I. The readiness and resolution of our Lord Jesus, in prosecuting his great undertaking for our redemption and salvation. Of this we have an instance, v. 51: When the time was come that he should be received up, he steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem. There was a time fixed for the sufferings and death of our Lord Jesus, and he knew well enough when it was. Then he appeared most publicly of all, and was most busy, knowing that his time was short. When he saw his death and sufferings approaching, he looked through them and beyond them, to the glory that should follow, when he should be received up into glory (1 Tim. iii. 16). All good Christians may frame to themselves the same notion of death, and may call it their being received up, to be with Christ where he is. On this prospect of the joy set before him, he steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem. He was fully determined to go, and would not be dissuaded; he went directly to Jerusalem. He went cheerfully and courageously thither. He did not fail nor was discouraged, knowing that he should be not only justified, but glorified, not only not run down, but received up. How should this shame us for, and shame us out of, our backwardness to do and suffer for Christ!

II. The rudeness of the Samaritans in a certain village who would not receive him. 1. How civil he was to them: He sent messengers before his face, that went to take up lodgings, and to know whether he might have leave to accommodate himself and his company among them. He sent some to make ready for him that his coming might be no surprise. 2. How uncivil they were to him, v. 53. They did not receive him, would not suffer him to come into their village. He would have been the greatest blessing that ever came to their village, and yet they forbid him entrance. Now the reason was because his face was as though he would go to Jerusalem. The great controversy between the Jews and the Samaritans was about the place of worship—whether Jerusalem or mount Gerizim near Sychar; see John iv. 20. And so hot was the controversy between them that the Jews would have no dealings with the Samaritans, nor they with them, John iv. 9. They were particularly incensed against Christ, who was a celebrated teacher, for owning and adhering to the temple at Jerusalem. They would not show him the common civility which probably they used formerly to show him in his journey thither.

III. The resentment which James and John expressed of this affront, v. 54. When these two heard this message brought, they were all in a flame presently, and nothing will serve them but Sodom's doom upon this village.

1. Here indeed was something commendable, for they showed, (1) A great confidence in the power they had received from Jesus Christ. They could with a word's speaking fetch fire from heaven. Wilt thou that we speak the word, and the thing will be done. (2) A great zeal for the honour of their Master. They took it very ill that he who did good wherever he came and found a hearty welcome should be denied

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

49, 50. John answered . . .—The link of connection here with the foregoing context lies in the words "in My name" (vs. 48). "Oh, as to that," said John, young, warm, but not sufficiently apprehending Christ's teaching in these things, "we saw one casting out devils in Thy name, and we forbade him: Were we wrong?" "Ye were wrong." "But we did because he followeth not us,' " "No matter. For (1) There is no man which shall do a miracle in My name that can lightly [soon] speak evil of Me' [Mark 9:39]. And (2) If such a person cannot be supposed to be 'against us,' you are to consider him 'for us.' " Two principles of immense importance. Christ does not say this man should not have followed "with them," but simply teaches how he was to be regarded though he did not—as a reverer of His name and a promoter of His cause. Surely this condemns not only those horrible attempts by force to shut up all within one visible pale of discipleship, which have deluged Christendom with blood in Christ's name, but the same spirit in its milder form of proud ecclesiastic scowl upon all who "after the form which they call a sect (as the word signifies, Acts 24:14), do so worship the God of their fathers." Visible unity in Christ's Church is devoutly to be sought, but this is not the way to it. See the noble spirit of Moses (Num. 11:24-29).

51-56. THE PERIOD OF HIS ASSUMPTION APPROACHING, CHRIST TAKES HIS LAST LEAVE OF GALILEE—THE SAMARITANS REFUSE TO RECEIVE HIM.

51. the time was come—rather, "the days were being fulfilled," or approaching their fulfilment—that he should be received up—"of His assumption," meaning His exaltation to the Father; a sublime expression, taking the sweep of His whole career, as if at one bound He was about to vault into glory. The work of Christ in the flesh is here divided into two great stages; all that preceded this belonging to the one, and all that follows it to the other. During the one, He formally "came to His own," and "would have gathered them"; during the other, the awful consequences of "His own receiving Him not" rapidly revealed themselves. he steadfastly set his face—the "He" here is emphatic—"He Himself then." See His own prophetic language, "I have set my face like a flint" (Isa. 50:7). go to Jerusalem—as His goal, but including His preparatory visits to it at the feasts of tabernacles and of dedication (John 7:2, 10; and 10:22, 23), and all the intermediate movements and events. 52. messengers before his face . . . to make ready for him—He had not done this before; but now, instead of avoiding, He seems to court publicity—all now hastening to maturity. 53. did not receive him, because . . .—The Galileans, in going to the festivals at Jerusalem, usually took the Samaritan route [JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 20. 6. 1], and yet seem to have met with no such inhospitality. But if they were asked to prepare quarters for the Messiah, in the person of one whose "face was as though He would go to Jerusalem," their national prejudices would be raised at so marked a slight upon their claims. (See on John 4:20.)

54. James and John not Peter, as we should have expected, but those "sons of thunder" (Mark 3:17), who afterwards wanted to have all the highest honors of the Kingdom to themselves, and the younger of whom had been rebuked already for his exclusiveness (vss. 49, 50). Yet this was "the disciple whom Jesus loved," while the other willingly drank of His Lord's bitter cup. (See on Mark 10:38-40 and Acts 12:2.) That same fiery zeal, in a mellowed and hallowed form, in the beloved disciple, we find in II John 5: 10 and III John 10.

49. We forbad him. See this subject considered on Mark ix. 38, etc.

We saw one casting out devils in thy name. It can scarcely be supposed that a man who knew nothing of Christ, or who was only a common exorcist, could be able to work a miracle in Christ's name. We may therefore safely imagine that this was either one of John the Baptist's disciples, who, at his master's command, had believed in Jesus, or one of the seventy whom Christ had sent out, Luke x. 1-7, who, after he had fulfilled his commission, had retired from accompanying the other disciples. But as he still held fast his faith in Christ and walked in good conscience, the influence of his Master still continued with him, so that he could cast out demons as well as the other disciples. We forbad him. I do not see that we have any right to attribute any other motive to John than that which he himself owns—because he followeth not us—because he did not attach himself constantly to Thee, as we do, we thought he could not be in a proper spirit.

Forbid him not. If you meet him again, let him go on quietly in the work in which God owns him. If he were not of God, the demons would not be subject to him, and his work could not prosper. A spirit of bigotry has little countenance from these passages. There are some who are so outrageously wedded to their own creed and religious system that they would rather let sinners perish than suffer those who differ from them to become the instruments of their salvation.

52. Sent messengers. "Angels," literally; but this proves that the word "angel" signifies a messenger of any kind, whether divine or human. The messengers in this case were probably James and John.

53. His face was. They saw He was going up to Jerusalem to keep the feast (it was the Feast of Tabernacles, John vii. 2); and knowing Him thereby to be a Jew, they would afford nothing for His entertainment; for in religious matters the Samaritans and Jews had no dealings; see John iv. 9. The Samaritans were a kind of mongrel heathens; they feared Jehovah, and served other gods, 2 Kings xvii. 34.

54. That we command fire. Vengeance belongs to the Lord. What we suffer for His sake should be left to himself to reprove or punish. The insult is offered to Him, not to us.

the liberty of the road by a parcel of paltry Samaritans. (3) A submission, notwithstanding, to their Master's goodwill and pleasure. They will not offer to do such a thing, unless Christ give leave: Wilt thou that we do it? (4) A regard to the examples of the prophets that were before them. It is doing as Elias did. They thought that this precedent would be their warrant; so apt are we to misapply the examples of good men.

2. But though there was something right in what they said, yet there was much more amiss for (1) This was not the first time, by a great many, that our Lord Jesus had been thus affronted, yet he never called for any judgment upon them, but patiently put up with the injury. (2) These were Samaritans, from whom better was not to be expected, and perhaps they had heard that Christ had forbidden his disciples to enter into any of the cities of the Samaritans (Matt. x. 5), and therefore it was not so bad in them as in others who knew more of Christ. (3) Perhaps it was only some few of the town that sent that rude message to him, while, for aught they knew, there were many in the town who would have gone to meet him and welcomed him. (4) Their Master had never yet upon any occasion called for fire from heaven. James and John were the two disciples whom Christ had called Boanerges—sons of thunder (Mark iii. 17); and will not that serve them, but they must be sons of lightning too? (5) The example of Elias did not reach the case. Elijah was sent to display the terrors of the law, but it is a dispensation of grace that is now to be introduced, to which such a terrible display of divine justice will not be at all agreeable.

IV. The reproof he gave to James and John (v. 55): He turned and rebuked them; for as many as he loves he rebukes and chastens, particularly for what they do, that is irregular and unbecoming them, under colour of zeal for him.

1. He shows them in particular their mistake: Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of. (1) "You are not aware how much there is of pride, and passion, and personal revenge, covered under this pretence of zeal for your Master." There may be much corruption lurking, nay, and stirring too, in the hearts of good people, and they themselves not be sensible of it. (2) "You do not consider what a good spirit you should be of. Surely you have yet to learn what the spirit of Christ is. Have you not been taught to love your enemies, and to bless them that curse you, and to call for grace from heaven, not fire from heaven, upon them? You are under the dispensation of love, and liberty, and grace, which was ushered in with a proclamation of peace on earth and goodwill toward men."

2. He shows them the general design and tendency of his religion (v. 56): The Son of man is not himself come to destroy men's lives, but to save them. He designed to propagate his holy religion by love and sweetness, and everything that is inviting and endearing, not by fire and sword, by miracles of healing, not by plagues and miracles of destruction, as Israel was brought out of Egypt. Christ came to slay all enmities, not to foster them. Christ came, not only to save men's souls, but to save their lives too. Christ would have his disciples do good to all, but hurt to none, to draw men into his church with the cords of a man and the bands of love, but not think to drive men into it.

V. His retreat from this village. Christ would not only not punish them for their rudeness but quietly and peaceably went to another village, where they were not so stingy. If some be very rude, instead of revenging it, we should try whether others will not be more civil.

We have here an account of three several persons that offered themselves to follow Christ.

I. Here is one that is extremely forward to follow Christ immediately, but seems to have been too rash and not to have set down and counted the cost.

1. He makes Christ a very large promise (v. 57): As they went in the way one said to him, Lord, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest. This must be the resolution of all that will be found Christ's disciples indeed; they follow the Lamb whithersoever he goes.

2. Christ gives him a necessary caution, not to promise himself great things in the world, in following him; for the Son of man has not where to lay his head.

We may look upon this, (1) As setting forth the very low condition that our Lord Jesus was in, in this world. He not only wanted the delights and ornaments that great princes usually have, but even such accommodations for mere necessity as the foxes have, and the birds of the air. He that made all did not make fire . . . as Elias—a plausible case, occurring also in Samaria (II Kings 1:10-12).

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

His disciples in loyalty went to a Samaritan village; and in loyalty, when the Samaritans would not receive Him, would have destroyed the Samaritans by fire. It was loyalty, but it was loyalty out of harmony with the spirit of the Master, and out of harmony with the method of the Master. It is possible to be zealous for the honor of God in a spirit which puts us out of fellowship with God. That is what kept Moses out of the promised land. Loyalty in a wrong spirit. He spake inadvisedly with his lips when he went to the people clamoring for water and grumbling against God. He smote the rock, and he showed an angry spirit; and God excluded him from the promised land.

Well, what is the true spirit? What did Jesus do?

"They went to another village."

To destroy by fire in loyalty to Him would manifest a spirit contrary to the Cross. His face was toward Jerusalem. That revealed His spirit. That revealed His attitude. He was led as a lamb to the slaughter, as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so He opened not His mouth. When He was reviled, He reviled not again. That is the spirit of the Cross. The spirit that wants to call down fire upon those that are refusing Jesus Christ is not Christ's spirit in that it lacks the principle of the Cross. Are we with James and John—loyal, passionately devoted, wanting to destroy men by fire? Our loyalty, because it is in a wrong spirit, puts us out of fellowship with Jesus Christ. Fellowship with Christ means going all the way to Calvary, bearing shame and scoffing rude, with no anger, and no desire to call down fire.—The Gospel According to Luke

55, 56. know not what . . . spirit The thing ye demand, though in keeping with the legal, is unsuited to the genius of the evangelical dispensation. The sparks of *un*holy indignation would seize readily enough on this example of Elias, though our Lord's rebuke (as is plain from vs. 56) is directed to the principle involved rather than the animal heat which doubtless prompted the reference. "It is a golden sentence of Tillotson, Let us never do anything for religion which is contrary to religion" [WEBSTER and WILKINSON].

56. for the Son of man . . .—a saying truly divine, of which all His miracles—for salvation, never destruction—were one continued illustration. went to another—illustrating His own precept (Matt. 10:23).

57-62. INCIDENTS ILLUSTRATIVE OF DISCIPLESHIP. 57, 58. The PRECIPITATE disciple. (See on Matt. 8:19, 20.) 59, 60. The PROCRASTINATING disciple. (See on Matt. 8:21, 22.)

ADAM CLARKE

55. Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of. Ye do not consider that the present is a dispensation of infinite mercy and love, and that the design of God is not to destroy sinners, but to give them space to repent, that He may save them unto eternal life. And ye do not consider that the zeal which you feel springs from an evil principle, being more concerned for your own honor than for the honor of God. The disciples of that Christ who died for His enemies should never think of avenging themselves on their persecutors. The words, Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of. For the Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them, are wanting in many MSS.

57. A certain man. He was a scribe. See on Matt. viii. 19-22. It is probable that this took place when Christ was at Capernaum, as Matthew represents it, and not on the way to Jerusalem through Samaria.

A certain scribe. Few of this class came to the Lord Jesus for instruction or salvation. Master. Rather, "teacher," the person who shows or points out a particular way or science. I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest. Every teacher among the Jews had disciples, and some especially that followed or accompanied them wherever they went, that they might have some person at hand with whom they might converse concerning the divine law.

The foxes have holes. Reader! are you a poor man? and do you fear God? Then what comfort must you derive from the thought that you so nearly resemble the Lord Jesus! Son of a dwelling-place for himself, not a house of his own to put his head in. He here calls himself the Son of man, a Son of Adam, partaker of flesh and blood. He glories in his condescension towards us, to testify his love to us, and to teach us a holy contempt of the world, and a continual regard to another world. Christ was thus poor, to sanctify and sweeten poverty to his people. We may well be content to fare as Christ did. (2) As proposing this to the consideration of those who intend to be his disciples. If we mean to follow Christ, we must not reckon upon making anything more than heaven of our religion. Christ tells this man what he must count upon if he followed him, to lie cold and uneasy, to fare hard, and live in contempt; if he could not submit to this, let him not pretend to follow Christ. This word sent him back, for aught that appears; but it will be no discouragement to any that know what there is in Christ and heaven to set in the scale against this.

II. Here is another, that seems resolved to follow Christ, but he begs a day, v. 59. To this man Christ first gave the call; he said to him, Follow me. This man to whom Christ gave a call, though he hesitated at first, yet, as it should seem, afterwards yielded. It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth (as that forward spark in the foregoing verses), but of God that showeth mercy, that gives the call.

1. The excuse he made: "Lord, suffer me first to go and bury my father. I have an aged father at home, who cannot live long, and will need me while he does live; let me go and attend on him until he is dead, and then I will do anything." We may here see three temptations. (1) We are tempted to rest in a discipleship at large, in which we may be at a loose end, and not to come close. (2) We are tempted to defer the doing of that which we know to be our duty, and to put it off to some other time. When we have got clear of such a care and difficulty, then we will begin to think of being religious; and so we are cozened out of all our time, by being cozened out of the present time. (3) We are tempted to think that our duty to our relations will excuse us from our duty to Christ. The kingdom of God and the righteousness thereof must be sought and minded in the first place.

2. Christ's answer to it (v. 60): "Let the dead bury their dead. Thou hast other work to do; go thou, and preach the kingdom of God." Not that Christ would have his followers or his ministers to be unnatural; our religion teaches us to be kind and good in every relation. But we must not make these offices an excuse from our duty to God. If the nearest and dearest relation we have in the world stand in our way to keep us from Christ, it is necessary that we have a zeal that will make us forget father and mother. No excuses must be admitted against a present obedience to the call of Christ.

III. Here is another that is willing to follow Christ, but he must have a little time to talk with his friends about it.

1. His request for a dispensation, v. 61. He said, "Lord, I will follow thee; but let me first go bid them farewell that are at home." Let me go and set in order my household affairs, so some understand it. Now that which was amiss in this is, (1) That he looked upon his following Christ as a melancholy, troublesome, dangerous thing; it was to him as if he were going to die, and therefore he must take leave of all his friends; whereas in following Christ, he might be more a comfort and blessing to them than if he had continued with them. (2) That he seemed to have his worldly concerns more upon his heart than would consist with a close attendance to his duty as a follower of Christ. He seemed to hanker after his relations and family concerns; they stuck to him. It may be he had bidden them farewell once, but Loth to depart bids oft farewell, and therefore he must bid them farewell once more, for they are at home at his house. (3) That he was willing to enter into a temptation from his purpose of following Christ. To go and bid them farewell that were at home at his house would be to expose himself to the strongest solicitations imaginable to alter his resolution; for they would all beg and pray that he would not leave them. Those that resolve to follow their Redeemer, must resolve that they will not so much as parley with their tempter.

2. The rebuke which Christ gave him for this request (v. 62): "No man, having put his hand to the plough, will look back, or look behind him, for then he makes balks with his plough, and the ground he ploughs is not fit to be sown; so thou, if thou hast a design to follow me, yet if thou lookest back to a worldly life again and hankerest after that, thou art not fit for the kingdom of God. Thou art not a sower fit to scatter the good seed of the kingdom if thou canst hold the plough no better." Ploughing

III. The Irresolute or Wavering Disciple (Luke 9: 61, 62). Vs. 61: "And another also said, Lord, I will follow thee; but let me first go bid them farewell which are at home at my house. Vs. 62: And Jesus said unto him, No man, having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God." But for the very different replies given, we should hardly have discerned the difference between this and the second case: the one man called, indeed, and the other volunteering, as did the first; but both seemingly alike willing, and only having a difficulty in their way just at that moment. But, by help of what is said respectively to each, we perceive the great difference between the two cases. From the warning given against "looking back," it is evident that this man's discipleship was not yet thorough, his separation from the world not entire. It is not a case of going back, but of looking back; and as there is here a manifest reference to the case of "Lot's wife" (Gen. 19:26; and see on Luke 17:32), we see that it is not actual return to the world that we have here to deal with, but a reluctance to break with it. The figure of putting one's hand to the plough and looking back is an exceedingly vivid one, and to an agricultural people most impressive. As ploughing requires an eye intent on the furrow to be made, and is marred the instant one turns about, so will they come short of salvation who prosecute the work of God with a distracted attention, a divided heart. The reference may be chiefly to ministers; but the application at least is general. As the image seems plainly to have been suggested by the case of Elijah and Elisha, a difficulty may be raised, requiring a moment's attention. When Elijah cast his mantle about Elisha, which the youth quite understood to mean appointing him his successor, he was ploughing with twelve yoke of oxen, the last pair held by himself. Leaving his oxen, he ran after the prophet, and said, "Let me, I pray thee, kiss my father and my mother, and [then] I will follow thee." Was this said in the same spirit with the same speech uttered by our disciple? Let us see. "And Elijah said unto him, Go back again: for what have I done to thee." Commentators take this to mean that Elijah had really done nothing to hinder him from going on with all his ordinary duties. But to us it seems clear that Elijah's intention was to try what manner of spirit the youth was of:—"Kiss thy father and mother? And why not? By all means, go home and stay with them; for what have I done to thee? I did but throw a mantle about thee; but what of that?" If this was his meaning, Elisha thoroughly apprehended and nobly met it. "He returned back from him, and took a yoke of oxen, and slew them, and boiled their flesh with the instruments of the oxen [the wood of his ploughing implements], and gave unto the people, and they did eat: then he arose, and went after Elijah, and ministered unto him" (I Kings 19:19-21). We know not if even his father and mother had time to be called to this hasty feast. But this much is plain, that, though in affluent circumstances, he gave up his lower calling, with all its prospects, for the higher and at that time perilous, office to which he was called. What now is the bearing of these two cases? Did Elisha do wrong in bidding them farewell with whom he was associated in his early calling? Or, if not, would this disciple have done wrong if he had done the same thing, and in the same spirit, with Elisha? Clearly not. Elisha's doing it proved that he could with safety do it; and our Lord's warning is not against bidding them farewell which were at home at his house, but against the probable fatal consequences of that step; lest the embraces of earthly relationship should prove too strong for him, and he should never return to follow Christ. Accordingly, we have called this the Irresolute or Wavering Disciple.

62. No man . . .—As ploughing requires an eye intent on the furrow to be made, and is marred the instant one turns about, so will they come short of salvation who prosecute the work of God with a distracted attention, a divided heart. Though the reference seems chiefly to ministers, the application is general. The expression "looking back" has a manifest reference to "Lot's wife" (Gen. 19:26; and see on ch. 17:32). It is not actual return to the world, but a reluctance to break with it.

ADAM CLARKE

man. A Hebrew phrase, expressive of humiliation and debasement; and, on that account, applied emphatically to himself by the meek and lowly Jesus. Besides, it seems here to be used to point out the incarnation of the Son of God, according to the predictions of the prophets, Ps. viii. 5; Dan. vii. 13. And as our Lord was now showing forth His eternal divinity in the miracles He wrought, He seems studious to prove to them the certainty of His incarnation, because on this depended the atonement for sin. Indeed our Lord seems more intent on giving the proofs of His humanity than of His divinity, the latter being necessarily manifested by the miracles which He was continually working.

Another of his disciples. This does not mean any of the twelve, but one of those who were constant hearers of our Lord's preaching, the name of disciple being common to all those who professed to believe in Him, John vi. 66. Bury my father. Probably his father was old, and apparently near death; but it was a maxim among the Jews that, if a man had any duty to perform to the dead, he was, for that time, free from the observance of any other precept or duty.

Let the dead bury their dead. It was usual for the Jews to consider a man as dead who had departed from the precepts of the law; and, on this ground, every transgressor was reputed a dead man. Our Lord's saying, being in common use, had nothing difficult in it to a Jew. Natural death is the separation of the body and soul; spiritual death, the separation of God and the soul. Men who live in sin are dead to God. Leave the spiritually dead to bury their natural dead.

61. Another also said. This circumstance is not mentioned by any of the other Evangelists; and Matthew alone mentions the former case, vv. 57-58. Let me first go bid them farewell, which are at home. "Permit me to set in order my affairs at home." Those who understand the Greek text will see at once that it will bear this translation well, and that this is the most natural. This person seems to have had in view the case of Elisha, who made a similar request to the Prophet Eliiah, 1 Kings xix. 19-20, which request was granted by the prophet. But our Lord, seeing that this person had too much attachment to the earth, and that his return to worldly employments, though for a short time, was likely to become the means of stifling the good desires which he now felt, refused to grant him that permission.

62. Put his hand to the plow. Can any person properly discharge the work of the ministry who is engaged in secular employments? A farmer and a minister of the gospel are incompatible characters. As a person who holds the plow cannot keep on a straight furrow if he look behind him, so he who is employed in the work of the ministry cannot do the work of an evangelist if he turn his desires to worldly profits. Such a person is not fit, "properly dis-is in order to sowing. Those are not fit to be employed in sowing who know not how to break up the fallow ground, but, when they have laid their hand to the plough, upon every occasion look back and think of quitting it. Looking back inclines to drawing back, and drawing back is to perdition. Those are not fit for heaven, who, having set their faces heavenward, face about. But he, and he only, that endures to the end, shall be saved.

CHAPTER 10

We have here the sending forth of seventy disciples, two and two. This is not taken notice of by the other evangelists: but the instructions here given them are much the same with those given to the twelve.

I. Their number: they were seventy. As in the choice of twelve apostles Christ has an eye to the twelve patriarchs, the twelve tribes, and the twelve princes of those tribes, so here he seems to have an eye to the seventy elders of Israel.

1. We are glad to find that Christ had so many followers fit to be sent forth; his labour was not altogether in vain, though he met with much opposition. These seventy, though they did not attend him so closely and constantly as the twelve did, were nevertheless the constant hearers of his doctrine, and witnesses of his miracles, and believed in him. These seventy are those of whom Peter speaks as "the men who companied with us all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us," and were part of the one hundred and twenty there spoken of, Acts i. 15, 21. Many of those that were the companions of the apostles, whom we read of in the Acts and the Epistles, we may suppose, were of these seventy disciples.

2. We are glad to find there was work for so many ministers, hearers for so many preachers: thus the grain of mustard-seed began to grow, and the savour of the leaven to diffuse itself in the meal.

II. Their work and business: He sent them two and two, that they might strengthen and encourage one another. He sent them, not to all the cities of Israel, as he did the twelve, but only to every city and place whither he himself would come (v. 1), as his harbingers. Two things they were ordered to do, the same that Christ did wherever he came: 1. They must heal the sick (v. 9), heal them in the name of Jesus, which would make people long to see this Jesus, and ready to entertain him whose name was so powerful. 2. They must publish the approach of the kingdom of God: The kingdom of God is come nigh to you. It is good to be made sensible of our advantages and opportunities, that we may lay hold of them. When the kingdom of God comes nigh us, it concerns us to go forth to meet it.

III. The instructions he gives them.

1. They must set out with prayer (v. 2). They must be duly affected with the necessities of the souls of men. They must look about, and see how great the harvest was. There was corn ready to shed and be lost for want of hands to gather it in. They must likewise be concerned that the labourers were so few. It is common for tradesmen not to care how few there are of their own trade; but Christ would have the labourers in his vineyard reckon it a matter of complaint when the labourers are few. They must earnestly desire to receive their mission from God, that he would send them forth as labourers into his harvest, and that he would send others forth; for, if God send them forth, they may hope he will go along with them and give them success.

2. They must set out with an expectation of trouble and persecution: "Behold, I send you forth as lambs among wolves; but go your ways. Your enemies will be as wolves. But you must be as lambs, peaceable and patient, though made an easy prey of." It would have been very hard thus to be sent forth as sheep among wolves, if he had not endued them with his spirit and courage.

3. They must not encumber themselves, as if they were going a long voyage, but depend upon God and their friends to provide: "Carry neither a purse for money, nor a scrip or knapsack for clothes or victuals, nor new shoes (as before to the twelve, ch. ix. 3); and salute no man by the way." (1) They must go as men in haste, must not hinder or retard themselves with needless ceremonies or compliments. (2) They must go as men of business, business that relates to another world, and therefore must not entangle themselves with conversation about secular affairs. (3) They must go as serious men.

4. They must show, not only their goodwill, but God's goodwill, to all to whom they came, v. 5, 6.

(1) The charge given them was, Whatsoever house they entered into, they must say, Peace be to this house.

CHAPTER 10

Vss. 1-24. MISSION OF THE SEVENTY DISCIPLES, AND THEIR RETURN. As our Lord's end approaches, the preparations for the establishment of the coming Kingdom are quickened and extended. 1. the Lord—a becoming title here, as this appointment was an act truly lordly [BENGEL]. other seventy also—rather, "others (also in number), 70"; probably with allusion to the seventy elders of Israel on whom the Spirit descended in the wilderness (Num. 11:24, 25). The mission, unlike that of the Twelve, was evidently quite temporary. All the instructions are in keeping with a brief and hasty pioneering mission, intended to supply what of general preparation for coming events the Lord's own visit afterwards to the same "cities and places" (vs. 1) would not, from want of time, now suffice to accomplish; whereas the instructions to the Twelve, besides embracing all those to the Seventy, contemplate world-wide and permanent effects. Accordingly, after their return from this single missionary tour, we never again read of the Seventy.

2. the harvest . . . —(See on Matt. 9:37, 38).

The harvest truly is plenteous—His eye doubtless rested immediately on the Jewish field, but this he saw widening into the vast field of "the world" (ch. 13:38), teeming with souls having to be gathered to Him. but the labourers—men divinely qualified and called to gather them in.

Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest—the great Lord and Proprietor of all. Cf. John 15:1, "I am the true vine, and My Father is the husbandman." that he will send forth labourers into his harvest—The word properly means "thrust forth"; but this emphatic sense disappears in some places, as in vs. 25, and John 10:4—"When He putteth forth His own sheep." (See on ch. 4:1.)

3-12. (See on Matt. 10: 7-16).

Behold, I send you forth—The "I" here is emphatic, holding up Himself as the Fountain of the Gospel ministry, as He is also the Great Burden of it. as sheep—defenseless—in the midst of wolves—ready to make a prey of you (John 10:12). To be left exposed, as sheep to wolves, would have been startling enough; but that the sheep should be sent among the wolves would sound strange indeed. No wonder this announcement begins with the exclamation, "Behold."

And when ye come into an house—or "the house," but it means not the worthy house, but the house ye first enter, to try if it be worthy. salute it—show it the usual civilities.

And if the house be worthy—showing this by giving you a welcome—let your peace come upon it—This is best explained by the injunction to the Seventy, "And into whatsoever house ye enter, first say, Peace be to this house" (Luke 10:5). This was posed," has not his mind properly directed towards the heavenly inheritance, and is not fit to show the way to others. In both these verses there is a plain reference to the call of Elisha.

1. The Lord appointed other seventy. Rather, "seventy others," not other seventy, as our translation has it, which seems to intimate that he had appointed seventy before this time, though probably the word other has a reference to the twelve chosen first. He not only chose twelve disciples to be constantly with Him, but He chose seventy others to go before Him. Our blessed Lord formed everything in His Church on the model of the Jewish church; and why? Because it was the pattern shown by God himself, the divine form, which pointed out the heavenly substance which now began to be established in its place. As He before had chosen twelve apostles, in reference to the twelve patriarchs, who were the chiefs of the twelve tribes, He now "publicly appointed" (for so the word means) seventy others, as Moses did the seventy elders whom he associated with himself to assist him in the government of the people; see Exod. xviii. 19; xxiv. 1-9. These Christ sent by two and two: (1) to teach them the necessity of concord among the ministers of righteousness; (2) that in the mouths of two witnesses everything might be established; and (3) that they might comfort and support each other in their difficult labor. See on Mark vi. 7. Several MSS. and versions have seventy-two. Sometimes the Jews chose six out of each tribe; this was the number of the great Sanhedrin.

2. That he would send forth. There seems to be an allusion here to the case of reapers who, though the harvest was perfectly ripe, yet were in no hurry to cut it down. News of this is brought to the Lord of the harvest, the farmer, and he is entreated to exert his authority, and hurry them out; and this he does because the harvest is spoiling for want of being reaped and gathered in. See the notes on Matt. ix. 37-38.

4. Carry neither purse, nor scrip. See on Matt. x. 9, etc., and Mark vi. 8, etc.

Nor scrip for your journey. To carry provisions. It was a leathern pouch hung about their necks, in which they put their victuals. This was, properly, the shepherd's bag.

If the house be worthy. If that family be proper for a preacher to lodge in, and the master be ready to embrace the message of salvation. Your peace. The blessings you have prayed for

MATTHEW HENRY

Here, [1] They are supposed to enter into private houses; for, being not admitted into the synagogues, they were forced to preach where they could have liberty. And, as their public preaching was driven into houses, so thither they carried it. Christ's church was at first very much a church in the house. [2] They are instructed to say, "Peace be to this house. Salute no man by the way in compliment, but to those into whose house ye enter, say, Peace be to you, with seriousness and in reality." Christ's ministers go into all the world, to say, in Christ's name, Peace be to you. We are to propose peace to all, to preach peace by Jesus Christ, peace on earth, and to invite the children of men to come and take the benefit of it. We are to pray for peace to all.

(2) The success was to be different, according to the different dispositions of those whom they preached to and prayed for. According as the inhabitants were sons of peace or not, so their peace should or should not rest upon the house. "You will meet with some that are the sons of peace, that are ready to admit the word of the gospel in the light and love of it. As to those, your peace shall find them out and rest upon them; your prayers for them shall be heard, the promises of the gospel shall be confirmed to them. You will meet with others that are no ways disposed to hear or heed your message, whole houses that have not one son of peace in them." Now it is certain that our peace shall not come upon them. But it shall return to us again; that is, we shall have the comfort of having done our duty to God and discharged our trust. Our peace shall return to us again, not only to be enjoyed by ourselves, but to be communicated to others, them that are sons of peace.

5. They must receive the kindnesses of those that should entertain them and bid them welcome, v. 7, 8. "Those that receive the gospel will receive you that preach it, and give you entertainment." (1) "Be not shy; do not suspect your welcome, nor be afraid of being troublesome, but eat and drink heartily such things as they give. You will deserve it, for the labourer is worthy of his hire, and it is not an act of charity, but of justice, in those who are taught in the word to communicate to those that teach them." (2) "Be not nice and curious in your diet: Eat and drink such things as they give (v. 7), such things as are set before you, v. 8. Be thankful for plain food, and do not find fault, though it be not dressed according to art." It ill becomes Christ's disciples to be desirous of dainties. Probably, Christ here refers to the traditions of the elders about their meat, but Christ would not have them to regard those things, but eat what was given them, asking no question for conscience' sake.

6. They must denounce the judgments of God against those who should reject them and their message: "If you enter into a city, and they do not receive you, leave them, v. 10. If they will not give you welcome into their houses, do you give them warning in their streets." He orders them to (ch. ix. 5) do as he had ordered the apostles to do: "Say to them: Even the dust of your city, which cleaveth on us, we do wipe off against you, v. 11. From them do not receive any kindnesses at all, be not beholden to them." It shall be a witness for Christ's messengers that they had been there according to their Master's order; tender and refusal were a discharge of their trust. "But tell them plainly, and bid them be sure of it, The kingdom of God is come nigh to you. Here is a fair offer made you; if you have not the benefit of it, it is your own fault. Now that the kingdom of God is come nigh to you, if you will not come up to it, and come into it, your sin will be inexcusable." The fairer offers we have of grace and life by Christ, the more we shall have to answer for another day, if we slight these offers: It shall be more tolerable for Sodom than for that city, v. 12. The Sodomites indeed rejected the warning given them by Lot; but rejecting the gospel is a more heinous crime.

Upon this occasion, the evangelist repeats,

(1) The particular doom of those cities wherein most of Christ's mighty works were done, which we had, Matt. xi. 20, &c. [1] They enjoyed greater privileges. Christ's mighty works were done in them. They were hereby exalted to heaven. They were brought as near heaven as external means could bring them. [2] God's design in favouring them thus was to bring them to repentance and reformation of life, to sit in sackcloth and ashes. [3] Their frustrating this design, and their receiving the grace of God therein in vain. It is implied that they repented not; they did not bring forth fruits agreeable to the advantages they enjoyed. [4] There was reason to think, morally speaking, that, if Christ had gone to Tyre and Sidon, Gentile cities, they would have repented long ago, so speedy would their repentance the ancient salutation of the East, and it prevails to this day. But from the lips of Christ and His messengers, it means something far higher, both in the gift and the giving of it, than in the current salutation. (See on John 14:27.) but if it be not worthy, let your peace return to you—If your peace finds a shut, instead of an open, door in the heart of any household, take it back to yourselves, who know how to value it; and it will taste the sweeter to you for having been offered, even though rejected.

son of peace—inwardly prepared to embrace your message of peace. See note on "worthy," (Matt. 10:13).

the workman is worthy of his meat—his "food" or "maintenance"; a principle which, being universally recognized in secular affairs, is here authoritatively applied to the services of the Lord's workmen, and by Paul repeatedly and touchingly employed in his appeals to the churches (Rom. 15:27; I Cor. 9:11; Gal. 6:6), and once as "scripture" (I Tim. 5:18).

12-15. (See on Matt. 11:20-24).

for Sodom—Tyre and Sidon were ruined by commercial prosperity; Sodom sank through its vile pollutions: but the doom of otherwise correct persons who, amidst a blaze of light, reject the Saviour, shall be less endurable than that of any of these.

shall come upon the family; God will prosper them in their bodies, souls, and substance. Let your peace. The blessings prayed for, return to you. "It shall turn back upon yourselves." They shall get nothing, and you shall have an increase.

6. The son of peace. In the Jewish style, a man who has any good or bad quality is called the son of it. Thus, wise men are called "the children of wisdom," Matt. xi. 19; Luke vii. 35. So, likewise, what a man is doomed to, he is called the son of, as in Eph. ii. 3, wicked men are styled the "children of wrath"; so Judas is called "the son of perdition," John xvii. 12; and a man who deserves to die is called, 2 Sam. xii. 5, a "son of death." Son of peace in the text not only means a peaceable, quiet man, but one also of good report for his uprightness and benevolence.

7. The labourer is worthy. See on Matt. x. 8. Go not from house to house. See on Matt. x. 11.

The workman is worthy of his meat. "Of his maintenance." It is a maintenance, and that only, which a minister of God is to expect, and that he has a divine right to; but not to make a fortune, or lay up wealth. Besides, it is the workman, he that labors in the Word and doctrine, that is to get even this.

Into whatsoever city or town ye shall enter. In the commencement of Christianity, Christ and His preachers were all itinerant. Enquire who in it is worthy. That is, of a good character; for a preacher of the gospel should be careful of his reputation, and lodge only with those who are of a regular life. There abide till ye go thence. "Go not from house to house," Luke x. 7. Acting contrary to this precept has often brought a great disgrace on the gospel of God. Stay in your own lodging as much as possible, that you may have time for prayer and study. Seldom frequent the tables of the rich and great; if you do, it will unavoidably prove a snare to you.

9. The kingdom of God is come nigh unto you. "Is just upon you." This was the general text on which they were to preach all their sermons. See it explained, Matt. iii. 2.

11. Even the very dust of your city. See on Matt. x. 14-15.

have been, and that in sackcloth and ashes, so deep would it have been. [5] The doom of those who thus receive the grace of God in vain will be very fearful. They that were thus exalted, not making use of their elevation, will be thrust down to hell. [6] In the day of judgment Tyre and Sidon will fare better, and it will be more tolerable for them than for these cities.

(2) The general rule which Christ would go by, as to those to whom he sent his ministers: He will reckon himself treated according as they treated his ministers, v. 16. "He that heareth you, heareth me. He that despiseth you doth in effect despise me, nay, he despiseth him that sent me." And they who despise the faithful ministers of Christ, and turn their backs upon their ministry, will be reckoned with as despisers of God and Christ.

I. What account they gave him of the success of their expedition: They returned again with joy (v. 17); not complaining of the fatigue of their journeys, but rejoicing in their success, especially in casting out unclean spirits: Lord, even the devils are subject unto us through thy name. They give Christ the glory of this: It is through thy name. All our victories over Satan are obtained by power derived from Jesus Christ. We must in his name enter the lists with our spiritual enemies. If the work be done in his name, the honour is due to his name. They speak of it with an air of exultation: Even the devils are subject to us. If devils are subject to us, what can stand before us?

II. How he received this account.

1. He confirmed what they said, as agreeing with his own observation (v. 18): I saw Satan fall as lightning from heaven. Satan and his kingdom fell before the preaching of the gospel. He falls as lightning falls from heaven, so suddenly, so irrecoverably. Satan falls from heaven when he falls from the throne in men's hearts. And Christ foresaw that the preaching of the gospel would wherever it went pull down Satan's kingdom. Now is the prince of this world cast out.

2. He repeated, ratified, and enlarged their commission: Behold I give you power to tread on serpents, v. 19. They had employed their power vigorously against Satan, and now Christ entrusts them with greater power. (1) An offensive power, power to tread on serpents and scorpions, devils and malignant spirits, the old serpent. As the devils have now been subject to you, so they shall still be. (2) A defensive power: "Nothing shall by any means hurt you; not serpents nor scorpions. If wicked men be as serpents to you, and you dwell among those scorpions, you may despise their rage, and tread upon it. They may hiss, but they cannot hurt."

3. He directed them to turn their joy into the right channel (v. 20): "Notwithstanding in this rejoice not, that the spirits are subject unto you. Do not rejoice in this only, or in this chiefly, but rather rejoice because your names are written in heaven, because you are the children of God through faith." Christ could tell them that their names were written in heaven, for it is the Lamb's book of life that they are written in. Power to become the children of God is to be valued more than a power to work miracles; for we read of those who did in Christ's name cast out devils, and yet will be disowned by Christ in the great day. But they whose names are written in heaven shall never perish; they are Christ's sheep, to whom he will give eternal life. Holy love is a more excellent way than speaking with tongues.

4. He offered up a solemn thanksgiving to his Father, v. 21, 22. This we had before (Matt. xi. 25–27), only here it is prefixed that in that hour Jesus rejoiced. In that hour in which he saw Satan fall, in that hour he rejoiced. Christ's joy was a solid substantial joy, an inward joy: he rejoiced in spirit. Before he applied himself to thank his Father, he stirred up himself to rejoice; for, as thankful praise is the genuine language of holy joy, so holy joy is the root and spring of thankful praise. Two things he gives thanks for:

(1) For what was revealed by the Father through the Son: I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, v. 21. Now that which he gives thanks for is, [1] That the counsels of God concerning man's reconciliation to himself were revealed to some of the children of men, who might be fit also to teach others; he has revealed that which had been kept secret from the beginning of the world. [2] That they were revealed to babes, to those who were but children in understanding, till God by his Spirit elevated their faculties. We have reason to thank God, not so much for the honour he has hereby put upon babes, as for the honour he has hereby done himself in perfecting strength out of weakness. [3] That, at the

17. returned—evidently not long away. Lord . . .—"Thou hast exceeded Thy promise, for 'even the devils . . .'." The possession of such power, not being expressly in their commission, as in that to the Twelve (ch. 9:1), filled them with more astonishment and joy than all else. through thy name—taking no credit to themselves, but feeling lifted into a region of unimagined superiority to the powers of evil simply through their connection with Christ.

18. I beheld—As much of the force of this glorious statement depends on the nice shade of sense indicated by the imperfect tense in the original, it should be brought out in the translation: "I was beholding Satan as lightning falling from heaven"; i.e., "I followed you on your mission, and watched its triumphs; while you were wondering at the subjection to you of devils in My name, a grander spectacle was opening to My view; sudden as the darting of lightning from heaven to earth, lo! Satan was beheld falling from heaven!" How remarkable is this, that by that law of association which connects a part with the whole, those feeble triumphs of the Seventy seem to have not only brought vividly before the Redeemer the whole ultimate result of His mission, but compressed it into a moment and quickened it into the rapidity of lightning! N. B.—The word rendered "devils," is always used for those spiritual agents employed in demoniacal possessions—never for the ordinary agency of Satan in rational men. When therefore the Seventy say, "the devils [demons] are subject to us," and Jesus replies, "Mine eye was beholding Satan falling," it is plain that He meant to raise their minds not only from the particular to the general, but from a very temporary form of satanic operation to the entire kingdom of evil. (See John 12: 31; and cf. Isa. 14:12). 19. Behold, I give you . . .—not for any renewal of their mission, though probably many of them afterwards became ministers of Christ; but simply as disciples. serpents and scorpions—the latter more venomous than the former: literally, in the first instance (Mark 16:17, 18; Acts 28:5); but the next words, "and over all the power of the enemy, and nothing shall by any means hurt you," show that the glorious power of faith to "overcome the world" and "quench all the fiery darts of the wicked one," by the communication and maintenance of which to His people He makes them innocuous, is what is meant (I John 5:4; Eph. 6:16). 20. rejoice not, . . .—i.e., not so much. So far from forbidding it, He takes occasion from it to tell them what had been passing in His own mind. But as power over demons was after all intoxicating, He gives them a higher joy to balance it, the joy of having their names in Heaven's register (Phil. 4:3). 21, 22. Jesus . . . said . . . .—The very same sublime words were uttered by our Lord on a former similar occasion (Matt. 11:25-27, on which see Note); but (1) There we are merely told that He "answered and said" thus; here, He "rejoiced in spirit and said . . ." (2) There it was merely "at that time" (or season) that He spoke thus, meaning with a general reference to the rejection of His gospel by the self-sufficient; here, "In that hour Jesus said," with express reference probably to the humble class from which He had to draw the Seventy, and the similar class that had chiefly welcomed their message. "Rejoice" is too weak a word. It is "exulted in spirit"—evidently giving visible expression to His unusual emotions; while, at the same time, the words "in spirit" are meant to convey to the reader the depth of them. This is one of those rare

15. To hell. To hades. See this explained, Matt. xi. 23.

Shalt be brought down to hell. Perhaps not meaning here the place of torment, but rather a state of desolation. The original word is Hades —the invisible receptacle or mansion of the dead, answering to sheol, in Hebrew; and implying, often, (1) the grave; (2) the state of separate souls, or unseen world of spirits, whether of torment, Luke xvi. 23, or in general, Rev. i. 18; vi. 8; xx. 13-14. The word hell, used in the common translation, conveys now an improper meaning of the original word, because hell is used only to signify the place of the damned.

18. I beheld Satan. Or "Satan himself"—"The very Satan, the supreme adversary"—falling as lightning, with the utmost suddenness, as a flash of lightning falls from the clouds, and at the same time in the most observable manner. The fall was both very sudden and very apparent.

19. To tread on serpents. It is possible that by serpents and scorpions our Lord means the scribes and Pharisees, whom He calls "serpents" and a "brood of vipers," Matt. xxiii. 33, because through the subtility and venom of the old serpent, the devil, they opposed Him and His doctrine. And by trampling on these, it is likely that He means they should get a complete victory over such; as it was an ancient custom to trample on the kings and generals who had been taken in battle, to signify the complete conquest which had been gained over them. See Josh. x. 24. See also Rom. xvi. 20.

20. Because your names are written in heaven. This form of speech is taken from the ancient custom of writing the names of all the citizens in a public register, that the several families might be known, and the inheritances properly preserved. This custom is still observed even in these kingdoms, though not particularly noticed. Every child that is born in the land is ordered to be registered, with the names of its parents, and the time when born, baptized, or registered; and this register is generally kept in the parish church, or in some public place of safety. Such a register as this is called in Phil. iv. 3; Rev. iii. 5, "the book of life," i.e., the book or register where the persons were enrolled as they came into life.

21. Rejoiced in spirit. Was truly and heartily joyous, felt an inward triumph. But the Holy Spirit is the reading here of numerous MSS. and versions. These might be considered sufficient authority to admit the word into the text.

I thank thee. Bishop Pearce justly observes the thanks are meant to be given to God for revealing them to babes, not for hiding them from the others. Thou hast hid. That is, Thou hast not revealed them to the scribes and Pharisees, who idolized their own wisdom; but Thou hast revealed them to the simple and humble of heart.

same time when he revealed them unto babes, he hid them from the wise and prudent, the Gentile philosophers, the Jewish rabbin. He did not reveal the things of the gospel to them, nor employ them in preaching up his kingdom. Paul indeed was bred a scholar among the wise and prudent; but he became a babe when he became an apostle, and made neither show nor use of any other knowledge than that of Christ and him crucified, 1 Cor. ii. 2, 4. [4] That God herein acted by way of sovereignty: Even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight. If God gives his grace and the knowledge of his son to some that are less likely, and does not give it to others whom we should think better able to deliver it with advantage, this must satisfy. He chooses to entrust the dispensing of his gospel in the hands of those who with a divine energy will give it the setting on, rather than in theirs who with human art will give it the setting off.

(2) For what was secret between the Father and the Son, v. 22. [1] The vast confidence that the Father puts in the Son: All things are delivered to me of my Father. In him all fulness must dwell, and from him it must be derived: he is the great trustee that manages all the concerns of God's kingdom. [2] The good understanding that there is between the Father and the Son: No man knows who the Son is but the Father, nor who the Father is but the Son, and he to whom the Son by the Spirit will reveal him.

5. He told his disciples how well it was for them that they had these things revealed to them, v. 23, 24. He turned to his disciples, designing to make them sensible how much it was for their happiness, that they knew the mysteries of the kingdom and were employed to lead others into the knowledge of them. (1) What a step it is towards something better. Though the bare knowledge of these things is not saving, yet it puts us in the way of salvation: Blessed are the eyes which see the things which we see. (2) What a step it is above those that went before them: "Many prophets and righteous men" (so it is in Matt. xiii. 17), "many prophets and kings" (so it is here), "have desired to see and hear those things which you are daily and intimately conversant with, and have not seen and heard them." The honour and happiness of the New Testament saints far exceed those even of the prophets and kings of the Old Testament. The general ideas which the Old Testament saints had of the graces and glories of the Messiah's kingdom, made them wish a thousand times that they might see the substance of those things of which they had faint shadows.

We have here Christ's discourse with a lawyer about some points of conscience, which we are all concerned to be rightly informed in, and are so here, from Christ.

I. We are concerned to know what that good is which we should do in this life, in order to our attaining eternal life. A question to this purport was proposed to our Saviour by a certain lawyer, only with a design to try him, v. 25. The lawyer stood up, and asked him, Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life? If Christ had anything peculiar to prescribe, by this question he would get it out of him; if not, he would expose his doctrine as needless; or, perhaps, he had no malicious design against Christ, only he was willing to have a little talk with him, just as people go to church to hear what the minister will say. This was a good question: What shall I do to inherit eternal life? But it lost all its goodness when it was proposed with an ill design. It is not enough to speak of the things of God, and to enquire about them, but we must do it with a suitable concern.

1. How Christ turned him over to the divine law. Though he knew the thoughts and intents of his heart, he did not answer him according to the folly of that, but according to the wisdom and goodness of the question he asked. He answered him with a question: What is written in the law? How readest thou? v. 26. Christ will catechize him, and make him know himself. The studies of his profession would inform him; let him practise according to his knowledge, and he should not come short of eternal life. It will be of great use to us, in our way to heaven, to consider what is written in the law, and what we read there. We must have recourse to our bibles, to the law, as it is now in the hand of Christ and walk in the way that is shown us there. Having it written, it is our duty to read it, to read it with understanding so that, when there is occasion, we may be able to tell what is written in the law, and how we read.

2. What a good account he gave of the law, of the principal commandments of the law. He did not, like a Pharisee, refer himself to the tradition of the cases in which the veil is lifted from off the Redeemer's inner man, that, angel-like, we may "look into it" for a moment (I Pet. 1:12). Let us gaze on it with reverential wonder, and as we perceive what it was that produced that mysterious ecstasy, we shall find rising in our hearts a still rapture—"Oh, the depths!"

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

The Savior's joy was that through the Father's grace men were being enlightened. The seventy disciples had been from city to city, working miracles and preaching the gospel, and their Master was glad when they returned with tidings of success: "In that hour Jesus rejoiced in spirit." It pleases Jesus when the gospel has free course, and God is glorified thereby. Then, in measure, He sees of the travail of His soul, and is filled with satisfaction. Shall we not find our joy where He finds His? Shall we not enter into the joy of the Lord? Whenever we hear good news of a village evangelized, of a township moved by the glad tidings, of a country long shut up from the gospel at length opened to the world, let us feel our highest and deepest joy. Rather let us rejoice in this than in business prosperity or personal advantage. What if we can find no joy in our own circumstances, what if even spiritual affairs within our soul are full of difficulty; let us joy and rejoice that God the Father is revealing the light of His gospel among the sons of men. Be this our highest wish, "Thy kingdom come," and in that coming kingdom let us find our utmost happiness. Be sure that the joy which warmed the heart of Christ can do us no hurt: it must be a pure, sacred, and ennobling joy, and therefore let us indulge in it very largely. Christ's joy lay in the Father's sending forth His light and His truth, making men to see things which prophets and kings had desired to behold, but had not been favored to see. Jesus rejoiced in this, that the blessings of grace were being revealed by the Father.

—The Treasury of the New Testament

But blessed are your eyes. You improve the light which God has given you, and you receive an increase of heavenly wisdom by every miracle and by every sermon.

Many prophets and righteous men. These lived by and died in the faith of the promised Messiah; the fullness of the time was not then come for His manifestation in the flesh.

A lawyer. "A teacher of the law." What is called lawyer in the common translation conveys a wrong idea to most readers. These teachers of the law were the same as the scribes.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

The story is not, properly speaking, a parable, or imaginary narrative of something in the physical world intended to be translated into something in the spiritual region, but it is an illustration (by an imaginary narrative) of the actual virtue in question. Every detail is beautifully adapted to bring out the lesson that the obligation of neighborly affection has nothing to do with nearness of race or religion, but is as wide as humanity. The wounded man was probably a Jew, but it is significant that his nationality is not mentioned. He is "a certain man," that is all. The Samaritan did not ask where he was born before he helped him. So Christ teaches us that sorrow and need and sympathy and help are of no nationality.—Expositions of Holy Scripture elders, but fastened upon the two first and great commandments of the law, which included all the rest, v. 27. We must love God with all our hearts, must look upon him as the best of beings, in himself most amiable, and infinitely perfect and excellent. Our love to him must be sincere, hearty, and fervent; it must be a superlative love, a love that is as strong as death, but an intelligent love. It must be an entire love; he must have our whole souls, and must be served with all that is within us. We must love our neighbours as ourselves, which we shall easily do, if we, as we ought to do, love God better than ourselves. We must do all the good we can in the world and no hurt, and must fix it as a rule to ourselves to do to others as we would they should do to us; and this is to love our neighbour as ourselves.

3. Christ's approbation of what he said, v. 28. What he said that was good Christ commended: Thou hast answered right. Christ himself fastened upon these as the two great commandments of the law (Matt. xxii. 37). So far is right; but the hardest part of this work yet remains: "This do, and thou shalt live; thou shalt inherit eternal life."

4. His care to avoid the conviction which was now ready to fasten upon him. When Christ said, This do, and thou shalt live, he began to be aware that Christ intended to draw from him an acknowledgment that he had not done this. He was willing to justify himself, and therefore cared not for carrying on that discourse. Many ask good questions with a design rather to justify themselves than to inform themselves, rather proudly to show what is good in them than humbly to see what is bad in them.

II. We are concerned to know who is our neighbour. This is another of this lawyer's queries. As to loving God, he was willing to say no more of it; but, as to his neighbour, he was sure that there he had come up to the rule, for he had always been very kind and respectful to all about him. Now observe,

1. What was the corrupt notion of the Jewish teachers in this matter. "Where he saith, Thou shalt love thy neighbour, he excepts all Gentiles, for they are not our neighbours, but those only that are of our own nation and religion." If they saw a Gentile in danger of death, they thought themselves under no obligation to help to save his life.

2. How Christ corrected this inhuman notion, and showed, by a parable, that whomsoever we have need to receive kindness from, and find ready to show us the kindness we need, we cannot but look upon as our neighbour.

(1) The parable itself, which represents to us a poor Jew in distressed circumstances, succoured and relieved by a good Samaritan. Let us see here,

[1] How he was abused by his enemies. The honest man was travelling peaceably upon his lawful business in the road, and it was a great road that led from Jerusalem to Jericho, v. 30. Probably it happened lately, just as it is here related. This poor man fell among thieves. They were very barbarous: they not only took his money, but stripped him of his clothes, and they wounded him, and left him half dead, ready to die of his wounds. What reason have we to thank God for our preservation from perils by robbers!

[2] How he was slighted by those who should have been his friends, one a priest and the other a Levite, men of professed sanctity, whose offices obliged them to tenderness and compassion, who ought to have taught others their duty in such a case as this. Many of the courses of the priests had their residence in Jericho, and thence came up to Jerusalem, and so back again, which occasioned abundance of passing and repassing of priests that way, and Levites their attendants. They came this way, and saw the poor wounded man. The Levite not only saw him, but came and looked on him, v. 32. But they passed by on the other side; when they saw his case, they got as far off him as ever they could.

[3] How he was succoured and relieved by a stranger, a certain Samaritan, of that nation which of all others the Jews most despised and detested and would have no dealings with. This man had some humanity in him, v. 33. The priest had his heart hardened against one of his own people, but the Samaritan had his opened towards one of another people. When he saw him he had compassion on him. Though he was a Jew, he was a man, and a man in misery, and the Samaritan has learned to honour all men; and therefore pities him, as he himself would desire and expect to be pitied in the like case. The compassion of this Samaritan was not an idle compassion; but, when he drew out his soul, he reached forth his hand also to this poor needy creature. See how friendly this good Samaritan was. He went to the poor man, whom the priest and Levite kept at a distance from. He did the surgeon's part, for want of a better. He bound up his wounds, making use of his own linen,

27. Thou shalt . . .—the answer Christ Himself gave to another lawyer. (See on Mark 12:29-33).

28. he said . . .—"Right; THIS do, and life is thine"—laying such emphasis on "this" as to indicate, without expressing it, where the real difficulty to a sinner lay, and thus nonplussing the questioner himself.

29. willing—"wishing," to get himself out of the difficulty, by throwing on Jesus the definition of "neighbor," which the Jews interpreted very narrowly and technically, as excluding Samaritans and Gentiles [ALFORD].

30. A certain man—a Jew. from Jerusalem to Jericho—a distance of nineteen miles northeast, a deep and very fertile hollow—"the Temple of Judea" [TRENCH]. thieves—"robbers." The road, being rocky and desolate, was a notorious haunt of robbers, then and for ages after, and even to this day.

31, 32. came down a . . . priest . . . and a Levite—Jericho, the second city of Judea, was a city of the priests and Levites, and thousands of them lived there. The two here mentioned are supposed, apparently, to be returning from temple duties, but they "had not learnt what that meaneth, 'I will have mercy and not sacrifice' [TRENCH]. saw him—It was not inadvertently that he acted. came and looked—a further aggravation. passed by—although the law expressly required the opposite treatment even of the beast not only of their brethren, but of their enemy (Deut. 22:4; Exod. 23.4, 5. Cf. Isa. 58:7). 33. Samaritan—one excommunicated by the Jews, a byword among them, synonymous with heretic and devil (John 8:48; See on ch. 17:18). had compassion—His best is mentioned first; for "He who gives outward things gives something external to himself, but he who imparts compassion and tears gives him something from his very self" [GREGORY the Great, in TRENCH]. No doubt the priest and Levite had their excuses—'Tisn't safe to be lingering here; besides, he's past recovery; and then, mayn't suspicion rest upon ourselves? So might the Samaritan have reasoned, but did not [TRENCH]. Nor did he say, He's a Jew, who would have had no dealings with me (John 4:9), and why should I with him?

ADAM CLARKE

27. Thou shalt love the Lord. See this important subject explained at large on Matt. xxii. 37-40. Thy neighbour as thyself. See the nature of self-love explained on Matt. xix. 19.

Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. Self-love, as it is generally called, has been grievously declaimed against, even by religious people, as a most pernicious and dreadful evil. But they have not understood the subject on which they spoke. They have denominated that intense propensity which unregenerate men feel to gratify their carnal appetites and vicious passions self-love, whereas it might be more properly termed self-hatred or self-murder. If I am to love my neighbor as myself, and this "love worketh no ill to his neighbour," then self-love, in the sense in which our Lord uses it, is something excellent.

29. Willing to justify himself. Wishing to make it appear that he was a righteous man, and that consequently he was in the straight road to the kingdom of God, said, Who is my neighbour? supposing our Lord would have at once answered, "Every Jew is to be considered as such, and the Jews only." Now as he imagined he had never been deficient in his conduct to any person of his own nation, he thought he had amply fulfilled the law. This is the sense in which the Jews understood the word neighbour, as may be seen from Lev. xxix. 15-18. But our Lord shows here that the acts of kindness which a man is bound to perform to his neighbor when in distress, he should perform to any person, of whatever nation, religion, or kindred, whom he finds in necessity. As the word signifies one who is "near," this very circumstance makes any person our neighbor whom we know; and, if in distress, an object of our most compassionate regard.

30. And Jesus answering. Rather, "Then Jesus took him up." This I believe to be the meaning of the word; he threw out a challenge, and our Lord "took him up" on his own ground. A certain man went down from Jerusalem. This was the most public road in all Judea, as it was the grand thoroughfare between these two cities for the courses of priests, 12,000 of whom are said to have resided at Jericho. Fell among thieves. At this time the whole land of Judea was much infested with hordes of banditti, and it is not unlikely that many robberies might have been committed on that very road to which our Lord refers.

31. And by chance. Properly means the "coincidence of time and circumstance." At the time in which the poor Jew was half dead, through the wounds which he had received, a priest came where he was.

31-32. Priest and Levite are mentioned here, partly because they were the most frequent travellers on this road, and partly to show that these were the persons who, from the nature of their office, were most obliged to perform works of mercy, and from whom a person in distress had a right to expect immediate succor and comfort; and their inhuman conduct here was a flat breach of the law, Deut. xxii. 1-4.

33. Samaritan is mentioned merely to show that he was a person from whom a Jew had no right to expect any help or relief, because of the enmity which subsisted between the two nations.

it is likely, for that purpose; and poured in oil and wine; wine to wash the wound, and oil to mollify it, and close it up. He did all he could as one whose heart bled with them. He set him on his own beast, and went on foot himself, and brought him to an inn. We suppose this Samaritan went upon business; but he understood that both his own business and God's sacrifice too must give place to such an act of mercy as this. He took care of him in the inn, got him to bed, had food for him that was proper, and due attendance, and, it may be, prayed with him. As if he had been his own child, when he left him next morning, he left money with the landlord, and passed his word for what he should spend more. Twopence of their money would go a great way; however, here it was an earnest of satisfaction to the full of all demands. All this was kind and generous, and as much as one could have expected from a friend or a brother; and yet here it is done by a stranger and foreigner.

Now this parable is applicable to another purpose than that for which it was intended; and does excellently set forth the kindness and love of God our Saviour towards sinful miserable man. We were like this poor distressed traveller. The law of Moses passes by on the other side, as having neither pity nor power to help us; but then comes the blessed Jesus, that good Samaritan; he has compassion on us. He takes care of us. This magnifies the riches of his love, and obliges us all to say, "How much are we indebted, and what shall we render?"

(2) The application of the parable. [1] The truth contained in it is extorted from the lawyer's own mouth. Saith Christ, "Which of these three was neighbour to him that fell among thieves (v. 36). Which of these did the neighbour's part?" To this the lawyer would not answer, "Doubtless, the Samaritan was"; but, "He that showed mercy on him; doubtless, he was a good neighbour to him." [2] The duty inferred from it is pressed home upon the lawyer's own conscience: Go, and do thou likewise. If a Samaritan does well that helps a distressed Jew, certainly a Jew does not well if he refuses in like manner to help a distressed Samaritan. "And therefore go thou and do as the Samaritan did, whenever occasion offers: show mercy to those that need thy help, and do it freely, and with concern and compassion, though they be not of thy own nation." This lawyer thought to have puzzled Christ himself; but Christ sends him to school to a Samaritan, to learn his duty: "Go, and do like him." It is the duty of everyone of us to succour, help, and relieve all that are in distress and necessity, and of lawyers particularly.

I. The entertainment which Martha gave to Christ and his disciples at her house, v. 38.

1. Christ's coming to the village where Martha lived: As they went he entered into a certain village. This village was Bethany, nigh to Jerusalem. Christ honoured the country-villages with his presence and favour, and not the great and populous cities only; for, as he chose privacy, so he countenanced poverty.

2. His reception at Martha's house: A certain woman, named Martha, received him into her house, and made him welcome. There were some who were Christ's particular friends, whom he loved more than his other friends, and them he visited most frequently. He loved this family (John xi. 5), and often invited himself to them. It is called Martha's house, for, probably, she was a widow, and was the housekeeper. Though at this time it was grown dangerous to entertain him, especially so near Jerusalem, yet she cared not what hazard she ran for his name's sake. Though there were many that rejected him, and would not entertain him, yet there was one that would bid him welcome.

II. The attendance which Mary, the sister of Martha, gave upon the word of Christ, v. 20. 1. She heard his word. It seems, our Lord Jesus, as soon as he came into Martha's house, addressed himself to his great work of preaching the gospel. A good sermon is never the worse for being preached in a house. Since Christ is forward to speak, we should be swift to hear. She sat to hear, which denotes a close attention. Her mind was composed, and she resolved not to catch a word now and then, but to receive all that Christ delivered. If we sit with him at his feet now, we shall sit with him on his throne shortly.

III. The care of Martha about her domestic affairs: But Martha was cumbered about much serving (v. 40), and that was the reason why she was not where Mary was. Housekeepers know what care and bustle there must be when a great entertainment is to be made. Observe here,

1. Something commendable, which must not be

oil and wine—the remedies used in such cases all over the East (Isa. 1:6), and elsewhere; the wine to cleanse the wounds, the oil to assuage their smartings. on his own beast—himself going on foot.

35. two pence—equal to two day's wages of a laborer, and enough for several days' support. 36. Which . . . was neighbour?—a most dexterous way of putting the question: (1) Turning the question from, "Whom am I to love as my neighbour?" to "Who is the man that shows that love?" (2) Compelling the lawyer to give a reply very different from what he would like—not only condemning his own nation, but those of them who should be the most exemplary. (3) Making him commend one of a deeply hated race. And he does it, but it is almost extorted. For he does not answer, "The Samaritan"—that would have sounded heterodox, heretical—but "He that showed mercy on him." It comes to the same thing, no doubt, but the circumlocution is significant. 37. Go . . .—O exquisite, matchless teaching! What new fountains of charity has not this opened up in the human spirit—rivers in the wilderness, streams in the desert! What noble Christian institutions have not such words founded, all undreamed of till that wondrous One came to bless this heartless world of ours with His incomparable love—first in words, and then in deeds which have translated His words into flesh and blood, and poured the life of them through that humanity which He made His own! Was this parable, now, designed to magnify the law of love, and to show who fulfils it and who not? And who did this as never man did it, as our Brother Man, "our Neighbor?" The priests and Levites had not strengthened the diseased, nor bound up the broken (Ezek. 34:4), while He bound up the brokenhearted (Isa. 61:1), and poured into all wounded spirits the balm of sweetest consolation. All the Fathers saw through the thin veil of this noblest of stories, the Story of love, and never wearied of tracing the analogy (though sometimes fancifully enough) [TRENCH]. "He hungered," exclaims GREGORY of Nazianzen (in the fourth century), "but He fed thousands; He was weary, but He is the Rest of the weary; He is saluted 'Samaritan' and 'Demoniac,' but He saves him that went down from Jerusalem and fell among thieves," etc.

38-42. MARTHA AND MARY. 38. certain village—Bethany (John 11:1), which Luke so speaks of, having no farther occasion to notice it. received him . . . her house—The house belonged to her, and she appears throughout to be the older sister.

39. which also—"who for her part," in contrast with Martha. sat—"seated herself." From the custom of sitting beneath an instructor, the phrase "sitting at one's feet" came to mean being a disciple of any one (Acts 22:3). heard—rather, "kept listening" to His word.

40. cumbered—"distracted." came to him—"presented herself before Him," as from another apartment, in which her sister had "left her to serve (or make preparation) alone."

ADAM CLARKE

34. Pouring in oil and wine. These, beaten together, appear to have been used formerly as a common medicine for fresh wounds. Bind up a fresh cut immediately in a soft rag or lint, moistened with pure olive oil, and the parts will heal by what is called the first intention, and more speedily than by any other means.

35. Two pence. Two denarii.

36. Which . . . was neighbour? Which fulfilled the duty which one neighbor owes to another?

37. He that shewed mercy. Or "so much mercy." His prejudice would not permit him to name the Samaritan, yet his conscience obliged him to acknowledge that he was the only righteous person of the three. Go, and do thou likewise. Be even to your enemy in distress as kind, humane, and merciful as this Samaritan was.

38. Received him. "Kindly received." She received Him in a friendly manner, under her roof, and entertained Him hospitably. So the word is used in the best Greek writers. Martha is supposed by some to have been a widow, with whom her brother, Lazarus, and sister, Mary, lodged.

39. Sat at Jesus' feet. This was the posture of the Jewish scholars while listening to the instructions of the rabbins. It is in this sense that Paul says he was "brought up at the feet of Gamaliel," Acts xxii. 3.

40. Martha was cumbered. "Perplexed." She was harassed with different cares and employments at the same time, one drawing one way, and another, another—a proper description of a worldly mind. But in Martha's favor it may be justly said that all her anxiety was to provide overlooked. Here was a commendable respect to our Lord Jesus. It was not for ostentation, but purely to testify her goodwill to him, that she made this entertainment. Here was a commendable care of her household affairs. It is the duty of those who have the charge of families to look well to the ways of their household. The affectation of state and the love of ease make many families neglected.

2. Here was something culpable. She was for much serving. Her heart was upon it, to have a very sumptuous and splendid entertainment. She was in care, concerning much attendance. It does not become the disciples of Christ to affect much serving; what need is there of much serving, when much less will serve? She was cumbered about it; she was just distracted with it. Note, Whatever cares the providence of God casts upon us we must not be cumbered with them. Care is good and duty; but cumber is sin and folly. She was then cumbered about much serving when she should have been with her sister, sitting at Christ's feet to hear his word.

IV. The complaint which Martha made to Christ against her sister Mary (v. 40): "Lord, dost thou not care that my sister has left me to serve alone? Bid her come and help me."

1. This complaint of Martha's may be considered as a discovery of her worldliness; it was the language of her inordinate care and cumber. The inordinacy of worldly cares and pursuits is often the occasion of disturbance in families and of strife and contention among relations. Martha, being angry at her sister, appealed to Christ, and would have him say that she did well to be angry. Lord, dost thou not care that my sister has left me to serve alone? When Martha was caring, she must have Mary, and Christ and all, to care too, or else she is not pleased. Those are not always in the right that are most forward to appeal to God; we must therefore take heed, lest at any time we expect that Christ should espouse our unjust and groundless quarrels. The cares which he casts upon us we may cheerfully cast upon him, but not those which we foolishly draw upon ourselves.

2. It may be considered as a discouragement of Mary's piety and devotion. Her sister should have commended her for it, but, instead of this, she condemns her as wanting in her duty. It is no strange thing for those that are zealous in religion to meet, not only with opposition from enemies, but with blame and censure from their friends.

V. The reproof which Christ gave to Martha for her inordinate care, v. 41. Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things, whereas but one thing is needful.

1. He reproved her, though he was at this time her guest. As many as Christ loves he rebukes and chastens. Even those that are dear to Christ, if anything be amiss in them, shall be sure to hear of it.

2. When he reproved her, he called her by her name, Martha. He repeated her name, Martha, Martha; he speaks as one in earnest, and deeply concerned for her welfare. Those that are entangled in the cares of this life are not easily disentangled.

3. That which he reproved her for was her being careful and troubled about many things. Christ reproves her, both for the intenseness of her care ("Thou art careful and troubled, divided and disturbed by thy care"), and for the extensiveness of it, "about many things. Poor Martha, thou hast many things to fret at, and this puts thee out of humour, whereas less ado would serve." Inordinate care or trouble about many things in this world is a common fault among Christ's disciples. If they fret for no just cause, it is just with him to order them something to fret at.

4. That which aggravated the sin and folly of her care was that but one thing is needful. The one thing needful is certainly meant of that which Mary made her choice—sitting at Christ's feet, to hear his word. She was troubled about many things, when she should have applied herself to one; godliness unites the heart, which the world had divided. The many things she was troubled about were needless, while the one thing she neglected was needful. Martha's care and work were good in their proper season and place; but now she had something else to do, which was unspeakably more needful. She expected Christ to have blamed Mary for not doing as she did, but he blamed her for not doing as Mary did. The day will come when Martha will wish she had set where Mary did.

VI. Christ's approbation and commendation of Mary for her serious piety: Mary hath chosen the good part.

1. She had justly given the preference to that which best deserved it; for one thing is needful, this one thing that she has done. Serious godliness is a needful thing, it is the one thing needful. Nothing but this will go with us into another world.

2. She had herein wisely done well for herself.

carest thou not . . . my sister . . .—"Lord, here am I with everything to do, and this sister of mine will not lay a hand to anything; thus I miss something from Thy lips, and Thou from our hands." bid her . . .—She presumes not to stop Christ's teaching by calling her sister away, and thus leaving Him without His one auditor, nor did she hope perhaps to succeed if she had tried.

41. Martha, Martha—emphatically redoubling upon the name. careful and cumbered—the one word expressing the inward worrying anxiety that her preparations should be worthy of her Lord; the other, the outward bustle of those preparations. many things—"much service" (vs. 40); too elaborate preparation, which so engrossed her attention that she missed her Lord's teaching.

42. one thing . . .—The idea of "Short work and little of it suffices for Me" is not so much the lower sense of these weighty words, as supposed in them, as the basis of something far loftier than any precept on economy. Underneath that idea is couched another, as to the littleness both of elaborate preparation for the present life and of that life itself, compared with another.

chosen the good part—not in the general sense of Moses' choice (Heb. 11:25), and Joshua's (Josh. 24:15), and David's (Ps. 119:30); i.e., of good in opposition to bad; but, of two good ways of serving and pleasing the Lord, choosing the better. Wherein, then, was Mary's better than Martha's? suitable and timely entertainment for our Lord and His disciples. And we should not, on the merest supposition, attribute earthly-mindedness to a woman whose character stands unimpeachable in the gospel; and who, by entertaining Christ and His disciples, and providing liberally for them, gave the highest proof that she was influenced by liberality and benevolence, and not by parsimony or covetousness.

Dost thou not care? Dost Thou not think it wrong that my sister thus leaves me to provide and prepare this supper, alone?

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

Of Martha, Luke tells us she "was cumbered about much serving"; a far better word for us today, with our modern method of speech, is the word distracted. She was distracted by much serving. What a great soul this Martha was. Jesus was the guest, and the one thing of supreme importance in the heart of Martha was that He should have adequate welcome. I can see her. I have met her in this life, haven't you? Those hurrying feet, those swiftly moving fingers; love suddenly suggesting something else to make the welcome more perfect. Love always multiplies itself. She went to do something, and on her way, love suggested two other things, and she moved a little more quickly; and while she was going to do these, four were suggested; and then she hurried after the four, and by the time she has begun those, the four are eight things crowding in; and by the time eight are begun, there are sixteen, and so she became distracted! God bless her; a great soul. But she was trying to express love in service, and it reacted. It was a sad reaction. She got so distracted that the next thing we see her doing—think of this woman whose one concern was to make Jesus welcome—we see her rushing in and complaining of His carelessness as well as her sister's. She said, "Dost thou not care?"—The Gospel According to Luke

41. Thou art careful and troubled. "You are distracted, your mind is divided," in consequence of which "you are disturbed," your spirit is thrown into a tumult. About many things. Getting a variety of things ready for this entertainment, much more than are necessary on such an occasion.

42. One thing is needful. This is the end of the sentence, according to Bengel. "Now Mary hath chosen . . ." begins a new one. One single dish, the simplest and plainest possible, is such as best suits Me and My disciples, whose meat and drink it is to do the will of our Heavenly Father. Mary hath chosen that good part. That is, of hearing My word, of which she shall not be deprived, it being at present of infinitely greater importance to attend to My teaching than to attend to any domestic concerns. While you are busily employed in providing that portion of perishing food for perishing bodies, Mary has chosen that spiritual portion which endures forever, and which shall not be taken away from her. Therefore I cannot command her to leave her present employment, and go and help you bring forward a variety of matters which are by no means necessary at this time. The words one thing is needful, on which we lay so much stress, are wanting in some of the most ancient MSS., and are omitted by some of the fathers, who quote all the rest of the passage—a plain proof that the meaning which we take out of them was not thought of in very ancient times; and in other MSS., versions, and fathers there is an unusual variety of readings where even the thing, or something like it, is retained. Some have it thus: "Martha, Martha, thou laborest much, and yet a little is sufficient, yea, one thing only." Others: "And only one thing is Christ justified Mary against her sister's clamours. Sooner or later, Mary's choice will be justified, and all those who make that choice, and abide by it. But this was not all; he applauded her for her wisdom: She hath chosen the good part; for she chose to be with Christ, and took a better way of honouring Christ and of pleasing him, by receiving his word into her heart, than Martha did by providing for his entertainment in her house. (1) A part with Christ is a good part; it is a part for the soul and eternity. (2) It is a part that shall never be taken away from those that have it. Nothing shall separate us from the love of Christ, and our part in that love. Men and devils cannot take it away from us, and God and Christ will not. (3) It is the wisdom and duty of everyone of us to choose this good part. Mary was at her choice whether she would partake with Martha in her care, and get the reputation of a fine housekeeper, or sit at the feet of Christ and approve herself a zealous disciple; and, by her choice in this particular, Christ judges of her general choice.

not be taken away—Martha's choice would be taken from her, for her services would die with her; Mary's never, being spiritual and eternal. Both were true-hearted disciples, but the one was absorbed in the higher, the other in the lower of two ways of honoring their common Lord. Yet neither despised, or would willingly neglect, the other's occupation. The one represents the contemplative, the other the active style of the Christian character. A Church full of Marys would perhaps be as great an evil as a Church full of Marthas. Both are needed, each to be the complement of the other.

required." Others: "Thou art anxious and embarrassed about many things, when that which is needful is very small." Others: "But here there need only a few things." Others: "But a few things, or one only, is necessary." Now these are the readings of almost all the ancient versions; and we plainly perceive by them that what we term the one thing needful is not understood by one of them as referring to the salvation of the soul, but to the provision then to be made. In short, I wonder how the present most exceptionable mode of interpretation ever obtained, as having no countenance in the text, ancient MSS. or versions, and as being false in itself. For even Christ himself could not say that sitting at His feet and hearing His word was the one thing needful. Repentance, faith, prayer, obedience, and a thousand other things are necessary to our salvation, besides merely hearing the doctrines of Christ, even with the humblest heart.

Prayer is one of the great laws of natural religion. One great design therefore of Christianity is to assist us in prayer, to enforce the duty upon us, to instruct us in it, and encourage us to expect advantage by it.

I. We find Christ himself praying in a certain place. This evangelist has taken particular notice of Christ's praying often, more than any other of the evangelists: when he was baptized (ch. iii. 21), he was praying; he withdrew into the wilderness, and prayed (ch. v. 16); he went out into a mountain to pray, and continued all night in prayer (ch. vi. 12): he was alone praying (ch. ix. 18); soon after, he went up into a mountain to pray, and as he prayed he was transfigured (ch. ix. 28, 29); and here he was praying in a certain place.

II. His disciples applied themselves to him for direction in prayer. When he was praying, they asked, Lord, teach us to pray. They came to him with this request, when he ceased; for they would not disturb him when he was at prayer. One of his disciples said, Lord, teach us. Though Christ is apt to teach, yet he will for this be enquired of.

1. Their request is, "Lord, teach us to pray." It becomes the disciples of Christ to apply themselves to him for instruction in prayer. Lord, teach us to pray, is itself a good prayer, and a very needful one, for it is a hard thing to pray well; and it is Jesus Christ only that can teach us, by his word and Spirit, how to pray. "Give me a mouth and wisdom in prayer, that I may speak as I ought; teach me what I shall say."

2. Their plea is, "As John also taught his disciples. He took care to instruct his disciples in this necessary duty, and we would be taught as they were." Whereas the Jews' prayers were generally adorations, and praises of God, and doxologies, John taught his disciples such prayers as were more filled up with petitions and requests. "Now, Lord, teach us this, to be added to those benedictions of the name of God which we have been accustomed to from our childhood." Christ did there teach them a prayer consisting wholly of petitions, and even omitting the doxology which had been affixed; and the Amen.

III. Christ gave them direction, much the same as he had given them before in his sermon upon the mount, Matt. vi. 9, &c. They would find all their requests couched in these few words, and would be able, in words of their own, to expatiate and enlarge upon them.

1. There are some differences between the Lord's prayer in Matthew and in Luke. There is a difference in the fourth petition. In Matthew we pray, "Give us daily bread this day": here, "Give it us day by day. Give us each day the bread which our bodies require, as they call for it." Let us have bread today for today, and to*morrow* for to*morrow*; for thus we may be kept in a continual dependence upon God, as children upon their parents, and may find ourselves under fresh obligations to do the work of every day in the day, according as the duty of the day requires, because we have from God the supplies of every day in the day, according as the necessity of the day requires. Here is likewise some difference in the fifth petition. In Matthew it is, Forgive us our debts, as we forgive: here it is, Forgive us our sins. For we forgive. This is a very necessary qualification for forgiveness, and, if God have wrought it in us, we may plead that work of his grace for the enforcing of our petitions for the pardon of our sins: "Lord, forgive us, for thou hast thyself inclined us to forgive others." There is another addition here; we plead not only in general, We forgive our debtors, but in particular, "We profess to forgive everyone that is as John . . .—From this reference to John, it is possible that disciple had not heard the Sermon on the Mount. Nothing of John's inner teaching (to his own disciples) has been preserved to us, but we may be sure he never taught his disciples to say, "Our Father." 2-4. (See on Matt. 6:9-13).

Vss. 1-13. THE DISCIPLES TAUGHT TO PRAY. 1. one . . .—struck with either the matter or the manner of our Lord's prayers.

3. day by day . . .—an extension of the petition in Matthew for "this day's" supply, to every successive day's necessities. The closing doxology, wanting here, is wanting also in all the best and most ancient copies of Matthew's Gospel. Perhaps our Lord purposely left that part open: and as the grand Jewish doxologies were ever resounding, and passed immediately and naturally, in all their hallowed familiarity into the Christian Church, probably this prayer was never used in the Christian assemblies but in its present form, as we find it in Matthew, while in Luke it has been allowed to stand as originally uttered.

1-5. Teach us to pray. See the nature of prayer, with an ample explanation of the different parts of the Lord's Prayer, treated of in Matt. vi. 5-15. The prayer related here by Luke is not precisely the same as that mentioned by Matthew; and indeed it is not likely that it was given at the same time. There are many variations in the MSS. in this prayer, but they seem to have proceeded principally from the desire of rendering this similar to that in Matthew. Attempts of this nature have given birth to multitudes of the various readings in the MSS. of the New Testament. It should be remarked also that there is no vestige of the doxology found in Matthew in any copy of Luke's Gospel.

Give us this day our daily bread. The word epiousion has greatly perplexed critics and commentators. I find upwards of thirty different explanations of it. It is found in no Greek writer before the Evangelists. The interpretation of Theophylact, one of the best of the Greek fathers, has ever appeared to me to be the most correct, "Bread, sufficient for our substance and support," i.e., that quantity of food which is necessary to support our health and strength, by being changed into the substance of our bodies.

And forgive us our debts. Sin is represented here under the notion of a debt, and as our sins are many, they are here called debts. God made man that he might live to His glory, and gave him a law to walk by; and if, when he does anything that tends not to glorify God, he contracts a debt with divine justice, how much more is he debtor when he breaks the law by actual transgression! Forgive us. Man has nothing to pay; if his debts are not forgiven, they must stand charged against him forever, as he is absolutely insolvent. Forgiveness, therefore, must come from the free mercy of God in Christ. As we forgive our debtors. It was a maxim among the ancient Jews that no man should lie down in his bed without forgiving those who had offended him. That man condemns himself to suffer eternal punishment who makes use of this prayer with revenge and hatred in his heart.

indebted to us." Here also the doxology in the close is wholly omitted, and the Amen. He left a vacuum here, to be filled up by a doxology more peculiar to the Christian institutes, ascribing glory to Father, Son and Holy Ghost.

2. Yet it is, for substance, the same; and we shall therefore here only gather up some general lessons from it.

(1) That in prayer we ought to come to God as children to a Father, a common Father to us and all mankind.

(2) That at the same time, and in the same petitions, which we address to God for ourselves, we should take in with us all the children of men. A rooted principle of catholic charity should go along with us throughout this prayer, which is so worded as to be accommodated to that noble principle.

(3) That in order to the confirming of the habit of heavenly-mindedness in us, we should, with an eye of faith look heavenward, and view the God we pray to as our Father in heaven.

(4) That in prayer we must seek first the kingdom of God and the righteousness thereof, by ascribing honour to his name, his holy name, and power to his government. O that both the one and the other may be more manifested.

(5) That the principles and practices of the unseen world (which therefor by faith only we are apprized of), are the great original—the ἀρχέτυπον, to which we should desire that the principles and practices of this lower world may be more conformable. Those words, As in heaven, so on earth, refer to all the first three petitions.

(6) That those who faithfully and sincerely mind the kingdom of God may humbly hope that all other things shall be added to them, and they may in faith pray for them. If our first chief desire and care be that God's name may be sanctified, his kingdom come, and his will be done, we may then come boldly to the throne of grace for our daily bread.

(7) That in our prayers for temporal blessings we must moderate our desires, and confine them to a competency. The expression here used of day by day is the very same with our daily bread.

(8) That sins are debts which we are daily contracting, and which therefore we should every day pray for the forgiveness of. Every day adds to the score of our guilt, and it is a miracle of mercy that we have so much encouragement given us to come every day to the throne of grace, to pray for the pardon of our sins of daily infirmity. God multiplies to pardon beyond seventy times seven.

(9) That we have no reason to expect that God would forgive our sins against him, if we do not sincerely forgive those that have at any time affronted us or been injurious to us.

(10) That temptations to sin should be as much dreaded and deprecated by us as ruin by sin. We must be as earnest with God that we may not be led into it as that we may not be led by that to sin, and by sin to ruin.

(11) That God is to be depended upon for our deliverance from all evil; and we should pray, not only that we may not be left to ourselves to run into evil, but that we may not be left to Satan to bring evil upon us.

IV. He stirs up and encourages importunity, fervency, and constancy, in prayer, by showing,

1. That importunity will go far in our dealings with men, v. 5–8. Suppose a man, upon a sudden emergency, goes to borrow a loaf or two of bread of a neighbour, at an unseasonable time of night, not for himself, but for his friend that came unexpectedly to him. His neighbour will be loth to accommodate him, for he has wakened him with his knocking, and put him out of humour, and he has a great deal to say in his excuse. But his neighbour will have no nay, therefore he continues knocking still, and tells him he will do so till he has what he comes for; so that he must give it to him, to be rid of him: He will rise and give him as many as he needs, because of his importunity. We prevail with men by importunity because they are displeased with it, but with God because he is pleased with it. Now this similitude may be of use to us to direct us in prayer. (1) We must come to God with boldness and confidence for what we need, as a man does to the house of his neighbour or friend, who, he knows, loves him, and is inclined to be kind to him. (2) We must come for bread, for that which is needful. (3) We must come to him by prayer for others as well as for ourselves. This man did not come for bread for himself, but for his friend. We cannot come to God upon a more pleasing errand than when we come to him for grace to enable us to do good. (4) We may come with the more boldness to God in a strait, if it be a strait that we have not brought ourselves into by

Invocation: Our Father which art in heaven. In the former clause we express His nearness to us; in the latter, His distance from us. (See Eccles. 5:2; Isa. 66:1). Holy, loving familiarity suggests the one; awful reverence the other. In calling Him "Father" we express a relationship we have all known and felt surrounding us even from our infancy; but in calling Him our Father "who art in heaven," we contrast Him with the fathers we all have here below, and so raise our souls to that "heaven" where He dwells, and that Majesty and Glory which are there as in their proper home. These first words of the Lord's Prayer—this invocation with which it opens—what a brightness and warmth does it throw over the whole prayer, and into what a serene region does it introduce the praying believer, the child of God, as he thus approaches Him! It is true that the paternal relationship of God to His people is by no means strange to the Old Testament. (See Deut. 32:6; Ps. 103: 13; Isa. 63:16; Jer. 3:4, 19; Mal. 1:6; 2:10.) But these are only glimpses—the "back parts" (Exod. 33:23), if we may so say, in comparison with the "open face" of our Father revealed in Jesus. (See on II Cor. 3:18). Nor is it too much to say, that the view which our Lord gives, throughout this His very first lengthened discourse, of "our Father in heaven," beggars all that was ever taught, even in God's own Word, or conceived before by His saints, on this subject.

The great majority of the best critics (taking the word to be compounded of ousia, "substance," or "being") understand by it the "staff of life," the bread of subsistence, and so the sense will be, "Give us this day the bread which this day's necessities require." In this case, the rendering of our authorized version (after the Vulgate, LUTHER and some of the best modern critics)—"our daily bread"—is, in sense, accurate enough. (See Prov. 30:8.) Among commentators, there was early shown an inclination to understand this as a prayer for the heavenly bread, or spiritual nourishment; and in this they have been followed by many superior expositors, even down to our own times. But as this is quite unnatural, so it deprives the Christian of one of the sweetest of his privileges—to cast his bodily wants in this short prayer, by one simple petition, upon his heavenly Father. No doubt the spiritual mind will, from "the meat that perisheth," naturally rise in thought to "that meat which endureth to everlasting life." But let it be enough that the petition about bodily wants irresistibly suggests a higher petition; and let us not rob ourselves—out of a morbid spirituality—of our one petition in this prayer for that bodily provision which the immediate sequel of this discourse shows that our heavenly Father has so much at heart. In limiting our petitions, however, to provision for the day, what a spirit of childlike dependence does the Lord both demand and beget!

5-8. at midnight . . . for a friend is come—The heat in warm countries makes evening preferable to day for travelling; but "midnight" is everywhere a most unseasonable hour of call, and for that very reason it is here selected. Trouble me not—the trouble making him insensible both to the urgency of the case and the claims of friendship. I cannot—without exertion which he would not make.

8. importunity—The word is a strong one—"shamelessness"; persisting in the face of all that seemed reasonable, and refusing to take a denial. as many . . .—His reluctance once overcome, all the claims of friendship and necessity are felt to the full. The sense is obvious: If the churlish and self-indulgent—deaf both to friendship and necessity—can after a positive refusal, be won over, by sheer persistency, to do all that is needed, how much more may the same determined perseverance in prayer be expected to prevail with Him whose very nature is "rich unto all that call upon Him" (Rom. 10:12).

ADAM CLARKE

Which art in heaven. The phrase, Our Father which art in heaven was very common among the ancient Jews, and was used by them precisely in the same sense as it is used here by our Lord. This phrase in the Scriptures seems used to express: (1) His omnipresence. "The . . . heaven of heavens cannot contain thee," 1 Kings viii. 27. (2) His majesty and dominion over His creatures. "Art not thou God in heaven? and rulest not thou over all the kingdoms of the heathen?" 2 Chron. xx. 6 (3) His power and might. "Art not thou God in heaven? . . . and in thine hand is there not power and might, so that none is able to withstand thee?" 2 Chron. xx. 6 (4) His omniscience. "The Lord's throne is in heaven: his eyes behold, his eyelids try, the children of men," Ps. xi. 4. (5) His infinite purity and holiness. Thou art "the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy," Isa. lvii. 15. Hallowed. Hagiazo from a negative, and ge, the earth, a thing separated from the earth, or from earthly purposes and employments. As the word sanctified or hallowed, in Scripture, is frequently used for the consecration of a thing or person to a holy use or office, as the Levites, firstborn, Tabernacle, Temple, and their utensils, which were all set apart from every earthly, common, or profane use, and employed wholly in the service of God, so the Divine Majesty may be said to be sanctified by us, in analogy to those things, viz., when we separate Him from, and in our conceptions and desires exalt Him above, earth and all things. Thy name. That is, God himself, with all the attributes of His divine nature—His power, wisdom, justice, mercy. We hallow God's name: (1) with our lips, when all our conversation is holy, and we speak of those things which are meet to minister grace to the hearers; (2) in our thoughts, when we suppress every rising evil, and have our tempers regulated by His grace and Spirit; (3) in our lives, when we begin, continue, and end our works to His glory; (4) in our families, when we endeavor to bring up our children in the discipline and admonition of the Lord; (5) in a particular calling or business, when we separate the falsity, deception, and lying, commonly practiced, from it, buying and selling as in the sight of the holy and just God.

4. Deliver us from evil. Literally, "Deliver us from the wicked one."

6. In his journey is come. Or perhaps more literally, "A friend of mine is come to me out of his way," which renders the case more urgent—a friend of mine, benighted, belated, and who has lost his way, is come unto me.

MATTHEW HENRY

our own folly and carelessness, but Providence has led us into it. This man would not have wanted bread if his friend had not come in unexpectedly. The care which Providence casts upon us, we may with cheerfulness cast back upon Providence. If importunity could prevail thus with a man who was angry at it, much more with a God who is infinitely more kind, and is not angry at our importunity, but accepts it. If he do not answer our prayers presently, yet he will in due time, if we continue to pray.

2. That God has promised to give us what we ask of him. We have not only the goodness of nature to take comfort from, but the word which he has spoken (v. 9, 10): "Ask, and it shall be given you." I say unto you. We have it from Christ's own mouth. We must not only ask, but we must seek, must second our prayers with our endeavours; and, in asking and seeking, we must continue pressing, still knocking at the same door, and we shall at length prevail. Every one that asketh receiveth, even the meanest saint that asks in faith. When we ask of God those things which Christ has here directed us to ask, that his name may be sanctified, that his kingdom may come, and his will be done, in these requests we must be importunate.

V. He gives us both instruction and encouragement in prayer from the consideration of our relation to God as a Father.

1. An appeal to the bowels of earthly fathers: "Let any of you that is a father tell me, if his son ask bread, will he give him a stone? If he ask a fish will he for a fish give him a serpent? Or, if he shall ask an egg for his supper (an egg and to bed), will he offer him a scorpion? You know you could not be so unnatural to your own children," v. 11, 12.

2. An application of this to the blessings of our heavenly Father (v. 13): If ye then, being evil, give good gifts to your children, much more shall God give you the Spirit. He shall give good things; so it is in Matthew. Observe,

(1) The direction he gives us what to pray for. We must ask for the Holy Spirit, not only as necessary in order to our praying well, but as inclusive of all the good things we are to pray for.

(2) The encouragement he gives us to hope that we shall speed in this prayer: Your heavenly Father will give. It is in his power to give the Spirit; he has all good things to bestow, wrapped up in that one; but that is not all, it is in his promise. If our earthly parents, though evil, be yet so kind, if they, though weak, be yet so knowing, that they not only give, but give with discretion, give what is best, much more will our heavenly Father give us his Holy Spirit.

The substance of these verses we had in Matt. xii. 22, &c. Christ is here giving a general proof of his divine mission, by a particular proof of his power over Satan. Here too he gives an earnest of the success of that undertaking. He is here casting out a devil that made the poor possessed man dumb: in Matthew we are told that he was blind and dumb. When the devil was forced out by the word of Christ, the dumb spoke immediately, and the lips were opened to show forth his praise.

I. Some were affected with this miracle. The people wondered; they admired the power of God.

II. Others were offended at it, and suggested that it was by virtue of a league with Beelzebub, the prince of the devils, that he did this, v. 15. Some, to corroborate this suggestion and confront the evidence of Christ's miraculous power, challenged him to give them a sign from heaven (v. 16), to confirm his doctrine. As if a sign from heaven could not have been given them as well by a compact and collusion with the prince of the power of the air, as the casting out of a devil. Obstinate infidelity will never be at a loss for something to say in its own excuse, though ever so frivolous and absurd. Christ here returns a full and direct answer in which he shows,

1. That it can by no means be imagined that such a subtle prince as Satan is should ever agree to measures that had such a direct tendency to his own overthrow, v. 17, 18. Jesus knew their thoughts, even when they industriously thought to conceal them, and he said, "You yourselves cannot but see the groundlessness of this charge; for it is an allowed maxim that no interest can stand that is divided against itself; not the more public interest of a kingdom, nor the private interest of a house or family; if either the one or the other be divided against itself, it cannot stand. Now, if Satan should thus be divided against himself, he would hasten his own overthrow."

2. That it was a very partial ill-natured thing for them to impute that in him to a compact with Satan which

Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you—Though there seems evidently a climax here, expressive of more and more importunity, yet each of these terms used presents what we desire of God in a different light. We ask for what we wish; we seek for what we miss; we knock for that from which we feel ourselves shut out. Answering to this threefold representation is the triple assurance of success to our believing efforts. "But ah!" might some humble disciple say, "I cannot persuade myself that I have any interest with God." To meet this, our Lord repeats the triple assurance He had just given, but in such a form as to silence every such complaint. For every one that asketh receiveth; and he that seeketh findeth; and to him that knocketh it shall be opened—Of course, it is presumed that he asks aright—i.e., in faith—and with an honest purpose to make use of what he receives. "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God. But let him ask in faith, nothing wavering [undecided whether to be altogether on the Lord's side]. For he that wavereth is like a wave of the sea driven with the wind and tossed. For let not that man think that he shall receive any thing of the Lord" (Jas 1:5-7).

13. the Holy Spirit—in Matthew (7:11), "good gifts"; the former, the Gift of gifts descending on the Church through Christ, and comprehending the latter.

14-36. BLIND AND DUMB DEMONIAC HEALED—CHARGE OF BEING IN LEAGUE WITH HELL, AND REPLY—DEMAND OF A SIGN, AND REPLY. (See on Matt. 12:22-45). 14. dumb—blind also (Matthew 12: 22).

But when the Pharisees heard it—Mark (3:22) says, "the scribes which came down from Jerusalem"; so that this had been a hostile party of the ecclesiastics, who had come all the way from Jerusalem to collect materials for a charge against Him. (See on vs. 14.) they said, This fellow—an expression of contempt—doth not cast out devils, but by Beelzebub—rather, Beelzebul (see on ch. 10:25)—the prince of the devils—Two things are here implied—first, that the bitterest enemies of our Lord were unable to deny the reality of His miracles; and next, that they believed in an organized internal kingdom of evil, under one chief. This belief would be of small consequence, had not our Lord set His seal to it; but this He immediately does. Stung by the unsophisticated testimony of "all the people," they had no way of holding out against His claims but the desperate shift of ascribing His miracles to Satan. And Jesus knew their thoughts—"called them" (Mark 3:23). and said unto them, Every kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation; and every city or house—household—divided against itself shall not stand: And if Satan cast out Satan, he is divided against himself; how shall then his kingdom stand?—The argument here is irresistible. "No organized society can stand—whether kingdom, city, or household—when turned against itself; such intestine war is suicidal: But the works I do are destructive of Satan's kingdom: That I should be in league with Satan, therefore, is incredible and absurd."

9. And [or, therefore] I say unto you, Ask, Be importunate with God, not so much to prevail on Him to save you, as to get yourselves brought into a proper disposition to receive that mercy which He is ever disposed to give. He who is not importunate for the salvation of his soul does not feel the need of being saved; and were God to communicate His mercy to such they could not be expected to be grateful for it, as favors are prized and esteemed only in proportion to the sense men have of their necessity and importance.

13. The Holy Spirit. Or, as several MSS. have it, the good spirit. See on Matt. vii. 11.

14. Casting out a devil. See on Matt. xii. 22.

One possessed with a devil, blind, and dumb. A person from whom the indwelling demon took away both sight and hearing. Satan makes himself master of the heart, the eyes, and the tongue of the sinner. His heart he fills with the love of sin; his eyes he blinds that he may not see his guilt, and the perdition which awaits him; and his tongue he hinders from prayer and supplication, though he gives it increasing liberty in blasphemies, lies, slanders, etc. None but Jesus can redeem from this threefold captivity.

yet they applauded and admired in others that were of their own nation (v. 19): "By whom do your sons cast them out? Some of your own kindred, some of your own followers, have undertaken, in the name of the God of Israel, to cast out devils, and they were never charged with such a hellish combination." It is gross hypocrisy to condemn that in those who reprove us which yet we allow in those that flatter us.

3. That, in opposing the conviction of this miracle, they were enemies to themselves, for they thrust from them the kingdom of God (v. 20): "If I with the finger of God cast out devils, no doubt the kingdom of God is come upon you, and if you receive it not, it is at your peril." In Matthew it is by the Spirit of God, here by the finger of God. He needed not make bare his everlasting arm; that roaring lion, when he pleases, is crushed, like a moth, with a touch of a finger.

4. That his casting out devils was really the destroying of them and their power, v. 21, 22. When Christ cast out devils he was stronger than they, and could do it by force, and did it so as to ruin Satan's power. Now this is applicable to Christ's victories over Satan both in the world and in the hearts of particular persons. And so we may observe here,

(1) The miserable condition of an unconverted sinner. In his heart, which was fitted to be a habitation of God, the devil has his palace; and all the powers and faculties of the soul are his goods. The heart is a palace, a noble dwelling; but the unsanctified heart is the devil's palace. The devil, as a strong man armed, keeps this palace. All the prejudices with which he hardens men's hearts against truth and holiness are the strongholds which he erects for the keeping of his palace. There is a kind of peace in the palace of an unconverted soul, while the devil, as a strong man armed, keeps it. The sinner has a good opinion of himself, is very secure and merry; he flatters himself in his own eyes, and cries peace to himself. Before Christ appeared, all was quiet, because all went one way; but the preaching of the gospel disturbed the peace of the devil's palace.

(2) The wonderful change that is made in conversion. Satan is a strong man armed; but our Lord Jesus is stronger than he, see the manner of this victory: He comes upon him by surprise, when his goods are in peace and overcomes him. See the evidences of this victory. First, He takes from him all his armour wherein he trusted. Christ disarms him. When the power of sin and corruption in the soul is broken then Satan's armour is taken away. Secondly, He divides the spoils; he takes possession of them for himself. All the endowments of mind and body are now converted to Christ's service. Yet this is not all; he makes a distribution of them among his followers, and gives to all believers the benefit of that victory. Hence Christ infers that, since the whole drift of his doctrine and miracles was to break the power of the devil, it was the duty of all to join with him, to receive his gospel and come heartily into the interests of it; for otherwise they would justly be reckoned as siding with the enemy (v. 23): He that is not with me is against me.

5. That there was a vast difference between the devil's going out by compact and his being cast out by compulsion. Those out of whom Christ cast him he never entered into again, for so was Christ's charge (Mark ix. 25); whereas, if he had gone out, whenever he saw fit he would have made a re-entry, v. 24–26. Christ, as he gives a total, so he gives a final, defeat to the enemy. Here we have,

(1) The condition of a formal hypocrite, his bright side and his dark side. His heart still remains the devil's house, and yet [1] The unclean spirit is gone out. He was not driven out, but he went out, withdrew for a time, so that the man seemed not to be under the power of Satan as formerly. [2] The house is swept from common pollutions by a partial reformation. The house is swept, but it is not washed; the house must be washed, or it is none of his. Sweeping takes off only the loose dirt, while the sin that besets the sinner, is untouched. It is swept from the filth that lies open to the eye of the world, but it is not searched and ransacked for secret filthiness. It is swept, but the leprosy is in the wall. [3] The house is garnished with common gifts and graces. It is not furnished with any true grace, but garnished with the pictures of all graces. It is all paint and varnish, not real, not lasting. The house is garnished, but the property is not altered; it was never surrendered to Christ.

(2) Here is the condition of a final apostate, into whom the devil returns after he had gone out: Then goes he, and takes seven other spirits more wicked than himself (v. 26). These enter in without any difficulty or opposition; they are welcomed, and they dwell there; and the last state of that man is worse than the first. Hypocrisy is the high road to apostasy. Where

And if I by Beelzebub cast out devils, by whom do your children—"your sons," meaning here the "disciples" or pupils of the Pharisees, who were so termed after the familiar language of the Old Testament in speaking of the sons of the prophets (I Kings 20:35; II Kings 2:3, etc.). Our Lord here seems to admit that such works were wrought by them; in which case the Pharisees stood self-condemned, as expressed in Luke (11:19), "Therefore shall they be your judges."

20. the finger of God—"the Spirit of God" (Matt. 12:28); the former figuratively denoting the power of God, the latter the living Personal Agent in every exercise of it.

21, 22. strong man—meaning Satan. armed—pointing to all the subtle and varied methods by which he wields his dark power over men. keepeth—"guardeth." his palace—man whether viewed more largely or in individual souls—how significant of what men are to Satan! in peace—undisturbed, secure in his possession. 22. a stronger than he—Christ: Glorious title, in relation to Satan! come upon him and overcome him—sublimely expressing the Redeemer's approach, as the Seed of the woman, to bruise the Serpent's head. taketh from him all his armour—"his panoply," "his complete armor." Vain would be the victory, were not the means of regaining his lost power wrested from him. It is this that completes the triumph and ensures the final overthrow of his kingdom. The parable that immediately follows (vss. 24-26) is just the reverse of this. (See on Matt. 12:43-35.) In the one case, Satan is dislodged by Christ, and so finds, in all future assaults, the house preoccupied; in the other, he merely goes out and comes in again, finding the house "EMPTY" (Matt. 12:44) of any rival, and all ready to welcome him back. This explains the important saying that comes in between the two parables (vs. 23). Neutrality in religion there is none. The absence of positive attachment to Christ involves hostility to Him. 23. gathereth . . . scattereth—referring probably to gleaners. The meaning seems to be, Whatever in religion is disconnected from Christ comes to nothing.

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

Is there a conflict going on in you? Remember faith gets the victory. Look to Jesus—look to Jesus, and the battle is won. Cast your poor spirit upon Jesus. Now burn that broom: it is of no use to go on sweeping, you want washing—washing with blood! Come, now, spare that money of yours with which you are going to buy garnishings—they are all rubbish; buy no more. I counsel thee buy of Him gold tried in the fire. Come to His precious blood, and be really made clean. Your church-goings, your chapel-goings, your prayers, your almsgivings, your fastings, your feelings, your good works, are all nothing—so much dross and dung—if you try to sweep and garnish your house with them. Cast them all away; fly from your good works as you would from your bad ones. No more expect to be saved by anything that you can feel that is good than you would expect to be saved by anything that you feel that is bad. Only Jesus can do helpless sinners good.

19. Beelzebub. See on Matt. x. 25.

By whom do your children cast them out? Children, or sons, of the prophets means the disciples of the prophets; and children or sons of the Pharisees, disciples of the Pharisees. From Acts xix. 13-14, it is evident there were exorcists among the Jews, and from our Lord's saying here, it is also evident that the disciples of the Pharisees did cast out demons, or at least those who educated them wished to have it believed that they had such a power. Our Lord's argument here is extremely conclusive: If the man who casts our demons proves himself thereby to be in league with and influenced by Satan, then your disciples, and you who taught them, are all of you in league with the devil.

20. Finger of God. See on Exod. viii. 19.

This is the finger of God. That is, The power and skill of God are here evident. Probably before this the magicians supposed Moses and Aaron to be conjurers, like themselves; but now they are convinced that no man could do these miracles which these holy men did, unless God were with him. God permits evil spirits to manifest themselves in a certain way that men may see that there is a spiritual world and be on their guard against seduction. He at the same time shows that all these agents are under His control, that men may have confidence in His goodness and power.

Else how can one enter into a strong man's house? Men, through sin, are become the very house and dwelling place of Satan, having of their own accord surrendered themselves to this unjust possessor; for whoever gives up his soul to sin gives it up to the devil. It is Jesus, and Jesus alone, who can deliver from the power of this bondage. When Satan is cast out, Jesus purifies and dwells in the heart.

He that is not with me is against me. There is no medium between loving the Lord and being His enemy—between belonging to Christ or to Satan. If we be on the side of the devil, we must expect to go to the devil's hell; if we be on the side of Christ, we may expect to go to His heaven.

Scattereth abroad. This seems to have been a proverbial form of speech, and may be a metaphor taken from shepherds. He who does not help the true shepherd to gather his flock into the fold is, most likely, one who wishes to scatter them, that he may have the opportunity of stealing and destroying them.

Into my house. The soul of that person from whom he had been expelled by the power of Christ, and out of which he was to have been kept by continual prayer, faith, and watchfulness. He findeth it empty. "Unoccupied," empty of the former inhabitant, and ready to receive a new one, denoting a soul that has lost the life and power of godliness and the testimony of the Holy Spirit. Swept, and garnished. Idle, or unemployed, it may refer here to the person as well as to his state. His affections and desires are no longer busied with the things of God, but gad about, like an idle person, among the vanities of a perishing world. Swept, from love, meekness, and all the fruits of the Spirit; and garnished, "adorned, decorated," with the vain, showy trifles of folly and fashion.

Seven other spirits more wicked. Seven was a favorite number with the Jews, implying frequently, with them, something "perfect, completed, filled up," for such is the proper import of the Hebrew word sheva or shevang, nearly allied in sound to our seven. The last state of that man is worse than the first. His soul, before influenced by the Spirit of God, dilated and ex-secret haunts of sin are kept up conscience is debauched, and the close hypocrite commonly proves an open apostate. The last state of such is worse than the first, in respect both of sin and punishment. Apostates are usually the worst of men; their consciences are seared, and their sins of all others the most aggravated. In the other world they will receive the greater damnation.

We had not this passage in the other evangelists.

1. The applause which an affectionate, honest, well-meaning woman gave to our Lord Jesus, upon hearing his excellent discourses. This good woman admired them: As he spoke these things (v. 27), a certain woman of the company was so pleased that she could not forbear crying out, "Blessed is the womb that bore thee. Happy the woman that has thee for her son. I should have thought myself very happy to have been the mother of one that speaks as never man spoke, that has so much of the grace of heaven in him, and is so great a blessing to this earth." To all that believe the word of Christ the person of Christ is precious.

2. The occasion which Christ took from this to pronounce them more happy who are his faithful and obedient followers than she was who bore and nursed him. Yea, rather, blessed are they that hear the word of God, and keep it, v. 28. This is intended partly as a check to her, for doting so much upon his bodily presence, partly as an encouragement to her to hope that she might be as happy as his own mother, if she would hear the word of God and keep it. Those only are truly blessed that hear it and keep it.

I. What is the sign we may expect from God for the confirmation of our faith. The great and most convincing proof of Christ's being sent of God was the resurrection of Christ from the dead.

1. A reproof to the people for demanding other signs than what had already been given them in great plenty: The people were gathered thickly together (v. 29), a vast crowd of them. Christ knew what brought such a multitude together; they came seeking a sign, they came to gaze, to have something to talk of when they went home.

2. A promise that yet there should be one sign more given them, even the sign of Jonas the prophet, which in Matthew is explained as meaning the resurrection of Christ. But, if this do not work upon them, let them look for nothing but utter ruin: The Son of man shall be a sign to this generation (v. 30), a sign speaking to them, though a sign spoken against by them.

3. A warning to them to improve this sign. The queen of Sheba would rise up in judgment against them, and condemn their unbelief, v. 31. She was a stranger to the commonwealth of Israel, and yet she came from the uttermost parts of the earth to hear his wisdom, not only to satisfy her curiosity, but to inform her mind; and, behold, a greater than Solomon is here. Yet these wretched Jews will give no manner of regard to what Christ says to them, though he be in the midst of them. The Ninevites would rise up in judgment against them (v. 32): They repented at the preaching of Jonas; but here is preaching which far exceeds that of Jonas, and yet none are startled by it, to turn from their evil way, as the Ninevites did.

II. What is the sign that God expects from us for the evidencing of our faith, and that is the serious practice of that religion which we profess to believe.

1. They had the light. For God, having lighted the candle of the gospel, did not put it in a secret place, or under a bushel; Christ did not preach in corners. It is a great privilege that the light of the gospel is put on a candlestick, so that all that come in may see it, and may see by it.

2. Having the light, their concern was to have the sight. Be the object ever so clear, if the organ be not right, we are never the better: The light of the body is the eye (v. 34). So the light of the soul is its power of discerning between good and evil, truth and falsehood. Now, according as this is, so the light of divine revelation is to us, and our benefit by it. (1) If this eye of the soul be single, if it see clear, if it aim at truth only, and seek it for its own sake the whole body, that is, the whole soul, is full of light. If our understanding admits the gospel in its full light, it fills the soul, and it has enough to fill it. And if the soul be thus filled, having no part dark, then the whole soul shall be full of light. It was darkness itself, but is now light in the Lord, as when the bright shining of a candle doth give thee light, v. 36. The gospel will come into those souls whose doors and 27, 28. as he spake these things, a . . . woman of the company—of the multitude, the crowd. A charming little incident and profoundly instructive. With true womanly feeling, she envies the mother of such a wonderful Teacher. Well, and higher and better than she had said as much before her (ch. 1:28. 42); and our Lord is far from condemning it. He only holds up—as "blessed rather"—the hearers and keepers of God's word; in other words, the humblest real saint of God. (See on Matt. 12:49, 50). How utterly alien is this sentiment from the teaching of the Church of Rome, which would excommunicate any one of its members who dared to talk in the spirit of this glorious saying!

An evil and adulterous generation—This latter expression is best explained by Jeremiah 3:20, "Surely as a wife treacherously departeth from her husband, so have ye dealt treacherously with Me, O house of Israel, saith the Lord." For this was the relationship in which He stood to the covenant people—"I am married unto you" (Jer. 3:14). seeketh after a sign—In the eye of Jesus this class were but the spokesmen of their generation, the exponents of the reigning spirit of unbelief. and there shall no sign be given to it, but the sign of the prophet Jonas.

The men of Nineveh shall rise in judgment with this generation, . . .—The Ninevites, though heathens, repented at a man's preaching; while they, God's covenant people, repented not at the preaching of the Son of God—whose supreme dignity is rather implied here than expressed.

The queen of the south shall rise up in the judgment with this generation . . .—The queen of Sheba (a tract in Arabia, near the shores of the Red Sea) came from a remote country, "south" of Judea, to hear the wisdom of a mere man, though a gifted one, and was transported with wonder at what she saw and heard (I Kings 10:1-9). They, when a Greater than Solomon had come to them, despised and rejected, slighted and slandered Him.

33-36. (See on Matt. 5:14-16; 6:22, 23.) But vs. 36 here is peculiarly vivid, expressing what pure, beautiful, broad perceptions the clarity of the inward eye imparts.

The light [the lamp] of the body is the eye: if therefore thine eye be single—simple, clear. As applied to the outward eye, this means general soundness; particularly, not looking two ways. Here, as also in classical Greek, it is used figuratively to denote the simplicity of the mind's eye, singleness of purpose, looking right at its object, as opposed to having two ends in view. (See Prov. 4:25-27.) thy whole body shall be full of light—illuminated. As with the bodily vision, the man who looks with a good, sound eye, walks in light, seeing every object clear; so a simple and persistent purpose to serve and please God in everything will make the whole character consistent and bright. But if thine eye be evil—distempered, or, as we should say, If we have got a bad eye—thy whole body shall be full of darkness—darkened. As a vitiated eye, or an eye that looks not straight and full at its object, sees nothing as it is, so a mind and heart divided between heaven and earth is all dark. If therefore the light panded under its heavenly influences, becomes more capable of refinement in iniquity, as its powers are more capacious than formerly. Evil habits are formed and strengthened by relapses; and relapses are multiplied, and become more incurable, through new habits.

27. A certain woman . . . lifted up her voice, and said. It was very natural for a woman, who was probably a mother, to exclaim thus. She thought that the happiness of the woman who was mother to such a Son was great indeed; but our blessed Lord shows her that even the holy Virgin could not be benefited by her merely being the mother of His human nature, and that only they were happy who carried Christ in their hearts. True happiness is found in hearing the glad tidings of salvation by Christ Jesus, and keeping them in a holy heart, and practicing them in an unblamable life.

29. This is an evil generation. Or, "This is a wicked race of men." See on Matt. xii. 38-42.

An evil and adulterous generation. Or "race of people." Our Lord terms the Jews an adulterous race. Under the old covenant, the Jewish nation was represented as in a marriage contract with the Lord of hosts, as believers in the new covenant are represented as the spouse of Christ. All unfaithfulness and disobedience was considered as a breach of this marriage contract; hence the persons who were thus guilty are denominated adulterers and adulteresses.

The queen of the south. In 1 Kings x. 1, this queen is said to be of Saba, which was a city and province of Arabia Felix, to the south, or southeast, of Judea. Uttermost parts of the earth. A form of speech which merely signifies "a great distance."

33. No man, when he hath lighted. See on Matt. v. 15. Our Lord intimates that if He worked a miracle among such an obstinate people, who were determined to disbelieve every evidence of His messiahship, He should act as a man who lighted a candle and then covered it with a bushel, which must prevent the accomplishment of the end for which it was lighted.

34. The light of the body is the eye. Or, "The eye is the lamp of the body." See on Matt. vi. 22.

36. The whole shall be full of light. Or "altogether enlightened"; i.e., when the eye is perfect, it enlightens the whole body. Every object within the reach of the eye is as completely seen as if there was an eye in every windows are thrown open to receive it. (2) If the eye of the soul be evil, it is no wonder that the whole body, the whole soul, should be full of darkness, v. 34. The inference hence therefore is, Take heed that the light which is in thee be not darkness, v. 35. Be sincere in your enquiries after truth, and ready to receive the light, and love, and power of it; and not as the men of this generation to whom Christ preached, who never sincerely desired to know God's will, nor designed to do it, and therefore no wonder that they walked on in darkness.

Christ here says many of those things to a Pharisee and his guests, in a private conversation at table, which he afterwards said in a public discourse in the temple (Matt. 23); for what he said in public and private was of a piece.

I. Christ's going to dine with a Pharisee that very civilly invited him to his house (v. 37): As he spoke a certain Pharisee interrupted him with a request to him to come and dine with him. We know not the mind of this Pharisee; but, whatever it was, Christ knew it: if he meant ill, he shall know Christ does not fear him; if well, he shall know Christ is willing to do him good: so he went in, and sat down to meat. Christ's disciples must learn of him to be conversable, and not morose. Though we have need to be cautious what company we keep, yet we need not be rigid.

II. The offence which the Pharisee took at Christ for not washing before dinner, v. 38. He wondered that a man of his sanctity should sit down to meat, and not first wash his hands; the Pharisee himself and all his guests, no doubt, washing. The ceremonial law consisted in divers washings, but this was none of them, and therefore Christ would not practise it, though he knew that offence would be taken at his omitting it.

III. The sharp reproof which Christ gave to the Pharisees.

1. He reproves them for placing religion so much in those instances of it which are only external, and fall under the eye of man, while those were not only postponed, but quite expunged, which respect the soul, and fall under the eye of God, v. 39, 40. (1) The absurdity they were guilty of: "You Pharisees make clean the outside only, you wash your hands with water, but do not wash your hearts from wickedness." Those can never be reckoned cleanly servants that wash only the outside of the cup or the platter, and take no care to make clean the inside. The frame or temper of the mind in every religious service is as the inside of the cup and platter; the impurity of this infects the services. To live under the dominion of spiritual wickedness, is as great an affront to God as it would be for a servant to give the cup into his master's hand, clean wiped from all the dust on the outside, but within full of cobwebs and spiders. Ravening and wickedness are the dangerous damning sins of many who have made the outside of the cup clean from the more gross, and scandalous, and inexcusable sins of whoredom and drunkenness. (2) A particular instance of the absurdity of it, "Ye fools, did not he that made that which is without make that which is within also? (v. 40). Did not that God who in the law of Moses appointed divers ceremonial washings, appoint also that you should cleanse and purify your hearts? He who made laws for that which is without, did not he even in those laws further intend something within. Did not God, who made us these bodies, make us these souls also? Now, if he made both, he justly expects we should take care of both; and therefore not only wash the body, but wash the spirit, which he is the Father of, and get the leprosy in the heart cleansed?"

To this he subjoins a rule for making our creature-comforts clean to us (v. 41): "Instead of washing your hands before you go to meat, give alms of such things as you have, let the poor have their share out of them, and then all things are clean to you, and you may use them comfortably." Here is a plain allusion to the law of Moses, by which it was provided that certain portions of the increase of their land should be given to the Levite, the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow; and, when that was done, what was reserved for their own use was clean to them. Deut. xxvi. 12–15. Then we can with comfort enjoy the gifts of God's bounty ourselves when we send portions to them for whom nothing is prepared. What we have is not our own, unless God have his dues out of it; and it is by liberality to the poor that we clear up to ourselves our liberty to make use of our creature-comforts.

2. He reproves them for laying stress upon trifles, and neglecting the weighty matters of the law, v. 42. Those laws which related only to the means of religion that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness!—As the conscience is the regulative faculty, and a man's inward purpose, scope, aim in life, determines his character—if these be not simple and heavenward, but distorted and double, what must all the other faculties and principles of our nature be which take their direction and character from these, and what must the whole man and the whole life be but a mass of darkness? In Luke (11: 36) the converse of this statement very strikingly expresses what pure, beautiful, broad perceptions the clarity of the inward eye imparts: "If thy whole body therefore be full of light, having no part dark, the whole shall be full of light, as when the bright shining of a candle doth give thee light." But now for the application of this.

37-54. DENUNCIATION OF THE PHARISEES. 38. marvelled . . .—(See on Mark 7:2-4).

39-41. cup and platter—remarkable example of our Lord's way of drawing the most striking illustrations of great truths from the most familiar objects and incidents of life. ravening—rapacity.

40. that which is without . . .—i.e., He to whom belongs the outer life, and right to demand its subjection to Himself—is the inner man less His?

41. give alms . . . and . . . all . . . clean—a principle of immense value. As the greed of these hypocrites was one of the most prominent features of their character (ch. 16:14; Matt. 23:14), our Lord bids them exemplify the opposite character, and then their outside, ruled by this, would be beautiful in the eye of God, and their meals would be eaten with clean hands, though never so fouled with the business of this worky world. (See Eccles. 9:7.)

part. So the eye is to every part of the body what the lamp is to every part of the house. When the light of Christ dwells fully in the heart, it extends its influence to every thought, word, and action, and directs its possessor how he is to act in all places and circumstances.

37. To dine. The word signifies the first eating of the day. The Jews made but two meals in the day; their ariston may be called their "breakfast" or their "dinner," because it was both, and was but a slight meal. Their chief meal was their supper, after the heat of the day was over; and the same was the principal meal among the Greeks and Romans.

38. First washed. See on Mark vii. 2-4.

Except they wash their hands. The hand to the wrist—"Unless they wash the hand up to the wrist, eat not." This sort of washing was, and still continues to be, an act of religion in the Eastern countries. It is particularly commanded in the Koran, Surat, v, v. 7, "O believers, when ye wish to pray, wash your faces, and your hands up to the elbows—and your feet up to the ankles," which custom it is likely Mohammed borrowed from the Jews. The Jewish doctrine is this: "If a man neglect the washing, he shall be eradicated from this world."

Except they wash. Or "dip." But instead of the word in the text, the famous Codex Vaticanus (B), eight others, and Euthymius have sprinkle. However the Jews sometimes washed their hands previously to their eating; at other times they simply dipped or plunged them into the water. Of cups. Any kind of earthen vessels. Pots. "Of measures," a measure for liquids, formed from the Latin sextarius, equal to a pint and a half English. Of brasen vessels. These, if polluted, were only to be washed or passed through the fire, whereas the earthen vessels were to be broken. And of tables. "Beds, couches." This is wanting in some MSS.

40. Did not he that made that which is without? God has made you such, both as to your bodies and souls, as He intended should show forth His praise. But can you think that the purpose of God can be accomplished by you while you attend only to external legal purifications, your hearts being full of rapine and wickedness?

41. Give alms of such things as ye have. Meaning either what was within the dishes spoken of before, or what was within their houses or power, or what they had "at hand." Far from spoiling the poor by wicked exactions, rather give them alms of everything you possess; and when a part of everything you have is sincerely consecrated to God for the use of the poor, then all that remains will be clean unto you. You will have the blessing of God in your basket and store, and everything will be sanctified to you. These verses are very difficult, and are variously translated and interpreted by critics and divines. I have given what I believe to be our Lord's meaning, in the preceding paraphrase.

they were very exact in the observance of: Ye pay tithe of mint and rue, pay it in kind and to the full. By this they would gain a reputation with the people as strict observers of the law. Now Christ does not condemn them for being so exact in paying tithes (these things ought ye to have done), but for thinking that this would atone for the neglect of their greater duties. Those laws which relate to the essentials of religion they made nothing of: You pass over judgment and the love of God, you make no conscience of giving men their dues and God your hearts.

3. He reproves them for their pride and vanity (v. 43): "Ye love the uppermost seats in the synagogues, and you love greetings in the markets." It is not sitting uppermost, or being greeted, that is reproved, but loving it.

4. He reproves them for their hypocrisy (v. 44): "You are as graves overgrown with grass, which therefore appear not, and the men that walk over them are not aware of them, and so they contract the ceremonial pollution which by the law arose from the touch of a grave." These Pharisees were within full of abominations, as a grave of putrefaction; and yet they concealed it so artfully that it did not appear, so that they who conversed with them, and followed their doctrine, were infected with their corruptions and ill morals, and yet suspected no danger by them. The contagion insinuated itself, and was insensibly caught, and those that caught it thought themselves never the worse.

IV. The testimony which he bore also against the lawyers or scribes, who made it their business to expound the law, as the Pharisees did to observe the law.

1. There was one of that profession who resented what he said against the Pharisees (v. 45): "Master, thus saying thou reproachest us also." It is the folly of those who are wedded to their sins, and resolved not to part with them, to make an ill use of the faithful and friendly admonitions given them, which come from love, and to have their passions provoked by them as if they were intended for reproaches. This lawyer espoused the Pharisee's cause, and so made himself partaker of his sins.

2. Our Lord Jesus thereupon took them to task (v. 46): Woe unto you also, ye lawyers; and again (v. 52): Woe unto you, lawyers. They blessed themselves in the reputation they had among the people, but Christ denounced woes against them, for he sees not as man sees. Those who quarrel with the reproofs of others, and suspect them to be reproaches to them, do but get woes of their own by so doing.

(1) The lawyers are reproved for making the services of religion more burdensome to others, but more easy to themselves, than God had made them (v. 46): "You lade men with burdens grievous to be borne, but you yourselves touch them not with one of your fingers"; that is, [1] "You will not burden yourselves with them, nor be yourselves bound by those restraints with which you hamper others." [2] "You will not lighten them, you will not touch them, that is, either to repeal them or to dispense with them when you find them to be burdensome and grievous to the people." They would come in with both hands to dispense with a command of God, but not with a finger to mitigate the rigour of any of the traditions of the elders.

(2) They are reproved for pretending a veneration for the memory of the prophets whom their fathers killed, when yet they hated and persecuted those in their own day who were sent to them on the same errand, v. 47-49. [1] These hypocrites built the sepulchres of the prophets; that is, they erected monuments over their graves, in honour of them. They were not so superstitious as to enshrine their relics, or to think their devotions the more acceptable to God for being offered at the tombs of the martyrs; but, as if they owned themselves the children of the prophets, they repaired and beautified the monuments sacred to their pious memory. [2] Notwithstanding this, they had an inveterate enmity to those in their own day that came to them in the spirit and power of those prophets. For the Wisdom of God said that they would slay and persecute the prophets and apostles that would be sent them. The Wisdom of God would thus make trial of them by sending them prophets, to reprove them for their sins and warn them of the judgments of God. "I will send them prophets under the style and title of apostles, and these they shall not only contradict and oppose, but slay and persecute, and put to death." [3] Therefore God will justly put another construction upon their building the tombs of the prophets, and it shall be interpreted their allowing the deeds of their fathers (v. 45); the building of their sepulchres shall have this sense put upon it, that they resolved to keep them in their graves whom their fathers had

42. mint . . . rue . . .—founding on Leviticus 27:30, which they interpreted rigidly. Our Lord purposely names the most trifling products of the earth, as examples of what they punctiliously exacted the tenth of. judgment and the love of God—in Matthew 23:25, "judgment, mercy, and faith." The reference is to Micah 6:6-8, whose third element of all acceptable religion, "walking humbly with God," comprehends both "love" and "faith." (See on Mark 12:29, 32, 33.) The same tendency to merge greater duties in less besets us still, but it is the characteristic of hypocrites. these ought ye . . .—There is no need for one set of duties to jostle out another; but of the greater, our Lord says, "Ye ought to have done" them; of the lesser, only "ye ought not to leave them undone." 43. uppermost seats—See on ch. 14:7-11. greetings—(See on Matt. 23:7-10). 44. appear not . . .—As one might unconsciously walk over a grave concealed from view, and thus contract ceremonial defilement, so the plausible exterior of the Pharisees kept people from perceiving the pollution they contracted from coming in contact with such corrupt characters. (See Ps. 5:9; Rom. 3:13; a different illustration from Matt. 23:27.)

46. burdens grievous . . .—referring not so much to the irksomeness of the legal rites (though they were irksome, Acts 15:10), as to the heartless rigor with which they were enforced, and by men of shameless inconsistency.

47, 48. ye build . . .—Out of pretended respect and honor, they repaired and beautified the sepulchres of the prophets, and with whining hypocrisy said, "If we had been in the days of our fathers, we should not have been partakers with them in the blood of the prophets," while all the time they "were witnesses to themselves that they were the children of them that killed the prophets" (Matt. 23:29, 30); convicting themselves daily of as exact a resemblance in spirit and character to the very classes over whose deeds they pretended to mourn, as child to parent. 49-51. said the wisdom . . .—a remarkable variation of the words in Matthew 23:34, "Behold I SEND." As there seems plainly an allusion to ancient warnings of what God would do with so incorrigible a people, so here Christ, stepping majestically into the place of God, so to speak, says, "Now I am going to carry all that out." Could this be other than the Lord of Israel in the flesh?

ADAM CLARKE

42. Ye tithe mint and rue. See on Matt. xxiii. 23.

43. Ye love the uppermost seats. Every one of them affected to be a ruler in the synagogues.

44. Ye are as graves which appear not. In Matt. xxiii. 27 our Lord tells them that they exactly resembled whitewashed tombs; they had no fairness but on the outside. But here He says they are like hidden tombs, graves which were not distinguished by any outward decorations, and were not elevated above the ground, so that those who walked over them did not consider what corruption was within. So they, under the veil of hypocrisy, covered their iniquities, so that those who had any intercourse or connection with them did not perceive what accomplished knaves they had to do with.

45. Thou reproachest us. He alone who searches the heart could unmask these hypocrites; and He did it so effectually that their own consciences acknowledged the guilt, and re-echoed their own reproach.

46. Ye lade men with burdens. By insisting on the observance of the traditions of the elders, to which it appears, by the way, they paid no great attention themselves. See on Matt. xxiii. 4.

47. Ye build the sepulchres. That is, you rebuild and beautify them.

48. Truly ye bear witness. You acknowledge that those of old who killed the prophets were your fathers, and you are about to show, by your conduct towards Me and My apostles, that you are as capable of murdering a prophet now as they were of old.

49. The wisdom of God. These seem to be Luke's words, and to mean that Jesus, the wisdom of God (as He is called, 1 Cor. i. 24), added the words which follow here, on that occasion; and this interpretation of the words is agreeable to that of Matthew, who makes Jesus speak in His own person: "Wherefore, behold, I send unto you prophets," Matt. xxiii. 34.

hurried thither. [4] They must expect no other than to be reckoned with, as the fillers up of the measure of persecution, v. 50, 51. It shall all be required of this generation whose sin in persecuting Christ's apostles would exceed any of the sins of that kind that their fathers were guilty of. Their destruction by the Romans was so terrible that it might well be reckoned the completing of God's vengeance upon that persecuting nation.

(3) They are reproved for opposing the gospel of Christ, v. 52. They had not, according to the duty of their place, faithfully expounded to the people those scriptures of the Old Testament which pointed at the Messiah. Instead of that, they had perverted those texts by their corrupt glosses upon them, and this is called taking away the key of knowledge; instead of using that key for the people, and helping them to use it aright, they hid it from them; this is called, in Matthew, shutting up the kingdom of heaven against men, Matt. xxiii. 13. They themselves did not embrace the gospel of Christ, though by their acquaintance with the Old Testament they could not but know that the time was fulfilled, and the kingdom of God was at hand, and yet would not themselves enter into it. Them that without any guidance or assistance of theirs were entering in they did all they could to hinder and discourage, by threatening to cast them out of the synagogue. It is bad for people to be averse to revelation, but much worse to be adverse to it.

Lastly, In the close of the chapter we are told how spitefully and maliciously the scribes and Pharisees contrived to draw him into a snare, v. 53, 54. They could not bear those cutting reproofs which they must own to be just, as if, because his reproofs were warm, they hoped to stir him up to some intemperate heat and passion, so as to put him off his guard, they began to urge him vehemently, and to provoke him to speak of many things, laying wait for something which might serve the design they had of making him either odious to the people, or obnoxious to the government, or both. Faithful reprovers of sin must expect to have many enemies. That we may bear trials of this kind with patience, and get through them with prudence, let us consider him who endured such contradiction of sinners against himself.

50. all . . . required of this generation—As it was only in the last generation of them that "the iniquity of the Amorites was full" (Gen. 15:16), and then the abominations of ages were at once completely and awfully avenged, so the iniquity of Israel was allowed to accumulate from age to age till in that generation it came to the full, and the whole collected vengeance of Heaven broke at once over its devoted head. In the first French Revolution the same awful principle was exemplified, and Christendom has not done with it yet. prophets—in the New Testament sense (Matt. 23:34; see I Cor. 12:28). 51. blood of Zacharias—Probably the allusion is not to any recent murder, but to II Chronicles 24:20-22, as the last recorded and most suitable case for illustration. And as Zacharias' last words were, "The Lord require it," so they are warned that "of that generation it should be required." 52. key of knowledge—not the key to open knowledge, but knowledge, the only key to open heaven. In Matthew 23:13, they are accused of shutting heaven; here of taking away the key, which was worse. A right knowledge of God's Word is eternal life (John 17:3); but this they took away from the people, substituting for it their wretched traditions.

53, 54. Exceedingly vivid and affecting. They were stung to the quick—and can we wonder?—yet had not materials for the charge they were preparing against Him. provoke him . . .—"to harass Him with questions."

ADAM CLARKE

50. That the blood. That the particle may be translated "so that," pointing out the event only, nor the design or intention, Bishop Pearce has well shown in his note on this place, where he refers to a like use of the word in chap. ix. 45; xiv. 20; John x. 17; Rom. v. 20; xi. 11; 1 Cor. i. 15, 31.

51. From the blood of Abel. See this subject explained at large on Matt. xxiii. 35. Required. May be translated either by the word "visited" or "revenged," and the latter word evidently conveys the meaning of our Lord. They are here represented as having this blood among them; and it is intimated that God will come by and by to require it, and to inquire how it was shed, and to punish those who shed it.

52. Ye have taken away the key of knowledge. By your traditions you have taken away the true method of interpreting the prophecies; you have given a wrong meaning to those scriptures which speak of the kingdom of the Messiah, and the people are thereby hindered from entering into it.

53. Began to urge him vehemently. They "began to be furious." They found themselves completely unmasked in the presence of a vast concourse of people. They therefore questioned Him on a variety of points, and hoped by the multitude and impertinence of their questions to puzzle or irritate Him, so as to induce Him to "speak rashly" (for this is the import of the word), that they might find some subject of accusation against Him.

Verses 1-12

I. A vast auditory that was got together to hear Christ preach. The scribes and Pharisees sought to accuse him, but the people still admired him, attended on him, and did him honour. In the meantime (v. 1), while he was in the Pharisee's house, the people got together for an afternoon sermon, a sermon after dinner, after dinner with a Pharisee; and he would not disappoint them. Though in the morning sermon, when they were gathered thickly together (ch. xi. 29), he had severely reproved them, yet they renewed their attendance on him; so much better could the people bear their reproofs than the Pharisees theirs. The more the Pharisees strove to drive the people from Christ, the more flocking there was to him. Here was an innumerable multitude of people gathered together, so that they trode one upon another. It is a good sight to see people thus forward to hear the word. When the net is cast where there is such a multitude of fish, it may be hoped that some will be enclosed.

II. The instructions which he gave his followers.

1. He began with a caution against hypocrisy. This he said to his disciples first of all. These were his more peculiar charge, and therefore he particularly warned them as his beloved sons; they made more profession of religion than others, and hypocrisy in that was the sin they were most in danger of. Hypocrisy would be worse in them than in others. Christ's disciples were, for aught we know, the best men then in the world, yet they needed to be cautioned against hypocrisy. Christ said this to the disciples, in the hearing of this great multitude, to add the greater weight to the caution, and to let the world know that he would not countenance hypocrisy, no, not in his own disciples.

(1) The description of that sin which he warns them against: It is the leaven of the Pharisees. It is leaven; it is spreading as leaven, insinuating itself into the whole man, and all that he does; it is swelling and souring as leaven, for it puffs men up with pride, embitters them with malice, and makes their service unacceptable to God. It is the leaven of the Pharisees: "It is the sin they are most of them found in. Take heed of imitating them; do not dissemble in Christianity as they do in Judaism."

(2) A good reason against it: "For there is nothing

CHAPTER 12

Vss. 1-12. WARNING AGAINST HYPOCRISY. 1-3. meantime—in close connection, probably, with the foregoing scene. Our Lord had been speaking out more plainly than ever before, as matters were coming to a head between Him and His enemies, and this seems to have suggested to His own mind the warning here. He had just Himself illustriously exemplified His own precepts.

his disciples first of all—afterwards to "the multitudes" (vs. 54).

1. An innumerable multitude of people. "Myriads of people." A myriad is 10,000, and myriads must, at the very lowest, mean 20,000. But the word is often used to signify a crowd or multitude which cannot be readily numbered. There was doubtless a vast crowd assembled on this occasion, and many of them were deeply instructed by the very important discourse which our Lord delivered.

Leaven of the Pharisees. See Matt. xvi. 1-12. Which is hypocrisy. These words are supposed by some to be an addition to the text, because it does not appear that it is their hypocrisy to which Christ alludes, but their false doctrines. They had, however, a large proportion of both.

covered that shall not be revealed, v. 2, 3. Sooner or later, truth will come out. If you speak in darkness that which is inconsistent with your public professions, it shall be heard in the light; some way or other it shall be discovered, and your folly and falsehood will be made manifest." If men's religion prevail not to conquer and cure the wickedness of their hearts, it shall not always serve for a cloak. The day is coming when hypocrites will be stripped of their fig-leaves.

2. To this he added a charge to them to be faithful to the trust reposed in them, and not to betray it, through cowardice or base fear. "Whether men will hear, or whether they will forbear, tell them the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; what has been spoken to you privately, that do you preach publicly, whoever is offended." It was likely to be a suffering cause, though never a sinking one; let them therefore arm themselves with courage; and divers arguments are furnished here to steel them with a holy resolution in their work.

(1) "The power of your enemies is a limited power (v. 4): I say unto you, my friends" (Christ's disciples are his friends, he calls them friends, and gives them this friendly advice), "be not afraid." Those whom Christ owns for his friends need not be afraid of any enemies. "Be not afraid, no, not of them that kill the body; after that there is no more that they can do." Those can do Christ's disciples no real harm who can but kill the body, for they only send that to its rest, and the soul to its joy, the sooner.

(2) God is to be feared more than the most powerful men: "I will forewarn you whom you shall fear (v. 5). By owning Christ you may incur the wrath of men, but by denying Christ, and disowning him, you will incur the wrath of God, which has power to send you to hell. Therefore I say unto you, Fear him." "It is true," said that blessed martyr, Bishop Hooper, "life is sweet, and death bitter; but eternal life is more sweet, and eternal death more bitter."

(3) The lives of good Christians and good ministers are the particular care of divine Providence, v. 6, 7. Providence takes cognizance of the meanest creatures, even of the sparrows. "Though they are of such small account that five of them are sold for two farthings, yet not one of them is forgotten of God. Now, you are of more value than many sparrows, and therefore you may be sure you are not forgotten." Providence takes cognizance of the meanest interest of the disciples of Christ: "Even the very hairs of your head are all numbered (v. 7); much more are your sighs and tears numbered, and the drops of your blood, which you shed for Christ's name's sake."

(4) "You will be owned or disowned by Christ, according as you now own or disown him," v. 8, 9. To engage us to confess Christ before men, how dear soever it may cost us, we are assured that they who confess Christ now shall be owned by him in the great day before the angels of God. Jesus Christ will confess, not only that he suffered for them, but that they suffered for him, and what greater honour can be done them? To deter us from denying Christ we are here assured that those who deny Christ, whatever they may save by it, though it were life itself, and whatever they may gain by it, will be vast losers at last, for they shall be denied before the angels of God; Christ will not know them, will not own them.

(5) The errand they were shortly to be sent out upon was of the highest and last importance, v. 10. Let them be bold in preaching the gospel, for a sorer and heavier doom would attend those that rejected them (after the Spirit was poured upon them, which was to be the last method of conviction) than those that now rejected Christ himself. "Whosoever shall speak a word against the Son of man, it is capable of some excuse: Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. But unto him that blasphemes the Holy Ghost, the privilege of the forgiveness of sins shall be denied; he shall have no benefit by Christ and his gospel." There were hopes of those who, though not convinced by them at first, yet admired them, but those who blasphemed them were given over.

(6) Whatever trials they should be called out to, they should be sufficiently furnished for them, and honourably brought through them, v. 11, 12. The faithful martyr for Christ has not only sufferings to undergo, but a testimony to bear, a good confession to witness, and is concerned to do that well, so that the cause of Christ may not suffer, though he suffer for it; and, if this be his care, let him cast it upon God: "When they bring you into the synagogues, or before magistrates and powers, to be examined about your doctrine, take no thought what ye shall answer," [1] "That you may save yourselves. If it be the will of God that you should come off, and your time is not yet come, he will bring it about effectually." [2] "That you may serve your Master; aim at this, but do not perplex yourselves about it, for the Holy covered—from the view. 2. hid—from knowledge. "Tis no use concealing anything, for all will one day come out. Give free and fearless utterance then to all the truth." (Cf. I Cor. 4:3, 5).

4, 5. I say . . .—You will say, That may cost us our life. Be it so; but, "My friends,' there their power ends." He calls them "my friends" here, not in any loose sense, but, as we think, from the feeling He then had that in this "killing of the body" He and they were going to be affectingly one with each other. Fear Him . . .—Fear Him—how striking the repetition here! Only the one fear would effectually expel the other. after he hath killed . . .—Learn here—(1) To play false with one's convictions to save one's life, may fail of its end after all, for God can inflict a violent death in some other and equally formidable way. (2) There is a hell, it seems, for the body as well as the soul; consequently, sufferings adapted to the one as well as the other. (3) Fear of hell is a divinely authorized and needed motive of action even to Christ's "friends." (4) As Christ's meekness and gentleness were not compromised by such harsh notes as these, so those servants of Christ lack their Master's spirit who soften down all such language to please ears 'polite.' (See on Mark 9:43-48.) 6, 7. five . . . for two farthings—In Matthew 10:29 it is two for one farthing"; so if one took two farthings' worth, he got one in addition—of such small value were they. than many sparrows—not "than millions of sparrows"; the charm and power of our Lord's teaching is very much in this simplicity.

8, 9. confess . . . deny . . .—The point lies in doing it "before men," because one has to do it "despising the shame." But when done, the Lord holds Himself bound to repay it in kind by confessing such "before the angels of God." For the rest, see on ch. 9:26.

10. Son of man . . . Holy Ghost—(See on Matt. 12:31, 32).

What, then, is this sin against the Holy Ghost—the unpardonable sin? One thing is clear: Its unpardonableness cannot arise from anything in the nature of sin itself; for that would be a naked contradiction to the emphatic declaration of vs. 31, that all manner of sin is pardonable. And what is this but the fundamental truth of the Gospel? (See Acts 13:38, 39; Rom. 3:22, 24; I John 1:7, etc.). Then, again when it is said (vs. 32), that to speak against or blaspheme the Son of man is pardonable, but the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost is not pardonable, it is not to be conceived that this arises from any greater sanctity in the one blessed Person than the other. These remarks so narrow the question that the true sense of our Lord's words seem to disclose themselves at once. It is a contrast between slandering "the Son of man" in His veiled condition and unfinished work—which might be done "ignorantly, in unbelief" (I Tim. 1:13), and slandering the same blessed Person after the blaze of glory which the Holy Ghost was soon to throw around His claims, and in the full knowledge of all

2. There is nothing covered. See the notes on Matt. v. 15; x. 26-27; Mark iv. 22.

For there is nothing covered. God sees everything; this is consolation to the upright, and dismay to the wicked. And He will bring into judgment every work, and every secret thing, whether good or bad, Eccles. xii. 14.

5. Fear him. Even the friends of God are commanded to fear God, as a Being who has authority to send both body and soul into hell. Therefore it is proper even for the most holy persons to maintain a fear of God, as the Punisher of all unrighteousness.

6. Are not five sparrows sold for two farthings? See this explained on Matt. x. 29, from which place we learn that two sparrows were sold for one farthing, and here that five were sold for two farthings.

7. Fear not therefore. Want of faith in the providence and goodness of God is the source of all human inquietudes and fears. He has undertaken to save and defend those to the uttermost who trust in Him.

8. Shall confess. See on Matt. x. 32-33.

Whosoever therefore shall confess me before men. That is, whosoever shall acknowledge Me to be the Messiah, and have his heart and life regulated by My spirit and doctrine. It is not merely sufficient to have the heart right before God; there must be a firm, manly, and public profession of Christ before men.

Whosoever shall deny me. Whosoever prefers his worldly interest to his duty to God sets a greater value on earthly than on heavenly things, and prefers the friendship of men to the approbation of God. Let it be remembered that to be renounced by Christ is to have Him for neither Mediator nor Saviour. To appear before the tribunal of God without having Christ for our Advocate, and, on the contrary, to have Him there as our Judge, and a Witness against us—how can a man think of this and not die with horror!

10. Him that blasphemeth. See the sin against the Holy Ghost explained, Matt. xii. 32.

11. Unto magistrates, and powers. See Matt. x. 17-20. Take ye no thought. See Matt. vi. 25; x. 19.

MATTHEW HENRY

Ghost, as a Spirit of wisdom, shall teach you what you ought to say, and how to say it, so that it may be for the honour of God and his cause."

I. The application that was made to Christ by one of his hearers, desiring him to interpose between him and his brother in a matter that concerned the estate of the family (v. 13): "Master, speak to my brother that he divide the inheritance with me." Some think that his brother did him wrong, and that he appealed to Christ to right him. Such brethren there are in the world, who have no sense at all either of natural equity or natural affection. They who are so wronged have a God to go to, who will execute judgment and justice for those that are oppressed. Others think that he had a mind to do his brother wrong, and would have Christ to assist him; that, whereas the law gave the elder brother a double portion of the estate, he would have Christ to alter that law, and oblige his brother to divide the inheritance equally with him. It was not a lawful desire of getting his own, but a sinful desire of getting more than his own.

II. Christ's refusal to interpose this in matter (v. 14): Man, who made me a judge or divider over you? Christ will not assume either a legislative power, or a judicial power. He corrects the man's mistake. If he had come to him to desire him to assist his pursuit of the heavenly inheritance, Christ would have given him his best help; but as to this matter he has nothing to do. Whatever he did, he could tell by what authority he did it, and who gave him that authority. Now this shows us what is the nature and constitution of Christ's kingdom. It is a spiritual kingdom, and not of this world. 1. It does not interfere with civil powers. Christianity leaves the matter as it found it, as to civil power. 2. It does not intermeddle with civil rights; it obliges all to do justly, according to the settled rules of equity. 3. It does not encourage our expectations of worldly advantages by our religion. 4. It does not encourage our contests with our brethren, and our being rigorous and high in our demands.

III. The necessary caution which Christ took occasion from this to give to his hearers.

1. The caution itself (v. 15): Take heed and beware of covetousness; ὁρᾶτε—"Observe yourselves, keep a jealous eye upon your own hearts, lest covetous principles steal into them; and φυλάσσεσθε—preserve yourselves, keep a strict hand upon your own hearts, lest covetous principles rule and give law in them."

2. An argument to enforce this caution: For a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth; that is, "our happiness and comfort do not depend upon our having a great deal of the wealth of this world." The life of the soul, undoubtedly, does not depend upon it. The things of the world will not suit the nature of a soul, nor supply its needs, nor satisfy its desires. Even the life of the body and the happiness of that do not consist in an abundance of these things; for many live very contentedly and easily, who have but a little of the wealth of it (a dinner of herbs with holy love is better than a feast of fat things); and, on the other hand, many live very miserably who have a great deal of the things of this world.

3. The illustration of this by a parable, which is intended for the enforcing of that necessary caution to us all, to take heed of covetousness. The parable gives us the life and death of a rich man, and leaves us to judge whether he was a happy man.

(1) Here is an account of his worldly wealth and abundance (v. 16): The ground of a certain rich man brought forth plentifully. His wealth lay much in the fruits of the earth. He had a great deal of ground, and his ground was fruitful; much would have more, and he had more.

(2) Here are the workings of his heart. We are here told what he thought within himself, v. 17. The God of heaven knows and observes whatever we think within ourselves, and we are accountable to him for it. Let us here observe,

[1] What his cares and concerns were. When he saw an extraordinary crop upon his ground, instead of thanking God for it, or rejoicing in the opportunity it would give him of doing the more good, he afflicts himself with this thought, What shall I do, because I have no room where to bestow my fruits? He speaks as one at a loss, and full of perplexity. What shall I do now? The poorest beggar in the country, that did not know where to get a meal's meat, could not have said a more anxious word. Even the abundance of the rich will not suffer them to sleep, for thinking what they shall do with what they have. The rich man seems to speak it with a sigh, What shall I do?

that. This would be to slander Him with eyes open, or to do it "presumptuously."

13-53. COVETOUSNESS—WATCHFULNESS—SUPERIORITY TO EARTHLY TIES. 13. Master . . .—i.e., "Great Preacher of righteousness, help; there is need of Thee in this rapacious world; here am I the victim of injustice, and that from my own brother, who withholds from me my rightful share of the inheritance that has fallen to us." In this most inopportune intrusion upon the solemnities of our Lord's teaching, there is a mixture of the absurd and the irreverent, the one, however, occasioning the other. The man had not the least idea that his case was not of as urgent a nature, and as worthy the attention of our Lord, as anything else He could deal with.

14. Man, . . .—Contrast this style of address with "my friends," (vs. 4). who . . .—a question literally repudiating the office which Moses assumed (Exod. 2:14). The influence of religious teachers in the external relations of life has ever been immense, when only the INDIRECT effect of their teaching; but whenever they intermeddle DIRECTLY with secular and political matters, the spell of that influence is broken.

15. unto them—the multitude around Him (vs. 1). of covetousness—The best copies have "all," i.e., "every kind of covetousness"; because as this was one of the more plausible forms of it, so He would strike at once at the root of the evil. a man's life . . .—a singularly weighty maxim, and not less so because its meaning and its truth are equally evident.

Covetousness is folly because it grasps at worldly good under the false belief that thereby it will secure the true good of life; but when it has made its pile, it finds that it is no nearer peace of heart, rest, nobleness, or joy than before, and has probably lost much of both in the process of making it. The mad race after wealth, which is the sin of this luxurious, greedy, commercial age, is the consequence of a lie—that life does consist in the abundance of possessions. It consists in knowing "thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent." Is there any saying of Jesus Christ's more revolutionary or less believed by His professed followers than this?

The story of the rich fool is not a parable in the narrower meaning of that word—that is, a description of some event or thing in the natural sphere, transferred by analogy to the spiritual—but an imaginary narrative exemplifying in a concrete instance the characteristics of the class of covetous men. The first point noted is that accumulated wealth breeds anxiety rather than satisfaction. The man is embarrassed by his abundance. The trouble of knowing how to keep it is as great as the labor of acquiring it, and the enjoyment of it is still in the future. Many a rich man is more worried about his securities than he was in making his money. There are so many "bags with holes" that he is at his wits' end for investments, and the first thing he looks at in his morning's paper is the stock report, the sight of which often spoils his breakfast.

ADAM CLARKE

13. Speak to my brother, that he divide. Among the Jews, the children had the inheritance of their fathers divided among them; the eldest had a double portion, but all the rest had equal parts. It is likely the person complained of in the text was the elder brother, and he wished to keep the whole to himself—a case which is far from being uncommon.

14. A judge. Without some judgment given in the case, no division could be made; therefore Jesus added the word judge. A minister of Christ ought not to concern himself with secular affairs any further than charity and the order of discipline require it. Better to leave all these things to the civil magistrate, unless where a lawsuit may be prevented, and the matter decided to the satisfaction or acquiescence of both parties.

15. Beware of covetousness. Or rather, "Beware of all inordinate desires." I add "all," on the authority of many MSS., versions, and several of the primitive fathers. Inordinate desires—from pleion, "more," and echein, "to have"; the desire to have more and more, let a person possess whatever he may—such a disposition of mind is never satisfied; for as soon as one object is gained, the heart goes out after another. Consisteth not in the abundance. That is, "dependeth not on the abundance." It is not superfluities that support man's life, but necessaries. What is necessary, God gives liberally; what is superfluous, He has not promised. Nor can a man's life be preserved by the abundance of his possessions; to prove this Jesus spoke the following parable.

16. The ground of a certain rich man. He had generally what is called good luck in his farm and this was a remarkably plentiful year.

17. He thought within himself. Began to be puzzled in consequence of the increase of his goods. Riches, though ever so well acquired, produce nothing but vexation and embarrassment.

And if you ask, Why, what is the matter? Truly he has abundance of wealth, and wants a place to put it in, that is all.

[2] What his projects and purposes were (v. 18): "This will I do, I will pull down my barns, and I will build greater, and there will I bestow all my fruits and my goods, and then I shall be at ease." It was folly for him to call the fruits of the ground his fruits and his goods. What we have is but lent us for our use, the property is still in God; we are but stewards of our Lord's goods. It was folly for him to hoard up what he had, and then to think it well bestowed. There will I bestow it all; as if none must be bestowed upon the poor, and the stranger, the fatherless and the widow, but all in the great barn. It was folly for him to let his mind rise with his condition; to talk of bigger barns, as if the next year must needs be as fruitful as this, and much more abundant, whereas the barn might be as much too big the next year as it was too little this. It was folly for him to think to ease his care by building new barns, for the building of them would but increase his care; those know this who know anything of the spirit of building. It was folly for him to contrive and resolve all this absolutely and without reserve. This I will do. I will; without so much as that necessary proviso, If the Lord will, I shall live, James iv. 13–15. Peremptory projects are foolish projects; for our times are in God's hand, and not in our own, and we do not so much as know what shall be on the morrow.

[3] What his pleasing hopes and expectations were. "Then I will say to my soul, Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; now take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry," v. 19. Here also appears his folly. It was folly for him to put off his comfort in his abundance till he had compassed his projects concerning it. When he has built bigger barns, then he will take his ease; and might he not as well have done that now? It was folly for him to be confident that his goods were laid up for many years, whereas in an hour's time they might be burnt to the ground and all that was laid up in them, perhaps by lightning. A few years may make a great change; moth and rust may corrupt, or thieves break through and steal. It was folly for him to count upon certain ease, whereas there are many things that may make people uneasy in the midst of their greatest abundance. One dead fly may spoil a whole pot of precious ointment; and one thorn a whole bed of down. Pain and sickness of body, disagreeableness of relations, and especially a guilty conscience, may rob a man of his ease, who has ever so much of the wealth of this world. It was folly for him to think of making no other use of his plenty than to eat and drink, and to be merry; to indulge the flesh, and gratify the sensual appetite, without any thought of doing good to others: as if we lived to eat, and did not eat to live. It was the greatest folly of all to say all this to his soul. If he had said, Body, take thine ease, for thou hast goods laid up for many years, there had been sense in it; but the soul was no way interested in a barn full of corn or a bag full of gold. If he had had the soul of a swine, he might have blessed it with the satisfaction of eating and drinking. It is the great absurdity which the children of this world are guilty of that they portion their souls in the wealth of the world and the pleasures of sense.

(3) Here is God's sentence upon all this. He said to himself, Take thine ease. If God had said so too, the man had been happy. But God said quite otherwise; God said he did ill for himself: Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee, v. 20. God said to him, that is, decreed this concerning him. This was said when he was in the fulness of his sufficiency, when his eyes were held waking upon his bed with his cares and contrivances about enlarging his barns. When he was forecasting this, and then lulled himself asleep again with a pleasing dream of many years' enjoyment, then God said this to him. Now observe what God said,

The character he gave him: Thou fool, thou Nabal, alluding to the story of Nabal, that fool (Nabal is his name, and folly is with him). Carnal worldlings are fools, and the day is coming when God will call them by their own name, Thou fool, and they will call themselves so.

The sentence he passed upon him, a sentence of death: This night thy soul shall be required of thee; and then whose shall those things be which thou hast provided? He thought he had goods that should be his for many years, but he must part from them this night; he thought he should enjoy them himself, but he must leave them to he knows not who.

First, It is a force, an arrest; it is the requiring of the soul; what hast thou to do with a soul, who canst use it no better? Thy soul shall be required. A good man cheerfully resigns his soul at death, and gives it

The next point is the selfish and arrogant sense of possession, as betrayed by the repetition of "my"—my fruits, my barns, my corn, and my goods. He has no thought of God, nor of his own stewardship. He recognizes no claim on his wealth. If he had looked a little beyond himself, he would have seen many places where he could have bestowed his fruits. Were there no poor at his gates? He had better have poured some riches into the laps of these than have built a new barn. Corn laid up would breed weevils; dispersed, it would bring blessings.

Again, this type of covetous men is a fool because he reckons on "many years." The goods may last, but will he? He can make sure that they will suffice for a long time, but he cannot make sure of the long time. Again, he blunders tragically in his estimate of the power of worldly goods to satisfy. "Eat, drink," might be said to his body, but to say it to his soul, and to fancy that these pleasures of sense would put it at ease, is the fatal error which gnaws like a worm at the root of every worldly life. The word here rendered "take thine ease" is cognate with Christ's in His great promise, "Ye shall find rest unto your souls." Not in abundance of worldly goods, but in union with Him, is that rest to be found which the covetous man vainly promises himself in filled barns and luxurious idleness.

There is a grim contrast between what the rich man said and what God said. The man's words were empty breath; God's are powers, and what He says is a deed. The divine decree comes crashing into the abortive human plans like a thunder-clap into a wood full of singing birds, and they are all stricken silent. So little does life consist in possessions that all the abundance cannot keep the breath in a man for one moment. His life is "required of him," not only in the sense that he has to give it up, but also inasmuch as he has to answer for it. In that requirement the selfishly used wealth will be "a swift witness against" him, and instead of ministering to life or ease, will "eat his flesh as fire." Molten gold dropping on flesh burns badly. Wealth, trusted in and selfishly clutched, without recognition of God the giver or of others' claims to share it, will burn still worse. —Expositions of Holy Scripture

19. a certain rich man . . .—Why is this man called a "fool?" (1) Because he deemed a life of secure and abundant earthly enjoyment the summit of human felicity. (2) Because, possessing the means of this, through prosperity in his calling, he flattered himself that he had a long lease of such enjoyment, and nothing to do but give himself up to it. Nothing else is laid to his charge.

20, 21. this night . . .—This sudden cutting short of his career is designed to express not only the folly of building securely upon the future, but of throwing one's whole soul into what may at any moment be gone. "Thy soul shall be required of thee" is put in opposition to his own treatment of it, "I will say to my soul, Soul, . . ." whose shall those things be . . .—Cf. Psalm 39:6, "He heapeth up riches and knoweth not who shall gather them."

ADAM CLARKE

18. I will pull down. The rich are full of designs concerning this life, but in general take no thought about eternity till the time that their goods and their lives are both taken away.

19. Soul, thou hast much goods. Great possessions are generally accompanied with pride, idleness, and luxury; and these are the greatest enemies to salvation.

20. Thou fool. To imagine that a man's comfort and peace can depend upon temporal things, or to suppose that these can satisfy the wishes of an immortal spirit!

This night. What a dreadful awakening of a soul, long asleep in sin! He is now hurried into the presence of his Maker; none of his worldly goods can accompany him, and he has not a particle of heavenly treasure!

up; but a worldly man has it torn from him with violence. They shall require thy soul. God shall require it; he shall require an account of it. "Man, woman, what hast thou done with thy soul. Give an account of that stewardship."

Secondly, It is a surprise, an unexpected force. It is in the night. The time of death is day-time to a good man; it is his morning. But it is night to a worldling, a dark night. It is this night, this present night, without delay. This pleasant night, when thou art promising thyself many years to come, now thou must die. In the midst of all, here is an end of all.

Thirdly, It is the leaving of all those things behind which they have provided. All that which they have placed their happiness in, and built their hope upon, they must leave behind.

Fourthly, It is leaving them to they know not who: "Then whose shall those things be? Not thine to be sure, and thou knowest not what they will prove for whom thou didst design them, thy children and relations, whether they will be wise or fools (Eccles. ii. 18, 19), whether such as will bless thy memory or curse it, be a credit to thy family or a blemish, do good or hurt with what thou leavest them." If many a man could have foreseen to whom his house would have come after his death, he would rather have burned it than beautified it.

Fifthly, It is a demonstration of his folly. At his end he shall be a fool, for then it will appear that he took pains to lay up treasure in a world he was hastening from, but took no care to lay it up in the world he was hastening to.

Lastly, Here is the application of this parable (v. 21): So is he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich towards God. This is the way and this is the end of such a man.

1. The description of a worldly man: He lays up treasure for himself, for himself in opposition to God, for that self that is to be denied. It is his error that he counts his flesh himself, as if the body were the man. It is his error that he makes it his business to lay up for the flesh, which he calls laying up for himself. It is his error that he counts those things his treasure which are thus laid up for the world, and the body, and the life that now is. The greatest error of all is that he is in no care to be rich towards God, rich in the things of God. Many who have abundance of this world are wholly destitute of that which will enrich their souls, which will make them rich towards God, rich for eternity.

2. The folly and misery of a worldly man: So is he. Our Lord Jesus Christ has here told us what his end will be. It is the unspeakable folly of the most of men to mind that which is merely for the body and for time, more than that which is for the soul and eternity.

"Therefore, because there are so many that are ruined by covetousness, I say unto you, my disciples, take heed of it." Thou, O man of God, flee these things, as well as thou, O man of the world, 1 Tim. vi. 11.

I. He charges them not to afflict themselves with disquieting perplexing cares about the necessary supports of life: Take no thought for your life, v. 22. In the foregoing parable he had given us warning against that branch of covetousness of which rich people are most in danger. He here warns them against another branch of covetousness, which they are most in temptation to that have but a little of this world, and that was, an anxious solicitude about the necessary supports of life: "Take no thought for your life what ye shall eat or what ye shall put on." This is the caution he had largely insisted upon, Matt. vi. 25, &c.; and the arguments here used are much the same.

1. God, who has done the greater for us, may be depended upon to do the less. He has given us life and a body, and therefore we may cheerfully leave it to him to provide meat for the support of that life, and raiment for the defence of that body.

2. God, who provides for the inferior creatures, may be depended upon to provide. "Trust God for meat, for he feeds the ravens (v. 24); they neither sow nor reap, and yet they are fed. Now consider how much better ye are than the fowls, than the ravens. Trust God for clothing, for he clothes the lilies (v. 27, 28); they toil not, they spin not, and yet, as the flower grows up, it appears wonderfully beautified. Now, if God has so clothed the flowers, shall he not much more clothe you?" Then let them not be of little faith. Our inordinate cares are owing to the weakness of our faith; for a powerful practical belief of the all-sufficiency of God would be mighty, through God, to the pulling down of the strongholds of these disquieting perplexing imaginations.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

21. So is he . . .—Such is a picture of his folly here, and of its awful issue. is not rich . . .—lives to amass and enjoy riches which terminate on self, but as to the riches of God's favor, which is life (Ps. 30:5), of "precious" faith (II Peter 1:1; Jas. 2:5), of good works (I Tim. 6:18), of wisdom which is better than rubies (Prov. 8:11)—lives and dies a beggar!

22-31.—(See on Matthew 6:25-33.)

Therefore I say unto you, Take no thought—"Be not solicitous." The English word "thought," when our version was made, expressed this idea of "solicitude," "anxious concern"—as may be seen in any old English classic; and in the same sense it is used in I Samuel 9:5, etc. But this sense of the word has now nearly gone out, and so the mere English reader is apt to be perplexed. Thought or forethought, for temporal things—in the sense of reflection, consideration—is required alike by Scripture and common sense. It is that anxious solicitude, that oppressive care, which springs from unbelieving doubts and misgivings, which alone is here condemned. (See Phil. 4:6). for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on—In Luke (12:29) our Lord adds, "neither be ye unsettled"—not "of doubtful mind," as in our version. When "careful (or 'full of care') about nothing," but committing all in prayer and supplication with thanksgiving unto God, the apostle assures us that "the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep our hearts and minds in Christ Jesus" (Phil. 4:6, 7); i.e., shall guard both our feelings and our thoughts from undue agitation, and keep them in a holy calm. But when we commit our whole temporal condition to the wit of our own minds, we get into that "unsettled" state against which our Lord exhorts His disciples. Is not the life more than meat [food] and the body than raiment?—If God, then, gives and keeps up the greater—the life, the body—will He withhold the less, food to sustain life and raiment to clothe the body?

ADAM CLARKE

21. So is he. That is, "thus will it be." This is not an individual case; all who make this life their portion, and who are destitute of the peace and salvation of God, shall, sooner or later, be surprised in the same way. Layeth up treasure for himself. This is the essential characteristic of a covetous man. He desires riches; he gets them; he lays them up, not for the necessary uses to which they might be devoted, but for himself—to please himself, and to gratify his avaricious soul. Such a person is commonly called a "miser," i.e., literally, a wretched, "miserable" man.

22. Take no thought. Be not anxiously careful. See on Matt. vi. 25.

Therefore. "On this account," namely, that you may not serve mammon, but have unshaken confidence in God, I say unto you. Take no thought. Be not anxiously careful. Prudent care is never forbidden by our Lord, but only that anxious, distracting solicitude which, by dividing the mind and drawing it different ways, renders it utterly incapable of attending to any solemn or important concern. In this and the following verses our Lord lays down several reasons why men should not disquiet themselves about the wants of life or concerning the future. The first is the experience of greater benefits already received. Is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment? Can He who gave us our bodies, and breathed into them the breath of life, before we could ask them from Him, refuse us that which is necessary to preserve both, and when we ask it in humble confidence?

Behold the fowls of the air. The second reason why we should not be anxiously concerned about the future is the example of the smaller animals, which the providence of God feeds without their own labor, though He be not their father.

F. B. MEYER:

The doom of the money lover. Our Lord did not come into our world as an earthly judge, adjusting differences between man and man. He lays down great principles, obedience to which will bring heaven into human lives. One of the greatest of these is enunciated in verse 15. Covetousness is as much a temptation of the poor man who is wronged as of his rich oppressor; and love for money will inevitably, in poor and rich, becloud the vision and disturb the inner peace. The worth of a man cannot be computed by the amount that stands to his credit. Not what you have, but what you are—that is your value in the eyes of God. Some men live to get; see to it that you live to be.

It is absurd to suppose that the soul can take its ease just because its barns are bursting with goods. Goods are not good! The soul cannot live on corn! Merriment cannot come to a heart that is smitten by remorse and shadowed by the remonstrances of an evil conscience! Besides, we cannot take with us our possessions when we cross the river. We can only take our character—our things pass into other hands.—Bible Commentary

3. Our cares are fruitless, vain, and insignificant. They will not gain us our wishes, and therefore ought not to hinder our repose (v. 25): "Which of you by taking thought can add to his stature one cubit? Now if ye be not able to do that which is least, if it be not in your power to alter your statures, why should you perplex yourselves about other things, which are as much out of your power?" As in our stature, so in our state, it is our wisdom to take it as it is, and make the best of it; for fretting and vexing, carping and caring will not mend it.

4. An inordinate anxious pursuit of the things of this world, even necessary things, very ill becomes the disciples of Christ (v. 29, 30): "Seek not ye what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; do not you afflict yourselves with perplexing cares." Let not the disciples of Christ thus seek their food, but ask it of God day by day; let them not be of doubtful mind; blown hither and thither with every wind. Be even and steady, and have your hearts fixed; live not in careful suspense; let not your minds be continually perplexed between hope and fear, ever upon the rack. Let not the children of God make themselves uneasy; for,

(1) This is to make themselves like the children of this world: "All these things do the nations of the world seek after, v. 30. They that take care for this world only, and not for the other, look no further than what they shall eat and drink. But it ill becomes you to do so. When inordinate cares prevail over us, we should think, "What am I, a Christian or a heathen? If a Christian, shall I rank myself with Gentiles, and join with them in their pursuits?"

(2) It is needless for them to disquiet themselves with care about the necessary supports of life: "Your Father knows that you have need of these things, and will supply your needs according to his riches in glory; for he is your Father, and therefore will take care that you want no good thing."

(3) They have better things to mind and pursue (v. 31): "But rather seek ye the kingdom of God, and mind this, you, my disciples, who are to preach the kingdom of God. Let all that have souls to save seek the kingdom of God, in which only they can be safe. Then all these things shall be added to you. Mind the affairs of your souls with diligence and care, and then trust God with all your other affairs."

(4) They have better things to expect and hope for: Fear not, little flock, v. 32. When we frighten ourselves with an apprehension of evil to come, we put ourselves upon the stretch of care how to avoid it, when after all perhaps it is but the creature of our own imagination. Therefore fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom. This comfortable word we had not in Matthew. [1] Christ's flock in this world is a little flock. The church is a vineyard, a garden, a small spot, compared with the wilderness of this world. [2] Though it be a little flock, quite over-numbered by its enemies, yet it is the will of Christ that they should not be afraid: "Fear not, little flock, but see yourselves safe under the protection and conduct of the great and good Shepherd." [3] God has a kingdom in store for all that belong to Christ's little flock, a crown of glory (1 Pet. v. 4). [4] The kingdom is given according to the good pleasure of the Father: It is your Father's good pleasure; it is given not of debt, but of grace. [5] The believing hopes and prospects of the kingdom should silence and suppress the fears of Christ's little flock in this world. "Fear no trouble; for, though it should come, it shall not come between you and the kingdom." (That is not an evil worth trembling at the thought of which cannot separate us from the love of God.)

II. He charged them to make sure work for their souls, by laying up their treasure in heaven, v. 33, 34.

1. "Sell that ye have, and give alms," that is, "rather than want wherewith to relieve those that are truly necessitous, sell what you have that is superfluous, and give it to the poor. Sell what you have, if you find it a hindrance from, or incumbrance in, the service of Christ. Do not sell to hoard up the money, or because you can make more of it by usury, but sell and give alms; what is given in alms, in a right manner, is put out to the best interest, upon the best security."

2. "Set your hearts upon the other world. Provide yourselves bags that wax not old." Grace will go with us into another world, for it is woven in the soul, and our good works will follow us. These will be treasures in heaven, that will enrich us to eternity. (1) It is treasure that will not be exhausted; we may spend upon it to eternity; there is no danger of seeing the bottom of it. (2) It is treasure that we are in no danger of being robbed of; what is laid up in heaven is out of the reach of enemies. (3) It is treasure that will not spoil with keeping, any more than it will waste with spending; the moth does not corrupt it. We have for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things—How precious this word! Food and raiment are pronounced needful to God's children; and He who could say, "No man knoweth the Father but the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal Him" (ch. 11:27), says with an authority which none but Himself could claim, "Your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things." Will not that suffice you, O ye needy ones of the household of faith? But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you—This is the great summing up. Strictly speaking, it has to do only with the subject of the present section—the right state of the heart with reference to heavenly and earthly things; but being couched in the form of a brief general directory, it is so comprehensive in its grasp as to embrace the whole subject of this discourse. And, as if to make this the more evident, the two keynotes of this great sermon seem purposely struck in it—"the KINGDOM" and "the RIGHTEOUSNESS" of the kingdom—as the grand objects, in the supreme pursuit of which all things needful for the present life will be added to us. The precise sense of every word in this golden verse should be carefully weighed.

29. of doubtful . . .—unsettled mind. put off your balance.

32. little flock . . .—How sublime and touching a contrast between this tender and pitying appellation, "Little flock" (in the original a double diminutive, which in German can be expressed, but not in English)—and the "good pleasure" of the Father to give them the Kingdom; the one recalling the insignificance and helplessness of that then literal handful of disciples, the other holding up to their view the eternal love that encircled them, the everlasting arms that were underneath them, and the high inheritance awaiting them!—"the kingdom"; grand word; then why not "bread" (vs. 31 [BENGEL]. Well might He say, "Fear not!"

33, 34. Sell . . .—This is but a more vivid expression of Matthew 6:19-21 (see Note there).

25. To his stature one cubit? See on Matt. vi. 27.

Which of you by taking thought can add one cubit unto his stature? The third reason against these carking cares is the unprofitableness of human solicitude, unless God vouchsafe to bless it. What can our uneasiness do but render us still more unworthy of the divine care?

28. Into the oven. See the note on Matt. vi. 30.

29. Neither be ye of doubtful mind. Or "in anxious suspense."

30. The nations of the world seek after. Or "earnestly seek"; to seek one thing after another, to be continually and eagerly coveting. This is the employment of the nations of this world, utterly regardless of God and eternity! It is the essence of heathenism to live only for this life; and it is the property of Christianity to lead men to live here in reference to another and better world.

32. Fear not, little flock. Or "very little flock." This is what some term a double diminutive, and, literally translated, is "little, little flock." Though this refers solely to the apostles and first believers, of whom it was literally true, yet we may say that the number of genuine believers has been, and is still, small in comparison of heathens and false Christians. It is your Father's good pleasure. "It hath pleased," though this tense joined with an infinitive has often the force of the present. Our Lord intimates, God has already given you that Kingdom which consists in righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost, and has undertaken to protect and save you to the uttermost. Therefore, fear not; the smallness of your number cannot hurt you, for Omnipotence itself has undertaken your cause.

33. Sell that ye have. Dispose of your goods. Be not like the foolish man already mentioned, who laid up the produce of his fields, without permitting the poor to partake of God's bounty. Turn the fruits of your fields (which are beyond what you need for your own support) into money, and give it in alms; and the treasure thus laid out shall be as laid up for yourselves and families in heaven.

34. Where your treasure is. Men fix their hearts on their treasures, and often resort to the place where they have deposited them, to see that all is safe and secure. Let God be the Treasure of your soul, and let your heart go frequently to the place where His honor dwelleth.

laid up our treasure in heaven if our hearts be there while we are here (v. 34). But, if your hearts be set upon the earth and the things of it, it is to be feared that you have your treasure and portion in it, and are undone when you leave it.

III. He charges them to get ready, and to keep in a readiness for Christ's coming, v. 35, &c.

1. Christ is our Master, and we are his servants, not only working servants, but waiting servants. We must be as men that wait for their Lord, that sit up late while he stays out late, to be ready to receive him.

2. Christ our Master, though now gone from us, will return again. Christ's servants are now in a state of expectation, looking for their Master's glorious appearing. He will come to take cognizance of his servants, and they shall either stay with him or be turned out of doors, according as they are found in that day.

3. The time of our Master's return is uncertain; it will be far in the night, when he has long deferred his coming; in the second watch, just before midnight, or in the third watch, next after midnight, v. 38. The Son of man cometh at an hour that ye think not (v. 40). This bespeaks the prevailing security of the greatest part of men, who are unthinking, so that, whenever he comes, it is in an hour that they think not.

4. That which he expects and requires from his servants is that they be ready to open to him immediately (v. 36), that is, that they be found as his servants, with their loins girded about, having their long garments tucked up (which otherwise would hang about them, and hinder them), and their lights burning, with which to light their master into the house.

5. Those servants will be happy who shall be found ready when their Lord shall come (v. 37): Blessed are those servants who, after having waited long, are then found awake and aware of his first approach, of his first knock; and again (v. 38): Blessed are those servants. He will make them sit down to meat, and will serve them. For the bridegroom to wait upon his bride at table is not uncommon, but to wait upon his servants is not the manner of men; yet Jesus Christ did once, to show his condescension, gird himself, and serve them, when he washed their feet (John xiii. 4, 5).

6. We are therefore kept at uncertainty concerning the precise time of his coming that we may be always ready: The good man of the house, if he had known what hour the thief would have come, though he were ever so careless a man, would yet have watched, v. 39. But we do not know at what hour the alarm will be given us, and therefore are concerned never to be off our guard. Or this may intimate the miserable case of those who are careless and unbelieving in this great matter. We have notice of the day of the Lord's coming, as a thief in the night, and yet do not thus watch. If men will take such care of their houses, O let us be thus wise for our souls: Be ye therefore ready also, as ready as the good man of the house would be if he knew what hour the thief would come.

I. Peter's question, which he put to Christ upon occasion of the foregoing parable (v. 41): "Lord, speakest thou this parable to us, or also to all—to all the hearers?" Peter was now, as often, spokesman for the disciples. We have reason to bless God that there are some such forward men; let those that are such take heed of being proud. Now Peter desires Christ to explain himself. Lord, said Peter, was it intended for us, or for all? To this Christ gives a direct answer (Mark xiii. 37): What I say unto you, I say unto all. Yet here he seems to show that the apostles were primarily concerned in it. Speakest thou this to us? Doth this word belong to me? Speak it to my heart.

II. Christ's reply to this question, directed to Peter and the rest of the disciples. This that follows is peculiarly adapted to ministers, who are the stewards in Christ's house.

1. What was their duty as stewards, and what the trust committed to them. They are made rulers of God's household, under Christ, whose own the house is; ministers derive an authority from Christ. Their business is to give God's children and servants their portion of meat, that which is proper for them; convictions and comfort to those to whom they respectively belong; to give it to them in due season; a word in season to him that is weary. Herein they must approve themselves faithful and wise; faithful to their Master, and faithful to their fellow-servants; and wise. Ministers must be both skilful and faithful.

2. What would be their happiness if they approved themselves faithful and wise (v. 43): Blessed is that

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

38. second . . . third watch—To find them ready to receive Him at any hour of day or night, when one might least of all expect Him, is peculiarly blessed. A servant may be truly faithful, even though taken so far unawares that he has not everything in such order and readiness for his master's return as he thinks is due to him, and both could and would have had if he had had notice of the time of his coming, and so may not be willing to open to him "immediately," but fly to preparation, and let his master knock again ere he admit him, and even then not with full joy. A too common case this with Christians. But if the servant have himself and all under his charge in such a state that at any hour when his master knocks, he can open to him "immediately," and hail his "return"—that is the most enviable, "blessed" servant of all.

35-40. loins . . . girded—to fasten up the long outer garment, always done before travel and work (II Kings 4:29; Acts 12:8). The meaning is, Be in readiness. lights . . . (See on Matt. 25:1).

return from the wedding not come to it, as in the parable of the virgins. Both have their spiritual significance; but preparedness for Christ's coming is the prominent idea.

37. gird himself . . .—"a promise the most august of all: Thus will the Bridegroom entertain his friends [nay, servants] on the solemn Nuptial Day" [BENGEL].

41-48. unto us or even to all?—us the Twelve, or all this vast audience?

42. Who then . . .—answering the question indirectly by another question, from which they were left to gather what it would be:—To you certainly in the first instance, representing the "stewards" of the "household" I am about to collect, but generally to all "servants" in My house. faithful and wise—Fidelity is the first requisite in a servant, wisdom (discretion and judgment in the exercise of his functions), the next.

ADAM CLARKE

38. If he shall come in the second watch. See the note on Matt. xiv. 25.

35. Let your loins. Be active, diligent, determined, ready; let all hindrances be removed out of the way, and let the candle of the Lord be always found burning brightly in your hand.

37. He shall gird himself. Alluding to the long garments which were worn in the Eastern countries; and which, in travelling and serving, were tucked up in their belts. That those among the Romans who waited on the company at table were girded, and had their clothes tucked up, appears from what Horace says, "He runs about like a girded waiter."

A. T. ROBERTSON:

41. "Peter said" (Eipen de ho Petros). This whole paragraph from verse 22 to verse 40 had been addressed directly to the disciples. Hence it is not surprising to find Peter putting in a question. This incident confirms also the impression that Luke is giving actual historical data in the environment of these discourses. He is certain that the Twelve are meant, but he desires to know if others are included, for he had spoken to the multitude in verses 13 to 21. Recall Mark 13:37. This interruption is somewhat like that on the Mount of Transfiguration (Luke 9:33) and is characteristic of Peter. Was it the magnificent promise in verse 37 that stirred Peter's impulsiveness? It is certainly more than a literary device of Luke. Peter's question draws out a parabolic reply by Jesus (42-48).

servant, (1) That is doing, and is not idle. (2) That is so doing, doing as he should be, by public preaching and personal application. (3) That is found so doing when his Lord comes. Now his happiness is illustrated by the preferment of a steward that has approved himself within a lower and narrower degree of service; he shall be preferred to a larger and higher (v. 44): He will make him ruler over all that he has. Ministers that obtain mercy of the Lord to be faithful shall obtain further mercy to be abundantly rewarded for their faithfulness in the day of the Lord.

3. What a dreadful reckoning there would be if they were treacherous and unfaithful, v. 45, 46. We had all this before in Matthew, and therefore shall here only observe, (1) He saith in his heart, My Lord delays his coming. Christ's patience is very often misinterpreted as delay, to the discouragement of his people, and the encouragement of his enemies. (2) The persecutors of God's people are commonly abandoned to security and sensuality; they beat their fellow-servants, and then eat and drink with the drunken, altogether unconcerned either at their own sin or their brethren's sufferings. (3) Death and judgment will be very terrible to all wicked people, but especially to wicked ministers. It will be a surprise to them: At an hour when they are not aware.

4. What an aggravation it would be of their sin and punishment that they knew their duty, and did not do it (v. 47, 48): That servant that knew his lord's will, and did it not, shall be beaten with many stripes; and he that knew not shall be beaten with few stripes, his punishment shall be mitigated. Here seems to be an allusion to the law, which made a distinction between sins committed through ignorance, and presumptuous sins (Num. xv. 29, 30). (1) Ignorance of our duty is an extenuation of sin. He that knew not his lord's will, and did things worthy of stripes, he shall be beaten, because he might have known his duty better, but with few stripes; his ignorance excuses in part, but not wholly. Thus through ignorance the Jews put Christ to death, and Christ pleaded that ignorance in their excuse: They know not what they do. (2) The knowledge of our duty is an aggravation of our sin: That servant that knew his lord's will shall be beaten with many stripes. God will justly inflict more upon him because it argues a great degree of wilfulness and contempt to sin against knowledge. Here is a good reason for this added: To whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required. Those that have greater capacities of mind than others, more knowledge and learning, more acquaintance and converse with the scriptures, to them much is given, and their account will be accordingly.

III. A further discourse concerning his own sufferings, and concerning the sufferings of his followers. In general (v. 49): I am come to send fire on the earth. By this some understand the preaching of the gospel, and the pouring out of the Spirit, holy fire; and it was already kindled. But, by what follows, it seems rather to be understood of the fire of persecution. Christ is not the Author of it, as it is the sin of the incendiaries, the persecutors; but he permits it as a refining fire for the trial of the persecuted.

1. He must himself suffer many things; he must pass through this fire that was already kindled (v. 50): I have a baptism to be baptized with. Afflictions are compared both to fire and water, Ps. lxvi. 12. Christ's sufferings were both. He calls them a baptism (Matt. xx. 22); for he was watered or sprinkled with them, and dipped into them, as Israel was baptized in the sea, 1 Cor. x. 2. Christ's foresight of his sufferings: I am to be baptized with a baptism. He calls his sufferings by a name that mitigates them; it is a baptism, not a deluge; I must be dipped in them, not drowned in them; and by a name that sanctifies them, for baptism is a sacred rite. Christ's forwardness to his sufferings: How am I straitened till it be accomplished! He longed for the time when he should suffer and die, having an eye to the glorious issue of his sufferings. Christ's sufferings were the travail of his soul, which he cheerfully underwent. So much was his heart set upon the redemption and salvation of man.

2. He tells those about him that they also must bear with hardships and difficulties (v. 51): "Suppose ye that I came to give peace on earth?" It is intimated that they went upon this supposition, that the gospel would meet with a universal welcome, that people would unanimously embrace it, that Christ would at least give them peace. "But," saith Christ, "you will be mistaken, the event will declare the contrary, and therefore do not flatter yourselves into a fool's paradise. You will find:

steward—house-steward, whose it was to distribute to the servants their allotted portion of food. shall make—will deem fit to be made. 44. make him ruler over all he hath—will advance him to the highest post, referring to the world to come. (See Matt. 25:21, 23.)

45. begin to beat . . .—In the confidence that his Lord's return will not be speedy, he throws off the role of servant and plays the master, maltreating those faithful servants who refuse to join him, seizing on and revelling in the fulness of his master's board; intending, when he has got his fill, to resume the mask of fidelity ere his master appear. 46. cut him in sunder—a punishment not unknown in the East; cf. Hebrews 11:37, "sawn asunder" (I Sam. 15:33; Dan. 2:5). the unbelievers—the unfaithful, those unworthy of trust (Matt. 24:51), "the hypocrites," falsely calling themselves "servants." 48. knew not—i.e., knew but partially; for some knowledge is presupposed both in the name "servant" of Christ, and his being liable to punishment at all. many . . . few stripes—degrees of future punishment proportioned to the knowledge sinned against. Even heathens are not without knowledge enough for future judgment; but the reference here is not to such. It is a solemn truth, and though general, like all other revelations of the future world, discloses a tangible and momentous principle in its awards.

49-53. to send—cast. fire—"the higher spiritual element of life which Jesus came to introduce into this earth (cf. Matt. 3:11), with reference to its mighty effects in quickening all that is akin to it and destroying all that is opposed. To cause this element of life to take up its abode on earth, and wholly to pervade human hearts with its warmth, was the lofty destiny of the Redeemer" [OLSHAUSEN: so CALVIN, STIER, ALFORD, etc.]. what will I . . .—an obscure expression, uttered under deep and half-smothered emotion. In its general import all are agreed; but the nearest to the precise meaning seems to be, "And what should I have to desire if it were once already kindled?" [BENGEL and BLOOMFIELD]. 50. But . . . a baptism . . . .—clearly, His own bloody baptism, first to take place. how . . . straitened—not, "how do I long for its accomplishment," as many understand it, thus making it but a repetition of the former verse; but "what a pressure of spirit is upon Me." till it be accomplished—till it be over. Before a promiscuous audience, such obscure language was fit on a theme like this; but oh, what surges of mysterious emotion in the view of what was now so near at hand does it reveal!

51. peace . . . .? Nay—the reverse of peace, in the first instance. (See on Matt. 10:34-36.) The connection of all this with the foregoing warnings about hypocrisy, covetousness, and watchfulness, is deeply solemn: "My conflict hasten apace; Mine over, yours begins; and then, let the servants tread in their Master's steps, uttering their testimony entire and fearless, neither loving nor dreading the world, anticipating awful wrenches of the dearest ties in life, but looking forward, as I do, to the completion of their testimony, when, reaching the haven after the tempest, they shall enter into the joy of their Lord."

ADAM CLARKE

W. E. VINE:

OIKONOMOS primarily denoted the manager of a household or estate (oikos, a house, nemo, to arrange), a steward (such were usually slaves or freedmen), Luke 12:42; 16:1, 3, 8; 1 Cor. 4:2; Gal. 4:2; R.V. (A.V., "governors"); in Rom. 16:23, the "treasurer" (R.V.) of a city; it is used metaphorically, in the wider sense, of a steward in general (a) of preachers of the gospel and teachers of the Word of God (1 Cor. 4:1); (b) of elders or bishops in churches (Tit. 1:7); (c) of believers generally (1 Pet. 4:10).—Vine's Expository Dictionary

46. With the unbelievers. Or, rather, "the unfaithful." Persons who had the light and knowledge of God's Word, but made an improper use of the privileges they received.

47. Shall be beaten with many stripes. Criminals among the Jews could not be beaten with more than forty stripes; and as this was the sum of the severity to which a whipping could extend, it may be all that our Lord here means. But, in some cases, a man was adjudged to receive fourscore stripes! How could this be, when the law had decreed only forty? Answer: By doubling the crime. He received forty for each crime; if he were guilty of two offenses, he might receive fourscore.

48. Shall be beaten with few. For petty offenses the Jews in many cases inflicted so few as four, five, and six stripes.

From this and the preceding verse we find that it is a crime to be ignorant of God's will, because to everyone God has given less or more of the means of instruction.

49. I am come to send fire. See this subject largely explained on Matt. x. 34, etc. From the connection in which these words stand, both in this place and in Matthew, it appears as if our Lord intended by the word fire, not only the consuming influence of the Roman sword, but also the influence of His own Spirit in the destruction of sin. In both these senses this fire was already kindled. As yet, however, it appeared but as a spark, but was soon to break out into an all-consuming flame.

50. But I have a baptism. The fire, though already kindled, cannot burn up till after the Jews have put Me to death. Then the Roman sword shall come, and the Spirit of judgment, burning, and purification shall be poured out.

51. To give peace. See Matt. x. 34.

Think not that I am come to send peace. The meaning of this difficult passage will be plain when we consider the import of the word peace, and the expectation of the Jews. The word shalom was used among the Hebrews to express all possible blessings, temporal and spiritual, but especially the former. The import of our Lord's teaching here is this: Do not imagine, as the Jews in general vainly do, that I am come to send forth, by forcing out the Roman power, that temporal prosperity which love, and, if all would receive it, this would be the effect of it; but there being multitudes that not only will not receive it, but oppose it, it proves, though not the cause, yet the occasion of division. While the strong man armed kept his palace, in the Gentile world, his goods were at peace. The sects of philosophers agreed well enough, so did the worshippers of different deities; but when the gospel was preached, and many were turned from the power of Satan to God, then there was a disturbance. Some distinguished themselves by embracing the gospel, and others were angry that they did so. Yea, and among them that received the gospel there would be division; and Christ permits it for holy ends, that Christians may learn and practise mutual forbearance.

(2) "That this division will reach into private families" (v. 53): The father shall be divided against the son, and the son against the father, when the one turns Christian and the other does not; for the one that does turn Christian will be zealous by arguments and endearments to turn the other too. The one that continues in unbelief will be provoked, and will hate and persecute the one that by his faith and obedience witnesses against, and condemns, his unbelief and disobedience. Even mothers and daughters fall out about religion; and those that believe not are ready to deliver up those that believe, though otherwise very near and dear to them. We find in the Acts that, wherever the gospel came, persecution was stirred up; it was everywhere spoken against, and there was no small stir about that way. Therefore let not the disciples of Christ promise themselves peace upon earth.

Having given his disciples their lesson in the foregoing verses, here Christ turns to the people, and gives them theirs, v. 54. In general, he would have them be as wise in the affairs of their souls as they are in their outward affairs.

I. Let them learn to discern the way of God towards them, that they may prepare accordingly. They were weather-wise, could foresee when there would be rain and when there would be hot weather (v. 54, 55). Even in regard to changes of the weather God gives warning to us what is coming, and art has improved the notices of nature in weather-glasses. From what has been we conjecture what will be. See the benefit of experience; by taking notice we may come to give notice. Whoso is wise will observe and learn.

1. The particulars of the presages: "When you see a cloud arising out of the west, perhaps it is at first no bigger than a man's hand (1 Kings xviii. 44), but you say, There is a shower in the womb of it, and it proves so. When you observe the south wind blow, you say, There will be heat, and it usually comes to pass"; yet nature has not tied itself to such a track but that sometimes we are mistaken in our prognostics.

2. The inferences from them (v. 56): "Ye hypocrites, who pretend to be wise, but really are not so, how is it that you do not discern this time? Why are you not aware that you have now an opportunity which you will not have long, and which you may never have again?" Now is the accepted time, now or never. It is the folly and misery of man that he knows not his time. This was the ruin of the men of that generation, that they knew not the day of their visitation, ch. xix. 44. He adds, "Yea, and why even of yourselves, judge ye not what is right?" v. 57. If men would allow themselves the liberty of judging what is right, they would soon find that all Christ's precepts concerning all things are right, and that there is nothing more equitable in itself, than to submit to them and be ruled by them.

II. Let them hasten to make their peace with God in time, before it be too late, v. 58, 59. This we had upon another occasion, Matt. v. 25, 26. 1. We reckon it our wisdom in our temporal affairs to compound with those with whom we cannot contend. "When thou goest with thine adversary to the magistrate, and thou art in danger of being cast, thou knowest it is the most prudent course to make the matter up between yourselves; as thou art in the way, give diligence to be delivered from him." Wise men will not let their quarrels go to an extremity, but accommodate them in time. 2. Let us do thus in the affairs of our souls. We have by sin made God our adversary, and he has both right and might on his side. Christ, to whom all judgment is committed, is the magistrate before whom we are hastening to appear: if we stand a trial before him, the cause will certainly go against us, the Judge will deliver us to the officer, and we shall be cast into the prison of hell, till the last mite be paid, which will not be to all eternity. Christ's sufferings were short, yet the value of them made them fully satisfactory. Now, in con-

And a man's foes shall be they of his own household—This saying, which is quoted, as is the whole verse, from Micah 7:6, is but an extension of the Psalmist's complaint (Ps. 41:9; 55: 12-14), which had its most affecting illustration in the treason of Judas against our Lord Himself (John 13:18; Matt. 26:48-50). Hence would arise the necessity of a choice between Christ and the nearest relations, which would put them to the severest test.

they long for. I am not come for this purpose, but to send forth the Roman sword, to cut off a disobedient and rebellious nation, the cup of whose iniquity is already full, and whose crimes cry aloud for speedy vengeance.

I am come to set a man at variance. The spirit of Christ can have no union with the spirit of the world. Even a father, while unconverted, will oppose a godly child. Thus the spirit that is in those who sin against God is opposed to that spirit which is in the followers of the Most High.

52. Five in one house divided. See on Matt. x. 35-36.

A man's foes shall be they of his own household. Our Lord refers here to their own traditions. So Sota, fol. 49. "A little before the coming of the Messiah, the son shall insult the father, the daughter rebel against her mother, the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law; and each man shall have his own household for his enemies."

54. A cloud rise. See on Matt. xvi. 2-3.

56. This time? Can you not discover from the writings of the prophets and from the events which now take place that this is the time of the Messiah, and that I am the very Person foretold by them?

57. And why . . . judge ye? Even without the express declarations of the prophets, you might, from what you see and hear yourselves, discern that God has now visited His people in such a manner as He never did before.

58. When thou goest with thine adversary. This and the next verse are a part of our Lord's Sermon on the Mount. See them explained, Matt. v. 25-26. Give diligence. "Give labor," do everything in your power to get free before a suit commences. The officer. Properly signifies such an officer as was appointed to levy the fines imposed by the law for a violation of any of its precepts.

sideration of this, let us give diligence to be delivered out of the hands of God as an adversary, into his hands as a Father, and this as we are in the way, which has the chief stress laid upon it here. While we are alive, we are in the way; and now is our time, by repentance and faith, to get the quarrel made up, while it may be done, before it be too late. Let us take hold on the arm of the Lord stretched out in this gracious offer, that we may make peace.

We have here, I. Tidings brought to Christ of the death of some Galileans lately, whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices, v. 1.

1. What this tragical story was. It is briefly related here, and is not met with in any of the historians of those times. The Galileans being Herod's subjects, it is probable that this outrage committed upon them by Pilate occasioned the quarrel that was between Herod and Pilate, which we read of in ch. xxiii. 12. We are not told what number they were, perhaps but a few; but the circumstance remarked is that he mingled their blood with their sacrifices. Though perhaps they had reason to fear Pilate's malice, yet they would not keep away from Jerusalem, whither the law obliged them to go up with their sacrifices. Neither the holiness of the place nor of the work would be a protection to them from the fury of an unjust judge, who neither feared God nor regarded man. The altar, which used to be a sanctuary and place of shelter, is now become a snare and a trap, a place of danger and slaughter.

2. Why it was related at this season to our Lord Jesus. Perhaps merely as a matter of news, which they supposed he had not heard before, and as a thing which they lamented and believed he would do so too. Perhaps it was intended as a confirmation of what Christ had said in the close of the foregoing chapter, concerning the necessity of making our peace with God in time, "Master, here is a fresh instance of some that were very suddenly delivered to the officer, that were taken away by death when they little expected it; and therefore we have all need to be ready." It will be of good use to us both to explain the word of God and to enforce it upon ourselves by observing the providences of God. Perhaps they would stir him up, being himself of Galilee, and a prophet, to find out a way to revenge the death of these Galileans upon Herod. Perhaps this was told Christ to deter him from going up to Jerusalem, to worship (v. 22), lest Pilate should serve him as he had served those Galileans. Now, lest Pilate, when his hand was in, should proceed further, they think it advisable that Christ should for the present keep out of the way. Christ's answer intimates that they told him this with a spiteful innuendo, that without doubt they were secretly bad men, else God would not have permitted Pilate thus barbarously to cut them off. It was very invidious; rather than they would allow them to be martyrs they would, without any colour of proof, suppose them to be malefactors. This fate of theirs was capable not only of a favourable, but an honourable construction.

II. Christ's reply to this report.

1. He seconded it with another story, which, like it, gave an instance of people's being taken away by sudden death. It is not long since the tower of Siloam fell, and there were eighteen persons killed and buried in the ruins of it. It was a sad story; yet such melancholy accidents we often hear of. Towers, that were built for safety, often prove men's destruction.

2. He cautioned his hearers not to make an ill use of these and similar events, nor take occasion thence to censure great sufferers, as if they were therefore to be accounted great sinners: Suppose ye that these Galileans were sinners above all the Galileans, because they suffered such things? I tell you nay, v. 2, 3. Perhaps they that told him the story of the Galileans were Jews, and were glad of anything that furnished them with matter of reflection upon the Galileans, and therefore Christ retorted upon them the story of the men of Jerusalem, that came to an untimely end. "Now suppose ye that those eighteen who met with their death from the tower of Siloam, while perhaps they were expecting their cure from the pool of Siloam, were debtors to divine justice above all men that dwelt at Jerusalem? I tell you nay." We cannot judge of men's sins by their sufferings in this world; for many are thrown into the furnace as gold to be purified, not as dross and chaff to be consumed. We must therefore not be harsh in our censures of those that are afflicted more than their neighbours, lest we add sorrow to the sorrowful. If we

Vss. 1-9. THE LESSON, "REPENT OR PERISH," SUGGESTED BY TWO RECENT INCIDENTS, AND ILLUSTRATED BY THE PARABLE OF THE BARREN FIG TREE.

1-3. Galileans—possibly the followers of Judas of Galilee, who, some twenty years before this, taught that Jews should not pay tribute to the Romans, and of whom we learn, from Acts 5:37, that he drew after him a multitude of followers, who on his being slain were all dispersed. About this time that party would be at its height, and if Pilate caused this detachment of them to be waylaid and put to death as they were offering their sacrifices at one of the festivals, that would be "mingling their blood with their sacrifices" [GROTIUS, WEBSTER and WILKINSON, but doubted by DE WETTE, MEYER, ALFORD, etc.]. News of this being brought to our Lord, to draw out His views of such, and whether it was not a judgment of Heaven, He simply points them to the practical view of the matter: "These men are not signal examples of divine vengeance, as ye suppose; but every impenitent sinner—ye yourselves, except ye repent—shall be like monuments of the judgment of Heaven, and in a more awful sense."

4, 5. tower in Siloam—probably one of the towers of the city wall, near the pool of Siloam. Of its fall nothing is known.

ALBERT BARNES:

From this account of the Galileans we may learn: (1) That men are very prone to infer, when any great calamity happens to others, that they are peculiarly guilty. See the Book of Job, and the reasoning of his three "friends." (2) That that conclusion, in the way in which it is usually drawn, is erroneous. If we see a man bloated, and haggard, and poor, who is in the habit of intoxication, we may infer properly that he is guilty, and that God hates his sin and punishes it. So we may infer of the effects of licentiousness. But we should not thus infer when a man's house is burned down, or when his children die, or when he is visited with a loss of health; nor should we infer it of the nations that of teeth pay to divine justice the debt a sinner has contracted? This is impossible. Let him who readeth understand.

1. At that season. At what time this happened is not easy to determine, but it appears that it was now a piece of news which was told to Christ and His disciples for the first time. Whose blood Pilate had mingled. This piece of history is not recorded (as far as I can find) by Josephus; however, he states that the Galileans were the most seditious people in the land. They belonged properly to Herod's jurisdiction; but, as they kept the great feasts at Jerusalem, they probably, by their tumultuous behavior at some one of them, gave Pilate, who was a mortal enemy to Herod, a pretext to fall upon and slay many of them and thus, perhaps, sacrifice the people to the resentment he had against the prince.

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

To all those who hastily look on every calamity as a judgment, I would speak in the earnest hope of setting them right. Let me begin, then, by saying: My dear brethren, do not you see that what you say is not true? and that is the best of reasons why you should not say it. Does not your own experience and observation teach you that one event happens both to the righteous and to the wicked? It is true, the wicked man sometimes falls dead in the street; but has not the minister fallen dead in the pulpit? It is true that a pleasure boat, in which men were seeking their own pleasure on Sunday, has suddenly gone down; but is it not equally true that a ship which contained none but godly men, who were bound upon an excursion to preach the gospel, has gone down too? The visible providence of God has no respect of persons; and a storm may gather round the "John Williams" missionary ship quite as well as around a vessel filled with riotous sinners.

Why do you not perceive that the providence of God has been, in fact, in its outward dealings, rather harder upon the good than upon the bad? For, did not Paul say, as he looked upon the miseries of the righteous in his day, "If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable"? The path of righteousness has often conducted men to the rack, to the prison, to the gibbet, to the stake; while the road of sin has often led a man to empire, to dominion, and to high esteem among his fellows. It is not true that in this world God does punish men for sin, and reward them for their good deeds. For, did not David say, "I have seen the wicked in great power, and spreading himself like a green bay tree"? And did not this perplex the Psalmist for a little season, until he went into the sanctuary of God, and he understood their end? Although your faith assures you that the ultimate result of providence will work out only good to the people of God, yet your life, though it be but a brief part of the divine drama of history, must have taught you that providence does not outwardly discriminate between the righteous and the wicked—that the righteous perish suddenly as well as the wicked—that the plague knows no difference between the sinner and the saint—and that the sword of war is alike pitiless to the sons of God and the sons of Belial.

—The Treasury of the New Testament

4. The tower in Siloam. This tower was probably built over one of the porticoes near the pool, which is mentioned in John ix. 7. See also Neh. iii. 15. "Debtors," a Jewish phrase for sinners. Persons professing to be under the law are bound by the law to be obedient to all its precepts; those who obey not are reckoned "debtors" to the law, or rather to that divine justice from which the law came.

will be judging, we have enough to do to judge ourselves. And we might as justly conclude that the oppressors on whose side are power and success, are the greatest saints, as that the oppressed are the greatest sinners. Let us, in our censures of others, do as we would be done by; for as we do we shall be done by: Judge not, that ye be not judged, Matt. vii. 1.

3. On these stories he founded a call to repentance, adding to each of them this awakening word, Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish, v. 3–5. (1) This intimates that we all deserve to perish as much as they did. It must moderate our censures, not only that we are sinners, but that we are as great sinners as they, have as much sin to repent of as they had to suffer for. (2) That therefore we are all concerned to repent, to be sorry for what we have done amiss, and to do so no more. The judgments of God upon others are loud calls to us to repent. (3) That repentance is the way to escape perishing, and it is a sure way. (4) That, if we repent not, we shall certainly perish, as others have done before us. Except we repent, we shall perish eternally, as they perished out of this world. The same Jesus that calls us to repent because the kingdom of heaven is at hand, bids us repent because otherwise we shall perish; so that he has set before us life and death, good and evil, and put us to our choice.

This parable is intended to enforce that word of warning immediately going before, "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish."

I. This parable primarily refers to the nation and people of the Jews. God chose them for his own, made them a people near to him, expected answerable returns of duty and obedience from them, which he would have accounted fruit; but they disappointed his expectations; they were a reproach instead of being a credit to their profession. Upon this, he justly determined to abandon them; but, upon Christ's intercession, he graciously gave them further time and further mercy; tried them, as it were, another year, by sending his apostles among them, to call them to repentance, and in Christ's name to offer them pardon. Some of them were wrought upon to repent, and bring forth fruit, and with them all was well; but the body of the nation continued impenitent and unfruitful, and ruin without remedy came upon them.

II. Yet it has a further reference, and is designed for the awakening of all that enjoy the means of grace to see to it that the temper of their minds and the tenor of their lives be answerable to their opportunities, for that is the fruit required.

1. The advantages which this fig-tree had. It was planted in a vineyard, in better soil, and where it had more care taken of it than other fig-trees had, that commonly grew by the way-side, Matt. xxi. 19. This fig-tree belonged to a certain man. The church of God is his vineyard. We are fig-trees planted in this vineyard. It is a distinguishing favour.

2. The owner's expectation from it: He came, and sought fruit thereon. He did not send, but came himself. Christ came into this world, came to his own, seeking fruit. The God of heaven requires and expects fruit from those that have a place in his vineyard. Leaves will not serve, crying, Lord, Lord; blossoms will not serve, beginning well and promising fair; there must be fruit. Our thoughts, words, and actions must be according to the gospel, light and love.

3. The disappointment of his expectation: He found none, not one fig. It is sad to think how many enjoy the privileges of the gospel, and yet do nothing at all to the honour of God.

(1) He here complains of it to the dresser of the vineyard: I come, seeking fruit, but am disappointed—I find none.

(2) He aggravates it, with two considerations: [1] That he had waited long, and yet was disappointed. As he was not high in his expectations, he only expected fruit, not much fruit, so he was not hasty, he came three years, year after year. In general, it teaches us that the patience of God is stretched out to longsuffering with many that enjoy the gospel, and do not bring forth the fruits of it. How many times three years has God come to many of us, seeking fruit, but has found none. [2] That this fig-tree did not only not bring forth fruit, but did hurt; it cumbered the ground; it took up the room of a fruitful tree, and was injurious to all about it. Those who do not do good commonly do hurt by the influence of their bad example. And the mischief is the greater, and the ground the more cumbered, if it be a high, large, spreading tree, and if it be an old tree of long standing.

4. The doom passed upon it: Cut it down. No other

are afflicted with famine, or the plague, or with the ravages of war; nor should we infer it when a man is killed by lightning, or when he perishes by the blowing up of a steamboat. Those who thus perish may be far more virtuous than many that live. (3) This is not a world of retribution. Good and evil are mingled; the good and the bad suffer, and all are exposed here to calamity. (4) There is another world—a future state—a world where the good will be happy and the wicked punished. There all that is irregular on earth will be regulated; all that appears unequal will be made equal; all that is chaotic will be reduced to order. (5) When men are disposed to speak about the great guilt of others, and the calamities that come upon them, they should inquire about themselves. What is their character? what is their condition? It may be that they are in quite as much danger of perishing as those are whom they regard as so wicked. (6) We must repent or we shall perish. No matter what befalls others, we are sinners; we are to die; we shall be lost unless we repent. Let us, then, think of ourselves rather than of others; and when we hear of any signal calamity happening to others, let us remember that there is calamity in another world as well as here; and that while our fellow sinners are exposed to trials here, we may be exposed to more awful woes there. Woe there is eternal; here, a calamity like that produced by a falling tower is soon over.—Popular Commentary vineyard—a spot selected for its fertility, separated from the surrounding fields, and cultivated with special care, with a view solely to fruit.

6-9. fig tree—Israel, as the visible witness of God in the world, but generally all within the pale of the visible Church of God; a familiar figure (cf. Isa. 5:1-7; John 15:1-8, etc.).

came and sought fruit—a heart turned to God; the fruits of righteousness; cf. Matthew 21:33, 34, and Isaiah 5:2, "He looked that it should bring forth fruit"; He has a right to it, and will require it.

7. three years—a long enough trial for a fig tree, and so denoting probably just a sufficient period of culture for spiritual fruit. The supposed allusion to the duration of our Lord's ministry is precarious.

ADAM CLARKE

5. Ye shall all likewise perish. "In a like way, in the same manner." This prediction of our Lord was literally fulfilled. When the city was taken by the Romans, multitudes of the priests, who were going on with their sacrifices, were slain, and their blood mingled with the blood of their victims; and multitudes were buried under the ruins of the walls, houses, and Temple. See Josephus, War, b. vi, cc. iv—vi.

6. A certain man. Many meanings are given to this parable, and divines may abound in them. The sense which our Lord designed to convey by it appears to be the following: (1) A person, God Almighty. (2) Had a fig tree, the Jewish church.

(3) Planted in his vineyard—established in the land of Judea.

(4) He came seeking fruit—He required that the Jewish people should walk in righteousness, in proportion to the spiritual culture He bestowed on them.

7. Behold these three years. From this circumstance in the parable it may be reasonably concluded that Jesus had been, at the time of saying this, exercising His ministry for three years past; and from what is said in v. 8 of letting it alone this year also, it may be concluded likewise that this parable was spoken about a year before Christ's crucifixion.

(6) Cut it down—let the Roman sword be unsheathed against it.

can be expected concerning barren trees than that they should be cut down. And with good reason, for why cumbers it the ground? What reason is there why it should have a place in the vineyard to no purpose?

5. The dresser's intercession for it. Christ is the great Intercessor. Ministers are intercessors; those we preach to we should pray for.

(1) What it is he prays for, and that is a reprieve: Lord, let it alone this year also. He doth not pray, "Lord, let it never be cut down," but, "Lord, not now." It is desirable to have a barren tree reprieved. Some have not yet grace to repent, yet it is a mercy to them to have space to repent. We owe it to Christ, the great Intercessor, that barren trees are not cut down immediately. We are encouraged to pray to God for the merciful reprieve of barren fig-trees: "Lord, let them alone; bear with them a little longer, and wait to be gracious." Thus must we stand in the gap, to turn away wrath. Reprieves of mercy are but for a time: Let it alone this year also. When God has borne long, we may hope he will bear yet a little longer, but we cannot expect he should bear always. Reprieves may be obtained by the prayers of others for us, but not pardons; there must be our own faith, and repentance, and prayers.

(2) How he promises to improve this reprieve: Till I shall dig about it, and dung it. In general, our prayers must always be seconded with our endeavours. Thus in all our prayers we must request God's grace, with a humble resolution to do our duty, else we mock God, and show that we do not rightly value the mercies we pray for. The dresser of the vineyard engages to do his part, and therein teaches ministers to do theirs. He will dig about the tree and will dung it. Unfruitful Christians must be awakened by the terrors of the law, which break up the fallow ground, and then encouraged by the promises of the gospel, which are warming and fattening, as manure to the tree. Both methods must be tried; the one prepares for the other, and all little enough.

(3) Upon what foot he leaves the matter: "Let us try what we can do with it one year more, and, if it bear fruit, well," v. 9. The word well is not in the original, but the expression is abrupt: If it bear fruit! —supply it how you please, so as to express how wonderfully well-pleased both the owner and dresser will be. Unfruitful professors of religion, if after long unfruitfulness they will repent, and amend, and bring forth fruit, shall find all is well. God will be pleased, ministers' hands will be strengthened. Nay, there will be joy in heaven for it; the ground will be no longer cumbered, but bettered, the vineyard beautified, and the good trees in it made better. As for the tree itself, it is well for it; it shall receive blessing from God (Heb. vi. 7); it shall be purged, and shall bring forth more fruit.

But he adds, If not, then after that thou shalt cut it down. Though God bear long, he will not bear always. Barren trees will certainly be cut down at last, and cast into the fire. The longer God has waited the greater will their destruction be: to be cut down after that will be sad indeed. Cutting down, though it is work that shall be done, is work that God does not take pleasure in. Those that now intercede for barren trees, if they persist in their unfruitfulness will be even content to see them cut down. Their best friends will acquiesce in the righteous judgment of God.

I. The miraculous cure of a woman that had been long under a spirit of infirmity. Our Lord Jesus spent his sabbaths in the synagogues, v. 10. We should make conscience of doing so, and not think we can spend the sabbath as well at home in reading a good book. And, when he was in the synagogues on the sabbath day, he was teaching there. He was in his element when he was teaching. Now to confirm the doctrine he preached, he wrought a miracle, a miracle of mercy.

1. The object of charity was a woman in the synagogue that had a spirit of infirmity eighteen years, v. 11. She had an infirmity which was such that she was bowed together, and could in no wise lift up herself; she could not stand erect. Though she was under this infirmity, yet she went to the synagogue on the sabbath day. Even bodily infirmities, unless they be very grievous indeed, should not keep us from public worship on sabbath days; for God can help us, beyond our expectation.

2. The offer of this cure to one that sought it not bespeaks the preventing mercy and grace of Christ: When Jesus saw her, he called her to him, v. 12. Before she called he answered. She came to him to be taught, and to get good to her soul, and then Christ gave this relief to her bodily infirmity. Those whose

8. He answering . . .—Christ, as Intercessor, loath to see it cut down so long as there was any hope (see vs. 34).

dig . . .—loosen the earth about it and enrich it with manure; pointing to changes of method in the divine treatment of the impenitent, in order to freshen spiritual culture.

9. if fruit, well—Genuine repentance, however late, avails to save (Ch. 23:42, 43).

after that . . .—The final perdition of such as, after the utmost limits of reasonable forbearance, are found fruitless, will be pre-eminently and confessedly just (Prov. 1:24-31; Ezek. 24:13).

10-17. WOMAN OF EIGHTEEN YEAR'S INFIRMITY HEALED ON THE SABBATH.

11. spirit of infirmity—Cf. vs. 17, "whom Satan hath bound." From this it is probable, though not certain, that her protracted infirmity was the effect of some milder form of possession; yet she was "a daughter of Abraham," in the same gracious sense, no doubt, as Zaccheus, after his conversion, was "a son of Abraham" (ch. 19:9).

12, 13. said . . . Woman . . . and laid—both at once.

ADAM CLARKE

Why cumbereth it the ground? Or in other words, "Why should the ground be also useless?" The tree itself brings forth no fruit; let it be cut down that a more profitable one may be planted in its place.

(5) The vinedresser—the Lord Jesus, for God hath committed all judgment to the Son, John v. 22.

(7) Let it alone—Christ is represented as Intercessor for sinners, for whose sake the day of their probation is often lengthened; during which time He is constantly employed in doing everything that has a tendency to promote their salvation.

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

The comparison of a man to a tree, and of human works to fruit, is exceedingly common in Scripture, because it is most suggestive, natural, and appropriate. As fruit is the production of the tree's life, and the end for which the tree exists, so obedience to the divine will, and holiness unto the Lord, should be the product of man's life, and for it he was at first created. When men plant trees in a vineyard, they very naturally expect to find fruit thereon; and if at the age and season of fruitbearing they find no produce, their natural and justifiable expectation is disappointed. Even thus, speaking after the manner of men, it is natural that the great Maker of all should look for the good fruit of obedience and love from the men who are the objects of His providential care, and be grieved when he meets with no return. Man is very much more God's property than a tree can ever be the property of the man who plants a vineyard; and as God has spent so much more skill and wisdom in the creation of a man than a husbandman can have spent in the mere planting of trees, it becomes the more natural that God should look for fruit from His creature, man; and the more reasonable that His most righteous requirements should not be refused. Trees that bring not forth fruit must be cut down; and sinners who bring not forth repentance, faith, and holiness must die. It is only a matter of time as to whether or not the vineyard shall be cleared of the incumbrance of its barren trees; it is but a matter of time as to when the world shall be delivered from the burdensome presence of barren souls. It stands to reason that barren trees which soon become the haunts of all sorts of mischief-doing creatures should be a nuisance to the vineyard; neither can sinners be permitted forever to become the dwelling places of evil spirits, and the dens of iniquity: a thorough riddance must be made of impenitent sinners as well as of rotten trees. There is a time for felling fruitless trees, and there is an appointed season for hewing down and casting into the fire the useless sinner.

—The Treasury of the New Testament

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

Let us first look at the woman at the center of the picture. Eighteen years, says Luke, she had been "bowed together." That is a medical term, and it is not found anywhere else in the New Testament. The Greek word might be translated quite accurately as "bent double." We are told, moreover, that she "could in no wise lift herself up." "Lift herself up" is again a medical term. It occurs in one other place in the New Testament, in John eight, where it speaks of Jesus in the temple and the woman taken in the act of sin. There John says, "He lifted himself up." She was quite unable to look up. If you had met her, she could not have looked at you; bent double, her eyes were always on the first and chief care is for their souls do best befriend the true interests of their bodies likewise.

3. The cure effectually and immediately wrought bespeaks his almighty power. He laid his hands on her, and said, "Woman, thou art loosed from thine infirmity." Though she could in no wise lift up herself, Christ could lift her up, and enable her to lift up herself. She that had been crooked was immediately made straight. This cure represents the work of Christ's grace upon the souls of people, in the conversion of sinners. Unsanctified hearts are under this spirit of infirmity; they are distorted. They can in no wise lift up themselves to God and heaven; the bent of the soul is the quite contrary way. Such crooked souls seek not to Christ; but he calls them to him, speaks a healing word to them, by which he looses them from their infirmity, makes the soul straight. The grace of God can make that straight which the sin of man has made crooked. In the consolation of good people. Many of the children of God are long under a spirit of infirmity, a spirit of bondage. Christ, by his Spirit of adoption, looses them from this infirmity in due time.

4. The present effect of this cure upon the soul of the patient as well as upon her body. She glorified God. When crooked souls are made straight, they will show it by their glorifying God.

II. The offence that was taken at this by the ruler of the synagogue. He had indignation at it, because it was on the sabbath day, v. 14. What light can shine so clear, so strong, that a spirit of bigotry will not serve to shut men's eyes against it. He said to the people, reflecting upon Christ in what he said, There are six days in which men ought to work, in them therefore come and be healed, and not on the sabbath day. See here how light he made of the miracles Christ wrought, as if they were things of course: "You may come and be healed any day of the week." Christ's cures were become, in his eyes, cheap and common things. This was evidently the work of God; and, when God tied us out from working that day, did he tie himself out? The same word in Hebrew signifies both godly and merciful (chesed), to intimate that works of mercy and charity are in a manner works of piety and therefore very proper on sabbath days.

III. Christ's justification of himself in what he had done (v. 15): The Lord then answered him, Thou hypocrite. We must judge charitably, and can judge only according to the outward appearance. Christ knew that he had a real enmity to him and to his gospel, that he did but cloak this with a pretended zeal for the sabbath day. Christ could have told him this, but he vouchsafes to reason the case with him.

1. He appeals to the common practice among the Jews, which was never disallowed, that of watering their cattle on the sabbath day. Those cattle that are kept up in the stable are constantly loosed from the stall on the sabbath day, and led away to watering. It would be a barbarous thing not to do it. Letting the cattle rest on the sabbath day, would be worse than working them, if they must be made to fast on that day.

2. He applies this to the present case (v. 16): "Must the ox and the ass have compassion shown them on the sabbath day, and shall not this woman be loosed from a much greater grievance? She is a daughter of Abraham; she is your sister, and shall she be denied a favour that you grant to an ox or an ass? She is a daughter of Abraham, and therefore is entitled to the Messiah's blessings. She is one whom Satan has bound. Therefore it was not only an act of charity to the poor woman, but of piety to God, to break the power of the devil. She has been in this deplorable condition lo, these eighteen years, and therefore, now that there is an opportunity of delivering her, it ought not to be deferred a day longer. Any of you would have thought eighteen years' affliction full long enough."

IV. The different effect that this had upon those that heard him.

1. What a confusion this was to the malice of his persecutors: When he had said these things, all his adversaries were ashamed (v. 17). It was not a shame that worked repentance, but rather indignation.

2. What a confirmation this was to the faith of his friends: All the people rejoiced for all the glorious things that were done by him. The shame of his foes was the joy of his followers. The things Christ did were glorious things, and we ought to rejoice in them.

I. The gospel's progress foretold in two parables, which we had before, Matt. xiii. 31–33. Christ undertakes here to show what the kingdom of God is like (v. 18): "Whereunto shall I liken the kingdom of God? v. 20. It will be quite another thing from what you ground, and she "could in no wise lift herself up."

Luke tells us in a very significant phrase that she "had a spirit of infirmity," and therefore was bent double, and therefore could not raise herself.

The interpretation of that phrase, "a spirit of infirmity," is found in verse sixteen. Jesus said of her, "Ought not this woman, being a daughter of Abraham, whom Satan had bound." The spirit of infirmity was an evil spirit. This woman was held in the grip of a physical malady, described by this physician-evangelist and writer, as bent double, with no ability to straighten herself at all; and Jesus says, "Satan had bound her."

Here, then, was a case in which an evil spirit had produced a physical malady that lasted eighteen years. There is no suggestion in this story that there was anything of immorality in this woman's life. She was the victim of a demon activity, under what circumstances we do not know, producing a physical disability and holding the woman in it for eighteen long years. There is no hint of this mastery having produced an immoral effect in her life. As a matter of fact, here she was in the synagogue. She had found her way to the place of worship, and when Jesus presently called her a daughter of Abraham, He did not merely mean she was a Jewess; that was patent. He was using the term in its full spiritual significance as revealing her faith in God. Here, then, was a case of physical suffering that was directly produced by the power of Satan. I am not attempting to explain this. There may be many other such cases in the world. There are things we have not fathomed yet in life concerning the mystery of suffering and the power of evil. We take the facts as revealed, and proceed to consider the action of Jesus.

Then He spoke to her. He called her "Woman." There are other occasions when He used the term, and on His lips it was ever a word of infinite and beautiful tenderness. Then He touched her, as He said, "Woman, thou art loosed from thine infirmity," and in a moment she was straight. A characteristic of the healing work of Jesus was that it was immediate, it was complete. There was no wondering whether the person was healed when He healed. There was no hysterical delay. People may fling their crutches away, and have to pick them up again. They never picked them up again when He healed. The woman was healed, she was completely healed, "immediately she was made straight."

Now let us listen to the ruler of the synagogue. He was angry. In the words of Scripture, "he was moved with indignation." The ruler of the synagogue, devoted to the worship of God, angry! Why? There was a woman who had entered the synagogue, a cripple, a derelict, a sufferer, now standing erect and glorifying God.

As I look at the ruler, I see that a man who has lost his sense of the worth of humanity has lost his sense of the truth about God. He did not know God. One the contrary, Jesus, knowing God, knew the value of humanity. A man who has lost his vision of God, and does not know God, has always lost his sense of the value of human life. But a man who knows God, knows the value of every human life, and knows that the tithing of mint and anise and rue and cummin are trivialities by comparison with the necessity for righteousness and truth and justice and mercy.—The Gospel According to Luke expect. You expect it will appear great, and will arrive at its perfection all of a sudden; but you are mistaken, it is like a grain of mustard-seed, a little thing, makes but a little figure, and promises but little; yet, when sown it waxes a great tree, v. 19." Many perhaps were prejudiced against the gospel, because its beginning was so small. Christ would remove this prejudice, by assuring them that though its beginning was small its latter end should greatly increase; so that many should come upon the wing, to lodge in the branches of it. "You expect it will make its way by external means, but it shall work like leaven, silently and insensibly, and without any force or violence," v. 21. A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump; so the doctrine of Christ will strangely diffuse its relish into the world of mankind. But you must give it time, and you will find it does wonders. By degrees the whole will be leavened.

II. Christ's progress towards Jerusalem recorded: He went through the cities and villages, teaching and journeying, v. 22. Here we find Christ journeying towards Jerusalem, to the feast of dedication, which was in the winter, when travelling was uncomfortable.

Verses 23–30

I. A question put to our Lord Jesus. Who it was that put it we are not told, whether a friend or a foe. The question was, Are there few that are saved? v. 23. Perhaps it was a captious question. If he should say that many would be saved, they would reproach him as too loose; if few, they would reproach him as precise and strait-laced. In nothing do men more betray their ignorance than in judging of the salvation of others. Perhaps it was a curious question, a nice speculation. Many are more inquisitive respecting who shall be saved, and who not, than respecting what they shall do to be saved. Perhaps it was an admiring question. He had taken notice how strict the law of Christ was, and how bad the world was, and, comparing these together, cries out, "How few are there that will be saved!" We have reason to wonder that of the many to whom the word of salvation is sent there are so few to whom it is indeed a saving word. Perhaps it was an enquiring question: "If there be few that be saved, what then? What influence should this have upon me?"

II. Christ's answer to this question. Our Saviour did not give a direct answer to this enquiry, for he came to guide men's consciences, not to gratify their curiosity. Not, "What shall become of such and such?" But, "What shall I do, and what will become of me?"

1. A quickening exhortation and direction: Strive to enter in at the strait gate. This is directed not to him only that asked the question, but to all: Strive ye. All that will be saved must enter in at the strait gate, and must submit to a strict discipline. Those that would enter in at the strait gate must strive to enter. It is a hard matter to get to heaven, and a point that will not be gained without a great deal of care and pains. "Be in an agony; strive as those that run for a prize; excite and exert ourselves to the utmost."

2. Divers awakening considerations.

(1) Think how many take some pains for salvation and yet perish because they do not take enough. Many will seek to enter in, and shall not be able; they seek, but they do not strive. The reason why many come short of grace and glory is because they rest in a lazy seeking. They have a good mind to happiness, and a good opinion of holiness, and take some good steps towards both. But their convictions are weak; their desires are cold, and their endeavours feeble, and there is no strength or steadiness in their resolutions; and thus they come short.

(2) Think of the distinguishing day that is coming and the decisions of that day: The Master of the house will rise up, and shut to the door, v. 25. Now he seems as if he left things at large; but the day is coming when he will rise up, and shut to the door. What door? A door of distinction. Now, within the temple of the church there are carnal professors who worship in the outer-court, and spiritual professors who worship within the veil; between these the door is now open. But, when the Master of the house is risen up, the door will be shut between them, that those who are in the outer-court may be kept out. As to those that are filthy, shut the door upon them, that those who are within may be kept within, that those who are holy may be holy still. The door is shut to separate between the precious and the vile. A door of denial and exclusion. The door of mercy and grace has long stood open to them, but they would not come in by it; they hoped to get to heaven by their own merits, and therefore when the Master of the house is risen up he will justly shut that door.

(3) Think how many who were very confident that they should be saved will be rejected in the day of

18-30. MISCELLANEOUS TEACHINGS. 18-21. mustard seed . . . leaven—See on Mark 4:30-32). The parable of "the Leaven" sets forth, perhaps, rather the inward growth of the kingdom, while "the Mustard Seed" seems to point chiefly to the outward. It being a woman's work to knead, it seems a refinement to say that "the woman" here represents the Church, as the instrument of depositing the leaven. Nor does it yield much satisfaction to understand the "three measures of meal" of that threefold division of our nature into "spirit, soul, and body," (alluded to in I Thess. 5:23) or of the threefold partition of the world among the three sons of Noah (Gen. 10:32), as some do. It yields more real satisfaction to see in this brief parable just the all-penetrating and assimilating quality of the Gospel, by virtue of which it will yet mould all institutions and tribes of men, and exhibit over the whole earth one "Kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ." (See on Rev. 11:15.)

23. Lord . . .—one of those curious questions by talking of which some flatter themselves they are religious.

said unto them—the multitude; taking no notice of the man or his question, save as furnishing the occasion of a solemn warning not to trifle with so momentous a matter as "salvation." 24. Strive—The word signifies to "contend" as for the mastery, to "struggle," expressive of the difficulty of being saved, as if one would have to force his way in. strait gate—another figure of the same. (See Note on Matt. 7:13, 14).

for many . . . will seek—desire, i.e., with a mere wish or slothful endeavor. and shall not be able—because it must be made a life-and-death struggle.

25. master of the house is risen up and hath shut to the door—awfully sublime and vivid picture! At present he is represented as in a sitting posture, as if calmly looking on to see who will "strive," while entrance is practicable, and who will merely "seek" to enter in. But this is to have an end, by the great Master of the house Himself rising and shutting the door, after which there will be no admittance.

ADAM CLARKE

18-19. The kingdom . . . is like a grain of mustard seed. See on Matt. xiii. 31.

21. Like leaven. See this explained, Matt. xiii. 33.

22. Journeying toward Jerusalem. Luke represents all that is said, from chap. ix. 51, as having been done and spoken while Christ was on His last journey to Jerusalem.

Enter ye in at the strait gate. The words in the original are very emphatic: Enter in (to the kingdom of Heaven) through this strait gate, i.e., of doing to everyone as you would he should do unto you; for this alone seems to be the strait gate which our Lord alludes to. For wide is the gate. And very "broad"; a spacious, roomy place that leadeth forward into that destruction, meaning eternal misery.

Because strait is the gate. Instead of because, I should prefer "how," which reading is supported by a great majority of the best MSS., versions, and fathers. How strait is that gate! This mode of expression more forcibly points out the difficulty of the way to the Kingdom. Few there be that find it. The strait gate signifies literally what we call a wicket, i.e., a little door in a large gate. Gate, among the Jews, signifies, metaphorically, the entrance, introduction, or means of acquiring anything. So they talk of the gate of repentance, the gate of prayers and the gate of tears. When God, say they, shut the gate of paradise against Adam, He opened to him the gate of repentance.

24. Many . . . will seek. They seek—wish and desire; but they do not strive. Therefore, because they will not "agonize"—will not be in earnest—they shall not get in.

25. And hath shut to the door. See the notes on Matt. vii. 22-23 and xxv. 10-41.

trial, and you will say that there are few that shall be saved and that we are all concerned to strive. Consider,

[1] How far their hope carried them, even to heaven's gate. There they stand and knock, knock as those that belong to the house, saying, "Lord, Lord, open to us, for we think we have a right to enter." Many are ruined by an ill-grounded hope of heaven, which they never distrusted or called in question. They call Christ, Lord; they are desirous now to enter in by that door which they had formerly made light of.

[2] What grounds they had for this confidence. Let us see what their plea is, v. 26. They had been Christ's guests and had shared in his favours: We have eaten and drunk in thy presence, at thy table. They had been Christ's hearers: "Thou hast taught in our streets. Wouldest thou teach us, and not save us?"

[3] How their confidence will fail them. Christ will say to them, I know you not whence you are, v. 25. And again (v. 27), I tell you, I know you not, depart from me. First, He disowns them: "I know you not; you do not belong to my family." The Lord knows them that are his, but them that are not he does not know, he has nothing to do with them. Secondly, He discards them: Depart from me. "Depart from my door, here is nothing for you." Thirdly, He gives them such a character as is the reason of this doom: You are workers of iniquity. This is their ruin, that, under a pretence of piety, they did the devil's drudgery in Christ's livery.

[4] How terrible their punishment will be (v. 28): There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth, the utmost degree of grief and indignation: You shall see the patriarchs and prophets in the kingdom of God, and yourselves thrust out. The Old Testament saints are in the kingdom of God; they saw his day at a distance and it reflected comfort upon them. New Testament sinners will be thrust out of the kingdom of God. They shall be thrust out with shame, as having no part or lot in the matter. The sight of the saint's glory will be a great aggravation of sinner's misery.

(4) Think who are they that shall be saved, notwithstanding: They shall come from the east and the west; and the last shall be first, v. 29, 30. By what Christ said, it appears that but few shall be saved of those who we think most likely. Yet do not say then that the gospel is preached in vain. There shall come many from all parts of the Gentile world that shall be admitted. When we come to heaven, we shall meet a great many there whom we little thought to have met there, and miss a great many thence whom we verily expected to have found there. Those who sit down in the kingdom of God are such as had taken pains to get thither, for they came from far—from the east and from the west, from the north and from the south. This shows that they who would enter into that kingdom must strive. Many who stood fair for heaven came short, and others who seemed cast behind will win and wear this prize, and therefore it concerns us to strive to enter. Shall I, who started first, and stood nearest, miss of heaven, when others, less likely, enter into it? If it be got by striving, why should not I strive?

I. A suggestion to Christ of his danger from Herod, now that he was in Galilee, within Herod's jurisdiction (v. 31): Certain of the Pharisees came to Christ, and said, Get thee out of this country, and depart hence, for otherwise Herod will kill thee. Some think that these Pharisees had no ground at all for this, but that they framed this lie, to drive him out of Galilee, and to drive him into Judea,where they knew there were those that really sought his life. But, Christ's answer being directed to Herod himself, it should seem that the Pharisees had ground for what they said, and that Herod was enraged against Christ, and designed him a mischief. Herod was willing to get rid of Christ. He hoped to frighten him away by sending him this threatening message.

II. His defiance of Herod's rage: Go you, and tell that fox so, v. 32. In calling him a fox, he gives him his true character; for he was subtle as a fox, noted for his craft, and treachery, and baseness. And, though it is a black and ugly character, yet it did not ill become Christ to give it to him. For Christ was a prophet, and prophets always had a liberty of speech in reproving princes and great men. Therefore it became him to call this proud king by his own name: "Go, and tell that fox that I do not fear him. I know that I must die, and must die shortly; I expect it, the third day," that is, "very shortly; my hour is at hand. If Herod should kill me, he will not surprise me. Tell him I do not fear him; when I die, I shall be perfected; I shall have completed my 26, 27. See on the similar passage (Matt. 7:22, 23). eaten and drunk . . .—We have sat with Thee at the same table. taught in our streets—Do we not remember listening in our own streets to Thy teaching? Surely we are not to be denied admittance? But he shall say . . .—No nearness of external communion with Christ will avail at the great day, in place of that "holiness without which no man shall see the Lord." Observe the style which Christ intimates that He will then assume, that of absolute Disposer of men's eternal destinies, and contrast it with His "despised and rejected" condition at that time.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

Boldly and searchingly personal as the preceding words had been, the final turn of Christ's answer must have had a still sharper and more distasteful edge. He had struck a blow at Jewish trust in outward connection with Messiah as ensuring participation in His kingdom. He now says that the Gentiles shall fill the vacant places. Many Jews will be unable to enter, for all their seeking, but still there will be many saved; for troops of hated Gentiles shall come from every corner of the earth, and the sight of them sitting beside the fathers of the nation, while Israel after the flesh is shut out, will move the excluded to weeping—the token of sorrow, which yet has in it no softening nor entrance-securing effect, because it passes into "gnashing of teeth," the sign of anger. Such sorrow worketh death.

—Expositions of Holy Scripture

31-35. MESSAGE TO HEROD. 31. and depart hence—and "go forward," push on. He was on His way out of Perea, east of Jordan, and in Herod's dominions, "journeying towards Jerusalem" (vs. 22). Haunted by guilty fears, probably, Herod wanted to get rid of Him (see on Mark 6:14), and seems, from our Lord's answer, to have sent these Pharisees, under pretense of a friendly hint, to persuade Him that the sooner He got beyond Herod's jurisdiction the better it would be for His own safety. Our Lord saw through both of them, and sends the cunning ruler a message couched in dignified and befitting irony.

32. that fox—that crafty, cruel enemy of God's innocent servants.

ADAM CLARKE

Not every one. The sense of this verse seems to be this: No person, by merely acknowledging My authority, believing in the divinity of My nature, professing faith in the perfection of My righteousness, and the infinite merit of My atonement, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven—shall have any part with God in glory; but he that doeth the will of my Father—he who gets the bad tree rooted up, the good tree planted, and continues to bring forth fruit to the glory and praise of God.

Many will say to me in that day. "In that very day," viz., the day of judgment—Have we not prophesied, taught, publicly preached, in thy name; acknowledging Thee to be the only Saviour, and proclaiming Thee as such to others; cast out demons, impure spirits, who had taken possession of the bodies of men; done many wonderful works, miracles, being assisted by supernatural agency to invert even the course of nature, and thus prove the truth of the doctrine we preached?

28. Abraham, and Isaac. See on Matt. viii. 11, where the figures and allusions made use of here are particularly explained.

29. They shall come. That is, the Gentiles, in every part of the world, shall receive the gospel of the grace of God, when the Jews shall have rejected it.

30. There are last which shall be first. See on Matt. xix. 30.

31. Depart hence. It is probable that the place from which Christ was desired to depart was Galilee or Perea, for beyond this Herod had no jurisdiction. Herod will kill thee. Lactantius says that this Herod was the person who chiefly instigated the Jewish rulers to put our Lord to death—fearing lest himself should be expelled from the kingdom if Christ should be permitted to set up His.

32. Tell that fox. Herod was a very vicious prince, and lived in public incest with his sister-in-law, Mark vi. 17. A fox among the Jews appears to have been the emblem of a wicked ruler who united cunning with cruelty, and was always plotting how he might aggrandize himself by spoiling the people.

business"; I shall be consecrated. When Christ died, he is said to have sanctified himself; he consecrated himself to his priestly office with his own blood. "I know that neither he nor any one else can kill me till I have done my work. I will cast out devils, and do cures, today and tomorrow, in spite of him and all his threats. It is not in his power to hinder me. I must go about preaching and healing, today, and tomorrow, and the day following." It is good for us to look upon the time we have before us as but a little, that we may thereby be quickened to do the work of the day in its day. And it is a comfort to us, in reference to the power and malice of our enemies, that they can have no power to take us off as long as God has any work for us to do. "I know that Herod can do me no harm, not only because my time is not yet come, but because the place appointed for my death is Jerusalem, which is not within his jurisdiction: It cannot be that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem." Now none undertook to try prophets, but the great sanhedrim, which always sat at Jerusalem; and therefore, if a prophet be put to death, it must be at Jerusalem.

III. His lamentation for Jerusalem, and his denunciation of wrath against that city, v. 34, 35. This we had in Matt. xxiii. 37–39. 1. The wickedness of persons and places that more eminently than others profess relation to God is in a particular manner provoking and grieving to the Lord Jesus. How pathetically does he speak of the sin and ruin of that holy city! O Jerusalem! O Jerusalem! 2. Those that enjoy great plenty of the means of grace, if they are not profited by them, are often prejudiced against them. If men's corruptions are not conquered, they are provoked. 3. Jesus Christ has shown himself willing to receive and entertain poor souls that come to him: How often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen gathereth her brood under her wings, with such care and tenderness! 4. I would, I often would, and ye would not. Christ's willingness aggravates sinners' unwillingness. 5. The house that Christ leaves is left desolate. The temple is desolate if Christ has deserted it. He leaves it to them; let them take it to themselves, and make their best of it, Christ will trouble it no more. 6. Christ justly withdraws from those that drive him from them. They would not be gathered by him, and therefore, saith he, "You shall not see me any more." 7. The judgment of the great day will effectually convince unbelievers that would not now be convinced: "Then you will say, Blessed is he that cometh"—"you will not see me to be the Messiah till then when it is too late."

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

Behold, I cast out devils and I do cures—i.e., "Plot on and ply thy wiles; I also have My plans; My works of mercy are nearing completion, but some yet remain; I have work for to-day and to-morrow too, and the third day; by that time I shall be where his jurisdiction reaches not; the guilt of My blood shall not lie at his door; that dark deed is reserved for others." He does not say, I preach the Gospel—that would have made little impression upon Herod—in the light of the merciful character of Christ's actions the malice of Herod's snares is laid bare [BENGEL]. to-day, to-morrow, the third day—remarkable language expressive of successive steps of His work yet remaining, the calm deliberateness with which He meant to go through with them, one after another, to the last, unmoved by Herod's threat, yet the rapid march with which they were now hastening to completion. (Cf. John 22:18.) I shall be perfected—I finish my course. I attain completion. 33. it cannot be that a prophet . . .—"It would never do that . . ."—awful severity of satire this upon "the bloody city!" "He seeks to kill me, does he? Ah! I must be out of Herod's jurisdiction for that. Go tell him I neither fly from him nor fear him, but Jerusalem is the prophets' slaughter-house." 34, 35. O Jerusalem . . .—(See on Matt. 23:37, 39).

How ineffably grand and melting is this apostrophe! It is the very heart of God pouring itself forth through human flesh and speech. It is this incarnation of the innermost life and love of Deity, pleading with men, bleeding for them, and ascending only to open His arms to them and win them back by the power of this story of matchless love, that has conquered the world, that will yet "draw all men unto Him," and beautify and ennoble Humanity itself! "Jerusalem" here does not mean the mere city or its inhabitants; nor is it to be viewed merely as the metropolis of the nation, but as the center of their religious life—"the city of their solemnities, whither the tribes went up, to give thanks unto the name of the Lord"; and at this moment it was full of them. It is the whole family of God, then, which is here apostrophized by a name dear to every Jew, recalling to him all that was distinctive and precious in his religion.

To day and to morrow. I am to work miracles for two days more, and on the third day I shall be put to death. But it is probable that this phrase only means that He had but a short time to live, without specifying its duration. Perfected. Or "finished." I shall then have accomplished the purpose for which I came into the world, leaving nothing undone which the counsel of God designed Me to complete. Hence, in reference to our Lord, the word implies His dying, as the plan of human redemption was not finished till He bowed His head and gave up the ghost on the Cross; see John xix. 30, where the same word is used. It is used also in reference to Christ's death, Heb. ii. 10; v. 9; see also Acts xx. 24 and Heb. xii. 23.

33. I must walk. I must continue to work miracles and teach for a short time yet, and then I shall die in Jerusalem. Therefore I cannot depart, according to the advice given Me (v. 31), nor can a hair of My head fall to the ground till My work be all done. Perish out of Jerusalem. A man who professes to be a prophet can be tried on that ground only by the grand Sanhedrin, which always resides at Jerusalem; and as the Jews are about to put Me to death, under the pretense of My being a false prophet, therefore My sentence must come from this city and My death take place in it.

35. Your house. The Temple—called here your house, not "My house"—I acknowledge it no longer; I have abandoned it, and will dwell in it no more forever. So He said, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 17, when He delivered the Temple into the hands of the Chaldeans—the house of their sanctuary. A similar form of speech is found, Exod. xxxii. 7, where the Lord said to Moses, "Thy people," to intimate that He acknowledged them no longer for His followers. But some think that our Lord means, not the Temple, but the whole commonwealth of the Jews.

I. The Son of man came eating and drinking, conversing familiarly with all sorts of people. Here he went into the house of one of the chief Pharisees to eat bread on the sabbath day, v. 1. See how favourable God is to us, that he allows us time, even on his own day, for bodily refreshments; and how careful we should be not to abuse that liberty. Christ went only to eat bread, to take such refreshment as was necessary on the sabbath day. Our sabbath meals must, with a particular care, be guarded against all manner of excess.

II. He went about doing good. Here was a certain man before him who had the dropsy, v. 2. Christ prevented him with the blessings of his goodness, and before he called he answered him. It is a happy thing to be where Christ is. This man had the dropsy, it is probable, in a high degree.

III. He endured the contradiction of sinners against himself: They watched him, v. 1. The Pharisee that invited him, it should seem, did it with a design to pick some quarrel with him. When Christ asked them whether they thought it lawful to heal on the sabbath day they would say neither yea nor nay, for their design was to inform against him, not to be informed by him. They would not say it was lawful to heal, they could not for shame say it was not lawful. Good men have often been persecuted for doing that which even their persecutors could not but own to be lawful and good. Many a good work Christ did, for which they cast stones at him and his name.

IV. Christ would not be hindered from doing good by the opposition and contradiction of sinners. He took him, and healed him, and let him go, v. 4. He took him, that is, he laid hands on him, to cure him; he embraced him, took him in his arms, big and unwieldly as he was (for so dropsical people generally are), and reduced him to shape. Christ cured even that disease, perfectly cured it, in a moment. He then let him go, lest the Pharisees should fall upon him for being healed, for what absurdities would not

Vss. 1-24. HEALING OF A DROPSICAL MAN, AND MANIFOLD TEACHINGS AT A SABBATH FEAST.

2. man before him—not one of the company, since this was apparently before the guests sat down, and probably the man came in hope of a cure, though not expressly soliciting it [DE WETTE]. 3-6. (See on Matt. 12:11, 12.)

Is it lawful to heal on the sabbath days? that they might accuse him—Matthew and Luke say they "watched Him whether He would heal on the sabbath day." They were now come to the length of dogging His steps, to collect materials for a charge of impiety against Him. It is probable that it was to their thoughts rather than their words that Jesus addressed Himself in what follows.

Then saith he to the man, Stretch forth thine hand. And he stretched it forth—the power to obey going forth with the word of command. and it was restored whole, like as the other—The poor man, having faith in this wonderful Healer—which no doubt the whole scene would singularly help to strengthen—disregarded the proud and venomous Pharisees, and thus gloriously put them to shame.

1. Chief Pharisees. Or "one of the rulers of the Pharisees." A man who was of the sect of the Pharisees, and one of the rulers of the people. To eat bread on the sabbath day. But why is it that there should be an invitation or dinner given on the Sabbath day? Answer: The Jews purchased and prepared the best viands they could procure for the Sabbath day, in order to do it honor. As the Sabbath is intended for the benefit of both the body and soul of man, it should not be a day of austerity or fasting, especially among the laboring poor. The most wholesome and nutritive food should be then procured if possible, that both body and soul may feel the influence of this divine appointment, and give God the glory of His grace. On this blessed day let every man eat his bread with gladness and singleness of heart, praising God. They watched him. Or "were maliciously watching." The conduct of this Pharisee was most execrable. Professing friendship and affection, he invited our blessed Lord to his table, merely that he might have a more favorable opportunity of watching His conduct, that he might accuse Him and take away His life. In eating and drinking people feel generally less restraint than at other times and are apt to converse more freely. The man who can take such an advantage over one of his own guests must have a baseness of soul of which we would have thought that devils alone were capable.

2. The dropsy. "Dropsical." Probably the insidious Pharisee had brought this dropsical man to the place, not doubting that our Lord's eye would affect His heart, and that He would instantly cure him; and then he could most plausibly accuse Him for a breach of the Sabbath. If this were the case, and it is likely, how deep must have been the perfidy and malice of such men as they were be guilty of?

V. Our Lord Jesus did nothing but what he could justify, v. 5, 6. He still answered their thoughts, and made them hold their peace for shame who before held their peace for subtlety, by an appeal to their own practice. Which of you shall have an ass or an ox fallen into a pit, and will not pull him out on the sabbath day, and that straightway, not deferring it till the sabbath be over, lest it perish? It is not so much out of compassion to the poor creature that they do it as a concern for their own interest. It is their own ox, and their own ass, that is worth money, that they will dispense with the law of the sabbath for the saving of. Many can easily dispense with that, for their own interest, which they cannot dispense with for God's glory and the good of their brethren. This question silenced them: They could not answer him again to these things, v. 6. Christ will be justified when he speaks.

Our Lord Jesus here sets us an example of profitable edifying discourse at our tables, when we are in company with our friends. When he was in company with strangers, nay, with enemies that watched him, he took occasion to reprove what he saw amiss in them, and to instruct them. We must not only not allow any corrupt communication at our tables, but we must go beyond common harmless talk, and should take occasion from God's goodness to us at our tables to speak well of him, and learn to spiritualise common things. Our Lord Jesus was among persons of quality, yet, as one that had not respect of persons,

I. He takes occasion to reprove the guests for striving to sit uppermost.

1. He observed how these lawyers and Pharisees affected the highest seats, v. 7. He had charged that sort of men with this in general, ch. xi. 43. Here he brings home the charge to particular persons. He marked how they chose out the chief rooms; every man, as he came in, got as near the best seat as he could. Even in the common actions of life, Christ's eye is upon us, and he marks what we do.

2. He observed how those who were thus aspiring often exposed themselves, and came off with a slur; whereas those who were modest, and seated themselves in the lowest seats, often gained respect by it. Those who assume the highest seats, may perhaps be degraded, and forced to come down to give place to one more honourable, v. 8, 9. It ought to check our high thoughts of ourselves to think how many there are that are more honourable than we, not only in respect of worldly dignities, but of personal merits and accomplishments. The master of the feast will marshal his guests, and will not see the more honourable kept out of the seat that is his due, and therefore will make bold to take him lower that usurped it: Give this man place. Pride will have shame, and will at last have a fall. Those who content themselves with the lowest seats, are likely to be preferred (v. 10): "Go, and seat thyself in the lowest room, as taking it for granted that thy friend has guests to come that are of better rank and quality than thou art; but perhaps it may not prove so, and then it will be said to thee, Friend, go up higher." The way to rise high is to begin low: "Thou shalt have honour and respect before those that sit with thee. They will see thee to be an honourable man. Honour appears the brighter for shining out of obscurity. They will likewise see thee to be a humble man, which is the greatest honour of all." A parable out of one of the rabbin is somewhat like this. "Three men," said he, "were bidden to a feast; one sat highest, For, said he, I am a prince; the other next, For, said he, I am a wise man; the other lowest, For, said he, I am a humble man. The king seated the humble man highest, and put the prince lowest."

3. He applied this generally, and would have us all learn not to mind high things. Pride and ambition are disgraceful before men: for whosoever exalteth himself shall be abased; but humility and self-denial are really honourable: he that humbleth himself shall be exalted, v. 11.

II. He takes occasion to reprove the master of the feast for inviting so many rich people, when he should rather have invited the poor. Our Saviour here teaches us that the using of what we have in works of charity is better than using it in magnificent housekeeping.

1. "Covet not to treat the rich; invite not thy friends, and brethren, and neighbours, that are rich," v. 12. This does not prohibit the entertaining of such, for the cultivating of friendship among relations and neighbours. "Do not make a common custom of it. One feast for the rich will make a great many meals

Resistless appeal! "A righteous man regardeth the life of his beast" (Prov. 12:10), and would instinctively rescue it from death or suffering on the sabbath day; how much more his nobler fellow man! But the reasoning, as given in the other two Gospels, is singularly striking: "But He knew their thoughts, and said to the man which had the withered hand, Rise up, and stand forth in the midst. And he arose and stood forth. Then said Jesus unto them, I will ask you one thing: Is it lawful on the sabbath days to do good, or to do evil? to save life or to destroy it?" (Luke 6:8, 9), or as in Mark (3:4), "to kill?" He thus shuts them up to this startling alternative: "Not to do good, when it is in the power of our hand to do it, is to do evil; not to save life, when we can, is to kill"—and must the letter of the sabbath rest be kept at this expense? This unexpected thrust shut their mouths. By this great ethical principle our Lord, we see, held Himself bound, as man. But here we must turn to Mark, whose graphic details make the second Gospel so exceedingly precious. "When He had looked round about on them with anger, being grieved for the hardness of their hearts, He saith unto the man" (Mark 3:5). This is one of the very few passages in the Gospel history which reveal our Lord's feelings. How holy this anger was appears from the "grief" which mingled with it at "the hardness of their hearts."

7-11. a parable—showing that His design was not so much to inculcate mere politeness or good manners, as underneath this to teach something deeper (vs. 11). chief rooms—principal seats, in the middle part of the couch on which they reclined at meals, esteemed the most honorable.

8. wedding—and seating thyself at the wedding feast. Our Lord avoids the appearance of personality by this delicate allusion to a different kind of entertainment than this of his host [BENGEL]. 9. the lowest—not a lower merely [BENGEL]. with shame—"To be lowest is only ignominious to him who affects the highest" [BENGEL]. 10. Friend—said to the modest guest only, not the proud one (vs. 9) [BENGEL]. worship—honor. The whole of this is but a reproduction of Proverbs 25:6, 7. But it was reserved for the matchless Teacher to utter articulately, and apply to the regulation of the minutest features of social life, such great laws of the Kingdom of God as that of vs. 11.

"whosoever . . ."—couching them in a chaste simplicity and proverbial terseness of style which makes them "apples of gold in a setting of silver." (See on ch. 18:14.)

12-14. call not thy friends—Jesus certainly did not mean us to dispense with the duties of ordinary fellowship, but, remitting these to their proper place, inculcates what is better [BENGEL].

ADAM CLARKE

the Pharisee!

4. They held their peace. They could not answer the question but in the affirmative; and as they were determined to accuse Him if He did heal the man, they could not give an answer but such as would condemn themselves, and therefore they were silent.

7. They chose out the chief rooms. When custom and law have regulated and settled places in public assemblies, a man who is obliged to attend may take the place which belongs to him, without injury to himself or to others. When nothing of this nature is settled, the law of humility and the love of order are the only judges of what is proper. To take the highest place when it is not our due is public vanity; obstinately to refuse it when offered is another instance of the same vice, though private and concealed. Humility takes as much care to avoid the ostentation of an affected refusal as the open seeking of a superior place. In this parable our Lord only repeats advices which the rabbins had given to their pupils, but were too proud to conform to themselves. Rabbi Akiba said, "Go two or three seats lower than the place that belongs to thee, and sit there till they say unto thee, 'Go up higher'; but do not take the uppermost seat, lest they say unto thee, 'Come down': for it is better that they should say unto thee, 'Go up, go up'; than that they should say, 'Come down, come down.'"

11. For whosoever exalteth himself. This is the unchangeable conduct of God. He is ever abasing the proud, and giving grace, honor, and glory to the humble.

12. Call not thy friends. Our Lord certainly does not mean that a man should not entertain, at particular times, his friends. But what He inculcates here is charity to the poor; and what He condemns is those entertainments which are given to the rich either to flatter them or to procure a similar return.

for the poor. Be not proud of it." Many make feasts only to make a show, and thus rob their families, to please their fancies. "Aim not at being paid again in your own coin." This is that which our Saviour blames in making such entertainments: "You commonly do it in hopes that you will be invited by them, and so a recompense will be made you."

2. "Be forward to relieve the poor (v. 13, 14): When thou makest a feast invite the poor and maimed, such as have nothing to live upon, nor are able to work for their living. These are objects of charity; they want necessaries; furnish them, and they will recompense thee with their prayers. They will go away, and thank God for thee. Say not that thou art a loser, because they cannot recompense thee, for thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just." Works of charity perhaps may not be rewarded in this world, for the things of this world are not the best things, but they shall in no wise lose their reward. It will be found that the longest voyages make the richest returns.

I. The occasion of the discourse was given by one of the guests, who said to him, Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God (v. 15).

1. But with what design does this man bring it in here? (1) Perhaps this man, fearing he should put the company out of humour, started this, to divert the discourse to something else. Or, (2) Admiring the good rules which Christ had now given, but despairing to see them lived up to, he longs for the kingdom of God, and pronounces them blessed who shall have a place in that kingdom. Or, (3) Christ having mentioned the resurrection of the just, he here confirms what he said, "Yea, Lord, they that shall be recompensed in the resurrection of the just, shall eat bread in the kingdom." Or, (4) Observing Christ to be silent, he was willing to draw him in again to further discourse; and he knew nothing more likely to engage him than to mention the kingdom of God. Even those that are not of ability to carry on good discourse themselves ought to put in a word now and then, to help it forward.

2. Now what this man said was a plain and acknowledged truth, and it was quoted very appositely now that they were sitting at meat. This thought will be very seasonable when we are partaking of bodily refreshments: Blessed are they that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God. (1) In the kingdom of grace. Christ promised his disciples that they should eat and drink with him in his kingdom. (2) In the kingdom of glory. Blessed are they that shall sit down at that table, whence they shall rise no more.

II. The parable which our Lord Jesus put forth upon this occasion, v. 16, &c. "But who are they that shall enjoy that privilege? You Jews will generally reject it, and the Gentiles will be the greatest sharers in it." Now in the parable we may observe,

1. The free grace and mercy of God, shining in the gospel of Christ; it appears,

(1) In the rich provision he has made for poor souls (v. 16): A certain man made a great supper. It is called a supper, because in those countries supper time was the chief feasting time.

(2) In the gracious invitation given us to come and partake of this provision. A general invitation given: He bade many. Christ invited the whole nation and people of the Jews to partake of the benefits of his gospel. Christ in the gospel, as he keeps a good house, keeps an open house. A particular memorandum given; the servant was sent round to put them in mind of it: Come, for all things are now ready. This is the call now given to us: "All things are now ready, now is the accepted time; and therefore come now; do not delay; accept the invitation; believe yourselves welcome."

2. The cold entertainment which the grace of the gospel meets with. The invited guests declined coming. They all with one consent began to make excuse, v. 18. They all found out some pretence or other to shift off their attendance. This bespeaks the general neglect of the Jewish nation to close with Christ. It also intimates the backwardness there is in most people to close with the gospel call. They cannot for shame avow their refusal, but they desire to be excused. They were unanimous in it; with one voice. Here were two that were purchasers. One had bought a piece of ground which was represented to him to be a good bargain, and he must needs go and see whether it was so or no; and therefore I pray thee have me excused. But what a frivolous excuse was this! He might have deferred going to see his piece of ground till the next day, and have found it in the same place and plight it was now in. Another had purchased stock for his land. "I have bought five yoke of oxen for the plough, and I must just now go lest . . . a recompense be given thee—a fear the world is not afflicted with [BENGEL]. The meaning, however, is that no exercise of principle is involved in it, as selfishness itself will suffice to prompt to it (Matt. 5:46, 47). 13. call the poor—"Such God Himself calls" (vs. 21) [BENGEL]. 14. blessed—acting from disinterested, god-like compassion for the wretched.

15-24. when one . . . heard . . . he said, Blessed . . .—As our Lord's words seemed to hold forth the future "recompense" under the idea of a great Feast, the thought passes through this man's mind, how blessed they would be who should be honored to sit down to it. Our Lord's reply is in substance this: "The great Feast is prepared already; the invitations are issued, but declined; the feast, notwithstanding, shall not want abundance of guests; but not one of its present contemners—who shall yet come to sue for admission—shall be allowed to taste of it." This shows what was lacking in the seemingly pious exclamation of this man. It was Balaam's, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his" (Num. 23:10), without any anxiety about living his life; fondly wishing that all were right with him at last, while all heedless of the precious present.

16. a great supper—(Cf. Isa. 25:6). bade many—historically, the Jews (see on Matt. 22:3); generally, those within the pale of professed discipleship. 17. supper-time . . . all now ready—pointing undoubtedly to the now ripening preparations for the great Gospel call. (See on Matt. 22:4.)

18. all began to make excuse—(Cf. Matthew 22:5). Three excuses, given as specimens of the rest, answer to "the care of this world" (vs. 18), "the deceitfulness of riches" (vs. 19), and "the pleasures of this life" (vs. 20), which "choke the word" (Matt. 13:22 and ch. 8:14). Each differs from the other, and each has its own plausibility, but all come to the same result: "We have other things to attend to, more pressing just now." Nobody is represented as saying, I will not come; nay, all the answers imply that but for certain things they would come, and when these are out of the way they will come. So it certainly is in the case intended, for the last words clearly imply that the refusers will one day become petitioners.

ADAM CLARKE

14. For they cannot recompense thee. Because you have done it for God's sake only, and they cannot make you a recompense, therefore God will consider himself your Debtor, and will recompense you in the resurrection of the righteous.

16-24. A certain man made a great supper. See a similar parable to this, though not spoken on the same occasion, explained, Matt. xxii. 1-14.

The kingdom of heaven. It appears from Luke xiv. 15 that it was at an entertainment that this parable was originally spoken. It was a constant practice of our Lord to take the subjects of His discourses from the persons present, or from the circumstances of times, persons, and places. See chap. xvi. 6; John iv. 7-10; vi. 26-27; vii. 37. A preacher that can do so can never be at a loss for text or sermon. A marriage for his son. "A marriage feast." Or a feast of inauguration, when his son was put in possession of the government, and thus he and his new subjects became married together. See 1 Kings i. 5-9, 19, 25, where such a feast is mentioned. From this parable it appears plain that: (1) the king means the great God; (2) his son, the Lord Jesus; (3) the marriage, His incarnation, or espousing human nature, by taking it into union with himself; (4) the marriage feast, the economy of the gospel, during which men are invited to partake of the blessings purchased by, and consequent on, the incarnation and death of our blessed Lord; (5) by those who had been bidden, or "invited," v. 3, are meant the Jews in general, who had this union of Christ with human nature, and His sacrifice for sin, pointed out by various rites, ceremonies, and sacrifices under the law, and who by all the prophets had been constantly invited to believe in and receive the promised Messiah; (6) by the servants, we are to understand the first preachers of the gospel, proclaiming salvation to the Jews—John the Baptist and the seventy disciples, Luke x. 1 may be here particularly intended; (7) by the other servants, v. 4, the apostles seem to be meant, who, though they were to preach the gospel to the whole world, yet were to begin at Jerusalem, Luke xxiv. 47, with the first offers of mercy; (8) by their making light of it, v. 5, is pointed out their neglect of this salvation, and their preferring secular enjoyments to the kingdom of Christ; (9) by injuriously using some and slaying others of his servants, v. 6, is pointed out the persecution raised against the apostles by the Jews, in which some of them were martyred; (10) by sending forth his troops, v. 7, is meant the commission given to the Romans against Judea; and by the burning of their city, the total destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, the son of Vespasian, which happened about forty years after.

and prove them, and therefore excuse me for this time." The former intimates that inordinate complacency in the world, this the inordinate care and concern about the world, which keep people from Christ and his grace. It is very criminal, when we are called to any duty, to make excuses for our neglect of it: it is a sign that there are convictions that it is duty, but no inclination to it. These things here were, [1] Little things. It had better become them to have said, "I am invited to eat bread in the kingdom of God, and therefore must be excused from going to see the ground or the oxen." [2] Lawful things. Things lawful in themselves, when the heart is too much set upon them, prove fatal hindrances in religion. Here was one that was newly married (v. 30): I have married a wife, and therefore, in short, I cannot come. He pretends that he cannot, when the truth is he will not. Thus many pretend inability for the duties of religion when really they have an aversion to them. Our affection to our relations often proves a hindrance to us in our duty to God. He might have gone and taken his wife along with him; they would both have been welcome.

3. The account which was brought to the master of the feast of the affront put upon him by his friends, who now showed how little they valued him (v. 21): That servant came, and showed his lord these things, told him with surprise that he was likely to sup alone. He made the matter neither better nor worse, but related it just as it was. Ministers must give account of the success of their ministry. They must do it now at the throne of grace. If they see of the travail of their soul, they must go to God with their thanks; if they labour in vain, they must go to God with their complaints. The apostle urges this as a reason why people should give ear to the word of God sent them by his ministers; for they watch for your souls, as those that must give account, Heb. xiii. 17.

4. The master's just resentment of this affront: He was angry, v. 21. The ingratitude of those that slight gospel offers, and the contempt they put upon the God of heaven thereby, are a very great provocation to him, and justly so. Abused mercy turns into the greatest wrath. None of the men that were bidden shall taste of my supper. Grace despised is grace forfeited, like Esau's birthright. They that will not have Christ when they may shall not have him when they would.

5. The care that was taken to furnish the table with guests, as well as meat. "Go" (saith he to the servants), "go first into the streets and lanes of the city that you may invite those that will be glad to come, bring in hither the poor and the maimed, the halt and the blind; pick up the common beggars." They soon gather an abundance of such guests: Lord, it is done as thou hast commanded. Many of the Jews are brought in, not of the scribes and Pharisees, but publicans and sinners; these are the poor and the maimed. But yet there is room for more guests. "Go, then, secondly, into the highways and hedges. Go out into the country, and pick up the vagrants, or those that are returning now in the evening from their work in the field, and compel them to come in, not by force of arms, but by force of arguments. Be earnest with them; for in this case it will be necessary to convince them that the invitation is sincere. They will hardly believe that they shall be welcome, and therefore do not leave them till you have prevailed with them." This refers to the calling of the Gentiles, and with them the church was filled. (1) The provision made for precious souls in the gospel of Christ shall appear not to have been made in vain; for, if some reject it, yet others will thankfully accept the offer of it. (2) Those that are very poor and low in the world shall be as welcome to Christ as the rich and great. Christ here plainly refers to what he had said just before, to invite to our tables the poor amd maimed, the lame and blind, v. 13. His condescensions and compassions towards them should engage ours. (3) Many times the gospel has the greatest success among those that are least likely to have the benefit of it. The publicans and harlots went into the kingdom of God before the scribes and Pharisees; so the last shall be first, and the first last. Let us not be confident concerning those that are most forward, nor despair of those that are least promising. (4) Christ's ministers must be both very expeditious and very importunate in inviting to the gospel feast: "Go out quickly (v. 21); lose no time, because all things are now ready." (5) Though many have been brought in to partake of the benefits of the gospel, yet still there is room for more. There is in him enough for all, and enough for each; and the gospel excludes none that do not exclude themselves. (6) Christ's house, though it be large, shall at last be filled.

A. B. SIMPSON:

First, the friends of the host, who here represent the ordinary hearers of the Gospel; perhaps we may say the worldly and nominal adherents of Christianity. They rejected the invitation. They did it very politely, as proud and worldly sinners still do. The first class declined on account of pressing business engagements, perhaps connected with first starting in life and beginning to acquire earthly possessions. This man has bought his piece of ground. He is just commencing to accumulate wealth, and is too busy to go to the feast. The second has bought five yoke of oxen. This represents an advanced stage of worldly success and occupation; he is now getting to be a very busy man. He is stocking his farm by the half score at a time and rapidly growing rich. And so he for the present puts off the kind invitation. The third has married a wife, and is still more peremptory in his refusal. He cannot come; and evidently he regards the religion of Jesus as incompatible with the thorough enjoyment of the pleasures of the world. Everything in its place. The bridal party, the honeymoon, the dance and revel are inconsistent in his view with the table of the Lord; and he allows the endearments, attachments, and pleasures of life to outweigh the claims of Christ, and the value of his soul.

The three forms of worldly obstruction which here stand in the way of the Gospel are worldly business, worldly wealth and worldly pleasure. With some, it is the eager desire to grow rich. With some, it is the increasing preoccupation of constant drive and absorbing business. With others, it is the love of pleasure and the influence of friends. From these various causes the great proportion of the invited guests still stay away from Christ. Indeed, the parable represents every one of them as refusing. It looks as though the whole body of nominal professors was ultimately going to reject the Gospel.—Christ in the Bible angry—in one sense a gracious word, showing how sincere he was in issuing his invitations (Ezek. 33:11). But it is the slight put upon him, the sense of which is intended to be marked by this word.

streets and lanes—historically, those within the same pale of "the city" of God as the former class, but the despised and outcasts of the nation, the "publicans and sinners" [TRENCH]; generally, all similar classes, usually overlooked in the first provision for supplying the means of grace to a community, half heathen in the midst of revealed light, and in every sense miserable. 22. yet there is room—implying that these classes had embraced the invitation (Matt. 21:32; Mark 12:37; last clause; John 7:48, 49); and beautifully expressing the longing that should fill the hearts of ministers to see their Master's table filled. 23. highways and hedges—outside the city altogether; historically, the heathen, sunk in the lowest depths of spiritual wretchedness, as being beyond the pale of all that is revealed and saving, "without Christ, strangers from the covenant of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world" (Eph. 2:12); generally, all such still. Thus, this parable prophetically contemplates the extension of the kingdom of God to the whole world; and spiritually, directs the Gospel invitations to be carried to the lowest strata, and be brought in contact with the outermost circles, of human society. compel them to come in—not as if they would make the "excuses" of the first class, but because it would be hard to get them over two difficulties: (1) "We are not fit company for such a feast." (2) "We have no proper dress, and are ill in order for such a presence." How fitly does this represent the difficulties and fears of the sincere! How is this met? "Take no excuse—make them come as they are—bring them along with you." What a directory for ministers of Christ! that my house may be filled—"Grace no more than nature will endure a vacuum" [BENGEL]. 24. I say unto you, That none—Our Lord here appears to throw off the veil of the parable, and proclaim the Supper His own, intimating that when transferred and transformed into its final glorious form, and the refusers themselves would give all for another opportunity, He will not allow one of them to taste it. (N.B.—This parable must not be confounded with that of Prov. 1:24-33; The Marriage Supper, Matt. 22:2-14.)

Go ye therefore into the highways. "Cross- or by-paths"; the places where two or more roads met in one, leading into the city, where people were coming together from various quarters of the country. Luke adds "hedges," to point out the people to whom the apostles were sent, as either miserable vagabonds or the most indigent poor, who were wandering about the country, or sitting by the sides of the ways and hedges, imploring relief. This verse points out the final rejection of the Jews and the calling of the Gentiles. It was a custom among the Jews, when a rich man made a feast, to go out and invite in all destitute travellers. As many as ye shall find, bid to the marriage. God sends His salvation to every soul, that all may believe and be saved.

23. Compel them to come in. "Prevail" on them by the most earnest entreaties. The word is used by Matthew, chap. xiv. 22, and by Mark, chap. vi. 45; in both places when Christ is said to "constrain" His disciples to get into the vessel, nothing but His commanding or persuading them to do it can be reasonably understood.

Verses 25–35

He is in these verses directing his discourse to the multitudes that crowded after him, and his exhortation to them is to understand the terms of discipleship.

I. How zealous people were in their attendance on Christ (v. 25): There went great multitudes with him, many for love and more for company. Here was a mixed multitude.

II. How considerate he would have them to be in their zeal. Those that undertake to follow Christ must count upon the worst, and prepare accordingly.

1. He tells them what the worst is that they must count upon. He takes it for granted that they had a mind to be his disciples. They expected that he should say, "If any man come to me, and be my disciple, he shall have wealth and honour in abundance." But he tells them quite the contrary.

(1) They must be willing to quit that which was very dear, rather than quit their interest in Christ, v. 26. A man cannot be Christ's disciple but he must hate father, and mother, and his own life. He is not sincere, he will not be constant and persevering, unless he love Christ better than anything in this world. Mention is not made here of houses and lands; philosophy will teach a man to look upon these with contempt; but Christianity carries it higher. Every good man loves his relations; and yet, if he be a disciple of Christ, he must comparatively hate them. Not that their persons must be in any degree hated, but our comfort and satisfaction in them must be lost and swallowed up in our love to Christ. When our duty to our parents comes in competition with our evident duty to Christ, we must give Christ the preference. If we must either deny Christ or be banished from our families and relations (as many of the primitive Christians were), we must rather lose their society than his favour. Every man loves his own life, no man ever yet hated it; and we cannot be Christ's disciples if we do not love him better than our own lives. The experience of the pleasures of the spiritual life, and the believing hopes and prospects of eternal life will make this hard saying easy. When tribulation and persecution arise because of the word, then chiefly the trial is. Yet even in days of peace this matter is sometimes brought to the trial. Those that are ashamed to confess him, for fear of disobliging a relation or friend, or losing a customer, give cause to suspect that they love him better than Christ.

(2) That they must be willing to bear that which was very heavy (v. 27): Whosoever doth not bear his cross, and so come after me, he cannot be my disciple. Though the disciples of Christ are not all crucified, yet they all bear their cross. They must be content to be put into an ill name, for no name is more ignominious than Furcifer—the bearer of the gibbet. He must bear his cross, and come after Christ; that is, he must bear it in the way of his duty, whenever it lies in that way. He must bear it when Christ calls him to it, and live in hope of a recompense with him.

2. He bids them count upon it, and then consider of it. It is better never to begin than not to proceed; and therefore before we begin we must consider what it is to proceed. This is to act rationally, and as becomes men. The cause of Christ will bear a scrutiny. Satan shows the best, but hides the worst. This considering of the case is necessary to perseverance. Our Saviour here illustrates the necessity of it by two similitudes. We are like a man that undertakes to build a tower, and therefore must consider the expense of it (v. 28–30): Which of you, intending to build a tower sitteth not down first, and counteth the cost? Let him compare the charge with his purse, lest he make himself to be laughed at, by beginning to build what he is not able to finish. All that take upon them a profession of religion undertake to build a tower. Begin low, and lay the foundation deep, lay it on the rock, and make sure work, and then aim as high as heaven. Those that intend to build this tower must sit down and count the cost. Let them consider that it will cost them a life of self-denial and watchfulness. It may, perhaps, cost them their reputation among men, and all that is dear to them in this world, even life itself. And if it should cost us all this, what is it in comparison with what it cost Christ? Many that begin to build this tower do not go on with it, nor persevere in it, and it is their folly. It is true, we have none of us in ourselves sufficient to finish this tower, but Christ hath said, My grace is sufficient for thee. Nothing is more shameful than for those that have begun well in religion to break off.

(2) When we undertake to be Christ's disciples we are like a man that goes to war, and therefore must consider the hazard of it, v. 31, 32. A king that declares war against a neighbouring prince considers whether he has strength wherewith to make his part

25-35. ADDRESS TO GREAT MULTITUDES TRAVELLING WITH HIM.

25. great multitudes with him—on His final journey to Jerusalem. The "great multitudes" were doubtless people going to the passover, who moved along in clusters (ch. 2:44), and who on this occasion falling in with our Lord had formed themselves into one mass about Him.

26, 27. If any man . . .—(See on Matt. 10:34-36, and Mark 8:34, 35).

He that loveth father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me; and he that loveth son or daughter more than me, is not worthy of me—(Cf. Deut. 33:9). As the preference of the one would, in the case supposed, necessitate the abandonment of the other, our Lord here, with a sublime, yet awful self-respect, asserts His own claims to supreme affection.

And he that taketh not his cross, and followeth after me, is not worthy of me—a saying which our Lord once and again emphatically reiterates (ch. 16:24; Luke 9:23; 14:27). We have become so accustomed to this expression—"taking up one's cross"—in the sense of "being prepared for trials in general for Christ's sake," that we are apt to lose sight of its primary and proper sense here—"a preparedness to go forth even to crucifixion," as when our Lord had to bear His own cross on His way to Calvary—a saying the more remarkable as our Lord had not as yet given a hint that He would die this death, nor was crucifixion a Jewish mode of capital punishment.

28-33. which of you . . .—Common sense teaches men not to begin any costly work without first seeing that they have wherewithal to finish. And he who does otherwise exposes himself to general ridicule. Nor will any wise potentate enter on a war with any hostile power without first seeing to it that, despite formidable odds (two to one), he be able to stand his ground; and if he has no hope of this, he will feel that nothing remains for him but to make the best terms he can. "Even so," says our Lord, "in the warfare you will each have to wage as My disciples, despise not your enemy's strength, for the odds are all against you; and you had better see to it that, despite every disadvantage, you still have wherewithal to hold out and win the day, or else not begin at all, and make the best you can in such awful circumstances." In this simple sense of the parable (STIER, ALFORD, etc., go wide of the mark here in making the enemy to be God, because of the "conditions of peace," vs. 32), two things are taught: (1) Better not begin (Rev. 3:15), than begin and not finish. (2) Though the contest for salvation be on our part an awfully unequal one, the human will, in the exercise of that "faith which overcometh the world" (I John 5:4), and nerved by power from above, which "out of weakness

26. And hate not. Matthew, chap. x. 37, expresses the true meaning of this word, when he says, "He that loveth father or mother more than me." In chap. vi. 24 he uses the word hate in the same sense. When we read, Rom. ix. 13, "Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated," the meaning is simply, I have loved Jacob, the Israelites, more than Esau, the Edomites. That this is no arbitrary interpretation of the word hate, but one agreeable to the Hebrew idiom, appears from what is said on Gen. xxix. 30-31, where Leah's being hated is explained by Rachel's being loved more than Leah.

A. T. ROBERTSON:

26. "Hateth not" (ou misei). An old and very strong verb miseo, to hate, detest. The Orientals use strong language where cooler spirits would speak of preference or indifference. But even so Jesus does not here mean that one must hate his father or mother of necessity or as such, for Matt. 15:4 proves the opposite. It is only where the element of choice comes in (Matt. 6:24) as it sometimes does when father or mother opposes Christ. Then one must not hesitate. The language here is more sharply put than in Matt. 10:37. The ou here coalesces with the verb misei in this conditional clause of the first class determined as fulfilled. It is the language of exaggerated contrast, it is true, but it must not be watered down till the point is gone. In mentioning "and wife," Jesus has really made a comment on the excuse given in verse 20 (I married a wife and so I am not able to come). "And his own life also" (eti te kai ten psuchen heautou). Note te kai, both—and. "The te (BL) binds all the particulars into one bundle of renuncianda" (Bruce). Note this same triple group of conjunctions (eti te kai) in Acts 21:28, "And moreover also," "even going as far as his own life." Martyrdom should be an ever-present possibility to the Christian, not to be courted, but not to be shunned.

—Word Pictures in the New Testament

28. To build a tower. Probably this means no more than a dwelling house, on the top of which, according to the Asiatic manner, battlements were built, both to take the fresh air on, and to serve for refuge from and defense against an enemy. It was also used for prayer and meditation. This parable represents the absurdity of those who undertook to be disciples of Christ without considering what difficulties they were to meet with, and what strength they had to enable them to go through with the undertaking. He that will be a true disciple of Jesus Christ shall require no less than the mighty power of God to support him, as both hell and earth will unite to destroy him.

good, and, if not, he will lay aside his thoughts of war. Is not the Christian life a warfare? We must fight every step we go, so restless are our spiritual enemies in their opposition. We ought to consider whether we can endure the hardness which a good soldier of Jesus Christ must expect and count upon, before we enlist ourselves under Christ's banner. Of the two it is better to make the best terms we can with the world than pretend to renounce it and afterwards return to it. That young man that could not find in his heart to part with his possessions for Christ did better to go away from Christ sorrowing than to have stayed with him dissembling.

This parable is another way applicable, and may be taken as designed to teach us to begin speedily to be religious, rather than to begin cautiously; and may mean the same with Matt. v. 25, Agree with thine adversary quickly. Those that persist in sin make war against God. The proudest and most daring sinner is no equal match for God. In consideration of this, it is our interest to make peace with him. We need not send to desire conditions of peace; they are offered to us, and are unexceptionable. Let us acquaint ourselves with them, and be at peace; do this in time, while the other is yet a great way off.

But the application of this parable here (v. 33) is to the consideration that ought to be exercised when we take upon us a profession of religion. Enter upon a profession of religion, as those that know that except you forsake all you have you cannot be Christ's disciples.

3. He warns them against apostasy, for that would make them utterly useless, v. 34, 35. Good Christians are the salt of the earth, and good ministers especially (Matt. v. 13); salt is good and of great use. Degenerate Christians, who, rather than part with what they have in the world, will throw up their profession, are like salt that has lost its savour, that is the most useless worthless thing in the world; it has no manner of virtue or good property in it. It can never be recovered: Wherewith shall it be seasoned? You cannot salt it. This intimates that it is extremely difficult, and next to impossible, to recover an apostate, Heb. vi. 4–6. It is of no use. It is not fit, as dung is, for the land, to manure that, nor will it be the better if it be laid in the dunghill to rot. A professor of religion whose mind and manners are depraved is the most insipid animal that can be. It is abandoned: Men cast it out, they will have no more to do with it. Such scandalous professors ought to be cast out of the church, because there is danger that others will be infected by them. Our Saviour concludes this with a call to all to take notice of it, and to take warning: He that hath ears to hear, let him hear.

makes it strong" (Heb. 11:34; I Pet. 1:5), becomes heroical and will come off "more than conqueror." But without absolute surrender of self the contest is hopeless (vs. 33).

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

There are two kinds of "forsaking all that we have." One is the forsaking by which we become disciples; and the other, by which we continue true disciples. The conviction that they had not sufficient to finish is the very conviction that Christ wished to root in the minds of the crowds. He exhibits the difficulties in order that they may feel they cannot cope with them. What then? That they may "forsake" all their own power to cope with them.

That is the first kind of "forsaking all that we have." That makes a disciple. The recognition of my own utter impotence to do the things which yet I see must be done is the underside of trust in Him. And that trust in Him brings the power that makes it possible for us to do the things which we cannot of ourselves do, and the consciousness of the impotence to do which is the first step toward doing them. It is the self-sufficient man who is sure to be bankrupt before he has finished his building; but he who has no confidence in himself, and recognizes the fact that he cannot build, will go to Jesus Christ and say, "Lord, I am poor and needy. Come Thou thyself and be my strength." Such a forsaking of all that we have in the recognition of our own poverty and powerlessness brings into the field an Ally for our reinforcement that has more than the twenty thousand that are coming against us, and will make us strong.—Expositions of Holy Scripture but if the salt have lost his savour—"become unsavory" or "insipid"; losing its saline or salting property. The meaning is: If that Christianity on which the health of the world depends, does in any age, region, or individual, exist only in name, or if it contain not those saving elements for want of which the world languishes, wherewith shall it be salted?—How shall the salting qualities be restored it? (Cf. Mark 9:50.) Whether salt ever does lose its saline property—about which there is a difference of opinion—is a question of no moment here. The point of the case lies in the supposition—that if it should lose it, the consequence would be as here described. So with Christians. The question is not: Can, or do, the saints ever totally lose that grace which makes them a blessing to their fellow men? But, What is to be the issue of that Christianity which is found wanting in those elements which can alone stay the corruption and season the tastelessness of an all-pervading carnality?

ADAM CLARKE

33. Whosoever he be of you. This seems to be addressed particularly to those who were then, and who were to be, preachers of His gospel, and who were to travel over all countries publishing salvation to a lost world.

CHAPTER 15

Here is, I. The diligent attendance of the publicans and sinners upon Christ's ministry. Great multitudes of Jews went with him (ch. xiv. 25), with such an assurance of admission into the kingdom of God that he found it requisite to say that to them which would shake their vain hopes. Here multitudes of publicans and sinners drew near to him, with a humble modest fear of being rejected by him, and to them he found it requisite to give encouragement. The publicans were perhaps some of them bad men, but they were all industriously put into an ill name, because of the prejudices of the Jewish nation against their office. They are sometimes ranked with harlots (Matt. xxi. 32); here and elsewhere with sinners. They drew near to him, not, as some did, for curiosity to see him, nor as others did, to solicit for cures, but to hear his excellent doctrine. In all our approaches to Christ we must have this in our eye, to hear him; to hear the instructions he gives us, and his answers to our prayers.

II. The offence which the scribes and Pharisees took at this. They murmured, This man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them, v. 2. 1. They were angry that publicans and heathens had the means of grace allowed them, and were encouraged to hope for pardon upon repentance. 2. They thought it inconsistent with the dignity of his character, to make himself familiar with such sort of people, and to eat with them. They could not, for shame, condemn him for preaching to them, and therefore they reproached him for eating with them, which was more expressly contrary to the tradition of the elders.

III. Christ's justifying himself in it, by showing that the worse these people were, the more glory would redound to God, and the more joy there would be in heaven, if by his preaching they were brought to repentance. It would be a more pleasing sight in

Vss. 1-32. PUBLICANS AND SINNERS WELCOMED BY CHRIST—THREE PARABLES TO EXPLAIN THIS. 1. drew near . . . all the publicans and sinners . . .—drawn around Him by the extraordinary adaptation of His teaching to their case, who, till He appeared—at least His forerunner—might well say, "No man careth for my soul."

2. murmured, saying . . .—took it ill, were scandalized at Him, and insinuated (on the principle that a man is known by the company he keeps) that He must have some secret sympathy with their character. But oh, what a truth of unspeakable preciousness do their lips, as on other occasions, unconsciously utter! Now follow three parables representing the sinner: (1) in his stupidity; (2) as all-unconscious of his lost condition; (3) knowingly and willingly estranged from God [BENGEL]. The first two set forth the seeking love of God; the last, His receiving love [TRENCH].

1. Publicans and sinners. "Taxgatherers and heathens"; persons who believed neither in Christ nor in Moses. See the note on chap. vii. 36. Concerning the "taxgatherers," see the note on Matt. v. 46.

The publicans. That is, "taxgatherers." A farmer or collector of the taxes or public revenues. This class of men were detestable among the Romans, the Greeks, and the Jews for their intolerable rapacity and avarice. They were abhorred in an especial manner by the Jews, to whom the Roman government was odious. These, assisting in collecting the Roman tribute, were considered as betrayers of the liberties of their country, and abettors of those who enslaved it.

2. Receiveth sinners. He "receives them cordially, affectionately," takes them to His bosom, for so the word implies.

MATTHEW HENRY

heaven to see publicans and sinners live an orderly sort of life than to see scribes and Pharisees go on in living such a life. This he here illustrates by two parables.

1. The parable of the lost sheep. Something like it we had in Matt. xviii. 12. There it was designed to show the care God takes for the preservation of saints; here it is designed to show the pleasure God takes in the conversion of sinners. We have here,

(1) The case of a sinner that goes on in sinful ways. He is like a lost sheep, a sheep gone astray; he is lost to God; lost to the flock; lost to himself: he knows not where he is, wanders endlessly, is continually exposed to the beasts of prey, subject to frights and terrors, taken from under the shepherd's care, and wanting the green pastures; and he cannot of himself find the way back to the fold.

(2) The care the God of heaven takes of poor wandering sinners. There is a particular care to be taken of this lost sheep; and though he has a hundred sheep, yet he will not lose that one, but he goes after it, and shows abundance of care in finding it out. He follows it, looking about for it, until he finds it. God follows backsliding sinners until at length they are wrought upon to think of returning. Though he finds it weary and not able to bear being driven home, yet he does not leave it to perish, but lays it on his shoulders, and, with a great deal of tenderness and labour, brings it to the fold. God sends his Son to seek and save that which was lost, ch. xix. 10. Christ is said to gather the lambs in his arms, and carry them in his bosom, denoting his pity and tenderness. Here he is said to bear them upon his shoulders; those can never perish whom he carries upon his shoulders.

(3) The pleasure that God takes in repenting returning sinners. He lays it on his shoulders rejoicing, and the joy is the greater because he began to be out of hope of finding it; and he calls his friends and neighbours, saying, Rejoice with me. Observe, he calls it his sheep, though a stray, a wandering sheep. Therefore he looks after it himself: I have found it; he did not send a servant, but his own Son, the great and good Shepherd, who will find what he seeks, and will be found of those that seek him not.

2. The parable of the lost piece of silver. (1) The loser is here supposed to be a woman. She has ten pieces of silver, and out of them loses only one. Notwithstanding the sinfulness and misery of the world of mankind there are nine to one, nay, in the foregoing parable there are ninety-nine to one, that retain their integrity, in whom God is praised, and never was dishonoured. (2) That which is lost is a piece of silver. The soul is silver, of intrinsic worth and value; not base metal, as iron or lead, but silver. It is silver coin. It is stamped with God's image and superscription. This silver was lost in the dirt; a soul plunged in the world is like a piece of money in the dirt; anyone would say, It is a thousand pities that it should lie there. (3) Here is a great deal of care and pains taken in quest of it. The woman lights a candle, sweeps the house, and seeks diligently till she finds it. This represents the various means and methods God makes use of to bring lost souls home to himself: he has lighted the candle of the gospel, not to show himself the way to us, but to show us the way to him; his heart is upon it, to bring lost souls to himself. (4) Here is a great deal of joy for the finding of it: Rejoice with me, for I have found the piece which I had lost, v. 9. Those that rejoice desire that others should rejoice with them. The pleasing surprise of finding it put her, for the present, into a kind of transport—I have found, I have found, is the language of joy.

3. The explication of these two parables is to the same purport (v. 7, 10): There is joy in heaven, joy in the presence of the angels of God, over one sinner that repenteth, more than over a great number of just persons, who need no repentance.

(1) The repentance and conversion of sinners on earth are matter of joy and rejoicing in heaven. It is possible that the greatest sinners may be brought to repentance. While there is life there is hope, and the worst are not to be despaired of. God will delight to show them mercy. There is always joy in heaven. God rejoiceth in all his works, but particularly in the works of his grace. He rejoiceth to do good to penitent sinners. He rejoiceth not only in the conversion of nations, but even over one sinner that repenteth, though but one. The good angels will be glad that mercy is shown them. The redemption of mankind was matter of joy in the presence of the angels; for they sung, Glory to God in the highest, ch. ii. 14.

(2) There is more joy over one sinner that repenteth than there is over ninety-nine just persons, who need no repentance. More joy for the conversion of the sinners of the Gentiles, and of those publicans that

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

3-7. I. THE LOST SHEEP—occurring again (Matt. 18:12-14); but there to show how precious one of His sheep is to the Good Shepherd; here, to show that the shepherd, though the sheep stray never so widely, will seek it out, and when he hath found, will rejoice over it. 4. leave the ninety and nine—bend all His attention and care, as it were, to the one object of recovering the lost sheep; not saying. "'Tis but one; let it go; enough remain." go after . . . until . . .—pointing to all the diversified means which God sets in operation for recovering sinners.

6. Rejoice with me . . .—The principle here is, that one feels exuberant joy to be almost too much for himself to bear alone, and is positively relieved by having others to share it with him. (See on vs. 10.)

8-10. II. THE LOST COIN. sweep the house—"not done without dust on man's part" [BENGEL].

7. ninety-nine just . . . needing no repentance—not angels, whose place in these parables is very different from this; but those represented by the prodigal's wellbehaved brother, who have "served their Father" many years and not at any time transgressed His commandment (in the outrageous sense of the prodigal). (See on vss. 29, 31.) In other words, such as have grown up from childhood in the fear of God and as the sheep of His pasture. Our Lord does not say "the Pharisees and scribes" were such; but as there was undoubtedly such a class, while "the publicans and sinners" were confessedly the strayed sheep and the prodigal children, He leaves them to fill up the place of the other class, if they could.

10. Likewise—on the same principle. joy . . .—Note carefully the language here—not "joy on the part," but "joy in the presence of the angels of God." True to the

4. What man of you? Our Lord spoke this and the following parable to justify His conduct in receiving and conversing with sinners. An hundred sheep. Parables similar to this are frequent among the Jewish writers. The whole flock of mankind, both Jews and Gentiles, belongs unto this divine Shepherd; and it is but reasonable to expect that the gracious Proprietor will look after those who have gone astray, and bring them back to the flock. The lost sheep is an emblem of a heedless, thoughtless sinner, one who follows the corrupt dictates of his own heart without ever reflecting upon his conduct or considering what will be the issue of his unholy course of life. No creature strays more easily than a sheep; none is more heedless; and none so incapable of finding its way back to the flock, when once gonè astray. It will bleat for the flock, and still run on in an opposite direction to the place where the flock is; this I have often noticed. No creature is more defenseless than a sheep, and more exposed to be devoured by dogs and wild beasts. Even the fowls of the air seek its destruction. I have known ravens often attempt to destroy lambs by picking out their eyes, in which, when they have succeeded, as the creature does not see whither it is going, it soon falls an easy prey to its destroyer.

8. Ten pieces of silver. "Ten drachmas." I think it always best to retain the names of these ancient coins, and to state their value in English money. Every reader will naturally wish to know by what names such and such coins were called in the countries in which they were current. The Grecian drachma was worth about the same as the Roman denarius. The drachma that was lost is also a very expressive emblem of a sinner who is estranged from God, and enslaved to habits of iniquity. The longer a piece of money is lost, the less probability is there of its being again found. So the sinner sinks deeper and deeper into the impurities of sin and gets the image and superscription of his Maker defaced from his heart.

7. Just persons, which need no repentance. Who do not require "such a change of mind and purpose" as these do—who are not so profligate, and cannot repent of sins they have never committed. Distinctions of this kind frequently occur in the Jewish writings. There are many persons who have been brought up in a sober and regular course of life, attending the ordinances of God and being true and just in all their dealings; these most materially differ from the heathens mentioned in v. 1, because they believe in God, and attend the means of grace. They differ also essentially from the taxgatherers mentioned in the same place, because they wrong no man and are upright in their dealings. Therefore they cannot repent of the sins of a heathen, which they have not practiced; nor of the rapine of a taxgatherer, of which they have never been guilty. As, therefore, these just persons are put in opposition to the taxgatherers and heathens, we may at once see the scope and design of our Lord's words. These needed no now heard Christ preach, than for all the praises and devotions, and all the God I thank thee, of the Pharisees, and the other self-justifying Jews, who thought that they needed no repentance. Christ tells them that God was more praised in, and pleased with, the penitent broken heart of one of those despised, envied sinners, than all the long prayers which the scribes and Pharisees made, who could not see anything amiss in themselves; more joy for the conversion of one such great sinner than for the regular conversion of one that had always conducted himself decently and well, and comparatively needs no repentance. Not but that it is best not to go astray; but the grace of God is more manifested in the reducing of great sinners than in the conducting of those that never went astray. And many times those that have been great sinners before their conversion prove more eminently and zealously good after. They to whom much is forgiven will love much. We are moved with a more sensible joy for the recovery of what we had lost than for the continuance of what we had always enjoyed, for health out of sickness than for health without sickness. A constant course of religion may in itself be more valuable, and yet a sudden return from an evil course and way of sin may yield a more surprising pleasure.

We have here the parable of the prodigal son, the scope of which is the same with those before. But the circumstances of the parable do much more largely and fully set forth the riches of gospel grace, and it has been, and will be while the world stands, of unspeakable use to poor sinners.

I. The parable represents God as a common Father to all mankind. He is our Father, for he has the educating and portioning of us. Our Saviour hereby intimates to those proud Pharisees that these publicans and sinners, whom they thus despised, were their brethren, and therefore they ought to be glad of any kindness shown them.

II. It represents the children of men as of different characters. He had two sons, one of them a solid grave youth, reserved and austere, sober himself, but not at all good-humoured to those about him; such a one would adhere to his education, and not be easily drawn from it; but the other volatile and mercurial, and impatient of restraint, roving, and willing to try his fortune, and, if he fall into ill hands, likely to be a rake. Now this latter represents the publicans and sinners, and the Gentiles. The former represents the Jews in general, and particularly the Pharisees.

The younger son is the prodigal.

1. His riot and ramble when he was a prodigal, and the extravagances and miseries he fell into.

(1) What his request to his father was (v. 12): He said to his father, "Father, give me"—he might have put a little more in his mouth, and have said, Pray give me, or, Sir, if you please, give me, but he makes an imperious demand—"give me the portion of goods that falleth to me; that which falls to me as my due." It is bad, and the beginning of worse, when men look upon God's gifts as debts. "Give it me all at present in possession, and I will never expect anything in reversion, anything hereafter." The great folly of sinners is being content to have their portion in hand, now in this lifetime to receive their good things. They look only at the things that are seen, and covet only a present gratification, but have no care for a future felicity. And why did he desire to have his portion in his own hands? [1] He was weary of his father's government, and was fond of liberty falsely so called. See the folly of many young men, who never think themselves their own masters till they have broken all God's bands in sunder, and, instead of them, bound themselves with the cords of their own lust. Here is the original of the apostasy of sinners from God; they will not be tied up to the rules of God's government; they will themselves be as gods, knowing no other good and evil than what themselves please. [2] He was willing to get from under his father's eye. A shyness of God, and a willingness to disbelieve his omniscience, are at the bottom of the wickedness of the wicked. [3] He was distrustful of his father's management. He would have his portion of goods himself, for he thought that his father would limit him in his present expenses, and that he did not like. [4] He was proud of himself, and had a great conceit of his own sufficiency. He thought that if he had put his portion in his own hands he could manage it better than his father did, and make a better figure with it. There are more young people ruined by pride than by any one lust whatsoever.

(2) How kind his father was to him: He divided unto them his living. He computed what he had to dispose of between his sons, and gave the younger son his share, and offered the elder his; but, it should idea of the parables. The Great Shepherd. The Great Owner Himself, is He whose the joy properly is over His own recovered property; but so vast and exuberant is it (Zech. 8:17), that as if He could not keep it to Himself, He "calleth His friends and neighbors together"—His whole celestial family—saying, "Rejoice WITH ME, for I have found My sheep-My-piece," etc. In this sublime sense it is "joy," before "or in the presence of the angels"; they only "catch the flying joy," sharing it with Him! The application of this to the reception of those publicans and sinners that stood around our Lord is grand in the extreme: "Ye turn from these lost ones with disdain, and because I do not the same, ye murmur at it: but a very different feeling is cherished in heaven. There, the recovery of even one such outcast is watched with interest and hailed with joy; nor are they left to come home of themselves or perish; for lo! even now the great Shepherd is going after His lost sheep, and the Owner is making diligent search for the lost property; and He is finding it, too, and bringing it back with joy, and all heaven is full of it." (Let the reader mark what sublime claims Himself our Lord covertly puts in here—as if in Him they beheld, all unknown to themselves, nothing less than heaven in the habiliments of earth, the Great Shepherd above, clothed in a garment of flesh, come "to seek and to save that which was lost")! 11-32. III. THE PRODIGAL SON.

12. the younger—as the more thoughtless. said . . .—weary of restraint, panting for independence, unable longer to abide the check of a father's eye. This is man impatient of divine control, desiring to be independent of God, seeking to be his own master; that "sin of sins, in which all subsequent sins are included as in their germ, for they are but the unfolding of this one" [TRENCH].

repentance in comparison of the others, as not being guilty of their crimes. And as these belonged, by outward profession at least, to the flock of God, and were sincere and upright according to their light, they are considered as being in no danger of being lost; and as they fear God, and work righteousness according to their light, He will take care to make those further discoveries to them of the purity of His nature, the holiness of His law, and the necessity of the atonement, which He sees to be necessary. On this ground, the owner is represented as feeling more joy in consequence of finding one sheep that was lost, there having been almost no hope of its recovery, than he feels at seeing ninety and nine still safe under his care.

ALBERT BARNES:

1. "And he said." Jesus, to illustrate still further the sentiment which he had uttered, and to show that it was proper to rejoice over repenting sinners, proceeds to show it by a most beautiful and instructive parable. We shall see its beauty and propriety by remembering that the design of it was simply to justify his conduct in receiving sinners, and to show that to rejoice over their return was proper. This he shows by the feelings of a father rejoicing over the return of an ungrateful and dissipated son.—Popular Commentary

12. Give me the portion of goods. It may seem strange that such a demand should be made, and that the parent should have acceded to it, when he knew that it was to minister to his debauches that his profligate son made the demand here specified. But the matter will appear plain when it is considered that it has been an immemorial custom in the East for sons to demand and receive their portion of the inheritance during their father's lifetime; and the parent, however aware of the dissipated inclinations of the child, could not legally refuse to comply with the application.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

The desire to be independent is good, but when it can only be attained by being dependent on him whose authority is irksome, it takes another color. This foolish boy wished to be able to use his father's property as his own, but he had to get the father's consent first. It is a poor beginning of independence when it has to be set up in business by a gift.

That is the essential absurdity in our attempts to do without God and to shake off His control. We can only get power to seem to do it by misusing His gifts. When we say, "Who is Lord over us?" the tongues which say it were given us by Him. The next step soon followed. "Not many days after," of course, for the sense of ownership could not be kept up while near the father. A man who wishes to enjoy worldly good without reference to God is obliged, in self-defense, to hustle God out of his thoughts as soon and as completely as possible.

seem, he desired his father to keep it in his own hands still, and we may see what he got by it (v. 31): All that I have is thine. He gave the younger son what he asked. He had as much as he expected, and perhaps more. [1] Thus he might now see his father's kindness, how willing he was to please him and make him easy. [2] Thus he would in a little time be made to see his own folly, and that he was not such a wise manager for himself.

(3) How he managed himself when he had got his portion in his own hands. He set himself to spend it as fast as he could, and, in a little time he made himself a beggar: not many days after, v. 13. That which the younger son determined was to be gone presently, and, in order to that, he gathered all together.

Now the condition of the prodigal in this ramble of his represents to us a sinful state, into which man has fallen.

[1] A sinful state is a state of departure and distance from God. It is the sinfulness of sin that it is an apostasy from God. He took his journey from his father's house. Sinners are fled from God. They get as far off him as they can. The world is the far country in which they take up their residence. It is the misery of sinners that they are afar off from God, and are going further and further from him. What is hell itself, but being afar off from God?

[2] A sinful state is a spending state: There he wasted his substance with riotous living (v. 13), devoured it with harlots (v. 30), and in a little time he had spent all, v. 14. He bought fine clothes, associated with those that helped him to make an end of what he had in a little time. But this is to be applied spiritually. Wilful sinners waste their patrimony; for they misemploy their thoughts and all the powers of their souls, do not only bury, but embezzle; the talents they are entrusted to trade with, and the gifts of Providence, which were intended to enable them to serve God and to do good with, are made the food and fuel of their lusts. The soul that is made a drudge, either to the world or to the flesh, wastes its substance, and lives riotously.

[3] A sinful state is a wanting state: When he had spent all there arose a mighty famine in that land, and he began to be in want, v. 14. Wilful waste brings woeful want. Riotous living in time, perhaps in a little time, brings men to a morsel of bread, especially when bad times hasten on the consequences of bad husbandry. This represents the misery of sinners, who have thrown away their own mercies. These they gave away for the pleasure of sense, and the wealth of the world, and then are ready to perish for want of them. Sinners want necessaries for their souls; they have neither food nor raiment for them, nor any provision for hereafter. A sinful state is like a land where famine reigns. Sinners are wretchedly and miserably poor, and, what aggravates it, they brought themselves into that condition.

[4] A sinful state is a vile servile state. When this young man's riot had brought him to want his want brought him to servitude. He went, and joined himself to a citizen of that country, v. 15. The same wicked life that before was represented by riotous living is here represented by servile living. How did this young gentleman debase and disparage himself, when he hired himself into such a service and under such a master as this! He sent him into the fields, not to feed sheep but to feed swine. The business of the devil's servants is to make provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof, and that is no better than feeding greedy, dirty, noisy swine; and how can rational immortal souls more disgrace themselves?

[5] A sinful state is a state of perpetual dissatisfaction. He would fain have filled his belly with the husks which the swine did eat, v. 16. A fine pass my young master had brought himself to, to be fellow-commoner with the swine! That which sinners, when they depart from God, promise themselves satisfaction in, will certainly disappoint them; they are labouring for that which satisfieth not, Isa. lv. 2. Husks are food for swine, but not for men. The wealth of the world and the entertainments of sense will serve for bodies; but what are these to precious souls? They neither suit their nature, nor satisfy their desires, nor supply their needs.

[6] A sinful state is a state which cannot expect relief from any creature. This prodigal, when he would not earn his bread by working, took to begging; but no man gave unto him. Those who depart from God cannot be helped by any creature. In vain do we cry to the world and the flesh; they have that which will poison a soul, but have nothing to give it which will feed and nourish it.

[7] A sinful state is a state of death: This my son was dead, v. 23, 32. A sinner is not only dead in law, as he is under a sentence of death, but dead in treas-by saddest proof, that to depart from Him is not to throw off the yoke, but to exchange a light yoke for a heavy one, and one gracious Master for a thousand imperious tyrants and lords" [TRENCH].

13. not many days—intoxicated with his new-found resources, and eager for the luxury of using them at will.

a far country—beyond all danger of interference from home.

wasted . . .—So long as it lasted, the inward monitor (Isa. 55:2) would be silenced (Isa. 9:10; 57:10; Amos 4:6-10). riotous living—(vs. 30), "with harlots." Ah! but this reaches farther than the sensualist; for "in the deep symbolical language of Scripture fornication is the standing image of idolatry; they are in fact ever spoken of as one and the same sin, considered now in its fleshly, now in its spiritual aspect" (Jer. 3; Ezek. 16 and 17), [TRENCH].

14. when he had spent all . . . a mighty famine—a mysterious providence holding back the famine till he was in circumstances to feel it in all its rigor. Thus, like Jonah, whom the storm did not overtake till on the mighty deep at the mercy of the waves, does the sinner feel as if "the stars in their courses were fighting against" him (Judg. 5:20). in want—the first stage of his bitter experience, and preparation for a change.

15. joined himself . . .—his pride not yet humbled, unable to brook the shame of a return. to feed swine—glad to keep life anyhow, behold the son sank into a swineherd—among the Jews, on account of the prohibition of swine's flesh, emphatically vile!" "He who begins by using the world as a servant, to minister to his pleasure, ends by reversing the relationship" [TRENCH].

16. would fain have filled—rather, "was fain to fill," ate greedily of the only food he could get. the husks—"the hulls of a leguminous plant which in the East is the food of cattle and swine, and often the nourishment of the poorest in times of distress" [STIER]. no man gave . . . him—not this food, for that he had, but anything better (Jer. 30:14). This was his lowest depth—perishing unpitied, alone in the world, and ready to disappear from it unmissed! But this is just the blessed turning-point; midnight before dawn of day (II Chron. 12:8; 33:11-13; Jer. 2:19).

ADAM CLARKE

The "far country" is easily reached; and it is far, though a step can land us in it. A narrow bay may compel a long journey round its head before those on its opposite shores can meet. Sin takes us far away from God, and the root of all sin is that desire of living to one's self which began the prodigal's evil course.

The third step in his downward career, wasting his substance in riotous living, comes naturally after the two others; for all self-centered life is in deepest truth waste, and the special forms of gross dissipation to which youth is tempted are only too apt to follow the first sense of being their own masters, and removed from the safeguards of their earthly father's home. Many a lad in our great cities goes through the very stages of the parable, and, when a mother's eye is no longer on him, plunges into filthy debauchery. But living which does not outrage the proprieties may be riotous all the same; for all conduct which ignores God and asserts self as supreme is flagrantly against the very nature of man, and is reckless waste.

13. Riotous living. In a course of life that led him to spend all.

15. To feed swine. The basest and vilest of all employments and, to a Jew, peculiarly degrading. Shame, contempt, and distress are wedded to sin, and can never be divorced. No character could be meaner in the sight of a Jew than that of a swineherd. Herodotus informs us that in Egypt they were not permitted to mingle with civil society, nor to appear in the worship of the gods, nor would the very dregs of the people have any matrimonial connections with them.

16. With the husks. Bochart, I think, has proved that keratia does not mean husks. He shows also that the original word means the fruit of the charub tree, which grows plentifully in Syria. This kind of pulse was made use of to feed swine.

MATTHEW HENRY

passes and sins, destitute of spiritual life; no union with Christ, no living to God, and therefore dead. The prodigal in the far country was dead to his father and his family, and it is his own doing.

[8] A sinful state is a lost state: This my son was lost—lost to everything that was good—lost to his father's house. Souls that are separated from God are lost souls; lost as a traveller that is out of his way, and, if infinite mercy prevent not, will soon be lost irrecoverably.

[9] A sinful state is a state of madness and frenzy. This is intimated in that expression (v. 17), when he came to himself, which intimates that he had been beside himself. Surely he was so when he left his father's house, and much more so when he joined himself to the citizen of that country. Sinners, like those that are mad, destroy themselves with foolish lusts, and yet at the same time deceive themselves with foolish hopes.

2. We have here his return from this ramble. Now observe here,

(1) What was the occasion of his return and repentance. It was his affliction; when he was in want, then he came to himself. Afflictions, when they are sanctified by divine grace, prove happy means of turning sinners from the error of their ways. When we find the insufficiency of creatures to make us happy, and have tried all other ways of relief for our poor souls in vain, then it is time to think of returning to God. When we see what miserable comforters, what physicians of no value, all but Christ are; no man gives unto us what we need, then surely we shall apply ourselves to Jesus Christ.

(2) What was the preparative for it; it was consideration. He said within himself when he recovered his right mind, How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough! Consideration is the first step towards conversion. He considered how bad his condition was: I perish with hunger. Not only, "I am hungry," but, "I perish with hunger." Sinners will not come to the service of Christ till they are brought to see themselves just ready to perish in the service of sin. And though we be thus driven to Christ he will not think himself dishonoured by our being forced to him, but rather honoured by his being applied to in a desperate case.

He considered how much better it might be made if he would but return: How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough, and to spare, such a good house does he keep! In our Father's house there is bread for all his family. There is enough and to spare, enough for all, enough for each, enough and to spare for charity. There are crumbs that fall from his table, which many would be glad of, and thankful for. Even the hired servants in God's family are well provided for. The consideration of this should encourage sinners, that have gone astray from God, to think of returning to him.

(3) What was the purpose of it. His consideration issues, at length, in this conclusion: I will arise, and go to my father. Good purposes are good things, but still good performances are all in all. He determined what to do: I will arise and go to my father. Though he be in a far country, a great way off from his father's house, yet, far as it is, he will return; every step of backsliding from God must be a step back again in return to him. Observe with what resolution he speaks: "I will arise, and go to my father; I am resolved I will, whatever the issue be." He determined what to say. True repentance is a rising, and coming to God. But what words shall we take with us? In all our addresses to God, it is good to deliberate with ourselves beforehand what we shall say, that we may order our cause before him. Let us observe what he purposed to say.

First, He would confess his fault and folly: I have sinned. Forasmuch as we have all sinned, it behoves us to own that we have sinned. The confession of sin is required and insisted upon, as a necessary condition of peace and pardon. If we plead not guilty, we put ourselves upon a trial. If guilty, with a contrite, penitent, and obedient heart, we refer ourselves to the covenant of grace, which offers forgiveness to those that confess their sins.

Secondly, He would be so far from extenuating the matter that he would lay a load upon himself for it: I have sinned against Heaven, and before thee. Let those that are undutiful to their earthly parents think of this; they sin against Heaven, and before God. Offences against them are offences against God. Sin is committed in contempt of God's authority over us: We have sinned against Heaven. The malignity of sin aims high; it is against Heaven. Yet it is impotent malice, for we cannot hurt the heavens. Nay, it is foolish malice; what is shot against the heavens will return upon the head of him that shoots it. It is committed in contempt of God's eye upon us:

17. came to himself—Before, he had been "beside himself" (Eccles. 9:3), in what sense will presently appear.

how many hired . . .—What a testimony to the nature of the home he had left! But did he not know all this ere he departed and every day of his voluntary exile? He did, and he did not. His heart being wholly estranged from home and steeped in selfish gratification, his father's house never came within the range of his vision, or but as another name for bondage and gloom. Now empty, desolate, withered, perishing, home, with all its peace, plenty, freedom, dignity, starts into view, fills all his visions as a warm and living reality, and breaks his heart.

18. I will arise and go to my FATHER—The change has come at last, and what a change!—couched in terms of such exquisite simplicity and power as if expressly framed for all heart-broken penitents. Father . . .—Mark the term. Though "no more worthy to be called his son," the prodigal sinner is taught to claim the defiled, but still existing relationship, asking not to be made a servant, but remaining a son to be made "as a servant," willing to take the lowest place and do the meanest work. Ah! and is it come to this? Once it was, "Any place rather than home." Now, "Oh, that home! Could I but dare to hope that the door of it would not be closed against me, how gladly would I take any place and do any work, happy only to be there at all." Well, that is conversion—nothing absolutely new, yet all new; old familiar things seen in a new light and for the first time as realities of overwhelming magnitude and power. How this is brought about the parable says not. (We have that abundantly elsewhere, Phil. 2: 13, etc.). Its one object is to paint the welcome home of the greatest sinners, when (no matter for the present how) they "arise and go to their Father."

ADAM CLARKE

17. When he came to himself. A state of sin is represented in the sacred writings as a course of folly and madness, and repentance is represented as a restoration to sound sense. I perish with hunger! "Here" is added by some MSS. and most of the versions.

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

When a sinner comes to himself, he soon comes to his God. This poor prodigal, soon after he came to himself, said, "I will arise, and go to my father." What led him back to his father? Very briefly let me answer that question.

First, his memory aroused him. He recollected his father's house, he remembered the past, his own riotous living. Do not try to forget all that has happened; the terrible recollections of a misspent past may be the means of leading you to a new life. Set memory to work.

Next, his misery bestirred him. Every pang of hunger that he felt, the sight of his rags, the degradation of associating with swine—all those things drove him back to his father. Oh, sirs, let your very needs, your cravings, your misery, drive you to your God!

Then, his fears whipped him back. He said, "I perish with hunger." He had not perished yet, but he was afraid that he soon would do so; he feared that he really would die, for he felt so faint. Oh, sirs, see what will become of you if you do die in your sins! What awaits you but an endless future of limitless misery? Sin will follow you into eternity, and will increase upon you there, and as you shall go on to sin, so shall you go on to sorrow ever-increasing. A deeper degradation and a more tremendous penalty will accompany your sin in the world to come; therefore, let your fears drive you home, as they drove home the poor prodigal.

Meanwhile, his hope drew him. This gentle cord was as powerful as the heavy whip: "In my father's house there is bread enough and to spare; I need not perish with hunger, I may yet be filled." Oh, think of what you may yet be! Poor sinner, think of what God can do and is ready to do for you, to do for you even tonight! How happy He can make you! How peaceful and how blessed! So let your hope draw you to him.

Then, his resolve moved him. He said, "I will arise, and go to my father." All else drove him or drew him, and now he is resolved to return home. He rose up from the earth on which he had been sitting amidst his filthiness, and he said, "I will." Then the man became a man; he had come to himself, the manhood had come back to him, and he said, "I will, I will."

—The Treasury of the New Testament

18. Against heaven. That is, "against God." The Jews often make use of this periphrasis in order to avoid mentioning the name of God, which they have ever treated with the utmost reverence. But some contend that it should be translated "even unto heaven"; a Hebraism for, I have sinned exceedingly, beyond all description.

MATTHEW HENRY

"I have sinned against Heaven, and yet before thee."

Thirdly, He would acknowledge himself to have forfeited all the privileges of the family: I am no more worthy to be called thy son, v. 19. He does not deny the relation (for that was all he had to trust to), but he owns that his father might justly deny the relation. He had, at his own demand, the portion of goods that belonged to him, and had reason to expect no more. It becomes sinners to acknowledge themselves unworthy to receive any favour from God.

Fourthly, He would nevertheless sue for admission into the family, though it were into the meanest post there: "Make me as one of thy hired servants; that is good enough, and too good for me." If it be imposed on him as a mortification to sit with the servants, he will not only submit to it, but count it a preferment in comparison with his present state. "Make me as a hired servant, that I may show I love my father's house as much as ever I slighted it."

Fifthly, In all this he would have an eye to his father as a father: "I will arise, and go to my father, and will say unto him, Father. Eyeing God as a Father, and our Father, will be of great use in our repentance and return to him. It will make our sorrow for sin genuine, our resolutions against it strong, and encourage us to hope for pardon. God delights to be called Father both by penitents and petitioners.

(4) What was the performance of this purpose: He arose, and came to his father. His good resolve he put in execution without delay; he struck while the iron was hot. Have we said that we will arise and go? Let us immediately arise and come. He did not come halfway, and then pretend that he was tired and could get no further, but, weak and weary as he was, he made a thorough business of it.

3. We have here his reception and entertainment with his father: He came to his father; but was he welcome? Yes, heartily welcome. And, by the way, it is an example to parents whose children have been foolish and disobedient, if they repent, not to be harsh and severe with them, but to be governed by the wisdom that is from above, which is gentle and easy to be entreated. But it is chiefly designed to set forth the grace and mercy of God to poor sinners that repent and return to him, and his readiness to forgive them. Now here observe,

(1) The great love and affection wherewith the father received the son: When he was yet a great way off his father saw him, v. 20. He expressed his kindness before the son expressed his repentance. Even before we call he answers; for he knows what is in our hearts. How lively are the images presented here! [1] Here were eyes of mercy, and those eyes quick-sighted: When he was yet a great way off his father saw him, as if from the top of some high tower he had been looking that way which his son was gone, with such a thought as this, "O that I could see yonder wretched son of mine coming home!" This intimates God's desire of the conversion of sinners, and his readiness to meet them that are coming towards him. He is aware of the first inclination towards him. [2] Here were bowels of mercy, yearning at the sight of his son: He had compassion. Misery is the object of pity, even the misery of a sinner; though he has brought it upon himself, yet God compassionates. [3] Here were feet of mercy, and those feet quick-paced: He ran. The prodigal son came slowly, under a burden of shame and fear; but the tender father ran to meet him with his encouragements. [4] Here were arms of mercy, and those arms stretched out to embrace him: He fell on his neck. Though guilty and deserving to be beaten, though dirty and newly come from feeding swine, yet he thus takes him in his arms, and lays him in his bosom. Thus dear are true penitents to God, thus welcome to the Lord Jesus. [5] Here were lips of mercy. He kissed him. This kiss not only assured him of his welcome, but sealed his pardon; his former follies shall be all forgiven, nor is one word said by way of upbraiding.

(2) The penitent submission which the poor prodigal made to his father (v. 21): He said unto him, Father, I have sinned. As it commends the good father's kindness that he showed it before the prodigal expressed his repentance, so it commends the prodigal's repentance that he expressed it after his father had shown him so much kindness. When he had received the kiss which sealed his pardon, yet he said, Father, I have sinned. Even those that have received the pardon of their sins must have in their hearts a sincere contrition for it. The more we see of God's readiness to forgive us, the more difficult it should be to us to forgive ourselves.

(3) The splendid provision which this kind father made for the returning prodigal. One word we find in his purpose to say (v. 19) which we do not find that he did say (v. 21), and that was, Make me as fell on his neck and kissed him—What! In all his filth? Yes. In all his rags? Yes. In all his haggard, shattered wretchedness? Yes. "Our Father who art in heaven," is this Thy portraiture? It is even so (Jer. 31:20). And because it is so, I wonder not that such incomparable teaching hath made the world new.

20. And kissed him. Or "kissed him again and again." The father thus showed his great tenderness towards him, and his great affection for him.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

There is no sign that his conscience smote him or that his heart woke in love to his father. His stomach, and it only, urged him to go home. He did, indeed, feel that he had been wrong and had forfeited the right to be called a son; but he did not care much for losing that name or even for losing the love to which it had the right if only he could get as much to eat as one of the hired servants, whose relation to the master was less close, and, in patriarchal times, less happy, than that of slaves born in the house.

One good thing about the lad was that he did not let the grass grow under his feet, but, as soon as he had made the resolution, began to carry it into effect. The bane of many a resolve to go back to God is that it is delayed by procrastination. The ragged prodigal has not much to leave which need hold him, but many such a one says, "I will arise and go to my father tomorrow," and lets all the tomorrows become yesterdays and is sitting among the swine still.

Low as the prodigal's motive for return was, the fact of his return was enough. So is it in regard to our attitude to the gospel. Men may be drawn to give heed to its invitations from the instinct of self-preservation, or from their sense of hungry need and the belief that in it they will find the food they crave for, while there may be little consciousness of longing for more from the Father than the satisfaction of felt wants. The longing for a place in the Father's heart will spring up later, but the beginning of most men's taking refuge in God as revealed in Christ is the gnawing of a hungry heart. The call to all is, "Ho, everyone that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money; come ye, buy, and eat."—Expositions of Holy Scripture one of thy hired servants. We cannot think that he forgot it, much less that he changed his mind, but his father interrupted him, prevented his saying it: "Hold, son, thou art heartily welcome, and, though not worthy to be called a son, shalt be treated as a dear son." He who is thus entertained at first needs not ask to be made as a hired servant, It is strange that here is not one word of rebuke: "You could never find the way home till beaten hither with your own rod." No, here is nothing like this; which intimates that, when God forgives the sins of true penitents, he forgets them, he remembers them no more. But this is not all; here is rich and royal provision made for him, far beyond what he did or could expect. He would have thought it sufficient if his father had but taken notice of him, and bid him go to the kitchen, and get his dinner with his servants; but God does for those who cast themselves upon his mercy, abundantly above what they are able to ask or think. The prodigal came home between hope and fear, fear of being rejected and hope of being received; but his father was not only better to him than his fears, but better to him than his hopes.

[1] He came home in rags, and his father not only clothed him, but adorned him. He said to the servants, Bring forth the best robe, and put it on him. The worst old clothes in the house might have served; but the father calls not for a coat, but for a robe, the best robe. "That robe, that principal robe, you know which I mean. Bring hither that robe, and put it on him; he will be ashamed to wear it, and think that it ill becomes him who comes home in such a dirty pickle, but put it on him, and put a ring on his hand, a signet-ring, with the arms of the family, in token of his being owned as a branch of the family." He came home barefoot, his feet perhaps sore with travel, and therefore, "Put shoes on his feet." Thus does the grace of God provide for true penitents. First, The righteousness of Christ is the robe with which they are clothed; they put on the Lord Jesus Christ. A new nature is this best robe; true penitents are clothed with this. Secondly, The earnest of the Spirit is the ring on the hand. "Put a ring on his hand, to be before him a constant memorial of his father's kindness, that he may never forget it." Thirdly, The preparation of the gospel of peace is as shoes for our feet (Eph. vi. 15). It intimates that they shall go on cheerfully, and with resolution, in the way of religion, as a man does when he has shoes on his feet, above what he does when he is barefoot.

[2] He came home hungry, and his father not only fed him, but feasted him (v. 23): "Bring hither the fatted calf and kill it, that my son may be satisfied with the best we have." The fatted calf can never be better bestowed. It was a great change with the prodigal, who just before would fain have filled his belly with husks. How sweet will the supplies of the new covenant be, to those who have been labouring in vain for satisfaction in the creature! Now he found his own words made good, In my father's house there is bread enough and to spare.

(4) The great joy and rejoicing occasioned by his return. The bringing of the fatted calf was designed to be not only a feast for him, but a festival for the family: "Let us all eat, and be merry, for it is a good day; for this my son was dead; we thought that he was dead, but behold he lives; he was lost, we gave him up for lost, but he is found." The conversion of a soul from sin to God is the raising of that soul from death to life, and the finding of that which seemed to be lost: it is a great, and wonderful, and happy change. It is such a change as that upon the face of the earth when the spring returns. The conversion of sinners is greatly pleasing to the God of heaven, and all that belong to his family ought to rejoice in it; those in heaven do, and those on earth should. It was the father that began the joy, and set all the rest on rejoicing. The family complied with the master: They began to be merry. God's children and servants ought to be affected with things as he is.

4. We have here the repining and envying of the elder brother, which is described by way of reproof to the scribes and Pharisees. He represents it so as not to aggravate the matter, but as allowing them still the privileges of elder brethren. Christ, when he reproved them for their faults, yet accosted them mildly, to smooth them into a good temper towards the poor publicans. But by the elder brother here we may understand those who are really good, and never went astray, who comparatively need no repentance; and to such these words in the close, Son, thou art ever with me, are applicable without any difficulty, but not to the scribes and Pharisees. Now concerning the elder brother, observe,

(1) How foolish and fretful he was upon occasion of his brother's reception, and how he was disgusted at it. It seems he was abroad in the field when his

A. B. SIMPSON:

There was much that was wrong in the spirit and repentance of the prodigal. There was much of pride still lingering in his heart, and he was really determined to buy his way back to his father's favor; or, at least, to earn some place as a servant at his board. It was a self-righteous idea, which always clings to the fallen heart. I will do something to deserve God's mercy. "I will say to my father, Father, I have sinned and am no more worthy to be called thy son." This is all right; but, "make me one of thy hired servants" is the very self-righteousness which Christ and His apostles declared shut the Pharisees out of the kingdom of heaven. It is the sinner still comforting himself with the thought that he is going to do better, and somehow make up for his past misdeeds by trying to serve God. Happily, when he got back, his father choked all this out of him before he was able to utter it. He let him say, "I have sinned and am no more worthy to be called thy son," and then he stopped short all the rest of his studied speech by his overflowing welcome and his fatherly reconciliation. Therefore, although our penitence may be imperfect, and our faith be weak and faltering, let us come the best we can. This is the beautiful teaching of this parable, and it comes out with still more force in the next division.—Christ in the Bible

22. But the Father said . . .—The son has not said all he purposed, not so much, because the father's demonstrations had rekindled the filial, and swallowed up all servile feeling [TRENCH] (see on the word "Father," vs. 18), but because the father's heart is made to appear too full to listen, at that moment, to more in this strain. the best robe—Cf. Zech. 3:4, 5, "Take away the filthy garments from him; behold I have clothed thee with change of raiment; and they clothed him with garments" (Isa. 61:10; Rev. 3:18). a ring—(Cf. Gen. 41:42; Jas. 2:2). shoes—Slaves went barefoot. Thus, we have here a threefold symbol of freedom and honor, restored, as the fruit of perfect reconciliation.

23. the fatted calf—kept for festive occasions.

24. my son—now twice his son. dead . . . lost—to me; to himself—to my service, my satisfaction; to his own dignity, peace, profit. alive again . . . found—to all these. merry—(See on vs. 10).

25. in the field—engaged in his father's business: cf. vs. 29, "These many years do I serve thee."

ADAM CLARKE

22. Bring forth the best robe. "Bring out that chief garment," the garment which was laid by, to be used only on birthdays or festival times. Put a ring on his hand. Giving a ring was in ancient times a mark of honor and dignity. See Gen. xli. 42; 1 Kings xxi. 8; Esther viii. 2; Dan. vi. 17; Jas. ii. 2. Shoes on his feet. Formerly those who were captivated had their shoes taken off, Isa. xx. 1; and when they were restored to liberty their shoes were restored. See 2 Chron. xxviii. 15.

23. The fatted calf, and kill it. "Sacrifice it." In ancient times the animals provided for public feasts were first sacrificed to God. The blood of the beast being poured out before God, by way of atonement for sin, the flesh was considered as consecrated, and the guests were considered as feeding on divine food.

24. Was dead. Lost to all good—given up to all evil. In this figurative sense the word is used by the best Greek writers.

25. His elder son. Meaning probably persons of a regular moral life, who needed no repentance in comparison of the prodigal already described. In the field. Attending the concerns of the farm.

MATTHEW HENRY

brother came, and by the time he had returned home the mirth was begun: When he drew nigh to the house he heard music and dancing, v. 25. He enquired what these things meant (v. 26), and was informed that his brother was come, and his father had made him a feast for his welcome home, and great joy there was because he had received him safe and sound, v. 27. It is but one word in the original, he had received him ὑγιαίνοντα—in health, well both in body and mind. He received him not only well in body, but a penitent, returned to his right mind, cured of his vices, else he had not been received safe and sound. Now this offended him to the highest degree: He was angry, and would not go in (v. 28), because he would intimate to his father that he should have kept out his younger brother. This shows what is a common fault, [1] In men's families. Those who have always been a comfort to their parents think they should have the monopoly of their parents' favours, and are apt to be too sharp upon those who have transgressed.

[2] In God's family. Those who are comparatively innocents seldom know how to be compassionate towards those who are manifestly penitents. The language of such we have here, in what the elder brother said (v. 29, 30). First, He boasted of himself and his own virtue and obedience. Lo, these many years do I serve thee, neither transgressed I at any time thy commandment. It is too common for those that are better than their neighbours to boast of it. I am apt to think that this elder brother said more than was true, that he had never transgressed his father's commands, for then I believe he would not have been so obstinate as now he was to his father's entreaties. Those that have long served God, and been kept from gross sins, have a great deal to be humbly thankful for, but nothing proudly to boast of. Secondly, He complained of his father: Thou never gavest me a kid, that I might make merry with my friends. He was out of humour now, else he would not have made this complaint; for, no question, if he had asked such a thing at any time, he might have had it at the first word. The killing of the fatted calf put him upon making this peevish reflection. When men are in a passion they are apt to reflect in a way they would not if they were in their right mind. He had many a time been merry with him and the family; but his father had never given him so much as a kid, which was but a small token of love compared with the fatted calf. Those that think highly of themselves and their services are apt to think hardly of their master and meanly of his favours. We ought to own ourselves utterly unworthy of those mercies which God has thought fit to give us, and therefore we must not complain. He would have had a kid, to make merry with his friends abroad, whereas the fatted calf was given to his brother, not to make merry with his friends abroad, but with the family at home: the mirth of God's children should be with their father and his family, and not with any other friends. Thirdly, He was very ill-humoured towards his younger brother. Some good people are apt to be overtaken in this fault, to look with disdain upon those who have not preserved their reputation so clean as they have done, though they have given very good evidence of their repentance and reformation. This is not the Spirit of Christ, but of the Pharisees. Let us observe the instances of it. 1. He would not go in; one house shall not hold him and his own brother, no, not his father's house. Though we are to shun the society of those sinners by whom we are in danger of being infected, yet we must not be shy of the company of penitent sinners, by whom we may get good. He saw that his father had taken him in, and yet he would not go in to him. We think too well of ourselves, if we cannot find in our hearts to receive those whom God hath received, and who are taken into friendship and fellowship with him. 2. He would not call him brother; but this thy son, which sounds arrogant, and not without reflection upon his father. Let us give our relations the titles that belong to them. Let the rich call the poor brethren, and let the innocents call the penitents so. 3. He aggravated his brother's faults, and made the worst of them: He is thy son, who hath devoured thy living with harlots. He had spent his own portion foolishly enough (whether upon harlots or no we are not told before, perhaps that was only the language of the elder brother's jealousy and ill will), but that he had devoured all his father's living was false; the father had still a good estate. Now this shows how apt we are to make the worst of everything, and to set it out in the blackest colours, which is not doing as we would be done by, nor as our heavenly Father does by us. 4. He grudged him the kindness that his father showed him: Thou hast killed for him the fatted calf. It is a wrong thing to envy penitents

29. these many years . . . neither transgressed I at any time . . .—The words are not to be pressed too far. He is merely contrasting his constancy of love and service with the conduct of his brother; just as Job, resenting the charge of hypocrisy by his friends, speaks as if nothing could be laid to his charge (Job 23:10-12), and David too (Ps. 18:20-24). The father attests the truth of all he says. never . . . a kid—I say not a calf, but not even a kid. that I might make merry with my friends—Here lay his misapprehension. It was no entertainment for the gratification of the prodigal: it was a father's expression of the joy he felt at his recovery.

thy son . . . thy living—How unworthy a reflection on the common father of both, for the one not only to disown the other, but fling him over upon his father, as if he should say, Take him, and have joy of him!

ADAM CLARKE

He heard music. Symphonias, a number of sounds mingled together, as in a concert. Dancing. But Le Clerc denies that the word means dancing at all, as it properly means a "choir of singers." The "symphony" mentioned before may mean the musical instruments which accompanied the choirs of singers.

28. He was angry. This refers to the indignation of the scribes and Pharisees, mentioned in vv. 1-2. In every point of view, the anger of the old son was improper and unreasonable. He had already received his part of the inheritance (see v. 12), and his profligate brother had received no more than what was his just dividend. Besides, what the father had acquired since that division he had a right to dispose of as he pleased, even to give it all to one son; nor did the ancient customs of the Asiatic countries permit the other children to claim any share in such property thus disposed of.

29. Never gavest me a kid. It is evident from v. 12 that the father gave him his portion when his profligate brother claimed his, for he divided his whole substance between them. And though he had not claimed it, so as to separate from, and live independently of, his father, yet he might have done so whenever he chose; and therefore his complaining was both undutiful and unjust.

30. This thy son. "This son of thine"—words expressive of supreme contempt. This son—he would not condescend to call him by his name, or to acknowledge him for his brother; and at the same time bitterly reproaches his amiable father for his affectionate tenderness, and readiness to receive his once undutiful, but now penitent, child!

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

There is another son. What are we to do with this elder son? It is rather interesting how men have struggled to explain this. I have heard it said that this is the difference between the Jew and the Gentile. That is very absurd, because we cannot say of the Jew what the father said of this son. The difference is not between Jew and Gentile. The difference is between two sons, one self-righteous and the other a sinner.

But that is not all. Look at this elder son. What do we find? He was devoted to his father's law, and he was devoted to his father's service; but he was entirely out of sympathy with his father's heart; and therefore unable to set the true value upon his brother. The Pharisees and scribes were the men Jesus was looking at when He talked about the elder son. He was taking them at their own valuation, devoted to the law and service of God. To them He said, in effect, "You cannot understand God, you cannot understand the heart of God; if you did, you could not look with contempt upon these men outside, with whom I am mixing." The elder son was out of sympathy with the heart of his father. How many sons of God are like that, even in the Church today!

—The Gospel According to Luke

the grace of God. As we must not envy those that are the worst of sinners the gifts of common providence, so we must not envy those that have been the worst of sinners the gifts of covenant love upon their repentance; we must not envy them any extraordinary gift which God bestows upon them. Paul, before his conversion, had been a prodigal, yet when after his conversion he had greater measures of grace given him than the other apostles, they who were the elder brethren did not envy him his visions and revelations, nor his more extensive usefulness, but glorified God in him, which ought to be an example to us, as the reverse of this elder brother.

(2) Let us now see how favourable and friendly his father was in his carriage towards him when he was thus sour and ill-humoured. This is as surprising as the former. Methinks the mercy and grace of our God in Christ shine almost as brightly in his tender and gentle bearing with peevish saints, as before in his reception of prodigal sinners upon their repentance. The disciples of Christ themselves had many infirmities, and were men subject to like passions as others, yet Christ bore with them.

[1] When he would not come in, his father came out, and entreated him, accosted him mildly, gave him good words, and desired him to come in. He might justly have said, "If he will not come in, let him stay out. Is not the house my own? and may I not do what I please in it? Is not the fatted calf my own? and may I not do what I please with it?" No, as he went to meet the younger son, so now he goes to court the elder. This is designed to represent to us the goodness of God; how strangely gentle and winning he has been towards those that were strangely froward and provoking. It is to teach all superiors to be mild and gentle with their inferiors, even when they are in a fault and passionately justify themselves in it. Even in that case let fathers not provoke their children to more wrath, and let masters forbear threatening, and both show all meekness.

[2] His father assured him that the kind entertainment he gave his younger brother was neither any reflection upon him nor should be any prejudice to him (v. 31): "Son, thou art ever with me; the reception of him is no rejection of thee, nor what is laid out on him any sensible diminution of what I design for thee; all that I have is thine, by an indefeasible title." If he had not given him a kid to make merry with his friends, he had allowed him to eat bread at his table continually; and it is better to be happy with our Father in heaven than merry with any friend we have in this world. First, It is the unspeakable happiness of all the children of God, that they are, and shall be, ever with him. All that he has is theirs; for, if children, then heirs, Rom. viii. 17. Secondly, Therefore we ought not to envy others God's grace to them because we shall have never the less for their sharing in it. If we be true believers, all that God is, all that he has, is ours; and, if others come to be true believers, all that he is, and all that he has, is theirs too, and yet we have not the less, as they that walk in the light and warmth of the sun have all the benefit they can have by it, and yet not the less for others having as much.

[3] His father gave him a good reason, It was meet that we should make merry and be glad, v. 32. He might have insisted upon his own authority: "It was my will that the family should make merry and be glad." But it does not become even those that have authority to be vouching and appealing to it upon every occasion, which does but make it cheap and common; it is better to give a convincing reason, as the father does here: It was meet that we should make merry for the return of a prodigal son, more than for the perseverance of a dutiful son; for, though the latter is a greater blessing to a family, yet the former is a more sensible pleasure. Any family would be much more transported with joy at the raising of a dead child to life, than for the continued life and health of many children. We do not find that the elder brother made any reply to what his father said, which intimates that he was well reconciled to his prodigal brother; and his father put him in mind that he was his brother: This thy brother. A good man, though he have not such a command of himself at all times as to keep his temper, yet will, with the grace of God, recover his temper.

came his father out, and entreated him—"Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him" (Ps. 103:13). As it is the elder brother who now errs, so it is the same paternal compassion which had fallen on the neck of the younger that comes forth and pleads with the elder.

31. Son . . .—The father resents not the insult—how could he, after the largeness of heart which had kissed the returning prodigal? He calmly expostulates with him, "Son, listen to reason. What need for special, exuberant joy over thee? Didst thou say, 'Lo, these many years do I serve thee?' In that saidst thou truly; but just for that reason do I not set the whole household a-rejoicing over thee. For thee is reserved what is higher still—a tranquil lifelong satisfaction in thee, as a true-hearted faithful son in thy father's house, nor of the inheritance reserved for thee is aught alienated by this festive and fitting joy over the once foolish but now wise and newly recovered one."

32. It was meet—Was it possible he should simply take his long vacant place in the family without one special sign of wonder and delight at the change? Would that have been nature? But this being the meaning of the festivity, it would for that very reason be temporary. In time, the dutifulness of even the younger son would become the law and not the exception; he too at length might venture to say, "Lo, these many years do I serve thee"; and of him the father would say, "Son, thou art ever with me." In that case, therefore, it would not be "meet that they should make merry and be glad." The lessons are obvious, but how beautiful! (1) The deeper sunk and the longer estranged any sinner is, the more exuberant is the joy which his recovery occasions. (2) Such joy is not the portion of those whose whole lives have been spent in the service of their Father in heaven. (3) Instead of grudging the want of this, they should deem it the highest testimony to their lifelong fidelity, that something better is reserved for them—the deep, abiding complacency of their Father in heaven.

ALBERT BARNES:

30. "This thy son." This son of "thine." This is an expression of great contempt. He did not call him his brother, but his father's son, to show at once his contempt for his younger brother and for his father for having received him as he did. Never was there a more striking instance of petty malice, or more unjustifiable disregard of a father's conduct and will.

"Thy living." Thy property. This is still designed to irritate the father and set him against his younger son. It was true that the younger son had been guilty and foolish and ungrateful; but he was penitent, and that was of more consequence to the father than all his property; and in the joy that he was penitent and was safe, he forgot his ingratitude and folly. So should the elder son have done.

31. "All I have is thine." The property was divided. What remained was in reality the elder son's. He was heir to it all, and had a right, if he chose, to use it. He had therefore no right to complain.

This instructive and beautiful parable was designed to vindicate the conduct of Jesus—to show that it was right to receive sinners, and that the conduct of the Pharisees was unreasonable. The elder son represents the Pharisees; the younger, the returning sinner, whether Jew or Gentile; and the father, God, who is willing to receive them. The parable had the designed effect. It silenced the adversaries of Jesus and vindicated his own conduct. There is not, perhaps, anywhere to be found a more beautiful and touching narrative than this. Every circumstance is tender and happily chosen; every word has a meaning; every image is beautiful; and the narrative closes just where it is fitted to make the deepest impression.—Popular Commentary

31. All that I have is thine. See on v. 28.

32. This thy brother. Or "this brother of thine." To awaken this ill-natured, angry, inhumane man to a proper sense of his duty, to both his parent and his brother, this amiable father returns him his own unkind words, but in a widely different spirit. This son of mine to whom I show mercy is your brother, to whom you should show tenderness and affection, especially as he is no longer the person he was. He was dead in sin—he is quickened by the power of God; he was lost to you, to me, to himself, and to our God, but now he is found. This, as well as the two preceding parables, was designed to vindicate the conduct of our blessed Lord in receiving taxgatherers and heathens. And as the Jews, to whom it was addressed, could not but approve of the conduct of this benevolent father, and reprobate that of his elder son, so they could not but justify the conduct of Christ towards those outcasts of men, and at least in the silence of their hearts pass sentence of condemnation upon themselves.

We mistake if we imagine that the design of Christ's doctrine and holy religion was either to amuse us with notions of divine mysteries or to entertain us with notions of divine mercies. No, the divine revelation of both these in the gospel is intended to engage and quicken us to the practice of Christian duties, to the duty of beneficence and doing good to those who stand in need of anything that either we have or can do for them. We are but stewards of the manifold grace of God. It is our wisdom to think how we may make what we have in the world turn to a good account. If we would act wisely, we must be as diligent and industrious to employ our riches in the acts of piety and charity, in order to promote our future and eternal welfare, as worldly men are in laying them out to the greatest temporal profit.

I. The parable itself, in which all the children of men are represented as stewards of what they have in this world. Whatever we have, the property of it is God's; we have only the use of it.

1. Here is the dishonesty of this steward. He wasted his lord's goods, and for this he was accused to his lord, v. 1. We are all liable to the same charge. We have not made a due improvement of what God has entrusted us with in this world. That we may not be for this judged of our Lord, it concerns us to judge ourselves.

2. His discharge out of his place. His lord called for him, and said, "How is it that I hear this of thee?" He speaks as one sorry to find himself disappointed in him: it troubles him to hear it; but the steward cannot deny it, and therefore there is no remedy, he must make up his accounts, and be gone in a little time, v. 2. Now this is designed to teach us, (1) That we must all of us shortly be discharged from our stewardship in this world. Death will come, and dismiss us from our stewardship, others will come in our places. (2) That our discharge from our stewardship at death is just, and what we have deserved, for we have wasted our Lord's goods. (3) That when our stewardship is taken from us we must give an account of it to our Lord.

3. His after-wisdom. Now he began to consider, What shall I do? v. 3. He would have done well to have considered this before, but it is better to consider late than never. He must live; which way shall he have a livelihood? (1) He knows that he has not such a degree of industry in him as to get his living by work: "I cannot dig." But why can he not dig? The truth is, he is lazy. His cannot is a will not; it is not a natural but a moral disability that he labours under. He cannot dig, for he was never used to it. (2) He knows that he has not such a degree of humility as to get his bread by begging: To beg I am ashamed. This was the language of his pride, as the former of his slothfulness. This steward had more reason to be ashamed of cheating his master than of begging his bread. (3) He therefore determines to make friends of his lord's debtors: "I am resolved what to do (v. 4). I am acquainted with my lord's tenants, have done them many a good turn, and now I will do them one more, which will so oblige them that they will bid me welcome to their houses. Till I can better dispose of myself, I will quarter upon them, and go from one good house to another." Accordingly, he sent for one, who owed his lord a hundred measures of oil: Take thy bill, said he, and sit down quickly, and write fifty (v. 6); so he reduced his debt to the one half. "Sit down quickly, and do it, lest we be taken treating, and suspected." He took another, who owed his lord a hundred measures of wheat, and bade him write fourscore (v. 7). See here what uncertain things our worldly possessions are; they are most so to those who have most of them, who devolve upon others all the care concerning them, and so put it into their power to cheat them. See also what treachery is to be found even among those in whom trust is reposed. Though this steward is turned out for dealing dishonestly, yet still he does so. So rare is it for men to mend of a fault, though they smart for it.

4. The approbation of this: The lord commended the unjust steward, because he had done wisely, v. 8. It may be meant of his lord, the lord of that servant, who yet was pleased with his ingenuity and policy for himself; but, taking it so, the latter part of the verse must be the words of our Lord, and therefore I think the whole is meant of him. He does not commend him because he had done falsely to his master, but because he had done wisely for himself. Yet perhaps herein he did well for his master too, and but justly with the tenants. He knew what hard bargains he had set them, so that they could not pay their rent. He now, at going off, did as he ought to do both in justice and charity. He had been all for his lord, but now he begins to consider the tenants, that he might

Vss. 1-31. PARABLES OF THE UNJUST STEWARD AND OF THE RICH MAN AND LAZARUS, OR, THE RIGHT USE OF MONEY.

1. steward—manager of his estate. accused—informed upon. had wasted—rather, "was wasting."

3. cannot dig . . . to beg, ashamed—therefore, when dismissed, shall be in utter want.

4. may receive me . . .—Observe his one object—when cast out of one home to secure another. This is the key to the parable, on which there have been many differing views. 5-7. fifty . . . fourscore—deducting a half from the debt of the one, and a fifth from that of the other.

8. the lord—evidently the steward's lord, so called in vss. 3, 5. commended . . .—not for his "injustice," but "because he had done wisely," or prudently; with commendable foresight and skilful adaptation of means to end.

ADAM CLARKE

1. A steward. One who superintends domestic concerns, and ministers to the support of the family, having the products of the field and business put into his hands for this very purpose. Wasted his goods. Had been profuse and profligate, and had embezzled his master's substance.

2. Give an account of thy. Produce your books of receipts and disbursements, that I may see whether the accusation against you is true or false. The original may be translated, "Give up the business of the stewardship."

3. I cannot dig. He could not submit to become a common day laborer, which was both a severe and base employment. To beg I am ashamed. And as these were the only honest ways left him to procure a morsel of bread, and he would not submit to either, he found he must continue the system of knavery, in order to provide for his idleness and luxury, or else starve.

4. They may receive me. That is, the debtors and tenants, who paid their debts and rents, not in money, but in kind; such as wheat, oil, and other produce of their lands.

6. An hundred measures of oil. "A hundred baths." The bath was the largest measure of capacity among the Hebrews, except the homer, of which it was the tenth part: see Ezek. xlv. 11, 14. It is equal to the ephah, i.e., to seven gallons and a half of our measure. Take thy bill. "Your account." The writing in which the debt was specified, together with the obligation to pay so much, at such and such times. This appears to have been in the handwriting of the debtor, and probably signed by the steward, and this precluded imposition on each part. To prevent all appearance of forgery in this case, he is desired to write it over again, and to cancel the old engagement.

7. An hundred measures of wheat. "A hundred cors." Koros, from the Hebrew cor, was the largest measure of capacity among the Hebrews, whether for solids or liquids. As the bath was equal to the ephah, so the cor was equal to the homer. It contained about seventy-five gallons and five pints English.

8. The lord commended. Viz., the master of this unjust steward. He spoke highly of the address and cunning of his iniquitous servant. He had, on his own principles, made a very prudent provision for his support; but his master no more approved of his conduct in this than he did in his wasting his substance before. From the ambiguous and improper manner in which this is expressed in the common English translation, it has been supposed that our blessed

The right use of money. We are all stewards, but how much we waste! Well might our Master deprive us of our position and trust! The unjust steward used his opportunity of ingratiating himself with the tenants at the landowner's cost. He thus secured for himself a welcome to their homes, but his deceit came to light and he was dismissed. Our Master did not commend his fraud, but pointed out that the children of this world are singularly alive to their future and prepare for its contingencies. If they make a wrong use of money to provide for the future, how much more should Christians make a right use of it, so that when they die they may be welcomed to the eternal home by those whom they have benefited!—Bible Commentary have their favour when he had lost his lord's. Now this forecast of his, for a comfortable subsistence in this world, shames our improvidence for another world: The children of this world are wiser for their generation, better consult their worldly interest and advantage, than the children of light, in their generation, that is, in the concerns of their souls and eternity. (1) The wisdom of worldly people in the concerns of this world is to be imitated by us in the concerns of our souls: it is their principle to improve their opportunities, to do that first which is most needful. O that we were thus wise in our spiritual affairs! (2) The children of light are commonly outdone by the children of this world. Not that the children of this world are truly wise; it is only in their generation. But in that they are wiser than the children of light in theirs. We live as if we were to be here always and as if there were not another life after this. Though as children of the light we cannot but see another world before us, yet we do not prepare for it, do not send our best effects and best affections thither, as we should.

II. The application of this parable, and the inferences drawn from it (v. 9): "I say unto you, you my disciples" (for to them this parable is directed, v. 1), "though you have but little in this world, consider how you may do good with that little." Observe,

1. What it is that our Lord Jesus here exhorts us to: "Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness." It is the wisdom of the men of this world so to manage their money as that they may have the benefit of it hereafter, and not for this present only. Now we should learn of them to make use of our money so as that we may be the better for it hereafter in another world, as they do in hopes to be the better for it hereafter in this world. And in our case, though whatever we have are our Lord's goods, yet, as long as we dispose of them among our Lord's tenants and for their advantage, it is so far from being reckoned a wrong to our Lord, that it is a duty to him as well as policy for ourselves. (1) The things of this world are the mammon of unrighteousness, or the false mammon. Riches are perishing things, and will disappoint those that raise their expectations from them. (2) Though this mammon of unrighteousness is not to be trusted to for a happiness, yet it may and must be made use of in subserviency to our pursuit of that which is our happiness. Though we cannot find true satisfaction in it, yet we may make to ourselves friends with it. (3) At death we must all fail, ὅταν ἐκλίπητε—when ye suffer an eclipse. Death eclipses us. A tradesman is said to fail when he becomes a bankrupt. We must all thus fail shortly; death shuts up the shop, seals up the hand. (4) It ought to be our great concern to make it sure to ourselves, that when we fail at death we may be received into everlasting habitations in heaven. Christ is gone before, to prepare a place for those that are his, and is there ready to receive them. See 1 Tim. vi. 17–19, which explains this here.

2. With what arguments he presses this exhortation.

(1) If we do not make a right use of the gifts of God's providence, how can we expect from him the gifts of his spiritual grace? Our unfaithfulness in the use of them may be justly reckoned a forfeiture of that grace which is necessary to bring us to glory, v. 10–14. The riches of this world are the less; grace and glory are the greater. Now if we be unfaithful in the less, it may justly be feared that we should be so in the gifts of God's grace, and therefore they will be denied us: He that is faithful in that which is least is faithful also in much, He that serves God, and does good, with his money, will serve God, and do good, with the more noble and valuable talents of wisdom and grace, but he that buries the one talent of this world's wealth will never improve the five talents of spiritual riches. The riches of this world are the unrighteous mammon, which is hastening from us apace, and, if we would make any advantage of it, we must bestir ourselves quickly; if we do not, how can we expect to be entrusted with spiritual riches, which are the only true riches? v. 11. Let us be convinced of this, that those are truly rich, and very rich, who are rich in faith, and rich towards God, rich in Christ, the kingdom of God and the righteousness thereof. If other things be added to us, by using them well we may take the faster hold of the true riches, and may be qualified to receive yet more grace from God. To a man that is faithful in the unrighteous mammon, he gives the true riches. The riches of this world are another man's. They are not our own; for they are God's. They are another man's; we have them from others; we use them for others; and we must shortly leave them to others. But spiritual and eternal riches are our own inseparably; they are a good part that will never be taken away from us. If we make Christ our own, and the promises our own, and heaven our own, we have that which we children of this world—so ch. 20:34; cf. Psalm 17:14 ("their portion in this life"); Philippians 3:19 ("mind earthly things"); Psalm 4:6, 7. in—or "for"—their generation—i.e., for the purposes of the "world" they are "of." The greater wisdom (or shrewdness) of the one, in adaptation of means to ends, and in energetic, determined prosecution of them, is none of it for God and eternity—a region they were never in, an atmosphere they never breathed, an undiscovered world, an unborn existence to them—but all for the purposes of their own grovelling and fleeting generation. children of light—(so John 12:36; Eph. 5:8; I Thess. 5:5). Yet this is only "as night-birds see better in the dark than those of the day—owls than eagles" [CAJETAN and TRENCH]. But we may learn lessons from them, as our Lord now shows, and "be wise as serpents."

9. Make . . . friends of—Turn to your advantage; i.e., as the steward did, "by showing mercy to the poor" (Dan. 4:27; cf. 12:33; 14:13, 14).

mammon of unrighteousness—treacherous, precarious. (See on Matt. 6:24.) ye fail—in respect of life. they may receive you—not generally, "ye may be received" (as ch. 6:38, "shall men give"), but "those ye have relieved may rise up as witnesses for you" at the great day. Then, like the steward, when turned out of one home shall ye secure another; but better than he, a heavenly for an earthly, an everlasting for a temporary habitation. Money is not here made the key to heaven, more than "the deeds done in the body" in general, according to which, as a test of character—but not by the merit of which—men are to be judged (II Cor. 5:10, and see Matt. 25:34-40).

10. He . . .—a maxim of great pregnancy and value; rising from the prudence which the steward had to the fidelity which he had not, the "harmlessness of the dove, to which the serpent" with all his "wisdom" is a total stranger. Fidelity depends not on the amount entrusted, but on the sense of responsibility. He that feels this in little will feel it in much, and conversely. 11, 12. unrighteous mammon—To the whole of this He applies the disparaging term "what is least," in contrast with "the true riches."

12. another man's . . . your own—an important turn to the subject. Here all we have is on trust as stewards, who have an account to render. Hereafter, what the faithful have will be their own property, being no longer on probation, but in secure, undisturbed, rightful, everlasting possession and enjoyment of all that is graciously bestowed on us. Thus money is neither to be idolized nor despised; we must sit loose to it and use it for God's glory.

ADAM CLARKE

Lord commended the conduct of this wicked man; but the word there translated lord simply means the "master" of the unjust steward. The children of this world. Such as mind worldly things only, without regarding God or their souls. A phrase by which the Jews always designate the Gentiles. Children of light. Such as are illuminated by the Spirit of God, and regard worldly things only as far as they may subserve the great purposes of their salvation, and become the instruments of good to others. But ordinarily the former evidence more carefulness and prudence in providing for the support and comfort of this life than the latter do in providing for another world.

9. The mammon of unrighteousness. Literally, "the mammon of injustice." Riches promise much, and perform nothing; they excite hope and confidence, and deceive both. In making a man depend on them for happiness, they rob him of the salvation of God and of eternal glory. For these reasons they are represented as unjust and deceitful. When ye fail. That is, when ye "die." The Septuagint use the word in this very sense, Jer. xlii. 17, 22. So does Josephus, War, chap. iv. 1, 9. They may receive you. The expression seems to be a mere Hebraism: they may receive you, for "ye shall be received"; i.e., God shall admit you, if you make a faithful use of His gifts and graces. He who does not make a faithful use of what he has received from his Maker has no reason to hope for eternal felicity.

10. He that is faithful in that which is least. He who has the genuine principles of fidelity in him will make a point of conscience of carefully attending to even the smallest things; and it is by habituating himself to act uprightly in little things that he acquires the gracious habit of acting with propriety, fidelity, honor, and conscience in matters of the greatest concern. On the contrary, he who does not act uprightly in small matters will seldom feel himself bound to pay much attention to the dictates of honor and conscience, in cases of high importance. Can we reasonably expect that a man who is continually falling by little things has power to resist temptations to great evils?

12. That which is another man's. Or rather "another's." That is, worldly riches, called another's: (1) Because they belong to God, and He has not designed that they should be any man's portion; (2) Because they are continually changing their possessors, being in the way of commerce, and in providence going from one to another. That which is your own. Grace and glory, which God has particularly designed for you.

may truly call our own. But how can we expect God should enrich us with these if we do not serve him with our worldly possessions, of which we are but stewards?

(2) We have no other way to prove ourselves the servants of God than by giving up ourselves so entirely to his service as to make all our worldly gain serviceable to us in his service (v. 13): No servant can serve two masters. If a man will love the world, and hold to that, it cannot be but he will hate God and despise him. But, on the other hand, if a man will love God, and adhere to him, he will comparatively hate the world, and the things of the world shall be made to help him in serving God and working out his salvation. The matter is here laid plainly before us: Ye cannot serve God and mammon. So divided are their interests that their services can never be compounded.

3. We are here told what entertainment this doctrine of Christ met with among the Pharisees.

(1) They wickedly ridiculed him, v. 14. The Pharisees, who were covetous, heard all these things, and could not contradict him, but they derided him. Let us consider this as their sin, and the fruit of their covetousness, which was their reigning sin. Many that make a great profession of religion and abound in the exercise of devotion, are yet ruined by the love of the world. These covetous Pharisees could not bear to have that touched, which was their Delilah, their darling lust; for this they derided him, they snuffled up their noses at him, or blew their noses on him. It is an expression of the utmost scorn and disdain imaginable. They laughed at him for going so contrary to the opinion and way of the world. It is common for those to make a jest of the word of God who are resolved that they will not be ruled by it. Our Lord Jesus endured not only the contradiction of sinners, but their contempt. He that spoke as never man spoke was bantered and ridiculed, that his faithful ministers, whose preaching is unjustly derided, may not be disheartened at it. It is no disgrace to a man to be laughed at, but to deserve to be laughed at.

(2) He justly reproved them for deceiving themselves with the shows and colours of piety, v. 15. Here is,

[1] Their specious outside. First, They justified themselves before men; they denied whatever ill was laid to their charge. They claimed to be looked upon as men of singular sanctity and devotion: "You are they that make it your business to court the opinion of men, and will justify yourselves before the world; you are notorious for this." Secondly, They were highly esteemed among men. Men did not only acquit them, but applauded them, not only as good men, but as the best of men.

[2] Their odious inside, which was under the eye of God: "He knows your heart, and it is in his sight an abomination." It is folly to justify ourselves before men, and to think this enough to bear us out, that men know no ill of us; for God, who knows our hearts, knows that ill of us which no one else can know. This ought to check our value for ourselves, that God knows our hearts, for we have reason to abase and distrust ourselves. It is folly to judge of persons and things by the opinion of men concerning them, and to go down with the stream of vulgar estimate; for that which is highly esteemed among men is perhaps an abomination in the sight of God, who sees things as they are. There are those whom men despise and condemn who yet are accepted and approved of God, 2 Cor. x. 18.

(3) He turned from them to the publicans and sinners, as more likely to be wrought upon by his gospel than those covetous conceited Pharisees (v. 16): "The law and the prophets were indeed until John; but since John Baptist appeared the kingdom of God is preached. Every man presses into the gospel kingdom, Gentiles as well as Jews. It is not as the Jewish economy was, when salvation was of the Jews; but it is made a particular personal concern, and therefore every man that is convinced he has a soul to save, thrusts to get in, lest he should come short." Some give this sense of it; they derided Christ for speaking in contempt of riches, for, thought they, were there not many promises of riches and other temporal good things in the law and the prophets? "It is true," said Christ, "so it was, but now that the kingdom of God is begun to be preached, blessed are the poor, and the mourners, and the persecuted. Now that the gospel is preached the eyes of the people are opened, they press with a holy violence into the kingdom of God." Those that would go to heaven must take pains, must strive against the stream, must press against the crowd that are going the contrary way.

(4) Yet still he protests against any design to in-

13. can serve—be entirely at the command of; and this is true even where the services are not opposed. hate . . . love—showing that the two here intended are in uncompromising hostility to each other: an awfully searching principle!

14-18. covetous . . . derided him—sneered at Him; their master-sin being too plainly struck at for them to relish. But it was easier to run down than to refute

15. justify yourselves—make a show of righteousness. highly esteemed among men—generally carried away by plausible appearances. (See I Sam. 16:7; and ch. 14:11.)

16. The law . . .—(See on Matt. 11:13). every man presseth . . .—Publicans and sinners, all indiscriminately, are eagerly pressing into it; and ye, interested adherents of the mere forms of an economy which is passing away, "discerning not the signs of this time," will allow the tide to go past you and be found a stranded monument of blindness and obstinacy.

ADAM CLARKE

13. No servant can serve two masters. The heart will be either wholly taken up with God or wholly engrossed with the world.

14. They derided him. Or rather, "They treated Him with the utmost contempt." So we may translate the original words, which literally signify, "They turned up their noses at Him."

15. Ye . . . justify yourselves. "You declare yourselves to be just."

16. The law and the prophets were until John. The law and the prophets continued to be the sole teachers till John came, who first began to proclaim the glad tidings of the kingdom of God. And now, he who wishes to be made a partaker of the blessings of that Kingdom must "rush speedily" into it, as there will be but a short time before an utter destruction shall fall upon this ungodly race. They who wish to be saved must imitate those who take a city by storm—rush into it, without delay, as the Romans are about to do into Jerusalem.

A. T. ROBERTSON:

14. "Who were lovers of money" (philarguroi huparchontes). Literally, being lovers of money. Philarguroi is an old word, but in the N.T. only here and 2 Tim. 3:2. It is from philos and arguros. "Heard" (ekouon). Imperfect active, were listening all the while Jesus was talking to the disciples (vv. 1-13). "And they scoffed at him" (kai exemukterizon). Imperfect active again of ekmukterizo. LXX where late writers use simple verb. In the N.T. only here and Luke 23:35. It means to turn out or up the nose at one, to sneer, to scoff. The Romans had a phrase, naso adunco suspendere, to hang on the hooked nose (the subject of ridicule). These money-loving Pharisees were quick to see that the words of Jesus about the wise use of money applied to them. They had stood without comment the three parables aimed directly at them (the lost sheep, the lost coin, the lost son). But now they do not remain quiet while they hear the fourth parable spoken to the disciples. No words were apparently spoken, but their eyes, noses, faces were eloquent with a fine disdain.
—Word Pictures in the New Testament

validate the law (v. 17): It is easier for heaven and earth to pass than for one tittle of the law to fail. The moral law is confirmed and ratified; the duties enjoined by it are duties still; the sins forbidden by it are sins still. The ceremonial law is perfected in the gospel, and its shades are filled up with the gospel colours; not one tittle of that fails, for it is found printed off in the gospel. There were some things which were connived at by the law, for the preventing of greater mischiefs, the permission of which the gospel has indeed taken away, but without any detriment or disparagement to the law, as in the case of divorce (v. 18), which we had before, Matt. v. 32; xix. 9. His gospel is intended to strike at the bitter root of men's corrupt appetites and passions, to kill them, and pluck them up; and therefore they must not be so far indulged as that permission did indulge them, for the more they are indulged the more impetuous and headstrong they grow.

Verses 19–31

As the parable of the prodigal son set before us the grace of the gospel, so this sets before us the wrath to come, and is designed for our awakening. The tendency of the gospel of Christ is both to reconcile us to poverty and affliction and to arm us against temptations to worldliness and sensuality. Now this parable goes very far in prosecuting those two great intentions. This parable is not like Christ's other parables, in which spiritual things are represented by similitudes borrowed from worldly things, as those of the sower and the seed. But here the spiritual things themselves are represented in a narrative or description of the different state of good and bad in this world and the other. It is matter of fact that is true every day, that poor godly people die away out of their miseries, and go to heavenly bliss and joy; and that rich epicures, who live in luxury, and are unmerciful to the poor, die, and go into a state of insupportable torment. Is this a parable? What similitude is there in this? Our Saviour came to bring us acquainted with another world, and here he does it. In this description (for so I shall choose to call it) we may observe,

I. The different condition of a wicked rich man, and a godly poor man, in this world. The Jews of old were ready to make prosperity one of the marks of a good man so that they could hardly have any favourable thoughts of a poor man. This mistake Christ, upon all occasions, set himself to correct, and here very fully, where we have,

1. A wicked man, and one that will be for ever miserable, in the height of prosperity (v. 19): There was a certain rich man. From the Latin we commonly call him Dives—a rich man; but he has no name given him, as the poor man has. Now we are told concerning this rich man,

(1) That he was clothed in purple and fine linen, and that was his adorning. He had fine linen for pleasure, and clean, no doubt, every day; night-linen, and day-linen. He had purple for state. He never appeared abroad but in great magnificence.

(2) He fared sumptuously every day. His table was furnished with all the varieties and dainties that nature and art could supply; his side-table richly adorned with plate; his servants, who waited at table, in rich liveries; and the guests at his table, no doubt, such as he thought graced it. Well, and what harm was there in all this? It is no sin to be rich, no sin to wear purple and fine linen, nor to keep a plentiful table, if a man's estate will afford it. Nor are we told that he got his estate by fraud, oppression, or extortion, no, nor that he was drunk, or made others drunk. [1] Christ would hereby show that a man may have a great deal of the wealth, and yet lie and perish for ever under God's wrath and curse. We cannot infer from men's living great either that God loves them in giving them so much, or that they love God for giving them so much. [2] That plenty and pleasure are very dangerous. This man might have been happy if he had not had great possessions and enjoyments. [3] That the indulgence of the body, and the ease and pleasure of that, are the ruin of many a soul. It is true, eating good meat and wearing good clothes are lawful; but they often become the food and fuel of pride and luxury, and so turn into sin to us. [4] That feasting ourselves and our friends, and, at the same time, forgetting the distresses of the poor and afflicted, are very provoking to God and damning to the soul.

2. Here is a godly man in the depth of adversity and distress (v. 20): There was a certain beggar, named Lazarus. This poor man was reduced to the last extremity, as miserable as you can suppose a man to be in this world.

17. it is easier . . .—(See on Matt. 5:17, 18).

18. putteth away his wife . . .—(See on Matt. 19:3-9). Far from intending to weaken the force of the law, in these allusions to a new economy, our Lord, in this unexpected way, sends home its high requirements with a pungency which the Pharisees would not fail to feel.

19. purple and fine linen . . .—(Cf. Esther 8:15; Rev. 18:12); wanting nothing which taste and appetite craved and money could procure.

ADAM CLARKE

18. Putteth away (or divorceth) his wife. See on Matt. v. 31-32; xix. 9-10; Mark x. 12, where the question concerning divorce is considered at large.

19. There was a certain rich man. This account of the rich man and Lazarus is either a parable or a real history. If it be a parable, it is what may be; if it be a history, it is that which has been. Either a man may live as is here described, and go to perdition when he dies; or some have lived in this way, and are now suffering the torments of an eternal fire. The account is equally instructive in whichsoever of these lights it is viewed. There was a certain rich man. Here is the first degree of his reprobation—he got all he could, and kept all to himself. He was clothed in purple and fine linen. Purple was a very precious and costly stuff; but our Lord does not say that in the use of it he exceeded the bounds of his income, nor of his rank in life. Yet our Lord lays this down as a second cause of his perdition. He fared sumptuously every day. Now let it be observed that the law of Moses, under which this man lived, forbade nothing on this point but excess in eating and drinking. Besides, this rich man is not accused of having eaten food which was prohibited by the law, or of having neglected the abstinences and fasts prescribed by it. It is true, he is said to have feasted sumptuously every day; but our Lord does not intimate that this was carried to excess, or that it ministered to debauch. What are his crimes? (1) He was rich. (2) He was finely clothed. And (3) he feasted well. No other evil is spoken of him. In comparison of thousands he was not only blameless, but he was a virtuous man.

20. There was a certain beggar named Lazarus. His name is mentioned because his character was good and his end glorious, and because it is the purpose of God that the righteous shall be had in everlasting remembrance. Lazarus,

A. B. SIMPSON:

This remarkable and most solemn picture carries us forward from the present to the eternal world and reveals the judgments and recompenses which await each individual at the close of the present life.

First, we have the picture of two lives in vivid contrast. The one is a man who has everything that this world can afford without God. He is not necessarily a wicked man in the common sense of that word; he is simply a worldly man without God. His portion is purely earthly; but it is complete as such a portion can be. He is rich and lives in luxury, and every indulgence. His taste and vanity are gratified by the most elegant and costly apparel. His sensual appetites are ministered to by every form of physical gratification. He dwells in a splendid mansion and no doubt is surrounded by a retinue of servants and a circle of admiring friends; and perhaps, has all that affection can add to the more refined enjoyments of life; but that is all.

The other is a man that has nothing that the world values. He is a poor, diseased beggar, without the means even of obtaining his necessary food, except through the charity of this very rich man; and without a friend to minister to his sufferings, except the dogs that licked his sores. It is the uttermost contrast of earthly conditions. But as the one compensation, he has God and the hope of heaven. This is not intended to glorify poverty, or to depreciate wealth; but simply to show how little the world is worth without God, and how much God is worth without the world.—Christ in the Bible

(1) His body was full of sores, like Job. To be sick and weak in body is a great affliction; but sores are more painful to the patient, and more loathsome to those about him.

(2) He was forced to beg his bread. He was so sore and lame that he could not go himself, but was carried by some compassionate hand or other, and laid at the rich man's gate. Those that are not able to help the poor with their purses should help them with their pains; those that cannot lend them a penny should lend them a hand. Lazarus, in his distress, had nothing of his own to subsist on.

[2] The usage he had from the dogs: The dogs came and licked his sores. The rich man kept a kennel of hounds, it may be, or other dogs, and these were fed to the full, when poor Lazarus could not get enough to keep him alive. Those will have a great deal to answer for hereafter that feed their dogs, but neglect the poor. Those offend God, nay, and they put a contempt upon human nature, that pamper their dogs and horses, and let the families of their poor neighbours starve. Now those dogs came and licked the sores of poor Lazarus, which may be taken, First, As an aggravation of his misery. His sores were bloody, which tempted the dogs to come and lick them. The dogs were like their master, and thought they fared sumptuously when they regaled themselves with human gore. Or, it may be taken, Secondly, as some relief to him in his misery; the master was hard-hearted towards him, but the dogs came and licked his sores, which mollified and eased them. The dogs were more kind to him that their master was.

II. The different condition of this godly poor man, and this wicked rich man, at and after death.

1. They both died (v. 22): The beggar died; the rich man also died. Death is the common lot of rich and poor, godly and ungodly; there they meet together. Saints die, that they may bring their sorrows to an end, and may enter upon their joys. Sinners die, that they may go to give up their account. It concerns both rich and poor to prepare for death, for it waits for them both.

2. The beggar died first. God often takes godly people out of the world, when he leaves the wicked to flourish still. Since he could find no other shelter or resting-place, he was hid in the grave.

3. The rich man died and was buried. Nothing is said of the interment of the poor man. They dug a hole anywhere, and tumbled his body in. But the rich man had a pompous funeral; probably he had a funeral oration in praise of him, and his generous way of living, and the good table he kept, which those would commend that had been feasted at it. How foreign is the ceremony of a funeral to the happiness of the man!

4. The beggar died and was carried by angels into Abraham's bosom. How much did the honour done to his soul, by this convoy of it to its rest, exceed the honour done to the rich man, by the carrying of his body with so much magnificence to its grave! (1) His soul existed in a state of separation from the body. It did not die, or fall asleep, with the body. (2) His soul removed to another world, it returned to

20, 21. laid—having to be carried and put down. full of sores—open, running, "not closed, nor bound up, nor mollified with ointment" (Isa. 1:6).

21. desiring to be fed with—but was not [GROTIUS, BENGEL, MEYER, TRENCH, etc.]. The words may mean indeed "was fain to feed on," or "gladly fed on," as in ch. 15:16 [ALFORD, WEBSTER and WILKINSON, etc.]. But the context rather favors the former.

licked . . .—a touching act of brute pity, in the absence of human relief. It is a case of heartless indifference, amidst luxuries of every kind, to one of God's poorest and most afflicted ones, presented daily before the eye.

22. died—His burial was too unimportant to mention; while "the rich man died and was buried"—his carcass carried in pomp to its earthly restingplace.

ADAM CLARKE

a contraction of the word Eliezar, which signifies the "help or assistance of God"—a name properly given to a man who was both poor and afflicted, and had no help but that which came from heaven.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

"And desiring to be fed with the crumbs that fell from the rich man's table." Don't put in there, "and no man gave unto him." That is from the parable of the prodigal son. I have heard those words positively added in that connection. He may have received the crumbs. We are not told he did not. We have simply a picture of abject poverty, of a pauper on life's highway, without question through certain social conditions, because the sequel proves that he was a godly man.

And Jesus added: "Yea, even the dogs came and licked his sores." There was more kindness in the dogs than in the heart of the man who lived in the house, in purple and fine-twined linen. Even if we suppose that Lazarus did gain the scraps from the rich man's table, the rich man would not know about it. There was no generosity in letting him have the crumbs. We do not prove our care for any poor, wretched beggar by the wayside when we give away the things we have already flung away, rummage sales notwithstanding!

That is our Lord's contrast. Now, the Pharisees would have spurned the beggar and glorified the success of the wealthy man.

But the story of the two men is not ended. Our Lord went on with it. Something happened.

"It came to pass, that the beggar died. And the rich man also died." They both died. The man with all his wealth could not bribe the grim rider upon the pale horse. He died. The beggar could not postpone the event. He died! They shared the common lot. They are both dead. That company of Pharisees, if there had been any sorrow, might have said of the beggar, "Poor wretch! what a blessing a man like that should have gone!" But of the other they would have said: "It is very sad this man has gone. We wonder what he was worth!" Indeed, they might have said: "What a successful man! Let us write his story for the encouragement of youth."

They both died! Is that all? No, said Jesus, that is not all. Death comes to all, but it does not end all. It does not end all for the rich man. It does not end all for the beggar. It does not end all for any man.

—The Gospel According to Luke

The rich man also died, and was buried. There is no mention of this latter circumstance in the case of Lazarus. He was buried, no doubt—necessity required this; but he had the burial of a pauper, while the pomp and pride of the other followed him to the tomb.

MATTHEW HENRY

God who gave it, to its native country. The spirit of a man goes upward. (3) Angels took care of it; it was carried by angels. They are ministering spirits to the heirs of salvation, not only while they live, but when they die. The soul of man, if not chained to this earth and clogged by it as unsanctified souls are, has in itself an elastic virtue, by which it springs upward as soon as it gets clear of the body; but Christ will not trust those that are his to that, and therefore will send special messengers to fetch them to himself. Saints shall be brought home, not only safely, but honourably. What were the bearers at the rich man's funeral, though, probably, those of the first rank, compared with Lazarus's bearers? (4) It was carried into Abraham's bosom. Abraham was the father of the faithful; and whither should the souls of the faithful be gathered but to him. He was carried to his bosom, that is, to feast with him. The saints in heaven sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob. Abraham was a great and rich man, yet in heaven he does not disdain to lay poor Lazarus in his bosom. Rich saints and poor meet in heaven. He is laid in the bosom of Abraham, whom the rich glutton scorned to set with the dogs of his flock.

5. The next news you hear of the rich man is that in hell he lifted up his eyes, being in torment, v. 23.

(1) His state is very miserable. He is in hell, in hades, in the state of separate souls, and there he is in the utmost misery and anguish possible. As the souls of the faithful, immediately after they are delivered from the burden of the flesh, are in joy and felicity, so wicked and unsanctified souls, immediately after they are fetched from the pleasures of the flesh by death, are in misery and torment endless, useless, and remediless. This rich man had entirely devoted himself to the pleasures of the world of sense, and therefore was wholly unfit for the pleasures of the world of spirits; to such a carnal mind as his they would indeed be no pleasure, and therefore he is of course excluded from them.

(2) The misery of his state is aggravated by his knowledge of the happiness of Lazarus: He lifts up his eyes, and sees Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom. He now began to consider what was become of Lazarus. He does not find him where he himself is, nay, he plainly sees him afar off in the bosom of Abraham. [1] He saw Abraham afar off. To see Abraham we should think a pleasing sight; but to see him afar off was a tormenting sight. [2] He saw Lazarus in his bosom. The sight of him brought to his mind his own cruel and barbarous conduct towards him; and the sight of him in that happiness made his own misery the more grievous.

III. An account of what passed between the rich man and Abraham in the separate state.

1. The request which the rich man made to Abraham for some mitigation of his present misery, v. 24. Seeing Abraham afar off, he cried to him. He that used to command aloud now begs aloud. The songs of his riot and revels are all turned into lamentations. Observe here,

(1) The title he gives to Abraham: Father Abraham. There are many in hell that can call Abraham father. Perhaps this rich man, in his carnal mirth, had ridiculed Abraham and the story of Abraham, as the scoffers of the latter days do; but now he gives him a title of respect, Father Abraham. The day is coming when wicked men will be glad to scrape acquaintance with the righteous, and to claim kindred to them, though now they slight them.

(2) The representation he makes to him of his present deplorable condition: I am tormented in this flame. It is the torment of his soul that he complains of, and therefore it is such a fire as will operate upon souls; and such a fire the wrath of God is, fastening upon a guilty conscience; such a fire horror of mind is, and the reproaches of a self-accusing self-condemning heart.

(3) His request to Abraham, in consideration of this misery: Have mercy on me. The day is coming when those that make light of divine mercy will beg hard for it. He that had no mercy on Lazarus, yet expects Lazarus should have mercy on him; "for," thinks he, "Lazarus is better natured than ever I was." The particular favour he begs is, Send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, and cool my tongue. [1] Here he complains of the torment of his tongue particularly. The tongue is one of the organs of speech, and by the torment of that he is put in mind of all the wicked words that he had spoken against God and man, all his hard speeches, and filthy speeches; by his words he is condemned, and therefore in his tongue he is tormented. The tongue is also one of the organs of tasting, and therefore the torments of that will remind him of his inordinate relish of the delights of sense. [2] He desires a drop of water to cool his tongue. He asks in to Abraham's bosom—as if seen reclining next to Him at the heavenly feast (Matt. 8:11).

23. in hell—not the final place of the lost (for which another word is used), but as we say "the unseen world." But as the object here is certainly to depict the whole torment of the one and the perfect bliss of the other, it comes in this case to much the same.

seeth Abraham—not God, to whom therefore he cannot cry [BENGEL].

24. Father Abraham—a well-founded, but unavailing, claim of natural descent (ch. 3:8; John 8:37).

mercy on me—who never showed any (Jas. 2:3). send Lazarus—the pining victim of his merciless neglect. that he may—take me hence? No; that he dares not to ask. dip . . . tongue—i.e., the least conceivable and the most momentary abatement of his torment; that is all. But even this he is told is (1) unreasonable.

ADAM CLARKE

22. Abraham's bosom, an allusion to the custom at Jewish feasts, when three persons reclining on their left elbows on a couch, the person whose head came near the breast of the other was said to lie in his bosom. So it is said of the beloved disciple, John xiii. 25. Abraham's bosom was a phrase used among the Jews to signify the paradise of God.

23. And seeth Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom. He sees Lazarus clothed with glory and immortality—this is the first circumstance in his punishment. What a contrast! What a desire does he feel to resemble him, and what rage and despair because he is not like him!

ALBERT BARNES:

24. "Father Abraham." The Jews considered it a signal honor that Abraham was their father—that is, that they were descendants from him. Though this man was now in misery, yet he seems not to have abandoned the idea of his relation to the father of the faithful. The Jews supposed that departed spirits might know and converse with each other. See Lightfoot on this place. Our Savior speaks in conformity with that prevailing opinion; and as it was not easy to convey ideas about the spiritual world without some such representation, he therefore speaks in the language which was usual in his time. We are not, however, to suppose that this was literally true, but only that it was designed to represent more clearly the sufferings of the rich man in hell.
—Popular Commentary

as small a thing as could be asked, a drop of water to cool his tongue for one moment. [3] He desires that Lazarus might bring it. He names him, because he knows him, and thinks Lazarus will not be unwilling to do him this good office for old acquaintance' sake. There is a day coming when those that now hate and despise the people of God would gladly receive kindness from them.

2. The reply which Abraham gave to this request. In general, he did not grant it. See how justly this rich man is paid in his own coin. He that denied a crumb is denied a drop. Now it is said to us, Ask, and it shall be given you; but, if we let slip this accepted time, we may ask, and it shall not be given us.

(1) He calls him son, a kind and civil title. He had been a son, but a rebellious one, and now an abandoned disinherited one.

(2) He puts him in mind of what had been both his own condition and the condition of Lazarus, in their life-time: Son, remember; this is a cutting word. Now sinners are called upon to remember, but they do not, they will not. "Son, remember thy Creator, thy Redeemer, remember thy latter end"; but they can forget that for which they have their memories. "Son, remember the many warnings that were given thee, remember the fair offers made thee of eternal life and glory, which thou wouldest not accept!" But that which he is here put in mind of is, [1] That thou in thy life-time receivedst thy good things. He does not tell him that he had abused them, but that he had received them: "Remember what a bountiful benefactor God has been to thee; thou canst not therefore say he owes thee anything, no, not a drop of water. What he gave thee thou receivedst, and that was all. Thou hast been the grave of God's blessings, in which they were buried, not the field of them, in which they were sown. Thou receivedst thy good things. They were the things which thou didst choose for thy good things, which were in thine eye the best things. Thou wast for the good things of thy life-time, and hadst no thought of better things in another life. The day of thy good things is past and gone." [2] "What evil things Lazarus received. Think what a large share of miseries he had in his life-time. Thou hadst as much good as could be thought to fall to the lot of so bad a man, and he as much evil as could be thought to fall to the lot of so good a man. He received his evil things; he received them as physic appointed for the cure of his spiritual distempers, and the cure was effected." As wicked people have good things in this life only, godly people have evil things only in this life. Now Abraham awakens his conscience to remind him how he had behaved towards Lazarus; he cannot forget that then he would not help Lazarus, and how then could he expect that Lazarus should now help him?

(3) He puts him in mind of Lazarus's present bliss, and his own misery: Now he is comforted, and thou art tormented. Heaven is comfort, and hell is torment: heaven is joy, hell is weeping, and wailing. Heaven will be heaven indeed to those that go thither through many and great calamities in this world. When they are fallen asleep in Christ, you may truly say, "Now they are comforted; now all their tears are wiped away." In heaven there is everlasting consolation. And, on the other hand, hell will be hell indeed to those that go thither from the midst of the enjoyment of all the delights and pleasures of sense.

(4) He assures him that it was to no purpose to think of having any relief by the ministry of Lazarus; for (v. 26), Besides all this, between us and you there is a great gulf fixed, a great chasm. The kindest saint in heaven cannot make a visit to the congregation of the dead and damned, to comfort or relieve any there who once were their friends. "They that would pass hence to you cannot." The most daring sinner in hell cannot force his way out of that prison. They cannot pass to us that would come thence. In this world, blessed be God, there is no gulf fixed between a state of nature and grace, but we may pass from the one to the other, from sin to God. It might have been prevented in time, but it cannot now be remedied to eternity. A stone is rolled to the door of the pit which cannot be rolled back.

3. The further request he had to make to his father Abraham. having an opportunity of speaking to Abraham, he will improve it for his relations whom he has left behind.

(1) He begs that Lazarus might be sent to his father's house. I pray thee therefore, father, v. 27. Again he calls upon Abraham. Surely thou wilt be so compassionate as not to deny this. Send him back to my father's house; he knows well enough where it is, has been there many a time. He knows I have five brethren there; they will know him, and will regard what he saith. Let him testify to them; let him tell

25, 26. Son—stinging acknowledgment of the claimed relationship. thou . . . Lazarus . . .—As it is a great law of God's kingdom, that the nature of our present desires shall rule that of our future bliss, so by that law, he whose "good things," craved and enjoyed, were all bounded by time, could look for none after his connection with time had come to an end (ch. 6:24). But by this law, he whose "evil things," all crowded into the present life, drove him to seek, and find, consolation in a life beyond the grave, is by death released from all evil and ushered into unmixed and uninterrupted good (ch. 6:21). (2) It is impossible.

26. besides all this—independently of this consideration. a great gulf fixed—By an irrevocable decree there has been placed a vast impassable abyss between the two states, and the occupants of each.

27-31. Then he said—now abandoning all hope for himself—send him to my father's house . . .—no waking up of good in the heart of the lost, but bitter reproach against God and the old economy, as not warning him sufficiently [TRENCH]. The answer of Abraham is, They are sufficiently warned.

ADAM CLARKE

25. Son, remember that thou in thy lifetime receivedst thy good things. The remembrance of the good things possessed in life, and now to be enjoyed no more forever, together with the remembrance of grace offered or abused, will form a circumstance in the perdition of the ungodly.

26. Beside all this, between us and you there is a great gulf. The eternal purpose of God, formed on the principles of eternal reason, separates the persons and the places of abode of the righteous and the wicked, so that there can be no intercourse: They which would pass from hence to you cannot; neither can they pass to us, that would come from thence. The iniquitous conduct of relatives and friends, who have been perverted by the bad example of those who are lost, is a source of present punishment to them; and if they come also to the same place of torment, must be, to those who were the instruments of bringing them thither, an eternal source of anguish. "Send Lazarus to my father's family, for I have five brothers, that he may earnestly testify to them, that they come not to this place of torment." These brothers had probably been influenced by his example to content themselves with an earthly portion, and to neglect their immortal souls. Those who have been instruments of bringing others into hell shall suffer the deeper perdition on that account.

"Son, remember!" It is the voice, the first voice, the perpetual voice, which meets every man when he steps across the threshold of earth into the presence chamber of eternity. All the future is so built upon and interwoven with the past that for the saved and for the lost alike this word might almost be taken as the motto of their whole situation, as the explanation of their whole condition. Memory in another world is indispensable to the gladness of the glad, and strikes the deepest note in the sadness of the lost. There can be no need to dwell at any length on the simple introductory thought, that there must be memory in a future state. Unless there were remembrance, there could be no sense of individuality. A man cannot have any conviction that he is himself, but by constant, though often unconscious, operation of this subtle act of remembrance. There can be no sense of personal identity except in proportion as there is clearness of recollection. Then again, if that future state be a state of retribution, there must be memory. Otherwise, there might be joy, and there might be sorrow; but the why and the wherefore of either would be entirely struck out of a man's consciousness, and the one could not be felt as reward nor the other as punishment. If, then, we are to rise from the grave the same men that we are laid in it, and if the future life has this for its characteristic, that it is a state either of recompense and reward or of retribution and suffering, then, for both, the clearness and constant action of memory are certainly needed. But it is not to the simple fact of its existence that I desire to direct your attention now. I wish, rather, to suggest to you one or two modifications under which it must apparently work in another world. When men remember there, they will remember very differently from the way in which they remember here. These changes constitute, on the one hand, an instrument of torture; and, on the other, a foundation of all our gladness.
—Expositions of Holy Scripture

them what condition I am in. Let him warn them not to tread in my steps lest they also come into this place of torment, v. 28. He does not say, "Give me leave to go to them, that I may testify to them"; his going would frighten them out of their wits; but, "Send Lazarus, whose address will be less terrible, and yet his testimony sufficient to frighten them out of their sins." Now he desired the preventing of their ruin, in tenderness to them, for whom he could not but retain a natural affection.

(2) Abraham denies him this favour too. There is no request granted in hell. Abraham leaves them to the testimony of Moses and the prophets. Here is their privilege: They have Moses and the prophets; and their duty: "Let them hear them, and mix faith with them, and that will be sufficient to keep them from this place of torment."

(3) He urges his request yet further (v. 30): "Nay, father Abraham, they have Moses and the prophets, yet it may be hoped, if one went to them from the dead, they would repent, that would be a more sensible conviction to them. They are used to Moses and the prophets; but this would be a new thing, and more startling; surely this would bring them to repent." Foolish men are apt to think any method of conviction better than that which God has chosen and appointed.

(4) Abraham insists upon the denial of it (v. 31): "If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead." The same strength of corruption that breaks through the convictions of the written word would certainly triumph over those by a witness from the dead. The scripture is now the ordinary way of God's making known his mind to us, and it is sufficient.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

30. Nay—giving the lie to Abraham. if . . .—a principle of awful magnitude and importance. The greatest miracle will have no effect on those who are determined not to believe. A real Lazarus soon "rose from the dead," but the sight of him by crowds of people, inclined thereby to Christ, only crowned the unbelief and hastened the murderous plots of the Pharisees against the Lord of glory; nor has His own resurrection, far more overpowering, yet won over that "crooked and perverse nation."

ADAM CLARKE

29. They have Moses and the prophets. This plainly supposes they were all Jewish believers; they had these writings in their hands, but they did not permit them to influence their lives.

30. If one went to them from the dead. Many are desirous to see an inhabitant of the other world, and converse with him, in order to know what passes there. Make way! Here is a damned soul, which Jesus Christ has evoked from the hell of fire! Hear him! Hear him tell of his torments! Hear him utter his regrets!

31. If they hear not Moses. This answer of Abraham contains two remarkable propositions: (1) That the Sacred Writings contain such proofs of a divine origin that, though all the dead were to arise to convince an unbeliever of the truths therein declared, the conviction could not be greater nor the proof more evident of the divinity and truth of these sacred records than that which themselves afford; (2) That to escape eternal perdition and get at last into eternal glory, a man is to receive the testimonies of God and to walk according to their dictates.

Note, I. That the giving of offences is a great sin, v. 1, 2. We can expect no other than that offences will come. It is almost impossible but that offences will come, and therefore we are concerned to provide accordingly; but woe to him through whom they come, his doom will be heavy (v. 2). They perish under a load of guilt more ponderous than that of millstones. This includes a woe, 1. To persecutors who offer any injury to the least of Christ's little ones. 2. To seducers, who corrupt the truths of Christ, and so trouble the minds of the disciples. 3. To those who live scandalously, and thereby weaken the hands and sadden the hearts of God's people.

II. That the forgiving of offences is a great duty (v. 3): Take heed to yourselves. This may refer either to what goes before, or to what follows: Take heed that you offend not one of these little ones. Or, "When your brother trespasses against you, take heed to yourselves at such a time, lest you be put into a passion."

1. If you are permitted to rebuke him, you are advised to do so. Smother not the resentment, but give it vent. Tell him his faults; and, it may be, you will perceive that you mistook him, that it was not a trespass against you, but an oversight, and then you will beg his pardon for misunderstanding him.

2. You are commanded, upon his repentance, to forgive him: If he repent, forgive him; forget the injury, never think of it again. Though he do not repent, you must not therefore bear malice to him, nor meditate revenge.

3. You are to repeat this every time he repeats his trespass, v. 4. If he could be supposed to be either so negligent as to trespass against thee seven times in a day, and as often profess himself sorry for his fault, continue to forgive him. Christians should be of a forgiving spirit, willing to make the best of everybody, and they should contrive as much to show that they have forgiven an injury as others to show that they resent it.

III. That we have all need to get our faith strengthened, because, as that grace grows, all other graces grow. 1. The address which the disciples made to Christ, for the strengthening of their faith, v. 5. The apostles themselves yet acknowledged the weakness and deficiency of their faith, and saw their need of Christ's grace for the improvement of it; they said unto the Lord, "Increase our faith." The increase of our faith is what we should earnestly desire. They put up this prayer to Christ upon occasion of his pressing upon them the duty of forgiving injuries: "Lord, increase our faith, or we shall never be able to practise such a difficult duty as this." Faith in God's pardoning mercy will enable us to get over the greatest difficulties that lie in the way of our forgiving our brother. 2. The assurance Christ gave them of the wonderful efficacy of true faith (v. 6): "If ye have faith

Vss. 1-10. OFFENSES—FAITH—HUMILITY. 1, 2. (See on Matt. 18:6, 7.)

For whosoever shall offend one of these little ones that believe in me—or, shall cause them to stumble; referring probably to the effect which such unsavory disputes as they had held would have upon the inquiring and hopeful who came in contact with them, leading to the belief that after all they were no better than others. it is better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck—The word here is simply "millstone," without expressing of which kind. But in Matthew 18:6 it is the "ass-turned" kind, far heavier than the small hand-mill turned by female slaves, as in Luke 17:35. It is of course the same which is meant here. and he were cast into the sea—meaning, that if by such a death that stumbling were prevented, and so its eternal consequences averted, it would be a happy thing for them. Here follows a striking verse in Matthew 18:7, "Woe unto the world because of offences!" (There will be stumblings and falls and loss of souls enough from the world's treatment of disciples, without any addition from you: dreadful will be its doom in consequence; see that ye share not in it.) "For it must needs be that offences come; but woe to that man by whom the offence cometh!" (The struggle between light and darkness will inevitably cause stumblings, but not less guilty is he who wilfully makes any to stumble.)

3, 4. (See on Matt. 18:15-17, 21, 22.) seven times—not a lower measure of the forgiving spirit than the "seventy times seven" enjoined on Peter, which was occasioned by his asking if he was to stop at seven times. "No," is the virtual answer, "though it come to seventy times that number, if only he ask forgiveness in sincerity."

5. Lord—(See on ch. 10:1). increase our faith—moved by the difficulty of avoiding and forgiving "offenses." This is the only instance in which a spiritual operation upon their souls was solicited of Christ by the Twelve; but a kindred and higher prayer had been offered before, by one with far fewer opportunities. (See on Mark 9:24.)

1. It is impossible but that offences will come. Such is the corrupt state of the human heart that, notwithstanding all the influences of grace and the promises of glory, men will continue to sin against God; and His justice must continue to punish.

2. A millstone. To have a millstone hanged about the neck was a common proverb.

3-4. If thy brother trespass. See the notes on Matt. xviii. 21-22.

5. Increase our faith. This work of pardoning every offense of every man, and that continually, seemed so difficult, even to the disciples themselves, that they saw, without an extraordinary degree of faith, they should never be able to keep this command.

as a grain of mustard-seed, so small as mustard-seed, or so sharp as mustard-seed, so pungent, so exciting to all other graces, nothing would be too hard for you, that was fit to be done for the glory of God, yea, though it were the transplanting of a tree from the earth to the sea." As with God nothing is impossible, so are all things possible to him that can believe.

IV. That, whatever we do in the service of Christ, we must be very humble. Even the apostles themselves, who did so much more for Christ than others, must not think that they had thereby made him their debtor. 1. We are all God's servants. Our whole strength and our whole time are to be employed for him. 2. As God's servants, it becomes us to fill up our time with duty, we ought to make the end of one service the beginning of another. The servant that has been ploughing, or feeding cattle, in the field, when he comes home at night has work to do still; he must wait at table, v. 7, 8. When we have been working for God, still we must be waiting on God. 3. Our principal care here must be to do the duty of our relation, and leave it to our Master to give us the comfort of it. No servant expects that his master should say to him, Go and sit down to meat; it is time enough to do that when we have done our day's work. Let us be in care to finish our work, and then the reward will come in due time. 4. It is fit that Christ should be served before us: Make ready wherewith I may sup, and afterwards thou shalt eat and drink. 5. Christ's servants, when they are to wait upon him, must gird themselves, must free themselves from everything that is entangling and encumbering. We must then gird ourselves, to attend him. This is expected from servants, and Christ might require it from us, but he does not insist upon it. He was among his disciples as one that served, and came not to be ministered unto, but to minister; witness his washing his disciples' feet. 6. Christ's servants do not so much as merit his thanks for any service they do him: "Does he thank that servant?" No good works of ours can merit anything at the hand of God. 7. Whatever we do for Christ, it is no more than is our duty to do. Though we should do all things that are commanded us, and, alas! in many things we come short of this, it is but what we are bound to by that first and great commandment of loving God with all our heart and soul. 8. The best servants of Christ must humbly acknowledge that they are unprofitable servants. God cannot be a gainer by our services, and therefore cannot be made a debtor by them. It becomes us therefore to call ourselves unprofitable servants, but to call his service a profitable service.

We have here an account of the cure of ten lepers, which we had not in any other of the evangelists. The leprosy was a disease which the Jews supposed to be, more than other diseases, a mark of God's displeasure; and therefore Christ, who came to take away sin, took particular care to cleanse the lepers that fell in his way. Christ was now in his way to Jerusalem, about the mid-way. He was now in the frontier-country, the marches that lay between Samaria and Galilee.

I. The address of these lepers to Christ. They were ten in a company; for, though they were shut out from society with others, yet those that were infected were at liberty to converse with one another. 1. They met Christ as he entered into a certain village. They did not stay till he had refreshed himself, but met him as he entered the town, weary as he was; and yet he did not put them off. 2. They stood afar off. A sense of our spiritual leprosy should make us very humble in all our approaches to Christ. Who are we, that we should draw near to him that is infinitely pure? 3. Their request was unanimous, and very importunate (v. 13): They lifted up their voices and cried, Jesus, Master, have mercy on us. Those that expect help from Christ must take him for their Master. If he be Master, he will be Jesus, a Saviour. They ask not in particular to be cured of their leprosy, but, Have mercy on us; and it is enough to refer ourselves to the compassions of Christ, for they fail not.

II. Christ sent them to the priest, to be inspected by him. He did not tell them positively that they should be cured, but bade them go show themselves to the priests, v. 14. This was a trial of their obedience. Those that expect Christ's favours must take them in his way and method. They all went to the priest. As the ceremonial law was yet in force, Christ took care that it should be observed.

III. As they went, they were cleansed. Then, we may expect God to meet us with mercy when we are found in the way of duty. If we do what we can, God will not be wanting to do that for us which we cannot. Though the means will not heal thee of sycamine—mulberry. (See on Mark 11:22-24.)

7-10. say unto him by and by—The "by and by" (or rather "directly") should be joined not to the saying but the going: "Go directly." The connection here is: "But when your faith has been so increased as both to avoid and forgive offenses, and do things impossible to all but faith, be not puffed up as though you had laid the Lord under any obligations to you."

9. I trow not—or, as we say, when much more is meant, "I should think not."

10. unprofitable—a word which, though usually denoting the opposite of profit, is here used simply in its negative sense. "We have not, as his servants, profited or benefited God at all." (Cf. Job 22:2, 3; Rom. 11:35.)

11-19. TEN LEPERS CLEANSED. 11-13. through the midst of Samaria and Galilee—probably on the confines of both.

12. stood afar off—(Cf. Lev. 13: 45, 46). 13. they lifted up—their common misery drawing these poor outcasts together (II Kings 7:3), nay, making them forget the fierce national antipathy of Jew and Samaritan [TRENCH] Jesus . . .—(Cf. Matt. 20:30-33). How quick a teacher is felt misery, even though as here the teaching may be soon forgotten!

14. show yourselves—as cleansed persons. (See on Matt. 8:4.) Thus too would the Samaritan be taught that "salvation is of the Jews" (John 4:22). as they went, were cleansed—In how many different ways were our Lord's cures wrought, and this different from all the rest.

ADAM CLARKE

6. As a grain of mustard seed. A faith that increases and thrives as that is described to do. This sycamine. The words seem to intimate that they were standing by such a tree. The sycamine is probably the same as the "sycomore." Jerome, who was well-acquainted with these countries, translates the word "mulberry tree." Be thou plucked up by the root. See the note on Matt. xxi. 21, where it is shown that this mode of speech refers to the accomplishment of things very difficult, but not impossible.

7-9. Which of you, having a servant? It is never supposed that the master waits on the servant—the servant is bound to wait on his master, and to do everything for him to the uttermost of his power. Nor does the former expect thanks for it, for he is bound by his agreement to act thus because of the stipulated reward, which is considered as being equal in value to all the service that he can perform.

10. We are unprofitable servants. This text has often been produced to prove that no man can live without committing sin against God. But let it be observed the text says unprofitable servants, not sinful servants.

12. Which stood afar off. They kept at a distance, because forbidden by law and custom to come near to those who were sound, for fear of infecting them. See Lev. xiii. 46; Num. v. 2; 2 Kings xv. 5.

13. They lifted up their voices. They cried with one accord—they were all equally necessitous, and there was but one voice among them all, though ten were engaged in crying at the same time. As they were companions in suffering, they were also companions in prayer.

14. Shew yourselves unto the priests. According to the direction, Lev. xiii. 2, etc.; xiv. 2, etc. Our Lord intended that their cure should be received by faith. They depended on His goodness and power; and though they had no promise, yet they went at His command to do that which those only were required by the law to do who were already healed. And . . . as they went, in this spirit of implicit faith, they were cleansed. God highly honors this kind of faith, themselves, God will heal thee in the diligent use of those means.

IV. One of them, and but one, returned, to give thanks, v. 15. When he saw that he was healed he turned back towards him who was the Author of his cure, whom he wished to have the glory of it. He appears to have been very hearty and affectionate in his thanksgivings: With a loud voice he glorified God, v. 13. Those that have received mercy from God should publish it to others. But he also made a particular address of thanks to Christ (v. 16): He fell down at his feet, and gave him thanks. We ought to give thanks for the favours Christ bestows upon us, and particularly for recoveries from sickness. It becomes us also to be very humble in our thanksgivings, as well as in our prayers.

V. Christ took notice of this one that had thus distinguished himself; for, it seems, he was a Samaritan whereas the rest were Jews, v. 16. The Samaritans had not the pure knowledge and worship of God among them that the Jews had, and yet it was one of them that glorified God, when the Jews forgot.

1. The particular notice Christ took of him, and the ingratitude of those that were sharers with him in the mercy—that he who was a stranger was the only one that returned to give glory to God, v. 17, 18. (1) How rich Christ is in doing good: Were there not ten cleansed? Here was a cure by wholesale, a whole hospital healed with one word's speaking. We shall have never the less grace for others sharing it. (2) How poor we are in our returns: "Where are the nine?" Ingratitude is a very common sin. Of the many that receive mercy from God, there are but few, very few, that return to give thanks. (3) How those often prove most grateful from whom it was least expected. A Samaritan gives thanks, and a Jew does not. This serves here to aggravate the ingratitude of those Jews of whom Christ speaks.

2. The great encouragement Christ gave him, v. 19. The rest had their cure, and had it not revoked, but he had his cure confirmed particularly; Thy faith hath made thee whole. The rest were made whole by the power of Christ, in compassion to their distress; but he was made whole by his faith, by which Christ saw him distinguished from the rest.

I. Here is the demand of the Pharisees concerning it, which occasioned this discourse. They asked when the kingdom of God should come. They understood, perhaps, that Christ had taught his disciples to pray for the coming of it, and they had long preached that it was at hand. "Now," say the Pharisees, "when will that glorious view open?"

II. Christ's reply to this demand, directed to the Pharisees first, and afterwards to his own disciples (v. 22); what he said to both, he saith to us.

1. That the kingdom of the Messiah was to be a spiritual kingdom. They asked when it would come. "You know not what you ask," saith Christ; "it may come, and you not be aware of it." For it has not an external show, as other kingdoms have, the advancements and revolutions of which fill the newspapers. "No," saith Christ, "it will have a silent entrance; it cometh not with observation." They desired to have their curiosity satisfied concerning the time of it. Christ will have their mistakes rectified concerning the nature of it. When Messiah the Prince comes to set up his kingdom, they shall not say, Lo here, or Lo there, as when a prince goes in progress to visit his territories. Christ will not come with all this talk; it will not be set up in this or that particular place. Those who confine Christianity and the church to this place or that party, cry, Lo here, or Lo there; so do they who make prosperity and external pomp a mark of the true church. "It has a spiritual influence: The kingdom of God is within you." It is not of this world. Its glory does not strike men's fancies, but affects their spirits, and its power is over their souls and consciences. The kingdom of God will not change men's outward condition, but their hearts and lives. Then it comes when it makes those humble, and serious, and heavenly, that were proud, and vain; and therefore look for the kingdom of God in the revolutions of the heart. The kingdom of God is among you; so some read it. "You enquire when it will come, and are not aware that it is already begun to be set up in the midst of you. It is in your nation, though not in your hearts." It is the folly of many curious enquirers concerning the times to come that they look for that before them which is already among them.

2. That the setting up of this kingdom was a work that would meet with a great deal of opposition and interruption, v. 22. The disciples thought they should carry all before them, but Christ tells them it would be otherwise: "The days will come when you shall desire to see one of the days of the Son of man, and shall not see it. At first, indeed, you will have won-

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

"Were not the ten cleansed? but where are the nine?" What a revelation of the fact that Christ values gratitude and misses it when it is not expressed. We had another illustration of it in chapter seven. When He went to the house of Simon, He missed the common courtesy of the Eastern home. "You gave me no water for my feet, you gave me no kiss, my head with oil you did not anoint"; you neglected the common courtesies. Are we not all in danger of being among the nine, rather than being represented by the one, forgetting and failing in our praising? We have almost lost the art of pure praise.—The Gospel According to Luke

17, 18. Were there not ten cleansed—rather, were not the ten cleansed? i.e., the whole of them—an example (by the way) of Christ's omniscience [BENGEL]. 18. this stranger—"this alien" (literally, "of another race"). The language is that of wonder and admiration, as is expressly said of another exhibition of Gentile faith (Matt. 8:10).

19. Arise—for he had "fallen down on his face at His feet" (vs. 16) and there lain prostrate. faith made thee whole—not as the others, merely in body, but in that higher spiritual sense with which His constant language has so familiarized us.

20-37. COMING OF THE KINGDOM OF GOD AND OF THE SON OF MAN. 20-25. when . . .—To meet the erroneous views not only of the Pharisees, but of the disciples themselves, our Lord addresses both, announcing the coming of the kingdom under different aspects. "It cometh not with observation"—with watching or lying in wait, as for something outwardly imposing and at once revealing itself.

21. Lo here! . . . lo there!—shut up within this or that sharply defined and visible geographical or ecclesiastical limit. within you—is of an internal and spiritual character (as contrasted with their outside views of it). But it has its external side too.

22. The days—rather "Days." will come—as in ch. 19: 43, when, amidst calamities, etc., you will anxiously look for a deliverer, and deceivers will put themselves forward in this character. one of the days of the Son of man—Himself again among them but for one day; as we say when all seems to be and makes it the instrument in His hand of working many miracles. He who will not believe till he receives what he calls a reason for it is never likely to get his soul saved. The highest, the most sovereign reason that can be given for believing is that God has commanded it.

15. One of them, when he saw that he was healed. It seems that he did not wait to go first to the priest, but turned immediately back, and gave public praise to the kind hand from which he had received his cure.

16. He was a Samaritan. One who professed a very corrupt religion, and from whom much less was to be expected than from the other nine, who probably were Jews.

18. This stranger. Often God receives more praise and affectionate obedience from those who had long lived without His knowledge and fear than from those who were bred up among His people and who profess to be called by His name. The simple reason is, Those who have much forgiven will love much, chap. vii. 47.

19. Thy faith hath made thee whole. Your faith has been the means of receiving that influence by which you have been cleansed.

20. Cometh not with observation. "With scrupulous observation."

21. Lo here! or, lo there! Perhaps those Pharisees thought that the Messiah was kept secret, in some private place, known only to some of their rulers; and that by and by He should be proclaimed in a similar way to that in which Joash was by Jehoiada the priest. See the account, 2 Chron. xxiii. 1-11.

22. When ye shall desire to see one of the days. As it was our Lord's constant custom to support and comfort the minds of His disciples, we cannot suppose that He intimates here that they shall be left destitute of those blessings necessary for their support in a day of trial.

derful success" (so they had, when thousands were added to the church in a day); "but do not think it will be always so; people will grow cool to it." This looks forward to his disciples in after-ages; they must expect much disappointment. Ministers and churches will sometimes be under outward restraints. Then they will wish to see such days of opportunity as they have formerly enjoyed. God teaches us to know the worth of such mercies by the want of them. Sometimes they will be under inward restraints. Then they shall wish to see such victorious triumphant days as they have sometimes seen. We must not think that Christ's church and cause are lost because not always alike visible and prevailing.

3. That Christ and his kingdom are not to be looked for in this or that particular place, but his appearance will be general in all places at once (v. 23, 24): "They will say to you, See here, or, See there. Go not after them, nor follow them. The kingdom of God was not designed to be the glory of one people only, but to give light to the Gentiles; for as the lightning that lightens out of one part under heaven, and shines all on a sudden irresistibly to the other part under heaven, so shall also the Son of man be in his day. The gospel that is to set up Christ's kingdom in the world shall fly like lightning through the nations. The kingdom of the Messiah is not to be a local thing, but is to be dispersed far and wide over the face of the whole earth." The design of the setting up of Christ's kingdom was not to make one nation great, but to make all nations good—some, at least, of all nations.

4. That the Messiah must suffer before he must reign (v. 25): "First must he suffer many things and be rejected of this generation; and, if he be thus treated, his disciples must expect no other than to suffer and be rejected too for his sake. We must go by the cross to the crown. The Son of man must suffer many things. Pain, and shame, and death, are those many things. He must be rejected by this generation of unbelieving Jews, before he be embraced by another generation of believing Gentiles."

5. That the setting up of the kingdom of the Messiah would introduce the destruction of the Jewish nation. Observe,

(1) How it had been with sinners formerly. Think how it was with the men of Sodom, who were wicked, and sinners before the Lord exceedingly. Now observe, [1] That they had fair warning given them. Noah was a preacher of righteousness to the old world; so was Lot to the Sodomites. [2] That they did not regard the warning given them. They were very secure. They were all very merry, and yet very busy too. When they should have been, as the men of Nineveh, fasting and praying, repenting and reforming, they were going on securely, eating flesh, and drinking wine. [3] That they continued in their security and sensuality, till the threatened judgment came. [4] That God took care for the preservation of those that were his. Noah entered into the ark, and there he was safe; Lot went out of Sodom, and so went out of harm's way. [5] That they were surprised with the ruin which they would not fear. The flood came, and destroyed all the sinners of the old world; fire and brimstone came, and destroyed all the sinners of Sodom. But that which is especially intended here is to show what a dreadful surprise destruction will be to those who are secure and sensual.

(2) How it will be with sinners still (v. 30): Thus shall it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed. They have warning given by Christ now, and will have it repeated to them by the apostles after him; but it will be all in vain. One would have thought that this discourse of our Saviour's, which was public, should have awakened them; but it did not.

6. That it ought to be the care of his disciples and followers to distinguish themselves from the unbelieving Jews in that day, and, leaving them, to flee at the signal given, according to the direction that should be given. This flight of theirs from Jerusalem must be expeditious, and must not be retarded by any concern about their worldly affairs (v. 31): "He that shall be on the house-top, let him not come down, to take his stuff away." It will be better to leave his stuff behind him than to stay to look after it, and perish with them that believe not. It will be their concern to do as Lot and his family were charged to do: Escape for thy life. Save yourselves from this untoward generation. When they have made their escape, they must not think of returning (v. 32): "Remember Lot's wife and do not look back, as she did; be not loth to leave a place marked for destruction." Let them not look back, lest they should be tempted to go back; nay, lest that be construed a going back in heart, or an evidence that the heart was left behind. There would be no other way of saving their lives going wrong and the one person who could keep them right is removed [NEANDER in STIER, etc.]. "This is said to guard against the mistake of supposing that His visible presence would accompany the manifestation and establishment of His kingdom" [WEBSTER and WILKINSON].

23. they shall say, See here ... go not ...—a warning to all so-called expositors of prophecy and their followers, who cry, Lo there and see here, every time that war breaks out or revolutions occur. 24. as lightning ... so ... the Son of man—i.e., it will be as manifest. The Lord speaks here of His coming and manifestation in a prophetically indefinite manner, and in these preparatory words blends into one the distinctive epochs [STIER]. When the whole polity of the Jews, civil and ecclesiastical alike, was broken up at once, and its continuance rendered impossible by the destruction of Jerusalem, it became as manifest to all as the lightning of heaven that the kingdom of God had ceased to exist in its old, and had entered on a new and perfectly different form. So it may be again, ere its final and greatest change at the personal coming of Christ, and of which the words in their highest sense are alone true. But first ... suffer ...—This shows that the more immediate reference of the previous verse is to an event soon to follow the death of Christ. It was designed to withdraw the attention of "His disciples" from the glare in which His foregoing words had invested the approaching establishment of His kingdom.

26-30. eat ... married ... planted ...—all the ordinary occupations and enjoyments of life. Though the antediluvian world and the cities of the plain were awfully wicked, it is not their wickedness, but their worldliness, their unbelief and indifference to the future, their unpreparedness, that is here held up as a warning. N.B.—These recorded events of Old Testament history—denied or explained away nowadays by not a few—are referred to here as facts.

31-33. to take it away ... Remember ...—a warning against that lingering reluctance to part with present treasures which induces some to remain in a burning house, in hopes of saving this and that precious article till consumed and buried in its ruins. The cases here supposed, though different, are similar. Lot's wife—her "look back," for that is all that is said of her, and her recorded doom. Her heart was in Sodom still, and the "look" just said, "And must I bid it adieu?" Whosoever ...—(See on ch. 9:23-27).

ADAM CLARKE

When He says, Ye shall desire to see one of the days of the Son of man, He either means, you of this nation, you Jews, and addresses His disciples as if they should bear witness to the truth of the declaration, intimating that heavy calamities were about to fall upon them, and that they should desire in vain to have those opportunities of returning to God which now they rejected; or He means that such should the distressed state of this people be that the disciples would through pity and tenderness desire the removal of those punishments from them which could not be removed because the cup of their iniquity was full. But the former is more likely to be the sense of the place.

24. As the lightning, that lighteneth. See this particularly explained, Matt. xxiv. 27-28.

25. But first must he suffer many things. As the cup of the iniquity of this people shall not be full till they have finally rejected and crucified the Lord of life and glory, so this desolation cannot take place till after My death.

26. As it was in the days of Noe. See on Matt. xxiv. 38.

27. They did eat, they drank. They spent their whole lives in reference to this world, and made no sort of provision for their immortal souls. So it was when the Romans came to destroy Judea; there was a universal carelessness, and no one seemed to regard the warnings given by the Son of God.

31. He which shall be upon the house top. See this explained on Matt. xxiv. 17.

32. Remember Lot's wife. Relinquish everything, rather than lose your souls. She "looked back," Gen. xix. 26; probably she turned back also to carry some of her goods away—for so much the preceding verse seems to intimate—and became a monument of the divine displeasure, and of her own folly and sin.

33. Whosoever shall seek to save his life. These or similar words were spoken on another occasion. See on Matt. x. 39; xvi. 25-26.

MATTHEW HENRY

(v. 33): "Whosoever shall seek to save his life, he shall lose it; but whosoever is willing to venture his life, he shall preserve his life, for he shall make sure of eternal life."

7. That all good Christians should certainly escape, but many of them very narrowly, v. 34–36. When God's judgments are laying all waste, he will take an effectual course to preserve those that are his: two in a bed, one taken and the other left. Sooner or later it shall be made to appear that the Lord knows them that are his and them that are not.

8. That this distinguishing, dividing, discriminating work shall be done in all places, as far as the kingdom of God shall extend, v. 37. Where, Lord? They had enquired concerning the time, and he would not gratify their curiosity, they therefore tried him with another question: "Where, Lord?" The answer is proverbial: Wheresoever the body is, thither will the eagles be gathered together. (1) Wherever the wicked are, they shall be found out by the judgments of God; as wherever a dead carcase is, the birds make a prey of it. The judgments of God shall fasten upon them, as the eagles do upon the prey. (2) Wherever the godly are, who are marked for preservation, they shall be found happy in the enjoyment of Christ. Wherever Christ is, believers will flock to him, and meet in him, as eagles about the prey, by the instinct of the new nature. Wherever the body is, wherever the gospel is preached, thither will pious souls resort, there they will find Christ. Wherever Christ records his name he will meet his people, and bless them.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

34. two in one bed—the prepared and unprepared mingled in closest intercourse together in the ordinary walks and fellowships of life, when the moment of severance arrives. Awful truth! realized before the destruction of Jerusalem, when the Christians found themselves forced by their Lord's directions (ch. 21:21) at once and for ever away from their old associates; but most of all when the second coming of Christ shall burst upon a heedless world. 37. Where—shall this occur? Wheresoever . . .—"As birds of prey scent out the carrion, so wherever is found a mass of incurable moral and spiritual corruption, there will be seen alighting the ministers of divine judgment," a proverbial saying terrifically verfied at the destruction of Jerusalem, and many times since, though its most tremendous illustration will be at the world's final day.

34 and 36. On the subject of these verses see Matt. xxiv. 40-41. The thirty-sixth verse is, without doubt, an interpolation. It was probably borrowed from Matt. xxiv. 40. The whole verse is wanting in most MSS. and versions and in many of the fathers.

37. Where, Lord? In what place shall all these dreadful evils fall? The answer our Lord gives in a figure, the application of which they are to make themselves. Where the "dead carcass" is, there will be the "birds of prey"—where the sin is, there will the punishment be. Thither will the eagles (or vultures) be gathered together.

This parable has its key hanging at the door. Christ spoke it to teach us that men ought always to pray and not to faint, v. 1. It supposes that all God's people are praying people; all God's children send to him statedly, and upon every emergency. It is our privilege and honour that we may pray. It is our duty; we ought to pray. It is to be our constant work; we ought always to pray. We must pray, and never grow weary of praying, till it comes to be swallowed up in everlasting praise. But that which seems particularly designed here is to teach us constancy and perseverance in our requests for some spiritual mercies that we are in pursuit of, relating either to ourselves or to the church of God. When we are praying for strength against our spiritual enemies, our lusts and corruptions, we must continue instant in prayer, must pray and not faint, for we shall not seek God's face in vain.

I. Christ shows, by a parable, the power of importunity among men. He gives you an instance of an honest cause that succeeded before an unjust judge, not by the equity or compassionableness of it, but purely by dint of importunity. 1. The bad character of the judge that was in a certain city. He neither feared God nor regarded man; he took no care to do his duty either to God or man; he was a perfect stranger both to godliness and honour. It is not strange if those that have cast off the fear of their Creator be altogether regardless of their fellow-creatures; where no fear of God is no good is to be expected. Such a prevalency of irreligion and inhumanity is bad in any, but very bad in a judge. Instead of doing good with his power he will be in danger of doing hurt. 2. The distressed case of a poor widow. She had manifestly right on her side; but, it should seem, she tied not herself to the formalities of the law, but made personal application to the judge from day to day, still crying, Avenge me of mine adversary, that is, Do me justice against mine adversary. Magistrates are particularly charged, not only not to do violence to the widow (Jer. xxii. 3), but to judge the fatherless, and plead for the widow (Isa. i. 17). 3. The difficulty and discouragement she met with in her cause: He would not for awhile. According to his usual practice, he took no notice of her cause; for she had no bribe to give him, so that he did not at all incline to redress her grievances. 4. The gaining of her point by continually dunning this unjust judge (v. 5): "Because this widow troubleth me I will hear her cause, and do her justice, lest by her clamour to me she weary me; for she is resolved that she will give me no rest till it is done, and therefore I will do it, to save myself further trouble; as good at first as at last." Thus she got justice done her by continual craving.

II. He applies this for the encouragement of God's praying people.

1. He assures them that God will at length be gracious to them (v. 6): Hear what the unjust judge saith, and shall not God avenge his own elect? Observe, (1) What it is that they desire and expect: that God widow—weak, desolate, defenseless (I Tim. 5:5, which is taken from this). 3. came—kept coming. See vs. 5, "her continual coming." Avenge me—i.e., rid me of the oppression of. 5. continual coming—coming for ever.

6-8. the Lord—a name expressive of the authoritative style in which He interprets His own parable.

1. Men ought always to pray. Therefore the plain meaning and moral of the parable are evident; viz., that as afflictions and desolations were coming on the land, and they should have need of much patience and continual fortitude, and the constant influence and protection of the Almighty, therefore they should be instant in prayer. It states, further, that men should never cease praying for that the necessity of which God has given them to feel till they receive a full answer to their prayers. No other meaning need be searched for in this parable; Luke, who perfectly knew his Master's meaning, has explained it as above.

2. A judge, which feared not God, neither regarded man. It is no wonder that our Lord calls this person an "unrighteous judge," v. 6. Because this person feared not God, he paid no attention to the calls of justice; and because he respected not man, he was unmoved at the complaint of the widow.

3. Avenge me of mine adversary. The original had better be translated, "Do me justice against, or vindicate me from, my adversary." If the woman had come to get revenge, as our common translation intimates, I think our blessed Lord would never have permitted her to have the honor of a place in the sacred records. She desired to have justice, and that only; and by her importunity she got that which the unrighteous judge had no inclination to give, but merely for his own ease.

4. He said within himself. How many actions which appear good have neither the love of God nor that of our neighbor, but only self-love of the basest kind, for their principle and motive!

5. She weary me. "Stun me." A metaphor taken from boxers, who bruise each other, and by beating each other about the face "blacken the eyes." See 1 Cor. ix. 27.

6. Hear what the unjust judge saith. Our blessed Lord intimates that we should reason thus with ourselves: "If a person of such an infamous character as this judge was could yield to the pressing and continual solicitations of a poor widow, for whom he felt nothing but contempt, how much more ready must God be, who is infinitely good and merciful, and who loves His creatures in the tenderest manner, to give would avenge his own elect. There are a people in the world that are God's people, his own elect. And this he has an eye to in all he does for them. God's own elect meet with a great deal of trouble and opposition in this world; there are many adversaries. That which is wanted and waited for is God's preserving and protecting them.

(2) What it is that is required of God's people: they must cry day and night to him. This he has made their duty, and to this he has promised mercy. We ought to be particular in praying against our spiritual enemies, like this importunate widow. Lord, mortify this corruption. Lord, arm me against this temptation. We ought to concern ourselves for the persecuted and oppressed churches, and to pray that God would do them justice. We must cry with earnestness; we must cry day and night; we must wrestle with God. God's praying people are told to give him no rest, Isa. lxii. 6, 7.

(3) What discouragements they may perhaps meet with in their prayers. He may bear long with them. He exercises patience towards the adversaries of his people, and he exercises the patience of his people.

(4) What assurance they have that mercy will come at last, though it be delayed. If this widow prevail by being importunate, much more shall God's elect prevail. [1] This widow was a stranger, but God's praying people are his own elect, whom he knows, and loves. [2] She was but one, but the praying people of God are many. Saints on earth besiege the throne of grace with their united prayers. [3] She came to a judge that bade her keep her distance; we come to a Father that bids us come boldly to him. [4] She came to an unjust judge; we come to a righteous Father. [5] She came to this judge purely upon her own account; but God is himself engaged in the cause which we are soliciting. [6] She had no friend to speak for her, but we have an Advocate with the Father, his own Son, who ever lives to make intercession for us. [7] She had no encouragement given her to ask; but we have a promise that it shall be given to us. [8] She could have access to the judge only at some certain times; but we may cry to God day and night, at all hours. [9] Her importunity was provoking to the judge, but our importunity is pleasing to God, and therefore we may hope, shall avail much, if it be an effectual fervent prayer.

2. He intimates to them that, notwithstanding this, they will begin to be weary of waiting for him (v. 8): "Nevertheless, when the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?" Now, when he comes, will he find faith on the earth? The question implies a strong negation: No, he will not; he himself foresees it.

(1) It supposes that faith is the great thing that Jesus Christ looks for. He does not ask, Is there innocency? but, Is there faith?

(2) It supposes that if there were faith, though ever so little, he would find it out.

(3) It is foretold that, when Christ comes he will find but little faith. [1] In general, he will find but few good people. Many that have the form and fashion of godliness, but few that have faith, that are sincere and honest. [2] In particular, he will find few that have faith concerning his coming. It intimates that Christ may, and will, delay his coming so long as that, First, Wicked people will begin to defy it, and his delay will harden them in their wickedness. Secondly, Even his own people will begin to despair of it. But this is our comfort, that, when the time appointed comes, it will appear that the unbelief of man has not made the promise of God of no effect.

Verses 9–14

The scope of this parable likewise is prefixed to it. He designed it for the conviction of some who trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others. 1. They were such as had a great conceit of themselves; they thought themselves as holy as they needed to be, and holier than all their neighbours. 2. They had a confidence in themselves before God. They trusted in themselves as being righteous; they thought they had made God their debtor. 3. They despised others. This is called a parable, though there be nothing of similitude in it. It is matter of fact every day.

I. Here are both these addressing themselves to the duty of prayer at the same place and time (v. 10): Two men went up into the temple to pray. It was not the hour of public prayer, but they went thither to offer up their personal devotions. The Pharisee and the publican both went to the temple to pray. Among the worshippers of God there is a mixture of good and bad. The Pharisee, proud as he was, could not think himself above prayer; nor could the publican, humble as he was, think himself shut out from the benefit of it. The Pharisee went to the temple to bear long with them—rather, "in their case," or "on their account" (as Jas. 5:7, "for it"), [GROTIUS, DE WETTE, etc.]. 8. speedily—as if pained at the long delay, impatient for the destined moment to interpose. (Cf. Prov. 29:1.)

7. shall not God—not unjust, but the infinitely righteous Judge. avenge—redeem from oppression. his own elect—not like this widow, the object of indifference and contempt, but dear to Him as the apple of the eye (Zech. 2:8). cry day and night—whose every cry enters into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth (Jas. 5:4), and how much more their incessant and persevering cries!

Nevertheless . . .—i.e., Yet ere the Son of man comes to redress the wrongs of His Church, so low will the hope of relief sink, through the length of the delay, that one will be fain to ask, Will He find any faith of a coming avenger left on the earth? From this we learn: (1) That the primary and historical reference of this parable is to the Church in its widowed, desolate, oppressed, defenseless condition during the present absence of her Lord in the heavens; (2) That in these circumstances importunate, persevering prayer for deliverance is the Church's fitting exercise; (3) That notwithstanding every encouragement to this, so long will the answer be delayed, while the need of relief continues the same, and all hope of deliverance will have nearly died out, and "faith" of Christ's coming scarcely to be found. But the application of the parable to prayer in general is so obvious as to have nearly hidden its more direct reference, and so precious that one cannot allow it to disappear in any public and historical interpretation.

9-14. PARABLE OF THE PHARISEE AND THE PUBLICAN.

His utmost salvation to all them who diligently seek it!"

7. And shall not God avenge his own elect? And will not God, the righteous Judge, "do justice for His chosen?" As God has graciously promised to give salvation to every soul that comes unto Him through His Son, and has put His Spirit in their hearts, inducing them to cry unto Him incessantly for it, the goodness of His nature and the promise of His grace bind Him to hear the prayers they offer unto Him, and to grant them all that salvation which He has led them by His promise and Spirit to request. Which cry day and night unto him. This is a genuine characteristic of the true elect or disciples of Christ. They feel they have neither light, power, nor goodness but as they receive them from Him; and, as He is the Desire of their souls, they incessantly seek that they may be upheld and saved by Him. Though he bear long with them. Rather, "and He is compassionate towards them," and consequently not at all like to the unrighteous judge.

8. He will avenge them speedily. Or, "He will do them justice speedily"—"instantly, in a trice." (1) Because He has promised it; and (2) Because He is inclined to do it.

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

When Jesus comes He will look for precious faith. He has more regard for faith than for all else that earth can yield Him. Our returning Lord will care nothing for the treasures of the rich or the honors of the great. He will not look for the abilities we have manifested, nor the influence we have acquired; but He will look for our faith. It is His glory that He is "believed on in the world," and to that He will have respect. This is the jewel for which He is searching. This heavenly merchantman counts faith to be the pearl of great price—faith is precious to Jesus as well as to us. The last day will be occupied with a great scrutiny, and that scrutiny will be made upon the essential point—where is there faith, and where is there no faith? He that believeth is saved; he that believeth not is condemned. A search warrant will be issued for our houses and our hearts, and the inquiry will be: Where is your faith? Did you honor Christ by trusting His Word and His blood, or did you not? Did you glorify God by believing His revelation and depending upon His promise, or did you not? The fact that our Lord, at His coming, will seek for faith should cause us to think very highly of faith.
—The Treasury of the New Testament

When the Son of man cometh. To require the produce of the seed of the Kingdom sown among this people. Shall he find faith on the earth? Or rather, "Shall He find fidelity in this land?" Shall He find that the soil has brought forth a harvest proportioned to the culture bestowed on it?

9. Despised. "Disdained, made nothing of others, treated them with sovereign contempt." Our Lord grants that the Pharisees made clean the outside; but, alas! what pride, vainglory, and contempt for others, were lodged within!

10. Publican. See an account of these on Matt. v. 46. Both these persons went up into the temple to pray, i.e., to worship God. They were probably both Jews, and felt themselves led by different motives to attend at the Temple, at the hour of prayer: the one to return thanks for the mercies he had received; the other to implore that grace which alone could redeem him from his sins.

pray because it was a public place, and therefore he should have many eyes upon him. The character Christ gave of the Pharisees, that all their works they did to be seen of men, gives us occasion for this suspicion. There are many whom we see every day at the temple, whom, it is to be feared, we shall not see in the great day at Christ's right hand. The Pharisee came to the temple upon a compliment, the publican upon business; the Pharisee to make his appearance, the publican to make his request. God sees with what disposition and design we come to wait upon him.

II. Here is the Pharisee's address to God (for a prayer I cannot call it): He stood and prayed thus with himself (v. 11, 12); standing by himself, he prayed thus, so some read it; he was wholly intent upon himself, had nothing in his eye but self, not God's glory. That which he is here supposed to say is that which shows,

1. That he trusted to himself that he was righteous. A great many good things he said of himself, which we will suppose to be true. He was not an extortioner. He was not unjust in any of his dealings; he did no man any wrong; he was no adulterer. Yet this was not all: he fasted twice in the week. Thus he glorified God with his body: yet that was not all; he gave tithes of all that he possessed, and so glorified God with his worldly estate. Yet he was not accepted; and why was he not? (1) His giving God thanks for this seems to be a mere formality. He does not say, By the grace of God I am what I am, as Paul did, but turns it off with a slight, God, I thank thee. (2) He makes his boast of this as if all his business to the temple was to tell God Almighty how very good he was. (3) He trusted to it as a righteousness. (4) Here is not one word of prayer in all he saith. He went up to the temple to pray, but forgot his errand. He thought he had need of nothing, no, not of the favour and grace of God, which, it would seem, he did not think worth asking.

2. That he despised others. (1) He thought meanly of all mankind but himself: I thank thee that I am not as other men are. We may have reason to thank God that we are not as some men are, but to speak as if we only were good, is to judge by wholesale. (2) He thought meanly in a particular manner of this publican. He knew that he was a publican, and therefore very uncharitably concluded that he was an extortioner, unjust, and all that is naught. Suppose it had been so, what business had he to take notice of it? Could not he say his prayers without reproaching his neighbours? And was he as much pleased with the publican's badness as with his own goodness?

III. Here is the publican's address to God, which was the reverse of the Pharisee's, as full of humility and humiliation as his was of pride and ostentation; as full of repentance for sin, and desire towards God, as his was of confidence in himself.

1. He expressed his repentance and humility in what he did. (1) He stood afar off. The publican kept at a distance under a sense of unworthiness to draw near to God. Hereby he owned that God might justly behold him afar off, and that it was a great favour that God was pleased to admit him thus nigh. (2) He would not lift up so much as his eyes to heaven. He did lift up his heart to God in the heavens, in holy desires, but, through prevailing shame and humiliation, he did not lift up his eyes in holy confidence and courage. The dejection of his looks is an indication of the dejection of his mind at the thought of sin. (3) He smote upon his breast. The sinner's heart first smites him in a penitent rebuke. Sinner, what hast thou done? And then he smites his heart with penitent remorse: O wretched man that I am!

2. He expressed it in what he said. His prayer was short. Sighs and groans swallowed up his words; but what he said was to the purpose: God, be merciful to me a sinner. And blessed be God that we have this prayer upon record as an answered prayer. (1) He owns himself a sinner by nature, by practice, guilty before God. The Pharisee denies himself to be a sinner. But the publican gives himself no other character than that of a sinner. (2) He has no dependence but upon the mercy of God. The Pharisee had insisted upon the merit of his fastings and tithes; but the poor publican disclaims all thought of merit, and flies to mercy as his city of refuge. "Justice condemns me; nothing will save me but mercy, mercy." (3) He earnestly prays for the benefit of that mercy: "O God, be merciful, be propitious, to me." He comes as a beggar for an alms, when he is ready to perish for hunger. Probably he repeated this prayer with renewed affections, but still this was the burden of the song: God, be merciful to me a sinner.

IV. Here is the publican's acceptance with God. There were those who would cry up the Pharisee, and who would look with contempt upon this

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

11, 12. stood—as the Jews in prayer (Mark 11:25). God . . .—To have been kept from gross iniquities was undoubtedly a just cause of thankfulness to God; but instead of the devoutly humble, admiring frame which this should inspire, the Pharisee arrogantly severs himself from the rest of mankind, as quite above them, and, with a contemptuous look at the poor publican, thanks God that he has not to stand afar off like him, to hang down his head like a bulrush and beat his breast like him. But these are only his moral excellencies. His religious merits complete his grounds for congratulation. Not confining himself to the one divinely prescribed annual fast (Lev. 16:29), he was not behind the most rigid, who fasted on the second and fifth days of every week [LIGHTFOOT], and gave the tenth not only of what the law laid under tithing, but of "all his gains." Thus, besides doing all his duty, he did works of supererogation; while sins to confess and spiritual wants to be supplied he seems to have felt none. What a picture of the Pharisaic character and religion!

13. standing afar off—as unworthy to draw near; but that was the way to get near (Ps. 34:18; Isa. 57:15). would not lift up—blushing and ashamed to do so (Ezra 9:6).

smote . . .—kept smiting; for anguish (ch. 23:48), and self-reproach (Jer. 31:19).

be merciful—"be propitiated," a very unusual word in such a sense, only once else used in the New Testament, in the sense of "making reconciliation" by sacrifice (Heb. 2:17). There may therefore, be some allusion to this here, though not likely. a sinner—literally, "the sinner"; i.e., "If ever there was one, I am he."

ADAM CLARKE

11. Stood and prayed thus with himself. Or "stood by himself and prayed," as some would translate the words. God, I thank thee. In Matt. v. 20, our Lord says, "Unless your righteousness abounds more than that of the scribes and Pharisees, you shall not enter into the kingdom of God." Now the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees is described here by a Pharisee himself. We find it was twofold: (1) It consisted in doing no harm to others, (2) In attending all the ordinances of God, then established in the Jewish economy; and in these things they were not like other men, the bulk of the inhabitants of the land paying little or no attention to them. That the Pharisees were in their origin a pure and holy people can admit of little doubt, but that they had awfully degenerated before our Lord's time is sufficiently evident. They had lost the spirit of their institution, and retained nothing else than its external regulations. This Pharisee did no harm to others—I am not rapacious, nor unjust, nor an adulterer.

12. He observed the ordinances of religion—I fast twice in the week. The Jewish days of fasting, in each week, were the second and fifth, what we call Monday and Thursday. These were instituted in remembrance of Moses' going up to the mount to give the law, which they suppose to have been on the fifth day; and of his descent, after he had received the two tables, which they suppose was on the second day of the week. I give tithes of all that I possess. Or "of all I acquire."

13. The publican, standing afar off. Not because he was a heathen and dared not approach the holy place (for it is likely he was a Jew), but because he was a true penitent, and felt himself utterly unworthy to appear before God. Would not lift up . . . his eyes. Holding down the head, with the eyes fixed upon the earth, was (1) a sign of deep distress, (2) of a consciousness and confession of guilt, and (3) it was the very posture that the Jewish rabbins required in those who prayed to God. So the Pharisee appears to have forgotten one of his own precepts. But smote upon his breast. Smiting the breast was a token of excessive grief, commonly practiced in all nations. It seems to intimate a desire in the penitent to punish that heart through the evil propensities of which the sin deplored had been committed.

God be merciful to me. "Be propitious toward me through sacrifice"—or, Let an atonement be made for me. I am a sinner, and cannot be saved but in this way. The Greek word often signifies to make expiation for sin. We see then, at once, the reason why our blessed Lord said that the taxgatherer "went down to his house sneaking whining publican. But our Lord Jesus assures us that this poor, penitent, broken-hearted publican went to his house justified, rather than the other. The Pharisee thought that if one of them must be justified, and not the other, certainly it must be he rather than the publican. "No," saith Christ, "I tell you it is the publican rather than the Pharisee" The proud Pharisee goes away rejected of God; he is not justified. He is not accepted as righteous in God's sight, because he is so righteous in his own sight; but the publican obtains the remission of his sins, and he whom the Pharisee would not set with the dogs of his flock God sets with the children of his family. Proud men, who exalt themselves, are rivals with God, and therefore they shall certainly be abased. Humble men, who abase themselves, are subject to God, and they shall be exalted. See how the punishment answers the sin: He that exalteth himself shall be abased. See how the recompense answers the duty: He that humbles himself shall be exalted. See also the power of God's grace in bringing good out of evil; the publican had been a great sinner, and out of the greatness of his sin was brought the greatness of his repentance. It was good that the Pharisee was no extortioner, nor unjust; but the devil made him proud of this, to his ruin.

Verses 15–17

1. Those who are themselves blessed in Christ should desire to have their children also blessed in him. They brought to him infants, very young, not able to go, sucking children, as some think. None are too little, too young, to bring to Christ. 2. One gracious touch of Christ's will make our children happy. They brought infants to him, that he might touch them. 3. It is no strange thing for those who make their application to Jesus Christ, for themselves or for their children, to meet with discouragement: When the disciples saw it they rebuked them. 4. Many whom the disciples rebuke the Master invites: Jesus called them unto him. 5. It is the mind of Christ that little children should be brought to him: "Suffer little children to come to me, and forbid them not; let nothing be done to hinder them, for they shall be as welcome as any." 6. The children of those who belong to the kingdom of God do likewise belong to that kingdom, as the children of freemen are freemen. 7. Those grown people are most welcome to him who have in them most of the disposition of children (v. 17): Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, that is, receive the benefits of it with humility and thankfulness, gladly owning himself indebted to free grace for them; unless a man be brought to this self-denying frame he shall in no wise enter into that kingdom.

Verses 18–30

I. Christ's discourse with a ruler, that had a good mind to be directed by him in the way to heaven.

1. Luke takes notice of it that he was a ruler. Few of the rulers had any esteem for Christ, but here was one that had.

2. The great thing we are everyone of us concerned to enquire after is, what we shall do to inherit eternal life.

3. Those who would inherit eternal life must apply themselves to Jesus Christ as their Master, their teaching Master, and their ruling Master. There is no learning the way to heaven but in the school of Christ.

4. Those who come to Christ as their Master must believe him to have not only a divine mission, but a divine goodness. "Why callest thou me good? Thou knowest there is none good but one, that is, God."

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

14. rather than the other—The meaning is, "and not the other"; for the Pharisee was not seeking justification, and felt no need of it. This great law of the Kingdom of God is, in the teaching of Christ, inscribed, as in letters of gold, over its entrance gate. And in how many different forms is it repeated (Ps. 138:6; 147:6; ch. 1:53). To be self-emptied, or, "poor in spirit," is the fundamental and indispensable preparation for the reception of the "grace which bringeth salvation": wherever this exists, the "mourning" for it which precedes "comfort" and the earnest "hungerings and thirstings after righteousness" which are rewarded by the "fulness" of it, will, as we see here, be surely found. Such, therefore, and such only, are the justified ones (Job 33:27, 28; Ps. 34:18; Isa. 57:15).

15-17. LITTLE CHILDREN BROUGHT TO CHRIST. infants—showing that some, at least, of those called in Matthew (19:13) and Mark (10:13) simply "little" or "young children," were literally "babes." touch them—or, as more fully in Matthew, "put His hands on them and pray," or invoke a "blessing" on them (Mark 10:16), according to venerable custom (Gen. 48:14, 15). rebuked them—Repeatedly the disciples thus interposed to save annoyance and interruption to their Master; but, as the result showed, always against the mind of Christ (Matt. 15:23; ch. 18:39, 40). Here, it is plain from our Lord's reply, that they thought the intrusion a useless one, as infants were not capable of receiving anything from Him. His ministrations were for grown people. 16. But Jesus—much displeased," says Mark (10:14); and invaluable addition. said—"SUFFER THE LITTLE CHILDREN TO COME UNTO ME"—"AND FORBID THEM NOT," is the important addition of Matthew (19:14) and Mark (10:14). What words are these from the lips of Christ! The price of them is above rubies. But the reason assigned, "FOR OF SUCH IS THE KINGDOM OF GOD," or "of heaven," as in Matthew 19:14, completes the previous information here conveyed; especially as interpreted by what immediately follows: "AND HE TOOK THEM UP IN HIS ARMS, PUT HIS HANDS UPON THEM, AND BLESSED THEM" (Mark 10:16). It is surely not to be conceived that all our Lord meant was to inform us, that seeing grown people must become childlike in order to be capable of the Kingdom of God, therefore they should not hinder infants from coming to Him, and therefore He took up and blessed the infants themselves. Was it not just the grave mistake of the disciples that infants should not be brought to Christ, because only grown people could profit by Him, which "much displeased" our Lord? And though He took the irresistible opportunity of lowering their pride of reason, by informing them that, in order to enter the Kingdom, "instead of the children first becoming like them, they must themselves become like the children" [RICHTER in STIER], this was but by the way; and, returning to the children themselves, He took them up in His gracious arms, put His hands upon them and blessed them, for no conceivable reason but to show that they were thereby made capable, AS INFANTS, of the Kingdom of God. And if so, then "Can any man forbid water that these should not be baptized which have received the Holy Ghost as well as we?" (Acts 10:47). But such application of the baptismal water can have no warrant here, save where the infants have been previously brought to Christ Himself for His benediction, and only as the sign and seal of that benediction.

18-30. THE RICH YOUNG RULER, AND DISCOURSE THEREON. This case presents some remarkable points. (1) The man was of irreproachable moral character; and this amidst all the temptations of youth, for he was a "young man" (Matt. 19:22), and wealth, for "he was very rich" (vs. 23; Mark 10:22). (2) But restless notwithstanding, his heart craves eternal life. (3) Unlike the "rulers," to whose class he belonged (vs. 18), he so far believed in Jesus as to be persuaded He could authoritatively direct him on this vital point. (4) So earnest is he that he comes "running" and even "kneeling before Him," and that when He was gone forth into the way (Mark 10:17)—the high-road, by this time crowded with travellers to the passover; undeterred by the virulent opposition of the class he belonged to as a "ruler" and by the shame he might be expected to feel at broaching such a question in the hearing of a crowd and on the open road. 19. Why . . .—Did our Lord mean then to teach that God only ought to be called "good"? Impossible, for that had been to contradict all Scripture teaching, and His own, too (Ps. 112:5; Matt. 25:21; Titus 1:8). Unless therefore we are to ascribe captiousness to our Lord, He could have had but one object — to raise the justified rather than the other"; he sought for mercy through an atonement for sin, which was the only way in which God had from the beginning purposed to save sinners. As the Pharisee depended on his doing no harm and observing the ordinances of religion for his acceptance with God, according to the economy of grace and justice, he must be rejected. For as all had sinned and come short of the glory of God, and no man could make an atonement for his sins, so he who did not take refuge in that which God's mercy had provided must be excluded from the kingdom of Heaven.

14. Went down to his house justified. His sin blotted out, and himself accepted. Rather than the other. That is, the other was not accepted, because he exalted himself—he made use of the mercies which he acknowledged he owed to God, to make claims on the divine approbation, and to monopolize the salvation of the Most High!

15-17. They brought unto him also infants. On these verses the reader is requested to consult the notes on Matt. xix. 13-14 and on Mark x. 16.

Then were there brought unto him little children. These are termed by Luke, chap. xviii. 15, "infants," very young children; and it was on this account, probably, that the disciples rebuked the parents, thinking them too young to receive good. That he should put his hands. It was a common custom among the Jews to lay their hands on the heads of those whom they blessed or for whom they prayed. This seems to have been done by way of dedication or consecration to God—the person being considered as the sacred property of God ever after.

Of such is the kingdom of heaven. Or, "The kingdom of heaven is composed of such." A great part of God's kingdom is composed of such literally, and those only who resemble little children shall be received into it; see on chap. xviii. 3. Christ loves little children because He loves simplicity and innocence; He has sanctified their very age by passing through it himself—the holy Jesus was once a little child.

18-23. A certain ruler. See the case of this person largely explained on Matt. xix. 16-22 and Mark x. 21-22.

One came. Much instruction may be had from seriously attending to the conduct, spirit, and question of this person. (1) He came running, Mark x. 17, and he was deeply convinced of the importance of his business, and seriously determined to seek so as to find. (2) He kneeled, or caught Him by the knees, thus evidencing his humility, and addressing himself only to mercy. (3) He came in the spirit of a disciple, or scholar, desiring to be taught a matter of the utmost importance to him—Good teacher. (4) He came in the spirit of obedience; he had worked hard to no purpose, and he is still willing to work, provided he can have a prospect of succeeding—What good thing shall I do? (5) His question was the most interesting and important that any soul can ask of God—How shall I be saved?

Why callest thou me good? Or, "Why do you question Me concerning that good thing?" The whole passage therefore may be read thus:

MATTHEW HENRY

5. Our Master, Christ himself, has not altered the way to heaven from what it was before his coming, but has only made it more plain, and easy, and comfortable. Thou knowest the commandments. Wouldest thou inherit eternal life? Govern thyself by the commandments.

6. The duties of the second table must be conscientiously observed. Nor is it enough to keep ourselves free from the gross violations of these commandments, but we must know these commandments in their extent and spiritual nature.

7. Men think themselves innocent because they are ignorant; so this ruler did. He said, All these have I kept from my youth up, v. 21. He boasts that he began early in a course of virtue, that he had continued in it to this day, and that he had not in any instance transgressed. Had he been acquainted with the nature of the divine law, and with the workings of his own heart,—had he been but Christ's disciple awhile, he would have said quite the contrary: "All these have I broken from my youth up."

8. The great things are how we stand affected to Christ and to our brethren, to this world and to the other. If he have a true affection to Christ, he will come and follow him whatever it cost him. None shall inherit eternal life who are not willing to follow the Lamb whithersoever he goes. If he have a true affection to his brethren, he will distribute to the poor. If he think meanly of this world he will not stick at selling what he has for the relief of God's poor. If he think highly of the other world, he will desire no more than to have treasure in heaven.

9. There are many that have a great deal in them that is very commendable, and yet they perish for lack of some one thing; so this ruler here; he broke with Christ upon this, which would part between him and his estate.

10. Many that are loth to leave Christ, yet do leave him. Their corruptions carry the day at last. If one must be quitted, it shall be their God, not their worldly gain.

II. Christ's discourse with his disciples upon this occasion, in which we may observe, 1. Riches are a great hindrance to many in the way to heaven. He saw that he was very sorrowful, and was sorry for him; but thence he infers, How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God! v. 24. Having a great estate, it had a great influence upon him, and he chose rather to take his leave of Christ than to lay himself under an obligation to dispose of his estate in charitable uses. Christ asserts the difficulty of the salvation of rich people very emphatically: It is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God, v. 25. 2. It is really very hard for any to get to heaven. If we must sell all, or break with Christ, who then can be saved? v. 26. They do not find fault with what Christ required as hard and unreasonable. But they know how closely the hearts of most men cleave to this world, and are ready to despair of their being ever brought to this. 3. There are such difficulties in the way of our salvation as could never be got over but by that grace of God which is almighty. The things which are impossible with men, these things are possible with God. His grace can work upon the soul, so as to alter the bent and bias of it, and give it a contrary ply. 4. There is an aptness in us to speak too much of what we have left and lost for Christ. This appears in Peter: Lo we have left all, and followed thee, v. 28. When it came in his way, he could not forbear magnifying his own and his brethren's affection to Christ, in quitting all to follow him. 5. Whatever we have left for Christ, it shall without fail be abundantly made up to us in this world and that to come (v. 29, 30): No man has left the comfort of his estate or relations for the kingdom of God's sake, who shall not receive manifold more in this present time, in the pleasures of communion with God and of a good conscience, advantages which will abundantly countervail all their losses. In the world to come they shall receive life everlasting, which is the thing that the ruler seemed to have his eye and heart upon.

youth's ideas of Himself, as not to be classed merely with other "good masters," and declining to receive this title apart from the "One" who is essentially and only "good." This indeed is but distantly hinted; but unless this is seen in the background of our Lord's words, nothing worthy of Him can be made out of them. (Hence, Socinianism, instead of having any support here, is only baffled by it.) 20. Thou knowest . . .—Matthew is more complete here: "but if thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments. He saith unto him, Which?"—as if he had said, Point me out one of them which I have not kept?—"Jesus said, Thou shalt . . ." (Matt. 19: 17, 18). Our Lord purposely confines Himself to the second table, which He would consider easy to keep, enumerating them all—for in Mark (10:19), "Defraud not" stands for the tenth (else the eighth is twice repeated). In Matthew the sum of this second table of the law is added, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," as if to see if he would venture to say he had kept that. 21. All these . . .—"what lack I yet?" adds Matthew. Ah! this gives us a glimpse of his heart. Doubtless he was perfectly sincere; but something within whispered to him that his keeping of the commandments was too easy a way of getting to heaven. He felt something beyond this to be necessary; after keeping all the commandments he was at a loss to know what that could be; and he came to Jesus just upon that point. "Then," says Mark (10:21), "Jesus beholding him loved him," or "looked lovingly upon him." His sincerity, frankness, and nearness to the kingdom of God, in themselves most winning qualities, won our Lord's regard even though he turned his back upon Him—a lesson to those who can see nothing lovable save in the regenerate. 22. lackest . . . one thing—Ah! but that a fundamental, fatal lack. sell . . .—As riches were his idol, our Lord, who knew if from the first, lays His great authoritative grasp at once upon it, saying, "Now give Me up that, and all is right." No general direction about the disposal of riches, then, is here given, save that we are to sit loose to them and lay them at the feet of Him who gave them. He who does this with all he has, whether rich or poor, is a true heir of the kingdom of heaven. 23-25. was very sorrowful—Matthew more fully, "went away sorrowful"; Mark still more, "was sad" or "sullen" at that saying, and "went away grieved." Sorry he was, very sorry, to part with Christ; but to part with his riches would have cost him a pang more. When Riches or Heaven, on Christ's terms, were the alternative, the result showed to which side the balance inclined. Thus was he shown to lack the one all-comprehensive requirement of the law—the absolute subjection of the heart to God, and this want vitiated all his other obediences. 24. when Jesus saw—Mark says, He "looked round about"—as if first following the departing youth with His eye—"and saith unto His disciples." how hardly . . .—with what difficulty. In Mark an explanation is added, "How hard is it for them that trust in riches . . ."—i.e., with what difficulty is this idolatrous trust conquered, without which they cannot enter; and this is introduced by the word "children"—sweet diminutive of affection and pity (John 21:5). easier for a camel . . .—a proverbial expression denoting literally a thing impossible, but figuratively, very difficult. 26, 27. For . . .—"At that rate none can be saved": "Well, it does pass human power, but not divine. 28-30. Lo . . .—in the simplicity of his heart (as is evident from the reply), conscious that the required surrender had been made, and generously taking in his brethren with him—"we"; not in the spirit of the young ruler. "All these have I kept," left all—"The workmen's little is as much his 'all' as the prince's much [BENGEL]. In Matthew (19:27) he adds, "What shall we have therefore?" How shall it fare with us? 29. There is no man . . .—graciously acknowledging at once the completeness and the acceptableness of the surrender as a thing already made. house . . .—The specification is still more minute in Matthew and Mark, to take in every form of self-sacrifice. for the kingdom of God's sake—in Mark, "for MY sake and the Gospel's." See on ch. 6:22. 30. manifold more in this present time—in Matthew (19:29) "an hundredfold," to which Mark (10:30) gives this most interesting addition, "Now in this present time, houses, and brethren, and sisters, and mothers, and children, and lands, with persecutions." We have here the blessed promise of a reconstruction of all human relationships and affections on a Christian basis and in a Christian state, after being sacrificed, in their natural form, on the altar of love to Christ. This He calls "manifold more"—"an hundredfold more"—than what they sacrificed.

ADAM CLARKE

"O Teacher! what good thing shall I do that I may have eternal life? And He said unto him, Why do you question Me concerning that good thing? There is One that is good." Keep the commandments. From this we may learn that God's great design in giving His law to the Jews was to lead them to the expectation and enjoyment of eternal life. But as all the law referred to Christ, and He became "the end of the law for righteousness" (justification) to all that believe, so He is to be received, in order to have the end accomplished which the law proposed.

All these things have I kept. I have made these precepts the rule of my life. There is a difference worthy of notice between this and our Lord's word. He says, v. 17, keep, earnestly, diligently, as with watch and ward, probably referring not only to the letter but to the spirit. The young man modestly says, All these have I "observed"; I have paid attention to, and endeavored to regulate my conduct by them. I have "kept them in custody." What lack I yet? He felt a troubled conscience, and a mind unassured of the approbation of God; and he clearly perceived that something was wanting to make him truly happy.

If thou wilt be perfect. "Be complete," have the business "finished," and all hindrances to your salvation removed, go and sell that thou hast—go and dispose of your possessions, to which it is evident his heart was too much attached, and give to the poor—for your goods will be a continual snare to you if you keep them; and thou shalt have treasure in heaven—the loss, if it can be called such, shall be made amply up to you in that eternal life about which you inquired; and come and follow me—be My disciple, and I will appoint you to preach the kingdom of God to others.

Went away sorrowful. Men undergo great agony of mind while they are in suspense between the love of the world and the love of their souls. He had great possessions. And what were these in comparison of peace of conscience and mental rest?

24. How hardly shall they that have riches. See the notes on this discourse of our Lord, on Matt. xix. 24-30 and Mark x. 30.

A rich man shall hardly enter. That is, into the spirit and privileges of the gospel in this world, and through them into the Kingdom of glory.

A camel. It was a mode of expression common among the Jews, and signified a thing impossible. Hence this proverb: "No man sees a palm tree of gold, nor an elephant passing through the eye of a needle."

28. We have left all. Our trades, our houses, and families. The reader is desired to consult the notes on Matt. iv. 20; xix. 27, etc.

29. That hath left house, or parents. See on Matt. xix. 28-29 and Mark x. 29-30.

MATTHEW HENRY

I. The notice Christ gave to his disciples of his sufferings and death approaching, and of the glorious issue of them. Two things are here which we had not in the other evangelists:—1. The sufferings of Christ are here spoken of as the fulfilling of the scriptures. All things that are written by the prophets concerning the Son of man shall be accomplished. This proves that the scriptures are the word of God, for they had their exact and full accomplishment; and that Jesus Christ was sent of God, for they had their accomplishment in him. This makes the offence of the cross to cease, and puts an honour upon it. Thus it was written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer. 2. The ignominy and disgrace done to Christ in his sufferings are here most insisted upon. The other evangelists had said that he should be mocked; but here it is added, He shall be spitefully treated, shall have all possible reproach put upon him. But here, as always, when Christ spoke of his sufferings and death, he foretold his resurrection as that which took off both the terror and reproach of his sufferings: The third day he shall rise again.

II. The confusion that the disciples were hereby put into. This was so contrary to the notions they had had of the Messiah and his kingdom that they understood none of these things, v. 34. Their prejudices were so strong that they would not understand them literally, and they could not understand them otherwise, so that they did not understand them at all. This saying was hidden from them, they could not receive it. They were so intent upon those prophecies that spoke of his glory that they overlooked those that spoke of his sufferings. Therefore it is that people run into mistakes, because they read their Bibles by the halves, and are as partial in the prophets as they are in the law. Thus now we are too apt, in reading, the prophecies that are yet to be fulfilled, to have our expectations raised of the glorious state of the church in the latter days. But we overlook its wilderness sackcloth state, and are willing to fancy that is over.

Christ came not only to bring light to a dark world, and so to set before us the objects we are to have in view, but also to give sight to blind souls, to enable them to view those objects. We have now an account of one to whom he gave sight near Jericho. Mark gives us an account of one, and names him, whom he cured as he went out of Jericho, Mark x. 46. Matthew speaks of two whom he cured as they departed from Jericho, Matt. xx. 30. Luke says it was when he was near to Jericho.

I. This poor blind man sat by the wayside, begging, v. 35. It seems, he was not only blind, but poor; the fitter emblem of the world of mankind which Christ came to heal and save. He sat begging, for he was blind, and could not work for his living. Such objects of charity by the wayside ought not to be overlooked by us. Christ here cast a favourable eye upon a common beggar.

II. Hearing the noise of a multitude passing by, he asked what it meant, v. 36. This we had not before. It teaches us that it is good to be inquisitive, and that those who are so some time or other find the benefit of it. Those who want their sight should make so much the better use of their hearing, and, when they cannot see with their own eyes, should, by asking questions, make use of other people's eyes. So this blind man did, and by that means came to understand that Jesus of Nazareth passed by, v. 37.

III. His prayer has in it a great deal both of faith and fervency: Jesus, thou Son of David, have mercy on me, v. 38. He believes he is able to help and succour him, and earnestly begs his favour: "Have mercy on me." Have mercy on us; for Christ's mercy includes all.

IV. Those who are in good earnest for Christ's favours and blessings will not be put by from the pursuit of them, though they meet with opposition and rebuke. They who went along chid him as troublesome to the Master, noisy and impertinent, and bade him hold his peace. The check given him was but as a dam to a full stream, which makes it swell so much the more: he cried the louder, Thou Son of David, have mercy on me.

V. Christ encourages poor beggars and invites them to come to him: He commanded him to be brought to him. Christ has more tenderness and compassion for distressed supplicants than any of his followers have. Those who had checked him must now lend him their hands to lead him to Christ.

VI. Though Christ knows all our wants, he will know them from us (v. 41): What wilt thou that I shall do unto thee? This man poured out his soul before Christ, when he said, Lord, that I may receive my sight.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

Our Lord was Himself the first to exemplify this new adjustment of His own relationships. (See on Matt. 12:49, 50; and on II Cor. 6:14-18.) But this "with persecutions"; for how could such a transfer take place without the most cruel wrenches to flesh and blood? but the persecution would haply follow them into their new and higher circle, breaking that up too! But best of all, "in the world to come life everlasting." And

> When the shore is won at last
> Who will count the billows past?
> KEBLE

These promises are for every one who forsakes his all for Christ. But in Matthew (19:28) this is prefaced by a special promise to the Twelve: "Verily I say unto you, That ye which have followed Me in the Regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of His glory, ye also shall sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Ye who have now adhered to Me shall, in the new kingdom, rule, or give law to, the great Christian world, here set forth in Jewish dress as the twelve tribes, presided over by the twelve apostles on so many judicial thrones. In this sense certainly the promise has been illustriously fulfilled [CALVIN, GROTIUS, LIGHTFOOT, etc.]. But if the promise refers to the yet future glory (as may be thought from ch. 22:28-30, and as most take it), it points to the highest personal distinction of the first founders of the Christian Church.

31-34. FULLER ANNOUNCEMENT OF HIS APPROACHING DEATH AND RESURRECTION. (See on Mark 10:32-34). 31. all written by the prophets concerning the Son of man . . . be accomplished—showing how Christ Himself read, and would have us to read, the Old Testament, in which some otherwise evangelical interpreters find no prophecies, or virtually none, of the sufferings of the Son of man. 34. understood none . . .—The Evangelist seems unable to say strongly enough how entirely hidden from them at that time was the sense of these exceeding plain statements: no doubt to add weight to their subsequent testimony, which from this very circumstance was prodigious, and with all the simple-hearted irresistible.

35-43. BLIND MAN HEALED. In Matthew 20: 29-34, they are two, as in the case of the Demoniac of Gadara. In Matthew and Mark (10:46-52) the occurrence is connected with Christ's departure from Jericho; in Luke with His approach to it. Many ways of accounting for these slight divergences of detail have been proposed. Perhaps, if we knew all the facts, we should see no difficulty; but that we have been left so far in the dark shows that the thing is of no moment any way. One thing is plain, there could have been no collusion among the authors of these Gospels, else they would have taken care to remove these "spots on the sun."

38. son of David . . .—(See on Matthew 12:23).

39. rebuked . . .—(See on vs. 15). so much the more—that importunity so commended in the Syrophœnician woman, and so often enjoined (ch. 11:5-13; 18:1-8). 40. commanded . . .—Mark has this interesting addition: "And they call the blind man, saying unto him, Be of good comfort, rise, He calleth thee"—just as one earnestly desiring an interview with some exalted person, but told by one official after another that it is vain to wait, as he will not succeed (they know it), yet persists in waiting for some answer to his suit, and at length the door opens, and a servant appears, saying, "You will be admitted—he has called you." And are there no other suitors to Jesus who sometimes fare

ADAM CLARKE

31. Behold, we go up to Jerusalem. See the notes on this discourse, Matt. xx. 17-19 and Mark x. 32.

33. And the third day he shall rise again. See Hos. vi. 2; and let the reader observe that the passage should be read thus: "In the third day He will raise Him up, and we shall live before Him"; His resurrection shall be the pledge, token, and cause of ours.

34. They understood none of these things. Notwithstanding all the information which Christ had given them concerning this awful subject, they could not as yet fully comprehend how the Messiah should suffer; or how their Master, whose power they knew was unlimited, should permit the Jews and Gentiles to torment and slay Him as He here intimates they would.

35. A certain blind man. Bartimaeus. See this transaction explained at large on Matt. xx. 29-34 and Mark x. 46, etc.

Two blind men. Mark x. 46 and Luke xviii. 35 mention only one blind man, Bartimaeus. Probably he was mentioned by the other Evangelists as being a person well-known before and after his cure. Sitting by the way side. In the likeliest place to receive alms, because of the multitudes going and coming between Jerusalem and Jericho.

Cried out. Though God had deprived them, for wise reasons, of their eyes, He left them the use of their speech. It is never so ill with us but it might be much worse; let us therefore be submissive and thankful.

MATTHEW HENRY

VII. The prayer of faith shall not be in vain (v. 42); Christ said, Receive thy sight, thy faith hath saved thee. True faith will produce fervency in prayer, and both together will fetch in abundance of the fruits of Christ's favour.

VIII. The grace of Christ ought to be thankfully acknowledged, v. 43. 1. The poor beggar himself, that had his sight restored, followed Christ, glorifying God. Those whom he healed pleased him best when they praised God, as those shall please God best who praise Christ and do him honour. 2. The people that saw it could not forbear giving praise to God. We must give praise to God for his mercies to others as well as for mercies to ourselves.

Many, no doubt, were converted to the faith of Christ of whom no account is kept in the gospels; but the conversion of some, whose case had something in it extraordinary, is recorded, as this of Zaccheus. Christ passed through Jericho, v. 1. This city was built under a curse, yet Christ honoured it with his presence, for the gospel takes away the curse.

I. Who, and what, this Zaccheus was. His name bespeaks him a Jew. 1. His calling, and the post he was in: He was the chief among the publicans. Here was one that was chief of the publicans, that enquired after him. God has his remnant among all sorts. Christ came to save even the chief of sinners, and therefore even the chief of publicans. 2. His circumstances in the world were very considerable: He was rich. Christ had lately shown how hard it is for rich people to enter into the kingdom of God, yet presently produces an instance of one rich man that had been lost, and was found, and that not as the prodigal by being reduced to want.

II. How he came in Christ's way. 1. He had a great curiosity to see Jesus, v. 3. It is natural to us to come in sight, if we can, of those whose fame has filled our ears; at least, we shall be able to say hereafter that we have seen such and such great men. We should now seek to see Jesus with an eye of faith, to see who he is; We would see Jesus. 2. He could not get his curiosity gratified in this matter because he was little, and the crowd was great. Christ did not study to show himself. As one of us, he was lost in a crowd. Many that are little of stature have large souls, and are lively in spirit. 3. Because he would not disappoint his curiosity he forgot his gravity, and ran before, like a boy, and climbed up into a sycamore-tree, to see him. Those that sincerely desire a sight of Christ will use the proper means for gaining a sight of him. Those that find themselves little must take all the advantages they can get to raise themselves to a sight of Christ. Let not dwarfs despair, with good help, by aiming high to reach high.

III. The notice Christ took of him, the call he gave him to a further acquaintance (v. 5), and the efficacy of that call, v. 6. 1. Christ invited himself to Zaccheus's house. Christ looked up into the tree, and saw Zaccheus. He came to look upon Christ, but little thought of being taken notice of by Christ. See how Christ prevented him with the blessings of his goodness, and outdid his expectations; and see how he encouraged very weak beginnings. He that had a mind to know Christ shall be known of him; he that only courted to see him shall be admitted to converse with him. And sometimes those that come to hear the word of Christ, as Zaccheus did, only for curiosity, have their consciences awakened, and their hearts changed. Christ called him by name, Zaccheus. He bade him make haste, and come down. Zaccheus must not hesitate, but hasten. He must come down, for Christ intends this day to bait at his house, and stay an hour or two with him. 2. Zaccheus was overjoyed to have such an honour put upon his house (v. 6): He made haste, and came down, and received him joyfully; and his receiving him into his house was an indication and token of his receiving him into his heart. How often has Christ said to us, Open to me, when we have made excuses! Zaccheus's forwardness to receive Christ will shame us.

IV. The offence which the people took. Those narrow-souled censorious Jews murmured, saying that he was gone to be a guest with a man that is a sinner; and were not they themselves sinful men? Was it not Christ's errand to seek and save men that are sinners? Now this was very unjust to blame Christ for going to his house: 1. Though he was a publican, and many of the publicans were bad men, it did not therefore follow that they were all so. We must take heed of condemning men in the lump, for at God's bar every man will be judged as he is. 2. Though he had been a sinner, it did not therefore follow that thus? "And he, casting away his garment"—how lively is this touch, evidently of an eye-witness, expressive of his earnestness and joy—"came to Jesus" (Mark 10:49, 50). 41-43. What wilt thou . . .—to try them; to deepen their present consciousness of need; and to draw out their faith in Him. Lord "Rabboni" (Mark 10:51); an emphatic and confiding exclamation. (See on John 9.)

Vss. 1-10. ZACCHEUS THE PUBLICAN. The name is Jewish.

2-4. chief among the publicans—farming a considerable district, with others under him. rich—Illgotten riches some of it certainly was. (See on vs. 8).

3. who he was—what sort of person. Curiosity then was his only motive, though his determination not to be baulked was overruled for more than he sought.

4. sycamore—the Egyptian fig, with leaves like the mulberry.

5, 6. looked up . . .—in the full knowledge of who was in the tree, and preparatory to addressing him.

Zaccheus . . . whom he had never seen in the flesh, nor probably heard of. "He calleth His own sheep by name and leadeth them out" (John 10:3). make haste, and come down—to which he literally responded—"he made haste and came down." for to-day . . .—Our Lord invites Himself, and in royal style, which waits not for invitations, but as the honor is done to the subject, not the sovereign, announces the purpose of royalty to partake of the subject's hospitalities. Manifestly our Lord speaks as knowing how the privilege would be appreciated. to-day . . . abide—(Cf. John 1:39), probably over night. 6. joyfully—Whence this so sudden "joy" in the cold bosom of an avaricious publican? The internal revolution was as perfect as instantaneous. "He spake and it was done." "Then shall the lame man leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing" (Isa. 35:6). 7. to be guest—or lodge: something more than "eating with" such (ch. 15:2). a sinner—that was one but a minute ago, but now is

That our eyes may be opened. He who feels his own sore, and the plague of his heart, has no great need of a prompter in prayer. A hungry man can easily ask bread; he has no need to go to a book to get expressions to state his wants in. His hunger tells him he wants food, and he tells this to the person from whom he expects relief.

CHAPTER 19

1. Entered and passed through. "Was passing through." Our Lord had not as yet passed through Jericho—He was only "passing" through it; for the house of Zacchaeus, in which He was to lodge, v. 5, was in it.

2. Zacchaeus. It is not unlikely that this person was a Jew by birth; see v. 9. But because he had engaged in a business so infamous, in the eyes of the Jews, he was considered as a mere heathen, v. 7. Chief among the publicans. Either a farmer-general of the taxes, who had subordinate collectors under him, or else the most respectable and honorable man among that class at Jericho. He was rich. And therefore the more unlikely to pay attention to an impoverished Messiah, preaching a doctrine of universal mortification and self-denial.

3. And he sought to see Jesus who he was. So the mere principle of curiosity in him led to his conversion and salvation, and to that of his whole family, v. 9.

4. He ran before. The shortness of his stature was amply compensated by his agility and invention. Had he been as tall as the generality of the crowd, he might have been equally unnoticed with the rest. His getting into the tree made him conspicuous; had he not been so low of stature he would not have done so. Even the imperfections of our persons may become subservient to the grace of God in our eternal salvation. As the Passover was at hand, the road was probably crowded with people going to Jerusalem, but the fame of the cure of the blind man was probably the cause of the concourse at this time.

6. Received him joyfully. He had now seen who He was, and he wished to hear what He was; and therefore he rejoiced in the honor that God had now conferred upon him. How often does Christ make the proposal of lodging, not only in our house, but in our heart, without its being accepted!

7. To be guest with a man that is a sinner. Meaning either that he was a heathen or, though by birth a Jew, yet as bad as a heathen, because of his unholy and oppressive office.

he was now as bad as he had been. God allows room for repentance, and so must we. 3. Though he was now a sinner, they ought not to blame Christ for going to him. Whither should the physician go but to the sick?

V. The proofs which Zaccheus gave publicly that he was now a penitent, v. 8. By his good works he will evidence the sincerity of his faith and repentance. He stood, which denotes his saying it deliberately and with solemnity, in the nature of a vow to God. He addressed himself to Christ in it, not to the people, but to the Lord. He makes it appear that there is a change in his heart (and that is repentance), for there is a change in his way.

1. Zaccheus had a good estate. He resolves that for the future he will be all towards God, and do good to others with it: Behold, Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor. "I do give it now," saith Zaccheus; "though hitherto I have been uncharitable to the poor, now I will relieve them, and give so much the more for having neglected the duty so long, even the half of my goods." Zaccheus would give one moiety to the poor, which would oblige him to retrench all his extravagant expenses. This he mentions here as a fruit of his repentance.

2. Zaccheus was conscious to himself that he had not gotten all he had honestly and fairly. He promises to make restitution: "If I have taken anything from any man by false accusation, exacting more than was appointed, I promise to restore him four-fold." (1) He seems plainly to own that he had done wrong. True penitents will own themselves not only in general guilty before God, but will particularly reflect upon that which, by reason of their business and employment in the world, has most easily beset them. (2) He admits that he had done wrong by false accusation. They had the ear of the government, which gave them an opportunity of gratifying their revenge if they bore a man an ill will. (3) He promises to restore four-fold. He does not say, "If I be sued, and compelled to it, I will make restitution" (some are honest when they cannot help it); but he will do it voluntarily. Those who are convinced of having done wrong cannot evidence the sincerity of their repentance but by making restitution. He does not think that his giving half his estate to the poor will atone for the wrong he has done. It is no charity, but hypocrisy, to give that which is none of our own; and we are not to reckon that our own which we have not come honestly by.

VI. Christ's approbation and acceptance of Zaccheus's conversion, v. 9, 10.

1. Zaccheus is declared to be now a happy man. This day is salvation come to this house. Now that he is converted he is in effect saved. Christ is come to his house, and, where Christ comes, he brings salvation along with him. Yet this is not all. Salvation this day comes to his house. (1) When Zaccheus becomes a convert, he will be, more than he had been, a blessing to his house. He will bring the means of grace and salvation to his house. He that is charitable to the poor does a kindness to his own house, and brings a blessing upon it. (2) When Zaccheus is brought to Christ himself his family also become related to Christ, and so salvation comes to his house, for that he is a son of Abraham, that blessing of Abraham which comes upon the publicans, upon the Gentiles, through faith, that God will be a God to them and to their children. Zaccheus is by birth a son of Abraham, but, being a publican, he was deemed a heathen. Being a true penitent, he is become as good a son of Abraham as if he had never been a publican.

2. What Christ had done was consonant to the great design and intention of his coming into the world, v. 10. With the same argument he had before justified his conversing with publicans, Matt. ix. 13. There he pleaded that he came to call sinners to repentance; now that he came to seek and save that which was lost. (1) The deplorable case of the sons of men: they were lost. The whole world of mankind, by the fall, is become a lost world: as a traveller is lost when he has missed his way in a wilderness, as a sick man is lost when his disease is incurable. (2) The gracious design of the Son of God: he came to seek and save, to seek in order to saving. He came from heaven to earth (a long journey), to seek that which was lost (which had wandered and gone astray), and to bring it back (Matt. xviii. 11, 12), and to save that which was lost, which was perishing. Christ undertook the cause when it was given up for lost. Christ came into this lost world to seek and save it. His design was to save. In prosecution of that design, he sought, took all probable means to effect that salvation. He seeks those that sought him not, and asked not for him, as Zaccheus here.

not. This mighty change, however, was all unknown to them. But they shall know it presently. "Sinner" would refer both to his office, vile in the eyes of a Jew, and to his character, which it is evident was not good. 8-10. stood—before all.

said unto the Lord, Behold, Lord—Mark how frequently Luke uses this title, and always where lordly authority, dignity, or power is intended.

if I have—i.e., "so far as I have," for evidently the "if" is so used (as in Philippians 4:8). taken by false accusation—defrauded, overcharged (ch. 3:12, 13). fourfold—The Roman law required this; the Jewish law, but the principal and a fifth more (Num. 5: 7). There was no demand made for either; but, as if to revenge himself on his hitherto reigning sin (see on John 20:28), and to testify the change he had experienced, besides surrendering the half of his fair gains to the poor, he voluntarily determines to give up all that was ill-gotten, quadrupled. He gratefully addressed this to the "Lord," to whom he owed the wonderful change.

9. Jesus said unto him—but also before all. This day . . .—memorable saying! Salvation already come, but not a day old. to this house—so expressed probably to meet the taunt, "He is gone to be guest . . ." The house is no longer polluted; it is now fit to receive Me. But salvation to a house is an exceedingly precious idea, expressing the new air that would henceforth breathe in it, and the new impulses from its head which would reach its members (Ps. 118:15; Acts 16:15, 16, 31). son of Abraham—He was that by birth, but here it means a partaker of his faith, being mentioned as the sufficient explanation of salvation having come to him.

10. lost—and such "lost" ones as this Zaccheus. (See on ch. 15:32). What encouragement is there in this narrative to hope for unexpected conversions!

ADAM CLARKE

8. If I have taken any thing . . . by false accusation. Esychophantesa, from sychon, "a fig," and phaino, "I show or declare"; for among the primitive Athenians, when the use of that fruit was first found out, or in the time of a dearth when all sorts of provisions were exceedingly scarce, it was enacted that no figs should be exported from Attica; and this law (not being actually repealed when a plentiful harvest had rendered it useless by taking away the reason of it) gave occasion to ill-natured and malicious fellows to accuse all persons they found breaking the letter of it; and from them all busy informers have ever since been branded with the name of "sycophants." I restore him fourfold. This restitution the Roman laws obliged the taxgatherers to make, when it was proved they had abused their power by oppressing the people. See the observations at the end of Genesis xlii and Num. v. 7.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

The one transforming agency is the love of Christ received into the heart. I do not suppose that Zacchaeus knew as much about Jesus Christ even after the conversation as we do; nor did he see His love in that supreme death on the cross as we do. But the love of the Lord made a deep dint in his heart and revolutionized his whole nature. The thing that will alter the whole current and set of a man's affections, that will upset his estimate of the relative value of material and spiritual, and that will turn him inside out and upside down, and make a new man of him, is the revelation of the supreme love that in Jesus Christ has come into the world, with an individualizing regard to each of us, and has died on the cross for the salvation of us all. Nothing else will do it. People had frowned on Zacchaeus and it made him bitter. They had execrated and persecuted him; and his only response was setting his teeth more firmly and turning the screw a little tighter when he had the chance. You can drive a man into devilry by contempt. If you want to melt him into goodness, try love. The one transforming power is faith in the love of Jesus Christ.

Further, the one test of a true reception of Him is the abandonment of past evil and restitution for it as far as possible. People say that our Gospel is unreal and sentimental, and a number of other ugly adjectives. Well! If it ever is so, it is the fault of the speakers and not of the Gospel. For its demands from every man that accepts it are intensely practical, and nothing short of a complete turning of his back upon his old self, shown in the conclusive forsaking of former evil, however profitable or pleasant, and reparation for harm done to men, satisfies them.—Expositions of Holy Scripture

Verses 11–27

Our Lord Jesus is now upon his way to Jerusalem, to his last passover.

I. How the expectations of his friends were raised upon this occasion: They thought that the kingdom of God would immediately appear, v. 11. The Pharisees expected it about this time (ch. xvii. 20), and, it seems, so did Christ's own disciples. The disciples thought that their Master would introduce it, but with temporal pomp and power. Jerusalem, they concluded, must be the seat of his kingdom, and therefore, now that he is going directly thither, they doubt not but in a little time to see him upon the throne there. Even good men are subject to mistakes concerning the kingdom of Christ.

II. How their expectations were checked, and the mistakes rectified; and this he does in three things:—

1. They expected that he should appear in his glory now presently, but he tells them that he must not be publicly installed in his kingdom for a great while yet. He is like a certain nobleman, he goes into a far country, to receive for himself a kingdom. He must receive the kingdom, and then return. Christ returned when the Spirit was poured out, when Jerusalem was destroyed. But his chief return here meant is that at the great day, of which we are yet in expectation.

2. They expected that his apostles and immediate attendants should be advanced to dignity and honour, that they should all be made princes and peers, privy-counsellors and judges, and have all the pomp and preferments of the court and of the town. But Christ here tells them that, instead of this, he designed them to be men of business; they must expect no other preferment in this world than that of the trading end of the town; he would set them up with a stock under their hands, that they might employ it themselves, in serving him and the interest of his kingdom among men. That is the true honour of a Christian and a minister which will enable us to look upon all temporal honours with a holy contempt. The apostles had dreamed of sitting on his right hand and on his left in his kingdom, and were pleasing themselves with this dream; but Christ tells them that which would fill them with serious thoughts, instead of those aspiring ones.

(1) They have a great work to do now. Their Master leaves them, and, at parting, he gives each of them a pound. This signifies the same thing with the talents in the parable that is parallel to this (Matt. xxv). But perhaps it is in the parable thus represented to make them the more humble; their honour in this world is only that of traders, and that not of first-rate merchants. He gave these pounds to his servants, with this charge: Occupy till I come. Or, as it might much better be translated, Trade till I come—Be busy. So the word properly signifies. "Now," saith he, "mind your business, and make a business of it; set about it in good earnest, and stick to it." All Christians have business to do for Christ in this world, and ministers especially; the former were not baptized, nor the latter ordained, to be idle. Those that are called to business for Christ he furnishes with gifts necessary for their business; and, on the other hand, from those to whom he gives power he expects service. He delivers the pounds with this charge, Go work, go trade. We must continue to mind our business till our Master comes.

(2) They have a great account to make shortly. These servants are called to him that he might know what every man had gained by trading. They that trade diligently and faithfully in the service of Christ shall be gainers. Many a labouring tradesman has been a loser; but those that trade for Christ shall be gainers. The conversion of souls is the winning of them; every true convert is clear gain to Jesus Christ. Ministers are but factors for him, and to him they must give account what fish they have enclosed in the gospel-net, that is, what they have gained by trading.

First, The good account which was given by some of the servants, and the master's approbation of them. Two such are instanced, v. 16, 19. 1. They had both made considerable improvements, but not both alike; one had gained ten pounds by his trading, and another five. All that are alike faithful are not alike successful. And perhaps, though they were both faithful, one of them took more pains, and applied himself more closely to his business, than the other, and sped accordingly. 2. They both acknowledged their obligations to their Master: Lord, it is not my industry, but thy pound, that has gained ten pounds. God must have all the glory of all our gains. 3. They were both commended for their fidelity and industry: Well done, thou good servant, v. 17. And to the other he said likewise, v. 19. If he says Well done, the matter is not great who says otherwise. 4. They were 11-27. PARABLE OF THE POUNDS. A different parable from that of the Talents (Matt. 25:14-30). For, (1) This parable was spoken "when He was nigh to Jerusalem" (vs. 11); that one, some days after entering it, and from the Mount of Olives. (2) This parable was spoken to the promiscuous crowd; that, to the Twelve alone. Accordingly, (3) Besides the "servants" in this parable, who profess subjection to Him, there is a class of "citizens" who refuse to own Him, and who are treated differently, whereas in the parable of the talents, spoken to the former class alone, this latter class is omitted. (4) In the Talents, each servant receives a different number of them (5, 2, 1); in the Pounds all receive the same one pound, which is but about the 60th part of a talent; also, in the talents, each shows the same fidelity by doubling what he received (the 5 are made 10, the 2, 4); in the Pounds, each receiving the same, render a different return (one making his pound 10, another 5). Plainly, therefore, the intended lesson is different; the one illustrating equal fidelity with different degrees of advantage; the other, different degrees of improvement of the same opportunities; yet with all this difference, the parables are remarkably similar. 12. a far country—said to put down the notion that He was just on His way to set up His kingdom, and to inaugurate it by His personal presence. to receive . . . a kingdom—be invested with royalty; as when Herod went to Rome and was there made king; a striking expression of what our Lord went away for and received, "sitting down at the right hand of the Majesty on high." to return—at His second coming.

13. Occupy—"negotiate," "do business," with the resources entrusted. 14. his citizens—His proper subjects; meaning the Jews, who expressly repudiating our Lord's claims said, "We have no king but Caesar" (John 19:15). In Christendom, these correspond to infidel rejecters of Christianity, as distinguished from professed Christians.

15-26. (See on Matt. 25:19-29).

After a long time the lord of those servants cometh and reckoneth with them—That any one—within the lifetime of the apostles at least—with such words before them, should think that Jesus had given any reason to expect His Second Appearing within that period, would seem strange, did we not know the tendency of enthusiastic, ill-regulated love of His appearing ever to take this turn.

—How beautifully does this illustrate what the beloved disciple says of "boldness in the day of judgment," and his desire that "when He shall appear we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before Him at His coming!" (I John 4:17; 2:28). His lord said unto him, Well done—a single word, not of bare satisfaction, but of warm and delighted commendation. And from what Lips!-

ADAM CLARKE

11. Immediately appear. Perhaps the generality of His followers thought that on His arrival at Jerusalem He would proclaim himself king.

12. A certain nobleman. In the following parable there are two distinct morals intended: (1) the behavior of the citizens to the nobleman, and (2) the behavior of his own servants to him. (1) By the behavior of the citizens, and their punishment (verses 14, 27), we are taught that the Jews, who were the people of Christ, would reject Him, and try to prevent His reigning over them in His spiritual kingdom, and would for that crime be severely punished by the destruction of their state. And this moral is all that answers to the introductory words, v. 11, "They thought that the kingdom of God should immediately appear." (2) The other moral extends itself through the whole of the parable, viz., that the disciples of Christ, who are His servants, and who made a good improvement of the favors granted them by the gospel, should be rewarded in proportion to the improvement made under the means of grace. The meaning of the different parts of this parable appears to be as follows. A certain nobleman—The Lord Jesus, who was shortly to be crucified by the Jews. Went into a far country. Ascended to the right hand of the Divine Majesty. To receive . . . a kingdom. To take possession of the mediatorial Kingdom, the right to which, as Messiah, He had acquired by His sufferings; see Phil. ii. 8-9; Heb. i. 3, 8-9. In these words there is an allusion to the custom of those days, when they who had kingdoms or governments given unto them went to Rome to receive that dignity from the emperors. In proof of this, see Josephus, Ant., l. xiv, c. xiv, where we find Herod went to Rome to receive the sanction and authority of the Roman emperor. And, from lib. xvii, c. 3, we learn that his successors acted in the same way. And to return. To judge and punish the rebellious Jews.

13. Ten servants. All those who professed to receive His doctrine. Ten was a kind of sacred number among the Hebrews, as well as seven. Ten pounds. Ten minas. It appears from Ezek. xlv. 12 to have been equal to sixty shekels in money.

14. His citizens. Or "countrymen"—the Jewish people, who professed to be subjects of the kingdom of God. Hated him. Despised Him for the meanness of His birth, His crucifixion to the world, and for the holiness of His doctrine. Neither mortification nor holiness suits the dispositions of the carnal mind. Sent a message after him. As, in v. 12, there is an allusion to a person's going to Rome, when elected to be ruler of a province or kingdom, to receive that dignity from the hand of the emperor, so it is here intimated that, after the person went to receive this dignity, some of the discontented citizens took the opportunity to send an embassy to the emperor to prevent him from establishing the object of their hatred in the government. We will not have this man. The Jews rejected Jesus Christ, would not submit to His government, and a short time after this preferred even a murderer to Him.

15. When he was returned. When He came to punish the disobedient Jews, and when He shall come to judge the world. See the parable of the talents, Matt. xxv. 14, etc.

16. Lord, thy pound hath gained ten. The principal difference between this parable and that of the talents above referred to is that the mina given to each seems to point out the gift of the gospel, which is the same to all who hear it; but the talents distributed in different proportions according to each man's ability seem to intimate that God has given different capacities and advantages to men, by which this one gift of the gospel may be differently improved.

MATTHEW HENRY

preferred in proportion to the improvement they had made: "Because thou hast been faithful in a very little, have thou authority over ten cities." Those are in a fair way to rise who are content to begin low. Two things are hereby promised the apostles: (1) That when they have taken pains to plant many churches they shall have great respect paid them, and have a great interest in the love and esteem of good Christians. (2) That, when they have served their generation, according to the will of Christ, in the other world they shall reign as kings with Christ. The happiness of heaven will be a much greater advancement to a good minister or Christian than it would be to a poor tradesman to be made governor of ten cities. He that had gained but five pounds had dominion over five cities. There are degrees of glory in heaven; every vessel will be alike full, but not alike large. And the degrees of glory there will be according to the degrees of usefulness here.

Secondly, The bad account that was given by one of them, and the sentence passed upon him, v. 20, &c. 1. He owned that he had not traded with the pound with which he had been entrusted (v. 20): "Lord, behold, here is thy pound; it is true, I have not made it more, but withal I have not made it less; I have kept it safely laid up in a napkin." This represents the carelessness of those who have gifts, but never lay out themselves to do good with them. It is all one to them whether the interests of Christ's kingdom sink or swim, go backward or forward; for their parts, they will take no care about it. Those are the servants that lay up their pound in a napkin who think it enough to say that they have done no hurt in the world, but did no good. 2. He justified himself with a plea that made the matter worse and not better (v. 21): I feared thee, because thou art an austere man. Austere is the Greek word itself: a sharp man: Thou takest up that which thou laidst not down. He thought that it was reaping where he did not sow; whereas really it was reaping where he had sown. He had no reason to fear his master's austerity. This was a mere sham, a frivolous groundless excuse for his idleness. 3. His excuse is turned upon him: Out of thine own mouth will I judge thee, thou wicked servant, v. 22. He will be condemned by his crime, but self-condemned by his plea. If thou hadst had any regard to my interest, thou mightest have put my money into the bank, that I might have had, not only my own, but my own with usury. If he durst not trade for fear of losing the principal, yet that would be no excuse for his not setting it out to interest, where it would be sure. Whatever may be the pretences of slothful professors, the true reason of it is a reigning indifference to the interests of Christ and his kingdom. They care not whether religion gets ground or loses ground, so long as they can but live at ease. 4 His pound is taken from him, v. 34. It is fit that those should lose their gifts who will not use them. Take from him the pound. 5. It is given to him that had the ten pounds. When this was objected against because he had so much already (Lord, he has ten pounds v. 25), it is answered (v. 26), Unto everyone that hath shall be given. It is the rule of justice, (1) That those should be most encouraged who have been most industrious. To him that hath gotten shall more be given, that he may be in a capacity to get more. (2) That those who have their gifts, as if they had them not, should be deprived of them. To those who endeavour to increase the grace they have, God will impart more; those who neglect it, and suffer it to decline, can expect no other than that God should do so too.

3. Another thing they expected was, that, when the kingdom of God should appear, the body of the Jewish nation would immediately fall in with it. Christ tells them that, after his departure, the generality of them would persist in their obstinacy and rebellion. This is shown here,

(1) In the message which his citizens sent after him, v. 14. When he was gone to be invested in his kingdom, then they continued their enmity to him, and said, We will not have this man to reign over us. This was fulfilled in the prevailing infidelity of the Jews after the ascension of Christ. They would not submit their necks to his yoke. It speaks the language of all unbelievers; they could be content that Christ should save them, but they will not have him to reign over them.

(2) In the sentence passed upon them at his return: Those mine enemies bring hither, v. 27. When his faithful subjects are preferred and rewarded, then he will take vengeance on his enemies. When the kingdom of God appeared then vengeance was taken on those irreconcilable enemies to Christ and his government; they were brought forth and slain before him. But this is applicable to all others who persist in their infidelity. Utter ruin will certainly be the portion ten . . . five cities—different degrees of future gracious reward, proportioned to the measure of present fidelity.

This depicts the conduct of all those who shut up their gifts from the active service of Christ, without actually prostituting them to unworthy uses. Fitly, therefore, may it, at least, comprehend those, to whom TRENCH refers, who, in the early Church, pleaded that they had enough to do with their own souls, and were afraid of losing them in trying to save others; and so, instead of being the salt of the earth, thought rather of keeping their own saltness by withdrawing sometimes into caves and wildernesses, from all those active ministries of love by which they might have served their brethren.

Then he which had received the one talent came and said, Lord, I knew thee that thou art an hard man—harsh. The word in Luke (19:21) is "austere."—reaping where thou hast not sown, and gathering where thou hast not strawed—The sense is obvious: "I knew thou wast one whom it was impossible to serve, one whom nothing would please: exacting what was impracticable, and dissatisfied with what was attainable." Thus do men secretly think of God as a hard Master, and virtually throw on Him the blame of their fruitlessness. 25. And I was afraid—of making matters worse by meddling with it at all.

Thou wicked and slothful servant—"Wicked" or "bad" means "falsehearted," as opposed to the others, who are emphatically styled "good servants." The addition of "slothful" is to mark the precise nature of his wickedness: it consisted, it seems, not in his doing anything against, but simply nothing for his master.

For whosoever hath—i.e., keeps; as a thing which he values. to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance—He will be rewarded by an increase of what he so much prizes. but whosoever hath not—who lets this go or lie unused, as a thing on which he sets no value. from him shall be taken away even that he hath—or as it is in Luke (8:18), "what he seemeth to have," or, thinketh he hath. This is a principle of immense importance, and, like other weighty sayings, appears to have been uttered by our Lord on more than one occasion, and in different connections. (See on ch. 25:9.) As a great ethical principle, we see it in operation everywhere, under the general law of habit; in virtue of which moral principles become stronger by exercise, while by disuse, or the exercise of their contraries, they wax weaker, and at length expire. The same principle reigns in the intellectual world, and even in the animal—if not in the vegetable also—as the facts of physiology sufficiently prove. Here, however, it is viewed as a divine ordination, as a judicial retribution in continual operation under the divine administration.

ADAM CLARKE

17. Over ten cities. This is to be understood as referring to the new kingdom which the nobleman had just received. His former trustiest and most faithful servants he now represents as being made governors under him over a number of cities, according to the capacity he found in each, which capacity was known by by the improvement of the minas.

20. Lord, behold, here is thy pound. See Matt. xxv. 18.

(1) See the ingratitude of this servant. His master gave him a talent, capable of being improved to his own present and eternal advantage; but he slights the mercy of his lord. (2) See his idleness. Rather than exert himself to improve what he has received, he goes and hides it. (3) See his gross error. He digs to hide it—puts himself to more trouble to render the mercy of God to him of none effect than he would have had in combating and conquering the world, the devil, and the flesh. (4) See his injustice. He takes his master's money, and neither improves nor designs to improve it, even while he is living on and consuming that bounty which would have been sufficient for a faithful servant. (5) Hear the absurdity of his reasoning. Lord, I knew thee that thou art an hard (or avaricious) man, reaping where thou hast not sown, v. 24. The wicked excuse of this faithless servant confuted itself and condemned him.

23. With usury. "With its produce," i.e., what the loan of the money is fairly worth, after paying the person sufficiently for using it.

26. And from him that hath not. See this particularly explained, Matt. xiii. 12.

Whosoever hath, to him shall be given. This is an allusion to a common custom in all countries. He who possesses much or is rich, to such a person presents are ordinarily given. Whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that he hath. That is, the poor man; he that has little may be easily made a prey of, and so lose his little.

27. Those mine enemies . . . bring hither. The Jews, whom I shall shortly slay by the sword of the Romans.

MATTHEW HENRY

of all Christ's enemies. Bring them hither, to have their frivolous pleas overruled, and to receive sentence according to their merits. Those that will not have Christ to reign over them shall be reputed and dealt with as his enemies. Those will be accounted so that will not submit to Christ's yoke, but will be their own masters. Whoever will not be ruled by the grace of Christ will inevitably be ruined by the wrath of Christ.

Verses 28–40

We have here the same account of Christ's riding in some sort of triumph (such as it was) into Jerusalem which we had before in Matthew and Mark.

I. Jesus Christ was forward and willing to suffer and die for us. He went forward to Jerusalem knowing very well the things that should befall him there, and yet he went before, ascending up to Jerusalem, v. 28. He was the foremost of the company. Was he so forward to suffer and die for us, and shall we draw back from any service we are capable of doing for him?

II. It was no ways inconsistent either with Christ's humility or with this present state of humiliation to make a public entry into Jerusalem a little before he died. The ignominy of his death might appear the greater.

III. Christ is entitled to a dominion over all the creatures. Christ sent to fetch an ass and her colt from their owner's and master's crib, when he had occasion for their service.

IV. Christ has all men's hearts both under his eye and in his hand. He could influence those to whom the ass and the colt belonged to consent to their taking them away, as soon as they were told that the Lord had occasion for them.

V. Those that go on Christ's errands are sure to speed (v. 32). It is a comfort to Christ's messengers that they shall bring what they are sent for, if indeed the Lord has occasion for it.

VI. The disciples of Christ, who fetch that for him from others which he has occasion for, should not think that enough, but, whatever they have themselves wherewith he may be served, they should be ready to serve him with it. Those disciples not only fetched the ass's colt for him, but cast their own garments upon the colt.

VII. Christ's triumphs are the matter of his disciples' praises. When Christ came nigh to Jerusalem, God put it of a sudden into the hearts of the whole multitude of the disciples, not of the twelve only, to rejoice and praise God (v. 37), and the spreading of their clothes in the way (v. 36) was a common expression of joy. Observe, What was the matter or occasion of their joy and praise. They praised God for all the mighty works they had seen, especially the raising of Lazarus, which is particularly mentioned, John xii. 17, 18. See how they expressed their joy and praise (v. 38): Blessed be the king that cometh in the name of the Lord. Christ is the king; he comes in the name of the Lord. Blessed be he. Let us praise him, let God prosper him. Peace in heaven. Let the God of heaven send peace and success to his undertaking, and then there will be glory in the highest. Compare this song of the saints on earth with that of the angels, ch. ii. 14. They both agree to give glory to God in the highest. The angels say, On earth peace. The saints say, Peace in heaven. Such is the communion we have with the holy angels that, as they rejoice in the peace on earth, so we rejoice in the peace in heaven.

VIII. Christ's triumphs, and his disciples' joyful praises of them, are the vexation of proud Pharisees. There were some Pharisees among the multitude who were enraged at them. They thought that he would not admit such acclamations as these, and therefore expected that he should rebuke his disciples, v. 39. As he despises the contempt of the proud, so he accepts the praises of the humble.

IX. Whether men praise Christ or no he will, and shall, and must be praised (v. 40): If these should hold their peace the stones would immediately cry out, rather than that Christ should not be praised. Pharisees would silence the praises of Christ, but they cannot gain their point; for as God can out of stones raise up children unto Abraham, so he can out of the mouths of those children perfect praise.

The great Ambassador from heaven is here making his public entry into Jerusalem, not to be respected there, but to be rejected. See here two instances of his love to that place and his concern for it.

I. The tears he shed for the approaching ruin of the city (v. 41): When he was come near, he beheld

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

27. bring hither . . .—(Cf. I Sam. 15:32, 33). Referring to the awful destruction of Jerusalem, but pointing to the final destruction of all that are found in open rebellion against Christ.

28-44. CHRIST'S TRIUMPHANT ENTRY INTO JERUSALEM, AND TEARS OVER IT. (See on Matt. 21:1-11). 29-38.

Bethphage—"house of figs," a village which with Bethany lay along the further side of Mount Olivet, east of Jerusalem. 30. whereon . . . (See on John 19:41). 31. the Lord hath need . . .—He both knew all and had the key of the human heart. (See on vs. 5.)

Perhaps the owner was a disciple. 35. set Jesus on—He allowing this, as befitting the state He was for the first and only time assuming.

37. whole multitude . . .—The language here is very grand, intended to express a burst of admiration far wider and deeper than ever had been witnessed before.

38. Blessed be the King . . .—Mark more fully, "Hosanna," i.e., "Save now," the words of Psalm 118:25, which were understood to refer to Messiah; and so they add, "to the Son of David, blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord (Ps. 118:26), Hosanna in the highest." This was the very loftiest style in which He could be saluted as the promised Deliverer. peace . . .—(See on ch. 2:13, 14).

40. the stones . . .—Hitherto the Lord had discouraged all demonstrations in His favor; latterly He had begun an opposite course; on this one occasion He seems to yield His whole soul to the wide and deep acclaim with a mysterious satisfaction, regarding it as so necessary a part of the regal dignity in which as Messiah He for this last time entered the city, that if not offered by the vast multitude, it would have been wrung out of the stones rather than be withheld (Hab. 2:11).

ADAM CLARKE

28. He went before. Perhaps it means that He walked at the head of His disciples, and that He and His disciples kept on the road before other companies who were then also on their way to Jerusalem, in order to be present at the feast.

29-38. See this Triumphal Entry into Jerusalem explained at large on Matt. xxi. 1-11 and Mark xi. 1-10.

Bethphage. A place on the west declivity of Mount Olivet, from which it is thought the whole declivity and part of the valley took their name. It is supposed to have derived its name from the fig trees which grew there.

And put on them their clothes. Thus acknowledging Him to be their King, for this was a custom observed by the people when they found that God had appointed a man to the kingdom.

Hosanna to the son of David. When persons applied to the king for help, or for a redress of grievances, they used the word hosanna. "Save now!" or "Save, we beseech thee!" Son of David. A well-known epithet of the Messiah. He that cometh in the name. He who comes in the name and authority of the Most High. Hosanna in the highest. Either meaning, Let the heavenly hosts join with us in magnifying this august Being!—or, let the utmost degrees of hosanna, of salvation, and deliverance, be communicated to Thy people! Probably there is an allusion here to the custom of the Jews in the Feast of Tabernacles. During the first seven days of that feast they went once round the altar, each day, with palm and other branches in their hands, singing hosanna. But on the eighth day of that feast they walked seven times round the altar, singing the hosanna; and this was termed the "great hosanna"; i.e., "Assist with the greatest succor."

40. If these should hold their peace, the stones would immediately cry out. Of such importance is My present conduct to you and to others, being expressly predicted by one of your own prophets, Zech. ix. 9, as pointing out the triumph of humility over pride, and of meekness over rage and malice, as signifying the salvation which I bring to the lost souls of men, that, if this multitude were silent, God would give even to the stones a voice, that the advent of the Messiah might be duly celebrated.

the city, and wept over it. Probably, it was when he was coming down the descent of the hill from the mount of Olives, where he had a full view of the city, and his eye affected his heart, and his heart his eye again. See here,

1. What a tender spirit Christ was of; we never read that he laughed, but we often find him in tears.

2. That Jesus Christ wept when all about him were rejoicing, to show how little he was elevated with the applause and acclamation of the people.

3. That he wept over Jerusalem. There are cities to be wept over, and none to be more lamented than Jerusalem. But why did Christ weep at the sight of Jerusalem? He himself gives us the reason of his tears.

(1) Jerusalem has not improved the day of her opportunities. He wept, and said, If thou hadst known, even thou at least in this thy day, the things that belong to thy peace—but thou dost not know the day of thy visitation, v. 44. The manner of speaking is abrupt: If thou hadst known! O that thou hadst, so some take it. Or, If thou hadst known, well; like that of the fig-tree, ch. xiii. 9. How happy had it been for thee! What he says lays all the blame of Jerusalem's impending ruin upon herself. [1] There are things which belong to our peace, which we are all concerned to know and understand. The things that belong to our peace are those things that relate to our present and future welfare; these we must know with application. [2] There is a time of visitation when those things which belong to our peace may be known by us. When we enjoy the means of grace in great plenty, and have the word of God powerfully preached to us—then is the time of visitation. [3] With those that have long neglected the time of their visitation, if at last their eyes be opened, and they bethink themselves, all will be well yet. Those shall not be refused that come into the vineyard at the eleventh hour. [4] It is the amazing folly of multitudes that enjoy the means of grace, that they do not improve the day of their opportunities. The things of their peace are revealed to them, but are not minded or regarded by them; they hide their eyes from them. They are not aware of the accepted time and the day of salvation, and so let it slip and perish through mere carelessness. None are so blind as those that will not see. [5] The sin and folly of those that persist in a contempt of gospel grace are a great grief to the Lord Jesus, and should be so to us. He looks with weeping eyes upon lost souls, that continue impenitent. He had rather that they would turn and live than go on and die, for he is not willing that any should perish.

(2) Jerusalem cannot escape the day of her desolation. The things of her peace are now in a manner hidden from her eyes. Not but that after this the gospel was preached to them by the apostles, and multitudes were convinced and converted. But as to the body of the nation, and the leading part of it, they were sealed up under unbelief. They were justly given up to judicial blindness and hardness. Neglecting the great salvation often brings temporal judgments upon a people; it did so upon Jerusalem. [1] The Romans besieged the city, cast a trench about it, compassed it round, and kept their inhabitants in on every side. [2] They laid it even with the ground. Titus commanded his soldiers to dig up the city, and the whole compass of it was levelled, except three towers. Not only the city, but the citizens were laid even with the ground (thy children within thee), by the cruel slaughters that were made of them: and there was scarcely one stone left upon another. This was because they knew not the day of their visitation.

II. The zeal he showed for the present purification of the temple.

1. Christ cleared it of those who profaned it. He went straight to the temple, and began to cast out the buyers and sellers, v. 45. Its purity was more its glory than its wealth was. Christ gave a reason for his dislodging the temple-merchants, v. 46. The temple is a house of prayer, set apart for communion with God: the buyers and sellers made it a den of thieves by the fraudulent bargains they made there. It would be a distraction to those who came there to pray.

2. He put it to the best use that ever it was put to, for he taught daily in the temple, v. 47. Now, when Christ preached in the temple, observe here, (1) How spiteful the church-rulers were against him (v. 47): The chief priests and scribes, and the chief of the people, sought to destroy him. (2) How respectful the common people were to him. They were very attentive to hear him. The people paid him great respect, attended on his preaching with diligence. Some read it, All the people, as they heard him, took his part; and so his enemies could not find what they might do against him.

when beheld . . . wept,—Cf. Lamentations 3:51, "Mine eye affecteth mine heart"; the heart again affecting the eye. Under this sympathetic law of the relation of mind and body, Jesus, in His beautiful, tender humanity, was constituted even as we. What a contrast to the immediately preceding profound joy! He vielded Himself alike freely to both. (See on Matt. 23:37.

42. at least in this . . .—even at this moving moment. (See on ch. 13:9). thy peace—thinking perhaps of the name of the city (Heb. 7:2) [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. How much is included in this word!

now . . . hid—It was His among His last open efforts to "gather them," but their eyes were judicially closed.

43. a trench—a rampart; first of wood, and when this was burnt, a built wall, four miles in circuit, built in three days—so determined were they. This "cut off all hope of escape," and consigned the city to unparalleled horrors. (See JOSEPHUS, Jewish Wars, vss. 6: 2; 12:3, 4.) All here predicted was with dreadful literality fulfilled.

45-48. SECOND CLEANSING OF THE TEMPLE, AND SUBSEQUENT TEACHING. 45, 46. As the first cleansing was on His first visit to Jerusalem (John 2:13-22), so this second cleansing was on His last. den of thieves—banded together for plunder, reckless of principle. The mild term "house of merchandise," used on the former occasion, was now unsuitable.

47. sought—continued seeking, i.e., daily, as He taught. 48. were very attentive to hear him—hung upon His words.

ADAM CLARKE

41. And wept over it. See Matt. xxiii. 37.

42. The things which belong unto thy peace! It is very likely that our Lord here alludes to the meaning of the word Jerusalem, yereh, "he shall see," and shalom, "peace or prosperity."

Now, because the inhabitants of it had not "seen" this "peace" and salvation, because they had refused to open their eyes, and behold this glorious light of heaven which shone among them, therefore He said, Now they are hid from thine eyes, still alluding to the import of the name.

43. Cast a trench about thee. This was literally fulfilled when this city was besieged by Titus. Josephus gives a very particular account of the building of this wall, which he says was effected in three days, though it was not less than thirty-nine furlongs in circumference; and that, when this wall and trench were completed, the Jews were so enclosed on every side that no person could escape out of the city, and no provision could be brought in, so that they were reduced to the most terrible distress by the famine which ensued. The whole account is well worth the reader's attention. See Josephus, War, book v, chap. xii, secs. 1-3.

44. The time of thy visitation. That is, the time of God's gracious offers of mercy to you. This took in all the time which elapsed from the preaching of John the Baptist to the coming of the Roman armies, which included a period of above forty years.

45. Went into the temple. See all this transaction explained, Matt. xxi. 12-16.

47. And he taught daily in the temple. This He did for five or six days before His crucifixion. Some suppose that it was on Monday in the Passion Week that He thus entered into Jerusalem and purified the Temple; and on Thursday He was seized late at night. During these four days He taught in the Temple, and lodged each night at Bethany.

48. Were very attentive to hear him. Or, "They heard Him with the utmost attention";

MATTHEW HENRY

Till his hour was come his interest in the common people protected him; but, when his hour was come, the chief priests' influence upon the common people delivered him up.

CHAPTER 20

Verses 1–8

Nothing is added here to what we had in the other evangelists; but only in the first verse, where we are told,

I. That he was now teaching the people in the temple, and preaching the gospel. Christ was a preacher of his own gospel. He not only purchased the salvation for us, but published it to us. This likewise puts an honour upon the preachers of the gospel. It puts an honour upon the popular preachers of the gospel; Christ condescended to the capacities of the people in preaching the gospel, and taught them.

II. That his enemies are here said to come upon him. The word is used only here, and it intimates,

1. That they thought to surprise him with this question; they came upon him suddenly.

2. That they thought to frighten him with this question. From this story itself we may learn, (1) That it is not to be thought strange, if even that which is evident be disputed and called in question by those that shut their eyes against the light. Christ's miracles plainly showed by what authority he did these things. (2) Those that question Christ's authority will have their folly made manifest unto all men. Christ answered these priests and scribes with a question concerning the baptism of John: Was it from heaven or of men? They all knew it was from heaven. And this question gravelled them, and ran them aground, and served to shame them before the people. (3) It is not strange if those that are governed by reputation and secular interest imprison the plainest truths, as these priests and scribes did who would not own that John's baptism was from heaven, and had no other reason why they did not say it was of men but because they feared the people. What good can be expected from men of such a spirit? (4) Those that bury the knowledge they have are justly denied further knowledge, v. 7, 8.

Verses 9–19

Christ spoke this parable against those who were resolved not to own his authority.

I. The parable has nothing added here to what we had before in Matthew and Mark. The scope of it is to show that the Jewish nation had provoked God to abandon them to ruin. It teaches us, 1. That those who enjoy the privileges of the visible church are as tenants and farmers that have a vineyard to look after, and rent to pay for it. God, by setting up revealed religion, hath planted a vineyard, which he lets out, v. 9. And they have vineyard work to do, needful and constant work, but pleasant and profitable. They have also vineyard-fruits to present to the Lord of the vineyard. There are rents to be paid and services to be done. 2. That the work of God's ministers is to call upon those who enjoy the privileges of the church to bring forth fruit accordingly. They are God's rent-gatherers, v. 10. 3. That it has often been the lot of God's faithful servants to be wretchedly abused by his own tenants. They that are resolved not to do their duty to God cannot bear to be called upon to do it. 4. That God sent his Son into the world to gather the fruits of the vineyard. The prophets spoke as servants, but Christ as a Son; to send him, one would have thought, should have won upon them. 5. That those who reject Christ's ministers would reject Christ himself. They said, This is the heir, come let us kill him. When they slew the servants, there were other servants sent. "But, if we can but be the death of the son, there is never another son to be sent; we may have a quiet possession of the vineyard for ourselves." Therefore they took the bold step, they cast him out of the vineyard, and killed him. 6. That the putting of Christ to death filled up the measure of the Jewish iniquity. No other could be expected than that God should destroy those wicked husbandmen. Those that live in the neglect of their duty to God know not what degrees of sin and destruction they are running themselves into.

II. To the application of the parable is added here, which we had not before, their deprecation of the doom included in it (v. 16): When they heard it, they said, God forbid—Let not this be done, so it should be read. And see what a cheat they put upon themselves, to think to avoid it by a cold God forbid, when they do nothing towards the preventing of it. Now observe what Christ said. 1. He beheld them. This is taken notice of only by this evangelist, v. 17. He looked upon them with pity and compassion. He 9-13. vineyard—(See on ch. 13:6). In Matthew 21:33 additional points are given, taken literally from Isaiah 5:2, to fix down the application and sustain it by Old Testament authority. husbandmen—the ordinary spiritual guides of the people, under whose care and culture the fruits of righteousness might be yielded. went . . .—leaving it to the laws of the spiritual husbandry during the whole length of the Jewish economy. (Cf. Heb. 3:3-6.) it may be—"surely"; implying the almost unimaginable guilt of not doing so. 14. reasoned among themselves . . .—(Cf. Genesis 37:18-20; John 11:47-53). the heir—sublime expression of the great truth, that God's inheritance was destined for, and in due time to come into the possession of, His Son in our nature (Heb. 1:2). inheritance . . . ours—and so from mere servants we may become lords; the deep aim of the depraved heart, and literally "the root of all evil." 15. cast him out of the vineyard—(Cf. Hebrews 13:11-13; I Kings 21:13; John 19:17). 16. He shall come . . .—This answer was given by the Pharisees themselves (Matt. 21: 41), thus pronouncing their own righteous doom. Matthew alone (21:43) gives the naked application, that "the kingdom of God should be taken from them, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof"—the great evangelical community of the faithful, chiefly Gentiles. God forbid—His whole meaning now bursting upon them. 17-19. written—(in Ps. 118:22, 23. literally, "They hung upon Him, hearing." The same form of speech is used often by both Greek and Latin writers of the best repute.

CHAPTER 20

1. One of those days. Supposed to have been one of the four last days of His life, mentioned in chap. xix. 47, probably Tuesday before the Passover.

2. By what authority. See the note on Matt. xxi. 23-27.

By what authority doest thou these things? The things which the chief priests allude to were His receiving the acclamations of the people as the promised Messiah, His casting the traders out of the Temple, and His teaching the people publicly in it.

The baptism of John. Had John a divine commission or not for his baptism and preaching? Our Lord here takes the wise in their own cunning. He knew the estimation John was in among the people, and He plainly saw that if they gave any answer at all they must convict themselves; and so they saw, when they came to examine the question.

We cannot tell, said they; which, in the words of truth, should have been, "We will not tell," for we will not have this man for the Messiah; because, if we acknowledge John as His forerunner, we must, of necessity, receive Jesus as the Christ.

9. A certain man planted a vineyard. See this parable largely explained, Matt. xxi. 33-46. See also on Mark xii. 4-9.

He sent his servants. Prophets, which, from time to time, He sent to the Jewish nation to call both priests and people back to the purity of His holy religion. Receive the fruits of it. Alluding to the ancient custom of paying the rent of a farm in kind; that is, by a part of the produce of the farm.

Beat one. "Took his skin off, flayed him," probably alluding to some who had been excessively scourged.

Other servants. There is not a moment in which God does not shower down His gifts upon men, and require the fruit of them. More than the first. Or more honorable.

Last of all he sent . . . his son. This requires no comment. Our Lord plainly means himself. They will reverence. They will reflect upon their conduct and blush for shame because of it, when they see my son.

Said among themselves. Alluding to the conspiracies which were then forming against the life of our blessed Lord, in the councils of the Jewish elders and chief priests. See chap. xxvii. 1.

Cast him out of the vineyard. Utterly rejected the counsel of God against themselves, and would neither acknowledge the authority of Christ nor submit to His teaching.

16. God forbid. Or, "Let it not be." Our phrase, God forbid, answers pretty well to the meaning of the Greek, but it is no translation.

MATTHEW HENRY

beheld them, to see if they would blush at their own folly. 2. He referred them to the scripture: "What is this then that is written? The stone which the builders rejected is become the head of the corner." The Lord Jesus will be exalted to the Father's right hand. Even those that stumble at him shall be broken—it will be their ruin; but as to those that not only reject him, but hate and persecute him, he will fall upon them and crush them to pieces—will grind them to powder.

Lastly, We are told how the chief priests and scribes were exasperated by this parable (v. 19): They perceived that he had spoken this parable against them. They fall into a rage at him and sought to lay hands on him. And it was only because they feared the people, that they did not now fly in his face, and take him by the throat. They were just ready to make his words good: This is the heir, come let us kill him. Christ tells them that instead of kissing the Son of God they would kill him. They do, in effect, say this: "And so we will; have at him now." And, though they deprecate the punishment of the sin, in the next breath they are projecting the commission of it.

We have here Christ's evading a snare which his enemies laid for him, by proposing a question to him about tribute.

I. The mischief designed him. The plot was to deliver him unto the power and authority of the governor, v. 20. They could not themselves put him to death by course of law, nor otherwise than by a popular tumult. They hoped to gain their point, if they could but incense the governor against him. Thus Christ's word must be fulfilled that he should be delivered into the hands of the Gentiles.

II. The persons they employed. They were spies, who should feign themselves just men. It is no new thing for bad men to feign themselves just men. A spy must go in disguise. These spies must take on them to have a value for Christ's judgment, and therefore must desire his advice in a case of conscience.

III. The question they proposed. Their preface is very courtly: Master, we know that thou sayest and teachest rightly, v. 21. Thus they thought to flatter him into an incautious freedom and openness with them. They were much mistaken who thought thus to impose upon the humble Jesus. He accepts not the person of any, but it is as true that he knows the hearts of all, and knew theirs, though they spoke fair. It was certain that he taught the way of God truly; but he knew that they were unworthy to be taught by him, who came to take hold of his words, not to be taken hold of by them. Their case is very nice: "Is it lawful for us" (this is added here in Luke), "to give tribute to Caesar?" Their pride and covetousness made them loth to pay taxes, and then they would have it a question whether it was lawful or no. Now if Christ should say that it was lawful the people would take it ill. But if he should say that it was not lawful as they expected he would, then they should have something to accuse him of to the governor.

IV. His evading the snare which they laid for him: He perceived their craftiness, v. 23. He did not give them a direct answer, but reproved them for offering to impose upon him—Why tempt ye me? Show me a penny; he asked them whose money it was, whose stamp it bore, who coined it. They owned, "It is Caesar's money." "Why then," saith Christ, "you should first have asked whether it was lawful to pay and receive Caesar's money among yourselves, and to admit that to be the instrument of your commerce. You must therefore render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's. But in sacred things God only is your King. You must render to God the things that are God's."

V. The confusion they were hereby put into, v. 26. The snare is broken: They could not take hold of his words before the people. They marvelled at his answer, it was so discreet and unexceptionable. Their mouths are stopped; they held their peace. They durst ask him nothing else, lest he should shame and expose them.

I. In every age there have been men of corrupt minds, that have endeavoured to subvert the fundamental principles of revealed religion. The Sadducees deny that there is any resurrection, any future state, no world of spirits, no state of recompense and retribution for what was done in the body. Take away this, and all religion falls to the ground.

II. It is common for those that design to undermine any truth of God to perplex it. So these Sadducees did when they would weaken people's faith in the doctrine of the resurrection. The case perhaps the spiritual builders, is, by the great Lord of the House, made the keystone of the whole. On that Stone the builders were now "falling" and being "broken" (Isa. 8:15), "sustaining great spiritual hurt; but soon that Stone should fall upon them and grind them to powder" (Dan. 2:34, 35; Zech. 12:3)—in their corporate capacity in the tremendous destruction of Jerusalem, but personally, as unbelievers, in a more awful sense still. 19. the same hour—hardly able to restrain their rage.

The stone. R. Solom. Jarchi, on Micah v, says this stone means the Messiah. This seems to have been originally spoken of David, who was at first rejected by the Jewish rulers, but was afterwards chosen by the Lord to be the great ruler of His people, Israel. The quotation is taken from Ps. cxviii. 22. The builders. The chief priests and elders of the people, with the doctors of the law. Rejected. An expression borrowed from masons, who, finding a stone, which being tried in a particular place, and appearing improper for it, is thrown aside, and another taken; however, at last, it may happen that the very stone which had been before rejected may be found the most suitable as the headstone of the corner.

18. Grind him to powder. See on Matt. xxi. 44.

20. They watched him. "Insidiously watching."

See on chap. xiv. 1. Spies. One who crouches in some secret place to spy, listen, catch, or hurt. Hesychius explains the word by "those who lie in wait," or in "ambush," to surprise and slay. Josephus uses the word to signify a person bribed for a particular purpose. No doubt the persons mentioned in the text were men of the basest principles and were hired by the malicious Pharisees to do what they attempted in vain to perform.

22. Is it lawful for us to give tribute unto Caesar? See this insidious but important question considered at large on Matt. xxii. 16-22.

Whose is this image and superscription? He knew well enough whose they were, but He showed the excellency of His wisdom in making them answer to their own confusion. They came to ensnare our Lord in His discourse, and now they are ensnared in their own. He who digs a pit for his neighbor ordinarily falls into it himself.

They say unto him, Caesar's. The image was the head of the emperor; the superscription, his titles. Tiberius was emperor at this time. Render therefore unto Caesar. The conclusion is drawn from their own premises. You acknowledge this to be Caesar's coin; this coin is current in your land; the currency of this coin shows the country to be under the Roman government; and your acknowledgment that it is Caesar's proves you have submitted. Do not, therefore, be unjust; but render to Caesar the things which you acknowledge to be his; at the same time, be not impious, but render unto God the things which belong to God. The image of princes stamped on their coin denotes that temporal things belong all to their government. The image of God stamped on the soul denotes that all its faculties and powers belong to the Most High, and should be employed in His service.

When they had heard these words, they marvelled. And well they might—"Never man spake like this man." By this decision Caesar is satisfied—he gets his own to the uttermost farthing. God is glorified—His honor is in every respect secured. And the people are edified—one of the most difficult questions that could possibly come before them is answered in such a way as to relieve their consciences and direct their conduct.

was matter of fact of a woman that had seven husbands. Now in the resurrection whose wife shall she be?

III. There is a great deal of difference between the state of the children of men on earth and that of the children of God in heaven.

1. The children of men in this world marry, and are given in marriage. Much of our business in this world is to raise and build up families, and to provide for them. Much of our pleasure in this world is in our relations, our wives and children; nature inclines to it. Marriage is instituted for the comfort of human life.

2. The world to come is quite another thing; it is called that world, by way of emphasis and eminency.

(1) Who shall be the inhabitants of that world: They that shall be accounted worthy to obtain it. They have not a legal worthiness, but an evangelical worthiness. It is a worthiness imputed by which we are glorified, as well as a righteousness imputed by which we are justified. They are by grace made and counted worthy to obtain that world; it intimates some difficulty in reaching after it, and danger of coming short. We must so run as that we may obtain. They shall obtain the resurrection from the dead, that is, the blessed resurrection.

(2) What shall be the happy state of the inhabitants of that world we cannot express or conceive, 1. Cor. ii. 9. See what Christ here says of it. [1] They neither marry nor are given in marriage. Those that have entered into the joy of their Lord are entirely taken up with that. Into that new Jerusalem there enters nothing that defiles. [2] They cannot die any more; and this comes in as a reason why they do not marry. Where there are no burials, there is no need of weddings. This crowns the comfort of that world that there is no more death there. Here death reigns, but thence it is for ever excluded. [3] They are equal unto the angels. In the other evangelists it was said, They are as the angels, but here they are said to be equal to the angels—angels' peers; they have a glory and bliss no way inferior to that of the holy angels. Saints, when they come to heaven, shall be naturalised. They have in all respects equal privileges with them that were free-born, the angels that are the natives and aborigines of that country. [4] They are the children of God, and so they are as the angels. We have the nature and disposition of sons, but that will not be perfected till we come to heaven. [5] They are the children of the resurrection, that is, they are made capable of the employments and enjoyments of the future state. They are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection.

IV. It is an undoubted truth that there is another life after this (v. 37, 38): Moses showed this, as it was shown to Moses at the bush, when he calleth the Lord, the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, were then dead as to our world; they had departed out of it many years before; how then could God say, not I was, but I am the God of Abraham? We must therefore conclude that they were then in being in another world; for God is not the God of the dead, but of the living. Luke here adds, For all live unto him, that is, all who, like them, are true believers; though they are dead, yet they do live. But there is more in it yet; when God called himself the God of these patriarchs, he meant that he was their felicity and portion, their exceeding great reward, Gen. xv. 1. Therefore there must be another life after this, in which he will do that for them that will amount to a discharge in full of that promise.

The scribes were students in the law, and expositors of it to the people, men in reputation for wisdom and honour, but the generality of them were enemies to Christ and his gospel.

I. We have them here commending the reply which Christ made to the Sadducees: Certain of the scribes said, Master, thou hast well said, v. 39. Even the scribes commended his performance, and owned that he said well. Many that call themselves Christians come short even of this spirit.

II. We have them here struck with an awe of Christ, and of his wisdom and authority (v. 40): They durst not ask him any questions at all. His own disciples, being willing to receive his doctrine, durst ask him any question; but the Sadducees durst ask him none.

III. We have them here puzzled and run aground with a question concerning the Messiah, v. 41. It was plain by many scriptures that Christ was to be the Son of David; even the blind man knew this (ch. xviii. 39); and yet it was plain that David called the Messiah his Lord (v. 42, 44): The Lord said to my Lord, Ps. cx. 1. Now if he be his Son, why doth he call him his Lord? If he be his Lord, why do we call him his Son? They could not reconcile this

34. said unto them—In Matthew 22:29, the reply begins with this important statement:—"Ye do err, not knowing the Scriptures," regarding the future state, "nor the power of God," before which a thousand such difficulties vanish (also Mark 12:24).

36. neither . . . die any more—Marriage is ordained to perpetuate the human family; but as there will be no breaches by death in the future state, this ordinance will cease. equal—or "like." unto the angels—i.e., in the immortality of their nature.

children of God—not in respect of character but nature; "being the children of the resurrection" to an undecaying existence (Rom. 8:21, 23). And thus the children of their Father's immortality (I Tim. 6:16).

37, 38. even Moses—whom they had just quoted to entangle Him. not . . . of the dead, . . . for all . . .—To God, no human being is dead, or ever will be; but all sustain an abiding conscious relation to Him. But the "all" here meant "those who shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world." These sustain a gracious covenant relation to God, which cannot be dissolved. In this sense our Lord affirms that for Moses to call the Lord the "God" of His patriarchal servants if at that moment they had no existence, would be unworthy of Him. He "would be ashamed to be called their God, if He had not prepared for them a city" (Heb. 11:16). How precious are these glimpses of the resurrection state!

39. scribes . . . well said—enjoying His victory over the Sadducees. they durst not—neither party, both for the time utterly foiled.

Whose son is He [to be]? They say unto Him, The son of David. He saith unto them, How then doth David in spirit [by the Holy Ghost, Mark 12: 36] call Him LORD?" (Matt. 22:42, 43). The dif-

34. The children of this world. Men and women in their present state of mortality and probation, procreation being necessary to restore the waste made by death, and to keep up the population of the earth.

36. Equal unto the angels. Who neither marry nor die.

38. All live unto him. There is a remarkable passage in Josephus' account of the Maccabees, chap. xvi, which proves that the best informed Jews believed that the souls of righteous men were in the presence of God in a state of happiness. "They who lose their lives for the sake of God, live unto God, as do Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and the rest of the patriarchs." So the resurrection of the dead, and the immortality and immateriality of the soul, were not strange or unknown doctrines among the Jews.

seeming contradiction; thanks be to God, we can; that Christ, as God, was David's Lord, but Christ, as man, was David's Son.

IV. We have them here described in their black characters, v. 45–47. Christ bids his disciples beware of the scribes, that is,

1. "Take heed of being drawn into sin by them; beware of such a spirit as they are governed by."

2. "Take heed of being brought into trouble by them," in the same sense that he had said (Matt. x. 17), "Beware of men, for they will deliver you up to the councils; beware of the scribes, for they will do so. Beware of them, they are proud and haughty. They desire to walk about the streets in long robes, as those that are above business, and as those that take state, and take place." They loved in their hearts to have people make their obeisance to them in the markets. They loved the highest seats in the synagogues and the chief rooms at feasts, and looked upon themselves with great conceit and upon all about them with great contempt. "They are covetous and oppressive, and make their religion a cloak and cover for crime. They devour widows' houses. For a show they make long prayers."

Christ reads them their doom in a few words: These shall receive a more abundant judgment, a double damnation. Dissembled piety is double iniquity.

devour . . .—taking advantage of their helpless condition and confiding character, to obtain possession of their property, while by their "long prayers" they made them believe they were raised far above "filthy lucre." So much "the greater damnation" awaits them. What a lifelike description of the Romish clergy, the true successors of "the scribes!"

ADAM CLARKE

46. Beware of the scribes. Take heed that you are not seduced by those who should show you the way of salvation. See on Matt. xxiii. 4-14.

The scribes and the Pharisees sit in Moses' seat. They "sat" there formerly by divine appointment; they sit there now by divine permission. What our Lord says here refers to their expounding the Scriptures, for it was the custom of the Jewish doctors to sit while they expounded the law and prophets, chap. v. 1; Luke iv. 20-22, and to stand up when they read them. By the seat of Moses we are to understand authority to teach the law. Moses was the great teacher of the Jewish people, and the scribes are here represented as his successors.

This short passage of story we had before in Mark. It is thus recorded twice, to teach us, 1. That charity to the poor is a main matter in religion. Our Lord Jesus took all occasions to commend it and recommend it. 2. That Jesus Christ has his eye upon us, to observe what we give to the poor. Christ, though intent upon his preaching, looked up, to see what gifts were cast into the treasury, v. 1. He observes whether we give largely and liberally, in proportion to what we have, or whether we be sneaking and paltry in it. He observes whether we give charitably and with a willing mind, or grudgingly and with reluctance. And this should encourage us to be abundant in it. He sees in secret, and will reward openly. 3. That Christ observes and accepts the charity of the poor in a particular manner. Those that have nothing to give may yet do a great deal in charity by ministering to the poor, and helping them. But here was one that was herself poor and yet gave what little she had to the treasury. It was but two mites, which make a farthing; but Christ magnified it as a piece of charity exceeding all the rest: She has cast in more than they all. Christ does not blame her for indiscretion; but commended her liberality, which proceeded from a belief of and dependence upon God's providence to take care of her. 4. That, whatever may be called the offerings of God, we ought to have a respect for, and to our power, yea, and beyond our power, to contribute cheerfully to.

Verses 5–19

See here, I. With what admiration some spoke of the external pomp and magnificence of the temple. They took notice of it to him how it was adorned with goodly stones and gifts, v. 5. They thought their Master should be as much affected with those things as they were. When we speak of the temple, it should be of the presence of God in it.

II. Christ spoke of their being all made desolate very shortly (v. 6): "As for those things which you behold, the days will come in which there shall not be left one stone upon another. This building shall yet be utterly ruined."

III. With what curiosity those about him enquire concerning the time when this great desolation should be: Master, when shall these things be? v. 7. It is natural to us to covet to know future things, when we are more concerned to ask what is our duty in the prospect of these things, and how we may prepare for them. They enquire what sign there shall be when these things shall come to pass. They ask not for a present sign, to confirm the prediction itself, but what the future signs will be of the approaching accomplishment of the prediction.

IV. With what clearness and fulness Christ answers their enquiries.

1. They must expect to hear of false Christs and false prophets appearing (v. 8): Many shall come in my name, usurping the title and character of the Messiah. They shall say, I am he. To encourage people to follow them, they added, "The time draws near when the kingdom shall be restored to Israel." When they asked solicitously and eagerly, Master, when shall these things be? the first word Christ said

Vss. 1-4. THE WIDOW'S TWO MITES. looked up—He had "sat down over against the treasury" (Mark 12:41), probably to rest, for He had continued long standing as he taught in the temple-court (Mark 11:27), and "looking up He saw"—as in Zaccheus' case, not quite casually. the rich . . . —"the people," says Mark 12:41 "cast money into the treasury, and many rich cast in much"; i.e., into chests deposited in one of the courts of the temple to receive the offerings of the people towards its maintenance (II Kings 12:9; John 8:20). 2. two mites—"which make a farthing" (Mark 12:42), the smallest Jewish coin. "She might have kept one" [BENGEL]. 3. And he said—"to His disciples," whom He "called to Him" (Mark 12:43), to teach from it a great future lesson. more than . . . all—in proportion to her means, which is God's standard (II Cor. 8:12). 4. of their abundance—their superfluity; what they had to spare," or beyond what they needed. of her penury—or "want" (Mark 12:44)—her deficiency, of what was less than her own wants required, "all the living she had." Mark still more emphatically, "all that she had—her whole subsistence." Note: (1) As temple offerings are needed still for the service of Christ at home and abroad, so "looking down" now, as then "up," Me "sees" who "cast in," and how much. (2) Christ's standard of commendable offering is not our superfluity, but our deficiency—not what will never be missed, but what costs us some real sacrifice, and just in proportion to the relative amount of that sacrifice. 1. The rich men casting their gifts into the treasury. See all this, vv. 1-4, explained on Mark xii. 41-44.

2. A certain poor widow. A widow "miserably poor," and her being miserably poor heightened the merit of the action. Two mites. Which Mark says, chap. xii. 42, make a "farthing," or quadrans, the fourth part of an as, or "penny," as we term it. In Plutarch's time we find the smallest piece of brass coin in use among the Romans was the quadrans, but it appears that a smaller piece of money was in circulation among the Jews in our Lord's time, called here, and in Mark, chap. xii. 42, a lepton, i.e., "small, diminished." In ancient times our penny used to be marked with a deep indented cross, dividing the piece into four equal parts, which, when broken in two, made the half-penny, and, when broken into four, made the "fourthing," what we have corrupted into farthing. Probably the Roman quadrans was divided in this way for the convenience of the poor.

5. Goodly stones. Or "costly stones." It has been thought by some that this relates not so much to the stones of which the Temple was built as to the precious stones with which it was decorated. For an account of the stones of the Temple, see on Mark xiii. 1. And gifts. Or "consecrated things," "consecrated to sacred uses."

6. One stone upon another. This was literally fulfilled. See Matt. xxiv. 2.

8. Many shall come in my name. Usurping My name; calling themselves the Messiah. See Matt. xxiv. 5. Concerning this prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem and its literal accomplishment, see the notes on Matt. xxiv. 1-42.

was, Take heed that you be not deceived. Those that are most inquisitive in the things of God (though it is very good to be so) are in most danger of being imposed upon. "Go you not after them." If we are sure that Jesus is the Christ, and his doctrine is the gospel of God, we must be deaf to all intimations of another Christ and another gospel.

2. They must expect to hear of great commotions in the nations. There shall be bloody wars (v. 10): Nation shall rise against nation. There shall be earthquakes, in divers places. There shall be famines and pestilences. God has various ways of punishing a provoking people. Though spiritual judgments are more commonly inflicted in gospel times, yet God makes use of temporal judgments also. There shall be fearful sights and great signs from heaven. "Be not terrified. Others will be frightened at them, but be not you frightened, v. 2. As to the fearful sights, let them not be fearful to you. You fall into the hands of God. Trust therefore in him, and be not afraid. It is your interest to make the best of that which is, for all your fears cannot alter it: these things must first come to pass. There is worse behind. The end is not by and by, not suddenly. Be not terrified, for, if you begin so quickly to be discouraged, how will you bear up under what is yet before you?"

3. They must expect to be themselves for signs and wonders in Israel. "Before all these, they shall lay their hands on you. This must be considered not only as the suffering of the persecuted, but as the sin of the persecutors." The ruin of a people is always introduced by their sin.

(1) Christ tells them what hard things they should suffer for his name's sake. They should sit down and count the cost. The Christians, having themselves been originally Jews, might expect fair quarter with them; but Christ bids them not expect it: They shall deliver you up to the synagogues to be scourged there. They shall deliver you into prisons, that you may be brought before kings and rulers for my name's sake. "Your own relations will betray you (v. 16), your parents, brethren, and kinsfolks, and friends. You will be called to resist unto blood. Some of you shall they cause to be put to death. You shall be hated of all men for my name's sake." This is worse than death itself. They were hated of all men, that is, of all bad men, who could not bear the light of the gospel (because it discovered their evil deeds). The wicked world, which hated to be reformed, hated Christ, the great Redeemer, and all that were his, for his sake.

(2) He encourages them to bear up under their trials, and to go on in their work. God will bring glory both to himself and them out of their sufferings: "It shall turn to you for a testimony, v. 13. Your being set up thus for a mark, and publicly persecuted, will make you the more taken notice of. Your being brought before kings and rulers will give you an opportunity of preaching the gospel to them. Your suffering such severe things, and being so hated by the worst of men, will be a testimony that you are good. Your courage, and cheerfulness, and constancy under your sufferings will be a testimony for you, that you believe what you preach, that you are supported by a divine power. God will stand by you, and own you, and assist you, and you shall be well furnished with instructions, v. 14, 15. Settle it in your hearts, not to meditate before what you shall answer; do not depend upon your own wit and ingenuity, and do not distrust or despair of the immediate and extraordinary aids of the divine grace. I promise you the special assistance of divine grace: I will give you a mouth and wisdom." A mouth and wisdom together completely fit a man both for services and sufferings; wisdom to know what to say, and a mouth wherewith to say it. Those that plead Christ's cause may depend upon him to give them a mouth and wisdom to enable them to answer for themselves. They are enabled to say that both for him and themselves which all their adversaries are not able to gainsay or resist, Acts iv, v and vi. "You shall suffer no real damage by all the hardships they shall put upon you (v. 18): There shall not a hair of your head perish." Shall some of them lose their heads, and yet not lose a hair? Take it figuratively in the same sense that Christ saith, He that loseth his life for my sake shall find it. To this end he had said (Matt. x. 30), The hairs of your head are all numbered. We do not reckon that lost or perishing which is laid out for good purposes. If we drop the body itself for Christ's name's sake, it does not perish, but is well bestowed. "It shall be abundantly recompensed." Though we may be losers for Christ, we shall not, we cannot, be losers by him in the end. "It is therefore your duty and interest to maintain a holy sincerity and serenity of mind, which will keep you always easy (v. 19): In your patience go . . . not . . . after them—"I come not so very soon" (II Thess. 2:1, 2) [STIER].

10. Nation . . .—Matthew and Mark add, "All these are the beginning of sorrows," or travailpangs, to which heavy calamities are compared (Jer. 4:31, etc.).

9-11. not terrified—(See vs. 19; Isa. 8:11-14).

end not by and by—or immediately, not yet (Matt. 24:6; Mark 13:7): i.e., "Worse must come before all is over."

12. brought before . . .—The book of Acts verifies all this.

13. for a testimony—an opportunity of bearing testimony.

18. not a hair . . . perish—He had just said (vs. 16) they should be put to death; showing that this precious promise is far above immunity from mere bodily harm, and furnishing a key to the right interpretation of Psalm 91, and such like. Matthew adds the following: "And because iniquity shall abound, the love of many," the many or the most—the generality of professed disciples—"shall wax cold." But he that endureth to the end shall be saved. Sad illustrations of the effect of abounding iniquity in cooling the love of faithful disciples we have in the Epistle of James, written about this period referred to, and too frequently ever since (Heb. 10:38, 39;

9. Commotions. Seditions and civil dissensions, with which no people were more agitated than the Jews.

11. Fearful sights. What these were the reader will find in detail on Matt. xxiv. 7.

12. Synagogues. Or "assemblies." See these all explained on Mark xiii. 9.

13. It shall turn to you for a testimony. That is, it shall turn out on your part for a testimony to them (your persecutors) that you are thoroughly persuaded of the truth of what you teach and that you are no impostors.

14. Settle it therefore. See on Matt. x. 19.

15. I will give you a mouth and wisdom. A mouth must appear plain to every person to be used here for a "ready utterance" or "eloquence" in speaking. They shall have an abundance of wisdom to know what to say, and they shall have an irresistible eloquence to say what they ought.

18. But there shall not an hair of your head perish. A proverbial expression for, You shall not suffer any essential injury. Every genuine Christian shall escape when this desolation comes upon the Jewish state.

possess ye your souls." It is our duty and interest at all times, especially in perilous times, to secure the possession of our own souls, that they be not distempered now, nor our possession of them disturbed and interrupted. "Possess your souls, be your own men. Keep under the tumults of passion, that neither grief nor fear may tyrannise over you." It is by patience, Christian patience, that we keep possession of our own souls. "Set patience upon the guard, and keep out all those impressions which would ruffle you and put you out of temper."

Verses 20–28

He here comes to show them what all those things would issue in at last, namely, the destruction of Jerusalem, which would be a little day of judgment, a type and figure of Christ's second coming.

I. He tells them that they should see Jerusalem besieged, compassed with armies (v. 20), and, when they saw this, they might conclude that its desolation was nigh.

II. He warns them, upon this signal given, to shift for their own safety (v. 21): "Then let them that are in Judæa flee to the mountains; let them that are in the midst of it depart out, and let not them that are in the countries and villages about enter into the city. Do you abandon a city and country which you see God has abandoned and given up to ruin."

III. He foretells the terrible havoc that should be made of the Jewish nation (v. 22): Those are the days of vengeance so often spoken of by the Old Testament prophets. All their predictions must now be fulfilled. All things that are written must be fulfilled at length. Reprieves are not pardons. The greatness of that destruction is set forth. It is wrath upon this people, the wrath of God. Of particular terror it would be to women with child, and poor mothers that are nurses. There should be general confusion all the nation over.

IV. He describes the issue of the struggles between the Jews and the Romans. Multitudes of them shall fall by the edge of the sword. The siege of Jerusalem was, in effect, a military execution. The rest shall be led away captive; not into one nation, but into all nations. Jerusalem itself was trodden down of the Gentiles. The Romans laid it quite waste.

V. He describes the great frights that people should generally be in. Many frightful sights shall be in the sun, moon, and stars, and here in this lower world, the sea and the waves roaring. The effect of this shall be universal confusion and consternation upon the earth, distress of nations with perplexity, v. 25. Men's hearts shall fail them for fear (v. 26), dying away for fear, still trembling for fear of worse, and looking after those things which are coming upon the world. The powers of heaven shall be shaken, and then the pillars of the earth cannot but tremble. As that day was all terror and destruction to the unbelieving Jews, so the great day will be to all unbelievers.

VI. He makes this to be a kind of appearing of the Son of man: Then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud, with power and great glory, v. 27. The destruction of Jerusalem was in a particular manner an act of Christ's judgment, so that it might justly be looked upon as a coming of the Son of man, in power and great glory, but in the clouds. Now this was, 1. An evidence of the first coming of the Messiah. Those that would not have him to reign over them shall have him to triumph over them. 2. It was an earnest of his second coming.

VII. He encourages all the faithful disciples (v. 28) "When these things begin to come to pass, then do you look up, look heavenward, in faith, hope, and prayer, and lift up your heads for your redemption draws nigh." When Christ came he came to redeem the Christians that were persecuted and oppressed. When he comes to judge the world at the last day, he will redeem all that are his, from all their grievances. When they see that day approaching, they can lift up their heads with joy, knowing that their redemption draws nigh.

VIII. Here is one word of prediction that looks further than the destruction of the Jewish nation, which is not easily understood; we have it in v. 24: Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, till the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled. 1. Some understand it of what is past. The Gentiles shall keep possession of it, and it shall be purely Gentile, till a great part of the Gentile world shall have become Christian. 2. Others understand it of what is yet to come. Jerusalem shall be possessed by the Gentiles, till the time come when the kingdoms of this world shall become Christ's kingdoms, and then all the Jews shall be converted.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

Rev. 2:10). "And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness, and then shall the end come" (Matt. 24:14). God never sends judgment without previous warning; and there can be no doubt that the Jews, already dispersed over most known countries, had nearly all heard the Gospel "as a witness," before the end of the Jewish state. The same principle was repeated and will repeat itself to the end. 20, 21. by armies—encamped armies, i.e., besieged: "the abomination of desolation" (meaning the Roman ensigns, as the symbols of an idolatrous, pagan, unclean power) "spoken of by Daniel the prophet" (Dan. 9:27) "standing where it ought not" (Mark 13:14). "Whoso readeth [that prophecy] let him understand" (Matt. 24:15). Then . . . flee . . .—EUSEBIUS says the Christians fled to Pella, at the north extremity of Perea, being "prophetically directed"; perhaps by some prophetic intimation still more explicit than this, which still would be their chart. 23. woe unto—"alas for." with child . . .—from the greater suffering it would involve; as also "flight in winter, and on the sabbath," which they were to "pray" against (Matt. 24:20), the one as more trying to the body, the other to the soul. "For then shall be tribulation such as was not since the beginning of the world, nor ever shall be"—language not unusual in the Old Testament for tremendous calamities, though of this it may perhaps be literally said, "And except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved, but for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened" (Matt. 24:21, 22). But for this merciful "shortening," brought about by a remarkable concurrence of causes, the whole nation would have perished, in which there yet remained a remnant to be afterwards gathered out. Here in Matthew and Mark are some particulars about "false Christs," who should, "if possible"—a precious clause—"deceive the very elect." (Cf. II Thess. 2:9-11; Rev. 13:13.) 24. Jerusalem . . . trodden down . . . until . . .—Implying (1) that one day Jerusalem shall cease to be "trodden down by the Gentiles" (Rev. 11:2), as then by pagan so now by Mohammedan unbelievers; (2) that this shall be at the "completion" of "the times of the Gentiles," which from Romans 11:25 (taken from this) we conclude to mean till the Gentiles have had their full time of that place in the Church which the Jews in their time had before them—after which, the Jews being again "graffed into their own olive tree," one Church of Jew and Gentile together shall fill the earth (Rom. 11). What a vista this opens up! 25-28. signs . . .—Though the grandeur of this language carries the mind over the head of all periods but that of Christ's second coming, nearly every expression will be found used of the Lord's coming in terrible national judgments, as of Babylon, etc.; and from vss. 28, 32, it seems undeniable that its immediate reference was to the destruction of Jerusalem, though its ultimate reference beyond doubt is to Christ's final coming.

28. redemption—from the oppression of ecclesiastical despotism and legal bondage by the total subversion of the Jewish state and the firm establishment of the evangelical kingdom (vs. 31). But the words are of far wider and more precious import. Matthew (24:30) says, "And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven," evidently something distinct from Himself, mentioned immediately after. What this was intended to mean, interpreters are not agreed. But as before Christ came to destroy Jerusalem, some appalling portents were seen in the air, so before His personal appearing it is likely that something analogous will be witnessed, though of what nature it is vain to conjecture.

ADAM CLARKE

19. In your patience. Rather, "your perseverance," your faithful continuance in My word and doctrine. Possess ye your souls. You will preserve your souls. You shall escape the Roman sword, and not one of you shall perish in the destruction of Jerusalem. Instead of "possess, or preserve ye," I read "ye shall preserve." This reading is supported by many of the MSS., versions, and fathers.

22. These be the days of vengeance. See on Matt. xxiv. 21.

24. They shall fall by the edge of the sword. Those who perished in the siege are reckoned to be not less than eleven hundred thousand. See Matt. xxiv. 22. And shall be led away captive. To the number of ninety-seven thousand. See Josephus, War, b. vi, c. ix, s. 2-3, and on Matt. xxiv. 31. Trodden down of the Gentiles. Judea was so completely subjugated that the very land itself was sold by Vespasian; the Gentiles possessing it, while the Jews were either nearly all killed or led away into captivity. Of the Gentiles be fulfilled. Till the different nations of the earth, to whom God shall have given the dominion over this land, have accomplished all that which the Lord hath appointed them to do; and till the time of their conversion to God take place.

25. The sea and the waves roaring. Figuratively pointing out the immense Roman armies by which Judea was to be overrun and destroyed.

26. Men's hearts failing them for fear. Or "men fainting away through fear, being ready to die." Coming on the earth. Or "coming upon this land."

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

A gleam of hope shoots through the stormy prospect, for the treading down of Jerusalem by the Gentiles has a term set to it. It is to continue "till the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled." That expression is important, for it clearly implies that these "times" are of considerable duration, and it thus places a period of undefined extent between the fall of Jerusalem and the subsequent prophecy. The word used for "times" generally carries with it the notion of opportunity, and here seems to indicate that the breakup of the Jewish national existence would usher in a period in which the "Gentiles" would have the kingdom of God offered to them. The history of the world since the city fell is the best comment on this saying.

—Expositions of Holy Scripture

MATTHEW HENRY

Verses 29–38

I. Christ appoints his disciples to observe the signs of the times, which they might judge by, as they could judge of the approach of summer by the budding forth of the trees, v. 29–31. As in the kingdom of nature there is a chain of causes, so in the kingdom of providence there is a consequence of one event upon another. When we see the ruin of persecuting powers hastening on, we may thence infer that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand.

II. He charges them to look upon those things as sure and very near. The destruction of the Jewish nation, 1. Was near (v. 32): This generation shall not pass away till all be fulfilled. There were some now alive that should see it. 2. It was sure; the decree was gone forth (v. 33): "Heaven and earth shall pass away sooner than any word of mine: but my words shall not."

III. He cautions them against security and sensuality (v. 34, 35): Take heed to yourselves. This is the word of command given to all Christ's disciples. We cannot be safe if we be secure. It concerns us at all times, but especially at some times, to be very cautious. 1. What our danger is: that the day of death and judgment should come upon us unawares, when we do not expect it, and are not prepared for it, lest it come upon us as a snare. 2. What our duty is: we must take heed lest our hearts be overcharged. Two things we must watch against, lest our hearts be overcharged with them: (1) The indulging of the appetites of the body: Take heed lest you be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, the immoderate use of meat and drink. They stupefy the conscience, and cause the mind to be unaffected with those things that are most affecting. (2) The inordinate pursuit of the good things of this world. The heart is overcharged with the cares of this life. This is the snare of the men of business, that will be rich.

IV. He counsels them to prepare and get ready for this great day, v. 36. Here see, 1. What should be our aim: that we may be accounted worthy to escape all these things. Yet we must aim not only to escape that, but to stand before the Son of man; not only to stand acquitted before him as our Judge, but to stand before him, to attend on him as our Master, and serve him day and night, always to behold his face. The saints are here said to be accounted worthy, as before, ch. xx. 35. God, by the goodwill of his grace towards them, accounts them worthy of it. A great part of our worthiness lies in an acknowledgment of our own unworthiness. 2. What should be our actings in these aims: Watch therefore, and pray always. Watching and praying must go together. Those that would make sure of the joys to come, must watch and pray. (1) To keep a guard upon themselves. "Watch against sin, watch to every duty. Be awake, and keep awake." (2) To keep up their communion with God: "Pray always." Those shall be accounted worthy to live a life of praise in the other world that live a life of prayer in this world.

V. In the last two verses we have an account how Christ disposed of himself during those three or four days between his riding in triumph into Jerusalem and the night in which he was betrayed. 1. He was all day teaching in the temple. He was an indefatigable preacher; he preached in the face of opposition, and in the midst of those that he knew sought occasion against him. 2. At night he went out to lodge at a friend's house, in the mount of Olives. 3. Early in the morning he was in the temple again, and the people were forward to hear one that they saw forward to preach (v. 38): They all came early in the morning to hear him. Sometimes the taste and relish which serious, honest, plain people have of good preaching are more to be valued and judged by than the opinion of the witty and learned.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

32. This generation—not "this nation," as some interpret it, which, though admissible in itself, seems very unnatural here. It is rather as in ch. 9:27.

34-37. surfeiting, and drunkenness—All animal excesses, quenching spirituality. cares of this life—(See on Mark 4:7, 19).

36. Watch . . . pray . . .—the two great duties which in prospect of trial are constantly enjoined. These warnings, suggested by the need of preparedness for the tremendous calamities approaching, and the total wreck of the existing state of things, are the general improvement of the whole discourse, carrying the mind forward to Judgment and Vengeance of another kind and on a grander and more awful scale—not ecclesiastical or political but personal, not temporal but eternal—when all safety and blessedness will be found to lie in being able to "STAND BEFORE THE SON OF MAN" in the glory of His personal appearing.

37, 38. in the daytime—of this His last week. abode in the mount—i.e., at Bethany (Matt. 21:17).

ADAM CLARKE

29. He spake to them a parable. Illustrated all these predicted facts by the simile of a fig tree. See this explained on Matt. xxiv. 32.

31. The kingdom of God is nigh at hand. After the destruction of the Jewish state, the doctrine of Christ crucified shall be preached everywhere, and everywhere prevail.

32. This generation. This race of men; but see on Matt. xxiv. 34 and Mark xiii. 30.

34. Take heed to yourselves. See our Lord's parable relative to this matter explained, Mark xiii. 34.

Be overcharged. Literally, "be made heavy," as is generally the case with those who have eaten or drunk too much.

35. The face of the whole earth. Or "of this whole land." The land of Judea, on which these heavy judgments were to fall.

36. Watch ye therefore, and pray always. Perhaps we should connect "continually" with watch, as it appears to be the most natural order. Indeed the word "continually" belongs equally to both watch and pray; and no man is safe, at any time, who does not attend to this advice as literally as possible. That shall come to pass. That is, the tribulations which are on their way to overwhelm and destroy the Jewish people. These are sufficiently stated in the preceding verses. To stand before the Son of man. To be acquitted and to be condemned are expressed, in Rom. xiv. 4, by "standing" and "falling." Those who were faithful to the grace they had received were not only not destroyed in the destruction of Jerusalem, but became heralds of the grace and mercy of God to the nations. Thus they were counted worthy to stand before the Son of man—to minister salvation in His name.

37. And in the day time. Or "every day." This probably relates to the last four days of His life already mentioned. Abode in the mount. He taught all day in the Temple, and withdrew every evening and lodged in Bethany, a town at the foot or on the declivity of the Mount of Olives.

Christ is here delivered up, when the feast of unleavened bread drew nigh, v. 1. Here we have,

I. His sworn enemies contriving it (v. 2), the chief priests, and the scribes, seeking how they might kill him. Could they have had their will, it had been soon done, but they feared the people.

II. A treacherous disciple joining in with them, Judas surnamed Iscariot. He is here said to be of the number of the twelve. One would wonder that one of that number, who could not but know Christ, should be so base as to betray him. How he who knew Christ so well yet came to betray him we are here told: Satan entered into Judas, v. 3. It was the devil's work. Whoever betrays Christ, or his truths or ways, it is Satan that puts them upon it. Judas knew how desirous the chief priests were to get Christ into their

VSS. 1-6. CONSPIRACY OF THE JEWISH AUTHORITIES TO PUT JESUS TO DEATH—COMPACT WITH JUDAS. 1, 2. (See on Matt. 26:1-5.) 3. Then entered Satan . . .—but not yet in the full sense. The awful stages of it were these: (1) Covetousness being his master-passion, the Lord let it reveal itself and gather strength by entrusting him with "the bag" (John 12:6), as treasurer to Himself and the Twelve. (2) In the discharge of that most sacred trust he became "a thief," appropriating its contents from time to time to his own use. Satan, seeing this door into his heart standing wide open, determines to enter by it, but cautiously (II Cor. 2:11); first merely "putting it into his heart to betray Him" (John 13:2), suggesting the thought to him that by this means he might enrich himself. (3) This

1. The feast of unleavened bread. See this largely explained, Exod. xxiii. 14; xxiii. 2-40; and on Matt. xxvi. 2.

2. They feared the people. The great mass of the people seem to have been convinced that Christ was at least a prophet sent from God, and it is likely they kept steady in their attachment to Him. The multitude, who are represented as clamoring for His blood at the Crucifixion, appear to have been a mere mob, formed out of the creatures of the chief priests and Pharisees.

3. Then entered Satan into Judas. The devil filled the heart of Judas with avarice, and that infamous passion led him to commit the crime here specified. This at once accounts for the hands. He therefore went himself, and made the motion to them, v. 4. When you see Judas communing with the chief priests, be sure some mischief is hatching.

III. The issue of the treaty between them. 1. Judas must betray Christ to them, and this they would be glad of. 2. They must give him a sum of money for doing it, and this he would be glad of (v. 5): They covenanted to give him money. Judas sought opportunity to betray him. He gained the advantage he sought, and fixed the time and place where it might be done, in the absence of the multitude, and without tumult.

Verses 7–20

I. The preparation that was made for Christ's eating the passover with his disciples, upon the very day of unleavened bread, when the passover must be killed according to the law, v. 7. He sent Peter and John to prepare the passover. He directed those whom he employed whither they should go (v. 9, 13): they must follow a man bearing a pitcher of water, and he must be their guide to the house. He directed them thus, to teach them to depend upon the conduct of Providence, and to follow that, step by step. Being come to the house, they must desire the master of the house to show them a room (v. 11), and he will readily do it, v. 12. The disciples found their guide, and the house, and the room, just as he had said to them (v. 13). They got everything in readiness for the passover, v. 11.

II. The solemnizing of the passover. When the hour was come he sat down, and the twelve apostles with him, Judas not excepted. Though Judas has already been guilty of an overt act of treason, yet, it not being publicly known, Christ admits him to sit down with the rest at the passover. Now observe.

1. How Christ bids this passover welcome (v. 15): "With desire I have desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer." He knew it was to be the prologue to his sufferings, and therefore he desired it, because it was in order to his Father's glory and man's redemption. Shall we be backward to any service for him who was so forward in the work of our salvation? See the love he had to his disciples; he desired to eat it with them, that he and they might have a little time together for private conversation. He was now about to leave them, but was very desirous to eat this passover with them before he suffered, as if the comfort of that would carry him the more cheerfully through his sufferings.

2. How Christ in it takes his leave of all passovers (v. 16): "I will not any more eat thereof until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God." (1) It was fulfilled when Christ our Passover was sacrificed for us. (2) It was fulfilled in the Lord's supper, an ordinance of the gospel kingdom, in which the passover had its accomplishment. They ate of it, and Christ might be said to eat with them, because of the spiritual communion they had with him in that ordinance. (3) The complete accomplishment of that commemoration of liberty will be in the kingdom of glory. What he had said of his eating of the paschal lamb, he repeats concerning his drinking of the passover wine, the cup of blessing, or of thanksgiving. This cup he took, according to the custom, and gave thanks and then said, Take this, and divide it among yourselves, v. 17. This is not said afterwards of the sacramental cup, which, being the New Testament in his blood, he might give into everyone's hand, to teach them to make a particular application of it to their own souls; but, as for the paschal cup, it is enough to say, "Take it, and divide it among yourselves, v. 18. I will not drink of the fruit of the vine any more, till the kingdom of God shall come." Christ dying next day was its fulfilment.

III. The institution of the Lord's supper, v. 19, 20. The passover and the deliverance out of Egypt were typical and prophetic signs of a Christ to come, who should by dying deliver us from sin and death, and the tyranny of Satan. Therefore the Lord's supper is instituted to be a commemorative sign or memorial of a Christ already come, that has by dying delivered us.

1. The breaking of Christ's body as a sacrifice for us is here commemorated by the breaking of bread: This is my body which is given for you. This bread that was given for us is given to us to be food for our souls, this bread that was broken and given for us, to satisfy for the guilt of our sins, is broken and given to us, to satisfy the desire of our souls. And this we do in remembrance of what he did for us, when he died for us, and for a memorial of what we do, in making ourselves partakers of him, and joining ourselves to him in an everlasting covenant.

thought was probably converted into a settled purpose by what took place in Simon's house at Bethany. (See on Matt. 26:6, and John 12:4-8.) (4) Starting back, perhaps, or mercifully held back, for some time, the determination to carry it into immediate effect was not consummated till, sitting at the paschal supper, "Satan entered into him" (see on John 13:27), and conscience, effectually stifled, only rose again to be his tormentor. What lessons in all this for every one (Eph. 4:27; Jas. 4:7; I Pet. 5:8, 9)! 5. money—"thirty pieces of silver" (Matt. 26:15); thirty shekels, the fine payable for man-or maidservant accidentally killed (Exod. 21:32), and equal to $25 in our money—"a goodly price that I was priced at of them" (Zech. 11:13). (See on John 19:16.) 6. in the absence, . . .—(See on Matt. 26:5).

7-38. LAST PASSOVER—INSTITUTION OF THE SUPPER—DISCOURSE AT THE TABLE. 7. the day of unleavened bread—strictly the 15th Nisan (part of our March and April) after the paschal lamb was killed; but here, the 14th (Thursday). Into the difficult questions raised on this we cannot here enter. 10-13. when ye are entered the city—He Himself probably stayed at Bethany during the day. there shall a man . . .—(See on ch. 19:29-32).

14-18. the hour—about 6 P.M. Between three and this hour the lamb was killed (Exod. 12:6, Margin).

15. With desire . . . desired—"earnestly have I longed" (as Gen. 31:30, "sore longedst"). Why? It was to be His last "before He suffered"—and so became "Christ our Passover sacrificed for us" (I Cor. 5:7), when it was "fulfilled in the Kingdom of God," the typical ordinance thenceforth disappearing.

17. took the cup—the first of several partaken of in this service. divide it among . . .—i.e., It is to be your last as well as Mine, "until the Kingdom of God come," or as it is beautifully given in Matthew 26:29, "until that day when I shall drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom." It was the point of transition between two economies and their two great festivals, the one about to close for ever, the other immediately to open and run its majestic career until from earth it be transferred to heaven.

whole of this most unprincipled and unnatural transaction.

4. And captains. Among the priests who were in waiting at the Temple, some were appointed for a guard to the Temple, and over these were "commanding officers."

5. They . . . covenanted to give him money. Matthew says thirty pieces, or staters, of silver, the common price of the meanest slave.

6. And he promised. That is, to do it—or he accepted the proposal.

7. The passover. That on which they feasted, viz., the sacrificed paschal lamb.

8-13. He sent Peter and John. See the subject of these verses largely explained on Matt. xxvi. 17-19 and Mark xiv. 13, 15.

14. And when the hour was come. That is, the evening. See Matt. xxvi. 20 and Mark xiv. 17.

15. With desire I have desired. A Hebraism for "I have desired most earnestly." Our Lord's meaning seems to be that, having purposed to redeem a lost world by His blood, He ardently longed for the time in which He was to offer himself up. Such love did the holy Jesus bear to the human race. This eucharistic Passover was celebrated once, by way of anticipation, before the bloody sacrifice of the Victim of salvation, and before the deliverance it was appointed to commemorate, as the figurative Passover had been likewise once celebrated before the going out of Egypt and the deliverance of God's chosen people.

16. Until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God. That is, until that of which the Passover is a type is fulfilled in My death, through which the kingdom of God, or of Heaven (see Matt. iii. 2), shall be established among men.

17. He took the cup. This was not the sacramental cup, for that was taken after supper, v. 20, but was the cup which was ordinarily taken before supper. Divide it among yourselves. Pass the cup from one to another; thus the cup which Christ gave to the first person on His right hand continued to be handed from one to another till it came to the last person on His left.

18. I will not drink of the fruit of the vine. That is, before the time of another Passover the Holy Ghost shall descend, the gospel of the Kingdom be established, and the sacramental supper shall take place of the paschal lamb; for in a few hours His crucifixion was to take place.

19. Took bread. See the nature and design of the Lord's Supper explained in the notes on Matt. xxvi. 26-29. This do in remembrance of me. That the Jews in eating the Passover did it to represent the sufferings of the Messiah is evident from the tract Pesachim, fol. 119.

2. The shedding of Christ's blood, by which the atonement was made, as represented by the wine in the cup. It commemorates the purchase of the covenant by the blood of Christ, and confirms the promises of the covenant. In all our commemorations of the shedding of Christ's blood, we must have an eye to it as shed for us; who loved me, and gave himself for me.

We have here Christ's discourse with his disciples after supper, much of which is new here; and in St. John's gospel we shall find other additions.

I. He discoursed with them concerning him that should betray him. 1. He signifies to them that the traitor was now among them, and one of them, v. 21. By placing this after the institution of the Lord's supper, though in Matthew and Mark it is placed before it, it seems plain that Judas did receive the Lord's supper, did eat of that bread and drink of that cup; for, after the solemnity was over, Christ said, Behold, the hand of him that betrayeth me is with me on the table. 2. He foretells that the treason would take effect (v. 22): Truly the Son of man goes as it was determined; for he is delivered up by the counsel and foreknowledge of God. Christ was not driven to his sufferings, but cheerfully went to them. 3. He threatens the traitor: Woe to that man by whom he is betrayed. Though God has determined that Christ shall be betrayed, and he himself has cheerfully submitted to it, yet Judas's sin or punishment is not at all the less. 4. He frightens the rest of the disciples into a suspicion of themselves, by saying that it was one of them (v. 23): They began to enquire among themselves who it was that should do this thing.

II. Concerning the strife that was among them for precedency or supremacy.

1. See what the dispute was: Which of them should be accounted the greatest. How inconsistent is this with that in the verse before! There they were enquiring which would be the traitor, and here which should be the prince. What a self-contradiction is the deceitful heart of man!

2. See what Christ said to this dispute. He was not sharp upon them but mildly showed them the sin and folly of it.

(1) This was to make themselves like the kings of the Gentiles, v. 25. They exercise lordship over their subjects. The exercising of lordship better becomes the kings of the Gentiles than the ministers of Christ. They that exercise authority, they are called Benefactors, they call themselves so, and so their flatterers call them. However they may really serve themselves, they would be thought to serve their country. One of the Ptolemies was surnamed The Benefactor. Now our Saviour, by taking notice of this, intimates, [1] That to do good is much more honourable than to look great. By their own confession, a benefactor to his country is much more valued than a ruler of his country. [2] That to do good is the surest way to be great. He would have his disciples believe, that their greatest honour would be to do all the good they could in the world. If they have that which is confessedly the greater honour, of being benefactors, let them despise the less, of being rulers.

(2) It was to make themselves unlike Christ himself: "You shall not be so," v. 26, 27. "It was never intended that you should rule any otherwise than by the power of truth and grace, but that you should serve." Here is the rule Christ gave to his disciples: He that is greater among you, that is senior, let him be as the younger. Their age and honour, instead of warranting them to take their ease, bind them to double work. And he that is chief, let him be as he that serves. Here is the example which he himself gave to this rule: Whether is greater, he that sitteth at meat or he that serveth? He was ready to do any office of kindness and service for them; witness his washing their feet.

(3) They ought not to strive for worldly honour and grandeur, because he had better honours in reserve for them, a kingdom, a feast, a throne, wherein they should all share alike, v. 28–30.

[1] Christ's commendation of his disciples for their faithfulness to him. It is spoken with an air of encomium and applause: "You are they who have continued with me in my temptations, you are they who have stood by me and stuck to me." His disciples continued with him, and were afflicted in all his afflictions. It was but little help that they could give him; nevertheless, he took it kindly that they continued with him, and he here owns their kindness. Christ's disciples had been very defective in their duty. We find them guilty of many mistakes and weaknesses: yet their Master passes all by and forgets it. You are they who have continued with me. Thus does he praise at parting, to show how willing

He will therefore speak it out in terms not to be misunderstood. But how much it cost Him to do this, appears from the "trouble" that came over His "spirit"—visible emotion, no doubt—before He got it uttered. What wounded susceptibility does this disclose, and what exquisite delicacy in His social intercourse with the Twelve, to whom He cannot, without an effort, break the subject!

there was—or "had been," referring probably to some symptoms of the former strife which had reappeared, perhaps on seeing the whole paschal arrangements committed to two of the Twelve. (See on Mark 10:42-45.)

20. This cup is the new testament in my blood. Perhaps it might be better to paraphrase the passage thus: "This cup which is poured out for you signifies the blood of the new covenant, which is shortly to be ratified in (or by) the shedding of My blood." Or, "This cup is the new covenant, poured out for you with My blood"; that is, the paschal sacrifice and My sacrifice happen together.

22. The Son of man goeth. That is, He is about to die. "Going, going away, and departing" are used, by the best Greek and Latin writers, for "death" and "dying."

23. They began to inquire among themselves. See the notes on Matt. xxvi. 23-24.

25. Are called benefactors. The very Greek word used by the Evangelist was the surname of some of the Ptolemies of Egypt: Ptolemy Euergetes, i.e., "the Benefactor." It was a custom among the ancient Romans to distribute part of the lands which they had conquered on the frontiers of the empire to their soldiers. Those who enjoyed such lands were called beneficiarii, beneficed persons; and the lands themselves were termed beneficia, benefices, as being held on the beneficence of the sovereign. And it is no wonder that such sovereigns, however tyrannical or oppressive they might have been in other respects, were termed benefactors by those who were thus dependent on their bounty.

26. Let him be as the younger. Dr Lightfoot justly conjectures that Peter was the eldest of all the disciples; and he supposes that the strife was kindled between him and the sons of Zebedee, James and John. These three disciples were those whom Christ had distinguished by peculiar marks of His favor; and therefore it is natural to conclude that the strife lay between these three, the two brothers and Peter. Shall we or Peter be at the head? Neither, says our Lord. Let him, Peter, who is chief (the eldest) among you, be as John, the younger.

he is to make the best of those whose hearts he knows to be upright with him.

[2] The recompence he designed them for their fidelity: I appoint unto you a kingdom. Understand it, First, Of what should be done for them in this world. God gave his Son a kingdom among men, the gospel church. This kingdom he appointed to his apostles and their successors in the ministry of the gospel. This is the honour reserved for you. Or, Secondly, Of what should be done for them in the other world. God will give them the kingdom. They shall eat and drink at Christ's table in his kingdom, of which he had spoken, v. 16, 18. They shall partake of those joys and pleasures which were the recompence of his services and sufferings. The highest dignities: "You shall sit down with me on my throne," Rev. iii. 21.

III. Concerning Peter's denying him.

1. The general notice Christ gives to Peter of the devil's design upon him and the rest of the apostles (v. 31): The Lord said, Simon, Simon, Satan hath desired to have you, that he may sift you as wheat. Peter, who used to be the mouth of the rest in speaking to Christ, is here made the ear of the rest; and what is designed for warning to them all (all you shall be offended, because of me) is directed to Peter, being in a particular manner struck at by the tempter: Satan has desired to have you. "Give me leave to try them," saith Satan, "and Peter particularly." He desired to have them, that he might sift them, that he might show them to be chaff, and not wheat. Satan could not sift them unless God gave him leave: He desired to have them, "He has challenged you to prove you a company of hypocrites, and Peter especially, the forwardest of you."

2. The particular encouragement he gave to Peter: "I have prayed for thee: thou wilt be most violently assaulted, but I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not." Though there may be many failings in the faith of true believers, yet there shall not be a total and final failure of their faith. It is owing to the mediation and intercession of Jesus Christ that the faith of his disciples, though sometimes sadly shaken, yet is not sunk. They are kept by the power of God and the prayer of Christ.

3. The charge he gives to Peter to help others: "When thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren; when thou hast found thy faith kept from failing, labour to confirm the faith of others; when thou hast found mercy with God thyself, encourage others to hope that they also shall find mercy." Those that have fallen into sin must be converted from it. Those that through grace are converted from sin must do what they can to strengthen their brethren that stand, and to prevent their falling; see Ps. li. 11–13.

4. Peter's declared resolution to cleave to Christ, whatever it cost him (v. 33): Lord, I am ready to go with thee, both into prison and to death. This was a great word, and yet I believe no more than he meant at this time, and thought he should make good too. All the true disciples of Christ sincerely desire and design to follow him, withersoever he goes.

5. Christ's express prediction of his denying him thrice (v. 34): "I tell thee, Peter, the cock shall not crow this day before thou even deny that thou knowest me." Christ knows us better than we know ourselves. It is well for us that Christ knows where we are weak better than we do, and therefore where to come in with grace sufficient.

IV. Concerning the condition of all the disciples.

1. He appeals to them concerning what had been, v. 35. He had owned that they had been faithful servants to him, v. 28. When I sent you without purse, lacked you anything? He owns that he had sent them out in a very poor and bare condition. If God thus send us out into the world, let us remember that better than us have thus begun low. Notwithstanding this, they had lacked nothing; and they readily acknowledged it: "Nothing, Lord." It is good for us often to review the providences of God, and to observe how we have got through the straits and difficulties we have met with. Christ is a good Master, and his service a good service; for though his servants may sometimes be brought low, yet he will help them. We must reckon ourselves well done by if we have had the necessary supports of life, though we have lived from hand to mouth. They had wanted nothing.

2. He gives them notice of a very great change of their circumstances now approaching. He that was their Master was now entering upon his sufferings, which he had often foretold (v. 37): "Now that which is written must be fulfilled in me. He was numbered among the transgressors. This is yet to be accomplished, and then the things concerning me will have an end; then I shall say, It is finished." It may be the comfort of suffering Christians, as it was of a suffer-

29. I appoint . . .—Who is this that dispenses kingdoms, nay, the Kingdom of kingdoms, within an hour or two of His apprehension, and less than a day of His shameful death? These sublime contrasts, however, perpetually meet and entrance us in this matchless history. 30. eat and drink . . .—(See on vs. 16, and on ch. 18:28, etc.).

31-34. Simon, Simon—(See on ch. 10:41). desired to have—rather, "hath obtained you," properly "asked and obtained"; alluding to Job (1:6-12; 2:1-6), whom he solicited and obtained that he might sift him as wheat, insinuating as "the accuser of the brethren" (Rev. 12:10), that he would find chaff enough in his religion, if indeed there was any wheat at all. to have you—not Peter only, but them all.

32. But I have prayed—have been doing it already. for thee—as most in danger. (See on vss. 61, 62.) fail not—i.e., entirely; for partially it did fail.

converted—brought back afresh as a penitent disciple. strengthen . . .—i.e., make use of thy bitter experience for the fortifying of thy tempted brethren.

33. I am ready . . .—honest-hearted, warmly-attached disciple, thinking thy present feelings immovable as a rock, thou shalt find them in the hour of temptation unstable as water: "I have been praying for thee," therefore thy faith shall not perish; but thinking this superfluous, thou shalt find that "he that trusteth in his own heart is a fool" (Prov. 28:26). 34. cock . . . crow—"twice" (Mark 14:30).

35-38. But now—that you are going forth not as before on a temporary mission, provided for without purse or scrip, but into scenes of continued and severe trial, your methods must be different; for purse and scrip will now be needed for support, and the usual means of defense.

37. the things concerning me—decreed and written.

ADAM CLARKE

29. I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me. Our Lord is probably to be understood as promising that they should get a Kingdom, a state of blessedness, as He should get it—they must go through much tribulation in order to enter into the kingdom of God.

31. Simon, Simon. When a name is thus repeated in the sacred writings, it appears to be always intended as an expression of love, manifested by a warning voice. As if He had said, While you and the others are contending for supremacy, Satan is endeavoring to destroy you all; but I have prayed for you, as being in most danger. Satan hath desired to have you. That is, all the apostles but particularly the three contenders; the plural pronoun sufficiently proves that these words were not addressed to Peter alone. Satan had already got one, Judas; he had nearly got another, Peter; and he wished to have all. But we see by this that the devil cannot even tempt a man unless he receive permission. He desires to do all evil; he is permitted only to do some.

32. I have prayed for thee. From the natural forwardness and impetuosity of your own spirit, you will be brought into the most imminent danger; "but I have supplicated for you, that your faith may not utterly fail"—"fall utterly or entirely off." Peter's faith did fail, but not utterly; he did fall, but he did not fall off, apostatize, or forsake his Master and His cause finally, as Judas did. Everybody sees, from Peter's denial of his Lord, that his faith did fail, and his great courage too; and yet they read, in the common translation, that Christ prayed that it might not fail. Can they then conceive that our Lord's prayer was heard? The translation which I have given above removes this embarrassment and apparent contradiction. When thou art converted. Restored to a sense of your folly and sin, and to Me and My cause—establish these thy brethren. All the disciples forsook Jesus and fled, merely through fear of losing their lives; Peter, who continued for a while near Him, denied his Master with oaths, and repeated this thrice. Our Lord seems to intimate that, after this fall, Peter would become more cautious and circumspect than ever; and that he should become uncommonly strong in the faith, which was the case; and that, notwithstanding the baseness of his past conduct, he should be a proper instrument for strengthening the feebleminded, and supporting the weak. His two Epistles to the persecuted Christians show how well he was qualified for this important work.

34. The cock shall not crow this day. Matt. xxvi. 34 and Mark xiv. 30 say "this night"; both expressions are right, because the Jewish day, of twenty-four hours, began with the evening, and ended at the evening of the following day. On Peter's denial, see the notes on Matt. xxvi. 31-35.

35. When I sent you without purse. See the notes on Matt. x. 9-10.

MATTHEW HENRY

ing Christ, that their sufferings were foretold. They will have an end, and will end well, everlastingly well. They must now in some degree suffer with their Master; and, when he is gone, they must expect to suffer like him. They must not now expect that their friends would be so kind and generous to them as they had been; and therefore, He that has a purse, let him take it. They must now expect that their enemies would be more fierce upon them than they had been, and they would need magazines as well as stores: He that has no sword will find a great want of it, and will be ready to wish that he had sold his garment and bought one. But the sword of the Spirit is the sword which the disciples of Christ must furnish themselves with. Christ having suffered for us, we must arm ourselves with the same mind, with a holy resignation to the will of God, and then we are better prepared than if we had sold a coat to buy a sword. The disciples hereupon enquire what strength they had, and find they had among them two swords (v. 38), of which one was Peter's. But he intimates how little he would have them depend upon this when he saith, It is enough. Two swords are sufficient for those who need more, having God himself to be the shield of their help and the sword of their excellency.

Verses 39–46

We have here the awful story of Christ's agony in the garden. In it Christ entered the lists with the powers of darkness, and yet conquered them.

I. What we have in this passage which we had before is, 1. That when Christ went out, his disciples (eleven of them, for Judas had given them the slip) followed him. Having continued with him hitherto in his temptations, they would not leave him now. 2. That he went to the place where he was wont to be private, which intimates that Christ was often alone, to teach us to be so. 3. That he exhorted his disciples to pray that, though the approaching trial could not be avoided, yet they might not in it enter into temptation to sin. 4. That he withdrew from them, and prayed himself. He withdrew about a stone's cast, and there he kneeled down (so it is here); but the other evangelists say that afterwards he fell on his face, and there prayed that, if it were the will of God, this cup of suffering might be removed from him. 5. That he, knowing it to be his Father's will that he should suffer and die, withdrew that petition, resigned himself to his heavenly Father's will: "Nevertheless not my will be done, not the will of my human nature, but the will of God, let that be done." 6. That his disciples were asleep when he was at prayer, and when they should have been themselves praying, v. 45. When he rose from prayer, he found them sleeping. See what a favourable construction is here put upon it, which we had not in the other evangelists—they were sleeping for sorrow. This teaches us to make the best of our brethren's infirmities, and, if there be one cause better than another, charitably impute them to that. 7. That when he awoke them, then he exhorted them to pray (v. 46): "Why sleep ye? Rise and pray." When we find ourselves entering into temptation, it concerns us to rise and pray, Lord, help me in this time of need.

II. There are three things in this passage which we had not in the other evangelists:

1. That when Christ was in his agony, there appeared to him an angel from heaven, strengthening him, v. 43. When he was not delivered from his sufferings, yet he was strengthened and supported under them, and that was equivalent. If God proportion the shoulders to the burden, we shall have no reason to complain, whatever he is pleased to lay upon us. The angels ministered to the Lord Jesus in his sufferings. He could have had legions of them to rescue him; but he made use of his ministration only to strengthen him.

2. That, being in an agony, he prayed more earnestly, v. 44. As his sorrow and trouble grew upon him, he grew more importunate in prayer. Prayer, though never out of season, is in a special manner seasonable when we are in an agony; and the stronger our agonies are the more lively and frequent our prayers should be.

3. That, in this agony, his sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground. There is some dispute among the critics whether this sweat is only compared to drops of blood, or whether real blood mingled with it, so that it was in colour like blood, and might truly be called a bloody sweat; the matter is not great. Every pore was as it were a bleeding wound, and his blood stained all his raiment. This showed the travail of his soul.

have an end—are rapidly drawing to a close. 38. two swords . . . enough—they thinking He referred to present defense, while His answer showed He meant something else.

39-46. AGONY IN THE GARDEN. 39. as . . . wont—(See John 18:2). 40. the place—the Garden of Gethsemane, on the west or city side of the mount. Comparing all the accounts of this mysterious scene, the facts appear to be these: (1) He bade nine of the Twelve remain "here" while He went and prayed "yonder." (2) He "took the other three, Peter, James, and John, and began to be sore amazed [appalled], sorrowful, and very heavy [oppressed], and said, My soul is exceeding sorrowful even unto death"—'I feel as if nature would sink under this load, as if life were ebbing out, and death coming before its time'—"tarry ye here, and watch with Me"; not, 'Witness for Me,' but, 'Bear Me company.' It did Him good, it seems, to have them beside Him. (3) But soon even they were too much for Him: He must be alone. "He was withdrawn from them about a stone's-cast"—though near enough for them to be competent witnesses—and kneeled down, uttering that most affecting prayer (Mark 14:36), that if possible "the cup," of His approaching death, "might pass from Him, but if not, His Father's will be done": implying that in itself it was so purely revolting that only its being the Father's will would induce Him to taste it, but that in that view of it He was perfectly prepared to drink it. It is no struggle between a reluctant and a compliant will, but between two views of one event—an abstract and a relative view of it, in the one of which it was revolting, in the other welcome. By signifying how it felt in the one view, He shows His beautiful oneness with ourselves in nature and feeling; by expressing how He regarded it in the other light, He reveals His absolute obediential subjection to His Father. (4) On this, having a momentary relief, for it came upon Him, we imagine, by surges, He returns to the three, and finding them sleeping, He addresses them affectingly, particularly Peter, as in Mark 14:37, 38. He then (5) goes back, not now to kneel, but fell on His face on the ground, saying the same words, but with this turn, "If this cup may not pass . . ." (Matt. 26:42)—i.e., 'Yes, I understand this mysterious silence (Ps. 22:1-6); it may not pass; I am to drink it, and I will'—"Thy will be done!" (6) Again, for a moment relieved, He returns and finds them "sleeping for sorrow," warns them as before, but puts a loving construction upon it, separating between the "willing spirit" and the "weak flesh." (7) Once more, returning to His solitary spot, the surges rise higher, beat more tempestuously, and seem ready to overwhelm Him. To fortify Him for this, "there appeared an angel unto Him from heaven strengthening Him"—not to minister light or comfort (He was to have none of that, and they were not needed nor fitted to convey it), but purely to sustain and brace up sinking nature for a yet hotter and fiercer struggle. And now, He is "in an agony, and prays more earnestly"—even Christ's prayer, it seems, admitted of and now demanded such increase—"and His sweat was as it were great drops [literally clots] of blood falling down to the ground." What was this? Not His proper sacrificial offering, though essential to it. It was just the internal struggle, apparently hushing itself before, but now swelling up again, convulsing His whole inner man, and this so affecting His animal nature that the sweat oozed out from every pore in thick drops of blood, falling to the ground. It was just shuddering nature and indomitable will struggling together. But again the cry, If it must be, Thy will be done, issues from His lips, and all is over. "The bitterness of death is past." He has anticipated and rehearsed His final conflict, and won the victory—now on the theater of an invincible will, as then on the arena of the Cross. 'I will suffer,' is the grand result of Gethsemane: "It is finished" is the shout that bursts from the Cross. The Will without the Deed had been all in vain; but His work was consummated when He carried the now manifested Will into the palpable Deed, "by the which WILL we are sanctified THROUGH THE OFFERING OF THE BODY OF JESUS CHRIST ONCE FOR ALL" (Heb. 10:10). (8) At the close of the whole scene, finding them still sleeping (worn out with continued sorrow and racking anxiety), He bids them, with an irony of deep emotion, "sleep on now and take their rest, the hour is come, the Son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinners, rise, let us be going, the traitor is at hand." And while He spoke, Judas approached with his armed band. Thus they proved "miserable comforters," broken

36. He that hath no sword. The word stands rather oddly in the passage. The verse, translated in the order in which it stands, is as follows: "And he who hath none, let him sell his garment and buy—a sword." [Some] think that it was a proverbial expression, intimating a time of great difficulty and danger, and that now the disciples had need to look to themselves, for His murderers were at hand. The reader will observe that these words were spoken to the disciples just before He went to the Garden of Gethsemane, and that the danger was now so very near that there could be no time for any of them to go and sell his garment in order to purchase a sword to defend himself and his Master from the attack of the Jewish mob. Judea was at this time, as we have already noticed, much infested by robbers; while our Lord was with His disciples, they were perfectly safe, being shielded by His miraculous power. Shortly they must go into every part of the land and would need weapons to defend themselves.

37. Must yet be accomplished. Probably meaning that, though this prophecy did refer to some particular matter in the time of the prophet, yet it "farther" related to Christ, and could not have its complete accomplishment but in His crucifixion as a criminal. For the things concerning me have an end. As if He had said: My work is now almost done; yours is only beginning. I am now about to be crucified and numbered with the transgressors. Think what will be done to you, and what ought to be done by you; and then think if this be a time for you to be contending with each other.

38. Lord, behold, here are two swords. And he said unto them, It is enough. These words cannot be well understood as being an answer to the supposed command of Christ for everyone who had no sword to go and sell his garment and buy one, for in this case they were not enough, or "sufficient," as nine of the disciples must be without any instrument of defense. But they may be understood as pointing out the readiness and determination of Peter, and perhaps some others, to defend our Lord: "Thou shalt not be treated as a transgressor; here are two swords, and we will fight for Thee." In v. 33, Peter had said he was ready to go with Christ either to prison or death which showed his strong resolution to stand by and defend his Master, even at the expense of his life. But, alas, he depended too much on himself! It is enough. The meaning probably is, There is enough said on the subject; as immediately after this He entered into His agony. I must here confess that the matter about the swords appears to me very obscure. I am afraid I do not understand it, and I know of none who does. Schoettgen and Lightfoot have said much on the subject; others have endeavored to get rid of the difficulty by translating a "knife," which was necessary on long journeys for providing forage and fuel, as they were to depend wholly on their own industry, under God, for all the necessaries of life while going through the nations of the earth, preaching the gospel to Jews and Gentiles. I cannot say which sense the reader should prefer.

40. When he was at the place. Viz., Gethsemane. On this agony of our Lord see the notes on Matt. xxvi. 36-46.

43. There appeared an angel . . . from heaven. It was as necessary that the fullest evidence should be given, not only of our Lord's divinity, but also of His humanity. His miracles sufficiently attested the former; His hunger, weariness, and agony in the garden, as well as His death and burial, were proofs of the latter. As man, He needs the assistance of an angel to support His body, worn down by fatigue and suffering. See at the end of v. 44.

44. Prayed more earnestly. With greater emphasis and earnestness than usual, with strong crying and tears, Heb. v. 7; the reason given for which is that He was in an agony. Drops of blood. Some have thought that the meaning of the words is that the sweat was so profuse that every drop was as large as a drop of blood, not that the sweat was blood itself, but this does not appear likely. There have been cases in which persons in a debilitated state of body, through horror of soul, have had their sweat he was guide to them that took Jesus; they knew not where to find him, but he brought them to the place: when they were there, they knew not which was he, but Judas told them that whomsoever he should kiss, that same was he; so he drew near to him to kiss him. Luke takes notice of the question Christ asked him, which we have not in the other evangelists: Judas, betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss? v. 48. Must one of his own disciples betray him? Must he be betrayed with a kiss? Was ever a love-token so desecrated and abused?

II. The effort which his disciples made for his protection (v. 49): When they saw what would follow, they said, "Lord, shall we smite with the sword? Thou didst allow us to have two swords, shall we now make use of them?" But they were in too much haste and too much heat to stay for an answer. Peter, aiming at the head of one of the servants of the high priest, missed his blow, and cut off his right ear. The other evangelists tell us what was the check Christ gave to Peter for it. Luke here tells us, 1. How Christ excused the blow: Suffer ye thus far, v. 51. He said this to his enemies who came to take him, to pacify them, that they might not be provoked by it to fall upon the disciples. He speaks them fair, and, as it were, begs their pardon for an assault made upon them by one of his followers, to teach us to give good words even to our enemies. 2. How he cured the wound: He touched his ear, and healed him; fastened his ear on again. Christ hereby gave them a proof, (1) Of his power. He that could heal could destroy if he pleased. (2) Of his mercy and goodness. Christ here gave an illustrious example to his own rule of doing good to them that hate us, as afterwards he did of praying for them that despitefully use us. Those who render good for evil do as Christ did.

III. Christ's expostulation with the officers to show what an absurd thing it was for them to make all this rout and noise, v. 52, 53. Luke tells us that it was said to the chief priests and captains of the temple, so that they were all ecclesiastics, retainers to the temple, who were employed in this odious piece of service.

1. How Christ reasons with them concerning their proceedings. What occasion was there for them to come out in the dead of the night, and with swords and staves? They knew that he was one that would not resist. Why then are ye come out as against a thief? They knew he was one that would not abscond, for he was daily with them in the temple, in the midst of them.

2. How he reconciles himself to their proceedings; and this we had not before: "But this is your hour, and the power of darkness. How hard soever it may seem that I should be thus exposed, I submit, for so it is determined. Now the power of darkness, Satan, the ruler of the darkness of this world, is permitted to do his worst. Let him do his worst." It is the power of darkness that rides master, and darkness must give way to light, and the power of darkness be made to truckle to the prince of light.

We have here the melancholy story of Peter's denying his Master. Notice is not taken here, as was in the other evangelists of Christ's being now upon his examination before the high priest, only of his being brought into the high priest's house, v. 54. But the manner of expression is observable. They took him, and led him, and brought him, which methinks intimates that they were in confusion. Struck with inward terror upon what they had seen and heard, they took him the furthest way about, such a hurry were they in in their own bosoms.

I. Peter's falling. It began in sneaking. He followed Christ; this was well. But he followed afar off. He thought to trim the matter, to follow Christ, and so to satisfy his conscience, but to follow afar off, and so to save his reputation, and sleep in a whole skin. It proceeded in associating himself with the high priest's servants. The servants kindled a fire in the midst of the hall and sat down together. Peter sat down among them, as if he had been one of them. His fall itself was disclaiming all acquaintance with Christ, because he was now in distress and danger. He was charged by a sorry simple maid with being retainer to this Jesus. She looked wistfully upon him as he sat by the fire; and this man was with him, saith she. And Peter, as he had not the courage to own the charge, so he had not the wit and presence of mind to turn it off, and therefore flatly and plainly denies it: Woman, I know him not. His fall was repeated a second time (v. 58): After a little while another saw him, and said, "Even thou art one of them." Not I, saith Peter; Man, I am not. And a third time about the space of an hour after another confidently affirms, strenuously asserts it. "Of a truth this fellow reeds; and thus in His whole work He was alone, and "of the people there was none with Him."

47-54. BETRAYAL AND APPREHENSION OF JESUS—FLIGHT OF HIS DISCIPLES.

Then Simon Peter, having a sword, drew it, and smote the high priest's servant, and cut off his right ear. The servant's name was Malchus—None of the other Evangelists mention the name either of the ardent disciple or of his victim. John being "known to the high priest" (vs. 15), the mention of the servant's name by him is quite natural, and an interesting mark of truth in a small matter. As to the right ear, specified both here and in Luke, the man was "likely foremost of those who advanced to seize Jesus, and presented himself in the attitude of a combatant; hence his right side would be exposed to attack. The blow of Peter was evidently aimed vertically at his head" [WESTER and WILKINSON]. Then said Jesus—"Suffer ye thus far" (Luke 22:51). Put up thy sword into the sheath: the cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?—This expresses both the feelings which struggled in the Lord's breast during the Agony in the garden—aversion to the cup viewed in itself, but, in the light of the Father's will, perfect preparedness to drink it. (See on Luke 22:39-46.) Matthew adds to the address to Peter the following:—"For all they that take the sword shall perish by the sword" (Matt. 26:52)—i.e., 'Those who take the sword must run all the risks of human warfare; but Mine is a warfare whose weapons, as they are not carnal, are attended with no such hazards, but carry certain victory.' "Thinkest thou that I cannot now"—even after things have proceeded so far—"pray to My Father, and He shall presently give Me"—rather, 'place at My disposal'—"more than twelve legions of angels"; with allusion, possibly, to the one angel who had, in His agony, "appeared to Him from heaven strengthening Him" (Luke 22:43); and in the precise number, alluding to the twelve who needed the help, Himself and His eleven disciples. (The full complement of a legion of Roman soldiers was six thousand.) "But how then shall the scripture be fulfilled that thus it must be?" (Matt. 26:53, 54.) He could not suffer, according to the Scripture, if He allowed Himself to be delivered from the predicted death. "And He touched his ear and healed him" (Luke 22:51); for "the Son of man came not to destroy men's lives, but to save them" (Luke 9. 56), and, even while they were destroying His, to save theirs.

Then the band . . . took Jesus—but not till He had made them feel that "no man took His life from Him, but that He laid it down of Himself." And led him away—"In that hour," says Matthew (26:55, 56), and probably now, on the way to judgment. when the crowds were pressing upon Him, "said Jesus to the multitudes, Are ye come out as against a thief, with swords and staves, for to take Me"—expressive of the indignity which He felt to be thus done to Him—"I sat daily with you in the temple, and ye laid no hold on Me. But this" (adds Luke 22:53) "is your hour and the power of darkness." Matthew continues—"But all this was done that the scriptures of the prophets might be fulfilled. Then all the disciples forsook Him and fled" (Matt. 26:56)—thus fulfilling His prediction (Mark 14:27; ch. 16:32).

55-62. JESUS BEFORE CAIAPHAS—FALL OF PETER. The particulars of these two sections require a combination of all the narratives, for which see on John 18:1-27.

tinged with blood. Dr. Mead from Galen observes, "Cases sometimes happen in which, through mental pressure, the pores may be so dilated that the blood may issue from them; so that there may be a bloody sweat."

48. Betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss? Do you attempt to kiss Me as a friend, while you are delivering Me up into the hands of My enemies? We need not wonder at all this, as Satan himself had entered into the heart of this traitor; see v. 3. Consequently we can expect nothing from him but what is fell, deceitful, and cruel.

51. Suffer ye thus far. Or, "Suffer Me to go thus far." As they had now a firm hold of Christ, Matt. xxvi. 50, He wished them to permit Him to go as far as Malchus, whose ear was cut off, that He might heal it. However, the words may be understood as an address to His disciples: "Let them proceed"; make no resistance; for in this way only are the Scriptures to be fulfilled.

53. I was daily with you in the temple. Alluding to the four preceding days, during the whole of which He taught in the Temple, see chap. xxi. 37 and Matt. xxi. 17. This is your hour, and the power of darkness. That is, the time in which you are permitted to unrein your malice, which you could not do before, because God did not permit you; and so perfectly are you under His control that neither you nor the prince of darkness can proceed a hair's breadth against Me but through this permission. What a comfortable thought is it to the followers of Christ that neither men nor demons can act against them but by the permission of their Heavenly Father, and that He will not suffer any of those who trust in Him to be tried above what they are able to bear, and will make the trial issue in their greater salvation and in His glory!

56. A certain maid beheld him. Or "attentively beholding him." And this she did by the help of the light of the fire at which Peter sat.

57. And he denied him. See the notes on Matt. xxvi. 58, 69, etc.

MATTHEW HENRY

also was with him, let him deny it if he can, for you may all perceive he is a Galilean." Peter now not only denies that he is a disciple of Christ, but that he knows anything of him (v. 60): "Man, I know not what thou sayest."

II. Peter's getting up again. See how happily he recovered himself.

1. The cock crew, and this startled him and put him upon thinking. Small accidents may involve great consequences.

2. The Lord turned and looked upon him. This circumstance we had not in the other evangelists, but it is a very remarkable one. Though Christ had now his back upon Peter, and was upon his trial, yet he knew all that Peter said. Christ takes more notice of what we say and do than we think he does. When Peter disowned Christ, yet Christ did not disown him. It is well for us that Christ does not deal with us as we deal with him. Christ looked upon Peter, for he knew that, though he had denied him with his lips, yet his eye would still be towards him. He only gave him a look, which none but Peter would understand the meaning of. (1) It was a convincing look. Peter said that he did not know Christ. Christ turned, and looked upon him, as if should say, "Dost thou not know me, Peter?" (2) It was a chiding look. (3) It was an expostulating upbraiding look: "What Peter, art thou he that disownest me now? Thou that wast the most forward to confess me to be the Son of God, and didst solemnly promise thou wouldest never disown me?" (4) It was a compassionate look; he looked upon him with tenderness. "Poor Peter! How art thou fallen and undone if I do not help thee!" (5) It was a directing look. Christ guided him with his eye to retire, and bethink himself a little. (6) It was a significant look: it signified the conveying of grace to Peter's heart. The crowing of the cock would not have brought him to repentance without this look. Power went along with this look to change the heart of Peter.

3. Peter remembered the words of the Lord.

4. Then Peter went out, and wept bitterly. One look from Christ melted him into tears of godly sorrow for sin.

Verses 63–71

I. How our Lord Jesus was abused by the servants of the high priest. They that held Jesus mocked him, and smote him (v. 63). They made sport with him: this sorrowful night to him shall be a merry night to them. They hood-winked him and then, they struck him on the face, and continued to do so till he named the person that smote him (v. 64), intending hereby an affront to his prophetical office. Many other things blasphemously spoke they against him, v. 65.

II. How he was accused and condemned by the great sanhedrim, consisting of the elders of the people, the chief priests, and the scribes, who were all up betimes, and got together as soon as it was day, to prosecute this matter. They would not have been up so early for any good work.

1. They ask him, Art thou the Christ? They could not prove it upon him that he had ever said so in so many words, and therefore urged him to own it to them, v. 67. If they had asked him this question with a willingness to admit that he was the Christ, it had been well; but they asked it with a resolution not to believe him, but a design to ensnare him.

2. He justly complained of their unfair and unjust usage of him, v. 67, 68. "But," saith he, "If I tell you that I am the Christ, you will not believe. Why should the cause be brought on before you who have already prejudged it? If I ask you what you have to object against the proofs I produce, you will not answer me. You will neither answer me nor let me go; if I be not the Christ, you ought to answer the arguments with which I prove that I am; if I be, you ought to let me go; but you will do neither."

3. He referred them to his second coming, for the full proof of his being the Christ (v. 69): "Hereafter shall the Son of man sit on the right hand of the power of God, and then you will not need to ask whether he be the Christ or no."

4. Hence they inferred that he set up himself as the Son of God, and asked him whether he were so or no (v. 70): Art thou then the Son of God? He called himself the Son of man, referring to Daniel's vision of the Son of man, Dan. vii. 13, 14. But they understood so much as to know that if he was that Son of man, he was also the Son of God.

5. He owns himself to be the Son of God: Ye say that I am; that is, "I am, as ye say."

6. Upon this they ground his condemnation (v. 71): What need we any further witness? It was true, they needed not any further witness to prove that he said he was the Son of God, they had it from his own mouth.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

immediately—"while he yet spake" (Luke 22:60). the cock crew.—As Mark is the only Evangelist who tells us that our Lord predicted that the cock should crow twice (ch. 14:30), so he only mentions that it did crow twice (vs. 72). The other Evangelists, who tell us merely that our Lord predicted that "before the cock should crow he would deny Him thrice" (Matt. 26:34; Luke 22:34; John 13:38), mention only one actual crowing, which was Mark's last. This is something affecting in this Evangelist —who, according to the earliest tradition (confirmed by internal evidence), derived his materials so largely from Peter as to have been styled his "interpreter," being the only one who gives both the sad prediction and its still sadder fulfilment in full. It seems to show that Peter himself not only retained through all his after-life the most vivid recollection of the circumstances of his fall, but that he was willing that others should know them too. The immediately subsequent acts are given in full only in Luke (22:61, 62): "And the Lord turned and looked upon Peter," from the hall of judgment to the court, in the way already explained. But who can tell what lightning flashes of wounded love and piercing reproach shot from that "look" through the eye of Peter into his heart! "And Peter remembered the word of the Lord, how He had said unto him, Before the cock crow, thou shalt deny Me thrice. And Peter went out and wept bitterly." How different from the sequel of Judas' act! Doubtless the hearts of the two men towards the Saviour were perfectly different from the first; and the treason of Judas was but the consummation of the wretched man's resistance of the blaze of light in the midst of which he had lived for three years, while Peter's denial was but a momentary obscuration of the heavenly light and love to his Master which ruled his life. But the immediate cause of the revulsion, which made Peter "weep bitterly," was, beyond all doubt, this heart-piercing "look" which his Lord gave him. And remembering the Saviour's own words at the table, "Simon, Simon, Satan hath desired to have you that he may sift you as wheat, but I have prayed [rather, 'I prayed'] for thee that thy faith fail not" (see on Luke 22:31, 32), may we not say that this prayer fetched down all that there was in that "look" to pierce and break the heart of Peter, to keep it from despair, to work in it "repentance unto salvation not to be repented of," and at length, under other healing touches, to "restore his soul?" (See on Mark 16:7.)

63-71. JESUS CONDEMNED TO DIE AND SHAMEFULLY ENTREATED. (See on Mark 14:53-63; John 18:19, etc.; and on vss. 55-62.)

Art thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed?—Why our Lord should have answered this question, when He was silent as to the former, we might not have quite seen, but for Matthew, who says (26:63) that the high priest put Him upon solemn oath, saying, "I adjure Thee by the living God, that Thou tell us whether Thou be the Christ, the Son of God." Such an adjuration was understood to render an answer legally necessary (Lev. 5:1). And Jesus said, I am—or, as in Matthew 26:64, "Thou hast said [it]." In Luke, however (22:70), the answer, "Ye say that I am," should be rendered—as DE WETTE, MEYER, ELLICOTT, and the best critics agree that the preposition requires —"Ye say [it], for I am [so]." Some words, however, were spoken by our Lord before giving His answer to this solemn question. These are recorded by Luke alone (22:67, 68): "Art Thou the Christ [they asked]? tell us. And He said unto them, If I tell you, ye will not believe: and if I also ask [interrogate] "you, ye will not answer Me, nor let Me go." This seems to have been uttered before giving His direct answer, as a calm remonstrance and dignified protest against the prejudgment of His case and the unfairness of their mode of procedure. But now let us hear the rest of the answer, in which the conscious majesty of Jesus breaks forth from behind the dark cloud which overhung Him as He stood before the Council. and—in that character—ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven—In Matthew (26:64) a slightly different but interesting turn is given to it by one word: "Thou hast said [it]: nevertheless"—We prefer this sense of the word to "besides," which some recent critics decide for—"I say unto you, Hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sit on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven." The word rendered "hereafter" means, not "at some future time" (as today "hereafter commonly does), but what the English word originally

ADAM CLARKE

Peter remembered the word of Jesus. Luke says, chap. xxii. 61, "The Lord turned, and looked upon Peter." And wept bitterly. Felt bitter anguish of soul, which evidenced itself by the tears of contrition which flowed plentifully from his eyes. "Let him that standeth take heed lest he fall." Where the mighty have been slain, what shall support the feeble? Only the grace of the almighty God. This transaction is recorded by the inspired penmen: (1) That all may watch unto prayer, and shun the occasions of sin. (2) That if a man be unhappily overtaken in a fault, he may not despair, but cast himself immediately with a contrite heart on the infinite tenderness and compassion of God.

62. And Peter went out. The word Peter is omitted by many good MSS., and some of the ancient versions.

63. Mocked him, and smote him. This and the following verses are placed by Matthew and Mark before the relation of Peter's denial. For their explanation, see on Matt. xxvi. 67-68.

68. And if I also ask you. Concerning the Christ, in case you cannot give Me such an answer as may prove I am not the Christ, you will not let Me go; for I know you are determined to put Me to death.

69. Hereafter. "From this very time." The kingdom of God is now going to be set up. See the note on Matt. xvi. 27-28.

70. Art thou then the Son of God? They all insisted on an answer to this question, and the high priest particularly put it to Him, Matt. xxvi. 63.

71. We ourselves have heard. We have heard Him profess himself the Son of God; He is therefore guilty of blasphemy, and, as an impious pretender to a divine mission, we must proceed against and condemn Him to death. See the note on Matt. xxvi. 66. Thus they proceeded as far as they could; He must now be brought before Pilate, as the Jews had no power to put Him to death. His trial before Pilate is related in the subsequent chapter.

On our Lord's agony in the garden, related in the forty-third and forty-fourth verses, much has been written, but to little purpose. The cause of this agony seems not to have been well understood, and there have been many wild conjectures concerning it. Some think it was occasioned by "the Divine wrath pressing in upon him; for, as he was bearing the sin of the world, God looked on and treated him as if he were a sinner." There is something very shocking in this supposition; and yet it is truly astonishing how general it is. The ministry of the angel, in this case, is a sufficient refutation of this opinion; for what sort of strength could an angel give Christ against God's indignation? Indeed the ministry of the angel, who must have been sent from God, and sent in love too, is a full proof that God's wrath was not poured out on our blessed Redeemer at this time. What renders this circumstance more difficult is that there is no mention of it in any of the other Evangelists; and it is worthy of remark that, among many of the ancients, the authenticity of these two verses, the forty-third and forty-fourth, has been doubted, and in consequence they are omitted in several MSS. and in some versions and fathers. The Codex Alexandrinus and the Codex Vaticanus omit both verses; in some other very ancient MSS. they stand with an asterisk before them, as a mark of dubiousness. They are, however, extant in such a vast number of MSS., versions, and fathers as to leave no doubt with most critics of their authenticity. After all that has been said or perhaps can be said on this subject there will remain mysteries which only the bright light of the eternal world can sufficiently illustrate. That Christ was now suffering, "the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God," and that He was bearing in His body the punishment due to their sins, I have no doubt; and that the agony of His mind in these vicarious sufferings caused the effusion of the bloody sweat from His body may be easily credited without supposing Him to be at all under the displeasure of His Heavenly Father. For as God can see nothing but as it is, He

Our Lord Jesus was condemned as a blasphemer in the spiritual court. When they had condemned him, they knew they could not put him to death, and therefore took another course.

I. They accused him before Pilate. The whole multitude of them arose, led him unto Pilate, and they demanded justice against him, not as a blasphemer (that was no crime that he took cognizance of), but as one disaffected to the Roman government, which they in their hearts did not look upon as any crime at all.

1. Here is the indictment drawn up against him (v. 2). They misrepresented him, (1) As making the people rebel against Caesar. It was true, and Pilate knew it, that there was a general uneasiness in the people under the Roman yoke. They would have Pilate believe that this Jesus was active to foment that general discontent: We have found him perverting the nation. Christ had particularly taught that they ought to give tribute to Caesar, and yet he is here falsely accused as forbidding to give tribute to Caesar. Innocency is no fence against calumny. (2) As making himself a rival with Caesar, though the very reason why they rejected him was because he did not offer to do anything against Caesar; yet this is what they charged him with, that he said, he himself is Christ a king.

2. His pleading to the indictment: Pilate asked him, Art thou the king of the Jews? v. 3. To which he answered, Thou sayest it; that is, "It is as thou sayest." Christ's kingdom is wholly spiritual, and will not interfere with Caesar's jurisdiction. All that knew him knew that he never pretended to be the king of the Jews, in opposition to Caesar as supreme.

3. Pilate's declaration of his innocency (v. 4): He said to the chief priests, and the people, "I find no fault in this man."

4. The continued fury and outrage of the prosecutors, v. 5. Instead of being moderated by Pilate's declaration of his innocency they were the more exasperated, more exceedingly fierce. We do not find that they have any particular fact to produce, but they resolve to carry it with noise and confidence: He stirs up the people, teaching throughout all Judea, beginning from Galilee to this place. He did stir up the people, but it was to everything that was virtuous and praiseworthy. He did teach, but they could not charge him with teaching any doctrine that tended to disturb the public peace.

II. They accused him before Herod. 1. Pilate removed him and his cause to Herod's court. The accusers mentioned Galilee. "Why," said Pilate, "is he of that country? Is he a Galilean?" v. 6. "Yes," said they. "Let us send him to Herod then," said Pilate, "since he belongs to Herod's jurisdiction." Pilate was already sick of the cause, and desirous to rid his hands of it. 2. Herod was very willing to have the examining of him (v. 8): When he saw Jesus he was exceedingly glad. He had heard many things of him in Galilee, and he longed to see him, but purely out of curiosity; and it was only to gratify this that he hoped to have seen some miracle done by him. In order to this, he questioned with him in many things. But Jesus answered him nothing; nor would he gratify him so much as with the performance of one miracle. The poorest beggar, that asked a miracle for the relief of his necessity, was never denied; but this proud prince, is denied. He might have seen Christ and his wondrous works many a time in Galilee, and would not. Now he would see them, and shall not; because he knew not the day of his visitation. Miracles must not be made cheap, nor Omnipotence be at the beck of the greatest potentate. 3. His prosecutors appeared against him before Herod. They stood, and vehemently accused him (v. 10), impudently and boldly, so the word signifies. 4. Herod was very abusive to him: He, with his men of war, set him at nought. They made nothing of him; so the word is. They laughed at him as one that had lost his power, and was become weak as other men. Herod was more abusive to Christ than Pilate was. Herod arrayed Christ in a gorgeous robe, as a mock-king; and so he taught Pilate's soldiers afterwards to do him the same indignity. 5. Herod sent him back to Pilate, and it proved an occasion of the making of them friends. Herod would not condemn him as a malefactor, and therefore sent him again to Pilate (v. 11), and so returned Pilate's civility and respect; and this mutual obligation brought them to a better understanding signified "after here," "after now," or "from this time." Accordingly, in Luke 22:69, the words used mean "from now."

Vss. 1-5. JESUS BEFORE PILATE. (See on Mark 5:1-5; and John 18:28-19:22.)

-I find in him no fault—no crime. This so exasperated "the chief priests and elders" that, afraid of losing their prey, they poured forth a volley of charges against Him, as appears from Luke 23:4, 5: on Pilate's affirming His innocence, "they were the more fierce, saying, He stirreth up the people, teaching throughout all Jewry, beginning from Galilee to this place." They see no hope of getting Pilate's sanction to His death unless they can fasten upon Him a charge of conspiracy against the government; and as Galilee was noted for its turbulence (Luke 13:1; Acts 5:37), and our Lord's ministry lay chiefly there, they artfully introduce it to give color to their charge. "And the chief priests accused Him of many things, but He answered nothing (Mark 15.3). Then said Pilate unto Him, Hearest Thou not how many things they witness against Thee? And He answered him to never a word, insomuch that the governor marvelled greatly" (Matt. 27:13, 14). See on Mark 15:3-5. In his perplexity, Pilate, hearing of Galilee, bethinks himself of the expedient of sending Him to Herod, in the hope of thereby further shaking off responsibility in the case. See on Mark 15:6, and on Luke 23:6-12. The return of the prisoner only deepened the perplexity of Pilate, who, "calling together the chief priests, rulers, and people," tells them plainly that not one of their charges against "this man" had been made good, while even Herod, to whose jurisdiction he more naturally belonged, had done nothing to Him: He "will therefore chastise and release him" (Luke 23:13-16).

6-12. JESUS BEFORE HEROD. (See on Mark 15: 6). 7. sent him to Herod—hoping thus to escape the dilemma of an unjust condemnation or an unpopular release. at Jerusalem . . . at that time—to keep the passover.

8. some miracle—Fine sport thou expectedst, as the Philistines with Samson (Judg. 16:25), O coarse, crafty, cruel tyrant! But thou hast been baulked before (see on ch. 13:31-33), and shalt be again. 9. answered . . . nothing—(See Matt. 7:6).

10. stood and vehemently accused him—no doubt both of treason before the king, and of blasphemy, for the king was a Jew. 11. his men of war—his bodyguard. set him at naught . . .—stung with disappointment at His refusal to amuse him with miracles or answer any of his questions. gorgeous robe—bright robe. If this mean (as sometimes) of shining white, this being the royal color among the Jews, it may have been in derision of His claim to be "King of the Jews." But if so, "He in reality honored Him, as did Pilate with His true title blazoned on the cross" [BENGEL]. sent him again to Pilate—instead of releasing him as he ought, having established nothing against Him (vss. 14, 15). "Thus he implicated himself with Pilate could not see Him as a sinner who was purity itself. In every act Jesus was that beloved Son in whom the Father was ever well pleased.

1. The whole multitude. It seems most probable that the chief priests, elders, scribes, and captains of the Temple, together with their servants, dependents, and other persons hired for the purpose, made up the multitude mentioned here. The common people were generally favorers of Christ; and for this reason the Jewish rulers caused Him to be apprehended in the night and in the absence of the people, chap. xxii. 6, and it was now but just the break of day, xxii. 66.

2. Perverting the nation. The Greek word signifies "stirring up to disaffection and rebellion." Many MSS. and versions add "our" nation. They intimated that He not only preached corrupt doctrine, but that He endeavored to make them disaffected towards the Roman government, for which they now pretended to feel a strong affection! Forbidding to give tribute to Caesar. These were the falsest slanders that could be invented. The whole of our Lord's conduct disproved them. And His decision in the case of the question about the lawfulness of paying tribute to Caesar, Matt. xxii. 21, was so fully known that we find Pilate paid not the least attention to such evidently malicious and unfounded accusations. Neither Christ nor any of His followers, from that day until now, ever forbade the paying tribute to Caesar; that is, constitutional taxes to a lawful prince.

7. Herod's jurisdiction. The city of Nazareth, in which Christ had continued till He was thirty years of age, and that of Capernaum, in which He principally resided the last years of His life, were both in lower Galilee, of which Herod Antipas was tetrarch. Pilate was probably glad of this opportunity to pay a little respect to Herod, whom it is likely he had irritated, and with whom he now wished to be friends. See v. 12.

10. The chief priests . . . vehemently accused him. Corrupt priests and teachers are generally the most implacable enemies of Christ and His truth. Evil passions betray those who are slaves to them. An affected moderation would have rendered these accusers less suspected, their accusations more probable, and the envy less visible than this vehemence. But envy seldom or never consults prudence, and God permits this to be so for the honor of truth and innocence.

11. A gorgeous robe. It probably means a "white robe," for it was the custom of the Jewish nobility to wear such. Hence in Rev. iii. 4 it is said of the saints, "They shall walk with me in white [garments]: for they are worthy." In such a robe Herod, by way of mockery, caused our Lord to be clothed; but the nobility among the Romans wearing purple for the most part, Pilate's soldiers, who were Romans, put on Jesus a "purple robe," Mark xv. 17; John xix. 2—both of them following the custom of their own country, when, by way of mocking our Lord as a King, they clothed Him in robes of state.

MATTHEW HENRY

one of another, v. 12. They had been at enmity between themselves. Observe how those that quarrelled with one another yet could unite against Christ. Christ is the great peacemaker; both Pilate and Herod owned his innocency, and their agreeing in this cured their disagreeing in other things.

Verses 13–25

We have here the blessed Jesus run down by the mob, and hurried to the cross in the storm of a popular noise and tumult.

I. Pilate solemnly protests that he believes he has done nothing worthy of death or of bonds. And, if he did believe so, he ought immediately to have discharged him. But, being himself a bad man, he had no kindness for Christ, and was afraid of displeasing the people; and therefore, for want of integrity, he called together the chief priests, and rulers, and people, and will hear what they have to say (v. 14): "You have brought," said he, "this man to me, and I have examined him before you, and have heard all you have to allege against him, and I can make nothing of it: I find no fault in him."

II. He appeals to Herod concerning him (v. 15): "I sent you to him, and he has sent him back; in his opinion, his crimes are not capital. He has laughed at him as a weak man, but has not stigmatized him as a dangerous man." He thought Bedlam a fitter place for him than Tyburn.

III. He proposes to release him, if they will but consent to it. He ought to have done it without asking leave of them. But the fear of man brings many into this snare, that, they will do an unjust thing rather than pull an old house about their ears. To please the people, 1. He will release him under the notion of a malefactor, because of necessity he must release one (v. 17). 2. He will chastise him, and release him. If no fault is to be found in him, why should he be chastised?

IV. The people choose rather to have Barabbas released. He was imprisoned for a sedition made in the city, and for murder, yet this was the criminal that was preferred before Christ: Away with this man, and release unto us Barabbas, v. 18, 19.

V. When Pilate urged the second time that Christ should be released, they cried out, Crucify him, crucify him, v. 20, 21. Nothing less will serve but he must be crucified: Crucify him, crucify him.

VI. When Pilate the third time reasoned with them they were the more peremptory and outrageous (v. 22): "Why? What evil hath he done? Name his crime. I have found no cause of death, I will chastise him and let him go." But they were instant with loud voices, not requesting, but requiring, that he might be crucified; as if they had as much right to demand the crucifying of one that was innocent as the release of one that was guilty.

VII. Pilate's yielding, at length. The voice of the people and of the chief priests prevailed. He gave sentence that it should be as they required, v. 24. This is repeated, in v. 25, with the aggravating circumstance of the release of Barabbas: He released unto them him that for sedition and murder was cast into prison, because him they had desired; but he delivered Jesus to their will, and he could not deal more barbarously with him than to deliver him to their will.

It is strange with what expedition they went through his trial. He was brought before the chief priests at break of day (ch. xxii. 66), after that to Pilate, then to Herod, then to Pilate again; and there seems to have been a long struggle between Pilate and the people about him. He was scourged, and crowned with thorns, and contumeliously used, and all this was done in four or five hours' time, or six at most, for he was crucified between nine o'clock and twelve. Never anyone was so chased out of the world as Christ was. Now as they led him away to death we find,

I. One that was a bearer, that carried his cross, Simon by name, a Cyrenian. They laid Christ's cross upon him, that he might bear it after Jesus (v. 26), lest Jesus should faint under it. It was pity, but a cruel pity, that gave him this ease.

II. Many that were mourners. The common people, were moved with compassion towards him, because they had reason to think he suffered unjustly. This drew a great crowd after him, as is usual at executions. A great company of people followed him, especially of women (v. 27); they also bewailed and lamented him. Though there were many that reproached and reviled him, yet there were some that valued him, and pitied him. Many bewail Christ that do not believe in him, and lament him that do not love him above all. He found time and heart to take cognizance of their tears. Christ died lamented. He turned to them, and bade them not weep for him, but for themselves, in all the guilt of His condemnation, and with him accordingly he is classed" (Acts 4:27) [BENGEL]. at enmity—perhaps about some point of disputed jurisdiction, which this exchange of the Prisoner might tend to heal.

13-38. JESUS AGAIN BEFORE PILATE—DELIVERED UP—LED AWAY TO BE CRUCIFIED. (See on Mark 15:6-15; and John 19:2-17.)

Luke 23:13-16: And Pilate, when he had called together the chief priests and the rulers and the people, said unto them, Ye have brought this man unto me, as one that perverteth the people: and, behold, I, having examined him before you—from the first three Gospels we should conclude that the whole examination hitherto had been in their presence, while John represents it as private; but in all likelihood the reference here is to what is related in verses 3-5, though too briefly to enable us to see the precise form which the examination took throughout—have found no fault in this man touching those things whereof ye accuse him: No, nor yet Herod: for I sent you to him; and, lo, nothing worthy of death is done unto him—or rather, "by him," as the phrase sometimes means classically, and here must be held to mean. I will therefore chastise him, and let him go. "When, therefore, I have corrected, I will dismiss Him." Though the kind of correction which he proposed to inflict was not specified by Pilate on this occasion, there can be no doubt that scourging was what he meant, and the event soon proved it. It seems strange to our ideas of justice that a Roman governor should propose to punish, however lightly, a prisoner whose innocence he had just proclaimed. But it was of the nature of a well-meant, yet indefensible offer, in hope of saving the prisoner's life.

Matt. 27:15-23: "Now at that feast the governor was wont to release unto the people a prisoner, whom they would. And they had then a notable [or notorious] prisoner called Barabbas"—"which," says Mark (15:7), "lay bound with them that had made insurrection with him" or "with his fellow insurgents, who had committed murder in the insurrection." But in Luke (23:19) the murder is expressly ascribed to this Barabbas, who is also called "a robber." He was evidently the ringleader of this lawless gang; and there we learn that the "sedition" here referred to was "made in the city." "And the multitude," says Mark, "crying aloud, began to desire him to do as he had ever done unto them." This is peculiar to Mark, and enables us vividly to realize the rising of the popular excitement before which Pilate—reluctantly though it was—gave way. But this clamor for the exercise of his usual clemency at the feast suggested another expedient for saving his conscience—the selection of Jesus as the prisoner of his choice for this release; not doubting that between Jesus and such a villain as this Barabbas they would for very shame be forced to prefer the former. But he little knew his men, if he thought that. "Therefore," continues Matthew, "when they were gathered together, Pilate saith unto them, Whom will ye that I release unto you? Barabbas, or Jesus which is called Christ? For he knew that for envy they had delivered him"—that is, out of jealousy at the popularity of Jesus, and fear of losing their own. This would seem to show that Pilate was not ignorant of the leading facts of this case.

Cyrenian—of Cyrene, in Libya, on the north coast of Africa, where were many Jews who had a synagogue at Jerusalem (Acts 6:9, and see 2:10). He was "the father of Alexander and Rufus" (Mark 15:21), probably better known afterwards than himself, as disciples. (See Rom. 16:13.) out of the country—and casually drawn into that part of the crowd. laid the cross—"Him they compel to bear His cross," (Matt. 27:32)—sweet compulsion, if it issued in him or his sons voluntarily "taking up their cross!" It would appear that our Lord had first to bear His own cross (John 19:17), but being from exhaustion unable to proceed, it was laid on another to bear it "after Him."

ADAM CLARKE

12. Pilate and Herod were made friends. I do not find any account of the cause of the enmity which subsisted between Herod and Pilate given by ancient authors, and the conjectures of the moderns on the subject should be considered as mere guesses. It is generally supposed that this enmity arose from what is related in chap. xiii of the Galileans whose blood Pilate had mingled with that of their sacrifices. These were Herod's subjects, and Pilate seems to have fallen on them at the time they were offering sacrifices to God at the Temple.

15. No, nor yet Herod: for I sent you to him. That is, to see whether he could find that Christ had ever attempted to raise any disaffection or sedition among the Galileans, among whom He had spent the principal part of His life; and yet Herod has not been able to find out any evil in His conduct. Your own accusations I have fully weighed, and find them frivolous to the last degree. Instead of for I sent you to him, many MSS., with some versions, read, "For he hath sent Him to us." As if he had said, "Herod had sent Him back to us, which is a sure proof that he had found no blame in Him." Nothing worthy of death is done unto him. Or rather, "Nothing worthy of death is committed by Him," not done unto him.

17. For of necessity he must release one. That is, he was under the necessity of releasing one at this feast. The custom, however it originated, had now been so completely established that Pilate was obliged to attend to it.

18. Away with this man. That is, "Put Him to death"—literally, "Take this One away," i.e., to punishment, to death.

22. I have found no cause of death in him. "I find no crime worthy of death in Him." There is nothing proved against Him that can at all justify me in putting Him to death. So here our blessed Lord was in the most formal manner justified by His judge. Now as this decision was publicly known, and perhaps registered, it is evident that Christ died as an innocent Person, and not as a malefactor. On the fullest conviction of His innocence, His judge pronounced Him guiltless, after having patiently heard everything that the inventive malice of these wicked men could allege against Him; and when he wished to dismiss Him, a violent mob took and murdered Him.

26. Simon, a Cyrenian. See on Matt. xxvii. 32.

27. Bewailed and lamented him. "Beat their breasts."

v. 28.

1. He gives them a general direction concerning their lamentations: Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me. They must not weep for him only, but rather let them weep for themselves and for their children. When with an eye of faith we behold Christ crucified we ought to weep, not for him, but for ourselves. The death of Christ was a thing peculiar; it was his victory and triumph over his enemies; it was our deliverance, and the purchase of eternal life for us. And therefore let us weep, not for him, but for our own sins, and the sins of our children, that were the cause of his death.

2. He gives them a particular reason why they should weep for themselves and for their children: "For behold sad times are coming upon your city." He had lately wept over Jerusalem himself, and now he bids them weep over it. Christ's tears should set us weeping. Now the destruction of Jerusalem is here foretold by two proverbial sayings, which both bespeak it very terrible, that what people commonly dread they would then desire, to be written childless and to be buried alive. (1) They would wish to be written childless. They will envy those that have none, and say, Blessed are the barren, and the wombs that never bare. (2) They would wish to be buried alive: They shall begin to say to the mountains, Fall on us, and to the hills, Cover us, v. 30. They shall wish to be hid in the darkest caves, that they may be out of the noise of these calamities. They will be willing to be sheltered upon any terms, though with the hazard of being crushed to pieces.

3. He shows how natural it was for them to infer this desolation from his sufferings. If they do these things in a green tree, what shall be done in the dry? v. 31. Christ was a green tree, fruitful and flourishing; now, if such things were done to him, we may thence infer what would have been done to the whole race of mankind if he had not interposed, and what shall be done to those that continue dry trees, notwithstanding all that is done to make them fruitful. The consideration of the bitter sufferings of our Lord Jesus should engage us to stand in awe of the justice of God. The best saints, compared with Christ, are dry trees; if he suffer, why may not they expect to suffer?

I. Divers passages which we had before in Matthew and Mark concerning Christ's sufferings. 1. That there were two others, malefactors, led with him to the place of execution. 2. That he was crucified at a place called Calvary—the place of a skull. He was crucified. This was a painful and shameful death above any other. 3. That he was crucified in the midst between two thieves. Thus he was not only treated as a transgressor, but numbered with them. 4. That the soldiers who were employed in the execution seized his garments as their fee, and divided them among themselves by lot: They parted his raiment and cast lots. 5. That he was reviled and reproached: The people stood beholding, and the rulers stood among the rabble, and derided him, and they said, He saved others, let him save himself. They challenged him to save himself from the cross, when he was saving others by the cross: If he be the Christ, the chosen of God, let him save himself. They mocked him (v. 36, 37); they made sport with him, and made a jest of his sufferings. And they said, If thou be the king of the Jews, save thyself. 6. That the superscription over his head, setting forth his crime, was This is the King of the Jews, v. 38. He is put to death for pretending to be the king of the Jews; but God intended it to be a declaration of what he really was: he is the king of the Jews, and his cross is the way to his crown. This was written in those that were called the three learned languages, Greek, and Latin, and Hebrew. It was written in these three languages that it might be known and read of all men. In these three languages is Jesus Christ proclaimed king.

II. Here are two passages which we had not before, and they are very remarkable ones.

1. Christ's prayer for his enemies (v. 34): Father, forgive them. Seven remarkable words Christ spoke after he was nailed to the cross, and before he died, and this is the first. As soon as ever he was fastened to the cross, or while they were nailing him, he prayed this prayer, in which observe,

(1) The petition: Father, forgive them. The sin they were now guilty of might justly have been made unpardonable. No, these are particularly prayed for. Now he made intercession for transgressors. Now the sayings of Christ upon the cross as well as his sufferings had a further intention than they seemed to have. This was explicatory of the intent and meaning of his death: "Father, forgive them, not only these, but all that shall repent, and believe the gospel." The great thing which Christ died to pur-

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

27-31. women—not the precious Galilean women (vs. 49), but part of the crowd. 28. not for me . . .—noble spirit of compassion, rising above His own dread endurances, in tender commiseration of sufferings yet in the distance and far lighter, but without His supports and consolations!

30. mountains . . . hills . . .—(Hos. 10:8), flying hither and thither as they did in despair for shelter, during the siege; a very slight premonition of cries of another and more awful kind (Isa. 2:10, 19, 21; Rev. 6:16, 17).

31. green tree—that naturally resists the fire. the dry—that attracts the fire, being its proper fuel. The proverb here plainly means: "If such sufferings alight upon the innnocent One, the very Lamb of God, what must be in store for those who are provoking the flames?"

32-38, 44-46. CRUCIFIXION AND DEATH OF THE LORD JESUS. (See on John 19:17-30.)

they crucified him, and two others with him—"malefactors" (Luke 23:33), "thieves" (rather "robbers," Matt. 27:38; Mark 15:27). on either side one and Jesus in the midst—a hellish expedient, to hold Him up as the worst of the three. But in this, as in many other of their doings, "the scripture was fulfilled, which saith (Isa. 53:12), And he was numbered with the transgressors"—(Mark 15: 28)—though the prediction reaches deeper.

Pilate wrote a title, and put it on the cross . . . Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews . . . and it was written in Hebrew—or Syro-Chaldaic, the language of the country—and Greek—the current language—and Latin—the official language. These were the chief languages of the earth, and this secured that all spectators should be able to read it. Stung by this, the Jewish ecclesiastics entreat that it may be so altered as to express, not His real dignity, but His false claim to it. But Pilate thought he had yielded quite enough to them; and having intended expressly to spite and insult them by this title, for having got him to act against his own sense of justice, he peremptorily refused them. And thus, amidst the conflicting passions of men, was proclaimed, in the chief tongues of mankind, from the Cross itself and in circumstances which threw upon it a lurid yet grand light, the truth which drew the Magi to His manger, and will yet be owned by all the world!

"Then said Jesus"—['probably while being nailed to the CROSS'] [OLSHAUSEN], "FATHER, FORGIVE THEM, FOR THEY KNOW NOT WHAT THEY DO" (Luke 23:34)—and again the Scripture was fulfilled which said, "And He made intercession for the transgressors" (Isa. 53:12), though this also reaches deeper. (See Acts 3:17; 13:27; and cf. I Tim. 1:13). Often have we

28. Weep not for me. Many pious persons have been greatly distressed in their minds because they could not weep on reading or hearing of the sufferings of Christ. For the relief of all such let it be forever known that no human spirit can possibly take any part in the passion of the Messiah. His sufferings were such as only God manifested in the flesh could bear; and as they were all of an expiatory nature, no man can taste of or share in them.

30. Mountains, fall on us. As this refers to the destruction of Jerusalem, and as the same expressions are used in Rev. vi. 16, Dr. Lightfoot conjectures that the whole of that chapter may relate to the same event.

31. If they do these things in a green tree. This seems to be a proverbial expression, the sense of which is: If they spare not a tree which, by the beauty of its foliage, abundance and excellence of its fruits, deserves to be preserved, then the tree which is dry and withered will surely be cut down. If an innocent Man be put to death in the very face of justice, in opposition to all its dictates and decisions, by a people who profess to be governed and directed by divine laws, what desolation, injustice, and oppression may not be expected when anarchy and confusion sit in the place where judgment and justice formerly presided? Our Lord alludes prophetically to those tribulations which fell upon the Jewish people about forty years after.

32. Two other, malefactors. Should certainly be translated "two others, malefactors," as in the Bibles published by the King's printer, Edinburgh. As it now stands in the text, it seems to intimate that our blessed Lord was also a malefactor.

33. The place which is called Calvary. See on Matt. xxvii. 33. They crucified him. See the nature of this punishment explained, Matt. xxvii. 35.

33. A place called Golgotha. From the Hebrew golgoleth, "a skull," probably so called from the many skulls of those who had suffered crucifiicion and other capital punishments scattered up and down in the place. It is the same as Calvary, Calvaria, i.e., calvi capitis area, the place of bare skulls. Some think the place was thus called because it was in the form of a human skull. It is likely that it was the place of public execution.

In the prayer, Father, forgive them, that word of prophecy was fulfilled, "He made intercession for the transgressors," Isa. liii. 12.

MATTHEW HENRY

chase and procure for us is the forgiveness of sin. His blood speaks this: Father, forgive them. Though they were his persecutors and murderers, he prayed, Father, forgive them.

(2) The plea: For they know not what they do; for, if they had known, they would not have crucified him. The crucifiers of Christ know not what they do. There is a kind of ignorance that does in part excuse sin: ignorance through want of the means of knowledge or of a capacity to receive instruction. The crucifiers of Christ were kept in ignorance by their rulers, and had prejudices against him instilled into them, so that in what they did against Christ and his doctrine they thought they did God service. Such are to be pitied and prayed for. We must in prayer call God Father. The great thing we must beg of God, both for ourselves and others, is the forgiveness of sins. We must pray for our enemies, and those that hate and persecute us; and we must be earnest with God in prayer for the forgiveness of their sins, their sins against us. This is Christ's example to his own rule (Matt. v. 44, 45, Love your enemies). If Christ loved and prayed for such enemies, what enemies can we have that we are not obliged to love and pray for?

2. The conversion of the thief upon the cross. Christ was crucified between two thieves, and in them were represented the different effects which the cross of Christ would have upon the children of men. Now the cross of Christ is to some a savour of life unto life, to others of death unto death.

(1) Here was one of these malefactors that was hardened to the last. Near to the cross of Christ, he railed on him, as others did (v. 39): he said, If thou be the Christ save thyself and us. Though he was now in pain and agony, yet this did not humble his proud spirit, nor teach him to give good language, no, not to his fellow-sufferer. He challenges Christ to save both himself and them. There are some that have the impudence to rail at Christ, and yet the confidence to expect to be saved by him.

(2) Here was the other of them that was softened at the last. This malefactor was snatched as a brand out of the burning, and made a monument of divine mercy and grace. This gives no encouragement to any to put off their repentance, for, though it is certain that true repentance is never too late, it is as certain that late repentance is seldom true. He never had any offer of Christ, nor day or grace, before now: he was designed to be made a singular instance of the power of Christ's grace. Christ, having conquered Satan in the destruction of Judas and the preservation of Peter, erects this further trophy of his victory over him. We shall see the case to be extraordinary if we observe,

[1] The extraordinary operations of God's grace upon him, which appeared in what he said.

First, See what he said to the other malefactor, v. 40, 41. 1. He reproved him for railing at Christ, as destitute of the fear of God: Dost not thou fear God? This implies that it was the fear of God which restrained him from following the multitude to do this evil. "If thou hadst any humanity in thee, thou wouldest not insult over one that is thy fellow-sufferer; thou art in the same condition; thou art a dying man too." 2. He owns that he deserves what was done to him: We indeed justly. We received the due reward of our deeds. True penitents acknowledge the justice of God in all the punishments of their sin. God has done right, but we have done wickedly. 3. He believes Christ to have suffered wrongfully. This penitent thief is convinced, by his conduct in his sufferings, that he has done nothing amiss. The chief priests would have him crucified between the malefactors, as one of them; but this thief has more sense than they.

Secondly, See what he said to our Lord Jesus: Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom, v. 42. This is the prayer of a dying sinner to a dying Saviour. It was the honour of Christ to be thus prayed to. It was the happiness of the thief thus to pray; perhaps he never prayed before, and yet now was heard, and saved at the last gasp. Observe his faith in this prayer. In his confession of sin (v. 41) he discovered repentance towards God. In this petition he discovered faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ. He owns him to be Lord, and to have a kingdom, and that he was going to that kingdom, and that those should be happy whom he favoured; and to believe and confess all this was a great thing at this time of day. He believed another life after this, and desired to be happy in that life, not as the other thief, to be saved from the cross, but to be well provided for when the cross had done its worst. Observe his humility in this prayer. All he begs is, Lord, remember me, referring himself to Christ in what way to remember him. Christ remembered this thief. There is an air of importunity and fervency in this prayer.

occasion to observe how our Lord is the first to fulfil His own precepts—thus furnishing the right interpretation and the perfect Model of them. (See on Matt. 5:44.) How quickly was it seen in "His martyr Stephen," that though He had left the earth in Person, His Spirit remained behind, and Himself could, in some of His brightest lineaments, be reproduced in His disciples! (Acts 7:60.) And what does the world in every age owe to these few words, spoken where and as they were spoken!

39-43. THE TWO THIEVES. 39. railed on him—catching up the universal derision, but with a turn of his own. Jesus, "reviled, reviles not again"; but another voice from the cross shall nobly wipe out this dishonor and turn it to the unspeakable glory of the dying Redeemer.

F. B. MEYER:

The signs of renewal, wrought in the heart of the penitent thief, showed the sure work of the Holy Spirit. These were: the fear of God, the sense of justice in his suffering, the confession of evil deeds, the recognition of our Lord's sinlessness and dignity, and the anticipation of his coming kingdom. We may begin a day under the dull skies of earth and close it where there is no need of sun or moon (Phil. 1:23; 2 Cor. 5:6). The rent veil (Heb. 10:20). Dying saints have often passed home with our Lord's last words on their lips (Ps. 31:5; Acts 7:59).
—Bible Commentary

40. Dost not thou—"thou" is emphatic: 'Let others jeer, but dost thou?' fear God—Hast thou no fear of meeting Him so soon as thy righteous Judge? Thou art within an hour or two of eternity, and dost thou spend it in reckless disregard of coming judgment? in the same condemnation—He has been condemned to die, but is it better with thee? Doth even a common lot kindle no sympathy in thy breast? 41. we . . . justly . . .—He owns the worst of his crimes and deserts, and would fain shame his fellow into the same. nothing amiss—lit., "out of place"; hence "unnatural"; a striking term here. Our Lord was not charged with ordinary crime, but only with laying claim to office and honors which amounted to blasphemy. The charge of treason had not even a show of truth, as Pilate told His enemies. In this defense then there seems more than meets the eye. 'He made Himself the promised Messiah, the Son of God; but in this He "did nothing amiss"; He ate with publicans and sinners, and bade all the weary and heavy laden come and rest under His wing; but in this He "did nothing amiss": He claimed to be Lord of the Kingdom of God, to shut it at will, but also to open it at pleasure even to such as we are; but in this He "did nothing amiss!"' Does His next speech imply less than this? Observe: (1) His frank confession and genuine selfcondemnation. (2) His astonishment and horror at the very different state of his fellow's mind. (3) His anxiety to bring him to a better mind while yet there was hope. (4) His noble testimony, not only to the innocence of Jesus, but to all that this implied of the rightfulness of His claims. 42. said to Jesus . . .—Observe here (1) The "kingdom" referred to was one beyond the grave; for it is inconceivable that he should have expected Him to come down from the cross to erect any temporal kingdom. (2) This he calls Christ's own

ADAM CLARKE

34. They know not what they do. If ignorance does not excuse a crime, it at least diminishes the atrocity of it. However, these persons well knew that they were crucifying an innocent man; but they did not know that by this act of theirs they were bringing down on themselves and on their country the heaviest judgments of God.

35. Derided him. "Treated Him with the utmost contempt," in the most infamous manner. See the meaning of this word explained, chap. xvi. 14.

36. Offering him vinegar. See on Matt. xxvii. 34. Vinegar or small sour wine was a common drink of the Roman soldiers; and it is supposed that wherever they were on duty they had a vessel of this liquor standing by. It appears that at least two cups were given to our Lord: one before He was nailed to the Cross, viz., of wine mingled with myrrh; and another of vinegar, while He hung on the Cross. Some think there were three cups: one of wine mixed with myrrh; the second, of vinegar mingled with gall; and the third, of simple vinegar. Allow these three cups, and the different expressions in all the Evangelists will be included.

38. A superscription. See Matt. xxvii. 37. In letters of Greek, and Latin, and Hebrew. The inscription was written in all these languages, which were the most common, that all might see the reason why He was put to death. The inscription was written in Greek, on account of the Hellenistic Jews, who were then at Jerusalem because of the Passover; it was written in Latin, that being the language of the government under which He was crucified; and it was written in Hebrew, that being the language of the place in which this deed of darkness was committed. But, by the good providence of God, the inscription itself exculpated Him and proved the Jews to be rebels against, and murderers of, their King. See the note on Matt. xxvii. 37. It is not to be wondered at that they wished Pilate to alter this inscription, John xix. 21, as it was a record of their infamy.

39. One of the malefactors which were hanged. It is likely that the two robbers were not nailed to their crosses, but only tied to them by cords, and thus they are represented in ancient paintings. If not nailed, they could not have suffered much, and therefore they were found still alive when the soldiers came to give the coup de grace, which put a speedy end to their lives, John xix. 31-33.

40. Dost not thou fear God? The sufferings of this person had been sanctified to him, so that his heart was open to receive help from the hand of the Lord. He is a genuine penitent, and gives the fullest proof he can give of it, viz., the acknowledgment of the justice of his sentence. He had sinned, and he acknowledges his sin; his heart believes unto righteousness, and with his tongue he makes confession unto salvation. While he condemns himself, he bears testimony that Jesus was innocent. Bishop Pearce supposes that these were not robbers in the common sense of the word, but Jews who took up arms on the principle that the Romans were not to be submitted to and that their levies of tribute money were oppressive, and therefore they made no scruple to rob all the Romans they met with. These Jews Josephus calls "robbers," the same term used by the Evangelists. This opinion gains some strength from the penitent thief's confession: We receive the due reward of our deeds—we rose up against the government, and committed depredations in the country; but this man hath done nothing amiss—"out of place, disorderly," nothing calculated to raise sedition or insurrection.

42. Lord, remember me. It is worthy of remark that this man appears to have been the first who believed in the intercession of Christ.

MATTHEW HENRY

He does, as it were, breathe out his soul in it: "Lord, remember me; I desire no more; into thy hands I commit my case." To be remembered by Christ, now that he is in his kingdom, is what we should earnestly desire and pray for, and it will be enough to secure our welfare living and dying.

[2] The extraordinary grants of Christ's favour to him: Jesus said unto him: "Verily I say unto thee, I say Amen to this prayer: nay, thou shalt have more than thou didst ask, This day thou shalt be with me in paradise," v. 43.

First, To whom this was spoken: to the penitent thief. Though Christ himself was now in the greatest struggle and agony, yet he had a word of comfort to speak to a poor penitent. Even great sinners, if they be true penitents, shall, through Christ, obtain not only the pardon of their sins, but a place in the paradise of God.

Secondly, By whom this was spoken. This was another mediatorial word which Christ spoke to explain the true intent and meaning of his sufferings; as he died to purchase the forgiveness of sins for us (v. 34), so also to purchase eternal life for us. By this word we are given to understand that Jesus Christ died to open the kingdom of heaven to all penitent obedient believers. 1. Christ here lets us know that he was going to paradise himself. He went by the cross to the crown, and we must not think of going any other way. 2. He lets all penitent believers know that when they die they shall go to be with him there. See here how the happiness of heaven is set forth to us. (1) It is paradise, a garden of pleasure, the paradise of God (Rev. ii. 7). (2) It is being with Christ there. That is the happiness of heaven. (3) It is immediate upon death: This day shalt thou be with me, tonight, before tomorrow.

I. Christ's dying magnified by the prodigies that attended it. 1. The darkening of the sun at noon-day. It was now about the sixth hour, that is, twelve o'clock at noon; and there was a darkness over all the earth until the ninth hour. 2. The rending of the veil of the temple. The former prodigy was in the heavens, this in the temple; for both these are the houses of God. By this rending of the veil was signified the taking away of the ceremonial law, and of all other difficulties and discouragements in our approaches to God, so that now we may come boldly to the throne of grace.

II. Christ's dying explained (v. 46) by the words with which he breathed out his soul. Jesus had cried with a loud voice when he said, Why hast thou forsaken me? So we are told in Matthew and Mark, and, it should seem, it was with a loud voice that he said this too. He said, Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit. He borrowed these words from his father David (Ps. xxxi. 5). Christ died with scripture in his mouth. In this address to God he calls him Father. When he complained of being forsaken, he cried, Eli, Eli, My God, my God; but, to show that that dreadful agony of his soul was now over, he here calls God Father. Christ made use of these words in a sense peculiar to himself as Mediator. He was now to make his soul an offering for our sin (Isa. liii. 10), to give his life a ransom for many (Matt. xx. 28). Now by these words he offered up the sacrifice, did, as it were, lay his hand upon the head of it, and surrender it. "I deposit it, I pay it down into thy hands. Father, accept of my life and soul instead of the lives and souls of the sinners I die for." The goodwill of the offerer was requisite to the acceptance of the offering. He commends his spirit into his Father's hand, to be received into paradise, and returned the third day. Christ has fitted those words of David to the purpose of dying saints, and hath, as it were, sanctified them for their use. We must show that we are freely willing to die, that we firmly believe in another life after this, by saying, Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit.

III. Christ's dying improved by the impressions it made upon those that attended him.

1. The centurion that had command of the guard was much affected with what he saw, v. 47. He was a Roman, a Gentile, and yet he glorified God. And he bore a testimony to the patient sufferer: "Certainly this was a righteous man." His testimony in Matthew and Mark goes further: Truly this was the Son of God.

2. The disinterested spectators could not but be concerned. This is taken notice of only here, v. 48. All the people that came together to that sight, beholding the things which were done, could not but go away very serious. They smote their breasts, and returned. They laid the thing very much to heart for the present. Probably these very people were of those that had cried, Crucify him, crucify him, and,

(Thy) kingdom. (3) As such, he sees in Christ the absolute right to dispose of that kingdom to whom He pleased. (4) He does not presume to ask a place in that kingdom, though that is what he means, but with a humility quite affecting, just says, "Lord, remember me when . . . ." Yet was there mighty faith in that word. If Christ will but "think upon him" (Neh. 5:19), at that august moment when He "cometh into His kingdom," it will do. 'Only assure me that then Thou wilt not forget such a wretch as I, that once hung by Thy side, and I am content.' Now contrast with this bright act of faith the darkness even of the apostles' minds, who could hardly be got to believe that their Master would die at all, who now were almost despairing of Him, and who when dead had almost buried their hopes in His grave. Consider, too, the man's previous disadvantages and bad life. And then mark how his faith comes out—not in protestations, 'Lord, I cannot doubt, I am firmly persuaded that Thou art Lord of a kingdom, that death cannot disannul Thy title nor impede the assumption of it in due time,' etc.—but as having no shadow of doubt, and rising above it as a question altogether, he just says, "Lord, remember me when Thou comest . . ." Was ever faith like this exhibited upon earth? It looks as if the brightest crown had been reserved for the Saviour's head at His darkest moment! 43. Jesus said . . .—The dying Redeemer speaks as if He Himself viewed it in this light. It was a "song in the night." It ministered cheer to His spirit in the midnight gloom that now enwrapt it. Verily I say unto thee—'Since thou speakest as to the king, with kingly authority speak I to thee.' to-day—"Thou art prepared for a long delay before I come into My kingdom, but not a day's delay shall there be for thee; thou shalt not be parted from Me even for a moment, but together we shall go, and with Me, ere this day expire, shalt thou be in Paradise" (future bliss, II Cor. 12:4; Rev. 2:7). Learn (1) How "One is taken and another left"; (2) How easily divine teaching can raise the rudest and worst above the best instructed and most devoted servants of Christ; (3) How presumption and despair on a death hour are equally discountenanced here, the one in the impenitent thief, the other in his penitent fellow.

"And when Jesus had cried with a loud voice" (Luke 23:46). This "loud voice," noticed by three of the Evangelists, does not imply, as some able interpreters contend, that our Lord's strength was so far from being exhausted that He needed not to die then, and surrendered up His life sooner than Nature required, merely because it was the appointed time. It was indeed the appointed time, but time that He should be "crucified through weakness" (I Cor. 13:4), and Nature was now reaching its utmost exhaustion. But just as even His own dying saints, particularly the martyrs of Jesus, have sometimes had such gleams of coming glory immediately before breathing their last, as to impart to them a strength to utter their feelings which has amazed the bystanders, so this mighty voice of the expiring Redeemer was nothing else but the exultant spirit of the Dying Victor, receiving the fruit of His travail just about to be embraced, and nerving the organs of utterance to an ecstatic expression of its sublime feelings (not so much in the immediately following words of tranquil surrender, in Luke, as in the final shout, recorded only by John): "FATHER, INTO THY HANDS I COMMEND MY SPIRIT!" (Luke 23:46). Yes, the darkness is past, and the true light now shineth. His soul has emerged from its mysterious horrors; "My God" is heard no more, but in unclouded light He yields sublime into His Father's hands the infinitely precious spirit—using here also the words of those matchless Psalms (31:5) which were ever on His lips.

47-56. SIGNS AND CIRCUMSTANCES FOLLOWING HIS DEATH—HIS BURIAL. (See on Matt. 27:51-56, 62-66; John 19:31-42.) Now when the centurion—the military superintendent of the execution. and they that were with him watching Jesus, saw the earthquake—or felt it and witnessed its effects. and those things that were done—reflecting upon the entire transaction. they feared greatly—convinced of the presence of a Divine Hand. saying, Truly this was the Son of God—There cannot be a reasonable doubt that this expression was used in the Jewish sense, and that it points to the claim which Jesus made to be the Son of God, and on which His condemnation expressly turned. The meaning, then, clearly is that He must have been what He professed to be; in other words,

ADAM CLARKE

43. In paradise. The Garden of Eden, mentioned in Gen. ii. 8, is also called, from the Septuagint, the "garden of Paradise." The word Eden signifies "pleasure" and "delight." Several places were thus called; see Gen. iv. 16; 2 Kings xix. 12; Isa. xxxvii. 12; Ezek. xxvii. 23; and Amos i. 5—and such places probably had this name from their "fertility, pleasant situation." In this light the Septuagint have viewed Gen. ii. 8, as they render the passage thus: "God planted a paradise in Eden." Hence the word has been transplanted into the New Testament, and is used to signify a place of exquisite pleasure and delight.

Paradise was in the beginning the habitation of man in his state of innocence, in which he enjoyed that presence of his Maker which constituted his supreme happiness. Our Lord's words intimate that this penitent should be immediately taken to the abode of the spirits of the just, where he should enjoy the presence and approbation of the Most High.

44. Darkness over all the earth. See the note on Matt. xxvii. 45. The darkness began at the sixth hour, about our twelve o'clock at noon, and lasted till the ninth hour, which answered to our three o'clock in the afternoon.

45. The veil . . . was rent. See Matt. xxvii. 51.

The veil of the temple was rent. That is, the veil which separated the holy place, where the priests ministered, from the holy of holies, into which the high priest only entered, and that once a year, to make a general expiation for the sins of the people. This rending of the veil was emblematical, and pointed out that the separation between Jews and Gentiles was now abolished, and that the privilege of the high priest was now communicated to all mankind. All might henceforth have access to the throne of grace, through the one great Atonement and Mediator, the Lord Jesus. See this beautifully illustrated in Heb. x. 19-22.

46. Into thy hands I commend my spirit. Or, "I will commit My spirit"—"I deposit My soul in Thy hands." Another proof of the immateriality of the soul, and of its separate existence when the body is dead.

48. And all the people. All were deeply affected except the priests, and those whom they had employed to serve their base purposes. The darkness, earthquake, etc., had brought terror and consternation into every heart.

MATTHEW HENRY

when he was nailed to the cross, reviled and blasphemed him; but now they had not only their mouths stopped, but their consciences startled. Yet, it should seem, the impression soon wore off: They smote their breasts, and returned. They did not show any further token of respect to Christ, but went home; and we have reason to fear that in a little time they quite forgot it. Thus many that see Christ evidently set forth crucified among them in the word and sacraments are a little affected for the present, but it does not continue. They see Christ's face and admire him; but they go away, and straightway forget what manner of man he is, and what reason they have to love him.

3. His own friends and followers were obliged to keep their distance, and yet got as near as they could and durst, to see what was done (v. 49): All his acquaintance stood afar off; this was part of his sufferings. And the women that followed him from Galilee were beholding these things. Now was Christ set for a sign that should be spoken against, as Simeon foretold, that the thoughts of many hearts might be revealed ch. ii. 34, 35.

We have here an account of Christ's burial.

I. Who buried him. His acquaintance stood afar off; but God raised up a man named Joseph, v. 50. His character is that he was a good man and a just, a man of unspotted reputation for virtue and piety, not only just to all, but good to all that needed him; he was a person of quality, a counsellor, a member of the sanhedrim, one of the elders of the Jewish church. Though he was of that body of men who had put Christ to death, yet he had not consented to their counsel and deed (v. 51). Nay, he not only dissented openly from those that were enemies to Christ, but he consented secretly with those that were his friends: He himself waited for the kingdom of God. There are many who, though they do not make any show in their outward profession, yet will be more ready to do him a piece of real service, than others who make a greater figure and noise.

II. What he did towards the burying of him. 1. He went to Pilate and begged the body of Jesus. 2. He took it down, it should seem, with his own hands, and wrapped it in linen. It was the manner of the Jews to roll the bodies of the dead, as we do little children in their swaddling-clothes, so that the piece of fine linen, which he bought whole, he cut into many pieces for this purpose.

III. Where he was buried. In a sepulchre that was hewn in stone. But it was a sepulchre in which never man before was laid.

IV. When he was buried. On the day of the preparation, when the sabbath drew on, v. 54. This is given as a reason why they made such haste with the funeral, because the sabbath drew on. Weeping must not hinder sowing. Though they were in tears for the death of Christ, yet they must apply themselves to the sanctifying of the sabbath.

V. Who attended the funeral; not any of the disciples, but only the women that came with him from Galilee (v. 55), who, as they stayed by him while he hung on the cross, so they followed him, and beheld the sepulchre, and how his body was laid in it. They were led to this, not by their curiosity, but by their affection to the Lord Jesus.

VI. What preparation was made for the embalming of his body after he was buried (v. 56): They returned, and prepared spices and ointments, which was more an evidence of their love than of their faith; for had they remembered and believed that he should rise again the third day, they would have spared their cost and pains herein. But, busy as they were in this preparation, they rested on the sabbath day.

that He was no impostor. There was no medium between those two. See, on the similar testimony of the penitent thief—"This man hath done nothing amiss"—on Luke 23:41

And many women were there beholding afar off, which followed Jesus—The sense here would be better brought out by the use of the pluperfect, "which had followed Jesus." from Galilee, ministering unto him—As these dear women had ministered to Him during His glorious missionary tours in Galilee (see on Luke 8:1-3), so from this statement it should seem that they accompanied him and ministered to His wants from Galilee on His final journey to Jerusalem.

Joseph of Arimathea—"a rich man" (Matt. 27:57), thus fulfilling Isaiah 53:9; "an honorable counsellor," a member of the Sanhedrim, and of good condition, "which also waited for the kingdom of God" (Mark 15:43), a devout expectant of Messiah's kingdom; "a good man and a just, the same had not consented to the counsel and deed of them" (Luke 23:50, 51—he had gone the length, perhaps, of dissenting and protesting in open council against the condemnation of our Lord); "who also himself was Jesus' disciple" (Matt. 27:57). being a disciple of Jesus, but secretly, for fear of the Jews—"He went in boldly unto Pilate" (Mark 15:43)—lit., "having taken courage went in," or "had the boldness to go in." Mark alone, as his manner is, notices the boldness which this required. The act would without doubt identify him for the first time with the disciples of Christ. Marvellous it certainly is, that one who while Jesus was yet alive merely refrained from condemning Him, not having the courage to espouse His cause by one positive act, should, now that He was dead, and His cause apparently dead with Him, summon up courage to go in personally to the Roman governor and ask permission to take down and inter the body. But if this be the first instance, it is not the last, that a seemingly dead Christ has wakened a sympathy which a living one had failed to evoke. The heroism of faith is usually kindled by desperate circumstances, and is not seldom displayed by those who before were the most timid, and scarce known as disciples at all.

Now the next day, that followed the day of the preparation—i.e., after six o'clock of our Saturday evening. The crucifixion took place on the Friday and all was not over till shortly before sunset, when the Jewish sabbath commenced; and "that sabbath day was an high day" (John 19:31), being the first day of the feast of unleavened bread. That day being over at six on Saturday evening, they hastened to take their measures.

50-51. Joseph . . . of Arimathaea. See the notes on Matt. xxvii. 57-60 and those especially on Mark xv. 43.

When the even. This must have been about three o'clock or a little after; for our Lord having expired about three o'clock, v. 46, and the Jewish Passover beginning about four, it was necessary that Joseph, who would not fail to eat the Passover at the usual time, should have obtained and buried the body of Christ some time before four o'clock. But such was the general consternation, occasioned by the prodigies that took place on this most awful occasion, that we may safely conjecture that nothing was done in order, and perhaps the Passover itself was not eaten at the usual hour, if at all, that day. A rich man. He was a counsellor of the great Sanhedrin, Luke xxiii. 50; and, from the accounts given of him by the Evangelists, we learn that he was a man of the greatest respectability. He now acted a more honorable part than all the disciples of our Lord. He was of Arimathaea, or Rama, in the tribe of Benjamin, Matt. ii. 17, but lived ordinarily in Jerusalem as being a member of the great council.

54. And the sabbath drew on. Or, "The Sabbath was lighting up," i.e., with the candles which the Jews light just before six in the evening, when the Sabbath commences. The same word is used for the dawning of the day, Matt. xxviii. 1.

55. The women also, which came. These were Mary of Magdala, Joanna, and Mary the mother of James, chap. xxiv. 10. To these three, Mark, in chap. xvi. 1, adds, Salome; but some think that this was only a surname of one of these Marys.

56. Prepared spices and ointments. This was in order to embalm Him, which sufficiently proves that they had no hope of His resurrection the third day. And rested the sabbath day. For though the Jewish canons allowed all works necessary for the dead to be done, even on the Sabbath, such as washing and anointing, provided they moved not a limb of the dead person, yet, as the Jews had put Christ to death under the pretense of His being a malefactor, it would not have been either prudent or safe to appear too forward in the present business; and therefore they rested on the Sabbath.

CHAPTER 24

The infallible proofs of his resurrection are things revealed which belong to us and to our children. Some of them we have here in these verses.

I. We have here the affection and respect which the good women that had followed Christ showed to him, after he was dead and buried, v. 1. As soon as ever they could, after the sabbath was over, they came to the sepulchre, to embalm his body, to anoint the head and face, and perhaps the wounded hands and feet, and to scatter sweet spices upon and about the body as it is usual with us to strew flowers about the dead bodies and graves of our friends. The zeal of these good women for Christ did continue. The spices they had prepared the evening before the sabbath, they brought to the sepulchre on the morning after the sabbath, early, very early. What is

1. Bringing the spices. To embalm the body of our Lord; but Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathaea had done this before the body was laid in the tomb. See John xix. 39-40. But there was a second embalming found necessary. The first must have been hastily and imperfectly performed; the spices now brought by the women were intended to complete the preceding operation. And certain others with them. This clause is wanting in some MSS. and versions. Dionysius Alexandrinus and Eusebius also omit it. The omission is approved by Mill, Bengel, Wetstein, Griesbach, and others.

prepared for Christ, let it be used for him. Notice is taken of the names of these women, Mary Magdalene, and Joanna, and Mary the Mother of James. Notice is also taken of certain others with them, v. 1, and again, v. 10. These, who had not joined in preparing the spices, would yet go along with them to the sepulchre; as if the number of Christ's friends increased when he was dead.

II. The surprise they were in, when they found the stone rolled away and the grave empty (v. 2, 3); they were much perplexed at that (v. 4), that the stone was rolled away from the sepulchre, and that they found not the body of the Lord Jesus. Good Christians often perplex themselves about that with which they should comfort and encourage themselves.

III. The plain account which they had of Christ's resurrection from two angels, who appeared to them in shining garments. The women, when they saw the angels, were afraid, they bowed down their faces to the earth, to look for their dear Master in the grave. They would rather find him in his grave-clothes than angels themselves in their shining-garments. They upbraid the women with the absurdity of the search they were making: Why seek ye the living among the dead? v. 5. Witness is hereby given to Christ that he is living, and it is the comfort of all the saints, I know that my Redeemer liveth; for because he lives we shall live also. But a reproof is given to those that look for him among the dead. They assure them that he is risen from the dead (v. 6): "He is not here, but is risen; he has quitted his grave." They refer them to his own words: Remember what he spoke to you, when he was yet in Galilee. If they had duly believed and observed the prediction of it, they would easily have believed the thing itself when it came to pass. The angels repeat to them what Christ had often said in their hearing, The Son of man must be delivered into the hands of sinful men. He told them that he must be crucified. Would not this bring to their mind that which always followed, The third day he shall rise again? These angels from heaven bring not any new gospel, but put them in mind of the sayings of Christ, and teach them how to improve and apply them.

IV. Their satisfaction in this account, v. 8. They remembered his words, when they were thus put in mind of them, and thence concluded that if he was risen it was no more than they had reason to expect. A seasonable remembrance of the words of Christ will help us to a right understanding of his providence.

V. The report they brought of this to the apostles: They returned from the sepulchre, and told all these things to the eleven, and to all the rest of Christ's disciples, v. 9. In a little time, that morning, they all had notice of it. But we are told (v. 11) how the report was received: Their words seemed to them as idle tales, and they believed them not. They thought it was only the fancy of the women, and imputed it to the power of imagination; for they also had forgotten Christ's words. One cannot but be amazed at the stupidity of these disciples,—who had themselves so often professed that they believed Christ to be the Son of God, had been so often told that he must die and rise again, and then enter into his glory, had seen him more than once raise the dead,—that they should be so backward to believe.

VI. The enquiry which Peter made hereupon, v. 12. It was Mary Magdalene that brought the report to him, as appears, John xx. 1, 2, where this story of his running to the sepulchre is more particularly related. 1. Peter hastened to the sepulchre upon the report. Perhaps, he had not been so ready to go thither now if the women had not told him that the watch was fled. Many that are swift-footed enough when there is no danger are but cow-hearted when there is. 2. He looked into the sepulchre, and took notice how orderly the linen clothes in which Christ was wrapped were taken off, and folded up, and laid by themselves, but the body gone. He was very particular in making his observations, as if he would rather credit his own eyes than the testimony of the angels. 3. He went away wondering in himself; at that which was come to pass. He is only amazed with the thing, and knows not what to make of it. There is many a thing puzzling and perplexing to us which would be both plain and profitable if we did but rightly understand the words of Christ.

Verses 13–35

This appearance of Christ to the two disciples going to Emmaus was mentioned, and but just mentioned, before (Mark xvi. 12); here it is largely related. It happened the same day that Christ rose, the first day of the new world that rose with him. One of these two disciples was Cleopas; who the other was is not certain. It was one of those that were associated with the eleven, mentioned v. 9.

I. The walk and talk of these two disciples: They

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

We see the women engaged in a great ministry of love, but a ministry all filled with sorrow and hopelessness. Very beautiful it is to see them coming, bringing their spices. They brought them to show their love for a dead Master. They thought of Him as dead. They loved Him with a great love. Love is stronger than death. Their love for Him had not ceased. Their faith in Him had not failed. But the things they had hoped for had not been realized. He was mastered, beaten, put to death, but still they loved Him, and they came to find a dead body and honor it.

—The Gospel According to Luke

5. Why . . .—Astonishing question! not "the risen," but "the Living One" (cf. Rev. 1: 18); and the surprise expressed in it implies an incongruity in His being there at all, as if, though He might submit to it, "it was impossible He should be holden of it" (Acts 2:24). 6. in Galilee—to which these women themselves belonged (ch. 23: 55).

7. saying . . .—How remarkable it is to hear angels quoting a whole sentence of Christ's to the disciples, mentioning where it was uttered, and wondering it was not fresh in their memory, as doubtless it was in theirs! (I Tim. 3:16, "seen of angels," and I Pet. 1:12.)

12. Peter . . .—(See on John 20:1-10).

13-35. CHRIST APPEARS TO THE TWO GOING TO EMMAUS. 13. two of them—One was Cleopas (vs. 18); who the other was is mere conjecture.

ADAM CLARKE

10. And Joanna. She was the wife of Chuza, Herod's steward. See chap. viii. 3.

2. They found the stone rolled away. An angel from God had done this before they reached the tomb, Matt. xxviii. 2. On this case we cannot help remarking that when persons have strong confidence in God obstacles do not hinder them from undertaking whatever they have reason to believe He requires; and the removal of them they leave to Him.

3. And found not the body of the Lord. His holy soul was in paradise, chap. xxiii. 43; and the Evangelist mentions the body particularly, to show that this only was subject to death.

5. Why seek ye the living among the dead? This was a common form of speech among the Jews and seems to be applied to those who were foolishly, impertinently, or absurdly employed. As places of burial were unclean, it was not reasonable to suppose that the living should frequent them; or that if any was missing, he was likely to be found in such places.

7. Sinful men. Or "heathens," i.e., the Romans by whom only He could be put to death, for the Jews themselves acknowledged that this power was now vested in the hands of the Roman governor alone. See John xix. 15.

8. They remembered his words. Even the simple recollection of the words of Christ becomes often a source of comfort and support to those who are distressed or tempted, for His words are the words of eternal life.

12. Then arose Peter. John went with him, and got to the tomb before him. See John xx. 2-3. The linen clothes laid by themselves. Or "the linen clothes only." This was the fine linen which Joseph of Arimathaea bought, and wrapped the body in, Mark xv. 46. Small as this circumstance may at first view appear, it is, nevertheless, no mean proof of the resurrection of our Lord. Had the body been stolen away, all that was wrapped about it would have been taken away with it, as the delay which must have been occasioned by stripping it might have led to the detection of the theft; nor would the disciples have run such a risk if they had stolen Him, when stripping the body could have answered no end. This circumstance is related still more particularly by John, chap. xx. 5-7. Peter "saw the linen clothes lying . . . and the napkin, that was about his head, not lying with the linen clothes, but wrapped together in a place by itself."

13. Behold, two of them. This long and interesting account is not mentioned by Matthew nor John, and is only glanced at by Mark, chap. xvi. 12-13. One of these disciples was Cleopas, v. 18, and the other is supposed by many learned men, both ancient and modern, to have been Luke himself. See the sketch of his life prefixed to these notes.

went to a village called Emmaus, which is reckoned to be about two hours' walk from Jerusalem, v. 13. The accounts brought them that morning of their Master's resurrection seemed to them as idle tales. But as they travelled they talked together of all those things which had happened, v. 14. They talked over these things, reasoning with themselves concerning the probabilities of Christ's resurrection.

II. The good company they met with upon the road, when Jesus himself came, and joined himself to them (v. 15): They communed together, and reasoned. Jesus himself drew near, as a stranger who, seeing them travel the same way that he went, told them that he should be glad of their company. Where but two together are well employed in work of that kind Christ will come to them, and make a third. Two thus twisted in faith and love become a threefold cord, not easily broken. They in their communings and reasonings together were searching for Christ, and now Christ comes to them. They who seek Christ shall find him. But, though they had Christ with them, they were not at first aware of it (v. 16): Their eyes were held, that they should not know him. No matter how it was, but so it was they did not know him, Christ so ordering it that they might the more freely discourse with him and he with them.

III. The conference that was between Christ and them, when he knew them, and they knew not him. Now Christ and his disciples, as is usual when friends meet incognito, or in a disguise, are here crossing questions.

1. Christ's first question to them is concerning their present sadness: What manner of communications are these that you have one with another as you walk, and are sad? v. 17.

(1) They were sad. They had lost their dear Master, and were, in their own apprehensions, quite disappointed in their expectations from him. They had given up the cause, and knew not what course to take to retrieve it. Though he was risen from the dead, yet either they did not know it or did not believe it, and so they were still in sorrow. Christ's disciples are often sad and sorrowful even when they have reason to rejoice. They had communications one with another concerning Christ. It becomes Christians to talk of Christ, not only of God and his providence, but of Christ and his grace and love. Good company and good converse are an excellent antidote against prevailing melancholy. Giving vent to the grief may perhaps give ease to the grieved. Joint mourners should be mutual comforters; comforts sometimes come best from such.

(2) Christ came up to them, and enquired into the matter of their talk: What manner of communications are these? Though Christ had now entered into his state of exaltation, yet he continued tender of his disciples. Our Lord Jesus takes notice of the sorrow and sadness of his disciples, and is afflicted in their afflictions. Christ has thereby taught us to be conversable. It does not become Christians to be morose and shy, but to take pleasure in good society. We are hereby taught to be compassionate. When we see our friends in sorrow and sadness, we should, like Christ here, take cognizance of their grief.

2. In answer to this, they put a question to him concerning his strangeness. Art thou only a stranger in Jerusalem, and hast not known the things that are come to pass there in these days? Cleopas gave him a civil answer. We ought to be civil to those who are civil to us. It was a dangerous time now with Christ's disciples; yet he was not jealous of this stranger, that he had any design upon them, to inform against them. He is full of Christ himself and of his death and sufferings, and wonders that everybody else is not so too: "What! art thou such a stranger in Jerusalem as not to know what has been done to our Master there?" He is very willing to inform this stranger concerning Christ. He would not have anyone that had the face of a man to be ignorant of Christ. And it is observable that these disciples, who were so forward to instruct the stranger, were instructed by him; for to him that has, and uses what he has, shall be given. It appears, by what Cleopas says, that the death of Christ made a great noise in Jerusalem, so that it could not be imagined that any man should be such a stranger in the city as not to know of it.

3. Christ, by way of reply, asked concerning their knowledge (v. 19): He said unto them, What things? thus making himself yet more a stranger. Jesus Christ made light of his own sufferings, in comparison with the joy set before him. See with what unconcernedness he looks back upon his sufferings. He had reason to know what things; for to him they were bitter things, and heavy things, and yet he asks, What things? They must tell him what things they know, and then he will tell them what was the meaning Emmaus—about seven and a half miles from Jerusalem. They probably lived there and were going home after the Passover.

14-16. communed and reasoned—exchanged views and feelings, weighing afresh all the facts, as detailed in vss. 18-24. drew near—coming up behind them as from Jerusalem.

eyes holden—Partly He was "in another form" (Mark 16:12), and partly there seems to have been an operation on their own vision; though certainly, as they did not believe that He was alive, His company as a fellow traveller was the last thing they would expect.

17-24. communication . . .—The words imply the earnest discussion that had appeared in their manner.

18. knowest not . . .—If he knew not the events of the last few days in Jerusalem, he must be a mere sojourner; if he did, how could he suppose they would be talking of anything else? How artless all this!

ADAM CLARKE

Threescore furlongs. Some MSS. say 160 furlongs, but this is a mistake, for Josephus assigns the same distance to this village from Jerusalem as the Evangelist does. "Ammaus is sixty stadia distant from Jerusalem," about 7 English miles and three-quarters. A stadium was about 243 yards.

15. And reasoned. Concerning the probability or improbability of Christ being the Messiah, or of His resurrection from the dead. It was a laudable custom of the Jews, and very common also, to converse about the law in all their journeyings; and now they had especial reason to discourse together, of both the law and the prophets, from the transactions which had recently taken place.

16. Their eyes were holden. It does not appear that there was anything supernatural here, for the reason why these persons (who were not apostles, see v. 33) did not recollect our Lord is given by Mark, chap. xvi. 12, who says that Christ appeared to them in another form.

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

Christian people, commune together, but let your communications always be like these which are recorded in this chapter. Speak of Him, talk of Him, what you know of Him, of your sorrows about Him, even of your neglects of Him, of your ill treatment of Him, your sins against Him. Talk of these things one to the other, for so long as they are about Him it will be good even to confess your faults one to another. It will lead you to pray one for another and to join your prayers together, so that there will be greater strength in the petitions; for if two of you are agreed, you know what power that sweet agreement has with heaven. "They that feared the Lord spake often one to another." A blessed practice, an ancient practice, an edifying practice, a God-honoring practice, one which so pleased God that He turned eavesdropper—came under the window to listen to what they said, and took His notebook and recorded it, "a book of remembrance was written"; and He has published it and given His blessing to "those that fear the Lord and that think upon his name."

18. Cleopas. The same as Alphaeus, father of the Apostle James, Mark iii. 18, and husband of the sister of the Virgin, John xix. 25. Art thou only a stranger? As if he had said, What has been done in Jerusalem within these few days has been so public, so awful, and so universally known that, if you had been but a lodger in the city for a single night, I cannot conceive how you could miss hearing of these things. Indeed, you appear to be the only person unacquainted with them.

of these things, and lead them into the mystery of them.

4. They, hereupon, gave him a particular account concerning Christ. Observe the story they tell, v. 19, &c.

(1) Here is a summary of Christ's life and character. The things they are full of are concerning Jesus of Nazareth, who was a prophet, a teacher come from God. He confirmed it by many glorious miracles, miracles of mercy, so that he was mighty in deed and word before God and all the people. He had great acceptance with God, and a great reputation in the country. Many are great before all the people, who are not so before God, but Christ was mighty before God and all the people. Those were strangers in Jerusalem that did not know this.

(2) Here is a modest narrative of his sufferings and death, v. 20. "The chief priests and our rulers delivered him to be condemned to death, and they have crucified him." It is strange that they did not lay a greater load upon those that had been guilty of crucifying Christ.

(3) Here is an intimation of their disappointment in him, as the reason of their sadness: "We trusted that it had been he who should have redeemed Israel," v. 21; great things expected from him, by them that looked for redemption, and in it for the consolation of Israel. Now, if hope deferred makes the heart sick, hope disappointed, especially such a hope, kills the heart. We trusted (say they) that it had been he that should have redeemed Israel. And is it not he that doth redeem Israel? Nay, is he not by his death paying the price of their redemption? So that now, since that most difficult part of his undertaking was got over, they had more reason than ever to trust that this was he that should deliver Israel.

(4) Here is an account of their present amazement. "This is the third day since he was crucified and died, and that was the day when it was expected, if ever, that he should rise again and show himself as publicly in honour as he had been shown three days before in disgrace, but all is silent." They own that there was a report among them that he was risen, but they seem to speak of it very slightly (v. 22, 23): "Certain women also of our company made us astonished, who were early at the sepulchre, and found the body gone, and they said that they had seen a vision of angels, who said that he was alive; but we are ready to think it was only their fancy. Women are easily imposed upon." They acknowledge that some of the apostles had visited the sepulchre, and found it empty, v. 24. "But him they saw not, and therefore we have reason to fear that he is not risen, for, if he be, surely he would have shown himself to them: so that we have no great reason to think that he is risen. Our hopes were all nailed to his cross, and buried in his grave."

(5) Our Lord Jesus, though not known by face to them, makes himself known to them by his word.

[1] He reproves them for the weakness of their faith in the scriptures of the Old Testament: O fools, and slow of heart to believe, v. 25. Christ called them fools, not as it signifies wicked men, but as it signifies weak men. That which is condemned in them as their foolishness is, First, Their slowness to believe. Christ tells us that those are fools who are slow of heart to believe, and are kept from it by prejudices never impartially examined. Secondly, Their slowness to believe the writings of the prophets. Were we but more conversant with the scripture, and the divine counsels as far as they are made known in the scripture, we should not be subject to such perplexities as we often entangle ourselves in.

[2] He shows them that the sufferings of Christ were really the appointed way to his glory, and he could not go to it any other way (v. 26): "Ought not the Christ to have suffered these things, and to enter into his glory?" The cross of Christ was that to which they could not reconcile themselves; now here he shows them two things which take off the offence of the cross: First, That the Messiah ought to suffer these things; and therefore his sufferings were not only no objection against his being the Messiah, but really a proof of it. He could not have been a Saviour, if he had not been a sufferer. Secondly, That, when he had suffered these things, he should enter into his glory, which he did at his resurrection. It is called his glory, and it was the glory he had before the world was. He ought to suffer first, and then to enter into his glory. We are directed to expect the crown of thorns and then that of glory.

[3] He expounded to them the scriptures of the Old Testament, and showed them how they were fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth (v. 27): Beginning at Moses he went in order through all the prophets, and expounded to them the things concerning himself, showing that the sufferings he had now gone through were the accomplishment of them. There are things dispersed

19. Concerning Jesus...—As if feeling it a relief to have someone to unburden his thoughts and feelings to, this disciple goes over the main facts in his own desponding style, and this was just what our Lord wished.

21. we trusted...—They expected the promised Deliverance at His hand, but in the current sense of it, not by His death. besides all this—not only did His death seem to give the fatal blow to their hopes, but He had been two days dead already, and this was the third. It is true, they add, some of our women gave us a surprise, telling us of a vision of angels they had at the empty grave this morning that said He was alive, and some of ourselves who went thither confirmed their statement; but then Himself they saw not. A doleful tale truly, told out of the deepest despondency.

fools—senseless, without understanding.

26. Ought not Christ—"the Christ," "the Messiah." to suffer... and enter—i.e., through the gate of suffering (and suffering "these things," or such a death) to enter into His glory. 'Ye believe in the glory; but these very sufferings are the predicted gate of entrance into it.'

27. Moses and all the prophets...—Here our Lord both teaches us the reverence due to Old Testament Scripture, and the great burden of it—"Himself."

ADAM CLARKE

19. Which was a prophet. "A man prophet," a genuine prophet; but this has been considered as a Hebraism: "for, in Exod. ii. 14, a man prince is simply a prince; and in 1 Sam. xxxi. 3, men archers mean no more than archers." But my own opinion is that this word is often used to deepen the signification; so in the above quotations: Who made thee a man prince (i.e., a mighty sovereign) and a judge over us? Exod. ii. 14. And, The battle went sore against Saul, and the men archers (i.e., the stout, or well-aiming archers) hit him, 1 Sam. xxxi. 3. So aner prophetes here signifies, He was a "genuine prophet," nothing like those false ones by whom the people have been so often deceived; and He has proved the divinity of His mission by His heavenly teaching and astonishing miracles. Mighty in deed and word. Irresistibly eloquent. "Powerful in deed," working incontrovertible miracles.

21-24. Cleopas paints the real state of his own mind in these verses. In his relation there is scarcely anything well connected. Important points are referred to, and not explained, though he considered the person to whom he spoke as entirely unacquainted with these transactions. His own hopes and fears he cannot help mixing with the narration, and throwing over the whole that confusion that dwells in his own heart. The narration is not at all in Luke's style; but as it is probable he was the other disciple who was present, and had heard the words of Cleopas, he gave them in that simple, natural, artless manner in which they were spoken. Had the account been forged, those simple, natural touches would not have appeared. To day is the third day. Our Lord had often said that He would rise again the third day; and though Alphaeus had little hope of this resurrection, yet he could not help recollecting the words he had heard, especially as they seemed to be confirmed by the relation of the women, vv. 22-24.

25. O fools, and slow of heart to believe. "Inconsiderate" men, justly termed such because they had not properly attended to the description given of the Messiah by the prophets, nor to His teaching and miracles, as proofs that He alone was the Person they described. Slow of heart. "Backward," not easy to be persuaded of the truth, always giving way to doubtfulness and distrust. This very imperfection in them is a strong evidence of the truth of the doctrine which they afterwards believed, and proclaimed to the world. Had they not had the fullest assurance of these things, they never would have credited them; and it is no small honor to the new-covenant Scriptures that such persons were chosen, first to believe them; secondly, to proclaim them in the world; and, thirdly, to die on the evidence of those truths, the blessed influence of which they felt in their own hearts and fully exemplified in their lives.

26. Ought not Christ to have suffered? "Was it not necessary that the Christ should suffer?" This was the way in which sin must be expiated and without this no soul could have been saved. The suffering Messiah is He alone by whom Israel and the world can be saved.

27. Beginning at Moses. What a sermon this must have been, where all the prophecies relative to the incarnation, birth, teaching, miracles, sufferings, death, and resurrection of the blessed Jesus were all adduced, illustrated, and applied throughout all the scriptures concerning Christ. You cannot go far in any part of scripture but you meet with something that has reference to Christ, some prophecy, some promise, some prayer, some type or other. A golden thread of gospel grace runs through the whole web of the Old Testament. The things concerning Christ need to be expounded. They were delivered darkly, according to that dispensation: but now that the veil is taken away the New Testament expounds the Old. Jesus Christ is himself the best expositor of scripture, particularly the scriptures concerning himself. In studying the scriptures, it is good to be methodical, for the Old Testament light shone gradually to the perfect day, and it is good to observe how at sundry times, and in divers manners, God spoke to the fathers concerning his Son, by whom he has now spoken to us. Some begin their bible at the wrong end, who study the Revelation first.

IV. Here is the discovery which Christ at length made of himself to them. One would have given a great deal for a copy of the sermon Christ preached to them by the way, of that exposition of the bible which he gave them. The disciples are so charmed with it, that they think they are come too soon to their journey's end; but so it is: They drew nigh to the village whither they went (v. 28). And now,

1. They courted his stay with them: He made as though he would have gone further; he did not say that he would but he seemed to them to be going further. He would have gone further if they had not courted his stay. Those that would have Christ dwell with them must invite him, and be importunate with him. If he seem to draw off from us, it is but to draw out our importunity; as here, they constrained him; with a kind and friendly violence, saying, Abide with us. Those that have experienced the pleasure and profit of communion with Christ cannot but covet more of his company, and beg of him, not only to walk with them all day, but to abide with them at night. Christ yielded to their importunity: He went in, to tarry with them. He has promised that if any man open the door, to bid him welcome, he will come in to him, Rev. iii. 20.

2. He manifested himself to them, v. 30, 31. We may suppose that he continued his discourse with them, which he began upon the road. While supper was getting ready (which perhaps was soon done, the provision was so small and mean), it is probable that he entertained them. But still they little thought that it was Jesus himself that was all this while talking with them, till at length he was pleased to throw off his disguise. They began to suspect it was he, when, as they sat down to meat: He took bread, and blessed it, and brake it, and gave to them. This was not a miraculous meal like that of the five loaves, nor a sacramental meal like that of the eucharist, but a common meal; yet Christ here did the same as he did in those, to teach us to keep up our communion with God through Christ in common providences as well as in special ordinances. Wherever we sit down to eat, let us set Christ at the upper end of the table, take our meat as blessed to us by him, and eat and drink to his glory, and receive contentedly and thankfully what he is pleased to carve out to us, be the fare ever so coarse and mean. Their eyes were opened, and then they saw who it was, and knew him well enough. The mists were scattered, the veil was taken off, and then they made no question but it was their Master. He might put on the shape of another, but no other could put on his; and therefore it must be he. See how Christ by his Spirit and grace makes himself known. The work is completed by the opening of the eyes of their mind. If he that gives the revelation do not give the understanding, we are in the dark still.

3. He immediately disappeared: He vanished out of their sight. He became not visible by them. As soon as he had given his disciples one glimpse of him he was gone. Such short and transient views have we of Christ in this world; we see him, but in a little while lose the sight of him again.

V. Here is the reflection which these disciples made upon this conference, and the report which they made of it to their brethren at Jerusalem.

1. The reflection they each of them made upon the influence which Christ's discourse had upon them (v. 32): They said one to another, Did not our hearts burn within us? Thus do they not so much compare notes as compare hearts, in the review of the sermon Christ had preached to them. They found the preaching powerful, even when they knew not the preacher. It made things very plain and clear to them; and, which was more, brought a divine heat with a divine light into their souls. Now this they take notice of, for the confirming of their belief, that it was indeed, as at last they saw, Jesus himself that had been talking with them all along. See here, (1) What preaching

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

I never read this without having the feeling that I would have given anything to travel that road, and hear what He had to say. One could almost imaginatively follow some of the things as one thinks of the Old Testament. They listened to this Stranger as He took their own sacred writings and interpreted to them their deepest meaning. They listened to Him as He revealed to them the profoundest depths in the suggestive ritual of the Mosaic economy, as He breathed in their ears the secret of the love which lay at the heart of the ancient law. They listened to Him as He traced the messianic note in the music of all the prophets.
—The Gospel According to Luke

28-31. made as though . . .—(Cf. Mark 6:48; Gen. 18:3, 5; 32:24-26). 29. constrained . . .—But for this, the whole design of the interview had been lost; but it was not to be lost, for He who only wished to be constrained had kindled a longing in the hearts of His travelling companions which was not to be so easily put off. And does not this still repeat itself in the interviews of the Saviour with His loving, longing disciples? Else why do they say,

> Abide with me from morn to eve,
> For without Thee I cannot live;
> Abide with me when night is nigh,
> For without Thee I cannot die.

30-31. he took . . .and blessed . . and their eyes were opened—The stranger first startles them by taking the place of master at their own table, but on proceeding to that act which reproduced the whole scene of the last Supper, a rush of associations and recollections disclosed their guest, and He stood confessed before their astonished gaze—THEIR RISEN LORD! They were going to gaze on Him, perhaps embrace Him, but that moment He is gone! It was enough.

32-34. They now tell each to the other how their hearts burned—were fired—within them at His talk and His expositions of Scripture. 'Ah! this accounts for it: We could not understand the glow of self-evidencing light, love, glory that ravished our hearts; but now we do.' They cannot rest—how could they?—they must go straight back and tell the news. They find the eleven, but ere they have time to tell their tale, their ears are saluted with the thrilling news, "The Lord is risen indeed, and hath appeared to Simon." Most touch-to himself, by an appeal to the well-known facts which had taken place during His life! We are almost irresistibly impelled to exclaim, What a pity this discourse has not been preserved! No wonder their hearts burned within them while hearing such a sermon from such a Preacher! The law and the prophets had all borne testimony, either directly or indirectly, to Christ; and we may naturally suppose that these prophecies and references were those which our Lord at this time explained and applied to himself. See v. 32.

28. He made as though he would have gone further. That is, "He was going on, as though He intended to go farther"; and so He doubtless would had they not earnestly pressed Him to lodge with them. His preaching had made a deep impression upon their hearts, v. 32, and now they feel it their greatest privilege to entertain the Preacher.

29. For it is toward evening. And consequently both inconvenient and unsafe to proceed to another village. And he went in. And so He will to you, you penitent soul! Therefore take courage, and be not faithless but believing.

30. He took bread. This was the office of the master and father of a family, and this was our Lord's usual custom among His disciples. Those whom Christ lodges with He feeds, and feeds too with bread that He has blessed, and this feeding not only strengthens but also enlightens the soul.

31. Their eyes were opened. But we are not to imagine that He administered the holy Eucharist at this time; there is not the most distant evidence of this. It was a mere family meal, and ended before it was well begun. They knew him. His acting as father of the family, in taking, blessing, and distributing the bread among them, caused them to recollect those lips which they had often heard speak, and those hands by which they had often been fed. Perhaps He also threw off the disguise which He had before assumed, and now appeared in His own person. He vanished out of their sight. Probably, during their surprise, He took the opportunity of withdrawing from the place, leaving them to reflect and meditate on what they had heard and seen.

32. Did not our heart burn within us? His word was in our heart as a burning fire, Jer. xx. 9. Our hearts waxed hot within us, and while we were musing the fire burned, Ps. xxxix. 3. In some such way as this the words of the disciples may be understood.

is likely to do good—such as Christ's was, plain preaching—he talked with us by the way; and scriptural preaching—he opened to us the scriptures. Ministers should show people their religion in their bibles, they must show that they make that the fountain of their knowledge and the foundation of their faith. (2) What hearing is likely to do good—that which makes the heart burn; when we are much affected with the things of God, especially with the love of Christ in dying for us, and have our hearts thereby drawn out in love to him, and drawn up in holy desires and devotions, then our hearts burn within us.

2. The report they brought of this to their brethren at Jerusalem (v. 33): They rose up the same hour, so transported with joy at the discovery Christ had made of himself to them that they could not stay to make an end of their supper, but returned with all speed to Jerusalem, though it was towards evening. Now that they had seen Christ they could not rest till they had brought the good news to the disciples, both for the confirmation of their trembling faith and for the comfort of their sorrowful spirits. It is the duty of those to whom Christ has manifested himself to let others know what he has done for their souls. These disciples were full of this matter themselves, and must go to their brethren, to give vent to their joys. (1) How they found them relating another proof of the resurrection of Christ. They found the eleven, and those that were their usual companions, gathered together late in the night, and they found them saying among themselves, and when these two came in, they repeated to them with joy and triumph, The Lord is risen indeed, and hath appeared to Simon, v. 34. That Peter had a sight of him before the rest of the disciples had appears 1 Cor. xv. 5, where it is said, He was seen of Cephas, then of the twelve. The angel having ordered the women to tell Peter of it particularly (Mark xvi. 7), for his comfort, it is highly probable that our Lord Jesus did himself the same day appear to Peter, though we have no particular narrative of it. This he had related to his brethren; but, observe, Peter does not here proclaim it, and boast of it, himself, but the other disciples speak of it with exultation, The Lord is risen indeed. He has appeared not only to the women, but to Simon. (2) How they seconded their evidence with an account of what they had seen (v. 35): They told what things were done in the way. The words that were spoken by Christ to them in the way are here called the things that were done in the way; for the words that Christ speaks are not an empty sound, wondrous things are done by them, done by the way, by the by as it were, where it is not expected. They told also how he was at length known to them in the breaking of bread.

Five times Christ was seen the same day that he rose: by Mary Magdalene alone in the garden (John xx. 14), by the women as they were going to tell the disciples (Matt. xxviii. 9), by Peter alone, by the two disciples going to Emmaus, and now at night by the eleven.

I. The great surprise which his appearing gave them. He came in among them very seasonably, as they were comparing notes concerning the proofs of his resurrection: As they thus spoke, Jesus himself stood in the midst of them, and put it out of question. 1. The comfort Christ spoke to them: Peace be unto you. This intimates in general that it was a kind visit which Christ now paid them, a visit of love and friendship. They did not credit those who had seen him; therefore he comes himself. He had promised that after his resurrection he would see them in Galilee; but so desirous was he to see them that he anticipated the appointment and sees them at Jerusalem. Christ is often better than his word, but never worse. Now his first word to them was, Peace be to you. Thus Christ would at the first word intimate to them that he did not come to quarrel with Peter for denying him and the rest for running away from him; no, he came peaceably, to signify to them that he had forgiven them. 2. The fright which they put themselves into upon it (v. 37): They were terrified, supposing that they had seen a spirit, because he was in the midst of them ere they were aware. The word used (Matt. xiv. 26), when they said It is a spirit, is a spectre, an apparition; but the word here used properly signifies a spirit; they supposed it to be a spirit not clothed with a real body.

II. The great satisfaction which his discourse gave them, wherein we have,

1. The reproof he gave them for their causeless fears: Why are you troubled, and why do thoughts arise in your hearts? v. 38. Observe here, (1) That when at any time we are troubled, thoughts are apt to rise in our hearts that do us hurt. Sometimes the ing and precious intelligence this. The only one of the Eleven to whom He appeared alone was he, it seems, who had so shamefully denied Him. What passed at that interview we shall never know here. Probably it was too sacred for disclosure. (See on Mark 16:7.) The two from Emmaus now relate what had happened to them, and while thus comparing notes of their Lord's appearances, lo! Christ Himself stands in the midst of them. What encouragement to doubting, dark, true-hearted disciples!

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

The other appearances of the risen Lord to individuals on the day of Resurrection are narrated with much particularity and a considerable length. John gives us the lovely account of our Lord's conversation with Mary Magdalene; Luke gives us in full detail the story of the interview with the two travelers on the road to Emmaus. Here is another appearance, known to "the eleven, and them that were with them," on the Resurrection evening, and enumerated by Paul in his list of the appearances of the Lord, the account of which was the common gospel of himself and all the others, and yet deep silence is preserved in regard to it. No word escaped Peter's lips as to what passed in the conversation between the denier and his Lord. That is very significant.

The other appearances of the risen Lord to individuals on the day of Resurrection suggest their own reasons. He appeared first to Mary Magdalene because she loved much. The love that made a timid woman brave, and the sorrow that filled her heart, to the exclusion of everything else, drew Jesus to her. The two on the road to Emmaus were puzzled, honest, painful seekers after truth. It was worth Christ's while to spend hours of that day of Resurrection in clearing, questioning, and confirming sincere minds.

Does not this other appearance explain itself? The brief spasm of cowardice and denial had changed into penitence when the Lord looked, and the bitter tears that fell were not only because of the denial, but because of the wound of that sharp arrow, the poisoned barb of which we are happy if we have not felt the thought—"He will never know how ashamed and miserable I am; and His last look was reproach, and I shall never see His face anymore." To respond to and to satisfy love, to clear and to steady thought, to soothe the agony of a penitent, were worthy works for the risen Lord. I venture to think that such a record of the use of such a day bears historical truth on its very face, because it is so absolutely unlike what myth-making or hallucination or the excited imagination of enthusiasts would have produced if these had been the sources of the story of the Resurrection.

F. B. MEYER:

How swiftly the seven and a half miles must have sped in such company; and what new light illumined the pages of the Old Testament! All the Bible is full of him, but we need to be shown its meaning. It is only through suffering that we shall come to the glory. But why should not life be one sweet walk of fellowship with One whom we cannot see, but whose presence fills our hearts with burning love until suddenly the veil shall part in twain (1 Pet. 1:8).

—Bible Commentary

34. Saying, The Lord is risen indeed. The meaning here is that these two disciples found the apostles, and those who were with them, unanimously testifying that Christ had risen from the dead. It is not the two disciples to whom we are to refer the word saying, but to the body of the disciples.

35. And they. The two disciples who were just come from Emmaus "related what had happened to them on the way," going to Emmaus, "and how He had been known unto them in the breaking of bread," while supping together at the above village.

36. And as they thus spake. While the two disciples who were going to Emmaus were conversing about Christ, He joined himself to their company. Now while they and the apostles are confirming each other in their belief of His resurrection, Jesus comes in, to remove every doubt, and to give them the fullest evidence of it. And it is ever true that wherever two or three are gathered together in His name He is in the midst of them. Peace be unto you. The usual salutation among the Jews. "May you prosper in body and soul, and enjoy every heavenly and earthly good!"

trouble is the effect of the thoughts that arise in our hearts. Sometimes the thoughts arising in the heart are the effect of the trouble, without are fightings and then within are fears. (2) That many of the troublesome thoughts with which our minds are disquieted arise from our mistakes concerning Christ. They here thought that they had seen a Spirit, when they saw Christ. When Christ is by his Spirit convincing and humbling us, when he is by his providence trying and converting us, we mistake him, as if he designed our hurt, and this troubles us. (3) That all the troublesome thoughts which rise in our hearts at any time are known to the Lord Jesus. He chid his disciples for such thoughts, to teach us to chide ourselves for them.

2. The proof he gave them of his resurrection, both for the silencing of their fears and for the strengthening of their faith. Two proofs he gives them:

(1) He shows them his body, particularly his hands and his feet. "Behold my hands and my feet; you see I have hands and feet, and therefore have a true body; and you see the marks of the nails in my hands and feet, and therefore it is my own body, the same that you saw crucified, and not a borrowed one." He lays down this prinicple—that a spirit has not flesh and bones. Now hence he infers, "It is I myself, whom you have been so intimately acquainted with, and have had such familiar conversation with; it is I myself, whom you have reason to rejoice in, and not to be afraid of." [1] He appeals to their sight, shows them his hands and his feet, which were pierced with the nails. Christ retained the marks of them in his glorified body, that they might be proofs that it was he himself; and he was willing that they should be seen. He afterwards showed them to Thomas, for he is not ashamed of his sufferings for us; little reason then have we to be ashamed of them, or of ours for him. [2] He appeals to their touch: Handle me, and see. He would not let Mary Magdalene touch him at that time, John xx. 17. But the disciples here are entrusted to do it, that they who were to preach his resurrection, and to suffer for doing so, might be themselves abundantly satisfied concerning it. He bade them handle him, that they might be convinced that he was not a spirit. There were many heretics in the primitive times who said that Christ had never any substantial body, was neither really born nor truly suffered. Blessed be God, these heresies have long since been buried; and we know and are sure that Jesus Christ was no spirit or apparition, but had a true and real body, even after his resurrection.

(2) He eats with them, to show that he had a real and true body. Peter lays a great stress upon this (Acts x. 41): We did eat and drink with him after he rose from the dead.

[1] When they saw his hands and his feet, They believed not for joy, and wondered, v. 41. It was their infirmity that they believed not, that yet they believed not. This very much corroborates the truth of Christ's resurrection that the disciples were so slow to believe it. Instead of stealing away his body, and saying, He is risen, when he is not, as the chief priests suggested they would do, they are ready to say again and again, He is not risen, when he is. When afterwards they did believe it, and venture their all upon it, it was not but upon the fullest demonstration of the thing that could be. But, though it was their infirmity, yet it was an excusable one; for it was not from any contempt of the evidence offered them that they believed not. They believed not for joy; they thought it too good news to be true. They wondered; they thought it not only too good, but too great, to be true.

[2] For their further conviction and encouragement, he called for some meat. He here did actually eat with them and the rest, to show that his body was really and truly returned to life. They gave him a piece of a broiled fish, and of a honey-comb, v. 42. This was mean fare; yet, if it be the fare of the disciples, their Master will fare as they do, because in the kingdom of our Father they shall fare as he does.

3. The insight he gave them into the word of God. He refers them to the word which they had heard from him when he was with them (v. 44): These are the words which I said unto you while I was yet with you. We should better understand what Christ does, if we did but better remember what he hath said. He refers them to the word they had read in the Old Testament: All things must be fulfilled which were written. Whatever they found written concerning the Messiah in the Old Testament must be fulfilled in him, what was written concerning his sufferings as well as what was written concerning his kingdom. All things must be fulfilled, even the hardest, even the heaviest. The several parts of the Old Testament are here mentioned, as containing each of them things Behold . . .—lovingly offering them both ocular and tangible demonstration of the reality of His resurrection. a spirit hath not—an important statement regarding "spirits." flesh and bones—He says not "flesh and blood"; for the blood is the life of the animal and corruptible body (Gen. 9:4), which "cannot inherit the kingdom of God" (I Cor. 15:50; but "flesh and bones," implying the identity, but with diversity of laws, of the resurrection-body. These are the words . . .—i.e., "Now you will understand what seemed so dark to you when I told you about the Son of man being put to death and rising again (ch. 18:31-34). while . . . yet with you—a striking expression, implying that He was now, as the dead and risen Saviour, virtually dissevered from this scene of mortality, and from all ordinary intercourse with His mortal disciples.

ADAM CLARKE

37-39. And supposed that they had seen a spirit. But if there be no such thing as a disembodied spirit, would not our Lord have shown them their error? Instead of this, He confirms them in their opinion, by saying, A spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have; therefore He says, Handle me, and see me. They probably imagined that it was the soul only of our blessed Lord which they saw; but they were soon fully convinced of the identity of His person and the reality of His resurrection; for (1) they saw His body, (2) they heard Him speak, (3) they handled Him, (4) they saw Him eat a piece of broiled fish and honeycomb, which they gave Him. In these things it was impossible for them to have been deceived.

41. They yet believed not for joy. They were so overcome with the joy of His resurrection that they did not, for some time, properly receive the evidence that was before them—as we phrase it, they thought the news too good to be true.

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

He has not lost His habit of chiding unbelief and encouraging faith; for as soon as He has risen, and speaks with His disciples, He asks them, "Why are ye troubled? and why do thoughts arise in your hearts?" He loves you to believe in Him, and be at rest. Find if you can, beloved, one occasion in which Jesus inculcated doubt, or bade men dwell in uncertainty. The apostles of unbelief are everywhere today, and they imagine that they are doing God service by spreading what they call "honest doubt." This is death to all joy! Poison to all peace! The Savior did not so. He would have them take extraordinary measures to get rid of their doubt. "Handle me," He says." It was going a long way to say that, but He would sooner be handled than His people should doubt! Ordinarily it might not be meet for them to touch Him. Had He not said to the women, "Touch me not"? But what may not be allowable ordinarily becomes proper when necessity demands it. The removal of their doubt as to our Lord's resurrection needed that they should handle Him, and therefore He bids them do so. Oh, beloved, you that are troubled and vexed with thoughts, and therefore get no comfort out of your religion because of your mistrust, your Lord would have you come very near to Him, and put His gospel to any test which will satisfy you. He cannot bear you to doubt. He appeals tenderly, saying "O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?" He would at this moment still encourage you to taste and see that the Lord is good.—The Treasury of the New Testament

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

Note Luke's explanation of the persistent incredulity, as being "for joy." It is like his notice that the three in Gethsemane "slept for sorrow." Great emotion sometimes produces effects opposite to what might have been expected. Who can wonder that the mighty fact which turned the black smoke of despair into bright flame should have seemed too good to be true? The little notice brings the disciples near to our experience and sympathy. Christ's loving forbearance and condescending affording of more than sufficient evidence show how little changed He was by death and resurrection. He is as little changed by sitting at the right hand of God. Still He is patient with our slow hearts. Still He meets our hesitating faith with lavish assurances. Still he lets us touch Him, if not with the hand of sense, with the truer contact of spirit; and we may have as firm personal experience of the reality of His life and presence as had that wondering company in the upper room.
—Expositions of Holy Scripture

concerning Christ: The law of Moses, the prophets, the Psalms. See in what various ways of writing God did of old reveal his will. By an immediate present work upon their minds he gave them to apprehend the true intent and meaning of the Old Testament prophecies of Christ: Then opened he their understanding, that they might understand the scriptures, v. 45. In his discourse with the two disciples he took the veil from off the text, by opening the scriptures; here he took the veil from off the heart, by opening the mind. Jesus Christ by his Spirit operates on the minds of men. He has access to our Spirits and can immediately influence them. Even good men need to have their understandings opened; for though they are not darkness, yet in many things they are in the dark. Christ's way of working faith in the soul is by opening the understanding. Thus he comes into the soul by the door. The design of opening the understanding is that we may understand the scriptures; not that we may be wise above what is written, but that we may be wiser in what is written. Christ's scholars never learn above their bibles in this world; but they need to be learning still more and more out of their bibles.

4. The instructions he gave them as apostles: "You are to be witnesses of these things (v. 48), to carry the notice of them to all the world. You are fully assured of these things yourselves, you are eye and ear-witnesses of them; go, and assure the world of them."

(1) What they must preach. They must preach the gospel. They must take their bibles along with them, and must show people how it was written of old concerning the Messiah, and the glories and graces of his kingdom, and then must tell them how all this was fulfilled in the Lord Jesus. The great gospel truth concerning the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ must be published to the children of men (v. 46): Thus it was written, and therefore, thus it behoved Christ to suffer. "Go, and tell the world that Christ suffered, as it was written of him. Go, preach Christ crucified; be not ashamed of his cross, not ashamed of a suffering Jesus. Tell them that it behoved him to suffer, that it was necessary to the taking away of the sin of the world. That he rose from the dead on the third day. In this also the scriptures were fulfilled. Go, and tell them, then, that he that was dead is alive, and lives for evermore, and has the keys of death and the grave." The great gospel duty of repentance must be pressed upon the children of men. Repentance for sin must be preached in Christ's name, and by his authority, v. 47. "Go, and tell all people that they must turn to the service of God in Christ. Their hearts and lives must be changed." The great gospel privilege of the remission of sins must be proposed to all, and assured to all that repent, and believe the gospel. "Go, tell a guilty world that there is hope concerning them."

(2) To whom they must preach. They must preach this among all nations. They must disperse themselves and carry this light along with them wherever they go. The prophets had preached repentance and remission to the Jews, but the apostles must preach them to all the world. None are exempted from the obligations the gospel lays upon men to repent, nor are any excluded from those inestimable benefits. They must begin at Jerusalem. There the gospel day must dawn. And why must they begin there? First, Because thus it was written, and therefore it behoved them to take this method. The word of the Lord must go forth from Jerusalem, Isa. ii. 3. Secondly, Because there the matters of fact on which the gospel was founded were transacted; and therefore there they were first attested. So strong, so bright, is the first shining forth of the glory of the risen Redeemer that it dares face those daring enemies of his and sets them at defiance. Thirdly, Because he would give us a further example of forgiving enemies. The first offer of gospel grace is made to Jerusalem, and thousands there are in a little time brought to partake of that grace.

(3) What assistance they should have in preaching. Behold, I send the promise of my Father upon you, and you shall be endued with power from on high, v. 49. He here assures them that in a little time the Spirit should be poured out upon them in greater measures than ever, and they should thereby be furnished with all those gifts and graces which were necessary to their discharge of this great trust. Those who receive the Holy Ghost are thereby endued with a power from on high. Christ's apostles could never have planted his gospel, and set up his kingdom in the world, as they did, if they had not been endued with such a power. This power from on high was the promise of the Father. And, if it be the promise of the Father, we may be sure that the promise is inviolable and the thing promised invaluable. Christ's ambassadors must stay till they have their powers

44. The law . . . the prophets, and . . . the psalms. The common Jewish division of the writings of the old covenant is the following, and indeed seems to be the same to which our Lord alludes: (1) The law, thorah, including Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. (2) The prophets, nabiaim, or "teachers," including Joshua, Judges, the two Books of Samuel, and the two Books of Kings; these were termed the "former prophets." Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi—these were termed the "latter prophets." (3) The hagiographa (holy writings), kethuvim, which comprehended the Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and the two Books of Chronicles. The Jews made anciently only twenty-two books of the whole, to bring them to the number of the letters in the Hebrew alphabet; and this they did by joining Ruth to Judges, making the two Books of Samuel only one, and so of Kings and Chronicles, joining the Lamentations to Jeremiah, and making the twelve minor prophets only one book.

45. Then opened he their understanding. "He fully opened." They had a measure of light before, so that they discerned the Scriptures to be the true Word of God, and to speak of the Messiah; but they had not light sufficient to enable them to apply these Scriptures to their Lord and Master. But now, by the influence of Christ, they see not only the prophecies which pointed out the Messiah, but also the Messiah who was pointed out by these prophecies. The Book of God may be received in general as a divine Revelation, but the proper meaning, reference, and application of the Scriptures can be discerned only by the light of Christ. Even the very plain Word of God is a dead letter to those who are not enlightened by the grace of Christ. And why? Because this Word speaks of spiritual and heavenly things, and the carnal mind of man cannot discern them. They who receive not this inward teaching continue dark and dead while they live.

47. Remission of sins. The "taking away"—removal of sins, in general—everything that relates to the destruction of the power, the pardoning of the guilt, and the purification of the heart from the very nature of sin. Should be preached in his name. See the office of a proclaimer, herald, or preacher explained in the note on Matt. iii. 1. In his name. On His authority, and in virtue of the atonement made by Him. For on what other ground could the inhabitants of the earth expect remission of sins? Among all nations. Because God wills the salvation of all, and Jesus Christ by His grace has tasted death for every man, Heb. ii. 9. Beginning at Jerusalem. Making the first overtures of mercy to My murderers! If, then, the sinners of Jerusalem might repent, believe, and be saved, none on this side of hell need despair.

48. Ye are witnesses of these things. He gave them a full commission to proclaim these glad tidings of peace and salvation to a lost world. The disciples were witnesses not only that Christ had suffered and risen again from the dead, but also that He opens the understanding by the inspiration of His Spirit, that He gives repentance, that He pardons sin and purifies from all unrighteousness, and that He is not willing that any should perish, but that all should come unto the knowledge of the truth and be saved.

49. The promise of my Father. That is, the Holy Ghost, promised, John xv. 26. See Acts i. 4; ii. 33.

The promise of the Father. The Holy Spirit, which indeed was the grand promise of the New Testament, as Jesus Christ was of the Old. How properly do we still pray, and how necessary is the prayer, "Cleanse the thoughts of our hearts by the inspiration of thy Holy Spirit, that we may perfectly love thee, and worthily magnify thy name, through Jesus Christ our Lord! Amen."—Communion Service. Ye have heard of me. In His particular conversations with His disciples, such as those related in John xiv. 16-26; xv. 26; xvi. 7-15.

Though, one would think, never was such haste as now for the preaching of the gospel, yet the preachers must tarry till they be endued with power from on high.

Verses 50–53

His ascension into heaven, of which we have a very brief narrative in these verses.

I. How solemnly Christ took leave of his disciples. He had business to do in both worlds, and accordingly came from heaven to earth in his incarnation, to despatch his business here, and, having finished this, he returned to heaven, to reside there. 1. Whence he ascended: from Bethany, near Jerusalem, adjoining to the mount of Olives. There was the garden in which his sufferings began, there he was in his agony; and Bethany signifies the house of sorrow. Those that would go to heaven must ascend thither from the house of sufferings and sorrow. And here it was that awhile ago he began his triumphant entry into Jerusalem, ch. xix. 29. 2. Who were the witnesses of his ascension: He led out his disciples to see him. The disciples did not see him rise out of the grave, because his resurrection was capable of being proved by their seeing him alive afterwards; but they saw him ascend into heaven, because they could not otherwise have an ocular demonstration of his ascension. 3. What was the farewell he gave them: He lifted up his hands, and blessed them. He did not go away in displeasure, but in love; he left a blessing behind him. He blessed them to show that, having loved his own which were in the world, he loved them unto the end. 4. How he left them: While he was blessing them, he was parted from them; to intimate that his being parted from them did not put an end to his blessing them. He began to bless them on earth, but he went to heaven to go on with it. 5. How his ascension is described. (1) He was parted from them. Those that love us, and pray for us, and instruct us, must be parted from us. Those that knew him after the flesh must now henceforth know him so no more. (2) He was carried up into heaven. There needed no chariot of fire, nor horses of fire; he knew the way.

II. How cheerfully his disciples continued their attendance on him. They paid their homage to him at his going away: They worshipped him, v. 52. He blessed them, in token of gratitude for which they worshipped him. The cloud that received him out of their sight did not put them or their services out of his sight. They returned to Jerusalem with great joy. Thither they went, and there they stayed with great joy. This was a wonderful change. When Christ told them that he must leave them sorrow filled their hearts; yet now that they see him go they are filled with joy. They abounded in acts of devotion while they were in expectation of the promise of the Father, v. 53. They attended the temple-service at the hours of prayer. They were continually in the temple, as their Master was when he was at Jerusalem. Temple-sacrifices, they knew, were superseded by Christ's sacrifice, but the temple-songs they joined in. Nothing better prepares the mind for the receiving of the Holy Ghost than holy joy and praise. Fears are silenced, sorrows sweetened and allayed, and hopes kept up. Amen. Let him be continually praised and blessed.

50-53. to Bethany—not to the village itself, but on the descent to it from Mount Olivet.

51. while he blessed . . . parted . . .—Sweet intimation! Incarnate Love, Crucified Love, Risen Love, now on the wing for heaven, waiting only those odorous gales which were to waft Him to the skies, goes away in benedictions, that in the character of Glorified, Enthroned Love, He might continue His benedictions, but in yet higher form, until He come again! And oh, if angels were so transported at His birth into this scene of tears and death, what must have been their ecstasy as they welcomed and attended Him "far above all heavens" into the presence-chamber, and conducted Him to the right hand of the Majesty on High! Thou hast an everlasting right, O my Saviour, to that august place. The brightness of the Father's glory, enshrined in our nature, hath won it well; for He poured out His soul unto death, and led captivity captive, receiving gifts for men, yea for the rebellious, that the Lord God might dwell among them. Thou art the King of glory, O Christ. Lift up your heads, O ye gates, be lifted up, ye everlasting doors, that the King of glory may come in! Even so wilt Thou change these vile bodies of ours, that they may be like unto Thine own glorious body; and then with gladness and rejoicing shall they be brought, they shall enter into the King's palace! 52. worshipped him—certainly in the strictest sense of adoration. returned to Jerusalem—as instructed to do: but not till after gazing, as if entranced, up into the blue vault in which He had disappeared, they were gently checked by two shining ones, who assured them He would come again to them in the like manner as He had gone into heaven. (See on Acts 1:10, 11.) This made them return, not with disappointment at His removal, but "with great joy." 53. were continually in the temple—i.e., every day at the regular hours of prayer till the day of Pentecost.

ADAM CLARKE

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

Our Lord Jesus, having spoiled the grave, and so proved His power over things that are under the earth, tarried for forty days among men, and so claimed His power over the earth itself, and then ascended through the air to show that the dominion of the prince of the power of the air was broken, and, finally, entered into the heaven of heavens to claim sovereignty there, that so, from the lowest depths up to the extremest heights, He might take possession of His vast domains. I like to think of Him as traversing His dominions from end to end, like a conqueror looking over the provinces which have been subdued by His might.
—The Treasury of the New Testament

51. Carried up into heaven. Into that heaven from which He had descended, John i. 18; iii. 13. This was forty days after His resurrection, Acts i. 3, during which time He had given the most convincing proofs of that resurrection, not only to the apostles, but to many others, to upwards of five hundred at one time, 1 Cor. xv. 6. As in His life they had seen the way to the Kingdom, and in His death the price of the Kingdom, so in His ascension they had the fullest proof to the immortality of the soul, the resurrection of the human body, and of His continual intercession at the right hand of God. There are some remarkable circumstances relative to this ascension mentioned in Acts i. 4-12.

53. Were continually in the temple. Especially till the Day of Pentecost came, when they received the promise mentioned, v. 49. Praising and blessing God. Magnifying His mercy and speaking good of His name. Thus the days of their mourning were ended, and they began that life upon earth in which they still live in the kingdom of God.

I cannot close these observations with a more profitable word than what is contained in that truly apostolic and sublime prayer for the second Sunday in Advent; and may he who reads it weigh every word in the spirit of faith and devotion! "Blessed God! who hast caused all holy scriptures to be written for our learning; grant that we may in such wise hear them, read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest them, that, by patience and comfort of thy holy word, we may embrace and ever hold fast the blessed hope of everlasting life, which thou hast given us in our Saviour Jesus Christ!"

Now "unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father; to him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen."

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO JOHN

I. From everlasting (1:1-18)
- A. The Word essentially (1:1-14)

  - 3. Unrecorded deeds (21:24, 25)

It is not important when and where this gospel was written; we are sure that it was given to John, the brother of James, one of the twelve apostles, distinguished by the honorable character of "that disciple whom Jesus loved." The ancients tell us that John lived longest of all the twelve apostles, and was the only one who died a natural death. Some of them say that he wrote this gospel at Ephesus in opposition to the heresy of the Ebionites, who held that our Lord was a mere man. It is clear that he wrote last of the four evangelists, and, comparing his gospel with theirs, we may observe (1) that he relates what they had omitted; he brings up the rear, gleans up what they had passed by; (2) that he gives us more of the mystery of that of which the other evangelists gave us only the history. Some of the ancients observe that the other evangelists wrote more of the bodily things of Christ; but John writes of the spiritual things of the gospel, the life and soul of it.

CHAPTER 1

Let us enquire what there is in those strong lines. The evangelist here lays down the great truth he is to prove, that Jesus Christ is God, one with the Father.

I. Of whom he speaks—The Word—ὁ λόγος. This is an idiom peculiar to John's writings. Even the vulgar Jews were taught that the Word of God was the same with God. The evangelist, in the close of his discourse (v. 18), plainly tells us why he calls Christ the Word—because he is the only begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, and has declared him. Word is two-fold: Word conceived, and word uttered. 1. There is the word conceived, that is, thought, which is the first and only immediate product and conception of the soul. And thus the second person in the Trinity is fitly called the Word; for he is the first-begotten of the Father. There is nothing we are more sure of then that we think, yet nothing we are more in the dark about then how we think. Surely then the generations and births of the eternal mind may well be allowed to be great mysteries of godliness, the bottom of which we cannot fathom, while yet we adore the depth. 2. There is the word uttered, and this is speech, the chief and most natural indication of the mind. And thus Christ is the Word, for by him God has in these last days spoken to us. He has made known God's mind to us, as a man's word or speech makes known his thoughts. John Baptist was the voice, but Christ the Word.

II. What he saith of him.

1. His existence in the beginning: In the beginning was the Word. This bespeaks his existence, not only before his incarnation, but before all time. The world was from the beginning, but the Word was in the beginning. The Word had a being before the world had a beginning. He that was in the beginning never began, and therefore was ever.

2. His co-existence with the Father: The Word was with God, and the Word was God. It is repeated in v. 2: the same was in the beginning with God, that is, he was so from eternity. In the beginning the world was from God, but the Word was with God, as ever with him. The Word was with God, (1) In respect of essence and substance; for the Word was God. (2) In respect of complacency and felicity. There was a glory and happiness which Christ had with God

Vss. 1-14. THE WORD MADE FLESH. 1. In the beginning—of all time and created existence, for this Word gave it being (vss. 3, 10); therefore, "before the world was" (ch. 17:5, 24); or, from all eternity.

was the Word—He who is to God what man's word is to himself, the manifestation or expression of himself to those without him. (See on vs. 18.) On the origin of this most lofty and now for ever consecrated title of Christ, this is not the place to speak. It occurs only in the writings of this seraphic apostle. was with God—having a conscious personal existence distinct from God (as one is from the person he is "with"), but inseparable from Him and associated with Him (vs. 18; ch. 17:5; I John 1:2), where "THE FATHER" is used in the same sense as "GOD" here. was God—in substance and essence GOD; or was possessed of essential or proper divinity. Thus, each of these brief but pregnant statements is the complement of the other, correcting any misapprehensions which the

1. In the beginning. That is, before anything was formed—ere God began the great work of creation. This is the meaning of the word in Gen. i. 1, to which the Evangelist evidently alludes. This phrase fully proves, in the mouth of an inspired writer, that Jesus Christ was no part of the creation, as He existed when no part of that existed; and that consequently He is no creature, as all created nature was formed by Him; for "without him was not any thing made that was made," v. 3. Now as what was before creation must be eternal, and as what gave being to all things could not have borrowed or derived its being from anything, therefore Jesus, who was before all things and who made all things, must necessarily be the eternal God.

Was the Word. Or "existed the Logos." This term "Logos" should be left untranslated, for the very same reason the names Jesus and Christ are left untranslated. And as it would be highly improper to say, "the Deliverer, the Anointed," instead of "Jesus Christ," so I deem it improper to say, "the Word," instead of the Logos. But as every appellative of the Saviour of the world was descriptive of some excellence in His person, nature, or work, so the epithet Logos, which signifies "a word spoken, speech, eloquence, doctrine, reason, or the faculty of reasoning," is very properly applied to Him who is the "true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world," v. 9; who is the Fountain of all wisdom; who giveth being, life, before the world was (ch. xvii. 5). (3) In respect of counsel and design. So that this grand affair of man's reconciliation to God was concerted between the Father and Son from eternity.

3. His agency in making the world, v. 3. This is here, (1) Expressly asserted: All things were made by him. He was with God, active in the divine operations in the beginning of time. Not as the workman cuts by his axe, but as the body sees by the eye. (2) The contrary is denied: Without him was not anything made that was made, from the highest angel to the meanest worm. God the Father did nothing without him in that work. This proves that he is God. This proves the excellency of the Christian religion, that the author and founder of it is the same that was the author and founder of the world. This shows how well qualified he was for the work of our redemption and salvation. He is appointed the author of our bliss who was the author of our being.

4. The original of life and light that is in him: In him was life, v. 4. This further proves that he is God. (1) He has life in himself; not only the true God, but the living God. (2) All living creatures have their life in him; all the life too that is in the creation is derived from him. He is that Word by which man lives more than by bread, Matt. iv. 4. (3) Reasonable creatures have their light from him; that life which is the light of men comes from him. Life in man is something greater and nobler than it is in other creatures; it is rational, and not merely animal. The spirit of a man is the candle of the Lord, and it was the eternal Word that lighted this candle. The light of reason, as well as the life of sense, is derived from him. From whom may we better expect the light of divine revelation than from him who gave us the light of human reason?

5. The manifestation of him to the children of men. Whence is it that he has been so little taken notice of and regarded? To this he answers (v. 5), The light shines, but the darkness comprehends it not.

(1) The discovery of the eternal Word to the lapsed world, even before he was manifested in the flesh: The light shineth in darkness. [1] The eternal Word, as God, shines in the darkness of natural conscience. Something of the power of the divine Word all mankind have an innate sense of. [2] The eternal Word shone in the darkness of the Old Testament prophecies and promises. He that had commanded the light of this world to shine out of darkness was himself long a light shining in darkness.

(2) The disability of the degenerate world to receive this discovery: The darkness comprehended it not. The darkness of error and sin overpowered and quite eclipsed this light. The Jews who had the light of the Old Testament, yet comprehended not Christ in it. It was therefore requisite that Christ should come, both to rectify the errors of the Gentile world and to improve the truths of the Jewish church.

Verses 5–14

The evangelist designs to bring in John Baptist bearing an honourable testimony to Jesus Christ. Now in these verses, before he does this,

I. He gives us some account of the witness he is about to produce. His name was John, which signifies gracious.

1. We are here told concerning him, in general, that he was a man sent of God. He was a man, a mere man. God is pleased to speak to us by men like ourselves. He was sent from God, he was God's messenger. God gave him both his mission and his message. John wrought no miracle, but the strictness and purity of his life and doctrine, were plain indications that he was sent of God.

2. We are here told what his office and business were (v. 7): The same came for a witness, for a testimony. The legal institutions had been long a testimony for God, in the Jewish church. But now divine revelation is to be turned into another channel. There was a profound silence concerning him, till John Baptist came for a witness to him. (1) The matter of his testimony: He came to bear witness to the light. Light is a thing which witnesses for itself. Christ's light needs not man's testimony, but the world's darkness does. John was like the night watchman that goes round the town, proclaiming the approach of the morning light to those that have closed their eyes. He was sent of God to proclaim that dispensation at hand which would bring life and immortality to light. (2) The design of his testimony: That all men through him might believe; not in him, but in Christ. He taught men to look through him, and pass through him, to Christ. If they would but receive this witness of man, they would soon find that the witness of God was greater. It was designed others might occasion. Was the Word eternal? It was not the eternity of "the Father," but of a conscious personal existence distinct from Him and associated with Him. Was the Word thus "with God?" It was not the distinctness and the fellowship of another being, as if there were more Gods than one, but of One who was Himself God—in such sense that the absolute unity of the God head, the great principle of all religion, is only transferred from the region of shadowy abstraction to the region of essential life and love. But why all this definition? Not to give us any abstract information about certain mysterious distinctions in the Godhead, but solely to let the reader know who it was that in the fulness of time "was made flesh." After each verse, then, the reader must say, "It was He who is thus, and thus, and thus described, who was made flesh." 2. The same . . .—See what property of the Word the stress is laid upon—His eternal distinctness, in unity, from God—the Father (John 1:2). 3. All things . . .—all things absolutely (as is evident from vs. 10; I Cor. 8:6; Col. 1:16, 17; but put beyond question by what follows). "Without Him was not one thing made [brought into being] that was made." This is a denial of the eternity and non-creation of matter, which was held by the whole thinking world outside of Judaism and Christianity: or rather, its proper creation was never so much as dreamt of save by the children of revealed religion. 4. In Him was life—essentially and originally, as the previous verses show to be the meaning. Thus He is the Living Word, or, as He is called in I John 1:1,2, "the Word of Life." the life . . . the light of men—All that in men which is true light—knowledge, integrity, intelligent, willing subjection to God, love to Him and to their fellow creatures, wisdom, purity, holy joy, rational happiness—all this "light of men" has its fountain in the essential original "life" of "the Word" (I John 1:5-7; Ps. 36:9). 5. shineth in darkness . . .—in this dark, fallen world, or in mankind "sitting in darkness and the shadow of death," with no ability to find the way either of truth or of holiness. In this thick darkness, and consequent intellectual and moral obliquity, "the light of the Word" shineth—by all the rays whether of natural or revealed teaching which men (apart from the Incarnation of the Word) are favored with. the darkness comprehended it not—did not take it in, a brief summary of the effect of all the strivings of this *un*incarnate Word throughout this wide world from the beginning, and a hint of the necessity of His putting on flesh, if any recovery of men was to be effected (I Cor. 1:21).

6-9. The Evangelist here approaches his grand thesis, so paving his way for the full statement of it in vs. 14, that we may be able to bear the bright light of it, and take in its length and breadth and depth and height.

light, knowledge, and reason to all men; who is the grand Source of revelation, who has declared God unto mankind; who spake by the prophets, "for the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy," Rev. xix. 10; who has illustrated life and immortality by His gospel, 2 Tim. i. 10; and who has fully made manifest the deep mysteries which lay hidden in the bosom of the invisible God from all eternity, John i. 18. The apostle does not borrow this mode of speech from the writings of Plato, as some have imagined; he took it from the scriptures of the Old Testament, and from the subsequent style of the ancient Jews. And the Word was God. Or "God was the Logos"; therefore no subordinate being, no second to the Most High, but the supreme, eternal Jehovah.

3. All things were made by him. That is, by this Logos. In Gen. i. 1, God is said to have created all things; in this verse, Christ is said to have created all things. The same unerring Spirit spoke in Moses and in the Evangelists; therefore Christ and the Father are One.

4. In him was life. This expression is not to be understood of natural life, but of that life eternal which He revealed to the world, 2 Tim. i. 10; to which He taught the way, chap. xiv. 6; which He promised to believers, chap. x. 28; which He purchased for them, chap. vi. 51, 53-54; which He is appointed to give them, chap. xvii. 2; and to which He will raise them up, v. 29, because He hath the life in himself, v. 26.

5. And the light shineth in darkness. By darkness here may be understood: (1) the heathen world, Eph. v. 8; (2) the Jewish people; (3) the fallen spirit of man. Comprehended it not. "Prevented it not—hindered it not."

6. Whose name was John. This was John the Baptist; see his name and the nature of his office explained, Mark i. 4 and Matt. iii. 1-3.

7. That all men through him might believe. He testified that Jesus was the true Light—the true Teacher of the way to the Kingdom of glory, and the Lamb or Sacrifice of God, which was to bear away the sin of the world, v. 29, and that all men through him might believe, excluding none that did not exclude themselves.

3. We are here cautioned not to mistake him for the light who only came to bear witness to it (v. 8): He was not that light. He was a star, like that which guided the wise men to Christ, a morning star; but he was not the Sun. The evangelist here, when he speaks very honourably of him, yet shows that he must give place to Christ. He was great as the prophet of the Highest, but not the Highest himself. We must take heed of over-valuing ministers, as well as of under-valuing them; they are not our lords, but ministers by whom we believe. Those who usurp the honour of Christ forfeit the honour of being the servants of Christ; yet John was very serviceable as a witness to the light, though he was not that light. Those may be of great use to us who yet shine with a borrowed light.

II. Before he goes on with John's testimony, he returns to give us a further account of this Jesus, to show the graces of his incarnation.

1. Christ was the true Light (v. 9). Christ is the great light that deserves to be called so. Other lights are but figuratively and equivocally called so: Christ is the true light. But how does Christ enlighten every man that comes into the world? (1) By his creating power he enlightens every man with the light of reason; all the beauty it puts upon us, are from Christ. (2) By the publication of his gospel to all nations he does in effect enlighten every man. John Baptist was a light but he lightened only Jerusalem and Judæa, like a candle that enlightens one room; but Christ is the true light, for he is a light to enlighten the Gentiles. Divine revelation is not now to be confined, as it had been, to one people, but to be diffused to all people, Matt. v. 15. Whatever light any man has, he is indebted to Christ for it, whether it be natural or supernatural.

2. Christ was in the world, v. 10. This speaks of his being in the world when he took our nature upon him, and dwelt among us. I am come into the world. He left a world of bliss and glory, and was here in this melancholy miserable world. He was in the world, but not of it. The greatest honour that ever was put upon this world was that the Son of God was once in the world. It should reconcile us to our present abode in this world that once Christ was here. What reason Christ had to expect the most affectionate and respectful welcome possible in this world; for the world was made by him. Therefore he came to save a lost world because it was a world of his own making. The world was made by him, and therefore ought to do him homage. What cold entertainment he met with, notwithstanding: The world knew him not. The ox knows his owner, but the more brutish world did not. They did not own him, did not bid him welcome, because they did not know him. When he shall come as a Judge the world shall know him.

3. He came to his own (v. 11); not only to the world which was his own, but to the people of Israel, that were peculiarly his own. To them he was first sent He came to his own, to seek and save them, because they were his own. The generality rejected him: His own received him not. He had reason to expect that those who were his own should have bidden him welcome. He came among them himself, introduced with signs and wonders, and himself the greatest; and therefore it is not said of them, as it was of the world (v. 10), that they knew him not; but his own, though they could not but know him, yet received him not. Many who in profession are Christ's own, yet do not receive him, because they will not part with their sins, nor have him to reign over them. Yet there was a remnant who owned him, and were faithful to him. There were those that received him (v. 12): But as many as received him. There were many of them that were wrought upon to submit to Christ, and many more that were not of that fold. The true Christian's description and property; and that is, that he receives Christ, and believes on his name. Believing in Christ's name is receiving him as a gift from God. We must receive his doctrine as true and good; and we must receive the image of his grace, and impressions of his love, as the governing principle of our affections and actions. The true Christians' dignity and privilege are twofold:

First, The privilege of adoption: To them gave he power to become the sons of God. Hitherto, the adoption pertained to the Jews only; but now, by faith in Christ, Gentiles are the children of God. To them gave he a right; this power have all the saints. It is the unspeakable privilege of all good Christians, that they are become the children of God. If they be the children of God, they become so, are made so. Behold what manner of love is this, 1 John iii. 1. God calls them his children, they call him Father. The privilege of adoption is entirely owing to Jesus

8. not that Light—(See on ch. 5:35). What a testimony to John to have to explain that "he was not that Light!" Yet was he but a foil to set it off, his night-taper dwindling before the Dayspring from on high (ch. 3:30).

lighteth every man . . .—rather, "which, coming into the world, enlighteneth every man"; or, is "the Light of the world" (ch. 9:5). "Coming into the world" is a superfluous and quite unusual description of "every man"; but it is of all descriptions of Christ amongst the most familiar, especially in the writings of this Evangelist (ch. 12:46; 16:28; 18:37; I John 4:9; I Tim. 1:15, etc.).

10-13. He was in the world . . .—The language here is nearly as wonderful as the thought. Observe its compact simplicity, its sonorousness—"the world" resounding in each of its three members—and the enigmatic form in which it is couched, startling the reader and setting his ingenuity a-working to solve the stupendous enigma of Christ ignored in His own world. "The world," in the first two clauses, plainly means the created world, into which He came, says vs. 9; "in it He was," says this verse. By His Incarnation, He became an inhabitant of it, and bound up with it. Yet it "was made by Him" (vss. 3, 4, 5). Here, then, it is merely alluded to, in contrast partly with His being in it, but still more with the reception He met with from it. "The world that knew Him not" (I John 3:1) is of course the intelligent world of mankind. (See on vss. 11, 12.) Taking the first two clauses as one statement, we try to apprehend it by thinking of the infant Christ conceived in the womb and born in the arms of His own creature, and of the Man Christ Jesus breathing His own air, treading His own ground, supported by substances to which He Himself gave being, and the Creator of the very men whom He came to save. But the most vivid commentary on this entire verse will be got by tracing (in His matchless history) Him of whom it speaks walking amidst all the elements of nature, the diseases of men and death itself, the secrets of the human heart, and "the rulers of the darkness of this world" in all their number, subtlety, and malignity, not only with absolute ease, as their conscious Lord, but, as we might say, with full consciousness on their part of the presence of their Maker, whose will to one and all of them was law. And this is He of whom it is added, "the world knew Him not!" 11. his own—"His own" (property or possession), for the word is in the neuter gender. It means His own land, city, temple, Messianic rights and possessions. and his own—"His own" (people); for now the word is masculine. It means the Jews, as the "peculiar people." Both they and their land, with all that this included, were "HIS OWN," not so much as part of "the world which was made by Him," but as "THE HEIR" of the inheritance (Luke 20:14; see also on Matt. 22:1). received him not—nationally, as God's chosen witnesses. 12. But as many—individuals, of the "disobedient and gainsaying people." gave he power—The word signifies both authority and ability, and both are certainly meant here. to become—Mark these words: Jesus is the Son of God; He is never said to have become such. the sons—or more simply, "sons of God," in name and in nature. believe on his name—a phrase never used in Scripture of any mere creature, to express the credit given to human testimony, even of prophets or apostles, inasmuch it carries with it the idea of trust proper only towards GOD. In this invited men to believe in Him for the remission of their sins, that they might receive the baptism of the Holy Ghost, vv. 32-34.

9. Which lighteth every man. As Christ is the Spring and Fountain of all wisdom, so all the wisdom that is in man comes from Him. The human intellect is a ray from His brightness; and reason itself springs from this Logos, the eternal Reason. Some of the most eminent rabbins understand Isa. lx. 1, "Arise, shine; for thy light is come," of the Messiah, who was to illuminate Israel. That cometh into the world. Or "coming into the world." This heavenly light shines into the soul of every man, to convince of sin, righteousness, and judgment; and it is through this light, which no man brings into the world with him, but which Christ mercifully gives to him on his coming into it, that what is termed conscience among men is produced. No man could discern good from evil were it not for this light thus supernaturally and graciously restored.

10. He was in the world. From its very commencement—He governed the universe—regulated His Church—spake by His prophets—and often, as the Angel or Messenger of Jehovah, appeared to them and to the patriarchs. The world knew him not. "Did not acknowledge Him"; for the Jewish rulers knew well enough that He was "a teacher come from God," but they did not choose to acknowledge Him as such.

11. He came unto his own. "To those of His own family, city, country"; "and His own people"—His own citizens, brethren, subjects. Received him not. Would not acknowledge Him as the Messiah, nor believe in Him for salvation.

12. Gave he power. "Privilege, honor, dignity, or right." He who is made a child of God enjoys the greatest "privilege" which the Divine Being can confer on this side of eternity. Those who accept Jesus Christ as He is offered to them in the gospel have, through His blood, a "right" to this sonship; for by that sacrifice this blessing was purchased, and the fullest promises of God confirm it to all who believe. And those Christ; he gave this power to them that believe on his name. The Son of God became a Son of man, that the sons and daughters of men might become the sons and daughters of God Almighty.

Secondly, The privilege of regeneration (v. 13): Which were born. All the children of God are born again; all that are adopted are regenerated. Now here we have an account of the original of this new birth. 1. Negatively. (1) It is not of blood, not of the will of the flesh, nor of corruptible seed. We do not become the children of God as we become the children of our natural parents. Grace does not run in the blood, as corruption does. (2) It is not produced by the natural power of our own will. As it is not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, so neither is it of the will of man. It is the grace of God that makes us willing to be his. But, 2. Positively: it is of God. This new birth is owing to the word of God as the means and to the Spirit of God as the great and sole author. True believers are born of God, 1 John iii. 9; v. 1.

4. The word was made flesh, v. 14. This expresses Christ's incarnation more clearly than what went before. Now that the fulness of time was come he was sent forth after another manner, made of a woman.

(1) The human nature of Christ with which he was veiled. The word was made flesh. Forasmuch as the children who were to become the sons of God, were partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same, Heb. ii. 14. John here saith, He was God, but He was made flesh. Compare v. 1 with this. He subjected himself to the miseries and calamities of the human nature. Flesh bespeaks man tainted with sin, and Christ appeared in the likeness of sinful flesh (Rom. viii. 3), and was made sin for us, 2 Cor. v. 21, and condemned sin in the flesh, Rom. viii. 3. The Word of the Lord, who was made flesh, endures for ever; when made flesh, he ceased not to be the Word of God. He dwelt among us. Having taken upon him the nature of man, he put himself into the place and condition of other men. Having taken a body of the same mould with ours, in it he came, and resided in the same world with us. He dwelt among us, us worms of the earth, us that were corrupt and depraved, and revolted from God. When we look upon the upper world, how mean and contemptible does this flesh, this body, appear, which we carry about with us, and this world in which our lot is cast. But that the eternal Word was made flesh, and dwelt in this world as we do should make us willing to abide in the flesh while God has any work for us to do. He dwelt among the Jews. Though the Jews were unkind to him, yet he continued to dwell among them. He dwelt among us. He was in the world, not as a wayfaring man that tarries but for a night, but he dwelt among us. The original word is observable, he dwelt as in a tabernacle, which intimates, that he dwelt here in very mean circumstances, as shepherds that dwell in tents. That his stay among us was not to be perpetual. He dwelt here as in a tent, not as at home. That as of old God dwelt in the tabernacle of Moses, so now he dwells in the human nature of Christ. And we are to make all our addresses to God through Christ.

(2) The beams of his divine glory that darted through this veil of flesh: We beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth. The sun is still the fountain of light, though eclipsed or clouded; so Christ was still the brightness of his Father's glory. There were those that saw through the veil.

[1] Who were the witnesses of this glory: we, his disciples and followers, we among whom he dwelt. Other men discover their weaknesses to those that are most familiar with them, but it was not so with Christ; those that were most intimate with him saw most of his glory. They saw the glory of his divinity, while others saw only the veil of his human nature.

[2] What evidence they had of it: We saw it. They had not their evidence by report, at secondhand, but were themselves eyewitnesses, We saw it. The word signifies a fixed abiding sight. This apostle himself explains this: What we declare unto you of the Word of life is what we have seen with our eyes, and what we have looked upon, 1 John i. 1.

[3] What the glory was: The glory as of the only begotten of the Father. The glory of the Word made flesh was such a glory as became the only begotten Son of God, and could not be the glory of any other. Jesus Christ is the only begotten of the Father. Believers are the children of God by the special favour of adoption and the special grace of regeneration. They are in a sense of a like nature, and have the image of his perfections; but Christ is of the same nature. He was evidently declared to be the only begotten of the Father, by that which was seen of his glory when he dwelt among us. His divine glory sense of supreme faith, as due to Him who "gives those that believe in Himself power to become sons of God," it is manifestly used here. 13. Which were born—a sonship therefore not of mere title and privilege, but of nature, the soul being made conscious of the vital capacities, perceptions, and emotions of a child of God, before unknown. not of blood . . .—not of superior human descent, not of human generation at all, not of man in any manner of way. By this elaborate threefold denial of the human source of this sonship, immense force is given to what follows—"but of God." Right royal gift, and He who confers must be absolutely divine. For who would not worship Him who can bring him into the family, and evoke within him the very life, of the sons of God? 14. And the Word . . .—To raise the reader to the altitude of this climax were the thirteen foregoing verses written. was made flesh—BECAME MAN, in man's present frail, mortal condition, denoted by the word "flesh" (Isa. 40:6; I Pet. 1:24). It is directed probably against the Docetæ, who held that Christ was not really but only apparently man; against whom this gentle spirit is vehement in his Epistles (I John 4:3; II John 7:10, 11), [LUCKE, etc.]. Nor could He be too much so, for with the verity of the Incarnation all substantial Christianity vanishes. But now, married to our nature, henceforth He is as personally conscious of all that is strictly human as of all that is properly divine; and our nature is in His Person redeemed and quickened, ennobled and transfigured. and dwelt—tabernacled or pitched his tent; a word peculiar to John, who uses it four times, all in the sense of a permanent stay (Rev. 7: 15; 12:12; 13:6; 21:3). For ever wedded to our "flesh," He has entered this tabernacle to "go no more out." The allusion is to that tabernacle where dwelt the Shekinah (see on Matt. 23:38, 39), or manifested "GLORY OF THE LORD," and with reference to God's permanent dwelling among His people (Lev. 26:11; Ps. 68:18; 132:13, 14; Ezek. 37:27). This is put almost beyond doubt by what immediately follows, "And we beheld His glory" [LUCKE, MEYER, DE WETTE, which last critic, rising higher than usual, says that thus were perfected all former partial manifestations of God in an essentially Personal and historically Human manifestation].

and we beheld his glory—not by the eye of sense, which saw in Him only "the carpenter." His glory was "spiritually discerned" (I Cor. 2:7-15; II Cor. 3:18; 4:4, 6; 5:16)—the glory of surpassing grace, love, tenderness, wisdom, purity, spirituality; majesty and meekness, richness and poverty, power and weakness, meeting together in unique contrast; ever attracting and at times ravishing the "babes" that followed and forsook all for Him.

the glory as of the only begotten of the Father—(See on Luke 1:35); not like, but "such as (belongs to)," such as became or was befitting the only begotten of the Father [CHRYSOSTOM in LUCKE, CALVIN, etc.], according to a wellknown use of the word "as."

who are engrafted in the heavenly family have the highest "honor" and "dignity" to which it is possible for a human soul to arrive.

13. Which were born, not of blood. Who were regenerated, "not of bloods"—the union of father and mother, or of a distinguished or illustrious ancestry, for the Hebrew language makes use of the plural to point out the dignity or excellence of a thing; and probably by this the Evangelist intended to show his countrymen that having Abraham and Sarah for their parents would not entitle them to the blessings of the new covenant, as no man could lay claim to them but in consequence of being born of God. Therefore neither the will of the flesh (anything that the corrupt heart of man could purpose or determine in its own behalf) nor the will of man (anything that another may be disposed to do in our behalf) can avail here. This new birth must come through the will of God—through His own unlimited power and boundless mercy, prescribing salvation by Christ Jesus alone.

14. And the Word was made flesh. That very Person who was in the beginning—who was with God—and who was God, v. 1, in the fullness of time became flesh—became incarnated by the power of the Holy Ghost, in the womb of the Virgin. Allowing this apostle to have written by divine inspiration, is not this verse, taken in connection with v. 1, an absolute and incontestable proof of the proper and eternal Godhead of Christ Jesus? And dwelt among us. "And tabernacled among us," the human nature which He took of the Virgin being as the shrine, house, or temple in which His immaculate deity condescended to dwell. The word is probably an allusion to the divine Shekinah in the Jewish Temple; and as God has represented the whole gospel dispensation by the types and ceremonies of the old covenant, so the Shekinah in the Tabernacle and Temple pointed out this manifestation of God in the flesh. The word is thus used by the Jewish writers; it signifies with them a manifestation of the divine Shekinah.

We beheld his glory. This refers to the Transfiguration, at which John was present, in company with Peter and James.

The glory as of the only begotten. That is, such a glory as "became," or was "proper to," the Son of God; for thus the particle hos should be here understood. There is also here an allusion to the manifestations of God above the ark in the Tabernacle (see Exod. xxv. 22; Num. vii. 89); and this connects itself with the first clause, "He tabernacled," or "fixed His tent among us." While God dwelt in the Tabernacle, among the Jews, the priests saw His glory; and while Jesus dwelt among men His glory was manifested in His appeared in the holiness and heavenliness of his doctrine; in his miracles; it appeared in the purity, goodness, and beneficence, of his whole conversation. God's goodness is his glory, and he went about doing good. Perhaps the evangelist had a particular regard to the glory of his transfiguration, of which he was an eyewitness.

[4] What advantage those he dwelt among had from this. In the old tabernacle wherein God dwelt was the law, in this was grace; in that were types in this was truth. He was full of grace and truth, the two great things that fallen man stands in need of. He was full of grace, and therefore qualified to intercede for us; and full of truth, and therefore fit to instruct us. He had a fulness of knowledge and a fulness of compassion.

Verses 15–18

I. The evangelist begins again to give us John Baptist's testimony concerning Christ, v. 15.

1. How he expressed his testimony: He cried, according to the prediction that he should be the voice of one crying. The Old Testament prophets cried aloud, to show people their sins; this New Testament prophet cried aloud, to show people their Saviour. It was an open public testimony, proclaimed, that all manner of persons might take notice of it. He was free and hearty in bearing this testimony. He cried as one that was both well assured of the truth to which he witnesses and well affected to it.

2. What his testimony was. He appeals to what he had said at the beginning of his ministry, when he had directed them to expect one that should come after him, whose forerunner he was. Now what he had then said he applies to this Jesus whom he had lately baptized: This was he of whom I spoke. In this he went beyond all the Old Testament prophets that he particularly specified the person.

(1) He had given the preference to this Jesus: He that comes after me is preferred before me as the prince or peer that comes after is preferred before the harbinger or gentleman-usher that makes way for him. Jesus Christ, who was to be called the Son of the highest (Luke i. 32), was preferred before John Baptist, who was to be called only the prophet of the Highest, Luke i. 76. John was a great man, yet he was forward to give the preference to him to whom it belonged. All the ministers of Christ must prefer him and his interest before themselves and their own interests. He comes after me, and yet is preferred before me. God dispenses his gifts according to his good pleasure, and many times crosses hands, as Jacob did. Paul far outstripped those that were in Christ before him.

(2) He gives here a good reason for it: For he was before me. In respect of seniority: he was before me, for he was before Abraham, ch. viii. 58. I am but of yesterday, he from eternity. In respect of supremacy: he is my Master, I am his minister and messenger."

II. He returns again to speak of Jesus Christ, and cannot go on with John Baptist's testimony till v. 19. The 16th verse has a manifest connection with v. 14, where the incarnate Word was said to be full of grace and truth. He has a fountain of fulness overflowing: We all have received. All we believers; as many as received him (v. 16), received from him. All true believers receive from Christ's fulness; the best and greatest saints cannot live without him, the meanest and weakest may live by him. This excludes proud boasting, that we have nothing but we have received it; and silences perplexing fears, that we want nothing but we may receive it.

1. We have received grace for grace. Our receivings by Christ are all summed up in this one word, grace; so great a gift, so rich, so invaluable; we have received no less than grace. It is repeated, grace for grace.

(1) The blessing received. It is grace; the goodwill of God towards us, and the good work of God in us. God's goodwill works the good work, and then the good work qualifies us for further tokens of his good will. As the cistern receives water from the fulness of the fountain, the branches sap from the fulness of the root, and the air light from the fulness of the sun, so we receive grace from the fulness of Christ.

(2) The manner of its reception: Grace for grace. The phrase is singular, and interpreters put different senses upon it, each of which will be of use to illustrate the unsearchable riches of the grace of Christ. Grace for grace bespeaks, [1] The freeness of this grace. It is grace for grace' sake. We receive grace, not for our sakes. It is grace to us for the sake of Jesus Christ. [2] The fulness of this grace. Grace for grace is abundance of grace, grace upon grace. It is a blessing poured out, that there shall not be room to receive it: one grace a pledge of more full of grace and truth—So it should read. "He dwelt among us full of grace and truth"; or, in Old Testament phrase, "Mercy and truth," denoting the whole fruit of God's purposes of love towards sinners of mankind, which until now existed only in promise, and the fulfilment at length of that promise in Christ; in one great word, "the SURE MERCIES of David" (Isa. 55:3; Acts 13:34; cf. II Sam. 23:5). In His Person all that Grace and Truth which had been floating so long in shadowy forms, and darting into the souls of the poor and needy its broken beams, took everlasting possession of human flesh and filled it full. By this Incarnation of Grace and Truth, the teaching of thousands of years was at once transcended and beggared, and the family of God sprang into Manhood.

15. A SAYING OF THE BAPTIST CONFIRMATORY OF THIS. after me—in official manifestation. before me—in rank and dignity.

for he was before me—in existence; "His goings forth being from of old, from everlasting" (Mic. 5:2). (Anything lower than this His words cannot mean); i.e., "My Successor is my Superior, for He was my Predecessor." This enigmatic play upon the different senses of the words "before" and "after" was doubtless employed by the Baptist to arrest attention, and rivet the thought; and the Evangelist introduces it just to clinch his own statements.

16-18. SAME SUBJECT CONTINUED. of his fulness—of "grace and truth," resuming the thread of vs. 14.

grace for grace—i.e., grace upon grace (so all the best interpreters), in successive communications and larger measures, as each was able to take it in. Observe, the word "truth" is here dropped. "Grace" being the chosen New Testament word for the whole fulness of the new covenant, all that dwells in Christ for men.

gracious words and miraculous acts. The only begotten of the Father. That is, the only Person born of a woman whose human nature never came by the ordinary way of generation, it being a mere creation in the womb of the Virgin by the energy of the Holy Ghost. Full of grace and truth. Full of favor, kindness, and mercy to men; teaching the way to the kingdom of God, with all the simplicity, plainness, dignity, and energy of truth.

15. Of him. The glorious Personage before mentioned. John the Baptist, whose history was well-known to the persons to whom this Gospel came in the beginning, bare witness . . . and [he] cried—being deeply convinced of the importance and truth of the subject, he delivered his testimony with the utmost zeal and earnestness, saying, This was he of whom I spake, He that cometh after me—for I am no other than the voice of the crier in the wilderness, Isa. xl. 3, the forerunner of the Messiah. Was before me. Speaking by the prophets, and warning your fathers to repent and return to God, as I now warn you; for he was before me—He was from eternity, and from Him I have derived both my being and my ministry.

16. And of his fulness. Of the plenitude of His grace and mercy, by which He made an atonement for sin, and of the plenitude of His wisdom and truth, by which the mysteries of heaven have been revealed and the science of eternal truth taught, have all we received. All we apostles have received grace or mercy to pardon our sins, and truth to enable us so to write and speak concerning these things, that those who attend to our testimony shall be unerringly directed in the way of salvation, and with us continue to receive "grace upon grace," one blessing after another, till they are filled with all the fullness of God. It is only necessary to add that John seems here to refer to the gospel as succeeding the law. The law was certainly a dispensation of both grace and truth, for it pointed out the gracious design of God to save men by Christ Jesus. But the gospel, which had now taken place, introduced that plenitude of grace and truth to the whole world, which the law had only shadowed forth to the Jewish people, and which they imagined should have been restrained to themselves alone. In the most gracious economy of God, one dispensation of mercy and truth is designed to make way for, and to be followed by, another and a greater. Thus the law succeeded the patriarchal dispensation, and the gospel the law; more and more of the plenitude of the grace of the gospel becomes daily manifest to the genuine followers of Christ; and to those who are faithful unto grace. [3] The serviceableness of this grace. Grace for grace is grace for the promoting and advancing of grace. Gracious vouchsafements for gracious performances; grace is a talent to be traded with. [4] The substitution of New Testament grace in the room and stead of Old Testament grace. And this sense is confirmed by what follows (v. 17); for the Old Testament had grace in type, the New Testament has grace in truth. This is grace instead of grace. [5] It bespeaks the augmentation and continuance of grace. Grace for grace is one grace to improve, confirm, and perfect another grace. [6] Grace for grace is grace in us answering to grace in him, as the impression upon the wax answers the seal line for line. The grace we receive from Christ changes us into the same image.

2. We have received grace and truth, v. 17. He had said (v. 14) that Christ was full of grace and truth; now here he says that by him grace and truth came to us. From Christ we receive grace; this is a string he delights to harp upon, he cannot go off from it. Two things he further observes in this verse concerning this grace: (1) Its preference above the law of Moses: The law was given by Moses, and it was a glorious discovery; but the gospel of Christ is a much clearer discovery. That which was given by Moses was purely terrifying and threatening, but that which is given by Jesus Christ has all the beneficial uses of the law, but not the terror, for it is grace. The endearments of love are the genius of the gospel, not the affrightments of law and the curse. (2) Its connection with truth: grace and truth. In the gospel we have the discovery of the greatest truths to be embraced by the understanding, as well as of the richest grace to be embraced by the will and affections. It is grace and truth with reference to the law that was given by Moses. For it is, [1] The performance of all the Old Testament promises. [2] It is the substance of all the Old Testament types and shadows. He is the true paschal lamb, the true scape-goat, the true manna. They had grace in the picture; we have grace in the person. Grace and truth came, was made; the same word that was used (v. 3) concerning Christ's making all things. By him this grace and truth do consist.

3. Another thing we receive from Christ is a clear revelation of God to us (v. 18): He hath declared God to us, whom no man hath seen at any time.

(1) The insufficiency of all other discoveries: No man hath seen God at any time. This intimates, [1] That the nature of God being spiritual, he is invisible to bodily eyes. We have therefore need to live by faith, by which we see him that is invisible, Heb. xi. 27. [2] That the revelation which God made of himself in the Old Testament was very short and imperfect, in comparison with that which he has made by Christ: No man hath seen God at any time. But this recommends Christ's holy religion to us that it was founded by one that had seen God, and knew more of his mind that anyone else ever did.

(2) The all-sufficiency of the gospel discovery proved from its author: The only-begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, he has declared him. Observe here, How fit he was to make this discovery. He is the only-begotten Son; and who so likely to know the Father as the Son? or in whom is the Father better known than in the Son? Matt. xi. 27. He is in the bosom of the Father. 1. In the bosom of his special love, dear to him, in whom he was well pleased. 2. In the bosom of his secret counsels. None so fit as he to make known God, for none knew his mind as he did.

(3) How free he was in making this discovery: He hath declared. Not only that which was hid of God, but that which was hid in God. It signifies a plain, clear, and full discovery. He that runs may now read the will of God and the way of salvation. This is the grace, this the truth, that came by Jesus Christ.

We have here the testimony of John, which he delivered to the messengers who were sent from Jerusalem to examine him.

I. Who they were that sent to him, and who they were that were sent. They that sent to him were the Jews at Jerusalem. One would think that they should have understood the times so well as to know that the Messiah was at hand, and therefore have known him that was his forerunner, but, instead of this, they sent messengers to cross questions with him. Secular learning, honour, and power, seldom dispose men's minds to the reception of divine light. They that were sent were, (1) Priests and Levites. John Baptist was himself a priest of the seed of Aaron, and therefore it was not fit that he should be examined by any but priests. (2) They were of the Pharisees that thought they needed no repentance.

II. On what errand they were sent; it was to enquire

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

17. For . . .—The Law elicits the consciousness of sin and the need of redemption; it only typifies the reality. The Gospel, on the contrary, actually communicates reality and power from above (cf. Rom. 6:14). Hence Paul terms the Old Testament "shadow," while he calls the New Testament "substance" (Col. 2:17), [OLSHAUSEN].

18. No man—"No one," in the widest sense. hath seen God—by immediate gaze, or direct intuition.

in the bosom of the Father—A remarkable expression, used only here, presupposing the Son's conscious existence distinct from the Father, and expressing His immediate and most endeared access to, and absolute acquaintance with, Him. he—emphatic; q.d., "He and He only hath declared Him," because He only can.

19-36. THE BAPTIST'S TESTIMONY TO CHRIST. 19. record—testimony. the Jews—i.e., the heads of the nation, the members of the Sanhedrim. In this peculiar sense our Evangelist seems always to use the term.

death, a heaven full of eternal glory will soon succeed to the grace of the gospel.

17. The law was given by Moses. Moses received the law from God, and through him it was given to the Jews, Acts vii. 38. But grace and truth. Which he had already mentioned, and which were to be the subject of the book which he was now writing, came to all mankind "through Jesus Christ," who is the Mediator of the new covenant, as Moses was of the old, Heb. viii. 6; ix. 15; Gal. iii. 19. Jesus Christ. "Jesus the Christ, the Messiah," or anointed Prophet, Priest, and King, sent from heaven.

18. No man hath seen God at any time. Moses and others heard His voice, and saw the cloud and the fire, which were the symbols of His presence; but such a manifestation of God as had now taken place, in the person of Jesus Christ, had never before been exhibited to the world. It is likely that the word seen, here, is put for "known," as in chap. iii. 32; 1 John iii. 2, 6; and 3 John, v. 11; and this sense the latter clause of the verse seems to require—No man, how highly soever favored, "hath fully known God, at any time," in any nation or age.

The only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, who was intimately acquainted with all the counsels of the Most High, he hath declared him, hath announced the divine oracles unto men; for in this sense the word is used by the best Greek writers. "Lying in the bosom" is spoken of in reference to the Asiatic custom of reclining while at meals. The person who was next the other was said to "lie in his bosom"; and he who had this place in reference to the master of the feast was supposed to share his peculiar regards, and to be in a state of the utmost favor and intimacy with him.

19. And this is the record of John. He persisted in this assertion, testifying to the Jews that this Jesus was the Christ.

MATTHEW HENRY

concerning John and his baptism. They did not send for John; they thought it was good to keep him at a distance. They enquire concerning him, 1. To satisfy their curiosity. The doctrine of repentance was to them strange doctrine. 2. It was to show their authority. 3. It was with a design to suppress him and silence him.

III. What was the answer he gave them, and his account, both concerning himself and concerning his baptism.

1. Concerning himself. They asked him, Thou, who art thou? John's appearing in the world was surprising. His spirit, his converse, his doctrine, had something in them which commanded and gained respect; but he did not give out himself to be some great one. He was more industrious to do good than to appear great. He answers their interrogatory, Negatively. He was not that great one whom some took him to be. God's faithful witnesses stand more upon their guard against undue respect than against unjust contempt. John disowns himself to be the Christ (v. 20): He said, I am not the Christ. Observe how emphatically this is here expressed concerning John: He confessed, and denied not, but confessed; it denotes his vehemence and constancy in making this protestation. I am not the Christ, not I; another is at hand, who is he, but I am not, His disowning himself to be the Christ is called his confessing and not denying Christ. He disowns himself to be Elias, v. 21. The Jews expected the person of Elias to return from heaven. Hearing of John's character, doctrine, and baptism, and observing that he appeared as one dropped from heaven, it is no wonder that they were ready to take him for this Elijah; but he disowned this honour too. He was indeed prophesied of under the name of Elijah (Mal. iv. 5), and he came in the spirit and power of Elias (Luke i. 17), and was the Elias that was to come (Matt. xi. 14); but he was not the person of Elias. He was the Elias that God had promised, not the Elias that they foolishly dreamed of. Elias did come, and they knew him not (Matt. xvii. 12); because they had promised themselves such an Elias as God never promised them. He disowns himself to be that prophet. First, He was not that prophet which Moses said the Lord would raise up to them of their brethren. Secondly, He was not such a prophet as they expected and wished for, who would interpose in public affairs, and rescue them from under the Roman yoke. Thirdly, He was not one of the old prophets raised from the dead.

The committee sent to examine him pressed for a positive answer (v. 22), urging the authority of those that sent them: "Tell us, What art thou? that we may give an answer to those that sent us." John was looked upon as a man of sincerity, and therefore they believed he would be fair and above-board, and give a plain answer to a plain question: What sayest thou of thyself? And he did so, I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness. He gives his answer in the words of scripture, to show that the scripture was fulfilled in him. He gives his answer in very humble, modest, self-denying expressions. He chooses to apply that scripture to himself which bespeaks him little: I am the voice, mere voice. He gives such an account of himself as might awaken them to hearken to him; for he was the voice (see Isa. xl. 3), a voice to alarm, an articulate voice to instruct. Ministers are but the voice, by which God is pleased to communicate his mind. First, He was a human voice. The people were prepared to receive the law by the voice of thunders; but they were prepared for the gospel by the voice of a man like ourselves, a still small voice. Secondly, He was the voice of one crying, which denotes, 1. His earnestness and importunity; he cried aloud, and did not spare. Ministers must preach as those that are in earnest. Those words are not likely to thaw the hearers' hearts that freeze between the speaker's lips. 2. His open publication of the doctrine he preached. Thirdly, It was in the wilderness that this voice was crying; in a place of silence and solitude, out of the noise of the world and the hurry of its business. Fourthly, That which he cried was, Make straight the way of the Lord. He came to rectify the mistakes of people concerning the ways of God. The scribes and Pharisees had made them crooked. Now John Baptist calls people to return to the original rule.

2. Here is his testimony concerning his baptism.

(1) The enquiry which the committee made about it: Why baptizest thou, if thou be not the Christ, nor Elias, nor that prophet? v. 25. They readily apprehended baptism to be fitly and properly used as a sacred rite or ceremony, to signify the cleansing of them from the pollutions of their former state. That sign was made use of in the Christian church. Christ did not affect novelty, nor should his ministers.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

20. confessed . . .—i.e., While many were ready to hail him as the Christ, he neither gave the slightest ground for such views, nor the least entertainment to them. 21. Elias—in His own proper person. that prophet—announced in Deuteronomy 18:15, etc., about whom they seem not to have been agreed whether he were the same with the Messiah or no.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

These men were intelligent; they were sent by the Pharisees, trained in the lore of their own religion. They began by suggesting, "Art thou the Christ?" The reply was clear, "I am not the Christ." Then they went back to Malachi, and they said, "Malachi said that before the Christ comes Elijah would come again. Are you Elijah?" He said, "I am not." Then they went back further. They went to Moses and said, "Art thou the prophet?" The interpretation of that question is found in Deuteronomy 18:15. Moses had said that God should one day raise up a prophet like unto him. These men were employing their own Scriptures. Art thou the Messiah? Art thou Elijah? Well then, art thou the prophet? Every time the answer was a denial. Then they said, "Who art thou? that we may give an answer to them that sent us." We cannot go back with negatives. Tell us, "Who art thou? What sayest thou of thyself?"

His reply was very suggestive. It implies that they had knowledge of their own Scriptures; they had the messianic hope; they were familiar with Malachi; and they knew the prediction of Moses. So he took them to the great central prophecy of Isaiah: "I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Make straight the way of the Lord, as said Isaiah the prophet."

Then these men did what men often do when they are surprised. They raised a ritualistic technicality. They said, "Why then baptizest thou, if thou art not the Christ, neither Elijah, neither the prophet?" In reply he interpreted his mission. "I baptize in water." That is all. They knew what his baptism in water had meant. They knew what had preceded it in his preaching, and what baptism in water at his hands had signified. He had called them to repent and be baptized unto the remission of sins; repentance, the confession of guilt, and baptism, a sign of the need for remission.

—The Gospel According to John

25. Why baptizest thou, if not . . .—Thinking he disclaimed any special connection with Messiah's kingdom, they demand his right to gather disciples by baptism.

ADAM CLARKE

A. T. ROBERTSON:

"When the Jews sent unto him" (hote apesteilan pros auton hoi Ioudaioi). John, writing in Ephesus near the close of the first century long after the destruction of Jerusalem, constantly uses the phrase "the Jews" as descriptive of the people as distinct from the Gentile world and from the followers of Christ (at first Jews also). Often he uses it of the Jewish leaders and rulers in particular who soon took a hostile attitude toward both John and Jesus. Here it is the Jews from Jerusalem who sent (apesteilan, first aorist active indicative of apostello). "Priests and Levites" (hiereis kai Leueitas). Sadducees these were. In verse 24 the author explains that it was the Pharisees who sent the Sadducees. The Synoptics throw a flood of light on this circumstance, for in Matt. 3:7 we are told that the Baptist called the Pharisees and Sadducees "offspring of vipers" (Luke 3:7). Popular interest in John grew till people were wondering "in their hearts concerning John whether haply he were the Christ" (Luke 3:15). So the Sanhedrin finally sent a committee to John to get his own view of himself, but the Pharisees saw to it that Sadducees were sent. "Who art thou?" (su tis ei). Direct question preserved and note proleptic position of su, "Thou, who art thou?" The committee from the Sanhedrin put the question sharply up to John to define his claims concerning the Messiah.

—Word Pictures in the New Testament

20. He confessed, and denied not; but confessed. A common mode of Jewish phraseology. John renounces himself, that Jesus may be All in All.

21. Art thou Elias? The scribes themselves had taught that Elijah was to come before the Messiah. See Matt. xvii. 10; and this belief of theirs they supported by a literal construction of Mal. iv. 5. Art thou that prophet? The prophet spoken of by Moses, Deut. xviii. 15, 18. This text they had also misunderstood, for the prophet or teacher promised by Moses was no other than the Messiah himself. See Acts iii. 22. But the Jews had a tradition that Jeremiah was to return to life, and restore the pot of manna, the ark of the covenant, etc., which he had hidden that the Babylonians might not get them. Besides this, they had a general expectation that all the prophets should come to life in the days of the Messiah. I am not. I am not the prophet which you expect, nor Elijah—though he was the Elijah that was to come; for in the spirit and power of that eminent prophet he came, proclaiming the necessity of reformation in Israel. See Matt. xi. 14; xvii. 10-13.

22. That we may give an answer to them that sent us. These Pharisees were probably a deputation from the grand Sanhedrin, the members of which, hearing of the success of the Baptist's preaching, were puzzled to know what to make of him, and seriously desired to hear from himself what he professed to be.

23. I am the voice of one crying. See the notes on Matt. iii. 3; Mark i. 4-5.

25. Why baptizest thou then? Baptism was a very common ceremony among the Jews, who never received a proselyte into the full enjoyment of a Jew's privileges till he was both baptized and circumcised. But such baptisms were never performed except by an ordinance of the Sanhedrin, or in the presence of three

MATTHEW HENRY

They expected it would be used in the days of the Messiah. It is taken for granted that Christ, and Elias, and that prophet, would baptize, when they came to purify a polluted world. Divine grace has provided for the cleansing of this new world from its filth. They would therefore know by what authority John baptized. His denying himself to be Elias, or that prophet, subjected him to this further question, Why baptizest thou?

(2) The account he gave of it, v. 26, 27. He owned himself to be only the minister of the outward sign: "I baptize with water, and that is all. I cannot confer the spiritual grace signified by it." He directed them to one who was greater than himself, and would do that for them which he could not do. John gave the same account to this committee that he had given to the people (v. 15): This was he of whom I spoke. He tells them of Christ's presence among them now at this time: There stands one among you, whom you know not. Christ stood among the common people, and was as one of them. Much true worth lies hid in this world; obscurity is often the lot of real excellency. God himself is often nearer to us than we are aware of. The kingdom of God was abroad and already among them, Luke xvii. 21. He tells them of Christ's preference above himself: He comes after me, and yet is preferred before me, "Whose shoe-latchet I am not worthy to loose." If so great a man as John accounted himself unworthy of the honour of being near Christ, how unworthy then should we account ourselves! Now, one would think, these chief priests and Pharisees, should presently have asked who, and where, this excellent person was. No, they came to molest John, not to receive any instructions from him. They might have known Christ, and would not. Notice is taken of the place where all this was done: In Bethabara beyond Jordan, v. 28. Bethabara signifies the house of passage; there was opened the way into the gospel state by Jesus Christ. He made this confession in the same place where he was baptizing, that all those who attended his baptism might be witnesses of it.

We have in these verses an account of John's testimony concerning Jesus Christ, which he witnessed to his own disciples that followed him. As soon as ever Christ was baptized he was immediately hurried into the wilderness, to be tempted; and there he was forty days. During his absence John had continued to bear testimony to him, but now at last he sees Jesus coming to him. Now here are two testimonies borne by John to Christ, but those two agree in one.

I. Here is his testimony to Christ, and here four things are witnessed by him concerning Christ.

1. That he is the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world, v. 29. Let us learn here,

(1) That Jesus Christ is the Lamb of God, which bespeaks him the great sacrifice, by which atonement is made for sin, and man reconciled to God. Of all the legal sacrifices he chooses to allude to the lambs that were offered with a special reference to the daily sacrifice, which was offered every morning and evening continually, and that was always a lamb; to the paschal lamb, the blood of which secured the Israelites from the stroke of the destroying angel. Christ is our passover. Christ, who was to make atonement for sin, is called the Lamb of God.

(2) That Jesus Christ, as the Lamb of God, takes away the sin of the world. John Baptist had called people to repent of their sins, in order to the remission of them. Now here he shows how and by whom that remission was to be expected. This ground of hope we have—Jesus Christ is the Lamb of God. [1] He takes away sin. He came to take away the guilt of sin by the merit of his death. To take away the power of sin by the Spirit of his grace. He is taking away the sin of the world, which denotes it a continued act. He is always taking away sin. [2] He takes away the sin of the world; purchases pardon for all of what country, nation, or language, soever they be. The Lamb of God was offered to be a propitiation for the sin of the whole world; see 1 John ii. 2. If Christ takes away the sin of the world, then why not my sin? [3] He does this by taking it upon himself. He is the Lamb of God, that bears the sin of the world; so the margin reads it. He bears it from us; he bore the sin of many, as the scape-goat had the sins of Israel put upon his head, Lev. xvi. 21. God has found out a way of abolishing the sin, and yet sparing the sinner, by making his Son sin for us.

(3) That it is our duty to behold the Lamb of God thus taking away the sin of the world. See him taking away sin, and let that increase our hatred of sin. Let it increase our love to Christ.

2. That this was he of whom he had spoken before (v. 30, 31): This is he of whom I said, After me cometh

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

26. there standeth—This must have been spoken after the baptism of Christ, and possibly just after His temptation (see on vs. 29).

28. Bethabara—Rather, Bethany (according to nearly all the best and most ancient MSS.); not the Bethany of Lazarus, but another of the same name, and distinguished from it as lying "beyond Jordan," on the east.

29. seeth Jesus—fresh, probably, from the scene of the temptation. coming unto him—as to congenial company (Acts 4:23), and to receive from him His first greeting. and saith—catching a sublime inspiration at the sight of Him approaching. the Lamb of God—the one God-ordained, God-gifted sacrificial offering.

that taketh away—taketh up and taketh away. The word signifies both, as does the corresponding Hebrew word. Applied to sin, it means to be chargeable with the guilt of it (Exod. 28:38; Lev. 5:1; Ezek. 18:20), and to bear it away (as often). In the Levitical victims both ideas met, as they do in Christ, the people's guilt being viewed as transferred to them, avenged in their death, and so borne away by them (Lev. 4:15; 16:15, 21, 22; and cf. Isa. 53:6-12; II Cor. 5:21). the sin—The singular number being used to mark the collective burden and all-embracing efficacy. of the world—not of Israel only, for whom the typical victims were exclusively offered. Wherever there shall live a sinner throughout the wide world, sinking under that burden too heavy for him to bear, he shall find in this "Lamb of God," a shoulder equal to the weight. The right note was struck at the first—balm, doubtless, to Christ's own spirit; nor was ever after, or ever will be, a more glorious utterance.

magistrates. Besides, they never baptized any Jew or Jewess, nor even those who were the children of their proselytes; for, as all these were considered as born in the covenant, they had no need of baptism, which was used only as an introductory rite. Now, as John had in this respect altered the common custom so very essentially, admitting to his baptism the Jews in general, the Sanhedrin took it for granted that no man had authority to make such changes, unless especially commissioned from on high; and that only the prophet, or Elijah, or the Messiah himself could have authority to act as John did.

26. I baptize with water. See on Mark i. 8. I use the common form, though I direct the baptized to a different end, viz., that they shall repent of their sins and believe in the Messiah. There standeth one among you. That is, the Person whose forerunner I am is now dwelling in the land of Judea and will shortly make His appearance among you. Christ was not present when John spoke thus, as may be seen from v. 29.

27. Is preferred before me. "Who was before me." This clause is wanting in a few of the MSS. and versions, and in some of the primitive fathers.

28. These things were done in Bethabara. It is very probable that the word Bethany should be inserted here instead of Bethabara. This reading, in the judgment of the best critics, is the genuine one. It is supported by many authorities, including some of the most eminent of the primitive fathers, before the time of Origen, who is supposed to have first changed the reading. Bethabara signifies literally "the house of passage," and is thought to be the place where the Israelites passed the river Jordan under Joshua. There was a place called Bethany, about two miles from Jerusalem, at the foot of the Mount of Olives. But there was another of the same name, beyond Jordan, in the tribe of Reuben. It was probably of this that the Evangelist speaks; and Origen, not knowing of this second Bethany, altered the reading to Bethabara.

29. The next day. The day after that on which the Jews had been with John, v. 19. Behold the Lamb of God. This was said in allusion to what was spoken in Isa. liii. 7. Jesus was the true Lamb or Sacrifice required and appointed by God, of which those offered daily in the Tabernacle and Temple, Exod. xxix. 38-39, and especially the paschal lamb, were only the types and representatives. See Exod. xii. 4-5; 1 Cor. v. 7. The continual morning and evening sacrifice of a lamb, under the Jewish law, was intended to point out the continual efficacy of the blood of atonement; for even at the throne of God, Jesus Christ is ever represented as a Lamb newly slain, Rev. v. 6. But John, pointing to Christ, calls Him emphatically the Lamb of God. All the lambs which had been hitherto offered had been furnished by men; this was provided by God, as the only sufficient and available Sacrifice for the sin of the world.

a man. This honour John had above all the prophets, that, whereas they spoke of him as one that should come, he saw him already come. Such a difference there is between present faith and future vision. He refers to what he had himself said of him before: This is he of whom I said. Though Christ appeared not in any external pomp or grandeur, yet John is not ashamed to own, This is he whom I meant, who is preferred before me. And it was necessary that John should thus show them the person, otherwise they could not have believed that one who made so mean a figure should be he of whom John had spoken such great things. He protests against any confederacy or combination with this Jesus: And I knew him not. There was no acquaintance at all between them; John had no personal knowledge of Jesus till he saw him come to his baptism. They who are taught believe and confess one whom they have not seen, and blessed are they who yet have believed. The great intention of John's ministry and baptism was to introduce Jesus Christ. That he should be made manifest to Israel, therefore am I come baptizing with water. Though John did not know Jesus by face, yet he knew that he should be made manifest. We may know the certainty of that which yet we do not fully know the nature and intention of. The general assurance John had that Christ should be made manifest served to carry him with diligence and resolution through his work: Therefore am I come. God reveals himself to his people by degrees. At first, John knew no more concerning Christ but that he should be made manifest; and now he is favoured with a sight of him.

3. That this was he upon whom the Spirit descended from heaven like a dove. For the confirming of his testimony concerning Christ, he here vouches the extraordinary appearance at his baptism, in which God himself bore witness to him. We are here told (v. 32–34),

(1) That John Baptist saw it: He bore record; attested it, with all the seriousness and solemnity of witness-bearing. He made affidavit of it: I saw the Spirit descending from heaven. John could not see the Spirit, but he saw the dove which was a sign and representation of the Spirit. God's children are made manifest by their graces; their glories are reserved for their future state. He descended like a dove—an emblem of meekness, and wildness, and gentleness. The dove brought the olive-branch of peace, Gen. viii. 11. The Spirit that descended upon Christ abode upon him. The Spirit did not move him at times, but at all times.

(2) That he was told to expect it. It was an instituted sign given him before, by which he might certainly know it (v. 33): I knew him not. He that sent me to baptize gave me this sign, Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending, the same is he. See here what sure grounds John went upon. He did not run without sending: God sent him to baptize. He had a warrant from heaven for what he did. When a minister's call is clear, his comfort is sure, though his success is not always so. He did not run without speeding; for, when he was sent to baptize with water, he was directed to one that should baptize with the Holy Ghost. It is a great comfort to Christ's ministers, that he whose ministers they are can put life, and soul, and power into their ministrations; can speak to the heart what they speak to the ear, and breathe upon the dry bones to which they prophesy. God had before given him a sign: "On whom thou shalt see the Spirit descend, that same is he." This not only prevented any mistakes, but gave him boldness in his testimony. When he had such assurance as this given him, he could speak with assurance.

4. That he is the Son of God. This is the conclusion of John's testimony, that in which all the particulars centre (v. 34): I saw, and bore record, that this is the Son of God. The truth asserted is, that this is the Son of God. This was the peculiar Christian creed, that Jesus is the Son of God (Matt. xvi. 16), and here is the first framing of it. John's testimony to it: "I saw, and bore record." What he saw he was forward to bear record of. What he bore record of was what he saw. Christ's witnesses were eyewitnesses.

II. Here is John's testimony to Christ, the next day after, v. 35, 36. John stood looking upon Jesus as he walked. It should seem, John was in close conversation with two of his disciples. He saw Jesus walking. He was looking upon Jesus; he looked steadfastly, and fixed his eyes upon him. Those that would lead others to Christ must be diligent and frequent in the contemplation of him themselves. 2. He repeated the same testimony which he had given to Christ the day before. Christ's sacrifice for the taking away of the sin of the world ought especially to be insisted upon by all good ministers: Christ, the Lamb of God, Christ and him crucified. 3. He intended this especially

31-34. knew him not—Living mostly apart, the one at Nazareth, the other in the Judean desert—to prevent all appearance of collusion, John only knew that at a definite time after his own call, his Master would show Himself. As He drew near for baptism one day, the last of all the crowd, the spirit of the Baptist heaving under a divine presentiment that the moment had at length arrived, and an air of unwonted serenity and dignity, not without traits, probably, of the family features, appearing in this Stranger, the Spirit said to him as to Samuel of his youthful type, "Arise, anoint Him, for this is He!" (I Sam. 16:12). But the sign which he was told to expect was the visible descent of the Spirit upon Him as He emerged out of the baptismal water. Then, catching up the voice from heaven, "he saw and bare record that this is the Son of God."

A. B. SIMPSON:

This was the visible descent of the Holy Spirit upon Jesus, in the form of a dove, and was designed to be an open and manifest testimony to His messiahship and divinity that no one could gainsay. It was also, as we learn from the other evangelists, accompanied by the voice of God, proclaiming, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." To John himself this sign had already been promised as the special token of the Messiah. The voice of God had whispered to him, "Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending and remaining on him, the same is he which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost." This is ever still the highest testimony that God can give to any of His servants. The same Holy Spirit is the witness of Christianity by His unceasing manifestations of grace and power in the ministry of God's servants and the lives of His children. The form in which the Holy Spirit came to Christ, as a dove, suggests the idea of gentleness, peace and love as the special attributes of His life and ministry.
—Christ in the Bible

35. John stood—"was standing," at his accustomed place. 36. looking—having fixed his eyes, with significant gaze, on Jesus. as he walked—but not now to him. To have done this once (see on vs. 29) was humility enough [BENGEL]. Behold . . .—The repetition of that wonderful proclamation, in identical terms and without another word, could only have been meant as a gentle hint to go after Him—as they did.

ADAM CLARKE

31. And I knew him not. John did not know our Lord personally, and perhaps had never seen Him, at the time he spoke the words in v. 15. Nor is it any wonder that the Baptist should have been unacquainted with Christ, as he had spent thirty years in the hill country of Hebron, and our Lord remained in a state of great privacy in the obscure city of Nazareth, in the extreme borders of Galilee. But that he should be made manifest to Israel. One design of My publicly baptizing Jesus was that He, coming to my baptism, should be shown to be what He is, by some extraordinary sign from heaven.

32. I saw the Spirit descending. See the notes on Matt. iii. 16-17.

33. He that sent me . . . said unto me. From this we may clearly perceive that John had a most intimate acquaintance with the Divine Being; and received not only his call and mission at first, but every subsequent direction, by immediate, unequivocal inspiration.

35. The next day. After that mentioned in v. 29. Two of his disciples. One of them was Andrew, v. 40, and it is very likely that John himself was the other; in everything in which he might receive honor he studiously endeavors to conceal his own name.

36. And looking upon Jesus. "Attentively beholding"—to view with steadfastness and attention. He who desires to discover the glories and excellencies of this Lamb of God must thus look on Him. At first sight He appears only as a man among men, and as dying in testimony to the truth, as many others have died. But on a for his two disciples that stood with him; he was willing to turn them over to Christ. He did not reckon that he lost those disciples who went over from him to Christ, any more than the schoolmaster reckons that scholar lost whom he sends to the university. John gathered disciples, not for himself, but for Christ. Humble, generous souls will give others their due praise without fear of diminishing themselves by it.

Verses 37–42

We have here the turning over of two disciples from John to Jesus, and one of them fetching in a third, and these are the first-fruits of Christ's disciples.

I. Andrew and another with him were the two that John Baptist had directed to Christ, v. 37. Who the other was we are not told.

1. Here is their readiness to go over to Christ. They heard him speak of Christ as the Lamb of God, that takes away the sin of the world, and this made them follow him.

2. The kind notice Christ took of them, v. 38. He was soon aware of them, and turned, and saw them following. Christ takes early cognizance of the first motions of a soul towards him. He did not stay till they begged leave to speak with him, but spoke first. When there is communion between a soul and Christ, it is he that begins the discourse. He saith unto them, "What seek ye?" It is a kind invitation of them into his acquaintance: "Come, what have you to say to me?" Those whose business it is to instruct people in the affairs of their souls should be humble, and mild, and easy of access. The question Christ put to them is what we should all put to ourselves when we begin to follow Christ: "What seek ye? What do we design and desire? Do we seek a teacher, ruler, and reconciler? In following Christ, do we seek the favour of God and eternal life?"

3. Their modest enquiry concerning the place of his abode: Rabbi, where dwellest thou? In calling him Rabbi, they intimated that their design in coming to him was to be taught by him; rabbi signifies a master, a teaching master. These came to Christ to be his scholars, so must all those that apply themselves to him. In asking where he dwelt, they intimate a desire to be better acquainted with him. They would attend him at some seasonable time, when he should appoint. Civility and good manners well become those who follow Christ. They hoped to have more from him than they could have now by the way. They resolved to make a business, not a by-business of conversing with Christ. Those that have had some communion with Christ cannot but desire a further communion with him; a fixed communion with him; where they may sit down at his feet. It is not enough to take a turn with Christ now and then, but we must lodge with him.

4. The courteous invitation Christ gave them to his lodgings: He saith unto them, Come and see. He invites them to come to his lodgings: the nearer we approach to Christ, the more we see of his beauty. Deceivers maintain their interest in their followers by keeping them at a distance, but that which Christ desired to recommend him to the esteem and affections of his followers was that they would come and see. He invites them to come immediately and without delay. There is never a better time. It is best taking people when they are in a good mind; strike while the iron is hot. It is wisdom to embrace the present opportunities: Now is the accepted time.

5. Their cheerful and (no doubt) thankful acceptance of his invitation: They came and saw where he dwelt, and abode with him that day. They readily went along with him. Gracious souls cheerfully accept Christ's gracious invitations. It is good being where Christ is, wherever it be. They abode with him that day ("Master, it is good to be here"); and he bade them welcome. It was about the tenth hour.

II. Andrew brought his brother Peter to Christ. Andrew had the honour first to be acquainted with Christ, and to be the instrument of bringing Peter to him.

1. The information which Andrew gave to Peter.

(1) He first finds his own brother Simon; his finding implies his seeking him. He first findeth Simon who came only to attend on John, but has his expectations out-done; he meets with Jesus.

(2) He told him whom they had found: We have found the Messias. He speaks humbly; not, "I have found," but "We have," rejoicing that he had shared with others in it. He speaks exultingly: We have found. He proclaims it, for he knows that he shall have never the less in Christ for others sharing. He speaks intelligently: We have found the Messias, which was more than had yet been said. He speaks more clearly concerning Christ than ever his teacher had done.

(3) He brought him to Jesus, brought him to the 37-51. First Gathering of Disciples—John, Andrew, Simon, Philip, Nathanael.

38. What seek ye—gentle, winning question, remarkable as the Redeemer's first public utterance. (See on Matt. 12:18-20.) where dwellest thou—i.e., "That is a question we cannot answer in a moment; but had we Thy company for a calm hour in private, gladly should we open our burden."

39. Come and see—His second utterance, more winning still.

tenth hour—not 10 A.M. (as some), according to Roman, but 4 P.M., according to Jewish reckoning, which John follows. The hour is mentioned to show why they stayed out the day with him—because little of it remained. 40. One . . . was Andrew—The other was doubtless our Evangelist himself. His great sensitiveness is touchingly shown in his representation of this first contact with the Lord; the circumstances are present to him in the minutest details; he still remembers the very hour. But "he reports no particulars of those discourses of the Lord by which he was bound to Him for the whole of His life; he allows everything personal to retire" [Olshausen]. Peter's brother—and the elder of the two. 41. have found the Messias—The previous preparation of their simple hearts under the Baptist's ministry, made quick work of this blessed conviction, while others hesitated till doubt settled into obduracy. So it is still. 42. brought him to Jesus—Happy brothers that thus do to each other!

ADAM CLARKE

more attentive consideration He appears to be no less than God manifest in the flesh, and by His death making an atonement for the sin of the world. Behold the Lamb of God! By this the Baptist designed to direct the attention of his own disciples to Jesus, not only as the great Sacrifice for the sin of the world, but also as the complete Teacher of heavenly truth.

38. What seek ye? These disciples might have felt some embarrassment in addressing our blessed Lord, after hearing the character which the Baptist gave of Him; to remove or prevent this, He graciously accosts them, and gives them an opportunity of explaining themselves to Him. Such questions, we may conceive, the blessed Jesus still puts to those who in simplicity of heart desire an acquaintance with Him. A question of this nature we may profitably ask ourselves: What seek ye? In this place? In the company you frequent? In the conversation in which you engage? In the affairs with which you are occupied? In the works which you perform? Rabbi. "Teacher." Behold the modesty of these disciples—we wish to be scholars; we are ignorant—we desire to be taught; we believe Thou art a Teacher come from God. Where dwellest thou? That we may come and receive Thy instructions.

39. Come and see. If those who know not the salvation of God would come at the command of Christ, they should soon see that with Him is the fountain of life, and in His light they should see light. The tenth hour. Generally supposed to be about what we call four o'clock in the afternoon. According to chap. xi. 9, the Jews reckoned twelve hours in the day; and of course each hour of the day, thus reckoned, must have been something longer or shorter, according to the different times of the year in that climate. The sixth hour with them answered to our twelve o'clock, as appears from what Josephus says in his life, chap. liv. "That on the Sabbath day it was the rule for the Jews to go to dinner at the sixth hour." Dr. Macknight, however, is of opinion that the Evangelist is to be understood as speaking of the Roman hour, which was ten o'clock in the morning; and, as the Evangelist remarks, They . . . abode with him that day, it implies that there was a considerable portion of time spent with our Lord. But had it been the Jewish tenth hour, it would have been useless to remark their abiding with Him that day, as there were only two hours of it still remaining.

41. Findeth his own brother Simon. Every man who has been brought to an acquaintance with God should endeavor to bring at least another with him; and his first attention should be fixed upon those of his own household.

fountain-head. Now this was an instance of true love to his brother. We ought with a particular concern and application to seek the spiritual welfare of those that are related to us; for their relation to us adds both to the obligation and to the opportunity of doing good to their souls. It was an effect of his day's conversation with Christ. Hereby it appeared that Andrew had been with Jesus that he was so full of him. He knew there was enough in Christ for all; and, having tasted that he is gracious, he could not rest till those he loved had tasted it too. True grace hates monopolies, and loves not to eat its morsels alone.

2. The entertainment which Jesus Christ gave to Peter, v. 42.

(1) Christ called him by his name: When Jesus beheld him, he said, Thou art Simon, the son of Jona. Some observe the signification of these names: Simon—obedient, Jona—a dove. An obedient dove-like spirit qualifies us to be the disciples of Christ.

(2) He gave him a new name: Cephas. His giving him a name intimates Christ's favour to him. By this Christ adopted him into his family as one of his own. The name which he gave him bespeaks his fidelity to Christ: Thou shalt be called Cephas (that is Hebrew for a stone:), which is by interpretation Peter. Peter's natural temper was stiff, and hardy, and resolute, which I take to be the principal reason why Christ called him Cephas—a stone. When Christ afterwards prayed for him, that his faith might not fail, that so he might be firm to Christ himself, then he made him what he here called him, Cephas—a stone. Those that come to Christ must come with a fixed resolution to be firm and constant to him, like a stone, and it is by his grace that they are so.

We have here the call of Philip and Nathanael.

I. Philip was called immediately by Christ himself, not as Andrew, who was directed to Christ by John or Peter, who was invited by his brother. God has various methods of bringing his chosen ones home to himself. Jesus findeth Philip. Christ sought us, and found us, before we made any enquiries after him. The name Philip is of Greek origin, and much used among the Gentiles, yet Christ changed not his name. He was called the day following. When work is to be done for God, we must not lose a day. Jesus would go forth into Galilee. Christ will find out all those that are given to him. Philip was brought to be a disciple by the power of Christ going along with that word, Follow me. We are told that Philip was of Bethsaida, and Andrew and Peter were so too, v. 44. Bethsaida was a wicked place (Matt. xi. 21), yet even there was a remnant, according to the election of grace.

II. Nathanael was invited to Christ by Philip.

1. What passed between Philip and Nathanael.

(1) The joyful news that Philip brought to Nathanael, v. 45. Philip, though newly come to an acquaintance with Christ himself, yet steps aside to seek Nathanael. O, saith Philip, we have found him of whom Moses and the prophets did write. What a transport of joy Philip was in, upon this new acquaintance with Christ: "We have found him whom we have so long wished and waited for; at last, he is come, he is come, and we have found him!" What an advantage it was to him that he was so well acquainted with the scriptures of the Old Testament, which prepared his mind for the reception of evangelical light. It was his weakness to say, We have found him, for Christ found them before they found Christ. He did not yet apprehend, as Paul did, how he was apprehended of Christ Jesus.

(2) The objection which Nathanael made against this, Can any good thing come out of Nazareth? v. 46. [1] His caution was commendable; our rule is, Prove all things. [2] His objection arose from ignorance. If he meant that the Messiah, that great good thing, could not come out of Nazareth, so far he was right, but then he was ignorant of the matter of fact, that this Jesus was born at Bethlehem; so that the blunder Philip made, in calling him Jesus of Nazareth, occasioned this objection.

(3) The short reply which Philip gave to this objection: Come and see. We may know enough to satisfy ourselves, and yet not be able to say enough to silence a subtle adversary. It was his wisdom and zeal that, when he could not answer the objection himself, he would have him go to one that could: Come and see. Not, Go and see, but, "Come, and I will go along with thee." Many people are kept from the ways of religion by the unreasonable prejudices they have conceived against religion, upon the account of some foreign circumstances which do not at all touch the merits of the case.

2. What passed between Nathanael and our Lord Jesus. He came and saw, not in vain.

beheld him—fixed his eyes on him, with significant gaze (as vs. 36). Cephas . . . stone—(See on Matt. 16:18).

43. would go . . . into Galilee—for from His baptism He had sojourned in Judea (showing that the calling at the Sea of Galilee (Matt. 4:18) was a subsequent one; see on Luke 5:1). Follow me—the first express call given, the former three having come to Him spontaneously. 44. the city of Andrew and Peter—of their birth probably, for they seem to have lived at Capernaum (Mark 1:29).

45. Nathanael—(See on Matt. 10:3). Moses—(See ch. 5:46). son of Joseph—the current way of speaking. (See Luke 3:23.)

46. any good out of Nazareth—remembering Bethlehem, perhaps, as Messiah's predicted birthplace, and Nazareth having no express prophetic place at all, besides being in no repute. The question sprang from mere dread of mistake in a matter so vital.

Come and see—Noble remedy against preconceived opinions [BENGEL]. Philip, though he could not perhaps solve his difficulty, could show him how to get rid of it. (See on ch. 6:68.)

ADAM CLARKE

42. Cephas, which is by interpretation, A stone. The reason why this name was given to Simon, who was ever afterwards called Peter, may be seen in the notes on Matt. xvi. 18-19.

43. Philip. This apostle was a native of Bethsaida in Galilee. He must not be confounded with Philip the deacon, spoken of in Acts vi. 5.

45. Nathanael. This apostle is supposed to be the same with Bartholomew, which is very likely, for these reasons: (1) That the Evangelists who mention Bartholomew say nothing of Nathanael; and that John, who speaks of Nathanael, says nothing of Bartholomew. (2) No notice is taken anywhere of Bartholomew's vocation, unless his and that of Nathanael mentioned here be the same. (3) The name of Bartholomew is not a proper name; it signifies the "son of Ptolomy"; and Nathanael might have been his own name. (4) John seems to rank Nathanael with the apostles when he says that Peter and Thomas, the two sons of Zebedee, Nathanael, and two other disciples, being gone a fishing, Jesus showed himself to them, John xxi. 2-4. Moses in the law. See Gen. iii. 15; xxii. 18; xlix. 10; Deut. xviii. 18. And the prophets. See Isa. iv. 2; vii. 14; ix. 5; xl. 10; liii. 1, etc.; Jer. xxiii. 5; xxxiii. 14-15; Ezek. xxiv. 23; xxxvii. 24; Dan. ix. 24; Mic. v. 2; Zech. vi. 12; ix. 9; xii. 10.

46. Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth? Bishop Pearce supposes that the ti anathon of the Evangelist has some particular force in it: for, in Jer. xxxiii. 14, God says, "I will perform that good thing which I have promised"; and this, in v. 15, is explained to mean his causing "the Branch of righteousness [i.e., the Messiah] to grow up unto David," from whom Jesus was descended. In this view, Nathanael's question seems to imply that not Nazareth, but Bethlehem, was to be the birthplace of the Messiah, according to what the chief priests and scribes had determined, Matt. ii. 4-6. If this conjecture be not thought solid, we may suppose that Nazareth, at this time, was become so abandoned that no good could be expected from any of those who dwelt in it,

MATTHEW HENRY

(1) Jesus saw him coming. He said of him to those about him, Behold an Israelite indeed. He commended him; not to flatter him, but perhaps because he knew him to be a modest man. Nathanael had objected against Christ; but Christ hereby showed that he excused it, because he knew his heart was upright. He commended him for his integrity. Behold an Israelite indeed. All are not Israel that are of Israel; here, however, was an Israelite indeed. A sincere follower of the good example of Israel. He was a genuine son of honest Jacob. A sincere professor of the faith of Israel: he was really as good as he seemed, and his practice was of a piece with his profession. He is the Jew that is one inwardly, so is he the Christian. He is one in whom is no guile: no guile towards men; a man that one may trust; no guile towards God, sincere in his repentance for sin. He does not say without guilt, but without guile. An Israelite indeed, a miracle of divine grace.

(2) Nathanael is much surprised at this.

[1] Here is Nathanael's modesty: "Whence knowest thou me, me that am unworthy of thy cognizance?" This was an evidence of his sincerity, that he did not catch at the praise he met with. Doth Christ know us? Let us covet to know him.

[2] Here is Christ's further manifestation of himself to him: Before Philip called thee, I saw thee. First, He gives him to understand that he knew him, and so manifests his divinity. Secondly, That before Philip called him he saw him under the fig-tree. Christ has knowledge of us before we have any knowledge of him. His eye was upon him when he was under the fig-tree; this was a private token which nobody understood but Nathanael: "When thou wast retired under the fig-tree I had then my eye upon thee, and saw that which was very acceptable." It is most probable that Nathanael under the fig-tree was employed in meditation, and prayer, and communion with God. Sitting under the fig-tree denotes quietness and composedness of spirit, which much befriend communion with God.

(3) Nathanael hereby obtained a full assurance of faith in Jesus Christ (v. 49): Rabbi, thou art the Son of God, thou art the king of Israel; that is, in short, thou art the true Messiah. Observe here, how firmly he believed with the heart. Now he asks no more, Can any good thing come out of Nazareth? How freely he confessed with the mouth. He confesses Christ's prophetical office. in calling him Rabbi. He confesses his divine nature and mission, in calling him the Son of God. He confesses, "Thou art the king of Israel." If he be the Son of God, he is king of the Israel of God.

(4) Christ hereupon raises the hopes and expectations of Nathanael to something further and greater than all this, v. 50, 51.

[1] He here signifies his acceptance, and (it should seem) his admiration, of the ready faith of Nathanael: Because I said, I saw thee under the fig-tree, believest thou? It was a sign that Nathanael's heart was prepared beforehand, else the work had not been done so suddenly.

[2] He promises him much greater helps for the confirmation and increase of his faith.

First, In general: "Thou shalt see greater things than these"; the miracles of Christ, and his resurrection. Those who truly believe the gospel will find its evidences grow upon them. Whatever discoveries Christ is pleased to make of himself here in this world, he hath still greater things than these to make known to them.

Secondly, In particular: "Not thou only, but you, all you my disciples, you shall see heaven opened." Verily, verily I say unto you, which commands both a fixed attention to what is said as very weighty, and a full assent to it as undoubtedly true. None used this word at the beginning of a sentence but Christ, though the Jews often used it at the close of a prayer. It is a solemn asseveration. Now see what it is that Christ assures them of: Hereafter, or ere long, ye shall see heaven opened. The Son of man is a title frequently applied to him in the gospel, but always by himself. Nathanael had called him the Son of God and king of Israel: he calls himself Son of man to express his humility, and to teach his humanity. They are great things which he here foretells: You shall see heaven opened, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man. It was fulfilled in the many ministrations of the angels to our Lord Jesus, especially that at his ascension, when heaven was opened to receive him, and the angels ascended and descended, and this in the sight of the disciples. Christ's ascension was the great proof of his mission, and much confirmed the faith of his disciples. We may understand it of Christ's miracles. Christ is now beginning a dispensation of miracles. Immediately after this, Christ began to work miracles, ch. ii. 11.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

47. an Israelite indeed . . . no guile—not only no hypocrite, but with a guileless simplicity not always found even in God's own people, ready to follow wherever truth might lead him, saying, Samuel-like, "Speak, Lord, for Thy servant heareth."

48. Whence knowest thou me—conscious that his very heart had been read, and at this critical moment more than ever before. Before Philip called thee—showing He knew all that passed between Philip and him at a distance. when . . . under the fig tree . . .—where retirement for meditation and prayer was not uncommon [LIGHTFOOT]. Thither, probably—hearing that his master's Master had at length appeared, and heaving with mingled eagerness to behold Him and dread of deception—he had retired to pour out his guileless heart for light and guidance, ending with such a prayer as this, "Show me a token for good!" (See on Luke 2:8.) Now he has it, 'Thou guileless one, that fig tree scene, with all its heaving anxieties, deep pleadings and tremulous hopes—I saw it all.' The first words of Jesus had astonished, but this quite overpowered and won him.

49. Son of God . . . King of Israel—the one denoting His person, the other His office. How much loftier this than anything Philip had said to him! But just as the earth's vital powers, the longer they are frost-bound, take the greater spring when at length set free, so souls, like Nathanael and Thomas (see on ch. 20:28), the outgoings of whose faith are hindered for a time, take the start of their more easy-going brethren when loosed and let go.

51. Because I said . . .—"So quickly convinced, and on this evidence only?"—an expression of admiration.

Hereafter . . .—The key to this great saying is Jacob's vision (Gen. 28:12-22), to which the allusion plainly is. To show the patriarch that though alone and friendless on earth his interests were busying all heaven, he was made to see "heaven opened and the angels of God ascending and descending upon a" mystic "ladder reaching from heaven to earth." 'By and by,' says Jesus here, 'ye shall see this communication between heaven and earth thrown wide open, and the Son of man the real Ladder of this intercourse.' and that its wickedness had passed into a proverb: Can anything good be found in Nazareth? Come and see. He who candidly examines the evidences of the religion of Christ will infallibly become a believer. No history ever published among men has so many external and internal proofs of authenticity as does this.

47. Behold an Israelite indeed. A worthy descendant of the patriarch Jacob, who not only professes to believe in Israel's God, but who worships Him in sincerity and truth, according to his light. In whom is no guile! To find a man, living in the midst of so much corruption, walking in uprightness before his Maker, was a subject worthy the attention of God himself. Behold this man! and, while you see and admire, imitate his conduct.

48. Whence knowest thou me? He was not yet acquainted with the divinity of Christ, could not conceive that He could search his heart, and therefore asks how He could acquire this knowledge of him, or who had given him that character. Under the fig tree. Probably engaged in prayer with God for the speedy appearing of the salvation of Israel; and the shade of this fig tree was perhaps the ordinary place of retreat for this upright man. It is not "a fig tree," but the fig tree, one particularly distinguished from the others.

49. Rabbi. That is, "Teacher!" and so this word should be translated. Thou art the Son of God. The promised Messiah. Thou art the King of Israel. The real Descendant of David, who was to sit on that spiritual throne of which the throne of David was the type.

50. Because I said unto thee, I saw thee. As you have credited My divine mission on this simple proof, that I saw you when and where no human eye, placed where Mine was, could see you, your faith shall not rest merely upon this, for you shall see greater things than these—more numerous and express proofs of My eternal power and Godhead.

51. Verily, verily. Amen, amen. The doubling of this word probably came from this circumstance: that it was written both in Hebrew and in Greek, signifying, "It is true." Heaven open. This seems to be a figurative expression. (1) Christ may be understood by this saying to mean that a clear and abundant revelation of God's will should now be made unto men; that heaven itself should, as it were, be laid open, and all the mysteries which had been shut up and hidden in it from eternity, relative to the salvation and glorification of man, should be now fully revealed. (2) That by the angels of God ascending and descending is to be understood that a perpetual intercourse should now be opened between heaven and earth through the medium of Christ, who was God manifested in the flesh. Our blessed Lord is represented in His mediatorial capacity as the Ambassador of God to men; and the angels ascending and descending upon the Son of man is a metaphor taken from the custom of dispatching couriers or messengers from the prince to his ambassador in a foreign court, and from the ambassador back to the prince. This metaphor will receive considerable light when compared with 2 Cor. v. 19-20: "God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself . . . we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us: we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God."

We have here the story of Christ's miraculous conversion of water into wine at a marriage in Cana of Galilee. He could have wrought miracles before, but, miracles being designed for the sacred and solemn seals of his doctrine, he began not to work any till he began to preach.

I. The occasion of this miracle. Maimonides observes it to be to the honour of Moses that all the signs he did in the wilderness he did upon necessity; we needed food, he brought us manna, and so did Christ.

1. The time: the third day after he came into Galilee. The evangelist keeps a journal of occurrences. Our Master filled up his time better than his servants do, and never lay down at night complaining that he had lost a day.

2. The place: it was at Cana in Galilee. Christ began to work miracles in an obscure corner of the country. His doctrine and miracles would not be so much opposed by the plain and honest Galileans as they would be at Jerusalem.

3. The occasion itself was a marriage. The mother of Jesus is said to be there. The honour which Christ hereby put upon the ordinance of marriage, that he graced the solemnity of it, not only with his presence, but with his first miracle. There was a marriage, a marriage-feast, to grace the solemnity. Marriages were usually celebrated with festivals.

4. Christ and his mother and disciples were principal guests at this entertainment. The mother of Jesus was there; no mention being made of Joseph, we conclude him dead before this. Jesus was called, and he came, and feasted with them. Christ was to come in a way different from that of John Baptist, who came neither eating nor drinking. There was a marriage, and Jesus was called. It is very desirable, when there is a marriage, to have Jesus Christ present at it; to have the marriage owned and blessed by him: the marriage is then honourable indeed. They that would have Christ with them at their marriage must invite him by prayer; that is the messenger that must be sent to heaven for him; and he will come. And he will turn the water into wine. The disciples also were invited. They had thrown themselves upon his care, and they soon found that, though he had no wealth, he had good friends. Those that follow Christ shall feast with him, they shall fare as he fares. Love to Christ is testified by a love to those that are his.

II. The miracle itself.

1. They wanted wine, v. 3. There was want at a feast; though much was provided, yet all was spent. While we are in this world we sometimes find ourselves in straits, even then when we think ourselves in the fulness of our sufficiency. If always spending, perhaps all is spent ere we are aware. There was want at a marriage feast. It should seem, Christ and his disciples were the occasion of this want, but they who straiten themselves for Christ shall not lose by him.

2. The mother of Jesus solicited him to assist her friends. We are told (v. 3–5) what passed between Christ and his mother.

(1) She acquaints him with the difficulty they were in (v. 3): She saith unto him, They have no wine. Some think that she did not expect from him any miraculous supply (he having as yet wrought no miracle). But, most probably, she looked for a miracle. The bridegroom might have sent out for more wine, but she was for going to the fountain-head. We ought to be concerned for the wants and straits of our friends. In our own and our friends' straits it is our wisdom and duty to apply ourselves to Christ by prayer. In our addresses to Christ, we must not prescribe to him, but humbly spread our case before him.

(2) He gave her a reprimand for it. Here is,

[1] The rebuke itself: Woman, what have I to do with thee? As many as Christ loves, he rebukes and chastens. He calls her woman, not mother. When we begin to be assuming, we should be reminded what we are, men and women, frail, foolish, and corrupt. Now this was intended to be, First, A check to his mother for interposing in a matter which was the act of his Godhead, which had no dependence on her, and which she was not the mother of. The greatest advancements must not make us forget ourselves and our place, nor the familiarity to which the covenant of grace admits us breed contempt, irreverence, or any kind of degree of presumption. Secondly, It was an instruction to others of his relations that they must never expect him to have any regard to his kindred according to the flesh, in his working miracles, who in this matter were no more to him than other people. In the things of God we must not know faces.

mother there—it being probably some relative's marriage. John never names her [Bengel].

3. no wine—evidently expecting some display of His glory, and hinting that now was His time.

4, 5. Woman—no term of disrespect in the language of that day (ch. 19:26). what . . . to do with thee—i.e., 'In my Father's business I have to do with Him only." 'Twas a gentle rebuke for officious interference, entering a region from which all creatures were excluded (cf. Acts 4:19, 20).

CHAPTER 2

1. Cana of Galilee. This was a small city in the tribe of Asher, Josh. xix. 28, and by saying this was Cana of Galilee, the Evangelist distinguishes it from another Cana which was in the tribe of Ephraim, in the Samaritan country. See Josh. xvi. 8; xvii. 9. Some suppose that the third day mentioned here refers to the third day of the marriage feast, such feasts lasting among the Jews seven days. See Judg. xiv. 12, 17-18.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

The first point, which John makes all but as emphatic as the miracle itself, is the new relation between Mary and Jesus, the lesson she had to learn, and her sweet triumphant trust. Now that she sees her Son surrounded by His disciples, the secret hope which she had nourished silently for so long bursts into flame, and she turns to Him with beautiful faith in His power to help, even in the small present need. What an example of her first word to Him sets us all! Like the two sad sisters at Bethany, she is sure that to tell Him of trouble is enough, for that His own heart will impel Him to share, and perchance to relieve it. Let us tell Jesus our wants and leave Him to deal with them as He knows how.—Expositions of Holy Scripture

3. They have no wine. Though the blessed Virgin is supposed never to have seen her Son work a miracle before this time, yet she seems to have expected Him to do something extraordinary on this occasion, as from her acquaintance with Him she must have formed some adequate idea of His power and goodness.

4. Woman, what have I to do with thee? "O woman, what is this to you and Me?" This is an abrupt denial, as if He had said: "We are not employed to provide the necessaries for this feast; this matter belongs to others, who should have made a proper and sufficient provision for the persons they had invited." The words seem to convey a reproof to the Virgin for meddling with that which did not particularly concern her. But here indeed there appears to be no blame. It is very likely the bride or bridegroom's family were relatives of the blessed Virgin; and she would naturally suppose that our Lord would feel interested for the honor and comfort of the family, and knowing that He possessed extraordinary power, made this application to Him to come forward to their assistance. Our Lord's answer to His mother, if properly translated, is far from being disrespect-

MATTHEW HENRY

[2] The reason of this rebuke: Mine hour is not yet come. For everything Christ did, and that was done to him, he had his hour, the fixed time and the fittest time. "Mine hour for working miracles is not yet come." Yet afterwards he wrought this, before the hour, because he foresaw it would confirm the faith of his infant disciples (v. 11): so that this was an earnest of the many miracles he would work when his hour was come. His mother moved him to help them when the wine began to fail (so it may be read, v. 3), but his hour was not yet come till it was quite spent. This teaches us that man's extremity is God's opportunity. Then his hour is come when we are reduced to the utmost strait, and know not what to do. The delays of mercy are not to be construed the denials of prayer.

(3) Notwithstanding this, she encouraged herself with expectations, that he would help, for she bade the servants observe his orders, v. 5. She took the reproof very submissively, and did not reply to it. It is best not to deserve reproof from Christ, but next best to be meek and quiet under it, and to count it a kindness. She kept her hope in Christ's mercy. When we come to God in Christ for any mercy, two things discourage us: Sense of our own follies and infirmities and fear of our Lord's frowns and rebukes. Afflictions are continued, deliverances delayed, and God seems angry at our prayers. This was the case of the mother of our Lord here, and yet she encourages herself with hope that he will at length give an answer of peace, to teach us to wrestle with God even when he seems in his providence to walk contrary to us. She directed the servants to have an eye to him, and not to make their applications to her. She directed them punctually to observe his orders: "Whatsoever he saith unto you, do it." Those that expect Christ's favours must with an implicit obedience observe his orders. The way of duty is the way to mercy; and Christ's methods must not be objected against.

(4) Christ did at length miraculously supply them; for he is often better than his word, but never worse.

[1] The miracle itself was turning water into wine; the substance of water acquiring a new form, and having all the accidents and qualities of wine. By this Christ showed himself to be the God of nature, who maketh the earth to bring forth wine. The beginning of Christ's miracles was turning water into wine; the blessing of the gospel turns water into wine. Christ hereby showed that his errand into the world was to heighten and improve creature-comforts to all believers, and make them comforts indeed.

[2] The circumstances of it magnified it and freed it from all suspicion of cheat.

First, It was done in water-pots (v. 6): There were set there six water-pots of stone. 1. For what use these water-pots were intended: for the legal purifications enjoined by the law of God, and many more by the tradition of the elders. They used much water in their washing, for which reason here were six large water-pots provided. It was a saying among them—He who uses much water in washing will gain much wealth in this world. 2. To what use Christ put them; to be the receptacles of the miraculous wine. Thus Christ came to bring in the grace of the gospel, which is as wine, instead of the shadows of the law, which were as water. These were water-pots, that had never been used to have wine in them; and of stone, which is not apt to retain the scent of former liquors, if ever they had had wine in them. They contained two or three firkins apiece; the quantity is uncertain, but very considerable. Christ gives like himself, gives abundantly, according to his riches in glory.

Secondly, The water-pots were filled up to the brim by the servants at Christ's word, v. 7.

Thirdly, The miracle was wrought suddenly, and in such a manner as greatly magnified it.

a. As soon as they had filled the water-pots, he said, Draw out now (v. 8), and it was done. Without any ceremony, in the eye of the spectators. He sits still in his place, says not a word, but wills the thing, and so works it. Christ does great things and marvellous without noise, works manifest changes in a hidden way, without any hesitation or uncertainty in his own breast. With the greatest assurance imaginable, though it was his first miracle, he recommends it to the master of the feast first. As he knew what he would do, so he knew what he could do. All was good, very good, even in the beginning.

b. Our Lord Jesus directed the servants, (a) To draw it out; to be drank. Christ's works are all for use. Has he turned thy water into wine, given thee knowledge and grace? It is to profit withal; and therefore draw out now. Those that would know Christ must make trial of him. (b) To present it to mine hour...—hinting that He would do something, but at His own time; and so she understood it (vs. 5).

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

Now, concerning this miracle, it may well be remarked how simple and unostentatious it was. One might have expected that when the great Lord of all came here in human form, He would commence His miraculous career by summoning the scribes and Pharisees at least, if not the kings and princes of the earth, to see the marks of His calling and the guarantees and warrants of His commission; gathering them all together to work some miracle before them, as Moses and Aaron did before Pharaoh, that they might be convinced of His messiahship. He does nothing of the kind. He goes to a simple wedding among poor people, and there in the simplest and most natural way He displays His glory. When the water is to be turned into wine, when He selects that as the first miracle, He does not call for the master of the feast even, or for the bridegroom himself, or for any of the guests, and begin to say, "You clearly perceive that your wine is all gone. Now, I am about to show you a great marvel, to turn water into wine." No, He does it quietly with the servants. He tells them to fill the waterpots: He uses the baths. He does not ask for any new vessels, but uses what were there, making no fuss or parade. He uses water, too, of which they had abundance, and works the miracle, if I may so speak, in the most commonplace and natural style; and that is just the style of Jesus Christ. Now, if it had been a Romish miracle, it would have been done in a very mysterious, theatrical, sensational way, with no end of paraphernalia; but, being a genuine miracle, it is done just as nearly after the course of nature as the supernatural can go. Jesus does not have the waterpots emptied and then fill them with wine, but He goes as far with nature as nature will go, and uses water to make the wine from; therein following the processes of His providence which are at work every day. When the water drops from heaven and flows into the earth to the roots of the vine, and so swells out the clusters with ruddy juice, it is through water that wine is produced. There is only a difference as to time whether the wine is created in the cluster, or in the waterpots. Our Lord does not call for any strangers to do it, but the ordinary servants shall bring ordinary water; and while they are drawing out the water, or what appears to them to be water, the servants shall perceive that the water has been turned into wine.

ful. He addresses the Virgin as He did the Syrophoenician woman, Matt. xv. 28; as He did the Samaritan woman, John iv. 21; as He addressed His disconsolate mother when He hung upon the Cross, chap. xix. 26; as He did His most affectionate friend Mary Magdalene, chap. xx. 15, and as the angels had addressed her before, v. 13; and as Paul does the believing Christian woman, 1 Cor. vii. 16—in all which places the same term which occurs in this verse is used, and where certainly no kind of disrespect is intended. Mine hour is not yet come. Or my "time," for in this sense the word is often taken. My time for working a miracle is not yet fully come. What I do, I do when necessary, and not before. Nature is unsteady, full of haste, and ever blundering in consequence. It is the folly and sin of men that they are ever finding fault with the divine providence. According to them, God never does anything in due time—He is too early or too late; whereas it is utterly impossible for the divine wisdom to forestall itself or for the divine goodness to delay what is necessary.

5. His mother saith. The Virgin seems to have understood our Lord as hinted above. It was not yet time to grant them a supply, because the want had not as yet been generally felt. But, silently receiving the respectful caution, she saw that miracle should be wrought when it best suited the purposes of the divine wisdom.

6. After the manner of the purifying of the Jews. Or "for the purpose of the purifying of the Jews." The preposition which I have translated "for the purpose" often denotes in the best Greek writers the final cause of a thing. These six vessels were set in a convenient place, for the purpose of the Jews washing their hands before they sat down to meat, and probably for other purposes of purification. See this custom referred to in Matt. xv. 2.

the governor of the feast. Though he was not treated as the Master of the feast, he kindly approved himself a friend to the feast, and, if not its founder, yet its best benefactor. This governor was the monitor of the feast, whose office it was to see that each had enough, and none did exceed, and that there were no indecencies or disorders. Feasts have need of governors, because too many, when they are at feasts, have not the government of themselves. Some think that this governor was priest or Levite that craved a blessing and gave thanks, and Christ would have the cup brought to him, that he might bless it, and bless God for it; for the extraordinary tokens of Christ's presence and power were not to supersede, or jostle out, the ordinary rules and methods of piety and devotion.

Fourthly, The wine which was thus miraculously provided was of the best and richest kind, which was acknowledged by the governor of the feast, v. 9, 10. 1. It was certain that this was wine. The governor knew this when he drank it, though he knew not whence it was; the servants knew whence it was, but had not yet tasted it. 2. That it was the best wine. Christ's works commend themselves even to those that know not their author. The products of miracles were always the best in their kind. This the governor of the feast takes notice of to the bridegroom, with an air of pleasantness, as uncommon. The common method was otherwise. Good wine is brought out to the best advantage at the beginning of a feast, but when they have well drunk, good wine is but thrown away upon them, worse will serve then. See the vanity of all the pleasures of sense; they soon surfeit, but never satisfy; the longer they are enjoyed, the less pleasant they grow. Thou hast kept the good wine until now; not knowing to whom they were indebted for this good wine, he returns the thanks of the table to the bridegroom. Christ, in providing thus plentifully for the guests, though he hereby allows a sober cheerful use of wine, especially in times of rejoicing (Neh. viii. 10), yet he does not invalidate his own caution, which is, that our hearts be not at any time, no not at a marriage feast, overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, Luke xxi. 34. Temperance per force is a thankless virtue; but if divine providence gives us abundance of the delights of sense, and divine grace enables us to use them moderately, this is self-denial that is praiseworthy. Two considerations, drawn from this story, may be sufficient at any time to fortify us against temptations to intemperance: First, That our meat and drink are the gifts of God's bounty to us. It is therefore ungrateful and impious to abuse them. Secondly, That, wherever we are, Christ has his eye upon us. He has given us a specimen of the method he takes in dealing with those that deal with him, which is, to reserve the best for the last, and therefore they must deal upon trust. The pleasures of sin give their colour in the cup, but at the last bite; but the pleasures of religion will be pleasures for evermore.

III. In the conclusion of this story (v. 11) we are told, 1. That this was the beginning of miracles which Jesus did. He himself was the greatest miracle of all; but this was the first that was wrought by him. He had power, but there was a time of the hiding of his power. 2. That herein he manifested his glory; hereby he proved himself to be the Son of God. 3. That his disciples believed on him. Those whom he had called (ch. i), now saw this, shared in it, and had their faith strengthened by it. Even the faith that is true is at first but weak. The strongest men were once babes, so were the strongest Christians.

I. The short visit Christ made to Capernaum, v. 12. It is called his own city (Matt. ix. 1), because he made it his headquarters in Galilee, and what little rest he had was there. It was a place of concourse, and therefore Christ chose it, that the fame of his doctrine and miracles might thence spread the further.

1. The company that attended him thither: his mother, his brethren, and his disciples. Wherever Christ went, (1) He would not go alone, but would take those with him who had put themselves under his guidance. (2) He could not go alone, but they would follow him, because they liked the sweetness either of his doctrine or of his wine, ch. vi. 26. His mother, yet followed him; not to intercede with him, but to learn of him. His brethren, who were at the marriage, and his disciples, attended him wherever he went. It should seem, people were more affected with Christ's miracles at first than they were afterwards, when custom made them seem less strange.

2. His continuance there, which was at this time not many days. Christ was still upon the remove, would not confine his usefulness to one place, because many needed him. He did not stay long at Capernaum

9, 10. well drunk—"drunk abundantly" (as Song of Sol. 5:1), speaking of the general practice. the good . . . till now—thus testifying, while ignorant of the source of supply, not only that it was real wine, but better than any at the feast.

11. manifested forth his glory—Nothing in the least like this is said of the miracles of prophet or apostle, nor could without manifest blasphemy be said of any mere creature. Observe, (1) At a marriage Christ made His first public appearance in any company, and at a marriage He wrought His first miracle—the noblest sanction that could be given to that God-given institution. (2) As the miracle did not make bad good, but good better, so Christianity only redeems, sanctifies, and ennobles the beneficent but abused institution of marriage; and Christ's whole work only turns the water of earth into the wine of heaven. Thus "this beginning of miracles" exhibited the character and "manifested forth the glory" of His entire Mission. (3) As Christ countenanced our seasons of festivity, so also that greater fulness which befits such; so far was He from encouraging that asceticism which has since been so often put for all religion. (4) The character and authority ascribed by Romanists to the Virgin is directly in the teeth of this and other scriptures.

8. Governor of the feast. The original word signifies one who is "chief or head over three couches, or tables." In the Asiatic countries, they take their meals reclining on small, low couches. And when many people are present, so that they cannot all eat together, three of these low tables or couches are put together in form of a crescent, and one of the guests is appointed to take charge of the persons who sit at these tables. Hence the appellation of architriclinus, the "chief over three couches or tables," which in process of time became applied to the governor or "steward" of a feast, let the guests be many or few; and such person, having conducted the business well, had a festive crown put on his head by the guests at the conclusion of the feast. And they bare it. A question has been asked, "Did our Lord turn all the water into wine which the six measures contained?" To which I answer: There is no proof that He did; and I take it for granted that He did not. It may be asked, "How could a part be turned into wine, and not the whole?" To which I answer: The water, in all likelihood, was changed into wine as it was drawn out, and not otherwise. "But did not our Lord by this miracle minister to vice, by producing an excess of inebriating liquor?" No; for the following reasons: (1) The company was a select and holy company, where no excess could be permitted. And (2) our Lord does not appear to have furnished any extra quantity, but only what was necessary. "But it is intimated in the text that the guests were nearly intoxicated before this miraculous addition to their wine took place; for the Evangelist says, 'when they have become intoxicated.'" I answer: (1) It is not intimated, even in the most indirect manner, that these guests were at all intoxicated. (2) The words are not spoken of the persons at that wedding at all; the governor of the feast only states that such was the common custom at feasts of this nature, without intimating that any such custom prevailed there. (3) The original word bears a widely different meaning from that which the objection forces upon it. The verbs signify not only "to inebriate" but "to take wine, to drink wine, to drink enough"; and in this sense the verb is evidently used in the Septuagint, Gen. xliii. 34; Cant. v. 1; Hag. i. 6.

10. The good wine until now. That which our Lord now made being perfectly pure and highly nutritive.

11. This beginning of miracles. It was probably the first He ever wrought; at any rate, it was the first He wrought after His baptism and the first He wrought publicly. His glory. His supreme divinity, chap. i. 14. His disciples believed on him. Were more abundantly confirmed in their faith that He was either the promised Messiah or a most extraordinary prophet, in the fullest intercourse with the ever blessed God.

MATTHEW HENRY

because the passover was at hand, and he must attend it at Jerusalem.

II. The passover he kept at Jerusalem; it is the first after his baptism. Christ, being made under the law, observed the passover at Jerusalem. He went up to Jerusalem when the passover was at hand, that he might be there with the first. Christ kept the passover at Jerusalem yearly, ever since he was twelve years old, but now that he has entered upon his public ministry we may expect something more from him than before; and two things he did there:

1. He purged the temple, v. 14–17.

(1) The first place we find him in at Jerusalem was the temple, and, it should seem, he did not make any public appearance till he came thither.

(2) The first work we find him at in the temple was the purging of it. He first purged out what was amiss and then taught them to do well. He expects that all who come to him should reform their hearts and lives. And this he has taught us by purging the temple. See here, What were the corruptions that were to be purged out. He found a market in one of the courts of the temple, that which was called the court of the Gentiles. They sold oxen, and sheep, and doves, for sacrifice; not for common use, but for the convenience of those who came out of the country, and could not bring their sacrifices in kind along with them. This market was admitted into the temple by the chief priests, for filthy lucre. Great corruptions in the church owe their rise to the love of money. They changed money, for the convenience of those that were to pay a half-shekel for the service of the tabernacle, and no doubt they got by it. See what course our Lord took to purge out those corruptions. He did not complain to the chief priests, for he knew they countenanced those corruptions. But he himself,

First, Drove out the sheep and oxen, and those that sold them. He never used force to drive any into the temple, but only to drive those out that profaned it. He made a scourge of small cords, which probably they had led their sheep and oxen with. Sinners prepare the scourges with which they themselves will be driven out from the temple of the Lord.

Secondly, He poured out the changers' money. In pouring out the money, he showed his contempt of it. In overthrowing the tables, he showed his displeasure against those that make religion a matter of worldly gain. Money-changers in the temple are the scandal of it.

Thirdly, He said to them that sold doves (sacrifices for the poor), Take these things hence. The sparrows and swallows were welcome, that were left to God's providence (Ps. lxxxiv. 3), but not the doves, that were appropriated to man's profit. God's temple must not be made a pigeon-house.

Fourthly, He gave them a good reason for what he did: Make not my Father's house a house of merchandise.

a. Here is a reason why they should not profane the temple, because it was the house of God. Merchandise is a good thing in the exchange, but not in the temple. It was sacrilege; it was robbing God. It was to debase that which was solemn and awful, and to make it mean. It was to make the business of religion subservient to a secular interest. Those make God's house a house of merchandise whose minds are filled with cares about the worldly business when they are attending on religious exercises, as those who perform divine offices for filthy lucre.

b. Here is a reason why he was concerned to purge it, because it was his Father's house. Therefore he had authority to purge it, as a Son over his own house. Therefore he had a zeal for the purging of it: "It is my Father's house, and therefore I cannot bear to see it profaned, and him dishonoured." Christ's purging the temple thus may justly be reckoned among his wonderful works. Considering, (a) That he did it without the assistance of any of his friends. (b) That he did it without the resistance of any of his enemies. The corruption was too plain to be justified; sinners' own consciences are reformers' best friends; yet that was not all, there was a divine power put forth herein, a power over the spirits of men.

Fifthly, Here is the remark which his disciples made upon it (v. 17): They remembered that it was written, The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up. One scripture came to their thoughts, which taught them to reconcile this action both with the meekness of the Lamb of God and with the majesty of the King of Israel; for David, speaking of the Messiah, takes notice of his zeal for God's house, as so great that it even ate him up. 1. The disciples came to understand the meaning of what Christ did, by remembering the scriptures: They remembered now that it was written. The word of God and the works of God do mutually explain and illustrate each other. See of what great use it is to

"Not by this slender whip but by divine majesty was the ejection accomplished, the whip being but a sign of the scourge of divine anger" [GROTIUS]. poured out . . . overthrew . . .—thus expressing the mingled indignation and authority of the impulse.

16. my Father's house—How close the resemblance of these remarkable words to Luke 2:49; the same consciousness of intrinsic relation to the temple—as the seat of His Father's most august worship, and so the symbol of all that is due to Him on earth—dictating both speeches. Only, when but a youth, with no authority, He was simply "a SON IN His own house"; now He was "a SON OVER His own house" (Hebrews 3:6), the proper Representative, and in flesh "the Heir," of his Father's rights. house of merchandise—There was nothing wrong in the merchandise; but to bring it, for their own and others' convenience, into that most sacred place, was a high-handed profanation which the eye of Jesus could not endure.

ADAM CLARKE

13. And the Jews' passover was at hand. This was the reason why He stayed but a few days at Capernaum, v. 12, as He wished to be present at the celebration of this feast at Jerusalem. This was the first passover after Christ's baptism. The second is mentioned in Luke vi. 1; the third, in John vi. 4; and the fourth, which was that at which He was crucified, in chap. xi. 55. From which it appears: (1) that our blessed Lord continued His public ministry about three years and a half, according to the prophecy of Daniel, chap. ix. 27; and (2) that, having been baptized about the beginning of His thirtieth year, He was crucified precisely in the middle of His thirty-third.

14. Found in the temple those that sold oxen. This is a similar fact to that mentioned in Matt. xxi. 12; Mark xi. 15; Luke xix. 45. If it be the same fact, then John anticipates three years of time in relating it here, as that cleansing of the Temple mentioned by the other Evangelists took place in the last week of our Lord's life. Mr. Mann, Dr. Priestley, and Bishop Pearce contend that our Lord cleansed the Temple only once, and that was at the last Passover. Calvin, Dr. Lardner, Bishop Hurd, and Bishop Newcome contend that He purged the Temple twice; and that this mentioned by John was the first cleansing, which none of the other Evangelists have mentioned. The vindication of God's house from profanation was the first and the last care of our Lord, and it is probable He began and finished His public ministry by this significant act. It certainly appears that John directly asserts an early cleansing of the Temple by the series of His history, as the other three Evangelists assert a later cleansing of it. And though the act mentioned here seems to be nearly the same with that mentioned by the other Evangelists, yet there are some differences. John alone mentions the "scourge of rushes" and the casting out of the "sheep and oxen." Besides, there is a considerable difference in our Lord's manner of doing it. In the cleansing mentioned by the three Evangelists, He assumes a vast deal of authority and speaks more pointedly concerning himself than He appears to do in this cleansing mentioned by John. The reason which has been given is, In the first cleansing He was just entering upon His public ministry, and therefore avoided (as much as was consistent with the accomplishment of His work) the giving any offence to the Jewish rulers; but in the last cleansing He was just concluding His ministry, being about to offer up His life for the salvation of the world, in consequence of which He speaks fully and without reserve.

17. The zeal of thine house. See Ps. lix. 10. Zeal to promote Thy glory, and to keep Thy worship pure.

MATTHEW HENRY

the disciples of Christ to be ready and mighty in the scriptures, and to have their memories well stored with scripture truths. 2. The scripture they remembered was very apposite: The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up. All the graces that were to be found among the Old Testament saints were eminently in Christ, and particularly this of zeal for the house of God. Zeal for the house of God forbids us to consult our own credit, ease, and safety, when they come in competition with Christ's service, and sometimes carries on our souls in our duty so far and so fast that our bodies cannot keep pace with them.

2. Christ gave a sign to those who demanded it to prove his authority for so doing.

(1) Their demand of a sign: Then answered the Jews, that is the multitude of the people, with their leaders. When they could object nothing against the thing itself, they questioned his authority to do it: "What sign showest thou unto us." What had he to do to undertake it, who was in no office there? But was not the thing itself sign enough?

(2) Christ's answer to this demand, v. 19. A sign in something to come, the truth of which must appear by the event. The sign that he gives them is his own death and resurrection. He refers them to that which would be. He foretells his death and resurrection, not in plain terms, but in figurative expressions: Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up. Thus he spoke in parables to those who were willingly ignorant, that they might not perceive, Matt. xiii. 13, 14. Those that will not see shall not see. Nay, this figurative speech used here proved such a stumbling-block to them that it was produced in evidence against him at his trial, Matt. xxvi. 60, 61. He foretells his death by the Jews' malice, in these words, Destroy you this temple. Christ, even at the beginning of his ministry, had a clear foresight of all his sufferings at the end of it, and yet went on cheerfully in it. He foretells his resurrection by his own power: In three days I will raise it up. There were others that were raised, but Christ raised himself. He chose to express this by destroying and re-edifying the temple. First, Because he was now to justify himself in purging the temple, which they had profaned: "You that defile one temple will destroy another; and I will prove my authority to purge what you have defiled by raising what you will destroy."

(3) "Forty and six years was this temple in building" v. 20. Temple work was always slow work and canst thou make such quick work of it?" They show some knowledge; they could tell how long the temple was in building. They show more ignorance, First, Of the meaning of Christ's words. Secondly, Of the almighty power of Christ, as if he could do no more than another man.

(4) A vindication of Christ's answer from their cavil. He spoke of the temple of his body, v. 21. Some think that when he said, Destroy this temple, he pointed to his own body; however, it is certain that he spoke of the temple of his body. Like the temple it was built by immediate divine direction. Like the temple, it was a holy house; it is called that holy thing. It was, like the temple, the habitation of God's glory; there the eternal Word dwelt. He is Emmanuel —God with us. Worshippers looked towards that house. So we must worship God with an eye to Christ.

(5) A reflection which the disciples made upon this, long after (v. 22): When he was risen from the dead his disciples remembered that he had said this. The memories of Christ's disciples should be like the treasure of the good householder, furnished with things both new and old, Matt. xiii. 52. They remembered that saying when he was risen from the dead. They laid up the saying in their hearts, and afterwards it became both intelligible and useful. The juniors in years and profession should treasure up those truths of which at present they do not well understand either the meaning or the use, for they will be serviceable to them hereafter. This saying of Christ revived in the memories of his disciples when he was risen from the dead; and why then? Because then the Spirit was poured out to bring things to their remembrance which Christ had said to them. That very day that Christ rose from the dead he opened their understandings, Luke xxiv. 45. Because then this saying of Christ was fulfilled. When the temple of his body had been destroyed and was raised again, and that upon the third day, then they remembered this. See what use they made of it: They believed the scripture, and the word that Jesus had said. They were slow of heart to believe (Luke xxiv. 25), but they were sure. The scripture and the words of Christ are here put together, because they mutually illustrate and strengthen each other.

17. eaten me up—a glorious feature in the predicted character of the suffering Messiah (Ps. 69:9), and rising high even in some not worthy to loose the latchet of His shoes. (Exod. 32:19 etc.).

18-22. What sign . . .—Though the act and the words of Christ, taken together, were sign enough, they were unconvinced: yet they were awed, and though at His very next appearance at Jerusalem they "sought to kill Him" for speaking of "His Father" just as He did now (ch. 5:18), they, at this early stage, only ask a sign.

19. Destroy this temple . . .—(See on Mark 14:58, 59).

20. Forty-six years—From the eighteenth year of Herod till then was just forty-six years [JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, XV. 11. 1].

21. temple of his body—in which was enshrined the glory of the eternal Word. (See on ch. 1:14.) By its resurrection the true Temple of God upon earth was reared up, of which the stone one was but a shadow; so that the allusion is not quite exclusively to Himself, but takes in that Temple of which He is the foundation, and all believers are the "lively stones." (I Pet. 2:4, 5.)

22. believed the scripture—on this subject; i.e., what was meant, which was hid from them till then. Mark (1) The act by which Christ signalized His first public appearance in the Temple. Taking "His fan in His hand, He purges His floor," not thoroughly indeed, but enough to foreshadow His last act towards that faithless people—to sweep them out of God's house. (2) The sign of His authority to do this is the announcement, at this first outset of His ministry, of that coming death by their hands, and resurrection by His own, which were to pave the way for their judicial ejection.

18. What sign shewest thou? When Moses came to deliver Israel he gave signs, or miracles, that he acted under a divine commission. What miracle dost Thou work to show us that Thou art vested with similar authority?

19. Destroy this temple. "This very temple," perhaps pointing to His body at the same time.

20. Forty and six years was this temple in building. The Temple of which the Jews spoke was begun to be rebuilt by Herod the Great in the eighteenth year of his reign (see Josephus). But though he finished the main work in nine years and a half, yet some additional buildings or repairs were constantly carried on for many years afterwards. Herod began the work sixteen years before the birth of our Lord; the transactions which are here related took place in the thirtieth year of our Lord, which make the term exactly forty-six years. Josephus has told us that the whole of the buildings belonging to the Temple were not finished till Nero's reign, when Albinus, the governor of Judea, was succeeded by Gessius Florus, which was eighty years after the eighteenth year of Herod's reign.

21. Of the temple of his body. Rather, "the temple, His body." His body had no particular temple; but it was the temple of His divinity—the place in which, as in the ancient Temple, His Godhead dwelt. See how the Jews perverted these words, Matt. xxvi. 60, and the notes there.

22. Remembered that he had said this unto them. Unto them is wanting in many MSS. and versions.

They believed the scripture. The scripture which the Evangelist immediately refers to may have been Ps. xvi. 10. Compare this with Acts ii. 31-32 and with chap. xiii. 35-37. See also Ps. ii. 7, and compare it with Heb. i. 5, and chap. v. 5, and with Acts xiii. 33. They understood these scriptures in a sense in which they never before understood them.

MATTHEW HENRY

the passover, did preach and work miracles. The time was holy time, the feast-day, and Christ took that opportunity of preaching, when the concourse of people was great.

II. Hereby many were brought to believe in his name, to acknowledge him a teacher come from God, as Nicodemus did (ch. iii. 2).

III. Yet Jesus did not commit himself unto them (v. 24): Christ did not see cause to repose any confidence in these new converts at Jerusalem, either, 1. Because they were false, at least some of them. He had more disciples that he could trust among the Galileans than among the dwellers at Jerusalem. Or, 2. Because they were weak. (1) They were timorous, and wanted zeal and courage. In times of difficulty and danger, cowards are not fit to be trusted. Or, (2) They were tumultuous, and wanted discretion and management.

IV. The reason why he did not commit himself to them was because he knew them (v. 25), knew the wickedness of some and the weakness of others. The evangelist takes this occasion to assert Christ's omniscience. He knew all men, not only their names and faces, as it is possible for us to know many, but their nature, dispositions, affections, designs, as we do not know any man, scarcely ourselves. He knows them that are truly his, knows their integrity and knows their infirmity too. He needed not that any should testify of man. His knowledge was not by information from others, but by his own infallible intuition. He knew what was in man. We know what is done by men; Christ knows what is in them. How fit is Christ to be the Saviour of men, very fit to be the physician, who has such a perfect knowledge of the patient's state and case, temper and distemper; knows what is in him! How fit also to be the Judge of all! The Lord comes to his temple, and none come to him but a parcel of weak simple people, that he can neither have credit from nor put confidence in.

23-25. in the feast day—the foregoing things occurring probably before the feast began. many believed—superficially, struck merely by "the miracles He did." Of these we have no record.

24. did not commit—"entrust," or let Himself down familiarly to them, as to His genuine disciples.

23. Many believed in his name. They believed Him to be the promised Messiah, but did not believe in Him to the salvation of their souls; for we find from the following verse that their hearts were not at all changed, because our blessed Lord could not trust himself to them.

CHAPTER 3

We found, in the close of the foregoing chapter, that few were brought to Christ at Jerusalem; yet here was one, a considerable one.

I. Who this Nicodemus was. Not many mighty and noble are called; yet some are, and here was one. Not many of the rulers, or of the Pharisees. This was a man of the Pharisees, bred to learning, a scholar. Let it not be said that all Christ's followers are unlearned and ignorant men. He was a ruler of the Jews, and a member of the great sanhedrim, a man of authority in Jerusalem. Bad as things were, there were some rulers well inclined. Nicodemus continued in his place, and did what he could, when he could not do what he would.

II. His solemn address to our Lord Jesus Christ, v. 2.

1. When he came: He came to Jesus by night, did not think it enough to hear his public discourses. He resolved to talk with him by himself, where he might be free with him. He made this address by night, which may be considered, (1) As an act of prudence and discretion. Christ was engaged all day in public work, and he would not interrupt him then, but observed Christ's hour, and waited on him when he was at leisure. Christ had many enemies, and therefore Nicodemus came to him incognito, lest being known to the chief priests they should be the more enraged against Christ. (2) As an act of zeal. He would rather take time from the diversions of the evening, or the rest of the night, than not converse with Christ. When others were sleeping, he was getting knowledge. He knew not how soon Christ might leave the town, nor what might happen betwixt that and another feast, and therefore would lose no time. In the night his converse with Christ would be more free, and less liable to disturbance. (3) As an act of fear and cowardice. He was afraid, or ashamed, to be seen with Christ, and therefore came in the night. Though he came by night, Christ bade him welcome, accepted his integrity, and pardoned his infirmity, and hereby taught his ministers to encourage good beginnings, though weak. Though now he came by night, yet afterwards he owned Christ publicly, ch. vii. 50; xix. 39. The grace which is at first but a grain of mustard-seed may grow to be a great tree.

2. What he said. He comes immediately to the business; he calls Christ Rabbi, which signifies a great man. There are hopes of those who have a respect for Christ, and think and speak honourably of him. He tells Christ how far he had attained: We know that thou art a teacher. (1) His assertion

Vss. 1-21. NIGHT INTERVIEW OF NICODEMUS WITH JESUS. 1, 2. Nicodemus—In this member of the Sanhedrim sincerity and timidity are seen struggling together. One of those superficial "believers" mentioned in ch. 2:23, 24, yet inwardly craving further satisfaction, he comes to Jesus in quest of it, but comes "by night" (see ch. 19:38, 39; 12:42); he avows his conviction that He was "come from God"—an expression never applied to a merely human messenger, and probably meaning more here—but only as "a teacher," and in His miracles he sees a proof merely that "God is with Him." Thus, while unable to repress his convictions, he is afraid of committing himself too far.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

"He came to Jesus by night," half-ashamed and wholly afraid of speaking out the conviction that was working in him. He was a man in position. He could not compromise himself in the eyes of his co-Sanhedrists. "It would be a grave thing for a man like me to be found in converse with this new rabbi and apparent prophet. I must go cautiously, and have regard to my reputation and my standing in the world; and shall steal to Him by night." There is something wrong with any convictions about Jesus Christ which let themselves be huddled up in secret. The true apprehension of Him is like a fire in a man's bones that makes him "weary of forbearing" when he locks his lips, and forces him to speak. If Christians can be speechless, there is something dreadfully wrong with their Christianity. If they do not regard Jesus Christ in such an aspect as to oblige them to stand out in the world and say, "Whatever anybody says or thinks about it, I am Christ's man," then be sure that they do not yet know Him as they ought to.

Nicodemus said, "Rabbi, we know." He is giving Jesus Christ a certificate, duly signed and sealed by rabbinical authority. He evidently thinks it is no small matter that he and some of his fellows should have been disposed to look with favor upon this new teacher. And so he comes, if not patronizing the young man, at all

2. Came to Jesus by night. He had matters of the utmost importance on which he wished to consult Christ; and he chose the night season, perhaps less through the fear of man than through a desire to have Jesus alone, as he found Him all the day encompassed with the multitude, so that it was impossible for him to get an opportunity to speak fully on those weighty affairs concerning which he intended to consult Him.

concerning Christ: Thou art a teacher come from God; supported with divine inspiration and divine authority. He came first to be a teacher; for he would rule by the power of truth, not of the sword. (2) His assurance of it: We know, not only I, but others; so he took it for granted, the thing being so plain and self-evident. (3) The ground of this assurance: No man can do those miracles that thou doest, except God be with him. Here was Nicodemus, a judicious, sensible, inquisitive man, one that had all the reason and opportunity imaginable to examine them, so fully satisfied that they were real miracles that he was wrought upon by them to go contrary to the stream of those of his own rank. We are directed what inference to draw from Christ's miracles: Therefore we are to receive him as a teacher come from God.

III. The discourse between Christ and Nicodemus hereupon, see v. 11, 12. Four things our Saviour here discourses of:

1. Concerning the necessity and nature of regeneration or the new birth, v. 3–8. Now we must consider this,

(1) As pertinently answered to Nicodemus's address. Jesus answered, v. 3. It was not enough for him to admire Christ's miracles, and acknowledge his mission, but he must be born again. It is plain that he expected the kingdom of heaven now shortly to appear. He is betimes aware of the dawning of that day. But Christ tells him that he can have no benefit by that change of the state, unless there be a change of the spirit, equivalent to a new birth. When Nicodemus owned Christ a teacher come from God, he plainly intimated a desire to know what this revelation was, and Christ declares it.

(2) As positively and vehemently asserted by our Lord Jesus: Verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God. Observe,

[1] What it is that is required: to be born again. We must live a new life. Birth is the beginning of life; to be born again is to begin anew. We must not think to patch up the old building, but begin from the foundation. We must have a new nature, new principles, new affections, new aims. We must be born ἄνωθεν, which signifies both again, and from above. We must be born anew. Our souls must be fashioned and enlivened anew. We must be born from above. This new birth has its rise from heaven, it is to be born to a divine and heavenly life.

[2] The indispensable necessity of this: "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." Except we be born from above, we cannot see this. We cannot understand the nature of it. We cannot receive the comfort of it. Regeneration is absolutely necessary to our happiness here and hereafter. It will appear, in the nature of the thing, that we must be born again, because it is impossible that we should be happy if we be not holy.

This great truth of the necessity of regeneration being thus solemnly laid down, a. It is objected against by Nicodemus (v. 4): How can a man be born when he is old? Can he enter the second time into his mother's womb, and be born? Herein appears, (a) His weakness in knowledge; what Christ spoke spiritually he seems to have understood after a corporal and carnal manner, as if there was such a connection between the soul and the body that there could be no fashioning the heart anew but by forming the bones anew. It is a great surprise to him to hear of being born again. Could he be better bred and born than bred and born an Israelite. They that are proud of their first birth are hardly brought to a new birth. (b) His willingness to be taught. He does not turn his back upon Christ because of his hard saying, but ingenuously acknowledges his ignorance. "Lord, make me to understand this, for it is a riddle to me; I am such a fool as to know no other way for a man to be born than of his mother." When we meet with that in the things of God which is dark, and hard to be understood, we must continue our attendance upon the means of knowledge.

b. It is opened and further explained by our Lord Jesus, v. 5–8. From the objection he takes occasion to repeat and confirm what he had said (v. 5): "Verily, verily I say unto thee, the very same that I said before." Though Nicodemus understood not the mystery of regeneration, yet Christ asserts the necessity of it as positively as before. It is folly to think of evading the obligation of evangelical precepts, by pleading that they are unintelligible. To expound and clear what he had said he further shows, (a) The author of this blessed change, and who it is that works it. To be born again is to be born of the Spirit, v. 5–8. The change is not wrought by any wisdom or power of our own, but by the power and influence of the blessed Spirit of grace.

events extremely conscious of his own condescension in recognizing Him with his "We know."

Had he the right to speak for any of his colleagues? If so, then at that very early stage of our Lord's ministry there was a conviction beginning to work in that body of ecclesiastics which casts a very lurid light on their subsequent proceedings. It was a good long while after, when Jesus Christ's attitude toward them had been a little more clearly made out than it was at the beginning, that they said officially, "As for this fellow, we know not whence he is." They "knew" when He did not seem to be trenching on their prerogatives, or driving His Ithuriel-spear through their traditional professions of orthodoxy and punctilious casuistries. But when He trod on their toes, when He ripped up their pretensions, when He began to show His antagonism to their formalism and traditionalism, then they did not know where He came from.—Expositions of Holy Scripture

3. Except . . .—This blunt and curt reply was plainly meant to shake the whole edifice of the man's religion, in order to lay a deeper and more enduring foundation. Nicodemus probably thought he had gone a long way, and expected, perhaps, to be complimented on his candor. Instead of this, he is virtually told that he has raised a question which he is not in a capacity to solve, and that before approaching it, his spiritual vision required to be rectified by an entire revolution on his inner man. Had the man been less sincere, this would certainly have repelled him; but with persons in his mixed state of mind—to which Jesus was no stranger (ch. 2:25)—such methods speed better than more honeyed words and gradual approaches. a man—not a Jew merely; the necessity is a universal one. born again—or, as it were, begin life anew in relation to God; his manner of thinking, feeling, and acting, with reference to spiritual things, undergoing a fundamental and permanent revolution. cannot see—can have no part in (just as one is said to "see life," "see death," etc.). the kingdom of God—whether in its beginnings here (Luke 16:16), or its consummation hereafter (Matt. 25:34; Eph. 5:5).

4. How . . .—The figure of the new birth, if it had been meant only of Gentile proselytes to the Jewish religion, would have been intelligible enough to Nicodemus, being quite in keeping with the language of that day; but that Jews themselves should need a new birth was to him incomprehensible.

5. of water and of the Spirit—A twofold explanation of the "new birth," so startling to Nicodemus. To a Jewish ecclesiastic, so familiar with the symbolical application of water, in every variety

ADAM CLARKE

Jews; and perhaps it was in reference to this that Nicodemus uses the word didaskalos immediately after, by which, in chap. i. 39, John translates the word rabbi. Rabbi, teacher, is often no more than a title of respect; didaskalos signifies a person who not only has the name of teacher but who actually does teach. We know that thou art a teacher come from God. We, all the members of the grand Sanhedrin, and all the rulers of the people, who have paid proper attention to Thy doctrine and miracles. We are all convinced of this, though we are not all candid enough to own it. It is possible, however, that we know signifies no more than "it is known, it is generally acknowledged and allowed," that thou art a teacher come from God. No man can do these miracles. It is on the evidence of Thy miracles that I ground my opinion of Thee. No man can do what Thou dost unless the omnipotence of God be with him.

3. Jesus answered. Not in the language of compliment; He saw the state of Nicodemus' soul, and He immediately addressed himself to him on a subject the most interesting and important. But what connection is there between our Lord's reply and the address of Nicodemus? Probably our Lord saw that the object of his visit was to inquire about the Messiah's kingdom; and in reference to this He immediately says, Except a man be born again. The repetition of amen, or verily, verily, among the Jewish writers, was considered of equal import with the most solemn oath. Be born again. Or "from above"; different to that new birth which the Jews supposed every baptized proselyte enjoyed; for they held that the Gentile who became a proselyte was like a newborn child. This birth was of water from below; the birth for which Christ contends is "from above"—by the agency of the Holy Spirit. Every man must have two births: one from heaven, the other from earth—one of his body, the other of his soul. Without the first he cannot see nor enjoy this world; without the last he cannot see nor enjoy the kingdom of God. As there is an absolute necessity that a child should be born into the world, that he may see its light, contemplate its glories, and enjoy its good, so there is an absolute necessity that the soul should be brought out of its state of darkness and sin, through the light and power of the grace of Christ, that it may be able to see, or to "discern," the glories and excellencies of the kingdom of Christ here, and be prepared for the enjoyment of the Kingdom of glory hereafter. The Jews had some general notion of the new birth; but, like many among Christians, they put the acts of proselytism, baptism, etc., in the place of the Holy Spirit and His influence. They acknowledged that a man must be born again; but they made that new birth to consist in profession, confession, and external washing. The new birth which is here spoken of comprehends not only what is termed justification or pardon but also sanctification or holiness. Sin must be pardoned and the impurity of the heart washed away before any soul can possibly enter into the kingdom of God. As this new birth implies the renewing of the whole soul in righteousness and true holiness, it is not a matter that may be dispensed with. Heaven is a place of holiness, and nothing but what is like itself can ever enter into it.

4. How can a man be born when he is old? It is probable that Nicodemus was pretty far advanced in age at this time; and from his answer we may plainly perceive that, like the rest of the Jews, and like multitudes of Christians, he rested in the letter, without paying proper attention to the spirit. The shadow, without the thing signified, had hitherto satisfied him. Our Lord knew him to be in this state, and this was the cause of His pointed address to him.

5. Of water and of the Spirit. To the baptism of water a man was admitted when he became a proselyte to the Jewish religion; and, in this baptism, he promised in the most solemn man-

MATTHEW HENRY

(b) The nature of this change, and what that is which is wrought; it is spirit, v. 6. Those that are regenerated are made spiritual. The dictates and interests of the rational and immortal soul have retrieved the dominion they ought to have over the flesh.

(c) The necessity of this change. Christ here shows that it is necessary in the nature of the thing: That which is born of the flesh is flesh, v. 6. 1. We are here told what we are: We are flesh. The soul is still a spiritual substance, but so wedded to the flesh, so captivated by the will of the flesh, that it is justly called flesh. And what communion can there be between God, who is a spirit, and a soul in this condition? 2. How we came to be so; by being born of the flesh. It is a corruption that is bred in the bone with us. The corrupt nature, which is flesh, takes rise from our first birth; and therefore the new nature, which is spirit, must take rise from a second birth. Nicodemus spoke of entering again into his mother's womb, and being born; but, if he could do so, to what purpose? If he were born of his mother a hundred times, that would not mend the matter, for still that which is born of the flesh is flesh. Corruption and sin are woven into our nature; we are shapen in iniquity. It is not enough to put on a new coat or a new face, but we must put on the new man. Christ makes it further necessary, by his own word: Marvel not that I said unto thee, You must be born again, v. 7. Christ hath said it. He who is the great Physician of souls, knows their case, and what is necessary to their cure,—he hath said, You must be born again. We are not to marvel at it; for when we consider the holiness of the God with whom we have to do, the depravity of our nature, we shall not think it strange that so much stress is laid upon this as the one thing needful, that we must be born again.

(d) This change is illustrated by two comparisons. First, The regenerating work of the Spirit is compared to water, v. 5. To be born again is to be born of water and of the Spirit. That which is primarily intended here is to show that the Spirit, in sanctifying a soul, (1) Cleanses and purifies it as water, takes away its filth. (2) Cools and refreshes it, as water does the hunted hart and the weary traveller. It is probable that Christ had an eye to the ordinance of baptism, which John had used and he himself had begun to use, "You must be born again of the Spirit," which regeneration by the Spirit should be signified by washing with water, as the visible sign of that spiritual grace. Secondly, It is compared to wind: The wind bloweth where it listeth, so is every one that is born of the Spirit, v. 8. The same word signifies both the wind and the Spirit. The Spirit, in regeneration, works arbitrarily, and as a free agent. The Spirit dispenses his influences where, and when, on whom, and in what measure and degrees, he pleases. He works powerfully, and with evident effects: Thou hearest the sound thereof; though its causes are hidden, its effects are manifest. He works mysteriously, and in secret hidden ways. Thou canst not tell whence it comes, nor whither it goes. How it gathers and how it spends its strength is a riddle to us; so the manner and methods of the Spirit's working are a mystery.

2. The certainty and sublimity of gospel truths.

(1) The objection which Nicodemus still made (v. 9): How can these things be? Christ's explication of the doctrine of the necessity of regeneration, it should seem, made it never the clearer to him. The corruption of nature which makes it necessary, and the way of the Spirit which makes it practicable, are as much mysteries to him as the thing itself. Thus many will neither believe the truths of Christianity nor submit to the laws of it further than they please. Christ shall be their teacher, provided they may choose their lesson. Nicodemus owns himself ignorant of Christ's meaning, after all: "How can these things be? They are things I do not understand, my capacity will not reach them." Because this doctrine was unintelligible to him he questions the truth of it. Many think that that cannot be proved which they cannot believe.

(2) The reproof which Christ gave him for his dullness and ignorance: "Art thou a master in Israel, and yet not only unacquainted with the doctrine of regeneration, but incapable of understanding it?" This word is a reproof, [1] To those who undertake to teach others and yet are ignorant and unskilful in the world of righteousness themselves. [2] To those that spend their time in notions and ceremonies in religion, niceties and criticisms in the scripture, and neglect that which is practical. Two words in the reproof are very emphatic: First, The place where his lot was cast: in Israel, where divine revelation was. He might have learned this out of the Old Testament. Secondly, The things he was thus ignorant in: these of way and form of expression, this language was fitted to show that the thing intended was no other than a thorough spiritual purification by the operation of the Holy Ghost. Indeed, element of water and operation of the Spirit are brought together in a glorious evangelical prediction of Ezekiel (36:25-27), which Nicodemus might have been reminded of had such spiritualities not been almost lost in the reigning formalism. Already had the symbol of water been embodied in an initiatory ordinance, in the baptism of the Jewish expectants of Messiah by the Baptist, not to speak of the baptism of Gentile proselytes before that; and in the Christian Church it was soon to become the great visible door of entrance into "the kingdom of God," the reality being the sole work of the Holy Ghost [Titus 3:5].

6-8. That which is born . . .—A great universal proposition; "That which is begotten carries within itself the nature of that which begat it" [OLSHAUSEN]. flesh—Not the mere material body, but all that comes into the world by birth, the entire man; yet not humanity simply, but in its corrupted, depraved condition, in complete subjection to the law of the fall (Rom. 8:1-9). So that though a man "could enter a second time into his mother's womb and be born," he would be no nearer this "new birth" than before (Job 14:4; Ps. 51:5). is spirit—partakes of and possesses His spiritual nature. 7. Marvel not . . .—If a spiritual nature only can see and enter the kingdom of God; if all we bring into the world with us be the reverse of spiritual; and if this spirituality be solely of the Holy Ghost, no wonder a new birth is indispensable. Ye must—"Ye, says Jesus, not we" [BENGEL]. After those universal propositions, about what "a man" must be, to "enter the kingdom of God,"—this is remarkable, showing that our Lord meant to hold Himself forth as "separate from sinners."

8. The wind . . .—Breath and spirit (one word both in Hebrew and Greek) are constantly brought together in Scripture as analogous (Job 27:3; 33:4; Ezek. 37:9-14). canst not tell . . .—The laws which govern the motion of the winds are even yet but partially discovered; but the risings, fallings, and change in direction many times in a day, of those gentle breezes here referred to, will probably ever be a mystery to us: So of the operation of the Holy Ghost in the new birth.

9, 10. How . . .—Though the subject still confounds him, the necessity and possibility of the new birth is no longer the point with him, but the nature of it and how it is brought about [LUTHARDT]. "From this moment Nicodemus says nothing more, but has sunk unto a disciple who has found his true teacher. Therefore the Saviour now graciously advances in His communications of truth, and once more solemnly brings to the mind of this teacher in Israel, now become a learner, his own not guiltless ignorance, that He may then proceed to utter, out of the fulness of His divine knowledge, such farther testimonies both of earthly and heavenly things as his docile scholar may to his own profit receive" [STIER]. master—"teacher." The question clearly implies that the doctrine of regeneration is so far disclosed in the Old Testament that Nicodemus was culpable in being ignorant of it. Nor is it merely as something that should be experienced under the Gospel that the Old Testament holds it forth—as many distinguished critics allege, denying that there was any such thing as regeneration before Christ. For our Lord's proposition is universal, that no fallen man is or can be spiritual without a regenerating operation of the Holy Ghost, and the necessity of a spiritual obedience under whatever name, in opposition to mere mechanical services, is proclaimed throughout all the Old Testament.

ner to renounce idolatry, to take the God of Israel for his God, and to have his life conformed to the precepts of the divine law. But the water which was used on the occasion was only an emblem of the Holy Spirit. The soul was considered as in a state of defilement because of past sin. Now, as by that water the body was washed, cleansed, and refreshed, so, by the influences of the Holy Spirit, the soul was to be purified from its defilement and strengthened to walk in the way of truth and holiness. When John came baptizing with water, he gave the Jews the plainest intimations that this would not suffice; that it was only typical of that baptism of the Holy Ghost, under the similitude of fire, which they must all receive from Jesus Christ. See Matt. iii. 11. Therefore our Lord asserts that a man must be born of water and of the Spirit, i.e., of the Holy Ghost, which, represented under the similitude of water, cleanses, refreshes, and purifies the soul. Though baptism by water into the Christian faith was necessary to every Jew and Gentile that entered into the kingdom of the Messiah, it is not necessary that by water and the Spirit (in this place) we should understand two different things. It is probably only an elliptical form of speech for the Holy Spirit under the similitude of water; as, in Matt. iii. 3, "the Holy Ghost and fire" do not mean two things, but one, viz., the Holy Ghost under the similitude of fire—pervading every part, refining and purifying the whole.

6. That which is born of the flesh is flesh. This is the answer to the objection made by Nicodemus in v. 4. "Can a man enter the second time into his mother's womb, and be born?"

8. The wind bloweth. Though the manner in which this new birth is effected by the Divine Spirit be incomprehensible to us, yet we must not on this ground suppose it to be impossible. The wind blows in a variety of directions—we hear its sound, perceive its operation in the motion of the trees, etc., and feel it on ourselves—but we cannot discern the air itself; we only know that it exists by the effects which it produces. So is every one that is born of the Spirit; the effects are as discernible and as sensible as those of the wind, but itself we cannot see. But he who is born of God knows that he is thus born. "The Spirit itself," the grand Agent in this new birth, "beareth witness with our spirit," that he is born of God, Rom. viii. 16; for "he that believeth . . . hath the witness in himself," 1 John iv. 13 and v. 10; Gal. iv. 6. And so does this Spirit work in and by him that others, though they see not the principle, can easily discern the change produced; for "whatsoever is born of God overcometh the world," 1 John v. 4.

9. How can these things be? Our Lord had very plainly told him how these things could be, and illustrated the new birth by one of the most proper similes that could be chosen; but so intent was this great man on making everything submit to the testimony of his senses that he appears unwilling to believe anything unless he can comprehend it. This is the case with many—they profess to believe because they comprehend, but they are impostors who speak thus. There is not a man in the universe that can fully comprehend one operation, either of God or of His instrument nature; and yet they must believe, and do believe, though they never did nor ever can fully comprehend, or account for, the objects of their faith.

10. Art thou a master of Israel? Have you taken upon you to guide the blind into the way of truth, and yet know not that truth yourself? Do you command proselytes to be baptized with water as an emblem of a new birth, and are you unacquainted with the cause, necessity, na-things, these necessary things, these great things, these divine things.

(3) Christ's discourse, hereupon, of the certainty and sublimity of gospel truths (v. 11–13). Observe here,

[1] That the truths Christ taught were very certain and what we may venture upon (v. 11): We speak that we do know. The truths of Christ are of undoubted certainty. We have all the reason in the world to be assured that the sayings of Christ are faithful sayings, and such as we may venture our souls upon. Whatever Christ spoke, he spoke of his own knowledge. The things are thus sure, thus clear; and yet you receive not our witness.

[2] The truths Christ taught, though communicated in language and expressions borrowed from common and earthly things, yet were most sublime and heavenly; this is intimated, v. 12: "I have told them earthly things, that is, have told them the great things of God in similitudes taken from earthly things, to make them the more easy and intelligible, as that of the new birth and the wind, and lisped to you in your own language, and cannot make you to understand my doctrine. If such familiar expressions be stumbling-blocks, what would abstract ideas be, and spiritual things painted proper?" The things of the gospel are heavenly things, out of the road of the enquiries of human reason, and much more out of the reach of its discoveries. He considers our frame, that we are of the earth, and our place, that we are on the earth, and therefore speaks to us earthly things, and makes things sensible the vehicle of things spiritual, to make them the more easy and familiar to us. Earthly things are despised because they are vulgar, and heavenly things because they are abstruse; and so, whatever method is taken, still some fault or other is found with it.

[3] Our Lord Jesus, and he alone, was fit to reveal to us a doctrine thus certain, thus sublime: No man hath ascended up into heaven but he, v. 13. None but Christ was able to reveal to us the will of God for our salvation. Nicodemus addressed Christ as a prophet; but he must know that he is greater than all the Old Testament prophets, for none of them had ascended into heaven. No man hath attained to the certain knowledge of God and heavenly things as Christ has. It is not for us to send to heaven for instructions; we must wait to receive what instructions Heaven will send to us. Jesus Christ is able to reveal the will of God to us; for it is he that came down from heaven and is in heaven. He had said (v. 12), How shall ye believe, if I tell you of heavenly things? He gives them an instance of those heavenly things when he tells them of one that came down from heaven, and yet is the Son of man. If the regeneration of the soul of man is such a mystery, what then is the incarnation of the Son of God? We have here an intimation of Christ's two distinct natures in one person. He gives them a proof of his ability to speak to them heavenly things by telling them, (1) That he came down from heaven. The intercourse settled between God and man began above. We love him, and send to him, because he first loved us, and sent to us. Now this intimates, [1] Christ's divine nature. [2] His intimate acquaintance with the divine counsels. [3] The manifestation of God. The New Testament shows us God coming down from heaven, to teach and save us. Herein he commended his love. (2) That he is the Son of man, by which the Jews always understand to be meant the Messiah. (3) That he is in heaven. Now at this time, when he is talking with Nicodemus on earth, yet, as God, he is in heaven.

3. Christ here discourses of the great design of his own coming into the world, and the happiness of those that believe in him, v. 14–18. Here we have the very marrow and quintessence of the whole gospel, that Jesus Christ came to seek and to save the children of men from death, and recover them to life. This saving here is opposed to condemning, v. 16–18.

(1) Jesus Christ came to save us by healing us, as the children of Israel that were stung with fiery serpents were cured and lived by looking up to the brazen serpent.

First, The deadly and destructive nature of sin, which is implied here. The guilt of sin is like the pain of the biting of a fiery serpent; the power of corruption is like the venom diffused thereby. The curses of the law are as fiery serpents, so are all the tokens of divine wrath.

Secondly, The powerful remedy provided against this fatal malady. The case of poor sinners is deplorable; but is it desperate? Thanks be to God, it is not. The Son of man is lifted up, as the serpent of brass was by Moses. It was a serpent of brass that cured them. It was made in the shape of a fiery serpent, and yet had no poison, no sting, fitly representing Christ; as harmless as a serpent of brass. It was 11-13. We speak that we know, and . . . have seen—i.e., by absolute knowledge and immediate vision of God, which "the only-begotten Son in the bosom of the Father" claims as exclusively His own (ch. 1:18). The "we" and "our" are here used, though Himself only is intended, in emphatic contrast, probably, with the opening words of Nicodemus, "Rabbi, we know . . . ." ye receive not . . .—referring to the class to which Nicodemus belonged, but from which he was beginning to be separated in spirit. 12. earthly things—such as regeneration, the gate of entrance to the kingdom of God on earth, and which Nicodemus should have understood better, as a truth even of that more earthly economy to which he belonged. heavenly things—the things of the new and more heavenly evangelical economy, only to be fully understood after the effusion of the Spirit from heaven through the exalted Saviour.

13. no man hath ascended . . .—There is something paradoxical in this language—'No one has gone up but He that came down, even He who is at once both up and down.' Doubtless it was intended to startle and constrain His auditor to think that there must be mysterious elements in His Person. The old Socinians, to subvert the doctrine of the pre-existence of Christ, seized upon this passage as teaching that the man Jesus was secretly caught up to heaven to receive His instructions, and then "came down from heaven" to deliver them. But the sense manifestly is this: 'The perfect knowledge of God is not obtained by any man's going up from earth to heaven to receive it—no man hath so ascended—but He whose proper habitation, in His essential and eternal nature, is heaven, hath, by taking human flesh, descended as the "Son of man" to disclose the Father, whom He knows by immediate gaze alike in the flesh as before He assumed it, being essentially and unchangeably "in the bosom of the Father" ' (ch. 1:18).

14-16. And as Moses . . .—Here now we have the "heavenly things," as before the "earthly," but under a veil, for the reason mentioned in vs. 12. The crucifixion of Messiah is twice after this veiled under the same lively term—"uplifting," ch. 8:28; 12:32, 33. Here it is still further veiled—though to us who know what it means, rendered vastly more instructive—by reference to the brazen serpent. The venom of the fiery serpents, shooting through the veins of the rebellious Israelites, was spreading death through the camp—lively emblem of the perishing condition of men by reason of sin. In both cases the remedy was divinely provided. In both the way of cure strikingly resembled that of the disease. Stung by serpents, by a serpent they are healed. By "fiery serpents" bitten—serpents, probably, with skin spotted fiery-red (KURTZ)—the instrument of cure is a serpent of brass or copper, having at a distance the same appearance. So in redemption, as by man came death, by Man also comes life—Man, too, "in the likeness of sinful flesh," differing in nothing outward and apparent from those who, pervaded by the poison of the serpent, were ready to perish. But as the uplifted serpent had none of the venom of which the serpent-bitten people were dying, so while the whole human family were perishing of the deadly wound inflicted on it by the old serpent, "the Second Man," who arose over humanity with healing in His wings, was without spot or wrinkle, or any such thing. In both cases the remedy is conspicuously displayed; in the one case on a pole, in the other on the cross, to "draw all men unto Him" ture, and effects of that new birth? "But I am taught to believe that this baptism is regeneration." Then you are taught to believe a falsity. Whereby are such persons made the children of grace? Not by the water, but by the "death unto sin," and the "new birth unto righteousness"; i.e., through the agency of the Holy Ghost sin is destroyed and the soul filled with holiness.

11. We speak that we do know. I and My disciples do not profess to teach a religion which we do not understand nor exemplify in our conduct. A strong but delicate reproof to Nicodemus, who, though a master of Israel, did not understand the very rudiments of the doctrine of salvation.

12. If I have told you earthly things. If after I have illustrated this new birth by a most expressive metaphor taken from earthly things, and after all you believe not, how can you believe should I tell you of heavenly things, in such language as angels use, where earthly images and illustrations can have no place? Or if you, a teacher in Israel, do not understand the nature of such an earthly thing, or custom of the kingdom established over the Jewish nation, as being born of baptism, practiced every day in the initiation of proselytes, how will you understand such heavenly things as the initiation of My disciples by the baptism of the Holy Ghost and fire from heaven, if I should proceed further on the subject?

13. No man hath ascended. This seems a figurative expression for "No man hath known the mysteries of the kingdom of God," as in Deut. xxx. 12; Ps. lxxiii. 17; Prov. xxx. 4; Rom. xi. 34. And the expression is founded upon this generally received maxim: That to be perfectly acquainted with the concerns of a place, it is necessary for a person to be on the spot. But our Lord probably spoke to correct a false notion among the Jews, viz., that Moses had ascended to heaven in order to get the law. It is not Moses who is to be heard now, but Jesus; Moses did not ascend to heaven, but the Son of Man is come down from heaven to reveal the divine will. That came down. The incarnation of Christ is represented under the notion of His coming down from heaven to dwell upon earth.

14. As Moses lifted up. He shows the reason why He descended from heaven, that He might be lifted up, i.e., crucified, for the salvation of mankind, and be, by the appointment of God, as certain a Remedy for sinful souls as the brazen serpent elevated on a pole, Num. xxi. 9, was for the bodies of the Israelites which had been bitten by the fiery serpents in the wilderness.

MATTHEW HENRY

lifted up upon a pole, and so must the Son of man be lifted up. Christ is lifted up, [1] In his crucifixion. He was lifted up upon the cross. His death is called his being lifted up, ch. xii. 32, 33. [2] In his exaltation. He was lifted up to the Father's right hand. He was lifted up to the cross, to be further lifted up to the crown. [3] In the publishing and preaching of his everlasting gospel. Being thus lifted up, it was appointed for the cure. He that sent the plague provided the remedy. It was God himself that found the ransom. He whom we have offended is our peace.

Thirdly, The way of applying this remedy, and that is by believing. Everyone that looked up to it did well, Num. xxi. 9. He hath said, Look, and be saved (Isa. xlv. 22), look and live.

Fourthly, The great encouragements given us by faith to look up to him. a. It was for this end that he was lifted up, that his followers might be saved. b. The offer that is made of salvation by him is general, whosoever believes without exception. c. The salvation offered is complete. They shall not perish. They shall have eternal life.

(2) Jesus Christ came to save us by pardoning us, v. 16, 17. Here is gospel indeed, good news, the best that ever came from heaven to earth.

First, Here is God's love, in giving his Son for the world (v. 16). [1]. The great gospel mystery revealed: God so loved the world that he gave his only-begotten Son. a. Jesus Christ is the only-begotten Son of God. Now know we that he loves us, when he has given his only-begotten Son for us. b. In order to the redemption and salvation of man, it pleased God to give his only-begotten Son. He gave him, that is, he gave him up to suffer and die for us. His enemies could not have taken him if his Father had not given him. c. Herein God has commended his love to the world; God so loved the world, so really, so richly. Behold, and wonder, that the great God should love such a worthless world; that the holy God should love such a wicked world. The Jews vainly conceited that the Messiah should be sent only in love to their nation; but Christ tells them that he came in love to the whole world, Gentiles as well as Jews. Through him there is a general offer of life and salvation made to all. So far God loved the world that he sent his Son with this fair proposal, that whosoever believes in him shall not perish. Salvation has been of the Jews, but now Christ is known as salvation to the ends of the earth. [2]. Here is the great gospel duty, and that is to believe in Jesus Christ. [3]. Here is the great gospel benefit: That whosoever believes in Christ shall not perish. God has taken away their sin, they shall not die; a pardon is purchased. They are entitled to the joys of heaven: they shall have everlasting life.

Secondly, Here is God's design in sending his Son into the world: it was that the world through him might be saved. He came into the world with salvation in his eye, with salvation in his hand (v. 17): God sent his Son into the world; sent him as his agent or ambassador, as resident. We are concerned to enquire on what errand he comes: Is it peace? And this scripture returns the answer, Peaceably. He did not come to condemn the world. We had reason enough to expect that he should, for it is a guilty world; it is convicted. Justly may such a world as this be condemned. He came with full powers indeed to execute judgment (ch. v. 22, 27), but did not begin with a judgment of condemnation, but put us upon a new trial before a throne of grace. He came that the world through him might be saved. God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself, and so saving it. This is good news to a convinced conscience, healing to broken bones and bleeding wounds, that Christ, our judge, came not to condemn, but to save.

(3) From all this is inferred the happiness of true believers: He that believeth on him is not condemned, v. 18. This denotes more than a reprieve; he is not condemned, that is, he is acquitted; and if he be not condemned he is discharged. Who is he that condemns? It is Christ that died. The cross perhaps lies heavy upon him, but he is saved from the curse: condemned by the world, it may be, but not condemned with the world, Rom. viii. 1.

4. The deplorable condition of those that persist in unbelief and wilful ignorance, v. 18–21.

(1) Read here the doom of those that will not believe in Christ: they are condemned already. [1] How great the sin of unbelievers is. They believe not in the name of the only-begotten Son of God, who is infinitely true, and deserves to be believed, infinitely good, and deserves to be embraced. God sent one to save us that was dearest to himself; and shall not he be dearest to us? [2] How great the misery of unbelievers is: they are condemned already. A certain condemnation. A present condemnation. They are condemned already, for their own hearts condemn them.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

(ch. 12:32). In both cases it is by directing the eye to the uplifted Remedy that the cure is effected; in the one case the bodily eye, in the other the gaze of the soul by "believing in Him," as in that glorious ancient proclamation—"Look unto me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth . . ." (Isa. 45:22). Both methods are stumbling to human reason. What, to any thinking Israelite, could seem more unlikely than that a deadly poison should be dried up in his body by simply looking on a reptile of brass? Such a stumbling block to the Jews and to the Greeks foolishness was faith in the crucified Nazarene as a way of deliverance from eternal perdition. Yet was the warrant in both cases to expect a cure equally rational and well grounded. As the serpent was God's ordinance for the cure of every bitten Israelite, so is Christ for the salvation of every perishing sinner—the one however a purely arbitrary ordinance, the other divinely adapted to man's complicated maladies. In both cases the efficacy is the same. As one simple look at the serpent, however distant and however weak, brought an instantaneous cure, even so, real faith in the Lord Jesus, however tremulous, however distant—be it but real faith—brings certain and instant healing to the perishing soul. In a word, the consequences of disobedience are the same in both. Doubtless many bitten Israelites, galling as their case was, would reason rather than obey, would speculate on the absurdity of expecting the bite of a living serpent to be cured by looking at a piece of dead metal in the shape of one—speculate thus till they died. Alas! is not salvation by a crucified Redeemer subjected to like treatment? Has the offense of the cross" yet ceased? (Cf. II Kings 5:12). 16. For God so loved . . .—What proclamation of the Gospel has been so oft on the lips of missionaries and preachers in every age since it was first uttered? What has sent such thrilling sensations through millions of mankind? What has been honored to bring such multitudes to the feet of Christ? What to kindle in the cold and selfish breasts of mortals the fires of selfsacrificing love to mankind, as these words of transparent simplicity, yet overpowering majesty? The picture embraces several distinct compartments: THE WORLD"—in its widest sense—ready "to perish"; the immense "LOVE OF GOD" to that perishing world, measurable only, and conceivable only, by the gift which it drew forth from Him; THE GIFT itself—"He so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son," or, in the language of Paul, "spared not His own Son" (Rom. 8:32), or in that addressed to Abraham when ready to offer Isaac on the altar, "withheld not His Son, His only Son, whom He loved" (Gen. 22:16); the FRUIT of this stupendous gift—not only deliverance from impending "perdition," but the bestowal of everlasting life; and the MODE in which all takes effect—by "believing" on the Son. How would Nicodemus' narrow Judaism become invisible in the blaze of this Sun of righteousness seen rising on "the world" with healing in His wings! 17-21. not to condemn . . .—A statement of vast importance. Though "condemnation" is to many the issue of Christ's mission (vs. 19), it is not the object of His mission, which is purely a saving one.

18. is not condemned—Having, immediately on his believing, "passed from death unto life" (ch. 5:24).

condemned already—Rejecting the one way of deliverance from that "condemnation" which God gave His Son to remove, and so wilfully remaining condemned.

ADAM CLARKE

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

The only thing we have to do with Christ Jesus crucified is to lift Him up and preach Him. There is many a man who could speak only in a ploughman's dialect, who will wear a bright and starry crown in heaven, because he lifted Christ up, and sinners saw and lived. And there is many a learned doctor, who spoke with the brogue of the Egyptian, and, with the dark and mysterious language, he talked he knew not what, who, after having ended his course, shall enter heaven without a solitary star in his crown, never having lifted up Christ, nor won crowns for his Master. Let each of us who are called to the solemn work of the ministry remember that we are not called to lift up doctrine, or church governments, or particular denominations; our business is to lift up Christ Jesus and to preach Him fully. There may be times when church government is to be discussed, and peculiar doctrines are to be vindicated. God forbid that we should silence any part of the truth; but the main work of the ministry —its everyday work—is just exhibiting Christ and crying out to sinners, "Believe, believe, believe on Him who is the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world."

—The Treasury of the New Testament

16. For God so loved the world. Such a love as that which induced God to give His only begotten Son to die for the world could not be described; Jesus Christ does not attempt it. He has put an eternity of meaning in the particle so and left a subject for everlasting contemplation, wonder, and praise, to angels and to men. The same Evangelist uses a similar mode of expression, 1 Epist. iii. 1: "Behold, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us."

17. For God sent not. It was the opinion of the Jews that the Gentiles, whom they often term "the world," and "nations of the world," were to be destroyed in the days of the Messiah. Christ corrects this false opinion and teaches here a contrary doctrine. God, by giving His Son and publishing His design in giving Him, shows that He purposes the salvation, not the destruction, of the world—the Gentile people. Nevertheless, those who will not receive the salvation He had provided for them, whether Jews or Gentiles, must necessarily perish; for this plain reason, there is but one remedy, and they refuse to apply it.

18. He that believeth. As stated before on v. 16. Is not condemned. For past sin, that being forgiven on his believing in Christ. But he that believeth not. When the gospel is preached to him, and the way of salvation made plain.

Is condemned already. Continues under the condemnation which divine justice has passed upon all sinners; and has this superadded, He hath not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God, and therefore is guilty of the grossest insult to the divine majesty in neglecting, slighting, and despising the salvation which the infinite mercy of God had provided for him.

MATTHEW HENRY

A condemnation grounded upon their former guilt. He is condemned already, because he has not believed. Unbelief is a sin against the remedy.

(2) Read also the doom of those that would not so much as know him, v. 19. And this is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and they loved darkness rather. The gospel is light, and, when the gospel came, light came into the world. Light is self-evidencing, so is the gospel; it proves its own divine origin. Light is discovering, and truly the light is sweet. A dark place indeed the world would be without it. It is the unspeakable folly of the most of men that they loved darkness rather than this light. Sinners that were wedded to their lusts loved their ignorance and mistakes rather than the truths of Christ. Wretched man is in love with his sickness, in love with his slavery, and will not be made free, will not be made whole. The true reason why men love darkness rather than light is because their deeds are evil. Their case is sad, and, because they are resolved that they will not mend it, they are resolved that they will not see it. Wilful ignorance is so far from excusing sin that it will be found to aggravate the condemnation: This is the condemnation, that they shut their eyes against the light, and will not so much as admit a parley with Christ and his gospel. We must account in the judgment not only for the knowledge we sinned against, but for the knowledge we sinned away. It is a common observation that everyone that doeth evil hateth the light, v. 20. Evil-doers seek concealment, out of a sense of shame and fear of punishment. They come not to this light, but keep as far off it as they can, lest their deeds should be reproved. The light of the gospel is sent into the world to reprove the evil deeds of sinners; to show people their transgressions, to show that to be sin which was not thought to be so, that sin by the new commandment might appear exceeding sinful. The gospel has its convictions, to make way for its consolations. It is for this reason that evil-doers hate the light of the gospel. There were those who had done evil and were sorry for it, who bade this light welcome, as the publicans and harlots. But he that does evil, and resolves to go on in it, hateth the light. Christ is hated because sin is loved. They who do not come to the light thereby evidence a secret hatred of the light. On the other hand, upright hearts bid this light welcome (v. 21): He that doeth truth cometh to the light. As it convinces and terrifies evil-doers, so it confirms and comforts those that walk in their integrity. The character of a good man. He is one that doeth truth. Though sometimes he comes short of doing good, the good he would do, yet he doeth truth, he aims honestly; he has his infirmities, but holds fast his integrity. He is one that cometh to the light. He that doeth truth is willing to know the truth by himself, and to have his deeds made manifest. He is solicitous to know what the will of God is, and resolves to do it, though ever so contrary to his own will and interest. Here is the character of a good work: it is wrought in God. Our works are then good, when the will of God is the rule of them and the glory of God the end of them; when they are done in his strength and for his sake. Nicodemus, though he was puzzled at first, yet afterwards became a faithful disciple of Christ.

Verses 22–36

I. Christ's removal into the land of Judæa (v. 22). Our Lord Jesus, after he entered upon his public work, travelled much, and removed often. Many a weary step he took to do good to souls. The Sun of righteousness took a large circuit to diffuse his light and heat, Ps. xix. 6. He was not wont to stay long at Jerusalem. After these things, after he had had this discourse with Nicodemus, he came into the land of Judæa; not so much for greater privacy as for greater usefulness. His preaching and miracles, perhaps, made most noise at Jerusalem, the fountain-head of news, but did least good there. When he came into the land of Judæa his disciples came with him. There he tarried with them. Those that are ready to go with Christ shall find him as ready to stay with them. There he baptized. John began to baptize in the land of Judæa (Matt. iii. 1), therefore Christ began there. He himself baptized not, with his own hand, but his disciples by his orders and directions, as appears, ch. iv. 2. Holy ordinances are Christ's, though administered by weak men.

II. John's continuance in his work, as long as his opportunities lasted, v. 23, 24. Here we are told,

1. That John was baptizing. Christ's baptism, was, for substance, the same with John's, and therefore they did not at all clash or interfere with one another. (1) Christ began the work of preaching and baptizing before John laid it down, so the wheels might be kept going. It is a comfort to useful men, when they are

19. this is the condemnation . . .—emphatically so, revealing the condemnation already existing, and sealing up under it those who will not be delivered from it. light is come into the world—in the Person of Him to whom Nicodemus was listening. loved darkness . . .—This can only be known by the deliberate rejection of Christ, but that does fearfully reveal it.

20. reproved—by detection.

21. doeth truth—whose only object in life is to be and do what will bear the light. Therefore he loves and "comes to the light," that all he is and does, being thus thoroughly tested, may be seen to have nothing in it but what is divinely wrought and divinely approved. This is the "Israelite, indeed, in whom is no guile."

19. This is the condemnation. That is, this is the reason why some shall finally perish, not that they came into the world with a perverted and corrupt nature, which is true; nor that they lived many years in the practice of sin, which is also true; but because they refused to receive the salvation which God sent to them. Light is come. That is, Jesus, the Sun of righteousness, the Fountain of light and life, diffusing His benign influences everywhere, and favoring men with a clear and full revelation of the divine will. Men loved darkness. Have preferred sin to holiness, Belial to Christ, and hell to heaven. Chashac, "darkness," is frequently used by the Jewish writers for the angel of death and for the devil. Because their deeds were evil. An allusion to robbers and cutthroats, who practice their abominations in the night season for fear of being detected.

20. For every one that doeth evil hateth the light. He who doth vile or abominable things, alluding to the subject mentioned in the preceding verse.

Lest his deeds should be reproved. Or "discovered." To "manifest" or "discover" is one sense of the original word in the best Greek writers, and is evidently its meaning in this place.

21. Wrought in God. In His presence, and through His assistance. This is the end of our Lord's discourse to Nicodemus; and though we are not informed here of any good effects produced by it, yet we learn from other scriptures that it had produced the most blessed effects in his mind, and that from this time he became a disciple of Christ. He publicly defended our Lord in the Sanhedrin, of which he was probably a member, chap. vii. 50; and, with Joseph of Arimathaea, gave Him an honorable funeral, chap. xix. 39, when all His bosom friends had deserted Him.

22. Came . . . into the land of Judaea. Jerusalem itself, where Christ held the preceding discourse with Nicodemus, was in Judea; but the Evangelist means that our Lord quitted the city and its suburbs and went into the country parts. The same distinction between Jerusalem and Judea is made in Acts i. 8; x. 39; and in 1 Macc. iii. 34; 2 Macc. i. 1, 10.

going off the stage, to see those rising up who are likely to fill up their place. (2) John continued the work of preaching and baptizing though Christ had taken it up. There was still work for John to do, for Christ was not yet generally known, nor were the minds of people thoroughly prepared for him by repentance. He goes on with his work, till Providence lays him aside. The greater gifts of some do not render the labours of others, that come short of them, needless and useless; there is work enough for all hands. They are sullen that will sit down and do nothing when they see themselves outshone.

2. That he baptized in Ænon near Salim, places we find nowhere else mentioned. Wherever it was, it seems that John removed from place to place. Ministers must follow their opportunities. He chose a place where there was much water, that is, many streams of water; so that wherever he met with any that were willing to submit to his baptism water was at hand to baptize.

3. That thither people came to him and were baptized. Some refer this both to John and to Jesus: some came to John, some to Jesus, and, as their baptism was one, so were their hearts.

4. It is noted (v. 24) that John was not yet cast into prison. John never desisted from his work as long as he had his liberty.

III. A contest between John's disciples and the Jews about purifying, v. 25. 1. Who were the disputants: some of John's disciples, and the Jews who had not submitted to his baptism of repentance. Penitents and impenitents divide this sinful world. 2. What was the matter in dispute: about purifying, about religious washing. We may suppose that John's disciples cried up his baptism, his purifying, and gave the preference to that as perfecting and superseding all the purifications of the Jews, and they were in the right. No doubt the Jews with as much assurance applauded the purifyings that were in use among them. It is very likely that the Jews in this dispute, when they could not deny the excellent nature and design of John's baptism, raised an objection against it from Christ's baptism, which gave occasion for the complaint that follows here (v. 26). Thus objections are made against the gospel from the advancement and improvement of gospel light, as if childhood and manhood were contrary to each other, and the superstructure were against the foundation.

IV. A complaint which John's disciples made to their master concerning Christ and his baptizing, v. 26. They come to their master, and tell him, "Rabbi, he that was with thee; he baptizeth, and all men come to him." They suggest that Christ's setting up a baptism of his own was a piece of presumption, as if John, having first set up this rite of baptizing, must have, as it were, a patent for the invention: "He that was with thee beyond Jordan, behold, the same, baptizes." They suggest that it was a piece of ingratitude to John. He to whom thou barest witness baptizes; as if Jesus owed all his reputation to the honourable character John gave of him. But Christ needed not John's testimony, ch. v. 36. He reflected more honour upon John than he received from him. John was just to Christ, in bearing witness to him; and Christ's answering his testimony did rather enrich than impoverish John's ministry. They conclude that it would be a total eclipse to John's baptism: "All men come to him." Aiming at the monopoly of honour and respect has been in all ages the bane of the church, and the shame of its members and ministers. We mistake if we think that the excelling gifts and graces, and labours and usefulness, of one, are a diminution and disparagement to another that has obtained mercy to be faithful. We must leave it to God to choose, employ, and honour his own instruments as he pleaseth.

V. Here is John's answer, v. 27, &c. It was no disturbance to him, but what he wished for. He therefore checked the complaint, and took this occasion to confirm the testimonies he had formerly borne to Christ as superior to him.

1. John here abases himself in comparison with Christ, v. 27–30.

(1) John acquiesces in the divine disposal (v. 27): A man can receive nothing except it be given him from heaven. Different employments are according to the direction of divine Providence, different endowments according to the distribution of the divine grace. We should not envy those that have a larger share of gifts than we have, or move in a larger sphere of usefulness. John reminds his disciples that Jesus would not have thus excelled him except he had received it from heaven, and, if God gave him the Spirit without measure (v. 34), shall they grudge at it? We should not be discontented, though we be inferior to others in gifts and usefulness, and be eclipsed by their excellencies. John was ready to baptized—in the sense explained in ch. 4:2.

24. John not yet cast into prison—Hence it is plain that our Lord's ministry did not commence with the imprisonment of John, though, but for this, we should have drawn that inference from Matthew 4:12 and Mark's (1: 14) express statement. 25, 26. between some of—rather, "on the part of." and the Jews—rather (according to the best MSS.), "and a Jew," about purifying—i.e,, baptizing, the symbolical meaning of washing with water being put (as in ch. 2:6) for the act itself. As John and Jesus were the only teachers who baptized Jews, discussions might easily arise between the Baptist's disciples and such Jews as declined to submit to that rite.

26. Rabbi . . .—'Master, this man tells us that He to whom thou barest such generous witness beyond Jordan is requiting thy generosity by drawing all the people away to Himself. At this rate, thou shalt soon have no disciples at all.' The reply to this is one of the noblest and most affecting utterances that ever came from the lips of man.

A man can receive . . .—can assume nothing, i.e., lawfully and with any success; i.e., Every man has his work and sphere appointed him from above. Even Christ Himself came under this law (Heb. 5:4).

ADAM CLARKE

23. In Aenon. This place was eight miles southward from Scythopolis, between Salim and Jordan. There was much water. And this was equally necessary where such multitudes were baptized, whether the ceremony was performed by dipping or sprinkling. But as the Jewish custom required the persons to stand in the water, and, having been instructed, and entered into a covenant to renounce all idolatry, and take the God of Israel for their God, then plunge themselves under the water, it is probable that the rite was thus performed at Aenon.

And baptized. It is not clear that Christ did baptize any with water, but His disciples did—chap. iv. 2; and what they did, by His authority and command, is attributed to himself. It is a common custom, in all countries and in all languages, to attribute the operations of those who are under the government and direction of another to him by whom they are directed and governed.

25. John's disciples and the Jews. Instead of Jews, some versions and fathers read, "a Jew." The person here spoken of was probably one who had been baptized by the disciples of our Lord, and the subject of debate seems to have been whether the baptism of John or that of Christ was the most efficacious towards purifying.

26. And they came unto John. That he might decide the question.

27. A man can receive nothing. Or, "A man can receive nothing from heaven, unless it be given him." I have received, not only my commission, but the power also by which I have executed it, from above. As I took it up at God's command, so I am ready to lay it down when He pleases. I have told you from the beginning that I was only the forerunner of the Messiah; and was sent, not to form a separate party, but to point out to men that Lamb of God which takes away the sin of the world, v. 28.

MATTHEW HENRY

own that it was God that gave him the interest he had in the love and esteem of the people; and, if now his interest decline, God's will be done! When he has fulfilled his ministry, he can contentedly see it go out of date.

(2) John appeals to the testimony he had formerly given concerning Christ (v. 28). I said, again and again, I am not the Christ, but I am sent before him. Neither the frowns of the chief priests, nor the flatteries of his own disciples, could make him change his note. Now this serves here, [1] As a conviction to his disciples of the unreasonableness of their complaint. "Now," saith John, "do you not remember what the testimony was that I did bear? Did I not say, I am not the Christ? Did I not say, I am sent before him? Why then does it seem strange to you that I should stand by and give way to him?" [2] As a comfort to himself that he had never given his disciples any occasions thus to set him up in competition with Christ; but, on the contrary, had particularly cautioned them against this mistake. John had not only not encouraged them to hope that he was the Messiah, but had plainly told them the contrary. It is a common excuse for those who have undue honour paid them—If the people will be deceived, let them; but that is an ill maxim for those to go by whose business it is to undeceive people.

(3) John professes the great satisfaction he had in the advancement of Christ, he rejoiced in it. This he expresses (v. 29) by an elegant similitude. He compares our Saviour to the bridegroom: "He that hath the bride is the bridegroom. Do all men come to him? It is his right." As far as particular souls are devoted to him in faith and love, so far the bridegroom has the bride. He compares himself to the friend of the bridegroom, assists him in prosecuting the match, speaks a good word for him, rejoices most of all when he has the bride. The friend of the bridegroom stands, and hears him; rejoices with joy because of the bridegroom's voice. Faithful ministers are friends of the bridegroom, to recommend him to the children of men; to bring letters and messages from him, for he courts by proxy. The friends of the bridegroom must stand, and hear the bridegroom's voice; must receive instructions from him, and attend his orders. The espousing of souls to Jesus Christ, in faith and love, is the fulfilling of the joy of every good minister. Surely they have no greater joy.

(4) He owns it highly fit and necessary that the reputation and interest of Christ should be advanced, and his own diminished (v. 30): He must increase, but I must decrease. John speaks of Christ's increase and his own decrease as highly just and agreeable, and affording him entire satisfaction. He was well pleased to see the kingdom of Christ getting ground: "He must increase." The kingdom of Christ is, and will be, a growing kingdom, like the light of the morning, like the grain of mustard-seed. He was not at all displeased that the effect of this was the diminishing of his own interest: I must decrease. The shining forth of the glory of Christ eclipses the lustre of all other glory. As the light of the morning increases, that of the morning star decreases. We must cheerfully be content to be anything, to be nothing, so that Christ may be all.

2. John Baptist here advances Christ, and instructs his disciples concerning him.

(1) Concerning the dignity of Christ's person (v. 31): He that cometh from above is above all. He supposes his divine origin, that he came from above, from heaven. None but he that came from heaven was fit to show us the will of heaven, or the way to heaven. Hence he infers his sovereign authority: he is above all, above all things and all persons. When we come to speak of the honours of the Lord Jesus, we can say but this, He is above all. This he further illustrates by the meanness of those who stood in competition with him: He that is of the earth, is earthly, has his converse with earthly things, and his concern is for them. The prophets and apostles were of the same mould with other men; they were but earthen vessels, though they had a rich treasure lodged in them.

(2) Concerning the excellency and certainty of his doctrine. He, for his part, spoke of the earth, and so do all those that are of the earth. The prophets were men; of themselves they could not speak but of the earth. The preaching of the prophets and of John was but low and flat compared with Christ's preaching; as heaven is high above the earth, so were his thoughts above theirs. But he that cometh from heaven is above all the prophets that ever lived on earth. The doctrine of Christ is here recommended to us,

First, As infallibly sure and certain, and to be entertained accordingly (v. 32): What he hath seen and heard, that he testifieth. 1. Christ's divine knowledge; he testified nothing but what he had seen and heard. What he discovered of the divine nature was what he

27-30. A man . . . —'I do my heaven-prescribed work, and that is enough for me. Would you have me mount into my Master's place? Said I not unto you, I am not the Christ? The Bride is not mine, why should the people stay with me? Mine it is to point the burdened to the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world, to tell them there is Balm in Gilead, and a Physician there. And shall I grudge to see them, in obedience to the call, flying as a cloud, and as doves to their windows? Whose is the Bride but the Bridegroom's? Enough for me to be the Bridegroom's friend, sent by Him to negotiate the match, privileged to bring together the Saviour and those He is come to seek and to save, and rejoicing with joy unspeakable if I may but "stand and hear the Bridegroom's voice," witnessing the blessed espousals. Say ye, then, they go from me to Him? Ye bring me glad tidings of great joy. He must increase, but I must decrease; this, my joy, therefore is fulfilled.'

31-34. He that . . .—Here is the reason why He must increase while all human teachers must decrease. The Master "cometh from above"—descending from His proper element, the region of those "heavenly things" which He came to reveal, and so, although mingling with men and things on the earth, is not "of the earth," either in Person or Word. The servants, on the contrary, springing of earth, are of the earth, and their testimony, even though divine in authority, partakes necessarily of their own earthiness. (So strongly did the Baptist feel this contrast that the last clause just repeats the first.) It is impossible for a sharper line of distinction to be drawn between Christ and all human teachers, even when divinely commissioned and speaking by the power of the Holy Ghost. And who does not perceive it? The words of prophets and apostles are undeniable and most precious truth; but in the words of Christ we hear a voice as from the excellent Glory, the Eternal Word making Himself heard in our own flesh. 32. what he hath seen and heard—(See on vs. 11 and ch. 1:18).

F. B. MEYER:

John shows the greatness of humility. It is expressly stated in 4:2 that Jesus baptized through his disciples. This controversy arose with a Jew who was comparing the respective baptisms of John and the Lord. Perhaps he stirred John's followers with jealousy as he contrasted the crowds that gathered round the new teacher with the waning popularity of the old. But the Baptist had no sense of being aggrieved. His answer is one of the noblest ever made by human lips: "My work has been definitely assigned to me. It has been enough for me to fulfill it. The rapture of the Bridegroom and his success in wooing hearts is not for me. It is enough to behold his joy. He must increase, and I must decrease, but I sorrow not. Indeed, my joy is filled to the brim because of his success."

What a blessing it would be if we could enshrine in our hearts this immortal maxim: "A man can receive nothing except it be given him from heaven!" What we have is God's gift; let us hold it reverently. What another person has is God's gift to him; we have no right to find fault with his dealings with another of his servants. Our orbits are distinct; all we have to do is shine our brightest where he has placed us, confident that he knows best.—Bible Commentary

29. He that hath the bride. The congregation of believers. Is the bridegroom. The Lord Jesus, the Head of the Church. The friend of the bridegroom. The person whom the Greeks called the paranymph. There were two at each wedding: one waited on the bride, the other on the bridegroom. Their business was to serve them, to inspect the concerns of the bridechamber, and afterwards to reconcile differences between husband and wife, when any took place. John considers himself as standing in this relation to the Lord Jesus, while espousing human nature and converting souls to himself; this is the meaning of "standeth by," i.e., ready to serve.

30. He must increase. His present success is but the beginning of a most glorious and universal spread of righteousness, peace, truth, and goodwill among men. I must decrease. My baptism and teaching, as pointing out the coming Messiah, must cease; because the Messiah is now come, and has entered publicly on the work of His glorious ministry.

31. Is above all. This blessed Bridegroom, who has descended from heaven, v. 13, is above all, superior to Moses, the prophets, and me. He that is of the earth. John himself, who was born in the common way of man. Speaketh of the earth. Cannot speak of heavenly things as Christ can do, and only represents divine matters by these earthly ordinances, for the spirit and meaning of which you must all go to the Messiah himself.

had seen; what he revealed of the mind of God was what he had heard immediately from him. The prophets testified what was made known to them in dreams and visions, but not what they had seen and heard. The gospel of Christ is not a doubtful opinion, like an hypothesis or new notion in philosophy, but it is a revelation of the mind of God, which is of eternal truth in itself. 2. His divine grace and goodness. Christ's preaching is here called his testifying, to denote, (1) The convincing evidence of it; it was not reported as news by hearsay, but it was testified as evidence given in court. (2) The affectionate earnestness of the delivery of it.

From the certainty of Christ's doctrine, John takes occasion, to lament the infidelity of the most of men. They receive it not, they will not hear it, or give credit to it. This he speaks of not only as a matter of wonder but as a matter of grief; John's disciples grieved that all men came to Christ (v. 26); they thought his followers too many. But John grieves that no man came to him; he thought them too few. The unbelief of sinners is the grief of saints. He takes occasion to commend the faith of the chosen remnant (v. 33): He that hath received his testimony hath set to his seal that God is true. God is true, though we do not set our seal to it; his truth needs not our faith to support it, but by faith we do ourselves the honour and justice to subscribe to his truth. God's promises are all yea and amen; by faith we put our amen to them. By believing in Christ we set to our seal that God is true to all the promises which he has made concerning Christ. That he is true to all the promises he has made in Christ. Being satisfied that he is true, we are willing to deal with him upon trust.

Secondly, It is recommended to us as a divine doctrine (v. 34): For he whom God hath sent speaketh the word of God, for God giveth not the Spirit by measure unto him. 1. He spoke the words of God. Both substance and language were divine. He proved himself sent of God (ch. iii. 2), and therefore his words are to be received as the words of God. 2. He spoke as no other prophet did; for God giveth not the Spirit by measure to him. The Old Testament prophets had the Spirit, and in different degrees. But, whereas God gave them the Spirit by measure, he gave him to Christ without measure. The Spirit was not in Christ as in a vessel, but as in a fountain, as in a bottomless ocean.

(3) Concerning the power and authority he is invested with. He is the beloved Son of the Father (v. 35): The Father loveth the Son. The prophets were faithful as servants, but Christ as a Son. He continued his love to him even in his estate of humiliation, loved him never the less for his poverty, and sufferings. He is Lord of all. The Father hath given all things into his hand. Love is generous. Having given him the Spirit without measure, he gave him all things. All power; so it is explained, Matt. xxviii. 18. He has power over all flesh, the heathen given him for his inheritance. Both the golden sceptre and the iron rod are given into his hand. All grace is given into his hand as the channel of conveyance. We are unworthy that the Father should give those things into our hands. The things he intended for us he gives into his hands, who is worthy. They are given into his hands, by him to be given into ours. The riches of the new covenant are deposited in so sure, so kind, so good a hand, the hand of him that purchased them for us.

He is the object of that faith which is made the great condition of eternal happiness: He that believeth on the Son, hath life, v. 36. It is the conclusion of the whole matter. As God offers and conveys good things to us by the testimony of Jesus Christ, so we receive and partake of those favours by believing the testimony. This way of receiving fitly answers that way of giving. We have here the sum of that gospel which is to be preached to every creature. Here is,

First, The blessed state of all true Christians: He that believes on the Son hath everlasting life. Not only believes him, that what he saith is true, but believes on him, and confides in him. The benefit of true Christianity is no less than everlasting life. True believers, even now, have everlasting life; not only they shall have it hereafter, but they have it now. They have the Son of God, and in him they have life. Grace is glory begun.

Secondly, The wretched and miserable condition of unbelievers: He that believeth not the Son is undone. The word includes both incredulity and disobedience. They cannot be happy in this world, nor that to come: He shall not see life, that life which Christ came to bestow. They cannot but be miserable: The wrath of God abides upon an unbeliever.

no man receiveth . . .—John's disciples had said, "All come to Him" (vs. 26). The Baptist here virtually says, Would it were so, but alas! they are next to "none" [BENGEL]. They were far readier to receive himself, and obliged him to say, I am not the Christ, and he seems pained at this. 33. hath set to His seal . . .—gives glory to God whose words Christ speaks, not as prophets and apostles by a partial communication of the Spirit to them.

34. for God giveth not the Spirit by measure—Here, again, the sharpest conceivable line of distinction is drawn between Christ and all human-inspired teachers: 'They have the Spirit in a limited degree; but God giveth not [to Him] the Spirit by measure.' It means the entire fulness of divine life and divine power. The present tense "giveth," very aptly points out the permanent communication of the Spirit by the Father to the Son, so that a constant flow and reflow of living power is to be understood (Cf. ch. 1:15) [OLSHAUSEN].

35, 36. The Father loveth . . .—See on Matthew 11:27, where we have the "delivering over of all things into the hands of the Son," while here we have the deep spring of that august act in the Father's ineffable "love of the Son."

36. hath everlasting life—already has it. (See on vs. 18 and ch. 5:24). shall not see life—The contrast here is striking: The one has already a life that will endure for ever—the other not only has it not now, but shall never have it—never see it. abideth on him—It was on Him before, and not being removed in the only possible way, by "believing on the Son," it necessarily remaineth on him! N.B.—How flatly does this contradict the teaching of many in our day, that there neither was, nor is, anything in God against sinners which needed to be removed by Christ, but only in men against God!

ADAM CLARKE

32. And no man receiveth his testimony. Or, "And this his testimony no man taketh up." That is, the testimony which John had borne to the Jews that Jesus was the promised Messiah. No man taketh up. No person is found to tread in my steps and to publish to the Jews that this is the Christ, the Saviour of the world.

33. Hath set to his seal. That is, hath hereby confirmed the truth of the testimony which he has borne. As a testator sets his seal to an instrument in order to confirm it, and such instrument is considered as fully confirmed by having the testator's seal affixed to it, so I, by taking up this testimony of Christ and proclaiming it to the Jews, have fully confirmed it, as I know it to be a truth; which knowledge I have from the immediate inspiration of the Holy Spirit.

34. For God giveth not the Spirit by measure. He is the most perfect of all teachers, as having received the Holy Spirit as none before Him ever did. Without measure—not for a particular time, people, purpose, etc., but for the whole compass of time, and in reference to all eternity. It is worthy of remark that this was fully done after the outpouring of the Spirit on the Day of Pentecost, Acts ii. 1, as may be clearly seen in all the apostolic Epistles. The Jews observe that the Holy Spirit was given only in certain measures to the prophets; some writing only one book, others two.

35. All things into his hand. See on Matt. xi. 27. A principal design of John is to show that Christ was infinitely above every teacher, prophet, and divine messenger that had ever yet appeared. The prophets had various gifts: some had visions, other dreams; some had the gift of teaching, others of comforting, etc. But none possessed all these gifts; Christ alone possessed their plenitude, and is all things in all.

36. Hath everlasting life. He has already the seed of this life in his soul, having been made a partaker of the grace and spirit of Him in whom he has believed. He that believeth not. Or "obeyeth not." Shall not see life. Shall never enjoy it, there being no way to the kingdom of God but through Christ Jesus, Acts iv. 12. And none can expect to enter into this Kingdom but those who obey Him; for to such only He is the Author of eternal salvation, Heb. v. 9. But the wrath of God abideth on him. The "displeasure" of God. I should prefer "displeasure" to wrath, because the common acceptation of the latter (fury, rage) is not properly applicable here. Perhaps the original word is used in the same sense here as in Rom. ii. 5; iii. 5; xiii. 4-5; Eph. v. 6; 1 Thess. i. 10; v. 9, where it evidently means "punishment," which is the effect of irritated justice. Taken in this sense, we may consider the phrase as a Hebraism: "punishment of God," i.e., the most heavy and awful of all punishments—such as sin deserves, and such as it becomes divine justice to inflict. And this abideth on him—endures as long as his unbelief and disobedience remain!

Now he left Judæa four months before harvest (v. 35).

I. He made disciples. His ministry was successful, notwithstanding the opposition it met with. It is Christ's prerogative to make disciples, to form and fashion them to his will. The Christian is made such, not born such.

II. He baptized those whom he made disciples; not himself, but by the ministry of his disciples, v. 2. Because he would put a difference between his baptism and that of John, who baptized all himself, He would put honour upon his disciples, and so train them up to further services. He would teach us that what is done by his ministers, according to his direction, he owns as done by himself.

III. He made and baptized more disciples than John. Christ's converse was more winning than John's.

IV. The Pharisees were informed of this. When the Pharisees thought they had got rid of John, Jesus appears. That which grieved them was that Christ made so many disciples. The success of the gospel exasperates its enemies.

V. Our Lord Jesus knew very well what informations were given in against him. None can dig so deep as to hide their counsels from the Lord.

VI. Hereupon our Lord Jesus left Judæa and departed again to go to Galilee. He left Judæa, because he was likely to be persecuted there even to the death. Christ quitted the country, and went where what he did would be less provoking than just under their eye. His hour was not yet come. He had not finished his testimony, and therefore would not surrender or expose himself. The disciples he had gathered in Judæa were not able to bear hardships, and therefore he would not expose them. Hereby he gave an example to his own rule: When they persecute you in one city, flee to another. We are not called to suffer, while we may avoid it without sin; and therefore we may change our place. He departed into Galilee, because he had work to do there, and many friends and fewer enemies.

Verses 4–26

We have here an account of the good Christ did in Samaria. The Samaritans, both in blood and religion, were mongrel Jews. They worshipped the God of Israel only, to whom they erected a temple on mount Gerizim. The Samaritans would not admit Christ, when they saw he was going to Jerusalem (Luke ix. 53); the Jews thought they could not give him a worse name than to say, He is a Samaritan.

I. Christ's coming into Samaria. He charges his disciples not to enter into any city of the Samaritans (Matt. x. 5), nor did he here preach publicly, or work any miracle, his eye being to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. What kindness he here did them was only a crumb of the children's bread that casually fell from the master's table.

1. His road from Judæa to Galilee lay through the country of Samaria (v. 4): He must needs go through Samaria. There was no other way, unless he would have fetched a compass on the other side Jordan, a great way about. We should not go into places of temptation but when we needs must; and then we should not reside in them, but hasten through them. It was happy for Samaria that it lay in Christ's way.

2. His baiting place happened to be at a city of Samaria. The place is described. It was called Sychar; probably the same with Sichem, or Shechem. Shechem yielded the first proselyte that ever came into the church of Israel (Gen. xxxiv. 24), and now it is the first place where the gospel is preached out of the commonwealth of Israel. Abimelech was made king here; it was Jeroboam's royal seat; but the evangelist takes notice of Jacob's interest there, which was more its honour than its crowned heads. Here lay Jacob's ground, the parcel of ground which Jacob gave to his son Joseph. Here was Jacob's well. Being wearied with his journey, he sat thus on the well. We have here our Lord Jesus labouring under the common fatigue of travellers. He was wearied with his journey. Because it was the sixth hour, the time of the heat of the day, therefore he was weary. He was a true man, and subject to the common infirmities of the human nature. He was a poor man, else he might have travelled on horseback or in a chariot. When we are carried easily, let us think on the weariness of our Master. It should seem that he was not of a robust constitution; it should seem, his disciples were not tired, for they went into the town without any difficulty. Bodies of the finest mould are most sensible of fatigue, and can worst bear it. We have him here betaking himself to the common relief of travellers: Being wearied, he sat thus on the well. He sat thus, in an uneasy posture.

Vss. 1-42. CHRIST AND THE WOMAN OF SAMARIA —THE SAMARITANS OF SYCHAR.

2. Jesus baptized not—John being a servant baptized with his own hand; Christ as the Master, "baptizing with the Holy Ghost," administered the outward symbol only through His disciples.

1-4. the Lord knew—not by report, but in the sense of ch. 2:25, for which reason He is here styled "the Lord."

3. left Judea—to avoid persecution, which at that early stage would have marred His work. departed into Galilee—by which time John had been cast into prison (Mark 1:14).

4. must needs go through Samaria—for a geographical reason, no doubt, as it lay straight in his way, but certainly not without a higher design. 5. cometh . . . to—i.e., as far as: for He remained at some distance from it. Sychar—the "Shechem" of the Old Testament, about thirty-four miles from Jerusalem, afterwards called "Neapolis," and now "Nablous."

6-8. wearied . . . sat thus—i.e., "as you might fancy a weary man would"; an instance of the graphic style of St. John [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. In fact, this is perhaps the most human of all the scenes of our Lord's earthly history. We seem to be beside Him, overhearing all that is here recorded, nor could any painting of the scene on canvas, however perfect, do other than lower the conception which this exquisite narrative conveys to the devout and intelligent reader. But with all that is human, how much also of the divine have we here, both blended in one glorious manifestation of the majesty, grace, pity, patience with which "the Lord" imparts light and life to this unlikeliest of strangers, standing midway between Jews and heathens. the sixth hour—noonday, reckoning from 6 A.M. From Song of Solomon 1: 7 we know, as from other sources, that the very flocks "rested at noon." But Jesus, whose maxim

1. Jesus made and baptized. These seem to be quoted as the very words which were brought to the Pharisees; and, from our Lord's conduct after this information, we may take it for granted that they were so irritated that they were determined to seek an occasion to take away His life; in consequence of which, leaving Judea, He withdrew into Galilee.

2. Jesus himself baptized not. See chap. iii. 22.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

The Lord knew that the account of His success was reaching the Pharisees. Quite evidently remarkable success was attending that ministry of Jesus, which was collateral with that of John. That success was evidenced by the fear expressed by John's disciples when they said, "All men go after him." The account of this success was now reaching the Pharisees. On that account, He left Judea. The implication is quite self-evident, that this knowledge was precipitating conflict between himself and the Pharisees. Already we have seen how in connection with His second sign—His first in the Temple, when He cleansed it—that He came into conflict with them. Now news came to these men that the One whose action in the Temple had raised their objection was marvelously successful in His ministry, even more so than John. The Lord knew that this would mean conflict; and on that account He left Judea.

—The Gospel According to John

4. And he must needs go through Samaria. Or, "It was necessary for Him to pass through Samaria." From Jerusalem to Galilee through Samaria, according to Josephus, was three days' journey.

5. A city . . . called Sychar. This city was anciently called Shechem. It seems to have been situated at the foot of Mount Gerizim, in the province of Samaria, on which the temple of the Samaritans was built. After the ruin of Samaria by Salmanezer, Sychar, or Shechem, became the capital of the Samaritans; and it continued so, according to Josephus, Ant. l. xi, c. 8, in the time of Alexander the Great. It was about ten miles from Shiloh, forty from Jerusalem, and fifty-two from Jericho. It probably got the name of Sychar, which signifies "drunken," from the drunkenness of his inhabitants. With this crime the Prophet Isaiah (ch. xxviii. 1, 3, 7-8) solemnly charges the Ephraimites, within whose limits the city stood. This place is remarkable in the Scriptures: (1) As being that where Abram first stopped on his coming from Haran to Canaan; (2) Where God first appeared to that patriarch, and promised to give the land to his seed; (3) The place where Abram first built an altar to the Lord, and called upon His name, Gen. xii. 7. That Jacob gave to his son Joseph. Jacob had bought this field from the children of Hamor, the father of Shechem, for a hundred pieces of silver, or lambs, Gen. xxxiii. 19; and in it he built an altar, which he dedicated to El Elohey Yishrael, the strong God, the covenant God of Israel, v. 19. This, Jacob left as a private or overplus inheritance to Joseph and his children. See Gen. xlviii. 21-22 and Josh. xxiv. 32.

6. The sixth hour. About twelve o'clock; see the notes on chap. i. 30. The time is noted here: (1) To account for Christ's fatigue—He had already travelled several hours. (2) To discourse is reducible to four heads:

1. They discourse concerning the water, v. 7–15.

(1) Notice is taken of the circumstances that gave occasion to this discourse. There comes a woman of Samaria to draw water. She had no servant to be a drawer of water; she would do it herself. See here, How the divine Providence brings about glorious purposes by events which seem to us fortuitous and accidental. His disciples were gone away into the city to buy meat. Christ did not go into the city to eat, but sent his disciples to fetch his meat thither; not because he scrupled eating in a Samaritan city, but, [1] Because he had a good work to do at that well. [2] Because it was more private and retired, more cheap and homely, to have his dinner brought him thither, than to go into the town for it. Christ could eat his dinner as well upon a draw well as in the best inn in the town. He often preached to multitudes yet here he condescends to teach a single person, a woman, a poor woman, a stranger, a Samaritan, to teach his ministers to do likewise, as those that know what a glorious achievement it is to help to save, though but one soul, from death.

(2) Let us observe the particulars of this discourse. Jesus begins with a modest request for a draught of water: Give me to drink. He that for our sakes became poor here becomes a beggar. Christ asked for it because he would draw on further discourse with her. Christ is still begging in his poor members, and a cup of cold water, given to them in his name, shall not lose its reward. The woman quarrels with him because he did not carry on the humour of his own nation (v. 9): How is it? Observe, First, What a mortal feud there was between the Jews and the Samaritans: The Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans. Quarrels about religion are usually the most implacable of all quarrels. They plainly show that however their religion may be true they are not truly religious. Secondly, How ready the woman was to upbraid Christ with the haughtiness and ill nature of the Jewish nation: How is it that thou, being a Jew, askest drink of me? Moderate men of all sides are men wondered at. Two things this woman wonders at: That he should ask this kindness; for it was the pride of the Jews that they would endure any hardship rather than be beholden to a Samaritan. We must, like our Master, put on goodness and kindness, though it should be ever so much the genius of our country, or the humour of our party, to be morose and ill-natured. This woman expected that Christ should be as other Jews were. No rule but has some exceptions. She wonders that he should expect to receive this kindness from her that was a Samaritan. Christ takes this occasion to instruct her in divine things: If thou knewest the gift of God, thou wouldst have asked, v. 10. He waives her objection of the feud between the Jews and Samaritans. Some differences are best healed by avoiding all occasions of entering into dispute about them. Christ will convert this woman, showing her her need of a Saviour. He fills her with an apprehension that she had now an opportunity of gaining that which would be of unspeakable advantage to her. Christ tells her expressly that she had now a season of grace.

[1] He hints to her what she should know, but was ignorant of: If thou knewest the gift of God, who it is that saith, Give me to drink. She saw him to be a Jew, a poor weary traveller; but he would have her know something more concerning him. Jesus Christ is the gift of God, the richest token of God's love to us. It is an unspeakable privilege to have this gift of God proposed and offered to us. It is he that saith, Give me to drink; this gift comes begging to thee.

[2] He hopes concerning her, what she would have done if she had known him: Thou wouldst have asked. Those that would have any benefit by Christ must ask for it. Those that have a right knowledge of Christ will seek to him. Christ knows what they that want the means of knowledge would have done if they had had them.

[3] He assures her what he would have done for her if she had applied to him: "He would have given thee living water." By this living water is meant the Spirit, who is not like the water in the bottom of the well, but like living or running water. The Spirit of grace is as living water. Jesus Christ can and will give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him. The woman cavils at the gracious intimation which Christ gave her (v. 11, 12): Thou hast nothing to draw with; and besides, Art thou greater than our father Jacob? What he spoke figuratively, she took literally; Nicodemus did so too. She does not think him capable of furnishing her with any water: Thou hast nothing to draw with, and the well is deep. But there are those who will not believe his promise, unless the means of the performance of it be visible; as if he could not was, "I must work the works of Him that sent Me while it is day" (ch. 9:4), seems to have denied Himself that repose, at least on this occasion, probably that He might reach this well when He knew the woman would be there. Once there, however, He accepts . . . the grateful ease of a seat on the patriarchal stone. But what music is that which I hear from His lips, "Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest" (Matt. 11:28).

7. Give me to drink—for the heat of a noonday sun had parched His lips. But "in the last, that great day of the feast," Jesus stood and cried, saying, "If any man thirst let him come unto Me and drink" (ch. 7:37).

9-12. How is it that thou—not altogether refusing, yet wondering at so unusual a request from a Jew, as His dress and dialect would at once discover Him to be, to a Samaritan. For . . .—It is this national antipathy that gives point to the parable of the good Samaritan (Luke 10:30-37), and the thankfulness of the Samaritan leper (Luke 17:16, 18).

10. If thou knewest . . .—i.e., 'In Me thou seest only a petitioner to thee but if thou knewest who that Petitioner is, and the Gift that God is giving to men, thou wouldst have changed places with Him, gladly suing of Him living water—nor shouldst thou have sued in vain" (gently reflecting on her for not immediately meeting His request).

account for His thirst—the sun had at this time waxed hot. (3) To account for the disciples going to buy food, v. 8, because this was the ordinary time of dinner among the Jews. See the note referred to above. Dr. Macknight thinks the sixth hour to be the Roman six o'clock in the afternoon.

7. There cometh a woman of Samaria to draw water. That this was the employment of the females, we see in different parts of the Sacred Writings. See Gen. xxiv. 11, etc.; Exod. ii. 16. The Jews say that those who wished to get wives went to the wells where young women were accustomed to come and draw water; and it is supposed that women of ill fame frequented such places also.

9. That thou, being a Jew. Probably the inhabitants of Judea distinguished themselves from those of Samaria by some peculiar mode of dress, and by this the Samaritan woman might have known Christ. But it is likely that our Lord spoke the Galilean dialect, by which we find, from Mark xiv. 70, a Jew of that district might easily be known. The Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans. Perhaps better, "Jews have no communion with Samaritans." These words appear to be added by the Evangelist himself, in explanation of the woman's question. The original word has been variously translated and understood. It has been understood to mean the Jews will be "under no kind of obligation" to the Samaritans—will borrow nothing from them—will not drink out of the same cup or well with them—will not sit down to meals with them, nor eat out of the same vessel—will have no religious connection, no commercial dealings with them. The word "communion," I think, fully expresses the sense of the original; and, being as extensive in its meaning as our word dealings, is capable of as general an interpretation. The deadly hatred that subsisted between these two nations is known to all. The Jews cursed them, and believed them to be accursed. Their most merciful wish to the Samaritans was that they might have no part in the resurrection; or, in other words, that they might be annihilated.

10. If thou knewest the gift of God. "Free gift." A gift is anything that is given for which no equivalent has been or is to be returned; a "free gift" is that which has been given without asking or entreaty. Such a gift of kindness was Jesus Christ to the world, chap. iii. 16; and through Him comes the gift of the Spirit, which those who believe on His name were to receive. Living water. By this expression, which was common to the inhabitants both of the East and of the West, is always meant "spring water," in opposition to dead, stagnant water contained in ponds, pools, tanks, or cisterns; and what our Lord means by it is evidently the Holy Spirit, as may be seen from chap. vii. 38-39. As water quenches the thirst, refreshes and invigorates the body, purifies things defiled, and renders the earth fruitful, so it is an apt emblem of the gift of the Holy Ghost, which so satisfies the souls that receive it that they thirst no more for earthly good; it purifies also from all spiritual defilement, on which account it is emphatically styled the Holy Spirit; and it makes those who receive it fruitful in every good word and work.

11. Thou hast nothing to draw with. "Thou hast no bucket." Good water is not plentiful in the East; and travellers are often obliged to carry leathern bottles or buckets with them, and a line also, to let them down into the deep wells, in order to draw up water. If the well was in our Lord's time, as it was found by draw water without our buckets. She asks scornfully, "Whence hast thou this living water? I see not whence thou canst have it." The fountain of life is hid with Christ. Christ has enough for us, though we see not whence he has it. She does not think it possible that he should furnish her with any better water, Art thou greater than our father Jacob, who gave us the well?

[4] We will suppose the tradition true, that Jacob himself, and his children, and cattle, did drink of this well. And we may observe from it, the power and providence of God, in the continuance of the fountains of water from generation to generation.

[5] Yet, allowing that to be true, she was out in several things. In calling Jacob father. What authority had the Samaritans to reckon themselves of the seed of Jacob? She is out in claiming this well as Jacob's gift. But thus we are apt to call the messengers of God's gifts the donors of them, and to look so much at the hands they pass through as to forget the hand they come from. She was out in speaking of Christ as not worthy to be compared with our father Jacob. An over-fond veneration for antiquity makes God's graces, in the good people of our own day, to be slighted. Christ makes it out that the living water he had to give was far better than that of Jacob's well, v. 13, 14. Christ did not cast her off, but encouraged her. He shows her that the water of Jacob's well yielded but a transient satisfaction: "Whoso drinketh of this water shall thirst again. It is no better than other water; it will quench the present thirst, but the thirst will return." This intimates, a. The infirmities of our bodies in this present state; they are ever craving. Life is a fire, a lamp, which will soon go out, without continual supplies of fuel and oil. b. The imperfections of all our comforts in this world; they are not lasting. Yesterday's meat and drink will not do to-day's work. But the living waters he would give should yield a lasting satisfaction and bliss, v. 14. Whoever partakes of the Spirit of grace,

(a) He shall never thirst. A desiring thirst he has, nothing more than God, still more and more of God; but not a despairing thirst.

(b) He shall never thirst, because this water that Christ gives shall be in him a well of water. He can never be reduced to extremity that has in himself a fountain of supply and satisfaction, ever ready, for it shall be in him. He needs not sneak to the world for comfort. Believers have in them a well of water, overflowing, ever flowing. It is springing up, ever in motion. If good truths stagnate in our souls, like standing water, they do not answer the end of our receiving them. It is springing up unto everlasting life, which intimates the aims of gracious actings. Spiritual life springs up towards its own perfection in eternal life. It will continue springing up till it come to perfection, eternal life at last. And now is not this water better than that of Jacob's well? The woman begs of him to give her some of this water (v. 15): Give me this water, that I thirst not. Some think that she speaks tauntingly, and ridicules what Christ had said as mere stuff. "A rare invention: it will save me a great deal of pain if I thirst not, and a great deal of pains if I never come hither to draw." Others think that it was a well-meant but weak and ignorant desire. Whatever it be, let me have it. Ease, or saving of labour, is a valuable good to poor labouring people. Even those that are weak and ignorant may yet have some faint and fluctuating desires towards Christ and his gifts.

2. The next subject of discourse with this woman is concerning her husband, v. 16–18. It was not to let fall the discourse of the water of life that Christ started this, but it was with a gracious design. Waiving the discourse about the living water, he sets himself to awaken her conscience, and then she would more easily apprehend the remedy by grace. And this is the method of dealing with souls; they must first be made weary and heavy-laden under the burden of sin, and then brought to Christ for rest. This is the course of spiritual physic.

(1) How discreetly and decently Christ introduces this discourse (v. 16): Go, call thy husband, and come hither. The order Christ gave her had a very good colour: "Call thy husband, that he may teach thee, and help thee to understand these things. Call thy husband, that he may learn with thee: that then you may be heirs together of the grace of life." As it had a good colour, so it had a good design; for hence he would take occasion to call her sin to remembrance. There is need of art and prudence in giving reproofs.

(2) How industriously the woman seeks to evade the conviction, and yet insensibly convicts herself. She said, I have no husband.

(3) How closely our Lord Jesus brings home the

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

12. Art thou greater . . .—already perceiving in this Stranger a claim to some mysterious greatness. our father Jacob—for when it went well with the Jews, they claimed kindred with them, as being descended from Joseph; but when misfortunes befell the Jews, they disowned all connection with them [JOSEPHUS, 9. 14, 3].

14. thirst again . . . never thirst . . .—The contrast here is fundamental and all comprehensive. "This water" plainly means 'this natural water and all satisfactions of a like earthly and perishable nature.' Coming to us from without, and reaching only the superficial parts of our nature, they are soon spent, and need to be anew supplied as much as if we had never experienced them before, while the deeper wants of our being are not reached by them at all; whereas the "water" that Christ gives—spiritual life—is struck out of the very depths of our being, making the soul not a cistern, for holding water poured into it from without, but a fountain (the word had been better so rendered, to distinguish it from the word rendered "well" in vs. 11), springing, gushing, bubbling up and flowing forth within us, ever fresh, ever living. The indwelling of the Holy Ghost as the Spirit of Christ is the secret of this life with all its enduring energies and satisfactions, as is expressly said (ch. 7:37-39). "Never thirsting," then, means simply that such souls have the supplies at home. into everlasting life—carrying the thoughts up from the eternal freshness and vitality of these waters to the great ocean in which they have their confluence. "Thither may I arrive!" [BENGEL].

15-18. give me this water . . .—This is not obtuseness—that is giving way—it expresses a wondering desire after she scarce knew what from this mysterious Stranger.

16. call thy husband—now proceeding to arouse her slumbering conscience by laying bare the guilty life she was leading, and by the minute details which that life furnished, not only bringing her sin vividly up before her, but preparing her to receive in His true character that wonderful Stranger to whom her whole life, in its minutest particulars, evidently lay open.

ADAM CLARKE

Mr. Maundrell, thirty-five yards deep, it would require a considerable line to reach it; and with such it is not likely that even the disciples of our Lord were provided. The woman might well say, The well is deep, and thou hast nothing to draw with . . . whence then hast thou that living water?

12. Our father Jacob. The ancient Samaritans were undoubtedly the descendants of Jacob, for they were the ten tribes that revolted in the reign of Rehoboam. But those in our Lord's time were not genuine Israelites, but a corrupted race, sprung from a mixture of different nations sent thither by Salmanezer, king of the Assyrians. See 2 Kings xvii.

14. Springing up into everlasting life. On this account he can never thirst; for how can he lack water who has in himself a living, eternal spring?

15. Give me this water. She did not as yet comprehend our Lord's meaning; but her curiosity was much excited, and this was the design of our Lord, that He might have her mind properly prepared to receive the great truths which He was about to announce.

16. Call thy husband. Our Lord appears to have spoken these words for two purposes: (1) To make the woman consider her own state; (2) To show her that He knew her heart and the secret actions of her life, and was therefore well qualified to teach her heavenly truths.

MATTHEW HENRY

conviction to her conscience. It is probable that he said more than is here recorded, for she thought that he told her all that ever she did (v. 29). A surprising narrative of her past conversation: Thou hast had five husbands. A severe reproof of her present state of life: He whom thou now hast is not thy husband. So that, in short, she lived in adultery. Yet observe how mildly Christ tells her of it; He with whom thou livest is not thy husband; and then leaves it to her own conscience to say the rest. Yet in this he puts a better construction than it would well bear upon what she said: Thou hast well said I have no husband; and again, In that saidst thou truly. What she intended as a denial of the fact he favourably interpreted as a confession of the fault. Those who would win souls should make the best of them, whereby they may hope to work upon their good-nature; for, if they make the worst of them, they certainly exasperate their ill-nature.

3. The next subject of discourse with this woman is concerning the place of worship, v. 19–24.

(1) A case of conscience concerning the place of worship, v. 19, 20.

[1] The inducement she had to put this case: Sir, I perceive that thou art a prophet. She does not deny the truth of what he had charged her with, nor is she put into a passion by it, as many are when they are touched in a sore place, but (which is a rare thing) can bear to be told of a fault. She goes further: First, She speaks respectfully to him, calls him Sir. This was the effect of Christ's meekness in reproving her; he gave her no ill language, and then she gave him none. Secondly, She acknowledges him to be a prophet. Thirdly, She desires some further instruction from him.

[2] The case itself that she propounded concerning the place of religious worship in public. She knew she must worship God, and desired to do it aright; and therefore, meeting with a prophet, begs his direction. It was agreed between the Jews and the Samaritans that God is to be worshipped (even those who were such fools as to worship false gods were not such brutes as to worship none). But the matter in variance was where they should worship God. Observe how she states the case:

As for the Samaritans: Our fathers worshipped in this mountain; there the Samaritan temple was built by Sanballat. Whatever the temple was the place was holy; it was mount Gerizim, the mount on which the blessings were pronounced. It might plead prescription: Our fathers worshipped here. She thinks they have antiquity, tradition, and succession, on their side. As to the Jews: You say that in Jerusalem is the place where men ought to worship. The Samaritans governed themselves by the five books of Moses. Now, though they found frequent mention there of the place God would choose, yet they did not find it named there; and therefore thought themselves at liberty to set up another place.

(2) Christ's answer to this case of conscience, v. 21, &c. He puts a slight upon the question concerning the place of worship (v. 21): "Woman, believe me; that which thou hast been taught to lay so much weight on shall be set aside as a thing indifferent." The hour comes when you shall neither in this mountain nor yet at Jerusalem worship the Father. A period shall be put to all niceness and all differences about the place of worship. It shall be a thing perfectly indifferent whether in either of these places or any other men worship God, for they shall not be tied to any place; neither here nor there, but both, and anywhere, and everywhere. He lays a stress upon other things. When he made so light of the place of worship he did not intend to lessen our concern about the thing itself. As to the present state of the controversy, he determines against the Samaritan worship, v. 22. The Samaritans were certainly in the wrong, because they were out in the object of their worship. But you worship you know not what. Ignorance is so far from being the mother of devotion that it is the murderer of it. That the Jews were certainly in the right. "We know what we worship. We go upon sure grounds in our worship." Those who by the scriptures have obtained some knowledge of God may worship him comfortably to themselves, and acceptably to him, for they know what they worship. Worship may be true where yet it is not pure and entire. Our Lord Jesus was pleased to reckon himself among the worshippers of God: We worship. Let not the greatest of men think the worship of God below them, when the Son of God himself did not. Salvation is of the Jews; and therefore they know what they worship, and what grounds they go upon in their worship. The author of eternal salvation comes of the Jews, and is sent first to bless them. The means of eternal salvation are afforded to them. The word of salvation was of the Jews. Having shown

19, 20. Sir I perceive . . .—Seeing herself all revealed, does she now break down and ask what hopes there might be for one so guilty? Nay, her convictions have not reached that point yet. She ingeniously shifts the subject from a personal to a public question. It is not, "Alas, what a wicked life am I leading!" but "Lo, what a wonderful prophet I got into conversation with! He will be able to settle that interminable dispute between us and the Jews. Sir, you must know all about such matters—our fathers hold to this mountain here," pointing to Gerizim in Samaria, "as the divinely consecrated place of worship, but ye Jews say that Jerusalem is the proper place—which of us is right?" How slowly does the human heart submit to thorough humiliation! (Compare the prodigal; see on Luke 15:15). Doubtless our Lord saw through the fetch; but does He say, "That question is not the point just now, but have you been living in the way described, yea or nay? Till this is disposed of I cannot be drawn into theological controversies." The Prince of preachers takes another method: He humors the poor woman, letting her take her own way, allowing her to lead while He follows—but thus only the more effectually gaining His object. He answers her question, pours light into her mind on the spirituality of all true worship, as of its glorious Object, and so brings her insensibly to the point at which He could disclose to her wondering mind whom she was all the while speaking to. 21-24. Woman . . . Here are three weighty pieces of information: (1) The point raised will very soon cease to be of any moment, for a total change of dispensation is about to come over the Church. (2) The Samaritans are wrong, not only as to the place, but the whole grounds and nature of their worship, while in all these respects the truth lies with the Jews. (3) As God is a Spirit, so He both invites and demands a spiritual worship, and already all is in preparation for a spiritual economy, more in harmony with the true nature of acceptable service than the ceremonial worship by consecrated persons, place, and times, which God for a time has seen meet to keep up till fulness of the time should come. neither in this mountain nor yet at Jerusalem—i.e., exclusively (Mal. 1:11; I Tim. 2:8). worship the Father—She had talked simply of "worship"; our Lord brings up before her the great OBJECT of all acceptable worship—"THE FATHER."

22. Ye worship ye know not what—without any revealed authority, and so very much in the dark. In this sense, the Jews knew what they were about. But the most glorious thing here is the reason assigned, "For salvation is of the Jews," intimating to her that Salvation was not a thing left to be reached by any one who might vaguely desire it of a God of mercy, but something that had been revealed, prepared, deposited with a particular people, and must be sought in connection with, and as issuing from them; and that people "the Jews."

ADAM CLARKE

18. Thou hast had five husbands. It is not clear that this woman was a prostitute. She might have been legally married to those five, and might have been divorced through some misbehavior of her own, not amounting to adultery; for the adulteress was to be put to death, by both the Jewish and the Samaritan law, not divorced. Or she might have been cast off through some caprice of her husband; for, in the time of our Lord, divorces were very common among the Jews, so that a man put away his wife for any fault. See the note on Matt. v. 31. He whom thou now hast is not thy husband. Bishop Pearce would translate this clause in the following manner: "There is no husband whom thou now hast"—or, less literally, "Thou hast no husband now." Probably the meaning is, Thou art contracted to another, but not yet brought home; therefore he is not yet thy husband.

19. I perceive that thou art a prophet. And therefore thought Him well qualified to decide the grand question in dispute between the Jews and the Samaritans; but she did not perceive Him to be the Messiah.

20. Worshipped in this mountain. Probably pointing to Mount Gerizim, at the foot of which Sychar was situated. The patriarchs had worshipped here—Jacob builded an altar on this mountain, and worshipped the true God; see Gen. xxii. 2; xxxiii. 20. Thus she could say, Our fathers worshipped in this mountain. On this mountain Sanballat had built them a temple, about 332 years before our Lord's incarnation. See Joseph., Antiq. xi, c. viii, s. 4, and 2 Macc. vi. 2.

21. The hour cometh. The time was now at hand in which the spiritual worship of God was about to be established in the earth, and all the Jewish rites and ceremonies entirely abolished. Worship the Father. This epithet shows the mild, benignant, and tender nature of the gospel dispensation. Men are called to worship their Heavenly Father, and to consider themselves as His children. In reference to this, our Lord's prayer begins, Our Father which art in heaven. See v. 23.

22. Ye worship ye know not what. The Samaritans believed in the same God with the Jews; but, as they rejected all the prophetical writings, they had but an imperfect knowledge of the Deity. Besides, as they incorporated the worship of idols with His worship, they might be justly said to worship Him whom they did not properly know. See the account of their motley worship, 2 Kings xvii. 26-34. But after Sanballat had built the temple on Mount Gerizim, the idolatrous worship of the Cutheans and Sepharvites, etc., was entirely laid aside, the same religious service being performed in the Samaritan temple which was performed in that at Jerusalem. We know what we worship. We Jews acknowledge all the attributes of His nature, and offer to Him only the sacrifices prescribed in the law. Salvation is of the Jews. "Salvation is from the Jews." Salvation seems here to mean the Saviour, the Messiah, as it does that the place is indifferent, he comes to show what is necessary and essential—that we worship God in spirit and in truth, v. 23, 24. The stress is upon the state of mind in which we worship him. It concerns us to be right, not only in the object of our worship, but in the manner of it; and it is this which Christ here instructs us in.

[1] The revolution which should introduce this change: The hour cometh, and now is. The perfect day is coming, and now it dawns.

[2]. The blessed change itself. True worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth. As creatures, we worship the Father of all: as Christians, we worship the Father of our Lord Jesus. Now the change shall be in the nature of the worship. Christians shall worship God, not in the ceremonial observances of the Mosaic institution, but in spiritual ordinances; in the temper and disposition of the worshippers. All should, and they will, worship God in spirit and in truth. It is spoken of (v. 23) as their character, and (v. 24) as their duty. It is required of all that worship God that they worship him in spirit and in truth. We must worship God in spirit, Phil. iii. 3. We must depend upon God's Spirit for strength and assistance. We must worship him with fixedness of thought and a flame of affection, with all that is within us. In truth, that is, in sincerity. We must mind the power more than the form. God must be thus worshipped, because they only are accounted the true worshippers. The gospel erects a spiritual way of worship, so that the professors of the gospel do not live up to gospel light and laws, if they do not worship God in spirit and in truth. For the Father seeketh such worshippers of him. Such worshippers are very rare. The gate of spiritual worshipping is strait. Such worship is necessary, and what the God of heaven insists upon. God is greatly well pleased with and graciously accepts such worship and such worshippers. His seeking such worshippers implies his making them such. Christ came to declare God to us (ch. i. 18), and this he has declared concerning him; he declared it to this poor Samaritan woman, for the meanest are concerned to know God. God is a spirit. It is easier to say what God is not than what he is. The spirituality of the divine nature is a very good reason for the spirituality of divine worship. If we do not worship God, who is a spirit, in the spirit, we miss the end of worship.

4. The last subject of discourse with this woman is concerning the Messiah, v. 25, 26.

(1) The faith of the woman, by which she expected the Messiah: I know that Messias cometh—and he will tell us all things. She had nothing to object against what Christ had said; his discourse was what might become the Messiah; but from him she would receive it, and in the meantime she thinks it best to suspend her belief. Thus many have no heart to the price in their hand, because they think they have a better in their eye. Whom she expects: I know that Messias cometh. The Jews and Samaritans agreed in the expectation of the Messiah and his kingdom. Those who knew least knew this, that Messias was to come. Messias, who is called Christ. The evangelist, though he retains the Hebrew word Messias, takes care to render it by a Greek word of the same signification, who is called Christ—Anointed. What she expects from him: "He will tell us all things. He will tell us the mind of God fully and clearly, and keep back nothing." Now this implies an acknowledgment, First, Of the imperfection of the discovery they now had of the divine will, and the rule they had of the divine worship. Secondly, Of the sufficiency of the Messiah to make this change: "He will tell us all things which we want to know, and about which we wrangle in the dark."

(2) The favour of our Lord Jesus in making himself known to her: I that speak to thee am he, v. 26. Christ did never make himself known so expressly to any as he did here to this poor Samaritan, and to the blind man (ch. ix. 37). Christ would thus put an honour upon such as were poor and despised. This woman had never had any opportunity of seeing Christ's miracles, which were then the ordinary method of conviction. God can make the light of grace shine into the heart even where he doth not make the light of the gospel shine in the face. This woman was better prepared to receive such a discovery than others were. Christ will manifest himself to those who with an honest humble heart desire to be acquainted with him: I that speak to thee am he. See here, How near Jesus Christ was to her, when she knew not who he was, Gen. xxviii. 16. Many are lamenting Christ's absence, and longing for his presence, when at the same time he is speaking to them. Christ makes himself known to us by speaking to us: I that speak unto thee, I am he.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

23. hour cometh, and now is—evidently meaning her to understand that this new economy was in some sense being set up while He was talking to her, a sense which would in a few minutes so far appear, when He told her plainly He was the Christ.

25, 26. I know Messias cometh ... when He is come ...—If we take our Lord's immediate disclosure of Himself, in answer to this, as the proper key to its meaning to His ear, we can hardly doubt that the woman was already all but prepared for even this startling announcement, which indeed she seems (from vs. 29) to have already begun to suspect by His revealing her to herself. Thus quickly, under so matchless a Teacher, was she brought up from her sunken condition to a frame of mind and heart capable of the noblest revelations. tell us all things—an expectation founded probably on Deuteronomy 18:15.

26. I that speak .. am he—He scarce ever said anything like this to His own people, the Jews. He had magnified them to the woman, and yet to themselves He is to the last far more reserved than to her—proving rather than plainly telling them He was the Christ. But what would not have been safe among them was safe enough with her, whose simplicity at this stage of the conversation appears from the sequel to have become perfect. What now will the woman say? We listen, the scene has changed, a new party arrives, the disciples have been to Sychar, at some distance, to buy bread, and on their return are astonished at the company their Lord has been holding in their absence.

in Luke ii. 30; Acts iv. 12; and so the woman appears to have understood it, v. 25. The Messiah was to spring from the Jews—from them, the preaching of the gospel and the knowledge of the truth were to go to all the nations of the world. It was to the Jews that the promises were made; and it was in their prophetic Scriptures, which the Samaritans rejected, that Jesus Christ was proclaimed and described. See Isa. xi. 3.

23. The true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit. The worship of the Samaritans was a defective worship—they did not receive the prophetical writings. That of the Jews was a carnal worship, dealing only in the letter, and referring to the spirit and design, which were at a distance, by types and ceremonies.

24. God is a Spirit. This is one of the first, the greatest, the most sublime, and necessary truths in the compass of nature! There is a God, the Cause of all things—the Fountain of all perfection—without parts or dimensions, for He is eternal—filling the heavens and the earth—pervading, governing, and upholding all things, for He is an infinite Spirit! A man worships God in spirit when, under the influence of the Holy Ghost, he brings all his affections, appetites, and desires to the throne of God; and he worships Him in truth when every purpose and passion of his heart, and when every act of his religious worship, is guided and regulated by the word of God.

25. I know that Messias cometh. Though they did not receive the prophetic writings, yet the tradition of the advent of the Messiah, which was common among the Jews, and founded on promises contained even in the books of Moses, was generally received among the Samaritans also. Which is called Christ. This appears to be the Evangelist's explanation of the Hebrew word, according to his custom; chap. i. 38, 41-42; ix. 7, etc. For we cannot suppose that the woman understood Greek, so as to translate the Hebrew word to our Lord; or that she should suppose that a person who was a Jew, v. 9, and a prohpet, v. 19, could stand in need of this interpretation. He will tell us all things. Relative to the nature of God, the nature of His worship, and the proper place to adore Him in.

26. Jesus saith unto her, I . . . am he. Our Lord never spoke in such direct terms concerning himself to His own countrymen; nor even to His own disciples, till a little before His death. The reason given by Bishop Pearce is the following: The woman being alone when Jesus said it and being a Samaritan, He had no reason to apprehend that the Samaritans, if they knew His claim, would disturb His ministry before the time of His suffering came—which seems to have been the reason why He concealed it so long from His own countrymen.

Verses 27–42

I. The interruption given to this discourse by the disciples' coming. Just when the discourse was brought to a head, then came the disciples. They wondered at Christ's converse with this woman, marvelled that he talked thus earnestly with a woman, a strange woman alone, especially with a Samaritan woman. They wondered he should condescend to talk with such a poor contemptible woman, forgetting what despicable men they themselves were when Christ first called them. Yet they acquiesced in it; they knew it was for some good reason, and therefore none of them asked, What seekest thou? or, Why talkest thou with her? All is well which Jesus Christ saith and doeth. Whatever they thought, they said nothing.

II. The notice which the woman gave to her neighbours, v. 28, 29. Observe here,

1. How she forgot her errand to the well, v. 28. She went her way. She withdrew, in civility to Christ, that he might have leisure to eat his dinner. She delighted in his discourse, but would not be rude. She supposed that Jesus would go forward in his journey, and therefore hastened to tell her neighbours. See how she improved time. When opportunities of getting good cease we should seek opportunities of doing good. Notice is taken of her leaving her water-pot or pail. She left it in kindness to Christ, that he might have water to drink with his dinner. She left it that she might make the more haste into the city. She left her water-pot, as one careless of it, being wholly taken up with better things.

2. How she minded her errand to the town. She went into the city, and said to the men, to every man she met in the streets: Come, see a man who told me all things that ever I did. Is not this the Christ? Observe,

(1) How solicitous she was to have her friends and neighbours acquainted with Christ. When she had found that treasure, she called together her friends and neighbours (as Luke xv. 9), not only to rejoice with her, but to share with her. Has he done us the honour to make himself known to us? Let us do him the honour to make him known to others; nor can we do ourselves a greater honour. This woman becomes an apostle. I have most opportunity, and therefore lie under the greatest obligations, to do good to those that live near me.

(2) How fair and ingenuous she was in the notice she gave them concerning this stranger. She tells them plainly what induced her to admire him: He has told me all things that ever I did. No more is recorded than what he told her of her husbands. He told her that which none knew but God and her own conscience. Two things affected her: First, the extent of his knowledge. We ourselves cannot tell all things that ever we did. Secondly, The power of his word. This made a great impression upon her, that he told her her secret sins. "Come see a man that has told me of my sins." She fastens upon that part of Christ's discourse which one would think she would have been most shy of repeating. That knowledge of Christ into which we are led by the conviction of sin and humiliation is most likely to be sound and saving. She invites them to come and see him. Not barely, "Come and look upon him" (she does not invite them to him as a show), but "Come and converse with him; come and hear his wisdom, as I have done." She would not undertake to manage the arguments which had convinced her, in such a manner as to convince others; all that see the evidence of truth themselves are not able to make others see it. Jesus was now at the town's end. "Now come see him." Shall we not go over the threshold to see him whose day prophets and kings desired to see? She resolves to appeal to themselves, Is this not the Christ? She does not peremptorily say, "He is the Messiah." She will not impose her faith upon them, but only propose it to them. By such fair but forcible appeals as these men's judgments and consciences are sometimes taken hold of ere they are aware.

(3) What success she had in this invitation: They went out of the city, and came to him, v. 30. They came unto him; did not send for him into the city to them, they went out to him. Those that would know Christ must meet him where he records his name.

III. Christ's discourse with his disciples while the woman was absent, v. 31–38. See how industrious our Lord Jesus was to redeem time, to husband every minute of it. It were well if we could thus gather up the fragments of time. Two things are observable in this discourse:

1. How Christ expresses the delight which he himself had in his work. Now with this work we here find him wholly taken up. For,

(1) He neglected his meat and drink for his work. When he sat down upon the well, he was weary, and

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

27. marvelled that he talked with the woman—It never probably occurred to them to marvel that He talked with themselves; yet in His eye, as the sequel shows, He was quite as nobly employed. How poor, if not false, are many of our most plausible estimates! no man said . . . What? . . . Why?—awed by the spectacle, and thinking there must be something under it. 28-30. left her water-pot—How exquisitely natural! The presence of strangers made her feel that it was time for her to withdraw, and He who knew what was in her heart, and what she was going to the city to do, let her go without exchanging a word with her in the hearing of others. Their interview was too sacred, and the effect on the woman too overpowering (not to speak of His own deep emotion) to allow of its being continued. But this one artless touch—that she "left her water-pot"—speaks volumes. The living water was already beginning to spring up within her; she found that man doth not live by bread nor by water only, and that there was a water of wondrous virtue that raised people above meat and drink, and the vessels that held them, and all human things. In short, she was transported, forgot everything but One, and her heart running over with the tale she had to tell, she hastens home and pours it out.

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

Notice that the woman leaves her waterpot. The Spirit of God thought well to record this circumstance, and therefore I think there must be a measure of teaching in it. She left her waterpot, first, for speed. Perhaps you thought it was an ordinary English waterpot such as you water the garden with: possibly you so picture it, rose and all. Nothing of the sort. It was a big jar, or large pitcher of earthenware, she had to carry on her head or her shoulder, quite a load for her, and so she left it that she might run the more quickly. She was a wise woman to leave her waterpot when she wanted to move rapidly. Others think she did so because she was so taken up with her errand that she forgot her pitcher. It is blessed forgetfulness which comes of absorption in a holy design. When the King's business requireth haste, it is wise to leave behind everything that would hinder.

—The Treasury of the New Testament

29. is not this the Christ—The form of the question (in the Greek) is a distant, modest way of only half insinuating what it seemed hardly fitting for her to affirm; nor does she refer to what He said of Himself, but solely to His disclosure to her of the particulars of her own life.

30. they went out . . .—How different from the Jews! and richly was their openness to conviction rewarded. 31-38. meantime—i.e., while the woman was away.

ADAM CLARKE

27. Came his disciples. From the town, whither they went to buy food, v. 8. Marvelled that he talked with the woman. Because it was contrary to the custom of the Eastern countries; and there are many canons, among the rabbins, against it. To the present time, if a man meet even his own wife in the street, he does not speak to her; and this is done to keep up the appearance of a chastity and temperance of which the Eastern world knows nothing. Yet no man said. They were awed by His majesty, and knew that He must have sufficient reasons to induce Him to act a part to which He was not at all accustomed.

28. Left her waterpot. She was so penetrated with the great truths which Jesus had announced that she forgot her errand to the well, and returned to the city without the water for which she came out!

29. All things that ever I did. The Jews believed that one essential characteristic of the Messiah would be that He should be able to tell the secrets of all hearts. This they believed was predicted, Isa. xi. 2-3.

30. They went out of the city. Such effect had the simple testimony of the woman on their minds. And came unto him. Or "were coming to Him"; for they did not reach Him immediately, all that discourse between Him and His disciples mentioned in vv. 31-39 inclusive having taken place before the people of Sychar got to the well.

needed refreshment; but this opportunity of saving souls made him forget his weariness and hunger. And he minded his food so little that his disciples were forced to invite him to it: They prayed him, Master, eat. It was an instance of their love to him that they invited him; but it was a greater instance of his love to souls that he needed invitation. He minded it so little that they suspected he had had meat brought him in their absence (v. 33): Has any man brought him aught to eat? He had so little appetite for his dinner that they were ready to think he had dined already.

(2) He made his work his meat and drink. The work he had done in instructing the woman, the work he had to do among the Samaritans, this was meat and drink to him. Never did a hungry man, or an epicure, expect a plentiful feast with so much desire, nor feed upon its dainties with so much delight, as our Lord Jesus expected and improved an opportunity of doing good to souls. It was such meat as the disciples knew not of. This may be said of good Christians too, that they have meat to eat which others know not of, joy with which a stranger does not intermeddle. Now this word made them ask, Has any man brought him aught to eat? The reason why his work was his meat and drink was because it was his Father's work, his Father's will: My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, v. 34. The salvation of sinners is the will of God, and the instruction of them in order thereunto is his work. He made this work his business and delight. When his body needed food, his mind was so taken up with this that he forgot both hunger and thirst, both meat and drink. He was earnest and in care to go through it, and to finish his work. He resolved never to quit it, nor lay it down, till he could say, It is finished. Many have zeal to carry them out at first, but not zeal to carry them on to the last.

2. See here how Christ excites his disciples to diligence in their work; they were workers with him, and therefore should be workers like him. The work they had to do was to preach the gospel. Now this work he here compares to harvest work, v. 35–38. Harvest time is busy time; all hands must be then at work. Harvest time is opportunity, a short and limited time, and harvest work is work that must be done then or not at all. Now he here suggests three things to them to quicken them to diligence:

(1) That it was necessary work, and the occasion for it very urgent and pressing (v. 35): You say, It is four months to harvest; but I say, The fields are already white. [A saying concerning the corn-harvest; there are yet four months, and then comes harvest. "You say, for the encouragement of the sower at seed-time, that it will be but four months to the harvest."] God has not only promised us a harvest every year, but has appointed the weeks of harvest; so that we know when to expect it. Christ's saying concerning the gospel harvest: Look, the fields are already white unto the harvest. Here in this place there was harvest work for him to do. They would have him to eat, v. 31. "Eat!" saith he, "I have other work to do, that is more needful; look what crowds of Samaritans are coming that are ready to receive the gospel." People's forwardness to hear the word is a great excitement to ministers' diligence and liveliness in preaching it. There are multitudes as ready to receive the gospel as a field of corn that is fully ripe is ready to be reaped. The fields were now made white to the harvest. It is a great encouragement to us to engage in any work for God, if we understand by the signs of the times that this is the proper season for that work. John Baptist had made ready a people prepared for the Lord. Since he began to preach the kingdom of God every man pressed into it, Luke xvi. 16. This, therefore, was a time to thrust in their sickle. It was necessary to work now. If the corn that is ripe be not reaped, it will shed and be lost. If souls that are under convictions be not helped now, their hopeful beginnings will come to nothing.

(2) That it was profitable and advantageous work, which they themselves would be gainers by (v. 36): "He that reapeth receiveth wages." Christ's reapers never have cause to say they served a hard Master. His work is its own wages. Christ's reapers have fruit: He gathereth fruit unto life eternal; that is, he shall both save himself and those that hear him. This is the comfort of faithful ministers, that their work has a tendency to the eternal salvation of precious souls: They have joy: That he that sows and they that reap may rejoice together. The minister who is the happy instrument of beginning a good work is he that sows; he that is employed to carry it on and perfect it is he that reaps: and both shall rejoice together. The reapers share in the joy of harvest.

(3) That it was easy work, and work that was half done to their hands by those that were gone before

Master, eat—Fatigue and thirst we saw He felt; here is revealed another of our common infirmities to which the Lord was subject—hunger.

32. meat ye know not of—What spirituality of mind! 'I have been eating all the while, and such food as ye dream not of.' What can that be? they ask each other; have any supplies been brought Him in our absence? He knows what they are saying though He hears it not. 34. My meat is . . .—'A Servant here to fulfil a prescribed work, to do and to finish, that is "meat" to Me; and of this, while you were away, I have had My fill.' And of what does He speak thus? Of the condescension, pity, patience, wisdom He had been laying out upon one soul—a very humble woman, and in some respects repulsive too! But He had gained her, and through her was going to gain more, and lay perhaps the foundations of a great work in the country of Samaria; and this filled His whole soul and raised Him above the sense of natural hunger (Matt. 4:4).

35. yet four months, and then harvest—i.e., 'In current speech, ye say thus at this season; but lift up your eyes and look upon those fields in the light of another husbandry, for lo! in that sense, they are even now white to harvest, ready for the sickle.' The simple beauty of this language is only surpassed by the glow of holy emotion in the Redeemer's own soul which it expresses. It refers to the ripeness of these Sycharites for accession to Him, and the joy of this great Lord of the reapers over the anticipated ingathering. Oh, could we but so, "lift up our eyes and look" upon many fields abroad and at home, which to dull sense appear unpromising, as He beheld those of Samaria, what movements, as yet scarce in embryo, and accessions to Christ, as yet seemingly far distant, might we not discern as quite near at hand, and thus, amidst difficulties and discouragements too much for nature to sustain, be cheered—as our Lord Himself was in circumstances far more overwhelming—with "songs in the night!"

36. he that reapeth . . .—As our Lord could not mean that the reaper only, and not the sower, received "wages," in the sense of personal reward for his work, the "wages" here can be no other than the joy of having such a harvest to gather in—the joy of "gathering fruit unto life eternal." rejoice together—The blessed issue of the whole ingathering is the interest alike of the sower as of the reaper; it is no more the fruit of the last operation than of the first; and just as there can be no reaping without previous sowing, so have those servants of Christ, to whom is assigned the pleasant task of merely reaping the spiritual harvest, no work to do, and no joy to taste, that has not been prepared to their hand by the toilsome and often thankless work of their predecessors in the field. The joy, therefore, of the great harvest

31. Master, eat. They knew that He was greatly spent both with hunger and fatigue.

32. I have meat to eat that ye know not of. Our blessed Lord seizes every opportunity to raise the minds of His apostles to heavenly things through the medium of earthly matters.

33. Hath any man brought Him ought to eat? Has He got food in any preternatural way? They could not help remembering the miraculous interventions of divine providence in feeding Elijah by the ravens, at the brook Cherith, 1 Kings xvii. 4-6, and by the ministry of an angel, chap. xix. 5-8, and our Lord's preternatural repast in the wilderness, after His victory over Satan, Matt. iv. 11.

34. My meat is to do the will of him that sent me. In these words our blessed Lord teaches a lesson of zeal and earnestness to His apostles, and to all their successors in the Christian ministry. Let the salvation of souls lie nearer your heart then life itself. Let eating and drinking, labor and rest, reading, thinking, study, prayer, and all things be directed to the accomplishment of this great work.

35. There are yet four months, and then cometh harvest? In Palestine the harvest did not begin till after the Passover, which was fixed on the fourteenth of the month Nisan, which answers to our March, and sometimes extends into April. The barley harvest was the first, after that the wheat; and both were finished by Pentecost. For in the Feast of Pentecost the firstfruits of all the harvest were carried to the Temple and waved before the Lord. See Lev. xxiii. 11. Lift up your eyes, and look on the fields, over which it is likely the Samaritans were then coming in troops, guided by the woman who had already received the light of the gospel of peace. The fields . . . are white already to harvest. Multitudes of Samaritans are coming to believe on Me, and to be saved unto eternal life. Probably they had a kind of white raiment.

36. And he that reapeth receiveth wages. Or, "And already the reaper receiveth wages." By making the word "already" the beginning of this verse, on the authority of some excellent MSS. and versions, a more consistent sense is obtained than from the common arrangement, where "already" terminates the preceding verse.

MATTHEW HENRY

them: One soweth, and another reapeth, v. 37, 38. Moses, and the prophets, and John Baptist, had paved the way to the gospel. I sent you to reap that whereupon you bestowed no labour. This intimates two things concerning the Old Testament ministry: It was very much short of the New Testament ministry. Moses and the prophets sowed, but they could not be said to reap. Their writings have done much more good since they left us than ever their preaching did. It was very serviceable to the New Testament ministry, and made way for it. Had it not been for the seed sown by the prophets, this Samaritan woman could not have said, We know that Messias cometh. This also intimates two things concerning the ministry of the apostles of Christ. It was a fruitful ministry: they were reapers that gathered in a great harvest. It was much facilitated by the writings of the prophets. The prophets sowed in tears, crying out, We have laboured in vain; the apostles reaped in joy, saying, Thanks be to God, who always causeth us to triumph. From the labours of ministers that are dead and gone much good fruit may be reaped by the people that survive them and the ministers that succeed them. See what reason we have to bless God for those that are gone before us. We are entered into their labours.

IV. The good effect which this visit Christ made to the Samaritans had upon them, v. 39–42. See what impressions were made on them,

1. By the woman's testimony concerning Christ; and the testimony no more than this, He told me all that ever I did. And two things they were brought to:

(1) To credit Christ's word (v. 39): Many of the Samaritans of that city believed on him for the saying of the woman. Who they were that believed: Many of the Samaritans, who were not of the house of Israel. Their faith was an earnest of the faith of the Gentiles. Upon what inducement they believed: For the saying of the woman. See here, First, How God is sometimes pleased to use very weak and unlikely instruments for the beginning and carrying on of a good work. Secondly, How great a matter a little fire kindles. Our Saviour, by instructing one poor woman, spread instruction to a whole town. Let not ministers be either careless in their preaching, or discouraged in it, because their hearers are few and mean; for, by doing good to them, good may be conveyed to more. See how good it is to speak experimentally of Christ. Those are most likely to do good that can tell what God has done for their souls.

(2) To court his stay among them (v. 40): When they were come to him they besought him that he would tarry with them. Upon the woman's report, they believed him to be a prophet, and came to him; and, when they saw him, they respected him as a prophet. They begged he would tarry with them that they might testify their respect to him; that they might receive instruction from him. Many would have flocked to one that would tell them their fortune, but these flocked to one that would tell them their faults. The Jews drove him from them: while the Samaritans invited him to them. The proof of the gospel's success is not always according to the probability, nor what is experienced according to what is expected. Christ granted their request. He abode there. When he had an opportunity of doing good, he abode there. We are told what impressions were made upon them by Christ's own word (v. 41, 42), what he said and did there is not related. He said and did that which convinced them that he was the Christ; and the labours of a minister are best told by the good fruit of them. Now their eyes saw him; and the effect was, [1] That their number grew (v. 41): Many more believed. [2] That their faith grew. Those who had been wrought upon by the report of the woman now saw cause to say, Now we believe, not because of thy saying, v. 42. Here are three things in which their faith grew: a. In the matter of it. Upon the testimony of the woman, they believed him to be a prophet; but now that they have conversed with him they believe that he is the Christ, the Anointed One, and that, being the Christ, he is the Saviour of the world. They believed him to be the Saviour not only of the Jews, but of the world, which they hoped would take them in, though Samaritans. b. In the certainty of it; their faith now grew up to a full assurance: We know that this is indeed the Christ. c. In the ground of it: Now we believe, not because of thy saying, for we have heard him ourselves. They had before believed for her saying: "Now we believe because we have heard him ourselves. We are abundantly satisfied and assured that this is the Christ." In this instance we may see how faith comes by hearing. Faith comes to the birth by hearing the report of men. The instructions of parents and preachers recommend the doctrine of Christ to our acquaintance. Faith comes festivity will be the common joy of all who have taken any part in the work from the first operation to the last. (See Deut. 16:11, 14; Ps. 126:6; Isa. 9:3.) What encouragement is here for those "fishers of men" who "have toiled all the night" of their official life, and, to human appearance, "have taken nothing!" 38. I sent you . . .—The I is emphatic—I, the Lord of the whole harvest: "sent you," points to their past appointment to the apostleship, though it has reference only to their future discharge of it, for they had nothing to do with the present ingathering of the Sycharites. ye bestowed no labour—meaning that much of their future success would arise from the preparation already made for them. (See on vs. 42.) others laboured—Referring to the Old Testament laborers, the Baptist, and by implication Himself, though He studiously keeps this in the background, that the line of distinction between Himself and all His servants might not be lost sight of. "Christ represents Himself as the Husbandman [rather the Lord of the laborers], who has the direction both of the sowing and of the harvest, who commissions all the agents—those of the Old Testament as well as of the New—and therefore does not stand on a level with either the sowers or the reapers" [OLSHAUSEN].

39-42. many . . . believed . . .—The truth of vs. 35 begins to appear. These Samaritans were the foundation of the Church afterwards built up there. No miracle appears to have been wrought there [but unparalleled supernatural knowledge displayed]: "we have heard Him ourselves" sufficed to raise their faith to a point never attained by the Jews, and hardly as yet by the disciples—that He was "the Saviour of the world" [ALFORD]. "This incident is further remarkable as a rare instance of the Lord's ministry producing an awakening on a large scale" [OLSHAUSEN].

40. abode two days—Two precious days, surely, to the Redeemer Himself! Unsought, He had come to His own, yet His own received Him not: now those who were not His own had come to Him, been won by Him, and invited Him to their town that others might share with them in the benefit of His wonderful ministry. Here, then, would He solace His already wounded spirit and have in this outfield village triumph of His grace, a sublime foretaste of the inbringing of the whole Gentile world into the Church.

ADAM CLARKE

37. Herein is that saying true, One soweth, and another reapeth. Or, "One is the sower, and another is the reaper." In what respects you, of this business, this proverb is true—One is the sower; for I have sent you to reap, to preach My gospel and gain converts, where you have not labored—have not sown the first seeds of eternal life. Others have labored—the patriarchs and prophets—and you are entered into the fruits of their labors.

39. Many of the Samaritans . . . believed on him for the saying of the woman. This woman was the first apostle of Christ in Samaria! She went and told her fellow citizens that the Messiah was come, and gave for proof that He had told her the most secret things she had ever done; see on v. 29. This word, which is twice repeated, in v. 29 and here, strongly intimates that a more particular conversation had taken place between our Lord and the Samaritan woman than what is here related.

40. He abode there two days. We are not told that He wrought any miracles among them. This does not appear to have been necessary; they were a simplehearted, teachable people, and they credited Him on the evidence of His own eternal truth. Why are not miracles wrought now? Miracles were only for the establishment of the doctrines of Christianity where they were first preached. We profess to believe these doctrines; therefore, to us, miracles would be useless. Where the doctrine is credited, no miracle is necessary; the Samaritans believed, and no miracle was wrought among them, for the simple reason that it was not necessary.

42. We have heard him ourselves. On seeing and hearing our Lord, the faith of those who had already believed on the woman's testimony was abundantly confirmed; and, besides those, many others believed who had not heard the woman speak. This is indeed the Christ. The promised Messiah. The Saviour of the world. Not of the Jews only, but of the Samaritans, and of the whole Gentile world.

MATTHEW HENRY

to its growth, by hearing the testimony of Christ himself; and this goes further, and recommends his doctrine to our acceptance. We were induced to look into the scriptures by the saying of those who told us that in them they had found eternal life; now we believe, not for their saying, but because we have searched them ourselves: and our faith stands not in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God.

Thus was the seed of the gospel sown in Samaria.

I. Christ's coming into Galilee, v. 43. After two days he left them because he must preach to other cities, Luke iv. 43. He went into Galilee.

1. Whither Christ went; into Galilee, but not to Nazareth, which was strictly his own country. He went among the villages, but declined going to Nazareth, for a reason here given, which Jesus himself testified: That a prophet has no honour in his own country. The honour due to the Lord's prophets has very often been denied them. This due honour is most frequently denied them in their own country. Christ's near kinsmen spoke most slightly of him, ch. vii. 5. Men's pride and envy make them scorn to be instructed by those who once were their schoolfellows and play-fellows. It is just with God to deny his gospel to those that despise the ministers of it. They that mock the messengers forfeit the benefit of the message.

2. What entertainment he met with among the Galileans in the country (v. 45): They received him. Christ and his gospel are not sent in vain; if they have not honour with some, they shall have with others. Now the reason given why these Galileans were so ready to receive Christ is because they had seen the miracles he did at Jerusalem, v. 45. They went up to Jerusalem at the feast, the feast of the passover. They went up to the feast, and there they became acquainted with Christ. They that are diligent and constant in attending on public ordinances some time or other meet with more spiritual benefit than they expect. At Jerusalem they saw Christ's miracles. The miracles were wrought for the benefit of those at Jerusalem; yet the Galileans got more advantage by them than they did for whom they were chiefly designed. Thus the word preached to a mixed multitude may perhaps edify occasional hearers more than the constant auditory.

3. What city he went to. He chose to go to Cana of Galilee, where he had made the water wine (v. 46). The evangelist mentions this miracle here to teach us to keep in remembrance what we have seen of the works of Christ.

II. His curing the nobleman's son. This story is not recorded by any other of the evangelists.

1. Who the petitioner was, and who the patient: the petitioner was a nobleman; the patient was his son: There was a certain nobleman. The father a nobleman and yet the son sick; for dignities and titles of honour will be no security from the assaults of sickness and death. It was fifteen miles from Capernaum to Cana, where Christ now was; yet this affliction in his family sent him so far to Christ.

2. How the petitioner made his application to the physician. He went to him himself, and besought him to come and heal his son, v. 47. See here, His tender affection to his son, that when he was sick he would spare no pains to get help for him. His great respect to our Lord Jesus, that he would come himself to wait upon him, and that he besought him, when, as a man in authority, he might have ordered his attendance. The greatest men, when they come to God, must become beggars. As to the errand he came upon, we may observe a mixture in his faith. There was sincerity in it; he did believe that Christ could heal his son. Yet there was infirmity in his faith; he thought he could not heal him at a distance, and therefore he besought him that he would come down and heal him. We are encouraged to pray, but we are not allowed to prescribe: Lord, heal me; but, whether with a word or a touch, thy will be done.

3. The gentle rebuke he met with in this address (v. 48): Jesus said to him, "Except you see signs and wonders, you will not believe." Though he was a nobleman, and now in grief about his son, yet Christ gives him a reproof. Christ first shows him his sin and weakness, to prepare him for mercy, and then grants his request. Those whom Christ intends to honour with his favours he first humbles with his frowns. Whereas they had heard by credible and incontestable report of the miracles he had wrought in other places, they could not believe except they saw them with their own eyes. They must be honoured, and they must be humoured, or they will not be convinced. Whereas they had seen divers miracles which sufficiently proved Christ to be a teacher come from God, they would go no further in believing than

43-54. SECOND GALILEAN MIRACLE—HEALING OF THE COURTIER'S SON. 43, 44. after two days—lit., the two days of His stay at Sychar. For Jesus testified . . .—This verse had occasioned much discussion. For it seems strange, if "His own country" here means Nazareth, which was in Galilee, that it should be said He came to Galilee because in one of its towns He expected no good reception. But all will be simple and natural if we fill up the statement thus: 'He went into the region of Galilee, but not, as might have been expected, to that part of it called "His own country," Nazareth (see Mark 6:4; Luke 4:24), for He acted on the maxim which He oft repeated, that a prophet . . .

45. received—welcomed Him. having seen . . . at the feast—proud, perhaps, of their Countryman's wonderful works at Jerusalem, and possibly won by this circumstance to regard His claims as at least worthy of respectful investigation. Even this our Lord did not despise, for saving conversion often begins in less than this (so Zaccheus, Luke 19:3-10). for they also went—i.e., it was their practice to go up to the feast.

46, 47. nobleman—courtier, king's servant, or one connected with a royal household; such as Chuza (Luke 8:3), or Manaen (Acts 13:1). heard that Jesus was come out of Judea—"where he had doubtless seen or heard what things Jesus had done at Jerusalem" (vs. 45), [BENGEL].

come down—for Capernaum was down on the northwest shore of the Sea of Galilee.

48-54. Except ye see signs . . .—He did believe, both as his coming and his urgent entreaty show; but how imperfectly we shall see; and our Lord would deepen his faith by such a blunt and seemingly rough answer as He made to Nicodemus.

ADAM CLARKE

44. Jesus himself testified. He bore testimony to the general truth of the following proverb. See on Matt. xiii. 57.

45. The Galilaeans received him. They received Him as the promised Messiah because of the miracles which they had seen Him perform at Jerusalem, at the Passover. See chap. ii. 23.

46. Where he made the water wine. See the notes on chap. ii. 1, etc. Cana was on the road from Nazareth to Capernaum and the Sea of Tiberias. A certain nobleman. An officer of the king's court, for this is the meaning of the original word. This officer belonged to Herod Antipas, who was then tetrarch of Galilee. This officer, whoever he was, appears to have had his ordinary abode at Capernaum; and hearing that Christ was at Cana, he came expressly from Capernaum thither to entreat Him to heal his child.

48. Except ye see signs and wonders. Our Lord did not tell this man that he had no faith, but that he had not enough. If he had had none, he would not have come from Capernaum to Cana to beg Him to heal his son. If he had had enough, he would have been contented with recommending his son to our Lord, without entreating Him to go to Capernaum to heal him, which intimates that he did not believe our Lord could do it at a distance. But the words are not addressed to the nobleman alone, but to all the Galilean Jews in general; for our Lord uses the plural number, which He never does when addressing an individual. These people differed widely from the people of Sychar; they they were driven by signs and wonders. The spiritual power of the word did not affect them, did not attract them, but only the sensible power of miracles.

4. His continued importunity in his address (v. 49): Sir, come down ere my child die. He took the reproof patiently; he spoke to Christ respectfully. And, as he did not take the reproof for an affront, so he did not take it for a denial, but still prosecuted his request, and continued to wrestle till he prevailed. He is so wholly taken up with concern about his child that he can mind nothing else. He still discovered the weakness of his faith in the power of Christ. He must have Christ to come down, thinking that else he could do the child no kindness. He believes that Christ could heal a sick child, but not that he could raise a dead child, "O come down, ere my child die," as if then it would be too late. He forgot that Elijah and Elisha had raised dead children; and is Christ's power inferior to theirs? Observe what haste he is in: Come down, ere my child die; as if there were danger of Christ's slipping his time.

5. The answer of peace which Christ gave (v. 50): Go thy way, thy son liveth. Christ here gives us an instance of his power, that he not only could heal, but could heal with so much ease. Here is nothing said, nothing done, nothing ordered to be done, and yet the cure wrought. This nobleman would have Christ come down and heal his son; Christ will heal his son, and not come down. And thus the cure is the sooner wrought, the nobleman's mistake rectified, and his faith confirmed; so that the thing was better done in Christ's way. When he denies what we ask, he gives what is much more to our advantage. He observed the nobleman to be in pain about his son, and therefore Christ dropped the reproof, and gave him assurance of the recovery of his child; for he knows how a father pities his children.

6. The nobleman's belief of the word of Christ: He believed, and went away. He is satisfied with the method Christ took. Now he sees no sign or wonder, and yet believes the wonder done. Christ said, Thy son liveth, and the man believed him. Christ said, Go thy way; and, as an evidence of the sincerity of his faith, he went his way.

7. The further confirmation of his faith, by comparing notes with his servants at his return. His servants met him with the agreeable news of the child's recovery, v. 51. Christ said, Thy son liveth; and now the servants say the same. Good news will meet those that hope in God's word. He enquired what hour the child began to recover (v. 52). He was desirous to have his faith confirmed. The diligent comparison of the works of Christ with his word will be of great use to us for the confirming of our faith. This was the course the nobleman took: He enquired of the servants the hour when he began to amend; and they told him, Yesterday at the seventh hour the fever left him; not only he began to amend, but he was perfectly well on a sudden; so the father knew that it was at the same hour when Jesus said to him, Thy son liveth. Two things would help to confirm his faith: First, That the child's recovery was sudden and not gradual. They name the precise time to an hour: Yesterday, not about, but at the seventh hour, the fever left him. The word of Christ did not work like physic, which must have time to operate, and produce the effect, and perhaps cures by expectation only; no, with Christ it was he spoke and it was done; not, He spoke and it was set a-doing. Secondly, That it was just at the same time that Christ spoke to him: at that very hour. The synchronisms and coincidents of events add very much to the beauty and harmony of Providence. In men's works, distance of place is the delay of time and the retarding of business; but it is not so in the works of Christ.

8. The happy effect and issue of this. The bringing of the cure to the family brought salvation to it. The nobleman himself believed. He had before believed the word of Christ; but now he believed in Christ. Christ has many ways of gaining the heart, and by the grant of a temporal mercy may make way for better things. His whole house believed likewise. Because of the interest they all had in the miracle, which preserved the blossom and hopes of the family; this affected them all, and endeared Christ to them. This was a nobleman, and probably he had a great household; but, when he comes into Christ's school, he brings them all along with him. What a blessed change was here in this house, occasioned by the sickness of the child! This should reconcile us to afflictions; we know not what good may follow from them.

9. Here is the evangelist's remark upon this cure (v. 54); This is the second miracle, referring to ch. ii. 11. In Judæa he had wrought many miracles. They had the first offer; but, being driven thence, he wrought miracles in Galilee. Somewhere or other Christ will

49. come down ere my child die—While we talk, the case is at its crisis, and if Thou come not instantly, all is over. This was faith, but partial, and our Lord would perfect it. The man cannot believe the cure could be wrought without the Physician coming to the patient—the thought of such a thing evidently never occurred to him. But Jesus will in a moment bring him up to this.

50. Go thy way; thy son liveth—Both effects instantaneously followed:—"The man believed the word," and the cure, shooting quicker than lightning from Cana to Capernaum, was felt by the dying youth. In token of faith, the father takes his leave of Christ—in the circumstances this evidenced full faith. The servants hasten to convey the joyful tidings to the anxious parents, whose faith now only wants one confirmation.

"When began he to amend?" "Yesterday, at the seventh hour, the fever left him"—the very hour in which was uttered that great word, "Thy son liveth!" So "himself believed and his whole house." He had believed before this, first very imperfectly; then with assured confidence of Christ's word; but now with a faith crowned by "sight." And the wave rolled from the head to the members of his household. "To-day is salvation come to this house" (Luke 19:9); and no mean house this!

second miracle Jesus did—i.e., in Cana; done "after He came out of Judea," as the former before.

had neither a love of the truth nor simplicity of heart, and would not believe anything from heaven unless forced on their minds by the most striking miracles. They were favored with the ministry of John Baptist; but, as that was not accompanied with miracles, it was not generally credited. They required the miracles of Christ in order that they might credit the advent of the Messiah.

49. Sir, come down. He did not think our Lord could cure him without being present, and seems here to feel himself hurt because our Lord did not come at his first entreaty. It is difficult for a proud man, or a man in office, to humble himself or to treat even God Almighty with proper respect.

50. Go thy way; they son liveth. Had our Lord gone with him, as he wished, his unbelief could not have been fully removed, as he would have still thought that our Lord's power could not reach from Cana to Capernaum. In order to destroy his unbelief at once, and bring him into the fullness of the faith of His supreme power, He cures him, being apparently absent, by that energy through which He fills both the heavens and the earth. Here it may be observed that our blessed Lord did what this man requested Him to do, but not in the way in which he wished it to be done. God will save all to the uttermost who call upon Him, but not in the way in which they may desire. Eternal life is the free gift of God, and He has a right to give it as He pleases; and He always gives His gifts in that way in which His glory is best promoted, and our eternal interest secured. The man believed the word. And yet it appears that he had suspended his faith upon a certain condition: "If I find on my return that my son is healed, I will believe that Jesus is the Messiah."

52. Then enquired he of them the hour. The servants, overjoyed to find their master's son so suddenly restored, set off to meet him, that they might impart to him tidings which they knew would be so very agreeable; and he, intent on having his faith settled, began immediately to inquire what time it was when the fever left him, to see whether his cure was the effect of some natural cause or whether it was done by the power of Christ. Yesterday at the seventh hour. At the time we would call one o'clock.

53. So the father knew. He had the fullest proof that his son's cure was supernatural, and that it was wrought by the Lord Jesus. Himself believed, and his whole house. He and his whole family became true converts to the doctrine of the manifested Messiah. The whole family, impressed with the great kindness of God in sending health to the child, were the more easily led to believe in the Lord Jesus. The sickness of the child became the means of salvation to all the household. They no doubt thought at first that God was dealing hardly with them, when threatening to remove the child; but now they see that in very faithfulness God had afflicted them. Let us learn never to murmur against God, or think that He does not act kindly towards us.

54. This is again the second miracle. The first miracle which Christ performed was in this same city of Cana, just after His baptism; and this second took place after His arrival find a welcome. People may, if they please, shut the sun out of their own houses, but they cannot shut it out of the world. This is noted to be the second miracle, to remind us of the first. Fresh mercies should revive the remembrance of former mercies, as former mercies should encourage our hopes of further mercies. Probably, the patient being a person of quality, when this nobleman applied himself to Christ, multitudes followed. What abundance of good may great men do, if they be good men!

CHAPTER 5

This miraculous cure is not recorded by any other of the evangelists, who confine themselves mostly to the miracles wrought in Galilee, but John relates those wrought at Jerusalem.

I. The time when this cure was wrought: it was at a feast of the Jews, that is, the passover, for that was the most celebrated feast. Christ, though residing in Galilee, yet went up to Jerusalem at the feast, v. 1. It was an opportunity of good; there were great numbers gathered together there at that time; it was a general rendezvous, from all parts of the country, besides proselytes from other nations. It was to be hoped that they were in a good frame, for they came together to worship God. Now a mind inclined to devotion lies very open to the further discoveries of divine light and love.

II. The place where this cure was wrought: at the pool of Bethesda, which had a miraculous healing virtue in it, v. 2–4.

1. Where it was situated: At Jerusalem, by the sheep-market. Some think it was near the temple, and, if so, it yielded a melancholy but profitable spectacle to those that went up to the temple to pray.

2. How it was called: It was a pool which is called in Hebrew, Bethesda—the house of mercy; for therein appeared much of the mercy of God to the sick and diseased. In a world of so much misery as this is, it is well that there are some Bethesdas.

3. How it was fitted up: It had five porches in which the sick lay. Thus the charity of men concurred with the mercy of God for the relief of the distressed. Nature has provided remedies, but men must provide hospitals.

4. How it was frequented with sick and cripples (v. 3): In these lay a great multitude of impotent folks. How many are the afflictions of the afflicted in this world! It may do us good to visit the hospitals sometimes, that we may take occasion, from the calamities of others, to thank God for our comforts The evangelist specifies three sorts of diseased people that lay here, blind, halt, and withered. These are mentioned because, being least able to help themselves into the water, they lay longest waiting in the porches. O that men were as wise for their souls, and as solicitous to get their spiritual diseases healed!

5. What virtue it had for the cure of these impotent folks (v. 4): An angel went down, and troubled the water; and whoso first stepped in was made whole. The virtue this pool had was supernatural.

(1) The preparation of the medicine by an angel, who went down into the pool, and stirred the water. See what mean offices the holy angels condescend to. If we would do the will of God as the angels do it, we must think nothing below us but sin. The troubling of the water was the signal given of the descent of the angel. The waters of the sanctuary are then healing when they are put in motion. Ministers must stir up the gift that is in them. When they are cold and dull in their ministrations, the waters settle and are not apt to heal. The angel descended, to stir the water at a certain season.

(2) The operation of the medicine: Whoever first stepped in was made whole. What disease soever it was, this water cured it. The power of miracles succeeds where the power of nature succumbs. He that first stepped in had the benefit, not those that lingered and came in afterwards. This teaches us to observe and improve our opportunities, that we slip not a season which may never return.

Now this is all the account we have of this standing miracle. It was a token of God's goodwill to that people, and an indication that, though they had been long without prophets and miracles, yet God had not cast them off. It was a type of the Messiah that arises with healing under his wings.

III. The patient on whom this cure was wrought (v. 5): one that had been infirm thirty-eight years. His disease was grievous: He had an infirmity; he had lost the use of his limbs. It is sad to have the

Vss. 1-47. THE IMPOTENT MAN HEALED—DISCOURSE OCCASIONED BY THE PERSECUTION ARISING THEREUPON. 1. a feast of the Jews—What feast? No question has more divided the Harmonists of the Gospels, and the duration of our Lord's ministry may be said to hinge on it. For if, as the majority have thought (until of late years) it was a Passover, His ministry lasted three and a half years; if not, probably a year less. Those who are dissatisfied with the Passover-view all differ among themselves what other feast it was, and some of the most acute think there are no grounds for deciding. In our judgment the evidence is in favor of its being a Passover, but the reasons cannot be stated here.

2, 3. sheep [market]—The supplement should be (as in Margin) 'sheep [gate]', mentioned in Nehemiah 3:1, 32. Bethesda—i.e., 'house (place) of mercy,' from the cures wrought there. five porches—for shelter to the patients. 3. impotent—infirm.

4. an angel . . .—This miracle differed in two points from all other miracles recorded in Scripture: (1) It was not one, but a succession of miracles periodically wrought: (2) As it was only wrought "when the waters were troubled," so only upon one patient at a time, and that the patient "who first stepped in after the troubling of the waters." But this only the more undeniably fixed its miraculous character. We have heard of many waters having a medicinal virtue; but what water was ever known to cure instantaneously a single disease? And who ever heard of any water curing all, even the most diverse diseases—"blind, halt, withered"—alike? Above all, who ever heard of such a thing being done "only at a certain season," and most singularly of all, doing it only to the first person who stepped in after the moving of the waters? Any of these peculiarities—much more all taken together—must have proclaimed the supernatural character of the cures wrought. (If the text here be genuine, there can be no doubt of the miracle, as there were multitudes living when this Gospel was published who, from their own knowledge of Jerusalem, could have exposed the falsehood of the Evangelist, if no such cure had been known there. The want of vs. 4 and part of vs. 3 in some good MSS., and the use of some unusual words in the passage, are more easily accounted for than the evidence in their favor if they were not originally in the text. Indeed vs. 7 is unintelligible without vs. 4. The internal evidence brought against it is merely the unlikelihood of such a miracle—a principle which will carry us a great deal farther if we allow it to weigh against positive evidence). 5-9. thirty-eight years—but not all that time at the pool. This was probably the most pitiable of all the cases, and therefore selected.

here from Jerusalem, whence, we have seen, He was driven by the persecution raised against Him by the scribes and Pharisees. By construing the word again, with he came, that confusion which is evident in the common version is entirely removed.

1. A feast. This is generally supposed, by the best critics, to have been the Feast of the Passover, which was the most eminent feast among the Jews. In several excellent MSS. the article is added, the feast, the grand, the principal festival. Petavius supposes that the feast of Purim is here meant; and one MS. reads the feast of Tabernacles. Several of the primitive fathers believe Pentecost to be intended; and they are followed by many of the moderns, because, in chap. vii. 2, mention is made of the feast of Tabernacles, which followed Pentecost, and was about the latter end of our September. Lightfoot has observed that the other Evangelists speak very sparingly of our Lord's acts in Judea. They mention nothing of the Passovers, from our Lord's baptism till His death, excepting the very last; but John points at them all. The first he speaks of in chap. ii. 13; the third, in chap. vi. 4; the fourth, in chap. xii. 1; and the second, in this place. For although he does not call it the Passover, but a feast in general, yet the circumstances agree best with this feast; and our Lord's words, chap. iv. 35, seem to cast light on this subject.

2. There is. This is thought by some to be a proof that John wrote his Gospel before the destruction of Jerusalem, and that the pool and its porticoes were still remaining. Though there can be little doubt that Jerusalem was destroyed many years before John wrote, yet this does not necessarily imply that the pool and its porticoes must have been destroyed too. It, or something in its place, is shown to travellers to the present day. But instead of is, both the Syriac, all the Arabic, Persic, Armenian, and Nonnus read "was," which is to me some proof that it did not exist when these versions were made, and that the pool which is shown now is not the original. By the sheep market. Rather, "gate"; see Neh. iii. 1, 32; xii. 39. This was in all probability the gate through which the sheep were brought which were offered in sacrifice in the Temple. Bethesda. This word is variously written in the MSS. and versions, but this reading is the genuine one. Bethesda, or according to the Hebrew Bethchasdah, signifies literally "the house of mercy." It got this name probably from the cures which God mercifully performed there. It is likely the porticoes were built for the more convenient reception of the poor and distressed, who came hither to be healed.

3. Waiting for the moving of the water. This clause, with the whole of the fourth verse, is wanting in some MSS. and versions; but I think there is no sufficient evidence against their authenticity.

4. Certain season. This probably refers to the time of the feast, during which only this miraculous virtue lasted. It is not likely that the angel appeared to the people—his descent might be only known by the ebullition caused in the waters. Was not the whole a type of Christ? See Zech. xiii. 1. He is the true Bethesda, or "house of mercy," the "fountain opened to the house of David and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem for sin and for uncleanness," unto which all the diseased may come, and find health and life eternal.

5. Had an infirmity thirty and eight years. The length of the time he had been afflicted makes the miracle of his cure the greater. There could have been no collusion in this case. As his affliction had lasted thirty-eight years, it must have been known to multitudes; therefore he could not be a person prepared for the occasion. All Christ's miracles have been wrought in such a way and on such per-body so disabled that instead of being the soul's instrument, it is become, even in the affairs of this life, its burden. What reason have we to thank God for bodily strength, to use it for him. The duration of it was tedious: Thirty-eight years. He was lame longer than most live. Shall we complain of one wearisome night, or one fit of illness, who perhaps for many years have scarcely known what it has been to be a day sick, when many others, better than we, have scarcely known what it has been to be a day well?

IV. The cure and the circumstances of it briefly related, v. 6–9.

1. Jesus saw him lie. Observe, When Christ came up to Jerusalem he visited not the palaces, but the hospitals, an indication of his great design in coming into the world, which was to seek and save the sick and wounded. There was a great multitude of poor cripples here at Bethesda, but Christ fastened his eye upon this one. Christ delights to help the helpless. He had often been disappointed of a cure; therefore Christ took him for his patient: it is his honour to side with the weakest.

2. He knew and considered how long he had lain in this condition.

3. He asked him, Wilt thou be made whole? A strange question to be asked one that had been so long ill. Some indeed would not be made whole, because their sores serve them to beg by. Christ put it to him, to express his own pity and concern for him. Christ is tenderly inquisitive concerning the desires of those that are in affliction, to teach them to value the mercy, and to excite in them desires after it. In spiritual cases, people are not willing to be cured of their sins. If people were willing to be made whole, the work were half done, for Christ is willing to heal, if we be but willing to be healed.

4. The poor impotent man takes this opportunity to set forth the misery of his case: Sir, I have no man to put me into the pool, v. 7. He complains for want of friends to help him in: "I have no man, no friend to do me that kindness." One would think that some of those who had been themselves healed should have lent him a hand. To the sick and impotent it is as true a piece of charity to work for them as to relieve them. He bewails his infelicity, that very often when he was coming another stepped in before him. But a step between him and a cure, and yet he continues impotent. There is no getting over the old maxim, Every one for himself. Having been so often disappointed, he begins to despair, and now is Christ's time to come to his relief. And observe further, to his praise, that, though he had waited so long in vain, yet still he continued lying by the pool-side, hoping that sometime or other help would come.

5. Our Lord Jesus hereupon cures him with a word.

(1) The word he said: Rise, take up thy bed, v. 8. He is bidden to rise and walk; a strange command to be given to an impotent man, that had been long disabled. He must rise and walk, that is, attempt to do it, and in the essay he should receive strength to do it. If he had not attempted to help himself, he had not been cured, yet it does not therefore follow that, when he did rise and walk, it was by his own strength; no, it was by the power of Christ. He is bidden to take up his bed. First, To make it to appear that it was a perfect cure, and purely miraculous; for he did not recover strength by degrees, but from the extremity of weakness and impotency he suddenly stepped into the highest degree of bodily strength. He, who this minute was not able to turn himself in his bed, the next minute was able to carry his bed. Secondly, It was to proclaim the cure. Being the sabbath day, whoever carried a burden through the streets made himself very remarkable, and everyone would enquire what was the meaning of it. Christ would thus witness against the tradition of the elders. The case may be such that it may become a work of necessity, or mercy, to carry a bed on the sabbath day; but here it was more, it was a work of piety. He would hereby try the faith and obedience of his patient. Those that have been healed by Christ's word should be ruled by his word.

(2) The efficacy of this word (v. 9). Immediately he was made whole. What a joyful surprise was this to the poor cripple, to find himself all of a sudden so easy, so strong, so able to help himself! What a new world was he in, in an instant! He took up his bed and walked, and did not care who blamed him or threatened him for it.

V. What became of the poor man after he was cured.

1. What passed between him and the Jews who saw him carry his bed on the sabbath day. The Jews quarrelled with the man, telling him that it was not lawful, v. 10. Thus far was commendable, that,

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

6. saw him lie and knew . . .—As He doubtless visited the spot just to perform this cure, so He knows where to find His patient, and the whole previous history of his case (ch. 2:25).

Wilt thou be made whole?—Could anyone doubt that a sick man would like to be made whole, or that the patients came thither, and this man had returned again and again, just in hope of a cure? But our Lord asked the question. (1) To fasten attention upon Himself; (2) By making him detail his case to deepen in him the feeling of entire helplessness; (3) By so singular a question to beget in his desponding heart the hope of a cure. (Cf. Mark 10: 51.) Sir, I have no man . . .—Instead of saying he wished to be cured, he just tells with piteous simplicity how fruitless had been all his efforts to obtain it, and how helpless and all but hopeless he was. Yet not quite. For here he is at the pool, waiting on. It seemed of no use; nay, only tantalizing—"While I am coming, another steppeth down before me"—the fruit was snatched from his lips. Yet he will not go away. He may get nothing by staying, he may drop into his grave ere he get into the pool; but by going from the appointed, divine way of healing, he can get nothing. Wait therefore he will, wait he does, and when Christ comes to heal him, lo! he is waiting his turn. What an attitude for a sinner at Mercy's gate! The man's hopes seemed low enough ere Christ came to him. He might have said, just before "Jesus passed by that way," 'This is no use; I'll never get in; let me die at home.' Then all had been lost. But he held on, and his perseverance was rewarded with a glorious cure. Probably some rays of hope darted into his heart as he told his tale before those Eyes whose glance measured his whole case. But the word of command consummates his preparation to receive the cure, and instantaneously works it. 8. Rise, take up thy bed . . .—"Immediately" he did so. "He spake and it was done." The slinging of his portable couch over his shoulders was designed to show the perfection of the cure.

9. the same day was the sabbath—Beyond all doubt this was intentional, as in so many other healings, in order that when opposition arose on this account men might be compelled to listen to His claims and His teaching. 10-16. The Jews—i.e., those in authority. (See on ch. 1:19.) it is not lawful to carry thy bed—a glorious testimony to the cure, as instantaneous and complete, from the lips of the most prejudiced! (And what a contrast does it, as all our Lord's miracles, present to the bungling miracles of the Church of Rome!) In ordinary circumstances, the sons and occasions as abolutely to preclude all possibility of the suspicion of imposture.

6. Wilt thou be made whole? Christ, by asking this question, designed to excite in this person faith, hope, and a greater desire of being healed. He wished him to reflect on his miserable state, that he might be the better prepared to receive a cure, and to value it when it came.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

This poor man, sick and impotent for thirty-eight years—many of which he had spent, as it would appear, day by day, wearily dragging his paralyzed limbs to the fountain with daily diminishing hope—attracts the regard of Christ when He enters, and He puts to him the strange question, "Wilt thou be made whole?" Surely there was no need to ask that; but no doubt the many disappointments and the long years of waiting and of suffering had stamped apathy upon the sufferer's face, and Christ saw that the first thing that was needed, in order that His healing power might have a point of contact in the man's nature, was to kindle some little flicker of hope in him once more.

And so, no doubt, with a smile on His face, which converted the question into an offer, He says: "Wilt thou be made whole?" meaning thereby to say, "I will heal thee if thou wilt." And there comes the weary answer, as if the man had said: "Will I be made whole? What have I been lying here all these years for? I have nobody to put me into the pool."

—Expositions of Holy Scripture

8. Rise, take up thy bed, and walk. Jesus speaks here as God. He speaks in no name but His own, and with an authority which belongs to God alone. And what is the consequence? The man became whole immediately; and this sudden restoration to health and strength was an incontestable proof of the omnipotence of Christ. It has been remarked that our Lord, after having performed a miracle, was accustomed to connect some circumstance with it which attested its truth. After the miracle of the five loaves, He ordered the fragments to be collected, which were more in quantity than the loaves themselves, though several thousands had been fed. When He changed the water into wine, He ordered some to be taken first to the steward of the feast, that he might taste and bear testimony to its genuineness and excellency. When He cured the lepers, He commanded them to show themselves to the priests, whose business it was to judge of the cure. So here, He judged it necessary, after having cured this infirm man, to order him not only to arise, but to take up his bed, and walk, which sufficiently attested the miracle which He had wrought.

while they knew not by what authority he did it, they were jealous for the honour of the sabbath. The man justified himself in what he did by a warrant that would bear him out, v. 11. "I do not do it in contempt of the law and the sabbath. He that could work such a miracle as to make me whole no doubt might give me such a command as to carry my bed. He that was so kind as to make me whole would not be so unkind as to bid me do what is sinful." The Jews enquired further who it was that gave him this warrant (v. 12): What man is that? How industriously they overlooked that which might be a ground of their faith in Christ. They resolve to look upon Christ as a mere man: What man is that? They were resolved that they would never own him to be the Son of God. They resolve to look upon him as a bad man. He who bade this man carry his bed was certainly a delinquent. The poor man was unable to give them any account of him: He wist not who he was, v. 13. Christ was unknown to him when he healed him. Christ does many a good turn for those that know him not. He enlightens, strengthens, quickens, comforts us, and we wist not who he is. For the present he kept himself unknown; for as soon as he had wrought the cure he conveyed himself away, a multitude being in that place. This is mentioned to show, either, First, How Christ conveyed himself away—by retiring into the crowd, so as not to be distinguished from a common person. Or, Secondly, Why he conveyed himself away, because there was a multitude there and he industriously avoided both the applause of those who would admire the miracle and cry that up and the censure of those who would censure him as a sabbath-breaker, and run him down. Christ left the miracle to commend itself, and the man on whom it was wrought to justify it.

2. What passed at their next interview, v. 14.

(1) Where Christ found him: in the temple. Christ went to the temple. The man that was cured went to the temple. There Christ found him. Thither he straightway went because he had, by his infirmity, been so long detained thence. Perhaps he had not been there for thirty-eight years. His first visit shall be to the temple. Because he had by his recovery a good errand thither; he went up to the temple to return thanks to God for his recovery. Because he had, by carrying his bed, seemed to put a contempt on the sabbath, he would thus show that he had an honour for it. Works of necessity and mercy are allowed; but when they are over we must go to the temple.

(2) What he said to him. He now applies himself to the healing of his soul. He gives him a memento of his cure: Behold thou art made whole. Christ calls his attention to it. Let the impressions of it abide, and never be lost. He gives him a caution against sin, Being made whole, sin no more. This implies that his disease was the punishment of sin. While those chronical diseases lasted, they prevented the outward acts of many sins, and therefore watchfulness was the more necessary when the disability was removed. When the trouble which only dammed up the current is over, the waters will return to their old course. It is common for people, when they are sick, to promise much, when newly recovered to perform something, but after awhile to forget all. He gives him warning of his danger: Lest a worse thing come to thee. Christ knew that he was one of those that must be frightened from sin. There is something worse that will come to him if he relapse into sin after God has given him such a deliverance.

VI. The notice which the poor simple man gave to the Jews concerning Christ, v. 15. He told them it was Jesus that had made him whole. The rage and enmity of the Jews against him: Therefore did the rulers of the Jews persecute Jesus. See, (1) How absurd and unreasonable their enmity to Christ was. Therefore, because he had made a poor sick man well, they persecuted him, because he did good in Israel. (2) How bloody and cruel it was: They sought to slay him. (3) How it was varnished over with a colour of zeal for the honour of the sabbath; for this was the pretended crime, Because he had done these things on the sabbath day. Thus hypocrites often cover their real enmity against the power of godliness with a pretended zeal for the form of it.

Verses 17–30

We have here Christ's discourse upon occasion of his being accused as a sabbath-breaker.

I. The doctrine laid down, by which he justified what he did on the sabbath day (v. 17): He answered them, My father worketh hitherto, and I work. Waving all other pleas, he insists upon that which was equivalent to the whole, and abides by it, which he had mentioned, Matt. xii. 8. The Son of man is Lord even of the sabbath day. 1. He pleads that he was the Son of God, plainly intimated in his calling God his rulers had the law on their side (Neh. 13:15; Jer. 17:21). But when the man referred them to "Him that had made him whole" as his authority, the argument was resistless. Yet they ingeniously parried the thrust, asking him, not who had "made him whole"—that would have condemned themselves and defeated their purpose—but who had bidden him "take up his bed and walk," in other words, who had dared to order a breach of the sabbath? Tis time we were looking after Him—thus hoping to shake the man's faith in his Healer.

13. he that was healed wist not . . .—That some one, with unparelleled generosity, tenderness and power, had done it, the man knew well enough: but as he had never heard of Him before, so he disappeared too quickly for any inquiries. conveyed himself away—slipped out of the crowd that had gathered, to avoid both hasty popularity and precipitate hatred (Matt. 12:14-19).

14. findeth him in the temple—saying, perhaps, "I will go into Thy house with burnt offerings, I will pay my vows which my lips have uttered and my mouth hath spoken when I was in trouble" (Ps. 66:13, 14). Jesus, there Himself for His own ends, "findeth him there"—not all accidentally, be assured.

sin no more . . .—a glimpse this of the reckless life he had probably led before his thirty-eight years' infirmity had come upon him, and which not improbably had brought on, in the just judgment of God, his chronic complaint. Fearful illustration this of "the severity of God," but glorious manifestation of our Lord's insight into "what was in man."

15. The man departed and told . . .—little thinking how unwelcome his grateful and eager testimony would be. "The darkness received not the light which was pouring its rays upon it" (John 1:5, 11), [OLSHAUSEN]. 16. because he had done these things on the sabbath day—What to these hypocritical religionists was the doing of the most glorious and beneficent miracles, compared with the atrocity of doing them on the sabbath day! Having given them this handle, on purpose to raise the first public controversy with them, and thus open a fitting opportunity of laying His claims before them, He rises at once to the whole height of them, in a statement which for grandeur and terseness exceeds almost anything that ever afterwards fell from Him, at least to His enemies. 17, 18. My Father worketh hitherto and I work—The "I" is emphatic; 'The creative and conservative activity of My Father has known no sabbath-cessation from the beginning until now, and that is the law of My working.'

ADAM CLARKE

11. He that made me whole. The poor man reasoned conclusively: He who could work such a miracle must be at least the best of men. Now a good man will neither do evil himself nor command others to do it. But he who cured me ordered me to carry my bed; therefore there can be no evil in it.

13. Jesus had conveyed himself away. Or "had withdrawn himself." And this He might easily do, as there was a crowd in the place. Some think the words indicate that Jesus withdrew on seeing a multitude in the place, i.e., raising a tumult, because of the man's carrying his bed. He had not yet finished His work and would not expose himself to the envy and malice of the Jewish rulers.

14. Jesus findeth him in the temple. The man being conscious that it was through the mercy of God that he was restored (though he did not as yet know distinctly who Christ was) went to the Temple to return thanks to God for his cure. Whether this was on the same day or some other does not distinctly appear; it was probably the same day, after he had carried home his couch.

Sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee. Our Lord, intending to disclose to this man who He was, gave him two proofs of the perfection of His knowledge. (1) He showed him that He knew the secret of the past—sin no more, thereby intimating that his former sins were the cause of his long affliction. (2) He showed him that He knew the future—lest a worse thing come unto thee; if your iniquity be repeated, your punishment will be increased.

15. The man departed, and told the Jews. He did not say it was Jesus who had ordered him to carry his bed, but it was Jesus who had cured him; and he left them to draw the inference, viz., that this Jesus must have the miraculous power of God.

17. My Father worketh hitherto, and I work. Or, "As My Father worketh until now." God created the world in six days; on the seventh He rested from all creating acts and set it apart to be an everlasting memorial of His Father. 2. That he was a worker together with God. My Father worketh hitherto. But I also work with him. As God created all things by Christ, so he supports and governs all by him. He that does all is Lord of all, and therefore Lord of the sabbath.

MATTHEW HENRY

II. The offence that was taken at his doctrine (v. 18): The Jews sought the more to kill him. His defence was made his offence. They sought to kill him,

1. Because he had broken the sabbath.

2. He had said also that God was his Father. Now they pretend a jealousy for God's honour, and charge Christ with it as a heinous crime that he made himself equal with God. This was justly inferred from what he said, that he was the Son of God, and that God was his Father. He had said that he worked with his Father, and hereby he made himself equal with God. Yet it was unjustly imputed to him as an offence that he equalled himself with God, for he was and is God. Therefore Christ, in answer to this charge, makes out his claim and proves that he is equal with God in power and glory.

III. Christ's discourse upon this occasion. In these verses he explains, and afterwards confirms, his commission, as Mediator. And, as the honours he is hereby entitled to are such as it is not fit for any creature to receive, so the work he is hereby entrusted with is such as it is not possible for any creature to go through with, and therefore he is God.

1. In general. He is one with the Father in all he does as Mediator. It is ushered in with a solemn preface (v. 19): Verily, verily, I say unto you. This intimates that the things declared are, (1) Very awful and great. (2) Very sure. (3) That they are matters purely of divine revelation, which we could not otherwise have come to the knowledge of. Two things he saith in general concerning the Son's oneness with the Father in working:

[1] That the Son conforms to the Father (v. 19): The Son can do nothing of himself but what he sees the Father do; for these things does the Son. The Lord Jesus, as Mediator, is Obedient to his Father's will. Christ was so entirely devoted to his Father's will that it was impossible for him in anything to act separately. He is observant of his Father's counsel; he can, he will, do nothing but what he sees the Father do. No man can find out the work of God, but the only-begotten Son, sees what he does, is intimately acquainted with his purposes, and has the plan of them ever before him. What the Father did in his counsels, the Son had ever in his view, and still he had his eye upon it. Yet he is equal with the Father in working; for what things soever the Father does these also does the Son likewise; he did the same things, not such things, but the same things; and he did them in the same manner, with the same authority, the same energy and efficacy.

[2] That the Father communicates to the Son, v. 20.

First, The inducement to it: The Father loveth the Son. Christ was now hated of men, but he comforted himself with this, that his Father loved him.

Secondly, The instances of it. He shows it, 1. In what he does communicate to him: He shows him all things that himself doth. He shows him all things which he does, that is, which the Son does; all that the Son does is by direction from the Father; he shows him. 2. In what he will communicate; he will show him greater works than these. Works of greater power than the curing of the impotent man; for he should raise the dead, and should himself rise from the dead. Many are brought to marvel at Christ's works, whereby he has the honour of them, who are not brought to believe, by which they would have the benefit of them.

2. In particular. He proves his equality with the Father, by specifying some of those works which he does that are the peculiar works of God. This is enlarged upon, v. 21–30.

(1) Observe what is here said concerning the Mediator's power to raise the dead and give life. [1] His authority to do it (v. 21): As the Father raiseth up the dead, so the Son quickeneth whom he will. It is God's prerogative to raise the dead, and give life. A resurrection from the dead never lay in the common road of nature, nor ever fell within the thought of those that studied only the compass of nature's power. It is purely the work of a divine power, and the knowledge of it purely by divine revelation. The Mediator is invested with this prerogative: He quickens whom he will. He does not enliven things by natural necessity, as the sun does, whose beams revive of course; but he acts as a free agent. As he has the power, so he has the wisdom and sovereignty, of a God; has the key of the grave and of death.

[2] His ability to do it, because he has life in himself, as the Father has, v. 26. It is certain that the Father has life in himself. He is a sovereign giver of God was his Father—lit., "His own [or peculiar] Father," (as in Rom. 8:32). The addition is their own, but a very proper one. making himself equal with God—rightly gathering this to be His meaning, not from the mere words "My Father," but from His claim of right to act as His Father did in the like high sphere, and by the same law of ceaseless activity in that sphere. And as, instead of instantly disclaiming any such meaning—as He must have done if it was false—He positively sets His seal to it in the following verses, merely explaining how consistent such claim was with the prerogatives of His Father, it is beyond all doubt that we have here an assumption of peculiar personal Sonship, or participation in the Father's essential nature.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

19, 20. the Son can do nothing of himself—i.e., apart from and in rivalry of the Father, as they supposed. The meaning is, 'The Son can have no separate interest or action from the Father.' for what things... 'On the contrary, whatever the Father doeth that same doeth the Son,' likewise—'in the like manner.' What claim to absolute equality with the Father could exceed this: not only to do the same things, but to do them as the Father does them?

Father loveth... and showeth him all...—As love has no concealments, so it results from the perfect fellowship and mutual endearment of the Father and the Son (see on ch. 1:1, 18), whose interests are one, even as their nature, that the Father communicates to the Son all His counsels, and what has been thus shown to the Son is by Him executed in His mediatorial character. "With the Father, doing is willing; it is only the Son who acts in Time" [ALFORD]. Three things here are clear: (1) The personal distinctions in the Godhead. (2) Unity of action among the Persons results from unity of nature. (3) Their oneness of interest is no unconscious or involuntary thing, but a thing of glorious consciousness, will, and love, of which the Persons themselves are the proper Objects. show him greater things...—referring to what He goes on to mention (vss. 21-31), comprised in two great words, LIFE and JUDGMENT, which STIER beautifully calls God's Regalia. Yet these, Christ says, the Father and He do in common. 21-23. raiseth the dead and quickeneth them—one act in two stages. This is His absolute prerogative as God. so the Son quickeneth—i.e., raiseth up and quickeneth. whom he will—not only doing the same divine act, but doing it as the result of His own will, even as the Father does it. This statement is of immense importance in relation to the miracles of Christ, distinguishing them from similar miracles of prophets and apostles, who as human instruments were employed to perform super-natural actions, while Christ did all as the Father's commissioned Servant indeed, but in the exercise of His own absolute right of action.

work. But though He rested from creating, He never ceased from preserving and governing that which He had formed. In this respect He can keep no sabbaths; for nothing can continue to exist or answer the end proposed by the divine wisdom and goodness without the continual energy of God. So I work—I am constantly employed in the same way, governing and supporting all things, comforting the wretched, and saving the lost; and to Me, in this respect, there is no Sabbath.

18. Making himself equal with God. This the Jews understood from the preceding verse, nor did they take a wrong meaning out of our Lord's words; for He plainly stated that, whatever was the Father's work, His was the same, thus showing that He and the Father were one. They had now found out two pretenses to take away His life. One was that He had broken the Sabbath—"dissolved," as they pretended, the obligation of keeping it holy. The other was that He was guilty of blasphemy, in making himself equal with God. For both of these crimes a man, according to the law, must suffer death. See Num. xv. 32; Lev. xxiv. 11, 14, 16.

19. The Son can do nothing of himself. Because of His inseparable union with the Father; nor can the Father do anything of himself, because of His infinite unity with the Son. What things soever he doeth, these also doeth the Son. The conclusion from our Lord's argument is: If I have broken the Sabbath, so has God also, for I can do nothing but what I see Him doing.

20. Greater works than these. Two of these He immediately mentions: raising the dead, v. 21; and judging the world, v. 22. That ye may marvel. Or "so as to make you wonder." Our Lord sometimes speaks of himself as God, and sometimes as the Ambassador of God. As He had a human and a divine nature, this distinction was essentially necessary.

21. As the Father raiseth up the dead. This He did in the case of the widow's son at Sarepta, I Kings xvii. 22, by the ministry of the Prophet Elijah. And again, in the case of the Shunammite's son, 2 Kings iv. 32-35, by the ministry of the Prophet Elisha. The Son quickeneth whom he will. He raiseth from death to life whomsoever He pleases. So He did, for He raised the ruler's daughter, Mark v. 35-42; the widow's son at Nain, Luke vii. 11-15; and Lazarus, at Bethany, John xi. 14-44. Whom he will. Here our Lord points out His sovereign power and independence; He gives life according to His own will—not being obliged to supplicate for the power by which it was done, as the prophets did, His own will being absolute and sufficient in every case.

life; he has the disposal of life in himself; and of all good (for so life sometimes signifies). He is to his creatures the fountain of life, and all good. It is as certain that he has given to the Son to have life in himself. The Son, as Redeemer, is the original of all spiritual life and good; is that to the church which the Father is to the world. The kingdom of grace, and all the life in that kingdom, are as fully and absolutely in the hand of the Redeemer as the kingdom of providence is in the hand of the Creator.

[3] His acting according to this authority and ability. There are two resurrections performed by his powerful word, both which are here spoken of:

A resurrection that now is (v. 29), a resurrection from the depth of sin to the life of righteousness. The hour is coming, and now is. It is a resurrection begun already. This is plainly distinguished from that in v. 28, which speaks of the resurrection at the end of time. Some think this was fulfilled in those whom he miraculously raised to life. I rather understand it of the power of the doctrine of Christ, for the recovering and quickening of those that were dead in trespasses and sins, Eph. ii. 1. The hour was coming when dead souls should be made alive by the preaching of the gospel: nay, it then was, while Christ was upon earth. It is to be applied to all the wonderful success of the gospel, among both Jews and Gentiles; an hour which still is, and is still coming. Sinners are spiritually dead, miserable, but neither sensible of their misery nor able to help themselves out of it. The conversion of a soul to God is its resurrection from death to life; then it begins to live when it begins to live to God. It is by the voice of the Son of God that souls are raised to spiritual life. The dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God.

The voice of Christ must be heard by us, that we may live by it. A resurrection yet to come; this is spoken of, v. 28, 29. When this resurrection shall be: The hour is coming. It is not yet come, it is not the hour spoken of at v. 25, that is coming, and now is. It will certainly come, it is coming on, nearer every day. How far off it is we know not. Who shall be raised: All that are in the graves. Christ here tells us that all must appear before the Judge, and therefore all must be raised. The grave is the prison of dead bodies, where they are detained. Yet, in prospect of their resurrection, we may call it their bed, where they sleep to be awaked again. How they shall be raised. (a) The efficient of this resurrection: They shall hear his voice. A divine power shall go along with the voice, to put life into them, and enable them to obey it. (b) The effect of it: They shall come forth out of their graves. They shall appear before Christ's tribunal. To what they shall be raised; to a different state of happiness or misery, according to their different character.

(a) They that have done good shall come forth to the resurrection of life; they shall live again, to live for ever. It will be well in the great day with those only that have done good. They shall be admitted into the presence of God, and that is life, it is better than life.

(b) They that have done evil to the resurrection of damnation; they shall live again, to be for ever dying.

(2) Observe what is here said concerning the Mediator's authority to execute judgment, v. 22–24, 27. As he has an almighty power, so he has a sovereign jurisdiction. Christ's commission or delegation to the office of a judge, which is twice spoken of here (v. 22): He hath committed all judgment to the Son; and again (v. 27): He hath given him authority.

First, The Father judges no man; he is pleased to govern by Jesus Christ. He does not rule us by the mere right of creation. Having made us, he may do what he pleases with us, as the potter with the clay; yet he does not take advantage of this. The Mediator having undertaken to make a vicarious satisfaction, the matter is referred to him.

Secondly, He has committed all judgment to the Son. It is God in Christ that reconciles the world, and to him he has given power to confer eternal life. The book of life is the Lamb's book; by his award we must stand or fall. He is constituted sole manager of the judgment of the great day. The final and universal judgment is committed to the Son of Man.

Thirdly, He has given him authority to execute judgment also, v. 27. He that executes judgment upon them is the same that would have wrought salvation for them. Whence he has that authority: the Father gave it to him. Now all this redounds very much to the honour of Christ, and very much to the comfort of all believers, who may with the greatest assurance venture their all in such hands. He has all judgment committed to him for two reasons:

First, Because he is the Son of man; which denotes these three things: 1. His humiliation and gracious

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

26. given to the Son . . .—Does this refer to the essential life of the Son before all time (ch. 1:4) [as most of the Fathers, and OLSHAUSEN, STIER, ALFORD, etc., among the moderns], or to the purpose of God that this essential life should reside in the Person of the Incarnate Son, and be manifested thus to the world? [CALVIN, LUCKE, LUTHARDT, etc.] The question is as difficult as the subject is high. But as all that Christ says of His essential relation to the Father is intended to explain and exalt His mediatorial functions, so the one seems in our Lord's own mind and language mainly the starting-point of the other.

28. Marvel not at this—this committal of all judgment to the Son of man. for the hour is coming—He adds not in this case (as in vs. 25), "and now is," because this was not to be till the close of the whole dispensation of mercy.

25-29. The hour cometh—in its whole fulness, at Pentecost. and now is—in its beginnings. the dead—the spiritually dead, as is clear from vs. 28. Here He rises from the calmer phrase "hearing his word" (vs. 24), to the grander expression, "hearing the voice of the Son of God," to signify that as it finds men in a dead condition, so it carries with it a resurrection-power. shall live—in the sense of vs. 24.

29. resurrection of life—i.e., to life everlasting (Matt. 25:46). of damnation—It would have been harsh to say 'the resurrection of death,' though that is meant, for sinners rise from death to death [BENGEL]. The resurrection of both classes is an exercise of sovereign authority; but in the one case it is an act of grace, in the other of justice. (Cf. Dan. 12:2, from which the language is taken.) How awfully grand are these unfoldings of His dignity and authority from the mouth of Christ Himself! And they are all in the third person; in what follows He resumes the first person.

22. For the Father judgeth no man . . .—rather, "For neither doth the Father judge any man," implying that the same "thing was meant in the former verse of the quickening of the dead"—both acts being done, not by the Father and the Son, as though twice done, but by the Father through the Son as His voluntary Agent. all judgment—judgment in its most comprehensive sense, or as we should say, all administration.

27. because he is the Son of man—This seems to confirm the last re-

ADAM CLARKE

A. T. ROBERTSON:

26. "In himself" (en heautoi). The living God possesses life wholly in himself, and so he has bestowed this power of life to the Son as already stated in the Prologue of the Logos (1:3). For "gave" (edoken, timeless aorist active indicative), see also 3:35; 17:2, 24. The particles "as" (hosper) and "so" (houtos) mark here the fact, not the degree (Westcott).
—Word Pictures in the New Testament

25. The dead shall hear the voice. Three kinds of death are mentioned in the Scriptures: natural, spiritual, and eternal. The first consists in the separation of the body and soul; the second, in the separation of God and the soul; the third, in the separation of body and soul from God in the other world. Answerable to these three kinds of death, there is a threefold life: natural life, which consists in the union of the soul and body; spiritual life, which consists in the union of God and the soul, by faith and love; eternal life, which consists in the communion of the body and soul with God, by holiness, in the realms of bliss.

22. The Father judgeth no man. This confirms what He had said before, vv. 17, 19, that the Father acts not without the Son, nor the Son without the Father; their acts are common, their power equal.

27. Because he is the Son of man. Because He is the Messiah; for in this sense the phrase Son of man is often to be understood.

MATTHEW HENRY

condescension. To this low estate he stooped. Because he condescended to be the Son of Man, his Father made him Lord of all, Phil. ii. 8, 9. 2. His affinity and alliance to us. Being the Son of man, he is of the same nature with those whom he is set over. 3. His being the Messiah promised. He is the Messiah, and therefore is invested with all this power. Christ usually called himself the Son of man, which was the more humble title, and bespeaks him a prince and Saviour, not to the Jewish nation only, but to the whole race of mankind.

Secondly, That all men should honour the Son, v. 23. The honouring of Jesus Christ is here spoken of as God's great design, and as man's great duty. We must honour the Son, must confess that he is Lord, and worship him; must honour him who was dishonoured for us. Even as they honour the Father. This supposes it to be our duty to honour the Father, and directs us to honour the Son. To enforce this law, it is added, He that honours not the Son honours not the Father who has sent him. Some pretend a reverence for the Creator, and speak honourably of him, who make light of the Redeemer, and speak contemptibly of him. Indignities done to the Lord Jesus reflect upon God himself. The Father counts himself struck as through him. The reason of this is because it is the Father who hath sent him. Affronts to an ambassador are justly resented by the prince that sends him. Here is the rule by which the Son goes in executing this commission (v. 24): He that heareth and believeth hath everlasting life. Here we have the substance of the whole gospel.

First, The character of a Christian: He that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me. To be a Christian indeed is to hear the word of Christ. It is not enough to be within hearing of it, we must hear and obey, it must abide by the gospel of Christ as the fixed rule of our faith and practice. To believe on him that sent him; for Christ's design is to bring us to God. Christ is our way; God is our rest.

Secondly, The charter of a Christian. A charter of pardon: He shall not come into condemnation. The grace of the gospel is a full discharge from the curse of the law. A charter of privileges: He is passed out of death to life. Hear and live, believe and live, is what we may venture our souls upon. Here is the righteousness of his proceedings (v. 30). My judgment is just. His judgments are certainly just, for they are directed by the Father's wisdom: I can of my ownself do nothing, but as I hear I judge, as he had said before (v. 19). The Son can do nothing but what he sees the Father do; so here, nothing but what he hears the Father say: As I hear, 1. From the secret eternal counsels of the Father, so I judge. Would we know what we may depend upon in our dealing with God? Hear the word of Christ. What Christ has adjudged is an exact copy or counterpart of what the Father has decreed. 2. From the published records of the Old Testament. Christ, in all the execution of his undertaking, had an eye to the scripture. As it was written in the volume of the book. By the Father's will: My judgment is just, because I seek not my own will, but his who sent me. Not as if the will of Christ were contrary to the will of the Father. Christ has, as man, the natural and innocent affections of the human nature, sense of pain and pleasure, an inclination to life, an aversion to death: yet he pleased not himself, but acquiesced entirely in the will of his Father. What he did as Mediator was not the result of any peculiar or particular purpose and design of his own, but he was therein guided by his Father's will.

I. He sets aside his own testimony of himself (v. 31): "If I bear witness of myself, though it is infallibly true (ch. viii. 14), you will not admit it."

II. He produces other witnesses that bear testimony to him that he was sent of God.

1. The Father himself bore testimony to him (v. 32): There is another that beareth witness. I take this to be meant of God the Father. The seal which the Father put to his commission: He beareth witness of me, not only has done so by a voice from heaven, but still does so by the tokens of his presence with me. The satisfaction Christ had in this testimony: "I know that the witness which he witnesseth of me is true."

2. John Baptist witnessed to Christ, v. 33, &c. John came to bear witness of the light (ch. i. 7).

(1) Now the testimony of John was a solemn and public testimony: You sent an embassy of priests and Levites to John, which gave him an opportunity of publishing what he had to say. It was a true testimony: He bore witness to the truth. Christ does not say, He bore witness to me, but, like an honest man. He bore witness to the truth.

(2) Two things are added concerning John's

mark, that what Christ had properly in view was the indwelling of the Son's essential life in humanity as the great theater and medium of divine display, in both the great departments of His work—lifegiving and judgment. The appointment of a Judge in our own nature is one of the most beautiful arrangements of divine wisdom in redemption.

23. honour the Son as . . . the Father—As he who believes that Christ in the foregoing verses has given a true account of His relation to the Father must of necessity hold Him entitled to the same honor as the Father, so He here adds that it was the Father's express intention in making over all judgment to the Son, that men should thus honor Him. honoureth not the Father . . .—does not do it in fact, whatever he may imagine, and will be held as not doing it by the Father Himself, who will accept no homage which is not accorded to His own Son.

24. believeth on him that sent me—i.e., believeth in Him as having sent Me. I have spoken of the Son's right not only to heal the sick but to raise from the dead, and quicken whom He will: And now I say unto you, That life-giving operation has already passed upon all who receive My words as the Sent of the Father on the great errand of mercy. hath everlasting life—immediately on his believing (cf. ch. 3:18; I John 5:12, 13). is passed—'hath passed over' "from death unto life." What a transition! (Cf. I John 3:14).

30-32. of mine own self do nothing—i.e., apart from the Father, or in any interest than My own. (See on vs. 19.) as I hear—i.e., "My judgments are all anticipated in the bosom of My Father, to which I have immediate access, and by Me only responded to and reflected. They cannot therefore err, as I live for one end only, to carry into effect the will of Him that sent Me."

31. If I . . . witness of myself—standing alone, and setting up any separate interest.

32. There is another—i.e., the Father, as is plain from the connection. How brightly the distinction of the Persons shines out here! and I know that the witness . . .—"This is the Son's testimony to the Father's truth (see ch. 7:28; 8:26, 55). It testifies to the full consciousness on the part of the Son, even in the days of His humiliation, of the righteousness of the Father" [ALFORD]. And thus He cheered His spirit under the cloud of human opposition which was already gathering over His head.

ADAM CLARKE

23. That all men should honour the Son. If then the Son is to be honored, even as the Father is honored, then the Son must be God, as receiving that worship which belongs to God alone. To worship any creature is idolatry. Christ is to be honored even as the Father is honored; therefore Christ is not a creature, and, if not a creature, consequently the Creator. He that honoureth not the Son. God will not receive that man's adoration who refuses to honor Jesus, even as He honors Him. The Jews expected the Messiah as a great and powerful prince; but they never thought of a person coming in that character enrobed with all the attributes of Godhead. To lead them off from this error our Lord spoke the words recorded in these verses.

24. He that heareth my word—My doctrine—and believeth on him that sent me—he who credits My divine mission, that I am come to give light and life to the world by My doctrine and death—hath everlasting life—the seed of this life is sown in his heart the moment he believes—and shall not come into condemnation, "into judgment"—that which will speedily come on this unbelieving race, and that which shall overwhelm the wicked in the great day. But is passed from death unto life. Has "changed his country, or place of abode." Death is the country where every Christless soul lives. The man who knows not God lives a dying life or a living death; but he who believes in the Son of God passes over from the empire of death to the empire of life.

30. I can of mine own self do nothing. Because of My intimate union with God. See on v. 19. I seek not mine own will. I do not, I cannot attempt to do anything without God. This, that is, the Son of Man, the human nature which is the temple of My divinity, chap. i. 14, is perfectly subject to the deity that dwells in it. In this respect our blessed Lord is the perfect Pattern of all His followers. In everything their wills should submit to the will of their Heavenly Father.

31. If I bear witness. If I had no proof to bring of My being the Messiah, and equal to God, common sense would direct you to reject My testimony; but the mighty power of God, by which I work My miracles, sufficiently attests that My pretensions are well-founded.

32. There is another. God the Father, who by His Spirit in your prophets described My person, office, and miracles. You read these Scriptures, and you cannot help seeing that they testify of Me. No person ever did answer the description there given but myself, and I answer to that description in the fullest sense of the word.

33. Ye sent unto John. I am not without human testimony of the most respectable kind. Ye sent unto John, and he bare witness.

testimony:

[1] That it was a testimony more than he needed to vouch (v. 34): I receive not testimony from man. Christ needs no testimonials or certificates, but what his own worth and excellency bring with him; why then did Christ here urge the testimony of John? Why, these things I say, that you may be saved. This he aimed at in all this discourse, to save not his own life, but the souls of others. Christ desires and designs the salvation even of his enemies and persecutors.

[2] That it was a testimony to the man, because John Baptist was one whom they had a respect for (v. 35).

First, The character of John Baptist: He was a burning and a shining light. He was a light, not light (so Christ was the light), but a luminary, a derived subordinate light. He was a burning light, which denotes sincerity; painted fire may be made to shine, but that which burns is true fire. It denotes also his activity, zeal, and fervency. Fire is always working on itself or something else, so is a good minister. He was a shining light, which denotes either his exemplary conversation, in which our light should shine (Matt. v. 16), or an eminent diffusive influence.

Secondly, The affections of the people to him: You were willing for a season to rejoice in his light. 1. It was a transport that they were in, upon the appearing of John: "You delighted to rejoice in his light; you were very proud that you had such a man among you. You were willing to dance, and make a noise about this light, as boys about a bonfire." 2. It was but transient, and soon over: "You were fond of him for a season, as little children are fond of a new thing, but soon grew weary of him, and said that he had a devil, and now you have him in prison." It is common for forward and noisy professors to cool and fall off. These here rejoiced in John's light, but never walked in it. Christ mentions their respect to John, to condemn them for their present opposition to himself. If they had continued their veneration for John they would have embraced Christ.

3. Christ's own works witnessed to him (v. 36): I have a testimony greater than that of John; for if we believe the witness of men, the witness of God is greater, 1 John v. 9. We must be glad of all the supports that offer themselves for the confirmation of our faith, though they may not amount to a demonstration; we have occasion for them all. Now this greater testimony was that of the works which his Father had given him to finish. In general the whole course of his life and ministry. All that work of which he said when he died, It is finished; all he said and did was holy and heavenly, and a divine purity, power and grace shone in it, proving abundantly that he was sent of God. In particular, the miracles he wrought for the proof of his divine mission witnessed of him. Now it is here said, (1) That these works were given him by the Father, that is, he was both appointed and empowered to work them. (2) They were given to him to finish; and his finishing them proves a divine power. (3) These works did bear witness of him, did prove that he was sent of God. That the Father had sent him as a Father, not as a master sends his servant on an errand, but as a father sends his son to take possession for himself.

4. He produces, more fully than before, his Father's testimony concerning him (v. 37): The Father that sent me hath borne witness of me. God was pleased to bear witness of his Son himself by a voice from heaven at his baptism (Matt. iii. 17): This is my beloved Son. Those whom God sends he will bear witness of; where he gives a commission, he will not fail to seal it. Where God demands belief, he will not fail to give sufficient evidence, as he has done concerning Christ. If God himself thus bore witness of Christ, how came it to pass that he was not universally received by the Jewish nation and their rulers? To this Christ here answers that it was for two reasons: (1) Because they were not acquainted with such extraordinary revelations of God and his will: You have neither heard his voice at any time, nor seen his shape, or appearance. They showed themselves to be as ignorant of God as we are of a man we never either saw or heard. Ignorance of God is the true reason of men's rejecting the record he has given concerning his Son. (2) Because they were not affected with the ordinary ways by which God had revealed himself to them: You have not his word abiding in you, v. 38. First, The word of God was not in them; it was among them, but not in them, in their hearts: not ruling in their souls, but only shining in their eyes and sounding in their ears. What did it avail them that they had the oracles of God committed to them (Rom. iii. 2), when they had not these oracles commanding in them? If they had, they would readily have embraced Christ. Secondly, It did not abide. Many have the word of God coming into them, and making some impressions for awhile, but it does not

33-35. Ye sent unto John—(See ch. 1:19, etc.). receive not testimony ... from man—i.e., depend not on human testimony. but ... that ye might be saved—'I refer to him merely to aid your salvation.'

35. He was a burning and a shining light—lit., "the burning and shining lamp" (or torch):—i.e., 'the great light of his day.' Christ is never called by the humble word here applied to John—a light-bearer—studiously used to distinguish him from his Master, but ever the Light in the most absolute sense. (See on ch. 1:6.)

willing for a season—i.e., till they saw that it pointed whither they were not prepared to go. to rejoice in his light—There is a play of irony here, referring to the hollow delight with which his testimony tickled them.

36-38. I have greater witness—rather, The witness which I have is greater. the works ... bear witness of me—not simply as miracles nor even as a miracle of mercy, but these miracles, as He did them, with a will and a power, a majesty and a grace manifestly His own.

37. the Father himself ... hath borne witness of me—not referring, probably, to the voice of His baptism, but (as seems from what follows) to the testimony of the Old Testament Scripture [CALVIN, LUCKE, MEYER, LUTHARDT, etc.].

neither heard his voice ...—never recognized Him in this character. (The words are "designedly mysterious, like many others which our Lord uttered" [STIER]. 38. not his word abiding in you—passing now from the Witness to the testimony borne by Him in "the lively oracles": both were alike strangers to their breasts, as was evidenced by their rejecting Him to whom all that witness was borne.

ADAM CLARKE

34. But I receive not testimony from man (only). I have no need of John's testimony; the works that I do bear sufficient testimony to Me, v. 36. But these things I say. You believed John to be a prophet. A prophet cannot lie; he bore testimony that I am the Lamb of God, that beareth away the sin of the world, chap. i. 29. Therefore, that you may be saved by believing in Me as such, I have appealed to John's testimony.

35. He was a burning and a shining light. "He was a burning and a shining lamp." The expression of "lamp" our Lord took from the ordinary custom of the Jews, who termed their eminent doctors "the lamps of Israel." Burning may refer to the zeal with which John executed his message; and shining may refer to the clearness of the testimony which he bore concerning Christ. He who wishes to save souls must both burn and shine; the clear light of the knowledge of the sacred records must fill his understanding, and the holy flame of loving zeal must occupy his heart. Zeal without knowledge is continually blundering, and knowledge without zeal makes no converts to Christ. For a season. The time between his beginning to preach and his being cast into prison. To rejoice. "To jump for joy," as we would express it. They were exceedingly rejoiced to hear that the Messiah was come, because they expected Him to deliver them out of the hands of the Romans. But when a spiritual deliverance, of infinitely greater moment, was preached to them, they rejected both it and the light which made it manifest.

36. But I have greater witness. However decisive the judgment of such a man as John may be, nevertheless I am not obliged to depend on his testimony alone; for I have a greater one, that of Him whom you acknowledge to be your God. And how do I prove that this God bears testimony to Me? By My works: these miracles, which attest My mission and prove by themselves that nothing less than unlimited power and boundless love could ever produce them.

37. The Father himself ... hath borne witness. That is, by His prophets. Ye have neither heard his voice. I make these words, with Bishop Pearce, a parenthesis. The sense is—"Not that My Father ever appeared visibly or spake audibly to any of you; but He did it by the mouths of His prophets." Lately, however, He had added to their testimony His own voice from heaven on the day of Christ's baptism. See Matt. iii. 17.

38. Ye have not his word abiding in you. Though you believe the Scriptures to be of God, yet you do not let them take hold of your hearts—His word is in your mouth, but not in your mind.

MATTHEW HENRY

abide with them; it is not constantly in them, as a man at home, but only now and then, as a wayfaring man. But how did it appear that they had not the word of God abiding in them? It appeared by this, Whom he hath sent, him ye believe not. The indwelling of the word, and Spirit, and grace of God in us, is best tried by its effects, particularly by our receiving what he sends, especially Christ whom he hath sent.

5. The next witness he calls is the Old Testament, and to it he appeals (v. 39, &c.): Search the scriptures.

(1) This may be read, either, [1] "You search the scriptures, and you do well to do so." Christ owns that they did indeed search the scriptures, but it was in search of their own glory. It is possible for men to be very studious in the letter of the scripture, and yet to be strangers to the power and influence of it. Or, [2] As we read it: Search the scriptures. It was spoken to them in the nature of an appeal. When appeals are made to the scriptures they must be searched. Search the whole book of scripture throughout, compare one passage with another, and explain one by another. We must likewise search particular passages to the bottom, and see not what they seem to say, but what they say indeed. It is spoken to us in the nature of an advice. All those who would find Christ must search the scriptures, which denotes, 1. Diligence in seeking, close application of mind. 2. Desire and design of finding. We must often ask, "What am I now searching for?" We must search as those that sink for gold or silver, or that dive for pearl.

(2) Now there are two things which we are here directed to have in our eye, in our searching the scripture: heaven our end, and Christ our way. [1] For in them you think you have eternal life. The scripture assures us of an eternal state set before us, and offers to us an eternal life in that state. But to the Jews Christ saith only, You think you have eternal life in the scriptures. They looked for it by the bare reading and studying of the scripture. It was a common but corrupt saying among them, He that has the words of the law has eternal life. [2] We must search the scriptures for Christ, as the new and living way that leads to this end. These are they that testify of me. The scriptures, even those of the Old Testament, testify of Christ, and by them God bears witness to him. The Jews knew very well that the Old Testament testified of the Messiah, and were critical in their remarks upon the passages that looked that way; and yet were careless, and wretchedly overseen, in the application of them. Therefore we must search the scriptures, because they testify of Christ; for this is life eternal, to know him. Christ is the treasure hid in the field of the scriptures, the water in those wells.

(3) To this testimony he annexes a reproof in four instances.

[1] Their neglect of him and his doctrine: "You will not come to me, that you might have life," v. 40. Their estrangement from Christ was the fault not so much of their understandings as of their wills. Christ offered life, and it was not accepted. There is life to be had with Jesus Christ for poor souls. Life is the perfection of our being, and inclusive of all happiness; and Christ is our life. Those that would have this life must come to Jesus Christ for it, we may have it for the coming for. The only reason why sinners die is because they will not come to Christ; it is not because they cannot, but because they will not. They will not be cured, for they will not observe the methods of cure. Those words (v. 41), I receive not honour from men, come in in a parenthesis, to obviate an objection against him, as if he sought his own glory in obliging all to come to him. He did not covet nor court the applause of men. He had not the applause of men. Instead of receiving honour from men, he received a great deal of dishonour and disgrace from men. He needed not the applause of men; it was no addition to his glory.

[2] Their want of the love of God (v. 42): "I know you that you have not the love of God in you." The reason why people slight Christ is because they do not love God. He charged them (v. 37) with ignorance of God, and here with want of love to him; therefore men have not the love of God because they desire not the knowledge of him. The crime charged upon them: You have not the love of God in you. They pretended a great love to God, and thought they proved it by their zeal for the law, and yet they were really without the love of God. There are many who make a great profession of religion who yet show they want the love of God by their neglect of Christ. They hate his holiness and undervalue his goodness. It is the love of God in us, that love seated in the heart, that God will accept; the love shed abroad there. The proof of this charge, is given by the personal knowledge of Christ. I know you. Christ sees through all our disguises, and can say to each of us, I know thee.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

39-42. Search the scriptures . . . —'In the Scriptures ye find your charter of eternal life; go search them then, and you will find that I am the Great Burden of their testimony; yet ye will not come to Me for that life eternal which you profess to find there, and of which they tell you I am the appointed Dispenser.' (Cf. Acts 17:11, 12.) How touching and gracious are these last words! Observe here (I) The honor which Christ gives to the Scriptures, as a record which all have a right and are bound to search—the reverse of which the Church of Rome teaches; (2) The opposite extreme is, resting in the mere Book without the living Christ, to direct the soul to whom is its main use and chiefest glory.

ALBERT BARNES:

39. "Search the scriptures." The word translated search here means to search diligently or anxiously. It is applied to miners, who search for precious metals—who look anxiously for the bed of the ore with an intensity or anxiety proportionate to their sense of the value of the metal. It is applied by Homer to a lioness robbed of her whelps, and who searches the plain to trace out the footsteps of the man who has robbed her. It is also applied by him to dogs tracing their game by searching them out by the scent of the foot. It means a diligent, faithful, anxious investigation. The word may be either in the indicative or imperative mood. In our translation it is in the imperative, as if Jesus commanded them to search the Scriptures. Cyril, Erasmus, Beza, Bengel, Kuinoel, Tholuck, De Wette, and others, give it as in the indicative; Chrysostom, Augustine, Luther, Calvin, Wetstein, Stier, Alford, and others, regard it as in the imperative, or as a command. It is impossible to determine which is the true interpretation. Either of them makes good sense, and it is proper to use the passage in either signification. There is abundant evidence that the Jews did search the books of the Old Testament. It is equally clear that all men ought to do it.
—Popular Commentary

41. I receive not honour from men—contrasting His own end with theirs, which was to obtain human applause.

42. not the love of God in you—which would inspire you with a single desire to know His mind and will, and yield yourselves to it, in spite of prejudice and regardless of consequences.

ADAM CLARKE

39. Search the scriptures. This should be translated, not in the imperative, but in the indicative mood—thus, "You search the Scriptures diligently." That these words are commonly read in the imperative mood is sufficiently known; but this reading can never accord well with the following verse, nor can the force and energy of the words be perceived by this version. The rabbins strongly recommend the study of the Scriptures. The Talmud, Tract. Shabbath, fol. 30, brings in God thus addressing David: "I am better pleased with one day in which thou sittest and studiest the law, than I shall be with a thousand sacrifices which thy son Solomon shall offer upon my altar." The word which might be translated, "You search diligently," is very expressive. Homer, Il. xviii. l. 321, applies it to a lion deprived of his whelps, who "scours the plains, and traces the footsteps of the man." And in Odyss. xix. l. 436, to dogs tracing their game by the scent of the foot. In the Septuagint the verb answers to the Hebrew chapash, "to search by uncovering"; to chakar, "to search minutely, to explore"; to chashaph, "to strip, make bare"; and to mashash, "to feel, search by feeling." It is, says Chrysostom, "a metaphor taken from those who dig deep, and search for metals in the bowels of the earth. They look for the bed where the metal lies, and break every clod, and sift and examine the whole, in order to discover the ore."

40. And ye will not come to me. Though you thus search the Scriptures, in hopes of finding the Messiah and eternal life in them, yet ye will not come to me, believe in Me, and be My disciples, though so clearly pointed out by them, that you may have that eternal life, which can come only through Me.

41. I receive not honour from men. I do not stand in need of you or your testimony. I act through neither self-interest nor vanity. Your salvation can add nothing to Me, nor can your destruction injure Me. I speak only through My love for your souls, that you may be saved.

42. But I know you, that ye have not. Do not say that you oppose Me through zeal for God's honor and love for His name, because I make myself equal to Him; no, this is not the case. I know the dispositions of your souls; and I know you have neither love for His name nor zeal for His glory. You read the Scriptures, but you do not enter into their meaning.

MATTHEW HENRY

Christ knows men better than their neighbours know them. Christ knows men better than they know themselves. We may deceive ourselves, but we cannot deceive him.

[3] Another charge is their readiness to entertain false christs and false prophets (v. 43): I am come in my Father's name, and you receive me not. If another shall come in his own name, him you will receive. They would not receive Christ, who came in his Father's name. They hearken to everyone that will set up in his own name. They forsake their own mercies, which is bad enough; and it is for lying vanities, which is worse. Those are false prophets who come in their own name. It is just with God to suffer those to be deceived with false prophets who receive not the truth. They that shut their eyes against the true light are given up to wander endlessly after false lights, and to be led aside after every ignis fatuus. They loathe manna, and at the same time feed upon ashes.

[4] They are charged with pride and vain-glory, and unbelief, and the effect of them, v. 44. They therefore slighted and undervalued Christ because they admired and overvalued themselves.

First, their ambition of worldly honour. Christ despised it, v. 41. They set their hearts upon it: You receive honour one of another. "You desire to receive it, and aim at this in all you do. You give honour to others, and applaud them, only that they may return it, and may applaud you. What respect is shown to you you receive yourselves, and do not transmit to God."

Secondly, Their neglect of spiritual honour, called here the honour that comes from God only. This honour have all the saints. All that believe in Christ, through him receive the honour that comes from God. This honour that comes from God we must seek; we must account it our reward, as the Pharisees accounted the praise of men.

Thirdly, The influence this had upon their infidelity. How can you believe who are thus affected? The ambition and affectation of worldly honour are a great hindrance to faith in Christ. How can they believe, the summit of whose ambition is to make a fair show in the flesh?

6. The last witness here called is Moses, v. 45, &c. Christ here shows them,

(1) That Moses was a witness against the unbelieving Jews: There is one that accuses you, even Moses. This may be understood either, [1] As showing the difference between the law and the gospel. Moses, that is, the law, accuses you, for by the law is the knowledge of sin; it condemns you. But it is not the design of Christ's gospel to accuse us: Think not that I will accuse you. He came to be an advocate, not an accuser; to reconcile God and man. Or, [2] As showing the manifest unreasonableness of their infidelity: "Think not that I will appeal from your bar to God's and challenge you to answer there for what you do against me, as injured innocency usually does." Instead of accusing his crucifiers to his Father, he prayed, Father, forgive them. Nor let them mistake concerning Moses, as if he would stand by them in rejecting Christ; no, There is one that accuses you, even Moses in whom you trust. The Jews trusted in Moses, and thought their having his laws and ordinances would save them. Those that confide in their privileges will find that those very privileges will be witnesses against them.

(2) That Moses was a witness for Christ and to his doctrine (v. 46, 47): He wrote of me. The ceremonies of the law of Moses were figures of him that was to come. Christ here shows that Moses was so far from writing against Christ that he wrote for him, and of him. Christ here charges it on the Jews that they did not believe Moses. He had said (v. 45) that they trusted in Moses, they trusted to his name, but they did not receive his doctrine in its true sense and meaning. He proves this charge from their disbelief of him: Had you believed Moses, you would have believed me. Many say that they believe, whose actions give their words the lie. Those who rightly believe one part of scripture will receive every part. From their disbelief of Moses he infers that it was not strange that they rejected him: If you believe not his writings, how shall you believe my words? "If you do not believe sacred writings, those oracles which are in black and white, which is the most certain way of conveyance, how shall you believe my words, words being usually less regarded? If you believe not what Moses spoke and wrote of me, how shall you believe me and my mission?" If we admit not the premises, how shall we admit the conclusion. If therefore we believe not the divine inspiration of those writings, how shall we receive the doctrine of Christ?

Thus ends Christ's plea for himself. Their mouths were stopped for the present.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

42-47. if another shall come . . .—How strikingly has this been verified in the history of the Jews! "From the time of the true Christ to our time, sixty-four false Christs have been reckoned by whom they have been deceived" [BENGEL].

How can ye believe . . .—(See on vss. 40, 41). The "will not" of vs. 40, and "cannot" here are just different features of the same awful state of the human heart.

45. Do not think I will accuse you—'My errand hither is not to collect evidence to condemn you at God's bar.'

one that judgeth you, Moses . . .—'Alas! that will be too well done by another, and him the object of all your religious boastings—Moses,' here put for "the Law," the basis of the Old Testament Scriptures. 46. he wrote of me—"an important testimony to the subject of the whole Pentateuch—'of Me' " [ALFORD].

47. If ye believe not . . .—(See on Luke 16:31). his writings . . . my words—a remarkable contrast, not absolutely exalting Old Testament Scripture above His own words, but pointing to the office of those venerable documents to prepare Christ's way, to the necessity universally felt for documentary testimony in revealed religion, and perhaps (as STIER adds) to the relation which the comparative "letter" of the Old Testament holds to the more flowing "words" of "spirit and life" which characterize the New Testament.

ADAM CLARKE

43. I am come in my Father's name. With all His influence and authority. Among the rabbins it was essential to a teacher's credit that he should be able to support his doctrine by the authority of some eminent persons who had gone before. If another shall come in his own name. Having no divine influence and no other authority than his own, him ye will receive. For an account of these false Christs, see the notes on Matt. xxiv. 5.

ALBERT BARNES:

44. "Which receive honor one of another." Who are studious of praise, and live for pride, ambition, and vain glory. This desire, Jesus says, was the great reason why they would not believe on him. They were unwilling to renounce their worldly honors and become the followers of one so humble and unostentatious as he was. They expected a Messiah of pomp and splendor, and would not submit to one so despised and of so lowly a rank. Had the Messiah come, as they expected, with pomp and power, it would have been an honor, in their view, to follow him; as it was, they despised and rejected him. The great reason why the multitudes do not believe is their attachment to human honors, or their pride, and vanity, and ambition. These are so strong that while they continue they cannot and will not believe. They might, however, renounce these things, and then, the obstacles being removed, they would believe. Learn: (1) A man cannot believe the gospel while he is wholly under the influence of ambition. The two are not compatible. The religion of the gospel is humility, and a man who has not that cannot be a Christian. (2) Great numbers are deterred from being Christians by pride and ambition. Probably there is no single thing that prevents so many young men from becoming Christians as this passion. The proud and ambitious heart refuses to bow to the humiliating terms of the gospel. (3) Though while a man is under this governing principle he cannot believe the gospel, yet this proves nothing about his ability to lay that aside, and to yield to truth.
—Popular Commentary

44. How can ye believe, which receive honour? The grand obstacle to the salvation of the scribes and Pharisees was their pride, vanity, and self-love. They lived on each other's praise. If they had acknowledged Christ as the only Teacher, they must have given up the good opinion of the multitude; and they chose rather to lose their souls than to forfeit their reputation among men! From God only. Or "from the only God."

45. Do not think that I will accuse you. You have accused Me with a breach of the Sabbath, which accusation I have demonstrated to be false. I could, in return, accuse you, and substantiate the accusation, with the breach of the whole law; but this I need not do, for Moses, in whom ye trust, accuses you. You read his law, acknowledge you should obey it, and yet break it both in the letter and in the spirit.

46. He wrote of me. For instance, in reciting the prophecy of Jacob, Gen. xlix. 10: "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be." And in Deut. xviii. 18: "I will raise them up a Prophet from among their brethren, like unto thee, and will put my words in his mouth." Compare this with Acts iii. 22 and vii. 37.

47. But if ye believe not his writings. If you lay them not to heart—if you draw not those conclusions from them which their very letter, as well as their spirit, authorizes you to draw—how shall ye believe my words, against which you have taken up the most ungrounded prejudice?

MATTHEW HENRY

CHAPTER 6

We have here an account of Christ's feeding five thousand men with five loaves and two fishes. It is the only passage of the actions of Christ's life that is recorded by all the four evangelists. John relates this, because of the reference the following discourse has to it.

I. The place and time where and when this miracle was wrought.

1. The country that Christ was in (v. 1): He went over the sea of Galilee. Christ did not go directly over but made a coasting voyage to another place on the same side.

2. The company that he was attended with: A great multitude followed him, because they saw his miracles, v. 2. Our Lord Jesus, while he went about doing good, lived continually in a crowd. Good and useful men must not complain of a hurry of business, when they are serving God. It will be time enough to enjoy ourselves when we come to that world where we shall enjoy God. Christ's miracles drew many after him that were not effectually drawn to him.

3. Christ's posting himself advantageously to entertain them (v. 3): He went up into a mountain, and there he sat with his disciples, Christ was now driven to be a field preacher; but his word was never the worse for that to those who followed him still, not only when he went out to a desert place, but when he went up to a mountain, though up-hill be against heart. Whoever would might come, and find him there. He sat with his disciples.

4. The time when it was. After those things. We are told (v. 4) that it was when the passover was nigh. It was a custom with the Jews religiously to observe the approach of the passover thirty days before. Perhaps, the approach of the passover, when everyone knew Christ would go up to Jerusalem, and be absent for some time, made the multitude attend the more diligently on him. The prospect of losing our opportunities should quicken us to improve them with double diligence.

II. The miracle itself.

1. The notice Christ took of the crowd that attended him (v. 5): He lifted up his eyes, and saw a great company come to him. Christ showed himself pleased with their attendance, and concerned for their welfare, to teach us to condescend to those of low estate, and not to set those with the dogs of our flock whom Christ hath set with the lambs of his.

2. The enquiry he made concerning the way of providing for them. He directed himself to Philip, who had been his disciple from the first, and had seen all his miracles, and particularly that of his turning water into wine. Those that have been witnesses of Christ's works, and have shared in the benefit of them, are inexcusable if they say, Can he furnish a table in the wilderness? Philip was of Bethsaida, in the neighbourhood of which town Christ now was, and therefore he was most likely to help them to provision at the best hand. Now Christ asked, Whence shall we buy bread, that these may eat? He takes it for granted that they must all eat with him. One would think that when he had taught and healed them he had done his part; yet he is solicitous to entertain them. Those that will accept Christ's spiritual gifts, instead of paying for them, shall be paid for their acceptance of them. His enquiry is, Whence shall we buy bread? He will buy to give, and we must labour that we may give, Eph. iv. 28.

3. The design of this enquiry; it was only to try the faith of Philip, for he himself knew what he would do, v. 6. When we know not, he himself knows what he will do. When Christ is pleased to puzzle his people, it is only with a design to prove them.

4. Philip's answer to this question: "Two hundred pennyworth of bread is not sufficient, v. 7. Neither will the country afford so much bread, nor can we afford to lay out so much money." Philip would go as near hand as he could, would have everyone to take a little. Christ might now have said to him, as he did afterwards, Have I been so long with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip? We are apt thus to distrust God's power when visible and ordinary means fails, that is, to trust him no further than we can see him.

5. The information which Christ received concerning the provision they had. It was Andrew who acquainted Christ with what they had at hand; and in this we may see,

(1) The strength of his love to those for whom he saw his Master concerned, in that he was willing to bring out all they had, though he knew not but they might want themselves, and anyone would have said, Charity begins at home. He did not go about to conceal it. It was five barley loaves, and two small fishes. The provision was coarse and ordinary; they were barley loaves. Christ and his disciples were glad of

4. passover . . . was nigh—but for the reason mentioned (ch. 7:1), Jesus kept away from it, remaining in Galilee.

F. B. MEYER:

The multitude satisfied with food. In this chapter we have a further illustration of John's method in selecting for his purpose the miracles which became the texts of our Lord's discourses. These multitudes had evidently gathered on their way to Jerusalem to celebrate the Passover. The imminence of that great festival, when the worshipers not only sacrificed but partook of the slain lamb, gave point to much that our Lord said after this memorable feeding of the multitude.

Christ often tests us to see what we shall say and do in the presence of overwhelming difficulty, but he always knows the way out. We at once begin to calculate our paltry resources and to confess their inadequacy. We come back to explain that when we have done our utmost, we can provide very little. Then he steps in, determined that everyone shall be "filled," with an ample supply left over. He makes his guests sit down in comfort on the grass, because there is plenty of time, as well as an abundance of food, for a happy and comfortable meal. We must bring him what we have, however slender; must enter into his great plan and arrange the people for the banquet; must distribute the food and gather up the broken pieces. The world is to be fed by the cooperation of Christ and his Church.

1. After these things. This is a sort of indefinite expression, from which we can gather nothing relative to the time in which these things happened. Jesus went over the sea of Galilee. Or, as some translate the words, "by the side of the sea of Galilee." From Luke, chap. ix. 10, we learn that this was a desert place in the vicinity of Bethsaida. The sea of Galilee, Gennesaret, and Tiberias are the same in the New Testament with the sea of Cinnereth in the Old. Tiberias was a city in Galilee, situated on the western side of the lake.

2. They saw his miracles which he did. John does not mention these miracles but Matthew details them, from chap. xii. 2 to chap. xiv. 13. John seems more intent on supplying the deficiencies of the other Evangelists than in writing a connected history himself.

3. Went up into a mountain. This mountain must have been in the desert of Bethsaida, in the territories of Philip, tetrarch of Galilee. Our Lord withdrew to this place for a little rest; for He and His disciples had been so thronged with the multitudes, continually coming and going, that they had not time to take necessary food. See Mark vi. 31.

4. And the passover . . . was nigh. This happened about ten or twelve days before the third Passover which Christ celebrated after His baptism. For a particular account of our Lord's four Passovers see the note on chap. ii. 13. For thirty days before the Passover there were great preparations made by the Jews, but especially in the last nineteen days, in order to celebrate the feast with due solemnity.

5. Saw a great company. See this miracle explained at large on Matt. xiv. 13, etc.; Mark vi. 31, etc.; Luke ix. 10, etc. In speaking of the Passovers and various other matters it does not appear that John follows any strict chronological order. Saith unto Philip. This, with what follows to the end of the seventh verse, is not mentioned by any of the other Evangelists. Philip was probably the provider for the disciples, as Judas was the treasurer. Whence shall we buy bread? Instead of shall we buy, I should read "may we buy," which is the reading of many MSS. As Philip was of Bethsaida, chap. i. 44; xii. 21, he must have been much better acquainted with the country in which they then were than any other of the disciples.

6. This he said to prove him. To try his faith, and to see whether he and the other apostles had paid proper attention to the miracles which they had already seen Him work; and to draw their attention more particularly to that which He was now about to perform. This is an observation of the Evangelist himself, who often interweaves his own judgment with the facts he relates, which Matthew rarely ever does.

8. Andrew, Simon Peter's brother, saith. The other Evangelists attribute this answer to the apostles in general. See the passages referred to above.

9. There is a lad here. A "little boy," or "servant," probably one who carried the apostles' provisions, or who came on purpose to sell his bread and fish. Five barley loaves. Barley bore scarcely one-third of the value of wheat in the East; see Rev. vi. 6. That it was a very mean fare appears from Ezek. xiii. 19, where the false prophetesses are said to pollute the name barley-bread. It does not follow hence that we should tie ourselves to such coarse fare, and place religion in it (when God brings that which is finer to our hands, let us receive it, and be thankful). Barley-bread is what Christ had, and better than we deserve. It was but short and scanty; there were but five loaves, and those so small that one little lad carried them all. There were but two fishes, and those small ones. The provision of bread was little, but that of fish was less in proportion to it, so that many a bit of dry bread they must eat before they could make a meal. Well, Andrew was willing that the people should have this, as far as it would go. A distrustful fear of wanting ourselves should not hinder us from needful charity to others.

(2) See here the weakness of his faith in that word, "But what are they among so many?" Philip and he had not that actual consideration of the power of Christ which they should have had.

6. The directions Christ gave the disciples to seat the guests (v. 10): "Make the men sit down." This was like sending providence to market, and going to buy without money. (1) The furniture of the dining-room: there was much grass in that place. Here was this plenty of grass where Christ was preaching; the gospel brings other blessings along with it. This plenty of grass made the place the more commodious for those that must sit on the ground, and served them for cushions, and, considering what Christ says of the grass of the field (Matt. vi. 29, 30), these excelled those of Ahasuerus: nature's pomp is the most glorious. (2) The number of the guests: About five thousand: a great entertainment, representing that of the gospel, which is a feast for all nations (Isa. xxv. 6), a feast for all comers.

7. The distribution of the provision, v. 11. It was done with thanksgiving: He gave thanks. We ought to give thanks to God for our food, for it is a mercy to have it. Though our provision be coarse and scanty, though we have neither plenty nor dainty, yet we must give thanks to God for what we have. It was distributed from the hands of Christ by the hands of his disciples, v. 11. All our comforts come to us originally from the hand of Christ; whoever brings them, it is he that sends them. It was done to universal satisfaction. They did not everyone take a little, but all had as much as they would. How agreeable this miraculous food may be supposed to have been, above common food. Those whom Christ feeds with the bread of life he does not stint. There were but two small fishes, and yet they had of them too as much as they would. Those who call feeding upon fish fasting, reproach the entertainment Christ here made, which was a full feast.

8. The care that was taken of the broken meat. The orders Christ gave concerning it (v. 12): When they were filled Christ said to the disciples, Gather up the fragments. We must always take care that we make no waste of any of God's good creatures; for the grant we have of them is with this proviso, wilful waste only excepted. It is just with God to bring us to the want of that which we make waste of. When we are filled we must remember that others want, and we may want. Those that would have wherewith to be charitable must be provident. Christ did not order the broken meat to be gathered up till all were filled; we must not begin to hoard and lay up till all is laid out that ought to be. The observance of these orders (v. 13): They filled twelve baskets with the fragments, which was an evidence not only of the truth of the miracle, that they were fed, but of the greatness of it; they were not only filled, but there was all this over and above. See how large the divine bounty is; bread enough, and to spare, in our Father's house. The fragments filled twelve baskets, one for each disciple; they were thus repaid with interest for their willingness to part with what they had for public service.

III. Here is the influence which this miracle had upon the people (v. 14): They said, This is of a truth that prophet. Even the vulgar Jews with great assurance expected the Messiah to come into the world, and to be a great prophet. The Pharisees despised them as not knowing the law; but, it should seem, they knew more of him that is the end of the law than the Pharisees did. The miracles which Christ wrought did clearly demonstrate that he was the Messiah promised, a teacher come from God, the great prophet. There were many who were convinced he was that prophet that should come into the world who yet did not cordially receive his doctrine. It is possible for men to acknowledge that Christ is that prophet, and yet to turn a deaf ear to him.

I. Christ's retirement from the multitude.

1. What induced him to retire; because he per-

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

Christ's preparation for making our poor resources adequate for anything is to drive home into our hearts the consciousness of their insufficiency. We need, first of all, to be brought to this: "All that I have is this wretched little stock; and what is that measured against the work that I have to do and the claims upon me?" Only when we are brought to that can His great power pour itself into us and fill us with rejoicing and overcoming strength. The old mystics used to say, and they said truly: "You must be emptied of yourself before you can be filled by God." And the first thing for any man to learn, in preparation for receiving a mightier power than his own into his opening heart, is to know that all his own strength is utter and absolute weakness. "What are they among so many?" When we have once gone right down into the depths of felt impotence, and when our work has risen before us, as if it were far too great for our poor strengths which are weaknesses, then we are brought, and only then, into the position in which we may begin to hope that power equal to our desire will be poured into our souls.

And so the last of the preparations that I will touch upon is that majestic preparation for blessing by obedience. "And Jesus said, Make the men sit down." And there they sat themselves, as Mark puts it in his picturesque way, like so many garden plots—the rectangular oblongs in a garden in which pot herbs are grown—on the green grass, below the blue sky, by the side of the quiet lake. Cannot you fancy how some of them seated themselves with a scoff, and some with a quiet smile of incredulity; and some half sheepishly and reluctantly; and some in mute expectancy; and some in foolish wonder; and yet all of them with a partial obedience? And says John in the true translation: "So the men sat down, therefore Jesus took the loaves." Sit you down where He bids you, and your mouths will not be long empty. Do the things He tells you, and you will get the food that you need. Our business is to obey and to wait, and His business is, when we are seated, to open His hand and let the mercy drop. So much for the preparations for this great miracle.—Expositions of Holy Scripture of God "for handfuls of barley," i.e., for the meanest reward. And Plutarch, in Apoph., p. 174, speaking concerning the flight of Artaxerxes Mnemon, says he was reduced to such distress as to be obliged to eat barley bread. Two small fishes. The word signifies "whatever is eaten with bread," to perfect the meal, or to help the digestion.

10. There was much grass in the place. Perhaps newly mown grass, or hay, is meant (so the Vulgate foenum), and this circumstance marks out more particularly that the Passover was at hand. In Palestine the grass is ready for mowing in March, and this miracle seems to have been wrought only a few days before the commencement of that festival.

11. Jesus took the loaves. See the notes on Matt. xiv. 19-21. As there were 5 loaves and 5,000 people, so there was one loaf to every thousand men, independently of the women and children.

12. Gather up the fragments. Among the Jews the peah, or residue after a meal, was the property of the servitors.

14. This is of a truth that prophet. Spoken of in Deut. xviii. 15, viz., the Messiah. How near were these people at this time to the kingdom of Heaven!

MATTHEW HENRY

ceived that those who acknowledged him to be that prophet would come, and take him by force, to make him a king, v. 15. Now here we have an instance,

(1) Of the irregular zeal of some of Christ's followers; nothing would serve but they would make him a king. This was an act of zeal for the honour of Christ. They were concerned to see so great a benefactor to the world so little esteemed in it; and therefore they would make him a king. Those whom Christ has feasted with the royal dainties of heaven should, in return for his favour, make him their king, and set him upon the throne in their souls. It was an irregular zeal. It was grounded upon a mistake concerning the nature of Christ's kingdom, as if it were to be of this world, and he must appear with outward pomp. Such a king as this they would make him, which was as great a disparagement to his glory as it would be to lacker gold or paint a ruby. Right notions of Christ's kingdom would keep us to right methods for advancing it. It was excited by the love of the flesh; they would make him their king who could feed them so plentifully without their toil, and save them from the curse of eating their bread in the sweat of their face. It was intended to carry on a secular design; they hoped this might be a fair opportunity of shaking off the Roman yoke. Thus is religion often prostituted to a secular interest, and Christ is served only to serve a turn. Jesus is usually sought after for something else, not for his own sake. It was contrary to the mind of our Lord Jesus himself; for they would take him by force, whether he would or no.

(2) Of the humility of the Lord Jesus, that he departed; so far was he from countenancing the design that he effectually quashed it. Herein he has left a testimony against ambition and affectation of worldly honour. Let us not then covet to be the idols of the crowd, nor be desirous of vain-glory. It is a testimony also against faction and sedition, treason and rebellion, and whatever tends to disturb the peace of kings and provinces. Whither he retired: He departed again into a mountain, into the mountain, the mountain where he had preached (v. 3), and then returned to it alone, to be private. Christ chose sometimes to be alone for the more free converse with God, and our own souls are never less alone, than when alone.

II. The disciples' distress at sea.

1. Here is their going down to the sea in a ship (v. 16, 17): When even was come, and they had done their day's work, it was time to look homeward, and therefore they went aboard, and set sail for Capernaum.

2. Here is the stormy wind arising. They had lately been feasted at Christ's table; but after the sunshine of comfort expect a storm. It was now dark. Sometimes the people of God are in trouble, and cannot see their way out; in the dark concerning the cause of their trouble, concerning the design and tendency of it, and what the issue will be. Jesus was not come to them. The absence of Christ is the great aggravation of the troubles of Christians. The sea rose by reason of a great wind. It was calm and fair when they put to sea, but it arose when they were at sea. In times of tranquillity we must prepare for trouble, for it may arise when we little think of it. Clouds and darkness sometimes surround the children of the light, and of the day.

3. Here is Christ's seasonable approach to them, v. 19. They had rowed about twenty-five or thirty furlongs. And, when they were got off a good way at sea, they see Jesus walking on the sea. The power Christ has over the laws and customs of nature. Christ walked upon the water as upon dry land. The concern Christ has for his disciples in distress: He drew nigh to the ship. He will not leave them comfortless when they seem to be tossed with tempests and not comforted. The relief Christ gives to his disciples in their fears. They were afraid, more afraid of an apparition (for so they supposed him to be) than of the winds and waves. When they thought a demon haunted them, they were more terrified than they had been while they saw nothing in it but what was natural. Our real distresses are often much increased by our imaginary ones. We are often not only worse frightened than hurt, but then most frightened when we are ready to be helped. How affectionately did Christ silence their fears with that compassionate word (v. 20), It is I, be not afraid! Nothing more powerful to comfort saints than this, "I am Jesus whom thou lovest; be not afraid of me, nor of the storm." When trouble is nigh Christ is nigh.

4. Here is their speedy arrival at the port they were bound for, v. 17. They welcomed Christ into the ship; they willingly received him. Christ's absenting himself for a time is but so much the more to endear himself, at his return, to his disciples. Christ

A. B. SIMPSON:

This is one of Christ's most impressive miracles, showing His absolute command over all the laws and forces of nature; and the scale upon which it was wrought was so magnificent that it left the profoundest impression on the multitudes who witnessed it. So much so, indeed, that in the enthusiasm of the moment they impetuously determined to compel Him to become the leader of a great popular movement, and allow them to make Him their actual king. Of course, this was but a superficial, and even a selfish movement. He knew their hearts better than they themselves did, and a few days afterward declared to them, "Ye seek not me because ye saw the miracles, but because ye did eat of the loaves and were filled." The Greek word in this last sentence denotes the grossest, the most animal satisfaction. They wanted a king that could gratify their earthly desires, and give them immunity from laboring and suffering, but had no appreciation of Christ's higher character and teaching. At the same time, their testimony, on this occasion, was sincere and spontaneous, as far as they knew themselves, and bears witness to the power of Christ and the influence of His mighty works.

—Christ in the Bible

15. departed . . . to a mountain himself alone—(1) to rest, which He came to this "desert place" on purpose to do before the miracle of the loaves, but could not for the multitude that followed Him (see on Mark 6:31); and (2) "to pray" (Matt. 14:23; Mark 6:46). But from His mountain-top He kept watching the ship (see on vs. 18), and doubtless prayed both for them, and with a view to the new manifestation which He was to give them of His glory. 16, 17. when even was come—(See on Mark 6:35). entered into a ship—"constrained" to do so by their Master (Matt. 14:22; Mark 6:45), in order to put an end to the misdirected excitement in His favor (vs. 15), into which the disciples themselves may have been somewhat drawn. The word "constrained" implies reluctance on their part, perhaps from unwillingness to part with their Master and embark at night, leaving Him alone on the mountain. went—rather, "were proceeding." toward Capernaum—Mark says (6:45), "unto Bethsaida," meaning "Bethsaida of Galilee" (ch. 12:21), on the west side of the lake. The place they left was of the same name (see on Mark 6:31). Jesus was not come to them—They probably lingered in hopes of His still joining them, and so let the darkness come on. 18, 19. sea arose . . .—and they were "now in the midst of it" (Matt. 14:24). Mark adds the graphic and touching particular, "He saw them toiling in rowing" (6:48), putting forth all their strength to buffet the waves and bear on against a head wind, but to little effect. He saw this from His mountain-top, and through the darkness of the night, for His heart was all with them; yet would He not go to their relief till His own time came. 19. they see Jesus—"about the fourth watch of the night" (Matt. 14:25; Mark 6:48), or between three and six in the morning. walking on the sea—What Job (9:8) celebrates as the distinguishing prerogative of GOD, "WHO ALONE spreadeth out the heavens, and TREADETH UPON THE WAVES OF THE SEA"—what AGUR challenges as GOD'S unapproachable prerogative, to "GATHER THE WIND IN HIS FISTS, and BIND THE WATERS IN A GARMENT" (Prov. 30:4)—lo! this is here done in flesh, by "THE SON OF MAN." drawing nigh to the ship—yet as though He "would have passed by them," Mark 6:48 (cf. Luke 24:28; Gen. 18:3:5; 32:24-26). they were afraid—"cried out for fear" (Matt. 14:26), "supposing it had been a spirit" (Mark 6:49). He would appear to them at first like a dark moving speck upon the waters; then as a human figure, but—in the dark tempestuous sky, and not dreaming that it could be their Lord—they take it for a spirit. (How often thus we miscall our chiefest mercies—not only thinking them distant when they are near, but thinking the best the worst!) 20. It is I; be not afraid—Matthew and Mark give before these exhilarating words, that to them well-known one, "Be of good cheer!" 21. willingly received him into the ship—their first fears being now converted

ADAM CLARKE

15. Take him by force, to make him a king. The Jews had often suffered by famine in those times in which their enemies were permitted to prevail over them; but, finding that Jesus had such power as to multiply a few loaves to feed thousands, they took it for granted that while He was at their head no evil could possibly happen to them and therefore were determined immediately to proclaim Him king and rid themselves at once of Herod and the Romans. Our Lord perceiving this, either by some words which they had dropped or by His penetration of their hearts, retired before the project had been fully formed or could be put into execution. It was not till a considerable time afterwards that even the disciples fully understood that His kingdom was not of this world. Into a mountain. That on which He was with His disciples previously to His working this miracle; see v. 3. Matthew, chap. xiv. 22-23, and Mark, vi. 45-46, say that before this Jesus constrained His disciples to embark in the vessel and go along the seacoast towards Capernaum, or Bethsaida—see here v. 17, and the note on Mark vi. 45; and that after they were gone He dismissed the multitudes, having no doubt given them such advices as the nature of the case required, after which He went into the mountain to pray.

17. Toward Capernaum. Mark says, chap. vi. 45, that our Lord commanded them to go along to Bethsaida; and in the course of the history we find they got neither to Bethsaida nor Capernaum, but landed in the country of Gennesaret, Matt. xiv. 34. Our Lord seems to have desired them to go to either Bethsaida or Capernaum, which were only a very few miles distant, and on the same side of the sea. The reason why they could reach neither was the storm which the Evangelists say rose at the time, and the wind being contrary.

19. Had rowed. Their vessel was a small one only, something of the boat kind. As to sails, if they had any they could not now venture to carry them because of the storm. Five and twenty or thirty furlongs. Between three and four miles.

MATTHEW HENRY

brought them safely to the shore: Immediately the ship was at the land whither they went. The ship of the church may be much shattered and distressed, yet it shall come safe to the harbour at last. The disciples had rowed hard, but could not make their point till they had got Christ in the ship, and then the work was done suddenly. If we have received Christ Jesus the Lord, though the night be dark and the wind high, yet we may comfort ourselves with this, that we shall be at shore shortly, and are nearer to it than we think we are.

Verses 22–27

I. The careful enquiry which the people made after Christ, v. 23, 24. They saw Christ retire to the mountain. They way-laid his return, and the day following,

1. They were much at a loss for him. He was gone, and they knew not what was become of him. They saw there was no boat there but that in which the disciples went off. They observed also that Jesus did not go with his disciples, but that they went off alone.

2. They were very industrious in seeking him. They searched the places thereabouts, and when they saw that Jesus was not there, nor his disciples, they resolved to search elsewhere. Those whom Christ has feasted with the bread of life should have their souls carried out in earnest desires towards him. Much would have more, in communion with Christ. They resolved to go to Capernaum in quest of him. Thither his disciples were gone; and they knew he would not be long absent from them. Providence favoured them with an opportunity of going thither, for there came other boats from Tiberias, nigh to the place where they did eat bread. Those that in sincerity seek Christ are commonly owned and assisted by Providence in those pursuits. The evangelist adds, After that the Lord had given thanks, v. 11. So much were the disciples affected with their Master's giving thanks that they could never forget the impressions made upon them by it. This was the grace and beauty of that meal, and made it remarkable; their hearts burned within them.

3. They also took shipping, and came to Capernaum, seeking for Jesus. Their convictions being strong, and their desires warm, they followed him. Good motions are often crushed, and come to nothing, for want of being prosecuted in time. They came to Capernaum, and, for aught that appears, had a calm and pleasant passage, while his sincere disciples had a rough and stormy one. It is not strange if it fare worst with the best men in this evil world. They came, seeking Jesus.

II. The success of this enquiry: They found him on the other side of the sea, v. 25. It is worth while to cross a sea to seek Christ, if we may but find him at last. These people appeared afterwards to be unsound, and not actuated by any good principle, and yet were thus zealous. If men have no more to show for their love to Christ than their running after sermons and prayers, and their pangs of affection to good preaching, they have reason to suspect themselves no better than this eager crowd. But though these people were no better principled, and Christ knew it, yet he was willing to be found of them.

III. The question they put to him: Rabbi, when camest thou hither? It should seem by v. 59 that they found him in the synagogue. There they found him, and all they had to say to him was, Rabbi, when camest thou hither? Their enquiry refers not only to the time, but to the manner, of his conveying himself thither; not only When, but "How camest thou hither?" They were curious in asking concerning Christ's motions, but not solicitous to observe their own.

IV. The answer Christ gave them, such an answer as their case required.

1. He discovers the corrupt principle they acted from in following him (v. 26): "Verily, verily, I say unto you. You seek me; that is well, but it is not from a good principle." Christ knows not only what we do, but why we do it. Not because you saw the miracles. It was for their own bellies' sake: Because you did eat of the loaves, and were filled; not because he taught them, but because he fed them. He had given them a full meal's meat: They did eat, and were filled; and some of them perhaps were so poor that they had not known of a long time before now what it was to have enough, to eat and leave. A cheap meal's meat, that cost them nothing. Many follow Christ for loaves, and not for love. These people complimented Christ with Rabbi, yet he told them thus faithfully of their hypocrisy; his ministers must hence learn not to flatter those that flatter them, but to give faithful reproofs where there is cause for them.

2. He directs them to better principles (v. 27): Labour for that meat which endures to everlasting life. His design is, into wonder and delight. and immediately the ship was at the land—This additional miracle, for as such it is manifestly related, is recorded here alone. Yet all that is meant seems to be that as the storm was suddenly calmed, so the little bark—propelled by the secret power of the Lord of Nature now sailing in it—glided through the now unruffled waters, and while they were wrapt in wonder at what had happened, not heeding their rapid motion, was found at port, to their still further surprise.

22-71. JESUS, FOLLOWED BY THE MULTITUDES TO CAPERNAUM, DISCOURSES TO THEM IN THE SYNAGOGUE OF THE BREAD OF LIFE—EFFECT OF THIS ON TWO CLASSES OF THE DISCIPLES. 22-24. These verses are a little involved, from the Evangelist's desire to mention every circumstance, however minute, that might call up the scene as vividly to the reader as it stood before his own view. The day following—the miracle of the loaves, and the stormy night; the day on which they landed at Capernaum. the people which stood on the other side of the sea—not the whole multitude that had been fed, but only such of them as remained over night about the shore, i.e., on the east side of the lake; for we are supposed to have come, with Jesus and His disciples in the ship, to the west side, to Capernaum. saw that there was none other boat there . . .—The meaning is, the people had observed that there had been only one boat on the east side where they were; namely, the one in which the disciples had crossed at night to the other, the west side, and they had also observed that Jesus had not gone on board that boat, but His disciples had put off without Him: "Howbeit," adds the Evangelist, in a lively parenthesis, "there came other boats from Tiberias" (which lay near the southwest coast of the lake), whose passengers were part of the multitude that had followed Jesus to the east side, and been miraculously fed; these boats were fastened somewhere (says the Evangelist) "nigh unto the place where they did eat bread, after that the Lord had given thanks"—thus he refers to the glorious "miracle of the loaves"—and now they were put in requisition to convey the people back again to the west side. For when "the people saw that Jesus was not there, neither His disciples, they also took shipping [in these boats] and came to Capernaum, seeking for Jesus." 25. when they had found him on the other side—at Capernaum—they said . . .—astonished at His being there, and wondering how He could have accomplished it, whether by land or water, and when He came; for being quite unaware of His having walked upon the sea and landed with the disciples in the ship, they could not see how, unless He had travelled all night round the head of the lake alone, He could have reached Capernaum, and even then, how He could have arrived before themselves.

26. Ye seek me . . .—Jesus does not put them through their difficulty, says nothing of His treading on the waves of the sea, nor even notices their question, but takes advantage of the favorable moment for pointing out to them how forward, flippant, and superficial were their views, and how low their desires. "Ye seek Me not because ye saw the miracles"—lit., 'the signs,' i.e., supernatural tokens of a higher presence, and a divine commission, "but because ye did eat of the loaves and were filled." From this He proceeds at once to that other Bread, just as, with the woman of Samaria, to that other Water (ch. 4). We should have supposed all that follows to have been delivered by the wayside, or wherever they happened first to meet. But from vs. 59 we gather that they had probably met about the door of the synagogue—"for that was the day in which they assembled in their synagogues" [LIGHTFOOT]—and that on being asked, at the close of the service, if He had any word of exhortation to the people, He had taken the two breads, the perishing and the living bread, for the subject of His profound and extraordinary discourse.

ADAM CLARKE

21. Immediately the ship was at the land. How far they were from the place at which they landed when our Lord came to them, we know not. But the Evangelist seems to speak of their sudden arrival there as extraordinary and miraculous.

23. There came other boats. After Jesus and His disciples had departed. From Tiberias. Herod Antipas built this city near the lake of Gennesaret, in the best parts of Galilee, and called it Tiberias, in honor of Tiberius, the Roman emperor; see Jos., Ant., book xviii, chap. 2, sec. 3.

24. They also took shipping. That is, as many of them as could get accommodated with boats took them, and thus got to Capernaum. But many others doubtless went thither on foot, as it is not at all likely that five or six thousand persons could get boats enough to carry them.

25. On the other side of the sea. That is, on the seacoast, to the northward of it, where Capernaum lies in the land of Gennesaret. It was in one of the synagogues of Capernaum that He delivered the following discourse; see v. 59.

26. Ye seek me, not because ye saw. Though the miracle of the loaves was one of the most astonishing that ever was wrought upon earth; and though this people had, by the testimony of all their senses, the most convincing proof of its reality; yet we find many of them paid little attention to it, and regarded the omnipotent hand of God in it no further than it went to satisfy the demands of their appetite! Most men are willing to receive temporal good from the hands of God; and there are few, very few, who are willing to receive spiritual blessings.

MATTHEW HENRY

(1) To moderate our worldly pursuits: Labour not for the meat that perishes. We must not make the things of this world our chief care and concern. The things of the world are meat that perishes. Worldly wealth, honour, and pleasure, are meat; they feed the fancy (and many times this is all) and fill the belly. These are things which men hunger after as meat. Those that have the largest share of them are not sure to have them while they live, but are sure to leave them and lose them when they die. It is therefore folly for us inordinately to labour after them. We must not make these perishing things our chief good.

(2) To quicken and excite our gracious pursuits: "Labour for that meat which belongs to the soul." It is unspeakably desirable: It is meat which endures to everlasting life; it is a happiness which will last as long as we must, which not only itself endures eternally, but will nourish us up to everlasting life. It is undoubtedly attainable. It is that which the Son of man shall give. First, Who gives this meat: the Son of man, who has power to give eternal life, with all the means of it. We are told to labour for it, as if it were to be got by our own industry, and sold upon that valuable consideration. But, when we have laboured ever so much for it, we have not merited it as our hire, but the Son of man gives it. And what more free than gift? Secondly, What authority he has to give it; for him has God the Father sealed. He has sealed him, that is, has given him full authority to deal between God and man, as God's ambassador to man and man's intercessor with God, and has proved his commission by miracles.

He gave them leave to ask him questions, and did not resent the interruption as an affront. Those that would be apt to teach must be swift to hear, and study to answer.

I. They enquire what work they must do, and he answers them, v. 28, 29. Their enquiry was pertinent enough (v. 28): What shall we do, that we may work the works of God? A humble serious question, showing them to be, at least for the present, in a good mind, and willing to know and do their duty. They were convinced that those who would obtain this everlasting meat, (1) Must aim to do something great. Those who look high in their expectations, must aim high in those endeavours, and study to do the works of God, distinguished from the works of worldly men in their worldly pursuits. It is not enough to speak the words of God, but we must do the works of God. (2) Must be willing to do anything: What shall we do? Lord, I am ready to do whatever thou shalt appoint. Christ's answer was plain enough (v. 29): This is the work of God that ye believe. The work of faith is the work of God. They enquire after the works of God (in the plural number), being careful about many things; but Christ directs them to the one thing needful; that you believe. Without faith you cannot please God. That faith is the work of God which closes with Christ; to rest upon him, and resign ourselves to him.

II. Christ having told them that the Son of man would give them this meat, they enquire concerning him.

1. Their enquiry is after a sign (v. 30): What sign showest thou? Thus far they were right, that, since he required them to give him credit, he should produce his credentials. But herein they missed it,

(1) That they overlooked the many miracles which they had seen wrought by him. Is this a time of day to ask, "What sign showest thou?" especially at Capernaum, where he had done so many mighty works. Were not these very persons but the other day miraculously fed by him? None so blind as they that will not see.

(2) That they preferred the miraculous feeding of Israel in the wilderness before all the miracles Christ wrought (v. 31): Our fathers did eat manna in the desert. They quote a scripture for it: He gave them bread from heaven. What a good use might be made of this story to which they here refer! Yet see how these people perverted it, and made an ill use of it. Christ reproved them for their fondness of the miraculous bread, and bade them not set their hearts upon meat which perisheth. Under colour of magnifying the miracles of Moses, they tacitly undervalue this miracle of Christ. Christ fed them but once, and then reproved those who followed him in hope to be still fed. Moses fed his followers forty years, and miracles were not their rarities, but their daily bread: Christ fed them with bread out of the earth, barley-bread, and fishes out of the sea; but Moses fed Israel with bread from heaven, angel's food. Thus big did these Jews talk of the manna which their fathers did eat; but their fathers had slighted it, and called it light

27. which the Son of man—taking that title of Himself which denoted His incarnate life. shall give unto you—in the sense of vs. 51. him hath God the Father sealed—marked out and authenticated for that transcendent office, to impart to the world the bread of an everlasting life, and this in the character of "the Son of man."

28-31. What shall we do . . . the works of God—such works as God will approve. Different answers may be given to such a question, according to the spirit which prompts the inquiry. (See Hos. 6:6-8; Luke 3:12-14.) Here our Lord, knowing whom He had to deal with, shapes His reply accordingly.

29. This is the work of God . . .—That lies at the threshold of all acceptable obedience, being not only the prerequisite to it, but the proper spring of it—in that sense, the work of works, emphatically "the work of God."

What sign showest thou . . .—But how could they ask "a sign," when many of them scarce a day before had witnessed such a "sign" as had never till then been vouchsafed to men; when after witnessing it, they could hardly be restrained from making Him a king; when they followed Him from the one side of the lake to the other; and when, in the opening words of this very discourse, He had chided them for seeking Him, "not because they saw the signs," but for the loaves? The truth seems to be that they were confounded by the novel claims which our Lord had just advanced. In proposing to make Him a king, it was for far other purposes than dispensing to the world the bread of an everlasting life; and when He seemed to raise His claims even higher still, by representing it as the grand "work of God," that they should believe on Himself as His Sent One, they saw very clearly that He was making a demand upon them beyond anything they were prepared to accord to Him, and beyond all that man had ever before made. Hence their question, "What dost Thou work?" 31. Our fathers did eat manna . . .—insinuating the inferiority of Christ's miracle of the loaves to those of Moses: 'When Moses claimed the confidence of the fathers, "he gave them bread from heaven to eat"—not for a few thousands, but for millions, and not once only, but daily throughout their wilderness journey.'

ADAM CLARKE

27. Labour not for the meat. That is, for that "only," but "also for the bread." Him hath God the Father sealed. By this expression our Lord points out the commission which, as the Messiah, He received from the Father, to be Prophet and Priest to an ignorant, sinful world. As a person who wishes to communicate his mind to another who is at a distance writes a letter, seals it with his own seal, and sends it directed to the person for whom it was written, so Christ, who lay in the bosom of the Father, came to interpret the divine will to man, bearing the image, superscription, and seal of God in the immaculate holiness of His nature, the unsullied truth of His doctrine, and in the astonishing evidence of His miracles. But He came also as a Priest, to make an atonement for sin; and the bread which nourishes unto eternal life, He tells us, v. 51, is His body, which He gives for the life of the world; and to this sacrifice of himself the words him hath God the Father sealed seem especially to relate. It certainly was a custom, among nations contiguous to Judea, to set a seal upon the victim which was deemed proper for sacrifice.

28. That we might work the works of God. That is, divine works, or such as God can approve.

29. This is the work of God, that ye believe. There is nothing you can be employed in more acceptable to God than in yielding to the evidence set before you, and acknowledging Me as your Messiah and the Saviour of a lost world.

30. What sign? "What miracle?" So the word is evidently used in John ii. 11, 23, and in many other places. That we may see, and believe thee. That, having seen the miracle, we may believe Thee to be the promised Messiah. They had already seen the miracle of the five loaves, and did not believe; and it was impossible for them to see anything more descriptive of unlimited power and goodness.

31. Our fathers did eat manna in the desert. Their argument seems to run thus: Thou hast, we grant, fed 5,000 men with 5 loaves and 2 small fishes, but what is this in comparison of what Moses did in the desert, who for forty years fed more than a million of persons with bread from heaven? Do something like this, and then we will believe in Thee, as we have believed in Moses.

bread, Num. xxi. 5. Thus apt are we to slight and overlook the appearances of God's power and grace in our own times, while we pretend to admire the wonders of which our fathers told us.

2. Here is Christ's reply to this enquiry. It was true that their fathers did eat manna in the desert. But, it was not Moses that gave it to them, he was but the instrument, and therefore they must look beyond him to God. Moses gave them not either that bread or that water. He informs them concerning the true manna: But my Father giveth you the true bread from heaven; the bread from heaven is now given, not to your fathers, but to you, for whom the better things were reserved: he is now giving you that bread from heaven, which is truly so called.

III. Christ, having replied to their enquiries, takes further occasion to discourse of himself under the similitude of bread, and of believing under the similitude of eating and drinking; to which, together with his putting both together in the eating of his flesh and drinking of his blood, and with the remarks made upon it by the hearers, the rest of this conference may be reduced.

1. Christ having spoken of himself as the great gift of God, and the true bread (v. 32), largely explains and confirms this. He here shows that he is the true bread; this he repeats again and again, v. 33, 35, 48–51. Observe, (1) That Christ is bread, is that to the soul which bread is to the body; it is the staff of life. Our bodies could better live without food than our souls without Christ. (2) That he is the bread of God (v. 33), divine bread; the bread of God's family, his children's bread. (3) That he is the bread of life (v. 35, and again, v. 48), that bread of life. Christ is the bread of life, for he is the fruit of the tree of life. He is the living bread (so he explains himself, v. 51): I am the living bread. Bread is itself a dead thing, but Christ is himself living bread, and nourishes by his own power. Christ is ever living, everlasting bread. The doctrine of Christ crucified is now as strengthening and comforting to a believer as ever it was. He gives life unto the world (v. 33). The manna did only preserve and support life. Christ gives life to those that were dead in sin. The manna was ordained only for the life of the Israelites, but Christ is given for the life of the world. (4) That he is the bread which came down from heaven; this is often repeated here, v. 33, 50, 51, 58. This denotes the divinity of Christ's person; the divine original of all that good which flows to us through him. (5) That he is that bread of which the manna was a type and figure (v. 58), the true bread, v. 32. There was manna enough for them all; so in Christ a fulness of grace for all believers; he that gathers much of this manna will have none to spare when he comes to use it, and he that gathers little, when his grace comes to be perfected in glory, shall find that he has no lack. He here shows what his undertaking was, giving us an account of his business among men, v. 38–40. He came from heaven upon his Father's business (v. 38), not to do his own will, but the will of him that sent him. He came from heaven; we may well ask with wonder, "What moved him to such an expedition?" Here he tells us that he came to do, not his own will, but the will of his Father. "I am come to do the will of him that sent me." He came into the world as God's great agent and the world's great physician. The scope of his whole life was to glorify God and do good to men. He acquaints us, in particular, with that will of the Father which he came to do.

First, The private instructions given to Christ to save all the chosen remnant; and this is the covenant of redemption between the Father and the Son (v. 38): This is the Father's will, who hath sent me; that of all whom he hath given me I should lose none. There is a certain number of the children of men given by the Father to Jesus Christ, to be his care, and so to be to him for a name and a praise. Those whom God chose to be the objects of his special love he lodged as a trust in the hands of Christ. Jesus Christ has undertaken that he will lose none of those that were thus given him of the Father. Christ's undertaking for those that are given him extends to the resurrection of their bodies. I will raise it up again at the last day. Christ's undertaking will never be accomplished till the resurrection. The spring and original of all this is the sovereign will of God.

Secondly, The public instructions which were to be given to the children of men, upon what terms, they might obtain salvation by Christ; and this is the covenant of grace between God and man. Who the particular persons were that were given to Christ is a secret. Though their names are concealed, their characters are published. An offer is made that by it those that were given to Christ might be brought to him (v. 40): "This is the will of him that sent me,

32, 33. Moses gave you not . . .—'It was not Moses that gave you the manna, and even it was but from the lower heavens; "but My Father giveth you the true bread," and that "from heaven."'

33. the bread of God is he . . .—This verse is perhaps best left in its own transparent grandeur—holding up the Bread Itself as divine, spiritual, and eternal; its ordained Fountain and essential Substance, "Him who came down from heaven to give it" (that Eternal Life which was with the Father and was manifested unto us, I John 1:2); and its designed objects, "the world."

35. I am the bread of life—Henceforth the discourse is all in the first person, "I," "Me," which occur in one form or other, as STIER reckons, thirty-five times.

51. I am . . .—Understand, it is of MYSELF I now speak as the Bread from heaven; of ME if a man eat he shall live for ever; and "THE BREAD WHICH I WILL GIVE IS MY FLESH, WHICH I WILL GIVE FOR THE LIFE OF THE WORLD." Here, for the first time in this high discourse, our Lord explicitly introduces His sacrificial death—for only rationalists can doubt this—not only as that which constitutes Him the Bread of life to men, but as THAT very element IN HIM WHICH POSSESSES THE LIFE-GIVING VIRTUE.—"From this time we hear no more (in this discourse) of 'Bread'; this figure is dropped, and the reality takes its place" [STIER]. The words "I will give" may be compared with the words of institution at the Supper, "This is My body which is given for you" (Luke 22:19), or in Paul's report of it, "broken for you" (I Cor. 11:24).

These, then, being the two members of the general opening statement, what follows is meant to take in both, "For I came down from heaven not to do Mine own will"—to play an independent part—"but [in respect to both the foregoing things, the divine and the human side of salvation] the will of Him that sent Me." What this twofold will of Him that sent Him is, we are next sublimely told (vss. 39, 40): "And this"—in the first place—"is the will of Him that sent Me, that of all [everything] which He hath given Me (taking up the identical words of vs. 37), I should lose nothing, but should raise it up at the last day." The meaning is not, of course, that He is charged to keep the objects entrusted to Him as He received them, so as they should merely suffer nothing in His hands. For as they were just "perishing" sinners of Adam's family, to let "nothing" of such "be lost," but "raise them up at the last day," must involve, first, giving His flesh for them" (vs. 51), that they "might not perish, but have everlasting life"; and then, after "keeping them from falling," raising their sleeping dust in incorruption and glory, and presenting them, body and soul, perfect and entire, wanting nothing, to Him who gave them to Him, saying, "Behold I and the children which God hath given Me." So much for the first will of Him that sent Him, the divine side of man's salvation, whose every stage and movement is inscrutable to us, but infallibly certain. "And this"—in the second place—"is the will of Him that sent Me, that

32. Moses gave you not that bread from heaven. Our Lord refutes the argument of the Jews by proving: (1) That it was not Moses, but God, who gave the manna; (2) That this bread was not the true bread, but was merely a type of it; (3) That God had given them now a Bread infinitely more excellent; (4) That himself is that heavenly nourishment of which He spake, and who was typified by the manna in the desert.

35. I am the bread of life. That is, the Bread which gives life, and preserves from death. He that cometh to me. The person who receives My doctrine and believes in Me as the great atoning Sacrifice shall be perfectly satisfied and never more feel misery of mind. All the guilt of his sins shall be blotted out, and his soul shall be purified unto God; and, being enabled to love Him with all his heart, he shall rest, fully, supremely, and finally happy, in his God.

50. This is the bread. I am come for this very purpose, that men may believe in Me and have eternal life.

38. Not to do mine own will. I am come, not to act according to human motives, passions, or prejudices; but according to infinite wisdom, goodness, and mercy. Jewish passions and prejudices would reject publicans and sinners as those alluded to, and shut the gate of heaven against the Gentiles; but God's mercy receives them, and I am come to manifest that mercy to men.

39. I should lose nothing. It is the will of God that every soul who believes should continue in the faith, and have a resurrection unto life eternal. But He wills this continuance in salvation without purposing to force the persons so to continue. God may will a thing to be without willing that it shall be. Judas was given to Christ by the Father, chap. xvii. 12. The Father willed that this Judas should continue in the faith, and have a resurrection unto life eternal; but Judas sinned and perished. Now it is evident that God willed that Judas might be saved, without willing that he must be saved infallibly and unconditionally. When a man is a worker together with the grace of God, he is saved; when he receives that grace of God in vain, he is lost—not through a lack of will or mercy in God, but through lack of his cooperation with divine grace. God saves no man as a stock or a stone, but as a reasonable being and free agent. "That which thou hast heard, thou mayest hold fast, and persevere in, if thou wilt," says Augustine. Raise it up again at the last day. The Jews believed that the wicked should have no resurrection; and that the principle that led to the resurrection of the body, in the righteous, was the indwelling Spirit of God.

40. This is the will of him that sent me.

that every one that sees the Son, and believes on him, may have everlasting life, and I will raise him up." Is it not reviving to hear this? Eternal life may be had, if it be not our own fault. The crown of glory is set before us as the prize of our high calling, which we may run for and obtain. Every one may have it. This everlasting life is sure to all those who believe in Christ. He that sees the Son, and believes on him, shall be saved. I rather understand seeing here to mean the same thing with believing. Everyone that sees the Son, that is, believes on him, sees him with an eye of faith. It is not a blind faith that Christ requires, that we should be willing to have our eyes put out, and then follow him, but that we should see him, and see what ground we go upon in our faith. Those who believe in Jesus Christ, shall be raised up by his power at the last day. He had it in charge as his Father's will (v. 39), and here he solemnly makes it his own undertaking: I will raise him up.

2. Now Christ discoursing thus concerning himself, as the bread of life that came down from heaven, let us see what remarks his hearers made upon it.

(1) When they heard of such a thing as the bread of God, which gives life, they heartily prayed for it (v. 34): Lord, evermore give us this bread. I take this request to be made, though ignorantly, yet honestly, and to be well meant. General and confused notions of divine things produce some kind of desires towards them. Those who have an indistinct knowledge of the things of God, who see men as trees walking, make, as I may call them, inarticulate prayers for spiritual blessings. They think the favour of God a good thing, and heaven a fine place, while they have no value nor desire at all for that holiness which is necessary.

(2) But, when they understood that by this bread of life Jesus meant himself, then they despised it. They murmured at him. This comes in immediately after that solemn declaration which Christ had made of God's will and his own undertaking concerning man's salvation (v. 39, 40), which certainly were some of the most weighty and gracious words that ever proceeded out of the mouth of our Lord Jesus. One would think that when they heard that God had thus visited them, they should have bowed their heads and worshipped; but on the contrary, they murmured, quarrelled with what Christ said. Many that will not professedly contradict the doctrine of Christ yet say in their hearts that they do not like it. That which offended them was Christ's asserting his origin to be from heaven, v. 41, 42. How is it that he saith, I came down from heaven? That which they thought justified them herein was that they knew his extraction on earth: Is not this Jesus the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know? They took it amiss that he should say that he came down from heaven, when he was one of them.

3. Christ, having spoken of faith as the great work of God (v. 29), discourses largely concerning this work.

(1) He shows what it is to believe in Christ. He that comes to me is the same with him that believes in me (v. 35), and again (v. 37): He that comes unto me; so v. 44, 45. Repentance towards God is coming to him as our chief good and highest end; and so faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ is coming to him as our prince and Saviour, and our way to the Father. When he was here on earth it was more than barely coming where he was; so it is now more than coming to his word and ordinances. It is to feed upon Christ (v. 51): If any man eat of this bread. The former denotes applying ourselves to Christ; this denotes applying Christ to ourselves.

(2) He shows what is to be got by believing in Christ. What shall we be the better if we feed upon him? Want and death are the chief things we dread. They shall never want, never hunger, never thirst, v. 35. Desires they have, earnest desires, but these so abundantly satisfied, that they cannot be called hunger and thirst, which are uneasy and painful. They shall never die, not die eternally. He that believes on Christ has everlasting life (v. 47). Union with Christ and communion with God in Christ are everlasting life begun. Whereas they that did eat manna died, Christ is such bread as a man may eat of and never die, v. 49, 50. [1] The insufficiency of the typical manna: Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness, and are dead. Those that did eat manna, angel's food, died, like other men. Many of them died for their unbelief and murmurings. Their eating manna was no security to them from the wrath of God, as believing in Christ is to us. The rest of them died in a course of nature, and their carcases fell in that wilderness where they did eat manna. Let them not then boast so much of manna. [2] The all-sufficiency of the true manna: This is the bread that cometh down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof and not every one which seeth the Son and believeth [seeing the Son believeth] on Him, may have everlasting life, and I will raise him up at the last day." This is the human side of the same thing as in the foregoing verse, and answering to "Him that cometh unto Me I will in no wise cast out"; i.e., I have it expressly in charge that everyone that so "beholdeth" [so vieweth] the Son as to believe on Him shall have everlasting life; and, that none of Him be lost, "I will raise him up at the last day." (See on vs. 54.)

34. Lord, evermore give us this bread—speaking now with a certain reverence (as at vs. 25), the perpetuity of the manna floating perhaps in their minds, and much like the Samaritan woman, when her eyes were but half opened, "Sir, give Me this water . . ." (ch. 4:15).

41-46. Jews murmured—muttered, not in our Lord's hearing, but He knew it (vs. 43; ch. 2:25). he said, I am the bread . . .—Missing the sense and glory of this, and having no relish for such sublimities, they harp upon the "Bread from heaven." 'What can this mean? Do we not know all about Him—where, when, and of whom He was born? And yet He says He came down from heaven!'

he that cometh to me—to obtain what the soul craves, and as the only all-sufficient and ordained source of supply. hunger . . . thirst—shall have conscious and abiding satisfaction.

47-51. He that believeth . . .—(See on ch. 3:36; 5: 24). 48. I am the bread of life . . .—'As he that believeth in Me hath everlasting life, so I am Myself the everlasting Sustenance of that life.' (Repeated from vs. 35.) 49. Your fathers—of whom ye spake (vs. 31); not "ours," by which He would hint that He had a higher descent, of which they dreamt not [BENGEL]. did eat manna . . . and are dead—recurring to their own point about the manna, as one of the noblest of the ordained preparatory illustrations of His own office: 'Your fathers, ye say, ate manna in the wilderness; and ye say well, for so they did, but they are dead—even they whose carcasses fell in the wilderness did eat of that bread; the Bread whereof I speak cometh down from heaven, which the manna never did, that men, eating of it, may live for ever.'

ADAM CLARKE

Lest they should take a wrong meaning out of His words, as many have done since, He tells them that, far from any person being excluded from His mercy, it was the will of God that everyone who saw Him might believe and be saved. The power without which they could not believe He freely gave them, but the use of that power was their own. God gives the grace of repentance and faith to every man, but He neither repents nor believes for any man. Each must repent for his own sins, and believe in the Lord Jesus, through the grace given, or perish.

34. Lord, evermore give us this bread. Either meaning, "Let the miracle of the manna be renewed, and continue among us forever"; or, "Let that Bread of which Thou hast spoken become our constant nourishment." The Jews expected that when the Messiah should come He would give them all manner of delicacies, and, among the rest, manna, wine, and spicy oil.

41. The Jews then murmured. Because the whole of His discourse went to prove that He was infinitely greater than Moses, and that He alone could give present peace and eternal glory to men.

A. B. SIMPSON:

The opposition of the Jews was on account of His high pretensions in contrast with what they knew of His obscure human origin. "Is not this Jesus, son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know? How is it that he saith, I came down from heaven?" Jesus answers them that no one can understand His divine character without divine teaching. "No man can come to me except my Father draw him." And this, He adds, lest they should excuse themselves by saying that the Father had not drawn them: "Every man therefore that hath heard of the Father and hath learned, cometh unto me." That is to say, the Father is teaching and willing to teach all who will learn; but they are not willing to be thus definitely taught and drawn. Then He adds two new thoughts to His former teaching, respecting the life He brings to men. First, the life it brings is not like the nourishment imparted by the manna, mere mortal life, but it is everlasting life. "Your fathers did eat manna and are dead; he that believeth on me hath everlasting life." The other thought is, that this life must come through His death: "The bread which I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world."
— Christ in the Bible

49. Your fathers did eat manna . . . and are dead. That bread neither preserved their bodies alive nor entitled them to life eternal; but those who receive My salvation shall not only be raised again in the last day, but shall inherit eternal life. It was an opinion of the Jews themselves that their fathers who perished in the wilderness should never have a resurrection. Our Lord takes them on their own ground: You acknowledge that your fathers who fell in the wilderness shall never have a resurrection, and yet they ate of the manna. Therefore that manna is not the bread that preserves to everlasting life, according even to your own concession.

MATTHEW HENRY

die. Not die, that is, not perish, not come short of the heavenly Canaan. If any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever, v. 51. This is the meaning of this never dying: though he go down to death, he shall pass through it to that world where there shall be no more death. To live for ever is not to be for ever, but to be happy for ever.

(3) He shows what encouragements we have to believe in Christ. Christ here speaks of some who had seen him and yet believed not, v. 36. Faith is not always the effect of sight; the soldiers were eye-witnesses of his resurrection, and yet, instead of believing in him, they belied him. Two things, to encourage our faith: That the Son will bid all those welcome that come to him (v. 37): Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out. How welcome should this word be to our souls which bids us welcome to Christ! The duty required is a pure gospel duty: to come to Christ, that we may come to God by him. His beauty and love must draw us to him; sense of need and fear of danger must drive us to him; anything to bring us to Christ. The promise is a pure gospel promise: I will in no wise cast out. There are two negatives: I will not, no, I will not. Much favour is expressed here. We have reason to fear that he should cast us out. We may justly expect that he should frown upon us, and shut his doors against us; but he obviates these fears with this assurance, he will not do it; will not reject us though we are sinful. More favour is implied than is expressed; when it is said that he will not cast them out the meaning is, He will receive them, and give them all that which they come to him for. That the Father will, without fail, bring all those to him in due time that were given him.

First, He here assures us that this shall be done: All that the Father giveth me shall come to me, v. 37. Christ had complained (v. 36) of those who, though they had seen him, yet would not believe on him; and then he adds this for their conviction and awakening. How can we think that God gave us to Christ if we give ourselves to the world and the flesh? For his own comfort and encouragement he adds: All that the Father gives him shall come to him. Here we have, (a) The election described: All that the father giveth me, and all that belongs to them; all their services, all their interests. As all that he has is theirs, so all that they have is his. God was now about to give him the heathen for his inheritance (Ps. ii. 8). And though the Jews, who saw him, believed not on him, yet these (saith he) shall come to me; the other sheep, which are not of this fold, shall be brought, ch. x. 15, 16. (b) The effect of it secured: They shall come to me. This is not in the nature of a promise, but a prediction. None of them shall be forgotten; not a grain of God's corn shall be lost. They are by nature alienated from Christ, and averse to him, and yet they shall come. Not, They shall be driven to me, but, They shall come freely, shall be made willing.

Secondly, How shall those who are given to Christ be brought to him? Two things are to be done in order to it:

a. Their understandings shall be enlightened; this is promised, v. 45, 46. It is written in the prophets, And they shall be all taught of God; they shall all know me. In order to our believing in Jesus Christ, it is necessary that we be taught of God. That there be a divine revelation made to us. There are some things which even nature teaches, but to bring us to Christ there is need of a higher light. That there be a divine work wrought in us. God, in giving us reason, teaches us more than the beasts of the earth; but in giving us faith he teaches more than the natural man. All that are genuine, are taught of God; he hath undertaken their education. It follows then, by way of inference from this, that every man that has heard and learned of the Father comes to Christ, v. 45. Except God by his grace enlighten our minds and not only tell us, that we may hear, but teach us, that we may learn the truth as it is in Jesus, we shall never be brought to believe in Christ. Those who do not come to Christ have never heard nor learned of the Father; for, if they had, doubtless they would have come to Christ. In vain do men pretend to be taught of God if they believe not in Christ. But lest any should dream of a visible appearance of God the Father, he adds (v. 46): Not that any man hath seen the Father. God, in enlightening men's eyes and teaching them, works in a spiritual way. The Father of spirits hath access to, and influence upon, men's spirits, undiscerned. Those that have not seen his face have felt his power. Those that learn of the Father must learn of Christ, who alone hath seen him.

b. Their wills shall be bowed. In the depraved soul of fallen man there is a rebellion of the will against the right dictates of the understanding. It is there-

36. But . . . ye have seen me, and believe not—seen Him not in His mere bodily presence, but in all the majesty of His life, His teaching, His works.

"AND HIM THAT COMETH TO ME I WILL IN NO WISE CAST OUT." As the former was the divine, this is just the human side of the same thing. True, the "coming" ones of the second clause are just the "given" ones of the first. But had our Lord merely said, "When those that have been given Me of My Father shall come to Me, I will receive them"—besides being very flat, the impression conveyed would have been quite different, sounding as if there were no other laws in operation, in the movement of sinners to Christ, but such as are wholly divine and inscrutable to us; whereas, though He does speak of it as a sublime certainty which men's refusals cannot frustrate, He speaks of that certainty as taking effect only by men's voluntary advances to Him and acceptance of Him —"Him that cometh to Me," "whosoever will," throwing the door wide open. Only it is not the simply willing, but the actually coming, whom He will not cast out; for the word here employed usually denotes arrival, as distinguished from the ordinary word, which rather expresses the act of coming (see ch. 8:42, Greek), [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. "In no wise" is an emphatic negative, to meet the fears of the timid (as in Rev. 21:27, to meet the presumption of the hardened). 37-40. All that . . .—This comprehensive and very grand passage is expressed with a peculiar artistic precision. The opening general statement (vs. 37) consists of two members: (1) "ALL THAT THE FATHER GIVETH ME SHALL COME TO ME"—i.e., 'Though ye, as I told you, have no faith in Me, My errand into the world shall in no wise be defeated; for all that the Father giveth Me shall infallibly come to Me.' Observe, what is given Him by the Father is expressed in the singular number and neuter gender—lit., 'everything'; while those who come to Him are put in the masculine gender and singular number—'every one.' The whole mass, so to speak, is gifted by the Father to the Son as a unity, which the Son evolves, one by one, in the execution of His trust. So ch. 17:2, "that He should give eternal life to all that which Thou hast given Him" [BENGEL]. This "shall" expresses the glorious certainty of it, the Father being pledged to see to it that the gift be no empty mockery.

45. written in the prophets—in Isaiah 54:13; Jeremiah 31:33, 34; other similar passages may also have been in view. Our Lord thus falls back upon Scripture authority for this seemingly hard saying. all taught of God —not by external revelation merely, but by internal illumination, corresponding to the "drawing" of vs. 44.

Every man therefore . . .—i.e., who hath been thus efficaciously taught of Him. cometh unto me—with absolute certainty, yet in the sense above given of "drawing"; i.e., 'As none can come to Me but as divinely drawn, so none thus drawn shall fail to come.' Not that any man hath seen . . .—Lest they should confound that "hearing and learning of the Father," to which believers are admitted by divine teaching, with His own immediate access to Him, He here throws in a parenthetical explanation; stating, as explicitly as words could do it, how totally different the two cases were, and that only He who is "from God" hath this naked, immediate access to the Father. (See ch. 1:18).

ADAM CLARKE

I will in no wise cast out. The words are exceedingly emphatic—"I will by no means thrust out of doors." Our blessed Lord alludes to the case of a person in deep distress and poverty who comes to a nobleman's house, in order to get relief. The person appears; and the owner, far from treating the poor man with asperity, welcomes, receives him kindly, and supplies his wants. So does Jesus. Never did He reject the suit of a penitent, however grievous his crimes might have been.

37. All that the Father giveth me. The neuter gender, pan, is probably used here for the masculine, pas. Shall come to me. All that are drawn by the Father, v. 44, i.e., all those who are influenced by His Spirit, and yield to those influences. "For as many as are led [not driven or dragged] by the Spirit of God, they are the sons [children] of God," Rom. viii. 14. God sent His prophets to proclaim His salvation to this people; and He accompanied their preaching with the influence of His Spirit. Those who yielded were saved; those who did not yield to these drawings were lost.

45. It is written in the prophets. Isa. liv. 13; Jer. xxxi. 34. They shall be all taught of God. This explains the preceding verse. God teaches a man to know himself, that, finding his need of salvation, he may flee to lay hold on the hope which his Heavenly Father has set before him in the gospel. God draws men by His love, and by showing them what His love has done for them. Fear repels, but love attracts. He who is ever preaching the terrors of the law, and representing God as a vindictive judge, will never bring sinners to Him. They are afraid of this terrible God; but they love Him who "so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

46. Not that any man hath seen the Father. He does not teach men by appearing personally before them, or by any other outward voice than that of His Word and messengers; but He teaches by His Spirit. He which is of God. That is, Christ alone. Neither Moses nor any of the prophets had ever seen God. Jesus, who lay in the bosom of the Father, saw and revealed Him, chap. i. 18.

fore requisite that there be a work of grace wrought upon the will, which is here called drawing (v. 44): No man can come to me except the Father, who hath sent me, draw him. The Jews murmured at the doctrine of Christ. Christ said (v. 43), "Murmur not among yourselves; lay not the fault of your dislike of my doctrine one upon another. Your antipathies to the truths of God are so strong that nothing less than a divine power can conquer them. No man can come to me except the Father, who hath sent me, draw him," v. 44. (a) The nature of the work: It is drawing, which denotes not a force put upon the will, but a change wrought in the will. A new bias is given to the soul, by which it inclines to God. He that formed the spirit of man knows how to new-mould the soul. (b) The necessity of it: No man, in this weak and helpless state, can come to Christ without it. (c) The author of it: The Father who hath sent me. The Father would not send him on a fruitless errand. So, having sent Christ to save souls, he sends souls to him to be saved by him. (d) The crown and perfection of this work: And I will raise him up at the last day. This is four times mentioned in this discourse. If he undertakes this, surely he can do anything. Let our expectations be carried out towards a happiness reserved for the last day.

4. Christ comes more particularly to show what of himself is this bread, v. 51–58, where he still prosecutes the metaphor of food. The bread that I will give is my flesh (v. 51), the flesh of the Son of man and his blood, v. 53. His flesh is meat indeed, and his blood is drink indeed, v. 53. We must eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink his blood (v. 53); and again (v. 54), Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood; and the same words (v. 56, 57), he that eateth me.

(1) Let us see how this discourse of Christ was liable to mistake and misconstruction. It was misconstrued by the carnal Jews (v. 52): They strove among themselves: How can this man give us his flesh to eat? Christ spoke (v. 51) of giving his flesh for us, to suffer and die; but they understood it of his giving it to us, to be eaten. It is misunderstood by many who hence infer that, if they take the sacrament when they die, they shall certainly go to heaven.

(2) Let us see how this discourse of Christ is to be understood.

[1] What is meant by the flesh and blood of Christ. It is called (v. 53), The flesh of the Son of man, and his blood. It is said to be given for the life of the world, that is, First, Instead of the life of the world, which was forfeited by sin, Christ gives his own flesh as a ransom. Secondly, In order to the life of the world, to purchase a general offer of eternal life to all the world. So that the flesh and blood of the Son of man denote Christ and him crucified, and the redemption wrought out by him. The promises of the covenant, and eternal life; these are called the flesh and blood of Christ, 1. Because they are purchased by the breaking of his body, and the shedding of his blood. 2. Because they are meat and drink to our souls. He had before compared himself to bread, which is necessary food; here to flesh, which is delicious. It is meat indeed, and drink indeed; in opposition to the shows and shadows with which the world shams off those that feed upon it.

[2] What is meant by eating this flesh and drinking this blood. It is certain that it means neither more nor less than believing in Christ. Believing in Christ includes these four things, which eating and drinking do: First, It implies an appetite to Christ. This spiritual eating and drinking begins with hungering and thirsting (Matt. v. 6): "Give me Christ or else I die." Secondly, An application of Christ to ourselves. Meat looked upon will not nourish us, but meat fed upon. We must so accept of Christ as to appropriate him to ourselves. Thirdly, A delight in Christ and his salvation. The doctrine of Christ crucified must be meat and drink to us, most pleasant and delightful. Fourthly, A derivation of nourishment from him and a dependence upon him for the support and comfort of our spiritual life, and the strength, growth, and vigour of the new man. It is to live upon him as we do upon our meat. When afterwards he would institute some outward sensible signs, by which to represent our communicating of the benefits of his death, he chose those of eating and drinking, and made them sacramental actions.

(3) Having thus explained the general meaning of this part of Christ's discourse, the particulars are reducible to two heads:

[1] The necessity of our feeding upon Christ (v. 53): Except you eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, you have no life in you. First, It is a certain sign that you have no spiritual life in you if you have no desire towards Christ, nor delight in him. If the soul does not hunger and thirst, certainly it does not

43. Murmur not . . . 44. No man—i.e., Be not either startled or stumbled at these sayings; for it needs divine teaching to understand them, divine drawing to submit to them. can come to me—in the sense of vs. 35. except the Father which hath sent me—i.e., the Father as the Sender of Me and to carry out the design of My mission. draw him—by an internal and efficacious operation; though by all the means of rational conviction, and in a way altogether consonant to their moral nature (Song of Sol. 1:4; Jer. 31:3; Hos. 11:3, 4). raise him up . . .—See on vs. 54.

52. Jews strove among themselves—arguing the point together. How can . . .—i.e., Give us His flesh to eat? Absurd. 53-58. Except ye eat the flesh . . . and drink the blood . . . no life . . .—The harshest word He had yet uttered in their ears. They asked how it was possible to eat His flesh. He answers, with great solemnity, "It is indispensable." Yet even here a thoughtful hearer might find something to temper the harshness. He says they must not only "eat His flesh" but "drink His blood," which could not but suggest the idea of His death—implied in the separation of one's flesh from his blood. And as He had already hinted that it was to be something very different from a natural death, saying, "My flesh I will give for the life of the world" (vs. 51), it must have been pretty plain to candid hearers that He meant something above the gross idea which the bare terms expressed. And farther, when He added that they "had no life in them unless they thus ate and drank," it was impossible they should think He meant that the temporal life they were then living was dependent on their eating and drinking, in this gross sense, His flesh and blood. Yet the whole statement was certainly confounding, and beyond doubt was meant to be so. Our Lord had told them that in spite of all they had "seen" in Him, they "did not believe" (vs. 36). For their conviction therefore he does not here lay Himself out; but having the ear not only of them but of the more candid and thoughtful in the crowded synagogue, and the miracle of the loaves having led up to the most exalted of all views of His Person and Office, He takes advantage of their very difficulties and objections to announce, for all time, those most profound truths which are here expressed, regardless of the disgust of the unteachable, and the prejudices even of the most sincere, which His language would seem only designed to deepen. The truth really conveyed here is no other than that expressed in vs. 51, though in more emphatic terms—that He Himself, in the virtue of His sacrificial death, is the spiritual and eternal life of men; and that unless men voluntarily appropriate to themselves this death, in its sacrificial virtue, so as to become the very life and nourishment of their inner man, they have no spiritual and eternal life at all. Not as if His death were the only thing of value, but it is what gives all else in Christ's Incarnate Person, Life, and Office, their whole value to us sinners. 54. Whoso eateth . . . hath . . .—The former verse said that unless they partook of Him they had no life; this adds, that whoever does so "hath eternal life." And I will raise him up at the last day—For the fourth time this is repeated (see vss. 39, 40, 44)—showing most clearly that the "eternal life" which such a man "hath" cannot be the same with the future resurrection-life from which it is carefully distinguished each time, but a

44. Except the Father . . . draw him. But how is a man drawn? Augustine answers from the poet, "A man is attracted by that which he delights in." Show green herbage to a sheep; he is drawn by it. Show nuts to a child, and he is drawn by them. They run wherever the person runs who shows these things. They run after him, but they are not forced to follow; they run through the desire they feel to get the things they delight in. So God draws man. He shows him his wants—He shows the Saviour whom He has provided for him. The man feels himself a lost sinner; and, through the desire which he finds to escape hell and get to heaven, he comes unto Christ, that he may be justified by His blood. Unless God thus draw, no man will ever come to Christ; because none could, without this drawing, ever feel the need of a Saviour. Drawing, or alluring, not dragging, is here to be understood. The best Greek writers use the verb in the same sense of "alluring, inciting."

51. Is my flesh, which I will give. Our Lord explains His meaning more fully in these words than He had done before. Having spoken so much of the bread which feeds and nourishes the soul and preserves from death, the attention of His hearers was fixed upon His words, which to them appeared inexplicable; and they desired to know what their meaning was. He then told them that the bread meant His flesh (His life), which He was about to give up to save the life of the world. Here our Lord plainly declares that His death was to be a vicarious sacrifice and atonement for the sin of the world; and that as no human life could be preserved unless there was bread (proper nourishment) received, so no soul could be saved but by the merit of His death.

52. How can this man give us his flesh to eat? Our Lord removes this difficulty, and answers the question in v. 63.

53. Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man. Unless you be made partakers of the blessings about to be purchased by My blood, passion, and violent death, you cannot be saved. Bishop Pearce justly observes that the ideas of eating and drinking are here borrowed to express "partaking of" and "sharing in." Thus spiritual happiness on earth, and even in heaven, is expressed by eating and drinking; instances of which may be seen in Matt. viii. 11; xxvi. 29; Luke xiv. 15; xxii. 30; and Rev. ii. 17. Those who were made partakers of the Holy Spirit are said by Paul, 1 Cor. xii. 13, to be "made to drink into [or of] one Spirit." This, indeed, was a very common mode of expression among the Jews.

54. Hath eternal life. This can never be understood of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper: (1) Because this was not instituted till a year after, at the last Passover; (2) It cannot be said that those who do not receive that sacrament must perish everlastingly; (3) Nor can it be live. Secondly, It is certain that you can have no spiritual life, unless you derive it from Christ by faith; separated from him you can do nothing. Our bodies may as well live without meat as our souls without Christ.

[2] The benefit and advantage of it, in two things:

First, We shall be one with Christ (v. 56): He that eats my flesh, and drinks my blood, he dwelleth in me, and I in him. By faith we have a close and intimate union with Christ; he is in us, and we in him. Such is the union between Christ and believers that he shares in their griefs, and they share in his graces and joys; he sups with them upon their bitter herbs, and they with him upon his rich dainties.

Secondly, We shall live, shall live eternally, by him. We shall live by him (v. 57): As the living Father hath sent me, and I live by the Father, so he that eateth me, even he shall live by me. True believers receive this divine life by virtue of their union with Christ. He that eateth me, or feeds on me, even he shall live by me: those that live upon Christ shall live by him. Because he lives, we shall live also. We shall live eternally by him (v. 54): Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, he hath eternal life. He shall live for ever, v. 58.

Lastly, The historian concludes with an account where Christ had this discourse with the Jews (v. 59): In the synagogue as he taught. This was that in his discourse which was new. Christ pleaded this upon his trial (ch. xviii. 20): I ever taught in the synagogue.

Verses 60–71

We have here an account of the effects of Christ's discourse.

I. To some it was a savour of death unto death; not only to the Jews, but even to many of his disciples.

1. Their murmurings at the doctrine they heard (v. 60); not a few, but many of them, were offended at it. See what they say to it (v. 60): This is a hard saying, who can hear it? They do not like it themselves. Now, when they found it a hard saying, if they had humbly begged of Christ to have declared unto them this parable, he would have opened it, and their understandings too. They think it impossible that anyone else should like it: "Who can hear it? Surely none can." Thus the scoffers at religion are ready to undertake that all the intelligent part of mankind concur with them. Thanks be to God, thousands have heard these sayings of Christ, and have found them not only easy, but pleasant.

2. Christ's animadversions upon their murmurings.

(1) He well enough knew their murmurings, v. 61. Christ knew them; he saw them, he heard them. He knew it in himself, not by any information given him, but by his own divine omniscience. Thoughts are words to Christ; we should therefore take heed not only what we say and do, but what we think.

(2) He well enough knew how to answer them: "Doth this offend you?" We may justly wonder that so much offence should be taken at the doctrine of Christ for so little cause. Christ speaks of it here with wonder: "Doth this offend you?" He gives them a hint of his ascension into heaven, as that which would give an irresistible evidence of the truth of his doctrine (v. 62): What and if you shall see the Son of man ascend up where he was before? If this be so hard a saying that you cannot hear it, how will you digest it when I tell you of my returning to heaven, whence I came down? Those who stumble at smaller difficulties should consider how they will get over greater. "You think I take too much upon me when I say, I came down from heaven, for it was with this that you quarrelled (v. 42); but will you think so when you see me return to heaven?" Christ did often refer himself thus to subsequent proofs. He gives them a general key to this and all such parabolical discourses, teaching them that they are to be understood spiritually: It is the spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing, v. 63. The bare participation of ordinances, unless the Spirit of God work with them, and quicken the soul by them, profits nothing; the word and ordinances, if the Spirit works with them, are as food to a living man, if not, they are as food to a dead man. The doctrine of eating Christ's flesh and drinking his blood, if it be understood literally, profits nothing. The spiritual sense of meaning of it quickens the soul, makes it alive and lively: The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life. To believe that Christ died for me, to derive from that doctrine strength and comfort, this is the spirit and life of that saying, and, construing it thus, it is an excellent saying. The reason why men dislike Christ's sayings is because they mistake them. The literal sense of a parable does us no good, we are never the wiser for it. The flesh profits nothing; but the Spirit quickeneth. They found fault with Christ's sayings, whereas the fault was in themselves; it is life communicated here below immediately on believing (ch. 3:36; 5:24, 25); and giving to the resurrection of the body as that which consummates the redemption of the entire man, a prominence which in the current theology, it is to be feared, it has seldom had. (See Rom. 8:23; I Cor. 15, throughout.) 56. He that eateth . . . dwelleth in me and I in him—As our food becomes incorporated with ourselves, so Christ and those who eat His flesh and drink His blood become spiritually one life, though personally distinct. 57. As the living Father hath sent me—to communicate His own life. and I live by the Father—lit., "because of the Father"; My life and His being one, but Mine that of a Son, whose it is to be "of the Father." (See ch. 1:18; 5:26.) he that eateth me, . . . shall live by me—lit., 'because of Me.' So that though one spiritual life with Him, "the Head of every man is Christ, as the head of Christ is God" (I Cor. 11:3; 3:23). 58. This is that bread . . .—a sort of summing up of the whole discourse, on which let this one further remark suffice—that as our Lord, instead of softening down His figurative sublimities, or even putting them in naked phraseology, leaves the great truths of His Person and Office, and our participation of Him and it, enshrined for all time in those glorious forms of speech, so when we attempt to strip the truth of these figures, figures though they be, it goes away from us, like water when the vessel is broken, and our wisdom lies in raising our own spirit, and attuning our own ear, to our Lord's chosen modes of expression. (It should be added that although this discourse has nothing to do with the Sacrament of the Supper, the Sacrament has everything to do with it, as the visible embodiment of these figures, and, to the believing partaker, a real, yea, and the most lively and affecting participation of His flesh and blood, and nourishment thereby of the spiritual and eternal life, here below.) 59. These things said he in the synagogue—which seems to imply that what follows took place after the congregation had broken up. 60-65. Many . . . of his disciples—His pretty constant followers, though an outer circle of them. hard saying—not merely harsh, but insufferable, as the word often means in the Old Testament. who can hear—submit to listen to it.

61. Doth this offend . . . What and if . . .—i.e., 'If ye are stumbled at what I have said, how will ye bear what I now say?' Not that His ascension itself would stumble them more than His death, but that after recoiling from the mention of the one, they would not be in a state of mind to take in the other.

the flesh profiteth nothing—Much of His discourse was about "flesh"; but flesh as such, mere flesh, could profit nothing, much less impart that life which the Holy Spirit alone communicates to the soul.

the words that I speak . . . are spirit and . . . life—The whole burden of the discourse is "spirit," not mere flesh, and "life" in its highest, not its lowest sense, and the words I have employed are to be interpreted solely in that sense.

supposed that all those who do receive it are necessarily and eternally saved. On the contrary, Paul intimates that many who received it at Corinth perished because they received it unworthily, not discerning the Lord's body, not distinguishing between it and a common meal, and not properly considering that Sacrifice for sin of which the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was a type; see 1 Cor. xi. 30.

55. My flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed. Or rather, "My flesh is the true meat." In both clauses of this verse, instead of the adverb I read the adjective, agreeing with brosis. This reading is supported by many MSS. Our Lord terms His flesh the "true meat," and His blood the "true drink," because those who received His grace merited by His death would be really nourished and supported thereby unto eternal life.

56. Dwelleth in me, and I in him. Of all connections and unions, none is so intimate and complete as that which is effected by the digestion of aliments, because they are changed into the very substance of him who eats them; and this our Lord makes the model of that union which subsists between himself and genuine believers. He lives in them, and they in Him; for they are made partakers of the divine nature, 2 Pet. i. 4.

57. So he that eateth me, even he shall live by me. From which we learn that the union between Christ and His followers shall be similar to that which subsists between God and Christ.

59. In the synagogue . . . in Capernaum. From v. 26 to this verse the Evangelist gives us the discourse which our Lord preached in the synagogue, in which He was repeatedly interrupted by the Jews; but this gave Him the fuller opportunity to proclaim the whole truth relative to His passion and death, to edify the disciples, and confute these gainsayers.

60. Many therefore of his disciples. So it appears that He had many more than the twelve who constantly accompanied Him. This is an hard saying; who can hear it? Who can digest such doctrine as this? It is intolerable; it is impracticable.

62. If ye shall see the Son of man ascend. You need not be stumbled at what I say concerning eating My flesh and drinking My blood, for you shall soon have the fullest proof that this is figuratively spoken, for I shall ascend with the same body with which I shall arise from the dead; therefore My flesh and blood, far from being eaten by men, shall not even be found among them.

63. It is the spirit that quickeneth. It is the spiritual sense only of My words that is to be attended to, and through which life is to be attained, 2 Cor. iii. 6. Such only as eat and drink what I have mentioned, in a spiritual sense, are to expect eternal life. The words that I speak. Instead of I speak, I read, "I have spoken," on the authority of many MSS. This is an important reading, and plainly shows that our Lord's words here do not refer to any new point of doctrine which He was then inculcating, but to what He had spoken concerning His being the living Bread, and concerning the eating of His flesh and drinking of His blood, in the preceding verses. Are spirit, and they are life. As My words are to be spiritually understood, so the life they promise is of a spiritual nature.

only to sensual minds that spiritual things are senseless and sapless, spiritual minds relish them, see 1 Cor. ii. 14, 15. He gives them an intimation of his knowledge of them, and that he had expected no better from them, though they called themselves his disciples, v. 64, 65.

First, They did not believe his report. Among those who are nominal Christians, there are many who are real infidels. The unbelief of hypocrites is naked and open before the eyes of Christ. He knew from the beginning who they were that believed, and who of the twelve should betray him; who were sincere, as Nathanael (ch. i. 47), and who were not. It is Christ's prerogative to know the heart; he knows who they are that believe not, but dissemble in their profession. If we pretend to judge men's hearts, we step into Christ's throne. We are often deceived in men, and see cause to change our sentiments of them.

Secondly, The reason why they did not believe his report was because the arm of the Lord was not revealed to them (v. 65): Therefore said I unto you that no man can come to me, except it be given unto him of my Father; referring to v. 44. There he had said that none could come to him, except the Father draw him; here he saith, except it be given him of my Father, which shows that God draws souls by giving them grace and strength, and a heart to come.

3. We have here their final apostasy from Christ hereupon: From that time many of his disciples went back, and walked no more with him, v. 66: the backsliding of these disciples. They had entered themselves in Christ's school, but they went back, did not only play truant for once, but took leave of him. Here were many that went back. It is often so; when some backslide many backslide with them; the disease is infectious. The occasion of this backsliding: From that time, from the time that Christ preached this comfortable doctrine, that he is the bread of life, and that those who by faith feed upon him shall live by him. The corrupt and wicked heart of man often makes that an occasion of offence which is indeed matter of the greatest comfort. That which is the undoubted word and truth of Christ must be faithfully delivered, whoever may be offended at it. Men's humours must be captivated to God's word, and not God's word accommodated to men's. The degree of their apostasy: They walked no more with him, returned no more to him and attended no more upon his ministry.

II. This discourse was to others a savour of life unto life. Many went back, but, thanks be to God, all did not.

1. The affectionate question which Christ put to the twelve (v. 67): Will you also go away? He saith nothing to those who went back. It was no great loss of those whom he never had; lightly come, lightly go; but he takes this occasion to speak to the twelve, to confirm them: Will you also go away? (1) "It is at your choice whether you will or no; if you will forsake me, now is the time, when so many do." Christ will detain none with him against their wills; his soldiers are volunteers, not pressed men. The twelve had now had time enough to try how they liked Christ and his doctrine. He here allows them a power of revocation, and leaves them at their liberty. (2) "It is at your peril if you do go away." They have not been so intimate with me as you have been, nor received so many favours from me; they are gone, but will you also go? The nearer we have been to Christ and the longer we have been with him, the more mercies we have received from him the greater will be our sin if we desert him. (3) "I have reason to think you will not. I hope better things of you, for you are they that have continued with me," Luke xxii. 28. Christ and believers know one another too well to part upon every displeasure.

2. The believing reply which Peter, in the name of the rest, made to this question, v. 68, 69. Peter was upon all occasions the mouth of the rest, not so much because he had more of his Master's ear than they, but because he had more tongue of his own; and what he said was sometimes approved and sometimes reprimanded (Matt. xvi. 17, 23)—the common lot of those who are swift to speak. Here is a good resolution to adhere to Christ: "Lord, to whom shall we go? No, Lord, we like our choice too well to change." Those who leave Christ would do well to consider to whom they will go. "Whither shall we go? Shall we make our court to the world? It will certainly deceive us. Shall we return to sin? It will certainly destroy us. Shall we leave the fountain of living waters for broken cisterns?" The disciples resolve to continue their pursuit of life and happiness, and will adhere to Christ as their guide. "If ever we find the way to happiness, it must be in following thee." Let those who find fault with this religion find a better before they quit it. Here is a good reason

64. But there are some . . .—i.e., "But it matters little to some of you in what sense I speak, for ye believe not." This was said, adds the Evangelist, not merely of the outer but of the inner circle of His disciples; for He knew the traitor, though it was not yet time to expose him.

65. Therefore said I . . .—i.e., "That was why I spoke to you of the necessity of divine teaching which some of you are strangers to." except it were given him—plainly showing that by the Father's "drawing" (vs. 44) was meant an internal and efficacious operation, for in recalling the statement here He says, it must be "given to a man to come" to Christ. 66-71. From that time . . .—or, in consequence of this. Those last words of our Lord seemed to have given them the finishing stroke—they could not stand it any longer.

walked no more—Many a journey, it may be, they had taken with Him, but now they gave Him up finally!

67. the twelve—the first time they are thus mentioned in this Gospel. Will ye also go away?—Affecting appeal! Evidently Christ felt the desertion of Him even by those miserable men who could not abide His statements; and seeing a disturbance even of the wheat by the violence of the wind which blew away the chaff (not yet visibly showing itself, but open to His eyes of fire), He would nip it in the bud by this home question.

68. Then Simon Peter—whose forwardness in this case was noble, and to the wounded spirit of His Lord doubtless very grateful. Lord, to whom . . .—i.e., 'We cannot deny that we have been staggered as well as they, and seeing so many go away who, as we thought, might have been retained by teaching a little less hard to take in, our own endurance has been severely tried, nor have we been able to stop short of the question, Shall we follow the rest, and give it up? But when it came to this, our light returned, and our hearts were reassured. For as soon as we thought of going away, there arose upon us that awful question, "To WHOM shall we go?" To the lifeless formalism and wretched traditions of the elders? to the gods many and lords many of the

64. But there are some of you that believe not. This is addressed to Judas, and to those disciples who left Him, v. 66. And who should betray him. Or "who would deliver Him up."

65. Therefore said I unto you. V. 44; see the note there. Except it were given unto him. None can come at first unless he be drawn by the Father; and none can continue unless he continue under those sacred influences which God gives only to those who do not receive His first graces in vain. Augustine himself grants that it was the sole fault of these disciples that they did not believe and were saved. "If I be asked why these could not believe, I immediately answer, because they would not."

66. Many of his disciples went back. They no longer associated with Him nor professed to acknowledge Him as the Messiah. None of these were of the twelve.

67. Will ye also go away? Or, "Do ye also desire?" These words are very emphatic. Will you abandon Me?—you, whom I have distinguished with innumerable marks of My affection—you, whom I have chosen out of the world to be My companions—you, to whom I have revealed the secrets of the eternal world—you, who have been witnesses of all My miracles—you, whom I intend to seat with Me on My throne in glory; will you go away?

68. Simon Peter answered. With his usual zeal and readiness, speaking in behalf of the whole, To whom shall we go? Where shall we find a more gracious master—a more powerful redeemer—a more suitable saviour? Thou [alone] hast the words of eternal life.

for this resolution. It was not the inconsiderate resolve of a blind affection, but the result of mature deliberation. The disciples were resolved never to go away from Christ because of the advantage they promised themselves by him: Thou hast the words of eternal life. The word of his doctrine showed the way to eternal life, and directed us what to do, that we might inherit it. His having the words of eternal life is the same with his having power to give eternal life. He had in the foregoing discourse assured eternal life to his followers; these disciples fastened upon his plain saying, and therefore resolved to stick to him, when the others overlooked this, and fastened upon the hard sayings, and therefore forsook him. Though we cannot account for every mystery, every obscurity, in Christ's doctrine, yet we know that it is the word of eternal life, and therefore must live and die by it. Because of the assurance they had concerning him (v. 69): We believe, and are sure, that thou art that Christ. The doctrine they believed: that this Jesus was the Messiah promised to the fathers, and that he was not a mere man, but the Son of the living God. The degree of their faith: it rose up to a full assurance: We are sure. When we have so strong a faith in the gospel of Christ as boldly to venture our souls upon it, then, and not till then, we shall be willing to venture everything else for it.

3. The melancholy remark which our Lord Jesus made upon this reply of Peter's (v. 70, 71): Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil? And the evangelist tells us whom he meant: he spoke of Judas Iscariot. Peter had undertaken for them all that they would be faithful to their Master. Now Christ does not condemn his charity (it is always good to hope the best), but he tacitly corrects his confidence. We must not be too sure concerning any. God knows those that are his; we do not. Hypocrites and betrayers of Christ are no better than devils. Judas, into whose heart Satan entered, and filled it, is called a devil. Many that are seeming saints are real devils. It is strange, and to be wondered at; Christ speaks of it with wonder: Have not I? It is sad, and to be lamented. The disguises of hypocrites however they may deceive men cannot deceive Christ. Christ's divine sight, far better than any double sight, can see spirits. There are those who are chosen by Christ to special services who yet prove false to him: I have chosen you and yet one of you is a devil. In the most select societies on this side heaven it is no new thing to meet with those that are corrupt. Of the twelve that were chosen to an intimate conversation with an incarnate Deity, one was an incarnate devil. The historian lays an emphasis upon this, that Judas was one of the twelve that were so dignified and distinguished. Let us not reject the twelve because one of them is a devil. There is a society within the veil into which no unclean thing shall enter.

heathen around us? or to blank unbelief? Nay, Lord, we are shut up. They have none of that "ETERNAL LIFE" to offer us whereof Thou hast been discoursing, in words rich and ravishing as well as in words staggering to human wisdom. That life we cannot want; that life we have learnt to crave as a necessity of the deeper nature which Thou hast awakened: "the words of that eternal life" (the authority to reveal it and the power to confer it). Thou hast: Therefore will we stay with Thee—"we must."

69. And we believe . . .—(See on Matt. 16:16). Peter seems to have added this not merely—probably not so much—as an assurance to his Lord of his heart's belief in Him, as for the purpose of fortifying himself and his faithful brethren against that recoil from his Lord's harsh statements which he was probably struggling against with difficulty at that moment. N.B.—There are seasons when one's faith is tried to the utmost, particularly by speculative difficulties; the spiritual eye then swims, and all truth seems ready to depart from us. At such seasons, a clear perception that to abandon the faith of Christ is to face black desolation, ruin and death; and on recoiling from this, to be able to fall back, not merely on first principles and immovable foundations, but on personal experience of a Living Lord in whom all truth is wrapt up and made flesh for our very benefit—this is a relief unspeakable. Under that blessed Wing taking shelter, until we are again fit to grapple with the questions that have staggered us, we at length either find our way through them, or attain to a calm satisfaction in the discovery that they lie beyond the limits of present apprehension. 70. Have not I chosen . . . and one of you is a devil:—'Well said, Simon-Barjonas, but that "we" embraces not so wide a circle as in the simplicity of thine heart thou thinkest; for though I have chosen you but twelve, one even of these is a "devil" ' (the temple, the tool of that wicked one).

69. We believe. On the authority of Thy word; and are sure—"have known," by the evidence of Thy miracles, that thou art that Christ, the promised Messiah. Instead of Christ, the Son of the living God, some excellent MSS. read "the holy one of God."

70. Have not I chosen you twelve? Have I not, in an especial manner, called you to believe in My name, and chosen you to be My disciples, and the propagators of My doctrine? Nevertheless, one of you is a devil, or "accuser," enlisted on the side of Satan, who was a murderer from the beginning.

71. He spake of Judas . . . for he it was that should betray him. "He who was about to deliver Him up." By referring to this matter so often, did not our blessed Lord intend to warn Judas? Was not the evil fully exposed to his view? And who dare say that it was impossible for him to avoid what he had so often been warned against?

I. The reason given why Christ spent more of his time in Galilee than in Judæa (v. 1): because the Jews, the people in Judæa and Jerusalem, sought to kill him, for curing the impotent man on the sabbath day, ch. v. 16. It is not said, He durst not, but, He would not, walk in Jewry; it was not through fear and cowardice that he declined it, but in prudence, because his hour was not yet come. Christ will withdraw from those that drive him from them. In times of imminent peril it is not only allowable, but advisable, to withdraw, and to choose the service of those places which are least perilous, Matt. x. 23. If the providence of God casts persons of merit into places of obscurity and little note, it must not be thought strange; it was the lot of our Master himself. He did not sit still in Galilee, but walked; he went about doing good. When we cannot do what and where we would, we must do what and where we can.

II. The approach of the feast of tabernacles (v. 2), one of the three solemnities which called for the personal attendance of all the males at Jerusalem. This feast was still religiously observed. Divine institutions are never antiquated, nor go out of date, by length of time: nor must wilderness mercies ever be forgotten.

III. Christ's discourse with his brethren. They interposed to advise him in his conduct.

1. Their ambition and vain-glory in urging him to make a more public appearance than he did: "Depart hence," said they, "and go into Judæa" (v. 3).

(1) They give two reasons for this advice: That it would be an encouragement to those in and about Jerusalem. They would have had the disciples there particularly countenanced, and thought the time

CHAPTER 7

VSS. 1-53. CHRIST AT THE FEAST OF TABERNACLES. 1, 2. After these things—i.e., all that is recorded after ch. 5:18. walked in Galilee—continuing His labors there, instead of going to Judea, as might have been expected. sought to kill him . . .—referring back to ch. 5:18. Hence it appears that our Lord did not attend the Passover mentioned in ch. 6:4—being the third since His ministry began, if the feast mentioned in ch. 5:1 was a Passover.

2. feast of tabernacles . . . at hand—This was the last of the three annual festivals, celebrated on the 15th of the 7th month (September). (See Lev. 23:33, etc.; Deut. 16:13, etc.; Neh. 8:14-18).

3-5. His brethren said—(See on Matt. 13:54-56). Depart . . . into Judea . . .—In vs. 5 this speech is as-

1. After these things. John passes from the preceding discourse of our Lord, which He delivered a little before the Passover, chap. vi. 4, to the Feast of Tabernacles, which happened six months after, and thus omits many things mentioned by the other Evangelists which our blessed Lord said and did during that time. He had already gone over Galilee four or five times; and He continued there, because He found that the hatred of the Jews was such that they would kill Him if they could meet with Him in Judea; and His time to suffer was not yet come. For he would not walk in Jewry. He found greater scope for the exercise of His important ministry in Galilee than in Judea, as the chief priests were continually plotting His death.

2. Feast of tabernacles. This feast was celebrated on the fifteenth day of the month Tisri, answering to the last half of our September and the first half of October. This month was the seventh of the ecclesiastical, and first of the civil, year. The feast took its name from the tents which were erected about the Temple, in public places, in courts, on the flat roofs of their houses, and in gardens; in which the Jews dwelt for eight days, in commemoration of the forty years during which their fathers dwelt in the wilderness. It was one of the three solemn annual feasts in which all the males were obliged, by the law, to appear at Jerusalem. This feast was celebrated in the following manner. All the people cut down branches of palm trees, he spent among his Galilean disciples wasted and thrown away, and his miracles turning to no account unless those at Jerusalem saw them. That it would be for the advancement of his name, There is no man that does anything in secret if he himself seeks to be known openly. They took it for granted that Christ sought to make himself known: "If thou do these things, venture abroad, and show thyself to the world. It is high time to think of being great."

(2) The evangelist notes it is an evidence of their infidelity: For neither did his brethren believe in him (v. 5). They that hear his word and keep it are the kindred he values. There were those who were akin to Christ according to the flesh who did believe in him, and yet others did not believe in him.

(3) What was there amiss in the advice which they gave him? It was a sign that they did not believe him able to guide them, when they did not think him sufficient to guide himself. They discovered a great carelessness about his safety, when they would have him go to Judæa, where they knew the Jews sought to kill him. Perhaps they were weary of his company in Galilee, and this was, in effect, a desire that he would depart out of their coasts. They tacitly reproach him as mean-spirited, that he durst not trust himself upon the stage of public action, which, if he had any courage and greatness of soul, he would do, and not sneak thus and skulk in a corner. They seem to question the truth of the miracles he wrought, in saying, "If thou do these things, if they will bear the test of a public scrutiny in the courts above, produce them there." They think Christ altogether such a one as themselves, and as desirous as they to make a fair show in the flesh. Self was at the bottom of all; if he would make himself as great as he might, they, being his kinsmen, should share in his honour. Many go to public ordinances, only to show themselves, and all their care is to make a good appearance.

2. The prudence and humility of our Lord Jesus, v. 6–8. Though there were so many base insinuations in it, he answered them mildly. We should learn of our Master to reply with meekness, and where it is easy to find much amiss, to seem not to see it, and wink at the affront.

(1) He shows the difference between himself and them, in two things: [1] His time was set, so was not theirs: My time is not yet come, but your time is always ready. Those who live useless lives have their time always ready; they can go and come when they please. But those whose time is filled up with duty will often find themselves straitened, and they have not yet time for that which others can do at any time. The confinement of business is a thousand times better than the liberty of idleness. We, who are ignorant and short-sighted, are apt to prescribe to him. The present time is our time, but he is fittest to judge, and, it may be, his time is not yet come. Therefore wait with patience for his time. [2] His life was sought, so was not theirs, v. 7. They, in showing themselves to the world, did not expose themselves: "The world cannot hate you, for you are of the world." Unholy souls, whom the holy God cannot love, the world that lies in wickedness cannot hate; but Christ, in showing himself to the world, laid himself open to the greatest danger; for me it hateth. Christ was not only slighted, but hated. But why did the world hate Christ? "Because" (saith he), "I testify of it, that the works of it are evil." The works of an evil world are evil works; as the tree is, so are the fruits. It is a great uneasiness and provocation to the world to be convicted of the evil of its works. Whatever is pretended, the real cause of the world's enmity to the gospel is the testimony it bears against sin and sinners. It is better to incur the world's hatred, by testifying against its wickedness, than gain its goodwill by going down the stream with it.

(2) He dismisses them, with a design to stay behind for some time in Galilee (v. 8): Go you up to this feast, I go not up yet. He allows their going to the feast. He denies them his company. Those who go to ordinances for ostentation, or to serve some secular purpose, go without Christ, and will speed accordingly. If the presence of Christ go not with us, to what purpose should we go up? When we are going to, or coming from, solemn ordinances, it becomes us to be careful what company we have and choose, lest the coal of good affections be quenched by corrupt communications. I go not up yet to this feast; he does not say, I will not go up at all, but not yet. The reason he gives is, My time is not yet fully come.

3. Christ's continuance in Galilee till his full time was come, v. 9. He, saying these things to them, abode still in Galilee. He would not depart from his own purpose. It becomes the followers of Christ thus to be steady, and not to use lightness.

4. His going up to the feast when his time was come. (1) When he went: When his brethren were cribed to their unbelief. But as they were in the "upper room" among the one hundred and twenty disciples who waited for the descent of the Spirit after the Lord's ascension (Acts 1:14), they seem to have had their prejudices removed, perhaps after His resurrection. Indeed here their language is more that of strong prejudice and suspicion (such as near relatives, even the best, too frequently show in such cases), than from unbelief. There was also, probably, a tincture of vanity in it. 'Thou hast many disciples in Judea; here in Galilee they are fast dropping off; it is not like one who advances the claims Thou dost to linger so long here, away from the city of our solemnities, where surely "the kingdom of our father David" is to be set up: "seeking," as Thou dost, "to be known openly," those miracles of Thine ought not to be confined to this distant corner, but submitted at headquarters to the inspection of "the world."' (See Ps. 69:8, "I am become a stranger to my brethren, an alien unto my mother's children!")

6-10. My time is not yet come—i.e., for showing Himself to the world. your time is always ready—i.e., 'It matters little when we go up, for ye have no great plans in life, and nothing hangs upon your movements. With Me it is otherwise; on every movement of Mine there hangs what ye know not. The world has no quarrel with you, for ye bear no testimony against it, and so draw down upon yourselves none of its wrath; but I am here to lift up My voice against its hypocrisy, and denounce its abominations; therefore it cannot endure Me, and one false step might precipitate its fury on its Victim's head before the time. Away, therefore, to the feast as soon as it suits you; I follow at the fitting moment, but "My time is not yet full come."' willows, and myrtles (and tied them together with gold and silver cords, or with ribbons), which they carried with them all day, took them into their synagogues and kept them by them while at prayers. On the other days of the feast they carried them with them into the Temple and walked round the altar with them in their hands, singing, "Hosanna!" i.e., "Save, we beseech Thee!" —the trumpets sounding on all sides. To this feast John seems to refer, Rev. vii. 9-10, where he represents the saints standing before the throne, with palm branches in their hands, singing, "Salvation to God." On the seventh day of the feast, they went seven times round the altar, and this was called the "great Hosanna." But the ceremony at which the Jews testified most joy was that of pouring out the water, which was done on the eighth day of the feast. A priest drew some water out of the Pool of Siloam, in a golden vessel, and brought it into the Temple; and at the time of the morning sacrifice, while the members of the sacrifice were on the altar, he went up and poured this water mingled with wine upon it, the people all the while singing, with transports of joy, Isaiah xii, especially v. 6: "With joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation." To this part of the ceremony our Lord appears to allude in v. 37 of this chapter.

3. His brethren . . . said. It is generally supposed that these were the children of the sisters of his mother, Mary; but some of the ancients have stated that Joseph had several children by a former wife. No solid proof can be alleged against this, nor can we pretend to say that these were not the children of Joseph and Mary. Our blessed Lord, it is true, was her Firstborn, while she was yet a virgin; but no man can prove that He was her last.

4. No man that doeth any thing in secret. They took it for granted that Christ was influenced by the same spirit which themselves felt, and that therefore He should use every opportunity of exhibiting himself to the public, that He might get into repute; and they hoped that a part of His honor would be reflected back upon themselves, as being His near relations.

5. Neither did his brethren believe in him. They did not receive Him as the promised Messiah; but, having seen so many of His miracles, they could not but consider Him as an eminent prophet. They supposed that if He were the Messiah He would wish to manifest himself as such to the world; and because He did not do so they did not believe that He was the Salvation of Israel.

6. My time is not yet come. It is probable our Lord meant no more than this, that He had some business to transact before He could go to Jerusalem; but His brethren, having nothing to hinder them, might set off immediately. Others think He spoke of His passion: My time of suffering is not yet come. as you are still in friendship with the world, you need not be under any apprehension of danger; you may go when you please. The first sense I think is the best.

7. The world cannot hate you. The Jews will not persecute you, because you are in their sentiments and interests. But me it hateth. Because I condemn its injustice, its pride, its ambition, and its maxims by My life and doctrine. It is very likely that the term world means here the Jewish people only.

8. I go not up yet unto this feast. Porphyry accuses our blessed Lord of falsehood, because He said here, I will not go to this feast, and yet afterwards He went; and some interpreters have made more ado than was necessary in order to reconcile this seeming contradiction. To me the whole seems very simple and plain. Our Lord did not say, "I will not go to this feast"; but merely, I go not yet or am not "going," i.e., at present; because, as He said in v. 6 and repeats here, His time was not yet come—He had other business to transact before He could go.

MATTHEW HENRY

gone up. He went up after them. His carnal brethren went up first, and then he went. It is not, Who comes first? that will be the question, but, Who come fittest? If we bring our hearts with us, it is no matter who gets before us. (2) How he went, as if he were hiding himself: not openly, but as it were in secret. Provided the work of God be done effectually, it is best done when done with least noise. We may do the work of God privately, and yet not do it deceitfully.

5. The great expectation that there was of him among the Jews at Jerusalem, v. 11–14. They could not but think of him (v. 11): The Jews sought him at the feast, and said, Where is he? They hoped the feast would bring him to Jerusalem, and then they should see him. If an opportunity of acquaintance with Christ come to their door, they can like it well enough. They sought him at the feast. Those who would see Christ at a feast must seek him there. Perhaps it was his enemies that were thus waiting an opportunity to seize him. They said, Where is he?—where is that fellow? Thus scornfully and contemptibly do they speak of him. When they should have welcomed the feast as an opportunity of serving God, they were glad of it as an opportunity of persecuting Christ. The people differed much in their sentiments concerning him (v. 12): There was much murmuring, or muttering, rather among the people concerning him. The enmity of the rulers against Christ caused him to be so much the more talked of. This ground the gospel of Christ has got by the opposition made to it. By being everywhere spoken against, it has come to be everywhere spoken of, and by this means has been spread the further. This murmuring was not against Christ, but concerning him; some murmured at the rulers, because they did not countenance and encourage him: others murmured at them, because they did not silence and restrain him. Christ and his religion have been, and will be, the subject of much controversy, and debate, Luke xii. 51, 52. But the noise and rencounter of liberty and business are preferable, surely, to the silence and agreement of a prison. Some said, He is a good man. This was a truth, but it was far short of being the whole truth. He was the Son of God. Many who have no ill thoughts of Christ have yet low thoughts of him, they do not say enough. Even those who would not believe him to be the Messiah could not but own he was a good man. Others said, Nay, but he deceiveth the people; if this had been true, he had been a very bad man. It must be taken for granted that there was some undiscovered cheat at the bottom, because it was the interest of the chief priests to oppose him and run him down. They were frightened by their superiors from speaking much of him (v. 13): No man spoke openly of him, for fear of the Jews. Either, they durst not openly speak well of him. Or they durst not speak at all of him openly. Because nothing could justly be said against him, they would not suffer anything to be said of him.

Verses 14–36

I. Christ's public preaching in the temple (v. 14): He went up into the temple, and taught. His sermon is not recorded. But that which is observable here is that it was about the midst of the feast. Why did he not go to the temple sooner, to preach? Because the people would have more leisure to hear him when they had spent some days in their booths. Because he would choose to appear when both his friends and his enemies had done looking for him. But why did he appear thus publicly now? Surely it was to shame his persecutors. By showing that he did not fear them; by taking their work out of their hands. Their office was to teach the people in the temple. But they taught for doctrines the commandments of men, and therefore he goes up to the temple and teaches the people.

II. His discourse with the Jews hereupon.

1. Concerning his doctrine.

(1) How the Jews admired it (v. 15): They marvelled, saying, How knoweth this man letters, having never learned? Our Lord Jesus was not educated in the schools of the prophets, or at the feet of the rabbin. Having received the Spirit without measure, he needed not to receive any knowledge from man, or by man. Christ had letters, though he had never learned them. It is necessary that Christ's ministers should have learning, and since they cannot expect to have it by inspiration, they must take pains to get it in an ordinary way. Christ's having learning, though he had not been taught it, made him truly great and wonderful. Some, it is likely, took notice of it to his honour. Others, probably, mentioned it in disparagement and contempt of him: Whatever he seems to have, he cannot really have any true learning, for he was never at the university, nor took his degree. Some perhaps suggested that he had got his learning

10. then went he . . . not openly—not "in the (caravan) company" [MEYER]. See on Luke 2:44.) as it were in secret—rather, in a manner secretly; perhaps by some other route, and in a way not to attract notice.

11-13. Jews—the rulers—sought him—for no good end. Where is He?—He had not been at Jerusalem for probably a year and a half.

12. much murmuring—buzzing. among the people—the multitudes; the natural expression of a Jewish writer, indicating without design the crowded state of Jerusalem at this festival [WEBSTER and WILKINSON].

a good man . . . Nay . . . deceiveth . . .—the two opposite views of His claims, that they were honest, and that they were an imposture. none spake openly of him—i.e., in His favor, "for fear of the [ruling] Jews."

14, 15. about the midst of the feast—the fourth or fifth day of the eight, during which it lasted. went up into the temple and taught—The word denotes formal and continuous teaching, as distinguished from mere casual sayings. This was probably the first time that He did so thus openly in Jerusalem. He had kept back till the feast was half through, to let the stir about Him subside, and entering the city unexpectedly, had begun His "teaching" at the temple, and created a certain awe, before the wrath of the rulers had time to break it.

15. How knoweth . . . letters—learning (Acts 26:24). having never learned—at any rabbinical school, as Paul under Gamaliel. These rulers knew well enough that He had not studied under any human teacher—an important admission against ancient and modern attempts to trace our Lord's wisdom to human sources [MEYER]. Probably His teaching on this occasion was expository, manifesting that unrivalled faculty and depth which in the Sermon on the Mount had excited the astonishment of all.

11. Then the Jews sought him. By Jews here are to be understood the scribes, Pharisees, and rulers of the people, and not the inhabitants of the province of Judea.

12. Some said, He is a good man. The multitude were divided in their opinions concerning Him. Those who knew Him best said, He is a good man. Those who spoke according to the character given Him by the priests said, Nay; but he deceiveth the people.

15. How knoweth this man letters, having never learned? The Jewish learning consisted in the knowledge of their own Scriptures and the traditions of their elders. As these branches of learning were taught at the Jewish schools, and our Lord had never attended there, they were astonished to find Him excelling in that sort of learning of which they themselves professed to be the sole teachers.

by magic arts. Since they know not how he could be a scholar, they will think him a conjuror.

(2) What he asserted concerning it; three things:

[1] That his doctrine is divine (v. 16): My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me. They were offended because he undertook to teach though he had never learned, in answer to which he tells them that his doctrine was such as was not to be learned. It was a divine revelation. "My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me; it does not centre in myself, nor lead ultimately to myself, but to him that sent me."

[2] That the most competent judges are those that with a sincere and upright heart desire and endeavour to do the will of God (v. 17): If any man be willing to do the will of God he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God or whether I speak of myself. First, What the question is, concerning the doctrine of Christ, whether it be of God or no. Christ himself was willing to have his doctrine enquired into, much more should his ministers. Secondly, Who are likely to succeed in this search: those that do the will of God, at least are desirous to do it. Who they are that will do the will of God. Such as are resolved by the grace of God, when they find out what the will of God is, to conform to it. Whence it is that such a one shall know of the truth of Christ's doctrine. Christ has promised to give knowledge to such; he hath said, He shall know. Those who improve the light they have shall be secured by divine grace. He that is inclined to submit to the rules of the divine law is disposed to admit the rays of divine light.

[3] That hereby it appeared that Christ, as a teacher, did not speak of himself, v. 18. See here the character of a deceiver: he seeketh his own glory, which is a sign that he speaks of himself. Here is the description of the cheat: they speak of themselves, and have no commission nor instructions from God; no warrant but their own will, no inspiration but their own imagination. They consult purely their own glory; self-seekers are self-speakers. Those who speak from God will speak for God, and for his glory. See the contrary character Christ gives of himself and his doctrine: He that seeks his glory that sent him, he is true. He was sent of God. Those teachers, and those only, who are sent of God, are to be received and entertained by us. He sought the glory of God. It was both the tendency of his doctrine and the tenor of his whole conversation to glorify God. This was a proof that he was true. False teachers are most unrighteous; they are unjust to God whose name they abuse, and unjust to the souls of men whom they impose upon. But Christ made it appear that he was true, that he was really what he said he was.

2. They discourse concerning the crime that was laid to his charge for curing the impotent man, and bidding him carry his bed on the sabbath day. He argues against them by way of recrimination, v. 19. How could they for shame censure him for a breach of the law of Moses, when they themselves were such notorious breakers of it? Did not Moses give you the law? But it was their wickedness that none of them kept the law. Their neglect of the law was universal: None of you keepeth it. They boasted of the law, and pretended a zeal for it, and yet none of them kept it; like those who say that they are for the church, and yet never go to church. It was an aggravation of their wickedness, in persecuting Christ; "None of you keepeth the law, why then go ye about to kill me for not keeping it?" Those are commonly most censorious of others who are most faulty themselves. Those that support themselves and their interest by persecution and violence, whatever they pretend, are not keepers of the law of God.

Here the people rudely interrupted him (v. 20): Thou hast a devil; who goes about to kill thee? This intimates the good opinion they had of their rulers, who, they think, would never attempt so atrocious a thing as to kill him. The ill opinion they had of our Lord Jesus: "Thou hast a devil, thou art possessed with a lying spirit, and art a bad man for saying so"; so some: or rather, "Thou art melancholy, and art a weak man; thou frightenest thyself with causeless fears." Not only open frenzies, but silent melancholies were then commonly imputed to the power of Satan. "Thou art crazed, hast a distempered brain." Let us not think it strange if the best of men are put under the worst of characters. Those who would be like Christ must put up with affronts, must not regard them, much less resent them, and least of all revenge them. He argues by way of appeal and vindication.

(1) He appeals to their own sentiments of this miracle: "I have done one work, and you all marvel, v. 21. You cannot choose but marvel at it as truly great."

(2) He appeals to their own practice in other instances: "I have done one work on the sabbath, and you all marvel, you make a mighty strange thing of 16-18. doctrine . . . not mine . . .—i.e., from Myself unauthorized; I am here by commission.

17. If any man will do his will . . .—'is willing,' or 'wishes to do.' whether . . . of God or . . . of myself—from above or from beneath; is divine or an imposture of Mine. A principle of immense importance, showing, on the one hand, that singleness of desire to please God is the grand inlet to light on all questions vitally affecting one's eternal interests, and on the other, that the want of his, whether perceived or not, is the chief cause of infidelity amidst the light of revealed religion. 18. seeketh his own glory . . .—(See on ch. 5:41-44).

19, 20. Did not Moses . . .—i.e., In opposing Me ye pretend zeal for Moses, but to the spirit and end of that law which he gave ye are total strangers, and in "going about to kill Me" ye are its greatest enemies.

20. The people answered, Thou hast a devil: who goeth about to kill thee?—This was said by the multitude, who as yet had no bad feeling to Jesus, and were not in the secret of the plot hatching, as our Lord knew, against Him.

21-24. I have done one work . . .—Taking no notice of the popular appeal, as there were those there who knew well enough what He meant, He recalls His cure of the impotent man, and the murderous rage it had kindled (ch. 5:9, 16, 18). It may seem strange

16. My doctrine is not mine. Our blessed Lord, in the character of Messiah, might as well say, My doctrine is not mine, as an ambassador might say, I speak not my own words, but his who sent me.

17. If any man will do his will. I will give you a sure rule by which you may judge of My doctrine: If you really wish to do the will of God, begin the practice of it; and take My doctrine and apply it to all that you know God requires of man.

18. He that speaketh of himself. I will give you another rule whereby you shall know whether I am from God or not: If I speak so as to procure My own glory, to gratify vanity, or to secure and promote My secular interests, then reject Me as a deceiver and as a false prophet. And no unrighteousness is in him. Or, "There is no falsehood in him."

19. Did not Moses give you the law? The scribes and Pharisees announced our Lord to the multitude as a deceiver; and they grounded their calumny on this, that He was not an exact observer of the law, for He had healed a man on the Sabbath day, chap. v. 9-10, and consequently must be a false prophet. Now they insinuated that the interests of religion required Him to be put to death (1) as a violator of the law and (2) as a false prophet and deceiver of the people. To destroy this evil reasoning our Lord speaks in this wise; If I deserve death for curing a man on the Sabbath and desiring him to carry home his bed, which you consider a violation of the law, you are more culpable than I am, for you circumcise a child on the Sabbath, which requires much more bustle and is of so much less use than what I have done to the infirm man.

21. I have done one work. That of curing the impotent man, already referred to. See chap. v. 9. And ye all marvel. Or, "You all marvel because of this."

it, that a religious man should dare do such a thing. If it be lawful for you, nay, and your duty, to circumcise a child on the sabbath day, much more was it lawful and good for me to heal a diseased man on that day."

First, The rise and origin of circumcision: Moses gave you circumcision. Circumcision is said to be given, and (v. 23) they are said to receive it. The ordinances of God, and particularly those which are seals of the covenant, are gifts given to men, and are to be received as such. Moses did not give it them, but God; nay, it was not of Moses first, but of the fathers, v. 22. It was ordained long before, for it was a seal of the righteousness of faith, and was part of that blessing of Abraham which was to come upon the Gentiles.

Secondly, The respect paid to the law of circumcision above that of the sabbath. If a child was born one sabbath day it was without fail circumcised the next.

Thirdly, The inference Christ draws hence in justification of himself (v. 23): A man-child on the sabbath day receives circumcision, that the law of circumcision might not be broken. "Now, if this be allowed by yourselves, how unreasonable are you, who are angry with me because I have made a man every whit whole on the sabbath day!" It was a spiteful anger, anger with gall in it. It is very absurd and unreasonable for us to condemn others for that in which we justify ourselves. Observe the comparison Christ here makes between their circumcising a child and his healing a man on the sabbath day. Circumcision was but a ceremonial institution. What Christ did was a good work by the law of nature. Circumcision made sore; but what Christ did made whole. Whereas, when they had circumcised a child, their care was only to heal up that part which was circumcised, which might be done and yet the child remain under other illnesses, Christ had made this man every whit whole. I have made the whole man healthful and sound. The whole body was healed. Nay, Christ not only healed his body, but his soul too, by that admonition, Go, and sin no more, and so indeed made the whole man sound.

He concludes this argument with that rule (v. 24): Judge not according to the appearance, but judge righteous judgment. This may be applied, either, First, In particular, to this work. Be not partial in your judgment; judge not with respect of persons. Or, Secondly, In general, to Christ's person and preaching, which they were offended at. Those things that are false commonly appear best when they are judged of according to the outward appearance, they appear most plausible prima facie—at the first glance. It was this that gained the Pharisees such an interest and reputation, that they appeared right unto men (Matt. xxiii. 27, 28), and men judged of them by that appearance. "But," saith Christ, "be not too confident that all are real saints who are seeming ones." Those who undertook to judge whether he was the Son of God or no by his outward appearance were not likely to judge righteous judgment. If a divine power accompanied him, and God bore him witness, and the scriptures were fulfilled in him, they ought to receive him, and to judge by faith, and not by the sight of the eye. We must not judge concerncerning any by their outward appearance, not by their titles, the figure they make in the world, and their fluttering show, but by their intrinsic worth, and the gifts and graces of God's Spirit in them.

3. Christ discourses with them here concerning himself, whence he came, and whither he was going, v. 25–36.

(1) Whence he came, v. 25–31.

[1] The objection concerning this stated by some of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, who seem to have been of all others most prejudiced against him, v. 25. Our Lord Jesus has often met with the least welcome from those that one would expect the best from. But it was not without some just cause that it came into a proverb. The nearer the church the further from God.

First, Reflecting on the rulers, because they let him alone: Is not this he whom they seek to kill? "Why do they not do it then? Lo, he speaketh boldly, and they say nothing to him; do the rulers know indeed that this is the very Christ?" v. 26. Here they slyly and maliciously insinuate two things, to exasperate the rulers against Christ. a. That by conniving at his preaching they brought their authority into contempt. "If our rulers will suffer themselves to be thus trampled upon, they may thank themselves if none stand in awe of them." The worst of persecutions have often been carried on under colour of the necessary support of authority and government. b. That hereby they brought their judgment into suspicion: Do they know that this is the Christ? It is spoken that He should refer to an event a year and a half old, as if but newly done. But their present attempt "to kill Him" brought up the past scene vividly, not only to Him, but without doubt to them, too, if indeed they had ever forgotten it; and by this fearless reference to it, exposing their hypocrisy and dark designs, He gave His position great moral strength. 22. Moses . . . gave you circumcision . . .—Though servile work was forbidden on the sabbath, the circumcision of males on that day (which certainly was a servile work) was counted no infringement of the Law. How much less ought fault to be found with One who had made a man "every whit whole"—or rather, 'a man's entire body whole'—on the sabbath-day? What a testimony to the reality of the miracle, none daring to meet the bold appeal.

24. Judge not . . .—i.e., Rise above the letter into the spirit of the law.

25-27. some of them of Jerusalem—the citizens, who, knowing the long-formed purpose of the rulers to put Jesus to death, wondered that they were now letting Him teach openly. 26. Do the rulers know . . .—Have they got some new light in favor of His claims?

ADAM CLARKE

22. But of the fathers. That is, it came "from the patriarchs." Circumcision was not, properly speaking, one of the laws of the Mosaic institution, it having been given at first to Abraham, and continued among his posterity till the giving of the law, Gen. xvii. 9-10, etc. Ye . . . circumcise a man. That is, a male child, for every male child was circumcised when eight days old; and if the eighth day after its birth happened to be a Sabbath, it was nevertheless circumcised, that the law might not be broken which had enjoined the circumcision to take place at that time, Lev. xii. 3.

23. Every whit whole. Some think that the original words should be translated "the whole man"; and that the meaning is that the blessed Saviour made him whole in both body and soul. This makes the miracle the greater, and shows still more forcibly the necessity of doing it without delay.

24. Judge not according to the appearance. Attend to the law, not merely in the letter, but in its spirit and design. Learn that the law which commands men to rest on the Sabbath day is subordinate to the law of mercy and love, which requires them to be ever active to promote God's glory in the comfort and salvation of their fellow creatures. And endeavor to judge of the merit or demerit of an action, not from the first impression it may make upon your prejudices, but from its tendency, and the motives of the person, as far as it is possible for you to acquaint yourselves with them, still believing the best where you have no certain proof to the contrary.

26. That this is the very Christ. In most of the common printed editions alethos is found, the very Christ; but the word is wanting in many MSS. and several editions. Calmet observes that the multitude which heard our Lord at this time was composed of three different classes of persons: (1) The rulers, priests, and Pharisees, declared enemies of Christ; (2) The inhabitants of Jerusalem, who knew the sentiments of their rulers concerning Him; (3) The strangers, who from different quarters had come up to Jerusaironically. "How came they to change their mind?" When religion and the profession of Christ's name are out of fashion, and consequently out of repute, many are strongly tempted to persecute and oppose them, only that they may not be thought to favour them and incline to them. It was strange that the rulers, thus irritated, did not seize Christ; but his hour was not yet come; and God can tie men's hands to admiration, though he should not turn their hearts.

Secondly, By their exception against his being the Christ, in which appeared more malice than matter, v. 27. "We have this argument against it, that we know this man, whence he is; but when Christ comes no man knows whence he is." They despised him because they knew whence he was. Familiarity breeds contempt, and we are apt to disdain the use of those whom we know the rise of. Christ's own received him not, because he was their own, for which very reason they should the rather have loved him.

[2] Christ's answer to this objection, v. 28, 29. He spoke freely and boldly, he cried in the temple, as he taught; to express his earnestness, being grieved for the hardness of their hearts. There may be a vehemency in contending for the truth where yet there is no intemperate heat nor passion. We may instruct gainsayers with warmth, and yet with meekness. Whoever has ears to hear, let him hear this. His answer to their cavil is, a. By way of concession, "You both know me, and you know whence I am. You know me, you think you know me; but you are mistaken; you take me to be the carpenter's son, and born at Nazareth, but it is not so." b. By way of negation, denying that that which they did see in him, and know of him, was all that was to be known. He will tell them what they knew not, from whom he came. (a) That he did not come of himself. (b) That he was sent of his Father; this is twice mentioned. (c) That he was from his Father as the beams from the sun. (d) That the Father who sent him is true; he had promised to give the Messiah. He that made the promise is true, and has performed it. He is true, and will fulfil the promise in the calling of the Gentiles. (e) That these unbelieving Jews did not know the Father: He that sent me, whom you know not. There is much ignorance of God even with many that have a form of knowledge; and the true reason why people reject Christ is because they do not know God. (f) Our Lord Jesus was intimately acquainted with the Father that sent him: but I know him. He was not at all in doubt concerning his mission from him, nor at all in the dark concerning the work he had to do.

[3] The provocation which this gave to his enemies, v. 30. They sought therefore to take him. But nobody touched him, because his hour was not yet come. God has wicked men in a chain. The malice of persecutors is impotent even when it is most impetuous, and, when Satan fills their hearts, yet God ties their hands. God's servants are sometimes wonderfully protected by indiscernible unaccountable means. Christ had his hour set. So have all his people and all his ministers. Nor can all the powers of hell and earth prevail against them, until they have finished their testimony.

[4] The good effect which Christ's discourse had upon some of his hearers (v. 31): Many of the people believed on him. Even where the gospel meets with opposition there may yet be a great deal of good done. Who they were that believed; not a few, but many, more than one would have expected when the stream ran so strongly the other way. But these many were of the people. We must not measure the prosperity of the gospel by its success among the great ones; nor must ministers say that they labour in vain, though none but the poor receive the gospel. What induced them to believe: the miracles which he did. How weak their faith was: they do not positively assert, as the Samaritans did, This is indeed the Christ, but they only argue, When Christ comes will he do more miracles than these? "Therefore why may not this be he?" They believe it, but have not courage to own it. Even weak faith may be true faith, and so accepted, by the Lord Jesus.

(2) Whither he was going, v. 32-36.

[1] The design of the Pharisees and chief priests against him, v. 32. The provocation given them was that they had information brought them by their spies, that the people murmured such things concerning him, that there were many who had a respect and value for him. Though the people did but whisper these things, yet the Pharisees were enraged at it. The Pharisees were sensible that if Christ did thus increase they must decrease. The project they laid hereupon was to seize Jesus, and take him into custody: They sent officers to take him. The most effectual way to disperse the flock is to smite the shepherd. The Pharisees as such, had no power, and

27. Howbeit we know this man . . .—This seems to refer to some current opinion that Messiah's origin would be mysterious (not altogether wrong), from which they concluded that Jesus could not be He, since they knew all about His family at Nazareth.

28, 29. cried Jesus—in a louder tone, and more solemn, witnessing style than usual.

Ye both . . .—i.e., 'Yes, ye know both Myself and My local parentage, "and (yet) I am not come of Myself."

he that sent me is true . . .—Probably the meaning is, 'He that sent Me is the only real Sender of any one.'

30-32. sought to take . . . none laid hands—their impotence being equal to their malignity.

31. When Christ cometh, will he . . .—i.e., If this be not the Christ, what can the Christ do, when He does come, which has not been anticipated and eclipsed by this man? This was evidently the language of friendly persons, overborne by their spiteful superiors, but unable to keep quite silent. 32. heard that the people murmured—that mutterings to this effect were going about, and thought it high time to stop Him if He was not to be allowed to carry away the people.

ADAM CLARKE

lem to the feast, and who heard Christ attentively, being ignorant of the designs of the rulers against Him. Our Lord addresses himself in this discourse principally to His enemies. The strange Jews were those who were astonished when Christ said, v. 20, that they sought to kill Him. And the Jews of Jerusalem were those who, knowing the disposition of the rulers, and seeing Christ speak openly, no man attempting to seize Him, addressed each other in the foregoing words, Do the rulers know indeed that this is the Christ? imagining that the chief priests had at last been convinced that Jesus was the Messiah.

27. No man knoweth whence he is. The generality of the people knew very well that the Messiah was to be born in Bethlehem, in the city, and of the family, of David; see v. 42. But from Isaiah liii. 8, "Who shall declare his generation?" they probably thought that there should be something so peculiarly mysterious in His birth, or in the manner of His appearing, that no person could fully understand.

28. Ye both know me, and ye know whence I am. Perhaps they should be read interrogatively: "Do you both know Me, and know whence I am?" Our Lord takes them up on their own profession and argues from it. Since you have got so much information concerning Me, add this to it, to make it complete; viz., that I am not come of myself, am no self-created or self-authorized prophet. I came from God; the testimony of John the Baptist, the descent of the Holy Ghost, the voice from heaven, the purity and excellence of My doctrine, and the multitude of My miracles sufficiently attest this. Now God is true, who has borne testimony to Me. But you know Him not; therefore it is that this testimony is disregarded.

31. Will he do more miracles? It was the belief of the Jews, and they founded it upon Isa. xxxv. 5, that, when the Messiah came, He would do all kinds of miracles. And in order that they might have the fullest proof of the divine mission of Christ, it had pleased God to cause miracles to cease for between four and five hundred years, and that John the Baptist himself had not wrought any. His miracles, therefore, were a full proof of His divine mission.

32. The people murmured such things. The people began to be convinced that He was the Messiah; and this being generally whispered about, the Pharisees thought it high time to put Him to death, lest the people should believe on Him. Therefore they sent officers to take him.

therefore they got the chief priests to join with them. As the world by wisdom knew not God, so the Jewish church by their wisdom knew not Christ.

[2] The discourse of our Lord Jesus hereupon (v. 33, 34): Yet a little while I am with you, and then I go to him that sent me; you shall seek me, and shall not find me; and where I am, thither you cannot come. These words, like the pillar of cloud and fire, have a bright side and a dark side.

First, They have a bright side towards our Lord Jesus himself. Three things Christ here comforted himself with: That he had but a little time to continue here in this troublesome world. His warfare will shortly be accomplished. Whomsoever we are with in this world, friends or foes, it is but a little while that we shall be with them. We must be awhile with those that are pricking briars and grieving thorns; but thanks be to God, it is but a little while, and we shall be out of their reach. That he should go to him that sent him. When I have done my work with you, then, and not till then, I go to him that sent me. Let those who suffer for Christ comfort themselves with this, that they have a God to go to, and are going to him, to be for ever with him. That none of their persecutions could follow him to heaven: You shall seek me, and shall not find me. It adds to the happiness of glorified saints that they are out of the reach of the devil and all his wicked instruments.

Secondly, These words have a black and dark side towards those that hated and persecuted Christ. They now longed to be rid of him. According to their choice so shall their doom be. He will not trouble them long, yet a little while and he will depart from them. They that are weary of Christ need no more to make them miserable than to have their wish. They would certainly repent their choice when it was too late. They should in vain seek the presence of the Messiah: "You shall seek me, and shall not find me" Those who now seek Christ shall find him, but the day is coming when those who now refuse him shall seek him, and shall not find him. They should in vain expect a place in heaven: Where I am, and where all believers shall be with me, thither ye cannot come. They are disabled by their own iniquity and infidelity: You cannot come, because you will not. Indeed heaven would be no heaven to them.

[3] Their descant upon this discourse (v. 35, 36): They said among themselves; Whither will he go? First, Their wilful ignorance and blindness. He had expressly said whither he would go—to him that sent him, to his Father in heaven, and yet they ask, Whither will he go? and, What manner of saying is this? Secondly, Their daring contempt of Christ's threatenings. Instead of trembling at that terrible word, You shall seek me, and not find me, they banter it and make a jest of it. Thirdly, Their inveterate malice and rage against Christ. All they dreaded in his departure was that he would be out of the reach of their power: "Whither will he go, that we shall not find him?" Fourthly, Their proud disdain of the Gentiles, whom they here call the dispersed of the Gentiles. Will he make his court to them? "Will he go and teach the Gentiles? Will he carry his doctrine to them?" So common is it for those who have lost the power of religion to be very jealous for the monopoly of the the name. They now made a jest of his going to teach the Gentiles; but not long after he did it in good earnest by his apostles and ministers.

I. Christ's discourse, with the explication of it, v. 37–39. It is probable that these are only short hints of what he enlarged upon, but they have in them the substance of the whole gospel; here is a gospel invitation to come to Christ, and a gospel promise of comfort and happiness in him.

1. When he gave this invitation: On the last day of the feast of tabernacles, that great day. Much people were gathered together, and, if the invitation were given to many, it might be hoped that some would accept of it. The people were now returning to their homes, and he would give them this to carry away with them as his parting word. When a great congregation is about to scatter, it is affecting to think that in all probability they will never come all together again in this world, and therefore, if we can say or do anything to help them to heaven, that must be the time. It is good to be lively at the close of an ordinance. Christ made this offer on the last day of the feast. He will try them once more, and, if they will yet hear his voice, they shall live. It would be half a year before there would be another feast, and in that time they would many of them be in their graves. Behold now is the accepted time.

2. How he gave this invitation: Jesus stood and cried, which denotes his great earnestness and importunity. Love to souls will make preachers lively. His desire 33, 34. Yet a little while . . .—i.e., 'Your desire to be rid of Me will be for you all too soon fulfilled. Yet a little while and we part company—for ever; for I go whither ye cannot come: nor, even when ye at length seek Him whom ye now despise, shall ye be able to find Him'—referring not to any penitential, but to purely selfish cries in their time of desperation.

35, 36. Whither will he go . . .—They cannot comprehend Him, but seem awed by the solemn grandeur of His warning. He takes no notice, however, of their questions.

37-39. the last day, that great day of the feast—the eigthth (Lev. 23:39). It was a sabbath, the last feast day of the year, and distinguished by very remarkable ceremonies. "The generally joyous character of this feast broke out on this day into loud jubilation, particularly at the solemn moment when the priest, as was done on every day of this festival, brought forth, in golden vessels, water from the stream of Siloah, which flowed under the temple-mountain, and solemnly poured it upon the altar. Then the words of Isaiah 12:3 were sung, "With joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of Salvation," and thus the symbolical reference of this act, intimated in vs. 39, was expressed" [OLSHAUSEN]. So ecstatic was the joy with which this ceremony was performed—accompanied with sound of trumpets—that it used to be said, "Whoever had not witnessed it had never seen rejoicing at all" [LIGHTFOOT]. On this high occasion, then, He who had already drawn all eyes upon Him by His supernatural power and

33. Yet a little while am I with you. As He knew that the Pharisees had designed to take and put Him to death, and that in about six months from this time, as some conjecture, He should be crucified, He took the present opportunity of giving this information to the common people, who were best disposed towards Him, that they might lay their hearts to His teaching and profit by it while they had the privilege of enjoying it. The word autois, "to them," in the beginning of this verse, is wanting in many MSS. Our Lord did not speak these words to the officers who came to apprehend Him, as autois here implies, but to the common people, merely to show that He was not ignorant of the designs of the Pharisees, though they had not yet been able to put them into practice.

34. Ye shall seek me, and shall not find me. When the Roman armies come against you, you will vainly seek for a deliverer. But you shall be cut off in your sins, because you did not believe in Me. And where I am—in the Kingdom of glory—ye cannot come, for nothing that is unholy shall enter into the New Jerusalem.

35. The dispersed among the Gentiles. Or "Greeks." By the dispersed are meant here the Jews who were scattered through various parts of that empire which Alexander the Great had founded in Greece, Syria, Egypt, and Asia Minor, where the Greek language was used and where the Jewish Scriptures in the Greek version of the Septuagint were read.

37. In the last day, that great day of the feast. This was the eighth day, and was called the great day because of certain traditional observances, and not on account of any excellence which it derived from the original institution. On the seven days they professed to offer sacrifices for the seventy nations of the earth, but on the eighth day they offered sacrifices for Israel; therefore the eighth day was more highly esteemed than any of the others. See the account of the Feast of Tabernacles, in the note on v. 2. It was probably when they went to draw water from the Pool of Siloam, and while they were pouring it out at the foot of the altar, that our Lord spoke these words.

MATTHEW HENRY

was that all might take notice, and take hold of this invitation. He stood, and cried, that he might the better be heard. The heathen oracles were delivered privately by them that peeped and muttered; but the oracles of the gospel were proclaimed by one that stood, and cried.

3. The invitation itself is very general: If any man thirst, whoever he be, he is invited to Christ. It is also very gracious: "If any man thirst, let him come to me and drink. If any man desires to be truly and eternally happy, let him apply himself to me."

(1) The persons invited are such as thirst, which may be understood, either, [1] Of the indigence of their cases; either as to their outward condition (let his poverty and afflictions draw him to Christ for that peace which the world can neither give nor take away), or as to their inward state: "If any man want spiritual blessings, he may be supplied by me." Or, [2] Of the inclination of their souls and their desires towards a spiritual happiness. If any man hunger and thirst after righteousness.

(2) The invitation itself: Let him come to me. Let him go to Christ as the fountain of living waters.

(3) The satisfaction promised: Let him come and drink, he shall have that which will not only refresh, but replenish.

4. A gracious promise annexed to this gracious call (v. 38): He that believeth on me, out of his belly shall flow: (1) See here what it is to come to Christ: It is to believe on him, as the scripture hath said. We must not frame a Christ according to our fancy, but believe in a Christ according to the scripture. (2) See how thirsty souls, that come to Christ, shall be made to drink. Israel drank of the rock that followed them, but believers drink of a rock in them, Christ in them. Provision is made not only for their present satisfaction, but for their continual perpetual comfort. Living water, running water, which the Hebrew language calls living, because still in motion. The graces and comforts of the Spirit are compared to living (meaning running) water: Rivers of living water. The comfort flows in both plentifully and constantly as a river; strong as a stream to bear down the oppositions of doubts and fears. These flow out of his heart or soul. There gracious principles are planted; and out of the heart, in which the Spirit dwells, flow the issues of life. Where there are springs of grace and comfort in the soul they will send forth streams. Grace and comfort will evidence themselves. A holy heart will be seen in a holy life; the tree is known by its fruits, and the fountain by its streams. They will communicate themselves for the benefit of others; a good man is a common good.

Those words, as the scripture hath said, seem to refer to some promise in the Old Testament to this purport, and there are many. It was a custom of the Jews which they received by tradition, the last day of the feast of tabernacles to have a solemnity, which they called the pouring out of water. They fetched a golden vessel of water from the pool of Siloam, brought it into the temple with sound of trumpet and other ceremonies, and, upon the ascent to the altar, poured it out before the Lord with all possible expressions of joy. It is thought that our Saviour might here allude to this custom. Believers shall have the comfort, not of a vessel of water fetched from a pool, but of a river flowing from themselves.

5. Here is the evangelist's exposition of this promise (v. 39): This spoke he of the Spirit, of the gifts, graces, and comforts of the Spirit. It is promised to all that believe on Christ that they shall receive the Holy Ghost. Some received his miraculous gifts; all receive his sanctifying graces. The Spirit dwelling and working in believers is as a fountain of living running water, out of which plentiful streams flow, cooling and cleansing as water, mollifying and moistening as water, making them fruitful, and others joyful. This plentiful effusion of the Spirit was yet the matter of a promise; for the Holy Ghost was not yet given, because Jesus was not yet glorified. It was certain that he should be glorified, but he was as yet in a state of humiliation and contempt. And, if Christ must wait for his glory, let not us think it much to wait for ours. The Holy Ghost was not yet given. If we compare the clear knowledge and strong grace of the disciples of Christ themselves, after the day of Pentecost, with their darkness and weakness before, we shall understand in what sense the Holy Ghost was not yet given; the earnests and first-fruits of the Spirit were given, but the full harvest was not yet come. The Holy Ghost was not yet given in such rivers of living water as should issue forth to water the whole earth, even the Gentile world. The reason why the Holy Ghost was not given was because Jesus was not yet glorified. The death of Christ is sometimes called his glorification; for in his cross he conquered and triumphed. The gift of the Holy Ghost was pur-unrivalled teaching—"JESUS stood," probably in some elevated position, "and cried," as if making proclamation in the audience of all the people, "IF ANY MAN THIRST, LET HIM COME UNTO ME AND DRINK!" What an offer! The deepest cravings of the human spirit are here, as in the Old Testament, expressed by the figure of "thirst," and the eternal satisfaction of them by "drinking." To the woman of Samaria He had said almost the same thing, and in the same terms (John 4:13, 14). But what to her was simply affirmed to her as a fact, is here turned into a world-wide proclamation; and whereas there, the gift by Him of the living water is the most prominent idea—in contrast with her hesitation to give Him the perishable water of Jacob's well—here, the prominence is given to Himself as the Well-spring of all satisfaction. He had in Galilee invited all the WEARY AND HEAVYLADEN of the human family to come under His wing and they should find REST (Matt. 11:28), which is just the same deep want, and the same profound relief of it, under another and equally grateful figure. He had in the synagogue of Capernaum (ch. 6) announced Himself, in every variety of form, as "the BREAD of Life," and as both able and authorized to appease the "HUNGER," and quench the "THIRST," of all that apply to Him. There is, and there can be, nothing beyond that here. But what was on all those occasions uttered in private, or addressed to a provincial audience, is here sounded forth in the streets of the great religious metropolis, and in language of surpassing majesty, simplicity, and grace. It is just Jehovah's ancient proclamation now sounding forth through human flesh, "HO, EVERY ONE THAT THIRSTETH, COME YE TO THE WATERS, AND HE THAT HATH NO MONEY . . . !" (Isa. 55:1). In this light we have but two alternatives; either to say with Caiaphas of Him that uttered such words, "He is guilty of death," or falling down before Him to exclaim with Thomas, "MY LORD AND MY GOD!"

38. as the scripture hath said—These words belong to what follows, "Out of his belly, as the scripture hath said, shall flow . . ." referring not to any particular passage, but to such as Isaiah 58:11; Joel 3: 18; Zechariah 14:8; Ezekiel 47:1-12; in most of which the idea is that of waters issuing from beneath the temple, to which our Lord compares Himself and those who believe in Him. out of his belly—i.e., his inner man, his soul, as in Proverbs 20:27. rivers of living water—(See on ch. 4:13, 14). It refers primarily to the copiousness, but indirectly also to the diffusiveness, of this living water to the good of others.

39. This spake he of the Spirit—who, by His direct personal agency, opens up this spring of living waters in the human spirit (ch. 3: 6), and by His indwelling in the renewed soul ensures their unfailing flow. they that believe . . .—As the Holy Ghost is, in the rendemption of man, entirely at the service of Christ, as His Agent, so it is only in believing connection with Christ that any one "receives" the Spirit. for the Holy Ghost was not yet [given]—Beyond all doubt the word "given," or some similar word, is the right supplement. In ch. 16:7 the Holy Ghost is represented not only as the gift of Christ, but a gift the communication of which was dependent upon His own departure to the Father. Now as Christ was not yet gone, so the Holy Ghost was not yet given. Jesus not yet glorified—The word "glorified" is here used advisedly, to teach the reader not only that the departure of Christ to the Father was indispensable to the giving of the Spirit, but that this illustrious Gift, direct from the hands of the ascended Saviour, was God's intimation to the world that He whom it had cast out, crucified, and slain, was "His Elect, in whom His soul delighted," and that it was through the smiting of that Rock that the waters of the Spirit—for which the Church was waiting, and with pomp at the feast of tabernacles proclaiming its expectation—had gushed forth upon a thirsty world.

ADAM CLARKE

F. B. MEYER:

There is a deep inner lesson for us all in these words. We sometimes wonder why we have not received the Spirit and why our lives are not channels through which He pours in mighty rivers to make desert hearts and lives blossom and sing. How gladly would we part with all beside if we might be conscious that not tiny streamlets, not one river of holy influence merely, but that rivers were issuing from us as the waters from the temple threshold!

Is not the reason to be sought in our neglect to glorify Christ? We have never yet abandoned ourselves to Him, content to live the branch-life, with no other aim than to realize the one purpose of his most blessed life, the glorifying of the Father. We have never seriously made it our life-purpose to glorify the Lord Jesus. There has been no triumphal entry into our hearts, no enthronization, no challenge to the gates of our soul that they should lift themselves up to admit the King of Glory.

—Great Verses Through the Bible

38. He that believeth on me, as the scripture hath said. He who receives Me as the Messiah, according to what the Scripture has said concerning Me—My person, birth, conduct, preaching, and miracles being compared with what is written there, as ascertaining the true Messiah. Out of his belly—"from his heart and soul"; for in his soul shall this Spirit dwell. Living water. As a true spring is ever supplied with water from the great deep with which it has communication, so shall the soul of the genuine believer be supplied with light, life, love, and liberty, and all the other graces of the indwelling Spirit from the indwelling Christ. The Jews frequently compare the gifts and influences of the Holy Spirit to water in general. The Scriptures abound in this metaphor. See Ps. xxxvi. 8-9; Isa. xliv. 3-4; Joel ii. 23.

39. Was not yet given. "Given" is added by many MSS. and several of the primitive fathers. The word seems necessary to the completion of the sense.

chased by the blood of Christ: the Holy Ghost was not given. There was not so much need of the Spirit, while Christ himself was here upon earth, as there was when he was gone. Though the Holy Ghost was not yet given, yet he was promised. Though the gifts of Christ's grace are long deferred, while we are waiting for the good promise, we have the promise to live upon.

II. The consequents of this discourse. In general, it occasioned differences: There was a division among the people because of him, v. 43. There were diversities of opinions, and those managed with heat and contention; various sentiments, and those such as set them at variance. Think we that Christ came to send peace. No, the effect of the preaching of his gospel would be division, for, while some are gathered to it others will be gathered against it. This is no more the fault of the gospel than it is the fault of a wholesome medicine that it stirs up the peccant humours in the body, in order to the discharge of them.

1. Some were taken with him: Many of the people, when they heard this saying, could not but think highly of him. Some of them said, Of a truth this is the prophet, the harbinger and forerunner of the Messiah. Others went further, and said, This is the Christ (v. 41), the Messiah himself. We do not find that these people became his disciples and followers; a good opinion of Christ is far short of a lively faith in Christ; many give Christ a good word that give him no more.

2. Others were prejudiced against him. No sooner was this great truth started, that Jesus is the Christ, than immediately it was contradicted and argued against. That his rise and origin were (as they took it for granted) out of Galilee, was thought enough to answer all the arguments for his being the Christ. For, shall Christ come out of Galilee? Has not the scripture said that Christ comes of the seed of David? See here, (1) A laudable knowledge of the scripture. This even the common people knew by the traditional expositions which their scribes gave them. Many that espouse some corrupt notions, seem to be very ready in the scriptures, when indeed they know little more than those scriptures which they have been taught to pervert. (2) A culpable ignorance of our Lord Jesus. They speak of it as certain and past dispute that Jesus was of Galilee, whereas by enquiring they might have known that he was the Son of David, and a native of Bethlehem.

3. Others were enraged against him, and they would have taken him, v. 44. Though what he said was most sweet and gracious, yet they were exasperated against him for it. They would have taken him; but no man laid hands on him, because his hour was not come. As the malice of Christ's enemies is always unreasonable, so sometimes the suspension of it is unaccountable.

Verses 45–53

The chief priests and Pharisees are here contriving how to suppress Christ; though this was the great day of the feast, they attended not the religious services of the day. They sat in the council-chamber, expecting Christ to be brought a prisoner to them, as they had issued out warrants for apprehending him, v. 32.

I. What passed between them and their own officers, who returned without him.

1. The reproof they gave the officers for not executing the warrant they gave them: Why have you not brought him? It vexed them that those who were their own creatures should thus disappoint them.

2. The reason which the officers gave: Never man spoke like this man, v. 46. This was a very great truth, that never any man spoke with that wisdom, and power, and grace, that convincing clearness, and that charming sweetness, wherewith Christ spoke. The very officers that were sent to take him were taken with him, and acknowledged this. They could not but prefer him before all those that sat in Moses's seat. Thus Christ was preserved by the power God has upon the consciences even of bad men. They said this to their lords and masters, who could not endure to hear anything that tended to the honour of Christ; and yet could not avoid hearing this. Their own officers, who could not be suspected to be biassed in favour of Christ, are witnesses against them.

3. The Pharisees endeavour to secure their officers to their interest, and to beget in them prejudices against Christ. They suggest two things: (1) That if they embrace the gospel of Christ they will deceive themselves (v. 47): Are you also deceived? Christianity has, from its first rise, been represented to the world as a great cheat upon it, and they that embraced it as men deceived, then when they began to be undeceived, observe what a compliment the Pharisees paid to these officers: "Are you also deceived? What! men of your sense?" They endeavour to prejudice them against

40-43. Many . . . when they heard this . . . said, Of a truth . . .—The only wonder is they did not all say it. "But their minds were blinded." Others, This is the Christ—(See on ch. 1:21). Shall Christ come out of Galilee . . . scripture said . . . of the seed of David and out of . . . Bethlehem . . .—We accept this spontaneous testimony to our David-descended, Bethlehemborn Saviour. Had those who gave it made the inquiry which the case demanded, they would have found that Jesus "came out of Galilee" and "out of Bethlehem" both, alike in fulfilment of prophecy as in point of fact. (Matt. 2:23; 4:13-16.)

44-49. would have taken him, but . . .—(See on vs. 30). 45. Then came the officers—"sent to take him" (vs. 32). Why . . . not brought him?—already thirsting for their Victim, and thinking it an easy matter to seize and bring Him. 46. Never man spake like this man—Noble testimony of unsophisticated men! Doubtless they were strangers to the profound intent of Christ's teaching, but there was that in it which by its mysterious grandeur and transparent purity and grace, held them spellbound. No doubt it was of God that they should so feel, that their arm might be paralyzed, as Christ's hour was not yet come; but even in human teaching there has sometimes been felt such a divine power, that men who came to kill them (e.g., ROWLAND HISS) have confessed to all that they were unmanned.

47. ye also deceived—In their own servants this seemed intolerable.

43. There was a division. A "schism"; they were divided in sentiment and separated into parties.

40. Of a truth this is the Prophet. The great prophet or "teacher" spoken of by Moses, Deut. xviii. 15, which they improperly distinguished from the Messiah, v. 41.

41. Shall Christ come out of Galilee? As the prophets had declared that the Messiah was to come from the tribe of Judah and from the family of David, and should be born in the city of Bethlehem, these Jews, imagining that Christ had been born in Galilee, concluded that He could not be the Messiah.

42. Where David was? That is, where he was born, 1 Sam. xvi. 1, 4, and where he was before he became king in Israel.

44. Would have taken him. Or "they wished to seize Him." And this they would have done, and destroyed Him too at that time, had they been unanimous; but their being divided in opinion, v. 43, was the cause, under God, why His life was at that time preserved. How true are the words of the prophet: "The wrath of man shall praise thee: the remainder of wrath shalt thou restrain," Ps. lxxvi. 10!

45. Then came the officers. They had followed Him for several days, seeking for a proper opportunity to seize on Him, when they might fix some charge of sedition upon Him; but the more they listened, the more they were convinced of His innocence, purity, and consummate wisdom.

46. Never man spake like this man. Though these officers had gone on the errand of their masters, they had not entered into their spirit. They were sent to apprehend a seditious man and a false prophet. They came where Jesus taught; they found Him to be a different Person to the description they received from their masters, and therefore did not attempt to touch or molest Him. No doubt they expected when they told their employers the truth that they would have commended them and acknowledged their own mistake, but these simple people were not in the secret of their masters' malice.

MATTHEW HENRY

Christ by persuading them to think well of themselves. (2) That they will disparage themselves. Most men, even in their religion, are willing to be governed by the example of those of the first rank; these officers therefore, are desired to consider,

(1) That, if they become disciples of Christ, they go contrary to those who were persons of quality and reputation: "Have any of the rulers, or of the Pharisees, believed on him?" Some of the rulers did embrace Christ and more believed in him, but wanted courage to confess him (ch. xii. 42); but, when the interest of Christ runs low in the world, it is common for its adversaries to represent it as lower than really it is. The cause of Christ has seldom had rulers and Pharisees on its side. Self-denial and the cross are hard lessons to rulers and Pharisees. This has confirmed many in their prejudices against Christ, that the rulers and Pharisees have been no friends. If rulers and Pharisees do not believe in Christ, they that do believe in him will be the most singular, unfashionable, ungenteel people in the world. Thus are people foolishly willing to be damned for fashion-sake.

(2) That they will link themselves with the despicable vulgar sort of people (v. 43): But this people, who know not the law, are cursed. First, How scornfully and disdainfully they speak of them: This people. As the wisdom of God has often chosen base things, and things which are despised, so the folly of men has commonly debased and despised those whom God has chosen. Secondly, How unjustly they reproach them: They know not the law. Perhaps many of those whom they thus despised knew the law, and the prophets too, better than they did. Many a plain, honest, unlearned disciple of Christ attains to a more clear, sound, and useful knowledge of the word of God, than some great scholars with all their wit and learning. Whose fault was it but theirs, who should have taught them better? Thirdly, How magisterially they pronounce sentence upon them: they are cursed. We are unable to try, and therefore unfit to condemn, and our rule is, Bless, and curse not. They use this odious word, they are cursed, to express their own indignation, and to frighten their officers from having anything to do with them.

II. What passed between them and Nicodemus, v. 50, &c.

1. The just and rational objection which Nicodemus made against their proceedings.

(1) Who it was that appeared against them; it was Nicodemus, he that came to Jesus by night, being one of them, v. 50. Though he had been with Jesus, and taken him for his teacher, yet he retained his place in the council, and his vote among them. Some impute this to his weakness and cowardice. It seems rather to have been his wisdom not immediately to throw up his place, because there he might have opportunity of serving Christ, and stemming the tide of the Jewish rage. God has his remnant among all sorts, and many times finds, or puts, or makes, some good in the worst places and societies. Though at first he came to Jesus by night, for fear of being known; yet, when there was occasion, he boldly appeared in defence of Christ, and opposed the whole council. Thus many believers who at first were timorous have at length, by divine grace, grown courageous. Let none justify the disguising of their faith by the example of Nicodemus, unless, like him, they be ready openly to appear in the cause of Christ, though they stand alone in it; for so Nicodemus did here, and ch. xix. 39.

(2) What he alleged against their proceedings (v. 51): Doth our law judge any man before it hear him and know what he doeth? He prudently argues from the principles of their own law, and an incontestable rule of justice, that no man is to be condemned unheard. Whereas they had reproached the people, as ignorant of the law, he here tacitly retorts the charge upon themselves. The law is here said to judge, and hear, and know. It is highly fit that none should come under the sentence of the law, till they have first undergone the scrutiny of it. Judges have two ears, to remind them to hear both sides. Persons are to be judged, not by what is said of them, but by what they do. Facts, and not faces, must be known in judgment; and the scale of justice must be used before the sword of justice.

2. What was said to this objection. Here is no direct reply given to it. What was lacking in reason they made up in railing and reproach. Whoever are against reason give cause to suspect that reason is against them. See how they taunt him: Art thou also of Galilee? (v. 52).

(1) How false the grounds of their arguing were. They suppose that Christ was of Galilee, and this was false. They suppose that because most of his disciples were Galileans they were all such. They

48. any of the rulers or . . . Pharisees believed—"Many of them" did, including Nicodemus and Joseph, but not one of these had openly "confessed Him" (ch. 12:42), and this appeal must have stung such of them as heard it to the quick.

49. But this people—lit., "multitude," meaning the ignorant rabble. It is a pity that these important distinctions, so marked in the orginal of this Gospel, should not be also in our version.)

are cursed—a cursed set (a kind of swearing at them, out of mingled rage and scorn).

50-53. Nicodemus—reappearing to us after nearly three years' absence from the history, as a member of the council, probably then sitting.

51. Doth our law . . .—a very proper, but all too tame rejoinder, and evidently more from pressure of conscience than any design to pronounce positively in the case. "The feebleness of his defense of Jesus has a strong contrast in the flerceness of the rejoinders of the Pharisees" [WEBSTER and WILKINSON].

52. thou of Galilee—in this taunt expressing their scorn of the party. Even a word of caution, or the gentlest proposal to inquire before condemning, was with them equivalent to an espousal of the hated One. Search . . . out of Galilee . . . no prophet—Strange! For had not Jonah (of 48. Have any of the rulers . . . believed on him? Very few. But is this a proof that He is not of God? No, truly. If He were of the world, the world would love its own. The religion of Christ has been in general rejected by the rulers of this world.

49. This people. "This rabble." The common people were treated by the Pharisees with the most sovereign contempt. They were termed am ha-arets, "people of the earth," and were not thought worthy to have a resurrection to eternal life.

50. Nicodemus . . . being one of them. That is, a Pharisee, and a ruler of the Jews; see on chap. iii. 1.

51. Doth our law judge any man? "The man," i.e., who is accused. Perhaps Nicodemus did not refer so much to anything in the law of Moses as to what was commonly practiced among them. Josephus says, Ant., b. xiv, c. 9, s. 3, "That the law has forbidden any man to be put to death, though wicked, unless he be first condemned to die by the Sanhedrin." It was probably to this law that Nicodemus here allŭdes. See laws relative to this point in Deut. xvii. 8, etc.; xix. 15.

52. Art thou also of Galilee? They knew very well that he was not, but they spoke this by way of reproach. As if they had said, You are no better than He is, as you take His part. Search, and look. Examine the Scriptures, search the public registers, and you will see that out of Galilee there arises no prophet. This conclusion, says Calmet, was false, because Jonah was of Gath-hepher, in Galilee; see 2 Kings xiv. 25, compared with Josh. xix. 13. The Prophet Nahum was also a Galilean, for he was of the tribe of Simeon.

53. And every man went. The authority and influence of Nicodemus, in this case, was so great that the Sanhedrin broke up without being able suppose that out of Galilee no prophet had risen, yet this was false too.

(2) How absurd their arguings were upon these grounds. Is any man of worth and virtue ever the worse for the poverty and obscurity of his country? Supposing no prophet had risen out of Galilee, yet it is not impossible that any should arise thence.

3. The hasty adjournment of the court hereupon. They broke up the assembly in confusion, and with precipitation, and every man went to his own house. All the policy of the close cabal was broken to pieces with one plain honest word. They were not willing to hear Nicodemus, because they could not answer him.

I. His retirement in the evening out of the town (v. 1): He went unto the mount of olives. He went out of Jerusalem, perhaps because he had no friend there that had either kindness or courage enough to give him a night's lodging; while his persecutors had houses of their own to go to (ch. vii. 53). In the daytime, when he had work to do in the temple, he willingly exposed himself. But in the night, he withdrew into the country, and sheltered himself there.

II. His return in the morning to the temple, and to his work there, v. 2.

1. What a diligent preacher Christ was: Early in the morning he came again, and taught. Three things were taken notice of here concerning Christ's preaching. (1) The time: Early in the morning. When a day's work is to be done for God and souls it is good to take the day before us. (2) The place: In the temple; not so much because it was a consecrated place as because it was not a place of concourse. (3) His posture: He sat down, and taught, as one having authority.

2. How diligently his preaching was attended upon: All the people came unto him. Though the rulers were displeased at those that came to hear him, yet they would come; and he taught them, though they were angry at him too.

III. His dealing with those that brought to him the woman taken in adultery, tempting him.

1. The case proposed to him by the scribes and Pharisees, who herein contrived to pick a quarrel with him, v. 3–6.

(1) They set the prisoner to the bar (v. 3): they brought him a woman taken in adultery. Those that were taken in adultery were by the Jewish law to be put to death. The scribes and Pharisees bring her to Christ, and set her in the midst of the assembly, as if they would leave her wholly to the judgment of Christ.

(2) They prefer an indictment against her: Master, this woman was taken in adultery, v. 4. Here they call him Master whom but the day before they had called a deceiver. The crime for which the prisoner stands indicted is no less than adultery. The Pharisees seemed to have a great zeal against the sin, when it appeared afterwards that they themselves were not free from it. It is common for those that are indulgent to their own sin to be severe against the sins of others. The proof of the crime, an incontestable proof; she was taken in the act. Sometimes it proves a mercy to sinners to have their sin brought to light. Better our sin should shame us than damn us.

(3) They produce the statute in this case upon which she was indicted, v. 5. Moses in the law commanded that such should be stoned. Adultery is an exceedingly sinful sin. It is the violation of a divine institution in innocency, by the indulgence of one of the basest lusts of man in his degeneracy.

(4) They pray his judgment in the case: "But what sayest thou, who pretendest to be a teacher come from God to repeal old laws and enact new ones?" If they had asked this question in sincerity, it had been very commendable. But this they said tempting him, that they might have to accuse him, v. 6. If he should confirm the sentence of the law, they would censure him as inconsistent with himself (he having received publicans and harlots) and with the character of the Messiah, who should be meek, and have salvation. If he should acquit her they would represent him, First, As an enemy to the law of Moses. Secondly, As a friend to sinners and, consequently a favourer of sin; than which no reflection could be more invidious upon one that professed the strictness, purity, and business of a prophet.

2. The method he took to resolve this case, and so to break this snare.

(1) He seemed to slight it, and turned a deaf ear to it: He stooped down, and wrote on the ground.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

Gathhepher) and even Elijah (of Thisbe) arisen out of Galilee? And there it may be more, of whom we have no record. But rage is blind, and deep prejudice distorts all facts. Yet it looks as if they were afraid of losing Nicodemus, when they take the trouble to reason the point at all. It was just because he had "searched," as they advised him, that he went the length even that he did. 53. every man went unto his own home—finding their plot could not at that time be carried into effect. Is your rage thus impotent, ye chief priests?

CHAPTER 8

VSS. 1-11. THE WOMAN TAKEN IN ADULTERY. 1, 2. Jesus went unto the Mount of Olives—This should have formed the last verse of the foregoing chapter. "The return of the people to the inert quiet and security of their dwellings (ch. 7:53), at the close of the feast, is designedly contrasted with our Lord's homeless way, so to speak, of spending the short night, who is early in the morning on the scene again. One cannot well see why what is recorded in Luke 21:37, 38 may not even thus early have taken place; it might have been the Lord's ordinary custom from the beginning to leave the brilliant misery of the city every night, that so He might compose His sorrowful and interceding heart, and collect His energies for new labors of love; preferring for His resting-place Bethany, and the Mount of Olives, the scene thus consecrated by many preparatory prayers for His final humiliation and exaltation" [STIER].

3-6. scribes and Pharisees—foiled in their yesterday's attempt, and hoping to succeed better in this. 4. woman . . . in adultery . . .

5. Moses . . . commanded . . . should be stoned—simply put to death (Deut. 22:22), but in aggravated cases, at least in later times, this was probably by stoning (Ezek. 16:40). but what sayest thou—hoping, whatever He might answer, to put Him in the wrong:—if He said, Stone her, that would seem a stepping out of His province; if He forbade it, that would hold Him up as a relaxer of the public morals. But these cunning hypocrites were overmatched.

6. stooped down—It will be observed He was sitting when they came to Him.

to conclude anything. As the feast was now ended, they were not obliged to continue any longer in or about Jerusalem, and therefore all returned to their respective dwellings. This verse and the first eleven verses of the following chapter are wanting in several MSS. Some of those which retain the paragraph mark it with obelisks, as a proof of spuriousness. Those which do retain it have it with such a variety of reading as is nowhere else found in the sacred writings. Professor Griesbach leaves the whole paragraph in the text with notes of doubtfulness. Most of the modern critics consider it as resting on no solid authority.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

When on the previous day He had made His great call, "If any man thirst," He had stood, which marked a distinct difference in His attitude for the moment. He stood as a herald. Now He went back and resumed the attitude of the teacher: He sat down. When He stood and uttered that call, He was not teaching, but making a proclamation. Now, going back, He again assumed the position of the teacher. The crowds gathered round Him. As they listened to Him, there was a stir, a movement in the crowd, and there came into the midst certain scribes and Pharisees, bringing a woman. It is impossible to read the story without realizing the brutal indelicacy of their action. Whatever this woman had done, and however guilty she was, legally they had no right to drag her into the public gaze. The Sanhedrin had its sittings in the very next part of the Temple to where Jesus was teaching. Probably they intended to take her there presently; but they had no right to drag her into publicity.

—The Gospel According to John

3. A woman taken in adultery. It is allowed that adultery was exceedingly common at this time, so common that they had ceased to put the law in force against it. The waters of jealousy were no longer drunk, the culprits, or those suspected of this crime, being so very numerous; and the men who were guilty themselves dared not try their suspected wives, as it was believed the waters would have no evil effect upon the wife if the husband himself had been criminal. See the whole of the process on the waters of jealousy in the notes on Num. v. 14.

5. That such should be stoned. It is not strictly true that Moses ordered adultery in general to be punished by stoning. The law simply says that the adulterer and the adulteress shall be "put to death," Lev. xx. 10; Deut. xxii. 22. The rabbins say they were strangled. This they affirm was the ordinary mode of punishment where the species of death was not marked in the law. If the person guilty of an act of this kind had been betrothed, but not married, she was to be stoned, Deut. xxii. 23. But if she was the daughter of a priest, she was to be burned alive, Lev. xxi. 9. It appears from Ezek. xvi. 38, 40 that adulteresses in the time of that prophet were stoned and pierced with a sword.

6. That they might have to accuse him. Had our Lord condemned the woman to death, they might have accused Him to Pilate, as arrogating to himself the power of life and death, which the Romans had taken away from the Jews. Besides, the Roman laws did not condemn an adulteress to be put to death. On the other hand, if He had said she should not be put to death, they might have represented Him to the people as One who decided contrary to the law and favored the crime of which the woman was accused. With his finger wrote. Several MSS.

MATTHEW HENRY

It is impossible to tell, and therefore needless to ask, what he wrote; but this is the only mention made in the gospels of Christ's writing. Christ by this teaches us to be slow to speak when difficult cases are proposed to us, not quickly to shoot our bolt. Think twice before we speak once. But, when Christ seemed as though he heard them not, he made it appear that he not only heard their words, but knew their thoughts.

(2) He turned the conviction of the prisoner upon the prosecutors, v. 7.

[1] They continued asking him, and his seeming not to take notice of them made them the more vehement; for now they thought sure enough that they had run him aground. Therefore they pushed on their appeal to him with vigour; whereas they should have construed his disregard of them as a check to their design, and an intimation to them to desist.

[2] At last he put them all to shame and silence with one word: He lifted up himself and said unto them, He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her. He neither reflected upon the law nor excused the prisoner's guilt, nor did he on the other hand encourage the prosecution or countenance their heat. When we cannot make our point by steering a direct course, it is good to fetch a compass. They came with design to accuse him, but they were forced to accuse themselves. He here refers to that rule which the law of Moses prescribed in the execution of criminals, that the hand of the witnesses must be first upon them (Deut. xvii. 7), as in the stoning of Stephen, Acts vii. 58. Christ puts it to them whether, according to their own law, they would dare to be the executioners. Durst they take away that life with their hands which they were now taking away with their tongues? He builds upon an uncontested maxim in morality. They are not better than self-condemned who judge others, and yet themselves do the same thing: "If there be any of you who is without sin, let him cast the first stone at her." Whenever we find fault with others, we ought to reflect upon ourselves, and to be more severe against sin in ourselves than in others. We ought to be favourable, though not to the sins, yet to the persons, of those that offend, considering ourselves and our own corrupt nature. Let this restrain us from throwing stones at our brethren. Those that are any way obliged to animadvert upon the faults of others are concerned to look well to themselves, and keep themselves pure. If you are without sin, stand to the charge, and let the adulteress be executed; but, if not, though she be guilty, while you that present her are equally so, according to your own rule she shall be free. He aimed to bring, not only the prisoner to repentance, by showing her his mercy, but the prosecutors too, by showing them their sins. They sought to ensnare him; he sought to convince and convert them.

[3] Having given them this startling word, he left them to consider of it, and again stooped down, and wrote on the ground, v. 8. The matter was lodged in their own breasts, let them make the best of it there. Some Greek copies here read, He wrote on the ground, the sins of everyone of them. But he does not write men's sins in the sand; no, they are written as with a pen of iron (Jer. xvii. 1), never to be forgotten till they are forgiven.

[4] The scribes and Pharisees were so strangely thunderstruck with the words of Christ that they let fall their persecution of Christ, whom they durst no further tempt, and their prosecution of the woman, whom they durst no longer accuse (v. 9): They went out one by one. Perhaps his writing on the ground frightened them, as the handwriting on the wall frightened Belshazzar. Happy they who have no reason to be afraid of Christ's writing! What he said frightened them by sending them to their own consciences; he had shown them to themselves, and they were afraid his next word would show them to the world. They went out one by one, that they might go out softly; they went away by stealth, as people being ashamed. The order of their departure is taken notice of, beginning at the eldest. If the eldest quit the field, and retreat ingloriously, no marvel if the younger follow them. 1. The force of the word of Christ for the conviction of sinners: They who heard it were convicted by their own consciences. Conscience is God's deputy in the soul, and one word from him will set it on work, Heb. iv. 12. Even scribes and Pharisees are by the power of Christ's word made to retire with shame. 2. The folly of sinners under these convictions. It is folly for those that are under convictions to make it their principal care to avoid shame. Our care should be more to save our souls than to save our credit. The scribes and Pharisees had the wound opened, and now they should have been desirous to have it searched, and then it might have with his finger wrote on the ground—The words of our translators in italics ("as though He heard them not") have hardly improved the sense, for it is scarcely probable He could wish that to be thought. Rather He wished to show them His aversion to enter on the subject. But as this did not suit them, they "continue asking Him," pressing for an answer. At last, raising Himself He said.

7. He that is without sin—not meaning sinless altogether; nor yet, guiltless of a literal breach of the Seventh Commandment; but probably, he whose conscience acquits him of any such sin. cast a stone—"the stone," meaning the first one (Deut. 17:7).

8. again he stooped down and wrote—The design of this second stooping and writing on the ground was evidently to give her accusers an opportunity to slink away unobserved by Him, and so avoid an exposure to His eye which they could ill have stood. Accordingly it is added.

add their sins who accused her, and the sins of all men. There are many idle conjectures concerning what our Lord wrote on the ground. We never find that Christ wrote anything before or after this, and what He wrote at this time we know not.

7. He that is without sin. Meaning the same kind of sin, adultery, fornication. Let him first cast a stone at her. Or "upon her." The Jewish method of stoning, according to the rabbins, was as follows: The culprit, half naked, the hands tied behind the back, was placed on a scaffold, ten or twelve feet high. The witnesses, who stood with her, pushed her off with great force. If she was killed by the fall, there was nothing further done; but if she was not, one of the witnesses took up a very large stone, and dashed it upon her breast, which generally was the coup de grace, or finishing stroke.

A. B. SIMPSON:

Here was a case of flagrant sin for which no excuse was offered, and all the hostile use His enemies would make of any necessities of the situation, especially the leniency on His part toward her, seemed to demand that He should act with righteous severity, at least according to the strict letter of the law. By a stroke of infinite wisdom He silences her accusers in a moment, and sends them from the room, more confounded than she, under the conviction of their own consciences; and then, by an act of sovereign grace, He forgives her sin without condoning or excusing it in the least degree, and dismisses her with the tender, solemn charge, "Neither do I condemn thee, go and sin no more."

One beautiful act of His delicate grace shines preeminent in all this incident. It was the refusal to look in the face of this poor woman while her accusers were present. Stooping down, He busied himself writing on the ground, and seeming to pay no attention to their bitter charges. This is the beautiful attitude which He still occupies in regard to His people's sins and the devil's charges against them. He listens as though He heard them not. "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect?" But although He forgives, He forgives with a purity as beautiful as His grace is blessed, and speaks to her heart the solemn charge, which the truly forgiven never can forget, "Go and sin no more."

—Christ in the Bible

9. Being convicted by their own conscience. So it is likely they were all guilty of similar crimes. Their own is not in the original, and is needless; being convicted by conscience is expressive enough. Beginning at the eldest, even unto the last. "From the most honorable to those of the least repute." In this sense the words are undoubtedly to be understood.

MATTHEW HENRY

been healed. It is folly for those that are under convictions to get away from Jesus Christ, for he is the only one that can heal the wounds of conscience. To whom will they go?

[5] When the self-conceited prosecutors quitted the field, the self-condemned prisoner stood her ground: Jesus was left alone and the woman standing in the midst, where they set her, v. 3. She did not seek to make her escape. Her prosecutors had appealed unto Jesus, and to him she would go. Those whose cause is brought before our Lord Jesus will never have occasion to remove it into any other court. Our cause is lodged in the gospel court; we are left with Jesus alone, it is with him only that we have now to deal. Let his gospel rule us, and it will infallibly save us.

[6] Here is the conclusion of the trial: Jesus lifted up himself, and he saw none but the woman, v. 10, 11. The woman, it is likely, stood trembling at the bar, as one doubtful of the issue. Christ was without sin, and might cast the first stone; but though none more severe than he against sin, none more compassionate than he to sinners, for he is infinitely gracious and merciful, and this poor malefactor finds him so. The prosecutors are called: Where are those thine accusers? Hath no man condemned thee? He asked, that he might shame them, who declined his judgment, and encourage her who resolved to abide by it. They do not appear when the question is asked: Hath no man condemned thee? She said, No man, Lord. She speaks respectfully to Christ, calls him Lord, but is silent concerning her prosecutors. She does not triumph in their retreat nor insult over them as witnesses against themselves, not against her. But she answered the question which concerned herself. Has no man condemned thee? True penitents find it enough to give an account of themselves to God, and will not undertake to give account of other people. The prisoner is therefore discharged: Neither do I condemn thee; go, and sin no more. 1. Her discharge from the temporal punishment: "If they do not condemn thee to be stoned to death, neither do I." Christ would not condemn this woman, (a) Because it was none of his business; would not intermeddle in secular affairs. (b) Because she was prosecuted by those that were more guilty than she and could not for shame insist upon their demand of justice against her. When Christ dismissed her, it was with this caution, Go, and sin no more. The fairer the escape was, the fairer the warning was to go and sin no more. Those who help to save the life of a criminal should, as Christ here, help to save the soul with this caution. 2. Her discharge from the eternal punishment. For Christ to say, I do not condemn thee is, in effect, to say, I do forgive thee; and the Son of man had power on earth to forgive sins. He knew the tenderness and sincere repentance of the prisoner, and therefore said that which would comfort her. Those are truly happy whom Christ doth not condemn. Christ will not condemn those who, though they have sinned, will go and sin no more. Christ's favour to us in the remission of the sins that are past should be a prevailing argument with us to go and sin no more.

The rest of the chapter is taken up with debates between Christ and contradicting sinners. There were other Pharisees (v. 13) to confront Christ, who had brass enough in their foreheads to keep them in countenance.

I. A great doctrine laid down, with the application of it.

1. The doctrine is, That Christ is the light of the world (v. 12): Then spoke Jesus again unto them. They had turned a deaf ear to what he said, and yet he spoke again to them, saying, I am the light of the world. He was expected to be a light to enlighten the Gentiles (Luke ii. 32), and so the light of the world. The visible light of the world is the sun. One sun enlightens the whole world, so does one Christ, and there needs no more. What a dungeon would the world be without the sun. So would it be without Christ by whom light came into the world. 2. The inference from this doctrine is, He that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life. It is our duty to follow him. Christ is the true light. It is not enough to look at this light, and to gaze upon it, but we must follow it, believe in it, and walk in it, for it is a light to our feet, not our eyes only. It is the happiness of those who follow Christ that they shall not walk in darkness. They shall have the light of life, the light of spiritual life in this world and of everlasting life in the other world. Follow Christ, and we shall follow him to heaven.

II. The objection which the Pharisees made against this doctrine: Thou bearest record of thyself; thy record is not true, v. 13. The objection was very

9. they . . . convicted . . . went out one by one . . . Jesus was left alone—i.e., without one of her accusers remaining; for it is added—the woman in the midst—i.e., of the remaining audience. While the trap failed to catch Him for whom it was laid, it caught those who laid it. Stunned by the unexpected home-thrust, they immediately made off—which makes the impudence of those impure hypocrites in dragging such a case before the public eye the more disgusting.

10. Woman . . .—What inimitable tenderness and grace! Conscious of her own guilt, and till now in the hands of men who had talked of stoning her, wondering at the skill with which her accusers had been dispersed, and the grace of the few words addressed to herself, she would be disposed to listen, with a reverence and teachableness before unknown, to our Lord's admonition. "And Jesus said unto her, Neither do I condemn thee, go and sin no more." He pronounces no pardon upon the woman (such as, "Thy sins are forgiven thee"—"Go in peace"), much less does He say that she had done nothing condemnable; He simply leaves the matter where it was. He meddles not with the magistrate's office, nor acts the Judge in any sense (ch. 12:47). But in saying, "Go and sin no more," which had been before said to one who undoubtedly believed (ch. 5:14), more is probably implied than expressed. If brought suddenly to conviction of sin, admiration of her Deliverer, and a willingness to be admonished and guided by Him, this call to begin a new life may have carried with it what would ensure and naturally bring about a permanent change. (This whole narrative is wanting in some of the earliest and most valuable MSS., and those which have it vary to some extent. The internal evidence in its favor is almost overpowering. It is easy to account for its omission, though genuine; but if not so, it is next to impossible to account for its insertion).

12-59. FURTHER DISCOURSES OF JESUS—ATTEMPT TO STONE HIM. 12. I am the light of the world—As the former references to water (chs. 4 and 7) and to bread (ch. 6) were occasioned by outward occurrences, so this one to light. In "the treasury" where it was spoken (see on vs. 20) stood two colossal golden lamp-stands, on which hung a multitude of lamps, lighted after the evening sacrifice (probably every evening during the feast of tabernacles), diffusing their brilliancy, it is said, over all the city. Around these the people danced with great rejoicing. Now, as amidst the festivities of the water from Siloam Jesus cried, saying, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink," so now amidst the blaze and the joyousness of this illumination, He proclaims, "I AM THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD"—plainly in the most absolute sense. For though He gives His disciples the same title, they are only "light in the Lord" (Eph. 5:8); and though He calls the Baptist "the burning and shining light" (or "lamp" of his day, ch. 5:35), yet "he was not that Light, but was sent to bear witness of that Light: that was THE TRUE LIGHT which, coming into the world, lighteth every man" (ch. 1:8, 9). Under this magnificent title Messiah was promised of old (Isa. 42:6; Mal. 4:2, etc.). he that followeth me—as one does a light going before him, and as the Israelites did the pillar of bright cloud in the wilderness. but shall have the light of life—the light, as of a new world, a newly awakened spiritual and eternal life. 13-19. bearest record of thyself; thy record is not true—How does He meet this

The woman standing in the midst. But if they all went out, how could she be in the midst? It is not said that all the people whom our Lord had been instructing went out, but only her accusers; see v. 2. The rest undoubtedly continued with their Teacher.

11. Neither do I condemn thee. After weighing what has been adduced in favor of its authenticity and seriously considering its state in the MSS., I must confess the evidence in its favor does not appear to me to be striking. Yet I by no means would have it expunged from the text. It may however be necessary to observe that a very perfect connection subsists between v. 52 of chap. vii and v. 12 of this chapter—all the intermediate verses having been omitted by MSS. of the first antiquity and authority. In some MSS. it is found at the end of this Gospel; in others a vacant place is left in this chapter; and in others it is placed after the twenty-first chapter of Luke.

12. Then spake Jesus again unto them. Allowing the story about the woman taken in adultery to be authentic and to stand here in its proper place, we may consider that our Lord, having begun to teach the people in the Temple, was interrupted by the introduction of this woman by the scribes and Pharisees; and now, having dismissed them and the woman also, He resumes His discourse. I am the light of the world. The Fountain whence all intellectual light and spiritual understanding proceed; without Me all is darkness, misery, and death. The Divine Being was by the rabbins denominated The light of the world. So in Bamidbar Rabbi: "The Israelites said to God, O Lord of the universe, thou commandest us to light lamps to thee, yet thou art the light of the world: and with thee the light dwelleth." Our Lord, therefore, assumes here a well-known character of the Supreme Being, and with this we find the Jews were greatly offended. Shall not walk in darkness. He shall be saved from ignorance, infidelity, and sin. He shall have the light of life—such a light as brings and supports life. The sun, the fountain of light, is also the fountain of life; by its vivifying influences, all things live—neither animal nor vegetative life could exist were it not for its influence. Jesus, the Sun of Righteousness, Mal. iv. 2, is the Fountain of all spiritual and eternal life. His light brings life with it, and they who walk in unjust, for they made that his crime which in the case of one who introduced a divine revelation was necessary and unavoidable. Did not Moses and all the prophets bear witness of themselves when they avouched themselves to be God's messengers? Futhermore they overlooked the testimony of all the other witnesses. Had he only borne record of himself, his testimony had indeed been suspicious, and the belief of it might have been suspended.

III. Christ's reply to this objection, v. 14. He is the light of the world, and it is the property of light to be self-evidencing. First principles prove themselves. He urges three things to prove that his testimony, though of himself, was true and cogent.

1. That he was conscious to himself of his own authority. He did not speak as one at uncertainty. I know whence I came, and whither I go. He knew that he came from the Father, and was going to him, came from glory, and was going to glory.

2. That they are very incompetent judges of him. Because they were ignorant: You cannot tell whence I came, and whither I go. He had told them of his coming from heaven and returning to heaven, but it was foolishness to them, they received it not. They took upon them to judge of that which they did not understand. Because they were partial (v. 15): You judge after the flesh. The judgment cannot be right when the rule is wrong. The Jews judged of Christ and his gospel by outward appearances, and thought it impossible he should be the light of the world; as if the sun under a cloud were no sun. Because they were unjust and unfair towards him, intimated in this "I judge no man; I neither make nor meddle with your political affairs." He thus judged no man. It was very unreasonable for them to judge him after the flesh.

3. That his testimony of himself was sufficiently supported and corroborated by the testimony of his Father with him and for him (v. 16): And yet, if I judge, my judgment is true. Consider him then,

(1) As a judge: "If I judge, my judgment is true. If I should judge, my judgment must be true, and then you would be condemned." Now that which makes his judgment unexceptionable is his Father's concurrence with him: I am not alone, but I and the Father. He did not act separately, but in his own name and his Father's. His Father's commission was to him: "It is the Father that sent me." No doubt his judgment was true and valid.

(2) Look upon him as a witness. As such his testimony was true and unexceptionable; this he shows, v. 17, 18. He quotes a maxim of the Jewish law, v. 17: That the testimony of two men is true. If nothing appear to the contrary it is taken for granted to be true. He applies this to the case in hand (v. 18): I am one that bear witness of myself, and the Father that sent me bears witness of me. Behold two witnesses! Now if the testimony of two distinct persons, that are men, and therefore may deceive or be deceived, is conclusive, much more ought the testimony of the Son of God concerning himself, backed with the testimony of his Father concerning him, to command assent. In conclusion, we are told how their tongues were let loose, and their hands tied.

First, How their tongues were let loose, v. 19. They set themselves to cross question with him.

a. How they evaded the conviction. Then said they unto him, Where is thy Father? They might easily have understood that when he spoke of his Father he meant no other than God himself; yet they pretend to understand him of a common person. They bid him call his witness, and challenge him, if he can, to produce him: Where is thy Father? Thus, as Christ said of them (v. 15), they judge after the flesh. Thus they turned it off with a taunt.

b. How he evaded the cavil with a further conviction; he charged them with wilful ignorance: "You neither know me nor my Father. It is to no purpose to discourse to you about divine things, who talk of them as blind men do of colours." He charges them with ignorance of God: "You know not my Father." Their eyes were darkened that they could not see the light of his glory shining in the face of Jesus Christ. The little children of the Christian church know the Father, but these rulers of the Jews did not, because they would not so know him. He shows them the true cause of their ignorance of God: If you had known me, you would have known my Father also. The reason why men are ignorant of God is because they are unacquainted with Jesus Christ. In knowing him we should know the Father. If we knew Christ better, we should know the Father better.

Secondly, See how their hands were tied, though their tongues were thus let loose. These words spoke Jesus in the treasury. Now the priests might easily, with the assistance of the janizaries that were at their beck, either have seized him and exposed him to the rage of the mob, or, at least, have silenced him. Yet specious cavil? Not by disputing the wholesome human maxim that "self-praise is no praise," but by affirming that He was an exception to the rule, or rather, that it had no application to Him.

14. for I know whence I came, and whither I go . . .—(See on ch. 7:28, 29). 15. Ye judge after the flesh—with no spiritual apprehension. I judge no man.

16. And yet if I judge, my judgment is true . . .—Ye not only form your carnal and warped judgments of Me, but are bent on carrying them into effect; I, though I form and utter My judgment of you, am not here to carry this into execution—that is reserved to a future day; yet the judgment I now pronounce and the witness I now bear is not Mine only as ye suppose, but His also that sent Me. (See on ch. 5:31, 32.) And these are the two witnesses to any fact which your law requires.

20. These words spake Jesus in the treasury—a division, so called, of the fore-court of the temple, part of the court of the women [JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, xix. 6. 2, etc.), which may confirm the genuineness of vss. 2-11, as the place where the woman was brought.

His light live in His life. Some suppose our Lord alludes to the custom of lighting lamps or torches on the first day of the Feast of Tabernacles. But as these words seem to have been spoken the day after that last and great day of the feast, mentioned in chap. vii. 37, they may rather be considered as referring to the following custom. It has already been observed that the Jews added a ninth day to this feast, which day they termed "the feast of joy for the law"; and on that day they were accustomed to take all the sacred books out of the chest where they had been deposited, and put a lighted candle in their place, in allusion to Prov. vi. 23: "For the commandment is a lamp [or candle]; and the law is light"; or to Ps. cxix. 105: "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path." If this custom existed in the time of our Lord, it is most likely that it is to it He here alludes, as it must have happened about the same time in which these words were spoken. As the Messiah was frequently spoken of by the prophets under the emblem of light (see Isa. lx. 1; xlix. 6; ix. 2), the Pharisees must at once perceive that He intended to recommend himself to the people as the Messiah, when He said, I am the light of the world.

13. Thou bearest record. As if they had said, Dost Thou imagine that we shall believe Thee, in a matter so important, on Thy bare assertion? Had these people attended to the teaching and miracles of Christ, they would have seen that His pretensions to the Messiahship were supported by the most irrefragable testimony.

14. I know whence I came. I came from God, and am going to God, and can neither do nor say anything but what leads to and glorifies Him.

15. Ye judge after the flesh. Because I appear in the form of man, judging from this appearance, you think I am but a mere man—pay attention to My teaching and miracles, and you shall then see that nothing less than infinite wisdom and unlimited power could teach and do what I have taught and performed.

ALBERT BARNES:

18. "I am one that bear witness of myself." In human courts a man is not allowed to bear witness of himself, because he has a personal interest in the case, and the court could have no proof of the impartiality of the evidence; but in the case of Jesus it was otherwise. When one has no party ends to serve; when he is willing to deny himself; when he makes great sacrifices; and when, by his life, he gives every evidence of sincerity, his own testimony may be admitted in evidence of his motives and designs. This was the case with Jesus and his apostles. And though in a legal or criminal case such testimony would not be admitted, yet, in an argument on moral subjects, about the will and purpose of him who sent him, it would not be right to reject the testimony of one who gave so many proofs that he came from God.

"The Father—beareth witness of me." By the voice from heaven at his baptism (Matt. 3:17), and by the miracles which Jesus wrought, as well as by the prophecies of the Old Testament. We may here remark that there is a distinction between the Father and the Son. They are both represented as bearing testimony; yet, they are not divided. They are not different beings. They bear testimony to the same thing, and are one in counsel, in plan, in essence, and in glory.—Popular Commentary

19. Ye neither know me. You know neither the Messiah nor the God that sent Him. If ye had known me. If you had received My teaching, you would have got such an acquaintance with the nature and attributes of God as you never could have had and never can have any other way. That is a true saying, "No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him." The nature and perfections of God never can be properly known but in the light of the gospel of Jesus Christ.

20. The treasury. Lightfoot observes, from the rabbins, that the treasury was in what was called the "court of the women"—that there were thirteen chests in it; in the thirteenth only the women were permitted to put their offerings. Probably the other twelve were placed there in reference to the twelve tribes, each perhaps inscribed with the name of one of Jacob's twelve even in the temple, where they had him in their reach, no man laid hands on him, for his hour was not yet come. 1. The restraint laid upon his persecutors by an invisible power. God can set bounds to the wrath of men, as he does to the waves of the sea. 2. The reason of this restraint: His hour was not yet come. The frequent mention of this, intimates how much the time of our departure out of the world depends upon the fixed counsel and decree of God. It will come, it is coming; not yet come, but it is at hand. My times are in thy hands; and better there than in our own.

Verses 21–30

Christ here gives fair warning to the careless unbelieving Jews to consider what would be the consequence of their infidelity.

I. The wrath threatened (v. 21): Jesus said again unto them. He continued to teach, in kindness to those few who received his doctrine, which is an example to ministers to go on with their work, notwithstanding opposition, because a remnant shall be saved. Here Christ changes his voice; he had piped to them in the offers of his grace, and they had not danced; now he mourns to them in the denunciations of his wrath, to try if they would lament. He said I go my way, and you shall seek me, and shall die in your sins. Whither I go you cannot come. Every word is terrible, and bespeaks spiritual judgments, which are the sorest of all judgments. Four things are here threatened against the Jews.

1. Christ's departure from them: I go my way. But woe to those from whom Christ departs. He base often farewell, as one loth to depart, and willing to be invited.

2. Their enmity to the true Messiah, and their infatuated enquiries after another Messiah when he was gone away. You shall seek me, which intimates either, (1) Their enmity to the true Christ: "You shall seek to ruin my interest, by persecuting my doctrine and followers." Or, (2) Their enquiries after false Christs: "You shall continue your expectations of the Messiah, of a Christ to come, when he is already come."

3. Their final impenitency: You shall die in your sins. Here it is meant especially of the sin of unbelief. Those that live in unbelief are for ever undone if they die in unbelief. Many that have long lived in sin are, through grace, saved by a timely repentance from dying in sin.

4. Their eternal separation from Christ. Whither I go you cannot come. When Christ left the world he went to paradise. Thither he took the penitent thief with him, that did not die in his sins; but the impenitent not only shall not come to him, but they cannot; for heaven would not be heaven to those that die unsanctified and unmeet for it.

II. The jest they made of this threatening. They turned it into ridicule (v. 22): Will he kill himself? What slight thoughts they had of Christ's threatenings; they could make themselves and one another merry with them. What ill thoughts they had of Christ's meaning, as if he had an inhuman design upon his own life. They had put a much more favourable construction upon this word of his (ch. vii. 34, 35): Will he go to the dispersed among the Gentiles? But see how indulged malice grows more and more malicious.

III. The confirmation of what he had said.

1. He had said, Whither I go you cannot come (v. 23): You are from beneath, I am from above; you are of this world, I am not of this world. You are of those things which are beneath. You are in with these things, how can you come where I go, when your spirit and disposition are so directly contrary to mine? The spirit of the Lord Jesus was—not of this world, but from above. None shall be with him but those who are born from above and have their conversation in heaven. How contrary to this their spirit was: "You are from beneath." What communion could Christ have with them?

2. He had said, You shall die in your sins, and here he stands to it. He gives this further reason for it, If you believe not that I am he, you shall die in your sins, v. 34. (1) What we are required to believe: that I am he; he that should come, he that you expect the Messias to be. I do not only call myself so, but I am he. True faith does not amuse the soul with an empty sound of words, but affects it. (2) How necessary it is that we believe this. If we have not this faith, we shall die in our sins. We cannot be saved from the power of sin while we live, and therefore shall certainly continue in it to the last. None but the Spirit of Christ's grace will be an agent powerful enough to turn us from sin to God. If Christ do not cure us, our case is desperate, and we shall die in our no man laid hands on him . . .—(See on ch. 7:30). In the dialogue that follows, the conflict waxes sharper on both sides, till rising to its climax, they take up stones to stone him.

sons. His hour was not yet come. The time was not arrived in which He had determined to give himself up into the hands of His crucifiers.

21. Then said Jesus again unto them. He had said the same things to them the day before. See chap. vii. 34. Ye shall seek me. When your calamities come upon you, you shall in vain seek for the help of the Messiah, whom you now reject and whom you shall shortly crucify.

A. T. ROBERTSON:

21. "Again" (palin). Probably palin (again) in verse 12 refers to a day after the feast is over since the last day is mentioned in 7:37. So then here again we probably move on to another day still beyond that in verse 12. "And ye shall seek me" (kai zetesete me). As in 7:34, "the search of despair" (Bernard), seeking for the Messiah when it is too late, the tragedy of Judaism today (1:11). "And ye shall die in your sin" (kai en tei hamartiai humon apothaneisthe). Future middle indicative of apothnesko which is the emphatic word here (Ezek. 3:18; 18:18; Prov. 24:9). Note singular hamartiai (sin) here, but plural hamartiais (sins) when the phrase is repeated in verse 24 (sin in its essence, sin in its acts). "Ye cannot come" (humeis ou dunasthe elthein). Precise language of 7:34 to the Jews and to the apostles in 13:33.

22. "Will he kill himself?" (meti apoktenei heauton). Negative answer formally expected, but there is a manifest sneer in the query. "The mockery in these words is alike subtle and bitter" (Vincent). It was a different group of Jews in 7:31 who cynically suggested that he was going to work among the Greeks in the Dispersion. Here they infer that Jesus refers to the next world. They suggest the depths of Gehenna for him as the abode of suicides (Josephus, War III. viii. 5). Of course the rabbis could not join Jesus there! Edersheim argues against this view.

—Word Pictures in the New Testament

22. Then said the Jews, Will he kill himself?—seeing something more in His words than before (ch. 7:35), but their question more malignant and scornful.

22. Will he kill himself? They now understood that He spoke concerning His death; but before, chap. vii. 35, they thought He spoke of going to some of the Grecian provinces to preach to the dispersed Jews.

23. Ye are from beneath; I am from above—contrasting Himself, not as in ch. 3:31, simply with earthborn messengers of God, but with men sprung from and breathing an opposite element from His, which rendered it impossible that He and they should have any present fellowship, or dwell eternally together. (See again on ch. 7:34: also vs. 44.)

23. Ye are from beneath. You are capable of murder, and of self-murder too, because you have nothing of God in you. They verified this character in murdering the Lord Jesus; and many of them afterwards, to escape famine, put an end to their own lives.

24. if ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins—They knew well enough what He meant (Mark 13:6, Gr.; cf. Matt. 24:5). But He would not, by speaking it out, give them the materials for a charge for which they were watching. At the same time, one is irresistibly reminded by such language, so far transcending what is becoming in men, of those ancient declarations of the God of Israel, "I AM HE" (Deut. 32:39; Isa. 43:10, 13; 46:4; 48:12). See on ch. 6:20.

MATTHEW HENRY

sins. Without faith we cannot be saved from the punishment of sin when we die. This implies the great gospel promise: If we believe that Christ is he, and receive him accordingly, we shall not die in our sins. Believers die in Christ, in his love, in his arms.

IV. Here is a further discourse concerning himself, v. 25–29.

1. The question which the Jews put to him (v. 25): Who art thou? He had said, You must believe that I am he. His not saying expressly who he was, they turned to his reproach, as if he knew not what to say of himself: "Who art thou?"

2. His answer to this question, wherein he directs them three ways for information:

(1) He refers them to what he had said all along: "Do you ask who I am? Even the same that I said unto you from the beginning." I am the same that I said to you from the beginning of time in the scriptures of the Old Testament; from the beginning of my public ministry. The account he had already given of himself he resolved to abide by. To this he refers them for an answer to their question.

(2) He refers them to his Father's judgment (v. 26): "I have many things to say, and to judge of you. I speak to the world (to which I am sent as an ambassador) those things which I have heard of him."

[1] He suppresses his accusation of them. He had many things to charge them with, but for the present he had said enough.

[2] He enters his appeal against them to his Father: He that sent me. Here two things comfort him: First, That he had been true to his Father, and to the trust reposed in him: I speak to the world (for his gospel was to be preached to every creature) those things which I have heard of him. Secondly, That his Father would be true to him. Though he should not accuse them to his Father, yet the Father, who sent him, would undoubtedly reckon. Christ would not accuse them; "for," saith he, "he that sent me is true, and will pass judgment on them." Upon this part of our Saviour's discourse the evangelist has a melancholy remark (v. 27): They understood not that he spoke to them of the Father. Though Christ spoke so plainly of God as his Father in heaven, yet they did not understand whom he meant. Day and night are alike to the blind.

(3) He refers them to their own convictions hereafter, v. 28, 29. Now observe here,

[1] What they should ere long be convinced of: "You shall know that I am he. You shall be made to know it in your own consciences, the convictions of which, though you may stifle, yet you cannot baffle." Two things they should be convinced of, First, That he did nothing of himself, of himself without the Father. Of false prophets it is said that they prophesied out of their own hearts, and followed their own spirits. Secondly, That as his Father taught him so he spoke these things, that he was not self-taught, but taught of God.

[2] When they should be convinced of this: When you have lifted up the Son of man, lifted him up upon the cross, as the brazen serpent upon the pole (ch. iii. 14). Or the expression denotes that his death was his exaltation. They lifted him up to the cross, but then he lifted up himself to his Father. Observe with what tenderness and mildness Christ here speaks to those who he certainly knew would put him to death. Christ speaks of his death as that which would be a powerful conviction of the infidelity of the Jews. When you have lifted up the Son of man, then shall you know this. Careless and unthinking people are often taught the worth of mercies by the want of them. The guilt of their sin would so awaken their consciences that they would be put upon serious enquiries after a Saviour, and then would know that Jesus was he who alone could save them. And so it proved, when, being told that with wicked hands they had crucified and slain the Son of God, they cried out, What shall we do? (Acts ii. 36). There would be such signs and wonders attending his death as would give a stronger proof of his being the Messiah than any that had been yet given. By the death of Christ the pouring out of the Spirit was purchased, who would convince the world that Jesus is he. The judgments which the Jews brought upon themselves, by putting Christ to death, were a sensible conviction to the most hardened among them that Jesus was he.

[3] What supported our Lord Jesus in the mean time (v. 29): He that sent me is with me, for the Father hath not left me alone, for I do always those things that please him. The assurance which Christ had of his Father's presence with him: He that sent me is with me. This greatly emboldens our faith in Christ and our reliance upon his word. The King of kings accompanied his own ambassador, and never left him alone, either solitary or weak; it also aggravated the wickedness of those that opposed him. The

25. Who art thou?—hoping thus to extort an explicit answer; but they are disappointed.

26, 27. I have many things to say and to judge of you; but he that sent me is true . . .—i.e., I could, and at the fitting time, will say and judge many things of you (referring perhaps to the work of the Spirit which is for judgment as well as salvation, ch. 16:8), but what I do say is just the message My Father hath given Me to deliver.

28-30. When ye have lifted up the Son of man—The plainest intimation He had yet given in public of the manner and the authors of His death. then shall ye know that I am he . . .—i.e., find out, or have sufficient evidence, how true was all He said, though they would be far from owning it.

29. the Father hath not left me alone; for I do always those things that please him . . .—i.e., To you, who gnash upon Me with your teeth, and frown down all open appearance for Me, I seem to stand uncountenanced and alone; but I have a sympathy and support transcending all human applause; I came hither to do My Father's will, and in the doing of it have not ceased to please Him; therefore is He ever by Me with His approving smile, His cheering words, His supporting arm.

ADAM CLARKE

25. Who art thou? This marks the indignation of the Pharisees—as if they had said: Who art Thou that takest upon Thee to deal out threatenings in this manner against us? Jesus saith unto them, Even the same that I said unto you from the beginning. Rather, "Just what I have already told you," i.e., that "I am the light of the world"—the Christ—the Saviour of mankind.

26. I have many things to say and to judge of you. Or "to speak and to condemn."

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

"When you have lifted up the Son of man you will know." In these words we catch the accents of the everlasting mercy. He had spoken to them in anger. He had had to tell them the truth. They were from beneath; and all their attitude was mastered by hell. But He was in the world under the mastery of high heaven. One day, He told them, the revelation would come to them. When they had lifted up the Son of man, they would understand. "I do always the things that please my Father"; and within those are the things to which I refer, the lifting up of the Son of man. So in the midst of all the bitterness of opposition, and the sternness of rebuke, there was the vibrant tenderness of the everlasting mercy.—The Gospel According to John

28. When ye have lifted up. When you have crucified Me, and thus filled up the measure of your iniquities, you shall know that I am the Christ by the signs that shall follow; and you shall know that what I spoke is true by the judgments that shall follow. To be lifted up is a common mode of expression among the Jewish writers for "to die" or "to be killed."

29. The Father hath not left me alone. Though you shall have power to put Me to death, yet this shall not be because He has abandoned Me. No—He is ever with Me, because I do that which pleases Him; and it is His pleasure that I should lay down My life for the salvation of the world.

ground of this assurance: For I do always those things that please him. His whole undertaking is called the pleasure of the Lord (Isa. liii. 10). His management of that affair was in nothing displeasing to his Father. Our Lord Jesus never offended his Father in anything, he fulfilled all righteousness. God's servants may then expect God's presence with them when they choose and do those things that please him.

V. Here is the good effect which this discourse of Christ's had upon some of his hearers (v. 30): As he spoke these words many believed on him. There is a remnant who believe to the saving of the soul. If Israel, the whole body of the people, be not gathered, yet there are those of them in whom Christ will be glorious. When Christ told them that if they believed not they should die in their sins, they thought it was time to look about them. Sometimes there is a wide door opened, and an effectual one, even where there are many adversaries. The gospel sometimes gains great victories where it meets with great opposition. Let this encourage God's ministers to preach the gospel, though it be with much contention, for they shall not labour in vain. Many may be secretly brought home to God by those endeavours which are openly contradicted.

I. A comfortable doctrine laid down concerning the spiritual liberty of Christ's disciples. Christ, knowing that his doctrine began to work upon some of his hearers addressed himself to those weak believers.

1. How graciously the Lord Jesus looks to those that tremble at his word, and are ready to receive it; and will not pass by those who set themselves in his way, without speaking to them.

2. How carefully he cherishes the beginnings of grace. In what he said to them, we have two things, which he saith to all that should at any time believe: (1) The character of a true disciple of Christ: If you continue in my word, then are you my disciples indeed. He lays down this for a settled rule, that he would own none for his disciples but those that continued in his word. It highly concerns those that are not strong in faith to see to it that they be sound in the faith. Let those who have thoughts of covenanting with Christ have no thoughts of reserving a power of revocation. Children are sent to school, and bound apprentices, only for a few years; but those only are Christ's who are willing to be bound to him for the term of life. Those only that continue in Christ's word shall be accepted as his disciples indeed. It is to dwell in Christ's word, as a man does at home, which is his centre, and rest, and refuge.

(2) The privilege of a true disciple of Christ. Here are two precious promises, v. 32. "You shall know the truth." Even those who are true believers may be, and are, much in the dark concerning many things which they should know. God's children are but children, and understand and speak as children. Did we not need to be taught, we should not need to be disciples. It is a very great privilege to know the truth. Christ's scholars are sure to be well taught. The truth shall make you free; that is, First, The truth which Christ teaches tends to make men free, Isa. lxi. 1. It makes us free from our spiritual enemies, free in the service of God, free to the privileges of sons. Secondly, The knowing, entertaining, and believing, of this truth does actually make us free, free from prejudices, mistakes, and false notions, free from the dominion of lust and passion; and restores the soul to the government of itself. The mind, by admitting the truth of Christ is vastly enlarged, and has scope and compass given it and never acts with so true a liberty as when it acts under a divine command, 2 Cor. iii. 17.

II. The offence which the carnal Jews took at this doctrine. They cavilled at it, v. 33. With a great deal of pride and envy they answered him, "We Jews are Abraham's seed, and therefore are free-born; we were never in bondage to any man; how sayest thou then, You shall be made free?"

1. What it was that they were grieved at; it was an innuendo in those words, You shall be made free, as if the Jewish nation were in some sort of bondage. 2. What it was that they alleged against it. (1) "We are Abraham's seed." It is common for a sinking decaying family to boast of the glory and dignity of its ancestors, and to borrow honour from that name to which they repay disgrace; so the Jews here did. It is the common fault and folly of those that have pious parentage and education to trust to their privilege, and boast of it, as if it would atone for the want of real holiness. Saving benefits are not conveyed by entail to us and our issue, nor can a title to heaven be made by descent. They are not all Israel that are of Israel. (2) We were never in bondage

30. As he spake these words, many believed on him—Instead of wondering at this, the wonder would be if words of such unearthly, surpassing grandeur could be uttered without captivating some that heard them. And just as "all that sat in the council" to try Stephen "saw his face" —though expecting nothing but death—"as it had been the face of an angel" (Acts 6:15), so may we suppose that, full of the sweet supporting sense of His Father's presence, amidst the rage and scorn of the rulers, a divine benignity beamed from His countenance, irradiated the words that fell from Him, and won over the candid "many" of His audience.

31-33. Then said Jesus to those Jews who believed, If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed . . .—The impression produced by the last words of our Lord may have become visible by some decisive movement, and here He takes advantage of it to press on them "continuance" in the faith, since then only were they His real disciples (cf. ch. 15:3-8), and then should they experimentally "know the truth," and "by the truth be made (spiritually) free."

33. They answered him, We be Abraham's seed, and were never in bondage to any man . . .—Who said this? Not surely the very class just spoken of as won over by His divine words, and exhorted to continue in them. Most interpreters seem to think so; but it is hard to ascribe such a petulant speech to the newly gained disciples, even in the lowest sense, much less persons so gained as they were. It came, probably, from persons mixed up with them in the same part of the crowd, but of a very different spirit. The pride of the Jewish nation, even now after centuries of humiliation, is the most striking feature of their character. 'Talk of freedom to us? Pray when or to whom were we ever in bondage?' This bluster sounds almost ludicrous from such a nation. Had they forgotten their long and bitter bondage in Egypt? their dreary captivity in Babylon? their present bondage to the Roman yoke, and their restless eagerness to throw it off? But probably they

30. As he spake these words, many believed on him. The same sun that hardens the clay softens the wax. This discourse, which proved the savor of death unto death to the obstinate Pharisees, became the savor of life unto life to many of the simplehearted people.

31. If ye continue in my word. Or "in this doctrine of Mine." It is not enough to receive God's truth—we must retain and walk in it. And it is only when we receive the truth, love it, keep it, and walk in it, that we are the genuine disciples of Christ.

32. Ye shall know the truth. Shall have a constant experimental knowledge of its power and efficacy. And the truth shall make you free. It was a maxim of the Jews "that no man was free, but he who exercised himself in the meditation of the law." No man is truly free but he in whose heart the power of sin is destroyed, and who has received the Spirit of adoption, through which he cries, "Abba! Father!" See Rom. viii. 15. The bondage of sin is the most grievous bondage, and freedom from its guilt and influence is the greatest liberty.

33. They answered. That is, the other Jews who had not believed—the carping, cavilling Pharisees already mentioned; for the words cannot be spoken of the simple people who had already believed.

to any man. How false this allegation was. I wonder how they could have the assurance to say a thing in the face of a congregation which was so notoriously untrue. Were they not at this time tributaries to the Romans, and, though not in a personal, yet in a national bondage to them, and groaning to be made free? How foolish the application was. Christ had spoken of a liberty wherewith the truth would make them free, which must be meant of a spiritual liberty, for truth as it is the enriching, so it is the enfranchising of the mind, and the enlarging of that from the captivity of error and prejudice; and yet they plead against the offer of spiritual liberty that they were never in corporal thraldom. Carnal hearts are sensible of no other grievances than those that molest the body and injure their secular affairs. Discourse to them of the bondage of sin, a captivity to Satan, and a liberty by Christ—and you bring certain strange things to their ears.

III. Our Saviour's vindication of his doctrine, v. 34–37, where he does these four things:

1. He shows that it was possible that they might be in a state of bondage (v. 34): Whosoever commits sin is the servant of sin. Christ further explains what he had said for their edification. (1) The preface is very solemn: Verily, verily, I say unto you. The style of the prophets was, Thus saith the Lord, for they were faithful as servants; but Christ, being a Son, speaks in his own name: I say unto you. He pawns his veracity upon it.

(2) The truth is of universal concern: Whosoever commits sin is the servant of sin, and sadly needs to be made free. See who it is on whom this brand is fastened—on him that commits sin. There is not a just man upon earth, that lives, and sins not; yet every one that sins is not a servant of sin, for then God would have no servants; but he that makes sin, that makes choice of sin, who walks after the flesh, and makes a trade of sin. See what the brand is which Christ fastens upon those that thus commit sin. He stigmatizes them, gives them a mark of servitude. They are servants of sin. He does the work of sin, supports its interest, and accepts its wages, Rom. vi. 16.

2. He shows them that their having a place in the house of God would not entitle them to the inheritance of sons: for (v. 35) the servant abideth not in the house for ever, but the son of the family abideth ever. (1) This points primarily at the rejection of the Jewish church and nation. Israel had been God's son, his first-born. Christ tells them that having made themselves servants they should not abide in the house for ever. "Think not to be made free from sin by the rites and ceremonies of the law of Moses, for Moses was but a servant. But, if the Son make you free, it is well," v. 36. (2) It looks further, to the rejection of all that are the servants of sin. True believers only are accounted free, and shall abide for ever in the house.

3. He shows them the way of deliverance. The case of those that are the servants of sin is sad, but thanks be to God it is not helpless, it is not hopeless. He who is the Son has a power both of manumission and of adoption (v. 36): If the Son shall make you free, you shall be free indeed.

(1) Jesus Christ in the gospel offers us our freedom. [1] To discharge prisoners; this he does in justification, by making satisfaction for our guilt, and for our debts. Christ, as our surety, compounds with the creditor, answers the demands of injured justice with more than an equivalent. [2] He has a power to rescue bond-slaves, and this he does in sanctification; by the powerful operations of his Spirit, he breaks the power of corruption in the soul, rallies the scattered forces of reason and virtue, and so the soul is made free. [3] He has a power to naturalize strangers and foreigners, and this he does in adoption. This is a further act of grace. There is a charter of privileges as well as pardon.

(2) Those whom Christ makes free are free indeed. It is not the word used (v. 31) for disciples indeed, but really. The truth and certainty of the promise, the liberty which the Jews boasted of was an imaginary liberty; but the liberty which Christ gives is a certain thing, it is real. The servants of sin promise themselves liberty and fancy themselves free, but they cheat themselves. None are free indeed but those whom Christ makes free. The singular excellency of the freedom promised; it is a freedom that deserves the name. It is a glorious liberty. It is substance, while the things of the world are shadows.

4. He applies this in answer to their boasts of relation to Abraham (v. 37): "I know that you are Abraham's seed, but now you seek to kill me, because my word hath no place in you."

(1) The dignity of their extraction admitted: "I know that you are Abraham's seed." They boasted of saw that our Lord pointed to something else–freedom, perhaps, from the leaders of sects or parties –and were not willing to allow their subjection even to these. Our Lord, therefore, though He knew what slaves they were in this sense, drives the ploughshare somewhat deeper than this, to a bondage they little dreamt of.

34, 35. Whosoever committeth sin–i.e., liveth in the commission of it– (Cf. I John 3:8; Matt. 7:23). is the servant of sin–i.e., the bond-servant, or slave of it; for the question is not about free service, but who are in bondage. (Cf. II Pet. 2:19; Rev. 6:16.) The great truth here expressed was not unknown to heathen moralists; but it was applied only to vice, for they were total strangers to what in revealed religion is called sin. The thought of slaves and freemen in the house suggests to our Lord a wider idea.

35. And the servant abideth not in the house for ever, but the Son abideth ever–i.e., 'And if your connection with the family of God be that of BONDSERVANTS, ye have no natural tie to the house; your tie is essentially uncertain and precarious. But the SON'S relationship to the FATHER is a natural and essential one; it is an indefeasible tie; His abode in it is perpetual and of right: That is My relationship, My tie: If, then, ye would have your connection with God's family made real, rightful, permanent, ye must by the Son be manumitted and adopted as sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty.' In this sublime statement there is no doubt a subordinate allusion to Genesis 21:10, "Cast out this bondwoman and her son, for the son of this bondwoman shall not be heir with my son, with Isaac." (Cf. Gal. 4:22-30.)

37-41. ye seek to kill me–He had said this to their face before: He now repeats it, and they do not deny it; yet are they held back, as by some marvellous spell –it was the awe which His combined dignity, courage, and benignity struck into them.

ADAM CLARKE

Were never in bondage to any man. This assertion was not only false, but it was ridiculous in the extreme, seeing their whole history, sacred and profane, is full of recitals of their servitude in Egypt, in Chaldea, under the Persians, under the Macedonians, and under the Romans.

34. Whosoever committeth sin is the servant of sin. Or "is the slave of sin." This was the slavery of which Christ spoke, and deliverance from it was the liberty which He promised.

35. And the servant abideth not in the house. Or, rather, "Now the slave abideth not in the family." As if Jesus had said: And now that I am speaking of a slave, I will add one thing more, viz., a slave has no right to any part of the inheritance in the family to which he belongs; but the son, the legitimate son, has a right.

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

When Christ sets free no chains can bind again. Let the Master say to me, "Captive, I have delivered thee," and it is done. Come on, come on, ye fiends of the pit! Mightier is he who is for us than all they who be against us. Come on, come on, temptations of the world, but if the Lord be on our side, whom shall we fear? If He be our defense, who shall be our destruction? Come on, come on, ye foul corruptions, come on, ye machinations and temptations of my own deceitful heart, but He who hath begun the good work in me will carry it on and perfect it to the end. Gather ye, gather ye, gather ye, all your hosts together, ye who are the foes of God and the enemies of man, and come at once with concentrated fury and with hellish might against my spirit, but if God acquitteth, who is he that condemneth? Who shall separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord? Yon black stream of health shall never wash out the mark of Christian liberty. That skeleton monarch bears no yoke which he can put upon a believer's neck. We will shout victory when we are breast-deep amidst the last billows and grapple with the king upon the pale horse: we will throw the rider and win the victory in the last struggle, according as it is written, "Thanks be unto God which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." Sparta and Greece refused to wear the yoke of Persia and broke the proud king's pomp; but we are free in a nobler sense. We refuse the yoke of Satan and will overcome his power as Christ overcame it in the days gone by.—The Treasury of the New Testament their descent from Abraham, as that which aggrandized their names; whereas really it did but aggravate their crimes.

(2) The inconsistency of their practice with this dignity: But you seek to kill me. They had attempted it several times, and were now designing it, which quickly appeared (v. 58), when they took up stones to cast at him.

(3) The reason of this inconsistency. It is because my word hath no place in you. Some of the critics read it, My word does not penetrate into you; it descended as the rain, but it came upon them as the rain upon the rock, which it runs off, and did not soak into their hearts, as the rain upon the ploughed ground. Our translation is very significant: It has no place in you. The words of Christ ought to have a place in us, the innermost and uppermost place,—a dwelling place, as a man at home, and not as a stranger or sojourner,—a working place; it must have room to operate, to work sin out of us, and to work grace in us; it must have a ruling place, its place must be upon the throne. There are many that make a profession of religion in whom the word of Christ has no place; they will not allow it a place, for they do not like it. Other things possess the place it should have in us. Where the word of God has no place no good is to be expected, for room is left there for all wickedness.

Verses 38–47

Here Christ and the Jews are still at issue.

I. He here traces the difference between his sentiments and theirs to a different rise and origin (v. 38): I speak that which I have seen with my Father, and you do what you have seen with your father.

1. Christ's doctrine was from heaven. I speak that which I have seen. The discoveries Christ has made to us of God and another world are not grounded upon guess and hearsay. It is what I have seen with my Father. The doctrine of Christ is not a plausible hypothesis, supported by probable arguments. It was not only what he had heard from his Father, but what he had seen with him. It was Christ's prerogative to have seen what he spoke, and to speak what he had seen.

2. Their doings were from hell: "You do that which you have seen with your father." As a child that is trained up with his father learns his father's words and fashions, and grows like him by imitation as well as by a natural image, so these Jews made themselves as like the devil as if they had industriously set him before them for their pattern.

II. He answers their vain-glorious boasts of relation to Abraham and to God as their fathers.

1. They pleaded relation to Abraham, and he replies to this plea. They said, Abraham is our father, v. 39. In this they intended, (1) To do honour to themselves, and to make themselves look great. (2) They designed to cast an odium upon Christ as if he reflected upon the patriarch Abraham, in speaking of their father as one they had learned evil from. Now Christ overthrows this plea by a plain and cogent argument: "Abraham's children will do the works of Abraham, but you do not do Abraham's works, therefore you are not Abraham's children." The proposition is plain: If you were Abraham's children then you would do the works of Abraham. Those only are reckoned the seed of Abraham, who tread in the steps of his faith and obedience. Those who would approve themselves Abraham's seed must not only be of Abraham's faith, but do Abraham's works (James ii. 21, 22). The assumption is evident likewise: But you do not do the works of Abraham, for you seek to kill me, a man that has told you the truth, which I have heard of God; this did not Abraham, v. 40. He shows them what their work was which they were now about; they sought to kill him. They were so unnatural as to seek the life of a man who had done them no harm, nor given them any provocation. They were so ungrateful as to seek the life of one who had told them the truth. They were so ungodly as to seek the life of one who told them the truth which he had heard from God. He shows them that this did not become the children of Abraham; for this did not Abraham. "He did nothing like this." He was famous for his humanity, and for his piety. Abraham believed God; they were obstinate in unbelief. "He would not have done thus if he had lived now, or I had lived then." The conclusion follows of course (v. 41): "You are not Abraham's children, but father yourselves upon another family (v. 41); there is a father whose deeds you do." He does not yet say plainly that he means the devil. He tried whether they would suffer their own consciences to infer from what he said that they were the devil's children.

2. So far were they from owning their unworthiness of relation to Abraham that they pleaded re-because my word hath no place in you–When did ever human prophet so speak of His words? They tell us of "the word of the Lord" coming to them. But here is One who holds up "His word" as that which ought to find entrance and abiding room for itself in the souls of all who hear it.

38. my Father . . . your father–(See on vs. 23).

39. If ye were Abraham's children, ye would do the works of Abraham–He had just said He "knew they were Abraham's children," i.e., according to the flesh; but the children of his faith and holiness they were not, but the reverse.

40. this did not Abraham–In so doing ye act in direct opposition to him.

ADAM CLARKE

37. My word hath no place in you. Or, "This doctrine of Mine has no place in you." You hear the truths of God but you do not heed them; the word of life has no influence over you. And how can it when you seek to kill Me because I proclaim this truth to you? From what is here said it is manifest, says Dr. Lightfoot, that the whole tendency of our Saviour's discourse is to show the Jews that they are the seed of that serpent which was to bruise the heel of the Messiah. Else what could that mean, v. 44: "Ye are of your father the devil"; i.e., "Ye are the seed of the serpent"?

38. I speak that which I have seen. I speak nothing but that unchangeable, eternal truth which I have received from the bosom of God.

Ye do that which ye have seen. Instead of ye have seen I think we should read "ye have heard," on the authority of some MSS. Jesus saw the Father, for He was the Word that was with God from eternity. The Jews did not see; they only felt and heard their father the devil.

39. If ye were Abraham's children. Griesbach reads ye are instead of ye were, on the authority of some MSS. Ye would do the works of Abraham. As the son has the nature of his father in him, and naturally imitates him, so if you were the children of Abraham you would imitate him in his faith, obedience, and uprightness. But this you do not, for you seek to kill Me merely because I tell you the truth. Abraham never did anything like this; therefore you have no spiritual relationship to him.

41. Ye do the deeds of your father. You have certainly another father than Abraham—one who has instilled his own malignant nature into you; and as you seek to murder Me for telling you the truth, you must be the offspring of him who was a murderer from the beginning, and stood not in the truth, v. 44.

MATTHEW HENRY

lation to God himself as their Father: "We are not born of fornication, we have one Father, even God."

(1) Some understand this literally. They were Hebrews of the Hebrews; and, being born in lawful wedlock, they might call God Father.

(2) Others take it figuratively. They begin to be aware now that Christ spoke of a spiritual father, of the father of their religion. They deny themselves to be a generation of idolaters: "We are not born of fornication, are not the children of idolatrous parents." If they meant no more than that they themselves were not idolaters, what then? A man may be free from idolatry, and yet perish in another iniquity. They boast themselves to be true worshippers of the true God. We have not many fathers, as the heathens had. The Lord our God is one Lord and one Father, and therefore it is well with us. Now our Saviour gives a full answer to this fallacious plea (v. 42, 43), and proves, by two arguments, that they had no right to call God Father.

First, They did not love Christ: if God were your Father, you would love me. He had disproved their relation to Abraham by their going about to kill him (v. 40), but here he disproves their relation to God by their not loving and owning him. All that have God for their Father have a true love to Jesus Christ. God has taken various methods to prove us, and this was one: he sent his Son into the world, concluding that all that called him Father would bid him welcome. By this our adoption will be proved or disproved—Did we love Christ, or no? If they were God's children they would love him. He was the Son of God. Now this could not but recommend him to the affections of all that were born of God. He was sent of God. Observe the emphasis he lays upon this: I came from God; neither came I of myself, but he sent me. He came to gather together in one the children of God (ch. xi. 52). And would not all God's children embrace with both arms a messenger sent from their Father on such errands?

Secondly, They did not understand him. They did not understand the language and dialect of the family: You do not understand my speech (v. 43). Those that had made the word of the Creator familiar to them needed no other key to the dialect of the Redeemer. And the reason why they did not understand Christ's speech made the matter much worse: Even because you cannot hear my word, that is, "You cannot persuade yourselves to hear it without prejudice, as it should be heard." The meaning of this cannot is an obstinate will not. They do not like it nor love it, and therefore they will not understand it. You cannot hear my words, for you have stopped your ears.

III. He comes next to tell them plainly whose children they were: You are of your father the devil, v. 44. If they were not God's children, they were the devil's.

This is a high charge, and sounds very harsh and horrid, and therefore our Saviour fully proves it,

1. By a general argument: The lusts of your father you will do. (1) "You do the devil's lusts, the lusts which he would have you to fulfil, and are led captive by him at his will." The peculiar lusts of the devil are spiritual wickedness; pride and envy, and wrath and malice; enmity to that which is good, and enticing others to that which is evil; these are lusts which the devil fulfils. (2) You will do the devil's lusts. The more there is of the will in these lusts, the more there is of the devil in them. "The lusts of your father you delight to do," they are rolled under the tongue as a sweet morsel.

2. By two particular instances, wherein they manifestly resembled the devil—murder and lying.

(1) He was a murderer from the beginning. He was a hater of man, and so in disposition a murderer of him. He was man's tempter to that sin which brought death into the world. The great tempter is the great destroyer. The Jews called the devil the angel of death. If the devil had not been very strong in Cain, he could not have done such an unnatural thing as to kill his own brother. Now herein these Jews were followers of him, and were murderers, like him; murderers of souls, sworn enemies of Christ, and now ready to be his betrayers and murderers. Now you seek to kill me.

(2) He was a liar. He is a deserter from the truth; he abode not in the truth. The truth which Christ was now preaching, and which the Jews opposed; herein they did like their father the devil. He is destitute of the truth: There is no truth in him. There is no truth, nothing you can confide in, in him, nor in anything he says or does. He is a friend and patron of lying: When he speaketh a lie he speaketh of his own. Three things are here said of the devil with reference to the sin of lying: First, That he is a liar; his oracles were lying oracles, his prophets lying prophets. All his temptations are carried on by lies, calling

41. We be not born of fornication . . . we have one Father, God—meaning, as is generally allowed, that they were not an illegitimate race in point of religion, pretending only to be God's people, but were descended from His own chosen Abraham.

42, 43. If God were your Father, ye would love me—If ye had anything of His moral image, as children have their father's likeness, ye would love Me, for I am immediately of Him and directly from Him. But "My speech" (meaning His peculiar style of expressing Himself on these subjects) is unintelligible to you because ye cannot take in the truth which it conveys.

44. Ye are of your father the devil—"This is one of the most decisive testimonies to the objective (outward) personality of the devil. It is quite impossible to suppose an accommodation to Jewish views, or a metaphorical form of speech, in so solemn an assertion as this" [ALFORD]. the lusts of your father—his impure, malignant, ungodly propensities, inclinations, desires. ye will do—are willing to do; not of any blind necessity of nature, but of pure natural inclination.

He was a murderer from the beginning—The reference is not to Cain [as LOCKE, DE WETTE, ALFORD, etc.], but to Adam [GROTIUS, CALVIN, MEYER, LUTHARDT, etc.]. The death of the human race, in its widest sense, is ascribed to the murderous seducer of our race. and abode not in the truth—As, strictly speaking, the word means "abideth," it has been denied that the fall of Satan from a former holy state is here expressed [LOCKE, etc.], and some superior interpreters think it only implied [OLSHAUSEN, etc.]. But though the form of the thought is present—not past—this is to express the important idea, that his whole character and activity are just a continual aberration from his own original truth or rectitude; and thus his fall is not only the implied basis of the thought, but part of the statement itself, properly interpreted and brought out. no truth in him—void of all that holy, transparent rectitude which, as His creature, he originally possessed. When he speaketh a lie, he speaketh of his own—perhaps his own resources, treasures (Matt. 12:35) [ALFORD].

We be not born of fornication. We are not a mixed, spurious breed—our tribes and families have been kept distinct—we are descended from Abraham by his legal wife, Sarah. We have one Father, even God. In the spiritual sense of father and son we are not a spurious, that is, an idolatrous race; because we acknowledge none as our spiritual father, and worship none as such, but the true God.

42. If God were your Father, ye would love me. I came from God, and it would be absurd to suppose that you would persecute Me if you were under the influence of God. The children of the same father should not murder each other.

43. Why do ye not understand my speech? "This My mode of speaking"—when illustrating spiritual by natural things. Because ye cannot hear my word. That is, you cannot bear My doctrine. It comes too close to you; it searches your hearts, detects your hypocrisy, and exposes your iniquitous intentions and designs. And as you are determined not to leave your sins, so you are purposed not to hear My doctrine.

44. Ye are of your father the devil. You are the seed of the old serpent. See on v. 37. The lusts of your father. Like father, like son. What Satan desires, you desire, because you are filled with his nature.

He was a murderer from the beginning. It was through him that Adam transgressed, in consequence of which death entered into the world, and slew him and all his posterity. Abode not in the truth. "He stood not in the truth"—was once in a state of glorious felicity, but fell from it; and, being deprived of all good himself, he could not endure that others should enjoy any. He speaketh of his own. "He speaketh of his own offspring," or, "from his own disposition," for he is the father and fountain of all error and falsity; and all who are deceived by him, and partake of his disposition, falsity, and cruelty are his offspring. For he is a liar, and the father of it—literally, "his father also."

MATTHEW HENRY

evil good and good evil. Secondly, That when he speaks a lie he speaks of his own. It is the proper idiom of his language. Thirdly, That he is the father of it. He is the author and founder of all lies. He is the father of every liar. God made men with a disposition to truth. It is congruous to reason and natural light, that we should speak truth; but the devil, the author of sin, is the father of liars, who begat them, who trained them up in the way of lying, whom they resemble and obey.

IV. Christ, having thus proved all murderers and all liars to be the devil's children, comes in the following verses to assist them in the application of it to themselves. Two things he charges upon them:

1. That they would not believe the word of truth (v. 45).

(1) Two ways it may be taken: [1] "Though I tell you the truth, yet you will not believe me." They would not believe that he told them the truth. The greatest truths with some gained not the least credit; for they rebelled against the light. Or, [2] Because I tell you the truth (so we read it) therefore you believe me not. They would not receive him, nor entertain him as a prophet, because he showed them their faces in a glass that would not flatter them. Miserable is the case of those to whom the light of divine truth is become a torment.

(2) Now, to show them the unreasonableness of their infidelity, he condescends to put the matter to this fair issue, v. 46. If he were in an error, why did they not convince him? But (saith Christ) which of you convinceth me of sin? Their accusations were malicious groundless calumnies, and utterly false. The very judge that condemned him owned he found no fault in him. The only way not to be convicted of sin is not to sin. If they were in an error, why were they not convinced by him? "If I say the truth, why do you not believe me? If you cannot convince me of error, you must own that I say the truth, and why do you not then give me credit?" It will be found that the reason why we believe not in Jesus Christ is because we are not willing to part with our sins, and deny ourselves, and serve God faithfully.

2. Another thing charged upon them is that they would not hear the words of God (v. 47).

(1) A doctrine laid down: He that is of God heareth God's words. He is willing and ready to hear them, is sincerely desirous to know what the mind of God is, and cheerfully embraces whatever he knows to be so. He apprehends and discerns them, he so hears them as to perceive the voice of God in them, as they of the family know the master's tread, and the master's knock, as the sheep know the voice of their shepherd from that of a stranger.

(2) The application of this doctrine: You therefore hear them not, because you are not of God. Your being thus deaf and dead to the words of God is a plain evidence that you are not of God. Or, their not being of God was the reason why they did not profitably hear the words of God, which Christ spoke. If the word of the kingdom do not bring forth fruit, the blame is to be laid upon the soil, not upon the seed.

I. Hitherto they had cavilled at his doctrine, but, having shown themselves uneasy when he complained (v. 43, 47) that they would not hear him, now at length they fall to downright railing, v. 48. The scribes and Pharisees scornfully turned off the conviction with this: Say we not well that thou art a Samaritan, and hast a devil?

1. The blasphemous character commonly given of our Lord Jesus among the wicked Jews. (1) That he was a Samaritan. Thus they exposed him to the ill will of the people, with whom you could not put a man into a worse name than to call him a Samaritan. They had often enough called him a Galilean—a mean man; they will have him a Samaritan—a bad man. Great endeavours have in all ages been used to make good people odious by putting them under black characters, and it is easy to run that down with a crowd and a cry which is once put into an ill name. (2) That he had a devil; that he was in league with the devil. That he was possessed with a devil, that he was a melancholy man, whose brain was clouded, or a mad man, whose brain was heated, and that which he said was no more to be believed than the extravagant rambles of a distracted man.

2. How they undertook to justify this character: Say we not well that thou art so? Their hearts were more hardened and their prejudices confirmed. They value themselves on their enmity to Christ, as if they had never spoken better than when they spoke the worst they could of Jesus Christ. It is bad to say and do ill, but it is worse to stand to it.

II. The meekness and mercifulness of Heaven shining in Christ's reply, v. 49, 50.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

(The word is plural.) It means that he has no temptation to it from without; it is purely self-begotten, springing from a nature which is nothing but obliquity. the father of it—i.e., of lying: all the falsehood in the world owes its existence to him. What a verse is this! It holds up the devil (1) as the murderer of the human race; but as this is meant here in the more profound sense of spiritual death, it holds him up, (2) as the spiritual parent of this fallen human family, communicating to his offspring his own evil passions and universal obliquity, and stimulating these into active exercise. But as there is "a stronger than he," who comes upon him and overcomes him (Luke 11:21, 22), it is only such as "love the darkness," who are addressed as children of the devil (Matt. 13:38; I John 3:8-10). 45-47. And because I tell you the truth, ye believe me not—not although, but just because He did so, for the reason given in the former verse. Had He been less true they would have hailed Him more readily.

46. Which of you convinceth me of sin—"Convicteth," bringeth home a charge of sin. Glorious dilemma! 'Convict Me of sin, and reject Me: If not, why stand ye out against My claims?' Of course, they could only be supposed to impeach His life; but in One who had already passed through unparalleled complications, and had continually to deal with friends and foes of every sort and degree, such a challenge thrown wide among His bitterest enemies, can amount to nothing short of a claim to absolute sinlessness.

48-51. Say we not well that thou art a Samaritan, and hast a devil?—What intense and virulent scorn! (See Heb. 12:3.) The "say we not well" refers to ch. 7:20. "A Samaritan" means more than "no Israelite at all"; it means one who pretended, but had no manner of claim to the title—retorting perhaps, this denial of their true descent from Abraham.

ADAM CLARKE

46. Which of you convinceth me of sin? Do you pretend to reject the truths which I announce, because My life does not correspond to the doctrines I have taught? But can any of you prove Me guilty of any fault? But it is probable that sin is put here in opposition to truth in the same verse, and then it should be rendered "falsehood." The very best Greek writers use the word in the same sense.

48. Thou art a Samaritan. This is the only time in which the Jews gave our Lord this title of reproach, and they probably grounded it on His having preached among them and lodged in their villages. See the account in chap. iv; but Samaritan, among them, meant a person unworthy of any credit. Hast a devil. Art possessed by an evil spirit and art, in consequence, deranged.

ALBERT BARNES:

46. "Which of you convinceth me?" To convince, with us, means to satisfy a man's own mind of the truth of anything; but this is not its meaning here. It rather means to convict. Which of you can prove that I am guilty of sin? "Of sin." The word sin here evidently means error, falsehood, or impostor. It stands opposed to truth. The argument of the Savior is this: A doctrine might be rejected if it could be proved that he that delivered it was an impostor; but as you cannot prove this of me, you are bound to receive my words.

47. "He that is of God." He that loves, fears, and honors God. "Heareth God's words." Listens to, or attends to the doctrines or commandments of God, as a child who loves his parent will regard and obey his commandments. This is an evidence of true piety. A willingness to receive all that God teaches us, and to obey all his commandments, is an undoubted proof that we are his friends (John 14:21; 1 John 2:4; 3:24). As the Jews did not show a readiness to obey the commands of God, it proved that they were not of him, and to this was owing their rejection of the Lord Jesus.

—Popular Commentary

MATTHEW HENRY

1. He denies their charge against him: I have not a devil. The imputation is unjust; "I am neither actuated by a devil, nor in compact with one."

2. He asserts the sincerity of his own intentions: But I honour my Father. It also proves that he had not a devil; for, if he had, he would not honour God.

3. He complains of the wrong they did him by their calumnies: You do dishonour me. By this it appears that, as man, he had a tender sense of the disgrace and indignity done him. Christ honoured his Father so as never man did, and yet was himself dishonoured so as never man was; for, though God has promised that those who honour him he will honour, he never promised that men should honour them.

4. He clears himself from the imputation of vain glory, v. 50. His contempt of worldly honour: I seek not mine own glory. He did not aim at this nor covet preferment in the world. "You do dishonour me, but cannot disturb me, for I seek not my own glory." Those who are dead to men's praise can safely bear their contempt. His comfort under worldly dishonour: There is one that seeketh and judgeth. In two things Christ made it appear that he sought not his own glory. (1) He did not court men's respect. In reference to this he saith, "There is one that seeketh." God will seek their honour that do not seek their own; for before honour is humility. (2) He did not revenge men's affronts, and in reference to this he saith, "There is one that judgeth, that will vindicate my honour." If we be humble appellants and patient expectants, we shall find, to our comfort, there is one that judgeth.

Verses 51-59

I. The doctrine of the immortality of believers laid down, v. 51. It is ushered in with the usual solemn preface, Verily, verily, I say unto you, If a man keep my sayings, he shall never see death. 1. The character of a believer: he is one that keeps the sayings of the Lord Jesus—my word. This we must not only receive, but keep; not only have, but hold. We must keep it in mind and memory, keep it in love and affection, keep in it as our way, keep to it as our rule. 2. The privilege of a believer: He shall by no means see death for ever; so it is in the original. Not as if the bodies of believers were secured from the stroke of death. How then is this promise made good that they shall not see death? The property of death is so altered to them that they do not see it as death, they do not see the terror of death. Their sight does not terminate in death, they look so clearly, so comfortably, through death, and beyond death, that they overlook death, and see it not. They shall not see death for ever. The day will come when death shall be swallowed up in victory. They are perfectly delivered from eternal death. They shall have their everlasting lot where there will be no more death, where they cannot die any more.

II. The Jews cavil at this doctrine. They lay hold of this occasion to reproach him that makes them so kind an offer: Now we know that thou hast a devil. Abraham is dead.

1. Their railing: "Now we know that thou hast a devil." If he had not abundantly proved himself a teacher come from God, his promises of immortality to his credulous followers might justly have been ridiculed, and charity itself would have imputed them to a crazed fancy; but his doctrine was evidently divine, his miracles confirmed it, and the Jews' religion taught them to expect such a prophet, and to believe in him.

2. Their reasoning. They look upon him as guilty of an insufferable piece of arrogance, in making himself greater than Abraham and the prophets: Abraham is dead, and the prophets, they are dead too. It is true that Abraham and the prophets were great men, great in the favour of God, and great in the esteem of all good men. It is true that they kept God's sayings. It is true that they died; they never pretended to have, much less to give, immortality. It was their honour that they died in faith, but die they must. Why should a good man be afraid to die when Abraham is dead, and the prophets are dead? They have tracked the way through that darksome valley, which should reconcile us to death and help to take off the terror of it. Now they think Christ talks madly when he saith, If a man keep my sayings, he shall never taste death. Now their arguing goes upon two mistakes: [1] They understood Christ of an immortality in this world. God is still the God of Abraham and the God of the holy prophets. God is not the God of the dead, but of the living; therefore Abraham and the prophets are still alive, and, as Christ meant it, they had not seen nor tasted death. [2] They thought none could be greater than Abraham and the prophets, whereas they could not but know that the Messiah would be greater than Abraham or any of the prophets. Instead of inferring from Christ's making himself greater than Abraham that he had a devil,

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

49. Jesus answered, I have not a devil—What calm dignity is here! Verily, "when reviled, He reviled not again" (I Pet. 2:23). Cf. Paul (Acts 26:25), "I am not mad . . ." He adds not, "Nor am I a Samaritan," that He might not even seem to partake of their contempt for a race that had already welcomed Him as the Christ, and began to be blessed by Him. I honour my Father, and ye do dishonour me—the language of wounded feeling. But the interior of His soul at such moments is only to be seen in such prophetic utterances as these, "For thy sake I have borne reproach; shame hath covered my face; I am become a stranger unto my brethren, an alien unto my mother's children. For the zeal of thine house hath eaten me up, and the reproaches of them that reproached thee are fallen upon me" (Ps. 69: 7-9.) 50. I seek not mine own glory: there is one that seeketh—i.e., evidently, 'that seeketh My glory'; requiring "all men to honor the Son even as they honor the Father"; judicially treating him "who honoreth not the Son as honoring not the Father that hath sent Him" (ch. 5:23; and cf. Matt. 17:5); but giving to Him (ch. 6:37) such as will yet cast their crowns before His throne, in whom He "shall see of the travail of his soul, and be satisfied" (Isa. 53:11).

51. If a man keep my saying, he shall never see death—Partly thus vindicating His lofty claims as Lord of the kingdom of life everlasting, and, at the same time, holding out even to His revilers the scepter of grace. The word "keep" is in harmony with vs. 31, "If ye continue in My word," expressing the permanency, as a living and paramount principle, of that faith to which He referred: "never see death," though virtually uttered before (ch. 5:24; 6:40, 47, 51), is the strongest and most naked statement of a very glorious truth yet given. (In ch. 11:26 it is repeated in nearly identical terms.)

52, 53. Then said the Jews unto him, Now we know that thou hast a devil . . .—'Thou art now self-convicted; only a demoniac could speak so; the most illustrious of our fathers are dead, and Thou promisest exemption from death to anyone who will keep Thy saying! pray, who art Thou?'

ADAM CLARKE

49. I have not a devil. The first part of the charge was too futile; if taken literally, it was both absurd and impossible. They did not believe it themselves, and therefore our Lord does not stop a moment to refute it; but He answers to the second with the utmost meekness and conclusiveness: I honor God. This is what no demon can do nor any man who is under such influence.

50. I seek not mine own glory. Another proof that I am not influenced by any spirit but that which proceeds from God. But there is one that seeketh—i.e., My glory—and judgeth—will punish you for your determined obstinacy and iniquity.

51. Shall never see death. He shall never come under the power of the death of the soul, but shall live eternally with Me in glory.

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

The false charge was the occasion of our Lord's uttering a great truth. On they rush, furious in their rage, but He flashes in their faces the light of truth. To put down error, lift up truth. Thus their deadly saying was met by a living saying: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, If a man keep my saying, he shall never see death." Nothing so baffles the adversaries of the faith as to utter with unshaken confidence the truth of God. The truth which Jesus stated was full of promise; and if they willfully rejected His promise, it became worse to them than a threatening. Christ's rejected promises curdle into woes. If these men, when He said to them, "If a man keep my saying, he shall never see death," yet went on reviling Him, then their consciences, when afterward awakened, would say to them, "He that believeth not shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him." If the believer shall never see death, then the unbeliever shall never see life. Thus the gospel itself becomes "a savor of death unto death" to those who refuse it; and the very word which proclaims eternal life threatens eternal death to the willfully unbelieving.

—The Treasury of the New Testament

MATTHEW HENRY

they should have inferred that he was the Christ; but their eyes were blinded. They scornfully asked, Whom makest thou thyself?

III. Christ's reply; still he vouchsafes to reason with them. This was the day of his patience.

1. In his answer he insists not upon his own testimony concerning himself, but waives it as not sufficient nor conclusive (v. 54): If I honour myself, my honour is nothing. Honour of our own creating is a mere chimera, has nothing in it, and therefore is called vain-glory. Self-admirers are self-deceivers.

2. He refers himself to his Father, God; and to their father, Abraham.

(1) To his Father, God: It is my Father that honoureth me. He derived from his Father all the honour he now claimed. He depended upon his Father for all the honour he further looked for. Christ and all that are his depend upon God for their honour; and he that is sure of honour where he is known cares not though he be slighted where he is in disguise.

First, He here takes occasion to show the reason of their incredulity, and this was their unacquaintedness with God; You say of him that he is your God, yet you have not known him. The profession they made of relation to God: "You say that he is your God." Many pretend to have an interest in God, and say that he is theirs, who yet have no just cause to say so. What will it avail us to say, He is our God, if we be not in sincerity his people. Their ignorance of him: Yet you have not known him. You know him not at all. Or, You know him not aright; and this is as bad as not knowing him at all, or worse. Men may be able to dispute subtly concerning God, and not know him. It is only the name of God which they have learned to talk of. They knew not God; and therefore perceived not the image of God, nor the voice of God in Christ. The reason why men receive not the gospel of Christ is because they have not the knowledge of God.

Secondly, He gives them the reason of his assurance that his Father would honour him and own him: But I know him; and again, I know him; which bespeaks his confidence in him. He professes his knowledge of his Father, with the greatest certainty: If I should say I know him not, I should be a liar like unto you. He would not deny his relation to God, to humour the Jews. If he should, he would be found a false witness against God and himself. He proves his knowledge of his Father: I know him and keep his sayings, or his word. He kept his Father's word, and his own word with the Father. Christ requires of us (v. 51) that we keep his sayings; and he has set before us a copy of obedience: he kept his Father's sayings; well might he who learned obedience teach it. Christ by this evinced that he knew the Father.

(2) Christ refers them to their father, and that was Abraham.

[1] Christ asserts Abraham's prospect of him, and respect to him: Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day, and he saw it, and was glad, v. 56. Two things he here speaks of as instances of that patriarch's respect to the promised Messiah:

First, The ambition he had to see his day: He rejoiced—he leaped at it. The word must here signify a transport of desire rather than of joy, for otherwise the latter part of the verse would be a tautology; he saw it, and was glad. The notices he had received of the Messiah to come had raised in him an expectation of something great, which he earnestly longed to know more of. Those who rightly know anything of Christ cannot but be earnestly desirous to know more of him. Those who discern the dawning of the light of the Sun of righteousness cannot but wish to see his rising. Abraham desired to see Christ's day, though it was at a great distance; but this degenerate seed of his discerned not his day, nor bade it welcome when it came.

Secondly, The satisfaction he had in what he did see of it: He saw it, and was glad.

a. How God gratified the pious desire of Abraham; he longed to see Christ's day, and he saw it. He saw something of it, more afterwards than he did at first. To him that desires and prays for more of the knowledge of Christ, God will give more. But how did Abraham see Christ's day? Some understand it of the sight he had of it in the other world. The longings of gracious souls after Jesus Christ will be fully satisfied when they come to heaven, and not till then. It is more commonly understood of some sight he had of Christ's day in this world. They that received not the promises, yet saw them afar off. There is room to conjecture that Abraham had some vision of Christ and his day, which is not recorded in his story.

b. How Abraham entertained these discoveries of Christ's day: He saw, and was glad. He was glad of what he saw of God's favour to himself, and glad of what he foresaw of the mercy God had in store

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

54-56. If I honour myself, my honour is nothing . . .—(See on ch. 5:31, etc.).

I shall be a liar like unto you—now rising to the summit of holy, naked severity, thereby to draw this long dialogue to a head.

56. Abraham rejoiced to see my day . . .—exulted, or exceedingly rejoiced that he should see, he exulted to see it, i.e., by anticipation. Nay, he saw it and was glad—he actually beheld it, to his joy. If this mean no more than that he had a prophetic foresight of the gospel-day—the second clause just repeating the first—how could the Jews understand our Lord to mean that He "had seen Abraham"? And if it mean that Abraham was then beholding, in his disembodied spirit, the incarnate Messiah [STIER, ALFORD, etc.], the words seem very unsuitable to express it. It expresses something past —"he saw My day, and was glad," i.e., surely while he lived. He seems to refer to the familiar intercourse which Abraham had with God, who is once and again in the history called "the Angel of the Lord," and whom Christ here identifies with Himself. On those occasions, Abraham "saw ME" [OLSHAUSEN, though he thinks the reference is to some unrecorded scene]. If this be the meaning, all that follows is quite natural.

ADAM CLARKE

54. Your God. Many MSS. and most of the versions read our instead of your. The variation is of very little consequence. They called God their God, while enemies to Him in both their spirit and conduct.

56. Abraham rejoiced to see my day. Or "he earnestly desired to see My day"; his soul "leaped" forward in earnest hope and strong expectation that he might see the incarnation of Jesus Christ. And he saw it. Not only in the first promise, Gen. iii. 15, for the other patriarchs saw this as well as he; and not only in that promise which was made particularly to himself, Gen. xii. 7; xxii. 18 (compared with Gal. iii. 16), that the Messiah should spring from his family. But he saw this day especially when Jehovah appeared to him in a human form, Gen. xviii. 2, 17, which many suppose to have been a manifestation of the Lord Jesus.

MATTHEW HENRY

for the world. A believing sight of Christ and his day will put gladness into the heart. No joy like the joy of faith; we are never acquainted with true pleasure till we are acquainted with Christ.

[2] The Jews cavil at this, and reproach him for it (v. 57): Thou art not yet fifty years old, and hast thou seen Abraham? They suppose it a very absurd thing for him to pretend to have seen Abraham, who was dead so many ages before he was born. Now this gave them occasion to despise his youth, as if he were but of yesterday, and knew nothing: Thou art not yet fifty years old.

[3] Our Saviour gives an effectual answer to this cavil, by a solemn assertion of his own seniority even to Abraham himself (v. 58): "Verily, verily, I say unto you; I say it to your faces, take it how you will: Before Abraham was, I am. Before Abraham was made or born, I am." The change of the word is observable, and bespeaks Abraham a creature, and himself the Creator. Before Abraham he was, as God. I am, is the name of God. He does not say, I was, but I am, for he is the first and the last. He was the appointed Messiah, long before Abraham.

[4] This great word ended the dispute abruptly: they could bear to hear no more from him, and he needed to say no more to them. Their inveterate prejudice against the holy spiritual doctrine and law of Christ, baffled all the methods of conviction. They were enraged at Christ for what he said: They took up stones to cast at him, v. 59. Perhaps they looked upon him as a blasphemer, and such were indeed to be stoned, but they must be first legally tried and convicted. Farewell justice and order if every man pretend to execute a law at his pleasure. Who would think that ever there should be such wickedness as this in men? Thus everyone has a stone to throw at his holy religion. He made his escape out of their hands. Jesus hid himself. Not that Christ was afraid or ashamed to stand by what he had said, but his hour was not yet come, and he would countenance the flight of his ministers and people in times of persecution. He departed, he went out of the temple, going through the midst of them, undiscovered, and so passed by. This was not a cowardly inglorious flight, nor such as argued either guilt or fear. It was an instance of his power over his enemies, and that they could do no more against him than he gave them leave to do. They now thought they had made sure of him and yet he passed through the midst of them, and thus he left them to fume. It was an instance of his prudent provision for his own safety. Thus he gave an example to his own rule, When they persecute you in one city flee to another. It was a righteous deserting of those who stoned him from among them. Christ will not long stay with those who bid him be gone. Christ now went through the midst of the Jews, and none of them courted his stay, nor stirred up himself to take hold of him, but were even content to let him go. God never forsakes any till they have first provoked him to withdraw, and will have none of him. When Christ left them it is said that he passed by silently and unobserved; so that they were not aware of him. Christ's departures from a church, or a particular soul, are often secret. As the kingdom of God comes not, so it goes not, with observation. Thus it was with these forsaken Jews, God left them, and they never missed him.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

57-59. Then said the Jews unto him, Thou art not yet fifty years old—"No inference can be drawn from this as to the age of our Lord at the time as man. Fifty years was with the Jews the completion of manhood" [ALFORD]. and hast thou seen Abraham?—He had said Abraham saw Him, as being his peculiar privilege. They give the opposite turn to it—"Hast Thou seen Abraham?" as an honor too great for Him to pretend to. 58. Before Abraham was, I am—The words rendered "was" and "am" are quite different. The one clause means, 'Abraham was brought into being'; the other, 'I exist.' The statement therefore is not that Christ came into existence before Abraham did (as Arians affirm is the meaning), but that He never came into being at all, but existed before Abraham had a being; in other words, existed before creation, or eternally (as ch. 1:1).

In that sense the Jews plainly understood Him, since "then took they up stones to cast at Him," just as they had before done when they saw that He made Himself equal with God (ch. 5:18). hid himself—(See on Luke 4:30).

ALBERT BARNES:

57. "Fifty years old." Jesus is supposed to have been at this time about thirty-three. It is remarkable that when he was so young they should have mentioned the number fifty, but they probably designed to prevent the possibility of a reply. Had they said forty they might have apprehended a reply, or could not be so certain that they were correct. "Hast thou seen Abraham?" It is remarkable, also, that they perverted his words. His affirmation was not that he had seen Abraham, but that Abraham had seen his day. The design of Jesus was to show that he was greater than Abraham (v. 53). To do this, he says that Abraham, great as he was, earnestly desired to see his time, thus acknowledging his inferiority to the Messiah. The Jews perverted this, and affirmed that it was impossible that he and Abraham should have seen each other.—Popular Commentary

59. Then took they up stones. It appears that the Jews understood Him as asserting His Godhead; and, supposing Him to be a blasphemer, they proceeded to stone Him, according to the law, Lev. xxiv. 16. But Jesus hid himself. In all probability He rendered himself invisible—though some will have it that He conveyed himself away from those Jews who were His enemies, by mixing himself with the many who believed on Him (vv. 30-31) and who, we may suppose, favored His escape. Going through the midst of them, and so passed by. These words are wanting in the Codex Bezae, and in several editions and versions. Erasmus, Grotius, Beza, Pearce, and Griesbach think them not genuine.

A. T. ROBERTSON:

59. "They took up stones therefore" (eran oun lithous). First aorist active indicative of airo, inferential use of oun. The time for argument had past. "To cast at him" (hina balosin ep auton). Final clause with hina and the second aorist active subjunctive of ballo. Vivid picture of a mob ready to kill Jesus, already beginning to do so. "Hid himself" (ekrube). Second aorist passive indicative of krupto. He was hidden. No Docetic vanishing, but quietly and boldly Jesus went out of the temple. His hour had not yet come. Once again three months later the Pharisees will try to kill him, but he will pass out of their hands (10:39).—Word Pictures in the New Testament

CHAPTER 9

Verses 1–7

I. The notice which our Lord Jesus took of the piteous case of this poor blind man (v. 1): As Jesus passed by he saw a man which was blind from his birth. Though the Jews had so basely abused him, yet he did not miss any opportunity of doing good among them. The cure of this blind man was a kindness to the public, enabling him to work for his living who before was a charge and burden to the neighbourhood. It is noble, and generous, and Christ-like, to be willing to serve the public. Though he was in his flight from a threatening danger, and escaping for his life, yet he willingly halted and stayed awhile to show mercy to this poor man. We make more haste than good speed when we out-run opportunities of doing good. Christ took this poor blind man in his way, and cured him as he passed by. Thus should we take occasions of doing good, even as we pass by, wherever we are. The condition of this poor man was very sad. He was blind, and had been so from his birth. He that is blind has no enjoyment of the light, but he that is born blind has no idea of it. Methinks such a one would give a great deal to have his curiosity satisfied with but one day's sight of light and colours,

CHAPTER 9

Vss. 1-41. THE OPENING OF THE EYES OF ONE BORN BLIND, AND WHAT FOLLOWED ON IT. 1-5. as Jesus passed by, he saw a man which was blind from birth—and who "sat begging" (vs. 8).

CHAPTER 9

1. And as Jesus passed by. This chapter is a continuation of the preceding, and therefore the word Jesus is not in the Greek text; it begins simply thus—"And passing along." Having left the Temple, where the Jews were going to stone Him (chap. viii. 59), it is probable our Lord went, according to His custom, to the Mount of Olives. The next day, which was the Sabbath, v. 14, He met a man who had been born blind, sitting in some public place, and asking alms from those who passed by, v. 8.

MATTHEW HENRY

shapes and figures, though he were never to see them more. Let us bless God that it was not our case. The eye is one of the most curious parts of the body, its structure exceedingly nice and fine. What a mercy is it that there was no miscarriage in the making of ours! Christ cured many that were blind by disease or accident, but here he cured one that was born blind; that he might give an instance of his power to help in the most desperate cases. That he might give a specimen of the work of his grace, upon the souls of sinners, which gives sight to those that were by nature blind. The compassions of our Lord Jesus towards him were very tender. He saw him; and looked upon him with concern. Others saw him, but not as he did. Christ is often found of those that seek him not, nor see him.

II. The discourse between Christ and his disciples concerning this man.

1. The question which the disciples put to their Master, v. 2. When Christ looked upon him, they had an eye to him too; Christ's compassion should kindle ours. But they did not move Christ to heal him. Instead of this, they started a very odd question concerning him: Rabbi, who sinned, this man or his parents, that he was born blind? Now this question of theirs was,

(1) Uncharitably censorious. They take it for granted that this extraordinary calamity was the punishment of some uncommon wickedness. The greatest sufferers are not therefore to be looked upon as the greatest sinners. The grace of repentance calls our own afflictions punishments, but the grace of charity calls the afflictions of others trials.

(2) It was unnecessarily curious. They ask, Who were the criminals, this man or his parents? And what was this to them? Or what good would it do them to know it? We are apt to be more inquisitive concerning other people's sins than concerning our own. To judge ourselves is our duty, but to judge our brother is our sin. They enquire, [1] Whether this man was punished thus for some sin of his own, either committed or foreseen before his birth. The Pharisees seem to have had the same opinion of his case when they said, Thou wast altogether born in sin (v. 34). Or, [2] Whether he was punished for the wickedness of his parents, which God sometimes visits upon the children. It is a good reason why parents should take heed of sin, lest their children smart for it when they are gone. Being at a loss what construction to put upon this providence, they desire to be informed. The equity of God's dispensations is always certain, but not always to be accounted for, for his judgments are a great deep.

2. Christ's answer to this question.

(1) He gives the reason of this poor man's blindness: "Neither has this man sinned nor his parents, but he was born blind, that now at last the works of God should be made manifest in him," v. 3. Here Christ told them two things concerning such uncommon calamities: That they are not always inflicted as punishments of sin. Many are made much more miserable than others in this life who are not at all more sinful. It was not any uncommon guilt that God had an eye to in inflicting this upon him. Misfortunes are sometimes intended purely for the glory of God, and the manifesting of his works. If God be glorified, either by us or in us, we were not made in vain. This man was born blind, that the works of God might be manifest in him. First, That the attributes of God might be made manifest in him, especially that his extraordinary power and goodness might be manifested in curing him. The difficulties of providence, otherwise unaccountable, may be resolved into this—God intends in them to show himself. Those who regard him not in the ordinary course of things are sometimes alarmed by things extraordinary. Secondly, That the counsels of God might be manifested in him. He was born blind that our Lord Jesus might prove himself sent of God to be the true light to the world. It was now a great while since this man was born blind, and yet it never appeared till now why he was so. The sentences in the book of providence are sometimes long, and you must read a great way before you can apprehend the sense of them.

(2) He gives the reason of his own forwardness and readiness to help and heal him, v. 4, 5. I must work the works of him that sent me while it is day; the night cometh, when no man can work. It was the sabbath day, on which works of necessity might be done, and he proves this to be a work of necessity.

[1] It was his Father's will: I must work the works of him that sent me. Whom God sends he employs, for he sends none to be idle. He was a worker together with God. He was pleased to lay himself under the strongest obligations to do the business he was sent about: I must work. Christ laid out himself with

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

"As Jesus passed by," says the story, "he saw a man which was blind from his birth." He fixes His eye upon him. No cry from the blind man's lips draws Him. He sits there unconscious of the kind eyes that were fastened upon him. The disciples stand at Christ's side and have no share in His feelings. They ask Him to do nothing. To them the blind man is—what? A theological problem. No trace of pity touches their hearts. They do not even seem to have reckoned upon or expected Christ's miraculous intervention. And that is a very remarkable feature in the Gospels. At all events, they evidently do not expect it here; but all that the sight of this lifelong sufferer does in them is to raise a question, "Who did sin; he or his parents?" Perhaps they do not quite see to the bottom of the alternative that they are suggesting; and we need not trouble ourselves to ask whether there was a full-blown notion of the preexistence of the man's soul in their minds as they ask the question. Perhaps they remembered the impotent man to whom our Lord said, "Go and sin no more lest a worse thing come unto thee." And they may have thought that they had His sanction to the doctrine—as old as Job's friends—that wherever there was great suffering there must first have been great sin.
—Expositions of Holy Scripture

2. who did sin, this man or his parents, that he was born blind—not in a former state of existence, in which, as respects the wicked, the Jews did not believe; but, perhaps, expressing loosely that sin somewhere had surely been the cause of this calamity.

3. Neither . . . this man . . .—The cause was neither in himself nor his parents, but, in order to the manifestation of "the works of God," in his cure.

4. I must work the works of him that sent me . . .—a most interesting statement from the mouth of Christ; intimating, (1) that He had a precise work to do upon earth, with every particular of it arranged and laid out to Him; (2) that all He did upon earth was just "the works of God"—particularly "going about doing good," though not exclusively by miracles; (3) that each work had its precise time and place in His programme of instructions, so to speak; hence, (4) that as His period for work had definite termina-

2. Who did sin, this man, or his parents? The doctrine of the transmigration of souls appears to have been an article in the creed of the Pharisees, and it was pretty general among both the Greeks and the Asiatics. The Pythagoreans believed the souls of men were sent into other bodies for the punishment of some sin which they had committed in a preexistent state. This seems to have been the foundation of the disciples' question to our Lord.

3. Neither hath this man sinned, nor his parents. That is, the blindness of this person is not occasioned by any sin of his own, nor of his parents; but has happened in the ordinary course of divine providence, and shall now become the instrument of salvation to his soul, edification to others, and glory to God. Many of the Jews thought that marks on the body were proofs of sin in the soul.

4. While it is day. Though I plainly perceive that the cure of this man will draw down upon Me the malice of the Jewish rulers, yet I must accomplish the work for which I came into the world while it is day—while the term of this life of Mine shall last. It was about six months after this that our Lord was crucified. It is very likely that the day was now declining and night coming on, and He took occasion from this circumstance to introduce the elegant metaphor immediately following. By this we are taught the utmost vigour and industry in his work. He worked the works he had to do. It is not enough to look at our work, and talk over it, but we must work it.

[2] Now was his opportunity. I must work while it is day, while the light lasts which is given to work by. Christ himself had his day. All the work he had to do in his own person here on earth was to be done before his death; the time of his living in this world is the day here spoken of. The time of our life is our day. Day-time is the proper season for work; during the day of life we must be busy, not waste day-time, nor play by daylight; it will be time enough to rest when our day is done.

[3] The period of his opportunity was at hand, and therefore he would be busy: The night comes when no man can work. It will come certainly, may come suddenly, is coming nearer and nearer. We cannot compute how nigh our sun is, it may go down at noon: nor can we promise ourselves a twilight between the day of life and the night of death. When the night comes we cannot work. When night comes, call the labourers; we must then show our work, and receive according to the things done. It is too late to bid when the inch of candle is dropped.

[4] His business in the world was to enlighten it (v. 5): As long as I am in the world, I am the light of the world. He had said this before, ch. viii. 12. Christ would cure this blind man, the representative of a blind world, because he came to be the light of the world, not only to give light, but to give sight. Now this gives us a great encouragement to come to him. Which way should we turn our eyes, but to the light? We partake of the sun's light, and so we may of Christ's grace, without money and without price. A good example of usefulness in the world. What Christ saith of himself, he saith of his disciples: You are lights in the world, and, if so, Let your light shine. What were candles made for but to burn?

III. The manner of the cure of the blind man, v. 6, 7. The circumstances of the miracle are singular, and no doubt significant. When he had thus spoken he addressed himself to the opening of the blind man's eyes. He did not defer it till the sabbath was past, when it would give less offence. What good we have opportunity of doing we should do quickly; he that will never do a good work till there is nothing to be objected against it will leave many a good work for ever undone.

1. The preparation of the eye-salve. Christ spat on the ground, and made clay of the spittle. He made clay of his own spittle, because there was no water near; and he would teach us to be willing to take up with that which is next hand, if it will but serve the turn. Why should we go about for that which may as well be had and done a nearer way?

2. The application of it to the place: He anointed the eyes of the blind man with the clay. Like a tender physician; he did it himself with his own hand, though the patient was a beggar. Daubing clay on the eyes would close them up, but never open them. The power of God often works by contraries. The design of the gospel is to open men's eyes. Now the eye-salve that does the work is of Christ's preparing. We must come to Christ for the eye-salve. He only is able, and he only is appointed, to make it up. The means used in this work are very weak, and unlikely, and are made effectual only by the power of Christ. And the method Christ takes is first to make men feel themselves blind, and then to give them sight.

3. The directions given to the patient, v. 7. His physician said to him, Go, wash in the pool of Siloam. Christ would hereby try his obedience, and whether he would with an implicit faith obey the orders of one he was so much a stranger to. He would likewise try how he stood affected to the tradition of the elders, which taught that it was not lawful to wash the eyes on the sabbath day. He would hereby represent the method of spiritual healing, in which, though the effect is owing purely to his power and grace, there is duty to be done by us. Go, search the scriptures, attend upon the ministry, converse with the wise; this is like washing in the pool of Siloam. Promised graces must be expected in the way of instituted ordinances. Concerning the pool of Siloam observe that it was supplied with water from Mount Zion, living waters, which were healing. The evangelist takes notice of the signification of the name, its being interpreted sent. Christ is often called the sent of God, so that when Christ sent him to the pool of Siloam he did in effect send him to himself. Go, wash in the fountain opened, a fountain of life, not a pool.

4. The patient's obedience to these directions: He went his way therefore, and he washed his eyes. In confidence of Christ's power, as well as in obedience to his command, he went, and washed.

5. The cure effected: He came seeing. So when the tion, so by letting any one service pass by its alotted time, the whole would be disarranged, marred, and driven beyond its destined period for completion; (5) that He acted ever under the impulse of these considerations, as man—"the night cometh when no man [or no one] can work." What lessons are here for others, and what encouragement from such Example!

5. As long as I am in the world, I am the light of the world—not as if He would cease, after that, to be so; but that He must make full proof of His fidelity while His earthly career lasted by displaying His glory. "As before the raising of Lazarus (ch. 11:25), He announces Himself as the Resurrection and the Life, so now He sets Himself forth as the source of the archetypal spiritual light, of which the natural, now about to be conferred, is only a derivation and symbol" [ALFORD].

6, 7. he spat on the ground, and made clay ... and he anointed the eyes of the blind man ...—These operations were not so incongruous in their nature as might appear, though it were absurd to imagine that they contributed in the least degree to the effect which followed. (See on Mark 6:13; and 7:33, 34).

7. Go, wash in Siloam which is ..., Sent ...—(See II Kings 5:10, 14). As the prescribed action was purely symbolical in its design, so in connection with it the Evangelist notices the symbolical name of the pool as in this case bearing testimony to him who was sent to do what it only symbolized. (See Isa. 8:6, where this same pool is used figuratively to denote "the streams that make glad the city of God," and which, humble though they be, betoken a present God of Israel.) that no opportunity for doing good should be omitted—day representing the opportunity: night, the loss of that opportunity.

5. I am the light of the world. Like the sun, it is My business to dispense light and heat everywhere, and to neglect no opportunity that may offer to enlighten and save the bodies and souls of men. See chap. viii. 12.

6. Anointed the eyes of the blind man. It would be difficult to find out the reason which induced our Lord to act thus. It is certain this procedure can never be supposed to have been any likely medical means to restore sight to a man who was born blind; this action, therefore, had no tendency to assist the miracle. The Jews believed that there was some virtue in spittle to cure the diseases of the eye, but then they always accompanied this with some charm. Perhaps the best lesson we can learn from this is that God will do His own work in His own way; and, to hide pride from man, will often accomplish the most beneficial ends by means not only simple or despicable in themselves, but by such also as appear entirely contrary, in their nature and operation, to the end proposed to be effected by them.

7. By interpretation, Sent. From the Hebrew shalach, "he sent"; either because it was looked upon as a gift sent from God, for the use of the city, or because its waters were directed or sent by canals or pipes, into different quarters, for the same purpose.

MATTHEW HENRY

pangs and struggles of the new birth are over, the bands of sin fly off with them, and a glorious light and liberty succeed. Such is the power of Christ. What cannot he do who could do this, and do it thus? This man let Christ do what he pleased, and did what he appointed him to do, and so was cured. Those that would be healed by Christ must be ruled by him. He came back from the pool wondering and wondered at; he came seeing. This represents the benefit gracious souls find in attending on instituted ordinances, according to Christ's appointment; they have gone trembling, and come away triumphing; have gone blind, and come away seeing, come away singing.

Verses 8–12

Such a wonderful event as the giving of sight to a man born blind could not but be the talk of the town. Here we are told what the neighbours said of it, for the confirmation of the matter of fact. That which at first was not believed without scrutiny may afterwards be admitted without scruple.

I. Whether this was the same man that had before been blind, v. 8.

1. The neighbours could not but be amazed when they saw that he had his eyesight, and they said, Is not this he that sat and begged? When he could not labour, his parents not being able to maintain him, he begged. Those who cannot otherwise subsist must not be ashamed to beg; let no man be ashamed of anything but sin. There are some common beggars that are objects of charity, that should be distinguished; and we must not let the bees starve for the sake of the drones or wasps that are among them. The truth of the miracle was the better attested, and there were more to witness against those infidel Jews who would not believe that he had been blind than if he had been maintained in his father's house. Note, Christ's condescension. When it was for the advantage of his miracles that they should be wrought on those that were remarkable, he pitched upon those that were made so by their poverty and misery, not by their dignity.

2. Some said, This is he, the very same man; and these are witnesses to the truth of the miracle, for they had long known him stone-blind. Others said, He is not he, but is like him, and so, by their confession, if it be he, it is a great miracle that is wrought upon him. Think, [1] Of the wisdom and power of Providence in ordering such a universal variety of the faces of men and women, so that no two are so alike but that they may be distinguished, which is necessary to society, and commerce, and the administration of justice. [2] Of the wonderful change which the converting grace of God makes upon some who before were very wicked and vile, but are thereby so universally and visibly altered that one would not take them to be the same person.

3. This controversy was soon decided by the man himself: He said, I am he, "I am he that was blind, but now see, and am a monument of the mercy and grace of God." Those who are savingly enlightened by the grace of God should be ready to own what they were before.

II. How he came to have his eyes opened, v. 10–12. They will now turn aside, and see this great sight, and enquire further concerning it. Two things these neighbours enquire after:

1. The manner of the cure: How were thine eyes opened? It is good to observe the way and method of God's works, and they will appear the more wonderful. In answer to this enquiry the poor man gives them a plain and full account of the matter: A man that is called Jesus made clay—and I received sight, v. 11. Those who have experienced God's power and goodness, in temporal or spiritual things, should be ready upon all occasions to communicate their experiences. It is a debt we owe to our benefactor, and to our brethren. God's favours are lost upon us, when they are lost with us, and go no further.

2. The author of it (v. 12): Where is he? Some perhaps asked this question out of curiosity. "Where is he, that we may see him?" Others, perhaps, asked out of ill-will. "Where is he, that we may seize him?" The unthinking crowd will have ill thoughts of those that are put into an ill name. Some, we hope, asked this question out of goodwill. "Where is he, that we may be acquainted with him?" In answer to this, he could say nothing: I know not. As soon as Christ had sent him to the pool of Siloam, it should seem, he withdrew immediately. The man had never seen Jesus, for by the time that he had gained his sight he had lost his Physician. None of all the new and surprising objects that presented themselves could be so grateful to him as one sight of Christ, but as yet he knew no more of him than that he was called Jesus—a Saviour. Thus in the work of grace

8-15. The neighbours therefore . . . said, Is not this he that sat and begged—Here are a number of details to identify the newly seeing with the long-known blind beggar.

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

In this man's healing, and in the salvation of every chosen soul, we shall see The Great Healer Conspicuous. If anyone among us shall ever be saved, the Savior will be made great thereby. If we are pardoned, we shall not be honored by the forgiveness, but the royal hand which signed and sealed the pardon shall be greatly extolled. If our eyes are opened, we shall not be made famous for sight, but He that opened our eyes will be made illustrious by the cure. It was thus in this case, and rightly so.

To begin with, in this man's mind, as soon as ever he received sight, "a man that was named Jesus" came to the forefront. Jesus was to him the most important person in existence. All that he knew of Him at first was that He was a man named Jesus; and under that character Jesus filled the whole horizon of his vision. He was more to him than those learned Pharisees, or than all his neighbors put together. Jesus was exceeding great, for He had opened his eyes. By and by, fixing his mind upon that figure, he saw more in it and declared, "He is a prophet." He boldly said this when he was running great risks by doing so. To their faces he told the carping Pharisees, "He is a prophet." A little further on he came to this, that he believed Him to be the Son of God, and worshiped Him. Now, my dear friend, if you are saved by Jesus, your star must set, but the star of Jesus must rise and increase in brilliance till it becomes no more a star, but a sun, making your day and flooding your whole soul with light. If we are saved, Christ Jesus must and will have the glory of it. None on earth or in heaven can rival Jesus in the esteem of souls brought from darkness to light: He is everybody to them. Do you dislike this? Do you want a share of the spoils, a fragment of the glory? Go your way and be blind, for your condition can never be altered while you refuse to honor the Savior. He that openeth a man's eyes deserves his grateful praises evermore.—The Treasury of the New Testament

F. B. MEYER:

Jesus opens blind eyes. At the close of the previous chapter our Lord bore the contradiction of sinners against himself. The Jews had caught up the stones gathered to repair the temple, in order to inflict the doom of the blasphemer; but Jesus passed through them unscathed and began to descend the great steps.To human gaze there was need for Jesus to hasten from his foes (8:59); in his thought there was greater need to heal this blind beggar. In the most leisurely manner, therefore, he made clay and wrought this miracle of sight. His heart was at rest in God. No great thing is wrought by those who live in perpetual ferment. Through the quiet heart God works his own works, and there will be time enough to get them all done before "the night cometh, when no man can work."

Our Lord perceived that beneath the unpromising exterior of this man were elements of nobility, which he set himself to elicit. The clay which the man found suddenly applied to his eyes awakened wonder, hope, expectation, and faith. It was a ladder by which he climbed from the pit of despair to the mount of joy. The walk to Siloam was a further venture of faith; but there were other steps to be taken before he attained to the full stature of his discipleship. Some were forced on him by opposition; to others he was led by Christ himself.—Bible Commentary

8. That he was blind. Instead of this, "when he begged," or "was a beggar," is the reading of many MSS. This is in all probability the true reading.

9. Some said, This is he. This miracle was not wrought in private—nor before a few persons—nor was it lightly credited. Those who knew him before were divided in their opinion concerning him—not whether the man who sat there begging was blind before, for this was known to all; nor whether the person now before them saw clearly, for this was now notorious; but whether this was the person who was born blind, and who used to sit begging in a particular place. Others said, He is like him. This was very natural, for certainly the restoration of his sight must have given him a very different appearance to what he had before.

11. A man that is called Jesus. The whole of this relation is simple and artless in the highest degree. The blind man had never seen Jesus, but he had heard of His name—he felt that He had put something on his eyes, which he afterwards found to be clay—but how this was made he could not tell, because he could not see Jesus when He did it. Therefore he does not say, "He made clay of spittle"—but simply, "He made clay, and spread it upon my eyes."

12. Where is he? They had designed to seize and deliver Him up to the Sanhedrin, as a violator of the law, because He had done this on the Sabbath day.

MATTHEW HENRY

wrought upon the soul we see the change, but see not the hand that makes it.

Verses 13–34

One would have expected that such a miracle as Christ wrought upon the blind man would have silenced and shamed all opposition, but it had the contrary effect; instead of being embraced as a prophet for it, he is prosecuted as a criminal.

I. They brought to the Pharisees him that aforetime was blind, v. 13. Some think that those who brought this man to the Pharisees did it with a good design, to show them that this Jesus was not what they represented him, but one that gave considerable proofs of a divine mission. It should seem, rather, that they did it with an ill design.

II. That which is good was never maligned but under the imputation of something evil. And the crime objected here (v. 14) was that it was the sabbath day when Jesus made the clay, and opened his eyes. The traditions of the Jews had made that to be a violation of the law of the sabbath which was far from being so. But it may be asked, "Why would Christ not only work miracles on the sabbath day, but work them in such a manner as he knew would give offence to the Jews? Could he not have cured this blind man without making clay?" He would not seem to yield to the usurped power of the scribes and Pharisees. Christ was made under the law of God, but not under their law. He did it that he might, both by word and action, expound the law of the fourth commandment. Works of necessity and mercy are allowed, and the sabbath-rest to be kept, not so much for its own sake as in order to the sabbath-work.

III. The trial and examination of this matter by the Pharisees, v. 15. So much passion, prejudice, and ill-humour, and so little reason, appear here, that the discourse is nothing but crossing questions. Their enmity to Christ had divested them of all manner of humanity, and divinity too. Let us see how they teased this man.

1. They interrogated him concerning the cure itself. They did not believe that he was born blind. This was not a prudent caution, but a prejudiced infidelity. However, it was a good way that they took for the clearing of this: They called the parents of the man who had received his sight. This they did in hopes to disprove the miracle. God so ordered and overruled this counsel of theirs that it turned to the more effectual proof of the miracle, and left them under a necessity of being either convinced or confounded. Now in this part of the examination we have the questions that were put to them (v. 19): They asked them, "Is this your son? Do you say he was born blind? How then doth he now see? That is impossible, and therefore you had better unsay it." Those who cannot bear the light of truth do all they can to eclipse it, and hinder the discovery of it. Their answers to these interrogatories. They fully attest that which they could safely say in this matter (v. 20): We know that this is our son, and we know that he was born blind. It had cost them many a sad thought, and many a careful troublesome hour, about him. Those who are ashamed of their children because of their bodily infirmities, may take a reproof from these parents, who freely owned, This is our son, though he was born blind. They cautiously decline giving any evidence concerning his cure. They were not themselves eye-witnesses of it, and could say nothing to it of their own knowledge. Observe how warily they express themselves (v. 21): "By what means he now seeth we know not, or who has opened his eyes we know not." Now these parents of the blind man were bound in gratitude to have borne their testimony to the honour of the Lord Jesus, who had done their son so great a kindness; but they had not courage to do it, and then thought it might serve to atone for their not appearing in favour of him that they said nothing to his prejudice. They refer themselves and the court to him: He is of age, ask him, he shall speak for himself. This man, though he was born blind, seems to have been of quick understanding above many. Thus God often by a kind providence makes up in the mind what is wanting in the body. His parents' turning them over to him was only to save themselves from trouble. See the reason why they were so cautious (v. 22, 23): Because they feared the Jews. Because they would shift trouble off from themselves. Near is my friend, and near is my child, and perhaps near is my religion, but nearer is myself. Note,

(1) The late law which the sanhedrim had made. If any man within their jurisdiction did confess that Jesus was Christ, he should be put out of the synagogue. [1] The crime designed to be punished, and that was embracing Jesus of Nazareth as the promised Messiah,

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

13. They brought to the Pharisees –sitting probably in council, and chiefly of that sect (ch. 7:47, 48).

18-23. the Jews did not believe . . . he had been born blind . . . till they called the parents of him that had received his sight–Foiled by the testimony of the young man himself, they hope to throw doubt on the fact by close questioning his parents, who, perceiving the snare laid for them, ingeniously escape it by testifying simply to the identity of their son, and his birth-blindness, leaving it to himself, as a competent witness, to speak as to the cure. They prevaricated, however, in saying they "knew not who had opened his eyes," for "they feared the Jews," who had come to an understanding (probably after what is recorded (ch. 7:50, etc.) but by this time well known), that whoever owned Him as the Christ would be put out of the synagogue–i.e., not simply excluded, but excommunicated.

ADAM CLARKE

13. They brought to the Pharisees. These had the chief rule, and determined all controversies among the people; in every case of religion, their judgment was final. The people, now fully convinced that the man had been cured, brought him to the Pharisees, that they might determine how this was done and whether it had been done legally.

14. It was the sabbath. Some of the ancient rabbins taught, and they have been followed by some moderns not much better skilled in physic than themselves, that the saliva is a cure for several disorders of the eyes; but the former held this to be contrary to the law if applied on the Sabbath.

18. But the Jews did not believe. All the subterfuge they could use was simply to sin against their conscience, by asserting that the man had not been blind. But out of this subterfuge they were soon driven by the testimony of the parents, who, if tried further on this subject, might have produced as witness, not only the whole neighborhood, but nearly the whole city; for it appears the man got his bread by publicly begging, v. 8.

21. He is of age. Literally, "he has stature," i.e., he is a full-grown man; and in this sense the phrase is used by the best Greek writers. Mature age was fixed among the Jews at thirty years.

22. Put out of the synagogue. That is, "excommunicated"—separated from all religious connection with those who worshipped God. This was the lesser kind of excommunication among the Jews and was against the followers of Christ till after the Resurrection.

MATTHEW HENRY

and confessing of him. They themselves did expect a Messiah, but they could by no means bear to think that this Jesus should be he. First, Because his precepts were all so contrary to their traditional laws. The spiritual worship he prescribed overthrew their formalities. Humility and mortification, repentance and self-denial, were lessons new to them and sounded harsh and strange in their ears. Secondly, Because his promises and appearances were so contrary to their traditional hopes. Now to hear of a Messiah whose outward circumstances were all mean and poor, and at the same time bade his followers expect the cross, and count upon persecution; this was such a disappointment to all their hopes, that they could never be reconciled to it. Right or wrong, it must be crushed.

[2] The penalty to be inflicted for this crime. If any should own himself a disciple of Jesus, he should therefore be put out of the synagogue, as one that had rendered himself unworthy of the honours, and incapable of the privileges, of their church. Nor was this merely an ecclesiastical censure. It was, in effect, an outlawry. Christ's holy religion, from its first rise, has been opposed by penal laws made against the professors of it. The church's artillery, when the command of it has fallen into ill hands, has often been turned against itself. It is no new thing to see those cast out of the synagogue that were the greatest ornaments and blessings of it. They had already agreed it. Thus early were they aware of his growing interest, and already agreed to do their utmost to suppress it.

(2) The influence which this law had upon the parents of the blind man. They declined saying anything of Christ, because they feared the Jews. Christ had incurred the frowns of the government to do their son a kindness, but they would not incur them to do him any honour. Let us now go on with the examination of the man himself.

(3) They enquired of him concerning the manner of the cure, v. 15, 16.

[1] The same question which his neighbours had put to him now again the Pharisees asked him, how he had received his sight. This they enquired not with any sincere desire to find out the truth, but with a desire to find an occasion against Christ.

[2] The same answer, in effect, which he had before given to his neighbours, he here repeats to the Pharisees: He put clay upon mine eyes, and I washed, and do see. In the former account he said, I washed, and received sight; but lest they should think it was only a glimpse, he now says, "I do see; it is a complete and lasting cure."

[3] The remarks made upon this story were very different, and occasioned a debate in the court, v. 16.

First, Some took this occasion to censure and condemn Christ. Some of the Pharisees said, This man is not of God, because he keepeth not the sabbath day. The doctrine upon which this censure is grounded is very true—that those are not of God who do not keep the sabbath day. Those that are of God will keep the commandments of God; and this is his commandment, that we sanctify the sabbath. The application of it to our Saviour is very unjust, for he did religiously observe the sabbath day, never did otherwise than well on the sabbath day. He did not keep the sabbath according to the tradition of the elders, but he kept it according to the command of God. Much unrighteousness and uncharitable judging is occasioned by men's making the rules of religion more strict than God has made them, and adding their own fancies to God's appointments. Everything that we take for a rule of practice must not presently be made a rule of judgment.

Secondly, Others spoke in his favour, and very pertinently urged, How can a man that is a sinner do such miracles? There were some that were witnesses for Christ, even in the midst of his enemies. The matter of fact was plain, that this was a true miracle. Such things as these could never be done by a man that is a sinner. Such a one may indeed show some signs and lying wonders, but not such signs and true wonders as Christ wrought. Thus there was a division among them. Thus God defeats the counsels of his enemies by dividing them.

2. Their enquiry concerning the author of it.

(1) What the man said of him. They ask him (v. 17), "What sayest thou of him, seeing that he has opened thine eyes?" If he should speak slightly of Christ, in answer to this, as he might be tempted to do, to please them, they would have triumphed in it. Nothing confirms Christ's enemies in their enmity to him so much as the slights put upon him by those that have passed for his friends. But if he should speak honourably of Christ, they would prosecute him. They would make him an example. Or perhaps

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

16, 17. This man is not of God ...—(See on ch. 5:9, 16).

ADAM CLARKE

16. This man is not of God. He can neither be the Messiah nor a prophet, for He has broken the Sabbath. The Jews always argued falsely on this principle. The law relative to the observation of the Sabbath never forbade any work but what was of the servile and unnecessary kind. Works of necessity and mercy never could be forbidden on that day by Him whose name is Mercy, and whose nature is love; for the Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath. Were it otherwise, the Sabbath would be rather a curse than a blessing.

How can a man that is a sinner? They knew very well that, though magicians and impostors might do things apparently miraculous, yet nothing really good could be performed by them. And there was a division among them. Schisma, "a schism," a decided difference of opinion, which caused a separation of the assembly.

ALBERT BARNES:

"If any man did confess that he was Christ." Did acknowledge that he was "the Messiah." They had prejudged the case, and were determined to put down all free inquiry, and not to be convinced by any means. "Put out of the synagogue." This took place in the temple, or near the temple. It does not refer, therefore, to any immediate and violent putting forth from the place where they were. It refers to excommunication from the synagogue. Among the Jews there were two grades of excommunication; the one for lighter offenses, of which they mentioned twenty-four causes; the other for greater offenses. The first excluded a man for thirty days from the privilege of entering a synagogue, and from coming nearer to his wife or friends than four cubits. The other was a solemn exclusion forever from the worship of the synagogue, attended with awful maledictions and curses, and an exclusion from all intercourse with the people. This was called "the curse," and so thoroughly excluded the person from all communion whatever with his countrymen, that they were not allowed to sell to him anything, even the necessaries of life (Buxtorf). It is probable that this latter punishment was what they intended to inflict if anyone should confess that Jesus was the Messiah; and it was the fear of this terrible punishment that deterred his parents from expressing their opinion.
—Popular Commentary

MATTHEW HENRY

Christ's friends proposed to have the man's own sentiments concerning his physician, since he appeared to be a sensible man. Those whose eyes Christ has opened know best what to say of him. What think we of Christ? To this question the poor man makes a short, plain, and direct answer: He is a prophet. It should seem, this man had not any thoughts that Christ was the Messiah, the great prophet. This blind man thought well of Christ according to the light he had, though he did not think well enough of him. This poor blind beggar had a clearer judgment of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God than the masters in Israel.

(2) What they said of him, in reply to the man's testimony. Finding that indeed a notable miracle was wrought, and they could not deny it, they do all they can to shake the good opinion the man had of him that opened his eyes, and to convince him that Christ was a bad man (v. 24): Give God the praise, we know that this man is a sinner. Two ways this is understood: By way of advice, to take heed of ascribing the praise of his cure to a sinful man, but to give it all to God. When God makes use of men that are sinners as instruments of good to us, we must give God the glory, and yet there is gratitude owing to the instruments. It was a good word, Give God the praise, but here it was ill used. By way of adjuration; "We know that this man is a sinner; this we are sure of, therefore give God praise. In God's name, man, tell the truth." See how basely they speak of the Lord Jesus: We know that this man is a sinner, is a man of sin. Their insolence and pride. They know very well that he is a sinner, and nobody can convince them of the contrary. He had challenged them to their faces (ch. viii. 46) to convince him of sin, and they had nothing to say; but now behind his back they speak of him as a malefactor. Thus false accusers make up in confidence what is wanting in proof. The injury and indignity hereby done to the Lord Jesus. When he became man, he took upon him the form not only of a servant, but of a sinner. Being made sin for us, he despised even this shame.

3. The debate that arose between the Pharisees and this poor man concerning Christ. They say, He is a sinner; he says, He is a prophet. It is an encouragement to those who are called out to witness for Christ to find with what prudence and courage this man managed his defence, according to the promise, It shall be given you in that same hour what you shall speak. Now in the parley we may observe three steps:

(1) He sticks to the certain matter of fact the evidence of which they endeavour to shake. He adheres to that which to himself, at least, was past dispute (v. 25): "Whether he be a sinner or no I know not," or, as it might better be rendered, "If he be a sinner, I know it not, for this one thing I know, that whereas I was blind, now I see, and therefore he is a prophet; I am both able and bound to speak well of him." He tacitly reproves their great assurance of the ill character they gave of the blessed Jesus: "I, who know him as well as you do, cannot give him any such character." He boldly relies upon his own experience of the power and goodness of the holy Jesus, and resolves to abide by it. There is no disputing against experience. As Christ's mercies are most valued by those that have felt the want of them, so the most powerful and durable affections to Christ are those that arise from an experimental knowledge of him. Thus in the work of grace in the soul, though we cannot tell when and how, the blessed change was wrought, yet we may take the comfort of it if we can say, through grace, "Whereas I was blind, now I see." A needless repetition of their enquiries into it (v. 26): What did he to thee? How opened he thine eyes? They asked these questions, because they wanted something to say, and would rather speak impertinently than seem to be silenced; because they hoped, by putting the man upon repeating his evidence, to catch him tripping in it.

(2) He upbraids them with their invincible prejudices, and they revile him as a disciple of Jesus, v. 27–29.

[1] Their wilful and unreasonable opposition to the evidence of this miracle, v. 27. He would not gratify them with a repetition of the story: I have told you already, and you did not hear, wherefore would you hear it again, will you also be his disciples? Some think that he spoke seriously, and really expecting that they would be convinced. But it rather seems to be spoken ironically: "Will you be his disciples? No, I know you abhor the thoughts of it." Those that wilfully shut their eyes against the light, as these Pharisees here did, First, Make themselves contemptible and base. Secondly, They forfeit all the benefit of further instruction. They that have been told once, and would not hear, why should they be told it again? Thirdly, They hereby receive the grace

Others said . . .—such as Nicodemus and Joseph. the blind man . . . said, He is a prophet—rightly viewing the miracle as but a "sign" of His prophetic commission.

24-34. Give God the praise; we know that this man is a sinner—not wishing him to own, even to the praise of God, that a miracle had been wrought upon him, but to show more regard to the honor of God than ascribe any such act to one who was a sinner.

25. He answered and said, Whether a sinner or no . . .—Not that the man meant to insinuate any doubt in his own mind on the point of His being "a sinner," but as his opinion on such a point would be of no consequence to others, he would speak only to what he knew as fact in his own case.

26. Then said they . . . again, What did he to thee . . .—hoping by repeated questions to ensnare him, but the youth is more than a match for them.

27. I have told you already . . . will ye also be his disciples?—In a vein of keen irony he treats their questions as those of anxious inquirers, almost ready for discipleship! Stung by this, they retort upon him as the disciple (and here they plainly were not wrong); for themselves, they fall back upon Moses; about him there could be no doubt; but who knew about this upstart?

ADAM CLARKE

17. He is a prophet. They had intended to lay snares for the poor man, that, getting him to acknowledge Christ for the Messiah, they might put him out of the synagogue, v. 22, or put him to death, that such a witness to the divine power of Christ might not appear against them. But, as the mercy of God had given him his sight, so the wisdom of God taught him how to escape the snares laid for his ruin. If they allow that Jesus was a prophet, then, even in their sense, He might break the law of the Sabbath, and be guiltless. Or if they did not allow Him to be a prophet, they must account for the miracle some other way than by the power of God; as from Satan or his agents no good can proceed—to do this it was impossible. So the wisdom of God taught the poor man to give them such an answer as put them into a complete dilemma, from which they could not possibly extricate themselves.

24. Give God the praise. Having called the man a second time, they proceeded to deal with him in the most solemn manner; and therefore they put him to his oath; for the words above were the form of an oath, proposed by the chief magistrate to those who were to give evidence to any particular fact, or to attest anything, as produced by or belonging to the Lord. But while they solemnly put him to his oath, they endeavored to put their own words in his mouth, viz., he is a sinner—a pretender to the prophetic character, and a transgressor of the law of God; assert this, or you will not please us.

25. Whereas I was blind, now I see. He pays no attention to their cavils, nor to their perversion of justice; but in the simplicity of his heart speaks to the fact of the reality of which he was ready to give them the most substantial evidence.

27. I have told you already. So he did, v. 15. And did you not hear? You certainly did. Why then do you wish to hear it again? Is it because you wish to become His disciples? The poor man continued steady in his testimony; and by putting this question to them, he knew he should soon put an end to the debate.

MATTHEW HENRY

of God in vain. This is implied in that, "Will you be his disciples?" Those who will not see cause to embrace Christ, and join with his followers, yet, one would think, should see cause enough not to hate and persecute him and them.

[2] For this they scorn and revile him, v. 28. When they could not resist the wisdom and spirit by which he spoke, they broke out into a passion. The method commonly taken by unreasonable man is to make out with railing what is wanting in truth and reason.

First, They taunted this man for his affection to Christ; they said, Thou art his disciple. They reviled him. The Vulgate reads it, they cursed him; and what was their curse? It was this, Be thou his disciple. "May such a curse" (saith St. Austin here) "ever be on us and on our children!" They had no reason to call this man a disciple of Christ. He had spoken favourably of a kindness Christ had done him, and this they could not bear.

Secondly, They gloried in their relation to Moses as their Master: "We are Moses's disciples." These Pharisees had before boasted of their good parentage: We are Abraham's seed; here they boast of their good education, We are Moses's disciples; as if these would save them. There was a perfect harmony between Christ and Moses; they might be disciples of Moses and become the disciples of Christ too; and yet they here put them in opposition. If we rightly understand the matter, we shall see God's grace and man's duty meet together and kiss and befriend each other.

Thirdly, They gave some sort of reason for their adhering to Moses against Christ (v. 29): We know that God spoke unto Moses; as for this fellow, we know not whence he is. But did they not know that they must expect another prophet, and a further revelation of the mind of God? yet, when our Lord Jesus did appear, they not only forfeited, but forsook, their own mercies. In this argument of theirs observe, a. How impertinently they allege that which none of his followers ever denied: We know that God spoke unto Moses, and, thanks be to God, we know it too. Moses was a prophet, it is true, and might not Jesus be a prophet also? b. How absurdly they urge their ignorance of Christ as a reason to justify their contempt of him: As for this fellow. Thus scornfully do they speak of the blessed Jesus, as if they did not think it worth while to charge their memories with a name so inconsiderable. As for this fellow, this sorry fellow, we know not whence he is. It was not long ago that the Jews had made the contrary to this an objection against Christ (ch. vii. 27): We know this man whence he is, but when Christ comes no man knows whence he is. Thus they could with the greatest assurance either affirm or deny the same thing according as they saw it would serve their turn. See the absurdity of infidelity. Men will not know the doctrine of Christ because they are resolved they will not believe it, and then pretend they do not believe it because they do not know it.

4. He reasons with them, and they excommunicate him.

(1) The poor man, finding that he had reason on his side, grows more bold. He wonders at their obstinate infidelity (v. 30). He bravely answered, "Why, herein is a marvellous thing, that you know not whence he is, and yet he has opened mine eyes." Two things he wonders at: [1] That they should be strangers to a man so famous. He that could open the eyes of the blind must certainly be a considerable man, and worth taking notice of. That they should talk as if they thought it below them to take cognizance of such a man as this, this is a strange thing indeed. There are many who pass for learned and knowing men, who have no concern, no, not so much as a curiosity, to acquaint themselves with that which the angels desire to look into. [2] That they should question the divine mission of one that had undoubtedly wrought a divine miracle. "Now this is strange," saith the poor man, "that the miracle wrought upon me has not convinced you, that you should thus shut your eyes against the light." Had Christ opened the eyes of the Pharisees, they would not have doubted his being a prophet. He argues strongly against them, v. 31–33. The man here proves not only that he was not a sinner (v. 31), but that he was of God, v. 33.

a. He argues here, (a) With great knowledge. Though he could not read a letter of the book, he was well acquainted with the scripture; he had wanted the sense of seeing, yet had well improved that of hearing, by which faith cometh. (b) With great zeal for the honour of Christ. (c) With great boldness, and courage. Those that are ambitious of the favours of God must not be afraid of the frowns of men.

b. His argument may be reduced into form, somewhat like that of David, Ps. lxvi. 18–20. If I regard iniquity in my heart, God will not hear me. But verily

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

A. B. SIMPSON:

The testimony of this man is full of manly courage and keen discernment. He faces the whole synagogue and stands fearlessly for his Deliverer, amazed that anybody could doubt that One to whom God could give such power was a true teacher and divine messenger. Like many still who are not afraid to witness for all that God has done for them, his persecution ended in his being expelled from the synagogue. But like every similar trial, it brought him a greater blessing, for then the Master met him and led him into a deeper revelation of His own character and love; and prostrate at Jesus' feet his spiritual vision was now open and he recognized and worshiped the Son of God as his own Savior and Lord. It teaches us that as we are true to Christ and to the light and blessing He gives us, He will lead us on and more freely meet us in every trial and suffering with the higher revelation of himself.
—Christ in the Bible

30. The man answered, Herein is a marvellous thing, that ye know not from whence he is, and yet he hath opened mine eyes—He had no need to say another word; but waxing bolder in defense of his Benefactor, and his views brightening by the very courage which it demanded, he puts it to them how they could pretend inability to tell whether one who opened the eyes of a man born blind was "of God" or "a sinner"—from above or from beneath—and proceeds to argue the case with remarkable power. So irresistible was his argument that their rage burst forth in a speech of intense Pharisaism, 'Thou wast altogether born in sins, and dost thou teach us?—thou, a base-born, uneducated, impudent youth, teach us, the trained, constituted, recognized guides of the people in the things of God! Out upon thee!

ADAM CLARKE

28. Then they reviled him. They spoke "cutting, piercing" words. Solomon talks of some who spoke "like the piercings of a sword," Prov. xiii. 18. And the Psalmist speaks of words that are like "drawn swords," Ps. lv. 21, words which show that the person who speaks them has his heart full of murderous intentions; and that, if he had the same power with a sword as he has with his tongue, he would destroy him whom he thus reproaches.

29. We know not from whence he is. As if they had said: We have the fullest assurance that the commission of Moses was divine, but we have no proof that this Man has such a commission: and should we leave Moses, and attach ourselves to this Stranger? No.

30. Why herein is a marvellous thing. As if he had said, "This is wonderful indeed!" Is it possible that such persons as you are, whose business it is to distinguish good from evil, and who pretend to know a true from a false prophet, cannot decide in a case so plain? Has not the Man opened my eyes? Is not the miracle known to all the town; and could anyone do it who was not endued with the power of God?

MATTHEW HENRY

God hath heard me; blessed be God.

(a) He lays it down for an undoubted truth that none but good men are the favourites of heaven (v. 31): Now we know that God heareth not sinners but if any man be a worshipper of God, and does his will, him he heareth. The assertions, rightly understood, are true. Be it spoken to the terror of the wicked, God heareth not sinners. This bespeaks no discouragement to repenting returning sinners, but to those that go on still in their trespasses. God will not hear them. Be it spoken to the comfort of the righteous, If any man be a worshipper of God, and does his will, him he heareth. The complete character of a good man: he is one that worships God, and does his will. The unspeakable comfort of such a man: him God hears; hears his prayers, and answers them.

(b) He magnifies the miracles which Christ had wrought, to strengthen the argument the more (v. 32): Since the world began was it not heard that any man opened the eyes of one that was born blind. It was a true miracle, and above the power of nature; it was never heard that any man, by the use of natural means, had cured one that was born blind. It was an extraordinary miracle, and beyond the precedents of former miracles. Moses wrought miraculous plagues, but Christ wrought miraculous cures.

(c) He therefore concludes, If this man were not of God, he could do nothing. What Christ did on earth sufficiently demonstrated what he was in heaven. We may each of us know by this whether we are of God or no: What do we? What do we more than others?

(2) The Pharisees fell foul upon him, and broke off the discourse, v. 34. What they said. Having nothing to reply to his argument, they reflected upon his person: Thou wast altogether born in sin, and dost thou teach it? [1] How they despised him: "Thou wast not only born in sin, as every man is, but altogether so, and bearing about with thee in thy body as well as in thy soul the marks of that corruption; thou waste one whom nature stigmatized." It was most unjust to take notice of it now that the cure had not only rolled away the reproach of his blindness, but had signalised him as a favourite of Heaven. [2] How they disdain to learn of him: Dost thou teach us? A mighty emphasis must be laid here upon thou and us. "What! wilt thou, a silly sorry fellow, ignorant and illiterate, wilt thou pretend to teach us, that sit in Moses's chair. Proud men scorn to be taught, especially by their inferiors, whereas we should never think ourselves too old, nor too wise, nor too good, to learn. Those that have much wealth would have more; and why not those that have much knowledge? What they did: They cast him out. Some understand it only of a rude and scornful dismission of him from their council-board. But it seems rather to be a judicial act; they excommunicated him.

Verses 35–38

I. The tender care which our Lord Jesus took of this poor man (v. 35): When Jesus heard that they had cast him out, then he found him, which implies his seeking him and looking after him, that he might encourage and comfort him, 1. Because he had spoken so very well, so bravely, so boldly, in defence of the Lord Jesus. Jesus Christ will be sure to stand by his witnesses, and own those that own him and his truth and ways. It shall redound not only to our credit hereafter, but our comfort now. 2. Because the Pharisees had cast him out. Here was one poor man suffering for Christ, and he took care that as his afflictions abounded his consolations should much more abound. Happy are they who have a friend from whom men cannot debar them. Jesus Christ will graciously find and receive those who for his sake are unjustly rejected and cast out by men.

II. The comfortable converse Christ had with him. Christ gives him further instruction; for he that is faithful in a little shall be entrusted with more, Matt. xiii. 12.

1. Our Lord Jesus examines his faith: "Dost thou believe on the Son of God?" The Messiah is here called the Son of God. Christ, that he might give us an idea of his kingdom, as purely spiritual and divine, calls himself the Son of God.

2. The poor man solicitously enquires concerning the Messiah he was to believe in, professing his readiness to embrace him (v. 36): Who is he, Lord, that I may believe on him? Some think he did know that Jesus, who cured him, was the Son of God, but did not know which was Jesus, and therefore, supposing this person that talked with him to be a follower of Jesus, desired him to do him the favour to direct him to his master. Others think he did know that this person who talked with him was Jesus, whom he believed a great and good man and a prophet, but did not yet know that he was the Son of God. "Thou

31. they cast him out—judicially, no doubt, as well in fact. The allusion to his being "born in sins" seems a tacit admission of his being blind from birth—the very thing they had been so unwilling to own. But rage and enmity to truth are seldom consistent in their outbreaks. The friends of this excommunicated youth, crowding around him with their sympathy, would probably express surprise that One who could work such a cure should be unable to protect his patient from the persecution it had raised against him, or should possess the power without using it. Nor would it be strange if such thoughts should arise in the youth's own mind. But if they did, it is certain, from what follows, that they made no lodgment there, conscious as he was that "whereas he was blind, now he saw," and satisfied that if his Benefactor "were not of God, He could do nothing" (vs. 33). There was a word for him too, which, if whispered in his ear from the oracles of God, would seem expressly designed to describe his case, and prepare him for the coming interview with his gracious Friend. "Hear the word of the Lord, ye that tremble at His word. Your brethren that hated you, that cast you out for My name's sake, said, Let the Lord be glorified; BUT HE SHALL APPEAR TO YOUR JOY, and they shall be ashamed" (Isa. 66:5). But how was He engaged to whom such noble testimony had been given, and for whom such persecution had been borne? Uttering, perhaps, in secret, "with strong crying and tears," the words of the prophetic psalm, "Let not them that wait on Thee, O Lord God of hosts, be ashamed for my sake; let none that seek Thee be confounded for my sake, O God of Israel; because for Thy sake I have borne reproach . . . and the reproaches of them that reproached Thee are fallen upon me" (Ps. 69:6, 7, 9). 35-38. Jesus heard—i.e., by intelligence brought Him. that they had cast him out; and when he had found him—by accident? Not very likely. Sympathy in that breast could not long keep aloof from its object.

he said unto him, Dost thou believe on the Son of God?—A question stretching purposely beyond his present attainments, in order the more quickly to lead him—in his present teachable frame—into the highest truth. 36. He answered and said, Who is he, Lord, that I may believe on him?—"His reply is affirmative, and believing by anticipation, promising faith as soon as Jesus shall say who He is" [STIER].

ADAM CLARKE

31. God heareth not sinners. I believe the word signifies "heathens," or persons not proselyted to the Jewish religion; and therefore it is put in opposition to "a worshipper of [the true] God." But in what sense may it be said, following our common version, that God heareth not sinners? When they regard iniquity in their heart—when they wish to be saved, and yet abide in their sins—when they will not separate themselves from the workers and works of iniquity.

32. Since the world began. "From the age"—probably meaning from the commencement of time. Neither Moses nor the prophets have ever opened the eyes of a man who was born blind. If this Person then were not the best of beings, would God grant Him a privilege which He has hitherto denied to His choicest favorites? Opened the eyes of one that was born blind. That there are cases in which a person who was born blind may be restored to sight by surgical means we know, but no such means were used by Christ. And it is worthy of remark that from the foundation of the world no person born blind has been restored to sight, even by surgical operation, till about the year of our Lord 1728, when the celebrated Dr. Cheselden, by couching the eyes of a young man, fourteen years of age, who had been born blind, restored him to perfect soundness. This was the effect of well-directed surgery; that performed by Christ was a miracle.

33. If this man were not of God. A very just conclusion: God is the Fountain of all good. All good must proceed from Him, and no good can be done but through Him. If this Person were not commissioned by the good God, He could not perform such beneficent miracles as these.

34. Thou wast altogether born in sins. You have not only been a vile wretch in some other preexistent state, but your parents also have been grossly iniquitous; therefore you and they are punished by this blindness. And they cast him out. They immediately "excommunicated" him, as the margin properly reads—drove him from their assembly with disdain, and forbade his further appearing in the worship of God. Thus a simple man, guided by the Spirit of truth, and continuing steady in his testimony, utterly confounded the most eminent Jewish doctors.

35. Dost thou believe on the Son of God? This was the same with, "Dost thou believe on the Messiah?" for these two characters were inseparable.

36. Who is he, Lord? It is very likely that the blind man did not know that it was Jesus the Christ who now spoke to him, for it is evident he had never seen Him before this time; and he might now see Him without knowing that He was the Person by whom he was cured, till our Lord made that discovery of himself mentioned in the following verse.

MATTHEW HENRY

who hast given me bodily sight, tell me, O tell me, who and where this Son of God is." The question was rational and just: Who is he, Lord, that I may believe on him?

3. Our Lord Jesus graciously reveals himself to him as that Son of God: Thou hast both seen him, and it is he that talketh with thee, v. 37. We do not find that Christ did thus expressly, and in so many words, reveal himself to any other as to this man here and to the woman of Samaria. He left others to find out by arguments who he was. Christ here describes himself to this man by two things: (1) Thou hast seen him. Now he was made sensible, more than ever, what an unspeakable mercy it was to be cured of his blindness, that he might see the Son of God. The greatest comfort of bodily eyesight is its serviceableness to our faith and the interests of our souls. Can we say that by faith we have seen Christ, seen him in his beauty and glory? Let us give him the praise, who opened our eyes. (2) It is he that talketh with thee. Great princes are willing to be seen by those whom yet they will not vouchsafe to talk with. But Christ talks with those whose desires are towards him, and manifests himself to them, as he did to the two disciples, when he talked their hearts warm, Luke xxiv. 32. This poor man was solicitously enquiring after the Saviour, when at the same time he saw him, and was talking with him. Jesus Christ is often nearer the souls that seek him than they themselves are aware of.

4. The poor man readily entertains this surprising revelation and said, Lord, I believe, and he worshipped him. He professed his faith in Christ: Lord, I believe thee to be the Son of God. He would not dispute anything that he said who had shown such mercy to him, and wrought such a miracle for him. Believing with the heart, he thus confesses with the mouth; and now the bruised reed was become a cedar. He paid his homage to him: He worshipped him. In worshipping Jesus he owned him to be God. Those who believe in him will see all the reason in the world to worship him. We never read any more of this man.

I. The account Christ gives of his design in coming into the world (v. 39): For judgment I am come. What Christ spoke, he spoke not as a preacher in the pulpit, but as a king upon the throne, and a judge upon the bench.

1. His business in the world was great. He came for judgment. To preach a doctrine and a law which would try men, and effectually discover and distinguish them. To put a difference between men, by revealing the thoughts of many hearts, and laying open men's true characters.

2. This great truth he explains by a metaphor borrowed from the miracle which he had lately wrought. That those who see not might see, and that those who see might be made blind. (1) This is applicable to nations and people. The Gentiles see a great light, while blindness is happened unto Israel, and their eyes are darkened. (2) To particular persons. Christ came into the world, [1] Intentionally and designedly to give sight to those that were spiritually blind; by his word to reveal the object, and by his Spirit to heal the organ, that many precious souls might be turned from darkness to light. [2] Eventually, and in the issue, that those who see might be made blind; that those who have a high conceit of their own wisdom, and set up that in contradiction to divine revelation, might be sealed up in ignorance. The preaching of the cross was foolishness to those who by wisdom knew not God.

II. The Pharisees' cavil at this. They said, Are we blind also? When Christ said that those who say should by his coming be made blind, they apprehended that he meant them, who were the seers of the people, and valued themselves on their insight and foresight. "We know that the common people are blind; but are we blind also?" Frequently those that need reproof most, and deserve it best, though they have wit enough to discern a tacit one, have no grace enough to bear a just one. These Pharisees took this reproof for a reproach.

III. Christ's answer to this cavil, which, if it did not convince them, yet silenced them: If you were blind you should have no sin; but now you say, We see therefore your sin remaineth. They gloried that they were not blind, but would see with their own eyes, having abilities, as they thought, sufficient for their own guidance. This very thing which they gloried in, Christ here tells them, was their shame and ruin.

1. If you were blind, you would have no sin. If you were blind you would have had comparatively no sin. The times of ignorance God winked at. It will be more tolerable with those that perish for lack of vision than with those that rebel against the light. "If you had been sensible of your own blindness you

37. Jesus said unto him, Thou hast both seen him—the new sense of sight having at that moment its highest exercise, in gazing upon "the Light of the world."

38. he said, Lord, I believe: and he worshipped him—a faith and a worship, beyond doubt, meant to express far more than he would think proper to any human "prophet" (vs. 17)—the unstudied, resistless expression, probably of SUPREME faith and adoration, though without the full understanding of what that implied.

39-41. Jesus said—perhaps at the same time, but after a crowd, including some of the skeptical and scornful rulers, had, on seeing Jesus talking with the healed youth, hastened to the spot. that they which see not might see . . .—rising to that sight of which the natural vision communicated to the youth was but the symbol. (See on vs. 5, and cf. Luke 4:18.) that they which see might be made blind—judicially incapable of apprehending and receiving the truth, to which they have wilfully shut their eyes.

40. Are we blind also?—We, the constituted, recognized guides of the people in spiritual things? pride and rage prompting the question.

41. If ye were blind—wanted light to discern My claims, and only waited to receive it—ye should have no sin—none of the guilt of shutting out the light.

ADAM CLARKE

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

Observe the ascending scale in this man's consciousness of Jesus. "A man called Jesus"; "He is a prophet"; "If this man were not from God, he could do nothing"; "Lord, I believe. And he worshipped him."

Thus the scene ends with Jesus receiving the worship of a man. An excommunicated man, a man put out of the synagogue, is received into relationship with God in the act of his submission and his worship.

—The Gospel According to John

38. And he said, Lord, I believe. That is, I believe Thou art the Messiah; and, to give the fullest proof of the sincerity of his faith, he fell down before and adored Him. Never having seen Jesus before, but simply knowing that a person of that name had opened his eyes, he had only considered Him as a holy man and a prophet. But now that he sees and hears Him, he is convinced of His divinity, and glorifies Him as his Saviour. The word kyrie has two meanings; it signifies "Lord," or Sovereign Ruler, and "Sir," a title of civil respect. In the latter sense it seems evidently used in the thirty-sixth verse, because the poor man did not then know that Jesus was the Messiah; in the former sense it is used in this verse—now the healed man knew the quality of his Benefactor.

39. For judgment I am come. I am come to manifest and execute the just judgment of God: (1) By giving sight to the blind and light to the Gentiles, who sit in darkness, (2) By removing the true light from those who, pretending to make a proper use of it, only abuse the mercy of God. In a word, salvation shall be taken away from the Jews, because they reject it; and the kingdom of God shall be given to the Gentiles.

40. Are we blind also? These Pharisees understood Christ as speaking of blindness in a spiritual sense, and wished to know if He considered them in that state.

41. If ye were blind. If you had not had sufficient opportunities to have acquainted yourselves with My divine nature, by the unparalleled miracles which I have wrought before you and the holy doctrine which I have preached, then your rejecting Me could not be would soon have accepted Christ as your guide, and then you would have had no sin." Those that are convinced of their disease are in a fair way to be cured, for there is not a greater hindrance to the salvation of souls than self-sufficiency.

2. "But now you say, We see; now that you have knowledge, and are instructed out of the law, and now that you think you see your way better than anybody can show it you, therefore your sin remains." And as those are most blind who will not see, so their blindness is most dangerous who fancy they do see. Hearest thou the Pharisees say, We see? There is more hope of a fool, of a publican and a harlot, than of such.

The Pharisees supported themselves in their opposition to Christ with this principle, that they were the pastors of the church, and that Jesus was an intruder and an imposter, and therefore the people were bound in duty to stick to them, against him. In opposition to this, Christ here describes who were the false shepherds, and who the true, leaving them to infer what they were.

I. Here is the parable or similitude proposed (v. 1–5). Verily, verily, I say unto you,—Amen, amen. This vehement asseveration intimates the certainty and weight of what he said.

1. In the parable we have, (1) A thief and a robber, that comes to do mischief to the flock, and damage to the owner, v. 1. He enters not by the door, as having no lawful cause of entry, but climbs up some other way. How industrious are wicked people to do mischief! This should shame us out of our slothfulness and cowardice in the service of God. (2) The character that distinguishes the rightful owner. He enters in by the door (v. 2), and he comes to do them some good office or other. Sheep need man's care, and, in return for it, are serviceable to man, they clothe and feed those by whom they are coted and fed. (3) The ready entrance that the shepherd finds: To him the porter openeth, v. 3. (4) The care he takes. The sheep hear his voice, and, which is more, he calls his own sheep by name, so exact is the notice he takes of them, and he leads them out from the fold to the green pastures (v. 4, 5). He does not drive them, but (such was the custom in those times) he goes before them, and they, being used to it, follow him, and are safe. (5) The strange attendance of the sheep upon the shepherd: They know his voice, and a stranger will they not follow, but will flee from him, not knowing his voice.

2. Good men are fitly compared to sheep. Men, as creatures depending on their Creator, are called the sheep of his pasture. The church of God in the world is a sheepfold, into which the children of God that were scattered abroad are gathered together (ch. xi. 52). This sheepfold lies much exposed to thieves and robbers; wolves in sheep's clothing, Matt. vii. 15. The great Shepherd of the sheep takes wonderful care of the flock and of all that belong to it. God is the great Shepherd, Ps. xxiii. 1. The under-shepherds, who are entrusted to feed the flock of God, ought to be careful and faithful in the discharge of that trust. Ministers must serve them in their spiritual interests, must feed their souls with the word of God. They must know the members of their flocks by name, and watch over them; must lead them into the pastures of public ordinances, be their mouth to God and God's to them. Those who are truly the sheep of Christ will be very observant of their Shepherd, and very cautious and shy of strangers. They follow their Shepherd, for they know his voice, having both a discerning ear, and an obedient heart. They flee from a stranger, and dread following him, because they know not his voice.

II. The Jews' ignorance of the drift and meaning of this discourse (v. 6): Jesus spoke this parable to them, but they understood not what the things were which he spoke unto them. The Pharisees had a great conceit of their own knowledge, and yet they had not sense enough to understand the things that Jesus spoke of; they were above their capacity. Frequently the greatest pretenders to knowledge are most ignorant in the things of God.

III. Christ's explication of this parable. Christ, in the parable, had distinguished the shepherd from the robber by this, that he enters in by the door. He makes himself to be both the door by which the shepherd enters and the shepherd that enters in by the door.

1. Christ is the door. He saith it to the Jews, who would be thought God's only sheep, and to the Pharisees, who would be thought their only shepherds:

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

ye say, We see; therefore your sin remaineth—Your claim to possess light, while rejecting Me, is that which seals you up in the guilt of unbelief.

CHAPTER 10

Vss. 1-21. THE GOOD SHEPHERD. This discourse seems plainly to be a continuation of the closing verses of ch. 9. The figure was familiar to the Jewish ear (from Jer. 23; Ezek. 34; Zech. 11, etc.). "This simple creature [the sheep] has this special note among all animals, that it quickly hears the voice of the shepherd, follows no one else, depends entirely on him, and seeks help from him alone—cannot help itself, but is shut up to another's aid" [LUTHER in STIER]. 1, 2. He that entereth not by the door—the legitimate way (without saying what that was, as yet). into the sheepfold—the sacred enclosure of God's true people. climbeth up some other way—not referring to the assumption of ecclesiastical office without an external call, for those Jewish rulers, specially aimed at, had this (Matt. 23:2), but to the want of a true spiritual commission, the seal of heaven going along with the outward authority; it is the assumption of the spiritual guidance of the people without this that is meant. 2. he that entereth in by the door is the shepherd of the sheep—a true, divinely recognized shepherd. 3. To him the porter openeth—i.e., right of free access is given, by order of Him to whom the sheep belong; for it is better not to give the allusion a more specific interpretation [CALVIN, MEYER, LUTHARDT]. and the sheep hear his voice—This and all that follows, though it admits of important application to every faithful shepherd of God's flock, is in its direct and highest sense true only of "the great Shepherd of the sheep," who in the first five verses seems plainly, under the simple character of a true shepherd, to be drawing His own portrait [LAMPE, STIER, etc.].

7-14. I am the door of the sheep—i.e., the way in to the fold, with all blessed privileges, both for shepherds and sheep (cf. ch. 14:6; Eph. 2: 18).

ADAM CLARKE

imputed to you as sin. But because you say, We see—we are perfectly capable of judging between a true and false prophet, and can from the Scriptures point out the Messiah by His works—on this account you are guilty. And your sin is of no common nature; it remaineth; i.e., it shall not be expiated. As you have rejected the Lord from being your Deliverer, so the Lord has rejected you from being His people. When the Scripture speaks of sin "remaining," it is always put in opposition to pardon; for pardon is termed the "taking away of sin," chap. i. 29; Ps. xxxii. 5.

CHAPTER 10

1. Verily, verily. Our Lord introduces this discourse in a most solemn manner, Verily, verily—Amen, amen!—"It is true, it is true!"—a Hebraism for, This is a most important and interesting truth, a truth of the utmost concern to mankind. He that entereth not by the door. Christ assures us, v. 7, that he is the door; whoever, therefore, enters not by Jesus Christ into the pastoral office is no other than a thief and a robber in the sheepfold. And he enters not by Jesus Christ who enters with a prospect of any other interest besides that of Christ and His people. Ambition, avarice, love of ease, a desire to enjoy the conveniences of life, to be distinguished from the crowd, to promote the interests of one's family, and even the whole design of providing against want—these are all ways by which thieves and robbers enter into the Church. Acting through motives of self-interest and with the desire of providing for himself and his family are innocent, yea, laudable, in a secular business; but to enter into the ministerial office through motives of this kind is highly criminal before God.

2. He that entereth in by the door. Observe here the marks, qualities, and duties of a good pastor. The first mark is that he has a lawful entrance into the ministry by the internal call of Christ, namely, by an impulse proceeding from His Spirit, upon considerations which respect only His glory, and upon motives which aim at nothing but the good of His Church, the salvation of souls, the doing the will of God, and the sacrificing himself entirely to His service, and to that of the meanest of His flock.

3. To him the porter openeth. In the porter opening the door to the true shepherd we may discover the second mark of a true minister—his labor is crowned with success. The Holy Spirit opens his way into the hearts of his hearers and he becomes the instrument of their salvation. See Col. iv. 3; 2 Cor. ii. 12; 1 Cor. xvi. 9; Rev. iii. 8. The sheep hear his voice. A third mark of a good shepherd is that he speaks so as to instruct the people—the sheep hear his voice. A man who preaches in such a language as the people cannot comprehend may do for a stage-player or a mountebank, but not for a minister of Christ. He calleth his own sheep by name. A fourth mark of a good pastor is that he is well acquainted with his flock; he knows them by name—he takes care to acquaint himself with the spiritual states of all those that are entrusted to him. And leadeth them out. A fifth mark of a good shepherd is, he leads the flock, does not lord it over God's heritage, nor attempt by any rigorous discipline not founded on the gospel of Christ to drive men into the way of life; nor drive them out of it, which many do, by a severity which is a disgrace to the mild gospel of the God of peace and love. He leads them out of themselves to Christ, out of the follies, diversions, and amusements of the world, into the path of Christian holiness.

4. He goeth before them. A sixth mark of a true pastor is, he gives them a good example; he not only preaches, but he lives, the truth of the gospel. He enters into the depths of the salvation of God. The minister who is in this state of salvation the sheep, genuine Christians, will follow . . . for they know his voice. It was the custom in the Eastern countries for the shepherd to go at the head of his sheep, and they followed him from pasture to pasture.

5. And a stranger will they not follow. That

MATTHEW HENRY

I am the door of the sheepfold.

(1) In general, he is as a door shut, to keep out thieves and robbers, and such as are not fit to be admitted. He is as a door open for passage and communication. By Christ, as the door, we have our first admission into the flock of God. By him God comes to his church, visits it, and communicates himself to it. By him, as the door, the sheep are at last admitted into the heavenly kingdom.

(2) More particularly,

[1] Christ is the door of the shepherds, so that none who come not in by him are to be accounted pastors, but thieves and robbers (though they pretended to be shepherds); but the sheep did not hear them. The character given of them: they are thieves and robbers (v. 8); all that went before him, that assumed a precedency and superiority above him. They condemned our Saviour as a thief and a robber, because he did not come in by them as the door, but he shows that they ought to have been admitted by him. The care taken to preserve the sheep from them: But the sheep did not hear them. Those that were spiritual and heavenly could by no means approve of the traditions of the elders, nor relish their formalities.

[2] Christ is the door of the sheep (v. 9): By me if any man enter into the sheepfold, he shall be saved; he shall go in and out. First, Plain directions how to come into the fold: we must come in by Jesus Christ as the door. By faith in him we come into covenant and communion with God. Secondly, Precious promises to those who observe this direction. They shall be saved hereafter; this is the privilege of their home. They shall be for ever happy. In the meantime they shall go in and out and find pasture; this is the privilege of their way. True believers are at home in Christ; when they go out, they are not shut out as strangers, but have liberty to come in again; when they come in, they are not shut in as trespassers, but have liberty to go out. They go out to the field in the morning, they come into the fold at night; and they find pasture in both: grass in the field, fodder in the fold.

2. Christ is the shepherd, v. 11, &c. God has constituted his Son Jesus to be our shepherd; and here again and again he owns the relation. He expects all that attendance and observance which the shepherds in those countries had from their flocks.

(1) Christ is a shepherd, and not as the thief. The mischievous design of the thief (v. 10): The thief cometh not but to steal, and to kill, and to destroy. Those whom they steal, whose hearts and affections they steal from Christ and his pastures, they kill and destroy spiritually. Deceivers of souls are murderers of souls. The gracious design of the shepherd; he is come,

First, To give life to the sheep. Christ saith, I am come among men, [1] That they might have life. He came to put life into the flock, the church in general, which had seemed rather like a valley full of dry bones than like a pasture covered over with flocks. He came to give life to particular believers. Life is inclusive of all good. [2] That they might have it more abundantly, that they might have a life more abundant than could have been expected or than we are able to ask or think. But it may be construed that they might have abundance. Christ came to give life and something more, something better, life with advantage. Life in abundance is eternal life, life and much more.

Secondly, To give his life for the sheep, and this that he might give life to them (v. 11): The good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep. It is the property of every good shepherd to hazard and expose his life for the sheep. It was the prerogative of the great Shepherd to give his life to purchase his flock.

(2) Christ is a good shepherd, and not as a hireling. There were many that were not thieves, yet were very careless in the discharge of their duty, and through their neglect the flock was greatly damaged. Christ here calls himself the good shepherd (v. 11), and again (v. 14). Jesus Christ is the best of shepherds, none so skilful, so faithful, so tender, as he. He proves himself so, in opposition to all hirelings, v. 12–14. The carelessness of the unfaithful shepherd described (v. 12, 13); he that is a hireling, whose own the sheep are not, sees the wolf coming, and leaves the sheep, for in truth he careth not for them. Evil shepherds, magistrates and ministers, are here described both by their bad principles and their bad practices. Their bad principles, the root of their bad practices. What makes those that have the charge of souls in trying times to betray their trust, and in quiet times not to mind it? It is because they are hirelings, and care not for the sheep. The wealth of the world is the chief of their good; it is because they are hirelings. They undertook the shepherds' office, as a trade to live

8. All that ever came before me—the false prophets; not as claiming the prerogatives of Messiah, but as perverters of the people from the way of life, all pointing to Him [OLSHAUSEN]. the sheep did not hear them—the instinct of their divinely taught hearts preserving them from seducers, and attaching them to the heaven-sent prophets, of whom it is said that "the Spirit of Christ was in them" (I Peter 1:11).

9. by me if any man enter in—whether shepherd or sheep. shall be saved—the great object of the pastoral office, as of all the divine arrangements towards mankind. and shall go in and out and find pasture—in, as to a place of safety and repose; out, as to "green pastures and still waters" (Ps. 23:2) for nourishment and refreshing, and all this only transferred to another clime, and enjoyed in another manner, at the close of this earthly scene (Rev. 7:17).

10. I am come that they might have life, and . . . more abundantly—not merely to preserve but impart LIFE, and communicate it in rich and unfailing exuberance. What a claim! Yet it is only an echo of all His teaching; and He who uttered these and like words must be either a blasphemer, all worthy of the death He died, or "God with us"—there can be no middle course. 11. I am the good shepherd—emphatically, and, in the sense intended, exclusively so (Isa. 40:11; Ezek. 34:23; 37:24; Zech. 13:7). the good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep—Though this may be said of literal shepherds, who, even for their brute flock, have, like David, encountered "the lion and the bear" at the risk of their own lives, and still more of faithful pastors who, like the early bishops of Rome, have been the foremost to brave the fury of their enemies against the flock committed to their care; yet here, beyond doubt, it points to the struggle which was to issue in the willing surrender of the Redeemer's own life, to save His sheep from destruction. 12. an hireling . . . whose own the sheep are not—who has no property in them. By this He points to His own peculiar relation to the sheep, the same as His Father's, the great Proprietor and Lord of the flock, who styles Him "My Shepherd, the Man that is My Fellow" (Zech. 13:7), and though faithful undershepherds are so in their Master's interest, that they feel a measure of His own concern for their charge, the language is strictly applicable only to "the Son over His own house" (Heb. 3:6). seeth the wolf coming—not the devil distinctively, as some take it [STIER, ALFORD, etc.], but generally whoever comes upon the flock with hostile intent, in whatever form: though the wicked one, no doubt, is at the bottom of such movements [LUTHARDT].

is, a man who, pretending to be a shepherd of the flock of God, is a stranger to that salvation which he professes to preach.

7. I am the door of the sheep. It is through Me only that a man can have a lawful entrance into the ministry; and it is through Me alone that mankind can be saved.

8. All that ever came before me. Or, as some translate, "all that came instead of Me," i.e., all that came as the Christ, or Messiah, such as Theudas, and Judas the Gaulonite, who are mentioned, Acts v. 36-37; and who were indeed no other than thieves, plundering the country wherever they came; and murderers, not only slaying the simple people who resisted them, but leading the multitudes of their followers to the slaughter. But our Lord probably refers to the scribes and Pharisees, who pretended to show the way of salvation to the people—who in fact stole into the fold, and clothed themselves with the fleece, and devoured the sheep. The thief and the robber should be properly distinguished; one takes by cunning and stealth, the other openly and by violence.

9. I am the door: by me if any man enter. Those who come for salvation to God, through Christ, shall obtain it. He shall be saved—he shall have his sins blotted out, his soul purified, and himself preserved unto eternal life. Go in and out. This phrase, in the style of the Hebrews, points out all the actions of a man's life and the liberty he has of acting or not acting. A good shepherd conducts his flock to the fields where good pasturage is to be found, watches over them while there, and brings them back again and secures them in the fold.

10. But for to steal, and to kill, and to destroy. Those who enter into the priesthood that they may enjoy the revenues of the Church are the basest and vilest of thieves and murderers. Their ungodly conduct is a snare to the simple, and the occasion of much scandal to the cause of Christ. Their doctrine is deadly; they are not commissioned by Christ, and therefore they cannot profit the people. Their character is well pointed out by the Prophet Ezekiel, chap. xxxiv. 2, etc.: "Woe be to the shepherds of Israel that do feed themselves! . . . Ye eat the fat, and ye clothe you with the wool, ye kill them that are fed: but ye feed not the flock." That they might have life. My doctrine tends to life, because it is the true doctrine—that of the false and bad shepherds tends to death, because it neither comes from nor can lead to that God who is the Fountain of life.

11. I am the good shepherd. Whose character is the very reverse of that which has already been described. In vv. 7 and 9, our Lord had called himself "the door of the sheep," as being the sole Way to glory, and Entrance into eternal life. Here He changes the thought, and calls himself the shepherd, because of what He was to do for them that believe in Him, in order to prepare them for eternal glory. Giveth his life for the sheep. That is, gives up His soul as a sacrifice to save them from eternal death.

MATTHEW HENRY

and grow rich by. It is the love of money, and of their own bellies, that carries them on in it. Those are hirelings that love the wages more than the work. The work of their place is the least of their care. They value not the sheep, are unconcerned in the souls of others. They seek their own things. What can be expected but that they will flee when the wolf comes. He careth not for the sheep, for he is one whose own the sheep are not. Their bad practices, the effect of these bad principles, v. 12. How basely the hireling deserts his post; when he sees the wolf coming he leaves the sheep and flees. Those who mind their safety more than their duty are an easy prey to Satan's temptations. How fatal the consequences are! The wolf catches them, and scatters the sheep, and woeful havoc is made of the flock. See here the grace and tenderness of the good Shepherd. The Lord Jesus is, and will be, as he ever has been, the good Shepherd. Here are two great instances of the shepherd's goodness.

[1] His acquainting himself with his flock.

a. He is acquainted with all that are now of his flock (v. 14, 15), as the good Shepherd (v. 3, 4): I know my sheep and am known of mine. They know one another very well, and knowledge notes affection. Christ knows his sheep. He knows who are his sheep, and who are not; he knows the sheep under their many infirmities, and the goats under their most plausible disguises. He knows them, that is, he approves and accepts of them. He is known of them. They observe him with an eye of faith. It is not so much our knowing him as our being known of him that is our happiness. Upon this occasion Christ mentions (v. 15) the mutual acquaintance between his Father and himself: As the Father knoweth me, even so know I the Father. First, As the ground of that intimate acquaintance and relation which subsist between Christ and believers. The Lord Jesus knows whom he hath chosen, and is sure of them (ch. xiii. 18), and they also know whom they have trusted, and are sure of him (2 Tim. i. 12), and the ground of both is the perfect knowledge which the Father and the Son had of one another's mind. Secondly, As an apt similitude, illustrating the intimacy that is between Christ and believers. It may be connected with the foregoing words, thus: I know my sheep, and am known of mine, even as the Father knows me, and I know the Father. As the Father knew the Son, and loved him, so Christ knows his sheep, and has a watchful tender eye upon them. As the Son knew the Father, loved and obeyed him, so believers know Christ.

b. He is acquainted with those that are hereafter to be of this flock (v. 16): Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold; them also I must bring.

(a) The eye that Christ had to the poor Gentiles. He had sometimes intimated his special concern for the lost sheep of the house of Israel, but, saith he, I have other sheep. Those who in process of time should believe in Christ, from among the Gentiles, are here called sheep. Christ has a right to many a soul of which he has not yet the possession. Christ speaks of those other sheep to take off the contempt that was put upon him, as having but a little flock, and therefore, if a good shepherd, yet a poor shepherd: "But," saith he, "I have more sheep than you see."

(b) The purposes and resolves of his grace concerning them: "Them also I must bring." But why must he bring them? What was the necessity? The necessity of their case required it. Like sheep, they will never come back, of themselves. The necessity of his own engagements required it; he must bring them, or he would not be faithful to his trust.

(c) The happy effect and consequence of this. "They shall hear my voice. It shall be heard by them; I will speak, and give to them to hear." Faith comes by hearing. There shall be one fold and one shepherd. As there is one shepherd, so there shall be one fold. Both Jews and Gentiles shall be incorporated in one church. Being united to Christ, they shall unite in him; two sticks shall become one in the hand of the Lord.

[2] Christ's offering up himself for his sheep v. 15, 17, 18.

a. He declares his purpose of dying for his flock (v. 15): I lay down my life for the sheep. He laid down his life not only for the good of the sheep, but in their stead. Thousands of sheep had been offered in sacrifice for their shepherds, as sin-offerings, but here, by a surprising reverse, the shepherd is sacrificed for the sheep. Though the smiting of the shepherd be for the present the scattering of the flock, it is in order to the gathering of them in.

b. He takes off the offence of the cross by four considerations:

(a) That his laying down his life for the sheep entitled him to the honours and powers of his exalted state (v. 17): "Therefore doth my Father love me,

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

14. I am the good shepherd, and know my sheep—in the peculiar sense of II Timothy 2:19. am known of mine—the soul's response to the voice that has inwardly and efficaciously called it; for of this mutual loving acquaintance ours is the effect of His. "The Redeemer's knowledge of us is the active element, penetrating us with His power and life; that of believers is the passive principle, the reception of His life and light. In this reception, however, an assimilation of the soul to the sublime Object of its knowledge and love takes place; and thus an activity, though a derived one, is unfolded, which shows itself in obedience to His commands" [OLSHAUSEN]. From this mutual knowledge Jesus rises to another and loftier reciprocity of knowledge. 15-18. As the Father knoweth me, even so know I the Father—What claim to absolute equality with the Father could exceed this? (See on Matt. 11:27.)

16. other sheep I have . . . not of this fold: them also I must bring—He means the perishing Gentiles, already His "sheep" in the love of His heart and the purpose of His grace to "bring them" in due time.

they shall hear my voice—This is not the language of mere foresight that they would believe, but the expression of a purpose to draw them to Himself by an inward and efficacious call, which would infallibly issue in their spontaneous accession to Him. and there shall be one fold—rather "one flock" (for the word for "fold," as in the foregoing verses, is quite different).

and I lay down my life for the sheep—How sublime this, immediately following the lofty claim of the preceding clause! 'Tis the riches and the poverty of "the Word made flesh"—one glorious Person reaching at once up to the Throne and down even to the dust of death, "that we might live through Him." A candid interpretation of the words, "for the sheep," ought to go far to establish the special relation of the vicarious death of Christ to the Church.

ADAM CLARKE

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

"I know my sheep." That is a knowledge like the knowledge of the shepherd, a bond of close intimacy. But He does not know them by reason of looking at them and thinking about them. It is something far more blessed than that. He knows me because He loves me; He knows me because He has sympathy with me, and I know Him, if I know Him at all, by my love, my sympathy, and my communion. A loveless heart does not know the Shepherd, and unless the Sherpherd's heart was all love, He would not know His sheep. The Shepherd's love is an individualized love. He knows His flock as a flock because He knows the units of it, and we can rest ourselves upon the personal knowledge, which is personal love and sympathy, of Jesus Christ.—Expositions of Holy Scripture

14. I . . . know my sheep. I know "them that are Mine."

16. Other sheep I have. The Gentiles and Samaritans. As if our Lord had said, Do not imagine that I shall lay down My life for the Jews, exclusively of all other people. No, I shall die also for the Gentiles; and, though they are not of this fold now, those among them that believe shall be united with the believing Jews, and made one fold under one Shepherd, Eph. ii. 13-17.

MATTHEW HENRY

because I lay down my life." He was therefore beloved of the Father because he undertook to die for the sheep. Did he think God's love recompence sufficient for all his services and sufferings, and shall we think it too little for ours, and court the smiles of the world to make it up?

(b) That his laying down his life was in order to his resuming it: I lay down my life, that I may receive it again. God loved him too well to leave him in the grave. He yielded to death, as if he were smitten before it, that he might the more gloriously conquer death, and triumph over the grave.

(c) That he was perfectly voluntary in his sufferings and death (v. 18). "I freely lay it down of myself, for I have power to lay it down, and to take it again." See here the power of Christ, as the Lord of life. He had power to keep his life against all the world. Though Christ's life seemed to be taken by storm, yet really it was surrendered, otherwise it had been impregnable. No man taketh my life from me. He had power to lay down his life. [a] He had ability to do it. He could, when he pleased, slip the knot of union between soul and body. Having voluntarily taken up a body, he could voluntarily lay it down again. [b] He had authority to do it. We are not at liberty to do it; but Christ had a sovereign authority to dispose of his own life as he pleased. He had power to take it again; we have not. Our life, once laid down, is as water spilt upon the ground; but Christ, when he laid down his life, still had it within reach, and could resume it. See here the grace of Christ; he laid it down of himself for our redemption. He offered himself to be the Saviour.

(d) That he did all this by the express order and appointment of his Father: This commandment have I received of my Father.

The people's different sentiments concerning Christ. There was a division, a schism, among them. Such a ferment as this they had been in before (ch. vii. 43; ix. 16); and where there has once been a division a little thing will make a division again. Rents are sooner made than made up or mended. But it is better that men should be divided about the doctrine of Christ than united in the service of sin.

I. Some upon this occasion spoke ill of Christ and of his sayings. They said, He has a devil, and is mad, why do you hear him? They reproach him as a demoniac. He is a distracted man, no more to be heard than the rambles of a man in bedlam. They ridicule his hearers: "Why hear you him?" Men would not thus be laughed out of their necessary food, and yet suffer themselves to be laughed out of what is more necessary.

II. Others stood up in defence of him, and, though the stream ran strong, dared to swim against it. They could not bear to hear him thus abused. If they could say no more of him, this they would maintain, that he was a man in his wits, that he had not a devil, that he was neither senseless nor graceless. Two things they plead: 1. The excellency of his doctrine: "These are not the words of him that hath a devil. These are not the words of one that is either violently possessed with a devil or voluntarily in league with the devil." So much of holiness there is in the words of Christ that we may conclude they are not the words of one that has a devil, and therefore are the words of one that was sent of God. 2. The power of his miracles: Can a devil open the eyes of the blind? Neither mad men nor bad men can work miracles. The devil will sooner put out men's eyes than open them. Therefore Jesus had not a devil.

It is hard to say which is more strange, the gracious words that came out of his mouth or the spiteful ones that came out of theirs.

I. It was at the feast of dedication, and it was winter, a feast that was annually observed by consent, in remembrance of the dedication of a new altar and the purging of the temple, by Judas Maccabæus. The return of their liberty was to them as life from the dead, and, in remembrance of it, they kept an annual feast about the beginning of December, and seven days after. The celebrating of it was not confined to Jerusalem, but every one observed it in his own place, not as a holy time, but as a good time.

II. The place where it was (v. 23): Jesus walked in the temple in Solomon's porch. He walked, ready to give audience to any that should apply to him, and to offer them his services. Those that have anything to say to Christ may find him in the temple and walk with him there.

III. The conference itself.

1. A weighty question put to him by the Jews, v. 24. They came round about him, to tease him; he was

17. Therefore doth my Father love me, because I lay down my life . . .—As the highest act of the Son's love to the Father was the laying down of His life for the sheep at His "commandment," so the Father's love to Him as His incarnate Son reaches its consummation, and finds its highest justification, in that sublimest and most affecting of all acts. that I might take it again—His resurrection-life being indispensable to the accomplishment of the fruit of His death. 18. No man taketh it from me, but I lay it down myself: I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again—It is impossible for language more plainly and emphatically to express the absolute voluntariness of Christ's death, such a voluntariness as it would be manifest presumption in any mere creature to affirm of his own death. It is beyond all doubt the language of One who was conscious that His life was His own (which no creature's is), and therefore His to surrender or retain at will. Here lay the glory of His sacrifice, that it was purely voluntary. The claim of "power to take it again" is no less important, as showing that His resurrection, though ascribed to the Father, in the sense we shall presently see, was nevertheless His own assertion of His own right to life as soon as the purposes of His voluntary death were accomplished. This commandment—to "lay down His-life, that He might take it again." have I received of my Father—So that Christ died at once by "command" of His Father, and by such a voluntary obedience to that command as has made Him (so to speak) infinitely dear to the Father. The necessity of Christ's death, in the light of these profound sayings, must be manifest to all but the superficial student.

19-21. There was a division . . . again among the Jews for these sayings—the light and the darkness revealing themselves with increasing clearness in the separation of the teachable from the obstinately prejudiced. The one saw in Him only "a devil and a madman"; the other revolted at the thought that such words could come from one possessed, and sight be given to the blind by a demoniac; showing clearly that a deeper impression had been made upon them than their words expressed.

22-42. DISCOURSE AT THE FEAST OF DEDICATION—FROM THE FURY OF HIS ENEMIES JESUS ESCAPES BEYOND JORDAN, WHERE MANY BELIEVE ON HIM. 22, 23. it was . . . the feast of the dedication—celebrated rather more than two months after the feast of tabernacles, during which intermediate period our Lord seems to have remained in the neighborhood of Jerusalem. It was instituted by Judas Maccabeus, to commemorate the purification of the temple from the profanations to which it had been subjected by Antiochus Epiphanes 165 B.C., and kept for eight days, from the 25th Chisleu (December), the day on which Judas began the first joyous celebration of it (I Maccabees 4:52, 56, 59; and JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, xii. 7. 7). it was winter—implying some inclemency. Therefore Jesus walked . . . in Solomon's porch—for shelter. This portico was on the east side of the temple, and Josephus says it was part of the original structure of Solomon [Antiquities, xx. 9. 7]. 24. Then came the Jews—the rulers. (See on ch. 1:19.)

ADAM CLARKE

17. Therefore doth my Father love me. As I shall be shortly crucified by you, do not imagine that I am abandoned by My Heavenly Father and therefore fall thus into your hands. The Father loveth Me particularly on this account, because I am going to lay down my life for the life of the world. Again, do not suppose that I shall be put to death by your rulers because I have not strength to resist them. I lay down my life voluntarily and cheerfully. No one can take it away from Me; see v. 18. And I shall give you the fullest proof of My supreme power by raising, in three days, that very crucified, wounded body from the grave.

18. I have power. Or "authority."

19. There was a division. "A schism." They were divided in their opinions; one part received the light, and the other resisted it. Again. There was a dissension of this kind before among the same people; see chap. ix. 16.

20. He hath a devil, and is mad. So, then, a demoniac and a madman were not exactly the same in the apprehension of the Jews; no more than the effect is the same with the cause which produces it. Some will have it that, when the Jews told our Lord that He had a demon, they meant no more than that He was deranged; but here these matters are evidently distinguished. They believed Him to be possessed by a demon, who deranged his faculties, and that He must have been a wicked man, and a deceiver, thus to be put under the power of such a spirit.

21. These are not the words of him that hath a devil. If He were deranged by an unclean spirit, His words would bear a similitude to the spirit that produced them; but these are words of deep sense, soberness, and piety. Besides, could a demoniac open the eyes of blind men? This is not the work of a demon. Now we have seen that this Man has restored a man who was born blind. Therefore it is demonstrably evident that He is neither a madman nor a demoniac.

22. The feast of the dedication. This was a feast instituted by Judas Maccabaeus in commemoration of his purifying the Temple after it had been defiled by Antiochus Epiphanes. This feast began on the twenty-fifth of the month, Cisleu (which answers to the eighteenth of our December), and continued for eight days. When Antiochus had heard that the Jews had made great rejoicings on account of a report that had been spread of his death, he hastened out of Egypt to Jerusalem, took the city by storm, and slew of the inhabitants in three days 40,000 persons; and 40,000 more he sold for slaves to the neighboring nations. Not contented with this, he sacrificed a great sow on the altar of burnt offerings; and, broth being made by his command of some of the flesh, he sprinkled it all over the Temple, that he might defile it to the uttermost. After this, the whole of the Temple service seems to have been suspended for three years; see 1 Macc. iv. 36, etc. Judas Maccabaeus restored the Temple service and cleansed it from pollution. It was winter. Or, "It was stormy or rainy weather." And this is the reason, probably, why our Lord is represented as walking in "Solomon's porch," or portico, v. 23. Though it certainly was in winter when this feast was held, yet it does not appear that the word above refers so much to the time of the year as to the state of the weather.

waiting for an opportunity to do them a kindness. Ill-will for good-will is no rare and uncommon return. They came about him pretending an impartial and importunate enquiry after truth, but intending a general assault upon our Lord Jesus: How long dost thou make us to doubt? If thou be the Christ tell us. They quarrel with him, as if he had unfairly held them in suspense hitherto. "How long dost thou keep us in suspense? How long are we kept debating whether thou be the Christ or no?" It was the effect of their infidelity, and powerful prejudices. The struggle was between their convictions, which told them he was Christ, and their corruptions, which said, No, because he was not such a Christ as they expected. They laid the blame of their doubting upon Christ himself, as if he made them to doubt by inconsistency with himself. Christ would make us to believe; we make ourselves to doubt. They challenge him to give a direct and categorical answer: "If thou be the Christ, tell us plainly, in so many words, either that thou art the Christ, or, as John Baptist, that thou art not," ch. i. 20. Now this pressing query of theirs was seemingly good; but it was really bad, and put with an ill design. Everyone knew the Messiah was to be a king, and therefore whoever pretended to be the Messiah would be prosecuted as a traitor, which was the thing they would have been at.

2. Christ's answer to this question.

(1) He justifies himself, referring them, [1] To what he had said: I have told you. He had told them that he was the Son of God, the Son of man. And is not this the Christ then? You believed not. They pretended that they only doubted, but Christ tells them that they did not believe. It is not for us to teach God how he should teach us, but to be thankful for divine revelation as we have it. [2] He refers them to his works, to the example of his life, and especially to his miracles. No man could do those miracles except God were with him, and God would not be with him to attest a forgery.

(2) He condemns them for their obstinate unbelief: "You believed not." But the reason he gives is very surprising: "You believed not, because you are not of my sheep. You are not disposed to be my followers, you will not herd yourselves with my sheep, will not come and see, come and hear my voice." Rooted antipathies to the gospel of Christ are the bonds of iniquity and infidelity.

(3) He takes this occasion to describe both the gracious disposition and the happy state of those that are his sheep.

[1] To convince them that they were not his sheep, he tells them what were the characters of his sheep. They hear his voice (v. 27), for they know it to be his (v. 4), and he has undertaken that they shall hear it, v. 16. They discern it. They delight in it. They do according to it. Christ will not account those his sheep that are deaf to his calls, deaf to his charms. They follow him. The word of command has always been, Follow me. We must tread in his steps—follow the Lamb whithersoever he goes. In vain do we hear his voice if we do not follow him.

[2] To convince them that it was their great unhappiness and misery not to be of Christ's sheep, he here describes the blessed state and case of those that are. Our Lord Jesus takes cognizance of his sheep: They hear my voice, and I know them. He distinguishes them from others (2 Tim. ii. 19), has a particular regard to every individual (Ps. xxxiv. 6). He has provided a happiness for them: I give unto them eternal life, v. 28. Man has a living soul; therefore the happiness provided is life. Man has an immortal soul: therefore the happiness provided is eternal life. Life eternal is the felicity and chief good of a soul immortal. I give it to them; it is given by the free grace of Jesus Christ. Not I will give it, but I do give it; it is a present gift. He gives the assurance of it, heaven in the seed, in the bud, in the embryo. He has undertaken for their security and preservation to this happiness. They shall by no means perish for ever; so the words are. As there is an eternal life, so there is an eternal destruction. They shall not come into condemnation. Shepherds that have large flocks often lose some of the sheep and suffer them to perish; but Christ has engaged that none of his sheep shall perish, not one. They cannot be kept from their everlasting happiness. His own power is engaged for them: Neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand. The Shepherd is so careful of their welfare that he has them not only within his fold, but in his hand, and taken under his special protection. Yet their enemies are so daring that they attempt to pluck them out of his hand; but they cannot, they shall not do it. Those are safe who are in the hands of the Lord Jesus. His Father's power is likewise engaged for their preservation, v. 29. a. The power of the Father: My Father is greater than all; greater

How long dost thou make us to doubt—"hold us in suspense" (marg.). If thou be the Christ, tell us plainly—But when the plainest evidence of it was resisted, what weight could a mere assertion of it have?

25, 26. Jesus answered them, I told you—i.e., in substance, what I am (e.g. ch. 7:37, 38; 8: 12, 35, 36, 58).

26. ye believe not, because ye are not of my sheep, as I said—referring to the whole strain of the Parable of the Sheep, (vs. 1, etc.).

27-30. My sheep hear my voice . . .—(See on vs. 8). I give unto them eternal life—not "will give them"; for it is a present gift. (See on ch. 3: 36; 5:24.) It is a very grand utterance, couched in the language of majestic authority.

29. My Father, which gave them me—(See on ch. 6:37-39). is greater than all—with whom no adverse power can contend. It is a general expression of an admitted truth, and what follows shows for what purpose it was uttered, "and none is able to pluck them out of My Father's hand." The impossibility of true believers being lost, in the midst of all the temptations which they may encounter, does not consist in their fidelity and decision, but is founded upon the power of God. Here the doctrine of predestination is presented in its sublime and sacred aspect; there is a predestination of the holy, which is taught from one end of the Scriptures to the other; not, indeed, of such a nature that an "irresistible grace" compels the opposing will of man (of course not), but so that that will of man which receives and loves the commands of God is produced only by God's grace [OLSHAUSEN—a testimony all the more valuable, being given in spite of Lutheran prejudice].

ADAM CLARKE

sephus, a portico built by Solomon, on the east side of the outer court of the Temple, was left standing by Herod when he rebuilt the Temple. This portico was 400 cubits long and was left standing, probably, because of its grandeur and beauty. But when Agrippa came to Jerusalem, a few years before the destruction of the city by the Romans, and about eighty years after Herod had begun his building (till which time what Herod had begun was not completed), the Jews solicited Agrippa to repair this portico at his own expense, using for argument not only that the building was growing ruinous but that otherwise 18,000 workmen, who had all of them, until then, been employed in carrying on the works of the Temple, would be all at once deprived of a livelihood.

24. How long dost thou make us to doubt? Or, "How long dost Thou kill us with suspense?" The Jews asked this question through extreme perfidiousness. They wished to get Him to declare himself king of the Jews, that they might accuse him to the Roman governor; and by it they insolently insinuated that all the proofs He had hitherto given them of His divine mission were good for nothing.

25. I told you. That is, I told you before what I tell you now again, that "the works which I do bear testimony to Me."

27. My sheep hear my voice; but you will not hear. My sheep follow me; but you will neither follow nor acknowledge Me. Any person who reads without prejudice may easily see that our Lord does not at all insinuate that these persons could not believe because God had made it impossible to them, but simply because they did not hear and follow Christ, which the whole of our blessed Lord's discourse proves that they might have done. The sheep of Christ are not those who are included in any eternal decree, to the exclusion of others from eternal mercy; but they are those who hear, believe in, follow, and obey the Saviour of the world.

28. They shall never perish. Why? Because they hear My voice, and follow Me; therefore I know, I approve of and love them, and give unto them eternal life. They who continue to hear Christ's voice, and to follow Him, shall never perish. They give themselves up to God—believe so on Jesus that He lives in their hearts. God hath given unto them "eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath life," 1 John v. 11-12. Now it is evident that only those who have Christ living in and governing their souls, so that they possess the mind that was in Him, are His sheep—are those that shall never perish, because they have this eternal life abiding in them. Therefore to talk of a man's being one of the elect—one that shall never perish—one who shall have eternal life—who shall never be plucked out of the hand of God, while he lives in sin, has no Christ in his heart, has either never received or fallen away from the grace of God, is as contrary to common sense as it is to the nature and testimonies of the Most High. Final perseverance implies final faithfulness—he that endures to the end shall be saved—he that is faithful unto death shall have a crown of life. And will any man attempt to say that he who does not endure to the end and is unfaithful shall ever enter into life?

than all the other friends of the church, all the other shepherds, magistrates or ministers. Those shepherds slumber and sleep, but he keeps his flock day and night. He is greater than all the enemies of the church. He is greater than all the combined force of hell and earth. The devil and his angels have had many a push, many a pluck for the mastery, but have never yet prevailed. b. The interest of the Father in the sheep: "It is my Father that gave them to me," and therefore God will still look after them. All the divine power is engaged for the accomplishment of all the divine counsels. c. The safety of the saints inferred from these two. None (neither man nor devil) is able to pluck them out of the Father's hand. Christ had himself experienced the power of his Father upholding and strengthening him, and therefore puts all his followers into his hand too. He that secured the glory of the Redeemer will secure the glory of the redeemed. Further to corroborate the security, he asserts: "I and my Father are one." The Jews understood him as hereby making himself God (v. 33), and he did not deny it. None could pluck them out of his hand because they could not pluck them out of the Father's hand.

IV. The rage of the Jews. The Jews took up stones again, v. 31. It is not the word that is used before (ch. viii. 59), but they carried stones—great stones, such as they used in stoning malefactors. The absurdity of this insult will appear if we consider that they had imperiously, not to say impudently, challenged him to tell them plainly whether he was the Christ or no; and yet now they condemned him as a malefactor. If the preachers of the truth propose it modestly, they are branded as cowards; if boldly, as insolent. When they had before made a similar attempt it was in vain; he escaped through the midst of them (ch. viii. 59); yet they repeat their baffled attempt. Daring sinners will throw stones at heaven, though they return upon their own heads.

V. Christ's tender expostulation with them (v. 32): Jesus answered what they did, for we do not find that they said anything. He mildly replied, Many good works have I shown you from my Father: for which of those works do you stone me? Words so very tender that one would think they should have melted a heart of stone. In dealing with his enemies he still argued from his works (men evidence what they are by what they do), his good works; the expression signifies both great works and good works.

1. The divine power of his works convicted them of the most obstinate infidelity. They were works from his Father. These works he showed them; he did them openly before the people. He did not show his works by candle-light, as those that are concerned only for show, but he showed them at noon-day before the world, ch. xviii. 20. His works were an incontestable demonstration of the validity of his commission.

2. The divine grace of his works convicted them of the most base ingratitude. The works he did among them were not only works of wonder to amaze them, but works of love and kindness to do them good, and so make them good. "Now, for which of these do you stone me? If therefore you will pick a quarrel with me, it must be for some good work; tell me for which." When he asks, For which of these do you stone me? as he intimates the abundant satisfaction he had in his own innocency, so he puts his persecutors upon considering what was the true reason of their enmity, and asking: Why persecute we him?

VI. Their vindication of the attempt they made upon Christ, v. 33.

1. They would not be thought such enemies to their country as to persecute him for a good work: For a good work we stone thee not. For indeed they would scarcely allow any of his works to be so. But, if he had done any good works, they would not own that they stoned him for them. Thus, though most absurd, they could not be brought to own their absurdities.

2. They would be thought such friends to God as to prosecute him for blasphemy: Because that thou, being a man, makest thyself God.

(1) A pretended zeal for the law. They seem mightily concerned for the honour of the divine majesty. A blasphemer was to be stoned, Lev. xxiv. 16. The vilest practices are often varnished with plausible pretences. As nothing is more courageous than a well-informed conscience, so nothing is more outrageous than a mistaken one.

(2) A real enmity to the gospel by representing Christ as a blasphemer. It is no new thing for the worst of characters to be put upon the best of men, by those that resolve to give them the worst of treatment. The crime laid to his charge is blasphemy.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

30. I and my Father are one—Our language admits not of the precision of the original in this great saying. "Are" is in the masculine gender—"we (two persons) are"; while "one" is neuter—"one thing." Perhaps "one interest" expresses, as nearly as may be, the purport of the saying. There seemed to be some contradiction between His saying they had been given by His Father into His own hands, out of which they could not be plucked, and then saying that none could pluck them out of His Father's hands, as if they had not been given out of them. 'Neither have they,' says He; 'though He has given them to Me, they are as much in His own almighty hands as ever—they cannot be, and when given to Me they are not, given away from Himself; for HE AND I HAVE ALL IN COMMON.' Thus it will be seen, that, though oneness of essence is not the precise thing here affirmed, that truth is the basis of what is affirmed, without which it would not be true. And Augustine was right in saying the "We are" condemns the Sabellians (who denied the distinction of Persons in the Godhead), while the "one" (as explained) condemns the Arians (who denied the unity of their essence). 31. Then the Jews took up stones again to stone Him—and for precisely the same thing as before (ch. 8:58, 59).

32. Many good works have I showed you—i.e., works of pure benevolence (as in Acts 10:38, "Who went about doing good . . ."; see Mark 7:37).

from my Father not so much by His power, but as directly commissioned by Him to do them. This He says to meet the imputation of unwarrantable assumption of the divine prerogatives [LUTHARDT].

for which of those works do ye stone me?—"are ye stoning (i.e., going to stone) me?"

33. for a blasphemy—whose legal punishment was stoning (Lev. 24:11-16). thou, being a man—i.e., a man only. makest thyself God—Twice before they understood Him to advance the same claim, and both times they prepared themselves to avenge what they took to be the insulted honor of God, as here, in the way directed by their law (ch. 5:18; 8:59).

ADAM CLARKE

30. I and my Father are one. If Jesus Christ were not God, could He have said these words without being guilty of blasphemy? It is worthy of remark that Christ does not say, I and my Father, which my our translation very improperly supplies, and which in this place would have conveyed a widely different meaning; for then it would imply that the human nature of Christ, of which alone, I conceive, God is ever said to be the Father in Scripture, was equal to the Most High. But He says, speaking then as God over all, "I and the Father"—the Creator of all things, the Judge of all men, the Father of the spirits of all flesh—are one, one in nature, one in all the attributes of Godhead, and one in all the operations of those attributes; and so it is evident the Jews understood Him.

31. The Jews took up stones. To stone Him as a blasphemer, Lev. xxiv. 14-16, because He said He was one with God. The Evangelist adds the word again, because they had attempted to do this before; see chap. viii. 59. But it seems they were prevented from doing this now by the following discourse.

32. Many good works have I shewed you. I have healed your sick, delivered those of you who were possessed from the power of demons; I have fed multitudes of your poor, and I have taught you in all places, at all times, without expense, with patience; and is this My reward? To "show good works or good things" is a Hebraism which signifies to do them really, to give good things liberally.

33. But for blasphemy. I have elsewhere shown that the original word, when applied to men, signifies "to speak injuriously" of their persons, character, connections, etc.; but when applied to God it signifies "to speak impiously," i.e., contrary to His nature, perfections, the wisdom of His providence, or goodness of His works. Thou, being a man. That is, only a man—makest thyself God. When Christ said before, v. 30, "I and the Father are one," had the Jews understood Him as only saying He

The proof of the crime: Thou, being a man, makest thyself God. As it is God's glory that he is God, so it is his glory that besides him there is no other. Thus far they were in the right, that what Christ said of himself amounted to this—that he was God, for he had said that he was one with the Father and that he would give eternal life; and Christ does not deny it. They were much mistaken when they looked upon him as a mere man, and that the Godhead he claimed was of his own making.

VII. Christ's reply to their accusation and his making good those claims which they imputed to him as blasphemous (v. 34, &c.), by two arguments:

1. By an argument taken from God's word. It is written (Ps. lxxxii. 6), I have said, You are gods. If they were gods, much more am I.

(1) How he explains the text (v. 35): He called them gods to whom the word of God came, and the scripture cannot be broken. We are sure that the scripture cannot be broken or found fault with. Every word of God is right.

(2) How he applies it. Say you of him whom the Father hath sanctified, Thou blasphemest? [1] The honour done him by the Father: He sanctified him, and sent him into the world. Our Lord Jesus was himself the Word, and had the Spirit without measure. He was sent into the world as Lord of all. The Father's sanctifying and sending him is here vouched as a sufficient warrant for his calling himself the Son of God. [2] The dishonour done him by the Jews, that he was a blasphemer, because he called himself the Son of God: "Say you of him so and so? Dare you say so? Have you brow and brass enough to tell the God of truth that he lies? What! say you of the Son of God that he is a blasphemer?" If devils, whom he came to condemn, had said so of him, it had not been so strange; but that men, whom he came to teach and save, should say so of him, be astonished, O heavens! at this.

2. By an argument taken from his own works. He here makes out his own claims, and proves that he and the Father are one (v. 37, 38): If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not.

(1) From what he argues—from his works. As he proved himself sent of God by the divinity of his works, so we must prove ourselves allied to Christ by the Christianity of ours. [1] The argument is very cogent; for the works he did were the works of his Father, which the Father only could do, and which could not be done in the ordinary course of nature. The miracles which the apostles wrought in his name corroborated this argument, and continued the evidence of it when he was gone. [2] It is proposed as fairly as can be desired, and put to a short issue. If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not. He does not demand an assent to his divine mission further than he gave proof of it. Christ is no hard master, who expects to reap in assents where he has not sown in arguments. "But if I do the works of my Father, though you believe not me, yet believe the works; believe your own eyes, your own reason." The invisible things of the Redeemer were seen by his miracles, and by all his works both of power and mercy; so that those who were not convinced by these works were without excuse.

(2) For what he argues—that you may know and believe that the Father is in me and I in him; which is the same with what he had said (v. 30): I and my Father are one. This we must know; not know and explain, but know and believe it; acknowledging and adoring the depth, when we cannot find the bottom.

Verses 39–42

We have here the issue of the conference with the Jews. Here we are told,

I. How they attacked him by force. Therefore they sought again to take him, v. 39. Because he persevered in the same testimony concerning himself, they persisted in their malice against him. They express the same resentment, and justify their attempt to stone him by another attempt to take him.

II. How he avoided them by flight. He escaped out of their hands, not by the interposal of any friend that helped him, but by his own wisdom he got clear of them. And he who knew how to deliver himself no doubt knows how to deliver the godly out of temptation, and to make a way for them to escape.

III. How he disposed of himself in his retirement: He went away again beyond Jordan, v. 40.

1. What shelter he found there. He went into a private part of the country, and there he abode; there he found some rest and quietness, when in Jerusalem he could find none. Christ and his gospel have often found better entertainment among the plain country-people than among the wise, the mighty, the noble, 1 Cor. i. 26, 27.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

34-36. Is it not written in your law—in Psalm 82:6, respecting judges or magistrates. Ye are gods—being the official representatives and commissioned agents of God. If he called them gods unto whom the word of God came... Say ye of him whom the Father hath sanctified and sent into the world, Thou blasphemest—The whole force of this reasoning, which has been but in part seized by the commentators, lies in what is said of the two parties compared. The comparison of Himself with mere men, divinely commissioned, is intended to show [as NEANDER well expresses it] that the idea of a communication of the Divine Majesty to human nature was by no means foreign to the revelations of the Old Testament; but there is also a contrast between Himself and all merely human representatives of God—the one "sanctified by the Father and sent into the world"; the other, "to whom the word of God [merely] came," which is expressly designed to prevent His being massed up with them as only one of many human officials of God. It is never said of Christ that "the word of the Lord came to Him"; whereas this is the well-known formula by which the divine commission, even to the highest of mere men, is expressed, as John the Baptist (Luke 3:2). The reason is that given by the Baptist himself (see on ch. 3:31). The contrast is between those "to whom the word of God came"—men of the earth, earthy, who were merely privileged to get a divine message to utter (if prophets), or a divine office to discharge (if judges)—and "Him whom (not being of the earth at all) the Father sanctified (or set apart), and sent into the world," an expression never used of any merely human messenger of God, and used only of Himself. because, I said, I am the Son of God—It is worthy of special notice that our Lord had not said, in so many words, that He was the Son of God, on this occasion. But He had said what beyond doubt amounted to it—namely, that He gave His sheep eternal life, and none could pluck them out of His hand; that He had got them from His Father, in whose hands, though given to Him, they still remained, and out of whose hand none could pluck them; and that they were the indefeasible property of both, inasmuch as "He and His Father were one." Our Lord considers all this as just saying of Himself, "I am the Son of God"—one nature with Him, yet mysteriously of Him. The parenthesis (vs. 35), "and the Scripture cannot be broken," referring to the terms used of magistrates in the 82d Psalm, has an important bearing on the authority of the living oracles. "The Scripture, as the expressed will of the unchangeable God, is itself unchangeable and indissoluble" [OLSHAUSEN]. (Cf. Matt. 5:17.) 37-39. though ye believe not me, believe the works—There was in Christ's words, independently of any miracles, a self-evidencing truth, majesty and grace, which those who had any spiritual susceptibility were unable to resist (ch. 7:46; 8:30). But, for those who wanted this, "the works" were a mighty help. When these failed, the case was desperate indeed. that ye may know and believe that the Father is in me, and I in him—thus reiterating His claim to essential oneness with the Father, which He had only seemed to soften down, that He might calm their rage and get their ear again for a moment. 39. Therefore they sought again to take him—true to their original understanding of His words, for they saw perfectly well that He meant to "make Himself God" throughout all this dialogue. he escaped out of their hand—(See on Luke 4:30; ch. 8:59). 40-42. went away again beyond Jordan... the place where John at first baptized—(See on ch. 1:28).

ADAM CLARKE

had a unity of sentiments with the Father, they would not have attempted to treat Him for this as a blasphemer; because in this sense Abraham, Isaac, Moses, David, and all the prophets were one with God. But what irritated them so much was that they understood Him as speaking of a unity of nature. Therefore they say here, Thou makest thyself God; which word they understood, not in a figurative, metaphorical, or improper sense, but in the most literal meaning of the term.

34. Is it not written in your law? The words which our Lord quotes are taken from Ps. lxxxii. 6, which shows that under the word law our Lord comprised the Jewish sacred writings in general. Ye are gods. That is, "judges," who are called elohim. That judges are here meant appears from Ps. lxxxii. 2, etc., and also from what follows here.

35. And the scripture cannot be broken. "Dissolved," rendered of none effect; i.e., it cannot be gainsaid or set aside. Every man must believe this, because it is the declaration of God. If those were termed gods who were only earthly magistrates, fallible mortals—and that they are termed gods is evident from that Scripture which cannot be gainsaid—what greater reason then have I to say, I am the Son of God, and one with God, when, as Messiah, I have been "consecrated," sent into the world, to instruct and save men; and when, as God, I have wrought miracles which could be performed by no power less than that of omnipotence?

37. If I do not the works. I desire you to believe only on the evidence of My works; if I do not do such works as God only can perform, then believe Me not.

38. Believe the works. Though you do not now credit what I have said to you, yet consider My works, and then you will see that these works prove that "I am in the Father, and the Father in me"; and, consequently, that I and the Father are one.

39. They sought again to take him. They could not reply to His arguments but by stones. The evidence of the truth could not be resisted, and they endeavored to destroy the Person who spoke it. But he escaped. In such a way as we know not, for the Evangelist has not specified the manner of it.

MATTHEW HENRY

2. What success he found there. He chose to go thither, where John at first baptized (ch. i. 28), because there could not but remain some impressions of John's ministry and baptism thereabouts, which would dispose them to receive Christ. The event in some measure answered expectation; for we are told,

(1) That they flocked after him (v. 41): Many resorted to him. The return of the means of grace to a place, commonly occasions a great stirring of affections.

(2) That they reasoned in his favour as much as those at Jerusalem sought objections against him. They said, John did no miracle, but all things that John spoke of this man were true. Two things they considered: That Christ far exceeded John Baptist's power, for John did no miracle, but Jesus does many; whence it is easy to infer that Jesus is greater than John. How great then is this Jesus! Christ is best known and acknowledged by such a comparison with others as sets him superlatively above others. That Christ exactly answered John Baptist's testimony. All things that John said of this man were true. Great things John had said of him, which raised their expectations. They acknowledged him as great as John had said he would be. When we get acquainted with Christ, and come to know him experimentally, we find that the reality exceeds the report, 1 Kings x. 6, 7. John Baptist was now dead and gone, and yet his hearers profited by what they had heard formerly. They were confirmed in their belief that John was a prophet, who foretold such things. They were prepared to believe that Jesus was the Christ. The success and efficacy of the words preached are not confined to the life of the preacher, nor do they expire with his breath.

(3) That many believed on him there. They gave up themselves to him as his disciples, v. 42. They were many. It was where John had had great success; there many believed on the Lord Jesus. Where the preaching of the doctrine of repentance has had success, there the preaching of the doctrine of reconciliation is most likely to be prosperous. Where John had been acceptable, Jesus will not be unacceptable.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

41. many resorted to him—on whom the ministry of the Baptist had left permanent impressions. John did no miracle, but all things John spake of this man were true—what they now heard and saw in Jesus only confirming in their minds the divinity of His forerunner's mission, though unaccompanied by any of His Master's miracles. And thus, "many believed on Him there."

ADAM CLARKE

40. Where John at first baptized. That is, at Bethabara; see chap. i. 28. Afterwards, John baptized at Aenon, chap. iii. 23.

42. Many believed on him there. The people believed on Him: (1) because of the testimony of John the Baptist, whom they knew to be a good and a wise man, and a prophet of the Lord; and (2) because of the miracles which they saw Jesus work. These fully proved that all that John had said of Him was true.

CHAPTER 11

I. A particular account of the parties principally concerned in this story, v. 1, 2. They lived at Bethany, a village not far from Jerusalem, where Christ usually lodged when he came up to the feasts. It is here called the town of Mary and Martha. Here was a brother named Lazarus. Here were two sisters, Martha and Mary, who seem to have been the housekeepers. Here was a decent, happy, well-ordered family, and a family that Christ was very much conversant with. One of the sisters is particularly described to be that Mary which anointed the Lord with ointment, v. 2. It refers to that anointing of Christ which this evangelist relates (ch. xii. 3). This was she whose brother Lazarus was sick; and the sickness of those we love is our affliction. The more friends we have the more frequently we are thus afflicted by sympathy. The multiplying of our comforts is but the multiplying of our cares and crosses.

II. The tidings that were sent to our Lord Jesus of the sickness of Lazarus, v. 3. His sisters knew where Jesus was, and they sent a special messenger to him, in which they manifest, 1. The affection and concern they had for their brother. They showed their love to him now that he was sick, for a brother is born for adversity, and so is a sister too. 2. The regard they had to the Lord Jesus, whom they were willing to make acquainted with all their concerns. The message they sent was very short, barely relating the case with the tender insinuation of a powerful plea, Lord, behold, he whom thou lovest is sick. They do not say, Lord, behold, he who loveth thee, but he whom thou lovest. Our love to him is not worth speaking of, but his to us can never be enough spoken of. It is no new thing for those whom Christ loves to be sick: all things come alike to all. It is a great comfort to us, when we are sick, to have those about us that will pray for us. We have reason to love and pray for those whom we have reason to think Christ loves and cares for.

III. An account how Christ entertained the tidings brought him.

1. He prognosticated the event and issue of the sickness. Two things he prognosticates:

(1) This sickness is not unto death. It was mortal, proved fatal, and no doubt but Lazarus was truly dead for four days. It came not, as in a common case, to be a summons to the grave. That was not the

CHAPTER 11

Vss. 1-46. LAZARUS RAISED FROM THE DEAD—THE CONSEQUENCES OF THIS. 1. of Bethany—at the east side of Mount Olivet. the town of Mary and her sister Martha—thus distinguishing it from the other Bethany, "beyond Jordan." (See on ch. 1: 28; 10:40.) 2. It was that Mary who anointed the Lord with ointment . . .—This, though not recorded by our Evangelist till ch. 12:3, was so well known in the teaching of all the churches, according to our Lord's prediction (Matt. 26:13), that it is here alluded to by anticipation, as the most natural way of identifying her; and she is first named, though the younger, as the more distinguished of the two. She "anointed THE LORD," says the Evangelist—led doubtless to the use of this term here, as he was about to exhibit Him illustriously as the Lord of Life.

3-5. his sisters sent unto him, saying, Lord, he whom thou lovest is sick—a most womanly appeal, yet how reverential, to the known affection of her Lord for the patient. (See vss. 5, 11.) "Those whom Christ loves are no more exempt than others from their share of earthly trouble and anguish: rather are they bound over to it more surely" [TRENCH].

4. When Jesus heard that, he said, This sickness is not unto death—to result in death—but

CHAPTER 11

1. Lazarus, of Bethany. John, who seldom relates anything but what the other Evangelists have omitted, does not tell us what gave rise to that familiar acquaintance and friendship that subsisted between our Lord and this family. It is surprising that the other Evangelists have omitted so remarkable an account as this, in which some of the finest traits in our Lord's character are exhibited. The conjecture of Grotius has a good deal of weight. He thinks that the other three Evangelists wrote their histories during the life of Lazarus, and that they did not mention him for fear of exciting the malice of the Jews against him. And indeed we find, from chap. xii. 10, that they sought to put Lazarus to death also, that our Lord might not have one monument of His power and goodness remaining in the land. Probably both Lazarus and his sisters were dead before John wrote. Bethany was situated at the foot of the Mount of Olives, about two miles from Jerusalem.

2. It was that Mary which anointed. There is much disagreement between learned men relative to the two anointings of our Lord, and the persons who performed these acts. The various conjectures concerning these points the reader will find in the notes on Matt. xxvi. 7, etc. Some think that the anointing of which the Evangelist speaks is that mentioned in chap. xii. 1, etc., and which happened about six days before the Passover. John, therefore, is supposed to anticipate the account, because it served more particularly to designate the person of whom he was speaking.

3. He whom thou lovest is sick. Nothing could be more simple, nor more modest, than this prayer. They do not say, Come and heal him; or, Command the disease to depart even where Thou art, and it will obey Thee. They content themselves with simply stating the case and using an indirect but a most forcible argument to induce our Lord to show forth His power and goodness.

MATTHEW HENRY

final effect of this sickness. He died, and yet it might be said he did not die. Death is an everlasting farewell to this world; and in this sense it was not unto death. The sickness of good people, how threatening soever, is not unto death. The body's death to this world is the soul's birth into another world.

(2) But it is for the glory of God. The afflictions of the saints are designed for the glory of God. The sweetest mercies are those which are occasioned by trouble. Let this reconcile us to the darkest dispensations of Providence, they are all for the glory of God; and, if God be glorified, we ought to be satisfied. It was that the Son of God might be glorified thereby, as it gave him occasion to work that glorious miracle, the raising of him from the dead. Let this comfort those whom Christ loves under all their grievances that the design of them all is that the Son of God may be glorified thereby.

2. He deferred visiting his patient, v. 5, 6. They had pleaded, Lord, it is he whom thou lovest, and the plea is allowed (v. 5): Jesus loved Martha, and her sister, and Lazarus. Now one would think it should follow, When he heard therefore that he was sick he made all the haste that he could to him. But he took the contrary way to show his love. Instead of coming post to him, he abode two days still in the same place where he was. (1) He loved them and therefore he deferred coming to them, that he might try them, that their trial might at last be found to praise and honour. (2) He loved them, that is, he designed to do something great and extraordinary for them. Therefore he delayed coming to them, that Lazarus might be dead and buried before he came. Deferring his relief so long, he had an opportunity of doing more for him than for any. God hath gracious intentions even in seeming delays. Christ's friends at Bethany were not out of his thoughts, though he made no haste to them.

IV. The discourse he had with his disciples, v. 7–16. Two things he discourses about—his own danger and Lazarus's death.

1. His own danger in going into Judæa, v. 7–10.

(1) He saith (v. 7): "Let us go into Judæa again." Now this may be considered, [1] As a purpose of his kindness to his friends at Bethany. When he knew they were brought to the last extremity, "Now," saith he, "let us go to Judæa." Christ will arise in favour of his people when the time to favour them, yea, the set time, is come; and the worst time is commonly the set time. In the depths of affliction, let this therefore keep us out of the depths of despair, that man's extremity is God's opportunity. [2] As a trial of the courage of the disciples, whether they would venture to follow him thither. To go to Judæa, which was so lately made too hot for them, was a saying that proved them. Let us go. Christ never brings his people into any peril but he accompanies them in it.

(2) Their objection against this journey (v. 8): Master, the Jews of late sought to stone thee, and goest thou thither again? They remind him of the danger he had been in there not long since. Christ's disciples are apt to make a greater matter of sufferings than their Master does. The rememberance of the fright was fresh in their minds. They marvel that he will go thither again. "Wilt thou favour those with thy presence that have expelled thee out of their coasts? Goest thou thither again, where thou hast been so ill used?" Had Christ been inclined to shift off suffering, he did not want friends to persuade him to it. They discover at the same time a distrust of his power, as if he could not secure both himself and them now in Judæa as well as he had done formerly; a secret fear of suffering themselves, for they count upon this if he suffer.

(3) Christ's answer to this objection (v. 9, 10): Are there not twelve hours in the day? Divine Providence has given us daylight to work by. Man's life is a day; this day is divided into divers ages, states, and opportunities, as into hours; the consideration of this should make us not only very busy, as to the work of life, but also very easy as to the perils of life; our day shall be lengthened out till our work be done. He shows the comfort and satisfaction which a man has while he keeps in the way of his duty: If any man walk in the day, he stumbles not. He does not hesitate in his own mind, but, walking uprightly, walks surely. As he that walks in the day stumbles not, but goes on steadily and cheerfully in his way, because he sees the light of this world, and by it sees his way before him; so a good man, relies upon the word of God as his rule, and regards the glory of God as his end, because he sees those two great lights. He is furnished with a faithful guide in all his doubts, and a powerful guard in all his dangers. Christ, wherever he went, walked in the day, and so shall we, if we follow his steps. He shows the pain and peril for the glory of God, that the Son of God may be glorified thereby—i.e., by this glory of God. (See Gr.) Remarkable language this, which from creature lips would have been intolerable. It means that the glory of GOD manifested in the resurrection of dead Lazarus would be shown to be the glory, personally and immediately, of THE SON.

5. Jesus loved Martha and her sister and Lazarus—what a picture!—one that in every age has attracted the admiration of the whole Christian Church. No wonder that those miserable skeptics who have carped at the ethical system of the Gospel, as not embracing private friendships in the list of its virtues, have been referred to the Saviour's peculiar regard for this family as a triumphant refutation, if such were needed. 6. When he heard he was sick, he abode two days still . . . where he was—at least twenty-five miles off. Beyond all doubt this was just to let things come to their worst, in order to display His glory. But how trying, meantime, to the faith of his friends, and how unlike the way in which love to a dying friend usually shows itself, on which it is plain that Mary reckoned. But the ways of divine are not as the ways of human love. Often they are the reverse. When His people are sick, in body or spirit; when their case is waxing more and more desperate every day; when all hope of recovery is about to expire—just then and therefore it is that "He abides two days still in the same place where He is." Can they still hope against hope? Often they do not; but "this is their infirmity." For it is His chosen style of acting. We have been well taught it, and should not now have the lesson to learn. From the days of Moses was it given sublimely forth as the character of His grandest interpositions, that "the Lord will judge His people and repent Himself for His servants"—when He seeth that their power is gone (Deut. 32:36). 7-10. Let us go into Judea again—He was now in Perea, "beyond Jordan."

8. His disciples say unto him, Master, the Jews of late sought . . .—lit., 'were (just) now seeking' "to stone thee" (ch. 10:31). goest thou thither again?—to certain death, as vs. 16 shows they thought.

9. Jesus answered, Are there not twelve hours in the day?—(See on ch. 9:4). Our Lord's day had now reached its eleventh hour, and having till now "walked in the day," He would not mistime the remaining and more critical part of His work, which would be as fatal, He says, as omitting it altogether; for "if a man (so He speaks, putting Himself under the same great law of duty as all other men—if a man) walk in the night, he stumbleth, because there is no light in him."

ADAM CLARKE

4. This sickness is not unto death. Not to final privation of life at this time; but a temporary death shall be now permitted, that the glory of God may appear in the miracle of his resurrection. It is very likely that this verse contains the message which Christ sent back by the person whom the afflicted sisters had sent to Him.

5. Now Jesus loved Martha, and her sister, and Lazarus. Therefore His staying two days longer in Bethabara was not through lack of affection for this distressed family, but merely that He might have a more favorable opportunity of proving to them how much He loved them. Christ never denies a less favor but in order to confer a greater. God's delays in answering prayers offered to Him by persons in distress are often proofs of His purpose to confer some great kindness; and they are also proofs that His wisdom finds it necessary to permit an increase of the affliction, that His goodness may be more conspicuous in its removal.

8. The Jews of late sought to stone thee. It was but a few weeks before that they were going to stone Him in the Temple, on the day of the Feast of the Dedication, chap. x. 31.

9. Are there not twelve hours in the day? Our Lord alludes to the case of a traveller who has to walk the whole day. The day points out the time of life—the night, that of death. He has already used the same mode of speech in chap. ix. 4: "I must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day: the night cometh, when no man can work." Here He refers to what the apostles had just said—"The Jews were but just now going to stone Thee." Are there not, said He, twelve hours in the day? I have not travelled these twelve hours yet—My last hour is not yet come; and the Jews, with all their malice and hatred, shall not be able to bring it a moment sooner than God has purposed. If any man walk in the day, he stumbleth not. A traveller should use the day to walk in, and not the night. During the day he has the sun, the light of this world; he sees his way, and does not stumble. But if he walk in the night, he stumbleth, because there is no light a man is in who walks not according to this rule (v. 10): If a man walk in the night, he stumbles. If a man walk in the way of his heart, and according to the course of this world—he falls into temptations and snares. He stumbles, because there is no light in him, for light in us is that to our moral actions which light about us is to our natural actions.

2. The death of Lazarus v. 11–16.

(1) The notice Christ gave his disciples of the death of Lazarus, v. 11. He then gives them plain intelligence of the death of Lazarus: Our friend Lazarus sleepeth. See here how Christ calls a believer and a believer's death. He calls a believer his friend: Our friend Lazarus. Those whom Christ is pleased to own as his friends all his disciples should take for theirs. Christ speaks of Lazarus as their common friend: Our friend. Death itself does not break the bond of friendship between Christ and a believer. Lazarus is dead, and yet he is still our friend. He calls the death of a believer a sleep: he sleepeth. It is good to call death by such names and titles as will help to make it more familiar and less formidable to us. Why should not the believing hope of that resurrection to eternal life make it as easy to us to put off the body and die as it is to put off our clothes and go to sleep? A good Christian, when he dies, does but sleep: he rests from the labours of the day past, and is refreshing himself for the next morning. To the godly it is a bed, and all its bands as the soft and downy fetters of an easy quiet sleep. It is but putting off our clothes to be mended and trimmed up for the marriage day. Particular intimations of his favourable intentions concerning Lazarus: but I go, that I may awake him out of sleep. Christ had no sooner said, Our friend sleeps, but presently he adds, I go, that I may awake him. When Christ tells his people at any time how bad the case is he lets them know in the same breath how easily, how quickly, he can mend it. Christ's telling his disciples that this was his business to Judæa might help to take off their fear of going with him thither; and, besides, it was to do a kindness to a family to which they were all obliged.

(2) Their mistake, and the blunder they made about it (v. 12, 13): They said, Lord, if he sleep, he shall do well. This intimates, [1] Some concern they had for their friend Lazarus; they hoped he would recover. Now that they heard he slept they concluded the worst was past. Sleep is often nature's physic. This is true of the sleep of death; if a good Christian sleep, he shall do well. [2] A greater concern for themselves. It was now needless for Christ to go to him, and expose himself and them. Thus we are willing to hope that the good work which we are called to do will do itself if there be peril in the doing of it.

(3) This mistake of theirs rectified (v. 13): Jesus spoke of his death. How dull of understanding Christ's disciples as yet were. Frequently death is called a sleep in the Old Testament. They should have understood Christ when he spoke scripture language. What Christ undertakes to do, we may be sure, is something great and uncommon, and a work worthy of himself. How carefully the evangelist corrects this error: Jesus spoke of his death.

(4) The plain and express declaration which Jesus made to them of the death of Lazarus, and his resolution to go to Bethany, v. 14, 15. He gives them notice of the death of Lazarus; what he had before said darkly he now says plainly: Lazarus is dead, v. 14. He gives them the reason why he had delayed so long: I am glad for your sakes that I was not there. Now that he went and raised him from the dead, as there were many brought to believe on him who before did not (v. 45), so there was much done towards the perfecting of what was lacking in the faith of those that did, which Christ aimed at: To the intent that you may believe. He resolves now to go to Bethany, and take his disciples along with him: Let us go unto him. Death cannot separate us from the love of Christ, nor put us out of the reach of his calls. Perhaps those who said, If he sleep there is no need to go, were ready to say, If he be dead it is to no purpose to go.

(5) Thomas exciting his fellow-disciples cheerfully to attend their Master's motions (v. 16): Thomas, who is called Didymus. Thomas in Hebrew and Didymus in Greek signify a twin. Probably Thomas was a twin. He said to his fellow-disciples very courageously, Let us also go that we may die with him; with him, that is,

[1] With Lazarus, who was now dead; so some take it. Perhaps Thomas had a particular intimacy with him. "If we survive, we know not how to live without him." Thus we are sometimes ready to think our lives bound up in the lives of some that were dear to us: but God will teach us to live, and to live com-

11-16. Our friend Lazarus sleepeth; but I go that I may wake him out of sleep—Illustrious title! "Our friend Lazarus." To Abraham only is it accorded in the Old Testament, and not till after his death, (II Chron. 20:7; Isa. 41:8, to which our attention is called in the New Testament (Jas. 2:23). When Jesus came in the flesh, His forerunner applied this name, in a certain sense, to himself (ch. 3:29); and into the same fellowship the Lord's chosen disciples are declared to have come (ch. 15: 13-15). "The phrase here employed, 'our friend Lazarus, means more than 'he whom Thou lovest' in vs. 3, for it implies that Christ's affection was reciprocated by Lazarus" [LAMPE]. Our Lord had been told only that Lazarus was "sick." But the change which his two days' delay had produced is here tenderly alluded to. Doubtless, His spirit was all the while with His dying, and now dead "friend." The symbol of "sleep" for death is common to all languages, and familiar to us in the Old Testament. In the New Testament, however, a higher meaning is put into it, in relation to believers in Jesus (see on I Thess. 4:14), a sense hinted at, and clearly, in Psalm 17:15 [LUTHARDT]; and the "awaking out of sleep" acquires a corresponding sense far transcending bare resuscitation.

12. if he sleep, he shall do well—lit., "be preserved"; i.e., recover. 'Why then go to Judea?'

14. Then said Jesus unto them plainly, Lazarus is dead—'Sleep [says BENGEL, beautifully] is the death of the saints, in the language of heaven; but this language the disciples here understood not; incomparable is the generosity of the divine manner of discoursing, but such is the slowness of men's apprehension that Scripture often has to descend to the more miserable style of human discourse; cf. Matthew 16:11.' 15. I am glad for your sakes I was not there—This certainly implies that if He had been present, Lazarus would not have died; not because He could not have resisted the importunities of the sisters, but because, in presence of the personal Life, death could not have reached His friend [LUTHARDT]. "It is beautifully congruous to the divine decorum that in presence of the Prince of Life no one is ever said to have died" [BENGEL]. that ye may believe—This is added to explain His "gladness" at not having been present. His friend's death, as such, could not have been to Him "joyous"; the sequel shows it was "grievous"; but for them it was safe. Phil. 3:1). 16. Thomas, . . . called Didymus—or "the twin." Let us also go, that we may die with him—lovely spirit, though tinged with some sadness, such as reappears at ch. 14:5, showing the tendency of this disciple to take the dark view of things. On a memorable occasion this tendency opened the door to downright, though but momentary, unbelief (ch. 20:25). Here, however, though alleged by many interpreters there is nothing of the sort. He perceives clearly how this journey to Judea will end, as respects his Master, and not only sees in it peril to themselves, as they

"in it," v. 10; i.e., there is no sun above the horizon. The words en auto, v. 10, refer not to the man, but to the world, the sun, its light, not being above the horizon.

11. Lazarus sleepeth. It was very common among the Jews to express death by sleep; and the expressions "falling asleep," "sleeping with their fathers" were in great use among them. The Hebrews probably used this form of speech to signify their belief in the immortality of the soul and the resurrection of the body. It is certain that our Lord received no intimation of Lazarus' death from any person, and that He knew it through that power by which He knows all things.

12. If he sleep, he shall do well. That is, "if he sleep only." Though the word sleep frequently meant death (see Acts vii. 60; 1 Cor. xi. 30; xv. 18, 20), yet, as it was an ambiguous term, the disciples appear here to have mistaken its meaning. If he sleep, he shall do well, or "recover," became a proverbial form of speech among the Jews. In most diseases sleep is a very favorable prognostic.

15. I am glad for your sakes that I was not there. "I tell you plainly, Lazarus is dead; and I am glad I was not there—if I had been, I should have been prevailed on to heal him almost as soon as he fell sick, and I should not have had so striking an occasion to manifest the glory of God to you, and to establish you in the faith."

16. Thomas, which is called Didymus. Thomas, or Thaom, was his Hebrew name, and signifies a "twin." Didymus is a literal translation of the Hebrew word into Greek. Let us also go, that we may die with him. That is, "Seeing we cannot dissuade our Lord from going, and His death is likely to be the inevitable consequence, let us give Him the fullest proof we can of our love, by going and suffering death with Him." Some think Thomas spoke these words peevishly, and that they should be translated thus, "Must we also go, and expose fortably, upon himself, when those are gone without whom we thought we could not live. "If we die, we hope to be happy with him." Such a firm belief he has of a happiness on the other side death that he is willing they should all go and die with him. The more of our friends are translated hence, the fewer cords we have to bind us to this earth, and the more to draw our hearts heavenwards.

[2] "Let us go and die with our Master," and so I rather think it is meant. "If he will go into danger, let us also go, according to the command we received, Follow me." Thomas knew so much of the malice of the Jews against Christ that it was no foreign supposition that he was now going to die. Thomas manifests a gracious readiness to die with Christ himself, flowing from strong affections to him. A zealous desire to help his fellow-disciples into the same frame: "Let us go and die with him; who would desire to survive such a Master?" Thus, in difficult times, Christians should animate one another.

Verses 17–32

The matter being determined, that Christ will go to Judæa, and his disciples with him, they address themselves to their journey.

At length, he comes near to Bethany, which is said to be about fifteen furlongs from Jerusalem, v. 18. Notice is taken of this, that this miracle was in effect wrought in Jerusalem.

I. What posture he found his friends there in. When we part from our friends we know not what changes may affect us or them before we meet again.

1. He found his friend Lazarus in the grave, v. 17. Lazarus had been four days buried. Promised salvations, though they always come surely, yet often come slowly.

2. He found his friends that survived in grief. Many of the Jews came to Martha and Mary to comfort them. Ordinarily, where death is there are mourners. Here was Martha's house, a house where the fear of God was, and on which his blessing rested, yet made a house of mourning. Grace will keep sorrow from the heart (ch. xiv. 1), not from the house. Where there are mourners there ought to be comforters. It is a duty we owe to those that are in sorrow to mourn with them, and to comfort them. They comforted them concerning their brother, that is, by speaking to them of him, not only of the good name he left behind, but of the happy state he was gone to. We have reason to be comforted concerning those who are gone before us to a happiness where they have no need of us. This visit which the Jews made to Martha and Mary is an evidence that they were persons of distinction. There was also a providence in it, that so many Jews should come together, just at this time, that they might be unexceptionable witnesses of the miracle.

II. What passed between him and his surviving friends. His departures endear his returns, and his absence teaches us how to value his presence.

1. The interview between Christ and Martha.

(1) We are told that she went and met him, v. 20. It should seem that Martha was earnestly expecting Christ's arrival, and enquiring for it. However it was, she heard of his coming before he arrived. Martha, when the good news was brought that Jesus was coming, threw all aside, and went and met him. When Martha went to meet Jesus, Mary sat still in the house. Some think she did not hear the tidings, while Martha, who was busied in the household-affairs, had early notice of it. Others think she did hear that Christ was come, but was so overwhelmed with sorrow that she did not care to stir. Comparing this story with that in Luke x. 38, &c., we may observe the different tempers of these two sisters. Martha's natural temper was active and busy; she loved to be here and there, and at the end of everything; and this had been a snare to her when by it she was not only careful and cumbered about many things, but hindered from the exercises of devotion: but now in a day of affliction this active temper did her a kindness, kept the grief from her heart, and made her forward to meet Christ, and so she received comfort from him the sooner. On the other hand, Mary's natural temper was contemplative and reserved. This had been formerly an advantage to her, when it was placed at her Christ's feet, to hear his word, and enabled her there to attend upon him without those distractions with which Martha was cumbered; but now in the day of affliction that same temper proved a snare to her, made her less able to grapple with her grief, and disposed her to melancholy. See here how much it will be our wisdom carefully to watch against the temptations, and improve the advantages, of our natural temper.

(2) Here is fully related the discourse between all did, but feels as if he could not and cared not to survive his Master's sacrifice to the fury of His enemies. It was that kind of affection which, living only in the light of its Object, cannot contemplate, or has no heart for life, without it.

18. Bethany was nigh Jerusalem, about fifteen furlongs—rather less than two miles; mentioned to explain the visits of sympathy noticed in the following words, which the proximity of the two places facilitated.

17-19. when Jesus came, he found that he had lain in the grave four days—If he died on the day the tidings came of his illness—and was, according to the Jewish custom, buried the same day (see JAHN'S Archæology, and vs. 39; Acts 5:5, 6, 10)—and if Jesus, after two days' farther stay in Perea, set out on the day following for Bethany, some ten hours' journey, that would make out the four days; the first and last being incomplete [MEYER].

19. many of the Jews came to Martha and Mary to comfort them—Thus were provided, in a most natural way, so many witnesses of the glorious miracle that was to follow, as to put the fact beyond possible question.

20-22. Martha, as soon as she heard that Jesus was coming, went and met him—true to the energy and activity of her character, as seen in Luke 10:38-42. (See Notes there.) but Mary sat . . . in the house—equally true to her placid character. These undesigned touches not only charmingly illustrate the minute historic fidelity of both narratives, but their inner harmony.

ourselves to destruction with Him?" But I think the first sense is to be preferred. When a matter is spoken which concerns the moral character of a person and which may be understood in a good and a bad sense, that sense which is most favorable to the person should certainly be adopted.

18. Fifteen furlongs. About two miles, for the Jewish miles contained about seven furlongs and a half.

17. He had lain in the grave four days already. Our Lord probably left Bethabara the day, or the day after, Lazarus died. He came to Bethany three days after; and it appears that Lazarus had been buried about four days and consequently that he had been put in the grave the day or day after he died. Though it was the Jewish custom to embalm their dead, yet we find, from v. 39, that he had not been embalmed; and God wisely ordered this, that the miracle might appear the more striking.

19. Many of the Jews came. Bethany being so nigh to Jerusalem, many of the relatives and friends of the family came, according to the Jewish custom, to mourn with the afflicted sisters. Mourning, among the Jews, lasted about thirty days. The first three days were termed days of weeping; then followed seven of lamentation. During the three days the mourner did no servile work; and if anyone saluted him, he did not return the salutation. During the seven days he did no servile work, except in private—lay with his bed on the floor—did not put on his sandals—did not wash nor anoint himself—had his head covered. All the thirty days he continued unshaven, wore no white or new clothes, and did not sew up the rents which he had made in his garments.

20. Martha . . . went and met him. Some suppose she was the eldest of the two sisters—she seems to have had the management of the house. See Luke x. 40. Mary sat still in the house. It is likely that by this circumstance the Evangelist intended to convey the idea of her sorrow and distress, because anciently afflicted persons were accustomed to put themselves in this posture, as expressive of their distress, their grief having rendered them as it were immovable.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

Martha hurried from the house to meet Him. In doing so she violated the conventionalities of the East. Mary observed them. She sat in the house, remaining in the seclusion of the home. Martha, honest, angry, as I cannot help believing, hurried to meet Him, and when she met Him, she said, "Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died." Of course it is very difficult to interpret dogmatically, but when Mary came she said exactly the same thing. But surely there was a tremendous difference between the intention of Martha and the intention of Mary. I have no doubt whatever that Martha's intention was that of honest, sincere, protesting disappointment. As though she had said, "Why did you not hurry? If thou hadst been here, my brother had not died." But she still believed in Him. She still had confidence in Him, and that in a very wonderful way, as witness her words: "And even now I know that, whatsoever thou shalt ask of God, God will give thee." She had tremendous confidence in Him, and yet, as a matter of fact, she did not quite mean that. She thought she did. She was perfectly honest, but she did not expect her brother back.

—The Gospel According to John

MATTHEW HENRY

Christ and Martha.

[1] Martha's address to Christ, v. 21, 22.

First, She complains of Christ's long absence and delay. Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died. Here is, 1. Some evidence of faith. She believed Christ's power, that he could have prevented his death. She believed his pity, that if he had but seen Lazarus in his extreme illness, he would have had compassion. 2. Here are sad instances of unbelief. Her faith was true, but weak as a bruised reed, for she limits the power of Christ, in saying, If thou hadst been here; whereas she ought to have known that Christ could cure at a distance. She reflects likewise upon the wisdom and kindness of Christ, that he did not hasten to them when they sent for him, and now might as well have stayed away.

Secondly, Yet she corrects and comforts herself. At least, she blames herself for blaming her Master, and for suggesting that he comes too late: for I know that even now, whatsoever thou wilt ask of God, God will give it to thee. 1. How willing her hope was. She humbly recommends the case to the wise and compassionate consideration of the Lord Jesus. When we know not what in particular to ask or expect, let us in general refer ourselves to God. 2. How weak her faith was. She should have said, "Lord, thou canst do whatsoever thou wilt"; but she only says, "Thou canst obtain whatsoever thou prayest for." His power is always predominant, his intercession always prevalent.

[2] The comfortable word which Christ gave to Martha (v. 23): Jesus saith unto her, Thy brother shall rise again. Martha, in her complaint, looked back. We are apt, in such cases, to add to our own trouble, by fancying what might have been. Christ directs Martha, and us in her, to look forward, and to think what shall be. Thy brother shall rise again. This was true of Lazarus in a sense peculiar to him: he was now presently to be raised. It is applicable to all the saints. Think you hear Christ saying, "Thy parent, thy child, thy yoke-fellow, shall rise again."

[3] The faith which Martha mixed with this word, and the unbelief mixed with this faith, v. 24. She accounts it a faithful saying that he shall rise again at the last day. Yet she seems to think this saying not so well worthy of all acceptation as really it was. I know that he shall rise again at the last day; and is not this enough? She seems to think it is not. Thus, by our discontent under present crosses, we greatly undervalue our future hopes.

[4] The further instruction and encouragement which Jesus Christ gave her. He said to her, I am the resurrection and the life, v. 25, 26. Two things Christ possesses her with the belief of.

First, The power of Christ, his sovereign power: I am the resurrection and the life. Martha believed that at his prayer God would give any thing, but he would have her know that by his word he could work anything. It is an unspeakable comfort to all good Christians that Jesus Christ is the resurrection and the life, and will be so to them. Resurrection is a return to life; Christ is the author of that return, and of that life to which it is a return.

Secondly, The promises of the new covenant. To whom these promises are made—to those that believe in Jesus Christ. The condition of the latter promise is thus expressed: Whosoever liveth and believeth in me, which may be understood, either, of natural life: Whosoever lives in this world, whether he be Jew or Gentile, if he believes in Christ, he shall live by him. Or, of spiritual life. He that lives and believes is he that by faith is born again to a heavenly and divine life. What the promises are (v. 25): Though he die, yet shall he live, nay, he shall never die, v. 26.

a. For the body; here is the promise of a blessed resurrection. Though the body be dead because of sin yet it shall live again. The body shall be raised a glorious body.

b. For the soul; here is the promise of a blessed immortality. He that liveth and believeth shall never die. That spiritual life shall never be extinguished, but perfected in eternal life. The mortality of the body shall at length be swallowed up of life; but the life of the soul shall be immediately at death swallowed up of immortality. Christ asks her, "Believest thou this? Canst thou take my word for it?" Martha was doting upon her brother's being raised to life in this world; before Christ gave her hopes of this, he directed her thoughts to another life, another world. The crosses and comforts of this present time would not make such an impression upon us as they do if we did but believe the things of eternity as we ought.

[5] Martha's unfeigned assent yielded to what Christ said, v. 27. We have here Martha's creed, the good confession she witnessed. And it is the conclusion of the whole matter.

First, Here is the guide of her faith, and that is the

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

21. Then said Martha . . . Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died—As Mary afterwards said the same thing (vs. 32), it is plain they had made this very natural remark to each other, perhaps many times during these four sad days, and not without having their confidence in His love at times overclouded. Such trials of faith, however, are not peculiar to them.

22. But I know that even now . . .—Energetic characters are usually sanguine, the rainbow of hope peering through the drenching cloud. whatsoever thou wilt ask of God, God will give it thee—i.e., 'even to the restoration of my dead brother to life,' for that plainly is her meaning, as the sequel shows.

23-27. Jesus saith unto her, Thy brother shall rise again—purposely expressing Himself in general terms, to draw her out.

24. Martha said, . . . I know that he shall rise again . . . at the last day—'But are we never to see him in life till then?'

25. Jesus said, I am the resurrection and the life—'The whole power to restore, impart, and maintain life, resides in Me.' (See on ch. 1:4; 5:21.) What higher claim to supreme divinity than this grand saying can be conceived?

he that believeth in me, though . . . dead . . . shall he live—i.e., The believer's death shall be swallowed up in life, and his life shall never sink into death. As death comes by sin, it is His to dissolve it; and as life flows through His righteousness, it is His to communicate and eternally maintain it (Rom. 5:21). The temporary separation of soul and body is here regarded as not even interrupting, much less impairing, the new and everlasting life imparted by Jesus to His believing people.

Believest thou this?—Canst thou take this in?

ADAM CLARKE

21. If thou hadst been here, my brother had not died. Mary said the same words to him a little after, v. 32, which proves that these sisters had not a complete knowledge of the omnipotence of Christ. They thought He could cure at hand, but not at a distance; or they thought that it was because He did not know of their brother's indisposition that He permitted him to die.

22. I know, that even now. She durst not ask so great a favor in direct terms; she only intimated modestly that she knew He could do it.

23. Thy brother shall rise again. That is, directly; for it was by raising him immediately from the dead that He intended to comfort her.

24. I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection. The doctrine of the resurrection of the dead was then commonly received; and though it was our Lord who fully exemplified it by His own resurrection, yet the opinion was common, not only among God's people, but among all those who believed in the God of Israel. The Jewish writings after the Captivity are full of this doctrine. See 2 Macc. vii. 9, 14, 23, 36; xii. 43; xiv. 46; Wisd. v. 1, 7, 17; vi. 6-7.

25. I am the resurrection, and the life. You say that your brother shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day; but by whom shall he arise if not by Me, who am the Author of the resurrection and the Source of life? And is it not as easy for Me to raise him now as to raise him then?

Though he were dead. Every man who has believed or shall believe in Me, though his believing shall not prevent him from dying a natural death, yet his body shall be reanimated, and he shall live with Me in an eternal glory. And everyone who is now dead, dead to God, dead in trespasses and sins, if he believe in Me, trust on Me as his sole Saviour, he shall live, shall be quickened by My Spirit, and live a life of faith, working by love.

26. Shall never die. Or "shall not die forever." Though he die a temporal death, he shall not continue under its power forever, but shall have a resurrection to life eternal.

Believest thou this? God has determined to work in the behalf of men only in proportion to their faith in Him. It was necessary, therefore, that these persons should be well instructed concerning His nature, that they might find no obstacles to their faith.

MATTHEW HENRY

word of Christ. She takes it entire as Christ had said it: Yea, Lord. Faith is an echo to divine revelation, returns the same words.

Secondly, The ground of her faith, and that is the authority of Christ. She has recourse to the foundation, for the support of the superstructure. "I have believed that thou art Christ, and therefore I do believe this." What she believed and confessed concerning Jesus. That he was the Christ; that he was the Son of God; that it was he who should come. That blessing of blessings she embraced as present. What she inferred hence. If she admits this, that Jesus is the Christ, there is no difficulty in believing that he is the resurrection and the life. He is the fountain of light and truth, and we may take all his sayings for faithful and divine. He is the fountain of life and blessedness, and we may therefore depend upon his ability.

2. The interview between Christ and Mary.

(1) The notice which Martha gave her of Christ's coming (v. 28): When she had so said, she went her way, and called Mary her sister. Time was when Martha would have drawn Mary from Christ, to come and help her in much serving (Luke x. 40). Here she is industrious to draw her to Christ. She called her secretly. She called her by order from Christ: The Master is come, and calleth for thee. She triumphs in his arrival: The Master is come. He whom we have long wished and waited for, he is come, he is come; this was the best cordial in the present distress. She invites her sister to go and meet him: "He calls for thee." When Christ our Master comes, he calls for us. He calls for thee in particular, for thee by name. If he calls thee, he will cure thee, he will comfort thee.

(2) The haste with which Mary made to Christ (v. 29): As soon as she heard that the Master was come, she arose quickly, and came to him. She little thought how near he was to her, for he is often nearer to them that mourn in Zion than they are aware of. The least intimation of Christ's gracious approaches is enough to a lively faith, which stands ready to take the hint, and answer the first call. She did not consult her neighbours, the Jews that were with her, comforting her; she left them all, to come to him.

(3) We are told (v. 30) where she found the Master; in that place where Martha met him. Christ's love to his work. He stayed near the place where the grave was, that he might be ready to go to it. Mary's love to Christ; still she loved much. Though Christ had seemed unkind in his delays, yet she could take nothing amiss from him.

(4) The misconstruction which the Jews made of her going away so hastily (v. 31): They said, She goes to the grave, to weep there. Martha bore up better under this affliction than Mary did, who was a woman of tender and sorrowful spirit; such was her natural temper. These comforters therefore concluded when she went out, it was to go to the grave and weep there. [1] What often is the folly and fault of mourners; they contrive how to aggravate their own grief, and to make bad worse. We are apt to fasten upon those things that aggravate the affliction, when it is our duty to reconcile ourselves to the will of God in it. [2] What is the wisdom and duty of comforters; and that is, to prevent as much as may be, the revival of the sorrow, and to divert it. Those Jews that followed Mary were thereby led to Christ, and became the witnesses of one of his most glorious miracles. It is good cleaving to Christ's friends in their sorrows, for thereby we may come to know him better.

(5) Mary's address to our Lord Jesus (v. 32): She came and fell down at his feet and said with many tears (as appears v. 33), Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died, as Martha said before. She fell down at his feet, which was more than Martha did, who had a greater command of her passions. This Mary had sat at Christ's feet to hear his word (Luke x. 39), and here we find her there on another errand. Those that in a day of peace place themselves at Christ's feet, to receive instructions from him, may with comfort and confidence in a day of trouble cast themselves at his feet with hope to find favour with him. Mary hereby made profession of the Christian faith as truly as Martha did, and in effect said, I believe that thou art the Christ. This she did in presence of the Jews that attended her, who, though friends to her and her family, yet were bitter enemies to Christ. Let them resent it as they pleased, she falls at his feet. Her address is very pathetic: Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died. Christ's delay was designed for the best, and proved so; yet both the sisters very indecently cast the same in his teeth, and in effect charge him with the death of their brother. Mary added no more, as Martha did. She said less than Martha, but wept more; and tears of devout affection have a voice, in the ears of Christ;

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

27. Yea, . . . I believe that thou art the Christ, the Son of God . . .—i.e., And having such faith in Thee, I can believe all which that comprehends. While she had a glimmering perception that Resurrection, in every sense of the word, belonged to the Messianic office and Sonship of Jesus, she means, by this way of expressing herself, to cover much that she felt her ignorance of—as no doubt belonging to Him.

28-32. The Master is come and calleth for thee—The narrative does not give us this interesting detail, but Martha's words do.

29. As soon as she heard that, she arose quickly—affection for her Lord, assurance of His sympathy, and His hope of interposition, putting a spring into her distressed spirit.

31. The Jews . . . followed her . . . to the grave—Thus casually were provided witnesses of the glorious miracle that followed, not prejudiced, certainly, in favor of Him who wrought it. to weep there—according to Jewish practice, for some days after burial.

fell at his feet—more impassioned than her sister, though her words were fewer. (See on vs. 21.)

ADAM CLARKE

27. Yea, Lord: I believe. "I have believed." Either meaning that she had believed this for some time past or that, since He began to teach her, her faith had been considerably increased. Martha here acknowledges Christ for the Messiah promised to their fathers; but her faith goes no further; and, having received some hope of her brother's present resurrection, she waited for no further instruction, but ran to call her sister.

28. The Master is come. This was the appellation which He had to the family; and from these words it appears that Christ had inquired for Mary, desiring to have her present, that He might strengthen her faith, previously to His raising her brother.

30. Jesus was not yet come into the town. As the Jewish burying places were without their cities and villages, it appears that the place where our Saviour was, when Martha met Him, was not far from the place where Lazarus was buried.

31. She goeth unto the grave to weep there. It appears that it was the custom for the nearest relatives of the deceased to go at times during the three days of weeping, accompanied by their friends and neighbors, to mourn near the graves of the deceased. They supposed that for three days the spirit hovered about the place where the body was laid, to see whether it might be again permitted to enter; but when it saw the face change, it knew that all hope was now past. It was on this ground that the seven days of lamentation succeeded the three days of weeping, because all hope was now taken away.

no rhetoric like this.

Verses 33–44

I. Christ's tender sympathy with his afflicted friends, which appeared three ways:—

1. By the inward groans and troubles of his spirit (v. 33): Jesus saw Mary weeping and the Jews that came with her weeping; he groaned in the spirit, and was troubled. The griefs of the sons of men represented in the tears of Mary and her friends. What an emblem was here of this world, this vale of tears! Religion teaches us likewise to weep with them that weep, as these Jews wept with Mary. Those that truly love their friends will share with them in their joys and griefs; for what is friendship but a communication of affections? The grace of the Son of God and his compassion towards those that are in misery. In all their afflictions he is afflicted, Isa. lxiii. 9. When Christ saw them all in tears, He groaned in the spirit. This was an expression of his feeling sense of the calamitous state of human life, and the power of death. Having now to make a vigorous attack upon death and the grave, he thus stirred up himself to the encounter. It was an expression of his kind sympathy with his friends that were in sorrow. Christ not only seemed concerned, but he groaned in the spirit; he was inwardly and sincerely affected with the case. Christ's was a deep and a hearty sigh. He was troubled. He troubled himself; so the phrase is, very significantly. He was never troubled, but when he troubled himself, as he saw cause. He often composed himself to trouble, but was never discomposed or disordered by it.

2. His concern for them appeared by his kind enquiry, (v. 34): Where have you laid him? He would thus divert the grief of his mourning friends, by raising their expectations of something great.

3. It appeared by his tears. Those about him desired him to come and see.

(1) As he was going to the grave, Jesus wept, v. 35. A very short verse, but it affords many useful instructions. Jesus Christ was really and truly man, susceptible of the impressions of joy, and grief. Christ gave this proof of his humanity, in both senses of the word; that, as a man, he could weep, and, as a merciful man, he would weep, before he gave this proof of his divinity. He was a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief, as was foretold, Isa. liii. 3. We never read that he laughed, but more than once we have him in tears. Tears of compassion well become Christians, and make them most to resemble Christ.

(2) Different constructions were put upon Christ's weeping. Some made a kind and candid interpretation of it (v. 36): Then said the Jews, Behold how he loved him! They seem to wonder that he should have so strong an affection for one to whom he was not related. It becomes us, according to this example of Christ, to show our love to our friends, both living and dying. Though our tears profit not the dead, they embalm their memory. When he only dropped a tear over Lazarus, they said, See how he loved him! Much more reason have we to say so, for whom he hath laid down his life: See how he loved us! Others make a peevish unfair reflection upon it (v. 37): Could not this man, who opened the eyes of the blind, have prevented the death of Lazarus? If he could have prevented it he would, and therefore because he did not they incline to think that he could not. Therefore it might justly be questioned whether he did indeed open the eyes of the blind. His not working this miracle they thought enough to invalidate the former. Christ soon convinced these whisperers, by raising Lazarus from the dead, which was the greater work that he could have prevented his death.

II. Christ's approach to the grave.

1. Christ repeats his groans (v. 38): Again groaning in himself, he comes to the grave; he groaned, (1) Being displeased at the unbelief of those who spoke doubtingly of his power, and blamed him for not preventing the death of Lazarus. He never groaned so much for his own pains and sufferings as for the sins and follies of men. (2) Being affected with the fresh lamentations which, it is likely, the mourning sisters made, when they came near the grave, his tender spirit was sensibly touched with their wailings. Ministers, when they are sent by the preaching of the gospel to raise dead souls, should be much affected with the deplorable condition of those they preach to and pray for, and groan in themselves to think of it.

2. The grave wherein Lazarus lay is here described: It was a cave, and a stone lay upon it; and such was the sepulchre in which Christ was buried. They reckoned the solemnity of the funeral ended when the stone was rolled to the grave, or, as here, laid upon it.

3. Orders are given to remove the stone (v. 39): Take away the stone. He would have this stone removed, that all the standers-by might see the body

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

33-38. When Jesus . . . saw her weeping, and the Jews . . . weeping . . . , he groaned in the spirit—the tears of Mary and her friends acting sympathetically upon Jesus, and drawing forth His emotions. What a vivid and beautiful outcoming of His real humanity! The word here rendered "groaned" does not mean "sighed" or "grieved," but rather "powerfully checked his emotion"—made a visible effort to restrain those tears which were ready to gush from His eyes. and was troubled—rather, "troubled himself" (Margin); referring probably to this visible difficulty of repressing His emotions.

34. Where have ye laid him? . . . Lord, come and see—Perhaps it was to retain composure enough to ask this question, and on receiving the answer to proceed with them to the spot, that He checked Himself. 35. Jesus wept—This beautifully conveys the sublime brevity of the two original words; else "shed tears" might have better conveyed the difference between the word here used and that twice employed in vs. 33, and there properly rendered "weeping," denoting the loud wail for the dead, while that of Jesus consisted of silent tears. Is it for nothing that the Evangelist, some sixty years after it occurred, holds up to all ages with such touching brevity the sublime spectacle of the Son of God in tears? What a seal of His perfect oneness with us in the most redeeming feature of our stricken humanity! But was there nothing in those tears beyond sorrow for human suffering and death? Could these effects move Him without suggesting the cause? Who can doubt that in His ear every feature of the scene proclaimed that stern law of the Kingdom, "The wages of sin is death," and that this element in His visible emotion underlay all the rest? 36. Then said the Jews, Behold how he loved him!—We thank you, O ye visitors from Jerusalem, for this spontaneous testimony to the human tenderness of the Son of God. 37. And—rather "But"—some . . . said, Could not this man, which opened the eyes of the blind, have caused that this man should not have died?—The former exclamation came from the better-feeling portion of the spectators; this betokens a measure of suspicion. It hardly goes the length of attesting the miracle on the blind man; but 'if (as everybody says) He did that, why could He not also have kept Lazarus alive?' As to the restoration of the dead man to life, they never so much as thought of it. But this disposition to dictate to divine power, and almost to peril our confidence in it upon its doing our bidding, is not confined to men of no faith. 38. Jesus again groaning in himself—i.e., as at vs. 33, checked or repressed His rising feelings, in the former instance, of sorrow, here of righteous indignation at their unreasonable unbelief; (cf. Mark 3:5) [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. But here, too, struggling emotion was deeper, now that His eye was about to rest on the spot where lay, in the still horrors of death, His friend.

a cave—the cavity, natural or artificial, of a rock. This, with the number of condoling visitors from Jerusalem, and the costly ointment with which Mary afterwards anointed Jesus at Bethany, all go to show that the family was in good circumstances. 39-44. Jesus said, Take ye away the stone—spoken to the attendants of Martha and Mary; for it was a work of

33. He groaned in the spirit. Here the blessed Jesus shows himself to be truly man; and a Man, too, who, notwithstanding His amazing dignity and excellence, did not feel it beneath Him to sympathize with the distressed, and weep with those who wept. After this example of our Lord, shall we say that it is weakness, folly, and sin to weep for the loss of relatives?

35. Jesus wept. The least verse in the Bible, yet inferior to none.

37. Could not this man, which opened the eyes? Through the maliciousness of their hearts these Jews considered the tears of Jesus as a proof of His weakness.

38. It was a cave. It is likely that several of the Jewish burying places were made in the sides of rocks.

39. Take ye away the stone. He desired to convince all those who were at the place, and lie dead in the sepulchre, and that way might be made for its coming out, and it might appear to be a true body, and not a ghost or spectre. It is a good step towards the raising of a soul to spiritual life when prejudices are removed and got over and way made for the word to the heart.

4. An objection made by Martha against the opening of the grave: Lord, by this time he stinketh, for he has been dead four days. Probably Martha perceived the body to smell, as they were removing the stone, and therefore cried out thus.

(1) It is easy to observe hence the nature of human bodies: four days are but a little while, yet what a great change will this time make with the body of man. Christ rose the third day because he was not to see corruption.

(2) Some think she said it in a due tenderness to the dead body. She did not care that it should be thus publicly shown and made a spectacle of. Others think she said it out of a concern for Christ. If there were any thing noisome she would not have her Master near it; but he was none of those tender and delicate ones that cannot bear an ill smell; if he had, he would not have visited the world of mankind, which sin had made a perfect dunghill. It should seem, by Christ's answer, that it was the language of her unbelief and distrust: "Lord, it is too late now. It is impossible that this putrid carcase should live." She gives up his case as helpless and hopeless. This distrustful word of hers served to make the miracle both the more evident and the more illustrious. Her suggesting that it could not be done puts the more honour upon him that did it.

5. The gentle reproof Christ gave to Martha (v. 40): Said I not unto thee that if thou wouldest believe thou shouldest see the glory of God? Our Lord Jesus has given us all the assurances imaginable that a sincere faith shall at length be crowned with a blessed vision. If we will take Christ's word, and rely on his power and faithfulness, we shall see the glory of God, and be happy in the sight. We have need to be often reminded of these sure mercies with which our Lord Jesus hath encouraged us. We are apt to forget what Christ has spoken, and need him to put us in mind of it by his Spirit: "Said I not unto thee so and so? And dost thou think that he will ever unsay it?"

6. The opening of the grave, notwithstanding Martha's objection (v. 41): Then they took away the stone. If we will see the glory of God, we must let Christ take his own way. They took away the stone, and this was all they could do; Christ only could give life.

III. The miracle itself wrought.

1. He applies himself to his living Father in heaven. The gesture he used was very significant: He lifted up his eyes. What is prayer, but the ascent of the soul to God, and the directing of its affections and motions heavenward? He lifted up his eyes, looking beyond the grave where Lazarus lay, and overlooking all the difficulties that arose thence. His address to God was with great assurance: Father, I thank thee that thou hast heard me. He has here taught us, by his own example, First, In prayer to call God Father. Secondly, In our prayers to praise him, and thankfully to acknowledge former favours. But our Saviour's thanksgiving here was intended to express the unshaken assurance he had of the effecting of this miracle. He speaks of this as his own act (v. 11): I go, that I may awake him; yet he speaks of it as what he had obtained by prayer, for his Father heard him. Christ speaks of this miracle as an answer to prayer. He was pleased thus to honour prayer, making it the key wherewith even he unlocked the treasures of divine power and grace. Christ, being assured that his prayer was answered, professes:

(1) His thankful acceptance of this answer: I thank thee that thou hast heard me. He triumphs before the victory. We may by faith in the promise have a prospect of mercy before it be actually given in, and give God thanks for it. Mercies in answer to prayer ought in a special manner to be acknowledged with thankfulness. Besides the grant of the mercy itself, we are to value it as a great favour to have our poor prayers taken notice of. As God answers us with mercy, even before we call, so we should answer him with praise even before he grants.

(2) His cheerful assurance of a ready answer at any time (v. 42): And I know that thou hearest me always. "I gave thanks" (saith he) "for being heard in this, because I am sure to be heard in every thing." The Father heard him always, which may encourage us to depend upon his intercession, and put all our petitions into his hand, for we are sure that him the Father hears always. The confidence he had: I knew it. We cannot have such a particular assurance as he had; but this we know, that whatsoever we ask according to his will he heareth us, 1 John v. 14, 15. But why no little labor [GROTIUS]. According to the Talmudists, it was forbidden to open a grave after the stone was placed upon it. Besides other dangers, they were apprehensive of legal impurity by contact with the dead. Hence they avoided coming nearer a grave than four cubits [MAIMONIDES in LAMPE]. But He who touched the leper, and the bier of the widow of Nain's son, rises here also above these Judaic memorials of evils, every one of which He had come to roll away. Observe here what our Lord did Himself, and what He made others do. As Elijah himself repaired the altar on Carmel, arranged the wood, cut the victim, and placed the pieces on the fuel, but made the bystanders fill the surrounding trench with water, that no suspicion might arise of fire having been secretly applied to the pile (I Kings 18:30-35); so our Lord would let the most skeptical see that, without laying a hand on the stone that covered His friend, He could recall him to life. But what could be done by human hand He orders to be done, reserving only to Himself what transcended the ability of all creatures. Martha, the sister of ... the dead—and as such the proper guardian of the precious remains; the relationship being here mentioned to account for her venturing gently to remonstrate against their exposure, in a state of decomposition, to eyes that had loved him so tenderly in life. Lord, by this time he stinketh, for he hath been dead four days—(See on vs. 17). It is wrong to suppose from this [as LAMPE and others do] that, like the bystanders, she had not thought of his restoration to life. But the glimmerings of hope which she cherished from the first (vs. 22), and which had been brightened by what Jesus said to her (vss. 23-27), had suffered a momentary eclipse on the proposal to expose the now sightless corpse. To such fluctuations all real faith is subject in dark hours. (See, for example, the case of Job.) 40. Jesus saith unto her, Said I not unto thee, that if thou wouldest believe, thou shouldest see the glory of God?—He had not said those very words, but this was the scope of all that He had uttered to her about His life-giving power (vss. 23, 25, 26); a gentle yet emphatic and most instructive rebuke: 'Why doth the restoration of life, even to a decomposing corpse, seem hopeless in the presence of the Resurrection and the Life? Hast thou yet to learn that "if thou canst believe, all things are possible to him that believeth?" ' (Mark 9:23).

41. Jesus lifted up his eyes—an expression marking His calm solemnity. (Cf. ch. 17:1.)

Father, I thank thee that thou hast heard me—rather, "heardest Me," referring to a specific prayer offered by Him, probably on intelligence of the case reaching Him (vss. 3,4); for His living and loving oneness with the Father was maintained and manifested in the flesh, not merely by the spontaneous and uninterrupted outgoing of Each to Each in spirit, but by specific actings of faith and exercises of prayer about each successive case as it emerged. He prayed [says LUTHARDT well] not for what He wanted, but for the manifestation of what He had; and having the bright consciousness of the answer in the felt liberty to ask it, and the assurance that it was at hand, He gives thanks for this with a grand simplicity before performing the act. 42. And—rather "Yet"—I knew that thou hearest me always, but because of the people that stand by I said it, that they might believe that thou hast sent me—Instead of praying now, He simply gives thanks for answer to prayer offered ere He left Perea, and adds that His doing even this, in the audience of the people, was not from any doubt of the prevalency of His prayers in any case, but to show the people that He did nothing without His Father, but all by direct communication with Him.

ADAM CLARKE

especially those who took away the stone, that Lazarus was not only dead, but that putrescency had already taken place, that it might not afterwards be said that Lazarus had only fallen into a lethargy, but that the greatness of the miracle might be fully evinced.

He stinketh. The body is in a state of putrefaction. The Greek word signifies simply "to smell," whether the scent be good or bad; but the circumstances of the case sufficiently show that the latter is its meaning here. For he hath been dead four days. "This is the fourth day," i.e., since his interment. Christ himself was buried on the same day on which He was crucified, see chap. xix. 42, and it is likely that Lazarus was buried also on the same day on which he died.

40. If thou wouldest believe. So it appears that it is faith alone that interests the miraculous and saving power of God in behalf of men.

41. Where the dead was laid. These words are wanting in some MSS. Father, I thank thee. As it was a common opinion that great miracles might be wrought by the power and in the name of the devil, Jesus lifted up His eyes to heaven, and invoked the supreme God before these unbelieving Jews, that they might see that it was by His power, and by His only, that this miracle was done.

MATTHEW HENRY

should Christ give this public intimation of his obtaining this miracle by prayer? It is because of the people who stand by, that they may believe that thou hast sent me; for prayer may preach. It was to obviate the objections of his enemies. It was blasphemously suggested by the Pharisees that he wrought his miracles by compact with the devil; now, to evidence the contrary, he openly made his address to God, using prayers, and not charms, with elevated eyes and voice professing his dependence on Heaven. It was to corroborate the faith of those that were well inclined to him: That they may believe that thou hast sent me. Christ proves his mission by raising to life one that was dead.

2. He now applies himself to his dead friend. He cried with a loud voice, Lazarus come forth.

(1) He could have raised Lazarus by a silent exertion of his power and will, but he did it by a call, a loud call.

[1] To be significant of the power then put forth for the raising of Lazarus. The soul of Lazarus, which was to be called back, was at a distance, not hovering about the grave, as the Jews fancied, but removed to Hades. It is natural to speak loud when we call to those at a distance. The body of Lazarus, which was to be called up, was asleep, and we usually speak loud when we would awake any out of sleep.

[2] To be typical of other works of wonder which the power of Christ was to effect. This loud call was a figure, First, Of the gospel call, by which dead souls were to be brought out of the grave of sin. Secondly, Of the sound of the archangel's trumpet at the last day, with which they that sleep in the dust shall be awakened when Christ shall descend with a shout.

(2) This loud call was but short, yet mighty through God. He calls him by name, Lazarus, as we call those by their names whom we would wake out of a fast sleep. He calls him out of the grave. He does not say unto him, Live; but he saith to him, Move, for when by the grace of Christ we live spiritually we must stir up ourselves to move; the grave of sin and this world is no place for those whom Christ has quickened, and therefore they must come forth. The event was according to the intention: He that was dead came forth, v. 44. Power went along with the word of Christ to reunite the soul and body of Lazarus, and then he came forth. The miracle is described, not by its invisible springs, to satisfy our curiosity, but by its visible effects, to confirm our faith. If any ask whether Lazarus, after he was raised, could give an account or description of his soul's removal out of the body or return to it, or what he saw in the other world, I suppose both these changes were so unaccountable to himself that it was not lawful nor possible to express it. Let us not covet to be wise above what is written, and this is all that is written concerning the resurrection of that Lazarus, that he that was dead came forth.

(3) This miracle was wrought, [1] Speedily. Nothing intervenes between the command, Come forth, and the effect, He came forth. [2] Perfectly. He was so thoroughly revived that he got up out of his grave as strongly as ever he got up out of his bed, and returned not only to life, but health. He was not raised to serve a present turn, but to live as other men. He came out of his grave, though he was fettered with his grave-clothes, with which he was bound hand and foot, and his face bound about with a napkin (for so the manner of the Jews was to bury); and he came forth in the same dress wherein he was buried, that it might appear that it was he himself and not another. The standers-by, in unbinding him, would handle him, and see him, that it was he himself, and so be witnesses of the miracle. How little we carry away with us, when we leave the world—only a winding-sheet and a coffin; there is no change of raiment in the grave, nothing but a single suit of grave-clothes. Lazarus being come forth, hampered and embarrassed with his grave-clothes, we may well imagine that those about the grave were exceedingly surprised and frightened at it. Christ, to make the thing familiar, sets them to work: "Loose him, slacken his grave-clothes, that they may serve for day-clothes till he comes to his house."

We have here an account of the consequences of this glorious miracle.

I. Some were invited by it, and induced to believe. Many of the Jews, when they saw the things that Jesus did, believed on him. They had often heard of his miracles, and yet evaded the conviction of them, by calling in question the matter of fact; but now that they had themselves seen this done their unbelief was conquered. These were some of those Jews that came to Mary, to comfort her. When we are doing good offices to others we put ourselves in the way of 43, 44. and when he had thus spoken, he cried with a loud voice—On one other occasion only did He this—on the cross. His last utterance was a "loud cry" (Matt. 27:50). "He shall not cry," said the prophet, nor, in His ministry, did He. What a sublime contrast is this "loud cry" to the magical "whisperings" and "mutterings" of which we read in Isaiah 8:19; 29:4 [as GROTIUS remarks]! It is second only to the grandeur of that voice which shall raise all the dead (ch. 5:28, 29; I Thess. 4:16).

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

44. Jesus saith unto them, Loose him and let him go—Jesus will no more do this Himself than roll away the stone. The one was the necessary preparation for resurrection, the other the necessary sequel to it. THE LIFE-GIVING ACT ALONE HE RESERVES TO HIMSELF. So in the quickening of the dead to spiritual life, human instrumentality is employed first to prepare the way, and then to turn it to account.

ADAM CLARKE

43. He cried with a loud voice. In chap. v. 25, our Lord had said that the time was coming in which the dead should hear the voice of the Son of God and live. He now fulfills that prediction and cries aloud, that the people may take notice, and see that even death is subject to the sovereign command of Christ.

44. Bound hand and foot with graveclothes. "Swathed about with rollers." These were long slips of linen a few inches in breadth with which the body and limbs of the dead were swathed, and especially those who were embalmed, that the aromatics might be kept in contact with the flesh. But as it is evident that Lazarus had not been embalmed, it is probable that his limbs were not swathed together, as is the constant case with those who are embalmed, but separately, so that he could come out of the tomb at the command of Christ, though he could not walk freely till the rollers were taken away. Loose him, and let him go. He would have the disciples and those who were at hand take part in this business, that the fullest conviction might rest on every person's mind concerning the reality of what was wrought. He whom the grace of Christ converts and restores to life comes forth at His call from the dark, dismal grave of sin, in which his soul has long been buried. He walks, according to the command of Christ, in newness of life; and gives, by the holiness of his conduct, the fullest proof to all his acquaintance that he is alive from the dead.

45. Many of the Jews . . . believed on him. They saw that the miracle was incontestable, and they were determined to resist the truth no longer. Their friendly visit to these distressed sisters became the means of their conversion.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

Someone asks, "Why did Jesus have to cry with a loud voice?" That is a child's question, and therefore it is the sort of question that admits to the kingdom of heaven and truth. It does look as though He had to cry in a loud voice to make Lazarus hear. But we know that is not so. Profundity is in the simplicities. He raised His voice that the crowd might hear. He had prayed to his Father that the multitude may believe, and now that all may hear what He does, He raised His voice. With a loud voice He spoke. Moreover, the habit of that time, and indeed of today in the case of all sorts of sorcerers and wizards communicating with the dead, was and is that of muttering incantations that nobody but themselves understand. I am not sure that this was not also the reason of the loud voice. "He cried with a loud voice, Lazarus, come forth."

But far more important than that, He spoke as to somebody who could hear Him. Martha would not have thought of calling Lazarus. Mary in her wailing might have called upon her brother, "O Lazarus, Lazarus!" But she would never have dreamed that he could hear her. Jesus spoke as to one who could hear. He knew that Lazarus was not dead. He told Martha that he was asleep, he was not dead. When He went into the house of Jairus, He said, "Talitha cumi," that exquisitely beautiful little phrase so badly rendered "Damsel arise," which should be, "Little lamb arise." He expected her to hear Him. She did! That was His attitude now. His was the voice which needed no raising for that purpose; but that carried over the borderline, and could be heard on the other side.

—The Gospel According to John

receiving favours from God.

II. Others were irritated by it, and hardened in their unbelief.

1. The informers were so (v. 46): Some of them went to the Pharisees and told them what things Jesus had done, with a spiteful design to excite those who needed no spur the more vigorously to prosecute him. A most obstinate infidelity, refusing to yield to the most powerful means of conviction. A most inveterate enmity. If they would not be satisfied that he was to be believed in as the Christ, yet one would think they should have been mollified, and persuaded not to persecute him.

2. The judges, the blind leaders, of the people were no less exasperated by the report made to them.

(1) A special council is called and held (v. 47): Then gathered the chief priests and Pharisees a council. This council was called, not only for joint advice, but for mutual irritation; that so they might exasperate and inflame one another with enmity and rage against Christ.

(2) The case is proposed, and shown to be weighty and of great consequence.

[1] The matter to be debated was what course they should take with this Jesus; they said, What do we? For this man doeth many miracles. They own the truth of Christ's miracles, and that he had wrought many of them; they are therefore witnesses against themselves, for they acknowledge his credentials and yet deny his commission. They consider what is to be done, and chide themselves that they have not done something sooner effectually to crush him. They do not take it at all into their consideration whether they shall not receive him and own him as the Messiah; but they take it for granted that he is an enemy, and as such is to be run down: "What do we? Shall we be always talking, and bring nothing to pass?"

[2] That which made this matter weighty was the peril they apprehended their church and nation to be in from the Romans (v. 48): "If we do not silence him, all men will believe on him; and, this being the setting up of a new king, the Romans will come and take away our place and nation." See what an opinion they have of their own power. They speak as if they thought Christ's progress depended upon their connivance; as if it were in their power to conquer him who had conquered death.

a. They take on them to prophecy that if he have liberty to go on, all men will believe on him. Thus do they now make his interest formidable, though, to serve another turn, these same men strove to make it contemptible, ch. vii. 48, Have any of the rulers believed on him? This was the thing they were afraid of, that men would believe on him.

b. They foretell that if the generality of the nation be drawn after him, the rage of the Romans will be drawn upon them. They will come and take away our place. Here appeared a cowardice. Had they kept their integrity, they needed not to have feared the Romans; but they speak like a dispirited people. When men lose their piety they lose their courage. It was false that there was any danger of the Romans' being irritated against their nation by the progress of Christ's gospel. He taught men to give tribute to Cæsar, and not to resist evil. The Roman governor, at his trial, could find no fault in him. Pretended fears are often the colour of malicious designs. The enemies of Christ and his gospel have often coloured their enmity with a seeming care for the public good and the common safety, and have branded his prophets and ministers as men that turn the world upside down. Carnal policy commonly sets up reasons of state, in opposition to rules of justice. That calamity which we seek to escape by sin we take the most effectual course to bring upon our own heads.

(3) Caiaphas makes a malicious but mystical speech in the council.

[1] The malice of it appears evident at first view, v. 49, 50. He, being the high priest, took upon him to decide the matter. "You know nothing at all. It is soon determined, if you consider that received maxim, That it is expedient for us that one man should die for the people."

First, The counsellor was Caiaphas, who was high priest that same year.

Secondly, the drift of the advice was, in short, this, That some way or other must be found out to put Jesus to death. Caiaphas does not say, Let him be silenced, but die he must.

Thirdly, This is plausibly insinuated. He suggests his own sagacity. How scornfully does he say, "You know nothing, who are but common priests. Thus it is common for those in authority to impose their corrupt dictates by virtue of that; and, because they should be the wisest and best, to expect that everybody should believe they are so. He takes it for granted that the case is plain and past dispute. Reason and 45, 46. many . . . which . . . had seen . . . believed . . . . But some . . . went . . . to the Pharisees and told them what Jesus had done—the two classes which continually reappear in the Gospel history; nor is there ever any great work of God which does not produce both. "It is remarkable that on each of the three occasions on which our Lord raised the dead, a large number of persons was assembled. In two instances, the resurrection of the widow's son and of Lazarus, these were all witnesses of the miracle; in the third (of Jairus' daughter) they were necessarily cognizant of it. Yet this important circumstance is in each case only incidentally noticed by the historians, not put forward or appealed to as a proof of their veracity. In regard to this miracle, we observe a greater degree of preparation, both in the provident arrangement of events, and in our Lord's actions and words than in any other. The preceding miracle (cure of the man born blind) is distinguished from all others by the open and formal investigation of its facts. And both these miracles, the most public and best attested of all, are related by John, who wrote long after the other Evangelists" [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. 47-54. What do we? for this man doeth many miracles.—'While we trifle, "this man," by His "many miracles," will carry all before Him; the popular enthusiasm will bring on a revolution, which will precipitate the Romans upon us, and our all will go down in one common ruin.' What a testimony to the reality of our Lord's miracles, and their resistless effect, from His bitterest enemies!

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

The resurrection of Lazarus had raised a wave of popular excitement. Any stir among the people was dangerous, especially at the Passover time, which was nigh at hand, when Jerusalem would be filled with crowds of men, ready to take fire from any spark that might fall among them. So a hasty meeting of the principal ecclesiastical council of the Jews was summoned in order to discuss the situation and concert measures for repressing the nascent enthusiasm. One might have expected to find there some disposition to inquire honestly into the claims of a teacher who had such a witness to His claims as a man alive that had been dead. But nothing of the sort appears in their ignoble calculations. Like all weak men, they feel that "something must be done," and are perfectly unable to say what. They admit Christ's miracles: "This man doeth many miracles," but they are not a bit the nearer to recognizing His mission, being therein disobedient to their law and untrue to their office. They fear that any disturbance will bring Rome's heavy hand down on them, and lead to the loss of what national life they still possess. But even that fear is not patriotism nor religion. It is pure self-interest. "They will take away our place"—the Temple, probably—"and our nation." The holy things were, in their eyes, their special property. And so, at this supreme moment, big with the fate of themselves and of their nation, their whole anxiety is about personal interests.
—Expositions of Holy Scripture

ADAM CLARKE

47. Then gathered the chief priests and the Pharisees a council. The Pharisees, as such, had no power to assemble councils; and therefore only those are meant who were scribes or elders of the people, in conjunction with Annas and his son-in-law, Caiaphas, who were the high priests here mentioned. See chap. xviii. 13, 24.

What do we? This last miracle was so clear, plain, and incontestable that they were driven now to their wits' end. Their own spies had come and borne testimony of it.

48. All men will believe on him. If we permit Him to work but a few more miracles like these last two (the cure of the blind man and the resurrection of Lazarus), He will be universally acknowledged for the Messiah; the people will proclaim Him king; and the Romans, who can suffer no government here but their own, will be so irritated that they will send their armies against us and destroy our Temple and utterly dissolve our civil and ecclesiastical existence. Both our place and nation. Literally, "this place," but that the Temple only is understood is clear from Acts vi. 13-14; 2 Macc. i. 14; ii. 18; iii. 18; v. 16-17; x. 7; where it is uniformly called "the place," or "the holy place," because they considered it the most glorious and excellent place in the world. When men act in opposition to God's counsel, the very evils which they expect thereby to avoid will come upon them. They said, If we do not put Jesus to death, the Romans will destroy both our Temple and nation. Now it was because they put Him to death that the Romans burned and razed their Temple to the ground and put a final period to their political existence. See Matt. xxii. 7 and the notes on chap. xxiv.

49. Caiaphas being the high priest that same year. By the law of Moses, Exod. xl. 15, the office of high priest was for life, and the son of Aaron's race always succeeded his father. But at this time the high priesthood was almost annual. The Romans and Herod put down and raised up whom they pleased, and when they pleased, without attending to any other rule than merely that the person put in this office should be of the sacerdotal race. According to Josephus, Ant. xviii, c. 3, the proper name of this person was Joseph, and Caiaphas was his surname. He possessed the high priesthood for eight or nine years and was deposed by Vitellius, governor of Judea. Ye know nothing. Of the perilous state in which you stand.

justice are often run down with a high hand. Truth is fallen in the streets, and, when it is down, down with it; and equity cannot enter, and, when it is out, out with it. He insists upon a maxim in politics, That the welfare of communities is to be preferred before that of particular persons. It is expedient for us that one man die for the people. Caiaphas craftily insinuates that the greatest and best man ought to think his life well spent, nay well lost, to save his country from ruin. The case ought to have been put thus: Was it expedient for them to bring upon themselves and upon their nation the guilt of blood, for the securing of their civil interests? Carnal policy, while it thinks to save all by sin, ruins all at last.

[2] The mystery that was in this counsel of Caiaphas does not appear at first view, but the evangelist leads us into it (v. 51, 52): This spoke he not of himself. In these words he prophesied, though he himself was not aware of it, that Jesus should die for that nation. Here is a precious comment upon a pernicious text. Charity teaches us to put the most favourable construction upon men's words and actions that they will bear; but piety teaches us to make a good improvement of them. If wicked men are God's hand to humble and reform us, why may they not be God's mouth to instruct and convince us? As the hearts of all men are in God's hand, so are their tongues.

(4) The evangelist explains and enlarges upon Caiaphas's words.

[1] He explains what he said. He did not speak it of himself. As it was an artifice to stir up the council against Christ, he spoke it of himself, but as it was an oracle, declaring it the purpose and design of God, he did not speak it of himself.

First, He prophesied, and those that prophesied did not, in their prophecying, speak of themselves. But is Caiaphas also among the prophets? He is so, this once. God can and often does make wicked men instruments to serve his own purposes, even contrary to their own intentions. Words of prophecy in the mouth are no infallible evidence of a principle of grace in the heart. Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? will be rejected as a frivolous plea.

Secondly, He prophesied, being high priest that year; not that his being high priest did at all dispose or qualify him to be a prophet. Being high priest, God was pleased to put this significant word into his mouth rather than into the mouth of any other, that it might be the more observed or the non-observance of it the more aggravated.

Thirdly, The matter of his prophecy was that Jesus should die for that nation. He meant by that nation those in it that obstinately adhered to Judaism, but God meant those in it that would receive the doctrine of Christ, and become followers of him. It is a great thing that is here prophesied: That Jesus should die, die for others, not only for their good, but in their stead. If the whole nation of the Jews had unanimously believed in Christ, and received his gospel, they had been not only saved eternally, but saved as a nation from their grievances.

[2] The evangelist enlarges upon this word of Caiaphas (v. 52), not for that nation only, but that also he should gather together in one the children of God that were scattered abroad.

First, The persons Christ died for: Not for the nation of the Jews only. He must die for the children of God that were scattered abroad. Some understand it of the children of God that were then in being, scattered abroad in the Gentile world, devout men of every nation that feared God and worshipped him. Christ died to incorporate these in one great society. Others take in with these all that belong to the election of grace, who are called the children of God. There are those that fear him throughout all generations; to all these he had an eye in the atonement he made. As he prayed, so he died, for all that should believe on him.

Secondly, The purpose and intention of his death: he died to gather in those who wandered, and to gather together in one those who were scattered. Christ's dying is, 1. The great attractive of our hearts; for this end he is lifted up, to draw men to him. His love in dying for us is the great lodestone of our love. 2. The great centre of our unity. He gathers them together in one. All the saints in all places and ages meet in Christ.

(5) The result of this debate (v. 53): From that day they took counsel together, to put him to death. They now understood one another's minds, and so each was fixed in his own, that Jesus must die. What before they had thought of severally now they jointly concurred in, and so strengthened the hands one of another in this wickedness. Evil men confirm and encourage themselves and one another in evil practices, by comparing notes; then the wickedness which before seemed impracticable appears not only possible, but easy to be effected. What before they wished done,

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

TODAY'S DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE:

Caiaphas, the Jewish high priest (A.D. 27-36) at the beginning of our Lord's public ministry, in the reign of Tiberius (Luke 3:1), and also at the time of his condemnation and crucifixion (Matt. 26:3, 57; John 11:49; 18:13, 14). He held this office during the whole of Pilate's administration. His wife was the daughter of Annas, who had formerly been high priest, and was probably the vicar or deputy (Heb. sagan) of Caiaphas. He was of the sect of the Sadducees (Acts 5:17) and was a member of the council when he gave his opinion that Jesus should be put to death "for the people, and that the whole nation perish not" (John 11:50). In these words he unconsciously uttered a prophecy. "Like Saul, he was a prophet in spite of himself." Caiaphas had no power to inflict the punishment of death, and therefore Jesus was sent to Pilate, the Roman governor, that he might duly pronounce the sentence against him (Matt. 27:2; John 18:28). At a later period his hostility to the gospel is still apparent (Acts 4:6).

Caiaphas . . . prophesied that Jesus should die for that nation.—He meant nothing more than that the way to prevent the apprehended ruin of the nation was to make a sacrifice of the Disturber of their peace. But in giving utterance to this suggestion of political expediency, he was so guided as to give forth a divine prediction of deep significance; and God so ordered it that it should come from the lips of the high priest for that memorable year, the recognized head of God's visible people, whose ancient office, symbolized by the Urim and Thummim, was to decide in the last resort, all vital questions as the oracle of the divine will.

and not for that nation only . . .—These are the Evangelist's words, not Caiaphas'.

53. they took council together to put him to death—Caiaphas but expressed what the party was secretly wishing, but afraid to propose.

ADAM CLARKE

50. Nor consider. Instead of ye do not consider, which properly conveys the idea of "conferring" or "talking together," neither do ye reason or consider rightly is the reading of several MSS. and some of the primitive fathers. That one man should die for the people. In saying these remarkable words Caiaphas had no other intention than merely to state that it was better to put Jesus to death than to expose the whole nation to ruin on His account. His maxim was, It is better to sacrifice one man than a whole nation.

51. This spake he not of himself. Wicked and worthless as he was, God so guided his tongue that, contrary to his intention, he pronounced a prophecy of the death of Jesus Christ. I have already remarked that the doctrine of a vicarious atonement had gained, long before this time, universal credit in the world. Words similar to these of Caiaphas are, by the prince of all the Roman poets, put in the mouth of Neptune, when promising Venus that the fleet of Aeneas should be preserved, and his whole crew should be saved, one only excepted, whose death he speaks of in these remarkable words: "One life shall fall, that many may be saved." This victim the poet informs us was Palinurus, the pilot of Aeneas' own ship, who was precipitated into the deep by a divine influence.

52. And not for that nation only. These, and the preceding words in v. 51, are John's explication of what was prophetic in the words of Caiaphas; as if John had said, He is indeed to die for the sins of the Jewish nation, but not for theirs alone, but for the sins of the whole world. See His own words afterwards, 1 John ii. 1-2. Gather together in one. That He should "collect into one body"; form one Church out of the Jewish and Gentile believers. Children of God that were scattered abroad. Probably John meant only the Jews who were dispersed among all nations since the conquest of Judea by the Romans (these are called "the dispersed," chap. vii. 35, and Jas. i. 1); and it is because he refers to these only that he terms them here the children of God, which was an ancient character of the Jewish people; see Deut. xxxii. 5; Isa. xliii. 6; xlv. 11; Jer. xxxii. 1. Taking his words in this sense, then his meaning is this: that Christ was to die, not only for the then inhabitants of Judea, but for all the Jewish race wheresoever scattered; and that the consequence would be that they should be all collected from their various dispersions and made one body. This comports with the predictions of Paul, Rom. xi. 1-32.

53. They took counsel together. They were of one accord in the business, and had fully made up their minds on the subject; they waited only for a proper opportunity to put Him to death.

but wanted a colour for, now they are furnished with a plausible pretence to justify themselves in.

(6) Christ hereupon absconded, v. 54. He walked no more openly among the Jews. He withdrew into an obscure part of the country, so obscure that the name of the town he retired to is scarcely met with anywhere else. He went to a country near the wilderness. He entered into a city called Ephraim. Thither his disciples went with him; neither would they leave him in solitude, nor would he leave them in danger. But why would Christ abscond now? It was not because he either feared the power of his enemies or distrusted his own power. He retired to put a mark of his displeasure upon Jerusalem and the people of the Jews. They rejected him and his gospel; justly therefore did he remove himself and his gospel from them. It was a sad presage of that thick darkness which was shortly to come upon Jerusalem, because she knew not the day of her visitation. It was to render the cruelty of his enemies the more inexcusable. He would try whether their anger would be turned away by his retirement into privacy. His hour was not yet come, and therefore he declined danger. His retirement, for awhile, was to make his return into Jerusalem the more remarkable and illustrious. This swelled the acclamations of joy with which his well-wishers welcomed him when he rode triumphantly into the city.

(7) The strict enquiry made for him during his recess, v. 55–57.

[1] The occasion of it was the approach of the passover, at which they expected his presence, according to custom (v. 55): The Jews' passover was nigh at hand, a festival which shone bright in their calendar. Now the passover being at hand, many went out of all parts of the country to Jerusalem, to purify themselves. This was either: A necessary purification of those who had contracted any ceremonial pollution. Or: A voluntary purification, by fasting and prayer, and other religious exercises, which many spent some time in before the passover.

[2] The enquiry was very solicitous: They said, What think you, that he will not come to the feast? v. 56. Some think this was said by those who wished well to him, and expected his coming. Those who came early out of the country, that they might purify themselves, were very desirous to meet with Christ, and perhaps came up the sooner with that expectation. They enquired what news of Christ? It should rather seem that they were his enemies who made this enquiry after him. When they should have been assisting those that came to purify themselves, according to the duty of their place, they were plotting against Christ. Their asking, What think you? Will he not come up to the feast? implies, a. An invidious reflection upon Christ, as if he would omit his attendance on the feast of the Lord for fear of exposing himself. It is sad to see holy ordinances prostituted to such unholy purposes. b. A fearful apprehension that they had of missing their game: "Will he not come up to the feast? If he do not, our measures are broken."

[3] The orders for the apprehending of him were very strict, v. 57. The great sanhedrim issued out a proclamation, strictly charging and requiring that if any person knew where he was they should show it, that he might be taken. See, First, How intent they were upon this prosecution. Secondly, How willing they were to involve others in the guilt with them. It is an aggravation of the sins of wicked rulers that they commonly make those that are under them instruments of their unrighteousness.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

Jesus . . . walked no more openly among the Jews—How could He, unless He had wished to die before His time? near to the wilderness—of Judea. a city called Ephraim—between Jerusalem and Jericho.

55-57. passover . . . at hand . . . many went . . . up . . . before the passover, to purify themselves—from any legal uncleanness which would have disqualified them from keeping the feast. This is mentioned to introduce the graphic statement which follows.

56. sought they for Jesus, and spake among themselves, as they stood in the temple—giving forth the various conjectures and speculations about the probability of His coming to the feast. that he will not come—The form of this question implies the opinion that He would come.

57. chief priests and the Pharisees had given a commandment that if any knew where he were, he should show it, that they might take him—This is mentioned to account for the conjectures whether He would come, in spite of this determination to seize Him.

ADAM CLARKE

54. Walked no more openly. He did not go as before through the cities and villages, teaching, preaching, and healing the sick. A city called Ephraim. Variously written in the MSS., Ephraim, Ephrem, Ephram, and Ephratha. This was a little village situated in the neighborhood of Bethel; for the scripture (2 Chron. xiii. 19) and Josephus join them both together. Eusebius and Jerome say it was about twenty miles north of Jerusalem.

55. The Jews' passover was nigh at hand. It is not necessary to suppose that this verse has any particular connection with the preceding. Most chronologists agree that our Lord spent at least two months in Ephraim. This was the last Passover which our Lord attended, and it was at this one that He suffered death for the salvation of a lost world. As the Passover was nigh, many of the inhabitants of Ephraim and its neighborhood went up to Jerusalem, some time (perhaps seven or eight days, for so much time was required to purify those who had touched the dead) before the feast, that they might purify themselves, and not eat the Passover otherwise than prescribed in the law. Many of the country people, in the time of Hezekiah, committed a trespass by not attending to this; see 2 Chron. xxx. 18-19. Those mentioned in the text wished to avoid this inconvenience.

56. Then sought they for Jesus. Probably those of Ephraim, in whose company Christ is supposed to have departed for the feast, but, having stayed behind, perhaps at Jericho, or its vicinity, the others had not missed Him till they came to the Temple, and then inquired among each other whether He would not attend the feast. Or the persons mentioned in the text might have been the agents of the high priest, and hearing that Christ had been at Ephraim, came and inquired among the people that came from that quarter whether Jesus would not attend the festival, knowing that He was punctual in His attendance on all the Jewish solemnities.

57. Had given a commandment. Had given order; "positive order," or "injunction," and perhaps with a grievous penalty, that no one should keep the place of His residence a secret. This was their hour, and the power of darkness; and now they were fully determined to take away His life. The order here spoken of was given in consequence of the determination of the council, mentioned in vv. 48–53.

CHAPTER 12

Verses 1–11

I. The kind visit our Lord Jesus paid to his friends at Bethany, v. 1. He came up out of the country, six days before the passover, and took up at Bethany. He lodged here with his friend Lazarus, whom he had lately raised from the dead. His coming to Bethany now may be considered.

1. As a preface to the passover he intended to celebrate, to which reference is made in assigning the date of his coming: Six days before the passover.

2. As a voluntary exposing of himself to the fury of his enemies; now that his hour was at hand he came within their reach. Our Lord Jesus was voluntary in his sufferings; his life was not forced from him, but resigned. As the strength of his persecutors could not overpower him, so their subtlety could not surprise him. As there is a time when we are allowed to shift for our own preservation, so there is a time when we are called to hazard our lives in the cause of God.

3. As an instance of his kindness to his friends at Bethany, whom he loved. This was a farewell visit.

CHAPTER 12

Vss. 1-11. THE ANOINTING AT BETHANY. (See on Matt. 26:6-13.) 1-8. six days before the passover—i.e., on the sixth day before it; probably after sunset on Friday evening, or the commencement of the Jewish sabbath preceding the passover.

CHAPTER 12

1. Six days before the passover. Reckoning the day of the Passover to be the last of the six.

MATTHEW HENRY

Bethany is here described to be the town where Lazarus was, whom he raised from the dead. The miracle wrought here put a new honour upon the place, and made it remarkable. Where he has sown plentifully, he observes whether it comes up again.

II. The kind entertainment which his friends there gave him: They made him a supper (v. 2). It is queried whether this was the same with that which is recorded, Matt. xxvi. 6, &c., in the house of Simon. Most commentators think it was. Let us see the account of this entertainment. They made him a supper; for with them, ordinarily, supper was the best meal. This they did in token of their respect and gratitude, for a feast is made for friendship; and that they might have an opportunity of free and pleasant conversation with him, for a feast is made for fellowship. Martha served. She did not think it below her to serve, when Christ sat at meat; nor should we think it a dishonour to stoop to any service whereby Christ may be honoured. Christ had formerly reproved Martha for being troubled with much serving. But she did not therefore leave off serving, as some, who, when they are reproved for one extreme, peevishly run into another; no, still she served. Better be a waiter at Christ's table than a guest at the table of a prince. Lazarus was one of those that sat at meat. It proved the truth of his resurrection, as it did of Christ's, that there were those who did eat and drink with him, Acts x. 41. He sat at meat, as a momument of the miracle Christ had wrought. Those whom Christ has raised up to a spiritual life are made to sit together with him.

III. The particular respect which Mary showed him, v. 3. She had a pound of ointment of spikenard, very costly, and with this she anointed the feet of Jesus, and she wiped them with her hair, and the house was filled with the odour of the ointment. Doubtless she intended this as a token of her love to Christ. By this her love to Christ appears to have been a generous love. If she had anything more valuable than another, that must be brought out for the honour of Christ. Those who love Christ truly love him so much better than this world as to be willing to lay out the best they have for him. A condescending love; she not only bestowed her ointment upon Christ, but with her own hands poured it upon him. Nay, she did not, as usual, anoint his head with it, but his feet. True love, as it does not spare charges, so it does not spare pains, in honouring Christ. A believing love; there was faith working by this love, faith in Jesus as the Messiah, the Christ, the Anointed. God's Anointed should be our Anointed. Let us pour on him the ointment of our best affections. The filling of the house with the pleasant odour of the ointment. Those who entertain Christ in their hearts and houses bring a sweet odour into them.

IV. Judas's dislike of Mary's token of her respect to Christ, v. 4, 5.

1. The person that carped at it was Judas, one of his disciples; not one of their nature, but only one of their number. Judas was an apostle, a preacher of the gospel, and yet one that discouraged this instance of pious affection. It is sad to see the life of religion discountenanced by such as are bound by their office to assist and encourage it. But this was he that should betray Christ.

2. The pretence with which he covered his dislike (v. 5): "Why was not this ointment sold for three hundred pence, and given to the poor?" Here is worldly wisdom passing a censure upon pious zeal. Those who value themselves upon their secular policy, and undervalue others for their serious piety, have more in them of the spirit of Judas than they would be thought to have. Here is charity to the poor secretly made a cloak for covetousness. Many excuse themselves from laying out in charity under pretence of laying up for charity. Judas asked, Why was it not given to the poor? We must not conclude that those do no acceptable piece of service who do not do it in our way. Proud men think all ill-advised who do not advise with them.

3. The detection and discovery of Judas's hypocrisy herein, v. 6. This he said, not that he cared for the poor, but because he was a thief, and had the bag. It did not come from a principle of charity: Not that he cared for the poor. What were the poor to him any further than he might serve his own ends? Thus some warmly contend for the power of the church, as others for its purity, when perhaps it is all one to them whether its true interest sink or swim, but under the pretence of this they are advancing themselves. It did come from a principle of covetousness. The truth of the matter was, he would rather have had it in money, to be put in the common stock, and then he knew what to do with it.

(1) Judas was treasurer of Christ's household. See what estate Jesus and his disciples had to live upon. Only a bag, wherein they kept just enough for their

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

2. Martha served—This, with what is afterwards said of Mary's way of honoring her Lord, is so true to the character in which those two women appear in Luke 10:38-42, as to constitute one of the strongest and most delightful confirmations of the truth of both narratives. (See also on ch. 11:20.) Lazarus ... sat at the table—"Between the raised Lazarus and the healed leper [Simon, Mark 14:3], the Lord probably sits as between two trophies of His glory" [STIER].

3. spikenard—or pure nard, a celebrated aromatic (Song of Sol. 1:12). anointed the feet of Jesus—and "poured it on His head" (Matt. 26:7; Mark 14:3). The only use of this was to refresh and exhilarate—a grateful compliment in the East, amidst the closeness of a heated atmosphere, with many guests at a feast. Such was the form in which Mary's love to Christ, at so much cost to herself, poured itself out.

4. Judas ... who should betray him—For the reason why this is here mentioned, see on Matthew 26:6. 5. three hundred pence—about $50.

6. had the bag—the purse. bare what was put therein—not, bare it off by theft, though that he did; but simply, had charge of its contents, was treasurer to Jesus and the Twelve. How worthy of notice is this arrangement, by which an avaricious and dishonest person was not only taken into the number of the Twelve, but entrusted with the custody of their little property! The purposes which this served are obvious enough; but it is further noticeable, that the remotest hint was never given to the eleven of His true character, nor did the disciples most favored with the intimacy of Jesus ever suspect him, till a few minutes before he voluntarily separated himself from their company—for ever!

ADAM CLARKE

F. B. MEYER:

Love's fragrant gift. Martha's service reminds us of Luke 10:41. The earlier Gospels (Matt. 26; Mark 14) do not mention Mary's name, probably because the whole family might have suffered for their intimate identification with Jesus (see v. 10). But when this Gospel was written, the beloved trio had been gathered home to God.

There was no value in the spikenard except to refresh and comfort, but this was sufficient to warrant Mary's act. We must not always be considering the utilitarian side of service. There are hours of holy ecstasy when we are lifted out of ourselves in the expression of our love to Jesus, in ways that to cold and calculating onlookers seem mere extravagance. In her absorption in him whom she loved, Mary has incited myriads to similar acts. But her love stirred up the evil in the heart of Judas, as summer's lovely sunshine extracts poison from stagnant ponds. Our Advocate will screen us from our dread accuser. He interpreted Mary's motive. She knew that her Lord would be crucified, and as she thought that there would be no opportunity for love to perform the last offices, she beforehand anointed him for the burial.

—Bible Commentary

5. Three hundred pence. Or denarii.

6. Not that he cared for the poor. There should be a particular emphasis laid on the word he, as the Evangelist studies to show the most determined detestation to his conduct. And bare what was put therein. Or rather, as some eminent critics contend, "and stole what was put in it." This seems the proper meaning of ebastazen; and in this sense it is used, chap. xx. 15: "If thou hast stolen Him away." In the same sense the word is used by Josephus, Ant., b. xii, c. 5, s. 4, where, speaking of the pillage of the Temple by Antiochus, he says, "He carried off, or stole, also the vessels of the Lord." If stealing were not intended by the Evangelist, the word itself must be consubsistence, giving the overplus, if any were, to the poor. This bag was supplied by the contributions of good people, and the Master and his disciples had all in common; for our sakes he became poor. See who was the steward of the little they had; it was Judas, he was purse-bearer. He was the least and lowest of all the disciples; it was not Peter nor John that was made steward. Secular employments, as they are a digression, so they are a degradation to a minister of the gospel. He was desirous of the place. He loved in his heart to be fingering money, and therefore had the moneybag committed to him. The bag he chose, and the bag he had. Strong inclinations to sin within are often justly punished with strong temptations to sin without. We have little reason to be fond of the bag, or proud of it, for at the best we are but stewards of it.

(2) Being trusted with the bag, he was a thief. The reigning love of money is heart-theft as much as anger and revenge are heart-murder. Those to whom the management and disposal of public money is committed have need to be governed by steady principles of justice and honesty, that no blot cleave to their hands. Judas, who had betrayed his trust, soon after betrayed his Master.

V. Christ's justification of what Mary did (v. 7, 8): Let her alone. Hereby he intimated his acceptance of her kindness. As it was a token of her goodwill, he signified himself well-pleased with it. Christ would not have those censured nor discouraged who sincerely design to please him, though in their honest endeavours there be not all the discretion that may be. Christ puts a favourable construction upon what she did, which those that condemned it were not aware of: Against the day of my burying she has kept this. "The day of my burying is now at hand, and she has anointed a body that is already as good as dead." Providence does often so open a door of opportunity to good Christians, that the expressions of their pious zeal prove to be more seasonable, and more beautiful, than any foresight of their own could make them. He gives a sufficient answer to Judas's objection, v. 8. It is so ordered in the kingdom of Providence that the poor we have always with us. It is so ordered in the kingdom of grace that the church should not always have the bodily presence of Jesus Christ: "Me you have not always." Opportunities are to be improved, and those opportunities first and most vigorously which are likely to be of the shortest continuance. That good duty which may be done at any time ought to give way to that which cannot be done but just now.

VI. The public notice which was taken of our Lord Jesus here at this supper in Bethany (v. 9): Much people of the Jews knew that he was there, and they came flocking thither. They came to see Jesus, whose name was very much magnified by the late miracle he had wrought in raising Lazarus. They came, not to hear him, but to gratify their curiosity with a sight of him. It being known where Christ was, multitudes came to him. They came to see Lazarus and Christ together, which was a very inviting sight. Some came for the confirmation of their faith in Christ. Others came only for the gratifying of their curiosity, that they might say they had seen a man who had been dead and buried, and yet lived again; so that Lazarus served for a show.

VII. The indignation of the chief priests at the growing interest of our Lord Jesus (v. 10, 11): They consulted how they might put Lazarus also to death, because that by reason of him many of the Jews went away, and believed on Jesus. Here observe,

1. How vain and unsuccessful their attempts against Christ had hitherto been. They had done all they could to alienate the people from him, and yet many of the Jews were so overcome by the convincing evidence of Christ's miracles that they went away from the party of the priests, and believed on Jesus; and it was by reason of Lazarus; his resurrection put life into their faith. What was impossible to him that could raise the dead?

2. How absurd and unreasonable that Lazarus must be put to death. It was a sign that they neither feared God nor regarded man. If they had feared God, they would not have done such an act of defiance to him. God will have Lazarus to live by a miracle, and they will have him to die by malice. Lazarus is singled out to be the object of their special hatred, because God has distinguished him by the tokens of his peculiar love. One would think that they should rather have consulted how they might have joined in friendship with Lazarus and his family, and by their mediation have reconciled themselves to this Jesus whom they had persecuted. If they had regarded man, they would not have done such an act of injustice to Lazarus, an innocent man, to whose charge they could not pretend to lay any crime.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

7. said Jesus, Let her alone, against the day of my burying hath she done this—not that she thought of His burial, much less reserved any of her nard to anoint her dead Lord. But as the time was so near at hand when that office would have to be performed, and she was not to have that privilege even after the spices were brought for the purpose (Mark 16:1), He lovingly regards it as done now. 8. the poor always . . . with you—referring to Deuteronomy 15:11. but me . . . not always—a gentle hint of His approaching departure. He adds (Mark 14:8), "She hath done what she could," a noble testimony, embodying a principle of immense importance. "Verily, I say unto you, Wheresoever this Gospel shall be preached in the whole world, there shall also this, that this woman hath done, be told for a memorial of her" (Matt. 26:13; Mark 14:9). "In the act of love done to Him she had erected to herself an eternal monument, as lasting as the Gospel, the eternal word of God. From generation to generation this remarkable prophecy of the Lord has been fulfilled; and even we, in explaining this saying of the Redeemer, of necessity contribute to its accomplishment" [OLSHAUSEN]. "Who but Himself had the power to ensure to any work of man, even if resounding in his own time through the whole earth, an imperishable remembrance in the stream of history? Behold once more here, the majesty of His royal judicial supremacy in the government of the world, in this, Verily I say unto you" [STIER]. Beautiful are the lessons here: (1) Love to Christ transfigures the humblest services. All, indeed, who have themselves a heart value its least outgoings beyond the most costly mechanical performances; but how does it endear the Saviour to us to find Him endorsing the principle as His own standard in judging of character and deeds!

What though in poor and humble guise
Thou here didst sojourn, cottage-born,
Yet from Thy glory in the skies
Our earthly gold Thou didst not scorn.
For Love delights to bring her best,
And where Love is, that offering evermore is blest.
Love on the Saviour's dying head
Her spikenard drops unblam'd may pour,
May mount His cross, and wrap Him dead
In spices from the golden shore.

KEBLE

(2) Works of utility should never be set in opposition to the promptings of self-sacrificing love, and the sincerity of those who do so is to be suspected. Under the mask of concern for the poor at home, how many excuse themselves from all care of the perishing heathen abroad. (3) Amidst conflicting duties, that which our "hand (presently) findeth to do" is to be preferred, and even a less duty only to be done now to a greater that can be done at any time. (4) "If there be first a willing mind, it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not" (II Cor. 8:12).—"She hath done what she could." (5) As Jesus beheld in spirit the universal diffusion of His Gospel, while His lowest depth of humiliation was only approaching, so He regards the facts of His earthly history as constituting the substance of this Gospel, and the relation of them as just the "preaching of this Gospel." Not that preachers are to confine themselves to a bare narration of these facts, but that they are to make their whole preaching turn upon them as its grand center, and derive from them its proper vitality; all that goes before this in the Bible being but the preparation for them, and all that follows but the sequel. 9-11. Crowds of the Jerusalem Jews hastened to Bethany, not so much to see Jesus, whom they knew to be there, as to see dead Lazarus alive; and this, issuing in their accession to Christ, led to a plot against the life of Lazarus also, as the only means of arresting the triumphs of Jesus (see vs. 19)—to such a pitch had these chief priests come of diabolical determination to shut out the light from themselves, and quench it from the earth!

ADAM CLARKE

sidered as superfluous; for when we are told that he had the bag, we need not be informed that he had what was in it. But the apostle says he was a thief, and because he was a thief and had the common purse in his power, therefore he stole as much as he conveniently could without subjecting himself to detection. And as he saw that the death of Christ was at hand, he wished to secure a provision for himself before he left the company of the apostles. The bag meant originally the little box, or sheath, in which the tongues or reeds used for pipes were carried. The Greek word is used in Hebrew letters by the Talmudists to signify a "purse, scrip, chest, coffer." As our Lord and His disciples lived on charity, a bag or scrip was provided to carry those pious donations by which they were supported. And Judas was steward and treasurer to this holy company.

7. Let her alone: against the day of my burying hath she kept this. Several MSS. and versions read thus: "Let her alone, that she may keep it to the day of my embalming." This reading, which has the approbation of Mill, Bengel, Griesbach, Pearce, and others, intimates that only a part of the ointment was then used, and that the rest was kept till the time that the women came to embalm the body of Jesus, Luke xxiv. 1.

9. Much people of the Jews. John, who was a Galilean, often gives the title of Jews to those who were inhabitants of Jerusalem.

10. Consulted that they might put Lazarus also to death. As long as he lived they saw an incontestable proof of the divine power of Christ; therefore they wished to put Him to death, because many of the Jews, who came to see him through curiosity, became converts to Christ through his testimony.

MATTHEW HENRY

Verses 12–19

I. The respect that was paid to our Lord Jesus by the common people, v. 12, 13.

1. Who they were that paid him this respect: much people—a great crowd of those that came up to the feast; not the inhabitants of Jerusalem, but the country people. The nearer the temple of the Lord, the further from the Lord of the temple. They were such as came up to the feast. Perhaps they had been Christ's hearers in the country, and great admirers of him there, and therefore were forward to testify their respect to him at Jerusalem. Perhaps they were those more devout Jews that came up to the feast some time before, to purify themselves, that were more inclined to religion than their neighbours, and these were they that were so forward to honour Christ. They were not the rulers, nor the great men, that went out to meet Christ, but the commonalty. But Christ is honoured more by the multitude than by the magnificence of his followers; for he values men by their souls, not their names and titles of honour.

2. On what occasion they did it: They heard that Jesus was coming to Jerusalem. They had enquired for him (ch. xi. 55, 56): Will he not come up to the feast? Now when they heard he was coming, they bestirred themselves, to give him an agreeable reception.

3. In what way they expressed their respect. Such as they had they gave him; and even this despicable crowd was a faint resemblance of that glorious company which John saw before the throne, and before the Lamb, Rev. vii. 9, 10. Though these were not before the throne, they were before the Lamb. There it is said of that celestial choir,

(1) That they had palms in their hands, and so had these branches of palm-trees. The palm-tree has ever been an emblem of victory and triumph. Christ was now by his death to conquer principalities and powers. Though he was but girding on the harness, yet he could boast as though he had put it off.

(2) That they cried with a loud voice, saying, Salvation to our God (Rev. vii. 10); so did these here, they shouted before him, Hosanna, blessed is the king of Israel, that comes in the name of the Lord; and hosanna signifies salvation. [1] They acknowledge our Lord Jesus to be the king of Israel, that comes in the name of the Lord. They own him to be a king, which bespeaks both his dignity and honour, which we must adore; and his dominion and power, to which we must submit. A rightful king, coming in the name of the Lord. The promised and long-expected king, Messiah the prince, for he is king of Israel. [2] They heartily wish well to his kingdom, which is the meaning of hosanna. In crying hosanna they prayed for three things: That his kingdom might come in the light and knowledge of it, and in the power and efficacy of it. That it might conquer. That it might continue. Hosanna is, Let the king live for ever. [3] They bid him welcome in Jerusalem: "Welcome is he that cometh; come in thou blessed of the Lord." Thus we must every one of us bid Christ welcome into our hearts. Faith saith, Blessed is he that cometh.

II. The posture Christ puts himself into for receiving the respect that was paid him (v. 14): When he had found a young ass, he sat thereon. It was but a poor sort of figure he made, he alone upon an ass, and a crowd of people about him shouting Hosanna. This was much more of state than he used to take; he used to travel on foot, but now was mounted. Yet it was much less of state than the great ones of the world usually take. His kingdom was not of this world, and therefore came not with outward pomp.

III. The fulfilling of the scripture in this: As it is written, Fear not, daughter of Sion, v. 15.

1. It was foretold that Zion's king should come, should come thus, sitting on an ass's colt. Though he comes but slowly (an ass is slow-paced), yet he comes surely, and with such expressions of condescension as greatly encourage his loyal subjects. Humble supplicants may reach to speak with him.

2. The daughter of Zion is therefore called upon to behold her king. Fear not. In the prophecy, Zion is told to rejoice greatly, and to shout, but here it is rendered, Fear not. Unbelieving fears are enemies to spiritual joys; if they be cured, if they be conquered, joy will come of course. If the case be so that we cannot reach to the exultations of joy, yet we should labour to get from under the oppressions of fear. Rejoice greatly; at least, fear not.

IV. The remark respecting the disciples (v. 16): They understood not at first, but when Jesus was glorified they remembered that these things were written of him, and that they and others had done these things to him.

1. See here the imperfection of the disciples; they understood not these things at first. They did not consider that they were performing the ceremony of 12-19. CHRIST'S TRIUMPHAL ENTRY INTO JERUSALEM. (See on Matt. 21:1-9; and Luke 19:29-36. 12. On the next day—the Lord's day, or Sunday (see on vs. 1); the tenth day of the Jewish month Nisan, on which the paschal lamb was set apart to be "kept up until the 14th day of the same month, when the whole assembly of the congregation of Israel were to kill it in the evening" (Exod. 12:3, 6). Even so, from the day of this solemn entry into Jerusalem, "Christ our Passover" was virtually set apart to be "sacrificed for us" (I Cor. 5:7).

ADAM CLARKE

13. Took branches. See on Matt. xxi. 1, etc., and Mark xi. 1-6, where this transaction is largely explained.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

The difference between John's account of the entry into Jerusalem and those of the Synoptic Gospels is very characteristic. His is much briefer, but it brings the essentials out clearly, and is particular in showing its place as a link in the chain that drew on the final catastrophe, and in noting its effect on various classes.

"The next day" (v. 12) was probably the Sunday before the crucifixion. To understand the events of that day, we must try to realize how rapidly, and, as the rulers thought, dangerously, excitement was rising among the crowds who had come up for the Passover, and who had heard of the raising of Lazarus. The Passover was always a time when national feeling was ready to blaze up, and any spark might light the fire. It looked as if Lazarus were going to be the match this time, and so, on the Saturday, the rulers had made up their minds to have him put out of the way in order to stop the current that was setting in, of acceptance of Jesus as the Messiah.

They had already made up their minds to dispose of Jesus, and now, with cynical contempt for justice, they determined to "put Lazarus also to death." So there were to be two men who were to "die for the people." Keeping all this wave of popular feeling in view, it might have been expected that Jesus would, as hitherto, have escaped into privacy, or discouraged the offered homage of a crowd whose messianic ideal was so different from His.

John is mainly concerned in bringing out two points in his version of the incident. First, he tells us what we should not have gathered from the other Evangelists, that the triumphal procession began in Jerusalem, not in Bethany. It was the direct result of the ebullition of enthusiasm occasioned by the raising of Lazarus. The course of events seems to have been that "the common people of the Jews" came streaming out to Bethany on the Sunday to gape and gaze at the risen man and Him who had raised him, that they and some of those who had been present at the raising went back to the city and carried thither the intelligence that Jesus was coming in from Bethany next day, and that then the procession to meet Him was organized.

The meaning of the popular demonstration was plain—from the palm branches, signs of victory and rejoicing, and from the chant, which is in part taken from Psalm 118. The messianic application of that quote is made unmistakable by the addition, "even the King of Israel." In the Psalm, "he that cometh in the name of Jehovah," means the worshiper drawing near to the Temple, but the added words divert the expression to Jesus, hail Him as the King, and invoke Him as "Savior." Little did that shouting crowd understand what sort of a Savior He was. Deliverance from Rome was what they where thinking of.—Expositions of Holy Scripture the inauguration of Zion's king. The scripture is often fulfilled by the agency of those who have not themselves an eye to the scripture in what they do. That which afterwards is clear was at first dark and doubtful. It well becomes the disciples of Christ to reflect upon the follies and weaknesses of their first beginning, that they may have compassion on the ignorant. When I was a child, I spoke as a child.

2. See here the improvement of the disciples in their adult state.

(1) When they understood it: When Jesus was glorified. Till then they did not rightly apprehend the nature of his kingdom. Till then the Spirit was not poured out, who was to lead them into all truth.

(2) How they understood it; they compared the prophecy with the event. Then remembered they that these things were written of him. The remembrance of what is written will enable us to understand what is done, and the observation of what is done will help us to understand what is written.

V. The reason which induced the people to pay this respect to our Lord Jesus. It was because of the illustrious miracle he had lately wrought in raising Lazarus.

1. See here what account and what assurance they had of this miracle; no doubt, the city rang of it. Those who considered it as a proof of Christ's mission, and a ground of their faith in him, traced the report to those who were eye-witnesses of it, that they might know the certainty of it. The people therefore that stood by when he called Lazarus out of his grave, bore record, v. 17. They unanimously averred the thing to be true, beyond dispute or contradiction. The truth of Christ's miracles was evidenced by incontestable proofs.

2. What influence it had upon them (v. 18): For this cause the people met him. Some, out of curiosity, were desirous to see one that had done such a wonderful work. Others, out of conscience, studied to do him honour, as the one sent of God.

VI. The indignation of the Pharisees at all this. They own that they had got no ground against him; that they prevailed nothing. Those who oppose Christ, will be made to perceive that they prevail nothing. God will accomplish his own purposes in spite of them, and the little efforts of their impotent malice. You prevail nothing, you profit nothing. There is nothing got by opposing Christ. They own that he had got ground: The world is gone after him. Yet here, like Caiaphas, ere they were aware, they prophesied that the world would go after him. 1. Thus they express their own vexation; their envy makes them fret. Considering how great these Pharisees were, one would think they needed not grudge Christ so inconsiderable a piece of honour as was now done him; but proud men would monopolize honour, and have none share with them. 2. Thus they excite themselves, and one another, to a more vigorous carrying on of the war against Christ. Thus the enemies of religion are made more resolute and active by being baffled; and shall its friends be disheartened with every disappointment, who know its cause is righteous and will at last be victorious?

Verses 20–26

Honour is here paid to Christ by certain Greeks that enquired for him.

I. We are told who they were that paid this honour to our Lord Jesus: Certain Greeks among the people who came up to worship at the feast, v. 20. Some think they were Jews of the dispersion, that were scattered among the Gentiles, and were called Greeks. Others think they were Gentiles, those whom they called proselytes of the gate, such as the eunuch and Cornelius. There were devout worshippers of the true God even among those that were strangers to the commonwealth of Israel. Though these Greeks, if uncircumcised, were not admitted to eat the passover, yet they came to worship at the feast. We must thankfully use the privileges we have, though there may be others from which we are shut out.

II. What was the honour they paid him: they desired to be acquainted with him, v. 21. Having a desire to see Christ, they were industrious in the use of proper means. They did not rest in bare wishes, but resolved to try what could be done. They made their application to Philip, one of his disciples. Some think that they had acquaintance with him formerly. It is good to know those who know the Lord. I think that they applied to him only because they saw him a close follower of Christ. Those that would see Jesus by faith now that he is in heaven must apply to his ministers, whom he has appointed for this purpose, to guide poor souls in their enquiries after him. The bringing of these Greeks to the knowledge of Christ by the means of Philip signified the agency of the apostles, when Jesus was glorified, then remembered they that these things were written of him...—The Spirit, descending on them from the glorified Saviour at Pentecost, opened their eyes suddenly to the true sense of the Old Testament, brought vividly to their recollection this and other Messianic predictions, and to their unspeakable astonishment showed them that they, and all the actors in these scenes, had been unconsciously fulfilling those predictions.

A. T. ROBERTSON:

19. "The Pharisees therefore said among themselves" (hoi oun Pharisaioi eipan pros heautous). Graphic picture of the predicament of the Pharisees standing off and watching the enthusiastic crowds sweep by. As people usually do, they blame each other for the defeat of their plots against Jesus and for his final victory, as it seemed. "Behold how ye prevail nothing" (theoreite hoti ouk opheleite ouden). It was a pathetic confession of failure because the rest of the plotters had bungled the whole thing. "Ye help nothing at all" by your plots and plans. "Lo, the world is gone after him" (ide ho kosmos opiso autou apelthen). Exclamatory use of ide and timeless aorist active indicative of aperchomai. The "world" is a bunch of fools, they feel, but see for yourselves. And the Sanhedrin had advertised to "find" Jesus! They can find him now!

20-36. SOME GREEKS DESIRE TO SEE JESUS—THE DISCOURSE AND SCENE THEREUPON. 20-22. Greeks—Not Grecian Jews, but Greek proselytes to the Jewish faith, who were wont to attend the annual festivals, particularly this primary one, the Passover.

The same came therefore to Philip... of Bethsaida—possibly as being from the same quarter. saying, Sir, we would see Jesus—certainly in a far better sense than Zaccheus (Luke 19:3). Perhaps He was then in that part of the temple court to which Gentile proselytes had no access. "These men from the west represent, at the end of Christ's life, what the wise men from the east represented at its beginning; but those come to the cross of the King, even as these to His manger" [STIER].

ADAM CLARKE

16. Then remembered they. After the ascension of Christ, the disciples saw the meaning of many prophecies which referred to Christ, and applied them to Him, which they had not fully comprehended before. Indeed it is only in the light of the new covenant that the old is to be fully understood.

17. When he called. It appears that these people who had seen Him raise Lazarus from the dead were publishing abroad the miracle, which increased the popularity of Christ and the envy of the Pharisees.

19. Ye prevail nothing. By either your threatenings or excommunications. The world is gone after him. The whole mass of the people are becoming His disciples. This is a very common form of expression among the Jews, and simply answers to the French, tout le monde, and to the English, "everybody"—the bulk of the people.

20. Certain Greeks. There are three opinions concerning these: (1) That they were proselytes of the gate or covenant, who came up to worship the true God at this feast; (2) That they were real Jews, who lived in Grecian provinces, and spoke the Greek language; (3) That they were mere Gentiles, who never knew the true God; and, hearing of the fame of the Temple or the miracles of our Lord, came to offer sacrifices to Jehovah and to worship Him according to the manner of the people of that land. Of these opinions the reader may choose, but the first seems best founded.

MATTHEW HENRY

and the use made of their ministry in the conversion of the Gentiles. Their address to Philip was in short this: Sir, we would see Jesus. They gave him a title of respect, because he was in relation to Christ. Their business is, they would see Jesus; not only see his face, that they might be able to say, when they came home, they had seen one that was so much talked of; but they would have some free conversation with him, and be taught by him. Now that they were come to worship at the feast, they would see Jesus. In our attendance upon holy ordinances, and particularly the gospel passover, the great desire of our souls should be to see Jesus. We miss of our end in coming if we do not see Jesus. The report which Philip made of this to his Master, v. 22. He tells Andrew. They agree that it must be made; but then he would have Andrew go along with him. Christ's ministers should be helpful to one another and concur in helping souls to Christ. It should seem that Andrew and Philip brought this message to Christ when he was teaching in public, for we read (v. 29) of the people that stood by.

III. Christ's acceptance of this honour. He foretells both the honour which he himself should have in being followed (v. 23, 24) and the honour which those should have that followed him, v. 25, 26.

1. He foresees that plentiful harvest, in the conversion of the Gentiles, of which this was as it were the first-fruits, v. 23. The hour is come when the Son of man shall be glorified. The end designed hereby, and that is the glorifying of the Redeemer: "And is it so? Do the Gentiles begin to enquire after me? Then the hour is come for the glorifying of the Son of man." This was no surprise to Christ, but a paradox to those about him. The calling of the Gentiles greatly redounded to the glory of the Son of man. The multiplying of the redeemed was the magnifying of the Redeemer. There was a time, a set time, for the glorifying of the Son of man, and he speaks of the approach of it with exultation and triumph: The hour is come. The strange way in which this end was to be attained, and that was by the death of Christ, intimated in that similitude (v. 24): "Verily, verily, I say unto you, except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone, and you never see any more of it; but if it die it bringeth forth much fruit." The necessity of Christ's humiliation intimated. He would never have been the living quickening head and root of the church if he had not descended from heaven to this accursed earth and ascended from earth to the accursed tree, and so accomplished our redemption. He must pour out his soul unto death. The advantage of Christ's humiliation illustrated. He fell to the ground in his incarnation; but this was not all: he died. He lay in the grave like seed under the clods; but as the seed comes up again green, and fresh, and flourishing, and with a great increase, so one dying Christ gathered to himself thousands of living Christians. The salvation of souls hitherto, and henceforward to the end of time, is all owing to the dying of this corn of wheat.

2. He promises an abundant recompence to those who should cordially embrace him, and should make it appear that they do so by their faithfulness.

(1) In suffering for him (v. 25): He that loves his life shall lose it; but he that hates his life in this world, shall keep it unto life eternal. The great design of his religion is to wean us from this world, by setting before us another world.

[1] See here the fatal consequences of an inordinate love of life; many a man hugs himself to death, and loses his life by overloving it. He that so loves his animal life shall thereby shorten his days, shall lose the life he is so fond of, and another infinitely better. He that is so much in love with the life of the body, as to deny Christ, he shall lose it, that is, lose a real happiness in the other world, while he thinks to secure an imaginary one in this. He that gives his soul, his God, his heaven, for it, buys life too dear.

[2] See also the blessed recompence of a holy contempt of life. He that so hates the life of the body as to venture it for the preserving of the life of his soul shall find both in eternal life. It is required of the disciples of Christ that they hate their life in this world. Our life in this world includes all the enjoyments of our present state. We must hate, that is, despise them as vain and insufficient to make us happy, and cheerfully part with them whenever they come in competition with the service of Christ. See here much of the power of godliness—that it conquers the strongest natural affections; and much of the mystery of godliness—that it is the greatest wisdom, and yet makes men hate their own lives. Those who, in love to Christ, hate their own lives in this world, shall be abundantly recompenced in the resurrection of the just. He that hateth his life shall keep it.

(2) In serving him (v. 26): If any man profess to serve

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

Philip . . . telleth Andrew—As follow townsmen of Bethsaida (ch. 1:44), these two seem to have drawn to each other. Andrew and Philip tell Jesus—The minuteness of these details, while they add to the graphic force of the narrative, serves to prepare us for something important to come out of this introduction.

23-26. Jesus answered them, The hour is come that the Son of man should be glorified—i.e., They would see Jesus, would they? Yet a little moment, and they shall see Him so as now they dream not of. The middle wall of partition that keeps them out from the commonwealth of Israel is on the eve of breaking down, "and I, if I be lifted up from the earth, shall draw all men unto Me"; I see them "flying as a cloud, and as doves to their cotes"—a glorious event that will be for the Son of man, by which this is to be brought about. It is His death He thus sublimely and delicately alluded to. Lost in the scenes of triumph which this desire of the Greeks to see Him called up before His view, He gives no direct answer to their petition for an interview, but sees the cross which was to bring them gilded with glory. 24. Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone; but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit—The necessity of His death is here brightly expressed, and its proper operation and fruit—life springing forth out of death—imaged forth by a beautiful and deeply significant law of the vegetable kingdom. For a double reason, no doubt, this was uttered—to explain what he had said of His death, as the hour of His own glorification, and to sustain His own Spirit under the agitation which was mysteriously coming over it in the view of that death.

He that loveth his life shall lose it; and he that hateth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal—(See on Luke 9:24). Did our Lord mean to exclude Himself from the operation of the great principle here expressed—selfrenunciation the law of self-preservation; and its converse, self-preservation the law of self-destruction? On the contrary, as He became Man to exemplify this fundamental law of the Kingdom of God in its most sublime form, so the very utterance of it on this occasion served to sustain His own Spirit in the double prospect to which He had just alluded.

ADAM CLARKE

22. Andrew and Philip tell Jesus. How pleasing to God is this union when the ministers of His gospel agree and unite together to bring souls to Christ!

23. The hour is come, that the Son of man. The time is just at hand in which the gospel shall be preached to all nations, the middle wall of partition broken down, and Jews and Gentiles united in one fold. But this could not be till after His death and resurrection, as the succeeding verse teaches.

24. Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die. Our Lord compares himself to a grain of wheat; His death, to a grain sown and decomposed in the ground; His resurrection, to the blade which springs up from the dead grain, which grain, thus dying, brings forth an abundance of fruit. I must die to be glorified; and, unless I am glorified, I cannot establish a glorious Church of Jews and Gentiles upon earth.

25. He that loveth his life. See on Matt. x. 39; Luke xiv. 26. I am about to give up My life for the salvation of men; but I shall speedily receive it back with everlasting honor, by My resurrection from the dead. In this I should be imitated by My disciples, who should, when called to it, lay down their lives for the truth; and if they do, they shall receive them again with everlasting honor.

MATTHEW HENRY

me, let him follow me; and where I am, there let my servant be; so some read it, as part of the duty. We read it as part of the promise, there shall he be in happiness with me. And, lest this should seem a small matter, he adds, If any man serve me, him will my Father honour. The Greeks desired to see Jesus (v. 21), but Christ lets them know that it was not enough to see him, they must serve him. In taking servants it is usual to fix both the work and the wages; Christ does both here.

[1] Here is the work which Christ expects from his servants. Let them attend their Master's movements: If any man serve me, let him follow me. Christians must follow Christ, do the things that he says, walk as he also walked. We must go whither he leads us, and in the way he leads us. Let them attend their Master's repose: Where I am, there let my servant be, to wait upon me. Christ is where his church is; and there let his servants be, to present themselves before him, and receive instructions from him.

[2] Here are the wages which Christ promises to his servants.

First, They shall be happy with him: Where I am, there shall also my servant be. Doubtless, he means being with him in paradise. Christ speaks of heaven's happiness as if he were already in it: Where I am; because he was sure of it, and near to it. And the same joy and glory which he thought recompence enough for all his services and sufferings are proposed to his servants as the recompence of theirs. Those that follow him in the way shall be with him in the end.

Secondly, They shall be honoured by his Father; he will make them amends for all their pains and loss, by conferring an honour upon them, far beyond what such worthless worms of the earth could expect to receive. The reward is honour, true lasting honour, the highest honour; it is the honour that comes from God. Those that wait on Christ God will put honour upon. Those that serve Christ must humble themselves, and are commonly vilified by the world, in recompence of both which they shall be exalted in due time.

What became of those Greeks we are not told, but are willing to hope that those who thus asked the way to heaven, with their faces thitherward, found it, and walked in it.

Honour is here done to Christ by his Father in a voice from heaven, which gave occasion to a further conference with the people.

I. Christ's address to his Father, upon occasion of the trouble which seized his spirit at this time: Now is my soul troubled, v. 27. A strange word to come from Christ's mouth, and at this time surprising, for it comes in the midst of divers pleasing prospects, in which, one would think, he should have said, Now is my soul pleased. Trouble of soul sometimes follows after great enlargements of spirit.

1. Christ's dread of his approaching sufferings: Now is my soul troubled. Now were the first throes of the travail of his soul. The sin of our soul was the trouble of Christ's soul. The trouble of his soul was designed to ease the trouble of our souls. Christ was now troubled, but it would not be so always, it would not be so long. The same is the comfort of Christians in their troubles; they are but for a moment, and will be turned into joy.

2. The strait he seems to be in hereupon: And what shall I say? Christ speaks like one at a loss, as if what he should choose he wot not. There was a struggle between the work he had taken upon him, which required sufferings, and the nature he had taken upon him, which dreaded them; between these two he here pauses with, What shall I say?

3. His prayer to God in this strait: Father, save me from this hour, out of this hour, praying, not so much that it might not come as that he might be brought through it. This was the language of innocent nature, and its feelings poured forth in prayer. Christ was voluntary in his sufferings, and yet prayed to be saved from them. Prayer against a trouble may very well consist with patience under it and submission to the will of God in it. The time of his suffering was, (1) A set time. (2) A short time. An hour is soon over, so were Christ's sufferings; he could see through them to the joy set before him.

4. His acquiescence in his Father's will, notwithstanding. But for this cause came I to this hour. Innocent nature got the first word, but divine wisdom and love got the last. Those who would proceed regularly must go upon second thoughts. With the second thought he checked himself: For this cause came I to this hour; he does not silence himself with this, that he could not avoid it, but satisfies himself with this, that he would not avoid it. This should reconcile us to the darkest hours of our lives.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

26. If any man serve me, let him follow me; and where I am, there shall also my servant be: If any man serve me, him will my Father honour—Jesus here claims the same absolute subjection to Himself, as the law of men's exaltation to honor, as He yielded to the Father.

27, 28. Now is my soul troubled—He means at the prospect of His death, just alluded to. Strange view of the Cross this, immediately after representing it as the hour of His glory! (vs. 23.) But the two views naturally meet, and blend into one. It was the Greeks, one might say, that troubled Him. Ah! they shall see Jesus, but to Him it shall be a costly sight.

and what shall I say?—He is in a strait betwixt two. The death of the cross was, and could not but be, appalling to His spirit. But to shrink from absolute subjection to the Father, was worse still. In asking Himself, "What shall I say?" He seems as if thinking aloud, feeling His way between two dread alternatives, looking both of them sternly in the face, measuring, weighing them, in order that the choice actually made might be seen, and even by himself the more vividly felt, to be a profound, deliberate, spontaneous election. Father, save me from this hour—To take this as a question—"Shall I say, Father, save me . . ."—as some eminent editors and interpreters do, is unnatural and jejune. It is a real petition, like that in Gethsemane, "Let this cup pass from Me"; only whereas there He prefaces the prayer with an "If it be possible," here He follows it up with what is tantamount to that—"Nevertheless for this cause came I unto this hour." The sentiment conveyed, then, by the prayer, in both cases, is twofold: (1) that only one thing could reconcile Him to the death of the cross—its being His Father's will He should endure it—and (2) that in this view of it He yielded Himself freely to it. What He recoils from is not subjection to His Father's will: but to show how tremendous a self-sacrifice that obedience involved, He first asks the Father to save Him from it, and then signifies how

26. If any man serve me. To such a person a twofold promise is given: (1) He shall be with Christ, in eternal fellowship with Him; and (2) He shall be honored by the Lord; he shall have an abundant recompense in glory.

27. Now is my soul troubled. Our blessed Lord took upon Him our weaknesses, that He might sanctify them to us. As a man He was troubled at the prospect of a violent death. Nature abhors death. God has implanted that abhorrence in nature, that it might become a principle of self-preservation; and it is to this that we owe all that prudence and caution by which we avoid danger. When we see Jesus working miracles which demonstrate His omnipotence, we should be led to conclude that He was not man were it not for such passages as these. The reader must ever remember that it was essentially necessary that He should be man, for without being such He could not have died for the sin of the world.

And what shall I say? Father, save me from this hour. Which may be paraphrased thus: "And why should I say, Father, save Me from this hour, when for this cause I am come to this hour?" The common version makes our blessed Lord contradict himself here, by not attending to the proper punctuation of the passage, and by translating the particle ti as what, instead of why or how.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

What does He mean by this commandment, "Follow me"? Of course I need not remind you that it brings all duty down to the imitation of Jesus Christ. That is a commonplace I do not need to dwell upon, nor to follow out into the many regions into which it would lead us, and where we might find fruitful subjects of contemplation; because I desire, in a sentence or two, to insist upon the special form of following which is here enjoined. It is a very grand thing to talk about the imitation of Christ, and even in its most superficial acceptation it is a good guide for all men. But no man has penetrated to the depths of that stringent and all-comprehensive commandment who has not recognized that there is one special thing in which Christ is to be our Pattern, and that is in regard to the very thing in which we think that He is most unique and inimitable. It is His Cross, and not His life; it is His death, and not His virtues, which He is here thinking about, and laying it upon all of us as the encyclopedia and sum of all morality that we should be conformed to it.

Christ's death is the pattern which is here set before us. Of course we cannot imitate that in its effects, except in a very secondary and figurative fashion. But the spirit that underlay it, as the supreme Example of self-sacrifice, is commended to us all as the royal law for our lives, and unless we are conformed thereto we have no right to call ourselves Christ's disciples. To die for the sake of higher life, to give up our own will utterly in obedience to God, and in the unselfish desire to help and bless others, that is the Alpha and the Omega of discipleship. It always has been so and always will be so. And so, dear brethren, let us lay it to our own hearts, and make very stringent inquiry into our own conduct, whether we have ever come within sight of what makes a true disciple—that we should be "conformable unto his death."—Expositions of Holy Scripture

5. His regard to his Father's honour herein. Father, glorify thy name, to the same purport with Father, thy will be done; for God's will is for his own glory. This expresses more than barely a submission to the will of God; it is a consecration of his sufferings to the glory of God. It was a mediatorial word, and was spoken by him as our surety, who had undertaken to satisfy divine justice for our sin. Our Lord Jesus interposed, undertook to satisfy God's injured honour, and he did it by his humiliation. Now here he makes a tender of this satisfaction as an equivalent: "Father, glorify thy name; let the debt be levied upon me." Thus he restored that which he took not away.

II. The Father's answer to this address. 1. How this answer was given. By a voice from heaven. 2. What the answer was. It was an express return to that petition, Father, glorify thy name: I have glorified it already, and I will glorify it yet again. (1) The name of God had been glorified in the life of Christ, in his doctrine and miracles, and all the examples he gave of holiness and goodness. (2) It should be further glorified in the death and sufferings of Christ. His wisdom and power, his justice and holiness, his truth and goodness, were greatly glorified. God accepted the satisfaction, and declared himself well pleased. What God has done for the glorifying of his own name is an encouragement to us to expect what he will yet further do.
