADAM CLARKE

This chapter should end with the twenty-ninth verse, and the following should begin with the thirtieth; this is the most natural division, and is followed by some of the most correct editions of the original text.

CHAPTER 23

1. I have lived in all good conscience. Some people seem to have been unnecessarily stumbled with this expression. What does the apostle mean by it? Why, that, while he was a Jew, he was one from principle of conscience; that what he did while he continued Jew, he did from the same principle; that when God opened his eyes to see the nature of Christianity he became a Christian because God persuaded his conscience that it was right for him to become one—that, in a word, he was sincere through the whole course of his religious life and his conduct had borne the most unequivocal proofs of it.

2. The high priest Ananias. There was a high priest of this name who was sent a prisoner to Rome by Quadratus, governor of Syria, to give an account of the part he took in the quarrel between the Jews and the Samaritans; see Joseph., Antiq., l. xx, c. 6, s. 8. Krebs has proved that this very Ananias, on being examined at Rome, was found innocent, returned to Jerusalem, and was restored to the high priesthood; see Joseph., Antiq., l. xx, c. 9, s. 2. To smite him on the mouth. Because he professed to have a good conscience, while believing on Jesus Christ and propagating His doctrine.

3. God shall smite thee, thou whited wall. Thou hypocrite! who sittest on the seat of judgment, pretending to hear and seriously weigh the defense of an accused person, who must in justice and equity be presumed to be innocent till he is proved to be guilty; and instead of acting according to the law, commandest me to be smitten contrary to the law, which always has the person of the prisoner under its protection.

he cried, I have done wrong. He wished he had not done it. He excuses it with this, that he did not consider when he said it to whom he spoke (v. 5): I wist not, brethren, that he was the high priest. "I did not just then think of the dignity of his place, or else I would have spoken more respectfully to him." But, says he, I did not consider it. But the Jews acknowledged that prophets might use a liberty in speaking of rulers which others might not. He takes care that what he had said should not be drawn into a precedent, to the weakening of the obligation of that law in the least: For it is written, Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people. It is for the public good that the honour of magistracy should be supported, and not suffer for the miscarriages of those who are entrusted with it. Not as if great men may not hear of their faults, and public grievances be complained of by proper persons, but there must be a particular tenderness for the honour of those in authority because the law of God requires a particular reverence to be paid to them, as God's vicegerents.

Verses 6–11

And now he finds that he who has delivered does and will deliver. He that delivered him from the tumult of the people here delivers him from that of the elders.

I. His own prudence and ingenuity contribute much to his escape. Paul's greatest honour, and that upon which he most valued himself, was that he was a Christian, and an apostle of Christ; and yet he had sometimes occasion to make use of his other honours. His being a citizen of Rome saved him from his being scourged by the chief captain, and here his being a Pharisee saved him from being condemned by the sanhedrim. It will consist very well with our willingness to suffer for Christ to use all lawful methods, both to prevent suffering and to extricate ourselves out of it. The honest policy Paul used here for his own preservation was to divide his judges, and, by incensing one part of them more against him, to engage the contrary part for him.

1. The great council was made up of Sadducees and Pharisees, and Paul perceived it (v. 6): One part were Sadducees and the other Pharisees. Now these differed very much from one another, and yet they ordinarily agreed well enough to do the business of the council together. The Pharisees were bigots, zealous for the ceremonies, but at the same time they were very orthodox in the faith of the Jewish church concerning the world of spirits, the resurrection of the dead, and the life of the world to come. The Sadducees were deists—no friends to the scripture, or divine revelation. The books of Moses they admitted as containing a good history and a good law, but had little regard to the other books of the Old Testament. They deny the resurrection; not only the return of the body to life, but a future state of rewards and punishments. They denied the existence of angels and spirits, and allowed of no being but matter. They thought that God himself was corporeal. When they read of angels in the Old Testament, they supposed that they were impressions on the fancies of those they were sent to, and no real existences—that they were this, or that, or anything rather than what they were. And, as for the souls of men, they denied their existence in a state of separation from the body, and any difference between the soul of a man and of a beast. These, no doubt, pretended to be free-thinkers, but really thought as meanly as possible. It is strange how men of such wicked principles could have a place in the great sanhedrim; but many of them were of quality and estate, and they complied with the public establishment, and so got in and kept in. But how degenerate was the character of the Jewish church, when such profane men as these were among their rulers!

2. In this matter of difference between the Pharisees and Sadducees Paul openly declared himself to be on the Pharisees' side against the Sadducees (v. 6): He cried out, "I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee. I hope for the resurrection of the dead, and this is it for which I am now called in question." Paul owns himself a Pharisee, so far as the Pharisees were in the right. Though as Pharisaism was opposed to Christianity he set himself against it, yet, as it was opposed to Sadducism, he adhered to it. We must never think the worse of any truth of God, for its being held by men otherwise corrupt. He might truly say that being persecuted, as a Christian, this was the thing he was called in question for. He might truly say he was called in question for the hope of the resurrection of the dead, as he afterwards pleaded, ch. xxiv. 15, and ch. xxvi. 6, 7.

3. This occasioned a division in the council. There

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

5. I wist not . . . that he was the high priest—All sorts of explanations of this have been given. The high priesthood was in a state of great confusion and constant change at this time (as appears from JOSEPHUS), and the apostle's long absence from Jerusalem, and perhaps the manner in which he was habited or the seat he occupied, with other circumstances to us unknown, may account for such a speech. But if he was thrown off his guard by an insult which touched him to the quick, "what can surpass the grace with which he recovered his self-possession, and the frankness with which he acknowledged his error? If his conduct in yielding to the momentary impulse was not that of Christ Himself under a similar provocation (John 18:22, 23), certainly the manner in which he atoned for his fault was Christlike" [HACKET].

6-9. when Paul perceived—from the discussion which plainly had by this time arisen between the parties—that the one part were Sadducees, and the other Pharisees, he cried out—raising his voice above both parties-the Sadducees say . . . there is no resurrection, neither angel, nor spirit—See on Luke 20:37.

–I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee—The true reading seems to be, 'the son of Pharisees,' i.e., belonging to a family who from father to son had long been such—of the hope and resurrection of the dead—i.e., not the vague hope of immortality, but the definite expectation of the resurrection—I am called in question—By this adroit stroke, Paul engages the whole Pharisaic section of the council in his favor; the doctrine of a resurrection being common to both, though they would totally differ in their application of it. This was, of course, quite warrantable, and the more so as it was already evident that no impartiality in trying his cause was to be looked for from such an assembly.

ADAM CLARKE

5. I wist not, brethren, that he was the high priest. After all the learned labor that has been spent on this subject, the simple meaning appears plainly to be this: Paul did not know that Ananias was high priest. He had been long absent from Jerusalem; political changes were frequent; the high priesthood was no longer in succession, and was frequently bought and sold; the Romans put down one high priest and raised up another as political reasons dictated. As the person of Ananias might have been wholly unknown to him, as the hearing was very sudden, and there was scarcely any time to consult the formalities of justice, it seems very probable that Paul, if he ever had known the person of Ananias, had forgotten him. And as in a council or meeting of this kind the presence of the high priest was not indispensably necessary, he did not know that the person who presided was not the sagan, or high priest's deputy, or some other person put in the seat for the time being. Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people. If I had known he was the high priest, I should not have publicly pronounced this execration, for respect is due to his person for the sake of his office. I do not see that Paul intimates that he had done anything through inadvertence, nor does he here confess any fault. He states two facts: (1) That he did not know him to be the high priest; (2) That such a one, or any ruler of the people, should be reverenced. But he neither recalls or makes an apology for his words; he had not committed a trespass, and he did not acknowledge one.

8. The Sadducees say that there is no resurrection. It is strange, since these denied a future state, that they observed the ordinances of the law; for they also believed the five books of Moses to be a revelation from God. Yet they had nothing in view but temporal good, and they understood the promises in the law as referring to these things alone.

6. I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee. Instead of "of a Pharisee," some MSS. have "of the Pharisees"; which, if acknowledged to be the genuine reading, would alter the sense thus, "I am a Pharisee, and a disciple of the Pharisees," for so the word son is frequently understood. Of the hope and resurrection. Concerning the hope of the resurrection. Paul had preached the resurrection of the dead, on the foundation and evidence of the resurrection of Christ. For this he and the apostles were some time before imprisoned by the high priest and elders, chap. iv. 1-3 and v. 17, because they preached through Jesus the resurrection of the dead. This they could not bear; for if Jesus Christ rose from the dead, their malice and wickedness in putting Him to death were incontrovertibly established.

arose a dissension between the Pharisees and the Sadducees (v. 7), for this word of Paul's made the Sadducees more warm and the Pharisees more cool in the prosecution of him; so that the multitude was divided. All the cry had been against Paul, but now there arose a great cry against one another, v. 9. Everything was done with clamour and noise; and in such a tumultuous manner were the great principles of their religion stickled for. Gainsayers may be convinced by fair reasoning, but never by a great cry.

4. The Pharisees hereupon (would one think it?) took Paul's part (v. 9): They strove, saying, We find no evil in this man. He had given a good account of himself, and had now declared himself orthodox in the great principles of religion, and therefore they cannot see that he has done anything worthy of death or of bonds. Nay, they go further, "If a spirit or an angel hath spoken to him we ought not to oppose him, lest we be found fighting against God"; as Gamaliel, who was himself a Pharisee, had argued, ch. v. 39. We may observe, to the honour of the gospel, that it was witnessed to even by its adversaries, and confessions, not only of its innocency, but of its excellency, were extorted sometimes by the power of truth even from those that persecuted it. Pilate found no fault in Christ though he put him to death; and the Pharisees here supposed it possible that Paul might have a commission sent him from heaven by an angel to do what he did; and yet it should seem, they after this joined with the high priest in prosecuting him, ch. xxiv. 1. They sinned against the knowledge which they not only had, but sometimes owned. We will hope that some of them at least did henceforward conceive a better opinion of Paul than they had had, and were favourable to him. And then it must be observed to their honour that their zeal for the traditions of the elders was so far swallowed up in a zeal for the fundamental doctrines of religion, that if he will heartily join with them against the Sadducees, and adhere to the hope of the resurrection of the dead, they will charitably hope that he walks according to the light God has given him, and are so far from persecuting him that they are ready to patronize and protect him.

II. The chief captain's care and conduct stand him in more stead; for when he has thrown this bone of contention between the Pharisees and Sadducees he is never the nearer, but is in danger of being pulled in pieces by them. The chief captain is forced to come with his soldiers and rescue him, as he had done, ch. xxi. 32, and ch. xxii. 24. Paul's danger. Between his friends and his enemies he had like to have been pulled to pieces, the one hugging him to death, the other crushing him to death. His deliverance: The chief captain ordered his soldiers to go down and to take him by force from among them, and to bring him into the castle.

III. Divine consolations stood him in most stead of all. The chief captain had rescued him out of the hands of cruel men, but still he had him in custody. The castle was indeed a protection to him, but withal it was a confinement; and, as it was now his preservation from so great a death, it might be his reservation for a greater. Perhaps, in the night following, Paul was full of thoughts and cares what should become of him, and how his present troubles might be turned to answer some good purpose. Then did the Lord Jesus make him a kind visit (v. 11): The Lord stood by him, came to his bedside. Whoever is against us, we need not fear if the Lord stand by us. Christ bids him have a good heart upon it: "Be of good cheer, Paul; be not discouraged." It is the will of Christ that his servants who are faithful should be always cheerful. Christ, by his word, satisfies him that God approved of his conduct. It is a strange argument which he makes use of to encourage him: As thou hast testified of me in Jerusalem, so must thou bear witness also at Rome. One would think this was but cold comfort, and yet this was designed to encourage him. He had been serving Christ as a witness for him in what he had hitherto endured. He was still going on with his work. He had not yet finished his testimony, but was only reserved for further service. Nothing disheartened Paul so much as the thought of being taken off from doing service to Christ and good to souls: Fear not, says Christ, I have not done with thee. Paul seems to have had a particular fancy to go to Rome, to preach the gospel there. Being a citizen of Rome, he longed for a journey thither, and had designed it (ch. xix. 21): After I have been at Jerusalem, I must also see Rome. Now he was ready to conclude that this had broken his measures, and he should never see Rome; but even in that Christ tells him he should be gratified.

the scribes . . . of the Pharisees' part . . . strove, saying, We find no evil in this man, but—as to those startling things which he brings to our ears—if a spirit or an angel hath spoken to him—referring, perhaps, to his trance in the temple, of which he had told them (ch. 22:17). They put this favorable construction upon his proceedings for no other reason than that they had found him one of their own party. They care not to inquire into the truth of what he alleged, over and above their opinions, but only to explain it away as something not worth raising a noise about. (The following words, "Let us not fight against God," seem not to belong to the original text, and perhaps are from ch. 5:39. In this case, either the meaning is, 'If he has had some divine communication, what of that?' or, the conclusion of the sentence may have been drowned in the hubbub, which the next verse shows to have been intense).

10. the chief captain, fearing lest Paul should have been pulled to pieces . . . commanded the soldiers to go down and take him by force . . .—This shows that the commandant was not himself present, and further, that instead of the Sanhedrim trying the cause, the proceedings quickly consisted in the one party attempting to seize the prisoner, and the other to protect him.

11-35. IN THE FORTRESS PAUL IS CHEERED BY A NIGHT VISION—AN INFAMOUS CONSPIRACY TO ASSASSINATE HIM IS PROVIDENTIALLY DEFEATED, AND HE IS DESPATCHED BY NIGHT WITH A LETTER FROM THE COMMANDANT TO FELIX AT CÆSAREA, BY WHOM ARRANGEMENTS ARE MADE FOR A HEARING OF HIS CAUSE. 11. the night following—his heart perhaps sinking, in the solitude of his barrack ward, and thinking perhaps that all the predictions of danger at Jerusalem were now to be fulfilled in his death there. the Lord—i.e., Jesus—stood by him . .

Be of good cheer, Paul; for as thou hast testified of me in Jerusalem, so must thou . . . also at Rome—i.e., 'Thy work in Jerusalem is done, faithfully and well done; but thou art not to die here; thy purpose next to "see Rome" (ch. 19:21) shall not be disappointed, and there also must thou bear witness of Me.' As this vision was not unneeded now, so we shall find it cheering and upholding him throughout all that befell him up to his arrival there.

ADAM CLARKE

7. And the multitude was divided. Paul, perceiving the assembly to consist of Sadducees and Pharisees, and finding he was not to expect any justice, thought it best thus to divide the council by introducing a question on which the Pharisees and Sadducees were at issue. He did so; and the Pharisees immediately espoused his side of the question, because in opposition to the Sadducees, whom they abhorred as irreligious men.

9. The scribes . . . arose, and strove. They "contended forcibly"—they came to an open rupture with the Sadducees; and in order to support their own party against them, they even admitted as truth Paul's account of his miraculous conversion, and therefore they said, If a spirit or an angel hath spoken to him. He had previously mentioned that Jesus Christ had appeared to him when on his way to Damascus; and though they might not be ready to admit the doctrine of Christ's resurrection, yet they could, consistently with their own principles, allow that the soul of Christ might appear to him. They immediately caught at this, as furnishing a strong proof against the doctrine of the Sadducees, who neither believed in angel nor spirit, while the Pharisees confessed both. Let us not fight against God. These words are wanting in some MSS.

10. The chief captain . . . commanded the soldiers to go down. It appears that the chief captain was present during these transactions, and that he had a body of soldiers in readiness in the castle of Antonia; and it was from this that he commanded them to "come down," for the rescue and preservation of Paul.

11. Be of good cheer, Paul. It is no wonder if, with all these trials and difficulties, Paul was much dejected in mind; and especially as he had not any direct intimation from God what the end of the present trials would be. To comfort him and strengthen his faith, God gave him this vision. So must thou bear witness also at Rome. This was pleasing intelligence to Paul, who had long desired to see that city and preach the gospel of Christ there. He appears to have had an intimation that he should see it; but how, he could not tell. This vision satisfied him that he should be sent thither by God himself. This would settle every fear and scruple concerning the issue of the present persecution.

MATTHEW HENRY

Verses 12–35

We have here the story of a plot against the life of Paul.

I. How this plot was laid. They found they could gain nothing by popular tumult, or legal process, and therefore have recourse to the barbarous method of assassination.

1. Who they were that formed this conspiracy. They were certain Jews, v. 12. And they were more than forty that were in the design, v. 13.

2. When the conspiracy was formed: When it was day. In the night Christ appeared to Paul to protect him, and, when it was day, here were forty men appearing against him to destroy him; they were not up so soon but Christ was up before them.

3. What the conspiracy was. These men banded together; they engaged to stand by one another, and everyone, to his power, to be aiding and assisting to murder Paul. What a monstrous idea must these men have formed of Paul, before they could be capable of forming such a monstrous design against him! What laws of truth and justice so sacred, so strong, which malice and bigotry will not break through!

4. How firm they made it: They bound themelves under an anathema, imprecating the heaviest curses upon themselves if they did not kill Paul, and so quickly that they would not eat nor drink till they had done it. What a complication of wickedness is here! To design to kill an innocent man that had done them no harm, was going in the way of Cain; yet, as if this had been a small matter, they bound themselves to it. To incline to do evil, and intend to do it, is bad; but to engage to do it is much worse. This is entering into covenant with the devil; it is leaving no room for repentance. They bound one another to it, and did all they could, not only to secure the damnation of their own souls, but of theirs whom they drew into the association. They showed a great contempt of the providence of God to do such a thing within so short a time. When we say, Tomorrow we will do this or that, we must add, If the Lord will. But with what face could they insert a proviso for the permission of God's providence when what they were about was directly against the prohibitions of God's word? What a woeful dilemma did they throw themselves upon! God certainly meets them with his curse if they do go on in it, and they desire he would if they do not! Such language of hell those speak that wish God to damn them, and the devil to take them, if they do not do so and so. They showed a most eager desire to compass this matter.

5. What method they took to bring it about. There is no getting near Paul in the castle. Therefore the chief priests and elders must desire the governor of the castle to let Paul come to them, to be further examined, and then, in his passage from the castle to the council, they would put an end to all disputes about Paul by killing him, v. 14, 15. They come to the principal members of the great sanhedrim. They are so confident of their approbation of this villainy, that they are not ashamed to own to them that they have bound themselves under a great curse, that they will eat nothing till they have killed Paul. They design to breakfast the next morning upon his blood. They doubt not but the chief priests will lend them a helping hand, and be their tools, pretending to the chief captain that they would enquire something more perfectly concerning him. What an ill opinion had they of their priests, when they could apply to them on such an errand as this! The priests and elders consented to it without boggling at it in the least. Instead of reproving them, they bolstered them up in it, because it was against Paul whom they hated.

II. How the plot was discovered. Providence so ordered it that it was brought to light, and brought to nought.

1. How it was discovered to Paul, v. 16. There was a youth that was related to Paul, his sister's son; and somehow or other he heard of their lying in wait, and he went into the castle, and he told Paul what he heard. God has many ways of bringing to light the hidden works of darkness.

2. How it was discovered to the chief captain. Paul had got a good interest in the officers that attended, by his peaceable deportment. He could call one of the centurions to him and he was ready to come at his call (v. 17); and he desired that he would introduce this young man to the chief captain, to give in an information. The centurion very readily gratified him, v. 18. He went himself to recommend his errand to the chief captain: "Paul the prisoner (this was his title now) called me to him, and prayed me to bring this young man to thee; he has something to say to thee." It is true charity to poor prisoners to act for them as well as to give to them. "I was sick

ALBERT BARNES:

"And bound themselves under a curse." The Greek is, "they anathematized themselves"; that is, they bound themselves by a solemn oath. They invoked a curse on themselves, or devoted themselves to destruction, if they did not do it. Lightfoot remarks, however, that they could be absolved from this vow by the Rabbins if they were unable to execute it. Under various pretenses, they could easily be freed from such oaths, and it was common to take them; and if there was any difficulty in fulfilling them, they could easily apply to their religious teachers and be absolved.

"That they would neither eat nor drink." That is, that they would do it as soon as possible. This was a common form of an oath, or curse, among the Jews. Sometimes they only vowed abstinence from particular things, as from meat or wine. But in this case, to make the oath more certain and binding, they vowed abstinence from all kinds of food and drink till they had killed him. Who these were—whether they were Sadducees or not—is not mentioned by the sacred writer. It is evident, however, that the minds of the Jews were greatly inflamed against Paul; and as they saw him in the custody of the Roman tribune, and as there was no prospect that he would punish him, they resolved to take the matter into their own hands. It is needless to remark that this was a most wicked oath. It was a deliberate purpose to commit murder; and it shows the desperate state of morals among the Jews at that time, and the infuriated malice of the people against the apostle that such an oath could have been taken.—Popular Commentary

12-14. bound themselves under a curse . . . that they would neither eat . . . till they had killed Paul—Cf. II Samuel 3:35; I Samuel 14:24.

15. Now . . . ye with the council signify to the chief captain . . . as though . . .—That these high ecclesiastics fell in readily with this infamous plot is clear. What will not unscrupulous and hypocritical religionists do under the mask of religion? The narrative bears unmistakable internal marks of truth. or ever he come near—Their plan was to assassinate him on his way down from the barracks to the council. The case was critical, but He who had pledged His word to him that he should testify for Him at Rome provided unexpected means of defeating this well-laid scheme.

16-22. Paul's sister's son—See on ch. 9:30. If he was at this time residing at Jerusalem for his education, like Paul himself, he may have got at the schools those hints of the conspiracy on which he so promptly acted.

Then Paul called one of the centurions—Though divinely assured of safety, he never allows this to interfere with the duty he owed to his own life and the work he had yet to do. (See on ch. 27:22-25, 31.)

12. That they would neither eat nor drink. These forty Jews were no doubt of the class of the sicarii mentioned before (similar to those afterwards called "assassins"), a class of fierce zealots, who took justice into their own hand, and who thought they had a right to dispatch all those who, according to their views, were not orthodox in their religious principles. If these were in their bad way conscientious men, must they not all perish through hunger, as God put it out of their power to accomplish their vow? No, for the doctrine of sacerdotal absolution was held among the Jews as among the Papists. Hence it is said, in Hieros. Avodah Zarah, fol. 40: "He that hath made a vow not to eat any thing, woe to him, if he eat; and woe to him, if he do not eat. If he eat, he sinneth against his vow; and if he do not eat, he sinneth against his life." What must such a man do in this case? Let him go to the wise men, and they will loose him from his vow, as it is written in Prov. xii. 18: "The tongue of the wise is health." When vows were so easily dispensed with, they might be readily multiplied.

15. And we, or ever he come near, are ready to kill him. We shall lie in weight and dispatch him before he can reach the chief captain. The plan was well and deeply laid, and nothing but an especial providence could have saved Paul.

16. Paul's sister's son. This is all we know of Paul's family.

and in prison, and you went on an errand for me," will pass as well in the account as, "I was sick and in prison, and you came unto me." Those that have acquaintance and interest should be ready to use them for the assistance of those that are in distress. This centurion helped to save Paul's life by this piece of civility. Those that cannot give a good gift to God's prisoners may yet speak a good word for them. The chief captain received the information with a great deal of tenderness, v. 19. He took the young man by the hand to encourage him, that he might not be put out of countenance, but might be assured of a favourable audience. The notice that is taken of this circumstance should encourage great men to make themselves easy of access. This familiarity to which this Roman tribune admitted Paul's nephew is here upon record to his honour. Let no man think he disparages himself by his humility or charity. He went with him aside privately and asked him, "What is it that thou hast to tell me?" The young man delivered his errand to the chief captain very readily (v. 20, 21): "The Jews have agreed to desire thee that thou wouldst bring down Paul tomorrow into the council; but do not thou yield unto them, for there lie in wait for him of them more than forty men, who have sworn to be the death of him, and now are they ready looking for a promise from thee." The captain dismissed the young man with a charge of secrecy: See that thou tell no man that thou hast shown these things unto me, v. 22. Those that cannot keep counsel are not fit to be employed in business.

III. How the plot was defeated: The chief captain, finding how restless they were in their designs to do him a mischief, and how near he was to become himself accessory to it, resolved to send him away with all speed out of their reach. He seemed afraid lest, if he should detain Paul in his castle here, they would find some way or other to compass their end. Whatever came of it, he would protect Paul, because he did not deserve such treatment. What a melancholy observation is it, that the Jewish chief priests, when they knew of this assassination-plot, should countenance it, while a Roman chief captain, purely from a natural sense of justice and humanity, sets himself to baffle it.

1. He orders a considerable detachment of the Roman forces under his command to go to Cæsarea with all expedition, and to bring Paul thither to Felix the governor. I see not but the chief captain might have set Paul at liberty, and given him leave to shift for his own safety. He himself owns that nothing was laid to his charge worthy of bonds (v. 29), and he ought to have had the same tenderness for his liberty that he had for his life; but he feared that this would have incensed the Jews too much against him. Two centurions are employed in this business, v. 23, 24. They must get ready two hundred soldiers to go to Cæsarea; and with these seventy horse, and two hundred spearmen besides. (1) The chief captain designed hereby to expose the Jews, as a headstrong tumultuous people, that needed to be awed by such a train as this. He thought less would not serve to defeat their attempt. (2) God designed hereby to encourage Paul. Yet Paul did not desire such a guard because he trusted in God's all-sufficiency; it was owing, however, to the governor's own care. But he was also made considerable; thus his bonds in Christ were made manifest all the country over (Phil. i. 13); and so great a preacher made so great a prisoner. When his enemies hate him, and I doubt his friends neglect him, then does a Roman tribune carefully provide, [1] For his ease: Let them provide beasts, that they set Paul on. Had his Jewish persecutors ordered his removal to Cæsarea, they would have made him run on foot, or dragged him thither in a cart. But the chief captain treats him like a gentleman, and orders him a good horse to ride upon. [2] For his security. They have a strict charge given them to bring him safely to Felix the governor, who was supreme in all civil affairs among the Jews, as this chief captain was in military affairs. The Roman historians speak much of this Felix, as a man of mean extraction, but that raised himself by his shifts to be governor of Judæa. To the judgment of such a man as this is poor Paul turned over; and yet better so than in the hands of Ananias the high priest!

2. The chief captain orders that he be taken away at the third hour of the night, three hours after sunset, that they might have the cool of the night to march in.

3. He writes a letter to Felix the governor of this province, by which he leaves the whole matter with Felix. This letter is here inserted verbatim, v. 25.

(1) The compliments he passes upon the governor, v. 26. He is the most excellent governor Felix, this title being given him of course. He sends him greeting.

be preserved, yet he knew that the divine providence acts by reasonable and prudent means; and that if he neglected to use the means in his power, he could not expect God's providence to work in his behalf. He who will not help himself, according to the means and power he possesses, has neither reason nor revelation to assure him that he shall receive any assistance from God.

F. B. MEYER:

Would-be murderers baffled. The Lord had told his servant that he was needed in Rome, but the conspirators said that he should not leave Jerusalem. There is only one conclusion when such a collision occurs—God's Word must stand, to the discomfiture of those who have sworn that they will neither eat nor drink till they have perpetrated their plan to the contrary.

These high ecclesiastics fell in with an infamous plot. What will not unscrupulous men do under cover of religion! It is a pleasing trait that the Roman officer took Paul's nephew by the hand and led him aside for a private audience. How proudly would the boy recount the whole story to his mother when he emerged from those grim walls. At nine o'clock that night there was a clattering of horses' hooves as 70 horsemen and 200 soldiers went through the stone-paved streets on their way to Caesarea. Already Paul had begun his journey to Rome. Often afterward, when it seemed as though his life would be forfeited, he must have rested on the Master's words, "So must thou bear witness also at Rome." What a lifebuoy that promise was! And if God had saved him from the mob at Jerusalem and given him the friendship of Lysias, what could God not do for him in the future!—Bible Commentary

23. Two hundred soldiers. "Infantry or foot soldiers." Horsemen threescore and ten. There was always a certain number of horse, or cavalry, attached to the foot. Spearmen. Persons who held a spear or javelin in their hand, from "taking or holding a thing in the right hand." The third hour of the night. About 9:00 p.m., for the greater secrecy, and to elude the cunning, active malice of the Jews.

24. Provide them beasts. One for Paul and some others for his immediate keepers. Felix the governor. This Felix was a freed man of the Emperor Claudius and brother of Pallas, chief favorite of the emperor. Tacitus calls him Antonius Felix, and gives us to understand that he governed with all the authority of a king and the baseness and insolence of a slave. Drusilla, the sister of Agrippa, was his wife at this time; see chap. xxiv. 22. He was an unrighteous governor; a base, mercenary, and bad man; see chap. xxiv. 2.

25. He wrote a letter after this manner. It appears that this was not only the substance of the letter, but the letter itself. The whole of it is so perfectly formal as to prove this, and in this simple manner are all the letters of the ancients formed. In this also we have an additional proof of Luke's accuracy.

of Paul's case: [1] He was one that the Jews had a pique against: They had taken him, and would have killed him; and perhaps Felix did not think much the worse of him for that, v. 27. [2] He had protected him because he was a Roman: "When they were about to kill him, I came with an army and rescued him"; which action for a citizen of Rome would recommend him to the Roman governor. [3] He could not understand the merits of his cause. He took the proper method to know: he brought him forth into their council (v. 28), to be examined there, but he found that he was accused of questions of their law (v. 29), about the hope of the resurrection of the dead, v. 6. The Romans allowed the nations they conquered the exercise of their own religion, and never offered to impose theirs upon them; yet, as conservators of the public peace, they would not suffer them, under colour of their religion, to abuse their neighbours. [4] Thus far he understood, that there was nothing laid to his charge worthy of death or of bonds.

(3) His referring Paul's case to Felix (v. 30): "When it was told me that the Jews laid wait for the man, to kill him, I sent straightway to thee, and let his accusers go after him, and say before thee what they have against him, for, being bred a soldier, I will never pretend to be a judge, and so farewell."

4. Paul was accordingly conducted to Cæsarea; the soldiers got him safely out of Jerusalem by night, and left the conspirators to consider whether they should eat and drink or no. If they would not repent of the wickedness of their oath they were now at leisure to repent to the rashness of it. If any of them did starve themselves to death, they fell unpitied. Paul was conducted to Antipatris, which was about the midway to Cæsarea, v. 31. Thence the two hundred foot-soldiers, and the two hundred spearmen returned to their quarters in the castle. There needed not so strong a guard, but the horsemen might serve to bring him to Cæsarea, and would do it with more expedition.

5. He was delivered into the hands of Felix, v. 33. The officers presented the letter, and Paul with it, to Felix. Paul had never affected acquaintance or society with great men, yet Providence overrules his sufferings so as by them to give him an opportunity of witnessing to Christ before great men. The governor enquired of what province the prisoner originally was, and was told that he was a native of Cilicia, v. 34. He promises him a speedy trial (v. 35): "I will hear thee when thine accusers have come." He ordered him into custody, that he should be kept a prisoner in Herod's judgment-hall.

30. I sent straightway to thee. As the proper person before whom this business should ultimately come, and by whom it should be decided. Farewell. "Be in good health."

31. Antipatris. This place was rebuilt by Herod the Great and denominated Antipatris in honor of his father, Antipater. It was situated between Joppa and Caesarea, on the road from Jerusalem to this latter city. The distance between Jerusalem and Caesarea was about seventy miles.

32. On the morrow they left the horsemen. Being now so far from Jerusalem, they considered Paul in a state of safety from the Jews and that the 70 horsemen would be a sufficient guard; 400 footmen therefore returned to Jerusalem, and the horsemen went on to Caesarea with Paul. We need not suppose that all this troop reached Antipatris on the same night in which they left Jerusalem; therefore, instead of "They brought him by night to Antipatris," we may understand the text thus—"Then the soldiers took Paul by night, and brought him to Antipatris." And the thirty-second verse need not to be understood as if the footmen reached the castle of Antonia the next day (though all this was possible) but that, having reached Antipatris and refreshed themselves, they set out the same day on their march to Jerusalem. On the morrow they . . . returned; that is, they began their march back again to the castle. See on chap. xxiv. 1.

33. Who. That is, the seventy horsemen mentioned above.

35. I will hear thee. "I will give you a fair, full, and attentive hearing when thine accusers are also come, in whose presence you shall be permitted to defend yourself. In Herod's judgment hall. "In Herod's praetorium," so called because it was built by Herod the Great. The praetorium was the place where the Roman praetor had his residence; and it is probable that in or near this place there was a sort of guard-room where state prisoners were kept. Paul was lodged here till his accusers should arrive.

CHAPTER 24

We must suppose that Lysias, the chief captain, gave notice to the chief priests that they must follow him to Cæsarea, and there they would find a judge ready to hear them.

I. We have here the cause followed against Paul. Here is no time lost, for they are ready for a hearing after five days. He says here (v. 11) that it was but twelve days since he came up to Jerusalem, and he had spent seven in his purifying in the temple. Those who had been his judges do themselves appear here as his prosecutors. Ananias himself the high priest, now stands to inform against him. One would wonder, That he should thus disparage himself, and forget the dignity of his place. That he should thus discover himself and his enmity against Paul! Ananias is not ashamed to own himself a sworn enemy to Paul. The elders attended him, to signify their concurrence with him. The pains that evil men take in an evil matter, and their unwearied industry, should shame us out of our coldness, and our indifference in that which is good.

II. We have here the cause pleaded against Paul. The prosecutors brought with them a certain orator named Tertullus, a Roman, and therefore fittest to be employed in a cause before the Roman governor, and most likely to gain favour. The high priest, and elders, though they had their own hearts spiteful enough, did not think their own tongues sharp enough. Paul is set to the bar before Felix the governor: He was called forth, v. 2. Tertullus's business is, on the behalf of the prosecutors, to open the information against him. His speech is made up of flattery and falsehood; it calls evil good, and good evil.

1. One of the worst of men is here applauded as one of the best of benefactors, only because he was the judge. Felix is represented by the historians of his own nation, as well as by Josephus the Jew, a certain orator—one of those Roman advocates who trained themselves for the higher practice of the metropolis by practicing in the provinces, where the Latin language, employed in the courts, was but imperfectly understood and Roman forms were not familiar. informed... against Paul—'laid information,' i.e., put in the charges.

1. After five days. These days are to be reckoned from the time in which Paul was apprehended at Jerusalem, and twelve days after he had arrived in that city; see v. 11. Calmet reckons the days thus: Luke says that Paul was apprehended at Jerusalem when the seven days of his vow were nearly ended, chap. xxi. 27; that is, at the end of the fifth day after his arrival. The next day, which was the sixth, he was presented before the Sanhedrin. The night following he was taken to Antipatris. The next day, the seventh, he arrived at Caesarea. Five days afterwards, that is, the twelfth day after his arrival at Jerusalem, the high priest and the elders, with Tertullus, came down to accuse him before Felix.

A certain orator named Tertullus. This was probably a Roman proselyte to Judaism, yet he speaks everywhere as a Jew. Roman orators, advocates, were found in different provinces of the Roman Empire and they, in general, spoke both the Greek and Latin languages; and being well acquainted with the Roman laws and customs, were no doubt very useful.

as a very bad man, who allowed himself in all manner of wickedness, was a great oppressor, very cruel, and very covetous. And yet Tertullus here, in the name of the high priest and elders, compliments him, and extols him to the sky, as if he were so good a magistrate as never was the like. To engage him to gratify their malice against Paul they magnify him as the greatest blessing to their church and nation that ever came among them.

(1) They are very ready to own it (v. 2): "By thee we enjoy great quietness and very worthy deeds are done to the whole nation of the Jews, by thy providence." To give him his due, he had been instrumental to suppress the insurrection of that Egyptian of whom the chief captain spoke (ch. xxi. 38). The unhappiness of great men is to have their services magnified beyond measure, and never to be faithfully told of their faults. Hereby they are hardened and encouraged in evil. The policy of bad men, by flattering princes in what they do amiss is to draw them in to do worse.

(2) They promise to retain a grateful sense of it (v. 3): "We accept it always, and in all places, most noble Felix, with all thankfulness." And, if it had been true that he was such a governor, it had been just that they should thus accept his good offices with all thankfulness. The benefits which we enjoy by government, especially by the administration of wise and good governors, are what we ought to be thankful for both to God and man.

(3) They therefore expect his favour in this cause, v. 4. They pretend a great care not to intrench upon his time: We will not be further tedious to thee; I pray thee that thou wouldest hear us of thy clemency a few words. They were so conscious to themselves that it would soon appear to have more malice than matter in it that they found it necessary thus to insinuate themselves into his favour. Everybody knew that the high priest and the elders hated Felix; and yet, to gain their ends against Paul, they show him all this respect. Princes cannot always judge of the affections of their people by their applauses; flattery is one thing, and true loyalty is another.

2. One of the best of men is here accused as one of the worst of malefactors. After a flourish of flattery he comes to his business. This part of his discourse is as nauseous for its raillery as the former part is for its flattery. As I cannot but be sorry that a man of wit and sense should have such a saleable tongue (as one calls it), so I cannot but be angry at those dignified men that put such words into his mouth. Two things Tertullus here complains of to Felix.

(1) The peace of the nation was disturbed by Paul. They could not have baited Christ's disciples if they had not first dressed them up in the skins of wild beasts. Innocence, nay excellence and usefulness, are no fence against calumny, no, nor against the impressions of calumny upon the minds both of magistrates and multitudes. Be the representation ever so unjust, when it is enforced, as here it was, with gravity, with assurance, something will stick. They do not say, "We suspect him to be a dangerous man," but, as if the thing were past dispute, "We have found him to be so", as if he were a traitor and rebel already convicted. Paul was a useful man, and a great blessing to his country, and yet he is here called a pestilent fellow (v. 5): "We have found him the plague of the nation, a walking pestilence." They would have it thought that he had done more mischief in his time than a plague could do,—that the mischief he did was spreading and infectious,—that it was of as fatal consequence as the plague is,—that it was as much to be dreaded and guarded against as a plague is. Paul was a peace-maker; he lived peaceably and quietly himself, and taught others to do so too, and yet is here represented as a mover of sedition among all the Jews throughout all the world. The Jews were disaffected to the Roman government. This Felix knew. Now they would fain make him believe that this Paul was the man that made them so. They moved sedition in all places where he came, and then cast the blame unjustly upon him. Paul was a man of catholic charity, who made himself the servant of all for their good; and yet he is here charged as being a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes. Now it was true that Paul was an active leading man in propagating Christianity. But, First, It was utterly false that this was a sect. True Christianity establishes that which is of common concern to all mankind, publishes goodwill to men, and therefore cannot be thought to take its rise from such narrow opinions as sects owe their origin to. True Christianity has a direct tendency to the uniting of the children of men, and, as far as it obtains its just influence upon the minds of men, will make them peaceable and loving, and therefore is far from being a sect. True Christianity aims at no worldly benefit

2-4. Seeing that by thee we enjoy great quietness . . .—In this fulsome flattery there was a semblance of truth: nothing more. Felix acted with a degree of vigor and success in suppressing lawless violence [JOSEPHUS, Antiquities xx. 8. 4; confirmed by TACITUS, Ann. xii. 54]. by thy providence—a phrase applied to the administration of the emperors.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

Let us carefully consider the indictment. What was the charge against Paul? They first of all described him as "a pestilent fellow." That in itself was a very serious charge. It was intended to be a declaration of the character of Paul, and was employed in order to prejudice his case in the minds of the Roman governor and the court. No word could have been used by Tertullus in the presence of Felix more calculated to suggest that Paul was a man of the very basest morals. The translation hardly carries the offensiveness of the description.

Introducing him thus as "a pestilent fellow," the charges were three: first, that he was "a mover of insurrections among all the Jews throughout all the world." The only ground there could have been for any such charge might have been that the account of the uproar in Ephesus, and at Philippi, had reached Jerusalem. The second charge and the real one, so far as the enmity of his enemies was concerned, was uttered when Tertullus said that he was "a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes." The third charge was of the nature of an illustration in proof of both these earlier charges, and was expressed in the words: "Who moreover assayed to profane the temple." Had this been true, then by such profanation Paul would have violated the Hebrew law, and run the risk of stirring up insurrection in Jerusalem itself. This general examination of the accusation shows that it consisted of a truth objectionably stated. This, then, was the charge preferred against Paul as he was arraigned before Felix.

—The Acts of the Apostles

5-8, a pestilent fellow—a plague, or pest—and a mover of sedition among all the Jews—by exciting disturbances among them—throughout the world—See on Luke 2:1. This was the first charge; and true only in the sense explained on ch. 16:20.

a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes—the second charge; and true enough.

ADAM CLARKE

2. Tertullus began to accuse him. There are three parts in this oration of Tertullus: (1) the exordium, (2) the proposition, (3) the conclusion. The exordium contains the praise of Felix and his administration, merely for the purpose of conciliating his esteem, vv. 2-4. The proposition is contained in v. 5. The narration and conclusion, in vv. 6-8. By thee we enjoy great quietness. As bad a governor as Felix most certainly was, he rendered some services to Judea. The country had long been infested with robbers; and a very formidable banditti of this kind, under one Eliezar, he entirely suppressed (Joseph., Antiq., l. xx, c. 6; Bell., l. ii, c. 22). He also suppressed the sedition raised by an Egyptian impostor who had seduced 30,000 men; see on chap. xxi. 38. He had also quelled a very afflictive disturbance which took place between the Syrians and the Jews of Caesarea. On this ground Tertullus said, "By you we enjoy great quietness, and illustrious deeds are done to this nation by your prudent administration." This was all true; but notwithstanding this, he is well-known from his own historians and from Josephus to have been not only a very bad man, but also a very bad governor. He was mercenary, oppressive, and cruel; and of all these the Jews brought proofs to Nero, before whom they accused him; and had it not been for the interest and influence of his brother Pallas, he had been certainly ruined.

3. We accept it always, and in all places. We have at all times a grateful sense of your beneficent administration, and we talk of it in all places, not only before your face, but behind your back.

4. Hear us of thy clemency. Give us this further proof of your kindness by hearkening to our present complaint. The whole of this exordium was artful enough, though it was lame. The orator had certainly a very bad cause, of which he endeavored to make the best. Felix was a bad man and bad governor, and yet he must praise him to conciliate his esteem. Paul was a very good man and nothing amiss could be proved against him, and yet he must endeavor to blacken him as much as possible in order to please his unprincipled and wicked employers. His oration has been blamed as weak, lame, and imperfect; and yet perhaps few with so bad a cause could have made better of it.

5. For we have found this man. Here the proposition of the orator commences. He accuses Paul, and his accusation includes four particulars: (1) He is a pest, an exceedingly bad and wicked man. (2) He excites disturbances and seditions against the Jews. (3) He is the chief of the sect of the Nazarenes, who are a very bad people and should not be tolerated. (4) He has endeavored to pollute and profane the Temple, and we took him in the fact. A pestilent fellow. The word loimos, pestis—the plague or pestilence—is used by both Greek and Roman authors to signify a very bad and profligate man; we have weakened the force of the word by translating the substantive adjectively. Tertullus did not say that Paul was a pestilent fellow, but he said that he was the very pestilence itself. A mover of sedition. Instead of sedition, some MSS. read "commotions," which is probably the true reading. Among all the Jews. Bishop Pearce contends that the words should be understood thus—"one that stirreth up tumults against all the Jews"; for if they be understood otherwise, Tertullus may be considered as accusing his countrymen as if they, at Paul's instigation, were forward to make insurrections everywhere. On the contrary, he wishes to represent them as a persecuted and distressed people by means of Paul and his Nazarenes. A ringleader. This is a military phrase, and signifies the "officer who stands on the right of the first rank"; the "captain of the front rank" of the sect of the Nazarenes; "of the heresy of the Nazarenes." This word is used six times by Luke; viz., in this verse, and in v. 14, and in chap. v. 17; xv. 5; xxvi. 5; and xxviii. 22. But in none of them does it appear necessarily to include that bad sense which we generally assign to the word "heresy." See the note on chap. v. 17, where the subject is largely considered; and see further on v. 14.

or advantage, and therefore must by no means be called a sect. Those that espouse a sect aim at wealth and honour; but the professors of Christianity expose themselves thereby to the loss of all that is dear to them in this world. Secondly, It is invidiously called the sect of the Nazarenes, by which Christ was represented as of Nazareth, whence no good thing was expected to arise; whereas he was of Bethlehem, where the Messiah was to be born. Thirdly, It was false that Paul was the author or standard-bearer of this sect; for he did not draw people to himself, but to Christ. Paul had a veneration for the temple, and had lately himself with reverence attended the temple-service; and yet it is here charged upon him that he went about to profane the temple, v. 6.

(2) The course of justice against Paul was obstructed by the chief captain. They pleaded that they took him, and would have judged him according to their law. This was false; they did not go about to judge him according to their law, but went about to beat him to death or to pull him to pieces, to throw him into the hands of ruffians that lay in wait to destroy him. It is easy for men, when they know what they should have done, to say, this they would have done, when they meant something else. They reflected upon the chief captain. The chief captain Lysias came upon us and with great violence took him out of our hands, v. 7. See how persecutors are enraged at their disappointments, which they ought to be thankful for. These cruel men justify themselves, and reckon him their enemy who kept them from shedding blood with their own hands. They referred the matter to Felix and his judgment, the chief captain having obliged them to it (v. 8): "He commanded his accusers to come to thee, that thou mightest hear the charge. He has left it to thee to examine him, and try what thou canst get out of him."

III. The assent of the Jews to this charge (v. 9): They confirmed it, saying that those things were so. Some think this expresses the proof of their charge by witnesses upon oath. It rather seems to intimate the approbation which the high priest and the elders gave to what Tertullus said. Those that have not the wit and parts to do mischief with that some others have, yet make themselves guilty of the mischiefs others do, by assenting to that which others do. Many that have not learning enough to plead for Baal yet have wickedness enough to vote for Baal.

We have here Paul's defence of himself, and there appears in it an accomplishment of Christ's promise to his followers that when they were before governors and kings, for his sake, it should be given them in that same hour what they should speak. Though Tertullus had said a great many provoking things, yet Paul did not interrupt him, but let him go on to the end of his speech. And when he had done he waited for a permission from the judge to speak in his turn, and had it. The governor beckoned to him to speak, v. 10. He made no reflections at all upon Tertullus, and levelled his defence against those that employed him.

I. He addressed himself very respectfully to the governor. Here are no such flattering compliments as Tertullus soothed him up with, but a profession that he answered for himself cheerfully before him, looking upon him as one that would be fair and impartial. It was likewise the language of one that was conscious to himself of his own integrity. He did not stand trembling at the bar; he was very cheerful when he had one to be his judge that was not a party, but an indifferent person. Nay, when he considers who his judge is, I the more cheerfully answer for myself, because I know thou hast been many years a judge to this nation; and this was very true. He could say of his own knowledge that there had not formerly been any complaints against Paul. He never had Paul brought before him till now; and therefore he was not so dangerous a criminal as he was represented to be. He was well acquainted with the Jewish nation. He knew what furious zealots they were against all that did not comply with them, and therefore would make allowances for that. Though he did not know him, he knew his prosecutors, and by this might guess what manner of man he was.

II. He denies the facts that he was charged with, upon which their character of him was grounded. Moving sedition, and profaning the temple, were the crimes for which he stood indicted, crimes which they knew the Roman governors were not accustomed to enquire into. But Paul desires that though he would not enquire into the crimes he would protect one that was unjustly charged with them. Now he would have him to understand.

hath gone about—attempted—to profane the temple—the third charge; and entirely false.

we . . . would have judged according to our law. But . . . Lysias came upon us, and with great violence took him out of our hands—a wilful falsehood and calumnious charge against a public officer. He had commanded the Sanhedrim to meet for no other purpose than to "judge him according to their law"; and only when, instead of doing so, they fell to disputing among themselves, and the prisoner was in danger of being "pulled in pieces of them" (ch. 23:10)—or as his own letter says "killed of them" (ch. 23:27)—did he rescue him, as was his duty, "by force" out of their hands. Commanding his accusers to come unto thee—Here they insinuate that, instead of troubling Felix with the case, he ought to have left it to be dealt with by the Jewish tribunal; in which case his life would soon have been taken. by examining whom—Lysias, as would seem (vs. 22)—thyself mayest . . .—referring all, as if with confidence, to Felix. the Jews assented . . .—See on ch. 23:15.

10. thou hast been many years a judge to this nation—He had been in this province for six or seven years, and in Galilee for a longer period. Paul uses no flattery, but simply expresses his satisfaction at having to plead before one whose long official experience of Jewish matters would enable him the better to understand and appreciate what he had to say.

ADAM CLARKE

6. Hath gone about to profane the temple. This was a heavy charge, if it could have been substantiated, because the Jews were permitted by the Romans to put any person to death who profaned their Temple. This charge was founded on the gross calumny mentioned in chap. xxi. 28-29; for as they had seen Trophimus, an Ephesian, with Paul in the city, they pretended that Paul had brought him into the Temple. Would have judged according to our law. He pretended that they would have tried the case fairly had not the chief captain taken him violently out of their hands; whereas, had not Lysias interfered, they would have murdered him on the spot.

7. With great violence. I rather think means "with an armed force." Tertullus intimates that Lysias interfered contrary to law and brought soldiers to support him in his infringement on their constitution. This is what he seems to say and complain of, for the Jews were vexed with Lysias for rescuing the apostle from their hands.

8-9. Commanding his accusers to come. Here Tertullus closes his opening and statement of the case, and now he proceeds to call and examine his witnesses; and they were no doubt examined one by one, though Luke sums the whole up in one word—The Jews also assented, saying that these things were so.

10. Then Paul . . . answered. The apostle's defense consists of two parts: (I) The exordium, which has for its object the praise of his judge, whose qualifications to discern and decide on a question of this nature he fully allows, and expects from this circumstance to have a favorable hearing. (II) The tractation, which consists of two parts: (a) Refutation: (1) of the charge of polluting the Temple, (2) of stirring up sedition, (3) of being a leader of any sect who had a different worship from the God of their fathers; (b) Affirmation: (1) that he had lived so as to preserve a good conscience towards God and towards men; (2) that so far from polluting the Temple, he had been purified in it, and was found thus worshipping according to the law of God; (3) that what Tertullus and his companions had witnessed was perfectly false; and he defied them to produce a single proof, and appealed to those who had been witnesses of his conduct in Jerusalem, who should have been there could they have proved anything against him. Thou hast been of many years a judge. Cumanus and Felix were, for a time, joint governors of Judea. But after the condemnation of Cumanus the government fell entirely into the hands of Felix; and from Josephus we learn that this was now the sixth or seventh year of his administration, which might be called many years when the very frequent removals of the governors of the provinces are considered. A judge—The same here in signification as the Hebrew shophet, which means a "ruler" or "governor." This was the title of the ancient governors of Israel. The more cheerfully. With a "better heart or courage" because, as your long residence among us has brought you to a thorough acquaintance with our customs, I may expect a proper decision in my favor, my cause being perfectly sound.

MATTHEW HENRY

1. That he came up to Jerusalem on purpose to worship God in peace and holiness. He came to keep up his communion with the Jews, not to put any affront upon them.

2. That it was but twelve days since he came up to Jerusalem, and he had been six days a prisoner; and it could not be supposed that in so short a time he could do the mischief they charged upon him.

3. That he had demeaned himself at Jerusalem very quietly and peaceably. If it had been true that he was a mover of sedition among all the Jews, surely he would have been industrious to make a party at Jerusalem: but he did not do so. He was in the temple, attending the public service there. He was in the synagogues where the law was read and opened. He went about in the city among his relations and friends. They could not charge him with offering anything either against the faith or against the peace of the Jewish church. (1) He had nothing in him of a contradicting spirit, as the movers of sedition have. They never found him disputing with any man. He was ready, if asked, to give a reason of his own hope, and to give instruction to others; but he never picked a quarrel with any man about his religion. (2) He had nothing in him of a turbulent spirit: "They never found me raising up the people." He behaved as became a Christian with love and quietness, and due subjection to lawful authority. Nor did he ever mention or think of such a thing as taking up arms for the propagating of the gospel.

4. That as to what they had charged him with, of moving sedition in other countries, he was wholly innocent, and they could not make good the charge (v. 13): Neither can they prove the things whereof they now accuse me. He maintains his own innocency. He was no enemy to the public peace. He bemoans his own calamity, that he was accused of those things which could not be proved against him. And it has often been the lot of very worthy good men to be thus injured, to have things laid to their charge which they abhor the thought of. He shows the iniquity of his prosecutors, who said that which they knew they could not prove, and thereby did him wrong, and did the judge wrong too, in imposing upon him. He appeals to the equity of his judge. The judge must give sentence according to that which is not only alleged but proved.

III. He gives a fair and just account of himself, which does intimate what was the true reason of their prosecuting him.

1. He acknowledged himself to be one whom they looked upon as a heretic. The chief captain had observed, and the governor now cannot but observe, an uncommon violence and fury in his prosecutors. Guessing at the crime by the cry, he must needs have been a very bad man. Now Paul here unriddles the matter: In the way which they call heresy—or a sect, so worship I the God of my fathers. It is no new thing for the right way of worshipping God to be called heresy. Let us therefore never be driven off from any good way by its being put into an ill name.

2. He vindicates himself from this imputation. They call Paul a heretic, but he is not so.

(1) He worships the God of his fathers, and therefore is right in the object of his worship. He worships the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the God who took them into covenant with himself. Paul adheres to that covenant, and sets up no other in opposition to it. I worship the same God that all my fathers worshipped. His religion gloried in its antiquity, and in an uninterrupted succession of its professors. It is very comfortable in our worshipping God to have an eye to him as the God of our fathers. He approved himself theirs, and therefore, if we serve him as they did, he will be ours.

(2) He believed all things which are written in the law and the prophets, and therefore is right in the rule of his worship. He received the scriptures entire, and he receives them pure. He sets not up any other rule of faith or practice but the scriptures. Divine revelation, as it is in the scripture, is that which he resolves to live and die by, and therefore he is not a heretic.

(3) He has his eye upon a future state, and therefore is right in the end of his worship. Those that turn aside to heresy have a regard to this world, but Paul aims to make heaven of his religion, and neither more nor less (v. 15): "I have hope towards God; my hope is towards God and not towards the world. I depend upon God and upon his power, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, of all, both the just and unjust." There shall be a resurrection of the dead, of all men from the beginning to the end of time. We have not only another life to live when our present life is at an end, but there is to be another world. It shall be a resurrection both of the just and of the unjust, of those that did well, and to them

11. thou mayest understand—canst easily learn—that there are yet but twelve days since I went up to Jerusalem—viz., 1. The day of his arrival in Jerusalem (ch. 21:15-17); 2. The interview with James (ch. 21:18-26); 3. The assumption of the vow (ch. 21:26); 4, 5, 6. Continuance of the vow, interrupted by the arrest (ch. 21: 27, etc); 7. Arrest of Paul (ch. 21:27); 8. Paul before the Sanhedrim (ch. 22:30; 23:1-10); 9. Conspiracy of the Jews and defeat of it (ch. 23:12-24), and despatch of Paul from Jerusalem on the evening of the same day (ch. 22:23, 31); 10, 11, 12, 13. The remaining period referred to (ch. 24:1) [MEYER]. This short period is mentioned to show how unlikely it was that he should have had time to do what was charged against him. for to worship—a very different purpose from that imputed to him.

12, 13. they neither found me . . . Neither can they prove the things . . .—After specifying several particulars, he challenges proof of any one of the charges brought against him. So much for the charge of sedition.

14, 15. But this I confess to thee—in which Felix would see no crime—that after the way they call heresy—literally, and better, 'a sect'—so worship I the God of my fathers—the ancestral God. Two arguments are contained here: (1) Our nation is divided into what they call sects—the sect of the Pharisees, and that of the Sadducees—all the difference between them and me is, that I belong to neither of these, but to another sect, or religious section of the nation, which from its Head they call Nazarenes: for this reason, and this alone, am I hated. (2) The Roman law allows every nation to worship its own deities; I claim protection under that law, worshipping the God of my ancestors, even as they, only of a different sect of the common religion.

believing all . . .—Here, disowning all opinions at variance with the Old Testament Scriptures, he challenges for the Gospel which he preached the authority of the God of their fathers. So much for the charge of heresy.

And have hope . . . as they themselves . . . allow, that there shall be a resurrection . . .—This appeal to the faith of his accusers shows that they were chiefly of the Pharisees, and that the favor of that party, to which he owed in some measure his safety at the recent council (ch. 23:6-9), had been quite momentary.

11. There are yet but twelve days. This is his reply to their charge of sedition, the improbability of which is shown from the short time he had spent in Jerusalem, quite insufficient to organize a sedition of any kind; nor could a single proof be furnished that he had attempted to seduce any man or unhinge any person from his allegiance by subtle disputations, in either the Temple, the synagogues, or the city. So that this charge necessarily fell to the ground self-confuted unless they could bring substantial proof against him, which he challenges them to do.

14. That after the way which they call heresy. See the explanation of this word in the note on chap. v. 17, and see before, v. 5, where what is here translated heresy is there rendered "sect." At this time the word had no bad acceptation in reference to religious opinions. The Pharisees themselves, the most respectable body among the Jews, are called a "sect"; for Paul, defending himself before Agrippa, says that he lived a Pharisee according to the strictest sect. And Josephus, who was a Pharisee, speaks of "the sect of the Pharisees," Life, chap. xxxviii. Therefore it is evident that the word heresy had no bad meaning among the Jews; it meant simply a "religious sect." Why then did they use it by way of degradation to Paul? This seems to have been the cause. They had already two accredited sects in the land, the Pharisees and Sadducees. The interests of each of these were pretty well balanced, and each had a part in the government, for the council, or Sanhedrin, was composed of both Sadducees and Pharisees; see chap. xxiii. 6. They were afraid that the Christians, whom they called Nazarenes, should form a new sect and divide the interests of both the preceding; and what they feared, that they charged them with. On this account the Christians had both the Pharisees and the Sadducees for their enemies. So worship, I the God of my fathers. I bring in no new object of worship, no new religious creed. I believe all things as they profess to believe; I acknowledge the law and the prophets as divinely inspired books, and have never in the smallest measure detracted from the authority or authenticity of either.

15. And have hope toward God. I not only do not hold anything by which the general creed of this people might be altered, in reference to the present state, but also I hold nothing different from their belief in reference to a future state; for if I maintain the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, it is what themselves allow.

our Saviour has told us that it will be a resurrection of life; and of those that did evil, he has said to them it will be a resurrection of condemnation. This implies that it will be a resurrection to a final judgment. The just shall rise by virtue of their union with Christ as their head; the unjust shall rise by virtue of Christ's dominion over them as their Judge. God is to be depended upon for the resurrection of the dead: I have hope towards God that there shall be a resurrection; it shall be effected by the almighty power of God. The resurrection of the dead is a fundamental article of our creed, as it was also of that of the Jewish church. It is what they themselves also allow, but it is more clearly revealed by the gospel. In all our religion we ought to serve God with a confidence in him that there will be a resurrection of the dead, expecting our recompence in that.

(4) His conversation is of a piece with his devotion (v. 16): And herein do I exercise myself, to have always a conscience void of offence towards God and towards men. This protestation of Paul's is to the same purport with that which he made before the high priest (ch. xxiii. 1): I have lived in all good conscience. [1] What was Paul's aim and desire: To have a conscience void of offence. Either, First, "A conscience not offending; not informing me wrong, nor in anything misleading me." Or, Secondly, A conscience, not offended. "This is what I am ambitious of, to keep upon good terms with my own conscience. I am as careful not to offend my conscience as I am not to offend a friend with whom I daily converse." [2] What was his care and endeavour, in pursuance of this: "I exercise myself. I make it my constant business" (those that did so were called ascetics, from the word here used), "that I may keep peace with my own conscience." [3] The extent of this care: First, To all times: To have always a conscience void of offence. Paul was conscious to himself that he had not yet attained perfection, and the evil that he would not do yet he did. Sins of infirmity are uneasy to conscience, but they do not wound it as presumptuous sins do; and, though offence may be given to conscience, yet care must be taken that it be not an abiding offence. This however we must always exercise ourselves in. Secondly, To all things: Both towards God, and towards man. His conscientious care extended itself to the whole of his duty, and he was afraid of breaking the law of love either to God or his neighbour. We must be very cautious that we do not think, or speak, or do anything amiss, either against God or man. [4] The inducement to it: Herein, for this cause; so it may be read. "Because I look for the resurrection of the dead and the life of the world to come, therefore I thus exercise myself."

IV. Having made confession of his faith, he gives a plain account of his case, and of the wrong done him by his persecutors. He challenges them to prove him guilty.

1. In the temple. Here they fell furiously upon him as an enemy to their nation and the temple, ch. xxi. 28. (1) It was very hard to accuse him as an enemy to their nation, when he came to bring alms to his nation, for the relief of the poor at Jerusalem. He had no malice to that people and was ready to do them all good offices. (2) It was very hard to accuse him of having profaned the temple when he brought offerings and was himself at charges therein (ch. xxi. 24), and was found purifying himself in the temple, according to the law (v. 18), neither with multitude nor with tumult. They were Jews from Asia, his enemies; they had no pretence to make a tumult and raise a multitude against him, for he had neither for him. He challenges them to prove it (v. 19): "Those Jews of Asia ought to have been here before thee, that they might have been examined, whether they had aught against me."

2. In the council. "Let these same that are here say whether they have found any evil doing in me when I stood before the council (v. 20). When I was there all I said was, Touching the resurrection of the dead I am called in question by you this day (v. 21), which gave no offence to anyone but the Sadducees. I stuck to that which is the faith of the whole Jewish church, excepting those whom they themselves call heretics."

Verses 22–27

I. Felix adjourned the cause (v. 22): He had a more perfect knowledge of that way than the high priest and the elders thought he had. He had got a notion of Christianity, that it was not such an evil thing as it was represented. Therefore he put off the prosecutors with an excuse: "When the chief captain shall come down I will know the uttermost of your matter, I shall know the truth. Either Paul deserves to be punished for raising the tumult, or you do for doing

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

He dismissed the Hebrew description of his religion with a touch of satire. They had spoken of it as a sect; but he said: "I confess unto thee, that after the Way which they call a sect, so serve I the God of our fathers." Everything he subsequently said on that matter was in denial of their statements. His claim was that his religion was their religion; carried to its ultimate conclusion. In effect he claimed that they had profaned their own religion, and violated its intention by stopping short at a point when they should have gone on. He claimed that his religion was according to Hebrew religion: "So serve I the God of our fathers." He argued that this Way was "according to the law," and in harmony with that which was "written in the prophets." He declared that it was according to the spiritual hope of resurrection, which was at the heart of the Hebrew religion. Finally he maintained that it was his religion according to personal conviction.—The Acts of the Apostles

16. And herein—On this account, accordingly; i.e., looking forward to that awful day (cf. II Cor. 5:10). I exercise myself—The "I" here is emphatic; 'Whatever they do, this is my study.' to have always a conscience void of offence . . .—See ch. 23:1; II Corinthians 1:12; 2:17, etc.; i.e., 'These are the great principles of my life and conduct—how different from turbulence and sectarianism!'

17. Now after many—several—years—absence from Jerusalem—I came to bring alms to my nation—referring to the collection from the churches of Macedonia and Greece, which he had taken such pains to gather. This only allusion in the Acts to what is dwelt upon so frequently in his own Epistles (Rom. 15:25, 26; I Cor. 16:1-4; II Cor. 8:1-4), throws a beautiful light on the truth of this History. (See PALEY'S Horæ Paulinæ.) and offerings—connected with his Jewish vow: see next verse. 18-21. found me purified in the temple—not polluting it, therefore, by my own presence, and neither gathering a crowd nor raising a stir: If then these Asiatic Jews have any charge to bring against me in justification of their arrest of me, why are they not here to substantiate it? Or else let these . . . here say—'Or, passing from all that preceded my trial, let those of the Sanhedrim here present say if I was guilty of aught there.' No doubt his hasty speech to the high priest might occur to them, but the provocation to it on his own part was more than they would be willing to recall. Except . . . this one voice . . . Touching the resurrection . . .—This would recall to the Pharisees present their own inconsistency, in befriending him then and now accusing him.

22, 23. having more perfect knowledge of that—'the'—way—See on ch. 19:23; and on vs. 10. When Lysias . . . shall come . . . I will know . . .—Felix might have dismissed the case as a tissue of unsupported charges. But if from his interest in the matter he really wished to have the presence of Lysias and others involved, a brief delay was not unworthy of him as a judge. Certainly, so far as recorded, neither Lysias nor any other parties

16. And herein do I exercise myself. And this very tenet is a pledge for by good behavior; for as I believe there will be a resurrection, "both of the just and unjust," and that every man shall be judged for the deeds done in the body, so I exercise myself day and night that I may have a conscience void of offence toward God, and toward men. Toward God. In entertaining no opinion contrary to His truth and in offering no worship contrary to His dignity, purity, and excellence. Toward men. In doing nothing to them that I would not, on a change of circumstances, they would do to me, and in withholding nothing by which I might comfort and serve them.

17. Now after many years. And as a full proof that I act according to the dictates of this divine and beneficent creed, far from coming to disturb the peace of society or to injure any person, I have brought alms to my nation, the fruits of my own earning and influence among a foreign people, and offerings to my God and His temple, proving hereby my attachment to my country and my reverence for the worship of my country's God.

18. Found me purified in the temple. And the Jews of Asia, who stirred up the persecution against me in Jerusalem, found me purified in the Temple, regularly performing the religious vow into which I had entered, giving no cause for suspicion; for I made no tumult, nor had I any number of people with me by whom I could have accomplished any seditious purpose.

20. Any evil doing in me, while I stood before the council. The Jews of Asia, the most competent witnesses, though my declared enemies, and they who stirred up the persecution against me, should have been here. Why are they kept back? Because they could prove nothing against me. Let these therefore who are here depose, if they have found any evil in me or proved against me by my most virulent adversaries when examined before them in their council at Jerusalem.

21. Except it be for this one voice. The Sadducees who belong to that council, and who deny the resurrection of the dead, may indeed blame me for professing my faith in this doctrine. But as this is a doctrine credited by the nation in general, and as there can be nothing criminal in such a belief, and they can bring no accusation against me relative to anything else, this of course is the sum of all the charges to which I am called to answer before you this day.

22. And when Felix heard these things. There is considerable difficulty in this verse. Translators greatly vary concerning the sense, and the MSS. themselves read variously. Wakefield's translation appears to be as proper as most: "Now Felix, upon hearing these things, put them off by saying, When Lysias the captain is come down, after I have gained a more exact knowledge of this doctrine, I will inquire fully into your business."

it yourselves. I will hear what he says, and determine accordingly between you." It was a disappointment to the high priest and the elders that Paul was not condemned, or remitted to their judgment. But thus sometimes God restrains the wrath of his people's enemies by the agency, not of their friends, but of such as are strangers to them. It was an injury to Paul that he was not released. But he was a judge that neither feared God nor regarded man, and what good could be expected from him?

II. He detained the prisoner in custody. Felix thought a man of such a public character as Paul was had many friends, and he might have an opportunity of obliging them, or making a hand of them. He continued him a prisoner, commanded a centurion to keep him, v. 23. Yet he took care he should be a prisoner at large, his keeper must let him have liberty, make his confinement as easy to him as possible. The high priest and the elders grudged him his life, but Felix generously allowed him a sort of liberty. He also gave orders that none of his friends should be hindered from coming to him; and a man's prison is as it were his own house if he has but his friends about him.

III. He had frequent conversation with him afterwards in private, v. 24, 25.

1. With what design Felix sent for Paul. He had a mind to have some talk with him concerning the faith in Christ. Felix had a mind to talk with Paul more freely than he could in open court concerning the faith of Christ; and this only to satisfy his curiosity, or rather the curiosity of his wife Drusilla, who was a Jewess, daughter of Herod Agrippa. Being educated in the Jewish religion, she was more inquisitive concerning the Christian religion. But it was no great matter what religion she was of; for, whatever it was, she was a reproach and scandal to it—a Jewess, but an adulteress; and was noted for an impudent woman. Many are fond of new notions and speculations in religion who yet hate to come under the power and influence of religion.

2. What the account was which Paul gave him of the Christian religion. He expected to be amused with a mystical divinity, but he is alarmed with a practical divinity. Paul, being asked concerning the Christ, reasoned concerning righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come. He discoursed with clearness and warmth of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come. Faith in Christ is designed to enforce upon the children of men the great laws of justice and temperance. Justice and temperance were celebrated virtues among the heathen moralists; if the doctrine Paul preaches will but free him from an obligation to these, he will readily embrace it. "It is so far from doing so that it strengthens the obligations of those sacred laws." Paul reasoned of righteousness and temperance, to convince Felix of his unrighteousness and intemperance, that, seeing the odiousness of them, he might enquire concerning the faith of Christ, with a resolution to embrace it. By the doctrine of Christ is discovered to us the judgment to come. Men have their day now, Felix hath his; but God's day is coming. From this account of the heads of Paul's discourse we may gather, [1] Paul in his preaching had no respect to persons, for the word of God has not. [2] Paul in his preaching aimed at the consciences of men and led them to a sight of their sins. [3] Paul preferred the serving of Christ, and the saving of souls, before his own safety. [4] Paul was willing to run hazards, in his work, even where there was little probability of doing good. Felix and Drusilla were such hardened sinners that it was not at all likely they should be brought to repentance by Paul's preaching, and yet Paul deals with them as one that did not despair of them. Let the watchman give fair warning, and then they have delivered their own souls, though they should not prevail to deliver the souls they watch for.

3. What impressions Paul's discourse made upon this great but wicked man: Felix trembled, being put into a fright. Paul never trembled before him, but he was made to tremble before Paul. We do not find that Drusilla trembled, though she was equally guilty. See here, The power of the word of God. It is searching, it is startling, it can strike a terror into the heart of the most proud and daring sinner. The workings of natural conscience; when it is startled and awakened, it fills the soul with horror and amazement. A prospect of the judgment to come is enough to make the stoutest heart to tremble.

4. How Felix struggled to get clear of these impressions. He did by them as he did by Paul's prosecutors (v. 25), he deferred them; he said, Go thy way for this time, when I have a convenient season I will call for thee. He trembled and that was all. Many are startled by the word of God who are not effectually changed by it. Many are in fear of the appeared again in the case. Verse 23, however, seems to show that at that time his prepossessions in favor of Paul were strong.

24, 25. Felix . . . with his wife Drusilla . . . a Jewess—This beautiful but infamous woman was the third daughter of Herod Agrippa I, who was eaten of worms (see on ch. 12: 1), and a sister of Agrippa II, before whom Paul pleaded, ch. 26. She was "given in marriage to Azizus, king of the Emesenes, who had consented to be circumcised for the sake of the alliance. But this marriage was soon dissolved, after this manner: When Festus was procurator of Judea, he saw her, and being captivated with her beauty, persuaded her to desert her husband, transgress the laws of her country, and marry himself" [JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, xx. 7. 1. 2]. Such was this "wife" of Felix. he sent for Paul and heard him concerning the faith in Christ—Perceiving from what he had heard on the trial that the new sect which was creating such a stir was represented by its own advocates as but a particular development of the Jewish faith, he probably wished to gratify the curiosity of his Jewish wife, as well as his own, by a more particular account of it from this distinguished champion. And no doubt Paul would so far humor this desire as to present to them the great leading features of the Gospel. But from vs. 25 it is evident that his discourse took an entirely practical turn, suited to the life which his two auditors were notoriously leading. And as he reasoned of righteousness—with reference to the public character of Felix—temperance—with reference to his immoral life—and judgment to come—when he would be called to an awful account for both-

-Felix trembled—and no wonder. For, on the testimony of TACITUS, the Roman Annalist (vs. 9; xii. 54), he ruled with a mixture of cruelty, lust, and servility, and relying on the influence of his brother Pallas at court, he thought himself at liberty to commit every sort of crime with impunity. How noble the fidelity and courage which dared to treat of such topics in such a presence, and what withering power must have been in those appeals which made even a Felix to tremble! Go thy way for this time; and when I have a convenient season I will call for thee—Alas for Felix! This was his golden opportunity, but—like multitudes still—he missed it. Convenient seasons in abundance he found to call for Paul, but never again to "hear him concerning the faith in Christ," and writhe under the terrors of the wrath to come. Even in those moments of terror he had

23. He commanded a centurion to keep Paul. He gave him into the custody of a captain, by whom he was most likely to be well used. And to let him have liberty; he freed him from the chains with which he was bound to the soldiers, his keepers. And that he should forbid none of his acquaintance, of his "own people," his fellow apostles, and the Christians in general, to minister or come unto him; to furnish him with any of the conveniences and comforts of life, and visit him as often as they pleased. This was an ample proof that Felix found no evil in him; and he would certainly have dismissed him but for two reasons: (1) He wanted to please the Jews, who, he knew, could depose grievous things against his administration. (2) He hoped to get money from the apostle or his friends as the purchase of his liberty.

24. His wife Drusilla. Felix was thrice married. Two of his wives were named Drusilla; one was a Roman, the niece or granddaughter of Antony and Cleopatra, mentioned by Tacitus, l. v, c. 9. The other, the person in the text, was a Jewess, daughter of Herod Agrippa the Great. When she was but six years of age she was affianced to Epiphanes, son of Antiochus, king of Comagene, who had promised to embrace Judaism on her account. But as he did not keep his word, her brother Agrippa (mentioned in chap. xxv. 13) refused to ratify the marriage. About the year of our Lord 53 he married her to Azizus, king of the Emesenes, who received her on condition of being circumcised. Felix, having seen her, fell desperately in love with her and by means of a pretended Jewish magician, a native of Cyprus, persuaded her to leave her husband, on which Felix took her to wife. She appears on the whole to have been a person of indifferent character, though one of the finest women of that age. It is said that she and a son she had by Felix were consumed in an eruption of Mount Vesuvius. See Josephus, Antiq., l. xx, c. 7. Heard him concerning the faith in Christ. For the purpose mentioned in the note on v. 21, that he might be the more accurately instructed in the doctrines and views of the Christians.

25. As he reasoned of righteousness. The principles and requisitions of justice and right between God and man, and between man and his fellows in all relations and connections of life. Temperance. "Chastity; self-government or moderation" with regard to a man's appetites, passions, and propensities of all kinds. And judgment to come. The day of retribution in which the unjust, intemperate, and incontinent must give account of all the deeds done in the body.

This discourse of Paul was most solemnly and pointedly adapted to the state of the person to whom it was addressed. Felix was tyrannous and oppressive in his government; lived under the power of avarice and unbridled appetites; and his incontinence, intemperance, and injustice appear fully in depriving the king of Emesa of his wife and in his conduct towards Paul and the motives by which that conduct was regulated. Go thy way for this time. His conscience had received as much terror and alarm as it was capable of bearing; and probably he wished to hide, by privacy, the confusion and dismay which by this time were fully evident in his countenance.

consequences of sin, and yet continue in love and league with sin. He did not fight against his convictions. He artfully shifted off his convictions by putting off the prosecution of them to another time. Like a sorry debtor, he begs a day; Paul has spent himself, and has tired him and his lady, and therefore, "Go thy way for this time, when I have a convenient season I will call for thee." Many lose all the benefit of their convictions for want of striking while the iron is hot. By dropping his convictions now, he lost them for ever, and himself with them. In the affairs of our souls, delays are dangerous. The matter is adjourned to some more convenient season, and then convictions cool and wear off. Felix put off this matter to a more convenient season, but we do not find that this more convenient season ever came. The present season is, without doubt, the most convenient season.

IV. He detained him a prisoner, and left him so, when two years after he was removed from the government, v. 26, 27. He was convinced in his conscience that Paul had done nothing worthy of death or of bonds, and yet had not the honesty to release him. Here we are told what principles he was governed by herein. 1. The love of money. He would not release Paul because he hoped that at length his friends would make a purse to purchase his liberty. He cannot find in his heart to do his duty as a judge, unless he can get money by it: He hoped that money would have been given him of Paul. In hopes of this, he detains him a prisoner, and sends for him the oftener, and communes with him. He sends for him to feel his pulse, and gives him an opportunity to ask what he would take to release him. And now we see what became of his promise both to Paul and to himself, that he would hear more of Christ at some other convenient season. All his business now is to get money by Paul. Paul was but a poor man, but Felix knew there were those who wished well to him who were able to assist him. Though Paul is to be commended that he would not offer money to Felix, yet I know not whether his friends are to be commended in not doing it for him. I ought not to bribe a man to do an unjust thing, but, if he will not do me justice without a fee, it is but doing myself justice to give it to him; and, if they might do it, it was a shame they did not do it. The Christians here at Cæsarea had parted with their tears to prevent his going to the prison (ch. xxi. 13), and could they not find in their hearts to part with their money to help him out? However, this will not excuse Felix. The judge that will not do right without a bribe will no doubt do wrong for a bribe. 2. Men-pleasing. Felix was recalled from his government about two years after this, and Porcius Festus was put in his place. He left Paul bound, and the reason here given is because he was willing to do the Jews a pleasure. He would continue him a prisoner rather than offend them; and he did it in hope thereby to atone for the many offences he had done against them. Thus those who do some base things are tempted to do more to screen themselves. But, when he had done it, it seems he did not gain his point. The Jews, notwithstanding this, accused him to the emperor. Those that aim to please God by doing good will have what they aim at; but so will not those that seek to please men by doing evil.

no thought of submission to the Cross or a change of life. The Word discerned the thoughts and intents of his heart, but that heart even then clung to its idols; even as Herod, who "did many things and heard John gladly," but in his best moments was enslaved to his lusts. How many Felixes have appeared from age to age!

26. He hoped . . . that money should have been given him . . . wherefore he sent for him the oftener, and communed with him—Bribery in a judge was punishable by the Roman law, but the spirit of a slave (to use the words of TACITUS) was in all his acts, and his "communing with Paul"—as if he cared for either him or his message—simply added hypocrisy to meanness. The position in life of Paul's Christian visitors might beget the hope of extracting something from them for the release of their champion; but the apostle would rather lie in prison than stoop to this!

27. after two years—What a trial to this burning missionary of Christ, to suffer such a tedious period of inaction! How mysterious it would seem! But this repose would be medicine to his spirit; he would not, and could not, be entirely inactive, so long as he was able by pen and message to communicate with the churches; and he would doubtless learn the salutary truth that even he was not essential to his Master's cause. That Luke wrote his Gospel during this period, under the apostle's superintendence, is the not unlikely conjecture of able critics. Porcius Festus—Little is known of him. He died a few years after this [JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, xx. 8. 9, to 9. 1]. came into Felix' room—He was recalled, on accusations against him by the Jews of Cæsarea, and only acquitted through the intercession of his brother at court [JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, xx. 8, 10]. Felix, willing to show the Jews a pleasure—'to earn the thanks of the Jews,' which he did not. left Paul bound (ch. 26:29)—which does not seem to have been till then.

ADAM CLARKE

A. T. ROBERTSON:

26. "He hoped withal" (hama kai elpizon). "At the same time also hoping." Paul had mentioned the "alms" (24:17) and that excited the avarice of Felix for "money" (chremata). Roman law demanded exile and confiscation for a magistrate who accepted bribes, but it was lax in the provinces. Felix had doubtless received them before. Josephus (Ant. XX. 8, 9) represents Felix as greedy for money. "The oftener" (puknoteron). Comparative adverb of puknos, old word, in N.T. only here and Luke 5:33 and 1 Tim. 5:23. Paul kept on not offering a bribe, but Felix continued to have hopes (present tense elpizon), kept on sending for him (present tense metapempomenos), and kept on communing. But he was doomed to disappointment. He was never terrified again.
—Word Pictures in the New Testament

26. He hoped also that money should have been given him. Bishop Pearce asks, "How could St. Luke know this?" To which I answer: From the report of Paul, with whom Felix had frequent conferences and to whom he undoubtedly expressed this wish.

27. After two years. That is, from the time that Paul came prisoner to Caesarea.

Verses 1–12

We commonly say, "New lords, new laws, new customs"; but here was a new governor, and yet Paul had the same treatment from him. Festus, like Felix, does not release him.

I. The pressing application which the high priest and other Jews used with the governor to abandon Paul. See how speedy they were in their applications to Festus. As soon as ever he had come into the province, within three days he went up to Jerusalem. The priests were upon him to proceed against Paul. He stayed three days at Cæsarea, where Paul was a prisoner. As soon as ever he comes up to Jerusalem the priests are in all haste with him against Paul. See how spiteful they were in their application. They informed the governor against Paul (v. 2) before he was brought upon a fair trial, that so they might make him a party who was to be the judge. But this artifice, though base enough, they could not confide in. They form another project much more base, and that is to assassinate Paul before he came upon his trial. See how specious the pretence was. Now that the governor was himself at Jerusalem they desired he would send for Paul thither, and try him there. He was charged with having profaned the Vss. 1-2. FESTUS, COMING TO JERUSALEM, DECLINES TO HAVE PAUL BROUGHT THITHER FOR JUDGMENT, BUT GIVES THE PARTIES A HEARING ON HIS RETURN TO CÆSAREA—ON FESTUS ASKING THE APOSTLE IF HE WOULD GO TO JERUSALEM FOR ANOTHER HEARING BEFORE HIM, HE IS CONSTRAINED IN JUSTICE TO HIS CAUSE TO APPEAL TO THE EMPEROR. 1-3. Festus . . . after three days . . . ascended . . . to Jerusalem—to make himself acquainted with the great central city of his government without delay. Then the high priest—a successor of him before whom Paul had appeared (ch. 23:2). and the chief of the Jews—and "the whole multitude of the Jews" (vs. 24) clamorously—informed him against Paul . . .

CHAPTER 25

1. Now when Festus was come into the province. By the province is meant Judea; for after the death of Herod Agrippa, Claudius thought it imprudent to trust the government in the hands of his son Agrippa, who was then but seventeen years of age; therefore Cuspius Fadus was sent to be procurator. And when afterwards Claudius had given to Agrippa the tetrarchate of Philip, that of Batanea and Abila, he nevertheless kept the province of Judea more immediately in his own hands, and governed it by procurators sent from Rome (Joseph., Ant., l. xx, c. 7, s. 1). Felix being removed, Porcius Festus is sent in his place; and having come to Caesarea, where the Roman governor generally had his residence, after he had tarried three days he went up to Jerusalem to acquaint himself with the nature and complexion of the ecclesiastical government of the Jews; no doubt, for the purpose of the better administration of justice among them.

2. The high priest . . . informed him against Paul. They supposed that as Felix, to please them, on the resignation of his government had temple at Jerusalem, and it is usual for criminals to be tried in the court where the fact was committed; but that which they designed was to way-lay him and to murder him upon the road. They desired favour against Paul. The business of prosecutors is to demand justice against one that they suppose to be a criminal. To desire favour against a prisoner, and from the judge, too, who ought to be of counsel for them, is a very impudent thing. The favour ought to be for the prisoner, but here they desire it against him.

II. The governor's resolution that Paul shall take his trial at Cæsarea, v. 4, 5. He gave orders that Paul should be kept at Cæsarea. Whatever was his reason for refusing it, God made use of it as a means of preserving Paul out of the hands of his enemies. God does not bring it to light, yet he finds another way to bring it to nought, by inclining the heart of the governor, not to remove Paul to Jerusalem. God is not tied to one method, in working out salvation for his people. Yet he will do them the justice to hear what they have to say against Paul, if they will go down to Cæsarea: "Let those among you who are able go down with me, and accuse this man. Let them go and give in their evidence." Festus will not take it for granted that there is wickedness in him, till it is proved upon him. If he be guilty, it lies upon them to prove him so.

III. Paul's trial before Festus. Festus stayed at Jerusalem about ten days, and then went down to Cæsarea. Since they are so eager in the prosecution, he is willing this cause should be first called; he will despatch it the next day. 1. The court set, and the prisoner called to the bar. Festus sat in the judgment-seat, and he commanded Paul to be brought, v. 6. 2. The prosecutors exhibiting their charges against the prisoner (v. 7): The Jews stood round about, which intimates that they were many. They stood round about, if possible, to frighten the judge into a compliance with their malicious design, or, at least, to frighten the prisoner; but in vain: he had too just and strong an assurance to be frightened by them. When they stood round about him, they brought many and grievous accusations against Paul, so it should be read. They represented him to the court as black and odious as their wit and malice could contrive; but when they came to the evidence, there they failed: they could not prove what they alleged against him, for it was all false. It is no new thing for the most excellent ones of the earth to have all manner of evil said against them falsely, even before the judgment-seat. 3. The prisoner's insisting upon his own vindication, v. 8. He insisted upon his general plea, Not guilty: Neither against the law of the Jews, nor against the temple, nor yet against Cæsar, have I offended anything at all. He had not violated the law of the Jews. He established the law. Preaching Christ, the end of the law, was no offence against the law. He had not profaned the temple. He had not offended against Cæsar, nor his government. By this it appears that they had charged him with some instances of disaffection to the present higher powers, which obliged him to purge himself as to that matter.

IV. Paul's appeal to the emperor. This gave the cause a new turn. God puts it into his heart to do it, for the bringing about of that which he had said to him, that he must bear witness to Christ at Rome.

1. The proposal which Festus made to Paul to go and take his trial at Jerusalem, v. 9. Festus was willing to do the Jews a pleasure, inclined to gratify the prosecutors rather than the prisoner, and asked him whether he would be willing to go up to Jerusalem and clear himself there. He would not offer to turn him over to the high priest and the sanhedrim, but, Wilt thou go thither, and be judged of these things before me? The president might have ordered him thither, but he would not do it without his own consent.

2. Paul's refusal to consent to it, and his reasons for it. (1) As a citizen of Rome, it was most proper for him to be tried in that which was properly his court, which sat at Cæsarea: I stand at Cæsar's judgment-seat, where I ought to be judged. The court being held in Cæsar's name, and by his authority and commission, before one that was delegated by him, it might well be said to be his judgment seat. Paul's owning that he ought to be judged at Cæsar's judgment seat plainly proves that Christ's ministers are not exempted from the jurisdiction of the civil powers, and, if they be guilty, of a real crime, to submit to their censure; if innocent, yet to submit to their enquiry. (2) As a member of the Jewish nation, he had done nothing to make himself obnoxious to them: To the Jews have I done no wrong, as thou very well knowest. It very well becomes those that are innocent to plead their innocency, and to desired favour—in vs. 15, "judgment"—against him—It would seem that they had the insolence to ask him to have the prisoner executed even without a trial (vs. 16). laying wait . . . to kill him—How deep must have been their hostility, when two years after the defeat of their former attempt, they thirst as keenly as ever for his blood! Their plea for having the case tried at Jerusalem, where the alleged offense took place, was plausible enough; but from vs. 10 it would seem that Festus had been made acquainted with their causeless malice, and that in some way which Paul was privy to. 4-6. answered that Paul should be kept—rather, 'is in custody'—at Cæsarea, and . . . himself would depart shortly thither. Let them . . . which among you are able, go down—'your leading men.'

7. the Jews . . . from Jerusalem—clamorously, as at Jerusalem; see vs. 24. many and grievous complaints against Paul—From his reply, and Festus' statement of the case before Agrippa, these charges seem to have been a jumble of political and religious matter which they were unable to substantiate, and vociferous cries that he was unfit to live. Paul's reply, not given in full, was probably little more than a challenge to prove any of their charges, whether political or religious.

9, 10. Festus, willing to do the Jews a pleasure—to ingratiate himself with them—said, Wilt thou go up to Jerusalem, and . . . be judged . . . before me—or, 'under my protection'. If this was meant in earnest, it was temporizing and vacillating. But, possibly, anticipating Paul's refusal, he wished merely to avoid the odium of refusing to remove the trial to Jerusalem.

Then said Paul, I stand at Cæsar's judgment seat—i.e., I am already before the proper tribunal. This seems to imply that he understood Festus to propose handing him over to the Sanhedrim for judgment (and see on vs. 11), with a mere promise of protection from him. But from going to Jerusalem at all he was too well justified in shrinking, for there assassination had been quite recently planned against him.

to the Jews have I done no wrong, as thou knowest very well—lit., 'better,' i.e., (perhaps), better than to press such a proposal.

ADAM CLARKE

left Paul bound, so Festus, on the assumption of it, would, to please them, deliver him into their hand. But as they wished this to be done under the color of justice, they exhibited a number of charges against Paul, which they hoped would appear to Festus a sufficient reason why a new trial should be granted, and he be sent to Jerusalem to take this trial. Their motive is mentioned in the succeeding verse.

4. Festus answered, that Paul should be kept at Caesarea. It is truly astonishing that Festus should refuse this favor to the heads of the Jewish nation, which to those who were not in the secret must appear so very reasonable; and especially as, on his coming to the government, it might be considered an act that was likely to make him popular—and he could have no interest in denying their request. But God had told Paul that he should testify of Him at Rome, and He disposed the heart of Festus to act as he did, and thus disappointed the malice of the Jews and fulfilled His own gracious design. He . . . would depart shortly. So had the providence of God disposed matters that Festus was obliged to return speedily to Caesarea, and thus had not time to preside in such a trial at Jerusalem. And this reason must appear sufficient to the Jews; especially as he gave them all liberty to come and appear against him who were able to prove the alleged charges.

5. Let them . . . which among you are able. "Those who have authority"; for so is this word often used by good Greek authors, and by Josephus.

6. When he had tarried . . . more than ten days. The strangeness of this mode of expression suggests the thought that our printed text is not quite correct in this place, and this suspicion is confirmed by an examination of MSS. and versions. "Not more than eight or ten days" is the reading of several MSS.

7. The Jews . . . laid many and grievous complaints against Paul. As they must have perceived that the Roman governors would not intermeddle with questions of their law, they no doubt invented some new charges, such as sedition and treason, in order to render the mind of the governor evil affected towards Paul. But their malicious designs were defeated, for assertion would not go for proof before a Roman tribunal; this court required proof, and the bloodthirsty persecutors of the apostle could produce none.

8. While he answered for himself. In this instance Luke gives only a general account both of the accusations and of Paul's defense. But from the words in this verse the charges appear to have been threefold: (1) that he had broken the law, (2) that he had defiled the Temple, (3) that he dealt in treasonable practices; to all of which he no doubt answered particularly, though we have nothing further here than this, Neither against the law of the Jews, neither against the temple, nor yet against Caesar, have I offended any thing at all.

9. Willing to do the Jews a pleasure. This was merely to please them and conciliate their esteem; for he knew that, as Paul was Roman citizen, he could not oblige him to take a new trial at Jerusalem.

10. I stand at Caesar's judgment seat. Every procurator represented the person of the emperor in the province over which he presided; and as the seat of government was at Caesarea, and Paul was now before the tribunal on which the emperor's representative sat, he could say, with the strictest propriety, that he stood before Caesar's judgment seat, where, as a freeman of Rome, he should be tried. As thou very well knowest. The record of this trial before Felix was undoubtedly left for the inspection of Festus; for, as he left the prisoner to his successor, he must also leave the charges aaginst him and the trial which he had undergone. Besides, Festus must be assured of his innocence from the trial through which he had just now passed.

11. For if I be an offender. If it can be proved that I have broken the laws, so as to expose me to capital punishment, I do not wish to save my life by subterfuges. I am before the only competent tribunal; here my business should be ultimately decided.

insist upon it. (3) He was willing to abide by the rules of the law, and to let that take its course, v. 11. If he be guilty of any capital crime that deserves death, he will neither flee from justice nor fight with it: "I refuse not to die." If he be innocent, as he protests he is, "If there be none of these things whereof these accuse me, no man may deliver me unto them, no, not the governor himself; for it is his business as much to protect the innocent as to punish the guilty"; and he claims his protection.

3. His appealing to court. Since he is continually in danger of the Jews, and one attempt made after another to get him into their hands, since he cannot have justice done him in any other way: "I appeal unto Cæsar. Rather than be delivered to the Jews let me be delivered to Nero." It is a hard case that a son of Abraham must be forced to appeal to a Nero, from those who call themselves the seed of Abraham, and shall be safer in Rome than in Jerusalem.

V. The judgment given upon the whole matter. His enemies hoped the cause would be ended in his death; his friends hoped it would be ended in his deliverance; they are both disappointed, the thing is left as it was. It is an instance of the slow steps which Providence sometimes takes, by which we are often made ashamed both of our hopes and of our fears, and are kept still waiting on God. The president takes advice upon the matter: He conferred with the council—not with the council of the Jews, but with his own counsellors. He determines to send him to Rome. A Roman citizen might appeal at any time to a superior court, even to the supreme. Hast thou appealed unto Cæsar? Unto Cæsar thou shalt go. In our judgment before God those that by justifying themselves appeal to the law, to the law they shall go, and it will condemn them; but those that by repentance and faith appeal to the gospel, to the gospel they shall go, and it will save them.

Verses 13–27

We have here the preparation that was made for another hearing of Paul before king Agrippa, only to gratify his curiosity.

I. The friendly visit which king Agrippa made to Festus, now upon his coming into the government in that province (v. 13): After certain days, king Agrippa came to Cæsarea.

1. Who the visitants were. (1) King Agrippa, the son of that Herod (surnamed Agrippa) who killed James the apostle, and was himself eaten of worms; and great grandson of Herod the Great, under whom Christ was born. (2) Bernice came with him. She was his own sister, the widow of his uncle Herod, after whose death she lived with this brother of hers; after she was a second time married to Polemon, king of Cilicia, she got to be divorced from him, and returned to her brother king Agrippa. Tacitus and Suetonius speak of a criminal intimacy afterwards between her and Titus Vespasian. Drusilla, the wife of Felix, was another sister. Such lewd people were the great people generally in those times!

2. What the design of this visit was: they came to salute Festus, to compliment him upon his accession to the government. But it is probable they came as much to divert themselves as to show respect to him, and to share in the entertainments of his court.

II. The account which Festus gave to king Agrippa of Paul and his case.

1. To entertain him. It would be particularly acceptable to Agrippa, not only because he was a judge, and there were some points of law and practice in it well worth his notice, but much more as he was a Jew, and there were some points of religion in it much more deserving his cognizance.

2. To have his advice. Festus was but newly come to be a judge, and therefore was willing to have the counsel of those that were older and more experienced. The particular account he gives to king Agrippa concerning Paul, v. 14–21.

(1) He found him a prisoner when he came into the government of this province: There is a certain man left in bonds by Felix; and therefore, if there were anything amiss in the first taking of him into custody, Festus is not to answer for that.

(2) The Jewish sanhedrim were extremely set against him: "The chief priests and the elders informed me against him as a dangerous man, and desired he might therefore be condemned to die."

if there be none of these things . . . no man may deliver me unto them—The word signifies to 'surrender in order to gratify' another.

I appeal to Cæsar—The right of appeal to the supreme power, in case of life and death, was secured by an ancient law to every Roman citizen, and continued under the empire. Had Festus shown any disposition to pronounce final judgment, Paul, strong in the consciousness of his innocence and the justice of a Roman tribunal, would not have made this appeal. But when the only other alternative offered him was to give his own consent to be transferred to the great hotbed of plots against his life, and to a tribunal of unscrupulous and bloodthirsty ecclesiastics whose vociferous cries for his death had scarcely subsided, no other course was open to him. 12. Festus—little expecting such an appeal, but bound to respect it—having conferred with the council—his assessors in judgment, as to the admissibility of the appeal—said, Hast thou—for 'thou hast.' to Cæsar shalt thou go—as if he would add perhaps 'and see if thou fare better.'

13-27. HEROD AGRIPPA II, ON A VISIT TO FESTUS, BEING CONSULTED BY HIM ON PAUL'S CASE, DESIRES TO HEAR THE APOSTLE, WHO IS ACCORDINGLY BROUGHT FORTH. 13. King Agrippa—great grandson of Herod the Great, and Drusilla's brother (see on ch. 24:24). On his father's awful death (ch. 12: 23), being thought too young (17) to succeed, Judea, was attached to the province of Syria. Four years after, on the death of his uncle Herod, he was made king of the northern principalities of Chalcis, and afterwards got Batanea, Iturea, Trachonitis, Abilene, Galilee, and Perea, with the title of king. He died A.D. 100, after reigning fifty-one years. and Bernice—his sister. She was married to her uncle Herod, king of Chalcis, on whose death she lived with her brother Agrippa—not without suspicion of incestuous intercourse, which her subsequent licentious life tended to confirm. came to salute Festus—to pay his respects to him on his accession to the procuratorship.

14, 15. when there many—'several'—days, Festus declared Paul's cause—taking advantage of the presence of one who might be presumed to know such matters better than himself; though the lapse of "several days" ere the subject was touched on shows that it gave Festus little trouble.

ADAM CLARKE

No man may deliver me unto them. The words of the apostle are very strong and appropriate. The Jews asked as a "favor," charin, from Festus, that he would send Paul to Jerusalem, v. 3. Festus, willing to do the Jews charin, this "favor," asked Paul if he would go to Jerusalem, and there be judged, v. 9. Paul says, I have done nothing amiss, either against the Jews or against Caesar. Therefore no man "can make a present of me to them"; that is, favor them so far as to put my life into their hands, and thus gratify them by my death. Festus, in his address to Agrippa, v. 16, admits this, and uses the same form of speech: "It is not the custom of the Romans gratuitously to give up anyone." Much of the beauty of this passage is lost by not attending to the original words. I appeal unto Caesar. A freeman of Rome who had been tried for a crime and sentence passed on him had a right to appeal to the emperor if he conceived the sentence to be unjust; but even before the sentence was pronounced, he had the privilege of an appeal, in criminal cases, if he conceived that the judge was doing anything contrary to the laws. This law was so very sacred and imperative that, in the persecution under Trajan, Pliny would not attempt to put to death Roman citizens who were proved to have turned Christians. Hence, in his letter to Trajan, l. x, Ep. 97, he says, "There were others guilty of similar folly, whom, finding them to be Roman citizens, I have determined to send to the city." Very likely these had appealed to Caesar.

12. Conferred with the council. From this circumstance we may learn that the appeal of Paul to Caesar was conditional, else Festus could not have deliberated with his council whether it should be granted; for he had no power to refuse to admit such an appeal. We may, therefore, understand Paul thus: "I now stand before a tribunal where I ought to be judged; if you refuse to hear and try this cause, rather than go to Jerusalem, I appeal to Caesar." Festus therefore consulted with the council, whether he should proceed to try the cause or send Paul to Rome; and it appears that the majority were of opinion that he should be sent to Caesar. Hast thou appealed unto Caesar? Rather, "Thou hast appealed unto Caesar, and to Caesar thou shalt go." The Jews were disappointed of their hope, and Festus got his hand creditably drawn out of a business with which he was likely to have been greatly embarrassed.

13. King Agrippa. This was the son of Herod Agrippa, who is mentioned in chap. xii. 1. Upon the death of his father's youngest brother, Herod, he succeeded him in the kingdom of Chalcis, by the favor of the Emperor Claudius (Jos., Antiq., l. xx, c. 4, s. 2; and Bell., l. ii, c. 12, s. 1. Afterwards Claudius removed him from that kingdom to a larger one, giving him the tetrarchy of Philip, which contained Trachonitis, Batanea, and Gaulonitis. He gave him, likewise, the tetrarchy of Lysanias, and the province which Varus had governed (Jos., Antiq., l. xx, c. 6, s. 1; Bell., l. ii, c. 12, s. 8. Nero made a further addition, and gave him four cities: Abila, Julias in Peraea, Tarichaea, and Tiberias in Galilee (Jos., Antiq., l. xx, c. 7, 2. 4; Bell., l. ii, c. 13, s. 2. Claudius gave him the power of appointing the high priest among the Jews (Joseph., Antiq., l. xx, c. 1, s. 3); and instances of his exercising this power may be seen in Joseph., Antiq., l. xx, c. 7, s. 8, 11. This king was strongly attached to the Romans and did everything in his power to prevent the Jews from rebelling against them; and when he could not prevail, he united his troops to those of Titus and assisted in the siege of Jerusalem. He survived the ruin of his country several years. Bernice, or as she is sometimes called, Berenice, was sister of this Agrippa and of the Drusilla mentioned in chap. xxiv. She was at first married to her uncle Herod, king of Chalcis (Joseph., Antiq., l. xix, c. 9, s. 1); and on his death went to live with her brother Agrippa, with whom she was violently suspected to lead an incestuous life.

14. Declared Paul's cause unto the king. Festus knew that Agrippa was better acquainted with such matters than he, and he wished in some sort to make him a party in this business.

15. Desiring to have judgment against him. Instead of judgment, "condemnation, sentence of

MATTHEW HENRY

(3) He had insisted upon the Roman law in favour of the prisoner, and would not condemn him unheard (v. 16): "It is not the manner of the Romans to deliver any man to die before the accused has the accusers face to face." Hear the other side had become a proverb among them. We must not give men bad characters, nor condemn their words and actions, till we have heard what is to be said in their vindication.

(4) He had brought him upon his trial, according to the duty of his place, v. 17. He had been expeditious in it as soon as ever they had come, without any delay, on the morrow, he had brought on the cause. He had likewise tried him in the most solemn manner: He sat on the judgment-seat. He called a great court on purpose for the trial of Paul, that the sentence might be definitive, and the cause ended.

(5) He was extremely disappointed in the charge they brought against him (v. 18, 19): When the accusers stood up against him they brought no accusations of such things as I supposed. He supposed by the eagerness of their prosecution, and their urging it thus upon the Roman governors one after another, That they had something to accuse him of that was dangerous either to private property or the public peace. Such were the outcries against the primitive Christians, so loud, so fierce, that the standers-by could not but conclude them the worst of men; and to represent them so was the design of that clamour, as it was against our Saviour. That they had something to accuse him of that was cognizable in the Roman courts, and which the governor was properly the judge of, as Gallio expected (ch. xviii. 14). But he finds the matter is not so; they had certain questions against him, instead of proofs and evidences against him. And they were questions of their own superstition, so he calls their religion. The Romans protected their religion according to their law, but not their superstition. But the great question, it seems, was concerning one Jesus that was dead, whom Paul affirmed to be alive. See how slightly this Roman speaks of Christ, and of his death and resurrection, and of the great controversy between the Jews and the Christians whether he were the Messiah promised or no, and the great proof of his being the Messiah, his resurrection from the dead. What Paul affirmed concerning Jesus, that he is alive, is a matter of such vast importance that if it be not true we are all undone.

(6) He had proposed to Paul that the cause might be adjourned to the Jewish courts, as best able to take cognizance of an affair of this nature (v. 20): "Because I doubted of such manner of questions I asked him whether he would go to Jerusalem and there be judged of these matters."

(7) Paul had chosen rather to remove his cause to Rome than to Jerusalem: "He appealed to be reserved to the hearing of Augustus (v. 21), and therefore I commanded him to be kept till I might send him to Cæsar."

III. The bringing of him before Agrippa.

1. The king desired it (v. 22): "I would also hear the man myself." Agrippa knows more of this matter than Festus does; he has heard of Paul. Nothing would oblige him more than to hear Paul. Agrippa would not for all the world have gone to a meeting to hear Paul preach, any more than Herod to hear Jesus; and yet they are both glad to have them brought before them, only to satisfy their curiosity.

2. Festus granted it: Tomorrow thou shalt hear him. There was a good providence in this, for the encouragement of Paul, who seemed buried alive in his imprisonment, and deprived of all opportunities of doing good. This gives him an opportunity of preaching Christ to a great congregation, and (which is more) to a congregatoin of great ones. Felix heard him in private concerning the faith of Christ. But Agrippa and Festus agree he shall be heard in public.

3. Great preparation was made for it (v. 23): The next day there was a great appearance in the place of hearing.

(1) Agrippa and Bernice took this opportunity to show themselves in state; they came with great pomp. They came with great fancy, so the word is. Great pomp is but great fancy. It neither adds any real excellency, nor gains any real respect, but feeds a vain humour. It is but a show, a dream, a fantastical thing (so the word signifies). The pomp which Agrippa and Bernice appeared in was, [1] Stained by their lewd characters, and all the beauty of it sullied, and all virtuous people that knew them could not but contemn them in the midst of all this pomp as vile persons. [2] Outshone by the real glory of the poor prisoner at the bar. His bonds in so good a cause were more glorious than their chains of gold. Who would be fond of worldly pomp that here sees so bad a woman loaded with it and so good a man questions . . . of their own superstition—rather 'religion' (see on ch. 17:22). It cannot be supposed that Festus would use the word in any discourteous sense in addressing his Jewish guest. one Jesus—"Thus speaks this miserable Festus of Him to whom every knee shall bow" [BENGEL]. whom Paul affirmed—kept affirming'—was alive—showing that the resurrection of the Crucified One had been the burden, as usual, of Paul's pleading. The insignificance of the whole affair in the eyes of Festus is manifest.

because I doubted of such manner of questions—The "I" is emphatic—I, as a Roman judge, being at a loss how to deal with such matters. the hearing of Augustus—the imperial title first conferred by the Roman Senate on Octavius.

22-27. I would also hear—'should like to hear'—the man myself—No doubt Paul was right when he said, "The king knoweth of these things . . . for I am persuaded that none of these things are hidden from him; for this thing was not done in a corner" (ch. 26:26). Hence his curiosity to see and hear the man who had raised such commotion and was remodelling to such an extent the whole Jewish life.

death" is the reading of several MSS., which is probably genuine. This is evidently the meaning of the place, whichever reading we prefer. Nothing could satisfy these men but the death of the apostle. It was not justice they wanted, but his destruction.

16. It is not the manner of the Romans to deliver any man to die. "To make a present of any man"; gratuitously to give up the life of any man, through favor or caprice. Here is a reference to the subject discussed on v. 11. Before that he which is accused have the accusers face to face. For this righteous procedure the Roman laws were celebrated over the civilized world. Appian says: "It is not their custom to condemn men before they have been heard."

19. Questions . . . of their own superstition. "Questions concerning their own religion." Superstition meant something as bad among the Romans as it does among us; and is it likely that Festus, only a procurator, should thus speak to Agrippa, a king, concerning his own religion? He could not have done so without offering the highest insult. The word must therefore simply mean "religion."

20. I doubted of such manner of questions. Such as whether he had broken their law, defiled their Temple; or whether this Jesus, who was dead, was again raised to life.

21. Unto the hearing of Augustus. "To the discrimination of the emperor."

22. I would also hear the man myself. A spirit of curiosity, similar to that of Herod, Luke xxiii. 8.

23. With great pomp. "With much phantasy," great splendor, great parade, superb attendance, or splendid retinue; in this sense the Greek word is used by the best writers. The place of hearing. A sort of audience chamber, in the palace of Festus. This was not a trial of Paul; there were no Jews present to accuse him, and he could not be tried but at Rome, as he had appealed to Caesar. These grandees wished to hear the man speak of his religion, and in his own defense, through a principle of curiosity.

loaded with the reverse of it?

(2) The chief captains and principal men of the city took this opportunity to pay their respects to Festus and to his guests. I am apt to think that those who were to appear in pomp perplexed themselves more with care about their clothes than Paul, who was to appear as a prisoner, did with care about his cause.

IV. The speech with which Festus introduced the cause. He addressed himself respectfully to the company: "King Agrippa, and all men who are here present with us." He speaks to all the men as if he intended a tacit reflection upon Bernice. The word used is that which signifies men in distinction from women; what had Bernice to do here? He represents the prisoner as one that the Jews had a very great spite against. The multitude of them, both at Jerusalem and here at Cæsarea, cry out that he ought not to live any longer. He confesses the prisoner's innocency (v. 25): I found that he had committed nothing worthy of death. Upon a full hearing of the case his own conscience brought in Paul not guilty. And why did he not discharge him then, for he stood upon his deliverance? Why, truly, because he was so much clamoured against, and he feared the clamour would turn upon himself if he should release him. It is a pity but every man that has a conscience should have courage to act according to it. He acquaints them with the present state of the case, that the prisoner had appealed to the emperor himself, and that he had admitted his appeal: I have determined to send him. And thus the cause now stood. He desires their assistance in examining the matter calmly and impartially, that he might have at least such an insight into the cause as was necessary to his stating it to the emperor, v. 36, 27. He thought it unreasonable to send a prisoner and not withal to signify the crimes laid against him, that the matter might be put in a readiness for the emperor's determination. He could not as yet write anything certain concerning Paul; so confused were the informations that were given in against him, that Festus could make nothing at all of them. He therefore desired Paul might thus be publicly examined, that he might be advised by them what to write.

with the chief captains—See on ch. 21:32. JOSEPHUS (Jewish War, iii. 4. 2) says that five cohorts, whose full complement was 1000 men, were stationed at Cæsarea. principal men of the city—both Jews and Romans. "This was the most dignified and influential audience Paul had yet addressed, and the prediction (ch. 9:15) was fulfilled, though afterwards still more remarkably at Rome (ch. 27:24; II Tim. 4:16, 17" [WEBSTER and WILKINSON].

I have no certain—'definite'—thing to write to my lord—Nero. "The writer's accuracy should be remarked here. It would have been a mistake to apply this term ('lord') to the emperor a few years earlier. Neither Augustus nor Tiberius would let himself be so called, as implying the relation of master and slave. But it had now come (rather, was coming) into use as one of the imperial titles" [HACKET].

ADAM CLARKE

26. I have no certain thing to write. Nothing alleged against him has been substantiated. Unto my lord. The title Kyrios, Dominus, Lord, both Augustus and Tiberius had absolutely refused; and forbade, even by public edicts, the application of it to themselves. Tiberius himself was accustomed to say that he was lord only of his slaves, emperor or general of the troops, and prince of the senate. The succeeding emperors were not so modest; they affected the title. Nero, the then emperor, would have it; and Pliny the younger is continually giving it to Trajan in his letters.

27. For it seemeth to me unreasonable. Every reader must feel the awkward situation in which Festus stood. He was about to send a prisoner to Rome to appear before Nero, though he had not one charge to support against him; and yet he must be sent, for he had appealed to Caesar. He hopes therefore that Agrippa, who was of the Jewish religion, would be able to discern more particularly the merits of this case; and might, after hearing Paul, direct him how to draw up those letters which, on sending the prisoner, must be transmitted to the emperor.

This chapter ends as exceptionably as the twenty-first. It should have begun at v. 13, and have been continued to the end of the twenty-sixth chapter, or both chapters have been united in one.

Verses 1–11

Agrippa was the most honourable person in the assembly, having the title of king bestowed upon him, and, though not here superior, yet senior, to Festus. Festus having opened the cause, Agrippa intimates to Paul a licence given him to speak for himself, v. 1. This was a favour which the Jews would not allow him, but Agrippa freely gives it to him. Notice is taken of his gesture: He stretched forth his hand, as one that had perfect freedom and command of himself.

I. Paul addressed himself with a very particular respect to Agrippa, v. 2, 3. He answered cheerfully before Felix, because he knew he had been many years a judge to that nation, ch. xxiv. 10. But his opinion of Agrippa goes further. Being accused of the Jews, and having many base things laid to his charge, he is glad he has an opportunity of clearing himself. Since he is forced to answer for himself, he is glad it is before king Agrippa, who, being himself a proselyte to the Jewish religion, understood all matters relating to it better than the other Roman governors did: I knew thee to be expert in all customs and questions which are among the Jews. It seems, Agrippa was expert in the customs of the Jewish religion. He was expert also in the questions that arose upon those customs. Agrippa was well versed in the scriptures of the Old Testament, and therefore could make a better judgment upon the controversy concerning Jesus being the Messiah than another could. It is an encouragement to a preacher to have those to speak to that are intelligent, and can discern things that differ. He therefore begs that he would hear him patiently. Paul designs a long discourse, and begs that Agrippa will hear him out, and not be weary; he designs a plain discourse, and begs that he will hear him with mildness, and not be angry. Surely the least we can expect, when we preach the faith of Christ, is to be heard patiently.

II. He professes that though he was branded as an apostate, yet he still adhered to all that good which he was first trained up in.

1. See here what his religion was in his youth: His manner of life was well known, v. 4, 5. He was not indeed born among his own nation, but he was bred among them at Jerusalem. His education was neither foreign nor obscure; it was among his own

VSS. 1-32. PAUL'S DEFENSE OF HIMSELF BEFORE KING AGRIPPA, WHO PRONOUNCES HIM INNOCENT, BUT CONCLUDES THAT THE APPEAL TO CÆSAR MUST BE CARRIED OUT. This speech, though in substance the same as that from the fortress stairs of Jerusalem (ch. 22), differs from it in being less directed to meet the charge of apostasy from the Jewish faith, and giving more enlarged views of his remarkable change and apostolic commission, and the divine support under which he was enabled to brave the hostility of his countrymen. 1-3. Agrippa said—Being a king he appears to have presided. Paul stretched forth the hand—chained to a soldier (vs. 29, and see on ch. 12:6).

I know thee to be expert . . .—His father was zealous for the law, and he himself had the office of president of the temple and its treasures, and the appointment of the high priest [JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 20. 1. 3]. hear me patiently—The idea of 'indulgently' is also conveyed.

1. Then Paul stretched forth the hand. This act, as we have already seen on chap. xxi. 40, was merely to gain attention; it was no rhetorical flourish, nor designed for one. From knowing, partly by descriptions and partly by ancient statues, how orators and others who address a concourse of people stood, we can easily conceive the attitude of Paul. When the right hand was stretched out, the left remained under the cloak, which being thrown off the right shoulder, to give the arm the fuller liberty, it then rested on the left. Under these circumstances, the hand could be stretched out gracefully.

2. I think myself happy. As if he had said, This is a peculiarly fortunate circumstance in my favor that I am called to make my defense before a judge so intelligent and so well acquainted with the laws and customs of our country. This Agrippa was king of Trachonitis, a region which lay on the north of Palestine, on the east side of Jordan, and south of Damascus.

4. My manner of life. The apostle means to state that, though born in Tarsus, he had a regular Jewish education, having been sent up to Jerusalem for that purpose, but at what age does not appear; probably about twelve, for at this age the male children were probably brought to the annual solemnities.

nation at Jerusalem. Those that knew him from the beginning could testify for him that he was a Pharisee, that he was of the most strict sect of that religion. He was not only called a Pharisee, but he lived a Pharisee. And he was of the better sort of Pharisees; for he was brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, who was an eminent rabbi of the school or house of Hillel. Now if Paul was a Pharisee, and lived a Pharisee, then he was a scholar, a man of learning; the Pharisees knew the law, and were well versed in it. It was a reproach to the other apostles that they had not had an academical education, but were bred fishermen, ch. iv. 13. Here is an apostle raised up that had sat at the feet of their most eminent doctors. Then he was a moralist, a man of virtue, and not a rake or loose debauched young man. He was, as touching the righteousness which is in the law, blameless. As he could not be thought to have deserted his religion because he did not know it (for he was a learned man), so he could not be thought to have deserted it because he did not love it. Then he was orthodox, sound in the faith. He was a Pharisee, in opposition to a Sadducee. They could not say, He quitted his religion for want of a due regard to divine revelation; no, he always had a veneration for the ancient promise made of God unto the fathers.

Now though Paul knew very well that all this would not justify him before God, yet he knew it was for his reputation among the Jews, and in argument, such as Agrippa would feel, that he was not such a man as they represented him to be. Though he counted it but loss that he might win Christ, yet he mentioned it when it might serve to honour Christ. He reflects upon it with some satisfaction that he had before his conversion lived in all good conscience before God.

2. See here what his religion is. He has not indeed such a zeal for the ceremonial law as he had in his youth. But for the main principles of his religion he is as zealous as ever.

(1) His religion is built upon the promise made of God unto the fathers. It is built upon divine revelation; it is built upon divine grace, and that grace manifested and conveyed by promise. The promise of God is the guide and ground of his religion, the promise made to the fathers, which was more ancient than the ceremonial law. Christ and heaven are the two great doctrines of the gospel—that God has given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. Now these two are the matter of the promise made unto the fathers.

(2) His religion consists in the hopes of this promise. He places it not, as they did, in meats and drinks, but in a believing dependence upon God's grace in the covenant, and upon the promise. He had hope in Christ as the promised seed; he hoped to be blessed in him. He had hopes of heaven. Paul had no confidence in the flesh, but in Christ.

(3) Herein he concurred with all the pious Jews. "Our twelve tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come to this promise. Now all the Israelites profess to believe in this promise, both of Christ and heaven. They all hope for a Messiah to come, and we that are Christians hope in a Messiah already come; so that we all agree to build upon the same promise. They look for the resurrection of the dead, and this is what I look for. Why should I be looked upon as an apostate from the faith and worship of the Jewish church, when I agree with them in this fundamental article? I hope to come to the same heaven at last that they hope to come to; and, if we expect to meet so happily in our end, why should we fall out so unhappily by the way?" Paul instantly serves God day and night in the gospel of his Son; the twelve tribes by their representatives do so in the law of Moses, but he and they do it in hope of the same promise. Much more should Christians, who hope in the same Jesus, for the same heaven, though differing in the modes and ceremonies of worship, live together in holy love. Those only can upon good grounds hope for eternal life that are diligent and constant in the service of God; and the prospect of that eternal life should engage us to diligence and constancy in all religious exercises. And of those that instantly serve God day and night, though not in our way, we ought to judge charitably.

(4) This was what he was now suffering for: I am judged for the hope of the promise made unto the fathers. He stuck to the promise, against the ceremonial law, while his persecutors stuck to the ceremonial law, against the promise. It is common for men to hate and persecute the power of that religion in others which yet they pride themselves in the form of. Paul's hope was what they themselves also allowed (ch. xxiv. 15), and yet they were thus

4, 5. from my youth, which was at the first . . . at Jerusalem, know all the Jews; which knew me from the beginning—plainly showing that he received his education, even from early youth, at Jerusalem. See on ch. 22:3. if they would—'were willing to'—testify—but this, of course, they were not, it being a strong point in his favor. after the most straitest—'the strictest'—sect—as the Pharisees confessedly were. This was said to meet the charge, that as a Hellenistic Jew he had contracted among the heathen lax ideas of Jewish peculiarities.

6, 7. I . . . am judged for the hope of the promise made . . . to our fathers—'for believing that the promise of Messiah, the Hope of the Church (ch. 13:32; 28:20) has been fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth risen from the dead.'

Unto which promise—the fulfilment of it—our twelve tribes—James 1:1; and see on Luke 2:36. instantly—'intently'; see on ch. 12:5. serving God—in the sense of religious worship; see on "ministered," ch. 13:2. day and night, hope to come—The apostle rises into language as catholic as the thought—representing his despised nation, all scattered thought it now was, as twelve great branches of one ancient stem, in all places of their dispersion offering to the God of their fathers one unbroken worship, reposing on one great "promise" made of old unto their fathers, and sustained by one "hope" of "coming" to its fulfilment; the single point of difference between him and his countrymen, and the one cause of all their virulence against him, being, that his hope had found rest in One already come, while theirs still pointed to the future.

For which hope's sake, King Agrippa, I am accused of the Jews—'I am accused of Jews, O king' (so the true reading appears to be); of all quarters the most surprising for such a charge to come from. The charge of sedition is not so much as alluded to throughout this speech. It was indeed a mere pretext.

ADAM CLARKE

5. After the most straitest sect. That is, the Pharisees; who were reputed the strictest in their doctrines and in their moral practices of all the sects then among the Jews. The sects were the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes.

6. For the hope of the promise. This does not appear to mean the hope of the Messiah, as some have imagined, but the hope of the resurrection of the dead, to which the apostle referred in chap. xxiii. 6, where he says to the Jewish council, "Of the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question."

ALBERT BARNES:

7. "Unto which" promise. To the fulfillment of which promise they hope to come; that is, they hope and believe that the promise will be fulfilled, and that they will partake of its benefits. "Our twelve tribes." This was the name by which the Jews were designated. The ancient Jewish nation had hoped to come to that promise; it had been the hope and expectation of the nation. Long before the coming of the Messiah, ten of the twelve tribes had been carried captive to Assyria, and had not returned, leaving but the two tribes of Benjamin and Judah. But the name, "the twelve tribes," as used to designate the Jewish people, would still be retained (James 1:1). Paul here says that the hope referred to had been that of the Jewish nation. Except the comparatively small portion of the nation, the Sadducees, the great mass of the nation had held to the doctrine of a future state. This Agrippa would well know.

"Instantly." Constantly: with intensity; with zeal. This was true, for amidst all the sins of the nation they observed with punctuality and zeal the outward forms of the worship of God. "Serving" God. In the ordinances and observances of the temple. As a nation they did not serve him in their hearts, but they kept up the outward forms of religious worship. "Day and night." With unwearied zeal; with constancy and ardor (Luke 2:37). The ordinary Jewish services and sacrifices were in the morning and evening, and might be said to be performed day and night. Some of their services, as the Paschal supper, were prolonged usually till late at night. The main idea is, that they kept up the worship of God with constant and untiring zeal and devotion. "For which hope's sake." On account of my cherishing this hope in common with the great mass of my countrymen. If Paul could convince Agrippa that the main point of his offense was that which had been the common belief of his countrymen, it would show to his satisfaction that he was innocent. And on this ground he put his defense—that he held only that which the mass of the nation had believed, and that he maintained this in the only consistent and defensible manner—that God had, in fact, raised up the Messiah, and had thus given assurance that the dead would rise.

—Popular Commentary

enraged against him for practising according to that hope.

(5) This was what he would persuade all that heard him cordially to embrace (v. 8): Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead? He explained the promise made to the fathers to be the promise of the resurrection and eternal life, and proved that he was in the right way because he believed in Christ who had risen from the dead, which was a pledge and earnest of that resurrection which the fathers hoped for. Now many of his hearers were Gentiles, Festus particularly, and we may suppose, when they heard him speak so much of Christ's resurrection, and of the resurrection from the dead, that they mocked. If it be above the power of nature, yet it is not above the power of the God of nature. Do we not see a kind of resurrection in nature, at the return of every spring? Has the sun such a force to raise dead plants, and should it seem incredible to us that God should raise dead bodies?

III. He acknowledges that while he continued a Pharisee he was a bitter enemy to Christians and Christianity, and thought he ought to be so. His becoming a Christian and a preacher was not the result of any previous inclination that way. He did not reason himself into Christianity, but was brought into the highest degree of an assurance of it, immediately from the highest degree of prejudice against it. His conversion in such a miraculous way was not only to himself, but to others also, a convincing proof of the truth of Christianity. Perhaps he designs it for an excuse of his prosecutors. Paul himself once thought he did what he ought to do when he persecuted the disciples of Christ, and he charitably thinks they laboured under the like mistake. Observe,

(1) What a fool he was in his opinion (v. 9): He thought with himself that he ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth. Because it agreed not with the notion he had of the kingdom of the Messiah, he was for doing all he could against it. He thought he did God good service in persecuting those who called on the name of Jesus Christ. It is possible for those to be confident they are in the right who yet are evidently in the wrong.

2. What a fury he was in his practice, v. 10, 11. There is not a more violent principle in the world than conscience misinformed. He gives an account of what he did and aggravates it as one that was truly penitent for it. He filled the jails with Christians. Many of the saints did I shut up in prison (ch. xxvi. 10), both men and women, ch. viii. 3. He made himself the tool of the chief priests. Herein from them he received authority and proud enough he was to be a man in authority for such a purpose. He was very officious to vote the putting of Christians to death, particularly Stephen, to whose death Saul was consenting (ch. viii. 1). He brought them under punishments of an inferior nature, in the synagogues, where they were scourged as transgressors of the rules of the synagogue. He not only punished them for their religion, but he forced them to abjure their religion, by putting them to the torture: "I compelled them to blaspheme Christ." Nothing will lie heavier upon persecutors than forcing men's consciences. His rage swelled so against Christians and Christianity that Jerusalem itself was too narrow a stage for it to act upon, but, being exceedingly mad against them, he persecuted them even to strange cities. He was mad at them, mad to see them multiply the more for their being afflicted. He was exceedingly mad; the stream of his fury would admit no banks, no bounds. Persecutors are mad men, and some of them exceedingly mad. There is not a more restless principle than malice, especially that which pretends conscience.

This was Paul's character, and this his manner of life in the beginning of his time. All imaginable external objections lay against his being a Christian.

Verses 12–23

All who believe a God must acknowledge that those who speak and act by his direction are not to be opposed; for that is fighting against God. Now Paul here makes it out that he had an immediate call from heaven to preach the gospel of Christ to the Gentile world.

I. He was made a Christian by a divine power. He was brought into it on a sudden by the hand of heaven, by a divine and spiritual energy, by a revelation of Christ from above: and this when he was in the full career of his sin, going to Damascus. Nor was he tempted to give it up by the failing of his friends, for he had at this time as ample an authority and commission from the chief priests to persecute Christianity as ever he had. Two things bring about this surprising change, a vision from heaven and a voice from heaven.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

8. Why should it be thought a thing incredible . . . that God should raise the dead?—rather, 'Why is it judged a thing incredible if God raises the dead?' the case being viewed as an accomplished fact. No one dared to call in question the overwhelming evidence of the resurrection of Jesus, which proclaimed Him to be the Christ, the Son of God; the only way of getting rid of it, therefore, was to pronounce it incredible. But why, asks the apostle, is it so judged? Leaving this pregnant question to find its answer in the breasts of his audience, he now passes to his personal history.

9-15. See on ch. 9:1, etc. and cf. ch. 22:4, etc.

ALBERT BARNES:

10. "And when they were put to death." In the history of those transactions, there is no account of any Christian being put to death except Stephen. But there is no improbability in supposing that the same thing which had happened to Stephen had occurred in other cases. Stephen was the first martyr, and as he was a prominent man his case is particularly recorded. "I gave my voice." Paul was not a member of the Sanhedrin, but this does not mean that he voted. It simply means that he joined in the persecution; he approved it; he assented to the putting of the saints to death. The Syriac renders it, "I joined with those who condemned them." It is evident, also, that Paul instigated them in this persecution, and urged them on to deeds of blood and cruelty.

11. "And compelled them to blaspheme." To blaspheme the name of Jesus by denying that he was the Messiah, and by admitting that he was an impostor. This was the object which they had in view in the persecution. It was not to make them blaspheme or reproach God, but to deny that Jesus was the Messiah, and to reproach him as a deceiver and an impostor. It is not necessarily implied in the expression, "and compelled them to blaspheme," that he succeeded in doing it, but that he endeavored to make them apostatize from the Christian religion and deny the Lord Jesus. It is certainly not impossible that a few might thus have been induced by the authority of the Sanhedrin and by the threats of Paul to do it, but it is certain that the great mass of Christians adhered firmly to their belief that Jesus was the Messiah.

"And being exceedingly mad." Nothing could more forcibly express his violence against the Christians. He raged like a madman; he was so ignorant that he laid aside all appearance of reason; with the fury and violence of a maniac, he endeavored to exterminate them from the earth. None but a madman will persecute men on account of their religious opinions; and all persecutions have been conducted like this, with the violence, the fury, and the ungovernable temper of maniacs.

ADAM CLARKE

8. That God should raise the dead. As Agrippa believed in the true God, and knew that one of His attributes was omnipotence, he could not believe that the resurrection of the dead was an impossible thing. To this belief of his the apostle appeals, and the more especially because the Sadducees denied the doctrine of the resurrection, though they professed to believe in the same God. Two attributes of God stood pledged to produce this resurrection: His truth, on which His promise was founded; and His power, by which the thing could be easily affected, as that power is unlimited. Some of the best critics think this verse should be read thus: "What! should it be thought a thing incredible with you, if God should raise the dead?"

10. Many of the saints. From what is said in this verse it seems that Paul, before his conversion, was invested with much power. He imprisoned the Christians; punished many in various synagogues; compelled them to blaspheme—to renounce and perhaps to execrate Christ, in order to save their lives; and gave his voice, exerted all his influence and authority, against them, in order that they might be put to death. And from this it would seem that there were other persons put to death besides Stephen, though their names are not mentioned.

12. Whereupon as I went to Damascus. See the whole account of the conversion of Saul of Tarsus explained at large in the notes on chap. ix. 2, etc.

MATTHEW HENRY

1. He saw a heavenly vision; it was without doubt a divine appearance. He saw a great light, a light from heaven, such as could not be produced by any art at midday; it was not in a house where tricks might have been played with him, but it was in the way, in the open air; it was such a light as was above the brightness of the sun, and this could not be the product of Paul's own fancy, for it shone round about those that journeyed with him: made the sun itself to be in their eyes a less light. They all fell to the earth upon the sight of it, such a mighty consternation did it put them into. In the creation of grace, as of the world, the first thing created is light, 2 Cor. iv. 6. Christ himself appeared to him (v. 16): I have appeared to thee for this purpose. Christ was in this light, though those that travelled with Paul saw the light only, and not Christ in the light.

2. He heard a heavenly voice speaking to him; it is here said to be in the Hebrew tongue, his native language. He called him by his name, and repeated it (Saul, Saul). He convinced him of sin, the sin of persecuting the Christians. He interested himself in the sufferings of his followers: Thou persecutest me (v. 14), and again, It is Jesus whom thou persecutest, v. 15. Little did Paul think, when he was trampling upon those that he looked upon as the blemishes of this earth, that he was insulting one that was so much the glory of heaven. He checked him for his wilful resistance of those convictions: It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks. Christ made himself known to him. Paul asked (v. 15), "Who art thou, Lord?" And he said, "I am Jesus; he whom thou hatest despised, and hated." Paul thought Jesus was buried in the earth, and, though stolen out of his own sepulchre, yet laid in some other. All the Jews were taught to say so, and therefore he is amazed to hear him speak from heaven, to see him surrounded with all this glory. This convinced him that the doctrines of Jesus were divine and heavenly, and not to be opposed, but to be cordially embraced: and this is enough to make him a Christian immediately.

II. He was made a minister by a divine authority: That the same Jesus that appeared to him in that glorious light ordered him to go and preach the gospel to the Gentiles. What is said of his being an apostle is here joined immediately to that which was said to him by the way. He puts the two together for brevity-sake: Rise, and stand upon thy feet. He must stand up, for Christ has work for him to do: I have appeared to thee to make thee a minister. Christ has the making of his own ministers. Christ will manifest himself to all those whom he makes his ministers; for how can those preach him who do not know him? And how can those know him to whom he does not by his spirit make himself known?

1. The office to which Paul is appointed: he is made a minister, to attend on Christ, and act for him, as a witness. Christ appeared to him that he might appear for Christ before men.

2. The matter of Paul's testimony: he must give an account to the world, Of the things which he had seen. He saw these things that he might publish them, and he did take all occasions to publish them, as here, and before, ch. xxii. Of those things in which he would appear to him. Paul at first had but confused notions of the gospel, till Christ appeared to him and gave him fuller instructions. The gospel he preached he received from Christ immediately (Gal. i. 12); but he received it gradually. Christ often appeared to Paul and still taught him.

3. The spiritual protection he was taken under (v. 17), delivering thee from the people of the Jews and from the Gentiles. Christ had shown Paul at this time what great things he must suffer (ch. ix. 16), and yet tells him here he will deliver him from the people. Great sufferings are reconcilable to the promise of the deliverance of God's people. Sometimes God delivers them into the hands of their persecutors that he may have the honour of delivering them out of their hands.

4. The special commission given him to go among the Gentiles; it was some years after Paul's conversion before he was sent to the Gentiles.

(1) There is great work to be done among the Gentiles, and Paul must be instrumental in doing it. A world that sits in darkness must be enlightened. He is sent to open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light. He shall open their eyes, which before were shut against the light, and they shall be willing to understand. Christ opens the heart by opening the eyes, does not lead men blindfold, but gives them to see their own way. He is sent not only to open their eyes for the present, but to keep them open, to turn them from darkness to light, that is, from following false and blind guides, to follow a divine revelation of unquestionable certainty and a minister . . . both of these things which thou hast seen—putting him on a footing with those "eye-witnesses and ministers of the word" mentioned in Luke 1:2. and of those in which I will appear to thee—referring to visions he was thereafter to be favored with; such as ch. 18:9, 10; 22:17-21; 23:11; II Corinthians 12, etc. (Gal. 1:12).

Delivering thee from the people—(the Jews) and from the Gentiles. He was all along the object of Jewish malignity, and was at that moment in the hands of the Gentiles; yet he calmly reposes on his Master's assurances of deliverance from both, at the same time taking all precautions for safety and vindicating all his legal rights.

unto whom now I send thee—The emphatic "I" here denotes the authority of the Sender [BENGEL]. To open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light—rather, 'that they may turn' (as in vs. 20), i.e., as the effect of their eyes being opened. The whole passage leans upon Isaiah 61: 1 (Luke 4:18).

ADAM CLARKE

16. But rise. The particulars mentioned here and in the following two verses are not given in chap. ix nor in chap. xxiii, where he gives an account of his conversion. He has detailed the different circumstances of that important event, as he saw it necessary; and perhaps there were several others which then took place that he had no opportunity of mentioning, because there was nothing in succeeding occurrences which rendered it necessary to produce them. To make thee a minister. "An under-rower"; that is, one who is under the guidance and authority of another; an assistant, or servant. So Paul was to act solely under the authority of Jesus Christ. And a witness. Martyra, a "martyr." Though this word literally means a witness, yet we apply it only to such persons as have borne testimony to the truth of God at the hazard and expense of their lives. In this sense also ancient history states Paul to have been a witness; for it is said he was beheaded at Rome, by the command of Nero. In the which I will appear. Here Christ gives him to understand that he should have further communications from himself; and this may refer either to those interpositions of divine providence by which he was so often rescued from destruction, or to those encouragements which he received in dreams, visions, trances, or to that general inspiration under which he was enabled to apprehend and reveal the secret things of God for the edification of the Church.

17. Delivering thee from the people. From the Jews—and from the Gentiles, put here in opposition to the Jews; and both meaning mankind at large, wheresoever the providence of God might send him. But he was to be delivered from the malice of the Jews, that he might be sent with salvation to the Gentiles.

18. To open their eyes. To be the instrument of informing their understanding in the things of God. To turn them from darkness to light. From heathenism and superstition to the knowledge and worship of the true God.

A. T. ROBERTSON:

13. "At midday" (hemeras meses). Genitive of time and idiomatic use of mesos, in the middle of the day, more vivid than mesembrian (22:6). "Above the brightness of the sun" (huperten lamproteta tou heliou). Here alone, not in Acts 9 or 22, though implied in 9:3 and 22:6, "indicating the supernatural character of the light" (Knowling). Luke makes no effort to harmonize the exact phrases here with those in the other accounts and Paul here (v. 16) blends together what Jesus said to him directly and the message of Jesus through Ananias (9:15). The word lamprotes, old word, is here alone in the N.T. "Shining round about me" (perilampsan me). First aorist active participle of perilampo, common Koine verb, in N.T. only here and Luke 2:9.

14. "When we were all fallen" (panton katapesonton hemon). Genitive absolute with second aorist active participle of katapipto. "In the Hebrew language" (tei Ebraidi dialektoi). Natural addition here, for Paul is speaking in Greek, not Aramaic as in 22:2. "It is hard for thee to kick against the goad" (skleron soi pros kentra laktizein). Genuine here, but not in chapters 9 and 22. A common proverb as Aeschylus Ag. 1624: Pros kentra me laktize. "It is taken from an ox that being pricked with a goad kicks and receives a severer wound" (Page). Compare the parables of Jesus (Matt. 13:35). Blass observes that Paul's mention of this Greek and Latin proverb is an indication of his culture. Besides, he mentions (not invents) it here rather than in chapter 22 because of the culture of this audience. Kentron means either sting as of bees (2 Macc. 14:19) and so of death (1 Cor. 15:55) or an iron goad in the ploughman's hand as here (the only two N.T. examples). Note plural here (goads) and laktizein is present active infinite so that the idea is "to keep on kicking against goads." This old verb means to kick with the heel (adverb lax, with the heel), but only here in the N.T. There is a papyrus example of kicking (laktizo) with the feet against the door.

truth. This was turning them from darkness to light, from the ways of darkness to those on which the light shines. The great design of the gospel is to rectify the mistakes of those who are in error, that things may be set and seen in a true light. A world that lies in wickedness, must be reformed; it is not enough for them to have their eyes opened, they must have their hearts renewed. Satan rules by the power of darkness, and God by the convincing evidence of light. Sinners are under the power of Satan; converting grace turns them from under the dominion of Satan, and brings them into subjection to God. When gracious dispositions are strong in the soul (as corrupt and sinful dispositions had been), it is then turned from the power of Satan unto God.

(2) There is a great happiness designed for the Gentiles by this work—that they may receive forgiveness of sins, and inheritance among those who are sanctified; they are turned from the slavery of Satan to the service of God. That they may be restored to his favour, which by sin they have forfeited: That they may receive forgiveness of sins. They are persuaded to lay down their arms, and return to their allegiance, that they may have the benefit of the act of indemnity. That they may be happy in the fruition of him, that they may have an inheritance among those who are sanctified by faith that is in me. Heaven is an inheritance, it descends to all the children of God; for, if children, then heirs. That they may have a right, so some read it; not by merit, but purely by grace. All that are effectually turned from sin to God are not only pardoned, but preferred. All that shall be saved hereafter are sanctified now. None can be happy that are not holy; nor shall any be saints in heaven that are not first saints on earth. We need no more to make us happy than to have our lot among those that are sanctified, to fare as they fare. Those who are sanctified shall be glorified. Let us therefore now cast in our lot among them. We are sanctified and saved by faith in Christ. Some refer it to the word next before, sanctified by faith, for faith purifies the heart. Others refer it to the receiving of both pardon and the inheritance. It comes all to one; for it is by faith that we are justified, sanctified, and glorified. By faith, that faith which is in me; it is emphatically expressed. That faith which in a particular manner fastens upon Jesus Christ and his mediation, by which we rely upon Christ, and resign ourselves to him.

III. He had discharged his ministry by divine aid and under divine direction and protection.

1. God gave him a heart to comply with the call (v. 19): I was not disobedient to the heavenly vision. If Paul had conferred with flesh and blood, and been swayed by his secular interest, he would have done as Jonah did, gone anywhere rather than upon this errand. He accepted his commission and he applied himself to act accordingly.

2. God enabled him to go through a great deal of work, though in it he grappled with a great deal of difficulty, v. 20. He applied himself to the preaching of the gospel with all vigour. He began at Damascus, where he was converted. When he came to Jerusalem, where he had his education, he there witnessed for Christ, where he had most furiously set himself against him. He preached throughout all the coasts of Judæa; he made the first offer of the gospel to the Jews, as Christ had appointed, and did not leave them till they had wilfully thrust the gospel from them. He turned to the Gentiles.

3. His preaching was all practical. He showed them that they ought, (1) To repent of their sins, to be sorry for them, and enter into covenant against them. They ought to change their mind and change their way. (2) To turn to God. They must not only conceive an antipathy to sin, but they must come into a conformity to God; they must turn to God, in love and affection, and return to God in duty and obedience, and turn and return from the world and the flesh. (3) To do works meet for repentance. This was what John preached, who was the first gospel preacher, Matt. iii. 8. Those that profess repentance must practise it, must live a life of repentance. It is not enough to speak penitent words, but we must do works agreeable to those words. Now what fault could be found with such preaching as this?

4. The Jews had no quarrel with him but upon this account, that he did all he could to persuade people to be religious, and to bring them to God by bringing them to Christ (v. 21): It was for these causes, and no other, that the Jews caught me in the temple, and went about to kill me; and let anyone judge whether these were crimes worthy of death or of bonds. They caught him in the temple worshipping God, and there they set upon him, as if the

and from the power of Satan—Note the connection here between being "turned from darkness" and "from the power of Satan," whose whole power over men lies in keeping them in the dark: hence he is called "the ruler of the darkness of this world." See on II Corinthians 4:

4. that they may receive forgiveness . . . and inheritance among the sanctified by faith that is in me—Note: Faith is here made the instrument of salvation at once in its first stage, forgiveness, and its last, admission to the home of the sanctified; and the faith which introduces the soul to all this is emphatically declared by the glorified Redeemer to rest upon Himself—"FAITH, even THAT WHICH IS IN ME." And who that believes this can refrain from casting his crown before Him or resist offering Him supreme worship?

19-21. Whereupon, O King Agrippa, I was not disobedient unto the heavenly vision—This musical and elevated strain, which carries the reader along with it, and doubtless did the hearers, bespeaks the lofty region of thought and feeling to which the apostle had risen while rehearsing his Master's communications to him from heaven. showed . . . to them of Damascus, and at Jerusalem—omitting Arabia; because, beginning with the Jews, his object was to mention first the places where his former hatred of the name of Christ was best known: the mention of the Gentiles, so unpalatable to his audience, is reserved to the last.

repent and return to God, and do works meet for repentance—a brief description of conversion and its proper fruits, suggested, probably, by the Baptist's teaching (Luke 3:7, 8).

ADAM CLARKE

From the power of Satan unto God. From the "authority" and domination of Satan; for as the kingdom of darkness is his kingdom, so those who live in this darkness are under his dominion, and he has authority and right over them.

And inheritance. By remission of sins, i.e., the removal of the guilt and pollution of sin, they become children of God; and, if children, then heirs. And as the inheritance is said to be among them which are sanctified, this is a further proof that aphesis hamartion signifies, not only the forgiveness of sins, but also the purification of the heart. By faith that is in me. By believing on Christ Jesus, as dying for their offenses and rising again for their justification. Thus we see not only that this salvation comes through Christ, but that it is to be received by faith; and consequently neither by the merit of works nor by that of suffering.

F. B. MEYER:

To us also the heavenly visions come. On our summer holidays, rising between us and some soaring Alp, or meeting us in our walk beside the gently breaking sea; on beds of pain and in chambers of watching; visions of the risen Lord; visions of his infinite grief and pain which we have caused; visions of the possibilities of our life as a minister and witness of the things which we have seen; visions of results far down the vista wherein dark souls should become light, slaves emancipated, the defiled saintly. Ah, visions of God! ye leave an indelible impression that molds and ennobles all afteryears! Pitiable the soul to which visions of a holier, sweeter life never come, or, if they come, are never seen.

The one important matter is our treatment of them. We may indolently refuse to follow the beckoning hand and obey the voice that calls. We may return to our evil courses and follow the devices and desires of our own hearts. We may cling to the prison cell, instead of following the angel that strikes us on our side and bids us go forth into freedom. And if so, like Balaam, we shall become spiritually blind and fail to see visions that the dumb creatures recognize, and that would fain arrest us in our perilous career.

On the other hand, if we will obey the vision, we shall not only retain the impression and feel its prolonged and enthralling power, but shall receive still further manifestations of the will of God. "A witness both of the thing wherein thou hast seen Me, and of the things wherein I will appear unto thee." To those who love and obey Him, He is ever drawing near with fresh and deeper thoughts of the Father.

—Great Verses Through the Bible

20. That they should repent. Be deeply humbled for their past iniquities, and turn to God as their Judge and Saviour, avoiding all idolatry and all sin, and thus do works meet for repentance; that is, show by their conduct that they had contrite hearts and that they sincerely sought salvation from God alone. For the meaning of the word repentance, see the note on Matt. iii. 2.

21. For these causes the Jews . . . went about to kill me. These causes may be reduced to four heads: (1) He had maintained the resurrection of the dead; (2) The resurrection of Christ, whom they had crucified and slain; (3) That this Jesus was the promised Messiah; (4) He had offered salvation to the Gentiles as well as to the Jews.

better place the better deed.

5. He had no help but from heaven (v. 22): "Having therefore obtained help of God, I continue unto this day. I have stood to what I said, and have not been afraid nor ashamed to persist in it." What was it that bore him up? Not any strength of his own resolutions, but having obtained help of God. He could not have gone on in it, but by help obtained of God. Those who are employed in work for God shall obtain help from God. Our continuance to this day must be attributed to help obtained of God. The preachers of the gospel could never have done as they did, if they had not had immediate help from heaven.

6. He preached no doctrine but what agreed with the scriptures of the Old Testament: He witnessed both to small and great. It was an evidence of the grace of the gospel that it was witnessed to the meanest, and the poor were welcome to the knowledge of it; and of the incontestable truth of it that it was neither afraid nor ashamed to show itself to the greatest. The enemies of Paul objected against him that he preached something more than that men should repent, and turn to God, and do works meet for repentance. Besides these, he had preached Christ, and his death, and his resurrection, and this was what they quarrelled with him for. "And so I did," says Paul, "and so I do, but therein also I say no other than that which Moses and the prophets said should come; and what greater honour can be done to them than to show that what they foretold is accomplished?" Three things they prophesied, and Paul preached: (1) That Christ should suffer, that the Messiah should be a sufferer. His ignominious death should be not only consistent with, but pursuant of, his undertaking. The cross of Christ was a stumbling-block to the Jews; but Paul stands to it that, in preaching that, he preached the fulfilling of the Old Testament predictions. (2) That he should be the first that should rise from the dead, that he should be the chief of the resurrection, the head, or principal one. He was the first that rose from the dead to die no more. (3) That he should show light unto the people, and to the Gentiles, to the people of the Jews in the first place. To them he showed light by himself, and then to the Gentiles by the ministry of his apostles. In this Paul refers to his commission (v. 18), To turn them from darkness to light. He rose from the dead on purpose that he might show light to the people. This also was foretold by the Old Testament prophets, that the Gentiles should be brought to the knowledge of God by the Messiah; and what was there in all this that the Jews could justly be displeased at?

Verses 24–32

We have reason to think that Paul had a great deal more to say. He had just fallen upon that which was the life of the cause—the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. Lead him but to this subject and he will never know when to conclude; for the power of Christ's death, and the fellowship of his sufferings, are with him inexhaustible subjects. It was a thousand pities then that he should be interrupted, and that, being permitted to speak for himself (v. 1), he should not be permitted to say all he designed.

I. Festus, the Roman governor, is of opinion that the poor man is crazed. He takes him to be a lunatic, a distracted man, that should be pitied, but at the same time should not be heeded. He thinks he has found out an expedient to excuse himself both from condemning Paul as a prisoner and from believing him as a preacher; for, if he be not compos mentis—in his senses, he is not to be either condemned or credited.

1. What it was that Festus said of him (v. 24): He said with a loud voice that he might oblige Paul to break off his discourse, and might divert the auditors from attending to it: "Paul, thou art beside thyself. Much learning hath made thee mad, thou hast cracked thy brains with studying." This he speaks, not so much in anger, as in scorn and contempt. He did not understand what Paul said; it was all a riddle to him, and therefore he imputes it all to a heated imagination. He owns Paul to be a scholar, and a man of learning. The apostles, who were fishermen, were despised because they had no learning; Paul who was a university-man, is despised as having too much learning. Thus the enemies of Christ's ministers will always have something or other to upbraid them with. He reproaches him as a madman. John Baptist and Christ were represented as having a devil, as being crazed. Festus put this invidious character upon him, which perhaps never a one in the company but himself thought of.

2. How Paul cleared himself from this invidious imputation. He denies the charge, protesting that --unto this day, witnessing . . .–i.e., This life of mine, so marvellously preserved, in spite of all the plots against it, is upheld for the Gospel's sake; therefore I "witnessed . . . ."

That Christ should suffer . . .–The construction of this sentence implies that in regard to the question 'whether the Messiah is a suffering one, and whether, rising first from the dead, he should show light to the (Jewish) people and to the Gentiles,' he had only said what the prophets and Moses said should come.

24. Festus said with a loud voice–surprised and bewildered. Paul, thou art beside thyself, much learning doth make thee mad–'is turning thy head.' The union of flowing Greek, deep acquaintance with the sacred writings of his nation, reference to a resurrection and other doctrines to a Roman utterly unintelligible, and, above all, lofty religious earnestness, so strange to the cultivated, cold-hearted skeptics of that day–may account for this sudden exclamation.

ALBERT BARNES:

"Witnessing." Bearing testimony to what he had seen, according to the command of Christ (v. 16). "To small." To those in humble life; to the poor, the ignorant, and the obscure. Like his Master, he did not despise them, but regarded it as his duty and privilege to preach the gospel to them. "And great." The rich and noble; to kings, princes, and governors. He had thus stood on Mars' Hill at Athens; he had declared the same gospel before Felix, Festus, and now before Agrippa. He offered salvation to all. He passed by none because they were poor; and he was not deterred by the fear of the rich and the great from making known their sins and calling them to repentance. What an admirable illustration of the proper duties of a minister of the gospel! "Saying none other thing." Delivering no new doctrine, but maintaining only that the prophecies had been fulfilled. As he had done this only, there was no reason for the opposition and persecution of the Jews. "Should come." Should come to pass, or should take place. Paul here evidently means to say that the doctrine of the atonement, and of the resurrection of Christ, is taught in the Old Testament. —Popular Commentary

23. That Christ should suffer. That "the Christ," or "Messiah," should suffer. This, though fully revealed in the prophets, the prejudices of the Jews would not permit them to receive. They expected their Messiah to be a glorious secular prince; and, to reconcile Isaiah 53 with their system, they formed the childish notion of two Messiahs—Messiah ben David, who should reign, conquer, and triumph; and Messiah ben Ephraim, who should suffer and be put to death. As the apostle says, he preached "none other things than those which the prophets and Moses did say should come"; therefore he understood that both Moses and the prophets spoke of the resurrection of Christ. That he should be the first that should rise from the dead. That is, that He should be the first who should rise from the dead so as to die no more; and to give, in His own person, the proof of the resurrection of the human body, no more to return under the empire of death. In no other sense can Jesus Christ be said to be the first that rose again from the dead, for Elisha raised the son of the Shunammite. A dead man, put into the sepulchre of the Prophet Elisha, was restored to life as soon as he touched the prophet's bones. Christ himself had raised the widow's son at Nain; and He had also raised Lazarus and several others. All these died again; but the human nature of our Lord was raised from the dead, and can die no more. Thus He was the first who rose again from the dead to return no more into the empire of death. And should shew light unto the people. Should give the true knowledge of the law and the prophets to the Jews, for these are meant by the term people, as in v. 17. And to the Gentiles, who had no revelation, and who sat in the valley of the shadow of death. That the Messiah should be the Light of both the Jews and the Gentiles, the prophets had clearly foretold. See Isa. lx. 1: "Arise, shine [or be illuminated]; for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee." And again, Isa. xlix. 6: "I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be my salvation unto the end of the earth." With such sayings as these Agrippa was well acquainted, from his education as a Jew.

24. Paul, thou art beside thyself. "Thou art mad, Paul!" "Thy great learning hath turned thee into a madman."

there was neither ground nor colour for it (v. 25): "I am not mad, most noble Festus. I do not ramble, but speak the words of truth and soberness." He gives him all possible respect, compliments him with his title of honour, most noble Festus, to teach us not to render railing for railing, but to speak civilly to those who speak slightly of us. He appeals to Agrippa concerning what he spoke (v. 26): For the king knows of these things. He therefore spoke freely before him, who knew something of them, and therefore would be willing to know more: For I am persuaded that none of these things are hidden from him. This thing was not done in a corner; all the country rang of it, and therefore it was unreasonable to censure him as a distracted man for relating it, much more for speaking of the death and resurrection of Christ, which was so universally spoken of. Agrippa could not be ignorant of it, and it was a shame for Festus that he was so.

II. Agrippa is so far from thinking him a madman that he thinks, he never heard a man talk more to the purpose.

1. Paul applies himself closely to Agrippa's conscience. He will speak to those who understand him, and whom he is likely to fasten something upon, and therefore still addresses Agrippa: "King Agrippa, believest thou the prophets?" He does not stay for an answer, but, in compliment to Agrippa, takes it for granted: I know that thou believest; for everyone knew that Agrippa professed the Jews' religion, and therefore both knew the writings of the prophets and gave credit to them. It is good dealing with those who have acquaintance with the scriptures and believe them; for such one has some hold of.

2. Agrippa owns there was a great deal of reason in what Paul said (v. 28): Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian. Some understand this as spoken ironically, Wouldest thou in so little a time persuade me to be a Christian? But, taking it so, it is an acknowledgment that Paul spoke very much to the purpose. Others take it as spoken seriously. He is as near being persuaded to believe in Christ as Felix, when he trembled, was to leave his sins. Many are almost persuaded to be religious who are not quite persuaded; they are under strong convictions, but yet are overruled by some external inducements, and do not pursue their convictions.

3. Paul concludes with a pious wish that all his hearers were Christians, and this wish turned into a prayer: I pray to God for it (v. 29). That not only thou but all that hear me this day were both almost, and altogether, such as I am, except these bonds. He professes his resolution to cleave to his religion. In wishing that they were all as he was, he does in effect declare against ever being as they were, how much soever it might be to his worldly advantage. He intimates his satisfaction not only in the truth, but in the benefit and advantage of Christianity. He could not wish better to the best friend he had in the world than to wish him a faithful zealous disciple of Jesus Christ. He intimates his trouble and concern that Agrippa went no further than being almost a Christian (what good would that do?). He intimates that it would be the unspeakable happiness of every one of them to become true Christians—that there is grace enough in Christ for all, be they ever so many. He intimates the hearty goodwill he bore to them all; he wishes them, (1) As well as he wished his own soul. (2) Better than he now was as to his outward condition. He wishes they might all be comforted Christians as he was, but not persecuted Christians as he was. When he wished them in bonds to Christ, he desired they might never be in bonds for Christ. Nothing could be said more tenderly nor with a better grace.

III. They all agree that Paul is an innocent man. The court broke up with some precipitation (v. 30): When he had spoken the king was afraid he would say something yet more moving. The king himself found his own heart begin to yield, and durst not trust himself to hear more, but, like Felix, dismissed Paul for this time. The king rose up, and the governor, and Bernice and those that sat with them. They all concurred in an opinion of Paul's innocency, v. 31. The court withdrew to consult, and they talked among themselves, all to the same purport, that this man does nothing worthy of death; nay, he does nothing worthy of bonds. Thus was he made manifest in the consciences of those who yet would not receive his doctrine; and the clamours of the hot-headed Jews, who cried out, Away with him, it is not fit he should live, were shamed by the moderate counsels of this court. Agrippa gave his judgment that he might have been set at liberty, if he had not himself appealed to Cæsar (v. 32), but by that appeal he had put a bar in his own door. Agrippa, who was but almost 25, 26. I am not mad, most noble Festus, but ... Can anything surpass this reply, for readiness, self-possession, calm dignity? Every word of it refuted the rude charge, though Festus, probably, did not intend to hurt the prisoner's feelings. the king knoweth ...—See on vss. 1-3.

27-29. believest thou the prophets? I know that thou believest—The courage and confidence here shown proceeded from a vivid persuasion of Agrippa's knowledge of the facts and faith in the predictions which they verified; and the king's reply is the highest testimony to the correctness of these presumptions and the immense power of such bold yet courteous appeals to conscience. Almost—or, 'in a little time'—thou persuadest me to be a Christian—Most modern interpreters think the ordinary translation inadmissible, and take the meaning to be, 'Thou thinkest to make me with little persuasion (or small trouble) a Christian—but I am not to be so easily turned. But the apostle's reply can scarcely suit any but the sense given in our authorized version, which is that adopted by CHRYSOSTOM and some of the best scholars since. The objection on which so much stress is laid, that the word "Christian" was at that time only a term of contempt, has no force except on the other side; for taking it in that view, the sense is, 'Thou wilt soon have me one of that despised sect.' I would to God ...—What unequalled magnanimity does this speech breathe! Only his Master ever towered above this. not only ... almost ... but altogether—or, 'whether soon or late,' or 'with little or much difficulty. except these bonds—doubtless holding up his two chained hands (see on ch. 12:6): which in closing such a noble utterance must have had an electrical effect.

30-32. when he had thus spoken, the king rose—not over-easy, we may be sure.

This man might have been set at liberty if he had not appealed to Cæsar—It would seem from this that such appeals, once made, behooved to be carried out.

ADAM CLARKE

25. I am not mad, most noble Festus. The title most noble, or "most excellent," which he gives to Festus, shows at once that he was far above indulging any sentiment of anger or displeasure at Festus, though he had called him a madman. "Most excellent" was merely a title which belonged to the office of Festus. Paul hereby acknowledges him as the governor. Speak forth the words of truth and soberness. Words of "truth and of mental soundness."

26. Before whom also I speak freely. This is a further judicious apology for himself and his discourse. As if he had said: Conscious that the king understands all these subjects well, being fully versed in the law and the prophets, I have used the utmost freedom of speech, and have mentioned the tenets of my religion in their own appropriate terms. This thing was not done in a corner. The preaching, miracles, passion, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ were most public and notorious; and of them Agrippa could not be ignorant. And indeed it appears from his own answer that he was not, but was now more fully persuaded of the truth than ever, and almost led to embrace Christianity.

27. Believest thou the prophets? Having made his elegant compliment and vindication to Festus, he turns to Agrippa; and with this strong appeal to his religious feeling, says, Believest thou the prophets?—and immediately anticipates his reply, and with great address speaks for him, I know that thou believest. The inference from this belief necessarily was: "As you believe the prophets, and I have proved that the prophets have spoken about Christ, as suffering and triumphing over death, and that all they say of the Messiah has been fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth, then you must acknowledge that my doctrine is true."

28. Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian. This declaration was almost the necessary consequence of the apostle's reasoning and Agrippa's faith. If he believed the prophets, see vv. 22-23, and believed that Paul's application of their words to Christ Jesus was correct, he must acknowledge the truth of the Christian religion; but he might choose whether he would embrace and confess this truth or not. However, the sudden appeal to his religious faith extorts from him the declaration, "Thou hast nearly persuaded me to embrace Christianity." How it could have entered into the mind of any man who carefully considered the circumstances of the case to suppose that these words of Agrippa are spoken ironically is to me unaccountable.

29. I would to God. So fully am I persuaded of the infinite excellence of Christianity and so truly happy am I in possession of it that "I most ardently wish that not only you, but this whole council, were not only almost, but altogether, such as I am, these chains excepted."

32. Then said Agrippa. The king himself, who had participated in the strongest emotions on the occasion, feels himself prompted to wish the apostle's immediate liberation; but this was now rendered impracticable because he had appealed to Caesar. The appeal was no doubt registered, and the business must now proceed to a full hearing. Bishop Pearce conjectures, with great persuaded to be a Christian, proves no better than if he had not been at all persuaded. And now I cannot tell whether Paul repented of his having appealed to Cæsar, now he saw that was the only thing that hindered his discharge. What we think is for our welfare often proves to be a trap; such short-sighted creatures are we. Or whether, notwithstanding this, he was satisfied in what he had done, and believed there was a providence in it, and it would issue well at last. And besides, he was told in a vision that he must bear witness at Rome, c. xxiii. 11. And it is all one to him whether he goes thither a prisoner or at his liberty.

I. How Paul was shipped off for Italy: a long voyage, but there is no remedy. He has appealed to Cæsar, and to Cæsar he must go: It was determined that we should sail into Italy. It was determined by the counsel of God, before it was determined by the council of Festus, that Paul should go to Rome; for God had work for him to do there. Whose custody he was committed to—to one named Julius, a centurion of Augustus's band. He had soldiers under him, who were a guard upon Paul. What bottom he embarked in: they went on board a ship of Adramyttium (v. 2), a sea-port of Africa. What company he had in this voyage; there were some prisoners who were committed to the custody of the same centurion. Paul was linked with these, as Christ with the thieves that were crucified with him, and was obliged to take his lot with them in this voyage; and we find (v. 42) that for their sakes he had like to have been killed, but for his sake they were preserved. But he had also some of his friends with him, Luke particularly, for he puts himself in all along, We sailed into Italy, and, We launched, v. 2. Aristarchus a Thessalonian, is particularly named, as being now in his company. It was a comfort to Paul to have the society of some of his friends in this tedious voyage. Those that go long voyages at sea have need of wisdom, that they may do good to the bad company they are in, may make them better, or at least be made never the worse by them.

II. What course they steered, and what places they touched at. They touched at Sidon, thither they came the next day. Julius the centurion was extraordinarily civil to Paul. It is probable that he was one of the chief captains, or principal men, that heard him plead his own cause before Agrippa (ch. xxv. 23), and was convinced of his innocency. Though Paul was committed to him as a prisoner, he treated him as a friend, as a gentleman. He gave him liberty to go among his friends to refresh himself. Julius herein gives an example to those in power to be respectful to those whom they find worthy of their respect. God herein encourages those that suffer for him to trust in him; for he can put it into the hearts of those to befriend them from whom they least expect it. And it is likewise an instance of Paul's fidelity. He did not go about to make his escape. If the centurion is so civil as to take his word, he is so just and honest as to keep his word. They thence sailed under Cyprus, v. 4. If the wind had been fair, they had left Cyprus on the right hand; but, the wind not favouring them, they were driven to sailing with a side wind, and left it on the left hand. Sailors must do as they can, when they cannot do as they would, and make the best of their wind, whatever point it is in; so must we all in our passage over the ocean of this world. At a port called Myra they changed their ship. They went on board a vessel of Alexandria bound for Italy, v. 5, 6. Great trading there was between that city and Italy; from Alexandria they carried corn to Rome, and the East-India goods and Persian which they imported at the Red Sea they exported again, especially to Italy. And it was a particular favour shown to the Alexandrian ships in the ports of Italy that they were not obliged to strike sail, when they came into port. With much ado they made The Fair Havens, a port of the island of Crete, v. 7, 8. They sailed slowly many days. It was a great while before they made the point of Cnidus, and were forced to sail under Crete, as before under Cyprus; much difficulty they met with in passing by Salmone, a promontory on the eastern shore of the island of Crete. Though the voyage hitherto was not tempestuous, yet it was very tedious. Thus many that are not driven backward in their affairs by cross providences, yet sail slowly, and do not get forward by favourable providences. The place they came to was called The Fair Havens. It is known to this day by the same name, and answers the name from the pleasantness

Vss. 1-44. THE VOYAGE TO ITALY—THE SHIPWRECK AND SAFE LANDING AT MALTA. 1. we should sail . . .—The "we" here reintroduces the historian as one of the company. Not that he had left the apostle from the time when he last included himself—ch. 21:18—but the apostle was parted from him by his arrest and imprisonment, until now, when they met in the ship. delivered Paul and certain other prisoners—State prisoners going to be tried at Rome; of which several instances are on record. Julius—who treats the apostle throughout with such marked courtesy (vss. 3, 43; ch. 28:16), that it has been thought [BENGEL] he was present when Paul made his defense before Agrippa (see ch. 25:23), and was impressed with his lofty bearing. a centurion of Augustus' band—the Augustan cohort, an honorary title given to more than one legion of the Roman army, implying, perhaps, that they acted as a bodyguard to the emperor or procurator, as occasion required. 2. a ship of—belonging to—Adramyttium—a port on the northeast coast of the Ægean Sea. Doubtless the centurion expected to find another ship, bound for Italy, at some of the ports of Asia Minor, without having to go with this ship all the way to Adramyttium; and in this he was not disappointed. See on vs. 6. meaning to sail by the coasts—'places'—of Asia—a coasting vessel, which was to touch at the ports of proconsular Asia. [one] Aristarchus, a Macedonian of Thessalonica, being with us—rather, 'Aristarchus the Macedonian . . .' The word "one" should not have been introduced here by our translators, as if this name had not occurred before; for we find him seized by the Ephesian mob as a "man of Macedonia and Paul's companion in travel" (ch. 19:29) and as a "Thessalonian" accompanying the apostle from Ephesus on his voyage back to Palestine (ch. 20:4). Here both these places are mentioned in connection with his name. After this we find him at Rome with the apostle (Col. 4:10; Philemon 24). 3. next day we touched at Sidon—To reach this ancient and celebrated Mediterranean port, about seventy miles north from Cæsarea, in one day, they must have had a fair wind. Julius courteously—(see on vs. 1)—gave him liberty to go to his friends—no doubt disciples, gained, it would seem, by degrees, all along the Phœnician coast since the first preaching there (see on ch. 11:19; and 21:4). to refresh himself—which after his long confinement would not be unnecessary. Such small personal details are in this case extremely interesting. 4. when we had launched—'set sail'—from thence, we sailed under Cyprus, because the winds were contrary—The wind blowing from the westward, probably with a touch of the north, which was adverse, they sailed under the lee of Cyprus, keeping it on their left, and steering between it and the mainland of Phœnicia. 5. when we had sailed over the Sea of Cilicia and Pamphylia—coasts with which Paul had been long familiar, the one, perhaps, from boyhood, the other from the time of his first missionary tour—we came to Myra, a city of Lycia—a port a little east of Patara (see on ch. 21:1). 6. there . . . found a ship of Alexandria, sailing into Italy, and he put us therein—(See on vs. 2). As Egypt was the granary of Italy, and this vessel was laden with wheat (vs. 35), we need not wonder it was large enough to carry 276 souls, passengers and crew together (vs. 37). Besides, the Egyptian merchantmen, among the largest in the Mediterranean, were equal to the largest merchantmen in our day. It may seem strange that on their passage from Alexandria to Italy they should be found at a Lycian port. But even still it is not unusual to stand to the north towards Asia Minor, for the sake of the current. 7. sailed slowly many days—owing to contrary winds—and scarce—'with difficulty'—were come over against Cnidus—a town on the promontory of the peninsula of that name, hav-probability, that Agrippa, on his return to Rome, represented Paul's case so favorably to the emperor, or his ministers of state, that he was soon set at liberty there, as may be concluded from chap. xxviii. 30, that he dwelt two whole years in his own hired place. And to the same cause it seems to have been owing that Julius, who had the care of Paul as a prisoner in the ship, treated him courteously; see chap. xxvii. 3, 43. And the same may be gathered from chap. xxviii. 14, 16. So that this defense of the apostle before Agrippa, Bernice, and Festus was ultimately serviceable to his important cause.

1. And when it was determined. That is, when the governor had given orders to carry Paul to Rome, according to his appeal, together with other prisoners who were bound for the same place. We should sail. By this it is evident that Luke was with Paul, and it is on this account that he was enabled to give such a circumstantial account of the voyage. Julius, a centurion of Augustus' band. Lipsius has found the name of this cohort on an ancient marble; see Lips. in Tacit. Hist., l. ii. The same cohort is mentioned by Suetonius in his life of Nero, 20.

2. A ship of Adramyttium. There were several places of this name; and in different MSS. the name is variously written. The port in question appears to have been a place in Mysia, in Asia Minor. Aristarchus, a Macedonian. We have seen this person with Paul at Ephesus, during the disturbances there, chap. xix. 29, where he had been seized by the mob and was in great personal danger. He afterwards attended Paul to Macedonia, and returned with him to Asia, chap. xx. 4. Now, accompanying him to Rome, he was there a fellow prisoner with him, Col. iv. 10, and is mentioned in Paul's Epistle to Philemon, v. 24, who was probably their common friend. Luke and Aristarchus were certainly not prisoners at this time, and seem to have gone with Paul merely as his companions, through affection to him, and love for the cause of Christianity. How Aristarchus became his fellow prisoner, as is stated in Col. iv. 10. we cannot tell, but it could not have been at this time.

6. A ship of Alexandria. It appears, from v. 38, that this ship was laden with wheat, which she was carrying from Alexandria to Rome. We know that the Romans imported much corn from Egypt, together with different articles of Persian and Indian merchandise.

7. Sailed slowly many days. Partly because the wind was contrary and partly because the vessel was heavy-laden. Over against Cnidus. This was a city or promontory of Asia, opposite of its situation and prospect. It was not the harbour they were bound for; it was a fair haven, but it was not their haven. It was not a commodious haven to winter in, v. 12. Every fair haven is not a safe haven; nay, there may be most danger where there is most pleasure.

III. What advice Paul gave them—it was to be content to winter where they were. They had lost a deal of time while they were struggling with contrary winds. Sailing was now dangerous, because the fast was already past, that is, the famous yearly fast of the Jews, the day of atonement, which was on the tenth day of the seventh month; it was about the 20th of our September. But (which is strange) we never have any mention made in all the scripture history of the observance of it, unless it be meant here, where it serves only to describe the season of the year. Michaelmas is reckoned by mariners as bad a time of the year to be at sea in as any other. Paul put them in mind of it, and gave them notice of their danger (v. 10): "I perceive that this voyage will be with hurt and damage." There were some good men in the ship, and many more bad men: but in things of this nature all things come alike to all. If both be in the same ship, they both are in the same danger. They would not be advised by Paul in this matter, v. 11. They thought him impertinent in interposing in an affair of this nature, and the centurion to whom it was referred to determine it, takes upon him to overrule. The centurion gave more regard to the opinion of the master and owner of the ship than to Paul's; for every man is to be credited in his own profession. The centurion was very civil to Paul (v. 3), and yet would not be governed by his advice.

Verses 12–20

I. The ship putting to sea again, at first with a promising gale. What induced them to leave the fair havens: it was because they thought the harbour not commodious to winter in. They ran upon a mischief to avoid an inconvenience, as we often do. Some of the ship's crew were for staying there. It is better to be safe in an incommodious harbour than to be lost in a tempestuous sea. But they were outvoted, and the greater part advised to depart thence also; yet they aimed not to go far, but only to another port of the same island, here called Phenice. It is here described to lie towards the south-west and north-west. Probably the haven was between two promontories, one of which pointed to the north-west and the other to the south-west, by which it was guarded against the east winds. In vain had nature provided for us the waters to sail on, if it had not likewise provided for us natural harbours to take shelter in. What encouragement they had at first to pursue their voyage. They set out with a fair wind (v. 13), the south wind blew softly, upon which they flattered themselves with hope that they should gain their point, and so they sailed close by the coast of Crete. Those who put to sea with ever so fair a gale know not what storms they may yet meet with, and therefore must not be secure.

II. The ship in a storm presently, a dreadful storm. They imagined that because the south wind now blew softly it would always blow so; in confidence of this, they ventured to sea, but were soon made sensible of their folly in giving more credit to a smiling wind than to the word of God in Paul's mouth.

1. What their danger and distress was. There arose against them a tempestuous wind. This wind the sailors called Euroclydon, a north-east wind, which upon those seas was in a particular manner troublesome and dangerous. The ship was exceedingly tossed (v. 18); it was kicked like a football from wave to wave. The ship could not possibly bear up into the wind, and therefore they folded up their sails, which in such a storm would endanger them rather than do them any service, and so let the ship drive. It is probable that they were very near the haven of Phenice, and thought they should presently be in a quiet haven, and lo, of a sudden, they are in this distress. The use of the loadstone for the direction of sailors not being then found out (so that they had no guide at all, when they could see neither sun nor stars) made the case the more hazardous. Thus melancholy sometimes is the condition of the people of God upon a spiritual account. Thus it may be with them, and yet light is sown for them. They had abundance of winter-weather: No small tempest, so that they were ready to perish for cold; and all this continued many days. See what hardships those often undergo who are much at sea, besides the hazards of life they run; and yet to get gain there are still those who make nothing of all this; and it is an instance of divine Providence that it disposes some to this employment, notwithstanding the difficulties that attend ing the island of Coos (see on ch. 21:1) to the west of it. But for the contrary wind they might have made the distance from Myra (130 miles) in one day. They would naturally have put in at Cnidus, whose larger harbor was admirable, but the strong westerly current induced them to run south. under—the lee of—Crete—See on Titus 1:5. over against Salmone—the cape at the eastern extremity of the island. 8. And hardly passing it—'with difficulty coasting along it,' from the same cause as before, the westerly current and head winds. came to . . . the Fair Havens—an anchorage near the center of the south coast, and a little east of Cape Matala, the southern most point of the island. nigh whereunto was the city Lasea—identified by the REV. GEORGE BROWN [SMITH'S Voyages and Shipwreck of St. Paul, App. iii., 2d Ed., 1856. To this invaluable book commentators on this chapter, and these notes, are much indebted]. 9, 10. when much time was spent—since leaving Cæsarea. But for unforeseen delays they might have reached the Italian coast before the stormy season. and when sailing—the navigation of the open sea—was now dangerous, because the fast was now . . . past—that of the day of atonement, answering to the end of September and beginning of October, about which time the navigation is pronounced unsafe by writers of authority. Since all hope of completing the voyage during that season was abandoned, the question next was, whether they should winter at Fair Havens, or move to Port Phenice, a harbor about forty miles to the westward. Paul assisted at the consultation and strongly urged them to winter where they were. Sirs, I perceive, that this voyage will be with hurt and much damage . . .—not by any divine communication, but simply in the exercise of a good judgment aided by some experience. The event justified his decision. 11. Nevertheless the centurion believed the master and owner . . . more than . . . Paul—He would naturally think them best able to judge, and there was much to say for their opinion, as the bay at Fair Havens, being open to nearly one-half of the compass, could not be a good winter harbor. 12. Phenice—'Phenix,' now called Lutro—which lieth toward the southwest and northwest—If this means that it was open to the west, it would certainly not be good anchorage. It is thought therefore to mean that a wind from that quarter would lead into it, or that it lay in an easterly direction from such a wind [SMITH]. The next verse seems to confirm this.

13. when the south wind blew softly, supposing they had attained their purpose—With such a wind they had every prospect of reaching their destination in a few hours.

14, 15. a tempestuous—'typhonic'—wind—i.e., like a typhon or tornado, causing a whirling of the clouds, owing to the meeting of opposite currents of air. called Euroclydon—The true reading appears to be Euro-aquilo, or east-northeast, which answers all the effects here ascribed to it. could not bear up into—'face'—the wind, we let her drift—before the gale.

to Crete, at one corner of the peninsula of Caria. Some think that this was an island between Crete and a promontory of the same name.

8. The fair havens. This port still remains, and is known by the same name; it was situated towards the northern extremity of the island.

9. Sailing was now dangerous, because the fast was now already past. It is generally allowed that the fast mentioned here was that of the great Day of Atonement, which was always celebrated on the tenth day of the seventh month, which would answer to the latter end of our September; see Lev. xvi. 29; xxiii. 27, etc. As this was about the time of the autumnal equinox, when the Mediterranean Sea was sufficiently tempestuous, we may suppose this feast alone to be intended. To sail after this feast was proverbially dangerous among the ancient Jews.

10. I perceive that this voyage will be with hurt. Paul might either have had this intimation from the Spirit of God or from his own knowledge of the state of this sea after the autumnal equinox, and therefore gave them this prudent warning.

11. The centurion believed the master. The "pilot"; and the owner of the ship, the "captain" and "proprietor." This latter had the command of the ship and the crew; the pilot had the guidance of the vessel along those dangerous coasts, under the direction of the captain; and the centurion had the power to cause them to proceed on their voyage or to go into port, as he pleased, as he had other state prisoners on board and probably the ship itself was freighted for government. Paul told them, if they proceeded, they would be in danger of shipwreck. The pilot and captain said there was no danger; and the centurion, believing them, commanded the vessel to proceed on her voyage.

12. Might attain to Phenice. It appears that the Fair Havens were at the eastern end of the island, and they wished to reach Phoenice, which lay farther towards the west. Toward the south west and north west. The libs certainly means the southwest, called libs, from Libya, from which it blows towards the Aegean Sea. The chorus means a northwest wind.

13. When the south wind blew softly. Though this wind was not very favorable, yet because it blew softly they supposed they might be able to make their passage. They sailed close by Crete. Kept as near the coast as they could.

14. A tempestuous wind, called Euroclydon. The reading of the Codex Alexandrinus is eurakylon, the "northeast" wind, which is the same with the euro-aquilo of the Vulgate.

15. And when the ship was caught. The ship was violently hurried away before this strong levanter; so that it was impossible for her to "face the wind," to "turn her prow to it," so as to shake it out, as I have heard sailors say, and have seen them successfully perform in violent tempests and squalls. We let her drive. We were obliged to let her go right before this tempestuous wind, whithersoever it might drive her.

MATTHEW HENRY

it. Perhaps Christ therefore chose ministers from among seafaring men, because they had been used to endure hardness.

2. What means they used for their own relief. When they could not make head against the wind, they let the ship run adrift. When it is fruitless to struggle, it is wisdom to yield. They nevertheless did what they could to avoid the present danger; there was a little island called Clauda. They took care to prevent their shipwreck, and therefore so ordered their matters that they did not run against the island, but quietly ran under it, v. 16. When they were afraid they should scarcely save the ship, they were busy to save the boat. They had much work to come by the boat (v. 16), but at last they took it up, v. 17. They used means which were proper enough in those times; they undergirded the ship, v. 17. They bound the ship under the bottom of it with strong cables, to keep it from bulging in the extremity of the tempest. For fear of falling into the quicksands they struck sail, and then let the ship go as it would. It is strange how a ship will live at sea (so they express it), even in very stormy weather, if it have but sea-room. The next day they lightened the ship of its cargo, threw the goods and merchandise overboard. See what the wealth of this world is; the time may come when it will be a burden, not only too heavy to be carried safe of itself, but heavy enough to sink him that has it. But see the folly of the children of this world, they can be thus prodigal of their goods when it is for the saving of their lives, and yet how sparing of them in works of piety and charity, and in suffering for Christ. Any man will rather make shipwreck of his goods than of his life; but many will rather make shipwreck of faith and a good conscience than of their goods. The third day they cast out the tacklings of the ship.

3. The despair which at last they were brought to (v. 20): All hope that we should be saved was then taken away. The storm continued, and they saw no symptoms of its abatement. The means they had used were ineffectual, so that they were at their wits' end; and they had no heart either to eat or drink. They had provision enough on board (v. 38), but such bondage were they under, through fear of death, that they could not admit the supports of life.

We have here the issue of the distress of Paul and his fellow-travellers; they escaped with their lives and that was all. We are here told (v. 37) what number there were on board—in all two hundred and seventy-six souls, and one Paul among them worth more than all the rest. We left them in despair, giving up themselves for gone. Paul among these seamen was not, like Jonah, the cause of the storm, but the comforter in the storm.

I. The encouragement Paul gave them, by assuring them that their lives should all be saved. Paul rescued them from their despair first, that they might not die of that, and then they were in a fair way to be rescued from their distress. After long abstinence, Paul stood forth in the midst of them. During the distress hitherto Paul was one of the crowd, helping with the rest to throw out the tackling (v. 19), but now though a prisoner, he undertook to be their counsellor and comforter.

1. He reproves them for not taking his advice (v. 8): "You should have hearkened to me and not have loosed from Crete, and then we should not have gained this harm and loss." They did not hearken to Paul when he warned them of their danger, and yet he will speak comfort and relief to them now that they are in danger, so compassionate is God to those that are in misery, though they bring themselves into it by their own wilfulness. Paul, before administering comfort, will first make them sensible of their sin in not hearkening to him. That which they are blamed for is their loosing from Crete, where they were safe. Most people bring themselves into inconvenience, because they do not know when they are well off, by aiming against advice to better themselves.

2. He assures them that though they should lose the ship yet they should none of them lose their lives. "Your case is sad, but it is not desperate, now, I exhort you to be of good cheer." Thus we say to sinners that are convinced of their sin and folly, "You should have hearkened unto us, and should have had nothing to do with sin; yet now we exhort you to be of good cheer: though you would not take our advice when we said, Do not presume, yet take it now when we say, Do not despair." They would use no further means, because all hope that they should be saved was taken away. Now Paul quickens them to bestir themselves. If they would resume their vigour they should secure their lives. They must Clauda—southwest of Crete, now called Gonzo; about twenty-three miles to leeward. we had much work to come by—i.e., to hoist up and secure—the boat—now become necessary. But why was this difficult? Independently of the gale, raging at the time, the boat had been towed between twenty and thirty miles after the gale sprang up, and could scarcely fail to be filled with water [SMITH]. undergirding the ship—i.e., passing four or five turns of a cable-laid rope round the hull or frame of the ship, to enable her to resist the violence of the seas, an operation rarely resorted to in modern seamanship. fearing lest they should fall into the quicksands–'be cast ashore' or 'stranded upon the Syrtis,' the Syrtis Major, a gulf on the African coast, southwest of Crete, the dread of mariners, owing to its dangerous shoals. they strake–'struck'–sail–This cannot be the meaning, for to strike sail would have driven them directly towards the Syrtis. The meaning must be, 'lowered the gear' (appurtenances of every kind); here, perhaps, referring to the lowering of the heavy mainyard with the sail attached to it [SMITH]. 18-20. cast out with our own hands—passengers and crew together—the tackling of the ship—whatever they could do without that carried weight. This further effort to lighten the ship seems to show that it was now in a leaking condition, as will presently appear more evident. neither sun nor stars appeared in many—'several'—days—probably most of the fourteen days mentioned in vs. 27. This continued thickness of the atmosphere prevented their making the necessary observations of the heavenly bodies by day or by night; so that they could not tell where they were. all hope that we should be saved was taken away—"Their exertions to subdue the leak had been unavailing; they could not tell which way to make for the nearest land, in order to run their ship ashore, the only resource for a sinking ship: but unless they did make the land, they must founder at sea. Their apprehensions, therefore, were not so much caused by the fury of the tempest, as by the state of the ship" [SMITH]. From the inferiority of ancient to modern naval architecture, leaks were sprung much more easily, and the means of repairing them were fewer than now. Hence the far greater number of shipwrecks from this cause.

21-26. But after long abstinence—See on vs. 33. "The hardships which the crew endured during a gale of such continuance, and their exhaustion from laboring at the pumps and hunger, may be imagined, but are not described" [SMITH] Paul stood forth in the midst of them, and said, Sirs, ye should have hearkened to me . . .—not meaning to reflect on them for the past, but to claim their confidence for what he was now to say . . . .

16. A certain island . . . called Clauda. Called also Gaudos; situated at the southwestern extremity of the island of Crete. Much work to come by the boat. It was likely to have been washed overboard; or if the boat was in tow, at the stern of the vessel, which is probable, they found it very difficult to save it from being staved or broken to pieces.

17. Undergirding the ship. This method has been used even in modern times. It is called frapping the ship. A stout cable is slipped under the vessel at the prow, which they can conduct to any part of the ship's keel and then fasten the two ends on the deck, to keep the planks from starting; as many rounds as they please may be thus taken about the vessel. The quicksands. "Into the syrt." There were two famous Syrts, or quicksands, on the African coast: one called the syrtis major, lying near the coast of Cyrene; and the other, the syrtis minor, not far from Tripoli. Both these were proverbial for their multitude of shipwrecks.

18. Lightened the ship. Of what, we know not; but it was probably cumbrous wares, by which the deck was thronged, and which were prejudicial to the due trim of the vessel.

19. The tackling of the ship. All supernumerary anchors, cables, baggage, etc.

20. Neither sun nor stars in many days appeared. And consequently they could make no observation; and, having no magnetical needle, could not tell in what direction they were going.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

That was the last attempt to save themselves, and after it there was nothing to do but to wait the apparently inevitable hour when they would all go down together. Idleness feeds despair, and despair nourishes idleness. Food was scarce, cooking it was impossible, appetite there was none. The doomed men spent the long idle days—which were scarcely days, so thick was the air with mist and foam and tempest—crouching anywhere for shelter, wet, tired, hungry, and hopeless. So they drifted "for many days," almost losing count of the length of time they had been thus. It was a gloomy company, but there was one man there in whom the lamp of hope burned when it had gone out in all others. Sun and stars were hidden, but Paul saw a better light, and his sky was clear and calm.

count upon the loss of the ship. Their ship shall be wrecked. Not a life shall be lost. This would be good news to those that were ready to die for fear of dying.

3. He tells them what ground he had for this assurance, he has a divine revelation for it. An angel of God appeared to him in the night, and told him that for his sake they should all be preserved (v. 23–25). They should have it not only by providence, but by promise, and as a particular favour to Paul.

(1) The solemn profession Paul makes of relation to God. It is he whose I am, and whom I serve. He looks upon God, as his rightful owner, who has a sovereign incontestable title to him, and dominion over him: Whose I am. We are more his than our own. As his sovereign ruler and master, who has right to give him law: Whom I serve. Because his we are, therefore we are bound to serve him. He does not say, "Whose we are, and whom we serve," for most that were present were strangers to him. This he tells the company, that they might thereby be drawn in to take him for their God, and to serve him likewise.

(2) The account he gives of the vision he had: There stood by me this night an angel of God. Though he was afar off upon the sea (Ps. lxv. 5), yet this could not intercept his communion with God. Thence he can direct a prayer to God, and thither God can direct an angel to him. The ship is tossed with winds and waves, and yet the angel finds a way into it. No storms nor tempests can hinder the communications of God's favour to his people, for he is a very present help. We may suppose that Paul, being a prisoner, had not a cabin of his own in the ship, but was put down into the hold (any dark or dirty place was thought good enough for him in common with the rest of the prisoners), and yet there the angel of God stood by him. Meanness and poverty set none at a distance from God and his favour. Paul had this vision but this last night. He has this fresh vision to assure him of the safety of those with him.

(3) The encouragements that were given him in the vision, v. 14. [1] He is forbidden to fear. Though all about him are at their wits' end, and lost in despair, yet, Fear not, Paul. Let not the saints be afraid, no, not at sea, in a storm; for the Lord of hosts is with them. [2] He is assured that he shall come safely to Rome: Thou must be brought before Cæsar. The rage of the most stormy sea, cannot prevail against God's witnesses till they have finished their testimony. This is comfortable for the faithful servants of God in straits and difficulties, that as long as God has any work for them to do their lives shall be prolonged. [3] For his sake all that were in the ship with him should be delivered too: God hath given thee all those that sail with thee. God chooses by preserving them all for his sake, to show what great blessings good men are to the world. Paul here delivers a whole ship's crew, almost three hundred souls. God often spares wicked people for the sake of the godly. The good people are hated and persecuted in the world as if they were not worthy to live in it, yet really it is for their sakes that the world stands. It was a great favour to Paul, and he looked upon it to be so, that others were saved for his sake: They are given thee. There is no greater satisfaction to a good man than to know that he is a public blessing.

4. He comforts them (v. 25): "Wherefore, sirs, be of good cheer, for I believe God, that it shall be even as it was told me." He would not require them to give credit to that to which he did not himself give credit; and therefore solemnly professes that he believes it himself. And shall it be as God hath said? Then be of good cheer, be of good courage. If with God saying and doing are not two things, then with us believing and enjoying should not be.

5. He gives them a sign, telling them particularly what this tempestuous voyage would issue in (v. 26): "We must be cast upon a certain island, and that will both break the ship and save the passengers." Providence undertakes to bring them to an island that shall be a refuge for them.

II. Their coming at length to an anchor upon an unknown shore, v. 27–29. They had been a full fortnight in the storm, continually expecting death: The fourteenth night they came near land; they were that night driven up and down in Adria, in the Adriatic Sea, a part of the Mediterranean, extending to the African shore; and knew not whereabouts they were. About midnight the mariners apprehended that they drew near to some shore. To try whether it was so or no, they sounded; the water would be shallower as they drew near to shore; by the first experiment they found they drew twenty fathoms deep of water, and by the next fifteen fathoms, which was a demonstration that they were near some shore. They took the hint, and, fearing rocks near the shore, they cast anchor, and wished for the day. When they had saying, Fear not, Paul: thou must be brought before Cæsar and, lo, God hath given thee all . . . that sail with thee—While the crew were toiling at the pumps, Paul was wrestling in prayer, not for himself only and the cause in which he was going a prisoner to Rome, but with true magnanimity of soul for all his shipmates; and God heard him, "giving him" (remarkable expression!) all that sailed with him. "When the cheerless day came he gathered the sailors (and passengers) around him on the deck of the laboring vessel, and raising his voice above the storm" [HOWS], reported the divine communication he had received; adding with a noble simplicity, "for I believe God that it shall be even as it was told me," and encouraging all on board to "be of good cheer" in the same confidence. What a contrast to this is the speech of Cæsar in similar circumstances to his pilot, bidding him keep up his spirit because he carried Cæsar and Cæsar's fortune! [PLUTARCH.] The Roman general knew no better name for the Divine Providence, by which he had been so often preserved, than Cæsar's fortune [HUMPHRY]. From the explicit particulars—that the ship would be lost, but not one that sailed in it, and that they "must be cast on a certain island"—one would conclude a visional representation of a total wreck, a mass of human beings struggling with the angry elements, and one and all of those whose figures and countenances had daily met his eye on deck, standing on some unknown island shore. From what follows, it would seem that Paul from this time was regarded with a deference akin to awe. 27-29. when the fourteenth night was come—from the time they left Fair Havens—as we were driven—drifting—up and down in Adria—the Adriatic, that sea which lies between Greece and Italy. about midnight the shipmen deemed—no doubt from the peculiar sound of the breakers—that they drew near some country—'that some land was approaching them.' This nautical language gives a graphic character to the narrative. they cast four anchors out of the stern—The ordinary way was to cast the anchor, as now, from the bow: but ancient ships, built with both ends alike, were fitted with hawseholes in the stern, so that in case of need they could anchor either way. And when the fear was, as here, that they might fall on the rocks to leeward, and the intention was to run the ship ashore as soon as daylight enabled them to fix upon a safe spot, the very best thing they could do was to anchor by the stern [SMITH]. In stormy weather two anchors were used, and we have instances of four being employed, as here. and wished—'anxiously' or 'devoutly wished'—for day—the remark this of one

22. There shall be no loss of . . . life. That must be joyous news to those from whom "all hope that we should be saved was . . . taken away," v. 20.

F. B. MEYER:

Yes, the angels of God can find their way through the murkiest air, and alight on the most weather-beaten vessel that ever ploughed its difficult way through the stormy seas. Wheresoever thou art, O child of God, God's angels have their eyes fixed lovingly on thee; and in a moment, if it were God's will to give thee eyes, thou wouldest behold them.

But if, like Paul, we would have the angel ministry, with their assurances against fear, like him we must be able to comply with two conditions—of being owned and being loyal.

Whose I am. We are his by creation, by purchase, by consecration. That sentiment of being owned, which in the case of slaves is inimical to the highest development, is the elementary condition of our truest growth and well-being. We belong to One who is infinitely worthy. We cannot do as we would with ourselves. We may not take our own course.

Whom I serve. The word rendered serve is the deepest and most expressive term that Paul could employ of the prostration of the soul at the feet of God. It is employed of the glorified, who serve him day and night in his temple, and of whom it is said that his servants shall do him service. The heavenly life begins here; and following its course, angels minister to us, and the stars in their courses fight for us.

26. We must be cast upon a certain island. The angel which gave him this information did not tell him the name of the island. It turned out to be Melita, on which, by the violence of the storm, they were wrecked some days after.

28. And sounded. "Heaving the lead." Twenty fathoms. About forty yards in depth.

29. Cast four anchors out of the stern. By this time the storm must have been considerably abated, though the agitation of the sea could not have subsided much. The anchors were cast out of the stern to prevent the vessel from drifting ashore, as they found that, the farther they stood in, the shallower the water grew; therefore they dropped the anchor astern, as even one ship's length might be of much consequence.

MATTHEW HENRY

light, there was no land to be seen. Now they had no light to see by; no marvel then they wished for day. When those that fear God walk in darkness, and have no light, let them do as these mariners did, cast anchor, and wish for the day, and be assured that the day will dawn.

III. The defeating of the sailors' attempt to quit the ship. 1. The treacherous design of the seamen, and that was to leave the sinking ship (v. 30): They were about to flee out of the ship, and to save themselves, and leave all the rest to perish. They pretended they would cast anchors out of the fore-ship, and in order to this they let down the boat, and were going into it. Paul had, in God's name, assured them that they should come safely to land, but they will rather trust their own refuge of lies than God's word and truth. 2. Paul's discovery of it, v. 31. Paul saw through it, and gave notice to the centurion and the soldiers concerning it, and told them plainly, Except these abide in the ship, you cannot be saved. Now the greatest difficulty of all was before them, and therefore the seamen were now more necessary than ever yet. Now that they are near land, they must use their art to bring the ship to it. When God has done that for us which we could not, we must then in his strength help ourselves. God, who appointed the end, that they should be saved, appointed the means, that they should be saved by the help of these seamen. Duty is ours, events are God's; and we do not trust God, but tempt him, when we do not use proper means, such as are within our power, for our own preservation. 3. The effectual defeat of it by the soldiers, v. 32. It was no time to stand arguing the case with the seamen, and therefore they made no more ado, but cut the ropes of the boat to let it fall off. And now the seamen, being forced to stay in the ship, are forced likewise to work for the safety of the ship, because if the rest perish they must perish with them.

IV. The new life which Paul put into the company. Happy they who had such a one as Paul in their company. The day was coming on. The dawning of the day revived them a little, and then Paul got them together. He chid them for their neglect of themselves: This is the fourteenth day that you have tarried, and continued fasting, having taken nothing, v. 33. They ate very little, next to nothing. "You have continued fasting, that is, you have lost your stomach; you have had no appetite at all to your food, nor any relish of it, through prevailing fear and despair." What folly it is to die for fear of dying! He courts them to their food (v. 34): "Wherefore I pray you to take some meat. We have a hard struggle before us; if our bodies be weak through fasting, we shall not be able to help ourselves." Paul will have these people eat, or otherwise the waves will be too hard for them: I pray you take some nourishment; for this is for your health, or rather your preservation, or safety, at this time. You cannot without nourishment have strength to shift for your lives. As he that will not labour, let him not eat; so he that means to labour must eat. Weak and trembling Christians, that give way to doubts and fears, continue fasting from the Lord's supper, and fasting from divine consolations, and then complain they cannot go on in their spiritual work: and it is owing to themselves. If they would feed and feast as they ought, they would be strengthened, and it would be for their souls' health and salvation. He assured them of their preservation: There shall not a hair fall from the head of any of you. "You cannot eat for fear of dying; I tell you, you are sure of living, and therefore eat." He himself spread their table for them: When he had thus spoken, he took bread. They were not reduced to short allowance, they had plenty, but what good did that do them, when they had no stomach? We have reason to be thankful to God that we have not only food to our appetite, but appetite to our food. He was chaplain to the ship, and they had reason to be proud of their chaplain. He gave thanks to God in presence of them all. Whether he had before this prayed with the whole company promiscuously is not certain. Now he gave thanks to God, in presence of them all, that they were alive, and that they had a promise that their lives should be preserved; he gave thanks for the provision they had, and begged a blessing upon it. We must in everything give thanks; and must particularly have an eye to God in receiving our food. He gave thanks in presence of them all, not only to show that he served a Master he was not ashamed of, but to invite them into his service too. If we crave a blessing upon our meat, and give thanks for it in a right manner, we shall credit our profession, and recommend it to the good opinion of others. He set them a good example: When he had given thanks, he broke the bread (it was sea-biscuit) and he began to eat. Whether they would be encouraged or no, he present, and with all his shipmates alive to the horrors of their condition. "The ship might go down at her anchors, or the coast to leeward might be iron-bound, affording no beach on which they could land with safety. Hence their anxious longing for day, and the ungenerous but natural attempt, not peculiar to ancient times, of the seamen to save their own lives by taking to the boat" [SMITH]. 30. as the shipmen were about to flee out of the ship—under cover of night—when they had let down the boat . . . as though they would . . . cast anchors out of the foreship—'bow'—rather, 'carry out' anchors, to hold the ship fore as well as aft. "This could have been of no advantage in the circumstances, and as the pretext could not deceive a seaman, we must infer that the officers of the ship were parties to the unworthy attempt, which was perhaps detected by the nautical skill of St. Luke, and communicated by him to St. Paul" [SMITH]. 31. Paul said to the centurion and to the soldiers—the only parties now to be trusted, and whose own safety was now at stake. except ye abide in the ship ye cannot be saved—The soldiers and passengers could not be expected to possess the necessary seamanship in so very critical a case. The flight of the crew, therefore, might well be regarded as certain destruction to all who remained. In full assurance of ultimate safety, in virtue of a DIVINE pledge, to all in the ship, Paul speaks and acts throughout this whole scene in the exercise of a sound judgment as to the indispensable HUMAN conditions of safety; and as there is no trace of any feeling of inconsistency between these two things in his mind, so even the centurion, under whose orders the soldiers acted on Paul's views, seems never to have felt perplexed by the twofold aspect, divine and human, in which the same thing presented itself to the mind of Paul. Divine agency and human instrumentality are in all the events of life quite as much as here. The only difference is that the one is for the most part shrouded from view, while the other is ever naked and open to the senses. 32. Then the soldiers cut off the ropes of the boat—already lowered—and let her fall off—let the boat drift away. 33-37. while day was coming on—'until it should be day'; i.e., in the interval between the cutting off of the boat and the approach of day, which all were "anxiously looking for" (vs. 29).

Paul—now looked up to by all the passengers as the man to direct them—besought them all to take meat—'partake of a meal'—saying, This is the fourteenth day ye have tarried—'waited for a breathingtime.' having eaten nothing—i.e., taken no regular meal. The impossibility of cooking, the occupation of all hands to keep down leakage, etc., sufficiently explain this, which is indeed a common occurrence in such cases.

I pray you to take some meat, for this is for your health, for there shall not a hair fall from . . . any of you—On this beautiful union of confidence in the divine pledge and care for the whole ship's health and safety see on vs. 31. when he had thus spoken he took bread—assuming the lead —and gave thanks to God in presence of them all—an impressive act in such circumstances, and fitted to plant a testimony for the God he served in the breasts of all. when he had broken it, he began to eat—not understood by the Christians in the ship as a lovefeast, or celebration of the Lord's Supper, as some think, but a meal to recruit exhausted nature, which Paul shows them by his own example how a Christian partakes of.

ADAM CLARKE

30. The shipman, the sailors, let down the boat. Having lowered the boat from the deck into the sea, they pretended that it was necessary to carry some anchors ahead to keep her from being carried in a dangerous direction by the tide, but with the real design to make for shore, and so leave the prisoners and the passengers to their fate. This was timely noticed by the pious and prudent apostle, who, while simply depending on the promise of God, was watching for the safety and comfort of all.

31. Except these abide in the ship, ye cannot be saved. God, who has promised to save your lives, promises this on the condition that you make use of every means He has put in your power to help yourselves.

32. The soldiers cut off the ropes. These were probably the only persons who dared to oppose the will of the sailors; this very circumstance is an additional proof of the accuracy of Luke.

33. While the day was coming on. It was then apparently about daybreak.

This day is the fourteenth day that ye have . . . continued fasting. You have not had one regular meal for these fourteen days past. Indeed we may take it for granted that during the whole of the storm very little was eaten by any man; for what appetite could men have for food who every moment had death before their eyes?

34. An hair fall from the head. A proverbial expression for "You shall neither lose your lives nor suffer any hurt in your bodies, if you follow my advice."

35. Gave thanks to God. Who had provided the food, and preserved their lives and health to partake of it.

MATTHEW HENRY

would. He would eat his meat, and be thankful. The most effectual way of preaching is by example. It had a happy influence upon them all (v. 36): Then were they all of good cheer. They then ventured to believe the message God sent them by Paul when they plainly perceived that Paul believed it himself. It is an encouragement to people to commit themselves to Christ as their Saviour when those who invite them to do so make it to appear that they do so themselves. It is here that the number of the persons is set down: they were in all two hundred threescore and sixteen souls. See how many may be influenced by the good example of one. They did all eat, nay, they did all eat enough (v. 38). They once more lightened the ship. They had before thrown the wares and the tackle overboard, and now the wheat; better they should sink the food than that it should sink them. We may ourselves be under a necessity of throwing that away to save our lives which we had gathered and laid up for the support of our lives.

V. Their putting to shore, and the staving of the ship in the adventure. When it was quite day they began to look about them. They knew not where they were; they could not tell what country it was they were now upon the coast of. It is probable that these seamen had often sailed this way, and yet here they were at a loss. They observed a creek with a level shore, into which they hoped to thrust the ship, v. 39. Though they knew not what country it was, nor whether the inhabitants were civil or barbarous, they determined to cast themselves upon their mercy; it was dry land, which would be very welcome to those that had been so long at sea. It was a pity but they had had some help from the shore. Those who live on the sea-coast have often opportunity of succouring those who are in distress at sea, and of saving precious lives, and they ought to do their utmost in order to it. They made straight to the shore (v. 40): They took up the anchors. They then committed themselves to the sea, and they loosed the rudder-bands, which were fastened during the storm for the greater steadiness of the ship, but, now that they were putting into the port, were loosed, that the pilot might steer with the greater freedom; they then hoisted up the main-sail to the wind, and made towards shore. When they saw the shore they hastened to it as fast as they could, and perhaps made more haste than good speed. And should not a poor soul that has long been struggling with winds and tempests in this world long to put into the safe and quiet haven of everlasting rest? And should it not hoist up the main-sail of faith to the wind of the Spirit, and so with longing desires make to shore? They made a shift among them to run the ship aground, in a shelf or bed of sand, or an isthmus, or neck of land, washed with the sea on both sides, and therefore two seas are said to meet upon it, and there the forepart stuck fast. The hinder part would soon be broken by the violence of the waves. The ship, that had strangely weathered the storm in the vast ocean, where it had room to roll, is dashed to pieces when it sticks fast. Thus if the heart fixes in the world it is lost. Satan's temptations beat against it, and it is gone; but, as long as it keeps above the world, though it be tossed with its cares and tumults, there is hope of it. They had the shore in view, and yet suffered shipwreck in the harbour, to teach us never to be secure.

VI. A particular danger that Paul and the rest of the prisoners were in. In this critical moment the soldiers advised the killing of the prisoners whom they were to give an account of, lest any of them should swim out and escape, v. 42. There was no great danger of that, for they could not escape far, weak and weary as they were; and, under the eye of so many soldiers that had the charge of them, it was not likely they should attempt it. But it was so much the worse that they were thus prodigal of other people's lives when without a miracle of mercy they must lose their own. The centurion, for Paul's sake, quashed this motion. Paul, who was his prisoner, had found favour with him. Julius, though he despised Paul's advice (v. 11), yet, being willing to save Paul, he prevented the execution of that bloody project. As God had saved all in the ship for Paul's sake, so here the centurion saves all the prisoners for his sake; such a diffusive good is a good man.

VII. The saving of the lives of all the persons in the ship. Some were saved by swimming: The centurion commanded his soldiers, as many of them as could swim, to get to land first, and to be ready to receive the prisoners, and prevent their escape. The rest with much ado scrambled to the shore, some on boards, and others on the broken pieces of the ship, and the more busy because they were assured their labour should not be in vain; but so it came to pass that through the good providence of God they escaped

Then were they all of good cheer, and they also took some meat—'took food'; the first full meal since the commencement of the gale. Such courage in desperate circumstances as Paul here showed is wonderfully infectious. 38-40. when they had eaten enough . . .—With fresh strength after the meal, they make a third and last effort to lighten the ship, not only by pumping, as before, but by throwing the whole cargo of wheat into the sea (see on vs. 6). when it was day they knew not the land—This has been thought surprising in sailors accustomed to that sea. But the scene of the wreck is remote from the great harbor, and possesses no marked features by which it could be recognized, even by a native if he came unexpectedly upon it [SMITH], not to speak of the rain pouring in torrents (ch. 28:2), which would throw a haze over the coast even after day broke. Immediately on landing they knew where they were (ch. 28:1). discovered a creek with a shore—Every creek of course, must have a shore; but the meaning is, a practicable shore, in a nautical sense, i.e., one with a smooth beach, in contradistinction to a rocky coast (as vs. 41 shows). into which they were minded, if . . . possible, to thrust the ship—This was their one chance of safety.

taken up the anchors, they committed themselves to the sea—The Marg. is here evidently right, 'cut the anchors (away), they left them in the sea.' loosed the rudder bands—Ancient ships were steered by two large paddles, one on each quarter. When anchored by the stern in a gale, it would be necessary to lift them out of the water and secure them by lashings or rudder bands, and to loose these when the ship was again got under way [SMITH]. hoised up the mainsail—rather, 'the foresail,' the best possible sail that could be set in the circumstances. How necessary must the crew have been to execute all these movements, and how obvious the foresight which made their stay indispensable to the safety of all on board (see on vs. 31)! 41. falling into a place where two seas met—SMITH thinks this refers to the channel, not more than 100 yards broad, which separates the small island of Salmone from Malta, forming a communication between the sea inside the bay and that outside. the fore part stuck fast, and remained immovable—"The rocks of Malta disintegrate into extremely minute particles of sand and clay, which, when acted upon by the currents or surface agitation, form a deposit of tenacious clay; but, in still waters, where these causes do not act, mud is formed; but it is only in creeks, where there are no currents, and at such a depth as to be undisturbed by the waves, that the mud occurs. A ship, therefore, impelled by the force of a gale, into a creek, with such a bottom, would strike a bottom of mud, graduating into tenacious clay, into which the fore part would fix itself, and be held fast, while the stern was exposed to the force of the waves" [SMITH]. hinder part was broken—The continued action denoted by the tense here is to be noted—'was fast breaking,' going to pieces. 42-44. the soldiers' counsel was to kill the prisoners, lest any . . . should escape—Roman cruelty, which made the keepers answerable for their prisoners with their own lives, is here reflected in this cruel proposal. the centurion . . .—Great must have been the influence of Paul over the centurion's mind to produce such an effect. All followed the swimmers in committing themselves to the deep, and according to the divine pledge and Paul's confident assurance given them, every soul got safe to land—yet without miracle. (While the graphic minuteness of this narrative of the shipwreck puts it beyond doubt that the narrator was himself on board, the great number of nautical phrases, which all critics have noted, along with the unprofessional air which the whole narrative wears, agrees singularly with all we know and have reason to believe of "the beloved physician"; see on ch. 16:40.)

ADAM CLARKE

38. They lightened the ship. They hoped that by casting out the lading the ship would draw less water, in consequence of which they could get nearer the shore.

39. They knew not the land. And therefore knew neither the nature of the coast nor where the proper port lay. A . . . creek with a shore. A bay, with a shore; a neck of land perhaps on either side, running out into the sea, and this little bay or gulf between them—though some think it was a tongue of land running out into the sea, having the sea on both sides, at the point of which these "two seas met," v. 41. There is such a place as this in the island of Malta, where tradition says Paul was shipwrecked, and which is called la Cale de St. Paul.

40. Taken up the anchors. Weighed all the anchors that they had cast out of the stern. Some think the meaning of the word is they slipped their cables, and so left the anchors in the sea. Loosed the rudder bands. Or the bands of the rudders; for large vessels in ancient times had two or more rudders, one at the side, and another at the stern, and sometimes one at the prow. The bands were some kind of fastenings by which the rudders were hoisted some way out of the water; for as they could be of no use in the storm, and should there come fair weather, the vessel could not do without them, this was a prudent way of securing them from being broken to pieces by the agitation of the waves. These bands being loosed, the rudders would fall down into their proper places, and serve to steer the vessel into the creek which they now had in view. Hoised up the mainsail. Not the mainsail, but the jib, or triangular sail which is suspended from the foremast to the bowsprit; with this they might hope both to steer and to carry in the ship.

41. Where two seas met. The tide running down from each side of the tongue of land, mentioned in v. 39, and meeting at the point. Ran the ship aground. In striving to cross at this point of land they had not taken a sufficiency of sea room, and therefore ran aground. The forepart stuck fast. Got into the sands; and perhaps the shore here was very bold or steep, so that the stem of the vessel might be immersed in the quicksands, which would soon close round it, while the stern, violently agitated with the surge, would soon be broken to pieces.

43. Willing to save Paul. Had one fallen, for the reasons those cruel and dastardly soldiers gave, so must all the rest. The centurion saw that Paul was not only an innocent but an extraordinary and divine man, and therefore for his sake he prevented the massacre; and, unloosing every man's bonds, he commanded those that could to swim ashore and escape. It is likely that all the soldiers escaped in this way, for it was one part of the Roman military discipline to teach the soldiers to swim.

44. And the rest. That could not swim. Some on boards, planks, spars, etc., got safe to land; manifestly by an especial providence of God.

MATTHEW HENRY

all safely to land. They were rescued from the dreaded sea, and brought to the desired haven. Though there be great difficulty in the way of the promised salvation, yet it shall without fail be accomplished; and even the wreck of the ship may furnish out means for the saving of the lives, and, when all seems to be gone, all proves to be safe, though it be on boards, and broken pieces of the ship.

CHAPTER 28

What a great variety of places and circumstances do we find Paul in! He was a planet, and not a fixed star. An ill wind indeed it is that blows nobody any good; this ill wind blew good to the island of Melita; for it gave them Paul's company, who was a blessing to every place he came to.

I. The kind reception which the inhabitants of this island gave (v. 2): The barbarous people showed us no little kindness. Providence continues its care of them, and what benefits we receive by the hand of man must be acknowledged to come from the hand of God. As he can make enemies to be at peace, so he can make strangers to be friends, friends in need, and those are friends indeed. 1. The general notice taken of the kindness which the natives of Malta showed. They are called barbarous people, because they did not, in language and customs, conform either to the Greeks or Romans, who looked upon all but themselves as barbarians, though otherwise civilized enough, and perhaps in some cases more civil than they. These barbarous people were full of humanity: They showed us no little kindness. So far were they from making a prey of this shipwreck that they laid hold of it as an opportunity of showing mercy. It is written for our imitation, that we may hence learn to be compassionate to those that are in distress and misery, and to relieve and succour them to the utmost of our ability. If Providence hath so appointed the bounds of our habitation as to give us an opportunity of being frequently serviceable to persons at a loss, we should not place it among the inconveniences of our lot, but the advantages of it. 2. A particular instance of their kindness: They kindled a fire, and they received us every one—made room for us about the fire, and bade us all welcome. Waters from above met those from below, and it rained so hard that this would wet them to the skin presently; and it was a cold rain too, so that they wanted nothing so much as a good fire to warm them, and dry their clothes. Be you warmed, is as necessary as, Be you filled.

II. The further danger that Paul was in by a viper's fastening on his hand.

1. When the fire was to be made, and to be made bigger, Paul was as busy as any of them in gathering sticks, v. 3. Paul was an industrious active man, and loved to be doing when anything was to be done, and would stoop to anything by which he might be serviceable, even to the gathering of sticks to make a fire of. We should be willing to condescend to the meanest offices for the good of our brethren. Those that receive benefit by the fire should help to carry fuel to it.

2. It happened there was a viper among them, that lay as dead till it came to the heat, and then revived, and flew at him that unawares threw it into the fire, and fastened upon his hand, v. 3. As there is a snake under the green grass, so there is often under the dry leaves. See how many perils human life is exposed to, and what danger we are in from the inferior creatures. We often meet with that which is mischievous where we expect that which is beneficial; and many come by hurt when they are honestly employed, and in the way of their duty.

3. The barbarous people concluded that this viper was sent by divine justice to be the avenger of blood. When they saw the venomous animal hang on his hand, they concluded, "No doubt this man is a murderer and therefore, though he has escaped the sea, yet divine vengeance pursues him, and will not suffer him to live."

(1) Some of the discoveries of natural light. They were barbarous people and yet they knew naturally, That there is a God that governs the world and that things do not come to pass by chance but by divine direction. That evil pursues sinners, that there are good works which God will reward and wicked works which he will punish. That murder is a heinous crime, and which shall not long go unpunished. Those that think they shall go unpunished in any evil way will be judged out of the mouth of these barbarians. Learn from these illiterate people that, though malefactors have escaped the vengeance of

for they kindled a fire, and received us every one, because of the present rain—'the rain that was on us'—not now first falling, but then falling heavily—and because of the cold—welcomed us all, drenched and shivering, to these most seasonable marks of friendship. In this these "barbarians" contrast favorably with many since, bearing the Christian name. The lifelike style of the narrative here and in the following verses gives it a great charm. 3. when Paul had gathered a bundle of sticks—'a quantity of dry sticks.' The vigorous activity of Paul's character is observable in this comparatively trifling action [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. and laid them on the fire, there came a viper out of the heat—Having laid itself up among the sticks on the approach of the cold winter season, it had suddenly recovered from its torpor by the heat. and fastened—its fangs—on his hand—Vipers dart at their enemies sometimes several feet at a bound. They have now disappeared from Malta, owing to the change which cultivation has produced.

4-6. No doubt this man is a murderer—His chains, which they would see, might strengthen the impression. whom . . . vengeance suffereth not to live—They believed in a Supreme, Resistless, Avenging Eye and Hand, however vague their notions of where it resided.

ADAM CLARKE

1. They knew that the island was called Melita. Now called Malta. It is about fifty miles from the coast of Sicily; twenty miles long, twelve miles in its greatest breadth; and about sixty miles in circumference. It is one immense rock of white, soft freestone, with about one foot depth of earth on an average. It produces cotton, excellent fruits, and fine honey, from which it appears the island originally had its name; for meli, and in the genitive case, melitos, signifies "honey." Others suppose that it derived its name from the Phoenicians, who established a colony in it, and made it a place of "refuge" when they extended their traffic to the ocean, because it was furnished with excellent harbors. Hence in their tongue it would be called Meliteh, "escape or refuge."

2. The barbarous people. This island was peopled by the Phoenicians or Carthaginians. Their ancient language was no doubt in use among them at that time, though mingled with some Greek and Latin terms; and this language must have been unintelligible to the Romans and the Greeks. With these, as well as with other nations, it was customary to call those barbarians whose language they did not understand. Paul himself speaks after this manner in 1 Cor. xiv. 11: "If I know not the meaning of the voice, I shall be unto him that speaketh a barbarian, and he that speaketh shall be a barbarian unto me."

Because of the present rain, and . . . of the cold. This must have been sometime in October; and when we consider the time of the year, the tempestuousness of the weather, and their escaping to shore on planks, spars, etc., wet of course to the skin, they must have been very cold, and have needed all the kindness that these well-disposed people showed them.

4. The venomous beast. The venomous animal; for theria is a general name among the Greek writers for serpents, vipers, scorpions, wasps, and suchlike creatures. Vengeance suffereth not to live. These heathens had a general knowledge of retributive justice, and they thought that the stinging of the serpent was a proof that Paul was a murderer.

the sea, yet there is no outrunning divine justice.

(2) Some of the mistakes of natural light. In two things their knowledge was defective: [1] They thought all wicked people were punished in this life. The day of vengeance is to come in the other world, though some are made examples of in this world, to prove that there is a God, yet many are left unpunished, to prove that there is a judgment to come. [2] They thought all who were remarkably afflicted in this life were wicked people. Divine revelation sets this matter in a true light—that all things come ordinarily alike to all, that good men are oftentimes greatly afflicted in this life, for the exercise of their faith and patience.

4. When he shook off the viper from his hand they expected that he would have swollen, or that he would have fallen down dead suddenly. See how apt men are, when once they have got an ill opinion of a man, to abide by it, and to think that God must necessarily confirm their peevish sentence.

III. Paul's deliverance from the danger, and the undue construction the people put upon this. It does not appear that it put him into any fright or confusion at all. He did not shriek or start. Such a wonderful presence of mind he had as no man could have upon such a sudden accident, but by the special aids of divine grace. He shook off the viper into the fire. Thus, in the strength of the grace of Christ, believers shake off the temptations of Satan. When we despise the censures and reproaches of men, having the testimony of conscience for us, then we do, as Paul here, shake off the viper into the fire. It does us no harm. He was none the worse. Those that thought it would have been his death looked a great while, but saw no harm at all come to him. God hereby intended to make way for the entertainment of the gospel among them. They then magnified him as much as before they had vilified him: They changed their minds, and said that he was a god; for they thought it impossible that a mortal man should have a viper hang on his hand so long and be never the worse. See the uncertainty of popular opinion, how it turns with the wind, and how apt it is to run into extremes both ways.

IV. The miraculous cure of an old gentleman that was ill of a fever, and of others, by Paul. The kind entertainment which Publius, the chief man of the island, gave to these distressed strangers; he received them and lodged them three days very courteously. It is happy when God gives a large heart to those to whom he has given a large estate. It became him, who was the chief man of the island, the richest man, to be rich in good works. The illness of the father of Publius: He lay sick of a fever and a bloody flux. Providence ordered it that he should be ill just at this time, that the cure of him might be a present recompence to Publius for his generosity, and a recompence particularly for his kindness to Paul. His cure: Paul took cognizance of his case. He entered in, not as a physician to heal him by medicines, but as an apostle to heal him by miracle; and he prayed for his cure, and then laid his hands on him, and he was perfectly well in an instant. Though he must needs be in years, yet he recovered his health. The cure of many others. If he can heal diseases so effectually, he shall soon have patients enough; and he bade them all welcome. He did not plead that he was a stranger there, thrown accidentally among them, and waiting to be gone by the first opportunity, and therefore might be excused. No, a good man will endeavour to do good wherever the providence of God casts him. Paul thanked God for an opportunity of being useful among them. Hereby he did in effect discharge his quarters, which should encourage us to entertain strangers, for some thereby have entertained angels and some apostles unawares. God will not be behind-hand with any for kindness shown to his people in distress. Never were any people so enriched by a shipwreck on their coasts as these Maltese were.

V. The grateful acknowledgment made of the kindness Paul had done them, v. 10. They honoured us with many honours. They showed them all possible respect. They justly thought nothing too much by which they might testify the esteem they had for them. When we departed, they loaded us with such things as were necessary; they put on board such things as we had occasion for. Paul accepted the kindness of the good people of Melita, not as a fee for his cures (freely he had received, and freely he gave), but as the relief of his wants, and theirs that were with him.

Verses 11–16

We have here the progress of Paul's voyage towards Rome, and his arrival there at length. After a storm comes a calm: the latter part of his voyage was easy and quiet.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

F. B. MEYER:

Accidents are not punishments. The clinging of the viper to Paul's hand was not an evidence of the anger of God, but was permitted in order to give these simplehearted people an evidence which they would appreciate of God's care for his own.

How changeable is human opinion, shifting in a moment from the highest to the lowest estimate of our fellows, and basing that estimate solely on the favorable or unfavorable aspect of outward circumstances! Let us not judge by appearance, but righteously. Because Paul cast off the viper, they accounted him divine; if he had died, they would have thought him a felon. Let us also shake off temptation. We cannot prevent its attacking us, but we need not take the viper into our heart.

Paul's unfailing influence for good shows what a blessing even one Christian man can be wherever he goes if he lives in the power of God.—Bible Commentary shook off the beast and felt no harm—See Mark 16:18. they looked—'continued looking'—when he should have swollen or fallen down dead—familiar with the effects of such bites—and saw no harm come to him, they changed their minds, and said . . . he was a god—from "a murderer" to "a god," as the Lycaonian greeting of Paul and Silas from "sacrificing to them" to "stoning them" (ch. 14:13, 19). What has not the Gospel done for the uncultivated portion of the human family, while its effects on the educated and refined, though very different, are not less marvellous! Verily it is God's chosen restorative for the human spirit, in all the multitudinous forms and gradations of its lapsed state. 7, 8. possessions of the chief man—'the first man'—of the island—He would hardly be so styled in the lifetime of his father, if his distinction was that of the family. But it is now ascertained that this was the proper official title of the Maltese representative of the Roman prætor to Sicily, to whose province Malta belonged; two inscriptions having been discovered in the island, one in Greek, the other in Latin, containing the same words which Luke here employs. who received us—of Paul's company, but doubtless including the "courteous" Julius—and lodged us three days courteously—till proper winter lodgings could be obtained for them. the father of Publius lay sick of a fever—'fevers.' The word was often thus used in the plural number, probably to express recurring attacks. and of a bloody flux—'of dysentery.' (The medical accuracy of our historian's style has been observed here.) to whom Paul entered in, and prayed—thereby precluding the supposition that any charm resided in himself. and laid his hands on him, and healed him—Thus, as our Lord rewarded Peter for the use of his boat (Luke 5:3, 4, etc.), so Paul richly repays Publius for his hospitality. Observe the fulfilment here of two things predicted in Mark 16:18—the "taking up serpents," and "recovering of the sick by laying hands on them." 9. this . . . done, others . . . came and were healed—'kept coming to [us] and getting healed,' i.e., during our stay, not all at once [WEBSTER and WILKINSON].

10. who also honoured us . . . and when we departed they laded us . . .—This was not taking hire for the miracles wrought among them (Matt. 10:8), but such grateful expressions of feeling, particularly in providing what would minister to their comfort during the voyage, as showed the value they set upon the presence and labors of the apostle among them, and such as it would have hurt their feelings to refuse. Whether any permanent effects of this three months' stay of the greatest of the apostles were left at Malta, we cannot certainly say. But though little dependence is to be placed upon the tradition that Publius became bishop of Malta and afterwards of Athens, we may well believe the accredited tradition that the beginnings of the Christian Church at Malta sprang out of this memorable visit.

ADAM CLARKE

6. When he should have swollen. When he should have been "inflamed." Said that he was a god. As Hercules was one of the gods of the Phoenicians, and was worshipped in Malta under the epithet of the "dispeller of evil," they probably thought that Paul was Hercules; and the more so because Hercules was famous for having destroyed, in his youth, two serpents that attacked him in his cradle.

7. The chief man of the island. The term chief, used here by Luke, was the ancient title of the governor of this island, as is evident from an inscription found in Malta. This title is another proof of the accuracy of Luke, who uses the very epithet by which the Roman governor of that island was distinguished.

8. The father of Publius lay sick of a fever and dysentery. Paul . . . prayed. That God would exert His power; and laid his hands on him, as the means which God ordinarily used to convey the energy of the Holy Spirit, and healed him, God having conveyed the healing power by this means.

9. Others . . . which had diseases. Luke was a physician, yet we do not find him engaging in these cures. As a medical man, he might have been of use to the father of Publius, but he is not even consulted on the occasion.

10. Honored us with many honors. The word is often used to signify a pecuniary "recompense" or "present." In the sense of a pecuniary recompense, or price, paid for anything, the word is met with in I Cor. vi. 20 and vii. 23. Such things as were necessary. They had before given them many presents, and now they gave them a good sea stock, all that was necessary for their passage.

MATTHEW HENRY

I. Their leaving Malta. When they are refreshed they must put to sea again. The difficulties and discouragements we have met with in our Christian course must not hinder us from pressing forward. The time of their departure: After three months, the three winter months. Better lie by than go forward while the season was dangerous. Paul had warned them against venturing to sea in winter weather, and they would not take the warning; but, now he needed not to warn them. Experience is therefore called the mistress of fools, because those are fools that will not learn till experience has taught them. The ship in which they departed. It was in a ship of Alexandria. This ship had wintered in that isle, and was safe. Here were two ships, both of Alexandria, but one is wrecked there and the other is saved. Events are thus varied, that we may learn both how to want and how to abound. The sign of the ship, which probably gave it its name: it was Castor and Pollux. They hoped they should have better sailing under this badge than they had had before.

II. Their landing in or about Italy, and the pursuing of their journey towards Rome. They landed first at Syracuse in Sicily, the chief city of that island. There they tarried three days. From Syracuse they came to Rhegium, a city in Italy. There, it seems, they stayed one day. It does not appear that they did so much as go ashore, but only came to an anchor in the road. From Rhegium they came to Puteoli, a sea-port town not far from Naples. The ship of Alexandria was bound for that port, and therefore there Paul, and the rest that were bound for Rome, were put ashore, and went the remainder of their way by land. At Puteoli they found brethren. Who brought the knowledge of Christ hither we are not told, but here it was, so wonderfully did the leaven of the gospel diffuse itself. God has many that serve and worship him in places where we little think he has. Though it is probable there were but few brethren in Puteoli, yet Paul found them out. As it were by instinct they got together. Brethren in Christ should find out one another, as those of the same country do in a foreign land. They desired Paul and his companions to tarry with them seven days, that is, to forecast to stay at least one Lord's day with them. Paul was willing to allow them so much of his time; and the centurion agreed to stay one week there, to oblige Paul. From Puteoli they went forward towards Rome. This was their last stage.

III. The meeting which the Christians at Rome gave to Paul.

1. The great honour they did to Paul. They had heard much of his fame and what eminent service he had done to the kingdom of Christ. They had heard of his sufferings, and how God had owned him in them, and therefore thought themselves obliged to show him all possible respect. He had some time ago written a long epistle to them in return for which they showed him this respect. They went to meet him, that they might bring him in state, though he was a prisoner. Some of them went as far as Appiforum, which was fifty-one miles from Rome; others to a place called the Three Taverns. They were so far from being ashamed of him, because he was a prisoner, that for that very reason they counted him worthy of double honour.

2. The great comfort Paul had in this. Now that he was drawing near to Rome he began to have some melancholy thoughts about his appeal to Caesar, and the consequences of it. What things might befal him here he could not tell; but he began to grow dull upon it, till he met with these good people that came from Rome, and when he saw them, (1) He thanked God. If our friends be kind to us, it is God that makes them so, and we must give him the glory of it. When he saw so many Christians that were of Rome, he thanked God that the gospel of Christ had had such wonderful success there in the metropolis of the empire. When we go abroad into the world, and meet with those, even in strange places, that bear up Christ's name, and fear God, we should lift up our hearts to heaven in thanksgiving; blessed be God that there are so many excellent ones on this earth, bad as it is. (2) He took courage. It put new life into him, and now he can enter Rome a prisoner as cheerfully as ever he had entered Jerusalem at liberty. He finds there are those there who love and value him. It is an encouragement to those who are travelling towards heaven to meet with their fellow travellers. When we see the numerous and serious assemblies of good Christians, we should not only give thanks to God, but take courage to ourselves.

IV. The delivering of Paul into custody at Rome, v. 16. He is now come to his journey's end. He is still a prisoner. He had longed to see Rome, but, when he comes there, he is delivered to the captain

11. we departed in a ship of Alexandria—(see on ch. 27:6)—which had wintered in the isle—no doubt driven in by the same storm which had wrecked on its shores the apostle's vessel—an incidental mark of consistency in the narrative. whose sign—or 'figurehead'; the figure, carved or painted on the bow, which gave name to the vessel. Such figureheads were anciently as common as now. was Castor and Pollux—the tutelar gods of mariners, to whom all their good fortune was ascribed. St. Anthony is substituted for them in the modern superstitions of Mediterranean (Romanist) sailors. They carry his image in their boats and ships. It is highly improbable that two ships of Alexandra should have been casually found, of which the owners were able and willing to receive on board such a number of passengers (ch. 27:6). We may then reasonably conceive that it was compulsory on the owners to convey soldiers and state travellers [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. 12, 13. landing at Syracuse—the ancient and celebrated capital of Sicily, on its eastern coast, about eighty miles, or a day's sail, north from Malta. we tarried there three days—probably from the state of the wind. Doubtless Paul would wish to go ashore, to find out and break ground among the Jews and proselytes whom such a mercantile center would attract to it; and if this was allowed at the outset of the voyage (ch. 27:3), much more readily would it be now when he had gained the reverence and confidence of all classes with whom he came in contact. At any rate we cannot wonder that he should be regarded by the Sicilians as the founder of the Church of that island. from thence we fetched a compass—i.e., proceeded circuitously, or tacked, working to windward probably, and availing themselves of the sinuosities of the coast, the wind not being favorable [SMITH]. What follows confirms this. and came to Rhegium—now Reggio, a seaport on the southwest point of the Italian coast, opposite the northeast point of Sicily, and at the entrance of the narrow straits of Messina. after one day the south wind blew—a south wind having sprung up'; being now favored with a fair wind, for want of which they had been obliged first to stay three days at Syracuse, and then to tack and put in for a day at Rhegium. the next day to Puteoli—now Pozzuoli, situated on the northern part of the magnificent bay of Naples about 180 miles north of Rhegium, a distance which they might make, running before their "south wind," in about twenty-six hours. The Alexandrian corn ships enjoyed a privilege peculiar to themselves, of not being obliged to strike their topsail on landing. By this they were easily recognized as they hove in sight by the crowds that we find gathered on the shore on such occasions [Hows]. 14, 15. Where we found brethren—not "the brethren" (see on ch. 21:4), from which one would conclude they did not expect to find such [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. and were desired—'requested'—to tarry with them seven days—If this request came from Julius, it may have proceeded partly from a wish to receive instructions from Rome and make arrangements for his journey thither, partly from a wish to gratify Paul, as he seems studiously and increasingly to have done to the last. One can hardly doubt that he was influenced by both considerations. However this may be, the apostle had thus an opportunity of spending a Sabbath with the Christians of the place, all the more refreshing from his long privation in this respect, and as a seasoning for the unknown future that lay before him at the metropolis. so we went toward Rome. And from thence, when the brethren—of Rome—heard of us—by letter from Puteoli, and probably by the same conveyance which took Julius' announcement of his arrival. they came to meet us as far as Appii Forum—a town forty-one miles from Rome. and the Three Taverns—thirty miles from Rome. Thus they came to greet the apostle in two parties, one stopping short at the nearer, the other going on to the more distant place. whom when Paul saw, he thanked God—for such a welcome. How sensitive he was to such Christian affection all his Epistles show (Rom. 1:9, etc.). and took courage—his long-cherished purpose to "see Rome" (ch. 19:21), there to proclaim the unsearchable riches of Christ, and the divine pledge that in this he should be gratified (ch. 23:11), being now about to be auspiciously realized. 16. when we came to Rome—the renowned capital of the ancient world, situated on the Tiber. the centurion delivered the prisoners to the captain of the guard—the Prætorian Prefect, to whose custody, as commander of the Prætorian guard, the highest military authority in the city, were committed all who were to come before the

11. After three months. Supposing that they had reached Malta about the end of October, as we have already seen, then it appears that they left it about the end of January or the beginning of February; and, though in the depth of winter, not the worst time for sailing, even in those seas, the wind being then generally more steady and, on the whole, the passage more safe. Whose sign was Castor and Pollux. These were two fabulous semi-deities, reported to be the sons of Jupiter and Leda, who were afterwards translated to the heavens, and made the constellation called Gemini, or the "Twins." This constellation was deemed propitious to mariners; and, as it was customary to have the images of their gods on both the head and the stern of their ships, we may suppose that this Alexandrian ship had these on either her prow or stern, and that these gave name to the ship.

12. Landing at Syracuse. In order to go to Rome from Malta, their readiest course was to keep pretty close to the eastern coast of Sicily, in order to pass through the straits of Rhegium and get into the Tyrrhenian Sea. Syracuse is one of the most famous cities of antiquity; it is the capital of the island of Sicily, and was built about 730 years before the Christian era. This was the birthplace of the illustrious Archimedes, who, when the city was besieged by the Romans, under Marcellus, about 212 years before Christ, defended the place with his powerful engines against all the valor and power of the assailants. He beat their galleys to pieces by huge stones projected from his machines.

13. We fetched a compass. "Whence we coasted about." Rhegium. A city and promontory in Italy, opposite to Sicily. It is now called Reggio. It had its name, Rhegium, from the Greek "to break off," because it appears to have been broken off from Sicily. The south wind blew. This was the fairest wind they could have from Syracuse, to reach the straits of Rhegium. The next day to Puteoli. This place, now commonly called Pozzuoli, is an ancient town of Naples.

14. Where we found brethren. That is, Christians; for there had been many in Italy converted to the faith of Christ some considerable time before this, as appears from Paul's Epistle to the Romans, written some years before this voyage. We went toward Rome. One of the most celebrated cities in the universe, the capital of Italy, and once of the whole world, situated on the river Tiber. This famous city was founded by Romulus, 753 years before the Christian era.

15. When the brethren heard of us. By whom the gospel was planted at Rome is not known; it does not appear that any apostle was employed in this work. It was probably carried thither by some of those who were converted to God on the Day of Pentecost; for there were then at Jerusalem, not only "devout men," proselytes to the Jewish religion, "from every nation under heaven," Acts ii. 5, but there were "strangers of Rome" also, v. 10. And it is most reasonable to believe, as we know of no other origin, that it was by these that Christianity was planted at Rome. As far as Appii forum. About fifty-two miles from Rome; a long way to come on purpose to meet the apostle! The Appii Forum, or "Market of Appius," was a town on the Appian Way, a road paved from Rome to Campania by the consul Appius Claudius. It was near the sea and was a famous resort for sailors and peddlers. And The three taverns. This was another place on the same road, and about thirty-three miles from Rome. Some of the Roman Christians had come as far as Appii Forum; others, to the Three Taverns. Thanked God, and took courage. He had longed to see Rome (see Rom. i. 9-15); and finding himself brought through so many calamities, and now so near the place that he was met by a part of that church to which, some years before, he had written an Epistle, he gave thanks to God, who had preserved him; and took fresh courage in the prospect of bearing there a testimony for his Lord and Master.

16. The captain of the guard. This word properly means the "commander of a camp"; but it signifies the prefect, or commander of the pretorian cohorts, or emperor's guards. With a soldier that kept him. That is, the soldier to of the guard, and can see no more of Rome than he will permit him. How many great men had made their entry into Rome, crowned and in triumph, who really were the plagues of their generation! But here a good man makes his entry into Rome, chained and triumphed over as a poor captive. This thought is enough to put one for ever out of conceit with this world. Yet he has some favour shown him. He is a prisoner, but not a close prisoner: Paul was suffered to dwell by himself, and a soldier was appointed to be his guard, who, we hope, let him take all the liberty that could be allowed to a prisoner. This may encourage God's prisoners, that he can give them favour in the eyes of those that carry them captive. If he either makes it easy to them or them easy under it, they have reason to be thankful.

Paul must call his own cause; and here he represents it to the chief of the Jews at Rome, these chief of the Jews were the most distinguished men of that religion. Paul called them together that there might be a good understanding between him and them.

I. What account he gave them of his cause. 1. He professes his own innocency: "I have committed nothing against the people of the Jews; nor have I committed anything against the customs of our fathers." Paul did not impose the customs of the fathers upon the Gentiles: they were never intended for them. But it is as true that he never opposed them in the Jews, but did himself conform to them. 2. He complains of the hard usage he had met with—he was delivered prisoner from Jerusalem into the hands of the Romans. If he had spoken the whole truth in this matter, it would have looked worse upon the Jews, for they would have murdered him if the Romans had not protected him; but, however, they accused him as a criminal, before Felix the governor, in effect, delivering him prisoner into the hands of the Romans. 3. He declares the judgment of the Roman governors concerning him, v. 18. They examined him, enquired into his case. The chief captain examined him, so did Felix, and Festus, and Agrippa, and they could find no cause of death in him; but, on the contrary, would have let him go. Those who most carefully examined his case acquitted him, and none condemned him but unheard, and such as were prejudiced against him. 4. He pleads the necessity he was under to remove his cause to Rome; and that it was only in his own defence, and not with any design to recriminate (v. 19): When the Jews spoke against it he was constrained to appeal unto Caesar. This was all he aimed at in this appeal; not to accuse his nation, but only to vindicate himself. It is an invidious thing to accuse, especially to accuse a nation. Paul made intercession for them, but never against them. The Roman government had at this time an ill opinion of the Jewish nation, and it had been an easy thing to have exasperated the emperor. But Paul would not for ever so much do such a thing; he was for making the best of everybody, and not making bad worse. 5. He puts his sufferings upon the true footing (v. 20): "For this cause I have called for you, not to quarrel with you but to see you and speak with you as my countrymen, because for the hope of Israel I am bound with this chain." He carried the mark of his imprisonment about with him, and probably was chained to the soldier that kept him. He preached that the Messiah was come, he whom Israel hoped for. "Do not all the Jews agree in this, that the Messiah will be the glory of his people Israel? This Messiah I preach, and prove he is come. I preach such a hope in a Messiah already come as must produce a joy in him." He preached that the resurrection of the dead would come. This also was the hope of Israel. "They would have you still expect a Messiah that would free you from the Roman yoke, and make you great and prosperous upon earth. This is what they hate me for,—because I would take you off from the nation of a temporal Messiah, and lead you to that which is the true and real hope of Israel, a spiritual kingdom of holiness and love set up in the hearts of men, to be the pledge of, and preparative for, the joyful resurrection of the dead and the life of the world to come."

II. What was their reply. They own, 1. That they had nothing to say in particular against him; nor had any instructions either by letter or word of mouth (v. 21): "We have neither received letters out of Judæa concerning thee nor have any of the brethren shown or spoken any harm of thee." This was very strange, that that restless rage of the Jews which had followed Paul wherever he went should not follow him to Rome. Some think they told a lie here, and had orders to prosecute him, but durst not own it. But I am apt to think that what they said was true, and emperor for trial. Ordinarily there were two such prefects; but from A.D. 51 to 62, one distinguished general—Burrus Aframus, who had been Nero's tutor—held that office; and as our historian speaks of "the captain," as if there were but one, it is thought that this fixes the apostle's arrival at Rome to be not later than the year 62 [WIES]. But even though there had been two when Paul arrived, he would be committed only to one of them, who would be "the captain" who got charge of him. (At most, therefore, this can furnish no more than confirmation to the chronological evidence otherwise obtained.) but Paul was suffered to dwell by himself with a—'the'—soldier that kept—'guarded'—him—(See on ch. 12:6). This privilege was allowed in the case of the better class of prisoners, not accused of any flagrant offense, on finding security—which in Paul's case would not be difficult among the Christians. The extension of this privilege to the apostle may have been due to the terms in which Festus wrote about him; but far more probably it was owing to the high terms in which Julius spoke of him, and his express intercession in his behalf. It was overruled, however, for giving the fullest scope to the labors of the apostle compatible with confinement at all. As the soldiers who kept him were relieved periodically, he would thus make the personal acquaintance of a great number of the Prætorian guard; and if he had to appear before the Prefect from time to time, the truth might thus penetrate to those who surrounded the emperor, as we learn, from Philippians 1:12, 13, that it did.

17-20. Paul called the chief of the Jews together—Though banished from the capital by Claudius, the Jews enjoyed the full benefit of the toleration which distinguished the first period of Nero's reign, and were at this time in considerable numbers, wealth, and influence settled at Rome. We have seen that long before this a flourishing Christian Church existed at Rome, to which Paul wrote his Epistle (see on ch. 20:3), and the first members of which were probably Jewish converts and proselytes. (See Introduction to Epistle to Romans.) yet was I delivered prisoner from Jerusalem into the hands of the Romans—the Roman authorities, Felix and Festus.

I was constrained to appeal . . . not that I had aught to accuse my nation of—'I am here not as their accuser, but as my own defender, and this not of choice but necessity.' His object in alluding thus gently to the treatment he had received from the Jews was plainly to avoid whatever might irritate his visitors at the first; especially as he was not aware whether any or what information against him had reached their community. For this cause . . . have I called for you . . . because . . . for the hope of Israel—see on 26:6, 7—I am bound with this chain—'This cause is not so much mine as yours; it is the nation's cause; all that is dear to the heart and hope of Israel is bound up with this case of mine.' From the touching allusions which the apostle makes to his chains, before Agrippa first, and here before the leading members of the Jewish community at Rome, at his first interview with them, one would gather that his great soul felt keenly his being in such a condition; and it is to this keenness of feeling, under the control of Christian principle, that we owe the noble use which he made of it in these two cases.

21, 22. We neither received letters out of Judea concerning thee . . .—We need not suppose (with THOLUCK and others) that there was any dishonest concealment here. The distinction made between himself, against whom they heard nothing, and his "sect," as "everywhere spoken against," is a presumption in favor of their sincerity; and there is ground to think that as the case took an whom he was chained, as has been related before, chap. xii. 6.

17. Paul called the chief of the Jews together. We have already seen, in chap. xviii. 2, that Claudius had commanded all Jews to depart from Rome, but it seems they were permitted to return very soon; and from this verse it appears that there were then chiefs, probably of synagogues, dwelling at Rome. I have committed nothing. Lest they should have heard and received malicious reports against him, he thought it best to state his own case.

20. For the hope of Israel I am bound. As if he had said: This, and this alone, is the cause of my being delivered into the hands of the Romans. I have proclaimed Jesus as the Messiah; have maintained that though He was crucified by the Jews, yet He rose again from the dead; and, through Him, I have preached the general resurrection of mankind. This all Israel professes to hope for, and yet it is on this account that the Jews persecute me. Both the Messiah and the Resurrection might be said to be the hope of Israel; and it is hard to tell which of them is here meant. See chap. xxiii. 6; xxiv. 15, 21; and xxvi. 6.

21. We neither received letters. This is very strange, and shows us that the Jews knew their cause to be hopeless, and therefore did not send it forward to Rome. They wished for an opportunity to kill Paul; and when they were frustrated by this appeal to the emperor, they permitted the business to drop.

MATTHEW HENRY

Paul now found he had gained the point he aimed at in appealing to Caesar, which was to remove his cause into a court to which they durst not follow it. 2. That they desired to know particularly concerning the religion he took so much pains to propagate in the face of so much opposition (v. 22): We desire to hear of thee what thou thinkest. Though we know little else of Christianity, we know it is a sect everywhere spoken against. This was all they knew concerning the Christian religion, that it was a sect everywhere spoken against. They put it into an ill name, and then ran it down. They looked upon it to be a sect, and this was false. True Christianity establishes that which is of common concern to all mankind, and is not built upon such narrow opinions as sects commonly owe their original to. All its gains are spiritual and eternal. It has a direct tendency to the uniting of the children of men, and not the dividing of them. They said it was everywhere spoken against, and this was too true. It is, and always has been, the lot of Christ's holy religion to be everywhere spoken against.

Verses 23–29

We have here a short account of a long conference which Paul had with the Jews at Rome about the Christian religion. They were willing to give it a hearing, which was more than the Jews at Jerusalem would do.

I. We are here told how Paul managed this conference. The Jews appointed the time, a day was set for this dispute, v. 23. Those Jews seemed well disposed to receive conviction, and yet it did not prove that they all were so.

1. There were many got together to Paul. Though he was a prisoner yet they were willing to come to him to his lodging. And the confinement he was now under, instead of prejudicing them against his doctrine, ought to confirm it to them; for it was a sign that he thought it worth suffering for. One would visit such a man as Paul in his prison rather than not have instruction from him.

2. He was very full in his discourse with them, seeking their conviction more than his own vindication. He expounded the kingdom of God to them,—showed them the nature of that kingdom, that it is heavenly and spiritual, and shines not in external pomp, but in purity of heart and life. Let but that be expounded to them, and set in a true light, and they will be brought into obedience to it. He not only expounded the kingdom of God, but he testified it,—plainly declared it to them, and confirmed it by incontestable proofs. He attested the extraordinary powers in the kingdom of grace by which it was set up, and the miracles in the kingdom of nature by which it was confirmed. He bore his testimony to it from his own experience of its power. He not only expounded and testified the kingdom of God, but he pressed them with all earnestness to embrace the kingdom of God. He followed his doctrine with a warm and lively applicaton to his hearers. He persuaded them concerning Jesus. The design and tendency of his whole discourse were to bring them to Christ, to convince them of his being the Messiah. He urged upon them the things concerning Jesus, out of the law of Moses and out of the prophets, and showed how they had all had their accomplishment in this Jesus. He dealt with them out of the scriptures of the Old Testament.

3. He was very long; for he continued his discourse from morning till evening. The subject was curious—he was full of it—it was of vast importance—he was in good earnest—he knew not when he should have such another opportunity, and therefore he kept them all day.

II. What was the effect of this discourse. One would have thought that so good a cause and managed by such a skilful hand as Paul's, could not but carry the day. But it did not prove so: the child Jesus is set for the fall of some and the rising again of others, a foundation stone to some and a stone of stumbling to others. They did not agree among themselves, v. 25. His hearers could not agree about the sense and evidence of what he preached. Some believed the things that were spoken, and some believed not, v. 24. Some are wrought upon by the word, and others hardened; some receive the light, and others shut their eyes against it. So it was among Christ's hearers, some believed and some blasphemed.

III. The awakening word which Paul said to them at parting. He perceived by what they muttered that there were many among them, that were obstinate, and would not yield. "Hold," says Paul, "take one word with you before you go. What do you think will be the effect of your obstinate infidelity? What will it come to?"

1. "You will by the righteous judgment of God be unexpected turn by Paul's appealing to Cæsar, so no information on the subject would travel from Jerusalem to Rome in advance of the apostle himself. we desire—'deem it proper'—to hear of thee what thou thinkest—what are thy sentiments, views, etc. The apparent freedom from prejudice here expressed may have arisen from a prudent desire to avoid endangering a repetition of those dissensions about Christianity to which, probably, SUETONIUS alludes, and which had led to the expulsion of the Jews under Claudius [HUMPHRY]. See on ch. 18:2.

23, 24. there came many—'considerable numbers'—into his lodging—The word denotes one's place of stay as a guest (Philemon 22), not "his own hired house," mentioned in vs. 30. Some Christian friends—possibly Aquila and Priscilla, who had returned to Rome (Rom. 16:3), would be glad to receive him, though he would soon find himself more at liberty in a house of his own. to whom he expounded and testified the kingdom of God—opening up the great spiritual principles of that kingdom in opposition to the contracted and secular views of it entertained by the Jews.

persuading them concerning Jesus—as the ordained and predicted Head of that kingdom. out of the law . . . and the prophets—drawing his materials and arguments from a source mutually acknowledged. from morning till evening—"Who would not wish to have been present?" exclaims BENGEL; but virtually we are present while listening to those Epistles which he dictated from his prison at Rome, and to his other epistolary expositions of Christian truth against the Jews. and some believed . . . some not—What simplicity and candor are in this record of a result repeated from age to age where the Gospel is presented to a promiscuous assemblage of sincere and earnest inquirers after truth, frivolous worldlings, and prejudiced bigots! 25-29. when they—the Jews—agreed not among themselves—the discussion having passed into one between the two parties into which the visitors were now divided, respecting the arguments and conclusions of the apostle.

they departed—the material of discussion being felt by both parties to be exhausted.

ADAM CLARKE

22. For as concerning this sect. See the note on chap. xxiv. 14. A saying of Justin Martyr casts some light on this saying of the Jews. He asserts that the Jews not only cursed them in their synagogues, but they sent out chosen men from Jerusalem to acquaint the world, and particularly the Jews everywhere, that the Christians were an atheistical and wicked sect, which should be detested and abhorred by all mankind (Justin Martyr, Dial., p. 234).

23. To whom he expounded . . . the kingdom of God. To whom he showed that the reign of the Messiah was to be a spiritual reign; and that Jesus, whom the Jewish rulers had lately crucified, was the true Messiah, who should rule in this spiritual Kingdom. These two points were probably those on which he expatiated from morning to evening, proving both out of the law and out of the prophets.

24. Some believed. His message was there treated as his gospel is to the present day. Some believe and are converted; others continue in obstinate unbelief and perish. Could the Jews then have credited the spiritual nature of the Messiah's kingdom, they would have found little difficulty to receive Jesus Christ as the Messiah.

25. Agreed not among themselves. It seems that a controversy arose between the Jews themselves, in consequence of some believing and others disbelieving, and the two parties contested together; and in respect to the unbelieving party, the apostle quoted the following passage from Isa. vi. 9.

sealed up under unbelief. Turn to that scripture (Isa. vi. 9, 10), and tremble lest the case there described should prove to be your case." As there are in the Old Testament gospel promises, which will be accomplished in all that believe, so there are gospel threatenings of spiritual judgments, which will be fulfilled in those that believe not. Isaiah the prophet is sent to make those worse that would not be made better. Well spoke the Holy Ghost by Esaias the prophet unto our fathers. Though what is there said had in it much of terror to the people and of grief to the prophet, yet it is here said to be well spoken. He that believes not shall be damned is gospel, as well as, He that believes shall be saved, Mark xvi. 16. "Well did Esaias prophesy of you. The Holy Ghost said to your fathers, that which would be fulfilled in you, Hearing you shall hear, and shall not understand." (1) "That which was their great sin against God is yours. Your eyes you have closed," v. 27. "As your fathers would not see God's hand lifted up against them in his judgments, so you will not see God's hand stretched out to you in gospel grace." They did not see, because they were resolved they would not, and none so blind as those that will not see. They have purposely closed their eyes, lest they should see with their eyes the great things which belong to their everlasting peace; will not receive the evidence of them, lest they should hear with their ears. And that which they are afraid of in shutting up their eyes and ears, is, lest they should understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them. They kept their mind in the dark, or at least in a constant confusion and tumult. God's method is to bring people first to see and hear, and so to understand with their hearts, and then to bow their wills, and so heal them, which is the regular way of dealing with a rational soul; and therefore Satan prevents the conversion of souls to God by blinding the mind and darkening the understanding. And the case is very sad when the sinner joins with him herein, and puts out his own eyes. They are in love with their disease, and are afraid lest God should heal them. This was the sin. (2) "That which was the great judgment of God upon them for this sin is his judgment upon you, and that is, you shall be blind. Hearing you shall hear—but you shall not understand it; because you will not give your minds to understand it, God will not give you strength and grace to understand it. Seeing you shall see but you shall not perceive." What with their resisting the grace of God and rebelling against the light, and God's withdrawing and withholding his grace and light from them,—what with their not receiving the love of the truth, and God's giving them up for that to strong delusions, to believe a lie, the heart of this people is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing. No physic that can be given them operates upon them, and therefore their disease must be adjudged incurable. And how should those be healed that will not be converted to the use of the methods of cure? And how should those be converted that will not be convinced either of their disease or of their remedy? And how should those be convinced that shut their eyes and stop their ears? When once they are thus given up to hardness of heart, they are already in the suburbs of hell.

2. "Your unbelief will justify God in sending the gospel to the Gentile world (v. 28): therefore seeing you put the grace of God away from you, and will not submit to the power of divine truth and love, be it known unto you that the salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles. They will hear it, and receive it, and be happy in it." Now Paul designs hereby, (1) To abate their displeasure at the preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles, by showing them the absurdity of it. They were angry that the salvation of God was sent to the Gentiles, but, if they thought that salvation of so small a value as not to be worthy of their acceptance, surely they could not grudge it to the Gentiles. The salvation of God was sent into the world, the Jews had the first offer of it, they would not accept the invitation which was given to them first to the wedding-feast and therefore must thank themselves if other guests be invited. (2) To improve their displeasure at the favour done to the Gentiles to their advantage, and to bring good out of that evil. The Jews have rejected the gospel of Christ, but it is not yet too late to repent of their refusal; they may say No, and take it, as the elder brother in the parable, Matt. xxi. 29. Is the gospel sent to the Gentiles? Let us go after it rather than come short of it. And will they hear it, who are thought to be out of hearing? And shall not we hear it, whose privilege it is to have God so nigh to us in all that we call upon him for? Thus he would have them shamed into the belief of the gospel by the welcome it met with among the after Paul had spoken one word—one solemn parting testimony, from those Scriptures regarded by both alike as "the Holy Ghost speaking" to Israel. Hearing, ye shall hear . . .—See on Matthew 13:13-15; and John 12:38-40. With what pain would this stern saying be wrung from him whose "heart's desire and prayer to God for Israel was that they might be saved," and who "had great heaviness and continual sorrow in his heart" on their account (Rom. 10:1; 9:2)!

the salvation of God is sent to the Gentiles, and they will hear—See on ch. 13:44-48. "This 'departure to the Gentiles' he had intimated to the perverse Jews at Antioch (ch. 13:46), and at Corinth (ch. 18:6); now at Rome: thus in Asia, Greece, and Italy" [BENGEL].

26. Hearing ye shall hear. See the notes on Matt. xiii. 14 and John xii. 39-40.

28. The salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles. Paul had spoken to this effect twice before, chap. xiii. 46 and chap. xviii. 6, where see the notes. But here he uses a firmer tone, being out of the Jewish territories and under the protection of the emperor. By the salvation of God, all the blessings of the kingdom of Christ are intended. This salvation God could have sent unto the Gentiles independently of the Jewish disobedience; but He waited till they had rejected it, and then reprobated them, and elected the Gentiles. Thus the elect became reprobate, and the reprobate elect. They will hear it. That is, they will obey it; for akouein signifies not only "to hear" but also "to obey."

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

This whole book of the Acts is the story of God's final striving with the Hebrew people. In the life of our Lord He came first to the Hebrew, the Jew. He said upon one occasion to a woman who asked His help: "It is not meet to take the children's bread, and cast it to the dogs." That little incidental word revealed the fact that He came first to the Hebrew people. They rejected Him. They had their new opportunity beyond his rejection at Pentecost, and yet another in that period in which this man had stood in Jerusalem. Jerusalem finally rejected Christ when it rejected Paul. After that Paul strove to reach them in every city. He went first to the synagogue, first to the Hebrew. The word of Paul in Rome was the final word. Before very many years had gone, after a period of oppression, tyranny, and suffering, the Roman eagles were carried through Jerusalem, and the nation was swept out. It was the occasion of the last and solemn abandonment of the people, this word spoken by Paul to the Hebrew rulers in that city of Rome, the central city of the world.

The words he quoted were words which had been spoken to Isaiah in that great vision, the record of which we have in the sixth chapter, when his whole ministry was changed. Our Lord quoted these very words in the thirteenth chapter of Matthew, in the course of the parables of the Kingdom. When He was showing why the Kingdom was to be taken from the Jewish people, He quoted the same words. John also quoted exactly the same word in the twelfth chapter of his Gospel, where he was giving the last things in the presentation of the Kingdom to Israel. Mark these occurrences of these words in the Bible: Isaiah, Jesus, John, and Paul. If we say that Paul quoted them from Isaiah, we shall say that which is correct, but do not forget that they were not the words of Isaiah, but the words of Jehovah spoken to Isaiah about these people. The declaration is that they themselves had closed their eyes because they would not see; and therefore God had made them blind; that they themselves had hardened their heart because they would not yield; and therefore God handed them over to their own hardness of heart. But it is interesting and solemn to remember that here in Rome, the city to whose yoke the Hebrew people had bowed the neck anew, in order to encompass the death of Christ, Paul's final word of excommunication was spoken.—The Acts of the Apostles Gentiles. And, if it had not that effect upon them, it would aggravate their condemnation.

IV. The breaking up of the assembly, as it should seem, in some disorder. They turned their backs upon Paul. When Paul had said these words, he had said enough for them, and they departed, no more affected, either with those terrible words in the close of his discourse or all the comfortable words he had spoken before, than the seats they sat on. They set their faces one against another; for they had great disputes among themselves. Those that agreed to depart from Paul, yet agreed not in the reasons why they departed, but had great reasoning among themselves. Many have great reasoning who yet do not reason right. Nor will men's reasoning among themselves convince them, without the grace of God to open their understandings.

Verses 30, 31

We are here taking our leave of the history of blessed Paul. We should carefully take notice of every particular of the circumstances in which we must here leave him.

I. It cannot but be trouble to us that we must leave him in bonds for Christ. Two whole years of that good man's life are here spent in confinement. He appealed to Cæsar, in hope of a speedy discharge from his imprisonment, and yet he is detained a prisoner. Then his bonds in Christ were manifest in Cæsar's court, as he says, Phil. i. 13. During these two years' imprisonment he wrote his epistles to the Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, and to Philemon. How or by what means he obtained his liberty we are not told, only that two years he was a prisoner. Tradition says that after his discharge he went from Italy to Spain, thence to Crete, and so with Timothy into Judæa, and thence went to visit the churches in Asia, and at length came a second time to Rome, and there was beheaded in the last year of Nero. It would grieve one to think that such a useful man as Paul was should be so long in restraint. Two years he was a prisoner under Felix (ch. xxiv. 27), and he is here two years more a prisoner under Nero. How many churches might Paul have planted if he had been at liberty! But God will show that he is no debtor to the most useful instruments he employs, but will carry on his own interest, both without their services and by their sufferings. Even Paul's bonds fell out to the furtherance of the Gospel, Phil. i. 12–14. Yet even Paul's imprisonment was in some respects a kindness to him, for these two years he dwelt in his own hired house, and that was more, for aught I know, than ever he had done before. Such a retirement as this would be a refreshment to one who had been all his days an itinerant. Now he lived for two years in the same house; so that the bringing of him into this prison was like Christ's call to his disciples to come into a desert place, and rest awhile, Mark vi. 31. When he was at liberty, he was in continual fear by reason of the lying in wait of the Jews (ch. xx. 19), but now his prison was his castle.

II. Yet it is a pleasure to us that, though we leave him in bonds for Christ, yet we leave him at work for Christ. His prison becomes a temple, a church, and then it is to him a palace. Thanks be to God, his mouth is not stopped; a faithful zealous minister can better bear any hardship than being silenced. He is bound, but the word of the Lord is not bound. He was glad to see some of them (v. 15), but it would not be half his joy unless he could impart to them some spiritual gift, which here he has an opportunity to do.

1. To whom he preached. Whoever would had liberty to come to his house to hear, and they were welcome. Ministers' doors should be open to such as desire to receive instruction from them. When we cannot do what we would in the service of God we must do what we can. He received all that came to him, and was not afraid of the greatest, nor ashamed of the meanest. He might hope the better to speed because they came in unto him, which supposed a desire to be instructed and a willingness to learn, and where these are it is probable that some good may be done.

2. What he preached. He is God's ambassador, and therefore preaches the kingdom of God. He meddles not with the affairs of the kingdoms of men; let those treat of them whose work it is. He preaches the kingdom of God among men; the same that he defended in his public disputes, testifying the kingdom of God (v. 23), he enforced in his public preaching, as that which will make us all wise and good, wiser and better, which is the end of preaching. He is an agent for Christ, and therefore teaches those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ—the whole history of Christ, all that relates to the mystery of godliness. Paul stuck still to his principle—to know and preach nothing but Christ; and him crucified.

the Jews departed, and had great –'much'–reasoning among themselves–"This verse is wanting in many MSS. [and omitted by several recent editors], but certainly without reason. Probably the words were regarded as superfluous, as they seem to tell us what we were told before, that Paul 'departed' (see vs. 25). But in vs. 25 it is the breaking off of the discourse that is meant, here the final departure from the house" [OLSHAUSEN]. 30. in his own hired house–(see on vs. 23), yet still in custody, for he only "received all that came to him"; and it is not said that he went to the synagogue or anywhere else. with all confidence, no man forbidding him–enjoying, in the uninterrupted exercise of his ministry, all the liberty of a guarded man.

Thus closes this most precious monument of the beginnings of the Christian Church in its march from east to west, among the Jews first, whose center was Jerusalem; next among the Gentiles, with Antioch for its headquarters; finally, its banner is seen waving over imperial Rome, foretokening its universal triumphs. That distinguished apostle whose conversion, labors, and sufferings for "the faith which once he destroyed" occupy more than half of this History, it leaves a prisoner, unheard, so far as appears, for two years. His accusers, whose presence was indispensable, would have to await the return of spring before starting for the capital, and might not reach it for many months; nor, even when there, would they be so sanguine of success–after Felix, Festus, and Agrippa had all pronounced him innocent–as to be impatient of delay. And if witnesses were required to prove the charge advanced by Tertullus, that he was "a mover of sedition among all the Jews throughout the [Roman] world" (ch. 24:5), they must have seen that unless considerable time was allowed them the case would certainly break down. If to this be added the capricious delays which the emperor himself might interpose, and the practice of Nero to hear but one charge at a time, it will not seem strange that the historian should have no proceedings in the case to record for two years. Begun, probably, before the apostle's arrival, its progress at Rome under his own eye would furnish exalted employment, and beguile many a tedious hour of his two years' imprisonment. Had the case come on for hearing during this period, much more if it had been disposed of, it is hardly conceivable that the History should have closed as it does. But if, at the end of this period, the Narrative only wanted the decision of the case, while hope deferred was making the heart sick (Prov. 13:12), and if, under the guidance of that Spirit whose seal was on it all, it seemed of more consequence to put the Church at once in possession of this History than to keep it back indefinitely for the sake of what might come to be otherwise known, we cannot wonder that it should be wound up as it is in its two concluding verses. All that we know of the apostle's proceedings and history beyond this must be gathered from the Epistles of the Imprisonment–Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon–written during this period, and the Pastoral Epistles–to Timothy and Titus, which, in our judgment, are of subsequent date. From the former class of Epistles we learn the following particulars: (1) That the trying restraint laid upon the apostle's labors by his imprisonment had only turned his influence into a new channel; the Gospel having in consequence penetrated even into the palace, and pervaded the city, while the preachers of Christ were emboldened; and though the Judaizing portion of them, observing his success among the Gentiles, had been led to inculcate with fresh zeal their own narrower Gospel, even this had done much good by extending the truth common to both (see on Phil. 1:12-18; 4:22); (2) That as in addition to all his other labors, "the care of all the churches pressed upon him from day to day" (II Cor. 11:28), so with these churches he kept up an active correspondence by means of letters and messages, and on such errands he lacked not faithful and beloved brethren enough ready to be employed–Luke; Timotheus; Tychicus; (John) Mark; Demas; Aristarchus; Epaphras; Onesimus; Jesus, called Justus; and, for a short time, Epaphroditus. (See on Col. 4:7, 9-12, 14; Philemon 23, 24; and Introduction to Ephesians, Philippians, and Philemon.) That the apostle suffered martyrdom under Nero at Rome has never been doubted. But that the appeal which brought him to Rome issued in his liberation, that he was at large for some years thereafter and took some wide missionary circuits, and that he was again arrested, carried to Rome, and then executed–was the undisputed belief of the early Church, as expressed by CHRYSOSTOM, JE-

ADAM CLARKE

30. Paul dwelt two whole years in his own hired house. As a state prisoner, he might have had an apartment in the common prison; but peculiar favor was showed him, and he was permitted to dwell alone, with the soldier that guarded him, v. 16. Finding now an opportunity of preaching the gospel, he hired a house for the purpose. Here he received all that came unto him, and preached the gospel with glorious success; so that his bonds became the means of spreading the truth, and he became celebrated even in the palace of Nero, Phil. i. 12-13; and we find that there were several saints even in Caesar's household, Phil. iv. 22. While he was in captivity, the church at Philippi, to which he was exceedingly dear, sent him some pecuniary assistance by the hands of their minister, Epaphroditus, who, it appears, risked his life in the service of the apostle, and was taken with a dangerous malady. When he got well, he returned to Philippi and, it is supposed, carried with him that Epistle which is still extant. From it we learn that Timothy was then at Rome with Paul, and that he had the prospect of being shortly delivered from his captivity. See Phil. i. 12-13; ii. 25; iv. 15-16, 18, etc.

31. Preaching the kingdom of God. Showing the spiritual nature of the true Church, under the reign of the Messiah. Those things which concern the Lord. The Redeemer of the world was to be represented as the Lord, as Jesus, and as the Christ. As the Lord, the sole Potentate, the Maker and Upholder of all things, and the Judge of all men. As Jesus—the "Saviour"; He who saves, delivers, and preserves; and especially He who saves His people from their sins. As Christ—the same as Messiah, both signifying the "anointed"; He who was appointed by the Lord to this great and glorious work, who had the Spirit without measure, and who anoints, communicates the gifts and graces of that Spirit to all true believers. Paul taught the things which concerned or belonged to the Lord Jesus Christ. He proved Him to be the Messiah foretold by the prophets and expected by the Jews; he spoke of what He does as the Lord, what He does as Jesus, and what He does as Christ. With all confidence. "Liberty of speech"; perfect freedom to say all he pleased, and when he pleased. He had the fullest toleration from the Roman government to preach as he pleased and what he pleased, and the unbelieving Jews had no power to prevent him. It is supposed that it was during this residence at Rome he converted Onesimus, and sent him back to his master, Philemon, with the Epistle which is still extant. And it is from vv. 22 and 24 of that Epistle that we learn that Paul had then with him Epaphras, Marcus, Aristarchus, Demas, and Luke.

MATTHEW HENRY

3. With what liberty he preached. Divine grace gave him a liberty of spirit. He preached with all confidence. He was not ashamed of the gospel of Christ. Divine Providence gave him a liberty of speech: No man forbidding him. The Jews that used to forbid him to speak to the Gentiles had no authority here; and the Roman government as yet took no cognizance of the profession of Christianity as a crime. It set bounds to the rage of persecutors; there were many, both Jews and Gentiles, in Rome, that hated Christianity; and yet so it was that Paul though a prisoner was connived at in preaching the gospel. Though there were so many that had it in their power to forbid Paul's preaching, yet God so ordered it, that no man did forbid him. See God here providing comfort for the relief of the persecuted. Though it was not a wide door that was opened to him, yet it was kept open, and it was to many an effectual door, so that there were saints even in Cæsar's household, Phil. iv. 22. When the city of our solemnities is thus made a quiet habitation at any time, we must give thanks to God for it, still longing for that holy mountain in which there shall never be any pricking brier nor grieving thorn.

ROME, and EUSEBIUS, in the fourth century, up to CLEMENT of Rome, the "fellow laborer" of the apostle himself (Phil. 4:3), in the first century. The strongest possible confirmation of this is found in the Pastoral Epistles, which bear marks throughout of a more advanced state of the Church, and more matured forms of error, than can well have existed at any period before the appeal which brought the apostle to Rome; which refer to movements of himself and Timothy that cannot without some straining (as we think) be made to fit into any prior period; and which are couched in a manifestly riper style than any of his other Epistles. (See Introduction to Timothy and Titus, and Notes.) All this has been called in question by modern critics of great research and acuteness [PETAVIUS, LARDNER, DE WETTE, WIESELER, DAVIDSON, and others]. But those who maintain the ancient view are of equal authority and more numerous, while the weight of argument appears to us to be decidedly on their side.

ADAM CLARKE

Here Luke's account of Paul's travels and sufferings ends, and it is probable that this history was written soon after the end of the two years mentioned in v. 30. That the apostle visited many places after this, suffered much in the great cause of Christianity, and preached the gospel of Jesus with amazing success, is generally believed. How he came to be liberated we are not told; but it is likely that, having been kept in this sort of confinement for about two years, and none appearing against him, he was released by the imperial order. Concerning the time, place, and manner of his death we have little certainty. It is commonly believed that, when a general persecution was raised against the Christians by Nero, about A.D. 64, under pretense that they had set Rome on fire, both Paul and Peter then sealed the truth with their blood, the latter being crucified with his head downward, the former being beheaded, in either A.D. 64 or 65.

THE EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS

I. Introduction (1:1-15)
A. The address (1:1-7)
B. Personal interest (1:8-13)
C. The reason of the letter (1:14-15)

II. The Gospel—unto salvation (1:16-11:36)
A. Fundamental affirmation (1:16-17)
B. Condemnation—the Gospel needed (1:18-3:20)
1. The Gentile condemned (1:18-32)
2. The Jew condemned (2:1-3:8)
3. The whole world guilty (3:9-20)
C. Salvation—the Gospel message (3:21-8:39)
1. Justification (3:21-5:21)
2. Sanctification (6:1-8:17)
3. Glorification (8:18-39)
D. Objections discussed (9:1-11:36)
1. Election (9:1-33)
2. Rejection (10:1-21)
3. Restoration (11:1-36)

III. The transformation—by salvation (12:1-15:13)
A. Final appeal (12:1, 2)
B. Simplicity—personal life (12:3-21)
1. The character of humility (12:3)
2. The consciousness of communion (12:4-8)
3. The conduct of simplicity (12:9-21)
C. Submission—relative life (13:1-14)
1. Definition (13:1-10)
2. Inspiration (13:11-14)
D. Sympathy—relative life (14:1-15:13)
1. Sympathy as toleration (14:1-12)
2. Sympathy as edification (14:13-23)
3. Sympathy as hospitality (15:1-13)

IV. Conclusion (15:14-16:27)
A. Personal matters (15:14-16:24)
B. Closing doxology (16:25-27)

In the Old Testament David's Psalms, and in the New Testament Paul's Epistles, are stars of the first magnitude. We have upon record several particular epistles, more of Paul's than of any other. His apprehension was quick and piercing; his expressions were fluent and copious; his affections very warm and zealous, and his resolutions no less bold and daring: this made him, before his conversion, a very keen and bitter persecutor. He became the most skillful zealous preacher; never any better fitted to win souls, nor more successful.

This epistle to the Romans is placed first, not because of the priority if its date, but because of the superlative excellency of the epistle, it being one of the longest and fullest of all. It is gathered from some passages in the epistle that it was written A.D. 56, from Corinth. Paul was now going to Jerusalem with the money that was given to the poor saints there; and of that he speaks (15:26). The great mysteries treated of in this epistle must needs produce many things dark and hard to be understood (2 Pet. 3:16). The former part of it doctrinal, in the first eleven chapters; the latter part practical, in the last five.

I. The doctrinal part of the epistle instructs us—
1. Concerning the way of salvation.
2. Concerning the persons saved, such as belong to the election of grace, Gentiles and Jews. Two things the Jews then stumbled at—justification by faith without the works of the law, and the admission of the Gentiles into the chruch; and therefore both these he studied to clear and vindicate.

II. The practical part follows.

III. As he draws toward a conclusion, he makes an apology for writing to them, sends particular salutations to many friends there, adds the salutations of his friends with him, and ends with a benediction to them and a doxology to God.

CHAPTER 1

I. The person who writes the epistle described (v. 1): Paul, a servant of Jesus Christ; this is his title of honour, which he glories in, a servant.

Called to be an apostle. Christ sought him to make an apostle of him, Acts ix. 15. He here builds his authority upon his call; he did not run without sending. Called an apostle, as if this were the name he would be called by, though he acknowledged himself not meet to be called so, 1 Cor. xv. 9.

Separated to the gospel of God. The Pharisees had their name from separation, because they separated themselves to the study of the law, such a one Paul had formerly been; but now he had changed his studies, was a gospel Pharisee, separated by the counsel of God (Gal. i. 15), separated from his mother's womb. He was an entire devotee to the gospel of God.

Vss. 1-17. INTRODUCTION. 1. Paul—see on Acts 13:9—a servant of Jesus Christ—The word here rendered "servant" means 'bond-servant,' or one subject to the will and wholly at the disposal of another. In this sense it is applied to the disciples of Christ at large (I Cor. 7:21-23), as in the Old Testament to all the people of God (Isa. 66:14). But as, in addition to this, the prophets and kings of Israel were officially "the servants of the Lord" (Josh. 1:1; Ps. 18, title), the apostles call themselves, in the same official sense, "the servants of Christ" (as here, and Phil. 1:1; Jas. 1:1; II Pet. 1:1; Jude 1), expressing such absolute subjection and devotion to the Lord Jesus as they would never have yielded to a mere creature. (See on vs. 7; and on John 5:22, 23.) called to be an apostle—when first he "saw the Lord"; the indispensable qualification for apostleship. (See on Acts 9:5; 22:14; I Cor. 9:1.)

separated unto the—preaching of the—gospel—neither so late as when "the Holy Ghost said, Separate me Barnabas and Saul" (Acts 13:2), nor so early as when "separated from his mother's womb" (see on Gal. 1:15). He was called at one and the same time to the faith and the apostleship of Christ (Acts 26:16-18). of God—i.e., the Gospel of which God is the glorious Author. (So ch. 15: 16; I Thess. 2:2, 8, 9; I Pet. 4:17.) 2. Which he

1. Paul, a servant of Jesus Christ. The word here translated servant properly means a "slave," one who is the entire property of his master, and is used here by the apostle with great propriety. He felt he was not his own, and that his life and powers belonged to his heavenly Owner, and that he had no right to dispose of or employ them but in the strictest subserviency to the will of his Lord. In this sense, and in this spirit, he is the willing slave of Jesus Christ; and this is, perhaps, the highest character which any soul of man can attain on this side of eternity. Called to be an apostle. The word apostle, from apostellein, "to send," signifies simply a "messenger" or "envoy"; one sent on a confidential errand. But here it means an extraordinary messenger, one sent by God himself to deliver the most important message on behalf of his Maker—in a word, one sent by the divine authority to preach the gospel to the nations. The word kletos, called, signifies here the same as "constituted," and should be joined with apostolos, as it is in the Greek, and translated thus: "Paul, a servant of Jesus Christ, constituted an apostle." This sense the word called has in many places of the sacred writings; e.g., "Behold, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed on us, that we should be called [constituted, or made] the sons of God." As it is likely that no apostle had been employed in founding the church at Rome, and there was need of much authority to settle the matters that were there in dispute, it was necessary he should show them that he derived his authority from God, and was immediately delegated by Him to preach and write as he was now doing. Separated unto the gospel. Set apart and appointed to this work, and to this only; as the Israelites were separate from all the people of the earth, to be the servants of God.

2. Which he had promised afore. Both in the

MATTHEW HENRY

II. Having mentioned the gospel of God, he digresses, to give us an encomium of it.

1. The antiquity of it. It was promised before (v. 2); it was of ancient standing in the promises and prophecies of the Old Testament.

2. The subject-matter of it: it is concerning Christ, v. 3, 4. The prophets and apostles all bear witness to him. When Paul mentions Christ, how he heaps up his names and titles, his Son Jesus Christ our Lord. He cannot go on in his discourse without some expression of love and honour, as here, where in one person he shows us his two distinct natures. (1) His human nature: Made of the seed of David (v. 3), that is, born of the virgin Mary, who was of the house of David (Luke i. 27). (2) His divine nature: Declared to be the Son of God (v. 4), according to the Spirit of holiness. According to the flesh, that is, his human nature, he was of the seed of David; but, according to the Spirit of holiness, that is, the divine nature, he is the Son of God. The great proof or demonstration of this is his resurrection from the dead. Those that would not be convinced by that would be convinced by nothing. So that we have here a summary of the gospel doctrine concerning Christ's two natures in one person.

3. The fruit of it (v. 5): By whom we have received grace and apostleship. Paul reckons the apostleship a favour. We may justly reckon it a great favour to be employed in any work or service for God. This apostleship was received for obedience to the faith, that is, to bring people to that obedience. Paul's was for this obedience among all nations, for he was the apostle of the Gentiles. Observe the description here given of the Christian profession: it is obedience to the faith. It does not consist in a notional knowledge, much less does it consist in perverse disputings, but in obedience. The act of faith is the obedience of the understanding to God revealing, and the product of that is the obedience of the will to God commanding. He here speaks of Christianity as an obedience. Christ has a yoke. "Among whom are you, v. 6. You Romans in this stand upon the same level with other Gentile nations of less fame and wealth; you are all one in Christ." No respect of persons with God. The called of Jesus Christ; all those, and those only, are brought to an obedience of the faith that are effectually called of Jesus Christ.

III. The persons to whom it is written (v. 7): To all that are in Rome, beloved of God, called to be saints; that is, to all the professing Christians that were in Rome, bond or free, learned or unlearned. Rich and poor meet together in Christ Jesus. The privilege of Christians: They are beloved of God. He hath a common love to all mankind and a peculiar love for true believers. The duty of Christians; and that is to be holy, for hereunto are they called, called to be saints. Saints, and only saints, are beloved of God with a special and peculiar love. Called saints, saints in profession; it were well if all that are called saints were saints indeed. It will be of little avail at the great day to have been called saints, if we be not really so.

IV. The apostolical benediction (v. 7): Grace to you and peace. It hath not only the affection of a good wish, but the authority of a blessing. The favours desired: Grace and peace. The Old Testament salutation was, Peace be to you; but now grace is prefixed—grace, that is, the favour of God towards us. All gospel blessings are included in these two: grace and peace. Peace, that is, all good. The fountain of those favours, from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ. All good comes, From God as a Father. We are taught, when we come for grace and peace, to call him our Father. From the Lord Jesus Christ, as Mediator. We have them from his fulness, peace from the fulness of his merit, grace from the fulness of his Spirit.

Verses 8–15

I. His thanksgiving for them (v. 8): First, I thank my God. It is good to begin everything with blessing God. He speaks this with delight and triumph. Through Jesus Christ. All our duties and performances are pleasing to God only through Jesus Christ, praises as well as prayers.—For you all. We must express our love to our friends, not only by praying for them, but by praising God for them. When some of the Roman Christians met him (Acts xxviii. 15), he thanked God for them, and took courage; but here his true catholic love extends itself further, and he thanks God for them all.—That your faith is spoken of. Wherever he came he heard great commendations of the Christians at Rome, which he mentions, not to make them proud, but to quicken them to answer the general character people gave of them. The greater reputation a man hath for religion, the more careful he should be to preserve it.—Throughout the whole world, that is, the Roman had promised afore . . . in the holy scriptures—Though the Roman Church was Gentile by nation (see on vs. 13), yet as it consisted mostly of proselytes to the Jewish faith (see Introduction to this Epistle), they are here reminded that in embracing Christ they had not cast off, but only the more profoundly yielded themselves to, Moses and the prophets (Acts 13:32, 33). 3, 4. Concerning his Son Jesus Christ our Lord—the grand burden of this "Gospel of God." made of the seed of David—as, according to "the holy scriptures," He behooved to be. (See on Matt. 1:1.) according to the flesh—i.e., in His human nature (cf. ch. 9:5, and John 1:14); implying, of course, that He had another nature, of which the apostle immediately proceeds to speak. And declared—lit., 'marked off,' 'defined,' 'determined,' i.e., 'shown,' or 'proved.' to be the Son of God—Observe how studiously the language changes here. He "was MADE [says the apostle] of the seed of David, according to the flesh"; but He was not made, He was only "declared [or proved] to BE the Son of God." So John 1:1, 14, "In the beginning WAS the Word . . . and the Word was MADE flesh"; and Isaiah 9:6, "Unto us a Child is BORN, unto us a Son is GIVEN." Thus the Sonship of Christ is in no proper sense a born relationship to the Father, as some, otherwise sound divines, conceive of it. By His birth in the flesh, that Sonship, which was essential and uncreated, merely effloresced into palpable manifestation. (See on Luke 1:35; Acts 13:32, 33.) with power—This may either be connected with "declared," and then the meaning will be 'powerfully declared' [LUTHER, BEZA, BENGEL, FRITZSCHE, ALFORD, etc.]; or (as in our version, and as we think rightly) with "the Son of God," and then the sense is, 'declared to be the Son of God in possession of that "power" which belonged to Him as the only-begotten of the Father, no longer shrouded as in the days of His flesh, but "by His resurrection from the dead" gloriously displayed and henceforth to be for ever exerted in this nature of ours" [VULGATE, CALVIN, HODGE, PHILIPPI, MEHRING, etc.]. according to the spirit of holiness—If "according to the flesh" means here, 'in His human nature,' this uncommon expression must mean 'in His other nature,' which we have seen to be that "of the Son of God"—an eternal, uncreated nature. This is here styled the "spirit," as an impalpable and immaterial nature (John 4:24), and "the spirit of holiness," probably in absolute contrast with that "likeness, of sinful flesh" which He assumed. One is apt to wonder that if this be the meaning, it was not expressed more simply. But if the apostle had said 'He was declared to be the Son of God according to the Holy Spirit,' the reader would have thought he meant 'the Holy Ghost'; and it seems to have been just to avoid this misapprehension that he used the rare expression, "the spirit of holiness." 5. By whom—as the ordained channel—we have received grace—the whole "grace that bringeth salvation"—and apostleship—for the publication of that "grace," and the organization of as many as receive it into churches of visible discipleship. (We prefer thus taking them as two distinct things, and not, with some good interpreters, as one—'the grace of apostleship.') for obedience to the faith—rather, 'for the obedience of faith'—i.e., in order to men's yielding themselves to the belief of God's saving message, which is the highest of all obedience. for his name—that He might be glorified. 6. Among whom are ye also—i.e., along with others; for the apostle ascribes nothing special to the Church of Rome (cf. I Cor. 14:36) [BENGEL]. the called—see on ch. 8:30—of Christ Jesus—i.e., either called 'by Him' (John 5:25), or the called 'belonging to Him'; 'Christ's called ones.' Perhaps this latter sense is best supported, but one hardly knows which to prefer. 7. beloved of God—(Cf. Deut. 33:12; Col. 3:12). Grace . . . (See on John 1:14). and peace—the peace which Christ made through the blood of His cross (Col. 1:20), and which reflects into the believing bosom . . . "the peace of God which passeth all understanding" (Phil. 4:7). from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ—"Nothing speaks more decisively for the divinity of Christ than these juxtapositions of Christ with the eternal God, which run through the whole language of Scripture, and the derivation of purely divine influences from Him also. The name of no man can be placed by the side of the Almighty. He only, in whom the Word of the Father who is Himself God became flesh, may be named beside Him; for men are commanded to honor Him even as they honor the Father (John 5:23)" [OLSHAUSEN]. 8. your faith is spoken of throughout the whole world—This was quite practicable through the frequent visits paid to the capital from all the provinces; and law and in the prophets God showed His purpose to introduce into the world a more perfect and glorious state of things; which state was to take place by and under the influence of the Messiah, who should bring life and immortality to light by His gospel.

3. Concerning his Son. That is, the gospel relates everything concerning the conception, birth, preaching, miracles, passion, death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus Christ, who was of the seed-royal, being, as far as His humanity was considered, the Son of David, and then the only rightful Heir to the Israelitish throne.

4. And declared to be the Son of God. The word which we render "declared" comes from horizo, to "bound, define, determine, or limit," and hence our word "horizon," the line that determines the farthest visible part of the earth, in reference to the heavens. In this place the word signifies such a manifest and complete exhibition of the subject as to render it indubitable. The resurrection of Christ from the dead was such a manifest proof of our Lord's innocence, the truth of His doctrine, and the fulfillment of all that the prophets had spoken, as to leave no doubt on any considerate and candid mind. With power. With a miraculous display of divine energy; for how could His body be raised again but by the miraculous energy of God?

According to the spirit of holiness. There are many differences of sentiment relative to the meaning of this phrase in this place; some supposing that the spirit of holiness implies the divine nature of Jesus Christ; others, His immaculate sanctity; etc. To me it seems that the apostle simply means that the Person called Jesus, lately crucified at Jerusalem, and in whose name salvation was preached to the world, was the Son of God, the very Messiah promised before in the Holy Scriptures; and that He was this Messiah was amply demonstrated. (1) By His resurrection from the dead, the irrefragable proof of His purity, innocence, and the divine approbation. (2) He was proved to be the Son of God, the promised Messiah, by the Holy Spirit (called here the spirit of holiness).

5. Grace and apostleship. The peculiar influence and the essential qualifications which such an office requires. For obedience to the faith. That by this office, which I have received from God, and the power by which it is accompanied, I might proclaim the faith, the gospel of Jesus; and show all nations the necessity of believing in it, in order to their salvation.

6. Ye are also the called. You Romans are all invited to believe in Christ Jesus, for the salvation of your souls; and to you, with the rest, my apostolical mission extends. This appears to be the most obvious sense of the word called in this place—to be called by the gospel is to be invited to believe in Christ Jesus, and become His disciples. The word sometimes means "constituted," or "made," as in v. 1.

7. Called to be saints. Invited to become holy persons, by believing the gospel and receiving the gifts of the Holy Ghost. Or, here, the word may have the meaning of "made" or "constituted," as above. Grace to you. May you be partakers of the divine favor, the source whence every blessing is derived. And peace. The same as shalom in Hebrew, generally signifying all kinds of blessing, but especially harmony and unity, and the bond of such unity. From God our Father. The apostle wishes them all the blessings which can flow from God, as the Fountain of grace, producing in them all the happiness which a heart filled with the peace of God can possess; all of which are to be communicated to them through the Lord Jesus Christ.

8. First, I thank my God. From this to the end of v. 17 belongs to the preface, in which the apostle endeavors to conciliate the good opinion of the Christians at Rome, and to prepare their empire. This was indeed a good name, a name for good things with God and good people. It is a desirable thing to be famous for faith. Rome was a city upon a hill, everyone took notice of what was done there. Thus those who have many eyes upon them have need to walk circumspectly, for what they do, good or bad, will be spoken of.

II. His prayer for them, v. 9. Though a famous flourishing church, yet they had need to be prayed for. One of the greatest kindnesses we can do our friends, and sometimes the only kindness that is in the power of our hands, is, by prayer to recommend them to the loving-kindness of God. From Paul's example here we may learn, Constancy in prayer: Always without ceasing. Charity in prayer: I make mention of you. He made express mention of them. It is not unfit sometimes to be express in our prayers for particular churches and places; not to inform God, but to affect ourselves. We are likely to have the most comfort in those friends that we pray most for. He makes a solemn appeal to the searcher of hearts: For God is my witness. It is very comfortable to be able to call God to witness to our constancy in the discharge of a duty. God is particularly a witness to our secret prayers. God, whom I serve with my spirit. Those that serve God with their spirits may, with a humble confidence, appeal to him; hypocrites who rest in bodily exercise cannot. His particular prayer was that he might have an opportunity of paying them a visit (v. 10): Making request, if by any means, &c. The expressions here used intimate that he was very desirous of such an opportunity: if by any means; that he had long and often been disappointed: now at length; and yet that he submitted it to the divine Providence: a prosperous journey by the will of God. Our journeys are prosperous or otherwise according to the will of God, comfortable or not as he pleases.

III. His great desire to see them, with the reasons of it, v. 11–15. Fruitful Christians are as much the joy as barren professors are the grief of faithful ministers. Accordingly, he often purposed to come, but was let hitherto (v. 13), for man purposeth, but God disposeth. Paul was for doing that first, not which was most pleasant (then he would have gone to Rome), but which was most needful.

1. That they might be edified (v. 11): That I may impart unto you. He received, that he might communicate. To the end you may be established. That as they grew upward in the branches they might grow downward in the root. The best saints have need to be more and more established.

2. That he might be comforted, v. 12. What he heard of their flourishing in grace was so much a joy to him that it must needs be much more so to behold it.—By the mutual faith both of you and me. It is very comfortable when there is a mutual confidence between minister and people, they confiding in him as a faithful minister, and he in them as a faithful people. It is very refreshing to Christians to compare notes about their spiritual concerns.—That I might have some fruit, v. 13. The more good he did the greater would his reward be.

3. That he might discharge his trust as the apostle of the Gentiles (v. 14): I am a debtor. His receivings made him a debtor. We should think of this when we covet great things, that all our receivings put us in debt; we are but stewards of our Lord's goods. His office made him a debtor. Paul had improved his talent, and laboured in his work, and done as much good as ever any man did, and yet, he still writes himself debtor.—Debtor to the Greeks, and to the barbarians, to the wise and to the unwise. The Greeks fancied themselves to have the monopoly of wisdom, and looked upon all the rest of the world as barbarians. Paul was a debtor to both, and looked upon himself as obliged to do all the good he could both to the one and to the other. Accordingly, we find him paying his debt, doing good both to Greeks and barbarians. For these reasons he was ready, if he had an opportunity, to preach the gospel at Rome, v. 15. Paul was ready to run the risk at Rome, if called to it: I am ready. It denotes a great readiness of mind. What he did was not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind.

Verses 16–18

Paul here enters upon a large discourse of justification, describing the deplorable condition of the Gentile world. He was ready to preach the gospel at Rome, for, I am not ashamed of it, v. 16. There is a great deal in the gospel which such a man as Paul might be tempted to be ashamed of, especially that he whose gospel it is was a man hanged upon a tree. Yet Paul was not ashamed to own it. I reckon him a Christian indeed that is neither ashamed of the gospel nor a shame to it.

the apostle, having an eye to the influence they would exercise upon others, as well as their own blessedness, given thanks for such faith to "his God through Jesus Christ," as being the source, according to his theology of faith, as of all grace in men.

9. For God . . . whom I serve—the word denotes religious service—with my spirit—from my inmost soul—in the gospel of his Son—to which Paul's whole religious life and official activity were consecrated—is my witness, that without ceasing I make mention of you always in my prayers—so for the Ephesians (Eph. 1:15, 15); so for the Philippians (Phil. 1:3, 4); so for the Colossians (Col. 1:3, 4); so for the Thessalonians (I Thess. 1:2, 3). What catholic love, what all-absorbing spirituality, what impassioned devotion to the glory of Christ among men!

10. Making request, if by any means now at length I may have a prosperous journey by the will of God, to come to you—Though long anxious to visit the capital, he met with a number of providential hindrances (vs. 13; ch. 15:22; and see on Acts 19:21; 23:11, 28:15); insomuch that nearly a quarter of a century elapsed, after his conversion, ere his desire was accomplished, and that only as "a prisoner of Jesus Christ." Thus taught that his whole future was in the hands of God, he makes it his continual prayer that at length the obstacles to a happy and prosperous meeting might be removed.

11, 12. For I long to see you, that I may impart to you some spiritual gift—not any supernatural gift, as the next clause shows, and cf. I Corinthians 1:7. to the end that ye may be established; That is, that I may be comforted together with you by the mutual faith both of you and me—"Not wishing to 'lord it over their faith,' but rather to be a 'helper of their joy,' the apostle corrects his former expressions: my desire is to instruct you and do you good, that is, for us to instruct and do one another good: in giving I shall also receive" [JOWETT]. "Nor is he insincere in so speaking, for there is none so poor in the Church of Christ who may not impart to us something of value: it is only our malignity and pride that hinder us from gathering such fruit from every quarter" [CALVIN]. How "widely different is the apostolic style from that of the court of Papal Rome!" [BENGEL.] 13. oftentimes I purposed to come unto you, but was let—hindered—hitherto—chiefly by his desire to go first to places where Christ was not known (ch. 15:20-24). that I might have some fruit—of my ministry—among you also, even as among other Gentiles—The GENTILE origin of the Church at Rome is here so explicitly stated, that those who conclude, merely from the Jewish strain of the argument, that they must have been mostly Israelites, decide in opposition to the apostle himself. (But see Introduction to this Epistle.) 14, 15. I am debtor both to the—cultivated—Greeks and to the—rude—Barbarians . . . So, as much as in me is, I am ready to preach the gospel to you that are at Rome also—He feels himself under an all-subduing obligation to carry the gospel to all classes of mankind, as adapted to and ordained equally for all (I Cor. 9:16).

16. For I am not ashamed of the gospel—(The words, "of Christ," which follow here, are not found in the oldest and best MSS.) This language implies that it required some courage to bring to 'the mistress of the world' what "to the Jews was a stumbling block and to the Greeks foolishness." But its inherent glory, as God's life-giving message to a dying world, so filled his soul, that, like his blessed Master, he "despised the shame."

minds for his reproofs and exhortations. Your faith is spoken of, is celebrated, throughout the whole world—in every place where the Christian religion is professed, through all parts of the Roman dominions; for in this sense we should understand the words the whole world.

9. Whom I serve with my spirit. Whom "I worship with the profoundest religious reverence," for so the original certainly means. I not only employ all the powers of my body in this service, but all those of my soul, being thoroughly convinced of the absolute truth of the religion I preach.

10. Making request. By this we see how earnestly the apostle longed to see Rome. It had long been a subject of continual prayer to God that he might have a prosperous journey to, or rather "meeting" with, them.

11. Some spiritual gift. This probably means some of the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Spirit, which, being given to them, might tend greatly to establish their faith in the gospel of Christ. It is very likely that such gifts were conferred only by means of apostles; and as the apostle had not yet been at Rome, consequently the Roman Christians had not yet received any of these miraculous gifts, and thus they differed widely from all the other churches which had been raised by the apostle's ministry.

13. But was let hitherto. The word let, from the Anglo-Saxon, lettan, to "hinder," signifies impediment or hindrance of any kind. But it is likely that the original word, "I was forbidden," refers to a divine prohibition; he would have visited them long before, but God did not see right to permit him.

14. I am debtor both to the Greeks, and to the Barbarians. All the nations of the earth, themselves excepted, were termed Barbarians by the Greeks.

15. I am ready to preach. I have a ready mind. I was prevented only by the providence of God from visiting you long ago.

16. I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ. This text is best illustrated by Isa. xxviii. 16; xlix. 23, quoted by the apostle, chap. x. 11: "For the scripture saith, Whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed"; i.e., they shall neither be confounded nor disappointed of their hope.

MATTHEW HENRY

I. The proposition, v. 16, 17. It reveals to us,

1. The salvation of believers as the end: It is the power of God unto salvation. Paul is not ashamed of the gospel; it shows us the way of salvation. It is through the power of God; without that power the gospel is but a dead letter. It is to those, and those only, that believe. The medicine prepared will not cure the patient if it be not taken.—To the Jew first. The lost sheep of the house of Israel had the first offer made them, both by Christ and his apostles. Upon their refusal the apostles turned to the Gentiles, Acts xiii. 46. Jews and Gentiles now stand upon the same level, both equally welcome to the Saviour. The long-expected Messiah proves a light to enlighten the Gentiles, as well as the glory of his people Israel.

2. The justification of believers as the way (v. 17): For therein is the righteousness of God revealed. That which will show us the way of salvation must needs show us the way of justification. The gospel makes known a righteousness. There is such a righteousness revealed in the gospel. This evangelical righteousness, (1) Is called the righteousness of God; it is of God's appointing. It is so called to cut off all pretensions to a righteousness resulting from the merit of our own works. It is the righteousness of Christ. (2) It is said to be from faith to faith. From the first faith, by which we are put into a justified state, to after faith, by which we live; from faith engrafting us into Christ, to faith deriving virtue from him as our root: both implied in the next words, The just shall live by faith. Just by faith, there is faith justifying us; live by faith, there is faith maintaining us. Faith is all in all, both in the beginning and progress of a Christian life. It is increasing, continuing, persevering faith. To show that this is no novel upstart doctrine, he quotes for it that famous scripture in the Old Testament: The just shall live by faith. Being justified by faith he shall live by it both the life of grace and of glory. Thus is the evangelical righteousness from faith to faith—from Old Testament faith in a Christ to come to New Testament faith in a Christ already come.

A. T. ROBERTSON:

"A righteousness of God" (dikaiosune theou). Subjective genitive, "a God kind of righteousness," one that each must have and can obtain in no other way save "from faith unto faith" (ek pisteos eis pistin), faith the starting point and faith the goal (Lightfoot). "Is revealed" (apokaluptetai). It is a revelation from God, this God kind of righteousness, that man unaided could never have conceived or still less attained. In these words we have Paul's statement in his own way of the theme of the Epistle, the content of the gospel as Paul understands it. Every word is important: soterian (salvation), euaggelion (gospel), apokaluptetai (is revealed), dikaiosune theou (righteousness of God), pistis (faith), and pisteuonti (believing). He grounds his position on Hab. 2:4 (quoted also in Gal. 3:11). By "righteousness" we shall see that Paul means both "justification" and "sanctification." It is important to get a clear idea of Paul's use of dikaiosune here, for it controls the thought throughout the Epistle. Jesus set up a higher standard of righteousness (dikaiosune) in the Sermon on the Mount than the scribes and Pharisees taught and practiced (Matt. 5:20) and proves it in various items. Here Paul claims that in the gospel, taught by Jesus and by himself, there is revealed a God kind of righteousness with two ideas in it (the righteousness that God has and that He bestows). It is an old word for quality from dikaios, a righteous man, and that from dike, right or justice (called a goddess in Acts 28:4), and that allied with deiknumi, to show, to point out.

—Word Pictures in the New Testament

for IT IS THE POWER OF GOD UNTO SALVATION TO EVERY ONE THAT BELIEVETH—Here and in the next verse the apostle announces the great theme of his ensuing argument; SALVATION, the one overwhelming necessity of perishing men; this revealed IN THE GOSPEL MESSAGE; and that message so owned and honored of God as to carry, in the proclamation of it, GOD'S OWN POWER TO SAVE EVERY SOUL THAT EMBRACES IT, Greek and Barbarian, wise and unwise alike. 17. For therein is the righteousness of God revealed—that is (as the whole argument of the Epistle shows), GOD'S JUSTIFYING RIGHTEOUSNESS. from faith to faith—a difficult clause. Most interpreters (judging from the sense of such phrases elsewhere) take it to mean, 'from one degree of faith to another.' But this agrees ill with the apostle's design, which has nothing to do with the progressive stages of faith, but solely with faith itself as the appointed way of receiving God's "righteousness." We prefer, therefore, to understand it thus: 'The righteousness of God is in the gospel message, revealed (to be) from (or "by") faith to (or "for") faith,' that is, 'in order to be by faith received.' (So substantially, MELVILLE, MEYER, STUART, BLOOMFIELD, etc.). as it is written—Habakkuk 2:4—The just shall live by faith—This golden maxim of the Old Testament is thrice quoted in the New Testament—here; Galatians 3:11; Hebrews 10:38—showing that the gospel way of 'LIFE BY FAITH,' so far from disturbing, only continued and developed the ancient method. On the foregoing verses, note (1) What manner of persons ought the ministers of Christ to be, according to the pattern here set up: absolutely subject and officially dedicated to the Lord Jesus; separated unto the gospel of God, which contemplates the subjugation of all nations to the faith of Christ: debtors to all classes, the refined and the rude, to bring the gospel to them all alike, all shame in the presence of the one, as well as pride before the other, sinking before the glory which they feel to be in their message; yearning over all faithful churches, not lording it over them, but rejoicing in their prosperity, and finding refreshment and strength in their fellowship! (2) The peculiar features of the gospel here brought prominently forward should be the devout study of all who preach it, and guide the views and the taste of all who are privileged statedly to hear it: that it is "the gospel of God," as a message from heaven, yet not absolutely new, but on the contrary, only the fulfilment of Old Testament promise, that not only is Christ the great theme of it, but Christ in the very nature of God as His own Son, and in the nature of men as partaker of their flesh—the Son of God now in resurrection-power and invested with authority to dispense all grace to men, and all gifts for the establishment and edification of the Church, Christ the righteousness provided of God for the justification of all that believe in His name; and that in this glorious Gospel, when preached as such, there resides the very power of God to save Jew and Gentile alike who embrace it. (3) While Christ is to be regarded as the ordained Channel of all grace from God to men (vs. 8), let none imagine that His proper divinity is in any respect compromised by this arrangement, since He is here expressly associated with "God the Father," in prayer for "grace and peace" (including all spiritual blessings) to rest upon this Church (vs. 7). (4) While this Epistle teaches, in conformity with the teaching of our Lord Himself, that all salvation is suspended upon faith, this is but half a truth, and will certainly minister to self-righteousness, if dissociated from another feature of the same truth, here explicitly taught, that this faith is God's own gift —for which accordingly in the case of the Roman believers, he "thanks his God through Jesus Christ" (vs. 8). (5) Christian fellowship, as indeed all real fellowship, is a mutual benefit; and as it is not possible for the most eminent saints and servants of Christ to impart any refreshment and profit to the meanest of their brethren without experiencing a rich return into their bosoms, so just in proportion to their humility and love will they feel their need of it and rejoice in it.

ADAM CLARKE

It is the power of God unto salvation. The almighty power of God accompanies this preaching to the souls of them that believe; and the consequence is they are saved; and what but the power of God can save a fallen, sinful soul? To the Jew first. Not only the Jews have the first offer of this gospel, but they have the greatest need of it; being so deeply fallen, and having sinned against such glorious privileges, they are much more culpable than the Gentiles, who never had the light of a divine revelation. And also to the Greek. Though the salvation of God has hitherto been apparently confined to the Jewish people, yet it shall be so no longer; for the gospel of Christ is sent to the Gentiles as well as the Jews, God having put no difference between them, and Jesus Christ having tasted death for every man.

17. For therein. In the gospel of Christ. Is the righteousness of God. God's method of saving sinners. Revealed from faith to faith. Shown to be by faith, and not by the works of any law. That righteousness signifies God's method of saving mankind by faith in Christ is fully evident from the use of the term in chap. ix. 30: "The Gentiles, which followed not after righteousness"—who had no knowledge, by revelation, of God's method of justifying and saving sinners, "have attained to righteousness"—have had imparted to them God's method of salvation by faith in Christ. V. 31: "But Israel," the Jews, "which followed after the law of righteousness"—that law, the end or object of which is Christ, and through Him justification to all that believe (chap. x. 4)—"hath not attained to the law of righteousness"—have not found out the genuine plan of salvation, even in that law which so strongly and generally proclaims justification by faith. And why have they not found it? V. 32: "Because they sought it not by faith, but as it were by the works of the law"—they did not discern that even its works or prescribed religious observances were intended to lead to faith in that glorious Mediator of whom they were the types and representatives; but the Jews trusted in the observances themselves, hoping to acquire justification and final salvation by that means. "For they stumbled at that stumblingstone"—at the doctrine of Christ crucified as the only sure ground on which the expectation of future salvation can be founded. Therefore, "being ignorant of God's righteousness"—God's method of saving sinners—"and going about to establish their own righteousness" —their own method of salvation, by the observance of those rites and ceremonies which should have led them by faith to Christ—they did not submit "themselves unto the righteousness of God"—they would not submit to be saved in God's way, and therefore rejected, persecuted, and crucified the Lord Jesus; see chap. x. 3. This collation of passages most evidently shows that the word righteousness here means simply God's method of saving sinners, or God's way of salvation, in opposition to the ways and means invented by the fancies or prejudices of men. There are few words in the sacred writings which are taken in a greater variety of acceptations than the word tsedakah in Hebrew, and dikaiosyne in Greek, both of which we generally translate righteousness. Our English word was originally "rightwiseness," and thus the righteous man was a person who was allowed to understand the claims of justice and right, and who, knowing them, acted according to their dictates. Such a man is thoroughly wise; he aims at the attainment of the best end by the use of the best means. This is a true definition of wisdom, and the righteous man is he that knows most and acts best. The Hebtew tsadak, in its ideal meaning, contains the notion of a beam or scales in equipoise, what we call "even balance." The just shall live by faith. This has been understood two ways: (1) That the just or righteous man cannot live a holy and useful life without exercising continual faith in our Lord Jesus—which is strictly true. (2) It is contended by some able critics that the words of the original text should be: "The just by faith, shall live"; that is, he alone that is justified by faith shall be saved—which is also true, as it is impossible to get salvation in any other way. This last meaning is probably the true one, as the original text in Hab. ii. 4 speaks of those who believed the declarations of God when the Chaldeans besieged Jerusalem, and, having acted con-

II. The proof of this proposition. Justification must be either by faith or works. It cannot be by works, and therefore he concludes it must be by faith. The apostle, like a skilful surgeon, before he applies the plaster, searches the wound—endeavours first to convince of guilt and wrath, and then to show the way of salvation. This makes the gospel the more welcome. In general (v. 18), the wrath of God is revealed. The light of nature and the light of the law reveal the wrath of God from sin to sin. It is well for us that the gospel reveals the justifying righteousness of God from faith to faith.

1. The sinfulness of man described; he reduceth it to two heads, ungodliness and unrighteousness.

2. The cause of that sinfulness, and that is, holding the truth in unrighteousness. Some ideas they had of the difference of good and evil; but they held them in unrighteousness. They held the truth as a captive or prisoner, that it should not influence them. An unrighteous wicked heart is the dungeon in which many a good truth is detained and buried.

3. The displeasure of God against it: The wrath of God is revealed from heaven; not only in the written word, but in the providences of God, his judgments executed upon sinners. They are a revelation from heaven. Or wrath from heaven is revealed; it is not the wrath of a man like ourselves, but wrath from heaven, therefore the more terrible.

Verses 19–32

I. The means and helps they had to come to the knowledge of God. Among them he left not himself without witness (Acts xiv. 17).

1. What discoveries they had: That which may be known of God is manifest among them; that is, there were some even among them that had the knowledge of God. That which may be known, which implies that there is a great deal which may not be known. The being of God may be apprehended, but cannot be comprehended. Finite understandings cannot perfectly know an infinite being; but, there is that which may be known.

2. Whence they had these discoveries: God hath shown it to them. Those common natural notions which they had of God were imprinted upon their hearts by the God of nature himself.

3. By what means these discoveries were confirmed, namely, by the work of creation (v. 20): For the invisible things of God, &c.

(1) Observe what they knew: The invisible things of him, even his eternal power and Godhead. The power and Godhead of God are invisible things, and yet are clearly seen in their products. He works in secret but manifests what he has wrought, and therein makes known his power and Godhead. They did come to the knowledge of the Godhead, at least so much knowledge as was sufficient to have kept them from idolatry. This was that truth which they held in unrighteousness.

(2) How they knew it: By the things that are made, which could not make themselves; and therefore must have been produced by some first cause or intelligent agent, which first cause could be no other than an eternal powerful God. The workman is known by his work. The concurrence of all the parts to the good and beauty of the whole, do abundantly prove a Creator and his eternal power and Godhead. Thus did the light shine in the darkness. And this from the creation of the world. To evince this truth, we have recourse to the great work of creation. The date of the discovery. It is as old as the creation of the world. These notices concerning God are ancient truths. The way of the acknowledgment of God is a good old way; it was from the beginning. Truth got the start of error.

II. Their gross idolatry, v. 21–23, 25. We shall the less wonder at the inefficacy of these natural discoveries to prevent the idolatry of the Gentiles if we remember how prone even the Jews were to idolatry; so miserably are the degenerate sons of men plunged in the mire of sense.

1. The inward cause of their idolatry, v. 21, 22. They are therefore without excuse, in that they did know God. Though some have greater light and means of knowledge than others, yet all have enough to leave them inexcusable. They glorified him not as God. To glorify him as God is to glorify him only; but they did not so glorify him, for they set up a multitude of other deities. To glorify him as God is to worship him with spiritual worship; but they made images of him. Not to glorify God as God is in effect not to glorify him at all. Neither were they thankful. Insensibleness of God's mercies is at the bottom of our sinful departures from him. But they became vain in their imaginations, in their reasonings, in their practical inferences. They had a great deal of knowledge of general truths (v. 19), but no prudence to

18. WHY THIS DIVINELY PROVIDED RIGHTEOUSNESS IS NEEDED BY ALL MEN. For the wrath of God—His holy displeasure and righteous vengeance against sin—is revealed from heaven—in the consciences of men, and attested by innumerable outward evidences of a moral government. against all ungodliness—i.e., their whole irreligiousness, or their living without any conscious reference to God, and proper feelings towards Him. and unrighteousness of men—i.e., all their deviations from moral rectitude in heart, speech, and behavior. (So these terms must be distinguished when used together, though, when standing alone, either of them includes the other.)

18-32. THIS WRATH OF GOD, REVEALED AGAINST ALL INIQUITY, OVERHANGS THE WHOLE HEATHEN WORLD. 18. who hold—rather, 'hold down,' 'hinder,' or 'keep back'—the truth in unrighteousness—The apostle, though he began this verse with a comprehensive proposition regarding men in general, takes up in the end of it only one of the two great divisions of mankind, to whom he meant to apply it; thus gently sliding into his argument. But before enumerating their actual iniquities, he goes back to the origin of them all, their stifling the light which still remained to them. As darkness overspreads the mind, so impotence takes possession of the heart, when the "still small voice" of conscience is first disregarded, next thwarted, and then systematically deadened. Thus "the truth" which God left with and in men, instead of having free scope and developing itself, as it otherwise would, was obstructed (cf. Matt. 6:22, 23; Eph. 4:17, 18). 19. Because that which may be—rather, 'which is'—known of God is manifest in them; for God hath showed it unto them—The sense of this pregnant statement the apostle proceeds to unfold in the next verse.

20. For the invisible things of him from—or 'since'—the creation of the world are clearly seen—the mind brightly beholding what the eye cannot discern—being understood by the things that are made—Thus, the outward creation is not the parent but the interpreter of our faith in God. That faith has its primary sources within our own breast (vs. 19); but it becomes an intelligible and articulate conviction only through what we observe around us ("by the things which are made," vs. 20). And thus are the inner and the outer revelation of God the complement of each other, making up between them one universal and immovable conviction that God is. (With this striking apostolic statement agree the latest conclusions of the most profound speculative students of Theism.) even his eternal power and Godhead—both that there is an Eternal Power, and that this is not a mere blind force, or pantheistic 'spirit of nature,' but the power of a living Godhead. so that they are without excuse—all their degeneracy being a voluntary departure from truth thus brightly revealed to the unsophisticated spirit.

21. Because that, when they knew God—that is, while still retaining some real knowledge of Him, and ere they sank down into the state next to be described—they glorified him not as God, neither were thankful—neither yielded the adoration due to Himself, nor rendered the gratitude which His beneficence demanded—but became vain—(cf. Jer. 2:5)—in their imaginations—thoughts, notions, speculations, regarding God; cf. Matt. 15:19; Luke 2:35; I Cor. 3:20, Greek—and their foolish—'senseless,' 'stupid'—heart—i.e., their whole inner man—was darkened—How instructively is the downward progress of the human soul here traced!

formably to them, escaped with their lives.

18. For the wrath of God is revealed. The apostle has now finished his preface, and comes to the grand subject of the Epistle; namely, to show the absolute need of the gospel of Christ, because of the universal corruption of mankind, which was so great as to incense the justice of God and call aloud for the punishment of the world. (1) He shows that all the heathen nations were utterly corrupt, and deserved this threatened punishment. And this is the subject of the first chapter, from v. 18 to the end. (2) He shows that the Jews, notwithstanding the greatness of their privileges, were no better than the Gentiles: and therefore the wrath of God was revealed against them also. This subject he treats in chap. ii. and chap. iii. 1-19. (3) He returns, as it were, on both, chap. iii. 20-31, and proves that, as the Jews and Gentiles were equally corrupt, they could not be saved by the deeds of any law; that they stood equally in need of that salvation which God had provided; that both were equally entitled to that salvation, for God was the God of the Gentiles as well as of the Jews. By the wrath of God we are not to understand any uneasy passion in the Divine Being; but the displeasure of His righteousness, which is expressed by the punishments inflicted on the ungodly, those who retain not God in their knowledge; and the unrighteous, those whose lives are profligate. As in the gospel the righteousness of God is revealed for the salvation of the ungodly, so is the wrath of God revealed against the workers of iniquity. Those who refuse to be saved in the way revealed by His mercy must be consumed in the way revealed by His justice. Ungodliness. Probably intended here to express atheism, polytheism, and idolatry of every kind. Unrighteousness. Everything contrary to strict morality; all viciousness and profligacy of conduct. Who hold the truth in unrighteousness. Some contend that the word here does not signify to hold, but to "hinder"; and that the place should be translated, "who through maliciousness hinder the truth"; i.e., prevent it from taking hold of their hearts, and from governing their conduct. This is certainly a very usual acceptation of the verb.

20. The invisible things of him. His invisible perfections are manifested by His visible works, and may be apprehended by what He has made; their immensity showing His omnipotence; their vast variety, His omniscience; and their adaptation to the most beneficent purposes, His infinite goodness. His eternal power. That all-powerful energy that ever was and ever will exist; so that, ever since there was a creation to be surveyed, there have been intelligent beings to make that survey. And Godhead. His acting as God in the government and support of the universe. His works prove His being.

21. Because that, when they knew God. When they thus acquired a general knowledge of the unity and perfections of the divine nature, they glorified him not as God—they did not proclaim Him to the people, but shut up His glory (as Bishop Warburton expresses it) in their mysteries, and gave the people, in exchange for an incorruptible God, an image made like to corruptible man. They glorified him not. They did not give Him that worship which His perfections required. Neither were thankful. They manifested no gratitude for the blessings they received from His providence but became vain in their imagination, "in their reasonings." This certainly refers to the foolish manner in which even the wisest of their philosophers discoursed about the divine nature, not excepting Socrates, Plato, or Seneca.

apply them to particular cases. They soon disputed themselves into a thousand vain and foolish fancies. When truth is forsaken, errors multiply. And their foolish heart was darkened. The foolishness and practical wickedness of the heart cloud and darken the intellectual powers and faculties. Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools, v. 22. Those that had the most luxuriant fancy, in framing to themselves the idea of a God, fell into the most gross and absurd conceits. Thus the world by wisdom knew not God. A proud conceit of wisdom is the cause of a great deal of folly. Paul's preaching was no where so laughed at and ridiculed as among the learned Athenians—conceiting themselves to be wise. The plain truth of the being of God would not content them; they thought themselves above that, and so fell into the greatest errors.

2. The outward acts of their idolatry, v. 23–25. (1) Making images of God (v. 23), by which they changed the glory of the incorruptible God. It was the greatest honour God did to man that he made man in the image of God; but it is the greatest dishonour man has done to God that he has made God in the image of man. This is called (v. 25) changing the truth of God into a lie. Idols are called lies, for they belie God, as if he had a body, whereas he is a Spirit. (2) Giving divine honour to the creature: Worshipped and served the creature, besides the Creator. They did in effect disown him by the worship they paid to the creature; for God will be all or none. Or, above the Creator, thinking the supreme God inaccessible. The sin itself was their worshipping the creature at all; but this is mentioned as an aggravation of the sin, that they worshipped the creature more than the Creator. This was the general wickedness of the Gentile world. Even the wise men among them, who knew and owned a supreme God and were convinced of the nonsense and absurdity of their polytheism and idolatry, yet did as the rest of their neighbours did. I mention this because methinks it doth fully explain that of the apostle here (v. 18): Who hold the truth in unrighteousness. Upon the mention of the dishonour done to God by the idolatry of the Gentiles the apostle expresses himself in an awful adoration of God: Who is blessed for ever. Amen. When we see or hear of any contempt cast upon God or his name, we should think and speak highly and honourably of him. In this as in other things, the worse others are, the better we should be.

III. The judgments of God upon them for this idolatry; not many temporal judgments but spiritual judgments, giving them up to the most brutish and unnatural lusts. He gave them up; it is thrice repeated here, v. 24, 26, 28. Spiritual judgments are of all judgments the sorest. By whom they were given up. God gave them up, in a way of righteous judgment, leaving them to themselves—letting them alone; for his grace is his own, he may give or withhold his grace at pleasure. This we are sure of that it is no new thing for God to give men up to their own hearts' lusts. And yet God is not the author of sin, for, though the greatest wickedness follow upon this giving up, the fault of that is to be laid upon the sinner's wicked heart. If the patient will not submit to the methods prescribed, but wilfully does that which is prejudicial to him, the physician is not to be blamed. The fatal symptoms that follow are not to be imputed to the physician, but to the disease itself and to the folly of the patient. To what they were given up.

1. To uncleanness and vile affections, v. 24, 26, 27. It is (as it is said here) through the lusts of their own hearts—there all the fault is to be laid. Those who dishonoured God were given up to dishonour themselves. A man cannot be delivered up to a greater slavery than to be given up to his own lusts. The particular instances of their uncleanness and vile affections are their unnatural lusts, for which many of the heathen, even of those among them who passed for wise men, were infamous. Perhaps the apostle especially refers to the abominations that were committed in the worship of their idol-gods. Dunghill service for dunghill gods. See what wickedness there is in the nature of man. How much are we beholden to the restraining grace of God! For, were it not for this, man, who was made but little lower than the angels, would make himself a great deal lower than the devils. This is said to be that recompence of their error which was meet.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

23. Professing themselves—'boasting,' or 'pretending to be—wise, they became fools—"It is the invariable property of error in morals and religion, that men take credit to themselves for it and extol it as wisdom. So the heathen" (I Cor. 1:21) [THOLUCK]. and changed —or 'exchanged'—the glory of the uncorruptible God into—or 'for'—an image . . . like to corruptible man—The allusion here is doubtless to the Greek worship, and the apostle may have had in his mind those exquisite chisellings of the human form which lay so profusely beneath and around him as he stood on Mars' Hill; and "beheld their devotions." (See on Acts 17:29.) But as if that had not been a deep enough degradation of the living God, there was found 'a lower deep' still. and to birds, and four-footed beasts, and to creeping things—referring now to the Egyptian and Oriental worship. In the face of these plain declarations of the descent of man's religious belief from loftier to ever lower and more debasing conceptions of the Supreme Being, there are expositors of this very Epistle (as REICHE and JOWETT), who, believing neither in any fall from primeval innocence, nor in the noble traces of that innocence which lingered even after the fall and were only by degrees obliterated by wilful violence to the dictates of conscience, maintain that man's religious history has been all along a struggle to rise, from the lowest forms of nature worship, suited to the childhood of our race, into that which is more rational and spiritual.

25. Who changed the truth of God into a lie—i.e., the truth concerning God into idol falsehood. and worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator—Professing merely to worship the Creator by means of the creature, they soon came to lose sight of the Creator in the creature. How aggravated is the guilt of the Church of Rome, which, under the same flimsy pretext, does shamelessly what the heathen are here condemned for doing, and with light which the heathen never had! who is blessed for ever! Amen—By this doxology the apostle instinctively relieves the horror which the penning of such things excited within his breast; an example to such as are called to expose like dishonor done to the blessed God.

Wherefore God also—in righteous retribution—gave them up—This divine abandonment of men is here strikingly traced in three successive stages, at each of which the same word is used (vs. 24; vs. 26; and vs. 28, where the word is rendered "gave over"). "As they deserted God, God in turn deserted them; not giving them divine (i.e., supernatural) laws, and suffering them to corrupt those which were human; not sending them prophets, and allowing the philosophers to run into absurdities. He let them do what they pleased, even what was in the last degree vile, that those who had not honored God, might dishonor themselves" [GROTIUS].

26, 27. For this cause God gave them up—See on vs. 24. for even their women—that sex whose priceless jewel and fairest ornament is modesty, and which, when that is once lost, not only becomes more shameless than the other sex, but lives henceforth only to drag the other sex down to its level. did change . . .—The practices here referred to, though too abundantly attested by classic authors, cannot be further illustrated, without trenching on things which "ought not to be named among us as become the saints." But observe how vice is here seen consuming and exhausting itself. When the passions, scourged by violent and continued indulgence in natural vices, became impotent to yield the craved enjoyment, resort was had to artificial stimulants by the practice of unnatural and monstrous vices. How early these were in full career, in the history of the world, the case of Sodom affectingly shows; and because of such abominations, centuries after that, the land of Canaan "spued out" its old inhabitants. Long before this chapter was penned, the Lesbians and others throughout refined Greece had been luxuriating in such debasements; and as for the Romans, TACITUS, speaking of the emperor Tiberius, tells us that new words had then to be coined to express the newly invented stimulants to jaded passion. No wonder that, thus sick and dying as was this poor humanity of ours under the highest earthly culture, its many-voiced cry for the balm in Gilead, and the Physician there, "Come over and help us," pierced the hearts of the missionaries of the Cross, and made them "not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ!" and receiving in themselves that recompense of their error which was meet—alluding to the many physical and moral ways in which, under the righteous government of God, vice was made self-avenging.

ADAM CLARKE

22. Professing themselves to be wise. This is most strikingly true of all the ancient philosophers, whether Greeks or Romans, as their works, which remain, sufficiently testify. The word signifies not merely the professing but the "assumption" of the philosophic character.

23. They changed the glory. The finest representation of their deities was in the human figure, and on such representative figures the sculptors spent all their skill. And when they had formed their gods according to the human shape, they endowed them with human passions. And to birds. As the eagle of Jupiter among the Romans, and the ibis and hawk among the Egyptians, which were all sacred animals. Four-footed beasts. As the ox among the Egyptians, from which the idolatrous Israelites took their golden calf. The goat, the monkey, and the dog were also sacred animals among the same people. Creeping things. Such as the crocodile and scarabeus, or beetle, among the Egyptians.

25. Changed the truth of God into a lie. In the place of the true worship of God, they established idolatry. In various places of Scripture idols are termed lies, Isa. xliv. 20; Jer. x. 14; and xiii. 25. The true God was known among the primitive inhabitants of the earth. Those who first became idolaters literally changed the truth of God into a lie; they did know the true God, but they put idols in His place.

24. God . . . gave them up. They had filled up the measure of their iniquities, and God, by permitting them to plunge into all manner of irregularities, thus, by one species of sin, inflicted punishment on another. Dishonour their own bodies. Probably alluding here to what is more openly expressed in vv. 26-27. Between themselves. "Of themselves," of their own free accord.

26. For this cause God gave them up. Their system of idolatry necessarily produced all kinds of impurity. How could it be otherwise, when the highest objects of their worship were adulterers, fornicators, and prostitutes of the most infamous kind, such as Jupiter, Apollo, Mars, Venus?

MATTHEW HENRY

2. To a reprobate mind in these abominations, v. 28.

(1) They did not like to retain God in their knowledge. The blindness of their understandings was caused by the wilful aversion of their wills and affections. They would neither know nor do anything but just what pleased themselves. There are many that have God in their knowledge, but they do not retain him there. Because it thwarts their lusts; they do not like it. There is a difference between the knowledge and the acknowledgment of God; the pagans knew God, but would not acknowledge him.

(2) Answerable to this wilfulness of theirs God gave them over to a wilfulness in the grossest sins, here called a reprobate mind. See whither a course of sin leads, and into what a gulf it plunges the sinner at last. This reprobate mind was a blind seared conscience, past feeling, Eph. iv. 19. Thus wilful hardness is justly punished with judicial hardness.—To do those things which are not convenient. And here he subjoins a black list of those unbecoming things which the Gentiles were guilty of. No wickedness, so contrary to the light of nature, but a reprobate mind will comply with it. By the histories of those times it appears that these sins here mentioned were reigning national sins. No fewer than twenty-three several sorts of sins and sinners are here specified, v. 29–31. It was time to have the gospel preached among them, for the world had need of reformation.

First, Sins against the first table: Haters of God. Here is the devil in his own colours, sin appearing sin. Every sin has in it a hatred of God. Proud men and boasters put those crowns upon their own heads which must be cast before his throne.

Secondly, Sins against the second table. In general here is a charge of unrighteousness. This is put first, for every sin is unrighteousness. It is especially put for second-table sins, doing as we would not be done by. Against the fifth commandment: Disobedient to parents, and without natural affection. Disobedient children are justly punished with unnatural parents; and unnatural parents with disobedient children. Against the sixth commandment: Wickedness (doing mischief for mischief's sake), maliciousness, envy, murder, debate, malignity, despiteful, implacable, unmerciful; all expressions of that hatred of our brother which is heart-murder. Against the seventh commandment: Fornication. Against the eighth commandment: Unrighteousness, covetousness. Against the ninth commandment: Deceit, whisperers, back-biters, covenant-breakers, inventors of evil things, and without understanding; wise to do evil, and yet having no knowledge to do good. So quick of invention in sin, and yet without understanding (stark fools) in the thoughts of God. Every heart by nature has in it the seed and spawn of all these sins.

F. B. MEYER:

From gross sins of the flesh. Few men knew as much as did Paul of the unutterableness of human need. In terrible words he enumerates its various aspects. Truth would enter human hearts from God's work in nature and from conscience; yet men pull down the blind and close the curtain. It is not that they do not know, but that they refuse to have God in their knowledge. They shun the thought of God (Ps. 10:4). They will not lift their happy faces toward him with filial confidence. Thus a heavy darkness steals over them and veils his presence.

The next downward step is uncleanness; and when once men have deliberately chosen the downward path, there is nothing to stop them. They go headlong from one point to another in their descent into darkness. When our hearts turn from the purifying presence of God, they become the haunt of every foul bird and noisome reptile. What a marvel it is that out of such material God can even create saints!

gave them over—or 'up'—see on vs. 24). to do those things which are not convenient—in the old sense of that word, i.e., 'not becoming,' 'indecorous,' 'shameful.' haters of God—The word usually signifies 'God-hated,' which some here prefer, in the sense of 'abhorred of the Lord'; expressing the detestableness of their character in His sight (cf. Prov. 22:14; Ps. 73:20). But the active sense of the word, adopted in our version and by the majority of expositors, though rarer, agrees perhaps better with the context. 32. Who knowing—from the voice of conscience, ch. 2:14, 15—the judgment of God—the stern law of divine procedure—that they which commit such things are worthy of death—here used in its widest known sense, as the uttermost of divine vengeance against sin: see Acts 28:4. not only do the same—which they might do under the pressure of temptation and in the heat of passion. but have pleasure in them that do them—deliberately set their seal to such actions by encouraging and applauding the doing of them in others. This is the climax of our apostle's charges against the heathen; and certainly, if the things are in themselves as black as possible, this settled and unblushing satisfaction at the practice of them, apart from all the blinding effects of present passion, must be regarded as the darkest feature of human depravity.—On this section, note, (1) "The wrath of God" against sin has all the dread reality of a "revelation from heaven" sounding in the consciences of men, in the self-inflicted miseries of the wicked, and in the vengeance which God's moral government, sooner or later, takes upon all who outrage it; so this "wrath of God" is not confined to high-handed crimes, or the grosser manifestations of human depravity, but is "revealed" against all violations of divine law of whatever nature—"against all ungodliness" as well as "unrighteousness of men," against all disregard of God in the conduct of life as well as against all deviations from moral rectitude; and therefore, since no child of Adam can plead guiltless either of "ungodliness" or of "unrighteousness," to a greater or less extent, it follows that every human being is involved in the awful sweep of "the wrath of God" (vs. 18). The apostle places this terrible truth in the forefront of his argument on justification by faith, that upon the basis of universal condemnation he might rear the edifice of a free, world-wide salvation; nor can the Gospel be scripturally preached or embraced, save as the good news of salvation to those that are all equally "lost." (2) We must not magnify the supernatural revelation which God has been pleased to make of Himself, through Abraham's family to the human race, at the expense of that older, and, in itself, lustrous revelation which He has made to the whole family of man through the medium of their own nature and the creation around them. Without the latter, the former would have been impossible, and those who have not been favored with the former will be without excuse, if they are deaf to the voice and blind to the glory of the latter (vss. 19, 20). (3) Wilful resistance of light has a retributive tendency to blunt the moral perceptions and weaken the capacity to apprehend and approve of truth and goodness; and thus is the soul prepared to surrender itself, to an indefinite extent, to error and sin (vs. 21, etc.). (4) Pride of wisdom, as it is a convincing evidence of the want of it, so it makes the attainment of it impossible (vs. 22; and cf. Matt. 11:25; I Cor. 3:18-20). (5) As idolatry, even in its most plausible forms, is the fruit of unworthy views of the Godhead, so its natural effect is to vitiate and debase still further the religious conceptions; nor is there any depth of degradation too low and too revolting for men's ideas of the Godhead to sink to, if only their natural temperament and the circumstances they are placed in be favorable to their unrestrained development (vss. 23, 25). The apostle had Greece and Egypt in his eye when he penned this description. But all the paganisms of the East at this day attest its accuracy, from the more elaborate idolatry of India and the simpler and more stupid idolatry of China down to the childish rudiments of nature worship prevalent among the savage tribes. Alas! Christendom itself furnishes a melancholy illustration of this truth; the constant use of material images in the Church of Rome and the materialistic and sensuous character of its entire service (to say nothing of the less offensive but more stupid service of the Greek Church,) debasing the religious ideas of millions of nominal Christians, and lowering the whole character and tone of Christianity as represented within their immense pale. (6) Moral corruption invariably follows religious debasement. The grossness of pagan idolatry is only equalled by the revolting

ADAM CLARKE

28. They did not like to retain God. It would, perhaps be more literal to translate, "They did not search to retain God in their knowledge." They did not examine the evidences before them (vv. 19-20) of His being and attributes; therefore God gave them over to a reprobate mind, to an "unsearching or undiscerning" mind, for it is the same word in both places. They did not reflect on the proofs they had of the divine nature, and God abandoned them to the operations of a mind incapable of reflection.

29. Being filled with all unrighteousness. Every vice contrary to justice and righteousness. Fornication. All commerce between the sexes out of the bounds of lawful marriage. Some of the best MSS. omit this reading. Wickedness. "Malignity," that which is oppressive to its possessor and to its object. Covetousness. The intense love or lust of gain, the determination to be rich, the principle of a dissatisfied and discontented soul. Maliciousness. "Malice, ill-will"; what is radically and essentially vicious. Full of envy. "Pain felt and malignity conceived at the sight of excellence or happiness in another." Murder. Taking away the life of another by any means; mortal hatred, for he that hates his brother in his heart is a murderer. Debate. "Contention, discord." Of this vile passion the Greeks made a goddess. Deceit. "Lying, falsity, prevarication, imposition." Malignity. Bad customs, founded in corrupt sentiment, producing evil habits, supported by general usage. It is generally interpreted a malignity of mind which leads its possessor to put the worst construction on every action, ascribing to the best deeds the worst motives. Whisperers. Secret detractors; those who, under pretended secrecy, carry about accusations against their neighbors, whether true or false, blasting their reputation by clandestine tittle-tattle. This word should be joined to the succeeding verse. The whispering is well expressed by the Greek word psithuristas.

30. Backbiters. Those who speak against others; false accusers, slanderers. Haters of God. Atheists, contemners of sacred things, maligners of providence, scorners. All profligate deists are of this class; and it seems to be the finishing part of a diabolic character. Despiteful. Stormy, boisterous; abusing both the characters and persons of those over whom they can have any power. Proud. They who are continually exalting themselves and depressing others, magnifying themselves at the expense of their neighbors. Boasters. Self-assuming, vainglorious, and arrogant men. Inventors of evil things. Those who have invented destructive customs, rites, fashions; such as the different religious ceremonies among the Greeks and Romans—the orgies of Bacchus, the mysteries of Ceres. Multitudes of which evil things, destructive and abominable ceremonies, are to be found in every part of the heathen worship. Disobedient to parents. Though filial affection was certainly more recommended and cultivated than many other virtues, yet there are many instances on record of the grossest violation of this great branch of the law of nature.

31. Without understanding. Persons incapable of comprehending what was spoken; destitute of capacity for spiritual things. Covenantbreakers. Persons who could be bound by no oath because, properly speaking, they had no God to witness or avenge their misconduct. As every covenant or agreement is made as in the presence of God, so he that opposes the being and doctrine of God is incapable of being bound by any covenant; he can give no pledge for his conduct. Without natural affection. Without that attachment which nature teaches the young of all animals to have to their mothers, and the mothers to have for their young. The heathen, in general, have made no scruple to expose the children they did not think proper to bring up, and to dispatch their parents when they were grown old or past labor. Implacable. The word here shows a deadly enmity, the highest pitch of an unforgiving spirit; in a word, persons who would not make reconciliation to either God or man. Unmerciful. Those who were incapable, through the deep-rooted wickedness of their own nature, of showing mercy to an enemy when brought under their power.

MATTHEW HENRY

In the close he mentions the aggravations of the sins, v. 32. 1. They knew the judgment of God. They knew the law. They knew the penalty. They knew that those who commit such things were worthy of death; their own consciences could not but suggest this to them. It is a great aggravation of sin when it is committed against knowledge. It is daring presumption to run upon the sword's point. 2. They not only do the same, but have pleasure in those that do them. To be pleased with other people's sins is to love sin for sin's sake: it is joining in a confederacy for the devil's kingdom. Our own sins are much aggravated by our concurrence with the sins of others.

Now lay all this together, and then say whether the Gentile world could be justified before God by any works of their own.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

character and frightful extent of the immoralities which it fostered and consecrated (vss. 24, 26, 27). And so strikingly is this to be seen in all its essential features in the East at this day, that (as HODGE says) the missionaries have frequently been accused by the natives of having forged the whole of the latter part of this chapter, as they could not believe that so accurate a description of themselves could have been written eighteen centuries ago. The kingdoms of Israel and Judah furnish a striking illustration of the inseparable connection between religion and morals. Israel corrupted and debased the worship of Jehovah, and the sins with which they were charged were mostly of the grosser kind —intemperance and sensuality: the people of Judah, remaining faithful to the pure worship, were for a long time charged mostly with formality and hypocrisy; and only as they fell into the idolatries of the heathen around them, did they sink into their vices. And may not a like distinction be observed between the two great divisions of Christendom, the Popish and the Protestant? To test this, we must not look to Popery, surrounded with, and more or less influenced by, the presence and power of Protestantism; nor to Protestantism under every sort of disadvantage, internal and external. But look at Romanism where it has unrestrained liberty to develop its true character, and see whether impurity does not there taint society to its core, pervading alike the highest and the lowest classes; and then look at Protestantism where it enjoys the same advantages, and see whether it be not marked by a comparatively high standard of social virtue. (7) To take pleasure in what is sinful and vicious for its own sake, and knowing it to be such, is the last and lowest stage of human recklessness (vs. 32). But (8) this knowledge can never be wholly extinguished in the breast of men. So long as reason remains to them, there is still a small voice in the worst of men, protesting, in the name of the Power that implanted it, "that they which do such things are worthy of death" (vs. 32).

ADAM CLARKE

32. Who, knowing the judgment of God. The grand rule of right which God has revealed to every man, the knowledge of which He has, more or less, given to every nation of the world, relative to honoring parents, taking care of their own offspring, keeping engagements. In the worst states of heathenism this great principle has been acknowledged; but through the prevalence of corruption in the heart, this law, though acknowledged, was not obeyed; and the corruption increased so that those were highest in repute who had cast off all restraints of this kind; so that they even delighted in them; highly applauded, and gladly associated with those transgressors—which argues the very highest pitch of moral depravity.

CHAPTER 2

Verses 1–16

The apostle had represented the state of the Gentile world to be as bad and black as the Jews were ready enough to pronounce it. Designing to show that the state of the Jews was very bad too, he sets himself to show that God would proceed upon equal terms of justice with Jews and Gentiles.

I. He arraigns them for their censoriousness and self-conceit (v. 1): Thou art inexcusable, O man, whosoever thou art that judgest. He intends especially the Jews, and to them particularly he applies this general charge, Thou who teachest another teachest thou not thyself? The Jews looked with a great deal of contempt upon the poor Gentiles; while in the meantime they were themselves as bad and immoral—though not idolaters. Therefore thou art inexcusable. If the Gentiles, who had but the light of nature, were inexcusable, much more the Jews, who had the light of the law.

II. He asserts the invariable justice of the divine government, v. 2, 3. He here shows what a righteous God that is with whom we have to do. The judgment of God is according to truth, according to the heart, and not according to the outward appearance, according to the works, and not with respect to persons, for he would not be God if he were not just; but it behoves those especially to consider it who condemn others for those things which they themselves are guilty of, and so think to bribe the divine justice by protesting against sin. As if preaching against sin would atone for the guilt of it. But observe how he puts it to the sinner's conscience (v. 3): Thinkest thou this, O man? The case is so plain that we may venture to appeal to the sinner's own thoughts: "Canst thou think that thou shalt escape the judgment of God? Can the heart-searching God be imposed upon by formal pretences, the righteous Judge of all so bribed?"

III. He draws up a charge against them (v. 4, 5), consisting of two branches:

1. Slighting the goodness of God (v. 4), the riches of his goodness. The more light we sin against the more love we sin against. There is in every wilful sin an interpretative contempt of the goodness of God, particularly the goodness of his patience, taking occasion thence to be so much the more bold in sin. Not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance. What method God takes to bring sinners to repentance. He leads them, not drives them like beasts, allures them; and it is goodness that leads, bands of love. The consideration of the goodness of God, his common goodness to all, should be

Vss. 1-29. THE JEW UNDER LIKE CONDEMNATION WITH THE GENTILE. From those without, the apostle now turns to those within the pale of revealed religion, the self-righteous Jews, who looked down upon the uncovenanted heathen as beyond the pale of God's mercies, within which they deemed themselves secure, however inconsistent their life may be. Alas! what multitudes wrap themselves up in like fatal confidence, who occupy the corresponding position in the Christian Church!

4. the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance —i.e., is designed and adapted to do so.

CHAPTER 2

1. That judgest. "The judger"; you assume the character of a judge, and in that character condemn others who are less guilty than yourself.

2. We are sure that the judgment of God. God is impartial, and will punish sin wheresoever He finds it. Transgression in a Jew is not less criminal than iniquity in a Gentile.

4. Or despisest thou the riches of his goodness? Will you render of none effect that marked benevolence of God towards you which has given so many superior advantages, and that forbearance which has tolerated your many miscarriages, and that longsuffering which, after repeated provocations, still continues to bear with you? Not knowing. Not "acknowledging" that this goodness of God, which has so long manifested itself in forbearance and long-suffering, leadeth thee to repentance—was designed to accomplish this blessed end, which your want of consideration and acknowledgment has rendered, hitherto, ineffectual. This was a maxim among the Jews themselves; for, in Synopsis Sohar, it is said: "The holy blessed God delays his anger against the wicked, to the end that they may repent and be converted."

effectual to bring us all to repentance.

2. Provoking the wrath of God, v. 5. The rise of this provocation is a hard and impenitent heart. To sin is to walk in the way of the heart; and when that is a hard and impenitent heart, how desperate must the course needs be! The provocation is expressed by treasuring up wrath. A treasure denotes abundance. It is a treasure that will be spending to eternity, and yet sinners are still adding to it as to a treasure. A treasure denotes secrecy. It denotes reservation to some further occasion. These treasures will be broken open. They are treasured up against the day of wrath. Though the present day be a day of patience towards sinners, yet there is a day of wrath coming. And that day of wrath will be the day of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God. The wrath of God is not like our wrath, a heat and passion: but it is a righteous judgment, his will to punish sin. This righteous judgment of God is now many times concealed in the prosperity of sinners, but shortly it will be manifested before all the world.

IV. Having mentioned the righteous judgment of God in v. 5, he here illustrates that judgment, and the righteousness of it.

1. He will render to every man according to his deeds (v. 6).

(1) In dispensing his favours; and this is mentioned twice here, both in v. 7 and v. 10. For he delights to show mercy. The objects of his favour: Those who by patient continuance, &c. Those whom the righteous God will reward are, First, Such as fix to themselves the right end, that seek for glory, and honour, and immortality. There is a holy ambition which is at the bottom of all practical religion, This is looking in our desires and aims as high as heaven, and resolved to take up with nothing short of it. This seeking implies a loss, desire to retrieve it, and pursuits and endeavours consonant to those desires. Secondly, Such as having fixed the right end, adhere to the right way: A patient continuance in well-doing. There must be well-doing, v. 10. It is not enough to know well, and promise well, but we must do well. A continuance in well doing. Not for a fit and a start, like the morning cloud and the early dew; it is perseverance that wins the crown. A patient continuance. This patience respects not only the length of the work, but the difficulties of it. Those that will do well and continue in it must put on a great deal of patience. The product of his favour. He will render to such eternal life. Heaven is life, eternal life, and it is called (v. 10) glory, honour, and peace. Those that seek for the vain glory and honour of this world often miss of them; but those that seek for immortal glory and honour shall have them, and not only glory and honour, but peace. Heavenly glory and honour have peace with them, undisturbed everlasting peace.

(2) In dispensing his frowns (v. 8, 9). The objects of his frowns. Such as are contentious and do not obey the truth. Contentious against God. Every wilful sin is a quarrel with God. Contentious, and do not obey the truth. The truths of religion are not only to be known, but to be obeyed. Disobedience to the truth is interpreted a striving against it. But obey unrighteousness. Those that refuse to be the servants of truth will soon be the slaves of unrighteousness. The products of these frowns: Indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish. These are the wages of sin. And this upon the soul; souls are the vessels of that wrath. Sin qualifies the soul for this wrath. Hell is eternal tribulation and anguish, the product of wrath and indignation. This comes of contending with God. Those that will not bow to his golden sceptre will certainly be broken by his iron rod.

2. There is no respect of persons with God, v. 11. As to the spiritual state, there is a respect of persons; but not as to outward relation or condition. God does not save men with respect to their external privileges, but according as their state and disposition really are. In dispensing both his frowns and favours it is both to Jew and Gentile. If to the Jews first, who had greater privileges, yet also to the Gentiles, whose want of such privileges will neither excuse them from the punishment of their ill-doing nor bar them out from the reward of their well-doing.

V. He proves the equity of his proceedings with all (v. 12–16). Three degrees of light are revealed to the children of men:

1. The light of nature. This the Gentiles have, and by this they shall be judged: As many as have sinned without law shall perish without law; that is, the unbelieving Gentiles, who had no other guide but natural conscience, shall not be reckoned with for the transgression of the law they never had. They shall be judged by the law of nature. The light of nature was to the Gentiles instead of a written law.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

5. treasurest up unto thyself wrath against—rather 'in'—the day of wrath—i.e., wrath to come on thee in the day of wrath. What an awful idea is here expressed—that the sinner himself is amassing, like hoarded treasure, an ever accumulating stock of divine wrath, to burst upon him in "the day of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God!" And this is said not of the reckless, but of those who boasted of their purity of faith and life.

7-10. To them who . . .—The substance of these verses is that the final judgment will turn upon character alone. by patient continuance in well-doing . . .—Cf. Luke 8:15: "That on the good ground are they, which in an honest and good heart, having heard the word, keep it, and bring forth fruit with patience"; denoting the enduring and progressive character of the new life.

But unto them that are contentious, and do not obey the truth . . .—referring to such keen and determined resistance to the Gospel as he himself had too painfully witnessed on the part of his own countrymen. (See Acts 13: 44-46; 17:5, 13; 18:6, 12; and cf. I Thess. 2:15, 16.) indignation and wrath—in the bosom of a sin-avenging God. Tribulation and anguish—the effect of these in the sinner himself.to the Jew first—first in perdition if unfaithful; but if obedient to the truth, first in salvation (vs. 10).

11, 12. For as many as have sinned—not 'as many as have sinned at all,' but, 'as many as are found in sin' at the judgment of the great day (as the whole context shows). without law—i.e., without the advantage of a positive Revelation. shall also perish without law—exempt from the charge of rejecting or disregarding it.

ADAM CLARKE

5. But after thy hardness. Occasioned by your long course of iniquity. And impenitent heart—produced by your hardness, through which you are callous to the calls and expostulations of conscience. Treasurest up—continue to increase your debt to the divine justice, which will infallibly inflict wrath, punishment, in the day of wrath—the judgment day, in which He will render to every man according to his works. The word treasure the Hebrew uses to express any kind of store or collection. So treasures of gold, silver, corn, wine, oil, etc., mean collections or an abundance of such things; the word is used by the Greek writers precisely in the same sense. By wrath we are to understand "punishment," as in chap. 1. 18; and it is used so by the very best Greek writers. The treasure of wrath, in this verse, is opposed to the riches of goodness, in the preceding. As surely as you despise or neglect to improve the riches of God's goodness, so surely you shall share in the treasures of His wrath. The punishment shall be proportioned to the mercy you have abused.

6. Who will render. Who, in the day of judgment, will reward and punish every man according as his life and conversation have been.

7. To them. In this manner will God, in the great day, dispense punishments and rewards: (1) He will give eternal life to them who, in all the trials and difficulties of the present state, have persevered in well doing—seeking for and expecting glory, honour, and immortality.

10. But glory, honour, and peace. While the finally impenitent Jew and Gentile shall experience the fullest effects of the righteous indignation of the supreme Judge, every man that worketh good—that lives in a conscientious obedience to the known will of God—whether he be Jew or Gentile, shall have glory, honour, and peace; i.e., eternal blessedness.

8. But unto them. (2) He will manifest His indignation, and inflict wrath—punishment, on all who are contentious—who obstinately dispute against the truth, and obey unrighteousness—who act under the influence of the principle of sin, and not under the influence of the Spirit of God.

9. Tribulation and anguish. Misery of all descriptions, without the possibility of escape, will this righteous Judge inflict upon every impenitent sinner. The Jew first, as possessing greater privileges, and having abused greater mercies; and also on the Gentile, who, though he had not the same advantages, had what God saw was sufficient for his state; and, having sinned against them, shall have punishment proportioned to his demerit.

11. For there is no respect of persons with God. The righteous Judge will not act according to any principle of partiality; the character and conduct alone of the persons shall weigh with Him. He will take no wicked man to glory, let his nation or advantages be what they may; and He will send no righteous man to perdition, though brought up in the very bosom of Gentilism.

12. For as many as have sinned without law. They, viz., the Gentiles, who shall be found to have transgressed against the mere light of nature, or rather, "that true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world," John i. 9, shall not come under the same rule with those, the Jews, who have in addition to this enioyed an extraordinary revelation, but they shall be dealt with according to the inferior dispensation under which they lived, while those, the Jews, who have sinned in the law—the positive, divine revelation granted to them, shall be judged by the law, and punished proportionably to the abuse of such an extraordinary advantage.

13. For not the hearers of the law. It does not follow, because one people are favored with a divine revelation, that therefore they shall be saved; while the others who have not had that revelation shall finally perish; this is not God's procedure. Where He has given a law, a divine revelation, He requires obedience to that law; and only those who have been doers of that law, who have lived according to the light and privileges granted in that revelation, shall be justified—shall be finally acknowledged to be such as are fit for the kingdom of God.

14. For when the Gentiles, which have not the law. Nor does it follow that the Gentiles, who

He had said (v. 12) they had sinned without law, which looks like a contradiction; for where there is no law there is no transgression. But, says he, though they had not the written law, they had that which was equivalent. They had the work of the law. The work of the law is to direct us what to do, and to examine us what we have done. (1) They had that which directed them what to do by the light of nature. They apprehended a clear and vast difference between good and evil. They did by nature the things contained in the law. They had a sense of justice and equity, honour and purity, love and charity. Thus they were a law unto themselves. (2) They had that which examined them as to what they had done: Their conscience also bearing witness. They had that within them which approved what was well done and which reproached them for what was done amiss. Conscience is a witness, and first or last will bear witness, testifying of that which is most secret; and their thought accusing or excusing, passing a judgment upon the testimony of conscience. Conscience is that candle of the Lord which was not quite put out, no, not in the Gentile world. Their thoughts the meanwhile. According as they observed or broke these natural laws and dictates, their consciences did either acquit or condemn them. All this did evince that they had that which was to them instead of a law. So that the guilty Gentiles are left without excuse. God is justified in condemning them. They cannot plead ignorance.

2. The light of the law. This the Jews had, and by this they shall be judged (v. 12): As many as have sinned in the law shall be judged by the law. They sinned in the face and light of so pure and clear a law. These shall be judged by the law; their punishment shall be, as their sin is, so much the greater for their having the law. The Jew first, v. 9. The apostle shows (v. 13) that their having, and hearing, and knowing the law, would not justify them, but their doing it. It was a great privilege that they had the law, but not a saving privilege, unless they lived up to the law they had. We may apply it to the gospel: it is not hearing, but doing that will save us.

3. The light of the gospel: and according to this those that enjoyed the gospel shall be judged (v. 16): According to my gospel; the gospel in general, called Paul's because he was a preacher of it. Some refer those words, according to my gospel, to what he says of the day of judgment. It is good for us to get acquainted with what is revealed concerning that day. There is a day set for a general judgment. The judgment of that day will be put into the hands of Jesus Christ. Nothing speaks more terror to sinners, or more comfort to saints, than this, that Christ shall be the Judge. The secrets of men shall then be judged. That will be the great discovering day.

Verses 17–29

He had said (v. 13) that not the hearers but the doers of the law are justified; and he here applies that great truth to the Jews.

I. He allows their profession (v. 17–20), that they might see he did not condemn them out of ignorance. He knew the best of their cause.

1. They were a peculiar people, having the written law and the special presence of God among them. Thou art called a Jew. It was a very honourable title. Salvation was of the Jews; and this they were very proud of, and yet many that were so called were the vilest of men. It is no new thing for the worst practices to be shrouded under the best names. And restest in the law. They were mightily puffed up with this privilege, and thought this enough to bring them to heaven, though they did not live up to the law. It is a dangerous thing to rest in external privileges, and not to improve them. And makest thy boast of God. A believing, humble, thankful glorying in God, is the summary of all religion. Boasting in God, and in the outward profession of his name, is the summary of all hypocrisy. Spiritual pride is of all kinds of pride the most dangerous.

and as many as have sinned in the law—within the pale of a positive, written Revelation. shall be judged by the law—tried and condemned by the higher standard of that written Revelation.

13-15. For not the hearers . . .—As touching the Jews, in whose ears the written law is continually resounding, the condemnation of as many of them as are found sinners at the last involves no difficulty; but even as respects the heathen, who are strangers to the law in its positive and written form—since they show how deeply it is engraven on their moral nature, which witnesses within them for righteousness and against iniquity, accusing or condemning them according as they violate or obey its stern dictates—their condemnation also for all the sin in which they live and die will carry its dreadful echo in their own breasts.

their thoughts the meanwhile accusing or else excusing—i.e., perhaps by turns doing both.

16. In the day . . .—Here the unfinished statement of vs. 12 is resumed and closed. shall judge the secrets of men—here specially referring to the unfathomed depths of hypocrisy in the self-righteous whom the apostle had to deal with. (See Eccles. 12:14; I Cor. 4:5.) according to my gospel—to my teaching as a preacher of the Gospel.

Behold—'But if' is, beyond doubt, the true reading here. (It differs but in a single letter from the received reading, and the sense is the same.)

have not had a divine revelation, shall either perish because they had it not or their unrighteous conduct pass unpunished because not having this revelation might be considered as an excuse for their sins. Do by nature the things contained in the law. Do, without this divine revelation, through that light which God imparts to every man, the things contained in the law—act according to justice, mercy, temperance, and truth, the practice of which the revealed law so powerfully enjoins; these . . . are a law unto themselves—they are not accountable to any other law, and are not to be judged by any dispensation different from that under which they live.

15. Which shew the work of the law. In acting according to justice, mercy, temperance, and truth they show that the great object of the law, which was to bring men from injustice, cruelty, intemperance, and falsity, is accomplished so far in them; their conscience also bearing witness—that faculty of the soul, where that divine light dwells and works, shows them that they are right; and thus they have a comfortable testimony in their own souls of their own integrity. Their thoughts the mean while accusing or else excusing one another; or rather, "their reasonings between one another accusing or answering for themselves." As if the apostle had said: And this point, that they have a law and act according to it, is further proved from their conduct in civil affairs; and from that correct sense which they have of natural justice in their debates, either in their courts of law or in their treatises on morality. All these are ample proofs that God has not left them without light; and that, seeing they have such correct notions of right and wrong, they are accountable to God for their conduct in reference to these notions and principles. This seems to be the true meaning of this difficult clause. See below. Much stress has been laid on the words by nature, in v. 14, as if the apostle designed to intimate that nature, independently of the influence of divine grace, possessed such principles as were sufficient to guide a man to glory. But certainly the term cannot be so understood here. I rather think that "certainly, truly" is its sense here: "For when the Gentiles, which have not the law, truly, or in effect, do the things contained in the law." This seems to be its sense in Gal. iv. 8: "When ye knew not God, ye did service unto them which certainly are no gods"; i.e., are false gods. The passage in v. 15, Their thoughts . . . accusing or else excusing one another, certainly does not refer to any expostulations or operations of conscience, for this is referred to in the preceding clause. The words accusing and excusing, "answering or defending one another among themselves," are all forensic or law terms, and refer to the mode of conducting suits of law in courts of justice, where one is plaintiff, who produces his accusation; another is defendant, who rebuts the charge and defends himself; and then the business is argued before the judges. This process shows that they have a law of their own, and that to this law it belongs to adjust differences—to right those who have suffered wrong, and to punish the guilty. As to the phrase written in their hearts, it is here opposed to the Jewish laws, which were written on tables of stone. The Jews drew the maxims by which their conduct was regulated from a divine revelation; the Gentiles drew theirs from what God, in the course of His providence and gracious influence, had shown them to be right, useful, and necessary. And with them this law was "well known and affectionately regarded"; for this is one meaning of the phrase written in their hearts.

17. Behold, thou art called a Jew. What the apostle had said in the preceding verses being sufficient to enforce conviction on the conscience of the Jew, he now openly argues with him in the most plain manner, asserting that his superior knowledge, privileges, and profession served only to aggravate his condemnation. And restest in the law. You trust in it for your endless salvation. The word implies the strongest confidence of safety and security. You "repose your whole trust and confidence" in this law. And makest thy boast of God. That you know His nature and attributes, which are not known to the Gentiles. The word implies the idea of "exulting" in anything, as being a proper object

2. They were a knowing people (v. 18) and knowest his will. The world will then be set to rights, when God's will is the only will, and all other wills are melted into it. The will of God, that which he would have them do. And approvest the things that are more excellent. A good apprehension in the things of God, reading it thus, Thou discernest things that differ, knowest how to distinguish between good and evil. Good and bad lie sometimes so near together that it is not easy to distinguish them; but the Jews were, or at least thought they were, able to distinguish, to cleave the hair in doubtful cases. Or, we may, understand controversies. A man may be well skilled in the controversies of religion, and yet a stranger to the power of godliness. A warm affection to the things of God, as we read it, Approvest the things that are excellent. There may be a consent of the practical judgment to the law, that it is good, and yet that consent overpowered by the lusts of the flesh, and of the mind:

I see the better, but pursue the worse.

They got this acqaintance with that which is good, by being instructed out of the law. It was the custom of the Jews to take a great deal of pains in teaching their children, and all their lessons were out of the law; it were well if Christians were but as industrious to teach their children out of the gospel. Now this is called (v. 20), The form of knowledge, and of the truth in the law. A form of knowledge produces but a form of godliness, 2 Tim. iii. 5. A form of knowledge may deceive men, but cannot impose upon the heart-searching God.

3. They were a teaching people, or at least thought themselves so (v. 19, 20): And art confident that thou thyself art a guide of the blind. Apply it, (1) To the Jews in general. They thought themselves guides to the poor blind Gentiles that sat in darkness. All other nations must come to school to them, to learn what is good. (2) To their rabbis, and doctors. The apostle expresses this in several terms, a guide of the blind, a light of those who are in darkness, an instructor of the foolish, a teacher of babes, the better to set forth their proud conceit. This was a string they loved to be harping upon. The best work, when it is prided in, is unacceptable to God. It is good to instruct the foolish, but considering our own inability to make these teachings successful without God, there is nothing in it to be proud of.

II. He aggravates their provocations (v. 21–24) from two things:

1. They sinned against their knowledge, did that themselves which they taught others to avoid: Thou that teachest another, teachest thou not thyself? Teaching is a piece of that charity which begins at home, though it must not end there. The Pharisees pulled down with their lives what they built up with their preaching. The greatest obstructors of the success of the word are those whose bad lives contradict their good doctrine, who in the pulpit preach so well that it is a pity they should ever come out, and out of the pulpit live so ill that it is a pity they should ever come in. He specifies three particular sins that abound among the Jews: (1) Stealing. (2) Adultery, v. 22. Many of the Jewish rabbin are said to have been notorious for this sin. (3) Sacrilege, and this is charged upon those that professed to abhor idols. It was in the latter days of the Old Testament church that they were charged with robbing God in tithes and offerings (Mal. iii. 8, 9), converting that to their own use which was set apart for God. And this is almost equivalent to idolatry.

2. They dishonoured God by their sin, v. 23, 24. While God and his law were an honour to them, which they boasted of, they were a dishonour to God and his law, by giving occasion to those that were without to reflect upon their religion. As it is written, v. 24. He does not mention the place, because he wrote this to those that were instructed in the law. The great evil of the sins of professors is the dishonour done to God and religion by their profession. "Blasphemed through you. The reproaches you bring upon yourselves reflect upon your God, and religion is wounded through your sides." A good caution to professors to walk circumspectly.

III. He asserts the utter insufficiency of their profession to clear them from the guilt of these provocations (v. 25–29): Circumcision verily profiteth, if thou keep the law; that is, obedient Jews shall not lose the reward of their obedience. He is here speaking to the Jews, whose Judaism would benefit them, if they would but live up to the laws of it; but if not "thy circumcision is made uncircumcision. Thou wilt be no more justified than the uncircumcised Gentiles, but more condemned for sinning against greater light."

1. He shows that the uncircumcised Gentiles, if

approvest the things that are excellent—Margin, 'triest the things that differ.' Both senses are good, and indeed the former is but the result of the latter action. (See on Phil. 1:10.)

hast the form of knowledge and of the truth in the law—not being left, as the heathen are, to vague conjecture on divine things, but favored with definite and precise information from heaven.

thou that abhorrest idols—as the Jews did ever after their captivity, though bent on them before—dost thou commit sacrilege?—not, as some excellent interpreters, 'dost thou rob idol-temples?' but more generally, as we take it, 'dost thou profane holy things?' (as in Matt. 21:12, 13, and in other ways). as it is written—(See Marginal reference.) 25-29. For circumcision—i.e., One's being within the covenant of which circumcision was the outward sign and seal. verily profiteth, if thou keep the law—if the inward reality correspond to the outward sign. but if . . .—i.e., 'Otherwise, thou art no better than the uncircumcised heathen.' Therefore if the uncircumcision keep the . . . law . . .—Two mistaken interpretations, we think, are given of these words: First, that the case here supposed is an impossible one, and put merely for illustration [HALDANE, CHALMERS, HODGE]; second that it is the case of the heathen who may and do please God when they act, as has been and is done, up to the light of nature [GROTIUS, OLSHAUSEN, etc.]. The first interpretation is, in our judgment, unnatural; the second, opposed to the apostle's own teaching. But the case here put is, we think, such as that of Cornelius (Acts 10), who, though outside the external pale of God's covenant, yet having come to the knowledge of the truths contained in it, do manifest the grace of the covenant without the seal of it, and exemplify the character and walk of Abraham's children, though not called by the name of Abraham. Thus, this is but another way of announcing that God was about to show the insufficiency of the mere badge of the Abrahamic covenant, by calling from among the Gentiles a seed of Abraham that had never received the seal of circumcision (see on Gal. 5:6); and this interpretation is confirmed by all that follows.

of hope and dependence; and when referred to God, it points out that He is the sure Cause of hope, dependence, joy, and happiness; and that it is the highest honor to be called to know His name, and be employed in His service. As if the apostle had said: You rejoice in God as the Object of your hope and dependence; you praise and magnify Him; you account it your greatest honor that He is your God, and that you worship Him.

18. Knowest his will. Have been favored with a revelation of His own will, immediately from himself. The things that are more excellent. "The things that differ"—that revelation which God has given of himself makes the nicest distinctions between right and wrong, between vice and virtue; showing how you should walk so as to please God, and, consequently, acquire the most excellent portion that human spirits can have on this side of heaven. For all these blessings you acknowledge to receive from your law, being instructed, being "catechized," from your infancy in the knowledge of divine things.

19. And art confident. In consequence of all these religious advantages, you believe that you are able to teach others, and to be guides and lights to the bewildered, darkened Gentiles, who may become proselytes to your religion.

20. An instructor of the foolish. You believe the Gentiles to be babes and fools when compared with yourselves; that you alone possess the only true knowledge; that you are the only favorites of Heaven; and that all nations must look up to you as possessing the only form of knowledge, the grand scheme and draught of all true science, of everything that is worthy to be learned: the system of eternal truth, derived from the law.

21. Thou therefore. That the Jewish priesthood was exceedingly corrupt in the time of the apostle, and that they were so long before, is fully evident from the sacred writings and from Josephus. The high priesthood was bought and sold like other commodities.

24. For the name of God is blasphemed. In Debarim rabba it is said: "The rulers destroy the influence of their own words among the people; and this is done when a rabbin, sitting and teaching in the academy, says, Do not take usury, and himself takes it; do not commit rapine, and himself commits it; do not steal, and himself steals." That they were exceedingly lax in their morals, the following fact proves: "Rabbi Ilai said, If a man see that his evil propensities are likely to prevail against him, let him go to some place where he is not known, and let him put on black clothes, and cover his head with a black veil; and then let him do whatsoever he pleases, lest the name of God should be publicly profaned."

25. For circumcision verily profiteth. It is a blessing to belong to the Church of God and wear the sign of the covenant, provided the terms of the covenant are complied with. But if thou be a breaker of the law. If you do not observe the conditions of the covenant, the outward sign is both without meaning and without effect. This was a maxim of the rabbins themselves; for they allowed that an apostate or ungodly Israelite must go to hell, notwithstanding his circumcision.

26. Therefore if the uncircumcision. If the Gentile be found to act according to the spirit and design of the law, his acting thus uprightly, according to the light which God has afforded him, will be reckoned to him as if he were circumcised and walked agreeably to the law.

they live up to the light they have, stand upon the same level with the Jews; if they keep the righteousness of the law (v. 26), fulfil the law (v. 27); that is, by submitting sincerely to the conduct of natural light, perform the matter of the law. It seems to be meant of such an obedience as some of the Gentiles did attain to. Doubtless, there were many such instances: and they were the uncircumcision, that kept the righteousness of the law. They were accepted with God. Their uncircumcision was counted for circumcision. Their obedience was a great aggravation of the disobedience of the Jews, v. 27. Judge thee, who by the letter and circumcision dost transgress. To carnal professors the law is but the letter; they read it as a bare writing, but are not ruled by it as a law. External privileges, if they do not do us good, do us hurt. The obedience of those that enjoy less means, and make a less profession, will help to condemn those that enjoy greater means, and make a greater profession, but do not live up to it.

2. He describes the true circumcision, v. 28, 29. It is not that which is outward in the flesh and in the letter. This is not to drive us off from the observances of external institutions (they are good in their place), but from trusting to them and taking up with a name to live, without being alive indeed. He is not a Jew. To be Abraham's children is to do the works of Abraham. It is that which is inward, of the heart, and in the spirit. It is the heart that God looks at. The praise thereof, though it be not of men, who judge according to outward appearance, yet it is of God, for he seeth not as man seeth. Fair pretences and a plausible profession may deceive men: but God sees through shows to realities. This is alike true of Christianity. He is not a Christian that is one outwardly, nor is that baptism which is outward in the flesh.

he is not a Jew which is one outwardly . . .—In other words, the name of "Jew" and the rite of "circumcision" were designed but as outward symbols of a separation from the irreligious and ungodly world unto holy devotedness in heart and life to the God of salvation. Where this is realized, the signs are full of significance; but where it is not, they are worse than useless. Note, (1) It is a sad mark of depravity when all that is designed and fitted to melt only hardens the heart (vs. 4, and cf. II Pet. 3:9; Eccles. 8:11). (2) Amidst all the inequalities of religious opportunity measured out to men, and the mysterious bearing of this upon their character and destiny for eternity, the same great principles of judgment, in a form suited to their respective discipline, will be applied to all, and perfect equity will be seen to reign throughout every stage of the divine administration (vss. 11-16). (3) "The law written on the heart" (vss. 14, 15)—or the Ethics of Natural Theology—may be said to be the one deep foundation on which all revealed religion reposes; and see on ch. 1:19, 20, where we have what we may call its other foundation—the Physics and Metaphysics of Natural Theology. The testimony of these two passages is to the theologian invaluable, while in the breast of every teachable Christian it wakens such deep echoes as are inexpressibly solemn and precious. (4) High religious professions are a fearful aggravation of the inconsistencies of such as make them (vss. 17-24). See II Samuel 12:14. (5) As no external privileges, or badge of discipleship, will shield the unholy from the wrath of God, so neither will the want of them shut out from the kingdom of heaven such as have experienced without them that change of heart which the seals of God's covenant were designed to mark. In the sight of the great Searcher of hearts, the Judge of quick and dead, the renovation of the character in heart and life is all in all. In view of this, have not all baptized, sacramented disciples of the Lord Jesus, who "profess that they know God, but in works deny Him," need to tremble—who, under the guise of friends, are "the enemies of the cross of Christ"?

ADAM CLARKE

27. And shall not uncircumcision which is by nature? And shall not the Gentile, who is according to the custom of his country—who is by birth not obliged to be circumcised? If it fulfil the law. If such a person act according to the spirit and design of the law. Judge, "condemn" thee, who, while you enjoy the letter, the written law, and bear in your body the proof of the circumcision which it requires, dost transgress the law.

28. For he is not a Jew, a genuine member of the Church of God, who has only an outward profession. Neither is that circumcision. Circumcision is a rite which represents a spiritual thing, viz., the change and purification of the heart, as may be seen from Jer. iv. 4, 6, 10; ix. 26; Ezek. xliv. 7, 9.

29. But he is a Jew. A true member of the Church of God. Which is one inwardly. Who has his heart purified, according to what God has uniformly prescribed by His prophets. For circumcision is . . . of the heart, in the spirit, "by the Spirit" of God, who is the Author of all spiritual affections and holy purposes; or everything here is to be understood spiritually, and not literally; for without holiness none can please God, and without holiness none can see Him. Whose praise is not of men. It has, with great probability, been conjectured that the apostle may here refer to the signification of the name Jew, or Judah, Yehudah, "Praise." Such a one is a true Israelite, who walks in a conformity to the spirit of his religion. His countrymen may praise him because he is a steady professor of the Jewish faith; but God praises him because he has entered into the spirit and design of the covenant made with Abraham, and has got the end of his faith, the salvation of his soul.

CHAPTER 3

Verses 1–18

I. Here the apostle answers several objections. Divine truths must be cleared from cavil.

Object. 1. If Jew and Gentile stand so much upon the same level before God, what advantage then hath the Jew? Now does not this levelling doctrine deny them all prerogatives, and reflect dishonour upon the ordinance of circumcision.

Answer. The Jews are, notwithstanding this, a people greatly privileged and honoured (v. 2): Much every way. The door is open to the Gentiles as well as the Jews, but the Jews have a fairer way up to this door. He reckons up many of the Jews' privileges Rom. ix. 4, 5; here he mentions but one that unto them were committed the oracles of God, that is, the scriptures of the Old Testament. The scriptures are the oracles of God: they are a divine revelation. We must have recourse to the law and to the testimony, as to an oracle. Now these oracles were committed to the Jews. The Old Testament was deposited in their hands, to be carefully preserved pure and uncorrupt. The Jews were entrusted with that sacred treasure for their own use and benefit in the first place, and then for the advantage of the world. The Jews had the means of salvation, but they had not the monopoly of salvation. Now this he mentions with a chiefly, this was their prime and principal privilege. The enjoyment of God's word and ordinances is the chief happiness of a people.

Object. 2. To what purpose were the oracles of God committed to them, when so many of them continued strangers to Christ, and enemies to his gospel? Some did not believe, v. 3.

Answer. But shall their unbelief make the faith of God without effect? The apostle startled at such a thought: God forbid! The obstinacy of the Jews could not invalidate those prophecies of the Messiah which were contained in the oracles committed to them. Christ will be glorious. God's words shall be accomplished, though there be a generation that by their unbelief go about to make God a liar. Let God be true but every man a liar; let us abide by this principle, that God is true to every word which he has spoken. Better question the credit of all the men in the world than doubt of the faithfulness of God. All men are liars, compared with God. It is very comfortable, when we find every man a liar (no faith in man), that God is faithful. He quotes Ps.

CHAPTER 3

Vss. 1-8. JEWISH OBJECTIONS ANSWERED. 1, 2. What advantage then hath the Jew?—i.e., 'If the final judgment will turn solely on the state of the heart, and this may be as good in the Gentile without, as in the Jew within, the sacred enclosure of God's covenant, what better are we Jews for all our advantages?

Answer: Much every way; chiefly, because—(rather, 'first, that')—unto them were committed the oracles of God—This remarkable expression, denoting 'divine communications' in general, is transferred to the Scriptures to express their oracular, divine, authoritative character.

3, 4. For what if some did not believe?—It is the unbelief of the great body of the nation which the apostle points at; but as it sufficed for his argument to put the supposition thus gently, he uses this word "some" to soften prejudice. shall their unbelief make the faith—or, faithfulness—of God of none effect?—'nullify,' 'invalidate' it. God forbid—lit., 'Let it not be,' i.e., 'Away with such a thought'—a favorite expression of our apostle, when he would not only repudiate a supposed consequence of his doctrine, but express his abhorrence of it. "The Scriptures do not authorize such a use of God's name as must have been common among the English translators of the Bible" [HODGE]. yea, let God be—held—true, and every man a liar—i.e., even though it should follow from this that every man is a liar. when thou art judged—so in Psalm 51:4, according to the LXX; but in the Hebrew and in our version, 'when thou judgest.' The general sentiment, however, is the same in both—that we are to vindicate the righteousness of God, at whatever expense to ourselves.

As the first nine verses are a dialogue between the apostle and a Jew, I shall prefix the speakers to their respective questions and answers, to make the whole the more intelligible to the reader.

1. JEW. What advantage then hath the Jew? or what profit is there of circumcision? As if he had said: You lately allowed (chap. ii. 25) that "circumcision verily profiteth." But if circumcision, or our being in covenant with God, raises us no higher in the divine favor than the Gentiles; if the virtuous among them are as acceptable as any of us; nay, and condemn our nation too, as no longer deserving the divine regards; pray tell me, wherein lies the superior honor of the Jew; and what benefit can arise to him from his circumcision, and being vested in the privileges of God's peculiar people?

2. APOSTLE. Much every way. The Jews, in reference to the means and motives of obedience, enjoy many advantages beyond the Gentiles; and, principally, because unto them were committed the oracles of God—that revelation of His will to Moses and the prophets, containing a treasure of excellencies with which no other part of the world has been favored.

3. JEW. For what? "What then, if some did not believe?" If some of the Jewish nation have abused their privileges, and acted contrary to their obligations, shall their wickedness annul the promise which God made to Abraham that He would, by an everlasting covenant, be a God to him and to his seed after him? Gen. xvii. 7. Shall God, therefore, by stripping the Jews of their peculiar honor, as you intimate He will, falsify His promise to the nation, because some of the Jews are bad men?

4. APOSTLE. God forbid. "Let it not be, far from it, by no means." Yea, let God be true, but every man a liar. We must ever maintain that God is true, and that if, in any case, His promise appear to fail, it is because the condition on which it was given has not been complied with; which is the sense of what is written, Ps. li. 3: I acknowledge my sin, and condemn myself that the truth of Thy promise (2 Sam. vii. 15-16) to establish my house and throne forever may li. 4, That thou mightest be justified, to show, 1. That God will preserve his own honour in the world, notwithstanding the sins of men. 2. That it is our duty to justify God and to assert and maintain his justice, truth, and goodness, however it goes. Thus is God justified in his sayings, and cleared when he is judged, as it is here rendered.

Object. 3. Carnal hearts might hence take occasion to encourage themselves in sin. If all our sin be so far from overthrowing God's honour that it commends it, and his ends are secured, is it not unjust for God to punish our sin and unbelief so severely? If our unrighteousness commend the righteousness of God, what shall we say? v. 5. What inference may be drawn from this? Is God unrighteous, who taketh vengeance? I speak as a man, that is, it is suggested like a man.

Answer. God forbid. Suggestions that reflect dishonour upon God and his justice and holiness are rather to be startled at than parleyed with. For then how shall God judge the world? v. 6. The sin has never the less of malignity in it though God bring glory to himself out of it. It is only accidentally that sin commends God's righteousness. No thanks to the sinner for that. It is not for us to arraign the proceedings of such an absolute Sovereign. The sentence of the supreme court, whence lies no appeal, is not to be called in question.

Object. 4. The former objection is repeated (v. 7, 8). But his setting off the objection in its own colours is sufficient to answer it: If the truth of God has more abounded through my lie, why should I be judged as a sinner, and not rather thence take encouragement to go on in my sin, that grace may abound? Let us do evil that good may come is oftener in the heart than in the mouth of sinners, so justifying themselves in their wicked ways. There were those who charged such doctrines as this upon Paul and his fellow-ministers: Some affirm that we say so. It is no new thing for the best of God's people and ministers to be charged with holding and teaching such things as they do most detest, and it is not to be thought strange, when our Master himself was said to be in league with Beelzebub. It is an old artifice of Satan thus to cast dirt upon Christ's ministers—Lay slander thickly on, for some will be sure to stick.

Answer. He says no more by way of confutation but that the damnation of those is just. Those who deliberately do evil that good may come of it will be so far from escaping, under the shelter of that excuse, that it will rather justify their damnation. Sinning upon such a surmise, and in such a confidence, argues a great deal both of the wit and of the will in the sin. Their damnation is just; and, whatever excuses of this kind they may now please themselves with, they will none of them stand good in the great day, but God will be justified in his proceedings.

II. Paul next revives his assertion of the general guilt of mankind, both of Jews and Gentiles, v. 9–18. "Are we better than they, we Jews, or will this justify us? No, by no means." or, Are we Christians (Jews and Gentiles) so much better than the unbelieving part as to have merited God's grace? Alas! no. They are all under sin. Under the guilt of sin. We are guilty before God, v. 19. And this he had proved. It is a law term: We have charged them with it, and have made good our charge. This charge and conviction he here further illustrates by several scriptures out of the Old Testament. The 10th, 11th, and 12th verses are taken from Ps. xiv. 1–3. The rest that follows here is found in the Septuagint translation of the 14th Psalm. What is said in Ps. xiv is expressly spoken of all the children of men. The Lord looked down, as upon the old world. He who, when he himself had made all, looked upon everything that he had made, and behold all was very good, now that man had marred all, looked, and behold all was very bad. Observe,

1. That which is habitual, which is twofold:

(1) An habitual defect of everything that is good. There is none righteous, none that has an honest good principle of virtue, no, not one; implying that, if there had been but one, God would have found him out. When all the world was corrupt, God had his eye upon one righteous Noah. No righteousness is born with us. There is none that understandeth, v. 11. The fault lies in the corruption of the understanding. Religion and righteousness have so much reason on their side that if people had but any understanding they would be better and do better. Sinners are fools. None that seeketh after God, that is, none that has any desire after him. They are together become unprofitable, v. 12. Those that have forsaken God soon grow good for nothing. There is none that doeth good; no, not a just man upon the earth, that doeth good, and sinneth not.

(2) An habitual defection to everything that is

5, 6. But if . . .—Another objection: 'It would appear, then, that the more faithless we are, so much the more illustrious will the fidelity of God appear; and in that case, for Him to take vengeance on us for our unfaithfulness would be (to speak as men profanely do) unrighteousness in God.' Answer: God forbid; for then how shall God judge the world?—i.e., 'Far from us be such a thought; for that would strike down all future judgment.

7, 8. For if the truth of God . . .—A further illustration of the same sentiment: i.e., 'Such reasoning amounts to this—which indeed we who preach salvation by free grace are slanderously accused of teaching—that the more evil we do, the more glory will redound to God; a damnable principle.' (Thus the apostle, instead of refuting this principle, thinks it enough to hold it up to execration, as one that shocks the moral sense.)—On this brief section, Note (1) Mark the place here assigned to the Scriptures. In answer to the question, "What advantage hath the Jew?" or, "What profit is there of circumcision?" those holding Romish views would undoubtedly have laid the stress upon the priesthood, as the glory of the Jewish economy. But in the apostle's esteem, "the oracles of God" were the jewel of the ancient Church (vss. 1, 2). (2) God's eternal purposes and man's free agency, as also the doctrine of salvation by grace and the unchanging obligations of God's law, have ever been subjected to the charge of inconsistency by those who will bow to no truth which their own reason cannot fathom. But amidst all the clouds and darkness which in this present state envelop the divine administration and many of the truths of the Bible, such broad and deep principles as are here laid down, and which shine in their own luster, will be found the sheet-anchor of our faith. "Let God be true, and every man a liar"; and as many advocates of salvation by grace as say, "Let us do evil that good may come," "their damnation is just."

9-20. THAT THE JEW IS SHUT UP UNDER LIKE CONDEMNATION WITH THE GENTILE IS PROVED BY HIS OWN SCRIPTURE. 9. are we better than they?—'do we excel them?' No, in no wise—Better off the Jews certainly were, for having the oracles of God to teach them better; but as they were no better, that only aggravated their guilt. 10-12. As it is written . . .—(Ps. 14:1-3; 53:1-3). These statements of the Psalmist were indeed suggested by particular manifestations of human depravity occurring under his own eye; but as this only showed what man, when unrestrained, is in his present condition, they were quite pertinent to the apostle's purpose.

be vindicated when Thou shalt execute that dreadful threatening (2 Sam. xii. 10) that the sword shall never depart from my house, which I own I have brought upon myself by my own iniquity. Should any man say that the promise of God had failed toward him, let him examine his heart and his ways, and he will find that he has departed out of that way in which alone God could, consistently with His holiness and truth, fulfill the promise.

5. JEW. But if our unrighteousness commend the righteousness of God. May we not suppose that our unrighteousness may serve to commend and illustrate the mercy of God in keeping and fulfilling to us the promise which He made to our forefathers? The more wicked we are, the more His faithfulness to His ancient promise is to be admired. And if so, would not God appear unjust in taking vengeance and casting us off? I speak as a man. I feel for the situation of both myself and my countrymen, and it is natural for one to speak as I do.

6. APOSTLE. God forbid. "By no means." God cannot be unjust; were He unjust, He could not be qualified to judge the world, nor inflict that punishment on the unfaithful Jews to which I refer.

7. JEW. For if the truth of God. But to resume my reasoning (see v. 5): If the faithfulness of God in keeping His promise made to our fathers is, through our unfaithfulness, made far more glorious than it otherwise would have been, why should we then be blamed for that which must redound so much to the honor of God?

8. APOSTLE. And not rather. And why do you not say, seeing you assume this ground, that in all cases we should do wickedly, because God, by freely pardoning, can so glorify His own grace? This is a most impious sentiment, but it follows from your reasoning; it has, indeed, been most injuriously laid to the charge of us apostles, who preach the doctrine of free pardon, through faith, without the merit of works; but this is so manifest a perversion of the truth that a just punishment may be expected to fall on the propagators of such a slander.

9. JEW. What then? After all, have not we Jews a better claim to the privileges of the kingdom of God than the Gentiles have?

APOSTLE. No, in no wise. For I have already proved that both Jews and Gentiles are under the guilt of sin; that they are equally unworthy of the blessings of the Messiah's kingdom; and that they must both, equally, owe their salvation to the mere mercy of God. From this, to the end of the twenty-sixth verse, the apostle proceeds to prove his assertion that both Jews and Gentiles were all under sin; and, that he might enforce the conviction upon the heart of the Jew, he quotes his own Scriptures, which he acknowledged had been given by the inspiration of God, and consequently true.

10. As it is written. See Ps. xiv. 1-3, from which this and the following two verses are taken. There is none righteous. This is true, not only of the Jews, but of the Gentiles—of every soul of man, considered in his natural and practical state, previously to his receiving the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ. There is no righteous principle in them, and consequently no righteous act can be expected from them; see on v. 12. God himself is represented as looking down from heaven to see if there were any that feared and sought after Him; and yet He, who cannot be deceived, could find none!

12. They are all gone out of the way. They have all "diverged" from the right way; they have either abandoned or corrupted the worship of God: the Jews, in forsaking the law and the prophets; and the Gentiles, in acting contrary to the law which God had written on their hearts. And the departure of both from the truth proves the evil propensity of human nature in general. They are together become unprofitable. They are "useless," good for nothing; or, as the Hebrew has it, "they are putrid." He views the whole mass of mankind as slain and thrown together, to putrefy in heaps. This is what is termed the corruption of human nature. There is none that doeth good. In v. 10 it is said, "There is none righteous"; here, There is none that doeth good. The first may refer to the want of a righteous principle; the second, to the necessary consequence of the absence of evil: They are all gone out of the way. God made man in the way, set him in right, but he hath forsaken it.

2. That which is actual.

(1) In their words (v. 13, 14), in three things particularly: [1] Cruelty: Their throat is an open sepulchre, waiting an opportunity to do mischief. And when they do not vent it publicly, yet they are underhand intending mischief: the poison of asps is under their lips, the most venomous and incurable poison, with which they blast the good name of their neighbours. [2] Cheating: With their tongues they have used deceit. Herein they show themselves the devil's children. They have used it: it intimates that they make a trade of lying. [3] Cursing: reflecting upon God, and blaspheming his holy name; wishing evil to their brethren: Their mouth is full of cursing and bitterness. How many, who are called Christians, do by these sins evince that they are still under the reign and dominion of sin.

(2) In their ways (v. 15–17): Their feet are swift to shed blood. Wherever they go, destruction and misery go along with them; these are their companions —destruction and misery to themselves at last. Destruction and misery are in their ways; their sin is its own punishment: a man needs no more to make him miserable than to be a slave to his sins. —And the way of peace have they not known. They are strangers to all true peace; they know not the things that belong to their peace.

(3) The root of all this we have: There is no fear of God before their eyes, v. 18. The fear of God is here put for all practical religion. Wicked people have not this before their eyes; they are governed by other rules, aim at other ends. Where no fear of God is, no good is to be expected. When once fear is cast off, prayer is restrained, and then all goes to wreck and ruin quickly. So that we have here a short account of the general depravity and corruption of mankind.

Verses 19–31

From all this Paul infers that it is in vain to look for justification by the works of the law, and that it is to be had only by faith, which he lays down (v. 28) as the summary of his discourse. We conclude that a man is justified by faith, without the deeds of the law. Man, under the power of such corruption, could never, by any works of his own, gain acceptance with God; but it must be resolved purely into the free grace of God, given through Jesus Christ. There are two things from which the apostle here argues: the guiltiness of man, to prove that we cannot be justified by the works of the law, and the glory of God, to prove that we must be justified by faith.

I. He argues from man's guiltiness. The argument is very plain: we can never be justified and saved by the law that we have broken. Now concerning the guiltiness of man,

1. He fastens it particularly upon the Jews (v. 19). This that the law says, it says to those who are under the law; this conviction belongs to the Jews as well as others, for it is written in their law. "The law convicts and condemns you—you see it does." That every mouth may be stopped. Those that are justified have their mouths stopped by a humble conviction; those that are condemned have their mouths stopped too, for they shall at last be convinced.

2. He extends it in general to all the world: That all the world may become guilty before God. May become guilty; that is, may be proved guilty. They must all plead guilty. Guilty before God is a dreadful word. All are guilty, and therefore all have need of a righteousness wherein to appear before God. For all have sinned (v. 23), and have come short of the glory of God—have failed of that which is the chief end of man. Come short, as the archer comes short of the mark, as the runner comes short of the prize; so come short, as not only not to win, but to be great losers. (1) Come short of glorifying God. They glorified him not as God. Man by sin comes short of this, and, instead of glorifying God, dishonours him. (2) Come short of glorying before God. There is no boasting of innocency: if we go about to glory before God we have all sinned, and this will silence us. We may glory before men, who cannot search our hearts, but

13-18. Their . . .—From generals, the apostle here comes to particulars, culling from different parts of Scripture passages which speak of depravity as it affects the different members of the body; as if to show more affectingly how "from the sole of the foot even to the head there is no soundness" in us.

Their throat is an open sepulchre—(Ps. 5:9); i.e., 'What proceeds out of their heart, and finds vent in speech and action through the throat, is like the pestilential breath of an open grave.' with their tongues they have used deceit—(Ps. 5:9); i.e., 'That tongue which is man's glory (Ps. 16:9; 57:8) is prostituted to the purposes of deception.' the poison of asps is under their lips—(Ps. 140:3): i.e., 'Those lips which should "drop as an honey-comb," and "feed many," and "give thanks unto His name" (Canticles 4:11; Prov. 10:21; Heb. 13:15), are employed to secrete and to dart deadly poison.' Whose mouth . . .—(Ps. 10:7): i.e., 'That mouth which should be "most sweet" (Canticles 5:16), being "set on fire of hell" (Jas. 3:6), is filled with burning wrath against those whom it should only bless.' Their feet are swift to shed blood—(Prov. 1:16; Isa. 59:7): i.e., 'Those feet, which should "run the way of God's commandments" (Ps. 119:32), are employed to conduct men to deeds of darkest crime.' Destruction and misery are in their ways; and the way of peace have they not known—This is a supplementary statement about men's ways, suggested by what had been said about the "feet," and expresses the mischief and misery which men scatter in their path, instead of that peace which, as strangers to it themselves, they cannot diffuse. There is no fear of God before their EYES—(Ps. 36:1): i.e., 'Did the eyes but "see Him who is invisible" (Heb. 11:27), a reverential awe of Him with whom we have to do would chasten every joy and lift the soul out of its deepest depressions; but to all this the natural man is a stranger.' How graphic is this picture of human depravity, finding its way through each several organ of the body into the life: but how small a part of the "desperate wickedness" that is within (Jer. 17:9) "proceedeth out of the heart of man!" (Mark 7:21-23; Ps. 19:12.)

Therefore we conclude . . .—It is the unavoidable tendency of dependence upon our own works, less or more, for acceptance with God, to beget a spirit of "boasting." But that God should encourage such a spirit in sinners, by any procedure of His, is incredible. This therefore stamps falsehood upon every form of 'justification by works,' whereas the doctrine that.

Our faith receives a righteousness
That makes the sinner just, manifestly and entirely excludes "boasting"; and this is the best evidence of its truth. Inference second: This and no other way of salvation is adapted alike to Jew and Gentile.

19. Now we know that what . . . the law—i.e., the Scriptures, considered as a law of duty—saith, it saith to them that are under the law—of course, therefore, to the Jews. that every mouth—opened in self-justification—may be stopped, and all the world may become—i.e., be seen to be, and own itself—guilty—and so condemned—before God.

for all have sinned—Though men differ greatly in the nature and extent of their sinfulness, there is absolutely no difference between the best and the worst of men, in the fact that "all have sinned," and so underlie the wrath of God. and come short of the glory—or 'praise'—of God—i.e., 'have failed to earn His approbation' (cf. John 12:43, Greek).

such a principle. If there be no righteousness within, there will be no acts of goodness without.

13. Their throat is an open sepulchre. This and all the following verses to the end of v. 18 are found in the Septuagint, but not in the Hebrew text. The verses in question, however, are not found in the Alexandrian MS. But they exist in the Vulgate, the Aethiopic, and the Arabic. As the most ancient copies of the Septuagint do not contain these verses, some contend that the apostle has quoted them from different parts of Scripture; and later transcribers of the Septuagint, finding that the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth verses were quoted from Psalm xiv, imagined that the rest were found originally there too, and so incorporated them in their copies from the apostle's text. Their throat is an open sepulchre—By their malicious and wicked words they bury, as it were, the reputation of all men. The whole of this verse appears to belong to their habit of lying, defamation, slandering, by which they wounded, blasted, and poisoned the reputation of others.

14. Whose mouth is full of cursing. They never speak but in profane oaths, blasphemies, and malice.

15. Their feet are swift to shed blood. They make use of every means in their power to destroy the reputation and lives of the innocent.

16. Destruction and misery are in their ways. Destruction is their work, and misery to themselves and to the objects of their malice is the consequence of their impious and murderous conduct.

17. And the way of peace have they not known. They neither have peace in themselves nor do they suffer others to live in quiet; they are brooders and fomenters of discord.

18. There is no fear of God before their eyes. This completes their bad character; they are downright atheists, at least practically such. They fear not God's judgments, although His eye is upon them in their evil ways. There is not one article of what is charged against the Jews and Gentiles here that may not be found justified by the histories of both, in the most ample manner. And what was true of them in those primitive times is true of them still. With very little variation, these are the evils in which the vast mass of mankind delight and live.

28. Therefore we conclude. Seeing these things cannot be denied, viz., that all have sinned; that all are guilty; that all are helpless; that none can deliver his own soul; and that God, in His endless mercy, has opened "a new and living way" to the holiest by the blood of Jesus, Heb. x. 19-20; therefore we, apostles and Christian teachers, conclude, prove by fair, rational consequence, that a man, any man, is justified, has his sins blotted out, and is received into the divine favor, by faith in Christ's blood, without the deeds of the law, which never could afford, to either Jew or Gentile, a ground for justification; because both have sinned against the law which God has given them, and consequently forfeited all right and title to the blessings which the obedient might claim.

19. What things soever the law saith. That the word law here does not mean the Pentateuch is evident from the preceding quotations, not one of which is taken from that work. The term law must here mean either the Jewish writings in general or that rule of moral conduct which God had given to both Jews and Gentiles: to the former in their own Scriptures; to the latter in that law written in their hearts by His own Spirit, and acknowledged in their written codes, and in their pleading in every civil case. Now, according to this great law, this rule of moral conduct, whether given in a written revelation, as to the Jews, or by the secret inspiration of His Spirit, as in certain cases to the Gentiles, every mouth may be stopped, and all the world, both Jews and Gentiles, stand convicted before God; for all mankind have sinned against this law.

23. For all have sinned. And consequently are equally helpless and guilty; and, as God is no respecter of persons, all human creatures being equally His offspring, and there being no reason why one should be preferred before another, therefore His endless mercy has embraced all. And come short of the glory of God. These words there is no glorying before God. (3) Come short of being glorified by God. Come short of justification, which is glory begun—come short of sanctification, which is the glorious image of God upon man. It is impossible now to get to heaven in the way of spotless innocency. That passage is blocked up.

3. Further to drive us off from expecting justificat on by the law, he ascribes this conviction to the law (v. 20): For by the law is the knowledge of sin. That law which convicts and condemns us can never justify us. It is the proper use and intendment of the law to open our wound, and therefore not likely to be the remedy. That which is searching is not sanative. Paul makes this use of the law, ch. vii. 9, Therefore by the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified in his sight. (1) No flesh shall be justified. The corruption that remained in our nature will for ever obstruct any justification by our own works. (2) Not justified in his sight. As the conscience stands in relation to God, in his sight, we cannot be justified by the deeds of the law.

II. He argues from God's glory to prove that justification must be expected only by faith in Christ's righteousness. Is there no hope? Is the wound become incurable because of transgression? No, blessed be God, it is not (v. 21, 22); there is another way laid open for us, the righteousness of God without the law is manifested now under the gospel. This is called the righteousness of God, righteousness of his ordaining, and providing, and accepting,—righteousness which he confers upon us.

1. Now concerning this righteousness of God. It is manifested. The gospel-way of justification is a highway, it is laid open for us. It is without the law. The righteousness that Christ hath brought in is a complete righteousness. Yet it is witnessed by the law and the prophets. The law is so far from justifying us that it directs us to another way of justification, points at Christ as our righteousness, to whom bear all the prophets witness. It is by the faith of Jesus Christ, that faith which hath Jesus Christ for its object. It is by this that we become interested in that righteousness which God has ordained, and which Christ has brought in. It is to all, and upon all, those that believe. Jews and Gentiles are alike welcome to God through Christ; for there is no difference. It is to all, the gospel excludes none that do not exclude themselves; but it is upon all that believe, not only tendered to them, but put upon them as a crown, as a robe.

2. But now how is this for God's glory?

(1) It is for the glory of his grace (v. 24): Justified freely by his grace. It is by his grace. And, to make it the more emphatic, he says it is freely by his grace. The grace of God comes freely, freely; nothing in us to deserve such favours: no, it is all through the redemption that is in Jesus Christ. It comes freely to us, but Christ bought it, and paid dearly for it. Christ's purchase is no bar to the freeness of God's grace; for grace provided and accepted this vicarious satisfaction.

(2) It is for the glory of his justice and righteousness (v. 25, 26): Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation, &c. [1] Jesus Christ is the great propitiation. He is our throne of grace, in and through whom atonement is made for sin. He is all in all in our reconciliation, not only the maker, but the matter of it. God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself. [2] God hath set him forth. God, the party offended, makes the first overtures towards a reconciliation. Fore-ordained him to this, in the counsels of his love form eternity, and has exhibited him to a guilty world as their propitiation. [3] By faith in his blood we become interested in this propitiation. There is the healing plaster provided. Faith is the applying of this plaster to the wounded soul. And this faith hath a special regard to the blood of Christ. Without blood there should be no remission, and no blood but this would do it effectually. [4] All who by faith are interested in this propitiation have the remission of their sins that are past. It was for this that Christ was set forth to be a propitiation. Through the forbearance of God. Divine patience has kept us out of hell, that we might have space to repent, and get to heaven. Past through the forbearance of God. It is owing to the divine forbearance that we were not taken in the very act of sin. It is owing to the master's goodness and the dresser's mediation that barren trees are let alone in the vineyard. It is owing to Christ that there is ever a sinner on this side hell. [5] God does in all this declare his righteousness. This he insists upon with a great deal of emphasis: To declare, I say, at this time his righteousness. He declares his righteousness, First, In the propitiation itself. It appears that he hates sin, when nothing less than the blood of Christ would satisfy for it. Finding sin, though but imputed, upon his own Son, he did not spare him, because he had

20. Therefore by the deeds of—obedience to—the law there shall no flesh be justified—i.e., be held and treated as righteous; as is plain from the whole scope and strain of the argument. in his sight—at His bar (Ps. 143:2). for by the law is the knowledge of sin—See on ch. 4:15; 7:7; I John 3:4).—Note: How broad and deep does the apostle in this section lay the foundations of his great doctrine of Justification by free grace—in the disorder of man's whole nature, the consequent universality of human guilt, the condemnation, by reason of the breach of divine law, of the whole world, and the impossibility of justification before God by obedience to that violated law! Only when these humiliating conclusions are accepted and felt, are we in a condition to appreciate and embrace the grace of the Gospel, next to be opened up.

21-26. GOD'S JUSTIFYING RIGHTEOUSNESS, THROUGH FAITH IN JESUS CHRIST, ALIKE ADAPTED TO OUR NECESSITIES AND WORTHY OF HIMSELF. 21-23. But now the righteousness of God—see on ch. 1:17—without the law—i.e., a righteousness to which our obedience to the law contributes nothing whatever (vs. 28; Gal. 2:16). is manifested, being witnessed—attested—by the law and the prophets—the Old Testament Scriptures. Thus this justifying righteousness, though new, as only now fully disclosed, is an old righteousness, predicted and foreshadowed in the Old Testament. by faith of—i.e., in—Jesus Christ unto all and upon all them that believe—i.e., perhaps, brought nigh "unto all" men the Gospel, and actually "upon all" believing men, as theirs in possession [LUTHER and others]; but most interpreters understand both statements of believers as only a more emphatic way of saying that all believers, without distinction or exception, are put in possession of this gratuitous justification, purely by faith in Christ Jesus. for there is no difference;

24. justified freely—without anything done on our part to deserve—by his grace—His free love—through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus—a most important clause; teaching us that though justification is quite gratuitous, it is not a mere fiat of the divine will, but based on a "Redemption," i.e., 'the payment of a Ransom,' in Christ's death. That this is the sense of the word 'redemption,' when applied to Christ's death, will appear clear to any impartial student of the passages where it occurs. 25, 26. Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation—or 'propitiatory sacrifice'—through faith in his blood—Some of the best interpreters, observing that "faith upon" is the usual phrase in Greek, not "faith in" Christ, would place a comma after "faith," and understand the words as if written thus: "to be a propitiation, in His blood, through faith." But "faith in Christ" is used in Galatians 3:26 and Ephesians 1:15; and "faith in His blood" is the natural and appropriate meaning here. to declare his righteousness for the remission—rather, 'pretermission' or 'passing by'—of sins—'the sins'—that are past—not the sins committed by the believer before he embraces Christ, but the sins committed under the old economy, before Christ came to "put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself." through the forbearance of God—God not remitting but only forbearing to punish them, or passing them by, until an adequate atonement for them should be made. In thus not imputing them, God was righteous, but He was not seen to be so; there was no "manifestation of His righteousness" in doing so under the ancient economy. But now that God can "set forth" Christ as a "propitiation for sin through faith in His blood," the righteousness of His procedure in passing by the sins of believers before, and in now remitting them, is "manifested," declared, brought fully out to the view of the whole world. (Our translators have unfortunately missed this glorious truth, taking "the sins that are past" to mean the past sins of believers—committed before faith—and rendering, by the word "remission," what means only a 'passing by'; thus making it appear that "remission of sins" is "through the forbearance of God," which it certainly is not.) To declare . . . at this time—now for the first time, under the Gospel—his righteousness: that he might be just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus—Glorious paradox! 'Just in punishing,' and 'merciful in pardoning,' men can understand; but 'just in justifying the guilty,' startles them. But the propitiation through faith in Christ's blood resolves the paradox and harmonizes the discordant elements. For in that "God hath made Him to be sin for us who knew no sin," justice has full satisfaction; and in that "we are made the righteousness of God in Him," mercy has her heart's delight!—Note (1) One way of a sinner's justifica-have been variously translated. "Failed of attaining the glory of God"; stand in need of the glory, that is, the mercy of God." The simple meaning seems to be this: that all have sinned, and none can enjoy God's glory but they that are holy; consequently both Jews and Gentiles have failed in their endeavors to attain it, as by the works of any law no human being can be justified.

20. Therefore by the deeds of the law. On the score of obedience to this moral law, there shall no flesh, "no human being," be justified: none can be accepted in the sight of God. And why? Because by the law is the knowledge of sin. It is that which ascertains what sin is, shows how men have deviated from its righteous demands, and sentences them to death because they have broken it.

21. But now the righteousness of God. God's method of saving sinners is now shown by the gospel to be through His own mere mercy, by Christ Jesus; without the law—without any right or claim which might result from obedience to the law; and is evidently that which was intended by God from the beginning, for it is witnessed by the law and the prophets—the rites and ceremonies of the one, and the preachings and predictions of the others, all bearing testimony to the great design of God, and to the absolute necessity there was for the sacrifice and salvation which God has provided.

22. Even the righteousness of God. That method of saving sinners which is not of works, but by faith in Christ Jesus; and it is not restrained to any particular people, as the law and its privileges were, but is unto all mankind in its intention and offer, and becomes effectual to them that believe; for God hath now made no difference between the Jews and the Gentiles.

24. Being justified freely by his grace. So far from being able to attain the glory of God by their obedience, they are all guilty; and to be saved must be freely pardoned by God's grace, which is shown to them who believe, through the redemption, the "ransom price," which is in the sacrifice of Christ Jesus. The original properly means the price laid down for the redemption of a captive.

25. Whom God hath set forth. Appointed and published to be a propitiation, the "mercy seat," or "place of atonement"; because the blood of the sacrifice was sprinkled on and before that, in order to obtain remission of sin. The mercy seat was the lid or cover of the ark of the covenant, where God was manifest in the symbol of His presence between the cherubim; therefore the atonement that was made in this place was properly made to God himself. Through faith in his blood. This shows what we are to understand both by the redemption and by the propitiation; viz., that they refer to the sacrificial death of Jesus Christ, as the atonement made, and the price paid down, for the redemption of the souls of men. To declare his righteousness. "For the manifestation of His righteousness"; His mercy in saving sinners, by sending Jesus Christ to make an atonement for them; thereby declaring His readiness to remit all past transgressions committed by both Jews and Gentiles, during the time in which His merciful forbearance was exercised towards the world. And this applies to all who hear the gospel now; to them is freely offered remission of all past sins.

26. To declare, I say, at this time. To manifest now, by the dispensation of the gospel, his righteousness, His infinite mercy; and to manifest it in such a way that He might still appear to be the just God, and yet the justifier, the Pardoner, of him which believeth in Jesus. Here we learn that God designed to give the most evident displays of both His justice and mercy: of His justice, in requiring a sacrifice, and absolutely refusing to give salvation to a lost world in any other way; and of His mercy, in providing the sacrifice which His justice required. Thus, because Jesus was an Atonement, a Ransom Price, for the sin of the world, therefore God can, consistently with His justice, pardon every soul that believeth in Jesus. This is the full discovery of God's righteousness, of His wonderful method of magnifying His law and making it honorable; of showing the infinite purity of His justice, and of saving a lost world. Hitherto, from the ninth verse, the apostle had gone on without interruption, proving that Jew made himself sin for us. Secondly, In the pardon upon that propitiation. That he might be just, and the justifier of him that believeth. It is now become not only an act of grace and mercy, but an act of righteousness, in God, to pardon the sins of penitent believers, having accepted the satisfaction that Christ by dying made to his justice for them. He is just, that is, faithful to his word.

(3) It is for God's glory; for boasting is thus excluded, v. 27. Now, if justification were by the works of the law, boasting would not be excluded. If we were saved by our own works, we might put the crown upon our own heads. But the law of faith doth for ever exclude boasting; for faith is a depending, self-emptying, self-denying grace, and casts every crown before the throne. He speaks of the law of faith. Believers are not left lawless: faith is a law, it is a working grace.

From all this he draws this conclusion (v. 28): That a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law.

III. He shows the extent of this privilege of justification by faith, and that it is not the peculiar privilege of the Jews, but pertains to the Gentiles also; for he had said (v. 22) that there is no difference. He asserts and proves it (v. 29, 30): Is he the God of the Jews only?

It is one God of grace that justifies the circumcision by faith, and the uncircumcision through faith. However the Jews, in favour of themselves, will needs fancy a difference, really there is no more difference than between by and through. He obviates an objection (v. 31), as if this doctrine did nullify the law. "No," says he, "though we do say that the law will not justify us, yet we do not therefore say that it was given in vain.

We establish the right use of the law, and secure its standing, by fixing it on the right basis. Though we cannot be saved by it as a covenant, yet we own it, and submit to it, as a rule in the hand of the Mediator, subordinate to the law of grace; and so are so far from overthrowing that we establish the law."

tion is taught in the Old Testament and in the New alike: only more dimly during the twilight of Revelation; in unclouded light under its perfect day (vs. 21). (2) As there is no difference in the need, so is there none in the liberty to appropriate the provided salvation. The best need to be saved by faith in Jesus Christ; and the worst only need that. On this common ground all saved sinners meet here, and will stand for ever (vss. 22-24). (3) It is on the atoning blood of Christ, as the one propitiatory sacrifice which God hath set forth to the eye of the guilty, that the faith of the convinced and trembling sinner fastens for deliverance from wrath. Though he knows that he is "justified freely, by God's grace," it is only because it is "through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus" that he is able to find peace and rest even in this (vs. 25). (4) The strictly accurate view of believers under the Old Testament is not that of a company of pardoned men, but of men whose sins, put up with and passed by in the meantime, awaited a future expiation in the fulness of time (vss. 25, 26; see on Luke 9:31; and on Heb. 9:15; and 11:39, 40).

27-31. INFERENCES FROM THE FOREGOING DOCTRINES, AND AN OBJECTION ANSWERED. Inference first: Boasting is excluded by this, and no other way of justification. 27, 28. Where is boasting then? . . . excluded. By what law?—on what principle or scheme?—of works? Nay; but by the law of faith.

29. Is he the God of the Jews only? . . .—The way of salvation must be one equally suited to the whole family of fallen man: but the doctrine of justification by faith is the only one that lays the basis of a Universal Religion; this therefore is another mark of its truth.

30. it is one God who shall justify—'has unchangeably fixed that He shall justify'—the circumcision by—'of'—faith, and the uncircumcision through faith—probably this is but a varied statement of the same truth for greater emphasis (see on vs. 22); though BENGEL thinks that the justification of the Jews, as the born heirs of the promise, may be here purposely said to be "of faith," while that of the Gentiles, previously "strangers to the covenants of promise," may be said to be "through faith," as thus admitted into a new family. Objection. 31. Do we then make void the law through faith?—'Does this doctrine of justification by faith, then, dissolve the obligation of the law? If so, it cannot be of God. But away with such a thought, for it does just the reverse.' God forbid: yea, we establish the law—It will be observed here, that, important as was this objection, and opening up as it did so noble a field for the illustration of the peculiar glory of the Gospel, the apostle does no more here than indignantly repel it, intending at a subsequent stage of his argument (ch. 6) to resume and discuss it at length.—Note (1) It is a fundamental requisite of all true religion that it tend to humble the sinner and exalt God; and every system which breeds self-righteousness, or cherishes boasting, bears falsehood on its face (vss. 27, 28). (2) The fitness of the Gospel to be a universal religion, beneath which the guilty of every name and degree are invited and warranted to take shelter and repose, is a glorious evidence of its truth (vss. 29, 30). (3) The glory of God's law, in its eternal and immutable obligations, is then only fully apprehended by the sinner, and then only is it enthroned in the depths of his soul, when, believing that "He was made sin for him who knew no sin," he sees himself "made the righteousness of God in Him." Thus do we not make void the law through faith: yea, we establish the law. (4) This chapter, and particularly the latter part of it, "is the proper seat of the Pauline doctrine of Justification, and the grand proof-passage of the Protestant doctrine of the Imputation of Christ's righteousness and of Justification not on account of, but through faith alone" [PHILIPPI]. To make good this doctrine, and reseat it in the faith and affection of the Church, was worth all the bloody struggles that it cost our fathers, and it will be the wisdom and safety, the life and vigor of the churches, to "stand fast in this liberty wherewith Christ hath made them free, and not be again entangled"—in the very least degree—"with the yoke of bondage."

and Gentile were in a state of guilt and condemnation, and that they could be saved only by the redemption that is in Christ Jesus. The Jew, finding his boasted privileges all at stake, interrupts him, and asks:

27. JEW. Where is boasting then? "This glorying" of ours. Have we nothing in which we can trust for our acceptance with God? No merit of our own? Nothing accruing to us from our circumcision and being in covenant with God?

APOSTLE. It is excluded. "It is shut out"; the door of heaven is shut against everything of this kind.

JEW. By what law? By what rule, doctrine, or reason is it shut out? by the law of works? The rule of obedience, which God gave to us, and by which obedience we are accepted by Him?

APOSTLE. Nay. Not by the law of works; glorying is not cut off or shut out by that; it stands in full force as the rule of life. But you have sinned and need pardon. The law of works grants no pardon; it requires obedience, and threatens the disobedient with death. But all glorying in the expectation of salvation through your own obedience is excluded by the law; the doctrine of faith, faith alone, in the mercy of God, through the propitiation made by the blood of Jesus (v. 25), is that by which you can be justified, pardoned, and taken into the divine favor.

29. Is he the God of the Jews only? Do not begin to suppose that because you cannot be justified by the works of the law, and God has in His mercy found out a new method of saving you, that therefore this mercy shall apply to the Jews exclusively. Is not God the Maker, Preserver, and Redeemer also of the Gentiles? Yes, of the Gentiles also, as much as of the Jews. For all have equally sinned and there is no reason, if God be disposed to show mercy at all, that He should prefer the one to the other; since they are all equally guilty, sinful, and necessitous.

30. Seeing it is one God. This has been rendered, "Seeing God is one." It however makes little difference in the sense. The apostle's meaning most evidently is, It is one and the same God who made both Jews and Gentiles, who shall justify, pardon, the circumcision, the believing Jews, by faith, and the uncircumcision, the believing Gentiles, by the same faith; as there is but one Saviour and one atonement provided for the whole. It is fanciful to suppose that the apostle has one meaning when he says, by faith, and a different meaning when he says, through faith. Both the prepositions are to be understood in precisely the same sense; only the addition of the article in the last case extends and more pointedly ascertains the meaning. It is one and the same God who shall justify the believing Jews by faith and the believing Gentiles "by that same faith."

31. Do we then make void the law through faith? (1) By law here we may understand the whole of the Mosaic law, in its rites and ceremonies, of which Jesus Christ was the Subject and the End. (2) We may understand also the moral law, that which relates to the regulation of the manners or conduct of men. This law also was established by the doctrine of salvation by faith, because this faith works by love, and love is the principle of obedience: and whosoever receives salvation through faith in Christ receives power to live in holy obedience to every moral precept.

CHAPTER 4

Verses 1–8

Here the apostle proves that Abraham was justified not by works, but by faith. He appeals to the case of Abraham their father, and puts his own name to the relation, being a Hebrew of the Hebrews: Abraham our Father. Now what has he found? All the world is seeking; but none can be truly reckoned to have found, but those who are justified before God; and thus Abraham found this one pearl of great price. What has he found as pertaining to the flesh, that is, by circumcision and his external privileges? Was he justified by them? Was it the merit of his works that recommended him to God's acceptance? No, by no means.

I. If he had been justified by works, room would have been left for boasting. If so, he hath whereof to glory (v. 2). "But was not his name made great, and then might not he glory?" Yes, but not before God; he might deserve well of men, but he could never merit of God. Paul himself had whereof to glory before men, and we have him sometimes glorying in it, but nothing to glory in before God. Man must not pretend to glory in anything before God; no, not Abraham.

II. It is expressly said that Abraham's faith was counted to him for righteousness. What saith the scripture? v. 3. In all controversies in religion this must be our question. It is not what this great man, and the other good man, say, but What saith the scripture? Now the scripture saith that Abraham believed, and this was counted to him for righteousness (Gen. xv. 6); therefore he had not whereof to glory before God, it being purely of free grace that it was so imputed. It is mentioned in Genesis, upon occasion of a very signal act of faith concerning the promised seed, and it followed upon a grievous conflict he had had with unbelief. It is not the perfect faith that is required to justification, but the prevailing faith, the faith that has the upper hand of unbelief.

III. If he had been justified by works, the reward would have been of debt, and not of grace. This is his argument (v. 4, 5): Abraham's reward was God himself; so he had told him but just before (Gen. xv. 1), I am thy exceeding great reward. Now, if Abraham had merited this by the perfection of his obedience, it had not been an act of grace in God. God will have free grace to have all the glory. And therefore to him that worketh not—that can pretend to no such merit, but casts himself wholly upon the free grace of God in Christ, by a lively, active, obedient faith—to such a one faith is counted for righteousness. Him that justifieth the ungodly, that is, him that was before ungodly. His former ungodliness was no bar to his justification upon his believing. No room therefore is left for despair; though God clears not the impenitent guilty; yet through Christ he justifies the ungodly.

IV. He further illustrates this by a passage out of the Psalms, where David speaks of the remission of sins, as constituting the blessedness of a man, pronouncing blessed, not the man who has no sin, but the man to whom the Lord imputeth not sin. 1. The nature of forgiveness. It is the remission of a debt, it is the covering of sin. God is said to cast sin behind his back, to hide his face from it, which implies that the ground of our blessedness is not our innocency, but God's not laying it to our charge. It is God's not imputing sin (v. 8), which makes it wholly a gracious act of God. The acceptance and the reward cannot be expected as debts; and therefore Paul infers (v. 6) that it is the imputing of righteousness without works. 2. The blessedness of it: Blessed are they. It is said, Blessed are those whose iniquities are forgiven, to show what that blessedness is, and what is the ground of it. Pardoned people are the only blessed people. Oh, how much therefore is it our interest to make it sure to ourselves that our sins are pardoned! For this is the foundation of all other benefits.

Verses 9–17

St. Paul observes in this paragraph when and why Abraham was thus justified.

I. It was before he was circumcised, v. 10. His faith was counted to him for righteousness while he was in uncircumcision. It was imputed. Now this the apostle takes notice of in answer to the question (v. 9), Cometh this blessedness then on the circumcision only, or on the uncircumcision also? Abraham was pardoned and accepted in uncircumcision. Here are two reasons why Abraham was justified by faith in circumcision:

Vss. 1-25. THE FOREGOING DOCTRINE OF JUSTIFICATION BY FAITH ILLUSTRATED FROM THE OLD TESTAMENT. First: Abraham was justified by faith. 1-3. What shall we say then that Abraham, our father as pertaining to the flesh, hath found?—i.e., (as the order in the original shows), 'hath found, as pertaining to ("according to," or "through") the flesh'; meaning, 'by all his natural efforts or legal obedience.' For if Abraham were justified by works, he hath whereof to glory; but not before God—'If works were the ground of Abraham's justification, he would have matter for boasting; but as it is perfectly certain that he hath none in the sight of God, it follows that Abraham could not have been justified by works.' And to this agree the words of Scripture.

For what saith the Scripture? Abraham believed God, and it—his faith—was counted to him for righteousness—Gen. 15.6. Romish expositors and Arminian Protestants make this to mean that God accepted Abraham's act of believing as a substitute for complete obedience. But this is at variance with the whole spirit and letter of the apostle's teaching. Throughout this whole argument, faith is set in direct opposition to works, in the matter of justification—and even in the next two verses. The meaning, therefore, cannot possibly be that the mere act of believing—which is as much a work as any other piece of commanded duty (John 6:29; I John 3:23)—was counted to Abraham for all obedience. The meaning plainly is that Abraham believed in the promises which embraced Christ (Gen. 12:3; 15:5, etc.), as we believe in Christ Himself; and in both cases, faith is merely the instrument that puts us in possession of the blessing gratuitously bestowed. 4, 5. Now to him that worketh—as a servant for wages—is the reward not reckoned of grace—as a matter of favor—but of debt—as a matter of right. But to him that worketh not—who, despairing of acceptance with God by "working" for it the work of obedience, does not attempt it—but believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly—casts himself upon the mercy of Him that justifieth those who deserve only condemnation. his faith . . .—See on vs. 3. Second: David sings of the same justification.

6-8. David also describeth—'speaketh,' 'pronounceth'—the blessedness of the man unto whom the Lord imputeth righteousness without works—whom, though void of all good works, He, nevertheless, regards and treats as righteous. Saying, Blessed . . .—(Ps. 32:1, 2). David here sings in express terms only of "transgression forgiven, sin covered, iniquity not imputed"; but as the negative blessing necessarily includes the positive, the passage is strictly in point.

9-12. Cometh this blessedness then . . .—i.e., 'Say not, All this is spoken of the circumcised, and is therefore no evidence of God's general way of justifying men; for Abraham's justification took place long before he was circumcised, and so could have no dependence upon that rite: nay, "the sign of circumcision" was given to Abraham as "a seal" (or token) of the (justifying) righteousness which he had before he was circumcised; in order that he might stand forth to every age as the parent believer—the model man of justification by faith—after whose type, as the first public example of it, all were to be moulded, whether Jew or Gentile, who should thereafter believe to life everlasting.'

1. JEW. What shall we then say that Abraham, our father as pertaining to the flesh, hath found? The pertaining to the flesh must here refer to the sign in Abraham's flesh, viz., his circumcision, on which the Jew would found his right to peculiar blessings.

2. For if Abraham were justified by works. The JEW proceeds: I conclude, therefore, that Abraham was justified by works, or by his obedience to the law of circumcision; and, consequently, he has cause for glorying, to "exult" in something which he has done to entitle him to these blessings. Now it is evident that he has this glorying, and consequently that he was justified by works.

APOSTLE. But not before God. These seem to be the apostle's words, and contain the beginning of his answer to the arguments of the Jew, as if he had said: Allowing that Abraham might glory in being called from heathenish darkness into such marvellous light, and exult in the privileges which God had granted to him, yet this glorying was not before God as a reason why those privileges should be granted, the glorying itself being a consequence of these very privileges.

3. For what saith the scripture? The scriptural account of this transaction, Gen. xv. 6, is decisive; for there it is said, Abraham "believed" God, and it was counted, it was reckoned "to him for righteousness," for justification.

4. Now to him that worketh is the reward not reckoned of grace, but of debt. Therefore if Abraham had been justified by works, the blessings he received would have been given to him as a reward for those works, and consequently his believing could have had no part in his justification, and his faith would have been useless.

5. But to him that worketh not. Which was the case with Abraham, for he was called when he was ungodly, i.e., an idolater; and, on his believing, was freely justified. And as all men have sinned, none can be justified by works; and, therefore, justification, if it take place at all, must take place in behalf of the ungodly, forasmuch as all mankind are such. It is necessary to observe here, in order to prevent confusion and misapprehension, that although the verb dikaioo has a variety of senses in the New Testament, yet here it is to be taken as implying the "pardon of sin," "receiving a person into the favor of God." It is also necessary to observe that our translators render the verb logizomai differently in different parts of this chapter. It is rendered "counted," vv. 3, 5; "reckoned," vv. 4, 9-10; "imputed," vv. 6, 8, 11, 22-24. "Reckoned" is probably the best sense in all these places.

6. Even as David also. David, in Ps. xxxii. 1-2, gives us also the true notion of this way of justification, i.e., by faith, without the merit of works, where he says—

7. Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven. That is, the man is truly "happy" whose iniquities, whose transgressions of the law, are forgiven; for by these he was exposed to the most grievous punishment. Whose sins, his innumerable deviations from the strict rule of truth and righteousness, are covered—entirely removed out of sight, and thrown into oblivion.

8. Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute sin. That man is truly happy to whose charge God does not reckon sin; that is, they alone are happy who are redeemed from the curse of the law and the consequence of their ungodly life, by having their sins freely forgiven, through the mercy of God.

9. Cometh this blessedness . . . upon the circumcision only? The word only is very properly supplied by our translators, and is here quite necessary to complete the sense. If this pardon, granted in this way, be essential to "happiness"—and David says it is so—then is it the privilege of the Jews exclusively? This cannot be; for it is by the mere mercy of God, through faith. But if God offer it to the circumcision, not because they have been obedient, for they also have sinned, but because of His mere mercy, then of course the same blessedness may be offered to the Gentiles who believe in the Lord Jesus. And this is evident; for we say, following our own Scriptures, that faith was

1. That circumcision might be a seal of the righteousness of faith, v. 11. For the confirmation of Abraham's faith God was pleased to appoint a sealing ordinance, and Abraham received it as a special favour, the sign of circumcision, &c. (1) The nature of sacraments in general; they are signs and seals. They are signs of absolute grace and favour; they are seals of the conditional promises. God does in the sacraments seal to us to be to us a God, and we do therein seal to him to be to him a people. (2) The nature of circumcision in particular: it was the initiating sacrament of the Old Testament. A sign—a sign of that original corruption which we are all born with, and which is cut off by spiritual circumcision. It was an outward and sensible sign of an inward and spiritual grace signified thereby. A seal of the righteousness of the faith. In general, it was a seal of the covenant of grace, particularly of justification by faith. Now if infants were then capable of receiving a seal of the covenant of grace, which proves that they then were within the verge of that covenant, how they come to be now cast out of the covenant, those are concerned to make out that reject the baptism of the seed of believers.

2. That he might be the father of all those that believe. In him commenced a much clearer and fuller dispensation of the covenant of grace than any that had been before extant; and therefore he is called the father of all that believe. The father of all those that believe; that is, a standing pattern of faith, as parents are examples to their children; and a standing precedent of justification by faith, as the liberties of the fathers descend to their children. (1) The father of believing Gentiles, though they be not circumcised. Abraham being himself uncircumcised when he was justified by faith, uncircumcision can never be a bar. Thus were the doubts and fears of the poor Gentiles anticipated. (2) The father of believing Jews because they are not of the circumcision only, but walk in the steps of that faith—not only are of Abraham's family, but follow the example of Abraham's faith. See here who are the genuine children of those that were the church's fathers. Those that tread in their steps; this is the line of succession. Those have most reason to call Christ Father, not that bear his name in being Christians in profession, but that tread in his steps.

II. It was before the giving of the law, v. 13–16.

1. What that promise was—that he should be the heir of the world. The meek are said to inherit the earth, and the world is theirs. Though Abraham had so little of the world in possession, yet he was heir of it all. Or, rather, it points at Christ, the seed here mentioned To thy seed, which is Christ. Now Christ is the heir of the world, and it is in him that Abraham was so.

2. How it was made to him: Not through the law, but through the righteousness of faith. Not through the law; it was upon his trusting God, in his leaving his own country when God commanded him. Now, being by faith, it could not be by the law (v. 14, 15): If those who are of the law be heirs, then faith is made void; for, if it were requisite that there should be a perfect performance of the whole law, then the promise can never take its effect, since the way to life by perfect obedience to the law, and spotless sinless innocency, is wholly blocked up, and the law in itself opens no other way. This he proves, v. 15. The law worketh wrath—wrath in us to God; as the damming up of a stream makes it swell—wrath in God against us. Now it is certain that we can never expect the inheritance by a law that worketh wrath. How the law works wrath he shows in the latter part of the verse: Where no law is there is no transgression (an acknowledged maxim).

3. Why the promise was made to him by faith; for three reasons, v. 16. (1) That it might be by grace and not by the law; by grace, and not of debt, not of merit. Faith hath particular reference to grace granting, as grace hath reference to faith receiving. God will have every crown thrown at the feet of grace, free grace. (2) That the promise might be sure. The first covenant was not sure: but, through man's failure, the benefits designed by it were cut off. The more effectually to ensure the conveyance of the new covenant, there is another way found out, not by works but by faith, which received all from Christ, in whose keeping it is safe. (3) That it might be sure to all the seed. If it had been by the law, it had been limited to the Jews. It was by faith that Gentiles as well as Jews might become interested in it, the spiritual as well as the natural seed of faithful Abraham. God would contrive the promise in such a way as might comprehend all true believers, and for this (v. 17) he refers us to Gen. xvii. 5, where the reason of the change of his name from Abram—a high father, to Abraham—the high father of a multitude,

ALBERT BARNES:

11. "And he received the sign." A sign is that by which anything is shown, or represented. And circumcision thus showed that there was a covenant between Abraham and God (Gen. 17:1-10). It became the public mark or token of the relation which he sustained to God. "A seal." A seal is that mark of wax or other substance, which is attached to an instrument of writing, as a deed, to confirm, ratify it, or to make it binding. Sometimes instruments were sealed, or made authentic, by stamping on them some word, letter, or device, which had been engraved on silver or on precious stones. The seal or stamp was often worn as an ornament on the finger (Esther 8:8; Gen. 41:42; 38:18; Ex. 28:11, 36; 29:6). To affix the seal, whether of wax or otherwise, was to confirm a contract or an engagement. In allusion to this, circumcision is called a seal of the covenant which God had made with Abraham. That is, he appointed this as a public attestation to the fact that he had previously approved of Abraham, and had made important promises to him.

"Which he had, yet being uncircumcised." He believed (Gen. 15:5); was accepted, or justified; was admitted to the favor of God, and favored with clear and remarkable promises (Gen. 15:18-21; 17:1-9), before he was circumcised. Circumcision, therefore, could have contributed neither to his justification, nor to the promises made to him by God. "That he might be the father." All this was done that Abraham might be held up as an example, or a model, of the very doctrine which the apostle was defending. The word "father" here is used evidently in a spiritual sense, as denoting that he was the ancestor of all true believers; that he was their model and example. They are regarded as his children because they are possessed of his spirit, are justified in the same way, and are imitators of his example. In this sense the expression occurs in Luke 19:9; John 8:33; Gal. 3:7, 29.
—Popular Commentary

13-15. For the promise . . .—This is merely an enlargement of the foregoing reasoning, applying to the law what had just been said of circumcision. that he should be the heir of the world—or, that "all the families of the earth should be blessed in him." was not to Abraham or to his seed through the law—in virtue of obedience to the law—but through the righteousness of faith—in virtue of his simple faith in the divine promises. For if they which are of the law be heirs—If the blessing is to be earned by obedience to the law. faith is made void—the whole divine method is subverted. Because the law worketh wrath—has nothing to give to those who break is but condemnation and vengeance. for where there is no law, there is no transgression—It is just the law that makes transgression, in the case of those who break it; nor can the one exist without the other. 16, 17. Therefore . . .—A general summary: 'Thus justification is by faith, in order that its purely gracious character may be seen, and that all who follow in the steps of Abraham's faith—whether of his natural seed or no—may be assured of the like justification with the parent-believer.'

ADAM CLARKE

reckoned to Abraham for righteousness. He had no merit; he was an idolater. But he believed in God, and his faith was reckoned to him "in reference to his justification."

10. How was it then reckoned? In what circumstances was Abraham when this blessing was bestowed upon him? When he was circumcised, or before? Not in circumcision, but in uncircumcision. Faith was reckoned to Abraham for justification, as we read in Gen. xv. 6, but circumcision was not instituted till about fourteen or fifteen years after, Gen. xvii. 1, etc.; for faith was reckoned to Abraham for righteousness or justification at least one year before Ishmael was born; compare Genesis xv and xvi. At Ishmael's birth he was eighty-six years of age, Gen. xvi. 16; and at the institution of circumcision, Ishmael was thirteen, and Abraham ninety-nine years old.

11. And he received the sign of circumcision, a seal. So far was obedience to the law of circumcision from being the reason of his justification that he not only received this justification before he was circumcised, but he received the sign of circumcision as a seal of the pardon which he had before actually received. And thus he became the father, the great head and representative, of all them that believe; particularly the Gentiles, who are now in precisely the same state in which Abraham was when he received the mercy of God. The whole of the apostle's argument in this fourth chapter to the Romans proves that we believing Gentiles are the seed of Abraham, to whom, as well as to himself, the promise was made; and that the promise made to him is the same in effect as that promise which is now made to us. There is nothing more common in the Jewish writers than the words sign and seal as signifying the mark in the flesh by the rite of circumcision.

12. And the father of circumcision. He is also the head and representative of all the circumcision of all the Jews who also walk in the steps of that faith; who seek for justification by faith only, and not by the works of the law—for this was the faith that Abraham had before he received circumcision.

13. For the promise, that he should be the heir of the world. This promise intimated that he should be the medium through whom the mercy of God should be communicated to the world, to both Jews and Gentiles; and the manner in which he was justified, be the rule and manner according to which all men should expect this blessing. Abraham is here represented as having all the world given to him as his inheritance, because in him all nations of the earth are blessed.

14. For if they which are of the law be heirs. If the Jews only be heirs of the promise made to Abraham, and that on the ground of prior obedience to the law, then faith is made void, is entirely useless; and the promise, which was made to faith, is made of none effect.

15. Because the law worketh wrath. For law, any law, or rule of duty. No law makes provision for the exercise of mercy, for it worketh wrath, "punishment," for the disobedient. Law necessarily subjects the transgressor to punishment. But the Jews have a law, which they have broken, and now they are exposed to the penal sanctions of that law; and if the promises of pardon without the works of the law do not extend to them, they must be finally miserable, because they have all broken the law, and the law exacts punishment. This was a home stroke, and the argument is unanswerable.

16. Therefore it is of faith, that it might be by grace. On this account the promise is mercifully grounded, not on obedience to a law, but on the infinite goodness of God; and thus the promise is sure to all the seed—to all, both Jews and Gentiles, who, believing in Christ Jesus, have a right to all the blessings contained in the Abrahamic covenant. All the seed necessarily comprehends all mankind.

MATTHEW HENRY

is thus rendered: For a father of many nations have I made thee; that is, all believers should take Abraham for their pattern, and call him father.

Verses 17–22

I. Whom he believed: God who quickeneth. It is God himself that faith fastens upon. Now observe what in God Abraham's faith had an eye to. 1. God who quickeneth the dead. It was promised that he should be the father of many nations, when he and his wife were now as good as dead (Heb. xi. 11, 12), and therefore he looks upon God as a God that could breathe life into dry bones. He that quickeneth the dead can do anything, can give a child to Abraham when he is old, can bring the Gentiles, who are dead in trespasses and sins, to a divine and spiritual life, Eph. ii. 1. 2. Who calleth things which are not as though they were. The justification and salvation of sinners, the espousing of the Gentiles that had not been a people, were a gracious calling of things which are not as though they were. This expresses the sovereignty of God and his absolute power and dominion, a mighty stay to faith when all other props sink and totter. It is faith indeed to build upon the all-sufficiency of God for the accomplishment of that which is impossible to anything but that all-sufficiency. Thus Abraham became the father of many nations before him whom he believed. It is by faith in God that we become accepted of him.

II. How he believed. Against hope, he believed in hope, v. 18. There was a hope against him, a natural hope. All the arguments of sense, and reason, and experience, which in such cases usually beget and support hope, were against him. But, against all those inducements to the contrary, he believed; for he had a hope for him: He believed in hope, which arose, as his faith did, from the consideration of God's all-sufficiency. That he might become the father of many nations. Therefore God, by his almighty grace, enabled him thus to believe against hope. It was fit that he who was to be the father of the faithful should have something more than ordinary in his faith. This was that which he believed, when it was counted to him for righteousness. Being not weak in faith, he considered not his own body, v. 19. His own body was now dead—become utterly unlikely to beget a child. When God intends some special blessing for his people, he commonly puts a sentence of death upon the blessing itself. But Abraham did not consider this, he did not dwell in his thoughts upon it. His faith thought of nothing but the faithfulness of the promise, and this kept up his faith. Though it may seem to be the wisdom of carnal reason, yet it is the weakness of faith, to look into the bottom of all the difficulties that arise against the promise. He staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief (v. 20). He disputed not; he did not hold any self-consultation about it, did not take time to consider whether he should close with it or no, but by a resolute act of his soul, with a holy boldness, ventured all upon the promise. He took it not for a point that would admit of argument or debate. He staggered not through unbelief. Unbelief is at the bottom of all our staggerings at God's promises. It is not the promise that fails, but our faith that fails when we stagger. He was strong in faith, giving glory to God, he was strengthened in faith, his faith got ground by exercise. Though weak faith shall not be rejected, yet strong faith shall be commended and honoured. The strength of his faith appeared in the victory it won over his fears. Abraham's faith gave God the glory, especially of his faithfulness. Abraham gave glory to God by trusting him. We never hear our Lord Jesus commending anything so much as great faith (Matt. viii. 10 and xv. 28): therefore God gives honour to faith, great faith, because faith, great faith, gives honour to God. He was fully persuaded that what God had promised he was able to perform—was carried on with the greatest confidence and assurance; it is a metaphor taken from ships that come into the harbour with full sail. Abraham saw the storms of doubts, and fears, and temptations likely to rise against the promise. But Abraham, having taken God for his pilot, and the promise for his card and compass, like a bold adventurer sets up all his sails, regards neither winds nor clouds, but trusts to the wisdom and faithfulness of his pilot, and bravely makes to the harbour, and comes home an unspeakable gainer. Such was his full persuasion, built on the omnipotence of God: He was able. Our waverings rise mainly from our distrust of the divine power. It is requisite we believe not only that he is faithful, but that he is able. And therefore it was imputed to him for righteousness, v. 22. Because he ventured his all in the divine promise, God graciously accepted him, and not only answered, but out-did, his expectation, and justified him. This shows why faith

As it is written . . .—(Gen. 17:5). This is quoted to justify his calling Abraham the "father of us all," and is to be viewed as a parenthesis. before—i.e., 'in the reckoning of'—him whom he believed—i.e., 'Thus Abraham, in the reckoning of Him whom he believed, is the father of us all, in order that all may be assured, that doing as he did, they shall be treated as he was.' even God, quickeneth the dead—The nature and greatness of that faith of Abraham which we are to copy is here strikingly described. What he was required to believe being above nature, his faith had to fasten upon God's power to surmount physical incapacity, and call into being what did not then exist. But God having made the promise, Abraham believed Him in spite of those obstacles. This is still further illustrated in what follows.

18-22. Who against hope—when no ground for hope appeared. believed in hope—i.e., cherished the believing expectation. that he might become the father of many nations, according to that which was spoken, So—i.e., Such "as the stars of heaven," Gen. 15:5—shall thy seed be . . .

he considered not . . .—paid no attention to those physical obstacles, both in himself and in Sarah, which might seem to render the fulfilment hopeless.

He staggered—hesitated—not . . . but was strong in faith, giving glory to God—as able to make good His own word in spite of all obstacles.

And being fully persuaded . . .—i.e., the glory which Abraham's faith gave to God consisted in this, that, firm in the persuasion of God's ability to fulfil his promise, no difficulties shook him.

And therefore it was imputed . . .—'Let all then take notice that this was not because of anything meritorious in Abraham, but merely because he so believed.'

ADAM CLARKE

17. As it is written, I have made thee a father. That Abraham's being a father of many nations has relation to the covenant of God made with him may be seen, Gen. xvii. 4-5: "Behold my covenant is with thee, and thou shalt be a father of many nations. Neither shall thy name any more be called Abram, but thy name shall be Abraham; for a father of many nations have I made thee"; i.e., he was constituted the head of many nations, the Gentile world, by virtue of the covenant which God made then with him. God, who quickeneth the dead. God is the most proper Object of trust and dependence; for being almighty, eternal, and unchangeable, He can even raise the dead to life, and call those things which be not as though they were. He is the Creator; He gave being when there was none. He can as infallibly assure the existence of those things which are not as if they were already actually in being. And, on this account, He can never fail of accomplishing whatsoever He has promised.

19. He considered not his own body now dead. He showed at once the correctness and energy of his faith: God cannot lie; Abraham can believe. It is true that, according to the course of nature, he and Sarah were so old that they could not have children; but God is almighty, and can do whatsoever He will, and will fulfill His promise. This was certainly a wonderful degree of faith; as the promise stated that it was in his posterity that all the nations of the earth were to be blessed; that he had, as yet, no child by Sarah; that he was one hundred years old; that Sarah was ninety; and that, added to the utter improbability of her bearing at that age, she had ever been barren before. All these were so many reasons why he should not credit the promise; yet he believed. Therefore it might be well said, v. 20, that he staggered not at the promise, though everything was unnatural and improbable; but was strong in faith, and, by this almost inimitable confidence, gave glory to God. It was to God's honor that His servant put such unlimited confidence in Him; and he put this confidence in Him on the rational ground that God was fully able to perform what He had promised.

21. And being fully persuaded. His soul was "full of confidence" that the truth of God bound Him to fulfil His promise, and His power enabled Him to do it.

22. And therefore it was imputed to him for righteousness. Abraham's strong faith in the promise of the coming Saviour, for this was essential to his faith, was reckoned to him for justification. For it is not said that any righis chosen to be the prime condition of our justification, because it is a grace that of all others gives glory to God.

In the close of the chapter, he applies all to us. He here concludes that his justification was to be the pattern of ours: It was not written for his sake alone. It was not intended only for an historical commendation of Abraham, or a relation of something peculiar to him. The accounts we have of the Old Testament saints were not intended for histories only, but for precedents to direct us, for ensamples (1 Cor. x. 11) for our learning, ch. xv. 4. And this particularly concerning Abraham was written for us also, to assure us what that righteousness is which God requireth. For us on whom the ends of the world are come, as well as for the patriarchs; for the grace of God is the same yesterday, today, and for ever.

I. Our common privilege; it shall be imputed to us, that is, righteousness shall. It shall be imputed; he uses a future verb, to signify the continuation of this mercy in the church, that as it is the same now so it will be while God has a church in the world. There is a fountain opened that is inexhaustible.

II. Our common duty, the condition of this privilege, and that is believing. The proper object of this believing is a divine revelation. The revelation to Abraham was concerning a Christ to come; the revelation to us is concerning a Christ already come, which difference in the revelation does not alter the case. Now we are to believe on him that raised up Christ; not only believe his power, but depend upon his grace. So he explains it, v. 25. He was delivered for our offences. He died indeed as a malefactor, because he died for sin; but it was not his own sin. He died to make atonement for our sins. He was raised again for our justification. By the merit of his death he paid our debt, in his resurrection he took out our acquittance. The apostle puts a special emphasis on Christ's resurrection; it is Christ that died, yea, rather, that has risen again, ch. viii. 34. So that upon the whole matter it is very evident that we are not justified by the merit of our own works, but by dependence upon Jesus Christ and his righteousness, which was the truth that Paul in this and the foregoing chapter had been fixing as the great spring and foundation of all our comfort.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

23-25. Now . . .—Here is the application of this whole argument about Abraham: These things were not recorded as mere historical facts, but as illustrations for all time of God's method of justification by faith. to whom it shall be imputed, if we believe in him that raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead—in Him that hath done this, even as Abraham believed that God would raise up a seed in whom all nations should be blessed. Who was delivered for—'on account of'—our offences—i.e., in order to expiate them by His blood. and raised again for—'on account of,' i.e., in order to—our justification—As His resurrection was the divine assurance that He had "put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself," and the crowning of His whole work, our justification is fitly connected with that glorious act. Note, (1) The doctrine of justification by works, as it generates self-exaltation, is contrary to the first principles of all true religion (vs. 2; and see on ch. 3:21-26, Note 1). (2) The way of a sinner's justification has been the same in all time, and the testimony of the Old Testament on this subject is one with that of the New (vs. 3, etc., and see on ch. 3:27-31, Note 1). (3) Faith and works, in the matter of justification, are opposite and irreconcilable, even as grace and debt (vss. 4, 5; and see on ch. 11:6). If God "justifies the ungodly," works cannot be, in any sense or to any degree, the ground of justification. For the same reason, the first requisite, in order to justification, must be (under the conviction that we are "ungodly") to despair of it by works; and the next, to "believe in Him that justifieth the ungodly"—that hath a justifying righteousness to bestow, and is ready to bestow it upon those who deserve none, and to embrace it accordingly. (4) The sacraments of the Church were never intended, and are not adapted, to confer grace, or the blessings of salvation, upon men. Their proper use is to set a divine seal upon a state already existing, and so, they presuppose, and do not create it (vss. 8-12). As circumcision merely "sealed" Abraham's already existing acceptance with God, so with the sacraments of the New Testament. (5) As Abraham is "the heir of the world," all nations being blessed in him, through his Seed Christ Jesus, and justified solely according to the pattern of his faith, so the transmission of the true religion and all the salvation which the world will ever experience shall yet be traced back with wonder, gratitude, and joy, to that morning dawn when "the God of glory appeared unto our father Abraham, when he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran," Acts 7: 2 (vs. 13). (6) Nothing gives more glory to God than simple faith in His word, especially when all things seem to render the fulfilment of it hopeless (vss. 18-21). (7) All the Scripture examples of faith were recorded on purpose to beget and encourage the like faith in every succeeding age (vss. 23, 24; and cf. ch. 15:4). (8) Justification, in this argument, cannot be taken—as Romanists and other errorists insist—to mean a change upon men's character; for besides that this is to confound it with Sanctification, which has its appropriate place in this Epistle, the whole argument of the present chapter—and nearly all its more important clauses, expressions, and words—would in that case be unsuitable, and fitted only to mislead. Beyond all doubt it means exclusively a change upon men's state or relation to God; or, in scientific language, it is an objective, not a subjective change—a change from guilt and condemnation to acquittal and acceptance. And the best evidence that this is the key to the whole argument is, that it opens all the wards of the many-chambered lock with which the apostle has enriched us in this Epistle.

ADAM CLARKE

teousness, either his own or that of another, was imputed or reckoned to him for justification; but it, i.e., his faith in God.

23. Now it was not written for his sake alone. The fact of Abraham's believing and receiving salvation through that faith is not recorded as a mere circumstance in the patriarch's life, intended to do him honor.

24. But for us also. The mention of this circumstance has a much more extensive design than merely to honor Abraham. It is recorded as the model according to which God will save both Jews and Gentiles.

25. Who was delivered for our offences. Who was delivered up to death as a Sacrifice for our sins; for in what other way or for what other purpose could He, who is innocence itself, be delivered for our offences? And was raised again for our justification. He was raised that we might have the fullest assurance that the death of Christ had accomplished the end for which it took place, viz., our reconciliation to God. (1) From a careful examination of the divine oracles it appears that the death of Christ was an atonement or expiation for the sin of the world. (2) And as His death was an atonement for our sins, so His resurrection was the proof and pledge of our eternal life. (3) The doctrine of justification by faith, which is so nobly proved in the preceding chapter, is one of the grandest displays of the mercy of God to mankind. It is so very plain that all may comprehend it, and so free that all may attain it. (4) The doctrine of the imputed righteousness of Christ, as held by many, will not be readily found in this chapter, where it has been supposed to exist in all its proofs. It is repeatedly said that faith is imputed for righteousness, but in no place here that Christ's obedience to the moral law is imputed to any man. The truth is, the moral law was broken, and did not now require obedience. It required this before it was broken; but after it was broken, it required death. Either the sinner must die or someone in his stead; but there was none whose death could have been an equivalent for the transgressions of the world but Jesus Christ. Jesus therefore died for man; and it is through His blood, the merit of His passion and death, that we have redemption, and not by His obedience to the moral law in our stead. (5) This doctrine of the imputed righteousness of Christ is capable of great abuse. To say that Christ's personal righteousness is imputed to every true believer is not scriptural. To say that He has fulfilled all righteousness for us, or in our stead, if by this is meant His fulfillment of all moral duties, is neither scriptural nor true. That He has died in our stead is a great, glorious, and scriptural truth; that there is no redemption but through His blood is asserted beyond all contradiction in the oracles of God. But there are a multitude of duties which the moral law requires which Christ never fulfilled in our stead, and never could—in the relation of parents, husbands, wives, etc.

CHAPTER 5

The precious benefits and privileges which flow from justification are such as should quicken us all to give diligence to make it sure to ourselves. The fruits of this tree of life are exceedingly precious.

I. We have peace with God, v. 1. It is sin that breeds the quarrel between us and God. Justification takes away the guilt, immediately upon the removing of that obstacle, the peace is made. By faith we lay hold of God's arm and of his strength, and so are at peace. There is more in this peace than barely a cessation of enmity, there is friendship and loving-kindness, for God is either the worst enemy or the best friend. Christ has called his disciples friends, John xv. 13–15. And surely a man needs no more to make him happy than to have God his friend! But this is through our Lord Jesus Christ—through him as Vss. 1-11. THE BLESSED EFFECTS OF JUSTIFICATION BY FAITH. The proof of this doctrine being now concluded, the apostle comes here to treat of its fruits, reserving the full consideration of this topic to another stage of the argument (ch. 8). 1. Therefore being—'having been'—justified by faith, we have peace with God . . .—If we are to be guided by MS. authority, the true reading here, beyond doubt, is, 'Let us have peace'; a reading, however, which most reject, because they think it unnatural to exhort men to have what it belongs to God to give, because the apostle is not here giving exhortations, but stating matters of fact. But as it seems hazardous to set aside the decisive testimony of MSS., as to what the apostle did write, in favor of what we merely think he ought to have written, let us pause and ask—If it be the privilege of the justi-

CHAPTER 5

1. Therefore being justified by faith. The apostle takes it for granted that he has proved that justification is by faith, and that the Gentiles have an equal title with the Jews to salvation by faith. And now he proceeds to show the effects produced in the hearts of the believing Gentiles by this doctrine. We are justified, have all our sins pardoned by faith, as the instrumental cause; for, being sinners, we have no works of righteousness that we can plead. We have peace with God. Before, while sinners, we were in a state of enmity with God, which was sufficiently proved by our rebellion against his authority, and our transgression of his laws; but now, being reconciled, we have peace with God. Peace is generally the firstfruits of our

the great peacemaker, the Mediator between God and man, not only the maker, but the matter and maintainer, of our peace.

II. We have access by faith into this grace wherein we stand, v. 2. This is a further privilege, not only peace, but grace. The saints' happy state. It is a state of grace, God's loving-kindness to us and our conformity to God. Into this grace we have access: we were not born in this state, but we are brought into it. We could not have got into it of ourselves, but we are led into it as blind, or lame, or weak people are led. We have had access. Paul, in his conversion, had this access; then he was made nigh. It was Christ that introduced and led him by the hand into this grace. By whom we have access by faith. By Christ as the author, by faith as the means of this access. Their happy standing in this state: Wherein we stand. Not only wherein we are, but wherein we stand. The phrase denotes also our progress; while we stand, we are going. We must not lie down, as if we had already attained, but stand as those that are pressing forward, stand as servants attending on Christ our master. The phrase denotes, further, our perseverance: we stand firmly and safely; stand as soldiers stand, that keep their ground. It is not in the court of heaven as in earthly courts, where high places are slippery places.

III. We rejoice in hope of the glory of God. Besides the happiness in hand, there is a happiness in hope, the glory of God. Those that have access by faith into the grace of God now may hope for the glory of God hereafter. Grace is glory begun, the earnest and assurance of glory. Those who hope for the glory of God hereafter, have enough to rejoice in now.

IV. We glory in tribulations also; not only notwithstanding our tribulations, but even in our tribulations. What a growing increasing happiness the happiness of the saints is: Not only so. We glory in tribulations also, especially tribulations for righteousness' sake. This being the hardest point, he sets himself to show the grounds and reasons of it. Tribulations, by a chain of causes, greatly befriend hope, which he shows in the method of its influence. Tribulation worketh patience, the powerful grace of God working in and with the tribulation. It proves, and by proving improves, patience, as steel is hardened by the fire. That which worketh patience is matter of joy; for patience does us more good than tribulations can do us hurt. Tribulation in itself worketh impatience; but, as it is sanctified to the saints, it worketh patience. Patience experience, v. 4. It works an experience of God, the patient sufferers have the greatest experience of the divine consolations. It works an experience of ourselves. It is by tribulation that we make an experiment of our own sincerity. It works an approbation, as he is approved that has passed the test. Experience hope. He who, being thus tried, comes forth as gold, will thereby be encouraged to hope. Experience of God is a prop to our hope. Experience of ourselves helps to evidence our sincerity. This hope maketh not ashamed, will not deceive us. Nothing confounds more than disappointment. It maketh not ashamed of our sufferings. It is in a good cause, for a good Master, and in good hope; and therefore we are not ashamed. Because the love of God is shed abroad. This hope will not disappoint us, because it is sealed with the Holy Spirit as a Spirit of love. The love of God, that is, the sense of God's love to us, drawing out love in us to him again. The ground of all our comfort and holiness, and perseverance in both, is laid in the shedding abroad of the love of God in our hearts. Sense of God's love to us will make us not ashamed, either of our hope in him or our sufferings for him.

The apostle here describes the fountain and foundation of justification, laid in the death of the Lord Jesus. He enlarges upon this instance of the love of God which is shed abroad. 1. The persons he died for, v. 6–8. 2. The precious fruits of his death, v. 9–11. 3. The parallel he runs between the communication of sin and death by the first Adam and of righteousness and life by the second Adam, v. 12, to the end.

I. The character we were under when Christ died for us.

1. We were without strength (v. 6), in a sad condition; altogether unable to help ourselves out of that condition. Therefore, our salvation is here said to come in due time. God's time to help and save is when those that are to be saved are without strength. It is the manner of God to help at a dead lift.

2. He died for the ungodly; not only helpless creatures, and therefore likely to perish, but guilty sinful creatures, and therefore deserving to perish. Being ungodly, they had need of one to die for them.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

fied to "have peace with God," why might not the apostle begin his enumeration of the fruits of justification by calling on believers to 'realize' this peace as belonged to them, or cherish the joyful consciousness of it as their own? And if this is what he has done, it would not be necessary to continue in the same style, and the other fruits of justification might be set down simply as matters of fact. This "peace" is first a change in God's relation to us; and next, as the consequence of this, a change on our part towards Him. God, on the one hand, has "reconciled us to Himself by Jesus Christ" (II Cor. 5:18); and we, on the other hand, setting our seal to this, "are reconciled to God" (II Cor. 5:20). The "propitiation" is the meeting-place; there the controversy on both sides terminates in an honorable and eternal "peace." 2. By whom also we have—'have had'—access by faith into this grace—favor with God—wherein we stand—i.e., 'To that same faith which first gave us "peace with God" we owe our introduction into that permanent standing in the favor of God which the justified enjoy.' As it is difficult to distinguish this from the peace first mentioned, we regard it as merely an additional phase of the same [MEYER, PHILIPPI, MEHRING], rather than something new [BEZA, THOLUCK, HODGE]. and rejoice—'glory,' 'boast,' 'triumph'—'rejoice' is not strong enough. in hope of the glory of God—See on "hope," vs. 4. 3, 4. we glory in tribulation also; knowing that tribulation worketh patience—Patience is the quiet endurance of what we cannot but wish removed, whether it be the withholding of promised good (ch. 8:25), or the continued experience of positive ill (as here). There is indeed a patience of unrenewed nature, which has something noble in it, though in many cases the offspring of pride, if not of something lower. Men have been known to endure every form of privation, torture, and death, without a murmur and without even visible emotion, merely because they deemed it unworthy of them to sink under unavoidable ill. But this proud, stoical hardihood has nothing in common with the grace of patience—which is either the meek endurance of ill because it is of God (Job 1:21, 22; 2:10), or the calm waiting for promised good till His time to dispense it come (Heb. 10:36); in the full persuasion that such trials are divinely appointed, are the needed discipline of God's children, are but for a definite period, and are not sent without abundant promises of "songs in the night." If such be the "patience" which "tribulation worketh," no wonder that patience worketh experience—rather 'proof,' as the same word is rendered in II Corinthians 2:9; 13:3; Philippians 2:22; i.e., experimental evidence that we have "believed through grace." and experience—'proof'—hope—"of the glory of God," as prepared for us. Thus have we hope in two distinct ways, and at two successive stages of the Christian life: first, immediately on believing, along with the sense of peace and abiding access to God (vs. 1); next, after the reality of this faith has been "proved," particularly by the patient endurance of trials sent to test it. We first get it by looking away from ourselves to the Lamb of God; next by looking into or upon ourselves as transformed by that "looking unto Jesus." In the one case, the mind acts (as they say) objectively; in the other, subjectively. The one is (as divines say) the assurance of faith; the other, the assurance of sense. 5. And hope maketh not ashamed—putteth not to shame, as empty hopes do—because the love of God—i.e., not 'our love to God,' as the Romish and some Protestant expositors (following some of the Fathers) represent it; but clearly 'God's love to us'—as most expositors agree. is shed abroad—lit., 'poured forth,' i.e., copiously diffused (cf. John 7:38; Titus 3:6). by the Holy Ghost which is—rather 'was'—given unto us—i.e., at the great Pentecostal effusion, which is viewed as the formal donation of the Spirit to the Church of God, for all time and for each believer. (The Holy Ghost is here first introduced in this Epistle.) It is as if the apostle had said, 'And how can this hope of glory, which as believers we cherish, put us to shame, when we feel God Himself, by His Spirit given to us, drenching our hearts in sweet, all-subduing sensations of His wondrous love to us in Christ Jesus?" This leads the apostle to expatiate on the amazing character of that love. 6-8. For when we were yet without strength—i.e., powerless to deliver ourselves, and so ready to perish. in due time—at the appointed season—Christ died for the ungodly—Three signal properties of God's love are here given: First, "Christ died for the ungodly," whose character, so far from meriting any interposition in their behalf, was altogether repulsive to the eye of God; second, justification. Through our Lord Jesus Christ. His passion and death being the sole cause of our reconciliation to God.

2. By whom also. We are not only indebted to our Lord Jesus Christ for the free and full pardon which we have received, but our continuance in a justified state depends upon His gracious influence in our hearts and His intercession before the throne of God. We have access. "We have received this access." It was only through Christ that we could at first approach God, and it is only through Him that the privilege is continued to us. And this access to God, or "introduction" to the Divine Presence, is to be considered as a lasting privilege. We are not brought to God for the purpose of an interview, but to remain with Him. Into this grace. This state of favor and acceptance. Wherein we stand. Having firm footing, and a just title through the blood of the Lamb to the full salvation of God. And rejoice. Have solid happiness, from the evidence we have of our acceptance with Him.

3. And not only so. We are not only happy from being in this state of communion with our God, and the prospect of being eternally with Him. But we glory in tribulations also. All the sufferings we endure for the testimony of our Lord are so sanctified to us by His grace that they become powerful instruments of increasing our happiness. Tribulation worketh patience. "Endurance" under trials, without sustaining loss or deterioration. It is a metaphor taken from refining metals. We do not speak thus from any sudden raptures or extraordinary sensations we may have of spiritual joy; for we find that the tribulations through which we pass are the means of exercising and increasing our patience, our meek forbearance of injuries received, or persecutions experienced, on account of the gospel.

4. And patience, experience. "Full proof, by trial," of the truth of our religion, the solidity of our Christian state, and the faithfulness of our God. In such cases we have the opportunity of putting our religion to the test; and by every such test it receives the deeper sterling stamp. The apostle uses here also a metaphor taken from the purifying, refining, and testing of silver and gold. Experience, hope. For we thus calculate, that He who has supported us in the past will support us in those which may yet come; and as we have received so much spiritual profiting by means of the sufferings through which we have already passed, we may profit equally by those which are yet to come. This hope prevents us from dreading coming trials; we receive them as means of grace, and find that all things work together for good to them that love God.

5. And hope maketh not ashamed. A hope that is not rationally founded will have its expectation cut off, and then shame and confusion will be the portion of its possessor. Because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts. We have the most solid and convincing testimony of God's love to us by that measure of it which He has communicated to our hearts. There it is "poured out" and diffused abroad, filling, quickening, and invigorating all our powers and faculties. The Holy Ghost comes with it; by His energy it is diffused and pervades every part.

6. For when we were yet without strength. The apostle, having pointed out the glorious state of the believing Gentiles, takes occasion to contrast this with their former state, and the means by which they were redeemed from it. Their former state he points out in four particulars, which may be applied to men in general. (1) They were without strength; in a weak, dying state; neither able to resist sin nor do any good; utterly devoid of power to extricate themselves from the misery of their situation. (2) They were ungodly; without either the worship or knowledge of the true God; they had not God in them; and, consequently, were not partakers of the divine nature. Satan lived in, ruled, and enslaved their hearts.

MATTHEW HENRY

This he illustrates (v. 7, 8) as an unparalleled instance of love; herein God's thoughts and ways were above ours. (1) One would hardly die for a righteous man, that is, one that is unjustly condemned; everybody will pity such a one, but few will hazard their own in his stead. (2) One might perhaps be persuaded to die for a good man, who is more than barely a righteous man. Many that are good themselves yet do but little good to others; but those that are useful commonly get themselves well beloved. And yet observe how he qualifies this: it is but some that would do so, after all, it is but a peradventure. (3) But Christ died for sinners (v. 8), neither righteous nor good; not only such as were useless, but such as were guilty. Now herein God commended his love, not only proved but magnified it and made it illustrious, not only put it past dispute, but rendered it the object of the greatest wonder and admiration. Commendeth his love in order to the shedding abroad of his love in our hearts by the Holy Ghost. While we were yet sinners. He died to save us, not in our sins, but from our sins; but we were yet sinners when he died for us. (4) Nay, which is more, we were enemies (v. 10), not only malefactors, but traitors and rebels. And that for such as these Christ should die is such a mystery, such an unprecedented instance of love, that it may well be our business to eternity to admire and wonder at it. Justly might he who had thus loved us make it one of the laws of his kingdom that we should love our enemies.

II. The precious fruits of his death.

1. Justification and reconcilation are the fruit of the death of Christ: We are justified by his blood (v. 9), reconciled by his death, v. 10. Sin is pardoned, the enmity slain, an end made of iniquity, and an everlasting righteousness brought in. Immediately upon our believing, we are actually put into a state of justification and reconciliation. Justified by his blood. Our justification is ascribed to the blood of Christ because without blood there is no remission, Heb. ix. 22. In all the propitiatory sacrifices, the sprinkling of the blood was of the essence of the sacrifice.

2. Hence results salvation from wrath: Saved from wrath (v. 9), saved by his life, v. 10. If God justified and reconciled us when we were enemies, much more will be save us when we are justified and reconciled. He that has done the greater, which is of enemies to make us friends, will certainly do the less, which is when we are friends to use us friendly and to be kind to us. The apostle, once and again, speaks of it with a much more. We shall be saved from wrath. It is the wrath of God that is the fire of hell. Reconciled by his death, saved by his life. His life here spoken of is not to be understood of his life in the flesh, but his life in heaven. We are reconciled by Christ humbled, we are saved by Christ exalted. The dying Jesus laid the foundation in satisfying for sin, and slaying the enmity, but it is the living Jesus that perfects the work. Christ dying was the testator, who bequeathed us the legacy; but Christ living is the executor, who pays it.

3. All this produces, as a further privilege, our joy in God, v. 11. God is now so far from being a terror to us that he is our joy. We are reconciled and saved from wrath. And not only so, there is more in it yet, a constant stream of favours; not only get into the harbour, but come in with full sail: We joy in God, solacing ourselves in his love. And all this (which he repeats as a string he loved to be harping upon) by virtue of the atonement, for by him we received the atonement. To receive the atonement is, (1) To give our consent to the atonement, being willing and glad to be saved in a gospel way and upon gospel terms. (2) To take the comfort of the atonement. Now we joy in God, now we do indeed receive the atonement, glorying in it.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

He did this "when they were without strength"—with nothing between them and perdition but that self-originating divine compassion; third, He did this "at the due time," when it was most fitting that it should take place (cf. Gal. 4:4). The two former of these properties the apostle now proceeds to illustrate. For scarcely for a righteous man—a man of simply unexceptionable character—will one—'any one'—die: yet peradventure for a good man—a man who, besides being unexceptionable, is distinguished for goodness, a benefactor to society—some—'some one'—would—rather 'doth'—even dare to die—"Scarce an instance occurs of selfsacrifice for one merely upright; though for one who makes himself a blessing to society there may be found an example of such noble surrender of life" [So BENGEL, OLSHAUSEN, THOLUCK, ALFORD, PHILIPPI]. (To make the "righteous" and the "good" man here to mean the same person, and the whole sense to be that "though rare, the case may occur, of one making a sacrifice of life for a worthy character" [as CALVIN, BEZA, FRITZSCHE, JOWETT], is extremely flat. But God commendeth—'setteth off,' 'displayeth'—in glorious contrast with all that men will do for each other. his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners—i.e., in a state not of positive "goodness," nor even of negative "righteousness," but on the contrary, "sinners," a state which His soul hateth. Christ died for us—Now comes the overpowering inference, emphatically redoubled. 9, 10. Much more then, being—'having been'—now justified by his blood, we shall be saved from wrath through him. For if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being now—'having now been'—reconciled, we shall be saved by his life—i.e., 'If that part of the Saviour's work which cost Him His blood, and which had to be wrought for persons incapable of the least sympathy either with His love or His labors in their behalf—even our "justification," our "reconciliation"—is already completed; how much more will He do all that remains to be done, since He has it to do, not by death-agonies any more, but in untroubled "life," and no longer for enemies, but for friends—from whom, at every stage of it, He receives the grateful response of redeemed and adoring souls?' To be "saved from wrath through Him," denotes here the whole work of Christ towards believers, from the moment of justification, when the wrath of God is turned away from them, till the Judge on the great white throne shall discharge that wrath upon them that "obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ"; and that work may all be summed up in "keeping them from falling, and presenting them faultless before the presence of His glory with exceeding joy" (Jude 24): thus are they "saved from wrath through Him." 11. And not only so, but we also joy—rather, 'glory'—in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, by—'through'—whom we have now received the atonement—rather, 'the reconciliation' (Margin), as the same word is rendered in vs. 10 and in II Corinthians 5:18, 19. (In fact, the earlier meaning of the English word 'atonement' was "the reconciliation of two estranged parties") [TRENCH]. The foregoing effects of justification were all benefits to ourselves, calling for gratitude; this last may be termed a purely disinterested one. Our first feeling towards God, after we have found peace with Him. is that of clinging gratitude for so costly a salvation; but no sooner have we learned to cry, Abba, Father, under the sweet sense of reconciliation, than "gloriation" in Him takes the place of dread of Him, and now He appears to us "altogether lovely!"—On this section, note (1) How gloriously does the Gospel evince its divine origin by basing all acceptable obedience on "peace with God," laying the foundations of this peace in a righteous "justification" of the sinner "through our Lord Jesus Christ," and making this the entrance to a permanent standing in the divine favor, and a triumphant expectation of future glory! (vss. 1, 2). Other peace, worthy of the name, there is none; and as those who are strangers to it rise not to the enjoyment of such high fellowship with God, so they have neither any taste for it nor desire after it. (2) As only believers possess the true secret of patience under trials, so, although "not joyous but grievous" in themselves (Heb. 12:17), when trials divinely sent afford them the opportunity of evidencing their faith by the grace of patience under them, they should "count it all joy" (vss. 3, 4; and see Jas. 1:2, 3). (3) "Hope," in the New Testament sense of the term, is not a lower degree of faith or assurance (as many now say, I hope for heaven, but am not sure of it); but invariably means 'the confident expectation of future good.' It

(3) They were sinners, v. 8, aiming at happiness, but constantly "missing the mark," which is the ideal meaning of the Hebrew chata and the Greek hamartano. (4) They were enemies, v. 10, from echthos, "hatred, enmity," persons who hated God and holiness; and acted in continual hostility to both. What a gradation is here! Died for the ungodly. "He died instead of the ungodly"; see also v. 8; so Luke xxii. 19. The body of Christ, "which is given for you"; i.e., the life that is laid down in your stead. In this way the preposition hyper is used by the best Greek writers.

7. For scarcely for a righteous man will one die. The Jews divide men, as to their moral character, into four classes. The first class consists of those who say, "What is mine, is my own; and what is thine, is thy own." These may be considered the just, who render to every man his due; or rather, they who neither give nor take. The second class is made up of those who say, "What is mine, is thine; and what is thine, is mine." These are they who accommodate each other, who borrow and lend. The third class is composed of those who say, "What is mine, is thine; and what is thine, let it be thine." These are the pious, or good, who give up all for the benefit of their neighbor. The fourth class are those who say, "What is thine, is mine; and what is thine, shall be mine." These are the impious, who take all, and give nothing. Now, for one of the first class, who would die? Peradventure for a good man some would even dare to die. This is for one of the third class, who gives all he has for the good of others. This is the truly benevolent man, whose life is devoted to the public good; for such a person, peradventure, some who have had their lives perhaps preserved by his bounty would even dare to die.

8. But God commendeth his love. God "hath set" this act of infinite mercy in the most conspicuous light, so as to recommend it to the notice and admiration of all. While we were yet sinners. We were neither righteous nor good, but impious and wicked.

9. Much more then, being now justified. If Jesus Christ, in His endless compassion towards us, gave His life for ours, while we were yet enemies; being now justified by his blood, by His death on the Cross, and thus reconciled to God, we shall be saved from wrath, from "punishment" for past transgression, through him, by what He has thus suffered for us.

10. We were reconciled. The enmity existing before rendered the reconciliation necessary. In every human heart there is a measure of enmity to holiness, and consequently to the Author of it. We shall be saved by his life. For, (1) as He died for our sins, so He rose again for our justification; and His resurrection to life is the grand proof that He has accomplished whatever He had purposed in reference to the salvation of man. (2) This may be also understood of His life of intercession: for it is written, "He ever liveth to make intercession for them," Heb. vii. 25. Through this life of intercession at the right hand of God we are spared and blessed. (3) And it will not be amiss to consider that, as our salvation implies the renovation of our nature, and our being restored to the image of God, so [it] may be rendered: "We shall be saved in His life." (4) The example also of the life of Christ is a means of salvation. He hath left us "an example" that we "should follow his steps"; and he that followeth Him "shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life," John viii. 12.

11. We also joy, "we exult," or "glory" in God. We now feel that God is reconciled to us, and we are reconciled to Him. The enmity is removed from our souls; and He, for Christ's sake, through whom we have received the atonement, "the reconciliation," has remitted the wrath, the punishment which we deserved; and now, through this reconciliation, we expect an eternal glory. It was certainly improper to translate here atonement, instead of "reconciliation"; as katallasso signifies to "reconcile," and is so rendered by our translators in all the places where it occurs. It does not mean the atonement here, as we generally understand that word, viz., the sacrificial death of Christ, but

III. The parallel that the apostle runs between the communication of sin and death by the first Adam and of righteousness and life by the second Adam (v. 12, to the end), showing a correspondence between our fall and our recovery.

1. A general truth laid down as the foundation of his discourse—that Adam was a type of Christ (v. 14): Who is the figure of him that was to come. God dealt with Adam and Adam acted as a common father, of and for all his posterity. Jesus Christ, the Mediator, acted as the head of all the elect, dealt with God for them, as their father, died for them, rose for them, entered within the veil for them, did all for them.

2. A more particular explication of the parallel. (1) How Adam communicated sin and death to all his posterity (v. 12): By one man sin entered. We see the world under a deluge of sin and death, full of iniquities and full of calamities. It was by one man, and he the first man. [1] By him sin entered. When God pronounced all very good (Gen. i. 31) there was no sin in the world. It never entered into the world of mankind till Adam sinned. Then entered the guilt of Adam's sin imputed to posterity, and a general depravedness of nature. For that (so we read it), rather in whom, all have sinned. Sin entered into the world by Adam, for in him we all sinned. God, as the author of nature, had made this the law of nature, that man should beget in his own likeness. In Adam therefore, as in a common receptacle, the whole nature of man was reposited. Adam therefore sinning and falling, the nature became guilty and corrupt. Thus in him all have sinned. [2] Death by sin, for death is the wages of sin. When sin came, of course death came with it. [3] So death passed, passed through all men, as an infectious disease passes through a town, so that none escape it. It is the universal fate, without exception. Death reigned, v. 14. None are exempted from its sceptre. It is the last enemy, 1 Cor. xv. 26. He shows that sin did not commence with the law of Moses, but was in the world until, or before, that law. Sin was in the world before the law; witness Cain's murder, the apostasy of the old world, the wickedness of Sodom. His inference hence is, Therefore there was a law; for sin is not imputed where there is no law. Original sin is a want of conformity to, and actual sin is a transgression of, the law of God: therefore all were under some law. His proof of it is, Death reigned from Adam to Moses, v. 14. This proves that sin was in the world before the law, and original sin, for death reigned over those that had not sinned any actual sin, that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression.

presupposes faith; and what faith assures us will be ours, hope accordingly expects. In the nourishment of this hope, the soul's look outward to Christ for the ground of it, and inward upon ourselves for evidence of its reality, must act and react upon each other (vs. 2 and vs. 4 compared). (4) It is the proper office of the Holy Ghost to beget in the soul the full conviction and joyful consciousness of the love of God in Christ Jesus to sinners of mankind, and to ourselves in particular; and where this exists, it carries with it such an assurance of final salvation as cannot deceive (vs. 5). (5) The justification of sinful men is not in virtue of their amendment, but of "the blood of God's Son"; and while this is expressly affirmed in vs. 9, our reconciliation to God by the "death of His Son," affirmed in vs. 10, is but a variety of the same statement. In both, the blessing meant is the restoration of the sinner to a righteous standing in the sight of God; and in both, the meritorious ground of this, which is intended to be conveyed, is the expiatory sacrifice of God's Son. (6) Gratitude to God for redeeming love, if it could exist without delight in God Himself, would be a selfish and worthless feeling; but when the one rises into the other—the transporting sense of eternal "reconciliation" passing into "gloriation in God" Himself—then the lower is sanctified and sustained by the higher, and each feeling is perfective of the other (vs. 11).

12-21. COMPARISON AND CONTRAST BETWEEN ADAM AND CHRIST IN THEIR RELATION TO THE HUMAN FAMILY. (This profound and most weighty section has occasioned an immense deal of critical and theological discussion, in which every point, and almost every clause, has been contested. We can here but set down what appears to us to be the only tenable view of it as a whole and of its successive clauses, with some slight indication of the grounds of our judgment). 12. Wherefore—i.e., Things being so; referring back to the whole preceding argument. as by one man—Adam. sin—considered here in its guilt, criminality, penal desert. entered into the world, and death by—as the penalty of—sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned—rather, 'all sinned,' i.e., in that one man's first sin. Thus death reaches every individual of the human family, as the penalty due to himself. [So, in substance, BENGEL, HODGE, PHILIPPI.] Here we should have expected the apostle to finish his sentence, in some such way as this: 'Even so, by one man righteousness has entered into the world, and life by righteousness.' But, instead of this, we have a digression, extending to five verses, to illustrate the important statement of vs. 12; and it is only at vs. 18 that the comparison is resumed and finished. 13-14. For until the law sin was in the world—i.e., during all the period from Adam "until the law" of Moses was given, God continued to treat men as sinners. but sin is not imputed where there is no law—'There must therefore have been a law during that period, because sin was then imputed'; as is now to be shown. Nevertheless death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression—But who are they?—a much contested question. Infants (say some), who being guiltless of actual sin, may be said not to have sinned in the way that Adam did [AUGUSTIN, BEZA, HODGE]. But why should infants be specially connected with the period "from Adam to Moses," since they die alike in every period? And if the apostle meant to express here the death of infants, why has he done it so enigmatically? Besides, the death of infants is comprehended in the universal mortality on account of the first sin, so emphatically expressed in vs. 12; what need then to specify it here? and why, if not necessary, should we presume it to be meant here, unless the language unmistakably point to it—which it certainly does not? The meaning then must be, that 'death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over those that had not, like Adam, transgressed against a positive commandment, threatening death to the disobedient.' (So most interpreters.) In this case, the particle "even," instead of specifying one particular class of those who lived "from Adam to Moses" (as the other interpretation supposes), merely explains what it was that made the case of those who died from Adam to Moses worthy of special notice—namely, that 'though unlike Adam and all since Moses, those who lived between the two had no positive threatening of death for transgression, "nevertheless, death reigned even over them."' who is the figure—or, 'a type'—of him that was to come—Christ. "This clause is inserted on the first mention of the name 'Adam, the one man of whom he is speaking, to recall the purpose for which he is rather the effect of that atonement, the removal of the enmity, and by this, the change of our condition and state; from kata, intensive, and allasso, "to change"—the thorough change of our state from enmity to friendship. God is reconciled to us and we are reconciled to Him by the death of His Son, and thus there is a glorious change from enmity to friendship; and we can exult in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have received this "reconciliation."

12. Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world. From this verse to the conclusion of the chapter the apostle produces a strong argument to prove that, as all mankind stood in need of the grace of God in Christ to redeem them from their sins, so this grace has been afforded equally to all, both Jews and Gentiles. The order in which the apostle handles this argument is this: (1) He affirms that death passed upon all men by Adam's one transgression, v. 12. (2) He proves this, vv. 13-14. (3) He affirms there is a correspondence between Adam and Christ, or between the "offence" and the "free gift," v. 14. (4) This correspondence, so far as the two opposite parts answer to each other, is justly expressed in vv. 18-19; and there we have the main or fundamental position of the apostle's argument, in relation to the point which he has been arguing from the beginning of the Epistle, namely, the extensiveness of the grace of the gospel, that it actually reaches to all men, and is not confined to the Jews. (5) But before he laid down this position, it was necessary that he should show that the correspondence between Adam and Christ, or between the "offence" and the "gift," is not to be confined strictly to the bounds specified in the position, as if the gift reached no further than the consequences of the offense, when in reality it extends vastly beyond them, vv. 15-17. (6) Having settled these points, as previously necessary to clear his fundamental position and fit to his argument, he then lays down that position in a diversified manner of speech, vv. 18-19, just as in 1 Cor. xv. 20-21, and leaves us to conclude, from the premises laid down, vv. 15-17, that the gift and the grace in their utmost extent are as free to all mankind who are willing to accept of them as this particular instance, the resurrection from the dead. They shall all be raised from the dead hereafter; they may all be quickened by the Spirit here. (7) Having thus shown the extensiveness of the divine grace, in opposition to the dire effects of the law under which Adam was, that the Jews might not overlook what he intended they should particularly observe, he puts them in mind that the law given to Adam, Transgress and die, was introduced into the Jewish constitution by the ministry of Moses; and for this end, that "the offence," with the penalty of death annexed to it, "might abound," v. 20. But to illustrate the divine grace by setting it in contrast to the law, he immediately adds: Where sin, subjecting to death, "abounded, grace did much more abound"; that is, in blessings bestowed, it has stretched far beyond both Adam's transgression and the transgressions under the law of Moses, vv. 20-21. Sin entered into the world. There was neither sin nor death before the offense of Adam; after that there were both. Adam's transgression was therefore the cause of both. And death by sin. Natural evil is evidently the effect of moral evil; if man had never sinned, he had never suffered. Death passed upon all men. Hence we see that all human beings partook in the consequences of Adam's sin. For that all have sinned. All are born with a sinful nature; and the seeds of this evil soon vegetate, and bring forth corresponding fruits.

13. For until the law sin was in the world. As death reigned from Adam to Moses, so also did sin. Now, as there was no written law from Adam to that given to Moses, the death that prevailed could not be the breach of that law; for sin, so as to be punished with temporal death, is not imputed when there is no law, which shows the penalty of sin to be death. Therefore men are not subjected to death for their own personal transgressions, but for the sin of Adam, as through his transgression all come into the world with the seed of death and corruption in their own nature, superadded to their moral depravity.

14. Who is the figure of him that was to come.

MATTHEW HENRY

[2] Wherein the communication of grace and love by Christ goes beyond the communication of guilt and wrath by Adam, v. 15–17. It is designed for the magnifying of Christ's love, and for the comfort of believers. First, If guilt and wrath be communicated much more shall grace and love. Much more the grace of God, and the gift by grace. God's goodness is, of all his attributes, in a special manner his glory. We know that God is rather inclined to show mercy; punishing is his strange work. Secondly, If there was so much power and efficacy in the sin of a man, to condemn us, much more are there power and efficacy in the righteousness and grace of Christ, to justify and save us. Surely Adam could not propagate so strong a poison but Jesus Christ could propagate as strong an antidote, and much stronger.

Thirdly, It is but the guilt of one single offence of Adam's that is laid to our charge: The judgment was by one, that is, by one offence, v. 16, 17. But from Jesus Christ we receive and derive an abundance of grace, and of the gift of righteousness. The stream of grace and righteousness is deeper and broader than the stream of guilt. God in Christ forgives all trespasses.

Fourthly, By Adam's sin death reigned; but by Christ's righteousness believers are preferred to reign in life, v. 17. We are by Christ and his righteousness entitled to, and instated in, more and greater privileges than we lost by the offence of Adam. The plaster is wider than the wound, and more healing than the wound is killing.

treating of him, as the figure of Christ" [ALFORD]. The point of analogy intended here is plainly the public character which both sustained, neither of the two being regarded in the divine procedure towards men as mere individual men, but both alike as representative men. (Some take the proper supplement here to be "Him [that is] to come"; understanding the apostle to speak from his own time, and to refer to Christ's second coming [FRITZSCHE, DE WETTE, ALFORD]. But this is unnatural, since the analogy of the second Adam to the first has been in full development ever since "God exalted Him to be a Prince and a Saviour," and it will only remain to be consummated at His second coming. The simple meaning is, as nearly all interpreters agree, that Adam is a type of Him who was to come after him in the same public character, and so to be "the second Adam.") 15. But–'Yet,' 'Howbeit'–not as the offence–'trespass'–so also is the free gift–or 'the gracious gift,' 'the gift of grace.' The two cases present points of contrast as well as resemblance. For if . . .–rather, 'For if through the offense of the one the many died (i.e., in that one man's first sin), much more did the grace of God, and the free gift by grace, even that of the one man, Jesus Christ, abound unto the many.' By "the many" is meant the mass of mankind represented respectively by Adam and Christ, as opposed, not to few, but to "the one" who represented them. By "the free gift" is meant (as in vs. 17) the glorious gift of justifying righteousness; this is expressly distinguished from "the grace of God," as the effect from the cause; and both are said to "abound" towards us in Christ–in what sense will appear in the next two verses. And the "much more." of the one case than the other, does not mean that we get much more of good by Christ than of evil by Adam (for it is not a case of quantity at all); but that we have much more reason to expect, or it is much more agreeable to our ideas of God, that the many should be benefited by the merit of one, than that they should suffer for the sin of one; and if the latter has happened, much more may we assure ourselves of the former [PHILIPPI, HODGE]. 16. And not as it was by one that sinned, so is the gift–'Another point of contrast may be mentioned.' for the judgment–'sentence'–was by one–rather, 'was of one,' meaning not 'one man, but, as appears from the next clause, 'one offense'–to condemnation, but the free gift–'gift of grace'–is of many offences unto justification–a glorious point of contrast. 'The condemnation by Adam was for one sin; but the justification by Christ is an absolution not only from the guilt of that first offense, mysteriously attaching to every individual of the race, but from the countless offenses into which, as a germ lodged in the bosom of every child of Adam, it unfolds itself in his life.' This is the meaning of "grace abounding towards us in the abundance of the gift of righteousness." It is a grace not only rich in its character, but rich in detail; it is a "righteousness" not only rich in a complete justification of the guilty, condemned sinner; but rich in the amplitude of the ground which it covers, leaving no one sin of any of the justified uncancelled, but making him, though loaded with the guilt of myriads of offenses, "the righteousness of God in Christ." 17. For if by–'the'–one man's offence death reigned by one–'through the one'–much more shall they which receive–'the'–abundance of grace and of the gift of–justifying–righteousness . . . reign in life by one–'through the one'–Jesus Christ–We have here the two ideas of vs. 15 and vs. 16 sublimely combined into one, as if the subject had grown upon the apostle as he advanced in his comparison of the two cases. Here, for the first time in this section, he speaks of that LIFE which springs out of justification, in contrast with the death which springs from sin and follows condemnation. The proper idea of it therefore is, 'Right to live'–'Righteous life'–life possessed and enjoyed with the good will, and in conformity with the eternal law, of "Him that sitteth on the Throne"; life therefore in its widest sense–life in the whole man and throughout the whole duration of human existence, the life of blissful and loving relationship to God in soul and body, for ever and ever. It is worthy of note, too, that while he says death "reigned over" us through Adam, he does not say Life "reigns over us" through Christ; lest he should seem to invest this new life with the very attribute of death–that of fell and malignant tyranny, of which we were the hapless victims. Nor does he say Life reigns in us, which would have been a scriptural enough idea; but, which is much more pregnant, "We shall reign in life." While freedom and might are implied in the figure of "reigning," "life" is represented as the

ADAM CLARKE

Adam was the figure, typos, the "type, pattern, or resemblance" of him that was to come; i.e., of the Messiah. The correspondence between them appears in the following particulars: (1) Through him, as its spring and fountain, sin became diffused through the world, so that every man comes into the world with sinful propensities. Through Christ, as its Spring and Fountain, righteousness becomes diffused through the earth, so that every man is made partaker of a principle of grace and truth. (2) "As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive," I Cor. xv. 22. "For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead," v. 21. (3) As in or through Adam guilt came upon all men, so, through Christ, "the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life," v. 18. These alone seem to be the instances in which a similitude exists between Adam and Christ.

15. For if through the offence of one many be dead. That "the many" of the apostle here means all mankind needs no proof to any but that person who finds himself qualified to deny that all men are mortal. And if "the many"—that is, all mankind—have died through the offense of one, certainly the gift by grace which abounds unto "the many" by Christ Jesus must have reference to every human being. If the consequences of Christ's incarnation and death extend only to a few, or a select number of mankind, then the consequences of Adam's sin have extend only to a few, or a select number of mannumber; and if only many and not all have fallen, only that many had need of a Redeemer. For it is most evident that the same persons are referred to in both clauses of the verse. Hath abounded unto many. That is, Christ Jesus died for every man; salvation is free for all; saving grace is tendered to every soul; and a measure of the divine light is actually communicated to every heart, John i. 9. And as the grace is offered, so it may be received; and hence the apostle says, v. 17: "They which receive abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness shall reign in life by . . . Jesus Christ." By receiving is undoubtedly meant not only the act of receiving, but retaining and improving the grace which they receive; and as all may receive, so all may improve and retain the grace they do receive; and, consequently, all may be eternally saved. But of multitudes Christ still may say, "They will not come unto Me, that they might have life."

16. And not as it was by one that sinned. That is, the judicial act that followed Adam's sin (the sentence of death pronounced upon him, and his expulsion from paradise) took its rise from his one offense alone, and terminated in condemnation; but the free gift of God in Christ takes its rise also from the many offences which men, in a long course of life, have personally committed; and the object of this grace is to justify them freely, and bring them to eternal life.

17. Death reigned by one. Death is here personified, and is represented as reigning over the human race. Shall reign in life. Those who receive, retain, and improve the abundant grace offered by Jesus Christ shall be redeemed from the empire of death and exalted to the throne of God, to live and reign with Him ever, world without end. See Rev. i. 5-6; ii. 7, 10-11; iii. 21. If we carefully compare v. 15 with v. 17, we shall find that there is a correspondence between the abounding, v. 17, and hath abounded, v. 15; between the gift of righteousness, i.e., "justification," v. 17, and the gift by grace, v. 15. Therefore, if we understand the abounding of grace and the gift of justification, v. 17, we shall understand the grace of God, and the gift by grace, which . . . hath abounded unto many, v. 15. But the abounding of grace, and the gift of justification, v. 17, are that grace and gift which are received by those who shall reign in (eternal) life. Reigning in life is the consequence of receiving the grace and gift. Therefore receiving the grace is a necessary qualification on our part for reigning in life; and this necessarily implies our believing in Christ Jesus as having died for our offenses, receiving the grace so freely offered us, using the means in order to get more grace, and bringing forth the fruits of the Spirit.

MATTHEW HENRY

(2) How, in correspondence to this, Christ communicates righteousness and life to all true believers. He shows not only wherein the resemblance holds, but wherein the communication of grace and love by Christ goes beyond the communication of guilt and wrath by Adam.

[1] Wherein the resemblance holds, v. 18, 19.

First, By the offence and disobedience of one many were made sinners, and judgment came upon all men to condemnation. Adam's sin was disobedience. The thing he did was therefore evil because it was forbidden, this opened the door to other sins. The malignity and poison of sin are very strong and spreading, else the guilt of Adam's sin would not have reached so far. Who would think there should be so much evil in sin? By Adam's sin many are made sinners: many, that is, all his posterity. Made sinners, It denotes the making of us such by a judicial act. Judgment is come upon all those that by Adam's disobedience were made sinners. All the race of mankind lie under a sentence, like an attainder upon a family.

Secondly, In like manner, by the righteousness and obedience of one are many made righteous, and so the free gift comes upon all. 1. The nature of Christ's righteousness, how it is brought in; it is by his obedience. The disobedience of the first Adam ruined us, the obedience of the second Adam saves us. By his obedience he wrought out a righteousness for us, satisfied God's justice. 2. The fruit of it. There is a free gift come upon all men. The salvation wrought is a common salvation; whoever will may come, and take of these waters of life. This free gift is unto justification of life. It is not only a justification that frees from death, but that entitles to life. Many shall be made righteous, shall be constituted righteous, as by letters patent.

F. B. MEYER:

We are here taught the unity of the race, not only in Adam, but in Christ. Adam's sin has affected the standing of every man; but the grace and the obedience of the "one man," Jesus Christ, have secured for all men the offer of the free gift. The guilt that lay upon the race by the sin of Adam has been removed from the race by the obedience of the Son of man to the cross. None, therefore, is condemned on account of that first transgression or doomed for that primal fall. In a sense, all are made righteous; that is, all stand before God on the basis of their individual, rather than their racial, responsibility. We are not condemned with Adam, but will be condemned if we refuse to avail ourselves of the grace of Jesus Christ. All that sin forfeited is put within our reach. Nay, we may reach higher heights than Adam if we will only receive the abundance of the grace of Christ.—Bible Commentary glorious territory or atmosphere of that reign. And by recurring to the idea of vs. 16, as to the "many offenses" whose complete pardon shows "the abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness," the whole statement is to this effect: 'If one man's one offense let loose against us the tyrant power of Death, to hold us as its victims in helpless bondage, "much more," when we stand forth enriched with God's "abounding grace" and in the beauty of a complete absolution from countless offenses, shall we expatiate in a life divinely owned and legally secured, "reigning" in exultant freedom and unchallenged might, through that other matchless "One," Jesus Christ!' (On the import of the future tense in this last clause, see on vs. 19, and on ch. 6. 5.) 18. Therefore—now at length resuming the unfinished comparison of vs. 12, in order to give formally the concluding member of it, which had been done once and again substantially, in the intermediate verses. as by the offence of one judgment came—or, more simply, 'it came'—upon all men to condemnation; even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came—rather, 'it came'—upon all men to justification of life—[So CALVIN, BENGEL, OLSHAUSEN, THOLUCK, HODGE, PHILIPPI]. But better, as we judge: 'As through one offense it [came] upon all men to condemnation; even so through one righteousness [it came] upon all men to justification of life'—[So BEZA, GROTIUS, FERME, MEYER, DE WETTE, ALFORD, REVISED VERSION]. In this case, the apostle, resuming the statement of vs. 12, expresses it in a more concentrated and vivid form—suggested no doubt by the expression in vs. 16, "through one offense," representing Christ's whole work, considered as the ground of our justification, as "ONE RIGHTEOUSNESS." (Some would render the peculiar word here employed, 'one righteous act' [ALFORD, etc.]; understanding by it Christ's death as the one redeeming act which reversed the one undoing act of Adam. But this is to limit the apostle's idea too much; for as the same word is properly rendered "righteousness" in ch. 8:4, where it means "the righteousness of the law as fulfilled by us who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit," so here it denotes Christ's whole "obedience unto death," considered as the one meritorious ground of the reversal of the condemnation which came by Adam. But on this, and on the expression, "all men," see on vs. 19. The expression "justification of life," is a vivid combination of two ideas already expatiated upon, meaning 'justification entitling to and issuing in the rightful possession and enjoyment of life'). 19. For . . .—better, 'For as by the one man's disobedience the many were made sinners, even so by the obedience of the One shall the many be made righteous.' On this great verse observe: First, By the "obedience" of Christ here is plainly not meant more than what divines call His active obedience, as distinguished from His sufferings and death; it is the entire work of Christ in its obediential character. Our Lord Himself represents even His death as His great act of obedience to the Father: "This commandment (i.e., to lay down and resume His life) have I received of My Father" (John 10:8). Second, The significant word twice rendered "made," does not signify to work a change upon a person or thing, but to constitute or ordain, as will be seen from all the places where it is used. Here, accordingly, it is intended to express that judicial act which holds men, in virtue of their connection with Adam, as sinners; and, in connection with Christ, as righteous. Third, The change of tense from the past to the future—"as through Adam we were made sinners, so through Christ we shall be made righteous"—delightfully expresses the enduring character of the act, and of the economy to which such acts belong, in contrast with the for-ever-past ruin of believers in Adam. (See on ch. 6:5.) Fourth, The "all men" of vs. 18 and the "many" of vs. 19 are the same party, though under a slightly different aspect. In the latter case, the contrast is between the one representative (Adam–Christ) and the many whom he represented; in the former case, it is between the one head (Adam–Christ) and the human race, affected for death and life respectively by the actings of that one. Only in this latter case it is the redeemed family of man that is alone in view; it is humanity as actually lost, but also as actually saved, as ruined and recovered. Such as refuse to fall in with the high purpose of God to constitute His Son a "second Adam," the Head of a new race, and as impenitent and unbelieving finally perish, have no place in this section of the Epistle, whose sole object is to show how God repairs in the second Adam the evil done by the first. (Thus the doctrine of universal restoration has no place here. Thus

ADAM CLARKE

18. Therefore as by the offence of one. Literally, "Therefore, as by one offense unto all men, unto condemnation; so likewise, by one righteousness unto all men, to justification of life." This is evidently an elliptical sentence, and its full meaning can be gathered only from the context. He who had no particular purpose to serve would most probably understand it, from the context, thus: "Therefore as by one sin all men came into condemnation, so also by one righteous act all men came unto justification of life."

ALBERT BARNES:

18. "Therefore." This is properly a summing up, a recapitulation of what had been stated in the previous verses. The apostle resumes the statement or proposition made in verse 12, and after the immediate explanation, in the parenthesis (vv. 13-17), in this verse and the following sums up the whole subject. The explanation, therefore, of the previous verses is designed to convey the real meaning of verses 18, 19. "As by the offence of one." Admitting this as an undisputed and everywhere apparent fact, a fact which no one can call in question. "Judgment came." This is not in the Greek, but it is evidently implied and is stated in verse 16. The meaning is, that all have been brought under the reign of death by one man. "Upon all men." The whole race. This explains what is meant by "the many" in verse 15. "To condemnation," verse 16.

"Even so." In the manner explained in the previous verses. With the same certainty and to the same extent. The apostle does not explain the mode in which it was done, but simply states the fact. "By the righteousness of one." This stands opposed to the "one offence" of Adam, and must mean, therefore, the holiness, obedience, purity of the Redeemer. The sin of one man involved men in ruin; the obedience unto death of the other (Phil. 2:8) restored them to the favor of God. Came "upon all men." Was with reference to all men; was originally adapted to the race. As the sin of Adam was of such a nature in the relation in which he stood as to affect all the race, so the work of Christ, in the relation in which he stood was adapted also to all the race. As the tendency of the one was to involve the race in condemnation, so the tendency of the other was to restore them to acceptance with God. There was an original applicability in the work of Christ to all men—a richness, a fullness of the atonement fitted to meet the sins of the entire world, and restore the race to favor. "Unto justification of life." With reference to that justification which is connected with eternal life. That is, his work is adapted to produce acceptance with God, to the same extent as the crime of Adam has affected the race by involving them in sin and misery. The apostle does not affirm that in fact as many will be affected by the one as by the other; but that it is fitted to meet all the consequences of the Fall; to be as widespread in its effects; and to be as salutary as that had been ruinous. This is all that the argument requires. Perhaps there could not be found a more striking declaration anywhere, that the work of Christ had an original applicability to all men; or that it is in its own nature fitted to save all. The course of argument here leads inevitably to this; nor is it possible to avoid it without doing violence to the obvious and fair course of the discussion. It does not prove that all will in fact be saved, but that the plan is fitted to meet all the evils of the Fall.

MATTHEW HENRY

IV. The law entered that the offence might abound. Not to make sin to abound the more in itself, but to discover the abounding sinfulness of it. The glass discovers the spots, but does not cause them. The letting of a clearer light into a room discovers the dust and filth which were there before, but were not seen.

That grace might much more abound—that the terrors of the law might make gospel-comforts so much the sweeter. The greater the strength of the enemy, the greater the honour of the conqueror. This abounding of grace he illustrates, v. 21. Sin reigned unto death; it was a cruel bloody reign.

But grace reigns to life, eternal life, and this through righteousness by Jesus Christ our Lord, through the power and efficacy of Christ.

too the forced interpretation by which the "justification of all" is made to mean a justification merely in possibility and offer to all, and the "justification of the many" to mean the actual justification of as many as believe [ALFORD, etc.], is completely avoided. And thus the harshness of comparing a whole fallen family with a recovered part is got rid of. However true it be in fact that part of mankind is not saved, this is not the aspect in which the subject is here presented. It is totals that are compared and contrasted; and it is the same total in two successive conditions—namely, the human race as ruined in Adam and recovered in Christ).

20, 21. Moreover the law—'The law, however.' The Jew might say, If the whole purposes of God towards men center in Adam and Christ, where does "the law" come in, and what was the use of it? Answer: It entered—But the word expresses an important idea besides 'entering.' It signifies, 'entered incidentally,' or 'parenthetically.' (In Galatians 2: 4 the same word is rendered, 'came in privily.') The meaning is, that the promulgation of the law at Sinai was no primary or essential feature of the divine plan, but it was "added" (Gal. 3:19) for a subordinate purpose—the more fully to reveal the evil occasioned by Adam, and the need and glory of the remedy by Christ. that the offence might abound—(or, 'be multiplied'). But what offense? Throughout all this section 'the offense' (four times repeated besides here) has one definite meaning, namely, 'the one first offense of Adam'; and this, in our judgment, is its meaning here also: 'All our multitudinous breaches of the law are nothing but that one first offense, lodged mysteriously in the bosom of every child of Adam as an offending principal, and multiplying itself into myriads of particular offenses in the life of each.' What was one act of disobedience in the head has been converted into a vital and virulent principle of disobedience in all the members of the human family, whose every act of wilful rebellion proclaims itself the child of the original transgression. But where sin abounded—or, 'was multiplied'—grace did much more abound—rather, 'did exceedingly abound,' or 'superabound.' The comparison here is between the multiplication of one offense into countless transgressions, and such an overflow of grace as more than meets that appalling case. That as sin—Observe, the word "offense" is no more used, as that had been sufficiently illustrated; but—what better befitted this comprehensive summation of the whole matter—the great general term sin. hath reigned unto death—rather, 'in death,' triumphing and (as it were) revelling in that complete destruction of its victims. even so might grace reign—In vss. 14, 17 we had the reign of death over the guilty and condemned in Adam; here it is the reign of the mighty causes of these—of SIN which clothes Death a Sovereign with venomous power (I Cor. 15:56) and with awful authority (ch. 6:23), and of GRACE, the grace which originated the scheme of salvation, the grace which "sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world," the grace which "made Him to be sin for us who knew no sin," the grace which "makes us to be the righteousness of God in Him," so that "we who receive the abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness do reign in life by One, Jesus Christ!" through righteousness—not ours certainly ('the obedience of Christians,' to use the wretched language of GROTIUS) nor yet exactly 'justification' [STUART, HODGE]; but rather, 'the (justifying) righteousness of Christ' [BEZA, ALFORD, and in substance, OLSHAUSEN, MEYER]; the same which in vs. 19 is called His "obedience," meaning His whole mediatorial work in the flesh. This is here represented as the righteous medium through which grace reaches its objects and attains all its ends, the stable throne from which Grace as a Sovereign dispenses its saving benefits to as many as are brought under its benign sway. unto eternal life—which is salvation in its highest form and fullest development for ever. by Jesus Christ our Lord—Thus, on that "Name which is above every name," the echoes of this hymn to the glory of "Grace" die away, and "Jesus is left alone."

ADAM CLARKE

20. The law entered, that the offence might abound. After considering various opinions concerning the true meaning of this verse, I am induced to prefer my own as being the most simple. By law I understand the Mosaic law. By entering in, or, rather, "coming in privily," see Gal. ii. 4 (the only place where it occurs besides), I understand the temporary or limited use of that law, which was, as far as its rites and ceremonies are considered, confined to the Jewish people, and to them only till the Messiah should come. But considered as the moral law, or rule of conscience and life, it has in its spirit and power been slipped in, introduced into every conscience, that sin might abound, that the true nature, deformity, and extent of sin might appear; for by the law is the knowledge of sin. For how can the finer deviations from a straight line be ascertained without the application of a known straightedge? Without this rule of right, sin can be known only in a sort of general way.

But where sin abounded. Whether in the world or in the heart of the individual, being discovered by this most pure and righteous law, grace did much more abound; not only pardon for all that is past is offered by the gospel, but also the Holy Spirit, in the abundance of His gifts and graces, is communicated, so as to prepare the receiver for an "exceeding and eternal weight of glory." Thus the grace of the gospel not only redeems from death and restores to life, but brings the soul into such a relationship with God, and into such a participation of eternal glory, as we have no authority to believe ever would have been the portion even of Adam himself had he even eternally retained his innocence.

21. That as sin hath reigned unto death. As extensively, as deeply, as universally, as sin, whether implying the act of transgression or the impure principle from which the act proceeds, or both. Hath reigned, subjected the whole earth and all its inhabitants; the whole soul, and all its powers and faculties. Unto death, temporal of the body, spiritual of the soul, and eternal of both. Even so, as extensively, deeply, and universally, might grace reign—filling the whole earth, and pervading, purifying, and refining the whole soul. Through righteousness—through this doctrine of free salvation by the blood of the Lamb, and by the principle of holiness transfused through the soul by the Holy Ghost.

Unto eternal life—the proper object of an immortal spirit's hope, the only sphere where the human intellect can rest, and be happy in the place and state where God is. By Jesus Christ our Lord—as the Cause of our salvation, the Means by which it is communicated, and the Source whence it springs. Thus we find that the salvation from sin here is as extensive and complete as the guilt and contamination of sin.

MATTHEW HENRY

CHAPTER 6

Verses 1-23

The apostle's transition, which joins this discourse with the former: "What shall we say then? (v. 1). Shall we continue in sin that grace may abound?" Shall we hence take encouragement to sin because the more sin we commit the more will the grace of God be magnified in our pardon? The apostle startled at the thought of it (v. 2): "God forbid." Those opinions that give any countenance to sin are to be rejected with the greatest abhorrence. The apostle is very full in pressing the necessity of holiness in this chapter, which may be reduced to two heads: His exhortations to holiness, and his arguments to enforce those exhortations.

I. For the first, we may hence observe the nature of sanctification. It has two things in it, mortification and vivification—dying to sin and living to righteousness.

1. Mortification, putting off the old man. (1) We must live no longer in sin (v. 2). Though there are none that live without sin, yet there are those that do not live in sin.

(2) In particular, being baptized into Jesus Christ, we were baptized into his death, v. 3. Baptism binds us to Christ. Particularly, we were baptized into his death. As Christ died for sin, so we should die to sin. This was the profession and promise of our baptism, and we do not do well if we do not answer this profession, and make good this promise.

We are buried with him by baptism, v. 4. Our conformity is complete. We are in profession quite cut off from all commerce and communion with sin. Thus must we be, as Christ was, separate from sin and sinners. We are sealed to be the Lord's, therefore to be cut off from sin. As Christ was buried, that he might rise again to a new and more heavenly life, so we are in baptism buried, that we may rise again to a new life of faith and love.

Vivification, or living to righteousness. It is to walk in newness of life, v. 4. Newness of life supposes newness of heart; there is no way to make the stream sweet but by making the spring so. Walk by new rules. Make a new choice of the way. Choose new paths to walk in, new leaders to walk after, new companions to walk with.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

CHAPTER 6

Vss. 1-11. THE BEARING OF JUSTIFICATION BY GRACE UPON A HOLY LIFE. 1. What . . .—The subject of this third division of our Epistle announces itself at once in the opening question, "Shall we (or, as the true reading is, 'May we,' 'Are we to') continue in sin, that grace may abound?" Had the apostle's doctrine been that salvation depends in any degree upon our good works, no such objection to it could have been made. Against the doctrine of a purely gratuitous justification, the objection is plausible; nor has there ever been an age in which it has not been urged. That it was brought against the apostles, we know from ch. 3: 8; and we gather from Galatians 5:13; I Peter 2:16; Jude 4, that some did give occasion to the charge; but that it was a total perversion of the doctrine of Grace the apostle here proceeds to show. 2. God forbid—'That be far from us'; the instincts of the new creature revolting at the thought. How shall we, that are dead . . .—lit., and more forcibly, 'We who died to sin (as presently to be explained), how shall we live any longer therein?' 3. Know ye not, that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ—cf. I Corinthians 10:2—were baptized into his death?—sealed with the seal of heaven, and as it were formally entered and articled, to all the benefits and all the obligations of Christian discipleship in general, and of His death in particular. And since He was "made sin" and "a curse for us" (II Cor. 5:21; Gal. 5:13), "bearing our sins in His own body on the tree," and "rising again for our justification" (ch. 4:25; I Pet. 2:24), our whole sinful case and condition, thus taken up into His Person, has been brought to an end in His death. Whoso, then, has been baptized into Christ's death has formally surrendered the whole state and life of sin, as in Christ a dead thing. He has sealed himself to be not only "the righteousness of God in Him," but "a new creature"; and as he cannot be in Christ to the one effect and not to the other, for they are one thing, he has bidden farewell, by baptism into Christ's death, to his entire connection with sin. "How," then, "can he live any longer therein?" The two things are as contradictory in the fact as they are in the terms. 4. Therefore we are—rather, 'were' (it being a past act, completed at once). buried with him, by baptism into death—(The comma we have placed after "him" will show what the sense is. It is not, 'By baptism we are buried with Him into death,' which makes no sense at all; but, 'By baptism with Him into death we are buried with Him'; in other words, 'By the same baptism which publicly enters us into His death, we are made partakers of His burial also). To leave a dead body unburied is represented, alike in heathen authors as in Scripture, as the greatest indignity (Rev. 11:8, 9). It was fitting, therefore, that Christ, after "dying for our sins according to the Scriptures," should "descend into the lower parts of the earth" (Eph. 4:9). As this was the last and lowest step of His humiliation, so it was the honorable dissolution of His last link of connection with that life which He laid down for us; and we, in being "buried with Him by our baptism into His death," have by this public act severed our last link of connection with that whole sinful condition and life which Christ brought to an end in His death. that like as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father—i.e., by such a forthputting of the Father's power as was the effulgence of His whole glory—even so we also—as risen to a new life with Him—should walk in newness of life—But what is that "newness?" Surely if our old life, now dead and buried with Christ, was wholly sinful, the new, to which we rise with the risen Saviour, must be altogether a holy life; so that every time we go back to "those things whereof we are now ashamed" (vs. 21), we belie our resurrection with Christ to newness of life, and "forget that we have been purged from our old sins" (II Pet. 1:9). Whether the mode of baptism by immersion be alluded to in this verse, as a kind of symbolical burial and resurrection, does not seem to us of much consequence. Many interpreters think it is, and it may be so. But as it is not clear that baptism in apostolic times was exclusively by immersion (see on Acts 2:41), so sprinkling and washing are indifferently used in the New Testament to express the cleansing efficacy of the blood of Jesus. And just as the woman with the issue of blood got virtue out of Christ by simply touching Him, so the essence of baptism seems to lie in the simple contact of the element with the body, symbolizing living contact with Christ crucified; the mode and extent of suffusion being indifferent and variable with climate and circum-

ADAM CLARKE

The apostle, having proved that salvation, to both Jew and Gentile, must come through the Messiah, and be received by faith only, proceeds in this chapter to show the obligations under which both were laid to live a holy life, and the means and advantages they enjoyed for that purpose. This he does, not only as a thing highly and indispensably necessary in itself—for without holiness none can see the Lord—but to confute a calumny which appears to have been gaining considerable ground even at that time, viz., that the doctrine of justification by faith alone, through the grace of Christ Jesus, rendered obedience to the moral law useless; and that the more evil a man did, the more the grace of God would abound to him in his redemption from that evil. That this calumny was then propagated we learn from chap. iii. 8; and the apostle defends himself against it in the thirty-first verse of the same by asserting that his doctrine, far from making void the law, served to establish it. But in this and the following two chapters he takes up the subject in a regular, formal manner, and shows both Jews and Gentiles that the principles of the Christian religion absolutely require a holy heart and a holy life and make the amplest provisions for both.

1. Shall we continue in sin? It is very likely that these were the words of a believing Gentile, who—having as yet received but little instruction, for he is but just brought out of his heathen state to believe in Christ Jesus—might imagine, from the manner in which God had magnified His mercy, in blotting out his sin on his simply believing on Christ, that, supposing he even gave way to the evil propensities of his own heart, his transgressions could do him no hurt now that he was in the favor of God.

2. God forbid. "Let it not be; by no means; far from it; let not such a thing be mentioned!"—any of these is the meaning of the Greek phrase, which is a strong expression of surprise and disapprobation; and is not properly rendered by our God forbid! for, though this may express the same thing, yet it is not proper to make the sacred name so familiar on such occasions. How shall we, that are dead to sin? The phraseology of this verse is common among Hebrews, Greeks, and Latins. To die to a thing or person is to have nothing to do with it or him, to be totally separated from them; and to live to a thing or person is to be wholly given up to them, to have the most intimate connection with them.

3. Know ye not? Every man who believes the Christian religion, and receives baptism as the proof that he believes it, and has taken up the profession of it, is bound thereby to a life of righteousness. To be baptized into Jesus Christ is to receive the doctrine of Christ crucified, and to receive baptism as a proof of the genuineness of that faith, and the obligation to live according to its precepts. Baptized into his death. That, as Jesus Christ in His crucifixion died completely, so that no spark of the natural or animal life remained in His body, so those who profess His reliigon should be so completely separated and saved from sin that they have no more connection with it, nor any more influence from it, than a dead man has with or from his departed spirit.

4. We are buried with him by baptism into death. It is probable that the apostle here alludes to the mode of administering baptism by immersion, the whole body being put under the water, which seemed to say, The man is drowned, is dead; and when he came up out of the water, he seemed to have a resurrection to life. The man is risen again; he is alive! Raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father. From this we learn that, as it required the glory of the Father, that is, His glorious energy, to raise up from the grave the dead body of Christ, so it requires the same glorious energy to quicken the dead soul of a sinner and enable him to walk in newness of life.

MATTHEW HENRY

Our conformity to the resurrection of Christ obliges us to rise again to newness of life. Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father. Now in baptism we are obliged to conform to that pattern, to be planted in the likeness of his resurrection (v. 5), to live with him, v. 8. Conversion is the first resurrection from the death of sin to the life of righteousness; and this resurrection is conformable to Christ's resurrection. We have all risen with Christ.

Our conformity to the death of Christ obliges us to die unto sin. Thus we are here said to be planted together in the likeness of his death (v. 5), as the engrafted stock is planted together into the likeness of the shoot, of the nature of which it doth participate. We are planted in the vineyard in a likeness to Christ, which likeness we should evidence in sanctification. Our creed concerning Jesus Christ is, among other things, that he was crucified, dead, and buried; now baptism is a sacramental conformity to him in each of these. First, Our old man is crucified with him, v. 6. The death of the cross was a slow death; but it was a sure death. Such is the mortification of sin in believers. It was a cursed death. Sin dies as a malefactor, devoted to destruction. Crucified with him. The crucifying of Christ for us has an influence upon the crucifying of sin in us. Secondly, We are dead with Christ, v. 8. Christ was obedient to death: when he died, we might be said to die with him. Baptism signifies and seals our union with Christ, so that we are dead with him, and engaged to have no more to do with sin than he had. Thirdly, The body of sin must be destroyed, v. 6. The corruption that dwelleth in us is the body of sin. This is the root to which the axe must be laid. We must not only cease from the acts of sin, but we must get the vicious habits and inclinations weakened and destroyed. That henceforth we should not serve sin. It is the body of sin that sways the sceptre; destroy this, and the yoke is broken.

To show the necessity of sanctification. There is such an antipathy in our hearts by nature to holiness that it is no easy matter to bring them to submit to it: it is the Spirit's work.

Our baptism carries in it a great reason why we should die to sin, and live to righteousness. Observe this reasoning.

In general, we are dead to sin. Our baptism signifies our cutting off from the kingdom of sin. We are dead to sin by our union with Christ, in and by whom it is killed. All this is in vain if we persist in sin; we return to that to which we were dead, like walking ghosts. For (v. 7) he that is dead is freed from sin; he that is dead to it is freed from the rule and dominion of it. Now shall we be such fools as to return to that slavery from which we are discharged?

In two things we must conform to the resurrection of Christ: First, He rose to die no more, v. 9. Over Christ death has no more dominion; he was dead indeed, but he is alive, and so alive that he lives for evermore. Thus we must rise from the grave of sin never again to return to it. Secondly, He rose to live unto God (v. 10), to live a heavenly life. He rose again to leave the world. Now I am no more in the world, John xvii. 11. He rose to live to God. Thus must we rise to live to God: this is what he calls newness of life (v. 4), to live by other rules, with other aims, than we have done. A life devoted to God is a new life; before, self was the chief and highest end, but now God.

5. For if we have been planted together—lit., 'have become formed together.' (The word is used here only.) in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection—i.e., 'Since Christ's death and resurrection are inseparable in their efficacy, union with Him in the one carries with it participation in the other, for privilege and for duty alike.' The future tense is used of participation in His resurrection, because this is but partially realized in the present state. (See on ch. 5:19.)

6, 7. Knowing this . . .—The apostle now grows more definite and vivid in expressing the sin-destroying efficacy of our union with the crucified Saviour. that our old man—'our old selves'; i.e., 'all that we were in our old unregenerate condition, before union with Christ' (cf. Col. 3:9, 10; Eph. 4:22-24; Gal. 2:20; 5:24; 6:14). is—rather, 'was'—crucified with him—in order—that the body of sin—not a figure for 'the mass of sin'; nor the 'material body,' considered as the seat of sin, which it is not; but (as we judge) for 'sin as it dwells in us in our present embodied state, under the law of the fall.' might be destroyed—(in Christ's death)—to the end—that henceforth we should not serve—'be in bondage to'—sin.

For he that is dead—rather, 'hath died'—is freed—'hath been set free'—from sin—lit., 'justified,' 'acquitted,' 'got his discharge from sin.' As death dissolves all claims, so the whole claim of sin, not only to "reign unto death," but to keep its victims in sinful bondage, has been discharged once for all, by the believer's penal death in the death of Christ; so that he is no longer a "debtor to the flesh to live after the flesh" (ch. 8:12).

8. Now if we be dead—'if we died'—with Christ . . .—See on vs. 5. 9-11. Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him—Though Christ's death was in the most absolute sense a voluntary act (Jas. 10:17, 18; Acts 2:24), that voluntary surrender gave death such rightful "dominion over Him" as dissolved its dominion over us. But this once past, "death hath," even in that sense, "dominion over Him no more." For in that he died, he died unto—i.e., in obedience to the claims of—sin once—for all—but in that he liveth, he liveth unto—in obedience to the claims of—God—There never, indeed, was a time when Christ did not "live unto God." But in the days of His flesh He did so under the continual burden of sin "laid on Him" (Isa. 53:6; II Cor. 5:21); whereas, now that He has "put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself," He "liveth unto God," the acquitted and accepted Surety, unchallenged and unclouded by the claims of sin. Likewise—even as your Lord Himself—reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed—'dead

5. For if we have been planted together. When the seed or plant is inserted in the ground, it derives from that ground all its nourishment and all those juices by which it becomes developed; by which it increases in size, grows firm, strong, and vigorous and puts forth its leaves, blossoms, and fruit. The death of Jesus Christ is represented as the cause whence His fruitfulness as the Author of eternal salvation to mankind is derived; and genuine believers in Him are represented as being planted . . . in . . . his death, and growing out of it; deriving their growth, vigor, firmness, beauty, and fruitfulness from it.

6. Our old man is crucified with him. This seems to be a further extension of the same metaphor. When a seed is planted in the earth, it appears as if the whole body of it perished. The body dies that the germ may live. How is the principle of life which Jesus Christ has implanted in us to be brought into full effect, vigor, and usefulness? By the destruction of the body of sin. Our old man, our wicked, corrupt, and fleshly self, is to be crucified, to be as truly slain as Christ was crucified, that our souls may as truly be raised from a death of sin to a life of righteousness as the body of Christ was raised from the grave, and afterwards ascended to the right hand of God. But how does this part of the metaphor apply to Jesus Christ? Plainly and forcibly. Jesus Christ took on Him a body, a body "in the likeness of sinful flesh," chap. viii. 3, and gave up that body to death; through which death alone an atonement was made for sin, and the way laid open for the vivifying Spirit to have the fullest access to, and the most powerful operation in, the human heart. Here the body of Christ dies that He may be a quickening Spirit to mankind. Our body of sin is destroyed by this quickening Spirit, that henceforth we should live unto Him who died and rose again. Thus the metaphor, in all its leading senses, is complete, and applies most forcibly to the subject in question. We find that the old man, used here and in Eph. iv. 22 and Col. iii. 9, is the same as "the flesh with the affections and lusts," Gal. v. 24; and "the body of the sins of the flesh," Col. ii. 11; and the very same which the Jewish writers term the "old Adam" and which they interpret by "evil concupiscence"; the same which we mean by indwelling sin, or the infection of our nature, in consequence of the Fall. From all which we may learn that the design of God is to counterwork and destroy the very spirit and soul of sin, that we shall no longer serve it, no longer be its slaves.

7. He that is dead is freed from sin. Literally, is "justified" from sin, or is freed or delivered from it. Does not this simply mean that the man who has received Christ Jesus by faith, and has been, through believing, made a partaker of the Holy Spirit, has had his "old man," all his evil propensities, destroyed; so that he is not only justified freely from all sin, but wholly sanctified unto God? The context shows that this is the meaning. Every instance of violence is done to the whole scope and design of the apostle by the opinion that "this text is a proof that believers are not fully saved from sin in this life, because only he that is dead is freed from sin." Then death is his justifier and deliverer! So then, the death of Christ and the influences of the Holy Spirit were only sufficient to depose and enfeeble the tyrant sin; but our death must come in to effect his total destruction! Thus our death is, at least partially, our Saviour; and thus, that which was an effect of sin (for sin entered into the world, and death by sin) becomes the means of finally destroying it! The divinity and philosophy of this sentiment are equally absurd. It is the blood of Christ alone that cleanses from all unrighteousness; and the sanctification of a believer is no more dependent on death than his justification.

9. Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more. So we, believing in Christ Jesus, and having a death unto sin and a life unto righteousness, should sin no more.

10. He died unto sin once. From the whole scope of the apostle's discourse it is plain that he considers the death of Christ is a death or sacrifice for sin, a sin offering. In this sense no man has ever died for sin, or ever can die.

11. Reckon ye also yourselves to be dead.

MATTHEW HENRY

It is to be alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord, v. 11. To converse with God, to have a regard to him, a delight in him, this is to be alive to God. It is to have the affections and desires alive towards God. Or, living (our life in the flesh) unto God, to his honour and glory as our end, by his word and will as our rule; this is to live unto God.—Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Christ is our spiritual life; there is no living to God but through him. He is the Mediator; no intercourse between sinful souls and a holy God, but by the mediation of the Lord Jesus. In living to God, Christ is all in all. We must be dead indeed unto sin, v. 11. As the death of the oppressor is a release, so much more is the death of the oppressed. Thus must we be dead to sin, fulfil its will no more. He that is dead is separated from his former company. Death makes a mighty change; such a change doth sanctification make in the soul, it cuts off all correspondence with sin.

Sin must not reign in our mortal bodies that we should obey it, v. 12. Though sin may remain as an outlaw, yet let it not reign as a king. Let it not make laws, so that we should obey it. Though we may be sometimes overtaken and overcome by it, yet let us never be obedient to it. In the lusts thereof. Sin lies very much in the gratifying of the body. And there is a reason implied in the phrase your mortal body. It was sin that made our bodies mortal, and therefore do not yield obedience to such an enemy.

We must not yield our members as instruments of unrighteousness, v. 13. The members of the body are made use of by the corrupt nature as tools, but we must not consent to that abuse. One sin begets another; it is like the letting forth of water, therefore leave it before it be meddled with. The members of the body may perhaps be forced to be instruments of sin; but do not yield them to be so, do not consent to it. This is one branch of sanctification, the mortification of sin.

It is to yield ourselves to God, as those that are alive from the dead, v. 13. The very life and being of holiness lie in the dedication of ourselves to the Lord, giving our own selves to the Lord. "Not yield your estates to him, but yield yourselves; nothing less than your whole selves. Not only submit to him, but comply with him; be always ready to serve him. Yield yourselves to him as wax to the seal, to take any impression, to be, and have, and do, what he pleases." As those that are alive from the dead. To yield a dead carcase to a living God is not to please him, but to mock him: "Yield yourselves as those that are alive and good for something, a living sacrifice, ch. xii. 1 The surest evidence of our spiritual life is the dedication of ourselves to God. It is to yield our members as instruments of righteousness to God. The members of our bodies, when withdrawn from the service of sin, are not to lie idle, but to be made use of in the service of God. The body must be always ready to serve the soul in the service of God.

2. He argues from the precious promises of the new covenant, v. 14. It might be objected that we cannot subdue sin, it is unavoidably too hard for us "No," says he, "you wrestle with an enemy that may be dealt with and subdued; it is an enemy that is already foiled and baffled. Sin shall not have dominion.' Sin may struggle in a believer, and may create him a great deal of trouble, it may vex him, but shall not rule over him. For we are not under the law, but under grace, not under the law of sin and death, but under the law of the spirit of life, which is in Christ Jesus New lords, new laws. Or, not under the covenant of works, which requires brick, and gives no straw but under the covenant of grace, which accepts sincerity as our gospel perfection, which requires nothing but what it promises strength to perform It does not leave our salvation in our own keeping but lays it up in the hands of the Mediator, who undertakes for us that sin shall not have dominion over us, who hath himself condemned it, and will destroy it. Christ rules by the golden sceptre of grace. We are under grace, grace which accepts the willing mind, which leaves room for repentance, which promises pardon upon repentance. Shall we sin against so much goodness, abuse such love? See how the apostle starts at such a thought (v. 15): Shall we sin because we are not under the law, but under grace? God forbid.

3. This will be evidence of our state, for us, or against us (v. 16): To whom you yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants you are. All the children of men are either the servants of God, or the servants of sin. We must enquire to which of these masters we yield obedience. Our obeying the laws of sin will be an evidence against us that we belong to that family on which death is entailed. Our obeying the laws of Christ will evidence our relation to Christ's family, on the one hand')—unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ—(The words, "our Lord," at the close of this verse, are wanting in the best MSS.) Note (1) "Antinomianism is not only an error; it is a falsehood and a slander" [HODGE]. That "we should continue in sin that grace may abound," not only is never the deliberate sentiment of any real believer in the doctrine of Grace, but is abhorrent to every Christian mind, as a monstrous abuse of the most glorious of all truths (vs. 1). (2) As the death of Christ is not only the expiation of guilt, but the death of sin itself in all who are vitally united to Him; so the resurrection of Christ is the resurrection of believers, not only to acceptance with God, but to newness of life (vss. 2-11). (3) In the light of these two truths, let all who name the name of Christ "examine themselves whether they be in the faith."

12-23. WHAT PRACTICAL USE BELIEVERS SHOULD MAKE OF THEIR DEATH TO SIN AND LIFE TO GOD THROUGH UNION TO THE CRUCIFIED SAVIOUR. Not content with showing that his doctrine has no tendency to relax the obligations to a holy life, the apostle here proceeds to enforce these obligations. 12. Let not sin therefore—as a Master—reign—(The reader will observe that wherever in this section the words "Sin," "Obedience," "Righteousness," "Uncleanness," "Iniquity," are figuratively used, to represent a Master, they are here printed in capitals, to make this manifest to the eye, and so save explanation.) in your mortal body, that ye should obey it—sin—in the lusts thereof—"the lusts of the body," as the Greek makes evident. (The other reading, perhaps the true one, 'that ye should obey the lusts thereof,' comes to the same thing.) The "body" is here viewed as the instrument by which all the sins of the heart become facts of the outward life, and as itself the seat of the lower appetites; and it is called "our mortal body," probably to remind us how unsuitable is this reign of sin in those who are "alive from the dead." But the reign here meant is the unchecked dominion of sin within us. Its outward acts are next referred to. 13. Neither yield ye your members instruments of unrighteousness unto Sin, but yield yourselves—this is the great surrender—unto God as those that are alive from the dead, and—as the fruit of this—your members—till now prostituted to sin—instruments of righteousness unto God—But what if indwelling sin should prove too strong for us? The reply is: But it will not.

14. For Sin shall not have dominion over you—as the slaves of a tyrant lord—for ye are not under the law, but under grace—The force of this glorious assurance can only be felt by observing the grounds on which it rests. To be "under the law" is, first, to be under its claim to entire obedience; and so, next under its curse for the breach of these. And as all power to obey can reach the sinner only through Grace, of which the law knows nothing, it follows that to be "under the law" is, finally, to be shut up under an inability to keep it, and consequently to be the helpless slave of sin. On the other hand, to be "under grace," is to be under the glorious canopy and saving effects of that "grace which reigns through righteousness unto eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord" (see on ch. 5:20, 21). The curse of the law has been completely lifted from off them; they are made "the righteousness of God in Him"; and they are "alive unto God through Jesus Christ." So that, as when they were "under the law," Sin could not but have dominion over them, so now that they are "under grace," Sin cannot but be subdued under them. If before, Sin resistlessly triumphed, Grace will now be more than conqueror. 15, 16. What then? ... Know ye not—it is a dictate of common sense—that to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey—with the view of obeying him—his servants ye are to whom ye obey—to whom ye yield that obedience—whether of Sin unto death—i.e., 'issuing in death,' in the awful sense of ch. 8:6, as the sinner's final condition—or of Obedience unto righteousness—i.e., obedience resulting in a righteous character, as the enduring condition of the servant of new Obedience (I John 2:17; John 8:34; II Pet. 2:19; Matt. 6:24).

ADAM CLARKE

Die as truly unto sin as He died for sin. Live as truly unto God as He lives with God. This seems to be the spirit of the apostle's meaning.

12. Let not sin therefore reign. This is a personification. Sin is represented as a king, ruler, or tyrant, who has the desires of the mind and the members of the body under his control, so that by influencing the passions he governs the body. Do not let sin reign, do not let him work; that is, let him have no place, no being in your souls; because, wherever he is he governs, less or more.

13. Neither yield ye your members. Do not yield to temptation. It is no sin to be tempted; the sin lies in yielding. While the sin exists only in Satan's solicitation, it is the devil's sin, not ours. When we yield, we make the devil's sin our own; then we enter into temptation. "Resist the devil, and he will flee from you." Yield yourselves unto God. Let God have your wills; keep them ever on His side. There they are safe, and there they will be active. Satan cannot force the will, and God will not. Indeed it would cease to be will were it forced by either; it is essential to its being that it be free. And your members as instruments. Let soul and body be employed in the service of your Maker; let Him have your hearts, and with them your heads, your hands, your feet. Think and devise what is pure; speak what is true, and to the use of edifying; work that which is just and good; and walk steadily in the way that leads to everlasting felicity. Be holy within and holy without.

14. Sin shall not have dominion over you. God delivers you from it; and if you again become subject to it, it will be the effect of your own choice or negligence. Ye are not under the law. That law which exacts obedience without giving power to obey, that condemns every transgression and every unholy thought without providing for the extirpation of evil or the pardon of sin. But under grace. You are under the merciful and beneficent dispensation of the gospel, that, although it requires the strictest conformity to the will of God, affords sufficient power to be thus conformed; and in the death of Christ has provided pardon for all that is past, and grace to help in every time of need.

15. Shall we sin, because we are not under the law? Shall we abuse our high and holy calling because we are not under that law which makes no provision for pardon, but are under that gospel which has opened the fountain to wash away all sin and defilement? Shall we sin because grace abounds? Shall we do evil that good may come of it? This be far from us!

16. To whom ye yield yourselves. Can you suppose that you should continue to be the servants of Christ if you give way to sin? Is he not the master who exacts the service, and to whom the service is performed? Sin is the service of Satan; righteousness, the service of Christ. If you sin, you are the servants of Satan, and not the servants of God. The word which we translate servants properly signifies "slaves"; and a slave among the Greeks and Romans was considered as his master's property, and he might dispose of him as he pleased. Under a bad master, the lot of the slave was most oppressive and dreadful: his ease and comfort were never consulted; he was treated worse than a beast; and in many cases his life hung on the mere caprice of the master. This state is the state of every poor, miserable sinner; he is the slave of Satan, and his own evil lusts and appetites are his most cruel taskmasters. The same word is applied to the servants of Christ, the more forcibly to show that they are their Master's property; and that, as He is infinitely good and benevolent, therefore His service must be perfect freedom. Indeed, He exacts no obedience from them which He does not turn to their eternal advantage, for this Master has no self-interest to secure.

4. He argues from their former sinfulness, v. 17–21.

(1) What they had been and done formerly. You were the servants of sin. Those that are now the servants of God would do well to remember the time when they were the servants of sin, to keep them humble, and to quicken them in the service of God. It is a reproach to the service of sin that so many thousands have quitted the service; and never any that sincerely deserted it, and gave up themselves to the service of God, have returned to the former drudgery. "God be thanked that you were so. God be thanked that we can speak of it as a thing past."

(2) How the blessed change was made, and wherein it did consist.

[1] You have obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine which was delivered to you, v. 17. This describes conversion, it is our conformity to, and compliance with, the gospel—Margin. Whereto you were delivered. First, The rule of grace, that form of doctrine. The gospel is the great rule both of truth and holiness; it is the stamp, grace is the impression of that stamp. Secondly, Our conformity to that rule. It is to obey from the heart. The gospel is a doctrine to be obeyed, and that from the heart; not in profession only, but in power—from the heart, the commanding part of us. It is to be delivered into it, as into a mould, as the wax is cast into the impression of the seal, answering it line for line.

You have yielded your members servants to uncleanness, and to iniquity unto iniquity, v. 19. It is the misery of a sinful state that the body is made a drudge to sin. You have yielded. Sinners are voluntary in the service of sin. The devil could not force them into the service, if they did not yield themselves to it. To iniquity unto iniquity. To iniquity as the work unto iniquity as the wages. Sow the wind, and reap the whirlwind; growing worse and worse, more and more hardened. This he speaks after the manner of men. You were free from righteousness (v. 20); not free by any liberty given, but by a liberty taken, which is licentiousness. But a freedom from righteousness is the worst kind of slavery. Thus (v. 19), "Yield your members servants to righteousness unto holiness. Let them be under the conduct and at the command of the righteous law of God." Righteousness unto holiness, which intimates growth, and progress, and ground obtained. As every sinful act confirms the sinful habit, and makes the nature more and more prone to sin, so every gracious act confirms the gracious habit. One duty fits us for another; and the more we do the more we may do for God.

(3) What apprehensions they now had of their former way. He appeals to themselves (v. 21), whether they had not found the service of sin, [1] An unfruitful service: "What fruit had you then? Did you ever get anything by it?" Besides the future losses, which are infinitely great, the very present gains of sin are not worth mentioning. What fruit? Nothing that deserves the name of fruit. [2] An unbecoming service; it is that of which we are now ashamed. Shame came into the world with sin, and is still the certain product of it. Who would wilfully do that which sooner or later he is sure to be ashamed of?

5. He argues from the end of all these things. To persuade us from sin to holiness here are good and evil, life and death, set before us; and we are put to our choice. The end of sin is death (v. 21): The end of those things is death. Though the way may seem pleasant and inviting, yet it will be bitterness in the latter end.

Being made free from sin, you became servants of righteousness (v. 18), servants to God, v. 22. Conversion is, First, A freedom from the service of sin. Secondly, A resignation of ourselves to the service of God. When we are made free from sin, it is not that we may live as we list, and be our own masters. We cannot be made the servants of God till we are freed from the power and dominion of sin; we cannot serve two masters.

17. But God be thanked, that ye were the servants of Sin—i.e., that this is a state of things now past and gone. but ye have obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine which was delivered you—rather (Margin), 'whereunto ye were delivered,' or cast, as in a mould. The idea is, that the teaching to which they had heartily yielded themselves had stamped its own impress upon them. 18. Being then—'And being'; it is the continuation and conclusion of the preceding sentence; not a new one—made free from Sin, ye became the servants of—'servants to'—Righteousness—The case is one of emancipation from entire servitude to one Master to entire servitude to another, whose property we are (see on ch. 1:1). There is no middle state of personal independence; for which we were never made, and to which we have no claim. When we would not that God should reign over us, we were in righteous judgment "sold under Sin"; now being through grace "made free from Sin," it is only to become "servants to Righteousness," which is our true freedom. 19. I speak after the manner of men—descending, for illustration, to the level of common affairs. because of the infirmity of your flesh—the weakness of your spiritual apprehension. for as ye have yielded—'as ye yielded,' the thing being viewed as now past—your members servants to Uncleanness and to Iniquity unto—the practice of—iniquity; even so now yield your members servants to Righteousness unto holiness—rather, 'unto (the attainment of) sanctification,' as the same word is rendered in II Thessalonians 2:13; I Corinthians 1:30; I Peter 1:2—i.e., 'Looking back upon the heartiness with which ye served Sin, and the lengths ye went to be stimulated now to like zeal and like exuberance in the service of a better Master.' 20. For when ye were the servants—'were servants'—of Sin, ye were free from—rather, 'in respect of'—Righteousness—Difficulties have been made about this clause where none exist. The import of it seems clearly to be this:—'Since no servant can serve "two masters," much less where their interests come into deadly collision, and each demands the whole man, so, while ye were in the service of Sin ye were in no proper sense the servants of Righteousness, and never did it one act of real service: whatever might be your conviction of the claims of Righteousness, your real services were all and always given to Sin: Thus had ye full proof of the nature and advantages of Sin's service.' The searching question with which this is followed up, shows that this is the meaning. 21. What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed? for the end of those things is death—What permanent advantage, and what abiding satisfaction, have those things yielded? The apostle answers his own question:—'Abiding satisfaction, did I ask? They have left only a sense of "shame." Permanent advantage? "The end of them is death." ' By saying they were "now ashamed," he makes it plain that he is not referring to that disgust at themselves, and remorse of conscience by which those who are the most helplessly "sold under sin" are often stung to the quick; but that ingenuous feeling of self-reproach, which pierces and weighs down the children of God, as they think of the dishonor which their past life did to His name, the ingratitude it displayed, the violence it did to their own conscience, its deadening and degrading effects, and the death—"the second death"—to which it was dragging them down, when mere Grace arrested them. (On the sense of "death" here, see on ch. 5:12-21, Note 3, and on vs. 16: see also Rev. 21:8—The change proposed in the pointing of this verse: 'What fruit had ye then? things whereof ye are now ashamed" [LUTHER, THOLUCK, DE WETTE, PHILIPPI, ALFORD, etc.], seems unnatural and uncalled for. The ordinary pointing has at least powerful support [CHRYSOSTOM, CALVIN, BEZA, GROTIUS, BENGEL, STUART, FRITZSCHE]). 22. But now—as if to get away from such a subject were unspeakable relief—being made free from Sin, and become servants to God—in the absolute sense intended throughout all this passage—ye have—not 'ought to have,' but 'do have,' in point of fact—your fruit unto holiness—'sanctification,' as in vs. 19; meaning that permanently holy state and character which is built up out of the whole "fruits of righteousness," which believers successively bring forth. They "have their fruit" unto this, i.e., all going towards this blessed result. and the end everlasting life—as the final state of the justified believer; the beatific experience not only of complete exemption from the fall with all its effects, but of the perfect life of acceptance with God, and conformity to His likeness, of unveiled access to Him, and ineffable fellowship

17. But God be thanked, that ye were the servants of sin. This verse should be read thus: "But thanks be to God that, although you were the servants of sin, nevertheless you have obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine that was delivered unto you"; or, "that mold of teaching into which you were cast." The apostle does not thank God that they were sinners; but that, although they were such, they had now received and obeyed the gospel. The Hebrew phrase, Isa. xii. 1, is exactly the same as that of the apostle here: "In that day thou shalt say . . . I will praise thee . . . [for] thou wast angry with me": that is, "Although Thou wast angry with me, Thou hast turned away Thy wrath." That form of doctrine. Christianity is represented under the notion of a "mold," or "die," into which they were cast, and from which they took the impression of its excellence. The figure upon this die is the image of God, righteousness and true holiness, which was stamped on their souls in believing the gospel and receiving the Holy Ghost. The words may be literally translated, "into which mold of doctrine ye have been cast."

18. Being then made free from sin. A term that refers to the manumission of a slave. They were redeemed from the slavery of sin, and became the servants of righteousness. Both sin and righteousness are personified: sin can enjoin no good and profitable work; righteousness can require none that is unjust or injurious.

19. I speak after the manner of men. This phrase is often used by the Greek writers to signify what was easy to be comprehended; what was level with common understandings, delivered in a popular style; what was different from the high flights of the poets and the studied, sublime obscurity of the philosophers. Because of the infirmity of your flesh. As if he had said: I make use of metaphors and figures connected with well-known natural things. Servants to uncleanness. These different expressions show how deeply immersed in and enslaved by sin these Gentiles were before their conversion to Christianity. Several of the particulars are given in the first chapter of this Epistle.

20. Ye were free from righteousness. These two servitudes are incompatible; if we cannot serve God and mammon, surely we cannot serve Christ and Satan. We must be either sinners or saints, God's servants or the devil's slaves.

21. What fruit had ye then in those things? God designs that every man shall reap benefit by his service. What benefit have you derived from the service of sin? Whereof ye are now ashamed. You blush to remember your former life. It was scandalous to yourselves, injurious to others, and highly provoking to God. The end of those things is death. Whatever sin may promise of pleasure or advantage, the end to which it necessarily tends is the destruction of body and soul.

22. But now being made free from sin. As being free from righteousness is the finished character of a sinner, so being made free from sin is the finished character of a genuine Christian. And become servants to God. They were transferred from the service of one master to that of another; they were freed from the slavery of sin, and engaged in the service of God. Fruit unto holiness. Holiness of heart was the principle, and righteousness of life the fruit.

MATTHEW HENRY

The wages of sin is death, v. 23. Death is as due to a sinner as wages are to a servant. All that are sin's servants and do sin's work must expect to be thus paid. If the fruit be unto holiness the end will be everlasting life—a very happy end!—Though the way be up-hill, yet everlasting life at the end of it is sure. So, v. 23, The gift of God is eternal life. Heaven is life, and it is eternal life, no infirmities attending it, no death to put a period to it. This is the gift of God. The death is the wages of sin; but the life is a gift. Sinners merit hell, but saints do not merit heaven. We must thank God, and not ourselves, if ever we get to heaven. And this gift is through Jesus Christ our Lord. It is Christ that purchased it, prepares us for it, preserves us to it.

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

Let us notice that eternal life is imparted by grace through faith. When it first enters the soul, it comes as God's free gift. The dead can not earn life; the very supposition is absurd Eternal life enjoyed on earth comes to us as a gift. "What!" saith one, "do you mean to say that eternal life comes into the soul here?" I say yes, here, or else never. Eternal life must be our possession now; for if we die without it, it will never be our possession in the world to come. which is not the state of probation, but of fixed and settled reward. When the flame of eternal life first drops into a man's heart, it is not as the result of any good works of his which preceded it, for there were none; nor as the result of any feelings of his, for good feelings were not there till the life came. Both good works and good feelings are the fruit of heavenly life which enters the heart.

"Eternal life is the gift of God in Jesus Christ." By faith we come consciously into Christ. We trust Him, we rest upon Him, we become one with Him, and thus eternal life manifests itself. Has He not said, "I give unto my sheep eternal life"; and again, "He that believeth in him hath everlasting life"? O beloved, you that have been quickened by the Spirit of God, I am sure you trace that first quickening to the grace of God. Whatever your doctrinal views may be, you are all agreed in the experimental acknowledgment that by the grace of God, you are what you are. How could you, being dead, give yourself life? How could you, being the slave of sin, set yourself free? But the Lord in mercy visited you as surely as the Lord Jesus Christ visited the tomb of Lazarus; and He spoke with His almighty voice and bade you to come to life, and you arose and came to life at His bidding. You remember well the change that came upon you. If any man here could have been literally dead, and then could have been made to live, what a wonderful experience his would have been! We should go a long way to hear the story of a man who had been dead and then was made alive again. But I tell you, his experience, if he could tell it, would not be any more wonderful than our experience as quickened from death in sin; for we have suffered the pains and come through the entrance of life into the soul, and we know the joys which afterward come of it.

with Him through all duration. 23. For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through—'in'—Jesus Christ our Lord—This concluding verse—as pointed as it is brief—contains the marrow, the most fine gold, of the Gospel. As the laborer is worthy of his hire, and feels it to be his due—his own of right— so is death the due of sin, the wages the sinner has well wrought for, his own. But "eternal life" is in no sense or degree the wages of our righteousness; we do nothing whatever to earn or become entitled to it, and never can: it is therefore, in the most absolute sense, "THE GIFT OF GOD." Grace reigns in the bestowal of it in every case, and that "in Jesus Christ our Lord," as the righteous Channel of it. In view of this, who that hath tasted that the Lord is gracious can refrain from saying, "Unto Him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in His own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and His Father, to Him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen!" (Rev. 1:5, 6). Note (1) As the most effectual refutation of the oft-repeated calumny, that the doctrine of Salvation by grace encourages to continue in sin, is the holy life of those who profess it, let such ever feel that the highest service they can render to that Grace which is all their hope, is to "yield themselves unto God, as those that are alive from the dead, and their members instruments of righteousness unto God" (vss. 12, 13). By so doing they will "put to silence the ignorance of foolish men," secure their own peace, carry out the end of their calling, and give substantial glory to Him that loved them. (2) The fundamental principle of Gospel-obedience is as original as it is divinely rational; that 'we are set free from the law in order to keep it, and are brought graciously under servitude to the law in order to be free' (vss. 14, 15, 18). So long as we know no principle of obedience but the terrors of the law, which condemns all the breakers of it, and knows nothing whatever of grace, either to pardon the guilty or to purify the stained, we are shut up under a moral impossibility of genuine and acceptable obedience: whereas when Grace lifts us out of this state, and through union to a righteous Surety, brings us into a state of conscious reconciliation, and loving surrender of heart to a God of salvation, we immediately feel the glorious liberty to be holy, and the assurance that "Sin shall not have dominion over us" is as sweet to our renewed tastes and aspirations as the ground of it is felt to be firm, "because we are not under the Law, but under Grace." (3) As this most momentous of all transitions in the history of a man is wholly of God's free grace, the change should never be thought, spoken, or written of but with lively thanksgiving to Him who so loved us (vs. 17). (4) Christians, in the service of God, should emulate their former selves in the zeal and steadiness with which they served sin, and the length to which they went in it (vs. 19). (5) To stimulate this holy rivalry, let us often "look back to the rock whence we were hewn, the hole of the pit whence we were digged," in search of the enduring advantages and permanent satisfactions which the service of Sin yielded; and when we find to our "shame" only gall and wormwood, let us follow a godless life to its proper "end," until, finding ourselves in the territories of "death," we are fain to hasten back to survey the service of Righteousness, that new Master of all believers, and find Him leading us sweetly into abiding "holiness," and landing us at length in "everlasting life" (vss. 20-22). (6) Death and life are before all men who hear the Gospel: the one, the natural issue and proper reward of sin; the other, the absolutely free "GIFT OF GOD" to sinners, "in Jesus Christ our Lord." And as the one is the conscious sense of the hopeless loss of all blissful existence, so the other is the conscious possession and enjoyment of all that constitutes a rational creature's highest "life" for evermore (vs. 23). Ye that read or hear these words, "I call heaven and earth to record this day against you, that I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing, therefore choose life, that both thou and thy seed may live!" (Deut. 30:19).

ADAM CLARKE

23. For the wages of sin is death. The second death, everlasting perdition. Every sinner earns this by long, sore, and painful service. Oh, what pains do men take to get to hell! But the gift of God is eternal life. A man may merit hell, but he cannot merit heaven. The apostle does not say that the wages of righteousness is eternal life: no, but that this eternal life, even to the righteous, is the gracious "gift of God." And even this gracious gift comes through Jesus Christ our Lord. He alone has procured it; and it is given to all those who find redemption in His blood. A sinner goes to hell because he deserves it; a righteous man goes to heaven because Christ has died for him, and communicated that grace by which his sin is pardoned and his soul made holy. The word wages signified the daily pay of a Roman soldier. So every sinner has a daily pay, and this pay is death; he has misery because he sins. Sin constitutes hell; the sinner has a hell in his own bosom; all is confusion and disorder where God does not reign. Every indulgence of sinful passions increases the disorder, and consequently the misery, of a sinner. If men were as much in earnest to get their souls saved as they are to prepare them for perdition, heaven would be highly peopled, and devils would be their own companions.

The apostle, having in the preceding chapter shown the converted Gentiles the obligations they were under to live a holy life, addresses himself here to the Jews who might hesitate to embrace the gospel, lest by this means they should renounce the law, which might appear to them as a renunciation of their allegiance to God. As they rested in the law as sufficient for justification and sanctification, it was necessary to convince them of their mistake. That the law was insufficient for their justification the apostle had proved, in chapters iii, iv, and v; that it is insufficient for their sanctification he shows in this chapter; and introduces his discourse by showing that a believing Jew is discharged from his obligations to the law, and is at liberty to come under another and much happier constitution, viz., that of the gospel of Christ, 1-4. In the fifth verse he gives a general description of the state of a Jew, in servitude to sin, considered as under mere law. In the sixth verse he gives a summary account of the state of a Christian, or believing Jew, and the advantages he enjoys under the gospel. Upon the fifth verse he comments, from verse 7 to the end of the chapter; and upon the sixth verse he comments, chap. viii. 1-11.

In explaining his position in the fifth verse he shows: (1) That the law reaches to all the branches and latent principles of sin, v. 7. (2) That it subjected the sinner to death, vv. 8-12, without the expectation of pardon. (3) He shows the reason why the Jew was put under it, v. 13. (4) He proves that the law, considered as a rule of action, though it was spiritual, just, holy, and good in itself, yet was insufficient for sanctification, or for freeing a man from the power of inbred sin. For, as the prevalency of sensual appetites cannot wholly extinguish the voice of reason and conscience, a man may acknowledge the law to be holy, just, and good, and yet his passions reign within him, keeping him in the most painful and degrading servitude, while the law supplies no power to deliver him from them, vv. 14-24, as that power can be supplied only by the grace of Jesus Christ, v. 25.

Verses 1–6

Among other arguments to persuade us against sin, and to holiness, this was one (v. 14), that we are not under the law; and this argument is here further insisted upon (v. 6): We are delivered from the law. 1. We are delivered from that power of the law which condemns us for the sin committed by us. The law

CHAPTER 7

VSS. 1-25. SAME SUBJECT CONTINUED. 1-6. Relation of Believers to the Law and to Christ. Recurring to the statement of ch. 6:14, that believers are "not under the law but under grace," the apostle here shows how this change is brought about, and what holy consequences follow from it. 1. I speak to them that know the law—of Moses to whom,

CHAPTER 7

1. For I speak to them that know the law. This is a proof that the apostle directs this part of his discourse to the Jews. As long as he liveth. Or "as long as it liveth"; law does not extend its influence to the dead, nor do abrogated laws bind. It is all the same whether we understand these words as speaking of a law saith, The soul that sins shall die; but we are delivered from the law. 2. We are delivered from that power of the law which provokes the sin that dwelleth in us. This the apostle seems especially to refer to (v. 5): The motions of sins which were by the law. The law, by threatening, corrupt and fallen man, but offering no grace to cure, did but stir up the corruption. We being lamed by the fall, the law comes and directs us, but provides nothing to heal and help our lameness. We are under grace, which promises strength to do what it commands, and pardon upon repentance when we do amiss. The difference between a law-state and a gospel-state he had before illustrated by the similitude of serving a new master; now here under the similitude of being married to a new husband.

I. Our first marriage was to the law. The law of marriage is binding till the death of one of the parties, no matter which, and no longer. For this he appeals to themselves, as persons knowing the law (v. 1): I speak to those that know the law. Many of the Christians at Rome had been Jews, and so were well acquainted with the law. One has some hold of knowing people. The law hath power over a man as long as he liveth; in particular, the law of marriage hath power. The obligation of laws extends no further. The condemnation of laws extends no further; death is the finishing of the law. The severest laws could but kill the body, and after that there is no more that they can do. Thus while we were alive to the law we were under the power of it. Such is the law of marriage (v. 2), the woman is bound to her husband during life, she cannot marry another; if she do, she shall be reckoned an adulteress, v. 3.

II. Our second marriage is to Christ.

1. We are freed, by death, from our obligation to the law as a covenant, v. 3. You are become dead to the law, v. 4. He does not say, "The law is dead," but, which comes all to one, You are dead to the law.

It is dead, it has lost its power; and this (v. 4) by the body of Christ, that is, by the sufferings of Christ in his body, by his crucified body. We are dead to the law by our union with the mystical body of Christ, but have no more to do with it than the dead servant hath to do with his master's yoke.

2. We are married to Christ. We enter upon a life of dependence on him and duty to him: Married to another, even to him who is raised from the dead. As our dying to sin and the law is in conformity to the death of Christ, and the crucifying of his body, so our devotedness to Christ in newness of life is in conformity to the resurrection of Christ. We are married to the raised exalted Jesus. Now we are thus married to Christ, (1) That we should bring forth fruit unto God, v. 4. One end of marriage is fruitfulness. Now the great end of our marriage to Christ is our fruitfulness in love, and grace, and every good work. As our old marriage to sin produced fruit unto death, so our second marriage to Christ produces fruit unto God. Good works are the children of the new nature. Whatever our professions and pretensions may be, there is no fruit brought forth to God till we are married to Christ. This distinguishes the good works of believers from the good works of hypocrites and self-justifiers that they are done in union with Christ. Thus were we married to the law (v. 5): When we were in the flesh, then the motions of sins which were by the law did work in our members, we were carried down the stream of sin, and the law was but as an imperfect dam, which made the stream to swell the higher. Our desire was towards sin, and sin ruled over us. We were under a law of sin and death, as the wife under the law of marriage; and the product of this marriage was fruit brought forth unto death. Lust, having conceived by the law, bringeth forth sin, and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death, Jam. i. 15. This is the posterity that springs from this marriage to sin and the law. This comes of the motions of sin working in our members.

though not themselves Jews (see on ch. 1:13), the Old Testament was familiar. 2, 3. if her husband be dead—'die' So vs. 3. she be married—'joined.' So vs. 4.

4. Wherefore . . . ye also are become dead—rather, 'were slain'—to the law by the body of Christ—through His slain body. The apostle here departs from his usual word "died," using the more expressive phrase 'were slain,' to make it clear that he meant their being "crucified with Christ" (as expressed in ch. 6:3-6, and Gal. 2:20. that ye should be married to another, even to him that is—'was'—raised from the dead—to the intent—that we should bring forth fruit unto God—It has been thought that the apostle should here have said that 'the law died to us,' not 'we to the law,' but that he purposely inverted the figure, to avoid the harshness to Jewish ears of the death of the law [CHRYSOSTOM, CALVIN, HODGE, PHILIPPI, etc.]. But this is to mistake the apostle's design in employing this figure, which was merely to illustrate the general principle that 'death dissolves legal obligation.' It was essential to his argument that we, not the law, should be the dying party, since it is we that are "crucified with Christ," and not the law. This death dissolves our marriage obligation to the law, leaving us at liberty to contract a new relation—to be joined to the Risen One, in order to spiritual fruitfulness, to the glory of God [BEZA, OLSHAUSEN, MEYER, ALFORD, etc.]. The confusion, then, is in the expositors, not the text; and it has arisen from not observing that, like Jesus Himself, believers are here viewed as having a double life—the old sin-condemned life, which they lay down with Christ, and the new life of acceptance and holiness to which they rise with their Surety and Head; and all the issues of this new life, in Christian obedience, are regarded as the "fruit" of this blessed union to the Risen One. How such holy fruitfulness was impossible before our union to Christ, is next declared. 5. For when we were in the flesh—in our unregenerate state, as we came into the world. See on John 3:6; and ch. 8:5-9. the motions—'passions' (Margin), 'affectious' (as in Gal. 5:24), or 'stirrings.' of sins—i.e., 'prompting to the commission of sins.' which were by the law—by occasion of the law, which fretted, irritated our inward corruption by its prohibitions. See on vss. 7-9.

did work in our members—the members of the body, as the instruments by which these inward stirrings find vent in action, and become facts of the life. See on ch. 6: 6. to bring forth fruit unto death—death in the sense of ch. 6:21. Thus hopeless is all holy fruit before union to Christ.

abrogated, so that it cannot command, or of its objects being dead, so that it has none to bind. In either case the law has no force.

2. For the woman which hath an husband. The apostle illustrates his meaning by a familiar instance. A married woman is bound to her husband while he lives; but when her husband is dead, she is discharged from the law by which she was bound to him alone.

3. So then if, while her husband liveth. The object of the apostle's similitude is to show that each party is equally bound to the other, but that the death of either dissolves the engagement. So . . . she is no adulteress, though she be married to another. And do not imagine that this change would argue any disloyalty in you to your Maker; for as He has determined that this law of ordinances shall cease, you are no more bound to it than a woman is to a deceased husband, and are as free to receive the gospel of Christ as a woman in such circumstances would be to remarry.

4. Wherefore, my brethren. This is a parallel case. You were once under the law of Moses and were bound by its injunctions, but now you are become dead to that law—a modest, inoffensive mode of speech, for "the law, which was once your husband, is dead." God has determined that it shall be no longer in force; so that now, as a woman whose husband is dead is freed from the law of that husband, or from her conjugal vow, and may legally be married to another, so God, who gave the law under which you have hitherto lived, designed that it should be in force only till the advent of the Messiah. That advent has taken place; the law has consequently ceased, and now you are called to take on you the yoke of the gospel, and lay down the yoke of the law; and it is the design of God that you should do so. That ye should be married to another . . . who is raised from the dead. As "Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth," the object of God in giving the law was to unite you to Christ; and as He has died, He has not only abolished that law which condemns every transgressor to death, but He has also made that atonement for sin by His own death, which is represented in the sacrifices prescribed by the law. And as Jesus Christ is risen again from the dead. He has thereby given the fullest proof that by His death He has procured the resurrection of mankind and made that atonement required by the law. That we should bring forth fruit unto God—we, Jews, who believe in Christ, have, in consequence of our union with Him, received the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit; so that we bring forth that fruit of holiness unto God which, without this union, it would be impossible for us to produce.

5. For when we were in the flesh. When we were without the gospel, in our carnal and unregenerated state, though believing in the law of Moses and performing the rites and offices of our religion. The motions of sins, which were by the law. "The passions of sins, the evil propensities to sins." To every particular sin there is a propensity; one propensity does not excite to all kinds of sinful acts. Hence the apostle uses the plural number, "the passions or propensities of sins," sins being not more various than their propensities in the unregenerate heart which excite to them. These "propensities" constitute the fallen nature; they are the disease of the heart, the pollution and corruption of the soul. Did work in our members. The evil propensity acts in the whole nervous and muscular system, applying that stimulus to every part which is necessary to excite them to action. To bring forth fruit unto death. To produce those acts of transgression which subject the sinner to death, temporal and eternal. When the apostle says the motions of sins, which were by the law, he points out a most striking and invariable characteristic of sin, viz., its rebellious nature; it ever acts against law, and the most powerfully against known law. Because the law requires obedience, therefore it will transgress. The law is equally against evil passions and evil actions, and both these exert themselves against it. So these motions which were by the law became roused into the most powerful activity by the prohibitions of the law. They were comparatively dormant till the law said, "Thou shalt not do this; thou shalt do

We are delivered from the law (v. 6); our obligation to it is as a husband is made void. And then he speaks of the law being dead as far as it was a law of bondage to us: That being dead wherein we were held.

(2) That we should serve in newness of spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter, v. 6. Still we must serve, but it is a service that is perfect freedom, whereas the service of sin was a perfect drudgery. There must be a renovation of our spirits wrought by the spirit of God, and in that we must serve. Not in the oldness of the letter; that is, we must not rest in mere external services. The letter is said to kill with its bondage and terror, but we are delivered from that yoke that we may serve God without fear, in holiness and righteousness, Luke i. 74, 75. It becomes us to worship within the veil, and no longer in the outward court.

Verses 7–14

What shall we say then? Is the law sin? He had said so much of the influence of the law that it might easily be misinterpreted as a reflection upon the law, to prevent which he shows the great excellency of it as a guide.

The great advantage that he had found by the law. 1. It was discovering: I had not known sin but by the law, v. 7. As that which is straight discovers that which is crooked, so there is no way of coming to that knowledge of sin which is necessary to repentance, but by comparing our hearts and lives with the law.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

6. But now—See on the same expression in ch. 6:22, and cf. James 1:15. we are delivered from the law—The word is the same which, in ch. 6:6 and elsewhere, is rendered "destroyed," and is but another way of saying (as in vs. 4) that "we were slain to the law by the body of Christ"; language which, though harsh to the ear, is designed and fitted to impress upon the reader the violence of that death of the Cross, by which, as by a deadly wrench, we are "delivered from the law." that being dead wherein we were held—It is now universally agreed that the true reading here is, 'being dead to that wherein we were held.' The received reading has no authority whatever, and is inconsistent with the strain of the argument; for the death spoken of, as we have seen, is not the law's, but ours, through union with the crucified Saviour. that we should—'so as to' or 'so that we'—serve in newness of spirit—'in the newness of the spirit' and not in the oldness of the letter—not in our old way of literal, mechanical obedience to the divine law, as a set of external rules of conduct, and without any reference to the state of our hearts; but in that new way of spiritual obedience which, through union to the risen Saviour, we have learned to render (cf. ch. 2:29; II Cor. 3:6).

7-25. False Inferences regarding the Law Repelled. And first, vss. 7-13, In the case of the UNREGENERATE. 7, 8. What... then? Is the law sin? God forbid!—'I have said that when we were in the flesh the law stirred our inward corruption, and was thus the occasion of deadly fruit: Is then the law to blame for this? Far from us be such a thought.' Nay—'On the contrary' (as in ch. 8:37; I Cor. 12:22; Greek).

I had not known sin but by the law—It is important to fix what is meant by "sin" here. It certainly is not 'the general nature of sin' [ALFORD, etc.], though it be true that this is learned from the law; for such a sense will not suit what is said of it in the following verses, where the meaning is the same as here. The only meaning which suits all that is said of it in this place is 'the principle of sin in the heart of fallen man.' The sense, then, is this: 'It was by means of the law that I came to know what a virulence and strength of sinful propensity I had within me.' The existence of this it did not need the law to reveal to him; for even the heathens recognized and wrote of it. But the dreadful nature and desperate power of it the law alone discovered—in the way now to be described.

that"; then the rebellious principle in the evil propensity became roused, and acts of transgression and omissions of duty were the immediate consequences.

6. But now we are delivered from the law. We who have believed in Christ Jesus are delivered from that yoke by which we were bound, which sentenced every transgressor to perdition, but provided no pardon even for the penitent and no sanctification for those who are weary of their inbred corruptions. That being dead wherein we were held. To us believers in Christ this commandment is abrogated; we are transferred to another constitution. That law which kills ceases to bind us; it is dead to us who have believed in Christ Jesus, who is "the end of the law" for justification and salvation to everyone that believes. That we should serve in newness of spirit. We are now brought under a more spiritual dispensation; now we know the spiritual import of all the Mosaic precepts. We see that the law referred to the gospel, and can be fulfilled only by the gospel. The oldness of the letter. The merely literal rites, ceremonies, and sacrifices are now done away; and the newness of spirit, the true intent and meaning of all, are now fully disclosed; so that we are got from an imperfect state into a state of perfection and excellence. We sought justification and sanctification, pardon and holiness, by the law, and have found that the law could not give them; we have sought these in the gospel scheme, and we have found them. We serve God now, not according to the old, literal sense, but in the true spiritual meaning.

7. Is the law sin? The apostle had said, v. 5: "The motions of sins, which were by the law, did . . . bring forth fruit unto death"; and now he anticipates an objection, "Is therefore the law sin?" To which he answers, as usual, "By no means." Law is only the means of disclosing this sinful propensity, not of producing it, as a bright beam of the sun introduced into a room shows millions of motes which appear to be dancing in it in all directions. But these were not introduced by the light; they were there before, only there was not light enough to make them manifest. So the evil propensity was there before, but there was not light sufficient to discover it. I had not known sin, but by the law. Mr. Locke and Dr. Taylor have properly remarked the skill used by Paul in dexterously avoiding, as much as possible, the giving offense to the Jews: and this is particularly evident in his use of the word I in this place. In the beginning of the chapter, where he mentions their knowledge of the law, he says "ye"; in the fourth verse he joins himself with them, and says "we"; but here, and so to the end of the chapter, where he represents the power of sin and the inability of the law to subdue it, he appears to leave them out, and speaks altogether in the first person, though it is plain he means all those who are under the law. So, chap. iii. 7, he uses the singular pronoun, "Why . . . am I . . . judged as a sinner?" when he evidently means the whole body of unbelieving Jews. There is another circumstance in which his address is peculiarly evident: his demonstrating the insufficiency of the law under color of vindicating it. He knew that the Jew would take fire at the least reflection on the law, which he held in the highest veneration; and therefore he very naturally introduces him catching at that expression, v. 5, "the motions of sins, which were by the law," or notwithstanding the law. "What!" says this Jew, "do you vilify the law, by charging it with favoring sin?" By no means, says the apostle; I am very far from charging the law with favoring sin. "The law is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good," v. 12. Thus he writes in vindication of the law; and yet at the same time shows: (1) That the law requires the most extensive obedience, discovering and condemning sin in all its most secret and remote branches, v. 7. (2) That it gives sin a deadly force, subjecting every transgression to the penalty of death, vv. 8-14. And yet, (3) supplies neither help nor hope to the sinner, but leaves him under the power of sin, and the sentence of death, v. 14. While the human heart is its own measure, it will rate its workings according to its own propensities, for itself is its highest rule. But when God gives a true insight of His own

A. B. SIMPSON:

First, we have the effect of the law in revealing him himself, and convicting him of sin. He says, "I had not known sin but by the law; I had not known lust, except the law had said, Thou shalt not covet. But sin taking occasion by the commandment wrought in me all manner of concupiscence, for without the law sin was dead." And then he goes on to tell us how the consiousness of sin was developed. "I was alive without the law once." That is, I felt happy and right, and free from condemnation, and even from the workings of sin. But there came a change, the commandment came forbidding him to do the things that he was doing, and then, like a torrent checked, or a wild beast at bay, all the strength of his evil nature asserted itself. Then he adds, "Sin revived and I died," that is, he became conscious of all the force of evil in his heart and gave up his hope and comfort in despair.

Is not this the experience usually of the young disciple? His early experience is cloudless and delightful. He has not yet seen the depths of his own evil heart, and thinks, perhaps, that there are no such depths of sin in him. But suddenly! some great sacrifice is demanded, some cherished thing is to be cut out of the life, some difficult obedience is to be performed, some secret sin is revealed, and then the whole strength of the will concentrates upon that issue, and the battle is a sharp and decisive one.—Christ in the Bible

Particularly he came to the knowledge of the sinfulness of lust. By lust he means sin dwelling in us. This he came to know when the law said, Thou shalt not covet. The law spoke in the spiritual sense and meaning of it. By this he knew that lust was sin and a very sinful sin. Paul had a very quick and piercing judgment, and yet never attained the right knowledge of indwelling sin till the Spirit by the law made it known to him. There is nothing about which the natural man is more blind than about original corruption. Thus the law is a schoolmaster, to bring us to Christ.

III. The ill use that his corrupt nature made of the law. Sin, taking occasion by the commandment, wrought in me all manner of concupiscence, v. 8. Paul had in him all manner of concupisence, as touching the righteousness of the law, blameless, and yet sensible of all manner of concupiscence. And it was sin that wrought it, indwelling sin, and it took occasion by the commandment. The corrupt nature would not have swelled and raged so much if it had not been for the restraints of the law. Ever since Adam ate forbidden fruit, we have all been fond of forbidden paths.

Without the law sin was dead, as a snake in winter, which the sunbeams of the law quicken and irritate.

It was humbling (v. 9): I was alive. He thought himself in a very good condition, very secure and confident of the goodness of his state. Thus he was once, in times past, when he was a Pharisee; and the reason was he was then without the law. Though brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, a doctor of the law, though himself a strict observer of it, yet without the law. He had the letter of the law, but he had not the spiritual meaning of it —the shell, but not the kernel. He had the law in his hand and in his head, but he had it not in his heart. But when the commandment came (not to his eyes only, but to his heart), sin revived, as the dust in a room rises when the sunshine is let into it. Paul then saw that in sin which he had never seen before—sin in its consequences, sin with death at the heels of it, sin and the curse entailed upon it. "The Spirit, by the commandment, convinced me that I was in a state of sin, and in a state of death because of sin." Of this excellent use is the law; it is a lamp and a light; it opens the eyes, prepares the way of the Lord.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

for I had not known lust, except . . .—Here the same Greek word is unfortunately rendered by three different English ones —"lust"; "covet"; "concupiscence"—which obscures the meaning. By using the word "lust" only, in the wide sense of all 'irregular desire,' or every outgoing of the heart towards anything forbidden, the sense will best be brought out; thus, 'For I had not known lust, except the law had said, Thou shalt not lust; But sin, taking ('having taken') occasion by the commandment (that one which forbids it), wrought in me all manner of lusting.' This gives a deeper view of the tenth commandment than the mere words suggest. The apostle saw in it the prohibition not only of desire after certain things there specified, but of 'desire after everything divinely forbidden'; in other words, all 'lusting' or 'irregular desire.' It was this which "he had not known but by the law." The law forbidding all such desire so stirred his corruption that it wrought in him "all manner of lusting"—desire of every sort after what was forbidden.

For without the law—i.e., before its extensive demands and prohibitions come to operate upon our corrupt nature. sin was—rather, 'is'—dead—i.e., the sinful principle of our nature lies so dormant, so torpid, that its virulence and power are unknown, and to our feeling it is as good as "dead."

9. For I was alive without the law once—'In the days of my ignorance, when, in this sense, a stranger to the law, I deemed myself a righteous man, and, as such, entitled to life at the hand of God.' but when the commandment came—forbidding all irregular desire; for the apostle sees in this the spirit of the whole law. sin revived—'came to life'; in its malignity and strength it unexpectedly revealed itself, as if sprung from the dead. and I died—'saw myself, in the eye of a law never kept and not to be kept, a dead man.'

10, 11. And—thus—the commandment, which was . . .—designed—to—give—life—through the keeping of it perfections, to be applied as a rule of both passion and practice, then sin is discovered, and discovered too to be exceedingly sinful. So strong propensities, because they appear to be inherent in our nature, would have passed for natural and necessary operations, and their sinfulness would not have been discovered if the law had not said, Thou shalt not covet; and thus determined that the propensity itself, as well as its outward operations, is sinful.

8. Sin, taking occasion by the commandment. I think the pointing, both in this and in the eleventh verse, to be wrong; the comma should be after occasion, and not after commandment. "But sin, taking occasion, wrought in me by this commandment all manner of concupiscence." There are different opinions concerning the meaning of the word occasion. Dr. Waterland translates the clause, "Sin, taking advantage." Dr. Taylor contends that all commentators have mistaken the meaning of it, and that it should be rendered "having received force." For this acceptation of the word I can find no adequate authority except in its etymology. The word appears to signify, in general, whatsoever is necessary for the completion or accomplishment of any particular purpose. There is a personification in the text; sin is represented as a murderer watching for life, and snatching at every means and embracing every opportunity to carry his fell purpose into effect. The miserable sinner has a murderer, sin, within him; this murderer can destroy life only in certain circumstances. Finding that the law condemns the object of his cruelty to death, he takes occasion from this to work in the soul all manner of concupiscence, evil and irregular desires and appetites of every kind, and by thus increasing the evil, exposes the soul to more condemnation; and thus it is represented as being slain, v. 11. That is, the law, on the evidence of those sinful dispositions and their corresponding practices, condemns the sinner to death, so that he is dead in law. Thus the very prohibition, as we have already seen in the preceding verse, becomes the instrument of exciting the evil propensity; for, although a sinner has the general propensity to do what is evil, yet he seems to feel most delight in transgressing known law. For without the law sin was dead. Where there is no law there is no transgression, "for sin is the transgression of the law"; and no fault can be imputed unto death where there is no statute by which such a fault is made a capital offense. Dr. Taylor thinks that without the law means the time before the giving of the law from Mount Sinai, which took in the space of 430 years, during which time the people were under the Abrahamic covenant of grace; and without the law that was given on Mount Sinai, the sting of death, which is sin, had not power to slay the sinner; the law was not reenacted till it was given by Moses, chap. v. 13. The Jew was then alive, v. 9, because he was not under the law subjecting him to death for his transgressions; but when the commandment came, with the penalty of death annexed, sin revived, and the Jew died. All manner of concupiscence. It showed what was evil and forbade it; and then the principle of rebellion, which seems essential to the very nature of sin, rose up against the prohibition, and he was the more strongly incited to disobey in proportion as obedience was enjoined. Thus the apostle shows that the law had authority to prohibit, condemn, and destroy; but no power to pardon sin, root out enmity, or save the soul. The word which we render concupiscence signifies simply "strong desire" of any kind; but in the New Testament it is generally taken to signify irregular and unholy desires. Sin in the mind is the desire to do, or to be, what is contrary to the holiness and authority of God. For without the law sin was dead. This means, according to Dr. Taylor's hypothesis, the time previous to the giving of the law. But it seems also consistent with the apostle's meaning to interpret the place as implying the time in which Paul, in his unconverted Jewish state, had not the proper knowledge of the law—while he was unacquainted with its spirituality. He felt evil desire, but he did not know the evil of it.

10. And the commandment, meaning the law in general. Which was ordained to life, the rule of righteousness teaching those statutes "which

MATTHEW HENRY

Thus the commandment, which was ordained to life, proved unto death, v. 10. The same word which to some is an occasion of life unto life is to others an occasion of death unto death. The same sun that makes the garden of flowers more fragrant makes the dunghill more noisome. The way to prevent this mischief is to bow our souls to the commanding authority of the law of God.

It deceived me. Sin puts a cheat upon the sinner, and it is a fatal cheat, v. 11. By it slew me. It deceived and slew him.

I. The great excellency of the law in itself. Far be it from Paul to reflect upon the law. It is holy, just, and good, v. 12. Laws are as the law-makers are. God, the great lawgiver, is holy, just, and good, therefore his law must needs be so. The ways of the Lord are right. It is good in the design of it; it was given for the good of mankind. It makes the observers of it good. Wherever there is true grace there is an assent to this—that the law is holy, just, and good. It wrought death in me by that which is good, v. 13. Nothing so good but a corrupt and vicious nature will pervert it, and make it an occasion of sin. Now in this sin appears sin. The worst thing that sin does is the perverting of the law. Thus sin by the commandment does appear sin (v. 13); it appears in its own colours. Thus by the commandment it becomes exceedingly sinful; that is, it appears to be so.

The law is spiritual (v. 14), not only in regard to the effect of it, but in regard to the extent of it; it reaches our spirits. It is given to man, whose principal part is spiritual; the soul is the best part, and therefore the law to the man must needs be a law to the soul. Herein the law of God is above all other laws, that it is a spiritual law. The law of God takes notice of the iniquity regarded in the heart. We know this. Wherever there is true grace there is an experimental knowledge of the spirituality of the law of God.

Here is a description of the conflict between grace and corruption in the heart, and it is applicable two ways: 1. To the struggles that are in a convinced soul, but yet unregenerate, in the person of whom it is supposed, by some, that Paul speaks. 2. To the struggles that are in a renewed sanctified soul, but yet in a state of imperfection, as other apprehend. And a great controversy there is of which of these we are to understand the apostle here.

I. Apply it to the struggles that are felt in a convinced soul, that is yet in a state of sin, knows his Lord's will, but does it not, continues a slave to his reigning lusts. The apostle had said (ch. vi. 14), Sin shall not have dominion, because you are not under the law, but under grace, for the proof of which he here shows that a man under the law, and not under grace, may be under the dominion of sin. The law may discover sin, and convince of sin, but it cannot conquer and subdue sin. It discovers the defilement but will not wash it off. It makes a man weary and heavy laden (Matt. xi. 28), burdens him with his sin; —I found to be unto death—through breaking it.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

For sin—my sinful nature—taking occasion by the commandment, deceived me—or 'seduced me'—drew me aside into the very thing which the commandment forbade. and by it slew me—'discovered me to myself to be a condemned and gone man' (cf. vs. 9, "I died").

12, 13. Wherefore—'So that'—the law is—'is indeed'—good, and the commandment—that one so often referred to, which forbids all lusting—holy, and just, and good. Was then that which is good made—'Hath then that which is good become'—death unto me? God forbid—i.e., 'Does the blame of my death lie with the good law? Away with such a thought.' But sin—became death unto me, to the end—that it might appear sin—that it might be seen in its true light—working death in—rather, 'to'—me by that which is good, that sin by the commandment might become exceeding sinful—'that its enormous turpitude might stand out to view, through its turning God's holy, just, and good law into a provocative to the very things which is forbids.' So much for the law in relation to the unregenerate, of whom the apostle takes himself as the example; first, in his ignorant, self-satisfied condition; next, under humbling discoveries of his inability to keep the law, through inward contrariety to it; finally, as self-condemned, and already, in law, a dead man. Some inquire to what period of his recorded history these circumstances relate. But there is no reason to think they were wrought into such conscious and explicit discovery at any period of his history before he "met the Lord in the way"; and though, "amidst the multitude of his thoughts within him" during his memorable three day's blindness immediately after that, such views of the law and of himself would doubtless be tossed up and down till they took shape much as they are here described (see on Acts 9:9) we regard this whole description of his inward struggles and progress rather as the finished result of all his past recollections and subsequent reflections on his unregenerate state, which he throws into historical form only for greater vividness. But now the apostle proceeds to repel false inferences regarding the law, secondly: vss. 14-25, In the case of the REGENERATE; taking himself here also as the example. 14. For we know that the law is spiritual—in its demands. but I am carnal—fleshly (see on vs. 5), and as such, incapable of yielding spiritual obedience. sold under sin—enslaved to it. The "I" here, though of course not the regenerate, is neither the unregenerate, but the sinful principle of the renewed man, as is expressly stated in vs. 18.

if a man do, he shall live in them," Lev. xviii. 5. I found, by transgressing it, to be unto death; for it only presented the duty and laid down the penalty, without affording any strength to resist sin or subdue evil propensities.

11. Sin, taking occasion. Sin, deriving strength from the law, threatening death to the transgressor, deceived me, drew me aside to disobedience, promising me gratification, honor, independence, as it promised to Eve; for to her history the apostle evidently alludes, and uses the very same expression, deceived me. See the Septuagint, Gen. iii. 13. And by it slew me. Subjected me to that death which the law denounced against transgressors, and rendered me miserable during the course of life itself. It is well-known to scholars that the verb signifies not only "to slay" or "kill," but also to "make wretched." Every sinner is only exposed to death because he has sinned, and must sooner or later die; but he is miserable in both body and mind by the influence and the effects of sin. He lives a dying life, or a living death.

12. Wherefore the law is holy. As if he had said, to soothe his countrymen, to whom he had been showing the absolute insufficiency of the law either to justify or save from sin: I do not intimate that there is anything improper or imperfect in the law as a rule of life. It prescribes what is holy, just, and good; for it comes from a holy, just, and good God. The law, which is to regulate the whole of the outward conduct, is holy; and the commandment, "Thou shalt not covet," which is to regulate the heart, is not less so. All is excellent and pure; but it neither pardons sin nor purifies the heart; and it is because it is holy, just, and good that it condemns transgressors to death.

13. Was then that which is good made death unto me? This is the question of the Jew, with whom the apostle appears to be disputing. "Do you allow the law to be good, and yet say it is the cause of our death?" The apostle answers: God forbid. "By no means." It is not the law that is the cause of your death, but sin. It was sin which subjected us to death by the law, justly threatening sin with death, which law was given that sin might appear—might be set forth in its own colors—when we saw it subjected us to death by a law perfectly holy, just, and good; that sin, by the law, might be represented what it really is, an exceeding great and deadly evil.

14. For we know that the law is spiritual. This is a general proposition, and probably, in the apostle's autograph, concluded the above sentence. The law is not to be considered as a system of external rites and ceremonies, nor even as a rule of moral action. It is a spiritual system; it reaches to the most hidden purposes, thoughts, dispositions, and desires of the heart and soul; and it reproves and condemns everything, without hope of reprieve or pardon, that is contrary to eternal truth and rectitude. But I am carnal, sold under sin. This was probably, in the apostle's letter, the beginning of a new paragraph. I believe it is agreed, on all hands, that the apostle is here demonstrating the insufficiency of the law in opposition to the gospel; that by the former is the knowledge, by the latter the cure, of sin. Therefore by I here he cannot mean himself, nor any Christian believer. If the contrary could be proved, the argument of the apostle would go to demonstrate the insufficiency of the gospel as well as the law. It is difficult to conceive how the opinion could have crept into the Church, or prevailed there, that "the apostle speaks here of his regenerate state; and that what was, in such a state, true of himself, must be true of all others in the same state." This opinion has, most pitifully and most shamefully, not only lowered the standard of Christianity, but destroyed its influence and disgraced its character. It requires but little knowledge of the spirit of the gospel, and of the scope of this Epistle, to see that the apostle is here either personating a Jew under the law and without the gospel or showing what his own state was when he was deeply convinced that by the deeds of the law no man could be justified, and had not as yet heard those blessed words: "Brother Saul, the Lord . . . Jesus, that appeared unto thee in the way . . . hath sent me, that thou mightest receive thy sight, and and yet it yields no help towards the shaking off of that burden; this is to be had only in Christ. The law may make a man cry out, O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me? and yet leave him thus fettered. Now a soul advanced thus far by the law is in a fair way towards a state of liberty by Christ, though many rest here and go no further. It is possible for a man to go to hell with his eyes open, and to carry about with him a self-accusing conscience, even in the service of the devil. He may consent to the law that it is good, may have that within him that witnesses against sin and for holiness; and yet all this overpowered by the reigning love of sin. Drunkards and unclean persons have some faint desires to leave off their sins, and yet persist in them. Of such as these there are many that will needs have all this understood. It is very hard to imagine why, if the apostle intended this, he should speak all along in his own person; and not only so, but in the present tense.

II. It seems rather to be understood of the struggles that are maintained between grace and corruption in sanctified souls. That there are remainders of indwelling corruption, even where there is a living principle of grace, is past dispute. If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, 1 John i. 8, 10. That true grace strives against these sins and corruptions is likewise certain (Gal. v. 17): The flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh; and these are contrary the one to the other, so that you cannot do the things that you would. And his design is further to open the nature of sanctification, that it does not attain to a sinless perfection in this life. That which we do sincerely strive against, shall not be laid to our charge, and through grace the victory is sure at last.

1. What he complains of—the remainder of indwelling corruptions. The law is insufficient to justify even a regenerate man, which is not the fault of the law, but of our own corrupt nature, which cannot fulfil the law. Observe the particulars of this complaint. (1) I am carnal, sold under sin, v. 14. Even where there is spiritual life there are remainders of carnal affections, and so far a man may be sold under sin.

(2) What I would, that I do not; but what I hate, that do I, v. 15. And to the same purport, v. 19, 21, When I would do good, evil is present with me. He was pressing forward towards perfection, yet he acknowledges that he had not already attained, neither was already perfect, Phil. iii. 12. Fain he would perfectly do the will of God, but his corrupt nature drew him another way: it was like the bias in a bowl, which, when it is thrown straight, yet draws it aside.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

ALBERT BARNES:

"We know." We admit. It is a conceded, well-understood point. "That the law is spiritual." This does not mean that the law is designed to control the spirit, in contradistinction from the body, but it is a declaration showing that the evils of which he was speaking were not the fault of the law. That was not, in its nature, sensual, corrupt, earthly, carnal; but was pure and spiritual. The effect described was not the fault of the law, but of the man, who was sold under sin. The word spiritual is often thus used to denote that which is pure and holy, in opposition to that which is fleshly or carnal (8:5, 6; Gal. 5:16-23). The flesh is described as the source of evil passions and desires; the spirit as the source of purity, or as that which is agreeable to the proper influences of the Holy Spirit. "But I am." The present tense shows that he is describing himself as he was at the time of writing. This is the natural and obvious construction, and if this be not the meaning, it is impossible to account for his having changed the past tense (v. 7) to the present. "Carnal." Fleshly; sensual; opposed to spiritual. This word is used because in the Scriptures the flesh is spoken of as the source of sensual passions and propensities (Gal. 5:19-21). The sense is, that these corrupt passions still retained a strong and withering and distressing influence over the mind. The renewed man is exposed to temptations from his strong native appetites; and the power of these passions, strengthened by long habit before he was converted, has traveled over into religion, and they continue still to influence and distress him. It does not mean that he is wholly under their influence; but that the tendency of his natural inclinations is to indulgence.

"Sold under sin." This expression is often adduced to show that it cannot be of a renewed man that the apostle is speaking. The argument is, that it cannot be affirmed of a Christian that he is sold under sin. A sufficient answer to this might be, that in fact, this is the very language which Christians often now adopt to express the strength of that native depravity against which they struggle, and that no language would better express it. It does not mean that they choose or prefer sins. It strongly implies that the prevailing bent of their mind is against it, but that such is its strength that it brings them into slavery to it. The expression here used, "sold under sin," is "borrowed from the practice of selling captives taken in war, as slaves" (Stuart). It hence means to deliver into the power of anyone, so that he shall be dependent on his will and control (Schleusner). The emphasis is not on the word sold, as if any act of selling had taken place, but the effect was as if he had been sold; i.e. he was subject to it, and under its control; and it means that sin, contrary to the prevailing inclination of his mind (vv. 15-17), had such an influence over him as to lead him to commit it, and thus to produce a state of conflict and grief (vv. 19-24). The verses which follow this are an explanation of the sense and of the manner in which he was "sold under sin."—Popular Commentary

15, 16. For . . .—better, 'For that which I do I know not'; i.e., 'In obeying the impulses of my carnal nature I act the slave of another will than my own as a renewed man? for . . . rather, 'for not what I would (wish, desire) that do I, but what I hate that I do. But if wat I would not that I do, I consent unto the law that it is good—the judgment of my inner man going along with the law.'

be filled with the Holy Ghost," Acts ix. 17. In this and the following verses he states the contrariety between himself, or any Jew while without Christ, and the law of God. Of the latter he says, "It is spiritual"; of the former, I am carnal, sold under sin. Of the carnal man, in opposition to the spiritual, never was a more complete or accurate description given. The expressions "in the flesh" and "after the flesh," in v. 5 and in chap. viii. 5, 8-9, etc., are of the same import with the word carnal in this verse. To be "in the flesh," or to be "carnally minded," solely respects the unregenerate. While unregenerate, a man is in a state of death and enmity against God, chap. viii. 6-9. This is Paul's own account of a carnal man. Those who are of another opinion maintain that by the word carnal here the apostle meant that corruption which dwelt in him after his conversion. But this opinion is founded on a very great mistake; for although there may be, after justification, the remains of the carnal mind, which will be less or more felt till the soul is completely sanctified, yet the man is never denominated from the inferior principle, which is under control, but from the superior principle which habitually prevails. Whatever epithets are given to corruption or sin in Scripture, opposite epithets are given to grace or holiness. By these different epithets are the unregenerate and regenerate denominated. From all this it follows that the epithet carnal, which is the characteristic designation of an unregenerate man, cannot be applied to Paul after his conversion; nor, indeed, to any Christian in that state. [But cf. I Cor. 3:3—ED.] But the word carnal, though used by the apostle to signify a state of death and enmity against God, is not sufficient to denote all the evil of the state which he is describing; hence he adds, expressions which the Spirit of God uses in Scripture to describe the full depravity of fallen man. It implies a willing slavery; Ahab had sold himself to work evil, I Kings xxi. 20. And of the Jews it is said, in their utmost depravity, "Behold, for your iniquities have you sold yourselves," Isa. l. 1. Now if the word carnal in its strongest sense had been sufficiently significant of all he meant, why add to this charge another expression still stronger? We must therefore understand the phrase sold under sin as implying that the soul was employed in the drudgery of sin; that it was "sold over" to this service, and had no power to disobey this tyrant, until it was redeemed by another. And if a man be actually sold to another, and he acquiesce in the deed, then he becomes the legal property of that other person. This state of bondage was well-known to the Romans. The sale of slaves they saw daily, and could not misunderstand the emphatical sense of this expression. Sin is here represented as a person, and the apostle compares the dominion which sin has over the man in question to that of a master over his legal slave. Universally through the Scriptures man is said to be in a state of bondage to sin until the Son of God make him free, but in no part of the sacred writings is it ever said that the children of God are sold under sin.

15. For that which I do I allow not. The first clause of this verse is a general assertion concerning the employment of the person in question in the state which the apostle calls carnal and sold under sin. The Greek word which is here translated I do means a work which the agent continues to perform till it is finished, and is used by the apostle, Phil. ii. 12, to denote the continued employment of God's saints in His service to the end of their lives, "Work out your own salvation." The word here denotes an employment of a different kind; and therefore the man who now feels the galling dominion of sin says, What I am continually laboring at I allow not. "I do not acknowledge" to be right, just, holy, or profitable. But what I hate, that do I. I am a slave, and under the absolute control of my tyrannical master; I hate his service, but am obliged to work his will. Who, without blaspheming, can assert that the apostle is speaking this of a man in whom the Spirit of the Lord dwells? From v. 7 to this one the apostle, says Dr. Taylor, denotes the Jew in the flesh by a single I; here he divides that I into two I's, or figurative persons, representing two different and opposite principles which were in him. The

ALBERT BARNES:

"For what I would." That which I approve and which is my prevailing and established desire. What I would wish always to do. "But what I hate." What I disapprove of; what is contrary to my judgment, my prevailing inclination, my established principles of conduct. "That do I." Under the influence of sinful propensities, and carnal inclinations and desires. This represents the strong native propensity to sin; and even the power of corrupt propensity under the restraining influence of the gospel.

On this remarkble and important passage we may observe: (1) That the prevailing propensity, the habitual fixed inclination of the mind of the Christian, is to do right. The evil course is hated, the right course is loved. This is the characteristic of a pious mind. It distinguishes a holy man from a sinner. (2) That the evil which is done is disapproved; is a source of grief; and the habitual desire of the mind is to avoid it, and be pure. This also distinguishes the Christian from the sinner. (3) That there is no need of being embarrassed here with any metaphysical difficulties or inquiries how this can be. It is in fact the experience of all Christians. The habitual, fixed inclination and desire of their minds is to serve God. They have a fixed abhorrence of sin; and yet they are conscious of imperfection, and error, and sin, which is the source of uneasiness and trouble. The strength of natural passion may in an unguarded moment overcome them. The power of long habits, of previous thoughts, may annoy them. A man who was an infidel before his conversion, and whose mind was filled with skepticism, and cavils, and blasphemy, will find the effect of his former habits of thinking lingering in his mind and annoying his peace for years. These thoughts will start up with the rapidity of lightning. Thus it is with every vice and every opinion. It is one of the effects of habit. "The very passage of an impure thought through the mind leaves pollution behind it"; and where sin has been long indulged, it leaves its withering, desolating effect on the soul long after conversion, and produces that state of conflict with which every Christian is familiar. An effect somewhat similar is felt by all men. All are conscious of doing that, under the excitement of passion and prejudice, which their conscience and better judgment disapprove.—Popular Commentary

His conscience witnessed for him that he had a good principle ruling and prevailing in him, notwithstanding. The rule of this good principle which he had was the law of God, to which he here speaks of having a threefold regard. [1] I consent unto the law that it is good, v. 16. Here is the approbation of the judgment. Wherever there is grace there is not only a dread of the severity of the law, but a consent to the goodness of the law. This is a sign that the law is written in the heart. The sanctified judgment not only concurs to the equity of the law, but to the excellency of it.

The fault lay in that corruption of his nature which he did really bewail and strive against: It is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me. This he mentions twice (v. 17, 20), not as an excuse for the guilt of sin, but that he might not sink in despair, but take comfort from the covenant of grace, which accepts the willingness of the spirit, and has provided pardon for the weakness of the flesh. He here professes his dissent from the law of sin. "It is not I; it is against my mind that it is done."

In me, that is in my flesh, dwelleth no good, v. 18. There is no good to be expected, any more than one would expect good corn growing upon a rock. As the new nature cannot commit sin (1 John iii. 9), so the flesh, the old nature, cannot perform a good duty. How should it? For the flesh serveth the law of sin (v. 25).

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

17. Now then it is no more I—my renewed self—that do it—'that work it' —but sin which dwelleth in me—that principle of sin that still has its abode in me. To explain this and the following statements, as many do [even BENGEL and THOLUCK], of the sins of unrenewed men against their better convictions, is to do painful violence to the apostle's language, and to affirm of the unregenerate what is untrue. That coexistence and mutual hostility of "flesh" and "spirit" in the same renewed man, which is so clearly taught in ch. 8:4, etc., and in Galatians 5:16, etc., is the true and only key to the language of this and the following verses. (It is hardly necessary to say that the apostle means not to disown the blame of yielding to his corruptions, by saying, "it is not he that does it, but sin that dwelleth in him." Early heretics thus abused his language; but the whole strain of the passage shows that his sole object in thus expressing himself was to bring more vividly before his readers the conflict of two opposite principles, and how entirely, as a new man—honoring from his inmost soul the law of God—he condemned and renounced his corrupt nature, with its affections and lusts, its stirrings and its outgoings, root and branch). 18. For . . .—better, 'For I know that there dwelleth not in me, that is in my flesh, any good.' for to will—'desire' —is present with me; but to perform that which is good—the supplement "how," in our version, weakens the statement—I find not—Here, again, we have the double self of the renewed man; 'In me dwelleth no good; but this corrupt self is not my true self; it is but sin dwelling in my real self, as a renewed man.'

one I, or principle, assents to the law that it is good, and wills and chooses what the other does not practice, v. 16. This principle he expressly tells us, v. 22, is the "inward man"; "the law of my mind," v. 23; the "mind," or rational faculty, v. 25; for he could find no other inward man, or law of the mind, but the rational faculty, in a person who was carnal and sold under sin. The other I, or principle, transgresses the law, v. 23, and does those things which the former principle allows not. This principle he expressly tells us, v. 18, is the "flesh," the "law in my members," or sensual appetite, v. 23; and he concludes in the last verse that these two principles, residing and counteracting each other in the same person, are reason and lust, or sin that dwells in us. And it is very easy to distinguish these two I's, or principles. For instance, v. 17: "Now then it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me." The I he speaks of here is opposed to indwelling or governing sin; and therefore plainly denotes the principle of reason, the "inward man," or "law of my mind"; in which, I add, a measure of the light of the Spirit of God shines, in order to show the sinfulness of sin. These two different principles he calls, one "flesh," and the other "Spirit," Gal. v. 17, where he speaks of their contrariety in the same manner that he does here. And we may give a probable reason why the apostle dwells so long upon the struggle and opposition between these two principles; it appears intended to answer a tacit but very obvious objection. The Jew might allege: "But the law is holy and spiritual; and I assent to it as good, as a right rule of action, which ought to be observed. Yea, I esteem it highly; I glory and rest in it, convinced of its truth and excellency. And is not this enough to constitute the law a sufficient principle of sanctification?" The apostle answers, "No; wickedness is consistent with a sense of truth. A man may assent to the best rule of action, and yet still be under the dominion of lust and sin, from which nothing can deliver him but a principle and power proceeding from the fountain of life."

16. If then I do that which I would not, knowing that the law condemns it and that therefore it must be evil, I consent unto the law; I show by this circumstance that I acknowledge the law to be good.

17. Now then it is no more I. It is not that I which constitutes reason and conscience. But sin—corrupt and sensual inclinations—that dwelleth in me—that has the entire domination over my reason, darkening my understanding, and perverting my judgment; for which there is condemnation in the law, but no cure. So we find here that there is a principle in the unregenerate man stronger than reason itself; a principle which is, properly speaking, not of the essence of the soul, but acts in it, as its lord, or as a tyrant. This is inbred and indwelling sin, the seed of the serpent, by which the whole soul is darkened, confused, perverted, and excited to rebellion against God.

18. For I know that in me. I have learned by experience that in an unregenerate man there is no good. There is no principle by which the soul can be brought into the light, no principle by which it can be restored to purity; fleshly appetities alone prevail, and the brute runs away with the man. For to will is present with me. When the apostle says, To will is present with me, he shows that the will is on the side of God and truth, so far that it consents to the propriety and necessity of obedience. There has been a strange clamor raised up against this faculty of the soul, as if the very essence of evil dwelt in it, whereas the apostle shows throughout this chapter that the will was regularly on God's side, while every other faculty appears to have been in hostility to Him. The truth is, men have confounded the will with the passions, and laid to the charge of the former what properly belongs to the latter. The will is right, but the passions are wrong. It discerns and approves, but is without ability to perform; it has no power over sensual appetites; in these the principle of rebellion dwells.

19. For the good that I would I do not. Here again is the most decisive proof that the will is on the side of God and truth. But the evil which I would not. And here is equally decisive proof

MATTHEW HENRY

A. B. SIMPSON:

"I delight in the law of God after the inward man." This inward man which delights in the law of God is undoubtedly the new man, the regenerated soul, born from above. Notwithstanding our corruptions and struggles, let us never give up the confidence of our salvation. We are the Lord's children, although we may be full of fault and blame. The nugget is genuine gold, although it is mixed with much rough rock and native ore. In due time the great Refiner will cleanse it from the dross; but be careful and do not throw it away because it still has some dross.

We see the honest struggle between these two natures. The new and heaven-born heart is opposed by the old natural heart, and a terrible struggle ensues in which the good is often defeated by the evil, yet never yields its consent. "I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members." Now, this is the struggle in which so many Christian lives spend all their earthly experience. It is an honest and earnest conflict, and God gives full credit for the intent, but looks with sorrow upon the failure which is so needless and vain.

What is the struggling soul to do? To continue the fight forever? What did Paul do? Listen, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" When we can do nothing else, we can at least give a good cry. When it came to the worst, Paul just lifted up his voice and called for help. With his little ship sinking in the rough waters, he shouted for aid. And such a cry is never heard in vain. God heard him, and a moment later, lo! the vision beyond the surf of the white sails of the lifeboat coming to his aid with Jesus in the prow, waving His hand in encouragement and victory, while Paul answers back with a shout of triumph, "Thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord." And now the lifeboat is quickly attached to the sinking ship and quickly bears it across the rough waters into the open sea of peace and grace and glory into which we pass in the following chapter.

The seventh chapter of Romans is the hopeless struggle of the new heart with the old heart in a saved man. The eighth chapter of Romans is the victory of the same man over his old enemy and all others, when something is added to his life—the indwelling presence and power of Jesus Christ and the Holy Ghost to fill him and keep him in triumph over all his foes. Rom. 7:25 gives us the key to the whole chapter in the words, "I myself"; it is the story of what I myself can do; it is the best that the good self is able to accomplish, while the eighth chapter is the best that Christ in us is able to accomplish, and the key to the chapter is, "In Christ, and Christ in us."

I myself can choose the right and struggle for it, but cannot fully accomplish it. With the mind I can serve the law of God, but with the flesh I will still often serve the law of sin. But when I come into the higher place of union with Christ, then "the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death."

In the fifth chapter of Galatians, the same conflict is described, "The flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh." Usually we spell the word "spirit" with a small "s" and that keeps us in the seventh chapter of Romans, our spirit struggling against our flesh. The true way to spell it is with a capital "S," and this takes us into the eighth chapter of Romans, and this makes the struggle no longer between our spirit and our flesh, but rather between the divine Spirit and our flesh. The battle is not ours, but God's, and the victory is sure and complete, and so the apostle says in Galatians, "This I say then, Walk in the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lust of the flesh."

—Christ in the Bible

[2] I delight in the law of God after the inward man, v. 22. He delighted not only in the promises of the word, but in the precepts and prohibitions of the word. All that are born again do truly delight in the law of God, never better pleased than when heart and life are in the strictest conformity to the law and will of God. After the inward man; First, The mind or rational faculties. The soul is the inward man, and that is the seat of gracious delights, which are therefore sincere and serious, but secret. Secondly, The new nature. The new man is called the inner man (Eph. iii. 16).

regenerate, because the description given of this "desire to do good" in the verse immediately following is such as cannot be ascribed, with the least show of truth, to any but the renewed.

22. For I delight in the law of God after the inward man—'from the bottom of my heart.' The word here rendered "delight" is indeed stronger than "consent" in vs. 16; but both express a state of mind and heart to which the unregenerate man is a stranger.

that the will is against or opposed to evil. It is not the will that leads men astray, but the corrupt passions which oppose and oppress the will. The plain state of the case is this: the soul is so completely fallen that it has no power to do good till it receive that power from on high. But it has power to see good, to distinguish between that and evil; to acknowledge the excellence of this good, and to will it, from a conviction of that excellence; but further it cannot go. Yet in various cases it is solicited and consents to sin; and because it is will, that is, because it is a free principle, it must necessarily possess this power; and although it can do no good unless it receive grace from God, yet it is impossible to force it to sin. Even Satan himself cannot do this; and before he can get it to sin, he must gain its consent. Thus God in His endless mercy has endued this faculty with a power in which, humanly speaking, resides the salvability of the soul; and without this the soul must have eternally continued under the power of sin, or been saved as an inert, absolutely passive machine. But does not this arguing destroy the doctrine of free grace? No! it establishes that doctrine. (1) It is through the grace, the unmerited kindness, of God that the soul has such a faculty, and that it has not been extinguished by sin. (2) This will, though a free principle, yet, properly speaking, has no power by which it can subjugate the evil or perform the good. We know that the eye has a power to discern objects, but without light this power is perfectly useless, and no object can be discerned by it. So of the person represented here by the apostle it is said, To will is present with me, v. 18; "To will is ever in readiness, it is ever at hand, it lies constantly before me"; but how to perform that which is good I find not; that is, the man is unregenerate, and he is seeking justification and holiness from the law. The law was never designed to give these—it gives the knowledge, not the cure, of sin. Here, then, the free agency of man is preserved, without which he could not be in a salvable state; and the honor of the grace of Christ is maintained, without which there can be no actual salvation.

20. It is no more I. My will is against it; my reason and conscience condemn it. But sin that dwelleth in me—the principle of sin, which has possessed itself of all my carnal appetites and passions, and thus subjects my reason and domineers over my soul. Thus I am in perpetual contradiction to myself. Two principles are continually contending in me for the mastery: my reason, on which the light of God shines, to show what is evil; and my passions, in which the principle of sin works, to bring forth fruit unto death.

21. I find then a law. I am in such a condition and state of soul, under the power of such habits and sinful propensities, that when I would do good—when my will and reason are strongly bent on obedience to the law of God and opposition to the principle of sin—evil is present with me, "evil is at hand; it lies constantly before me." As the will to do good is constantly at hand, v. 18, so the principle of rebellion exciting me to sin is equally present; but as the one is only will, wish, and desire, without power to do what is willed, to obtain what is wished, or to perform what is desired, sin continually prevails. The word law in this verse must be taken as implying any strong or confirmed habit, under the influence of which the man generally acts; and in this sense the apostle most evidently uses it in v. 23.

22. I delight in the law of God after the inward man. Every Jew, and every unregenerate man, who receives the Old Testament as a revelation from God must acknowledge the great purity, excellence, and utility of its maxims, though he will ever find that without the grace of our Lord Jesus he can never act according to those heavenly maxims; and without the mercy of God, can never be redeemed from the curse entailed upon him for his past transgressions. To say that the inward man means the regenerate part of the soul is supportable by no argument. If it be said that it is impossible for an unregenerate man to delight in the law of God, the experience of millions contradicts the assertion. Every true penitent admires the moral law, longs most earnestly for a conformity to it, and feels that he can never be satisfied till he

I see another law in my members warring against the law of my mind, v. 23. Christ having set up his throne in his heart, it was only the rebellious members of the body that were the instruments of sin—all that corrupt nature which is the seat not only of sensual but of more refined lusts. This wars against the law of the mind, the new nature, to which corrupt disposition and inclination are as great a burden and grief as the worst drudgery and captivity could be. It brings me into captivity.

ALBERT BARNES:

"The body of this death." Marg., "this body of death." The word "body" here is probably used as equivalent to "flesh," denoting the corrupt and evil propensities of the soul. It is thus used to denote the law of sin in the members as being that with which the apostle was struggling, and from which he desired to be delivered. The expression "body of this death" is a Hebraism, denoting a body deadly in its tendency; and the whole expression may mean the corrupt principles of man; the carnal, evil affections that lead to death or to condemnation. The expression is one of vast strength, and strongly characteristic of the apostle Paul. It indicates that it was near him, attending him, and was distressing in its nature. And it indicates an earnest wish to be delivered from it. Some have supposed that he refers to a custom practiced by ancient tyrants, of binding a dead body to a captive as a punishment, and compelling him to drag the cumbersome amd offensive burden with him wherever he went. I do not see any evidence that the apostle had this in view. But such a fact may be used as a striking and perhaps not improper illustration of the meaning of the apostle here. No strength of words could express deeper feeling; none more feelingly indicate the necessity of the grace of God to accomplish that to which the unaided human powers are incompetent.

—Popular Commentary

His general complaint we have v. 24, O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death? The thing he complains of is a body of death; either the body of flesh, which is a mortal dying body, or the body of sin, the corrupt nature, which tends to death. It was as troublesome to Paul as if he had had a dead body tied to him. This made him cry out, O wretched man that I am! Had I been required to speak of Paul, I should have said, "O blessed man that thou art." But in his own account he was a wretched man, because of the corruption of nature. Who shall deliver me? He speaks like one that was sick of it. The remainders of indwelling sin are a very grievous burden to a gracious soul.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

23. But I see another—it should be 'a different'—law in my members—see on vs. 5—warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members—In this important verse, observe, first, that the word "law" means an inward principle of action, good or evil, operating with the fixedness and regularity of a law. The apostle found two such laws within him; the one "the law of sin in his members," called (in Gal. 5:17, 24) "the flesh which lusteth against the spirit," "the flesh with the affections and lusts," i.e., the sinful principle in the regenerate; the other, "the law of the mind," or the holy principle of the renewed nature. Second, when the apostle says he "sees" the one of these principles "warring against" the other, and "bringing him into captivity" to itself, he is not referring to any actual rebellion going on within him while he was writing, or to any captivity to his own lusts then existing. He is simply describing the two conflicting principles, and pointing out what it was the inherent property of each to aim at bringing about. Third, when the apostle describes himself as "brought into captivity" by the triumph of the sinful principle of his nature, he clearly speaks in the person of a renewed man. Men do not feel themselves to be in captivity in the territories of their own sovereign and associated with their own friends, breathing a congenial atmosphere, and acting quite spontaneously. But here the apostle describes himself, when drawn under the power of his sinful nature, as forcibly seized and reluctantly dragged to his enemy's camp, from which he would gladly make his escape. This ought to settle the question, whether he is here speaking as a regenerate man or the reverse.

O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?—The apostle speaks of the "body" here with reference to "the law of sin" which he had said was "in his members," but merely as the instrument by which the sin of the heart finds vent in action, and as itself the seat of the lower appetites (see on ch. 6:6, and on vs 5); and he calls it "the body of this death," as feeling, at the moment when he wrote, the horrors of that death (ch. 6:21, and vs. 5) into which it dragged him down. But the language is not that of a sinner newly awakened to the sight of his lost state; it is the cry of a living but agonized believer, weighed down under a burden which is not himself, but which he longs to shake off from his renewed self. Nor does the question imply ignorance of the way of relief at the time referred to. It was designed only to prepare the way for that outburst of thankfulness for the divinely provided remedy which immediately follows. 25. I thank God—the Source—through Jesus Christ—the Channel of deliverance. So then—to sum up the whole matter—with the mind—the mind indeed—I myself serve the law of God, but with the flesh the law of sin—'Such then is the unchanging character of these two principles within me. God's holy law is dear to my renewed mind, and has the willing service of my new man; although that corrupt nature which still remains in me listens to the dictates of sin.' Note (1) This whole chapter was of essential service to the Reformers in their contendings with the Church of Rome. When the divines of that corrupt church, in a Pelagian spirit, denied that the sinful principle in our fallen nature, which they called 'Concupiscence,' and which is commonly called 'Original Sin,' had the nature of sin at all, they were triumphantly answered from this chapter, where—both in the first section of it, which speaks of it in the unregenerate, and in the second, which treats of its awakes up after this divine likeness; and he hates himself because he feels that he has broken it, and that his evil passions are still in a state of hostility to it.

23. But I see another law in my members. Though the person in question is more or less under the continual influence of reason and conscience, which offer constant testimony against sin, yet as long as help is sought only from the law, and the grace of Christ in the gospel is not received, the remonstrances of reason and conscience are rendered of no effect by the prevalence of sinful passions; which, from repeated gratifications, have acquired all the force of habit, and now give law to the whole carnal man. Warring against the law of my mind. There is an allusion here to the case of a city besieged, at last taken by storm, and the inhabitants carried away into captivity; carrying on a system of warfare; laying continual siege to the soul; repeating incessantly its attacks; harassing, battering, and storming the spirit; and, by all these assaults, reducing the man to extreme misery. Never was a picture more impressively drawn and more effectually finished; for the next sentence shows that this spiritual city was at last taken by storm, and the inhabitants who survived the sackage led into the most shameful, painful, and oppressive captivity. Bringing me into captivity to the law of sin. He does not here speak of an occasional advantage gained by sin; it was a complete and final victory gained by corruption, which, having stormed and reduced the city, carried away the inhabitants with irresistible force into captivity. This is the consequence of being overcome; he was now in the hands of the foe, as the victor's lawful captive. This is the import of the original word, and is the very term used by our Lord when speaking of the final ruin, dispersion, and captivity of the Jews. He says, "They . . . shall be led away captive into all nations," Luke xxi. 24. When all this is considered, who, in his right mind, can apply it to the holy soul of the apostle of the Gentiles? Is there anything in it that can belong to his gracious state? Surely nothing. The basest slave of sin, who has any remaining checks of conscience, cannot be brought into a worse state than that described here by the apostle. Sin and corruption have a final triumph; and conscience and reason are taken prisoners, laid in fetters, and sold for slaves. Can this ever be said of a man in whom the Spirit of God dwells, and whom the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus has made free from the law of sin and death? See chap. viii. 2.

24. O wretched man that I am! This affecting account is finished more impressively by the groans of the wounded captive. Having long maintained a useless conflict against innumerable hosts and irresistible might, he is at last wounded and taken prisoner; and to render his state more miserable, is not only encompassed by the slaughtered, but chained to a dead body; for there seems to be here an allusion to an ancient custom of certain tyrants, who bound a dead body to a living man, and obliged him to carry it about, till the contagion from the putrid mass took away his life! Virgil paints this in all its horrors in the account he gives of the tyrant Mezentius. We may naturally suppose that the cry of such a person would be, "Wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from this dead body?" And how well does this apply to the case of the person to whom the apostle refers! A body—a whole mass of sin and corruption, was bound to his soul with chains which he could not break; and the mortal contagion, transfused through his whole nature, was pressing him down to the bitter pains of an eternal death. He now finds that the law can afford him no deliverance, and he despairs of help from any human being. But while he is emitting his last or almost expiring groan, the redemption by Christ Jesus is proclaimed to him; and, if the apostle refers to his own case, Ananias unexpectedly accosts him with—"Brother Saul, the Lord . . . Jesus, that appeared unto thee in the way . . . hath sent me [unto thee], that thou mightest receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost." He sees then an open door of hope, and he immediately, though but in the prospect of this deliverance, returns God thanks for the well-grounded hope

His great comfort lay in Jesus Christ (v. 25) I thank God, through Jesus Christ our Lord. In the midst of his complaints he breaks out into praises. It is a special remedy against fears and sorrows to be much in praise: many a poor, drooping soul hath found it so. Who shall deliver me? says he (v. 24), as one at a loss for help. At length he finds an all-sufficient friend, even Jesus Christ. If it were not for Christ, this iniquity that dwells in us would certainly be our ruin. It is Christ that has purchased deliverance for us in due time. Blessed be God that giveth us this victory through our Lord Jesus Christ!

With the mind I myself serve the law of God, v. 25. It is not enough to consent to the law, and to delight in the law, but we must serve the law. Thus it was with Paul's mind; this it is with every sanctified renewed mind.

presence and actings in believers—it is explicitly, emphatically, and repeatedly called "sin." As such, they held it to be damnable. (See the Confessions both of the Lutheran and Reformed churches.) In the following century, the orthodox in Holland had the same controversy to wage with 'the Remonstrants' (the followers of Arminius), and they waged it on the field of this chapter. (2) Here we see that Inability is consistent with Accountability. (See vs. 18; Gal. 5:17.) "As the Scriptures constantly recognize the truth of these two things, so are they constantly united in Christian experience. Everyone feels that he cannot do the things that he would, yet is sensible that he is guilty for not doing them. Let any man test his power by the requisition to love God perfectly at all times. Alas! how entire our inability! Yet how deep our self-loathing and self-condemnation!" [HODGE]. (3) If the first sight of the Cross by the eye of faith kindles feelings never to be forgotten, and in one sense never to be repeated—like the first view of an enchanting landscape—the experimental discovery, in the latter stages of the Christian life, of its power to beat down and mortify inveterate corruption, to cleanse and heal from longcontinued backslidings and frightful inconsistencies, and so to triumph over all that threatens to destroy those for whom Christ died, as to bring them safe over the tempestuous seas of this life into the haven of eternal rest—is attended with yet more heart-affecting wonder draws forth deeper thankfulness, and issues in more exalted adoration of Him whose work Salvation is from first to last (vss. 24, 25). (4) It is sad when such topics as these are handled as mere questions of biblical interpretation or systematic theology. Our great apostle could not treat of them apart from personal experience, of which the facts of his own life and the feelings of his own soul furnished him with illustrations as lively as they were apposite. When one is unable to go far into the investigation of indwelling sin, without breaking out into an, "O wretched man that I am!" and cannot enter on the way of relief without exclaiming "I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord," he will find his meditations rich in fruit to his own soul, and may expect, through Him who presides in all such matters, to kindle in his readers or hearers the like blessed emotions (vss. 24, 25). So be it even now, O Lord!

which he has of salvation "through Jesus Christ our Lord."

25. I thank God through Jesus Christ. Instead of I thank God, several excellent MSS., with the Vulgate, some copies of the Itala, and several of the fathers, read "the grace of God," or "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ"; this is an answer to the almost despairing question in the preceding verse. The whole, therefore, may be read thus: "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" ANSWER—"The grace of God through our Lord Jesus Christ." Thus we find that a case of the kind described by the apostle in the preceding verses, whether it were his own before he was brought to the knowledge of Christ, particularly during the three days that he was at Damascus, without being able to eat or drink, in deep penitential sorrow, or whether he personates a Pharisaic yet conscientious Jew deeply concerned for his salvation—I say, we find that such a case can be relieved by the gospel of Christ only; or, in other words, that no scheme of redemption can be effectual to the salvation of any soul, whether Jew or Gentile, but that laid down in the gospel of Christ. So then with the mind I myself serve the law of God. That this clause contains the inference from the preceding train of argumentation appears evident from the therefore with which the apostle introduces it. As if he had said: "To conclude, the sum of what I have advanced concerning the power of sin in the carnal man and the utter insufficiency of all human means and legal observances to pardon sin and expel the corruption of the heart is this: that the very same person, the 'the same I,' while without the gospel, under the killing power of the law, will find in himself two opposite principles, the one subscribing to and approving the law of God and the other, notwithstanding, bringing him into captivity to sin. His 'inward man,' his rational powers and conscience, will assent to the justice and propriety of the requisitions of the law; and yet, notwithstanding this, his fleshly appetites, the 'law in his members,' will 'war against the law of his mind,' and continue, till he receives the gospel of Christ, to keep him in the galling captivity of sin and death."

Verses 1–9

I. The apostle here begins with one signal privilege of true Christians, and describes the character of those to whom it belongs: There is therefore now no condemnation to those that are in Christ Jesus, v. 1. This is his triumph after that melancholy complaint and conflict. The complaint he takes to himself, but humbly transfers the comfort to all true believers. It is the unspeakable privilege of all those that are in Christ Jesus that there is therefore now no condemnation to them. He does not say, "There is no accusation against them", for this there is; but the accusation is thrown out. He does not say, "There is nothing in them that deserves condemnation", for this there is, and they see it, and own it; but it shall not be their ruin. He does not say, "There is no cross, no affliction to them", for this there may be; but no condemnation. Now this arises from their being in Christ Jesus; by virtue of their union with him through faith they are thus secured. It is the undoubted character of all those who are so in Christ Jesus that they walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit. The character is given from their walk, not from any one particular act.

CHAPTER 8

Vss. 1-39. CONCLUSION OF THE WHOLE ARGUMENT—THE GLORIOUS COMPLETENESS OF THEM THAT ARE IN CHRIST JESUS. In this surpassing chapter the several streams of the preceding argument meet and flow in one "river of the water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb," until it seems to lose itself in the ocean of a blissful eternity.

FIRST: The Sanctification of Believers (vss. 1-13). 1. There is therefore now . . .—referring to the immediately preceding context [OLSHAUSEN, PHILIPPI, MEYER, ALFORD, etc.]. The subject with which ch. 7 concludes is still under consideration. The scope of the four opening verses is to show how "the law of sin and death" is deprived of its power to bring believers again into bondage, and how the holy law of God receives in them the homage of a living obedience [CALVIN, FRASER, PHILIPPI, MEYER, ALFORD, etc.]. no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus—As Christ, who "knew no sin," was, to all legal effects, "made sin for us," so are we, who believe in Him, to all legal effects, "made the righteousness of God in Him" (II Cor. 5:21); and thus, one with Him in the divine reckoning, there is to such "NO CONDEMNATION." (Cf. John 3:18; 5:24; ch. 5:18, 19.) But this is no mere legal arrangement: it is a union in life; believers, through the indwelling of Christ's Spirit in them, having one life with Him, as truly as the head and the members of the same body have one life. who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit—The evidence of MSS. seems to show that this clause formed no part of the original text of this verse, but that the first part of it was early introduced, and the second later, from vs. 4, probably as an explanatory comment, and to make the transition to vs. 2 easier.

1. There is therefore now no condemnation. To do justice to Paul's reasoning, this chapter must be read in the closest connection with the preceding. There we have seen the unavailing struggles of an awakened Jew, who sought pardon and holiness from that law which he was conscious he had broken; and in which he could find no provision for pardon, and no power to sanctify. This conviction having brought him to the very brink of despair, and being on the point of giving up all hope, he hears of redemption by Jesus Christ, thanks God for the prospect he has of salvation, applies for and receives it, and now magnifies God for the unspeakable gift of which he has been made a partaker. Those who restrain the word now, so as to indicate by it the gospel dispensation only, do not take in the whole of the apostle's meaning. The apostle has not been dealing in general matters only, but also in those which are particular. He has not been pointing out merely the difference between the two dispensations, the Mosaic and the Christian; but he marks out the state of a penitent under the former and that of a believer under the latter. The last chapter closed with an account of his salvation. The now, therefore, in the text must refer more to the happy transition from darkness to light, from condemnation to pardon, which this believer now enjoys, than to the Christian dispensation taking the place of the Jewish economy. Who walk not after the flesh. In this one verse we find the power and virtue of the gospel scheme. It pardons and sanctifies; the Jewish law could do neither. By faith in our Lord Jesus Christ the penitent, condemned by the law, is pardoned; the carnal man, laboring under the overpowering influence of the sin of his nature, is sanctified. He is first freely justified; he feels no condemnation. He is fully sanctified; he walks not after the flesh, but after the spirit. This last clause is wanting in the principal MSS.,

MATTHEW HENRY

II. How we come by this great privilege, and how we may answer this character.

1. How we come by these privileges—the privilege of justification, the privilege of sanctification. The law could not do it, v. 3. It could neither justify nor sanctify. The law made nothing perfect: It was weak. Yet that weakness was not through any defect in the law, but through the flesh, through the corruption of human nature. In case of failure, the law, as a covenant of works, made no provision, and so left us as it found us. The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus does it, v. 2. The covenant of grace in Christ is a treasury of merit and grace, and thence we receive pardon and a new nature, are freed from the law of sin and death, both from the guilt and power of sin. We are under another covenant, under the law of the Spirit, the law that gives the Spirit, spiritual life to qualify us for eternal.

The foundation of this freedom is laid in Christ's undertaking for us, of which he speaks, v. 3, God sending his own Son. When the law failed, God provided another method. Christ comes to do that which the law could not do.

The best exposition of this verse we have Heb. x. 1–10. (1) How Christ appeared: In the likeness of sinful flesh. Not sinful, but in the likeness of that flesh. He took upon him that nature which was corrupt, though perfectly abstracted from the corruptions of it. It was great condescension that he who was God should be made in the likeness of flesh; but much greater that he who was holy should be made in the likeness of sinful flesh. And for sin. God sent him in the likeness of sinful flesh, and as a sacrifice for sin.

(2) What was done by this appearance of his: Sin was condemned. For all that are Christ's both the damning and the domineering power of sin is broken. Though it live and remain, its life in the saints is still but like that of a condemned malefactor. The condemning of sin saved the sinner from condemnation. Christ was made sin for us (2 Cor. v. 21). When he was condemned, sin was condemned in the flesh of Christ. So was satisfaction made to divine justice, and way made for the salvation of the sinner.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

2. For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free—rather, 'freed me'—referring to the time of his conversion, when first he believed—from the law of sin and death—It is the Holy Ghost who is here called "the Spirit of life," as opening up in the souls of believers a fountain of spiritual life (see on John 7:38, 39); just as He is called "the Spirit of truth," as "guiding them into all truth" (John 16:13), and "the Spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge and the fear of the Lord" (Isa. 11:2), as the inspirer of these qualities. And He is called "the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus," because it is as members of Christ that He takes up His abode in believers, who in consequence of this have one life with their Head. And as the word "law" here has the same meaning as in ch. 7:23, namely, 'an inward principle of action, operating with the fixedness and regularity of a law,' it thus appears that "the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus" here means, 'that new principle of action which the Spirit of Christ has opened up within us—the law of our new being.' This "sets us free," as soon as it takes possession of our inner man, "from the law of sin and death" i.e., from the enslaving power of that corrupt principle which carries death in its bosom. The "strong man armed" is overpowered by the "stronger than he"; the weaker principle is dethroned and expelled by the more powerful; the principle of spiritual life prevails against and brings into captivity the principle of spiritual death—"leading captivity captive." If this be the apostle's meaning, the whole verse is to this effect: That the triumph of believers over their inward corruption, through the power of Christ's Spirit in them, proves them to be in Christ Jesus, and as such absolved from condemnation. But this is now explained more fully. 3, 4. For what the law could not do . . .—a difficult and much controverted verse. But it is clearly, we think, the law's inability to free us from the dominion of sin that the apostle has in view; as has partly appeared already (see on vs. 2), and will more fully appear presently. The law could irritate our sinful nature into more virulent action, as we have seen in ch. 7:5, but it could not secure its own fulfilment. How that is accomplished comes now to be shown. in that it was weak through the flesh—i.e., having to address itself to us through a corrupt nature, too strong to be influenced by mere commands and threatenings. God . . .—The sentence is somewhat imperfect in its structure, which occasions a certain obscurity. The meaning is, that whereas the law was powerless to secure its own fulfilment for the reason given, God took the method now to be described for attaining that end. sending—'having sent'—his own Son—This and similar expressions plainly imply that Christ was God's "OWN SON" before He was sent—that is, in His own proper Person, and independently of His mission and appearance in the flesh (see on ch. 8:32; Gal. 4:4); and if so, He not only has the very nature of God, even as a son of his father, but is essentially of the Father, though in a sense too mysterious for any language of ours properly to define (see on ch. 1-4). And this peculiar relationship is put forward here to enhance the greatness and define the nature of the relief provided, as coming from beyond the precincts of sinful humanity altogether, yea, immediately from the Godhead itself. in the likeness of sinful flesh—lit., "of the flesh of sin"; a very remarkable and pregnant expression. He was made in the reality of our flesh, but only in the likeness of its sinful condition. He took our nature as it is in us, compassed with infirmities, with nothing to distinguish Him as man from sinful men, save that He was without sin. Nor does this mean that He took our nature with all its properties save one; for sin is no property of humanity at all, but only the disordered state of our souls, as the fallen family of Adam; a disorder affecting, indeed, and overspreading our entire nature, but still purely our own. and for sin—lit., 'and about sin'; i.e., 'on the business of sin.' The expression is purposely a general one, because the design was not to speak of Christ's mission to atone for sin, but in virtue of that atonement to destroy its dominion and extirpate it altogether from believers. We think it wrong, therefore, to render the words (as in Margin) 'by a sacrifice for sin' (suggested by the language of the LXX and approved by CALVIN, etc.); for this sense is too definite, and makes the idea of expiation more prominent than it is. condemned sin—'condemned it to lose its power over men [BEZA, BENGEL, FRASER, MEYER, THOLUCK, PHILIPPI, ALFORD]. In this glorious sense our Lord says of His approaching death (John 12:31), "Now is the judgment of this world; now shall the prince of this world be cast out", and versions, and fathers. It was probably to make the thing more obvious that this explanatory clause was added by some copyist, for it does not appear to have made an original part of the text; and it is most likely that it was inserted here from the fourth verse.

2. For the law of the Spirit of life. The gospel of the grace of Christ, which is not only a law or rule of life, but affords that sovereign energy by which guilt is removed from the conscience, the power of sin broken, and its polluting influence removed from the heart. Most people allow that Paul is here speaking of his own state; and this state is so totally different from that described in the preceding chapter that it is absolutely impossible that they should have been the state of the same being at one and the same time.

3. For what the law could not do. The law could not pardon; the law could not sanctify; the law could not dispense with its own requisitions; it is the rule of righteousness, and therefore must condemn unrighteousness. This is its unalterable nature. Had there been perfect obedience to its dictates, instead of condemning, it would have applauded and rewarded; but as the flesh, the carnal and rebellious principle, had prevailed, and transgression had taken place, it was rendered weak, inefficient to undo this work of the flesh, and bring the sinner into a state of pardon and acceptance with God.

God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh. Did that which the law could not do; i.e., purchased pardon for the sinner, and brought every believer into the favor of God. And this is effected by the incarnation of Christ. He in whom dwelt the fullness of the Godhead bodily took upon Him the likeness of sinful flesh, that is, a human body like ours, but not sinful as ours; and for sin, "and as a sacrifice for sin" (this is the sense of the word in a multitude of places); condemned sin in the flesh—condemned that to death and destruction which had condemned us to both.

Condemned sin in the flesh. The design and object of the incarnation and sacrifice of Christ was to condemn sin, to have it executed and destroyed; not to tolerate it as some think, or to render it subservient to the purposes of His grace, as others; but to annihilate its power, guilt, and being in the soul of a believer.

MATTHEW HENRY

(3) The happy effect of this upon us (v. 4): That the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us. A righteousness of satisfaction for the breach of the law is fulfilled by the imputation of Christ's perfect righteousness. A righteousness of obedience to the law is fulfilled in us, when by the Spirit the law of love is written upon the heart, and that love is the fulfilling of the law, ch. xiii. 10. Us who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit. This is the description of all those that are interested in this privilege.

2. How we may answer to this character, v. 5, &c.

(1) By looking to our minds. By examining what we mind, the things of the flesh or the things of the spirit. The favour of God, the welfare of the soul, the concerns of eternity, are the things of the Spirit. The man is as the mind is. The mind is the forge of thoughts. Which way do the thoughts move with most pleasure? The mind is the seat of wisdom. Whether are we more wise for the world or for our souls? They savour the things of the flesh; so the word is rendered, Matt. xvi. 23. It is a great matter what truths, what tidings, what comforts, we do most relish. Now, to caution us against this carnal-mindedness, he shows the great misery of it, and compares it with the unspeakable comfort of spiritual-mindedness. [1] It is death, v. 6. It is the death of the soul; for it is its alienation from God, in union and communion with whom the life of the soul consists. A carnal soul is a dead soul, dead as a soul can die. Death includes all misery; carnal souls are miserable souls. But to be spiritually minded is life and peace. A sanctified soul is a living soul, and that life is peace; it is a very comfortable life. It is life and peace in the other world, as well as in this. Spiritual-mindedness is eternal life and peace begun. [2] It is enmity to God (v. 7) and this is worse than the former. The former speaks the carnal sinner a dead man, but this speaks him a devil of a man. It is not only the alienation of the soul from God, but the opposition of the soul against God. To prove this, he urges that it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. The holiness of the law of God, and the unholiness of the carnal mind, are as irreconcilable as light and darkness. The carnal man may, by the power of divine grace, be made subject to the law of God, but the carnal mind never can; this must be broken and expelled. Hence he infers (v. 8), Those that are in the flesh cannot please God. Pleasing God is our highest end, of which those that are in the flesh cannot but fall short; they cannot please him, nay, they cannot but displease him.

(2) By enquiring whether we have the Spirit of God and Christ, or not (v. 9): You are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit. It denotes our being overcome and subdued by one of these principles. Now the great question is whether we are in the flesh or in the Spirit; and how may we come to know it? Why, by enquiring whether the Spirit of God dwell in us. The Spirit visits many that are unregenerate; but in all that are sanctified he dwells. Shall we put this question to our own hearts, Who dwells, who rules, who keeps house, here? To this he subjoins a general rule of trial: If any man has not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his. To be Christ's is a privilege and honour which many pretend to that have no part nor lot in the matter. None are his but those that have his Spirit; that are spirited as he was spirited. The frame and disposition of our souls must be conformable to Christ's pattern. That are actuated and guided by the Holy Spirit of God. Having the Spirit of Christ is the same with having the Spirit of God to dwell in us. All that are actuated by the Spirit of God as their rule are conformable to the spirit of Christ as their pattern.

Two more excellent benefits, which belong to true believers.

I. Life. The happiness is not barely a negative happiness, not to be condemned; but it is positive (v. 10, 11): If Christ be in you. Now we are here told what becomes of the bodies and souls of those in whom Christ is.

1. We cannot say but that the body is dead; it is a frail, mortal, dying body. In the midst of life we are in death: be our bodies ever so strong, they are as good as dead, and this because of sin. It is sin that kills the body. Methinks, were there no other argument, love to our bodies should make us hate sin, because it is such an enemy to our bodies.

2. But the spirit, that is life. The life of the saint lies in the soul, while the life of the sinner goes no further than the body. When the body dies the spirit is life. Death to the saints is but the freeing of the heaven-born spirit from the clog and load of this body, that it may be fit to partake of eternal life. And this because of righteousness. The righteousness again (see on John 16:11), "When He (the Spirit) shall come, He shall convince the world of . . . judgment, because the prince of this world is judged," i.e., condemned to let go his hold of men, who, through the Cross, shall be emancipated into the liberty and power to be holy. in the flesh—i.e., in human nature, henceforth set free from the grasp of sin. That the righteousness of the law—'the righteous demand', 'the requirement' [ALFORD], or 'the precept' of the law; for it is not precisely the word so often used in this Epistle to denote 'the righteousness which justifies' (ch. 1:17; 3:21; 4:5, 6; 5:17, 18, 21), but another form of the same word, intended to express the enactment of the law, meaning here, we believe, the practical obedience which the law calls for. might be fulfilled in us—or, as we say, 'realized in us.' who walk—the most ancient expression of the bent of one's life, whether in the direction of good or of evil (Gen. 48:15; Ps. 1:1; Isa. 2:5; Mic. 4:5; Eph. 4:17; I John 1:6, 7). not after—i.e., according to the dictates of—the flesh, but after the spirit—From vs. 9 it would seem that what is more immediately intended by "the spirit" here is our own mind as renewed and actuated by the Holy Ghost. 5. For they that are after the flesh—i.e., under the influence of the fleshly principle—do mind—give their attention to (Phil. 3:19)—the things of the flesh . . .—Men must be under the predominating influence of one or other of these two principles, and, according as the one or the other has the mastery, will be the complexion of their life, the character of their actions. 6. For—a mere particle of transition here [THOLUCK], like 'but' or 'now.' to be carnally minded—lit., 'the mind' or 'minding of the flesh' (Margin); i.e., the pursuit of fleshly ends. is death—not only 'ends in' [ALFORD, etc.], but even now 'is'; carrying death into its bosom, so that such are "dead while they live" (I Tim. 5:6; Eph. 2:1, 5) [PHILIPPI]. but to be spiritually minded—'the mind' or 'minding of the spirit'; i.e., the pursuit of spiritual objects. is life and peace—not "life" only, in contrast with the "death" that is in the other pursuit, but "peace"; it is the very element of the soul's deepest repose and true bliss. 7. Because the carnal mind is enmity against God—The desire and pursuit of carnal ends is a state of enmity to God, wholly incompatible with true life and peace in the soul. for it is not subject—'doth not submit itself'—to the law of God, neither indeed can be—In such a state of mind there neither is nor can be the least subjection to the law of God. Many things may be done which the law requires, but nothing either is or can be done because God's law requires it, or purely to please God. 8. So then—nearly equivalent to 'And so.' they that are in—and, therefore, under the government of—the flesh cannot please God—having no obediential principle, no desire to please Him. 9. But ye are not in the flesh, but in the spirit, if so be that the Spirit of God dwell in you—This does not mean, 'if the disposition or mind of God dwell in you; but 'if the Holy Ghost dwell in you' (see I Cor. 6:11, 19; 3:16, etc.). (It thus appears that to be "in the spirit" means here to be under the dominion of our own renewed mind; because the indwelling of God's Spirit is given as the evidence that we are "in the spirit.") Now—'But'—if any man have not the Spirit of Christ—Again, this does not mean 'the disposition or mind of Christ,' but the Holy Ghost; here called "the Spirit of Christ," just as He is called "the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus" (see on vs. 2). It is as "the Spirit of Christ" that the Holy Ghost takes possession of believers, introducing into them all the gracious, dovelike disposition which dwelt in Him (Matt. 3:16; John 3:34). Now if any man's heart be void, not of such dispositions, but of the blessed Author of them, "the Spirit of Christ"—he is none of his—even though intellectually convinced of the truth of Christianity, and in a general sense influence by its spirit. Sharp, solemn statement this! 10, 11. And if Christ be in you—by His indwelling Spirit in virtue of which we have one life with him. the body—'the body indeed.' is dead because of—'by reason of'—sin; but the spirit is life because—or, 'by reason'—of righteousness—The word 'indeed,' which the original requires, is of the nature of a concession—'I grant you that the body is dead . . . and so far redemption is incomplete, but . . .'; i.e., 'If Christ be in you by His indwelling Spirit, though your "bodies" have to pass through the stage of "death" in consequence of the first Adam's "sin," your spirit is instinct with new and undying "life," brought in by the "righteousness" of the second Adam' [THOLUCK, MEYER, and ALFORD in part, but only HODGE entirely]. But—'And'—if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you—i.e., 'If He

ADAM CLARKE

4. That the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us. That the guilt might be pardoned through the merit of that sacrifice; and that we might be enabled, by the power of His own grace and Spirit, to walk in newness of life; loving God with all our heart, soul, mind, and strength, and our neighbor as ourselves. And thus the righteousness, the spirit, design, and purpose of the law are fulfilled in us, through the strength of the Spirit of Christ, which is here put in opposition to the weakness of the law through the flesh.

5. For they that are after the flesh. Here is the great distinction between Jews and genuine Christians: the former are after the flesh, are under the power of the carnal, rebellious principle; and consequently mind, "relish," the things of the flesh, the things which appertain merely to the present life, having no relish for spiritual and eternal things. But they that are after the Spirit. They who are regenerated, who are born of the Spirit, being redeemed from the influence and law of the carnal mind; these relish the things of the Spirit—they are spiritually minded, and pass through things temporal, so as not to lose the things which are eternal.

6. For to be carnally minded is death. To live under the influence of the carnal mind is to live in the state of condemnation, and consequently liable to death eternal; whereas, on the contrary, he who is spiritually minded has the life and peace of God in his soul, and is in full prospect of life eternal.

7. Because the carnal mind is enmity against God. Because it is a carnal mind, and relishes earthly and sinful things, and lives in opposition to the pure and holy law of God, therefore, it is enmity against God; it is irreconcilable and implacable hatred. It is not subject to the law of God. It will come under no obedience, for it is sin, and the very principle of rebellion; and therefore it cannot be subject, nor subjected, for it is essential to sin to show itself in rebellion; and when it ceases to rebel, it ceases to be sin. From this we learn that the design of God in the economy of the gospel is not to weaken, curtail, or lay the carnal principle in bonds, but to destroy it. As it is not subject, and cannot be subject, to the law of God, it must be destroyed, else it will continue to rebel against God.

8. So then. Because this carnal mind is enmity against God, they that are in the flesh, who are under the power of the workings of this carnal mind (which every soul is that has not received redemption in the blood of the Lamb), cannot please God, because of the rebellious workings of this principle of rebellion and hatred. And if they cannot please God, they must be displeasing to Him, and consequently in the broad road to final perdition.

9. But ye are not in the flesh. You Christians, who have believed in Christ Jesus as the Sin Offering which has condemned sin in the flesh, and having been justified by faith and made partakers of the Holy Spirit, are enabled to walk in newness of life. If so be that the Spirit of God dwell in you. Or "seeing that" the Spirit of God dwelleth in you. The flesh, the sinful principle, dwelt in them before, and its motions were the proofs of its indwelling; but now the Spirit dwells in them, and His testimony in their conscience and His powerful operations in their hearts are the proofs of His indwelling.

10. And if Christ be in you. This is the criterion by which you may judge of the state of grace in which you stand. If Christ dwell in your hearts by faith, the body is dead because of sin, "in reference to sin"; the members of your body no more perform the work of sin than the body of a dead man does the functions of natural life. Or the apostle may mean that although because of sin the life of man is forfeited and the sentence, "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return," must be fulfilled on every human being, until the judgment of the great day, yet their souls being quickened by the indwelling Spirit of Christ, which enables them to live a life of righteousness, they receive a full assurance that their bodies, which are now condemned to death because of sin, shall be raised again to a life of immortal glory.

of Christ imputed to them secures the soul from death; the righteousness of Christ inherent in them, preserves it, and at death elevates it, and makes it meet to partake of the inheritance of the saints in light.

3. There is a life reserved too for the poor body at last: He shall also quicken your mortal bodies, v. 11. The body shall be reunited to the soul, and clothed with a glory agreeable to it. Two great assurances of the resurrection of the body are mentioned: (1) The resurrection of Christ: He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken. Christ rose as the forerunner of all the saints, 1 Cor. xv. 20. It is in the virtue of Christ's resurrection that we shall rise. (2) The indwelling of the Spirit. The same Spirit that raiseth the soul now will raise the body shortly: By his Spirit that dwelleth in you. The Spirit, breathing upon dead and dry bones, will make them live, and the saints even in their flesh shall see God. Hence the apostle infers how much it is our duty to walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit, v. 12, 13. Two motives he mentions here: [1] We are not debtors to the flesh. We are indeed bound to clothe, and feed, and take care of the body, as a servant to the soul in the service of God, but no further. We are not debtors to it. We are debtors to Christ and to the Spirit: there we owe our all. See 1 Cor. vi. 19, 20. [2] Consider what will be at the end of the way. If you live after the flesh, you shall die; that is, die eternally. Dying indeed is the soul's dying: the death of the saints is but a sleep. But, on the other hand, You shall live, that is the true life: If you through the Spirit mortify the deeds of the body. We cannot do it without the Spirit working it in us, and the Spirit will not do it without our doing our endeavour. We are put upon this dilemma, either to displease the body or destroy the soul.

II. The Spirit of adoption v. 14–16.

1. All that are Christ's are taken into the relation of children to God, v. 14. (1) Their property: They are led by the Spirit of God, not driven as beasts, but led as rational creatures. It is the undoubted character of all true believers that they are led by the Spirit of God. They do in their obedience follow that guidance, and are sweetly led into all truth and all duty. (2) Their privilege: They are the sons of God, owned and loved by him as his children.

2. And those that are the sons of God have the Spirit,

(1) To work in them the disposition of children. You have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear, v. 15. Understand it, First, Of that spirit of bondage which the Old Testament church was under, by reason of the darkness of that dispensation. You are not under that dispensation, you have not received that spirit. Secondly, Of that spirit of bondage which many of the saints themselves were under at their conversion. Then the Spirit himself was to the saints a spirit of bondage: "But," says the apostle, "with you this is over."

dwell in you as the Spirit of the Christ-raising One,' or, 'in all the resurrection-power which He put forth in raising Jesus.' he that raised up Christ from the dead—Observe the change of name from JESUS, as the historical Individual whom God raised from the dead, to CHRIST, the same Individual, considered as the Lord and Head of all His members, or of redeemed Humanity [ALFORD]. shall also quicken—rather, 'shall quicken even'—your mortal bodies by—the true reading appears to be 'by reason of'—his Spirit that dwelleth in you—; 'Your bodies indeed are not exempt from the death which sin brought in; but your spirits even now have in them an undying life, and if the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, even these bodies of yours, though they yield to the last enemy and the dust of them return to the dust as it was, shall yet experience the same resurrection as that of their living Head, in virtue of the indwelling of the same Spirit in you that quickened Him.' 12, 13. Therefore, brethren, we are debtors, not to the flesh, to live after the flesh—'Once we were sold under sin (ch. 7:14); but now that we have been set free from that hard master and become servants to Righteousness (ch. 6:22), we owe nothing to the flesh, we disown its unrighteous claims and are deaf to its imperious demands.' Glorious sentiment! For if ye live after the flesh, ye shall die—in the sense of ch. 6:21—but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body—see on ch. 7:23—ye shall live—in the sense of ch. 6:22. The apostle is not satisfied with assuring them that they are under no obligations to the flesh, to hearken to its suggestions, without reminding them where it will end if they do; and he uses the word "mortify" (put to death) as a kind of play upon the word "die" just before. 'If ye do not kill sin, it will kill you. But he tempers this by the bright alternative, that if they do, through the Spirit, mortify the deeds of the body, such a course will infallibly terminate in "life" everlasting. And this leads the apostle into a new line of thought, opening into his final subject, the "glory" awaiting the justified believer. Note (1) "There can be no safety, no holiness, no happiness, to those who are out of Christ: No safety, because all such are under the condemnation of the law (vs. 1); no holiness, because such only as are united to Christ have the spirit of Christ (vs. 9); no happiness, because to be 'carnally minded is death' (vs. 6)' [HODGE]. (2) The sanctification of believers, as it has its whole foundation in the atoning death, so it has its living spring in the indwelling of the Spirit of Christ (vss. 2-4). (3) "The bent of the thoughts, affections, and pursuits, is the only decisive test of character (vs. 5)" [HODGE]. (4) No human refinement of the carnal mind will make it spiritual, or compensate for the absence of spirituality. "Flesh" and "spirit" are essentially and unchangeably opposed; nor can the carnal mind, as such, be brought into real subjection to the law of God (vss. 5-7). Hence (5) the estrangement of God and the sinner is mutual. For as the sinner's state of mind is "enmity against God" (vs. 7), so in this state he "cannot please God" (vs. 8). (6) Since the Holy Ghost is, in the same breath, called indiscriminately "the Spirit of God," "the Spirit of Christ," and "Christ" Himself (as an indwelling life in believers), the essential unity and yet Personal distinctness of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, in the one adorable Godhead must be believed, as the only consistent explanation of such language (vss. 9-11). (7) The consciousness of spiritual life in our renewed souls is a glorious assurance of resurrection life in the body also, in virtue of the same quickening Spirit whose inhabitation we already enjoy (vs. 11). (8) Whatever professions of spiritual life men may make, it remains eternally true that "if we live after the flesh we shall die," and only "if we through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body we shall live" (vs. 13, and cf. Gal. 6:7, 8; Eph. 5:6; Phil. 3:18, 19; I John 3:7, 8).

SECOND: The Sonship of Believers—Their future Inheritance—The Intercession of the Spirit for Them (vss. 14-27). 14. For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they . . .—'these are sons of God'. Hitherto the apostle has spoken of the Spirit simply as a power through which believers mortify sin: now he speaks of Him as a gracious, loving Guide, whose "leading"—enjoyed by all in whom is the Spirit of God's dear Son—shows that they also are "sons of God." 15. For . . .—'For ye received not (at the time of your conversion) the spirit of bondage,' i.e., 'The spirit ye received was not a spirit of bondage.' again—gendering—to fear—as under the law which "worketh wrath", i.e., 'Such was your condition before ye believed, living in legal bondage, haunted with incessant forebodings under a 11. But if the Spirit. This verse confirms the sense given to the preceding. He who here receives the grace and Spirit of Christ, and continues to live under its influence a life of obedience to the divine will, shall have a resurrection.

12. Therefore, brethren. Dr. Taylor is of opinion that the apostle, having spoken separately to both Jews and Gentiles concerning holiness and the obligations to it, now addresses himself to both conjointly, and, (1) Draws the general conclusion from all his arguments upon this subject, v. 12. (2) Proves the validity of their claims to eternal life, vv. 14-17. (3) And as the affair of suffering persecution was a great stumbling block to the Jews, and might very much discourage the Gentiles, he introduces it to the best advantage, v. 17, and advances several arguments to fortify their minds under all trials: as (a) That they suffered with Christ; (b) In order to be glorified with Him in a manner which will infinitely compensate all sufferings, vv. 17-18. (c) All mankind are under various pressures, longing for a better state, vv. 19-22. (d) Many of the most eminent Christians are in the same distressed condition, v. 23. (e) According to the plan of the gospel, we are to be brought to glory after a course of patience exercised in a variety of trials, vv. 24-25. (f) The Spirit of God will supply patience to every upright soul under persecution and suffering, vv. 26-27. (g) All things, even the severest trials, shall work together for their good, v. 28. And this he proves by giving us a view of the several steps which the wisdom and goodness of God have settled in order to our complete salvation, vv. 29-30. Thence he passes to the affair of our perseverance, concerning which he concludes, from the whole of his preceding arguments, that as we are brought into a state of pardon by the free grace of God, through the death of Christ, who is now our Mediator in heaven, no possible cause, providing we continue to love and serve God, shall be able to pervert our minds or separate us from His love in Christ Jesus, vv. 31-39. Therefore is the grand inference from all that he has been arguing in relation to sanctity of life, both to the Gentiles, chap. vi, and to the Jews, chaps. vii and viii to this verse, where I suppose he begins to address himself to both, in a body, to the end of the chapter.

13. But if ye through the Spirit—if you seek that grace and spiritual help which the gospel of Christ furnishes—resist, and, by resisting, mortify the deeds of the flesh, against which the law gave you no assistance, ye shall live a life of faith, love, and holy obedience here, and a life of glory hereafter.

14. For as many as are led by the Spirit. No man who has not divine assistance can either find the way to heaven or walk in it when found. As Christ by His sacrificial offering has opened the kingdom of God to all believers, and as a Mediator transacts the concerns of their Kingdom before the throne, so the Spirit of God is the great Agent here below to enlighten, quicken, strengthen, and guide the true disciples of Christ; and all that are born of this Spirit are led and guided by Him, and none can pretend to be the children of God who are not thus guided.

15. Ye have not received the spirit of bondage. All that were under the law were under bondage to its rites and ceremonies; and as, through the prevalence of that corrupt nature with which every human being is polluted, and to remove which the law gave no assistance, they were often transgressing, consequently they had forfeited their lives, and were continually, through fear of death, subject to bondage, Heb. ii. 15. The believers in Christ Jesus were brought from under that law and from under its condemnation, and consequently were freed from its bondage.

MATTHEW HENRY

But you have received the Spirit of adoption. It is God's prerogative, when he adopts, to give a spirit of adoption—the nature of children. A sanctified soul bears the image of God, as the child bears the image of the father.

Whereby we cry, Abba, Father. Praying is here called crying. Children that cannot speak vent their desires by crying. Now, the Spirit teaches us in prayer to come to God as a Father. And why both, Abba, Father? Because Christ said so in prayer (Mark xiv. 36), Abba, Father. It denotes an affectionate endearing importunity. Little children, begging of their parents, can say little but Father, Father, and that is rhetoric enough. It also denotes that the adoption is common both to Jews and Gentiles.

(2) To witness to the relation of children, v. 16. Beareth witness with our spirit. Many speak peace to themselves to whom the God of heaven does not speak peace. But those that are sanctified have God's Spirit witnessing with their spirits. This testimony is always agreeable to the written word, and is therefore always grounded upon sanctification. The Spirit witnesses to none the privileges of chidren who have not the nature and disposition of children.

Verses 17-25

A fourth happiness of believers, namely, a title to the future glory. If children, then heirs, v. 17. In earthly inheritances this rule does not hold, only the first-born are heirs. Heaven is an inheritance that all the saints are heirs to. They do not come to it by any merit of their own; but as heirs, purely by the act of God. Their present state is a state of education and preparation for the inheritance. 1. Heirs of God. The Lord himself is the portion of the saints' inheritance. The vision of God and the fruition of God make up the inheritance the saints are heirs to. 2. Joint-heirs with Christ. True believers shall inherit all things. Those that now partake of the Spirit of Christ, as his brethren, shall partake of his glory. Lord, what is man, that thou shouldst thus magnify him! Now this future glory is the reward of present sufferings, the accomplishment of present hopes.

sense of unpardoned sin. But it was not to perpetuate that wretched state that ye received the Spirit.'

but ye have received—'ye received'—the spirit of adoption. whereby—rather, 'wherein'—we cry, Abba, Father—The word "cry" is emphatic, expressing the spontaneousness, the strength, and the exuberance of the final emotions. In Galatians 4:6 this cry is said to proceed from the Spirit in us, drawing forth the filial exclamation in our hearts. Here, it is said to proceed from our own hearts under the vitalizing energy of the Spirit, as the very element of the new life in believers (cf. Matt. 10:19, 20; and see on vs. 4). "Abba" is the Syro-Chaldaic word for "Father"; and the Greek word for that is added, not surely to tell the reader that both mean the same thing, but for the same reason which drew both words from the lips of Christ Himself during his agony in the garden (Mark 14:36). He, doubtless, loved to utter His Father's name in both the accustomed forms; beginning with His cherished mother tongue, and adding that of the learned. In this view the use of both words here has a charming simplicity and warmth.

16. The Spirit itself—It should be 'Himself' (see on vs. 26). beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children—'are children'—of God—The testimony of our own spirit is borne in that cry of conscious sonship, "Abba, Father"; but we are not therein alone; for the Holy Ghost within us, yea, even in that very cry which it is His to draw forth, sets His own distinct seal to ours; and thus, "in the mouth of two witnesses" the thing is established. The apostle had before called us "sons of God," referring to our adoption; here the word changes to "children," referring to our new birth. The one expresses the dignity to which we are admitted; the other the new life which we receive. The latter is more suitable here; because a son by adoption might not be heir of the property, whereas a son by birth certainly is, and this is what the apostle is now coming to.

17. And if children, then heirs—'heirs also'. heirs of God—of our Father's kingdom. and joint-heirs with Christ—as the "First-born among many brethren" (vs. 29), and as "Heir of all things."

ADAM CLARKE

But ye have received the Spirit of adoption. You are brought into the family of God by adoption; and the Agent that brought you into this family is the Holy Spirit; and this very Spirit continues to witness to you the grace in which you stand, by enabling you to call God your Father, with the utmost filial confidence and affection. The Spirit of adoption. Adoption was an act frequent among the ancient Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans, by which a person was taken out of one family and incorporated with another. Persons of property, who had no children of their own, adopted those of another family. The child thus adopted ceased to belong to his own family and was in every respect bound to the person who had adopted him, as if he were his own child, and in consequence of the death of his adopting father he possessed his estates. If a person after he had adopted a child happened to have children of his own, then the estate was equally divided between the adopted and real children. The Romans had regular forms of law by which all these matters were settled. Whereby we cry, Abba, Father. It has been remarked that slaves were not permitted to use the term Abba, father, or Imma, mother, in accosting their masters and mistresses. And from this some suppose that the apostle intimates that being now brought from under the spirit of bondage, in which they durst not call God their Father, they are not only brought into a new state, but have got that language which is peculiar to that state. Some have supposed that the apostle, by using the Syriac and Greek words which express Father, shows the union of Jewish and Gentile believers in those devotions which were dictated by a filial spirit. Others have thought that these were the first words which those generally uttered who were made partakers of the Holy Spirit. It is enough to know that it was the language of their sonship; and that it expressed the clear assurance they had of being received into the divine favor, the affection and gratitude they felt for this extraordinary blessing and their complete readiness to come under the laws and regulations of the family, and to live in the spirit of obedience.

16. The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit. "That same Spirit," the Spirit of adoption; that is, the Spirit who witnesses this adoption; which can be no other than the Holy Ghost himself, and certainly cannot mean any disposition or affection of mind which the adopted person may feel. With our spirit. In our understanding, the place or recipient of light and information, and the place or faculty to which such information can properly be brought. This is done that we may have the highest possible evidence of the work which God has wrought. As the window is the proper medium to let the light of the sun into our apartments, so the understanding is the proper medium of conveying the Spirit's influence to the soul. We therefore have the utmost evidence of the fact of our adoption which we can possibly have; we have the word and Spirit of God, and the word sealed on our spirit by the Spirit of God. And this is not a momentary influx. If we take care to walk with God and not grieve the Holy Spirit, we shall have an abiding testimony; and while we continue faithful to our adopting Father, the Spirit that witnesses that adoption will continue to witness it, and hereby we shall know that we are of God by the Spirit which He giveth us.

17. And if children, then heirs. For the legitimate children alone can inherit the estate. This is not an estate to which they succeed in consequence of the death of a former possessor; it is like the Promised Land, given by God himself, and divided among the children of the family. Heirs of God. It is neither an earthly portion nor a heavenly portion, but GOD himself, who is to be their Portion. It is not heaven they are to inherit; it is GOD, who is infinitely greater and more glorious than heaven itself. Joint-heirs with Christ. Partaking of the same eternal glory with the glorified human nature of Christ. If so be that we suffer with him. Observe, says Dr. Taylor, how prudently the apostle advances to the harsh affair of suffering. He does not mention it till he has raised up their thoughts to the highest object of joy and pleasure —the happiness and glory of a joint inheritance

I. The reward of the saints' present sufferings. If so be that we suffer with him (v. 17), or forasmuch as we suffer with him. The state of the church in this world always is an afflicted state. He tells them that they suffered with Christ, and should be glorified with him. Though we may be losers for him, we shall not be losers by him in the end. This the gospel is filled with the assurances of. He holds the balance (v. 18), in a comparison between the two. 1. In one scale he puts the sufferings of this present time. The sufferings of the saints last no longer than the present time (2 Cor. iv. 17), light affliction, and but for a moment. So that on the sufferings he writes tekel, weighed in the balance and found light. 2. In the other scale he puts the glory, and finds that an exceeding and eternal weight: Glory that shall be revealed. In our present state we come short, not only in the enjoyment, but in the knowledge of that glory: it shall be revealed. It surpasses all that we have yet seen and known. There is something to come, something behind the curtain, that will outshine all. Shall be revealed in us; not only revealed to us, to be seen, but revealed in us, to be enjoyed. He concludes the sufferings not worthy to be compared with the glory. They cannot merit that glory; and, if suffering for Christ will not merit, much less will doing. The sufferings are small and short, and concern the body only; but the glory is rich and great, and concerns the soul, and is eternal. This he reckons as an arithmetician that is balancing an account. He first sums up what is disbursed for Christ in the sufferings of this present time, and finds they come to very little; he then sums up what is secured to us by Christ in the glory that shall be revealed, and this he finds to be an infinite sum. And who would be afraid then to suffer for Christ, who as he is beforehand with us in suffering, so he will not be behind-hand with us in recompence? He could reckon not by art only, but by experience, for he knew both. And, upon the view of both, he gives this judgment here. The reproach of Christ appears riches to those who have respect to the recompence of reward.

II. The accomplishment of the saints' present hopes and expectations, v. 19, &c. As the saints are suffering for it, so they are waiting for it. He will establish that word unto his servants on which he has caused them to hope. If hope deferred makes the heart sick, surely when the desire comes it will be a tree of life. Now he observes an expectation of this glory.

1. In the creatures, v. 19–22. That must needs be a great, a transcendent glory, which all the creatures are so earnestly expecting and longing for. By the creature here we understand the whole frame of nature, the whole creation. The sense of the apostle in these four verses we may take in the following observations: (1) There is a present vanity to which the creature, by reason of the sin of man, is made subject, v. 20. When man sinned, the ground was cursed for man's sake, and with it all the creatures. Under the bondage of corruption, v. 21. The creation is sullied and stained, much of the beauty of the world gone. And it is not the least part of their bondage that they are used, or abused rather, by men as instruments of sin. And this not willingly, not of their own choice. All the creatures desire their own perfection. When they are made instruments of sin it is not willingly. They are thus captivated, not for any sin of their own, but for man's sin: By reason of him who hath subjected the same. And this yoke (poor creatures) they bear in hope that it will not be so always. We have reason to pity the poor creatures that for our sin have become subject to vanity. (2) The creatures groan and travail in pain together under this vanity and corruption, v. 22. Sin is a burden to the whole creation. There is a general outcry of the whole creation against the sin of man. (3) The creature shall be delivered from this bondage into the glorious liberty of the children of God (v. 21)—they shall no more be subject to vanity and corruption. This lower world shall be renewed: when there will be new heavens there will be a new earth. (4) The creature doth therefore earnestly expect the manifestation of the children of God, v. 19. Now the saints are God's hidden ones, the wheat seems lost in a heap of chaff; but then they shall be manifested. The children of God shall appear in their own colours. And this redemption of the creature is reserved till then. This the whole creation longs for; and it may serve as a reason why now a good man should be merciful to his beast.

if so be that we suffer—'provided we be suffering with Him' —that we may be also glorified together—with Him. This necessity of conformity to Christ in suffering in order to participate in His glory, is taught alike by Christ Himself and by His apostles (John 12:24-26; Matt. 16:24, 25; II Tim. 2:12).

18. For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us—i.e., 'True, we must suffer with Christ, if we would partake of His glory; but what of that? For if such sufferings are set over against the coming glory, they sink into insignificance.' 19-22. For . . .—'The apostle, fired with the thought of the future glory of the saints, pours forth this splendid passage, in which he represents the whole creation groaning under its present degradation, and looking and longing for the revelation of this glory as the end and consummation of its existence' [HODGE]. the earnest expectation—(cf. Phil. 1:20). of the creature—rather, 'the creation.'

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

"The unveiling of the sons of God." That unveiling is represented as coming along with the glory which shall be revealed to usward, and as being contemporaneous with the deliverance of the creation itself from the bondage of corruption, and its passing into the liberty of the glory of the children of God. It coincides with the vanishing of the pain in which the whole creation now groans and travails, and with the adoption—that is, the redemption of our body. Then hope will be seen and will pass into still fruition. All this points to the time when Jesus Christ is revealed, and His servants are revealed with Him in glory. That revelation brings with it of necessity the manifestation of the sons of God for what they are—the making visible in the life of what God sees them to be.

That revelation of the sons of God is the result of the entire dominion and transforming supremacy of the Spirit of God in them. In the whole sweep of their consciousness there will in that day be nothing done from other motives; there will be no sidelights flashing in and disturbing the perfect illumination from the candle of the Lord set on high in their being; there will be no contraditions in the life.

—Expositions of Holy Scripture

waiteth for the manifestation—'is waiting for the revelation.' of the sons of God—i.e., "for the redemption of their bodies" from the grave (vs. 23), which will reveal their sonship, now hidden (cf. Luke 20:36; Rev. 21:7). For the creature—'the creation'—was made subject to vanity, not willingly—i.e., through no natural principle of decay. The apostle, personifying creation, represents it as only submitting to the vanity with which it was smitten, on man's account, in obedience to that superior power which had mysteriously linked its destinies with man's. And so he adds—but by reason of him who hath subjected the same—'who subjected it'—in hope; because—or 'in hope that'—the creature itself also—'even the creation itself'—shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption—its bondage to the principle of decay—into the glorious liberty—rather, 'the liberty of the glory'—of the children of God—i.e., the creation itself shall, in a glorious sense, be delivered into that freedom from debility and decay in which the children of God, when raised up in glory, shall expatiate: into this freedom from corruptibility the creation itself shall, in a glorious sense, be delivered [So CALVIN, BEZA, BENGEL, THOLUCK, OLSHAUSEN, DE WETTE, MEYER, PHILIPPI, HODGE, ALFORD, etc.]. If for man's sake alone the earth was cursed, it cannot surprise us that it should share in his recovery. And if so, to represent it as sympathizing with man's miseries, and as looking forward to his complete redemption as the period of its own emancipation from its present sin-blighted condition, is a beautiful thought, and in harmony with the general teaching of Scripture on the subject. (See on II Pet. 3:13.)

ADAM CLARKE

with the ever-blessed Son of God. We are heirs: heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with him. This, with the additional consideration that we suffer with Christ, or as He himself suffered, would greatly qualify the transitory afflictions of this world, and dispose them to attend to the other arguments He had to offer.

18. For I reckon that the sufferings. If the glory that is to be revealed be the enjoyment of God himself, then the sufferings of this life, which, when compared with eternity, are but as for a moment, are not worthy to be put in competition with this glory which shall be revealed in us.

19. For the earnest expectation of the creature. There is considerable difficulty in this and the following four verses, and the difficulty lies chiefly in the meaning of the word which we translate the creature, and creation. Some think that by it the brute creation is meant; others apply it to the Jewish people; others, to the godly; others, to the Gentiles; others, to the good angels; and others, to the fallen spirits, both angelic and human. Dr. Lightfoot's mode of explanation appears to me to be the best, on the whole. "There is," says he, "a twofold key hanging at this place, which may unlock the whole, and make the sense plain and easy. (1) The first is the phrase which we render 'the whole creation,' v. 22, and with which we meet twice elsewhere in the New Testament. Mark xvi. 15: 'Preach the gospel to every creature'; and Col. i. 23: The gospel 'was preached to every creature.' Now it is sufficiently apparent what is meant in both these places, viz. 'all nations.' For that which in Mark is, 'Preach the gospel to every creature,' is, in Matthew, 'Go . . . and teach all nations.' (2) The second key is the word, v. 20, which is not unfitly rendered vanity; but then this vanity is improperly applied to the vanishing, dying, changing state of the creation. For vanity does not so much denote the vanishing condition of the outward state as it does the inward vanity or emptiness of the mind. So the apostle, speaking of the Gentiles concerning whom he speaks here, tells us, They 'became vain in their imaginations,' chap. i. 21; and again, The 'Gentiles walk, in the vanity of their mind,' Eph. iv. 17. Throughout this whole place the apostle seems to allude to the bondage of the Israelites in Egypt and their deliverance from it, with a comparison made betwixt the Jewish and the Gentile church. When God would deliver Israel from his bondage, He challenges him for His Son, and His firstborn, Exod. iv. 22. And in like manner the Gentiles earnestly expect and wait for such a kind of manifestation of the sons of God within and among themselves. The Romans to whom the apostle writes knew well how many predictions and promises it had pleased God to publish by His prophets concerning gathering together and adopting sons to himself among the Gentiles; the manifestation of which sons the whole Gentile world with a 'neck' as it were 'stretched out,' as the word implies, doth now wait for."

20. For the creature was made subject to vanity. The Gentile world was subject to vanity of mind; but how? Not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same. May we not say it became vain willingly, but was made subject to vanity unwillingly?

21. Because the creature. This and the preceding verse should be thus connected: "in hope that the creature itself also shall be delivered." The word phthora denotes, very frequently, "sinful corruption." So 2 Pet. i. 4: "Corruption . . . through lust." 2 Cor. xi. 3: "Lest your minds should be corrupted." I Cor. xv. 33: "Evil communications corrupt good manners." The sense, therefore, of the apostle in this place seems to be: The Gentile world shall, in time, be delivered from the bondage of their "sinful corruption" (i.e., the bondage of their lusts and vile affections), and be brought into such a noble liberty as the sons of God enjoy.

22. The whole creation groaneth and travaileth. If it be inquired how the Gentile world groaned and travailed in pain, let them who explain this of the fabric of the material world tell us how that groans and travails. They must needs own it to be a borrowed and allusive

2. In the saints, who are new creatures, v. 23–25. (1) The grounds of this expectation in the saints. It is our having received the first-fruits of the spirit. Grace is the first-fruits of glory, it is glory begun. We, having received such clusters in this wilderness, cannot but long for the full vintage in the heavenly Canaan. Not only they—not only the creatures, but even we cannot but long for something more and greater. In having the first-fruits of the Spirit we have that which is very precious, but we have not all we would have. We groan within ourselves with silent groans, which pierce heaven soonest of all. Or, We groan among ourselves. It is the unanimous vote of the whole church. Present receivings and comforts are consistent with a great many groans; as the throes of a woman in travail—groans that are symptoms of life, not of death. (2) The object of this expectation. The adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body. The resurrection is here called the redemption of the body. It shall then be rescued from the power of death and the grave. It shall be made like that glorious body of Christ, Phil. iii. 21; 1 Cor. xv. 42. This is called the adoption. It is the adoption manifested before all the world, angels and men. As Christ was, so the saints will be, declared to be the sons of God with power, by the resurrection from the dead, ch. i. 4. It is the adoption perfected and completed. The children of God have bodies as well as souls; and, till those bodies are brought into the glorious liberty of the children of God, the adoption is not perfect. (3) The agreeableness of this to our present state, v. 24, 25. Our happiness is not in present possession: We are saved by hope. Our reward is out of sight. Those that will deal with God must deal upon trust. Faith respects the promise, hope the thing promised. Faith is the evidence, hope the expectation, of things not seen. Faith is the mother of hope. We do with patience wait. In hoping for this glory we have need of patience. Our way is rough and long, though he seem to tarry, it becomes us to wait for him.

Verses 26–28

Two privileges more to which true Christians are entitled:

I. The help of the Spirit in prayer.

1. Our weakness in prayer: We know not what we should pray for as we ought. As to the matter of our requests, we know not what to ask. We are short-sighted. We are like foolish children, that are ready to cry for fruit before it is ripe and fit for them. As to the manner, we know not how to pray as we ought. The apostle speaks of this in the first person: We know not. He puts himself among the rest. If so great a saint as Paul knew not what to pray for, what little reason have we to go forth about that duty in our own strength!

2. The assistances which the Spirit gives us. He helps our infirmities, meant especially of our praying infirmities. The Spirit in the word helps. The Spirit in the heart helps; for this end the Holy Ghost was poured out. Helpeth, heaves with us, over against us, helps as we help one that would lift up a burden, by lifting over against him at the other end. We must not sit still, and expect that the Spirit should do all; when the Spirit goes before us we must bestir ourselves. We cannot without God, and he will not without us. The Spirit itself makes intercession for us. Christ intercedes for us in heaven, the Spirit intercedes for us in our hearts; so graciously has God provided for the encouragement of the praying remnant. Now this intercession which the Spirit makes is, (1) With groanings that cannot be uttered. There may be praying in the Spirit where there is not a word spoken. It is not the rhetoric and eloquence, but the faith and fervency, of our prayers, that the Spirit works, in us. Cannot be uttered; we know not what to say, nor how to express ourselves. When we can but cry, Abba, Father, with a holy humble boldness, this is the work of the Spirit. (2) According to the will of God, v. 27. The Spirit interceding in us evermore melts our wills into the will of God.

3. The sure success of these intercessions: He that searches the heart knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, v. 27. To a hypocrite, all whose religion lies in his tongue, nothing is more dreadful than that God searches the heart. To a sincere Christian, who makes heart-work of his duty, nothing is more comfortable. He will hear and answer those desires which we want words to express. He knows what we have need of before we ask. Christ had said, "Whatever you ask the Father according to his will he will give you." But how shall we learn to ask according to his will. Why, the Spirit will teach us that.

23. And not only they, but ourselves also—or 'not only [so], but even we ourselves'—i.e., besides the inanimate creation. which have the first-fruits of the Spirit—or, 'the Spirit as the first-fruits' of our full redemption (cf. II Cor. 1:22), moulding the heart to a heavenly frame and attempering it to its future element. even we ourselves—though we have so much of heaven already within us. groan within ourselves—under this "body of sin and death," and under the manifold "vanity and vexation of spirit" that are written upon every object and every pursuit and every enjoyment under the sun. waiting for the—manifestation of our—adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body—from the grave: "not (be it observed) the deliverance of ourselves from the body, but the redemption of the body itself from the grave" [BENGEL]. 24. For we are saved by hope—rather, 'For in hope we are saved'; i.e., it is more a salvation in hope than as yet in actual possession. but hope that is seen is not hope—for the very meaning of hope is, the expectation that something now future will become present. for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for?—the latter ending when the other comes. 25. But if we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it—i.e., then, patient waiting for it is our fitting attitude. 26, 27. Likewise the Spirit also . . .—or, 'But after the like manner doth the Spirit also help . . . our infirmities—rather (according to the true reading), 'our infirmity'; not merely the one infirmity here specified, but the general weakness of the spiritual life in its present state, of which one example is here given. for we know not what we should pray for as we ought—It is not the proper matter of prayer that believers are at so much loss about, for the fullest directions are given them on this head: but to ask for the right things "as they ought" is the difficulty. This arises partly from the dimness of our spiritual vision in the present veiled state, while we have to "walk by faith, not by sight" (see on I Cor. 13:9; and on II Cor. 5:7), and the large admixture of the ideas and feelings which spring from the fleeting objects of sense that there is in the very best views and affections of our renewed nature; partly also from the necessary imperfection of all human language as a vehicle for expressing the subtle spiritual feelings of the heart. In these circumstances, how can it be but that much uncertainty should surround all our spiritual exercises, and that in our nearest approaches and in the freest outpourings of our hearts to our Father in heaven, doubts should spring up within us whether our frame of mind in such exercises is altogether befitting and well pleasing to God? Nor do these anxieties subside, but rather deepen, with the depth and ripeness of our spiritual experience. But the Spirit—rather, 'Himself.' (See end of vs. 27)—maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered—i.e., which cannot be expressed in articulate language. Sublime and affecting ideas, for which we are indebted to this passage alone! 'As we struggle to express in articulate language the desires of our hearts and find that our deepest emotions are the most inexpressible, we "groan" under this felt inability. But not in vain are these groanings. For "the Spirit Himself" is in them, giving to the emotions which He Himself has kindled the only language of which they are capable; so that though on our part they are the fruit of impotence to utter what we feel, they are at the same time the intercession of the Spirit Himself in our behalf.' And—rather, 'But,' inarticulate though these groanings be—he that searcheth the hearts knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, because he—the Spirit—maketh intercession for the saints according to the will of God—As the Searcher of hearts, He watches the surging emotions of them in prayer, and knows perfectly what the Spirit means by the groanings which He draws forth within us, because that blessed Intercessor pleads by them only for what God Himself designs to bestow. Note (1) Are believers "led by the Spirit of God" (vs. 14)? How careful then should they be not to "grieve the Holy Spirit of God" (Eph. 4:30)! Cf. Psalm 32:8, 9: "I will . . . guide thee with Mine eye. Be not (then) as the horse, or as the mule . . ." (2) "The spirit of bondage," to which many Protestants are "all their lifetime subject," and the 'doubtsome faith' which the Popish Church systematically inculcates, are both rebuked here, being in direct and painful contrast to that "spirit of adoption," and that witness of the Spirit, along with our own spirit, to the fact of our sonship, which it is here said the children of God, as such, enjoy (vss. 15, 16). (3) As suffering with Christ is the ordained preparation for participating in this glory, so the insignificance of the one phrase; but in the sense above given, the very literal construction may be admitted.

23. And not only they, but ourselves also. Neither the Gentiles only, but we Jews also, to whom God hath granted the firstfruits of the Spirit. We sigh among ourselves for their sakes, waiting for the adoption; that is, the redemption of our mystical body, whereof the Gentiles make a very great part.

24. For we are saved by hope. We are supported and are comfortable in the expectation we have of receiving from the hand of our God all the good we need in the troubles and adversities of this life, and of having our bodies raised from corruption and death at the general resurrection. Hope that is seen is not hope. As hope signifies "the expectation of future good," so it necessarily supposes that the object of it is not seen, i.e., not "enjoyed"; for to see in Scripture language sometimes signifies to enjoy, as in Job vii. 7: "Mine eye shall no more see [margin, 'enjoy'] good." The hope that is seen, that is, "enjoyed," is no longer hope; it is fruition; and a man cannot hope for that which he has in his possession.

25. But if we hope for that we see not. If we have a well-grounded expectation of our resurrection and final glorification, knowing that such things are necessarily future and must for a certain time be delayed, then do we patiently wait for them, continue patiently to endure the common ills of life and whatever tribulations we may be exposed to in consequence of our Christian profession.

26. The Spirit also helpeth our infirmities. The same Spirit mentioned before as bearing witness with ours that we are the children of God; and consequently it is not a disposition or frame of mind, for the disposition of our mind surely cannot help the infirmities of our minds. The word synantilambanetai is very inadequately expressed by helpeth. It is compounded of syn, "together," anti, "against," and lambanomai, "to support or help," and signifies such assistance as is afforded by any two persons to each other who mutually bear the same load or carry it between them. He who prays receives help from the Spirit of God; but he who prays not receives no such help. For we know not what we should pray for as we ought. And should therefore be liable to endless mistakes in our prayers if suitable desires were not excited by the Holy Spirit and power received to bring these desires, by prayer, before the throne of grace. But the Spirit itself, "the same Spirit," viz., the Spirit that witnesses of our adoption and sonship, vv. 15-16, maketh intercession for us. Surely if the apostle had designed to teach us that he meant our own sense and understanding by the Spirit, he never could have spoken in a manner in which plain common sense was never likely to comprehend his meaning.

27. He maketh intercession for the saints. The word entynchano signifies to apply oneself to a person in behalf of another, to "intercede" or "negotiate for." Our Lord makes intercession for us by negotiating and managing, as our Friend and Agent, all the affairs pertaining to our salvation. And the Spirit of God makes intercession for the saints, not by supplication to God on their behalf, but by directing and qualifying their supplications in a proper manner by His agency and influence upon their hearts; which, according to the gospel scheme, is the peculiar work and office of the Holy Spirit. According to the will of God. According to the mind, intention, or design of God. And thus the prayers which we offer up, and the desires which subsist in the unutterable groanings, are all such as are pleasing in the sight of God. So that God, whose is the Spirit, and who is acquainted with the mind of the Spirit, knows what He means when He leads the saints to express themselves in words, desires, groans, sighs, or tears. In each, God reads the language of the Holy Ghost, and prepares the answer according to the request.

MATTHEW HENRY

ALBERT BARNES:

28. "And we know." This verse introduces another source of consolation and support, drawn from the fact that all things are under the direction of an infinitely wise Being, who has purposed the salvation of the Christian, and who has so appointed all things that they shall contribute to it.

"All things." All our afflictions and trials; all the persecutions and calamities to which we are exposed. Though they are numerous and long continued, yet they are among the means that are appointed for our welfare.

"Work together for good." They shall cooperate; they shall mutually contribute to our good. They take off our affections from this world; they teach us the truth about our frail, transitory, and dying condition; they lead us to look to God for support, and to heaven for a final home; and they produce a subdued spirit, a humble temper, a patient, tender, and kind disposition. This has been the experience of all saints; and at the end of life they have been able to say it was good for them to be afflicted (Ps. 119:67, 71; Jer. 31:18, 19; Heb. 12:11).

"For good." For our real welfare; for the promotion of true piety, peace, and happiness in our hearts.

"To them that love God." This is a characteristic of true piety. To them, afflictions are a blessing; to others, they often prove otherwise On others, they are sent as chastisements; and they produce murmuring instead of peace; rebellion instead of submission; and anger, impatience, and hatred instead of calmness, patience, and love. The Christian is made a better man by receiving afflictions as they should be received, and by desiring that they should accomplish the purpose for which they are sent the sinner is made more hardened by resisting them, and refusing to submit to their obvious intention and design.—Popular Commentary as compared with the other cannot fail to lighten the sense of it, however bitter and protracted (vss. 17, 18). (4) It cannot but swell the heart of every intelligent Christian to think that if external nature has been mysteriously affected for evil by the fall of man, it only awaits his completed recovery, at the resurrection, to experience a corresponding emancipation from its blighted condition into undecaying life and unfading beauty (vss. 19-23). (5) It is not when believers, through sinful "quenching of the Spirit," have the fewest and faintest glimpses of heaven, that they sigh most fervently to be there; but, on the contrary, when through the unobstructed working of the Spirit in their hearts, "the first-fruits" of the glory to be revealed are most largely and frequently tasted, then, and just for that reason, is it that they "groan within themselves" for full redemption (vs. 23). For thus they reason: If such be the drops, what will the ocean be? If thus "to see through a glass darkly" be so very sweet, what will it be to "see face to face?" If when "my Beloved stands behind our wall, looking forth at the windows, showing Himself through the lattice" (Canticles 2:9)—that thin veil which parts the seen from the unseen—if He is even thus to me "Fairer than the children of men," what shall He be when He stands confessed before my undazzled vision, the Only-begotten of the Father in my own nature, and I shall be like Him, for I shall see Him as He is? (6) "The patience of hope" (I Thess. 1:3) is the fitting attitude for those who with the joyful consciousness that they are already "saved" (II Tim. 1:9; Titus 3:5), have yet the painful consciousness that they are saved but in part: or, "that being justified by His grace, they are made (in the present state) heirs according to the hope (only) of eternal life," Titus 3:7 (vss. 24, 25). (7) As prayer is the breath of the spiritual life, and the believer's only effectual relief under the "infirmity" which attaches to his whole condition here below, how cheering is it to be assured that the blessed Spirit, cognizant of it all, comes in aid of it all; and in particular, that when believers, unable to articulate their case before God, can at times do nothing but lie "groaning" before the Lord, these inarticulate groanings are the Spirit's own vehicle for conveying into "the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth" their whole case; and come up before the Hearer of prayer as the Spirit's own intercession in their behalf, and that they are recognized by Him that sitteth on the Throne, as embodying only what His own "will" determined before to bestow upon them (vss. 26, 27)! (8) What a view do these two verses (vss. 26, 27) give of the relations subsisting between the Divine Persons in the economy of redemption, and the harmony of their respective operations in the case of each of the redeemed!

THIRD: Triumphant Summary of the Whole Argument (vss. 28-39). 28. And—or, 'Moreover,' or 'Now'; noting a transition to a new particular. we know . . .—The order in the original is more striking: "We know that to them that love God" (cf. I Cor. 2:9; Eph. 6:24; Jas. 1:12; 2:5) "all things work together for good [even] to them who are the called (rather, 'who are called') according to His (eternal) purpose." Glorious assurance! And this, it seems, was a "household word," a "known" thing, among believers. This working of all things for good is done quite naturally to "them that love God", because such souls, persuaded that He who gave His own Son for them cannot but mean them well in all His procedure, learn thus to take in good part whatever He sends them, however trying to flesh and blood: and to them who are the called, according to "His purpose," all things do in the same intelligible way "work together for good"; for, even when "He hath His way in the whirlwind," they see "His chariot paved with love" (Canticles 3:10). And knowing that it is in pursuance of an eternal "purpose" of love that they have been "called into the fellowship of His Son Jesus Christ" (I Cor. 1:9), they naturally say within themselves, 'It cannot be that He "of whom, and through whom, and to whom are all things," should suffer that purpose to be thwarted by anything really adverse to us, or that He should not make all things, dark as well as light, crooked as well as straight, to co-operate to the furtherance and final completion of His high design.' 29. For—as touching this "calling according to his purpose"—whom he did foreknow he also did predestinate—foreordain. In what sense are we to take the word "foreknow" here? 'Those who He foreknew would repent and believe,' say Pelagians of every age and every hue. But this is to thrust into the text what is contrary to the whole spirit, and even letter, of the apostle's teaching (see ch. 9:11; II Tim. 1:9). In ch. 11:2, and Psalm 1:6,

ADAM CLARKE

ALBERT BARNES:

"To them who are the called." Christians are often represented as called of God. The word is sometimes used to denote an external invitation, offer, or calling (Matt. 20:16; 22:14). But excepting in these places, it is used in the New Testament to denote those who had accepted the call, and were true Christians (Rom. 1:6, 7; 1 Cor. 1:2, 24; Rev. 17:14). It is evidently used in this sense here—to denote those who were true Christians. The connection as well as the usual meaning of the word requires us thus to understand it. Christians are said to be called because God has invited them to be saved, and has sent into their heart such an influence as to make the call effectual to their salvation. In this way their salvation is to be traced entirely to God.

"According to his purpose." The word here rendered "purpose" means properly a proposition, or a laying down anything in view of others; and is thus applied to the bread that was laid on the table of showbread (Matt 12:4; Mark 2:26; Luke 6:4). Hence it means, when applied to the mind, a plan or purpose of mind. It implies that God had a plan, purpose, or intention in regard to all who became Christians. They are not saved by chance or haphazard. God does not convert men without design; and his designs are not new, but are eternal. What he does, he always meant to do. What it is right for him to do, it was right always to intend to do. What God always meant to do is his purpose or plan. That he has such a purpose in regard to the salvation of his people is often affirmed (Rom. 9:11; Eph. 1:11; 3:11; 2 Tim. 1:9; Jer. 51:29).

This purpose of saving his people is: (1) one over which a creature can have no control; it is according to the counsel of his own will (Eph. 1:11); (2) without any merit on the part of the sinner—a purpose to save him by grace (2 Tim. 1:9); (3) eternal (Eph. 3:11); (4) such as should excite lively gratitude in all who have been inclined by the grace of God to accept the offers of eternal life. They owe it to the mere mercy of God, and they should acknowledge him as the fountain and source of all their hopes of heaven. —Popular Commentary

II. The concurrence of all providences for the good of those that are Christ's, v. 28. Notwithstanding all these privileges, we see believers compassed about with manifold afflictions, but in this the Spirit's intercession is always effectual, that all this is working together for their good.

1. The character of the saints, who are interested in this privilege. They love God. Those that love God make the best of all he does, and take all in good part. They are the called according to his purpose, not according to any merit or desert of ours, but according to God's own gracious purpose.

2. The privilege of the saints, that all things work together for good to them. All the providences of God are theirs—merciful providences, afflicting providences. They are all for good; perhaps for temporal good, at least, for spiritual and eternal good. Either directly or indirectly, every providence has a tendency to the spiritual good of those that love God. They work together, as several ingredients in a medicine concur to answer the intention. He worketh all things together for good; so some read it. All this we know—know it for a certainty, from the word of God, from our own experience, and from the experience of all the saints.

Verses 29, 30

The apostle, having reckoned up so many ingredients of the happiness of true believers, comes here to represent the ground of them all, which he lays in predestination. He here sets before us the order of the causes of our salvation, a golden chain, which cannot be broken. There are four links of it:

I. Whom he did foreknow he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son. All that God designed for glory and happiness as the end he decreed to grace and holiness as the way. God's foreknowledge of the saints is the same with that everlasting love wherewith he is said to have loved them. Whom he did foreknow, that is, whom he designed for

28. And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God. To understand this verse aright, let us observe: (1) That the persons in whose behalf all things work for good are they who love God and, consequently, who live in the spirit of obedience. (2) It is not said that all things shall work for good, but that they work now in the behalf of him who loveth now, for both verbs are in the present tense. (3) All these things work together; while they are working, God's providence is working, His Spirit is working, and they are working together with Him. To them who are the called according to his purpose. Dr. Taylor translates the called, "the invited," and observes that it is a metaphor taken from inviting guests or making them welcome to a feast. Our being called or "invited," according to God's purpose, proves that all things work for our good, on the supposition that we love God, and not otherwise. How is it evident and unquestionable that we are called? From our being in the Visible Church and professing the faith of the gospel. For always, in the apostolic writings, all that are in the Visible Church and profess the faith of the gospel are numbered among the called or "invited"; i.e., among the persons who are invited to feast on the covenant sacrifice.

his friends and favourites. Now those whom God thus foreknew he did predestinate to be conformed to Christ. 1. Holiness consists in our conformity to the image of Christ. This takes in the whole of sanctification. Christ is the express image of his Father, and the saints are conformed to the image of Christ. Thus it is that we have God's love restored to us and God's likeness renewed upon us. 2. All that God hath from eternity foreknown with favour he hath predestinated to this conformity. It is not we that can conform ourselves to Christ. None can know their election but by their conformity to the image of Christ; for all that are chosen are chosen to sanctification.

3. That which is herein chiefly designed is the honour of Jesus Christ, that he might be the first-born among many brethren; that is, that Christ might have the honour of being the great pattern, might have pre-eminence. And blessed be God that there are many brethren; though they seem but a few in one place at one time, yet, when they come all together, they will be a great many. In spite of all the opposition of the powers of darkness, Christ will be the first-born among many, very many brethren.

II. Whom he did predestinate those he also called, not only with the external call, but with the internal and effectual call. The former comes to the ear only, but this to the heart. The call is then effectual when we come at the call; and we then come at the call when the Spirit draws us, persuades and enables us to embrace Christ in the promises. It is an effectual call from self and earth to God, and Christ—from sin and vanity to grace, and holiness. This is the gospel call. Them he called, that the purpose of God, according to election, might stand.

III. Whom he called those he also justified. All that are effectually called are accepted as righteous through Jesus Christ. They are no longer dealt with as criminals, but owned and loved as friends and favourites.

IV. Whom he justified those he also glorified. The power of corruption being broken in effectual calling, and the guilt of sin removed in justification, nothing can come between that soul and glory. It is spoken of as a thing done: He glorified, because of the certainty of it; he hath saved us. God's design of love has its full accomplishment. This was what he aimed at all along—to bring them to heaven. Are they chosen? It is to salvation. Called? It is to his kingdom and glory. Begotten again? It is to an inheritance incorruptible. Afflicted? It is to work for them this exceeding and eternal weight of glory. The author of all these is the same. God himself hath undertaken the doing of it from first to last. This is a mighty encouragement to our faith and hope.

The apostle closes with a holy triumph, in the name of all the saints. What shall we then say to these things? What use shall we make of all that has been said? He speaks as one wondering at the height and depth, and length and breadth, of the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge. The more we know of other things the less we wonder at them; but the further we are led into an acquaintance with gospel mysteries the more we are affected with the admiration of them. If ever Paul rode in a triumphant chariot on this side of heaven, here it was. He here makes a challenge, dares all the enemies of the saints to do their worst: If God be for us, who can be against us? This includes all, that God is for us. All that he is, and has, and does, is for his people. And, if so, who can be against us, so as to prevail against us? Be they ever so strong, ever so many, what can they do? While God is for us, and we keep in his love, we may defy all the powers of darkness. Let Satan do his worst, he is chained. Who then dares fight against us, while God himself is fighting for us? And this we say to these things.

I. We have supplies ready in all our wants (v. 32): He that spared, &c. Who can cut off our streams, while we have a fountain to go to? 1. What God has done for us, on which our hopes are built: He spared not his own Son. Now we may know that he loves us, in that he hath not withheld his Son. If nothing less will save man, rather than man shall perish let him go.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

God's "knowledge" of His people cannot be restricted to a mere foresight of future events, or acquaintance with what is passing here below. Does "whom He did foreknow," then, mean 'whom He foreordained?' Scarcely, because both 'foreknowledge' and 'foreordination' are here mentioned, and the one as the cause of the other. It is difficult indeed for our limited minds to distinguish them as states of the Divine Mind towards men; especially since in Acts 2:23 "the counsel" is put before "the foreknowledge of God," while in I Peter 1:2 "election" is said to be "according to the foreknowledge of God." But probably God's foreknowledge of His own people means His peculiar, gracious, complacency in them, while His "predestinating" or "foreordaining" them signifies His fixed purpose, flowing from this, to "save them and call them with an holy calling" (II Tim. 1:9). to be conformed to the image of his Son—i.e., to be His sons after the pattern, model, or image of His Sonship in our nature. that he might be the first-born among many brethren—"The First-born," the Son by nature; His "many brethren," sons by adoption: He, in the Humanity of the Only-begotten of the Father, bearing our sins on the accursed tree; they in that of mere men ready to perish by reason of sin, but redeemed by His blood from condemnation and wrath, and transformed into His likeness: He "the First-born from the dead"; they "that sleep in Jesus," to be in due time "brought with Him"; "The First-born," now "crowned with glory and honor"; His "many brethren," "when He shall appear, to be like Him, for they shall see Him as He is." 30. Moreover—'And,' or 'Now'; explanatory of the foregoing verse—'In "predestinating us to be conformed to the image of His Son" in final glory, He settled all the successive steps of it. Thus—whom he did predestinate, them he also called—The word "called" (as Hodge and others truly observe) is never in the Epistles of the New Testament applied to those who have only the outward invitation of the Gospel (as in Matt. 20:16; 22:14). It always means 'internally, effectually, savingly called.' It denotes the first great step in personal salvation and answers to "conversion." Only the word conversion expresses the change of character which then takes place, whereas this "calling" expresses the divine authorship of the change, and the sovereign power by which we are summoned, Matthew-like, Zaccheus-like, out of our old, wretched, perishing condition, into a new, safe, blessed life. and whom he—thus—called, them he also justified—brought into the definite state of reconciliation already so fully described. and whom he justified, them he also glorified—brought to final glory (vss. 17, 18). Noble climax, and so rhythmically expressed! And all this is viewed as past; because, starting from the past decree of "predestination to be conformed to the image of God's Son" of which the other steps are but the successive unfoldings—all is beheld as one entire, eternally completed salvation. 31. What shall we then say to these things?—'We can no farther go, think, wish' [BENGEL]. This whole passage, to vs. 34, and even to the end of the chapter, strikes all thoughtful interpreters and readers, as transcending almost every thing in language, while OLSHAUSEN notices the 'profound and colossal' character of the thought. If God be for us, who can be against us? If God be resolved and engaged to bring us through, all our enemies must be His; and "Who would set the briers and thorns against Him in battle? He would go through them. He would burn them together" (Isa. 27:4). What strong consolation is here! Nay, but the great Pledge of all has already been given; for, 32. He—rather, 'He surely.' (It is a pity to lose the emphatic particle of the original.) that spared not—'withheld not,' 'kept not back.' This expressive phrase, as well as the whole thought, is suggested by Genesis 22:12, where Jehovah's touching commendation of Abraham's conduct regarding his son Isaac seems designed to furnish something like a glimpse into the spirit of His own act in surrendering His own Son. "Take now (said the Lord to Abraham) thy son, thine only, whom thou lovest, and . . . offer him for a burnt offering" (Gen. 22:2); and only when Abraham had all but performed that loftiest act of self-sacrifice, the Lord interposed, saying, "Now I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou HAST NOT WITHHELD THY SON, THINE ONLY SON, from Me." In the light of this incident, then, and of this language, our apostle can mean to convey nothing less than this, that in "not sparing His own Son, but delivering Him up," or surrendering Him, God exercised, in His Paternal character, a mysterious act of Self-sacrifice, which, though involving none of the pain and none of the loss which are

29. The firstborn among many brethren. That He might be the Chief or Head of all the redeemed; for His human nature is the first-fruits of the resurrection from the dead; and He is the first human being that, after having passed through death, was raised to eternal glory.

30. Whom he did predestinate. The Gentiles, whom He determined to call into His Church with the Jewish people, he called—He invited by the preaching of the gospel, to believe on His Son, Jesus Christ. He also justified. Pardoned the sins of all those who with hearty repentance and true faith turned unto Him. He also glorified. He has honored and dignified the Gentiles with the highest privileges, and He has already taken many of them to the Kingdom of glory and many more are on their way thither; and all who love Him and continue faithful unto death shall inherit that glory eternally. Though the terms are here used in a more general sense, yet if we take them more restrictedly, we must consider that in the work of justification sanctification is implied, justification being the foundation and beginning of that work. From all this we learn that none will be glorified who have not been sanctified and justified. The word doxa, which we render "glory," and doxazo, to "glorify," both mean to "render illustrious, eminent," in various parts of the New Testament; and in this sense the verb is used in John xi. 4; xii. 23, 28; xiii. 31-32; xiv. 13; xv. 8; xxi. 19; Acts iii. 13; and in chap. xi. 13—in none of which places eternal beatification can be intended. Here it seems to mean that those whom God had called into a state of justification He had rendered illustrious by innumerable gifts, graces, and privileges, in the same manner as He had done to the Israelites of old. The whole of the preceding discourse will show that everything here is conditional, as far as it relates to the ultimate salvation of any person professing the gospel of Christ; for the promises are made to character, and not to persons, as some have most injudiciously affirmed. The apostle insists upon a character all along from the beginning of the chapter. V. 1: "There is . . . no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit." V. 13: "If ye live after the flesh, ye shall die." The absolute necessity of holiness to salvation is the very subject of his discourse; this necessity he positively affirms, and establishes by the most solid arguments.

31. What shall we then say to these things? What conclusion should we draw from the above premises—from all that was already laid down in the preceding chapters, but especially in the preceding verses, from vv. 28 to 30 inclusive? As if he had said: What comfort may we derive from these doctrines? God has called us all to holiness, and to love to Him, which is the principle of holiness. If God be for us, who can be against us? He who is infinitely wise has undertaken to direct us; He who is infinitely powerful has undertaken to protect us; He who is in-

MATTHEW HENRY

Thus did he deliver him up for us all, not only for our good, but in our stead, to be a propitiation for sin. He did not spare his own Son that served him, that he might spare us. 2. What we may therefore expect he will do: He will with him freely give us all things. It is implied that he will give us Christ, for other things are bestowed with him. He will with him freely give us all things, all good things, and more we should not desire. Freely, without reluctancy; and freely, without recompence. How shall he not? Can it be imagined that he should give so great a gift for us when we were enemies, and should deny us any good thing, now that we are friends and children? He that hath prepared a crown and kingdom for us will be sure to give us enough to bear our charges in the way to it.

II. We have an answer ready to all accusations and a security against all condemnations (v. 33, 34): Who shall lay anything? This is enough, It is God that justifieth. If God justifies, this answers all. We may challenge all our accusers to come and put in their charge. This overthrows them all; it is God, the righteous faithful God, that justifieth. Who is he that condemneth? Though they cannot make good the charge, yet they will be ready to condemn; but we have a plea ready which cannot be overruled. It is Christ that died, &c. It is by Christ, and our union with him, that we are thus secured. 1. His death: It is Christ that died. By the merit of his death he paid our debt. 2. His resurrection: Yea, rather, that has risen again. This is a much greater encouragement. Therefore the apostle mentions it with a yea, rather. If he had died, and not risen again, we had been where we were. 3. His sitting at the right hand of God: He is even at the right hand of God a mighty encouragement to us in reference to all accusations, that we have a friend, such a friend, in court. Our friend is himself the judge. 4. The intercession which he makes there. He is there, not unconcerned about us, not forgetful of us, but making intercession. And is not this abundant matter for comfort? What room is left for doubting and disquietment? Some understand the accusation and condemnation here spoken of as that which the suffering saints met with from men. The primitive Christians had many black crimes laid to their charge. For these the ruling powers condemned them: "But no matter for that" (says the apostle); "while we stand right at God's bar it is of no great moment how we stand at men's."

III. We have good assurance of our preservation and continuance in this blessed state, v. 35, to the end. The fears of the saints lest they should lose their hold of Christ are often very discouraging and disquieting, but here is that which may silence their fears, that nothing can separate them.

1. A daring challenge to all the enemies of the saints to separate them, if they could, from the love of Christ. Who shall? None shall, v. 35–37. God having manifested his love in giving his own Son for us, can we imagine that anything else should divert or dissolve that love?

(1) The present calamities of Christ's beloved ones

inseparable from the very idea of self-sacrifice on our part, was not less real, but, on the contrary, as far transcended any such acts of ours as His nature is above the creature's. But this is inconceivable if Christ be not God's "own (or proper) Son," partaker of His very nature, as really as Isaac was of his father Abraham's. In that sense, certainly, the Jews charged our Lord with making Himself "equal with God" (see on John 5:18), which He in reply forthwith proceeded, not to disown, but to illustrate and confirm. Understand Christ's Sonship thus, and the language of Scripture regarding it is intelligible and harmonious; but take it to be an artificial relationship, ascribed to Him in virtue either of His miraculous birth, or His resurrection from the dead, or the grandeur of His works, or all of these together—and the passages which speak of it neither explain of themselves nor harmonize with each other. delivered him up—not to death merely (as many take it), for that is too narrow an idea here, but 'surrendered Him' in the most comprehensive sense; cf. John 3:16, "God so loved the world that He GAVE His only-begotten Son." for us all—i.e., for all believers alike; as nearly every good interpreter admits must be the meaning here. how shall he not—how can we conceive that He should not. with him also—rather, 'also with Him.' (The word "also" is often so placed in our version as to obscure the sense; see on Heb. 12:1.) freely give us all things?—all other gifts being not only immeasurably less than this Gift of gifts, but virtually included in it. 33, 34. Who shall lay anything to the charge of—or, 'bring any charge against.' God's elect?—the first place in this Epistle where believers are styled "the elect." In what sense this is meant will appear in next chapter. yea rather, that is risen again—to make good the purposes of His death. Here, as in some other cases, the apostle delightfully corrects himself (see Gal. 4:9; and on ch. 1:12); not meaning that the resurrection of Christ was of more saving value than His death, but that having "put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself"—which though precious to us was to Him of unmingled bitterness—it was incomparably more delightful to think that He was again alive, and living to see to the efficacy of His death in our behalf. who is even—'also'—at the right hand of God—The right hand of the king was anciently the seat of honor (cf. I Sam. 20:25; I Kings 2:19; Ps. 45:9), and denoted participation in the royal power and glory (Matt. 20:21). The classical writings contain similar allusions. Accordingly Christ's sitting at the right hand of God—predicted in Psalm 110:1, and historically referred to in Mark 16:19; Acts 2:33; 7:56; Ephesians 1:20; Colossians 3:1; I Peter 3:22; Revelation 3:21—signifies the glory of the exalted Son of man, and the power in the government of the world in which He participates. Hence it is called "sitting on the right hand of Power" (Matt. 26:64), and "sitting on the right hand of the Majesty on high" (Heb. 1:3) [PHILIPPI]. who also maketh intercession for us—using all His boundless interest with God in our behalf. This is the top of the climax. "His Session at God's right hand denotes His power to save us; His Intercession, His will to do it" [BENGEL]. But how are we to conceive of this intercession? Not certainly as of one pleading 'on bended knees and with outstretched arms,' to use the expressive language of CALVIN. But yet, neither is it merely a figurative intimation that the power of Christ's redemption is continually operative [THOLUCK], or merely to show the fervor and vehemence of His love for us [CHRYSOSTOM]. It cannot be taken to mean less than this: that the glorified Redeemer, conscious of His claims, expressly signifies His will that the efficacy of His death should be made good to the uttermost, and signifies it in some such royal style as we find Him employing in that wonderful Intercessory Prayer which He spoke as from within the veil (see on John 17:11, 12): "Father, I WILL that they also whom Thou hast given Me be with Me where I am" (see on John 17:24). But in what form this will is expressed is as undiscoverable as it is unimportant. 35, 36. Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? This does not mean 'our love to Christ,' as if, Who shall hinder us from loving Christ? but 'Christ's love to us,' as is clear from the closing words of the chapter, which refer to the same subject. Nor would the other sense harmonize with the scope of the chapter, which is to exhibit the ample ground of the believer's confidence in Christ. "It is no ground of confidence to assert, or even to feel, that we will never forsake Christ; but it is the strongest ground of assurance to be convinced that His love will never change" [HODGE]. shall tribulation . . . 'None of these, nor all together, how terfinitely good has undertaken to save us. What cunning, strength, or malice can prevail against His wisdom, power, and goodness?

32. He that spared not his own Son. And can we, His sincere followers, doubt of the safety of our state, or the certainty of His protection? No; for if He loved us, Gentiles and Jews, so intensely as to deliver up to death His own Son for us all, can He withhold from us any minor blessing? Nay, will He not, on the contrary, freely give us all things?

33. This and the following two verses contain a string of questions, most appropriately introduced and most powerfully urged, tending to show the safety of the state of those who have believed the gospel of the grace of God. I shall lay these verses down as they are pointed by the best Greek critics: "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect?—God, who justifieth? Who is he that condemneth?—Christ, who died? or, rather, who is risen again? He who is at the right hand of God? He who maketh intercession for us? Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?—Tribulation? or distress? or persecution? or famine? or nakedness? or peril? or sword?" In all these questions the apostle intimates that if neither God nor Christ would bring any charge against them who love Him, none else could. And as God justifies through Christ, who died, consequently no charge can lie against these persons, as God alone could produce any; and He, so far from doing this, has justified them—freely forgiven their trespasses.

34. Who is even at the right hand of God. To which He has exalted our human nature, which He took in conjunction with His divinity; and there he maketh intercession for us—manages all the concerns of His own kingdom in general, and of every member of His Church in particular.

35. Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? I do think that this question has been generally misunderstood. The apostle is referring to the persecutions and tribulations to which genuine Christians were exposed through their attachment to Christ, and the gracious provision God had made for their support and final salvation. As in this provision God had shown His infinite love to them in providing Jesus Christ as their Sin Offering, and Jesus Christ had shown His love in suffering death upon the Cross for them, so, here, he speaks of the love of the followers of God to that Christ supposed—that they meet with tribulation, are in distress, are followed with persecution from an angry malicious world that always hated those whom Christ loved, pinched with famine, and starved with nakedness, exposed to the greatest perils, the sword of the magistrate drawn against them. Can a case be supposed more black and dismal? It is illustrated (v. 36) by a passage quoted from Ps. xliv. 22, For thy sake we are killed all the day long, that is, continually exposed to and expecting the fatal stroke. Accounted as sheep for the slaughter; they make no more of killing a Christian than of butchering a sheep.

(2) The inability of all these things to separate us from the love of Christ. All this will not cut the bond of love and friendship that is between Christ and true believers. [1] Christ doth not, will not, love us the less for all this. They are neither a cause nor an evidence of the abatement of his love. These things separate us from the love of other friends. When Paul was brought before Nero all men forsook him, but then the Lord stood by him, 2 Tim. iv. 16, 17. Whatever persecuting enemies may rob us of, they cannot rob us of the love of Christ, and therefore, let them do their worst, they cannot make a true believer miserable. [2] We do not, will not, love him the less for this, because we do not think that he loves us the less. A true Christian loves Christ never the less though he suffer for him, thinks never the worse of Christ though he lose all for him.

(3) The triumph of believers in this (v. 37): Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors.

[1] We are conquerors. A strange way of conquering, but it was Christ's way. It is a surer and a nobler way of conquest by faith and patience than by fire and sword. The enemies have sometimes confessed themselves baffled and overcome by the invincible courage and constancy of the martyrs.

[2] We are more than conquerors. Those are more than conquerors that conquer, First, With little loss. Many conquests are dearly bought; but what do the suffering saints lose? Why, they lose that which the gold loses in the furnace, nothing but the dross. Secondly, With great gain. The spoils are exceedingly rich; glory, honour, and peace, a crown of righteousness that fades not away. In this the suffering saints have triumphed. As afflictions abound, consolations much more abound, 2 Cor. i. 5. Those that have gone smiling to the stake, and stood singing in the flames —these were more than conquerors.

[3] It is only through Christ that loved us. We are conquerors, not in our own strength, but in the grace that is in Christ Jesus. We are conquerors by virtue of Christ's victory. We have nothing to do but to pursue the victory, and to divide the spoil, and so are more than conquerors.

2. A direct and positive conclusion of the whole matter: For I am persuaded, v. 38, 39. And here he enumerates all those things which might separate between Christ and believers, and concludes that it could not be done. (1) Neither death nor life, neither the fear of death nor the hope of life. We shall not be separated from that love either in death or in life. (2) Nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers. The good angels will not, the bad shall not; and neither can. The good angels are engaged friends, the bad are restrained enemies. (3) Nor things present, nor things to come—neither the sense of troubles present nor the fear of troubles to come. Time shall not separate us, eternity shall not, from the love of Christ, whose favour is twisted in with both present things and things to come. (4) Nor height, nor depth—neither the height of prosperity, nor the depth of adversity, nothing from heaven above, nothing on earth below. (5) Nor any other creature—anything than can be named or thought of. It will not, it cannot, separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. Nothing does it, can do it, but sin. This is the ground of the steadfastness of the love, because Jesus Christ, in whom he loves us, is the same yesterday, today and for ever.

rible soever to the flesh, are tokens of God's wrath, or the least ground for doubt of His love.' From whom could such a question come better than from one who had himself for Christ's sake endured so much? (See II Cor. 11:11-33; I Cor. 4:10-13.) The apostle says not (remarks CALVIN nobly) 'What,' but "Who," just as if all creatures and all afflictions were so many gladiators taking arms against the Christians [THOLUCK]. As it is written, For thy sake . . .—Psalm 44:22—quoted as descriptive of what God's faithful people may expect from their enemies at any period when their hatred of righteousness is roused, and there is nothing to restrain it (see Gal. 4:29). 37. Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors, through him that loved us—not, "We are so far from being conquered by them, that they do us much good" [HODGE]; for though this be true, the word means simply, 'We are pre-eminently conquerors.' See on ch. 5:20. And so far are they from "separating us from Christ's love," that it is just "through Him that loved us" that we are victorious over them. 38, 39. For I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers—whether good or bad. But as the bad are not called "angels," or "principalities," or "powers," save with some addition to show that such are meant (Matt. 25:41; Col. 2:15; Eph. 6: 12; II Pet. 2:4—except perhaps I Cor. 6:3), probably the good are meant here, but merely as the same apostle supposes an angel from heaven to preach a false gospel. (So the best interpreters.) nor things present, nor things to come—no condition of the present life and none of the unknown possibilities of the life to come. nor any other creature—rather, 'created thing'—any other thing in the whole created universe of God—shall be able to separate us . . .—"All the terms here are to be taken in their most general sense, and need no closer definition. The indefinite expressions are meant to denote all that can be thought of, and are only a rhetorical paraphrase of the conception of allness" [OLSHAUSEN]. from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord—Thus does this wonderful chapter, with which the argument of the Epistle properly closes, leave us who are "justified by faith" in the arms of everlasting Love, whence no hostile power or conceivable event can ever tear us. "Behold what manner of love is this?" And "what manner of persons ought we to be," who are thus "blessed with all spiritual blessings in Christ?"—Note (1) There is a glorious consistency between the eternal purposes of God and the free agency of men, though the link of connection is beyond human, perhaps created, apprehension (vs. 28). (2) How ennobling is the thought that the complicated movements of the divine government of the world are all arranged in expressed furtherance of the "good" of God's chosen (vs. 28)! (3) To whatever conformity to the Son of God in dignity and glory, believers are or shall hereafter be raised, it will be the joy of everyone of them, as it is most fitting, "that in all things He should have the pre-eminence" (Col. 1:18), (vs. 29). (4) "As there is a beautiful harmony and necessary connection between the several doctrines of grace, so must there be a like harmony in the character of the Christian. He cannot experience the joy and confidence flowing from his election without the humility which the consideration of its being gratuitous must produce; nor can he have the peace of one who is justified without the holiness of one who is saved" (vss. 29, 30) [HODGE]. (5) However difficult it may be for finite minds to comprehend the emotions of the Divine Mind, let us never for a moment doubt that in "not sparing His own Son, but delivering Him up for us all," God made a real sacrifice of all that was dearest to His heart, and that in so doing He meant for ever to assure His people that all other things which they need—inasmuch as they are nothing to this stupendous gift, and indeed but the necessary sequel of it—will in due time be forthcoming (vs. 32). (6) In return for such a sacrifice on God's part, what can be considered too great on ours? (7) If there could be any doubt as to the meaning of the all-important word "JUSTIFICATION" in this Epistle—whether, as the Church of Rome teaches, and many others affirm, it means 'infusing righteousness into the unholy, so as to make them righteous,' or, according to Protestant teaching, 'absolving, acquitting, or pronouncing righteous the guilty' vs. 33 ought to set such doubt entirely at rest. For the apostle's question in this verse is, "Who shall bring a charge against God's elect?" In other words, 'Who shall pronounce' or 'hold them guilty?' seeing that "God justifies" them: showing beyond all doubt, that to "justify" was intended to express precisely the op-who had first loved them. Therefore the question is not, Who shall separate the love of Christ from us? or prevent Christ from loving us? but, Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Who or what shall be able to remove our affection from Him? And the questions that immediately follow show that this is the sense of the passage; for the tribulation, distress, etc., which he enumerates are things by which they might be affected, but by which Christ could not be affected. Shall tribulation? Thlipsis, grievous affliction, or distress of any kind; from thlibo, to "compress, oppress, straiten"; anything by which a man is rendered miserable. Or distress? A word of nearly the same import with the former, but more intense in its signification. It signifies "straitness," being hemmed in on every side, without the possibility of getting out or escaping. Or persecution? Diogmos from dioko, to "pursue, press upon, prosecute," signifies such pursuing as an enemy uses in order to overtake the object of his malice that he may destroy him. Or famine? The total want of bread, and all the necessaries of life. Or peril? A state of extreme and continued danger, perplexing and distressing with grievous forebodings and alarms. Or sword? "Slaughter"; the total destruction of life, and especially beheading, and suchlike, done by the order of the civil magistrate; for the word is used in this Epistle, chap. xiii. 4, to signify the authority and power which he has of judicially terminating life; i.e., of inflicting capital punishment.

ADAM CLARKE

36. As it is written. And these are no more than we may naturally expect from the present constitution of the world, and the positive predictions of the prophet, Ps. xliv. 22, who foresaw that a wicked world would always persecute and oppress the true followers of God.

37. Nay. As the prophet adds in the same place, "All this is come upon us; yet have we not forgotten thee, neither have we dealt falsely in thy covenant," vv. 17-18. So all these things may happen unto us, but in all these things we are more than conquerors. We abide faithful in the new covenant of our God; and He is faithful who has promised to support and make us more than conquerors; i.e., to give us a complete triumph over sin, and death, and hell, not leaving one enemy unsubdued.

38. For I am persuaded, after the blessed experience we have had of support by the grace and Spirit of Him that loved us, that neither fear of death, nor hope of life, nor evil angels, nor principalities, nor powers, persecuting us for Christ's sake; nor the things we endure at present, nor the things to come, whatever tribulation we may be called to suffer in future.

39. Nor height of honor, nor depth of ignominy, nor any other creature (nor any other thing whatever), shall be able to separate us who love God from the love of God, which He has vouchsafed to us in Christ Jesus.

MATTHEW HENRY

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

In that great ocean of the divine love we live and move and have our being, floating in it like some sea flower which spreads its filmy beauty and waves its long tresses in the depths of mid-ocean. The sound of its waters is ever in our ears; and above, beneath, around us, its mighty currents run evermore. We need not cower before the fixed gaze of some stony god, looking on us unmoved like those Egyptian deities that sit pitiless with idle hands on their laps, and wide-open lidless eyes gazing out across the sands. We need not fear the Omnipresence of love, nor the Omniscience which knows us altogether, and loves us even as it knows. Rather we shall be glad that we are ever in His presence, and desire, as the height of all felicity and the power for all goodness, to walk all the day long in the light of His countenance till the day come when we shall receive the crown of our perfecting in that we shall be "ever with the Lord."
—Expositions of Holy Scripture

Verses 1–5

The apostles' solemn profession of a great concern for the nation and people of the Jews—that he was heartily troubled that so many of them were enemies to the gospel. For this he had great heaviness and continual sorrow. It is wisdom as much as may be to mollify those truths which sound harshly: dip the nail in oil, it will drive the better. He introduces his discourse with this affectionate profession, that they might not think he triumphed over the rejected Jews. Paul was so far from desiring it that he most pathetically deprecates it.

I. He asserts it with a solemn protestation (v. 1): I say the truth in Christ, "I speak it as one of God's people, children that will not lie. I appeal to Christ concerning it." He appeals likewise to his own conscience. That which he was going to assert was a secret; it was concerning a sorrow in his heart to which none was a capable competent witness but God and his own conscience.—That I have great heaviness, v. 2. The very mention of it was unpleasant.

II. He backs it with a very serious imprecation out of love to the Jews. I could wish; he does not say, I do wish, for it was no proper means appointed for such an end; but, if it were, I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren—a very high pang of zeal and affection for his countrymen. Love is apt to be thus bold, and venturous, and self-denying. Because the glory of God's grace in the salvation of many is to be preferred before the welfare and happiness of a single person, Paul would be content to forego all his own happiness to purchase theirs. 1. He would be content to be cut off from the land of the living, as an anathema. They thirsted for his blood, persecuted him as the most obnoxious person in the world. "I am willing to bear all this, and a great deal more, for your good. Your unbelief and rejection create in my heart a heaviness so much greater than all these troubles can that I could look upon them not only as tolerable, but as desirable, rather than this rejection." 2. He would be content to be excommunicated from the society of the faithful if that would do them any good. He could wish himself no more remembered among the saints. He would be content to have his name buried in oblivion or reproach, for the good of the Jews. 3. He could be content to be cut off from all his share of happiness in Christ, if that might be a means of their salvation.

III. He gives us the reason of this affection and concern.

1. Because of their relation to them: My brethren, my kinsmen, according to the flesh. Though they were very bitter against him upon all occasions, thus respectfully does he speak of them. It shows him to be a man of forgiving spirit. My kinsmen. Paul was a Hebrew of the Hebrews. We ought to be in a special manner concerned for the spiritual good of our relations. Concerning them, and our usefulness to them, we must in a special manner give account

2. Especially because of their relation to God (v. 4, 5): Who are Israelites, distinguished by visible church privileges, many of which are here mentioned. (1) The adoption; not that which is saving, and which entitles to eternal happiness, but that which was external. (2) And the glory. The many tokens of the posite of 'holding guilty'; and consequently (as CALVIN triumphantly argues) that it means 'to absolve from the charge of guilt.' (8) If there could be any reasonable doubt in what light the death of Christ is to be regarded in this Epistle, vs. 34 ought to set that doubt entirely at rest. For there the apostle's question is, Who shall "condemn" God's elect, since "Christ died" for them; showing beyond all doubt (as PHILIPPI justly argues) that it was the expiatory (character of that death which the apostle had in view. (9) What an affecting view of the love of Christ does it give us to learn that His greatest nearness to God and most powerful interest with Him—as "seated on His right hand"—is employed in behalf of His people here below (vs. 34)! (10) "The whole universe, with all that it contains, so far as it is good, is the friend and ally of the Christian; and, so far as it is evil, is more than a conquered foe" (vss. 35-39), [HODGE]. (11) Are we who "have tasted that the Lord is gracious," both "kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation" (I Pet. 1:5), and embraced in the arms of Invincible Love? Then surely, while "building ourselves up on our most holy faith," and "praying in the Holy Ghost," only the more should we feel constrained to "keep ourselves in the love of God, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life" (Jude 20,21).

CHAPTER 9

VSS. 1-33. THE BEARING OF THE FOREGOING TRUTHS UPON THE CONDITION AND DESTINY OF THE CHOSEN PEOPLE—ELECTION—THE CALLING OF THE GENTILES. Too well aware that he was regarded as a traitor to the dearest interests of his people (Acts 21:33; 22:22; 25:24), the apostle opens this division of his subject by giving vent to his real feelings with extraordinary vehemence of protestation. 1, 2. I say the truth in Christ—as if steeped in the spirit of Him who wept over impenitent and doomed Jerusalem (cf. ch. 1:9; II Cor. 12:19; Phil. 1:8). my conscience bearing me witness in the Holy Ghost—'my conscience as quickened, illuminated, and even now under the direct operation of the Holy Ghost.' That I have . . .—'That I have great grief (or, sorrow) and unceasing anguish in my heart'—the bitter hostility of his nation to the glorious Gospel, and the awful consequences of their unbelief, weighing heavily and incessantly upon his spirit. 3. For I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for—'in behalf of'—my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh—In proportion as he felt himself severed from his nation, he seems to have realized all the more vividly their natural relationship. To explain away the wish here expressed, as too strong for any Christian to utter or conceive, some have rendered the opening words, 'I did wish,' referring it to his former unenlightened state; a sense of the words too tame to be endured: others unwarrantably soften the sense of the word "accursed." But our version gives the true import of the original; and if it be understood as the language rather of "strong and indistinct emotions than of definite ideas" [HODGE], expressing passionately how he felt his whole being swallowed up in the salvation of his people, the difficulty will vanish, and we shall be reminded of the similar idea so nobly expressed by Moses (Exod. 32:32). 4. Who are Israelites—See ch. 11:1; II Corinthians 11:22; Philippians 3:5. to whom pertaineth—'whose is'—the adoption—It is true that, compared with the new economy, the old was a state of minority and pupilage, and so far that of a bond-servant (Gal. 4:1-3); yet, compared with the state of the surrounding heathen, the choice of Abraham and his seed was a real separation of them to be a Family of God (Exod. 4:22; Deut. 32:6; Isa. 1:2; Jer. 31:9; Hos. 11:1; Mal. 1:6). and the glory—that "glory of the Lord," or 'visible token of the Divine Presence in the midst of them,' which rested on the ark and filled the tabernacle during all their wanderings in the wilderness; which in Jerusalem continued to be seen in the tabernacle and temple, and only disappeared when, at the Captivity, the temple was demolished, and the sun of the ancient economy began to go down. This was what the Jews called the "Shekinah." and the covenants—"the covenants of promise" to which the Gentiles before Christ were "strangers" (Eph. 2:12); meaning the one covenant with Abraham in its successive renewals (see Gal. 3:16, 17). and the giving of the law—from Mount Sinai, and the possession of it thereafter, which the Jews justly deemed their peculiar honor (Deut. 26:18, 19; Ps. 147:19, 20; ch. 2:17). and the service of God—or, of the sanctuary,

ADAM CLARKE

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

The recognition of this triumphant sovereignty of love over all these real and supposed antagonists makes us, too, lords over them, and delivers us from the temptations which some of them present us to separate ourselves from the love of God. They all become our servants and helpers, uniting us to that love. So we are set free from the dread of death and from the distractions incident to life. So we are delivered from superstitious dreads of an unseen world, and from craven fear of men. So we are emancipated from absorption in the present and from careful thought for the future. So we are at home everywhere, and every corner of the universe is to us one of the many mansions of our Father's house. "All things are yours, . . . and ye are Christ's; and Christ is God's."
—Expositions of Holy Scripture

1. I say the truth in Christ, I lie not. This is one of the most solemn oaths any man can possibly take. He appeals to Christ as the Searcher of hearts that he tells the truth; asserts that his conscience was free from all guile in this matter, and that the Holy Ghost bore him testimony that what he said was true.

3. For I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ. Very few passages in the New Testament have puzzled critics and commentators more than this. Every person saw the perfect absurdity of understanding it in a literal sense, as no man in his right mind could wish himself eternally damned in order to save another, or to save even the whole world. And the supposition that such an effect could be produced by such a sacrifice was equally absurd and monstrous. The Greek word anathema properly signifies anything devoted to God, so as to be destroyed; it answers to the Hebrew cherem, which the Septuagint translate by it, and means either a "thing or person separated from its former state or condition, and devoted to destruction." In this sense it is used, Deut. vii. 25-26; Josh. vi. 17-18; vii. 12. It is certain that the word, among both Hebrews and Greeks, was used to express a person devoted to destruction for the public safety. This one circumstance is sufficient to explain the word in this place. Paul desired to be devoted to destruction, as the Jews then were, in order to redeem his countrymen from this most terrible excision. He was willing to become a sacrifice for the public safety, and to give his life to redeem theirs.

4. Who are Israelites. Descendants of Jacob, a man so highly favored of God, and from whom he received his name Israel—"a prince of God," Gen. xxxii. 28, from which name his descendants were called Israelites, and separated unto God for His glory and praise. Their very name of Israelites implied their very high dignity; they were a royal nation, princes of the most high God. The adoption. The Israelites were all taken into the family of God, and were called His sons and firstborn, Exod. iv. 22; Deut. xiv. 1; Jer. xxxi. 9; Hos. xi. 1; and this adoption took place when God made the covenant with them at Horeb. The glory. The manifestation of God among them; principally by the cloud and pillar, and the Shekinah, or Divine Presence, appearing between the cherubim over the mercy seat. These were peculiar to the Jews; no other nation was ever thus favored. The covenants. The covenants made with Abraham, both that which relates to the spiritual seed and that which was peculiar to his natural descendants, Gal. iii. 16-17; which covenants were afterwards renewed by Moses, Deut. xxix. 1. The giving of the law. The revelation of God by God himself, containing a system of moral and political precepts. This was also peculiar to the Jews, for to no other nation had He ever given a revelation of His divine presence and guidance, the cloud, the Shechinah, the distinguishing favours conferred upon them—these were the glory. (3) And the covenants—the covenant made with Abraham, and often renewed with his seed upon divers occasions. Still these pertained to Israel. (4) And the giving of the law. It is a great privilege to have the law of God among us, and it is to be accounted so. (5) And the services of God. They had the ordinances of God's worship among them—the temple, the altars, the priests, the sacrifices, the feasts. While other nations were worshipping and serving stocks, and stones, and devils, and they knew not what of other idols their own invention, the Israelites were serving the true God in the way of his own appointment. (6) And the promises—promises relating to the Messiah and the gospel state. The comfort of the promises is to be had in obedience to that law and attendance upon that service. (7) Whose are the fathers (v. 5), Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, that stood so high in the favour of God. It was for the fathers' sake that they were taken into covenant. (8) But the greatest honour of all was that of them as concerning the flesh, Christ came. This was the great privilege of the Jews, that Christ was of kin to them. Mentioning Christ, he interposes a very great word concerning him, that he is over all, God blessed for ever. It is a very full proof of the Godhead of Christ; he is not only over all, as Mediator, but he is God blessed for ever. It was likewise the honour of the Jews that, seeing God blessed for ever would be a man, he would be a Jew.

Verses 6–13

The rejection of the Jews, by the establishment of the gospel dispensation, did not at all invalidate the word of God's promise to the patriarchs: Not as though the word of God hath taken no effect (v. 6). We are not to ascribe inefficacy to any word of God: nothing that he has spoken does or can fall to the ground; see Isa. lv. 10, 11. This is to be understood especially of the promise of God, which may be to a wavering faith very doubtful; but it is not, it cannot be, made of no effect.

Now the difficulty is to reconcile the rejection of the unbelieving Jews with the word of God's promise. This he does in four ways: 1. By explaining the true meaning and intention of the promise, v. 6–13. 2. By asserting the absolute sovereignty of God, v. 14–24. 3. By showing how this rejection of the Jews, and the taking in of the Gentiles, were foretold in the Old Testament, v. 25–29. 4. By fixing the true reason of the Jews' rejection, v. 30. to the end.

In this paragraph the apostle explains the true meaning and intention of the promise. When we misunderstand the promise, no marvel if we are ready to quarrel with God about the accomplishment. When God said he would be a God to Abraham, and to his seed, he did not mean it of all his seed according to the flesh. He intended it with a limitation. And as from the beginning it was appropriated to Isaac and not to Ishmael, to Jacob and not to Esau, and yet for all this the word of God was not made of no effect; so now the same promise is appropriated to believing Jews that embrace Christ, and, though it throws off multitudes that refuse Christ, yet the promise is not therefore invalidated.

I. He lays down this proposition—that they are not all Israel who are of Israel (v. 6), neither because they are, &c., v. 7. They are not all really Israel that are so in name and profession. Grace does not run in the blood.

II. He proves this by instances. Some of Abraham's seed were chosen, and others not; God therein wrought according to the counsel of his own will.

1. He specifies the case of Isaac and Ishmael, both of them the seed of Abraham; and yet Isaac only taken into covenant with God, and Ishmael rejected. For this he quotes Gen. xxi. 12, In Isaac shall thy seed be called, because the covenant was to be established with Isaac, Gen. xvii. 19. The blessings wrapt up in that great word, being communicated by God as a benefactor, he was free to determine on what head they should rest, and accordingly entailed them upon Isaac. This he explains further (v. 8, 9). The children of the flesh, as such, are not therefore the children of God, for then Ishmael had put in a good claim. This remark comes home to the unbelieving Jews. They had confidence in the flesh. Ishmael was a child of the flesh, representing those that expect justification and salvation by their own strength and righteousness. The children of the promise are counted for the seed. Those that have the happiness of being counted for the seed have it not for the sake of any merit of their own, but purely by virtue of the promise. Isaac was a child of promise; this he proves, v. 9. He was also con-meaning the whole divinely instituted religious service, in the celebration of which they were brought so nigh unto God. and the promises—the great Abrahamic promises, successively unfolded, and which had their fulfilment only in Christ; (see Heb. 7:6; Gal. 3:16, 21; Acts 26:6, 7). 5. Whose are the fathers—here, probably, the three great fathers of the covenant—Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob—by whom God condescended to name Himself (Exod. 8:6, 13; Luke 20:37). and—most exalted privilege of all, and as such, reserved to the last—of whom as concerning the flesh—see on ch. 1:3—Christ came—or, 'is Christ'—who is over all, God—rather, 'God over all.' blessed for ever. Amen—To get rid of the bright testimony here borne to the supreme divinity of Christ, various expedients have been adopted: (1) To place a period, either after the words "concerning the flesh Christ came," rendering the next clause as a doxology to the Father—"God who is over all be blessed for ever"; or after the word "all"-thus, "Christ came, who is over all: God be blessed . . . ." [ERASMUS, LOCKE, FRITZSCHL, MEYER, JOWETT, etc.]. But it is fatal to this view, as even Socinus admits, that in other Scripture doxologies the word "Blessed" precedes the name of God on whom the blessing is invoked (thus: "Blessed be God," Ps. 68:35; "Blessed be the Lord God, the God of Israel," Ps. 72:18). Besides, any such doxology here would be 'unmeaning and frigid in the extreme'; the sad subject on which he was entering suggesting anything but a doxology, even in connection with Christ's Incarnation [ALFORD]. (2) To transpose the words rendered 'who is'; in which case the rendering would be, 'whose (i.e., the fathers') is Christ according to the flesh' [CRELLIUS, WHISTON, TAYLOR, WHITBY]. But this is a desperate expedient, in the face of all MS. authority; as is also the conjecture of GROTIUS and others, that the word "God" should be omitted from the text. It remains then, that we have here no doxology at all, but a naked statement of fact, that while Christ is "of" the Israelitish nation "as concerning the flesh," He is in another respect "God over all, blessed for ever." (In II Cor. 11:31 the very Greek phrase which is here rendered "who is," is used in the same sense; and cf. ch. 1:25, Greek.) In this view of the passage, as a testimony to the supreme divinity of Christ, besides all the orthodox fathers, some of the ablest modern critics concur [BENGEL, THOLUCK, STUART, OLSHAUSEN, PHILIPPI, ALFORD, etc.] 6. Not as though the word of God had taken none effect—'hath fallen to the ground,' i.e., failed: cf. Luke 16:17, Greek. for they are not all Israel which are of Israel—better, 'for not all they which are of Israel are Israel.' Here the apostle enters upon the profound subject of ELECTION, the treatment of which extends to the end of ch. 11—'Think not that I mourn over the total loss of Israel; for that would involve the failure of God's word to Abraham; but not all that belong to the natural seed, and go under the name of "Israel," are the Israel of God's irrevocable choice.' The difficulties which encompass this subject lie not in the apostle's teaching, which is plain enough, but in the truths themselves, the evidence for which, taken by themselves, is overwhelming, but whose perfect harmony is beyond human comprehension in the present state. The great source of error here lies in hastily inferring [as THOLUCK and others], from the apostle's taking up, at the close of this chapter, the calling of the Gentiles in connection with the rejection of Israel, and continuing this subject through the two next chapters, that the Election treated of in the body of this chapter is national, not personal Election, and consequently is Election merely to religious advantages, not to eternal salvation. In that case, the argument of vs. 6, with which the subject of Election opens, would be this: 'The choice of Abraham and his seed has not failed; because though Israel has been rejected, the Gentiles have taken their place; and God has a right to choose what nation He will to the privileges of His visible kingdom.' But so far from this, the Gentiles are not so much as mentioned at all till towards the close of the chapter; and the argument of this verse is, that 'all Israel is not rejected, but only a portion of it, the remainder being the "Israel" whom God has chosen in the exercise of His sovereign right.' And that this is a choice not to mere external privileges, but to eternal salvation, will abundantly appear from what follows. 7-9. Neither, because they are the seed of Abraham, are they all children—'Not in the line of mere fleshly descent from Abraham does the election run; else Ishmael, Hagar's child, and even Keturah's children, would be included, which they were not.' but—the true election are such of Abraham's seed as God unconditionally will. The service. The particular ordinances, rites, and ceremonies of their religious worship, and especially the sacrificial system, so expressive of the sinfulness of sin and the holiness of God. The promises. The land of Canaan, and the blessings of the Messiah and His kingdom, which promises had been made and often repeated to the patriarchs and to the prophets.

5. Whose are the fathers. Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, the twelve patriarchs, Moses, Joshua, Samuel, David, etc., without controversy, the greatest and most eminent men that ever flourished under heaven. From these, in an uninterrupted and unpolluted line, the Jewish people had descended, and it was no small glory to be able to reckon, in their genealogy, persons of such incomparable merit and excellency. And of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came. These ancestors were the more renowned as being the progenitors of the human nature of the Messiah Christ; the Messiah "according to the flesh" sprang from them. But this Messiah was more than man; He is God over all; the very Being who gave them being, though He appeared to receive a being from them. Here the apostle most distinctly points out the twofold nature of our Lord—His eternal Godhead and His humanity.

6. Not as though the word of God hath taken none effect. A Jew might have objected, as in chap. iii. 3: "Is not God bound by His faithfulness to continue the Jews as His peculiar church and people, notwithstanding the infidelity of the major part of them?" To which it may be answered: This awful dispensation of God towards the Jews is not inconsistent with the veracity of the divine promise; for even the whole body of natural-born Jews are not the whole of the Israelites comprehended in the promise. Abraham is the father of many nations; and his seed is not only that which is of the law, but that also which is "of the faith of Abraham," chap. iv. 16-17. The Gentiles were included in the Abrahamic covenant as well as the Jews, and therefore the Jews have no exclusive right to the blessings of God's kingdom.

7. Neither because they are the seed of Abraham. Nor can they conclude, because they are the natural descendants of Abraham, that therefore they are all of them, without exception, the children in whom the promise is to be fulfilled. But, In Isaac shall thy seed be called. The promise is not confined to immediate natural descent, but may be accomplished in any part of Abraham's posterity. For Abraham had several sons besides Isaac, Gen. xxv. 1-2, particularly Ishmael, who was circumcised before Isaac was born, and in whom Abraham was desirous that the promise should be fulfilled, Gen. xvii. 18. In him God might have fulfilled the promise had He so pleased; and yet He said to Abraham, Gen. xxi. 12: Not in Ishmael, but "in Isaac shall thy seed be called."

8. That is, They which are the children of the flesh. Whence it appears that not the children who descend from Abraham's loins, nor those who were circumcised as he was, nor even those whom he might expect and desire, are therefore the Church and people of God; but those who are made children by the good pleasure and promise of God, as Isaac was, are alone to be accounted for the seed with whom the covenant was established.

9. For this is the word of promise. That is, this is evidently implied in the promise recorded in Gen. xviii. 10: "At this time I will come," saith God, "and exert My divine power, and Sarah, though fourscore and ten years old, shall have a son"; which shows that it is the ceived and born by virtue of the promise, and so a proper type of those who are now counted for the seed, even true believers, who are born, not of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God.

2. The case of Jacob and Esau (v. 10–13), which is much stronger. There was a previous difference between Ishmael and Isaac, before Ishmael was cast out: Ishmael was of a fierce disposition, and had mocked or persecuted Isaac. But, in the case of Jacob and Esau, they were both the sons of Isaac by one mother. The difference was made between them by the divine counsel before they were born, or had done any good or evil. Both lay struggling alike in their mother's womb, when it was said, The elder shall serve the younger, that the purpose of God according to election might stand—that this great truth may be established, that God chooses some and refuses others by his own absolute and sovereign will. This difference that was put between Jacob and Esau he further illustrates by a quotation from Mal. i. 2, 3, where it is said, not of Jacob and Esau, but the Edomites and Israelites their posterity, Jacob have I loved, and Esau have I hated. The people of Israel were taken into the covenant, while the Edomites were rejected. Such a difference did God put between those two nations, that both descended from the loins of Abraham and Isaac, as at first there was a difference put between Jacob and Esau. (1) Some understand it of the election and rejection of conditions or qualifications. As God chose Isaac and Jacob, and rejected Ishmael and Esau, so he might and did choose faith to be the condition of salvation and reject the works of the law. (2) Others understand it of the election and rejection of particular persons—some loved, and others hated, from eternity. But the apostle speaks of Jacob and Esau, not in their own persons, but as ancestors. Nor does God condemn any merely because he will do it, without any reason taken from their own deserts. (3) Others therefore understand it of the election and rejection of people considered complexly. His design is to justify God, and his mercy and truth, in calling the Gentiles, while he suffered the obstinate part of the Jews to persist in unbelief. The choosing of Jacob the younger, and preferring him before Esau the elder (so crossing hands), were to intimate that the Jews, though the natural seed of Abraham, should be laid aside; and the Gentiles, who were as the younger brother, should be taken in in their stead. The Jews had for many ages been the favourites of heaven. Now that the gospel was preached, Christian churches (and in process of time Christian nations), become their successors in the divine favour.

Verses 14–24

The apostle comes here to maintain the absolute sovereignty of God, in disposing of the children of men. God is to be considered as an owner and benefactor, giving to the children of men such grace and favour as he has determined in and by his secret and eternal will.

Now this part of his discourse is in answer to two objections.

I. It might be objected, Is there unrighteousness with God? This the apostle startles at the thought of: God forbid! Far be it from us to think such a thing. He denies the consequences, and proves the denial.

1. In respect of those to whom he shows mercy, v. 15, 16. He quotes that scripture to show God's sovereignty in dispensing his favours (Exod. xxxiii. 19): I will be gracious to whom I will be gracious. All God's reasons of mercy are taken from within himself. He dispenses his gifts to whom he will, without giving us any reason. The expression is very emphatic, and the repetition makes it more so: I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, he will do what he will. Therefore God's mercy endures for ever, because the reason of it is fetched from within himself; therefore his gifts and callings are without repentance.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

chooses, as exemplified in that promise. In Isaac shall thy seed be called—(Gen. 21:12). 10-13. And not only so; but when Rebecca . . .—It might be thought that there was a natural reason for preferring the child of Sarah, as being Abraham's true and first wife, both to the child of Hagar, Sarah's maid, and to the children of Keturah, his second wife. But there could be no such reason in the case of Rebecca, Isaac's only wife; for the choice of her son Jacob was the choice of one of two sons by the same mother and of the younger in preference to the elder, and before either of them was born, and consequently before either had done good or evil to be a ground of preference: and all to show that the sole ground of distinction lay in the unconditional choice of God—"not of works, but of Him that calleth."

ALBERT BARNES:

13. "As it is written." Mal. 1:2, 3. That is, the distribution of favors is on the principle advanced by the prophet, and is in accordance with the declaration that God had in fact loved the one and hated the other.

"Jacob." This refers, doubtless, to the posterity of Jacob. "Have I loved." I have shown affection for that people; I have bestowed on them great privileges and blessings as proofs of attachment. I have preferred Jacob to Esau.

"Esau." The descendants of Esau, the Edomites (see Mal. 1:4). "Have I hated." This does not mean any positive hatred, but that he had preferred Jacob, and had withheld from Esau those privileges and blessings which he had conferred on the posterity of Jacob. This is explained in Mal. 1:3, "And I hated Esau, and laid his mountains and heritage waste for the dragons of the wilderness" (cf. Jer. 49:17, 18; Ezek. 35:6). It was common among the Hebrews to use the terms love and hatred in this comparative sense, where the former implied strong positive attachment, and the latter, not positive hatred, but merely a less love, or the withholding of the expressions of affection. "He that spareth his rod hateth his son; but he that loveth him chasteneth him betimes" (Prov. 13:24); "No man can serve two masters, for either he will hate the one and love the other" (Matt. 6:24); "If any man come to me, and hate not his father and mother" (Luke 14:26).
—Popular Commentary

14. What shall we say then? Is there unrighteousness with God? God forbid—This is the first of two objections to the foregoing doctrine, that God chooses one and rejects another, not on account of their works, but purely in the exercise of His own good pleasure: 'This doctrine is inconsistent with the justice of God.' The answer to this objection extends to vs. 19, where we have the second objection.

15. For he saith to Moses—Exod. 33:19—I will have mercy on whom I will have—'on whom I have'—mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have—'on whom I have'—compassion—'There can be no unrighteousness in God's choosing whom He will, for to Moses He expressly claims the right to do so.' Yet it is worthy of notice that this is expressed in the positive rather than the negative form: not, 'I will have mercy on none but whom I will'; but, 'I will have mercy on whomsoever I will.'

sovereign will and act of God alone which singles out and constitutes the peculiar seed that was to inherit the promise made to Abraham.

11. For the children being not yet born. As the word children is not in the text, the word "nations" would be more proper; for it is of nations that the apostle speaks, as the following verses show, as well as the history to which he refers. Neither having done any good. To merit the distinction of being made the peculiar people of God. Or evil, to deserve to be left out of this covenant, and the distinguishing national blessings which it conferred. That the purpose of God according to election might stand—that such distinctions might appear to depend on nothing but God's free choice. Not of works, or any desert in the people or nations thus chosen; but of the mere purpose of him that calleth any people He pleases, to make them the depositories of His especial blessings, and thus to distinguish them from all others.

12-13. The elder shall serve the younger. These words, with those of Malachi, Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated, are cited by the apostle to prove, according to their typical signification, that the "purpose of God according to election" does and will stand, "not of works, but of him that calleth"; that is, that the purpose of God, which is the ground of that election which He makes among men, unto the honor of being Abraham's seed, might appear to remain unchangeable in Him, and to be even the same which He had declared unto Abraham. That these words are used in a national and not in a personal sense is evident from this: that, taken in the latter sense they are not true, for Jacob never did exercise any power over Esau, nor was Esau ever subject to him. Jacob, on the contrary, was rather subject to Esau, and was sorely afraid of him; and, first, by his messengers, and afterwards personally, acknowledged his brother to be his lord, and himself to be his servant; see Gen. xxxii. 4; xxxiii. 8, 13. And hence it appears that neither Esau nor Jacob, nor even their posterities, are brought here by the apostle as instances of any personal reprobation from eternity. For it is very certain that very many, if not the far greatest part, of Jacob's posterity were wicked, and rejected by God; and it is not less certain that some of Esau's posterity were partakers of the faith of their father Abraham. (1) It incontestably appears from these passages that the prophet does not speak at all of the person of Jacob or Esau, but of their respective posterities. (2) If neither the prophet nor the apostle speaks of the persons of Jacob or Esau, but of their posterity, then it is evident that neither the love of God to Jacob nor the hatred of God to Esau were such according to which the eternal states of men, in either happiness or misery, are to be determined; nor is there here any scriptural or rational ground for the decree of unconditional personal election and reprobation, which comparatively modern times have endeavored to build on these scriptures.

14. What shall we say then? To what conclusion shall we come on the facts before us? Shall we suggest that God's bestowing peculiar privileges in this unequal manner on those who otherwise are in equal circumstances is inconsistent with justice and equity? "By no means." Whatever God does is right, and He may dispense His blessings to whom and on what terms He pleases.

15. For he saith to Moses, I will have mercy. The words of God to Moses, Exod. xxxiii. 19, show that God has a right to dispense His blessings as He pleases; for, after He had declared that He would spare the Jews of old and continue them in the relation of His peculiar people, when they had deserved to have been cut off for their idolatry, He said: "I will make all my goodness pass before thee, and I will proclaim the name of the Lord before thee . . . and will shew mercy on whom I will shew mercy"; and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion. As if He had said: I will make such a display of My perfections as shall convince you that My nature is kind and beneficent; but know that I am a debtor to none of My creatures. I will give My salvation in My own way and on My own terms. "He that believeth not shall be damned." This

Hence he infers (v. 16), It is not of him that willeth. It is not to be ascribed to the most generous desire, nor to the most industrious endeavour, of man, but only and purely to the free grace and mercy of God. In Jacob's case it was not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth; but only the mercy and grace of God. The reason why the unworthy, undeserving Gentiles are called, while the greatest part of the Jews are left to perish in unbelief, is not because those Gentiles were better deserving or better disposed for such a favour, but because of God's free grace that made that difference. Such is the method of God's grace towards all that partake of it, for he is found of those that sought him not (Isa. lxv. 1).

2. In respect of those who perish, v. 17. God's sovereignty is here discovered in the instance of Pharaoh. What God did with Pharaoh. He raised him up. Thus doth God raise up sinners in outward prosperity, external privileges. What he designed in it: That I might show my power in thee. God would, by all this, serve the honour of his name, and manifest his power.

His conclusion concerning both these we have, v. 18. He hath mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth. The various dealings of God must be resolved into his absolute sovereignty. He is debtor to no man, his grace is his own; we have none of us deserved it, nay, we have all justly forfeited it a thousand times. Those who are saved must thank God only, and those who perish must thank themselves only. We are bound to do our utmost for the salvation of all we have to do with; but God is bound no further than he has been pleased to bind himself; and that is that he will receive, and not cast out, those that come to Christ. Had he mercy on the Gentiles? It was because he would have mercy on them.

II. It might be objected, Why doth he yet find fault? For who hath resisted his will? (v. 19). He might well find fault if people refused to come up to the terms on which such a salvation is offered; the salvation being so great, the terms could not be hard. If God, while he gives effectual grace to some, denies it to others, why doth he find fault with those to whom he denies it? This objection he answers at large,

1. By reproving the objector (v. 20): Nay but, O man. This is not an objection fit to be made by the creature against his Creator, by man against God. Observe how contemptibly he speaks of man, when he comes to argue with God his Maker: "Who art thou, thou that art so foolish, so incompetent a judge of the divine counsels? art thou able to fathom such a depth." That repliest against God. It becomes us to submit to him, not to reply against him; not to fly in his face, nor to charge him with folly.

2. By resolving all into the divine sovereignty. We are the thing formed, and he is the former; and it does not become us to arraign his wisdom in ordering and disposing of us into this or that shape of figure. God's sovereignty over us is fitly illustrated by the power that the potter hath over the clay; compare Jer. xviii. 6.

(1) He gives us the comparison, v. 21. The potter, out of the same lump, may make either a fashionable vessel, or a contemptible vessel, and herein he acts arbitrarily.

(2) The application of the comparison, v. 22–24. Two sorts of vessels God forms out of the great lump of fallen mankind: Vessels of wrath. In these God is willing to show his wrath. God will make it appear that he hates sin. He will likewise make his power known. In order to this, God endured them with much long-suffering—exercised a great deal of patience towards them, and so they became fitted for destruction, fitted by their own sin and self-hardening. The reigning corruptions and wickedness of the soul are its preparedness for hell.

16. So then it is not of him that willeth—hath the inward desire—nor of him that runneth—maketh active effort—(cf. I Cor. 9:24, 26; Phil. 2:16; 3:14). Both these are indispensable to salvation, yet salvation is owing to neither, but is purely "of God that showeth mercy." See on Philippians 2: 12, 13, "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling: for it is God which, out of His own good pleasure, worketh in you both to will and to do." 17. For the scripture saith to Pharaoh—observe here the light in which the Scripture is viewed by the apostle. Even for this same—'this very'—purpose have I raised—'raised I'—thee up . . .—The apostle had shown that God claims the right to choose whom He will: here he shows by an example that God punishes whom He will. But "God did not make Pharaoh wicked; He only forbore to make him good, by the exercise of special and altogether unmerited grace" [HODGE]. that I might—'may'—show my power in thee—It was not that Pharaoh was worse than others that he was so dealt with, but "in order that he might become a monument of the penal justice of God, and it was with a view to this that God provided that the evil which was in him should be manifested in this definite form" [OLSHAUSEN]. and that my name might—'may'—be declared—'proclaimed'—in all the earth—"This is the principle on which all punishment is inflicted, that the true character of the Divine Lawgiver should be known. This is of all objects, where God is concerned, the highest and most important; in itself the most worthy, and in its results the most beneficent" [HODGE]. 18. Therefore hath he—'So then he hath.' The result then is that He hath—mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth—by judicially abandoning them to the hardening influence of sin itself (Ps. 81:11, 12; ch. 1:24, 26, 28; Heb. 3:8, 13), and of the surrounding incentives to it (Matt. 24:12; I Cor. 15:38; II Thess. 2:17). 19. Second objection to the doctrine of Divine Sovereignty: Thou shalt say then unto me, Why—'Why then' is the true reading—doth he yet find fault? for who hath resisted—'Who resisteth'—his will?—i.e., 'This doctrine is incompatible with human responsibility'; If God chooses and rejects, pardons and punishes, whom He pleases, why are those blamed who, if rejected by Him, cannot help sinning and perishing? This objection shows quite as conclusively as the former the real nature of the doctrine objected to—that it is Election and Non-election to eternal salvation prior to any difference of personal character; this is the only doctrine that could suggest the objection here stated, and to this doctrine the objection is plausible. What now is the apostle's answer? It is twofold. First: 'It is irreverence and presumption in the creature to arraign the Creator.' 20, 21. Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made—'didst thou make'—me thus—(Isa. 45:9)? Hath not the potter power over the clay; of the same lump to make one vessel unto honour, and another to dishonour?—"The objection is founded on ignorance or misapprehension of the relation between God and His sinful creatures; supposing that He is under obligation to extend His grace to all, whereas He is under obligation to none. All are sinners, and have forfeited every claim to His mercy; it is therefore perfectly competent to God to spare one and not another, to make one vessel to honor and another to dishonor. But it is to be borne in mind that Paul does not here speak of God's right over His creatures as creatures, but as sinful creatures: as he himself clearly intimates in the next verses. It is the cavil of a sinful creature against his Creator that he is answering, and he does so by showing that God is under no obligation to give His grace to any, but is as sovereign as in fashioning the clay" [HODGE]. But, Second: 'There is nothing unjust in such sovereignty.' 22, 23. What if God, willing to show—'designing to manifest'—his wrath—His holy displeasure against sin—and to make his power—to punish it—known, endured with much long-suffering the vessels of wrath—i.e., 'destined to wrath'; just as "vessels of mercy," in the next verse, mean 'vessels destined to mercy'; compare Ephesians 2:3, "children of wrath." fitted for destruction—It is well remarked by STUART that the "difficulties which such statements involve are not to be got rid of by softening the language of one text, while so many others meet us which are of the same tenor; and even if we give up the Bible itself, so long as we acknowledge an omnipotent and omniscient God we cannot abate in the least degree from any of the difficulties which such texts make." Be it observed, however, that if God, as the apostle teaches, expressly "designed to manifest His wrath, and to make His is God's ultimate design; this purpose He will never change, and this He has fully declared in the everlasting gospel. This is the grand decree of reprobation and election.

16. So then it is not of him that willeth. I conclude, therefore, from these several instances, that the making or continuing any body of men as the peculiar people of God is righteously determined, not by the judgment, hopes, or wishes of men, but by the will and wisdom of God alone.

17. For the scripture saith unto Pharaoh. Instead of showing the Israelites mercy, He might justly have suffered them to go on in sin, till He should have signalized His wisdom and justice in their destruction; as appears from what God in His Word declares concerning His dealings with Pharaoh and the Egyptians, Exod. ix. 15-16: "For now I had stretched forth my hand [in the plague of boils and blains], and I had smitten thee and thy people with the pestilence; and thou hadst [by this plague] been cut off from the earth [as thy cattle were by the murrain]; but in very deed for this cause have I raised thee up"—I have restored you to health by removing the boils and blains, and by respiting your deserved destruction to a longer day, that I may, in your instance, give such a demonstration of My power in your final overthrow that all mankind may learn that I am God, the righteous Judge of all the earth, the Avenger of wickedness.

18. Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will. This is the apostle's conclusion from the facts already laid down: that God, according to His own will and wisdom, in perfect righteousness, bestows mercy—that is to say, His blessings—upon one part of mankind (the Jews of old and the Gentiles of the present time) while He suffers another part (the Egyptians of old and the Jews of the present day) to go on in the abuse of His goodnsss and forbearance, hardening themselves in sin, till He brings upon them a most just and exemplary punishment, unless this be prevented by their deep repentance and general return to God through Jesus, the promised, the real Messiah.

19. Why doth he yet find fault? The question here is: If God's glory be so highly promoted and manifested by our obstinacy, and He suffers us to proceed in our hardness and infidelity, why does He find fault with us, or punish us for that which is according to His good pleasure?

20. Nay but, O man, who art thou? As if he had said: Weak, ignorant man, dare you retort on the infinitely good and righteous God? God has made, created, formed the Jewish nation, and shall the thing formed, when it hath corrupted itself, pretend to correct the wise and gracious Author of its being, and say, Why hast thou made me thus?

21. Hath not the potter power over the clay? The apostle continues his answer to the Jew. Has not God shown by the parable of the potter, Jer. xviii. 1 ff., that He may justly dispose of nations and of the Jews in particular according as He in His infinite wisdom may judge most right and fitting; even as the potter has a right, out of the same lump of clay, to make one vessel to a more honorable and another to a less honorable use, as his own judgment and skill may direct? The reference to this parable shows most positively that the apostle is speaking of men, not individually, but nationally; and it is strange that men should have given his words any other application with this scripture before their eyes.

22. What if God, willing to shew his wrath? The apostle refers here to the case of Pharaoh and the Egyptians, and to which he applies Jeremiah's parable of the potter, and from them to the then state of the Jews. Pharaoh and the Egypians were vessels of wrath—persons deeply guilty before God; and by their obstinate refusal of His grace and abuse of His goodness they had fitted themselves for that destruction which the wrath, the vindictive justice of God, inflicted, after He had endured their obstinate rebellion with much longsuffering; which is a most absolute proof that the hardening of their hearts and their ultimate punishment were the consequences of their obstinate refusal of His grace and abuse of His goodness, as the history in Exodus sufficiently shows. As the Jews of Vessels of mercy. The happiness bestowed upon the saved remnant is the fruit, not of their merit, but of God's mercy. Vessels of honour must to eternity own themselves vessels of mercy. What he designs in them: To make known the riches of his glory, that is, of his goodness; for God's goodness is his greatest glory. God makes known his glory, this goodness of his, in the preservation and supply of all the creatures: the earth is full of his goodness, but when he would demonstrate the riches of his goodness, he does it in the salvation of the saints. What he does for them: he does before prepare them to glory. This is God's work. We can destroy ourselves fast enough, but we cannot save ourselves. Sinners fit themselves for hell, but it is God that prepares saints for heaven. And would you know who these vessels of mercy are? Those whom he hath called (v. 24); for whom he did predestinate those he also called with an effectual call: and these not of the Jews only, but of the Gentiles. The question is not now whether of the seed of Abraham or no, but whether or no called according to his purpose.

Verses 25–29

The apostle here shows how the rejection of the Jews, and the taking in of the Gentiles, were foretold in the Old Testament. The Jews would, no doubt, willingly refer it to the Old Testament. Now he shows how this was there spoken of.

I. By the prophet Hosea. The Gentiles had not been the people of God: "But," says he, "I will call them my people, make them such and own them as such, notwithstanding all their unworthiness." Former badness is no bar to God's present grace and mercy.—And her beloved which was not beloved. Those whom God calls his people he calls beloved: he loves those that are his own. In the place where it was said, &c., there shall they be called. Wherever they are scattered over the face of the earth, there will God own them. Behold, what manner of love! This honour have all his saints.

II. By the prophet Isaiah, who speaks of the casting off of many of the Jews, in two places:

1. One is Isa. x. 22, 23, which speaks of the saving of a remnant, that is, but a remnant. It is no strange thing for God to abandon to ruin a great many of the seed of Abraham, and yet maintain his word of promise to Abraham in full force. This is intimated in the supposition that the number of children of Israel was as the sand of the sea. And yet only a remnant shall be saved; for many are called, but few are chosen. In this salvation of the remnant we are told (v. 28) from the prophet, (1) That he will complete the work: He will finish the work. When God begins he will make an end, whether in ways of judgment or of mercy. As for God, his work is perfect. Margin, He will finish the account. God has taken an account of the children of men: and he will finish the account, call in as many as belong to the election of grace, and then the account will be finished. (2) That he will finish it quickly. Now he will cut it short, and make a short work upon the earth. But he will cut it short in righteousness. Men, when they cut short, do amiss; but, when God cuts short, it is always in righteousness. The work (the word, the law) was under the Old Testament very long. Our duty is now, under the gospel, summed up in much less room than it was under the law; religion is brought into a less compass. With us contractions are apt to darken things, but it is not so in this case. Though it be cut short, it is clear and plain; and, because short, the more easy.

2. Another is quoted from Isa. i. 9, where the prophet is showing how God would preserve a seed. It was no strange thing for God to leave the greatest part of the people of the Jews to ruin, and to reserve to himself only a small remnant: and they must not wonder if he did so now. What God is. He is the Lord of sabaoth, that is, the Lord of hosts. When God secures a seed to himself he acts as Lord of sabaoth. It is an act of almighty power and infinite sovereignty. What his people are; they are a seed, a small number. But they are a useful number. It is a wonder of divine power and mercy that there are any saved; for even those that are left to be a seed, if God had dealt with them according to their sins, had perished with the rest.

Verses 30–33

The true reason of the reception of the Gentiles, and the rejection of the Jews. There was a difference in the way of their seeking, and therefore there was that different success. He concludes like an orator, What shall we say then?

I. Concerning the Gentiles. 1. How they had been alienated from righteousness: they followed not after power (in the way of wrath) known," it could only be by punishing some, while He pardons others; and if the choice between the two classes was not to be founded, as our apostle also teaches, on their own doings but on God's good pleasure, the decision behooved ultimately to rest with God. Yet, even in the necessary punishment of the wicked, as HODGE observes, so far from proceeding with undue severity, the apostle would have it remarked that God "endures with much long-suffering" those objects of His righteous displeasure. and that he might make known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy—that 'glorious exuberance of Divine mercy' which was manifested in choosing and eternally arranging for the salvation of sinners. 24. even us, whom he hath called . . . —rather, 'Whom he hath also called, even us . . . , in not only "afore preparing," but in due time effectually "calling us." not of the Jews . . . —better, 'not from among Jews only, but also from among Gentiles.' Here for the first time in this chapter the calling of the Gentiles is introduced; all before having respect, not to the substitution of the called Gentiles for the rejected Jews, but to the choice of one portion and the rejection of another of the same Israel. Had Israel's rejection been total, God's promise to Abraham would not have been fulfilled by the substitution of the Gentiles in their room; but Israel's rejection being only partial, the preservation of a "remnant," in which the promise was made good, was but "according to the election of grace." And now, for the first time, the apostle tells us that along with this elect remnant of Israel, it is God's purpose to "take out of the Gentiles a people for His name" (Acts 28:14); and that subject, thus introduced, is now continued to the end of ch. 11. 25. As he saith also in Osee—'Hosea.' I will call them my people, which were not my people; and her beloved, which was not beloved—quoted, though not quite to the letter, from Hosea 2:23, a passage relating immediately, not to the heathen, but to the kingdom of the ten tribes; but since they had sunk to the level of the heathen, who were "not God's people," and in that sense "not beloved," the apostle legitimately applies it to the heathen, as "aliens from the commonwealth of Israel and strangers to the covenants of promise" (so I Pet. 2:10). 26. And—another quotation from Hosea 1:10—it shall come to pass, that in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people; there shall they be called the children—'called sons'—of the living God—The expression, 'in the place where . . . there,' seems designed only to give greater emphasis to the gracious change here announced, from divine exclusion to divine admission to the privileges of the people of God. 27-29. Esaias also crieth—('But Isaiah crieth')—an expression denoting a solemn testimony openly borne (John 1:15; 7:28, 37; 12:44; Acts 23:6; 24:41). concerning Israel, Though the number of the children—'sons'—of Israel be as the sand of the sea, a—'the'—remnant—i.e., the elect remnant only—shall be saved: For he will finish the work, and cut—'is finishing the reckoning, and cutting'—it short in righteousness; because a short work —'reckoning'—will the Lord make upon the earth—Isaiah 10:22, 23, as in the LXX. The sense given to these words by the apostle may seem to differ from that intended by the prophet. But the sameness of sentiment in both places will at once appear, if we understand those words of the prophet, "the consumption decreed shall overflow with righteousness," to mean that while a remnant of Israel should be graciously spared to return from captivity, "the decreed consumption" of the impenitent majority should be "replete with righteousness," or illustriously display God's righteous vengeance against sin. The "short reckoning" seems to mean the speedy completing of His word, both in cutting off the one portion and saving the other. And as Esaias said—'hath said'—before—i.e., probably in an earlier part of his book, namely, Isaiah 1:9. Except the Lord of Sabaoth—i.e., 'The Lord of Hosts': the word is Hebrew, but occurs so in the Epistle of James (ch. 5:4), and has thence become naturalized in our Christian phraseology. had left us a seed—meaning a 'remnant'; small at first, but in due time to be a seed of plenty (cf. Ps. 22:30, 31; Isa. 6:12, 13). we had been—'become'—as Sodom . . . —But for this precious seed, the chosen people would have resembled the cities of the plain, both in degeneracy of character and in merited doom. 30, 31. What shall we say then?—'What now is the result of the whole?' The result is this—very different from what one would have expected—That the Gentiles, which followed not after righteousness, have attained—'attained'—to righteousness, even the righteousness of faith—As we have seen that "the righteousness of the apostle's time had sinned after the similitude of the Egyptians, hardening their hearts and abusing His goodness after every display of His long-suffering kindness, being now fitted for destruction, they were ripe for punishment; and that power, which God was making known for their salvation, having been so long and so much abused and provoked, was now about to show itself in their destruction as a nation. But even in this case there is not a word of their final damnation; much less that either they or any others were by a sovereign decree reprobated from all eternity; and that their very sins, the proximate cause of their punishment, were the necessary effect of that decree which had from all eternity doomed them to endless torments.

23. And that he mght make known. God "endured with much longsuffering the vessels of wrath": (1) "To shew his wrath, and to make his power known"; and also (2) That he might make known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy.

24. Even us, whom he hath called. All the Jews and Gentiles who have been "invited" by the preaching of the gospel to receive justification by faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, and have come to the gospel feast on this invitation.

25. As he saith also in Osee. It is a cause of not a little confusion that a uniformity in the orthography of the proper names of the Old and New Testaments has not been preserved. What stranger to our sacred books would suppose that the Osee above meant the Prophet Hosea, from whom, chap. ii. 23, this quotation is taken: "I will have mercy on her that had not obtained mercy; and I will say to them which were not my people, Thou art my people"? The apostle shows that this calling of the Gentiles was no fortuitous thing, but a firm purpose in the divine mind, which He had largely revealed to the prophets; and by opposing the calling of the Gentiles, the Jews in effect renounced their prophets and fought against God.

26. And it shall come to pass. These quotations are taken out of Hosea, chap. i. 10: "Yet the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea, which cannot be measured nor numbered; and it shall come to pass, that in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people, there it shall be said unto them, Ye are the sons of the living God." As if he had said: The decrease of numbers in the Church, by God's utterly taking away the ten tribes (v. 6) shall be well supplied by what shall afterwards come to pass by calling the Gentiles into it.

28. For he will finish the work, and cut it short. These appear to be forensic terms, and refer to the conclusion of a judicial proceeding; the Lord has tried and found them guilty, and will immediately execute upon them the punishment due to their transgressions.

29. And as Esaias said before. What God designs to do with the Jews at present, because of their obstinacy and rebellion, is similar to what He has done before, to which the same prophet refers, chap. i. 9: "Except the Lord of hosts had left unto us a very small remnant, we should have been as Sodom, and we should have been like unto Gomorrah"; i.e., had not God, who commands and overrules all the powers in heaven and earth, in mercy preserved a very small remnant, to keep up the name and being of the nation, it had been quite cut off and extinct, as were Sodom and Gomorrah.

MATTHEW HENRY

it. God was found of those that sought him not, Isa. lxv. 1. Thus doth God delight to dispense grace in a way of sovereignty and absolute dominion. 2. How they attained to righteousness, notwithstanding: By faith; by embracing Christ, and believing in Christ. They attained to that by the short cut of believing sincerely in Christ for which the Jews had been long in vain beating about the bush.

II. Concerning the Jews. 1. How they missed their end: they followed after the law of righteousness (v. 31). As many as stuck to their old Jewish principles and ceremonies, embracing the shadows now that the substance was come, these fell short of acceptance with God. 2. How they mistook their way, which was the cause of their missing the end, v. 32, 33. They sought, but not in the right way. Not by faith, not by depending upon the merit of Christ, and submitting to the terms of the gospel, which were the very life and end of the law. But they sought by the works of the law. This was the stumbling-stone at which they stumbled. They could by no means be reconciled to the doctrine of Christ, which brought them to expect justification through the merit of another. Christ himself is to some a stone of stumbling, for which he quotes Isa. viii. 14; xxviii. 16. It is sad that Christ should be set for the fall of any, and yet it is so (Luke ii. 34). So he is to multitudes; so he was to the unbelieving Jews. But still there is a remnant that do believe on him; and they shall not be ashamed, their hopes and expectations of justification by him shall not be disappointed, as theirs are who expect it by the law. The unbelieving Jews have no reason to quarrel with God for rejecting them; they had a fair offer made to them upon gospel terms, which they did not like. If they perish, they may thank themselves.

MARTIN LUTHER:

33. "He who believes in him will not be put to shame." The Hebrew text reads: "He who believes shall not make haste." This can be reconciled by interpreting it to mean that he who believes in Christ is secure in his conscience and righteous and, as the Scripture says, "bold as a lion" (Prov. 28:1). And again, "Whatever befalls the righteous man will not disturb him' (Prov. 12:21), while, according to Prov. 28:1, "The wicked flee when no one pursues," and again in Isa. 57:20: "The wicked are like the tossing sea, for it cannot rest." "There is no peace, says my God, for the wicked" (Isa. 57:21). And in Ps. 1:4 we read: "The wicked are not so, but are like chaff which the wind drives away"; in Lev. 26:36: "The sound of a driven leaf shall put them to flight"; and in Isa. 30:15 ff.: "For thus said the Lord God, the Holy One of Israel, In returning and rest you shall be saved; in quietness and in trust shall be your strength. And you would not, but you said, No! We will speed upon horses, therefore you shall speed away; and, We will ride upon swift steeds, therefore your pursuers shall be swift. A thousand shall flee at the threat of one . . ." And this is the meaning, that he who believes in Christ will not be in a hurry, will not flee, will not be terrified, for he fears nothing, he stands quiet and secure, established on the solid rock, as our Lord taught in Matt. 7:24.—Luther's Works faith" is the righteousness which justifies (see on ch. 3:22, etc.), this verse must mean that 'the Gentiles, who while strangers to Christ were quite indifferent about acceptance with God, having embraced the Gospel as soon as it was preached to them, experienced the blessedness of a justified state.' but Israel, which followed—'following'—after the law of righteousness, hath not attained—'attained not'—unto the law of righteousness—The word "law" is used here, we think, in the same sense as in ch. 7:23, to denote 'a principle of action'; i.e., 'Israel, though sincerely and steadily aiming at acceptance with God, nevertheless missed it.' 32, 33. Wherefore? Because they sought it not by faith, but as it were—rather simply, 'as'—by the works of the law—as if it were thus attainable, which justification is not: Since, therefore, it is attainable only by faith, they missed it. for—it is doubtful if this particle was originally in the text—they stumbled at that stumbling stone—better, 'against the stone of stumbling,' meaning Christ. But in this they only did—as it is written—Isa. 8:14; 28:16)—Behold . . . —Two Messianic predictions are here combined, as is not unusual in quotations from the Old Testament. Thus combined, the prediction brings together both the classes of whom the apostle is treating: those to whom Messiah should be only a stone of stumbling, and those who were to regard Him as the Corner-stone of all their hopes. Thus expounded, this chapter presents no serious difficulties, none which do not arise out of the subject itself, whose depths are unfathomable; whereas on every other view of it the difficulty of giving it any consistent and worthy interpretation is in our judgment insuperable. Note, (1) To speak and act "in Christ," with a conscience not only illuminated, but under the present operation of the Holy Ghost, is not peculiar to the supernaturally inspired, but is the privilege, and ought to be the aim, of every believer (vs. 1). (2) Grace does not destroy, but only intensify and elevate, the feelings of nature; and Christians should study to show this (vss. 2, 3). (3) To belong to the visible Church of God, and enjoy its high and holy distinctions, is of the sovereign mercy of God, and should be regarded with devout thankfulness (vss. 4, 5). (4) Yet the most sacred external distinctions and privileges will avail nothing to salvation without the heart's submission to the righteousness of God (vss. 31-33). (5) What manner of persons ought "God's elect" to be—in humility, when they remember that He hath saved them and called them, not according to their works, but according to His own purpose and grace, given them in Christ Jesus before the world began (II Tim. 1:9); in thankfulness, for "Who maketh thee to differ, and what hast thou that thou didst not receive?" (I Cor. 4:7); in godly jealousy over themselves; remembering that "God is not mocked," but "whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap" (Gal. 6:7); in diligence "to make our calling and election sure" (II Pet. 1:10); and yet in calm confidence that "whom God predestinates, and calls, and justifies, them (in due time) He also glorifies" (ch. 8:30). (6) On all subjects which from their very nature lie beyond human comprehension, it will be our wisdom to set down what God says in His word, and has actually done in His procedure towards men, as indisputable, even though it contradict the results at which in the best exercise of our limited judgment we may have arrived (vss. 14-23). (7) Sincerity in religion, or a general desire to be saved, with assiduous efforts to do right, will prove fatal as a ground of confidence before God, if unaccompanied by implicit submission to His revealed method of salvation (vss. 31-33). (8) In the rejection of the great mass of the chosen people, and the inbringing of multitudes of estranged Gentiles, God would have men to see a law of His procedure, which the judgment of the great day will more vividly reveal-that "the last shall be first and the first last" (Matt. 20:16).

ADAM CLARKE

31. But Israel, which followed after. But the Jews, who have hitherto been the people of God, though they have been industrious in observing a rule by which they supposed they could secure the blessings of God's peculiar kingdom, yet have not come up to the true and only rule by which those blessings can be secured.

32. Wherefore? And where lies their mistake? Being ignorant of God's righteousness, of His method of saving sinners by faith in Christ, they went about to establish their own righteousness—their own method of obtaining everlasting salvation. They attend not to the Abrahamic covenant, which stands on the extensive principles of grace and faith; but they turn all their regards to the law of Moses. They imagine that their obedience to that law gives them a right to the blessings of the Messiah's kingdom. But finding that the gospel sets our special interest in God and the privileges of His Church on a different footing, they are offended, and refuse to come into it.

33. As it is written, Behold, I lay in Sion. Christ, the Messiah, is become "a stone of stumbling" to them, and thus what is written in the prophecy of Isaiah is verified in their case, Isa. viii. 14; xxviii. 16: Behold, I lay in Sion, i.e., I shall bring in My Messiah. But He shall be a widely different Person from him whom the Jews expect; for whereas they expect the Messiah to be a mighty secular prince, and to set up a secular kingdom, He shall appear "a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief"; and redeem mankind, not by His sword or secular power, but by His humiliation, passion, and death. Therefore they will be offended at Him and reject Him, and think it would be reproachful to trust in such a Person for salvation. And whosoever believeth on him. But so far shall any be from confusion or disappointment who believes in Christ that, on the contrary, every genuine believer shall find salvation—the remission of sins here, and eternal glory hereafter.

CHAPTER 10

Verses 1–11

The scope of the apostle in this part of the chapter is to show the great pre-eminence of the righteousness of faith above that of the law; that he might persuade the Jews to believe in Christ.

I. Paul here professes his good affection to the Jews (v. 1, 2), where he gives them a good wish, and a good witness.

1. A good wish (v. 1), a wish that they might be saved. Though Paul preached against them, yet he prayed for them. This, he says, was his heart's desire and prayer. The strength and sincerity of his desire. It was his heart's desire; it was not a formal compli-

CHAPTER 10

Vss. 1-21. SAME SUBJECT CONTINUED—HOW ISRAEL CAME TO MISS SALVATION, AND THE GENTILES TO FIND IT. 1. Brethren, my heart's desire—The word here expresses 'entire complacency,' that in which the heart would experience full satisfaction. and prayer—'supplication'—to God for Israel—'for them' is the true reading; the subject being continued from the close of the preceding chapter. is, that they may be saved—'for their salvation.' Having before poured forth the anguish of his soul at the general unbelief of his nation and its dreadful consequences (ch. 9:1-3), he here expresses in the most emphatic terms his desire and prayer for

CHAPTER 10

1. My heart's desire. Though the apostle knew that the Jews were now in a state of rejection, yet he knew also that they were in this state through their own obstinacy, and that God was still waiting to be gracious, and consequently that they might still repent and turn to Him. Of his concern for their salvation he had already given ample proof, when he was willing to become a sacrifice for their welfare; see chap. ix. 3.

2. They have a zeal of God. They believe their law to have come immediately from God himself, and are jealous of its glory and ex-ment, as good wishes are with many from the teeth outward, but a real desire. The soul of prayer is the heart's desire. Cold desires do but beg denials. The offering up of this desire to God. It was his prayer. There may be desires in the heart, and yet no prayer. Wishing and woulding, if that be all, are not praying.

2. A good witness, as a reason of his good wish (v. 2): I bear them record that they have a zeal of God. The unbelieving Jews were the most bitter enemies Paul had in the world, and yet Paul gives them as good a character as the truth would bear. Charity teaches us to put the best construction upon words and actions that they will bear. We should take notice of that which is commendable even in bad people. They have a zeal of God. Their opposition to the gospel is from a principle of respect to the law. There is such a thing as a blind misguided zeal: such was that of the Jews.

II. He here shows the fatal mistake that the unbelieving Jews were guilty of. Their zeal was not according to knowledge. It is true God gave them that law for which they were so zealous; but they might have known that, by the appearance of the promised Messiah, an end was put to it. He gave the most convincing evidence that could be of his being the Messiah; and yet they would not own him, but shut their eyes against the clear light, so that their zeal for the law was blind. This he shows further, v. 3.

1. The nature of their unbelief. They have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God. Unbelief is a non-submission to the righteousness of God. Have not submitted. In true faith, there is need of a great deal of submission.

2. The causes of their unbelief, and these are two: (1) Ignorance of God's righteousness. They did not consider what need we have of a righteousness wherein to appear before him; if they had, they would never have expected justification by their own works, as if they could satisfy God's justice. (2) A proud conceit of their own righteousness: Going about to establish their own—a righteousness of their own working out, by the merit of their works. They thought they needed not to be beholden to the merit of Christ.

III. He here shows the folly of that mistake.

1. The subserviency of the law to the gospel (v. 4): Christ is the end of the law for righteousness. The design of the law was to lead people to Christ. The use of the law was to direct people for righteousness to Christ. (1) Christ is the end of the ceremonial law, because he is the perfection of it. (2) Christ is the end of the moral law in that he did what the law could not do (ch. viii. 3). The end of the law was to bring men to perfect obedience, and so to obtain justification. The law is not destroyed, but, full satisfaction being made by the death of Christ for our breach of the law, the end is attained, and we are put in another way of justification. Christ is thus the end of the law; but it is only to everyone that believeth.

2. The excellency of the gospel above the law.

(1) What is the righteousness which is of the law? This he shows, v. 5. The tenor of it is, Do, and live. It owneth nothing as a righteousness sufficient to justify a man but that of perfect obedience. For this he quotes that scripture (Lev. xviii. 5), You shall therefore keep my statutes and my judgments, which if a man do, he shall live in them. The doing supposed must be perfect and sinless, without the least breach or violation. Now, was it not extreme folly in the Jews to adhere so closely to this way of justification and salvation, when there was a new and a living way opened?

(2) What is that righteousness which is of faith, v. 6, &c. This he describes in the words of Moses, in Deuteronomy. He quotes it from Deut. xxx. 11-14, and shows, [1] That it is not at all hard or difficult. The way of justification and salvation has in it no such depths or knots as may discourage us, no insuperable difficulties attending it. First, We need not go to heaven to enquire into the secrets of the divine counsel. It is true Christ is in heaven; but we may be justified and saved without going thither. Secondly, We need not go to the deep, to fetch Christ out of the grave: Into the deep, to bring up Christ from the dead. It is true that Christ was in the grave, and it is as true that he is now in heaven; but we need not perplex ourselves with fancied difficulties. No, salvation is not put at so vast a distance from us.

[2] But it is very plain and easy: The word is nigh thee. Christ is nigh thee, for the word is nigh thee.

their salvation. 2. For I bear them record—or, 'witness,' as he well could from his own sad experience—that they have a zeal of—'for'—God, but not according to knowledge—(Cf. Acts 22:3; 26:9-11; Gal. 1:13, 14). He alludes to this well-meaning of his people, notwithstanding their spiritual blindness, not certainly to excuse their rejection of Christ and rage against His saints, but as some ground of hope regarding them. (See I Tim. 1:13).

3. For they being ignorant of God's righteousness—i.e., for the justification of the guilty (see on ch. 1:17)—and going about—'seeking'—to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God—The apostle views the general rejection of Christ by the nation as one act.

For Christ is the end—the object or aim—of the law for—justifying—righteousness to every one that believeth—i.e., contains within Himself all that the law demands for the justification of such as embrace Him, whether Jew or Gentile (Gal. 3:24).

5-10. For Moses describeth the righteousness which is of the law, That the man that doeth—'hath done'—those things—which it commands—shall live in them—(Lev. 28:5). This is the one way of justification and life—by "the righteousness which is of (or, by our own obedience to) the law."

But the—justifying—righteousness which is of faith speaketh on this wise—'speaketh thus'—its language or import is to this effect (quoting in substance Deut. 30:13, 14). Say not in thine heart, Who shall ascend into heaven? that is, to bring Christ down . . .—i.e., 'Ye have not to sigh over the impossibility of attaining to justification; as if one should say, oh! if I could but get someone to mount up to heaven and fetch me down Christ, there might be some hope, but since that cannot be, mine is a desperate case.' or, Who shall descend . . .—another case of impossibility, suggested by Proverbs 30:4, and perhaps also Amos 9:2—probably proverbial expressions of impossibility (cf. Ps. 139:7-10; Prov. 24:7, etc.).

But what saith it? It saith—continuing the quotation from Deuteronomy 30:14—The word is nigh thee—easily accessible.

ADAM CLARKE

cellence; they conscientiously observe its rites and ceremonies, but they do not consider the object and end of those rites. They sin more through ignorance than malice; and this pleads in their excuse. By this fine apology for them, the apostle prepares them for the harsher truths which he was about to deliver.

3. For . . . being ignorant of God's righteousness—not knowing God's method of saving sinners, which is the only proper and efficient method. And going about to establish their own righteousness—seeking to procure their salvation by means of their own contriving. They have not submitted—they have not bowed to the determinations of the Most High, relative to His mode of saving mankind, viz., through faith in Jesus Christ as the only available Sacrifice for sin, the end to which the law pointed.

4. For Christ is the end of the law. Where the law ends, Christ begins. The law ends with representative sacrifices; Christ begins with the real offering. The law is our schoolmaster to lead us to Christ; it cannot save, but it leaves us at His door, where alone salvation is to be found. Christ as an atoning Sacrifice for sin was the grand Object of the whole sacrificial code of Moses; His passion and death were the fulfillment of its great object and design. Separate this sacrificial death of Christ from the law, and the law has no meaning, for it is impossible that the blood of bulls and goats should take away sins. God never designed that the sacrifices of the law should be considered the atonement for sin, but a type or representative of that atonement; and that the atonement was the sacrifice offered by Christ. Thus He was the end of the law, in respect to its sacrifices.

5. For Moses describeth the righteousness which is of the law. The place to which the apostle refers seems to be Lev. xviii. 5: "Ye shall therefore keep my statutes, and my judgments; which if a man do, he shall live in them." These words seem to be spoken in answer to an objection which might be made by a Jew: "Did not Moses give us a law, the observance of which would secure our salvation?" Such a law Moses undoubtedly gave, and that law promises life to those who perform it precepts; but who can plead for life on this ground who rejects that Christ who is "the end of the law"? No man ever did, nor ever can, fulfill that law so as to merit salvation by the performance of it. For as "all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God," they are all under the curse of the law, which says: "Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them," Deut. xxvii. 26; Gal. iii. 10. Therefore by the deeds of this law none can be justified, because all are in a state of condemnation for transgressions already committed against it.

6-7. But the righteousness which is of faith. As it is most evident that there can be no justification by works, as all are sinful and all in a guilty state, if God will grant salvation at all, it must be by faith. But faith must have an object and a reason for its exercise. The Object is Jesus Christ; the reason is the infinite merit of His passion and death. Who shall ascend into heaven? As Christ is "the end of the law" for justification to everyone that believes, no observance of the law can procure Him. Who by the practice of the law can bring Christ down from heaven? or, when brought down, and crucified and buried, as a Sacrifice for sin, who can bring Him up again from the dead? And both His death and resurrection are essentially necessary for the salvation of a lost world. Or the sense of the apostle may be this: They who will not believe in Christ crucified must in effect be seeking another Messiah to come down from heaven with a different revelation; or they who will not credit the doctrine that we preach concerning His resurrection seem in effect to say, Christ yet remains to be raised from the dead, and reign over the Jews as a mighty secular Sovereign, subjecting the Gentile world to the sway of His righteous sceptre.

8. But what saith it? The word is nigh thee. There is no occasion to seek high or low for the saving power; the word of reconciliation is nigh.

MATTHEW HENRY

It is in thy mouth, and in thy heart. The work thou hast to do lies within thee. All that which is to be done for us is already done to our hands. Those that were under the law were to do all themselves, Do this, and live; but the gospel discovers the greatest part of the work done already, and what remains cut short in righteousness, salvation, brought to our door, as it were. It is in our mouth—we are reading it daily; it is in our heart—we are, or should be, thinking of it daily. Even the word of faith. Now what is this word of faith? We have the tenor of it, v. 9, 10. What is promised to us: Thou shalt be saved. It is salvation that the gospel exhibits and tenders which Christ is the author of, a Saviour to the uttermost. Upon what terms. Two things are required as conditions of salvation: (a) Confessing the Lord Jesus—openly professing relation to him and dependence on him, standing by him in all weathers. Our Lord Jesus lays a great stress upon this confessing of him before men; see Matt. x. 32, 33. It was a very great thing, especially, when the profession of Christ and Christianity hazarded life, and all that is dear in this world, which was the case in the primitive times. (b) Believing in the heart that God raised him from the dead. The profession of faith with the mouth, if there be not the power of it in the heart, is but a mockery; especially concerning his resurrection, which is the fundamental article of the Christian faith. This is further illustrated (v. 10), and the order inverted, because there must first be faith in the heart before there can be an acceptable confession with the mouth. Concerning faith: It is with the heart that man believeth, which implies more than an assent of the understanding, and takes in the consent of the will. This is unto righteousness. There is the righteousness of justification and the righteousness of sanctification. Faith is to both. Concerning profession: It is with the mouth that confession is made—confession to God in prayer and praise, confession to men by owning the ways of God before others. And this is said to be unto salvation, because it is the performance of the condition of that promise, Matt. x. 32. Justification by faith lays the foundation of our title to salvation; but by confession we build upon that foundation. So that we have here a brief summary of the terms of salvation, that we must give up, to God, our souls and our bodies—our souls in believing with the heart, and our bodies in confessing with the mouth. For this (v. 11) he quotes Isa. xlv. 17, Whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed. He will not be ashamed to own that Christ in whom he trusts; he that believes in the heart will not be ashamed to confess with the mouth. He shall not be ashamed of his hope in Christ. He shall never have cause to repent his confidence in reposing such a trust in the Lord Jesus.

Verses 12–21

There is no difference between Jews and Gentiles, but they stand upon the same level in point of acceptance with God. In Jesus Christ there is neither Greek nor Jew, Col. iii. 11. There is no difference.

I. God is the same to all: The same Lord over all is rich unto all. There is not one God to the Jews who is more kind, and another to the Gentiles who is less kind; but he is the same to all. When he proclaimed his name, The Lord, the Lord God, gracious and merciful, he thereby signified not only what he was to the Jews, but what he is and will be to all his creatures that seek unto him: liberal and bountiful in dispensing his favours to all that call upon him. Something must be done by us, and it is as little as can be, we must call upon him. We have nothing to do but to draw out by prayer.

II. The promise is the same to all (v. 13): Whoever shall call. Calling upon the name of the Lord is here put for all practical religion. What is the life of a Christian but a life of prayer? He that thus calls upon him shall be saved. It is but ask and have; what would we have more? For the further illustration of this he observes,

1. How necessary it was that the gospel should be preached to the Gentiles, v. 14, 15. This was what the Jews were so angry with Paul for. He shows how needful it was to bring them within the reach of the promise. They cannot call on him in whom they have not believed. Except they believe that he is God, they will not call upon him by prayer. The grace of faith is absolutely necessary to the duty of prayer; we cannot pray aright without it. He that comes to God by prayer must believe, Heb. xi. 6. They cannot believe in him of whom they have not heard. Some way or other the divine revelation must be made known to us, before we can receive it and assent to it; it is not born with us. They cannot hear without a preacher. Somebody must tell them what they are to believe. They cannot preach except they be sent. How shall in thy mouth—when thou confessest Him. and in thine heart—when thou believest on Him. Though it is of the law which Moses more immediately speaks in the passage quoted, yet it is of the law as Israel shall be brought to look upon it when the Lord their God shall circumcise their heart "to love the Lord their God with all their heart" (vs. 6); and thus, in applying it, the apostle (as OLSHAUSEN truly observes) is not merely appropriating the language of Moses, but keeping in the line of his deeper thought. that is, the word of faith, which we preach—i.e., the word which men have to believe for salvation (cf. I Tim. 4:6). That if thou shalt . . .—So understanding the words, the apostle is here giving the language of the true method of justification; and this sense we prefer [with CALVIN, BEZA, FERME, LOCKE, JOWETT]. But able interpreters render the words, 'For,' or 'Because if thou shalt . . . , [VULGATE, LUTHER, DE WETTE, STUART, PHILIPPI, ALFORD, REVISED VERSION]. In this case, these are the apostle's own remarks, confirming the foregoing statements as to the simplicity of the gospel method of salvation. confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus—i.e., probably, 'If thou shalt confess Jesus [to be] the Lord,' which is the proper manifestation or evidence of faith (Matt. 10: 32; I John 4:15). This is put first merely to correspond with the foregoing quotation—"in thy mouth and in thine heart." So in I Pet. 1:10 the "calling of believers" is put before their "election," as that which is first "made sure," although in point of time it comes after it. and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised—'that God raised'—him from the dead . . .—See on ch. 4:25. In the next verse the two things are placed in their natural order. For with the heart man believeth unto—justifying—righteousness; and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation—This confession of Christ's name, especially in times of persecution, and whenever obloquy is attached to the Christian profession, is an indispensable test of discipleship.

11-13. For the scripture saith—in Isaiah 28:16, a glorious Messianic passage. Whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed—Here, as in ch. 9:33, the quotation is from the LXX, which renders those words of the original, "shall not make haste" i.e., fly for escape, as from conscious danger), 'shall not be put to shame,' which comes to the same thing.

For there is no difference—or 'distinction'—between Jew and Greek; for the same Lord over all—i.e., not God [as CALVIN, GROTIUS, OLSHAUSEN, HODGE], but Christ, as will be seen, we think, by comparing vss. 9, 12, 13 and observing the apostle's usual style on such subjects. [So CHRYSOSTOM, MELVILLE, BENGEL, MEYER, DE WETTE, FRITZSCHE, THOLUCK, STUART, ALFORD, PHILIPPI.] is rich—a favorite Pauline term to express the exuberance of that saving grace which is in Christ Jesus. unto all that call upon him—This confirms the application of the preceding words to Christ; since to call upon the name of the Lord Jesus is a customary expression. (See Acts 7:59, 60; 9:14, 21; 22:16; I Cor. 1:2; II Tim. 2:22). For saith the scripture whosoever—The expression is emphatic, 'Everyone whosoever'—shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved—Joel 2:32; quoted also by Peter, in his great Pentecostal sermon (Acts 2:21), with evident application to Christ.

14, 15. How then shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? and . . . believe in him of whom they have not heard? and . . . hear without a preacher?

ADAM CLARKE

The way of salvation is now both plain and easy. By the preaching of the gospel the doctrine of salvation is nigh thee, and the saving influence is at hand. It is in thy mouth, easy to be understood, easy to be professed; and in thy heart, if you are upright before God, sincerely desiring to be saved on His own terms.

9. That if thou shalt confess. Acknowledge the Lord Jesus Christ as the only Saviour. Believe in thine heart that He who died for your offenses has been raised for your justification, and depend solely on Him for that justification, and thou shalt be saved.

10. For with the heart man believeth. And be sincere in this. For with the heart, duly affected with a sense of guilt and of the sufficiency of the sacrifice which Christ has offered, man believeth unto righteousness, believes to receive "justification"; for this is the proper meaning of the term here, and in many other parts of this Epistle. And with the mouth confession is made unto salvation. He who believes aright in Christ Jesus will receive such a full conviction of the truth, and such an evidence of his redemption, that his mouth will boldly confess his obligation to his Redeemer, and the blessed persuasion he has of the remission of all his sins through the blood of the Cross.

11. For the scripture saith. And however the Jews may despise this gospel, because it comes not unto them with pomp and ceremony, it puts those who receive it into possession of every heavenly blessing; and this is according to the positive declarations of the prophets, for it is written, Isa. xxviii. 16; xlix. 23: Whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed. He shall neither be disappointed of his hope nor ashamed of his confidence, because he has that faith which is "the evidence of things not seen," the subsistence "of things hoped for," Heb. xi. 1.

12. For there is no difference between the Jew and the Greek. All are equally welcome to this salvation. Here the Jew has no exclusive privilege, and from this the Greek is not rejected. One simple way of being saved is proposed to all, viz., faith in the Lord Jesus Christ.

13. For whosoever shall call. Nor shall anyone who hears this doctrine of salvation and credits it as he is commanded be permitted to pray or supplicate the throne of grace in vain. For the Prophet Joel hath declared, chap. ii. 32: Whosoever shall call upon, invoke, the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, the Saviour of sinners, shall be saved—shall have his guilt pardoned, his heart purified; and if he abide in the faith, rooted and grounded in Him, showing forth the virtues of Him who has called him out of darkness into His marvellous light, he shall be saved with all the power of an eternal life. It is evident that Paul understood the text of Joel as relating to our blessed Lord; and therefore his word Kyrios must answer to the prophet's word Yehovah, which is no mean proof of the Godhead of Jesus Christ.

a man act as an ambassador, unless he have both his credentials and his instructions from the prince that sends him? It is God's prerogative to send ministers. He only can qualify men for, and incline them to, the work of the ministry. But the competency of that qualification, and the sincerity of that inclination, must not be left to the judgment of every man for himself. This must needs be submitted to the judgment of those who are presumed the most able judges, and who are empowered to set apart such as they find so qualified and inclined. And those that are thus set apart, not only may, but must preach, as those that are sent.

2. How welcome the gospel ought to be to those to whom it was preached, because it showed the way to salvation, v. 15. For this he quotes, Isa. lii. 7. What the gospel is: It is the gospel of peace. Peace is put in general for all good; so it is explained here; it is glad tidings of good things. The things of the gospel are good things indeed, the best things; the best news that ever came from heaven to earth. What the work of ministers is: To bring these glad tidings; to evangelize peace (so the original is). Every preacher is in this sense an evangelist. How acceptable they should therefore be for their work's sake: How beautiful are the feet, that is, how welcome are they! Those that preach the gospel of peace should see to it that their feet (their life and conversation) be beautiful: the holiness of ministers' lives is the beauty of their feet. How beautiful! namely, in the eyes of those that hear them. Those that welcome the message cannot but love the messengers.

3. He answers an objection against all this (v. 16): But they have not all obeyed the gospel. All the Jews have not, all the Gentiles have not; far the greater part of both remain in unbelief and disobedience. The gospel is given us not only to be known and believed, but to be obeyed. It is no strange thing, but it is a very sad and uncomfortable thing, for the ministers of Christ to bring the report of the gospel, and not to be believed in it. He shows that the word preached is the ordinary means of working faith (v. 17): So then, though many that hear do not believe, yet those that believe have first heard. Faith cometh by hearing. The beginning, progress, and strength of faith, are by hearing. The word of God is therefore called the word of faith. God gives faith, but it is by the word as the instrument. Hearing is by the word of God. It is not hearing the enticing words of man's wisdom, but hearing the word of God, that will befriend faith. Those who would not believe the report of the gospel, yet, having heard it, were thereby left inexcusable, v. 18, to the end.

(1) The Gentiles have heard it (v. 18): Have they not heard? They have either heard the gospel, or at least heard of it. Their sound went into all the earth; not only a confused sound, but their words are gone unto the ends of the world. The commission which the apostles received runs thus: Go you into all the world—preach to every creature—disciple all nations; and they did with indefatigable industry and wonderful success pursue that commission. It was in order to this that the gift of tongues was poured so plentifully upon the apostles.

(2) The Jews have heard it too, v. 19–21. For this he appeals to two passages of the Old Testament. Did not Israel know that the Gentiles were to be called in? They might have known it from Moses and Isaiah.

First, One is taken from Deut. xxxii. 21, I will provoke you to jealousy. The Jews not only had the offer; they had the refusal. In all places where the apostles came still the Jews had the first offer, and the Gentiles had but their leavings. If one would not, another would. Now this provoked them to jealousy. The Gentiles are here called no people, and a foolish nation. How much soever there be of the wit and wisdom of the world, those that are not the people of God are a foolish people. Such was the state of the Gentile world, who yet were made the people of God, and Christ to them the wisdom of God. What a provocation it was to the Jews to see the Gentiles taken into favour we may see, especially Acts xxii. 22. It was an instance of the great wickedness of the Jews that they were thus enraged. God often makes people's sin their punishment. A man needs no greater plague than to be left to the impetuous rage of his own lusts.

Secondly, Another is taken from Isa. lxv. 1, 2, and in it Esaias is very bold. Those that will be found faithful have need to be very bold. Those that are resolved to please God must not be afraid to displease any man. Now Esaias speaks boldly and plainly, Of the preventing grace and favour of God in the reception of the Gentiles (v. 20): I was found of those that sought me not. The prescribed method is, Seek and find; this is a rule for us, not a rule for and . . . preach except . . . sent?—i.e., 'True, the same Lord over all is rich unto all alike that call upon Him. But this calling implies believing, and believing hearing, and hearing preaching, and preaching a mission to preach: Why, then, take ye it so ill, O children of Abraham, that in obedience to our heavenly mission (Acts 26:16-18) we preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ?' as it is written—(Isa. 52:7). How beautiful are the feet of them that preach the gospel of peace . . .—The whole chapter of Isaiah from which this is taken, and the three that follow, are so richly Messianic, that there can be no doubt "the glad tidings" there spoken of announce a more glorious release than of Judah from the Babylonish captivity, and the very feet of its preachers are called "beautiful" for the sake of their message. 16, 17. But they have not all obeyed the gospel—i.e., the Scripture hath prepared us to expect this sad result. For Esaias saith, Lord, who hath believed our report?—i.e.,'Where shall one find a believer?' The prophet speaks as if next to none would believe: The apostle softens this into "They have not all believed." So then faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God—'This is another confirmation of the truth that faith supposes the hearing of the Word, and this a commission to preach it.' 18. But I say, Have they not heard?—'Did they not hear?' Can Israel, through any region of his dispersion, plead ignorance of these glad tidings? Yes, verily, their sound went—'their voice went out'—into all the earth, and their words unto the end of the world—These beautiful words are from Psalm 19:4. Whether the apostle quoted them as in their primary intention applicable to his subject [as OLSHAUSEN, ALFORD, etc.], or only "used scriptural language to express his own ideas, as is done involuntarily almost by every preacher in every sermon" [HODGE], expositors are not agreed. But though the latter may seem the more natural since "the rising of the Sun of righteousness upon the world" (Mal. 4:2), "the Day-spring from on high visiting us, giving light to them that sat in darkness, and guiding our feet into the way of peace" (Luke 1:78, 79), must have been familiar and delightful to the apostle's ear, we cannot doubt that the irradiation of the world with the beams of a better Sun by the universal diffusion of the Gospel of Christ, must have a mode of speaking quite natural, and to him scarcely figurative. 19. But I say, Did not Israel know?—know, from their own Scriptures, of God's intention to bring in the Gentiles? First—i.e., First in the prophetic line [DE WETTE]. Moses saith . . .—'I will provoke you to jealousy ('against') [them that are] not a nation, and against a nation without understanding will I anger you' (Deut. 32:21). In this verse God warns His ancient people that because they had (that is, in aftertimes would) moved Him to jealousy with their "no-gods," and provoked Him to anger with their vanities, He in requital would move them to jealousy by receiving into His favor a "no-people," and provoke them to anger by adopting a nation void of understanding. 20. But Esaias is very bold, and saith—i.e., is still plainer, and goes even the length of saying—I was found of them that sought me not—until I sought them—I was made—'became'—manifest unto them that asked not after me—until the invitation from Me came to them. That the calling of the Gentiles was meant by these words of the prophet (Isa. 65:1) is manifest from what immediately follows, "I said, Behold Me, behold Me, unto a nation that was not called by My name." 21. But to—rather, 'with regard to'—Israel he saith, All day—'All the day'—long I have stretched out—'did I stretch forth'—my hands—the attitude of gracious entreaty. unto a disobedient and gainsaying people—These words, which immediately follow the announcement just quoted of the calling of the Gentiles, were enough to forewarn the Jews both of God's purpose to eject them from their privileges, in favor of the Gentiles, and of the cause of it on their own part.—Note, (1) Mere sincerity, and even earnestness in religion—though it may be some ground of hope for a merciful recovery from error—is no excuse, and will not compensate, for the deliberate rejection of saving truth, when in the providence of God presented for acceptance (vss. 1-3; and see on ch. 9, Note 7). (2) The true cause of such rejection of saving truth, by the otherwise sincere, is the prepossession of the mind by some false notions of its own. So long as the Jews "sought to set up their own righteousness," it was in the nature of things impossible that they should "submit themselves to the righteousness of God"; the one of these two methods of acceptance being in the teeth of the other (vs. 3). (3) The es-

16. But they have not all obeyed the gospel. This seems to be the objection of a Jew; as if he had said: A divine mission would be attended with success, whereas there are numbers who pay no attention to the glad tidings you preach. To this the apostle answers that the Spirit of God by Isaiah, chap. liii. 1, foretold it would be so, even in the case of the Jews themselves, when he said, Lord, who hath believed our report? For although God brings the message of salvation to men, He does not oblige them to embrace it.

17. So then faith cometh by hearing. Preaching the gospel is the ordinary means of salvation; faith in Christ is the result of hearing the word, the "doctrine" of God preached.

18. But I say, Have they not heard? But to return to the objection: You say they have not all believed; I ask: Have they not all heard? Have not the means of salvation been placed within the reach of every Jew in Palestine, and within the reach of all those who sojourn in the different Gentile countries where we have preached the gospel, as well to the Jews as to the Gentiles themselves? Yes; for we may say of the preaching of the gospel what the Psalmist has said (Ps. xix. 4) of the heavenly bodies: Their sound went into all the earth, and their words unto the ends of the world. As the celestial luminaries have given testimony of the eternal power and Godhead of the Deity to the habitable world, the gospel of Christ has borne testimony to His eternal goodness and mercy to all the land of Palestine, and to the whole Roman Empire.

19. But I say, Did not Israel know? You object to this preaching among the Gentiles; but is not this according to the positive declaration of God? He, foreseeing your unbelief and rebellion, said by Moses, Deut. xxxii. 21, I will provoke you to jealousy by them that are no people, and by a foolish nation I will anger you. As you have provoked Me to jealousy with worshipping those that are no gods, I will provoke you to jealousy by those which are no people. This most evidently refers to the calling or inviting of the Gentiles to partake of the benefits of the gospel, and plainly predicts the envy and rage which would be excited in the Jews in consequence of those offers of mercy made to the Gentiles.

20. But Esaias (the Greek orthography for Isaiah) is very bold. Speaks out in the fullest manner and plainest language, chap. lxv. 1, notwithstanding the danger to which such a declaration exposed him among a crooked, perverse, and dangerous people: I was found of them that sought me not; I put my salvation in the way of those (the Gentiles) who were not seeking for it, and knew nothing of it; thus the "Gentiles, which followed not after righteousness, have attained to [the law of] righteousness," chap. ix. 30, and they have found that redemption which the Jews have rejected.

21. But to Israel he saith. In the very next verse (Isa. lxv. 2), All day long have I stretched forth my hands, manifesting the utmost readiness and willingness to gather them all together under My protecting care; but I stretched forth My hands in vain, for they are a disobedient and gainsaying people. They not only disobey My command, but they gainsay and contradict My prophets. Thus the apostle proves, in answer to the objection made, v. 16, that the infidelity of the Jews was the effect of their own obstinacy; that the opposition which they are now making to the gospel was foretold

God, who is often found of those that do not seek. Thus he manifested himself to the Gentiles, by sending the light of the gospel among them. Was not this our own particular case? Did not God begin in love, and manifest himself to us when we did not ask after him? And was not that a time of love indeed, to be often remembered with a great deal of thankfulness? Of the obstinacy and perverseness of Israel, v. 21. God's great goodness to them: All day long I have stretched forth my hands. (a) His offers: I have stretched forth my hands, offering them life and salvation. Stretching forth the hands is the gesture of those that require audience, or desire acceptance. Christ was crucified with his hands stretched out. Stretched forth my hands as offering reconciliation—come let us shake hands and be friends; and our duty is to give the hand to him. (b) His patience in making these offers: All day long. He waits to be gracious. He bears long, but he will not bear always. Their great badness to him. They were a disobedient gainsaying people, not only disobedient to the call, but gainsaying, and quarrelling with it. The Jews contradicted and blasphemed. It is a wonder of mercy in God that his goodness is not overcome by man's badness; and it is a wonder of wickedness in man that his badness is not overcome by God's goodness.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

sential terms of salvation have in every age been the same: "Whosoever will" is invited to "take of the water of life freely," Revelation 22:17 (vs. 13). (4) How will the remembrance of the simplicity, reasonableness, and absolute freeness of God's plan of salvation overwhelm those that perish from under the sound of it (vss. 4-13). (5) How piercingly and perpetually should that question—"How SHALL THEY HEAR WITHOUT A PREACHER?"—sound in the ears of all churches, as but the apostolic echo of their Lord's parting injunction, "PREACH THE GOSPEL TO EVERY CREATURE" (Mark 16:15), and how far below the proper standard of love, zeal, and self-sacrifice must the churches as yet be, when with so plenteous a harvest the laborers are yet so few (Matt. 9:37, 38), and that cry from the lips of pardoned, gifted, consecrated men—"Here am I, send me" (Isa. 6:8), is not heard everywhere (vss. 14, 15)! (6) The blessing of a covenant relation to God is the irrevocable privilege of no people and no Church; it can be preserved only by fidelity, on our part, to the covenant itself (vs. 19). (7) God is often found by those who apparently are the farthest from Him, while He remains undiscovered by those who think themselves the nearest (vss. 20, 21). (8) God's dealings even with reprobate sinners are full of tenderness and compassion; all the day long extending the arms of His mercy even to the disobedient and gainsaying. This will be felt and acknowledged at last by all who perish, to the glory of God's forbearance and to their own confusion (vs. 21).

and deplored 700 years before; and that their opposition, far from being a proof of the insufficiency of the gospel, proved that this was the grand means which God had provided for their salvation; and having rejected this, they could expect no other.

Verses 1–32

The apostle proposes here a plausible objection, which might be urged against the divine conduct (v. 1): "Hath God cast away his people?" Is the rejection total and final? Will he have no more a peculiar people to himself? He shows that there was a great deal of goodness and mercy expressed along with this seeming severity: 1. That, though some of the Jews were cast off, yet they were not all so. 2. That, though the body of the Jews were cast off, yet the Gentiles were taken in. And, 3. That, though the Jews were cast off at present, yet in God's due time they should be taken into his church again.

I. The Jews, it is true, were many of them cast off, but not all. The supposition of this he introduces with a God forbid.

1. There was a chosen remnant of believing Jews, that obtained righteousness and life by faith in Jesus Christ, v. 1–7. These are said to be such as he foreknew (v. 2), whom he thus foreknew he did predestinate. Here lies the ground of the difference. They are called the election (v. 7). Believers are the election, all those and those only whom God hath chosen. He shows that he himself was one of them: For I also am an Israelite. Paul was a chosen vessel (Acts ix. 15), and yet he was of the seed of Abraham. He suggests that as in Elias's time, so now, this chosen remnant was really more and greater than one would think it was. (1) His mistake concerning Israel; as if he himself was the only faithful servant God had in the world. He refers to 1 Kings xix. 14, where (it is here said) he maketh intercession to God against Israel. A strange kind of intercession! He deals with God against Israel; so it may be read. In prayer we deal with God. It is said of Elijah (Jas. v. 17) that he prayed in praying. We are then likely to pray in praying, when we pray as those that are dealing with God. Elijah in this prayer spoke as if there were none left faithful in Israel but himself. See to what a low ebb the profession of religion may sometimes be brought. The powers of Israel were then persecuting powers: They have killed thy prophets, and digged down thine altars, and they seek my life. The multitude of Israel were then idolatrous: I am left alone. Thus those few that were faithful to God were not only lost in the crowd of idolaters, but crushed and driven into corners. Digged down thine altars. When altars were set up for Baal, it is no wonder if God's altars were pulled down; they could not endure that standing testimony against their idolatry. This was his intercession against Israel. It is a very sad thing for any person or people to have the prayers of God's people against them, for God espouses, and sooner or later will visibly own, the cause of his praying people. (2) The rectifying of this mistake (v. 4): I have reserved. Things are often much better with the church of God than wise and good men think they are. In times of general apostasy, there is usually a remnant that keep their integrity—all do not go one way. When there is a remnant who keep their integrity it is God that reserves to himself that remnant. It is his free and almighty grace that

Vss. 1-36. SAME SUBJECT CONTINUED AND CONCLUDED—THE ULTIMATE INBRINGING OF ALL ISRAEL, TO BE, WITH THE GENTILES, ONE KINGDOM OF GOD ON THE EARTH. 1. I say then, Hath—'Did'—God cast away his people?

God forbid—Our Lord did indeed announce that "the kingdom of God should be taken from Israel" (Matt. 21:41); and when asked by the Eleven, after His resurrection, if He would at that time "restore the kingdom to Israel," His reply is a virtual admission that Israel was in some sense already out of covenant (Acts 1:9). Yet here the apostle teaches that, in two respects, Israel was not "cast away"; First, Not totally; Second, Not finally. FIRST, Israel is not wholly cast away. for I also am an Israelite—See Phil. 3:5, and so a living witness to the contrary. of the seed of Abraham—of pure descent from the father of the faithful. of the tribe of Benjamin—Phil. 3:5), that tribe which, on the revolt of the ten tribes, constituted, with Judah, the one faithful kingdom of God (I Kings 12:21), and after the captivity was, along with Judah, the kernel of the Jewish nation (Ezra 4:1; 10:9). 2-4. God hath—'did'—not cast away his people—i.e., wholly. which he foreknew—On the word "foreknew," see on ch. 8:29. Wot—i.e., 'Know'—ye not that the scripture saith of—lit., 'in,' i.e., in the section which relates to—Elias? how he maketh intercession—'pleadeth'—against Israel—(The word "saying," which follows, as also the particle "and" before "digged down," should be omitted, as without MSS. authority.) and I am left alone—'I only am left.'

CHAPTER 11

1. I say then, Hath God cast away his people? Has He utterly and finally rejected them? for this is necessarily the apostle's meaning, and is the import of the Greek word which signifies to "thrust" or "drive away." Has He thrust them off, and driven them eternally from Him?

God forbid—"By no means." This rejection is neither universal nor final.

For I also am an Israelite—I am a regular descendant from Abraham, through Israel or Jacob, and by his son Benjamin. And I stand in the Church of God, and in the peculiar covenant; for the rejection is only of the obstinate and disobedient; those who believe on Christ, as I have done, are continued in the Church.

2. God hath not cast away his people which he foreknew. God has not finally and irrecoverably rejected a people whom He has "loved (or approved) so long," for this is evidently the meaning of the word in this place. Wot ye not what the scripture saith? "Do you not know what the Scripture saith?" The reference is to 1 Kings xix. 10, 14. And the apostle's answer to the objecting Jew is to the following effect: God has not universally thrust away His people, for whom in the promise to Abraham He intended, and to whom decreed, to grant His special favor and blessing; but the case is now much as it was in the days of Elijah. That prophet, in his addresses to God, made his complaint against Israel thus:

3. Lord, they have killed thy prophets. They will not permit any person to speak unto them in Thy name; and they murder those who are faithful to the commission which they have received from Thee. Digged down thine altars. They are profligate and profane beyond example, and retain not the slightest form of religion. I am left alone. There is no prophet besides myself left, and they seek to destroy me.

makes the difference between them and others.—Seven thousand: a competent number, and yet, compared with the many thousands of Israel, a very small number. Now the description of this remnant is that they had not bowed the knee to the image of Baal. In court, city, and country, Baal had the ascendant; and the generality of people, more or less, paid their respect to Baal. The best evidence of integrity is to swim against the stream when it is strong. This is thankworthy, not to bow to Baal when everybody bows. Sober singularity is commonly the badge of true sincerity.

(3) The application of this instance to the case in hand: Even so at this present time, v. 5–7. As it has been, so it is. In Elijah's time there was a remnant, and so there is now. A remnant, a few of many, a remnant of believing Jews. This is called a remnant according to the election of grace. If the difference between them and others be made purely by the grace of God, as certainly it is (I have reserved them, saith he, to myself), then it must needs be according to the election.

Now concerning this remnant we may observe, First, Whence it takes its rise, from the free grace of God (v. 6), that grace which excludes works. Election is purely according to the good pleasure of his will, Eph. i. 5. Paul's heart was so full of the freeness of God's grace that he turns aside to make this remark. If of grace, then not of works.

Secondly, What it obtains: that which Israel in vain sought for (v. 7): Israel hath not obtained that which he seeketh for, that is, justification, and acceptance with God, but the election have obtained it. In them the promise of God has its accomplishment, and God's ancient kindness for that people is remembered. They were the persons whom God had in his eye in the counsels of his love.

2. The rest were blinded, v. 7. Some are chosen and called. But others are left to perish in their unbelief. The gospel, which to those that believed was the savour of life unto life, to the unbelieving was the savour of death unto death. The same sun softens wax and hardens clay. They were blinded; they were hardened; so some. They could neither see the light nor feel the touch, of gospel grace. Blindness and hardness are expressive of the same senselessness and stupidity of spirit. This seemed harsh doctrine: to qualify it, therefore, he vouches two witnesses out of the Old Testament.

(1) Isaiah, who spoke of such a judgment in his day, ch. xxix. 10; vi. 9. The spirit of slumber. They are under the power of a prevailing unconcernedness, like people that are slumbering and sleeping. Eyes, that they should not see, and ears, that they should not hear. They had the faculties, but in the things that belonged to their peace they had not the use of those faculties. They saw Christ, but they did not believe in him; they heard his word, but they did not receive it. It was all one as if they had neither seen nor heard—Unto this day. Ever since Esaias prophesied, this hardening work has been in the doing; some among them have been blind and senseless. It is still true concerning multitudes of them, even to this day in which we live.

(2) David (v. 9, 10), quoted from Ps. lxix. 22, 23, where David having foretold the sufferings of Christ from his own people the Jews, particularly that of their giving him vinegar to drink, foretells the dreadful judgments of God upon them for it: Let their table become a snare, which the apostle here applies to the present blindness of the Jews, and the offence they took at the gospel. He speaks here, [1] Of the ruin of their comforts: Let their table be made a snare, that is, as the psalmist explains it, Let that which should be for their welfare be a trap to them. The seven thousand, that have not bowed the knee to Baal—not "the image of Baal," according to the supplement of our version.

5. Even so at this present time—'in this present season'; this period of Israel's rejection. (See Acts 1:7, Greek.) there is—'there obtains,' or 'hath remained.' a remnant according to the election of grace—'As in Elijah's time the apostasy of Israel was not so universal as it seemed to be, and as he in his despondency concluded it to be, so now, the rejection of Christ by Israel is not so appalling in extent as one would be apt to think: There is now, as there was then, a faithful remnant; not however of persons naturally better than the unbelieving mass, but of persons graciously chosen to salvation.' (See I Cor. 4:7; II Thess. 2:13.) This establishes our view of the argument on Election in ch. 9, as not being an election of Gentiles in the place of Jews, and merely to religious advantages, but a sovereign choice of some of Israel itself, from among others, to believe and be saved. (See on ch. 9:6.)

6. And . . .—better, 'Now if it (the election) be by grace, it is no more of works; for [then] grace becomes no more grace: but if it be of works . . .' (The authority of ancient MSS. against this latter clause, as superfluous and not originally in the text, though strong, is not sufficient, we think, to justify its exclusion. Such seeming redundancies are not unusual with our apostle). The general position here laid down is of vital importance: That there are but two possible sources of salvation—men's works, and God's grace; and that these are so essentially distinct and opposite, that salvation cannot be of any combination or mixture of both, but must be wholly either of the one or of the other.

7-10. What then?—How stands the fact? Israel hath not obtained that which he seeketh for—better, 'What Israel is in search of (i.e., Justification, or acceptance with God—see on ch. 9:31); this he found not; but the election (the elect remnant of Israel) found it, and the rest were hardened,' or judicially given over to the 'hardness of their own hearts.'

as it is written—Isa. 29:10, and Deut. 29:4—God hath given—'gave'—them the spirit of slumber—'stupor'. unto this—'this present'—day. And David saith—Psalm 69:23, which in such a Messianic psalm must be meant of the rejecters of Christ. Let their table . . .—i.e., Let their very blessings prove a curse to them, and their enjoyments only sting and take vengeance on them.

ADAM CLARKE

4. But what saith the answer of God? The answer which God made assured him that there were seven thousand, that is, several or many thousands; for so we must understand the word seven, a certain for an uncertain number. These had continued faithful to God; but, because of Jezebel's persecution, they were obliged to conceal their attachment to the true religion; and God, in His providence, preserved them from her sanguinary rage. Who have not bowed the knee. Baal was the god of Jezebel; or, in other words, his worship was then the worship of the state. But there were several thousands of pious Israelites who had not acknowledged this idol, and did not partake in the idolatrous worship.

5. Even so then at this present time. As in the present day the irreligion of the Jews is very great, yet there is a remnant, a considerable number, who have accepted of the grace of the gospel. According to the election of grace. And these are saved just as God has saved all believers from the beginning. They are chosen by His grace, not on account of any worth or excellence in themselves, but through His goodness are they chosen to have a place in His Church, and continue to be His people, entitled to all the privileges of the new covenant. The election of grace simply signifies God's gracious design in sending the Christian system into the world, and saving under it all those who believe in Christ Jesus, and none else. Thus the believers in Christ are chosen to inherit the blessings of the gospel, while those who seek justification by the works of the law are rejected.

6. And if by grace. And let this very remnant of pious Jews who have believed in Christ Jesus know that they are brought in in precisely the same way as God has brought in the Gentiles, the one having no more worthiness to plead than the other, both being brought in and continued in by God's free grace, and not by any observance of the Mosaic law. And this is done according to the election of grace, or the rule of choosing any persons to be the people of God upon the footing of grace, which takes in all that believe in His Son, Jesus Christ. Some of the Jewish people did so believe; therefore those believing Jews are "a remnant according to the election of grace." They are saved in that way in which alone God will save mankind. And if by grace. Then let these very persons remember that their election and interest in the covenant of God has no connection with their old Jewish works; for were it of works, grace would lose its proper nature, and cease to be what it is—a free, undeserved gift. But if it be of works. On the other hand, could it be made to appear that they are invested in these privileges of the kingdom of Christ only by the observance of the law of Moses, then grace would be quite set aside; and if it were not, work, or the merit of obedience, would lose its proper nature, which excludes favor and free gift.

7. What then? What is the real state of the case before us? Israel, the body of the Jewish people, have not obtained that which they so earnestly desire, i.e., to be continued, as they have been hitherto, the peculiar people of God; but the election hath obtained it—as many of them as have believed in Jesus Christ and accepted salvation through Him. This is the grand scheme of the election by grace; God chooses to make those His peculiar people who believe in His Son, and none other shall enjoy the blessings of His kingdom. Those who would not receive Him are blinded; they have shut their eyes against the light, and are in the very circumstances of those mentioned by the Prophet Isaiah, chap. xxix. 10.

8. God hath given them the spirit of slumber. As they had willfully closed their eyes against the light, so God has, in judgment, given them up to the spirit of slumber.

9. And David saith, Let their table. And from their present disposition it is reasonable to conclude that the same evils will fall upon them as fell upon the disobedient in former times, as predicted by David, Ps. lxix. 22-23, that their very blessings should become curses to them, and their temporal mercies be their only recompense; and yet even these earthly blessings, by not being enjoyed in the Lord, should curse of God will turn meat into poison. Their very food, that should nourish them, shall choke them. [2] Of the ruin of their powers and faculties (v. 10), their eyes darkened, their backs bowed down, that they can neither find the right way, nor, if they could, are they able to walk in it. They mind earthly things. We have our eyes darkened if we are bowed down in worldly-mindedness.

II. Another thing which qualified this doctrine of the rejection of the Jews was that though they were cast off, yet the Gentiles were taken in (v. 11–14), which he applies by way of caution to the Gentiles, v. 17–22.

1. The Jews' leavings were a feast for the poor Gentiles (v. 11): "Have they stumbled that they should fall? Had God no other end in rejecting them than their destruction?" He startled at this as usually he does when anything is suggested which seems to reflect upon the wisdom, or righteousness, or goodness of God: God forbid! no, through their fall salvation is come to the Gentiles. By the divine appointment it was so ordered that the gospel should be preached to the Gentiles upon the Jews' refusal of it. And so it was in the history (Acts xiii. 46): It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you; but, seeing you put it from you, lo, we turn to the Gentiles. The Jews had the refusal, and so the tender came to the Gentiles. See how Infinite Wisdom brings light out of darkness, good out of evil. To the same purport he says (v. 12), The fall of them was the riches of the world. The riches of the Gentiles was the multitude of converts among them. True believers are God's jewels. To the same purport (v. 15): The casting away of them is the reconciling of the world. God's displeasure towards them made way for his favour towards the Gentiles. God was in Christ reconciling the world, 2 Cor. v. 19. In every nation he that feared God and wrought righteousness should be accepted of him.

2. The use that the apostle makes of this doctrine.

(1) As a kinsman to the Jews, here is a word of exhortation to them, to stir them up to receive the gospel offer. This God intended in his favour to the Gentiles, to provoke the Jews to jealousy (v. 11), and Paul endeavours to enforce it accordingly (v. 14): If by any means I might provoke to emulation those who are my flesh. "Shall the despised Gentiles run away with all the comforts and privileges of the gospel, and shall not we repent of our refusal, and now at last put in for a share?" There is a commendable emulation in the affairs of our souls; why should not we be as holy and happy as any of our neighbours? The blessings are not lessened by the multitudes of the sharers.—And might save some of them. See what was Paul's business, to save souls; and yet the utmost he promises himself is but to save some. Of the many he dealt with he could but save some. Ministers must think their pains well bestowed if they can but be instrumental to save some.

(2) As an apostle to the Gentiles, here is a word of caution for them: "I speak to you Gentiles. You believing Romans, you hear what riches of salvation are come to you by the fall of the Jews, but take heed lest you do anything to forfeit it." Paul takes this, as other occasions, to apply his discourse to the Gentiles, because he was the apostle of the Gentiles. This was the purport of his extraordinary mission, Acts xxii. 21, I will send thee far hence unto the Gentiles. It ought to be our great and special care to do good to those that are under our charge: we must particularly mind that which is our own work. The Gentile world was a wider province; and the work to be done in it required a very able, courageous workman. God calls those to special work whom he either sees or makes fit for it.—I magnify my office. There were those that vilified it, and him because of it. It is a sign of true love to Jesus Christ to reckon that service for him truly honourable which the world looks upon with scorn. The office of the ministry is an office to be magnified. Ministers are stewards of the mysteries of God, and for their work's sake are to be esteemed highly in love.—My office, my ministry, my service. It was not the dignity but the work, of an apostle, that Paul was so much in love with. Now two things he exhorts the Gentiles to,

[1] To have a respect for the Jews, and to desire their conversion. The advantage that would accrue to the church by their conversion, v. 12, 15. It would be as life from the dead; and therefore they must long for the receiving of them in again.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

Let their eyes be darkened . . . and bow down their back alway—expressive either of the decrepitude, or of the servile condition, to come on the nation through the just judgment of God. The apostle's object in making these quotations is to show that what he had been compelled to say of the then condition and prospects of his nation was more than borne out by their own Scriptures. But, SECONDLY, God has not cast away His people finally. The illustration of this point extends from vs. 11 to vs. 31.

11. I say then, Have they stumbled—'Did they stumble'—that they should fall? God forbid; but—the supplement "rather" is better omitted—through their fall—lit., 'trespass,' but here best rendered 'false step' [DE WETTE]; not "fall," as in our version. salvation is come to the Gentiles, to provoke them to jealousy—Here, as also in ch. 10:19 (quoted from Deut. 32: 21), we see that emulation is a legitimate stimulus to what is good.

12. Now if the fall of them—'But if their trespass,' or 'false step'—be the riches of the—Gentile—world—as being the occasion of their accession to Christ. and the diminishing of them—i.e., the reduction of the true Israel to so small a remnant —the riches of the Gentiles; how much more their fulness!—i.e., their full recovery (see on vs. 26); i.e., 'If an event so untoward as Israel's fall was the occasion of such unspeakable good to the Gentile world, of how much greater good may we expect an event so blessed as their full recovery to be productive?'

13. I speak—'am speaking'—to you Gentiles—another proof that this Epistle was addressed to Gentile believers. (See on ch. 1:13.)

I magnify—'glorify'—mine office—The clause beginning with "inasmuch" should be read as a parenthesis. If . . . I may provoke . . . (See on vs. 11). my flesh—Cf. Isa. 58:7.

15. For if the casting away of them—The apostle had denied that they were cast away (vs. 1); here he affirms it. But both are true; they were cast away, though neither totally nor finally, and it is of this partial and temporary rejection that the apostle here speaks. be the reconciling of the—Gentile—world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead?—The reception of

be a stumbling block over which they should fall, and, instead of being a blessing, should be the means of their punishment.

10. Let their eyes be darkened. All these words are declarative, and not imprecatory. God declares what will be the case of such obstinate unbelievers; "their table," their common providential blessings, will become "a snare, and a trap, and a stumblingblock," and the means of their punishment. Their eyes will be more and more darkened as they persist in their unbelief, and their "back shall be bowed down always." Far from becoming a great and powerful nation, they shall continue ever in a state of abject slavery and oppression, till they acknowledge Jesus as the promised Messiah, and submit to receive redemption in His blood.

11. Have they stumbled that they should fall? Have the Jews, now for their disobedience and unbelief rejected, so sinned against God as to be forever put out of the reach of His mercy? "By no means." Are they, as a nation, utterly irrecoverable? This is the sense of the place, and here the prophecy of the restoration of the Jewish nation commences. But rather through their fall salvation is come. The Church of God cannot fail; if the Jews have broken the everlasting covenant, Isa. xxiv. 5, the Gentiles shall be taken into it; and this very circumstance shall be ultimately the means of exciting them to seek and claim a share in the blessings of the new covenant. This is what the apostle terms provoking them to jealousy, i.e., exciting them to emulation, for so the word should be understood. We should observe here that the fall of the Jews was not in itself the cause or reason of the calling of the Gentiles. Whether the Jews had stood or fallen, whether they had embraced or rejected the gospel, it was the original purpose of God to take the Gentiles into the Church, for this was absolutely implied in the covenant made with Abraham; and it was in virtue of that covenant that the Gentiles were now called, and not because of the unbelief of the Jews.

12. Now if the fall of them. The English reader may imagine that because fall is used in both these verses the original word is the same. But their fall and the fall of them are parastoma, the same word which we render "offence," chap. v. 15, 17-18, and might be rendered "lapse." Whereas that they should fall (v. 11) is hina pesosi. Now pipto, "to fall," is used in a sense so very emphatical as to signify "being slain." It is well-known that to fall in battle means to be "killed." It is in such a sense as this that Paul used the word fall when he says, "Have they stumbled that they should fall?" The riches of the world. If in consequence of their unbelief the riches of God's grace and goodness be poured out on the whole Gentile world, how much more shall that dispensation of grace and mercy enrich and aggrandize the Gentiles, which shall bring the whole body of the Jews to the faith of the gospel! Here the apostle supposes, or rather predicts, that such a dispensation shall take place, and that therefore the Jews have not so stumbled as to be finally irrecoverable.

13. This and the following verse should be read in a parenthesis. Paul, as the apostle of the Gentiles, wished to show them the high pitch of glory and blessedness to which they had been called, that they might have a due sense of God's mercy in calling them to such a state of salvation, and that they might be jealous over themselves, lest they should fall as the Jews had done before them; and he dwells particularly on the greatness of those privileges which the Gentiles had now received, that he might stir up the minds of his countrymen to emulation, and might be the means of saving some of them, as he states in the following verse. I magnify mine office. Literally, "I honor this my ministry."

14. Might save some of them. And yet all these were among the reprobate, or rejected; however, the apostle supposed that none of them were irrecoverably shut out from the divine favor and that some of them, by his preaching, might be disposed to receive salvation by Christ Jesus.

15. But life from the dead. If the rejection of the Jews became the occasion of our receiving the gospel, so that we can even glory in our tribulations, though they themselves be-

MATTHEW HENRY

What it is grounded upon, and what reason we have to look for it.

Because of the holiness of the first-fruits and the root, v. 16. A good beginning promises a good ending. By the first-fruits understand the same with the root, namely, the patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Now, if they were holy—if they were in the covenant—then we have reason to conclude that God hath a kindness for the lump—the body of that people; and for the branches—the particular members of it. If the root be holy, so are the branches. Though a wise man does not beget a wise man, yet a free man begets a free man. Though grace does not run in the blood, yet external privileges do (till they are forfeited). The Jewish branches are reckoned holy, because the root was so.

[2] To take heed to themselves, lest they should stumble and fall, as the Jews had done, v. 17–22.

First, The privilege which the Gentiles had by being taken into the church. They were grafted in (v. 17), as a branch of a wild olive into a good olive, which is contrary to the custom of the husbandman, who grafts the good olive into the bad; but those that God grafts into the church he finds wild and barren, and good for nothing. Men graft to mend the tree; but God grafts to mend the branch. The church of God is an olive-tree, flourishing and fruitful, the fruit useful. Those that are out of the church are as wild olive-trees not only useless, but what they do produce is sour and unsavoury: Wild by nature, v. 24. It is the natural state of everyone of us to be wild by nature. Conversion is the grafting in of wild branches into the good olive. Those that are grafted into the good olive-tree partake of the root and fatness of the olive. All that are by a lively faith grafted into Christ partake of him as the branches of the root. The Gentiles, being grafted into the church, partake of the same privileges that the Jews did, the root and fatness. Christ only is the root. Now the believing Gentiles partake of this root.

Secondly, A caution not to abuse these privileges. 1. "Be not proud (v. 18): Boast not against the branches." Grace is given, not to make us proud, but to make us thankful. The law of faith excludes all boasting either of ourselves or against others. "Do not say (v. 19): They were broken off that I might be grafted in; that is, do not think that thou didst merit more at the hand of God than they. But remember, thou bearest not the root, but the root thee. Though thou art grafted in, thou art still but a branch borne by the root; nay, and an engrafted branch, brought into the good olive contrary to nature (v. 24), not free-born, but by an act of grace. Therefore, if thou boast, know (this word must be supplied to clear the sense) thou bearest not the root but the root thee." 2. "Be not secure (v. 20): Be not high-minded, but fear. Be not too confident of your own strength and standing." A holy fear is an excellent preservative against high-mindedness: happy is the man that thus feareth always. Fear what? "Why fear lest thou lose the privileges thou now enjoyest, as they have lost theirs." The evils that befall others should be warnings to us. The patent which churches have of their privileges is not for a certain term, but it runs as long as they carry themselves well, and no longer. Consider, (1) "How they were broken off. It was not undeservedly, but because of unbelief." They did by this cut themselves off.

the whole family of Israel, scattered as they are among all nations under heaven, and the most inveterate enemies of the Lord Jesus, will be such a stupendous manifestation of the power of God upon the spirits of men, and of His glorious presence with the heralds of the Cross, as will not only kindle devout astonishment far and wide, but so change the dominant mode of thinking and feeling on all spiritual things as to seem like a resurrection from the dead.

16. For—'But'—if the first fruit be holy, the lump is also holy; and if the root . . ., so the branches—The Israelites were required to offer to God the first fruits of the earth—both in their raw state, in a sheaf of newly reaped grain (Lev. 23:10, 11), and in their prepared state, made into cakes of dough (Num. 15:19-21)—by which the whole produce of that season was regarded as hallowed. It is probable that the latter of these offerings is here intended, as to it the word "lump" best applies; and the argument of the apostle is, that as the separation unto God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, from the rest of mankind, as the parent stem of their race, was as real an offering of first fruits as that which hallowed the produce of the earth, so, in the divine estimation, it was as real a separation of the mass or "lump" of that nation in all time to God. The figure of the "root" and its "branches" is of like import—the consecration of the one of them extending to the other,

17, 18. And if—rather, 'But if'; i.e., 'If notwithstanding this consecration of Abraham's race to God. some of the branches—The mass of the unbelieving and rejected Israelites are here called "some," not, as before, to meet Jewish prejudice (see on ch. 3:3, and on "not all" in ch. 10:16), but with the opposite view of checking Gentile pride. and thou, being a wild olive, wert—'wast'—graffed in among them—Though it is more usual to graft the superior cutting upon the inferior stem, the opposite method, which is intended here, is not without example. and with them partakest—'wast made partaker,'—along with the branches left, the believing remnant—of the root and fatness of the olive tree—the rich grace secured by covenant to the true seed of Abraham—boast not against the—rejected—branches. But if thou—'do'—boast—remember that—thou bearest not—'it is not thou that bearest'—the root, but the root thee—'If the branches may not boast over the root that bears them, then may not the Gentile boast over the seed of Abraham; for what is thy standing, O Gentile, in relation to Israel, but that of a branch in relation to the root? From Israel hath come all that thou art and hast in the family of God; for "salvation is of the Jews" (John 4:22).

19-21. Thou wilt say then—as a plea for boasting—The branches were broken off, that I might be graffed in. Well—'Be it so, but remember that'—because of unbelief they came chief instruments of our sufferings, yet so far must we feel from exulting over them that we should esteem their full conversion to God as great and choice a favor as we would the restoration of a most intimate friend to life, who had been at the gates of death. The restoration of the Jews to a state of favor with God to which the apostle refers, and which is too plainly intimated by the spirit of prophecy to admit of a doubt, will be a most striking event. Their being preserved as a distinct people is certainly a strong collateral proof that they shall once more brought into the Church of God; and their conversion to Christianity will be an incontestable proof of the truth of divine revelation, and doubtless will become the means of converting multitudes of deists, who will see the prophecies of God, which had been delivered so long before, so strikingly fulfilled in this great event. We need not wonder if a whole nation should then be born as in a day.

16. For if the firstfruit be holy. As consecrating the firstfruits to God was the means of drawing down His blessing upon the rest, so the conversion of Abraham to the true faith, and the several Jews who have now embraced Christianity, are pledges that God will, in process of time, admit the whole Jewish nation into His favor again, so that they shall constitute a part of the Visible Church of Christ. If the root be holy, so are the branches. The word holy in this verse is to be taken in that sense which it has so frequently in the Old and New Testaments, viz., "consecrated, set apart to sacred uses." It must not be forgotten that the first converts to Christ were from among the Jews; these formed the root of the Christian Church. These were holy, "consecrated" to God, and those who among the Gentiles were converted by their means were also "consecrated." But the chief reference is to the ancestors of the Jewish people, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; and as these were devoted to God and received into His covenant, all their posterity, the branches which proceeded from this root, became entitled to the same privileges; and as the root still remains, and the branches also, the descendants from that root still remain. They still have a certain title to the blessings of the covenant, though because of their obstinate unbelief these blessings are suspended, as they cannot, even on the ground of the old covenant, enjoy these blessings but through faith; for it was when Abraham believed God that it was accounted to him for righteousness, and thus he became an heir of the righteousness which is by faith.

17. And if some of the branches—if the present nation of the Jews, because of their unbelief, are cut off from the blessings of the Church of God, and the high honor and dignity of being His peculiar people. And thou, being a wild olive—ye Gentiles, being without the knowledge of the true God, and consequently bringing forth no fruits of righteousness. Wert grafted in among them—are now inserted in the original stock, having been made partakers of the faith of Abraham, and consequently of his blessings; and enjoy, as the people did who sprang from him, the fatness of the olive tree, the promises made to the patriarchs, and the spiritual privileges of the Jewish church.

18. Boast not against the branches. While you are ready to acknowledge that you were included in the covenant made with Abraham, and are now partakers of the same blessings with him, do not "exult over," much less insult, the branches, his present descendants, whose place you now fill up, according to the election of grace. For remember, you are not the root, nor do you bear the root, but the root bears you. You have not been the means of deriving any blessing on the Jewish people; but through that very people, which you may be tempted to despise, all the blessing and excellencies which you enjoy have been communicated to you.

19. Thou wilt say then. You may think that you have reason to exult over them, because it is a fact that God has been displeased with them, and therefore has broken them off; has cast them out of the Church and taken you into it in their place.

20. Well; because of unbelief. This statement is all true; but then, consider, why is it that

MATTHEW HENRY

They were natural branches (v. 21), yet, when they sunk into unbelief, God did not spare them. Prescription, long usage, the faithfulness of their ancestors, would not secure them. It was in vain to plead, though they insisted much upon it, that they were Abraham's seed. This is called here severity, v. 22. Severity is a word that sounds harshly; and I do not remember that it is anywhere else in scripture ascribed to God. God is most severe towards those that have been in profession nearest to him, if they rebel against him. Of all judgments, spiritual judgments are the sorest; for of these he is here speaking, v. 8. (2) "How thou standest, thou that are engrafted in." "By what means thou standest: By faith, which is a depending grace. Thou dost not stand in any strength of thy own: thou art no more than the free grace of God makes thee. That which ruined them was unbelief, and by faith thou standest." On what terms (v. 22): "Towards thee goodness, if thou continue in his goodness, that is, continue in a dependence upon the free grace of God." The condition of our happiness, is to keep ourselves in the love of God.

III. Another thing that qualifies this doctrine of the Jews' rejection is that the rejection is not final.

1. How this conversion of the Jews is here described. It is said to be their fulness (v. 12), that is, the addition of them to the church. This would be the enriching of the world with a great deal of light and strength and beauty. It is called the receiving of them. They shall be received into the love of Christ. And this will be as life from the dead—so strange and surprising, and yet withal so welcome and acceptable. It is called the grafting of them in again (v. 23). That which is grafted in receives sap and virtue from the root; so does a soul that is truly grafted into the church receive life, and strength, and grace from Christ the quickening root. They shall be grafted into their own olive-tree (v. 24) to retrieve those privileges which they had so long enjoyed, but have now sinned away and forfeited by their unbelief. It is called the saving of all Israel, v. 26. The adding of them to the church is the saving of them.

Because of the power of God (v. 23): God is able to graft them in again. Our comfort is that God is able to work a change, able to graft those in that have been long cast out and withered. If they abide not still in unbelief. So that nothing is to be done but to remove that unbelief, and God is able to take that away, though nothing less than an almighty power will do it.

Because of the grace of God manifested to the Gentiles. This is his argument (v. 24): "If thou wast grafted into a good olive, that was wild by nature, much more shall these that were the natural branches." This is a suggestion very proper to check the insolence of those Gentile Christians that looked with disdain upon the rejected Jews.

were broken off, and thou standest—not as a Gentile, but solely—by faith—But as faith cannot live in those "whose soul is lifted up" (Hab. 2:4)—Be not high-minded, but fear—(Prov. 28:14; Phil. 2:12):

for if God spared not the natural branches—sprung from the parent stem—take heed lest he also spare not thee—a mere wild graft. The former might, beforehand, have been thought very improbable; but, after that, no one can wonder at the latter.

22, 23. Behold therefore the goodness and severity of God: on them that fell, severity—in rejecting the chosen seed—but toward thee, goodness—'God's goodness' is the true reading' i.e., His sovereign goodness in admitting thee to a covenant standing who before wert a "stranger to the covenants of promise" (Eph. 2:12-20). if thou continue in his goodness—in believing dependence on that pure goodness which made thee what thou art.

otherwise . . . And they also—'Yea, and they'—if they abide not still in unbelief, shall be graffed in: for God is able to graff them in again—This appeal to the power of God to effect the recovery of His ancient people implies the vast difficulty of it—which all who have ever labored for the conversion of the Jews are made depressingly to feel. That intelligent expositors should think that this was meant of individual Jews, reintroduced from time to time into the family of God on their believing on the Lord Jesus, is surprising; and yet those who deny the national recovery of Israel must and do so interpret the apostle. But this is to confound the two things which the apostle carefully distinguishes. Individual Jews have been at all times admissible, and have been admitted, to the Church through the gate of faith in the Lord Jesus. This is the "remnant, even at this present time, according to the election of grace," of which the apostle, in the first part of the chapter, had cited himself as one. But here he manifestly speaks of something not then existing, but to be looked forward to as a great future event in the economy of God, the reingrafting of the nation as such, when they "abide not in unbelief." And though this is here spoken of merely as a supposition (if their unbelief shall cease)—in order to set it over against the other supposition, of what will happen to the Gentiles if they shall not abide in the faith—the supposition is turned into an explicit prediction in the verses following. 24. For if thou wert cut—'wert cut off'—from the olive tree, which is wild by nature, and wast graffed contrary to nature into a good olive tree; how much more shall these . . .—This is just the converse of vs. 21: 'As the excision of the merely engrafted Gentiles through unbelief is a thing much more to be expected than was the excision of the natural Israel, before it happened; so the restoration of Israel, when they shall be brought to believe in Jesus, is a thing far more in the line of what we should expect, than the admission of the Gentiles to a standing which they never before enjoyed.'

25. For I would not . . . that ye should be ignorant of this mystery—The word "mystery," so often used by our apostle, does not mean (as with us) something incomprehensible, but 'something before kept secret, either wholly or for the most part, and now only fully disclosed' (cf. ch. 16:25; I Cor. 2:7-10; Eph. 1:9, 10; 3:3-6, 9, 10).

lest ye should be wise in your own conceits—as if they were cast out? Was it not because of their unbelief? And you stand by faith; you were made partakers of these blessings by faith. Be not highminded; let this humble, not exalt you in your own estimation.

21. For if God spared not the natural branches. If He, in His infinite justice and holiness, could not tolerate sin in the people whom He foreknew, whom He had so long loved, cherished, miraculously preserved, and blessed, take heed lest he also spare not thee. Be convinced that the same righteous principle in Him will cause Him to act towards you as He has acted towards them, if you sin after the similitude of their transgression; and to this, self-sufficiency and self-confidence will soon lead you.

22. Behold therefore the goodness. The exclamation, Behold the goodness of God! is frequent among the Jewish writers when they wish to call the attention of men to particular displays of God's mercy, especially towards those who are singularly unworthy. And severity of God. As goodness signifies the essential quality of the divine nature, the fountain of all good to men and angels, so severity signifies that particular exercise of His goodness and holiness which leads Him to sever from His mystical body whatsoever would injure, corrupt, or destroy it. The apostle, having adopted this metaphor as the best he could find to express that act of God's justice and mercy by which the Jews were rejected and the Gentiles elected in their stead, and in order to show that though the Jewish tree was cut down, or its branches lopped off, yet it was not rooted up, he informs the Gentile believers that, as it is customary to insert a good scion in a bad or useless stock, they who were bad, contrary to the custom in such cases, were grafted in a good stock, and their growth and fruitfulness proclaimed the excellence and vegetative life of the stock in which they were inserted. This was the goodness of the heavenly Gardener to them; but it was severity, an act of "excision," to the Jews.

23. If they abide not still in unbelief. So we find that their rejection took place in consequence of their willful obstinacy, and that they may return into the fold, the door of which still stands open. For God is able to graff them in again. Fallen as they are and degraded, God can, in the course of His providence and mercy, restore them to all their forfeited privileges; and this will take place if they abide not still in unbelief, which intimates that God has furnished them with all the power and means necessary for faith, and that they may believe on the Lord Jesus whenever they will.

24. The olive tree which is wild by nature. Which is "naturally" wild and barren; for that the wild olive bore no fruit is sufficiently evident from the testimony of the authors who have written on the subject. Hence the proverb, "More unfruitful than the wild olive." And wert graffed contrary to nature. "Contrary to all custom"; for a scion taken from a barren or useless tree is scarcely ever known to be grafted into a good stock; but here the Gentiles, a fruitless and sinful race, are grafted on the ancient patriarchal stock. Now if it was possible to effect such a change in the state and disposition of the Gentiles, who were (Eph. ii. 12) "without God [atheists] in the world," how much more possible is it, speaking after the manner of men, to bring about a similar change in the Jews, who acknowledge the one, only, and true God, and receive the law and the prophets as a revelation from Him! This seems to be the drift of the apostle's argument.

25. I would not . . . that ye should be ignorant of this mystery. Mystery signifies anything that is hidden or covered, or not fully made manifest. In the New Testament it signifies, generally, "any thing or doctrine that has not, in former times, been fully known to men"; or "something that has not been heard of, or which is so deep, profound, and difficult of comprehension that it cannot be apprehended without special direction and instruction." Here it signifies the doctrine of the future restoration of the Jews, not fully known in itself, and not at all known as to the time in which it will take place. In chap. xvi. 25, it means the Christian religion, not known till the advent of Christ. Lest ye should be wise in your own conceits.

MATTHEW HENRY

3. The time and extent of this conversion, when and where it is to be expected. It is called a mystery (v. 25), that which was not obvious, and which one would not expect upon the view of the present state of that people. The case of the rejected Jews seemed as bad now as that of the Gentiles had been. Now he would have them know so much of this mystery as to keep them humble: lest you be wise in your own conceit. Ignorance is the cause of our self-conceitedness. (1) Their present state: Blindness, in part, is happened to Israel, v. 25. It is but in part; there is a remnant that see the things which belong to their peace, v. 7, 8.

(2) When this blessed change should be: when the fulness of the Gentiles shall come in, when the gospel has had its intended success, and made its progress in the Gentile world. The Jews shall continue in blindness, till God hath performed his whole work among the Gentiles. God's taking them again was not because he had need of them, but of his own free grace.

(3) The extent of it: All Israel shall be saved, v. 26. He will have mercy upon all, v. 32. They should be brought to believe in Christ the true Messiah whom they crucified, and become one sheep-fold with the Gentiles under Christ the great Shepherd. Some think it is done already, when before, and in, and after, the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, multitudes of the Jews were convinced, and turned Christians. Others think that it is yet to have its accomplishment towards the end of the world.

(4) Because of the promises and prophecies of the Old Testament. He quotes a very remarkable one, v. 26, from Isa. lix. 20, 21. [1] The coming of Christ promised: There shall come out of Zion the deliverer. Jesus Christ is the great deliverer. In Isaiah it is, the Redeemer shall come to Zion. There he is called the Redeemer; here the deliverer; he delivers in a way of redemption, by a price. There he is said to come to Zion, because when the prophet prophesied he was yet to come into the world. When the apostle wrote this, he had come, and he is speaking of the fruits of his appearing, which shall come out of Zion. [2] The purpose of this coming: He shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob. Christ's errand into the world was to turn away ungodliness, that iniquity might not be our ruin, and that it might not be our ruler. Especially to turn it away from Jacob. What greater kindness could he do them than to turn away ungodliness from them, and then make way for all good? In Isaiah it is, The Redeemer shall come to Zion, and unto those that turn from transgression in Jacob, those only that leave their sins and turn to God; to them Christ comes as a Redeemer.—For this is my covenant with them—this, that the deliverer shall come to them—this, that my Spirit shall not depart from them. The apostle adds, When I shall take away their sins. Pardon of sin is laid as the foundation. For I will be merciful.

ye alone were in all time coming to be the family of God. that blindness—'hardness'—in part is happened to—'hath come upon'—Israel—i.e., hath come partially, or upon a portion of Israel.

until the fulness of the Gentiles be—'have'—come in—i.e., not the general conversion of the world to Christ, as many take it; for this would seem to contradict the latter part of this chapter, and throw the national recovery of Israel too far into the future: besides, in vs. 15, the apostle seems to speak of the receiving of Israel, not as following, but as contributing largely to bring about the general conversion of the world—but, 'until the Gentiles have had their full time of the visible Church all to themselves while the Jews are out, which the Jews had till the Gentiles were brought in.' (See Luke 21:24.)

26, 27. And so all Israel shall be saved—To understand this great statement, as some still do, merely of such a gradual inbringing of individual Jews, that there shall at length remain none in unbelief, is to do manifest violence both to it and to the whole context. It can only mean the ultimate ingathering of Israel as a nation, in contrast with the present "remnant." [So THOLUCK, MEYER, DE WETTE, PHILIPPI, ALFORD, HODGE]. Three confirmations of this now follow: two from the prophets, and a third from the Abrahamic covenant itself. First, as it is written, There shall come out of Sion the Deliverer, and shall—or, according to what seems the true reading, without the "and"—'He shall'—turn away ungodliness from Jacob—The apostle, having drawn his illustrations of man's sinfulness chiefly from Psalm 14 and Isaiah 59, now seems to combine the language of the same two places regarding Israel's salvation from it [BENGEL]. In the one place the Psalmist longs to see the "salvation of Israel coming out of Zion" (Ps. 14:7); in the other, the prophet announces that "the Redeemer (or, "Deliverer") shall come to (or for) Zion" (Isa. 59:20). But as all the glorious manifestations of Israel's God were regarded as issuing out of Zion, as the seat of His manifested glory (Ps. 20:2; 110:2; Isa. 31:9), the turn which the apostle gives to the words merely adds to them that familiar idea. And whereas the prophet announces that He "shall come to (or, 'for') them that turn from transgression in Jacob," while the apostle makes Him say that He shall come "to turn away ungodliness from Jacob," this is taken from the LXX version, and seems to indicate a different reading of the original text. The sense, however, is substantially the same in both. Second, For—rather, 'and' (again); introducing a new quotation. this is my covenant with them—lit., 'this is the covenant from me unto them." when I shall take away their sins—This, we believe, is rather a brief summary of Jeremiah 31:31-34 than the express words of any prediction, Those who believe that there are no predictions regarding the literal Israel in the Old Testament, that stretch beyond the end of the Jewish economy, are obliged to view these quotations by the apostle as mere adaptations of Old Testament language to express his own predictions [ALEXANDER on Isaiah, etc.]. But how forced this is, we shall presently see.

28, 29. As concerning the Gospel they are enemies for your sakes—i.e., they are regarded and treated as enemies (in a state of exclusion through unbelief, from the family of God) for the benefit of you Gentiles; in the sense of vss. 11, 15. but as touching the election—of Abraham and his seed

It seems from this, and from other expressions in this Epistle, that the converted Gentiles had not behaved toward the Jews with that decorum and propriety which the relation they bore to them required. In this chapter the apostle strongly guards them against giving way to such a disposition. Blindness in part is happened to Israel. Partial blindness, or blindness to a part of them; for they were not all believers. Several thousands of them had been converted to the Christian faith; though the body of the nation, and especially its rulers, civil and spiritual, continued opposed to Christ and His doctrine. Until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. And this blindness will continue till the Church of the Gentiles be fully completed—till the gospel be preached through all the nations of the earth, and multitudes of heathens everywhere embrace the faith. By the fulness a "great multitude" may be intended, which should be so dilated on every hand as to fill various regions. The apostle, therefore, seems to give this sense of the mystery—that the Jews will continue in a state of blindness till such time as a "multitude of nations," or Gentiles, shall be converted to the Christian faith; and the Jews, hearing of this, shall be excited, by a spirit of emulation, to examine and acknowledge the validity of the proofs of Christianity and embrace the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ.

26. And so all Israel shall be saved. Shall be brought into the way of salvation by acknowledging the Messiah, for the word certainly does not mean eternal glory; for no man can conceive that a time will ever come in which every Jew then living shall be taken to the Kingdom of glory. The term saved as applied to the Israelites in different parts of the Scripture signifies no more than their being gathered out of the nations of the world, separated to God, and possessed of the high privilege of being His peculiar people. And we know that this is the meaning of the term by finding it applied to the body of the Israelites when this alone was the sum of their state. As it is written. The apostle supports what he advances on this head by a quotation from Scripture, which in the main is taken from Isa. lix. 20: The Deliverer shall come out of Zion, and turn away ungodliness from Jacob. Now this cannot be understood of the manifestation of Christ among the Jews or of the multitudes which were converted before, at, and for some time after, the Day of Pentecost; for these times were all past when the apostle wrote this Epistle. And as no remarkable conversion of that people has since taken place, therefore the fulfillment of this prophecy is yet to take place. In what manner Christ is to come out of Sion, and in what way or by what means He is to "turn away transgression from Jacob," we cannot tell; and to attempt to conjecture, when the time, occasion, means, etc., are all in mystery, would be more than reprehensible.

27. For this is my covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins. The reader, on referring to Isa. lix. 20-21, will find that the words of the original are here greatly abridged. They are the following: "And the Redeemer shall come to Zion, and unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob, saith the Lord. As for me, this is my covenant with them, saith the Lord, My Spirit that is upon thee, and my words which I have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of the mouth of thy seed's seed, saith the Lord, from henceforth and for ever."

It may not be amiss to subjoin here a collection of those texts in the Old Testament that seem to point out a restoration of the Jewish commonwealth to a higher degree of excellence than it has yet attained: Isa. ii. 2-5; xix. 24-25; xxv. 6 ff.; xxx. 18-19, 26; lx throughout; lxv. 17 to the end; Jer. xxxi. 10-12; xlvi. 27-28; Ezek. xx. 34, 40 ff.; xxviii. 25-26; xxiv. 20 ff.; xxxvi. 8-16; xxxvii. 21-28; xxxix. 25 ff.; Joel iii. 1-2, 17, 20-21; Amos ix. 9 to the end; Obad. vv. 17, 21; Mic. iv. 3-7; vii. 18-20; Zeph. iii. 19-20.

28. As concerning the gospel. The unbelieving Jews, with regard to the gospel which they have rejected, are at present enemies to God, and aliens from His kingdom, under His Son, Jesus Christ. But with regard to the original purpose of election, whereby they were chosen

This is expressed more plainly (v. 28): They are beloved for the fathers' sakes. And the same love would revive their privileges for still the ancient loving-kindness is remembered. Though, as concerning the gospel, they are enemies to it for your sakes, that is, for the sake of the Gentiles, against whom they have such an antipathy; yet, when God's time shall come, this will wear off, and God's love to their fathers will be remembered. Many fare the better for the sake of their godly ancestors. It is upon this account that the church is called their own olive-tree, which is some encouragement to us to hope that there may be room for them in it again, for old acquaintance-sake. That which hath been may be again. Now from all this he infers that certainly God had great mercy in store for that people, and he proves his inference (v. 29) by this truth: For the gifts and callings of God are without repentance. Those gifts and callings are immutable; whom he so loves, he loves to the end. We never find God repenting that he had given a man grace, or effectually called him.

This is his argument (v. 30, 31): As you in times past have not, &c. It is good for those that have found mercy with God to be often thinking what they were in time past, and how they obtained that mercy. He argues further from the occasion of the Gentiles' call: "You have obtained mercy through their unbelief; much more shall they obtain mercy through your mercy. That through your mercy they might obtain mercy, that is, that they may be beholden to you, as you have been to them." True grace hates monopolies. Those that have found mercy themselves should endeavour that through their mercy others also may obtain mercy.

To the same purport (v. 32): God has concluded them all in unbelief, shut them up as in a prison. They all stand before God convicted of unbelief. They would not believe. "Why then," saith God, "you shall not."

Verses 33–36

The apostle having insisted so largely upon reconciling the rejection of the Jews with the divine goodness, he concludes here with the acknowledgment of the divine wisdom in all this.

I. The secrecy of the divine counsels: O the depth! in general, the whole mystery of the gospel, which we cannot fully comprehend.—The riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God, a depth which the angels pry into, 1 Pet. i. 12. Much more may it puzzle any human understanding. He confesses himself at a loss in the contemplation, and, despairing to find the bottom, he humbly sits down at the brink, and adores the depth. Those that know most in this state of imperfection cannot but be most sensible

—they are beloved—even in their state of exclusion—for the fathers' sakes. For the gifts and calling—'and the calling'—of God are without repentance—'not to be,' or 'cannot be repented of.' By the "calling of God," in this case, is meant that sovereign act by which God, in the exercise of His free choice, "called" Abraham to be the father of a peculiar people; while "the gifts of God" here denote the articles of the covenant which God made with Abraham, and which constituted the real distinction between his and all other families of the earth. Both these, says the apostle, are irrevocable; and as the point for which he refers to this at all is the final destiny of the Israelitish nation, it is clear that the perpetuity through all time of the Abrahamic covenant is the thing here affirmed. And lest any should say that though Israel, as a nation, has no destiny at all under the Gospel, but as a people disappeared from the stage when the middle wall of partition was broken down, yet the Abrahamic covenant still endures in the spiritual seed of Abraham, made up of Jews and Gentiles in one undistinguished mass of redeemed men under the Gospel—the apostle, as if to preclude that supposition, expressly states that the very Israel who, as concerning the Gospel, are regarded as "enemies for the Gentiles' sakes," are "beloved for the fathers' sakes"; and it is in proof of this that he adds, "For the gifts and the calling of God are without repentance." But in what sense are the now unbelieving and excluded children of Israel "beloved for the fathers' sakes"? Not merely from ancestral recollections, as one looks with fond interest on the child of a dear friend for that friend's sake [DR. ARNOLD]—a beautiful thought, and not foreign to Scripture, in this very matter (see II Chron. 20:7; Isa. 41:8)—but it is from ancestral connections and obligations, or their lineal descent from and oneness in covenant with the fathers with whom God originally established it. In other words, the natural Israel—not "the remnant of them according to the election of grace," but THE NATION, sprung from Abraham according to the flesh—are still an elect people, and as such, "beloved." The very same love which chose the fathers, and rested on the fathers as a parent stem of the nation, still rests on their descendants at large, and will yet recover them from unbelief, and reinstate them in the family of God. 30, 31. For as ye in times past have not believed—or, 'obeyed'—God—that is, yielded not to God "the obedience of faith," while strangers to Christ. yet now have obtained mercy through—by occasion of—their unbelief—(See on vss. 11, 15, 28). even so have these—the Jews—now not believed—or, 'now been disobedient'—that through your mercy—the mercy shown to you—they also may obtain mercy—Here is an entirely new idea. The apostle has hitherto dwelt upon the unbelief of the Jews as making way for the faith of the Gentiles—the exclusion of the one occasioning the reception of the other; a truth yielding to generous, believing Gentiles but mingled satisfaction. Now, opening a more cheering prospect, he speaks of the mercy shown to the Gentiles as a means of Israel's recovery; which seems to mean that it will be by the instrumentality of believing Gentiles that Israel as a nation is at length to "look on Him whom they have pierced and mourn for Him," and so to "obtain mercy." (See II Cor. 3:15, 16.) 32. For God hath concluded them all in unbelief—'hath shut them all up to unbelief'—that he might have mercy upon all—i.e., those "all" of whom he had been discoursing; the Gentiles first, and after them the Jews [FRITZSCHE, THOLUCK, OLSHAUSEN, DE WETTE, PHILIPPI, STUART, HODGE]. Certainly it is not 'all mankind individually' [MEYER, ALFORD]; for the apostle is not here dealing with individuals, but with those great divisions of mankind, Jew and Gentile. And what he here says is that God's purpose was to shut each of these divisions of men to the experience first of an humbled, condemned state, without Christ, and then to the experience of His mercy in Christ. 33. Oh, the depth . . .—The apostle now yields himself up to the admiring contemplation of the grandeur of that divine plan which he had sketched out. of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God—Many able expositors render this, 'of the riches and wisdom and knowledge . . .' [ERASMUS, GROTIUS, BENGEL, MEYER, DE WETTE, THOLUCK, OLSHAUSEN, FRITZSCHE, PHILIPPI, ALFORD, REVISED VERSION]. The words will certainly bear this sense, "the depth of God's riches." But "the riches of God" is a much rarer expression with our apostle than the riches of this or that perfection of God; and the words immediately following limit our attention to the unsearchableness of God's "judgments," which probably and separated from all the people of the earth to be the peculiar people of God, they are beloved for the fathers' sakes; He has still favor in store for them on account of their forefathers, the patriarchs.

29. For the gifts and calling of God. The gifts which God has bestowed upon them, and the calling—the invitation—with which He has favored them, He will never revoke. In reference to this point there is no "change of mind" in Him; and therefore the possibility and certainty of their restoration to their original privileges, of being the people of God, of enjoying every spiritual blessing with the fullness of the Gentiles, may be both reasonably and safely inferred. Repentance, when applied to God, signifies simply "change of purpose" relative to some declarations made subject to certain conditions.

30. For as ye in times past. The apostle pursues his argument in favor of the restoration of the Jews. As ye, Gentiles, in times past, for many ages back. Have not believed. Were in a state of alienation from God, yet not so as to be totally and forever excluded, Have now obtained mercy. For you are now taken into the kingdom of the Messiah; through their unbelief —by that method which, in destroying the Jewish peculiarity, and fulfilling the Abrahamic covenant, has occasioned the unbelief and obstinate opposition of the Jews.

31. Even so have these also. In like manner the Jews are, through their infidelity, shut out of the kingdom of God. That through your mercy. This exclusion will not be everlasting; but this will serve to open a new scene, when, through further displays of mercy to you Gentiles, they also may obtain mercy—shall be received into the kingdom of God again; and this shall take place whenever they shall consent to acknowledge the Lord Jesus, and see it their privilege to be fellow heirs with the Gentiles of the grace of life. As sure, therefore, as the Jews were once in the Kingdom, and the Gentiles were not; as sure as the Gentiles are now in the Kingdom, and the Jews are not; so surely will the Jews be brought back into that Kingdom.

32. For God hath concluded them all in unbelief. God hath "shut" or "locked" them all up under unbelief. This refers to the guilty state of both Jews and Gentiles. They had all broken God's law—the Jews, the written law; the Gentiles, the law written in their hearts. See chap. i. 19-20 and ii. 14-15. They are represented here as having been accused of their transgressions; tried at God's bar; found guilty on being tried; condemned to the death they had merited; remanded to prison, till the sovereign will relative to their execution should be announced; "shut" or "locked up," under the jailer, unbelief; and there both continued in the same state, awaiting the execution of their sentence. But God, in His own compassion, moved by no merit in either party, caused a general pardon by the gospel to be proclaimed to all. The Jews have refused to receive this pardon on the terms which God has proposed it, and therefore continue locked up under unbelief. The Gentiles have welcomed the offers of grace, and are delivered out of their prison. But as the offers of mercy continue to be made to all indiscriminately, the time will come when the Jews, seeing the vast accession of the Gentile world to the kingdom of the Messiah, and the glorious privileges which they in consequence enjoy, shall also lay hold on the hope set before them, and thus become with the Gentiles one flock under one Shepherd and Bishop of all their souls. The same figure is used in Gal. iii. 22-23. "But the scripture hath concluded [locked up] all under sin, that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe. But before faith came, we were kept [we were guarded as in a stronghold] under the law, shut up [locked up together] unto the faith which should afterwards be revealed." It is a fine and well-chosen metaphor in both places, and forcibly expresses the guilty, helpless, wretched state of both Jews and Gentiles.

33. O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! This is a very proper conclusion of the whole preceding dis-of their own weakness and short-sightedness.—The depth of the riches. Men's riches are shallow, you may soon see the bottom; but God's riches are deep. There is not only depth in the divine counsels, but riches too, and that passing knowledge.—Riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God. His seeing all things—that all is naked and open before him: there is his knowledge. His ruling and ordering all things and bringing about his own purposes in all; this is his wisdom.—How unsearchable are his judgments! that is, his counsels and purposes: and his ways, that is, the execution of these counsels and purposes. We know not what he has in view; it is past finding out. Secret things belong not to us. What he does we know not now, John xiii. 7. We cannot give a reason of God's proceedings. The judgments of his hands, and the ways of his providence, are dark and mysterious, which therefore we must not pry into, but silently adore. The apostle speaks this especially with reference to that strange turn, the casting off of the Jews, and the entertainment of the Gentiles, with a purpose to take in the Jews again in due time. These are methods unaccountable, concerning which we must say, O the depth!—Past finding out, cannot be traced. God leaves no prints nor footsteps behind him, but his paths of providence are new every morning. He does not go the same way so often as to make a track of it. It follows (v. 34), For who hath known the mind of the Lord? Is there any creature made of his cabinet-council? Is there any to whom he has imparted his counsels, to know the way that he takes? The apostle makes the same challenge (1 Cor. ii. 16): For who hath known the mind of the Lord? And yet there he adds, But we have the mind of Christ. He that knew the mind of the Lord has declared him, John i. 18. And so, though we know not the mind of the Lord, yet if we have the mind of Christ, we have enough.—Or who has been his counsellor? It is nonsense for any man to prescribe to God, or to teach him how to govern the world.

II. The sovereignty of the divine counsels. In all these things God does what he will, because he will, and yet there is no unrighteousness with him.

1. He challenges any to prove God a debtor to him (v. 35): Who hath first given to him? Who is there of all the creatures that can prove God is beholden to him? Of thine own we have given thee. All the duties we can perform are not requitals, but rather restitutions. The apostle here proclaims, in God's name, that payment is ready: It shall be recompenced to him again. It is certain God will let nobody lose by him; but never anyone yet durst make a demand of this kind. This is here suggested, (1) To silence the clamours of the Jews. When God took away their visible church-privileges from them, he did but take his own. (2) To silence the insultings of the Gentiles. When God sent the gospel among them, it was not because he owed them so much favour, but of his own good pleasure.

2. He resolves all into the sovereignty of God (v. 36): For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things, that is, God is all in all. Of God as the spring and fountain of all, through Christ, as the conveyance, to God as the ultimate end. If all be of him and through him, there is all the reason in the world that all should be to him and for him. To do all to the glory of God is to make a virtue of necessity; for all shall in the end be to him, whether we will or no. And so he concludes with a short doxology: To whom be glory for ever, Amen. Paul had been discoursing at large of the counsels of God concerning man, but, after all, he concludes with the acknowledgment of the divine sovereignty, as that into which all these things must be ultimately resolved. Especially when we come to talk of the divine counsels and actings, it is best for us to turn our arguments into awful and serious adorations.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

means His decrees or plans (Ps. 119:75), and of "His ways," or the method by which He carries these into effect. [So LUTHER, CALVIN, BEZA, HODGE, etc.] Besides, all that follows to the end of the chapter seems to show that while the Grace of God to guilty men in Christ Jesus is presupposed to be the whole theme of this chapter, that which called forth the special admiration of the apostle, after sketching at some length the divine purposes and methods in the bestowment of this grace, was "the depth of the riches of God's wisdom and knowledge" in these purposes and methods. The "knowledge," then, points probably to the vast sweep of divine comprehension herein displayed; the "wisdom" to that fitness to accomplish the ends intended, which is stamped on all this procedure. 34, 35. For who hath known the mind of the Lord?—See Job 15:8; Jeremiah 23:18. or who hath been his counsellor—See Isaiah 40:13, 14. or who hath first given to him, and it shall be recompensed to him—'and shall have recompense made to him—again—see Job 35:7, and 41:11. These questions, it will thus be seen, are just quotations from the Old Testament, as if to show how familiar to God's ancient people was the great truth which the apostle himself had just uttered, that God's plans and methods in the dispensation of His Grace have a reach of comprehension and wisdom stamped upon them which finite mortals cannot fathom, much less could ever have imagined, before they were disclosed. 36. For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things: to whom—'to Him'—be glory for ever. Amen—Thus worthily—with a brevity only equalled by its sublimity—does the apostle here sum up this whole matter. "OF Him are all things," as their eternal Source: "THROUGH HIM are all things," inasmuch as He brings all to pass which in His eternal counsels He purposed: "To Him are all things," as being His own last End; the manifestation of the glory of His own perfections being the ultimate, because the highest possible, design of all His procedure from first to last.—On this rich chapter, Note (1) It is an unspeakable consolation to know that in times of deepest religious declension and most extensive defection from the truth, the lamp of God has never been permitted to go out, and that a faithful remnant has ever existed—a remnant larger than their own drooping spirits could easily believe (vss. 1-5). (2) The preservation of this remnant, even as their separation at the first, is all of mere grace (vss. 5, 6). (3) When individuals and communities, after many fruitless warnings, are abandoned of God, they go from bad to worse (vss. 7-10). (4) God has so ordered His dealings with the great divisions of mankind, "that no flesh should glory in His presence." Gentile and Jew have each in turn been "shut up to unbelief," that each in turn may experience the "mercy" which saves the chief of sinners (vss. 11-32). (5) As we are "justified by faith," so are we "kept by the power of God through faith"—faith alone—unto salvation (vss. 20-32). (6) God's covenant with Abraham and his natural seed is a perpetual covenant, in equal force under the Gospel as before it. Therefore it is, that the Jews as a nation still survive, in spite of all the laws which, in similar circumstances, have either extinguished or destroyed the identity of other nations. And therefore it is that the Jews as a nation will yet be restored to the family of God, through the subjection of their proud hearts to Him whom they have pierced. (7) Thus has the Christian Church the highest motive to the establishment and vigorous prosecution of missions to the Jews; God having not only promised that there shall be a remnant of them gathered in every age, but pledged Himself to the final ingathering of the whole nation assigned the honor of that ingathering to the Gentile Church, and assured them that the event, when it does arrive, shall have a life-giving effect upon the whole world (vss. 12-16, 26-31). (8) Those who think that in all the evangelical prophecies of the Old Testament the terms "Jacob," "Israel," etc., are to be understood solely of the Christian Church, would appear to read the Old Testament differently from the apostle, who, from the use of those very terms in Old Testament prophecy, draws arguments to prove that God has mercy in store for the natural Israel (vss. 26, 27). (9) Mere intellectual investigations into divine truth in general, and the sense of the living oracles in particular, as they have a hardening effect, so they are a great contrast to the spirit of our apostle, whose lengthened sketch of God's majestic procedure towards men in Christ Jesus ends here in a burst of admiration, which loses itself in the still loftier frame of adoration (vss. 33-36).

ADAM CLARKE

course. Wisdom may here refer to the designs of God; knowledge, to the means which He employs to accomplish these designs.

34. For who hath known the mind of the Lord? Who can pretend to penetrate the counsels of God, or fathom the reasons of His conduct? His designs and His counsels are like himself, infinite; and consequently, inscrutable.

35. Or who hath first given to him? Who can pretend to have any demands upon God? To whom is He indebted? Have either Jews or Gentiles any right to His blessings? May not He bestow His favors as He pleases, and to whom He pleases? Does He do any injustice to the Jews in choosing the Gentiles? And was it because He was under obligation to the Gentiles that He has chosen them in the place of the Jews? Let him who has any claim on God prefer it, and he shall be compensated.

36. For of him. This is far from being the case, for of him, as the original Designer and Author; and through (by) him, as the prime and efficient Cause; and to him, as the ultimate End for the manifestation of His eternal glory and goodness, are all things in universal nature, through the whole compass of time and eternity. To whom be glory. And let Him have the praise of all His works, from the hearts and mouths of all His intelligent creatures, for ever—throughout all the generations of men. Amen—"So be it!" Let this be established forever!

F. B. MEYER:

This verse reminds us of those lagoons of perfectly still clear water, of which travelers tell. So clear that it is easily possible to look into their translucent depths to where the submarine foliage waves! So deep that the ordinary measuring line fails to plumb them! All these words are monosyllables. A child just learning to read could easily spell them out. But who shall exhaust their meaning?

"Of Him." The entire scheme of redemption; the marvelous history of the chosen people, with which this chapter is occupied; the universe of matter—all are included in the all things that have emanated out of God. No one has been his counselor, or given aught to Him. From all created things, which are as the stream, let us climb to Him, who is their fountain, source, and origin; and in Him let us learn to fill our own souls to the very brim.

"Through Him." Through Jesus Christ, the Mediator, God has poured the entire grace and wealth of his nature to bless and help us. There is no good thing that does not come to us through the mediation of the Second Person of the Holy Trinity. Through Him He made the worlds. Through Him we have received the reconciliation. Through Him, also, all grace is made to abound toward us. Never forget to magnify the Lord Jesus as the source of all your supply.

"To Him." Creation, providence, and redemption are all tending back to God. The tide is setting in toward the throne. A revenue of glory shall yet accrue from all that has happened within the parenthesis of time. Every whit in the great temple shall one day say "Glory!"

MATTHEW HENRY

CHAPTER 12

Verses 1–21

I. Concerning our duty to God. We see what is godliness.

1. It is to surrender ourselves to God, and so to lay a good foundation. This is here pressed as the spring of all duty and obedience, v. 1, 2.

(1) The body must be presented to him, v. 1. The exhortation is here introduced very pathetically: I beseech you, brethren. Though he was a great apostle, yet he calls the meanest Christians brethren, a term of affection and concern. He uses entreaty; this is the gospel way. This is to insinuate the exhortation, that it might come with the more pleasing power. Many are sooner wrought upon if they be accosted kindly, are more easily led than driven.

[1] The duty pressed—to present our bodies a living sacrifice. Your bodies—your whole selves. Our bodies and spirits are intended. Sacrifice is here taken for whatsoever is by God's own appointment dedicated to himself. Christ, who was once offered to bear the sins of many, is the only sacrifice of atonement; but our persons and performances, tendered to God through Christ, are as sacrifices of acknowledgment to the honour of God. Presenting them denotes a voluntary act. It must be a free-will offering. The presenting of the body to God implies not only the avoiding of the sins that are committed with or against the body, but the using of the body as a servant of the soul in the service of God. It is to yield the members of our bodies as instruments of righteousness, ch. vi. 13. Though bodily exercise alone profits little, yet in its place it is a proof of the dedication of our souls to God. First, Present them a living sacrifice. A Christian makes his body a sacrifice to God. A body sincerely devoted to God is a living sacrifice. It is Christ living in the soul by faith that makes the body a living sacrifice. Holy love kindles the sacrifices, puts life into the duties. Alive, that is, to God, v. 11. Secondly, They must be holy. There must be that real holiness which consists in an entire rectitude of heart and life, our bodies must not be made the instruments of sin and uncleanness, but set apart for God, and put to holy uses. It is the soul that is the proper subject of holiness; but a sanctified soul communicates a holiness to the body. That is holy which is according to the will of God; when the bodily actions are so, the body is holy.

[2] The arguments to enforce this, which are three: First, Consider the mercies of God: I beseech you by the mercies of God. This is an argument most sweetly cogent. There is the mercy that is in God and the mercy that is from God—mercy in the spring and mercy in the streams: both are included here. God is a merciful God, therefore let us present our bodies to him; he will be sure to use them kindly. We receive from him every day the fruits of his mercy, particularly mercy to our bodies: he made them, he maintains them, be bought them. The greatest mercy of all is that Christ hath made not his body only, but his soul, an offering for sin. Let us render ourselves as an acknowledgment of all these favours—all we are, all we have, all we can do; and, after all, it is but very poor returns, and yet, because it is what we have, Secondly, It is acceptable to God. These living sacrifices are acceptable to God. If the presenting of ourselves will but please him, we may easily conclude that we cannot bestow ourselves better. Thirdly, It is our reasonable service. There is an act of reason in it; for it is the soul that presents the body. Our God must be served in the spirit and with the understanding. God does not impose upon us anything hard or unreasonable, but that which is altogether agreeable to the principles of right reason. That is a reasonable service which we are able and ready to give a reason for.

(2) The mind must be renewed for him. This is pressed (v. 2): "Be you transformed by the renewing of your mind." Conversion and sanctification are the renewing of the mind, a change not of the substance, but of the qualities of the soul. The man is not what he was—old things are passed away, all things are become new. The renewing of the mind is the renewing of the whole man, for out of it are the issues of life. The progress of sanctification, dying to sin more and more and living to righteousness more and more, is the carrying on of this renewing work. This is called the transforming of us. The same word is used 2 Cor. iii. 18, where we are said to be changed into the same image from glory to glory. Not that we can work such a change ourselves: we could as soon make a new world as make a new heart by any power of our own; it is God's work. "Use the means which God hath appointed and ordained for it." It is God that turns us, and then we are turned. "Lay your souls under the changing transforming influences of Vss. 1-21. DUTIES OF BELIEVERS, GENERAL AND PARTICULAR. The doctrinal teaching of this Epistle is now followed up by a series of exhortations to practical duty. And first, the all-comprehensive duty. 1. I beseech you therefore—in view of all that has been advanced in the foregoing part of this Epistle.

that ye present—See on ch. 6:13, where we have the same exhortation and the same word there rendered "yield" (as also in vss. 16, 19). your bodies—i.e., 'yourselves in the body,' considered as the organ of the inner life. As it is through the body that all the evil that is in the unrenewed heart comes forth into palpable manifestation and action, so it is through the body that all the gracious principles and affections of believers reveal themselves in the outward life. Sanctification extends to the whole man (I Thess. 5:23, 24).

a living sacrifice—in glorious contrast to the legal sacrifices, which, save as they were slain, were no sacrifices at all. The death of the one "Lamb of God, taking away the sin of the world," has swept all dead victims from off the altar of God, to make room for the redeemed themselves as "living sacrifices" to Him who made "Him to be sin for us"; while every outgoing of their grateful hearts in praise, and every act prompted by the love of Christ, is itself a sacrifice to God of a sweet-smelling savor (Heb. 13:15, 16). holy—As the Levitical victims, when offered without blemish to God, were regarded as holy, so believers, "yielding themselves to God as those that are alive from the dead, and their members as instruments of righteousness unto God, are, in His estimation, not ritually but really "holy," and so—by the mercies of God—those mercies, whose free and unmerited nature, glorious Channel, and saving fruits have been opened up at such length.

acceptable—'wellpleasing'—unto God—not as the Levitical offerings, merely as appointed symbols of spiritual ideas, but objects, intrinsically, of divine complacency, in their renewed character, and endeared relationship to Him through His Son Jesus Christ. which is your reasonable—rather, 'rational' —service—in contrast, not to the senselessness of idol worship, but to the offering of irrational victims under the law. In this view the presentation of ourselves, as living monuments of redeeming mercy, is here called "our rational service"; and surely it is the most rational and exalted occupation of God's reasonable creatures. So II Peter 1:5, "to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God through Jesus Christ." but be ye transformed—or, 'transfigured' (as in Matt. 17:2; and II Cor. 3:18, Greek). by the renewing of your mind —not by a mere outward disconformity to the ungodly world, many of whose actions in themselves may be virtuous and praiseworthy; but by such an inward spiritual transformation as makes the whole life new—new in its motives and ends, even where the actions differ in nothing from those of the world —new, considered as a whole, and in such a sense as to be wholly unattainable save through the constraining power of the love of Christ.

ADAM CLARKE

CHAPTER 12

The apostle, having now finished the doctrinal part of this Epistle, proceeds to the practical.

1. I beseech you therefore, brethren. This address is probably intended for both the Jews and the Gentiles; though some suppose that the Jews are addressed in the first verse, the Gentiles in the second.

That ye present your bodies. A metaphor taken from bringing sacrifices to the altar of God. The person offering picked out the choicest of his flock, brought it to the altar, and presented it there as an atonement for his sin. They are exhorted to give themselves up in the spirit of sacrifice; to be as wholly the Lord's property as the whole burnt offering was, no part being devoted to any other use.

A living sacrifice. In opposition to those dead sacrifices which they were in the habit of offering while in their Jewish state; and that they should have the lusts of the flesh mortified, that they might live to God. Holy. Without spot or blemish, referring still to the sacrifice required by the law.

By the mercies of God. "By the tender mercies or compassions of God," such as a tender father shows to his refractory children; who, on their humiliation, is easily persuaded to forgive their offenses. Acceptable unto God. The sacrifice being perfect in its kind, and the intention of the offerer being such that both can be acceptable and well pleasing to God, who searches the heart. All these phrases are sacrificial, and show that there must be a complete surrender of the person—the body, the whole man, mind and flesh, to be given to God; and that he is to consider himself no more his own, but the entire property of his Maker. Your reasonable service. Nothing can be more consistent with reason than that the work of God should glorify its Author. We are not our own; we are the property of the Lord by the right of creation and redemption, and it would be as unreasonable as it would be wicked not to live to His glory, in strict obedience to His will. The reasonable service of the apostle may refer to the difference between the Jewish and Christian worship. The former religious service consisted chiefly in its sacrifices, which were of irrational creatures. The Christian service or worship is "rational," because performed according to the true intent and meaning of the law, the heart and soul being engaged in the service. He alone lives the life of a fool and a madman who lives the life of a sinner against God; for in sinning against his Maker he wrongs his own soul, loves death, and rewards evil unto himself.

Be ye transformed. "Be ye metamorphosed, transfigured," appear as new persons, and with new habits; as God has given you a new form of worship, so that you serve in the newness of the spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter. The word implies a radical, thorough, and universal change, both outward and inward. By the renewing of your mind. Let the inward change produce the outward. Where the spirit, the temper, and disposition of the mind, Eph. iv. 23, are not renewed, an outward change is of but little worth, and but of short standing.

the blessed Spirit." Though the new man be created of God, yet we must put it on (Eph. iv. 24), and be pressing forward towards perfection.

[1] What is the great enemy to this renewing; and that is, conformity to this world: Be not conformed to this world. All the disciples and followers of the Lord Jesus must be nonconformists to this world. Do not fashion yourselves according to the world. We must not conform to the things of the world. We must not conform to the men of the world, we must not follow a multitude to do evil. If sinners entice us, we must not consent to them, but in our places witness against them. True Christianity consists much in a sober singularity. Yet we must take heed of the extreme of affected rudeness and moroseness, which some run into. The rule of the gospel is a rule of direction, not a rule of contrariety.

[2] What is the great effect of this renewing: That you may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God. By the will of God, here we are to understand his revealed will concerning our duty, that will which we pray may be done by us as it is done by the angels. First, The will of God is good, and acceptable, and perfect; three excellent properties of a law. It is good in itself. It is good for us. It is acceptable, it is pleasing to God. The only way to attain his favour as the end is to conform to his will as the rule. It is perfect, to which nothing can be added. Secondly, It concerns Christians to prove what is that will of God which is good, and acceptable, and perfect; to know it experimentally, to know the excellency of the will of God by the experience of a conformity to it. It is to approve things that are excellent (Phil. i. 10). It is to be of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord, Isa. xi. 3. Thirdly, Those are best able to prove what is the good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God, who are transformed by the renewing of their mind. It disposes the soul to receive the revelations of the divine will. The promise is (John vii. 17), If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine. A good wit can dispute about the will of God; while an honest, humble heart loves it.

2. When this is done, to serve him (v. 11, 12), Serving the Lord. To be religious is to serve God. (1) We must make a business of it, and not be slothful in that business. Not slothful in business. We must not drive on slowly in religion. Slothful servants will be reckoned with as wicked servants. (2) We must be fervent in spirit, serving the Lord. God must be served with the spirit under the influences of the Holy Spirit. And there must be fervency in the spirit—a holy zeal, and warmth, as those that love God not only with the heart and soul, but with all our hearts, and with all our souls. This is the holy fire that kindles the sacrifice and carries it up to heaven, an offering of a sweet-smelling savour. (3) Rejoicing in hope. God is honoured by our hope and trust in him, especially when we rejoice in that hope. (4) Patient in tribulation. Thus also God is served, not only by working for him when he calls us to work, but by sitting still quietly when he calls us to suffer. Those that rejoice in hope are likely to be patient in tribulation. (5) Continuing instant in prayer. Prayer is a friend to hope and patience, and we do in it serve the Lord.

II. Concerning our duty which respects ourselves; this is sobriety.

1. A sober opinion of ourselves, v. 3. I say, through the grace given unto me. It is said to everyone of us, one as well as another. Pride is a sin that is bred in the bone of all of us. Not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think. We must take heed of having too great an opinion of ourselves. We must not be self-conceited, nor esteem too much our own wisdom. There is a high thought of ourselves which we may and must have to think ourselves too good to be the slaves of sin and drudges to this world. We should think soberly, that is, we must have a modest opinion of ourselves and our own abilities, according to what we have received from God, and not otherwise. The words will bear yet another sense agreeable enough. Of himself is not in the original; therefore it may be read, That no man be wise above what he ought to be wise, but be wise unto sobriety. There is a knowledge that puffs up. We must take heed of this, and labour after that knowledge which tends to sobriety. To this head refers also that exhortation (v. 16), Be not wise in your own conceits. It is good to be wise, but it is bad to think ourselves so; for there is more hope of a fool than of him that is wise in his own eyes. It was an excellent thing for Moses to have his face shine and not know it. Now the reasons are these:

(1) Because whatever we have that is good, God hath dealt it to us. The best and most useful man in the world is no more, no better, than what the free grace of God makes him every day. When we are

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

2. And be ye not conformed to this world—Cf. Eph. 2:2; Gal. 1:4, Greek.

that ye may prove—i.e., experimentally. (See on the word "experience" in ch. 5:4, and cf. I Thess. 5:10, where the sentiment is the same.) what is that—'the'—good, and acceptable—'well pleasing'—and perfect, will of God—We prefer this rendering [with CALVIN] to that which many able critics [THOLUCK, MEYER, DE WETTE, FRITZSCHE, PHILIPPI, ALFORD, HODGE] adopt—'that ye may prove,' or 'discern the will of God, [even] what is good, and acceptable, and perfect.' God's will is "good," as it demands only what is essentially and unchangeably good (ch. 7: 10); it is "well pleasing," in contrast with all that is arbitrary, as demanding only what God has eternal complacency in (cf. Mic. 6:8, with Jer. 9:24); and it is "perfect," as it required nothing else than the perfection of God's reasonable creature, who, in proportion as he attains to it, reflects God's own perfection. Such then is the great general duty of the redeemed—SELF-CONSECRATION, in our whole spirit and soul and body to Him who hath called us into the fellowship of His Son Jesus Christ. Next follow specific duties, chiefly social; beginning with Humility, the chiefest of all the graces—but here with special reference to spiritual gifts.

11. not slothful in business—The word rendered "business" means 'zeal,' 'diligence,' 'purpose'; denoting the energy of action. serving the Lord—i.e., the Lord Jesus (see Eph. 6:5-8). Another reading—'serving the time,' or 'the occasion'—which differs in form but very slightly from the received reading, has been adopted by good critics [LUTHER, OLSHAUSEN, FRITZSCHE, MEYER]. But as MS. authority is decidedly against it, so is internal evidence; and comparatively few favor it. Nor is the sense which it yields a very Christian one. 12. rejoicing . . .—Here it is more lively to retain the order and the verbs of the original: 'In hope, rejoicing; in tribulation, enduring; in prayer, persevering.' Each of these exercises helps the other. If our "hope" of glory is so assured that it is a rejoicing hope, we shall find the spirit of "endurance in tribulation" natural and easy; but since it is "prayer" which strengthens the faith that begets hope and lifts it up into an assured and joyful expectancy, and since our patience in tribulation is fed by this, it will be seen that all depends on our "perseverance in prayer."

For I say—authoritatively—through the grace given unto me—as an apostle of Jesus Christ; thus exemplifying his own precept by modestly falling back on that office which both warranted and required such plainness towards all classes. to every man that is among you, not to think . . .—It is impossible to convey in good English the emphatic play, so to speak, which each word here has upon another: 'not to be high-minded above what he ought to be minded, but so to be minded as to be sober-minded [CALVIN, ALFORD]. This is merely a strong way of characterizing all undue self-elevation.

2. And be not conformed to this world. By this world may be understood that present state of things among both the Jews and the Gentiles; the customs and fashions of the people who then lived, the Gentiles particularly, who had neither the power nor the form of godliness. The world that now is, this present state of things, is as much opposed to the spirit of genuine Christianity as the world then was.

That ye may prove. That you may have practical proof and experimental knowledge of the will of God—of His purpose and determination, which is good in itself, infinitely so. Acceptable, "well pleasing to and well received by" every mind that is renewed and transformed. And perfect. Finished and complete. When the mind is renewed, and the whole life changed, then the will of God is perfectly fulfilled; for this is its grand design in reference to every human being.

11. Not slothful in business. That God who forbade working on the seventh day has, by the same authority, enjoined it on the other six days. He who neglects to labor during the week is as culpable as he is who works on the Sabbath. An idle, slothful person can never be a Christian. Fervent in spirit. Do nothing at any time but what is to the glory of God, and do everything as unto Him; and in everything let your hearts be engaged. Be always in earnest, and let your heart ever accompany your hand. Serving the Lord. Ever considering that His eye is upon you, and that you are accountable to Him for all that you do, and that you should do everything so as to please Him. In order to this there must be simplicity in the intention and purity in the affections.

12. Rejoicing in hope. Of that glory of God that to each faithful follower of Christ shall shortly be revealed. Patient in tribulation. Remembering that what you suffer as Christians you suffer for Christ's sake; and it is to His honor, and the honor of your Christian profession, that you suffer it with an even mind. Continuing instant in prayer. Making the most fervent and intense application to the throne of grace for the light and power of the Holy Spirit; without which you can neither abhor evil, do good, love the brethren, entertain a comfortable hope, nor bear up patiently under the tribulations and ills of life.

3. Through the grace given unto me. By the grace given, Paul most certainly means his apostolic office, by which he had the authority, not only to preach the gospel, but also to rule the Church of Christ. This is the meaning of the word in Eph. iii. 8: "Unto me, who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given [is conceded this office or employment immediately by God himself], that I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ." Not to think . . . more highly. "Not to act proudly"; to arrogate nothing to himself on account of any grace he had received, or of any office committed to him. But to think soberly. The reader will perceive here a sort of paronomasia, or play upon words: phronein, from phren, the "mind," signifies to "think, mind, relish, to be of opinion"; and sophronein signifies to be of a sound mind, to "think discreetly, modestly, humbly." Let no man think himself more or greater than God has made him; and let him know that whatever he is or has of good or excellence, he has it from God; and that the glory belongs to the Giver, and not to him who has received the gift.

thinking of ourselves, we must remember to think not how we have attained; but think how kind God hath been to us.

(2) Because God deals out his gifts in a certain measure: According to the measure of faith. The measure of spiritual gifts he calls the measure of faith, for this is the radical grace. What we have and do that is good is so far right and acceptable as it is founded in faith. Christ had the Spirit given him without measure. But the saints have it by measure. Christ, who had gifts without measure, was meek and lowly; and shall we, that are stinted, be proud and self-conceited?

(3) Because God has dealt out gifts to others as well as to us: Dealt to every man. Had we the monopoly of the Spirit there might be some pretence for this conceitedness of ourselves; but others have their share as well as we. Therefore it ill becomes us to lift up ourselves, and to despise others, as if we only were the people in favour with Heaven. This reasoning he illustrates by a comparison taken from the members of the natural body. As we have many members in one body, &c., v. 4, 5. [1] All the saints make up one body in Christ, who is the head of the body. Believers lie not in the world as a confused disorderly heap, but are organized and knit together. [2] Particular believers are members of this body, deriving life and spirits from the head. Some members in the body are bigger and more useful than others, and each received according to its proportion. If the little finger should receive as much nourishment as the leg, how unseemly and prejudicial would it be! We must remember that we are not the whole; we are but parts. [3] All the members have not the same office (v. 4), but each hath its respective place and work assigned it. So in the mystical body, some are called to one sort of work; others are called to another sort of work. [4] Each member hath its place and office, for the good of the whole, and of every other member. We are not only members of Christ, but we are members one of another, v. 5. We are engaged to do all the good we can one to another. Whatever we have we received it not for ourselves, but for the good of others.

2. A sober use of the gifts that God hath given us. As we must not on the one hand be proud of our talents, so on the other hand we must not bury them. We must not say, "I am nothing, therefore I will sit still, and do nothing"; but, "I am nothing in myself, and therefore I will lay out myself to the utmost in the strength of the grace of Christ." Having gifts, let us use them. Gifts differing. The immediate design is different, though the ultimate tendency of all is the same. According to the grace. It is grace that appoints the office, qualifies and inclines the person. Seven particular gifts he specifies (v. 6–8), which seem to be meant of so many distinct offices. There are two general ones here expressed by prophesying and ministering, the former the work of the bishops, the latter the work of the deacons. The five latter will therefore be reduced to the two former.

(1) Prophecy. Whether prophecy, let us prophesy according to the proportion of faith. It is not meant of the extraordinary gifts of foretelling things to come, but the ordinary office of preaching the word. The work of the Old Testament prophets was not only to foretell future things, but to warn the people concerning sin and duty. And thus gospel preachers are prophets. Those that preach the word must do it according to the proportion of faith, [1] As to the manner of our prophesying, it must be according to the proportion of the grace of faith. Let him that preaches set all the faith he hath on work, to impress the truths he preaches upon his own heart in the first place. As people cannot hear well, so ministers cannot preach well, without faith. And we must remember the proportion of faith—that, though all men have not faith, yet a great many have besides ourselves. "Hast thou faith? Have it to thyself; and do not make it a ruling rule to others, remembering that thou hast but thy proportion." [2] As to the matter of our prophesying, it must be according to the proportion of the doctrine of faith. There are some staple-truths, as I may call them, plainly and uniformly taught in the scripture, which are the touchstone of preaching, by which we must prove all things, and then hold fast that which is good, 1 Thess. v. 20, 21. Truths that are more dark must be examined by those that are more clear, for it is certain one truth can never contradict another. See here what ought to be the great care of preachers—to preach sound doctrine. It is necessary that it be according to the proportion of faith: for it is the word of faith that we preach. Now there are two particular works which he that prophesieth hath to mind—teaching and exhorting. First, Let him that teacheth wait on teaching. Teaching is the bare explaining and proving according as God hath dealt to every man the measure of faith—Faith is here viewed as the inlet to all the other graces, and so, as the receptive faculty of the renewed soul—i.e., 'as God hath given to each his particular capacity to take in the gifts and graces which He designs for the general good.'

4, 5. For as we have many members . . .—The same diversity and yet unity obtains in the body of Christ, whereof all believers are the several members, as in the natural body.

6-8. Having then gifts differing according to the grace given to us—Here, let it be observed, all the gifts of believers alike are viewed as communications of mere grace.

whether—we have the gift of—prophecy—i.e., of inspired teaching (as in Acts 15:32). Anyone speaking with divine authority—whether with reference to the past, the present, or the future—was termed a prophet (Exod. 7:1).

let us prophesy according to the proportion of faith—rather, 'of our faith.' Many Romish expositors and some Protestant (as CALVIN and BENGEL, and, though, hesitatingly, BEZA and HODGE), render this 'the analogy of faith,' understanding by it 'the general tenor' or 'rule of faith,' divinely delivered to men for their guidance. But this is against the context, whose object is to show that, as all the gifts of believers are according to their respective capacity for them, they are not to be puffed up on account of them, but to use them purely for their proper ends.

or he that teacheth—Teachers are expressly distinguished from prophets, and put after them, as exercising a lower function (Acts 13:1; I Cor. 12:28,

ADAM CLARKE

Measure of faith. It is very likely that the faith here used means the Christian religion; and the measure, the degree of knowledge and experience which each had received in it, and the power this gave him of being useful in the Church of God.

4. For as we have many members. As the human body consists of many parts, each having its respective office, and all contributing to the perfection and support of the whole; each being indispensably necessary in the place which it occupies, and each equally useful though performing a different function.

5. So we, being many. We who are members of the Church of Christ, which is considered the body of which He is the Head, have various offices assigned to us, according to the measure of grace, faith, and religious knowledge which we possess; and although each has a different office, and qualifications suitable to that office, yet all belong to the same body, and each has as much need of the help of another as that other has of his. Therefore let there be neither pride on the one hand, nor envy on the other.

6. Having then gifts differing. As the goodness of God, with this view of our mutual subserviency and usefulness, has endowed us with different gifts and qualifications, let each apply himself to the diligent improvement of his particular office and talent, and modestly keep within the bounds of it, not exalting himself or despising others. Whether prophecy. That prophecy in the New Testament often means the gift of "exhorting, preaching, or of expounding the Scriptures," is evident from many places in the Gospels, Acts, and Paul's Epistles; see 1 Cor. xi. 4-5; and especially 1 Cor. xiv. 3: "He that prophesieth speaketh unto men to edification, and exhortation, and comfort." This was the proper office of a preacher; and it is to the exercise of this office that the apostle refers in the whole of the chapter from which the above quotations are made. I think the apostle uses the term in the same sense here—Let every man who has the gift of preaching and interpreting the Scriptures do it in proportion to the grace and light he has received from God and in no case arrogate to himself knowledge which he has not received; let him not esteem himself more highly on account of this gift, or affect to be wise above what is written, or indulge himself in fanciful interpretations of the Word of God. The proportion of faith, which some render the "analogy of faith," signifies in grammar "the similar declension of similar words"; but in scriptural matters it has been understood to mean the general and consistent plan or scheme of doctrines delivered in the Scriptures, where everything bears its due relation and proportion to another. Thus the death of Christ is commensurate in its merits to the evils produced by the fall of Adam. The doctrine of justification by faith bears the strictest analogy or proportion to the grace of Christ and the helpless, guilty, condemned state of man.

Or he that teacheth. The teacher was a person whose office it was to instruct others, whether by catechizing or simply explaining the grand truths of Christianity.

of gospel truths, without practical application. Now he that has a faculty of teaching, and has undertaken that province, let him stick to it. It is a good gift, let him use it, and give his mind to it. Secondly, Let him that exhorteth wait on exhortation. Let him give himself to that. This is the work of the pastor, to apply gospel truths and rules more closely to the people, and to press upon them that which is more practical. Many that are very accurate in teaching may yet be very cold and unskilful in exhorting; and on the contrary. The one requires a clearer head, the other a warmer heart. To wait on our work is to bestow the best of our time and thoughts upon it, and to study not only to do it, but to do it well.

(2) Ministry. If a man hath the office of a deacon let him use that office well. It includes all those offices which concern the outward business of the house of God. Serving tables, Acts vi. 2. Now let him on whom this care of ministering is devolved attend to it with faithfulness and diligence. [1] He that giveth, let him do it with simplicity. Those church-officers that were the stewards of the church's alms. Let them do it liberally and faithfully, with all sincerity and integrity, having no other intention in it than to glorify God and do good. He that hath wherewithal, let him give, and give plentifully and liberally. God loves a cheerful bountiful giver. [2] He that ruleth with diligence. It should seem, he means those that were assistants to the pastors in exercising church-discipline. Now such must do it with diligence. The word denotes both care and industry to discover what is amiss to keep the church pure. [3] He that showeth mercy with cheerfulness. Some think it is meant in general of all that in anything show mercy; Let them be willing to do it, and take a pleasure in it. But it seems to be meant of some particular church-officers, whose work it was to take care of the sick and strangers. Now this must be done with cheerfulness. A pleasing countenance in acts of mercy is a great relief and comfort to the miserable; when they see it is not done grudgingly and unwillingly, but with pleasant looks and gentle words. Those that have to do with such as are sick and sore, and commonly cross and peevish, have need to put on not only patience, but cheerfulness.

III. Concerning that part of our duty which respects our brethren. Now all our duty towards one another is summed up in one word, and that a sweet word, love. Therefore the apostle mentions this first: Let love be without dissimulation; not in compliment and pretence, but in reality. There is a love owing to our friends, and to our enemies. He specifies both.

1. To our friends. There is a mutual love that Christians owe, and must pay.

(1) An affectionate love (v. 10): Be kindly affectioned one to another, with brotherly love—it signifies not only love, but a readiness and inclination to love, kindness flowing out as from a spring. It properly denotes the love of parents to their children. Such must our love be to one another, and such it will be where there is a new nature and the law of love is written in the heart. One to another. This may recommend the grace of love to us, that, as it is made our duty to love others, so it is as much their duty to love us. And what can be sweeter on this side heaven than to love and be beloved?

(2) A respectful love: In honour preferring one another. Let us be forward to give to others the pre-eminence. We should be forward to take notice of the gifts, and graces, and performances of our brethren, and value them accordingly, be more pleased to hear another praised than ourselves; going before, or leading one another in honour; so some read it: not in taking honour, but in giving honour. Though we must prefer others (as our translation reads it) as more capable and deserving than ourselves, yet we must not make that an excuse for doing nothing, nor under a pretence of honouring others, indulge ourselves in ease and slothfulness. Therefore he immediately adds (v. 11), Not slothful in business.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

29). Probably it consisted mainly in opening up the evangelical bearings of Old Testament Scripture; and it was in this department apparently that Apollos showed his power and eloquence (Acts 18:24). or he that exhorteth—Since all preaching, whether by apostles, prophets, or teachers, was followed up by exhortation (Acts 11:23; 14:22; 15:32, etc.), many think that no specific class is here in view. But if liberty was given to others to exercise themselves occasionally in exhorting the brethren, generally, or small parties of the less instructed, the reference may be to them.

Or ministry, let us wait on—be occupied with'—our ministering—The word here used imports any kind of service, from the dispensing of the word of life (Acts 6:4) to the administering of the temporal affairs of the Church (Acts 6:1-3). The latter seems intended here, being distinguished from "prophesying," "teaching," and "exhorting."

he that giveth—in the exercise of private benevolence probably, rather than in the discharge of diaconal duty. with simplicity—so the word probably means. But as simplicity seems enjoined in the next clause but one of this same verse, perhaps the meaning here is, 'with liberality,' as the same word is rendered in II Corinthians 8:2; 9:11. he that ruleth—whether in the Church or his own household. See I Timothy 3:4, 5, where the same word is applied to both. with diligence—with earnest purpose. he that showeth mercy, with cheerfulness—not only without grudging either trouble or pecuniary relief, but feeling it to be "more blessed to give than to receive," and to help than be helped.

9. Let love be without dissimulation—'Let your love be unfeigned' (as in II Cor. 6:6; I Pet. 2:22; and see I John 3:18). Abhor that which is evil; cleave to that which is good—What a lofty tone of moral principle and feeling is here inculcated! It is not, Abstain from the one, and do the other; nor, Turn away from the one, and draw to the other; but, Abhor the one, and cling, with deepest sympathy, to the other.

10. Be . . . —better, 'In brotherly love be affectionate one to another; in [giving, or showing] honor, outdoing each other.' The word rendered "prefer" means rather 'to go before,' 'take the lead,' i.e., 'show an example.' How opposite is this to the reigning morality of the heathen world! and though Christianity has so changed the spirit of society, that a certain beautiful disinterestedness and self-sacrifice shines in the character of not a few who are but partially, if at all under the transforming power of the Gospel, it is only those whom "the love of Christ constrains to live not unto themselves," who are capable of thoroughly acting in the spirit of this precept.

ADAM CLARKE

8. Or he that exhorteth. The person who admonished and reprehended the unruly or disorderly; and who supported the weak and comforted the penitents, and those who were under heaviness through manifold temptations.

7. Or ministry. Diakonia simply means the office of a deacon.

He that giveth. He who distributeth the alms of the church. With simplicity, being influenced by no partiality, but dividing to each according to the necessity of his case. He that ruleth. He that presides over a particular business; but as the verb also signifies to "defend or patronize," it is probably used here to signify receiving and providing for strangers, and especially the persecuted who were obliged to leave their own homes, and were destitute, afflicted, and tormented. It might also imply the persons whose business it was to receive and entertain the apostolical teachers who travelled from place to place, establishing and confirming the churches. He that sheweth mercy. Let the person who is called to perform any act of compassion or mercy to the wretched do it, not grudgingly nor of necessity, but from a spirit of pure benevolence and sympathy. The poor are often both wicked and worthless; and if those who are called to minister to them as stewards, overseers, etc., do not take care, they will get their hearts hardened with the frequent proofs they will have of deception, lying, idleness, etc. If whatever is done in this way be not done unto the Lord, it can never be done with cheerfulness.

9. Let love be without dissimulation. Have no "hypocritical" love; let not your love wear a mask; make no empty professions. Abhor that which is evil. Hate sin as you would hate that hell to which it leads. Stygeo signifies to "hate or detest with horror"; the preposition greatly strengthens the meaning. Styx was a feigned river in hell by which the gods were wont to swear, and if any of them falsified this oath he was deprived of his nectar and ambrosia for a hundred years; hence the river was reputed to be hateful, and stygeo signified "to be as hateful as hell." Cleave to that which is good. "Be cemented or glued to that which is good"; so the word literally signifies. Have an unalterable attachment to whatever leads to God and contributes to the welfare of your fellow creatures.

10. Be kindly affectioned one to another with brotherly love. It is difficult to give a simple translation of the original. The word philadelphia signifies that affectionate regard which every Christian should feel for another, as being members of the same mystical body; hence it is emphatically termed the "love of the brethren." When William Penn, of deservedly famous memory, made a treaty with the Indians in North America, and purchased from them a large woody tract, which, after its own nature and his name, he called Pennsylvania, he built a city on it, and peopled it with Christians of his own denomination, and called the city from the word in the text Philadelphia. The word philostorgos, which we translate kindly affectioned, signifies that tender and indescribable affection which a mother bears to her child, and which almost all creatures manifest towards their young. "Love a brother Christian with the affection of a natural brother." In honour preferring one another. The meaning appears to be this: Consider all your brethren as more worthy than yourself; and let neither grief nor envy affect your mind at seeing another honored and yourself neglected. This is a hard lesson, and very few persons learn it thoroughly. If we wish to see our brethren honored, still it is with the secret condition in our own minds that we be honored more than they. We have no objection to the elevation of others, providing we may be at the head. But who can bear even to be what he calls neglected? I once heard the following conversation between two persons. "I know not," said one, "that I neglect to do anything in my power to promote the interest of true religion in this place, and yet I seem to be held in very little repute, scarcely any person even noticing me." To which the other replied: "My good friend, set yourself down for nothing, and if any person takes you for something it will be all clear gain."

MATTHEW HENRY

(3) A liberal love (v. 13): Distributing to the necessities of saints. It is but a mock love which rests in the verbal expressions of kindness and respect, while the wants of our brethren call for real supplies, and it is in the power of our hands to furnish them. It is no strange thing for saints in this world to want necessaries for the support of their natural life. Surely the things of this world are not the best things; if they were, the saints would not be put off with so little of them. It is the duty of those who have wherewithal to distribute, or (as it might better be read) to communicate to those necessities. It is not enough to draw out the soul, but we must draw out the purse, to the hungry. Communicating. Our poor brethren have a kind of interest in that which God hath given us; and our relieving them should come from a fellow-feeling of their wants. The charitable benevolence of the Philippians to Paul is called their communicating with his affliction, Phil. iv. 14. We are in a special manner bound to communicate to the saints. There is a common love owing to our fellow-creatures, but a special love owing to our fellow-christians. He mentions another branch of this bountiful love: Given to hospitality. As there is occasion, we must welcome strangers. I was a stranger, and you took me in, is mentioned as one instance of the mercifulness of those that shall obtain mercy. It intimates, not only that we must take opportunity, but that we must seek opportunity, thus to show mercy.

(4) A sympathizing love (v. 15): Rejoice with those that do rejoice, and weep with those that weep. True love will interest us in the sorrows and joys of one another, and teach us to make them our own. Some rejoicing, and others weeping for the trial, as of other graces, so of brotherly love and Christian sympathy. Not that we must participate in the sinful mirths or mournings of any. Not envying those that prosper, but rejoicing with them; not despising those that are in trouble, but concerned for them, and ready to help them.

(5) A united love: "Be of the same mind one towards another (v. 16). Agree in affection; endeavour to be all one; wishing the same good to others that you do to yourselves"; so some understand it. This is to love our brethren as ourselves.

(6) A condescending love: Mind not high things, but condescend to men of low estate, v. 16. True love cannot be without lowliness. To love one another aright is to be willing to stoop to the meanest offices of kindness for the good of one another. Love is a condescending grace. Mind not high things. We must not be ambitious of honour and preferment. The Romans, living in the imperial city, were perhaps ready to take occasion thence to think the better of themselves. Therefore the apostle so often cautions them against high-mindedness; compare ch. xi. 20. Condescend to men of low estate. It may be meant of mean things, to which we must condescend. If our condition in the world be poor and low, yet we must bring our minds to it, and acquiesce in it. So the margin: Be contented with mean things. Be reconciled to the place which God in his providence hath put us in. We must account nothing below us but sin. It may be meant of mean persons; so we read it (I think both are to be included): Condescend to men of low estate. We need not be ashamed to converse with the lowly, while the great God overlooks heaven and earth to look at such. True love values grace in rags as well as in scarlet. A jewel is a jewel, though it lie in the dirt. Condescend; that is, suit yourselves to them, stoop to them for their good. He adds, Be not wise in your own conceits; to the same purport with v. 3. We shall never find in our hearts to condescend to others while we find there so great a conceit of ourselves: and therefore this must needs be mortified. "Be not wise by yourselves, be not confident of the sufficiency of your own wisdom, nor be shy of communicating what you have to others. It is the merchandise of wisdom that we profess; now merchandise consists in commerce, receiving and returning."

(7) A love that engages us, as much as lies in us, to live peaceably with all men, v. 18. Even those with whom we cannot live intimately and familiarly, yet we must with such live peaceably. Thus must we labour to preserve the peace, that it be not broken, and to piece it again when it is broken. It is not expressed so as to oblige us to impossibilities: If it be possible, as much as lies in you. Study the things that make for peace.—If it be possible. It is not possible to preserve the peace when we cannot do it without offending God and wounding conscience. The wisdom that is from above is first pure and then peaceable, Jas. iii. 17. Peace without purity is the peace of the devil's palace.—As much as lieth in you. There must be two words to the bargain of peace. We may be unavoidably striven with. Our care

13. given to hospitality—i.e., the entertainment of strangers. In times of persecution, and before the general institution of houses of entertainment, the importance of this precept would be at once felt. In the East, where such houses are still rare, this duty is regarded as of the most sacred character [HODGE].

15. Rejoice with them that rejoice; weep—the "and" should probably be omitted—with them that weep—What a beautiful spirit of sympathy with the joys and sorrows of others is here inculcated! But it is only one charming phase of the unselfish character which belongs to all living Christianity. What a world will ours be when this shall become its reigning spirit! Of the two, however, it is more easy to sympathize with another's sorrows than his joys, because in the one case he needs us; in the other not. But just for this reason the latter is the more disinterested, and so the nobler. 16. Be—'Being'—of the same mind one toward another—The feeling of the common bond which binds all Christians to each other, whatever diversity of station, cultivation, temperament, or gifts may obtain among them, is the thing here enjoined. This is next taken up in detail. Mind not—'not minding'—high things—i.e., Cherish not ambitious or aspiring purposes and desires. As this springs from selfish severance of our own interests and objects from those of our brethren, so it is quite incompatible with the spirit inculcated in the preceding clause.

but condescend—'condescending'—to men of low estate—or (as some render the words), 'inclining unto the things that be lowly.' But we prefer the former.

Be not wise in your own conceits—This is just the application of the caution against high-mindedness to the estimate we form of our own mental character.

18. If it be possible—i.e., If others will let you—as much as lieth in you—or, 'dependeth on you'—live peaceably—or, 'be at peace'—with all men—The impossibility of this in some cases is hinted at, to keep up the hearts of those who, having done their best unsuccessfully to live in peace, might be tempted to think the failure was necessarily owing to themselves. But how emphatically expressed is the injunction to let nothing on our part prevent it! Would that Christians were guiltless in this respect!

ADAM CLARKE

13. Distributing to the necessity of saints. Relieve your poor brethren according to the power which God has given you. Do good unto all men, but especially to them which are of the household of faith.

Given to hospitality. "Pursuing hospitality," or the duty of entertaining strangers. A very necessary virtue in ancient times, when houses of public accommodation were exceedingly scarce. This exhortation might have for its object the apostles, who were all itinerants; and in many cases the Christians, flying before the face of persecution.

15. Rejoice with them that do rejoice. Take lively interest in the prosperity of others. Let it be a matter of rejoicing to you when you hear of the health, prosperity, or happiness of any brother. Weep with them that weep. Labor after a compassionate or sympathizing mind. Let your heart feel for the distressed; enter into their sorrows, and bear a part of their burdens.

16. Be of the same mind. Live in a state of continual harmony and concord, and pray for the same good for all which you desire for yourselves. Mind not high things. Be not ambitious; affect nothing above your station; do not court the rich nor the powerful; do not pass by the poor man to pay your court to the great man; do not affect titles or worldly distinctions, much less sacrifice your conscience for them. The attachment to high things and high men is the vice of little, shallow minds.

But condescend to men of low estate. Be a companion of the humble, and pass through life with as little noise and show as possible. Let the poor, godly man be your chief companion; and learn from his humility and piety to be humble and godly. The term which we translate condescend signifies "to be led, carried, or dragged away to prison with another"; and points out the state in which the primitive Christians were despised and rejected of men, and often led forth to prison and death.

Be not wise in your own conceits. Be not puffed up with an opinion of your own consequence, for this will prove that the consequence itself is imaginary. Be not wise "by yourselves"—do not suppose that wisdom and discernment dwell alone with you. Believe that you stand in need of both help and instruction from others.

18. If it be possible. To live in a state of peace with one's neighbors, friends, and even family, is often very difficult. But the man who loves God must labor after this, for it is indispensably necessary even for his own sake. A man cannot have broils and misunderstandings with others without having his own peace very materially disturbed: he must, to be happy, be at peace with all men, whether they will be at peace with him or not.

must be that nothing be wanting on our parts to preserve the peace.

2. To our enemies. Those that embrace religion have reason to expect to meet with enemies in a world whose smiles seldom concur with Christ's. Now Christianity teaches us how to behave towards our enemies; and it quite differs from all other rules and methods, which generally aim at victory and dominion; but this at inward peace. Whoever are our enemies, our rule is to do them all the good we can.

(1) To do them no hurt (v. 17): Recompence to no man evil for evil. We have so learned God, who does so much for his enemies (Matt. v. 45), much more have we so learned Christ, who died for us when we were enemies (ch. v. 8, 10).—"To no man; not to one that has been thy friend, for by recompencing evil for evil thou wilt certainly lose him; not to one that has been thine enemy, for by not recompencing evil for evil thou mayest perhaps gain him." To the same purport, v. 19, Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves. He addresses himself to such in this endearing language, to mollify them. Anything that breathes love sweetens the blood. Would you pacify a brother offended? Call him dearly beloved. Such a soft word may be effectual to turn away wrath. Avenge not yourselves. It forbids private revenge, which flows from anger and ill-will. See how strict the law of Christ is in this matter, Matt. v. 38-40. It is forbidden not only to take it into our own hands to avenge ourselves, but to thirst after even that judgment in our case which the law affords, for the satisfying of a revengeful humour. This is a hard lesson to corrupt nature; and therefore he subjoins, [1] A remedy against it: Rather give place unto wrath. Not to our own wrath; to give place to this is to give place to the devil. We must resist and suppress this. First, To the wrath of our enemy. "Give place to it; do not answer wrath with wrath, but with love rather." When men's passions are up, and the stream is strong, let it have its course, lest it be made to rage and swell the more. When others are angry, let us be calm. Secondly, Many apply it to the wrath of God: "Give place to this, and let him alone to deal with thine adversary." [2] A reason against it: For it is written, Vengeance is mine. God is the sovereign King, the righteous Judge, and to him it belongs to administer justice. Some of this power he hath trusted in the hands of the civil magistrates; their legal punishments therefore are to be looked upon as a branch of God's revengings. If vengeance be God's we may not do it. We step into the throne of God if we do. We need not do it. For God will, if we meekly leave the matter with him.

(2) We must not only not do hurt to our enemies, but do them all the good we can. It is a command peculiar to Christianity: Love your enemies, Matt. v. 44. We are here taught to show that love to them both in word and deed.

[1] In word: Bless those who persecute you, v. 14. It has been the common lot of God's people to be persecuted. Now we are here taught to bless those that so persecute us. Bless them; "Speak well of them. Speak respectfully to them, not rendering railing for railing." We must wish well to them. We must offer up that desire to God, by prayer for them. We can testify our goodwill by praying for them.—Bless and curse not. It denotes a thorough goodwill; not, "Bless them when you are at prayer, and curse them at other times"; but, "Bless them always, and curse not at all." Cursing ill becomes the mouths of those whose work it is to bless God.

[2] In deed (v. 20): "If thine enemy hunger be ready to show him any kindness, and be never the less forward for his having been thine enemy, that thou mayest thereby testify the sincerity of thy forgiveness of him." First, What we must do. We must do good to our enemies. "If he hunger, do not say, Now God is avenging me of him. But feed him. Then, when he has need of thy help, and thou hast an opportunity of starving him, feed him (a significant word)—feed him abundantly; feed him, as we do children and sick people, with much tenderness. Contrive to do it so as to express thy love. If he thirst, give him drink: in token of reconciliation and friendship. So confirm your love to him." Secondly, Why we must do this. Thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head; that is, "Thou shalt either," 1. "Melt him into repentance and friendship" (alluding to those who melt metals; they not only put fire under them, but heap fire upon them) "thou wilt win a friend by it, and if thy kindness have not that effect then," 2. "It will make his malice against thee the more inexcusable." Not that this must be our intention in showing him kindness, but such will be the effect. Those that revenge are the conquered, and those that forgive are the conquerors. (1) "Be not overcome of evil.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

17. Recompense—'Recompensing' . . .—see on vs. 14. Provide—'Providing'—things honest—'honorable'—in the sight of all men—The idea (which is from Prov. 3:4) is the care which Christians should take so to demean themselves as to command the respect of all men.

19-21. avenge not . . .—see on vs. 14. but rather give place unto wrath—This is usually taken to mean, 'but give room or space for wrath to spend itself.' But as the context shows that the injunction is to leave vengeance to God, "wrath" here seems to mean, not the offense, which we are tempted to avenge, but the avenging wrath of God (see II Chron. 24:18), which we are enjoined to await, or give room for. (So the best interpreters).

14. Bless—i.e., Call down by prayer a blessing on—them which persecute you . . .—This is taken from the Sermon on the Mount, which, from the allusions made to it, seems to have been the storehouse of Christian morality among the churches.

if thine enemy hunger . . .—This is taken from Proverbs 25:21, 22, which without doubt supplied the basis of those lofty precepts on that subject which form the culminating point of the Sermon on the Mount.

in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head—As the heaping of "coals of fire" is in the Old Testament the figurative expression of divine vengeance (Ps. 140:10; 11:6. etc.), the true sense of these words seems to be, 'That will be the most effectual vengeance—a vengeance under which he will be fain to bend [So ALFORD, HODGE, etc.]. The next verse confirms this.

ADAM CLARKE

17. Recompense. Do not take notice of every little injury you may sustain. Beware of too nice a sense of your own honor; intolerable pride is at the bottom of this. Provide things honest. Be prudent, be cautious; neither eat, drink, nor wear, but as you pay for everything.

19. Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves. You are the children of God, and He loves you; and because He loves you He will permit nothing to be done to you that He will not turn to your advantage. Never take the execution of the law into your own hands; rather suffer injuries. The Son of Man is come, not to destroy men's lives, but to save; be of the same spirit. When He was reviled, He reviled not again. It is the part of a noble mind to bear up under unmerited disgrace; little minds are litigious and quarrelsome. Give place unto wrath. Leave room for the civil magistrate to do his duty; he holds the sword for this purpose; and if he be unfaithful to the trust reposed in him by the state, leave the matter to God, who is the righteous Judge; for by avenging yourselves you take your cause both out of the hands of the civil magistrate and out of the hands of God. I believe this to be the meaning of give place unto wrath, "punishment"; the penalty which the law, properly executed, will inflict. Vengeance is mine. This fixes the meaning of the apostle, and at once shows that the exhortation, Rather give place unto wrath, or "punishment," means, Leave the matter to the judgment of God; it is His law that in this case is broken, and to Him the infliction of deserved punishment belongs. I will repay. In My own time and in My own way. But He gives the sinner space to repent, and this long-suffering leads to salvation.

14. Bless them which persecute you. Give good words, or pray for them that give you bad words, who make dire imprecations against you. Bless them, pray for them, and on no account curse them, whatever the provocation may be. Have the loving, forgiving mind that was in your Lord.

20. If thine enemy hunger, feed him. Do not withhold from any man the offices of mercy and kindness. You have been God's enemy, and yet God fed, clothed, and preserved you alive; do to your enemy as God has done to you. If your enemy be hungry, feed him; if he be thirsty, give him drink—so has God dealt with you. And has not a sense of His goodness and long-suffering towards you been a means of melting down your heart into penitential compunction, gratitude, and love towards Him? How know you that a similar conduct towards your enemy may not have the same gracious influence on him towards you? Your kindness may be the means of begetting in him a sense of his guilt; and, from being your fell enemy, he may become your real friend. This I believe to be the sense of this passage, which many have encumbered with difficulties of their own creating. The whole is a quotation from Prov. xxv. 21-22, in the precise words of the Septuagint; and it is very likely that the latter clause of this verse, Thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head, is a metaphor taken from smelting metals. The ore

Let not the evil of any provocation that is given you have such a power over you as to disturb your peace, to destroy your love, or to bring you to study or attempt any revenge." He that cannot quietly bear an injury is perfectly conquered by it. (2) "But overcome evil with good, with the good of patience and forbearance, nay, and of kindness and beneficence to those that wrong you." He that hath this rule over his spirit is better than the mighty.

3. There remain two exhortations which recommend all the rest as good in themselves, and of good report.

(1) As good in themselves (v. 9): Abhor that which is evil, cleave to that which is good. We must not only not do evil, but we must abhor that which is evil. We must hate sin with an utter and irreconcilable hatred. We must not only do that which is good, but we must cleave to it. It denotes a deliberate choice of, a sincere affection for, and a constant perseverance in, that which is good.

(2) As of good report (v. 17): "Provide things honest in the sight of all men; study and take care to do, that which recommends religion to all with whom you converse."

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

Be not overcome of evil—for then you are the conquered party. but overcome evil with good—and then the victory is yours; you have subdued your enemy in the noblest sense.

ADAM CLARKE

is put into the furnace, and fire put both under and over, that the metal may be liquefied, and leaving the dross, may fall down pure to the bottom of the furnace. It is most evident from the whole connection of the place and the apostle's use of it that the heaping of the coals of fire upon the head of the enemy is intended to produce, not an evil, but the most beneficial effect; and the following verse is an additional proof of this.

21. Be not overcome of evil. Do not, by giving place to evil, become precisely the same character which you condemn in another. Overcome evil with good—however frequently he may grieve and infuriate you, always repay him with kindness; your goodwill, in the end, may overcome his evil.

We are here taught how to conduct ourselves towards magistrates, and those that are in authority over us, called here the higher powers, intimating their authority (they are powers), and their dignity (they are higher powers). The just power which they have must be submitted to and obeyed.

I. The duty enjoined: Let every soul be subject. Every soul—every person, one as well as another, not excluding the clergy.—Every soul. Not that our consciences are to be subjected to the will of any man. It is God's prerogative to make laws immediately to bind conscience. Our subjection must be free and voluntary, sincere and hearty. The subjection of soul here required includes inward honour and outward reverence and respect, both in speaking to them and in speaking of them. "They are higher powers; be content they should be so, and submit to them accordingly." Now there was good reason for the pressing of this duty, 1. Because of the reproach which the Christian religion lay under in the world, as an enemy to public peace, order, and government. Our Lord Jesus was so reproached, though he told them his kingdom was not of this world: no marvel, then, if his followers have been loaded in all ages with the like calumnies, called facetious, seditious, and turbulent. The apostle therefore shows that obedience to civil magistrates is one of the laws of Christ, whose religion helps to make people good subjects. 2. Because of the temptation which the Christians lay under to be otherwise affected to civil magistrates. The apostle enjoins obedience to civil government, which was the more necessary to be pressed now because the magistrates were heathens and unbelievers, which yet did not destroy their civil power and authority.

II. The reasons to enforce this duty.

1. For wrath's sake. Magistrates bear the sword; it is to no purpose to contend with him that bears the sword. The least show of resistance in a Christian would be very prejudicial to the whole society; and therefore they had more need than others to be exact in their subjection. To this head must that argument be referred (v. 2), Those that resist shall receive to themselves damnation: they shall be called to an account for it. God will reckon with them for it, because the resistance reflects upon him. The magistrates will reckon with them for it. So it follows (v. 3), Rulers are a terror. This is a good argument, but it is low for a Christian.

2. We must be subject, not only for wrath, but for conscience' sake; not so much from the fear of punishment, as from the love of virtue. Now to oblige conscience to this subjection he argues, v. 1-4, 6,

(1) From the institution of magistracy: There is no power but of God. God as the ruler of the world hath appointed the ordinance of magistracy, so that all civil power is derived from him. The usurpation of power and the abuse of power are not of God, but the power itself is. The most unjust and oppressive princes in the world have no power but what is given them from above (John xix. 11). It is an instance of God's wisdom, power, and goodness, in the management of mankind, that he has disposed them into such a state as distinguishes between governors and governed, and has not left them like the fishes of the sea, where the greater devour the less.—The powers that be: whatever the particular form and method of government are. It is an ordinance of God, and it is

Vss. 1-14. SAME SUBJECT CONTINUED—POLITICAL AND SOCIAL RELATIONS—MOTIVES.

1, 2. Let every soul—every man of you—be subject unto the higher powers—or, 'submit himself to the authorities that are above him.'

Whosoever therefore resisteth the power—'So that he that setteth himself against the authority'—resisteth the ordinance of God; and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation—or, 'condemnation,' according to the old sense of that word; that is, not from the magistrate, but from God, whose authority in the magistrate's is resisted.

For there is no power—'no authority'—but of God: the powers that be are—'have been'—ordained of God.

1. Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers. This is a very strong saying, and most solemnly introduced; and we must consider the apostle as speaking, not from his own private judgment, or teaching a doctrine of present expediency, but declaring the mind of God on a subject of the utmost importance to the peace of the world; a doctrine which does not exclusively belong to any class of people, order of the community, or official situations, but to every soul; and, on the principles which the apostle lays down, to every soul in all possible varieties of situation, and on all occasions. And what is this solemn doctrine? Let every man be obedient to the civil government under which the providence of God has cast his lot.

2. Whosoever . . . resisteth the power. "He who sets himself in order against this order" of God; and they who resist, they who obstinately, and for no right reason, oppose the ruler, and strive to unsettle the constitution, and to bring about illegal changes, shall receive to themselves damnation. "Condemnation"; shall be condemned by both the spirit and the letter of that constitution, which, under pretense of defending or improving, they are indirectly laboring to subvert.

For there is no power but of God. As God is the Origin of power, and the supreme Governor of the universe, He delegates authority to whomsoever He will; and though in many cases the governor himself may not be of God, yet civil government is of Him. For without this there could be no society, no security, no private property; all would be confusion and anarchy, and the habitable world would soon be depopulated.

MATTHEW HENRY

to be received and submitted to accordingly.—Ordained of God. Hence it follows (v. 2) that whosoever resisteth the power resisteth the ordinance of God. Magistracy is from God as an ordinance, that is, it is a great law, and it is a great blessing. And those who spurn at their power reflect upon God himself. Magistrates are here again and again called God's ministers. He is the minister of God, v. 4, 6. Magistrates are in a more peculiar manner God's servants; the dignity they have calls for duty. Though they are lords to us, they are servants to God.

(2) From the intention of magistracy: Rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil, &c. Magistracy was designed to be,

[1] A terror to evil works and evil workers. They bear the sword; not only the sword of war, but the sword of justice. Such is the power of sin and corruption that many will not be restrained from the greatest enormities by any regard to the law of God and nature; but only by the fear of temporal punishments. Laws with penalties for the lawless and disobedient (1 Tim. i. 9) must be constituted in Christian nations, and are agreeable with, and not contradictory to, the gospel. In this work the magistrate is the minister of God, v. 4. He acts as God's agent, and therefore must take heed of infusing into his judgments any private personal resentments of his own.—To execute wrath upon him that doeth evil. The judicial processes of the most vigilant faithful magistrates yet come far short of the judgment of God: they reach only to the evil act, on him that doeth evil.—He beareth not the sword in vain. It is not for nothing that God hath put such a power into the magistrate's hand. And therefore, "If thou do that which is evil, be afraid; for civil powers have quick eyes and long arms." It is a good thing when the punishment of malefactors is managed as an ordinance of God. As a holy God, that hates sin. As King of nations, and the God of peace and order. As the protector of the good. As one that by the punishment of some would terrify others, and so prevent the like wickedness.

[2] A praise to those that do well. "Do that which is good (v. 3), and thou needest not be afraid of the power, nay, thou shalt have praise of it." This is the intention of magistracy, and therefore we must, for conscience' sake, be subject to it, as a constitution designed for the public good. But pity it is that ever this gracious intention should be perverted. Yet even then the blessing and benefit of a common protection, and a face of government and order, are such that it is our duty rather to submit to persecution for well-doing, than by any irregular and disorderly practices to attempt a redress. Better a bad government than none at all.

(3) From our interest in it: "He is the minister of God to thee for good." Protection draws allegiance. By upholding the government, we keep up our own hedge. This subjection is likewise consented to by the tribute we pay (v. 6): "For this cause pay you tribute, as a testimony of your submission, and an acknowledgment that in conscience you think it to be due. By your paying tribute you not only own the magistrate's authority, but the blessing of that authority to yourselves. Honour is a burden: and, if he do as he ought, he is attending continually upon this very thing, in consideration of which fatigue, we pay tribute." He does not say, "You give it as an alms," but, "You pay it as a just debt." This is the lesson the apostle teaches, and it becomes all Christians to learn and practise it, that the godly in the land may be found (whatever others are) the quiet and the peaceable in the land.

Verses 7–10

We are here taught a lesson of justice and charity.

I. Of justice (v. 7): Render therefore to all their dues. What we have we have as stewards; others have an interest in it, and must have their dues. Render to all their dues; and that readily and cheerfully, not tarrying till you are by law compelled to it. Due taxes: Tribute to whom tribute is due, custom to whom custom. He wrote this to the Romans, who, as they were rich, so they were drained by taxes and impositions, to the just and honest payment of which they are here pressed by the apostle. Our Lord was born when his mother went to be taxed; and he enjoined the payment of tribute to Cæsar. Many, who in other things seem to be just, yet make no conscience of this, but pass it off with a false ill-favoured maxim, that it is no sin to cheat the king. Due respect: Fear to whom fear, honour to whom honour. This sums up the duty which we owe not only to magistrates, but to all that are over us in the Lord, according to the fifth commandment: Honour thy father and mother. Where there is not this respect in the heart to our superiors, no other duty will be paid aright. Due

3, 4. For rulers are not a terror to good works—'to the good work,' as the true reading appears to be—but to the evil . . . he beareth not the sword in vain—i.e., the symbol of the magistrate's authority to punish. 5. Wherefore ye must needs be subject, not only for wrath—for fear of the magistrate's vengeance—but also for conscience' sake—from reverence for God's authority. It is of Magistracy in general, considered as a divine ordinance, that this is spoken: and the statement applies equally to all forms of government, from an unchecked despotism—such as flourished when this was written, under the Emperor Nero—to a pure democracy. The inalienable right of all subjects to endeavor to alter or improve the form of government under which they live is left untouched here. But since Christians were constantly charged with turning the world upside down, and since there certainly were elements enough in Christianity of moral and social revolution to give plausibility to the charge, and tempt noble spirits, crushed under misgovernment, to take redress into their own hands, it was of special importance that the pacific, submissive, loyal spirit of those Christians who resided at the great seat of political power, should furnish a visible refutation of this charge.

6, 7. For, for this cause pay ye—rather, 'ye pay'—tribute also—i.e., "This is the reason why ye pay the contributions requisite for maintaining the civil government." for they are God's ministers, attending continually upon—'to'—this very thing.

Render therefore to all their dues—From magistrates the apostle now comes to other officials, and from them to men related to us by whatever tie. tribute—land tax. custom—mercantile tax. fear—reverence for superiors. honour—the respect due to persons of distinction.

ADAM CLARKE

3. For rulers are not a terror to good works. Here the apostle shows the civil magistrate what he should be: he is clothed with great power, but that power is entrusted to him, not for the terror and oppression of the upright man, but to overawe and punish the wicked. It is, in a word, for the benefit of the community, and not for the aggrandizement of himself, that God has entrusted the supreme civil power to any man. Wilt thou then not be afraid of the power? If you would not live in fear of the civil magistrate, live according to the laws. You may expect that he will rule according to the laws; and consequently instead of incurring blame, you will have praise. This is said on the supposition that the ruler is himself a good man. Such the laws suppose him to be; and the apostle, on the general question of obedience and protection, assumes the point that the magistrate is such.

4. For he is the minister of God to thee for good. Here the apostle puts the character of the ruler in the strongest possible light. He is the minister of God—the office is by divine appointment. He beareth not the sword in vain. His power is delegated to him for the defense and encouragement of the good, and the punishment of the wicked; and he has authority to punish capitally, when the law so requires. This the term sword leads us to infer. For he is the minister of God, a revenger. "For he is God's vindictive minister." To execute wrath; to inflict "punishment" upon the transgressors of the law; and this according to the statutes of that law, for God's civil ministers are never allowed to pronounce or inflict punishment according to their own minds or feelings, but according to the express declarations of the law.

5. Ye must needs be subject. There is a necessity that you should be subject, not only for wrath, "on account of the punishment" which will be inflicted on evildoers, but also for conscience sake; not only to avoid punishment, but also to preserve a clear conscience.

6. For this cause pay ye tribute also. Because civil government is an order of God, and the ministers of state must be at considerable expense in providing for the safety and defense of the community, it is necessary that those in whose behalf these expenses are incurred should defray that expense; and hence nothing can be more reasonable than an impartial and moderate taxation, by which the expenses of the state may be defrayed and the various officers, whether civil or military, who are employed for the service of the public be adequately remunerated. By God's ministers are not meant here the ministers of religion, but the civil officers in all departments of the state.

7. Render therefore to all their dues. This is an extensive command. Be rigidly just; withhold from neither the king nor his ministers, nor his officers of justice and revenue, nor from even the lowest of the community, what the laws of God and your country require you to pay. Tribute to whom tribute. This word probably means such taxes as were levied on persons and estates. Custom to whom custom. This word probably means such duties as were laid upon goods, merchandise, etc., on imports and exports; what we commonly call custom. Fear to whom fear. It is likely that the word which we translate fear signifies that "reverence" which produces obedience. Treat all official characters with respect, and be obedient to your superiors. Honour to whom honour. The word may here mean that "outward respect" which the principle of reverence, from which it springs, will generally produce. Never behave rudely to any person; but behave respectfully to men in office. If you cannot even respect the man—for an important office may be filled by an unworthy person—respect the office, and the man on account of his office. If a man habituate himself to disrespect official characters, he will soon find himself disposed to pay little respect or obedience to the laws themselves.

MATTHEW HENRY

payment of debts (v. 8): "Owe no man anything; do not continue in anyone's debt, while you are able to pay it." Many that are very sensible of the trouble think little of the sin of being in debt.

II. Of charity: Owe no man anything. "Whatever you owe, it is eminently summed up in this debt of love. But to love one another, this is a debt that must be always in the paying, and yet always owing." Love is a debt. Love is the fulfilling of the law; not perfectly, but it is a good step towards it. It is inclusive of all the duties of the second table, which he specifies, v. 9, and these suppose the love of God. If the love be sincere, it is accepted as the fulfilling of the law. Surely we serve a good master, that has summed up all our duty in one word, and that a short word and a sweet word—love, the beauty and harmony of the universe. Loving and being loved is all the pleasure, joy, and happiness, of an intelligent being. God is love (1 John iv. 16), and love is his image upon the soul. Now, to prove that love is the fulfilling of the law, he gives us, 1. An induction of particular precepts, v. 9. He specifies the last five of the ten commandments, which he observes to be all summed up in this royal law, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. On this is built that golden rule of doing as we would be done by. Were there no restraints of human laws in these things the law of love would of itself be effectual to keep peace and good order among us. The apostle puts the seventh before the sixth, and mentions this first, Thou shalt not commit adultery; for though this commonly goes under the name of love (pity it is that so good a word should be so abused) yet it is really as great a violation of it as killing and stealing. He that tempts others to sin, though he may pretend the most passionate love does really hate them. 2. A general rule concerning the nature of brotherly love: Love worketh no ill (v. 10)—he that walks in love worketh no ill to his neighbour, to anyone that he has anything to do with. Love intends and designs no ill to anybody. More is implied than is expressed; it not only worketh no ill, but it worketh all the good that may be. Love is a living active principle of obedience to the whole law. The whole law is written in the heart, if the law of love be there.

Verses 11–14

We are here taught a lesson of sobriety and godliness in ourselves. Four things we are here taught, as a Christian's directory for his day's work: when to awake, how to dress ourselves, how to walk, and what provision to make.

I. When to awake: Now it is high time to awake (v. 11). We have need to be often excited and stirred up to awake. The word of command to all Christ's disciples is, Watch. "Awake—be concerned about your souls and your eternal interest. Considering," 1. "The time we are cast into: Knowing the time. Consider what time of day it is with us, and you will see it is high time to awake. It is gospel time, it is a time when more is expected than was in the times of that ignorance which God winked at, when people sat in darkness. It is high time to awake; for the sun has been up a great while, and shines in our faces. It is high time to awake; for others are awake and up about us. Know the time to be a busy time; we have a great deal of work to do. Know the time to be a perilous time. We are in the midst of enemies and snares. It is time to awake, for we have slept enough." 2. "The salvation we are upon the brink of: Now is our salvation nearer than when we believed. The eternal happiness we chose for our portion is now nearer to us than it was when we became Christians. Let us mind our way and mend our pace. The nearer we are to our centre the quicker should our motion be. Is there but a step between us and heaven, and shall we be so very slow and dull in our Christian course?"

II. How to dress ourselves. This is the next care, when we are awake and up: "The night is far spent, the day is at hand; therefore it is time to dress ourselves." Clearer discoveries will be quickly made of gospel grace than have been yet made, as light gets ground.

1. "What we must put off; our night-clothes, which it is a shame to appear abroad in: Cast off the works of darkness." Sinful works are works of darkness. Let us therefore, who are of the day, cast them off, and have no more to do with them.

2. "What we must put on." Our care must be wherewithal we shall be clothed, how shall we dress our souls? (1) Put on the armour of light. Christians are soldiers in the midst of enemies, therefore their array must be armour. A Christian may reckon himself undressed if he be unarmed. The graces of the Spirit are this armour, to secure the soul from Satan's temptations. This is called the armour of light.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

8. Owe no man anything, but to love one another—"Acquit yourselves of all obligations except love, which is a debt that must remain ever due" [HODGE].

for he that loveth another hath fulfilled the law—[or the law itself is but love in manifold action, regarded as matter of duty.

9. For this, . . .—better thus: 'For the [commandments], Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not covet, and whatever other commandment [there may be], it is summed up . . . (The clause, "Thou shalt not bear false witness," is wanting in all the most ancient MSS.) The apostle refers here only to the second table of the law, as love to our neighbor is what he is treating of.

10. Love worketh no ill to his—or, 'one's'—neighbour: therefore . . .—As love, from its very nature, studies and delights to please its objects, its very existence is an effectual security against our wilfully injuring him. Next follow some general motives to the faithful discharge of all these duties.

11. And that—rather, 'And this' [do]—knowing the time, that now it is high time—lit., 'the hour has already come.' to awake out of sleep—of stupid, fatal indifference to eternal things.

for now is our salvation—rather, 'the salvation,' or simply 'salvation'—nearer than when we—first—believed—This is in the line of all our Lord's teaching, which represents the decisive day of Christ's second appearing as at hand, to keep believers ever in the attitude of wakeful expectancy, but without reference to the chronological nearness or distance of that event.

12. The night—of evil—is far spent, the day—of consummated triumph over it—is at hand:

let us therefore cast off—as a dress—the works of darkness—all works holding of the kingdom and period of darkness, with which, as followers of the risen Saviour, our connection has been dissolved. and let us put on the armour of light—described at length in Ephesians 6:11-18.

ADAM CLARKE

8. Owe no man any thing, but to love one another. In the preceding verses the apostle has been showing the duty, reverence, and obedience which all Christians, from the highest to the lowest, owe to the civil magistrate, whether he be emperor, king, proconsul, or other state officer; here he shows them their duty to each other. But this is widely different from that which they owe to the civil government. To the first they owe subjection, reverence, obedience, and tribute; to the latter they owe nothing but mutual love, and those offices which necessarily spring from it. Therefore the apostle says, Owe no man; as if he had said: You owe to your fellow brethren nothing but mutual love, and this is what the law of God requires, and in this the law is fulfilled.

9. For this, Thou shalt not commit adultery. He that loves another will not deprive him of his wife, of his life, of his property, of his good name; and will not even permit a desire to enter into his heart which would lead him to wish to possess anything that is the property of another; for the law, the sacred Scripture, has said: Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. It is remarkable that thou shalt not bear false witness is missing from several MSS. The generality of the best critics think it a spurious reading.

10. Love worketh no ill. As he that loves another will act towards that person as, on a reverse of circumstances, he would that his neighbor should act towards him, therefore this love can never work ill towards another; and on this head, i.e., the duty we owe to our neighbor, love is the fulfilling of the law.

11. And that, knowing the time. Some think the passage should be understood thus: We have now many advantages which we did not formerly possess. Salvation is nearer—the whole Christian system is more fully explained, and the knowledge of it more easy to be acquired than formerly; on which account a greater progress in religious knowledge and in practical piety is required of us, and we have for a long time been too remiss in these respects.

12. The night is far spent. If we understand this in reference to the heathen state of the Romans, it may be paraphrased thus: The night is far spent—heathenish darkness is nearly at an end. The day is at hand—the full manifestation of the Sun of Righteousness, in the illumination of the whole Gentile world, approaches rapidly. The manifestation of the Messiah is regularly termed by the ancient Jews day, because previously to this all is night. Cast off the works of darkness—prepare to meet this rising light, and welcome its approach, by throwing aside superstition, impiety, and vice of every kind; and put on the armour of light—fully receive the heavenly teaching, by which your spirits will be as completely armed against the attacks of evil as your bodies could be by the best weapons and impenetrable armor. This sense seems most suitable to the following verses, where the vices of the Gentiles are particularly specified; and they are exhorted to abandon them, and to receive the gospel of Christ. The common method of explanation is this: The night is far spent—our present imperfect life, full of afflictions, temptations, and trials, is almost run out; the day of eternal blessedness is at hand—is about to dawn on us in our glorious resurrection unto eternal life. Therefore, let us . . . cast off—let us live as candidates for this eternal glory. But this sense cannot at all comport with what is said below, as the Gentiles are most evidently intended.

MATTHEW HENRY

The graces of the Spirit are suitable splendid ornaments. (2) Put on the Lord Jesus Christ, v. 14. This stands in opposition to a great many base lusts, mentioned, v. 13. Rioting and drunkenness must be cast off. "Put on Christ, this includes all. Put on the righteousness of Christ for justification; be found in him (Phil. iii. 9) as a man is found in his clothes. Put on the spirit and grace of Christ for sanctification; put on the new man (Eph. iv. 24)." Jesus Christ is the best clothing for Christians to adorn themselves with, to arm themselves with. All other things are filthy rags. By baptism we have in profession put on Christ. Let us do it in truth and sincerity. The Lord Jesus Christ. "Put him on as Lord to rule you, as Jesus to save you, and in both as Christ, appointed by the Father to this ruling saving work."

III. How to walk. When we are up and dressed, we are not to sit still. What have we good clothes for, but to appear abroad in them?—Let us walk. Christianity teaches us how to walk so as to please God. Our conversation must be as becomes the gospel. Walk honestly; decently and becomingly. Christians should be careful to conduct themselves well in those things wherein men have an eye upon them, and to study that which is lovely and of good report. We must not walk in rioting and drunkenness; we must abstain from all excess in eating and drinking. We must not give the least countenance to revelling. Not in chambering and wantonness; not in any of those lusts of the flesh, those works of darkness—whatsoever transgresseth the pure and sacred law of chastity and modesty. Not in strife and envying. These are also works of darkness; for, though the acts and instances of strife and envy are very common, yet none are willing to acknowledge themselves envious and contentious. To strive and to envy ill becomes the disciples and followers of the peaceable and humble Jesus. Where there are riot and drunkenness, there usually are chambering and wantonness, and strife and envy.

IV. What provision to make (v. 14): "Make not provision for the flesh. Be not careful about the body." Our great care must be to provide for our souls; but must we take no care about our bodies? Two things are here forbidden: 1. Perplexing ourselves with an inordinate care; do not stretch your wits, nor set your thoughts upon the tenter-hooks, in making this provision. It forbids an anxious encumbering care. 2. Indulging ourselves in an irregular desire. The necessities of the body must be considered, but the lusts of it must not be gratified. Natural desires must be answered but wanton appetites must be checked and denied.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

13. Let us walk honestly—'becomingly,' 'seemingly'—as in the day—'Men choose the night for their revels, but our night is past, for we are all the children of the light and of the day (I Thess. 5:5): let us therefore only do what is fit to be exposed to the light of such a day.' not in rioting and drunkenness—varied forms of intemperance; denoting revels in general, usually ending in intoxication. not in chambering and wantonness—varied forms of impurity; the one pointing to definite acts, the other more general. not in strife and envying—varied forms of that venomous feeling between man and man which reverses the law of love.

14. But—to sum up all in one word—put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ—in such wise that Christ only may be seen in you (see II Cor. 3:3; Gal. 3:27; Eph. 4:24). and make no provision—'take no forethought'—for the flesh, to fulfil the lust [thereof]—'Direct none of your attention to the cravings of your corrupt nature, how you may provide for their gratification.'—Note, (1) How gloriously adapted is Christianity for human society in all conditions! As it makes war directly against no specific forms of government, so it directly recommends none. While its holy and benign principles secure the ultimate abolition of all iniquitous government, the reverence which it teaches for magistracy, under whatever form, as a divine institution, secures the loyalty and peaceableness of its disciples, amid all the turbulence and distractions of civil society, and makes it the highest interest of all states to welcome it within their pale, as in this as well as every other sense—"the salt of the earth, the light of the world" (vss. 1-5). (2) Christianity is the grand specific for the purification and elevation of all the social relations; inspiring a readiness to discharge all obligations, and most of all, implanting in its disciples that love which secures all men against injury from them, inasmuch as it is the fulfilling of the law (vss. 6-10). (3) The rapid march of the kingdom of God, the advanced stage of it at which we have arrived, and the ever-nearing approach of the perfect day—nearer to every believer the longer he lives—should quicken all the children of light to redeem the time, and, seeing that they look for such things, to be diligent, that they may be found of Him in peace, without spot and blameless (II Pet. 3:14). (4) In virtue of 'the expulsive power of a new and more powerful affection,' the great secret of persevering holiness in all manner of conversation will be found to be "Christ IN US, the hope of glory" (Col. 1:27), and Christ ON US, as the character in which alone we shall be able to shine before men (II Cor. 3:8) (vs. 14).

ADAM CLARKE

13. Let us walk honestly, as in the day. "Let us walk decently." Let our deportment be decent, orderly, such as we shall not be ashamed of in the eyes of the whole world. Not in rioting and drunkenness. Rioting, according to Hesychius, signifies "unclean and dissolute songs," banquets, and suchlike. Methais signifies "drunken festivals," such as were celebrated in honor of their gods, when after they had sacrificed they drank to excess, accompanied with abominable acts of every kind. Not in chambering. This is no legitimate word, and conveys no sense till, from its connection in this place, we force a meaning upon it. The original word signifies "whoredoms" and prostitution of every kind. And wantonness. All manner of "uncleanness." Not in strife and envying. Not in contentions and furious altercations, which must be the consequence of such practices as are mentioned above. Can any man suppose that this address is to the Christians at Rome? That they are charged with practices almost peculiar to the heathens? And practices of the most abandoned and dissolute sort? If those called Christians at Rome were guilty of such acts, there could be no difference, except in profession, between them and the most abominable of the heathens. But it is impossible that such things should be spoken to the followers of Christ, for the very grace that brings repentance enables the penitent to cast aside and abominate all such vicious and abominable conduct. The advices to the Christians may be found in the preceding chapter; those at the conclusion of this chapter belong solely to the heathens.

14. Put ye on the Lord Jesus. This is in reference to what is said, v. 13: "Let us put on decent garments"—let us make a different profession, unite with other company, and maintain that profession by a suitable conduct. Putting on or being clothed with Jesus Christ signifies receiving and believing the gospel; and consequently taking its maxims for the government of life, having the mind that was in Christ. The ancient Jews frequently use the phrase putting on the Shekinah, or divine majesty, to signify the soul's being clothed with immortality and rendered fit for glory. "To be clothed with a person" is a Greek phrase signifying to "assume the interests" of another—to enter into his views, to imitate him, and be wholly on his side. Chrysostom particularly mentions this as a common phrase, "such a one hath put on such a one"; i.e., he closely follows and imitates him. The mode of speech itself is taken from the custom of stage players; they assumed the name and garments of the person whose character they were to act, and endeavored as closely as possible to imitate him in their spirit, words, and actions. And make not provision for the flesh. By flesh we are here to understand not only the body, but all the irregular appetities and passions which led to the abominations already recited. No provision should be made for the encouragement and gratification of such a principle as this. To fulfil the lusts thereof. "In reference to its lusts"; such as the rioting, drunkenness, prostitutions, and uncleanness, mentioned in v. 13, to make provision for which the Gentiles lived and labored, and bought and sold, and schemed and planned; for it was the whole business of their life to gratify the sinful lusts of the flesh. Their philosophers taught them little else; and the whole circle of their deities, as well as the whole scheme of their religion, served only to excite and inflame such passions and produce such practices.

CHAPTER 14

I. An account of the unhappy contention which had broken out in the Christian church.

1. There was a difference among them about the distinction of meats and days. The members of the Christian church at Rome were some of them originally Gentiles, and others of them Jews. Now those that had been Jews were trained up in the observance of the ceremonial appointments touching meats and days, and therefore retained the ceremonial institutions, while other Christians made no such difference.

CHAPTER 14

Vss. 1-23. SAME SUBJECT CONTINUED—CHRISTIAN FORBEARANCE. The subject here, and on to ch. 15: 13, is the consideration due from stronger Christians to their weaker brethren; which is but the great law of love (treated of in ch. 13) in one particular form.

CHAPTER 14

It seems very likely, from this and the following chapter, that there were considerable misunderstandings between the Jewish and Gentile Christians at Rome relative to certain customs which were sacredly observed by the one and disregarded by the other. The principal subject of dispute was concerning meats and days. The converted Jew, retaining a veneration for the law of Moses, abstained from certain meats and was observant of certain days; while the converted Gentile, understanding that the Christian religion laid him under no obligations to such ceremonial points, had no regard to either. It

MATTHEW HENRY

2. It was not so much the difference itself that did the mischief as the mismanagement of the difference, making it a bone of contention. Those who were strong, and knew their Christian liberty, despised the weak, who did not. They should have pitied them, and helped them. So apt are those who have knowledge to be puffed up with it, and to look disdainfully and scornfully upon their brethren. Those who were weak, and durst not use their Christian liberty, judged and censured the strong, who did, as if they were loose Christians. They judged them as breakers of the law. Well, this was the disease, and we see it remaining in the church to this day.

II. We have proper suggestions laid down for allaying this contention. Not by excommunicating, suspending, and silencing either side, but by persuading them both to a mutual forbearance: reasoning the case with the strong that they should not be so scornful, and with the weak that they should not be so censorious. Let us observe the rules he gives, some to the strong and some to the weak, and some to both.

1. Those who are weak must be received, but not to doubtful disputations, v. 1. Spend your zeal in those things wherein you and all the people of God are agreed. Receive him, take him to you, lend him your hand, to help him. Receive him into your company. Receive him: not to quarrel with him, and to argue about uncertain points that are in controversy. Let not your Christian friendship be disturbed with such vain janglings and strifes of words.—Not to judge his doubtful thoughts (so the margin). Receive him, not to expose him, but to instruct and strengthen him.

Concerning meats (v. 2): One believeth that he may eat all things—he is well satisfied that every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused; nothing unclean of itself, v. 14. This the strong Christian is clear in, and practises accordingly, eating what is set before him. On the other hand, another, who is weak, is dissatisfied in this point; he will eat no flesh at all, but eateth herbs, contenting himself with only the fruits of the earth.

2. Those who are strong must by no means despise the weak; nor those who are weak judge the strong, v. 3. This is levelled directly against the fault of each party. It is seldom that any such contention exists but there is a fault on both sides. We must not despise nor judge our brethren. Why so?

(1) Because God hath received them. Strong believers and weak believers, if they be true believers, are accepted of God. "Nay, God doth not only receive him, but hold him up (v. 4). If they have true faith, they shall be held up—the one in his integrity, and the other in his comfort. This hope is built upon the power of God, for God is able to make him stand."

(2) Because they are servants to their own master (v. 4): Who art thou that judgest another man's servant? We reckon it a piece of ill manners to meddle with other people's servants. Weak and strong Christians are indeed our brethren, but they are not our servants. We make ourselves our brethren's masters, and do in effect usurp the throne of God, when we take upon us thus to judge them. God sees not as man sees; and he is their master, and not we. If we must needs be judging, let us exercise our faculty upon our own hearts and ways.—To his own master he stands or falls. How well for us is it that we are not to stand nor fall by the judgment one of another, but by the judgment of God. Concerning days, v. 5. Those who thought themselves still under some kind of obligation by the ceremonial law esteemed one day above another—kept up a respect to the times of the passover, pentecost, new moons, and feast of tabernacles. Those who knew that all these things were abolished by Christ's coming esteemed every day alike. We must understand it with an exception of the Lord's day, which all Christians unanimously observed. The apostle seems willing to let the ceremonial law wither by degrees, and to let it have an honourable burial.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

1. Him that is weak in the faith—rather, 'in faith'; i.e., not 'him that is weak in the truth believed' [CALVIN, BEZA, ALFORD, etc.], but (as most interpreters agree), 'him whose faith wants that firmness and breadth which would raise him above small scruples.' (See on vss. 22, 23.) receive ye—to cordial Christian fellowship—but not to doubtful disputations—rather, perhaps, 'not to the deciding of doubts,' or 'scruples;' i.e., not for the purpose of arguing him out of them: which indeed usually does the reverse; whereas to receive him to full brotherly confidence and cordial interchange of Christian affection is the most effectual way of drawing them off. Two examples of such scruples are here specified, touching Jewish meats and days. "The strong," it will be observed, are those who knew these to be abolished under the Gospel; "the weak" are those who had scruples on this point. 2. one believeth that he may eat all things—See Acts 10:16. another, who is weak, eateth herbs—restricting himself probably to a vegetable diet, for fear of eating what might have been offered to idols, and so would be unclean. (See I Cor. 8.)

3. Let not him that eateth despise—look down superciliously upon—him that eateth not; and let not him that eateth not judge—sit in judgment censoriously upon—him that eateth: for God hath received him—as one of His dear children, who in this matter acts not from laxity, but religious principle.

4. Who art thou that judgest another man's—rather, 'another's'—servant?—i.e., CHRIST'S, as the whole context shows, especially vss. 8, 9. Yea . . .—'But he shall be made to stand, for God is able to make him stand'; i.e., to make good his standing, not at the day of judgment, of which the apostle treats in vs. 10, but in the true fellowship of the Church here, in spite of thy censures.

5. One man esteemeth one day above another: another esteemeth every day—The supplement "alike" should be omitted, as injuring the sense.

ADAM CLARKE

appears further that mutual censures and uncharitable judgments prevailed among them, and that brotherly love and mutual forbearance did not generally prevail. The apostle in this part of his Epistle exhorts that in such things, not essential to religion and in which both parties, in their different way of thinking, might have an honest meaning and serious regard to God, difference of sentiments might not hinder Christian fellowship and love; but that they would mutually forbear each other, make candid allowance, and especially not carry their gospel liberty so far as to prejudice a weak brother, a Jewish Christian, against the gospel itself, and tempt him to renounce Christianity.

1. Him that is weak in the faith. By this the apostle most evidently means the converted Jew, who must indeed be weak in the faith if he considered this distinction of meats and days essential to his salvation. Receive ye. Associate with him; receive him into your religious fellowship; but when there, let all religious altercations be avoided. Not to doubtful disputations. Do not reject any from your Christian communion because of their particular sentiments on things which are in themselves indifferent.

2. One believeth that he may eat all things. He believes that whatsoever is wholesome and nourishing, whether herbs or flesh, whether enjoined or forbidden by the Mosaic law, may be safely and conscientiously used by every Christian. Another, who is weak, eateth herbs. Certain Jews lately converted to the Christian faith and having as yet little knowledge of its doctrines believe the Mosaic law relative to clean and unclean meats to be still in force; and therefore when they are in a Gentile country, for fear of being defiled, avoid flesh entirely and live on vegetables.

3. Let not him that eateth, the Gentile, who eats flesh, despise him, the Jew, who eatest not flesh but herbs. And let not him, the Jew, which eateth not indiscriminately, judge—condemn—him, the Gentile, that eateth indiscriminately flesh or vegetables. For God hath received him. Both being sincere and upright, and acting in the fear of God, are received as heirs of eternal life, without any difference on account of these religious scruples or prejudices.

4. Who art thou that judgest another man's servant? Who has ever given you the right to condemn the servant of another man, in things pertaining to his own master? To his own master he standeth or falleth. He is to judge him, not you; your intermeddling in this business is both rash and uncharitable. Yea, he shall be holden up. He is sincere and upright, and God, who is able to make him stand, will uphold him, and so teach him that he shall not essentially err. And it is the will of God that such upright though scrupulous persons should be continued members of His Church.

5. One man esteemeth one day above another. Perhaps the word day is here taken for "time, festival," and suchlike, in which sense it is frequently used. Reference is made here to the Jewish institutions and especially their festivals, such as the Passover, Pentecost, Feast of Tabernacles, new moons, jubilee. The converted Jew still thought these of moral obligation; the Gentile Christian not having been bred up in this way had no such prejudices. And as those who were the instruments of bringing him to the knowledge of God gave him no such injunctions, consequently he paid to these no religious regard. Another. The converted Gentile esteemeth every day—considers that all time is the Lord's, and that each day should be devoted to the glory of God, and that those festivals are not binding on him. We add here alike, and make the text say what I am sure was never intended, viz., that there is no distinction of days, not even of the Sabbath; and that every Christian is at liberty to consider even this day to be holy or not holy, as he happens to be persuaded in his own mind. That the Sabbath is of lasting obligation may be reasonably concluded from its institution (see the note on Gen. ii. 3) and from its typical reference. All allow that the Sabbath is a type of that rest in glory which remains for the people of God. Now all types are intended to continue in full force till the antitype or thing

(3) Because both the one and the other, if they be true believers, have an eye to God, and do approve themselves to God in what they do, v. 6. He that regards the day—it is well. We have reason to think, because in other things he conducts himself like a good Christian, that he regardeth it unto the Lord; and God will accept of his honest intention. The sincerity and uprightness of the heart were never rejected for the weakness and infirmity of the head: so good a master do we serve. On the other hand, he that regards not the day, but esteems every day alike—he does not do it out of a spirit of contradiction, or contempt of his brother. If he be a good Christian we charitably conclude that to the Lord he does not regard it. He makes no such difference of days only because he knows God hath made none; and therefore intends his honour in endeavouring to dedicate every day to him. So for the other instance: He that eateth whatever is set before him he eateth to the Lord. He understands the liberty that God has granted him, and uses it to the glory of God. He giveth God thanks for the variety of food he has, and the liberty he has to eat it. On the other hand, he that eateth not, to the Lord he eateth not. It is for God's sake, because he is afraid of offending God by eating that which he is sure was once prohibited; and he giveth God thanks too that there is enough besides. Thus, while both approve themselves to him in their integrity, why should either of them be judged or despised? Whether we eat flesh, or eat herbs, it is a thankful regard to God, the author and giver of all our mercies, that sanctifies and sweetens it. It appears by this that saying grace (as we commonly call it), before and after meat was the common known practice of the church. Blessing the creatures in the name of God before we use them, and blessing the name of God for them after, are both included. Observe his description of true Christians, taken from their end and aim (v. 7, 8), and the ground of it, v. 9.

[1] Our end and aim: not self, but the Lord. If we would know what way we walk in, we must enquire what end we walk towards. First, Not to self. We have learned to deny ourselves: None of us liveth to himself. This is a thing in which all the people of God are one, however they differ in other things. Not one that hath given up his name to Christ is allowedly a self-seeker; it is contrary to the foundation of true Christianity. We neither live to ourselves nor die to ourselves. The business of our lives is not to please ourselves, but to please God. When we come to die it is to the Lord, that we may depart and be with Christ. Secondly, But to the Lord (v. 8), to the Lord Christ. Christ is the gain we aim at, living and dying. We live to glorify him; we die to glorify him, and to go to be glorified with him. Christ is the centre, in which all the lines of life and death do meet. So that, whether we live or die, we are the Lord's. Though some Christians are weak and others strong, yet they are all the Lord's, and are accordingly owned and accepted of him. Is it for us then to judge or despise them, as if we were their masters?

[2] The ground of this, v. 9. It is grounded upon Christ's absolute sovereignty, the fruit and end of his death and resurrection. To this end he both died, and rose, and revived, that he might be Lord both of dead and living. He is head over all things to the church. He is Lord of those that are living to rule them, of those that are dead to receive them and raise them up. We must consider that Christ is Lord of the dead, as well as of the living. If they are dead, they have already given up their account, and let that suffice. And this leads to another reason against judging and despising.

(4) Because both the one and the other must shortly give an account, v. 10–12. Why dost thou that are weak judge thy brother that is strong? And why dost thou that art strong set at nought thy brother that is weak? Why is all this clashing, and contradicting, and censuring, among Christians? We shall all stand before the judgment-seat of Christ. Christ will be the Judge, and before him we shall stand as persons to be tried. To illustrate this (v. 11), he quotes a passage out of the Old Testament, which speaks of Christ's universal sovereignty and dominion, and that established with an oath: As I live (saith the Lord), every knee shall bow to me. It is a prophecy, in general, of Christ's dominion. Here is a proof of Christ's Godhead. Divine honour is due to him, and must be paid. The bowing of the knee to him, and the confession made with the tongue, are but outward expressions of inward adoration and praise. Every knee and every tongue, either freely or by force.

[1] All his friends do it freely. Bowing to him—the understanding bowed to his truths, the will to his laws, the whole man to his authority; and this expressed by the bowing of the knee, the posture of

6. He that regardeth the day, regardeth it to the Lord—the Lord CHRIST, as before—and he . . .

not, to the Lord he doth not—each doing what he believes to be the Lord's will.

He that eateth, eateth to the Lord, for he giveth God thanks; and he that eateth not, to the Lord he eateth not, and giveth God thanks—The one gave thanks to God for the flesh which the other scrupled to use; the other did the same for the herbs to which, for conscience' sake, he restricted himself. From this passage about the observance of days, ALFORD unhappily infers that such language could not have been used if the sabbath law had been in force under the Gospel in any form. Certainly it could not, if the sabbath were merely one of the Jewish festival days; but it will not do to take this for granted merely because it was observed under the Mosaic economy. And certainly, if the sabbath was more ancient than Judaism; if, even under Judaism, it was enshrined among the eternal sanctities of the Decalogue, uttered, as no other parts of Judaism were, amidst the terrors of Sinai; and if the Lawgiver Himself said of it when on earth, "The Son of man is LORD EVEN OF THE SABBATH DAY" (see Mark 2:28)—it will be hard to show that the apostle must have meant it to be ranked by his readers among those vanished Jewish festival days, which only "weakness" could imagine to be still in force—a weakness which those who had more light ought, out of love, merely to bear with. 7, 8. For none of us—Christians—liveth to himself—(See II Cor. 5:14, 15), to dispose of himself or shape his conduct after his own ideas and inclinations. and no man—'and none'—of us Christians—dieth to himself. For whether we live, we live unto the Lord—the Lord CHRIST; see next verse—and whether we die, we die unto the Lord; whether we live therefore, or die, we are the Lord's—Nothing but the most vivid explanation of these remarkable words could make them endurable to any Christian ear, if Christ were a mere creature. For Christ is here—in the most emphatic terms, and yet in the most unimpassioned tone—held up as the supreme Object of the Christian's life, and of his death too; and that by the man whose horror of creature-worship was such, that when the poor Lycaonians would have worshipped him, he rushed forth to arrest the deed, directing them to "the living God," as the only legitimate Object of worship (Acts 14:15). Nor does Paul teach this here, but rather appeals to it as a known and recognized fact, of which he had only to remind his readers. And since the apostle, when he wrote these words, had never been at Rome, he could only know that the Roman Christians would assent to this view of Christ, because it was the common teaching of all the accredited preachers of Christianity, and the common faith of all Christians. 9. For to this end Christ both . . .—The true reading here is, To this end Christ died and lived ['again']—that he might be Lord both of the dead and—'and of the'—living—The grand object of His death was to acquire this absolute Lordship over His redeemed, both in their living and in their dying, as His of right. 10. But why . . .—The original is more lively:—'But thou (the weaker believer), why judgest thou thy brother? And thou again (the stronger), why despisest thou thy brother?' for we shall all—the strong and the weak together—stand before the judgment seat of Christ—All the most ancient and best MSS. read here, 'the judgment seat of God.' The present reading doubtless crept in from II Corinthians 5:10, where "the judgment seat of Christ" occurs. But here "the judgment seat of God" seems to have been used, with reference to the quotation and the inference in the next two verses. 11, 12. For it is written—Isaiah 45:23—As I live, saith the Lord—Hebrew, JEHOVAH—every knee shall bow to me, and every tongue shall confess to God—consequently, shall bow to the award of God upon their character and actions.

ADAM CLARKE

signified take place; consequently the Sabbath will continue in force till the consummation of all things. The word alike should not be added, nor is it acknowledged by any MS. or ancient version.

6. He that regardeth the day. A beautiful apology for mistaken sincerity and injudicious reformation. Do not condemn the man for what is indifferent in itself; if he keep these festivals, his purpose is to honor God by the religious observance of them. On the other hand, he who finds that he cannot observe them in honor of God, not believing that God has enjoined them, does not observe them at all. In like manner, he that eateth any creature of God which is wholesome and proper food gives thanks to God as the Author of all good. And he who cannot eat of all indiscriminately, but is regulated by the precepts in the Mosaic law relative to clean and unclean meats, also giveth God thanks. Both are sincere, both upright; both act according to their light. God accepts both, and they should bear with each other.

7. None of us liveth to himself. The Greek writers use the phrase to signify acting according to one's own judgment, following one's own opinion. Christians must act in all things according to the mind and will of God, and not follow their own wills. The apostle seems to intimate that in all the above cases each must endeavor to please God, for he is accountable to Him alone for his conduct in these indifferent things. God is our Master; we must live to Him, as we live under His notice and by His bounty; and when we cease to live among men, we are still in His hand. Therefore what we do, or what we leave undone, should be in reference to that eternity which is ever at hand.

9. Christ both died, and rose. That we are not our own, but are the Lord's in both life and death, is evident from this—that Christ lived, and died, and rose again, that he might be Lord of the dead and living; for His power extends equally over both worlds. Separate, as well as embodied, spirits are under His authority; and He it is who is to raise even the dead to life, and thus all throughout eternity shall live under His dominion. The clause and rose is wanting in several reputable MSS., and certainly is not necessary to the text.

10. But why dost thou, Christian Jew, observing the rites of the Mosaic law, judge, condemn, thy brother, the Christian Gentile, who does not think himself bound by this law? Or why dost thou, Christian Gentile, set at nought your Christian Jewish brother, as if he were unworthy of your regard, because he does not yet believe that the gospel has set him free from the rites and ceremonies of the law? We shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ. Why should we then judge and condemn each other? We are accountable to God for our conduct, and shall be judged at His bar; and let us consider that whatever measure we mete, the same shall be measured unto us again.

adoration and prayer. Confessing to him—acknowledging his glory, grace, and greatness—acknowledging our own meanness and vileness, confessing our sins to him.

[2] All his foes shall be constrained to do it. Hence he concludes (v. 12), Everyone of us shall give account of himself to God. We must not give account for others, nor they for us; but everyone for himself. We have little to do to judge others, for they are not accountable to us, nor are we accountable for them. They must give account to their own master, and not to us; if we can in anything be helpers of their joy, it is well; but we have not dominion over their faith. We have the more to do to judge ourselves. We have an account of our own to make up. Let this take up his thoughts, and he that is strict in judging himself will not be apt to judge and despise his brother.

(5) Because the stress of Christianity is not to be laid upon these things, nor are they at all essential to religion. Why should you spend your zeal either for or against those things which are so minute and inconsiderable in religion? The kingdom of God is not meat, &c. Observe here,

[1] The nature of true Christianity. It is here called, The kingdom of God; it is a religion intended to rule us. First, It is not meat and drink: it does not consist either in using or in abstaining from such and such meats and drinks. Christianity gives no rule in that case. The matter is left at large. Every creature of God is good, 1 Tim. iv. 4. It is not being of this party and persuasion, of this or the other opinion in minor things, that will recommend us to God. But it will be asked, "Who feared God and worked righteousness, and who did not?" Secondly, It is righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. These are some of the essentials of Christianity in the pursuit of which we must spend our zeal. Righteousness, peace, and joy, are very comprehensive words. As to God, our great concern is righteousness, for the righteous Lord loveth righteousness. As to our brethren, it is peace—to live in peace and love, and charity with them. Christ came into the world to be the great peacemaker. As to ourselves, it is joy in the Holy Ghost. Next to our compliance with God, to delight ourselves always in the Lord. Surely we serve a good Master, who makes peace and joy so essential to our religion. Thirdly, It is in these things to serve Christ (v. 18), to do all this out of respect to Christ himself as our Master, to his will as our rule and to his glory as our end. What is Christianity but the serving of Christ?

[2] The advantages of it. He that duly obscrveth these things is acceptable to God. He has the love and favour of God, and we need no more to make us happy. Those are most pleasing to God that are best pleased with him. He is approved of men—of all wise and good men, and the opinion of others is not to be regarded. The approbation of men is not to be slighted; for we must provide things honest in the sight of all men: but the acceptance of God is to be aimed at in the first place.

3. In these doubtful things everyone not only may, but must, walk according to the light that God hath given him. This is laid down, v. 5, Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind; that is, "Practise according to your own judgment in these things, and leave others to do so too. If your sober sentiments be otherwise, do not make their practice a rule to you, any more than you must prescribe yours as a rule to them. First be persuaded that what you do is lawful, before you venture to do it." In doubtful things, it is good keeping on the sure side of the hedge. To this purport he argues, v. 14 and 23, which two verses give us a rule not to act against the dictates,

(1) Of a mistaken conscience, v. 14. If we really think it a sin to do it it is to us a sin, because we act against our consciences, though mistaken and misinformed.

[1] His own clearness in this matter. "I know and am persuaded—I am fully persuaded that there is nothing unclean of itself, that is, no kind of meat that lies under any ceremonial uncleanness, nor is forbidden to be eaten." Sin had brought a curse upon the whole creation. Now that Christ has removed the curse the matter is set at large again. Therefore Paul says that he was persuaded by the Lord Jesus, not only as the author of that persuasion, but as the ground of it. So that now there is nothing unclean of itself, every creature of God is good; nothing common; nothing profane; in this sense the Jews used the word common. This was Paul's own clearness, and he practised accordingly.

[2] But here is a caution: To him that esteemeth anything to be unclean, to him it is unclean. He who does a thing which he verily believes to be unlawful, however the thing be in itself, to him it is a sin. Our wills, in all their choices should follow the dictates of our under-

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

So then—infers the apostle—every one of us shall give account of himself to God—Now, if it be remembered that all this is adduced quite incidentally, to show that CHRIST is the absolute Master of all Christians, to rule their judgments and feelings towards each other while "living," and to dispose of them "dying," the testimony which it bears to the absolute Divinity of Christ will appear remarkable. On any other view, the quotation to show that we shall all stand before the judgment seat of God would be a strange proof that Christians are all amenable to Christ.

For the kingdom of God—or, as we should say, Religion; i.e., the proper business and blessedness for which Christians are formed into a community of renewed men in thorough subjection to God (cf. I Cor. 4:20). is not meat and drink—'eating and drinking'—but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost—a beautiful and comprehensive division of living Christianity. The first—"righteousness"—has respect to God, denoting here 'rectitude,' in its widest sense (as in Matt. 6:33); the second—"peace"—has respect to our neighbors, denoting 'concord' among brethren (as is plain from vs. 19; cf. Eph. 4:3; Col. 3:14, 15); the third—"joy in the Holy Ghost"—has respect to ourselves. This phrase, 'joy in the Holy Ghost,' represents Christians as so thinking and feeling under the workings of the Holy Ghost, that their joy may be viewed rather as that of the blessed Agent who inspires it than their own (cf. I Thess. 1:6). 18. For he that in these things—'in this,' meaning this threefold life. serveth Christ—Here again observe how, though we do these three things as a "kingdom of God," yet it is "Christ" that we serve in so doing; the apostle passing here from God to Christ as naturally as before from Christ to God—in a way to us inconceivable, if Christ had been viewed as a mere creature (cf. II Cor. 8:21). is acceptable to God, and approved of men—these being the things which God delights in, and men are constrained to approve. (Cf. Prov. 3:4; Luke 2:52; Acts 2:47; 19: 20.)

Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind—be guided in such matters by conscientious conviction.

14, 15. I know, and am persuaded by—or rather, 'in'—the Lord Jesus—as "having the mind of Christ" (I Cor. 2:16). that there is nothing unclean of itself—Hence it is that he calls those "the strong" who believed in the abolition of all ritual distinctions under the Gospel. (See Acts 10:15.)

but—'save that'—to him that esteemeth anything to be unclean, to him it is unclean—'and therefore, though you can eat of it without sin, he cannot.'

ADAM CLARKE

12. Every one of us shall give account of himself. We shall not, at the bar of God, be obliged to account for the conduct of each other—each shall give account of himself; and let him take heed that he be prepared to give up his accounts with joy.

17. For the kingdom of God. That holy religion which God has sent from heaven, and which He intends to make the instrument of establishing a counterpart of the Kingdom of glory among men. Is not meat and drink. It consists not in these outward and indifferent things. But righteousness. Pardon of sin, and holiness of heart and life. And peace. In the soul, from a sense of God's mercy; peace regulating, ruling, and harmonizing the heart. And joy in the Holy Ghost. Solid spiritual happiness, a joy which springs from a clear sense of God's mercy, the love of God being shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost. In a word, it is happiness brought into the soul by the Holy Spirit, and maintained there by the same influence. This is a genuine counterpart of heaven: righteousness without sin, peace without inward disturbance, joy without any kind of mental agony or distressing fear.

18. For he that in these things. The man, whether Jew or Gentile, who in these things—"righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost"—serveth Christ, acts according to His doctrine, is acceptable to God. For he has not only the form of godliness in thus serving Christ, but he has the power, the very spirit and essence of it, in having "righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost"; and therefore the whole frame of his mind, as well as his acts, must be acceptable to God. And approved of men; for although religion may be persecuted, yet the righteous man who is continually laboring for the public good will be generally esteemed.

Let every man be fully persuaded. With respect to the propriety or non-propriety of keeping the above festivals let every man act from the plenary conviction of his own mind. There is a sufficient latitude allowed; all may be fully satisfied.

14. I know, and am persuaded by the Lord Jesus. After reasoning so long and so much with these contending parties on the subject of their mutual misunderstandings, without attempting to give any opinion, but merely to show them the folly and uncharitableness of their conduct, he now expresses himself fully and tells them that nothing is unclean of itself, and that he has the inspiration and authority of Jesus Christ to say so; for to such an inspiration he must refer in such words as I know, and am persuaded by the Lord Jesus. And yet, after having given them this decisive judgment, through respect to the tender, mistaken conscience of weak believers, he immediately adds: But to him that esteemeth any thing to be unclean, to him it is unclean; because if he act contrary to his conscience, he must necessarily contract guilt. For he who acts in opposition to his conscience in one case may do it in another, and thus even the plain declarations of the Word of God may be set aside on things of the utmost importance, as well as the erroneous though well-intentioned dictates of his conscience on matters which he makes of the last consequence, though others who are better taught know them to be indifferent. It is dangerous to trifle with conscience, standings. This order is broken if the understanding (though misguided) tells us that such a thing is a sin, and yet we will do it. This is a will to do evil; there is the same corruption of the will in the doing of it as if really it were a sin. It must be understood likewise with this proviso, though men's judgments and opinions may make that which is good in itself to become evil to them, yet they cannot make that which is evil in itself to become good.

4. Another rule here prescribed is to those who know their Christian liberty, yet to take heed of using it so as to give offence to a weak brother. This is laid down v. 13, Let us not judge one another any more. "Judge this rather, instead of censuring the practice of others, let us look to our own, that no man put a stumbling-block, or an occasion to fall, in his brother's way." We must take heed of saying or doing anything which may occasion our brother to stumble or fall; which may be an occasion,

(1) Of grief to our brother, "One that is weak, and thinks it unlawful to eat such and such meats, will be greatly troubled to see thee eat them." Christians should take heed of grieving one another, and of saddening the hearts of Christ's little ones.

(2) Of guilt to our brother. The former is a stumbling-block, that gives our brother a great shake; but this is an occasion to fall. "If thy weak brother, purely by thy example and influence, be drawn to act against his conscience and to walk contrary to the light he has, and so to contract guilt upon his soul, thou art to be blamed for giving the occasion." To the same purport (v. 21) he recommends it to our care not to give offence by the use of lawful things: It is good neither to eat flesh nor to drink wine; these are things not necessary to the support of human life, and therefore we must deny ourselves in them, rather than give offence. It is good—pleasing to God, profitable to our brother, and no harm to ourselves. This is to be extended to all things whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, is involved either in sin or in trouble: or is made weak—his graces weakened, his comforts weakened, his resolutions weakened. Observe the motives to enforce this caution.

[1] Consider the royal law of Christian love and charity, which is hereby broken (v. 15): If thy brother be grieved with thy meat. Possibly thou art ready to say, "Now he talks foolishly and weakly." We are apt, in such a case, to lay all the blame on that side. But the reproof is here given to the stronger: Now walkest thou not charitably. Thus the apostle takes part with the weakest, and condemns the defect in love on the one side more than the defect in knowledge on the other side. Charity to the souls of our brethren is the best charity. True love would make us tender of their peace and purity, and beget a regard to their consciences as well as to our own. Christ deals gently with those that have true grace, though they are weak in it.

[2] Consider the design of Christ's death: Destroy not him with thy meat for whom Christ died, v. 15. First, Drawing a soul to sin threatens the destruction of that soul. It denotes an utter destruction. Secondly, The consideration of the love of Christ in dying for souls should make us very tender of the happiness and salvation of souls. Did Christ quit a life for souls, such a life, and shall not we quit a morsel of meat for them? Did he think it worth while to deny himself so much for them as to die for them, and shall not we think it worth while to deny ourselves so little for them?—With thy meat. Thou pleadest that it is thy own meat, but remember that, though the meat is thine, the brother offended by it is Christ's.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

13. Let us not therefore judge—'assume the office of judge over'—one another; but judge this rather . . .—a beautiful sort of play upon the word 'judge,' meaning, 'But let this be your judgment, not to put a stumbling block. . . .'

21. It is good not to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor any thing—'nor to do any thing'—whereby—'wherein'—thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak—rather, 'is weak.' These three words, it has been remarked, are each intentionally weaker than the other:—'Which may cause a brother to stumble, or even be obstructed in his Christian course, nay—though neither of these may follow—wherein he continues weak; unable wholly to disregard the example, and yet unprepared to follow it.' But this injunction to abstain from flesh, from wine, and from whatsoever may hurt the conscience of a brother, must be properly understood. Manifestly, the apostle is treating of the regulation of the Christain's conduct with reference simply to the prejudices of the weak in faith; and his directions are to be considered not as prescriptions for one's entire lifetime, even to promote the good of men on a large scale, but simply as cautions against the too free use of Christian liberty in matters where other Christians, through weakness, are not persuaded that such liberty is divinely allowed. How far the principle involved in this may be legitimately extended, we do not inquire here; but ere we consider that question, it is of great importance to fix how far it is here actually expressed, and what is the precise nature of the illustrations given of it.

But if thy brother be grieved—has his weak conscience hurt—with thy meat—rather, 'because of meat.' The word "meat" is purposely selected as something contemptible in contrast with the tremendous risk run for its sake. Accordingly, in the next clause, that idea is brought out with great strength.

Destroy not him with—'by'—thy meat for whom Christ died—"The worth of even the poorest and weakest brother cannot be more emphatically expressed than by the words, 'for whom Christ died' " [OLSHAUSEN]. The same sentiment is expressed with equal sharpness in I Corinthians 8:11. Whatever tends to make anyone violate his conscience tends to the destruction of his soul; and he who helps, whether wittingly or no, to bring about the one is guilty of aiding to accomplish the other.

ADAM CLARKE

even when erroneous; it should be borne with and instructed; it must be won over, not taken by storm. Its feelings should be respected because they ever refer to God, and have their foundation in His fear. He who sins against his conscience in things which everyone else knows to be indifferent will soon do it in those things in which his salvation is most intimately concerned. It is a great blessing to have a well-informed conscience; it is a blessing to have a tender conscience; and even a sore conscience is infinitely better than none.

13. Let us not therefore judge one another any more. Let us abandon such rash conduct. It is dangerous; it is uncharitable. Judgment belongs to the Lord. That no man put a stumblingblock. Let both the converted Jew and Gentile consider that they should labor to promote each other's spiritual interests, and not be a means of hindering each other in their Christian course; or of causing them to abandon the gospel, on which, and not on questions of rites and ceremonies, the salvation of their soul depends.

21. It is good neither to eat flesh. The spirit and self-denying principles of the gospel teach us that we should not only avoid everything in eating or drinking which may be an occasion of offense or apostasy to our brethren, but even to lay down our lives for them should it be necessary. Whereby thy brother stumbleth. Proskoptei from pros, "against," and kopto, "to strike, to hit the foot against a stone in walking, so as to halt, and be impeded in one's journey." It here means, spiritually, anything by which a man is so perplexed in his mind as to be prevented from making due progress in the divine life, anything by which he is caused to halt, to be undecisive, and undetermined; and under such an influence no man has ever yet grown in grace and in the knowledge of Jesus Christ. Or is offended. Scandalizetai from scandalon, a "stumbling block"; anything by which a person is caused to fall, especially into a snare, trap, or gin. Originally the word signified the piece of wood or key in a trap which, being trodden on, caused the animal to fall into a pit or the trap to close upon him. In the New Testament it generally refers to total apostasy from the Christian religion, and this appears to be its meaning in this place. Or is made weak. Without mental vigor; without power sufficiently to distinguish between right and wrong, good and evil, lawful and unlawful. The last two terms are omitted by two excellent MSS. and by some of the primitive fathers. It is very likely that they were added by some early hand by way of illustration.

15. If thy brother be grieved. If he thinks that you do wrong, and he is in consequence stumbled at your conduct. Now walkest thou not charitably. "According to love," for "love worketh no ill to his neighbour"; but by your eating some particular kind of meat on which neither your life nor well-being depends, you work ill to him by grieving and distressing his mind; and therefore you break the law of God in reference to him, while pretending that your Christian liberty raises you above his scruples. Destroy not him with thy meat, for whom Christ died. This puts the uncharitable conduct of the person in question in the strongest light, because it supposes that the weak brother may be so stumbled as to fall and perish finally, even the man for whom Christ died. To injure a man in his circumstances is bad; to injure him in his person is worse; to injure him in his reputation it still worse; and to injure his soul is worst of all. No wickedness, no malice, can go further than to injure and destroy the soul. Your uncharitable conduct may proceed thus far; therefore you are highly criminal before God. From this verse we learn that a man for whom Christ died may perish, or have his soul destroyed, and destroyed with such a destruction as implies perdition; the original is very emphatic. Christ died in his stead; do not destroy his soul. The sacrificial death is as strongly expressed as it can be, and there is no word in the New Testament that more forcibly implies eternal ruin than the verb apollyo, from which is derived that most significant name of the devil, Apollyon, the "Destroyer," the great universal murderer of souls.

MATTHEW HENRY

[3] Consider the work of God (v. 20): "For meat destroy not the work of God." Do not undo that which God hath done. You should work together with God, do not countermine his work. The work of grace and peace is the work of God. The same for whom Christ died (v. 15) are here called the work of God; besides the work that is wrought for us there is a work to be wrought in us. Every saint is God's workmanship. We must be very careful to do nothing which tends to the destruction of this work, either in ourselves or others. We must deny ourselves rather than obstruct and prejudice our own or others' grace and peace. Many do for meat and drink destroy the work of God in themselves, so likewise in others. Think what thou destroyest—the work of God; think for what thou destroyest it—for meat, which was but for the belly, and the belly for it.

[4] Consider the evil of giving offence. He grants that all things indeed are pure. But, if we abuse this liberty, it turns into sin to us: It is evil to him that eats with offence. Lawful things may be done unlawfully. It is observable that the apostle directs his reproof most against those who gave the offence. He directs his speech to the strong, because they were better able to bear the reproof, and to begin the reformation. For the further pressing of this rule, we may here observe two directions.—First, Let not then your good be evil spoken of (v. 16)—take heed of doing any thing which may give occasion to others to speak evil, either of the Christian religion in general, or of your Christian liberty in particular. It is true we cannot hinder loose and ungoverned tongues from speaking evil of us, and of the best things we have; but we must not (if we can help it) give them any occasion to do it. We must deny ourselves in many cases for the preservation of our credit and reputation, forbearing to do that which we rightly know we may lawfully do, when our doing it may be a prejudice to our good name. In such a case we must rather cross ourselves than shame ourselves. We should manage all our good duties in such a manner that they may not be evil spoken of. As we tender the reputation of the good we profess and practise, let us so order it that it may not be evil spoken of. Secondly, Hast thou faith? Have it to thyself before God, v. 22. "Art thou satisfied that thou mayest eat all meats, and observe all days (except the Lord's day) alike? Have it to thyself, and do not trouble others by the imprudent use of it." In these indifferent things, though we must never contradict our persuasion, yet we may sometimes conceal it, when the avowing of it will do more hurt than good. A rule to thyself (not to be imposed upon others, or made a rule to them), or a rejoicing to thyself. Paul had faith in these things: I am persuaded that there is nothing unclean of itself; but he had it to himself, so as not to use his liberty to the offence of others. In things necessary let there be unity, in things unnecessary let there be liberty, and in both let there be charity.—Have it to thyself before God. The end of such knowledge is that we may have a conscience void of offence towards God. Those are right indeed that are so in God's sight.

It is a dangerous thing to put a force upon conscience, though it be under a mistake (v. 22). Happy is he that condemns not himself in that thing which he allows. Many a one allows himself in practice to do that which yet in his judgment and conscience he condemns himself for. Whilst he does it his own heart gives him the lie, and his conscience condemns him for it. Now, happy is the man who so orders his conversation as not to expose himself to the reproaches of his own conscience. He is happy that has peace and quietness within.

5. There is one rule more laid down here: Let us therefore follow after the things which make for peace, and things wherewith one may edify another, v. 91. We must study mutual peace. Many wish for peace, and talk loudly for it, that do not follow the things that make for peace. Meekness, humility, self-denial, and love, are the springs of peace, the things that make for our peace. We are not always so happy as to obtain peace; there are so many that delight in war: but the God of peace will accept us if we follow after the things that make for peace. We must study mutual edification. We cannot edify one another, while we are quarrelling and contending. We are God's building, God's temple, and have need to be edified. None so strong but they may be edified; none so weak but may edify.

Nor must we act against the dictates of a doubting conscience. He that doubteth is damned if he eat (v. 23), that is, it turns into sin to him; he is condemned of his own conscience, because he eateth not of faith, because he does that which he is not fully persuaded he may lawfully do. Here his own

For—'For the sake of'—meat destroy not the work of God—See on vs. 15. The apostle sees in whatever tends to violate a brother's conscience the incipient destruction of God's work (for every converted man is such)—on the same principle as "he that hateth his brother is a murderer" (I John 3:15).

All things indeed are pure—'clean'; the ritual distinctions being at an end. but it is evil to that man—there is criminality in the man—who eateth with offence—i.e., so as to stumble a weak brother.

16, 17. Let not then your good—i.e., this liberty of yours as to Jewish meats and days, well founded though it be—be evil spoken of—for the evil it does to others.

22. Hast thou faith—on such matters? have it to thyself—within thine own breast—before God—a most important clause. It is not mere sincerity, or a private opinion, of which the apostle speaks; it is conviction as to what is the truth and will of God. If thou hast formed this conviction in the sight of God, keep thyself in this frame before Him. Of course, this is not to be over-pressed, as if it were wrong to discuss such points at all with our weaker brethren. All that is here condemned is such a zeal for small points as endangers Christian love.

Happy is he that condemneth not himself in that which he alloweth—allows himself to do nothing, about the lawfulness of which he has scruples; does only what he neither knows nor fears to be sinful.

19. the things . . .—more simply, 'the things of peace, and the things of mutual edification.'

23. And—rather, 'But'—he that doubteth is damned—See on the word "damnation," ch. 13:2. if he eat, because he eateth not of faith—See on the meaning of "faith" here, vs. 22.

ADAM CLARKE

20. For meat destroy not the work of God. Do not hinder the progress of the gospel either in your own souls or in those of others by contending about lawful or unlawful meats. And do not destroy the soul of your Christian brother, v. 15, by offending him so as to induce him to apostatize.

All things indeed are pure. This is a repetition of the sentiment delivered in v. 14, in different words. Nothing that is proper for aliment is unlawful to be eaten; but it is evil for that man who eateth with offence—the man who either eats contrary to his own conscience or so as to grieve and stumble another does an evil act; and however lawful the thing may be in itself, his conduct does not please God.

16. Let not then your good be evil spoken of. Do not make such a use of your Christian liberty as to subject the gospel itself to reproach. Whatsoever you do, do it in such a manner, spirit, and time as to make it productive of the greatest possible good. There are many who have such an unhappy method of doing their good acts as not only to do little or no good by them but a great deal of evil. It requires much prudence and watchfulness to find out the proper time of performing even a good action.

22. Hast thou faith? The term faith seems to signify in this place a "full persuasion in a man's mind that he is right," that what he does is lawful, and has the approbation of God and his conscience. Happy is he that condemneth not. That man only can enjoy peace of conscience who acts according to the full persuasion which God has given him of the lawfulness of his conduct, whereas he must be miserable who allows himself in the practice of anything for which his conscience upbraids and accuses him. This is a most excellent maxim, and every genuine Christian should be careful to try every part of his conduct by it. If a man have not peace in his own bosom, he cannot be happy; and no man can have peace who sins against his conscience. If a man's passions or appetite allow or instigate him to a particular thing, let him take good heed that his conscience approve what his passions allow, and that he live not the subject of continual self-condemnation and reproach. Even the man who has the too scrupulous conscience had better, in such matters as are in question, obey its erroneous dictates than violate this moral feeling and live only to condemn the actions he is constantly performing.

19. Let us therefore follow. Far from contending about meats, drinks, and festival times, in which it is not likely that the Jews and Gentiles will soon agree, let us endeavor to the utmost of our power to promote peace and unanimity, that we may be instrumental in edifying each other, in promoting religious knowledge and piety instead of being stumbling blocks in each other's way.

23. And he that doubteth. This verse is a necessary part of the preceding, and should be read thus: "But he that doubteth is condemned if he eat, because he eateth not of faith." The meaning is sufficiently plain. He that feeds on any kind of meats prohibited by the Mosaic law with the persuasion in his mind that he may be wrong in so doing is condemned by his conscience for doing that which he has reason to think God has forbidden. For whatsoever is not of faith is sin. Whatever he does, without a full persuasion of its lawfulness (see v. 22), is to him sin, for he does it under a conviction that heart cannot but condemn him as a transgressor.—For whatsoever is not of faith is sin. Whatever is done while we are not clearly persuaded of the lawfulness of it, is a sin against conscience. He that will venture to do that which his own conscience suggests to him to be unlawful, when it is not so in itself, will by a like temptation be brought to do that which his conscience tells him is unlawful when it is really so.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

for whatsoever is not of faith is sin—a maxim of unspeakable importance in the Christian life.–

ADAM CLARKE

he may be wrong in so doing. Therefore if he makes a distinction in his own conscience between different kinds of meats, and yet eats of all indifferently, he is a sinner before God. There are few readers who have not remarked that the last three verses of this Epistle (chap. xvi. 25-27) appear to stand in their present place without any obvious connection, and apparently after the Epistle is concluded. And it is well-known to critics that a number of MSS. and versions add those verses at the end of the fourteenth chapter. These words certainly connect better with the close of the fourteenth chapter and the beginning of the fifteenth than they do with the conclusion of the sixteenth, where they are now generally found. But I shall defer my observations upon them till I come to that place, with only this remark, that the stablishing mentioned in chap. xvi. 25 corresponds well with the doubting of chap. xiv. 23; and indeed the whole matter of these verses agrees so well with the subject so largely handled in the preceding chapter that there can be very little doubt of their being in their proper place if joined to the end of this chapter, as they are in some MSS. and versions.

CHAPTER 15

The apostle here lays down two precepts, showing the duty of the strong Christian to consider the weakest.

I. We must bear the infirmities of the weak, v. 1. We all have our infirmities; but the weak are more subject to them than others. We must bear with their infirmities, and not have our affections alienated from them. Thus Christ bore with his weak disciples. We must also bear their infirmities by sympathizing with them, ministering strength to them. This is bearing one another's burdens.

II. We must not please ourselves, but our neighbour, v. 1, 2.

1. Christians must not please themselves. It is good for us to cross ourselves sometimes, and then we shall the better bear others crossing of us. We shall be spoiled if we be always humoured. The first lesson we have to learn is to deny ourselves, Matt. xvi. 24.

2. Christians must please their brethren. Christians should study to be pleasing. How amiable and comfortable a society would the church of Christ be if Christians would study to please one another!—Please his neighbour, not in everything, but for his good, especially for the good of his soul. To edification, that is, not only for his profit, but for the profit of others, to edify the body of Christ. The closer the stones lie, and the better they are squared to fit one another, the stronger is the building. For even Christ pleased not himself. The self-denial of our Lord Jesus is the best argument against the selfishness of Christians.

(1) Christ pleased not himself. He did not consult his own worldly credit, ease, safety, nor pleasure, he emptied himself, and made himself of no reputation: and all this for our sakes, and to set us an example. His whole life was a self-denying, self-displeasing life.

(2) Herein the scripture was fulfilled: As it is written, The reproaches of those that reproached thee fell on me. It is quoted to show that Christ was so far from pleasing himself that he did in the highest degree displease himself. In his humiliation the content and satisfaction of natural inclination were altogether crossed and denied. He preferred our benefit before his own ease and pleasure. This the apostle chooses to express in scripture language. The shame of those reproaches, which Christ underwent. Whatever dishonour was done to God was a trouble to the Lord Jesus. Christ also did himself endure the greatest indignities; there was much of reproach in his suffering. The sin of those reproaches. Every sin is a kind of reproach to God. Now the guilt of these fell upon Christ, when he was made a sin-offering for us. Nothing could be more contrary to him, nor more against him, than to be made sin and a curse for us, and to have the reproaches of God fall upon him. We must not please ourselves, for Christ pleased not himself; we must bear the infirmities of the weak, for Christ bore the reproaches of those that reproached God. He bore the guilt of sin and the curse for it; we are only called to bear a little of the trouble of it. He bore the presumptuous sins of the wicked; we are called only to bear the infirmities of the weak.—Even Christ. Even he pleased not himself, even he bore

Vss. 1-13. SAME SUBJECT CONTINUED AND CONCLUDED. 1. We then that are strong—on such points as have been discussed, the abolition of the Jewish distinction of meats and days under the Gospel. See on ch. 14:14, 20.

ought . . . not to please ourselves—ought to think less of what we may lawfully do than of how our conduct will affect others.

2, 3. Let every one of us—lay himself out to—please his neighbour—not indeed for his mere gratification, but—for his good—with a view—to his edification. For even Christ pleased not—lived not to please—himself; but, as it is written—(Ps. 69:9)—The reproaches . . . —see Mark 10:42-45.

1. We then that are strong. The sense of this verse is supposed to be the following: We Gentile Christians who perfectly understand the nature of our gospel liberty not only lawfully may, but are bound in duty to, bear any inconveniences that may arise from the scruples of the weaker brethren, and to ease their consciences by prudently abstaining from such indifferent things as may offend and trouble them, and not take advantage from our superior knowledge to make them submit to our judgment.

2. Let every one of us please his neighbour. For it should be a maxim with each of us to do all in our power to please our brethren, and especially in those things in which their spiritual edification is concerned. Though we should not indulge men in mere whims and caprices, yet we should bear with their ignorance and their weakness, knowing that others had much to bear with from us before we came to our present advanced state of religious knowledge.

3. For even Christ pleased not himself. Christ never acted as One who sought His own ease or profit. He not only bore with the weakness, but with the insults, of His creatures; as it is written in Ps. lxix. 9: The reproaches of them that reproached thee fell on me—I not only bore their insults, but bore the punishment due to them for their vicious and abominable conduct. That this psalm refers to the Messiah and His sufferings for mankind is evident, not only from the quotation here, but also from John xix. 28-29, when our Lord's receiving the vinegar during His expiatory suffering is said to be a fulfilling of the scripture, viz., of v. 21 of this very psalm; and His cleansing the Temple, John ii. 15-17, is said to be a fulfillment of v. 9, "For the zeal of thine house hath eaten me up," the former part of which verse the apostle quotes here.

our sins. And should not we be humble, and self-denying, and ready to consider one another.

(3) Therefore we must go and do likewise: For whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning. [1] That which is written of Christ, is written for our learning; he hath left us an example. The example of Christ is recorded for our imitation. [2] That which is written in the scriptures of the Old Testament is written for our learning. What happened to the Old Testament saints happened to them for ensample. They are written, that they might remain for our use and benefit. First, For our learning. We must therefore labour, not only to understand the literal meaning of the scripture, but to learn out of it that which will do us good. Practical observations are more necessary than critical expositions. Secondly, That we through patience and comfort of the scriptures might have hope. The scripture was written that we might know what to hope for from God. Now the way of attaining this hope is through patience and comfort of the scripture. Patience and comfort suppose trouble and sorrow; such is the lot of the saints in this world. But both these befriend that hope which is the life of our souls. Patience works experience, and experience hope, which maketh not ashamed, ch. v. 3–5. The more patience we exercise under troubles the more hopefully we may look through our troubles; nothing more destructive to hope than impatience. And the comfort of the scriptures, that comfort which springs from the word of God is likewise a great stay to hope, as it is an earnest in hand of the good hoped for.

Verses 5, 6

The apostle, having delivered two exhortations, intermixes here a prayer for the success of what he had said.

I. The title he gives to God: The God of patience and consolation. He gives the grace of patience; he confirms and keeps it up as the God of consolation. When he comes to beg the pouring out of the spirit of love and unity he addresses himself to God as the God of patience and consolation. 1. As a God that bears with us and comforts us, is not extreme to mark what we do amiss—to teach us so to testify our love to our brethren. Or, 2. As a God that gives us patience and comfort. He had spoken (v. 4) of patience and comfort of the scriptures; it comes through the scripture as the conduit-pipe, but from God as the fountain-head. Nothing breaks the peace more than an impatient, and peevish, melancholy temper.

II. The mercy he begs of God: Grant you to be like-minded one towards another, according to Christ Jesus. The foundation of Christian love and peace is laid in likemindedness. This like-mindedness must be according to Christ Jesus, according to the precept of Christ, the royal law of love, according to the pattern and example of Christ, which he had propounded to them for their imitation, v. 3. The method of our prayer must be first for truth, and then for peace; for such is the method of the wisdom that is from above: it is first pure, then peaceable. This is to be like-minded according to Christ Jesus. Like-mindedness among Christians, according to Christ Jesus, is the gift of God. We are taught to pray that the will of God may be done on earth as it is done in heaven: now there it is done unanimously, among the angels; and our desire must be that the saints on earth may do so too.

III. The end of his desire: that God may be glorified, v. 6. We should have the glory of God in our eye in every prayer. Like-mindedness among Christians is in order to our glorifying God, 1. With one mind and one mouth. It will not suffice that there be one mouth, but there must be one mind; nay, there will hardly be one mouth where there is not one mind. 2. As the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. God must be glorified as he has now revealed himself in the face of Jesus Christ, in whom he is our Father. The unity of Christians glorifies God as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

He had exhorted the strong to receive the weak (ch. xiv. 1), here, Receive one another; for sometimes the prejudices of the weak Christian make him shy of the strong, as much as the pride of the strong Christian makes him shy of the weak, neither of which ought to be. Let there be a mutual embracing among Christians. Now the reason why Christians must receive one another is taken, as before, from the condescending love of Christ to us: As Christ also received us, to the glory of God. Has Christ been so kind to us, and shall we be so unkind to those that are his? Christ has received us into the nearest and dearest relations to himself. He has received us

4. For whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning—'instruction'-

-that we through . . . —'through the comfort and the patience of the Scriptures'—might have hope—i.e., 'Think not that because such portions of Scripture relate immediately to Christ, they are inapplicable to you; for though Christ's sufferings, as a Saviour, were exclusively His own, the motives that prompted them, the spirit in which they were endured, and the general principle involved in His whole work—self-sacrifice for the good of others—furnish our most perfect and beautiful model; and so all Scripture relating to these is for our instruction; and since the duty of forbearance, the strong with the weak, requires "patience," and this again needs "comfort," all those Scriptures which tell of patience and consolation, particularly of the patience of Christ, and of the consolation which sustained Him under it, are our appointed and appropriate nutriment, ministering to us "hope" of that blessed day when these shall no more be needed.' See on ch. 4, Note 7. (For the same connection between "patience and hope" see on ch. 12:12, and I Thess. 1:3). 5, 6. Now the God of patience and consolation—Such beautiful names of God are taken from the graces which He inspires: as "the God of hope" (vs. 13), "the God of peace" (vs. 33).-

-grant you to be like minded—'of the same mind'—according to Christ Jesus—It is not mere unanimity which the apostle seeks for them; for unanimity in evil is to be deprecated. But it is "according to Christ Jesus"—after the sublimest model of Him whose all-absorbing desire was to do, "not His own will, but the will of Him that sent Him" (John 6:38). That . . . —rather, 'that with one accord ye may with one mouth glorify the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ'; the mind and the mouth of all giving harmonious glory to His name. What a prayer! And shall this never be realized on earth?

7. Wherefore—returning to the point—receive ye one another . . . to the glory of God—If Christ received us, and bears with all our weaknesses, well may we receive and compassionate one with another, and by so doing God will be glorified.

4. For whatsoever things were written aforetime. This refers not only to the quotation from Psalms 69, but to all the Old Testament scriptures; for it can be to no other scriptures that the apostle alludes. And from what he says here of them, we learn that God had not intended them merely for those generations in which they were first delivered, but for the instruction of all the succeeding generations of mankind.

That we through patience and comfort of the scriptures—that we, through those remarkable examples of patience exhibited by the saints and followers of God, whose history is given in those scriptures, and the comfort which they derived from God in their patient endurance of sufferings brought upon them through their faithful attachment to truth and righteousness —might have hope that we shall be upheld and blessed as they were, and our sufferings become the means of our greater advances in faith and holiness, and consequently our hope of eternal glory be the more confirmed. Some think that the word which we translate comfort should be rendered "exhortation"; but there is certainly no need here to leave the usual acceptation of the term, as the word comfort makes a regular and consistent sense with the rest of the verse.

5. Now the God of patience and consolation. May that God who endued them with patience, and gave them the consolation that supported them in all their trials and afflictions, grant you to be likeminded—give you the same mode of thinking and the same power of acting towards each other, according to the example of Christ.

6. That ye—Jews and Gentiles—may with one mind. Thinking the same things, and bearing with each other, after the example of Christ. And one mouth, in all your religious assemblies, without jarring or contentions. Glorify God for calling you into such a state of salvation, and showing himself to be your loving, compassionate Father, as he is the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. It is very likely that the apostle refers here to religious acts in public worship which might have been greatly interrupted by the dissensions between the converted Jews and the converted Gentiles. These differences he labors to compose; and after having done all that was necessary in the way of instruction and exhortation, he now pours out his soul to God, who alone could rule and manage the heart, that He would enable them to think the same things, to be of the same judgment, and that all, feeling their obligation to Him, might join in the sweetest harmony in every act of religious worship.

7. Wherefore receive ye one another. Have the most affectionate regard for each other, and acknowledge each other as the servants and children of God Almighty.

As Christ also received us. In the same manner and with the same cordial affection as Christ has received us into communion with himself, and has made us partakers of such inestimable blessings,

MATTHEW HENRY

(though we were strangers and enemies, and had played the prodigal) into fellowship and communion with himself. Those words, to the glory of God, may refer both to Christ's receiving us, which is our pattern, and to our receiving one another, which is our practice according to that pattern.

I. Christ hath received us to the glory of God. The end of our reception by Christ is that we might glorify God in this world, and be glorified with him in that to come. We are called to an eternal glory by Christ Jesus, John xvii. 24.

II. We must receive one another to the glory of God. This must be our great end in all our actions, that God may be glorified; and nothing more conduces to this than the mutual love and kindness of those that profess religion; compare v. 6, That you may with one mind and one mouth glorify God. He shows how Jesus Christ has received both Jews and Gentiles; in him they are both one, one new man, Eph. ii. 14–16. Those that agree in Christ may well afford to agree among themselves.

1. He received the Jews, v. 8. Let not any think hardly or scornfully therefore of those that were originally Jews. (1) Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision. He was a minister—a servant. Christ blessed them, looked upon himself as primarily sent to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, laid hold of the seed of Abraham (Heb. ii. 16, margin), and by them, as it were, caught at the whole body of mankind. Christ's personal ministry was appropriated to them. (2) He was so for the truth of God. That is, to make good the promises given to the patriarchs concerning the special mercy God had in store for their seed.—To confirm the promises made unto the fathers. The best confirmation of promises is the performance of them. When Messiah the Prince appeared in the fulness of time, as a minister of the circumcision, all these promises were confirmed. In Christ all the promises of God are Yea, and in him Amen.

2. He received the Gentiles likewise. This he shows, v. 9–12.

(1) Christ's favour to the Gentiles. One design of Christ was that the Gentiles likewise might be converted. A good reason why they should not think the worse of any Christian for his having been formerly a Gentile; for Christ has received him. That the Gentiles might glorify God for his mercy. They shall have matter for praise, even the mercy of God. Considering the miserable and deplorable condition that the Gentile world was in, the receiving of them appears more as an act of mercy than the receiving of the Jews. The greatest mercy of God to any people is the receiving of them into covenant with himself. They shall have a heart for praise. They shall glorify God for his mercy. God intended to reap a harvest of glory from the Gentiles, who had been so long turning his glory into shame.

(2) The fulfilling of the scriptures in this. The favour of God to the Gentiles was not only mercy, but truth. Though there were not promises directly given to them, yet there were many prophesies concerning them, which related to the calling of them, some of which he mentioned. Thus, by referring them to the Old Testament, he labours to qualify their dislike of the Gentiles. [1] It was foretold that the Gentiles should have the gospel preached to them "I will confess to thee among the Gentiles (v. 9), thy name shall be known and owned in the Gentile world." Christ, in and by his apostles and ministers, whom he sent to disciple all nations, did confess to God among the Gentiles. Christ's declaring God's name to his brethren is called his praising God in the midst of the congregation, Ps. xxii. 22. When David's psalms are read and sung among the Gentiles, to the praise and glory of God, it may be said that David is confessing to God among the Gentiles, and singing to his name. He that was the sweet psalmist of Israel is now the sweet psalmist of the Gentiles. Converting grace makes people greatly in love with David's psalms. If any confess to God among the Gentiles, and sing to his name, it is not they, but Christ and his grace in them. [2] The Gentiles should rejoice with his people, v. 10. Those Jews that retain a prejudice against the Gentiles will by no means admit them to any of their joyful festivities. But, the partition-wall being taken down, the Gentiles are welcome to rejoice with his people. [3] They should praise God (v. 11): Praise the Lord, all ye Gentiles. Converting grace sets people praising God. The Gentiles had been, for many ages, praising their idols of wood and stone, but now they are brought to praise the Lord. [4] They should believe in Christ (v. 12), quoted from Isa. xi. 10. First, The revelation of Christ, as the Gentiles' king. He is here called the root of Jesse. Christ, as God, was David's root; Christ, as man, was David's offspring.—And he that shall rise to reign over the Gentiles. When Christ rose from the dead, when he

8-12. Now—'For' is the true reading: the apostle is merely assigning an additional motive to Christian forbearance. I say that Jesus Christ was—'hath become'—a minister of the circumcision—a remarkable expression, meaning 'the Father's Servant for the salvation of the circumcision (or, of Israel).' for the truth of God—to make good the veracity of God towards His ancient people. to confirm the—Messianic—promises made unto the fathers—To cheer the Jewish believers, whom he might seem to have been disparaging, and to keep down Gentile pride, the apostle holds up Israel's salvation as the primary end of Christ's mission.

But next after this, Christ was sent—that the Gentiles might glorify God for his mercy—A number of quotations from the Old Testament here follow, to show that God's plan of mercy embraced, from the first, the Gentiles along with the Jews.

condescending to be present in all our assemblies. And as Christ has received us thus to the glory of God, so should we, Jews and Gentiles, cordially receive each other, that God's glory may be promoted by our harmony and brotherly love.

8. Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision. To show the Gentiles the propriety of bearing with the scrupulous Jews, he shows them here that they were under the greatest obligations to his people; to whom, in the days of His flesh, Jesus Christ confined His ministry, giving the world to see that He allowed the claim of the Jews as having the first right to the blessings of the gospel. And He confined His ministry thus to the Jews to confirm the truth of God contained in the promises made unto the patriarchs; for God had declared that thus it should be; and Jesus Christ, by coming according to the promise, has fulfilled this truth by making good the promises. Therefore salvation is of the Jews, as a kind of right conveyed to them through the promises made to their fathers. But this salvation was not exclusively designed for the Jewish people, as God by His prophets had repeatedly declared.

9. And that the Gentiles might glorify God for his mercy. As the Jews were to glorify God for His truth, so the Gentiles were to glorify God for His mercy. The Jews received the blessings of the gospel by right of promise, which promise God had most punctually and circumstantially fulfilled. The Gentiles had received the same gospel as an effect of God's mere mercy, having no right in consequence of any promise or engagement made with any of their ancestors, though they were originally included in the covenant made with Abraham.

I will confess to thee among the Gentiles. This quotation is taken from Ps. xviii. 49, and shows that the Gentiles had a right to glorify God for His mercy to them.

MATTHEW HENRY

ascended on high, it was to reign over the Gentiles. Secondly, The recourse of the Gentiles to him: In him shall the Gentiles trust. The prophet has it, to him shall the Gentiles seek. The method of faith is first to seek unto Christ, as to one proposed to us for a Saviour; and, finding him able and willing to save, then to trust in him. Those that know him will trust in him. This seeking to him is the effect of a trust in him. We shall never seek to Christ till we trust in him. Trust is the mother; diligence in the use of means the daughter. Jews and Gentiles being thus united in Christ's love, why should they not be united in one another's love?

Verse 13

Here is another prayer directed to God, as the God of hope.

I. He addresses himself to God, as the God of hope. He is the foundation on which our hope is built, and he is the builder that doth himself raise it: he is both the object of our hope, and the author of it. That hope is but fancy, which is not fastened upon God and which is not of his working in us.

II. What he asks of God, not for himself, but for them.

1. That they might be filled with all joy and peace in believing. Joy and peace are two of those things in which the kingdom of God consists, ch. xiv. 17. (1) How desirable this joy and peace are; they are filling. Carnal joy puffs up the soul, but cannot fill it. True, heavenly, spiritual joy is filling to the soul; it has a satisfaction in it, answerable to the soul's vast and just desires. Nothing more than this joy, only more of it, even the perfection of it in glory, is the desire of the soul that hath it. (2) How it is attainable. By prayer. Prayer fetches in spiritual joy and peace. By believing. True substantial joy is the fruit of faith. It is owing to the weakness of our faith that we are so much wanting in joy and peace. Only believe; believe the goodness of Christ, the love of Christ, and the result must needs be joy and peace. It is all joy and peace—all sorts of true joy and peace. When we come to God by prayer we must enlarge our desires. Ask for all joy.

2. That they might abound in hope through the power of the Holy Ghost. What is laid out upon them is but little, compared with what is laid up for them; therefore the more hope they have the more joy and peace they have. Christians should desire and labour after an abundance of hope, such hope as will not make ashamed. This is through the power of the Holy Ghost. Our own power will never reach it; and therefore where this hope is, and is abounding, the blessed spirit must have all the glory.

Verses 14–16

I. He commends these Christians. He began his epistle with their praises (ch. i. 8), Your faith is spoken of throughout the world. Because sometimes he had reproved them sharply, he now concludes with the like commendation, to part friends. It was not a piece of idle flattery, but a due acknowledgment of their worth, and of the grace of God in them. We must be forward to observe and commend in others that which is excellent and praiseworthy. Paul had no personal acquaintance with these Christians, and yet he says he was persuaded of their excellencies, though he knew them only by hearsay. As we must not, on the one hand, be so simple as to believe every word; so, on the other hand, we must not be so sceptical as to believe nothing; but especially we must be forward to believe good concerning others. It is safer to err on this side. They were full of goodness; therefore the more likely to take in good part what he had written, and to account it a kindness; and not only so, but to put it in practice, especially that which relates to the healing of their differences. A good understanding of one another, and a goodwill to one another, would soon put an end to strife. Filled with all knowledge. Goodness and knowledge together! A very rare and an excellent conjunction; the head and the heart of the new man. Able to admonish one another. Those that have goodness and knowledge should communicate what they have. "You that excel so much in good gifts may think you have no need of any instructions of mine." How gladly would ministers leave off their admonishing work, if people were able and willing to admonish one another! Would to God that all the Lord's people were prophets.

II. He clears himself from the suspicion of intermeddling needlessly with that which did not belong to him, v. 15. Observe how affectionately he speaks to them: My brethren (v. 14), and again, brethren, v. 15. He had himself, and taught others, the art of obliging. He acknowledges he had written boldly in some sort.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

13. Now . . . —This seems a concluding prayer, suggested by the whole preceding subject matter of the epistle. the God of hope— that ye may abound in hope—"of the glory of God." (See on ch. 5:1.) through the power of the Holy Ghost—to whom, in the economy of redemption, it belongs to inspire believers with all gracious affections.—On the foregoing portion, note, (1) No Christian is at liberty to regard himself as an isolated disciple of the Lord Jesus, having to decide questions of duty and liberty solely with reference to himself. As Christians are one body in Christ, so the great law of love binds them to act in all things with tenderness and consideration for their brethren in "the common salvation" (vss. 1, 2). (2) Of this unselfishness CHRIST is the perfect model of all Christians (vs. 3). (3) Holy Scripture is the divine storehouse of all furniture for the Christian life, even in its most trying and delicate features (vs. 4). (4) The harmonious glorification of the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ by the whole body of the redeemed, as it is the most exalted fruit of the scheme of redemption, so it is the last end of God in it (vss. 5-7).

(see on vs. —fill you with all joy and peace in believing—the native truth of that faith which is the great theme of this epistle (cf. Gal. 5:22).

14-33. CONCLUSION: IN WHICH THE APOSTLE APOLOGIZES FOR THUS WRITING TO THE ROMAN CHRISTIANS, EXPLAINS WHY HE HAD NOT YET VISITED THEM, ANNOUNCES HIS FUTURE PLANS, AND ASKS THEIR PRAYERS FOR THE COMPLETION OF THEM.

14, 15. And . . . —rather, 'Now I am persuaded, my brethren, even I myself, concerning you'—that ye also yourselves are full of goodness—of inclination to all I have been enjoining on you—

-filled with all knowledge—of the truth expounded—and able—without my intervention—to admonish one another.

Nevertheless, I have written the more boldly unto you in some sort—'measure'—as putting you in mind,

ADAM CLARKE

13. Now the God of hope. "May the God of this hope"—that God who caused both Jews and Gentiles to hope that the gracious promises which He made to them should be fulfilled; and who, accordingly, has fulfilled them in the most punctual and circumstantial manner. Fill you with all joy. Give you true spiritual happiness: peace in your own hearts, and unity among yourselves; in believing not only the promises which He has given you, but believing in Christ Jesus, in whom all the promises are yea and amen.

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

The apostle attributes the power to be filled with joy and peace in believing, and the power to abound in hope, to the Holy Ghost. But, then, I wanted also to show you that the power of the church outside, that with which she is to be aggressive and work upon the world for the gathering out of God's elect from among men, is also this same energy of the Holy Spirit. Hence I have taken the nineteenth verse, for the apostle there says that God had through him made "the Gentiles obedient by word and deed, through mighty signs and wonders, by the power of the Spirit of God." So you see, dear friends, that first of all to keep the church happy and holy within herself there must be a manifestation of the power of the Holy Spirit, and secondly, that for the church to invade the territories of the enemy and to conquer the world for Christ, she must be clothed with the self-same sacred energy. We may then go further and say that the power of the church for external work will be proportionate to the power which dwells within herself. Gauge the energy of the Holy Spirit in the hearts of believers and you may fairly calculate their influence upon unbelievers. Only let the church be illuminated by the Holy Spirit and she will reflect the light and become to onlookers "fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners."

—The Treasury of the New Testament

14. And I . . . am persuaded of you. This is supposed to be an address to the Gentiles, and it is managed with great delicacy. He seems to apologize for the freedom he had used in writing to them, which he gives them to understand proceeded from the authority he had received by his apostolical office, the exercise of which office respected them particularly.

15. Nevertheless . . . I have written. Notwithstanding I have this conviction of your extensive knowledge in the things of God, I have

MATTHEW HENRY

1. He did it only as their remembrancer: As putting you in mind. People commonly excuse themselves from hearing the word with this, that the minister can tell them nothing but what they knew before. Yet have they not need to know it better, and to be put in mind of it?

2. He did it as the apostle of the Gentiles. It was in pursuance of his office: Because of the grace given to me of God, to be the minister of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles, v. 16. He thus laid out himself among the Gentiles, that he might not receive that grace of God in vain. Christ received that he might give; so did Paul; so have we talents which must not be buried. Paul was a minister. Whose minister he was: the minister of Jesus Christ; his we are, and him we serve. To whom: to the Gentiles. These Romans were Gentiles: "Now," says he, "I do not thrust myself upon you, I am appointed to it: my commission is my warrant. What he ministered: the gospel of God—ministering as about holy things (so the word signifies). For what end: that the offering up of the Gentiles might be acceptable. Paul laid out himself thus to bring about something that might be acceptable to God. It is the offering up of the Gentiles; the oblation of the Gentiles, in which the Gentiles are looked upon either, (1) As the priests, offering the oblation of prayer and praise. Long had the Jews been the holy nation, the kingdom of priests, but now the Gentiles are made priests unto God. Or, (2) The Gentiles are themselves the sacrifice offered up to God by Paul. Paul gathered in souls by his preaching, not to keep them to himself, but to offer them up to God. And it is an acceptable offering, being sanctified by the Holy Ghost. That which made them sacrifices to God was their sanctification; and this was not his work, but the work of the Holy Ghost. None are acceptably offered to God but those that are sanctified.

Verses 17–21

He goes on further to magnify his office in the efficacy of it, and to mention to the glory of God the wonderful things that God had done by him. Though, compared with the multitude of their idolatrous neighbours, they were but a little flock, yet, there were many that were their companions in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ. It was likewise a great confirmation of the truth of the Christian doctrine that it had such strange success. Therefore Paul gives them this account, which he makes the matter of his glorying; not vain glory, but holy gracious glorying; it is through Jesus Christ. Thus does he centre all his glorying in Christ. And it is in those things which pertain to God. Whereof I may glory. I would rather read it thus: Therefore I have a rejoicing in Christ Jesus concerning the things of God. Paul would have them to rejoice with him in the efficacy of his ministry, of which he speaks not only with the greatest deference possible to the power of Christ, but with a protestation of the truth of what he said (v. 18): I will not dare to speak of any of those things which Christ hath not wrought by me. He would not take the praise of another man's work, for (says he) I dare not do it.

I. His unwearied diligence and industry in his work.

1. He preached in many places: From Jerusalem and round about unto Illyricum. We have in the book of the Acts an account of Paul's travels. There we find him, after he was sent forth to preach to the Gentiles (Acts xiii), labouring in Seleucia, Cyprus, Pamphylia, Pisidia, and Lycaonia (Acts xiii, xiv), afterwards travelling through Syria and Cilicia, Phrygia, Galatia, Mysia, Troas, and thence called over to Macedonia, and so into Europe, Acts xv, xvi. Then we find him very busy at Thessalonica, Berea, Athens, Corinth, Ephesus, and the parts adjacent. Now it might be suspected that if Paul undertook so much work, surely he did it by the halves. "No," says he, "I have fully preached the Gospel of Christ—have given them a full account of the truth and terms of the gospel, have not shunned to declare the whole counsel of God."

2. He preached in places that had not heard the gospel before, v. 20, 21. He broke up the fallow ground, and introduced Christianity where nothing had reigned for many ages but idolatry and witchcraft. Paul broke the ice, and therefore must needs meet with the more difficulties and discouragements in his work. Paul was called out to the hardest work. He was a bold man that made the first attack upon the palace of the strong man armed in the Gentile world, and Paul was that man who ventured the first onset in many places, and suffered greatly for it. He mentions this as a proof of his apostleship; for the office of the apostles was especially to bring in those that were without. He principally laid himself made bold to write to you in some sort, "to a party" among you, as some learned men translate the words, who stand more in need of such instructions than the others; and I do this because of the grace—because of the "office"—which I have received from God, namely, to be the apostle of the Gentiles.

16. Ministering the gospel of God. "Acting as a priest." Here is a plain allusion, says Dr. Whitby, to the Jewish sacrifices offered by the priest, and sanctified or made acceptable by the libamen offered with them; for he compares himself, in preaching the gospel, to the priest performing his sacred functions—preparing his sacrifice to be offered. The Gentiles, converted by him and dedicated to the service of God, are his sacrifices and oblation. The Holy Spirit is the libamen poured upon this sacrifice, by which it was sanctified and rendered acceptable to God. The words of Isa. lxvi. 20, "And they shall bring all your brethren for an offering unto the Lord out of all nations," might have suggested the above idea to the mind of the apostle.

17. I have therefore whereof I may glory. Being sent of God on this most honorable and important errand, I have matter of great exultation, not only in the honor which He has conferred upon me, but in the great success with which He has crowned my ministry.

18. For I will not dare to speak. If the thing were not as I have stated it, I would not dare to arrogate to myself honors which did not belong to me. But God has made me the apostle of the Gentiles; and the conversion of the Gentiles is the fruit of my ministry, Christ having wrought by me for this purpose.

Round about unto Illyricum. It is a country of Europe, extending from the Adriatic gulf to Pannonia. From Jerusalem the apostle went round the eastern coast of the Mediterranean Sea.

I have fully preached the gospel. "I have successfully preached"—I have not only proclaimed the Word, but made converts and founded churches.

out for the good of those that sat in darkness. He was in care not to build upon another man's foundation. He quotes a scripture for this out of Isa. lii. 15, To whom he was not spoken of, they shall see. The transition from darkness to light is more sensible than the after-growth and increase of that light. And commonly the greatest success of the gospel is at its first coming to a place; afterwards most people become sermon-proof.

II. The great success that he had in his work: It was effectual to make the Gentiles obedient. The design of the gospel is to bring people to be obedient. This Paul aimed at in all his travels. Now how was this great work wrought? Christ was the principal agent. He does not say, "which I worked," but "which Christ wrought by me," v. 18. Whatever good we do, it is not we, but Christ by us, that does it. Paul takes all occasions to own this. Paul was a very active instrument: By word and deed, that is, by his preaching, and by the miracles he wrought, or his preaching and his living. Those ministers are likely to win souls that preach both by word and deed. This is according to Christ's example, who began both to do and teach.—Through mighty signs and wonders. These made the preaching of the word so effectual. The power of the Spirit of God made this effectual, v. 19. (1) The power of the Spirit in Paul, as in the other apostles, for the working of those miracles. Miracles were wrought by the power of the Holy Ghost. Or, (2) The power of the Spirit in the hearts of those who saw the miracles. Paul himself could not make one soul obedient further than the power of the Spirit of God accompanied his labours. This is an encouragement to faithful ministers, who labour under the sense of great weakness and infirmity. The same almighty Spirit that wrought with Paul often perfects strength in weakness. The converted nations were his joy and crown of rejoicing: and he tells them of it, that they might rejoice with him.

Verses 22–29

St. Paul here declares his purpose to come and see the Christians at Rome. The manner of his expression is gracious, and for our imitation. Even our common discourse should have an air of grace; by this it will appear what country we belong to. It should seem that Paul's company was very much desired at Rome. Should the apostle of the Gentiles be a stranger at Rome, the metropolis of the Gentile world? He promises to come shortly, and gives a good reason why he could not come now.

I. He excuses it that he never came yet. 1. He assures them that he had a great desire to see them; not to see Rome, but to come unto you (v. 3), a company of poor despised saints in Rome. These were the men that Paul was ambitious of an acquaintance with at Rome. And he had a special desire to see them, because of the great character they had in all the churches for faith and holiness. This desire Paul had had for many years, and yet could never compass it. God's dearest servants are not always gratified in everything that they have a mind to. 2. He tells them that the reason why he could not come to them was because he had so much work cut out for him elsewhere. For which cause he was so much hindered. God had opened a wide door for him in other places, and so turned him aside. (1) The gracious providence of God about his ministers, casting their lot, not according to their contrivance, but according to his own purpose. Man purposes but God disposes. The gospel does not come by chance to any place, but by the will and counsel of God. (2) The gracious prudence of Paul, in bestowing his time and pains where there was most need. Had Paul consulted his own honour, the greatness of the work would never have hindered him from seeing Rome. Paul sought the things of Christ more than his own things. There was now a gale of opportunity, the fields were white unto the harvest; such a season slipped might never be retrieved. It concerns us all to do that first which is most needful. This Paul mentions as a sufficient satisfying reason. We must not take it ill of our friends if they prefer necessary work, which is pleasing to God, before unnecessary visits and compliments.

II. He promised to come and see them shortly, v. 23, 24, 29. Having no more place in these parts, namely, in Greece, where he then was. He had driven the chariot of the gospel to the sea-coast, and having thus conquered Greece he is ready to wish there were another Greece to conquer.

1. How he forecasted his intended visit. His project was to see them in his way to Spain. It appears by this that Paul intended a journey into Spain. But it is not certain whether ever he fulfilled his purpose, and went to Spain. He did indeed come to by word and deed—by preaching and working; which latter he explains in the next clause.

through mighty—lit., 'in the power of'—signs and wonders—i.e., glorious miracles. by the power of the Spirit of God—'the Holy Ghost,' as the true reading seems to be. This seems intended to explain the efficacy of the word preached, as well as the working of the miracles which attested it.

For which cause—'Being so long occupied with this missionary work, I have been much (or, 'for the most part') hindered . . . , (See on ch. 1:9-11.)

23, 24. But now having no more place—'no longer having place,'—i.e., unbroken ground, where Christ has not been preached—and having a great desire—'a longing'—these many years to come unto you—(see, as before, on ch. 1:9-11)—whensoever I take my journey into Spain—Whether this purpose was ever accomplished has been much disputed, as no record of it nor allusion to it anywhere occurs. Those who think our apostle was never at large after his first imprisonment at Rome will of course hold

20. So have I strived to preach the gospel. For I have considered it my "honor" to preach the gospel where that gospel was before unknown. This is the proper import of the word; from philos, a "friend," and time, "honor."

21. But as it is written. These words, quoted from Isa. lii. 15, the apostle applies to his own conduct; not that the words themselves predicted what Paul had done, but that he endeavored to fulfill such a declaration by his manner of preaching the gospel to the heathen.

By word and deed. These words may refer to the doctrines which he taught and to the miracles which he wrought among them. So they became obedient to the doctrines, on the evidence of the miracles with which they were accompanied.

19. Through mighty signs and wonders. This more fully explains the preceding clause. Through the power of the Holy Ghost he was enabled to work among the Gentiles mighty signs and wonders, so that they were fully convinced that both his doctrine and mission were divine; and therefore they cheerfully received the gospel of the Lord Jesus.

A. B. SIMPSON:

Again and again, in Paul's missionary work, God put His hand upon the work. Look at him at Derby and Lystra, beaten by the mob, and left for dead. He simply rose upon his feet, taking strength from the living One, and went forth to his work as if nothing had happened. On his way to Rome, standing on the rocking deck of the little ship bravely triumphing over the angry storm and the terror of the captain and the crew, leading them by his triumphant faith to the shore. Or, again, on the shores of Malta, flinging from his hand the viper that threatened his life, and then going forth throughout the island, to pour into other hearts the blessing which he himself had received.

This was the way Paul did his mission work, turning every curse into a blessing and every assault into a victory.

This is the very way God still wants to send forth His workers, and seal their labors with His mighty hand. But you must first know His power in your own life, and then it will be easy to claim it for the lives of others, and as the seal of your work. There is nothing God will not do for you if you will first let Him do it in you.

The greatest need of foreign work today, both at home and abroad—a mighty baptism of the Holy Ghost. This will produce missionary enthusiasm, the consecration of means, the calling of true workers, the preparation of the power that you most need. And this will open the hearts of the heathen, will break the barriers and bars of brass asunder, and will give the triumphs of the Gospel in the face of idolatry and opposition.—Christ in the Bible

22. For which cause. My considering it a point of honor to build on no other man's foundation; and, finding that the gospel has been long ago planted at Rome, I have been prevented from going thither, purposing rather to spend my time and strength in preaching where Christ has not yet been proclaimed.

23. But . . . having no more place in these parts. Having nothing further at present that I can do—for topon echein signifies not merely "to have a place of residence," or the like, but "convenience, opportunity," which is a frequent meaning of the phrase among the best Greek writers—having no large place or city where Christianity has not yet been planted, in which I can introduce the gospel. The apostle was then at Corinth; and having evangelized all

Rome, but he was brought thither a prisoner, and there was detained two years; and whither he went after is uncertain. The grace of God often with favour accepts the sincere intention, when the providence of God in wisdom prohibits the execution. Now, in his way to Spain he proposed to come to them. I trust to see you: not, "I am resolved I will" but, "I hope I shall." We must purpose all our purposes in like manner with a submission to the divine providence.

2. What he expected in his intended visit. (1) What he expected from them. He expected they would bring him on his way towards Spain. It was not a stately attendance but a loving attendance, such as friends give, that Paul expected. They might be helpful to Paul in his voyage thither; and it was not barely their accompanying him part of the way, but their furthering him in his expedition, that he counted upon. (2) What he expected in them: to be somewhat filled with their company. That which Paul desired was their company and conversation. Paul was himself a man of great attainments in knowledge and grace, and yet see how he pleased himself with the thoughts of good company. He intended to make some stay with them, for he would be filled with their company; not just look at them, and away. It is but somewhat filled, he thought he should leave them with a desire of more of their company. The satisfaction we have in communion with the saints in this world is but partial. It is partial compared with our communion with Christ. That will fill the soul. It is partial compared with the communion we hope to have with the saints in the other world. (3) What he expected from God with them, v. 29. He expected to come in the fulness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ. Concerning what he expected from them he speaks doubtfully: I trust to be brought on my way, and to be filled with your company. Paul had learnt not to be too confident of the best. These very men slipped from him afterwards, At my first answer, no man stood by me; none of the Christians at Rome. But concerning what he expected from God he speaks confidently. I am sure when I do come I shall come in the fulness, &c. We cannot expect too little from man, nor too much from God. Now Paul expected that God would bring him to them, loaded with blessings. Compare ch. i. 11, That I may impart unto you some spiritual gift. The blessing of the gospel of Christ is the best and most desirable blessing. There is then a happy meeting between people and ministers, when they are both under the fulness of the blessing. When ministers are fully prepared to give out, and people fully prepared to receive, this blessing, both are happy.

III. He gives them a good reason why he could not come and see them now. He must first make a journey to Jerusalem, v. 25–28. He was going to Jerusalem, as the messenger of the church's charity.

1. Concerning this charity itself. And he speaks of that probably to excite the Roman Christians to do the like. Examples are moving, and Paul was very ingenious at begging, not for himself, but for others. (1) For whom it was intended: For the poor saints which are at Jerusalem, v. 26. It is no strange thing for saints to be poor. Riches are not the best things, nor is poverty a curse. It seems, the saints at Jerusalem were poorer than other saints because the famine that was over all the world in the days of Claudius Cæsar did in a special manner prevail in Judæa. This was the occasion of that contribution mentioned, Acts xi. 28–30. Though the saints at Jerusalem were at a great distance from them, yet they thus extended their bounty to them, to teach us to stretch out the hand of our charity to all that are of the household of faith, though in places distant from us. We must extend our bounty, as the sun his beams. (2) By whom it was collected: By those of Macedonia (the chief of whom were the Philippians) and Achaia (the chief of whom were the Corinthians). It seems those of Macedonia and Achaia were rich and wealthy, while those at Jerusalem were poor and needy, so that some should have what others want, and so this mutual dependence of Christians one upon another might be maintained.—It pleased them. This intimates how ready they were to it, and how cheerful they were in it.—To make a certain contribution; a communication, in token of the communion of saints, as in the natural body one member communicates to the relief of another, as there is occasion. Time was when the saints at Jerusalem were on the giving hand, when they laid their estates at the apostles' feet for charitable uses, and took special care that the Grecian widows should not be neglected in the daily ministration. And now that the providence of God had turned the scale, and made them necessitous, they found the Grecians kind to them; for the merciful shall obtain mercy. (3) What reason there was for it (v. 27): And their

that it never was; while those who are persuaded, as we are, that he underwent a second imprisonment, prior to which he was at large for a considerable time after his first, incline naturally to the other opinion. I will come to you—If these words were not originally in the text, and there is weighty evidence against them, they must at least be inserted as a necessary supplement. in my journey . . .—'as I pass through by you, to be set forward on my journey thither, if first I be somewhat filled with your company': i.e., 'I should indeed like to stay longer with you than I can hope to do, but I must, to some extent at least, have my fill of your company.'

And I am sure—'I know'—that . . . I shall come in the fulness of the blessing of Christ—Such, beyond all doubts, is the true reading, the words "of the gospel" being in hardly any MSS. of antiquity and authority. Nor was the apostle mistaken in this confidence, though his visit to Rome was in very different circumstances from what he expected. See Acts 28:16-31.

25-27. But now I go to Jerusalem to minister—'ministering'—to the saints—in the sense immediately to be explained. For . . .—better, 'For Macedonia and Achaia have thought good to make a certain contribution for the poor of the saints which are at Jerusalem.' (See Acts 24: 17.) 'They have thought it good; and their debtors verily they are'; i.e., 'And well they may, considering what the Gentile believers owe to their Jewish brethren.'

For if the Gentiles have been made partakers of their spiritual things, their duty is also—'they owe it also'—to minister unto them in carnal things—(Cf. I Cor. 9:11; Gal. 6:6; and see Luke 7:4; Acts 10:2).

those parts, he had no opportunity of breaking up any new ground.

24. Whensoever I take my journey into Spain. Where it is very likely the gospel had not yet been planted. I will come to you. These words are wanting in almost every MS. of note. If the first clause of this verse be read in connection with the latter clause of the preceding, it will fully appear that this rejected clause is useless. "Having a great desire these many years to come unto you whensoever I take my journey into Spain: for I trust to see you in my journey."

Somewhat filled with your company. The word which we translate filled would be better rendered "gratified"; for it signifies to be "satisfied, to be gratified, and to enjoy." The apostle, though he had not the honor of having planted the church at Rome, yet expected much gratification from the visit which he intended to pay them.

29. In the fulness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ. The words of the gospel are wanting in almost every MS. of importance. There is no doubt they should be omitted. "The fulness of the blessing of Christ" is really more than "the fulness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ."

25. Now I go unto Jerusalem. From this and the following two verses we learn that the object of his journey to Jerusalem was to carry a contribution made among the Gentile Christians of Macedonia and Achaia for the relief of the poor Jewish Christians at Jerusalem. About this affair he had taken great pains, as appears from 1 Cor. xvi. 1-4; 2 Corinthians vii and ix. His design in this affair is very evident from 2 Cor. ix. 12-13. The apostle was in hopes that this liberal contribution sent by the Gentile Christians who had been converted by Paul's ministry would engage the affections of the Jewish Christians, who had been much prejudiced against the reception of the Gentiles into the Church without being previously obliged to submit to the yoke of the law. He wished to establish a coalition between the converted Jews and Gentiles, being sensible of its great importance to the spread of the gospel; and his procuring this contribution was one laudable device to accomplish this good end. This shows why he so earnestly requests the prayers of the Christians at Rome, that his service which he had for Jerusalem might be accepted of the saints.

27. For if the Gentiles have been made partakers. It was through and by means of the Jews that the Gentiles were brought to the knowledge of God and the gospel of Christ. These were the spiritual things which they had received, and the pecuniary contribution was the carnal things which the Gentiles were now returning.

debtors they are. The Gentiles were greatly beholden to the Jews, and were bound in gratitude to be very kind to them. From the stock of Israel came Christ himself; out of the same stock came the prophets, and apostles, and first preachers of the gospel. The Jews, having had the lively oracles committed to them, were the Christians' library-keepers. They were cut off, that the Gentiles might be admitted in. Thus did the Gentiles partake of their spiritual things, and receive the gospel of salvation as it were at secondhand from the Jews; and therefore their duty is to minister unto them in carnal things: it is the least they can do.

2. Concerning Paul's agency in this business. He ministered unto the saints (v. 25) by stirring up others, receiving what was gathered, and transmitting it to Jerusalem. Many good works of that kind stand at a stay for want of some one active person to lead in them, and to set the wheels going. Besides this, Paul had other business in this journey, to visit and confirm the churches. Paul was one that laid out himself to do good every way, like his Masfer, to the bodies as well as to the souls of people. This Paul had undertaken, and therefore he resolves to go through with it, before he fell upon other work (v. 28): When I have sealed to them this fruit. He calls the alms fruit, for it is one of the fruits of righteousness; it sprang from a root of grace in the givers. And his sealing it intimates his great care about it. Paul was very solicitous to approve himself faithful in the management of this matter.

Verses 30–33

I. St. Paul's desire of a share in the prayers of the Romans for him, expressed very earnestly, v. 30–32. He had prayed much for them, and this he desires as the return of his kindness. Interchanging prayers is an excellent token of the interchanging of loves. How careful should we be lest we do anything to forfeit our interest in the love and prayers of God's praying people!

1. Why they must pray for him. I beseech you, "For the Lord Jesus Christ's sake. You love Christ, and own Christ; for his sake then do me this kindness. For the love of the Spirit. As a proof of that love which the Spirit works in the hearts of believers one to another, pray for me. If ever you experienced the Spirit's love to you, and would be found returning your love to the Spirit, be not wanting in this office of kindness."

2. How they must pray for him: That you strive together. That you strive in prayer. We must put forth all that is within us in that duty; pray with fixedness, faith, and fervency. This not only when we are praying for ourselves, but when we are praying for our friends. True love to our brethren should make us as earnest for them as sense of our own need makes us for ourselves. "Strive together with me, who am wrestling with God daily, upon my own and my friends' account." He would have them to ply the same oar. Those who are put far asunder by the disposal of God's providence may yet meet together at the throne of his grace.

3. What they must beg of God for him. In praying both for ourselves and for our friends, it is good to be particular. He recommends himself to their prayers, with reference to three things: (1) The dangers which he was exposed to: That I may be delivered from those that do not believe in Judæa. Some prospect he had of trouble from them in this journey; and therefore they must pray that God would deliver him. We may, and must, pray against persecution. (2) His services: Pray that my service which I have for Jerusalem may be accepted of the saints. Why, was there any danger that it would not be accepted? Paul was the apostle of the Gentiles, and as the unbelieving Jews looked spitefully at him, which was their wickedness, so those that believed were shy of him, which was their weakness. "Pray that it may be accepted." As God must be sought unto for the restraining of the ill will of our enemies, so also for the preserving and increasing of the goodwill of our friends. (3) His journey to them. To engage their prayers for him, he interests them in his concerns (v. 32): That I may come unto you with joy. If he should not do good, and prosper, in one visit, he thought he should have small joy of the next: may come with joy, by the will of God. All our joy depends upon the will of God.

II. Here is another prayer of the apostle for them (v. 33): Now the God of peace be with you all, Amen. He describes God under this title here, because of the divisions among them; if God be the God of peace, let us be men of peace. Those who have the fountain cannot want any of the streams. With you all; both weak and strong. Those who are united in the blessing of God should be united in affection one to another.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

28, 29. When therefore I have . . . sealed—i.e., delivered over safely—to them this fruit—of the faith and love of the Gentile converts—I will come—'come back,' or 'return'—by you into Spain—See on vs. 24.

30. Now I beseech you, brethren, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake, and for the love of the Spirit—or, 'by the Lord Jesus Christ, and by the love of the Spirit'—not the love which the Spirit bears to us, but that love which He kindles in the hearts of believers towards each other; i.e. 'By that Saviour whose name is alike dear to all of us and whose unsearchable riches I live only to proclaim, and by that love one to another which the blessed Spirit diffuses through all the brotherhood, making the labors of Christ's servants a matter of common interest to all—I beseech you'—that ye strive together with me in your prayers to God for me—implying that he had his grounds for anxious fear in this matter. 31. That I may be delivered from them that do not believe—'that do not obey,' i.e., the truth, by believing it; as in ch. 2:8. in Judea—He saw the storm that was gathering over him in Judea, which, if at all, would certainly burst upon his head when he reached the capital; and the event too clearly showed the correctness of these apprehensions. and that my service which I have for Jerusalem—See on vss. 25-28. may be accepted by—'prove acceptable to'—the saints—Nor was he without apprehension lest the opposition he had made to the narrow jealousy of the Jewish converts against the free reception of their Gentile brethren, should make this gift of theirs to the poor saints at Jerusalem less welcome than it ought to be. He would have the Romans therefore to join him in wrestling with God that this gift might be gratefully received, and prove a cement between the two parties. But further. 32. That I may come unto you with—'in'—joy by the will of God (Acts 18:21; I Cor. 4:19; 16:7; Heb. 6:3; Jas. 4:15—and may with you be refreshed—rather, 'with you refresh myself,' after all his labors and anxieties, and so be refitted for future service. 33. Now the God of peace be with you all. Amen—The peace here sought is to be taken in its widest sense: the peace of reconciliation to God, first, "through the blood of the everlasting covenant" (Heb. 13:20; I Thess. 5: 23; II Thess. 3:16; Phil. 4:9); then the peace which that reconciliation diffuses among all the partakers of it (I Cor. 14:33; II Cor. 13:11; and see on ch. 16:20); more widely still, that peace which the children of God, in beautiful imitation of their Father in Heaven, are called and privileged to diffuse far and wide through this sin-distracted and divided world (ch. 22:18; Matt. 5:9; Heb. 12: 14; Jas. 3:18).—Note, (1) Did "the chiefest of the apostles" apologize for writing to a Christian church which he had never seen, and a church that he was persuaded was above the need of it, save to "stir up their pure minds by way of remembrance" (II Pet. 1:13; 3:1); and did he put even this upon the sole plea of apostolic responsibility (vss. 14-16)? What a contrast is thus presented to hierarchical pride, and in particular to the affected humility of the bishop of this very Rome! How close the bond which the one spirit draws between ministers and people—how wide the separation produced by the other! (2) There is in the Christian Church no real priesthood, and none but figurative sacrifices. Had it been otherwise, it is inconceivable that the 16th verse of this chapter should have been expressed as it is. Paul's only priesthood and sacrificial offerings lay, first, in ministering to them as "the apostle of the Gentiles," not the sacrament with the 'real presence' of Christ in it, or the sacrifice of the mass, but "the Gospel of God," and then, when gathered under the wing of Christ, presenting them to God as a grateful offering, "being sanctified [not by sacrificial gifts, but] by the Holy Ghost." (See Heb. 13:9-16.) (3) Though the debt we owe to those by whom we have been brought to Christ can never be discharged, we should feel it a privilege when we render them any lower benefit in return (vss. 26, 27). (4) Formidable designs against the truth and the servants of Christ should, above all other ways of counteracting them, be met by combined prayer to Him who rules all hearts and controls all events; and the darker the cloud, the more resolutely should all to whom Christ's cause is dear "strive together in their prayers to God" for the removal of it (vss. 30, 31). (5) Christian fellowship is so precious that the most eminent servants of Christ, amid the toils and trials of their work, find it refreshing and invigorating; and it is no good sign of any ecclesiastic, that he deems it beneath him to seek and enjoy it even amongst the humblest saints in the Church of Christ (vss. 24, 32).

ADAM CLARKE

28. When therefore I have performed this service, and have sealed, faithfully delivered up, to them this fruit, of the success of my ministry and of your conversion to God, I will come by you into Spain. This was in his desire; he had fully purposed it, if God should see meet to permit him; but it does not appear that he ever went.

30. For the love of the Spirit. By that love of God which the Holy Spirit sheds abroad in your hearts. That ye strive together. "That you agonize with me." He felt that much depended on the success of his present mission to the Christians at Jerusalem, and their acceptance of the charitable contribution which he was bringing with him, in order to conciliate them to the reception of the Gentiles into the Church of God without obliging them to submit to circumcision.

31. That I may be delivered from them that do not believe. He knew that his countrymen who had not received the gospel lay in wait for his life; and no doubt they thought they should do God service by destroying him, not only as an apostate, in their apprehension, from the Jewish religion, but as one who was laboring to subvert and entirely destroy it. And that my service. But several eminent MSS. read "the gift which I bear." This probably was a gloss, which in many MSS. subverted the word in the text; for service in its connection here could refer to nothing else but the contribution which he was carrying to the poor saints at Jerusalem.

32. That I may come unto you with joy. That his apprehensions of ill usage were not groundless, and the danger to which his life was exposed real, we have already seen in the account given of this visit, Acts xxi—xxiv; and that he had such intimations from the Holy Spirit himself appears from Acts xx. 23; xxi. 11; and xx. 38. Should his journey to Jerusalem be prosperous and his service accepted, so that the converted Jews and Gentiles should come to a better understanding, he hoped to see them at Rome with great joy; and if he got his wishes gratified through their prayers, it would be the full proof that this whole business had been conducted according to the will of God.

33. The God of peace be with you. The whole object of the Epistle is to establish peace between the believing Jews and Gentiles, and to show them their mutual obligations, and the infinite mercy of God to both; and now he concludes with praying that the God of peace—He from whom it comes and by whom it is preserved—may be forever with them. The word Amen at the end does not appear to have been written by the apostle; it is wanting in some of the most ancient MSS.

MATTHEW HENRY

CHAPTER 16

Verses 1-16

I. Here is the recommendation of a friend, by whom (as some think) this epistle was sent—one Phebe, v. 1, 2. It should seem that she was a person of quality and estate, who had business which called her to Rome, where she was a stranger; and therefore Paul recommends her to the acquaintance of the Christians there. Courtesy and Christianity agree well together.

1. He gives a very good character of her. (1) As a sister to Paul: Phebe our sister; not in nature, but in grace. Both Christ and his apostles had some of their best friends among the devout (and upon that account honourable) women. (2) As a servant to the church at Cenchrea: a servant by office, not to preach the word (that was forbidden to women), but in acts of charity and hospitality. Phebe seems to have been a person of some account; and yet it was no disparagement to her to be a servant to the church. Everyone in his place should strive to serve the church, for therein he serves Christ. Cenchrea was a small sea-port town adjoining to Corinth. (3) As a succourer of many, and particularly of Paul, v. 2. She relieved many that were in want and distress. Her bounty was extensive, she was a succourer of many. Observe the gratitude of Paul in mentioning her particular kindness to him: And to myself also. Acknowledgment of favours is the least return we can make.

2. He recommends her to their care. "Receive her in the Lord. Entertain her; bid her welcome, as a servant and friend of Christ." As it becometh saints to receive, who love Christ, and therefore love all that are his for his sake; or, as becometh saints to be received, with love and honour. Assist her in whatsoever business she has need of you. Being a woman, a stranger, a Christian, she had need of help: and Paul engaged them to be assistant to her. It becomes Christians to be helpful one to another in their affairs, especially to be helpful to strangers; for we are members one of another. Paul bespeaks help for one that had been so helpful to many.

II. Here are commendations to some particular friends among those to whom he wrote. Though the care of all the churches came upon Paul daily, enough to distract an ordinary head, yet he could retain the remembrance of so many; and his heart was so full of love and affection as to send salutations to each of them. Greet them, salute them; it is the same word, "Let them know that I remember them."

1. Concerning Aquila and Priscilla, a famous couple, that Paul had a special kindness for. They were originally of Rome, but were banished thence by the edict of Claudius, Acts xviii. 2. At Corinth, Paul became acquainted with them, wrought with them at the trade of tent-making; after some time, they returned to Rome. He calls them his helpers in Christ Jesus. Nay, they did not only do much, but they ventured much, for Paul: They have for my life laid down their own necks. They exposed themselves to secure Paul, hazarded their own lives for the preservation of his. Paul was in a great deal of danger at Corinth; but they sheltered him. It was a good while ago that they had done Paul this kindness; and yet he speaks as feelingly of it as if it had been but yesterday. To whom not only I give thanks, but also all the churches of the Gentiles; who were all beholden to these good people for helping to save the life of him that was the apostle of the Gentiles. He sends likewise greeting to the church in their house, v. 5. Religion reigning in a family, will turn a house into a church. It had a good influence upon this that Priscilla the good wife of the family was so very eminent and forward in religion, so eminent that she is often named first. When Priscilla and Aquila were at Ephesus, though but sojourners there, yet there also they had a church in their house, 1 Cor. xvi. 19. A truly godly man will be careful to take religion along with him wherever he goes.

2. Concerning Epenetus, v. 5. He calls him his well-beloved. Endearing language should pass among Christians to express love, and to engage love. So he calls Amplias, beloved in the Lord; and Stachys, his beloved. Of Epenetus it is further said that he was the first-fruit of Achaia unto Christ: one that was offered up to God by Paul, as the first-fruits of his ministry there; an earnest of a great harvest; for in Corinth, the chief city of Achaia, God had much people, Acts xviii. 10. Special respect is to be paid to those that set out early, and come to work in the vineyard at the first hour.

3. Concerning Mary, and some others. Mary, who bestowed much labour on us. True love never sticks at labour, but rather takes a pleasure in it;

CHAPTER 16

Vss. 1-27. CONCLUSION, EMBRACING SUNDRY SALUTATIONS AND DIRECTIONS, AND A CLOSING PRAYER. 1. I commend unto you Phœbe our sister, which is a servant—or 'deaconess'—of the church which is at Cenchrea—The word is Cenchreæ, the eastern part of Corinth (Acts 18:18). That in the earliest churches there were deaconesses, to attend to the wants of the female members, there is no good reason to doubt. So early at least as the reign of Trajan, we learn from PLINY'S celebrated letter to that emperor—A.D. 110, or 111—that they existed in the Eastern churches. Indeed, from the relation in which the sexes then stood to each other, something of this sort would seem to have been a necessity. Modern attempts, however, to revive this office have seldom found favor; either from the altered state of society, or the abuse of the office, or both.

2. Receive her in the Lord—i.e., as a genuine disciple of the Lord Jesus. as—'so as'—becometh saints—so as saints should receive saints. assist her in whatsoever business she hath—'may have'—need of you—some private business of her own. for she hath been a succourer of many, and of myself also—(See Ps. 41:1-3; II Tim. 1:16-18).

3-5. Salute Priscilla—The true reading here is 'Prisca' (as in II Tim. 4:19), a contracted form of Priscilla, as "Silas" of "Silvanus." and Aquila my helpers—The wife is here named before the husband (as in Acts 18:18, and vs. 26, according to the true reading; also in II Tim. 4:19), probably as being the more prominent and helpful to the Church. who have for my life laid down—'who did for my life lay down'—their own necks—i.e., risked their lives; either at Corinth (Acts 18:6, 9, 10), or more probably at Ephesus (Acts 19:30, 31; and cf. I Cor. 15:32). They must have returned from Ephesus (where we last find them in the history of the Acts) to Rome, whence the edict of Claudius had banished them (Acts 18:2); and doubtless, if not the principal members of that Christian community, they were at least the most endeared to our apostle. unto whom not only I give thanks, but also all the churches of the Gentiles—whose special apostle this dear couple had rescued from imminent danger. 5. Likewise the church that is in their house—The Christian assembly that statedly met there for worship. "From his occupation as tent-maker, he had probably better accommodations for the meetings of the church than most other Christians" [HODGE]. Probably this devoted couple had written to the apostle such an account of the stated meetings at their house, as made him feel at home with them, and include them in this salutation, which doubtless would be read at their meetings with peculiar interest. Salute my well beloved Epænetus, who is the first fruits—i.e., the first convert—of Achaia unto Christ—The true reading here, as appears by the MSS., is, 'the first fruits of Asia unto Christ'—i.e., Proconsular Asia (see Acts 16:6). In I Corinthians 16:15 it is said that "the household of Stephanas was the first fruit of Achaia"; and though if Epænetus was one of that family, the two statements might be reconciled according to the received text, there is no need to resort to this supposition, as that text is in this instance without authority. Epænetus, as the first believer in that region called Proconsular Asia, was dear to the apostle. (See Hos. 9:10; and Mic. 7:1). None of the names mentioned from vss. 5-15 are otherwise known. One wonders at the number of them, considering that the writer had never been at Rome. But as Rome was then the center of the civilized world, to and from which journeys were continually taken to the remotest parts, there is no great difficulty in supposing that so active a travelling missionary as Paul would, in course of time, make the acquaintance of a considerable number of the Christians then residing at Rome. 6. Greet—or 'salute'—Mary, who bestowed much labour on us—labor, no doubt, of a womanly kind.

CHAPTER 16

1. I commend unto you Phebe. As the apostle had not been at Rome previously to his writing this Epistle, he could not have had a personal acquaintance with those members of the church there to whom he sends these friendly salutations. It is likely that many of them were his own converts, who in different parts of Asia Minor and Greece had heard him preach the gospel and afterwards became settlers at Rome. Phoebe is here termed a servant, "a deaconess" of the church . . . at Cenchrea. There were deaconesses in the primitive Church, whose business it was to attend the female converts at baptism; to instruct the catechumens, or persons who were candidates for baptism; to visit the sick, and those who were in prison; and, in short, perform those religious offices for the female part of the Church which could not with propriety be performed by men. They were chosen in general out of the most experienced of the Church, and were ordinarily widows who had borne children. Some ancient constitutions required them to be forty, others fifty, and others sixty years of age. It is evident that they were ordained to their office by the imposition of the hands of the bishop, and the form of prayer used on the occasion is extant in the apostolical constitutions. In the tenth or eleventh century the order became extinct in the Latin church, but continued in the Greek church till the end of the twelfth century. Cenchrea was a seaport on the east side of the isthmus which joined the Morea to Greece, as Lechaeum was the seaport on the west side of the same isthmus.

2. Succourer of many. One who probably entertained the apostles and preachers who came to minister at Cenchrea, and who was remarkable for entertaining strangers.

3. Greet Priscilla and Aquila. This pious couple had been obliged to leave Rome, on the edict of Claudius, see Acts xviii. 2, and take refuge in Greece. It is likely that they returned to Rome at the death of Claudius, or whenever the decree was annulled. It seems they had greatly contributed to assist the apostle in his important labors. Instead of "Priscilla," the principal MSS. and versions have "Prisca," which most critics suppose to be the genuine reading.

4. Who have for my life laid down their own necks. What transaction this refers to we know not; but it appears that these persons had on some occasion hazarded their own lives to save that of the apostle, and that the fact was known to all the churches of God in that quarter, who felt themselves under the highest obligations to these pious persons for the important service which they had thus rendered.

5. The church that is in their house. In these primitive times no such places existed as those which we now term churches; the word always signifying the "congregation" or "assembly" of believers, and not the place they assembled in.

Epaenetus . . . the firstfruits of Achaia. In 1 Cor. xvi. 15, the house or family of Stephanas is said to be the firstfruits of Achaia. How then can it be said here that Epenetus was the firstfruits, or first person who had received the gospel in that district? Ans.—Epenetus might have been one of the family of Stephanas; for it is not said that Stephanas was the firstfruits, but his house or family; and there can be no impropriety in supposing that one of that house or family was called Epenetus; and that this person, being the only one of the family now at Rome, might be mentioned as the firstfruits of Achaia. This would rationally account for the apparent difficulty were we sure that of Achaia was the true reading; but this is more than doubtful, for of Asia is the reading of several MSS.

6. Greet Mary, who bestowed much labour on us. Who this Mary was or what the labour was which she bestowed upon the apostles, we know where there is much love there will be much labour. He says of Tryphena and Tryphosa that they laboured in the Lord (v. 12), and of the beloved Persis, that she laboured much in the Lord, abounding more in the work of the Lord.

4. Concerning Andronicus and Junia, v. 7. Some take them for a man and his wife. They were Paul's cousins, akin to him; so was Herodion, v. 11. Religion does not take away, but sanctifies, and improves, our respect to our kindred, engaging us to rejoice in them the more, when we find them related to Christ by faith. They were his fellow-prisoners. Partnership in suffering sometimes does much towards the union of souls and the knitting of affections. They were of note among the apostles. They were eminent for knowledge, and gifts, and graces, which made them famous among the apostles.

Who also were in Christ before me. In time they had the start of Paul. How ready was Paul to acknowledge in others any kind of precedency!

5. Concerning Apelles, who is here said to be approved in Christ (v. 10), a high character! One that had been tried; his friends and enemies had tried him, and he was as gold, a man that one might trust and repose a confidence in.

6. Concerning Aristobulus and Narcissus; notice is taken of their household, v. 10, 11. Those of their household who are in the Lord (as it is limited, v. 11), that were Christians. How studious was Paul to leave none out of his salutations that he had any knowledge of or acquaintance with!

7. Concerning Rufus (v. 13), chosen in the Lord. He was a choice Christian, whose gifts and graces evinced that he was eternally chosen in Christ Jesus.

—And his mother and mine, his mother by nature and mine by Christian love. This good woman, upon some occasion, or other, had been as a mother to Paul, and Paul here gratefully owns it.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

7. Andronicus and Junia—or, as it might be, 'Junias,' a contracted form of 'Julianus'; in this case, it is a man's name. But if, as is more probable, the word be, as in our version, "Junia," the person meant was no doubt either the wife or the sister of Andronicus. my kinsmen—or, 'relatives.' and my fellow prisoners—on what occasion, it is impossible to say, as the apostle elsewhere tells us that he was "in prisons more frequent" (II Cor. 11:23). which are of note among the apostles—Those who think the word "apostle" is used in a lax sense, in the Acts and Epistles, take this to mean 'noted apostles' [CHRYSOSTOM, LUTHER, CALVIN, BENGEL, OLSHAUSEN, THOLUCK, ALFORD, JOWETT]; others, who are not clear that the word "apostle" is applied to any without the circle of the Twelve, save where the connection or some qualifying words show that the literal meaning of 'one sent' is the thing intended, understand by the expression used here, 'persons esteemed by the apostles' [BEZA, GROTIUS, DE WETTE, MEYER, FRITZSCHE, STUART, PHILIPPI, HODGE]. And of course, if "Junia" is to be taken for a woman, this latter must be the meaning. who also were in Christ before me—The apostle writes as if he envied them this priority in the faith. And, indeed, if to be "in Christ" be the most enviable human condition, the earlier the date of this blessed translation, the greater the grace of it. This latter statement about Andronicus and Junia seems to throw some light on the preceding one. Very possibly they may have been among the first fruits of Peter's labors, gained to Christ either on the day of Pentecost or on some of the succeeding days. In that case they may have attracted the special esteem of those apostles who for some time resided chiefly at Jerusalem and its neighborhood; and our apostle, though he came late in contact with the other apostles, if he was aware of this fact, would have pleasure in alluding to it. 8. Amplias—a contracted form of 'Ampliatus' —my beloved in the Lord—an expression of dear Christian affection. 9, 10. Urbane—rather, 'Urbanus.' It is a man's name. our helper—'fellow labourer'—in Christ. Salute Apelles approved—'the approved'—in Christ—or, as we should say, 'that tried Christian'; a noble commendation. Salute them which are of Aristobulus' household—It would seem, from what is said of Narcissus in the following verse, that this Aristobulus himself had not been a Christian; but that the Christians of his household simply were meant; very possibly some of his slaves. 11. Salute Herodion, my kinsman—(See on vs. 7), Greet them that be of the household of Narcissus, which are in the Lord—which implies that others in his house, including probably himself, were not Christians. 12. Salute Tryphena and Tryphosa, who labour in the Lord—two active women. Salute the beloved Persis—another woman—which laboured much in the Lord—referring probably, not to official services, such as would fall to the deaconesses, but to such higher Christian labors—yet within the sphere competent to woman—as Priscilla bestowed on Apollos and others (Acts 18:18). 13. Salute Rufus, chosen—'the chosen'—in the Lord—meaning, not 'who is one of the elect,' as every believer is, but 'the choice' or 'precious one' in the Lord. (See I Pet. 2:4; II John 13.) We read in Mark 15:21 that Simon of Cyrene, who was compelled to bear our Lord's cross, was "the father of Alexander and Rufus." From this we naturally conclude that when Mark wrote his Gospel, Alexander and Rufus must have been well known as Christians among those by whom he expected his Gospel to be first read; and, in all likelihood, this was that very "Rufus"; in which case our interest is deepened by what immediately follows about his mother. and—salute —his mother and mine—The apostle calls her "his own mother," not so much as our Lord calls every elderly woman believer His mother (Matt. 12:49, 50), but in grateful acknowledgment of her motherly attentions to himself, bestowed no doubt for his Master's sake, and the love she bore to his honored servants. To us it seems altogether likely that the conversion of Simon the Cyrenian dated from that memorable day when "passing [casually] by, as he came from the country" (Mark 15:21), "they compelled him to bear the" Saviour's cross. Sweet compulsion, if what he thus beheld issued in his voluntarily taking up his own cross! Through him it is natural to suppose that his wife would be brought in, and that this believing couple, now "heirs together of the grace of life" (I Peter 3:7), as they told their two sons, Alexander and Rufus, what honor had unwittingly been put upon their father at that hour of deepest and dearest moment to all Christians, might be blessed to the inbringing of both of them to Christ. In this case, sup-not. Her works, though hidden from man, are with God and her name is recorded with honor in this book of life.

7. Andronicus and Junia, my kinsmen. As the word signifies "relatives," whether male or female, and as Junia may probably be the name of a woman, the wife of Andronicus, it would be better to say "relatives" than kinsmen. But probably Paul means no more than that they were Jews; for in chap. ix. 3 he calls all the Jews his "kinsmen according to the flesh." My fellowprisoners. As Paul was in prison often, it is likely that these persons shared this honor with him on some occasion, which is not distinctly marked. Of note among the apostles. Whether this intimates that they were noted apostles or only highly reputed by the apostles is not absolutely clear, but the latter appears to me the most probable. They were well-known not only to Paul but also to the rest of the apostles. In Christ before me. That is, they were converted to Christianity before Paul was; probably at the Day of Pentecost, or by the ministry of Christ himself, or by that of the seventy disciples.

8. Amplias my beloved in the Lord. One who is my "particular friend," and also a genuine Christian.

9. Urbane, our helper. Who this Urbanus was we know not; what is here stated is that he had been a fellow laborer with the apostles. Stachys my beloved. One of my "particular friends."

10. Apelles approved in Christ. A man who, on different occasions, had given the highest proofs of the sincerity and depth of his religion. Some suppose that Apelles was the same with Apollos. Whoever he was, he had given every demonstration of being a genuine Christian. Of Aristobulus' household. It is doubted whether this person was converted, as the apostle does not salute him, but his household; or as the margin reads, "his friends." He might have been a Roman of considerable distinction who, though not converted himself, had Christians among his servants or his slaves. But whatever he was, it is likely that he was dead at this time, and therefore only those of his household are referred to by the apostle.

11. Herodion my kinsman. Probably another converted Jew. See on v. 7. Of the household of Narcissus. Probably dead also, as we have supposed Aristobulus to have been at this time. Which are in the Lord. This might intimate that some of this family were not Christians, those only of that family that were converted to the Lord being saluted.

12. Tryphena and Tryphosa. Two holy women, who it seems were assistants to the apostle in his work, probably by exhorting, visiting the sick, etc. Persis was another woman who it seems excelled the preceding; for of her it is said, She laboured much in the Lord. We learn from this that Christian women as well as men labored in the ministry of the Word. In those times of simplicity all persons, whether men or women, who had received the knowledge of the truth believed it to be their duty to propagate it to the uttermost of their power.

13. Rufus chosen in the Lord. One of great excellence in Christianity; a "choice" man, as we would say. So the word often signifies. His mother and mine. It is not likely that the mother of Rufus was the mother of Paul; but while she was the natural mother of the former, she acted as a mother to the latter. We say of a person of this character that she is a "motherly" woman. Among the ancients, he or she who acted a kind, instructing, and indulgent part to another was styled the "father" or "mother" of such a one.

MATTHEW HENRY

8. Concerning the rest, he salutes the brethren who are with them (v. 14), and the saints who are with them (v. 15). It is the good property of saints to delight in being together; and Paul thus joins them together in his salutations to endear them one to another. In Christian congregations there should be smaller societies linked together in love and converse.

Lastly, He concludes with the recommendation of them to the love and embraces one of another: Salute one another with a holy kiss. Mutual salutations, as they express love, so they increase and strengthen love. Paul here encourages the use of them, and only directs that they may be holy. He adds, in the close, a general salutation to them all, in the name of the churches of Christ (v. 16): "The churches of Christ salute you; that is, the churches which I am with desire me to testify their affection to you and good wishes for you." This is one way of maintaining the communion of saints.

A caution to take heed of those whose principles and practices were destructive to Christian love.

I. The caution itself: I beseech you, brethren. He does not will and command, but for love's sake beseeches. He teaches them, 1. To see their danger: Mark those who cause divisions and offences. Our Master had himself foretold that divisions and offences would come, and against such we are here cautioned. Those who burden the church with dividing and offending impositions cause divisions and offences, contrary to, or different from, the doctrine which we have learned. If truth be once deserted, unity and peace will not last long. Now, mark those that thus cause divisions. There is need of a piercing watchful eye to discern the danger we are in from such people; for commonly the pretences are plausible, when the projects are very pernicious. A danger discovered is half prevented. 2. To shun it: "Avoid them. Shun all unnecessary communion and communication with them, lest you be leavened and infected by them.—Their word will eat as doth a canker." Some think he especially warns them to take heed of the judaizing teachers.

II. The reasons to enforce this caution.

1. Because of the pernicious policy of these seducers, v. 18. His description of them, in two things: (1) The master they serve: not our Lord Jesus Christ. Though they call themselves Christians, they do not serve Christ, whatever they pretend. But they serve their own belly. It is some base lust or other that they are pleasing. Their God is their belly, Phil. iii. 19. What a base master do they serve, and how unworthy to come in competition with Christ. (2) The method they take to compass their design: By good words and fair speeches they deceive the hearts of the simple. Their words and speeches have a show of holiness and zeal for God (it is an easy thing to be godly from the teeth outward), and a show of kindness and love to those into whom they instil their corrupt doctrines. We have great need therefore to keep our hearts with all diligence.

2. Because of the peril we are in: "For your obedience has come abroad unto all men—you are noted in all the churches for a willing, tractable, complying people." (1) Therefore, because it was so, these seducing teachers would be the more apt to assault them. "The false teachers hear that you are an obedient people, and therefore they will be likely to come among you, to see if you will be obedient to them." (2) Though it were so, yet they were in danger from these seducers. This Paul suggests, not as one suspicious of them, but as one solicitous for them: "Your obedience has come abroad unto all men; I am glad therefore on your behalf." Thus does he insinuate their commendation, the better to make way for the caution. "You must not be secure: I would have you wise unto that which is good, and simple concerning evil." A pliable temper is good when it is under good government; but otherwise it may be very ensnaring. Two general rules: [1] To be wise unto that which is good. There is need of a great deal of wisdom in our adherence to good truths, and good duties, and good people, lest in any of these we be imposed upon and deluded. [2] To be simple concerning evil—so wise as not to be deceived, and yet so simple as not to be deceivers. The wisdom of the serpent becomes Christians, but not the subtlety of the old serpent. That is a wisely simple man that knows not how to do anything against the truth. Now Paul was the more solicitous for the Roman church, because it was so famous; it was a city upon a hill, and many eyes were upon the Christians there.

3. Because of the promise of God, that we shall have victory at last (v. 20): The God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet.

posing the elder of the two to have departed to be with Christ ere this letter was written, or to have been residing in some other place, and Rufus left alone with his mother, how instructive and beautiful is the testimony here borne to her! 14, 15. Salute Asyncritus . . .—These have been thought to be the names of ten less notable Christians than those already named. But this will hardly be supposed if it be observed that they are divided into two pairs of five each, and that after the first of these pairs it is added, "and the brethren which are with them," while after the second pair we have the words, "and all the saints which are with them." This perhaps hardly means that each of the five in both pairs had "a church at his house," else probably this would have been more expressly said. But at least it would seem to indicate that they were each a center of some few Christians who met at his house—it may be for further instruction, for prayer, for missionary purposes, or for some other Christian objects. These little peeps into the rudimental forms which Christian fellowship first took in the great cities, though too indistinct for more than conjecture, are singularly interesting. Our apostle would seem to have been kept minutely informed as to the state of the church at Rome, both as to its membership and its varied activities, probably by Priscilla and Aquila. 16. Salute one another with an holy kiss—So I Corinthians 16:20; I Thessalonians 5:26; I Peter 5:14. The custom prevailed among the Jews, and doubtless came from the East, where it still obtains. Its adoption into the Christian churches, as the symbol of a higher fellowship than it had ever expressed before, was probably as immediate as it was natural. In this case the apostle's desire seems to be that on receipt of his epistle, with its salutations, they should in this manner expressly testify their Christian affection. It afterwards came to have a fixed place in the church service, immediately after the celebration of the Supper, and continued long in use. In such matters, however, the state of society and the peculiarities of different places require to be studied. The churches of Christ salute you—The true reading is, 'All the churches'; the word "all" gradually falling out, as seeming probably to express more than the apostle would venture to affirm. But no more seems meant than to assure the Romans in what affectionate esteem they were held by the churches generally; all that knew he was writing to Rome having expressly asked their own salutations to be sent to them. (See vs. 19.) 17. Now I beseech you, brethren, mark them which cause divisions and offences contrary to the doctrine which ye have learned—'which ye learned'—and avoid them—The fomentors of "divisions" here referred to are probably those who were unfriendly to the truths taught in this epistle, while those who caused "offenses" were probably those referred to in ch. 14:15 as haughtily disregarding the prejudices of the weak. The direction as to both is, first, to "mark" such, lest the evil should be done ere it was fully discovered; and next, to "avoid" them (cf. II Thess. 3:6, 14), so as neither to bear any responsibility for their procedure, nor seem to give them the least countenance. 18. For they that are such serve not our Lord Jesus Christ—'our Lord Christ' appears to be the true reading. but their own belly—not in the grosser sense, but as 'living for low ends of their own' (cf. Phil. 3:19). and by good words and fair speeches deceive the simple—the unwary, the unsuspecting. (See Prov. 14:15.) 19. For your obedience—i.e., tractableness—is come abroad unto all. I am glad therefore on your behalf—'I rejoice therefore over you,' seems the true reading. but yet I would have you wise unto that which is good, and simple—'harmless,' as in Matthew 10:16, from which the warning is taken—concerning—'unto'—evil—'Your reputation among the churches for subjection to the teaching ye have received is to me sufficient ground of confidence in you; but ye need the serpent's wisdom to discriminate between transparent truth and plausible error, with that guileless simplicity which instinctively cleaves to the one and rejects the other.'

20. And the God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly—The apostle encourages the Romans to persevere in resisting the wiles of the devil

ADAM CLARKE

14. Salute Asyncritus . . . Who these were we know not. Hermas was probably the same to whom a work called the Shepherd is attributed; a work with this title is still extant, and may be found among the writings of the apostolical fathers. But it is in vain to look for identity of persons in similarity of names, for among the Greeks and Romans at this time there were many persons who bore the same names mentioned in this chapter.

15. Salute Philologus. Of these several persons, though much has been conjectured, nothing certain is known. Even the names of some are so ambiguous that we know not whether they were men or women. They were persons well-known to Paul, and undoubtedly were such as had gone from different places where the apostle had preached to sojourn or settle at Rome. One thing we may remark, that there is no mention of Peter, who, according to the Roman and papistical catalogue of bishops, must have been at Rome at this time. If he were not now at Rome, the foundation stone of Rome's ascendancy, of Peter's supremacy, and of the uninterrupted succession is taken away, and the whole fabric falls to the ground. But if Peter were at Rome at this time, Paul would have sent his salutations to him in the first place.

16. Salute one another with an holy kiss. In those early times the kiss, as a token of peace, friendship, and brotherly love, was frequent among all people; and the Christians used it in their public assemblies, as well as in their occasional meetings. This was at last laid aside, not because it was abused, but because, the Church becoming very numerous, the thing was impossible. In some countries the kiss of friendship is still common; and in such countries it is scarcely ever abused, nor is it an incentive to evil because it is customary and common. Shaking of hands is now substituted for it in almost all Christian congregations. The churches of Christ salute you. The word all is added here by some of the most reputable MSS. and principal versions. Paul must mean, here, that all the churches in Greece and Asia, through which he had passed, in which the faith of the Christians at Rome was known, spoke of them affectionately and honorably; and probably knowing the apostle's design of visiting Rome, desired to be kindly remembered to the church in that city.

18. They . . . serve not our Lord Jesus. They profess to be apostles, but they are not apostles of Christ; they neither do His will nor preach His doctrine. They serve their own belly—they have intruded themselves into the Church of Christ that they might get a secular support; it is for worldly gain alone that they take up the profession of the ministry. They have no divine credentials; they convert not the heathen nor the ungodly, for they have no divine unction. But by good words and fair speeches (for they have no miraculous nor saving powers) deceive the hearts of the simple, perverting Christian converts, that they may get their property, and thus secure a maintenance for themselves.

19. For your obedience is come abroad. The apostle gives this as a reason why they should continue to hear and heed those who had led them into the path of truth, and avoid those false teachers whose doctrines tended to the subversion of their souls. Yet I would have you wise. I would wish you carefully to discern the good from the evil, and to show your wisdom by carefully avoiding the one and cleaving to the other.

20. The God of peace. Who neither sends nor favors such disturbers of the tranquility of His Church. Shall bruise Satan. Shall give you the

MATTHEW HENRY

(1) The titles he gives to God: The God of peace. When we come to God for spiritual victories, we must not only eye him as the Lord of hosts, whose all power is, but as the God of peace, a God at peace with us, creating peace for us. Victory comes from God more as the God of peace than as the God of war.

(2) The blessing he expects from God—a victory over Satan. Satan tempting and troubling, acting as a deceiver and as a destroyer, the God of peace will bruise under our feet. "Though you cannot overcome in your own strength and wisdom, yet the God of peace will do it for you." [1] The victory shall be complete: He shall bruise Satan under your feet, plainly alluding to the first promise the Messiah made in paradise (Gen. iii. 15). Christ hath overcome for us, and we have nothing to do but to pursue the victory. Let this quicken us to our spiritual conflict, to fight the good fight of faith. [2] The victory shall be speedy: He shall do it shortly. It will encourage soldiers when they know the war will be at an end quickly, in such a victory. It is the victory which all the saints shall have over Satan when they come to heaven, together with the present victories which through grace they obtain in earnest of that. Hold out therefore, faith and patience, yet a little while! The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. If the grace of Christ be with us, who can be against us so as to prevail? Paul, not only as a friend, but as an apostle, thus with authority blesses them, and repeats it, v. 24.

Verses 21-24

He here adds an affectionate remembrance of them from some particular persons who were now with him. 1. Some that were his particular friends. Timotheus my work-fellow. Paul sometimes calls Timothy his son; but here he styles him his work-fellow, as one equal with him. Lucius, probably Lucius of Cyrene, a noted man in the church of Antioch (Acts xiii. 1). Sosipater, supposed to be the same with Sopater of Berea, mentioned Acts xx. 4. These Paul calls his kinsmen. It is a very great comfort to see the holiness and usefulness of our kindred. 2. One that was Paul's amanuensis (v. 22): I Tertius, who wrote this epistle. Paul made use of a scribe because he wrote a bad hand, which was not very legible, which he excuses, when he writes to the Galatians with his own hand (Gal. vi. 11). The least piece of service done to the church shall not pass without a remembrance and a recompence. 3. Some others that were of note among the Christians (v. 23): Gaius my host. Paul commends him for his great hospitality; not only my host, but of the whole church.

Erastus, the chamberlain of the city, is another; he means the city of Corinth. It seems he was a person of honour and account, one in public place. Not many mighty, not many noble, are called, but some are.

Quartus is likewise mentioned, and called a brother.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

with the assurance that, as good soldiers of Jesus Christ, they are "shortly" to receive their discharge, and have the satisfaction of "putting their feet upon the neck" of that formidable enemy—symbol familiar, probably, in all languages to express not only the completeness of the defeat, but the abject humiliation of the conquered foe. (See Josh. 10:24; II Sam. 22:41; Ezek. 21:29; Ps. 91:13.) Though the apostle here styles Him who is thus to bruise Satan, the God of peace," with special reference to the "divisions" (vs. 17) by which the church at Rome was in danger of being disturbed, this sublime appellation of God has here a wider sense, pointing to the whole "purpose for which the Son of God was manifested, to destroy the works of the devil" (I John 3:8); and indeed this assurance is but a reproduction of the first great promise, that the Seed of the woman should bruise the Serpent's head (Gen. 3:15). The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen—The "Amen" here has no MS. authority. What comes after this, where one would have expected the epistle to close, has its parallel in Philippians 4:20, etc., and being in fact common in epistolary writings, is simply a mark of genuineness. 21. Timotheus, my work-fellow—'my fellow labourer'; see Acts 16:1-5. The apostle mentions him here rather than in the opening address to this church, as he had not been at Rome [BENGEL]. and Lucius—not Luke, for the fuller form of 'Lucas' is not 'Lucius' but 'Lucanus.' The person meant seems to be "Lucius of Cyrene," who was among the "prophets and teachers" at Antioch with our apostle, before he was summoned into the missionary field (Acts 13:1). and Jason—See Acts 17:5. He had probably accompanied or followed the apostle from Thessalonica to Corinth. Sosipater—See Acts 20:4. 22. I, Tertius, who wrote this—'the'—epistle—as the apostle's amanuensis, or penman—salute you in the Lord—So usually did the apostle dictate his epistles, that he calls the attention of the Galatians to the fact that to them he wrote with his own hand (Gal. 6:11). But this Tertius would have the Romans to know that, far from being a mere scribe, his heart went out to them in Christian affection; and the apostle, by giving his salutation a place here, would show what sort of assistants he employed. 23. Gaius mine host, and—the host—of the whole church—See Acts 20:4. It would appear that he was one of only two persons whom Paul baptized with his own hand (cf. III John 1). His Christian hospitality appears to have been something uncommon.

Erastus the chamberlain—'treasurer'—of the city—doubtless of Corinth. (See Acts 19:22; II Tim. 4:20.)

Quartus a brother—rather, 'the' or 'our brother'; as Sosthenes and Timothy are called (I Cor. 1:1, and II Cor. 1:1 (Greek). Nothing more is known of this Quartus.

24. The grace, . . .—a repetition of the benediction precisely as in vs. 20, save that it is here invoked on them "all."

dominion over the great adversary of your souls, and over all his agents who, through his influence, endeavor to destroy your peace and subvert your minds. Several critics suppose that the word Satan is a sort of collective term here, by which all opposers and adversaries are meant, and especially those false teachers to whom he refers above. The grace of our Lord. That you may be truly wise, simple, obedient, and steady in the truth, may the favor or gracious influence of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you—without which you cannot be preserved from evil, nor do anything that is good.

Here the apostle appears to have intended to conclude his Epistle; but afterwards he added a postscript, if not two, as we shall see below. Several ancient MSS. omit the whole of this clause, probably thinking that it had been borrowed from v. 24. But on the ground that the apostle might have added a postscript or two, not having immediate opportunity to send the Epistle, there is no need for this supposition.

21. Timotheus my workfellow. This is on all hands allowed to be the same Timothy to whom Paul directs the two Epistles which are still extant. Lucius. This was probably Luke, the Evangelist, and writer of the book called the Acts of the Apostles. Jason. It is likely that this is the same person mentioned in Acts xvii. 7, who at Thessalonica received the apostles into his house, and befriended them at the risk of both his property and life. Sosipater. He was a Berean, the son of one Pyrrhus, a Jew by birth, and accompanied Paul from Greece into Asia, and probably into Judea. See Acts xx. 4.

22. I Tertius, who wrote this epistle. It appears that Paul dictated it to him, and he wrote it down from the apostle's mouth, and here introduces himself as joining with Paul in affectionate wishes for their welfare. Salute you in the Lord. I wish you well in the name of the Lord: or, I feel for you that affectionate respect which the grace of the Lord Jesus inspires. It is not clear whether the following two verses be the words of Tertius or of Paul.

23. Gaius mine host. Gaius in Greek is the same as Caius in Latin, which was a very common name among the Romans. Luke (Acts xix. 29) mentions one "Gaius of Macedonia," who was exposed to much violence at Ephesus in the tumult excited by Demetrius the silversmith against Paul and his companions; and it is very possible that this was the same person. He is here called not only the host, the "entertainer" of Paul, or Tertius (if he wrote this and the following verse), but also of the whole church; that is, he received and lodged the apostles who came from different places, as well as the messengers of the churches. Erastus the chamberlain of the city. "Treasurer of the city" of Corinth, from which Paul wrote this Epistle. This is supposed to be the same person as is mentioned in Acts xix. 22. He was one of Paul's companions, and, as appears from 2 Tim. iv. 20, was left about this time by the apostle at Corinth. He is called the chamberlain, which signifies the same as "treasurer," he to whom the receipt and expenditure of the public money were intrusted. Such persons were in very high credit; and if Erastus was at this time treasurer, it would appear that Christianity was then in considerable repute in Corinth. But if the Erastus of the Acts was the same with the Erastus mentioned here, it is not likely that he now held the office, for this could not at all comport with his travelling with Paul. Hence several, both ancients and moderns, who believe the identity of the persons, suppose that Erastus was not now treasurer, but that having formerly been so, he still retained the title. Chrysostom thought that he still retained the employment. Quartus a brother. Whether the brother of Erastus or of Tertius we know not; probably nothing more is meant than that he was a Christian—one of the heavenly family, a brother in the Lord.

24. The grace of our Lord. This is the conclusion of Tertius, and is similar to what Paul used above. Hence it is possible that Tertius wrote the whole of the twenty-second, twenty-third, and twenty-fourth verses without receiving any particular instructions from Paul, except the bare permission to add his own salutations with those of his particular friends. There is a great deal of disagreement among the

Verses 25–27

Here the apostle solemnly closes his epistle with a magnificent ascription of glory to the blessed God. He does, as it were, breathe out his soul to those Romans in the praise of God.

I. A description of the gospel of God, which comes in in a parenthesis. To establish you according to my gospel. Paul calls it his gospel, because he was the preacher of it. Paul had his head and heart so full of the gospel that he could scarcely mention it without a digression to set forth the nature and excellency of it.

1. It is the preaching of Jesus Christ. The sum and substance of the whole gospel is Jesus Christ and him crucified. We preach not ourselves, says Paul, but Christ Jesus the Lord. That which establishes souls is the plain preaching of Jesus Christ.

2. It is the revelation of the mystery which was kept secret since the world began, and by the scriptures of the prophets made known. The subject-matter of the gospel is a mystery. Blessed be God, there is as much of this mystery made plain as will suffice to bring us to heaven, if we do not wilfully neglect so great salvation.

(1) This mystery was kept secret since the world began: It was wrapped up in silence from eternity; so some. Before the foundation of the world was laid, the mystery was hid in God, Eph. iii. 9. Or, since the world began, so we translate it. During all the times of the Old Testament this mystery was comparatively kept secret. Thus it was hid from ages and generations, even among the Jews, much more among the Gentiles. Even the disciples of Christ themselves, before his resurrection and ascension, were very much in the dark about the mystery of redemption.

(2) It is now made manifest. The shadows of the evening are done away, and the Sun of righteousness has risen upon the world. But how is it made manifest by the scriptures of the prophets? Surely, because now the event has given the best exposition to the prophecies of the Old Testament. Being accomplished, they are explained. The Old Testament does not only borrow light from, but return light to, the revelation of the New Testament. Now Christ appears to have been the treasure hid in the field of the Old Testament. To him bear all the prophets witness. See Luke xxiv. 27.

(3) It is manifested according to the commandment of the everlasting God. Lest any should object, "Why was this mystery kept secret so long, and why made manifest now?"—he resolves it into the will of God. The everlasting God. He is from everlasting. He is to everlasting. We must never look for any new revelation, but abide by this, for this is according to the commandment of the everlasting God. Christ, in the gospel, is the same yesterday, today, and for ever.

(4) It is made known to all nations for the obedience of faith. The extent of this revelation he often takes notice of. Christ is salvation to the ends of the earth, to all nations. And the design of it is very observable; it is for the obedience of faith. The gospel is revealed, not to be talked of, and disputed about, but to be submitted to. See here what is the right faith—even that which works in obedience; and what is the right obedience—even that which springs from faith; and what is the design of the gospel—to bring us to both.

II. A doxology to that God whose gospel it is, ascribing glory to him for ever (v. 27).

1. The matter of this praise. In thanking God, we fasten upon his favours, to us; in praising and adoring God, we fasten upon his perfections in himself. Two of his principal attributes are here taken notice of: (1) His power (v. 25): To him that is of power to establish you. It is no less than a divine power that establishes the saints. In giving God the glory of this power we may, and must, take to ourselves the comfort of it—that whatever our doubts, and difficulties, and fears, may be, our God, whom we serve, is of power to establish us. (2) His wisdom (v. 27): To God only wise. Power to effect without wisdom to contrive, and wisdom to contrive without power to effect, are alike vain and fruitless; but both together, and both infinite, make a perfect being. He is only perfectly and infallibly wise. He is the spring and fountain of all the wisdom of the creatures. With him are strength and wisdom.

2. The Mediator of this praise: Through Jesus Christ. To God only wise through Jesus Christ; so some. It is in and through Christ that God is manifested to the world as the only wise God. Or rather, as we read it, glory through Jesus Christ. All the glory that passes from fallen man to God must go through the hands of the Lord Jesus. As he is the Mediator of all our prayers, so he is, and I believe will be to eternity, the Mediator of all our praises.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

25. Now to him that is of power—more simply, as in Jude 24, 'to Him that is able'—to stablish—confirm, or uphold—you, according to my gospel, and the preaching of Jesus Christ—i.e., in conformity with the truths of that Gospel which I preach, and not I only, but all to whom has been committed "the preaching of Jesus Christ."

—according to the revelation of the mystery—see on ch. 11:25—which was kept secret since the world began—lit., 'which hath been kept in silence during eternal ages'.

26. But is now made manifest—The reference here is to that peculiar feature of the Gospel economy which Paul himself was specially employed to carry into practical effect and to unfold by his teaching—the introduction of the Gentile believers to an equality with their Jewish brethren, and the new, and, to the Jews, quite unexpected form which this gave to the whole Kingdom of God (cf. Eph. 3:1-10, etc.). This the apostle calls here a mystery hitherto undisclosed, in what sense the next verse will show, but now fully unfolded; and his prayer for the Roman Christians, in the form of a doxology to Him who was able to do what he asked, is that they might be established in the truth of the Gospel, not only in its essential character, but specially in that feature of it which gave themselves, as Gentile believers, their whole standing among the people of God.

and by the scriptures of the prophets, according to the commandment of the everlasting God, made known to all nations for—in order to—the obedience of faith—Lest they should think, from what he had just said, that God had brought in upon his people so vast a change on their condition without giving them any previous notice, the apostle here adds that, on the contrary, "the Scriptures of the prophets" contain all that he and other preachers of the Gospel had to declare on these topics, and indeed that the same "everlasting God," who "from eternal ages" had kept these things hid, had given "commandment'" that they should now, according to the tenor of those prophetic Scriptures, be imparted to every nation for their believing acceptance.

27. to God, . . .—'To the only wise God through Jesus Christ, be'—lit., 'to whom be'; i.e., 'to Him, I say, be the glory for ever. Amen.' At its outset, this is an ascription of glory to the power that could do all this; at its close it ascribes glory to the wisdom that planned and that presides over the gathering of a redeemed people out of all nations. The apostle adds his devout "Amen," which the reader—if he has followed him with the astonishment and delight of him who pens these words—will fervently echo.

MSS. and versions relative to this verse, some rejecting it entirely, and some of those which place the following verses at the end of chap. xiv inserting it at the end of the twenty-seventh verse in that place.

25. Now to him. In the note at the end of chap. xiv I have shown that this and the following verses are by the most reputable MSS. and versions placed at the end of that chapter, which is supposed by most critics to be their proper place. Of power to stablish you. To that God without whom nothing is wise, nothing strong; who is as willing to teach as He is wise, as ready to help as He is strong. According to my gospel. That gospel which explains and publishes God's purpose of taking the Gentiles to be His people under the Messiah, without subjecting them to the law of Moses. This is what he here calls the preaching of Jesus Christ.

Which was kept secret. This purpose of calling the Gentiles, and giving them equal privileges to the Jews without obliging them to submit to circumcision.

26. But now is made manifest. Now, under the New Testament dispensation, and by my preaching. By the scriptures of the prophets. Hints relative to this important work being scattered up and down through all their works, but no clear revelation that the Gentiles, who should be admitted into the Church, should be admitted without passing under the yoke of the Mosaic law. This was the point which was kept secret. As to the calling of the Gentiles, this was declared in general terms by the prophets, and the apostle quotes and makes a most important use of their predictions; but the other was a point on which the prophets gave no information, and it seems to have been peculiarly revealed to Paul, who received the commandment of the everlasting God to make it known to all the Gentiles—all the people of the earth that were not of Jewish extraction. And it was to be made known for the obedience of faith, that they might believe its doctrines and obey its precepts; its universal voice requiring repentance towards God, faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, and circumcision of the heart, in the place of all Jewish rites and ceremonies.

27. To God only wise. This comes in with great propriety. He alone who is the Fountain of wisdom and knowledge had all this mystery in himself; and He alone who knew the times, places, persons, and circumstances could reveal the whole; and He has revealed all in such a way as not only to manifest His unsearchable wisdom, but also His infinite goodness. Therefore to Him be glory for His wisdom in devising this most admirable plan, and His goodness in sending Christ Jesus to execute it; to Him, through Christ Jesus, be glory for ever—because this plan is to last forever, and is to have no issue but in eternal glory. Written to the Romans from Corinthus. That this Epistle was written from Corinth is almost universally believed. That Phebe was a deaconess of the church at Cenchrea, we have seen in the first verse of this chapter; and that the Epistle might have been sent by her to Rome is possible. This subscription, however, stands on very questionable grounds. It is wanting in almost all the ancient MSS.; and even of those which are more modern, few have it entirely, as in our common editions. The subscriptions to the sacred books are of little or no authority, all having been added in latter times, and frequently by injudicious hands. The word Amen was seldom added by the inspired writers, and here it is wanting in almost all the ancient MSS. As this was a word in frequent use in religious services, pious people would naturally employ it in finishing the reading or copying of this Epistle, as they would thereby express their conviction of the truth of its contents, and their desire that the promises contained in it might be fulfilled to them and to the Church at large.

Corinth was a principal city of Greece. It was situated on the isthmus that joined Peloponnesus to the rest of Greece, and had two ports adjoining, one called Lechaeum, not far from the city, whence they traded to Italy and the west, the other, called Cenchrea, at a more remote distance, whence they traded to Asia. From this situation, it is no wonder that Corinth should be a place of great trade and wealth; and neither is it to be wondered at if a place so famous for wealth and arts should be infamous for vice. Yet in this lewd city did Paul plant and raise a Christian church, chiefly among the Gentiles. "You know that you were Gentiles, carried away to those dumb idols even as you were led," though it is not improbable that many Jewish converts might be also among them, for we are told that "Crispus, the chief ruler of the synagogue, believed on the Lord, with all his house" (Acts 18:8). He continued in this city nearly two years, being encouraged by a divine vision assuring him God "had much people in that city" (Acts 18:9, 10).

Some time after he left them he wrote this epistle to them, to water what he had planted and rectify some gross disorders which during his absence had been introduced. Pride, avarice, luxury, lust, with all these either the body of this people or some particular persons among them are here charged by the apostle. Their pride discovered itself in their parties and factions. And this vice was not wholly fed by their wealth, but by the insight they had into the Greek learning and philosophy. Their avarice was manifest in their lawsuits before heathen judges. Their luxury appeared in more instances than one—in their dress, in their debauching themselves even at the Lord's table. Their lust broke out in a most flagrant and infamous instance—that a man should have his father's wife. And it is plain from other passages of the epistle that they were not so entirely free from their former lewd inclinations as not to need very strict cautions against fornication. The pride of their learning had also carried many of them so far as to disbelieve or dispute the doctrine of the resurrection.

It is manifest that there was much that deserved reprehension, and needed correction, in this church. And the apostle sets himself to do both with all wisdom and faithfulness, and with a due mixture of tenderness and authority. After a short introduction he first blames them for their discord and factions, and prescribes humility as a remedy for the evils that abounded among them. This he does through the first four chapters. In the fifth he treats the case of the incestuous person. In the sixth chapter he blames them for their lawsuits, carried on before heathen judges, and in the close of the chapter warns them against the sin of fornication. In the seventh chapter he gives advice upon a case of conscience about marriage. He gives also some directions here about virgins. In the eighth he directs them about meats offered to idols. From this he also takes occasion, in the ninth chapter, to expatiate a little on his own conduct. In the tenth chapter he dissuades them against having communion with idolaters, by eating of their sacrifices, inasmuch as they could not be at once partakers of the Lord's table and the table of devils. In the eleventh chapter he gives direction about their habit in public worship, blames them for their gross irregularities and scandalous disorders in receiving the Lord's Supper. In the twelfth chapter he enters on the consideration of spiritual gifts, which were poured forth in great abundance on this church. Toward the close he informs them that he could recommend to them something far more excellent, upon which he breaks out, in the thirteenth chapter, into the commendation and characteristics of charity. And then, in the fourteenth, he directs them how to keep up decency and order in the churches in the use of their spiritual gifts. The fifteenth chapter is taken up in confirming and explaining the great doctrine of the resurrection. The last chapter consists of some particular advices and salutations.

CHAPTER 1

We have here the apostle's preface to his whole epistle.

I. The inscription. It is an epistle from Paul to the church of Corinth, which he himself had planted, though there were some among them that now questioned his apostleship (ch. ix. 1, 2). The most faithful and useful ministers are not secure from this contempt. Paul, called to be an apostle of Jesus Christ, through the will of God. He had not taken this honour to himself, but had a divine commission for it. It was necessary at this time, to assert his character, and magnify his office, when false teachers made a merit of running him down. It was not pride in Paul, but

Possibly inserted from Romans 1:1; but as likely to be genuine. Translate, lit., "a called apostle" [CONYBEARE and HOWSON]. through the will of God—not because of my own merit. Thus Paul's call as "an apostle by the will of God," while constituting the ground of the authority he claims in the Corinthian Church (cf. Gal. 1:1), is a reason for humility on his own part (ch. 15:8, 10) [BENGEL]. In assuming the ministerial office a man should see he

1. Paul, called to be an apostle. The word called may be here used, as in some other places, for "constituted." As the apostle had many irregularities to reprehend in the Corinthian church, it was necessary that he should be explicit in stating his authority. Through the will of God. By a particular appointment from God alone; for, being an extraordinary messenger, he derived no part of his authority from man.

faithfulness to his trust to maintain his apostolical character and authority. He joins Sosthenes with him in writing. Paul, and Sosthenes his brother, once a ruler of the Jewish synagogue, afterwards a convert to Christianity. He speaks, through the rest of the epistle, in his own name, and in the singular number.

TODAY'S DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE:

Sosthenes—safe in strength—the chief ruler of the synagogue at Corinth, who was seized and beaten by the mob in the presence of Gallio, the Roman governor, when he refused to proceed against Paul at the instigation of the Jews (Acts 18:12-17). The motives of this assault against Sosthenes are not recorded, nor is it mentioned whether it was made by Greeks or Romans. Some identify him with one whom Paul calls "Sosthenes our brother," a convert to the faith (1 Cor. 1:1).

The persons to whom this epistle was directed were the church of God that was at Corinth, sanctified in Christ Jesus, and called to be saints. All Christians are thus far sanctified in Christ Jesus, that they are by baptism dedicated and devoted to him. If they be not truly holy, it is their own fault and reproach. It is the design of Christianity to sanctify us in Christ.

He directs the epistle to all that in every place call on the name of Christ Jesus our Lord, both theirs and ours. God hath a remnant in all places; and we should have a common concern for and hold communion with all that call on Christ's name.

II. The apostolical benediction. Grace be to you, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ. Grace and peace—the favour of God, and reconciliation to him. It is indeed the summary of all blessings. This advantage we have by the gospel, 1. That we are directed how to obtain that peace from God: it is in and by Christ. 2. We are told what must qualify us for this peace; namely, grace: first grace, and then peace.

III. The apostle's thanksgiving to God on their behalf. Paul begins most of his epistles with thanksgiving to God for his friends and prayer for them. He gives thanks, 1. For their conversion to the faith of Christ: For the grace which was given you through Jesus Christ, v. 4. Those who are united to him by faith, are the objects of divine favour. God loves them. 2. For the abundance of their spiritual gifts. They did not come behind any of the churches in any gift, v. 7. He specifies utterance and knowledge, v. 5. Many have the flower of utterance that have not the root of knowledge, and their converse is barren. Many have the treasure of knowledge, and want utterance to employ it for the good of others, and then it is in a manner wrapped up in a napkin. But, where God gives both, a man is qualified for eminent usefulness. These gifts were a confirmation of the testimony of Christ among them, v. 6. So that the does so not of his own impulse, but by the will of God (Jer. 23:21); Paul if left to his own will would never have been an apostle (Rom. 9:16). Sosthenes Associated by Paul with himself in the inscription, either in modesty, Sosthenes being his inferior [CHRYSOSTOM], or in order that the name of a "brother" of note in Corinth (Acts 18:17) might give weight to his Epistle and might show, in opposition to his detractors that he was supported by leading brethren. Gallio had driven the Jews who accused Paul from the judgment seat. The Greek mob, who disliked Jews, took the opportunity then of beating Sosthenes the ruler of the Jewish synagogue, while Gallio looked on and refused to interfere, being secretly pleased that the mob should second his own contempt for the Jews. Paul probably at this time had showed sympathy for an adversary in distress, which issued in the conversion of the latter. So Crispus also, the previous chief ruler of the synagogue had been converted. Saul the persecutor turned into Paul the apostle, and Sosthenes the leader in persecution against that apostle, were two trophies of divine grace that, side by side, would appeal with double power to the Church at Corinth [BIRKS]. 2. the church of God—He calls it so notwithstanding its many blots. Fanatics and sectaries vainly think to anticipate the final sifting of the wheat and tares (Matt. 13:27-30). It is a dangerous temptation to think there is no church where there is not apparent perfect purity. He who thinks so, must at last separate from all others and think himself the only holy man in the world, or establish a peculiar sect with a few hypocrites. It was enough for Paul in recognizing the Corinthians as a church, that he saw among them evangelical doctrine, baptism, and the Lord's Supper" [CALVIN]. It was the Church of God, not of this or of that favorite leader [CHRYSOSTOM]. at Corinth—a church at dissolute Corinth—what a paradox of grace! sanctified—consecrated, or set apart as holy to God in (by union with) Christ Jesus. In the Greek there are no words "to them that are"; translate simply, "men sanctified." called to be saints—rather, "called saints"; saints by calling: applied by Paul to all professing members of the Church. As "sanctified in Christ" implies the fountain sources of holiness, the believer's original sanctification in Christ (ch. 6:11; Heb. 10:10, 14; I Pet. 1:2) in the purposes of God's grace, so "called saints" refers to their actual call (Rom. 8: 30), and the end of that call that they should be holy (I Pet. 1:15). with all that in every place call upon . . . Christ—The Epistle is intended for these also, as well as for the Corinthians. The true CATHOLIC CHURCH (a term first used by IGNATIUS, ad Smyrnæos, c. 8): not consisting of those who call themselves from Paul, Cephas, or any other eminent leader (vs. 12), but of all, wherever they be, who call on Jesus as their Saviour in sincerity (cf. II Tim. 2:22). Still a general unity of discipline and doctrine in the several churches is implied in ch. 4:17; 7:17 11-16; 14-33, 36. The worship due to God is here attributed to Jesus (cf. Joel 2:32; Matt. 4:10; Acts 9:14). both theirs and ours—"in every place which is their home . . . and our home also"; this is added to include the Christians throughout Achaia, not residing in Corinth, the capital (II Cor. 1:1). Paul feels the home of his converts to be also his own. Cf. a similar phrase in Romans 16:13 [CONYBEARE and HOWSON]. "Ours" refers to Paul and Sosthenes, and the Corinthians' home [ALFORD]. BEZA better explains, "Both their Lord and our Lord." All believers have one and the same Lord (ch. 8:6; Eph. 4:5); a virtual reproof of the divisions of the Corinthians, as if Christ were divided (vs. 13). 3. peace—peculiarly needed in the Corinthian church, on account of its dissensions. On this verse see Romans 1:7. 4. He puts the causes for praise and hope among them in the foreground, not to discourage them by the succeeding reproof, and in order to appeal to their better selves. my God—(Rom. 1:8; Phil. 1:3). always—(Cf. Phil. 1:4). the grace . . . given you—(Cf. vs. 7). by . . . Christ—lit., IN Jesus Christ given you as members in Christ. 5. utterance—ALFORD from MENOCHIUS translates, "doctrine." Ye are rich in preachers or the preaching of the word, and rich in knowledge or apprehension of it: lit. (the) word (preached).' English Version (as in II Cor. 8:7) is better: for Paul, purposing presently to dwell on the abuse of the two gifts on which the Corinthians most prided themselves, utterance (speech) and knowledge (ch. 1:20; 3:18; 4:19; ch. 13 and 14), previously gains their goodwill by congratulating them on having those gifts. 6. According as the testimony of (of, and concerning) Christ (who is both the object and author of this testimony [BENGEL]; ch. 2:1; I Tim.

Sosthenes our brother. Probably the same person mentioned in Acts xviii. 17.

2. The church of God which is at Corinth. This church was planted by the apostle himself.

Sanctified in Christ Jesus. "Separated" from the corruptions of their place and age. Called to be saints. "Constituted saints," or "invited" to become such; this was the design of the gospel, for Jesus Christ came to save men from their sins.

With all that in every place. All who profess Christianity, both in Corinth, Ephesus, and other parts of Greece or Asia Minor; and by this we see that the apostle intended that this Epistle should be a general property of the universal Church of Christ, though there are several matters in it that are suited to the state of the Corinthians only.

4. For the grace . . . which is given you. Not only their calling to be saints, and to be sanctified in Christ Jesus, but for the various spiritual gifts which they had received, as specified in the succeeding verses.

5. Ye are enriched—"ye abound." In all utterance. "In all doctrine"; for so the word should certainly be translated and understood.

6. As the testimony of Christ. The testimony of Christ is the gospel which the apostle had preached, and which had been confirmed by various gifts of the Holy Spirit and miracles wrought by the apostle.

MATTHEW HENRY

more plentifully they were poured forth on any church the more confirming evidence they had of their divine mission.

And it is no wonder that when they had such a foundation for their faith they should live in expectation of the coming of their Lord Jesus Christ, v. 7. It is the character of Christians that they wait for Christ's second coming. And the more confirmed we are in the Christian faith the more earnest our expectation of it.

IV. The encouraging hopes the apostle had of them for the time to come, founded on the power and love of Christ, and the faithfulness of God, v. 8, 9. He who had begun a good work in them, would not leave it unfinished. Those that wait for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ will be kept by him, and those that are so will be blameless in the day of Christ. How glorious are the hopes of such a privilege, whether for ourselves or others! O glorious expectation, especially when the faithfulness of God comes in to support our hopes! Those that come at his call shall never be disappointed in their hopes in him. If we approve ourselves faithful to God, we shall never find him unfaithful to us.

Here the apostle enters on his subject.

I. He exhorts them to unity and brotherly love, and reproves them for their divisions. He had received an account from some that wished them well of some unhappy differences among them. He writes to them in a very engaging way: "I beseech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ; be unanimous. Speak all the same thing; avoid divisions or schisms. Be perfectly joined together in the same mind. In the great things of religion be of a mind: but, when there is not a unity of sentiment, let there be a union of affections."

II. He hints at the origin of these contentions. Pride lay at the bottom, and this made them factious. They quarrelled about their ministers. Those who were disposed to be contentious broke into parties, and set their ministers at the head of their several factions: some cried up Paul, others cried up Apollos, some Cephas, or Peter, and some were for none of them, but Christ only. So liable are the best things in the world to be corrupted, and the gospel and its institutions, which are at perfect harmony with themselves and one another, to be made the engines of variance, discord, and contention. How far will pride carry Christians in opposition to one another! Even so far as to set Christ and his own apostles at variance, and make them rivals and competitors.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

2:6; II Tim. 1:8) was confirmed among [ALFORD] you; i.e., by God, through my preaching and through the miracles accompanying it (ch. 12:3; Mark 16:20; II Cor. 1:21, 22; Gal. 3:2, 5; Eph. 4:7, 8; Heb. 2:4). God confirmed (cf. Phil. 1:7; Heb. 2:3), or gave effect to the Gospel among (or better as English Version, "in") the Corinthians by their accepting it and setting their seal to its truth, through the inward power of His Spirit, and the outward gifts and miracles accompanying it [CALVIN]. 7. ye come behind—are inferior to other Christians elsewhere [GROTIUS]. in no gift—not that all had all gifts, but different persons among them had different gifts (ch. 12. 4, etc.). waiting for . . . coming of . . . Christ—The crowning proof of their "coming behind in no gift." Faith, hope, and love, are all exercised herein (cf. II Tim. 4:8; Titus 2:13). "Leaving to others their MEMENTO MORI (remember death), do thou earnestly cherish this joyous expectation of the Lord's coming" [BENGEL]. The Greek verb implies, "to expect constantly, not only for a certain time, but even to the end till the expected event happens" (Rom. 8:19, [TITTM., Synonyms]. 8. Who—God, vs. 4 (not Jesus Christ, vs. 7, in which case it would be "in His day"). unto the end—viz., "the coming of Christ." blameless in the day of . . . Christ—(I Thess. 5:23). After that day there is no danger (Eph. 4:30; Phil. 1: 6). Now is our day to work, and the day of our enemies to try us: then will be the day of Christ, and of His glory in the saints [BENGEL]. 9. faithful—to His promises (Phil. 1:6; I Thess. 5:24). called—according to His purpose (Rom. 8:28). unto . . . fellowship of . . . Jesus—to be fellow heirs with Christ (Rom. 8:17-28), like Him sons of God and heirs of glory (Rom. 8:30; II Thess. 2:14; I Pet. 5:10; I John 1:3). CHRYSOSTOM remarks that the name of Christ is oftener mentioned in this than in any other Epistle, the apostle designing thereby to draw them away from their party admiration of particular teachers to Christ alone. 10. Now—Ye already have knowledge, utterance, and hope, maintain also love. brethren—The very title is an argument for love. by . . . Christ—whom Paul wishes to be all in all to the Corinthians, and therefore names Him so often in this chapter. speak . . . same thing—not speaking different things as ye do (vs. 12), in a spirit of variance. divisions—lit., "splits," "breaches." but—"but rather." perfectly joined together—the opposite word to "divisions." It is applied to healing a wound, or making whole a rent. mind . . . judgment—the view taken by the understanding, and the practical decision arrived at [CONYBEARE and HOWSON], as to what is to be done. The mind, within, refers to things to be believed: the judgment is displayed outwardly in things to be done [BENGEL]. Disposition—opinion [ALFORD]. 11. (Ch. 11:18.) by them . . . of . . . house of Chloe—They seem to have been alike in the confidence of Paul and of the Corinthians. The Corinthians "wrote" to the apostle (ch. 7:1), consulting him concerning certain points; marriage, the eating of things offered to idols, the decorum to be observed by women in religious assemblies. But they said not a syllable about the enormities and disorders that had crept in among them. That information reached Paul by other quarters. Hence his language about those evils is, "It hath been declared unto me . . ."; "It is reported commonly" (ch. 5:1, 2). All this he says before he refers to their letter, which shows that the latter did not give him any intimation of those evils. An undesigned proof of genuineness [PALEY'S Horæ Paulinæ]. Observe his prudence: He names the family, to let it be seen that he made his allegation not without authority: he does not name the individuals, not to excite odium against them. He tacitly implies that the information ought rather to have come to him directly from their presbyters, as they had consulted him about matters of less moment. contentions—not so severe a word as "divisions," lit., schisms (Margin, vs. 10). 12. this I say—this is what I mean in saying "contentions" (vs. 11). every one of you saith—Ye say severally, "glorying in men" (vs. 31; ch. 3:21, 22), one, I am of Paul; another, I am of Apollos. . . . Not that they formed definite parties, but they individually betrayed the spirit of party in contentions under the name of different favorite teachers. Paul will not allow himself to be flattered even by those who made his name their party cry, so as to connive at the dishonor thereby done to Christ. These probably were converted under his ministry. Those alleging the name of Apollos, Paul's successor at Corinth (Acts 18:24, etc), were persons attracted by his rhetorical style (probably acquired in Alexandria, ch. 3:6), as contrasted with the "weak bodily presence" and "contemptible

ADAM CLARKE

7. So that ye come behind in no gift. Every gift and grace of God's Spirit was possessed by the members of that church, some having their gifts after this manner, others after that. Waiting for the coming of our Lord. It is difficult to say whether the apostle means the final judgment or our Lord's coming to destroy Jerusalem and make an end of the Jewish polity. (See 1 Thess. iii. 13.)

8. Who shall . . . confirm you. As the testimony of Christ was confirmed among you, so, in conscientiously believing and obeying, God will confirm you through that testimony. (See v. 6.) In the day of our Lord Jesus. In the day that He comes to judge the world, according to some; but in the day in which He comes to destroy the Jewish polity, according to others. While God destroys them who are disobedient, He can save you who believe.

9. God is faithful. The faithfulness of God is a favorite expression among the ancient Jews, and by it they properly understand the integrity of God in preserving whatever is entrusted to Him. Unto the fellowship. Into the communion or participation of Christ, in the graces of His Spirit and the glories of His future kingdom. God will continue to uphold and save you if you entrust your bodies and souls to Him. But can it be said that God will keep what is either not entrusted to Him or, after being entrusted, is taken away?

10. Now I beseech you, brethren. The apostle having finished his introduction comes to his second point, exhorting them to abstain from dissensions, that they might be of the same heart and mind, striving together for the hope of the gospel. By the name of our Lord Jesus. By His authority, and in His place, and on account of your infinite obligations to His mercy in calling you into such a state of salvation. That ye all speak the same thing. The members of the Church of God should labor to be of the same mind, and to speak the same thing, in order to prevent divisions, which always hinder the work of God. On every essential doctrine of the gospel all genuine Christians agree; why then need religious communion be interrupted?

11. By them which are of the house of Chloe. This was doubtless some very religious matron at Corinth whose family were converted to the Lord, some of whom were probably sent to the apostle to inform him of the dissensions which then prevailed in the church at that place. Contentions. "Altercations"; produced by the "divisions," mentioned above. When once they had divided, they must necessarily have contended, in order to support their respective parties.

12. Every one of you saith. It seems from this expression that the whole church at Corinth was in a state of dissension. The converts at Corinth were partly Jews and partly Greeks. The Gentile part, as Dr. Lightfoot conjectures, might boast the names of Paul and Apollos; the Jewish, those of Cephas and Christ. But these again might be subdivided; some probably considered themselves disciples of Paul, he being the immediate instrument of their conversion, while others might prefer Apollos for his extraordinary eloquence.

MATTHEW HENRY

III. He expostulates with them upon their discord and quarrels: "Is Christ divided? No, there is but one Christ, and therefore Christians should be of one heart. Was Paul crucified for you? Was he your sacrifice and atonement?

Or, were you baptized in the name of Paul? Were you devoted to my service, or engaged to be my disciples, by that sacred rite?' Ministers, however instrumental they are of good to us, are not to be put in Christ's stead. And happy were it for the churches if there were no name of distinction among them, as Christ is not divided.

Verses 14–16

Here the apostle gives an account of his ministry among them. He thanks God he had baptized but a few among them, Crispus, who had been a ruler of a synagogue at Corinth (Acts xviii. 8), Gaius, and the household of Stephanas, besides whom, he says, he did not remember that he had baptized any. He is not to be understood in such a sense as if he were thankful for not having baptized at all, but for not having done it in present circumstances. He left it to other ministers to baptize, while he filled up his time with preaching the gospel. This, he thought, was more his business. In this sense he says, Christ sent him not to baptize, but to preach the gospel—not so much to baptize as to preach. Ministers should consider themselves set apart more especially to that service in which Christ will be most honoured and the salvation of souls promoted, and for which they are best fitted. The principal business Paul did among them was to preach the gospel (v. 17), the cross (v. 18), Christ crucified, v. 23. He did not preach his own fancy, but the gospel. Christ crucified is the foundation of all our hopes and the fountain of all our joys. By his death we live. This is what Paul preached, what all ministers should preach, and what all the saints live upon.

Verses 17–31

I. The manner in which Paul preached the gospel, and the cross of Christ: Not with the wisdom of words (v. 17), the enticing words of man's wisdom (ch. ii. 4), lest the cross of Christ should be of no effect, lest the success should be ascribed to the force of art, and not of truth; not to the plain doctrine of a crucified Jesus, but to the powerful oratory of those who spread it. He preached a crucified Jesus in plain language, and told the people that that Jesus who was crucified at Jerusalem was the Son of God and Saviour of men, and that all who would be saved must repent of their sins, and believe in him. This truth needed no artificial dress; it shone out with the greatest majesty in its own light, and prevailed in the world by its divine authority, without any human helps. The plain preaching of a crucified Jesus was more powerful than all the oratory and philosophy of the heathen world.

II. We have the different effects of this preaching: To those who perish it is foolishness, but to those who are saved it is the power of God, v. 18.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

speech" of the apostle. Apollos, doubtless, did not willingly foster this spirit of undue preference (ch. 4:6, 8); nay, to discourage it, he would not repeat his visit just then (ch. 16:12). I of Cephas—probably Judaizers, who sheltered themselves under the name of Peter, the apostle of the circumcision ("Cephas" is the Hebrew, "Peter" the Greek name; John 1:42; Gal. 2:11, etc.): the subjects handled in chs. 7-9 were probably suggested as matters of doubt by them. The church there began from the Jewish synagogue, Crispus the chief ruler, and Sosthenes his successor (probably), being converts. Hence some Jewish leaven, though not so much as elsewhere, is traceable (II Cor. 11:22). Petrism afterwards sprang up much more rankly at Rome. If it be wrong to boast "I am of Peter," how much more so to boast "I am of the Pope!" [BENGEL]. I of Christ—A fair pretext used to slight the ministry of Paul and their other teachers (ch. 4:8; II Cor. 10:7-11). 13. Is Christ divided?—into various parts (one under one leader, another under another) [ALFORD]. The unity of His body is not to be cut in pieces, as if all did not belong to Him, the One Head. was Paul crucified for you?—In the Greek the interrogation implies that a strong negative answer is expected: "Was it Paul (surely you will not say so) that was crucified for you?" In the former question the majesty of "CHRIST" (the Anointed One of God) implies the impossibility of His being "divided." in the latter, Paul's insignificance implies the impossibility of his being the head of redemption, "crucified for" them, and giving his name to the redeemed. This, which is true of Paul the founder of the Church of Corinth, holds equally good of Cephas and Apollos, who had not such a claim as Paul in the Corinthian Church. crucified ... baptized—The cross claims us for Christ, as redeemed by Him; baptism, as dedicated to Him. in the name—rather, "into the name" (Gal. 3:27), implying the incorporation involved in the idea of baptism. 14. I thank God's providence now, who so ordered it that I baptized none of you but Crispus (the former ruler of the synagogue, Acts 18:8) and Gaius (written by the Romans Caius, the host of Paul at Corinth, and of the church, Rom. 16:23; a person therefore in good circumstances). Baptizing was the office of the deacons (Acts 10:48) rather than of the apostles, whose office was that of establishing and superintending generally the churches. The deacons had a better opportunity of giving the necessary course of instruction preparatory to baptism. Crispus and Gaius were probably among the first converts, and hence were baptized by Paul himself, who founded the church. 15. Lest—not that Paul had this reason at the time, but God so arranged it that none might say [ALFORD]. 16. household of Stephanas—"The first fruits of Achaia," i.e., among the first converted there (ch. 16:15, 17). It is likely that such "households" included infants (Acts 16:33). The history of the Church favors this view, as infant baptism was the usage from the earliest ages. 17. Paul says this not to depreciate baptism; for he exalts it most highly (Rom. 6:3). He baptized some first converts; and would have baptized more, but that his and the apostles' peculiar work was to preach the Gospel, to found by their autoptic testimony particular churches, and then to superintend the churches in general. sent me—lit., "as an apostle." not to baptize—even in Christ's name, much less in my own. not with wisdom of words—or speech; philosophical reasoning set off with oratorical language and secular learning, which the Corinthians set so undue a value upon (vs. 5; ch. 2:1, 4) in Apollos, and the want of which in Paul they were dissatisfied with (II Cor. 10:10). cross of Christ—the sum and substance of the Gospel (vs. 23; ch. 2:2), Christ crucified. be made of none effect—lit., "be made void" (Rom. 4:14); viz., by men thinking more of the human reasonings and eloquence in which the Gospel was set forth, than of the Gospel itself of Christ crucified, the sinner's only remedy, and God's highest exhibition of love. 18. preaching ...—lit., "the word," or speech as to the cross; in contrast to the "wisdom of words" (so called), vs. 17. them that perish—rather, "them that are perishing", viz., by preferring human "wisdom of words" to the doctrine of the "cross of Christ." It is not the final state that is referred to; but, "them that are in the way of perishing." So also in II Corinthians 2:15, 16. us which are saved—In the Greek the collocation is more modest, "to them that are being saved (that are in the way of salvation) as," i.e., to which class we belong. power of God—which includes in it that it is the wisdom of God" (vs. 24). God's powerful instrument of salvation; the highest exhibition of God's power (Rom. 1:16). What seems

ADAM CLARKE

13. Is Christ divided? Can He be split into different sects and parties? Has He different and opposing systems? Or is the Messiah to appear under different persons? Was Paul crucified for you? As the gospel proclaims salvation through the crucified only, has Paul poured out his blood as an atonement for you? This is impossible, and therefore your being called by my name is absurd; for His disciples you should be, alone, who has bought you by His blood. Were ye baptized in the name of Paul? To be baptized in, or "into," the name of one implied that the baptized was to be the disciple of him into whose name, religion, etc., he was baptized. As if he said: Did I ever attempt to set up a new religion, one founded on my own authority, and coming from myself? On the contrary, have I not preached Christ crucified for the sin of the world; and called upon all mankind, both Jews and Gentiles, to believe on Him?

14. I thank God that I baptized none of you. None of those who now live in Corinth, except Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue, Acts xviii. 8. And Gaius, the same person probably with whom Paul lodged, Rom. xvi. 23, where see the notes.

15. Lest any should say. He was careful not to baptize, lest it should be supposed that he wished to make a party for himself; because superficial observers might imagine that he baptized them into his own name, to be his followers, though he baptized them into the name of Christ only. Instead of I had baptized the Codex Alexandrinus, the Codex Ephraim, and several others read "ye were baptized." And if we read "so that," instead of lest, the sentence will stand thus: "So that no one can say that ye were baptized into my name." This appears to be the true reading.

16. The household of Stephanas. From Rom. xvi. 15 we learn that the family of Stephanas were the first converts in Achaia, probably converted and baptized by the apostle himself. I know not whether I baptized any other. I do not recollect that there is any person now residing in Corinth, or Achaia, besides the abovementioned, whom I have baptized. It is strange that the doubt here expressed by the apostle should be construed so as to affect his inspiration! What, does the inspiration of prophet or apostle necessarily imply that he must understand the geography of the universe, and have an intuitive knowledge of all the inhabitants of the earth, and how often and where they may have changed their residence! Nor was that inspiration ever given so to work on a man's memory that he could not forget any of the acts which he had performed during life. Inspiration was given to the holy men of old that they might be able to write and proclaim the mind of God in the things which concern the salvation of men.

17. For Christ sent me not to baptize. It appears sufficiently evident that baptizing was considered to be an inferior office; and though every minister of Christ might administer it, yet apostles had more important work. Preparing these adult heathens for baptism by the continual preaching of the Word was of much greater consequence than baptizing them when thus prepared to receive and profit by it. Not with wisdom of words. In several places in the New Testament the term logos is taken not only to express a word, a speech, a saying, etc., but "doctrine," or the matter of teaching. Here, and in 1 Thess. i. 5, and several other places, it seems to signify "reason," or that mode of rhetorical argumentation so highly prized among the Greeks. The apostle was sent not to pursue this mode of conduct, but simply to announce the truth; to proclaim Christ crucified for the sin of the world; and to do this in the plainest and simplest manner possible, lest the numerous conversions which followed might be attributed to the power of the apostle's eloquence, and not to the demonstration of the Spirit of God.

18. For the preaching of the cross. "The doctrine of the Cross," or the doctrine that is of or concerning the Cross; that is, the doctrine that proclaims salvation to a lost world through the crucifixion of Christ. Is to them that perish foolishness. There are, properly speaking, but two classes of men known where the gospel is

III. We have here the triumphs of the cross over human wisdom, according to the ancient prophecy (Isa. xxix. 14): I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent. Where is the wise? Where is the scribe? Where is the disputer of this world? Hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world? (v. 19, 20). All the valued learning of this world was confounded by the Christian revelation and the glorious triumphs of the cross.

When God would save the world, he took a way by himself; and good reason, for the world by wisdom knew not God, v. 21. All the boasted science of the heathen world did not, could not, effectually bring home the world to God.

Men were puffed up by their imaginary knowledge, and therefore it pleased him, by the foolishness of preaching, to save those that believe.

1. The thing preached was foolishness in the eyes of worldly-wise men. Our living through one who died, our being blessed by one who was made a curse, our being justified by one who was himself condemned, was all folly.

2. The manner of preaching the gospel was foolishness to them too. None of the famous men for wisdom or eloquence were employed. A few fishermen were called out, and sent upon this errand. These were commissioned to disciple the nations. The proud pretenders to learning and wisdom despised the doctrine for the sake of those who dispensed it.

It is to the Jews a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks foolishness; but unto those who are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God, v. 23, 24. 1. Christ crucified is a stumbling-block to the Jews. They despised him, and looked upon him as execrable, because he did not gratify them with a sign to their mind, though his divine power shone out in innumerable miracles. The Jews require a sign, v. 22. 2. He was to the Greeks foolishness. They laughed at the story of a crucified Saviour. They sought for wisdom. There was nothing in the plain doctrine of the cross to suit their taste: they entertained it therefore with scorn and contempt. What, hope to be saved by one that could not save himself! And trust in one who was condemned and crucified as a malefactor, a man of mean birth and poor condition in life! This was what the pride of human reason and learning could not relish. It is just with God to leave those to themselves who pour such proud contempt on divine wisdom and grace. 3. To those who are saved he is the wisdom of God, and the power of God. Those who are enlightened by the Spirit of God, discern more glorious discoveries of God's wisdom and power in the doctrine of Christ crucified than in all his other works.

to the world "weakness" in God's plan of salvation (vs. 25), and in its mode of delivery by His apostle (ch. 2:3) is really His mighty "power." What seems "foolishness" because wanting man's "wisdom of words" (vs. 17), is really the highest "wisdom of God" (vs. 24). 19. I will destroy—slightly altered from the LXX, Isaiah 29:14. The Hebrew is, "The wisdom of the wise shall perish, and the understanding of their prudent men shall be hid." Paul by inspiration gives the sense of the Spirit, by making GOD the cause of their wisdom perishing, etc., "I will destroy," etc. understanding of the prudent—lit., "of the understanding ones." 20. Where—nowhere; for God "brings them to naught" (vs. 19). the wise—generally. the scribe—Jewish [ALFORD]. the disputer—Greek [ALFORD]. Cf. the Jew and Greek of this world contrasted with the godly wise, vss. 22, 23. VITRINGA thinks the reference is to the Jewish discourses in the synagogue, daraschoth, from a Hebrew root "to dispute." Cf. "questions," Acts 26:3; Titus 3:9. If so, "wise" refers to Greek wisdom (cf. vs. 22). Paul applies Isaiah 33:18 here in a higher sense; there the primary reference was to temporal deliverance, here to external; vs. 22, which is in threefold opposition to vs. 18 there, sanctions this higher application; the Lord in the threefold character being the sole ground of glorying to His people. of this world . . . of this world—rather, "dispensation (or age) . . ., world"; the Greek words are distinct. The former is here this age or worldly order of things in a moral point of view, as opposed to the Christian dispensation or order of things. The latter is the world viewed externally and cosmically. made foolish—shown the world's philosophy to be folly, because it lacks faith in Christ crucified [CHRYSOSTOM]. Has treated it as folly, and not used its help in converting and saving men (vss. 26, 27) [ESTIUS]. 21. after that—rather, "whereas." in the wisdom of God—in the wise arrangement of God. world by wisdom—rather, "by its wisdom," or its philosophy (John 1:10; Rom. 1:28). knew not God—whatever other knowledge it attained (Acts 17:23, 27). The deistic theory that man can by the light of nature discover his duty to God, is disproved by the fact that man has never discovered it without revelation. All the stars and moon cannot make it day; that is the prerogative of the sun. Nor can nature's highest gifts make the moral day arise; that is the office of Christ. Even the Jew missed this knowledge, in so far as he followed after mere carnal world wisdom. it pleased God—Paul refers to Jesus' words (Luke 10:21). by the foolishness of preaching—by that preaching which the world (unbelieving Jews and Gentiles alike) deem foolishness. save them that believe—(Rom. 1:16). 22. For—lit., "Since", seeing that. This verse illustrates how the "preaching" of Christ crucified came to be deemed "foolishness" (vs. 21). a sign—The oldest MSS. read "signs." The singular was a later correction from Matthew 12:38; 16:1; John 2:18. The signs the Jews craved for were not mere miracles, but direct tokens from heaven that Jesus was Messiah (Luke 11:16). Greeks seek . . . wisdom—viz., a philosophic demonstration of Christianity. Whereas Christ, instead of demonstrative proof, demands faith on the ground of His word, and of a reasonable amount of evidence that the alleged revelation is His word. Christianity begins not with solving intellectual difficulties, but with satisfying the heart that longs for forgiveness. Hence not the refined Greeks, but the theocratic Jews were the chosen organ for propagating revelation. Again, intellectual Athens (Acts 17: 18-21, etc.) received the Gospel less readily than commercial Corinth. 23. we—Paul and Apollos. Christ crucified—The Greek expresses not the mere fact of His crucifixion, but the permanent character acquired by the transaction, whereby He is now a Saviour (Gal. 3:1) [GREEN]. A Messiah (Christ) crucified was the stone on which the Jews stumbled (Matt. 21:44). The opposition of Jew and Gentile alike shows that a religion so seemingly contemptible in its origin could not have succeeded if it had not been divine. unto the Greeks—the oldest MSS. read "unto the Gentiles." 24. called—(cf. vs. 26). The same class as the "us which are (being) saved" (vs. 18); the elect, who have obeyed the call; called effectually (Rom. 8:28, 30). Christ—"Crucified" is not here added, because when the offense of the cross is overcome, "Christ" is received in all His relations, not only in His cross, but in His life and His future kingdom. power—so meeting all the reasonable requirements of the Jews who sought "a sign." The cross (the death of a slave), which to the Jews (looking for a temporal Messiah) was a "stumbling block," is really "the power of God" to the salvation of all who believe. wisdom of God— preached: the unbelievers and gainsayers, who are perishing; and the obedient believers, who are in a state of salvation.

19. For it is written. The place referred to is Isa. xxix. 14.

20. Where is the wise . . . the scribe . . . the disputer of this world? These words most manifestly refer to the Jews, as the places (Isa. xxix. 14; xxxiii. 18; and xliv. 25) to which he refers cannot be understood of any but the Jews. The wise man of the apostle is the chakam of the prophet, whose office it was to teach others. The scribe of the apostle is the sopher of the prophet; this signifies any man of learning, as distinguished from the common people, especially any master of the traditions. The disputer answers to the derosh, or darshan, the "propounder of questions"; the seeker of allegorical, mystical, and cabalistical senses from the Holy Scriptures. Now as all these are characters well-known among the Jews, and as the words of this world are a simple translation of olam hazzeh, which is repeatedly used to designate the Jewish republic, there is no doubt that the apostle has the Jews immediately in view.

21. For after that in the wisdom of God. The plain meaning of this verse is that the wise men of the world, especially the Greek philosophers, who possessed every advantage that human nature could have independently of a divine revelation, and who had cultivated their minds to the uttermost, could never, by their learning, wisdom, and industry, find out God; nor had the most refined philosophers among them just and correct views of the divine nature, nor of that in which human happiness consists. By the foolishness of preaching. By the preaching of Christ crucified, which the Gentiles termed foolishness, in opposition to their own doctrines, which they termed wisdom. It was not by the foolishness of preaching, literally, nor by the foolish preaching, that God saved the world; but by that gospel which they called foolishness; which was, in fact, the wisdom of God, and also the power of God to the salvation of them that believed.

22. For the Jews require a sign. Instead of a sign, several MSS., with many of the fathers, have "signs"; which reading, as undoubtedly genuine, Griesbach has admitted into the text. And the Greeks seek after wisdom. Such wisdom, or philosophy, as they found in the writings of Cicero, Seneca, Plato, etc., which was called philosophy, and which came recommended to them in all the beauties and graces of the Latin and Greek languages.

23. But we. Apostles, differing widely from these Gentile philosophers. Preach Christ crucified. Call on men, both Jews and Gentiles, to believe in Christ, as having purchased their salvation by shedding His blood for them. Unto the Jews a stumblingblock. Because Jesus came meek, lowly, and impoverished; not seeking worldly glory, nor affecting worldly pomp; whereas they expected the Messiah to come as a mighty prince and conqueror. Because Christ did not come so, they were offended at Him. Unto the Greeks foolishness. Because they could not believe that proclaiming supreme happiness through a man that was crucified at Judea as a malefactor could ever comport with reason and common sense; for both the matter and manner of the preaching were opposite to every notion they had formed of what was dignified and philosophic.

24. But unto them which are called. Those, of both Jews and Greeks, who were by the preaching of the gospel called or "invited" to the marriage feast, and have accordingly believed in Christ Jesus. The called, or "invited," is a title of genuine Christians, and is frequently used in the New Testament. "Saints" is used in the same sense.

MATTHEW HENRY

And yet the foolishness of God is wiser than men, v. 25. "You see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called," v. 26, &c. There is a great deal of meanness and weakness in the outward appearance of our religion. Few of distinguished character in any of these respects were chosen for the work of the ministry. Not the wise men after the flesh. Not the mighty and noble. But God seeth not as man seeth. He hath chosen the foolish things of the world, the weak things of the world, the base and despicable things of the world, men of mean birth, of low rank, of no liberal education, to be the preachers of the gospel. He is a better judge than we what instruments and measures will best serve the purposes of his glory. Few of distinguished rank and character were called to be Christians. As the preachers were poor and mean, so generally were the converts. Few of the wise, and mighty, and noble, embraced the doctrine of the cross. Yet what glorious discoveries are there of divine wisdom in the whole scheme of the gospel.

IV. We have an account how admirably all is fitted, 1. To beat down the pride and vanity of men. God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise, the weak things of the world to confound the mighty, and base things, and things which are despised, and things which are not, to bring to nought (to abolish) things that are; the conversion of the Gentiles was to open a way to the abolishing of that constitution upon which they valued themselves so much. It is common for the Jews to speak of the Gentiles under this character, as things that are not.

The gospel is fitted to bring down the pride of both Jews and Greeks, that no flesh should glory in his presence (v. 29), that there might be no pretence for boasting. Divine wisdom alone had the contrivance of the method of redemption; divine grace alone revealed it, and made it known. It lay, in both respects, out of human reach. The gospel dispensation is a contrivance to humble man. 2. It is as admirably fitted to glorify God. The hand of the Lord went along with the preachers, and was mighty in the hearts of the hearers; and Jesus Christ was made both to ministers and Christians what was truly great and honourable. All we have we have from God as the fountain, and in and through Christ as the channel of conveyance. He is made of God to us wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption (v. 30). We are foolishness and he is made wisdom to us. We are guilty and he is made righteousness. We are depraved and corrupt; and he is made sanctification. We are in bonds, and he is made redemption to us.

And what is designed in all is that all flesh may glory in the Lord, v. 31. Man is humbled, and God glorified by the whole scheme.

so really exhibiting, and in the highest degree (if they would but see it), that which the Greeks sought after—wisdom (Col. 2:3). 25. foolishness of God—i.e., God's plan of salvation which men deem "foolishness." weakness of God—Christ "crucified through weakness" (II Cor. 13:4, the great stumbling block of the Jews), yet "living by the power of God." So He perfects strength out of the weakness of His servants (ch. 2:3; II Cor. 12:9). 26. ye see—rather, from the prominence of the verb in the Greek, "see" or "consider" (imperative) [ALFORD from VULGATE and IRENÆUS]. your calling . . . *are called—Instead of the words in italics, supplied by English Version, supply, "were your callers." What Paul is dwelling on (cf. vss. 27, 28) is the weakness of the instrumentality which the Lord employed to convert the world [HINDS and WHATELY; so ANSELM]. However, English Version accords well with vs. 24. "The whole history of the expansion of the Church is a progressive victory of the ignorant over the learned, the lowly over the lofty, until the emperor himself laid down his crown before the cross of Christ" [OLSHAUSEN]. wise . . . after the flesh—the wisdom of this world acquired by human study without the Spirit. (Contrast Matt. 16:17.) 27. the foolish things—a general phrase for all persons and things foolish. Even things (and those, too, foolish things) are chosen by God to confound persons, (and those too persons who are wise). This seems to me the force of the change from neuter to masculine. to confound—The Greek is stronger, "that He might confound (or put to shame)." God confounds the wise by effecting through His instruments, without human wisdom, that the worldly wise, with it, cannot effect, viz., to bring men to salvation. chosen . . . chosen—The repetition indicates the gracious deliberateness of God's purpose (Jas. 2:5). 28. yea, and things which are not—Yea is not in the Greek. Also some of the oldest MSS. omit "and." Thus the clause, "things which are not" (are regarded as naught), is in apposition with "foolish . . . weak . . . base (i.e., lowborn) and despised things." God has chosen all four, though regarded as things that are not, to bring to naught things that are. 29. no flesh . . . glory—For they who try to glory (boast) because of human greatness and wisdom, are "confounded" or put to shame (vs. 27). Flesh, like "the flower of the field," is beautiful, but frail (Isa. 40:6). in his presence—We are to glory not before Him, but in Him [BENGEL]. 30. But . . . ye—in contrast to them that "glory" in worldly wisdom and greatness. of him are—not of yourselves (Eph. 2:8), but of Him (Rom. 11:36). From Him ye are (i.e., have spiritual life, who once were spiritually among the "things which are not." vs. 28). in Christ—by living union with Him. Not "in the flesh" (vss. 26, 29). of God—from God; emanating from Him and sent by Him. is made unto us—has been made to us, to our eternal gain. wisdom—unattainable by the worldly mode of seeking it (vss. 19, 20; contrast Col. 2:3; Prov. 8; Isa. 9:6). By it we become "wise unto salvation," owing to His wisdom in originating and executing the plan, whereas once we were "fools." righteousness—the ground of our justification (Jer. 23:5, 6; Rom. 4:25; II Cor. 5:21); whereas once we were "weak" (Rom. 5:6). Isaiah 42:21; 45:24. sanctification—by His Spirit; whereas formerly we were "base." Hereafter our righteousness and sanctification alike shall be both perfect and inherent. Now the righteousness wherewith we are justified is perfect, but not inherent; that wherewith we are sanctified is inherent, but not perfect [HOOKER]. Now sanctification is perfect in principle, but not in attainment. These two are joined in the Greek as forming essentially but one thing, as distinguished from the "wisdom" in devising and executing the plan for us ("abounded toward us in all wisdom," Eph. 1:8), and "redemption," the final completion of the scheme in the deliverance of the body (the position of "redemption" last shows that this limited sense is the one intended here). Luke 21:28; Romans 8:23; Ephesians 1:14; 4:30. redemption—whereas once we were "despised." 31. glory in . . Lord—(Jer. 9:23, 24)—in opposition to "flesh glorying in His presence" (vs. 29). In contrast to morbid slavish self-abasement, Paul joins with humility the elevating consciousness of our true dignity in Christ. He who glories is to glory in the Lord, not in the flesh, nor in the world.

ADAM CLARKE

25. The foolishness of God is wiser. The meaning of these strong expressions is that the things of God's appointment which seem to men foolishness are infinitely beyond the highest degree of human wisdom; and those works of God which appear to superficial observers weak and contemptible surpass all the efforts of human power. The means which God has appointed for the salvation of men are so wisely imagined and so energetically powerful that all who properly use them shall be infallibly brought to the end—final blessedness—which He has promised to them who believe and obey.

26. Ye see your calling. The state of grace and blessedness to which you are invited. I think blepo should be read in the imperative: "Take heed to, or consider, your calling, brethren; that not many of you are wise after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble." Men is not in the original, and Paul seems to allude to the Corinthian believers in particular. This seems to have been said in opposition to the high and worldly notions of the Jews, who assert that the Divine Spirit never rests upon any man unless he be wise, powerful, and rich. Now this Divine Spirit did rest upon the Christians at Corinth, and yet these were, in the sense of the world, neither wise, rich, nor noble. We spoil, if not corrupt, the apostle's meaning by adding are called, as if God did not send His gospel to the wise, the powerful, and the noble, or did not will their salvation. The truth is, the gospel has an equal call to all classes of men; but the wise, the mighty, and the noble are too busy or too sensual to pay any attention to an invitation so spiritual and so divine; and therefore there are few of these in the Church of Christ in general.

27. But God hath chosen the foolish things. God has chosen by means of men who are esteemed rude and illiterate to confound the greatest of the Greek philosophers and overturn their systems; and by means of men weak, without secular power or authority, to confound the scribes and Pharisees; and in spite of the exertions of the Jewish sanhedrin, to spread the doctrine of Christ crucified all over the land of Judea, and by such instruments as these to convert thousands of souls to the faith of the gospel.

28. And base things . . . and things which are despised. It is very likely that the apostle refers here to the Gentiles and to the Gentile converts, who were considered base and despicable in the eyes of the Jews, who counted them no better than dogs, and who are repeatedly called the things that are not. By these very people, converted to Christianity, God has brought to nought all the Jewish pretensions.

29. That no flesh should glory. God does His mighty works in such a way as proves that, though He may condescend to employ men as instruments, yet they have no part either in the contrivance or energy by which such works are performed.

30. But of him are ye in Christ Jesus. Even the good which you possess is granted by God, for it is by and through Him that, Christ Jesus comes, and all the blessings of the gospel dispensation. And righteousness. "Justification," as procuring for us that remission of sins which the law could not give, Gal. ii. 21; iii. 21. And sanctification. As procuring for and working in us not only an external and relative holiness, as was that of the Jews, but true and eternal holiness, Eph. iv. 24, wrought in us by the Holy Spirit.

31. According as it is written. In Jer. ix. 23-24: "Thus saith the Lord, Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty man glory in his might, let not the rich man glory in his riches: but let him that glorieth glory in this, that he understandeth and knoweth me, that I am the Lord which exercise lovingkindness, judgment, and righteousness, in the earth." So then, as all good is of and from God, let him that has either wisdom, strength, riches, pardon, holiness, or any other blessing, whether temporal or spiritual, acknowledge that he was nothing but what he has received.

CHAPTER 2

Verses 1–5

The apostle reminds the Corinthians how he acted when he first preached the gospel among them.

I. As to the matter or subject he tells us (v. 2), He determined to know nothing among them but Jesus Christ and him crucified. Christ, in his person and offices, is the sum and substance of the gospel, and ought to be the great subject of a gospel minister's preaching. Anyone that heard Paul preach found him to harp so continuously on this string that he would say he knew nothing but Christ and him crucified.

II. The manner wherein he preached Christ. Negatively. He came not among them with excellency of speech or wisdom, v. 1. His speech and preaching were not with enticing words of man's wisdom, v. 4. He did not set himself to captivate the ear by eloquent expressions, nor to entertain the fancy with lofty flights. Divine wisdom needed not to be set off with such human ornaments. Positively. He came among them declaring the testimony of God, v. 1. He published a divine revelation. Ornaments of speech and philosophical skill and argument could add no weight to what came recommended by such authority. He was also among them in weakness and fear, and in much trembling; and yet his speech and preaching were in demonstration of the Spirit and of power, v. 3, 4. His enemies in the church of Corinth spoke very contemptuously of him: His bodily presence, say they, is weak, and his speech contemptible, 2 Cor. x. 10. Possibly he had a little body, and a low voice; but, it is plain that he was no mean speaker. Nor did he want courage nor resolution, he was in nothing terrified by his adversaries. Yet he was no boaster. He did not proudly vaunt himself, like his opposers. None know the fear and trembling of faithful ministers; and a deep sense of their own weakness is the occasion of this fear and trembling. They know how insufficient they are. Yet he spoke with authority: In the demonstration of the Spirit and of power. He preached the truths of Christ in their native dress, with plainness of speech. He laid down the doctrine as the Spirit delivered it; and left the Spirit to demonstrate the truth of it.

III. Here is the end mentioned for which he preached Christ crucified: That your faith should not stand in the wisdom of man, but the power of God (v. 5)—that they might not be drawn by human motives, nor overcome by mere human arguments. When nothing but Christ crucified was plainly preached, the success must be entirely attributed to a divine power.

The apostle shows them that he had communicated to them a treasure of the truest and the highest wisdom: We speak wisdom among those who are perfect (v. 6). Those that receive the doctrine as divine, and have looked well into it, discover true wisdom in it. Though what we preach is foolishness to the world, it is wisdom to them.

CHAPTER 2

Vss. 1-16. PAUL'S SUBJECT OF PREACHING, CHRIST CRUCIFIED, NOT IN WORLDLY, BUT IN HEAVENLY, WISDOM AMONG THE PERFECT. 1. And I—"So I" [CONYBEARE] as one of the "foolish, weak, and despised" instruments employed by God (ch. 1:27, 28); "glorying in the Lord," not in man's wisdom (ch. 1: 31). Cf. ch. 1:23, "We." when I came—(Acts 18: 1, etc.). Paul might, had he pleased, have used an ornate style, having studied secular learning at Tarsus of Cilicia, which Strabo preferred as a school of learning to Athens or Alexandria; here, doubtless, he read the Cilician Aratus' poems (which he quotes, Acts 17:28), and Epimenides (Titus 1:12), and Menander (I Cor. 15:33). Grecian intellectual development was an important element in preparing the way for the Gospel, but it failed to regenerate the world, showing that for this a superhuman power is needed. Hellenistic (Grecizing) Judaism at Tarsus and Alexandria was the connecting link between the schools of Athens and those of the Rabbis. No more fitting birthplace could there have been for the apostle of the Gentiles than Tarsus, free as it was from the warping influences of Rome, Alexandria, and Athens. He had at the same time Roman citizenship, which protected him from sudden violence. Again, he was reared in the Hebrew divine law at Jerusalem. Thus, as the three elements, Greek cultivation, Roman polity (Luke 2:1), and the divine law given to the Jews, combined just at Christ's time, to prepare the world for the Gospel, so the same three, by God's marvellous providence, met together in the apostle to the Gentiles [CONYBEARE and HOWSON]. testimony of God—"the testimony of Christ" (ch. 1:6); therefore Christ is God. 2. The Greek implies, "The only definite thing that I made it my business to know among you, was to know Jesus Christ (His person) and Him crucified (His office)" [ALFORD], not exalted on the earthly throne of David, but executed as the vilest malefactor. The historical fact of Christ's crucifixion had probably been put less prominently forward by the seekers after human wisdom in the Corinthian church, to avoid offending learned heathens and Jews. Christ's person and Christ's office constitute the sum of the Gospel. 3. I—the preacher: as vs. 2 describes the subject, "Christ crucified," and vs. 4 the mode of preaching: "my speech . . . not with enticing words," "but in demonstration of the Spirit." weakness—personal and bodily (II Cor. 10:10; 12:7, 9; Gal. 4:13). trembling—(cf. Phil. 2:12). Not personal fear, but a trembling anxiety to perform a duty; anxious conscientiousness, as proved by the contrast to "eye service" (Eph. 6:5) [CONYBEARE and HOWSON]. 4. my speech—in private. preaching—in public [BENGEL]. ALFORD explains it, My discourse on doctrines, and my preaching or announcement of facts. enticing—rather, "persuasive." man's wisdom—"man's" is omitted in the oldest authorities. Still "wisdom" does refer to man's wisdom. demonstration of . . . Spirit . . .—Persuasion is man's means of moving his fellow man. God's means is demonstration, leaving no doubt, and inspiring implicit faith, by the powerful working of the Spirit (then exhibited both outwardly by miracles, and inwardly by working on the heart, now in the latter and the more important way only, (Matt. 7:29; Acts 6:10; Heb. 4:12; cf. also Rom. 15:19). The same simple power accompanies divine truth now, producing certain persuasion and conversion, when the Spirit demonstrates by it. 5. stand in . . . wisdom of men—rest on it, owe its origin and continuance to it. 6, 7. Yet the Gospel preaching, so far from being at variance with true "wisdom," is a wisdom infinitely higher than that of the wise of the world. we speak—resuming "we" (preachers, I, Apollos, etc.) from "we preach" (ch. 1:28), only that here, "we speak" refers to something less public (cf. vss. 7.13, "mystery" "hidden") than "we preach," which is public. For "wisdom" here denotes not the whole of Christian doctrine, but its sublimer and deeper principles. perfect—Those matured in Christian experience and knowledge alone can understand the true superiority of the Christian wisdom which Paul preached. Distinguished not only from worldly and natural men, but also from babes, who though "in Christ" retain much that is "carnal" (ch. 3:1, 2), and cannot therefore understand the deeper truths of Christianity (ch. 14:20; Phil. 3:15; Heb. 5:14). Paul does not mean by the "mystery" or "hidden wisdom (vs. 7) some hidden tradition distinct from the Gospel (like the Church of Rome's disciplina arcani and doctrine of reserve), but the unfolding of the treasures of knowledge, once hidden in God's counsels, but now announced to all, which would be in-

ADAM CLARKE

1. When I came to you. Acting suitably to my mission, which was to preach the gospel, but not with human eloquence, chap. i. 17.

I declared to you the testimony, the gospel, of God, not with excellency of speech, not with arts of rhetoric, used by your own philosophers, where the excellence of the speech recommends the matter, and compensates for the want of solidity and truth. On the contrary, the testimony concerning Christ and His salvation is so supremely excellent as to dignify any kind of language by which it may be conveyed.

2. I determined not to know any thing among you. Satisfied that the gospel of God could alone make you wise unto salvation, I determined to cultivate no other knowledge, and to teach nothing but Jesus Christ, and him crucified, as the foundation of all true wisdom, piety, and happiness.

3. I was with you in weakness. It is very likely that Paul had not only something in his speech very unfavorable to a ready and powerful elocution, but also some infirmity of body that was still more disadvantageous to him. A fine appearance and a fine voice cover many weaknesses and defects, and strongly and forcibly recommend what is spoken, though not remarkable for depth of thought or solidity of reasoning. Many popular orators have little besides their persons and their voice to recommend them. In fear, and in much trembling. An eminent divine has said that it requires three things to make a good preacher: study, temptation, and prayer. The latter, no man that lives near to God can neglect; the former, no man who endeavors rightly to divide "the word of truth" will neglect; and with the second every man will be more or less exercised whose whole aim is to save souls. Those of a different cast the devil permits to pass quietly on in their own indolent and prayerless way.

4. And my speech. My "doctrine"; the matter of my preaching. And my preaching. "My proclamation." Was not with enticing words of man's wisdom. "With persuasive doctrines of human wisdom"; in every case I left man out, that God might become the more evident. I used none of the means of which great orators avail themselves in order to become popular, and thereby to gain fame. But in demonstration of the Spirit. In the "manifestation." The doctrine that he preached was revealed by the Spirit. That it was a revelation of the Spirit, the holiness, purity, and usefulness of the doctrine rendered manifest; and the overthrow of idolatry and the conversion of souls, by the power and energy of the preaching, were the demonstration that all was divine. The greater part of the best MSS., versions, and fathers leave out the adjective man's before wisdom.

5. That your faith should not stand. That the illumination of your souls and your conversion to God might appear to have nothing human in it. Your belief, therefore, of the truths which have been proposed to you is founded, not in human wisdom, but in divine power.

6. We speak wisdom among them that are perfect. By among them that are perfect we are to understand Christians of the highest knowledge and attainments, those who were fully instructed in the knowledge of God through Christ Jesus. Nothing, in the judgment of Paul, deserved the name of wisdom but this. And though he apologizes for his not coming to them with excellency of speech or wisdom, yet he means what was reputed wisdom among the Greeks, and which, in the sight of God, was mere folly when compared with that wisdom that came from above.

MATTHEW HENRY

Those who are wise themselves are the only proper judges of what is wisdom: not indeed the wisdom of this world, nor of the princes of this world, but the wisdom of God in a mystery (v. 6, 7); not worldly wisdom, but divine; not such as the men of this world could have discovered, nor such as worldly men, destitute of the Spirit of God, can receive. How different is the judgment of God from that of the world! The wisdom he teaches is of a quite different kind from what passes under that notion in the world. But the wisdom of God in a mystery, the hidden wisdom of God. The depth of which, now it is revealed, none but himself can fathom. Now, concerning this wisdom, observe,

I. The rise and origin of it: It was ordained of God, before the world, to our glory, v. 7. It was ordained of God; he had determined long ago to make it known; and that to our glory, the glory of us, either us apostles or us Christians. It was a great honour put upon the apostles, to be entrusted with the revelation of this wisdom. It was a great privilege for Christians to have this glorious wisdom discovered to them. And the wisdom of God taught by the gospel prepares for our everlasting glory and happiness in the world to come. What honour does he put on his saints!

II. The ignorance of the great men of the world about it: Which none of the princes of this world knew (v. 8). The Roman governor, and the rulers of the Jewish nation, seem to be the persons here chiefly meant. Jesus Christ is the Lord of glory, and the reason why he was hated was because he was not known. Had his crucifiers known him, known who and what he was, they would have withheld their impious hands. Thus he pleaded with his Father for their pardon: Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do, Luke xxiii. 34.

III. It is such wisdom as could not have been discovered without a revelation, according to what the prophet Isaiah says (Isa. lxiv. 4), Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor have entered into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for those that love him—for him that waiteth for him, that waiteth for his mercy, so the LXX. Waiting upon God is an evidence of love to him. There are things which God hath prepared for those that love him, and wait for him. But the apostle speaks here of the divine revelation under the gospel. The great truths of the gospel are things lying out of the sphere of human discovery: Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard them, nor have they entered into the heart of man. Were they objects of sense there had been no need of a revelation. But, lying out of the sphere of nature, we cannot discover them but by the light of revelation.

IV. By whom this wisdom is discovered to us: God hath revealed them to us by his Spirit, v. 10.

telligently comprehended in proportion as the hearer's inner life became perfectly transformed into the image of Christ. Cf. instances of such "mysteries," i.e., deeper Christian truths, not preached at Paul's first coming to Corinth, when he confined himself to the fundamental elements (vs. 2), but now spoken to the "perfect" (ch. 15:51; Rom. 11:25; Eph. 3:5, 6). "Perfect" is used not of absolute perfection, but relatively to "babes," or those less ripe in Christian growth (cf. Phil. 3:12, 15, with I John 2:12-14). "God" (vs. 7) is opposed to the world, the apostles to "the princes [great and learned men] of this world" (vs. 8; cf. ch. 1:20) [BENGEL]. come to naught—nothingness (ch. 1:28). They are transient, not immortal. Therefore, their wisdom is not real [BENGEL]. Rather, translate with ALFORD, "Which are being brought to naught," viz., by God's choosing the "things which are not (the weak and despised things of the Gospel), to bring to naught (the same verb as here) things that are" (ch. 1:28). 7. wisdom of God—emphatically contrasted with the wisdom of men and of this world (vss. 5, 6). in a mystery—connected in construction with "we speak": We speak as dealing with a mystery; i.e. not something to be kept hidden, but what heretofore was so, but is now revealed. Whereas the pagan mysteries were revealed only to a chosen few, the Gospel mysteries were made known to all who would obey the truth. "If our Gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost" (II Cor. 4:3), "whom the God of this world hath blinded." Ordinarily we use "mystery" in reference to those from whom the knowledge is withheld; the apostles, in reference to those to whom it is revealed [WHATELY]. It is hidden before it is brought forward, and when it is brought forward it still remains hidden to those that are imperfect [BENGEL]. ordained—lit., "foreordained" (cf. vs. 9), "prepared for them that love Him." before the world—rather, "before the ages" (of time), i.e., from eternity. This infinitely antedates worldly wisdom in antiquity. It was before not only the wisdom of the world, but eternally before the world itself and its ages. to our glory—ours both now and hereafter, from "the Lord of glory" (vs. 8), who brings to naught "the princes of this world." 8. Which—wisdom. The strongest proof of the natural man's destitution of heavenly wisdom. crucified . . . Lord of glory—implying the inseparable connection of Christ's humanity and His divinity. The Lord of glory (which He had in His own right before the world was, John 17:4, 24) was crucified. 9. But—(it has happened) as it is written. Eye hath not seen . . .—ALFORD translates, "The things which eye saw not, . . . the things which God prepared . . ., to us God revealed through His Spirit." Thus, however, the "but" of vs. 10 is ignored. Rather construe, as ESTIUS, "('We speak,' supplied from vs. 8), things which eye saw not (heretofore), . . . things which God prepared. . . . But God revealed them to us . . . ." The quotation is not a verbatim one, but an inspired exposition of the "wisdom" (vs. 6, from Isa. 64:4). The exceptive words, "O God, beside (i.e., except) Thee," are not quoted directly, but are virtually expressed in the exposition of them (vs. 10), "None but thou, O God, seest these mysteries, and God hath revealed them to us by His Spirit." entered—lit., "come up into the heart." A Hebraism (cf. Margin, Jer. 3:16). In Isaiah 64 it is "Prepared (lit., 'will do') for him that waiteth for Him"; here, "for them that love Him." For Isaiah spake to them who waited for Messiah's appearance as future; Paul, to them who love Him as having actually appeared (I John 4:19); cf. vs. 12, "the things that are freely given to us of God" [BENGEL]. 10. revealed . . . by . . . Spirit—The inspiration of thoughts (so far as truth essential to salvation is concerned) makes the Christian (ch. 3:16; 12:3; Matt. 16:17; John 16:13; I John 2:20, 27); that of words, the PROPHET (II Sam. 23:1, 2; I Kings 13:1, 5), "by the word of the Lord" (vs. 13; John 20:30, 31; II Pet. 1:21). The secrets of revelation are secret to some, not because those who know them will not reveal them (for indeed, the very notion of revelation implies an unveiling of what had been veiled), but because those to whom they are announced have not the will or power to comprehend them. Hence the Spirit-taught alone know these secrets (Ps. 25:14; Prov. 3:32; John 7:17; 15:15). unto us—the "perfect" or fully matured in Christian experience (vs. 6). Intelligent men may understand the outline of doctrines; but without the Holy Spirit's revelation to the heart, these will be to them a mere outline—a skeleton, correct perhaps, but wanting life [Cautions for the Times, xiv.], (Luke 10:21). the Spirit searcheth—working in us and with our spirits (cf. Rom. 8:16, 26, 27). The Old

ADAM CLARKE

7. The wisdom of God in a mystery. The gospel of Jesus Christ, which had been comparatively hidden from the foundation of the world (the settling of the Jewish economy, as this phrase often means), though appointed from the beginning to be revealed in the fullness of time.

8. Which none of the princes of this world knew. Here it is evident that this world refers to the Jewish state, and to the degree of knowledge in that state, and the rulers, the priests, rabbins, etc., who were principally concerned in the crucifixion of our Lord. The Lord of glory. Or the "glorious Lord," infinitely transcending all the rulers of the universe, whose is eternal glory.

9. But, as it is written. The quotation is taken from Isa. lxiv. 4. The sense is continued here from verse the seventh, and "we speak" is understood—We do not speak or preach the wisdom of this world; but that mysterious wisdom of God, of which the prophet said: Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him. These words have been applied to the state of glory in a future world; but they certainly belong to the present state, and express merely the wondrous light, life, and liberty which the gospel communicates to them that believe in the Lord Jesus Christ in that way which the gospel itself requires.

10. But God hath revealed them unto us. A manifest proof that the apostle speaks here of the glories of the gospel, and not of the glories of the future world.

MATTHEW HENRY

The scripture is given by inspiration of God. And the apostles spoke by inspiration of the same Spirit. What he taught was revealed of God by his Spirit, that Spirit that searches all things, yea, the deep things of God, and knows the things of God, as the spirit of a man that is in him knows the things of a man, v. 11. A double argument in proof of the divinity of the Holy Ghost: 1. Omniscience is attributed to him: He searches all things, even the deep things of God. He enters into the very depths of God, penetrates into his most secret counsels. Now who can have such a thorough knowledge of God but God? 2. This allusion seems to imply that the Holy Spirit is as much in God as a man's mind is in himself. He is as much and as intimately one with God as the man's mind is with the man. The Spirit of God knows the things of God because he is one with God. Neither can we know the secret counsels and purposes of God till they are made known to us by his Holy Spirit. And it was by this Spirit that the apostles had received the wisdom of God in a mystery. "Now we have received not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is of God, that we might know the things freely given to us of God (v. 12). We have what we deliver in the name of God by inspiration from him; and it is by his gracious illumination that we know the things freely given to us of God unto salvation" —that is, "the great privileges of the gospel." Though these things are given to us, we cannot know them to any saving purpose till we have the Spirit.

V. In what manner this wisdom was taught: Which things we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teaches, but which the Holy Ghost teaches, v. 13. They had received the wisdom they taught from the Spirit of God. Nor did they put a human dress on it, but plainly declared the doctrine of Christ, in terms also taught them by the Holy Spirit. The truths of God need no garnishing by human skill or eloquence, but look best in the words which the Holy Ghost teaches. Comparing spiritual things with spiritual—one part of revelation with another. Spiritual things, when brought together, will help to illustrate one another; but, if the principles of human art and science are to be made a test of revelation, we shall certainly judge amiss concerning it. The language of the Spirit of God is the most proper to convey his meaning.

VI. How this wisdom is received.

1. The natural man receiveth not the things of God, for they are foolishness to him, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned, v. 14. Either, (1) The man under the power of corruption, and never yet illuminated by the Spirit of God. Men unsanctified receive not the things of God. The truths of God are foolishness to such a mind. Evil inclinations and wicked principles render the man unwilling to enter into the mind of God. It is the quickening beams of the Spirit of truth and holiness that must help the mind to discern their excellency. Thus the natural man cannot know them, because they are spiritually discerned. Or, (2) The natural man, that is, the wise man of the world (ch. i. 19, 20), one who hath the wisdom of the world, man's wisdom (ch. ii. 4–6), a man that would receive nothing by faith, nor own any need of supernatural assistance. This was very much the character of the philosophy and the Grecian learning and wisdom in that day. Such a man receives not the things of the Spirit of God. Revelation is not with him a principle of science; he looks upon it as the extravagant thought of some deluded dreamer. For that reason he can have no knowledge of things revealed, because they are only spiritually discerned.

2. But he that is spiritual judgeth all things, yet he himself is judged of no man, v. 15. He who is sanctified is capable of judging about matters of human wisdom, and has also a relish and savour of Testament shows us God (the Father) for us. The Gospels, God (the Son) with us. The Acts and Epistles, God (the Holy Ghost) in us [MONOD], (Gal. 3:14). deep things of God—(Ps. 92:5). His divine nature, attributes, and counsels. The Spirit delights to explore the infinite depths of His own divine mind, and then reveal them to us, according as we are capable of understanding them (Deut. 29: 29). This proves the personality and Godhead of the Holy Ghost. Godhead cannot be separated from the Spirit of God, as manhood cannot be separated from the Spirit of man [BENGEL]. 11. what man...—lit., "who of men knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of that man?" things of God knoweth no man—rather, "none knoweth," not angel or man. This proves the impossibility of any knowing the things of God, save by the Spirit of God (who alone knows them, since even in the case of man, so infinitely inferior in mind to God, none of his fellow men, but his own spirit alone knows the things hidden within him). 12. we... received, not... spirit of... world—the personal evil "spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience" (Eph. 2:2). This spirit is natural in the unregenerate, and needs not to be received. Spirit which is of God—i.e., which comes from God. We have received it only by the gift of God, whose Spirit it is, whereas our own spirit is the spirit that is in us men (vs. 11). that we might know... things... freely given... of God—present experimental knowledge, to our unspeakable comfort, of His deep mysteries of wisdom, and of our future possession of the good "things which God hath prepared for them that love Him" (vs. 9). 13. also—We not only know by the Holy Ghost, but we also speak the "things freely given to us of God" (vs. 12). which the Holy Ghost teacheth—The old MSS. read "the Spirit" simply, without "Holy." comparing spiritual things with spiritual—expounding the Spirit-inspired Old Testament Scripture, by comparison with the Gospel which Jesus by the same Spirit revealed [GROTIUS]; and conversely illustrating the Gospel mysteries by comparing them with the Old Testament types [CHRYSOSTOM]. So the Greek word is translated, "comparing" (II Cor. 10:12). WAHL (Clavis) translates, "explaining (as the Greek is translated, Gen. 40:8, LXX) to spiritual (i.e., Spirittaught) men, spiritual things (the things which we ourselves are taught by the Spirit)." Spirit-taught men alone can comprehend spiritual truths. This accords with vss. 6, 9, 10, 14, 15; ch. 3:1. ALFORD translates, "Putting together (combining) spirituals with spirituals"; i.e., attaching spiritual words to spiritual things, which we should not do, if we were to use words of worldly wisdom to expound spiritual things (so vss. 1, 4; I Pet. 4:11). Perhaps the generality of the neuters is designed to comprehend these several notions by implication. Comparing, or combining, spirituals with spirituals; implying both that spiritual things are only suited to spiritual persons (so "things" comprehended persons, ch. 1:27), and also that spiritual truths can only be combined with spiritual (not worldly-wise) words; and lastly, spirituals of the Old and New Testaments can only be understood by mutual comparison or combination, not by combination with worldly "wisdom," or natural perceptions (ch. 1:21, 22; 2:1, 4-9; cf. Ps. 119:18). 14. natural man—lit., "a man of animal soul." As contrasted with the spiritual man, he is governed by the animal soul, which overbears his spirit, which latter is without the Spirit of God (Jude 19). So the animal (English Version, "natural") body, or body led by the lower animal nature (including both the mere human fallen reason and heart), is contrasted with the Spiritquickened body (ch. 15:44-46). The carnal man (the man led by bodily appetites, and also by a self-exalting spirit, estranged from the divine life) is closely akin; so too the "earthly." "Devilish," or "demon-like"; "led by an evil spirit," is the awful character of such a one, in its worst type (Jas. 3:15). receiveth not—though they are offered to him, and are "worthy of being received by all men" (I Tim. 1:15). they are foolishness unto him—whereas he seeks "wisdom" (ch. 1: 22). neither can he—Not only does he not, but he cannot know them, and therefore has no wish to "receive" them (Rom. 8:7). 15. He that is spiritual—lit., "the spiritual (man)." In vs. 14, it is "A [not 'the,' as English Version] natural man." The spiritual is the man distinguished above his fellow men, as he in whom the Spirit rules. In the unregenrate, the spirit which ought to be the organ of the Holy Spirit (and which is so in the regenerate), is overridden by the animal soul, and is in abeyance, so that such a one is never called "spiritual." judgeth all things—and persons, by their true standard (cf.

ADAM CLARKE

Yea, the deep things of God. It is only the Spirit of God who can reveal the counsels of God. These are the purposes which have existed in His infinite wisdom and goodness from eternity; and particularly what refers to creation, providence, redemption, and eternal glory, as far as men and angels are concerned in these purposes. The apostles were so fully convinced that the scheme of redemption proclaimed by the gospel was divine that they boldly asserted that these things infinitely surpassed the wisdom and comprehension of man. The apostles were as truly conscious of their own inspiration as they were that they had consciousness at all; and what they spoke, they spoke as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.

12. Now we have received, not the spirit of the world. We who are the genuine apostles of Christ have received this Spirit of God, by which we know the deep things of God; and through the teaching of that Spirit we preach Christ crucified. We have not therefore received . . . the spirit of the world—of the Jewish teachers, who are all looking for a worldly kingdom and a worldly Messiah, and interpret all the scriptures of the Old Testament which relate to Him in a carnal and worldly sense. That we might know the things. It is evident that, as the apostle means by "princes of the world" the rulers of the Jews, vv. 6-8, so by spirit of the world he here means Jewish wisdom, or their carnal mode of interpreting the sacred oracles and their carnal expectation of a worldly kingdom under the Messiah.

13. Which things also we speak. We dare no more use the language of the Jews and the Gentiles in speaking of those glorious things than we can indulge their spirit. The Greek orators affected a high and florid language, full of tropes and figures, which dazzled more than it enlightened. The rabbins affected obscurity, and were studious to find out cabalistical meanings, which had no tendency to make the people wise unto salvation. The apostles could not follow any of these; they spoke the things of God in the words of God. Comparing spiritual things with spiritual. This is commonly understood to mean comparing the spiritual things under the Old Testament with the spiritual things under the New, but this does not appear to be the apostle's meaning. The word which we translate comparing rather signifies "conferring, discussing, or explaining"; and the word pneumatikois should be rendered "to spiritual men," and not be referred to spiritual things. The passage therefore should be thus translated: "Explaining spiritual things to spiritual persons." And this sense the following verse absolutely requires.

14. But the natural man. The animal man—the man who is in a mere state of nature, and lives under the influence of his animal passions. The person in question is not only one who either has had no spiritual teaching or has not profited by it, but one who lives for the present world, having no respect to spiritual or eternal things. This "animal man" is opposed to the "spiritual man"; and as this latter is one who is under the influence of the Spirit of God, so the former is one who is without that influence. But the natural man—The apostle appears to give this as a reason why he explained those deep spiritual things to spiritual men: because the "animal man"; the man who is in a state of nature, without the regenerating grace of the Spirit of God, receiveth not the things of the Spirit—neither apprehends nor comprehends them. He has no relish for them; he considers it the highest wisdom to live for this world.

15. But he that is spiritual judgeth all things. He who has the mind of Christ discerns and judges of all things spiritual, yet he himself is not discerned by the mere animal man. Some suppose that the word should be understood thus: "He examines, scrutinizes, convinces, reproves," which it appears to mean in chap. xiv. 24; and they read the verse thus: The spiritual man, the well-taught Christian, convinces, i.e.,

divine truths. It is the sanctified mind that must discern the real beauties of holiness; but they do not lose their power of discerning about common and natural things. The spiritual man may judge of all things, natural and supernatural, human and divine. But he himself is judged or discerned of no man. The carnal man knows no more of a spiritual man than he does of other spiritual things. The spiritual man does not lie open to his observation. He that is spiritual can judge both of common things and things divine. He does not lose the power of reasoning by founding his religion on revelation. But he himself is judged of no man—can be judged, so as to be confuted, by no man. He who founds all his knowledge upon principles of science, and the mere light of reason, can never be a judge of the truth or falsehood of what is received by revelation.

For who hath known the mind of the Lord, that he may instruct him (v. 16), that is, the spiritual man? Who can enter so far into the mind of God as to instruct him who has the Spirit of God, and is under his inspiration? Very few have known anything of the mind of God by a natural power. But, adds the apostle, we have the mind of Christ: and the mind of Christ is the mind of God. It is the great privilege of Christians that they have the mind of Christ.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

ch. 6:2-4; I John 4:1), in so far as he is spiritual. "Discerneth . . . is discerned," would better accord with the translation of the same Greek (vs. 14). Otherwise for "discerned," in vs. 14, translate, "judged of," to accord with the translation, "judgeth . . . is judged" in this 15th verse. He has a practical insight into the verities of the Gospel, though he is not infallible on all theoretical points. If an individual may have the Spirit without being infallible, why may not the Church have the Spirit, and yet not be infallible (a refutation of the plea of Rome for the Church's infallibility, from Matt. 28: 20; John 16:13)? As the believer and the Church have the Spirit, and are yet not therefore impeccable, so he and the Church have the Spirit, and yet are not infallible or impeccable. He and the Church are both infallible and impeccable, only in proportion to the degree in which they are led by the Spirit. The Spirit leads into all truth and holiness; but His influence on believers and on the Church is as yet partial. Jesus alone, who had the Spirit without measure (John 3:34), is both infallible and impeccable. Scripture, because it was written by men, who while writing were infallibly inspired, is unmixed truth (Prov. 28:5; I John 2:27). 16. For—proof of vs. 15, that the spiritual man "is judged of no man." In order to judge the spiritual man, the ordinary man must "know the mind of the Lord." But "who of ordinary men knows" that? that he may instruct him—i.e., so as to be able to set Him right as His counsellor (quoted from Isa. 40:13, 14). So the LXX translates the Greek verb, which means to "prove," in Acts 9:22. Natural men who judge spiritual men, living according to the mind of God ("We have the mind of Christ"), are virtually wishing to instruct God, and bring Him to another mind, as counsellors setting to right their king. we have the mind of Christ—in our degree of capability to apprehend it. Isaiah 40 refers to JEHOVAH: therefore, as it is applied here to Christ, He is Jehovah.

can easily convict, all men, every animal man, of error and vice; yet he himself is convicted of no man. His mind is enlightened and his life is holy, and therefore the animal man cannot convict him of sin. This is a good sense, but the first appears the most natural.

16. For who hath known the mind of the Lord? Who that is still an animal man can know the mind of God? so as to instruct him, viz., the spiritual man, the same that is spoken of in v. 15. But the words may be better understood thus: How can the animal man know the mind of the Lord? And how can any man communicate that knowledge which he has never acquired, and which is foolishness to him, because it is spiritual and he is animal? This quotation is made from Isa. xl. 13. But we have the mind of Christ. He has endowed us with the same disposition, being born again by His Spirit; therefore we are capable of knowing His mind and receiving the teachings of His Spirit. The words that he may instruct him should be translated "that he may teach it"; that is, the mind of God—not instruct God, but teach His mind to others.

Verses 1–4

Here, I. Paul blames the Corinthians for their weakness. Those who are renewed to a spiritual life may yet in many things be defective. The apostle tells them he could not speak to them as unto spiritual men, but as unto carnal men, as to babes in Christ, v. 1. It was but too evident they were much under the command of carnal and corrupt affections. They were still mere babes in Christ. They had received some of the first principles of Christianity, but had not grown up to maturity. He had communicated no more of the deep things of it to them.

They could not bear such food, they needed to be fed with milk, not with meat, v. 2. It is the duty of a faithful minister of Christ to consult the capacities of his hearers and teach them as they can bear. And yet it is natural for babes to grow up to men; and babes in Christ should endeavour to grow in stature, and become men in Christ. Christians are utterly to blame who do not endeavour to grow in grace and knowledge.

II. He blames them for their carnality, and mentions their contention and discord about their ministers as evidence of it: For you are yet carnal; for whereas there are among you envyings, and strifes, and divisions, are you not carnal, and walk as men? (v. 3). While one said, I am of Paul; and another, I am of Apollos, v. 4. Contentions and quarrels about religion are sad evidences of remaining carnality. True religion makes men peaceable and not contentious. Do not you walk as men? It is to be lamented that many who should walk as Christians, above the common rate of men, do indeed walk as men, live and act too much like other men.

Vss. 1-23. PAUL COULD NOT SPEAK TO THEM OF DEEP SPIRITUAL TRUTHS, AS THEY WERE CARNAL, CONTENDING FOR THEIR SEVERAL TEACHERS; THESE ARE NOTHING BUT WORKERS FOR GOD, TO WHOM THEY MUST GIVE ACCOUNT IN THE DAY OF FIERY JUDGMENT. THE HEARERS ARE GOD'S TEMPLE, WHICH THEY MUST NOT DEFILE BY CONTENTIONS FOR TEACHERS, WHO, AS WELL AS ALL THINGS, ARE THEIRS, BEING CHRIST'S. 1. And I—i.e., as the natural (animal) man cannot receive, so I also could not speak unto you the deep things of God, as I would to the spiritual; but I was compelled to speak to you as I would to MEN OF FLESH. The oldest MSS. read this for "carnal." The former (lit., "fleshy") implies men wholly of flesh, or natural. Carnal, or fleshly, implies not they were wholly natural or unregenerate (ch. 2:14), but that they had much of a carnal tendency; e.g., their divisions. Paul had to speak to them as he would to men wholly natural, inasmuch as they are still carnal (vs. 3) in many respects, notwithstanding their conversion (ch. 1:4-9). babes—contrasted with the perfect (fully matured) in Christ (Col 1:28; cf. Heb. 5:13, 14). This implies they were not men wholly of flesh, though carnal in tendencies. They had life in Christ, but it was weak. He blames them for being still in a degree (not altogether, cf. ch. 1:5, 7; therefore he says "as") babes in Christ, when by this time they ought to have "come unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ" (Eph. 4:13). In Romans 7:14, also the oldest MSS. read, "I am a man of flesh." 2. (Heb. 5:12.) milk—the elementary "principles of the doctrine of Christ." 3. envying—jealousy, rivalry. As this refers to their feelings, "strife" refers to their words, and "divisions" to their actions [BENGEL]. There is a gradation, or ascending climax: envying had produced strife, and strife divisions (factious parties) [GROTIUS]. His language becomes severer now as He proceeds; in ch. 1:11 he had only said "contentions," he now multiplies the words (cf. the stronger term, ch. 4:6, than in ch. 3:21). carnal—For "strife" is a "work of the flesh" (Gal. 5:20). The "flesh" includes all feelings that aim not at the glory of God, and the good of our neighbor, but at gratifying self. walk as men—as unregenerate men (cf. Matt. 16:23). "After the flesh, not after the Spirit" of God, as becomes you as regenerate by the Spirit (Rom. 8:4; Gal. 5:25, 26). 4. (Ch. 1:12.) are ye not carnal—The oldest MSS. read, "Are ye not men?" i.e., "walking as men" unregenerate (vs. 3). 5. Who then—Seeing then that ye severally strive so for your favorite teachers,

CHAPTER 3

1. I, brethren, could not speak unto you as unto spiritual. This is a continuation of the preceding discourse. But as unto carnal. Persons under the influence of fleshly appetites, coveting and living for the things of this life. Babes in Christ. Just beginning to acquire some notion of the Christian religion, but as yet very incapable of judging what is most suitable to yourselves, and consequently utterly unqualified to discern between one teacher and another; so that your making the distinctions which you do make, so far from being a proof of mature judgment, is on the contrary a proof that you have no right judgment at all; and this springs from your want of knowledge in divine things.

2. I have fed you with milk. I have instructed you in the elements of Christianity—in its simplest and easiest truths; because from the low state of your minds in religious knowledge, you were incapable of comprehending the higher truths of the gospel; and in this state you will still continue. The apostle thus exposes to them the absurdity of their conduct in pretending to judge between preacher and preacher while they had but a very partial acquaintance even with the first principles of Christianity.

3. There is among you envying, and strife, and divisions. There are three things here worthy of note: these people were wrong in thought, word, and deed. Envying refers to the state of their souls; they had inward grudgings and disaffection towards each other. Strife or "contention" refers to their words; they were continually disputing and contending whose party was the best, each endeavoring to prove that he and his party were alone in the right. Divisions refers to their conduct; as they could not agree, they contended till they separated from each other, and thus rent the Church of Christ. Thus the envying and grudging led to strife and evil speaking, and this led to divisions and fixed parties. In this state well might the apostle say, Are ye not carnal, and walk as men? You act just as the people of the world, and have no more of the spirit of religion than they.

4. For while one saith, I am of Paul. It was notorious that both Paul and Apollos held the same creed; between them there was not the slightest difference. When, therefore, the dissentients began to prefer the one to the other, it

Here the apostle instructs them how to cure this humour.

I. By reminding them that the ministers about whom they contended were but ministers: Who then is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ministers by whom you believed? Even as the Lord gave to every man, v. 5, mere instruments used by the God of all grace. We should take care not to deify ministers, nor put them into the place of God. All the gifts and powers that even apostles discovered and exerted in the work of the ministry were from God. They were intended to manifest their mission and doctrine to be divine. Paul had planted and Apollos had watered, v. 6. Both were useful, one for one purpose, the other for another. Paul was fitted for planting work, and Apollos for watering work, but God gave the increase.

The success of the ministry must be derived from the divine blessing: Neither he that planteth is anything, nor he that watereth, but God who giveth the increase, v. 7. Even apostolical ministers can do nothing with efficacy and success unless God give the increase. Paul and Apollos are nothing at all in their own account, but God is all in all.

II. By representing to them the unanimity of Christ's ministers: He that planteth and he that watereth are one (v. 8), employed by one Master, busied in one work, in harmony with one another, however they may be set in opposition to each other by factious party-makers. All the faithful ministers of Christ are one in the great business and intention of their ministry. All such may expect a glorious recompence of their fidelity, and in proportion to it: Every man shall receive his own reward, according to his own labour. Those that work hardest shall fare best. Those that are most faithful shall have the greatest reward.

They are labourers with God, fellow-labourers (v. 9). They are engaged in his business. They are working together with God, and he who knows their work will take care they do not labour in vain. The judgment of God is according to truth. He ever rewards in proportion to the diligence and faithfulness of his servants. They are always under his eye, employed in his husbandry and building; and therefore, to be sure, he will carefully look over them: "You are God's husbandry, you are God's building; and therefore are neither of Paul nor of Apollos. It is all for God that we have been doing among you." According to the grace of God which is given unto me, as a wise master-builder, I have laid the foundation, and another buildeth thereon. It was honourable to be a master-builder in the edifice of God; but it added to his character to be a wise one. But, though he gives himself such a character, it is not to gratify his own pride, but to magnify divine grace. He was a wise master-builder, but the grace of God made him such. Spiritual pride is abominable. But to take notice of the favours of God to promote our gratitude to him, and to speak of them to his honour, is but a proper expression of the duty and regard we owe him. Ministers should not be proud of their gifts or graces; but the better qualified they are for their work, and the more success they have in it, the more thankful should they be to God. I have laid the foundation, and another buildeth thereon. It was Paul that laid the foundation of a church among them. He would derogate from none that had done service among them, nor would he be robbed of his own honour and respect. Faithful ministers may and ought to have a concern for their own reputation. Their usefulness depends much upon it. But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereon. There may be very indifferent building on a good foundation. Nothing must be laid upon it but what the foundation will bear, and what is of a piece with it. Gold and dirt must not be mingled together. Ministers of Christ should take great care that they do not build their own fancies or false reasonings on the foundation of divine revelation.

Verses 11–15

Here the apostle informs us what foundation he had laid. Other foundation can no man lay besides what is laid—even Jesus Christ. The doctrine of our Saviour and his mediation is the principal doctrine of Christianity. It lies at the bottom, and is the foundation, of all the rest. But of those that hold the foundation there are two sorts:

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

"Who is (of what intrinsic power and dignity) Paul?" If so great an apostle reasons so of himself, how much more does humility, rather than self-seeking, become ordinary ministers! Paul... Apollos—The oldest MSS. read in the reverse order, "Apollos"... "Paul." He puts Apollos before himself in humility. but ministers...—The oldest MSS. have no "but." "Who is Apollos... Paul? (mere) ministers (a lowly word appropriate here, servants), by whom (not 'in whom'; by whose ministrations) ye believed." as... Lord gave to every man—i.e., to the several hearers, for it was GOD that "gave the increase" (vs. 6). 6. I... planted, Apollos watered—(Acts 18:1; 19:1). Apollos at his own desire (Acts 18:27) was sent by the brethren to Corinth, and there followed up the work which Paul had begun. God gave the increase—i.e., the growth (vs. 10; Acts 18:27). "Believed through grace." Though ministers are nothing, and God all in all, yet God works by instruments, and promises the Holy Spirit in the faithful use of means. This is the dispensation of the Spirit, and ours is the ministry of the Spirit. 7. neither is he that... anything... but God—viz., is all in all. "God" is emphatically last in the Greek. "He that giveth the increase (namely), GOD." Here follows a parenthesis from vs. 8 to vs. 21, where "Let no man glory in men" stands in antithetic contrast to "God" here. 8. one—essentially in their aim they are one, engaged in one and the same ministry; therefore they ought not to be made by you the occasion of forming separate parties. and every man—rather "but every man." Though in their service or ministry, they are essentially "one," yet every minister is separately responsible in "his own" work, and "shall receive his own (emphatically repeated) reward, according to his own labor." The reward is something over and above personal salvation (vss. 14, 15; II John 8). He shall be rewarded according to, not his success or the amount of work done, but "according to his own labor." It shall be said to him, "Well done, thou good and (not successful, but) faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord" (Matt. 25:23). 9. Translate, as the Greek collocation of words, and the emphasis on "God" thrice repeated, requires, "For (in proof that "each shall receive reward according to his own labor," viz., from God) it is of God that we are the fellow workers (laboring with, but under, and belonging to Him as His servants, II Cor. 5:20; 6:1; cf. Acts 15:4; Note, I Thess. 3:2) of God that ye are the field (or tillage), of God that ye are the building" [ALFORD]. "Building" is a new image introduced here, as suited better than that of husbandry, to set forth the different kinds of teaching and their results, which he is now about to discuss. "To edify" or "build up" the Church of Christ is similarly used (Eph. 2:21, 22; 4:29). 10. grace... given unto me—Paul puts this first, to guard against seeming to want humility, in pronouncing himself "a WISE master builder," in the clause following [CHRYSOSTOM]. The "grace" is that "given" to him in common with all Christians (vs. 5), only proportioned to the work which God had for him to do [ALFORD]. wise—i.e., skilful. His skill is shown in his laying a foundation. The unskilful builder lays none (Luke 6:49). Christ is the foundation (vs. 11). another—who ever comes after me. He does not name Apollos; for he speaks generally of all successors, whoever they be. His warning, "Let every man (every teacher) take heed how..." refers to other successors rather than Apollos, who doubtless did not, as they, build wood, hay, etc., on the foundation (cf. ch. 4: 15). "I have done my part, let them who follow me see (so the Greek for "take heed") to theirs" [BENGEL]. how—with what material [ALFORD]. How far wisely, and in builder-like style (I Pet. 4: 11). buildeth thereupon—Here the building or superstructure raised on Christ the "foundation," laid by Paul (ch. 2:2) is not, as in Ephesians 2:20, 21, the Christian Church made up of believers, the "lively stones" (I Peter 2:5), but the doctrinal and practical teaching which the teachers who succeeded Paul, superadded to his first teaching; not that they taught what was false, but their teaching was subtle and speculative reasoning, rather than solid and simple truth. 11. (Isa. 28:16; Acts 4:12; Eph. 2:20.) For—my warning ("take heed..." vs. 10) is as to the superstructure ("buildeth thereupon"), not as to the foundation: "For other foundation can no man lay, than that which has (already) been laid (by God) Jesus Christ," the person, not the mere abstract doctrine about Him, though the latter also is included; Jesus, GOD-SAVIOUR; Christ, MESSIAH or ANOINTED. can—A man can not lay any other, since the only one recognized by God was the fullest proof of their carnality, because in the doctrines of these apostles there was no difference, so that what the people were captivated by must be something in their outward manner, Apollos being probably more eloquent than Paul. Their preferring one to another on such an account proved that they were carnal—led by their senses and mere outward appearances, without being under the guidance of either reason or grace.

5. Ministers by whom ye believed. The different apostles who have preached unto you the word of life are the means which God has used to bring you to the knowledge of Christ. No one of those has either preached or recommended himself; they all preach and recommend Christ Jesus the Lord.

6. I have planted. I first sowed the seed of the gospel at Corinth, and in the region of Achaia. Apollos watered. Apollos came after me, and by his preachings and exhortations watered the seed which I had sowed. But God gave the increase. The seed has taken root, has sprung up, and borne much fruit; but this was by the especial blessing of God.

7. So then neither is he that planteth any thing. God alone should have all the glory, as the seed is His, the ground is His, the laborers are His, and the produce all comes from himself.

8. He that planteth and he that watereth are one. Both Paul and Apollos have received the same doctrine, preach the same doctrine, and labor to promote the glory of God in the salvation of your souls. Why should you be divided with respect to Paul and Apollos while these apostles are intimately one in spirit, design, and operation? According to his own labour. God does not reward His servants according to the success of their labor, because that depends on himself; but He rewards them according to the quantum of faithful labor which they bestow on His work.

9. For we are labourers together with God. It would perhaps be more correct to translate, "We are fellow laborers of God"; i.e., we labor together in the work of God. Far from being divided among ourselves, we jointly labor, as oxen in the same yoke, to promote the honor of our Master. Ye are God's husbandry, ye are God's building. The word which we translate husbandry signifies properly an "arable field"; so Prov. xxiv. 30: "I went by the field of the slothful"; and chap. xxxi. 16: The wise woman "considereth a field, and buyeth it." It would be more literal to translate it, "You are God's farm." Ye are God's building. You are not only the field which God cultivates, but you are the house which God builds, and in which He intends to dwell. As no man in viewing a fine building extols the quarryman that dug up the stones, the hewer that cut and squared them, the mason that placed them in the wall, the woodman that hewed down the timber, the carpenter that squared and jointed it, but the architect who planned it, and under whose direction the whole work was accomplished; so no man should consider Paul or Apollos or Cephas anything but as persons employed by the great Architect to form a building which is to become a habitation of himself through the Spirit, and the design of which is entirely His own.

10. As a wise masterbuilder. The design or plan of the building is from God; all things must be done according to the pattern which He has exhibited. But the execution of this plan was entrusted chiefly to Paul; he was the wise or "experienced architect" which God used in order to lay the foundation; to ascertain the essential and immutable doctrines of the gospel—those alone which came from God, and which alone He would bless to the salvation of mankind. Let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon. Let him take care that the doctrines which he preaches be answerable to those which I have preached; let him also take heed that he enjoin no other practice than that which is suitable to the doctrine, and in every sense accords with it.

11. Other foundation can no man lay. I do not speak particularly concerning the foundation of this spiritual building; it can have no other foundation than Jesus Christ. There cannot be

I. Some build upon this foundation gold, silver, and precious stones (v. 12), namely, those who hold nothing but the truth as it is in Jesus, and preach nothing else. This is building well upon a good foundation.

II. Others build wood, hay, and stubble, on this foundation; that is, though they adhere to the foundation, they depart from the mind of Christ in many particulars, and build upon the good foundation what will not abide the test when the day of trial shall come. There is a time coming when a discovery will be made of what men have built on this foundation: Every man's work shall be made manifest. Every man's work shall be made manifest to himself, and made manifest to others, both those that have been misled by him and those that have escaped his errors. There is a day coming that will show us ourselves, and show us our actions in the true light, without covering or disguise: For the day shall declare it (that is, every man's work), because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work, of what sort it is, v. 13. The day shall declare and make it manifest, the last day, the great day of trial; see ch. iv. 5. There is a day coming that will distinguish one man from another, and one man's work from another's, as the fire distinguishes gold from dross, or metal that will bear the fire from other materials that will be consumed in it.

Some men's works will abide the trial. It will appear that they not only hold the foundation, but that they built regularly and well upon it. The foundation and the superstructure were all of a piece. And such a builder shall not, cannot fail of a reward. He will have praise and honour in that day, and eternal recompence after it. Fidelity in the ministers of Christ will meet with a full and ample reward in a future life. And, Lord, how great! how much exceeding their deserts! There are others whose works shall be burnt (v. 15). The great day will pluck off all disguises, and make things appear as they are: He whose work shall be burnt will suffer loss. If he have built upon the right foundation wood and hay and stubble, he will suffer loss, though he may in the general have been an honest and an upright Christian. This part of his work will be lost, though he himself may be saved. Those who hold the foundation of Christianity, though they build hay, wood, and stubble, upon it, may be saved. This may help to enlarge our charity. Nothing will damn men but wickedness. He shall be saved, yet so as by fire, saved out of the fire. God will have no mercy on their works, though he may pluck them as brands out of the burning.

Verses 16, 17

Here the apostle resumes his argument, founding it on his former allusion, You are God's building, v. 9. Know you not that you are the temple of God, and the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? If any man defile (corrupt and destroy) the temple of God, him shall God destroy (the same word is in the original in both clauses), for the temple of God is holy, which temple you are. It looks from other parts of the epistle (see ch. vi. 13–20), as if the false teachers among the Corinthians were not only loose livers, but taught licentious doctrines. Such doctrine was not to be reckoned among hay and stubble, which would be consumed while the person who laid them on the foundation escaped the burning. Those who spread principles of this sort would provoke God to destroy them. Know you not that you are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? Christian has been already laid. 12. Now—rather, "But." The image is that of a building on a solid foundation, and partly composed of durable and precious, partly of perishable, materials. The "gold, silver, precious stones," which all can withstand fire (Rev. 21:18, 19), are teachings that will stand the fiery test of judgment; "wood, hay, stubble," are those which cannot stand it; not positive heresy, for that would destroy the foundation, but teaching mixed up with human philosophy and Judaism, curious rather than useful. Besides the teachings, the superstructure represents also the persons cemented to the Church by them, the reality of whose conversion, through the teachers' instrumentality, will be tested at the last day. Where there is the least grain of real gold of faith, it shall never be lost (I Pet. 1:7; cf. ch. 4:12). On the other hand, the lightest straw feeds the fire [BENGEL] (Matt. 5:19). 13. Every man's work—each teacher's superstructure on the foundation. the day—of the Lord (ch. 1:8; Heb. 10:25; I Thess. 5:4). The article is emphatic, "The day," i.e., the great day of days, the long expected day. declare it—old English for "make it clear" (ch. 4:4). it shall be revealed by fire—it, i.e., "every man's work." Rather, "He," the Lord, whose day it is (II Thess. 1:7, 8). Translate lit., "is being revealed (the present in the Greek implies the certainty and nearness of the event, Rev. 22:10, 20) in fire" (Mal. 3:3; 4:1). The fire (probably figurative here, as the gold, hay, etc.) is not purgatory (as Rome teaches, i.e., purificatory and punitive), but probatory, not restricted to those dying in "venial sin"; the supposed intermediate class between those entering heaven at once, and those dying in mortal sin who go to hell, but universal, testing the godly and ungodly alike (II Cor. 5:10; cf. Mark 9:49). This fire is not till the last day, the supposed fire of purgatory begins at death. The fire of Paul is to try the works, the fire of purgatory the persons, of men. Paul's fire causes "loss" to the sufferers; Rome's purgatory, great gain, viz., heaven at last to those purged by it, if only it were true. Thus this passage, quoted by Rome for, is altogether against, purgatory. "It was not this doctrine that gave rise to prayers for the dead; but the practice of praying for the dead [which crept in from the affectionate but mistaken solicitude of survivors] gave rise to the doctrine" [WHATELY]. 14. abide—abide the testing fire (Matt. 3:11, 12). which he hath built thereupon—which he built on the foundation. reward—wages, as a builder, i.e., teacher. His converts built on Christ the foundation, through his faithful teaching, shall be his "crown of rejoicing" (II Cor. 1:14; Phil. 2: 16; I Thess. 2:19). 15. If . . . be burnt—if any teacher's work consist of such materials as the fire will destroy [ALFORD]. suffer loss—i.e., forfeit the special "reward"; not that he shall lose salvation (which is altogether a free gift, not a "reward" or wages), for he remains still on the foundation (vs. 12; II John 6). saved; yet so as by fire—rather, "so as through fire" (Zech. 3:2; Amos 4:11; Jude 23). "Saved, yet not without fire" (Rom. 2:27) [BENGEL]. As a builder whose building, not the foundation, is consumed by fire, escapes, but with the loss of his work [ALFORD]; as the shipwrecked merchant, though he has lost his merchandise, is saved, though having to pass through the waves [BENGEL]. Malachi 3:1, 2; and 4:1, give the key to explain the imagery. The "Lord suddenly coming to His temple" in flaming "fire," all the parts of the building which will not stand that fire will be consumed; the builders will escape with personal salvation, but with the loss of their work, through the midst of the conflagration [ALFORD]. Again, a distinction is recognized between minor and fundamental doctrines (if we regard the superstructure as representing the doctrines superadded to the elementary essentials); a man may err as to the former, and yet be saved, but not so as to the latter (cf. Phil. 3:15). 16. Know ye not—It is no new thing I tell you, in calling you "God's building"; ye know and ought to remember, ye are the noblest kind of building, "the temple of God." ye—all Christians form together one vast temple. The expression is not, "ye are temples," but "ye are the temple" collectively, and "lively stones" (I Pet. 2:5) individually. God . . . Spirit—God's indwelling, and that of the Holy Spirit, are one; therefore the Holy Spirit is God. No literal "temple" is recognized by the New Testament in the Christian Church. The only one is the spiritual temple, the whole body of believing worshippers in which the Holy Spirit dwells (ch. 6: 19; John 4:23, 24). The synagogue, not the temple, was the model of the Christian house of worship. The temple was the house of sacrifice, rather than of prayer. Prayers in the temple were silent two opinions on this subject among the true apostles of our Lord. The only fear is lest an improper use should be made of this heavenly doctrine, lest a bad superstructure should be raised on this Foundation.

12. If any man build . . . gold, silver. By gold, silver, and precious stones the apostle certainly means pure and wholesome doctrines; by wood, hay, and stubble, false doctrines, such as at that time prevailed in the Corinthian church.

13. The day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire. There is much difference of opinion relative to the meaning of the terms in this and the following two verses. That the apostle refers to the approaching destruction of Jerusalem I think very probable; and when this is considered, all the terms and metaphors will appear clear and consistent. The day is the time of punishment coming on this disobedient and rebellious people. And this day being revealed by fire points out the extreme rigor and totally destructive nature of that judgment. And the fire shall try every man's work. If the apostle refers to the Judaising teachers and their insinuations that the law, especially circumcision, was of eternal obligation, then the day of fire—the time of vengeance—which was at hand, would sufficiently disprove such assertions as, in the judgment of God, the whole Temple service should be destroyed; and the people, who fondly presumed on their permanence and stability, should be dispossessed of their land and scattered over the face of the whole earth.

14. If any man's work abide. Perhaps there is here an allusion to the purifying of different sorts of vessels under the law. All that could stand the fire were to be purified by the fire; and those which could not resist the action of the fire were to be purified by water, Num. xxxi. 23. The "gold," "silver," and "precious stones" could stand the fire; but the "wood," "hay," and "stubble" must be necessarily consumed. So, in that great and terrible day of the Lord, all false doctrine, as well as the system that was to pass away, should be made sufficiently manifest; and God would then show that the gospel, and that alone, was that system of doctrine which He should bless and protect, and none other.

15. If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss. If he have preached the necessity of incorporating the law with the gospel, or proclaimed as a doctrine of God anything which did not proceed from heaven, he shall suffer loss—all his time and labor will be found to be uselessly employed and spent. But he himself shall be saved. If he have sincerely and conscientiously believed what he preached, and yet preached what was wrong, not through malice or opposition to the gospel, but through mere ignorance, he shall be saved. God in His mercy will pass by his errors, and he shall not suffer punishment because he was mistaken. Yet, as in most erroneous teachings there is generally a portion of willful and obstinate ignorance, the salvation of such erroneous teachers is very rare; and is expressed here, yet so as by fire, i.e., with great difficulty. The apostle obviously refers to the case of a man who, having builded a house and begun to dwell in it, the house happens to be set on fire, and he has warning of it just in time to escape with his life, losing at the same time his house, his goods, his labor, and almost his own life. So he who, while he holds the doctrine of Christ crucified as the only foundation on which a soul can rest its hopes of salvation, builds at the same time on that foundation Antinomianism or any other erroneous or destructive doctrine, he shall lose all his labor, his own soul scarcely escape everlasting perdition; nor even this unless sheer ignorance and inveterate prejudice, connected with much sincerity, be found in his case.

16. Ye are the temple of God. The apostle resumes here what he had asserted in v. 9: "Ye are God's building." As the whole congregation of Israel were formerly considered as the temple and habitation of God, because God dwelt among them, so here the whole church of Corinth is called the temple of God, because all genuine believers have the Spirit of God to dwell in them; and Christ has promised to be churches are temples of God. He dwells among them by his Holy Spirit. Every Christian is a living temple of the living God. Christ by his Spirit dwells in all true believers. The temple was set apart from every common to a holy use, to the immediate service of God. So all Christians are separated from common uses, and set apart for God and his service. They are sacred to him. Christians are holy by profession, and should be pure and clean both in heart and conversation.

Here he prescribes humility for the remedy of the irregularities in the Church of Corinth: "Let no man deceive himself (v. 18). Do not be led away from the truth and simplicity of the gospel." We are in great danger of deceiving ourselves when we have too high an opinion of human wisdom and arts. But he who seems to be wise must become a fool that he may be wise. He must be sensible of his own ignorance, and lament it; he must distrust his own understanding, and not lean on it. The person who resigns his own understanding, that he may follow the instruction of God, is in the way to true and everlasting wisdom. He that has a low opinion of his own knowledge and powers will submit to better information; but the proud man, conceited of his own wisdom and understanding, will undertake to correct even divine wisdom itself. We must abase ourselves before God if we would be either truly wise or good: For the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God, v. 19. There can be no more comparison between his wisdom and ours than between his power and being and ours. There is no common measure by which to compare finite and infinite. And much more is the wisdom of man foolishness with God when set in competition with his. How justly does he despise, how easily can he baffle and confound it! He knows the thoughts of the wise, that they are vain (v. 20). God has a perfect knowledge of the thoughts of men, their most secret counsels and purposes. And he knows them to be vanity. And should not all this teach us modesty, and a deference to the wisdom of God? He who would be wise indeed must learn of God, and not set his own wisdom up in competition with God's.

An exhortation against over-valuing their teachers. They had an equal interest in all their ministers: Therefore let no man glory in men (v. 21)—forget that their ministers are men, or pay that deference to them that is due only to God, set them at the head of parties. The only way to avoid this mischief is to have a due sense of the common weakness of human understanding, and an entire deference to the wisdom of God. Ministers are not to be set up in competition with one another. They were appointed of Christ, for the common benefit of the church: "Paul, and Apollos, and Cephas, are all yours. All are to be valued and used for your own spiritual benefit." Upon this occasion also he gives in an inventory of the church's possessions, the spiritual riches of a true believer: "All is yours. Nay, the world itself is yours. Life is yours, that you may prepare for the life of heaven; and death is yours, that you may go to the possession of it. It is the kind messenger that will fetch you to your Father's house. Things present are yours, for your support on the road; things to come are yours, to enrich you for ever at your journey's end." All is ours, time and eternity, earth and heaven, life and death. But it must be remembered, at the same time, that we are Christ's. All things are ours, upon no other ground than our being Christ's. Those that would be safe for time, and happy to eternity, must be Christ's. And Christ is God's. He is the Christ of God, anointed of God, and commissioned by him. God in Christ reconciling a sinful world to himself, and shedding abroad the riches of and individual (Luke 1:10; 18:10-13), not joint and public, nor with reading of Scripture, as in the synagogue. The temple, as the name means (from a Greek root "to dwell"), was the earthly dwelling place of God, where alone He put His name. The synagogue (as the name means an assembly) was the place for assembling men. God now too has His earthly temple, not one of wood and stone, but the congregation of believers, the "living stones" on the "spiritual house." Believers are all spiritual priests in it. Jesus Christ, our High Priest, has the only literal priesthood (Mal. 1:11; Matt. 18:20; I Pet. 2: 5) [VITRINGA]. 17. If any . . . defile . . . destroy—rather as the Greek verb is the same in both cases, "destroy . . . destroy." God repays in kind by a righteous retaliation. The destroyer shall himself be destroyed. As temporal death was the penalty of marring the material temple (Lev. 16:2; Dan. 5: 2, 3, 30), so eternal death is the penalty of marring the spiritual temple—the Church. The destroyers here (vss. 16, 17), are distinct from the unwise or unskilful builders (vss. 12, 15); the latter held fast the "foundation" (vs. 11), and, therefore, though they lose their work of superstructure and the special reward, yet they are themselves saved; the destroyers, on the contrary, assailed with false teaching the foundation, and so subvert the temple itself, and shall therefore be destroyed. (See Note, vs. 10), [ESTIUS and NEANDER]. I think Paul passes here from the teachers to all the members of the Church, who, by profession, are "priests unto God" (Exod. 19:6; I Pet. 2:9; Rev. 1:6). As the Aaronic priests were doomed to die if they violated the old temple (Exod. 28:43), so any Christian who violates the sanctity of the spiritual temple, shall perish eternally (Heb. 12:14: 10:26, 31). holy—inviolable (Hab. 2:20). which temple ye are—rather, "the which (i.e., holy) are ye" [ALFORD], and, therefore, want of holiness on the part of any of you (or, as ESTIUS, "to tamper with the foundation in teaching you") is a violation of the temple, which cannot be let to pass with impunity. GROTIUS supports English Version. 18. seemeth—i.e., is, and is regarded by himself and others. wise in this world—wise in mere worldly wisdom (ch. 1:20). let him become a fool—by receiving the Gospel in its unworldly simplicity, and so becoming a fool in the world's sight [ALFORD]. Let him no longer think himself wise, but seek the true wisdom from God, bringing his understanding into captivity to the obedience of faith [ESTIUS]. 19. with God—in the judgment of God. it is written—in Job 5:13. The formula of quoting SCRIPTURE used here, establishes the canonicity of Job. He taketh . . . wise in . . . own craftiness—proving the "foolishness" of the world's wisdom, since it is made by God the very snare to catch those who think themselves so wise. Lit., "He who taketh . . ." the whole of the sentence not being quoted, but only the part which suited Paul's purpose. 20. Quotation from Psalm 94:11. There it is of men; here it is "of the wise." Paul by inspiration states the class of men whose "thoughts" (or rather, "reasonings," as suits the Greek and the sense of the context) the Spirit designated in the Psalm, "vanity," viz., the "proud" (vs. 2) and worldly-wise, whom God in vs. 8 calls "fools," though they "boast themselves" of their wisdom in pushing their interests (vs. 4). 21. let no man glory in men—resuming the subject from vs. 4; cf. ch. 1:12 and 31, where the true object of glorying is stated: "He that glorieth, let him glory in THE LORD." Also ch. 4:6, "That no one of you be puffed up for one against another." For all things—not only all men. For you to glory thus in men, is lowering yourselves from your high position as heirs of all things. All men (including your teachers) belong to Christ, and therefore to you, by your union with Him; He makes them and all things work together for your good (Romans 8:28). Ye are not for the sake of them, but they for the sake of you (II Cor. 4:5, 15). They belong to you, not you to them. 22. Enumeration of some of the "all things." The teachers, in whom they gloried, he puts first (ch. 1:12). He omits after "Cephas" or Christ (to whom exclusively some at Corinth, ch. 1:12, professed to belong); but, instead, substitutes "ye are Christ's" (vs. 23). world . . . life . . . death . . . things present . . . things to come—Not only shall they not "separate you from the love of God in Christ" (Rom 8:38, 39), but they "all are yours," i.e., are for you (Rom. 8:28), and belong to you, as they belong to Christ your Head (Heb. 1:2). things present—"things actually present" [ALFORD]. 23. ye are Christ's—not Paul's, or Apollos', or Cephas' (ch. 11:3; Matt. 23: 8-10). "Neither be ye called masters; for one is your Master, even Christ" (Rom. 14:8). Not merely a particular section of you, but always in the midst even of two or three who are gathered together in His name. Therefore where God is, there is His temple.

17. If any man defile the temple. "If any man destroy the temple of God, him will God destroy." The verb is the same in both clauses. If any man injure, corrupt, or destroy the church of God by false doctrine, God will destroy him—will take away his part out of the book of life.

18. If any man among you seemeth to be wise. "If any pretend or affect to be wise." This seems to refer to some individual in the church of Corinth who had been very troublesome to its peace and unity. Let him become a fool. Let him divest himself of his worldly wisdom, and be contented to be called a fool, and esteemed one, that he may become wise unto salvation, by renouncing his own wisdom and seeking that which comes from God. But probably the apostle refers to him who, pretending to great wisdom and information, taught doctrines contrary to the gospel.

19. The wisdom of this world, whether it be the pretended deep and occult wisdom of the rabbins or the wire-drawn speculations of the Grecian philosophers, is foolishness with God; for as folly consists in spending time, strength, and pains to no purpose, so these may be fitly termed fools who acquire no saving knowledge by their speculations. He taketh the wise in their own craftiness. This is a quotation from Job. v. 13, and powerfully shows what the wisdom of this world is. It is a sort of craft, a subtle trade, which they carry on to wrong others and benefit themselves; and they have generally too much cunning to be caught by men, but God often overthrows them with their own devisings.

20. The Lord knoweth the thoughts of the wise. They are always full of schemes and plans for earthly good; and God knows that all this is vain, "empty," and unsatisfactory, and will stand them in no stead when He comes to take away their souls. This is a quotation from Ps. xciv. 11. What is here said of the vanity of human knowledge is true of every kind of wisdom that leads not immediately to God himself.

22. Whether Paul, or Apollos. As if he had said: God designs to help you by all things and persons; every teacher sent from Him will become a blessing to you if you abide faithful to your calling. Or the world. The word cosmos here means rather the inhabitants of the world than what we commonly understand by the world itself; and this is its meaning in John iii. 16-17; vi. 33; xiv. 31; xvii. 21. See particularly John xii. 19. The apostle's meaning evidently is: Not only Paul, Apollos, and Cephas are yours—appointed for and employed in your service—but every person besides with whom you may have any intercourse or connection, whether Jew or Greek, whether enemy or friend. Or life, with all its trials and advantages; every hour of it, every tribulation in it, the whole course of it, as the grand state of your probation, is a general blessing to you. Or death. That solemn hour, so dreadful to the wicked, and so hateful to those who live without God—that is yours. Death is your servant. He comes a special messenger from God for you; he comes to undo a knot that now connects body and soul, which it would be unlawful for yourselves to untie. He comes to take your souls to glory; and he cannot come before his due time to those who are waiting for the salvation of God. Or things present. Every occurrence in providence in the present life, for God rules in providence as well as in grace. Or things to come. The whole order and economy of the eternal world; all in heaven and all in earth are even now working together for your good.

23. And ye are Christ's. "You are of Christ"; all the light and life which you enjoy you have received through and from Him, and He has bought you with His blood. And Christ is God's. "And Christ is of God." Christ, the his grace on a reconciled world, is the sum and substance of the gospel.

CHAPTER 4

I. The apostle challenges the respect due to him on account of his character and office. Let a man so account of us as of the ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God (v. 1). In our opinion of ministers we should be careful to avoid extremes. Apostles themselves were, 1. Not to be overvalued, for they were ministers, not masters. They were servants of Christ, and no more. They had no authority to propagate their own fancies, but to spread Christian faith. 2. Apostles were not to be undervalued; for, they were ministers of Christ. They are not stewards of the common things of the world, but of divine mysteries. They did not set up for masters, but they deserved respect and esteem in this honourable service. Especially,

II. When they did their duty in it. It is required in stewards that a man be found faithful (v. 2), trustworthy. The stewards in Christ's family must appoint what he hath appointed. They must teach what he hath commanded.

When they have the testimony of a good conscience, and the approbation of their Master, they must slight the opinions and censures of their fellow-servants: But with me, saith the apostle, it is a small thing that I should be judged of you, or of man's judgment, v. 3. Indeed, reputation and esteem among men are a good step towards usefulness in the ministry. But he that would make it his chief endeavour to please men would hardly approve himself a faithful servant of Christ, Gal. i. 10. He that would be faithful to Christ must despise the censures of men for his sake. The best of men are too apt to judge rashly, and harshly. It is a comfort that men are not to be our final judges. Nay, we are not thus to judge ourselves: "Yea, I judge not myself. For though I know nothing by myself, cannot charge myself with unfaithfulness, yet am I not thereby justified; but he that judgeth me is the Lord. It is his judgment that must determine me. Such I am as he shall find and judge me to be."

III. The apostle takes occasion hence to caution the Corinthians against censoriousness: Therefore judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, v. 5. It is judging out of season, judging persons' future state, or the secret springs and principles of their actions. To judge in these cases is to assume the seat of God. How bold a sinner is the forward and severe censurer! How ill-timed and arrogant are his censures! But there is one who will judge the censurer, and those he censures. This should make them now cautious of judging others, and careful in judging themselves. There is a time coming when the Lord will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and make manifest the counsels of the hearts. There is a day coming that will fetch men's secret sins into open day and discover the secrets of their hearts. The Lord Jesus Christ will manifest the counsels of the heart, of all hearts. The Lord Jesus Christ must have the knowledge of the counsels of the heart, else ye all are Christ's (ch. 1:12). Christ is God's—(ch. 11:3). God is the ultimate end of all, even of Christ, His co-equal Son (ch. 15:28; Phil. 2:6-11).

CHAPTER 4

Vss. 1-21. TRUE VIEW OF MINISTERS: THE JUDGMENT IS NOT TO BE FORESTALLED; MEANWHILE THE APOSTLES' LOW STATE CONTRASTS WITH THE CORINTHIANS' PARTY PRIDE, NOT THAT PAUL WOULD SHAME THEM, BUT AS A FATHER WARN THEM; FOR WHICH END HE SENT TIMOTHY, AND WILL SOON COME HIMSELF. 1. account . . . us—Paul and Apollos. ministers of Christ—not heads of the Church in whom ye are severally to glory (ch. 1:12); the headship belongs to Christ alone; we are but His servants ministering to you (ch. 1:13; 3:5, 22). stewards—(Luke 12:42; I Pet. 4:10). Not the depositories of grace, but dispensers of it ("rightly dividing" or dispensing it), so far as God gives us it, to others. The chazan, or overseer, in the synagogue answered to the bishop or "angel" of the Church, who called seven of the synagogue to read the law every sabbath, and oversaw them. The parnasin of the synagogue, like the ancient "deacon" of the Church, took care of the poor (Acts 6) and subsequently preached in subordination to the presbyters or bishops, as Stephen and Philip did. The Church is not the appendage to the priesthood; but the minister is the steward of God to the Church. Man shrinks from too close contact with God; hence he willingly puts a priesthood between, and would serve God by deputy. The pagan (like the modern Romish) priest was rather to conceal than to explain "the mysteries of God." The minister's office is to "preach" (lit., "proclaim as a herald," Matt. 10:27) the deep truths of God ("mysteries," heavenly truths, only known by revelation), so far as they have been revealed, and so far as his hearers are disposed to receive them. JOSEPHUS says that the Jewish religion made known to all the people the mysteries of their religion, while the pagans concealed from all but the "initiated" few, the mysteries of theirs. 2. Moreover—The oldest MSS. read, "Moreover here" (i.e., on earth). The contrast thus is between man's usage as to stewards (vs. 2), and God's way (vs. 3). Though here below, in the case of stewards, inquiry is made, that one man be found (i.e., proved to be) faithful; yet God's steward awaits no such judgment of man, in man's day, but the Lord's judgment in His great day. Another argument against the Corinthians for their partial preferences of certain teachers for their gifts: whereas what God requires in His stewards is faithfulness (I Sam. 3:20; Heb. 3:5; Margin); as indeed is required in earthly stewards, but with this difference (vs. 3), that God's stewards await not man's judgment to test them, but the testing which shall be in the day of the Lord. 3. it is a very small thing—lit., "it amounts to a very small matter"; not that I despise your judgment, but as compared with God's, it almost comes to nothing. judged . . . of man's judgment—lit., "man's day," contrasted with the day (ch. 3:13) of the Lord (vs. 5; I Thess. 5:4). "The day of man" is here put before us as a person [WAHL]. All days previous to the day of the Lord are man's days. EMESTI translates the thrice recurring Greek for "judged . . . judge . . . judgeth" (vs. 4), thus: To me for my part (though capable of being found faithful) it is a very small matter that I should be approved of by man's judgment; yea, I do not even assume the right of judgment and approving myself—but He that has the right, and is able to judge on my case (the Dijudicator), is the Lord. 4. by myself—Translate, "I am conscious to myself of no (ministerial) unfaithfulness." BENGEL explains the Greek compound, "to decide in judgments on one in relation to others," not simply to judge. am I not hereby justified—Therefore conscience is not an infallible guide. Paul did not consider his so. This verse is directly against the judicial power claimed by the priests of Rome. 5. Disproving the judicial power claimed by the Romish priesthood in the confessional. Therefore—as the Lord is the sole Decider or Dijudicator. judge—not the same Greek word as in vss. 3, 4, where the meaning is to approve of, or decide on, the merits of one's case. Here all judgments in general are forbidden, which would, on our part, presumptuously forestall God's prerogative of final judgment. Lord—Jesus Christ, whose "ministers" we are (vs. 1), and who is to be the judge (John 5:22, 27; Acts 10:42; 17:31). manifest . . . hearts—Our judgments now (as those of the Corinthians respecting their teachers) are necessarily defective; as we only see the outward act, we

Messiah, is the Gift of God's eternal love and mercy to mankind.

1. Let a man so account of us. This is a continuation of the subject in the preceding chapter, and should not have been divided from it. The fourth chapter would have begun better at v. 6, and the third should have ended with the fifth verse. As of the ministers of Christ. The word means an "under-rower," or one who, in the trireme, quadrireme, or quinquereme galleys, rowed in one of the undermost benches; but it means also, as used by the Greek writers, any inferior officer or assistant. By the term here the apostle shows the Corinthians that, far from being heads and chiefs, he and his fellow apostles considered themselves only as inferior officers, employed under Christ; from whom alone they received their appointment, their work, and their recompense. Stewards of the mysteries of God. "Economists" of the divine mysteries. The steward was the master's deputy in regulating the concerns of the family, providing food for the household, seeing it served out at the proper times and seasons, and in proper quantities. He received all the cash, expended what was necessary for the support of the family, and kept exact accounts, which he was obliged at certain times to lay before the master. The mysteries, the doctrines of God, relative to the salvation of the world by the passion and death of Christ; and the inspiration, illumination, and purification of the soul by the Spirit of Christ, constituted a principal part of the divine treasure intrusted to the hands of the stewards by their heavenly Master.

3. It is a very small thing that I should be judged of you. Those who preferred Apollos or Cephas before Paul would of course give their reasons for this preference; and these might, in many instances, be very unfavorable to his character as a man, a Christian, or an apostle. Of this he was regardless, as he sought not his own glory, but the glory of God in the salvation of their souls. Or of man's judgment. Literally, "or of man's day": any day set apart by a judge or magistrate to try a man on. I judge not mine own self. I leave myself entirely to God, whose I am, and whom I serve.

4. For I know nothing by myself. I am not conscious that I am guilty of any evil, or have neglected to fulfill faithfully the duty of a steward of Jesus Christ. The import of the verb is "to be conscious of guilt." Yet am I not hereby justified. I do not pretend to say that though I am not conscious of any offense towards God I must therefore be pronounced innocent. No. I leave those things to God; He shall pronounce in my favor, not I myself. By these words the apostle, in a very gentle yet effectual manner, censures those rash and precipitate judgments which the Corinthians were in the habit of pronouncing on both men and things—a conduct than which nothing is more reprehensible and dangerous.

5. Judge nothing before the time. God, the righteous Judge, will determine everything shortly; it is His province alone to search the heart, and bring to light the hidden things of darkness.

MATTHEW HENRY

he could not make them manifest. We should be very careful how we censure others, when we have to do with a Judge from whom we cannot conceal ourselves. When he shall come to judge, every man shall have praise of God. Every man, that is, everyone qualified for it. Christians may well be patient under unjust censures, when they know such a day as this is coming. But how fearful should they be of loading any with reproaches now whom their common Judge shall hereafter commend.

IV. The apostle here lets us into the reason why he had used his own name and that of Apollos in this discourse of his. He had done it in a figure, and he had done it for their sakes. He chose rather to mention his own name, and the name of a faithful fellow-labourer, than the names of any heads of factions among them, that hereby he might avoid what would provoke. That they might learn not to think of men above what is written, nor be puffed up for one against another (v. 6). Apostles were not to be esteemed other than servants of Christ. We must be very careful not to transfer the honour and authority of the Master to his servant. We must not think of them above what is written. Pride commonly lies at the bottom of these quarrels. We shall not be puffed up for one against another if we remember that they are all instruments employed by God in his husbandry and building, and endowed by him with their various talents and qualifications.

Here the apostle improves the foregoing hint to a caution against pride and self-conceit.

I. He cautions them against pride; all the distinction made among them was owing to God: Who maketh thee to differ? And what hast thou that thou didst not receive? (v. 7). Here the apostle turns his discourse to the ministers who set themselves at the head of these factions. What had they to glory in, when all their peculiar gifts were from God? But it may be taken as a general maxim: We have no reason to be proud of our attainments, or performances; all that we have, or are, or do, that is good, is owing to the free and rich grace of God. Boasting is for ever excluded. Those who receive all should be proud of nothing. Due attention to our obligations to divine grace would cure us of arrogance and self-conceit.

II. He presses the duty of humility upon them by a very smart irony: "You are full, you are rich, you have reigned as kings without us. You have not only a sufficiency, but an affluence, of spiritual gifts; nay, you can make them the matter of your glory without us." There is a very elegant gradation from sufficiency to wealth, and thence to royalty, to intimate how much the Corinthians were elated by the abundance of their wisdom and spiritual gifts. "You have reigned as kings," says the apostle, "that is, in your own conceit; and I would to God you did reign, that we also might reign with you. I wish you had as much of the true glory of a Christian church upon you as you arrogate to yourselves." Those do not commonly know themselves best who think best of themselves. The Corinthians might have reigned, and the apostle with them, if they had not been blown up with an imaginary royalty. Pride is a great prejudice to our improvement. He is stopped from growing wiser or better who thinks himself at the height; not only full, but rich, nay, a king.

III. He comes to set forth his own circumstances and those of the other apostles, and compares them with theirs. 1. To set forth the case of the apostles: For I think it hath pleased God to set forth us the apostles last, as it were appointed to death. For we are made a spectacle to the world, and to angels, and to men. Never were any men in this world so hunted and worried. An allusion is made to some of the bloody spectacles in the Roman amphitheatres, where the victor did not escape with his life, but was only reserved for another combat, so that such wretched criminals might very properly be called persons devoted or appointed to death. They are said to be set forth last, because those who combated one another in the after-part of the day, were most exposed, being obliged to fight naked. The general meaning is that the apostles were exposed to continual danger of death. God had set them forth. The apostles were shown to manifest the power of divine grace, to confirm the truth of their mission and doctrine. These were ends worthy of God—noble views, fit to animate them to the combat. The office of an apostle was, as an honourable, so a hard and hazardous one: "For we are made a spectacle to the world, and to angels, and to men, v. 9. A show. Angels and men are witnesses to our persecutions, patience, and magnanimity. They all see that we suffer for our fidelity to Christ. How sharp our sufferings, and how patiently we endure them, by the power of divine cannot see the motives of "hearts." "Faithfulness" (vs. 2) will hereby be estimated, and the "Lord" will "justify," or the reverse (vs. 4), according to the state of the heart. then shall every man have praise—(ch. 3:8; I Sam. 26:23; Matt. 25:21, 23; 28). Rather, "his due praise," not exaggerated praise, such as the Corinthians heaped on favorite teachers; "the praise" (so the Greek) due for acts estimated by the motives. "Then," not before: therefore wait till then (Jas. 5:7). 6. And—"Now," marking transition. in a figure transferred to myself—i.e., I have represented under the persons of Apollos and myself what really holds good of all teachers, making us two a figure or type of all the others. I have mentioned us two, whose names have been used as a party cry; but under our names I mean others to be understood, whom I do not name, in order not to shame you [ESTIUS]. not to think . . .—The best MSS. omit "think." Translate, "That in us (as your example) ye might learn (this), not (to go) beyond what is written." Revere the silence of Holy Writ, as much as its declarations: so you will less dogmatize on what is not expressly revealed (Deut. 29:29). puffed up for one—viz., "for one (favorite minister) against another." The Greek indicative implies, "That ye be not puffed up as ye are." 7. Translate, "Who distinguisheth thee (above another)?" Not thyself, but God. glory, as if thou hadst not received it—as if it was to thyself, not to God, thou owest the receiving of it. 8. Irony. Translate, "Already ye are filled full (with spiritual food), already ye are rich, ye have seated yourselves upon your throne as kings, without us." The emphasis is on "already" and "without us"; ye act as if ye needed no more to "hunger and thirst after righteousness," and as if already ye had reached the "kingdom" for which Christians have to strive and suffer. Ye are so puffed up with your favorite teachers, and your own fancied spiritual attainments in knowledge through them, that ye feel like those "filled full" at a feast, or as a "rich" man priding himself in his riches: so ye feel ye can now do "without us," your first spiritual fathers (vs. 15). They forgot that before the "kingdom" and the "fulness of joy," at the marriage feast of the Lamb, must come the cross, and suffering, to every true believer (II Tim. 2:5, 11, 12). They were like the self-complacent Laodiceans (Rev. 3:17; cf. Hosea 12:8). Temporal fulness and riches doubtless tended in some cases at Corinth, to generate this spiritual self-sufficiency; the contrast to the apostle's literal "hunger and thirst" (vs. 11) proves this. I would . . . ye did reign—Translate, "I would indeed . . . ." I would truly it were so, and that your kingdom had really begun. that we also might reign with you—(II Cor. 12:14). "I seek not yours, but you." Your spiritual prosperity would redound to that of us, your fathers in Christ (ch. 9: 23). When you reach the kingdom, you shall be our "crown of rejoicing, in the presence of our Lord Jesus" (I Thess. 2:19). 9. For—assigning the reason for desiring that the "reign" of himself and his fellow apostles with the Corinthians were come; viz., the present afflictions of the former. I think—The Corinthians (ch. 3:18) "seemed" to (lit., as here, "thought") themselves "wise in this world." Paul, in contrast, "thinks" that God has sent forth him and his fellow ministers "last," i.e., the lowest in this world. The apostles fared worse than even the prophets, who, though sometimes afflicted, were often honored (II Kings 1:10; 5:9; 8:9, 12). set forth—as a spectacle or gazing-stock. us the apostles—Paul includes Apollos with the apostles, in the broader sense of the word; so Romans 16:7; II Corinthians 8:23 (Greek for "messengers," apostles). as it were appointed to death—as criminals condemned to die. made a spectacle—lit., "a theatrical spectacle." So the Greek in Hebrews 10: 33, "made a gazing-stock by reproaches and afflictions." Criminals "condemned to die," in Paul's time, were exhibited as a gazing-stock to amuse the populace in the amphitheater. They were "set forth last" in the show, to fight with wild beasts. This explains the imagery of Paul here. (Cf. TERTULLIAN, de Pudicitia, ch. 14.) the world—to the whole world, including "both angels and men"; "the whole family in heaven and earth" (Eph. 3: 15). As Jesus was "seen of angels" (I Tim. 3:16), so His followers are a spectacle to the holy angels who take a deep interest in all the progressive steps of redemption (Eph. 3:10; I Pet. 1:12). Paul tacitly implies that though "last" and lowest in the world's judgment, Christ's servants are deemed by angels a spectacle worthy of their most intense regard [CHRYSOSTOM]. However, since "the world" is a comprehensive expression, and is applied in this Epistle to the evil especially (ch. 1:27, 28), and since

If you are so pure and upright in your conduct, if what you have been doing in these divisions, etc., is right in His sight, then shall you have praise for the same; if otherwise, yourselves are most concerned. Some refer the praise to Paul and his companions: "Then shall every one of us apostles have praise of God."

6. These things. Which I have written, chap. iii. 5, etc. I have in a figure transferred to myself and to Apollos. I have written as if myself and Apollos were the authors of the sects which now prevail among you; although others, without either our consent or knowledge, have proclaimed us heads of parties.

7. For who maketh thee to differ? It is likely that the apostle is here addressing himself to some one of those puffed up teachers, who was glorying in his gifts, and in the knowledge he had of the gospel, etc. As if he had said: If you have all that knowledge which you profess to have, did you not receive it from myself or some other of my fellow helpers who first preached the gospel at Corinth? Have you a particle of light that you have not received from our preaching? Why then do you glory, boast, and exult, as if God had first spoken by you, and not by us?

8. Now we (Corinthians) are full of secular wisdom; now ye are rich, in both wealth and spiritual gifts (chap. xiv. 26). Ye have reigned as kings, flourishing in the enjoyment of these things, in all tranquillity and honor, without any want of us; and I would to God ye did reign, in deed, and not in conceit only, that we also, poor, persecuted, and despised apostles, might reign with you.—Whitby. Though this paraphrase appears natural, yet I am of opinion that the apostle here intends a strong irony; and one which, when taken in conjunction with what he had said before, must have stung them to the heart. It is not an unusual thing for many people to forget, if not despise, the men by whom they were brought to the knowledge of the truth; and take up with others to whom, in the things of God, they owe nothing.

9. God hath set forth us the apostles last. Seneca speaks thus, Epist. vii: "In the morning men are exposed to lions and bears; at mid-day to their spectators; those that kill are exposed to one another; the victor is detained for another slaughter; the conclusion of the fight is death. The former fighting compared to this was mercy; now it is mere butchery: they have nothing to cover them; their whole body is exposed to every blow, and every stroke produces a wound." We are made a spectacle. We are exhibited on the "theatre" to the world; we are lawful booty to all mankind, and particularly to the men of the world, who have their portion in this life. Angels are astonished at our treatment, and so are the more considerate part of men. Who at that time would have coveted the apostolate?

grace. Ours is hard work, but honourable; it is hazardous, but glorious. The world cannot but see and wonder at our undaunted resolution, our invincible patience." 2. He compares his own case with that of the Corinthians: "We are fools for Christ's sake, but you are wise in Christ; we are weak, but you are strong; you are honourable, but we are despised, v. 10. We can pass for fools in the world, and be despised as such, so that the honour of the gospel may by this means be secured and displayed. But you are wise in Christ. You have the fame of being wise and learned Christians, and you do not a little value yourselves upon it. We are weak, but you are strong. We are suffering for Christ's sake when you are in easy and flourishing circumstances." All Christians are not alike exposed. The standard-bearers in an army are most struck at. So ministers in a time of persecution are commonly the first and greatest sufferers. Those are not always the greatest proficients in Christianity who think thus of themselves, or pass for such upon others. The Corinthians may think themselves, and be esteemed by others, as wiser and stronger men in Christ than the apostles themselves. But O! how gross is the mistake!

IV. He enters into some particularities of their sufferings: Even to this present hour; we hunger and thirst, and are naked, and are buffeted, and have no certain dwelling-place, and labour, working with our own hands, v. 11, 12. Nay, they were made as the filth of the world, and the off-scouring of all things, v. 13. Poor circumstances indeed, for the prime ministers of our Saviour's kingdom to have no house nor home, and to be destitute of food and raiment! But yet no poorer than his who had not where to lay his head, Luke ix. 58. But O glorious charity and devotion, that would carry them through all these hardships! How ardently did they love God. They thought they had a rich amends for all the outward good things they wanted, if they might but serve Christ and save souls. Nay, though they were made the filth of the world, and the off-scouring of all things. They were treated as men not fit to live. And apostles could not meet with better usage. They suffered in their persons and characters as the very worst and vilest men. Nay, as the off-scouring of all things. To be the off-scouring of anything is bad, but what is it to be the off-scouring of all things! How much did the apostles resemble their Master! They suffered for him, and they suffered after his example. Those may be very dear to God, and honourable in his esteem, whom men may think unworthy to live, and use and scorn as the very dirt and refuse of the world.

V. We have here the apostles' behaviour under all: Being reviled, we bless; being persecuted, we suffer it; being defamed, we entreat, v. 12, 13. They returned blessings for reproaches, and were patient under the sharpest persecutions. The disciples of Christ, and especially his ministers, should hold fast their integrity, and keep a good conscience. They must be content, with him and for him, to be despised and abused.

Verses 14-16

Here Paul challenges their regard to him as their father. 1. What he had written was not for their reproach, but admonition (v. 14): I write not to shame you, but as my beloved children I warn you. Reproofs that expose commonly do but exasperate, when those that kindly and affectionately warn are likely to reform; to lash like an enemy or executioner will provoke and render obstinate. To expose to open shame is but the way to render shameless.

2. He shows them upon what foundation he called them his sons. He was their father: for in Christ Jesus he had begotten them by the gospel, v. 15. They were made Christians by his ministry. He was the instrument of their new birth, and therefore claimed the relation of a father to them. There commonly is, and always ought to be, an endeared affection between faithful ministers and those they beget in Christ Jesus through the gospel. They should love like parents and children.

the spectators (in the image drawn from the amphitheater gaze at the show with savage delight, rather than with sympathy for the sufferers, I think bad angels are included, besides good angels. ESTIUS makes the bad alone to be meant. But the generality of the term "angels," and its frequent use in a good sense, as well as Ephesians 3:10; I Peter 1:12, incline me to include good as well as bad angels, though, for the reasons stated above, the bad may be principally meant. 10. Irony. How much your lot (supposing it real) is to be envied, and ours to be pitied. fools—(ch. 1:21; 3:18; cf. Acts 17:18; 26:24.) for Christ's sake . . . in Christ—Our connection with Christ only entails on us the lowest ignominy, "ON ACCOUNT OF," or, "FOR THE SAKE OF" Him, as "fools"; yours gives you full fellowship IN Him as "wise" (i.e., supposing you really are all you seem, ch. 3:18). we . . . weak . . . ye . . . strong—(ch. 2:3; II Cor. 13:9). we . . . despised—(II Cor. 10:10) because of our "weakness," and our not using worldly philosophy and rhetoric, on account of which ye Corinthians and your teachers are (seemingly) so "honorable." Contrast with "despised" the "ye (Galatians) despised not my temptation . . . in my flesh." 11. (IICor. 11:23-27.) naked—i.e., insufficiently clad (Rom. 8:35). buffeted—as a slave (I Pet. 2:20), the reverse of the state of the Corinthians, "reigning as kings" (Acts 23:2). So Paul's master before him was "buffeted" as a slave, when about to die a slave's death (Matt. 26:67). 12. working with our own hands—viz., "even unto this present hour" (vs. 11). This is not stated in the narrative of Paul's proceedings at Ephesus, from which city he wrote this Epistle (though it is expressly stated of him at Corinth, cf. Acts 18:3, and 19). But in his address to the Ephesian elders at Miletus (Acts 20:34), he says, "Ye yourselves know that these hands have ministered unto my necessities . . . ." The undesignedness of the coincidence thus indirectly brought out is incompatible with forgery. 13. defamed, we entreat—viz., God for our defamers, as Christ enjoined (Matt. 5:10, 44) [GROTIUS]. We reply gently [ESTIUS]. filth—"the refuse" [CONYBEARE and HOWSON], the sweepings or rubbish thrown out after a cleaning. of all things—not of the "world" only.

14. warn—rather, "admonish" as a father uses "admonition" to "beloved sons," not provoking them to wrath (Eph. 6:4). The Corinthians might well be "ashamed" at the disparity of state between the father, Paul, and his spiritual children themselves.

15. ten thousand—implying that the Corinthians had more of them than was desirable. instructors—tutors who had the care of rearing, but had not the rights, or peculiar affection, of the father, who alone had begotten them spiritually. in Christ—Paul admits that these "instructors" were not mere legalists, but evangelical teachers. He uses, however, a stronger phrase of himself in begetting them spiritually, "In Christ Jesus," implying both the Saviour's office and person. As Paul was the means of spiritually regenerating them, and yet "baptized none of them save Crispus, Gaius, and the household of Stephanas," regeneration cannot be inseparably in and by baptism (ch. 1:14-17).

ADAM CLARKE

10. We are fools for Christ's sake. Here he still carries on the allusion to the public spectacles among the Romans, where they were accustomed to hiss, hoot, mock, and variously insult the poor victims. To this Philo alludes, speaking of the treatment which the Jews received at Rome: "For, as if exhibited upon a theatre, we are hissed, most outrageously hooted, and insulted beyond all bounds." Ye are wise in Christ. Surely all these expressions are meant ironically. The apostles were neither fools, nor weak, nor contemptible; nor were the Corinthians, morally speaking, wise, and strong, and honourable. Change the persons, and then the epithets will perfectly apply.

11. We both hunger, and thirst. Who would then have been an apostle of Christ, even with all its spiritual honors and glories, who had not a soul filled with love to both God and man, and the fullest conviction of the reality of the doctrine he preached, and of that spiritual world in which alone he could expect rest? Have no certain dwellingplace. We are mere itinerant preachers, and when we set out in the morning know not where or whether we shall or not get a night's lodging.

12. Working with our own hands. They were obliged to labor in order to supply themselves with the necessaries of life while preaching the gospel to others. Being reviled, we bless. What a most amiable picture does this exhibit of the power of the grace of Christ! Man is naturally a proud creature, and his pride prompts him always to avenge himself in whatever manner he can, and repay insult with insult. It is only the grace of Christ that can make a man patient in bearing injuries, and render blessing for cursing, beneficence for malevolence. Blaspheming against men is anything by which they are injured in their persons, characters, or property.

13. We are made as the filth of the world, and are the offscouring of all things. The Greek word which we render filth is a "purgation, or lustrative sacrifice"; that which we translate offscouring is "a redemption sacrifice." To understand the full force of these words as applied by the apostle in this place we must observe that he alludes to certain customs among the heathens, who, in the time of some public calamity, chose out some unhappy men of the most abject and despicable character to be a public expiation for them. These they maintained a whole year at the public expense; and then they led them out, crowned with flowers, as was customary in sacrifices; and, having heaped all the curses of the country upon their heads, and whipped them seven times, they burned them alive, and afterwards their ashes were thrown into the sea, while the people said these words: "Be thou our propitiation." The apostle therefore means that he and his fellows were treated like those wretched beings who were judged to be fit for nothing but to be expiatory victims to the infernal gods, for the safety and redemption of others. Our words filth and offscouring convey no legitimate sense of the original.

14. I write not these things to shame you. It is not by way of finding fault with you for not providing me with the necessaries of life that I write thus; but I do it to warn you to act differently for the time to come; and be not so ready to be drawn aside by every pretender to apostleship, to the neglect of those to whom, under God, you owe your salvation.

15. For though ye have ten thousand instructors. "Myriads of leaders," that is, an indefinite multitude; for so the word is often used. The paidagogos, from which we have our word "pedagogue," which we improperly apply to a "schoolmaster," was, among the Greeks, the person or servant who attended a child, had the general care of him, and who led him to school for the purpose of being instructed by the teacher. It seems there were many at Corinth who offered their services to instruct this people, and who were not well-affected towards the apostle. Not many fathers. Many offer to instruct you who have no parental feeling for you; and how can they? You are not their spiritual children; you stand in this relation to me alone. For in Christ Jesus—by the power and unction of His Spirit—I have begotten you—I was the means of bringing you into a

3. We have here the special advice he urges on them: Wherefore I beseech you be you followers of me, v. 16. This he elsewhere explains and limits (ch. xi. 1): "Be you followers of me, as I also am of Christ. Follow me as far as I follow Christ. I would not have you be my disciples, but his." Ministers should so live that their people may live after their copy. They should guide them by their lives as well as their lips, go before them in the way to heaven, and not content themselves with pointing it out.

Verses 17-21

I. He tells them of his having sent Timothy to them, to bring them into remembrance of his ways in Christ, as he taught everywhere in every church (v. 17). Those who have had ever so good teaching are apt to forget and need to have their memories refreshed. He had not one doctrine for one place and people, and another for another. He therefore taught the same things in every church, and lived after the same manner in all times and places. The truth of Christ is one and invariable. What one apostle taught at one time and in one place, he taught at all times and in all places. To render their regard to Timothy the greater, he gives them his character. He was his beloved son, a spiritual child of his, as well as themselves. The children of one father should have one heart. But he adds, "He is faithful in the Lord—trustworthy, as one that feared the Lord." It is a great commendation of any minister that he is faithful in the Lord; this must go a great way in procuring regard to his message.

II. He rebukes those who imagined he would not come to them, by letting them know this was his purpose: "I will come to you shortly." But he adds, if the Lord will. All our purposes must be formed with a dependence on Providence.

III. He lets them know what would follow upon his coming to them: I will know, not the speech of those that are puffed up, but the power, v. 19. He would bring the great pretenders among them to a trial, would know what they were by the authority and efficacy of what they taught, and whether it was accompanied with divine influences and saving effects on the minds of men. For, adds he, the kingdom of God is not in word, but in power, the powerful influence of divine truth on the minds and manners of men. It is a good way in the general to judge of a preacher's doctrine, to see whether the effects of it upon men's hearts be truly divine. That is most likely to come from God which in its own nature is most fit, and in event is found to produce most likeness to God.

IV. He puts it to their choice how he should come among them, whether with a rod or in love and the spirit of meekness (v. 21); that is, according as they were they would find him. Stubborn offenders must be used with severity. In families, in Christian communities, paternal pity and tenderness, Christian love and compassion, will sometimes force the use of the rod. But this is far from being desirable, if it may be prevented. Or in love and the spirit of meekness. As much as if he had said, "Take warning, cease your unchristian feuds, and you shall find me as gentle and benign as you can wish. I had rather come and display the tenderness of a father among you than assert his authority." It is a happy temper in a minister to have the spirit of love and meekness predominant, and yet to maintain his just authority.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

16. be ye followers of me—lit., "imitators," viz., in my ways, which be in Christ (vs. 17; ch. 11:1), not in my crosses (vss. 8-13; Acts 26:29; Gal. 4:12).

17. For this cause—that ye may the better "be followers of me" (vs. 16), through his admonitions. sent . . . Timotheus—(ch. 16:10; Acts 19:21, 22). "Paul purposed . . . when he had passed through Macedonia and Achaia, to go to Jerusalem. So he sent into Macedonia Timotheus and Erastus." Here it is not expressly said that he sent Timothy into Achaia (of which Corinth was the capital), but it is implied, for he sent him with Erastus before him. As he therefore purposed to go into Achaia himself, there is every probability they were to go thither also. They are said only to have been sent into Macedonia, because it was the country to which they went immediately from Ephesus. The undesignedness of the coincidence establishes the genuineness of both the Epistle and the history. In both, Timothy's journey is closely connected with Paul's own (cf. vs. 19). Erastus is not specified in the Epistle, probably because it was Timothy who was charged with Paul's orders, and possibly Erastus was a Corinthian, who, in accompanying Timothy, was only returning home. The seeming discrepancy at least shows that the passages were not taken from one another [PALEY's Horæ Paulinæ]. son—i.e., converted by me (cf. vs. 14, 15; Acts 14:6, 7; with 16:1, 2; I Tim. 1:2, 18; II Tim. 1:2). Translate, "My son, beloved and faithful in the Lord." bring you into remembrance—Timothy, from his spiritual connection with Paul, as converted by him, was best suited to remind them of the apostle's walk and teaching (II Tim. 3:10), which they in some respects, though not altogether (ch. 11:2), had forgotten. as I teach . . . in every church—an argument implying that what the Spirit directed Paul to teach "everywhere" else, must be necessary at Corinth also (ch. 7:17). 18. some . . . as though I would not come—He guards against some misconstruing (as by the Spirit he foresees they will, when his letter shall have arrived) his sending Timothy, "as though" he "would not come" (or, "were not coming") himself. A puffed-up spirit was the besetting sin of the Corinthians (cf. ch. 1:11; 5:2). 19. ALFORD translates, "But come I will"; an emphatical negation of their supposition (vs. 18). shortly—after Pentecost (ch. 16:8). if the Lord will—a wise proviso (Jas. 4:15). He does not seem to have been able to go as soon as he intended. and will know—take cognizance of. but the power—I care not for their high-sounding "speech," "but" what I desire to know is "their power," whether they be really powerful in the Spirit, or not. The predominant feature of Grecian character, a love for power of discourse, rather than that of godliness, showed itself at Corinth. 20. kingdom of God is not in word—Translate, as in vs. 19, to which the reference is "speech." Not empty "speeches," but the manifest "power" of the Spirit attests the presence of "the kingdom of God" (the reign of the Gospel spiritually), in a church or in an individual (cf. ch. 2:1, 4; I Thess. 1:5). 21. with a rod, or in love—The Greek preposition is used in both clauses; must I come IN displeasure to exercise the rod, or IN love, and the Spirit of meekness (Isa. 11:4; II Cor. 13:3)?

ADAM CLARKE

state of salvation, so that you have been born again. You are my children alone in the gospel.

16. Wherefore, I beseech you, be ye followers of me. It should rather be translated, "Be ye imitators of me"; mimetai, from which we have our word "mimic," which, though now used only in a bad or ludicrous sense, simply signifies an imitator of another person, whether in speech, manner, habit, or otherwise. As children should imitate their parents in preference to all others, he calls on them to imitate him, as he claims them for his children.

17. For this cause. That you imitate me, and know in what this consists. I sent unto you Timotheus. The same person to whom he wrote the two Epistles that are still extant under his name, and whom he calls here his beloved son, one of his most intimate disciples, and whom he had been the means of bringing to God through Christ.

My ways which be in Christ. This person will also inform you of the manner in which I regulate all the churches, and show to you that what I require of you is no other than what I require of all the churches of Christ which I have formed, as I follow the same plan of discipline in every place.

18. Some are puffed up. Some of your teachers act with great haughtiness, imagining themselves to be safe, because they suppose that I shall not revisit Corinth.

19. But I will come to you shortly. God being my Helper, I fully purpose to visit you; and then I shall put those proud men to the proof, not of their speech—eloquence, or pretensions to great knowledge and influence—but of their power—the authority they profess to have from God, and the evidences of that authority in the works they have performed.

20. For the kingdom of God. The religion of the Lord Jesus is not in word—in human eloquence, excellence of speech, or even in doctrines; but in power, in the mighty energy of the Holy Spirit, enlightening, quickening, converting, and sanctifying believers.

21. Shall I come unto you with a rod, or in love? Here he alludes to the case of the teacher and father, mentioned in v. 15. Shall I come to you with the authority of a teacher, and use the rod of discipline? or shall I come in the tenderness of a father, and entreat you to do what I have authority to enforce? Among the Jews, those who did not amend, after being faithfully admonished, were whipped, either publicly or privately, in the synagogue.

CHAPTER 5

Verses 1-6

I. One of their community was guilty of fornication, v. 1. It was told in all places, to their dishonour. The heinous sins of professed Christians are quickly noted and noised abroad. We should walk circumspectly, for many eyes are upon us. This was not a common instance of fornication, but such as was not so much as named among the Gentiles, that a man should have his father's wife. Not that there were no such instances of incestuous marriages among the heathens; but, whenever they happened, they gave a shock to every man of virtue and probity among them. They could not mention them without detestation. Yet such a horrible wickedness was committed by one in the church of Corinth. The best churches are, in this state of imperfection, liable to very great corruptions.

CHAPTER 5

Vss. 1-13. THE INCESTUOUS PERSON AT CORINTH: THE CORINTHIANS REPROVED FOR CONNIVANCE, AND WARNED TO PURGE OUT THE BAD LEAVEN. QUALIFICATION OF HIS FORMER COMMAND AS TO ASSOCIATION WITH SINNERS OF THE WORLD. 1. commonly—rather, "actually" [ALFORD]. Absolutely [BENGEL]. "It is reported," implies, that the Corinthians, though they "wrote" (ch. 7:1) to Paul on other points, gave him no information on those things which bore against themselves. These latter matters reached the apostle indirectly (ch. 1:11). so much as named—The oldest MSS. and authorities omit "named": "Fornication of such a gross kind as (exists) not even among the heathen, so that one (of you) hath (in concubinage) his father's wife," i.e., his stepmother, while his father is still alive (II Cor. 7:12; cf. Lev. 18:8). She was perhaps a heathen, for which reason he does not direct his rebuke against her (cf. vss. 12, 13). ALFORD thinks "have" means have in marriage: but the connection is called "fornication," and neither Christian nor Gentile law would have sanctioned such a marriage, however Corinth's notorious profligacy might wink at the concubinage.

CHAPTER 5

1. There is fornication among you. The word which we translate fornication in this place must be understood in its utmost latitude of meaning as implying all kinds of impurity; for that the Corinthians were notoriously guilty of every species of irregularity and debauch we have already seen, and it is not likely that in speaking on this subject, in reference to a people so very notorious, he would refer to only one species of impurity. That one should have his father's wife. Commentators and critics have found great difficulties in this statement. One part of the case is sufficiently clear, that a man who professed Christianity had illegal connections with his father's wife. But the principal question is, Was his father alive or dead? Most think the father was alive, and imagine that to this the apostle refers, 2 Cor. vii. 12, where, speaking of the person who did the wrong, he introduces also him who had suffered the wrong; which must mean the father, and the father then alive. After all that has been said on this subject, I think it most natural to conclude that

MATTHEW HENRY

II. He greatly blames them for their own conduct hereupon: They were puffed up (v. 2), they gloried. Perhaps on account of this very scandalous person. He might be a man very greatly esteemed. Instead of mourning for his fall, and their own reproach upon his account, they continued to applaud him and pride themselves in him. Pride or self-esteem often lies at the bottom of our immoderate esteem of others, and this makes us as blind to their faults as to our own. Or else some of the opposite party were puffed up. It is a very wicked thing to glory over the miscarriages and sins of others. Probably this was one effect of the divisions among them. The opposite party made their advantage of this scandalous lapse, and were glad of the opportunity. The sins of others should be our sorrow.

III. We have the apostle's direction to them how they should now proceed with this scandalous sinner. He would have him excommunicated and delivered to Satan (v. 3–5); as absent in body, yet present in spirit, he had judged already as if he had been present. He says this to let them know that, though he was at a distance, he did not pass an unrighteous sentence, nor judge without having as full cognizance of the case as if he had been on the spot. The apostle adds, him who hath so done this deed. He had so committed the evil as to heighten the guilt by the manner of doing it. In dealing with scandalous sinners, not only are they to be charged with the fact, but the aggravating circumstances of it.

Paul had judged that he should be delivered to Satan (v. 5), and this was to be done in the name of Christ, and in a full assembly, where the apostle would be also present in spirit. Some think that this is to be understood of mere ordinary excommunication, and that delivering him to Satan is only meant of disowning him, that by this means he might be brought to repentance, and his flesh might be mortified. Those that live in sin, when they profess relation to Christ, belong to another master, and by excommunication should be delivered up to him; and this in the name of Christ. It was to be done also when they were gathered together. The more public the more solemn, and the more solemn the more likely to have a good effect on the offender. Others think the apostle is not to be understood of mere excommunication, but of a miraculous power or authority they had of delivering a scandalous sinner into the power of Satan, which is the meaning of the destruction of the flesh. In this sense the destruction of the flesh has been a happy occasion of the salvation of the spirit. The great end of church-censures is the good of those who fall under them. It is that their spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus, v. 5.

IV. He hints the danger of contagion from this example: Your glorying is not good. Know you not that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump? The bad example of a man in rank and reputation is very mischievous, spreads the contagion far and wide. A little leaven will quickly spread the ferment through a great lump.

Verses 7, 8

Here the apostle exhorts them to purity.

I. The advice itself, addressed either, 1. To the church in general; and so purging out the old leaven, that they might be a new lump, refers to the putting away from themselves that wicked person, v. 13. Or, 2. To each particular member of the church. And so it implies that they should purge themselves from all impurity of heart and life. Christians should be careful to keep themselves clean, as well as purge polluted members out of their society. They were also to purge themselves from malice and wickedness. This is leaven that sours the mind to a great degree. Christians should be careful to keep free from malice and mischief. Love is the very essence and life of the Christian religion. It is the fairest image of God, for God is love (1 John iv. 16), and therefore it is no wonder if it be the greatest beauty and ornament of a Christian.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

2. puffed up—with your own wisdom and knowledge, and the eloquence of your favorite teachers: at a time when ye ought to be "mourning" at the scandal caused to religion by the incest. Paul mourned because they did not mourn (II Cor. 2:4). We ought to mourn over the transgressions of others, and repent of our own (II Cor. 12:21) [BENGEL]. that—ye have not felt such mourning as would lead to the result that .... taken away from among you—by excommunication. The incestuous person was hereby brought to bitter repentance, in the interval between the sending of the first and second Epistles (II Cor. 2:5-10). Excommunication in the Christian Church corresponded to that in the Jewish synagogue, in there being a lighter and heavier form: the latter an utter separation from church fellowship and the Lord's house, the former exclusion from the Lord's Supper only but not from the Church. 3. as absent—The best MSS. read, "being absent." present in spirit—(II Kings 5:26; Col. 2:5). so done—rather, "perpetrated," as the Greek word here is stronger than that for "done" in vs. 2. "So," i.e., so scandalously while called a brother. 4. In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ—By His authority and as representing His person and will (II Cor. 2:10). Join this with "to deliver such a one unto Satan" (vs. 5). The clause, "When ye have been gathered together and my spirit (wherein I am 'present,' though 'absent in body,' (vs. 3), with the power of our Lord Jesus," stands in a parenthesis between. Paul speaking of himself uses the word "spirit"; of Christ, "power." Christ's power was promised to be present with His Church "gathered together in His name" (Matt. 18: 18-20): and here Paul by inspiration gives a special promise of his apostolic spirit, which in such cases was guided by the Holy Spirit, ratifying their decree passed according to his judgment ("I have judged," vs. 3), as though he were present in person (John 20:21-23; (II Cor. 13:3-10). This power of infallible judgment was limited to the apostles; for they alone had the power of working miracles as their credentials to attest their infallibility. Their successors, to establish their claim to the latter, must produce the former (II Cor. 12:2). Even the apostles in ordinary cases, and where not specially and consciously inspired, were fallible (Acts 8:13, 23; Gal. 2:11-14). 5. Besides excommunication (of which the Corinthians themselves had the power), Paul delegates here to the Corinthian Church his own special power as an apostle, of inflicting corporeal disease or death in punishment for sin ("to deliver to Satan such an one," i.e., so heinous a sinner). For instances of this power, see Acts 5:1-11; 13:11; I Tim. 1:20. As Satan receives power at times to try the godly, as Job (Job 2:4-7) and Paul (II Cor. 12:7; cf. also as to Peter, Luke 22:31), much more the ungodly. Satan, the "accuser of the brethren" (Rev. 12:10) and the "adversary" (I Pet. 5:8), demands the sinner for punishment on account of sin (Zech. 3:1). When God lets Satan have his way, He is said to "deliver the sinner unto Satan" (cf. Ps. 109:6). Here it is not finally; but for the affliction of the body with disease, and even death (ch. 11:30, 32), so as to destroy fleshly lust. He does not say, "for the destruction of the body," for it shall share in redemption (Rom. 8:23); but of the corrupt "flesh" which "cannot inherit the kingdom of God," and the lusts of which had prompted this offender to incest (Rom. 7:5; 8:9, 10). The "destruction of the flesh" answers to "mortify the deeds of the body" (Rom. 8:13), only that the latter is done by one's self, the former is effected by chastisement from God (cf. I Pet. 4:6). the spirit ... saved—the spiritual part of man, in the believer the organ of the Holy Spirit. Temporary affliction often leads to permanent salvation (Ps. 83:16). 6. Your glorying in your own attainments and those of your favorite teachers (ch. 3:21; 4:19; 5:2), while all the while ye connive at such a scandal, is quite unseemly. a little leaven leaveneth ... whole lump—(Gal. 5:9), viz., with present complicity in the guilt, and the danger of future contagion (ch. 15:33; II Tim. 2:17). 7. old leaven—The remnant of the "old" (Eph. 4:22-24) heathenish and natural corruption. The image is taken from the extreme care of the Jews in searching every corner of their houses, and "purging out" every particle of leaven from the time of killing the lamb before the Passover (Deut. 16:3, 4). So Christians are continually to search and purify their hearts (Ps. 139:23, 24). as ye are unleavened—normally, and as far as your Christian calling is concerned: free from the leaven of sin and death (ch. 6:11). Paul often grounds exhortations on the assumption of Christian professors' normal state as realized (Rom. 6:3, 4) [ALFORD]. Regarding the

the person in question had married the wife of his deceased father, not his own mother, but stepmother, then a widow. The word named is wanting in almost every MS. and version of importance and certainly makes no part of the text. The words should be read, "and such fornication as is not amongst the Gentiles," i.e., not allowed.

2. Ye are puffed up. Ye are full of strife and contention relative to your parties and favorite teachers, and neglect the discipline of the church. Had you considered the greatness of this crime, you would have rather mourned, and have put away this flagrant transgressor from among you. Taken away from among you. This is supposed by some to refer to the punishment of death, by others to excommunication. The Christian Church was at this time too young to have those forms of excommunication which were practiced in succeeding centuries. Probably no more is meant than a simple disowning of the person, accompanied with the refusal to admit him to the sacred ordinances, or to have any intercourse or connection with him.

3. Absent in body, but present in spirit. Perhaps Paul refers to the gift of the discernment of spirits, which it is very likely the apostles in general possessed on extraordinary occasions. He had already seen this matter so clearly that he had determined on that sort of punishment which should be inflicted for this crime.

4. In the name of our Lord Jesus. Who is the Head of the Church, and under whose authority every act is to be performed. And my spirit. My apostolical authority derived from Him; with the power, with the miraculous energy of the Lord Jesus, which is to inflict the punishment that you pronounce.

5. To deliver such an one unto Satan. There is no evidence that delivering to Satan was any form of excommunication known among either the Jews or the Christians. It was a species of punishment administered in extraordinary cases, in which the body and the mind of an incorrigible transgressor were delivered by the authority of God into the power of Satan, to be tortured with diseases and terrors as a warning to all. But while the body and mind were thus tormented, the immortal spirit was under the influence of the divine mercy; and the affliction, in all probability, was in general only for a season; though sometimes it was evidently unto death, as the destruction of the flesh seems to imply. But the soul found mercy at the hand of God.

6. Your glorying is not good. You are triumphing in your superior knowledge, and busily employed in setting up and supporting your respective teachers, while the church is left under the most scandalous corruptions—corruptions which threaten its very existence if not purged away. Know ye not? With all your boasted wisdom, do you not know and acknowledge the truth of a common maxim, A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump? If this leaven, the incestuous person, be permitted to remain among you; if his conduct be not exposed by the most formidable censure, the floodgates of impurity will be opened on the church, and the whole state of Christianity ruined in Corinth.

7. Purge out therefore the old leaven. As it is the custom of the Jews previously to the Passover to search their houses in the most diligent manner for the old leaven, and throw it out, sweeping every part clean, so act with this incestuous person.

MATTHEW HENRY

II. The reason with which this advice is enforced: For Christ our passover is sacrificed for us, v. 7. The Jews, after they had killed the passover, kept the feast of unleavened bread. So must we; not for seven days only, but all our days. The whole life of a Christian must be a feast of unleavened bread.

He must purge out the old leaven, and keep the feast of unleavened bread of sincerity and truth. He must be without guilt in his conduct towards God and man. The sacrifice of our Redeemer is the strongest argument with a gracious heart for purity and sincerity. Heinous evil could not be expiated but with the blood of the Son of God! And shall a Christian love the murderer of his Lord? God forbid.

Verses 9–13

Here the apostle advises them to shun the company of scandalous professors.

I. The advice itself: I wrote to you in a letter not to company with fornicators, v. 9. Some think this was an epistle written to them before, which is lost. Some think it is to be understood of this very epistle, but thought it needful now to be more particular.

And therefore he tells them that if any man called a brother, and being a member of a Christian church, were a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolater, or a railer, that they should not keep company with him, not so much as eat with such a one. They were to avoid all familiarity with him; but, that they might shame him, and bring him to repentance, must disclaim and shun him. They may call themselves brethren in Christ, but they are not Christian brethren. They are only fit companions for their brethren in iniquity.

II. How he limits this advice. He does not forbid their eating nor conversing with the fornicators of this world, &c. They know no better. They profess no better. "You must needs go out of the world if you will have no conversation with such men. It is impossible, as long as you are in the world, but you must fall into their company. This cannot be wholly avoided."

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

Corinthian Church as the Passover "unleavened lump" or mass, he entreats them to correspond in fact with this their normal state. "For Christ our Passover (Exod. 12:5-11, 21-23; John 1:29) has been (English Version, "is") sacrificed for us"; i.e., as the Jews began the days of unleavened bread with the slaying of the Passover lamb, so, Christ our Passover having been already slain, let there be no leaven of evil in you who are the "unleavened lump." Doubtless he alludes to the Passover which had been two or three weeks before kept by the Jewish Christians (ch. 16:8): the Gentile Christians probably also refraining from leavened bread at the love feasts. Thus the Jewish Passover naturally gave place to our Christian Easter. The time however, of keeping feast (metaphorical; i.e., leading the Christian life of joy in Christ's finished work, cf. Prov. 15:15) among us Christians, corresponding to the Jewish Passover, is not limited, as the latter, to one season, but is ALL our time; for the transcendent benefits of the once-for-all completed sacrifice of our Passover Lamb extends to all the time of our lives and of this Christian dispensation; in no part of our time is the leaven of evil to be admitted. For even—an additional reason, besides that in vs. 6, and a more cogent one for purging out every leaven of evil; viz., that Christ has been already sacrificed, whereas the old leaven is yet unremoved, which ought to have been long ago purged out. 8. not . . . old leaven—of our unconverted state as Jews or heathen. malice—the opposite of "sincerity," which allows no leaven of evil to be mixed up with good (Matt. 16:6). wickedness—the opposite of "truth," which allows not evil to be mistaken for good. The Greek for "malice" means the evil habit of mind; "wickedness," the outcoming of the same in word and deed. The Greek for "sincerity" expresses literally, a thing which, when examined by the sun's light, is found pure and unadulterated. 9. I wrote . . . in an epistle—rather, "in the Epistle": a former one not now extant. That Paul does not refer to the present letter is proved by the fact that no direction "not to company with fornicators" occurs in the previous part of it; also the words, "in an (or the) epistle," could not have been added if he meant, "I have just written" (II Cor. 10:10). "His letters" (plural; not applying to merely one) confirm this. II Corinthians 7:8 also refers to our first Epistle, just as here a former letter is referred to by the same phrase. Paul probably wrote a former brief reply to inquiries of the Corinthians: our first Epistle, as it enters more fully into the same subject, has superseded the former, which the Holy Spirit did not design for the guidance of the Church in general, and which therefore has not been preserved. See my Introduction. 10. Limitation of the prohibition alluded to in vs. 9. As in dissolute Corinth to "company with no fornicators . . ." would be almost to company with none in the (unbelieving) world; ye need not utterly ("altogether") forego intercourse with fornicators, etc., of the unbelieving world (cf. ch. 10:27; John 17:15; I John 5:18, 19). As "fornicators" sin against themselves, so "extortioners" against their neighbors, and "idolaters" against God. The attempt to get "out of the world," in violation of God's will that believers should remain in it but keep themselves from its evil, led to monasticism and its consequent evils. 11. But now I have written—"Now" does not express time, but "the case being so," viz., that to avoid fornicators, etc., of the world, you would have to leave the world altogether, which would be absurd. So "now" is used in Hebrews 11:16. Thus we avoid making the apostle now retract a command which he had before given. I have written—i.e., my meaning in the letter I wrote was . . . . a brother—contrasted with a "fornicator, etc., of the world" (vs. 10). There is less danger in associating with open worldlings than with carnal professors. Here, as in Ephesians 5:3, 5, "covetousness" is joined with "fornication": the common fount of both being "the fierce and ever fiercer longing of the creature, which has turned from God, to fill itself with the inferior objects of sense" [TRENCH, Syn. New Testament]. Hence "idolatry" is associated with them: and the covetous man is termed an "idolater" (Num. 25:1, 2). The Corinthians did not fall into open idolatry, but ate things offered to idols, so making a compromise with the heathen; just as they connived at fornication. Thus this verse prepares for the precepts in ch. 8:4, etc. Cf. the similar case of fornication, combined with a similar idolatrous compromise, after the pattern of Israel with the Midianites (Rev. 2:14). no not to eat—not to sit at the same table with such; whether at the love feasts (agapæ) or in private intercourse, much more at

ADAM CLARKE

8. Therefore let us keep the feast. It is very likely that the time of the Passover was now approaching, when the Church of Christ would be called to extraordinary acts of devotion, in commemorating the passion, death, and resurrection of Christ; and of this circumstance the apostle takes advantage in his exhortation to the Corinthians. Not with old leaven. Under the Christian dispensation we must be saved equally from Judaism, heathenism, and sin of every kind. Malice and wickedness must be destroyed; and sincerity and truth, inward purity and outward holiness, take their place. Sincerity, such purity of affections and conduct that even the light of God shining upon them discovers no flaw, and truth—inwardly as well as outwardly what they profess to be.

10. For then must ye needs go out of the world. What an awful picture of the general corruption of manners does this exhibit! The Christians at Corinth could not transact the ordinary affairs of life with any others than with fornicators, covetous persons, extortioners, railers, drunkards, and idolaters because there were none others in the place! How necessary was Christianity in that city!

11. But now I have written. I not only write this, but I add more: If anyone who is called a brother, i.e., professes the Christian religion, be a fornicator, covetous, idolater, railer, drunkard, or extortioner, not even to eat with such—have no communion with such a one, in things either sacred or civil. You may transact your worldly concerns with a person that knows not God and makes no profession of Christianity, whatever his moral character may be; but you must not even thus far acknowledge a man professing Christianity who is scandalous in his conduct. Let him have this extra mark of your abhorrence of all sin; and let the world see that the Church of God does not tolerate iniquity.

MATTHEW HENRY

III. The reason of this limitation is here assigned. Christians must have gone out of the world to avoid the company of loose heathens. But the dread of sin wears off by familiar converse with the wicked. Besides, heathens were such as Christians had nothing to do to judge and censure, and avoid upon a censure passed; for they are without (v. 12), and must be left to God's judgment, v. 13. But, as to members of the church, they are within, are professedly bound by the laws and rules of Christianity, and not only liable to the judgment of God, but to the censures of the fellow-members of the same body, when they transgress those rules. They are to be punished, by having this mark of disgrace put upon them, that they may be shamed, and, if possible, reclaimed thereby. Though the church has nothing to do with those without, it must endeavour to keep clear of the guilt and reproach of those within.

IV. How he applies the argument to the case before him: "Therefore put away from among yourselves that wicked person, v. 13. Cast him out of your fellowship."

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

the Lord's table: at the last, too often now the guests "are not as children in one family, but like a heterogeneous crowd of strangers in an inn" [BENGEL] (cf. Gal. 2:12; II John 10:11). 12. what have I to do—You might have easily understood that my concern is not with unbelievers outside the Church, but that I referred to those within it. also—Implying, Those within give me enough to do without those outside. do not ye . . .—Ye judge your fellow citizens, not strangers: much more should I [BENGEL]. Rather, Is it not your duty to judge them that are within? God shall judge them that are without: do you look at home [GROTIUS]. God is the Judge of the salvation of the heathen, not we (Rom. 2:12-16). Paul here gives an anticipatory censure of their going to law with saints before heathen tribunals, instead of judging such causes among themselves within. 13. put away from among yourselves that wicked—Sentence of excommunication in language taken from Deuteronomy 24:7.

ADAM CLARKE

12. For what have I to do to judge them also that are without? The term without signifies those who were not members of the church. The word also, which greatly disturbs the sense here, is wanting in several MSS. The sentence I think, with the omission of also, should stand thus: "Does it belong to me to pass sentence on those which are without"—which are not members of the church? "By no means. You pass sentence on them which are within"—which are members of the church: "those which are without"—which are not members of the church, "God will pass sentence on," in that way in which He generally deals with the heathen world. "But put away the evil from among yourselves." This is most evidently the apostle's meaning, and renders all comments unnecessary. In the last clause there appears to be an allusion to Deut. xvii. 7, where the like directions are given to the congregation of Israel, relative to a person found guilty of idolatry: "Thou shalt put the evil away from among you"—where the version of the Septuagint is almost the same as that of the apostle.

CHAPTER 6

Verses 1–8

Here the apostle reproves them for going to law with one another before heathen judges for little matters; and therein blames all vexatious law-suits.

I. The fault he blames them for. Brother went to law with brother (v. 6). The bonds of fraternal love were broken through. Christians should not contend with one another, for they are brethren. They brought the matter before the heathen magistrates: they went to law before the unjust, not before the saints (v. 1), brought the controversy before unbelievers (v. 6). This tended much to the reproach of Christianity. And therefore, says the apostle, "Dare any of you, having a controversy with another, go to law before the unjust?" Here is at least an intimation that they went to law for trivial matters, for the apostle blames them that they did not suffer wrong rather than go to law (v. 7). Christians should be of a forgiving temper. And it is more for their honour to suffer small injuries than seem to be contentious.

II. He lays before them the aggravations of their fault: Do you not know that the saints shall judge the world (v. 2), shall judge angels? (v. 3).

And are they unworthy to judge the smallest matters, the things of this life? It was a dishonour to their Christian character, as saints, for them to carry little matters, about the things of life, before heathen magistrates. When they were to judge the world, nay, to judge angels, it is unaccountable that they could not determine little controversies among one another. They are not partners in their Lord's commission, but see his proceeding against the wicked world, and approve it. Others understand it as condemning the world by their faith and practice. The first sense seems to be most natural. "Shall Christians have the honour to sit with the sovereign Judge, and are they not worthy to judge of the trifles about which you contend before heathen magistrates? Cannot they make up your mutual differences?

CHAPTER 6

Vss. 1-11. LITIGATION OF CHRISTIANS IN HEATHEN COURTS CENSURED: ITS VERY EXISTENCE BETRAYS A WRONG SPIRIT: BETTER TO BEAR WRONG NOW, AND HEREAFTER THE DOERS OF WRONG SHALL BE SHUT OUT OF HEAVEN. 1. Dare—This word implies treason against Christian brotherhood [BENGEL]. before the unjust—The Gentile judges are here so termed by an epithet appropriate to the subject in question, viz., one concerning justice. Though all Gentiles were not altogether unjust, yet in the highest view of justice which has regard to God as the Supreme Judge, they are so: Christians, on the other hand, as regarding God as the only Fountain of justice, should not expect justice from them. before . . . saints—The Jews abroad were permitted to refer their disputes to Jewish arbitrators (JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 14:10, 17). So the Christians were allowed to have Christian arbitrators. 2. Do ye not know—as a truth universally recognized by Christians. Notwithstanding all your glorying in your "knowledge," ye are acting contrary to it (ch. 1:4, 5; 8:1). The oldest MSS. have "Or" before "know ye not"; i.e., "What! (expressing surprise) know ye not . . . ." saints . . . judge—i.e., "rule," including judgment: as assessors of Christ. Matthew 19:28, "judging," i.e., "ruling over." (Cf. Ps. 49:14; Dan. 7:22, 27; Rev. 2:26; 3:21; 20:4.) There is a distinction drawn by able expositors between the saints who judge or rule, and the world which is ruled by them: as there is between the elected (Matt. 20:23) twelve apostles who sit on thrones judging, and the twelve tribes of Israel that are judged by them. To reign, and to be saved, are not necessarily synonymous. As Jehovah employed angels to carry the law into effect when He descended on Sinai to establish His throne in Israel, so at His coming the saints shall administer the kingdom for, and under, Him. The nations of the earth, and Israel the foremost, in the flesh, shall, in this view, be the subjects of the rule of the Lord and His saints in glorified bodies. The mistake of the Chiliasts was that they took the merely carnal view, restricting the kingdom to the terrestrial part. This part shall have place with the accession of spiritual and temporal blessings such as Christ's presence must produce. Besides this earthly glory, there shall be the heavenly glory of the saints reigning in transfigured bodies, and holding such blessed intercourse with mortal men, as angels had with men of old, and as Christ, Moses, and Elias, in glory had with Peter, James, and John, in the flesh at the transfiguration (II Tim. 2:12; II Pet. 1:16-18). But here the "world" seems to be the unbelieving world that is to be "condemned" (ch. 11:22), rather than the whole world, including the subject nations which are to be brought under Christ's sway; however, it may include both those to be condemned, with the bad angels, and those about to be brought into obedience to the sway of Christ with His saints. Cf. Matthew 25:32, 40, "all nations," "these my brethren" on the thrones with Him. The event will decide the truth of this view. judged by you—or, before you (cf. ch. 3:22). smallest matters—The weightiest of earthly questions at issue are infinitely small compared with those to be decided on the judgment day. 3. judge angels—viz., bad angels. We who are now "a spectacle to angels" shall then "judge angels." The

CHAPTER 6

1. Dare any of you? From the many things that are here reprehended by the apostle, we learn that the Christian church at Corinth was in a state of great imperfection, notwithstanding there were very many eminent characters among them. Divided as they were among themselves, there was no one person who possessed any public authority to settle differences between man and man; therefore, as one party would not submit to the decisions of another, they were obliged to carry their contentions before heathen magistrates; and probably these very subjects of litigations arose out of their ecclesiastical divisions. Before the unjust, and not before the saints. The heathen judges were termed dikastai from their presumed righteousness in the administration of justice. Here the apostle, by a paronomasia, calls them adikoi, unrighteous persons; and it is very likely that at Corinth, where such corruption of manners reigned, there was a great perversion of public justice; and it is not to be supposed that matters relative to the Christians were fairly decided. The Christians the apostle terms saints, which they were all by profession; and doubtless many were so in spirit and in truth.

2. The saints shall judge the world. Nothing can be more evident than that the writers of the New Testament often use ho cosmos, the world, to signify the Jewish people; and sometimes the Roman Empire, and the Jewish state. In the former sense it is often used by our Lord. "When the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel," Matt. xix. 28. It is supposed that He refers to the same subject as that mentioned here—the saints judging the world; and that Paul has His words in view in what he says here to the Corinthians. By "judging the twelve tribes of Israel" some have imagined that having authority in the Church is merely intended; but Dr. Lightfoot contends that the words referred to the coming of our Lord to execute judgment on the Jews, and to destroy their state; and that the doctrine of the apostles, not themselves, was to judge and condemn that most disobedient people. I think, with Dr. Lightfoot, that these words of the apostle refer to the prediction of Dan. chap. vii. 18, 27, and such like prophecies, where the kingdoms of the earth are promised to the saints of the Most High; that is, that a time shall come when Christianity shall so far prevail that the civil government of the world shall be administered by Christians, which, at that time, was administered by heathens.

MATTHEW HENRY

Must you, about the affairs of this life, set those to judge who are of no esteem in the church?" i.e., heathen magistrates (so some read, and perhaps most properly, v. 4). "Must those be called in to judge in your controversies of whom you ought to entertain so low an opinion? Is not this shameful?" v. 5. Some who read it as our translators make it an ironical speech: "If you have such controversies depending, set those to judge who are of least esteem among yourselves. They are trifles not worth contending about. Bear and forbear, and the men of meanest skill among you may end your quarrels. I speak it to your shame," v. 5.

III. He puts them on a method to remedy this fault. 1. By referring it to some to make it up: "Is it so that there is no wise man among you, no one able to judge between his brethren? (v. 5). You who value yourselves so much upon your wisdom and knowledge, is there none among you that has wisdom enough to judge in these differences? Must brethren quarrel, and the heathen magistrate judge, in a church so famous as yours for knowledge and wisdom?" 2. By suffering wrong rather than taking this method to right themselves: It is utterly a fault among you to go to law in this matter: it is always a fault of one side to go to law, except in a case where the title is indeed dubious, and there is a friendly agreement of both parties to refer it to the judgment of those learned in the law to decide it. Should you not rather take wrong, rather suffer yourselves to be defrauded? A Christian should rather put up with a little injury than tease himself, and provoke others, by a litigious contest. The peace of his own mind, and the calm of his neighbourhood, are of more worth than victory in such a contest. But the apostle tells them they were so far from bearing injuries that they actually did wrong, and defrauded, and that their brethren. It is utterly a fault to wrong and defraud any; but it is an aggravation of this fault to defraud our Christian brethren.

Verses 9–11

Here he takes occasion to warn them against many heinous evils, to which they had been formerly addicted.

I. He puts it to them as a plain truth, that such sinners should not inherit the kingdom of God. The meanest among them must know this much, that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God (v. 9). He specifies several sorts of sins: against the first and second commandments, as idolaters; against the seventh, as adulterers, fornicators, effeminate, and Sodomites; against the eighth, as thieves and extortioners; against the ninth, as revilers; and against the tenth, as covetous and drunkards. Heaven could never be intended for these. The scum of the earth are no ways fit to fill the heavenly mansions.

II. Yet he warns them against deceiving themselves: Be not deceived. Those who cannot but know the fore-mentioned truth are but too apt not to attend to it. Men are very much inclined to flatter themselves that they may live in sin and yet die in Christ, may lead the life of the devil's children and yet go to heaven with the children of God. But this is all a gross cheat. We cannot hope to sow to the flesh and yet reap everlasting life.

III. He puts them in mind what a change the gospel and grace of God had made in them: Such were some of you (v. 11). Some that are eminently good after their conversion have been as remarkably wicked before. How glorious a change does grace make! It changes the vilest of men into saints and the children of God. You are not what you were. You are washed, you are sanctified, you are justified in the name of Christ, and by the Spirit of our God. The washing of regeneration can purge away all guilt and defilement. You are sanctified, you are justified. None are cleansed from the guilt of sin, and reconciled to God through Christ, but those who are also sanctified by his Spirit. All who are made righteous in the sight of God are made holy by the grace of God.

The twelfth verse and former part of the thirteenth seem to relate to that early dispute among Christians about the distinction of meats, and yet to be prefatory to the caution that follows against fornication. The connection seems plain enough if we attend to the famous determination of the apostles, Acts xv, where the prohibition of certain foods was joined with that of fornication. Now some among the Corinthians seem ready to say, even in the case of fornication, All things are lawful for me. This pernicious conceit saints shall join in approving the final sentence of the Judge on them (Jude 6). Believers shall, as administrators of the kingdom under Jesus, put down all rule that is hostile to God. Perhaps, too, good angels shall then receive from the Judge, with the approval of the saints, higher honors. 4. judgments—i.e., cases for judgment. least esteemed—lit., "those of no esteem." Any, however low in the Church, rather than the heathen (ch. 1:28). Questions of earthly property are of secondary consequence in the eyes of true Christians, and are therefore delegated to those in a secondary position in the Church. 5. your shame—Thus he checks their puffed-up spirit (ch. 5:2; cf. ch. 15:34). To shame you out of your present unworthy course of litigation before the heathen, I have said (vs. 4), "Set the least esteemed in the Church to judge." Better even this, than your present course. Is it so?—Are you in such a helpless state that . . . ? not a wise man—though ye admire "wisdom" so much on other occasions (ch. 1:5, 22). Paul alludes probably to the title, "cachain," or wise man, applied to each Rabbi in Jewish councils. no, not one—not even one, amidst so many reputed among you for wisdom (ch. 3:18; 4:6). shall be able—when applied to. brethren—lit., "brother"; i.e., judge between brother and brother. As each case should arise, the arbitrator was to be chosen from the body of the church, such a wise person as had the charism, or gift, of church government. 6. But—emphatically answering the question in the end of vs. 5 in the negative. Translate, "Nay . . . ." 7. utterly a fault—lit., "a shortcoming" (not so strong as sin). Your going to law at all is a falling short of your high privileges, not to say your doing so before unbelievers, which aggravates it. rather take wrong—(Prov. 20:22; Matt. 5:39, 40); i.e., "suffer yourselves to be wronged." 8. ye—emphatic. Ye, whom your Lord commanded to return good for evil, on the contrary, "do wrong (by taking away) and defraud" (by retaining what is entrusted to you; or "defraud" marks the effect of the "wrong" done, viz., the loss inflicted). Not only do ye not bear, but ye inflict wrongs. 9. unrighteous—Translate, "Doers of wrong": referring to vs. 8 (cf. Gal. 5:21). kingdom of God—which is a kingdom of righteousness (Rom. 14:17). fornicators—alluding to ch. 5; also below, vss. 12-18. effeminate—self-polluters, who submit to unnatural lusts. 11. ye are washed—The Greek middle voice expresses, "Ye have had yourselves washed." This washing implies the admission to the benefits of Christ's salvation generally; of which the parts are; (1) Sanctification, or the setting apart from the world, and adoption into the Church: so "sanctified" is used ch. 7:14; John 17:19. Cf. I Pet. 1:2, where it rather seems to mean the setting apart of one as consecrated by the Spirit in the eternal purpose of God. (2) Justification from condemnation through the righteousness of God in Christ by faith (Rom. 1:17). So PARÆUS. The order of sanctification before justification shows that it must be so taken, and not in the sense of progressive sanctification. "Washed" precedes both, and so must refer to the Christian's outward new birth of water, the sign of the inward setting apart to the Lord by the inspiration of the Spirit as the seed of new life (John 3:5; Eph. 5:26; Titus 3:5; Heb. 10:22). Paul (cf. the Church of England Baptismal Service), in charity, and faith in the ideal of the Church, presumes that baptism realizes its original design, and that those outwardly baptized inwardly enter into vital communion with Christ (Gal. 3:27). He presents the grand ideal which those alone realized in whom the inward and the outward baptism coalesced. At the same time he recognizes the fact that this in many cases does not hold good (vss. 8-10), leaving it to God to decide who are the really "washed," while he only decides on broad general principles. in the name of . . . Jesus, and by the Spirit—rather, "in the Spirit," i.e., by His in-dwelling. Both clauses belong to the three—"washed, sanctified, justified." our God—The "our" reminds them that amidst all his reproofs God is still the common God of himself and them.

12-20. REFUTATION OF THE ANTINOMIAN DEFENSE OF FORNICATION, AS IF IT WAS LAWFUL BECAUSE MEATS ARE SO. 12. All things are lawful unto me—These, which were Paul's own words on a former occasion (to the Corinthians, cf. ch. 10:23, and Gal. 5:23), were made a pretext for excusing the eating of meats offered to idols, and so of what was generally connected with idolatry (Acts 15:29), "fornication" (perhaps in the letter of the Corinthians to Paul, ch. 7:1). Paul's remark had referred only to things indifferent: but they wished to treat fornication as such, on the ground that the

4. Things pertaining to this life. They could examine all civil cases among themselves, which they were permitted to determine without any hindrance from the heathen governments under which they lived. Who are least esteemed in the church. Those who were in the lowest order of judges.

5. Is it so, that there is not a wise man among you? Have you none among yourselves that can be arbitrators of the differences which arise, that you go to the heathen tribunals?

6. Brother goeth to law with brother. One Christian sues another at law! This is almost as great a scandal as can exist in a Christian society. Those in a religious community who will not submit to a proper arbitration, made by persons among themselves, should be expelled from the Church of God.

7. There is utterly a fault among you. There is a most manifest "defect" among you: (1) Of peaceableness; (2) Of brotherly love; (3) Of mutual confidence; and (4) Of reverence for God, and concern for the honor of His cause. Why do ye not rather take wrong? Better suffer an injury than take a method of redressing yourselves which must injure your own peace and greatly dishonor the cause of God.

8. Nay, ye do wrong. Far from suffering, you are the aggressors; and defraud your pious, long-suffering brethren, who submit to this wrong rather than take those methods of redressing their grievances which the spirit of Christianity forbids. Probably the apostle refers to him who had taken his father's wife.

9. The unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom. The unrighteous, those who act contrary to right, cannot inherit, for the inheritance is by right. He who is not a child of God has no right to the family inheritance, for that inheritance is for the children. "If children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ," Rom. viii. 17. There are here ten classes of transgressors which the apostle excludes from the kingdom of God; and any man who is guilty of any one of the evils mentioned above is thereby excluded from this Kingdom, whether it imply the Church of Christ here below or the state of glory hereafter.

11. And such were some of you. It was not with the prospect of collecting saints that the apostles went about preaching the gospel of the Kingdom. None but sinners were to be found over the face of the earth; they preached that sinners might be converted unto God, made saints, and constituted into a church; and this was the effect as well as the object of their preaching. But ye are washed. Several suppose that the order in which the operations of the grace of God take place in the soul is here inverted, but I am of a very different mind. Everything will appear here in its order when we understand the terms used by the apostle. Ye are washed; you have been baptized into the Christian faith, and you have promised in this baptism to put off all filthiness of the flesh and spirit; the washing of your bodies is emblematical of the purification of your souls. Ye are sanctified. From a, privative, and ge, "the earth"; you are separated from earthly things to be connected with spiritual. You are separated from time to be connected with eternity. You are separated from idols to be joined to the living God. Separation from common, earthy, or sinful uses, to be wholly employed in the service of the true God, is the ideal meaning of this word, in both the Old and New Testaments. It was in consequence of their being separated from the world that they became a church of God. You were formerly workers of iniquity, and associated with workers of iniquity; but now you are separated from them, and united together to work out your salvation with fear and trembling before God. Ye are justified. You have been brought into a state of favor with God, your sins having been blotted out through Christ Jesus, the Spirit of God witnessing the same to your conscience, and carrying on by His energy the great work of regeneration in your hearts.

12. All things are lawful unto me. It is likely that some of the Corinthians had pleaded that the offense of the man who had his father's wife, as well as the eating the things offered to Paul here sets himself to oppose: he tells them that many things lawful in themselves were not expedient. Christians should not barely consider what is in itself lawful to be done, but what is fit for them to do. They should be very careful that by carrying this maxim too far they be not brought into bondage, either to a crafty deceiver or a carnal inclination. All things are lawful for me, says he, but I will not be brought under the power of any, v. 12. There is a liberty wherewith Christ has made us free, in which we must stand fast. But surely he would never carry this liberty so far as to put himself into the power of any bodily appetite. He would not become a glutton nor a drunkard. And much less would he abuse the maxim of lawful liberty to countenance the sin of fornication. He would not abuse this maxim about eating and drinking to encourage any intemperance, nor indulge a carnal appetite: "Though meats are for the belly and the belly for meats (v. 13).

If I am in danger of being subjected to my belly and appetite, I will abstain. But God shall destroy both it and them." There is a time coming when the need and use of food shall be abolished. The transition to his arguments against fornication seems very natural: But the body is not for fornication, but for the Lord, and the Lord for the body, v. 13. Meats and the belly are for one another; not so fornication and the body.

II. Some understand this last passage, The Lord is for the body, thus: He is for its resurrection and glorification, according to what follows, v. 14, which is a second argument against this sin, the honour intended to be put on our bodies: God hath both raised up our Lord, and will raise us up by his power (v. 14). It will be an honour to our bodies that they will be raised. Let us not abuse those bodies by sin which, if they be kept pure, shall be made like to Christ's glorious body.

I. The body is not for fornication, but for the Lord. This is the first argument he uses against this sin, for which the heathen inhabitants of Corinth were infamous. The body is not for fornication; it was never formed for any such purpose, but for the Lord. It is to be a member of Christ, and therefore must not be made the member of a harlot, v. 15. And the Lord is for the body, that is, as some think, Christ is to be Lord of the body, to have property in it and dominion over it. We must take care that we do not use what belongs to Christ as if it were our own, and much less to his dishonour.

III. A third argument is the honour already put on them: Know you not that your bodies are the members of Christ? v. 15. If the soul be united to Christ by faith, the whole man is become a member of his mystical body. The body is in union with Christ as well as the soul. But now, says the apostle, shall I take the members of Christ, and make them the members of a harlot? God forbid. Would it not be dishonouring Christ, and dishonouring ourselves to the very last degree? What, make Christ's members the members of a harlot? God forbid. Know you not that he who is joined to a harlot is one body with hers? For two, says he, shall be one flesh. But he who is joined to the Lord is one spirit, v. 16, 17. He is joined to the Lord in union with Christ, and made partaker by faith of his Spirit. How shall one in so close a union with Christ as to be one spirit with him yet be so united to a harlot as to become one flesh with her? Can anything be more inconsistent with our profession or relation? It is no wonder therefore that the apostle should say, "Flee fornication" (v. 18). Other vices may be conquered in fight, this only by flight; so speak many of the fathers.

IV. A fourth argument is that it is a sin against our own bodies. Every sin that a man does is without the body; he that committeth fornication sinneth against his own body (v. 18); every sin, that is, every external act of sin besides, is without the body.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

existence of bodily appetites proved the lawfulness of their gratification. me—Paul giving himself as a sample of Christians in general. but I—whatever others do, I will not . . . . lawful . . . brought under the power—The Greek words are from the same root, whence there is a play on the words: All things are in my power, but I will not be brought under the power of any of them (the "all things"). He who commits "fornication," steps aside from his own legitimate power or liberty, and is "brought under the power" of an harlot (vs. 15; cf. ch. 7:4). The "power" ought to be in the hands of the believer, not in the things which he uses [BENGEL]; else his liberty is forfeited; he ceases to be his own master (John 8:34-36; Gal. 5:13; I Pet. 2:16; II Pet. 2:19). Unlawful things ruin thousands; "lawful" things (unlawfully used), ten thousands. 13. The argument drawn from the indifference of meats (ch. 8:8; Rom. 14:14, 17; cf. Mark 7:18; Col. 2:20-22) to that of fornication does not hold good. Meats doubtless are indifferent, since both they and the "belly" for which they are created are to be "destroyed" in the future state. But "the body is not (created) for fornication, but for the Lord, and the Lord for the body" (as its Redeemer, who hath Himself assumed the body): "And God hath raised up the Lord, and will also raise up us" (i.e., our bodies): therefore the "body" is not, like the "belly," after having served a temporary use, to be destroyed: Now "he that committeth fornication, sinneth against his own body (vs. 18). Therefore fornication is not indifferent, since it is a sin against one's own body, which, like the Lord for whom it is created, is not to be destroyed, but to be raised to eternal existence. Thus Paul gives here the germ of the three subjects handled in subsequent sections: (1) The relation between the sexes. (2) The question of meats offered to idols. (3) The resurrection of the body. shall destroy—at the Lord's coming to change the natural bodies of believers into spiritual bodies (ch. 15:44, 52). There is a real essence underlying the superficial phenomena of the present temporary organization of the body, and this essential germ, when all the particles are scattered, involves the future resurrection of the body incorruptible. 14. (Rom. 8:11.) raised up—rather, "raised," to distinguish it from "will raise up us"; the Greek of the latter being a compound, the former a simple verb. Believers shall be raised up out of the rest of the dead (Note, Phil. 3:11); the first resurrection (Rev. 20:5). us—Here he speaks of the possibility of his being found in the grave when Christ comes; elsewhere, of his being possibly found alive (I Thess. 4:17). In either event, the Lord's coming rather than death is the great object of the Christian's expectation (Rom. 8:19). 15. Resuming the thought in vs. 13, "the body is for the Lord" (ch. 12:27; Eph. 4:12, 15, 16; 5:30). shall I then—such being the case. take—spontaneously alienating them from Christ. For they cannot be at the same time "the members of an harlot," and "of Christ" [BENGEL]. It is a fact no less certain than mysterious, that moral and spiritual ruin is caused by such sins; which human wisdom (when untaught by revelation) held to be actions as blameless as eating and drinking [CONYBEARE and HOWSON]. 16. Justification of his having called fornicators "members of an harlot" (vs. 15). joined—by carnal intercourse; lit., "cemented to": cleaving to. one body—with her. saith he—GOD speaking by Adam (Gen. 2:24; Matt. 19:5). "He which made them at the beginning said . . ." (Eph. 5:31). 17. one spirit—with Him. In the case of union with a harlot, the fornicator becomes one "body" with her (not one "spirit," for the spirit which is normally the organ of the Holy Spirit in man, is in the carnal so overlaid with what is sensual that it is ignored altogether). But the believer not only has his body sanctified by union with Christ's body, but also becomes "one spirit" with Him (John 15:1-7; 17:21; II Pet. 1:4; cf. Eph. 5:23-32, and John 3:6). 18. Flee—The only safety in such temptations is flight (Gen. 39:12; Job 31:1). Every sin—The Greek is forcible. "Every sin whatsoever that a man doeth." Every other sin; even gluttony, drunkenness, and selfmurder are "without," i.e., comparatively external to the body (Mark 7:18; cf. Prov. 6: 30-32). He certainly injures, but he does not alienate the body itself; the sin is not terminated in the body; he rather sins against the perishing accidents of the body (as the "belly," and the body's present temporary organization), and against the soul than against the body in its permanent essence, designed "for the Lord." "But" the fornicator alienates that body which is the Lord's, and makes it one with a harlot's body, and so "sinneth against his own body," i.e., against the verity and nature idols, was not contrary to the law, as it then stood. To this the apostle answers: Though such a thing be lawful, yet the case of fornication, mentioned in chap. v. 1, is not expedient—it is not agreeable to propriety, decency, order, and purity. It is contrary to the established usages of the best and most enlightened nations, and should not be tolerated in the Church of Christ.

13. Meats for the belly. God has provided different kinds of aliments for the appetite of man, and among others those which are generally offered to idols; and He has adapted the appetite to these aliments, and the aliments to the appetite.

But God shall destroy both it and them; none of these is eternal; all these lower appetites and sensations will be destroyed by death and have no existence in the resurrection body. Now the body is not for fornication. Though God made an appetite for food, and provided food for that appetite, yet He has not made the body for any uncleanness nor indulgence in sensuality; but He has made it for Christ. And Christ was provided to be a Sacrifice for this body as well as for the soul, by taking our nature upon Him; so that now, as human beings, we have an intimate relationship to the Lord; and our bodies are made not only for His service but to be His temples.

14. And God hath both raised up the Lord. He has raised up the human nature of Christ from the grave, as a pledge of our resurrection; and will also raise us up by His own power, that we may dwell with Him in glory forever.

15. Know ye not that your bodies are the members of Christ? Because He has taken your nature upon Him, and thus, as believers in Him, you are the members of Christ. Shall I then take? Shall we who profess to be members of His body, of His flesh, and of His bones, connect ourselves with harlots, and thus dishonor and pollute the bodies which are members of Christ?

17. Is one spirit. He who is united to God, by faith in Christ Jesus, receives His Spirit, and becomes a partaker of the divine nature. Who can change such a relationship for communion with a harlot, or for any kind of sensual gratification?

18. Flee fornication. Abominate, detest, and escape from every kind of uncleanness. Some sins, or solicitations to sin, may be reasoned with; in the above cases, if you parley you are undone; reason not but fly! Sinneth against his own body. Though sin of every species has a tendency to destroy life, yet none are so mortal as those to which the apostle refers; they strike immediately at the basis of the constitution. By the just judgment of God, all these irregular and sinful connections are married to death.

MATTHEW HENRY

This sin is in a peculiar manner styled uncleanness, pollution, because no sin has so much external turpitude in it, especially in a Christian. He sins against his own body; he defiles it, he degrades it. He casts vile reproach on what his Redeemer has dignified to the last degree by taking it into union with himself. We should not make our present vile bodies more vile by sinning against them.

V. The fifth argument against this sin is that the bodies of Christians are the temples of the Holy Ghost which is in them, and which they have of God, v. 19. He that is joined to Christ is one spirit. He is yielded up to him and is hereupon possessed, and inhabited, by his Holy Spirit. This is the proper notion of a temple—a place where God dwells, and sacred to his use. Such temples real Christians are of the Holy Ghost.

Hence we are not our own. We are possessed by and for God; nay, and this in virtue of a purchase made of us: You are bought with a price. In short, our bodies were made for God, they were purchased for him. And shall we desecrate his temple, and offer it up to the use and service of a harlot? The temple of the Holy Ghost must be kept holy. Our bodies must be kept as his whose they are, and fit for his use and residence.

VI. The apostle argues from the obligation we are under to glorify God both with our body and spirit, which are his, v. 20. He made both, he bought both. They must be kept as vessels fitted for our Master's use. We must look upon our whole selves as holy to the Lord. We are to honour him with our bodies and spirits, which are his. Body and spirit are to be kept clean, that God may be honoured by both. But God is dishonoured when either is defiled by so beastly a sin. Therefore flee fornication, nay, and every sin. Use your bodies for the glory and service of their Lord and Maker.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

of his body; not a mere effect on the body from without, but a contradiction of the truth of the body, wrought within itself [ALFORD]. 19. Proof that "he that fornicates sinneth against his own body" (vs. 18). your body—not "bodies." As in ch. 3:17, he represented the whole company of believers (souls and bodies), i.e., the Church, as "the temple of God," the Spirit; so here, the body of each individual of the Church is viewed as the ideal "temple of the Holy Ghost." So John 17:23, which proves that not only the Church, but also each member of it, is "the temple of the Holy Ghost." Still though many the several members form one temple, the whole collectively being that which each is in miniature individually. Just as the Jews had one temple only, so in the fullest sense all Christian churches and individual believers form one temple only. Thus "YOUR [plural] body" is distinguished here from "HIS OWN [particular or individual] body" (vs. 18). In sinning against the latter, the fornicator sins against "your (ideal) body," that of "Christ," whose "members your bodies" are (vs. 15). In this consists the sin of fornication, that it is a sacrilegious desecration of God's temple to profane uses. The unseen, but much more efficient, Spirit of God in the spiritual temple now takes the place of the visible Shekinah in the old material temple. The whole man is the temple; the soul is the inmost shrine; the understanding and heart, the holy place; and the body, the porch and exterior of the edifice. Chastity is the guardian of the temple to prevent anything unclean entering which might provoke the indwelling God to abandon it as defiled [TERTULLIAN de cultu fœminarum]. None but God can claim a temple; here the Holy Ghost is assigned one; therefore the Holy Ghost is God. not your own—The fornicator treats his body as if it were "his own," to give to a harlot if he pleases (vs. 18; cf. vs. 20). But we have no right to alienate our body which is the Lord's. In ancient servitude the person of the servant was wholly the property of the master, not his own. Purchase was one of the ways of acquiring a slave. Man has sold himself to sin (I Kings 21:20; Rom. 7:14). Christ buys him to Himself, to serve Him (Rom. 6:16-22). 20. bought with a price—Therefore Christ's blood is strictly a ransom paid to God's justice by the love of God in Christ for our redemption (Matt. 20:28; Acts 20:28; Gal. 3:13; Heb. 9:12; I Pet. 1:18, 19; II Pet. 2:1 Rev. 5:9). While He thus took off our obligation to punishment, He laid upon us a new obligation to obedience (ch. 7:22, 23). If we accept Him as our Prophet to reveal God to us, and our Priest to atone for us, we must also accept Him as our King to rule over us as wholly His, presenting every token of our fealty (Isa. 26:13). in your body—as "in" a temple (cf. John 13:32; Rom. 12:1; Phil. 1:20). and in your spirit, which are God's—not in the oldest MSS. and versions, and not needed for the sense, as the context refers mainly to the "body" (vss. 16, 18, 19). The "spirit" is incidentally mentioned in vs. 17, which perhaps gave rise to the interpolation, at first written in the margin, afterwards inserted in the text.

ADAM CLARKE

19. Your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost. What an astonishing saying is this! As truly as the living God dwelt in the Mosaic Tabernacle and in the Temple of Solomon, so truly does the Holy Ghost dwell in the souls of genuine Christians; and as the Temple and all its utensils were holy, separated from all common and profane uses and dedicated alone to the service of God, so the bodies of genuine Christians are holy, and all their members should be employed in the service of God alone.

And ye are not your own. You have no right over yourselves, to dispose of either your body or any of its members as you may think proper or lawful; you are bound to God, and to Him you are accountable.

20. Ye are bought with a price. As the slave who is purchased by his master for a sum of money is the sole property of that master, so you, being bought with the price of the blood of Christ, are not your own; you are His property. As the slave is bound to use all his skill and diligence for the emolument of his master, so you should employ body, soul, and spirit in the service of your Lord; promoting, by every means in your power, the honor and glory of your God, whom you must also consider as your Lord and Master. And in your spirit, which are God's is wanting in some MSS. and in several of the primitive fathers. Almost every critic of note considers them to be spurious.

CHAPTER 7

Verses 1–9

The apostle comes now to answer some cases of conscience which the Corinthians had proposed to him. They were things whereof they wrote to him, v. 1. The apostle was as ready to resolve as they were to propose their doubts. In the former chapter, he warns them to avoid fornication; here he gives some directions about marriage.

I. It was good to abstain from marriage altogether: It is good for a man not to touch a woman (not to take her to wife), by good here not understanding what is so conformable to the mind of God as if to do otherwise were sin, an extreme into which many of the ancients have run in favour of celibacy and virginity. At this juncture it would be a convenience for Christians to keep themselves single, provided they can keep themselves chaste.

II. He informs them that marriage, and the comforts and satisfactions of that state, are by divine wisdom prescribed for preventing fornication (v. 2).

CHAPTER 7

Vss. 1-40. REPLY TO THEIR INQUIRIES AS TO MARRIAGE; THE GENERAL PRINCIPLE IN OTHER THINGS IS, ABIDE IN YOUR STATION, FOR THE TIME IS SHORT. 1. The Corinthians in their letter had probably asked questions which tended to disparage marriage, and had implied that it was better to break it off when contracted with an unbeliever. good—i.e., "expedient," because of "the present distress"; i.e., the unsettled state of the world, and the likelihood of persecutions tearing rudely asunder those bound by marriage ties. Hebrews 13: 4, in opposition to ascetic and Romish notions of superior sanctity in celibacy, declares, "Marriage is HONORABLE IN ALL." Another reason why in some cases celibacy may be a matter of Christian expediency is stated in vss. 34, 35, "that ye may attend upon the Lord without distraction." But these are exceptional cases, and in exceptional times, such as those of Paul. 2. Here the general rule is given to avoid fornication—More lit., "on account of fornications," to which as being very prevalent at Corinth, and not even counted sins among the heathen, unmarried persons might be tempted. The plural, "fornications," marks irregular lusts, as contrasted with the unity of the marriage relation [BENGEL]. let every man have—a positive command to all who have not the gift of continency, in fact to the great majority of the world (vs. 5). The dignity of marriage is set forth by Paul (Eph. 5:25-

CHAPTER 7

1. The things whereof ye wrote unto me. It is sufficiently evident that the principal part of this Epistle was written in answer to some questions which had been sent to the apostle in a letter from the Corinthian church; and the first question seems to be this: "Is it proper for a man to marry in the present circumstances of the church?" The question concerning the expediency or inexpediency of marriage was often agitated among the ancient philosophers; and many, though inclined to decide against it, because of the troubles and cares connected with it, tolerated it in their opinions because, though an evil, it was judged to be a necessary evil. But this was not the common opinion; the Jews absolutely required that every man should marry, and reputed those as murderers who did not. By the laws of Lycurgus unmarried persons were prohibited from seeing the public games. By the laws of the Spartans bachelors were punished. And Plato declares all such unworthy of any honor.

2. Let every man have his own wife. Let every man have one woman, his own; and every woman one man, her own. Here, plurality of wives and husbands is most strictly forbidden; and they are commanded to marry for the purpose of procreating children.

MATTHEW HENRY

And, when they are married, let each render the other due benevolence (v. 3).

ALBERT BARNES:

3. "Let them not imagine that there is any virtue in living separate from each other, as if they were in a state of celibacy."—Doddridge. They are bound to each other; in every way they are to evince kindness, and to seek to promote the happiness and purity of each other. There is a great deal of delicacy used here by Paul, and his expression is removed as far as possible from the grossness of heathen writers. His meaning is plain; but instead of using a word to express it which would be indelicate and offensive, he uses one which is not indelicate in the slightest degree. The word which he uses (benevolence) denotes kindness, goodwill, affection of mind. And by the use of the word "due," he reminds them of the sacredness of their vow, and of the fact that in person, property, and in every respect, they belong to each other. It was necessary to give this direction, for the contrary might have been regarded as proper by many who would have supposed there was special virtue and merit in living separate from each other (facts have shown that many have imbibed such an idea). It was not possible to give the rule with more delicacy than Paul has done. Many mss., however, instead of "due benevolence," read "a debt" or "that which is owed"; and this reading has been adopted by Griesbach in the text. Homer, with a delicacy not unlike the apostle Paul, uses the word "friendship" to express the same idea.
—Popular Commentary

And therefore they should not defraud one another of the use of their bodies, except it be with mutual consent (v. 5) and for a time only, while they employ themselves in some extraordinary duties of religion, or give themselves to fasting and prayer. Seasons of deep humiliation require abstinence from lawful pleasures.

III. The apostle limits what he had said (v. 2). Paul did not bind every man to marry. No, he could wish all men were as himself (v. 7). Natural constitutions vary.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

32), in the fact that it signifies the mystical union between Christ and the Church. 3, 4. The duty of cohabitation on the part of the married. due benevolence—The oldest MSS. read simply, "her due"; i.e., the conjugal cohabitation due by the marriage contract (cf. vs. 4).

4. A paradox. She hath not power over her body, and yet it is her own. The oneness of body in which marriage places husband and wife explains this. The one complements the other. Neither without the other realizes the perfect ideal of man.

5. Defraud . . . not—viz., of the conjugal duty "due" (vs. 3; cf. LXX, Exod. 21:10). except it be—"unless perchance" [ALFORD]. give yourselves to—lit., "be at leisure for"; be free from interruptions for; viz., on some special "season," as the Greek for "time" means (cf. Exod. 19:15; Joel 2:16; Zech. 7:3). fasting and prayer—The oldest MSS. omit "fasting and"; an interpolation, evidently, of ascetics. come together—The oldest MSS. read, "be together," viz., in the regular state of the married. Satan—who often thrusts in his temptations to unholy thoughts amidst the holiest exercises. for your incontinency—because of your inability to "contain" (vs. 9) your natural propensities, which Satan would take advantage of.

6. by permission . . . not of commandment—not by God's permission to me to say it: but, "by way of permission to you, not as a commandment." "This" refers to the directions vss. 2-5.

7. even as I—having the gift of continence (Matt. 19:11, 12). This wish does not hold good absolutely, else the extension of mankind and of the Church would cease; but relatively to "the present distress" (vs. 26).

8. to the unmarried—in general, of both sexes (vss. 10, 11). and widows—in particular. even as I—unmarried (ch. 9:5).

ADAM CLARKE

3. Let the husband render unto the wife due benevolence. Though our version is no translation of the original, yet few persons are at a loss for the meaning, and the context is sufficiently plain. Some have rendered the words, not unaptly, the "matrimonial debt" or "conjugal duty"—that which a wife owes to her husband, and the husband to his wife; and which they must take care mutually to render, else alienation of affection will be the infallible consequence, and this in numberless instances has led to adulterous connections. In such cases the wife has to blame herself for the infidelity of her husband, and the husband for that of his wife. What miserable work has been made in the peace of families by a wife or a husband pretending to be wiser than the apostle, and too holy and spiritual to keep the commandments of God!

4. The wife hath not power. Her person belongs to her husband; her husband's person belongs to her. Neither of them has any authority to refuse what the other has a matrimonial right to demand. The woman that would act so is either a knave or a fool. It would be trifling to attribute her conduct to any other cause than weakness or folly. She does not love her husband; or she loves someone else better than her husband; or she makes pretensions to a fancied sanctity unsupported by Scripture or common sense.

5. Defraud ye not one the other. What you owe thus to each other never refuse paying, unless by mutual consent; and let that be only for a certain time, when prudence dictates the temporary separation, or when some extraordinary spiritual occasion may render it mutually agreeable, in order that you may fast and pray, and derive the greatest possible benefit from these duties by being enabled to wait on the Lord without distraction. That Satan tempt you not for your incontinency. It is most evident that the separations permitted by the apostle, for he enjoins none, are only for a season, on extraordinary occasions; and that the persons may come together again, lest Satan, taking advantage of their matrimonial abstinence, might tempt either party to illicit commerce. Incontinency, "want of strength" to regulate one's desires or appetities; from a, negative, and kratos, "strength." It is remarkable that the apostle supposes that even this temporary continence might produce incontinence; and universal observation confirms the supposition.

6. I speak this by permission. It was a constant custom of the more conscientious rabbins to make a difference between the things which they enjoined on their own judgment and those which they built on the authority of the law. Thus Rabbi Tancum: "The washing of hands before meat is in our own power; washing after meat is commanded." We may understand the apostle here as saying that the directions already given were from his own judgment, and not from any divine inspiration; and we may take it for granted that where he does not make this observation he is writing under the immediate afflatus of the Holy Spirit.

7. For I would that all men. He wished that all that were then in the Church were, like himself, unmarried; but this was in reference to the necessities of the Church, or what he calls, v. 26, the "present distress." For it never could be his wish that marriage should cease among men, and that human beings should no longer be propagated upon earth. Nor could he wish that the Church of Christ should always be composed of single persons; this would have been equally absurd. But as the Church was then in straits and difficulties, it was much better for its single members not to encumber themselves with domestic embarrassments. Every man hath his proper gift of God. Continence is a state that cannot be acquired by human art or industry; a man has it from God, or not at all.

8. The unmarried and widows. It is supposed that the apostle speaks here of men who had been married but were now widowers; as he does of women who had been married, in the word widows. And when he says even as I, he means that he himself was a widower; for several of the ancients rank Paul among the married apostles.

MATTHEW HENRY

IV. He sums up (v. 9, 10): Marriage, with all its inconveniences, is much better than to burn with impure and lustful desires.

Verses 10–16

The apostle gives them direction in a case which must have been frequent in that age of the world, whether they were to live with heathen relatives in a married state. Moses's law permitted divorce. This might move a scruple in many minds.

I. Marriage, by Christ's command, is for life. The wife must not depart from the husband (v. 10), nor the husband put away his wife, v. 11. The Lord himself had forbidden such separations, Matt. v. 32. They must not separate for any other cause than what Christ allows. Husbands and wives should not quarrel at all, or should be quickly reconciled. They are bound to each other for life. They cannot throw off the burden, and therefore should set their shoulders to it, and endeavour to make it as light to each other as they can.

II. The case of such as had an unbelieving mate (v. 12). It does not mean that the apostle decided this case by his own wisdom. He closes this subject with a declaration to the contrary (v. 40).

1. The advice itself, that if an unbelieving husband or wife were pleased to dwell with a Christian relative, the other should not separate, v. 12, 13. The Christian calling did not dissolve the marriage covenant, but bind it the faster. Yet, if the unbelieving relative desert the believer, in such a case a brother or sister is not in bondage (v. 15). In such a case the deserted person must be free to marry again. The apostle says (v. 11), If the woman depart from her husband let her remain unmarried.

2. The reasons of this advice. (1) The relation is sanctified by the holiness of either party (v. 14). The apostle tells them that, though they were yoked with unbelievers, yet, if they themselves were holy, marriage was to them a holy state. He is sanctified for the wife's sake. She is sanctified for the husband's sake. Else were your children unclean, but now are they holy (v. 14). The children born to Christians, though married to unbelievers, are not to be reckoned as part of the world, but of the church.

A. T. ROBERTSON:

14. "Is sanctified in the wife" (hegiastai en tei gunaiki). Perfect passive indicative of hagiazo, to set apart, to hallow, to sanctify. Paul does not, of course, mean that the unbelieving husband is saved by the faith of the believing wife, though Hodge actually so interprets him. Clearly he only means that the marriage relation is sanctified so that there is no need of a divorce. If either husband or wife is a believer and the other agrees to remain, the marriage is holy and need not be set aside. This is so simple that one wonders at the ability of men to get confused over Paul's language. "Else were your children unclean" (epei ara ta tekna akatharta). The common ellipse of the condition with epei: "since, accordingly, if it is otherwise, your children are illegitimate (akatharta)." If the relations of the parents be holy, the child's birth must be holy also (not illegitimate). "He is not assuming that the child of a Christian parent would be baptized; that would spoil rather than help his argument, for it would imply that the child was not hagios till it was baptized. The verse throws no light on the question of infant baptism" (Robertson and Plummer).

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

9. if they cannot contain—i.e., "have not continency." burn—with the secret flame of lust, which lays waste the whole inner man. [Cf. AUGUSTINE, de Sancta Virginitate.] The dew of God's grace is needed to stifle the flame, which otherwise would thrust men at last into hell-fire. 10. not I, but the Lord—(Cf. vss. 12, 25, 40). In ordinary cases he writes on inspired apostolic authority (ch. 14:37); but here on the direct authority of the Lord Himself (Mark 10:11, 12). In both cases alike the things written are inspired by the Spirit of God "but not all for all time, nor all on the primary truths of the faith" [ALFORD]. Let not the wife depart—lit., "be separated from." Probably the separation on either side, whether owing to the husband or to the wife, is forbidden. 11. But and if she depart—or "be separated." If the sin of separation has been committed, that of a new marriage is not to be added (Matt. 5:32). be reconciled—by appeasing her husband's displeasure, and recovering his good will. let not... husband put away... wife—In Matthew 5:32 the only exception allowed is, "saving for the cause of fornication." 12. to the rest—the other classes (besides "the married," vs. 10, where both husband and wife are believers) about whom the Corinthians had inquired, viz., those involved in mixed marriages with unbelievers. not the Lord—by any direct command spoken by Him. she be pleased—Greek, "consents": implying his wish in the first instance, with which hers concurs. 13. the woman—a believer. let her not leave him—"her husband," instead of "him," is the reading of the oldest MSS. The Greek for "leave" is the same as in vs. 12, "put away"; translate, "Let her not put away [i.e., part with] her husband." The wife had the power of effecting a divorce by Greek and Roman law. 14. sanctified—Those inseparably connected with the people of God are hallowed thereby, so that the latter may retain the connection without impairing their own sanctity (cf. I Tim. 4:5); nay, rather imparting to the former externally some degree of their own hallowed character, and so preparing the way for the unbeliever becoming at last sanctified inwardly by faith. by... by—rather, "in... in"; i.e., in virtue of the marriage tie between them. by the husband—The oldest MSS. read, "by the brother." It is the fact of the husband being a "brother," i.e., a Christian, though the wife is not so, that sanctifies or hallows the union. else... children unclean—i.e., beyond the hallowed pale of God's people: in contrast to "holy," i.e., all that is within the consecrated limits [CONYBEARE and HOWSON]. The phraseology accords with that of the Jews, who regarded the heathen as "unclean," and all of the elect nation as "holy," i.e., partakers of the holy covenant. Children were included in the covenant, as God made it not only with Abraham, but with his "seed after" him (Gen. 17:7). So the faith of one Christian parent gives to the children a near relationship to the Church, just as if both parents were Christians (cf. Rom. 11:16). Timothy, the bearer of this Epistle, is an instance in point (Acts 16:1). Paul appeals to the Corinthians as recognizing the principle, that the infants of heathen parents would not be admissible to Christian baptism, because there is no faith on the part of the parents; but where one parent is a believer, the children are regarded as not aliens from, but admissible even in infancy as sharers in, the Christian covenant: for the Church presumes that the believing parent will rear the child in the Christian faith. Infant baptism tacitly superseded infant circumcision, just as the Christian Lord's day gradually superseded the Jewish sabbath, without our having any express command for, or record of, transference. The setting aside of circumcision and of sabbaths in the case of the Gentiles was indeed expressly commanded by the apostles and Paul, but the substitution of infant baptism and of the Lord's day were tacitly adopted, not expressly enacted. No explicit mention of it occurs till Irenæus in the third century; but no society of Christians that we read of disputed its propriety till 1500 years after Christ. Anabaptists would have us defer baptism till maturity as the child cannot understand the nature of it. But a child may be made heir of an estate: it is his, though incapable at the time of using or comprehending its advantage; he is not hereafter to acquire the title and claim to it. he will hereafter understand his claim, and be capable of employing his wealth: he will then, moreover, become responsible for the use he makes of it [ARCHBISHOP, WHATELY]. 15. if... depart—i.e., wishes for separation. Translate, "separateth himself": offended with her Christianity, and refusing to live with her unless she renounce it. brother or

ADAM CLARKE

9. But if they cannot contain. If they find it inconvenient and uncomfortable to continue as widowers and widows, let them remarry.

10. I command, yet not I, but the Lord. I do not give my own private opinion or judgment in this case; for the Lord Jesus commands that man shall not put asunder them whom God hath joined, Matt. v. 32; xix. 6. And God has said the same, Gen. ii. 24.

11. But and if she depart. He puts the case as probable, because it was frequent, but lays it under restrictions. Let her remain unmarried. She departs at her own peril, but she must not marry another; she must either continue unmarried or be reconciled to her husband. And let not the husband put away his wife. Divorces cannot be allowed but in the case of fornication. An act of this kind dissolves the marriage vow, but nothing else can.

12. But to the rest speak I, not the Lord. As if he had said: For what I have already spoken I have the testimony of the Lord by Moses, and of my own Lord and Master, Christ; but for the directions which I am now about to give there is no written testimony, and I deliver them now for the first time. These words do not intimate that the apostle was not now under the influences of the divine Spirit, but that there was nothing in the sacred writings which bore directly on this point. If any brother, a Christian man, hath a wife that believeth not, i.e., who is a heathen, not yet converted to the Christian faith, and she be pleased to dwell with him, notwithstanding his turning Christian since their marriage, let him not put her away because she still continues in her heathen superstition.

13. And the woman, converted from heathenism to the Christian faith, which hath an husband, who still abides in heathenism; if he be pleased to dwell with her, notwithstanding she has become a Christian since their marriage, let her not leave him because he still continues a heathen.

14. The unbelieving husband is sanctified by the wife. Or rather, is to be reputed as sanctified on account of his wife. She being a Christian woman and he, though a heathen, being by marriage one flesh with her, her sanctity, as far as it refers to outward things, may be considered as imputed to him so as to render their connection not unlawful. The case is the same when the wife is a heathen and the husband a Christian. The word sanctification here is to be applied much more to the Christian state than to any moral change in the persons, for "saints" is a common term for Christians. Else were your children unclean. If this kind of relative sanctification were not allowed, the children of these persons could not be received into the Christian Church, nor enjoy any rights or privileges as Christians; but the Church of God never scrupled to admit such children as members, just as well as she did those who had sprung from parents both of whom were Christians. The Jews considered a child as born "out of holiness" whose parents were not proselytes at the time of the birth, though afterwards they became proselytes. On the other hand, they considered the children of heathens born "in holiness" provided the parents became proselytes before the birth. All the children of the heathens were reputed unclean by the Jews, and all their own children holy. This shows clearly what the apostle's meaning is.

15. But if the unbelieving depart. Whether husband or wife, if such obstinately depart and utterly refuse all cohabitation, a brother or a sister, a Christian man or woman, is not

MATTHEW HENRY

(2) Another reason is that God hath called Christians to peace, v. 15.

(3) It is possible for the believing relative to be an instrument of the other's salvation (v. 16). Should a Christian desert a mate, when an opportunity offers to give the most glorious proof of love? Endeavour to save a soul. It is not impossible. What know I but I may save his soul? should move me to attempt it.

Verses 17–24

I. He lays down this rule in general—as God hath distributed to everyone. And again, As the Lord hath called everyone, so let him walk. In every state a man may live so as to be a credit to it. The apostle adds that this was a general rule, to be observed in all places: So ordain I in all churches.

II. He specifies particular cases: 1. That of circumcision. It matters not whether a man be a Jew or Gentile (v. 19). External observances without internal piety are as nothing. Therefore let every man abide in the calling (the state) wherein he was called, v. 20. 2. That of servitude and freedom. "Now," says the apostle, "art thou called being a servant? Care not for it. It is not inconsistent with thy duty, profession, or hopes, as a Christian. Yet, if thou mayest be made free, use it rather," v. 21. There are many conveniences in a state of freedom above that of servitude. But men's outward condition does neither hinder nor promote their acceptance with God. He who is a slave may yet be a Christian freeman; he who is a freeman may yet be Christ's servant. He must not be so the servant of men, that Christ's will is not obeyed, and regarded, more than his master's. The servants of Christ should be at the absolute command of no other master besides himself.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

a sister is not under bondage—is not bound to renounce the faith for the sake of retaining her unbelieving husband [HAMMOND]. So Deuteronomy 13:6; Matthew 10:35-37; Luke 14:26. The believer does not lie under the same obligation in the case of a union with an unbeliever, as in the case of one with a believer. In the former case he is not bound not to separate, if the unbeliever separate or "depart," in the latter nothing but "fornication" justifies separation [PHOTIUS in Æcumenius]. but God hath called us to peace—Our Christian calling is one that tends to "peace" (Rom. 12:18), not quarrelling; therefore the believer should not ordinarily depart from the unbelieving consort (vss. 12-14), on the one hand; and on the other, in the exceptional case of the unbeliever desiring to depart, the believer is not bound to force the other party to stay in a state of continual discord (Matt. 5:32). Better still it would be not to enter into such unequal alliances at all (vs. 40; II Cor. 6:14). 16. What knowest thou but that by staying with thy unbelieving partner thou mayest save him or her? Enforcing the precept to stay with the unbelieving consort (vss. 12-14). So Ruth the Moabitess became a convert to her husband's faith: and Joseph and Moses probably gained over their wives. So conversely the unbelieving husband may be won by the believing wife (I Pet. 3:1) [CALVIN]. Or else (vs. 15), if thy unbelieving consort wishes to depart, let him go, so that thou mayest live "in peace": for thou canst not be sure of converting him, so as to make it obligatory on thee at all costs to stay with him against his will [MENOCHIUS and ALFORD]. 16. save—be the instrument of salvation to (Jas. 5:20). 17. But—Greek, "If not." "Only." Caution that believers should not make this direction (vs. 16; as ALFORD explains it) a ground for separating of themselves (vss. 12-14). Or, But if there be no hope of gaining over the unbeliever, still let the general principle be maintained, "As the Lord hath allotted to each, as God hath called each, so let him walk" (so the Greek in the oldest reading); let him walk in the path allotted to him and wherein he was called. The heavenly calling does not set aside our earthly callings. so ordain I in all churches—Ye also therefore should obey. 18. not become uncircumcised—by surgical operation (I Maccabees 1:15; JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 12. 5. 1). Some Christians in excess of anti-Jewish feeling might be tempted to this. let him not be circumcised—as the Judaizing Christians would have him (Acts 15; Gal. 5:2). 19. Circumcision . . . nothing, but . . . keeping of . . . commandments of God—viz., is all in all. In Galatians 5:6 this "keeping of the commandments of God" is defined to be "faith which worketh by love"; and in Galatians 6:15, "a new creature." Circumcision was a commandment of God: but not for ever, as "love." 20. the same calling—i.e., the condition from which he is called a Jew, a Greek, a slave, or a freeman. 21. care not for it—Let it not be a trouble to thee that thou art a servant or slave. use it rather—Continue rather in thy state as a servant (vs. 20; Gal. 3:28; I Tim. 6:2). The Greek, "But if even thou mayest be made free, use it," and the context (vss. 20, 22) favors this view [CHRYSOSTOM, BENGEL, and ALFORD]. This advice (if this translation be right) is not absolute, as the spirit of the Gospel is against slavery. What is advised here is, contentment under one's existing condition (vs. 24), though an undesirable one, since in our union with Christ all outward disparities of condition are compensated (vs. 22). Be not unduly impatient to cast off "even" thy condition as a servant by unlawful means (I Pet. 2:13-18); as, e.g., Onesimus did by fleeing (Philemon 10-18). The precept (vs. 23), "Become not (so the Greek) the servants of men," implies plainly that slavery is abnormal (cf. Lev. 25:42). "Men stealers," or slave dealers, are classed in I Timothy 1:10, with "murderers" and "perjurers." NEANDER, GROTIUS, etc., explain, "If called, being a slave, to Christianity, be content—but yet, if also thou canst be free (as a still additional good, which if thou canst not attain, be satisfied without it; but which, if offered to thee, is not to be despised), make use of the opportunity of becoming free, rather than by neglecting it to remain a slave." I prefer this latter view, as more according to the tenor of the Gospel, and fully justified by the Greek. 22. the Lord's freeman—(Philemon 16)—rather, "freedman." Though a slave externally, spiritually made free by the Lord: from sin, John 8:36; from the law, Romans 8:2; from "circumcision," vs. 19; Galatians 5:1. Christ's servant—(ch. 9:21). Love makes Christ's service perfect freedom (Matt. 11:29,30; Gal. 5:13; I Peter 2:16). 23. be not ye—Greek, "become not ye." Paul here changes from "thou" (vs. 21) to "ye.'

ADAM CLARKE

under bondage to any particular laws, so as to be prevented from remarrying. Such, probably, the law stood then; but it is not so now, for the marriage can be dissolved only by death or by the ecclesiastical court. God hath called us to peace. The refractory and disagreeing party should not be compelled to fulfill such matrimonial engagements as would produce continual jarring and discord. At the same time each should take care that he give no cause for disagreements and separations, for the Author of the Christian religion is the Author of peace, and has called us to it.

16. For what knowest thou, O wife? You that are Christians, and who have heathen partners, do not give them up because they are such, for you may become the means of saving them unto eternal life. Bear your cross and look up to God, and He may give your unbelieving husband or wife to your prayers.

17. But as God hath distributed to every man. Let every man fulfill the duties of the state to which God in the course of His providence has called him. So ordain I in all churches. I do not lay on you a burden which others are not called to bear; this is the general rule which, by the authority of God, I impose on every Christian society.

18. Is any man called being circumcised? Is any man who was formerly a Jew converted to Christianity? Let him not become uncircumcised. Let him not endeavor to abolish the sign of the old covenant, which he bears in his flesh. Let him not be circumcised. Let no man who, being a Gentile, has been converted to the Christian faith submit to circumcision as something necessary to his salvation.

19. Circumcision is nothing. Circumcision itself, though commanded of God, is nothing of itself, it being only a sign of the justification which should be afterwards received by faith. At present, neither it nor its opposite either hinders or furthers the work of grace; and keeping the commandments of God, from His love shed abroad in a believing heart, is the sum and substance of religion.

20. Let every man abide in the same calling. As both the circumcised and uncircumcised, in Christ, have the same advantages, and to their believing the same facilities, so any situation of life is equally friendly to the salvation of the soul, if a man be faithful to the grace he has received. Therefore in all situations a Christian should be content, for all things work together for good to him who loves God.

21. Art thou called being a servant? Are you converted to Christ while you are a "slave"—the property of another person, and bought with his money? Care not for it—this will not injure your Christian condition. But if you can obtain your liberty, use it rather, prefer this state for the sake of freedom, and the temporal advantages connected with it.

22. For he that is called. The man who, being a "slave," is converted to the Christian faith is the Lord's freeman; his condition as a slave does not vitiate any of the privileges to which he is entitled as a Christian. On the other hand, all free men who receive the grace of Christ must consider themselves the "slaves of the Lord," i.e., His real property, to be employed and disposed of according to His godly wisdom, who, notwithstanding their state of subjection, will find the service of their Master to be perfect freedom.

MATTHEW HENRY

III. He sums up his advice (v. 24). He should quietly abide in the condition in which he is; and this he may well do, when he may abide therein with God. The presence and favour of God are not limited to any outward condition. He who is bound may have it as well as he who is free. The favour of God is not bound.

Verses 25–35

The apostle here gives directions to virgins how to act.

I. The manner wherein he introduces them, v. 25. Though Christ had before delivered no universal law about that matter, he now gives direction by an inspired apostle.

III. He is very careful to satisfy them that he does not condemn marriage, nor declare it unlawful. Though he says, "If thou art loosed from a wife do not seek a wife," yet he adds, "If thou art bound to a wife, do not seek to be loosed. It is thy duty to continue in the married relation." Duty must be done, and God trusted with events. Marrying is not in itself a sin, but marrying at that time was likely to add to the calamities of the times.

YE ALL are "bought" with the blood of Christ, whatever be your earthly state (ch. 6:20). "Become not servants to men," either externally, or spiritually; the former sense applying to the free alone: the latter to Christian freemen and slaves alike, that they should not be servile adherents to their party leaders at Corinth (ch. 3:21, 22; Matt. 23:8-10; II Cor. 11:20); nor indeed slaves to men generally, so far as their condition admits. The external and internal conditions, so far as is attainable, should correspond, and the former be subservient to the latter (cf. vss. 21, 32-35). 24. abide with God—being chiefly careful of the footing on which he stands towards God rather than that towards men. This clause, "with God," limits the similar precept in vs. 20. A man may cease to "abide in the calling wherein he was called," and yet not violate the precept here. If a man's calling be not favorable to his "abiding with God" (retaining holy fellowship with Him), he may use lawful means to change from it (cf. Note, vs. 21).

25. no commandment of the Lord: yet . . . my judgment—I have no express revelation from the Lord commanding it, but I give my judgment (opinion); viz., under the ordinary inspiration which accompanied the apostles in all their canonical writings (cf. vs. 40; ch. 14:37; I Thess. 4:15). The Lord inspires me in this case to give you only a recommendation, which you are free to adopt or reject—not a positive command. In the second case (vss. 10, 11) it was a positive command; for the Lord had already made known His will (Mal. 2: 14, 15; Matt. 5:31, 32). In the third case (vs. 12), the Old Testament commandment of God to put away strange wives (Ezra 10:3), Paul by the Spirit revokes. mercy of the Lord—(I Tim. 1:13). He attributes his apostleship and the gifts accompanying it (including inspiration) to God's grace alone. faithful—in dispensing to you the inspired directions received by me from the Lord. 26. I suppose—"I consider." this—viz., "for a man so to be," i.e., in the same state in which he is (vs. 27). for—by reason of. the present distress—the distresses to which believers were then beginning to be subjected, making the married state less desirable than the single; and which would prevail throughout the world before the destruction of Jerusalem, according to Christ's prophecy (Matt. 24:8-21; cf. Acts 11:28).

27. Illustrating the meaning of "so to be," vs. 26. Neither the married (those "bound to a wife") nor the unmarried (those "loosed from a wife") are to "seek" a change of state (cf. vss. 20, 24).

28. trouble in the flesh—Those who marry, he says, shall incur "trouble in the flesh" (i.e., in their outward state, by reason of the present distress), not sin, which is the trouble of the spirit. but I spare you—The emphasis in the Greek is on "I." My motive in advising you so is, to "spare you" such trouble in the flesh. So ALFORD after CALVIN, BENGEL, and others. ESTIUS from AUGUSTINE explains it, "I spare you further details of the inconveniences of matrimony, lest even the incontinent may at the peril of lust be deterred from matrimony: thus I have regard for your infirmity." The antithesis in the Greek of "I . . . you" and "such" favors the former. 29. this I say—A summing up of the whole, wherein he draws the practical inference from what precedes (ch. 15:50). the time—the season (so the Greek) of this present dispensation up to the coming of the Lord (Rom.

23. Ye are bought with a price. As truly as your bodies have become the property of your masters, in consequence of their paying down a price for you, so sure you are now the Lord's property, in consequence of your being purchased by the blood of Christ. Some render this verse interrogatively: "Are you bought with a price" from your slavery? "Do not again become slaves of men." Never sell yourselves; prefer and retain your liberty now that ye have acquired it.

24. Let every man . . . abide with God. Let him live to God in whatever station he is placed by Providence. If he be a slave, God will be with him even in his slavery, if he be faithful to the grace which he has received. It is very likely that some of the slaves at Corinth, who had been converted to Christianity, had been led to think that their Christian privileges absolved them from the necessity of continuing slaves or, at least, brought them on a level with their Christian masters. A spirit of this kind might have soon led to confusion and insubordination, and brought scandals into the church. It was therefore a very proper subject for the apostle to interfere in; and to his authority the persons concerned would doubtless respectfully bow.

25. Now concerning virgins. This was another subject on which the church at Corinth had asked the advice of the apostle. The word virgin we take to signify a "pure, unmarried young woman"; but it is evident that the word in this place means young unmarried persons of either sex, as appears from vv. 26-27, 32-34, and from Rev. xiv. 4. The word is frequently applied to men as well as to women. I have no commandment of the Lord. There is no thing in the sacred writings that directly touches this point. Yet I give my judgment. As every way equal to such commandments had there been any, seeing I have received the teaching of His own Spirit, and have obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful to this heavenly gift, so that it abides with me to lead me into all truth. In this way I think the apostle's words may be safely understood.
