20. But pray ye that your flight be not in the winter. For the hardness of the season, the badness of the roads, the shortness of the days, and the length of the nights will all be great impediments to your flight. Neither on the sabbath day. That you may not raise the indignation of the Jews by travelling on that day, and so suffer that death out of the city which you had endeavored to escape from within. Besides, on the Sabbath days the Jews not only kept within doors, but the gates of all the cities and towns in every place were kept shut and barred; so that if their flight should be on a Sabbath, they could not expect admission into any place of security in the land. Our Lord had ordered His followers to make their escape from Jerusalem when they should see it encompassed with armies; but how could this be done? God took care to provide amply for this. In the twelfth year of Nero, Cestius Gallus, the president of Syria, came against Jerusalem with a powerful army. He might, says Josephus, War, b. ii, c. 19, have assaulted and taken the city, and thereby put an end to the war; but without any just reason, and contrary to the expectation of all, he raised the siege and departed. Josephus remarks that, after Cestius Gallus had raised the siege, "many of the principal Jewish people, forsook the city, as men do a sinking ship." Vespasian was deputed in the room of Cestius Gallus, who, having subdued all the country, prepared to besiege Jerusalem, and invested it on every side. But the news of Nero's death, and soon after that of Galba, and the disturbances that followed, and the civil wars between Otho and Vitellius, held Vespasian and his son Titus in suspense. Thus the city was not actually besieged in form till after Vespasian was confirmed in the empire and Titus was appointed to command the forces in Judæa. It was in those incidental delays that the Christians, and indeed several others, provided for their own safety, by flight.

quiet undisturbed sabbaths, and may have no other work than sabbath work to do on sabbath days; that we may attend upon the Lord without distraction. To flee in the winter is uncomfortable to the body; but to flee on the sabbath day is so to the soul.

3. The greatness of the troubles which should immediately ensue (v. 21); Then shall be great tribulation; when the measure of iniquity is full, then come the troubles. There shall be great tribulation. Great, indeed, when within the city plague and famine raged, and (worse than either) faction and division, so that every man's sword was against his fellow; then and there it was that the hands of the pitiful women flayed their own children. Josephus's History of the Wars of the Jews, has in it more tragical passages than perhaps any history whatsoever.

(1) It was a desolation unparalleled, such as was not since the beginning of the world, nor ever shall be. Many a city and kingdom has been made desolate, but never any with a desolation like this. No wonder that the ruin of Jerusalem was an unparalleled ruin, when the sin of Jerusalem was an unparalleled sin—even their crucifying Christ. The nearer any people are to God in profession and privileges, the greater and heavier will his judgments be upon them.

(2) It was a desolation which, if it should continue long, would be intolerable, so that no flesh should be saved, v. 22. No flesh shall be saved; he doth not say, "No soul shall be saved," for the destruction of the flesh may be for the saving of the spirit in the day of the Lord Jesus."

But here is one word of comfort in the midst of all this terror—that for the elects' sake these days shall be shortened, not made shorter than what God had determined, but shorter than what he might have decreed, if he had dealt with them according to their sins. In times of common calamity God manifests his favour to the elect remnant; his peculiar treasure, which he will secure when the lumber is abandoned to the spoiler. The shortening of calamities is a kindness God often grants. Instead of complaining that our afflictions last so long, if we consider our defects, we shall see reason to be thankful that they do not last always; when it is bad with us, it becomes us to say, "Blessed be God that it is no worse."

And now comes in the repeated caution to take heed of being ensnared by false Christs, and false prophets (v. 23, &c.). Times of great trouble are times of great temptation and therefore we have need to double our guard then. Do not heed them, it is all but talk.

VII. He foretells the sudden spreading of the gospel in the world, about the time of these great events (v. 27, 28); As the lightning comes out of the east, so shall the coming of the Son of man be.

1. It seems primarily to be meant of his coming to set up his spiritual kingdom in the world. The gospel would be remarkable for two things.

(1) Its swift spreading; it shall fly as the lightning. The gospel is light (John iii. 19); and it is not in this as the lightning, that it is a sudden flash, and away, for it is sunlight, and daylight. It is as lightning in these respects:

[1] It is light from heaven, as the lightning. It is God, and not man, that sends the lightnings, and summons them.

[2] It is visible and conspicuous as the lightning. Truth seeks no corners, however it may sometimes be forced into them. Christ preached his gospel openly (John xviii. 20), and his apostles on the housetop (ch. x. 27).

[3] It was sudden and surprising to the world as the lightning. The powers of darkness were dispersed and vanquished by the gospel lightning.

[4] It spread far and wide, and that quickly and irresistibly, like the lightning, which comes, suppose, out of the east (Christ is said to ascend from the east), and lighteneth to the west. Gospel light rose with the sun, and went with the same, so that the beams of it reached to the ends of the earth. Though it was fought against, it could never be cooped up in a desert, or in a secret place, as the seducers were; but by this, according to Gamaliel's rule, proved itself to be of God, that it could not be overthrown, Acts v. 38, 39. How soon did the gospel lightning reach this island of Great Britain! Tertullian, who wrote in the second century, takes notice of it, The fastnesses of Britain, though inaccessible to the Romans, were occupied by Jesus Christ. This was the Lord's doing.

(2) Another thing remarkable concerning the gospel, was, its strange success in those places to which it was spread; it gathered in multitudes. The lifting up of Christ from the earth, that is, the preaching of Christ crucified, which, one would think, should drive all men from him, will draw all men to him

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

For in those days shall be affliction, such as was not from the beginning of the creation which God created unto this time, neither shall be—Such language is not unusual in the Old Testament with reference to tremendous calamities. But it is matter of literal fact that there was crowded into the period of the Jewish war an amount and complication of suffering perhaps unparalleled; as the narrative of JOSEPHUS, examined closely and arranged under different heads, would show. And except that the Lord had shortened those days, no flesh—i.e., no human life—should be saved: but for the elect's sake, whom he hath chosen, he hath shortened the days—But for this merciful "shortening," brought about by a remarkable concurrence of causes, the whole nation would have perished, in which there yet remained a remnant to be afterwards gathered out. This portion of the prophecy closes, in Luke, with the following vivid and important glance at the subsequent fortunes of the chosen people: "And they shall fall by the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations: and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled" (Luke 21:24). The language as well as the idea of this remarkable statement is taken from Daniel 8: 10, 13. What, then, is its import here? It implies, first, that a time is coming when Jerusalem shall cease to be "trodden down of the Gentiles"; which it was then by pagan, and since and till now is by Mohammedan unbelievers: and next, it implies that the period when this treading down of Jerusalem by the Gentiles is to cease will be when "the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled" or "completed." But what does this mean? We may gather the meaning of it from Romans 11 in which the divine purposes and procedure towards the chosen people from first to last are treated in detail. In vs. 25 of that chapter these words of our Lord are thus reproduced: "For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits; that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in." See the exposition of that verse, from which it will appear that "till the fulness of the Gentiles be come in"—or, in our Lord's phraseology, "till the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled"—does not mean "till the general conversion of the world to Christ," but "till the Gentiles have had their full time of that place in the Church which the Jews had before them." After that period of Gentilism, as before of Judaism, "Jerusalem" and Israel, no longer "trodden down by the Gentiles," but "grafted into their own olive tree," shall constitute, with the believing Gentiles, one Church of God, and fill the whole earth. What a bright vista does this open up!

ADAM CLARKE

21. For then shall be great tribulation. No history can furnish us with a parallel to the calamities and miseries of the Jews: rapine, murder, famine, and pestilence within; fire and sword, and all the horrors of war, without. Our Lord wept at the foresight of these calamities, and it is almost impossible for any humane person to read the relation of them in Josephus without weeping also. Luke, chap. xxi. 22, calls these the "days of vengeance, that all things which are written may be fulfilled."

22. Except those days should be shortened. Josephus computes the number of those who perished in the siege at eleven hundred thousand, besides those who were slain in other places, War, b. vi, c. 9; and if the Romans had gone on destroying in this manner, the whole nation of the Jews would, in a short time, have been entirely extirpated. But, for the sake of the elect, the Jews, that they might not be utterly destroyed, and for the Christians particularly, the days were shortened. These, partly through the fury of the zealots on one hand and the hatred of the Romans on the other, and partly through the difficulty of subsisting in the mountains, without houses or provisions, would in all probability have all been destroyed, by either the sword or famine, if the days had not been shortened. The besieged themselves helped to shorten those days by their divisions and mutual slaughters, and by fatally deserting their strongholds, where they never could have been subdued but by famine alone. So well-fortified was Jerusalem, and so well-provided to stand a siege, that the enemy without could not have prevailed had it not been for the factions and seditions within. When Titus was viewing the fortifications after the taking of the city, he could not help ascribing his success to God. "We have fought," said he, "with God on our side; and it is God who pulled the Jews out of these strong holds: for what could machines or the hands of men avail against such towers as these?" (War, b. vi, c. 9.)

27. For as the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west. It is worthy of remark that our Lord, in the most particular manner, points out the very march of the Roman army. They entered into Judea on the east, and carried on their conquest westward, as if not only the extensiveness of the ruin, but the very route which the army would take, were intended in the comparison of the lightning issuing from the east and shining to the west.

W. E. VINE:

PAROUSIA, lit., a presence, para, with, and ousia, being (from eimi, to be), denotes both an arrival and a consequent presence with. For instance, in a papyrus letter a lady speaks of the necessity of her parousia in a place in order to attend matters relating to her property there. Paul speaks of his parousia in Philippi (Phil. 2:12) (in contrast to his apousia, his absence). Parousia is used to describe the presence of Christ with His disciples on the Mount of Transfiguration (2 Pet. 1:16). When used of the return of Christ, at the rapture of the Church, it signifies, not merely His momentary coming for His saints, but His presence with them from that moment until His revelation and manifestation to the world. In some passages the word gives prominence to the beginning of that period, the course of the period being implied (1 Cor. 15:23; 1 Thess. 4:15; 5:23; 2 Thess. 2:1; James 5:7, 8; 2 Pet. 3:4). In some, the course is prominent (Matt. 24:3, 37; 1 Thess. 3:13; 1 John 2:28); in others the conclusion of the period (Matt. 24:27; 2 Thess. 2:8).—Vine's Expository Dictionary

MATTHEW HENRY

(John xii. 32). Whither should the soul go but to Jesus Christ, who has the words of eternal life? Those who have spiritual senses exercised, will know the voice of the good Shepherd from that of a thief and a robber. Saints will be where the true Christ is, not the false Christs. A living principle of grace is a kind of natural instinct in all the saints, drawing them to Christ to live upon him.

2. Some understand these verses of the coming of the Son of man to destroy Jerusalem.

Now here are two things intimated concerning it.

(1) That to the most it would be as unexpected as a flash of lightning, which indeed gives warning of the clap of thunder which follows, but is itself surprising.

(2) That it might be as justly expected as that the eagle should fly to the carcases. The desolation will come as certainly as the birds of prey to a dead carcase. The Jews were so corrupt and degenerate that they were become a carcase, obnoxious to the righteous judgment of God. The Romans were as an eagle, and the ensign of their armies was an eagle. The destruction shall find out the Jews wherever they are, as the eagle scents the prey.

3. It is very applicable to the day of judgment, the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ in that day. Now see here,

(1) How he shall come; as the lightning. Therefore those that enquire after Christ must not go into the desert or the secret places, nor listen to everyone that will put up the finger to invite them to a sight of Christ; but let them look upward, for the heavens must contain him, and thence we look for the Saviour.

(2) How the saints shall be gathered to him with the greatest swiftness and alacrity imaginable.

VIII. He foretells his second coming at the end of time, v. 29–31. The sun shall be darkened, &c.

1. Some think this is to be understood only of the destruction of Jerusalem and the Jewish nation; the darkening of the sun, moon, and stars, denotes the eclipse of the glory of that state. The sign of the Son of man (v. 30) means a signal appearance of the power and justice of the Lord Jesus in it, and the gathering of his elect (v. 31) signifies the delivering of a remnant from this sin and ruin.

2. It seems rather to refer to Christ's second coming. The only objection against this, is, that it is said to be immediately after the tribulation of those days; but as to that, (1) It is usual in the prophetical style to speak of things great and certain as near and just at hand, only to express the greatness and certainty of them. (2) A thousand years are in God's sight but as one day, 2 Pet. iii. 8. It is there urged, with reference to this very thing, and so it might be said to be immediately after.

Now concerning Christ's second coming, it is here foretold,

[1] That there shall be then a great and amazing change of the creatures, and particularly the heavenly bodies (v. 29). The sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light. The stars shall fall; and the powers of heaven shall be shaken. This intimates,

First, That there shall be a great change, in order to the making of all things new.

Secondly, It shall be a visible change, and such as all the world must take notice of; for such the darkening of the sun and moon cannot but be: and it would be an amazing change. The days of heaven, and the continuance of the sun and moon, are used to express that which is lasting and unchangeable, yet they shall thus be shaken.

Thirdly, It shall be a universal change. Nature shall sustain a general shock and convulsion, which yet shall be no hindrance to the joy and rejoicing of heaven and earth before the Lord, when he cometh to judge the world.

Fourthly, The sun was darkened at the death of Christ, for then was in one sense the judgment of this world (John xii. 31).

Fifthly, The glorious appearance of our Lord Jesus, will darken the sun and moon, as a candle is darkened in the beams of the noon-day sun.

Sixthly, The sun and moon shall be then darkened, because there will be no more occasion for them. To the saints that had their treasure above, such light of joy and comfort will be given as shall supersede that of the sun and moon, and render it useless.

[2] That then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven (v. 30), the Son of man himself, as it follows here, They shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds. At his first coming, he was set for a Sign that should be spoken against (Luke ii. 34), but at his second coming, a sign that should be admired.

[3] That then all the tribes of the earth shall mourn, v. 30. Some of all the tribes and kindreds of the earth shall mourn, while the chosen remnant shall lift up their heads with joy, knowing that their re-

For as the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." See on Luke 17:23, 24. "For wheresoever the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together." See on Luke 17:37.

But in those days, after that tribulation—"Immediately after the tribulation of those days" (Matt. 24:29). the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light. And the stars of heaven shall fall—"and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth" (Luke 21:25, 26). and the powers that are in heaven shall be shaken—Though the grandeur of this language carries the mind over the head of all periods but that of Christ's Second Coming, nearly every expression will be found used of the Lord's coming in terrible national judgments: as of Babylon (Isa. 13:9-13); of Idumea (Isa. 34:1, 2, 4, 8-10); of Egypt (Ezek. 32:7, 8); compare also Psalm 18:7-15; Isaiah 24:1, 17-19; Joel 2:10, 11, etc. We cannot therefore consider the mere strength of this language a proof that it refers exclusively or primarily to the precursors of the final day, though of course in "that day" it will have its most awful fulfilment. And then shall they see the Son of man coming in the clouds with great power and glory—In Matthew 24:30, this is given most fully: "And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven; and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man . . ." That this language finds its highest interpretation in the Second Personal Coming of Christ, is most certain. But the question is, whether that be the primary sense of it as it stands here? Now if the reader will turn to Daniel 7:13, 14, and connect with it the preceding verses, he will find, we think, the true key to our Lord's meaning here. There the powers that oppressed the Church—symbolized by rapacious wild beasts—are summoned to the bar of the Great God, who as the Ancient of days seats Himself, with His assessors, on a burning Throne: thousand thousands ministering to Him, and ten thousand times ten thousand standing before Him. "The judgment is set, and the books are opened." Who that is guided by the mere words would doubt that this is a description of the Final Judgment? And yet nothing is clearer than that it is not, but a description of a vast temporal judgment, upon organized bodies of men, for their incurable hostility to the kingdom of God upon earth. Well, after the doom of these has been pronounced and executed, and room thus prepared for the unobstructed development of the kingdom of God over the earth, what follows? "I saw in the night visions, and behold, one like THE SON OF MAN came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they (the angelic attendants) brought Him near before Him." For what purpose? To receive investiture in the kingdom, which, as Messiah, of right belonged to Him. Accordingly, it is added, "And there was given Him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all peoples, nations, and languages should serve Him: His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and His kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." Comparing this with our Lord's words, He seems to us, by "the Son of man [on which phrase, see on John 1:51] coming in the clouds with great power and glory," to mean, that when judicial vengeance shall once have been executed upon Jerusalem, and the ground thus cleared for the unobstructed establishment of His

28. For wheresoever the carcase is. "The dead carcass." The Jewish nation, which was morally and judicially dead. There will the eagles. The Roman armies, called so partly from their strength and fierceness and partly from the figure of these animals which was always wrought on their ensigns, or even in brass, placed on the tops of their ensign-staves. It is remarkable that the Roman fury pursued these wretched men wheresoever they were found. They were a dead carcass doomed to be devoured, and the Roman eagles were the commissioned devourers. See the pitiful account in Josephus, War, b. vii, cc. 2—3, 6, 9—11.

29. Immediately after the tribulation. Commentators generally understand this, and what follows, of the end of the world and Christ's coming to judgment; but the word immediately shows that our Lord is not speaking of any distant event, but of something immediately consequent on calamities already predicted—and that must be the destruction of Jerusalem.

30. Then shall appear the sign of the Son of man. The plain meaning of this is that the destruction of Jerusalem will be such a remarkable instance of divine vengeance and such a signal manifestation of Christ's power and glory that all the Jewish tribes shall mourn, and many will, in consequence of this manifestation of God, be led to acknowledge Christ and His religion. By "of the land," in the text, is evidently meant here, as in several other places, the land of Judea and its tribes, either its then inhabitants or the Jewish people wherever found.

demption draws nigh, and their Redeemer. Penitent sinners look to Christ, and mourn after a godly sort; and they who sow in those tears, shall shortly reap in joy.

[4] That then they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory. First, The judgment of the great day will be committed to the Son of man. Secondly, The Son of man will at that day come in the clouds of heaven. Much of the intercourse between heaven and earth is by the clouds; drawn by heaven from the earth, distilled by heaven upon the earth. Christ went to heaven in a cloud, and will in like manner come again, Acts i. 9, 11. Thirdly, He will come with power and great glory: his first coming was in weakness and great meanness (2 Cor. xiii. 4). Fourthly, Therefore the Son of man will be the Judge, that he may be seen, that sinners thereby may be the more confounded. "Is this he whom we have slighted, and rejected, and rebelled against; whom we have crucified to ourselves afresh; who might have been our Saviour, but is our Judge?"

[5] That he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, v. 31. The angels shall be attendants upon Christ at his second coming; they shall be obliged to wait upon him. They are now ministering Spirits sent forth by him (Heb. i. 14), and will be so then. Their ministration will be ushered in with a great sound of a trumpet. Very fitly therefore shall there be the sound of a trumpet at the last day, when the saints shall enter upon their eternal jubilee.

[6] That they shall gather together his elect from the four winds. At the second coming of Jesus Christ, there will be a general meeting of all the saints. The gifts of love to eternity follow the thoughts of love from eternity; and the Lord knows them that are his. The angels shall be employed to bring them together, as Christ's servants, and as the saints' friends. They shall be gathered from one end of heaven to the other; the elect of God are scattered abroad (John xi. 52), but when that great gathering day comes, there shall not one of them be missing; distance of place shall keep none out of heaven, if distance of affection do not.

We have here the practical application of the foregoing prediction; in general, we must expect and prepare for the events here foretold.

I. We must expect them; "Now learn a parable of the fig-tree, v. 32, 33. Now learn what use to make of the things you have heard; that you may provide accordingly." The parable of the fig-tree is no more than this, that its budding and blossoming are a presage of summer. Thus when God begins to fulfil prophecies, he will make an end. After the branch grows tender, we expect the March winds, and the April showers, before the summer comes; however, we are sure it is coming; "so likewise ye, when the gospel day shall dawn, the perfect day will come. Know that it is near." When the trees of righteousness begin to bud and blossom, when God's people promise faithfulness, it is a happy presage of good times. In them God begins his work, first prepares their heart, and then he will go on with it.

Now touching the events foretold here, which we are to expect,

1. Christ here assures us of the certainty of them (v. 35); Heaven and earth shall pass away; but my words shall not pass away. The word of Christ is more sure and lasting than heaven and earth. We may build with more assurance upon the word of Christ than we can upon the pillars of heaven, or the strong foundations of the earth; for, when they shall be no more, the word of Christ shall remain. In God's time, which is the best time, and in God's way, which is the best way, it shall certainly be fulfilled. Every word of Christ is very pure, and therefore very sure.

2. He here instructs us as to the time of them, v. 34, 36.

(1) As to these things, especially the ruin of the Jewish nation; "This generation shall not pass away, till all these things be fulfilled (v. 34); there are those now alive, that shall see Jerusalem destroyed. Because it might seem strange, he backs it with a solemn asseveration; "Verily, I say unto you. You may take my word for it, these things are at the door."

(2) But as to that day and hour which will put a period to time, that knoweth no man, v. 36. There is a certain day and hour fixed for the judgment to come; it is called the day of the Lord. That day and hour are a great secret. No man knows it; not the wisest by their sagacity, not the best by any divine discovery. None knows but my Father only. The uncertainty of the time of Christ's coming, is, to those who are watchful, a savour of life unto life, and makes them own kingdom, His true regal claims and rights would be visibly and gloriously asserted and manifested. See on Luke 9:28 (with its parallels in Matthew and Mark), in which nearly the same language is employed, and where it can hardly be understood of anything else than the full and free estabishment of the kingdom of Christ on the destruction of Jerusalem. But what is that "sign of the Son of man in heaven?" Interpreters are not agreed. But as before Christ came to destroy Jerusalem some appalling portents were seen in the air, so before His Personal appearing it is likely that something analogous will be witnessed, though of what nature it would be vain to conjecture. And then shall he send his angels—"with a great sound of a trumpet" (Matt. 24:31). and shall gather together his elect . . .—As the tribes of Israel were anciently gathered together by sound of trumpet (Exod. 19:13, 16, 19; Lev. 23: 24; Ps. 81:3-5), so any mighty gathering of God's people, by divine command, is represented as collected by sound of trumpet (Isa. 27:13; cf. Rev. 11: 15); and the ministry of angels, employed in all the great operations of Providence, is here held forth as the agency by which the present assembling of the elect is to be accomplished. LIGHTFOOT thus explains it: "When Jerusalem shall be reduced to ashes, and that wicked nation cut off and rejected, then shall the Son of man send His ministers with the trumpet of the Gospel, and they shall gather His elect of the several nations, from the four corners of heaven: so that God shall not want a Church, although that ancient people of His be rejected and cast off: but that ancient Jewish Church being destroyed, a new Church shall be called out of the Gentiles." But though something like this appears to be the primary sense of the verse, in relation to the destruction of Jerusalem, no one can fail to see that the language swells beyond any gathering of a human family into a Church upon earth, and forces the thoughts onward to that gathering of the Church "at the last trump," to meet the Lord in the air, which is to wind up the present scene. Still, this is not, in our judgment, the direct subject of the prediction; for the next verse limits the whole prediction to the generation then existing.

Now learn a parable of the fig tree—"Now from the fig tree learn the parable," or the high lesson which this teaches. When her branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves—"its leaves." So ye, in like manner, when ye shall see these things come to pass—rather, 'coming to pass'—know that it—"the kingdom of God" (Luke 21:31)—is nigh, even at the doors—that is, the full manifestation of it; for till then it admitted of no full development. In Luke (21:28) the following words precede these: "And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh"—their redemption, in the first instance certainly, from Jewish oppression (I Thess. 2:14-16; Luke 11:52): but in the highest sense of these words, redemption from all the oppressions and miseries of the present state at the second appearing of the Lord Jesus.

Heaven and earth shall pass away; but my words shall not pass away—the strongest possible expression of the divine authority by which He spake; not as Moses or Paul might have said of their own inspiration, for such language would be unsuitable in any merely human mouth.

Verily I say unto you, that this generation shall not pass till all these things be done—or "fulfilled" (Matt. 24:34; Luke 21: 32). Whether we take this to mean that the whole would be fulfilled within the limits of the generation then current, or, according to a usual way of speaking, that the generation then existing would not pass away without seeing a begun fulfilment of this prediction, the facts entirely correspond. For either the whole was fulfilled in the destruction accomplished by Titus, as many think; or, if we stretch it out, according to others, till the thorough dispersion of the Jews a little later, under Adrian, every requirement of our Lord's words seems to be met.

But of that day and that hour—i.e., the precise time. knoweth no man—lit., no one—no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father—This very remarkable statement regarding "the Son" is peculiar to Mark. Whether it

31. He shall send his angels. "His messengers," the apostles, and their successors in the Christian ministry. With a great sound of a trumpet. Or "a loud-sounding trumpet"—the earnest, affectionate call of the gospel of peace, life, and salvation. Shall gather together his elect. The Gentiles, who were now chosen or elected, in place of the rebellious, obstinate Jews, according to our Lord's prediction, Matt. viii. 11-12 and Luke xiii. 28-29. To Matthew's account, Luke adds, chap. xxi. 24, "They shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations: and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." The number of those who fell by the sword was very great. Eleven hundred thousand perished during the siege. Many were slain at other places and at other times. Many also were led away captives into all nations. Josephus says the number of the captives taken in the whole war amounted to 97,000. Those above seventeen years of age were sent to the works in Egypt; but most were distributed through the Roman provinces, to be destroyed in their theaters by the sword and by the wild beasts; and those under seventeen years of age were sold for slaves. Jerusalem also was, according to the prediction of our Lord, to be "trodden down of the Gentiles." Accordingly it has never since been in the possession of the Jews.

32. Learn a parable of the fig tree. That is, These signs which I have given you will be as infallible a proof of the approaching ruin of the Jewish state as the budding of the trees is a proof of the coming summer.

34. This generation shall not pass. "This race"; i.e., the Jews shall not cease from being a distinct people till all the counsels of God relative to them and the Gentiles be fulfilled. Some translate this generation as meaning the persons who were then living, that they should not die before these signs took place. But though this was true as to the calamities that fell upon the Jews, and the destruction of their government and Temple, yet as our Lord mentions Jerusalem's continuing to be under the power of the Gentiles till the fulness of the Gentiles should come in, i.e., till all the nations of the world should receive the gospel of Christ, after which the Jews themselves should be converted unto God, Rom. xi. 25. I think it more proper not to restrain its meaning to the few years which preceded the destruction of Jerusalem, but to understand it of the care taken by divine providence to preserve them as a distinct people, and yet to keep them out of their own land and from their Temple service. See on Mark xiii. 30. But still it is literally true in reference to the destruction of Jerusalem. John probably lived to see these things come to pass. The war began, as Josephus says, Ant. b. xx, c. 11, s. 1, in May, A.D. 66. The Temple was burnt August 10, A.D. 70, the same day and month on which it had been burnt by the king of Babylon, Josephus, Ant. b. xx, c. 11, s. 8. The city was taken September 8, in the second year of the reign of Vespasian, or the year of Christ 70, Ant. b. vi, c. 10.

36. But of that day and hour. Hora here is translated "season" by many eminent critics, and is used in this sense by both sacred and profane authors. As the day was not known in which Jerusalem should be invested by the Romans, therefore our Lord advised His disciples to pray that it might not be on a Sabbath; and as the "season" was not known, therefore they were to pray that it might not be in the winter, v. 20. See on Mark xiii. 32.

more watchful; but to those who are careless, it is a savour of death unto death, and makes them more careless.

II. To this end we must expect these events, that we may prepare for them, v. 37–41. In these verses we have such an idea given us of the judgment day, as may serve to startle and awaken us.

It will be a surprising day, and a separating day.

1. It will be a surprising day, as the deluge was to the old world, v. 37–39. Besides his first coming, to save, he has other comings to judge. He saith (John ix. 39), For judgment I am come; and for judgment he will come.

Now this here is applicable,

(1) To temporal judgments, particularly that which was now hastening upon the nation and people of the Jews; though they had fair warning given them of it, yet it found them secure, crying, Peace and safety. Men's unbelief shall not make God's threatenings of no effect.

(2) To the eternal judgment; so the judgment of the great day is called, Heb. vi. 2. Now Christ here shows what were the temper and posture of the old world when the deluge came.

[1] They were sensual and worldly; they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage. They were all of them, except Noah, over head and ears in the world, and regardless of the word of God, and this ruined them. Universal neglect of religion is a more dangerous symptom to any people than particular instances here and there of daring irreligion. Eating and drinking are necessary to the preservation of man's life; marrying and giving in marriage are necessary to the preservation of mankind. They were unreasonable in it, inordinate and entire in the pursuit of the delights of sense. They were in these things as in their element, as if they had their being for no other end than to eat and drink. They were unreasonable in it; they were entire and intent upon the world and the flesh. They were eating and drinking, when they should have been repenting and praying.

[2] They were secure and careless; they knew not, until the flood came, v. 39. Knew not! Surely they could not but know. Did he not call them to repentance while his long-suffering waited? Their not knowing is joined with their eating, and drinking, and marrying; for, First, Therefore they were sensual, because they were secure. Secondly, Therefore they were secure, because they were sensual; were so taken up with things seen and present, that they had neither time nor heart to mind the things not seen as yet, which they were warned of. They knew not, until the flood came. The flood did come, though they would not foresee it. The evil day is never the further off for men's putting it far off from them. They did not know it till it was too late to prevent it. Judgments are most terrible and amazing to the secure, and those that have made a jest of them.

The application of this, concerning the old world, we have in these words; So shall the coming of the Son of man be. Security and sensuality are likely to be the epidemical diseases of the latter days. All are off their watch, and at their ease. As the flood took away the sinners of the old world, irresistibly and irrecoverably; so shall secure sinners, that mocked at Christ and his coming, be taken away.

2. It will be a separating day (v. 40, 41); Then shall two be in the field.

(1) We may apply it to the success of the gospel, especially at the first preaching of it; it divided the world; some believed the things which were spoken, and were taken to Christ; others believed not, and were left to perish in their unbelief.

When ruin came upon Jerusalem, a distinction was made by Divine Providence, according to that which had been before made by divine grace; for all the Christians among them were saved from perishing in that calamity. If we are safe when thousands fall on our right hand and our left, are not consumed when others are consumed round about us, so that we are as brands plucked out of the fire, we have reason to say, It is of the Lord's mercies, and it is a great mercy.

(2) We may apply it to the second coming of Jesus Christ, and the separation which will be made in that day. He had said before (v. 31), that the elect will be gathered together. Here it is applied to them who shall be found alive. Christ will come unlooked for, will find people busy at their usual occupations, in the field, at the mill. And it speaks abundance of comfort to the Lord's people. Are they mean and despised in the world, as the man-servant in the field, or the maid at the mill (Exod. xi. 5)? Yet they shall not be forgotten or overlooked in that day. Are they dispersed in distant and unlikely places, where one would not expect to find the heirs of glory, in the means that the Son was not at that time in possession of the knowledge referred to, or simply that it was not among the things which He had received to communicate—has been matter of much controversy even among the firmest believers in the proper Divinity of Christ. In the latter sense it was taken by some of the most eminent of the ancient Fathers, and by LUTHER, MELANCTHON, and most of the older Lutherans; and it is so taken by BENGEL, LANGE, WEBSTER and WILKINSON. CHRYSOSTOM and others understood it to mean that as man our Lord was ignorant of this. It is taken literally by CALVIN, GROTIUS, DE WETTE, MEYER, FRITZSCHE, STIER, ALFORD, and ALEXANDER. Take ye heed, watch and pray; for ye know not when the time is.

A. B. SIMPSON:

His advent. Our postmillennial friends are fond of telling us of the gradual progress of Christian influences and the improvement of the world and that, after a little while, things will be about right and we can expect the Lord to come down to congratulate us on the good work we have been able to do without Him.

The picture Jesus gives us is entirely different: "As the days of Noah were, so shall also the days of the coming of the Son of man be." We know that the days of Noah were marked by wickedness and crime, and it would seem as if the two crimes most rampant in Noah's time, namely violence and lust, are coming to the front again in our own day in the increasing prevalence of murder, divorce, and social corruption. While it is true that the elements of righteousness and spiritual power are making progress and the good are better than they ever were before, there can be no doubt that the bad are worse and the shadow grows as dark as the light grows bright.

His coming a surprise. These verses tell us that the Lord's coming will be a shock to this self-complacent world. It will also be a surprise to the modern prophets who have told us all about it so often and still persist in knowing the very schedule of events and the time which the Father hath put in His own power.

It will not be a surprise to His waiting people. "That day shall not overtake you as a thief." They may not know the day or hour, but they shall know enough to be ready. But to the world it will be a terrific and startling blow. "When they shall say peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them as travail upon a woman with child, and they shall not escape." Even for us, the followers of Christ, the only safety is to be always ready.

—Christ in the Bible

ADAM CLARKE

37-38. As the days of Noe . . . they were eating and drinking. The design of these verses seems to be that the desolation should be as general as it should be unexpected.

40-41. Then shall two men . . . two women . . . one shall be taken, and the other left. The meaning seems to be that so general should these calamities be that no two persons, wheresoever found, or about whatsoever employed, should be both able to effect their escape; and that captivity and the sword should have a complete triumph over this unhappy people. Two women shall be grinding. Women alone are still employed in grinding the corn in the East; and it is only when dispatch is required, or the uppermost millstone is heavy, that a second woman is added.

MATTHEW HENRY

field, at the mill? Yet the angels will find them there. A very great change it will be, to go to heaven from ploughing and grinding. Are they weak, and unable of themselves to move heavenward? They shall be taken. Those whom Christ has once apprehended and laid hold on, he will never lose his hold of. Are they intermixed with others, linked with them in the same habitations, societies, employments? Let not that discourage any true Christian; God knows how to separate the wheat and chaff in the same floor.

III. Here is a general exhortation to us, to watch, and be ready, v. 42, &c.

1. The duty required; Watch, and be ready, v. 42, 44.

(1) Watch therefore, v. 42. It is the great duty and interest of all the disciples of Christ to watch, to be awake and keep awake. As a sinful state or way is compared to sleep, senseless and inactive, so a gracious state or way is compared to watching and waking. We must watch for our Lord's coming. To watch implies not only to believe that our Lord will come, but to desire that he would come, to be often thinking of his coming. To watch for Christ's coming, is to maintain that gracious temper and disposition of mind which we should be willing that our Lord, when he comes, should find us in. Watching is supposed to be in the night, which is sleeping time; while we are in this world, it is night with us, and we must take pains to keep ourselves awake.

(2) Be ye also ready, We wake in vain, if we do not get ready. It is not enough to look for such things; but we must therefore give diligence. There is an inheritance which we then hope to enter upon, and we must have ourselves ready, made meet to partake of it.

2. The reasons to induce us to this watchfulness; which are two.

(1) Because the time of our Lord's coming is very uncertain. Let us consider then,

[1] That we know not what hour he will come, v. 42. We cannot know that we have a long time to live; nor can we know how little a time we have to live, for it may prove less than we expect.

[2] That he may come at such an hour as we think not, v. 44. Though we know not when he will come, we are sure he will come. In such an hour as you think not, that is, such an hour as they who are unready and unprepared, think not (v. 50); nay, such an hour as the most lively expectants perhaps thought least likely.

[3] That the children of this world are thus wise in their generation. This he shows in a particular instance, v. 43. If the master of a house had notice that a thief would come such a night, and such a watch of the night, though it were the midnight-watch, when he was most sleepy, yet he would be up, and listen to every noise in every corner, and he ready to give him a warm reception. Though we know not just when our Lord will come, yet, knowing that he will come, it concerns us to watch always. The day of the Lord comes by surprise, as a thief in the night. If Christ, when he comes, finds us asleep and unready, our house will be broken up, and we shall lose all we are worth. Be ye also ready; as ready at all times as the good man of the house would be at the hour when he expected the thief.

(2) Because the issue of our Lord's coming will be very happy and comfortable to those that shall be found ready, but very dismal and dreadful to those that shall not, v. 45, &c. This is represented by the different state of good and bad servants, when their lord comes to reckon with them. Now this parable seems especially intended as a warning to ministers; for the servant spoken of is a steward. Now observe what Christ here saith,

[1] Concerning the good servant; he shows here what he is—a ruler of the household; what, being so, he should be—faithful and wise; and what, if he be so, he shall be eternally—blessed.

First, We have here his place and office. He is one whom his Lord has made ruler over his household, to give them meat in due season. The church of Christ is his household, or family, standing in relation to him as the Father and Master of it. Gospel ministers are appointed rulers in this household; not as princes but as stewards, or other subordinate officers; not as lords, but as guides. They are rulers by Christ; what power they have is derived from him. The work of gospel ministers is to give to Christ's household their meat in due season, as stewards. Their work is to give, not take to themselves, but give to the family what the Master has bought, to dispense what Christ has purchased. It is to give meat; not to give law (that is Christ's work), but to deliver those doctrines to the church which, if duly digested, will be nourishment to souls. They must give the meat that is sound and wholesome. It must be given in due season, that is, whenever any opportunity offers itself; or time after time, according as the duty of every day

The closing words of the Discourse, as given by Luke (21:34-36), are remarkable. "And take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged" or "weighted down with surfeiting"—"debauchery," or its effects; "and drunkenness"—meaning all animal excesses, which quench spirituality; "and cares of this life"—engrossing the interest, absorbing the attention, and so choking spirituality: "and so that day come upon you unawares. For as a snare"—a trap catching them when least expecting it—"shall it come on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth. Watch ye therefore, and pray always"—the two great duties which, in prospect of trial, are always enjoined—"that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man." These warnings, though suggested by the need of preparedness for the tremendous calamities approaching, and the total wreck of the existing state of things, have reference to a coming of another kind, for judicial vengeance of another nature and on a grander and more awful scale—not ecclesiastical or political but personal; not temporal but eternal—when all safety and blessedness will be found to lie in being able to "stand before the Son of man" in the glory of His personal appearing.

ADAM CLARKE

42. Watch therefore. Be always on your guard, that you may not be taken unawares, and that you may be properly prepared to meet God in the way of either judgment or mercy, whensoever He may come.

F. B. MEYER:

Watch and work. There are many comings of the Son of man before the final one to judgment. We may derive the full benefit of our Lord's words, even though we have arrived at no settled opinion as to the precise order of future events. The hour of our death is as uncertain as that of his coming in the clouds. For each, we should be ready!

Watchfulness is keeping awake! We are beset by temptations to sleep. Bunyan said that we are traveling over the Enchanted Ground, the air of which is very heavy and sleep-producing. How dull we are to perceive the unseen, or to meet the great opportunities of life! "Broken up" alludes to the mud or clay house which could not keep out the thief. Death breaks in and carries us away from all of our treasures (1 Thess. 5:2, 4).

We had best wait for our Lord while engaged in carefully discharging our appointed tasks. The Church is a big household in which each has his niche. To labor is to pray; to serve is to be ready. —Bible Commentary

45. Who then is a faithful and wise servant? All should live in the same expectation of the coming of Christ which a servant has with respect to the return of his master, who, in departing for a season, left the management of his affairs to him, and of which management he is to give an exact account on his master's return.

requires.

Secondly, His right discharge of this office. The good servant will be a good steward.

1. He is faithful; stewards must be so. He that is trusted, must be trusty; and the greater the trust is, the more is expected from them. It is a great good thing that is committed to ministers; and they must be faithful. Christ counts those ministers, and those only, that are faithful. A faithful minister of Jesus Christ is one that sincerely designs his master's honour, not his own; regards the meanest, reproves the greatest, and doth not respect persons.

2. He is wise to understand his duty. In guiding of the flock there is need, not only of the integrity of the heart, but the skilfulness of the hands. Honesty may suffice for a good servant, but wisdom is necessary to a good steward.

3. He is doing. The ministry is a good work, and they whose office it is, have always something to do; they must not indulge themselves in ease, but be doing, and doing to the purpose; not talking, but doing.

4. He is found doing when his Master comes; which intimates, (1) Constancy at his work. At what hour soever his Master comes, he is found busy at the work of the day. As with a good God the end of one mercy is the beginning of another, so with a good man, a good minister, the end of one duty is the beginning of another. (2) Perseverance in his work till the Lord come.

Thirdly, The recompence of reward intended him for this.

1. He shall be taken notice of. This is intimated in these words, Who then is that faithful and wise servant? Which supposes that there are but few who answer this character. Those who thus distinguish themselves now, Christ will in the great day both dignify and distinguish by the glory conferred on them.

2. He shall be blessed? Blessed is that servant. All the dead that die in the Lord are blessed, Rev. xiv. 13. But there is a peculiar blessedness secured to them that approve themselves faithful stewards, and are found so doing. Next to the honour of those who die in the field of battle, suffering for Christ as the martyrs, is the honour of those that die in the field of service, ploughing, and sowing, and reaping, for Christ.

3. He shall be preferred (v. 47); He shall make him ruler over all his goods. Great men, if the stewards of their house conduct themselves well in that place, commonly prefer them to be the managers of their estates. But the greatest honour which the kindest master ever did to his most tried servants in this world, is nothing to that weight of glory which the Lord Jesus will confer upon his faithful watchful servants in the world to come.

[2] Concerning the evil servant. Here we have, First, His description given (v. 48, 49). The vilest of creatures is a wicked man, the vilest of men is a wicked Christian, and the vilest of them a wicked minister.

1. The cause of his wickedness; He hath said in his heart, My Lord delays his coming; and therefore he begins to think he will never come. The delay of Christ's coming, though it is a gracious instance of his patience, is greatly abused by wicked people. They that walk by sense, are ready to say of the unseen Jesus, as the people did of Moses when he tarried in the mount upon their errand, We wot not what is become of him, and therefore up, make us gods, the world a god, the belly a god, anything but him that should be.

2. The particulars of his wickedness; he is a slave to his passions and his appetites.

(1) Persecution is here charged upon him. He begins to smite his fellow servants. It is no new thing to see evil servants smiting their fellow servants; both private Christians and faithful ministers. He smites them, either because they reprove him, or because they will not bow, and do him reverence. The steward, when he smites his fellow servants, does it under colour of his Master's authority, and in his name; but he shall know that he could not put a greater affront upon his Master.

(2) Profaneness and immorality; He begins to eat and drink with the drunken. He associates with the worst of sinners. The drunken are the merry and jovial company, and those he is for, and thus he hardens them in their wickedness. He does like them: eats, and drinks, and is drunken. This is an inlet to all manner of sin. Drunkenness is a leading wickedness; they who are slaves to that, are never masters of themselves in anything else. Well, this is the description of a wicked minister, who yet may have the common gifts of learning and utterance above others; and, as hath been said of some, may preach so well in the pulpit, that it is a pity he should ever

ADAM CLARKE

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

In the parable of the household, the word itself is suggestive. Jesus said: "Who then is the faithful and wise servant, whom his lord hath set over his household?" The Greek word here translated household is only once again used. In Revelation we read that "the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations." What relation can there be between healing and household? This question can be answered only by an understanding of what this word household really signifies. It is the word from which we derive our word therapeutic, and the basal idea of it is healing. The word household refers to all such in the house as serve.

That first word, "Who then is the faithful and wise servant?" is the word bond-slave; but the word household comes from another term for servant, which is other than the word bond-slave. It is a word that signifies a loving service, a purpose of healing in service. This is a case of metonymy, where one word is put for another, which the other suggests, as when we say a man keeps a good table, when we refer really to his food. This word in the parable, then, suggests the picture of a great house, and one Lord; and of all those in the house under His control, as thinking of His interests, while serving under His command. He used the word that indicated the love principle in service, the tender healing ministry that only grows out of love. Thus in a word, flaming and flashing with meaning, we discover our Lord's conception of His Church during the time of His absence. His household all serve, but all serve by love, and the ministry is a healing ministry.

Now let us very carefully notice His word: "Who then is the faithful and wise servant, whom his lord hath set over his household?" This word must be interpreted by the consistent teaching of the Lord, that service is the condition of greatness. The servant is "set over." Why "set over"? Because he is a servant. This is not a picture of the priesthood, or of the ministry according to many modern conceptions of these. There is no sense in which any priesthood or ministry is set over the Church of God, save by their ministry. "Whosoever would be first among you, shall be servant of all." Here is Christ's picture of one servant set over the rest, because he serves all the rest. It is not a picture of any man in the household, a picture of one in official authority; it is the picture of each one in the exercise of the ministry of healing and of love.

Now, in the parable we see two attitudes. First that of the faithful and wise servant. His attitude is simply that of bringing forth meat in due season, and feeding the rest; the attitude of caring for all the other members of the household during the Lord's absence, for the sake of the absent Lord. But there is another servant here, and Jesus speaks of him as "that evil servant." He says, "My lord tarrieth," He is not returning yet; and with that sense of the Master's absence, he turns to evil courses within the household, beating his fellow servants instead of feeding and caring for them; turning aside to the companionship of drunken men instead of standing in the place of loyalty to the absent Lord.

In the parable we have two results. When the lord returns, the servant who has been loyal to the service of his fellow servants, for the sake of his absent lord, is promoted and put into the place of a new authority; while the evil servant is cut asunder and cast out.

We must not attempt to carry these parables further than they go. This is a picture first of all of a household, and the relation of all within it to the absent Lord. To gather it up we may state it thus. We shall prove our loyalty in the Church of God to the absent Lord by the measure in which we serve one another; and we shall prove our disloyalty by the measure in which we beat and slay our brethren.
—The Gospel According to Matthew

come out, and yet live so ill out of the pulpit, that it is a pity he should ever come in.

Secondly, His doom read, v. 50, 51. Observe,

1. The surprise that will accompany his doom (v. 50); The Lord of that servant will come. Our putting off the thoughts of Christ's coming will not put off his coming. Whatever fancy he deludes himself with, his Lord will come. The coming of Christ will be a most dreadful surprise to secure and careless sinners, especially to wicked ministers; He shall come in a day when he looketh not for him. Behold, he has told us before.

2. The severity of his doom, v. 51. It is not more severe than righteous, but it is a doom that carries in it utter ruin.

(1) Death. His Lord shall cut him asunder, "he shall cut him off from the land of the living," from the congregation of the righteous, shall separate him unto evil. Death cuts off a good man, as a choice imp is cut off to be grafted in a better stock; but it cuts off a wicked man, as a withered branch is cut off for the fire. Or, as we read it, shall cut him asunder, that is, part body and soul. The soul and body of a godly man at death part fairly, the one cheerfully lifted up to God, the other left to the dust; but the soul and body of a wicked man at death are cut asunder, torn asunder.

(2) Damnation. He shall appoint him his portion with the hypocrites, and a miserable portion it will be, for there shall be weeping. There is a place and state where there is nothing but weeping and gnashing of teeth; which speaks the soul's tribulation and anguish under God's indignation and wrath. The divine sentence will appoint this place and state as the portion of those who by their own sin were fitted for it. He that is now the Saviour, will then be the Judge, and the everlasting state of the children of men will be as he appoints. When Christ would express the most severe punishment in the other world, he calls it the portion of hypocrites. Wicked ministers will have their portion in the other world with the worst of sinners, even with the hypocrites, and justly, for they are the worst of hypocrites. Son, remember, will be as cutting a word to a minister if he perish as to any other sinner whatsoever. Let them therefore who preach to others, fear, lest they themselves should be castaways.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

The dreadful doom of the unwatchful servant is couched in terms of awful severity. The cruel punishment of sawing asunder, which, tradition says, was suffered by Isaiah and was not unfamiliar in old times, is his. What concealed terror of retribution it signifies we do not know. Perhaps it points to a fate in which a man shall be, as it were, parted into two, each at enmity with the other. Perhaps it implies a retribution in kind for his sin, which consisted, as the next clause implies, in hypocrisy, which is the sundering in twain of inward conviction and practice, and is to be avenged by a like but worse rending apart of conscience and will. At all events, it shadows a fearful retribution, which is not extinction, inasmuch as, in the next clause, we read that his portion—his lot, or that condition which belongs to him by virtue of his character—is with "the hypocrites." He was one of them, because, while he said "my lord," he had ceased to love and obey, having ceased to desire and expect; and therefore whatever is their fate shall be his, even to the "dividing asunder of soul and spirit," and setting eternal discord among the thoughts and intents of the heart. That is not the punishment of unwatchfulness, but of what unwatchfulness leads to, if unawakened. Let these words of the King ring an alarm for us all, and rouse our sleepy souls to watch, as becomes the children of the day.
—Expositions of Holy Scripture

ADAM CLARKE

51. Cut him asunder. This refers to an ancient mode of punishment used in several countries. Isaiah is reported to have been sawed asunder. That it was an ancient mode of punishment is evident from what Herodotus says: that Sabacus, king of Ethiopia, had a vision in which he was commanded to cut in two all the Egyptian priests.

CHAPTER 25

I. That in general which is to be illustrated is, the kingdom of heaven. Some of Christ's parables had shown us what it is like now in the present reception of it, as ch. xiii. This tells us what it shall be like, when the mystery of God shall be finished, and that kingdom delivered up to the Father.

II. That by which it is illustrated, is, a marriage solemnity. It was a custom sometimes used among the Jews on that occasion, that the bridegroom came, attended with his friends, late in the night, to the house of the bride, where she expected him, attended with her bride-maids; who, upon notice given of the bridegroom's approach, were to go out with lamps in their hands, to light him into the house with ceremony and formality, in order to the celebrating of the nuptials with great mirth.

1. The Bridegroom is our Lord Jesus Christ. It bespeaks his singular and superlative love to, and his faithful and inviolable covenant with, his spouse the church.

2. The virgins are the professors of religion, members of the church; but here represented as her companions.

3. The office of these virgins is to meet the bridegroom, which is as much their happiness as their duty. They come to wait upon the bridegroom when he appears, and in the meantime to wait for him. As Christians, we profess ourselves to be, (1) Attendants upon Christ, to do him honour. Hold up the name, and hold forth the praise of the exalted Jesus; this is our business. (2) Expectants of Christ, and of his second coming. The second coming of Christ is the centre in which all the lines of our religion meet, and to which the whole of the divine life hath a constant reference and tendency.

4. Their chief concern is to have lights in their hands, when they attend the bridegroom, thus to do him honour and do him service. Christians are children of light.

Now concerning these ten virgins, we may observe,

(1) Their different character, with the proof and evidence of it. Their character was, that five were wise, and five foolish (v. 2). Those of the same profession and denomination among men, may yet be of characters vastly different in the sight of God.

Vss. 1-13. PARABLE OF THE TEN VIRGINS. This and the following parable are in Matthew alone. 1. Then—at the time referred to at the close of the preceding chapter, the time of the Lord's Second Coming to reward His faithful servants and take vengeance on the faithless. Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins, which took their lamps, and went forth to meet the bridegroom—This supplies a key to the parable, whose object is, in the main, the same as that of the last parable—to illustrate the vigilant and expectant attitude of faith, in respect of which believers are described as "they that look for Him" (Heb. 9:28), and "love His appearing" (II Tim. 4:8). In the last parable it was that of servants waiting for their absent Lord; in this it is that of virgin attendants on a Bride, whose duty it was to go forth at night with lamps, and be ready on the appearance of the Bridegroom to conduct the Bride to his house, and go in with him to the marriage. This entire and beautiful change of figure brings out the lesson of the former parable in quite a new light. But let it be observed that, just as in the parable of the Marriage Supper, so in this—the Bride does not come into view at all in this parable; the Virgins and the Bridegroom holding forth all the intended instruction: nor could believers be represented both as Bride and Bridal Attendants without incongruity. 2. And five of them were wise, and five were foolish—They are not distinguished into good and bad, as TRENCH observes, but into "wise" and "foolish"—just as in ch. 7:25-27 those who reared their house for eternity are distinguished into "wise" and "foolish builders"; because in both cases a certain degree of goodwill towards the truth is assumed. To make anything of the equal number of both classes would, we think, be precarious, save to warn us how large a portion of those who, up to the last, so nearly resemble those that love Christ's appearing will be disowned by Him when He comes.

1. Then shall the kingdom of heaven. The state of Jews and professing Christians—or the state of the Visible Church at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem, and in the day of judgment, for the parable appears to relate to both those periods. And particularly at the time in which Christ shall come to judge the world, it shall appear what kind of reception His gospel has met with. Virgins. Denoting the purity of the Christian doctrine and character. In this parable the bridegroom is generally understood to mean Jesus Christ. The feast, that state of felicity to which He has promised to raise His genuine followers. The wise, or "prudent," and foolish virgins, those who truly enjoy, and those who only profess, the purity and holiness of His religion. The oil, the grace and salvation of God, or that faith which works by love. The vessel, the heart in which this oil is contained. The lamp, the profession of enjoying the burning and shining light of the gospel of Christ. Going forth, the whole of their sojourning upon earth.

2. Five of them were wise. Or "provident"—they took care to make a proper provision beforehand, and left nothing to be done in the last moment. Five were foolish. "Careless." Moros is thus defined, "he who sees not what is proper or necessary." These did not see that it was necessary to have "oil in their vessels" (the salvation of God in their souls), as well as a burning lamp of religious profession, vv. 3-4.

MATTHEW HENRY

Those are wise or foolish indeed, that are so in the affairs of their souls. True religion is true wisdom; sin is folly. The evidence of this character was in the very thing which they were to attend to.

First, It was the folly of the foolish virgins, that they took their lamps, and took no oil with them, v. 3. They had just oil enough to make their lamps burn for the present, to make a show with, as if they intended to meet the bridegroom; but no cruse or bottle of oil with them for a recruit if the bridegroom tarried; thus hypocrites.

[1] They have no principle within. They have a lamp of profession in their hands, but have not in their hearts that stock which is necessary to carry them through the services and trials of the present state.

[2] They have no prospect of, nor make provision for, what is to come. They took lamps for a present show, but not oil for after use. They do not provide for hereafter, as the ant does, nor lay up for the time to come, 1 Tim. vi. 19.

Secondly, It was the wisdom of the wise virgins, that they took oil in their vessels with their lamps, v. 4. They had a good principle within, which would maintain and keep up their profession. The heart is the vessel, which it is our wisdom to get furnished; for, out of a good treasure there, good things must be brought; but if that root be rottenness, the blossom will be dust. Grace is the oil which we must have in this vessel. Our light must shine before men, in good works, but this cannot be, or not long, unless there be a fixed active principle in the heart, of faith in Christ, and love to God and our brethren. They that took oil in their vessels, did it upon supposition that perhaps the bridegroom might tarry. In looking forward it is good to prepare for the worst, to lay in for a long siege.

(2) Their common fault, during the bridegroom's delay; They all slumbered and slept, v. 5. The bridegroom tarried, that is, he did not come out so soon as they expected. What we look for as certain, we are apt to think is very near. Christ, as to us, seems to tarry, and yet really does not. But though Christ tarry past our time, he will not tarry past the due time. While he tarried, those that waited for him grew careless, and forgot what they were attending; They all slumbered and slept; as if they had given over looking for him. Those that inferred the suddenness of it from its certainty, when that answered not their expectation, were apt from the delay to infer its uncertainty. The wise virgins kept their lamps burning, but did not keep themselves awake. Too many good Christians, when they have been long in profession, grow remiss, their graces are not lively, nor their works found perfect before God; and though all love be not lost, yet the first love is left.

(3) The surprising summons given them, to attend the bridegroom (v. 6); At midnight there was a cry made, Behold, the bridegroom cometh. Though Christ tarry long, he will come at last; though he seem slow, he is sure. His friends shall find, to their comfort, that the vision is for an appointed time. The year of the redeemed is fixed, and it will come. Christ's coming will be at our midnight, when we least look for him. His coming for the relief and comfort of his people, often is when the good intended seems to be at the greatest distance. Christ will come when he pleases, to show his sovereignty, and will not let us know when, to teach us our duty. When Christ comes, we must go forth to meet him. Go ye forth to meet him, is a call to those who are habitually prepared, to be actually ready. The notice given of Christ's approach, and the call to meet him, will be awakening; There was a cry made. His first coming was not with any observation at all, nor did they say, Lo, here is Christ, or Lo, he is there; he was in the world, and the world knew him not; but his second coming will be with the observation of all the world.

(4) The address they all made to answer this summons (v. 7); They all arose, and trimmed their lamps, snuffed them and supplied them with oil, and went about with all expedition to receive the bridegroom. This, in the wise virgins, bespeaks an actual preparation for the Bridegroom's coming. Even those that are best prepared for death, have work to do, to get themselves actually ready, that they may be found in peace (2 Pet. iii. 14), found doing (ch. xxiv. 46), and not found naked, 2 Cor. v. 3. It will be a day of search and enquiry; and it concerns us to think how we shall then be found. In the foolish virgins, it denotes a vain confidence, and conceit of the goodness of their state, and their readiness for another world.

(5) The distress which the foolish virgins were in, for want of oil, v. 8, 9. This bespeaks, [1] The apprehensions which some hypocrites have of the misery of their state, even on this side death, when God opens

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

3. They that were foolish took their lamps, and took no oil with them: 4. But the wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps—What are these "lamps" and this "oil"? Many answers have been given. But since the foolish as well as the wise took their lamps and went forth with them to meet the Bridegroom, these lighted lamps and this advance a certain way in company with the wise, must denote that Christian profession which is common to all who bear the Christian name; while the insufficiency of this without something else, of which they never possessed themselves, shows that "the foolish" mean those who, with all that is common to them with real Christians, lack the essential preparation for meeting Christ. Then, since the wisdom of "the wise" consisted in their taking with their lamps a supply of oil in their vessels, keeping their lamps burning till the Bridegroom came, and so fitting them to go in with Him to the marriage, this supply of oil must mean that inward reality of grace which alone will stand when He appears whose eyes are as a flame of fire. But this is too general; for it cannot be for nothing that this inward grace is here set forth by the familiar symbol of oil, by which the Spirit of all grace is so constantly represented in Scripture. Beyond all doubt, this was what was symbolized by that precious anointing oil with which Aaron and his sons were consecrated to the priestly office (Exod. 30:23-25, 30); by "the oil of gladness above His fellows" with which Messiah was to be anointed (Ps. 45:7; Heb. 1:9), even as it is expressly said, that "God giveth not the Spirit by measure unto Him" (John 3:34); and by the bowl full of golden oil, in Zechariah's vision, which, receiving its supplies from the two olive trees on either side of it, poured it through seven golden pipes into the golden lampstand to keep it continually burning bright (Zech. 4) —for the prophet is expressly told that it was to proclaim the great truth, "Not by might, nor by power, but by MY SPIRIT, saith the Lord of hosts [shall this temple be built]. Who art thou, O great mountain [of opposition to this issue]? Before Zerubbabel thou shalt become a plain [or, be swept out of the way], and he shall bring forth the head-stone [of the temple], with shoutings [crying], GRACE, GRACE unto it." This supply of oil, then, representing that inward grace which distinguishes the wise, must denote, more particularly, that "supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ," which, as it is the source of the new spiritual life at the first, is the secret of its enduring character. Everything short of this may be possessed by "the foolish"; while it is the possession of this that makes "the wise" to be "ready" when the Bridegroom appears, and fit to "go in with Him to the marriage." Just so in the parable of the Sower, the stony-ground hearers, "having no deepness of earth" and "no root in themselves," though they spring up and get even into ear, never ripen, while they in the good ground bear the precious grain. 5. While the bridegroom tarried—So in ch. 24:48, "My Lord delayeth His coming"; and so Peter says sublimely of the ascended Saviour, "Whom the heaven must receive until the times of restitution of all things" (Acts 3:21, and cf. Luke 19:11, 12). Christ "tarries," among other reasons, to try the faith and patience of His people. they all slumbered and slept—the wise as well as the foolish. The world "slumbered" signifies, simply, "nodded," or, "became drowsy"; while the world "slept" is the usual word for lying down to sleep, denoting two stages of spiritual declension—first, that half-involuntary lethargy or drowsiness which is apt to steal over one who falls into inactivity; and then a conscious, deliberate yielding to it, after a little vain resistance. Such was the state alike of the wise and the foolish virgins, even till the cry of the Bridegroom's approach awoke them. So likewise in the parable of the Importunate Widow: "When the Son of man cometh, shall He find faith on the earth?" (Luke 18:8). 6. And at midnight—i.e., the time when the Bridegroom will be least expected; for "the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night" (I Thess. 5:2). there was a cry made, Behold, the Bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him—i.e., Be ready to welcome Him. 7. Then all those virgins arose, and trimmed their lamps—the foolish virgins as well as the wise. How very long do both parties seem the same—almost to the moment of decision! Looking at the mere form of the parable, it is evident that the folly of "the foolish" consisted not in having no oil at all; for they must have had oil enough in their lamps to keep them burning up to this moment: their folly consisted in not making provision against its exhaustion, by taking with their lamp an oil-vessel

ADAM CLARKE

4. Took oil in their vessels. They not only had a sufficiency of oil in their lamps, but they carried a vessel with oil to recruit their lamps, when it should be found expedient. This the foolish or improvident neglected to do; hence, when the oil that was in their lamps burned out, they had none to pour into the lamps to maintain the flame.

5. The bridegroom tarried. The coming of the bridegroom to an individual may imply his death, His coming to the world—the final judgment. The delay—the time from a man's birth till his death, in the first case; in the second, the time from the beginning to the end of the world. Slumbered and slept. Or, "They became drowsy and fell asleep." As sleep is frequently used in the sacred writings for death, so drowsiness, which precedes sleep, may be considered as pointing out the decays of the constitution, and the sicknesses which precede death.

6. At midnight there was a cry. The Jewish weddings were generally celebrated in the night, yet they usually began at the rising of the evening star; but in this case there was a more than ordinary delay.

their eyes to see their folly. Or, however, [2] The real misery of their state on the other side death, and in the judgment.

First, Their lamps are gone out. The lamps of hypocrites often go out in this life; when they who have begun in the spirit, end in the flesh. The profession withers, and the credit of it is lost; the hopes fail, and the comfort of them is gone. The gains of a hypocritical profession will not follow a man to judgment, ch. vii. 22, 23.

Secondly, They wanted oil to supply them when they were going out. An external profession well humoured may carry a man far, it may light him along this world, but the dams of the valley of the shadow of death will put it out.

Thirdly, They would gladly be beholden to the wise virgins for a supply out of their vessels; Give us of your oil. Those who now hate the strictness of religion, will, at death and judgment, wish for the solid comforts of it. Those who care not to live the life, yet would die the death, of the righteous. Give us of your oil; that is, "Speak a good word for us"; so some; but there is no occasion for vouchers in the great day, the Judge knows what is every man's true character. Those will see their need of grace hereafter, when it should save them, who will not see their need of grace now, when it should sanctify and rule them. It comes too late. There is no buying when the market is over, no bidding when the inch of candle is dropped.

Fourthly, They were denied a share in their companions' oil. The wise answered, Not so; that peremptory denial is not in the original, but supplied by the translators: these wise virgins would rather give a reason without a positive refusal, than (as many do) give a positive refusal without a reason. They were well inclined to help their neighbours in distress; but, We must not, we cannot, we dare not, do it, lest there be not enough for us and you; charity begins at home; but go, and buy for yourselves. Those that would be saved, must have grace of their own. Though we have benefit by the communion of saints, and the faith and prayers of others, yet our own sanctification is indispensably necessary to our own salvation. Every man shall give account of himself; for he cannot get another to muster for him in that day. Those that have most grace, have none to spare; all we have, is little enough for ourselves to appear before God in. The best have need to borrow from Christ, but they have none to lend to any of their neighbours. These wise virgins do not upbraid the foolish with their neglect, but give them the best advice the case will bear, Go ye rather to them that sell. When ministers attend such as have been mindless of God and their souls all their days, but are under death-bed convictions; and direct them to repent, and turn to God, and close with Christ; they do but as these wise virgins did by the foolish, even make the best of bad. They can but tell them what is to be done. It is good advice now, if it be taken in time, Go to them that sell, and buy for yourselves.

(6) The coming of the bridegroom, and the issue of all this.

[1] While they went out to buy, the bridegroom came. With regard to those that put off their great work to the last, it is a thousand to one, that they have not time to do it then. Getting grace is a work of time, and cannot be done in a hurry. While the poor awakened soul addresses itself, upon a sick bed, to repentance and prayer, in awful confusion, it scarcely knows which end to begin at. This comes of having oil to buy when we should burn it, and grace to get when we should use it.

The bridegroom came. Our Lord Jesus will come to his people, at the great day, as a Bridegroom; will come in pomp and rich attire, attended with his friends.

[2] They that were ready, went in with him to the marriage. To be eternally glorified is to be in his immediate presence, and in the most intimate fellowship and communion with him. Those, and those only, shall go to heaven hereafter, that are made ready for heaven here.

[3] The door was shut, as is usual when all the company is come. The door was shut, First, To secure those that were within. Adam was put into paradise, but the door was left open and so he went out again; but when glorified saints are put into the heavenly paradise, they are shut in. Secondly, To exclude those that were out. Now the gate is strait, yet it is open; but then it will be shut and bolted, and a great gulf fixed.

[4] The foolish virgins came when it was too late (v. 11); Afterward came also the other virgins. There are many that will seek admission into heaven when it is too late; as profane Esau, who afterward would have inherited the blessing. The vain confidence of hypocrites will carry them very far in their expectations wherewith to replenish their lamp from time to time, and so have it burning until the Bridegroom should come. Are we, then—with some even superior expositors—to conclude that the foolish virgins must represent true Christians as well as do the wise, since only true Christians have the Spirit, and that the difference between the two classes consists only in the one having the necessary watchfulness which the other wants? Certainly not. Since the parable was designed to hold forth the prepared and the unprepared to meet Christ at His coming, and how the unprepared might, up to the very last, be confounded with the prepared—the structure of the parable behooved to accommodate itself to this, by making the lamps of the foolish to burn, as well as those of the wise, up to a certain point of time, and only then to discover their inability to burn on for want of a fresh supply of oil. But this is evidently just a structural device; and the real difference between the two classes who profess to love the Lord's appearing is a radical one—the possession by the one class of an enduring principle of spiritual life, and the want of it by the other. 8. And the foolish said unto the wise, Give us of your oil; for our lamps are gone out—rather, as in the margin, "are going out"; for oil will not light an extinguished lamp, though it will keep a burning one from going out. Ah! now at length they have discovered not only their own folly, but the wisdom of the other class, and they do homage to it. They did not perhaps despise them before, but they thought them righteous overmuch; now they are forced, with bitter mortification, to wish they were like them. 9. But the wise answered, Not so; lest there be not enough for us and you—The words "Not so," it will be seen, are not in the original, where the reply is very elliptical—"In case there be not enough for us and you." A truly wise answer this. "And what, then, if we shall share it with you? Why, both will be undone." but go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves—Here again it would be straining the parable beyond its legitimate design to make it teach that men may get salvation even after they are supposed and required to have it already gotten. It is merely a friendly way of reminding them of the proper way of obtaining the needed and precious article, with a certain reflection on them for having it now to seek. Also, when the parable speaks of "selling" and "buying" that valuable article, it means simply, "Go, get it in the only legitimate way." And yet the word "buy" is significant; for we are elsewhere bidden, "buy wine and milk without money and without price," and "buy of Christ gold tried in the fire," (Isa. 55:1; Rev. 3:18). Now, since what we pay the demanded price for becomes thereby our own property, the salvation which we thus take gratuitously at God's hands, being bought in His own sense of that word, becomes ours thereby in inalienable possession. (Cf. for the language, Prov. 23:23; ch. 13:44.) 10. And while they went to buy, the Bridegroom came; and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage: and the door was shut—They are sensible of their past folly; they have taken good advice: they are in the act of getting what alone they lacked: a very little more, and they also are ready. But the Bridegroom comes; the ready are admitted; "the door is shut," and they are undone. How graphic and appalling this picture of one almost saved—but lost! 11. Afterward came also the other virgins, saying, Lord, Lord, open to us—In ch. 7:22 this reiteration of the name was an exclamation rather of surprise; here it is a piteous cry of urgency, bordering on despair. Ah! now at length their eyes are wide open, and they realize all the consequences of their past folly. 12. But he answered and said, Verily I say unto you, I know you not—The attempt to establish a difference between "I know you not" here, and "I never knew you" in ch. 7:23—as if this were gentler, and so implied a milder fate, reserved for "the foolish" of this parable—is to be resisted, though advocated by such critics as OLSHAUSEN, STIER, and ALFORD. Besides being inconsistent with the general tenor of such language, and particularly the solemn moral of the whole (vs. 13), it is a kind of criticism which tampers with some of the most awful warnings regarding the future. If it be asked why unworthy guests were admitted to the marriage of the King's Son, in a former parable, and the foolish virgins are excluded in this one, we may answer, in the admirable words of GERHARD, quoted by TRENCH, that those festivities are celebrated in this life, in the Church militant; these at the last day, in the Church triumphant; to those, even they are admitted who are not adorned with the wedding garment; but to these, only they to whom it is granted to be arrayed in fine linen clean and white,

ADAM CLARKE

8. Our lamps are gone out. "Are going out." So then it is evident that they were once lighted. They had once hearts illuminated and warmed by faith and love; but they had backslidden from the salvation of God, and now they are excluded from heaven, because, through their carelessness, they have let the light that was in them become darkness, and have not applied in time for a fresh supply of the salvation of God.

9. Lest there be not enough for us and you. These had all been companions in the Christian course, and there was a time when they might have been helpful to each other; but that time is now past forever—none has a particle of grace to spare, not even to help the soul of the dearest relative! The grace which every man receives is just enough to save his own soul; he has no merits to bequeath to the church, no work of supererogation which can be placed to the account of another. Go ye rather to them that sell, and buy. "Rather go to them that sell, and buy for yourselves, lest there be not enough for us and you."

10. While they went to buy, the bridegroom came. What a dismal thing it is not to discover the emptiness of one's heart of all that is good till it is too late to make any successful application for relief! God alone knows how many are thus deceived. And they that were ready. "They who were prepared"—who had not only a burning lamp of an evangelical profession, but had oil in their vessels, the faith that works by love in their hearts, and their lives adorned with all the fruits of the Spirit. The door was shut. Dreadful and fatal words! No hope remains. Nothing but death can shut this door; but death may surprise us in our sins, and then despair is our only portion.

11. Afterwards came also the other virgins, saying, Lord, Lord. Earnest prayer when used in time may do much good; but it appears, from this parable, that there may come a time when prayer even to Jesus may be too late!—viz., when the door is shut—when death has separated the body and the soul.

of happiness. They go to heaven-gate, and demand entrance, and yet are shut out.

[5] They were rejected, as Esau was (v. 12); I know you not. We are all concerned to seek the Lord while he may be found. Time was, when, Lord, Lord, open to us, would have sped well, by virtue of that promise, Knock, and it shall be opened to you; but now it comes too late.

Lastly, Here is a practical inference drawn from this parable (v. 13); Watch therefore. We had it before (ch. xxiv. 42), and here it is repeated as the most needful caution. Our great duty is to watch. Be awake, and be wakeful. It is a good reason for our watching, that the time of our Lord's coming is very uncertain; we know neither the day nor the hour.

Verses 14–30

We have here the parable of the talents committed to three servants; this implies that we are in a state of work and business, as the former implies that we are in a state of expectancy. That showed the necessity of habitual preparation, this of actual diligence in our present work and service. 1. The Master is Christ. 2. The servants are Christians, his own servants, so they are called.

We have three things, in general, in this parable.

I. The trust committed to these servants; Their master delivered to them his goods: having appointed them to work (for Christ keeps no servants to be idle), he left them something to work upon. 1. Christ's servants have and receive their all from him; nor have anything they can call their own but sin. 2. Our receiving from Christ is in order to our working for him. 3. Whatever we receive to be made use of for Christ, still the property is vested in him.

(1) On what occasion this trust was committed to these servants; The master was travelling into a far country. When he ascended on high, he gave gifts unto men. When Christ went to heaven, he was as a man travelling into a far country. When he went, he took care to furnish his church with all things necessary for it during his personal absence. Thus Christ, at his ascension, left his goods to his church.

(2) In what proportion this trust was committed. He gave talents. Christ's gifts are rich and valuable, the purchases of his blood inestimable, and none of them mean. He gave to some more, to others less; to everyone according to his several ability. When Divine Providence has made a difference in men's ability, grace dispenses spiritual gifts accordingly, but still the ability itself is from him. Everyone had some one talent at least, and that is not a despicable stock for a poor servant to begin with. A soul of our own is the one talent we are every one of us entrusted with, and it will find us with work. It is the duty of a man to render himself beneficial to those around him. He that is useful to others, may be reckoned a common good. All had not alike, for they had not all alike abilities and opportunities. Some are cut out for service in one kind, others in another, as the members of the natural body.

II. The different management and improvement of this trust, v. 16–18.

1. Two of the servants did well.

(1) They were diligent and faithful; They went, and traded; as soon as ever their master was gone, they immediately applied themselves to their business. Those that have so much work to do, as every Christian has, need to set about it quickly, and lose no time. They went, and traded. A true Christian is a spiritual tradesmen. A tradesman is one who, having made his trade his choice, and taken pains to learn it, makes it his business to follow it, makes all other affairs bend to it, and lives upon the gain of it. We have no stock of our own to trade with, but trade as factors with our master's stock. The endowments of the mind—the enjoyments of the world—must be improved for the honour of Christ. The ordinances of the gospel, and our opportunities of attending them, must be improved for the end for which they were instituted, and communion with God kept up by them, and the gifts and graces of the Spirit must be exercised.

(2) They were successful; they doubled their stock. The hand of the diligent makes rich in graces, and comforts, and treasures of good works. There is a great deal to be got by industry in religion. The returns were in proportion to the receivings. The greater gifts any have, the more pains they ought to take, as those must that have a large stock to manage. From those to whom he has given but two talents, he expects only the improvement of two; if they lay out themselves to do good according to the best of their capacity and opportunity, they shall be accepted, though they do not so much good as others.

2. The third did ill (v. 18); He that had received one talent, went, and hid his lord's money. The un-which is the righteousness of saints (Rev. 19:8); to those, men are called by the trumpet of the Gospel; to these by the trumpet of the Archangel; to those, who enters may go out from them, or be cast out; who is once introduced to these never goes out, nor is cast out, from them any more: wherefore it is said, "The door is shut." 13. Watch therefore; for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of man cometh—This, the moral or practical lesson of the whole parable, needs no comment.

14-30. PARABLE OF THE TALENTS. This parable, while closely resembling it, is yet a different one from that of THE POUNDS, in Luke 19:11-27; though CALVIN, OLSHAUSEN, MEYER, and others identify them—but not DE WETTE and NEANDER. For the difference between the two parables, see the opening remarks on that of The Pounds. While, as TRENCH observes with his usual felicity, "the virgins were represented as waiting for their Lord, we have the servants working for Him; there the inward spiritual life of the faithful was described; here his external activity. It is not, therefore, without good reason that they appear in their actual order—that of the Virgins first, and of the Talents following—since it is the sole condition of a profitable outward activity for the kingdom of God, that the life of God be diligently maintained within the heart." 14. For [the kingdom of heaven is] as a man—The ellipsis is better supplied by our translators in the corresponding passage of Mark (13: 34), "[For the Son of man is] as a man . . . travelling into a far country—or more simply, "going abroad." The idea of long "tarrying" is certainly implied here, since it is expressed in vs. 19. who called his own servants, and delivered unto them his goods—Between master and slaves this was not uncommon in ancient times. Christ's "servants" here mean all who, by their Christian profession, stand in the relation to Him of entire subjection. His "goods" mean all their gifts and endowments, whether original or acquired, natural or spiritual. As all that slaves have belongs to their master, so Christ has a claim to everything which belongs to His people, everything which may be turned to good, and He demands its appropriation to His service, or, viewing it otherwise, they first offer it up to Him; as being "not their own, but bought with a price" (I Cor. 6:19, 20), and He "delivers it to them" again to be put to use in His service. 15. And unto one he gave five talents, to another two, and to another one—While the proportion of gifts is different in each, the same fidelity is required of all, and equally rewarded. And thus there is perfect equity. to every man according to his several ability—his natural capacity as enlisted in Christ's service, and his opportunities in providence for employing the gifts bestowed on him. and straightway took his journey—Cf. ch. 21:33, where the same departure is ascribed to God, after setting up the ancient economy. In both cases, it denotes the leaving of men to the action of all those spiritual laws and influences of Heaven under which they have been graciously placed for their own salvation and the advancement of their Lord's kingdom. 16. Then he that had received the five talents went and traded with the same—expressive of the activity which he put forth and the labor he bestowed. and made them other five talents. 17. And likewise he that had received two he also gained other two—each doubling what he received, and therefore both equally faithful.

ADAM CLARKE

13. Watch therefore. If to watch be to employ ourselves chiefly about the business of our salvation, alas! how few of those who are called Christians are there who do watch!

15. He gave . . . to every man according to his several ability. The talent which each man has suits his own state best, and it is only pride and insanity which lead him to desire and envy the graces and talents of another. The man who improves the grace he has received, however small, will as surely get to the kingdom of God as he who has received most from his Master and improved all.

In this parable of our Lord, four things may be considered:

I. The master who distributes the talents. (1) The master's kindness. The servants have nothing—deserve nothing—have no claim on their master; yet he, in his kindness, delivers unto them his goods, not for his advantage, but for their comfort and salvation. (2) The master distributes these goods diversely—giving to one five, to another two, and to another one. No person can complain that he has been forgotten; the master gives to each. (3) The master distributes his talents with wisdom. He gave to each according to his several ability, i.e., to the power he had to improve what was given.

II. The servants who improved their talents. These persons are termed slaves, such as were the property of the master, who might dispose of them as he pleased. Then he that had received the five talents went and traded, v. 16. (1) The work was speedily begun—as soon as the master gave the talents and departed, so soon they began to labor. There is not a moment to be lost—every moment has its grace, and every grace has its employment, and everything is to be done for eternity. (2) The work was perseveringly carried on; after a long time the Lord of those servants cometh, v. 19. The master was long before he returned, but they did not relax. Many begin well, and continue faithful for a time—but how few persevere to the end! (3) Their work was crowned with success. They doubled the sum which they had received. Every grace of God is capable of great improvement. (4) They were ready to give in a joyful account when their master came and called for them. (5) Their recompense from their gracious master. (a) They receive praise. Well done, thou good and faithful servant v. 21. What a glorious thing to have the approbation of God, and the testimony of a good conscience! They were good, pure, and upright within—faithful, using to God's glory the blessings He had given. (b) They receive gracious promises. "You have been faithful over a little; I will set you over much." These promises refer not only to a future here; for the more faithfully a man faithful servant was he that had but one talent: doubtless there are many that have five talents, and bury them all; great abilities, great advantages, and yet do no good with them: but Christ would hint to us, (1) That if he that had but one talent, be reckoned with thus for burying that one, much more will they be accounted offenders, that have more, that have many, and bury them. (2) That those who have least to do for God, frequently do least of what they have to do. Some make it an excuse, because they have not wherewithal to do what they say they would, they will not do what we are sure they can, and so sit down and do nothing; it is really an aggravation of their sloth, that when they have but one talent to take care about, they neglect that one.

He digged in the earth, and hid the talent, for fear it should be stolen. Money is like manure (so my Lord Bacon used to say), good for nothing in the heap, but it must be spread; and so it is in spiritual gifts; many have them, and make no use of them for the end for which they were given them.

He hid his lord's money; had it been his own, he might have done as he pleased. His fellow-servants were busy and successful in trading, and their zeal should have provoked his. Are others active, and shall we be idle?

III. The account of this improvement, v. 19. The account is deferred; it is not till after a long time that they are reckoned with. Yet the day of account comes at last; The lord of those servants reckoneth with them. We must all be reckoned with—what good we have got to our own souls, and what good we have done to others.

1. The good account of the faithful servants. The servants giving up the account (v. 20, 22); "Lord, thou deliveredst to me five talents, and to me two; behold, I have gained five talents, and I two talents more."

Christ's faithful servants acknowledge with thankfulness his vouchsafements to them; Lord, thou deliveredst to me such and such things. It is good to remember what we have received, that we may know what is expected from us, and may render according to the benefit. We must never look upon our improvements but with a general mention of God's favour to us, of the honour he has put upon us, in entrusting us with his goods. For the truth is, the more we do for God, the more we are indebted to him for making use of us.

They produce, as an evidence of their faithfulness, what they have gained. God's good stewards have something to show for their diligence; Show me thy faith by thy works. He that is a good man, let him show it, James iii. 13. And it is observable that he who had but two talents, gave up his account as cheerfully as he who had five; for our comfort, in the day of account, will be according to our faithfulness, our sincerity, not our success; according to the uprightness of our hearts, not according to the degree of our opportunities.

The master's acceptance and approbation of their account, v. 21, 23.

First, He commended them; Well done, good and faithful servant. Those that own and honour God now, he will own and honour shortly. Christ will give them their just characters, of good and faithful. Their performances will be accepted; Well done. Christ will call those, and those only, good servants, that have done well. If we do that which is good, and do it well, we shall have praise of the same. Some masters are so morose, that they will not commend their servants; it is thought enough not to chide: but Christ will commend his servants that do well; whether their praise be of men or no, it is of him. If he saith, Well done, we are happy.

Secondly, He rewards them. All their work and labour of love shall be rewarded.

Now this reward is here expressed two ways.

(1) In one expression agreeable to the parable; Thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things. It is usual in the courts of princes, and families of great men, to advance those to higher offices, that have been faithful in lower. Christ is a master that will prefer his servants who acquit themselves well. Christ has honour in store for those that honour him. Here they are beggars; in heaven they shall be rulers.

Observe the disproportion between the work and the reward; there are but few things in which the saints are serviceable to the glory of God, but there are many things wherein they shall be glorified with God. What charge we receive from God, what work we do for God in this world, is but little, very little, compared with the joy set before us.

(2) In another expression, which slips out of the parable into the thing signified by it; Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord. The state of the blessed is a state of joy. Where there are the vision and fruition of

18. But he that had received one went and digged in the earth, and hid his lord's money—not misspending, but simply making no use of it. Nay, his action seems that of one anxious that the gift should not be misused or lost, but ready to be returned, just as he got it.

19. After a long time the lord of those servants cometh and reckoneth with them—That any one—within the lifetime of the apostles at least—with such words before them, should think that Jesus had given any reason to expect His Second Appearing within that period, would seem strange, did we not know the tendency of enthusiastic, ill-regulated love of His appearing ever to take this turn. 20. Lord, thou deliveredst unto me five talents; behold, I have gained besides them five talents more—How beautifully does this illustrate what the beloved disciple says of "boldness in the day of judgment," and his desire that "when He shall appear we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before Him at His coming!" (I John 4:17; 2:28).

21. His lord said unto him, Well done—a single word, not of bare satisfaction, but of warm and delighted commendation. And from what Lips!—thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things... 22. He also that had received two talents came... good and faithful servant: thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things—Both are commended in the same terms, and the reward of both is precisely the same. (See on vs. 15.) Observe also the contrasts: "Thou hast been faithful as a servant; now be a ruler—thou hast been entrusted with a few things; now have dominion over many things." enter thou into the joy of thy lord—thy Lord's own joy. (See John 15:11; Heb. 12:2.)

improves what God has already given him, the more he shall have from his gracious Master. For He giveth more grace, till He fills the faithful soul with His own fullness. (c) They receive glory. Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord. As you were partakers of My nature on earth, be sharers of My glory in heaven. The joy, the happiness wherewith I am happy, shall be your eternal portion!

III. The servant who buried his talent. He that had received one went and digged in the earth, and hid his Lord's money, v. 18. (1) See the ingratitude of this servant. His master gave him a talent, capable of being improved to his own present and eternal advantage; but he slights the mercy of his lord. (2) See his idleness. Rather than exert himself to improve what he has received, he goes and hides it. (3) See his gross error. He digs to hide it—puts himself to more trouble to render the mercy of God to him of none effect than he would have had in combating and conquering the world, the devil, and the flesh. (4) See his injustice. He takes his master's money, and neither improves nor designs to improve it, even while he is living on and consuming that bounty which would have been sufficient for a faithful servant. (5) Hear the absurdity of his reasoning. Lord, I knew thee that thou art an hard (or avaricious) man, reaping where thou hast not sown, v. 24. The wicked excuse of this faithless servant confuted itself and condemned him.

A. B. SIMPSON:

The endowment of these talents stands for everything in our natural, spiritual, and providential conditions which God has given us for the purpose of fitting us for service and usefulness—everything, in a word, which may tell in your life for the glory of God and the good of others. These talents, he says, were given according to "their several ability." God has put each one of us in the very best position to accomplish our own work for Him. There is something you can do that no one else can do; there is someone you can reach that no one else can reach. Your talent may consist of natural ability, social influence, financial resources, position in the church or the world, or special opportunities brought to you in connection with your life work. It is the sum of all the possibilities of usefulness in your life. God expects you to make the most of it for Him and others and is going to call you to account at the coming of Christ for the use you have made of your life.

The principle of which He will judge you will not be the amount of your talent, but the measure in which you have improved it. The man who had but two talents was rewarded as much as the man who had five, if it was found that he had made a proportionate improvement of his little endowment. The reward that the Master is to give at His coming will be a higher form of service. The coming age and the future kingdom is not to be a luxurious sinecure, but a magnificent opportunity for higher work and holy activity.—Christ in the Bible

God, a perfection of holiness, and the society of the blessed, there cannot but be a fulness of joy. This joy is the joy of their Lord; the joy which he himself has purchased and provided for them; the joy of the redeemed, bought with the sorrow of the Redeemer. Christ admits his faithful stewards into his own joy, to be joint-heirs with him. Glorified saints shall enter into this joy, shall have a full and complete possession of it, as they that were ready, went in to the marriage feast. Shortly they shall enter into it, shall be in it to eternity, as in their element.

2. The bad account of the slothful servant.

(1) His apology for himself, v. 24, 25. Though he had received but one talent, for that one he is called to account. None shall be called to an account for more than they have received; but for what we have, we must all account.

First, What he confides in. "Lo, there thou hast that is thine; if I have not made it more, as the others have done, yet this I can say, I have not made it less." This, he thinks, may serve to bring him off, if not with praise, yet with safety. Slothful professors, that are afraid of doing too much for God, yet hope to come off as well as those that take so much pains in religion. This servant thought that this account would pass well enough, because he could say, There thou hast that is thine. Many that are called Christians, build great hopes for heaven upon their being able to make such an account; as if no more were required, or could be expected.

Secondly, What he confesses. He owns the burying of his talent; I hid thy talent in the earth. He speaks as if that were no great fault; nay, as if he deserved praise for his prudence in putting it in a safe place, and running no hazards with it.

Thirdly, What he makes his excuse; I knew that thou wert a hard man, and I was afraid. Good thoughts of God would beget love, and that love would make us diligent and faithful; but hard thoughts of God beget fear, and that fear makes us slothful and unfaithful. His excuse bespeaks,

[1] The sentiments of an enemy; I knew thee, that thou art a hard man. Thus his defence is his offence. Observe how confidently he speaks; I knew thee to be so. How could he know him to be so? Does not all the world know the contrary, that he is so far from being a hard master, that the earth is full of his goodness, so far from reaping where he sowed not, that he sows a great deal where he reaps nothing? For he causes the sun to shine, and his rain to fall, upon the evil and unthankful, and fills their hearts with food and gladness who say to the Almighty, Depart from us. This suggestion bespeaks the common reproach which wicked people cast upon God, as if all the blame of their sin and ruin lay at his door, for denying them his grace. But if we perish, it is owing to ourselves.

[2] The spirit of a slave; I was afraid. This ill affection toward God arose from his false notions of him. Hard thoughts of God drive us from, and cramp us in his service. Those who think it impossible to please him, and in vain to serve him, will do nothing to purpose in religion.

(2) His Lord's answer to this apology. His plea is made to turn against him, and he is struck speechless with it.

First, His conviction, v. 26, 27. Two things he is convicted of.

[1] Slothfulness; Thou wicked and slothful servant. Slothful servants are wicked servants. He that is careless in God's work, is near akin to him that is busy in the devil's work. Omissions are sins, and must come into judgment; slothfulness makes way for wickedness. When the house is empty, the unclean spirit takes possession. When men sleep, the enemy sows tares.

[2] Self-contradiction (v. 26, 27); Thou knewest that I reap where I sowed not: thou oughtest therefore to have put my money to the exchangers. Three ways this may be taken; a. "Suppose I had been so hard a master, shouldest not thou therefore have been the more diligent and careful to please me, if not for love, yet for fear?" b. "If thou didst think me to be a hard master, and therefore durst not trade with the money thyself, for fear of losing by it, yet thou mightest have brought it to the bank, and then at my coming I should have received my own with usury." If we could not find in our hearts to venture upon more difficult and hazardous services, yet will that justify us in shrinking from those that were more safe and easy? Something is better than nothing; if we fail of showing our courage in bold enterprises, yet we must not fail to testify our goodwill in honest endeavours. c. "Suppose I did reap where I sowed not, yet that is nothing to thee, for I had sowed upon thee, and the talent was my money which thou was entrusted with, not only to keep, but to improve."

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

24. Then he which had received the one talent came and said, Lord, I knew thee that thou art an hard man—harsh. The word in Luke (19:21) is "austere."—reaping where thou hast not sown, and gathering where thou hast not strawed—The sense is obvious: "I knew thou wast one whom it was impossible to serve, one whom nothing would please: exacting what was impracticable, and dissatisfied with what was attainable." Thus do men secretly think of God as a hard Master, and virtually throw on Him the blame of their fruitlessness.

25. And I was afraid—of making matters worse by meddling with it at all. and went and hid thy talent in the earth—This depicts the conduct of all those who shut up their gifts from the active service of Christ, without actually prostituting them to unworthy uses. Fitly, therefore, may it, at least, comprehend those, to whom TRENCH refers, who, in the early Church, pleaded that they had enough to do with their own souls, and were afraid of losing them in trying to save others; and so, instead of being the salt of the earth, thought rather of keeping their own saltness by withdrawing sometimes into caves and wildernesses, from all those active ministries of love by which they might have served their brethren. Thou wicked and slothful servant—"Wicked" or "bad" means "falsehearted," as opposed to the others, who are emphatically styled "good servants." The addition of "slothful" is to mark the precise nature of his wickedness: it consisted, it seems, not in his doing anything against, but simply nothing for his master.

Thou knewest that I reap where I sowed not, and gather where I have not strawed—He takes the servant's own account of his demands, as expressing graphically enough, not the hardness which he had basely imputed to him, but simply his demand of a profitable return for the gift entrusted. 27. thou oughtest therefore to have put my money to the exchangers—the banker. and then at my coming I should have received mine own with usury—interest.

ADAM CLARKE

IV. The awful punishment of this faithless servant. (1) He is reproached. Thou wicked and slothful servant! Wicked—in your heart; slothful—in your work. Thou knewest that I reap where I sowed not. You are condemned by your own mouth—whose is the unemployed talent? Did I not give you this? And did I require the improvement of two when I gave you but one? You know I did not.

27. With usury. "With its produce," not usury; for that is unlawful interest, more than the money can properly produce.

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

Deep down in all unregenerate hearts there lurks the idea that God is too severe upon poor erring mortals, expecting more of them than is reasonable. Yet, if they think so they ought to be roused to greater carefulness to render to the Lord full obedience; their knowledge of what the Lord demands will make their disobedience the more criminal.

He probably thought that as he could not do much, he would not do anything, and there are thousands of his opinion; they fancy that their little is not needed and will never be missed, and therefore they make no attempt to serve their Lord. Are we of that kind?

We all have some talent. It may be only one, but we are responsible for it. Are we acting up to the measure of our ability? Many wish they had more talents, but this is wrong, for the Lord has entrusted us with quite as many gifts as we shall be able to give a good account of. Our great concern should be to be found faithful stewards of such things as we have.—Spurgeon's Devotional Bible

Secondly, His condemnation. The slothful servant is sentenced,

[1] To be deprived of his talent (v. 28, 29); Take therefore the talent from him. And the meaning of this part of the parable we have in the reason of the sentence (v. 29), To every one that hath shall be given. This may be applied, a. To the blessings of this life—worldly wealth and possessions. These we are entrusted with, to be used for the glory of God, and the good of those about us. But from him that hath not, that is, that hath these things as if he had them not, they shall be taken away. b. We may apply it to the means of grace. They who are diligent in improving the opportunities they have, God will enlarge them. c. We may apply it to the common gifts of the Spirit. He that hath these, and doeth good with them, shall have abundance; these gifts improve by exercise, and brighten by being used; the more we do, the more we may do, in religion; but those who stir not up the gift that is in them their gifts rust, and decay, and go out like a neglected fire.

[2] He is sentenced to be cast into outer darkness, v. 30.

(1) His character is that of an unprofitable servant. Slothful servants will be reckoned with as unprofitable servants. A slothful servant is a withered member in the body, he is good for nothing. In one sense, we are all unprofitable servants (Luke xvii. 10); we cannot profit God. It is not enough not to do hurt, but we must do good, must bring forth fruit, and though thereby God is not profited, yet he is glorified, John xv. 8.

(2) His doom is, to be cast into outer darkness. Their state is, [1] Very dismal; it is outer darkness. In the dark no man can work, a fit punishment for a slothful servant. It is outer darkness, out from the light of heaven, out from the joy of their Lord, into which the faithful servants were admitted; out from the feast. [2] Very doleful; there is weeping and gnashing of teeth. This will be the portion of the slothful servant.

We have here a description of the process of the last judgment in the great day. It is, as it were, the explanation of the former parables.

I. The placing of the judge upon the judgment-seat (v. 31); When the Son of man shall come.

1. That there is a judgment to come, in which every man shall be sentenced according to what he did in this world of trial and probation.

2. The administration of the judgment of the great day is committed to the Son of man. Here, as elsewhere, when the last judgment is spoken of, Christ is called the son of man, because he is to judge the sons of men (and, being himself of the same nature, he is the more unexceptionable).

3. Christ's appearing to judge the world will be splendid and glorious. Christ will come to the judgment-seat in real glory; and all the world shall see what the saints only do now believe—that he is the brightness of his Father's glory. His first coming was under a black cloud of obscurity; his second will be in a bright cloud of glory.

4. When Christ comes in his glory to judge the world, he will bring all his holy angels with him. This glorious person will have a glorious retinue, his holy myriads.

5. He will then sit upon the throne of his glory. He is now set down with the Father upon his throne; and it is a throne of grace, to which we may come boldly; but then he will sit upon the throne of glory, the throne of judgment. Christ, in the days of his flesh, was arraigned as a prisoner at the bar; but at his second coming, he will sit as a judge upon the bench.

II. The appearing of all the children of men before him (v. 32); Before him shall be gathered all nations. The judgment of the great day will be a general judgment. All must be summoned before Christ's tribunal; all nations, all those nations of men that are made of one blood, to dwell on all the face of the earth.

III. The distinction that will then be made; He shall separate them one from another, as the tares and wheat are separated at the harvest, the good fish and the bad at the shore, the corn and chaff in the floor. Wicked and godly here dwell together and are not certainly distinguishable one from another: but in that day they will be separated, and parted for ever. They cannot separate themselves one from another in this world (1 Cor. v. 10), nor can anyone else separate them (ch. xiii. 29); but the Lord knows them that are his, and he can separate them. This is compared to a shepherd's dividing between the sheep and the goats. 1. Jesus Christ is the great Shepherd;

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

29. For unto every one that hath shall be given . . .—See on ch. 13:12. 30. And cast ye—cast ye out. the unprofitable servant—the useless servant, that does his Master no service. into outer darkness—the darkness which is outside. On this expression see on ch. 22:13. there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth—See on ch. 13:42.

31-46. THE LAST JUDGMENT. The close connection between this sublime scene—peculiar to Matthew—and the two preceding parables is too obvious to need pointing out. 31. When the Son of man shall come in his glory—His personal glory—and all the holy angels with him—See Deuteronomy 33:2; Daniel 7:9, 10; Jude 14; with Hebrews 1:6; I Peter 3:22—then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory—the glory of His judicial authority.

32. And before him shall be gathered all nations—or, "all the nations." That this should be understood to mean the heathen nations, or all except believers in Christ, will seem amazing to any simple reader. Yet this is the exposition of OLSHAUSEN, STIER, KEIL, ALFORD (though latterly with some diffidence), and of a number, though not all, of those who hold that Christ will come the second time before the millennium, and that the saints will be caught up to meet Him in the air before His appearing. Their chief argument is, the impossibility of any that ever knew the Lord Jesus wondering, at the Judgment Day, that they should be thought to have done—or left undone—anything "unto Christ." To that we shall advert when we come to it. But here we may just say, that if this scene does not describe a personal, public, final judgment on men, according to the treatment they have given to Christ—and consequently men within the Christian pale—we shall have to consider again whether our Lord's teaching on the greatest themes of human interest does indeed possess that incomparable simplicity and transparency of meaning which, by universal consent, has been ascribed to it. If it be said, But how can this be the general judgment, if only those within the Christian pale be embraced by it?—we answer, What is here described, as it certainly does not meet the case of all the family

(2) He is stripped of what he possessed. Take therefore the talent from him. Oh, terrible word! Remove the candlestick from that slothful, worldly-minded church; take away the inspirations of the Holy Spirit from that lukewarm, Christless Christian, who lives only to resist them and render them of none effect.

(3) He is punished with an everlasting separation from God and the glory of His power. Cast forth the unprofitable servant, v. 30. Let him have nothing but darkness who refused to walk in the light; let him have nothing but misery—weeping and gnashing of teeth, who has refused the happiness which God provided for him.

31. When the Son of man shall come. This must be understood of Christ's coming at the last day, to judge mankind, though all the preceding part of the chapter may be applied also to the destruction of Jerusalem.

32. All nations. Literally, "all the nations"—all the Gentile world; the Jews are necessarily included, but they were spoken of in a particular manner in the preceding chapter. He shall separate them. Set each kind apart by themselves. As a shepherd divideth. It does not appear that sheep and goats were ever penned or housed together, though they might feed in the same pasture; yet even this was not done but in separate flocks; so Virgil, Eclog. vii. v. 2.

MATTHEW HENRY

he now feeds his flock like a shepherd, and will shortly distinguish between those that are his, and those that are not. 2. The godly are like sheep—innocent, mild, patient, useful: the wicked are like goats, a baser kind of animal, unsavoury and unruly. The sheep and goats are here feeding all day in the same pasture, but will be coted at night in different folds. Being thus divided, he will set the sheep on his right hand, and the goats on his left, v. 33. Christ puts honour upon the godly, as we show respect to those we set on our right hand. All other divisions and subdivisions will then be abolished; but the great distinction of men into saints and sinners, sanctified and unsanctified, will remain for ever.

IV. The process of the judgment concerning each of these.

1. Concerning the godly, on the right hand. Observe here,

(1) The glory conferred upon them (v. 34); The king shall say unto them. He that was the Shepherd (which bespeaks the care and tenderness wherewith he will make this disquisition), is here the King. Where the word of this King is, there is power. Here are two things in this sentence:

[1] The acknowledging of the saints to be the blessed of the Lord; Come, ye blessed of my Father. He pronounces them blessed; and his saying they are blessed, makes them so. Blessed of his Father; reproached and cursed by the world, but blessed of God. All our blessings in heavenly things flow to us from God, as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Eph. i. 3. He calls them to come: this come is, in effect, "Welcome, ten thousand welcomes, to the blessings of my Father; come to me, come to be for ever with me; you that followed me bearing the cross, now come along with me wearing the crown." We now come boldly to the throne of grace, but we shall then come boldly to the throne of glory.

[2] The admission of the saints into the blessedness and kingdom of the Father; Inherit the kingdom prepared for you.

First, The happiness they shall be possessed of is very rich.

a. It is a kingdom; which is reckoned the most valuable possession on earth, and includes the greatest wealth and honour. They that here are beggars, prisoners, accounted as the off-scouring of all things, shall then inherit a kingdom.

b. It is a kingdom prepared: the happiness must needs be great, for it is the product of the divine counsels.

c. It is prepared for them. This bespeaks, (a) The suitableness of this happiness. (b) Their property and interest in it. It is prepared on purpose for them; not only for such as you, but for you, you by name.

d. It is prepared from the foundation of the world. This happiness was designed for the saints, and they for it, before time began, from all eternity, Eph. i. 4.

Secondly, The tenure by which they shall hold and possess it is very good, they shall come and inherit it. It is God that makes heirs, heirs of heaven. We come to an inheritance by virtue of our sonship, our adoption; if children, then heirs. A title by inheritance is the sweetest and surest title. Saints, in this world, are as heirs under age, tutored and governed till the time appointed of the Father (Gal. iv. 1, 2); and then they shall be put in full possession of that which now through grace they have a title to; Come, and inherit it.

(2) The ground of this (v. 35, 36), For I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat. We cannot hence infer that any good works of ours merit the happiness of heaven; but it is plain that Jesus Christ will judge the world by the same rule by which he governs it, and therefore will reward those that have been obedient to that law. This happiness will be adjudged to obedient believers, upon the promise of God purchased by Jesus Christ. It is the purchase and promise that give the title, the obedience is only the qualification of the person designed.

Now the good works here mentioned are such as we commonly call works of charity to the poor, and it teaches us this in general, that faith working by love is all in all in Christianity; Show me thy faith by thy works. The good works here described imply three things, which must be found in all that are saved.

[1] Self-denial, and contempt of the world; reckoning the things of the world no further good things, than as we are enabled to do good with them: and those who have not wherewithal to do good, must show the same disposition, by being contentedly and cheerfully poor.

[2] Love to our brethren; which is the second great commandment. We must give proof of this love by our readiness to do good, and to communicate; good of Adam, is of course so far not general. But we have no right to conclude that the whole "judgment of the great day" will be limited to the point of view here presented. Other explanations will come up in the course of our exposition. and he shall separate them—now for the first time; the two classes having been mingled all along up to this awful moment. as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats—(see Ezek. 34:17). 33. And he shall set the sheep on his right hand—the side of honor (I Kings 2:19; Ps. 45:9; 110:1, etc.). but the goats on the left—the side consequently of dishonor.

34. Then shall the King—Magnificent title, here for the first and only time, save in parabolical language, given to Himself by the Lord Jesus, and that on the eve of His deepest humiliation! It is to intimate that in then addressing the heirs of the kingdom, He will put on all His regal majesty. say unto them on his right hand, Come—the same sweet word with which He had so long invited all the weary and heavy laden to come unto Him for rest. Now it is addressed exclusively to such as have come and found rest. It is still, "Come," and to "rest" too; but to rest in a higher style, and in another region. ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world—The whole story of this their blessedness is given by the apostle, in words which seem but an expression of these: "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ; according as He hath chosen us in Him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before Him in love." They were chosen from everlasting to the possession and enjoyment of all spiritual blessings in Christ, and so chosen in order to be holy and blameless in love. This is the holy love whose practical manifestations the King is about to recount in detail; and thus we see that their whole life of love to Christ is the fruit of an eternal purpose of love to them in Christ.

35. For I was an hungered . . thirsty . . . a stranger . . . 36. Naked . . . sick . . . prison, and ye came unto me. 37-39. Then shall the righteous answer him . . . 40. And the King shall answer and say unto them, Verily I say unto you, . . .—Astonishing dialogue this between the King, from the Throne of His glory, and His wondering people! "I was an hungered, and ye gave Me meat . . ."—"Not we," they reply. "We never did that, Lord: We were born out of due time, and enjoyed not the privilege of ministering unto Thee." "But ye did it to these My brethren, now beside you, when cast upon your love." "Truth, Lord, but was that doing it to Thee? Thy name was indeed dear to us, and we thought it a great honor to suffer shame for it. When among the destitute and distressed we discerned any of the household of faith, we will not deny that our hearts leapt within us at the discovery, and when their knock came to our dwelling, our bowels were moved, as though 'our Beloved Himself had put in His hand by the hole of the door.' Sweet was the fellowship we had with them, as if we had 'entertained angels unawares'; all difference between giver and receiver somehow melted away under the beams of that love of Thine which knit us together; nay, rather, as they left us with gratitude for our poor givings, we seemed the debtors—not

33. He shall set the sheep. The right hand signifies, among the rabbins, approbation and eminence; the left hand, rejection, and disapprobation. Sheep, which have ever been considered as the emblems of mildness, simplicity, patience, and usefulness, represent here the genuine disciples of Christ. Goats, which are naturally quarrelsome, lascivious, and excessively ill-scented, were considered as the symbols of riotous, profane, and impure men. They here represent all who have lived and died in their sins. See Ezek. xxxiv. 17 and Zech. x. 3.

34. Ye blessed of my Father. This is the King's address to his followers, and contains the reason why they were found in the practice of all righteousness, and were now brought to this state of glory—they were blessed—came as children, and received the benediction of the Father, and became, and continued to be, members of the heavenly family. Inherit. The inheritance is only for the children of the family—"if sons, then heirs," Gal. iv. 7, but not otherwise. Prepared for you. That is, The Kingdom of glory is designed for such as you. From the foundation of the world. It was God's purpose and determination to admit none into His heaven but those who were made partakers of His holiness, Heb. xii. 14.

35. I was an hungred, and ye gave me meat. Everything which is done to a follower of Christ, whether it be good or evil, He considers as done to himself; see v. 40; Acts ix. 4-5; Heb. vi. 10. Of all the fruits of the Spirit, none are mentioned here but those that spring from love, or mercy, because these give men the nearest conformity to God. Jesus had said, "Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy"; and He here shows how this promise shall be fulfilled. The rabbins say: "As often as a poor man presents himself at thy door, the holy blessed God stands at his right hand: if thou give him alms, know that he who stands at his right hand will give thee a reward. But if thou give him not alms, he who stands at his right hand will punish thee." A stranger, and ye took me in. "You entertained Me."

wishes are but mockeries without good works. Those that have not to give, must show the same disposition some other way.

[3] A believing regard to Jesus Christ. That which is here rewarded is the relieving of the poor for Christ's sake, out of love to him. Those good works shall then be accepted which are done in the name of the Lord Jesus, Col. iii. 17.

I was hungry, and you gave them meat. It is no new thing for those that are feasted with the dainties of heaven to be hungry and thirsty, and to want daily food; for those that are at home in God, to be strangers in a strange land; for those that have put on Christ, to want clothes to keep them warm; for those that have healthful souls, to have sickly bodies, and for those to be in prison, that Christ has made free. Works of charity and beneficence, according as our ability is, are necessary to salvation. These must be the proofs of our love, and of our professed subjection to the gospel of Christ. But they that show no mercy, shall have judgment without mercy.

Now this reason is modestly excepted against by the righteous, but is explained by the Judge himself.

a. It is questioned by the righteous, v. 37–39. Not as if they were loth to inherit the kingdom, or were ashamed of their good deeds. Christ has a mighty regard to works of charity, and is especially pleased with kindnesses done to his people for his sake. They bespeak the humble admiration which glorified saints will be filled with, to find such poor and worthless services, as theirs are, so highly celebrated, and richly rewarded: Lord, when saw we thee an hungered, and fed thee? Gracious souls are apt to think meanly of their own good deeds; especially as unworthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed. Saints in heaven will wonder what brought them thither, and that God should so regard them and their services. "When saw we thee an hungered? We have seen the poor in distress many a time; but when saw we thee?" Christ is more among us than we think he is.

b. It is explained by the Judge himself (v. 40); Inasmuch as ye have done it to these my brethren, to the least, to one of the least of them, ye have done it unto me. The good works of the saints, when they are produced in the great day, (a) Shall all be remembered; and not the least overlooked, no not a cup of cold water. (b) They shall be interpreted most to their advantage. As Christ makes the best of their infirmities, so he makes the most of their services.

But what will become of the godly poor, that had not wherewithal to do so? Must they be shut out? No, Christ will own them, even the least of them, as his brethren; he will not be ashamed, nor think it any disparagement to him, to call them brethren. In the height of his glory, he will not disown his poor relations. He will take the kindness done to them, as done to himself; Ye have done it unto me; which shows a respect to the poor that were relieved, as well as to the rich that did relieve them.

2. Here is the process concerning the wicked, those on the left hand. And in that we have,

(1) The sentence passed upon them, v. 41. He shall say to them, Depart from me, ye cursed.

[1] To be so near to Christ was some satisfaction, though under his frowns; but that will not be allowed, Depart from me. In this world they were often called to come to Christ, to come for life and rest, but they turned a deaf ear to his calls. Here they said to the Almighty, Depart from us; then he will say to them, Depart from me.

[2] If they must depart, and depart from Christ, might they not be dismissed with a blessing, with one kind and compassionate word at least? No, Depart, ye cursed. They that would not come to Christ, to inherit a blessing, must depart from him under the burthen of a curse. The righteous are called the blessed of my Father; for their blessedness is owing purely to the grace of God and his blessing, but the wicked are called only ye cursed, for their damnation is of themselves.

[3] If they must depart may they not go into some place of ease and rest? Will it not be misery enough for them to bewail their loss? They must depart into fire. This fire is the wrath of the eternal God.

[4] If into fire, prepared fire, O let it be but of short continuance, let them but pass through fire. No for the streams of mercy and grace being for ever excluded, there is nothing to extinguish it.

[5] If they must be doomed to such a state of endless misery yet may they not have some good company there? No, none but the devil and his angels. They served the devil while they lived, and therefore are justly sentenced to be where he is, as those that served Christ, are taken to be with him where they. But, Lord, were we all that time in company with Thee?" "Yes, that scene was all with Me," replies the King—"Me in the disguise of My poor ones. The door shut against Me by others was opened by you—'Ye took Me in.' Apprehended and imprisoned by the enemies of the truth, ye whom the truth had made free sought Me out diligently and found Me; visiting Me in My lonely cell at the risk of your own lives, and cheering My solitude; ye gave Me a coat, for I shivered; and then I felt warm. With cups of cold water ye moistened My parched lips; when famished with hunger ye supplied Me with crusts, and my spirit revived—"YE DID IT UNTO ME." What thoughts crowd upon us as we listen to such a description of the scenes of the Last Judgment! And in the light of this view of the heavenly dialogue, how bald and wretched, not to say unscriptural, is that view of it to which we referred at the outset, which makes it a dialogue between Christ and heathens who never heard of His name, and of course never felt any stirrings of His love in their hearts! To us it seems a poor, superficial objection to the Christian view of this scene, that Christians could never be supposed to ask such questions as the "blessed of Christ's Father" are made to ask here. If there were any difficulty in explaining this, the difficulty of the other view is such as to make it, at least, insufferable. But there is no real difficulty. The surprise expressed is not at their being told that they acted from love to Christ, but that Christ Himself was the Personal Object of all their deeds: that they found Him hungry, and supplied Him with food: that they brought water to Him, and slaked His thirst; that seeing Him naked and shivering, they put warm clothing upon Him, paid Him visits when lying in prison for the truth, and sat by His bedside when laid down with sickness. This is the astonishing interpretation which Jesus says "the King" will give to them of their own actions here below. And will any Christian reply, "How could this astonish them? Does not every Christian know that He does these very things, when He does them at all, just as they are here represented?" Nay, rather, is it conceivable that they should not be astonished, and almost doubt their own ears, to hear such an account of their own actions upon earth from the lips of the Judge? And remember, that Judge has come in His glory, and now sits upon the throne of His glory, and all the holy angels are with Him; and that it is from those glorified Lips that the words come forth, "Ye did all this unto ME." Oh, can we imagine such a word addressed to ourselves, and then fancy ourselves replying, "Of course we did—To whom else did we anything? It must be others than we that are addressed, who never knew, in all their good deeds, what they were about?" Rather, can we imagine ourselves not overpowered with astonishment, and scarcely able to credit the testimony borne to us by the King? 41.Then shall he say also unto them on the left hand, Depart from me, ye cursed . . .—As for you on the left hand, ye did nothing for Me. I came to you also, but ye knew Me not: ye had neither warm affections nor kind deeds to bestow upon Me: I was as one despised in your eyes." "In our eyes, Lord? We never saw Thee before, and never, sure, behaved we so to Thee." "But thus ye treated these little ones that believe in Me and now stand on My right hand. In the disguise of these poor members of Mine I came soliciting your pity, but ye shut up your bowels of compassion from Me: I asked relief, but ye had none to give Me. Take back therefore your own coldness, your own contemptuous distance: Ye bid Me away from your presence, and now I bid you from Mine—Depart from Me, ye cursed!"

ADAM CLARKE

36. I was sick, and ye visited me. Relieving the strangers and visiting the sick were in high estimation among the Jews. One of their sayings on this head is worthy of notice: "He who neglects to visit the sick is like him who has shed blood," That is, as he has neglected, when it was in his power, to preserve life, he is as guilty in the sight of the Lord as he is who has committed murder.

37. Lord, when saw we thee an hungred. This barbarous expression, an hungred, should be banished out of the text, wheresoever it occurs, and the simple word "hungry" substituted for it. Whatever is done for Christ's sake is done through Christ's grace; and he who does the work attributes to Jesus both the will and the power by which the work was done, and seeks and expects the kingdom of Heaven, not as a reward, but as a gift of pure, unmerited mercy.

40. Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren. The meanest follower of Christ is acknowledged by Him as His brother!

41. Depart from me, ye cursed. Or, "Ye cursed! depart." These words are the address of the King to the sinners, and contain the reason why they are to be separated from blessedness: You are cursed, because you have sinned, and would not come unto Me that you might have life. Into everlasting fire. This is the punishment of sense. You shall not only be separated from Me, but you shall be tormented—awfully, everlastingly tormented in that place of separation. Prepared for the devil and his angels. The devil and his angels sinned before the creation of the world, and the place of torment was then prepared for them. It never was designed for human souls; but as the wicked are partakers with the devil and his angels in their iniquities, in their rebellion against God, so it is right that they should be sharers with them in their punishment.

he is.

The reason of this sentence assigned.

[1] All that is charged upon them, on which the sentence is grounded, is, omission; as, before, the servant was condemned, not for wasting his talent, but for burying it. "When I was in these distresses, you were so selfish that you did not minister as you might have done to my relief and succour." Omissions are the ruin of thousands.

[2] It is the omission of works of charity to the poor; for omitting the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith. Uncharitableness to the poor is a damning sin. They shall have judgment without mercy, that have showed no mercy. Sinners will be condemned, at the great day, for the omission of that good which it was in the power of their hand to do. Now this reason of the sentence is,

First, Objected against by the prisoners (v. 44); Lord, when saw we thee an hungered, or athirst? Condemned sinners, though they have no plea that will bear them out, will yet in vain offer excuses. When saw we thee hungry, or thirsty, or naked? They care not to repeat the full charge, as conscious to themselves of their own guilt. The matter of their plea bespeaks their former inconsideration of that which they might have known, but would not till now that it was too late. They imagined it was only a company of poor, weak, silly, and contemptible people that they put those slights upon; but they who do so, will be made to know that it was Jesus whom they persecuted.

Secondly, Justified by the Judge. He goes by this rule (v. 45); Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to me. What is done against the faithful disciples and followers of Christ, even the least of them, he takes as done against himself. In all their afflictions he is afflicted. He that touches them, touches him in a part no less tender than the apple of his eye.

Lastly, Here is the execution of both these sentences, v. 46.

a. The wicked shall go away into everlasting punishment. Sentence will then be executed speedily. It can neither be thought that sinners should change their own natures, nor that God should give his grace to change them, when in this world the day of grace was misspent.

b. The righteous shall go away into life eternal; that is, they shall inherit the kingdom, v. 34. Heaven is life, it is all happiness. It is eternal life. There is no death to put a period to the life itself, nor old age to put a period to the comfort of it, or any sorrow to embitter it. Thus life and death, good and evil, the blessing and the curse, are set before us, that we may choose our way; and so shall our end be.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

46. And these shall go away—these "cursed" ones. Sentence, it should seem, was first pronounced—in the hearing of the wicked—upon the righteous, who thereupon sit as assessors in the judgment upon the wicked (I Cor. 6:2); but sentence is first executed, it should seem, upon the wicked, in the sight of the righteous—whose glory will thus not be beheld by the wicked, while their descent into "their own place" will be witnessed by the righteous, as BENGEL notes. into everlasting punishment—or, as in vs. 41, "everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." Cf. ch. 13:42; II Thessalonians 1:9, etc. This is said to be "prepared for the devil and his angels," because they were "first in transgression." But both have one doom, because one unholy character. but the righteous into life eternal—i.e., "life everlasting." The word in both clauses, being in the original the same, should have been the same in the translation also. Thus the decisions of this awful day will be final, irreversible, unending.

ADAM CLARKE

42. I was an hungred, and ye gave me no meat. I put it in your power to do good, and you would not. A variety of occasions offered themselves to you, but you neglected them all, so that My blessings in your hands, not being improved, according to My order, became a curse to you.

43. I was a stranger. If men were sure that Jesus Christ was actually somewhere in the land, in great personal distress, hungry, thirsty, naked, and confined, they would doubtless run unto and relieve Him. Now Christ assures us that a man who is hungry, thirsty, naked is His representative, and that whatever we do to such a one He will consider as done to himself.

44. Lord, when saw we thee an hungred? It is want of faith which in general produces hardheartedness to the poor. The man who sees only with eyes of flesh is never likely to discover Christ in the person of a man destitute of the necessaries of life.

46. And these shall go away into everlasting punishment. No appeal, no remedy, to all eternity! No end to the punishment of those whose final impenitence manifests in them an eternal will and desire to sin. By dying in a settled opposition to God, they cast themselves into a necessity of continuing in an eternal aversion from Him. But some are of the opinion that this punishment shall have an end. This is as likely as that the glory of the righteous shall have an end, for the same word is used to express the duration of the punishment as is used to express the duration of the state of glory. I have seen the best things that have been written in favor of the final redemption of damned spirits, but I never saw an answer to the argument against that doctrine drawn from this verse but what sound learning and criticism should be ashamed to acknowledge. Some have gone a middle way, and think that the wicked shall be annihilated. This, I think, is contrary to the text; if they go into . . . punishment, they continue to exist; for that which ceases to be ceases to suffer.

Here is, 1. The notice Christ gave his disciples of the near approach of his sufferings, v. 1, 2. He had often told them of his sufferings at a distance, now he speaks of them as at the door; after two days. Observe,

(1) The time when he gave this alarm; when he had finished all these sayings. Christ's witnesses die not till they have finished their testimony. He had bid his disciples to expect sad times, bonds and afflictions, and then tells them, The Son of man is betrayed; to intimate that they should fare no worse than he should, and that his sufferings should take the sting out of theirs.

(2) The thing itself he gave them notice of; The Son of man is betrayed. The thing was not only so sure, but so near, that it was as good as done. It is good to make sufferings that are yet to come, as present to us.

2. The plot of the chief priests, and scribes, and elders of the people, against the life of our Lord Jesus, v. 3–5. Many consultations had been held against the life of Christ; but this plot was laid deeper than any yet, for the grandees were all engaged in it. (1) The place where they met; in the palace of the high priest. (2) The plot itself; to take Jesus by subtlety, and kill him; nothing less than his blood, his lifeblood, would serve their turn. (3) The policy of the plotters; Not on the feastday. Lest there should be an uproar among the people. They were awed, not by the fear of God, but by the fear of the people; all their concern was for their own safety, not God's honour.

I. The singular kindness of a good woman to our Lord Jesus in anointing his head, v. 6, 7. It was in Bethany, a village hard by Jerusalem, and in the

CHAPTER 26

VSS. 1-16. CHRIST'S FINAL ANNOUNCEMENT OF HIS DEATH, AS NOW WITHIN TWO DAYS, AND THE SIMULTANEOUS CONSPIRACY OF THE JEWISH AUTHORITIES TO COMPASS IT—THE ANOINTING AT BETHANY—JUDAS AGREES WITH THE CHIEF PRIESTS TO BETRAY HIS LORD. (=Mark 14:1-11; Luke 22:1-6; John 12:1-11.) For the exposition, see on Mark 14:1-11.

After two days was the feast of the passover, and of unleavened bread—The meaning is, that two days after what is about to be mentioned the passover would arrive; in other words, what follows occurred two days before the feast. and the chief priests and the scribes sought how they might take him by craft, and put him to death—From Matthew's fuller account (ch. 26) we learn that our Lord announced this to the Twelve as follows, being the first announcement to them of the precise time: "And it came to pass, when Jesus had finished all these sayings"—referring to the contents of chs. 24, 25, which He delivered to His disciples; His public ministry being now closed: from His prophetical He is now passing into His priestly office, although all along He Himself took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses—"He said unto His disciples, Ye know that after two days is [the feast of] the passover, and the Son of man is betrayed to be crucified."The first and the last steps of His final sufferings are brought together in this brief announcement of all that was to take place. The passover was the first and the chief of the three great annual festivals, commemorative of the redemption of God's people from Egypt, through the sprinkling of the blood of a lamb divinely appointed to be slain for that end; the destroying angel, "when he saw the blood, passing over" the Israelitish houses, on which that blood was seen,

1. When Jesus had finished all these sayings. He began these sayings on Mount Olivet, chap. xxiv. 1, and continued them till He entered into Bethany, whither He was going.

2. The passover. A feast instituted in Egypt to commemorate the destroying angel's passing over the houses of the Israelites, when he slew the firstborn of the Egyptians. See the whole of this business largely explained in the notes on Exod. xii. 1-27. This feast began on the fourteenth day of the first moon, in the first month, Nisan, and it lasted only one day; but it was immediately followed by the days of unleavened bread, which were seven, so that the whole lasted eight days, and all the eight days are sometimes called the feast of the passover, and sometimes the "feast or days of unleavened bread." See Luke xxii. 1-7. The Son of man is betrayed (rather "delivered up") to be crucified. With what amazing calmness and precision does our blessed Lord speak of this awful event! What a proof does He here give of His prescience in so correctly predicting it, and of His love in so cheerfully undergoing it! These two verses have no proper connection with this chapter, and should be joined to the preceding.

3. Then assembled together the chief priests. That is, during the two days that preceded the Passover.

4. And consulted that they might take Jesus by subtilty. The providence of God frustrated their artful machinations; and that event which they wished to conduct with the greatest privacy and silence was transacted with all possible house of Simon the leper. Probably he was one who had been miraculously cleansed from his leprosy by our Lord Jesus, and he would express his gratitude to Christ by entertaining him; nor did Christ disdain to come in to him, and sup with him. The woman that did this, is supposed to have been Mary, the sister of Martha and Lazarus. She had a box of ointment very precious, which she poured upon the head of Christ as he sat at meat. This, among us, would be a strange sort of compliment. But it was then accounted the highest piece of respect. Now this may be looked upon,

1. As an act of faith in our Lord Jesus, the Christ, the Messiah, the anointed.

2. As an act of love and respect to him. Some think that this was she who loved much at first, and washed Christ's feet with her tears (Luke vii. 38, 47). Where there is true love in the heart to Jesus Christ, nothing will be thought too good, no, nor good enough, to bestow upon him.

II. The offence which the disciples took at this. They had indignation (v. 8, 9).

1. See how they expressed their offence at it. They said, To what purpose is this waste? Now this bespeaks,

(1) Want of tenderness toward this good woman, in interpreting her over-kindness (suppose it was so) to be wastefulness. Charity teaches us to put the best construction upon everything that it will bear. It is true, there may be over-doing in well-doing; but thence we must learn not to be censorious of others; because that which we may impute to the want of prudence, God may accept as an instance of abundant love. We must not say, Those do too much in religion, that do more than we do, but rather aim to do as much as they.

(2) Want of respect to their Master. It did not become them to call it waste, when they perceived that he admitted and accepted it as a token of his friend's love. We must take heed of thinking anything waste, which is bestowed upon the Lord Jesus, either by others or by ourselves.

2. See how they excused their offence at it; This ointment might have been sold for much, and given to the poor.

III. The reproof Christ gave to his disciples for the offence at this good woman (v. 10, 11); Why trouble ye the woman? Note, It is a great trouble to good people to have their good works censured and misconstrued; and it is a thing that Jesus Christ takes very ill. He here took part against all his disciples: so heartily does he espouse the cause of the offended little ones, ch. xviii. 10.

Observe his reason; You have the poor always with you.

1. There are some opportunities of doing and getting good which are constant, and which we must give constant attendance to the improvement of. Those who have a heart to do good, never need complain for want of opportunity.

2. There are other opportunities of doing and getting good, which come but seldom, and which ought to be preferred before the other; "Me ye have not always, therefore use me while ye have me." Sometimes special works of piety and devotion should take place of common works of charity.

IV. Christ's approbation and commendation of the kindness of this good woman. He calls it a good work (v. 10), and says more in praise of it than could have been imagined; particularly,

1. That the meaning of it was mystical (v. 12); She did it for my burial. Some think that she intended it so, and that the woman better understood Christ's frequent predictions of his death and sufferings than the apostles did. Christ interpreted it so; and he is always willing to make the best, to make the most of his people's well-meant words and actions.

2. That the memorial of it should be honourable (v. 13); This shall be told for a memorial. This act of faith and love was so remarkable, that the preachers of Christ crucified, and the inspired writers of the history of his passion, could not choose but take notice of this passage. None of all the trumpets of fame sound so loud and so long as the everlasting gospel. Though the honour of Christ is principally designed in the gospel, yet the honour of his saints and servants is not altogether overlooked. The memorial of this woman was to be preserved by mentioning her faith and piety in the preaching of the gospel, for example to others.

Immediately after an instance of the greatest kindness done to Christ, follows an instance of the greatest unkindness; such mixture is there of good and bad among the followers of Christ.

I. The traitor was Judas Iscariot; he is said to be one of the twelve, as an aggravation of his villainy.

when he came to destroy all the first-born in the land of Egypt (Exod. 12)—bright typical foreshadowing of the great Sacrifice, and the Redemption effected thereby. Accordingly, "by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, who is wonderful in counsel and excellent in working," it was so ordered that precisely at the passover season, "Christ our Passover should be sacrificed for us." On the day following the passover commenced "the feast of unleavened bread," so called because for seven days only unleavened bread was to be eaten (Exod. 12:18-20). See on I Corinthians 5:6-8. We are further told by Matthew (26:3) that the consultation was held in the palace of Caiaphas the high priest, between the chief priests, [the scribes], and the elders of the people, how "they might take Jesus by subtlety and kill Him." But they said, Not on the feast day—rather, not during the feast; not until the seven days of unleavened bread should be over—lest there be an uproar of the people—In consequence of the vast influx of strangers, embracing all the male population of the land who had reached a certain age, there were within the walls of Jerusalem at this festival some two million people; and in their excited state, the danger of tumult and bloodshed among "the people," who for the most part took Jesus for a prophet, was extreme. (See JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, XX. 5. 3.) What plan, if any, these ecclesiastics fixed upon for seizing our Lord, does not appear. But the proposal of Judas being at once and eagerly gone into, it is probable they were till then at some loss for a plan sufficiently quiet and yet effectual. So, just at the feast-time shall it be done; the unexpected offer of Judas relieving them of their fears. Thus, as BENGEL remarks, did the divine counsel take effect.

The Supper and the Anointing at Bethany Six Days before the Passover The time of this part of the narrative is four days before what has just been related. Had it been part of the regular train of events which our Evangelist designed to record, he would probably have inserted it in its proper place, before the conspiracy of the Jewish authorities. But having come to the treason of Judas, he seems to have gone back upon this scene as what probably gave immediate occasion to the awful deed. And being in Bethany, in the house of Simon the leper, as he sat at meat, there came a woman—It was "Mary," as we learn from John 12:3. having an alabaster box of ointment of spikenard—pure nard, a celebrated aromatic—(See Song of Sol. 1:12). very precious—"very costly" (John 12:3). and she brake the box, and poured it on his head—"and anointed," adds John, "the feet of Jesus, and wiped His feet with her hair: and the house was filled with the odor of the ointment." The only use of this was to refresh and exhilarate—a grateful compliment in the East, amid the closeness of a heated atmosphere, with many guests at a feast. Such was the form in which Mary's love to Christ, at so much cost to herself, poured itself out. And there were some that had indignation within themselves and said—Matthew says (26:8), "But when His disciples saw it, they had indignation, saying . . ." The spokesman, however, was none of the true-hearted Eleven—as we learn from John (12:4): "Then saith one of His disciples, Judas Iscariot, Simon's son, which should betray Him." Doubtless the thought stirred first in his breast, and issued from his base lips; and some of the rest, ignorant of his true character and feelings, and carried away by his plausible speech, might for the moment feel some chagrin at the apparent waste. Why was this waste of the ointment made? For it might have been sold for more than three hundred pence—about $50 in our currency. and have been given to the poor. And they murmured against her—"This he said," remarks John, and the remark is of exceeding importance, "not that he cared for the poor but because he was a thief, and had the bag"—the scrip or treasure-chest—"and bare what was put therein"—not 'bare it off' by theft, as some understand it. It is true that he did this; but the expression means simply that he had charge of it and its contents, or was treasurer to Jesus and the Twelve. What a remarkable arrangement was this, by which an avaricious and dishonest person was not only taken into the number of the Twelve, but entrusted with the custody of their little property! The purposes which this served are obvious enough; but it is further noticeable, that the remotest hint was never given to the Eleven of his true character, nor did the disciples most favored with the intimacy of Jesus ever suspect him, till a few minutes before he voluntarily separated himself from their company—for ever! And Jesus celebrity, amidst the thousands who resorted to Jerusalem at this season for the keeping of the Passover.

5. Not on the feast day, lest there be an uproar. It was usual for the Jews to punish criminals at the public festivals; but in this case they were afraid of an insurrection, as our Lord had become very popular. The providence of God directed it thus, for the reason given in the preceding note.

6. Simon the leper. This was probably no more than a surname, as Simon the Canaanite, chap. x. 4, and Barsabas Justus, Acts i. 23, and several others. Yet it might have been some person that Christ had healed of this disease.

7. There came unto him a woman. There is much contention among commentators about the transaction mentioned here and in John xii. 14, some supposing them to be different, others to be the same. Some think that the woman mentioned here was Mary, the sister of Lazarus; others, Mary Magdalene; but against the former opinion it is argued that it is not likely, had this been Mary the sister of Lazarus, that Matthew and Mark would have suppressed her name. Besides, say they, we should not confound the repast which is mentioned here with that mentioned by John, chap. xii. 3. This one was made only two days before the Passover, and that one six days before; the one was made at the house of Simon the leper, the other at the house of Lazarus, John xii. 1-2. At this, the woman poured the oil on the head of Christ; at the other, Mary anointed Christ's feet with it.

9. And given to the poor. How often does charity serve as a cloak for covetousness! God is sometimes robbed of His right under the pretense of devoting what is withheld to some charitable purpose, to which there was no intention ever to give it.

MATTHEW HENRY

When the number of the disciples was multiplied (Acts vi. 1), no marvel if there were some among them that were a shame and trouble to them; but when there were but twelve, and one of them was a devil, surely we must never expect any society perfectly pure on this side heaven. The twelve were Christ's chosen friends, and yet one of them betrayed him. No bonds of duty or gratitude will hold those that have a devil.

II. Here is the proffer which he made to the chief priests; he went to them, and said, What will ye give me? v. 15. They did not send for him, nor make the proposal to him; they could not have thought that one of Christ's own disciples should be false to him.

1. What Judas promised; "I will deliver him unto you; that you may seize him without noise, or danger of an uproar." In their conspiracy against Christ, this was it they were at a loss about, v. 4, 5. They durst not meddle with him in public, and knew not where to find him in private. Here the matter rested, and the difficulty was insuperable, till Judas came, and offered them his services. Those that give up themselves to be led by the devil, find him readier than they imagine to help them at a dead lift. Though the rulers, by their power and interest, could kill him when they had him in their hands, yet none but a disciple could betray him.

I will deliver him unto you. He did not offer himself to be a witness against Christ, though they wanted evidence, v. 59. This is an evidence of the innocency of our Lord Jesus, that his own disciple, who was false to him, could not charge him with anything criminal, though it would have served to justify his treachery.

2. What he asked in consideration of this undertaking; What will ye give me? This was the only thing that made Judas betray his Master; he hoped to get money by it. It was not the hatred of his Master, nor any quarrel with him, but purely the love of money; that, and nothing else, made Judas a traitor.

What will ye give me? Why, what did he want? Neither bread to eat, nor raiment to put on; neither necessaries nor conveniences. This covetous wretch could not be content, but comes basely cringing to the priests with, What will ye give me? It is not the lack of money, but the love of money, that is the root of all evil.

III. Here is the bargain which the chief priests made with him; they covenanted with him for thirty pieces of silver. By the law (Exod. xxi. 32), thirty pieces of silver was the price of a slave—a goodly price, at which Christ was valued! They covenanted with him—they paid it down, so some; gave him his wages in hand, to secure him and to encourage him.

IV. Here is the industry of Judas, in pursuance of his bargain (v. 16); he sought opportunity to betray him, his head was still working to find out how he might do it effectually. It is a very wicked thing to seek opportunity to sin, and to devise mischief; for it argues the heart fully set in men to do evil. He had time to repent; but now by his covenant the devil tells him that he must be true to his word, though ever so false to his Master.

We have here an account of Christ's keeping the passover.

I. The time when Christ ate the passover, was the usual time appointed by God, and observed by the Jews (v. 17); the first day of the feast of unleavened bread.

II. The place was particularly appointed by himself to the disciples, upon their enquiry (v. 17); they asked, Where wilt thou that we prepare the passover?

1. They took it for granted that their Master would eat the passover, though he was at this time persecuted by the chief priests, and his life sought; they knew that he would not be put by his duty, either by frightenings without or fears within.

2. They knew very well that there must be preparation made for it, and that it was their business; Where wilt thou that we prepare? Before solemn ordinances there must be solemn preparation.

3. They knew that he had no house of his own wherein to eat the passover.

4. They would not pitch upon a place without direction from him, and from him they had direction; he sent them to such a man (v. 18), who probably was a friend and follower of his, and to his house he invited himself and his disciples.

(1) Tell him, My time is at hand; he means the time of his death. He knew when it was at hand, and was busy accordingly; we know not our time (Eccles. ix. 12), and therefore must never be off our said, Let her alone; why trouble ye her? she hath wrought a good work on me—It was good in itself, and so was acceptable to Christ; it was eminently seasonable, and so more acceptable still; and it was "what she could," and so most acceptable of all. For ye have the poor with you always—referring to Deuteronomy 15:11. and whensoever ye will ye may do them good: but me ye have not always—a gentle hint of His approaching departure, by One who knew the worth of His own presence.

She hath done what she could—a noble testimony, embodying a principle of immense importance. she is come aforehand to anoint my body to the burying—or, as in John (12:7), "Against the day of my burying hath she kept this." Not that she, dear heart, thought of His burial, much less reserved any of her nard to anoint her dead Lord. But as the time was so near at hand when that office would have to be performed, and she was not to have that privilege even after the spices were brought for the purpose (ch. 16:1), He lovingly regards it as done now. "In the act of love done to Him," says OLSHAUSEN beautifully, "she has erected to herself an eternal monument, as lasting as the Gospel, the eternal Word of God. From generation to generation this remarkable prophecy of the Lord has been fulfilled; and even we, in explaining this saying of the Redeemer, of necessity contribute to its accomplishment." "Who but Himself, asks STIER, "had the power to ensure to any work of man, even if resounding in His own time through the whole earth, an imperishable remembrance in the stream of history? Behold once more here the majesty of His royal judicial supremacy in the government of the world, in this, 'Verily I say unto you.'"

And Judas Iscariot, one of the twelve, went unto the chief priests, to betray him unto them—i.e., to make his proposals, and to bargain with them, as appears from. Matthew's fuller statement (ch. 26: 14, 15) which says, he "went unto the chief priests, and said, What will ye give me, and I will deliver Him unto you? And they covenanted with him for thirty pieces of silver." The thirty pieces of silver were thirty shekels, the fine paid for man-or maid-servant acidentally killed (Exod. 21:32), and equal to about $25 in our currency—"a goodly price that I was prized at of them!" (Zech. 11:13).

And when they heard it, they were glad, and promised to give him money—Matthew alone records the precise sum, because a remarkable and complicated prophecy, which he was afterwards to refer to, was fulfilled by it. And he sought how he might conveniently betray him—or, as more fully given in Luke (22:6), "And he promised, and sought opportunity to betray Him unto them in the absence of the multitude." That he should avoid an "uproar" or "riot" among the people, which probably was made an essential condition by the Jewish authorities, was thus assented to by the traitor; into whom, says Luke (22:3), "Satan entered," to put him upon this hellish deed.

17-30. PREPARATION FOR AND LAST CELEBRATION OF THE PASSOVER, ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE TRAITOR, AND INSTITUTION OF THE SUPPER. (=Mark 14:12-26; Luke 22:7-23; John 13:1-3, 10, 11, 18-30.) For the exposition, see on Luke 22:7-23.

Then came the day of unleavened bread, when the passover must be killed. The day here alluded to—"the first day of unleavened bread"—was the 14th Nisan, when, about midday, labor was intermitted, and all leaven removed from the houses (Ex. 12:15-17). Then, "between the two evenings" (Ex. 12:6)—or between three and six o'clock—the paschal lamb was killed, and in the evening, when the 15th Nisan began, was eaten. And though "the days of unleavened bread" properly began with the 15th, the preparations for the festival being made on the 14th, it was popularly called, as here, the "first" day of unleavened bread—as we learn from Josephus, whose way of speaking agrees with that here employed. The two disciples being sent from Bethany to make the necessary preparations on the Thursday, our Lord and the other disciples followed them to the city later in the day, and probably as evening drew near.

ADAM CLARKE

10. Why trouble ye the woman? Or, "Why do you put the woman to pain?" A generous mind is ever pained when it is denied the opportunity of doing good, or when its proffered kindness is refused.

11. Ye have the poor always with you. And, consequently, have the opportunity of doing them good at any time. But me ye have not always; My bodily presence is about to be removed from you forever. The woman, under a presentiment of My death, is preparing Me for My burial.

12. She did it for my burial. Or, "She hath done it to embalm Me." Our Lord took this opportunity to tell them once more that He was shortly to die.

13. Wheresoever this gospel shall be preached. Another remarkable proof of the prescience of Christ. For a memorial of her. As embalming preserves the body from corruption, and she has done this good work to embalm and preserve this body, so will I order everything concerning this transaction to be carefully recorded, to preserve her memory to the latest ages. The actions which the world blames, through the spirit of envy, covetousness, or malice, God takes delight to distinguish and record.

14. Then . . . Judas. After this supper at Bethany, Judas returned to Jerusalem and made his contract with the chief priests.

16. He sought opportunity. "A convenient or fit opportunity." Men seldom leave a crime imperfect. When once sin is conceived, it meets, in general, with few obstacles, till it brings forth death. How deceitful, how deeply damning, is the love of money!

17. Now the first day of the feast of unleavened bread. As the Feast of Unleavened Bread did not begin till the day after the Passover, the fifteenth day of the month (Lev. xxiii. 5-6; Num. xxviii. 16-17), this could not have been, properly, the first day of that feast. But as the Jews began to eat unleavened bread on the fourteenth (Exod. xii. 18), this day was often termed the first of unleavened bread. The Evangelists use it in this sense, and call even the paschal day by this name. See Mark xiv. 12; Luke xxii. 7. Where wilt thou that we prepare? How astonishing is this, that He who created all things, whether visible or invisible, and by whom all things were upheld, should so empty himself as not to be Proprietor of a single house in His whole creation, to eat the last Passover with His disciples! It is worthy of note what the Talmudists say, that the inhabitants of Jerusalem did not let out their houses to those who came to the annual feasts, but afforded all accommodations of this kind gratis. A man might, therefore, go and request the use of any room, on such an occasion, which was as yet unoccupied.

18. Go . . . to such a man. It is probable that this means some person with whom Christ was well-acquainted, and who was known to the disciples. Grotius observes that the Greeks use watch; our time is always ready (John vii. 6), and therefore we must be always ready. When our Lord Jesus invited himself to this good man's house, he sent him this intelligence, that his time was at hand. Christ's secret is with them that entertain him in their hearts.

(2) Tell him, I will keep the passover at thy house. This was an instance of his authority, as the Master; he did not beg, but command, the use of his house for this purpose. Thus, when Christ by his Spirit comes into the heart, he demands admission, as one whose own the heart is and cannot be denied. His people shall be willing, for he makes them so. I will keep the passover with my disciples. Wherever Christ is welcome, he expects that his disciples should be welcome too. When we take God for our God, we take his people for our people.

III. The preparation was made by the disciples (v. 19); They did as Jesus had appointed. They made ready the passover; they got the lamb killed. and everything set in readiness for such a sacred solemn feast.

IV. They ate the passover according to the law (v. 20); He sat down. His sitting down, denotes the composedness of his mind, when he addressed himself to this solemnity; He sat down with the twelve, Judas not excepted. By the law, they were to take a lamb for a household; Christ's disciples were his household. They whom God has charged with families, must have their houses with them in serving the Lord.

V. We have here Christ's discourse with his disciples at the passover-supper. The usual subject was the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt (Exod. xii. 26, 27); but the great Passover is now ready to be offered, and the discourse of that swallows up all talk of the other.

1. The general notice Christ gives his disciples of the treachery that should be among them (v. 21); One of you shall betray me. Christ knew it. We know not what troubles will befall us, nor whence they will arise: but Christ knew all his. It magnifies his love, that he knew all things that should befall him, and yet did not draw back. When there was occasion, he let those about him know it. He had often told them that the Son of man should be betrayed; now he tells them that one of them should do it.

2. The disciples' feelings on this occasion, v. 22. (1) They were exceedingly sorrowful. It troubled them much to hear that their Master should be betrayed. When Peter was first told of it, he said, Be it far from thee. It troubled them more to hear that one of them should do it. Gracious souls grieve for the sins of others, especially of those that have made a more than ordinary profession of religion. It troubled them most of all, that they were left at uncertainty which of them it was.

(2) They began every one of them to say, Lord, is it I? They were not apt to suspect Judas. Though he was a thief, yet, it seems, he had carried it so plausibly, that none of them so much as looked upon him, much less said, Lord, is it Judas? It is possible for a hypocrite to go through the world, not only undiscovered, but unsuspected; like bad money so ingeniously counterfeited that nobody questions it.

They were apt to suspect themselves; Lord, is it I? They feared the worst, and asked Him who knows us better than we know ourselves, Lord is it I? We know not how strongly we may be tempted, nor how far God may leave us to ourselves, and therefore have reason, not to be high-minded, but fear.

3. Further information given them concerning this matter (v. 23, 24), where Christ tells them, (1) That the traitor was a familiar friend; He that dippeth his hand with me in the dish, that is, One of you that are now with me at the table. It is base ingratitude to dip with Christ in the dish, and yet betray him. (2) That this was according to the scripture, which would take off the offence at it. The more we see of the fulfilling of the scripture in our troubles, the better we may bear them. (3) That it would prove a very dear bargain to the traitor; Woe to that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed. Though God can serve his own purposes by the sins of men, that doth not make the sinner's condition the less woeful; It had been good for that man, if he had not been born.

4. The conviction of Judas, v. 25. He asked, Is it I? to avoid coming under the suspicion of guilt by his silence. He knew very well that it was he, and yet wished to appear a stranger to such a plot. Note, Many whose consciences condemn them are very industrious to justify themselves before men, and put a good face on it, with, Lord, is it I? Christ soon answered this question; Thou hast said. It was enough to convict him, and, if his heart had not been wretchedly hardened, to have broken the neck of his plot, when he saw it discovered to his Master, and discovered by him.

And when the hour was come—about six o'clock, he sat down, and the twelve apostles with him—the whole twelve, Judas included.

verily, I say unto you, One of you shall betray me—The announcement of vs. 18 seems not to have been plain enough to be quite apprehended, save by the traitor himself. He will therefore speak it out in terms not to be misunderstood. But how much it cost Him to do this, appears from the "trouble" that came over His "spirit"—visible emotion, no doubt—before He got it uttered. What wounded susceptibility does this disclose, and what exquisite delicacy in His social intercourse with the Twelve, to whom He cannot, without an effort, break the subject!

"They were exceeding sorrowful" (Matt. 26:22). (2) "They began to inquire among themselves which of them it was that should do this thing" (Luke 22:23). (3) "They began to say unto Him one by one, Is it I, and another, Is it I?" (Mark 14:19). Generous, simple hearts! They abhorred the thought, but, instead of putting it on others, each was only anxious to purge himself, and know if he could be the wretch. Their putting it at once to Jesus Himself, as knowing doubtless who was to do it, was the best, as it certainly was the most spontaneous and artless evidence of their innocence. (4) Jesus, apparently while this questioning was going on, added, "The Son of man goeth as it is written of Him, but woe unto that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed! It had been good for that man if he had not been born" (Matt. 26:24). (5) "Judas," last of all, "answered and said, Lord, is it I?" evidently feeling that when all were saying this, if he held his peace, that of itself would draw suspicion upon him. To prevent this the question is wrung out of him, but perhaps, amidst the stir and excitement at the table, in a half-suppressed tone as we are inclined to think the answer also was—"Thou hast said" (Matt. 26:25), or possibly by little more than a sign; for from vs. 28 it is evident that till the moment when he went out, he was not openly discovered.

this form when they mean some particular person who is so well-known that there is no need to specify him by name. My time is at hand. That is, the time of My crucifixion.

19. And the disciples did. The disciples that were sent on this errand were Peter and John. See Luke xxii. 9. They made ready the passover. That is, they provided the lamb, etc., which were appointed by the law for this solemnity.

20. Now when the even was come, he sat down with the twelve. It is a common opinion that our Lord ate the Passover some hours before the Jews ate it; for the Jews, according to custom, ate theirs at the end of the fourteenth day, but Christ ate His the preceding even, which was the beginning of the same sixth day, or Friday. The Jews begin their day at sunsetting, we at midnight. Thus Christ ate the Passover on the same day with the Jews, but not on the same hour. Christ kept this Passover the beginning of the fourteenth day, the precise day and hour in which the Jews had eaten their first Passover in Egypt. See Exod. xii. 6-12. And in the same part of the same day in which the Jews had sarcificed their first paschal lamb, viz., "between the two evenings," about the ninth hour, or three o'clock, Jesus Christ, our Passover, was sacrificed for us. For it was at this hour that He yielded up His last breath; and then it was that, the sacrifice being completed, Jesus said, "It is finished."

21. One of you shall betray me. Or "will deliver Me up." Judas had already betrayed Him, v. 15, and he was now about to deliver Him into the hands of the chief priests, according to the agreement he had made with them.

22. They were exceeding sorrowful. That is, the eleven who were innocent; and the hypocritical traitor, Judas, endeavored to put on the appearance of sorrow.

23. He that dippeth his hand. As the Jews ate the Passover a whole family together, it was not convenient for them all to dip their bread in the same dish. They therefore had several little dishes or plates, in which was the juice of the bitter herbs, mentioned Exod. xii. 8, on different parts of the table; and those who were nigh one of these dipped their bread in it. As Judas is represented as dipping in the same dish with Christ, it shows that he was either near or opposite to Him. If this man's heart had not been hardened, and his conscience seared beyond all precedent, by the deceitfulness of his sin, would he have showed his face in this sacred assembly, or have thus put the seal to his own perdition by eating of this sacrificial lamb?

24. The Son of man goeth. That is, is about to die. "Going, going away, departing" are frequently used in the best Greek and Latin writers for "death" or "dying." The same words are often used in the Scriptures in the same sense. It had been good for that man. Can this be said of any sinner, in the common sense in which it is understood, if there be any redemption from hell's torments? Can the doctrine of the non-eternity of hell's torments stand in the presence of this saying? Or can the doctrine of the annihilation of the wicked consist with this declaration? It was common for the Jews to say of any flagrant transgressor, "It would have been better for him had he never been born."

25. Judas . . . said, Master, is it I? What excessive impudence! He knew, in his conscience, that he had already betrayed his Master, and was waiting now for the servants of the chief priests, that he might deliver Him into their hands; and yet he says (hoping that he had transacted his business so privately that it had not yet transpired), Master, is it I? It is worthy of remark that each of the other disciples said, Lord, is it I? But Judas dares not, or will not, use this august title, but simpy say, "Teacher, is it I?" Thou hast said. "Ye have said" was a common form of expression for "Yes. It is so."

MATTHEW HENRY

Verses 26–30

We have here the institution of the great gospel ordinance of the Lord's supper.

I. The time when it was instituted—as they were eating. At the latter end of the passover-supper, before the table was drawn, because it was to come in the room of that ordinance. Christ is to us the Passover-sacrifice by which atonement is made (1 Cor. v. 7); Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us.

II. The institution itself. A sacrament must be instituted; it has both its being and significancy from the institution, from a divine institution. Hence the apostle (1. Cor. xi. 23, &c.), in that discourse of his concerning this ordinance, all along calls Jesus Christ the Lord, because, as Lord, he appointed this ordinance.

1. The body of Christ is signified and represented by bread; he had said formerly (John vi. 35), I am the bread of life. As the life of the body is supported by bread, so the life of the soul is supported and maintained by Christ's mediation.

(1) He took bread—the loaf; some loaf that lay ready at hand, fit for the purpose. His taking the bread was a solemn action, and was, probably, done in such a manner as to be observed by them that sat with him.

(2) He blessed it; set it apart for this use by prayer and thanksgiving. We do not find any set form of words used by him upon this occasion. Christ could command the blessing, and we, in his name, are emboldened to beg the blessing.

(3) He brake it; which denotes, [1] The breaking of Christ's body for us, that it might be fitted for our use; He was bruised for our iniquities. [2] The breaking of Christ's body to us, as the father of the family breaks the bread to the children.

(4) He gave it to his disciples, as the Master of the family, and the Master of this feast. To the disciples, because all the disciples of Christ have a right to this ordinance; and those shall have the benefit of it who are his disciples indeed; yet he gave it to them as he did the multiplied loaves, by them to be handed to all his other followers.

(5) He said, Take, eat; this is my body, v. 26. He here tells them,

[1] What they should do with it; "Take, eat; accept of Christ as he is offered to you, receive the atonement, approve of it, consent to it." Believing on Christ is expressed by receiving him (John i. 12), and feeding upon him, John vi. 57, 58. Meat looked upon, or the dish ever so well garnished, will not nourish us; it must be fed upon: so must the doctrine of Christ.

[2] What they should have with it; This is my body, not ὄντος—this bread, but τοῦτο—this eating and drinking. Believing carries all the efficacy of Christ's death to our souls. This is my body, spiritually and sacramentally; this signifies and represents my body. He employs sacramental language. We partake of the sun, not by having the bulk and body of the sun put into our hands, but the beams of it darted down upon us; so we partake of Christ by partaking of his grace, and the blessed fruits of the breaking of his body.

2. The blood of Christ is signified and represented by the wine (v. 27, 28); He took the cup, the grace-cup, which was set ready to be drank, after thanks returned, according to the custom of the Jews at the passover. He gave thanks, to teach us, not only in every ordinance, but in every part of the ordinance, to have our eyes up to God.

This cup he gave to the disciples,

(1) With a command; Drink ye all of it. Thus he welcomes his guests to his table, obliges them all to drink of his cup.

(2) With an explication; For this is my blood of the New Testament. Hitherto the blood of Christ had been represented by the blood of beasts, real blood: but, after it was actually shed, it was represented by the blood of grapes, metaphorical blood.

[1] It is my blood of the New Testament. The

And he took bread, and gave thanks. In Matthew and Mark it is "and blessed it." The one act includes the other. He "gave thanks." not so much here for the literal bread as for that higher food which was couched under it; and He "blessed" it as the ordained channel of spiritual nourishment.

and brake it, and gave unto them, saying, This is my body, which is given for you: this do in remembrance of me. "The expression, 'This is my body,' " says Alexander most truly, "which is common to all the accounts, appears so unambiguous and simple an expression, that it is hard to recognize in it the occasion and the subject of the most protracted and exciting controversy that has rent the Church within the last thousand years. That controversy is so purely theological that it has scarcely any basis in the exposition of the text; the only word upon which it could fasten (the verb is) being one which in Aramaic (or Syro-Chaldaic), would not be expressed, and therefore belongs merely to the Greek translation of our Savior's language. Until the strong unguarded figures of the early Fathers had been petrified into a dogma, at first by popular misapprehension, and at last by theological perversion, these words suggested no idea but the one which they still convey to every plain unbiased reader, that our Savior calls the bread His body in the same sense that He calls himself a door (John 10:9), a vine (John 15:11), a root (Rev. 22:16), a star, and is described by many other metaphors in Scripture. The bread was an emblem of His flesh, as wounded for the sins of men, and as administered for their spiritual nourishment and growth in grace."

Likewise also the cup after supper—not after the Lord's Supper, as if the taking of the bread and of the cup in it were separated so far as that; but after the paschal supper, and consequently immediately after the distribution of the bread. The accounts of Matthew and of Mark would seem to imply that He gave thanks on taking the cup, as well as with the bread; but here, at any rate, and in the most authoritative account, perhaps, which we have, in 1 Cor 11:23, that is not said. saying, This cup is the new testament in my blood, which is shed for you. In Matthew (26:28), "This is my blood of the new testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins." In 1 Cor. (11:25) "This cup is the new testament in my blood: this do ye, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me." Most critics now maintain that the word here rendered "testament" should be rendered covenant, not only

26. As they were eating. Either an ordinary supper, or the paschal lamb, as some think. This is the first institution of what is termed the Lord's Supper. Jesus took bread. Of what kind? Unleavened bread, certainly, because there was no other kind to be had in all Judea at this time; for this was the first day of unleavened bread (v. 17), i.e., the fourteenth of the month Nisan, when the Jews, according to the command of God (Exod. xii. 15-20; xxiii. 15; and xxxiv. 25), were to purge away all leaven from their houses. For he who sacrified the Passover, having leaven in his dwelling, was considered to be such a transgressor of the divine law as could no longer be tolerated among the people of God, and therefore was to be cut off from the congregation of Israel. Now if any respect should be paid to the primitive institution, in the celebration of this divine ordinance, then unleavened, unyeasted bread should be used. And blessed it. Both Matthew and Mark use the word blessed instead of "gave thanks," which is the word used by Luke and Paul. The terms, in this case, are nearly of the same import, as both blessing and giving thanks were used on these occasions. But what was it that our Lord blessed? Not the bread, though many think the contrary, being deceived by the word it, which is improperly supplied in our version. In all the four places referred to above, whether the word blessed or gave thanks is used, it refers not to the bread, but to God, the Dispenser of every good. Our Lord here conforms himself to that constant Jewish custom, viz., of acknowledging God as the Author of every good and perfect gift, by giving thanks or taking the bread and taking the cup at their ordinary meals. The Jewish form of blessing, probably that which our Lord used on this occasion is: "Blessed be thou, our God, King of the universe who bringest forth bread out of the earth!" "Likewise, on taking the cup, they say: "Blessed be our God, the King of the universe, the Creator of the fruit of the vine!"

And brake it. We often read in the Scriptures of breaking bread, but never of cutting it. The breaking of the bread I consider essential to the proper performance of this solemn and significant ceremony, because this act was designed by our Lord to shadow forth the wounding, piercing, and breaking of His body upon the Cross. And gave it to the disciples. Not only the breaking, but also the distribution, of the bread are necessary parts of this rite. This is my body. Here it must be observed that Christ had nothing in His hands at this time but part of that unleavened bread which He and His disciples had been eating at supper, and therefore He could mean no more than this, viz., that the bread which He was now breaking represented His body, which in the course of a few hours was to be crucified for them. The truth is, there is scarcely a more common form of speech in any language than "This is" for "This represents or signifies." And as our Lord refers in the whole of this transaction to the ordinance of the Passover, we may consider Him as saying: "This bread is now My body in that sense in which the paschal lamb has been My body hitherto; and this cup is My blood of the New Testament in the same sense as the blood of bulls and goats has been My blood under the Old (Exodus xxiv; Hebrews ix). That is, the paschal lamb and the sprinkling of blood represented My sacrifice to the present time; this bread and this wine shall represent My body and blood through all future ages. Therefore, "Do this in remembrance of Me."

28. For this is my blood of the new testament. This is the reading both here and in Mark; but Luke and Paul say, "This cup is the new testament in my blood." This passage has been strangely mistaken. By new testament, many understand nothing more than the Book commonly known by this name, containing the four Gospels, Acts of the Apostles, apostolical Epistles, and Book of the Revelation; and they think that the cup of the new testament means no more than merely that cup which the Book called the New Testament enjoins in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. The original which we translate the new testament and which is general title of all the contents of the Book already described simply means "the new covenant." Covenant signifies an agreement, con-covenant God is pleased to make with us, and all the benefits and privileges of it, are owing to the merits of Christ's death.

[2] It is shed; it was not shed till next day, but it was now upon the point of being shed, it is as good as done.

[3] It is shed for many. Christ came to confirm a covenant with many. The blood of the Old Testament was shed for a few. But Jesus Christ is a propitiation for the sins of the whole world, 1 John ii. 2.

[4] It is shed for the remission of sins, that is, to purchase remission of sins for us. The new covenant which is procured and ratified by the blood of Christ, is a charter of pardon, an act of indemnity, in order to a reconciliation between God and man. The pardon of sin is that great blessing which is, in the Lord's supper, conferred upon all true believers; it is the foundation of all other blessings, and the spring of everlasting comfort, ch. ix. 2, 3. A farewell is now bidden to the fruit of the vine, v. 29. How good to be here! Never such a heaven upon earth as was at this table; but it was not intended for a perpetuity.

First, He takes leave of such communion; I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine. Farewell this fruit of the vine, this passover-cup, this sacramental wine. Dying saints take their leave of sacraments, and the other ordinances of communion which they enjoy in this world, with comfort, for the joy and glory they enter into supersede them all; when the sun rises, farewell the candles.

Secondly, He assures them of a happy meeting again at last. Until that day when I drink it new with you. Some understand it of the interviews he had with them after his resurrection. Others understand it of the joys and glories of the future state, which the saints shall partake of in everlasting communion with the Lord Jesus. Christ will himself partake of those pleasures; it was the joy set before him, which he had in his eye, and all his faithful friends and followers shall partake with him.

Lastly, Here is the close of the solemnity with a hymn (v. 30); They sang a hymn or psalm. Singing of psalms is a gospel-ordinance. It is very proper after the Lord's supper, as an expression of our joy in God through Jesus Christ, and a thankful acknowledgment of that great love wherewith God has loved us in him. It is not unseasonable, no, not in times of sorrow and suffering. Our spiritual joy should not be interrupted by outward afflictions.

When this was done, they went out into the mount of Olives. He would not stay in the house to be apprehended, lest he should bring the master of the house into trouble; but he retired into the adjacent country, the mount of Olives. They had the benefit of moonlight for this walk, for the passover was always at the full moon. After we have received the Lord's supper, it is good for us to retire for prayer and meditation, and to be alone with God.

here but wherever else it occurs in the New Testament; being used in the Old Testament constantly by the LXX translators for the well-known Hebrew word signifying "covenant," which never signifies "testament." Here, in particular, there is a manifest allusion to Ex. 24:8, "Behold, the blood of the covenant which the Lord hath made with you concerning all these words." Now it is beyond doubt that "covenant" is the fundamental idea, and that in the Old Testament the word is correctly rendered "covenant." But let it be observed, first, that "testament" or "will" is the proper classical sense of the Greek word, and "disposition" or "covenant" but a secondary sense; and next, that in Heb. 9:15 the sense of "testament" appears to be so obviously what the apostle reasons on that to exclude it there, and restrict the meaning to "covenant," can only be made to yield the harshest sense. But the true harmony of both senses of the word, and how, in the case of Christ's death, the one runs into the other, will be seen, not by any criticism on the word, but by reflection on the thing. If it be true that by "covenant," or eternal divine arrangement, all the blessings of salvation become the rightful possession of believers solely in virtue of Christ's death, does not this almost irresistibly suggest to every reflecting mind the idea of a testator's death as a most true and exalted conception of the virtue of it? What can be a more natural view of the principle on which the fruits of Christ's death become ours than that of a testamentary disposition? Then, observe how near to this idea of His death our Lord himself came in what He said, when the Greeks sought to "see Jesus" on the eve of His last Passover. "The hour is come when the Son of man should be glorified: except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone; but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit" (John 12:23, 24). Observe, too, His mode of expression twice over at the Supper table. "I appoint unto you, as my Father appointed unto me, a kingdom" (Luke 22:29); "Peace I leave with you; my peace I give unto you": and it will be seen, we think, how each idea suggests the other. While that of "covenant" is confessedly the fundamental one, that of "testament" is accessory or illustrative only. Yet the one is as real as the other, and presents a phase of the truth exceedingly precious. In this view Bengel substantially concurs, and Stier entirely.

"I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom," or, "in the kingdom of God" (Mark 14:25). The primary application of this, no doubt, is to the new Gospel kingdom to be fully erected when the old economy, with its Passover and temple rites, should disappear. But the best interpreters agree that its only full and proper application is to that celestial kingdom of which He speaks so beautifully in verse 30—"that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom."

tract, or compact between two parties by which both are mutually bound to do certain things on certain conditions and penalties. It answers to the Hebrew berith, which often signifies, not only the covenant or agreement, but also the sacrifice which was slain on the occasion, by the blood of which the covenant was ratified; and the contracting parties professed to subject themselves to such a death as that of the victim in case of violating their engagements. In this place our Lord terms His blood "the blood of the new covenant"; by which He means that grand plan of agreement, or reconciliation, which God was now establishing between himself and mankind, by the passion and death of His Son, through whom alone men could draw nigh to God. Which is shed (poured out) for many. Often used in a sacrificial sense in the Septuagint, to "pour out" or "sprinkle" the blood of the sacrifices before the altar of the Lord, by way of atonement. See 2 Kings xvi. 15; Lev. viii. 15; ix. 9; Exod. xxix. 12; Lev. iv. 7, 14, 17, 30, 34; and in various other places. Our Lord, by this very remarkable mode of expression, teaches us that, as His body was to be broken or crucified, "in our stead," so here the Blood was to be poured out to make an atonement, as the words remission of sins sufficiently prove; for "without shedding of blood [there] is no remission," Heb. ix. 22. The whole of this passage will receive additional light when collated with Isa. liii. 11-12. "By his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many; for he shall bear their iniquities . . . because he hath poured out his soul unto death . . . and he bare the sin of many." The pouring out of the soul unto death in the prophet answers to "This is the blood of the new covenant which is poured out for you," in the Evangelists. For the remission of sins. "For [or in reference to] the taking away of sins." For although the Blood is shed and the atonement made, no man's sins are taken away until as a true penitent he returns to God and, feeling his utter incapacity to save himself, believes in Christ Jesus, who is the Justifier of the ungodly. The phrase remission of sins (frequently used by the Septuagint), being thus explained by our Lord, is often used by the Evangelists and the apostles, and does not mean merely the pardon of sins, as it is generally understood, but the removal or taking away of sins—not only the guilt, but also the very nature of sin, and the pollution of the soul through it; and comprehends all that is generally understood by the terms justification and sanctification. Both Luke and Paul add that, after giving the bread, our Lord said, "This do in remembrance of me." And after giving the cup, Paul alone adds, "This do ye, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me." The account as given by Paul should be carefully followed, being fuller, and received, according to his own declaration, by especial revelation from God. See 1 Cor. xi. 23. For I have received of the Lord that which also I delivered unto you.

29. I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine. These words seem to intimate no more than this: We shall not have another opportunity of eating this bread and drinking this wine together, as in a few hours My crucifixion shall take place. Until that day when I drink it new with you. That is, I shall no more drink of the produce of the vine with you; but shall drink new wine—wine of a widely different nature from this—a wine which the kingdom of God alone can afford. The term new in Scripture is often taken in this sense. So the "new heaven," and "new earth," the "new covenant," the "new man" mean a heaven, earth, covenant, man of a very different nature from the former. From what our Lord says here, we learn that the sacrament of His supper is a type and a pledge to genuine Christians of the felicity they shall enjoy with Christ in the Kingdom of glory.

30. And when they had sung an hymn. Probably no more than a kind of recitative reading or chanting. As to the hymn itself, we know, from the universal consent of Jewish antiquity, that it was composed of Psalms 113—118, termed by the Jews halel, from halelu-yah, the first word in Psalm 113. These six psalms were always sung at every paschal solemnity. They sung this great hallel on account of the five great benefits referred to in it; viz., (1) The Exodus from Egypt, Ps. cxiv. 1, "When Israel

Verses 31–35

We have here Christ's discourse with his disciples upon the way.

I. A prediction of the trial which both he and his disciples were now to go through. He here foretells,

1. A dismal scattering storm just arising, v. 31.

(1) That they should all be offended because of Christ that very night; they would not have the courage to cleave to him but would all basely desert him. Offences will come among the disciples of Christ in an hour of trial and temptation; it cannot be but they should, for they are weak. Even they whose hearts are upright may sometimes be overtaken with an offence. There are some temptations and offences, the effects of which are general, All you shall be offended. Though there will be but one traitor, they will be all deserters. We have need to prepare for sudden trials, which may come to extremity in a very little time. How soon may a storm arise! The cross of Christ is the great stumbling-block to many that pass for his disciples.

(2) That herein the scripture would be fulfilled; I will smite the Shepherd. It is quoted from Zech. xiii. 7. Here is the smiting of the Shepherd in the sufferings of Christ, and the scattering of the sheep, thereupon, in the flight of the disciples. It was each one's care to shift for himself, and happy he that could get furthest from the cross.

2. He gives them the prospect of a comfortable gathering together again after this storm (v. 32); "After I am risen again, I will go before you. Though you will forsake me, I will not forsake you; though you fall I will take care you shall not fall finally: we shall have a meeting again in Galilee, I will go before you, as the shepherd before the sheep." The captain of our salvation knows how to rally his troops, when, through their cowardice, they have been put into disorder.

II. The presumption of Peter (v. 33); Though all men be offended, yet will I never be offended. Peter had a great stock of confidence, and was upon all occasions forward to speak; sometimes it did him a kindness, but at other times it betrayed him, as it did here.

1. How he bound himself with a promise, that he would never be offended in Christ. Before the Lord's supper, Christ's discourse led his disciples to examine themselves with, Lord, is it I? For that is our preparatory duty; after the ordinance, his discourse leads them to an engaging of themselves to close walking, for that is the subsequent duty.

2. How he fancied himself better armed against temptation than anyone else, Though all men shall be offended yet will not I. Peter supposes it possible that some, nay that all, might be offended, and yet he escape better than any. We should rather say, If it be possible that others may be offended, there is danger that I may be so.

III. The particular warning Christ gave Peter of what he would do, v. 34. He imagined that in the hour of temptation he should come off better than any of them, and Christ tells him that he should come off worse. "Verily, I say unto thee; take my word for it, who know thee better than thou knowest thyself." He tells him,

1. That he should deny him. He said, "Though all men, yet not I"; and he did it sooner than any.

2. How quickly he should do it; this night, before to-morrow, nay, before cock-crowing. As we know not how near we may be to trouble, so we know not how near we may be to sin; if God leave us to ourselves, we are always in danger.

3. How often he should do it; thrice. Christ tells him that he would do it again and again; for, when once our feet begin to slip, it is hard to recover our standing again.

IV. Peter's repeated assurances of his fidelity (v. 35); Though I should die with thee. He knew what he should do—rather die with Christ than deny him; and he thought what he would do—never be false to his Master, whatever it cost him; yet, it proved, he was. It is easy to talk boldly and carelessly of death at a distance; but it is not so soon done as said, when it comes to the setting-to, and death shows itself in its own colours.

What Peter said the rest subscribed to; likewise also said all the disciples. There is a proneness in good men to be over-confident of their own strength and stability. Those often fall soonest and foulest that are most confident of themselves. Those are least safe that are most secure.

In these verses we have the story of his agony in the garden. The clouds had been gathering a good while, and looked black. But now the storm began 31-35. THE DESERTION OF JESUS BY HIS DISCIPLES, AND THE DENIAL OF PETER FORETOLD. (= Mark 14:27-31; Luke 22:31-38; John 13:36-38.) For the exposition, see on Luke 22:31-38.

Then saith Jesus unto them, All ye shall be offended because of me this night—"shall be stumbled in me"; temporarily staggered on seeing their Master apprehended. In the expression, "All ye," there may be a reference to the one who had just "gone out." Great as was the relief, now for the first time experienced by the Savior himself, on the traitor's voluntary separation from a fellowship to which He never in heart belonged (John 13:31), even in those who remained there was something which burdened the spirit and wounded the heart of the Man of Sorrows. It saddened Him to think that, within one brief hour or two of the time when their hearts had warmed toward Him more than ever at the Paschal and Communion table, they should every one of them be "stumbled" because of Him: for it is written [Zech. 13:7], I will smite the Shepherd, and the sheep of the flock shall be scattered abroad. 32. But after I am risen again, I will go before you into Galilee. He falls back upon this striking prophecy, partly to confirm their faith in what they would otherwise hardly think credible; and partly to console himself with the reflection that it was but one of "the things concerning him" which "would have an end"—that they would be but links in the chain, "doing what God's hand and purpose determined before to be done."

In Matthew and Mark it was when our Lord told them they should all be stumbled in Him that night that Peter said, "Though all men"—or rather, "all," meaning all that sat with him at the table—"shall be offended in thee, yet will I never be offended" (Matt. 26:33; Mark 14:29). But as the answer there given by our Lord is the same as that recorded by our Evangelist, he probably uttered both protestations in his vehemence at one time; his feeling being roused by our Lord singling him out from all the rest. Poor Peter, thou shalt yet pay dearly for that unlovely elevation of thyself above the rest of thy brethren, when thy risen Lord shall wring thy heart by asking thee, in presence of these very brethren, "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me more than these?" (John 21:15-17). Yet no vain-glorious vaunt was this of Peter. It was just the outcoming of conscious attachment: insomuch that all the rest, feeling a cord touched in their own hearts by this protestation, immediately repeated it for themselves. For, add our two first Evangelists, "Likewise also said all the disciples." Dear disciples! Ye spoke out but the feelings of your heart then; your Lord knew that, and doubtless was comforted by it, as a spontaneous utterance of your hearts' affection. But little thought ye how soon it was to be seen—in all of you, but in Peter preeminently—that "he that trusteth in his own heart is a fool" (Prov. 28:26). 34. And he said, I tell thee, Peter, the cock shall not crow this day, before that thou shalt thrice deny that thou knowest me. Most interesting and touching is the fact, that whereas in the first, third, and fourth Gospels only one crowing of the cock is mentioned as sounding the note of Peter's fall; in the second Gospel—which all ancient tradition proclaims, and internal evidence suggests, to have been drawn up under the immediate eye of Peter—it is said that two crowings of the cock would sound his fall. And as it is Mark alone who records the fact that the cock did crow twice—the first time after one denial of his Lord, and the second immediately after the last—we have thus an affecting announcement, almost from his own pen, that warning after warning passed unheeded till the second knell rang in his ears and bitterly revealed how much wiser his Lord was than he.

31. All ye shall be offended. Or rather, "You will all be stumbled"—you will all forsake Me, and lose in a great measure your confidence in Me. This night. The time of trial is just at hand.

I will smite the shepherd. It will happen to you as to a flock of sheep whose shepherd has been slain—the leader and guardian being removed, the whole flock shall be scattered, and be on the point of becoming a prey to ravenous beasts.

32. But after I am risen again. Do not lose your confidence; for though I shall appear for a time to be wholly left to wicked men, and be brought under the power of death, yet I will rise again, and triumph over all your enemies and mine. I will go before you. Still alluding to the case of the shepherd and his sheep. Though the shepherd have been smitten and the sheep scattered, the shepherd shall revive again, collect the scattered flock, and go before them, and lead them to peace, security, and happiness.

33. Peter . . . said unto him, Though all men shall be offended . . . yet will I never. The presumptuous person imagines he can do everything, and can do nothing; thinks he can excel all, and excels in nothing; promises everything, and performs nothing. The humble man acts a quite contrary part. There is nothing we know so little of as ourselves—nothing we see less of than our own weakness and poverty.

34. Jesus said. Our Lord's answer to Peter is very emphatic and impressive. Verily—I speak a solemn, weighty truth, you will not only be stumbled, fall off and forsake your Master, but you will even deny that you have, or ever had, any knowledge of or connection with Me; and this you will do, not by little and little, through a long process of time, till the apostasy, daily gathering strength, shall be complete; but you will do it this very night, and that not once only, but thrice.

35. Though I should die with thee, yet will I not deny thee. He does not take the warning which his Lord gave him—he trusts in the warm, sincere attachment to Christ which he now feels, not considering that this must speedily fail unless supported by the power of God.

I. The place where he underwent this mighty agony; it was in a place called Gethsemane. The name signifies an olive-mill, a press for olives, like a wine-press, where they trod the olives. There our Lord Jesus began his passion; there it pleased the Lord to bruise him, and crush him, that fresh oil might flow to all believers from him.

II. The company he had with him, when he was in this agony.

1. He took all the twelve disciples with him to the garden, except Judas, who was at this time otherwise employed.

2. He took only Peter, and James, and John, with him into that corner of the garden where he suffered his agony. He left the rest at some distance, with this charge, Sit ye here, while I go and pray yonder. Christ went to pray alone, though he had lately prayed with his disciples, John xvii. 1. He took these three with him, because they had been the witnesses of his glory in his transfiguration (ch. xvii. 1, 2), and that would prepare them to be the witnesses of his agony. Those are best prepared to suffer with Christ, that have by faith beheld his glory. If we hope to reign with him, why should we not expect to suffer with him?

III. The agony itself that he was in; He began to be sorrowful, and very heavy. It is called an agony (Luke xxii. 44), a conflict. It was not any bodily pain or torment that he was in, it was from within; he troubled himself, John xi. 33. The words here used are very emphatical; he began to be sorrowful, and in a consternation. He had like a weight of lead upon his spirits.

But what was the cause of all this? What was it that put him into this agony? Why art thou cast down, blessed Jesus, and why disquieted? Certainly, it was nothing of despair or distrust of his Father, much less any conflict or struggle with him. As the Father loved him because he laid down his life for the sheep, so he was entirely subject to his Father's will in it. But,

1. He engaged in an encounter with the powers of darkness; so he intimates (Luke xxii. 53). As the Father gave me commandment, so I do; however it be, I must have a struggle with him, therefore arise, let us go hence, let us hasten to the field of battle, and meet the enemy. Christ, when he works salvation, is described like a champion taking the field, Isa. lix. 16–18.

2. He was now bearing the iniquities which the Father laid upon him, and, by his sorrow and amazement, he accommodated himself to his undertaking. The sufferings he was entering upon were for our sins; they were all made to meet upon him, and he knew it. As we are obliged to be sorry for our particular sins, so was he grieved for the sins of us all.

3. He had a full and clear prospect of all the sufferings that were before him. He foresaw the treachery of Judas, the unkindness of Peter, the malice of the Jews, and their base ingratitude. Death in its most dreadful appearances, death in pomp, attended with all its terrors, looked him in the face; and this made him sorrowful, especially because it was the wages of our sin, which he had undertaken to satisfy for. It is true, the martyrs have suffered for Christ without any such sorrow and consternation. But then, (1) Christ was now denied the supports and comforts which they had; that is, he denied them to himself. Their cheerfulness under the cross was owing to the divine favour, which, for the present, was suspended from the Lord Jesus. (2) His sufferings were of another nature from theirs. On the saints' cross there is a blessing pronounced, which enables them to rejoice under it (ch. v. 10, 12); but to Christ's cross there was a curse annexed, which made him sorrowful and very heavy under it. And his sorrow under the cross was the foundation of their joy under it.

IV. His complaint of this agony. He goes to his disciples (v. 38), and,

1. He acquaints them with his condition; My soul is exceedingly sorrowful, even unto death. It gives some little ease to a troubled spirit, to have a friend ready to unbosom itself to, and give vent to its sorrows. Christ here tells them, (1) What was the seat of his sorrow; it was his soul that was now in an agony. Christ suffered in soul as well as in body. (2) What was the degree of his sorrow. He was exceedingly sorrowful. It was sorrow in the highest degree, even unto death; it was a killing sorrow, such sorrow as no mortal man could bear and live. (3) The duration of it; it will continue even unto death. He now began to be sorrowful, and never ceased to be so till he said, It is finished. It was prophesied of Christ, that he should be a Man of sorrows (Isa. liii. 3).

2. He bespeaks their company and attendance;

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

The walk to Gethsemane, we incline to think, was taken in silence. But no sooner was He on the spot than, having said to the whole of them, "Pray that ye enter not into temptation" (Luke 22:40), the internal commotion—which may have begun as soon as the "hymn" that closed the proceedings of the upper room died away in silence—would no longer conceal. As soon as He was "at the place," having said to eight out of the eleven, "Sit ye here while I go and pray yonder," He took Peter and James and John aside by themselves, or a little in advance of the rest, and "saith unto them, My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death: tarry ye here and watch with me" (Matt. 26:38; Mark 14:34). Not, "Come and see Me, to be My witnesses"; but "Come and watch with Me, to bear Me company." It did Him good, it seems, to have them by Him. For He had a true humanity, only all the more tender and susceptible than ours that it was not blunted and dulled by sin. You may say, indeed, if company was what He wanted, He got little of it. True enough. They fell asleep. "I looked for some to take pity, but there was none; and for comforters, but I found none" (Ps. 69:20). It would have soothed His burdened spirit to have had their sympathy, but He did not get it. They were broken reeds. And so He had to tread the winepress alone. Yet was their presence, even while asleep, not quite in vain. Perhaps the spectacle would only touch His sensibilities the more, and rouse into quickened action His greathearted compassions. In fact, He did not want even them too near Him. For it is said, "He went forward a little"; or, as Luke (22:41) more precisely expresses it, "was withdrawn from them about a stone's cast." Yes, company is good, but there are times when even the best company can hardly be borne.

But now let us reverently draw near and see this great sight, the Son of God in a tempest of mysterious internal commotion—"the bush burning, and the bush not consumed." Every word of the threefold record is weighty, every line of the picture awfully bright. "Let us put off the shoes from off our feet, for the place whereon we stand is holy ground." "He began," says Matthew, "to be sorrowful and very heavy," or, "to be sorrowful and oppressed" (Matt. 26:37). Mark uses the last of these words, but places before it one more remarkable: "He began to be sore amazed, and to be very heavy"; or better, perhaps, "to be appalled and to be oppressed" (Mark 14:33). Although through life He had been "a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief," there is no ground to think that even the selectest circle of His followers was made privy to them, save on one occasion before this, after His final entry into Jerusalem, when, upon the Greeks "desiring to see Jesus"—which seems to have brought the hour of His "uplifting" overwhelmingly before Him—He exclaimed, "Now is my soul troubled, and what shall I say? Father, save me from this hour? But for this cause came I unto this hour. Father, glorify thy name" (John 12:27, 28). This was just Gethsemane anticipated. But now the tempest rose as never before. "He began to be sorrowful," as if till this moment unacquainted with grief. So new to Him, indeed, was the feeling, that Mark, using a singularly bold word, says, He was "appalled" at it; and under the joint action of this "sorrow" and "amazement," He was "very heavy," oppressed, weighed down—so much so that He was fain to tell it to the three He had taken aside, and most affectingly gave this as His reason for wishing their company: "My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death: tarry ye here and watch with me." "I feel as if nature were sinking under this load—as if life were ebbing out—as if death were coming before its time—as if I could not survive this." It is usual to compare here such passages as that of Jonah (4:4), "I do well to be angry even unto death," and even some classical passages of similar import; but these are all too low. In dealing with such scenes as this, one feels as if even the most ordinary phraseology must be interpreted with reference to the unique circumstances of the case.

ADAM CLARKE

36. A place called Gethsemane. A garden at the foot of the Mount of Olives. The name seems to be formed from gath, "a press," and shemen, "oil"; probably the place where the produce of the mount of Olives was prepared for use. The garden of the oil press, or olive press.

37. And he took with him Peter and the two sons of Zebedee. That is, James and John, the same persons who had beheld His transfiguration on the mount—that they might contemplate this agony in the light of that glory which they had there seen, and so be kept from being stumbled by a view of His present humiliation. And very heavy. "Overwhelmed with anguish." This word is used by the Greeks to denote the most extreme anguish which the soul can feel—excruciating anxiety and torture of spirit.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

Is it permitted us to ask what were the fountains of these bitter floods that swept over Christ's sinless soul? Was the mere physical shrinking from death all? If so, we may reverently say that many a maiden and old man, who drew all their fortitude from Jesus, have gone to stake or gibbet for His sake, with a calm which contrasts strangely with His agitation. Gethsemane is robbed of its pathos and nobleness if that be all. But it was not all. Rather, it was the least bitter of the components of the cup. What lay before Him was not merely death, but the death which was to atone for a world's sin, and in which, therefore, the whole weight of sin's consequences was concentrated. "The Lord hath made to meet on Him the iniquities of us all"; that is the one sufficient explanation of this infinitely solemn and tender scene. Unless we believe that, we shall find it hard to reconcile His agitation in Gethsemane with the perfection of His character as the captain of "the noble army of martyrs."—Expositions of Holy Scripture

38. My soul is exceeding sorrowful (or "is surrounded with exceeding sorrow"), even unto death. This latter word explains the two former: My soul is so dissolved in sorrow, My spirit is filled with such agony and anguish, that, if speedy succor be not given to My body, death must be the speedy consequence.

MATTHEW HENRY

Tarry ye here, and watch with me. Surely he was destitute indeed of help, when he entreated theirs, who, he knew, would be but miserable comforters. It is good to have, and therefore good to seek, the assistance of our brethren, when at any time we are in an agony.

V. What passed between him and his Father when he was in this agony; Being in an agony, he prayed. Prayer is never out of season, but it is especially seasonable in an agony.

1. The place where he prayed; He went a little further, withdrew from them. He retired for prayer; a troubled soul finds most ease when it is alone with God, who understands the broken language of sighs and groans. Christ has hereby taught us that secret prayer must be made secretly.

2. His posture in prayer; He fell on his face; his lying prostrate denotes, (1) The agony he was in, and the extremity of his sorrow. (2) His humility in prayer.

3. The prayer itself; wherein we may observe three things.

(1) The title he gives to God; O my Father. Thick as the cloud was, he could see God as a Father through it. It is a pleasing string to harp upon at such a time, My Father; whither should the child go, when anything grieves him, but to his father?

(2) The favour he begs; If it be possible, let this cup pass from me. He calls his sufferings a cup; not a river, not a sea, but a cup, which we shall soon see the bottom of. When we are under troubles, we should make the best, the least, of them, and not aggravate them. He begs that this cup might pass from him, that is, that he might avoid the sufferings now at hand; or, at least, that they might be shortened. This intimates no more than that he was really and truly Man, and as a Man he could not but be averse to pain and suffering. A prayer of faith against an affliction, may very well consist with the patience of hope under affliction. But observe the proviso; If it be possible. If God may be glorified, man saved, and the ends of his undertaking answered, without his drinking of this bitter cup, he desires to be excused; otherwise not. What we cannot do with the securing of our great end, we must reckon to be in effect impossible; Christ did so.

(3) His entire submission to, and acquiescence in, the will of God; Nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt. Our Lord Jesus, though he had a quick sense of the extreme bitterness of the sufferings he was to undergo, yet was freely willing to submit to them for our redemption and salvation. The reason of Christ's submission to his sufferings, was, his Father's will; as thou wilt, v. 39. He grounds his own willingness upon the Father's will. He did what he did, and did it with delight, because it was the will of God. This he had often referred to, as that which put him upon, and carried him through, his whole undertaking. In conformity to this example of Christ, we must drink of the bitter cup which God puts into our hands, be it ever so bitter; though nature struggle, grace must submit.

4. The repetition of the prayer; He went away again the second time, and prayed (v. 42), and again the third time (v. 44). Though we may pray to God to prevent and remove an affliction, yet our chief errand must be, that he will give us grace to bear it well. It should be more our care to get our troubles sanctified, and our hearts satisfied under them, than to get them taken away. He prayed, saying, Thy will be done. Prayer is the offering up, not only of our desires, but of our resignations, to God. The third time he said the same words. It should seem by v. 40 that he continued an hour in his agony and prayer; but, whatever more he said, it was to this effect, deprecating his approaching sufferings, and yet resigning himself to God's will in them.

But what answer had he to this prayer? Certainly it was not made in vain; he that heard him always, did not deny him now. It is true, the cup did not pass from him, but he had an answer to his prayer; for, He was strengthened with strength in his soul; and that was a real answer, Luke xxii. 43. In answer to his prayer, God provided that he should not fail or be discouraged.

VI. What passed between him and his three disciples at this time.

1. The fault they were guilty of; that when he was in his agony, they were so little concerned, that they could not keep awake; he comes, and finds them asleep, v. 40. Much more should their love to their Master, and their care concerning him, have obliged them to a more close and vigilant attendance on him; yet they were so dull, that they could not keep their eyes open. What had become of us, if Christ had been now as sleepy as his disciples were? Christ engaged them to watch with him, as if he expected

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

What next? He "kneeled down," says Luke; He "fell on his face," says Matthew; or "fell on the ground," as Mark expresses it. Perhaps the kneeling posture was tried for a moment, but quickly became intolerable: and unable to bear up under a pressure of spirit which felt like the ebbing out of life itself, He was compelled to seek the dust! And now went up a cry such as never before ascended from this earth; no, not from those lips which dropped as a honeycomb; "O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me; nevertheless not as I will, but as thou wilt" (Matt. 26:39). The variations in Mark 14:36 and Luke 22:42 are worthy of note. Mark's double form of the invocation, "Abba, Father," we may pretty confidently conjecture was the very one our Lord used—the hallowed, endeared form of the mother tongue "Abba," followed emphatically by the term "Father," that of educated life (Rom. 8:15). Then Mark breaks up the one expression of Matthew, "If it be possible, let this cup pass," into these two, identical in meaning, "All things are possible unto thee; take away this cup"; while Luke's expression, "If thou be willing to remove this cup" (as in the Greek), shows that the "possibility" of the other two Evangelists was understood to be one purely of divine will or arrangement, insomuch that the one word came naturally to be interchanged with the other. (To suppose that our Lord used the identical words of all the three accounts is absurd.)

That tears accompanied this piercing cry is not reported by any of the Evangelists—who appear to give rigidly what was seen by the three favored disciples in the clear moonlight, and heard by them in the unbroken stillness of the night air of Gethsemane, ere sleep overpowered their exhausted frames. But those remarkable words in the Epistle to the Hebrews—which, though they seem to express what often took place, have, beyond all doubt, a special reference to this night of nights—leave no doubt of it, as a fact well known in the Christian churches, that on this occasion the tears of the Son of God fell fast upon the earth, while His cries rent the heavens: "Who in the days of his flesh, when he had offered up prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears" (Heb. 5:7). Exquisite here are the words of old Traill, which, though before quoted, are peculiarly appropriate here: "He filled the silent night with His crying, and watered the cold earth with His tears, more precious than the dew of Hermon, or any moisture, next unto His own blood, that ever fell on God's earth since the creation."

But now let us listen to the cry itself. "The cup" to which the Son of God was so averse—"the cup," the very prospect of drinking which so appalled and oppressed Him—"the cup," for the removal of which, if it were possible, He prayed so affectingly—that cup was assuredly no other than the death He was about to die. When He says, "If it be possible, let this cup pass from me," He tells me He didn't like it, and couldn't like it; its ingredients were too bitter, too revolting; but when He says, "Nevertheless, not my will, but thine be done," He proclaims in my ear His absolute obedient subjection to the Father. This view of the cup quite changed its character, and by the expulsive power of a new affection—I will not say, turned its bitterness into sweetness, for I see no signs of sweetness even in that sense, but—absorbed and dissolved His natural repugnance to drink it up.

But to return to the conflict, whose crisis is yet to come. Getting a momentary relief—for the agitation of His spirit seems to have come upon Him by surges—He returns to the three disciples, and finding them sleeping, He chides them, particularly Peter, in terms deeply affecting: "He saith unto Peter, What! could ye not watch with me one hour?" In Mark (which may almost be called Peter's own Gospel) this is particularly affecting, "He saith unto Peter, Simon, sleepest thou? Couldest not thou watch one hour? Watch ye and pray, lest ye enter into temptation. The spirit truly is ready, but the flesh is weak." How considerate

39. This cup. The word cup is frequently used in the Sacred Writings to point out sorrow, anguish, terror, death. It seems to be an allusion to a very ancient method of punishing criminals. A cup of poison was put into their hands, and they were obliged to drink it. Socrates was killed thus, being obliged by the magistrates of Athens to drink a cup of the juice of hemlock.

42. O my Father, if this cup may not pass away from me. If it be not possible to redeem fallen man unless I drink this cup, unless I suffer death for them; thy will be done—I am content to suffer whatever may be requisite to accomplish the great design. In this address the humanity of Christ most evidently appears, for it was His humanity alone that could suffer.

44. Prayed the third time. So Paul wrote: "I besought the Lord thrice, that it might depart from me" (2 Cor. xii. 8). This thrice repeating the same petition argues deep earnestness of soul.

some succour from them, and yet they slept; surely it was the unkindest thing that could be. His enemies, who watched for him, were wakeful enough (Mark xiv. 43); but his disciples, who should have watched with him, were asleep.

2. Christ's favour to them, notwithstanding. Persons in sorrow are too apt to be cross and peevish with those about them, but Christ in his agony is as meek as ever and is not apt to take things ill.

When Christ's disciples put this slight upon him,

(1) He came to them, as if he expected to receive some comfort from them. They added grief to his sorrow; and yet he came to them, more careful for them than they were for themselves; when he was most engaged, yet he came to look after them; for those that were given him, were upon his heart, living and dying.

(2) He gave them a gentle reproof; he directed it to Peter, who used to speak for them; let him now hear for them. What! could ye not watch with me one hour? He speaks as one amazed to see them so stupid. Consider, [1] Who they were; "Could not ye watch—ye, my disciples and followers? From you I expected better things." [2] Who he was; "Watch with me." He awoke out of his sleep, to help them when they were in distress (ch. viii. 36); and could not they keep awake, at least to show their goodwill to him? [3] How small a thing it was that he expected from them—only to watch with him. If he had bid them do some great thing, or die with him, they thought they could have done it; and yet they could not do it, when he only desired them to watch with him. [4] How short a time it was that he expected it—but one hour; they were not set upon the guard whole nights, only one hour.

(3) He gave them good counsel; Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation, v. 41. There was an hour of temptation drawing on, and very near; the troubles of Christ were temptations to his followers to disbelieve and distrust him, to deny and desert him, and renounce all relation to him. There was danger of their entering into the temptation, as into a snare or trap. He therefore exhorts them to watch and pray; Watch with me, and pray with me. While they were sleeping, they lost the benefit of joining in Christ's prayer. "Watch yourselves, and pray yourselves. Pray that you may watch; beg of God by his grace to keep you awake, now that there is occasion."

(4) He kindly excused for them; The spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak. We do not read of one word they had to say for themselves; but then he had a tender word to say on their behalf; in this he sets us an example of that love which covers a multitude of sins. He considered their frame, and did not chide them, for he remembered that they were but flesh; and the flesh is weak, though the spirit be willing. It is the unhappiness and burthen of Christ's disciples, that their bodies cannot keep pace with their souls in works of piety and devotion, but are many a time a cloud and clog to them; that, when the spirit is free and disposed to that which is good, the flesh is averse and indisposed. Yet it is our comfort, that our Master graciously considers this, and accepts the willingness of the spirit, and pities and pardons the weakness and infirmity of the flesh; for we are under grace, and not under the law.

(5) Though they continued dull and sleepy, he did not any further rebuke them for it; for, though we daily offend, yet he will not always chide. When he came to them the second time, we do not find that he said anything to them (v. 43); he findeth them asleep again. One would have thought that he had said enough to them to keep them awake; but it is hard to recover from a spirit of slumber. Their eyes were heavy, which intimates that they strove against it as much as they could, but were overcome by it, and therefore their Master looked upon them with compassion. When he came the third time, he left them to be alarmed with the approaching danger (v. 45, 46); Sleep on now, and take your rest. See here how Christ deals with those that suffer themselves to be overcome by security, and will not be awakened out of it. Sometimes he gives them up to the power of it; Sleep on now. He that will sleep, let him sleep still. The curse of spiritual slumber is the just punishment of the sin of it. Many times he sends some startling judgment. Those who will not be alarmed by reasons and arguments, had better be alarmed by swords and spears than left to perish in their security. Let those that would not believe, be made to feel.

As to the disciples here, their Master gave them notice of the near approach of his enemies. The Son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinners. And again, He is at hand that doth betray me. Christ's sufferings were no surprise to him. He called them to rise, and be going: not, "Rise, and let us flee and compassionate this allusion to the weakness of the flesh was at that moment, appears by the explanation which Luke gives of the cause of it—an explanation beautifully in accordance with his profession as "the beloved physician" (Col. 4:4)—"that he found them sleeping for sorrow" (Luke 22:45). What now? "Again he went away, and prayed, and spake the same words" (Mark 14:39). He had nothing more, it seems, and nothing else to say. But now the surges rise higher, beat more tempestuously, and threaten to overwhelm Him. To fortify Him against this, "there appeared an angel unto him from heaven, strengthening him": not to minister to Him spiritually, by supplies of heavenly light or comfort—of that He was to have none during this awful scene; nor if it had been otherwise, would it seem competent for an angel to convey it—but simply to sustain and brace up sinking nature for a yet hotter and fiercer struggle.

But again there is a lull; and returning to the three, "He found them asleep again (for their eyes were heavy), neither wist they what to answer him" (Mark 14:40) when He scolded them, perhaps in nearly the same terms. And now, once more, returning to His solitary spot, He "prayed the third time," saying the same words; but this time slightly varied. It is not now, "O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me"; but, "O my Father, if this cup may not pass from me, except I drink it, thy will be done." Had only one of these two forms of the petition occurred in the same Gospel, we might have thought that they were but verbal differences in the different reports of one and the same petition. But as they both occur in the same Gospel of Matthew, we are warranted in regarding the second as an intentional, and in that case momentous, modification of the first. The worst is over. The bitterness of death is past. He has anticipated and rehearsed His final conflict. The victory has now been won on the theater of an invincible will—to "give his life a ransom for many." He shall win it next on the arena of the cross, where it is to become an accomplished fact. "I will suffer" is the result of Gethsemane: "It is finished," bursts from the cross. Without the deed, the will had been all in vain. But His work was then consummated when into the palpable deed He carried the now manifested will—"by the which will we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all" (Heb. 10:10).

At the close of the whole scene, returning once more to His three disciples, and finding them still sleeping, worn out with continued sorrow and racking anxiety, He says to them, with an irony of tender but deep emotion, "Sleep on now, and take your rest: behold, the hour is at hand, and the Son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinners. Rise, let us be going: behold, he is at hand that doth betray me" (Matt. 26:45, 46). While He yet spake, Judas appeared with his armed band, and so they proved miserable comforters, broken reeds. But thus in His whole work He was alone, and "of the people there was none with him."

ADAM CLARKE

40. He . . . saith unto Peter. He addressed himself more particularly to this apostle because of the profession he had made, v. 33; as if He had said: "Is this the way you testify your affectionate attachment to Me? You all said you were ready to die with Me; what, then, cannot you watch . . . one hour?"

41. That ye enter not into temptation. Watch —that you be not taken unawares; and pray— that when it comes you may be enabled to bear it.

45. Sleep on now, and take your rest. Perhaps it might be better to read these words interrogatively, and paraphrase them thus: "Do you sleep on still?" My hour—in which I am to be delivered up, is at hand; therefore, now think of your own personal safety. The Son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinners. Viz., the Gentiles or heathens, who were generally distinguished by this appellation from the Jews.

MATTHEW HENRY

from the danger"; but, "Rise, and let us go meet it". He intimates to them their folly, in sleeping away the time which they should have spent in preparation; now the event found them unready, and was a terror to them.

Verses 47–56

We are here told how the blessed Jesus was seized, and taken into custody; this followed immediately upon his agony, while he yet spake; for from the beginning to the close of his passion he had not the least intermission or breathing-time.

Now concerning the apprehension of the Lord Jesus,

I. Who the persons were, that were employed in it. Here was Judas, one of the twelve, at the head of this infamous guard: he was guide to them that took Jesus (Acts i. 16); without his help they could not have found him in this retirement. Here was with him a great multitude. This multitude was made up partly of a detachment out of the guards, these were Gentiles, sinners, as Christ calls them, v. 45. The rest were the servants and officers of the High Priest, and they were Jews; they that were at variance with each other, agreed against Christ.

II. How they were armed for this enterprise.

1. What weapons they were armed with; They came with swords and staves. They were not regular troops, but a tumultuous rabble. But wherefore is this ado? His hour being come for him to give up himself, all this force was needless. When a butcher goes into the field to take out a lamb for the slaughter, does he raise the militia, and come armed? No, he needs not; yet is there all this force used to seize the Lamb of God.

2. What warrant they were armed with; They came from the chief priests, and elders of the people. He was taken up by a warrant from the great sanhedrim, as a person obnoxious to them. Pilate, the Roman governor, gave them no warrant; but they were men who pretended to religion, and presided in the affairs of the church, that were active in this prosecution, and were the most spiteful enemies Christ had. Pilate upbraided him with it; Thine own nation and the chief priests delivered thee to me, John xviii. 35.

III. The manner how it was done, and what passed at that time.

1. How Judas betrayed him; he did his business effectually, and his resolution in this wickedness may shame us who fail in that which is good.

(1) The instructions he gave to the soldiers (v. 48). He gave them a sign, lest by mistake they should seize one of the disciples instead of him. That same is he; and when they had him in their hands, not to lose him—Hold him fast; for he had sometimes escaped from those who thought to secure him; as Luke iv. 30. And Judas by his kiss intended not only to distinguish him, but to detain him, while they came behind him, and laid hands on him.

(2) The dissembling compliment he gave his Master. He came close up to Jesus; surely when he comes to look him in the face, he will either be awed by its majesty, or charmed by its beauty. Dares he to come into his very sight and presence, to betray him? Peter denied Christ, but when the Lord turned and looked upon him, he relented presently; but Judas comes up to his Master's face, and betrays him. He said, Hail, Master; and kissed him. A kiss is a token of allegiance and friendship. But Judas, when he broke all the laws of love and duty, profaned this sacred sign to serve his purpose.

(3) The entertainment his Master gave him, v. 50. He calls him friend. He would teach us under the greatest provocation to forbear bitterness. He calls him friend, because he furthered his sufferings, and so befriended him; whereas, he called Peter Satan for attempting to hinder them. He asks him, "Wherefore art thou come? Is it peace, Judas? Explain thyself; if thou come as an enemy, what means this kiss? If as a friend, what mean these swords and staves? Wherefore art thou present? Why hadst thou not so much shame left thee, as to keep out of sight, which thou mightest have done, and yet have given the officers notice where I was?"

2. How the officers and soldiers secured him. Then came they, and laid hands on Jesus, and took him; they made him their prisoner. We may well imagine what rude and cruel hands they were, which this barbarous multitude laid on Christ; and now, it is probable, they handled him the more roughly for their being so often disappointed when they sought to lay hands on him. They could not have taken him, if he had not surrendered himself, and been delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, Acts ii. 23.

Our Lord Jesus was made a prisoner, because he 47-56. BETRAYAL AND APPREHENSION OF JESUS—FLIGHT OF HIS DISCIPLES. (=Mark 14:43-52; Luke 22:47-54; John 18:1-12). For the exposition, see on John 18:1-12.

Judas . . . knew the place, for Jesus ofttimes—see ch. 8:1; Luke 21:37—resorted thither with his disciples—The baseness of this abuse of knowledge in Judas, derived from admission to the closest privacies of his Master, is most touchingly conveyed here, though nothing beyond bare narrative is expressed. Jesus, however, knowing that in this spot Judas would expect to find Him, instead of avoiding it, hies Him thither, as a Lamb to the slaughter. "No man taketh My life from Me, but I lay it down of Myself" (ch. 10:18). Besides, the scene which was to fill up the little breathing-time, the awful interval, between the Supper and the Apprehension—like the "silence in heaven for about the space of half an hour" between the breaking of the Apocalyptic Seals and the peal of the Trumpets of war (Rev. 8:1)—the AGONY—would have been too terrible for the upper room; nor would He cloud the delightful associations of the last Passover and the first Supper by pouring out the anguish of His soul there. The garden, however, with its amplitude, its shady olives, its endeared associations, would be congenial to His heart. Here He had room enough to retire—first, from eight of them, and then from the more favored three; and here, when that mysterious scene was over, the stillness would only be broken by the tread of the traitor.

Judas then—"He that was called Judas, one of the Twelve," says Luke, in language which brands him with peculiar infamy, as in the sacred circle while in no sense of it. a band of men—"the detachment of the Roman cohort on duty at the festival for the purpose of maintaining order" [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. officers from the chief priests and Pharisees—captains of the temple and armed Levites. lanterns and torches—It was full moon, but in case He should have secreted Himself somewhere in the dark ravine, they bring the means of exploring its hiding-places—little knowing whom they had to do with. "Now he that betrayed Him had given them a sign, saying, Whomsoever I shall kiss, that same is He, hold Him fast" (Matt. 26:48). The cold-bloodedness of this speech was only exceeded by the deed itself. "And Judas went before them [Luke 22:47], and forthwith he came to Jesus, and said, Hail, Master, and kissed Him" (Matt. 26:49; cf. Exod. 4:27; 18:7; Luke 7:45). The impudence of this atrocious deed shows how thoroughly he had by this time mastered all his scruples. If the dialogue between our Lord and His captors was before this, as some interpreters think it was, the kiss of Judas was purely gratuitous, and probably to make good his right to the money; our Lord having presented Himself unexpectedly before them, and rendered it unnecessary for any one to point Him out. But a comparison of the narratives seems to show that our Lord's "coming forth" to the band was subsequent to the interview of Judas. "And Jesus said unto him, Friend"—not the endearing term "friend" (in ch. 15:15), but "companion," a word used on occasions of remonstrance or rebuke (as in Matt. 20:13; 22:12)—"Wherefore art thou come?" (Matt. 26:50). "Betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss"—imprinting upon the foulest act the mark of tenderest affection? What wounded feeling does this express! Of this Jesus showed Himself on various occasions keenly susceptible—as all generous and beautiful natures do.

46. Rise, let us be going. That is, to meet them, giving thereby the fullest proof that I know all their designs and might have, by flight or otherwise, provided for My own safety. But I go willingly to meet that death which their malice designs Me, and through it provide for the life of the world.

47. Judas, one of the twelve. More deeply to mark his base ingratitude and desperate wickedness. A great multitude with swords and staves. They did not come as officers of justice but as a desperate mob.

48. Gave them a sign. How coolly deliberate is this dire apostate! The man whom I shall kiss—how deeply hypocritical! That is He; hold him fast, "seize Him"—how diabolically malicious!

49. Hail, master. A usual compliment among the Jews. Judas pretends to wish our Lord continued health while he is meditating His destruction! And kissed him. "And tenderly kissed Him"—this is the proper meaning of the original word. He kissed Him again and again—still pretending the most affectionate attachment to Him, though our Lord had before unmasked him.

50. Jesus said unto him, Friend (rather, "companion"), wherefore art thou come? How must these words have cut his very soul, if he had any sensibility left! Surely you, who have so long been My companion, are not come against Me, your Lord, Teacher, and Friend! What is the human heart not capable of, when abandoned by God, and influenced by Satan and the love of money!

would in all things be treated as a malefactor, punished for our crime. He became a prisoner, that he might set us at liberty; for he said, If ye seek me, let these go their way (John xviii. 8); and those are free indeed, whom he makes so.

3. How Peter fought for Christ, and was checked for his pains. It is here only said to be one of them that were with Jesus in the garden; but in John xviii. 10, we are told that it was Peter who signalized himself upon this occasion.

(1) Peter's rashness (v. 51); He drew his sword. They had but two swords among them all (Luke xxii. 38), and one of them, it seems, fell to Peter's share; and now he thought it was time to draw it. But all the execution he did was the cutting off an ear from a servant of the High Priest; designing, it is likely, to cleave him down the head, he missed his blow. Peter had talked much of what he would do for his Master, he would lay down his life for him; yea, that he would; and now he would be as good as his word, and venture his life to rescue his Master. He had a great zeal for Christ, and his honour and safety; but it was not according to knowledge, nor guided by discretion; he did it without warrant. We must see not only our cause good, but our call clear, before we draw the sword. He indiscreetly exposed himself and his fellow-disciples to the rage of the multitude; for what could they with two swords do against a band of men?

(2) The rebuke which our Lord Jesus gave him (v. 52); Put up again thy sword into its place. He commands Peter to put up his sword, does not chide him indeed for what he had done, because done out of goodwill, but stops the progress of his arms. Christ's errand into the world was to make peace. As Christ forbade his disciples the sword of justice (ch. xx. 25, 26), so here the sword of war. Christ bade Peter put up his sword, and never bade him draw it again.

Three reasons Christ gives to Peter for this rebuke:

[1] His drawing the sword would be dangerous to himself and to his fellow-disciples; They that take the sword, shall perish with the sword; they that use violence, fall by violence; and men hasten and increase their own troubles by blustering bloody methods of self-defence. Grotius gives another, and a probable sense of this blow, making those that take the sword to be, not Peter, but the officers and soldiers that come with swords to take Christ; They shall perish with the sword. They took the Roman sword to seize Christ with, and by the Roman sword, not long after, they and their place and nation were destroyed.

[2] It was needless for him to draw his sword in defence of his Master, who, if he pleased, could summon into his service all the hosts of heaven (v. 53); "Thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to my Father, and he shall send from heaven effectual succours? Peter, if I would put by these sufferings, I could easily do it without thy hand or thy sword." Note, God has no need of us, of our services, much less of our sins, to bring about his purposes. God can do his work without us. Though Christ was crucified through weakness, it was a voluntary weakness; he submitted to death, not because he could not, but because he would not contend with it. Christ here lets us know,

First, What a great interest he had in his Father; I can pray to my Father, and he will send me help. It is a great comfort to God's people, when they are surrounded with enemies on all hands, that they have a way open heavenward; if they can do nothing else, they can pray to him that can do everything. And they who are much in prayer at other times, have most comfort in praying when troublesome times come. Christ saith, not only that God could, but that, if he insisted upon it, he would do it. He might yet have gone out free from the service, but he loved it, and would not; so that it was only with the cords of his own love that he was bound to the altar.

Secondly, What a great interest he had in the heavenly hosts; He shall presently give me more than twelve legions of angels. a. There is an innumerable company of angels, Heb. xii. 22. b. This innumerable company of angels are all at the disposal of our heavenly Father, and do his pleasure, Ps. ciii. 20, 21. c. These angelic hosts were ready to come in to the assistance of our Lord Jesus in his sufferings, if he had needed or desired it. He shall give them me; therefore angels are not to be prayed to, but the Lord of the angels. He shall presently give them me. See how ready his Father was to hear his prayer.

[3] It was no time to make any defence at all, or to offer to put by the stroke; For how then shall the scriptures be fulfilled, that thus it must be? v. 54. It was written, that Christ should be led as a lamb

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

10, 11. Then Simon Peter, having a sword, drew it, and smote the high priest's servant, and cut off his right ear. The servant's name was Malchus—None of the other Evangelists mention the name either of the ardent disciple or of his victim. John being "known to the high priest" (vs. 15), the mention of the servant's name by him is quite natural, and an interesting mark of truth in a small matter. As to the right ear, specified both here and in Luke, the man was "likely foremost of those who advanced to seize Jesus, and presented himself in the attitude of a combatant; hence his right side would be exposed to attack. The blow of Peter was evidently aimed vertically at his head" [WESTER and WILKINSON].

Matthew adds to the address to Peter the following:—"For all they that take the sword shall perish by the sword" (Matt. 26:52)—i.e., 'Those who take the sword must run all the risks of human warfare; but Mine is a warfare whose weapons, as they are not carnal, are attended with no such hazards, but carry certain victory.'

"Thinkest thou that I cannot now"—even after things have proceeded so far—"pray to My Father, and He shall presently give Me"—rather, 'place at My disposal'—"more than twelve legions of angels"; with allusion, possibly, to the one angel who had, in His agony, "appeared to Him from heaven strengthening Him" (Luke 22:43); and in the precise number, alluding to the twelve who needed the help, Himself and His eleven disciples. (The full complement of a legion of Roman soldiers was six thousand.)

"But how then shall the scripture be fulfilled that thus it must be?" (Matt. 26:53, 54.) He could not suffer, according to the Scripture, if

51. One of them which were with Jesus. This was Peter—struck a servant of the high priest's (the servant's name was Malchus, John xviii. 10), and smote off his ear. In Luke xxii. 51 it is said, Jesus touched and healed it. Here was another miracle, and striking proof of the divinity of Christ.

52. Put up again thy sword into his place. Neither Christ nor His religion is to be defended by the secular arm. Shall perish with the sword. The general meaning of this verse is, they who contend in battle are likely, on both sides, to become the sacrifices of their mutual animosities. But it is probably a prophetic declaration of the Jewish and Roman states. The Jews put our Lord to death under the sanction of the Romans—both took the sword against Christ, and both perished by it. But how came Peter to have a sword? Judea was at this time so infested with robbers and cutthroats that it was not deemed safe for any person to go unarmed. He probably carried one for his mere personal safety.

53. More than twelve legions of angels. As if He had said, Instead of you twelve, one of whom is a traitor, My Father can give me more than twelve legions of angels to defend Me. A legion, at different times, contained different numbers; 4,200, 5,000, and frequently 6,000 men.

to the slaughter, Isa. liii. 7. In all difficult cases, the word of God must be conclusive against our own counsels, and nothing must be done, nothing attempted, against the fulfilling of the scripture. We ought to say, "Let God's word and will take place, let his law be magnified and made honourable, whatever becomes of us." Thus Christ checked Peter, when he set up for his champion, and captain of his life-guard.

4. We are next told how Christ argued the case with them that came to take him (v. 55); though he did not resist them, yet he did reason with them. It will consist with Christian patience under our sufferings, calmly to expostulate with our enemies and persecutors. Are ye come out, (1) With rage and enmity, as against a thief, as if I were an enemy to the public safety, and deservedly suffered this? If he had been the plague of his country, he could not have been prosecuted with more heat and violence. (2) With all this power and force, as against the worst of thieves, that dare the law, bid defiance to public justice, and add rebellion to their sin?

He further expostulates with them, by reminding them how he had behaved himself hitherto toward them, and they toward him. I sat daily with you in the temple teaching. Ye laid no hold on me. How comes then this change? They were very unreasonable, in treating him as they did. He had given them no occasion to look upon him as a thief, for he had taught in the temple. Such gracious words as came from his mouth, were not the words of a thief, nor of one that had a devil. Nor had he given them occasion to look upon him as one that absconded, or fled from justice, that they should come in the night to seize him. They might find him every day in the temple, and there they might do as they pleased with him; for the chief priests had the custody of the temple. To come upon him thus clandestinely, in the place of his retirement, was base and cowardly. Thus the greatest hero may be villainously assassinated in a corner, by one that in open field would tremble to look him in the face.

But all this was done (so it follows, v. 56) that the scriptures of the prophets might be fulfilled. It is hard to say, whether these are the words of the sacred historian, as a comment upon this story, or, whether they are the words of Christ himself, that the scriptures of the prophets might be fulfilled, to which he had just now referred himself, v. 54.

5. How he was, in the midst of this distress, shamefully deserted by his disciples; They all forsook him, and fled, v. 56.

(1) This was their sin; and it was a great sin for them who had left all to follow him, now to leave him for they knew not what. There was unkindness in it. There was unfaithfulness in it, for they had solemnly promised to adhere to him, and never to forsake him.

(2) It was a part of Christ's suffering, it added affliction to his bonds, to be thus deserted. They should have stayed with him, to minister to him, and, if need were, to be witnesses for him at his trial. Christ, as a sacrifice for sins, stood thus abandoned. The deer that by the keeper's arrow is marked out to be hunted and run down, is immediately deserted by the whole herd. Christ, as the Saviour of souls, stood thus alone. He bore all, and did all himself.

We have here the arraignment of our Lord Jesus in the ecclesiastical court, before the great sanhedrim. Observe,

I. The sitting of the court; the scribes and the elders were assembled, though it was in the dead time of the night; yet, to gratify their malice against Christ, they sat up all night, to be ready to fall upon the prey.

1. Who they were, that were assembled; the scribes, the principal teachers, and elders, the principal rulers, of the Jewish church: these were the most bitter enemies to Christ our great teacher and ruler. 2. Where they were assembled; in the palace of Caiaphas the High Priest; there they assembled two days before, to lay the plot (v. 3), and there they now convened again, to prosecute it. His house should have been the sanctuary of oppressed innocency, but it is become the throne of iniquity; and no wonder, when even God's house of prayer was made a den of thieves.

II. The setting of the prisoner to the bar; they that had laid hold on Jesus, led him away, hurried him, no doubt, with violence. He was brought into Jerusalem through that which was called the sheep-gate, for that was the way into town from the mount of Olives; and it was so called because the sheep appointed for sacrifice were brought that way to the temple; very fitly therefore is Christ led that way.

III. The cowardice and faint-heartedness of Peter (v. 58).

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

He allowed Himself to be delivered from the predicted death. "And He touched his ear and healed him" (Luke 22:51); for "the Son of man came not to destroy men's lives, but to save them" (Luke 9. 56), and, even while they were destroying His, to save theirs.

"In that hour," says Matthew (26:55, 56), and probably now, on the way to judgment. when the crowds were pressing upon Him, "said Jesus to the multitudes, Are ye come out as against a thief, with swords and staves, for to take Me"—expressive of the indignity which He felt to be thus done to Him—"I sat daily with you in the temple, and ye laid no hold on Me. But this" (adds Luke 22:53) "is your hour and the power of darkness." Matthew continues—"But all this was done that the scriptures of the prophets might be fulfilled. Then all the disciples forsook Him and fled" (Matt. 26:56)—thus fulfilling His prediction (Mark 14:27; ch. 16:32).

57-75. JESUS ARRAIGNED BEFORE THE SANHEDRIM, CONDEMNED TO DIE, AND SHAMEFULLY ENTREATED—THE DENIAL OF PETER. (=Mark 14:53-72; Luke 22:54-71; John 18:13-18, 24-27.) For the exposition, see on Mark 14:53-72.

And they led Jesus away to the high priest: and with him were assembled—or rather, "there gathered together unto him"—all the chief priests and the elders and the scribes—it was then a full and formal meeting of the Sanhedrim. Now, as the first three Evangelists place all Peter's denials of his Lord after this, we should naturally conclude that they took place while our Lord stood before the Sanhedrim. But besides that the natural impression is that the scene around the fire took place overnight, the second crowing of the cock, if we are to credit ancient writers, would occur about the beginning of the fourth watch, or between three and four in the morning. By that time, however, the Council had probably convened, being warned, perhaps, that they were to prepare for being called at any hour of the morning, should the Prisoner be successfully secured. If this be correct, it is fairly certain that only the last of Peter's three denials would take place while our Lord was under trial before the Sanhedrim. One thing more may require explanation. If our Lord had to be transferred from the residence of Annas to that of Caiaphas, one is apt to wonder that there

54. But how then—had I such a defense—shall the scriptures be fulfilled, which say that thus it must be? That is, that I am to suffer and die for the sin of the world. Probably the scriptures to which our Lord principally refers are Psalms xxii; lxix; and especially Isaiah liii and Dan. ix. 24-27. Christ shows that they had no power against Him but what He permitted, and that He willingly gave up himself into their hands.

56. But all this was done. This is probably the observation of the Evangelist. Then all the disciples forsook him, and fled. He had but twelve who professed inviolable attachment to Him. One of these betrayed Him; another denied Him with oaths; and the rest ran away and utterly abandoned Him to His implacable enemies!

57. They . . . led him away to Caiaphas. John says, chap. xviii. 13, that they led him first to Annas; but this appears to have been done merely to do him honor as the father-in-law of Caiaphas, and his colleague in the high priesthood. But as the Sanhedrin was assembled at the house of Caiaphas, it was there He must be brought to undergo His mock trial.

MATTHEW HENRY

1. He followed him, but it was afar off. Some sparks of love and concern for his Master there were in his breast, and therefore he followed him; but fear and concern for his own safety prevailed, and therefore he followed afar off. It looks ill, and bodes worse, when those that are willing to be Christ's disciples, are not willing to be known to be so. To follow him afar off, is by little and little to go back from him. There is danger in drawing back, nay, in looking back.

2. He followed him, but he went in, and sat with the servants. He went in where there was a good fire, and sat with the servants, not to silence their reproaches, but to screen himself. It was presumption in Peter thus to thrust himself into temptation; he that does so, throws himself out of God's protection.

3. He followed him, but it was only to see the end, led more by his curiosity than by his conscience; he attended as an idle spectator rather than as a disciple. He went in, only to look about him; it is not unlikely that Peter went in, expecting that Christ would have made his escape miraculously out of the hands of his persecutors; having so lately struck them down, who came to seize him; and this he had a mind to see: if so, it was folly for him to think of seeing any other end than what Christ had foretold, that he should be put to death. It is more our concern to prepare for the end, whatever it may be, than curiously to enquire what the end will be. The event is God's, but the duty is ours.

IV. The trial of our Lord Jesus in this court.

1. They examined witnesses against him. The crimes properly cognizable in their court, were, false doctrine and blasphemy; these they endeavoured to prove upon him.

(1) Their search for proof; They sought false witness against him; they had seized him, bound him, abused him, and after all have to seek for something to lay to his charge, and can show no cause for his commitment. They made proclamation, that, if any-one could give information against the prisoner at the bar, they were ready to receive it, and presently many bore false witness against him (v. 60).

(2) Their success in this search; in several attempts they were baffled, they sought false testimonies among themselves, others came in to help them, and yet they found none.

But at last they met with two witnesses, who, it seems, agreed in their evidence, and therefore were hearkened to, in hopes that now the point was gained. The words they swore against him, were, that he should say, I am able to destroy the temple of God, and to build it in three days, v. 61. Now by this they designed to accuse him, [1] As an enemy to the temple, and one that sought for the destruction of it. [2] As one that dealt in witchcraft, or some such unlawful arts, by the help of which he could rear such a building in three days. Now, as to this, First, The words were mis-recited; he said, Destroy ye this temple (John ii. 19); they come, and swear that he said, I am able to destroy this temple, as if the design against it were his. He said, In three days I will raise it up, a word properly used of a living temple; I will raise it to life. They come, and swear that he said, I am able to build it; which is properly used of a house temple. Secondly, The words were misunderstood; he spoke of the temple of his body (John ii. 21), but they swore that he said the temple of God, meaning this holy place. There have been, and still are, such as wrest the sayings of Christ to their own destruction. He was accused, that we might not be condemned; and if at any time we suffer thus, have all manner of evil, not only said, but sworn, against us falsely, let us remember that we cannot expect to fare better than our Master.

(3) Christ's silence under all these accusations, to the amazement of the court, v. 62. The High Priest, the judge of the court, arose in some heat, and said, "Answerest thou nothing? Come, you the prisoner at the bar; you hear what is sworn against you, what have you now to say for yourself?" But Jesus held his peace (v. 63), not because he wanted something to say, or knew not how to say it, but that the scripture might be fulfilled (Isa. liii. 7); As the sheep is dumb before the shearer, and before the butcher, so he opened not his mouth. He was silent, because his hour was come; he would not deny the charge, because he was willing to submit to the sentence. He stood mute at this bar, that we might have something to say at God's bar.

2. They examined our Lord Jesus himself upon an oath. They will try, contrary to the law of equity, to make him accuse himself.

Here is the interrogatory put to him by the High Priest. The question itself; Whether thou be the Christ, the Son of God? That is, Whether thou pretend to be so? For they will by no means admit it into is no mention of His being marched from the one to the other. But the building, in all likelihood, was one and the same; in which case He would merely have to be taken perhaps across the court, from one chamber to another. And Peter followed him afar off, even into—or "from afar, even to the interior of"—the palace of the high priest—"An Oriental house." says ROBINSON, "is usually built around a quadrangular interior court; into which there is a passage (sometimes arched) through the front part of the house, closed next the street by a heavy folding gate, with a smaller wicket for single persons, kept by a porter. The interior court, often paved or flagged, and open to the sky, is the hall, which our translators have rendered 'palace,' where the attendants made a fire; and the passage beneath the front of the house, from the street to this court, is the porch. The place where Jesus stood before the high priest may have been an open room, or place of audience on the ground-floor, in the rear or on one side of the court; such rooms, open in front, being customary. It was close upon the court, for Jesus heard all that was going on around the fire, and turned and looked upon Peter (Luke 22:61).

"And Peter stood with them and warmed himself." "He went in," says Matthew (26:58), "and sat with the servants to see the end." These two minute statements throw an interesting light on each other. His wishing to "see the end," or issue of these proceedings, was what led him into the palace, for he evidently feared the worst. But once in, the serpent-coil is drawn closer; it is a cold night, and why should not he take advantage of the fire as well as others? Besides, in the talk of the crowd about the all-engrossing topic he may pick up something which he would like to hear. Poor Peter! But now, let us leave him warming himself at the fire, and listening to the hum of talk about this strange case by which the subordinate officials, passing to and fro and crowding around the fire in this open court, would while away the time; and, following what appears the order of the Evangelical Narrative, let us turn to Peter's Lord.

And the chief priests and all the council sought for witness against Jesus to put him to death—Matthew (26:59) says they "sought false witness." They knew they could find nothing valid; but having their Prisoner to bring before Pilate, they behooved to make a case. and found none—none that would suit their purpose, or make a decent ground of charge before Pilate. For many bare false witness against him—From their debasing themselves to "seek" them, we are led to infer that they were bribed to bear false witness; though there are never wanting sycophants enough, ready to sell themselves for naught, if they may but get a smile from those above them: see a similar scene in Acts 6:11-14. How is one reminded here of that complaint, "False witnesses did rise up: they laid to my charge things that I knew not" (Ps. 31:11)! "At the last came two false witnesses." As no two had before agreed in anything, they felt it necessary to secure a duplicate testimony to something, but they were long of succeeding. And what was it, when at length it was brought forward? saying, We heard him say, I will destroy this temple that is made with hands, and within three days I will build another made without hands—On this charge, observe, first, that eager as His enemies were to find criminal matter against our Lord, they had to go back to the outset of His ministry, His first visit to Jerusalem, more than three years before this. In all that He said and did after that, though ever increasing in boldness, they could find nothing. Next, that even then, they fix only on one speech, of two or three words, which they dared to adduce against Him. Further, they most manifestly pervert the speech of our Lord.

Answerest thou nothing? what is it which these witness against thee?—Clearly, they felt that their case had failed, and by this artful question the high priest hoped to get from His own mouth what they had in vain tried to obtain from their false and contradictory witnesses. But in this, too, they failed. But he held his peace, and answered nothing—This must have nonplussed them. But they were not to be easily baulked of their object. Again the high priest—arose (Matt. 26:62), matters having now come to a crisis. asked him, and said unto him, Art thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed?—Why our Lord should have answered this question, when He was silent as to the former, we might not have quite seen, but for Matthew,

ADAM CLARKE

58. Peter followed him afar off. Poor Peter! This is the beginning of his dreadful fall. His fear kept him from joining the company and publicly acknowledging his Lord, and his affection obliged him to follow at a distance that he might see the end. And sat with the servants, to see the end. When a man is weak in faith and can as yet only follow Christ at a distance, he should avoid all dangerous places and the company of those who are most likely to prove a snare to him.

59. All the council, sought false witness. What a prostitution of justice! They first resolve to ruin Him, and then seek the proper means of effecting it; they declare Him criminal, and after that do all they can to fix some crime upon Him, that they may appear to have some shadow of justice on their side when they put Him to death.

61. I am able to destroy the temple of God. (1) These words were not fairly quoted. Jesus had said, John ii. 19, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up." (2) The innuendo which they produce, applying these words to a pretended design to destroy the temple at Jerusalem, was utterly unfair; for these words He spoke of the temple of His body.

MATTHEW HENRY

consideration, whether he be really so or no. They only wished him to confess that he called himself so, that they might on that indict him as a deceiver. What will not pride and malice carry men to? The solemnity of the proposal of it; I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us. Not that he had any regard to the living God, but took his name in vain; only thus he hoped to gain his point with our Lord Jesus. If he should refuse to answer when he was thus adjured, they would charge him with contempt of the blessed name of God.

Christ's answer to this interrogatory (v. 64), in which,

(1) He owns himself to be the Christ the Son of God. Thou hast said; that is, "It is as thou hast said"; for in St. Mark it is, I am. Hitherto, he seldom professed himself expressly to be the Christ, the Son of God; but now he would not omit to make a confession of it, First, Because that would have looked like a disowning of that truth which he came into the world to bear witness to. Secondly, It would have looked like declining his sufferings. He thus confessed himself, for example and encouragement to his followers, when they are called to it, to confess him before men, whatever hazards they run by it.

(2) He refers himself, for the proof of this, to his second coming. It is probable that they looked upon him with a scornful disdainful smile, when he said, I am. To that this nevertheless refers. "Though now you see me in this low and abject state, nevertheless the day is coming when I shall appear otherwise." Hereafter ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, to judge the world; of which his coming shortly to judge and destroy the Jewish nation would be a type and earnest. First, Whom they should see; the Son of man. Having owned himself the Son of God, even now in his estate of humiliation, he speaks of himself as the Son of man, even in his estate of exaltation; for he had these two distinct natures in one person. He is Immanuel, God with us. Secondly, In what posture they should see him; Sitting on the right hand of power. Though now he stood at the bar, they should shortly see him sit on the throne. Coming in the clouds of heaven. He had spoken of this day to his disciples, a while ago, for their comfort, and had bid them lift up their heads for joy in the prospect of it, Luke xxi. 27, 28. Now he speaks of it to his enemies, for their terror.

V. His conviction upon this trial; The High Priest rent his clothes, according to the custom of the Jews, when they heard or saw anything done or said which they looked upon to be a reproach to God.

1. The crime he was found guilty of; blasphemy. He hath spoken blasphemy. Christ, when he was made Sin for us, was condemned as a blasphemer for the truth he told them.

2. The evidence upon which they found him guilty; Ye have heard the blasphemy; why should we trouble ourselves to examine witnesses any further? Thus was he judged out of his own mouth at their bar, because we were liable to be so judged at God's bar. There is no need of witnesses against us; our own consciences are against us instead of a thousand witnesses.

VI. His sentence passed, upon this conviction, v. 66.

Here is, 1. Caiaphas's appeal to the bench; What think ye? When he had already prejudged the cause, and pronounced him a blasphemer, then, as if he were willing to be advised, he asks the judgment of his brethren. He knew that by the authority of his place he could sway the rest, and therefore declares his judgment, and presumes they are all of his mind.

2. Their concurrence with him; they said, He is guilty of death; perhaps they did not all concur: it is certain that Joseph of Arimathea, if he was present, dissented (Luke xxiii. 51); so did Nicodemus, and, it is likely, others with them; however, the majority carried it that way. The judgment was, "He is guilty of death; by the law he deserves to die." Though they had not power now to put any man to death, yet by such a judgment as this they made a man an outlaw among his people, and so exposed him to the fury either of a popular tumult, as Stephen was, or to be clamoured against before the governor, as Christ was.

VII. The abuses and indignities done to him after sentence passed (v. 67, 68); Then, when he was found guilty, they spat in his face. Because they had not power to put him to death, and could not be sure that they should prevail with the governor to be their executioner, they would do him all the mischief they could, now that they had him in their hands. When they had passed sentence upon our Lord Jesus, he was treated as if he were not only worthy of death, but as if that were too good for him. See how they who says (26:63) that the high priest put Him upon solemn oath, saying, "I adjure Thee by the living God, that Thou tell us whether Thou be the Christ, the Son of God." Such an adjuration was understood to render an answer legally necessary (Lev. 5:1). And Jesus said, I am—or, as in Matthew 26:64, "Thou hast said [it]." In Luke, however (22:70), the answer, "Ye say that I am," should be rendered—as DE WETTE, MEYER, ELLICOTT, and the best critics agree that the preposition requires—"Ye say [it], for I am [so]." Some words, however, were spoken by our Lord before giving His answer to this solemn question. These are recorded by Luke alone (22:67, 68): "Art Thou the Christ [they asked]? tell us. And He said unto them, If I tell you, ye will not believe: and if I also ask [interrogate] "you, ye will not answer Me, nor let Me go." This seems to have been uttered before giving His direct answer, as a calm remonstrance and dignified protest against the prejudgment of His case and the unfairness of their mode of procedure. But now let us hear the rest of the answer, in which the conscious majesty of Jesus breaks forth from behind the dark cloud which overhung Him as He stood before the Council. and—in that character—ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven—In Matthew (26:64) a slightly different but interesting turn is given to it by one word: "Thou hast said [it]: nevertheless"—We prefer this sense of the word to "besides," which some recent critics decide for—"I say unto you, Hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sit on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven." The word rendered "hereafter" means, not "at some future time" (as today "hereafter commonly does), but what the English word originally signified, "after here," "after now," or "from this time." Accordingly, in Luke 22:69, the words used mean "from now." So that though the reference we have given it to the day of His glorious Second Appearing is too obvious to admit of doubt, He would, by using the expression, "From this time," convey the important thought which He had before expressed, immediately after the traitor left the supper-table to do his dark work, "Now is the Son of man glorified" (John 13:31). At this moment, and by this speech, did He "witness the good confession" emphatically and properly, as the apostle says in I Timothy 6:13.

Then the high priest rent his clothes—On this expression of horror of blasphemy, see II Kings 18: 37—and saith, What need we any further witnesses?

Ye have heard the blasphemy—(See John 10: 33). In Luke (22:71), "For we ourselves have heard of His own mouth"—an affectation of religious horror. what think ye?—'Say what the verdict is to be.' they all condemned him to be guilty of death—or of a capital crime, which blasphemy against God was according to the Jewish law (Lev. 24:16). Yet not absolutely all; for Joseph of Arimathea, "a good man and a just," was one of that Council, and "he was not a consenting party to the counsel and deed of them," for that is the strict sense of the words of Luke 23:50, 51. Probably he absented himself, and Nicodemus also, from this meeting of the Council, the temper of which they would know too well to expect their voice to be listened to; and in that case, the words of our Evangelist are to be taken strictly, that, without one dissentient voice, "all [present] condemned him to be guilty of death."

ADAM CLARKE

63. I adjure thee by the living God. I put Thee to Thy oath. To this solemn adjuration Christ immediately replies, because He is now called on, in the name of God, to bear another testimony to the truth.

64. Thou hast said. That is, I am the Christ, the promised Messiah (see on v. 25) and you and this whole nation shall shortly have the fullest proof of it. For hereafter, in a few years, shall ye see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, fully invested with absolute dominion, and coming in the clouds of heaven, to execute judgment upon this wicked race. Our Lord appears to refer to Dan. vii. 13: "One like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven." This may also refer to the final judgment.

65. The high priest rent his clothes. This rending of the high priest's garments was expressly contrary to the law, Lev. x. 6 and xxi. 10. But it was a common method of expressing violent grief, Gen. xxxvii. 29, 34; Job i. 20, and horror at what was deemed blasphemous or impious, 2 Kings xviii. 37; xix. 1; Acts xiv. 14. All that heard a blasphemous speech were obliged to rend their clothes, and never to sew them up again.

66. He is guilty of death. "He is liable to death." All the forms of justice are here violated. The judge becomes a party and accuser, and proceeds to the verdict without examining whether all the prophecies concerning the Messiah and the innumerable miracles which He wrought did not justify Him.

abused him.

1. They spat in his face. It is an expression of the greatest contempt and indignation possible; looking upon him as more despicable than the very ground they spit upon. Yet Christ submitted to it. Thus was confusion poured upon his face, that ours might not be filled with everlasting shame and contempt.

2. They buffeted him, and smote him with the palms of their hands. This added pain to the shame, for both came in with sin. Here the margin reads it, They smote him with rods; for so ἐῤῥάπισαν signifies, and this he submitted to.

3. They challenged him to tell who struck him, having first blindfolded him; Prophesy unto us, thou Christ, who is he that smote thee? They made sport of him, as the Philistines did with Samson; it is grievous to those that are in misery, for people to make merry about them, but much more to make merry with them and their misery. They had heard him called a prophet; this they upbraided him with, and pretended to make a trial of; as if the divine omniscience must stoop to a piece of children's play.

We have here the story of Peter's denying his Master, and it comes in as a part of Christ's sufferings. Observe how he fell, and how he got up again by repentance.

I. His sin. The immediate occasion of Peter's sin. He sat without in the palace, among the servants of the High Priest. Bad company is to many an occasion of sin; and those who needlessly thrust themselves into it, go upon the devil's ground; they scarcely can come out of such company, without guilt or grief, or both. The temptation came, when he was challenged as a retainer to Jesus of Galilee. First one maid, and then another, and then the rest of the servants, charged it upon him; Thou also wert with Jesus of Galilee, v. 69. And again, This fellow was with Jesus of Nazareth, v. 71. And again (v. 73), Thou also art one of them, for thy speech betrayeth thee to be a Galilean. Happy he whose speech betrays him to be a disciple of Christ. Observe how scornfully they speak of Christ—Jesus of Galilee, and of Nazareth, upbraiding him with the country he was of: and how disdainfully they speak of Peter—This fellow; as if they thought it a reproach to them to have such a man in their company. The sin itself. When he was charged as one of Christ's disciples, he denied it, was ashamed and afraid to own himself so. Upon the first mention of it, he said, I know not what thou sayest. This was a shuffling answer; he pretended that he did not understand the charge. It is a fault to pretend that we do not understand, or did not think of, or remember, that which yet we do apprehend, and did think of, and remember; this is a species of lying which we are more prone to than any other, because in this a man is not easily disproved. It is yet a greater fault to be shy of Christ, to dissemble our knowledge of him; it is, in effect, to deny him. Upon the next attack, he said, flat and plain, I know not the man, and backed it with an oath, v. 72. This was, in effect, to say, I will not own him. Why, Peter? Canst thou look upon yonder Prisoner at the bar, and say thou dost not know him? Hast thou forgotten all the kind and tender looks thou hast had from him, and all the intimate fellowship thou hast had with him? Canst thou look him in the face, and say that thou dost not know him? Upon the third assault, he began to curse and to swear, saying, I know not the man, v. 74. This was worst of all, for the way of sin is downhill. He cursed and swore, 1. To back what he said, and to gain credit to it, and yet what he said, was false. We have reason to suspect the truth of that which is backed with rash oaths and imprecations. None but the devil's sayings need the devil's proofs. 2. He designed it to be an evidence for him, that he was none of Christ's disciples, for this was none of their language.

This is written for warning to us, that we sin not after the similitude of Peter's transgression; that we never, either directly or indirectly, deny Christ the Lord, dissembling our knowledge of him, and being ashamed of him and his words. This sin was aggravated considering who he was; an apostle, one of the first three. The greater profession we make of religion, the greater is our sin if in anything we walk unworthily. What fair warning his Master had given him of his danger. How solemnly he had promised to adhere to Christ in this night of trial; he had said again and again, "I will never deny thee." How soon he fell into this sin after the Lord's supper. There to receive such an inestimable pledge of redeeming love, and yet the same night, before morning, to disown his Redeemer, was indeed turning aside quickly. How weak comparatively the temptation was; it

The Blessed One Is Now Shamefully Entreated

Every word here must be carefully observed, and the several accounts put together, that we may lose none of the awful indignities about to be described. some began to spit on him—or, as in Matthew 26:67, "to spit in [into] His face." Luke (22:63) says in addition, "And the men that held Jesus mocked him"—or cast their jeers at Him. to cover his face—or "to blindfold him" (as in Luke 22:64). to buffet him—Luke's word, which is rendered "smote Him" (22:63), is a stronger one, conveying an idea for which we have an exact equivalent in English, but one too colloquial to be inserted here—began to say unto him, Prophesy—In Matthew 26:68 this is given more fully: "Prophesy unto us, thou Christ, Who is he that smote Thee?" The sarcastic fling at Him as "the Christ," and the demand of Him in this character to name the unseen perpetrator of the blows inflicted on Him, was in them as infamous as to Him it must have been, and was intended to be, stinging.

And as Peter was beneath in the palace—This little word "beneath"—one of our Evangelist's graphic touches—is most important for the right understanding of what we may call the topography of the scene. We must take it in connection with Matthew's word (26:69): "Now Peter sat without in the palace"—or quadrangular court, in the center of which the fire would be burning; and crowding around and buzzing about it would be the menials and others who had been admitted within the court. At the upper end of this court, probably, would be the memorable chamber in which the trial was held —open to the court, likely, and not far from the fire (as we gather from Luke 22:61), but on a higher level; for (as our verse says) the court, with Peter in it, was "beneath" it. The ascent to the Council chamber was perhaps by a short flight of steps. If the reader will bear this explanation in mind, he will find the intensely interesting details which follow more intelligible. there cometh one of the maids of the high priest—"the damsel that kept the door" (John 18:17). The Jews seem to have employed women as porters of their doors (Acts 12:13). And when she saw Peter warming himself, she looked upon him—Luke (22:56) is here more graphic; "But a certain maid beheld him as he sat by the fire"—lit., 'by the light,' which, shining full upon him, revealed him to the girl—"and earnestly looked upon him"—or, 'fixed her gaze upon him.' His demeanor and timidity, which must have attracted notice, as so generally happens, leading," says OLSHAUSEN, "to the recognition of him." and said, And thou also wast with Jesus of Nazareth—"with Jesus the Nazarene," or, "with Jesus of Galilee" (Matthew 26:69). The sense of this is given in John's report of it (18:17), "Art not thou also one of this man's disciples?" i.e., thou as well as "that other disciple," whom she knew to be one, but did not challenge, perceiving that he was a privileged person. In Luke (22:56) it is given as a remark made by the maid to one of the bystanders—this man was also with Him." If so expressed in Peter's hearing—drawing upon him the eyes of every one that heard it (as we know it did, Matt. 26:70), and compelling him to answer to it—that would explain the different forms of the report naturally enough. But in such a case this is of no real importance. But he denied—"before all" (Matt. 26:70). saying, I know not, neither understand I what thou sayest—in Luke, "I know Him not." And he went out into the porch—the vestibule leading to the street—no doubt finding the fire-place too hot for him; possibly also with the hope of escaping—but that was not to be, and perhaps he dreaded that, too. Doubtless by this time his mind would be getting into a sea of commotion, and would fluctuate every moment in its resolves. And a maid saw him again—or, "a girl." It might be rendered "the girl"; but this would not necessarily mean the same one as before, but might, and probably does, mean just the female who had charge of the door or gate near which Peter now was. Accordingly, in Matthew 26:71, she is expressly called "another [maid]." But in Luke it is a male servant: "And after a little while (from the time of the first denial) another"—i.e., as the word signifies, "another male" servant. But there is no real difficulty, as the challenge, probably, after being made by one was reiterated by another. Accordingly, in John, it is, "They said therefore unto him . . .," as if more than one challenged him at once. and began to say to them that stood by, This is

67. Then did they spit in his face. This was done as a mark of the most profound contempt. See Job xvi. 10 and xxx. 10; Isa. l. 6; Mic. v. 1. The judges now delivered Him into the hands of the mob. And buffeted him. Smote Him with their fists. "Beat with the hand, the fingers being clenched." Smote him with the palms of their hands. "Smite the cheek with the open hand."

68. Prophesy unto us, thou Christ. Their conduct toward Him now was expressly prophesied of, by a man whose divine mission they did not pretend to deny; see Isa. l. 6. It appears that, before they buffeted Him, they bound up His eyes; see Mark xiv. 65.

69. A damsel came unto him. "A maidservant." Thou also wast with Jesus. What a noble opportunity had Peter now to show his zeal for the insulted cause of truth and his attachment to his Master!

72. And again he denied with an oath. He has told a lie, and he swears to support it. A liar has always some suspicion that his testimony is not credited, for he is conscious of his own falsity, and is therefore naturally led to support his assertions by oaths.

73. Thy speech. "Your manner of speech," "that dialect of yours"—his accent being different from that of Jerusalem. Bewrayeth thee. "Makes you manifest."

74. Then began he to curse and to swear. Rather, "Then he began positively to affirm."

MATTHEW HENRY

was not the judge, nor any of the officers of the court, that charged him with being a disciple of Jesus, but a silly maid or two. How often he repeated it; even after the cock had crowed once he continued in the temptation, and a second and third time relapsed into the sin.

Thus was his sin aggravated; but on the other hand there is this to extenuate it, that, what he said he said in his haste. He fell into the sin by surprise, not as Judas, with design; his heart was against it.

II. Peter's repentance for this sin, v. 75.

1. What it was, that brought Peter to repentance.

(1) The cock crew (v. 74). The word of Christ can put a significancy upon whatever sign he shall please to choose. The crowing of a cock is to Peter instead of a John Baptist, the voice of one calling to repentance. Conscience should be to us as the crowing of the cock, to put us in mind of what we had forgotten. Where there is a living principle of grace in the soul, though for the present overpowered by temptation, a little hint will serve, when God sets in with it, to recover it from a by-path. Here was the crowing of a cock made a happy occasion of the conversion of a soul. Christ comes sometimes in mercy at cock-crowing.

(2) He remembered the words of the Lord; this was it that brought him to himself, a sense of his ingratitude to Christ. Nothing grieves a penitent more than that he has sinned against the grace of the Lord Jesus and the tokens of his love.

2. How his repentance was expressed; He went out, and wept bitterly.

(1) His sorrow was secret; he went out, out of the High Priest's hall, vexed at himself that ever he came into it. He went out into the porch before (v. 71); and if he had gone quite off then, his second and third denial had been prevented; but then he came in again, now he went out and came in no more.

(2) His sorrow was serious; He wept bitterly. Sorrow for sin must not be slight, but great and deep. Those that have sinned sweetly, must weep bitterly; for, sooner or later, sin will be bitterness. This deep sorrow is requisite to evidence that there is a real change of mind. Peter, who wept so bitterly for denying Christ, never denied him again, but confessed him often and openly, and in the mouth of danger. True repentance for any sin will be best evidenced by our abounding in the contrary grace and duty. Some of the ancients say, that as long as Peter lived, he never heard a cock crow but it set him a weeping. Those that have truly sorrowed for sin, will sorrow upon every remembrance of it; yet not so as to hinder, but rather to increase, their joy in God and in his mercy and grace.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

one of them—or, as in Matthew 26:71—"This [fellow] was also with Jesus the Nazarene." And he denied it again—In Luke, "Man, I am not." But worst of all in Matthew—"And again he denied with an oath, I do not know the man" (26:72). This was the Second Denial, more vehement, alas! than the first.

Peter's THIRD DENIAL of His Lord.

And a little after—"about the space of one hour after" (Luke 22:59). they that stood by said again to Peter, Surely thou art one of them: for thou art a Galilean, and thy speech agreeth thereto—"bewrayeth (or "discovereth") thee" (Matt. 26:73). In Luke it is, "Another confidently affirmed, saying, Of a truth this [fellow] also was with him: for he is a Galilean." The Galilean dialect had a more Syrian cast than that of Judea. If Peter had held his peace, this peculiarity had not been observed; but hoping, probably, to put them off the scent by joining in the fireside talk, he was thus discovered. The Fourth Gospel is particularly interesting here: "One of the servants of the high priest, being his kinsman (or kinsman to him) whose ear Peter cut off, saith, Did not I see thee in the garden with Him?" (John 18:26.) No doubt his relationship to Malchus drew his attention to the man who had smitten him, and this enabled him to identify Peter. "Sad reprisals!" exclaims BENGEL. Poor Peter! Thou art caught in thine own toils; but like a wild bull in a net, thou wilt toss and rage, filling up the measure of thy terrible declension by one more denial of thy Lord, and that the foulest of all.

But he began to curse—'anathematize,' or wish himself accursed if what he was now to say was not true. and to swear—or to take a solemn oath. saying, I know not this man of whom ye speak.

And Peter called to mind the word that Jesus said unto him, Before the cock crow twice, thou shalt deny me thrice. And when he thought thereon, he wept—To the same effect is the statement of the First Evangelist (Matt. 26:75), save that like "the beloved physician," he notices the "bitterness" of the weeping. The most precious link, however, in the whole chain of circumstances in this scene is beyond doubt that "look" of deepest, tenderest import reported by Luke alone. Who can tell what lightning flashes of wounded love and piercing reproach shot from that "look" through the eye of Peter into his heart! "And Peter remembered the word of the Lord, how He had said unto him, Before the cock crow, thou shalt deny Me thrice. And Peter went out and wept bitterly." How different from the sequel of Judas' act!

ADAM CLARKE

The cock crew. This animal becomes, in the hand of God, the instrument of awaking the fallen apostle at last to a sense of his fall, danger, and duty.

75. Peter remembered the word of Jesus. Luke says, chap. xxii. 61, "The Lord turned, and looked upon Peter." And wept bitterly. Felt bitter anguish of soul, which evidenced itself by the tears of contrition which flowed plentifully from his eyes. "Let him that standeth take heed lest he fall." Where the mighty have been slain, what shall support the feeble? Only the grace of the almighty God. This transaction is recorded by the inspired penmen: (1) That all may watch unto prayer, and shun the occasions of sin. (2) That if a man be unhappily overtaken in a fault, he may not despair, but cast himself immediately with a contrite heart on the infinite tenderness and compassion of God.

We left Christ in the hands of the chief priests and elders, condemned to die, but they could only show their teeth. The Romans had taken from the Jews the power of capital punishment; they could put no man to death, and therefore early in the morning another council is held, to consider what is to be done.

I. Christ is delivered up to Pilate, that he might execute the sentence they had passed upon him. Pilate is characterized by the Roman writers of that time, as a man of a rough and haughty spirit; the Jews had a great enmity to his person, and were weary of his government, and yet they made use of him as the tool of their malice against Christ.

1. They bound Jesus. Having found him guilty, they tied his hands behind him, as they usually do with convicted criminals. He was already bound with the bonds of love to man, and of his own undertaking, else he had soon broken these bonds, as Samson did his.

2. They led him away in a sort of triumph, led him as a lamb to the slaughter. It was nearly a mile from Caiaphas's house to Pilate's. All that way they led him through the streets of Jerusalem, when in the morning they began to fill, to make him a spectacle to the world.

3. They delivered him to Pontius Pilate; according to that which Christ had often said, that he should be delivered to the Gentiles. Christ was to be the Saviour both of Jews and Gentiles; and therefore Christ was brought into the judgment both of Jews and Gentiles, and both had a hand in his death.

II. The money which they had paid to Judas for betraying Christ, is by him delivered back to them, and Judas, in despair, hangs himself. The chief priests and elders supported themselves with this, in prosecuting Christ, that his own disciple betrayed him to them; but now, in the midst of the prosecution,

CHAPTER 27

Vss. 1-10. JESUS LED AWAY TO PILATE—REMORSE AND SUICIDE OF JUDAS. (= Mark 15:1; Luke 23:1; John 18:28).

Jesus Led Away to Pilate (vss. 1, 2). For the exposition of this portion, see on John 18:28, etc.

Then led they Jesus from Caiaphas to the hall of judgment—but not till "in the morning the chief priests held a consultation with the elders and scribes and the whole council against Him to put Him to death, and bound Him" (Matt. 27:1; and see on Mark 15:1). The word here rendered "hall of judgment" is from the Latin, and denotes 'the palace of the governor of a Roman province.' they themselves went not into the judgment hall lest they should be defiled—by contact with ceremonially unclean Gentiles. but that they might eat the passover—If this refer to the principal part of the festival, the eating of the lamb, the question is, how our Lord and His disciples came to eat it the night before; and, as it was an evening meal, how ceremonial defilement contracted in the morning would unfit them for partaking of it, as after 6 o'clock it was reckoned a new day. These are questions which have occasioned immense research and learned treatises. But as the usages of the Jews appear to have somewhat varied at different times, and our present knowledge of them is not sufficient to clear up all difficulties, they are among the not very important questions which probably will never be entirely solved.

1. When the morning was come. As soon as it was light. Took counsel against Jesus. They had begun this counsel the preceding evening; see chap. xxvi. 59. But as it was contrary to all forms of law to proceed against a person's life by night, they seem to have separated for a few hours, and then, at the break of day, came together again, pretending to conduct the business according to the forms of law. To put him to death. They had already determined His death, and pronounced the sentence of death on Him; chap. xxvi. 66. And now they assemble under the pretense of reconsidering the evidence and deliberating on it, to give the greater appearance of justice to their conduct.

that string failed them, and even he is made to them a witness of Christ's innocency, which served, 1. For glory to Christ in the midst of his sufferings, and a specimen of his victory over Satan who had entered into Judas. 2. For warning to his persecutors, and to leave them the more inexcusable.

(1) See here how Judas repented: not like Peter, who repented, believed, and was pardoned: no, he repented, despaired, and was ruined.

[1] What induced him to repent. It was when he saw that he was condemned. Judas, it is probable, expected that Christ would have made his escape out of their hands, and then Christ would have had the honour, the Jews the shame, and he the money, and no harm done. This he had no reason to expect, because he had so often heard his Master say that he must be crucified. Those who measure actions by the consequences of them rather than by the divine law, will find themselves mistaken in their measures. The way of sin is down-hill; and if we cannot easily stop ourselves, much less can we stop others whom we have set going in a sinful way. He repented himself. When he was tempted to betray his Master, the thirty pieces of silver looked very fine and glittering. But when the thing was done, and the money paid, the silver was become dross. Now his conscience flew in his face; "What have I done! What a fool, what a wretch, am I, to sell my Master for such a trifle! It is owing to me, that he is bound and condemned, spat upon and buffeted. I little thought it would have come to this, when I made that wicked bargain." The remembrance of his Master's goodness to him, steeled his convictions, and made them the more piercing. Now he found his Master's words true; It were better for that man, that he had never been born. Sin will soon change its taste.

[2] What were the indications of his repentance. First, He made restitution; He brought again the thirty pieces of silver to the chief priests. Now the money burned in his conscience, and he was as sick of it as ever he had been fond of it. That which is ill gotten, will never do good to those that get it. If he had repented, and brought the money back before he had betrayed Christ, he might have done it with comfort; but now it was too late, now he cannot do it without horror. What is unjustly gotten, must not be kept; for that is a continuance in the sin by which it was got. He brought it to those from whom he had it, to let them know that he repented his bargain.

Secondly, He made confession (v. 4); I have sinned, in that I have betrayed innocent blood. 1. To the honour of Christ, he pronounces his blood innocent. He, freely and without being urged to it, pronounces him innocent, to the face of those who had pronounced him guilty. 2. To his own shame, he confesses that he had sinned, in betraying this blood. He does not lay the blame on anyone else, but takes it all to himself; "I have sinned, in doing it." Thus far Judas went toward his repentance, yet it was not to salvation. He confessed, but not to God, did not go to him, and say, I have sinned, Father, against heaven.

(2) See here how the chief priests and elders entertained Judas's penitential confession; they said, What is that to us? See thou to that.

[1] See here how carelessly they speak of the betraying of Christ. What is that to us? Was it nothing to them that they had thirsted after this blood, and hired Judas to betray it, and had now condemned it to be shed unjustly?

[2] See here how carelessly they speak the sin of Judas; he said, I have sinned, and they said, "What is that to us? What are we concerned in thy sin, that thou tellest us of it?" It is folly for us to think that the sins of others are nothing to us, especially those sins that we are any way accessory to, or partakers in. The guilt of sin is not so easily transferred as some people think it is. If there were guilt in the matter, they tell Judas that he must look to it, he must bear it. First, Because he had betrayed him to them. His was indeed the greater sin (John xix. 11); but it did not therefore follow, that theirs was no sin. Secondly, Because he knew and believed him to be innocent. "If he be innocent, see thou to it. We have adjudged him guilty, and therefore may justly prosecute him as such." Wicked practices are buoyed up by wicked principles, and particularly by this, That sin is sin only to those that think it to be so; that it is no harm to persecute a good man, if we take him to be a bad man.

[3] See how carelessly they speak of the conviction, terror, and remorse, that Judas was under. They were glad to make use of him in the sin, and were then very fond of him. But now they slighted him, had nothing to say to him, but turned him over to his own terrors. Those that are resolvedly impenitent, look with disdain upon the penitent. When

Remorse and Suicide of Judas (vss. 3-10). This portion is peculiar to Matthew. On the progress of guilt in the traitor, see on Mark 14:1-11; and on John 13:21-30. 3. Then Judas, which had betrayed him, when he saw that he was condemned—The condemnation, even though not unexpected, might well fill him with horror. But perhaps this unhappy man expected, that, while he got the bribe, the Lord would miraculously escape, as He had once and again done before, out of His enemies' power: and if so, his remorse would come upon him with all the greater keenness. repented himself—but, as the issue too sadly showed, it was "the sorrow of the world, which worketh death" (II Cor. 7:10)

—and brought again the thirty pieces of silver to the chief priests and elders—A remarkable illustration of the power of an awakened conscience. A short time before, the promise of this sordid pelf was temptation enough to his covetous heart to outweigh the most overwhelming obligations of duty and love; now, the possession of it so lashes him that he cannot use it, cannot even keep it! 4. Saying, I have sinned in that I have betrayed the innocent blood—What a testimony this to Jesus! Judas had been with Him in all circumstances for three years; his post, as treasurer to Him and the Twelve (John 12:6), gave him peculiar opportunity of watching the spirit, disposition, and habits of his Master; while his covetous nature and thievish practices would incline him to dark and suspicious, rather than frank and generous, interpretations of all that He said and did. If, then, he could have fastened on one questionable feature in all that he had so long witnessed, we may be sure that no such speech as this would ever have escaped his lips, nor would he have been so stung with remorse as not to be able to keep the money and survive his crime. And they said, What is that to us? see thou to that—"Guilty or innocent is nothing to us: We have Him now—begone!" Was ever speech more hellish uttered?

ADAM CLARKE

3. Judas . . . when he saw that he was condemned, repented. There is much of the wisdom and goodness of God to be seen in this part of Judas' conduct. Had our Lord been condemned to death on the evidence of one of His own disciples, it would have furnished infidels with a strong argument against Christ and the Christian religion.

4. Innocent blood. A Hebraism for an "innocent man." What is that to us? What is it? A great deal. You should immediately go and reverse the sentence you have pronounced, and liberate the innocent Person.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

This is the final picture of Judas. What are the things that are impressed upon our mind as we look at him? First, a too-late repentance; secondly, a too-late restitution, the flinging back of the thirty pieces of silver; and finally, an appalling retribution coming upon him by his own hand. Judas appears in this trial scene as one of the band of Christ's own disciples, one of the inner circle. In following this Gospel, we have seen vast multitudes crowding about Him, the rulers and those in authority deeply interested in Him. We have also seen how they gradually fell away, the rulers first, and then the multitudes, until He slowly and solemnly proceeded to the place He occupied in the awful hour of His passion, absolutely alone so far as human friendship was concerned. Judas had been His companion along the highway of His public ministry. He had sat at the table with Him, and had heard those intimate and private conversations. He had been one of the inner circle of souls, loyal to Him, at least by confession and profession. This man was the traitor in the camp, the betrayer of our Lord from the inner circle to the outer circle; as in turn, they of His own nationality became His betrayers to that yet wider circle of Roman power. So by a process of betrayal from the inner circle outward, our Lord was handed over by a member of His own disciples to the foes plotting for His own life and by the members of His own nation to the nation without, which cared nothing for Him, but wholly for themselves.

Many brilliant and interesting attempts have been made to redeem Judas from obloquy, but let us be content to abide by his own conception of what he had done—"I have sinned." Not, I have blundered, or have been mistaken, or foolish, or wrong; not, I have attempted to hurry this Messiah to declare himself, but, "I have sinned." As we look at Judas in that terrible picture, we see a man filled with terror, the terror of a lost soul; the sense of sin, and the dread of its issue. Not regret, not the sense of sin with desire to escape it, but the sense of sin with desire to escape the issue of it. That is not the repentance that brings man to God. If a man simply repents of sin, by attempting to escape its issue, he knows nothing of repentance in the true sense of the word. Repentance which would be glad to bear the fire of hell if it would purge from sin is the repentance that works salvation.—The Gospel According to Matthew they had brought him into the snare, they not only left him, but laughed at him. Sinners, under convictions, will find their old companions in sin, but miserable comforters. It is usual for those that love the treason, to hate the traitor.

(3) Here is the utter despair that Judas was hereby driven into. He grew desperate, v. 5.

[1] He cast down the pieces of silver in the temple. The chief priests would not take the money, for fear of taking thereby the whole guilt to themselves. Judas would not keep it, it was too hot for him to hold, he therefore threw it down in the temple, that, whether they would or no, it might fall into the hands of the chief priests.

[2] He went, and hanged himself. First, He retired, he withdrew into some solitary place. Woe to him that is in despair, and is alone. If Judas had gone to Christ, or to some of the disciples, perhaps he might have had relief, bad as the case was. Secondly, He became his own executioner; He hanged himself Judas had a sight and sense of sin, but no apprehension of the mercy of God in Christ. His sin, we may suppose, was not in its own nature unpardonable: but he concluded, as Cain, that his iniquity was greater than could be forgiven. And some have said, that Judas sinned more in despairing of the mercy of God, than in betraying his Master's blood. He throws himself into the fire, to avoid the flame; but miserable is the case when a man must go to hell for ease 1. We have an instance of the wretched end of those into whom Satan enters, and particularly those that are given up to the love of money. 2. We have an instance of the wrath of God. As in the story of Peter we behold the goodness of God, and the triumphs of Christ's grace in the conversion of some sinners; so in the story of Judas we behold the severity of God. 3. We have an instance of the direful effects of despair; it often ends in self-murder. Let us think as bad as we can of sin, provided we do not think it unpardonable; let us despair of help in ourselves, but not of help in God. And self-murder, though prescribed by some of the heathen moralists, is certainly a remedy worse than the disease, how bad soever the disease may be.

(4) The disposal of the money which Judas brought back, v. 6–10. It was laid out in the purchase of a field, called the potter's field. And this field was to be a burying-place for strangers. It looks like an instance of their humanity, that they took care for the burying of strangers. It was no instance of their humility that they would bury strangers in a place by themselves. Strangers must keep their distance, alive and dead, and that principle must go down to the grave.

This buying of the potter's field took place not long after; for Peter speaks of it soon after Christ's ascension: yet it is here recorded.

First, To show the hypocrisy of the chief priests and elders. They scruple to put that money into the treasury, or corban, of the temple, with which they had hired the traitor. They would not put that money into it, which was the price of blood. The hire of a traitor they thought parallel to the hire of a whore, and the price of a malefactor (such a one they made Christ to be) equivalent to the price of a dog, neither of which was to be brought into the house of the Lord. Thus they that swallowed a camel, strained at a gnat. They think to atone for what they had done, by this public good act of providing a burying-place for strangers, though not at their own charge.

Secondly, To signify the favour intended by the blood of Christ to strangers, and sinners of the Gentiles. Through the price of his blood, a resting place is provided for them after death. The grave is the potter's field, but Christ by his blood purchased it. He has altered the property of it (as a purchaser doth), so that now death is ours, the grave is ours, a bed of rest for us.

Thirdly, To perpetuate the infamy of those that bought and sold the blood of Christ. This field was commonly called Aceldama—the field of blood; not by the chief priests, they hoped in this burying-place to bury the remembrance of their own crime; but by the people. They fastened this name upon the field in perpetuam rei memoriam—for a perpetual memorial.

Fourthly, That we may see how the scripture was fulfilled (v. 9, 10); Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by Jeremy the prophet. The words quoted are found in the prophecy of Zechariah, ch. xi. 12. How they are here said to be spoken by Jeremy is a difficult question. The Syriac version, which is ancient, reads only, It was spoken by the prophet, not naming any. The Jews used to say, The spirit of Jeremiah was in Zechariah. Here that is really acted, which was there but figuratively expressed. The sum of money is the same—thirty pieces of silver; this they weighed for his price, and this was cast to the potter in the house

5. And he cast down the pieces of silver—The sarcastic, diabolical reply which he had got, in place of the sympathy which perhaps he expected, would deepen his remorse into an agony —in the temple—the temple proper, commonly called "the sanctuary," or "the holy place," into which only the priests might enter. How is this to be explained? Perhaps he flung the money in after them. But thus were fulfilled the words of the prophet—"I cast them to the potter in the house of the Lord" (Zech. 11:13)—and departed, and went and hanged himself—See, for the details, on Acts 1:18.

6. And the chief priests took the silver pieces, and said, It is not lawful for to put them into the treasury—"the Corban," or chest containing the money dedicated to sacred purposes (see on ch. 15:5).

because it is the price of blood—How scrupulous now! But those punctilious scruples made them unconsciously fulfil the Scripture.

Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by Jeremy the prophet, saying—(Zech. 11:12, 13). Never was a complicated prophecy, otherwise hopelessly dark, more marvellously fulfilled. Various conjectures have been formed to account for Matthew's ascribing to Jeremiah a prophecy found in the book of Zechariah. But since with this book he was plainly familiar, having quoted one of its most remarkable prophecies of Christ but a few chapters before (ch. 21:4, 5), the question is one more of critical interest than real importance. Perhaps the true explanation is the following, from

ADAM CLARKE

5. In the temple signifies, properly, the Temple itself, into which none but the priests were permitted to enter. "Near the Temple," by the Temple door, where the boxes stood to receive the freewill offerings of the people, for the support and repairs of the sacred edifice. Hanged himself. Or was "strangled." Some eminent critics believe that he was only suffocated by excessive grief, and thus they think the account here given will agree with that in Acts i. 18. I have my doubts. The old method of reconciling the two accounts appears to me quite plausible—he went and strangled himself, and the rope breaking, he fell down; and by the violence of the fall his body was burst, and "his bowels gushed out."

6. The treasury. The place whither the people brought their freewill offerings for the service of the Temple.

7. To bury strangers in. "The strangers," probably meaning, as some learned men conjecture, the Jewish strangers who might have come to Jerusalem, either to worship or on some other business, and died there during their stay.

8. The field of blood. In vain do the wicked attempt to conceal themselves; God makes them instrumental in discovering their own wickedness. Judas, by returning the money, and the priests, by laying it out, raise to themselves an eternal monument—the one of his treachery, the others of their perfidiousness, and both of the innocence of Jesus Christ.

9. Jeremy the prophet. The words quoted here are not found in the prophet Jeremiah, but in Zech. xi. 13. It was ancient custom among the Jews, says Dr. Lightfoot, to divide the Old Testament into three parts. The first beginning with the law was called The Law; the second beginning with the Psalms was called The Psalms; the third beginning with the prophet in question was called Jeremiah. Thus, then, the writings of Zechariah and the other prophets being included in that division that began with Jeremiah, all quotations from it would go under

Universally, this is true, that sooner or later, when the delirium of passion and the rush of temptation are over and we wake to consciousness, we find that we are none the richer for the thing gained, and oh! so infinitely the poorer for the means by which we gained it. It is that old story of the Veiled Prophet that wooed and won the hearts of foolish maidens, and, when he had them in his power in the inner chamber, removed the silver veil which they had thought hid dazzling glory and showed hideous features that struck despair into their hearts. Every man's sin does that for him. And to you I come now with this message: every wrong thing that you do, great or small, will be like some of those hollow images of the gods that one hears of in barbarian temples—looked at in front, fair, but when you get behind them you find a hollow, full of dust and spiders' webs and unclean things.

That is the first lesson that lies in these words of this wretched traitor; but again, here is an awful picture for us of the hell upon earth, of a conscience which has no hope of pardon. I do not suppose that Judas was lost, if he were lost, because he betrayed Jesus Christ, but because, having betrayed Jesus Christ, he never asked to be forgiven. And I suppose that the difference between the traitor who betrayed Him and the other traitor who denied Him was this, that the one, when "he went out and wept bitterly," had the thought of a loving Master with him, and the other, when "he went out and hanged himself," had the thought of nothing but that foul deed glaring before him. I pray you to learn this lesson: you cannot think too much, too blackly, of your own sins, but you may think too exclusively of them, and if you do, they will drive you to madness of despair.

of the Lord; which was here literally accomplished.

The giving of the price of him that was valued, not for him, but for the potter's field, bespeaks, 1. The high value that ought to be put upon Christ. He cannot be valued with the gold of Ophir, nor this unspeakable Gift bought with money. 2. The low value that was put upon him. They of the children of Israel did strangely undervalue him, when his price did but reach to buy a potter's field, a pitiful sorry spot of ground, not worth looking upon. Cast it to the potter, so it is in Zechariah; a contemptible petty chapman, not the merchant that deals in things of value. He gave kings' ransoms for them, but they gave a slave's ransom for him (see Exod. xxi. 32), and valued him but at the rate of a potter's field. But all this was as the Lord appointed.

We have here an account of what passed in Pilate's judgment-hall.

I. The trial Christ had before Pilate.

1. His arraignment; Jesus stood before the governor, as the prisoner before the judge. We could not stand before God because of our sins, if Christ had not been thus made sin for us. He was arraigned that we might be discharged.

2. His indictment; Art thou the king of the Jews? Now they thought that whoever was the Christ, must be the king of the Jews, and must deliver them from the Roman power, and restore to them a temporal dominion. They accused our Lord Jesus, as making himself king of the Jews, in opposition to the Roman yoke. They assuring the governor that, if he made himself Christ, he made himself king of the Jews, the governor takes it for granted, that he goes about to pervert the nation, and subvert the government. Art thou a king?

3. His plea; Jesus said unto him, "Thou sayest. It is as thou sayest, though not as thou meanest; I am a king, but not such a king as thou dost suspect me to be."

4. The evidence (v. 12); He was accused of the chief priests. Pilate found no fault in him; whatever was said, nothing was proved, and therefore what was wanting in matter they made up in noise and violence.

5. The prisoner's silence as to the prosecutors' accusations; He answered nothing. Because there was no occasion; nothing was alleged but what carried its own confutation along with it. His hour was come, and he submitted to his Father's will; Not as I will, but as thou wilt. Pilate pressed him to make some reply (v. 13); Hearest thou not how many things they witness against thee? Pilate, having no malice at all against him, was desirous he should clear himself, urges him to it. He wondered at his silence. Pilate is not said to be angry at it, but to have marvelled greatly at it, as a thing very unusual. He thought it strange that he had not one word to say for himself.

II. The outrage and violence of the people, in pressing the governor to crucify Christ. The chief priests by the power of the mob gained the point which they could not otherwise carry. Now here are two instances of their outrage.

1. Their preferring Barabbas before him, and choosing to have him released rather than Jesus.

(1) It seems it was grown into a custom with the Roman governors, for the humouring of the Jews, to grace the feast of the passover with the release of a prisoner, (v. 15).

(2) The prisoner put in competition with our Lord Jesus was Barabbas; he is here called a notable prisoner (v. 16). Treason, murder, and felony, are the three most enormous crimes that are usually punished by the sword of justice; and Barabbas was guilty of all three, Luke xxiii. 19; John xviii. 40. A notable prisoner indeed, whose crimes were so complicated.

(3) The proposal was made by Pilate the governor (v. 17); Whom will ye that I release unto you? Pilate proposed to them to have Jesus released; he was convinced of his innocency, and that the prosecution was malicious; yet had not the courage to acquit him, as he ought to have done, by his own power, but would have him released by the people's election, and so he hoped to satisfy both his own conscience, and the people too. But such little tricks and artifices as these are the common practice of those that seek more to please men than God. What shall I do then, saith Pilate, with Jesus, who is called Christ? He puts the people in mind of this, that this Jesus, whose release he proposed, was looked upon by some among them as the Messiah.

The reason why Pilate laboured thus to get Jesus discharged was because he knew that for envy the chief priests had delivered him up (v. 18); that it was not his guilt, but his goodness, that they were pro-

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

LIGHTFOOT: "Jeremiah of old had the first place among the prophets, and hereby he comes to be mentioned above all the rest in ch. 16:14; because he stood first in the volume of the prophets [as he proves from the learned DAVID KIMCHI] therefore he is first named. When, therefore, Matthew produceth a text of Zechariah under the name of Jeremy, he only cites the words of the volume of the prophets under his name who stood first in the volume of the prophets. Of which sort is that also of our Saviour (Luke 24:41), "All things must be fulfilled which are written of Me in the Law, and the Prophets, and the Psalms," or the Book of Hagiographa, in which the Psalms were placed first."

11-26. JESUS AGAIN BEFORE PILATE—HE SEEKS TO RELEASE HIM, BUT AT LENGTH DELIVERS HIM TO BE CRUCIFIED. (=Mark 15:1-15; Luke 23:1-25; John 18:28-40). For the exposition, see on Luke 23:1-25, and on John 18:28-40.

Art thou the King of the Jews?—In Luke 23:2 they charge our Lord before Pilate with "perverting the nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar, saying that He Himself is Christ a king." Perhaps this was what occasioned Pilate's question. Jesus answered . . . , Sayest thou this of thyself, or did others tell it thee of me?—an important question for our Lord's case, to bring out whether the word "King" were meant in a political sense, with which Pilate had a right to deal, or whether he were merely put up to it by His accusers, who had no claims to charge Him but such as were of a purely religious nature, with which Pilate had nothing to do.

I find in him no fault—no crime. This so exasperated "the chief priests and elders" that, afraid of losing their prey, they poured forth a volley of charges against Him, as appears from Luke 23:4, 5: on Pilate's affirming His innocence, "they were the more fierce, saying, He stirreth up the people, teaching throughout all Jewry, beginning from Galilee to this place." They see no hope of getting Pilate's sanction to His death unless they can fasten upon Him a charge of conspiracy against the government; and as Galilee was noted for its turbulence (Luke 13:1; Acts 5:37), and our Lord's ministry lay chiefly there, they artfully introduce it to give color to their charge. "And the chief priests accused Him of many things, but He answered nothing (Mark 15.3). Then said Pilate unto Him, Hearest Thou not how many things they witness against Thee? And He answered him to never a word, insomuch that the governor marvelled greatly" (Matt. 27:13, 14). See on Mark 15:3-5. In his perplexity, Pilate, hearing of Galilee, bethinks himself of the expedient of sending Him to Herod, in the hope of thereby further shaking off responsibility in the case. See on Mark 15:6, and on Luke 23:6-12. The return of the prisoner only deepened the perplexity of Pilate, who, "calling together the chief priests, rulers, and people," tells them plainly that not one of their charges against "this man" had been made good, while even Herod, to whose jurisdiction he more naturally belonged, had done nothing to Him: He "will therefore chastise and release him" (Luke 23:13-16). But ye have a custom that I should release one unto you at the passover . . .—See on Mark 15:7-11. "On the typical import of the choice of Christ to suffer, by which Barabbas was set free, see Leviticus 16, particularly vss. 5-10, where the subject is the sin offering on the great day of atonement" [KRAFFT in LUTHARDT].

the name of this prophet. If this be admitted, it solves the difficulty at once.

12. He answered nothing. An answer to such accusations was not necessary; they sufficiently confuted themselves.

14. Marvelled greatly. Silence under calumny manifests the utmost magnanimity. The chief priests did not admire this because it confounded them; but Pilate, who had no interest to serve by it, was deeply affected. This very silence was predicted, Isa. liii. 7.

15. The governor was wont to release. Whence this custom originated among the Jews is not known; probably it was introduced by the Romans themselves, or by Pilate, merely to oblige the Jews, by showing them this public token of respect.

16. A notable prisoner called Barabbas. This person had, a short time before, raised an insurrection in Jerusalem, in which it appears, from Mark xv. 7, some lives were lost. In some MSS. this man has the surname of Jesus.

18. For envy. "Through malice." Then it was his business, as an upright judge, to disperse this mob, and immediately release Jesus. Seeing malice is capable of putting even Christ himself to death, how careful should we be not to let the least spark of it harbor in our breasts! Let it be remembered that malice as often originates from envy as it does from anger.

voked at. Anyone that heard the hosannas with which Christ was but a few days ago brought into Jerusalem, would have thought that Pilate might safely have referred this matter to the commonalty. But it proved otherwise.

(4) While Pilate was thus labouring the matter, he was confirmed in his unwillingness to condemn Jesus, by a message sent him from his wife (v. 19), by way of caution; Have thou nothing to do with that just man, for I have suffered many things this day in a dream because of him. Observe, The special providence of God, in sending this dream to Pilate's wife; it is not likely that she had heard anything, before, concerning Christ. Perhaps she was one of the devout and honourable women, and had some sense of religion. She suffered many things in this dream. It seems that it was a frightful dream, and her thoughts troubled her. See the tenderness and care of Pilate's wife, in sending this caution, thereupon, to her husband; Have nothing to do with that just man. This was an honourable testimony to our Lord Jesus, witnessing for him that he was a just man. When his friends were afraid to appear in defence of him, God made even those that were strangers and enemies, to speak in his favour; when Peter denied him, Judas confessed him; when the chief priests pronounced him guilty of death, Pilate declared he found no fault in him; when the women that loved him stood afar off, Pilate's wife, who knew little of him, showed a concern for him. It was a fair warning to Pilate; Have nothing to do with him. God has many ways of giving checks to sinners in their sinful pursuits, and it is a great mercy to have such checks. It is also our great duty to hearken to them. Pilate's lady sent him this warning, out of the love she had to him; let him take it how he would, she would give him the caution. It is an instance of true love to our friends and relations, to do what we can to keep them from sin; and the nearer any are to us, and the greater affection we have for them, the more solicitous we should be. The best friendship is friendship to the soul.

(5) The chief priests and the elders were busy, all this while, to influence the people in favour of Barabbas, v. 20. They persuaded the multitude that they should ask Barabbas, and destroy Jesus. Thus they managed the mob, who otherwise were well affected to Jesus, and, if they had not been so much at the beck of their priests, would never have done such a preposterous thing as to prefer Barabbas before Jesus. We cannot but look upon these wicked priests with indignation. Great power put into their hands they wretchedly abused, and the leaders of the people caused them to err. We cannot but look upon the deluded people with pity; I have compassion on the multitude, to see them hurried thus violently to so great wickedness.

(6) Being thus over-ruled by the priests, at length they made their choice, v. 21. Whether of the twain (saith Pilate) will ye that I release unto you? He hoped that he had gained his point, to have Jesus released. But, to his great surprise, they said Barabbas. Were ever men that pretended to reason or religion, guilty of such prodigious madness, such horrid wickedness! This was it that Peter charged so home upon them (Acts iii. 14); Ye desired a murderer to be granted to you.

2. Their pressing earnestly to have Jesus crucified, v. 22, 23. Pilate, being amazed at their choice of Barabbas puts it to them, "What shall I do then with Jesus?" They all said, Let him be crucified. That death they desired he might die, because it was looked upon as the most scandalous and ignominious; and they hoped thereby to make his followers ashamed to own him, and their relation to him. Malice and rage made them forget all rules of order and decency, and turned a court of justice into a riotous, tumultuous, and seditious assembly. See what a change was made upon the mind of the populace in a little time: when he rode in triumph into Jerusalem, so general were the acclamations of praise, that one would have thought he had no enemies; but now when he was led in triumph to Pilate's judgment-seat, so general were the outcries of enmity, that one would think he had no friends. Such revolutions are there in this changeable world, through which our way to heaven lies, as our Master's did, by honour and dishonour, by evil report, and good report.

Now, as to this demand, we are further told,

(1) How Pilate objected against it; Why, what evil hath he done? A proper question for a judge to ask before he pass a sentence of death. It is much for the honour of the Lord Jesus, that, though he suffered as an evil-doer, yet neither his judge nor his prosecutors could find that he had done any evil. This repeated assertion of his unspotted innocency, plainly intimates that he died to satisfy for the sins of others;

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

Pilate takes his place on his official seat to wait for, and then to ratify, their vote. In that pause, he perhaps felt some compunction at paltering with justice, which it was Rome's one virtue to administer. How his wife's message would increase his doubt! Was her dream a divine warning, or a mere reflection in sleep of waking thoughts? It is noticeable that Matthew records several dreams which conveyed God's will—for example, to Joseph and to the Magi, and here may be another instance; or some tidings as to Jesus may have reached the lady, though not her husband, and her womanly sense of right may have shaped the dream and given her vivid impressions of the danger of abetting a judicial murder. But Matthew seems to tell of her intervention mainly in order to preserve her testimony to Jesus' innocence, and to point out one more of the fences which Pilate trampled down in his dread of offending the rulers. A wife's message, conveying what both he and she probably regarded as a supernatural warning, was powerless to keep him back from his disgraceful failure of duty.

While he was fighting against the impression of that message, the rulers were busy in the crowd, suggesting the choice of Barabbas. It was perhaps his wife's words that stung him to act at once and have done with his inner conflict. So he calls for the decision of the alternative which he had already submitted. His dignity would suffer if he had to wait longer for an answer. He got it at once, and the unanimous vote was for Barabbas. Probably the rulers had skillfully manipulated the people. The multitude is easily led by demagogues, but, left to itself, its instincts are usually right, though its perception of character is often mistaken. Why was Barabbas preferred? Probably just because he had been cast into prison for sedition, and so was thought to be a good patriot. Popular heroes often win their reputation by very questionable acts, and Barabbas was forgiven his being a murderer for the sake of his being a rebel.

But it was not so much that Barabbas was loved as that Jesus was hated, and it was not the multitude so much as the rulers that hated him. Many of those now shrieking, "Crucify Him!" had shouted "Hosanna!" a day or two before till they were hoarse. The populace was guilty of fickleness, blindness, rashness, too easy credence of the crafty calumnies of the rulers. But a far deeper stain rests on these rulers who had resisted the light, and were now animated by the basest self-interest in the garb of keen regard for the honor of God. There were very different degrees of guilt in the many voices that roared "Barabbas!"

Pilate made one more feeble attempt to save Jesus by asking what was to be done with Him. The question was an ignoble abdication of his judicial office, and perhaps was meant as a salve for his own conscience, and an excuse to his wife, enabling him to say, "I did not crucify Him; they did"—a miserable pretext, the last resort of a weak man, who knew that he was doing a wrong and cowardly thing.

—Expositions of Holy Scripture

ADAM CLARKE

19. I have suffered many things . . . in a dream. There is no doubt that God had appeared unto this woman, testifying the innocence of Christ, and showing the evils which should pursue Pilate if this innocent blood should be shed by his authority.

20. Ask Barabbas. Who had raised an insurrection and committed murder—and to destroy Jesus, who had, during the space of three years and a half, gone about unweariedly, from village to village, instructing the ignorant, healing the diseased, and raising the dead.

22. What shall I do then with Jesus? Showing, hereby, that it was his wish to release Him.

23. What evil hath he done? Pilate plainly saw that there was nothing laid to His charge for which, consistently with the Roman laws, he could condemn Him. But they cried out the more. What strange fury and injustice! They could not answer Pilate's question, What evil hath he done? He had done none, and they knew He had done none; but they were determined on His death.

MATTHEW HENRY

for if it had not been for our transgressions that he was thus wounded, and for our offences that he was delivered up, and that upon his own voluntary undertaking to atone for them, I see not how these extraordinary sufferings of a person that had never thought, said, or done, anything amiss, could be reconciled with the justice and equity of that providence that governs the world, and at least permitted this to be done in it.

(2) How they insisted upon it; They cried out the more, Let him be crucified. They do not go about to show any evil he had done, but, right or wrong, he must be crucified. This unjust judge was wearied by importunity into an unjust sentence, as he in the parable into a just one (Luke xviii. 4, 5), and the cause carried purely by noise.

III. Here is the devolving of the guilt of Christ's blood upon the people and priests.

1. Pilate endeavours to transfer it from himself, v. 24. He sees it to no purpose to contend. What he said, (1) Would do no good; he could prevail nothing. See how strong the stream of lust and rage sometimes is; neither authority nor reason will prevail to give check to it. Nay, (2) It was more likely to do hurt; he saw that rather a tumult was made. This rude and brutish people fell to high words, and began to threaten Pilate what they would do if he did not gratify them. Now this turbulent tumultuous temper of the Jews contributed more than anything to the ruin of that nation not long after; for their frequent insurrections provoked the Romans to destroy them, and their inveterate quarrels among themselves made them an easy prey to the common enemy. Thus their sin was their ruin.

The priests were apprehensive that their endeavours to seize Christ would have caused an uproar, especially on the feast day; but it proved that Pilate's endeavour to save him, caused an uproar, and that on the feast day; so uncertain are the sentiments of the crowd. This puts him into a great strait, betwixt the peace of his own mind, and the peace of the city. Had he steadily and resolutely adhered to the sacred laws of justice, he had not been in any perplexity. A man in whom was found no fault, ought not to be crucified, upon any pretence whatsoever, nor must an unjust thing be done, to gratify any man or company of men in the world. Pilate thinks to trim the matter, and to pacify both the people and his own conscience too, by doing it, and yet disowning it.

Now Pilate endeavours to clear himself from the guilt,

[1] By a sign; He took water, and washed his hands before the multitude; not as if he thought thereby to cleanse himself from any guilt contracted before God, but to acquit himself before the people. He borrowed the ceremony from that law which appointed it to be used for the clearing of the country from the guilt of an undiscovered murder (Deut. xxi. 6, 7); and he used it the more to affect the people with the conviction he was under of the prisoner's innocency.

[2] By a saying; in which, First, He clears himself; I am innocent of the blood of this just person. What nonsense was this, to condemn him, and yet protest that he was innocent of his blood! For men to protest against a thing, and yet to practise it, is only to proclaim that they sin against their consciences. Secondly, He casts it upon the priests and people; "See ye to it"; do you answer it before God and the world. Sin is a brat that nobody is willing to own; and many deceive themselves with this, that they shall bear no blame if they can but find any to lay the blame upon; but it is not so easy a thing to transfer the guilt of sin as many think it is. The priests threw it upon Judas; See thou to it; and now Pilate throws it upon them; See ye to it.

2. The priests and people consented to take the guilt upon themselves; they all said, "His blood be on us, and on our children". They, in the heat of their rage, agreed to it, rather than lose the prey they had in their hands, and cried, His blood be upon us. By this they designed to indemnify Pilate. But those that are themselves bankrupts and beggars will never be admitted security for others. None could bear the sin of others, except him that had none of his own to answer for; it is a bold undertaking, and too big for any creature, to become bound for a sinner to Almighty God. But they did really imprecate wrath and vengeance upon themselves and their posterity. Christ had lately told them, that upon them would come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from that of the righteous Abel; but as if that were too little, they here imprecate upon themselves the guilt of that blood which was more precious than all the rest, and the guilt of which would lie heavier. Observe, How cruel they were in their imprecation. They imprecated the punishment of this sin, not only upon themselves, but upon their

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

The story of Pilate is a story of conscience; and there are these distinct movements in the process: first conscience startled; then conscience struggling; then conscience compromising; and, finally, conscience drugged, silenced! The final revelation of the study is that the man who governs his life simply by conscience is likely to ruin his life.

His conscience was startled by the very presence of Jesus. There would seem to be no other explanation. Pilate was a man never popular, even among his own friends; hard, cold, dispassionate, used to scenes of blood; a man who in all likelihood had risen from the rank of a slave, not immediately, but by succession. The man who rises without the grace of God always becomes the greatest despot when he is given power. But when the priests came to Pilate, bearing that Prisoner, he was a startled man. No such prisoner had stood before him up to that moment. Pilate embodied Roman authority; but here was a Prisoner at the bar, who immediately became the Judge, while the judge became the prisoner. Pilate felt the influence of His stately and quiet affirmation of Kingship. "Art thou the King of the Jews?" which meant to say, "Thou art claiming to be the King of the Jews; it is an absurd position; settle it at once by saying that Thou art not!" But instead of a denial, there was an affirmation. Pilate expected the Prisoner would wish to escape; he found the Prisoner had no desire to escape. Pilate himself would have given anything to escape. His conscience was aroused.

Then we see a man struggling with his conscience. His arguments for Jesus as against the priests, and that last suggestion supposed to be by himself a master-stroke of cleverness, prove this. It was his custom to release a notable prisoner. Barabbas was a man guilty of robbery and murder, and yet a man making claims to free his people. Barabbas means "son of the father" and is a title rather than a name. Some of the ancient manuscripts give the name as Jesus Barabbas. In all probability he had set up messianic claims, on the low level of a material fight and robbery. Pilate saw the difference, and thought that surely these religious men, if driven to choice, would be bound to accept Jesus. So little did Pilate know of priestism! "Which will you have, Jesus which is called Christ, or Barabbas?"

Then there occurred an interval in which the priests persuaded the people to ask for Barabbas; and, as John tells us, in the loneliness of an inner chamber, face to face with Christ, Pilate asked, "What is truth?"

The hidden interview over, the people were ready to answer; and Pilate came with his question, "Which of the two will ye that I release unto you?" They replied, "Barabbas." Then, perplexed, struggling with his conscience, Pilate said, "What then shall I do unto Jesus who is called Christ?" Again the answer came, quick and ready, priest-inspired, "Let him be crucified." And again Pilate asked, "Why, what evil hath he done?" We see how now his conscience was struggling between obedience and expedience; struggling as to whether it would obey the deep conviction concerning the Man in front of him or listen to the clamor of these men, and secure his own position. He knew the subtlety of the priests, he knew full well if he handed Jesus over to freedom, they would complain against him at Rome, that he had committed high treason against Caesar.

Then followed the washing of his hands in water. Judas, a frenzied soul, went back and faced the high priests and said, "I have betrayed innocent blood." Now Pilate said, "I am innocent of the blood of this righteous man; see ye to it."

What next? Conscience drugged. "Then . . . Jesus he scourged and delivered to be crucified."

—The Gospel According to Matthew

ADAM CLARKE

24. Pilate . . . took water, and washed his hands. Thus signifying his innocence. It was a custom among the Hebrews, Greeks, and Latins to wash the hands in token of innocence, and to show that they were pure from any imputed guilt. In case of an undiscovered murder, the elders of that city which was nearest to the place where the dead body was found were required by the law, Deut. xxi. 1-10, to wash their hands over the victim which was offered to expiate the crime, and thus make public protestation of their own innocence.

25. His blood be on us, and on our children. If this Man be innocent, and we put Him to death as a guilty person, may the punishment due to such a crime be visited upon us, and upon our children after us! What a dreadful imprecation! and how literally fulfilled! They were visited with the same kind of punishment; for the Romans crucified them in such numbers when Jerusalem was taken that there was found a deficiency of crosses for the condemned and of places for the crosses.

MATTHEW HENRY

children too. It was madness to pull it upon themselves, but the height of barbarity to entail it on their posterity. See what enemies wicked men are to their own children and families. From the time they imprecated this blood upon them, they were followed with one judgment after another. Yet on some of them, and some of theirs, this blood came, not to condemn them, but to save them; divine mercy, upon their repenting and believing, cut off this entail, and then the promise was again to them, and to their children. God is better to us and ours than we are.

Verses 26–32

I. The sentence passed, and the warrant signed for his execution; and this immediately, the same hour.

1. Barabbas was released; to intimate that Christ was condemned for this purpose, that sinners, even the chief of sinners, might be released; he was delivered up, that we might be delivered. In this unparalleled instance of divine grace, the upright is a ransom for the transgressors, the just for the unjust.

2. Jesus was scourged; this was an ignominious cruel punishment, especially as it was inflicted by the Romans, who were not under the moderation of the Jewish law, which forbade scourgings, above forty stripes.

3. He was then delivered to be crucified; a kind of death used only among the Romans; the manner of it is such, that it seems to be the result of wit and cruelty in combination, to make death in the highest degree terrible and miserable. A cross was set up in the ground, to which the hands and feet were nailed, on which nails the weight of the body hung, till it died of the pain. It was a bloody death, a painful, shameful, cursed death; it was so miserable a death, that merciful princes appointed those who were condemned to it by the law, to be strangled first, and then nailed to the cross.

II. The barbarous treatment which the soldiers gave him. When he was condemned, he ought to have had some time allowed him to prepare for death. There was a law made by the Roman senate that the execution of criminals should be deferred at least ten days after sentence. But there were scarcely allowed so many minutes to our Lord Jesus. The storm continued without any intermission.

When he was delivered to be crucified, that was enough; they that kill the body, yield that there is no more that they can do, but Christ's enemies will do more. His guards set themselves to abuse him. Perhaps it was not so much in spite to him, as to make sport for themselves, that they thus abused him. They understood that he pretended to a crown; to taunt him with that gave them some diversion, and an opportunity to make themselves and one another merry.

Observe, 1. Where this was done—in the common hall. The governor's house, which should have been a shelter to the wronged and abused, is made the theatre of this barbarity. Those in authority will be accountable, not only for the wickedness which they do, or appoint, but for that which they do not restrain.

2. Who were concerned in it. They gathered the whole band, the soldiers that were to attend the execution.

3. What particular indignities were done him.

(1) They stripped him, v. 28. The shame of nakedness came in with sin (Gen. iii. 7).

(2) They put on him a scarlet robe, some old red cloak, such as the Roman soldiers wore, in imitation of the scarlet robes which kings and emperors wore; thus upbraiding him with his being called a King. This sham of majesty they put upon him in his dress, only to expose him to the spectators, as the more ridiculous.

(3) They platted a crown of thorns, and put it upon his head, v, 29. This was to carry on the humour of making him a mock-king; yet, had they intended it only for a reproach, they might have platted a crown of straw, or rushes, but they designed it to be painful to him. Thorns signify afflictions. These Christ put into a crown; so much did he alter the property of them to them that are his, giving them cause to glory in tribulation, and making it to work for them a weight of glory. Christ was crowned with thorns, to show that his kingdom was not of this world, nor the glory of it worldly glory, but is attended here with bonds and afflictions, while the glory of it is to be revealed.

(4) They put a reed in his right hand; this was intended for a mock-sceptre, another of the insignia of the majesty they jeered him with; as if this were a sceptre good enough for such a King. Like sceptre, like kingdom, both weak and wavering, and withering and worthless; but they were quite mistaken, for his throne is for ever and ever.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

Pilate took Jesus and scourged him—in hope of appeasing them. (See on Mark 15:15.) "And the soldiers led Him away into the palace, and they call the whole band" (Mark 15:16)—the body of the military cohort stationed there—to take part in the mock coronation now to be enacted.

27-33. JESUS, SCORNFULLY AND CRUELLY ENTREATED OF THE SOLDIERS, IS LED AWAY TO BE CRUCIFIED. (=Mark 15:16-22; Luke 23:26-31; John 19:2, 17.) For the exposition, see on Mark 15:16-22.

and they put on him a purple robe—in mockery of the imperial purple; first "stripping him" (Matt. 27:28) of His own outer garment. The robe may have been the "gorgeous" one in which Herod arrayed and sent Him back to Pilate (Luke 23:11). "And they put a reed into His right hand" (Matt. 27:29)—in mockery of the regal scepter. "And they bowed the knee before Him" (Matt. 27:29).

. the soldiers platted a crown of thorns, and put it on his head—in mockery of a regal crown.

ADAM CLARKE

26. Scourged Jesus. This is allowed to have been a very severe punishment of itself among the Romans, the flesh being generally cut by the whips used for this purpose. It has been thought that Pilate might have spared this additional cruelty of whipping, but it appears that it was a common custom to scourge those criminals which were to be crucified (see Josephus De Bello, lib. ii, c. 25), and lenity in Christ's case is not to be allowed; He must take all the misery in full tale. Delivered him to be crucified. Tacitus, the Roman historian, mentions the death of Christ in very remarkable terms: "Nero put those who commonly went by the name of Christians to the most exquisite tortures. The author of this name was Christ, who was capitally punished in the reign of Tiberius, by Pontius Pilate the Procurator."

27. The common hall. Or praetorium. Called so from the praetor, a principal magistrate among the Romans, whose business it was to administer justice in the absence of the consul.

28. Stripped him. Took off His mantle, or upper garment. A scarlet robe. Or, according to Mark and John, a purple robe, such as emperors and kings wore.

29. A crown of thorns. It does not appear that this crown was intended to be an instrument of punishment or torture to His head, but rather to render Him ridiculous; for which cause also they put a reed in His hand, by way of sceptre, and bowed their knees, pretending to do Him homage. The crown was not probably of thorns in our sense of the word; there are eminently learned men who think that the crown was formed of the herb acanthus. This, however, is a prickly plant, though nothing like thorns in the common meaning of that word. Painters, the worst of all commentators, frequently represent Christ with a crown of long thorns, which one standing by is striking into His head with a stick. These representations engender ideas both false and absurd.

MATTHEW HENRY

(5) They bowed the knee before him, and mocked him, saying, Hail, King of the Jews! Having made him a sham King, they thus make a jest of doing homage to him, thus ridiculing his pretensions to sovereignty.

(6) They spit upon him; thus he had been abused in the High Priest's hall, ch. xxvi. 67. In doing homage, the subject kissed the sovereign, in token of his allegiance; but they, in this mock-homage, instead of kissing him, spit in his face. It is strange that the sons of men should ever do such a piece of villainy, and that the Son of God should ever suffer such a piece of ignominy.

(7) They took the reed, and smote him on the head. That which they had made the mock-ensign of his royalty, they now make the real instrument of their cruelty, and his pain. They smote him, it is probable, upon the crown of thorns, and so struck them into his head, which made the most sport for them, to whom his pain was the greatest pleasure. All this misery and shame he underwent, that he might purchase for us everlasting life, and joy, and glory.

III. The conveying of him to the place of execution. After they had mocked and abused him, as long as they thought fit, they then took the robe off from him; and they put his own raiment on him, because that was to fall to the soldiers' share, that were employed in the execution. No mention is made of their taking off the crown of thorns, whence it is commonly supposed (though there is no certainty of it) that he was crucified with that on his head.

1. They led him away to be crucified; he was led as a lamb to the slaughter, as a sacrifice to the altar. We may well imagine how they hurried him on, and dragged him along, with all the speed possible. They led him away out of the city; for Christ, that he might sanctify the people with his own blood, suffered without the gate (Heb. xiii. 12).

2. They compelled Simon of Cyrene to bear his cross, v. 32. It seems, at first he carried the cross himself. And this was intended, as other things, both for pain and shame to him. But after a while they took the cross off from him, either, (1) In compassion to him, because they saw it was too great a load for him. We can hardly think that they had any consideration of that. But, (2) Perhaps it was because he could not, with the cross on his back, go forward so fast as they would have him. Or, (3) They were afraid, lest he should faint away under the load of his cross, and die, and so prevent what their malice further intended to do against him. Taking the cross off from him, they compelled one Simon of Cyrene to bear it. It was a reproach, and none would do it but by compulsion. Some think that this Simon was a disciple of Christ, at least a well-wisher to him, and that they knew it, and therefore put this upon him. All that will approve themselves disciples indeed, must follow Christ, bearing his cross.

We have here the crucifixion of our Lord Jesus.

I. The place where our Lord Jesus was put to death.

1. They came to a place called Golgotha, near adjoining to Jerusalem, probably the common place of execution. But now in the same place where criminals were sacrificed to the justice of the government, was our Lord Jesus sacrificed to the justice of God. Some think that it was called the place of a skull, because it was the common charnel-house, where the bones and skulls of dead men were laid together out of the way, lest people should touch them, and be defiled thereby. When by dying Christ would destroy death, he added this circumstance of honour to his victory, that he triumphed over death upon his own dunghill.

2. There they crucified him (v. 35), nailed his hands and feet to the cross, and then reared it up, and him hanging on it; for so the manner of the Romans was to crucify. Let our hearts be touched with the feeling of that exquisite pain which our blessed Saviour now endured. And when we behold what manner of death he died, let us in that behold with what manner of love he loved us.

II. The barbarous and abusive treatment they gave him. As if death, so great a death, were not bad enough, they contrived to add to the bitterness and terror of it.

1. By the drink they provided for him before he was nailed to the cross, v. 34. It was usual to have a cup of spiced wine for those to drink of, that were to be put to death. But with that cup which Christ was to drink of, they mingled vinegar and gall, to make it sour and bitter. He tasted thereof, and so had the worst of it, took the bitter taste into his mouth; now he was tasting death in its full bitterness.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

And said, Hail, King of the Jews!—doing Him derisive homage, in the form used on approaching the emperors. "And they spit upon Him, and took the reed and smote Him on the head" (Matt. 27:30). The best comment on these affecting details is to cover the face.

Cyrenian—of Cyrene, in Libya, on the north coast of Africa, where were many Jews who had a synagogue at Jerusalem (Acts 6:9, and see 2:10). He was "the father of Alexander and Rufus" (Mark 15:21), probably better known afterwards than himself, as disciples. (See Rom. 16:13.) out of the country—and casually drawn into that part of the crowd. laid the cross—"Him they compel to bear His cross," (Matt. 27:32)—sweet compulsion, if it issued in him or his sons voluntarily "taking up their cross!" It would appear that our Lord had first to bear His own cross (John 19:17), but being from exhaustion unable to proceed, it was laid on another to bear it "after Him."

34-50. CRUCIFIXION AND DEATH OF THE LORD JESUS. (=Mark 15:25-37; Luke 23:33-46; John 19:18-30). For the exposition, see on John 19:18-30.

And he bearing his cross—(See on Luke 23:26). went forth—Cf. Hebrews 13:11-13, "without the camp"; "without the gate." On arriving at the place, "they gave Him vinegar to drink mingled with gall [wine mingled with myrrh, Mark 15:23], and when He had tasted thereof, He would not drink" (Matt. 27:34). This potion was stupefying, and given to criminals just before execution, to deaden the sense of pain.

Fill high the bowl, and spice it well, and pour
The dews oblivious: for the Cross is sharp,
The Cross is sharp, and He
Is tenderer than a lamb.
[KEBLE]

But our Lord would die with every faculty clear, and in full sensibility to all His sufferings.

Thou wilt feel all, that Thou may'st pity all;
And rather would'st Thou wrestle with strong pain
Than overcloud Thy soul,
So clear in agony,
Or lose one glimpse of Heaven before the time,
O most entire and perfect Sacrifice,
Renewed in every pulse.
[KEBLE]

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

Even as Isaiah had prophesied: "I gave my back to the smiters, and my cheeks to them that plucked off the hair; I hid not my face from shame and spitting." An old writer says concerning this shameful spitting, "What couldest thou have found on earth more vile and loathsome in order to thy abasement than that man should spit on thee? and this, moreover, with such railing and insult, as though thou wert the pest of mankind, a blasphemer and an outcast unworthy of the merest decencies of life! What, Lord, was there in thee to be loathed? Why, then, do they thus contemn and spit upon thee? Oh, my God, it is my due, not thine! Truly do I, Lord, deserve to be spitted on by every creature, as a vile and harmful thing, a wretched sinner, unworthy to live; but thou, Infinite Mercy, dost promote me to honor, dost spare me, and, for my sake, dost yield up the majesty of thy person and thy divine countenance to be humbled by such loathsome affronts and insults!"
—Spurgeon's Devotional Bible

ADAM CLARKE

32. A man of Cyrene . . . him they compelled to bear his cross. In John, chap. xix. 16-17, we are told Christ himself bore the Cross, and this it is likely He did for a part of the way; but, being exhausted with the scourging and other cruel usage which He had received, He was found incapable of bearing it alone. Therefore they obliged Simon, not, I think, to bear it entirely, but to assist Christ, by bearing a part of it. It was a constant practice among the Romans to oblige criminals to bear their crosses to the place of execution, insomuch that Plutarch makes use of it as an illustration of the misery of vice. "Every kind of wickedness produces its own particular torment, just as every malefactor, when he is brought forth to execution, carries his own cross."

33. A place called Golgotha. From the Hebrew golgoleth, "a skull," probably so called from the many skulls of those who had suffered crucifiion and other capital punishments scattered up and down in the place. It is the same as Calvary, Calvaria, i.e., calvi capitis area, the place of bare skulls. Some think the place was thus called because it was in the form of a human skull. It is likely that it was the place of public execution.

34. They gave him vinegar to drink mingled with gall. Perhaps gall signifies no more than bitters of any kind. It was a common custom to administer a stupefying potion compounded of sour wine, which is the same as vinegar, frankincense, and myrrh to condemned persons to help to alleviate their sufferings or so disturb their intellect that they might not be sensible

He would not drink it, because he would not have the best of it; would have nothing like an opiate to lessen his sense of pain, for he would die so as to feel himself die.

2. By the dividing of his garments, v. 35. When they nailed him to the cross, they stripped him of his garments. If we be at any time stripped of our comforts for Christ, let us bear it patiently; he was stripped for us. Enemies may strip us of our clothes, but cannot strip us of our best comforts; cannot take from us the garments of praise. The clothes of those that are executed are the executioner's fee: four soldiers were employed in crucifying Christ, and they must each of them have a share; his upper garment, if it were divided, would be of no use to any of them, and therefore they agreed to cast lots for it. Perhaps they had heard of those that had been cured by touching the hem of his garment, and they thought it valuable for some magic virtue in it. Or, It was for diversion; to pass away the time while they waited for his death, they would play a game at dice for the clothes. but, whatever they designed, the word of God is herein accomplished. In that famous psalm, the first words of which Christ made use of upon the cross, it was said, They parted my garment among them, and cast lots upon my vesture, Ps. xxii. 18. Christ stripped himself of his glories, to divide them among us.

They now sat down, and watched him, v. 36. But Providence so ordered it, that those who were appointed to watch him, thereby became unexceptionable witnesses for him; having the opportunity to see and hear that which extorted from them that noble confession (v. 54), Truly this was the Son of God.

3. By the title set up over his head, v. 37. It was usual not only by a crier to proclaim before them, but by a writing also over their heads to notify what was the crime for which they suffered; so they set up over Christ's head his accusation written, This is Jesus the King of the Jews. Here was no crime alleged against him. It is not said that he was a pretended Saviour, or a usurping King, but, This is Jesus, a Saviour; surely that was no crime; and, This is the King of the Jews; nor was that a crime; for they expected that the Messiah should be so. Here was a very glorious truth asserted concerning him—that he is Jesus the King of the Jews, that King whom the Jews expected and ought to have submitted to. Pilate, instead of accusing Christ as a Criminal, proclaimed him a King, and that three times, in three inscriptions. Thus God makes men to serve his purposes, quite beyond their own.

4. By his companions with him in suffering, v. 38. There were two thieves crucified with him at the same time, in the same place, under the same guard; two highway-men, or robbers upon the road, as the word properly signifies. It is probable that this was appointed to be execution-day. However it was, the scripture was fulfilled in it (Isa. liii. 12), He was numbered with the transgressors.

(1) It was a reproach to him, that he was crucified with them. He was made to partake with the vilest malefactors in their plagues, as if he had been a partaker with them in their sins. He was, at his death, numbered among the transgressors, that we, at our death, might be numbered among the saints.

(2) It was an additional reproach, that he was crucified in the midst, between them, as if he had been the worst of the three, the principal malefactor; for among three the middle is the place for the chief. Every circumstance was contrived to his dishonour, as if the great Saviour were of all others the greatest sinner. It was also intended to ruffle and discompose him, in his last moments, with the shrieks, and groans, and blasphemies, of these malefactors. But thus would Christ affect himself with the miseries of sinners, when he was suffering for their salvation.

5. By the blasphemies and revilings with which they loaded him when he was hanging upon the cross. One would have thought that, when they had nailed him to the cross, they had done their worst. A dying man, though an infamous man, should be treated with compassion. For aught that appears, not one of his friends, who the other day cried Hosanna to him, durst be seen to show him any respect.

(1) The common people, that passed by, reviled him. His extreme misery and exemplary patience under it, did not make them to relent; but they who by their outcries brought him to this, now think to justify themselves in it by their reproaches, as if they did well to condemn him. They reviled him.

[1] The persons that reviled him; they that passed by, the travellers that went along the road; they were possessed with prejudices against him by the reports and clamours of the High Priest's creatures. It is a hard thing to keep up a good opinion of persons and things that are everywhere run down,

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

Then the soldiers, when they had crucified Jesus, took his garments, and made four parts; to every soldier—the four who nailed Him to the cross, and whose perquisite they were. a part, and also his coat—the Roman tunic, or close-fitting vest. without seam, woven from the top throughout—"perhaps denoting considerable skill and labor as necessary to produce such a garment, the work probably of one or more of the women who ministered in such things unto Him, Luke 8:3" [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. Let us not rend it, but cast lots . . ., whose it shall be, that the scripture might be fulfilled which saith, They parted my raiment among them; and for my vesture they did cast lots . . . (Psalm 22:18). That a prediction so exceedingly specific—distinguishing one piece of dress from others, and announcing that while those should be parted amongst several, that should be given by lot to one person—that such a prediction should not only be fulfilled to the letter, but by a party of heathen military, without interference from either the friends of the enemies of the Crucified One, is surely worthy to be ranked among the wonders of this all-wonderful scene.

Pilate wrote a title, and put it on the cross . . . Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews . . . and it was written in Hebrew—or Syro-Chaldaic, the language of the country—and Greek—the current language—and Latin—the official language. These were the chief languages of the earth, and this secured that all spectators should be able to read it. Stung by this, the Jewish ecclesiastics entreat that it may be so altered as to express, not His real dignity, but His false claim to it. But Pilate thought he had yielded quite enough to them; and having intended expressly to spite and insult them by this title, for having got him to act against his own sense of justice, he peremptorily refused them. And thus, amidst the conflicting passions of men, was proclaimed, in the chief tongues of mankind, from the Cross itself and in circumstances which threw upon it a lurid yet grand light, the truth which drew the Magi to His manger, and will yet be owned by all the world!

they crucified him, and two others with him—"malefactors" (Luke 23:33), "thieves" (rather "robbers," Matt. 27:38; Mark 15:27). on either side one and Jesus in the midst—a hellish expedient, to hold Him up as the worst of the three. But in this, as in many other of their doings, "the scripture was fulfilled, which saith (Isa. 53:12), And he was numbered with the transgressors"—(Mark 15: 28)—though the prediction reaches deeper.

of them. Some person, out of kindness, appears to have administered this to our blessed Lord; but He, as in all other cases, determining to endure the fullness of pain, refused to take what was thus offered to Him, choosing to tread the winepress alone.

35. And they crucified him. Crucifixion properly means the act of nailing or tying to a cross. The cross was made of two beams, either crossing at the top at right angles, like a T, or in the middle of their length, like an X. There was, besides, a piece on the center of the transverse beam, to which the accusation or statement of the crime of the culprit was attached, and a piece of wood which projected from the middle, on which the person sat, as on a sort of saddle, and by which the whole body was supported. It was probably the Romans who introduced it among the Jews. Before they became subject to the Romans, they used hanging or gibbeting, but not the cross. This punishment was the most dreadful of all others, for both the shame and the pain of it; and so scandalous that it was inflicted as the last mark of detestation upon the vilest of people. It was the punishment of robbers and murderers, provided they were slaves; but if they were free, it was thought too infamous a punishment for such, let their crimes be what they might. The body of the criminal was fastened to the upright beam, by nailing or tying the feet to it, and on the transverse piece by nailing, and sometimes tying the hands to it. The anguish occasioned by crucifixion was so intense that crucio, among the Romans, was the common word by which they expressed suffering and torment in general. And parted his garments, casting lots. These were the Roman soldiers who had crucified Him; and it appears from this circumstance that in those ancient times the spoils of the criminal were claimed by the executioners, as they are to the present day. It appears that they divided a part, and cast lots for the rest; viz., for His seamless coat, John xix. 23-24. That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, [saying], They parted my garments among them, and upon my vesture did they cast lots. The whole of this quotation should be omitted, as making no part originally of the genuine text of this Evangelist. It is omitted by almost every MS. of worth and importance, by almost all the versions, and the most reputable of the primitive fathers, who have written or commented on the place. The words are plainly an interpolation, borrowed from John xix. 24, in which place they will be properly noticed.

36. They watched him. To prevent His disciples or relatives from taking away the body or affording any relief to the Sufferer.

37. His accusation. It was a common custom to affix a label to the cross, giving a statement of the crime for which the person suffered. It is with much propriety that Matthew calls this accusation, for it was false that Christ ever pretended to be King of the Jews in the sense the inscription held forth. He was accused of this, but there was no proof of the accusation; however it was affixed to the Cross. From John xix. 21 we find that the Jews wished this to be a little altered: "Write," said they, "that he said, I am King of the Jews," thus endeavoring by the addition of a vile lie to countenance their own conduct in putting Him to death. But this Pilate refused to do. Both Luke, chap. xxiii. 38, and John, chap. xix. 20, say that this accusation was written in Greek, Latin, and Hebrew.

38. Two thieves. "Robbers," or cutthroats, men who had committed robbery and murder; for it does not appear that persons were crucified for robbery only. Thus was our Lord "numbered" (His name enrolled, placed as it were in the death warrant) "with the transgressors," according to the prophetic declaration, Isa. liii. 12, and the Jews placed Him between these two, perhaps to intimate that He was the worst felon of the three.

and spoken against. Every one is apt to say as the most say, and to throw a stone at that which is put into an ill name.

[2] The gesture they used, in contempt of him—wagging their heads; which signifies their triumph in his fall, and their insulting over him.

[3] The taunts and jeers they uttered. These are here recorded.

First, They upbraided him with his destroying of the temple. They industriously spread it among the people, to bring an odium upon him, that he had a design to destroy the temple; than which nothing would more incense the people against him. "Thou that destroyest the temple, that vast and strong fabric, try thy strength now in plucking up that cross, and drawing those nails, and so save thyself; if thou hast the power thou hast boasted of, this is a proper time to exert it, and give proof of it." He was crucified in weakness (2 Cor. xiii. 4), so it seemed to them; but indeed Christ crucified is the Power of God.

Secondly, They upbraided him with his saying that he was the Son of God; If thou be so, say they, come down from the cross. Now they take the devil's words out of his mouth, with which he tempted him in the wilderness (ch. iv. 3, 6), and renew the same assault; If thou be the Son of God. They think that now, or never, he must prove himself to be the Son of God; forgetting that he had proved it by the miracles he wrought; and unwilling to wait for the complete proof of it by his own resurrection, to which he had so often referred. This comes of judging things by the present aspect of them, without a due remembrance of what is past, and a patient expectation of what may further be produced.

(2) The chief priests and scribes, v. 41. They did not think it enough to invite the rabble to do it. They should have been in the temple at their devotion, for it was the first day of the feast of unleavened bread. but they were here at the place of execution, spitting their venom at the Lord Jesus. Did they disparage themselves thus, to do despite to Christ, and shall we be afraid of disparaging ourselves, by joining with the multitude to do him honour?

Two things the priests and elders upbraided him with.

[1] That he could not save himself, v. 42. First, They take it for granted that he could not save himself, and therefore had not the power he pretended to, when really he would not save himself, because he would die to save us. Secondly, They would insinuate that, because he did not now save himself, therefore all his pretence to save others was but sham and delusion. Thirdly, They upbraid him with being the King of Israel. Many people would like the King of Israel well enough, if he would but come down from the cross. But the matter is settled; if no cross, then no Christ, no crown. Those that would reign with him, must be willing to suffer with him, for Christ and his cross are nailed together in this world. Fourthly, They challenged him to come down from the cross. But his unchangeable love and resolution set him above, and fortified him against, this temptation, so that he did not fail, nor was discouraged. Fifthly, They promised that, if he would come down from the cross, they would believe him. When they had formerly demanded a sign, he told them that the sign he would give them, should be not his coming down from the cross, but, which was a greater instance of his power, his coming up from the grave. But to promise ourselves that we would believe, if we had such and such means and motives of faith as we ourselves would prescribe, is not only a gross instance of the deceitfulness of our hearts, but the sorry refuge, or subterfuge rather, of an obstinate destroying infidelity.

[2] That God, his Father, would not save him (v. 43); He trusted in God, for he said, I am the Son of God. Those who call God Father, and themselves his children, thereby profess to put a confidence in him, Ps. ix. 10. Now they suggest, that he did but deceive himself and others; for, if he had been the Son of God he would not have been abandoned to all this misery, much less abandoned in it. It was intended, First, To vilify him, and to make the standers-by think him a deceiver and an imposter. Secondly, To terrify him, and drive him to distrust and despair of his Father's power and love.

(3) To complete the reproach, the thieves also that were crucified with him were not only not reviled as he was, as if they had been saints compared with him, but cast the same in his teeth; that is, one of them did, who said, If thou be the Christ, save thyself and us, Luke xxiii. 39. One would think that of all people this thief had least cause, and should have had least mind, to banter Christ.

Well, thus our Lord Jesus having undertaken to satisfy the justice of God for the wrong done him in

Now come the mockeries, and from four different quarters:—(1) "And they that passed by reviled Him, wagging their heads" in ridicule (Ps. 22:7; 109:25; cf. Jer. 18:16; Lam. 2:15). "Ah!"—'Ha,' an exclamation here of derision. "Thou that destroyest the temple, and buildest it in three days, save Thyself and come down from the cross" (Matt. 27:39, 40; Mark 15:29, 30). "It is evident that our Lord's saying, or rather this perversion of it (for He claimed not to destroy, but to rebuild the temple destroyed by them) had greatly exasperated the feeling which the priests and Pharisees had contrived to excite against Him. It is referred to as the principal fact brought out in evidence against Him on the trial (cf. Acts 6:13, 14), as an offense for which He deserved to suffer. And it is very remarkable that now while it was receiving its real fulfilment, it should be made more public and more impressive by the insulting proclamation of His enemies. Hence the importance attached to it after the resurrection, ch. 2:22" [WEBSTER and WILKINSON].

(2) "Likewise also the chief priests, mocking Him, with the scribes and elders, said, He saved others, Himself He cannot save." There was a deep truth in this, as in other taunts; for both He could not do, having "come to give His life a ransom for many." No doubt this added an unknown sting to the reproach. "If He be the king of Israel, let Him now come down from the cross, and we will believe Him." No, they would not; for those who resisted the evidence from the resurrection of Lazarus, and from His own resurrection, were beyond the reach of any amount of merely external evidence. "He trusted in God that He would deliver him; let Him deliver Him now if He will have Him [or 'delight in Him,] cf. Ps. 18:19; Deut. 21:14]; for He said, I am the Son of God" (Matthew 27:41-43). We thank you, O ye chief priests, scribes, and elders, for this triple testimony, unconsciously borne by you, to our Christ: first to His habitual trust in God, as a feature in His character so marked and palpable that even ye found upon it your impotent taunt; next, to His identity with the Sufferer of the 22d Psalm, whose very words (vs. 8) ye unwittingly appropriate, thus serving yourselves heirs to the dark office and impotent malignity of Messiah's enemies; and again, to the true sense of that august title which He took to Himself, "THE SON OF GOD," which He rightly interpreted at the very first (see on ch. 5:18) as a claim to that oneness of nature with Him, and dearness to Him, which a son has to his father. (3) "And the soldiers also mocked Him, coming to Him and offering Him vinegar, and saying, If thou be the king of the Jews, save Thyself" (Luke 23:36, 37). They insultingly offer to share with Him their own vinegar, or sour wine, the usual drink of Roman soldiers, it being about the time of their midday meal. In the taunt of the soldiers we have one of those undesigned coincidences which so strikingly verify these historical records. While the ecclesiastics deride Him for calling Himself, "the Christ, the King of Israel, the Chosen, the Son of God," the soldiers, to whom all such phraseology was mere Jewish jargon, make sport of Him as a pretender to royalty ("KING of the Jews"), an office and dignity which it belonged to them to comprehend. "The thieves also, which were crucified with Him, cast the same in His teeth" (Matt. 27:44; Mark 15: 32). Not both of them, however, as some commentators unnaturally think we must understand these words; as if some sudden change came over the penitent one, which turned him from an unfeeling railer into a trembling petitioner. The plural "thieves" need not denote more than the quarter or class whence came this last and cruelest taunt—i.e., 'Not only did scoffs proceed from the passers-by, the ecclesiastics, the soldiery, but even from His fellow sufferers,' a mode of speaking which no one would think necessarily meant both of them. Cf. Matthew 2:20, "They are dead which sought the child's life," meaning Herod; and Mark 9:1, "There be some standing here," where it is next to certain that only John, the youngest and last survivor of his honour by sin, he did it by suffering in his honour; by submitting to the utmost indignity that could be done to the worst of men; because he was made sin for us, he was thus made a curse for us.

III. We have here the frowns of heaven, which our Lord Jesus was under, in the midst of all these injuries and indignities from men. Concerning which, observe,

1. How this was signified—by an extraordinary and miraculous eclipse of the sun, which continued for three hours, v. 45. An extraordinary light gave intelligence of the birth of Christ (ch. ii. 2), and therefore it was proper that an extraordinary darkness should notify his death, for he is the Light of the world. This surprising, amazing, darkness was designed to stop the mouths of those blasphemers, who were reviling Christ as he hung on the cross. Though their hearts were not changed, yet they were silent, and stood doubting what this should mean, till after three hours the darkness scattered, and then (as appears by v. 47), like Pharaoh when the plague was over, they hardened their hearts. But that which was principally intended in this darkness, was, (1) Christ's present conflict with the powers of darkness. He fights them on their own ground; gives them all the advantage they could have against him by this darkness, lets them take the wind and sun, and yet baffles them, and so becomes more than a conqueror. (2) His present want of heavenly comforts. This darkness signified that dark cloud which the human soul of our Lord Jesus was now under. God makes his sun to shine upon the just and upon the unjust; but even the light of the sun was withheld from our Saviour, when he was made sin for us. When earth denied him a drop of cold water, heaven denied him a beam of light; having to deliver us from utter darkness, he did himself, in the depth of his sufferings, walk in darkness, and had no light. During the three hours that this darkness continued, we do not find that he said one word, but passed this time in a silent retirement into his own soul. Never were there three such hours since the day that God created man upon the earth, never such a dark and awful scene; the crisis of that great affair of man's redemption and salvation.

2. How he complained of it (v. 46); About the ninth hour, when it began to clear up, after a long and silent conflict. Jesus cried, Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani. The words are related in the Syriac tongue, in which they were spoken, for the sake of the perverse construction which his enemies put upon them, in putting Elias, for Eli. Now observe here,

(1) Whence he borrowed this complaint—from Ps. xxii. 1. This, and that other word, Into thy hands I commit my spirit, he fetched from David's psalms; to teach us of what use the word of God is to us, to direct us in prayer, which will help our infirmities.

(2) How he uttered it—with a loud voice; which bespeaks the extremity of his pain and anguish, the strength of nature remaining in him, and the great earnestness of his spirit in this expostulation.

(3) What the complaint was—My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken me? A strange complaint to come from the mouth of our Lord Jesus, who we are sure, was one in whom he was always well pleased. The Father now loved him, nay, he knew that therefore he loved him, because he laid down his life for the sheep; what, and yet forsaken of him, and in the midst of his sufferings too! Surely never sorrow was like unto that sorrow which extorted such a complaint as this. No wonder that such a complaint as this made the earth to quake, and rent the rocks.

Note, [1] That our Lord Jesus was, in his sufferings, for a time, forsaken by his Father. So he saith himself, who we are sure was under no mistake concerning his own case. Not as if there were any abatement of his Father's love to him, or his to his Father; but his Father forsook him. He delivered him up into the hands of his enemies, and did not appear to deliver him out of their hands. No angel is sent from heaven to deliver him, no friend on earth raised up to appear for him. When his soul was first troubled, he had a voice from heaven to comfort him (John xii. 27, 28); when he was in his agony in the garden, there appeared an angel from heaven strengthening him; but now he had neither the one nor the other. God hid his face from him. Christ was made Sin for us, a Curse for us; and therefore, though God loved him as a Son, he frowned upon him as a Surety.

[2] That Christ's being forsaken of his Father was the most grievous of his sufferings. Here he laid the most doleful accents. When his Father stood at a distance, he cried out thus; for this was it that put wormwood and gall into the affliction and misery.

[3] That our Lord Jesus, even when he was thus forsaken of his Father, kept hold of him as his God, the apostles, is meant. And is it conceivable that this penitent thief should have first himself reviled the Saviour, and then, on his views of Christ suddenly changing, he should have turned upon his fellow sufferer and fellow reviler, and rebuked him not only with dignified sharpness, but in the language of astonishment that he should be capable of such conduct? Besides, there is a deep calmness in all that he utters, extremely unlike what we should expect from one who was the subject of a mental revolution so sudden and total. On the scene itself, see on Luke 23:29-43.

Now occurred the supernatural darkness, recorded by all the other Evangelists, but not here. "Now from the sixth hour (12, noon) there was darkness over all the land unto the ninth hour" (Matt. 27: 45). No ordinary eclipse of the sun could have occurred at this time, it being then full moon, and this obscuration lasted about twelve times the length of any ordinary eclipse. (Cf. Exod. 10:21, 23). Beyond doubt, the divine intention of the portent was to invest this darkest of all tragedies with a gloom expressive of its real character.

"And about the ninth hour Jesus cried, ELI, ELI, LAMA SABACTHANI ... My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" (Matt. 27:46). As the darkness commenced at the sixth hour, the second of the Jewish hours of prayer, so it continued till the ninth hour, the hour of the evening sacrifice, increasing probably in depth, and reaching its deepest gloom at the moment of this mysterious cry, when the flame of the one great "Evening Sacrifice" was burning fiercest. The words were made to His hand. They are the opening words of a Psalm (the 22d) full of the last "sufferings of Christ and the following glories" (I Pet. 1:11). "FATHER," was the cry in the first prayer which He uttered on the cross, for matters had not then come to the worst. "Father" was the cry of His last prayer, for matters had then passed their worst. But at this crisis of His sufferings, "Father" does not issue from His lips, for the light of a Father's countenance was then mysteriously eclipsed. He falls back, however, on a title expressive of His official relation, which, though lower and more distant in itself, yet when grasped in pure and naked faith was mighty in its claims, and rich in psalmodic associations. And what deep earnestness is conveyed by the redoubling of this title! But as for the cry itself, it will never be fully comprehended. An absolute desertion is not indeed to be thought of; but a total eclipse of the felt sense of God's presence it certainly expresses. It expresses surprise, as under the experience of something not only never before known, but inexplicable on the footing which had till then subsisted between Him and God. It is a question which the lost cannot utter. They are forsaken, but they know why. Jesus is forsaken, but does not know and demands to know why. It is thus the cry of conscious innocence, but of innocence unavailing to draw down, at that moment, the least token of approval from the unseen Judge—innocence whose only recognition at that moment lay in the thick surrounding gloom which but reflected the horror of great darkness that invested His own spirit. There was indeed a cause for it, and He knew it too—the "why" must not be pressed so far as to exclude this. He must taste this bitterest of the wages of sin "who did no sin." But that is not the point now. In Him there was no cause at all (ch. 14:30) and He takes refuge in the glorious fact. When no ray from above shines in upon Him, He strikes a light out of His own breast. If God will not own Him, He shall own Himself. On the rock of His unsullied allegiance to Heaven He will stand, till the light of Heaven returns to His spirit. And it is near to come. While He is yet speaking, the fierceness of the flame is beginning to abate. One incident and insult more, and the experience of one other predicted element of suffering, and the victory is His. The incident, and the insult springing out of it, is the misunderstanding of the cry, for we can hardly suppose that it was anything else. "Some of them that stood there, when they heard that, said, This man calleth for Elias" (Matthew 27:47).

45. There was darkness over all the land. I am of opinion that does not mean all the world but only the land of Judea. So the word is used chap. xxiv. 30; Luke ix. 25, and in other places.

46. My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? These words are quoted by our Lord from Ps. xxii. 1; they are of very great importance, and should be carefully considered. Some suppose "that the divinity had now departed from Christ, and that his human nature was left unsupported to bear the punishment due to men for their sins." But this is by no means to be admitted, as it would deprive His sacrifice of its infinite merit, and consequently leave the sin of the world without an atonement. Take deity away from any redeeming act of Christ and redemption is ruined. Others imagine that our Lord spoke these words to the Jews only, to prove to them that He was the Messiah. "The Jews," say they, "believed this psalm to speak of the Messiah. They quoted the eighth verse of it against Christ—'He trusted on the Lord that he would deliver him: let him deliver him, seeing he delighted in him.' (See this chap., v. 43.) To which our Lord immediately answers, My God, my God, thus showing that He was the Person of whom the Psalmist prophesied." I have doubts concerning the propriety of this interpretation. The words might be thus translated: "My God! My God! to what sort of persons hast Thou left Me?" The words thus understood are rather to be referred to the wicked Jews than to our Lord, and are an exclamation indicative of the obstinate wickedness of His crucifiers, who steeled their hearts against every operation of the Spirit and power of God. Through the whole of the Sacred Writings, God is represented as doing those things which, in the course of His providence, he only permits to be done. Therefore the words, "To whom hast Thou left or given Me up?" are only a form of expression for "How astonishing is the wickedness of those persons into whose hands I am fallen!" If this interpretation be admitted, it will free this celebrated passage from much embarrassment, and make it speak a sense consistent with itself, and with the dignity of the Son of God. The words of Mark, chap. xv. 34, agree pretty nearly with this translation of the Hebrew: "To what [sort of persons, understood] has Thou left me?" But whatever may be thought of the above mode of interpretation, one thing is certain, viz., that the words could not be used by our Lord in the sense in which they are generally understood. This is sufficiently evident, for He well knew why He was come unto that hour; nor could He be forsaken of God, in whom dwelt all the fullness of the Godhead bodily. The Deity, however, might restrain so much of its consolatory support as to leave the human nature fully sensible of all its sufferings, so that the consolations might not take off any part of the keen edge of His passion; and this was necessary to make His sufferings meritorious. And it is probable that this is all that is intended by our Lord's quotation from the twenty-second psalm. Taken in this view, the words convey an unexceptionable sense, even in the common translation.

MATTHEW HENRY

notwithstanding; My God, my God; though forsaking me, yet mine. This supported him, and bore him up, that even in the depth of his sufferings God was his God, and this he resolves to keep fast hold of.

(4) See how his enemies impiously bantered and ridiculed this complaint (v. 47); They said, This man calleth for Elias. Some think that this was the ignorant mistake of the Roman soldiers, who knew not the signification of Eli, Eli, and so made this blundering comment upon these words of Christ. Many of the reproaches cast upon the word of God and the people of God, take rise from gross mistakes. Those that hear by the halves, pervert what they hear. But others think that it was the wilful mistake of some of the Jews, who knew very well what he said, but were disposed to abuse him, and to misrepresent him as one who, being forsaken of God, was driven to trust in creatures. It is no new thing for the most pious devotions of the best men to be ridiculed and abused by profane scoffers. Christ's words were so, though he spoke as never man spoke.

IV. The cold comfort which his enemies ministered to him in this agony.

1. Some gave him vinegar to drink (v. 48); instead of some cordial-water to revive and refresh him under this heavy burthen. One of them ran to fetch it.

2. Others, with the same purpose of disturbing and abusing him, refer him to Elias (v. 49); "Let be, let us see whether Elias will come to save him. Come, let him alone, he has appealed to Elias, and to Elias let him go."

Verses 50–56

We have here, at length, an account of the death of Christ.

I. The manner how he breathed his last (v. 50); between the third and the sixth hour, that is, between nine and twelve o'clock, as we reckon, he was nailed to the cross, and soon after the ninth hour, that is, between three and four o'clock, in the afternoon, he died. That was the time of the offering of the evening sacrifice, and the time when the paschal lamb was killed; and Christ our Passover was sacrificed for us.

Two things are here noted concerning the manner of Christ's dying.

1. That he cried with a loud voice, as before, v. 46. Now,

(1) This was a sign, that, after all his pains and fatigues, his life was whole in him, and nature strong. The voice of dying men is one of the first things that fails; with a panting breath and a faltering tongue, a few broken words are hardly spoken, and more hardly heard. But Christ, just before he expired, spoke like a man in his full strength, to show that his life was not forced from him, but was freely delivered by him into his Father's hands.

(2) It was significant. His crying with a loud voice when he died, signified that his death should be published and proclaimed to all the world. Christ's loud cry was like a trumpet blown over the sacrifices.

2. That then he yielded up the ghost. This is the usual periphrasis of dying; to show that the Son of God upon the cross did truly and properly die by the violence of the pain he was put to. His soul was separated from his body, and so his body was left really and truly dead. He had undertaken to make his soul an offering for sin.

II. The miracles that attended his death. So many miracles being wrought by him in his life, we might well expect some to be wrought concerning him at his death.

1. Behold, the veil of the temple was rent in twain. Just as our Lord Jesus expired, at the time of the offering of the evening sacrifice, the veil of the temple was rent by an invisible power; that veil which parted between the holy place and the most holy. In this, as in others of Christ's miracles, there was a mystery.

(1) It was in correspondence with the temple of Christ's body, which was now in the dissolving. Death is the rending of the veil of flesh which interposes between us and the holy of holies; the death of Christ was so, the death of true Christians is so.

(2) It signified the revealing and unfolding of the mysteries of the Old Testament. The veil of the temple was for concealment, for it was highly penal for any person to see the furniture of the most holy place, except the High Priest, and he but once a year, with great ceremony and through a cloud of smoke. But now, at the death of Christ, all was laid open, the mysteries were unveiled, so that now he that runs may read the meaning of them.

(3) It signified the uniting of Jew and Gentile, by the removing of the partition wall between them, which was the ceremonial law. Christ, in his death, repealed the ceremonial law, took it out of the way, nailed it to his cross. Christ died, to rend all dividing veils, and to make all his one, John xvii. 21.

filled a sponge with vinegar, and put it upon—a stalk of—hyssop, and put it to his mouth—Though a stalk of this plant does not exceed eigtheen inches in length, it would suffice, as the feet of crucified persons were not raised high. "The rest said, Let be"—[i.e., as would seem, 'Stop that officious service'] "let us see whether Elias will come to save Him" (Matt. 27:49). This was the last cruelty He was to suffer, but it was one of the most unfeeling. "And when Jesus had cried with a loud voice" (Luke 23:46). This "loud voice," noticed by three of the Evangelists, does not imply, as some able interpreters contend, that our Lord's strength was so far from being exhausted that He needed not to die then, and surrendered up His life sooner than Nature required, merely because it was the appointed time. It was indeed the appointed time, but time that He should be "crucified through weakness" (I Cor. 13:4), and Nature was now reaching its utmost exhaustion. But just as even His own dying saints, particularly the martyrs of Jesus, have sometimes had such gleams of coming glory immediately before breathing their last, as to impart to them a strength to utter their feelings which has amazed the bystanders, so this mighty voice of the expiring Redeemer was nothing else but the exultant spirit of the Dying Victor, receiving the fruit of His travail just about to be embraced, and nerving the organs of utterance to an ecstatic expression of its sublime feelings (not so much in the immediately following words of tranquil surrender, in Luke, as in the final shout, recorded only by John): "FATHER, INTO THY HANDS I COMMEND MY SPIRIT!" (Luke 23:46). Yes, the darkness is past, and the true light now shineth. His soul has emerged from its mysterious horrors; "My God" is heard no more, but in unclouded light He yields sublime into His Father's hands the infinitely precious spirit—using here also the words of those matchless Psalms (31:5) which were ever on His lips. "As the Father receives the spirit of Jesus, so Jesus receives those of the faithful" (Acts 7:59) [BENGEL]. And now comes the expiring mighty shout— It is finished! and he bowed his head and gave up the ghost. What is finished? The Law is fulfilled as never before, nor since, in His "obedience unto death, even the death of the cross"; Messianic prophecy is accomplished; Redemption is completed; "He hath finished the transgression, and made reconciliation for iniquity, and brought in everlasting righteousness, and sealed up the vision and prophecy, and anointed a holy of holies"; He has inaugurated the kingdom of God and given birth to a new world.

51-66. SIGNS AND CIRCUMSTANCES FOLLOWING THE DEATH OF THE LORD JESUS—HE IS TAKEN DOWN FROM THE CROSS, AND BURIED—THE SEPULCHRE IS GUARDED. (=Mark 15:38-47; Luke 23:47-56; John 19:31-42).

The Veil Rent (vs. 51). 51. And, behold, the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom—This was the thick and gorgeously wrought veil which was hung between the "holy place" and the "holiest of all," shutting out all access to the presence of God as manifested "from above the mercy seat and from between the cherubim"—"the Holy Ghost this signifying, that the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest" (Heb. 9:8). Into this holiest of all none might enter, not even the high priest, save once a year, on the great day of atonement, and then only with the blood of atonement in his hands, which he sprinkled "upon and before the mercy seat seven times" (Lev. 16:14)—to signify that access for sinners to a holy God is only through atoning blood. But as they had only the blood of bulls and of goats, which could not take away sins (Heb. 10:4), during all the long ages that preceded the death of Christ the thick veil remained; the blood of bulls and of goats continued to be shed and sprinkled; and once a year access to God through an atoning sacrifice was vouchsafed—in a picture, or rather, was dramatically represented, in those symbolical actions—nothing more. But now, the one atoning Sacrifice being provided in the precious blood of Christ, access to this holy God could no longer be

47. This man calleth for Elias. Probably these were Hellenistic Jews, who did not fully understand the meaning of our Lord's words. Elijah was daily expected to appear as the forerunner of the Messiah, whose arrival, under the character of a mighty prince, was generally supposed to be at hand throughout the East. See Mal. iii. 23; Matt. ii. 2-4; xvii. 10-12.

48. Took a spunge. This being the most convenient way to reach a liquid to His mouth; tied it on a reed, that they might be able to reach His lips with it. This reed, as we learn from John, was a stalk of hyssop, which in that country must have grown to a considerable magnitude. This appears also to have been done in mercy, to alleviate His sufferings. See v. 34.

50. Yielded up the ghost. "He dismissed the spirit." He himself willingly gave up that life which it was impossible for man to take away. It is not said that He hung on the Cross till He died through pain and agony; nor is it said that His bones were broken, the sooner to put Him out of pain, and to hasten His death. But that He himself "dismissed the soul," that He might thus become, not a forced sacrifice, but a freewill Offering for sin. Now, as our English word ghost, from the Anglo-Saxon gast, an "inmate, inhabitant, guest" (a casual visitant), also a "spirit," is now restricted among us to the latter meaning, always signifying the immortal spirit or soul of man, the guest of the body; and as giving up the spirit, ghost, or soul, is an act not proper to man, though commending it to God, in our last moments, is both an act of faith and piety; and as giving up the ghost, i.e., dismissing His spirit from His body, is attributed to Jesus Christ, to whom alone it is proper. I therefore object against its use in every other case. Every man, since the Fall, has not only been liable to death, but has deserved it, as all have forfeited their lives because of sin. Jesus Christ, as born immaculate, and having never sinned, had not forfeited His life, and therefore may be considered as naturally and properly immortal. "No man," says He, "taketh it," My life, "from me, but I lay it down of myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again . . . Therefore doth my Father love me, because I lay down my life, that I might take it again," John x. 18, 17. Hence we rightly translate Matt. xxvii. 50. "He gave up the ghost"; i.e., He "dismissed His spirit," that He might die for the sin of the world. The Evangelist John, xix. 30, makes use of an expression to the same import, which we translate in the same way: "He delivered up His spirit." We translate Mark xv. 37 and Luke xxiii. 46, "He gave up the ghost," but not correctly, because the word in both these places is very different—"He breathed His last," or "expired"; though in the latter place, Luke xxiii. 46, there is an equivalent expression —"Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit"; i.e., "I place My soul in Thy hand," proving that the act was His own, that no man could take His life away from Him, that He did not die by the perfidy of His disciple or the malice of the Jews, but by His own free act. Thus He laid down his life for the sheep. Of Ananias and Sapphira, Acts v. 5, 10, and of Herod, Acts xii. 23, our translation says, they "gave up the ghost"; but the word in both places is simply to "breathe out," to "expire," or "die." But in no case, either by the Septuagint in the Old, or any of the sacred writers in the New Testament, is "He dismissed his spirit," or "delivered up his spirit," spoken of any person but Christ. Abraham, Isaac, Ishmael, Jacob, and others "breathed their last"; Ananias, Sapphira, and Herod "expired"; but none, Jesus Christ excepted, "gave

(4) It signified the consecrating and laying open of a new and living way to God. The veil kept people off from drawing near to the most holy place, where the Shechinah was. But the rending of it signified that Christ by his death opened a way to God, [1] For himself. Having offered his sacrifice in the outer court, the blood of it was now to be sprinkled upon the mercy-seat within the veil. Though he did not personally ascend into the holy place not made with hands till above forty days after, yet he immediately acquired a right to enter, and had a virtual admission. [2] For us in him: so the apostle applies it, Heb. x. 19, 20. He died, to bring us to God, and, in order thereunto, to rend that veil of guilt and wrath which interposed between us and him. We have free access through Christ to the throne of grace, or mercy-seat, now, and to the throne of glory hereafter, Heb. iv. 16. When Christ had overcome the sharpness of death, he opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers. Nothing can obstruct or discourage our access to heaven.

2. The earth did quake. This earthquake signified two things.

(1) The horrible wickedness of Christ's crucifiers. The earth, by trembling under such a load, bore its testimony to the innocency of him that was persecuted, and against the impiety of those that persecuted him.

(2) The glorious achievements of Christ's cross. This earthquake signified the mighty shock, nay, the fatal blow, now given to the devil's kingdom. God shakes all nations, when the Desire of all nations is to come.

3. The rocks rent; the hardest and firmest part of the earth was made to feel this mighty shock. Christ had said, that if the children should cease to cry Hosanna, the stones would immediately cry out; and now, in effect, they did so, proclaiming the glory of the suffering Jesus. Jesus Christ is the Rock; and the rending of these rocks, signified the rending of that rock, (1) That in the clefts of it we may be hid, as Moses in the cleft of the rock at Horeb, that there we may behold the glory of the Lord, as he did. (2) That from the cleft of it rivers of living water may flow, and follow us in this wilderness. When we celebrate the memorial of Christ's death, our hard and rocky hearts must be rent—the heart, and not the garments. That heart is harder than a rock, that will not yield, that will not melt, where Jesus Christ is evidently set forth crucified.

4. The graves were opened. It should seem, the same earthquake that rent the rocks, opened the graves, and many bodies of saints which slept, arose. Death to the saints is but the sleep of the body, and the grave the bed it sleeps in; they awoke by the power of the Lord Jesus, and (v. 53) came out of the graves after his resurrection, and went into Jerusalem, the holy city, and appeared unto many. We may raise many enquiries concerning it, which we cannot resolve: as, [1] Who these saints were, that did arise. Some think, the ancient patriarchs, that were in such care to be buried in the land of Canaan. Others think, these that arose were modern saints, such as had seen Christ in the flesh, but died before him. What if we should suppose that they were the martyrs, who in the Old Testament times had sealed the truths of God with their blood. Sufferers with Christ shall first reign with him. [2] It is uncertain whether (as some think) they arose to life, now at the death of Christ, but did not go into the city till after his resurrection; or whether they did not revive and rise till after the resurrection; only, for brevity-sake, it is mentioned here, upon the mention of the opening of the graves. [3] Some think that they arose only to bear witness of Christ's resurrection to those to whom they appeared, and, having finished their testimony, retired to their graves again. But it is more agreeable, both to Christ's honour and theirs, to suppose that they arose as Christ did, to die no more. Surely on them who did partake of his first resurrection, a second death had no power. [4] To whom they appeared, whether enemies or friends, in what manner they appeared, how often, what they said and did, are secret things which belong not to us. The relating of this matter so briefly, is a plain intimation to us, that we must not look that way for a confirmation of our faith; we have a more sure word of prophecy.

Yet we may learn many good lessons from it. [1] That even those who lived and died before the death and resurrection of Christ, had saving benefit thereby, as well as those who have lived since. [2] That Jesus Christ, by dying, conquered, disarmed, and disabled, death. These saints that arose, were the present trophies of the victory of Christ's cross over the powers of death. [3] That, in virtue of Christ's resurrection, the bodies of all the saints shall, in denied; and so the moment the Victim expired on the altar, that thick veil which for so many ages had been the dread symbol of separation between God and guilty men was, without a hand touching it, mysteriously "rent in twain from top to bottom"—"the Holy Ghost this signifying, that the way into the holiest of all was now made manifest!" How emphatic the statement, "from top to bottom"; as if to say, Come boldly now to the Throne of Grace; the veil is clean gone; the mercy seat stands open to the gaze of sinners, and the way to it is sprinkled with the blood of Him—"who through the eternal Spirit hath offered Himself without spot to God!" Before, it was death to go in, now it is death to stay out. See more on this glorious subject on Hebrews 10:19-22.

An Earthquake—The Rocks Rent—The Graves Opened, that the Saints Which Slept in Them Might Come Forth after Their Lord's Resurrection (vss. 51-53). 51. and the earth did quake—From what follows it would seem that this earthquake was local, having for its object the rending of the rocks and the opening of the graves—and the rocks rent—"were rent"—the physical creation thus sublimely proclaiming, at the bidding of its Maker, the concusssion which at that moment was taking place in the moral world at the most critical moment of its history. Extraordinary rents and fissures have been observed in the rocks near this spot.

52. And the graves were opened; and many bodies of the saints which slept arose—These sleeping saints (see on I Thess. 4:14) were Old Testament believers, who—according to the usual punctuation in our version—were quickened into resurrection-life at the moment of their Lord's death, but lay in their graves till His resurrection, when they came forth. But it is far more natural, as we think, and consonant with other Scriptures, to understand that only the graves were opened, probably by the earthquake, at our Lord's death, and this only in preparation for the subsequent exit of those who slept in them, when the Spirit of life should enter into them from their risen Lord, and along with Him they should come forth, trophies of His victory over the grave. Thus, in the opening of the graves at the moment of the Redeemer's expiring, there was a glorious symbolical proclamation that the death which had just taken place had "swallowed up death in victory"; and whereas the saints that slept in them were awakened only by their risen Lord, to accompany Him out of the tomb, it was fitting that "the Prince of Life" "should be the First that should rise from the dead" (Acts 26: 23; I Cor. 15:20, 23; Col. 1:18; Rev. 1:5). and went into the holy city—that city where He, in virtue of whose resurrection they were now alive, had been condemned. and appeared unto many—that there might be undeniable evidence of their own resurrection first, and through it of their Lord's. Thus, while it was not deemed fitting that He Himself should appear again in Jerusalem, save to the disciples, provision was made that the fact of His resurrection should be left in no doubt. It must be observed, however, that the resurrection of these sleeping saints was not like those of the widow of Nain's son, of Jairus' daughter, of Lazarus, and of the man who "revived and stood upon his feet," on his dead body touching the bones of Elisha (II Kings 13:21)—which were mere temporary recallings of the departed spirit to the mortal body, to be followed by a final departure of it "till the trumpet shall sound." But this was a resurrection once for all, to life everlasting; and so there is no room to doubt that they went to glory with their Lord, as bright trophies of His victory over death.

51. The veil of the temple was rent. That is, the veil which separated the holy place, where the priests ministered, from the holy of holies, into which the high priest only entered, and that once a year, to make a general expiation for the sins of the people. This rending of the veil was emblematical, and pointed out that the separation between Jews and Gentiles was now abolished, and that the privilege of the high priest was now communicated to all mankind. All might henceforth have access to the throne of grace, through the one great Atonement and Mediator, the Lord Jesus. See this beautifully illustrated in Heb. x. 19-22.

52. And the graves were opened. By the earthquake; and many bodies of saints which slept, i.e., were dead, sleep being a common expression for death in the Scriptures.

53. And came out of the graves after his resurrection. Not before, as some have thought, for Christ was himself the Firstfruits of them, who slept, 1 Cor. xv. 20. The graves were opened at His death by the earthquake, and the bodies came out at His resurrection. And appeared unto many. Thus establishing the truth of our Lord's resurrection in particular, and of the resurrection of the body in general, by many witnesses.

the fulness of time, rise again. This was an earnest of the general resurrection at the last day.

III. The conviction of his enemies that were employed in the execution, v. 54.

1. The persons convinced; the centurion, and they that were with him watching Jesus. (1) They were soldiers, whose profession is commonly hardening, and whose breasts are commonly not so susceptible as some others of the impressions either of fear or pity. But there is no spirit too big, too bold, for the power of Christ to break and humble. (2) They were Romans, Gentiles, yet they only were convinced. Here were the Gentiles softened, and the Jews hardened. (3) They were the persecutors of Christ, and those that but just before had reviled him, as appears Luke xxiii. 36. How soon can God, by the power he has over men's consciences, alter their language.

2. The means of their conviction; they perceived the earthquake, which frightened them, and saw the other things that were done. These had their end on these soldiers, whatever they had on others.

3. The expressions of this conviction, in two things. (1) The terror that was struck upon them; they feared greatly; feared lest they should have been buried in the darkness, or swallowed up in the earthquake. God can easily frighten the most daring of his adversaries. Guilt puts men into fear. Whereas there are those who will not fear, though the earth be removed, Ps. xlvi. 1, 2.

(2) The testimony that was extorted from them; they said, Truly this was the Son of God. It was the great matter now in dispute, the point upon which he and his enemies had joined issue, ch. xxvi. 63, 64. His disciples believed it, but at this time durst not confess it; our Saviour himself was tempted to question it, when he said, Why hast thou forsaken me? The Jews, now that he was dying upon the cross, looked upon it as plainly determined against him. And yet now this centurion and the soldiers make this voluntary confession of the Christian faith, Truly this was the Son of God. The best of his disciples could not have said more at any time, and at this time they had not faith and courage enough to say thus much.

IV. The attendance of his friends, that were witnesses of his death, v. 55, 56.

1. Who they were; many women who followed him from Galilee. Not his apostles (only elsewhere we find John by the cross, John xix. 26), their hearts failed them, they durst not appear. But here were a company of women, some would have called them silly women, that boldly stuck to Christ, when the rest of his disciples had basely deserted him. Even those of the weaker sex are often, by the grace of God, made strong in faith. There have been women martyrs, famous for courage and resolution in Christ's cause. Now of these women it is said, (1) That they had followed Jesus from Galilee, out of the great love they had to him. The males only were obliged to come up, to worship at the feast. Now having followed him such a long journey they resolved not to forsake him now. Our former services and sufferings for Christ should be an argument with us, faithfully to persevere to the end in our attendance on him. (2) That they ministered to him of their substance. How gladly would they have ministered to him now, if they might have been admitted! When we are restrained from doing what we would, we must do what we can, in the service of Christ. (3) Some of them are particularly named. They were such as we have several times met with before, and it was their praise, that we meet with them to the last.

2. What they did; they were beholding afar off.

(1) They stood afar off. It was an aggravation of the sufferings of Christ, that his lovers and friends stood aloof from his sore. Perhaps they might have come nearer, if they would; but good people, when they are in sufferings, must not think it strange, if some of their best friends be shy of them. If we be thus looked strangely upon, remember, our Master was so before us.

(2) They were there beholding; when they were debarred from doing any other office of love to him, they looked a look of love toward him. It was a sorrowful look. We may well imagine how it cut them to the heart, to see him in this torment. Let us with an eye of faith behold Christ and him crucified, and be affected with that great love wherewith he loved us. It was no more than a look; they beheld him, but they could not help him. When Christ was in his sufferings, the best of his friends were but spectators and lookers on.

We have here an account of Christ's burial. 1. The kindness and goodwill of his friends that laid him in the grave. 2. The malice and ill will of his enemies saying, Truly this was the Son of God—There cannot be a reasonable doubt that this expression was used in the Jewish sense, and that it points to the claim which Jesus made to be the Son of God, and on which His condemnation expressly turned. The meaning, then, clearly is that He must have been what He professed to be; in other words, that He was no impostor. There was no medium between those two. See, on the similar testimony of the penitent thief—"This man hath done nothing amiss"—on Luke 23:41.

The Galilean Women (vss. 55, 56). 55. And many women were there beholding afar off, which followed Jesus—The sense here would be better brought out by the use of the pluperfect, "which had followed Jesus." from Galilee, ministering unto him—As these dear women had ministered to Him during His glorious missionary tours in Galilee (see on Luke 8:1-3), so from this statement it should seem that they accompanied him and ministered to His wants from Galilee on His final journey to Jerusalem. 56. Among which was Mary Magdalene—(see on Luke 8:2). and Mary the mother of James and Joses—the wife of Cleophas, or rather Clopas, and sister of the Virgin (John 19:25). 54. The centurion. The Roman officer who superintended the execution, called centurio, from centum, a hundred, because he had the command of 100 men.

Truly this was the Son of God. An innocent, holy, and divine Person; and God thus shows His disapprobation of this bloody tragedy. It is not likely that this centurion had any knowledge of the expectation of the Jews relative to the Messiah, and did not use the words in this sense. "A son of God," as the Romans used the term, would signify no more than a very eminent or divine person, a hero.

55. Many women. To their everlasting honor, these women evidenced more courage and affectionate attachment to their Lord and Master than the disciples did, who had promised to die with Him rather than forsake Him. Beholding afar off. "At a distance."

56. Mary Magdalene. She probably had her name from Magdala, a village or district in Lower Galilee. See chap. xv. 39. Mary the mother of James. She was mother of him called James the lesser, or junior, who was son of Alphaeus or Cleopas; see chap. x. 3; Mark xv. 40; John xix. 25; and she was sister to the Holy Virgin. Thus it appears that there were four remarkable Marys mentioned in the Gospels: (1) Mary the Virgin, wife of Joseph. (2) Mary Salome, her sister, wife of Cleopas, John xix. 25. (3) Mary Magdalene, or Mary of Magdala; and (4) Mary, the sister of Martha and Lazarus, John xi. 1.

that were very solicitous to keep him there.

I. His friends gave him a decent burial.

1. Jesus Christ was buried; when his precious soul was gone to paradise, his blessed body was deposited in the chambers of the grave. He was buried, to make his death the more certain, and his resurrection the more illustrious. Pilate would not deliver his body to be buried, till he was well assured that he was really dead. He was buried, that he might take off the terror of the grave, and make it easy to us, might warm and perfume that cold noisome bed for us, and that we might be buried with him.

2. The particular circumstances of his burial here related.

(1) The time when he was buried; when the evening was come; the same evening that he died, before sunset, as is usual in burying malefactors. It was not deferred till the next day, because it was the sabbath.

(2) The person that took care of the funeral was Joseph of Arimathea. The apostles had all fled. The women that followed him durst not move in it; then did God stir up this good man to do it; for what work God has to do, he will find out instruments to do it. Joseph was a fit man, for, [1] He had wherewithal to do it, being a rich man. Most of Christ's disciples were poor men; but here was one that was a rich man, ready to be employed in a piece of service which required a man of estate. Worldly wealth in some services to be done for Christ is an advantage and an opportunity, and it is well for those who have it, if withal they have a heart to use it for God's glory. [2] He was well affected to our Lord Jesus, for he was himself his disciple, though he did not openly profess it. Christ has more secret disciples than we are aware of.

(3) The grant of the dead body procured from Pilate, v. 58. Joseph went to Pilate, the proper person to be applied to on this occasion. Pilate was willing to give the body to one that would inter it decently. In Joseph's petition, and Pilate's ready grant of it, honour was done to Christ, and a testimony borne to his integrity.

(4) The dressing of the body in its graveclothes (v. 59); though he was an honourable counsellor, yet he himself took the body, as it should seem, into his own arms, from the infamous and accursed tree (Acts xiii. 29); for where there is true love to Christ, no service will be thought too mean to stoop to for him. Having taken it, he wrapped it in a clean linen cloth; for burying in linen was then the common usage. This common act of humanity, if done after a godly sort, may be made an acceptable piece of Christianity.

(5) The depositing of it in the sepulchre, v. 60. A private funeral did best befit him whose kingdom came not with observation. He was laid in a borrowed tomb, in Joseph's burying place; as he had not a house of his own, wherein to lay his head while he lived, so he had not a grave of his own, wherein to lay his body when he was dead. The grave is the peculiar heritage of a sinner. There is nothing we can truly call our own but our sins and our graves. When we go to the grave, we go to our own place; but our Lord Jesus, who had no sin of his own, had no grave of his own; dying under imputed sin, it was fit that he should be buried in a borrowed grave. He was laid in a new tomb, which Joseph, it is likely, designed for himself; it would, however, be never the worse for his lying in it, who was to rise so quickly, but a great deal the better for his lying in it, who has altered the property of the grave. It was a tomb hewn out of a rock. Christ's sepulchre should be in a solid entire rock, that no room might be left to suspect his disciples had access to it to steal the body; for there was no access to it but by the door, which was watched. A great stone was rolled to the door of his sepulchre; this also was according to the custom of the Jews in burying their dead, as appears by the description of the grave of Lazarus (John xi. 38). If the grave were his prison, now was the prison-door locked and bolted. The rolling of the stone to the grave's mouth, was with them as filling up the grave is with us, it completed the funeral. It is the most melancholy circumstance in the funerals of our Christian friends, when we have laid their bodies in the dark and silent grave to go home, and leave them behind; but alas, it is not we that go home, and leave them behind, no, it is they that are gone to the better home, and have left us behind.

(6) The company that attended the funeral; and that were very small and mean. Some good women that were true mourners—Mary Magdalene, and the other Mary, v. 56. These, as they had attended him to the cross, so they followed him to the grave. True love to Christ will carry us through to the utmost, in following him. Death itself cannot quench that divine fire.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

Joseph of Arimathea—"a rich man" (Matt. 27:57), thus fulfilling Isaiah 53:9; "an honorable counsellor," a member of the Sanhedrim, and of good condition, "which also waited for the kingdom of God" (Mark 15:43), a devout expectant of Messiah's kingdom; "a good man and a just, the same had not consented to the counsel and deed of them" (Luke 23:50, 51—he had gone the length, perhaps, of dissenting and protesting in open council against the condemnation of our Lord); "who also himself was Jesus' disciple" (Matt. 27:57). being a disciple of Jesus, but secretly, for fear of the Jews—"He went in boldly unto Pilate" (Mark 15:43)—lit., "having taken courage went in," or "had the boldness to go in." Mark alone, as his manner is, notices the boldness which this required. The act would without doubt identify him for the first time with the disciples of Christ. Marvellous it certainly is, that one who while Jesus was yet alive merely refrained from condemning Him, not having the courage to espouse His cause by one positive act, should, now that He was dead, and His cause apparently dead with Him, summon up courage to go in personally to the Roman governor and ask permission to take down and inter the body. But if this be the first instance, it is not the last, that a seemingly dead Christ has wakened a sympathy which a living one had failed to evoke. The heroism of faith is usually kindled by desperate circumstances, and is not seldom displayed by those who before were the most timid, and scarce known as disciples at all.

Then took they the body of Jesus, and wound it in linen clothes with the spices, as the manner of the Jews is to bury—the mixed and pulverized myrrh and aloes shaken into the folds, and the entire body, thus swathed, wrapt in an outer covering of "clean linen cloth" (Matt. 27:59). Had the Lord's own friends had the least reason to think that the spark of life was still in Him, would they have done this? But even if one could conceive them mistaken, could anyone have lain thus enveloped for the period during which He was in the grave, and life still remained? Impossible. When, therefore, He walked forth from the tomb, we can say with the most absolute certainty, "Now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first fruits of them that slept" (I Cor. 15:20). No wonder that the learned and the barbarians alike were prepared to die for the name of the Lord Jesus; for such evidence was to the unsophisticated resistless. (No mention is made of anointing in this operation. No doubt it was a hurried proceeding, for fear of interruption, and because it was close on the sabbath, the women seem to have set this as their proper task "as soon as the sabbath should be past" (Mark 16:1). But as the Lord graciously held it as undesignedly anticipated by Mary at Bethany (Mark 14:8), so this was probably all the anointing, in the strict sense of it, which He received. Now in the place where he was crucified there was a garden, and in the garden a new sepulchre—The choice of this tomb was, on their part, dictated by the double circumstance that it was so near at hand, and by its belonging to a friend of the Lord; and as there was need of haste, even they would be struck with the providence which thus supplied it. "There laid they Jesus therefore, because of the Jew's preparation-day, for the sepulchre was nigh at hand." But there was one recommendation of it which probably would not strike them; but God had it in view. Not its being "hewn out of a rock" (Mark 15:46), accessible only at the entrance, which doubtless would impress them with its security and suitableness.

The Women Mark the Sacred Spot, that They Might Recognize It on Coming Thither to Anoint the Body (vs. 61). 61. And there was Mary Magdalene, and the other Mary—"the mother of James and Joses," mentioned before (vs. 56)—sitting over against the sepulchre—See on Mark 16:1.

ADAM CLARKE

57. When the even. This must have been about three o'clock or a little after; for our Lord having expired about three o'clock, v. 46, and the Jewish Passover beginning about four, it was necessary that Joseph, who would not fail to eat the Passover at the usual time, should have obtained and buried the body of Christ some time before four o'clock. But such was the general consternation, occasioned by the prodigies that took place on this most awful occasion, that we may safely conjecture that nothing was done in order, and perhaps the Passover itself was not eaten at the usual hour, if at all, that day. A rich man. He was a counsellor of the great Sanhedrin, Luke xxiii. 50; and, from the accounts given of him by the Evangelists, we learn that he was a man of the greatest respectability. He now acted a more honorable part than all the disciples of our Lord. He was of Arimathaea, or Rama, in the tribe of Benjamin, Matt. ii. 17, but lived ordinarily in Jerusalem as being a member of the great council.

58. Begged the body. That he might bury it honorably; otherwise, by the Jewish customs, He would have either been burned, or buried in the common place appointed for executed criminals.

59. Wrapped it in a clean linen cloth. The Jews, as well as the Egyptians, added spices to keep the body from putrefaction, and the linen was wrapped about every part to keep the aromatics in contact with the flesh. From John xix. 39-40 we learn that a mixture of myrrh and aloes of 100 pounds' weight had been applied to the body of Jesus when He was buried. And that a second embalmment was intended, we learn from Luke xxiii. 56 and xxiv. 1, as the hurry to get the body interred before the Sabbath did not permit them to complete the embalming in the first instance.

60. Laid it in his own new tomb. To all human appearance the body of Christ must have had the same burial place with those of the two robbers, as "he was numbered with the transgressors," and suffered with them; for then He was a Sacrifice, bearing the sin of the world in His own body on the tree. But now the Sacrifice is offered, the atonement made and accepted; He is no longer to be enrolled with the transgressors, and, according to a prophecy delivered nearly seven hundred years before that time, He is to have the burying place of a rich man. See Isa. liii. 9-10. Had our Lord been buried in the common burial ground of the malefactors, His resurrection could not have been so distinctly remarked, as the chief priests would never have thought of sealing the stone there or setting a watch. But now that the body is given into the hands of a friend, they judge it necessary to make use of these precautions, in order, as they said, to prevent imposture; and from this very circumstance the resurrection of Christ had its fullest evidence, and was put beyond the power of successful contradiction.

61. Mary Magdalene, and the other Mary. The mother of James and Joses, v. 56. The mother of our Lord had probably, by this time, been taken home to the house of John. See John xix. 26-27. Sitting over against the sepulchre. These holy women, filled with that love to their Lord which death cannot destroy, cleaved to Him in life, and in death were not divided. They came to the grave to see the end, and overwhelmed with sorrow and anguish, sat down to mourn.

MATTHEW HENRY

II. His enemies did what they could to prevent his resurrection; what they did herein was the next day that followed the day of the preparation, v. 62. That was the seventh day of the week, the Jewish sabbath. All that day, Christ lay dead in the grave. On that day, the chief priests and Pharisees, when they should have been at their devotions, asking pardon for the sins of the week past, were dealing with Pilate about securing the sepulchre.

(1) Their address to Pilate. They desire a guard may be set on the sepulchre.

[1] Their petition sets forth, that that deceiver had said, After three days I will rise again. He had said so, and his disciples remembered those very words for the confirmation of their faith, but his persecutors remember them for the provocation of their rage and malice. Thus the same word of Christ to the one was a savour of life unto life, to the other of death unto death.

[2] It further sets forth their jealousy; lest his disciples come by night, and steal him away, and say, He is risen.

First, That which really they were afraid of, was, his resurrection; that which is most Christ's honour and his people's joy, is most the terror of his enemies. So the chief priests and Pharisees laboured to defeat the predictions of Christ's resurrection; if he should rise, that would break all their measures. Christ's enemies, even when they have gained their point, are still in fear of losing it again. Perhaps the priests were surprised at the respect shown to Christ's dead body by Joseph and Nicodemus, two honourable counsellors, nor can they forget his raising Lazarus from the dead, which so confounded them.

Secondly, That which they took on them to be afraid of, was, lest his disciples should come by night, and steal him away, which was a very improbable thing. They had not the courage to own him while he lived, and it was not likely that his death should put courage into such cowards. What could they promise themselves by stealing away his body, and making people believe he was risen. What good would it do them, to carry on a cheat upon themselves, to steal away his body, and say, He is risen? The chief priests apprehend that if the doctrine of Christ's resurrection be once preached and believed, the last error will be worse than the first. Those that oppose Christ and his kingdom, will see not only their attempts baffled, but themselves miserably plunged and embarrassed, their errors each worse than other, and the last worst of all.

[3] In consideration hereof, they humbly move to have a guard set upon the sepulchre till the third day; Command that the sepulchre be made sure. One would think that death's prisoners needed no other guard, and that the grave were security enough to itself.

(2) Pilate's answer to this address (v. 65); Ye have a watch, make it sure, as sure as you can. He was ready to gratify Christ's friends, in allowing them the body, and his enemies, in setting a guard upon it, being desirous to please all sides, looking upon the hopes of one side and the fears of the other to be alike ridiculous. Ye have a watch; but, as if ashamed to be himself seen in such a thing, he leaves the management of it wholly to them. Methinks that word, Make it as sure as you can, looks like a banter, either, [1] Of their fears; "Be sure to set a strong guard upon the dead man"; or rather, [2] Of their hopes; "Do your worst, but if he be of God, he will rise, in spite of you and all your guards." Tertullian, speaking of Pilate, saith, In his conscience he was a Christian; and it is possible that he might be under such convictions, yet never be thoroughly persuaded, any more than Agrippa or Felix was, to be a Christian.

(3) The wonderful care they took, hereupon, to secure the sepulchre (v. 66); They sealed the stone. But not trusting too much to that, withal they set a watch, to keep his disciples from coming to steal him away. God brought this good out of it, that they who were set to oppose his resurrection, thereby had an opportunity to observe it, and did so, and told the chief priests what they observed. To guard the sepulchre against the poor weak disciples, was folly, because needless; but to think to guard it against the power of God was folly, because fruitless and to no purpose.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

The Sepulchre Guarded (vss. 62-66). 62. Now the next day, that followed the day of the preparation—i.e., after six o'clock of our Saturday evening. The crucifixion took place on the Friday and all was not over till shortly before sunset, when the Jewish sabbath commenced; and "that sabbath day was an high day" (John 19:31), being the first day of the feast of unleavened bread. That day being over at six on Saturday evening, they hastened to take their measures. 63. Saying, Sir, we remember that that deceiver—Never, remarks BENGEL, will you find the heads of the people calling Jesus by His own name. And yet here there is betrayed a certain uneasiness, which one almost fancies they only tried to stifle in their own minds, as well as crush in Pilate's, in case he should have any lurking suspicion that he had done wrong in yielding to them. said, while he was yet alive—Important testimony this, from the lips of His bitterest enemies, to the reality of Christ's death; the cornerstone of the whole Christian religion. After three days—which, according to the customary Jewish way of reckoning, need signify no more than "after the commencement of the third day." I will rise again—"I rise," in the present tense, thus reporting not only the fact that this prediction of His had reached their ears, but that they understood Him to look forward confidently to its occurring on the very day named.

and say unto the people, he is risen from the dead.—Did they really fear this? so the last error shall be worse than the first—the imposture of His pretended resurrection worse than that of His pretended Messiahship.

64. Command therefore that the sepulchre be made sure—by a Roman guard. until the third day—after which, if He still lay in the grave, the imposture of His claims would be manifest to all.

65. Pilate said unto them, Ye have a watch—The guards had already acted under orders of the Sanhedrim, with Pilate's consent; but probably they were not clear about employing them as a night-watch without Pilate's express authority. go your way, make it as sure as ye can—as ye know how, or in the way ye deem securest. Though there may be no irony in this speech, it evidently insinuated that if the event should be contrary to their wish, it would not be for want of sufficient human appliances to prevent it. 66. So they went, and made the sepulchre sure, sealing the stone—which Mark (16:4) says was "very great." and setting a watch—to guard it. What more could man do? But while they are trying to prevent the resurrection of the Prince of Life, God makes use of their precautions for His own ends. Their stone-covered, sealsecured sepulchre shall preserve the sleeping dust of the Son of God free from all indignities, in undisturbed, sublime repose; while their watch shall be His guard of honor until the angels shall come to take their place.

ADAM CLARKE

62. The next day. This was the seventh, or Saturday, and might be what we should term the evening of the sixth, or Friday, because the Jews always ended their day when the sun set, and then began the next. That followed the day of the preparation. That is, of the Sabbath. The victuals which were to be used on the Sabbath by the Jews were always prepared the preceding evening before the sun set. It is of this preparation that the Evangelist speaks here, and it is the same which is mentioned by Mark, chap. xv. 42; by Luke, chap. xxiii. 54; and by John, chap. xix. 31. But there was another preparation which happened in the same day, viz., the preparation of the Passover. This began about twelve o'clock, and continued till four, the time in which they ate the paschal lamb. See John xix. 14.

63. Sir, we remember. While these wicked men are fulfilling their own vicious counsels, they are subserving the great cause of Christianity. Everything depended on the resurrection of Christ. If it did not appear that He rose from the dead, then the whole system was false, and no atonement was made. It was necessary, therefore, that the chief priests should make use of every precaution to prevent an imposture, that the resurrection of Christ might have the fullest evidence to support it. See on v. 60. The word kyrie is here very properly translated "Sir," which, in many other places, is as improperly translated Lord. When a Roman is the speaker or the person addressed, kyrie should always be translated "sir"; when strangers address our Lord, the word is a title of civil respect, and should, in general, be translated in the same way. After three days I will rise again. This they probably took from His saying, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up." If so, they destroyed, by their own words, the false accusation they brought against Him to put Him to death. Then they perverted the meaning; now they declare it. Thus the wise are taken in their own craftiness.

65. Ye have a watch. The Jews had a corps of Roman troops, consisting of several companies, as a guard for the Temple, Acts iv. 1. These companies mounted guard by turns; see Luke xxii. 4. Some of these companies, which were not then on duty, Pilate gave them leave to employ to watch the tomb.

66. Made the sepulchre sure, sealing the stone, and setting a watch. Or rather, "made the tomb secure by the guard, and by sealing the stone." The guard was to take care that the disciples should not steal him away; and the seal, which was probably the seal of the governor, was to prevent the guards from being corrupted so as to permit the theft. So everything was done which human policy and prudence could to prevent a resurrection, which these very precautions had the most direct tendency to authenticate and establish. How wonderful are the wisdom and goodness of God!

CHAPTER 28

For the proof of Christ's resurrection, we have here the testimony of the angel, and of Christ himself. Let us not prescribe to Infinite Wisdom, which ordered that the witnesses of his resurrection should see him risen, but not see him rise. His incarnation was a mystery; so was this second incarnation.

I. The coming of the good women to the sepulchre.

1. When they came; in the end of the sabbath, as it began to dawn toward the first day of the week, v. 1. This fixes the time of Christ's resurrection.

(1) He arose the third day after his death. He was buried in the evening of the sixth day of the week, and arose in the morning of the first day of the following week.

(2) He arose after the Jewish sabbath, and it was the passover-sabbath. Christ on the sixth day finished his work; he said, It is finished; on the seventh day he rested, and then on the first day of the next week did as it were begin a new world, and enter upon new work. The time of the saints' lying in the grave, is a sabbath to them for there they rest from their labours (Job iii. 17).

(3) He arose upon the first day of the week; on the first day of the first week God commanded the light to shine out of darkness; on this day therefore did he who was to be the Light of the world, shine out of the darkness of the grave. It arose again in the first-day sabbath, called the Lord's day (Rev. i. 10), and no other day of the week is from henceforward mentioned in all the New Testament than this. The sabbath was instituted in remembrance of the perfecting of the work of creation, Gen. ii. 1. Man by his revolt made a breach upon that perfect work, which was never perfectly repaired till Christ arose from the dead. He who on that day arose from the dead, is the same by whom, and for whom, all things were at first created, and now anew created.

(4) He arose as it began to dawn toward that day; as soon as it could be said that the third day was come, he arose. Christ arose when the day began to dawn, because then the day-spring from on high did again visit us, Luke i. 78. His passion began in the night; when he hung on the cross the sun was darkened; he was laid in the grave in the dusk of the evening; but he arose from the grave when the sun was near rising, for he is the bright and morning Star (Rev. xxii. 16), the true Light.

2. Who they were, that came to the sepulchre; Mary Magdalene and the other Mary, the same that attended the funeral, and sat over against the sepulchre, as before they sat over against the cross; still they studied to express their love to Christ. Their attendance on Christ not only to the grave, but in the grave, represents his like care for those that are his. As Christ in the grave was beloved of the saints, so the saints in the grave are beloved of Christ; for death and the grave cannot slacken that bond of love which is between them.

3. What they came to do: the other evangelists say that they came to anoint the body; Matthew saith that they came to see the sepulchre. They went, to show their goodwill in another visit to the dear remains of their beloved Master. Visits to the grave are of great use to Christians, especially visits to the grave of our Lord Jesus, where we may see sin buried out of sight, and the great proof of redeeming love shining illustriously even in that land of darkness.

II. The appearance of an angel of the Lord to them, v. 2–4. We have here an account of the manner of the resurrection of Christ.

1. There was a great earthquake. When he died, the earth that received him, shook for fear; now that he arose, the earth that resigned him, leaped for joy in his exaltation. It was the signal of Christ's victory. Those who are sanctified, and thereby raised to a spiritual life, while it is in the doing find an earthquake in their own bosoms, as Paul, who trembled and was astonished.

2. The angel of the Lord descended from heaven. The angels frequently attended our Lord Jesus, but upon the cross we find no angel attending him: when his Father forsook him, the angels withdrew from him; but now that he is resuming the glory, behold, the angels of God worship him.

3. He came, and rolled back the stone from the door, and sat upon it. The stone of our sins was rolled to the door of the grave of our Lord Jesus, but to demonstrate that divine justice was satisfied, an angel was commissioned to roll back the stone. All the powers of death and darkness are under the control of the God of light and life. An angel from heaven has power to break the seal, though it were the great seal of Israel, and is able to roll away the stone, though ever so great. The angel's sitting upon the stone, when he had rolled it away, is very observable. There he sat, defying all the powers of hell to roll

Vss. 1-15. GLORIOUS ANGELIC ANNOUNCEMENT ON THE FIRST DAY OF THE WEEK, THAT CHRIST IS RISEN—HIS APPEARANCE TO THE WOMEN—THE GUARDS BRIBED TO GIVE A FALSE ACCOUNT OF THE RESURRECTION. (=Mark 16:1-8; Luke 24:1-8; John 20:1).

The Resurrection Announced to the Women (vss. 1-8). 1. In the end of the sabbath, as it began to dawn—after the Sabbath, as it grew toward daylight. toward the first day of the week—Luke (24:1) has it, "very early in the morning"—properly, "at the first appearance of daybreak"; and corresponding with this, John (20:1) says, "when it was yet dark." See on Mark 16:2. Not an hour, it would seem, was lost by those dear lovers of the Lord Jesus. came Mary Magdalene, and the other Mary—"the mother of James and Joses" (see on ch. 27:56, 61). to see the sepulchre—with a view to the anointing of the body, for which they had made all their preparations. (See on Mark 16:1, 2).

And, behold, there was—i.e., there had been, before the arrival of the women. a great earthquake; for the angel of the Lord descended from heaven . . .—And this was the state of things when the women drew near. Some judicious critics think all this was transacted while the women were approaching; but the view we have given, which is the prevalent one, seems the more natural. All this august preparation—recorded by Matthew alone—bespoke the grandeur of the exit which was to follow. The angel sat upon the huge stone, to overawe, with the lightning-luster that darted from him, the Roman guard, and do honor to his rising Lord.

ADAM CLARKE

1. In the end of the sabbath. "After the end of the week." In general the Jews divided their natural day, which consisted of twenty-four hours, into day and night. Their artificial day began at the rising and ended at the setting of the sun; all the rest of the time, from the setting to the rising of the sun, they termed night. Hence the same word, in Hebrew, signifies both evening and night, Gen. i. 5; Mark vi. 47. Matthew has employed the word in this extensive sense here, pointing out the latter part of the Jewish night, that which immediately preceded the rising of the sun, and not that first part which we call the evening. The transaction mentioned here evidently took place early on the morning of the third day after our Lord's crucifixion; what is called our Sunday morning, or first day of the next week.

Came . . . to see the sepulchre. That is, they set out at this time in order to visit the tomb of our Lord, and also to weep there, John xi. 31, and to embalm the body of our Lord, Luke xxiv. 1. Matthew omits Mary Salome, mentioned by Mark; and Joanna, the wife of Chuza, Herod's steward, mentioned by Luke. The other Mary was the wife of Cleopas, and mother of James and Joses, mentioned before, chap. xxvii. 56. Were not Mary and Salome two distinct persons?

2. A great earthquake. A "shaking" or "commotion" of any kind; probably the word means no more than the confusion caused among the guards by the angel's appearance. All this had taken place before the women reached the sepulchre. The angel of the Lord descended from heaven. Matthew is very particular in this to show that the word angel is not to be taken in the sense of an ordinary messenger, who might have come from Joseph of Arimathaea, or from any other; but in the sense of an extraordinary messenger, who descended from God out of heaven for this very purpose. It is likely that the angel had descended, rolled away the stone, and was sitting on it, before the women reached the tomb.

the stone to the grave again. The angel sat as a guard to the grave, having frightened away the enemies' black guard; he sat, expecting the women, and ready to give them an account of his resurrection.

4. That his countenance was like lightning, and his raiment white as snow, v. 3. His look upon the keeper was like flashes of lightning. The whiteness of his raiment was an emblem, not only of purity, but of joy and triumph. When Christ died, the court of heaven went into deep mourning, signified by the darkening of the sun; but when he arose, they again put on the garments of praise. The glory of this angel represented the glory of Christ, to which he was now risen, for it is the same description that was given of him in his transfiguration (ch. xvii. 2); but when he conversed with his disciples after his resurrection, he drew a veil over it.

5. That for fear of him the keepers did shake, and became as dead men, v. 4. They were soldiers, that thought themselves hardened against fear, yet the very sight of an angel struck them with terror. The resurrection of Christ, as it is the joy of his friends, so it is the terror and confusion of his enemies. They did shake; the word is the same with that which was used for the earthquake, v. 2. When the earth shook, these children of the earth, that had their portion in it, shook too; whereas, those that have their happiness in things above, though the earth be removed, yet are without fear. They were posted here, to keep a dead man in his grave—as easy a piece of service surely as was ever assigned them, and yet it proves too hard for them.

III. The message which this angel delivered to the women, v. 5–7.

1. He encourages them against their fears, v. 5. To come near to graves and tombs, especially in silence and solitude, has something in it frightful, much more was it so to those women, to find an angel at the sepulchre; but he soon makes them easy with the word, Fear not ye. The keepers shook, and became as dead men, but, Fear not ye. "Let not the news I have to tell you, be any surprise to you; let it be no terror to you, for his resurrection will be your consolation. Fear not ye, for I know that ye seek Jesus. I do not come to frighten you, but to encourage you." Those that seek Jesus, have no reason to be afraid; for, if they seek him diligently they shall find him. Ye seek Jesus that was crucified. He mentions his being crucified, the more to commend their love to him; "You seek him still, though he was crucified." True believers love and seek Christ, not only though he was crucified, but because he was so.

2. He assures them of the resurrection of Christ; and there was enough in that to silence their fears, v. 6. To be told He is not here, would have been no welcome news to those who sought him, if it had not been added, He is risen. We must not hearken to those who say, Lo, here is Christ, or, Lo, he is there, for he is not here, he is not there, he is risen. We must seek him as one risen. They that make pictures and images of Christ, forget that he is not here, he is risen; our communion with him must be spiritual, by faith in his word. We must seek him with great reverence and humility, and an awful regard to his glory, for he is risen. We must seek him with a heavenly mind; when we are ready to make this world our home, and to say, It is good to be here, let us remember our Lord Jesus is not here, he is risen, and therefore let not our hearts be here, but let them rise too.

Two things the angel refers these women to, for the confirmation of their faith.

(1) To his word now fulfilled, which they might remember; He is risen, as he said. "He said that he would rise, why should you be backward to believe that which he told you would be?" Let us never think that strange, of which the word of Christ has raised our expectations. If we remember what Christ hath said to us, we shall be the less surprised at what he does with us.

(2) To his grave now empty, which they might look into; "Come, see the place where the Lord lay. Compare what you have heard, with what you see, and, putting both together, you will believe." It may have a good influence upon us, to come, and with an eye of faith see the place where the Lord lay. When we look into the grave, where we expect we must lie, to take off the terror of it, let us look into the grave where the Lord lay; the place where our Lord lay.

3. He directs them to go carry the tidings of it to his disciples (v. 7); Go quickly, and tell his disciples. It was good to be here, but they have other work appointed them. They must not have the monopoly of it, must not hold their peace. They must go tell the disciples. Public usefulness to others must be preferred before the pleasure of secret communion

3. His countenance—appearance—was like lightning, and his raiment white as snow—the one expressing the glory, the other the purity of the celestial abode from which he came.

4. And for fear of him the keepers did shake, and became as dead men—Is the sepulchre "sure" now, O ye chief priests? He that sitteth in the heavens doth laugh at you.

5. And the angel answered and said unto the women, Fear not ye—The "ye" here is emphatic, to contrast their case with that of the guards. "Let those puny creatures, sent to keep the Living One among the dead, for fear of Me shake and become as dead men (vs. 4); but ye that have come hither on another errand, fear not ye." for I know that ye seek Jesus, which was crucified—Jesus the Crucified.

ADAM CLARKE

3. His countenance. "His appearance" or "his face," for so the word is used in some of the best Greek writers. It seems, from Mark xvi. 5, that this angel had assumed the appearance of a young man. Like lightning. Coruscations of glory continually flaming from his face. This might produce the confusion mentioned in v. 2. His raiment white as snow. He was clothed in garments emblematical of the glad tidings which he came to announce. It would have been inconsistent with the message he brought had the angel appeared in black robes, such as those preposterously wear who call themselves his successors in the ministry of a once suffering, but now risen and highly exalted, Saviour.

4. The keepers . . . became as dead men. God can, by one and the same means, comfort His servants and terrify His enemies. The resurrection of Christ is a subject of terror to the servants of sin and a subject of consolation to the sons of God, because it is proof of the resurrection of both—the one to shame and everlasting contempt—the other to eternal glory and joy.

5. I know that ye seek Jesus. Speaking after the manner of men, these women deserved to be the first witnesses of the resurrection of Christ. During life they ministered to Him, and in death they were not divided. They attended Him to the Cross, notwithstanding their attachment to Him exposed them to the most imminent danger; and now they come to watch and weep at His tomb. The common opinion is that women are more fickle and less courageous than men. The reverse of this I believe to be the truth in those who are thoroughly converted to God; and who, previously to conversion, whether man or woman, can be trusted in any case?

A. B. SIMPSON:

Christ's resurrection was witnessed by the angels of God. Not often do these mighty beings interpose in human affairs. Certainly they do not come down from heaven to play a farce such as the enemies of Christ's resurrection would imply. Their presence on this occasion intimates that some stupendous event had occurred. There were apparently two angelic parties, the one that rolled away the stone and two others that afterward were found sitting where the body of Jesus had lain. So mighty was this glorious being that "his countenance was like lightning and his raiment white as snow, and for fear of him the keepers did shake and became as dead men." But as the women drew near with their loving offerings for the body of Jesus, He answered and said unto them, "Fear not."

The voice of heaven proclaims the resurrection of Jesus Christ. The mighty angels, who came down at Sinai and at the Savior's birth and who are to come once more when the Lord returns, were there to herald His victory over the grave and the ushering in of the great redemption which His death assured. Joyfully we listen to their message and echo back the glad refrain, "The Lord is risen indeed!"—Christ in the Bible

6. He is not here; for he is risen, as he said—See on Luke 24:5-7. Come—as in ch. 11:28. see the place where the Lord lay. Charming invitation! "Come, see the spot where the Lord of glory lay: now it is an empty grave: He lies not here, but He lay there. Come, feast your eyes on it!" But see on John 20:12.

7. And go quickly, and tell his disciples—For a precious addition to this, see on Mark 16:7. that he is risen from the dead; and, behold, he goeth before you into Galilee—to which those women belonged (ch. 27:55).

6. Come, see the place. The tomb in which our Lord was laid was no doubt like the rest of the Jewish burying places, a receptacle for the several dead of a whole family, divided into separate niches, where each had his place. Come, see the place was tantamount to, Come and see the niche in which He was laid—it is now empty. Nor was there any other body in the place, for the tomb was a new one, in which no man had ever been laid, John xix. 41; so there could be no deception in the case.

7. Go quickly, and tell his disciples. Thus these faithful women proclaim the gospel to those who were afterwards to be the teachers of the whole human race! That he is risen from the dead. There is a remarkable saying of with God ourselves.

(1) The disciples of Christ must first be told the news; not, Go, tell the chief priests and the Pharisees, that they may be confounded; but, Tell the disciples, that they may be comforted. God anticipates the joy of his friends more than the shame of his enemies. Tell his disciples; [1] That they may encourage themselves under their present sorrows and dispersions. It was a dismal time with them, between grief and fear; what a cordial would this be to them now, to hear, their Master is risen! [2] That they may enquire further into it themselves. This was to set them on seeking him, and to prepare them for his appearance to them. General hints excite to closer searches. They shall now hear of him, but shall very shortly see him.

(2) The women are sent to tell it to them. This was a recompence for their constant affectionate adherence to him, at the cross, and in the grave, and a rebuke to the disciples who forsook him. As the woman was first in the transgression, so these women were first in the belief of the redemption from transgression by Christ's resurrection.

(3) They were bid to go quickly upon this errand. Why, what haste was there? Would not the news keep cold, and be welcome to them at any time? Yes, but they were now overwhelmed with grief, and Christ would have this cordial hastened to them. We must always be ready and forward to do good to our brethren, and to carry comfort to them, now, quickly.

(4) They were directed to appoint the disciples to meet him in Galilee. Now this general rendezvous was appointed in Galilee, eighty or a hundred miles from Jerusalem; [1] In kindness to those of his disciples that remained in Galilee, and did not (perhaps they could not) come up to Jerusalem. Christ knows where his disciples dwell, and will visit there. Even to them that are at a distance from the plenty of the means of grace he will graciously manifest himself. [2] In consideration of the weakness of his disciples that were now at Jerusalem, who as yet were afraid of the Jews, and durst not appear publicly. Christ knows our fears, and considers our frame, and made his appointment where there was least danger of disturbance.

Lastly, The angel solemnly affirms upon his word the truth of what he had related to them; "Lo, I have told you, you may be assured of it." This angel was now sent to certify the resurrection of Christ to the disciples, and so leave it in their hands to be published to the world. "I have done my errand, I have faithfully delivered my message, I have told you." Those messengers from God, that discharge their trust faithfully, may take the comfort of that, whatever the success be.

IV. The women's departure from the sepulchre, to bring notice to the disciples, v. 8.

1. What frame and temper of spirit they were in; They departed with fear and great joy; a strange mixture, fear and joy at the same time, in the same soul. To hear that Christ was risen, was matter of joy; but to be led into his grave, and to see an angel, and talk with him about it, could not but cause fear. It was good news, but they were afraid that it was too good to be true. It is said of their joy, it was great joy; it is not said so of their fear. Holy fear has joy attending it. It is only perfect love and joy that will cast out all fear.

2. What haste they made; They did run. The fear and joy together quickened their pace, and added wings to their motion. Those that are sent on God's errand must not loiter, or lose time.

3. What errand they went upon; They ran, to bring his disciples word. They ran, to comfort them with the same comforts wherewith they themselves were comforted of God. The disciples of Christ should be forward to communicate to each other their experiences, should tell others what God has done for their souls, and spoken to them. Joy in Christ Jesus will betray itself.

V. Christ's appearing to the women, to confirm the testimony of the angel, v. 9, 10. These zealous good women, not only heard the first tidings of him, but had the first sight of him, after his resurrection. Jesus Christ is often better than his word, but never worse; often anticipates, but never frustrates, the believing expectations of his people.

1. Christ's surprising appearance to the women; As they went to tell his disciples, behold, Jesus met them. God's gracious visits usually meet us in the way of duty, and to those who use what they have for others' benefit, more shall be given. This interview with Christ was unexpected. Christ is nearer to his people than they imagine. Christ was nigh them, and still in the word is nigh us.

2. The salutation wherewith he accosted them; there shall ye see him—This must refer to those more public manifestations of Himself to large numbers of disciples at once, which He vouchsafed only in Galilee; for individually He was seen of some of those very women almost immediately after this (vss. 9, 10).

Lo, I have told you—Behold, ye have this word from the world of light!

8. And they departed quickly—Mark (16:8) says "they fled." from the sepulchre with fear and great joy—How natural this combination of feelings! See on a similar statement of Mark 16:11.

and did run to bring his disciples word—"Neither said they anything to any man [by the way]; for they were afraid" (Mark 16:8).

F. B. MEYER:

The open and empty tomb. Ere the sun had risen and while the glory of the dawn was faint in the eastern sky, the women were well on their way. But he whom they sought had gone. How often we look down into the grave of the dead past, or we peer for help into the diaries, prayers, and rites of departed saints or a moribund church—but we do not find the Lord. The divine Leader of souls is not behind us, but before; not in the grave of the dead past, but in the vanguard of the world's march. Lo, he beckons us on to follow the ascension mountain and the opened Heaven!

The Lord engaged women as messengers of his resurrection (Ps. 68:11). How eagerly they caught his idea, and with what alacrity they endeavored to fulfill it. And as they went, he for whom they went met them! It is ever thus. We go on his errands, but we do not leave him as we go. On the contrary, he meets us (Isa. 64:5).—Bible Commentary

R. Judah Hakkodesh, which some critics quote on this subject: "After three days the soul of the Messiah shall return to its body, and he shall go out of that stone in which he shall be buried."

Goeth before you into Galilee. As himself promised, chap. xxvi. 32.

8. They departed quickly from the sepulchre. At the desire of the angel they went into the tomb, to have the fullest certainty of the Resurrection. Fear and great joy. Fear produced by the appearance of this glorious messenger of God, and great joy occasioned by the glad tidings of the resurrection of their Lord and Master. At the mention of unexpected good news, fear and joy are generally intermingled.

A. T. ROBERTSON:

8. "With fear and great joy" (meta phobou kai charas megales). A touch of life was this as the excited women ran quickly (tachu edramon) as they had been told "to bring his disciples word" (apaggeilai tois mathetais autou). They had the greatest piece of news that it was possible to have. Mark calls it fear and ecstasy. Anything seemed possible now. Mark even says that at first they told no one anything, for they were afraid (Mark 16:9), the tragic close of the text of Mark in Aleph and B, our two oldest manuscripts. But these mingled emotions of ecstasy and dread need cause no surprise when all things are considered.—Word Pictures in the New Testament

MATTHEW HENRY

All hail—χαίρετε. We use the old English form of salutation, wishing all health to those we meet; for so All hail signifies. And it bespeaks, (1) The goodwill of Christ to us and our happiness. (2) The freedom and holy familiarity which he used in his fellowship with his disciples; for he called them friends. But the Greek word signifies, Rejoice ye. They were affected both with fear and joy; what he said to them tended to encourage their joy (v. 9), Rejoice ye, and to silence their fear (v. 10), Be not afraid. It is the will of Christ that his people should be a cheerful joyful people, and his resurrection furnishes them with abundant matter for joy.

3. The affectionate respect they paid him; They came, and held him by the feet, and worshipped him. Thus they expressed, (1) The reverence and honour they had for him. (2) The love and affection they had to him; they held him, and would not let him go. (3) The transport of joy they were in, now that they had this further assurance of his resurrection.

4. The encouraging words Christ said to them, v. 10. We do not find that they said anything to him, their affectionate embraces and adorations spoke plainly enough; and what he said to them was no more than what the angel had said (v. 5, 7). Now observe here,

(1) How he rebukes their fear; Be not afraid. The news, though strange, was both true and good. Christ arose from the dead, to silence his people's fears, and there is enough in that to silence them.

(2) How he repeats their message; "Go, tell my brethren, that they must prepare for a journey into Galilee, and there they shall see me." If there be any communion between our souls and Christ, it is he that appoints the meeting, and he will observe the appointment. But that which is especially observable here, is, that he calls his disciples his brethren. He never called them so till after his resurrection, here and John xx. 17. Christ did not now converse so constantly and familiarly with his disciples as he had done before his death; but he gives them this endearing title, Go to my brethren. They had shamefully deserted him in his sufferings; but he not only continues his purpose to meet them, but calls them brethren.

We have here the confession of the adversaries that were upon the guard; and there are two things which strengthen this testimony—that they were eye-witnesses—and that they were enemies, set there to oppose and obstruct his resurrection.

I. How this testimony was given in to the chief priests (v. 11). Some of the watch came into the city, and brought to those who employed them, the report of their disappointment. They showed to the chief priests all the things that were done; told them of the earthquake, the descent of the angel, the rolling of the stone away, and the coming of the body of Jesus alive out of the grave. So the utmost means of conviction were afforded them. It might justly have been expected that they should now have believed in Christ, but they were obstinate in their infidelity, and therefore sealed up under it.

II. How it was baffled and stifled by them. They called an assembly, and considered what was to be done. For their own parts, they were resolved not to believe that Jesus was risen; but their care was, to keep others from believing.

The result of their debate was, that those soldiers must by all means be bribed off, and hired not to tell tales. They put money into their hands. They gave large money unto the soldiers. These chief priests loved their money as well as most people did, and were as loth to part with it; and yet, to carry on a malicious design against the gospel of Christ, they were very prodigal of it. Here was large money given for the advancing of that which they knew to be a lie, yet many grudge a little money for the advancement of that which they know to be the truth. Let us never starve a good cause, when we see a bad one so liberally supported. They put a lie into their mouths (v. 13); Say ye, His disciples came by night, and stole him away while we slept; a sorry shift is better than none, but this is a sorry one indeed. (1) The sham was ridiculous, and carried along with it its own confutation. If they slept, how could they know anything of the matter, or say who came? But had it been ever so plausible, (2) It was a wicked thing for these priests and elders to hire those soldiers to tell a deliberate lie.

But lest the soldiers should object the penalty they incurred by the Roman law for sleeping upon the guard, which was very severe (Acts xii. 19), they promised to interpose with the governor; "We will persuade him, and secure you." If really these soldiers had slept, and so suffered the disciples to steal him

Appearance to the Women (vss. 9,:10). This appearance is recorded only by Matthew. 9. And as they went to tell his disciples, behold, Jesus met them, saying, All hail!—the usual salute, but from the lips of Jesus bearing a higher signification. And they came and held him by the feet—How truly womanly!

10. Then said Jesus unto them, Be not afraid—What dear associations would these familiar words—now uttered in a higher style, but by the same Lips—bring rushing back to their recollection! go tell my brethren that they go into Galilee, and there shall they see me—The brethren here meant must have been His brethren after the flesh (cf. 13:55); for His brethren in the higher sense (see on John 20:17) had several meetings with Him at Jerusalem before He went to Galilee, which they would have missed if they had been the persons ordered to Galilee to meet Him.

The Guards Bribed (vss. 11-15). The whole of this important portion is peculiar to Matthew. 11. Now when they were going—while the women were on their way to deliver to His brethren the message of their risen Lord. some of the watch came into the city, and showed unto the chief priests all the things that were done—Simple, unsophisticated soldiers! How could ye imagine that such a tale as ye had to tell would not at once commend itself to your scared employers? Had they doubted this for a moment, would they have ventured to go near them, knowing it was death to a Roman soldier to be proved asleep when on guard? and of course that was the only other explanation of the case. 12. And when they were assembled with the elders—But Joseph at least was absent: Gamaliel probably also; and perhaps others.

and had taken counsel, they gave large money unto the soldiers—It would need a good deal; but the whole case of the Jewish authorities was now at stake. With what contempt must these soldiers have regarded the Jewish ecclesiastics! 13. Saying, Say ye, His disciples came by night, and stole him away while we slept—which, as we have observed, was a capital offense for soldiers on guard.

14. And if this come to the governor's ears—rather, "If this come before the governor"; i.e., not in the way of mere report, but for judicial investigation—we will persuade him, and secure you—The "we" and the "you" are emphatic here—"we shall [take care to] persuade him

9. All hail. "Be safe, rejoice."

10. Be not afraid. They were seized with fear at the sight of the angel, and this was now renewed by this unexpected appearance of Christ. Go tell my brethren. This is the first time our Lord called His disciples by this endearing name. They no doubt thought that their Lord would reproach them with their past cowardice and infidelity; but, in speaking thus, He gives them a full assurance, in the most tender terms, that all that was past was as buried forever.

11. Some of the watch. Or "guards." Probably the rest still remained at the tomb, waiting for orders to depart, and had sent these to intimate to their employers the things that had taken place.

12. With the elders. That is, the "senators" of the great Sanhedrin or Jewish council of state, elsewhere called "the elders of the people"; they could now meet, as the Sabbath was over.

13. His disciples came by night. This was as absurd as it was false. On one hand, the terror of the disciples, the smallness of their number (only eleven), and their almost total want of faith; on the other, the great danger of such a bold enterprise, the number of armed men who guarded the tomb, the authority of Pilate and of the Sanhedrin, must render such an imposture as this utterly devoid of credit. Stole him away while we slept. Here is a whole heap of absurdities. (1) Is it likely that so many men would all fall asleep, in the open air, at once? (2) Is it at all probable that a Roman guard should be found off their watch, much less asleep, when it was instant death, according to the Roman military laws, to be found in this state? (3) Could they be so sound asleep as not to awake with all the noise which must be necessarily made by removing the great stone and taking away the body? (4) Is it at all likely that these disciples could have had sufficient time to do all this, and to come and return, without being perceived by any person? And (5), If they were asleep, how could they possibly know that it was the disciples that stole Him, or indeed that any person or persons stole Him? For, being asleep, they could see no person.

14. If this come to the governor's ears. Pilate. We will persuade him that it is for his own interest and honor to join in the deception; and we will render you secure—we will take care that you shall not suffer that punishment for this pretended breach of duty which otherwise you might expect.

away, the priests and elders would certainly have been the forwardest to solicit the governor to punish them for their treachery; so that their care for the soldiers' safety plainly gives the lie to the story.

Well, thus was the plot laid; now what success had it?

[1] Those that were willing to deceive, took the money, and did as they were taught. They took the money; that was it they aimed at, and nothing else. Money is a bait for the blackest temptation; mercenary tongues will sell the truth for it.

The great argument to prove Christ to be the Son of God, is, his resurrection and none could have more convincing proofs of the truth of that than these soldiers had; they saw the angel descend from heaven, saw the stone rolled away, saw the body of Christ come out of the grave, and yet they were so far from being convinced by it themselves, that they were hired to belie him, and to hinder others from believing in him. The most sensible evidence will not convince men, without the concurring operation of the Holy Spirit.

[2] Those that were willing to be deceived, not only credited, but propagated, the story; This saying is commonly reported among the Jews until this day. The sham took well enough, and answered the end. The Jews, when they were pressed with the argument of Christ's resurrection, had this still ready to reply, His disciples came, and stole him away. When once a lie is raised, none knows how far it will spread, nor how long it will last, nor what mischief it will do.

This evangelist passes over several other appearances of Christ, recorded by Luke and John, and hastens to this, which was of all other the most solemn, as being promised and appointed again and again before his death, and after his resurrection.

I. How the disciples attended his appearance, according to the appointment (v. 16); They went into Galilee, a long journey to go for one sight of Christ, but it was worth while.

1. Because he appointed them to do so. Though it seemed a needless thing to go into Galilee, yet they had learned to obey Christ's commands and not object against them. Those who would maintain communion with Christ, must attend him there where he has appointed.

2. Because that was to be a public and general meeting. The place was a mountain in Galilee, probably the same mountain on which he was transfigured. There they met, for privacy, and perhaps to signify the exalted state into which he was entered.

II. How they were affected with the appearance of Christ to them, v. 17. We are told,

1. That they worshipped him; many of them did so, nay, it should seem, they all did that, they gave divine honour to him. All that see the Lord Jesus with an eye of faith are obliged to worship him.

2. But some doubted. Even among those that worship there are some that doubt. The faith of those that are sincere, may yet be very weak and wavering. They hung in suspense, as the scales of the balance, when it is hard to say which preponderates. It tended much to the honour of Christ, that the disciples doubted before they believed; so that they cannot be said to be credulous, and willing to be imposed upon; for they first questioned, and proved all things, and then held fast that which was true, and which they found to be so.

III. What Jesus Christ said to them (v. 18–20); Jesus came, and spoke unto them. He did not stand at a distance, but came near, and gave them such convincing proofs of his resurrection, as turned the wavering scale, and made their faith to triumph over their doubts. He came, and spoke familiarly to them, as one friend speaks to another. Christ now delivered to his apostles the great charter of his kingdom in the world, was sending them out as his ambassadors, and here gives them their credentials.

In opening this great chapter, we may observe two things.

1. The commission which our Lord Jesus received himself from the Father. Being about to authorize his apostles, here he tells us, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Hereby he asserts his universal dominion as Mediator. He has all power. (1) Whence he hath this power. It was given him, by a grant from him who is the Fountain of all being, and consequently of all power. As God, equal with the Father, all power was originally and essentially his; but as Mediator, as God-man, all power was given him. He had this power given him over all flesh, that he might give eternal life to as many as were given him (John xvii. 2). This power he was now more signally invested in, upon his and keep you from trouble," or "save you harmless." The grammatical form of this clause implies that the thing supposed was expected to happen. The meaning then is, "If this come before the governor—as it likely will—we shall see to it that . . . ." The "persuasion" of Pilate meant, doubtless, quieting him by a bribe, which we know otherwise he was by no means above taking (like Felix afterwards, Acts 24:26). 15. So they took the money, and did as they were taught—thus consenting to brand themselves with infamy.

and this saying is commonly reported among the Jews until this day—to the date of the publication of this Gospel. The wonder is that so clumsy and incredible a story lasted so long. But those who are resolved not to come to the light will catch at straws. JUSTIN MARTYR, who flourished about A.D. 170, says, in his Dialogue with Trypho the Jew, that the Jews dispersed the story by means of special messengers sent to every country.

16-20. JESUS MEETS WITH THE DISCIPLES ON A MOUNTAIN IN GALILEE, AND GIVES FORTH THE GREAT COMMISSION. 16. Then the eleven disciples went away into Galilee—but certainly not before the second week after the resurrection, and probably somewhat later. into a mountain where Jesus had appointed them—It should have been rendered "the mountain," meaning some certain mountain which He had named to them—probably the night before He suffered, when He said, "After I am risen, I will go before you into Galilee" (ch. 26:32; Mark 14:28). What it was can only be conjectured; but of the two between which opinions are divided—the Mount of the Beatitudes or Mount Tabor—the former is much the more probable, from its nearness to the Sea of Tiberias, where last before this the Narrative tells us that He met and dined with seven of them. (John 21:1, etc.). That the interview here recorded was the same as that referred to in one place only—I Corinthians 15:6—when "He was seen of above five hundred brethren at once; of whom the greater part remained unto that day, though some were fallen asleep," is now the opinion of the ablest students of the evangelical history. Nothing can account for such a number as five hundred assembling at one spot but the expectation of some promised manifestation of their risen Lord: and the promise before His resurrection, twice repeated after it, best explains this immense gathering. 17. And when they saw him, they worshipped him; but some doubted—certainly none of "the Eleven," after what took place at previous interviews in Jerusalem. But if the five hundred were now present, we may well believe this of some of them.

ADAM CLARKE

15. Until this day. That is to say, the time in which Matthew wrote his Gospel.

16. Then the eleven disciples went. When the women went and told them that they had seen the Lord, and that He had promised to meet them in Galilee. From the eleventh to the fifteenth verse inclusive should be read in a parenthesis, as the sixteenth verse is the continuation of the subject mentioned in the tenth.

17. But some doubted. That is, Thomas only at first doubted. The expression simply intimates that they did not all believe at that time.

18. And Jesus came and spake unto them. It is supposed by some that the reason why any doubted was that, when they saw Jesus at first, He was at a distance; but when He came up, drew near to them, they were fully persuaded of the identity of His person. All power is given unto me. Or, "All authority in heaven and upon earth is given unto Me." One fruit of the sufferings and resurrection of Christ is represented to be His having authority or right in heaven to send down the Holy Spirit—to raise up His followers thither—and to crown them in the Kingdom of an endless glory; in earth, to convert sinners; to sanctify, protect, and perfect His Church; to subdue all nations to himself; resurrection. (2) Where he has this power; in heaven and earth, comprehending the universe. He is Lord of all. He has all power in heaven. He has power of dominion over the angels. He has power of intercession with his Father, he intercedes not as a suppliant, but as a demandant; Father, I will. He has all power on earth too; he prevails with men, and deals with them as one having authority, by the ministry of reconciliation. All souls are his, and to him every heart and knee must bow, and every tongue confess him to be the Lord. This our Lord Jesus tells them to take off the offence of the cross; they had no reason to be ashamed of Christ crucified, when they saw him thus glorified.

2. The commission he gives to those whom he sent forth; Go ye therefore. This commission is given, (1) To the apostles primarily, the architects that laid the foundation of the church. It is not only a word of command, like that, Son, go work, but a word of encouragement, Go, and fear not, have I not sent you? They must go, and bring the gospel to their doors, Go ye. As an eagle stirs up her nest, flutters over her young, to excite them to fly (Deut. xxxii. 11), so Christ stirs up his disciples, to disperse themselves over all the world. (2) It is given to their successors, the ministers of the gospel, whose business it is to transmit the gospel from age to age, to the end of the world in time. Christ, at his ascension, gave not only apostles and prophets, but pastors and teachers, Eph. iv. 11. Now observe,

How far his commission is extended; to all nations. Go, and disciple all nations. Now this plainly signifies it to be the will of Christ, First, That the covenant of peculiarity, made with the Jews, should now be cancelled and disannulled. Whereas the apostles, when first sent out, were forbidden to go into the way of the Gentiles, now they were sent to all nations. Secondly, That salvation by Christ should be offered to all, and none excluded that did not by their unbelief and impenitence exclude themselves. The salvation they were to preach is a common salvation. Thirdly, That Christianity should be twisted in with national constitutions, that the kingdoms of the world should become Christ's kingdoms, and their kings the church's nursing-fathers.

What is the principal intention of this commission; to disciple all nations. "Admit them disciples; do your utmost to make the nations Christian nations"; Christ the Mediator is setting up a kingdom in the world, bring the nations to be his subjects; setting up a school, bring the nations to be his scholars; raising an army, enlist the nations of the earth under his banner. The work which the apostles had to do, was, to set up the Christian religion in all places, and it was honourable work; the achievements of the mighty heroes of the world were nothing to it. They conquered the nations for themselves, and made them miserable; the apostles conquered them for Christ, and made them happy.

Their instructions for executing this commission. First, They must admit disciples by the sacred rite of baptism; "Go into all nations, preach the gospel to them, work miracles among them, and persuade them to come in themselves, and bring their children with them, into the church of Christ, and then admit them and theirs into the church, by washing them with water." Secondly, This baptism must be administered in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. That is, 1. By authority from heaven, and not of man; for his ministers act by authority from the three persons in the Godhead. 2. Calling upon the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Everything is sanctified by prayer, and particularly the waters of baptism. But, 3. It is into the name (εἰς το ὄνομα) of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; this was intended as the summary of the first principles of the Christian religion. By our being baptized, we solemnly profess, (1) Our assent to the scripture-revelation concerning God, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. (2) Our consent to a covenant-relation to God, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Baptism is a sacrament, that is, it is an oath. It is an oath of abjuration, by which we renounce the world and the flesh, as rivals with God for the throne in our hearts; and an oath of allegiance, by which we resign and give up ourselves to God, to be his, body, soul, and spirit, to be governed by his will, and made happy in his favour; we become his men, so the form of homage in our law runs. [1] It is into the name of the Father, believing him to be the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and our Father, as our Creator, Preserver, and Benefactor, to whom therefore we resign ourselves, to rule us, as free agents, by his law; and as our chief good, and highest end. [2] It is into the name of the Son, the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God. In baptism we assent, as Peter did, Thou art Christ, the Son of the living God

A. B. SIMPSON:

The word power here more exactly means "dominion, authority," and has reference to the sceptre and sovereignty of a king. The Lord Jesus means that He has been appointed to administer the government, both of heaven and earth, until the consummation of redemption. It is, indeed, a glorious and transcendent claim.

He has all power to settle the standing and destiny of every sinner, and to control all our future prospects and our relations to God. He himself could say, "Thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him." Through His name and the acceptance of His words all sins are forgiven, and the guilty soul in a moment translated out of the kingdom of Satan and from the curse of sin and hell to the glorious liberty of the children of God and heirship of His everlasting kingdom. He has power, in a moment, to arrest the sentence of judgment and condemnation, and to proclaim the guilty acquitted, justified, and joint-heirs with himself of all the hopes of the Gospel.

The power of salvation is in His hands. The Son of God has received from the Father the right to emancipate every criminal under the sun from every curse of the law of God if he will accept His mighty clemency. Well may we rejoice in the power of Jesus—His power to save. Well may the prophet cry in wonder and admiration, "Who is this that cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah? I that speak in righteousness, mighty to save."

—Christ in the Bible

19. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations—rather, "make disciples of all nations"; for "teaching," in the more usual sense of that word, comes in afterwards, and is expressed by a different term.

baptizing them in the name—It should be, "into the name"; as in I Corinthians 10: 2, "And were all baptized unto (or rather 'into') Moses"; and Galatians 3:27, "For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ." of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; and, finally, to judge all mankind. If Jesus Christ were not equal with the Father, could He have claimed this equality of power without being guilty of impiety and blasphemy? Surely not; and does He not, in the fullest manner, assert His Godhead, and His equality with the Father, by claiming and possessing all the authority in heaven and earth?—i.e., all the power and authority by which both empires are governed?

ADAM CLARKE

19. Go ye therefore. Because I have the authority aforesaid, and can send whomsoever I will to do whatsoever I please.

Teach, "make disciples of all nations," bring them to an acquaintance with God who bought them, and then baptize them in the name of the Father. It is natural to suppose that adults were the first subjects of baptism; for as the gospel was, in a peculiar manner, sent to the Gentiles, they must hear and receive it before they could be expected to renounce their old prejudices and idolatries and come into the bonds of the Christian covenant. But certainly no argument can be drawn from this concession against the baptism of children. When the Gentiles and Jews had received the faith and blessings of the gospel, it is natural enough to suppose they should wish to get their children incorporated with the Visible Church of Christ; especially if, as many pious and learned men have believed, baptism succeeded to circumcision, which I think has never yet been disproved. The apostles knew well that the Jews not only circumcised the children of proselytes, but also baptized them; and as they now received a commission to teach and proselyte all the nations, and baptize them in the name of the Holy Trinity, they must necessarily understand that infants were included. Nor could they, the custom of their country being considered, have understood our Lord differently unless He had, in the most express terms, said that they were not to baptize children, which neither He nor His apostles ever did. And as to the objection that the baptized were obliged to profess their faith, and that, therefore, only adults should be baptized, there is no weight at all in it; because what is spoken of such refers to those who, only at that period of life, heard the gospel, and were not born of parents who had been Christians; therefore they could not have been baptized into the Christian faith, forasmuch as no such faith was at their infancy preached in the world. In the name of the Father. Baptism, properly speaking, whether administered by dipping or sprinkling, signifies a full and eternal consecration of the person to the service and honor of that Being in whose name it is administered. But this consecration can never be made to a creature; therefore the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit are not creatures. Again, baptism is not made in the name of a quality or attribute of the divine nature; therefore the Father, and the Son, and (ch. xvi. 16), and consent, as Thomas did, My Lord, and my God, John xx. 28. We take Christ to be our Prophet, Priest, and King, and give up ourselves to be taught, and saved, and ruled, by him. [3] It is into the name of the Holy Ghost. We give up ourselves to his conduct and operation, as our sanctifier, teacher, guide and comforter. Thirdly, Those that are thus baptized, and enrolled among the disciples of Christ, must be taught (v. 20); Teaching them to observe all things, whatsoever I have commanded you. This denotes two things. The duty of disciples, of all baptized Christians; they must observe all things whatsoever Christ has commanded, and, in order to that, must submit to the teaching of those whom he sends. He enlists soldiers that he may train them up for his service.

All that are baptized, are thereby obliged, (1) To make the command of Christ their rule. We are by baptism bound, and must obey. (2) To observe what Christ has commanded. Due obedience to the commands of Christ requires a diligent observation. (3) To observe all things, that he has commanded, without exception; all the moral duties, and all the instituted ordinances. (4) To confine themselves to the commands of Christ, and as not to diminish from them, so not to add to them. (5) To learn their duty according to the law of Christ, from those whom he has appointed to be teachers in his school. The duty of the apostles of Christ, and his ministers; and that is, to teach the commands of Christ. They must teach them, and in the knowledge of them Christians must be trained up. The heirs of heaven, till they come to age, must be under tutors and governors. Here is the assurance he gives them of his spiritual presence with them in the execution of this commission; And lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world. Observe,

(1) The favour promised them; I am with you. Not, I will be with you, but I am. He was now about to leave them; his bodily presence was now to be removed from them, and this grieved them; but he assures them of his spiritual presence, I am with you; that is, "My Spirit is with you, the Comforter shall abide with you, John xvi. 7. I am with you, and not against you: with you to take your part, to be on your side. I am with you, and not absent from you, not at a distance; I am a very present help," Ps. xlvi. 1. Christ was now sending them to set up his kingdom in the world. And then doth he seasonably promise them his presence with them, [1] To carry them on through the difficulties they were likely to meet with. "I am with you, to bear you up, to plead your cause; with you in all your services, in all your sufferings." [2] To succeed this great undertaking; "Lo, I am with you, to make your ministry effectual for the discipling of the nations." It was an unlikely thing that they should persuade people to become the disciples of a crucified Jesus; but lo, I am with you, and therefore you shall gain your point.

[1] They shall have his constant presence; always, πάσας τὰς ἡμέρας—all days, every day. "I will be with you on sabbath days and week days, fair days and foul days, winter days and summer days" Since his resurrection he had appeared to them now and then. But he assures them that they shall have his spiritual presence continued to them without intermission. The God of Israel, the Saviour, is sometimes a God that hideth himself (Isa. xlv. 15), but never a God that absenteth himself; sometimes in the dark, but never at a distance.

[2] They shall have his perpetual presence, even to the end of the world. This is hastening towards its period; and even till then the Christian religion shall, in one part of the world or other, be kept up, and the presence of Christ continued with his ministers. I am with you to the end of the world, First, With you and your writings. There is a divine power going along with the scriptures of the New Testament, not only preserving them in being, but producing strange effects by them, which will continue to the end of time. Secondly, With you and your successors; with all who thus baptize and thus teach. This is an encouraging word to all the faithful ministers of Christ, that what was said to the apostles, was said to them all, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee.

Two solemn farewells we find our Lord Jesus giving to his church, and his parting word at both of them is very encouraging; one was here, "Lo, I am with you always; I leave you, and yet still I am with you"; the other was, "Surely, I come quickly. I leave you for awhile, but I will be with you again shortly," Rev. xxii. 20. By this it appears that he did not part in anger, but in love, and that it is his will we should keep up both our communion with him and our expectation of him.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

Teaching them—This is teaching in the more usual sense of the term; or instructing the converted and baptized disciples. to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I—The "I" here is emphatic. It is enough that I—am with you alway—"all the days"; i.e., till making converts, baptizing, and building them up by Christian instruction, shall be no more. even unto the end of the world. Amen—This glorious Commission embraces two primary departments, the Missionary and the Pastoral, with two sublime and comprehensive Encouragements to undertake and go through with them.

First, The MISSIONARY department (vs. 18): "Go, make disciples of all nations." In the corresponding passage of Mark (16:15) it is, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature." The only difference is, that in this passage the sphere, in its worldwide compass and its universality of objects, is more fully and definitely expressed; while in the former the great aim and certain result is delightfully expressed in the command to "make disciples of all nations." "Go, conquer the world for Me; carry the glad tidings into all lands and to every ear, and deem not this work at an end till all nations shall have embraced the Gospel and enrolled themselves My disciples." Now, Was all this meant to be done by the Eleven men nearest to Him of the multitude then crowding around the risen Redeemer? Impossible. Was it to be done even in their lifetime? Surely not. In that little band Jesus virtually addressed Himself to all who, in every age, should take up from them the same work. Before the eyes of the Church's risen Head were spread out, in those Eleven men, all His servants of every age; and one and all of them received His commission at that moment. Well, what next? Set the seal of visible discipleship upon the converts, by "baptizing them into the name," i.e., into the whole fulness of the grace "of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," as belonging to them who believe. (See on II Cor. 13:14.) This done, the Missionary department of your work, which in its own nature is temporary, must merge in another, which is permanent. This is—

Second, The PASTORAL department (vs. 20): "Teach them"—teach these baptized members of the Church visible—"to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you," My apostles, during the three years ye have been with Me.

What must have been the feelings which such a Commission awakened? "WE who have scarce conquered our own misgivings—we, fishermen of Galilee, with no letters, no means, no influence over the humblest creature, conquer the world for Thee, Lord? Nay, Lord, do not mock us." "I mock you not, nor send you a warfare on your own charges. For"—Here we are brought to—

Third, The ENCOURAGEMENTS to undertake and go through with this work. These are two; one in the van, the other in the rear of the Commission itself.

First Encouragement: "All power in heaven"—the whole power of Heaven's love and wisdom and strength, "and all power in earth"—power over all persons, all passions, all principles, all movements—to bend them to this one high object, the evangelization of the world: All this "is given unto Me." as the risen Lord of all, to be by Me placed at your command—"Go ye therefore." But there remains a—the Holy Spirit are not qualities or attributes of the divine nature. The orthodox, as they are termed, have generally considered this text as a decisive proof of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, and what else can they draw from it? Is it possible for words to convey a plainer sense than do these? And do they not direct every reader to consider the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit as three distinct Persons?

20. Teaching them to observe all things. Men are ignorant of divine things and must be taught. Only those can be considered as proper teachers of the ignorant who are thoroughly instructed in whatsoever Christ has commanded. Persons who are entrusted with the public ministry of the Word should take care that they teach not human creeds and confessions of faith in place of the Sacred Writings but those things, and those only, which Jesus has commanded.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

There is another step still. Making disciples and bringing into communion with the Godhead is not all that is to flow from, and correspond to, and realize in the individual, the absolute authority of Jesus Christ—"teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you." We hear a great deal in these days about the worthlessness of mere dogmatic Christianity. Jesus Christ anticipated all that talk, and guarded it from exaggeration. For what He tells us here that we are to train ourselves and others in is not creed but conduct; not things to be believed or credenda but things to be done or agenda—"teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you." A creed that is not wrought out in actions is empty; conduct that is not informed, penetrated, regulated by creed is unworthy of a man, not to say of a Christian. What we are to know we are to know in order that we may do, and so inherit the benediction, which is never bestowed upon them that know, but upon them that, knowing these things, are blessed in, as well as for, the doing of them.

That training is to be continuous, educating to new views of duty; new applications of old truths, new sensitiveness of conscience, unveiling to us, ever as we climb, new heights to which we aspire. The Christian Church has not yet learned—thank God it is learning, though by slow degrees—all the moral and practical implications and applications of "the truth as it is in Jesus." And so these are the three things by which the Church recognizes and corresponds to the universal dominion of Christ, the making disciples universally; the bringing them into the communion of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit; and the training of them to conduct ever approximating more and more to the divine ideal of humanity in the glorified Christ.

The great promise. "I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world," or, as it might be read, "with you all the days, even to the accomplishment of the age." Note that emphatic "I am," which does not only denote certainty, but is the speech of Him who is lifted above the lower regions where Time rolls and the succession of events occurs. That "I am" covers all the varieties of was, is, will be. Notice the long vista of variously tinted days which opens here. Howsoever many they be, howsoever different their complexion, days of summer and days of winter, days of sunshine and days of storm, days of buoyant youth and days of stagnant, stereotyped old age, days of apparent failure and days of apparent prosperity, He is with us in them all. They change, He is "the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever."

—Expositions of Holy Scripture

MATTHEW HENRY

There is one word more remaining, which must not be overlooked, and that is Amen; which is not a cipher, intended only for a concluding word, like finis at the end of a book. It bespeaks Christ's confirmation of this promise, Lo, I am with you. It is his Amen, in whom all the promises are Yea and Amen. It bespeaks the church's concurrence with it, in their desire, and prayer, and expectation. It is the evangelist's Amen—So be it, blessed Lord. Our Amen to Christ's promises turns them into prayers.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

Second Encouragement: "And lo! I am with you all the days"—not only to perpetuity, but without one day's interruption, "even to the end of the world," The "Amen" is of doubtful genuineness in this place. If, however, it belongs to the text, it is the Evangelist's own closing word.

ADAM CLARKE

And, lo, I am with you alway. Literally, "Behold, I am with you every day." Unto the end of the world. Some translate, "to the end of this age," meaning the apostolic age, or Jewish dispensation; and then they refer the promise of Christ's presence to the working of miracles, and explain this by Mark xvi. 17-19, "In my name shall they cast out devils." But though the words are used in this sense in several places, see chap. xiii. 39-40, 49 and xxiv. 3, yet it is certain they were repeatedly used among the primitive ecclesiastical writers to denote the "consummation of all things"; and it is likely that this is the sense in which they are used here.

  - 2. The commission (16:14-18)
  - 3. The ascension (16:19, 20)

We have heard the evidence given by the first witness to the doctrine and miracles of our Lord Jesus; and now here is another witness produced, who calls for our attention.

Concerning this witness. His name is Mark. Marcus was a Roman name, and a very common one, and yet we have no reason to think but that he was by birth a Jew; but as Saul took the Roman name of Paul, so he of Mark. We read of John whose surname was Mark, sister's son to Barnabas, whom Paul was displeased with (Acts 15:37, 38), but afterward had a great kindness for, and not only ordered the churches to receive him (Col. 4:10), but sent for him to be his assistant, with this encomium, "He is profitable to me for the ministry" (2 Tim. 4:11); and he reckons him among his fellow laborers (Philem. 24). We read of Marcus whom Peter calls his son (1 Pet. 5:13); whether that was the same with the other is altogether uncertain. It is a tradition very current among the ancients, that St. Mark wrote this gospel under the direction of St. Peter, and that it was confirmed by his authority. Thus wrote Hieron, "Mark, the disciple and interpreter of Peter, being sent from Rome by the brethren, wrote a concise gospel"; and Tertullian said, "Mark, the interpreter of Peter, delivered in writing the things which had been preached by Peter." It is true Mark was no apostle, yet we think that both he and Luke were of the number of the seventy disciples. St. Jerome said that, after the writing of this gospel, he went into Egypt, and was the first that preached the gospel at Alexandria, where he founded a church, to which he was a great example of holy living.

Concerning this testimony. Mark's gospel is but short, much shorter than Matthew's, not giving so full an account of Christ's sermons as that did, but insisting chiefly on his miracles. It is very much a repetition of what we had in Matthew; many remarkable circumstances being added to the stories there related, but not many new matters. It was fit that such great things as these should be spoken and written, once, yea twice, because man is so unapt to perceive them, and so apt to forget them. Though it was written at Rome it was written in Greek, as was St. Paul's epistle to the Romans, the Greek being the more universal language.

I. What the New Testament is. It is the gospel of Jesus Christ the Son of God, v. 1. 1. It is gospel. It is a good word, and well worthy of all acceptation; it brings us glad tidings. 2. It is the gospel of Jesus Christ. The foregoing gospel began with the generation of Jesus Christ—that was but preliminary, this comes immediately to the business—the gospel of Christ. 3. This Jesus is the Son of God. That truth is the foundation on which the gospel is built, and which it is written to demonstrate.

II. What the reference of the New Testament is to the Old. The gospel of Jesus Christ begins, and so we shall find it goes on, just as it is written in the prophets, v. 2. which was most proper and powerful for the conviction of the Jews, who believed the Old Testament prophets to be sent of God, but it is of use to us all, for the confirmation of our faith both in the Old Testament and in the New.

Quotations are here borrowed from two prophecies —that of Isaiah, and that of Malachi, both of whom spoke to the same purport concerning the beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, in the ministry of John.

CHAPTER 1

Vss. 1-8. THE PREACHING AND BAPTISM OF JOHN. (=Matthew 3:1-12; Luke 3:1-18.) 1. The beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God —By the "Gospel" of Jesus Christ here is evidently meant the blessed Story which our Evangelist is about to tell of His Life, Ministry, Death, Resurrection, and Glorification, and of the begun Gathering of Believers in His Name. The abruptness with which he announces his subject, and the energetic brevity with which, passing by all preceding events, he hastens over the ministry of John and records the Baptism and Temptation of Jesus—as if impatient to come to the Public Life of the Lord of glory—have often been noticed as characteristic of this Gospel—a Gospel whose direct, practical, and singularly vivid setting imparts to it a preciousness peculiar to itself. What strikes every one is, that though the briefest of all the Gospels, this is in some of the principal scenes of our Lord's history the fullest. But what is not so obvious is, that wherever the finer and subtler feelings of humanity, or the deeper and more peculiar hues of our Lord's character were brought

CHAPTER 1

1. The beginning of the gospel. With utmost propriety Mark begins the Gospel dispensation by the preaching of John the Baptist, the forerunner of Jesus Christ and the first proclaimer of the incarnated Messiah. Son of God. Mark thus points out Jesus' divine origin, and thus glances at His miraculous conception. This was an essential character of the Messiah. See Matt. xvi. 16; xxvi. 63; Luke xxii. 67, etc.

MATTHEW HENRY

1. Malachi spoke very plainly (ch. iii. 1) concerning John Baptist. Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, v. 2. Christ himself had taken notice of this, and applied it to John (Matt. xi. 10), who was God's messenger, sent to prepare Christ's way.

2. Isaiah, the most evangelical of all the prophets, begins the evangelical part of his prophecy with this, which points to the beginning of the gospel of Christ, (Isa. xl. 3); The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness, v. 3. Matthew had taken notice of this, and applied it to John, ch. iii. 3. Such is the corruption of the world, that there is something to do to make room for him. When God sent his Son into the world, he took care, and when he sends him into the heart, he takes care, effectual care, to prepare his way before him. The mistakes of the judgment are rectified, and the crooked ways of the affections; then way is made for Christ's comforts. It is in a wilderness, for such this world is, that Christ's way is prepared, and theirs that follow him, like that which Israel passed through to Canaan. They that are sent to prepare the way of the Lord, in such a vast howling wilderness as this is, have need to cry aloud.

III. What the beginning of the New Testament was. The gospel began in John Baptist. His baptism was the dawning of the gospel day.

1. In John's way of living there was the beginning of a gospel spirit; for it bespoke great self-denial, mortification of the flesh, a holy contempt of the world, and nonconformity to it. The more we sit loose to the body, and live above the world, the better we are prepared for Jesus Christ.

2. In John's preaching and baptizing there was the beginning of the gospel doctrines and ordinances. (1) He preached the remission of sins, which is the great gospel privilege. (2) He preached repentance, in order to it; he told people that there must be a renovation of their hearts and a reformation of their lives. (3) He preached Christ, and directed his hearers to expect him speedily to appear, and to expect great things from him. He preached, [1] The great pre-eminence Christ is advanced to; so high, so great, is Christ, that John thinks himself unworthy to be employed in the meanest office about him, even to stoop down, and untie his shoes. [2] The great power Christ is invested with; He comes after me in time, but he is mightier than I, for he is able to baptize with the Holy Ghost. [3] The great promise Christ makes in his gospel to those who have repented, and have had their sins forgiven them; They shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost. And, lastly, All those who received his doctrine, and submitted to his institution, he baptized with water, as the manner of the Jews was to admit proselytes, in token of their cleansing themselves by repentance and reformation, and of God's cleansing them both by remission and by sanctification.

3. In the success of John's preaching, and the disciples he admitted by baptism, there was the beginning of a gospel church. He baptized in the wilderness, but there went out unto him all the land of Judæa, and they of Jerusalem, and were all baptized of him. They entered themselves his disciples, and bound themselves to his discipline; in token of which, they confessed their sins; he admitted them his disciples, in token of which, he baptized them. Many of these afterward became followers of Christ, and preachers of his gospel, and this grain of mustard-seed became a tree.

We have here a brief account of Christ's baptism and temptation.

I. His baptism, which was his first public appearance, after he had long lived obscurely in Nazareth.

1. See how humbly he owned God, by coming to be baptized of John. Though he was perfectly pure and unspotted, yet he was washed as if he had been polluted.

2. See how honourably God owned him, when he submitted to John's baptism.

(1) He saw the heavens opened; thus he was owned to be the Lord from heaven. Matthew saith, The heavens were opened to him. Mark saith, He saw them opened. Many have the heavens opened to receive them, but they do not see it.

(2) He saw the Spirit like a dove descending upon him. It is an ancient tradition, that a great light shone round the place.

(3) He heard a voice which was intended for his encouragement to proceed in his undertaking, and therefore it is here expressed as directed to him, Thou art my beloved Son. God is well pleased in him, and so well pleased in him, as to be well pleased with us in him.

II. His temptation. The good Spirit that descended upon him, led him into the wilderness, v. 12. Retire-out, these, though they should be lightly passed over by all the other Evangelists, are sure to be found here, and in touches of such quiet delicacy and power, that though scarce observed by the cursory reader, they leave indelible impressions upon all the thoughtful and furnish a key to much that is in the other Gospels. These few opening words of the Second Gospel are enough to show, that though it was the purpose of this Evangelist to record chiefly the outward and palpable facts of our Lord's public life, he recognized in Him, in common with the Fourth Evangelist, the glory of the Only-begotten of the Father. 2. As it is written in the prophets,—(Mal. 3:1; Isa. 40:3)—Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, which shall prepare thy way before thee. 3. The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight—The second of these quotations is given by Matthew and Luke in the same connection, but they reserve the former quotation till they have occasion to return to the Baptist, after his imprisonment (Matt. 11:10; Luke 7: 27). (Instead of the words, "as it is written in the Prophets," there is weighty evidence in favor of the following reading: "As it is written in Isaiah the prophet." This reading is adopted by all the latest critical editors. If it be the true one, it is to be explained thus—that of the two quotations, the one from Malachi is but a later development of the great primary one in Isaiah, from which the whole prophetical matter here quoted takes its name. But the received text is quoted by IRENAEUS, before the end of the second century, and the evidence in its favor is greater in amount, if not in weight. The chief objection to it is, that if this was the true reading, it is difficult to see how the other one could have got in at all; whereas, if it be not the true reading, it is very easy to see how it found its way into the text, as it removes the startling difficulty of a prophecy beginning with the words of Malachi being ascribed to Isaiah). For the exposition, see on Matthew 3:1-6, 11.

9-11. BAPTISM OF CHRIST, AND DESCENT OF THE SPIRIT UPON HIM IMMEDIATELY THEREAFTER. (= Matt. 3:13-17; Luke 3:21, 22.) See on Matthew 3:13-17.

12, 13. TEMPTATION OF CHRIST. (=Matt. 4:1-11; Luke 4:1-13.) See on Matthew 4:1-11.

1. Then—an indefinite note of sequence. But Mark's word (1:12) fixes what we should have presumed was meant, that it was "immediately" after His baptism; and with this agrees the statement of Luke (4:1). was Jesus led up—i.e., from the low Jordan valley to some more elevated spot. of the Spirit—that blessed Spirit immediately before spoken of as descending upon Him at His baptism, and abiding upon Him. Luke, connecting these two scenes, as if the one were but the sequel of the other, says, "Jesus, being full of the Holy Ghost, returned from Jordan, and was led . . . ." Mark's expression has a startling sharpness about it—"Immediately the Spirit driveth Him," "putteth," or "hurrieth Him forth," or "impelleth Him." (See the same word in Mark 1:43; 5:40; Matt. 9:25; 13:52; John 10:4.) The thought thus strongly expressed is the mighty constraining impulse of the Spirit under which He went; while

2. As it is written in the prophets. Rather, "As it is written by Isaiah the prophet." I think this reading should be adopted, instead of that in the common text. It is the reading of several MSS. and versions of great repute, and in several of the Fathers. As this prophecy is found both in Isaiah and Malachi, early scribes probably changed the reading to the prophets, that it might comprehend both.

3. The voice of one crying. See on Matt. iii. 1-3.

4. John. The original name is Yehochanan, compounded of Yehovah chanan, the "grace or mercy of Jehovah"—a most proper and significant name for the forerunner of the "God of all grace." It was John's business to proclaim the gospel of the grace of God, and to point out that Lamb or sacrifice of God which takes away the sin of the world. For the remission of sins. Or "toward the remission." They were to repent, and be baptized with reference to the remission of sins. Repentance prepared the soul for it, and baptism was the type or pledge of it.

5. All the land. See on Matt. iii. 4-6. Confessing their sins. It was an invariable custom among the Jews to admit no proselyte to baptism till he had in the most solemn manner declared that he had renounced forever all idolatrous worship, all heathen superstitions, and promised an entire and unreserved submission to the law of Moses.

6. John was clothed . . . See the note on Matt. iii. 4.

7. The latchet of whose shoes. The shoe of the ancients was properly only a sole tied round the foot and ankle with strings or thongs.

8. I indeed have baptized you with water. As if he had said: This baptism is not to be rested in; it is only an emblem of that which you must receive from Him who is mightier than I. It is He only who can communicate the Holy Spirit; and water baptism is nothing, but as it points out, and leads to, the baptism of the Holy Ghost.

12. The spirit driveth him. "Pulleth Him forth." Matthew says, chap. iv. 1, "was . . . led up."

ment from the world is an opportunity of more free converse with God, and therefore must sometimes be chosen. Mark observes this circumstance of his being in the wilderness—that he was with the wild beasts. It was an instance of his Father's care of him, that he was preserved from being torn in pieces by the wild beasts. Special protections are earnests of seasonable supplies. In that wilderness,

1. The evil spirits were busy with him; he was tempted of Satan. Christ himself was tempted, not only to teach us, that it is no sin to be tempted, but to direct us whither to go for succour when we are tempted, even to him that suffered, being tempted.

2. The good spirits were busy about him; the angels ministered to him. The ministration of the good angels about us, is matter of great comfort in reference to the malicious designs of the evil angels against us.

Verses 14–22

I. A general account of Christ's preaching in Galilee.

1. When Jesus began to preach in Galilee; After that John was put in prison. When he had finished his testimony, then Jesus began his.

2. What he preached; The gospel of the kingdom of God. Christ came to set up the kingdom of God among men, and he set it up by the preaching of his gospel, and a power going along with it.

(1) The great truths Christ preached; The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand. Christ gives them notice of it; "The time prefixed is now at hand; glorious discoveries of divine light, life, and love, are now to be made." God keeps time; when the time is fulfilled, the kingdom of God is at hand.

(2) The great duties inferred from thence. Christ gave them to understand the times, that they might know what Israel ought to do; they fondly expected the Messiah to appear in external pomp and power, and therefore thought, when that kingdom of God was at hand, they must prepare for war, and for victory. Christ tells them, in the prospect of that kingdom approaching, they must repent, and believe the gospel. By repentance we must lament and forsake our sins, and by faith we must receive the forgiveness of them. Both these must go together: we must not think either that reforming our lives will save us without trusting in the righteousness and grace of Christ, or that trusting in Christ will save us without the reformation of our hearts and lives. Christ hath joined these two together, and let no man think to put them asunder. Thus the preaching of the gospel began, and thus it continues; still the call is, Repent, and believe, and live a life of repentance and a life of faith.

II. Christ appearing as a teacher, here is next his calling of disciples, v. 16–20. Observe, 1. Christ will have followers. If he set up a school, he will have scholars; if he set up his standard, he will have soldiers; if he preach, he will have hearers. 2. The instruments Christ chose to employ in setting up his kingdom, were the weak and foolish things of the world; not called from the great sanhedrim, or the schools of the rabbin, but picked up from among the tarpaulins by the sea-side. 3. Though Christ needs not the help of man, yet he is pleased to make use of it in setting up his kingdom. 4. Christ puts honour upon those who are diligent in their business, and loving to one another; so those were, whom Christ called. He found them employed, and employed together. Industry and unity are good and pleasant, and there the Lord Jesus commands the blessing. 5. The business of ministers is to fish for souls, and win them to Christ. Ministers, in preaching the gospel, cast the net into the waters, Matt. xiii. 47. Some are enclosed and brought to shore, but far the greater number escape. If many a draught brings home nothing, yet they must go on. 6. Those whom Christ calls, must leave all, to follow him; and by his grace he inclines them to do so. We must sit loose to the world, and forsake everything that is inconsistent with our duty to Christ. Mark takes notice of James and John, that they left not only their father (which we had in Matthew), but the hired servants, being their fellow-labourers and pleasant comrades; not only relations, but companions, must be left for Christ, and old acquaintance.

III. Here is a particular account of his preaching in Capernaum. 1. When Christ came into Capernaum, he straightaway applied himself to his work there, and took the first opportunity of preaching the gospel. Those will think themselves concerned not to lose time, who consider what a deal of work they have to do, and what a little time to do it in. 2. Christ religiously observed the sabbath day. 3. Sabbaths are to be sanctified in religious assemblies, if we have opportunity; it is a holy day. 4. In religious assemblies

Matthew's more gentle expression, "was led up," intimates how purely voluntary on His own part this action was. into the wilderness—probably the wild Judean desert. The particular spot which tradition has fixed upon has hence got the name of Quarantana or Quarantaria, from the forty days, —"an almost perpendicular wall of rock twelve or fifteen hundred feet above the plain" [ROBINSON'S Palestine]. The supposition of those who incline to place the temptation amongst the mountains of Moab is, we think, very improbable. to be tempted —The Greek word (peirazein) means simply to try or make proof of; and when ascribed to God in His dealings with men, it means, and can mean no more than this. Thus, Genesis 22:1, "It came to pass that God did tempt Abraham," or put his faith to a severe proof. (See Deut. 8:2.) But for the most part in Scripture the word is used in a bad sense, and means to entice, solicit, or provoke to sin. Hence the name here given to the wicked one—"the tempter" (vs. 3). Accordingly "to be tempted" here is to be understood both ways. The Spirit conducted Him into the wilderness simply to have His faith tried; but as the agent in this trial was to be the wicked one, whose whole object would be to seduce Him from His allegiance to God, it was a temptation in the bad sense of the term. The unworthy inference which some would draw from this is energetically repelled by an apostle (Jas. 1:13-17). of the devil. The word signifies a slanderer—one who casts imputations upon another. Hence that other name given him (Rev. 12:10), "The accuser of the brethren, who accuseth them before our God day and night." Mark (1:13) says, "He was forty days tempted of Satan," a word signifying an adversary, one who lies in wait for, or sets himself in opposition to another. These and other names of the same fallen spirit point to different features in his character or operations. What was the high design of this? First, as we judge, to give our Lord a taste of what lay before Him in the work He had undertaken; next, to make trial of the glorious equipment for it which He had just received; further, to give Him encouragement, by the victory now to be won, to go forward spoiling principalities and powers, until at length He should make a show of them openly, triumphing over them in His cross; that the tempter, too, might get a taste, at the very outset, of the new kind of material in man which he would find he had here to deal with; finally, that He might acquire experimental ability "to succor them that are tempted" (Heb. 2:18). The temptation evidently embraced two stages: the one continuing throughout the forty days' fast; the other, at the conclusion of that period.

14-20. CHRIST BEGINS HIS GALILEAN MINISTRY —CALLING OF SIMON AND ANDREW, JAMES AND JOHN. See on Matthew 4:12-22.

21-39. HEALING OF A DEMONIAC IN THE SYNAGOGUE OF CAPERNAUM, AND THEREAFTER OF SIMON'S MOTHER-IN-LAW AND MANY OTHERS—JESUS, NEXT DAY, IS FOUND IN A SOLITARY PLACE AT MORNING PRAYERS, AND IS ENTREATED TO RETURN, BUT DECLINES, AND GOES FORTH ON HIS FIRST MISSIONARY CIRCUIT. (=Luke 4:31-44; Matt. 8:14-17; 4:23-25.) 21. And they went into Capernaum—(See on Matthew 4:13). and straightway on the sabbath day he entered into the synagogue, and taught—This should have been rendered, "straightway on the sabbaths He entered into the synagogue and taught," or "continued to teach." The meaning is, that as He began this practice on the very first sabbath after coming to settle at Capernaum, so He continued it regularly thereafter.

ADAM CLARKE

13. With the wild beasts. This is a curious circumstance, which is mentioned by none of the other Evangelists, and seems to intimate that He was in the most remote, unfrequented, and savage part of the desert; which, together with the diabolic influence, tended to render the whole scene the more horrid.

15. The time is fulfilled. That is, the time appointed for sending the Messiah; and particularly the time specified by Daniel, chap. ix. 24-27.

16. Andrew his brother. Instead of the common reading, his brother, the best MSS. and versions have "the brother of Simon," which should be received into the text.

A. T. ROBERTSON:

20. "With the hired servants" (meta ton misthoton). One hired for wages (misthos), a very old Greek word. Zebedee and his two sons evidently had an extensive business in co-operation with Andrew and Simon (Luke 5:7, 10). Mark alone has this detail of the hired servants left with Zebedee. They left the boat and their father (Matt. 4:22) with the hired servants. The business would go on while they left all (Luke 5:11) and became permanent followers of Jesus. Many a young man has faced precisely this problem when he entered the ministry. Could he leave father and mother, brothers and sisters, while he went forth to college and seminary to become a fisher of men? Not the least of the sacrifices made in the education of young preachers is that made by the home folks who have additional burdens to bear because the young preacher is no longer a bread-winner at home. Most young preachers joyfully carry on such burdens after entering the ministry.—Word Pictures in the New Testament on sabbath-days, the gospel is to be preached. 5. Christ was a non-such preacher; he did not preach as the scribes, who expounded the law of Moses by rote; it came not from the heart, and therefore came not with authority. But Christ taught as one that had authority.

Verses 23–28

As soon as Christ began to preach, he began to work miracles for the confirmation of his doctrine.

I. Christ's casting the devil out of a man that was possessed, in the synagogue at Capernaum. There was in the synagogue a man with an unclean spirit, εν πνεύματι ἀκαθάρτῳ—in an unclean spirit; for the spirit had the man in his possession, and led him captive at his will. This man was in the synagogue; he did not come either to be taught or to be healed.

1. The rage which the unclean spirit expressed at Christ; He cried out, as one in an agony, at the presence of Christ. We are told what he said, v. 24, where he doth not make terms, but speaks as one that knew his doom. (1) He calls him Jesus of Nazareth; for aught that appears, he was the first that called him so. (2) Yet a confession is extorted from him—that he is the holy One of God. Those who have only a notion of Christ, and have no faith in him, or love to him, go no further than the devil doth. (3) He in effect acknowledgeth that he could not stand before the power of Christ; "Let us alone; for if thou take us to task, we are undone, thou canst destroy us." (4) He desires to have nothing to do with Jesus Christ; for he despairs of being saved by him, and dreads being destroyed by him.

2. The victory which Jesus Christ obtained over the unclean spirit. It is in vain for Satan to beg and pray, Let us alone; his power must be broken, and the poor man must be relieved. (1) Jesus commands. As he taught, so he healed, with authority. Jesus rebuked him; Hold thy peace; φιμώθητι—be muzzled. Christ has a muzzle for that unclean spirit when he fawns as well as when he barks. But this is not all, he must not only hold his peace, but he must come out of the man. (2) The unclean spirit yields, for there is no remedy (v. 26); He tore him, put him into a strong convulsion. When he would not touch Christ, in fury at him he grievously disturbed this poor creature. Thus, when Christ by his grace delivers poor souls out of the hands of Satan, it is not without a grievous toss and tumult in the soul. He cried with a loud voice, to frighten the spectators, and make himself seem terrible.

II. The impression which this miracle made upon the minds of the people, v. 27, 28.

1. It astonished them that saw it; They were all amazed. This was surprising to them, and put them upon considering with themselves, and enquiring of one another, "What is this new doctrine? For it must certainly be of God, which is thus confirmed." The Jewish exorcists pretended by charm or invocation to drive away evil spirits; but this was quite another thing, with authority he commands them. Surely it is our interest to make him our Friend, who has the control of infernal spirits.

2. It raised his reputation among all that heard it; Immediately his fame spread abroad into the whole adjacent region of Galilee. The story was presently got into everyone's mouth, together with the remark made upon it, What new doctrine is this? So that it was universally concluded, that he was a Teacher come from God. Thus he prepared his own way, now that John, who was his harbinger, was clapped up.

Verses 29–39

In these verses, we have,

I. A particular account of one miracle that Christ wrought, in the cure of Peter's wife's mother.

1. When Christ had done that which spread his fame throughout all parts, he did not then sit still, as some think that they may lie in bed when their name is up. No, he continued to do good: Those who are in reputation, had need be busy and careful to keep it up.

2. When he came out of the synagogue, where he had taught and healed with a divine authority, yet he conversed familiarly with the poor fishermen that attended him.

3. He went into Peter's house, probably invited thither to such entertainment as a poor fisherman could give him, and he accepted of it.

4. He cured his mother-in-law, who was sick. Wherever Christ comes, he comes to do good, and will be sure to pay richly for his entertainment. The same hand that healed her, strengthened her, so that she was able to minister to them; the cure is in order to that, to fit for action.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

22. And they were astonished at his doctrine—or "teaching"—referring quite as much to the manner as the matter of it. for he taught them as one that had authority, and not as the scribes—See on Matthew 7:28, 29. 23. And there was in their synagogue a man with—lit., "in"—an unclean spirit—i.e., so entirely under demoniacal power that his personality was sunk for the time in that of the spirit. The frequency with which this character of "impurity" is ascribed to evil spirits—some twenty times in the Gospels—is not to be overlooked. and he cried out, 24. Saying, Let us alone—or rather, perhaps, "ah!" expressive of mingled astonishment and terror. what have we to do with thee—an expression of frequent occurrence in the Old Testament (I Kings 17:18; II Kings 3:13; II Chron. 35:21, etc.). It denotes entire separation of interests:—i.e., "Thou and we have nothing in common; we want not Thee; what wouldst Thou with us?" For the analogous application of it by our Lord to His mother, see on John 2:4. thou Jesus of Nazareth—"Jesus, Nazarene!" an epithet originally given to express contempt, but soon adopted as the current designation by those who held our Lord in honor (Luke 18:37; ch. 16:6; Acts 2:22). art thou come to destroy us?—In the case of the Gadarene demoniac the question was, "Art Thou come hither to torment us before the time?" (Matt. 8:29). Themselves tormentors and destroyers of their victims, they discern in Jesus their own destined tormentor and destroyer, anticipating and dreading what they know and feel to be awaiting them! Conscious, too, that their power was but permitted and temporary, and perceiving in Him, perhaps, the woman's Seed that was to bruise the head and destroy the works of the devil, they regard His approach to them on this occasion as a signal to let go their grasp of this miserable victim. I know thee who thou art, the Holy One of God—This and other even more glorious testimonies to our Lord were given, as we know, with no good will, but in hope that, by the acceptance of them, He might appear to the people to be in league with evil spirits—a calumny which His enemies were ready enough to throw out against Him. But a Wiser than either was here, who invariably rejected and silenced the testimonies that came to Him from beneath, and thus was able to rebut the imputations of His enemies against Him (Matt. 12:24-30). The expression, "Holy One of God," seems evidently taken from that Messianic Psalm (16:10), in which He is styled "Thine Holy One." 25. And Jesus rebuked him, saying, Hold thy peace, and come out of him—A glorious word of command. BENGEL remarks that it was only the testimony borne to Himself which our Lord meant to silence. That he should afterwards cry out for fear or rage (vs. 26) He would right willingly permit. 26. And when the unclean spirit had torn him—Luke (4:35) says, "When he had thrown him in the midst." Malignant cruelty—just showing what he would have done, if permitted to go farther: it was a last fling! and cried with a loud voice—the voice of enforced submission and despair. he came out of him—Luke (4:35) adds, "and hurt him not." Thus impotent were the malignity and rage of the impure spirit when under the restraint of "the Stronger than the strong one armed" (Luke 11: 21, 22). 27. What thing is this? what new doctrine—teaching—is this?—The audience, rightly apprehending that the miracle was wrought to illustrate the teaching and display the character and glory of the Teacher, begin by asking what novel kind of teaching this could be, which was so marvellously attested. 28. And immediately his fame spread abroad throughout all the region round about Galilee—rather, "the whole region of Galilee"; though some, as MEYER and ELLICOTT, explain it of the country surrounding Galilee. 29. And forthwith, when they were come out of the synagogue—so also in Luke 4:38. they entered into the house of Simon and Andrew, with James and John—The mention of these four—which is peculiar to Mark—is the first of those traces of Peter's hand in this Gospel, of which we shall find many more. The house being his, and the illness and cure so nearly affecting himself, it is interesting to observe this minute specification of the number and names of the witnesses; interesting also as the first occasion on which the sacred triumvirate of Peter and James and John are selected from among the rest, to be a threefold cord of testimony to certain events in their Lord's life (see on ch. 5:37)—Andrew being present on this occasion, as the occurrence took place in his own house. 30. But Simon's wife's mother lay sick of a fever—Luke, as was natural in "the beloved physician" (Col. 4:14), describes it professionally; calling it a "great fever," and thus

22. As one that had authority. From God, to do what He was doing, and to teach a pure and beneficent system of truth. And not as the scribes. Who had no such authority, and whose teaching was not accompanied by the power of God to the souls of the people: (1) because the matter of the teaching did not come from God, and (2) because the teachers themselves were not commissioned by the Most High.

23. A man with an unclean spirit. This demoniac is mentioned only by Mark and Luke, chap. iv. 31. It seems the man had lucid intervals; else he could not have been admitted into the synagogue. Unclean [or impure] spirit—a common epithet for those fallen spirits; but here it may mean one who filled the heart of him he possessed with lascivious thoughts, images, desires, and propensities.

24. What have we to do with thee? Or, "What is it to us and to Thee?" or, What business hast Thou with us? There is a phrase exactly like it in 2 Sam. xvi. 10, "What have I to do with you, ye sons of Zeruiah?" The Septuagint translate the Hebrew just as the Evangelist does here; it is the same idiom in both places. Art thou come to destroy us? We may suppose this spirit to have felt and spoken thus: "Is this the time of which it hath been predicted that in it the Messiah should destroy all that power which we have usurped and exercised over the bodies and souls of men? Alas! it is so: I now plainly see who thou art, the Holy One of God, who art come to destroy unholiness, in which we have our residence, and through which we have our reign in the souls of men." An unholy spirit is the only place where Satan can have his full operation, and show forth the fullness of his destroying power.

25. And Jesus rebuked him. A spirit of this cast will yield only to the sovereign power of the Son of God.

26. And when the unclean spirit had torn him. "And . . . had thrown him [down] in the midst," Luke iv. 35, and "convulsed" him.

27. For with authority. They had never heard such a gracious doctrine, and had never seen any teaching supported by miracles before. How much must this Person be superior to men! They are brought into subjection by unclean spirits; this Person subjects unclean spirits to himself.

28. And immediately his fame spread abroad. The word immediately is used more frequently by this Evangelist than by any other writer of the new covenant. It is very often superfluous, and may often be omitted in the translation without any prejudice to the sense of the passage in which it is found.

Peter's house. That Peter lived at Capernaum, and that Christ lodged with him, is fully evident from this verse compared with chap. xvii. 24. Peter's . . . wife's mother. Learn hence, says Theophylact, that marriage is no hindrance to virtue, since the chief of the apostles had his wife. Marriage is one of the first of divine institutions, and is a positive command of God. He says the state of celibacy is not good, Gen. ii. 18. Those who pretend to say that the single state is more holy than the other slander their

II. A general account of many cures he wrought—diseases healed, devils expelled. It was on the evening of the sabbath, when the sun did set, or was set; perhaps many scrupled bringing their sick to him, till the sabbath was over.

1. How numerous the patients were; All the city was gathered at the door, as beggars for a dole. That one cure in the synagogue occasioned this crowding after him. Others speeding well with Christ should quicken us in our enquiries after him. Christ was flocked after in a private house, as well as in the synagogue; wherever he is, there let his servants, his patients, be.

2. How powerful the Physician was; he healed all that were brought to him, though ever so many. Nor was it some one particular disease, that Christ set up for the cure of, but he healed those that were sick of divers diseases. And that miracle particularly which he wrought in the synagogue, he repeated in the house at night; for he cast out many devils, and suffered not the devils to speak.

III. His retirement to his private devotion (v. 35); He prayed, prayed alone; to set us an example of secret prayer. Though as God he was prayed to, as man he prayed. He found time to be alone with his Father.

1. The time when Christ prayed. (1) It was in the morning, the morning after the sabbath day. We must go to the throne of grace, every day in the week. This morning was the morning of the first day of the week, which afterward he sanctified, and made remarkable, by another sort of rising early. (2) It was early, a great while before day. When others were asleep in their beds, he was praying. When our spirits are most fresh and lively, then we should take time for devout exercises.

2. The place where he prayed; He departed into a solitary place. Secret prayer must be made secretly. Those that have the most business in public, and of the best kind, must sometimes be alone with God.

IV. His return to his public work. The disciples thought they were up early, but found their Master was up before them, followed him to his solitary place, and there found him at prayer, v. 36, 37. They told him that he was much wanted, All men seek for thee. They were proud that their Master was become so popular already, and would have him appear in public, yet more in that place, because it was their own city. "No," saith Christ, "Let us go into the next towns, the villages, that I may preach there also, for therefore came I forth, to go about doing good." He preached in their synagogues throughout all Galilee, and, to illustrate and confirm his doctrine, he cast out devils.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

distinguishing it from that lighter kind which the Greek physicians were wont to call "small fevers," as GALEN, quoted by WETSTEIN, tells us. and anon—immediately. they tell him of her—naturally hoping that His compassion and power towards one of His own disciples would not be less signally displayed than towards the demonized stranger in the synagogue. 31. And he came and took her by the hand—rather, "And advancing, He took her . . ." The beloved physician again is very specific: "And He stood over her." and lifted her up—This act of condescension, most felt doubtless by Peter, is recorded only by Mark. and immediately the fever left her, and she ministered unto them—preparing their sabbath-meal: in token both of the perfectness and immediateness of the cure, and of her gratitude to the glorious Healer. 32. And at even, when the sun did set—so Matthew 8:16. Luke (4:40) says it was setting. they brought unto him all that were diseased, and them that were possessed with devils—the demonized. From Luke 13:14 we see how unlawful they would have deemed it to bring their sick to Jesus for a cure during the sabbath hours. They waited, therefore, till these were over, and then brought them in crowds. Our Lord afterwards took repeated occasion to teach the people by example, even at the risk of His own life, how superstitious a straining of the sabbath-rest this was. 33. And all the city was gathered together at the door—of Peter's house; i.e., the sick and those who brought them, and the wondering spectators. This bespeaks the presence of an eye-witness, and is one of those lively examples of word-painting so frequent in this Gospel. 34. And he healed many that were sick of divers diseases, and cast out many devils—In Matthew 8:16 it is said, "He cast out the spirits with His word"; or rather, "with a word"—a word of command. and suffered not the devils to speak, because they knew him—Evidently they would have spoken, if permitted, proclaiming His Messiahship in such terms as in the synagogue; but once in one day, and that testimony immediately silenced, was enough. See on vs. 24. After this account of His miracles of healing, we have in Matthew 8:17 this pregnant quotation, "That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Esaias the prophet, saying [53:4], Himself took our infirmities, and bare our sicknesses." 35. And in the morning—i.e., of the day after this remarkable sabbath; or, on the first day of the week. His choosing this day to inaugurate a new and glorious stage of His public work, should be noted by the reader. rising up a great while before day—"while it was yet night," or long before daybreak. he went out—all unperceived from Peter's house, where He slept. and departed into a solitary place, and there prayed—or, "continued in prayer." He was about to begin His first preaching and healing circuit; and as on similar solemn occasions (Luke 5:16; 6:12; 9:18, 28, 29; ch. 6:46), He spent some time in special prayer, doubtless with a view to it. What would one not give to have been, during the stillness of those grey morning-hours, within hearing—not of His "strong crying and tears," for He had scarce arrived at the stage for that—but of His calm, exalted anticipations of the work which lay immediately before Him, and the outpourings of His soul about it into the bosom of Him that sent Him! He had doubtless enjoyed some uninterrupted hours of such communings with His heavenly Father ere His friends from Capernaum arrived in search of Him. As for them, they doubtless expected, after such a day of miracles, that the next day would witness similar manifestations. When morning came, Peter, loath to break in upon the repose of his glorious Guest, would await His appearance beyond the usual hour; but at length, wondering at the stillness, and gently coming to see where the Lord lay, he finds it—like the sepulchre afterwards—empty! Speedily a party is made up to go in search of Him, Peter naturally leading the way. 36. And Simon and they that were with him followed after him—rather, "pressed after Him." Luke (4:42) says, "The multitudes sought after Him"; but this would be a party from the town. Mark, having his information from Peter himself, speaks only of what related directly to him. "They that were with him" would probably be Andrew his brother, James and John, with a few other choice brethren. 37. And when they had found him—evidently after some search. they said unto him, All men seek for thee—By this time, "the multitudes" who, according to Luke, "sought after Him"—and who, on going to Peter's house, and there learning that Peter and a few more were gone in search of Him, had set out on the same errand—

Maker, and say in effect, "We are too holy to keep the commandments of God."

He touched her hand. Can anything on this side the unlimited power of God effect such a cure with only a touch? If the Scriptures had not spoken of the divinity of Christ, these proofs of His power must have demonstrated it to the common sense of every man whose creed had not previously blinded him.

32. When the sun did set. See on Matt. viii. 16.

When the even was come. The Jews kept their Sabbath from evening to evening, according to the law, Lev. xxiii. 32, "From even unto even, shall ye celebrate your sabbath." Hence it was that the sick were not brought out to our Lord till after sunset, because then the Sabbath was ended. Many that were possessed with devils. Dr. Lightfoot gives two sound reasons why Judea, in our Lord's time, abounded with demoniacs. First, because they were then advanced to the very height of impiety. See what Josephus, their own historian, says of them: There was not (said he) a nation under heaven more wicked than they were. Secondly, because they were then strongly addicted to magic, and so, as it were, invited evil spirits to be familiar with them. And healed all that were sick. Not a soul did the Lord Jesus ever reject who came to Him soliciting His aid. Need any sinner despair who comes to Him, conscious of his spiritual malady, to be healed by His merciful hand?

35. In the morning . . . a great while before day. By the morning is to be understood the whole space of three hours which finished the fourth watch of the night. And there prayed. Not that He needed anything, for in Him dwelt "all the fulness of the Godhead bodily," but that He might be a Pattern to us. Everything that our blessed Lord did He performed either as our Pattern or as our Sacrifice.

36. And Simon . . . followed after him. "Followed Him eagerly."

37. All men seek for thee. Some to hear; some to be healed; some to be saved; and some, perhaps, through no good motive.

MATTHEW HENRY

Verses 40–45

We have here the story of Christ's cleansing a leper. It teaches us,

1. How to apply ourselves to Christ; come as this leper did, (1) With great humility; this leper came beseeching him, and kneeling down to him (v. 40); it teaches us that those who would receive grace and mercy from Christ, must approach to him with humility and reverence. (2) With a firm belief of his power; Thou canst make me clean. He believes it with application, not only in general, Thou canst do everything (as John xi. 22), but, Thou canst make me clean. What we believe of the power of Christ we must bring home to our particular case; Thou canst do this for me. (3) With submission to the will of Christ; Lord, if thou wilt. With the modesty that became a poor petitioner, he refers his own particular case to him.

2. What to expect from Christ; that according to our faith it shall be to us. His address is not in the form of prayer, yet Christ answered it as a request. (1) Christ was moved with compassion. This is added here, in Mark, to show that Christ's power is employed by his pity for the relief of poor souls. Our misery makes us the objects of his mercy. And what he does for us he does with all possible tenderness. (2) He put forth his hand, and touched him. In healing souls, Christ toucheth them. Christ toucheth and healeth too. (3) He said, I will, be thou clean. The poor leper put an if upon the will of Christ; If thou wilt; but that doubt is soon put out of doubt; I will. Christ most readily wills favours to those that most readily refer themselves to his will. He was confident of Christ's power; Thou canst make me clean; and Christ will show how much his power is drawn out into act by the faith of his people, Be thou clean. And power accompanied this word, and the cure was perfect in an instant; Immediately his leprosy vanished, and there remained no more sign of it, v. 42.

3. What to do when we have received mercy from Christ. We must with his favours receive his commands. When Christ had cured him, he strictly charged him. I am apt to think that this refers not to the directions he gave him to conceal it (v. 44), for those are mentioned by themselves; but that this was such a charge as he gave to the impotent man whom he cured, John v. 14, Sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee. He also appointed him, (1) To show himself to the priest. (2) Till he had done that, not to say anything of it to any man. He must not proclaim it, because that would much increase the crowd that followed Christ, which he thought was too great already; not as if he were unwilling to do good to all, to as many as came; but he would do it with as little noise as might be. What to think of the leper's publishing it, and blazing it abroad, I know not. The leper ought to have observed his orders; yet, no doubt, it was with a good design that he proclaimed the cure, and it had no other ill effect than that it increased the multitudes which followed Christ, to that degree, that he could no more openly enter into the city, which obliged him to go into desert places. This shows how expedient it was for us, that Christ should go away, for his bodily presence could be but in one place at a time. By his spiritual presence he is with his people wherever they are, and comes to them to every quarter.

would have arrived, and "came unto Him and stayed Him, that He should not depart from them" (Luke 4:42); all now urging His return to their impatient townsmen. 38. And he said unto them, Let us go—or, according to another reading, "Let us go elsewhere." into the next towns—rather, "unto the neighboring village-towns"; meaning those places intermediate between towns and villages, with which the western side of the Sea of Galilee was studded. that I may preach there also; for therefore came I forth—not from Capernaum, as DE WETTE miserably interprets, nor from His privacy in the desert place, as MEYER, no better; but from the Father. Cf. John 16:28, "I came forth from the Father, and am come into the world . . ."—another proof, by the way, that the lofty phraseology of the Fourth Gospel was not unknown to the authors of the others, though their design and point of view are different. The language in which our Lord's reply is given by Luke (4:43) expresses the high necessity under which, in this as in every other step of His work, He acted—"I must preach the kingdom of God to other cities also; for therefore"—or, "to this end"—"am I sent." An act of self-denial it doubtless was, to resist such pleadings to return to Capernaum. But there were overmastering considerations on the other side.

40-45. HEALING OF A LEPER. (=Matt. 8:1-4; Luke 5:12-16.) See on Matthew 8:1-4.

Jesus ["straitly charged him, and forthwith sent him away," Mark 1:43, and] saith unto him, See thou tell no man—A hard condition this would seem to a grateful heart, whose natural language, in such a case, is "Come, hear, all ye that fear God, and I will declare what He hath done for my soul" (Ps. 66:16). We shall presently see the reason for it. but go thy way, show thyself to the priest, and offer the gift that Moses commanded [Lev. 14] for a testimony unto them—a palpable witness that the Great Healer had indeed come, and that "God had visited His people." What the sequel was, our Evangelist Matthew does not say; but Mark thus gives it (1:45): "But he went out, and began to publish it much, and to blaze abroad the matter, insomuch that Jesus could no more openly enter into the city, but was without in desert places: and they came to Him from every quarter." Thus—by an over-zealous, though most natural and not very culpable, infringement of the injunction to keep the matter quiet—was our Lord, to some extent, thwarted in His movements. As His whole course was sublimely noiseless (ch. 12:19), so we find Him repeatedly taking steps to prevent matters prematurely coming to a crisis with Him. (But see on Mark 5:19, 20). "And He withdrew Himself," adds Luke (5:16), "into the wilderness, and prayed"; retreating from the popular excitement into the secret place of the Most High, and thus coming forth as dew upon the mown grass, and as showers that water the earth (Ps. 72:6). And this is the secret both of strength and of sweetness in the servants and followers of Christ in every age.

ADAM CLARKE

38. The next towns. Properly signifies such towns as resembled cities for magnitude and number of inhabitants, but which were not walled, as were cities. For therefore came I forth. For this purpose am I come forth—to preach the gospel to every creature, that all might hear, and fear, and return unto the Lord. The towns and the villages will not come to the preacher—the preacher must go to them, if he desires their salvation.

39. And he preached. "He continued preaching." This is the proper meaning of the words. He never slackened His pace—He continued proclaiming the glad tidings of salvation to all. There was no time to be lost—immortal souls were perishing for lack of knowledge; and the grand adversary was prowling about, seeking whom he might devour.

40. There came a leper. See the notes on Matt. vii. 2, etc. Should any be inclined to preach on this cleansing of the leper, Mark is the best Evangelist to take the account from, because he is more circumstantial than either Matthew or Luke.

45. Began to publish it much. Began to publish "many things"; probably all that he had heard about our Lord's miraculous works. Jesus could no more openly enter into the city. A city of Galilee, probably Chorazin or Bethsaida, in which He did not appear, for fear of exciting the jealousy of the secular government or the envy and malice of the Jewish rulers.

CHAPTER 2

Christ having been for some time preaching about in the country, here returns to Capernaum, his headquarters.

I. The great resort there was to him. Though he was in the house yet people came to him as soon as it was noised that he was in town. Straightway many were gathered together to him. Where the king is, there is the court. There was no room to receive them, they were so numerous, no not so much as about the door. A blessed sight, to see people thus flying like a cloud to Christ's house.

II. The good entertainment Christ gave them; he preached the word unto them, v. 2. Many of them perhaps came only for cures, and many perhaps only for curiosity, to get a sight of him; but when he had them together he preached to them. He thought it not at all amiss to preach in a house, on a week day; though some might reckon it both an improper place and an improper time.

VSS. 1-12. HEALING OF A PARALYTIC. (=Matt. 9:1-8; Luke 5:17-26.) This incident, as remarked on Matthew 9:1, appears to follow next in order of time after the cure of the leper (ch. 1:40-45). 1. And again he entered into Capernaum—"His own city" (Matt. 9:1). and it was noised that he was in the house—no doubt of Simon Peter (ch. 1:29). 2. And straightway many were gathered together, insomuch that there was no room to receive them, no, not so much as about the door—This is one of Mark's graphic touches. No doubt in this case, as the scene occured at his informant's own door, these details are the vivid recollections of that honored disciple. and he preached the word unto them—i.e., indoors; but in the hearing, doubtless, of the multitude that pressed around. Had He gone forth, as He naturally would, the paralytic's faith would have had no such opportunity to display itself. Luke (5:17) furnishes an additional and very important incident in the scene—as follows: "And it came to pass on a certain day, as He was teaching, that there were Pharisees and doctors of the law sitting by, which were come out of every town," or village, "of Galilee, and Judea, and Jerusalem." This was the highest testimony yet borne to our Lord's growing influence, and the necessity increasingly felt by the ecclesiastics through-

CHAPTER 2

1. In the house. The house of Peter, with whom Christ lodged when at Capernaum.

2. So much as about the door. Meaning the yard or court before the house. Preached the word. The doctrine of the kingdom of God.

MATTHEW HENRY

III. The presenting of a poor cripple to him, to be helped by him. The patient was one sick of the palsy, but perfectly disabled, so that he was borne of four, was carried upon a bed, as if he had been upon a bier. It was his misery, that he needed to be so carried, it was their charity, who did so carry him. These kind relations or neighbours thought, if they could but carry this poor man once to Christ, they should not need to carry him any more; and therefore made hard shift to get him to him, they uncovered the roof where he was, v. 4. It had no upper room, but the ground-floor was open to the roof: and these petitioners for the poor paralytic, when they could not get through the crowd at the door, got their friend by some means or other to the roof of the house, took off some of the tiles, and so let him down upon his bed with cords into the house where Christ was preaching. This bespoke both their faith and their fervency. Hereby it appeared that they were in earnest, and would not go away, nor let Christ go without a blessing, Gen. xxxii. 26.

IV. The kind word Christ said to this poor patient; He saw their faith; theirs that brought him. He commended their faith, because they did bring their friend through so much difficulty. True faith and strong faith may work variously, conquering sometimes the objections of reason, sometimes those of sense; but, however manifested, it shall be accepted and approved by Jesus Christ. Christ said, Son, thy sins be forgiven thee. The compellation is very tender—Son. Christ owns true believers as his sons: a son, and yet sick of the palsy. The cordial is very rich; Thy sins are forgiven thee. The word of Christ was to take his thoughts off from the disease, which was the effect, and to lead them to the sin, the cause, that he might be more concerned about that, to get that pardoned. Recovery from sickness is then a mercy indeed, when way is made for it by the pardon of sin. The way to remove the effect, is, to take away the cause. Pardon of sin strikes at the root of all diseases, and either cures them, or alters their property.

V. The cavil of the scribes at that which Christ said. They were expositors of the law, and their doctrine was true. But their application was false. It is true, None can forgive sins but God only; but it is false that therefore Christ cannot. But Christ perceived in his spirit that they so reasoned within themselves; this proves him to be God.

out the country of coming to some definite judgment regarding Him. "And the power of the Lord was [present] to heal them"—or, "was [efficacious] to heal them," i.e., the sick that were brought before Him. So that the miracle that is now to be described was among the most glorious and worthy to be recorded of many then performed; and what made it so was doubtless the faith which was manifested in connection with it, and the proclamation of the forgiveness of the patient's sins that immediately preceded it. 3. And they come unto him—i.e., towards the house where He was. bringing one sick of the palsy—"lying on a bed" (Matt. 9: 2). which was borne of four—a graphic particular of Mark only. 4. And when they could not come nigh unto him for the press—or, as in Luke, "when they could not find by what way they might bring him in because of the multitude," they "went upon the housetop"—the flat or terrace-roof, universal in Eastern houses. they uncovered the roof where he was: and when they had broken it up, they let down the bed—or portable couch—wherein the sick of the palsy lay—Luke says, they "let him down through the tilling with his couch into the midst before Jesus." Their whole object was to bring the patient into the presence of Jesus; and this not being possible in the ordinary way, because of the multitude that surrounded Him, they took the very unusual method here described of accomplishing their object, and succeeded. Several explanations have been given of the way in which this was done; but unless we knew the precise plan of the house, and the part of it from which Jesus taught—which may have been a quadrangle or open court, within the buildings of which Peter's house was one, or a gallery covered by a veranda—it is impossible to determine precisely how the thing was done. One thing, however, is clear, that we have both the accounts from an eye-witness. 5. When Jesus saw their faith—It is remarkable that all the three narratives call it "their faith" which Jesus saw. That the patient himself had faith, we know from the proclamation of his forgiveness, which Jesus made before all; and we should have been apt to conclude that his four friends bore him to Jesus merely out of benevolent compliance with the urgent entreaties of the poor sufferer. But here we learn, not only that his bearers had the same faith with himself, but that Jesus marked it as a faith which was not to be defeated—a faith victorious over all difficulties. This was the faith for which He was ever on the watch, and which He never saw without marking, and, in those who needed anything from Him, richly rewarding. he said unto the sick of the palsy, Son—"be of good cheer" (Matt. 9:2). thy sins be forgiven thee—By the word "be," our translators perhaps meant "are," as in Luke (5:20). For it is not a command to his sins to depart, but an authoritative proclamation of the man's pardoned state as a believer. And yet, as the Pharisees understood our Lord to be dispensing pardon by this saying, and Jesus not only acknowledges that they were right, but founds His whole argument upon the correctness of it, we must regard the saying as a royal proclamation of the man's forgiveness by Him to whom it belonged to dispense it; nor could such a style of address be justified on any lower supposition. (See on Luke 7:41, etc.). 6. But there were certain of the scribes—"and the Pharisees" (Luke 5:21)—sitting there—those Jewish ecclesiastics who, as Luke told us, "were come out of every village of Galilee, and Judea, and Jerusalem," to make their observations upon this wonderful Person, in anything but a teachable spirit, though as yet their venomous and murderous feeling had not showed itself. and reasoning in their hearts. 7. Why doth this man thus speak blasphemies? who can forgive sins but God only?—In this second question they expressed a great truth. (See Isa. 43:25; Mic. 7:18; Ex. 34: 6, 7, etc.). Nor was their first question altogether unnatural, though in our Lord's sole case it was unfounded. That a man, to all appearances like one of themselves, should claim authority and power to forgive sins, they could not, on the first blush of it, but regard as in the last degree startling; nor were they entitled even to weigh such a claim, as worthy of a hearing, save on supposition of resistless evidence afforded by Him in support of the claim. Accordingly, our Lord deals with them as men entitled to such evidence, and supplies it; at the same time chiding them for rashness, in drawing harsh conclusions regarding Himself. 8. Why reason ye these things—or, as in Matthew, "Wherefore think ye evil." in your hearts? 9. Whether is it easier to say to the sick of the palsy, Thy sins be—or "are"—forgiven thee; or to say, Arise, and

ADAM CLARKE

3. One sick of the palsy. "A paralytic person." See Matt. ix. 1. Borne of four. Four men, one at each corner of the sofa or couch on which he lay. This sick man appears to have been too feeble to come himself, and too weak to be carried in any other way.

4. They uncovered the roof. The houses in the East are generally made flat-roofed, that the inhabitants may have the benefit of taking the air on them. They are also furnished with battlements round about, Deut. xxii. 8; Judg. xvi. 27; and 2 Sam. xi. 2, to prevent persons from falling off; and have a trapdoor by which to descend into the house. This door, it appears, was too narrow to let down the sick man and his couch; so they uncovered the roof, removed a part of the tiles, and having broken it up, taken away the laths or timber to which the tiles had been attached, they then had room to let down the afflicted man.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

Faith, if worth anything, comes to the surface in act. Was it the faith of the bearers, or of the sick man, which Christ rewarded? Both. As Abraham's intercession delivered Lot, as Paul in the shipwreck was the occasion of safety to all the crew, so one man's faith may bring blessings on another. But if the sick man, too, had not had faith, he would not have let himself be brought at all, and would certainly not have consented to reach Christ's presence by so strange and, to him, dangerous a way—being painfully hoisted up some narrow stair, and then perilously let down, at the risk of cords snapping, or hands letting go, or bed giving way. His faith, apparently, was deeper than theirs; for Christ's answer, though it went far beyond his or their expectations, must have been molded to meet his deepest sense of need. His heart speaks in the tender greeting "son," or, as the margin has it, "child"—possibly pointing to the man's youth, but more probably an appellation revealing the mingled love and dignity of Jesus, and taking this man into the arms of His sympathy.

—Exposition of Holy Scriptures

7. Why doth this man thus speak blasphemies? See this explained, Matt. ix. 3.

This man blasphemeth. Wherever it is used in reference to God, it simply signifies "to speak impiously" of His nature, or attributes, or works. "Injurious speaking" is its proper translation when referred to man.

MATTHEW HENRY

God's royalties are inseparable, and he that could know thoughts, could forgive sins. Now he proves his power to forgive sin, by demonstrating his power to cure the man sick of the palsy, v. 9–11. He would not have pretended to do the one, if he could not have done the other; that ye may know that the Son of man has power on earth to forgive sin, Thou that art sick of the palsy, arise, take up thy bed. He could not have cured the disease, which was the effect, if he could not have taken away the sin, which was the cause. He that could by a word accomplish the sign, could doubtless perform the thing signified. It was proper enough to appeal, whether it is easier to say, Thy sins are forgiven thee, or to say, Arise, and walk? The removing of the punishment as such, was the remitting of the sin; he that could go so far in the cure, no doubt could perfect it.

VI. The cure of the sick man, and the impression it made upon the people, v. 12. He not only arose out of his bed, perfectly well, but he took up his bed and went forth before them all; and they were all amazed, and glorified God saying, "We never saw it on this fashion." Christ's works were without precedent. When we see what he does in healing souls, we must own that we never saw the like.

I. Christ preaching by the sea-side (v. 13), whither he went for room. Upon the strand there might come as many as would. It should seem by this, that our Lord Jesus had a strong voice, and could and did speak loud.

II. His calling Levi; the same with Matthew, who had a place in the custom-house at Capernaum, from which he was denominated a publican; his place fixed him by the waterside, and thither Christ went to meet with him. It is probable that Matthew was but a loose extravagant young man, or else, being a Jew, he would never have been a publican. Christ called him to follow him. With God, through Christ, there is mercy to pardon the greatest sins, and grace to sanctify the greatest sinners. Matthew, that had been a publican, became an evangelist. Great sin and scandal before conversion, are no bar to great gifts, graces, and advancements, after; nay, God may be the more glorified. In bodily cures, ordinarily, he was sought unto, but in these spiritual cures, he was found of them that sought him not. For this is the great evil and peril of the disease of sin, that those who are under it, desire not to be made whole.

III. His familiar converse with publicans and sinners, v. 15. We are here told, 1. That Christ sat at meat in Levi's house, who invited him and his disciples to the farewell feast he made to his friends, when he left all to attend on Christ. 2. That many publicans and sinners sat with Christ in Levi's house, and they followed him. They followed Levi; so some understand it. I rather take it, that they followed Jesus because of the report they had heard of him. They did not for conscience-sake leave all to follow him, but for curiosity-sake they came to Levi's feast, to see him. The publicans are here and elsewhere ranked with sinners, the worst of sinners. (1) Because commonly they were such; so general were the corruptions in the execution of that office, oppressing, exacting, and taking bribes or fees to extortion, and accusing falsely. (2) Because the Jews had a particular antipathy to them and their office, as an affront to the liberty of their nation, and thought it scandalous to be seen in their company. Such as these our blessed Lord was pleased to converse with, when he appeared in the likeness of sinful flesh.

IV. The offence which the scribes and Pharisees took at this, v. 16. They would not come to hear him preach, which they might have been convinced and edified by; but they would come themselves to see him sit with publicans and sinners, which they would be provoked by. They endeavoured to put the disciples out of conceit with their Master, and therefore put the question to them. How is it, that he eateth and drinketh with publicans and sinners?

V. Christ's justification of himself in it, v. 17. He stood to what he did, and would not withdraw. Those are too tender of their own good name, who, to preserve it with some nice people, will decline a good work. Christ would not do so. They thought the publicans were to be hated. "No," saith Christ, "they are to be pitied, they are sick and need a physician; they are sinners, and need a Saviour." They thought Christ's character should separate him from them; "No," saith Christ, "I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance. It is to a sinful world that I am sent, and therefore my business lies most with those that are the greatest sinners in it." Or thus; "I am not come to call the righteous, the take up thy bed and walk?—"Is it easier to command away disease than to bid away sin? If, then, I do the one which you can see, know thus that I have done the other, which you cannot see." 10. But that ye may know that the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins—that forgiving power dwells in the Person of this Man, and is exercised by Him while on this earth and going out and in with you. (he saith to the sick of the palsy), 11. I say unto thee, Arise, and take up thy bed, and go thy way into thine house—This taking up the portable couch, and walking home with it, was designed to prove the completeness of the cure. 12. And immediately he arose, took up the bed—"Sweet saying!" says BENGEL: "The bed had borne the man: now the man bore the bed." and went forth before them all—proclaiming by that act to the multitude, whose wondering eyes would follow him as he pressed through them, that He who could work such a glorious miracle of healing, must indeed "have power on earth to forgive sins." We never saw it on this fashion—"never saw it thus," or, as we say, "never saw the like." In Luke (5:26) it is, "We have seen strange [unexpected] things to-day"—referring both to the miracles wrought and the forgiveness of sins pronounced by Human Lips. In Matthew (9:8) it is, "They marvelled, and glorified God, which had given such power unto men." At forgiving power they wondered not, but that a man, to all appearance like one of themselves, should possess it!

13-17. LEVI'S (OR MATTHEW'S) CALL AND FEAST. (=Mat. 9:9-13; Luke 5:27-32). See on Matthew 9:9-13.

And as Jesus passed forth from thence—i.e., from the scene of the paralytic's cure in Capernaum, towards the shore of the Sea of Galilee, on which that town lay. Mark, as usual, pictures the scene more in detail, thus (2:13): "And He went forth again by the seaside; and all the multitude resorted unto Him, and He taught them"—or, "kept teaching them." "And as He passed by" he saw a man, named Matthew—the writer of this precious Gospel, who here, with singular modesty and brevity, relates the story of his own calling. In Mark and Luke he is called Levi, which seems to have been his family name. In their lists of the twelve apostles, however, Mark and Luke give him the name of Matthew, which seems to have been the name by which he was known as a disciple. While he himself sinks his family name, he is careful not to sink his occupation, the obnoxious associations with which he would place over against the grace that called him from it, and made him an apostle. (See on ch. 10:3.) Mark alone tells us (2:14) that he was "the son of Alphaeus"—the same, probably, with the father of James the Less. From this and other considerations it is pretty certain that he must at least have heard of our Lord before this meeting. Unnecessary doubts, even from an early period, have been raised about the identity of Levi and Matthew. No capable jury, with the evidence before them which we have in the Gospels, would hesitate in giving a unanimous verdict of identity. sitting at the receipt of custom—as a publican, which Luke (5:27) calls him. It means the place of receipt, the toll-house or booth in which the collector sat. Being in this case by the seaside, it might be the ferry tax for the transit of persons and goods across the lake, which he collected. (See on ch. 5:46.) and he saith unto him, Follow me—Witching words these, from the lips of Him who never employed them without giving them resistless efficacy in the hearts of those they were spoken to.

And when the Pharisees—"and scribes," add Mark and Luke. saw it, they "murmured" or "muttered," says Luke (5:30). said unto his disciples—not venturing to put their question to Jesus Himself. Why eateth your Master with publicans and sinners?—(See on Luke 15:2.) But when Jesus heard [that], he said unto them—to the Pharisees and scribes; addressing Himself to them, though they had shrunk from addressing Him. They that be whole need not a physician, but they that are sick—i.e., "Ye deem yourselves whole; My mission, therefore, is not to you: The physician's business is with the sick; therefore eat I with publicans and sinners." Oh, what myriads of broken hearts, of sin-sick souls, have been bound up by this matchless saying!

for I am not come to call the righteous, but sinners [to repentance]—The words enclosed in brackets are of doubtful authority here, and more than doubtful authority in Mark 2:17; but in Luke 5:32 they are undisputed. We have here just the former statement stripped of its figure. "The righteous" are the

Jesus knowing their thoughts. In telling them what the thoughts of their hearts were (for they had expressed nothing publicly), He gave them the fullest proof of His power to forgive sins; because only God can forgive sins, and only God can search and know the heart.

For whether is easier, to say, Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, Arise, and walk? Both are equally easy, and equally difficult, for both require unlimited power to produce them. And everything is equally easy to that power which is unlimited. A universe can be as easily produced by a single act of the divine will as the smallest elementary part of matter.

But that ye may know. External miracles are the proofs of internal ones. Three miracles are wrought in this case: (1) The remission of the poor man's sins. (2) The discernment of the secret thoughts of the scribes. (3) The restoring of the paralytic, in an instant, to perfect soundness. Thus one miracle becomes the proof and establishment of another. Never was a clearer proof of omnipotent energy and mercy brought under the senses of man. Here is an absolutely perfect miracle wrought, and here are absolute incontestable proofs that the miracle was wrought; and the conclusion is the fullest demonstration of the divinity of the ever-blessed Jesus. Arise, take up thy bed. Being enabled to obey this command was the public proof that the man was made whole.

14. Levi. The same as Matthew; he appears to have been a Jew, though employed in the odious office of a taxgatherer. For an account of his call, see his Gospel, chap. ix. 9.

Named Matthew. Generally supposed to be the same who wrote this history of our blessed Lord. Mathai signifies a "gift" in Syriac; probably so named by his parents as implying a "gift from God." The receipt of custom. The customhouse, the place where the taxes levied by the Romans of the Jews were collected. Follow me. That is, Become My disciple. And he arose, and followed him. How blessed it is to be obedient to the first call of Christ—how much happiness and glory are lost by delays, though conversion at last may have taken place!

16. Sinners. The Gentiles or heathens are generally to be understood in the Gospels, for this was a term the Jews never applied to any of themselves. See the note on Matt. ix. 10.

Sat at meat in the house. Viz., of Matthew, who it appears, from Luke v. 29, made a great feast on the occasion, thus testifying his gratitude for the honor done him; and that his friends and acquaintances might profit by the teaching of his new Master, he invites them to the entertainment that was honored by the presence of Christ. His companions, it appears, were not of the most creditable kind. They were "taxgatherers and sinners."

17. To repentance. This is omitted by many manuscripts and versions, and many authorities approve of the omission.

MATTHEW HENRY

proud Pharisees that think themselves righteous, but poor publicans, that own themselves to be sinners, and are glad to be invited and encouraged to repent." It is good dealing with those that there is hope of.

Verses 18-28

Here he is put to justify his disciples; and in what they do according to his will he will justify them, and bear them out.

I. He justifies them in their not fasting. Why do the Pharisees and the disciples of John fast? They used to fast, the Pharisees fasted twice in the week (Luke xviii. 12), and probably the disciples of John did so too. Thus apt are strict professors to make their own practice a standard, and to censure and condemn all that do not fully come up to it. They invidiously suggest that if Christ went among sinners to do them good, yet the disciples went to indulge their appetites, for they never knew what it was to fast. Ill-will always suspects the worst.

Two things Christ pleads in excuse of his disciples not fasting.

1. That these were easy days with them, and fasting was not so seasonable now as it would be hereafter, v. 19, 20. There is a time for all things.

2. That these were early days with them, and they were not so able for the severe exercises of religion as hereafter they would be. The Pharisees had long accustomed themselves to such austerities; and John Baptist himself came neither eating nor drinking. But it was not so with Christ's disciples; their Master came eating and drinking, and had not bred them up to the difficult services of religion as yet. To put them upon such frequent fasting at first, would be a discouragement to them, it would be of as ill consequence as putting new wine into old casks, or sewing new cloth to that which is worn thin and threadbare, v. 21, 22. God graciously considers the frame of young Christians, that are weak and tender, and so must we; nor must we expect more than the work of the day in its day, and that day according to the strength. Weak Christians must take heed of over-tasking themselves, and of making the yoke of Christ otherwise than it is, easy, and sweet, and pleasant.

II. He justifies them in plucking the ears of corn on the sabbath day, which, I will warrant you, a disciple of the Pharisees would not dare to have done; for it was contrary to an express tradition of their elders. They reflect upon the discipline of Christ's school, as too easy, so common it is for those who deny the power of godliness, to be jealous for the form, and censorious of those who affect not their form.

Observe, 1. What a poor breakfast Christ's disciples had on a sabbath-day morning, when they were going to church (v. 23); they plucked the ears of corn, and that was the best they had. They were so intent upon spiritual dainties, that they forget even their necessary food.

2. How even this was grudged them by the Pharisees, upon supposition that it was not lawful to pluck the ears of corn on the sabbath day, that that was as much a servile work as reaping (v. 24); Why do they on the sabbath day that which is not lawful? If Christ's disciples do that which is unlawful, Christ will be reflected upon. It is observable, that when the Pharisees thought Christ did amiss, they told the disciples (v. 16); and now when they thought the disciples did amiss, they spoke to Christ.

3. How Christ defended them.

(1) By example. They had a good precedent for it in David's eating the showbread (v. 25, 26); Have ye never read? Ritual observances must give way to moral obligations; and that may be done in a case of necessity, which otherwise may not be done.

(2) By argument. To reconcile them to the disciples' plucking the ears of corn, let them consider whom the sabbath was made for (v. 27); it was made for man, and not man for the sabbath. The sabbath is a sacred and divine institution; but we must receive and embrace it as a privilege and a benefit, not as a task and a drudgery. God never designed it to be an imposition upon us, and therefore we must not make it so to ourselves. Man was made for God, and for his honour and service, but he was not made for the sabbath. God did design it to be an advantage to us. He made it for man. He had some regard to our bodies in the institution, that they might rest, and not be tired out with the constant business of this world. He had much more regard to our souls. The sabbath was made a day of rest, only in order to its being a day of holy work, a day of communion with God, a day of praise and thanksgiving; and the rest from worldly business is therefore necessary, that we may closely apply ourselves to this work. See here, [1] What a good Master we serve, all whose institutions are for our own benefit. It is not he, but we, whole; "sinners," the sick. When Christ "called" the latter, as He did Matthew, and probably some of those publicans and sinners whom he had invited to meet Him, it was to heal them of their spiritual maladies, or save their souls: "The righteous," like those miserable self-satisfied Pharisees, "He sent empty away."

18-22. DISCOURSE ON FASTING. (=Matt. 9:14-17; Luke 5:33-39). See on Luke 5:33-39.

There may seem to be some inconsistency between the freedom and joy which our Lord here indirectly teaches to be characteristic of the new economy, and that sadness at His departure in person from the Church which He intimates would be the proper feeling of all that love Him during the present state. But the two are quite consistent. We may sorrow for one thing and rejoice for another, even at the same time. The one, indeed, will necessarily chasten the other; and so it is here. The liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free is a well-spring of resistless and commanded joy; nor is this a jot abated, but only chastened and refined, by the widowed feeling of Christ's absence. But neither is this sense of Christ's absence the less real and sad that we are taught to "rejoice in the Lord alway," "whom having not seen we love, in whom believing we rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory," in the assurance that "when he who is our life shall appear, we also shall appear with him in glory."

23-28. PLUCKING CORN-EARS ON THE SABBATH DAY. (=Matt. 12:1-8; Luke 6:1-5.) See on Matthew 12:1-8.

At that time Jesus went on the sabbath day through the corn—"the cornfields" (Mark 2:23; Luke 6:1). and his disciples were an hungered—not as one may be before his regular meals; but evidently from shortness of provisions: for Jesus defends their plucking the corn-ears and eating them on the plea of necessity. and began to pluck the ears of corn, and to eat—"rubbing them in their hands" (Luke 6:1). But when the Pharisees saw it, they said unto him, Behold, thy disciples do that which is not lawful to do upon the sabbath day—The act itself was expressly permitted (Deut. 23:25). But as being "servile work," which was prohibited on the sabbath day, it was regarded as sinful. But he said unto them, Have ye not read—or, as Mark has it, "Have ye never read." what David did (1 Sam. 21:1-6)—when he was an hungered, and they that were with him; How he entered into the house of God, and did eat the showbread, which was not lawful for him to eat, neither for them which were with him, but only for the priests?—No example could be more apposite than this. The man after God's own heart, of whom the Jews ever boasted, when suffering in God's cause and straitened for provisions, asked and obtained from the high priest what, according to the law, it was illegal for anyone save the priests to touch. Mark (2:26) says this occurred "in the days of Abiathar the high priest." But this means not during his high priesthood—for it was under that of his father Ahimelech—but simply, in his time. Ahimelech was soon succeeded by Abiathar, whose connection with David, and prominence during his reign, may account for his name, rather than his father's, being here introduced. Yet there is not a little confusion in what is said of these priests in different parts of the Old Testament. Thus he is called both the son of the father of Ahimelech (I Sam. 22:20; II Sam. 8:17); and Ahimelech is called Ahiah (I Sam. 14:3), and Abimelech (I Chron. 18:16).

"And he said unto them, the sabbath was made for man, and not man for the sabbath" (Mark 2:27). A glorious and far-reaching maxim, alike for the permanent establishment of the sabbath and the true freedom of its observance.

ADAM CLARKE

Thy disciples fast not. Probably meaning that they did not fast so frequently as the others did, or for the same purposes, which is very likely, for the Pharisees had many superstitious fasts. They fasted in order to have lucky dreams, to obtain the interpretation of a dream, or to avert the evil import of a dream. They also fasted often in order to obtain the things they wished for. The tract taanith is full of these fasts, and of the wonders performed thus by the Jewish doctors.

Can the children of the bridechamber? These persons were the companions of the bridegroom, who accompanied him to the house of his father-in-law when he went to bring the bride to his own home. The marriage feast among the Jews lasted seven days, but the new-married woman was considered to be a bride for thirty days.

21. No man . . . seweth. See Matt. ix. 16. "No man seweth a piece of unscoured cloth upon an old garment."

That which is put in . . . taketh from the garment. Instead of closing up the rent, it makes a larger, by tearing away with it the whole breadth of the cloth over which it was laid; "it taketh its fulness or whole breadth from the garment."

New wine into old bottles. It is still the custom, in the Eastern countries, to make their bottles of goatskins. If these happened to be old, and new wine were put into them, the violence of the fermentation must necessarily burst them; and therefore newly made bottles were employed for the purpose of putting that wine in which had not yet gone through its state of fermentation. The institutes of Christ, and those of the Pharisees, could never be brought to accord; an attempt to combine the two systems would be as absurd as it would be destructive. The old covenant made way for the new, which was its completion and its end; but with that old covenant the new cannot be incorporated.

26. The days of Abiathar the high priest. It appears from 1 Sam. xxi. 1, which is the place referred to here, that Ahimelech was then high priest at Nob. And from 1 Sam. xxii. 20; xxiii. 6; and 1 Chron. xviii. 16, it appears that Abiathar was the son of Ahimelech. Some suggest that Abiathar was the priest, and Ahimelech or Abimelech the high priest, and thus endeavor to reconcile both the sacred historians. Others reconcile the accounts thus: Ahimelech was called Ahimelech Abiathar, ab, "father," understood; and Abiathar was called Abiathar Ahimelech, ben, "son," understood. Probably they both officiated in the high priesthood, and the name of the office was indifferently applied to either. Shewbread. See Matt. xii. 4.

27. The Sabbath was made for man. That he might have the seventh part of his whole time to devote to the purposes of bodily rest and spiritual exercises. And in these respects it is of infinite use to mankind. Where no Sabbath is observed, there disease, poverty, and profligacy generally prevail. Had we no Sabbath, we should soon have no religion.

that are gainers by our service. [2] What we should aim at in our sabbath work. If the sabbath was made for man, we should then ask ourselves at night, "What am I the better for this sabbath day?" [3] What care we ought to take not to make those exercises of religion burthens to ourselves or others, which God ordained to be blessings. Consider whom the sabbath was made by (v. 28); "The Son of man is Lord also of the sabbath." The sabbath days are days of the Son of man; he is the Lord of the day, and to his honour it must be observed. The shifting of it one day forward to the first day of the week, was to be in remembrance of his resurrection, and therefore the Christian sabbath was to be called the Lord's day.

CHAPTER 3

Here, as before, we have our Lord Jesus busy at work in the synagogue first, and then by the seaside; to teach us that his presence should not be confined either to the one or to the other, but, wherever any are gathered together in his name there is he in the midst of them.

I. When he entered again into the synagogue, he improved the opportunity he had there, of doing good.

1. The patient's case was piteous; he had a withered hand, by which he was disabled to work for his living; let those be helped that cannot help themselves.

2. The spectators were very unkind, both to the patient and to the Physician; instead of interceding for a poor neighbour, they did what they could to hinder his cure: for they intimated that if Christ cured him now on the sabbath day, they would accuse him as a Sabbath breaker.

3. Christ dealt very fairly with the spectators, and dealt with them first, if possible to prevent the offence.

(1) He laboured to convince their judgment. He bade the man stand forth (v. 3), that by the sight of him they might be moved with compassion. And then he appeals to their own consciences; "Is it lawful to do good on the sabbath days, or to do evil? Whether is better to save life or to kill?" What fairer question could be put? And yet, because they saw it would turn against them, they held their peace.

(2) When they rebelled against the light, he lamented their stubbornness (v. 5); He looked round about on them with anger, being grieved for the hardness of their hearts. The sin he had an eye to, was, the hardness of their hearts. We hear what is said amiss, and see what is done amiss; but Christ looks at the root of bitterness in the heart, the blindness and hardness of that. [1] How he was provoked by the sin; he looked round upon them; and he looked with anger; his anger, it is probable, appeared in his countenance. The sin of sinners is very displeasing to Jesus Christ; and the way to be angry, and not to sin, is to be angry, as Christ was, at nothing but sin. [2] How he pitied the sinners; he was grieved for the hardness of their hearts. It is a great grief to our Lord Jesus, to see sinners bent upon their own ruin, for he would not that any should perish. This is a good reason why the hardness of our own hearts and of the hearts of others, should be a grief to us.

4. Christ dealt very kindly with the patient; he bade him stretch forth his hand, and it was immediately restored. Christ has hereby taught us to go on with resolution in the way of our duty, how violent soever the opposition is, that we meet with in it. We must not deny ourselves the satisfaction of serving God, and doing good, though offence may unjustly be taken at it. None could be more tender of giving offence than Christ; yet, rather than send this poor man away uncured, he would venture offending all the scribes and Pharisees that compassed him about. He hath hereby given us a specimen of the cures wrought by his grace upon poor souls; our hands are spiritually withered, the powers of our souls weakened by sin. Though our hands are withered, and we cannot of ourselves stretch them forth, we must attempt it, must, as well as we can, lift them up to God in prayer, lay hold on Christ and eternal life, and employ them in good works; and if we do our endeavour, power goes along with the word of Christ, he effects the cure. If we will not offer to stretch them out, it is our own fault that we are not healed.

5. The enemies of Christ dealt very barbarously with him. Such a work of mercy should have engaged their love to him, and such a work of wonder their faith in him. But, instead of that, the Pharisees and the Herodians, took counsel together against him, how they might destroy him.

II. When he withdrew to the sea, he did good there.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

For the Son of man is Lord even of the sabbath day—In what sense now is the Son of man Lord of the sabbath day? Not surely to abolish it—that surely were a strange lordship, especially just after saying that it was made or instituted for MAN—but to own it, to interpret it, to preside over it, and to ennoble it, by merging it in the "Lord's Day" (Rev. 1:10), breathing into it an air of liberty and love necessarily unknown before, and thus making it the nearest resemblance to the eternal sabbatism.

Vss. 1-12. THE HEALING OF A WITHERED HAND ON THE SABBATH DAY, AND RETIREMENT OF JESUS TO AVOID DANGER. (=Matt. 12:9-21; Luke 6:6-11.) See on Matthew 12:9-21.

he went into their synagogue—and taught," He had now, no doubt, arrived in Galilee; but this, it would appear, did not occur at Capernaum, for after it was over, He "withdrew Himself," it is said "to the sea" (Mark 3:7), whereas Capernaum was at the sea. And, behold, there was a man which had his hand withered—disabled by paralysis (as in I Kings 13:4). It was his right hand, as Luke graphically notes.

Matthew and Luke say they "watched Him whether He would heal on the sabbath day." They were now come to the length of dogging His steps, to collect materials for a charge of impiety against Him. It is probable that it was to their thoughts rather than their words that Jesus addressed Himself in what follows.

Resistless appeal! "A righteous man regardeth the life of his beast" (Prov. 12:10), and would instinctively rescue it from death or suffering on the sabbath day; how much more his nobler fellow man! But the reasoning, as given in the other two Gospels, is singularly striking: "But He knew their thoughts, and said to the man which had the withered hand, Rise up, and stand forth in the midst. And he arose and stood forth. Then said Jesus unto them, I will ask you one thing: Is it lawful on the sabbath days to do good, or to do evil? to save life or to destroy it?" (Luke 6:8, 9), or as in Mark (3:4), "to kill?" He thus shuts them up to this startling alternative: "Not to do good, when it is in the power of our hand to do it, is to do evil; not to save life, when we can, is to kill"—and must the letter of the sabbath rest be kept at this expense? This unexpected thrust shut their mouths. By this great ethical principle our Lord, we see, held Himself bound, as man. But here we must turn to Mark, whose graphic details make the second Gospel so exceedingly precious. "When He had looked round about on them with anger, being grieved for the hardness of their hearts, He saith unto the man" (Mark 3:5). This is one of the very few passages in the Gospel history which reveal our Lord's feelings. How holy this anger was appears from the "grief" which mingled with it at "the hardness of their hearts." Then saith he to the man, Stretch forth thine hand. And he stretched it forth—the power to obey going forth with the word of command. and it was restored whole, like as the other—The poor man, having faith in this wonderful Healer—which no doubt the whole scene would singularly help to strengthen—disregarded the proud and venomous Pharisees, and thus gloriously put them to shame.

Then the Pharisees went out, and held a council against him, how they might destroy him—This is the first explicit mention of their murderous designs against our Lord. Luke (6:11) says, they were filled with madness, and communed one with another what they might do to Jesus." But their doubt was not, whether to get rid of Him, but how to compass it. Mark (3:6), as usual, is more definite: "The Pharisees went forth, and straightway took counsel with the Herodians against Him, how they might destroy Him." These Herodians were supporters of Herod's dynasty, created by Cæsar—a political rather than religious party. The Pharisees regarded them as untrue to their religion and country. But here we see them combining together against Christ as a common enemy. So on a subsequent occasion (ch. 22:15, 16).

ADAM CLARKE

28. The Son of man is Lord. See on Matt. xii. 7-8. Some have understood this as applying to men in general, and not to Christ. It was made for man, for his ease, comfort, and use, and to these purposes he is to apply it. But this is a very harsh, and at the same time a very lax, mode of interpretation; for it seems to say that a man may make what use he pleases of the Sabbath; and were this true, the moral obligation of the Sabbath would soon be annihilated. God ordained the Sabbath not only to be a type of that rest which remains for the people of God, but also to be a means of promoting the welfare of men in general.

CHAPTER 3

1. A man there which had a withered hand. See this explained on Matt. xii. 10, etc., and on Luke vi. 6, 10.

2. They watched him. "They maliciously watched Him." See on Luke xiv. 1.

4. To do good . . . or . . . evil? to save life, or to kill? It was a maxim with the Jews, as it should be with all men, that he who neglects to preserve life when it is in his power is to be reputed a murderer.

5. With anger, being grieved for the hardness of their hearts. These words are not found in any of the other Evangelists. For hardness, some manuscripts read "deadness"; and others, "blindness." Join all these together, and they will scarcely express the fullness of this people's wretchedness. By a long resistance to the grace and Spirit of God, their hearts had become callous; they were past feeling. By a long opposition to the light of God, they became dark in their understanding, were blinded by the deceitfulness of sin, and thus were past seeing. By a long continuance in the practice of every evil work, they were cut off from all union with God, the Fountain of spiritual life; and, becoming dead in trespasses and sins, they were incapable of any resurrection but through a miraculous power of God. With anger. The anger which our Lord felt proceeded from excessive grief, which was occasioned by their obstinate stupidity and blindness. Whole as the other. This is omitted by the best MSS. and versions.

6. Herodians. For an account of these, see the note on Matt. xvi. 1; xxii. 16.

MATTHEW HENRY

He quitted the place; to teach us in troublous times to shift for our own safety.

1. How he was followed into his retirement. When some had such an enmity to him, that they drove him out of their country, others had such a value for him, that they followed him wherever he went. Great multitudes followed him from all parts of the nation. (1) What induced them to follow him; it was the report they heard of the great things he did. Some wished to see one that had done such great things, and others hoped he would do great things for them. The consideration of the great things Christ has done, should engage us to come to him. (2) What they followed him for (v. 10); They pressed upon him, to touch him, as many as had plagues. Diseases are here called plagues, corrections, chastisements. Those that were under these scourgings came to Jesus; this is the errand on which sickness is sent, to quicken us to enquire after Christ, and apply ourselves to him as our Physician. They pressed upon him, each striving which should get nearest to him, and which should be first served. They desired leave but to touch him, having faith to be healed, not only by his touching them, but by their touching him. (3) What provision he made to be ready to attend them (v. 9); He spoke to his disciples, that a small ship should wait on him, to carry him from place to place on the same coast; without pressing through the crowds of people that followed him for curiosity. Wise men, as much as they can, decline a crowd.

2. What abundance of good he did in his retirement. He did not withdraw to be idle, nor did he send back those who rudely crowded after him when he withdrew, but took it kindly, and gave them what they came for; for he never said to any that sought him diligently, Seek ye me in vain. (1) Diseases were effectually cured. He healed many. (2) Devils were effectually conquered; those whom unclean spirits had got possession of, when they saw him, trembled at his presence, and they also fell down before him, not to supplicate his favour, but to deprecate his wrath. (3) Christ sought not applause to himself in doing those great things, for he strictly charged those for whom he did them, that they should not make him known (v. 12); that they should not be industrious to spread the notice of his cures, as it were by advertisements in the newspapers, but let them leave his own works to praise him, and let the report of them diffuse itself, and make its own way. Let the standers-by carry away the intelligence of it.

I. The choice Christ made of the twelve apostles to be his constant followers and attendants.

1. The introduction to this call or promotion of disciples; He goes up into a mountain, and his errand thither was to pray.

2. The rule he went by in his choice, and that was his own good pleasure; He called unto him whom he would. Not such as we should have thought fittest to be called; but such as he thought fit to call, and determined to make fit for the service to which he called them. Christ calls whom he will.

3. The efficacy of the call; He called them to separate themselves from the crowd, and stand by him, and they came unto him. Those whom it was his will to call, he made willing to come.

4. The end and intention of this call; He ordained them that they should be with him constantly, to be witnesses of his doctrine, manner of life, and patience, that they might fully know it; they must be with him, to receive instructions from him, that they might be qualified to give instructions to others. It would require time to fit them for that which he designed them for. Christ's ministers must be much with him.

5. The power he gave them to work miracles. He ordained them to heal sicknesses and to cast out devils. This showed that the power which Christ has to work these miracles was an original power; that he had it not as a Servant, but as a Son in his own house. Our Lord Jesus had life in himself, and the Spirit without measure; for he could give this power even to the weak and foolish things of the world.

6. Their number and names; He ordained twelve, according to the number of the twelve tribes of Israel. They are here named not just in the same order as they were in Matthew, but as there, so here, Peter is put first and Judas last. Here Matthew is put before Thomas; but in that catalogue which Matthew himself drew up, he puts himself after Thomas. But that which Mark only takes notice of in this list of the apostles, is, that Christ called James and John Boanerges, which is, The sons of thunder; perhaps they were remarkable for a loud commanding voice, they were thundering preachers; or, rather, it denotes the zeal and fervency of their spirits. Yet John, one

But when Jesus knew it, he withdrew himself from thence—whither, our Evangelist says not; but Mark (3:7) says "it was to the sea"—to some distance, no doubt, from the scene of the miracle, the madness, and the plotting just recorded. and great multitudes followed him, and he healed them all—Mark gives the following interesting details: "A great multitude from Galilee followed Him, and from Judea and from Jerusalem, and from Idumea, and from beyond Jordan; and they about Tyre and Sidon, a great multitude, when they had heard what great things He did, came unto Him. And He spake to His disciples, that a small ship should wait on Him because of the multitude, lest they should throng Him. For He had healed many; insomuch that they pressed upon Him for to touch Him, as many as had plagues. And unclean spirits, when they saw Him, fell down before Him, and cried, saying, Thou art the Son of God. And He straitly charged them that they should not make Him known" (Mark 3:7-12). How glorious this extorted homage to the Son of God! But as this was not the time, so neither were they the fitting preachers, as BENGEL says. (See on Mark 1:25, and cf. Jas. 2:19.) Coming back now to our Evangelist: after saying, "He healed them all," he continues: And charged them—the healed—that they should not make him known—(See on ch. 8:4).

13-19. THE TWELVE APOSTLES CHOSEN. See on Luke 6:12-19.

went out—probably from Capernaum. all night in prayer . . . and when . . . day, he called . . .—The work with which the next day began shows what had been the burden of this night's devotions. As He directed His disciples to pray for "laborers" just before sending themselves forth (see on Matt. 9:37; 10:1), so here we find the Lord Himself in prolonged communion with His Father in preparation for the solemn appointment of those men who were to give birth to His Church, and from whom the world in all time was to take a new mould. How instructive is this!

And when he had called unto him his twelve disciples, he gave them power—The word signifies both "power," and "authority" or "right." Even if it were not evident that here both ideas are included, we find both words expressly used in the parallel passage of Luke (9:1)—"He gave them power and authority"—in other words, He both qualified and authorized them. against—or "over." Now the names af the twelve apostles are these—The other Evangelists enumerate the twelve in immediate connection with their appointment (Mark 3:13-19; Luke 6:13-16). But our Evangelist, not intending to record the appointment, but only the Mission of the Twelve, gives their names here. And as in the Acts (1:13) we have a list of the Eleven who met daily in the upper room with the other disciples after their Master's ascension until the day of Pentecost, we have four catalogues in all for comparison. The first, Simon, who is called Peter—(See on John 1:42). and Andrew his brother; James [the son] of Zebedee, and John his brother—named after James, as the younger of the two. Philip and Bartholomew—That this person is the same with "Nathanael of Cana in Galilee" is justly concluded for the three following reasons: First, because Bartholomew is not so properly an individual's name as a family surname; next, because not only in this list, but in Mark's and Luke's, he follows the name of "Philip," who was the instrument of bringing Nathanael first to Jesus (John 1:45); and again, when our Lord, after His resurrection, appeared at 7. Galilee. See Matt. iv. 13, 15.

8. Tyre and Sidon. See Matt. xi. 21. When they had heard what great things he did, came unto him. So if Christ be persecuted and abandoned by the wicked, there are a multitude of pious souls who earnestly seek and follow Him. He who labors for God will always find more than he loses, in the midst of all his contradictions and persecutions.

9. A small ship. It was doubtless a boat, which probably belonged to some of the disciples. Our Lord was at this time teaching by the Sea of Galilee. The word ship is utterly improper in many places of our translation, and tends to mislead the people.

10. They pressed upon him. "Rushed upon Him," through eagerness to have their spiritual and bodily maladies immediately removed. Plagues. Properly such "disorders" as were inflicted by the Lord. The word plague tends to mislead.

A. T. ROBERTSON:

11. "Whensoever they beheld him" (hotan auton etheoroun). Imperfect indicative with hotan of repeated action. They kept falling down before him (prosepipton) and crying, (ekrazon) and he kept charging or rebuking (epitima) them, all imperfects. The unclean spirits (demons) recognize Jesus as the Son of God, as before. Jesus charged them not to make him known as he had also done before. He did not wish this testimony. It was a most exciting ordeal and is given only by Mark.
—Word Pictures in the New Testament

14. He ordained twelve. He "made" twelve. Here is nothing of what we call ordaining. Christ simply appointed them to be with Him, and that He might send them occasionally to preach.

15. To have power to heal . . . and to cast out devils. The business of a minister of Christ is: (1) to preach the gospel, (2) to be the physician of souls, and (3) to wage war with the devil and destroy his kingdom.

16. Simon. See on Matt. x. 2, etc.

17. Sons of thunder. Probably so named because of their zeal and power in preaching the gospel. Some think that our Lord gave this appellative to the sons of Zebedee because of of those sons of thunder, was full of love and tenderness, as appears by his epistles, and was the beloved disciple.

7. Their retirement with their Master, and close adherence to him; They went into a house. Now that this jury was impanelled, they stood together, to hearken to their evidence.

II. The continual crowds that attended Christ's motions (v. 20); The multitude cometh together again, unsent for, and unseasonably pressing upon him, so that he and his disciples could not get time so much as to eat bread. Yet he did not shut his doors against the petitioners, but bade them welcome. They whose hearts are enlarged in the work of God, can easily bear with great inconveniences to themselves, in the prosecution of it. It is happy when zealous hearers and zealous preachers thus meet, and encourage one another. This was a gale of opportunity worth improving. It is good striking while the iron is hot.

III. The care of his relations concerning him (v. 21); When his friends in Capernaum heard how he was followed they went out, to lay hold on him, and fetch him home, for they said, He is beside himself. 1. Some understand it of an absurd preposterous care, which had more in it of reproach to him than of respect; and so we must take it as we read it, He is beside himself. His kindred were willing to hearken to this ill construction which some put upon his great zeal, and to conclude him crazed in his intellects. 2. Others understand it of a well-meaning care; and then they read ἐξέστη—"He fainteth, he has no time to eat bread, and therefore his strength will fail him; he will be stifled with the crowd of people. Therefore let us use a friendly violence with him, and get him a little breathing-time." They who go on with vigour and zeal in the work of God, must expect to meet with hindrances, both from the groundless disaffection of their enemies, and the mistaken affections of their friends.

Verses 22–30

Here is, I. The impudent impious brand which the scribes fastened upon Christ's casting out devils. These scribes came down from Jerusalem, v. 22. It should seem they came this long journey on purpose to hinder the progress of the doctrine of Christ. Coming from Jerusalem, where were the most polite and learned scribes, they were in the greater capacity to do mischief; the reputation of scribes from Jerusalem would have an influence not only upon the country people, but upon the country scribes. They could not deny but that he cast out devils, but they insinuated that he had Beelzebub on his side, and by the prince of the devils cast out devils. There is a trick in the case; Satan is not cast out, he only goes out by consent.

II. The rational answer which Christ gave to this objection.

1. Satan is so subtle, that he will never voluntarily quit his possession; If Satan cast out Satan, his kingdom is divided against itself, and it cannot stand, v. 23–26. He called them to him, he vouchsafed to reason the case with them, that every mouth may be stopped. It was plain that the doctrine of Christ made war upon the devil's kingdom, and had a direct tendency to break his power, and it was as plain that the casting of him out of the bodies of people confirmed that doctrine. Everyone knows that Satan is no fool, nor will act so directly against his own interest.

2. Christ is so wise, that, being engaged in war with him, he will attack his forces wherever he meets them, whether in the bodies or souls of people, v. 27. It is plain, Christ's design is to enter into the strong man's house, and to spoil his goods. Therefore it is natural to suppose that he will thus bind the strong man, and thus show that he has gained a victory over him.

III. The awful warning Christ gave them to take heed how they spoke such dangerous words as these; however they might make light of them, as only conjectures, and the language of free-thinking, if they persisted in it, it would be of fatal consequence to them; it would be found a sin against the last remedy, and consequently unpardonable. It is true, the gospel promiseth, because Christ hath purchased, forgiveness for the greatest sins and sinners, v. 28. Many of those who reviled Christ on the cross found mercy, and Christ himself prayed, Father, forgive them; but this was blaspheming the Holy Ghost, for it was by the Holy Spirit that he cast out devils, and they said, It was by the unclean spirit, v. 30.

Here is, 1. The disrespect which Christ's kindred, according to the flesh, showed to him when he was preaching; they not only stood without, but they sent in a message to call him out to them (v. 31, 32).

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

the Sea of Tiberias, "Nathanael of Cana in Galilee" is mentioned along with six others, all of them apostles, as being present (John 21:2). Matthew the publican—In none of the four lists of the Twelve is this apostle so branded but in his own, as if he would have all to know how deep a debtor he had been to his Lord. (See on ch. 1:3, 5, 6; 9:9.) James the son of Alphaeus—the same person apparently who is called Cleopas or Clopas (Luke 24:18; John 19:25); and, as he was the husband of Mary, sister to the Virgin, James the Less must have been our Lord's cousin. and Lebbaeus, whose surname was Thaddaeus—the same, without doubt, as "Judas the brother of James," mentioned in both the lists of Luke (6:16; Acts 1:13), while no one of the name of Lebbaeus or Thaddaeus is so. It is he who in John (14:22) is sweetly called "Judas, not Iscariot." That he was the author of the Catholic Epistle of "Jude," and not "the Lord's brother" (ch. 13:55), unless these be the same, is most likely. Simon the Canaanite; rather "Kananite," but better still, "the Zealot," as he is called in Luke 6:15, where the original term should not have been retained as in our version ("Simon, called Zelotes"), but rendered "Simon, called the Zealot." The word "Kananite" is just the Aramaic, or Syro-Chaldaic, term for "Zealot." Probably before his acquaintance with Jesus, he belonged to the sect of the Zealots, who bound themselves, as a sort of voluntary ecclesiastical police, to see that the law was not broken with impunity. and Judas Iscariot—i.e., Judas of Kerioth, a town of Judah (Josh. 15:25); so called to distinguish him from "Judas the brother of James" (Luke 6:16). who also betrayed him—a note of infamy attached to his name in all the catalogues of the Twelve.

20-30. JESUS IS CHARGED WITH MADNESS AND DEMONIACAL POSSESSION—HIS REPLY. (=Matt. 12: 22-37; Luke 11:14-26.) See on Matthew 12:22-37, and on Luke 11:21-26.

In Mark the language is awfully strong, "hath never forgiveness, but is in danger of eternal damnation"—or rather, according to what appears to be the preferable though very unusual reading, "in danger of eternal guilt"—a guilt which he will underlie for ever. Mark has the important addition (vs. 30), "Because they said, He hath an unclean spirit." (See on ch. 10:25.) What, then, is this sin against the Holy Ghost—the unpardonable sin? One thing is clear: Its unpardonableness cannot arise from anything in the nature of sin itself; for that would be a naked contradiction to the emphatic declaration of vs. 31, that all manner of sin is pardonable. And what is this but the fundamental truth of the Gospel? (See Acts 13:38, 39; Rom. 3:22, 24; I John 1:7, etc.). Then, again when it is said (vs. 32), that to speak against or blaspheme the Son of man is pardonable, but the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost is not pardonable, it is not to be conceived that this arises from any greater sanctity in the one blessed Person than the other. These remarks so narrow the question that the true sense of our Lord's words seem to disclose themselves at once. It is a contrast between slandering "the Son of man" in His veiled condition and unfinished work—which might be done "ignorantly, in unbelief" (I Tim. 1:13), and slandering the same blessed Person after the blaze of glory which the Holy Ghost was soon to throw around His claims, and in the full knowledge of all that. This would be to slander Him with eyes open, or to do it "presumptuously." To blaspheme Christ in the former condition—when even the apostles stumbled at many things—left them still open to conviction on fuller light: but to blaspheme Him in the latter condition would be to hate the light the clearer it became, and resolutely to shut it out; which, of course, precludes salvation. (See on Heb. 10:26-29). The Pharisees had not as yet done this; but in charging Jesus with being in league with hell they were displaying beforehand a malignant determination to shut their eyes to all evidence, and so, bordering upon, and in spirit committing, the unpardonable sin.

their desire to bring fire down from heaven, i.e., a storm of thunder and lightning, to overturn and consume a certain Samaritan village, the inhabitants of which would not receive their Master. See the account in Luke ix. 53-54. It was a very usual thing among the Jews to give to their rabbins surnames which signified some particular quality or excellence.

19. Into an house. As Christ was now returned to Capernaum, this was probably the house of Peter, mentioned in chap. ii. 1.

20. Eat bread. Had no time to take any necessary refreshment.

21. His friends. Or "relations." They said, He is beside himself. The enemies of Christ raised this report; and His relatives, probably thinking that it was true, went to confine Him. Let a Christian but neglect the care of his body for a time, in striving to enter in at the strait gate; let a minister of Christ but impair his health by his pastoral labors—presently "he is distracted"; he has "not the least conduct nor discretion." But let a man forget his soul, let him destroy his health by debaucheries, let him expose his life through ambition, and he may, notwithstanding, pass for a very prudent and sensible man!

22. He hath Beelzebub. See on Matt. xii. 24-26.

Beelzebub. This name is variously written in the MSS. Beelzeboul, Beelzeboun, Beelzebud, but there is a vast majority in favor of the reading Beelzebul, which should, by all means, be inserted in the text instead of Beelzebub. It is supposed that this idol was the same with Baalzebub the god fly, worshipped at Ekron, 2 Kings i. 2, etc., who had his name changed afterwards by the Jews to Baal zebul, the dung god, a title expressive of the utmost contempt.

27-30. No man. For an explanation of these verses, and a definition of the sin against the Holy Ghost, see Matt. xii. 29-33.

29. Eternal damnation. Or "everlasting judgment." But instead, BL and two others read hamartematos, "sin." The Codex Bezae, two others, and some of the fathers read hamartias, a word of the same import. Grotius, Mill, and Bengel prefer this latter reading. Sin or trespass is the reading of the Coptic, Armenian, Gothic, Vulgate, and all the Itala but two. Everlastinge trespas is the translation in my old MSS. English Bible.

2. The respect which Christ showed to his spiritual kindred upon this occasion. Now, as at other times, he put a comparative neglect upon his mother. He looked upon those that sat about him, and pronounced those of them that not only heard, but did, the will of God, to be to him as his brother, and sister, and mother; as much esteemed, loved, and cared for, as his nearest relations, v. 33–35. This is a good reason why we should honour those that fear the Lord, that we may share with the saints in this honour.

The foregoing chapter began with Christ's entering into the synagogue (v. 1); this chapter begins with Christ's teaching again by the seaside. Thus he changed his method, that if possible all might be reached and wrought upon.

Here seems to be a new convenience found out, which had not been used before, and that was—his standing in a ship, while his hearers stood upon the land.

I. The way of teaching that Christ used with the multitude (v. 2); He taught them many things, but it was by parables, which would tempt them to hear; for people love to be spoken to in their own language, and careless hearers will catch at a plain comparison borrowed from common things. Unless they would take pains to search into it, it would but amuse them; seeing they would see, and not perceive (v. 12). They wilfully shut their eyes against the light, and therefore justly did Christ put it into the dark lantern of a parable, which had a bright side toward those who applied it to themselves, but to those who were only willing for a season to play with it, it only gave a flash of light now and then, but sent them away in the dark.

II. The way of expounding that he used with his disciples; When he was alone by himself, not only the twelve, but others that were about him with the twelve, took the opportunity to ask him the meaning of the parables, v. 10. And he told them what a distinguishing favour it was to them, that they were made acquainted with the mystery of the kingdom of God, v. 11. That instructed them, which others were only amused with. Those who know the mystery of the kingdom of heaven, must acknowledge that it is given to them; they receive both the light and the sight from Jesus Christ.

1. The parable of the sower, as we had it, Matt xiii. 3, &c. He begins (v. 3), with, Hearken, and concludes (v. 9) with, He that hath ears to hear, let him hear. The words of Christ demand attention, even that which as yet we do not thoroughly understand, or not rightly, we must carefully attend to. We shall find more in Christ's sayings than at first there seemed to be.

2. The exposition of it to the disciples. Here is a question Christ put to them before he expounded it, which we had not in Matthew (v. 13); "Know ye not this parable? Know ye not the meaning of it? How then will ye know all parables?" "If ye know not this, which is so plain, how will ye understand other parables, which will be more dark and obscure?" This should quicken us both to prayer and pains that we may get knowledge. If we understand not the plain truths of the gospel, how shall we master those that are more difficult? This parable is to teach you to be attentive to the word, and affected with it, that you may understand it. "If ye receive not this, ye will not know how to use the key by which ye must be let into all the rest." Before Christ expounds the parable, (1) He shows them how sad their case was, who were not let into the meaning of the doctrine of Christ; To you it is given, but not to them. It will help us to put a value upon the privileges we enjoy as disciples of Christ, to consider the deplorable state of those who want such privileges, lest they should be converted, and their sins should be forgiven them, v. 12. Those only who are converted, have their sins forgiven them. (2) He shows them what a shame it was, that they needed such particular explanations of the word they heard, and did not apprehend it at first. Those that would improve in knowledge, must be made sensible of their ignorance.

He gives them the interpretation of the parable of the sower, as we had it before in Matthew. Let us only observe here,

First, That in the great field of the church, the word of God is dispensed to all promiscuously; The sower soweth the word (v. 14), sows it at a venture, not knowing where it will light, or what fruit it will bring forth. He scatters it, in order to the increase of it. Christ was awhile sowing himself, when he —Absorbed in the awful warnings He was pouring forth, He felt this to be an unseasonable interruption, fitted to dissipate the impression made upon the large audience—such an interruption as duty to the nearest relatives did not require Him to give way to. But instead of a direct rebuke, He seizes on the incident to convey a sublime lesson, expressed in a style of inimitable condescension.

VSS. 1-34. PARABLE OF THE SOWER—REASON FOR TEACHING IN PARABLES—PARABLES OF THE SEED GROWING WE KNOW NOT HOW, AND OF THE MUSTARD SEED. (=Matt. 13:1-23, 31, 32; Luke 8:4-18.) 1. And he began again to teach by the seaside: and there was gathered unto him a great multitude—or, according to another well-supported reading, "a mighty" or "immense multitude." so that he entered into a ship—rather, "the ship," meaning the one mentioned in ch. 3:9. (See on Matt. 12:15). and sat in the sea; and the whole multitude was by the sea on the land—crowded on the seashore to listen to Him. (See on Matt. 13:1,2.) 2. And he taught them many things by parables, and said unto them in his doctrine—or "teaching."

Parable of the Sower (vss. 3-9, 13-20). After this parable is recorded, the Evangelist says: vs. 10. And when he was alone, they that were about him with the twelve—probably those who followed Him most closely and were firmest in discipleship, next to the Twelve. asked of him the parable—The reply would seem to intimate that this parable of the sower was of that fundamental, comprehensive, and introductory character which we have assigned to it (see on Matt. 13:1).

13. Know ye not this parable? and how then will ye know all parables?—Probably this was said not so much in the spirit of rebuke, as to call their attention to the exposition of it which He was about to give, and so train them to the right apprehension of His future parables. As in the parables which we have endeavored to explain in Matthew 13, we shall take this parable and the Lord's own exposition of the different parts of it together.

THE SOWER, THE SEED, AND THE SOIL. 3. Hearken; Behold, there went out a sower to sow—What means this? 14. The sower soweth the word—or, as in Luke (8:11), "Now the parable is this: The seed is the word of God." But who is "the sower"? This is not expressed here because if "the word of God" be the seed, every scatterer of that precious

31. His brethren and his mother. Or rather, "his mother and his brethren." This is the arrangement of the best and most ancient MSS.; and this clause, and thy sisters, should be added to verse 32 on the authority of numerous manuscripts and some editions and marginal renderings. Griesbach has received this reading into the text.

2. He taught them many things by parables. See every part of this parable of the sower explained on Matt. xiii. 1.

10. They that were about him. None of the other Evangelists intimate that there were any besides the twelve with Him: but it appears there were several others present; and though they were not styled disciples, yet they appear to have seriously attended to His public and private instructions.

13. Know ye not this parable? The scope and design of which is so very obvious. How then will ye know all parables? Of which mode of teaching you should be perfect masters, in order that you may be able successfully to teach others. This verse is not found in any of the other Evangelists.

went about teaching and preaching; now he sends his ministers and sows by their hand.

Secondly, That of the many that hear the word of the gospel, there are, comparatively, but few that receive it, so as to bring forth the fruits of it; here is but one in four, that comes to good. It is sad to think, how much of the precious seed of the word of God is lost, and sown in vain; but there is a day coming when lost sermons must be accounted for.

Fourthly, The reason why the word doth not leave commanding, abiding, impressions upon the minds of the people. The fault is in themselves, not in the word; some are careless forgetful hearers, and these get no good at all by the word; it comes in at one ear, and goes out at the other; others have their convictions overpowered by their corruptions, and they lose the good impressions the word has made upon them, so that they get no abiding good by it.

Fifthly, The devil is very busy about loose, careless hearers, as the fowls of the air go about the seed that lies above ground. Like the fowls, he comes swiftly, and carries away the word ere we are aware. Though we cannot keep them from hovering over our heads we may not let them nestle in our hearts.

Thirdly, Many are much affected with the word for the present, who yet receive no abiding benefit by it. The motions of soul they have, answerable to what they hear, are but a mere flash, like the crackling of thorns under a pot. Those represented here by the stony ground, received the word with gladness, and yet came to nothing.

Seventhly, Impressions that are not deep, will not be durable. Many that keep their profession in fair days, lose it in a storm; and as those that go to sea only for pleasure, come back again when the wind arises. It is the ruin of hypocrites, that they have no root; they do not act from a living fixed principle. He is the Christian, that is one inwardly.

Sixthly, Many that are not openly scandalized, so as to throw off their profession, as they on the stony ground did, yet have the efficacy of it secretly choked and stifled, so that it comes to nothing.

Eighthly, Many are hindered from profiting by the word of God, by their abundance of the world. Many a good lesson is choked and lost by that prevailing complacency in the world, which they are apt to have, on whom it smiles.

Ninthly, Those that are not encumbered with the cares of the world, and the deceitfulness of riches, may yet lose the benefit of their profession by the lusts of other things; this is added here in Mark; an inordinate appetite toward those things that are pleasing to sense or to the fancy. Those that have but little of the world, may yet be ruined by an indulgence of the body.

seed must be regarded as a sower. It is true that in the parable of the tares it is said, "He that soweth the good seed is the Son of man," as "He that soweth the tares is the devil" (Matt. 13:37, 38). But these are only the great unseen parties, struggling in this world for the possession of man. Each of these has his agents among men themselves; and Christ's agents in the sowing of the good seed are the preachers of the word. Thus, as in all the cases about to be described, the sower is the same, and the seed is the same; while the result is entirely different, the whole difference must lie in the soils, which mean the different states of the human heart. And so, the great general lesson held forth in this parable of the sower is, that however faithful the preacher, and how pure soever his message, the effect of the preaching of the word depends upon the state of the hearer's heart. Now follow the cases.

First Case: THE WAYSIDE. 4. And it came to pass, as he sowed, some fell by the wayside—by the side of the hard path through the field, where the soil was not broken up. and the fowls [of the air] came and devoured it up—Not only could the seed not get beneath the surface, but "it was trodden down" (Luke 8:5), and afterwards picked up and devoured by the fowls. What means this? 15. And these are they by the wayside, where the word is sown; but, when they have heard . . .—or, more fully (Matt. 13:19), "When any one heareth the word of the kingdom, and understandeth it not, then cometh the wicked one, and catcheth away that which was sown in his heart." The great truth here taught is, that hearts all unbroken and hard are no fit soil for saving truth. They apprehend it not (Matt. 13:19) as God's means of restoring them to Himself; it penetrates not, makes no impression, but lies loosely on the surface of the heart, till the wicked one—afraid of losing a victim by his "believing to salvation" (Luke 8:12)—finds some frivolous subject by whose greater attractions to draw off the attention, and straightway it is gone. Of how many hearers of the word is this the graphic but painful history!

Second Case: THE STONY, or rather, ROCKY GROUND. 5. And some fell on stony ground, where it had not much earth—"the rocky ground"; in Matthew (13:5), "the rocky places"; in Luke, "the rock." The thing intended is, not ground with stones in it which would not prevent the roots striking downward, but ground where a quite thin surface of earth covers a rock. What means this? 16. And these are they likewise which are sown on stony ground . . .—"Immediately" the seed in such a case "springs up"—all the quicker from the shallowness of the soil—"because it has no depth of earth." But the sun, beating on it, as quickly scorches and withers it up, "because it has no root" (vs. 6), and "lacks moisture" (Luke 8:6). The great truth here taught is that hearts superficially impressed are apt to receive the truth with readiness, and even with joy (Luke 8:13); but the heat of tribulation or persecution because of the word, or the trials which their new profession brings upon them quickly dries up their relish for the truth, and withers all the hasty promise of fruit which they showed. Such disappointing issues of a faithful and awakening ministry—alas, how frequent are they!

Third Case: THE THORNY GROUND. 7. And some fell among thorns, and the thorns grew up, and choked it, and it yielded no fruit—This case is that of ground not thoroughly cleaned of the thistles, etc.; which, rising above the good seed, "choke" or "smother" it, excluding light and air, and drawing away the moisture and richness of the soil. Hence it "becomes unfruitful" (Matt. 13:22); it grows, but its growth is checked, and it never ripens. The evil here is neither a hard nor a shallow soil—there is softness enough, and depth enough; but it is the existence in it of what draws all the moisture and richness of the soil away to itself, and so starves the plant. What now are these "thorns?" 18. And these are they which are sown among thorns; such as hear the word, 19. And the cares of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, and the lusts of other things entering in—or "the pleasures of this life" (Luke 8:14)—choke the word, and it becometh unfruitful. First, "The cares of this world"—anxious, unrelaxing attention to the business of this present life; second, "The deceitfulness of riches"—of those riches which are the fruit of this worldly "care"; third, "The pleasures of this life," or "the lusts of other things entering in"—the enjoyments in themselves may be innocent, which worldly prosperity enables one to indulge. These "choke" or "smother" the word; drawing off so

4. The fowls. "Of the air" is the common reading; but it should be omitted, on the authority of many MSS. and almost all the versions. Bengel and Griesbach have left it out of the text. It seems to have been inserted in Mark from Luke viii. 5.

When any one heareth the word of the kingdom. Viz., the preaching of the gospel of Christ. And understandeth it not. Perhaps more properly, "regardeth it not," does not lay his heart to it. The wicked one. He who distresses and torments the soul. Mark, chap. iv. 15, calls him Satan, the "adversary" or "opposer," because he resists men in all their purposes of amendment, and to the utmost of his power opposes, in order to frustrate, the influences of divine grace upon the heart. In the parallel place in Luke, viii. 12, he is called the devil. It is worthy of remark that the three Evangelists should use each a different appellative of this mortal enemy of mankind; probably to show that the devil, with all his powers and properties, opposes everything that tends to the salvation of the soul. Catcheth away. Makes the utmost haste to pick up the good seed, lest it should take root in the heart. A careless, inattentive hearer is compared to the way side—his heart is an open road, where evil affections and foolish and hurtful desires continually pass and repass without either notice or restraint.

He also that received seed among the thorns. In land ploughed, but not properly cleared and weeded. Is he—represents that person that heareth the word; and the care, rather "the anxiety" the whole system of anxious, carking cares. The deceitfulness of riches. Which promise peace and pleasure, but can never give them. Choke the word. Or "together choke the word," meaning either that these grow up together with the word, overtop, and choke it, or that these united together, viz., carking, worldly cares, with the delusive hopes and promises of riches, cause the man to abandon the great concerns of his soul and seek, in their place, what he shall eat, drink, and wherewithal he shall be clothed. Dreadful stupidity of man, thus to barter spiritual for temporal good—a heavenly inheritance for an earthly portion! The seed of the Kingdom can never produce much fruit in any heart till the thorns and thistles of vicious affections and impure desires be plucked up by the roots and burned.

Tenthly, Fruit is the thing that God expects and requires from those that enjoy the gospel: fruit according to the seed; a temper of mind, and a course of life, agreeable to the gospel. This is fruit, and it will abound to our account.

Lastly, No good fruit is to be expected but from good seed. If the seed be sown on good ground, if the heart be humble, and holy, and heavenly, there will be good fruit, and it will abound sometimes even to a hundredfold.

I. Those who are good ought to do good; that is to bring forth fruit. God expects a grateful return of his gifts to us, and a useful improvement of his gifts in us; for (v. 21), Is a candle brought to be put under a bushel, or under a bed? No, but that it may be set on a candlestick. All Christians, as they have received the gift, must minister the same. Gifts and graces make a man as a candle; the most eminent are but candles, poor lights, compared with the Sun of righteousness. A candle gives light but a little way, and but a little while, and is easily blown out, and continually burning down and wasting. Many who are lighted as candles, put themselves under a bed, or under a bushel: they do not manifest grace themselves, nor minister grace to others. Like a taper in an urn, they burn to themselves. Those who are lighted as candles, should set themselves on a candlestick; that is, should improve all opportunities of doing good. We are not born for ourselves.

The reason given for this, is, because there is nothing hid, which shall not be manifested, v. 22. There is no treasure of gifts and graces lodged in any but with design to be communicated; nor was the gospel made a secret to the apostles. It should come abroad, and be divulged to all the world. Though Christ expounded the parables to his disciples privately, yet it was with design to make them the more publicly useful; they were taught, that they might teach.

II. It concerns those who hear the word of the gospel, to mark what they hear, and to make a good use of it, If any man have ears to hear, let him hear, v. 23. It is added (v. 24), Take heed what ye hear, and give a due regard to that which ye do hear; Consider what ye hear. What we hear, doth us no good, unless we consider it; those especially that are to teach others must themselves be very observant of the things of God. We must likewise take heed what we hear, by proving all things, that we may hold fast that which is good. As we deal with God, God will deal with us, "With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you." As we improve the talents we are entrusted with, we shall increase them; if we make use of the knowledge we have, it shall sensibly grow, as stock in trade both by being turned; Unto you that hear, shall more be given; to you that have, it shall be given, v. 25. Gifts and graces multiply by being exercised.

If we do not use, we lose, what we have; From him that hath not shall be taken even that which he hath. Burying a talent is the betraying of a trust, and amounts to a forfeiture; and gifts and graces rust for want of wearing.

III. The good seed of the gospel sown in the world, and sown in the heart, doth by degrees produce wonderful effects, but without noise (v. 26, &c.); So is the kingdom of God.

1. It will come up; though it seem lost and buried under the clods, it will find or make its way through them. The seed cast into the ground will spring. After a field is sown with corn, how soon is the sur-much of one's attention, absorbing so much of one's interest, and using up so much of one's time, that only the dregs of these remain for spiritual things, and a fagged, hurried, and heartless formalism is at length all the religion of such persons. What a vivid picture is this of the mournful condition of many, especially in great commercial countries, who once promised much fruit! "They bring no fruit to perfection" (Luke 8:14); indicating how much growth there may be, in the early stages of such a case, and promise of fruit—which after all never ripens.

Fourth Case: The GOOD GROUND. 8. And other fell on good ground, and did yield fruit . . .—The goodness of this last soil consists in its qualities being precisely the reverse of the other three soils: from its softness and tenderness, receiving and cherishing the seed; from its depth, allowing it to take firm root, and not quickly losing its moisture; and from its cleanness, giving its whole vigor and sap to the plant. In such a soil the seed "brings forth fruit," in all different degrees of profusion, according to the measure in which the soil possesses those qualities. 20. And these are they which are sown on good ground; such as hear the word, and receive it, and bring forth fruit, some thirtyfold, some sixty, and some an hundred—A heart soft and tender, stirred to its depths on the great things of eternity, and jealously guarded from worldly engrossments, such only is the "honest and good heart" (Luke 8:15), which "keeps," i.e., "retains" the seed of the word, and bears fruit just in proportion as it is such a heart. Such "bring forth fruit with patience" (vs. 15), or continuance, "enduring to the end"; in contrast with those in whom the word is "choked" and brings no fruit to perfection. The "thirtyfold" is designed to express the lowest degree of fruitfulness; the "hundredfold" the highest; and the "sixtyfold" the intermediate degrees of fruitfulness. As a hundredfold," though not unexampled (Gen. 26:12), is a rare return in the natural husbandry, so the highest degrees of spiritual fruitfulness are too seldom witnessed. The closing words of this introductory parable seem designed to call attention to the fundamental and universal character of it. 9. And he said unto them, He that hath ears to hear, let him hear.

Reason for Teaching in Parables (vss. 11, 12). 11, 12. And he said unto them, Unto you it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of God: but unto them . . .—See on Matthew 13:10-17. 21. And he said unto them, Is a candle—or "lamp"—brought to be put under a bushel, or under a bed? and not to be set on a candlestick?—"that they which enter in may see the light" (Luke 8:16). See on Matthew 5:15, of which this is nearly a repetition. 22. For there is nothing hid which shall not be manifested . . .—See on Matthew 10:26, 27; but the connection there and here is slightly different. Here the idea seems to be this—'I have privately expounded to you these great truths, but only that ye may proclaim them publicly; and if ye will not, others will. For these are not designed for secrecy. They are imparted to be diffused abroad, and they shall be so; yea, a time is coming when the most hidden things shall be brought to light.' 23. If any man have ears to hear, let him hear—This for the second time on the same subject (see on vs. 9). 24. And he saith unto them, Take heed what ye hear—In Luke (8:18) it is, "Take heed how ye hear." The one implies the other, but both precepts are very weighty. with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you—See on Matthew 7:2. and unto you that hear—i.e., thankfully, teachably, profitably. shall more be given. 25. For he that hath, to him shall be given; and he that hath not, from him shall be taken even that which he hath —or "seemeth to have," or "thinketh he hath." (See on Matt. 13:12.) This "having" and "thinking he hath" are not different; for when it hangs loosely upon him, and is not appropriated to its proper ends and uses, it both is and is not his.

Parable of the Seed Growing We Know not How (vss. 26-29). This beautiful parable is peculiar to Mark. Its design is to teach the Imperceptible Growth of the word sown in the heart, from its earliest stage of development to the ripest fruits of practical righteousness. 26. So is the kingdom of God, as if a man should cast seed into the ground;

ADAM CLARKE

Good ground. That which had depth of mold, was well-ploughed and well-weeded. Is he that heareth. Who diligently attends the ministry of the word. And understandeth it. Lays the subject to heart, deeply weighing its nature, design, and importance. Which also beareth fruit. His fruitfulness being an almost necessary consequence of his thus laying the divine message to heart. Let it be observed that to hear, to understand, and to bring forth fruit are the three grand evidences of a genuine believer. He who does not hear the word of wisdom cannot understand what makes for his peace; and he who does not understand what the gospel requires him to be and to perform cannot bring forth fruit; and he who is not fruitful, very fruitful, cannot be a disciple of Christ, see John xv. 8; and he who is not Christ's disciple cannot enter into the kingdom of God. From the different portions of fruit produced by the good ground, a hundred, sixty, and thirty, we may learn that all sound believers are not equally fruitful. All hear, understand, and bring forth fruit, but not in the same degrees—occasioned partly by their situation and circumstances not allowing them such extensive opportunities of receiving and doing good; and partly by lack of mental capacity—for every mind is not equally improvable. Let it be further observed that the unfruitfulness of the different lands was not owing to bad seed or an unskillful sower—the same sower sowed the same seed in all, and with the same gracious design—but it is unfruitful in many because they are careless, inattentive, and worldly-minded.

21. Is a candle . . . put under a bushel? The design of My preaching is to enlighten men; My parables are not designed to hide the truth, but to make it more manifest.

22. For there is nothing hid. Probably our Lord means that all that had hitherto been secret relative to the salvation of a lost world, or only obscurely pointed out by types and sacrifices, shall now be uncovered and made plain by the everlasting gospel. See on Matt. v. 15; x. 26.

25. He that hath. See on Matt. xiii. 12.

Whosoever hath, to him shall be given. This is an allusion to a common custom in all countries. He who possesses much or is rich, to such a person presents are ordinarily given. Whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that he hath. That is, the poor man; he that has little may be easily made a prey of, and so lose his little.

26. So is the kingdom of God. This parable is mentioned only by Mark, a proof that Mark did not abridge Matthew.

face of it altered! How gay and pleasant doth it look, when it is covered with green!

2. The husbandman cannot describe how it comes up; it is one of the mysteries of nature; It springs and grows up, he knows not how, v. 27. Thus we know not how the Spirit by the word makes a change in the heart, any more than we can account for the blowing of the wind, which we hear the sound of, but cannot tell whence it comes, or whither it goes.

3. The husbandman, when he hath sown the seed, doth nothing toward the springing of it up; He sleeps, and rises, night and day, and perhaps never so much as thinks of the corn he hath sown, and yet the earth brings forth fruit of itself, according to the ordinary course of nature. Thus the word of grace, when it is received in faith, is in the heart a work of grace.

4. It grows gradually; first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear, v. 28. When it is sprung up, it will go forward; nature will have its course, and so will grace. Christ's interest, is, and will be, a growing interest; and though the beginning be small, the latter end will greatly increase. Though at first it is but a tender blade, which the frost may nip, or the foot may crush, yet it will increase to the ear, to the full corn in the ear. God carries on his work insensibly and without noise, but insuperably and without fail.

5. It comes to perfection at last (v. 29); When the fruit is brought forth, then he puts in the sickle. From the fruit of the gospel taking place and working in the soul, Christ gathers in a harvest. When those that receive the gospel aright, have finished their course, the harvest comes, when they shall be gathered as wheat into God's barn (Matt. xiii. 30).

IV. The work of grace is small in its beginnings, but comes to be great and considerable at last (v. 30–32); "Whereunto shall I liken the kingdom of God? How shall I make you to understand the designed method of it?" It is like a grain of mustard-seed; he had compared it before to seed sown, here to that seed, intending thereby to show,

1. That the beginnings of the gospel kingdom would be very small, like that which is one of the least of all seeds. The work of grace in the soul, is, at first, but the day of small things; a cloud no bigger than a man's hand. Never were there such great things undertaken by such an inconsiderable handful, as that of the discipling of the nations by the ministry of the apostles.

2. That the perfection of it will be very great; When it grows up, it becomes greater than all herbs. The gospel kingdom in the world, shall increase and spread to the remotest nations of the earth. The difference between a grain of mustard seed and a great tree, is nothing to that between a young convert on earth and a glorified saint in heaven.

With many such parables he spoke the word unto them (v. 33). He spoke in parables, as they were able to hear them; he fetched his comparisons from those things that were familiar to them. His manner of expression was easy, and such as they might hereafter recollect to their edification. But, for the present, without a parable spoke he not unto them, v. 34. The disciples themselves understood those sayings of Christ afterward, which at first they did not rightly take the sense of. But these parables he expounded to them, when they were alone. We cannot but wish we had had that exposition, as we had of the parable of the sower.

This miracle which Christ wrought for the relief of his disciples, in stilling the storm, we had before (Matt. viii. 23, &c.); but it is here more fully related.

1. It was the same day, when the even was come, v. 35. When he had been labouring in the world and doctrine all day, instead of reposing himself, he exposeth himself. The end of a toil may perhaps be but the beginning of a toss.

2. He himself proposed putting to sea at night, because he would lose no time; Let us pass over to the other side; he has work to do there. Christ went about doing good, and no difficulties in his way should hinder him.

3. They did not put to sea, till they had sent away the multitude, that is, answered all their requests; for he sent none home complaining that they had attended him in vain.

4. They took him even as he was, without any cloak to throw over him, which he ought to have had, to keep him warm, when he went to sea at night. We may learn hence not to be over nice and solicitous about the body.

5. The storm was so great, that the ship was full of water (v. 37). The ship being little, the waves beat into it so that it was full.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

27. And should sleep, and rise night and day—go about his other ordinary occupations, leaving it to the wellknown laws of vegetation under the genial influences of heaven. This is the sense of "the earth bringing forth fruit of herself," in the next verse. 28. For the earth bringeth forth fruit of herself; first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear—beautiful allusion to the succession of similar stages, though not definitely marked periods, in the Christian life, and generally in the kingdom of God.

29. But when the fruit is brought forth—to maturity—immediately he putteth in the sickle, because the harvest is come—This charmingly points to the transition from the earthly to the heavenly condition of the Christian and the Church.

Parable of the Mustard Seed (vss. 30-32). For the exposition of this portion, see on Matthew 13: 31, 32.

33. And with many such parables spake he the word unto them, as they were able to hear it—Had this been said in the corresponding passage of Matthew, we should have concluded that what that Evangelist recorded was but a specimen of other parables spoken on the same occasion. But Matthew (13:34) says, "All these things spake Jesus unto the multitude in parables"; and as Mark records only some of the parables which Matthew gives, we are warranted to infer that the "many such parables" alluded to here mean no more than the full complement of them which we find in Matthew. 34. But without a parable spake he not unto them—See on Matthew 13:34. and when they were alone, he expounded all things to his disciples—See on vs. 22.

35-ch. 5:20. JESUS, CROSSING THE SEA OF GALILEE, MIRACULOUSLY STILLS A TEMPEST—HE CURES THE DEMONIAC OF GADARA. (=Matt. 8:23-34; Luke 8:22-39.) The time of this section is very definitely marked by our Evangelist, and by him alone, in the opening words.

Jesus Stills a Tempest on the Sea of Galilee (vss. 35-41). 35. And the same day—on which He spoke the memorable parables of the preceding section, and of Matthew 13. when the even was come—See on ch. 6:35. This must have been the earlier evening—what we should call the afternoon—since after all that passed on the other side, when He returned to the west side, the people were waiting for Him in great numbers (vs. 21; Luke 8:40). he saith unto them, Let us pass over unto the other side—to the east side of the lake, to grapple with a desperate case of possession, and set the captive free, and to give the Gadarenes an opportunity of hearing the message of salvation, amid the wonder which that marvellous cure was fitted to awaken and the awe which the subsequent events could not but strike into them. 36. And when they had sent away the multitude, they took him even as he was in the ship—i.e., without any preparation, and without so much as leaving the vessel, out of which He had been all day teaching. And there were also

27. And should sleep, and rise night and day. That is, he should sleep by night and rise by day, for so the words are obviously to be understood. He knoweth not how. How a plant grows is a mystery in nature which the wisest philosopher in the universe cannot fully explain.

28. Bringeth forth . . . of herself. By its own energy, without either the influence or industry of man. The full corn. "Full wheat"; the perfect, full-grown, or ripe head of grain. The kingdom of God, which is generated in the soul by the word of life, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, is first very small; there is only a blade, but this is full of promise, for a good blade shows there is a good seed at bottom, and that the soil in which it is sown is good also. Then the ear—the strong stalk grows up, and the ear is formed at the top. The faith and love of the believing soul increase abundantly; it is justified freely through the redemption that is in Christ. It has the ear which is shortly to be filled with the ripe grain, the outlines of the whole image of God. Then the full corn. The soul is purified from all unrighteousness; and, having escaped the corruption that is in the world, it is made a partaker of the divine nature, and is filled with all the fullness of God.

29. He putteth in the sickle. "He sendeth out the sickle," i.e., the reapers—the instrument, by a metonomy, being put for the persons who use it. This is a common figure. It has been supposed that our Lord intimates here that, as soon as a soul is made completely holy, it is taken into the kingdom of God. But certainly the parable does not say so. When the corn is ripe, it is reaped for the benefit of him who sowed it, for it can be of little or no use till it be ripe. So when a soul is saved from all sin, it is capable of being fully employed in the work of the Lord; it is then, and not till then, fully fitted for the Master's use. God saves men to the uttermost, that they may here perfectly love Him and worthily magnify His name. To take them away the moment they are capable of doing this would be, so far, to deprive the world and the Church of the manifestation of the glory of His grace.

31. A grain of mustard seed. See on Matt. xiii. 31-32.

33. With many such parables. Many is omitted by L, sixteen others; the Syriac, both the Persic, one Arabic, Coptic, Armenian, Aethiopic, and two of the Itala. Mill approves of the omission, and Griesbach leaves it doubtful. It is probably an interpolation. The text reads better without it. As they were able to hear. Or to "understand," always suiting His teaching to the capacities of His hearers. I have always found that preacher most useful who could adapt his phrase to that of the people to whom he preached.

34. He expounded all things to his disciples. That they might be capable of instructing others. Outside hearers, those who do not come into close fellowship with the true disciples of Christ, have seldom more than a superficial knowledge of divine things. In the fellowship of the saints, where Jesus the Teacher is always to be found, everything is made plain—for the secret of the Lord is with them who fear Him.

35. Let us pass over unto the other side. Our Lord was now by the Sea of Galilee.

36. They took him even as he was in the ship. The construction of this verse is exceedingly difficult. The meaning appears to be this: The disciples sailed off with Him just as He was in the boat out of which He had been teaching the people, and they did not wait to provide any accommodations for the passage. This I believe to be the meaning of the inspired penman.

MATTHEW HENRY

6. There were with him other little ships, which, no doubt, shared in the distress and danger. The multitude went away when he put to sea, but some there were, that would venture upon the water with him. One may boldly and cheerfully put to sea in Christ's company, yea though we foresee a storm.

7. Christ was asleep in this storm. It was in the hinder part of the ship, the pilot's place: he lay at the helm.

He had a pillow there. And he slept, to try the faith of his disciples and to stir up prayer: upon the trial, their faith appeared weak, and their prayers strong. Sometimes when the church is in a storm, Christ seems as if he were asleep, unconcerned in the troubles of his people, and regardless of their prayers. When he sleeps he doth not sleep; the keeper of Israel doth not so much as slumber (Ps. cxxi. 3, 4); he slept, but his heart was awake.

8. His disciples encouraged themselves with their having his presence, and thought it the best way to improve that, and appeal to that, and ply the oar of prayer rather than their other oars. Their confidence lay in this, that they had their Master with them; and the ship that has Christ in it, though it may be tossed, cannot sink. They awoke Christ. When Christ seems as if he slept in a storm, he is awakened by the prayers of his people; we may be at our wits' end, but not at our faith's end, while we have such a Saviour to go to. Their address to Christ is here expressed very emphatically; Master, carest thou not that we perish? I confess this sounds somewhat harsh, rather like chiding him for sleeping than begging him to awake. I know no excuse for it, but the present distress they were in, which put them into such a fright, that they knew not what they said. They do Christ a deal of wrong, who suspect him to be careless of his people in distress.

9. The word of command with which Christ rebuked the storm, we have here, and had not in Matthew, v. 39. He says, Peace, be still—be silent, be dumb. Let not the wind any longer roar, nor the sea rage. The noise is threatening and terrifying; let us hear no more of it. This is, (1) A word of command to us; when our wicked hearts are like the troubled sea which cannot rest (Isa. lvii. 20); let us think we hear the law of Christ, saying, Be silent, be dumb. Think not confusedly, speak not unadvisedly; but be still. (2) A word of comfort to us, that, be the storm of trouble ever so loud, ever so strong, Jesus Christ can lay it with a word's speaking. He that made the seas, can make them quiet.

10. The reproof Christ gave them for their fears, is here carried further than in Matthew. There it is, Why are ye fearful? Here, Why are ye so fearful? There it is, O ye of little faith. Here it is, How is it that ye have no faith? Not that the disciples were without faith. But at this time their fears prevailed so that they seemed to have no faith at all. It was out of the way, when they had occasion for it, and so it was as if they had not had it. Those may suspect their faith, who can entertain such a thought as that Christ careth not though his people perish.

Lastly, The impression this miracle made upon the disciples, is here differently expressed. In Matthew it is said, The men marvelled; here it is said, They feared greatly. Now their fear was rectified by their faith. When they feared the winds and the seas it was for want of the reverence they ought to have had for Christ. But now that they saw a demonstration of his power over them, they feared them less, and him more. They had feared the power and wrath of the Creator in the storm, and that fear had torment and amazement in it; but now they feared the power and grace of the Redeemer in the calm; and it had pleasure and satisfaction in it. They said, What manner of man is this? Surely more than a man, for even the winds and the seas obey him.

with him other little ships—with passengers, probably, wishing to accompany Him. 37. And there arose a great storm of wind—"a tempest of wind." To such sudden squalls the Sea of Galilee is very liable from its position, in a deep basin, skirted on the east by lofty mountain ranges, while on the west the hills are intersected by narrow gorges through which the wind sweeps across the lake, and raises its waters with great rapidity into a storm. and the waves beat into the ship—kept beating or pitching on the ship. so that it was now full—rather, "so that it was already filling." In Matthew (8:24), "insomuch that the ship was covered with the waves"; but this is too strong. It should be, "so that the ship was getting covered by the waves." So we must translate the word used in Luke (8:23)—not as in our version—"And there came down a storm on the lake, and they were filled [with water]"—but "they were getting filled," i.e., those who sailed; meaning, of course, that their ship was so. 38. And he was in the hinder—or stern—part of the ship, asleep on a pillow—either a place in the vessel made to receive the head, or a cushion for the head to rest on. It was evening; and after the fatigues of a busy day of teaching under the hot sun, having nothing to do while crossing the lake, He sinks into a deep sleep, which even this tempest raging around and tossing the little vessel did not disturb. and they awake him, and say unto him, Master—or "Teacher." In Luke (8:24) this is doubled—in token of their life-and-death earnestness—"Master, Master." carest thou not that we perish?—Unbelief and fear made them sadly forget their place, to speak so. Luke has it, "Lord, save us, we perish." When those accustomed to fish upon that deep thus spake, the danger must have been imminent. They say nothing of what would become of Him, if they perished; nor think, whether, if He could not perish, it was likely He would let this happen to them; but they hardly knew what they said. 39. And he arose, and rebuked the wind—"and the raging of the water" (Luke 8:24). and said unto the sea, Peace, be still—two sublime words of command, from a Master to His servants, the elements. And the wind ceased, and there was a great calm—The sudden hushing of the wind would not at once have calmed the sea, whose commotion would have settled only after a considerable time. But the word of command was given to both elements at once. 40. And he said unto them, Why are ye so fearful?—There is a natural apprehension under danger; but there was unbelief in their fear. It is worthy of notice how considerately the Lord defers this rebuke till He had first removed the danger, in the midst of which they would not have been in a state to listen to anything. how is it that ye have no faith?—next to none, or none in present exercise. In Luke it is, "Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith?" Faith they had, for they applied to Christ for relief: but little, for they were afraid, though Christ was in the ship. Faith dispels fear, but only in proportion to its strength. 41. And they feared exceedingly—were struck with deep awe. and said one to another, What manner of man is this, that even the wind and the sea obey him?—"What is this? Israel has all along been singing of JEHOVAH, 'Thou rulest the raging of the sea: when the waves thereof arise, Thou stillest them!' 'The Lord on high is mightier than the noise of many waters, yea, than the mighty waves of the sea!' (Ps. 89:9; 93:4). But, lo, in this very boat of ours is One of our own flesh and blood, who with His word of command hath done the same! Exhausted with the fatigues of the day, He was but a moment ago in a deep sleep, undisturbed by the howling tempest, and we had to waken Him with the cry of our terror; but rising at our call, His majesty was felt by the raging elements, for they were instantly hushed—'WHAT MANNER OF MAN IS THIS?' "

ADAM CLARKE

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

The day had been a very illustrious one. Our Lord had remarkably displayed His teaching and healing powers. Great crowds had been attracted and He had both delivered to them most precious parables and wrought among them most marvelous cures. Grand as the day was, it could not come to a close without a storm. After the same manner you will find it in the history of the Church of God, that intermingled with great successes will be great afflictions. Pentecost is followed by persecution: Peter's sermon by Peter's imprisonment. Though today a church may flourish abundantly, in a very short time it may be visited with stern adversities; it may be tried nonetheless, but all the more, because God is in its midst and is blessing it. When our Lord took ship, the weather appears to have been very fair, and many little boats, which scarce would have tempted the sea had its surface been ruffled, put out upon the lake under the convoy of the great teacher's vessel. His was the admiral's flag ship, and they were the happy fleet. They made a gay flotilla sailing softly like seabirds when the ocean is in a gentle mood. All hearts were happy, all spirits were serene, and the sleep of the Master was but a type of the general peace. Nature reposed; the lake was as a molten looking-glass, everything was quiet; and yet all of a sudden, as is the custom with these deep-lying inland seas, the storm fiend rushed from his haunt among the mountains, sweeping everything before it; the little vessel was hard put to it, she was well-nigh filled with water, and ready to sink through the force of the driving hurricane. Thus may our loveliest calms be succeeded by overwhelming storms. A Christian man is seldom long at ease.

—The Treasury of the New Testament

39. Peace, be still. "Be silent! Be still!" There is uncommon majesty and authority in these words. Who but God could act thus? Perhaps this saving of His disciples in the boat might be designed to show forth that protection and deliverance which Christ will give to His followers, however violently they may be persecuted by earth or hell.

40. Why are ye so fearful? Having Me with you. How is it that ye have no faith? Having already had such proofs of My unlimited power and goodness.

41. What manner of man is this? They were astonished at such power proceeding from a Person who appeared to be only like one of themselves.

CHAPTER 5

We have here an instance of Christ's dispossessing the strong man armed. This he did when he was come to the other side, whither he went through a storm; his business there was to rescue this poor creature out of the hands of Satan.

I. The miserable condition that this poor creature was in; he was under the power of an unclean spirit; he was raving mad; his condition seems to have been worse than any of the possessed, that were Christ's patients.

1. He had his dwelling among the tombs, among the graves of dead people. Their tombs were out of

CHAPTER 5

Glorious Cure of the Gadarene Demoniac (vss. 1-20). 1. And they came over unto the other side of the sea, into the country of the Gadarenes. 2. And when he was come out of the ship, immediately—(see vs. 6)—there met him a man with an unclean spirit—"which had devils [demons] long time" (Luke 8:27). In Matthew (8:28), "there met him two men possessed with devils." Though there be no discrepancy between these two statements—more than between two witnesses, one of whom testifies to something done by one person, while the other affirms that there were two—it is difficult to

CHAPTER 5

1. The Gadarenes. Some of the MSS. have Gergasenes, and some of them Gerasenes. The Gadarenes were included within the limits of the Gergasenes. Dr. Lightfoot supposes that, of the two demoniacs mentioned here, one was of Gadara, and consequently a heathen, the other was a Gergesenian, and consequently a Jew; and he thinks that Mark and Luke mention the Gadarene demoniac because his case was a singular one, being the only heathen cured by our Lord except the daughter of the Syrophoenician woman.

MATTHEW HENRY

the cities, in desolate places. Perhaps the devil drove him to the tombs. The touch of a grave was polluting. The unclean spirit drives people into that company that is defiling, and so keeps possession of them. Christ, by rescuing souls out of Satan's power, saves the living from among the dead.

2. He was very strong and ungovernable; No man could bind him. Not only cords would not hold him, but chains and fetters of iron would not, v. 3, 4. This sets forth the sad condition of those souls in which the devil has dominion. Some notoriously wilful sinners are like this madman. The commands and curses of the law are as chains and fetters, to restrain sinners from their wicked courses; but they break those bonds in sunder.

3. He was a terror and torment to himself and to all about him, v. 5. The devil is a cruel master. This wretched creature was night and day in the mountains and in the tombs, crying, and cutting himself with stones. What is a man, when reason is *de*throned and Satan *en*throned?

II. His application to Christ (v. 6); When he saw Jesus afar off, coming ashore, he ran, and worshipped him. He usually ran upon others with rage, but he ran to Christ with reverence. That was done by an invisible hand of Christ, which could not be done with chains and fetters; his fury was all on a sudden curbed. The poor man came, and worshipped Christ, in a sense of the need he had of his help, the power of Satan in and over him being, for this instant, suspended.

III. The word of command Christ gave (v. 8); Come out of him, thou unclean spirit. He made the man desirous to be relieved, when he enabled him to run, and worship him, and then put forth his power for his relief. If Christ work in us heartily to pray for a deliverance from Satan, he will work for us that deliverance.

IV. The dread which the devil had of Christ. The man ran, and worshipped Christ; but it was the devil in the man, that cried with a loud voice (making use of the poor man's tongue), What have I to do with thee? v. 7. 1. He calls God the most high God, above all other gods. 2. He owns Jesus to be the Son of God. It is no strange thing to hear the best words drop from the worst mouths. Piety from the teeth outward is an easy thing. The most fair-spoken hypocrite cannot say better than to call Jesus the Son of God and yet that the devil did. 3. He disowns any design against Christ; "What have I to do with thee?" 4. He deprecates his wrath; I adjure thee, that, though those drive me out hence, yet that thou torment me not.

V. The account Christ took from this unclean spirit of his name. This we had not in Matthew. Christ asked him, What is thy name? My name is Legion, for we are many. Now this intimates that the devils are, 1. Military powers. The devils war against God and his glory, Christ and his gospel, men and their holiness and happiness. 2. That they are numerous; he owns, or rather he boasts—We are many; as if he hoped to be too many for Christ himself to deal with. 3. That they are unanimous; they are many devils, and yet but one legion engaged in the same wicked cause. 4. That they are very powerful; Who can stand before a legion? We are not a match for our spiritual enemies, in our own strength; but in the Lord, and in the power of his might, we shall be able to stand against them.

VI. The request of this legion, that Christ would suffer them to go into a herd of swine that was feeding nigh unto the mountains (v. 11). Their request was, 1. That he would not send them away out of the country (v. 10); not only that he would not torment them before the time; but that he would not banish them that country. They seem to have had a particular affection for that country; or, rather, a particular spite to it. 2. That he would suffer them to enter into the swine.

VII. The permission Christ gave them to enter into the swine, and the immediate destruction of the swine thereby; He gave them leave (v. 13). Immediately the unclean spirits entered into the swine, which by the law were unclean creatures. Those that, like the swine, delight in the mire of sensual lusts, are fit habitations for Satan. The consequence of the devils entering into the swine, was, that they all ran mad presently, and ran headlong into the adjoining sea, where they were all drowned, to the number of two thousand.

VIII. The report of all this dispersed through the country immediately. They that fed the swine, hastened to the owners, to give an account of their charge, v. 14. This drew the people together, to see what was done.

see how the principal details here given could apply to more than one case. 3. Who had his dwelling among the tombs—Luke says, "He ware no clothes, neither abode in any house." These tombs were hewn out of the rocky caves of the locality, and served for shelters and lurking-places (Luke 8:26). 4. Because that he had been often bound with fetters and chains . . .—Luke says (8:29) that "oftentimes it [the unclean spirit] had caught him"; and after mentioning how they had vainly tried to bind him with chains and fetters, because, "he brake the bands," he adds, "and was driven of the devil [demon] into the wilderness." The dark tyrant-power by which he was held clothed him with superhuman strength and made him scorn restraint. Matthew (8:28) says he was "exceeding fierce, so that no man might pass by that way." He was the terror of the whole locality. 5. And always, night and day, he was in the mountains, and in the tombs, crying, and cutting himself with stones—Terrible as he was to others, he himself endured untold misery, which sought relief in tears and self-inflicted torture. 6. But when he saw Jesus afar off, he ran and worshipped him—not with the spontaneous alacrity which says to Jesus, "Draw me, we will run after thee," but inwardly compelled, with terrific rapidity, before the Judge, to receive sentence of expulsion. 7. What have I to do with thee, Jesus, Son of the most high God? I adjure thee by God, that thou torment me not—or, as in Matthew 8:29, "Art Thou come to torment us before the time?" (See on ch. 1:24.) Behold the tormentor anticipating, dreading, and entreating exemption from torment! In Christ they discern their destined Tormentor; the time, they know, is fixed, and they feel as if it were come already! (Jas. 2:19.) 8. For he said unto him—i.e., before the unclean spirit cried out. Come out of the man, unclean spirit!—Ordinarily, obedience to a command of this nature was immediate. But here, a certain delay is permitted, the more signally to manifest the power of Christ and accomplish His purposes. 9. And he asked him, What is thy name?—The object of this question was to extort an acknowledgment of the virulence of demoniacal power by which this victim was enthralled. And he answered, saying, My name is Legion: for we are many—or, as in Luke, "because many devils [demons] were entered into him." A legion, in the Roman army, amounted, at its full complement, to six thousand; but here the word is used, as such words with us, and even this one, for an indefinitely large number—large enough however to rush, as soon as permission was given, into two thousand swine and destroy them. 10. And he besought him much that he would not send them away out of the country—The entreaty, it will be observed, was made by one spirit, but in behalf of many—"he besought Him not to send them . . ."—just as in the former verse, "he answered we are many." But what do they mean by entreating so earnestly not to be ordered out of the country? Their next petition (vs. 12) will make that clear enough. 11. Now there was there, nigh unto the mountains—rather, "to the mountain," according to what is clearly the true reading. In Matthew 8:30, they are said to have been "a good way off." But these expressions, far from being inconsistent, only confirm, by their precision, the minute accuracy of the narrative. a great herd of swine feeding—There can hardly be any doubt that the owners of these were Jews, since to them our Lord had now come to proffer His services. This will explain what follows. 12. And all the devils besought him, saying—"if thou cast us out" (Matt. 8:31)—Send us into the swine, that we may enter into them—Had they spoken out all their mind, perhaps this would have been it: "If we must quit our hold of this man, suffer us to continue our work of mischief in another form, that by entering these swine, and thus destroying the people's property, we may steel their hearts against Thee!" 13. And forthwith Jesus gave them leave—In Matthew this is given with majestic brevity—"Go!" The owners, if Jews, drove an illegal trade; if heathens, they insulted the national religion: in either case the permission was just. And the unclean spirits went out—of the man—and entered into the swine: and the herd ran violently—rushed—down a steep place—down the hanging cliff—into the sea (they were about two thousand)—The number of them is given by this graphic Evangelist alone. and were choked in the sea—"perished in the waters" (Matt. 8:32). 14. And they that fed the swine fled, and told it—"told everything, and what was befallen to the possessed of the devils" (Matt. 8:33)—in the city, and in the country. And they went out to see what it was that

ADAM CLARKE

2. A man with an unclean spirit. There are two mentioned by Matthew, who are termed "demoniacs."

3. Who had his dwelling among the tombs. See Matt. viii. 28.

4. With fetters and chains. His strength, it appears, was supernatural, no kind of chains being strong enough to confine him.

5. Crying, and cutting himself with stones. In this person's case we see a specimen of what Satan could do in all the wicked if God should permit him. But even the devil himself has his chain, and he who often binds others is always bound himself.

6. Worshipped him. "Did Him homage," compelled thereto by the power of God. How humiliating to Satan thus to be obliged to acknowledge the superiority of Christ!

7. What have I to do with thee? Or, "What is it to Thee and me?" or, "Why dost Thou trouble thyself with me?" See on chap. i. 24 and Matt. viii. 29, where the idiom and meaning are explained.

10. Out of the country. Strange that these accursed spirits should find it any mitigation of their misery to be permitted to exercise their malevolence in a particular district! But as this is supposed to have been a heathen district, therefore the demons might consider themselves in their own territories; and probably they could act there with less restraint than they could do in a country where the worship of God was established.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

I am not going to enter into any discussion of the old-time difficulty, the controversy between Huxley and Gladstone, about that herd of swine. Suffice it to say that our Lord was exercising His ministry in Jewish territory, and even if Josephus is right, that this was a Greek city, it is nevertheless true that our Lord was dealing with the children of Israel, and in the destruction of the swine He was rebuking their indulgence in a traffic absolutely forbidden.

—The Gospel According to Mark

MATTHEW HENRY

When they saw how wonderfully the poor man was cured, they hence conceived a veneration for Christ, v. 15. They saw him that was possessed with the devil sitting clothed and in his right mind; when Satan was cast out, he came to himself, and was his own man presently. Those who are grave and sober, and live by rule and with consideration, thereby make it appear that by the power of Christ the devil's power is broken in their souls.

The sight of this made them afraid; it astonished them, and forced them to own the power of Christ, and that he is worthy to be feared. When they found that their swine were lost, they thence conceived a dislike of Christ, they prayed him to depart out of their coasts, for they think not any good he can do them sufficient to make them amends for the loss of so many swine, fat swine, it may be, and ready for the market. Now the devils had what they would have; for by no handle do these evil spirits more effectually manage sinful souls than by that of the love of the world. If they would but part with their sins, he had life and happiness for them; but, being loth to quit either their sins or their swine, they chose rather to abandon their Saviour. Thus they do, who, rather than let go a base lust, will throw away their interest in Christ. They wished him further off.

IX. An account of the conduct of the poor man after his deliverance. 1. He desired that he might go along with Christ (v. 18). 2. Christ would not suffer him to go with him. He had other work for him to do; he must go home to his friends, and tell them what great things the Lord had done for him, and his neighbours and friends might be edified, and invited to believe in Christ. He must take particular notice rather of Christ's pity than of his power; he must tell them what compassion the Lord had had on him in his misery. 3. The man, in a transport of joy, proclaimed, all the country over, what great things Jesus had done for him, v. 20. And see what was the effect of it; All men did marvel, but few went any further. Many that cannot but wonder at the works of Christ, yet do not, as they ought, wonder after him.

The Gadarenes having desired Christ to leave their country, he did not stay to trouble them long, but presently went by water, back to the other side (v. 21), and there much people gathered to him. If there be some that reject Christ, yet there are others that receive him, and bid him welcome.

I. Here is one, that comes openly to beg a cure for a sick child; and it is no less a person than one of the rulers of the synagogue. He was not named in Matthew, he is here, Jairus, or Jair, Judges x. 3.

was done—Thus had they the evidence, both of the herdsmen and of their own senses, to the reality of both miracles. 15. And they come to Jesus—Matthew (8:34) says, "Behold, the whole city came out to meet Jesus." and see him that was possessed with the devil—the demonized person—and had the legion, sitting—"at the feet of Jesus," adds Luke (8:35); in contrast with his former wild and wandering habits. and clothed—As our Evangelist had not told us that he "ware no clothes," the meaning of this statement could only have been conjectured but for "the beloved physician" (Luke 8:27), who supplies the missing piece of information here. This is a striking case of what are called Undesigned Coincidences amongst the different Evangelists; one of them taking a thing for granted, as familiarly known at the time, but which we should never have known but for one or more of the others, and without the knowledge of which some of their statements would be unintelligible. The clothing which the poor man would feel the want of the moment his consciousness returned to him, was doubtless supplied to him by some of the Twelve. and in his right mind—but now, oh, in what a lofty sense! (Cf. an analogous, though a different kind of case, Dan. 4:34-37.) and they were afraid—Had this been awe only, it had been natural enough; but other feelings, alas! of a darker kind, soon showed themselves. 16. And they that saw it told them how it befell to him that was possessed with the devil ('the demonized person') and also concerning the swine—Thus had they the double testimony of the herdsmen and their own senses. 17. And they began to pray him to depart out of their coasts—Was it the owners only of the valuable property now lost to them that did this? Alas, no! For Luke (8:37) says, "Then the whole multitude of the country of the Gadarenes round about besought Him to depart from them; for they were taken with great fear." The evil spirits had thus, alas! their object. Irritated, the people could not suffer His presence; yet awe-struck, they dared not order Him off: so they entreat Him to withdraw, and—He takes them at their word. 18. he that had been possessed with the devil prayed him that he might be with him—the grateful heart, fresh from the hand of demons, clinging to its wondrous Benefactor. How exquisitely natural! 19. Howbeit, Jesus suffered him not, . . .—To be a missionary for Christ, in the region where he was so well known and so long dreaded, was a far nobler calling than to follow Him where nobody had ever heard of him, and where other trophies not less illustrious could be raised by the same power and grace. 20. And he departed, and began to publish—not only among his friends, to whom Jesus immediately sent him, but—in Decapolis—so called, as being a region of ten cities. (See on Matt. 4:25.) how great things Jesus had done for him: and all men did marvel—Throughout that considerable region did this monument of mercy proclaim his new-found Lord; and some, it is to be hoped, did more than "marvel."

21-43. THE DAUGHTER OF JAIRUS RAISED TO LIFE—THE WOMAN WITH AN ISSUE OF BLOOD HEALED. (= Matt. 9:18-26; Luke 8:41-56.) The occasion of this scene will appear presently.

Jairus' Daughter (vss. 21-24). 21. And when Jesus was passed over again by ship unto the other side—from the Gadarene side of the lake, where He had parted with the healed demoniac, to the west side, at Capernaum. much people gathered unto him—who "gladly received Him; for they were all waiting for Him" (Luke 8:40). The abundant teaching earlier that day (ch. 4:1, etc., and Matthew 13) had only whetted the people's appetite: and disappointed, as would seem, that He had left them in the evening to cross the lake, they remain hanging about the beach, having got a hint, probably through some of His disciples, that He would be back the same evening. Perhaps they witnessed at a distance the sudden calming of the tempest. The tide of our Lord's popularity was now fast rising. and he was nigh unto the sea. 22. And, behold, there cometh one of the rulers of the synagogue—of which class there were but few who believed in Jesus (John 7:48). One would suppose from this that the ruler had been with the multitude on the shore, anxiously awaiting the return of Jesus, and immediately on His arrival had accosted Him as here related. But Matthew (9:18) tells us that the ruler came to Him while He was in the act of speaking at His own table on the subject of fasting; and as we must suppose that this converted publican ought to know what took place on that memorable occasion when he made a feast to his Lord, we conclude that here the right order is indicated by the First Evangelist alone. Jairus by name—or

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

The terrified Gerasenes beseech Jesus to leave them. They had rather have their swine than their Savior, and so, though they saw the demoniac sitting, "clothed, and in his right mind," at the feet of Jesus, they in turn beseech that He should take himself away. Fear and selfishness prompted the prayer. The communities on the eastern side of the lake were largely Gentile; and, no doubt, these people knew that they did many worse things than swine-keeping, and may have been afraid that some more of their wealth would have to go the same road as the herd. They did not want instruction, nor feel that they needed a healer. Were their prayers so very unlike the wishes of many of us? Is there nobody nowadays unwilling to let the thought of Christ into his life, because he feels an uneasy suspicion that, if Christ comes, a good deal will have to go? How many trades and schemes of life really beseech Jesus to go away and leave them in peace!

And He goes away. The tradegy of life is that we have the awful power of severing ourselves from His influence. Christ commands unclean spirits, but He can only plead with hearts. And if we bid Him depart, He is fain to leave us for the time to the indulgence of our foolish and wicked schemes. If any man open, He comes in—oh, how gladly! but if any man slam the door in His face, He can but tarry without and knock. Sometimes His withdrawing does more than His loudest knocking; and sometimes they who repelled Him as He stood on the beach call Him back as He moves away to the boat. It is in the hope that they may that He goes.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

Jarius employed a phrase which had at its very heart a sense of proprietorship: "my little daughter!" Ah! we may love all children, all the bairns may seem to us the special messengers of God to mortals; but there is a difference. Parental love has within itself an almost terrifying, and yet most exquisitely tender sense of responsibility. If a man shall say to me, "It is your duty to do thus or so," I shall challenge him for his reason; and if he shall reply, "For your own sake," I may answer, "Stand out of my sunlight, and do not interfere with me!" But if he shall say, "For the sake of that boy in your home," he has conquered me, he has mastered me! Oh! that strange agony in the love of parent for child that makes the parent ever tremble! "My little daughter." That is a picture in itself.

Luke records the fact that she was an only daughter, and that she was twelve years of age. Twelve years of sunshine, twelve years of music in the home! She had come to that wonderful age which today we are describing as the period of adolescence, when will is becoming supreme, and choices and elections are being made alone, when all life seems to be breaking from bud into larger blossom with the potentiality of fruitage. Twelve years of age!

—The Gospel According to Mark

He addressed himself to Christ with great humility and reverence; When he saw him, he fell at his feet, and with great importunity, he besought him greatly, as one in earnest. He has a little daughter, about twelve years old, the darling of the family, and she lies a-dying; but he believes that if Christ will but come, and lay his hands upon her, she will return even from the gates of the grave. He said, at first, when he came, She lies a-dying (so Mark); but afterward, She is even now dead (so Matthew); but he still prosecutes his suit. Christ readily agreed, and went with him, v. 24.

II. Here is another, that comes clandestinely to steal a cure (if I may so say) for herself; and she got the relief she came for. This cure was wrought by the way, as he was going to raise the ruler's daughter. Many of his discourses, and some of his miracles, are dated by the way-side; we should be doing good, not only when we sit in the house, but when we walk by the way.

1. The piteous case of this poor woman. She had a constant issue of blood upon her, for twelve years. She had had the best advice of physicians, that she could get, and had made use of the many medicines and methods they prescribed; but now that she had spent all she had among them, they gave her up as incurable. It is usual with people not to apply themselves to Christ, till they have tried in vain all other helpers, and find them, as certainly they will, physicians of no value. And he will be found a sure refuge, even to those who make him their last refuge.

2. The strong faith that she had in the power of Christ to heal her; If I may but touch his clothes, I shall be whole, v. 28. A private cure was what she wished for, and her faith was suited to her case.

3. The wonderful effect produced by it; She came in the crowd behind him, and with much ado got to touch his garment, and immediately she felt the cure wrought, v. 29. The flux of blood was dried up, and she felt herself perfectly well all over her in an instant. Those whom Christ heals of the disease of sin, that bloody issue, cannot but experience in themselves a universal change for the better.

4. Christ's enquiry after his concealed patient, and the encouragement he gave her; Christ knew in himself that virtue had gone out of him, v. 30. Being desirous to see his patient, he asked, not in displeasure, as one affronted, but in tenderness, as one concerned, Who touched my clothes? The disciples almost ridiculed his question (v. 31); The multitudes throng thee, and sayest thou, Who touched me?

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

"Jaeirus." It is the same name as Jair, in the Old Testament (Num. 32:41; Judg. 10:3; Esther 2:5). and when he saw him, he fell at his feet—in Matthew (9:18), "worshipped Him." The meaning is the same in both. 23. And besought him greatly, saying, My little daughter—Luke (8:42) says, "He had one only daughter, about twelve years of age." According to a well-known rabbin, quoted by LIGHTFOOT, a daughter. till she had completed her twelfth year, was called "little," or "a little maid"; after that, "a young woman." lieth at the point of death—Matthew gives it thus: "My daughter is even now dead"—"has just expired." The news of her death reached the father after the cure of the woman with the issue of blood: but Matthew's brief account gives only the result, as in the case of the centurion's servant (Matt. 8:5, etc.). come and lay thy hands on her, that she may be healed; and she shall live—or, "that she may be healed and live," according to a fully preferable reading. In one of the class to which this man belonged, so steeped in prejudice, such faith would imply more than in others.

The Woman with an Issue of Blood Healed (vss. 23-34). 24. And Jesus went with him; and much people followed him, and thronged him—The word in Luke is stronger—"choked," "stifled Him." 26. And had suffered many things of many physicians—The expression perhaps does not necessarily refer to the suffering she endured under medical treatment, but to the much varied treatment which she underwent. and had spent all that she had, and was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse—pitiable case, and affectingly aggravated; emblem of our natural state as fallen creatures (Ezek. 16:5, 6), and illustrating the worse than vanity of all human remedies for spiritual maladies (Hos. 5:13). The higher design of all our Lord's miracles of healing irresistibly suggests this way of viewing the present case, the propriety of which will still more appear as we proceed. 27. When she had heard of Jesus, came—This was the right experiment at last. What had she "heard of Jesus?" No doubt it was His marvellous cures she had heard of; and the hearing of these, in connection with her bitter experience of the vanity of applying to any other, had been blessed to the kindling in her soul of a firm confidence that He who had so willingly wrought such cures on others was able and would not refuse to heal her also. in the press behind—shrinking, yet seeking. touched his garment—According to the ceremonial law, the touch of anyone having the disease which this woman had would have defiled the person touched. Some think that the recollection of this may account for her stealthily approaching Him in the crowd behind, and touching but the hem of His garment. But there was an instinct in the faith which brought her to Jesus, which taught her, that if that touch could set her free from the defiling disease itself, it was impossible to communicate defilement to Him, and that this wondrous Healer must be above such laws. 28. For she said—"within herself" (Matt. 9:21). If I may touch but his clothes, I shall be whole—i.e., if I may but come in contact with this glorious Healer at all. Remarkable faith this! 29. And straightway the fountain of her blood was dried up—Not only was her issue of blood stanched (Luke 8:44), but the cause of it was thoroughly removed, insomuch that by her bodily sensations she immediately knew herself perfectly cured. 30. And Jesus immediately knowing in himself that virtue—or "efficacy." had gone out of him—He was conscious of the forthgoing of His healing power, which was not—as in prophets and apostles—something foreign to Himself and imparted merely, but what He had dwelling within Him as "His own fulness." turned him about in the press—crowd. and said, Who touched my clothes? 31. And his disciples said unto him—Luke says (8:45), "When all denied, Peter and they that were with Him said, Master"—Thou seest the multitude thronging thee, and sayest thou, Who touched me?—"Askest thou, Lord, who touched Thee? Rather ask who touched Thee not in such a throng." "And Jesus said, Somebody hath touched Me"—a certain person has touched Me"—"for I perceive that virtue is gone out of Me" (Luke 8:46). Yes, the multitude "thronged and pressed Him"—they jostled against Him, but all involuntarily; they were merely carried along; but one, one only—"a certain person—TOUCHED HIM," with the conscious, voluntary, dependent touch of faith, reaching forth its hand expressly to have contact with Him. This and this only Jesus acknowledges and seeks out. Even so, as AUGUSTINE long ago said, multitudes still come

23. My little daughter. "That little daughter of mine." The words express much tenderness and concern. Luke observes, chap. viii. 42, that she was his "only daughter," and was about "twelve years of age." At the point of death. "In the last extremity, the last gasp." See on Matt. ix. 18.

25. A certain woman. See Matt. ix. 20.

26. Had suffered many things of many physicians . . . and was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse. No person will wonder at this account when he considers the therapeutics of the Jewish physicians in reference to hemorrhages, especially of the kind with which this woman was afflicted. From some of these nostrums it is evident the woman could not be bettered, and from some others it is as evident that she must be made worse; and from all together it is indubitably certain that she must have suffered many things—and from the persons employed, the expense of the medicaments, and the number of years she was afflicted, as she was not a person of great opulence, it is most perfectly credible that she spent all that she had. She was therefore a fit patient for the Great Physician. It has been said, and the saying is a good one, "Man's extremity is God's opportunity." Never could the power and goodness of God be shown in a more difficult and distressful case. And now Jesus comes, and she is healed.

27. Came in the press behind. She had formed her resolution in faith; she executes it, notwithstanding her weakness, with courage; and now she finds it crowned with success.

31. Thou seest the multitude thronging thee. Many touch Jesus who are not healed by Him; the reason is, they do it not by faith, through a sense of their wants, and a conviction of His ability and willingness to save them. Faith conveys the virtue of Christ into the soul, and spiritual health is the immediate consequence of this received virtue.

MATTHEW HENRY

Christ passed by the affront, and looks around to see her that had done this thing; not that he might blame her for her presumption, but that he might commend and encourage her faith, and by his own act and deed might warrant and confirm the cure. As secret acts of sin, so secret acts of faith, are known to the Lord Jesus, and are under his eye. The poor woman, hereupon, presented herself to the Lord Jesus (v. 33), fearing and trembling, not knowing how he would take it. Christ's patients are often trembling, when they have reason to be triumphing. She might have come boldly, knowing what was done in her; yet, knowing that, she fears and trembles. It was a surprise, and was not yet, as it should have been, a pleasing surprise. However, she fell down before him. There is nothing better for those that fear and tremble, than to throw themselves at the feet of the Lord Jesus. And she told him all the truth. We must not be ashamed to own the secret transactions between Christ and our souls; but, when called to it, mention what he has done for our souls, and the experience we have had of healing virtue derived from him. What an encouraging word he gave her (v. 34); Daughter, thy faith hath made thee whole. God's grace will set the seal of its amen to the prayers and hopes of faith, saying, "So be it, and so it shall be, to thee." And therefore, "Go in peace."

Christ, having healed an incurable disease, here goes on to triumph over death.

I. The melancholy news is brought to Jairus, that his daughter is dead. While there is life, there is hope, and room for the use of means; but when life is gone, it is past recall; Why troublest thou the Master any further? v. 35. Ordinarily, the proper thought in this case, is, "The matter is determined, the will of God is done, and I submit, I acquiesce; The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away." But here the case was extraordinary; the death of the child doth not, as usually, put an end to the narrative.

II. Christ encourageth the afflicted father yet to hope. Christ had stayed to work a cure by the way, but he shall be no sufferer by that, nor loser by the gain of others; Be not afraid, only believe. We may suppose Jairus at a pause, whether he should ask Christ to go on or no; but have we not as much occasion for the grace of God, and his consolations, when death is in the house, as when sickness is? Christ therefore soon determines this matter; "Be not afraid that my coming will be to no purpose, only believe that I will make it turn to a good account." Only believe. Keep up a confidence in Christ, and a dependence upon him, and he will do what is for the best. Believe the resurrection, and then be not afraid.

III. He went with a select company to the house where the dead child was. Now he shook off the crowd, and suffered no man to follow him but his three bosom-disciples, Peter, and James, and John.

IV. He raised the dead child to life. Here we may observe,

1. That the child was extremely well beloved, for the relations and neighbours wept and wailed greatly.

2. That it was evident beyond dispute, that the child was really and truly dead. Their laughing Christ to scorn, for saying, She is not dead, but sleepeth, serves for the proof of this.

3. That Christ put those out as unworthy to be witnesses of the miracle, who were so ignorant in the things of God, as not to understand him when he spoke of death as a sleep, or so scornful, as to ridicule him for it.

4. That he took the parents of the child to be witnesses of the miracle, and designed it for their comfort, who were the true, for they were the silent mourners.

5. That Christ raised the child to life by a word of power, which is recorded here, and recorded in Syriac, the language in which Christ spoke, for the greater certainty of the thing; Talitha, cumi; Damsel, I say unto thee, Arise. Christ said, Arise from the dead; meaning, I command that thou arise; nay, there is more in it—the dead have not power to arise, therefore power goes along with this word, to make it effectual. Christ works while he commands, and works by the command, and therefore may command what he pleaseth, even the dead to arise. Such is the gospel call to those that are by nature dead in trespasses and sins, and can no more rise from that death by their own power, than this child could.

6. That the damsel, as soon as life returned, arose, and walked, v. 42. Spiritual life will appear by our rising from the bed of sloth and carelessness, our similarly close to Christ in the means of grace, but all to no purpose, being only sucked into the crowd. The voluntary, living contact of faith is that electric conductor which alone draws virtue out of Him. 32. And he looked round about to see her that had done this thing—not for the purpose of summoning forth a culprit, but, as we shall presently see, to obtain from the healed one a testimony to what He had done for her. 33. But the woman, fearing and trembling, knowing what was done in her—alarmed, as a humble, shrinking female would naturally be, at the necessity of so public an exposure of herself, yet conscious that she had a tale to tell which would speak for her. came and fell down before him, and told him all the truth—In Luke (8:47) it is, "When the woman saw that she was not hid, she came trembling, and falling down before Him, she declared unto Him before all the people for what cause she had touched Him, and how she was healed immediately." This, though it tried the modesty of the believing woman, was just what Christ wanted in dragging her forth, her public testimony to the facts of her case—the disease, with her abortive efforts at a cure, and the instantaneous and perfect relief which her touching the Great Healer had brought her. 34. And he said unto her, Daughter—"be of good comfort" (Luke 8:48). thy faith hath made thee whole; go in peace, and be whole of thy plague—Though healed as soon as she believed, it seemed to her a stolen cure—she feared to acknowledge it. Jesus therefore sets His royal seal upon it. But what a glorious dismissal from the lips of Him who is "our Peace" is that, "Go in peace!"

Jairus' Daughter Raised to Life (vss. 35-43). 35. Thy daughter is dead; why troublest thou the Master—the Teacher—any further? 36. he saith unto the ruler of the synagogue, Be not afraid, only believe—Jesus, knowing how the heart of the agonized father would sink at the tidings, and the reflections at the delay which would be apt to rise in his mind, hastens to reassure him, and in His accustomed style: "Be not afraid, only believe"—words of unchanging preciousness and power! How vividly do such incidents bring out Christ's knowledge of the human heart and tender sympathy! (Heb. 4:15.) 37. And he suffered no man to follow him, save Peter, and James, and John the brother of James—See on ch. 1:29. 38. And he cometh—rather, "they come." to the house of the ruler of the synagogue, and seeth the tumult, and them that wept and wailed greatly—"the minstrels and the people making a noise" (Matt. 9:23)—lamenting for the dead. (See II Chron. 35:25; Jer. 9:20; Amos 5:16.) 39. And when he was come in, he saith unto them, Why make ye this ado, and weep? the damsel is not dead, but sleepeth—so brief her state of death as to be more like a short sleep. 40. And they laughed him to scorn—rather, simply, "laughed at Him"—"knowing that she was dead" (Luke 8:53); an important testimony this to the reality of her death. But when he had put them all out—The word is strong—"turned them all out"; meaning all those who were making this noise, and any others that may have been there from sympathy, that only those might be present who were most nearly concerned, and those whom He had Himself brought as witnesses of the great act about to be done. he taketh the father and the mother of the damsel, and them that were with him—Peter, and James, and John. and entereth in where the damsel was lying.

41. And he took the damsel by the hand—as He did Peter's mother-in-law (ch. 1:31). and said unto her, Talitha cumi—The words are Aramaic, or Syro-Chaldaic, the then language of Palestine. Mark loves to give such wonderful words just as they were spoken. See ch. 7:34; 14:36.

42. And straightway the damsel—The word here is different from that in vss. 39, 40, 41, and signifies "young maiden," or "little girl." arose, and walked—a vivid touch evidently from an eye-witness.

ADAM CLARKE

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

She trembled as Jesus looked for her. Those blessed eyes looked around, and by and by they lighted upon her, and as she gazed upon them, she did not feel so much alarmed as before; but, still afraid and trembling, she came and fell down before Him, and told Him all the truth. Then He gently raised her up, and said, "Daughter, thy faith hath made thee whole; go in peace, and be whole of thy plague." Now she knew her cure from Christ's lips as well as from her own consciousness. She had now the divine witness bearing witness with her spirit that she was indeed a healed one.

—The Treasury of the New Testament

34. Be whole of thy plague. Rather, "Continue whole," not, Be whole, for she was already healed. But this contains a promise, necessary to her encouragement, that her disorder should afflict her no more.

35. Why troublest thou the Master? These people seem to have had no other notion of our Lord than that of an eminent physician, who might be useful while there was life, but afterwards could do nothing.

36. Jesus . . . saith. These words were spoken by our Lord to the afflicted father, immediately on his hearing of the death of his child, to prevent that distress which he otherwise must have felt on finding that the case was now, humanly speaking, hopeless.

38. He cometh. But they come is the reading of a number of MSS. and several versions.

40. The father and the mother. Prudence required that they should be present, and be witnesses of the miracle. And them that were with him. That is, Peter, James, and John, v. 37. It is remarkable that our Lord gave a particular preference to these three disciples, beyond all the rest, on three very important occasions. They were present (1) at the Transfiguration, (2) at the raising of Jairus' daughter, and (3) at His agony in the Garden of Gethsemane.

MATTHEW HENRY

walking up and down in Christ's name and strength.

7. That all who saw it, and heard of it, admired the miracle, and him that wrought it; They were astonished with a great astonishment. They could not but acknowledge that there was something in it extraordinary and very great, and yet they knew not what to make of it, or to infer from it.

8. That Christ endeavoured to conceal it; He charged them straitly, that no man should know it. It was sufficiently known to a competent number, but he would not have it as yet proclaimed any further.

9. That Christ took care something should be given her to eat. By this it appeared that she was raised not only to life, but to a good state of health, that she had an appetite to her meat. Where Christ hath given spiritual life, he will provide food for the support and nourishment of it unto life eternal, for he will never forsake, or be wanting to, the work of his own hands.

CHAPTER 6

I. Christ makes a visit to his own country, that was Nazareth; where his relations were. He had been in danger of his life among them (Luke iv. 29), and yet he came among them again; so strangely doth he wait to be gracious.

II. There he preached in their synagogue, on the sabbath day, v. 2. On sabbath days, the word of God is to be preached according to Christ's example.

III. They could not but own that which was very honourable concerning him. 1. That he spoke with great wisdom. 2. That he did mighty works. They acknowledged the two great proofs of the divine original of his gospel—the divine wisdom, and the divine power, and yet, though they could not deny the premises, they would not admit the conclusion.

IV. They studied to disparage him. All this wisdom, and all these mighty works, shall be of no account. Is not this the Carpenter? In Matthew, they upbraid him with being the carpenter's son. But, it seems, they could say further, Is not this the Carpenter? 1. He would thus humble himself as one that had taken upon him the form of a servant. 2. He would thus teach us to abhor idleness, and to find ourselves something to do in this world. Nothing is more pernicious for young people than to get a habit of sauntering. The Jews had a good rule for this—that their young men who were designed for scholars, were yet bred up to some trade, as Paul was a tent-maker, that they might have some business to fill up their time with. 3. He would thus put an honour upon despised mechanics, and encourage those who eat the labour of their hands, though great men look upon them with contempt.

Another thing they upbraided him with, was, the meanness of his relations; "He is the son of Mary; his brethren and sisters are here with us; we know his family and kindred;" and therefore, though they were astonished at his doctrine (v. 2), yet they were offended at his person (v. 3), and for that reason would not receive his doctrine.

V. Let us see how Christ bore this contempt.

1. He partly excused it (v. 4); A prophet is not despised anywhere but in his own country. Doubtless many have got over this prejudice, but ordinarily it holds good, that ministers are seldom so acceptable and successful in their own country as among strangers; familiarity in the younger years breeds a contempt, the advancement of one that was an inferior begets envy, and men will hardly set those among the guides of their souls whose fathers they were ready to set with the dogs of their flock.

2. He did some good among them, notwithstanding the slights they put upon him, for he is kind even to the evil and unthankful; He laid his hands upon a few sick folks, and healed them.

3. Yet he could there do no such mighty works as in other places, because of the unbelief that prevailed among the people, v. 5. It is a strange expression, as if unbelief tied the hands of omnipotence itself; he would have done as many miracles there as he had done elsewhere, but he could not. They forfeited the honour of having them wrought for them. By unbelief and contempt of Christ men stop the current of his favours to them, and put a bar in their own door.

4. He marvelled because of their unbelief, v. 6. We never find Christ wondering but at the faith of the Gentiles that were strangers, as the centurion (Matt. viii. 10), and the woman of Samaria, and at the unbelief of Jews that were his own countrymen.

5. He went round about the villages, teaching. If we cannot do good where we would, we must do it

And they were astonished with a great astonishment—The language here is the strongest.

43. And he charged them straitly—strictly—that no man should know it—The only reason we can assign for this is His desire not to let the public feeling regarding Him come too precipitately to a crisis. and commanded that something should be given her to eat—in token of perfect restoration.

Vss. 1-6. CHRIST REJECTED AT NAZARETH. (= Matt. 13:54-58; Luke 4:16-30.) See on Luke 4: 16-30.

A large gap here occurs, embracing the important transactions in Galilee and Jerusalem which are recorded in John 1:29 to 4:54, and which occurred before John's imprisonment (John 3:24); whereas the transactions here recorded occurred (as appears from Matt. 4:12, 13) after that event. The visit to Nazareth recorded in Matthew 13:54-58 (and Mark 6:1-6) we take to be not a later visit, but the same with this first one; because we cannot think that the Nazarenes, after being so enraged at His first display of wisdom as to attempt His destruction, should, on a second display of the same, wonder at it and ask how He came by it, as if they had never witnessed it before.

Is not this the carpenter's son? Is not his mother called Mary? And his brothers—James and Joses and Simon and Judas—"don't we all know them? Haven't we done business with them? Haven't they been in our houses? And this Jesus himself, have we not seen Him in boyhood and youth moving about among us? Can this be He of whom Moses and all the prophets wrote? Can this be He who is sent to heal the brokenhearted, and comfort all that mourn? Incredible!" Nor can it be doubted that a nearer view of Him than even ordinary Nazarenes could have was the very thing that stumbled His own "brethren," who for a while, we are told, "did not believe in him," and that made even the whole family think He was "beside himself" (Mark 3:21).

And he said . . .—Her replies to the one proverb by another, equally familiar, which we express in a rougher form—"Too much familiarity breeds contempt." Our Lord's long residence in Nazareth merely as a townsman had made Him too common, incapacitating them for appreciating Him as others did who were less familiar with His everyday demeanor in private life. A most important principle, to which the wise will pay due regard. (See also Matt. 7:6, on which our Lord Himself ever acted.)

43. Something should be given her to eat. For though He had employed an extraordinary power to bring her to life, He wills that she should be continued in existence by the use of ordinary means. "When the miraculous power of God is necessary, let it be resorted to; when it is not necessary, let the ordinary means be used." To act otherwise would be to tempt God.

1. And he went out from thence. That is, from Capernaum.

3. Is not this the carpenter? Among the ancient Jews, every father was bound to do four things for his son: (1) to circumcise him, (2) to redeem him, (3) to teach him the law, (4) to teach him a trade. And this was founded on the following just maxim: "He who teaches not his son to do some work is as if he taught him robbery!" It is therefore likely that Joseph brought up our Lord to his own trade.

F. B. MEYER:

In the opening paragraph of this chapter, we learn of hatred and rejection of those who had enjoyed the rich privileges of being the neighbors and associates of our Lord from his earliest days. They could not discern the divine in the human, the heavenly under the earthly veil. The Savior, therefore, driven from their towns, goes about the villages, depriving himself of the companionship of His disciples in order to spread the Good News as far as possible. The Lord is still in his Church through the Holy Spirit, but his power is limited and neutralized by our unbelief. It is useless to ask him to put forth his great power and save us so long as we have made it practically impossible for him to do as we ask. The old-time cry was: "Why shouldst thou be as a mighty man that cannot save?" The answer is supplied here: "He could do no mighty work . . . and he marvelled because of their unbelief." Faith is our capacity for God, and there are several conditions for its nurture and growth.—Bible Commentary where we can, though but in the villages. Sometimes the gospel of Christ finds better entertainment in the country villages, than in the populous cities.

I. The commission given to the twelve apostles, to preach and work miracles. Hitherto they had been conversant with Christ, and had sat at his feet, had heard his doctrine, and seen his miracles. They had received, that they might give, had learned, that they might teach; and therefore now he began to send them forth. They must not always be studying in the academy, to get knowledge. Though they were not as yet so well accomplished as they were to be, yet, according to their present ability and capacity, they must be set to work, and make further improvements afterward. Now observe here,

1. That Christ sent them forth by two and two; this Mark takes notice of. They went two and two to a place that they might be company for one another when they were among strangers, and might strengthen the hands, and encourage the hearts, one of another; might help one another. It is an approved maxim, Two are better than one. Christ would thus teach his ministers to associate, and both lend and borrow help.

2. That he gave them power over unclean spirits. He commissioned them to attack the devil's kingdom, and empowered them to cast him out of the bodies of those that were possessed.

3. That he commanded them not to take provisions along with them, neither victuals nor money, that they might appear, wherever they came, to be poor men. When afterward he bid them take purse and scrip (Luke xxii. 36), that did not intimate that his care of them was abated from what it had been; but, that they should meet with worse times and worse entertainment than they met with at their first mission. In Matthew and Luke they are forbidden to take staves with them, that is, fighting staves; but here in Mark they are bid to take nothing save a staff only, that is, a walking staff, such as pilgrims carried. They must not put on shoes, but sandals only; they must go in the readiest plainest dress they could, and must not so much as have two coats. What they wanted, those they preached to would cheerfully accommodate them with.

4. He directed them, whatever city they came to, to make that house their headquarters, which happened to be their first quarters (v. 10); "There abide till ye depart from that place. And since ye know ye come on an errand sufficient to make you welcome, have such charity for your friends that first invited you, as to believe they do not think you burthensome."

5. He pronounces a very heavy doom upon those that rejected the gospel they preached (v. 11); "Whosoever shall not receive you, or will not so much as hear you, depart thence, and shake off the dust under your feet, for a testimony against them." That dust, like the dust of Egypt (Exod. ix. 9), shall turn into a plague to them; and their condemnation in the great day, will be more intolerable than that of Sodom.

II. The apostles' conduct in pursuance of their commission. Though they were conscious to themselves of great weakness, yet, in obedience to their Master's order, and in dependence upon his strength, they went out as Abraham, not knowing whither they went.

1. The doctrine they preached; They preached that men should repent (v. 12); that they should change their minds, and reform their lives. The great design of gospel preachers, and the great tendency of gospel preaching, should be, to bring people to repentance, to a new heart and a new way. They did not amuse people with curious speculations, but told them that they must repent of their sins, and turn to God.

2. The miracles they wrought. The power Christ gave them over unclean spirits, was not ineffectual, nor did they receive it in vain, but used it, for they cast out many devils (v. 13); and they anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them.

Verses 14–29

I. The wild notions that the people had concerning our Lord Jesus, v. 15. His own countrymen could believe nothing great concerning him, because they knew his poor kindred; but others were yet willing to believe anything rather than the truth. They said, He is Elias, whom they expected; or, He is the prophet, one of the Old Testament prophets raised to life; or as one of the prophets, a prophet now newly raised up.

II. The opinion of Herod concerning him. He said, "It is certainly John Baptist, v. 14. It is John whom I beheaded, v. 16. He is risen from the dead;

7-13. MISSION OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES. (= Matt. 10:1, 5-15; Luke 9:1-6.) See on Matthew 10:1, 5-15.

And when he had called unto him his twelve disciples, he gave them power—The word signifies both "power," and "authority" or "right." Even if it were not evident that here both ideas are included, we find both words expressly used in the parallel passage of Luke (9:1)—"He gave them power and authority"—in other words, He both qualified and authorized them. against—or "over."

Provide neither gold, nor silver, nor brass in—for—your purses—lit., "your belts," in which they kept their money. Nor scrip for your journey—the bag used by travelers for holding provisions. neither two coats—or tunics, worn next the skin. The meaning is, Take no change of dress, no additional articles. neither shoes—i.e., change of them.

And whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear your words, when ye depart out of that house or city—for possibly a whole town might not furnish one "worthy." shake off the dust of your feet—"for a testimony against them," as Mark and Luke add. By this symbolical action they vividly shook themselves from all connection with such, and all responsibility for the guilt of rejecting them and their message. Such symbolical actions were common in ancient times, even among others than the Jews, as strikingly appears in Pilate (ch. 27:24). And even to this day it prevails in the East. Verily I say unto you, It shall be more tolerable—more bearable—for Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment, than for that city—Those Cities of the Plain, which were given to the flames for their loathsome impurities, shall be treated as less criminal, we are here taught, than those places which, though morally respectable, reject the Gospel message and affront those that bear it.

14-29. HEROD THINKS JESUS A RESURRECTION OF THE MURDERED BAPTIST—ACCOUNT OF HIS DEATH. (= Matt. 14:1-12; Luke 9:7-9.)

Herod's View of Christ (vss. 14-16). 14. 7. By two and two. That they might encourage and support each other, and to show that union among the ministers of the gospel is essential to the promotion of the cause of truth.

8. A staff only. It is likely He desired them to take only one with every two, merely for the purpose of carrying any part of their clothes on, when they should be obliged to strip them off by reason of the heat; for walking staves, or things of this kind, were forbidden—see Matt. x. 10. But probably no more is designed than simply to state that they must not wait to make any provision for the journey, but go off just as they were, leaving the provision necessary in the present case to the care of Divine Providence.

9. Shod with sandals. The sandal seems to have been similar to the Roman solea, which covered only the sole of the foot, and was fastened about the foot and ankle with straps. Sandals were originally a part of the woman's dress; ancient authors represent them as worn only by women. In Matt. x. 10 the disciples are commanded to take no shoes, which word is nearly of the same import with sandals; but, as our Lord intimates to them that they should be free from all useless incumbrances, that they might fulfill His orders with the utmost diligence and dispatch, so we may suppose that the sandal was a lighter kind of wear than the shoe; and indeed the word sandal might be properly translated a "light shoe."

11. And whosoever shall not receive you. "Whatsoever place will not receive you" is the reading of some versions. Verily. All this clause is omitted in several MSS. and versions. Mill and Beza approve of the omission, and Griesbach leaves it out of the text. It has probably been transferred here from Matt. x. 15.

13. Anointed with oil many that were sick. This is spoken of only here and in Jas. v. 14. This ceremony was in great use among the Jews, and in certain cases it might be profitable. But in the cases mentioned here, which were merely miraculous, it could avail no more of itself than the imposition of hands. It was used symbolically, as an emblem of that ease, comfort, and joy which they prayed God to impart to the sick.

he is come again with greater power, and now mighty works do show forth themselves in him."

1. Where there is an idle faith, there is commonly a working fancy. The people said, It is a prophet risen from the dead; Herod said, It is John Baptist risen from the dead. It seems by this, that the rising of a prophet from the dead, to do mighty works, was thought neither impossible nor improbable, and it was now readily suspected when it was not true; but afterward, when it was true concerning Christ, it as obstinately gainsaid and denied. Those who most wilfully disbelieve the truth, are commonly most credulous of errors and fancies.

2. They who fight against the cause of God, will find themselves baffled, even when they think themselves conquerors.

3. A guilty conscience needs no accuser or tormentor but itself. I beheaded him; and the terror of it made him imagine that Christ was John risen. He feared John while he lived, and now, fears him ten times worse when he is dead. One might as well be haunted with ghosts and furies, as with the horrors of an accusing conscience.

4. There may be the terrors of strong conviction, where there is not the truth of a saving conversion.

III. A narrative of Herod's putting John Baptist to death.

1. The great value and veneration which Herod had some time had for John Baptist, which is related only by this evangelist, v. 20.

(1) He feared John, knowing that he was a just man, and a holy. It is possible that a man may have a great reverence for good men, and especially for good ministers, yea, and for that in them that is good, and yet himself be a bad man. [1] John was a just man, and a holy; to make a complete good man, both justice and holiness are necessary; holiness toward God, and justice toward men. [2] Herod knew this by personal acquaintance with him. Those that have but little justice and holiness themselves, may yet discern it with respect in others. [3] He therefore feared him, he honoured him. Many that are not good themselves, have respect for those that are.

(2) He observed him; he took notice of that in him that was praiseworthy, and commended it in the hearing of those about him; he made it appear that he observed what John said and did.

(3) He heard him preach; which was great condescension.

(4) He did many of those things which John in his preaching taught him. He was not only a hearer of the word, but in part a doer of the work. But it will not suffice to do many things, unless we have respect to all the commandments.

(5) He heard him gladly. There is a flashy joy, which a hypocrite may have in hearing the word. The stony ground received the word with joy, Luke viii. 13.

2. John's faithfulness to Herod, in telling him of his faults. Herod had married his brother Philip's wife, v. 17. John reproved him, told him plainly, It is not lawful for thee to have thy brother's wife. This was Herod's own iniquity, which he could not leave, when he did many things that John taught him. Though he were a king, he would not spare him, any more than Elijah did Ahab. Though it was dangerous to offend Herod, and much more to offend Herodias, yet John would run the hazard rather than be wanting in his duty. Those ministers that would be found faithful in the work of God, must not be afraid of the face of man.

3. The malice which Herodias bore to John for this (v. 19); She has a quarrel with him, and would have him killed; but when she could not obtain that, she got him committed to prison, v. 17. Many that pretend to honour prophesying, are for smooth things only, and love good preaching, if it keep far enough from their beloved sin. But it is better that sinners persecute ministers now for their faithfulness, than curse them eternally for their unfaithfulness.

4. The plot laid to take off John's head. When a convenient day was come (v. 21). There must be a ball at court, upon the king's birthday. To grace the solemnity, the daughter of Herodias must dance publicly, and Herod must take on him to be wonderfully charmed with her dancing. The king hereupon must make her an extravagant promise, to give her whatever she would ask, even to the half of the kingdom. This promise is bound with an oath; He sware unto her, Whatsoever thou shalt ask, I will give. She, being instructed by Herodias her mother, asked the head of John Baptist; and she must have it brought her in a charger, as a pretty thing for her to play with (v. 24, 25); and there must be no delay, no time lost, she must have it by and by. Herod granted it, and the execution was done im-like a specter, and seemed to him alive again and clothed with unearthly powers, in the person of Jesus. 15. Others said, That it is Elias. And others, That it is a prophet, or as one of the prophets—See on Matthew 16:14. 16. But when Herod heard thereof, he said, It is John, whom I beheaded; he is risen from the dead—"himself has risen"; as if the innocence and sanctity of his faithful reprover had not suffered that he should lie long dead.

Account of the Baptist's Imprisonment and Death (vss. 17-29). 17. For Herod himself had sent forth, and laid hold upon John, and bound him in prison—in the castle of Machærus, near the southern extremity of Herod's dominions, and adjoining the Dead Sea [JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 18:5, 2]. for Herodias' sake—She was the granddaughter of Herod the Great. his brother Philip's wife—and therefore the niece of both brothers. This Philip, however, was not the tetrarch of that name mentioned in Luke 3:1 (see there), but one whose distinctive name was "Herod Philip," another son of Herod the Great—who was disinherited by his father. Herod Antipas' own wife was the daughter of Aretas, king of Arabia; but he prevailed on Herodias, his half-brother Philip's wife, to forsake her husband and live with him, on condition, says JOSEPHUS (Antiquities, 18:5, 1), that he should put away his own wife. This involved him afterwards in war with Aretas, who totally defeated him and destroyed his army, from the effects of which he was never able to recover himself.

20. For Herod feared John—but, as BENGEL notes, John feared not Herod. knowing that he was a just man and an holy—Cf. the ease of Elijah with Ahab, after the murder of Naboth (I Kings 21:20). and observed him—rather, as in the margin, "kept" or "saved him"; i.e., from the wicked designs of Herodias, who had been watching for some pretext to get Herod entangled and committed to despatch him. and when he heard him, he did many things—many good things under the influence of the Baptist on his conscience. and heard him gladly—a striking statement this, for which we are indebted to our graphic Evangelist alone, illustrating the working of contrary principles in the slaves of passion. But this only shows how far Herodias must have wrought upon him, as Jezebel upon Ahab, that he should at length agree to what his awakened conscience kept him long from executing.

18. For John had said unto Herod, It is not lawful for thee to have thy brother's wife—Noble fidelity! It was not lawful because Herod's wife and Herodias husband were both living; and further, because the parties were within the forbidden degrees of consanguinity (see Lev. 20:21); Herodias being the daughter of Aristobulus, the brother of both Herod and Philip [JOSEPHUS, 18:5, 4]. 19. Therefore Herodias had a quarrel against him—rather, as in the margin, "had a grudge against him." Probably she was too proud to speak to him; still less would she quarrel with him. and would have killed him; but she could not.

21. And when a convenient day—for the purposes of Herodias—was come, that Herod—rather, A convenient day being come, when Herod—on his birthday, made a supper to his lords, high captains, and chief [estates] of Galilee—This graphic minuteness of detail adds much to the interest of the tragic narrative. 22. And when the daughter of the said Herodias—i.e.,—her daughter by her proper husband, Herod Philip: Her name was Salome [JOSEPHUS, ibid.]. came in and danced, and pleased Herod and them that sat with him, the king said unto the damsel—"the girl" (See on ch. 5:42). Ask of me whatsoever thou wilt, and I will give it thee. 23. And he—the king, so called, but only by courtesy (see on vs. 14). sware unto her Whatsoever thou shalt ask of me, unto the half of my kingdom—Those in whom passion and luxury have destroyed self-command will in a capricious moment say and do what in their cool moments they bitterly regret. 24. And she said, The head of John the Baptist—Abandoned women are more shameless and heartless than men. The Baptist's fidelity marred the pleasures of Herodias, and this was too good an

15. Or as one of the prophets. Or is omitted by many MSS. Bengel, Wetstein, and Griesbach leave it out of the text. The omission of it mends the sense much.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

He "feared John"—the jailer afraid of his prisoner—"knowing that he was a righteous man and an holy." Goodness is awful. The worst men know it when they see it, and pay it the homage of dread, if not of love. "And kept him safe" (not ob- but pre-served him); that is, from Herodias' revenge. "And when he heard him, he was much perplexed." The reading thus translated differs from that in the Authorized Version by two letters only, and obviously is preferable. Herod was a weak-willed man, drawn by two stronger natures pulling in opposite directions.

So he alternated between lust and purity, between the foul kisses of the temptress at his side and the warnings of the prophet in his dungeon. But in all his vacillation he could not help listening to John, but "heard him gladly," and mind and conscience approved the nobler voice. Thus he staggered along, with religion enough to spoil some of his sinful delights, but not enough to make him give them up.

In such a condition one is liable to unrest and frequent inner conflict. Truly, he is "much perplexed" whose conscience pulls him one way and his inclinations another. There is no more miserable condition than that of the man whose will is cleft in twain, and who has a continual battle raging within. Conscience may be bound and thrust down into a dungeon, like John, and lust and pride may be carousing overhead, but their mirth is hollow, and every now and then the stern voice comes up through the gratings, and the noisy revelry is hushed, while it speaks doom. Such a state of inner strife comes often from unwillingness to give up one special evil.

19. Would have killed. "Sought to kill him." See the whole of this account, from v. 17 to v. 29, explained on Matt. xiv. 2-12.

21. Lords. Probably governors of particular districts. High captains. Literally, "chiefs" or "captains" over 1,000 men, military chiefs. Chief estates. Probably such as might be called nobles by title only, having no office civil or military; probably magistrates.

23. Unto the half of my kingdom. A noble price for a dance! This extravagance in favor of female dancers has the fullest scope in the East, even to the present day.

MATTHEW HENRY

mediately while the company were together. But he takes on him, (1) To be very backward to it, and that he would not for all the world have done it, if he had not been surprised into such a promise; The king was exceeding sorry. He could not do it but with great regret and reluctancy; natural conscience will not suffer men to sin easily. (2) He takes on him to be very sensible of the obligation of his oath. The promise was rashly made, and could not bind him to do an unrighteous thing. Sinful oaths must be repented of, and therefore not performed. He was hurried into the doing of it by those about him, only to carry on the humour; for he did it for their sakes who sat with him. Thus do princes make themselves slaves to those whose respect they covet. The king sent an executioner, a soldier of his guard. Bloody tyrants have executioners ready to obey their most cruel and unrighteous decrees.

5. The effect of this is, that Herod's wicked court is all in triumph, the head is made a present of to the damsel, and by her to her mother, v. 28. And John Baptist's sacred college is all in tears. When they heard of it, they came, and took up the neglected corpse, and laid it in a tomb.

I. The return to Christ of the apostles whom he had sent forth (v. 7). They gathered themselves together, and came to Jesus to give him an account of what they had done. They told him all things, both what they had done, and what they had taught. Ministers are accountable both for what they do, and for what they teach. Let them not either do anything, or teach anything, but what they are willing should be related and repeated to the Lord Jesus.

II. The tender care Christ took for their repose, after the fatigue they had (v. 31); He said unto them, Come ye yourselves apart into a desert place, and rest awhile. It should seem that John's disciples came to Christ with the mournful tidings of their master's death, much about the same time that his own disciples came to him. Christ takes cognizance of the frights of some, and the toils of others, of his disciples, and provides suitable relief for both, rest for those that are tired, and refuge for those that are terrified. With what kindness and compassion doth Christ say to them, Come, and rest! The most active servants of Christ cannot be always upon the stretch of business, but have bodies that require some relaxation, some breathing-time. And the Lord is for the body, considers its frame, and not only allows it time for rest, but puts it in mind of resting. Those that work diligently and faithfully, may cheerfully retire to rest. 1. Christ calls them to come themselves apart; if they must rest, they must be alone. 2. He invites them not to some pleasant country-seat, but into a desert place. No wonder that he who had but a ship for his preaching place, had but a desert for his resting place. 3. He calls them only to rest awhile; only to get breath, and then to go to work again. 4. The reason given for this, is, for there were many coming and going, and they had no leisure so much as to eat. Let but proper time be set, and kept for everything, and a great deal of work may be done with a great deal of ease; but if people be continually coming and going, a little work will not be done without a deal of trouble.

opportunity of getting rid of him to let slip. 25. I will that thou give me by and by—rather, "at once" —in a charger—large, flat trencher—the head of John the Baptist. 26. And the king was exceeding sorry—With his feelings regarding John, and the truths which so told upon his conscience from that preacher's lips, and after so often and carefully saving him from his paramour's rage, it must have been very galling to find himself at length entrapped by his own rash folly. yet for his oath's sake—See how men of no principle, but troublesome conscience, will stick at breaking a rash oath, while yielding to the commission of the worst crimes! and for their sakes which sat with him—under the influence of that false shame, which could not brook being thought to be troubled with religious or moral scruples. To how many has this proved a fatal snare! he would not reject her. 27. And immediately the king sent an executioner—one of the guards in attendance. The word is Roman, denoting one of the Imperial Guard. and commanded his head to be brought: and he went and beheaded him in the prison—after, it would seem, more than twelve months' imprisonment. Blessed martyr! Dark and cheerless was the end reserved for thee: but now thou hast thy Master's benediction, "Blessed is he whosoever shall not be offended in Me" (Matt. 11:6), and hast found the life thou gavest away (Matt. 10:39). But where are they in whose skirts is found thy blood? 28. And brought his head in a charger, and gave it to the damsel: and the damsel gave it to her mother—Herodias did not shed the blood of the stern reprover; she only got it done, and then gloated over it, as it streamed from the trunkless head. 29. And when his disciples heard of it—i.e., the Baptist's own disciples. they came and took up his corpse, and laid it in a tomb —"and went and told Jesus" (Matt. 14:12). If these disciples had, up to this time, stood apart from Him, as adherents of John (Matt. 11:2), perhaps they now came to Jesus, not without some secret reflection on Him for His seeming neglect of their master; but perhaps, too, as orphans, to cast in their lot henceforth with the Lord's disciples. How Jesus felt, or what He said, on receiving this intelligence, is not recorded; but He of whom it was said, as He stood by the grave of His friend Lazarus, "Jesus wept," was not likely to receive such intelligence without deep emotion. And one reason why He might not be unwilling that a small body of John's disciples should cling to him to the last, might be to provide some attached friends who should do for his precious body, on a small scale, what was afterwards to be done for His own.

The occasion and all the circumstances of this grand section are thus brought before us with a vividness quite remarkable.

Five Thousand Miraculously Fed (vss. 30-44). 30. And the apostles gathered themselves together—probably at Capernaum, on returning from their mission (vss. 7-13). and told him all things, both what they had done, and what they had taught—Observe the various reasons He had for crossing to the other side. First, Matthew (14:13) says, that "when Jesus heard" of the murder of His faithful forerunner—from those attached disciples of his who had taken up his body and laid it in a sepulchre (see on vs. 29)—"He departed by ship into a desert place apart"; either to avoid some apprehended consequences to Himself, arising from the Baptist's death (Matt. 10:23), or more probably to be able to indulge in those feelings which that affecting event had doubtless awakened, and to which the bustle of the multitude around Him was very unfavorable. Next, since He must have heard the report of the Twelve with the deepest interest, and probably with something of the emotion which He experienced on the return of the Seventy (see on Luke 10:17-22), He sought privacy for undisturbed reflection on this begun preaching and progress of His kingdom. Once more, He was wearied with the multitude of "comers and goers"—depriving Him even of leisure enough to take His food—and wanted rest: "Come ye yourselves apart into a desert place, and rest a while . . . ." Under the combined influence of all these considerations, our Lord sought this change. 32. And they departed

26. For their sakes which sat with him. Probably these persons joined in with the request, and were glad of this opportunity to get this light of Israel extinguished, he being a public reprover of all their vices.

A. T. ROBERTSON:

27. "A soldier of his guard" (spekoulatora). Latin word speculator. A spy, scout, lookout, and often executioner. It was used of the bodyguard of the Roman emperor and so for one of Herod's spies. He was used to do errands of this sort and it was soon done. It was a gruesome job, but he soon brought John's head to the damsel, apparently in the presence of all, and she took it to her mother. This miserable tetrarch, the slave of Herodias, was now the slave of his fears. He is haunted by the ghost of John and shudders at the reports of the work of Jesus.

29. "His corpse" (to ptoma autou). See Matt. 24:28. It was a mournful time for the disciples of John. "They went and told Jesus" (Matt. 14:12). What else could they do?

—Word Pictures in the New Testament

30. The apostles gathered themselves together. For they went different ways before, by two and two, v. 7; and now they return and meet Christ at Capernaum.

31. Rest a while. Rest is necessary for those who labor, and a zealous preacher of the gospel will as often stand in need of it as a galley slave.

MATTHEW HENRY

5. They withdrew, accordingly, by ship, v. 32. Going by water was much less toilsome than going by land would have been. They went away privately. The most public persons cannot but wish to be private sometimes.

III. The diligence of the people to follow him. They are not blamed for it, nor bid to go back, but bid welcome. A failure in good manners will easily be excused in those who follow Christ, if it be but made up in a fulness of good affections. They followed him out of the cities, quitted their houses and shops, their callings and affairs. They followed him afoot, though he was gone by sea. They stuck to him. They ran afoot, and made such haste, that they out-went the disciples. Nay they followed him, though it was into a desert place. The presence of Christ will turn a wilderness into a paradise.

IV. The entertainment Christ gave them (v. 34); When he saw much people, instead of being moved with displeasure, he was moved with compassion toward them, because they were as sheep having no shepherd, they seemed to be well-inclined, and manageable as sheep. But they had no shepherd, none to lead and guide them in the right way, and therefore, in compassion to them, he not only healed their sick, as it is in Matthew, but he taught them many things.

V. The provision he made for them all; all his hearers he generously made his guests, and treated them at a splendid entertainment: so it might truly be called, because a miraculous one.

1. The disciples moved that they should be sent home. When the day was now far spent they said, This is a desert place, and much time is now past; send them away to buy bread, v. 35, 36. This the disciples suggested to Christ; but we do not find that the multitude themselves did. The disciples thought it would be a kindness to them to dismiss them. Willing minds will do more, and hold out longer, in that which is good, than one would expect from them.

2. Christ ordered that they should all be fed (v. 37); Give ye them to eat. To teach us to be kind to those who are rude to us, he ordered provision to be made for them; that bread which Christ and his disciples took with them into the desert, that they might make a quiet meal of it for themselves, he will have them to partake of. Thus was he given to hospitality. They attended on the spiritual food of his word, and then he took care that they should not want corporal food. The way of duty, as it is the way of safety, so it is the way to supply. Providence, not tempted, but duly trusted, never yet failed any of God's faithful servants, but has refreshed many with seasonable and surprising relief.

3. The disciples objected against it as impracticable; Shall we go, and buy two hundred penny-worth of bread, and give them to eat? Instead of waiting for directions from Christ, they perplex the cause with projects of their own. Christ would let them see their folly in forecasting for themselves, that they might put the greater value upon his provision for them.

4. Christ effected it, to universal satisfaction. They had brought with them five loaves, and two fishes, and that is the bill of fare. This was but a little for Christ and his disciples, and yet this they must give away. We often find Christ entertained at other people's tables, but here we have him supping a great many at his own charge.

(1) The provision was ordinary. Here were no rarities. If we have for necessity, it is no matter though we have not for delicacy and curiosity. The promise to them that fear the Lord, is, that verily they shall be fed; he doth not say, They shall be feasted.

(2) The guests were orderly; for they sat down by companies on the green grass (v. 39), they sat down in ranks by hundreds and by fifties (v. 40), for God is the God of order, and not of confusion.

(3) A blessing was craved upon the meat; He looked up to heaven, and blessed. Christ did not call one of

into a desert place by ship privately—"over the Sea of Galilee, which is the Sea of Tiberias," says John (6:1), the only one of the Evangelists who so fully describes it; the others having written when their readers were supposed to know something of it, while the last wrote for those at a greater distance of time and place. This "desert place" is more definitely described by Luke (9:10) as "belonging to the city called Bethsaida." This must not be confounded with the town so called on the western side of the lake (see on Matt. 11:21). This town lay on its northeastern side, near where the Jordan empties itself into it: in Gaulonitis, out of the dominions of Herod Antipas, and within the dominions of Philip the Tetrarch (Luke 3:1), who raised it from a village to a city, and called it Julias, in honor of Julia, the daughter of Augustus [JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 18:2, 1]. 33. And the people—the multitudes—saw them departing, and many knew him—The true reading would seem to be: "And many saw them departing, and knew or recognized [them]. and ran afoot—Here, perhaps, it should be rendered "by land"—running round by the head of the lake, and taking one of the fords of the river, so as to meet Jesus, who was crossing with the Twelve by ship. thither out of all cities, and outwent them—got before them—and came together unto him—How exceedingly graphic is this! every touch of it betokening the presence of an eye-witness. John (6:3) says, that "Jesus went up into a mountain"—somewhere in that hilly range, the green tableland which skirts the eastern side of the lake. 34. And Jesus, when he came out of the ship—having gone on shore—saw much people—a great multitude—and was moved with compassion toward them, because they were as sheep not having a shepherd—At the sight of the multitudes who had followed Him by land and even got before Him, He was so moved, as was His wont in such cases, with compassion, because they were like shepherdless sheep, as to forego both privacy and rest that He might minister to them. Here we have an important piece of information from the Fourth Evangelist (John 6:4), "And the passover, a feast of the Jews, was nigh"—rather, "Now the passover, the feast of the Jews, was nigh." This accounts for the multitudes that now crowded around Him. They were on their way to keep that festival at Jerusalem. But Jesus did not go up to this festival, as John expressly tells us, (ch. 7:1)—remaining in Galilee, because the ruling Jews sought to kill Him. 35. And when the day was now far spent—"began to wear away" or "decline," says Luke (9:12). Matthew (14:15) says, "when it was evening"; and yet he mentions a later evening of the same day (vs. 23). This earlier evening began at three P.M.; the latter began at sunset. 36. Send them away, that they may go into the country round about, and into the villages, and buy themselves bread: for they have nothing to eat—John tells us (6:5, 6) that "Jesus said to Philip, Whence shall we buy bread, that these may eat? (And this He said to prove him: for He Himself knew what He would do.)" The subject may have been introduced by some remark of the disciples; but the precise order and form of what was said by each can hardly be gathered with precision, nor is it of any importance. 37. He answered and said unto them—"They need not depart" (Matt. 14:10). Give ye them to eat—doubtless said to prepare them for what was to follow. And they say unto him, Shall we go and buy two hundred pennyworth of bread, and give them to eat?—"Philip answered Him, Two hundred pennyworth of bread is not sufficient for them, that every one of them may take a little" (John 6:7). 38. He saith unto them, How many loaves have ye? go and see. And when they knew, they say, Five, and two fishes—John is more precise and full: "One of His disciples, Andrew, Simon Peter's brother, saith unto Him, There is a lad here which hath five barley loaves and two small fishes: but what are they among so many?" (John 6:8, 9.) Probably this was the whole stock of provisions then at the command of the disciples—no more than enough for one meal to them—and entrusted for the time to this lad. "He said, Bring them hither to me" (Matthew 14:18). 39. And he commanded them to make all sit down by companies upon the green grass—or "green hay"; the rank grass of those bushy wastes. For, as John (6:10) notes, "there was much grass in the place." 40. And they sat down in ranks, by hundreds, and by fifties—Doubtless this was to show at a glance the number fed, and to enable all to witness in an orderly manner this glorious miracle. 41. And when he had taken the five loaves and the two fishes, he looked up to heaven—Thus would the

33. The people. Or "the multitudes." This is wanting in many MSS., but it seems necessary to make the sense clear. There is scarcely a verse in the whole New Testament that has suffered so much from transcribers as this verse. Amidst the abundance of various readings, one can scarcely tell what its original state was.

34. Much people. See this miracle explained on Matt. xiv. 14, etc.

Jesus . . . was moved with compassion. He was moved with "tender compassion," so I think the word should in general be translated.

Send the multitude away, that they may go . . . and buy. The disciples of Christ are solicitous for the people's temporal as well as spiritual welfare; and he is not worthy to be called a minister of Christ who does not endeavor to promote both to the uttermost of his power.

They need not depart. He that seeks first the kingdom of Heaven is sure to have every temporal requisite.

We have here but five loaves, and two fishes. When we are deeply conscious of our own necessities, we shall be led to depend on Jesus with a firmer faith. God often permits His servants to be brought low, that they may have repeated opportunities of proving the kindness and mercy of their gracious Lord and Master.

And took the five loaves. This was the act of the father of a family among the Jews—his business it was to take the bread into his hands, and render thanks to God, before any of the family was permitted to taste of it. Looking up to heaven. To teach us to acknowledge God as the Supreme Good, and Fountain of all excellence.

his disciples to crave a blessing, but did it himself (v. 41); and by virtue of this blessing the bread strangely multiplied, and so did the fishes, for they did all eat, and were filled, though they were to the number of five thousand, v. 42–44. Christ came into the world, to be the great feeder as well as the great healer; and in him there is enough for all that come to him. None are sent empty away from Christ, but those that come to him full of themselves.

(4) Care was taken of the fragments that remained, with which they filled twelve baskets. Though Christ had bread enough at command, he would hereby teach us, not to make waste.

Verses 45–56

I. The dispersing of the assembly; Christ constrained his disciples to go before by ship to Bethsaida. The people were loth to scatter. For now that they had got a good supper, they were in no haste to leave him.

II. Christ departed into a mountain, to pray. He prayed; he was much in prayer; he prayed often, and prayed long. He went alone, to pray, to set us an example, and to encourage us in our secret addresses to God, he prayed alone. A good man is never less alone than when alone with God.

III. The disciples were in distress at sea; The wind was contrary (v. 48), so that they toiled in rowing. This was a specimen of the hardships they were to expect, when hereafter he should send them abroad to preach the gospel. The church is often like a ship at sea, tossed with tempests, and not comforted; we may have Christ for us, and yet wind and tide against us; but it is a comfort to Christ's disciples in a storm, that their Master is in the heavenly mount, interceding for them.

most distant of them see distinctly what He was doing. and blessed—John says, "And when he had given thanks." The sense is the same. This thanksgiving for the meal, and benediction of it as the food of thousands, was the crisis of the miracle. and brake the loaves, and gave them to his disciples to set before them—thus virtually holding forth these men as His future ministers. and the two fishes divided he among them all. 42. And they did all eat, and were filled—All the four Evangelists mention this: and John (6:11) adds, "and likewise of the fishes, as much as they would"—to show that vast as was the multitude, and scanty the provisions, the meal to each and all of them was a plentiful one. "When they were filled, He said unto His disciples, Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost" (John 6:12). This was designed to bring out the whole extent of the miracle. 43. And they took up twelve baskets full of the fragments, and of the fishes—"Therefore (says John 6:13), they gathered them together, and filled twelve baskets with the fragments of the five barley loaves, which remained over and above unto them that had eaten." The article here rendered "baskets" in all the four narratives was part of the luggage taken by Jews on a journey—to carry, it is said, both their provisions and hay to sleep on, that they might not have to depend on Gentiles, and so run the risk of ceremonial pollution. In this we have a striking corroboration of the truth of the four narratives. Internal evidence renders it clear, we think, that the first three Evangelists wrote independently of each other, though the fourth must have seen all the others. But here, each of the first three Evangelists uses the same word to express the apparently insignificant circumstance that the baskets employed to gather up the fragments were of the kind which even the Roman satirist, JUVENAL, knew by the name of cophinus, while in both the narratives of the feeding of the Four Thousand the baskets used are expressly said to have been of the kind called spuris. (See on ch. 8:19, 20.) 44. And they that did eat of the loaves were about five thousand men—"besides women and children" (Matt. 14:21). Of these, however, there would probably not be many; as only the males were obliged to go to the approaching festival.

Jesus Recrosses to the Western side of the Lake, Walking on the Sea (vss. 45-56). One very important particular given by John alone (6:15) introduces this portion: "When Jesus therefore perceived that they would take Him by force, to make Him a king, He departed again into a mountain Himself alone." 45. And straightway he constrained his disciples to get into the ship, and to go to the other side before—Him—unto Bethsaida—Bethsaida of Galilee (John 12:21). John says they "went over the sea towards Capernaum"—the wind, probably, occasioning this slight deviation from the direction of Bethsaida. while he sent away the people—"the multitude." His object in this was to put an end to the misdirected excitement in His favor (John 6:15), into which the disciples themselves may have been somewhat drawn. The word "constrained" implies reluctance on their part, perhaps from unwillingness to part with their Master and embark at night, leaving Him alone on the mountain. 46. And when he had sent them away, he departed into a mountain to pray—thus at length getting that privacy and rest which He had vainly sought during the earlier part of the day; opportunity also to pour out His soul in connection with the extraordinary excitement in His favor that evening—which appears to have marked the zenith of His reputation, for it began to decline the very next day; and a place whence He might watch the disciples on the lake, pray for them in their extremity, and observe the right time for coming to them, in a new manifestation of His glory, on the sea. 47. And when even was come—the later evening (see on vs. 35). It had come even when the disciples embarked (Matt. 14:23; John 6:16). the ship was in the midst of the sea, and he alone on the land—John says (6:17), "It was now dark, and Jesus was not come to them." Perhaps they made no great effort to push across at first, having a lingering hope that their Master would yet join them, and so allowed the darkness to come on. "And the sea arose" (adds the beloved disciple, 6:18), "by reason of a great wind that blew." 48. And he saw them toiling in rowing; for the wind was contrary unto them—putting forth all their strength to buffet the waves and bear on against a head wind, but to little effect. He "saw" this from His mountain-top, and through the darkness of the night, for His heart was all with them: yet would He not go to their relief till His own time

41. And blessed. I think the word God should be inserted here, as in Matt. xiv. 19. See the note there. The food we receive from God is already blessed, and does not stand in need of being blessed by man; but God, who gives it, deserves our warmest thanksgivings, as frequently as we are called to partake of His bounty.

43. Twelve baskets. These were either the baskets used by the disciples, see Matt. xiv. 20, or baskets belonging to some of the multitude, who might have brought some with them to carry provisions, or other things necessary for the sick, whom they brought to Christ to be healed.

44. Were about five thousand. This miracle is mentioned by all the four Evangelists. It is one of the most astonishing that Christ has wrought. It is a miracle whch could not be counterfeited, and a full proof of the divinity of Christ.

45. To the other side before unto Bethsaida. John says, chap. vi. 17, to "Capernaum." It is probable our Lord ordered them to steer to one or other of these two places, which were about four miles distant, and on the same side of the Sea of Galilee.

He went up into a mountain apart, to pray. Some make this part of our Lord's conduct emblematic of the spirit and practice of prayer, and observe that the proper dispositions and circumstances for praying well are: (1) retirement from the world, (2) elevation of the heart to God, (3) solitude, and (4) the silence and quiet of the night. It is certain in this also Christ has left us an example that we should follow His steps.

47. The ship was in the midst of the sea. See all the parts of this wonderful transaction considered on Matt. xiv. 22-33.

MATTHEW HENRY

IV. Christ made them a kind visit upon the water. He chose to help them in the most endearing manner possible, and therefore came to them himself.

1. He did not come till the fourth watch of the night, not till after three o'clock in the morning; but then he came. If Christ's visits to his people be deferred long, yet at length he will come.

2. He came, walking upon the waters. The sea was now tossed with waves, and yet Christ came, walking upon it. No difficulties can obstruct Christ's gracious appearances for his people. He will either find, or force, a way through the most tempestuous sea, for their deliverance.

3. He would have passed by them. Providence, when it is acting designedly and directly for the succour of God's people, yet sometimes seems as if it were giving them the go-by. They thought that he would, but we may be sure that he would not, have passed by them.

4. They were frightened at the sight of him, supposing him to have been an apparition; They all saw him, and were troubled (v. 50). We often perplex and frighten ourselves with phantasms, the creatures of our own fancy and imagination.

5. He encouraged them, and silenced their fears, by making himself known to them; Be of good cheer, it is I; be not afraid. We know not Christ till he is pleased to reveal himself to us. "It is I; I your Master, I your friend." The knowledge of Christ, as he is in himself, and near to us, is enough to make the disciples of Christ cheerful even in a storm, and no longer fearful. Christ's presence with us in a stormy day, is enough to make us of good cheer, though clouds and darkness be round about us. He doth not tell them who he was, they knew his voice, as the sheep know the voice of their own shepherd. When Christ said to those that came to apprehend him by force, I am he, they were struck down by it, John xviii. 6. When he saith to those that come to apprehend him by faith, I am he, they are raised up by it, and comforted.

6. He went up to them into the ship. Let them but have their Master with them, and all is well. And as soon as he was come into the ship, the wind ceased. The wind ceased all of a sudden. Though we hear not the command given, yet, if thus the wind cease, and we have the comfort of a calm, say, It is because Christ is in the ship.

7. They were more surprised and astonished at this miracle than did become them, They were sore amazed in themselves. But why all this confusion about it? It was because they considered not the miracle of the loaves; had they given that its due weight they would not have been so much surprised at this; for his multiplying the bread was as great an instance came. and about the fourth watch of the night—The Jews, who used to divide the night into three watches, latterly adopted the Roman division into four watches, as here. So that, at the rate of three hours to each, the fourth watch, reckoning from six P.M., would be three o'clock in the morning. "So when they had rowed about five and twenty or thirty furlongs" (John 6:19)—rather more than halfway across. The lake is about seven miles broad at its widest part. So that in eight or nine hours they had only made some three and a half miles. By this time, therefore, they must have been in a state of exhaustion and despondency bordering on despair; and now at length, having tried them long enough—he cometh unto them, walking upon the sea—"and draweth nigh unto the ship" (John 6:19). and would have passed by them—but only in the sense of Luke 24:28; Genesis 32:26; cf. Genesis 18:3, 5; 42:7. 49. But when they saw him walking upon the sea, they supposed it had been a spirit, and cried out—"for fear" (Matt. 14:26). He would appear to them at first like a dark moving speck upon the waters; then as a human figure; but in the dark tempestuous sky, and not dreaming that it could be their Lord, they take it for a spirit. Cf. Luke 24:37. 50. For they all saw him, and were troubled. And immediately he talked with them, and saith unto them, Be of good cheer: It is I; be not afraid—There is something in these two little words—given by Matthew, Mark and John—"'Tis I," which from the mouth that spake it and the circumstances in which it was uttered, passes the power of language to express. Here were they in the midst of a raging sea, their little bark the sport of the elements, and with just enough of light to descry an object on the waters which only aggravated their fears. But Jesus deems it enough to dispel all apprehension to let them know that He was there. From other lips that "I am" would have merely meant that the person speaking was such a one and not another person. That, surely, would have done little to calm the fears of men expecting every minute, it may be, to go to the bottom. But spoken by One who at that moment was "treading upon the waves of the sea," and was about to hush the raging elements with His word, what was it but the Voice which cried of old in the ears of Israel, even from the days of Moses, "I AM"; "I, EVEN I, AM HE!" Cf. John 18:5, 6; 8:58. Now, that Word is "made flesh, and dwells among us," uttering itself from beside us in dear familiar tones—"It is the Voice of my Beloved!" How far was this apprehended by these frightened disciples? There was one, we know, in the boat who outstripped all the rest in susceptibility to such sublime appeals. It was not the deep-toned writer of the Fourth Gospel, who, though he lived to soar beyond all the apostles, was as yet too young for prominence, and all unripe. It was Simon-Barjonas. Here follows a very remarkable and instructive episode, recorded by Matthew alone:

51. And he went up unto them into the ship—John (6:21) says, "Then they willingly received him into the ship"—or rather, "Then were they willing to receive Him" (with reference to their previous terror); but implying also a glad welcome, their first fears now converted into wonder and delight. "And immediately," adds the beloved disciple, "they were at the land whither they went," or "were bound." This additional miracle, for as such it is manifestly related, is recorded by the fourth Evangelist alone. As the storm was suddenly calmed, so the little bark—propelled by the secret power of the Lord of nature now sailing in it—glided through the now unruffled waters, and, while they were wrapt in wonder at what had happened, not heeding their rapid motion, was found at port, to their still further surprise.

Then are they glad, because at rest
And quiet now they be;
So to the haven He them brings
Which they desired to see.

Matthew (14:33) says, "Then they that were in the ship came [i.e., ere they got to land] and worshipped him, saying, Of a truth Thou art the Son of God." But our Evangelist is wonderfully striking. and the wind ceased and they were sore amazed in themselves beyond measure, and wondered—The Evangelist seems hardly to find language strong enough to express their astonishment. 52. For they considered not the miracle of the loaves; for their heart was hardened—What a singular statement! The meaning seems to be that if they had

The fourth watch. Anciently the Jews divided the night into three watches, consisting of four hours each. The first watch is mentioned, Lam. ii. 19; the second, Judg. vii. 19; and the third, Exod. xiv. 24; but a fourth watch is not mentioned in any part of the Old Testament. This division the Romans had introduced in Judea, as also the custom of dividing the day into twelve hours; see John xi. 9. The first watch began at six o'clock in the evening, and continued till nine; the second began at nine, and the fourth began at three, and continued twelve, and continued till three next morning; and the fourth began at three, and continued till six. It was, therefore, between the hours of three and six in the morning that Jesus made His appearance to His disciples. Walking on the sea. Thus suspending the laws of gravitation was a proper manifestation of unlimited power. Jesus did this by His own power; therefore Jesus showed forth His Godhead.

49. They supposed it had been a spirit. That is, by whom the storm had been raised.

It is I; be not afraid. Nothing but this voice of Christ could, in such circumstances, have given courage and comfort to His disciples. Those who are grievously tossed with difficulties and temptations require a similar manifestation of His power and goodness. When He proclaims himself in the soul, all sorrow and fear and sin are at an end.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

The story of the storm is one concerning these men, in the way of His will. He asked them to enter the boat and cross back again to the other shore. They went. Remember that the way of His will was the way of the storm. He sent them into the storm, and there is a strong word used here concerning that storm. We have translated it "distressed." Far more literally we may render, "They were tormented in rowing." Why did they not turn back to the other shore? The wind was contrary. There was the difficulty. The wind was blowing off the shore to which He had commanded them to go. It would have been the simplest thing to tack, to put about, and run before the wind. But no! they must not do that. Why not? He sent them in that direction! They were tormented in the very path of obedience. But it was also the way of His power. He came after them. The wind was contrary to Him also, but did not hinder Him. The waters were storm-tossed for Him also, but they constituted the pavement of His victorious footsteps. When presently He was in the boat, the storm ceased.—The Gospel According to Mark of his power as his walking on the water. It is for want of a right understanding of Christ's former works, that we are transported at the thought of his present works, as if there never were the like before.

V. When they came to the land of Gennesaret the people bid them very welcome; The men of that place knew Jesus (v. 53), and knew what mighty works he did wherever he came, they knew likewise that he used to stay but a little while at a place, and therefore, They ran through that whole region round about, with all possible expedition, and began to carry about in beds those that were sick, there was no danger of their getting cold when they hoped to get a cure, v. 55. Let him go where he would, he was crowded with patients, they laid the sick in the streets, to be in his way, and begged leave for them to touch if it were but the border of his garment, and as many as touched, were made whole. We do not find that they were desirous to be taught by him, only to be healed. If ministers could now cure people's bodily diseases, what multitudes would attend them! But it is sad to think how much more concerned the most of men are about their bodies than about their souls.

but "considered [reflected upon] the miracle of the loaves," wrought but a few hours before, they would have wondered at nothing which He might do within the whole circle of power and grace.

Incidents on Landing (vss. 53-56). The details here are given with a rich vividness quite peculiar to this charming Gospel. 53. And when they had passed over, they came into the land of Gennesaret—from which the lake sometimes takes its name, stretching along its western shore. Capernaum was their landing-place (John 6:24, 25). and drew to the shore—a nautical phrase, nowhere else used in the New Testament. 54. And when they were come out of the ship, straightway they knew him—"immediately they recognized Him"; i.e., the people did. 55. and began to carry about in beds those that were sick, where they heard he was—At this period of our Lord's ministry the popular enthusiasm in His favor was at its height. 56. and besought him that they might touch if it were but the border of his garment—having heard, no doubt, of what the woman with the issue of blood experienced on doing so (ch. 5:25-29), and perhaps of other unrecorded cases of the same nature. and as many as touched him—or "it"—the border of His garment—were made whole—All this they continued to do and to experience while our Lord was in that region. The time corresponds to that mentioned (John 7:1), when He "walked in Galilee," instead of appearing in Jerusalem at the passover, "because the Jews," i.e., the rulers, "sought to kill Him"—while the people sought to enthrone Him!

53. The land of Gennesaret. This country lay on the coast of the Sea of Galilee: it is described by Josephus as being exceedingly pleasant and fertile. It had its name of Gennesaret from gen, a "garden," and sar, a "prince," either because the king had a garden there or because of its great fertility.

54. They knew him. "They recollected Him," for He had before preached and wrought miracles in different places of the same country.

56. Villages. Probably small towns near cities. Country. Villages at a distance from cities and large public towns.

One great design of Christ's coming, was, to set aside the ceremonial law which God made, and to put an end to it; to make way for which he begins with the ceremonial law which men had made, and added to the law of God's making. These Pharisees and scribes with whom he had this argument, are said to come from Jerusalem down to Galilee—fourscore or a hundred miles, to pick quarrels with our Saviour there.

I. What the tradition of the elders was: by it all were enjoined to wash their hands before meat; a cleanly custom, and no harm in it; but they placed religion in it. They interposed their authority, and commanded all to do it upon pain of excommunication; this they kept up as a tradition of the elders.

We have here an account of the practice of the Pharisees and all the Jews, v. 3, 4. 1. They washed their hands oft. 2. They particularly washed before they ate bread; for that was the rule; they must be sure to wash before they ate the bread on which they begged a blessing, else he was thought to be defiled. 3. They took special care, when they came in from the markets, to wash their hands. It signifies any place of concourse where there were people of all sorts, and, it might be supposed, some heathen or Jews under a ceremonial pollution, by coming near to whom they thought themselves polluted. They say, The rule of the rabbis was—That, if they washed their hands well in the morning, the first thing they did, it would serve for all day, provided they kept alone; but, if they went into company, they must not, at their return, either eat or pray till they had washed their hands. 4. They added to this the washing of cups and pots, and brazen vessels, nay, and the very tables on which they ate their meat. There were many cases in which, by the law of Moses, washings were appointed; but they added to them, and enforced the observation of their own impositions as much as of God's institutions.

II. What the practice of Christ's disciples was; they knew what the law was, and the common usage; but they would not be bound up by it: they ate bread with defiled, that is, with unwashen hands, v. 2. The disciples knew (it is probable) that the Pharisees had their eye upon them, and yet they would not humour them by a compliance with their traditions, and ate bread with unwashen hands; and herein their righteousness, however it might seem to come short, did really exceed, that of the scribes and Pharisees, Matt. v. 20.

III. The offence which the Pharisees took at this; They found fault (v. 3). They brought a complaint against them to their Master, expecting that he should check them, and order them to conform. They do not ask, Why do not thy disciples do as we do? But, Why do not they walk according to the tradition of the elders? v. 5.

IV. Christ's vindication of them; in which,

1. He argues with the Pharisees concerning the

CHAPTER 7

Vss. 1-23. DISCOURSE ON CEREMONIAL POLLUTION. (=Matt. 15:1-20). See on Matthew 15:1-20.

The time of this section was after that Passover which was nigh at hand when our Lord fed the five thousand (John 6:4)—the third Passover, as we take it, since His public ministry began, but which He did not keep at Jerusalem for the reason mentioned in John 7:1.

Then came to Jesus scribes and Pharisees, which were of—or "from"—Jerusalem—Mark says they "came from" it: a deputation probably sent from the capital expressly to watch Him. As He had not come to them at the last Passover, which they had reckoned on, they now come to Him. "And," says Mark, "when they saw some of His disciples eat bread with defiled, that is to say, with unwashen hands"—hands not ceremonially cleansed by washing—"they found fault. For the Pharisees, and all the Jews, except they wash their hands oft"—lit., "in" or "with the fist"; i.e., probably washing the one hand by the use of the other—though some understand it, with our version, in the sense of 'diligently,' 'sedulously'—"eat not, holding the tradition of the elders"; acting religiously according to the custom handed down to them. "And when they come from the market"—"And after market": after any common business, or attending a court of justice, where the Jews, as WEBSTER and WILKINSON remark, after their subjection to the Romans, were especially exposed to intercourse and contact with heathens—"except they wash, they eat not. And many other things there be, which they have received to hold, as the washing of cups and pots, brazen vessels and tables"—rather, "couches," such as were used at meals, which probably were merely sprinkled for ceremonial purposes. "Then the Pharisees and scribes asked Him," saying, Why do thy disciples transgress the tradition of the elders? for they wash not their hands when they eat bread.

1. Came from Jerusalem. Probably for the express purpose of disputing with Christ, that they might entangle Him in His talk.

3. Except they wash their hands. The hand to the wrist—"Unless they wash the hand up to the wrist, eat not." This sort of washing was, and still continues to be, an act of religion in the Eastern countries. It is particularly commanded in the Koran, Surat, v, v. 7, "O believers, when ye wish to pray, wash your faces, and your hands up to the elbows—and your feet up to the ankles," which custom it is likely Mohammed borrowed from the Jews. The Jewish doctrine is this: "If a man neglect the washing, he shall be eradicated from this world."

4. Except they wash. Or "dip." But instead of the word in the text, the famous Codex Vaticanus (B), eight others, and Euthymius have sprinkle. However the Jews sometimes washed their hands previously to their eating; at other times they simply dipped or plunged them into the water. Of cups. Any kind of earthen vessels. Pots. "Of measures," a measure for liquids, formed from the Latin sextarius, equal to a pint and a half English. Of brasen vessels. These, if polluted, were only to be washed or passed through the fire, whereas the earthen vessels were to be broken. And of tables. "Beds, couches." This is wanting in some MSS.

2. They found fault. This is wanting in many MSS. and several versions; Mill and Bengel approve the omission, and Griesbach rejects the word. If the third and fourth verses be read in a parenthesis, the second and fifth verses will appear to be properly connected, without the above clause.

authority by which this ceremony was imposed; but this he did not speak of publicly to the multitude (as appears by his calling the people to him, v. 14) lest he should have seemed to stir them up to faction; but addressed it as a reproof to the persons concerned.

(1) He reproves them for their hypocrisy in pretending to honour God, when really they had no such design in their religious observances (v. 6, 7); They honour me with their lips, they pretend it is for the glory of God, but really their heart is far from God. They rested in the outside of all their religious exercises, and their hearts were not right with God in them, and this was worshipping God in vain; for neither was he pleased with such sham-devotions, nor were they profited by them.

(2) He reproves them for placing religion in the inventions and injunctions of their elders and rulers; They taught for doctrines the traditions of men. They were enforcing the canons of their church, and judged of people's being Jews or no, according as they did, or did not, conform to them, without any consideration had, whether they lived in obedience to God's laws or no. Instead of providing the substance, they presumptuously added to the ceremony, and were very nice in washing pots and cups; and observe, he adds, Many other suchlike things ye do, v. 8. Superstition is an endless thing.

(3) He reproves them for laying aside the commandment of God, and overlooking that, and in their discipline conniving at the violation of that, as if that were no longer of force, v. 8. It is the mischief of impositions, that too often they who are zealous for them, have little zeal for the essential duties of religion. Nay, they rejected the commandment of God, v. 9. Ye do fairly disannul and abolish the commandment of God; and even by your traditions make the word of God of no effect, v. 13. They were entrusted to expound the law, and to enforce it; and, under pretence of using that power, they violated the law, and dissolved the bonds of it.

This he gives them a particular instance of, and a flagrant one—God commanded children to honour their parents, not only by the law of Moses, but by the law of nature; and whoso revileth, or speaketh evil of, father or mother, let him die the death, v. 10. It is the duty of children, if their parents be poor, to relieve them, according to their ability; and if those children are worthy to die, that curse their parents, much more those that starve them. But they will find him out an expedient by which he may be discharged from this obligation, v. 11. If his parents be in want, and he has wherewithal to help them, but has no mind to do it, let him swear by the Corban that is, by the gold of the temple, and the gift upon the altar, that his parents shall not be profited by him, and, if they ask anything of him, let him tell them this, and it is enough; as if by the obligation of this wicked vow he had discharged himself from the obligation. He concludes, And many such things do ye. Where will men stop, when once they have made the word of God give way to their tradition? These eager imposers of such ceremonies, at first only made light of God's commandments in comparison with their traditions, but afterward made void God's commandments, if they stood in competition with them.

2. He instructs the people concerning the principles upon which this ceremony was grounded. It was requisite that this part of his discourse should be public, he therefore called the people unto him (v. 14), and bid them hear and understand. It is not enough for the common people to hear, but they must understand what they hear. Corrupt customs are best cured by rectifying corrupt notions.

Now that which he goes about to set them right in, is, what the pollution is, which we are in danger of being damaged by, v. 15. (1) Not by the meat we eat, that is but from without, and goes through a man. But, (2) It is by the breaking out of the corruption that is in our hearts. We become odious in the sight of God by that which comes out of us; our wicked thoughts and affections, words and actions, these defile us, and these only. Our care must therefore be, to wash our heart from wickedness.

3. He gives his disciples, in private, an explication of the instructions he gave the people. They asked him concerning the parable (v. 17). (1) He reproves their dulness; "Are ye so without understanding also?" He doth not expect they should understand everything; "But are ye so weak as not to understand this?" (2) He explains this truth to them, that they might perceive it, and then they would believe it. [1] That that which we eat and drink cannot defile us, so as to call for any religious washing; it goes into the stomach, and what there may be in it that is defiling is voided and gone. But, [2] It is that which

Ye hypocrites, well did Esaias prophesy of you, saying—(Isa. 29:13)— This people draweth nigh unto me with their mouth, . . .—By putting the commandments of men on a level with the divine requirements, their whole worship was rendered vain—a principle of deep moment in the service of God. "For," it is added in Mark 7:8, "laying aside the commandment of God, ye hold the tradition of men, as the washing of pots and cups; and many other such like things ye do." The drivelling nature of their multitudinous observances is here pointedly exposed, in contrast with the manly observance of "the commandment of God"; and when our Lord says, "Many other such like things ye do," it is implied that He had but given a specimen of the hideous treatment which the divine law received, and the grasping disposition which, under the mask of piety, was manifested by the ecclesiastics of that day.

Thus have ye made the commandment of God of none effect—cancelled or nullified it—by your tradition.

But he answered and said unto them, Why do ye also transgress the commandment of God by your tradition?—The charge is retorted with startling power: "The tradition they transgress is but man's, and is itself the occasion of heavy transgression, undermining the authority of God's law."

For God commanded, saying, Honour thy father and mother Deut. 5:16; and, He that curseth father or mother, let him die the death—(Exod. 21:17).

But ye say, Whosoever shall say to his father or his mother, It is a gift—or simply, "A gift!" In Mark it is, "Corban!" i.e., "An oblation!" meaning, any unbloody offering or gift dedicated to sacred uses. by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me; And honour not his father or his mother, [he shall be free]—i.e., It is true, father—mother—that by giving to thee this, which I now present, thou mightest be profited by me; but I have gifted it to pious uses, and therefore, at whatever cost to thee, I am not now at liberty to alienate any portion of it. "And," it is added in Mark, "ye suffer him no more to do aught for his father or his mother." To dedicate property to God is indeed lawful and laudable, but not at the expense of filial duty.

And he called the multitude, and said unto them—The foregoing dialogue, though in the people's hearing, was between Jesus and the pharisaic cavilliers, whose object was to disparage Him with the people. But Jesus, having put them down, turns to the multitude, who at this time were prepared to drink in everything He said, and with admirable plainness, strength, and brevity, lays down the great principle of real pollution, by which a world of bondage and uneasiness of conscience would be dissipated in a moment, and the sense of sin be reserved for deviations from the holy and eternal law of God. Hear and understand: Not that which geeth into the mouth defileth a man; but that which cometh out of the mouth, this defileth a man—This is expressed even more emphatically in Mark (17:15, 16), and it is there added, "If any man have ears to hear, let him hear." As in ch. 13:9, this so oft-repeated saying seems designed to call attention to the fundamental and universal character of the truth it refers to.

Are ye also yet without understanding?—Slowness of spiritual apprehension in His genuine disciples grieves the Saviour: from others He expects no better (ch. 13: 11). Do not ye yet understand that whatsoever entereth in at the mouth, . . .—Familiar though these sayings have now become, what freedom from bondage to outward things do they proclaim, on the one hand; and on the other, how searching is the truth which they express—that nothing which enters from without can really defile us; and that only the evil that is in the heart, that is

It is found only in the Synoptists, and always used by the Lord, fifteen times in Matthew; elsewhere, Mark 7:6; Luke 6:42; 11:44 (in some mss.); 12:56; 13:15.

8. Washing of pots and cups. This whole clause is wanting in some MSS. and versions.

9. Full well. A strong irony. How noble is your conduct! From conscientious attachment to your own traditions you have annihilated the commandments of God! That ye may keep. God's law was nothing to these men in comparison of their own; hear a case in point. "Rabba said, How foolish are most men! They observe the precepts of the divine law, and neglect the statutes of the rabbins!"

10. For Moses said. See all these verses, from this to the twenty-third, explained on Matt. xv. 3-20.

14. When he had called all the people. But instead of all, "again" is the reading of some MSS. and versions. Mill and Griesbach approve of this reading.

Are ye also yet without understanding? The word which we translate yet should be here rendered "still": Are ye still void of understanding? The word is used in this sense by several Greek writers.

comes out from the heart, the corrupt heart, that defiles us. What comes out from the mind of a man is that which defiles him before God, and calls for a religious washing (v. 21); From within, out of the heart of men, thence that which defiles proceeds, thence comes all the mischief. As a corrupt fountain sends forth corrupt streams, so doth a corrupt heart. Divers particulars are specified, as in Matthew; we had one there, which is not here, and that is, false witness-bearing; but seven are mentioned here, to be added to those we had there. First, Covetousnesses, for it is plural; immoderate desires of more of the wealth of the world, and the gratifications of sense, and still more, still crying, Give, give. Secondly, Wickedness, malice, hatred, and ill-will, a desire to do mischief, and a delight in mischief done. Thirdly, Deceit; which is wickedness covered and disguised, that it may be the more securely and effectually committed. Fourthly, Lasciviousness; that filthiness and foolish talking which the apostle condemns; the eye full of adultery, and all wanton dalliances. Fifthly, The evil eye; the envious eye, and the covetous eye, grudging others the good we give them, or grieving at the good they do or enjoy. Sixthly, Pride; exalting ourselves in our own conceit above others, and looking down with scorn and contempt upon others. Seventhly, Foolishness; imprudence, inconsideration; some understand it especially of vainglorious boasting. Ill-thinking is put first, as that which is the spring of our own *com*missions, and unthinking put last, as that which is the spring of all our *o*missions. Of all these he concludes (v. 23), 1. That they come from within, from the corrupt nature. 2. That they defile the man; they render a man unfit for communion with God, they bring a stain upon the conscience.

Verses 24–30

I. How humbly Christ was pleased to conceal himself. Never man was so cried up as he was in Galilee, and therefore, to teach us not to be fond of popular applause, he arose from thence, and went into the borders of Tyre and Sidon, where he was little known; and there he entered into a private house, and he would have no man to know it. As there is a time to appear, so there is a time to retire. Or, he would not be known, because he was among Gentiles, to whom he would not be so forward to show himself as to the tribes of Israel.

II. How graciously he was pleased to manifest himself, notwithstanding. Though he would not carry a harvest of miraculous cures into those parts, he let fall this one which we have here an account of. He could not be hid; for, though a candle may be put under a bushel, the sun cannot. Christ was too well known to be long hid, anywhere.

1. The application made to him by a poor woman in distress and trouble. She was a Gentile, a Greek, an alien to the covenant of promise; she was by extraction a Syrophenician; she had a daughter, a young daughter, that was possessed with the devil. Her address was, (1) Very humble, pressing, and importunate; She heard of him, and came, and fell at his feet. Christ never put any from him, that fell at his feet, which a poor trembling soul may do, that has not boldness and confidence to throw itself into his arms. (2) It was very particular; she tells him what she wanted. She besought him that he would cast forth the devil out of her daughter, v. 25. The greatest blessing we can ask of Christ for our children is, that he would break the power of Satan, that is, the power of sin, in their souls.

2. The discouragement he gave to this address (v. 27); He said unto her, "Let the children first be filled; let the Jews have all the miracles wrought for them, that they have occasion for, and let not that which was intended for them, be thrown to those who are not of God's family, and who are as dogs in comparison of them, and who are as dogs to them, snarling at them, and ready to worry them." Where Christ knows the faith of poor supplicants to be strong, he sometimes delights to try it, and put it to the stretch. But his saying, Let the children first be filled, intimates that there was mercy in reserve for the Gentiles, and not far off; for the Jews began already to be surfeited with the gospel of Christ, and some of them had desired him to depart out of their coasts. The children begin to play with their meat, and their leavings would be a feast for the Gentiles.

3. The turn she gave to this word of Christ, which made against her, and her improvement of it, to make it for her, v. 28. She said, "Yes, Lord, I own it is true that the children's bread ought not to be cast to the dogs, but they were never denied the crumbs, allowed to stir there, to rise up in thought and affection, and to flow forth in voluntary action, really defiles a man! For out of the heart proceed evil thoughts—"evil reasonings"; referring here more immediately to those corrupt reasonings which had stealthily introduced and gradually reared up that hideous fabric of tradition which at length practically nullified the unchangeable principles of the moral law. But the statement is far broader than this; viz., that the first shape which the evil that is in the heart takes, when it begins actively to stir, is that of "considerations" or "reasonings" on certain suggested actions. murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies—detractions, whether directed against God or man; here the reference seems to be to the latter. Mark adds, "covetousnesses"—or desires after more: "wickednesses"—here meaning, perhaps, malignities of various forms; "deceit, lasciviousness"—meaning, excess or enormity of any kind, though by later writers restricted to lewdness; "an evil eye"—meaning, all looks or glances of envy, jealousy, or ill-will towards a neighbor; "pride, foolishness"—in the Old Testament sense of "folly"; i.e., criminal senselessness, the folly of the heart. How appalling is this black catalogue! These are the things which defile a man: but to eat with unwashen hands defileth not a man—Thus does our Lord sum up this whole searching discourse.

24-37. THE SYROPHOENICIAN WOMAN AND HER DAUGHTER—A DEAF AND DUMB MAN HEALED. (= Matt. 15:21-31).

The Syrophoenician Woman and Her Daughter (vss. 24-30). The first words of this narrative show that the incident followed, in point of time, immediately on what precedes it. 24. And from thence he arose, and went into—or "unto". borders of Tyre and Sidon—the two great Phœnician seaports, but here denoting the territory generally, to the frontiers of which Jesus now came. But did Jesus actually enter this heathen territory? The whole narrative, we think, proceeds upon the supposition that He did. His immediate object seems to have been to avoid the wrath of the Pharisees at the withering exposure He had just made of their traditional religion. and entered into an house, and would have no man know it—because He had not come there to minister to heathens. But though not "sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Matt. 15:24), He hindered not the lost sheep of the vast Gentile world from coming to Him, nor put them away when they did come—as this incident was designed to show. but he could not be hid—Christ's fame had early spread from Galilee to this very region (ch. 3:8; Luke 6:17). 25. For a certain woman, whose young daughter had an unclean spirit—or, as in Matthew, "was badly demonized." heard of him—One wonders how; but distress is quick of hearing. 26. The woman was a Greek—i.e., "a Gentile," as in the margin. a Syrophœnician by nation—so called as inhabiting the Phœnician tract of Syria. JUVENAL uses the same term, as was remarked by JUSTIN MARTYR and TERTULLIAN. Matthew calls her "a woman of Canaan"—a more intelligible description to his Jewish readers (cf. Judg. 1:30, 32, 33). and she besought him that he would cast forth the devil out of her daughter—"She cried unto Him, saying, Have mercy on me, O Lord, Son of David: my daughter is grievously vexed with a devil" (Matt. 15:22). Thus, though no Israelite herself, she salutes Him as Israel's promised Messiah. Here we must go to Matthew 15:23-25 for some important links in the dialogue omitted by our Evangelist. 27. But Jesus said unto her, Let the children first be filled—"Is there hope for me here?" "Filled FIRST?" "Then my turn, it seems, is coming!"—but then, "The CHILDREN first?" "Ah! when, on that rule, shall my turn ever come!" But ere she has time for these ponderings of His word, another word comes to supplement it. for it is not meet to take the children's bread, and to cast it unto the dogs—Is this the death of her hopes? Nay, rather it is life from the dead. Out of the eater shall come forth meat (Judg. 14:14). "At evening-time, it shall be light" (Zech. 14:7). "Ah! I have it now. Had He kept silence, what could I have done but go unblest? but He hath spoken, and the victory is mine." 28. And she answered and said unto him, Yes, Lord—or, as the same word is rendered in Matthew 15:27. "Truth, Lord." yet the dogs eat of the children's crumbs—which fall from their

19. Purging all meats. For what is separated from the different aliments taken into the stomach, and thrown out of the body, is the innutritious parts of all the meats that are eaten; and thus they are purged, nothing being left behind but what is proper for the support of the body.

Evil thoughts. "Wicked dialogues"—for in all evil surmisings the heart holds a conversation, or dialogue, with itself. For murders, two MSS. have "envyings," and three others have both. Envy and murder are nearly allied; the former has often led to the latter.

These . . . defile a man. Our Lord's argument is very plain. What goes into the mouth descends into the stomach and other intestines; part is retained for the nourishment of the body, and part is ejected, as being improper to afford nourishment. Nothing of this kind defiles the soul, because it does not enter into it; but the evil principles that are in it, producing evil thoughts, murders, etc., these defile the soul, because they have their seat and operation in it.

24. Into the borders of Tyre and Sidon. Or "into the country between Tyre and Sidon."

25. A certain woman. See this account of the Syrophoenician woman explained at large, Matt. xv. 21-28.

26. The woman was a Greek. All heathen or idolaters were called Greeks by the Jews. Jews and Greeks divided the whole world at this period.

The children's bread. The salvation provided for the Jews, who were termed "the children of the kingdom." And cast it to the "little dogs"; such the Gentiles were reputed by the Jewish people, and our Lord uses that form of speech which was common among His countrymen.

Truth, Lord. Yes Lord. This appears to be not so much an assent as a bold reply to our Lord's reason for apparently rejecting her suit.

and they are allowed a place under the table, that they may be ready to receive them. I ask not for a loaf, no, nor for a morsel, only for a crumb; do not refuse me that." This she speaks, magnifying the abundance of miraculous cures with which she heard the Jews were feasted, in comparison with which a single cure was but as a crumb. Perhaps she had heard of Christ's feeding five thousand lately at once, after which, there could not but be some crumbs left for the dogs.

4. The grant Christ thereupon made of her request. For this saying, Go thy way, thou shalt have what thou camest for, the devil is gone out of thy daughter, v. 29. This encourages us to pray and not to faint, not doubting but to prevail at last. Christ's saying that it was done, did it effectually, for (v. 30) she came to her house, depending upon the word of Christ, and so she found it, the devil was gone out. Christ can conquer Satan at a distance. She found her daughter not in any toss or agitation, but very quietly laid on the bed, and reposing herself; waiting for her mother's return, to rejoice with her, that she was so finely well.

Our Lord Jesus seldom stayed long in a place. When he had cured the woman of Canaan's daughter, he had done what he had to do in that place, and returned to the sea of Galilee. He did not come directly thither, but fetched a compass through the midst of the coasts of Decapolis, which lay mostly on the other side Jordan.

Now here we have the story of a cure that Christ wrought, which is not recorded by any other of the evangelists; it is of one that was deaf and dumb.

I. His case was sad, v. 32. There were those that brought to him one that was deaf; and he had an impediment in his speech. He was perfectly unfit for conversation, and deprived both of the pleasure and of the profit of it; he had not the satisfaction either of hearing other people talk, or of telling his own mind. Let us take occasion from hence to give thanks to God for preserving to us the sense of hearing, especially that we may be capable of hearing the word of God; and the faculty of speech, especially that we may be capable of speaking God's praises. They that brought this poor man to Christ, besought him that he would put his hand upon him. It is not said, They besought him to cure him, but to put his hand upon him, to take cognizance of his case, and put forth his power to do to him as he pleased.

II. His cure was solemn, and some of the circumstances of it were singular.

1. Christ took him aside from the multitude, v. 33. Ordinarily, he wrought his miracles publicly, but this he did privately. Let us learn of Christ to do good where no eye sees, but his.

2. He used more significant actions, in the doing of this cure, than usual. (1) He put his fingers into his ears. (2) He spit upon his own finger, and then touched his tongue, and so loosened that with which his tongue was tied; these were no causes that could in the least contribute to his cure, but only signs for the encouraging of his faith and theirs that brought him.

master's table" (Matt. 15:27). "I thank Thee, O blessed One, for that word! That's my whole case. Not of the children? True. A dog? True also: Yet the dogs under the table are allowed to eat of the children's crumbs—the droppings from their master's full table: Give me that, and I am content: One crumb of power and grace from Thy table shall cast the devil out of my daughter." Oh, what lightning-quickness, what reach of instinctive ingenuity, do we behold in this heathen woman! 29. And he said unto her—"O woman, great is thy faith" (Matt. 15:28). As BENGEL beautifully remarks, Jesus "marvelled" only at two things—faith and unbelief (see on Luke 7:9). For this saying go thy way; the devil is gone out of thy daughter—That moment the deed was done. 30. And when she was come to her house, she found the devil gone out, and her daughter laid upon the bed—But Matthew is more specific; "And her daughter was made whole from that very hour." The wonderfulness of this case in all its features has been felt in every age of the Church, and the balm it has administered, and will yet administer, to millions will be known only in that day that shall reveal the secrets of all hearts.

Deaf and Dumb Man Healed (vss. 31-37). 31. And again, departing from the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, he came unto the Sea of Galilee—or, according to what has very strong claims to be regarded as the true text here, "And again, departing from the coasts of Tyre, He came through Sidon to the Sea of Galilee." The MSS. in favor of this reading, though not the most numerous, are weighty, while the versions agreeing with it are among the most ancient; and all the best critical editors and commentators adopt it. In this case we must understand that our Lord, having once gone out of the Holy Land the length of Tyre, proceeded as far north as Sidon, though without ministering, so far as appears, in those parts, and then bent His steps in a southeasterly direction. There is certainly a difficulty in the supposition of so long a detour without any missionary object: and some may think this sufficient to cast the balance in favor of the received reading. Be this as it may, on returning from these coasts of Tyre, He passed through the midst of the coasts—frontiers—of Decapolis—crossing the Jordan, therefore, and approaching the lake on its east side. Here Matthew, who omits the details of the cure of this deaf and dumb man, introduces some particulars, from which we learn that it was only one of a great number. "And Jesus," says that Evangelist (15:29-31), "departed from thence, and came nigh unto the Sea of Galilee, and went up into a mountain"—the mountain range bounding the lake on the northeast, in Decapolis: "And great multitudes came unto Him, having with them lame, blind, dumb, maimed"—not "mutilated," which is but a secondary sense of the word, but "deformed"—"and many others, and cast them down at Jesus' feet; and He healed them: insomuch that the multitude [multitudes] wondered, when they saw the dumb to speak, the maimed to be whole, the lame to walk, and the blind to see; and they glorified the God of Israel"—who after so long and dreary an absence of visible manifestation, had returned to bless His people as of old (cf. Luke 7: 16). Beyond this it is not clear from the Evangelist's language that the people saw into the claims of Jesus. Well, of these cases Mark here singles out one, whose cure had something peculiar in it. 32. And they bring unto him one that was deaf . . . and they beseech him to put his hand upon him—In their eagerness they appear to have been somewhat too officious. Though usually doing as here suggested, He will deal with this case in His own way. 33. And he took him aside from the multitude—As in another case He "took the blind man by the hand and led him out of the town" (ch. 8: 23), probably to fix his undistracted attention on Himself, and, by means of certain actions He was about to do, to awaken and direct his attention to the proper source of relief. and put his fingers into his ears—As his indistinct articulation arose from his deafness, our Lord addresses Himself to this first. To the impotent man He said, "Wilt thou be made whole?" to the blind men, "What will ye that I shall do unto you?" and "Believe ye that I am able to do this?" (John 5:6; Matt. 20:32; 9: 28.) But as this patient could hear nothing, our Lord substitutes symbolical actions upon each of the organs affected. and he spit and touched his tongue—moistening the man's parched tongue with saliva from His own mouth, as if to lubricate the organ or facilitate its free motion; thus indicating the source of the healing virtue to be His own person. (For similar actions, see ch. 8:23; John

The little dogs share with the children, for they eat the crumbs which fall from their masters' table. I do not desire what is provided for these highly favored children, only what they leave. A single exertion of Thy almighty power, in the healing of my afflicted daughter, is all that I wish for; and this the highly favored Jews can well spare without lessening the provision made for themselves. Is not this the sense of this noble woman's reply?

30. Laid upon the bed. The demon having tormented her so that her bodily strength was exhausted, and she was now laid upon the couch to take a little rest.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

The next picture that Mark gives is that of a man deaf and having an impediment in his speech. This is a picture of personal disability. The whole point of the picture, however, as it occurs here in the Gospel, is not that of the man's personal disability. It is rather that of the fact that this man in this Gentile region was brought to Jesus by his friends. It is never safe to base too much upon the argument of silence, but at least it is an interesting fact to note that the man made no appeal to Christ. He did not come to Christ on his own initiative. His friends brought him and besought Jesus that He would touch him. So while the man stands central in the picture, in some senses, I look again, and in the sympathy of these men for their friend, men outside the company of Israel, outside that racial relationship which was religious in its function, I see something human. I am again impressed by the elemental superiority over racial disadvantage. Oh, yes, these men were Gentiles, but they were men. Oh! yes, these people also probably were of the Canaanite race, but they had sympathy in their heart; witness their effort to bring their friend to Jesus.—The Gospel According to Mark

32. They bring unto him one that was deaf, and had an impediment in his speech. Though from the letter of the text, it does not appear that this man was absolutely deprived of speech (for mogilalos literally signifies one that cannot speak plainly, a stammerer), yet it is certain also that the word means a dumb person; and it is likely that the person in question was dumb, because he was deaf; and it is generally found that he who is totally deaf is dumb also.

33. And he spit, and touched his tongue. This place is exceedingly difficult. There is scarcely an action of our Lord's life but one can see an evident reason for, except this. Various interpretations are given of it—none of them satisfies my mind. After all, it is possible that what is attributed here to Christ belongs to the person who was cured. I will give my sense of the place in a short paraphrase: And Jesus took him aside from the multitude: and (the deaf man) put his fingers into his ears, intimating thereby to Christ that they were so stopped that he could not hear; and having spat out, that there might be nothing remaining in his mouth to offend the sight when Christ should look at his tongue, he touched his tongue, showing to Christ that it was so bound that he could not speak;

MATTHEW HENRY

3. He looked up to heaven. Thus he signified that it was by a divine power. He also hereby directed his patient who could see, though he could not hear, to look up to heaven for relief.

4. He sighed; not as if he found any difficulty in working this miracle; thus he expressed his pity for the miseries of human life, and his sympathy with the afflicted in their afflictions, as one that was himself touched with the feeling of their infirmities.

5. He said, Ephphatha; that is, Be opened. Be opened, served both parts of the cure; "Let the ears be opened, let the lips be opened, let him hear and speak freely," and the effect was answerable (v. 35); Straightway his ears were opened, and the string of his tongue was loosed. Happy he who, as soon as he had his hearing and speech, had the blessed Jesus so near him, to converse with.

Now this cure was, (1) A proof of Christ's being the Messiah; for it was foretold that by his power the ears of the deaf should be unstopped, and the tongue of the dumb should be made to sing, Isa. xxxv. 5, 6. (2) It was a specimen of the operations of his gospel upon the minds of men. The great command of the gospel, and grace of Christ to poor sinners is Ephphatha—Be opened. He opens the heart, and thereby opens the ear to receive the word of God, and opens the mouth in prayer and praises.

6. He ordered it to be kept very private, but it was made very public. It was his humility, that he charged them they should tell no man, v. 36. Most men will proclaim their own goodness, or, at least, desire that others should proclaim it. We should take pleasure in doing good, but not in its being known. It was their zeal, that they published it, before Christ would have had it published. But they meant honestly, and therefore it is to be reckoned rather an act of indiscretion than an act of disobedience, v. 36. But they that told it, and they that heard it, were beyond measure astonished. This was said by everybody, it was the common verdict, He hath done all things well (v. 37). They are ready to witness for him, not only that he has done no evil, but that he has done a great deal of good, and has done it well, and all gratis, without money and without price. He maketh both the deaf to hear, and the dumb to speak; and that is well, and therefore they are inexcusable who will speak ill of him.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

9:6.) 34. And looking up to heaven—ever acknowledging His Father, even while the healing was seen to flow from Himself (see on John 5:19). he sighed—"over the wreck," says TRENCH, "which sin had brought about, and the malice of the devil in deforming the fair features of God's original creation." But, we take it, there was a yet more painful impression of that "evil thing and bitter" whence all our ills have sprung, and which, when "Himself took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses" (Matt. 8:17), became mysteriously His own.

In thought of these his brows benign, and saith unto him, Ephphatha, that is, Be opened—Our Evangelist, as remarked on ch. 5:41, loves to give such wonderful words just as they were spoken. 35. And straightway his ears were opened—This is mentioned first as the source of the other derangement. and the string of his tongue was loosed, and he spake plain—The cure was thus alike instantaneous and perfect. 36. And he charged them that they should tell no man—Into this very region He had sent the man out of whom had been cast the legion of devils, to proclaim "what the Lord had done for him" (ch. 5:19). Now He will have them "tell no man." But in the former case there was no danger of obstructing His ministry by "blazing the matter" (ch. 1:45), as He Himself had left the region; whereas now He was sojourning in it. but the more he charged them, so much the more a great deal they published it—They could not be restrained; nay, the prohibition seemed only to whet their determination to publish His fame. 37. And were beyond measure astonished, saying, He hath done all things well—reminding us, says TRENCH, of the words of the first creation (Gen. 1: 31, LXX), upon which we are thus not unsuitably thrown back, for Christ's work is in the truest sense "a new creation," he maketh both the deaf to hear and the dumb to speak—"and they glorified the God of Israel" (Matt. 15:31). See on vs. 31 of this chapter.
Not even in healing, cloudless shine.

and he looked up to heaven, as if to implore assistance from above; and he groaned, being distressed because of his present affliction, and thus implored relief. For, not being able to speak, he could only groan and look up, expressing by these signs, as well as he could, his afflicted state, and the desire he had to be relieved. Then Jesus, having compassion upon him, said, Be opened: and immediately his ears were opened, so that he could hear distinctly; and the impediment to his speaking was removed, so that he spake properly. The original will admit of this interpretation; and this, I am inclined to believe, is the true meaning of this otherwise (to me and many others) unaccountable passage.

35. He spake plain. "Distinctly, without stammering."

36. Tell no man. See on Matt. viii. 4. This miracle is not mentioned by any other of the Evangelists—another proof that Mark did not abridge Matthew.

37. He hath done all things well. This has been, and ever will be, true of every part of our Lord's conduct. In creation, providence, and redemption He hath done all things well.

CHAPTER 8

We had the story of a miracle very like this before, in this gospel (ch. vi. 35), and of this same miracle (Matt. xv. 32).

1. Our Lord Jesus was greatly followed; The multitude was very great (v. 1); the common people, who had more honesty, and therefore more true wisdom, than their leaders, kept up their high thoughts of him. With such Christ conversed, and was familiar; this encouraged the meanest to come to him for life and grace.

2. They were with him three days, and had nothing to eat; that was hard service. Never let the Pharisee say, that Christ's disciples fast not. Yet they continued with Christ, and did not speak of leaving him till he spoke of dismissing them. True zeal makes nothing of hardships in the way of duty. It was an old saying among the Puritans, Brown bread and the gospel are good fare.

3. Christ said, I have compassion on the multitude Whom the proud Pharisees looked upon with disdain the humble Jesus looked upon with pity and tenderness. But that which he chiefly considers, is, They have been with me three days, and have nothing to eat. Whatever losses we sustain, or hardships we go through, for Christ's sake, and in love to him, he will take care that they shall be made up to us one way or other. Observe with what sympathy Christ saith (v. 3), If I send them away fasting to their own houses, they will faint by the way. He considered that many of them came from afar, and had a great way home. When we see multitudes attending upon the word preached, it is comfortable to think that Christ knows whence they all come, though we do not. Christ would by no means have them go home fasting, for it is not his manner to send those empty away from him, that in a right manner attend on him.

4. The doubts of Christians are sometimes made to work for the magnifying of the power of Christ. The disciples could not imagine whence so many men should be satisfied with bread here in this wilderness, v. 4. That therefore must needs be wonderful, which the disciples looked upon as impossible.

5. Christ's time to act for the relief of his people, is, when things are brought to the last extremity. That he might not invite them to follow him for the loaves, he did not supply them but when they were

CHAPTER 8

VSS. 1-26. FOUR THOUSAND MIRACULOUSLY FED—A SIGN FROM HEAVEN SOUGHT AND REFUSED—THE LEAVEN OF THE PHARISEES AND SADDUCEES—A BLIND MAN AT BETHSAIDA RESTORED TO SIGHT. (= Matt. 15:32 to 16:12.) This section of miscellaneous matter evidently follows the preceding one in point of time, as will be seen by observing how it is introduced by Matthew.

Feeding of the Four Thousand (vss. 1-9). 1. In those days the multitude being very great . . .

2. I have compassion on the multitude—an expression of that deep emotion in the Redeemer's heart which always preceded some remarkable interposition for relief. (See Matt. 14:14; 20:34; Mark 1: 41; Luke 7:13; also Matt. 9:36, before the mission of the Twelve; cf. Judg. 2:18; 10:16.) because they have now been with me—in constant attendance—three days, and have nothing to eat: 3. And if I send them away fasting to their own houses, they will faint by the way—In their eagerness they seem not to have thought of the need of provisions for such a length of time; but the Lord thought of it. In Matt. (15:32) it is, "I will not send them away fasting"—or rather, "To send them away fasting I am unwilling." 4. From whence can a man satisfy these men with bread here in the wilderness?—Though the question here is the same as when He fed the five thousand, they evidently now meant no more by it than that they had not the means of feeding the multitude; modestly leaving the Lord to decide what was to be done. And this will the more appear from His not now trying them, as before, by saying, "They need not depart, give ye them to eat"; but simply asking what they had, and then giving His directions. 5. And he asked them. How many loaves have ye? And they said, Seven—It was important in this case, as in the former, that the precise number of the loaves should be brought out. Thus also does the distinctness of the two miracles appear.

CHAPTER 8

1. The multitude being very great. Or rather, "There was again a great multitude." Instead of very great, I read again a great, which is the reading of many MSS. and versions. There had been such a multitude gathered together once before, who were fed in the same way. See chap. vi. 34, etc.

2. Have nothing to eat. If they had brought any provisions with them, they were now entirely expended, and they stood in immediate need of a supply.

3. For divers of them came from far. And they could not possibly reach their respective homes without perishing, unless they got food.

utterly reduced, and then he sent them away.

6. The bounty of Christ is inexhaustible. Christ repeated this miracle. His favours are renewed, as our wants and necessities are. In the former miracle, Christ used all the bread he had, which was five loaves, and fed all the guests he had, which were five thousand. He might have said, "If five loaves would feed five thousand, four may feed four thousand"; he took all the seven loaves, and fed with them the four thousand; for he would teach us to use what we have, and make the best of that which is.

7. In our Father's house there is bread enough, and to spare. Those need not fear wanting, that have Christ to live upon.

8. It is good for those that follow Christ, to keep together. Christ fed them all. Christ's sheep must abide by the flock, and verily they shall be fed.

Verses 10–21

Still Christ is upon motion; now he visits the parts of Dalmanutha. Meeting with occasions of dispute, there, and not with opportunities of doing good, he entered into the ship again (v. 13), and came back.

I. How he refused to gratify the Pharisees, who challenged him to give them a sign from heaven. They came forth on purpose to question with him, that they might ensnare him.

1. They demanded of him a sign from heaven, as if the signs he gave them on earth were not sufficient. They demanded this sign, tempting him; not in hopes that he would give it them, that they might imagine themselves to have a pretence for their infidelity.

2. He denied them their demand; He sighed deeply in his spirit, v. 12. He groaned (so some), being grieved for the hardness of their hearts. It troubles him, that sinners should thus stand in their own light, and put a bar in their own door. He expostulates with them upon this demand; "Why doth this generation seek after a sign; this generation, that is so unworthy to have the gospel brought to it, and to have any sign accompanying it; this generation, that has had such plenty of sensible and merciful signs given them in the cure of their sick? What an absurdity is it for them to desire a sign!" (2) He refuses to answer their demand; Verily, I say unto you, there shall no sign be given to this generation. He denied them, and then left them, as men not fit to be talked with; if they will not be convinced, they shall not; leave them to their strong delusions.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

9. And they that had eaten were about four thousand: and he sent them away—Had not our Lord distinctly referred, in this very chapter and in two successive sentences, to the feeding of the five thousand and of the four thousand as two distinct miracles, many critics would have insisted that they were but two different representations of one and the same miracle, as they do of the two expulsions of the buyers and sellers from the temple, at the beginning and end of our Lord's ministry. But even in spite of what our Lord says, it is painful to find such men as NEANDER endeavoring to identify the two miracles. The localities, though both on the eastern side of the lake, were different; the time was different; the preceding and following circumstances were different; the period during which the people continued fasting was different—in the one case not even one entire day, in the other three days; the number fed was different—five thousand in the one case, in the other four thousand; the number of the loaves was different—five in the one case, in the other seven; the number of the fishes in the one case is definitely stated by all the four Evangelists—two; in the other case both give them indefinitely—"a few small fishes"; in the one case the multitude were commanded to sit down "upon the green grass"; in the other "on the ground"; in the one case the number of the baskets taken up filled with the fragments was twelve, in the other seven; but more than all, perhaps, because apparently quite incidental, in the one case the name given to the kind of baskets used is the same in all the four narratives—the cophinus (see on ch. 6:43); in the other case the name given to the kind of baskets used, while it is the same in both the narratives, is quite different—the spuris, a basket large enough to hold a man's body, for Paul was let down in one of these from the wall of Damascus (Acts 9:25). It might be added, that in the one case the people, in a frenzy of enthusiasm, would have taken Him by force to make Him a king; in the other case no such excitement is recorded. In view of these things, who could have believed that these were one and the same miracle, even if the Lord Himself had not expressly distinguished them?

Sign from Heaven Sought (vss. 10-13). 10. And straightway he entered into a ship—"into the ship," or "embarked." with his disciples, and came into the parts of Dalmanutha—In Matthew (15:39) it is "the coasts of Magdala." Magdala and Dalmanutha were both on the western shore of the lake, and probably not far apart. From the former the surname "Magdalene" was probably taken, to denote the residence of Mary Magdalene. Dalmanutha may have been a village, but it cannot now be identified with certainty. 11. seeking of him a sign from heaven, tempting him—not in the least desiring evidence for their conviction, but hoping to entrap Him. The first part of the answer is given in Matthew alone (16:2, 3): "He answered and said unto them, When it is evening, ye say, It will be fair weather; for the sky is red. And in the morning, It will be foul weather to-day: for the sky is red and lowering [sullen, gloomy]. Hypocrites! ye can discern the face of the sky; but can ye not discern the signs of the times?" The same simplicity of purpose and careful observation of the symptoms of approaching events which they showed in common things would enable them to "discern the signs of the times"—or rather "seasons," to which the prophets pointed for the manifestation of the Messiah. The scepter had departed from Judah; Daniel's seventy weeks were expiring, etc.; and many other significant indications of the close of the old economy, and preparations for a freer and more comprehensive one, might have been discerned. But all was lost upon them. 12. And he sighed deeply in his spirit—The language is very strong. These glimpses into the interior of the Redeemer's heart, in which our Evangelist abounds, are more precious than rubies. The state of the Pharisaic heart, which prompted this desire for a fresh sign, went to His very soul. and saith, Why doth this generation—"this wicked and adulterous generation" (Matt. 16:4)—seek after a sign?—when they have had such abundant evidence already. There shall no sign be given unto this generation—lit., "If there shall be given to this generation a sign"; a Jewish way of expressing a solemn and peremptory determination to the contrary (cf. Heb. 4:5; Ps. 95:11, Margin). "A generation incapable of appreciating such demonstrations shall not be gratified with them." In Matthew 16:4 He added, "but the sign of the prophet Jonas." (See on Matthew 12:39, 40.) 13. And he left them—no doubt with tokens of displeasure.

7. And they had a few small fishes. This is not noticed in the parallel place, Matt. xv. 36.

They did all eat, and were filled. "They were satisfied." The husks of worldly pleasures may fill the man, but cannot satisfy the soul.

Four thousand. Let the poor learn from these miracles to trust in God for support. Whatever His ordinary providence denies, His miraculous power will supply.

He sent away the multitude. But not before He had instructed their souls, and fed and healed their bodies.

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

Brethren, who knows what may come out of seven loaves and a few small fishes? Yea, the enemies may do what they like; they may preach what they please; they may take away one pulpit after another from the orthodox; they may bury us under the rubbish of evolution and false philosophy; but we shall rise again. These small clouds will soon blow over. There may not remain one single sound expounder of the gospel; but as long as God lives, the gospel will not die. Its power may slumber, but ere long it shall awake out of sleep, and cry like a mighty man who shouteth by reason of wine. As long as we have one match left, we can yet set the world on fire. As long as one Bible remains, the empire of Satan is in danger. Only barley loaves and a few small fishes were in the possession of the apostolic company; but Jesus found them and began to work with them.—The Treasury of the New Testament

10. Dalmanutha. See the note on Matt. xv. 39.

The coasts of Magdala. In the parallel place, Mark viii. 10, this place is called Dalmanutha. Either Magdala was formed by a transposition of letters from Dalman, to which the Syriac termination atha had been added, or the one of these names refers to the country and the other to a town in that neighborhood.

Shew them a sign. These sects, however opposed among themselves, most cordially unite in their opposition to Christ and His truth. Tempting . . . him. Feigning a desire to have His doctrine fully proved to them, that they might credit it, and become His disciples, but having no other design than to betray and ruin Him.

12. And he sighed deeply in his spirit. Or "having deeply groaned"—so the word properly means. He was exceedingly affected at their obstinacy and hardness of heart. See Matt. xvi. 1-4.

Wicked and adulterous generation. The Jewish people are represented in the Sacred Writings as married to the Most High; but, like a disloyal wife, forsaking their true Husband, and uniting themselves to Satan and sin. Seeketh after a sign, "seeketh sign upon sign," or still "another sign." Our blessed Lord had already wrought miracles sufficient to demonstrate both His divine mission and His divinity; only one was further necessary to take away the scandal of His cross and death, to fulfill the Scriptures, and to establish the Christian religion; and that was His resurrection from the dead, which, He here states, was typified in the case of Jonah.

MATTHEW HENRY

II. How he warned his disciples against the leaven of the Pharisees and of Herod. Observe here,

1. What the caution was (v. 15); "Take heed, beware, lest ye partake of the leaven of the Pharisees." Matthew adds, and of the Sadducees; Mark adds, and of Herod. The leaven of both was the same; they were unsatisfied with the signs they had, and would have others of their own devising; "Take heed of this leaven" (saith Christ), "be convinced by the miracles ye have seen."

2. How they misunderstood this caution. It seems, at their putting to sea this time, they had forgotten to take bread, and had not in their ship more than one loaf, v. 14. They reasoned among themselves, what should be the meaning of this caution, and concluded "It is because we have no bread." They reasoned it, they disputed about it; one said, "It was owing to you"; and the other said, "It was owing to you, that we are so ill provided for this voyage." Thus distrust of God makes Christ's disciples quarrel among themselves.

3. The reproof Christ gave them for their uneasiness in this matter. The reproof is given with some warmth, for he knew their hearts, and knew they needed to be thus soundly chidden; "Perceive ye not yet, neither understand? Have ye your hearts yet hardened? Having eyes, see ye not? Having ears, hear ye not? How strangely stupid and senseless are ye! Do ye not remember when I broke the five loaves among the five thousand, and soon after, the seven loaves among the four thousand? Do ye not remember how many baskets full ye took up of the fragments?" Yes, they did remember, and could tell that they took up twelve baskets full one time, and seven another; "Why, then," saith he, "how is it that ye do not understand? As if he that multiplied five loaves, and seven, could not multiply one." They seemed to suspect that that one was not matter enough to work upon. As if it were not all alike to the Lord, to save by many or few, and as easy to make one loaf to feed five thousand as five. It was therefore proper to remind them, not only of the sufficiency, but of the overplus, of the former meals. The experiences we have had of God's goodness to us in the way of duty greatly aggravate our distrust of him. Our not understanding of the true intent and meaning of God's favours to us, is equivalent to our not remembering of them. We are therefore overwhelmed with present cares and distrusts, because we do not understand, and remember, what we have known and seen of the power and goodness of our Lord Jesus. When we thus forget the works of God, and distrust him, we should chide ourselves severely for it, as Christ doth his disciples here.

This cure is related only by this evangelist.

I. Here is a blind man brought to Christ by his friends, with a desire that he would touch him, v. 22. Here appears the faith of those that brought him; but the man himself showed not that earnestness for, or expectation of, a cure that other blind men did. If those that are spiritually blind, do not pray for themselves, yet let their friends and relations pray for them, that Christ would be pleased to touch them.

II. Here is Christ leading this blind man, v. 23. He did not bid his friends lead him, he himself took him by the hand, and led him. Never had poor blind man such a Leader. He led him out of the town. Had he herein only designed privacy, he might have led him into a house, into an inner chamber, and have cured him there. Perhaps Christ took the blind man out of the town, that he might have a larger prospect in the open fields, to try his sight with, than he could have in the close streets.

III. Here is the cure of the blind man. In this cure we may observe, 1. That Christ used a sign; he spat on his eyes, and put his hand upon him. He could have cured him, as he did others, with a word, but thus he was pleased to assist his faith which was very weak, and to help him against his unbelief. 2. That the cure was wrought gradually, which was not usual in Christ's miracles. He asked him if he saw aught, v. 23. And he looked up; and he said, I see men as trees walking; he could not distinguish men from trees, otherwise than that he could discern them to move. He had some glimmerings of sight, and betwixt him and the sky could perceive a man erect like a tree. 3. It was soon completed;

14-21). 14. Now the disciples had forgotten to take bread, neither had they in the ship with them more than one loaf—This is another example of that graphic circumstantiality which gives such a charm to this briefest of the four Gospels. The circumstance of the "one loaf" only remaining, as WEBSTER and WILKINSON remark, was more suggestive of their Master's recent miracles than the entire absence of provisions. 15. And he charged them, saying, Take heed, beware of the leaven of the Pharisees—"and of the Sadducees" (Matt. 16:6). and of the leaven of Herod—The teaching or "doctrine" (Matt. 16:12) of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees was quite different, but both were equally pernicious; and the Herodians, though rather a political party, were equally envenomed against our Lord's spiritual teaching. See on Matthew 12:14. The penetrating and diffusive quality of leaven, for good or bad, is the ground of the comparison. 16. And they reasoned among themselves, saying, It is because we have no bread—But a little while ago He was tried with the obduracy of the Pharisees; now He is tried with the obtuseness of His own disciples. The nine questions following each other in rapid succession (vss. 17-21) show how deeply He was hurt at this want of spiritual apprehension, and worse still, their low thoughts of Him, as if He would utter so solemn a warning on so petty a subject. It will be seen, however, from the very form of their conjecture, "It is because we have no bread," and our Lord's astonishment that they should not by that time have known better with what He took up His attention—that He ever left the whole care for His own temporal wants to the Twelve: that He did this so entirely, that finding they were reduced to their last loaf they felt as if unworthy of such a trust, and could not think but that the same thought was in their Lord's mind which was pressing upon their own; but that in this they were so far wrong that it hurt His feelings—sharp just in proportion to His love—that such a thought of Him should have entered their minds! Who that, like angels, "desire to look into these things" will not prize such glimpses above gold? 17. have ye your heart yet hardened?—How strong an expression to use of true-hearted disciples! See on ch. 6:52. 18. Having eyes, see ye not? and having ears, hear ye not?—See on Matthew 13:13. and do ye not remember? 19. When I brake the five loaves among—the—five thousand, how many baskets full of fragments took ye up? . . . 21. How is it that ye do not understand?—"do not understand that the warning I gave you could not have been prompted by any such petty consideration as the want of loaves in your scrip." Profuse as were our Lord's miracles, we see from this that they were not wrought at random, but that He carefully noted their minutest details, and desired that this should be done by those who witnessed, as doubtless by all who read the record of them. Even the different kind of baskets used at the two miraculous feedings, so carefully noted in the two narratives, are here also referred to; the one smaller, of which there were twelve, the other much larger, of which there were seven.

Blind Man at Bethsaida Restored to Sight (vss. 22-26). 22. And he cometh to Bethsaida—Bethsaida-Julias, on the northeast side of the lake, whence after this He proceeded to Cæsarea Philippi (vs. 27). and they bring a blind man unto him, and besought him to touch him—See on ch. 7:32. 23. And he took the blind man by the hand, and led him out of the town—Of the deaf and dumb man it is merely said that "He took him aside" (ch. 7:33); but this blind man He led by the hand out of the town, doing it Himself rather than employing another—great humility, exclaims BENGEL—that He might gain his confidence and raise his expectation. and when he had spit on his eyes—the organ affected—see on ch. 7:33. and put his hands upon him, he asked him if he saw aught. 24. And he looked up, and said, I see men as trees, walking—This is one of the cases in which one edition of what is called the received text differs from another. That which is decidedly the best supported, and has also internal evidence on its side is this: "I see men; for I see [them] as trees walking"—i.e., he could distinguish them from trees only by their motion; a minute mark of truth in the narrative, as ALFORD observes, describing how human objects had appeared to him during that gradual failing of sight which had ended in blindness.

14. Now the disciples had forgotten to take bread. See all this, to v. 21, explained at large on Matt. xvi. 4-12.

Beware of the leaven. Bad doctrines act in the soul as leaven does in meal; they assimilate the whole spirit to their own nature. A man's particular creed has a greater influence on his tempers and conduct than most are aware of. Pride, hypocrisy, and worldly-mindedness, which constituted the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees, ruin the major part of the world.

They reasoned. For, as Lightfoot observes, the term leaven was very rarely used among the Jews to signify doctrine, and therefore the disciples did not immediately apprehend His meaning.

Do ye not yet understand . . . the five loaves . . . Neither the seven? How astonishing is it that these men should have any fear of lacking bread, after having seen the two miracles which our blessed Lord alludes to above!

They now perceived that He warned them against the superstition of the Pharisees, which produced hypocrisy, pride, envy, etc., and the false doctrine of the Sadducees, which denied the existence of a spiritual world, the immortality of the soul, the resurrection of the body, and the providence of God.

23. And he took the blind man by the hand. Giving him proof of His readiness to help him, and thus preparing him for the cure which He was about to work. Led him out of the town. Thus showing the inhabitants that He considered them unworthy of having another miracle wrought among them. When he had spit on his eyes. There is a similar transaction to this mentioned in John ix. 6. It is likely this was done merely to separate the eyelids, as in certain cases of blindness they are found always gummed together. It required a miracle to restore the sight, and this was done in consequence of Christ having laid His hands upon the blind man. It required no miracle to separate the eyelids, and therefore natural means only were employed—this was done by rubbing them with spittle, but whether by Christ or by the blind man is not absolutely certain. See on chap. vii. 33.

24. I see men as trees, walking. His sight was so imperfect that he could not distinguish between men and trees, only by the motion of the former.

Christ never doeth his work by the halves. He put his hands again upon his eyes, to disperse the remaining darkness, and then bade him look up again, and he saw every man clearly, v. 25. Now Christ took this way, (1) Because he would not tie himself to a method. He did not cure by rote. Providence gains the same end in different ways, that men may attend its motions with an implicit faith. (2) Because it should be to the patient according to his faith; and perhaps this man's faith was at first very weak, but afterward gathered strength, and accordingly his cure was. (3) Thus Christ would show how, and in what method, those are healed by his grace, who by nature are spiritually blind; at first, their knowledge is confused, they see men as trees walking; but like the light of the morning, it shines more and more to the perfect day, and then they see all things clearly.

IV. The directions Christ gave the man he had cured, not to tell it to any in the town of Bethsaida, nor so much as to go into the town. Christ doth not forbid him to tell it to others, but he must not tell it to any in the town. Slighting Christ's favours is forfeiting them; and Christ will make those know the worth of their privileges by the want of them, that would not know them otherwise. They will not see, and therefore shall not see.

We have read a great deal of the doctrine Christ preached, and the miracles he wrought. It is now time for us to pause a little, and to consider what these things mean. What shall we think of them? Is the record of these things designed only for an amusement, or to furnish us with matter for discourse? No, certainly these things are written, that we may believe that Jesus is the Christ the Son of God (John xx. 31). Three things we are here taught to infer from the miracles Christ wrought.

I. They prove that he is the Son of God, and Saviour of the world. This his disciples, who were the eye-witnesses of those works, here profess their belief of.

1. Christ enquired of them: Who do men say that I am? v. 27. Though it is a small thing for us to be judged of men, yet it may sometimes do us good to know what people say of us, not that we may seek our own glory, but that we may hear of our faults.

2. The account they gave him, was such as plainly intimated the high opinion the people had of him. Though they came short of the truth, yet they were convinced by his miracles that he was an extraordinary person, with a divine commission. None of the people said that he was a Deceiver, but some said that he was John Baptist, others Elias, others one of the prophets, v. 28. All agreed that he was one risen from the dead.

3. The account they gave him of their own sentiments concerning him. But whom say ye that I am? To this they have an answer ready, Thou art the Christ, the Messiah often promised, and long expected, v. 29. This they knew, and must shortly publish and maintain; but for the present they must keep it secret (v. 30), till the proof of it was completed, and they were completely qualified to maintain it.

II. These miracles of Christ take off the offence of the cross, and assure us that Christ was, in it, not conquered, but a Conqueror. Now that the disciples are convinced that Jesus is the Christ, they may bear to hear of his sufferings, v. 31.

1. Christ taught his disciples that he must suffer many things, Though they had got over the vulgar error of the Messiah's being a temporal Prince, yet still they retained it, so far as to expect that he would shortly restore the kingdom to Israel. Christ here gives them a prospect of the contrary, that he must be rejected of the elders, and the chief priests, and the scribes; that, instead of being crowned, he must be killed, he must be crucified, and after three days he must rise again to a heavenly life, and to be no more in this world. This he spoke openly (v. 32). He said it freely and plainly, and did not wrap it up in ambiguous expressions. He spoke it cheerfully and without any terror, and would have them to hear it so: he spoke that saying boldly, as one that not only knew he must suffer and die, but made it his own act and deed.

2. Peter opposed it; He took him, and began to rebuke him. Here Peter showed more love than discretion, a zeal for Christ, and his safety, but not according to knowledge. He took hold of him, as it were to stop and hinder him, took him in his arms, and embraced him (so some understand it); or he took him aside privately, and began to rebuke him. This was not the language of the least authority, but of the greatest affection. Our Lord Jesus allowed his disciples to be free with him, but Peter here took too

25. After that he put his hands again upon his eyes, and made him look up; and he was restored, and saw every man clearly—Perhaps the one operation perfectly restored the eyes, while the other imparted immediately the faculty of using them. It is the only recorded example of a progressive cure, and it certainly illustrates similar methods in the spiritual kingdom. Of the four recorded cases of sight restored, all the patients save one either came or were brought to the Physician. In the case of the man born blind, the Physician came to the patient. So some seek and find Christ; of others He is found who seek Him not.

26. Neither go into the town, nor tell it to any in the town—Besides the usual reasons against going about "blazing the matter," retirement in this case would be salutary to himself.

27-38. PETER'S NOBLE CONFESSION OF CHRIST—OUR LORD'S FIRST EXPLICIT ANNOUNCEMENT OF HIS APPROACHING SUFFERINGS, DEATH, AND RESURRECTION—HIS REBUKE OF PETER, AND WARNING TO ALL THE TWELVE. (= Matt. 16:13-27; Luke 9:18-26.) For the exposition, see on Matthew 16:13-28.

he asked his disciples—"by the way," says Mark (8: 27), and "as He was alone praying," says Luke (9: 18). saying, Whom—or more grammatically, "Who"—do men say that I the Son of man am?—(or, "that the Son of man is"—the recent editors omitting here the me of Mark and Luke; though the evidence seems pretty nearly balanced)—i.e., 'What are the views generally entertained of Me, the Son of man, after going up and down among them so long?' He had now closed the first great stage of His ministry, and was just entering on the last dark one. His spirit, burdened, sought relief in retirement, not only from the multitude, but even for a season from the Twelve. He retreated into "the secret place of the Most High," pouring out His soul "in supplications and prayers, with strong crying and tears" (Heb. 5:7). On rejoining His disciples, and as they were pursuing their quiet journey, He asked them this question. And they said, Some say that thou art John the Baptist—risen from the dead. So that Herod Antipas was not singular in his surmise (ch. 14:1, 2). some, Elias—(Cf. Mark 6:15). and others, Jeremias—Was this theory suggested by a supposed resemblance between the "Man of Sorrows" and "the weeping prophet"? or one of the prophets—or, as Luke (9: 8) expresses it, "that one of the old prophets is risen again." In another report of the popular opinions which Mark (6:15) gives us, it is thus expressed, "That it is a prophet [or], as one of the prophets": in other words, That He was a prophetical person, resembling those of old.

From that time forth began Jesus to show unto his disciples—i.e., with an explicitness and frequency He had never observed before—how that he must go unto Jerusalem and suffer many things "and be rejected," (Matthew and Mark)—of the elders and chief priests and scribes—not as before, merely by not receiving Him, but by formal deeds. and be killed, and be raised again the third day—Mark (8:32) adds, that "He spake that saying openly"—"explicitly," or "without disguise."

Then Peter took him—aside, apart from the rest; presuming on the distinction just conferred on him; showing how unexpected and distasteful to them all was the announcement. and began to rebuke him—affectionately, yet with a certain generous indignation, to chide Him.

ADAM CLARKE

25. And saw every man clearly. Our Lord could have restored this man to sight in a moment; but He chose to do it in the way mentioned in the text, to show that He is a Sovereign of His own graces; and to point out that, however insignificant means may appear when He chooses to work by them; and that, however small the first manifestations of mercy may be, they are nevertheless the beginnings of the fullness of the blessings of the gospel of peace.

26. He sent him away to his house. So it appears that this person did not belong to Bethsaida, for in going to his house he was not to enter into the village. This miracle is not mentioned by any other of the Evangelists. It affords another proof that Mark did not abridge Matthew's Gospel.

27. And Jesus went out. See on Matt. xvi. 13-20.

And he spake that saying. Concerning the certainty and necessity of His sufferings—openly: "with great plainness, confidence, or emphasis," so that the disciples now began fully to understand Him. This is an additional observation of Mark. For Peter's reproof, see on Matt. xvi. 22, etc.

Then Peter took him. "Took Him up"—suddenly interrupted Him, as it were calling Him to order. Be it far from thee, Lord. "Be merciful to thyself, Lord." Peter knew that Christ had power sufficient to preserve himself from all the power and malice of the Jews, and wished Him to exert that in His own behalf which He had often exerted in the behalf of others.

great a liberty.

3. Christ checked him for his opposition (v. 33); He turned about, and looked on his disciples, to see if the rest of them were of the same mind, and he said, Get thee behind me, Satan. Peter little thought to have had such a sharp rebuke, but perhaps expected as much commendation now for his love as he had lately had for his faith. Christ knows what manner of spirit we are of, when we ourselves do not. (1) Peter spoke as one that did not rightly understand the purposes and counsels of God. The most potent enemies could not overpower him whom diseases and deaths, whom winds and waves and devils themselves, were forced to obey and yield to. He looked upon his death only as a martyrdom which he thought might be prevented. He knew not that the thing was necessary for the glory of God, the destruction of Satan, and the salvation of man, that the Captain of our salvation must be made perfect through sufferings. The wisdom of man is perfect folly, when it pretends to give measures to the divine counsels. The cross of Christ was to some a stumbling-block, and to others foolishness. (2) Peter spoke as one that did not rightly understand the nature of Christ's kingdom; he took it to be temporal and human, whereas it is spiritual and divine. Thou savourest not the things that are of God, but those that are of men. Peter seemed to mind more the things that relate to the lower world, than those which relate to the upper world, and the life to come. Minding the things of men more than the things of God, and his glory and kingdom, is a very great sin, and the root of much sin, and very common among Christ's disciples. Thou art not wise (so it may be read) in the things of God, but in the things of men. It seems policy to shun trouble, but if with that we shun duty it will be folly in the end.

III. These miracles of Christ should engage us all to follow him, whatever it cost us, not only as they were confirmations of his mission, but as they were explications of his design; plainly intimating that by his Spirit he would do that for our blind, deaf, lame, leprous, diseased, possessed souls, which he did for the bodies of those many who in those distresses applied themselves to him. This is written, that we may believe that he is the great Physician of souls, and may become his patients. He called all the people to him, to hear this. This is that which all are concerned to know, and consider, if they expect Christ should heal their souls.

1. They must not be indulgent of the ease of the body; for (v. 34), "Whosoever will come after me, let him deny himself, and live a life of self-denial; let him not pretend to be his own physician, and let him take up his cross, and thus let him continue to follow me." Those that will be Christ's patients must attend on him, converse with him, receive instruction and reproof from him, and must resolve they will never forsake him.

2. They must not be solicitous, no, not for the life of the body, when they cannot keep it without quitting Christ, v. 35. Are we invited by the words and works of Christ to follow him? Let us sit down, and count the cost, whether we can prefer our advantages by Christ before life itself. When the devil is drawing away disciples and servants after him, he conceals the worst of it. What there is of trouble and danger in the service of Christ, he tells us of it before, and is not afraid that we should know the worst; because the advantages of his service abundantly suffice to balance the discouragements, if we will but impartially set the one over against the other.

(1) We must not dread the loss of our lives in the cause of Christ (v 35); Whosoever will save his life, by declining Christ, or by disowning him after he has in profession come to Christ, he shall lose it, and all his hopes of eternal life; such a bad bargain will he make for himself. But whosoever shall lose his life, shall be truly willing to lose it, when he cannot keep it without denying Christ, he shall save it, he shall be an unspeakable gainer. It is looked upon to be some kind of recompence to those who lose their lives in the service of their prince and country, to have their memories honoured and their families provided for; but what is that to the recompence which Christ makes in eternal life to all that die for him?

(2) We must dread the loss of our souls (v. 36, 37); For what shall it profit a man, if he should gain the whole world, by denying Christ, and lose his own soul? "True it is," said Bishop Hooper, the night before he suffered martyrdom, "that life is sweet, and death is bitter, but eternal death is more bitter, and eternal life is more sweet." The gain of all the world in sin, is not sufficient to countervail the ruin of the soul by sin.

What that is that men do, to save their lives, and

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

But he turned, and said—in the hearing of the rest; for Mark (8:33) expressly says, "When He had turned about and looked on His disciples, He rebuked Peter"; perceiving that he had but boldly uttered what others felt, and that the check was needed by them also. Get thee behind me, Satan—the same words as He had addressed to the Tempter (Luke 4:8); for He felt in it a satanic lure, a whisper from hell, to move Him from His purpose to suffer. So He shook off the Serpent, then coiling around Him, and "felt no harm" (Acts 28:5). How quickly has the "rock" turned to a devil! The fruit of divine teaching the Lord delighted to honor in Peter; but the mouthpiece of hell, which he had in a moment of forgetfulness become, the Lord shook off with horror. thou art an offence—a stumbling block—unto me: 'Thou playest the Tempter, casting a stumbling block in My way to the Cross. Could it succeed, where wert thou? and how should the Serpent's head be bruised?' for thou savourest not—thou thinkest not—the things that be of God, but those that be of men—"Thou art carried away by human views of the way of setting up Messiah's kingdom, quite contrary to those of God." This was kindly said, not to take off the sharp edge of the rebuke, but to explain and justify it, as it was evident Peter knew not what was in the bosom of his rash speech.

Then said Jesus unto his disciples—Mark (8:34) says, "When He had called the people unto Him, with His disciples also, He said unto them"—turning the rebuke of one into a warning to all.

If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me. For whosoever will save—is minded to save, or bent on saving—his life shall lose it, and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it—See on ch. 10:38, 39. "A suffering and dying Messiah liketh you ill; but what if His servants shall meet the same fate? They may not; but who follows Me must be prepared for the worst." For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose—or forfeit—his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?—Instead of these weighty words, which we find in Mark also, it is thus expressed in Luke: "If he gain the whole world, and lose himself, or be cast away," or better, "If he gain the whole world, and destroy or forfeit himself." How awful is the stake as here set forth! If a man makes the present world—in its various forms of riches, honors, pleasures, and such like—the object of supreme pursuit, be it that he gains the world; yet along with it he forfeits his own soul. Not that any ever did, or ever will gain the whole world—a very small portion of it, indeed, falls to the lot of the most successful of the world's votaries—but to make the extravagant concession, that by giving himself entirely up to it, a man gains the whole world; yet, setting over against this gain the forfeiture of his soul—necessarily following the surrender of his whole heart to the world—what is he profited? But, if not the whole world, yet possibly something else may be conceived as an equivalent for the soul. Well, what is it?—"Or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" Thus, in language the weightiest, because the simplest, does our Lord shut up His hearers, and all who shall read these words to the end of the world, to the priceless value to every man of his own soul. In Mark and Luke the following words are added: "Whosoever therefore shall be ashamed of Me and of My words [shall be ashamed of belonging to Me, and ashamed of My Gospel] in this adulterous and sinful generation" (see on ch. 12:39), "of him shall the Son of man be ashamed when He cometh in the

Get thee behind me, Satan. "Get behind Me, you adversary." This is the proper translation of the Hebrew word Satan, from which the Greek word is taken. Our blessed Lord certainly never designed that men should believe He called Peter "devil" because he, through erring affection, had wished Him to avoid that death which He predicted to himself. This translation, which is literal, takes away that harshness which before appeared in our Lord's words. Thou art an offence unto me. You are a stumbling block in My way, to impede Me in the accomplishment of the great design. Thou savourest not. That is, "do not relish," or, do not "understand or discern" the things of God—you are wholly taken up with the vain thought that My kingdom is of this world. He who opposes the doctrine of the atonement is an adversary and offense to Christ, though he be as sincere in his profession as Peter himself was.

34. Whosoever will come after me. It seems that Christ formed, on the proselytism of the Jews, the principal qualities which He required in the proselytes of His covenant. The first condition of proselytism among the Jews was that he that came to embrace their religion should come voluntarily and that neither force nor influence should be employed in this business. This is also the first condition required by Jesus Christ, and which He considers as the foundation of all the rest: "If a man be willing to come after Me." The second condition required in the Jewish proselyte was that he should perfectly renounce all his prejudices, his errors, his idolatry, and everything that concerned his false religion; and that he should entirely separate himself from his most intimate friends and acquaintances. It was on this ground that the Jews called proselytism a "new birth," and proselytes "newborn" and "new men"; and our Lord requires men to be born again, not only of water, but by the Holy Ghost. See John iii. 5. All this our Lord includes in this word, Let him deny himself. To this the following scriptures refer: Matt. x. 33; John iii. 3, 5; 2 Cor. v. 17. The third condition on which a person was admitted into the Jewish church as a proselyte was that he should submit to the yoke of the Jewish law and bear patiently the inconveniences and sufferings with which a profession of the Mosiac religion might be accompanied. Christ requires the same condition; but, instead of the yoke of the law, He brings in His own doctrine, which He calls His yoke, Matt. xi. 29; and His cross, the taking up of which not only implies a bold profession of Christ crucified, but also a cheerful submitting to all the sufferings and persecutions to which He might be exposed, and even to death itself. The fourth condition was that he should solemnly engage to continue in the Jewish religion, faithful even unto death. This condition Christ also requires; and it is comprised in this word, Let him . . . follow me.

35. For whosoever will save his life. On this and the following verses, see Matt. xvi. 24, etc.

MATTHEW HENRY

gain the world, he tells us (v. 38), Whosoever therefore shall be ashamed of me, and of my words, in his adulterous and sinful generation, of him shall the Son of man be ashamed. The disadvantage that the cause of Christ labours under in this world, is, that it is to be owned and professed in an adulterous and sinful generation. Some ages, some places, are more especially sinful, as that was in which Christ lived; in such a generation the cause of Christ is opposed and run down, and those that own it, are exposed to reproach and contempt, and everywhere ridiculed and spoken against. There are many, who, though they cannot but own that the cause of Christ is a righteous cause, are ashamed of it. They are ashamed of their relation to Christ. They cannot bear to be frowned upon and despised, and therefore throw off their profession. There is a day coming, when the cause of Christ will appear as bright and illustrious as now it appears mean and contemptible. They shall not share with him in his glory then, that were not willing to share with him in his disgrace now.

I. A prediction of Christ's kingdom now near approaching, v. 1. That which is foretold is, 1. That the kingdom of God would come, and would come so as to be seen. 2. That it would come with power, and bear down the opposition that was given to it. 3. That it would come while some now present were alive; There are some standing here, that shall not taste of death, till they see it.

II. A specimen of that kingdom in the transfiguration of Christ, six days after Christ spoke that prediction. He gives them this glimpse of his glory, to show that his sufferings were voluntary, and to prevent the offence of the cross.

1. It was on the top of a high mountain. Tradition saith, It was on the top of Mount Tabor that Christ was transfigured.

2. The witnesses of it were Peter, James, and John; these were the three that were to bear record on earth, answering to Moses, Elias, and the voice from heaven. As there are distinguishing favours which are given to disciples and not to the world, so there are to some disciples and not to others. All the saints are a people near to Christ, but some lie in his bosom. James was the first of all the twelve that died for Christ, and John survived them all, to be the last eye-witness of this glory; he bore record (John i. 14); We saw his glory: and so did Peter, 2 Pet. i. 16–18.

3. The manner of it; He was transfigured before them. See what a great change human bodies are capable of, when God is pleased to put an honour upon them. His raiment became shining, exceeding white as snow, beyond what the fuller's art could do toward whitening it.

4. His companions in this glory were Moses and Elias (v. 4); They appeared talking with him, to testify to him. Moses and Elias lived at a great distance of time one from another, but that breaks no squares in heaven, where the first shall be last, and the last first, that is, all one in Christ.

5. The great delight that the disciples took in seeing this sight, and hearing this discourse, is expressed by Peter; He said, Master, It is good for us to be here, v. 5. Though Christ was transfigured, and was in discourse with Moses and Elias, yet he gave Peter leave to speak to him. Many, when they are in their greatness, oblige their friends to keep their distance; but even to the glorified Jesus true believers have access with boldness. Even in this heavenly discourse there was room for Peter to put in a word; and this is it, "Lord, it is good to be here, for let us make tabernacles." Gracious souls reckon it good to be in communion with Christ, good to be in the mount with him. If it is good to be with Christ transfigured only upon a mountain with Moses and Elias, how good will it be to be with Christ glorified in heaven with all the saints! But observe, While Peter was for staying here, he forgot what need there was of the presence of Christ among the people. At this very time, the other disciples wanted them greatly, v. 14. When it is well with us, we are apt to be mindless of others. It was a weakness in Peter to prefer private communion with God before public usefulness. Peter talked of making three distinct tabernacles for Moses, Elias, and Christ, which was not well-contrived. One tabernacle will hold them all; they dwell together in unity. But whatever was incongruous in what he said, he may be excused, for they were all sore afraid; and he, for his part, wist not what to say (v. 6).

6. The voice that came from heaven, was an attestation of Christ's mediatorship, v. 7. There was a cloud glory of His Father, with the holy angels" (Mark 8: 38; Luke 9:26). He will render back to that man his own treatment, disowning him before the most august of all assemblies, and putting him to "shame and everlasting contempt" (Dan. 12:2). "O shame," exclaims BENGEL, "to be put to shame before God, Christ, and angels!" The sense of shame is founded on our love of reputation, which causes instinctive aversion to what is fitted to lower it, and was given us as a preservative from all that is properly shameful. To be lost to shame is to be nearly past hope. (Zeph. 3:5; Jer. 6:15; 3:3.) But when Christ and "His words" are unpopular, the same instinctive desire to stand well with others begets that temptation to be ashamed of Him which only the expulsive power of a higher affection can effectually counteract. For the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father with his angels—in the splendor of His Father's authority and with all His angelic ministers, ready to execute His pleasure.

VSS. 1-13. JESUS IS TRANSFIGURED—CONVERSATION ABOUT ELIAS. (= Matt. 16:28-17:13; Luke 9: 27-36.) See Luke 9:27-36.

not taste of death till they see the kingdom of God—"see it come with power" (Mark 9:1); or see "the Son of man coming in His kingdom" (Matt. 16:28). The reference, beyond doubt, is to the firm establishment and victorious progress, in the lifetime of some then present, of that new Kingdom of Christ, which was destined to work the greatest of all changes on this earth, and be the grand pledge of His final coming in glory.

Peter, James, and John—partners before in secular business; now sole witnesses of the resurrection of Jairus' daughter (Mark 5:37), the transfiguration, and the agony in the garden (Mark 14:33). a mountain—not Tabor, according to long tradition, with which the facts ill comport, but some one near the lake.

-Before He cried He was answered, and while He was yet speaking He was heard. Blessed interruption to prayer this! Thanks to God, transfiguring manifestations are not quite strangers here. Ofttimes in the deepest depths, out of groanings which cannot be uttered, God's dear children are suddenly transported to a kind of heaven upon earth, and their soul is made as the chariots of Amminadab. Their prayers fetch down such light, strength, holy gladness, as make their face to shine, putting a kind of celestial radiance upon it (II Corinthians 3:18, with Exod. 34:29-35). raiment white . . .—Matthew says, "His face did shine as the sun" (17:2), and Mark says "His raiment became shining, exceeding white as snow, so as no fuller on earth can white them" (9:2). The light, then, it would seem, shone not upon Him from without, but out of Him from within; He was all irradiated, was in one blaze of celestial glory. What a contrast to that "visage more marred than men, and His form than the sons of men!" (Isa. 52:14).
there talked with him two men . . . Moses and Elias . . . appeared in glory—"Who would have believed these were not angels had not their human names been subjoined?" [BENGEL]. (Cf. Acts 1:10; Mark 16:5.) Moses represented "the law," Elijah "the prophets," and both together the whole testimony of the Old Testament Scriptures, and the Old Testament saints, to Christ; now not borne in a book, but by living men, not to a coming, but a come Messiah, visibly, for they "appeared," and audibly, for they "spake." spake—"were speaking."

ADAM CLARKE

38. Whosoever therefore shall be ashamed of me. Our Lord hints here at one of the principal reasons of the incredulity of the Jews—they saw nothing in the person of Jesus Christ which corresponded to the pompous notions which they had formed of the Messiah. And of my words. This was another subject of offense to the Jews: the doctrine of the Cross must be believed; a suffering Messiah must be acknowledged; and poverty and affliction must be borne; and death, perhaps, suffered in consequence of becoming His disciples.

1. There be some. This verse properly belongs to the preceding chapter, and to the preceding discourse. It is in this connection in Matt. xvi. 27-28. See the notes there.

2. And after six days Jesus taketh with him Peter. For a full account of the nature and design of the Transfiguration, see on Matt. xvii. 1, etc. An high mountain. I have conjectured, Matt. xvii. 1, that this was one of the mountains of Galilee; some say Hermon, some Tabor.

Peter, James, and John. He chose those that they might be witnesses of His transfiguration, two or three witnesses being required by the Scripture to substantiate any fact. The same three were made witnesses of His agony in the garden, chap. xxvi. 37. An high mountain. This was one of the mountains of Galilee, but whether Mount Tabor or not is uncertain. Some think it was Mount Hermon. St. Luke says Christ and His disciples went up into the mountain to pray, chap. ix. 28.

Was transfigured. That fullness of the Godhead which dwelt bodily in Christ now shone forth through the human nature, and manifested to His disciples not only that divinity which Peter had before confessed, chap. xvi. 16, but also the glorious resurrection body, in which they should exist in the presence of God to eternity.

Moses and Elias. Elijah came from heaven in the same body which he had upon earth, for he was translated, and did not see death, 2 Kings ii. 11. And the body of Moses was probably raised again as a pledge of the resurrection. It was a constant and prevalent tradition among the Jews that both Moses and Elijah should appear in the times of the Messiah, and to this very tradition the disciples refer, v. 10. We may conceive that the law in the person of Moses, the great Jewish legislator, and the prophets in the person of Elijah, the chief of the prophets, came now to do homage to Jesus Christ, and to render up their authority into His hands, as He was the End of the law and the grand Subject of the predictions of the prophets. This appears more particularly from what Luke says, chap. ix. 31, that Moses and Elijah conversed with our Lord on His death, which He was about to accomplish, because in it all the rites, ceremonies, and sacrifices of the law, as well as the predictions of the prophets, were fulfilled.

Then answered Peter . . . let us make here three tabernacles. That is, when he saw Moses and Elijah ready to depart from the mount, Luke ix. 33, he wished to detain them, that he might always enjoy their company with that of his Lord and Master, still supposing that Christ would set up a temporal kingdom upon earth.

A bright cloud overshadowed them. A cloud was frequently the symbol of the Divine Presence. This is my beloved Son. "This is My Son, the beloved One, in whom I have delighted," or "been well pleased." God adds His that overshadowed them. Peter had talked of making tabernacles for Christ and his friends; but while he yet spoke God created his tabernacle not made with hands. Now out of this cloud it was said, This is my beloved Son, hear him. God owns him, and accepts him, as his beloved Son.

7. The vision disappeared (v. 8); Suddenly when they had looked round about all was gone, they saw no man any more. Jesus only remained with them, and he not transfigured, but as he used to be. Christ doth not leave the soul, when extraordinary joys and comforts leave it. Christ's disciples have, and shall have, his ordinary presence with them always, even to the end of the world. Let us thank God for daily bread, and not expect a continual feast on this side heaven.

8. The discourse between Christ and his disciples, as they came down from the mount.

(1) He charged them to keep this matter very private, till he was risen from the dead, v. 9. He, being now in a state of humiliation, would have nothing publicly taken notice of, that might seem disagreeable to such a state. This enjoining of silence to the disciples, would likewise be of use to them, to prevent their boasting. It is a mortification to a man, to be tied up from telling of his advancements, and may help to hide pride from him.

(2) The disciples were at a loss what the rising from the dead should mean. Here is another thing that embarrasses them (v. 11). Why say the Scribes, Elias must first come? But Elias was gone, and Moses too. The scribes taught them to expect the person of Elias, whereas the prophecy intended one in the spirit and power of Elias.

(3) Christ gave them a key to the prophecy concerning Elias (v. 12, 13); "It is indeed prophesied that Elias will come, and will restore all things. It is also prophesied of the Son of man that he must suffer many things, and be set at nought. Though the scribes do not tell you so, the scriptures do, and you have as much reason to expect that as the other. But as to Elias, I tell you he is come; and if you consider a little, you will understand whom I mean, it is one to whom they have done whatsoever they listed." The true Elias, as well as the true Messiah promised, is come, and we are to look for no other. He is come, and hath been, and done, according as was written of him.

Verses 14-29

We have here the story of Christ's casting the devil out of a child.

I. Christ's return to his disciples, and the perplexity he found them in. Christ's glory above does not make him forget the concerns of his church below, v. 14. And he came very seasonably, when the disciples were embarrassed and run a-ground. A child possessed with a devil was brought to them, and they could not cast out the devil, whereupon the scribes triumphed as if the day were their own. He found the scribes questioning with them. Christ's return was very welcome, no doubt, to the disciples, and *un*welcome to the scribes. But particular notice is taken of its being very surprising to the people.

When they beheld him coming to them again, they were greatly amazed; and running to him, they saluted him. It is easy to give a reason why they should be glad to see him; but why were they amazed, greatly amazed, when they beheld him? Probably, there might remain something unusual in his countenance. Instead of seeming fatigued, there appeared a wonderful briskness and sprightliness in his looks, which amazed them.

II. The case which perplexed the disciples, brought before him. He asked the scribes, "What question ye with them? What is the quarrel now?" The scribes made no answer, for they were confounded at his presence; the disciples made none, for they were comforted, and now left all to him. But the father of the child opened the case, v. 17, 18. 1. His child is cloud—not one of our watery clouds, but the Shekinah-cloud (see on Matt. 23:39), the pavilion of the manifested presence of God with His people, what Peter calls "the excellent" of "magnificent glory" (II Pet. 1:17). a voice—"such a voice," says Peter emphatically; "and this voice [he adds] we heard, when we were with Him in the holy mount" (II Pet. 1:17, 18). my beloved Son . . . hear him—reverentially, implicitly, alone. Jesus was found alone—Moses and Elias are gone. Their work is done, and they have disappeared from the scene, feeling no doubt with their fellow servant the Baptist, "He must increase, but I must decrease." The cloud too is gone, and the naked majestic Christ, braced in spirit, and enshrined in the reverent affection of His disciples, is left—to suffer! kept it close—feeling, for once at least, that such things were unmeet as yet for the general gaze.

14-32. HEALING OF A DEMONIAC BOY—SECOND EXPLICIT ANNOUNCEMENT OF HIS APPROACHING DEATH AND RESURRECTION. (= Matt. 17:14-23; Luke 9:37-45.)

Healing of the Demoniac Boy (vss. 14-29). 14. And when he came to his disciples, he saw a great multitude about them, and the scribes questioning with them—This was "on the next day, when they were come down from the hill" (Luke 9:37). The Transfiguration appears to have taken place at night. In the morning, as He came down from the hill on which it took place—with Peter, and James, and John—on approaching the other nine, He found them surrounded by a great multitude, and the scribes disputing or discussing with them. No doubt these cavillers were twitting the apostles of Jesus with their inability to cure the demoniac boy of whom we are presently to hear, and insinuating doubts even of their Master's ability to do it; while they, zealous for their Master's honor, would no doubt refer to His past miracles in proof of the contrary. 15. And straightway all the people—the multitude. when they beheld him, were greatly amazed—were astounded. and running to him saluted him—The singularly strong expression of surprise, the sudden arrest of the discussion, and the rush of the multitude towards Him, can be accounted for by nothing less than something amazing in His appearance. There can hardly be any doubt that His countenance still retained traces of His transfiguration-glory. (See Exod. 34:29, 30.) So BENGEL, DE WETTE, MEYER, TRENCH, ALFORD. No wonder, if this was the case, that they not only ran to Him, but saluted Him. Our Lord, however, takes no notice of what had attracted them, and probably it gradually faded away as He drew near; but addressing Himself to the scribes, He demands the subject of their discussion, ready to meet them where they had pressed hard upon His half-instructed and as yet timid apostles. 16. And he asked the scribes, What question ye with them?—Ere they had time to reply, the father of the boy, whose case had occasioned the dispute, himself steps forward and answers the question; telling a piteous tale of deafness, and dumbness, and fits of epilepsy—ending with this, that the disciples, though entreated, could not perform the cure. 17. And one of the multitude answered, and said, Master, I have brought testimony of approbation to what was spoken of the sufferings of Christ by Moses and Elijah, thus showing that the sacrificial economy of the old covenant was in itself of no worth, but as it referred to the grand atonement which Jesus was about to make. Therefore He says, "In Him have I delighted," intimating that it was in Him alone, as typified by those sacrifices, that He had delighted through the whole course of the legal administration; and that it was only in reference to the death of His Son that He accepted the offerings and oblations made to Him under the old covenant. Hear . . . him. The disciples wished to detain Moses and Elijah that they might hear them, but God shows that the law which had been in force, and the prophets which had prophesied, until now, must all give place to Jesus; and He alone must now be attended to, as "the way, the truth, and the life," for no man could now come unto the Father but through Him.

Tell the vision to no man. See the note on chap. xvi. 20; and further observe that, as this Transfiguration was intended to show forth the final abolition of the whole ceremonial law, it was necessary that a matter which could not fail to irritate the Jewish rulers and people should be kept secret till Jesus had accomplished vision and prophecy by His death and resurrection.

Why then say the scribes that Elias must first come? As the disciples saw that Elijah returned to heaven, knowing the tradition of the elders, and the prophecy on which the tradition was founded, Mal. iv. 5-6, "Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before . . . the great and dreadful day of the Lord [shall come]: and he shall turn the hearts," it was natural enough for them to inquire what the meaning of the tradition and the intention of the prophecy were.

12. And how it is written. Rather, "as also it is written."

15. Were greatly amazed. Probably because He came so unexpectedly.

MATTHEW HENRY

possessed with a dumb spirit, and in his fits is speechless; wheresoever the fit takes him, the spirit tears him, throws him into such violent convulsions as almost pull him to pieces; and, he foams at the mouth, and gnashes with his teeth. Though the fits go off presently, yet they leave him so weak, that he pines away, is worn to a skeleton.

2. The disciples cannot give him any relief; "I desired they would cast him out, but they could not; and therefore thou couldest never have come in better time; Master, I have brought him to thee."

III. The rebuke he gave to them all (v. 19); O faithless generation, how long shall I be with you? How long shall I suffer you? Them he calls a faithless generation, and speaks as one weary of being with them, and of bearing with them. "How long shall I be among these faithless people, and suffer them?"

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

Dear friends, here is "a little window through which we may see a great matter," if we will only think of how all that solitude, and all that sorrow of uncomprehended aims, was borne lovingly and patiently, right away on to the very end, for every one of us. I know that there are many of the aspects of Christ's life in which Christ's griefs tell more on the popular apprehension; but I do not know that there is one in which the title of "The Man of Sorrows" is to all deeper thinking more pathetically vindicated than in this—the solitude of the uncomprehended and the unaccepted Christ and His pain at His disciples' faithlessness.

—Expositions of Holy Scripture

IV. The deplorable condition that the child was actually in, when he was brought to Christ, and the doleful representation which the father made of it. When the child saw Christ, he fell into a fit; The spirit straightway tore him, as if the devil would set Christ at defiance, and hoped to be too hard for him too, and to keep possession in spite of him. The child fell on the ground, and wallowed foaming.

Christ asked, How long since this came to him? And, it seems, the disease was of long standing; it came to him of a child (v. 21), which made the case the more sad, and the cure the more difficult.

V. The pressing instances which the father of the child makes with Christ for a cure (v. 22); Oft-times it hath cast him into the fire, and into the waters, to destroy him. But if thou canst do anything, have compassion on us, and help us. The leper was confident of Christ's power, but put an if upon his will (Matt. viii. 2); If thou wilt, thou canst. This poor man referred himself to his goodwill, but put an if upon his power.

unto thee my son—"mine only child" (Luke 9:38). which hath a dumb spirit—a spirit whose operation had the effect of rendering his victim speechless, and deaf also (vs. 25). In Matthew's report of the speech (17:15), the father says "he is lunatic"; this being another and most distressing effect of the possession. 18. And wheresoever he taketh him, he teareth him; and he foameth, and gnasheth with his teeth, and pineth away—rather, "becomes withered," "dried up," or "paralyzed"; as the same word is everywhere else rendered in the New Testament. Some additional particulars are given by Luke, and by our Evangelist below. "Lo," says he in Luke 9: 39, "a spirit taketh him, and he suddenly crieth out; and it teareth him that he foameth again, and bruising him hardly [or with difficulty] departeth from him." and I spake to thy disciples that they should cast him out; and they could not—Our Lord replies to the father by a severe rebuke to the disciples. As if wounded at the exposure before such a multitude, of the weakness of His disciples' faith, which doubtless He felt as a reflection on Himself, He puts them to the blush before all, but in language fitted only to raise expectation of what He Himself would do. 19. He answereth him, and saith, O faithless generation—"and perverse," or "perverted" (Matt. 17:17; Luke 9:41). how long shall I be with you? how long shall I suffer you?—language implying that it was a shame to them to want the faith necessary to perform this cure, and that it needed some patience to put up with them. It is to us surprising that some interpreters, as CHRYSOSTOM and CALVIN, should represent this rebuke as addressed, not to the disciples at all, but to the scribes who disputed with them. Nor does it much, if at all, mend the matter to view it as addressed to both, as most expositors seem to do. With BENGEL, DE WETTE, and MEYER, we regard it as addressed directly to the nine apostles who were unable to expel this evil spirit. And though, in ascribing this inability to their "want of faith" and the "perverted turn of mind" which they had drunk in with their early training, the rebuke would undoubtedly apply, with vastly greater force, to those who twitted the poor disciples with their inability, it would be to change the whole nature of the rebuke to suppose it addressed to those who had no faith at all, and were wholly perverted. It was because faith sufficient for curing this youth was to be expected of the disciples, and because they should by that time have got rid of the perversity in which they had been reared, that Jesus exposes them thus before the rest. And who does not see that this was fitted, more than anything else, to impress upon the bystanders the severe loftiness of the training He was giving to the Twelve, and the unsophisticated footing He was on with them? Bring him unto me—The order to bring the patient to Him was instantly obeyed; when, lo! as if conscious of the presence of his Divine Tormentor, and expecting to be made to quit, the foul spirit rages and is furious, determined to die hard, doing all the mischief he can to this poor child while yet within his grasp. 20. And they brought him unto him: and when he saw him, straightway the spirit tare him—Just as the man with the legion of demons, "when he saw Jesus, ran and worshipped Him" (ch. 5:6), so this demon, when he saw Him, immediately "tare him." The feeling of terror and rage was the same in both cases. and he fell on the ground, and wallowed foaming—Still Jesus does nothing, but keeps conversing with the father about the case—partly to have its desperate features told out by him who knew them best, in the hearing of the spectators; partly to let its virulence have time to show itself; and partly to deepen the exercise of the father's soul, to draw out his faith, and thus to prepare both him and the bystanders for what He was to do. 21. And he asked his father, How long is it ago since this came unto him? And he said, Of a child . . .—Having told briefly the affecting features of the case, the poor father, half dispirited by the failure of the disciples and the aggravated virulence of the malady itself in presence of their Master, yet encouraged too by what he had heard of Christ, by the severe rebuke He had given to His disciples for not having faith enough to cure the boy, and by the dignity with which He had ordered him to be brought to Him—in this mixed state of mind, he closes his description of the case with these touching words: but if thou canst do anything, have compassion on us, and help us—"us," says the father; for it was a sore family affliction. Cf. the language of the Syrophœnician woman regarding her daughter, "Lord, help me." Still nothing is done: the man is but struggling into faith: it must come a step farther. But he had to do with Him

17. A dumb spirit. That is, a demon who afflicted those in whom it dwelt with an incapacity of speaking.

18. Pineth away. By these continual torments; so he was not only deaf and dumb, but sorely tortured besides.

O faithless and perverse generation. These and the following words may be considered as spoken: (1) To the disciples, because of their unbelief, v. 20. (2) To the father of the possessed, who should have brought his son to Christ. (3) To the whole multitude, who were slow of heart to believe in Him as the Messiah, notwithstanding the miracles which He wrought.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

Do not let us forget that in this short, sharp cry of anguish—for it is that—there may be detected by the listening ear not only the tone of personal hurt, but the tone of disappointed and thwarted love. Because of their unbelief He knew that they could not receive what He desired to give them. We find Him more than once in His life hemmed in, hindered, balked of His purpose, thwarted, as I may say, in His design, simply because there was no one with a heart open to receive the rich treasure that He was ready to pour out. He had to keep it locked up in His own spirit, else it would have been wasted and spilled upon the ground.

—Expositions of Holy Scripture

20. When he saw him . . . the spirit tare him; and he fell on the ground, etc. When this demon saw Jesus, he had great rage, knowing that his time was short; and hence the extraordinary convulsions mentioned above.

22. If thou canst do any thing. I have already tried Thy disciples, and find they can do nothing in this case; but if thou hast any power, in mercy use it in our behalf.

MATTHEW HENRY

VI. The answer Christ gave to his address (v. 23); If thou canst believe, all things are possible to him that believeth. He tacitly checks the weakness of his faith. The sufferer put it upon Christ's power, If thou canst do anything; but Christ turns it upon him, and puts him upon questioning his own faith, and will have him impute the disappointment to the want of that; If thou canst believe. He graciously encourages the strength of his desire; "All things are possible to him that believes the almighty power of God, to which all things are possible." In dealing with Christ, very much is put upon our believing, and very much promised to it. Canst thou believe? Darest thou believe? If thou canst believe, it is possible that thy hard heart may be softened, thy spiritual diseases may be cured; and that, weak as thou art, thou mayest be able to hold out to the end.

VII. The profession of faith which the poor man made hereupon (v. 24); He cried out, "Lord, I believe; my cure shall not be prevented by the want of faith; Lord, I believe." He adds a prayer for grace to enable him more firmly to rely upon Christ to save; Help thou my unbelief. Those that complain of unbelief, must look up to Christ for grace to help them against it, and his grace shall be sufficient for them. "Help mine unbelief; help out what is wanting in my faith with thy grace, the strength of which is perfected in our weakness."

VIII. The cure of the child. Christ saw the people come running together, and therefore kept them in suspense no longer, but rebuked the foul spirit. 1. What the charge was which Christ gave to this unclean spirit; "Thou dumb and deaf spirit come out of him immediately, and enter no more into him. Let him not only be brought out of this fit, but let his fits never return." Whom Christ cures, he cures effectually. Satan may go out himself, and yet recover possession; but if Christ cast him out, he will keep him out. 2. How the unclean spirit took it; he grew yet more outrageous, he cried, and rent him sore, gave him such a twitch at parting, that he was as one dead. Many said, He is dead. 3. How the child was perfectly restored (v. 27); Jesus took him by the hand, took fast hold of him, and strongly bore him up, and he arose and recovered, and all was well.

IX. The reason he gave to the disciples why they could not cast out this devil. They enquired of him privately why they could not, and he told them (v. 29), This kind can come forth by nothing but prayer and fasting. The disciples must not think to do their work always with a like ease; but Christ can do that with a word's speaking, which they must prevail for the doing of by prayer and fasting.

Verses 30–40

I. Christ foretells his own approaching sufferings. He passed through Galilee, and would not that any man should know it (v. 30). The time of his sufferings drew nigh, and therefore he was willing to converse only with his disciples, to prepare them for the approaching trial, v. 31.

who breaks not the bruised reed, and who knew how to inspire what He demanded. The man had said to Him, "If Thou canst do." 23. Jesus said unto him, If thou canst believe—The man had said, "If Thou canst do anything." Jesus replies. all things are possible to him that believeth—"My doing all depends on thy believing." To impress this still more, He redoubles upon the believing: "If thou canst believe, all things are possible to him that believeth." Thus the Lord helps the birth of faith in that struggling soul; and now, though with pain and sore travail, it comes to the birth, as TRENCH, borrowing from OLSHAUSEN, expresses it. Seeing the case stood still, waiting not upon the Lord's power but his own faith, the man becomes immediately conscious of conflicting principles, and rises into one of the noblest utterances on record. 24. And straightway the father of the child cried out, and said with tears, Lord, I believe: help thou mine unbelief—i.e., " 'Tis useless concealing from Thee, O Thou mysterious, mighty Healer, the unbelief that still struggles in this heart of mine; but that heart bears me witness that I do believe in Thee; and if distrust still remains, I disown it, I wrestle with it, I seek help from Thee against it." Two things are very remarkable here: First, The felt and owned presence of unbelief, which only the strength of the man's faith could have so revealed to his own consciousness. Second, His appeal to Christ for help against his felt unbelief—a feature in the case quite unparalleled, and showing, more than all protestations could have done, the insight he had attained into the existence of a power in Christ more glorious than any he had besought for his poor child. The work was done; and as the commotion and confusion in the crowd was now increasing, Jesus at once, as Lord of spirits, gives the word of command to the dumb and deaf spirit to be gone, never again to return to his victim. 26. And the spirit cried, and rent him sore, and came out of him; and he was as one dead; insomuch that many said, He is dead—The malignant, cruel spirit, now conscious that his time was come, gathers up his whole strength, with intent by a last stroke to kill his victim, and had nearly succeeded. But the Lord of life was there; the Healer of all maladies, the Friend of sinners, the Seed of the woman, "the Stronger than the strong man armed," was there. The very faith which Christ declared to be enough for everything being now found, it was not possible that the serpent should prevail. Fearfully is he permitted to bruise the heel, as in this case; but his own head shall go for it—his works shall be destroyed (I John 3:8). 27. But Jesus took him by the hand, and lifted him up; and he arose. 28. Why could not we cast him out? 29. And he said unto them, This kind can come forth by nothing but by prayer and fasting—i.e., as nearly all good interpreters are agreed, "this kind of evil spirits cannot be expelled," or "so desperate a case of demoniacal possession cannot be cured, but by prayer and fasting." But since the Lord Himself says that His disciples could not fast while He was with them, perhaps this was designed, as ALFORD hints, for their after-guidance—unless we take it as but a definite way of expressing the general truth, that great and difficult duties require special preparation and self-denial. But the answer to their question, as given in Matthew 17 is fuller: "And Jesus said unto them, Because of your unbelief. For verily I say unto you, If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place, and it shall remove; and nothing shall be impossible unto you" (vs. 20). See on ch. 11:23. "Howbeit this kind goeth not out but by prayer and fasting" (vs. 21). i.e., though nothing is impossible to faith, yet such a height of faith as is requisite for such triumphs is not to be reached either in a moment or without effort—either with God in prayer or with ourselves in self-denying exercises. Luke (9:43) adds, "And they were all amazed at the mighty power of God"—"at the majesty" or "mightiness of God," in this last miracle, in the Transfiguration, etc.; or, at the divine grandeur of Christ rising upon them daily.

Second Explicit Announcement of His Approaching Death and Resurrection (vss. 30-32). 30. And they departed thence, and passed—were passing along. through Galilee; and he would not that any man should know it—By comparing Matthew 17:22, 23 and Luke 9:43, 44 with this, we gather, that as our Lord's reason for going through Galilee more privately than usual on this occasion was to reiterate to them the announcement which had so shocked them at the first mention of it, and thus familiarize them with it by little and little, so this was His reason for enjoining silence upon them as

23. If thou canst believe. This was an answer to the inquiry above. I can furnish a sufficiency of power, if you can but bring faith to receive it. Why are not our souls completely healed? Why is not every demon cast out? Why are not pride, self-will, love of the world, lust, anger, peevishness, with all the other bad tempers and dispositions which constitute the mind of Satan, entirely destroyed? Alas! it is because we do not believe. Jesus is able; more, Jesus is willing; but we are not willing to give up our idols; we give not credence to His word; therefore has sin a being in us, and dominion over us.

24. Lord, I believe. The word Lord is omitted by many MSS. and versions. Griesbach leaves it out. The omission, I think, is proper, because it is evident the man did not know our Lord, and therefore could not be expected to accost Him with a title expressive of that authority which he doubted whether He possessed, unless we grant that he used the word kyrie after the Roman custom, for "Sir." Help thou mine unbelief. That is, assist me against it. Give me a power to believe.

25. I charge thee. Considerable emphasis should be laid on the pronoun: You resisted the command of My disciples; now I command you to come out.

29. Prayer and Fasting. See on Matt. xvii. 21. This case is related by both Matthew and Luke, but it is greatly amplified in Mark's account, and many new circumstances related—another proof that Mark did not abridge Matthew.

30. They . . . passed through Galilee. See on Matt. xvii. 22-27.

MATTHEW HENRY

He said to them, The Son of man is delivered into the hands of men (v. 31), and they shall kill him. That men, who have reason, and should have love, that they should be thus spiteful to the Son of man, who came to redeem and save them, is unaccountable. But still it is observable that when Christ spoke of his death, he always spoke of his resurrection.

But they understood not that saying, v. 32. The words were plain enough, but they could not be reconciled to the thing, and they were afraid to ask him. Many remain ignorant because they are ashamed to enquire.

II. He rebukes his disciples for magnifying themselves. When he came to Capernaum, he privately asked his disciples what it was that they disputed among themselves by the way, v. 33. As our other discourses among ourselves by the way, so especially our disputes, will be all called over again, and we shall be called to an account about them. Of all disputes, Christ will be sure to reckon with his disciples for their disputes about precedency and superiority: that was the subject of the debate here, who should be the greatest, v. 34. Nothing could be more contrary to the two great laws of Christ's kingdom, which are humility and love, than desiring preferment in the world, and disputing about it. This ill temper he took all occasions to check. They were willing to cover this fault (v. 34); they held their peace. As they would not ask (v. 32), because they were ashamed to own their ignorance, so here they would not answer because they were ashamed to own their pride. He was willing to amend this fault in them, and therefore sat down, that he might have a solemn and full discourse with them.

He called the twelve to him, and told them, 1. That ambition, instead of gaining them preferment in his kingdom, would but postpone their preferment; If any man desire and aim to be first, he shall be last; he that exalteth himself, shall be abased. 2. That there is no preferment to be had under him, but an opportunity for, and an obligation to, so much the more labour and condescension. 3. That those who are most humble and self-denying, do most resemble Christ, and shall be most tenderly owned by him. He took a child in his arms. "Look you," saith he; "whosoever shall receive one like this child, receives me. Those of a humble, meek, mild disposition are such as I will own and countenance, and so will my Father too, for he who thus receiveth me, receiveth him that sent me." to their present movements. 31. For he taught his disciples, and said unto them—"Let these sayings sink down into your ears" (Luke 9:44); not what had been passing between them as to His grandeur, but what He was now to utter. The Son of man is delivered—The use of the present tense expresses how near at hand He would have them to consider it. As BENGEL says, steps were already in course of being taken to bring it about. into the hands of men—This remarkable antithesis, "the Son of man shall be delivered into the hands of men," it is worthy of notice, is in all the three Evangelists. and they shall kill him—i.e., "Be not carried off your feet by all that grandeur of Mine which ye have lately witnessed, but bear in mind what I have already told you and now distinctly repeat, that that Sun in whose beams ye now rejoice is soon to set in midnight gloom." and after he is killed, he shall rise the third day. 32. But they understood not that saying—"and it was hid from them, [so] that they preceived it not" (Luke 9:45). and were afraid to ask him—Their most cherished ideas were so completely dashed by such announcements, that they were afraid of laying themselves open to rebuke by asking Him any questions. But "they were exceeding sorry" (Matt. 17:23). While the other Evangelists, as WEBSTER and WILKINSON remark, notice their ignorance and their fear, Matthew, who was one of them, retains a vivid recollection of their sorrow.

33-50. STRIFE AMONG THE TWELVE WHO SHOULD BE GREATEST IN THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN, WITH RELATIVE TEACHING—INCIDENTAL REBUKE OF JOHN FOR EXCLUSIVENESS. (= Matt. 18:1-9; Luke 9:46-50.)

Strife among the Twelve, with Relative Teaching (vss. 33-37). 33. What was it that ye disputed among yourselves by the way?—From this we gather that after the painful communication He had made to them, the Redeemer had allowed them to travel so much of the way by themselves; partly, no doubt, that He might have privacy for Himself to dwell on what lay before Him, and partly that they might be induced to weigh together and prepare themselves for the terrible events which He had announced to them. But if so, how different was their occupation! 34. But they held their peace: for by the way they had disputed among themselves, who should be the greatest—From Matthew 18:1 we should infer that the subject was introduced, not by our Lord, but by the disciples themselves, who came and asked Jesus who should be greatest. Perhaps one or two of them first referred the matter to Jesus, who put them off till they should all be assembled together at Capernaum. He had all the while "perceived the thought of their heart" (Luke 9:47); but now that they were all together "in the house," He questions them about it, and they are put to the blush, conscious of the temper towards each other which it had kindled. This raised the whole question afresh, and at this point our Evangelist takes it up. The subject was suggested by the recent announcement of the Kingdom (Matt. 16:19-28), the transfiguration of their Master, and especially the preference given to three of them at that scene. 35. If any man desire to be first, the same shall be last of all, and servant of all—i.e., "let him be" such: he must be prepared to take the last and lowest place. See on ch. 10:42-45. 36. And he took a child—"a little child" (Matt. 18:2); but the word is the same in both places, as also in Luke 9:47. and set him in the midst of them: and when he had taken him in his arms—This beautiful trait is mentioned by our Evangelist alone. he said unto them—Here we must go to Matthew (18:3, 4) for the first of this answer: "Verily I say unto you, except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of Heaven:" i.e., "Conversion must be thorough; not only must the heart be turned to God in general, and from earthly to heavenly things, but in particular, except ye be converted from that carnal ambition which still rankles within you, into that freedom from all such feelings which ye see in this child, ye have neither part nor lot in the kingdom at all; and he who in this feature has most of the child, is highest there." Whosoever, therefore, shall "humble himself as this little child, the same is greatest in the kingdom of heaven": "for he that is [willing to be] least among you all, the same shall be great" (Luke 9:48). 37. Whosoever shall receive one of such children—so manifesting the spirit unconsciously displayed by this child. in my name—from love to Me. receiveth me; and whosoever shall receive me, receiveth not me, but Him that sent me—See on Matthew 10:40.

ADAM CLARKE

32. But they understood not. It does not appear likely, from Matthew's account, that three of the disciples, Peter, James, and John, could be ignorant of the reasons of Christ's death and resurrection, after the Transfiguration. On the contrary, from that time they must have had at least a general understanding of this important subject. But the other nine might have been ignorant of this matter, who were not present at the Transfiguration; probably it is of these that the Evangelist speaks here.

33. And being in the house. That is, Peter's house, where He ordinarily lodged.

34. Who should be the greatest. See on Matt. xviii. 1-5.

Who is the greatest? Could these disciples have viewed the kingdom of Christ in any other light than that of a temporal one? Hence they wished to know whom He would make His prime minister—whom His general—whom His chief chancellor—whom supreme judge. The disciples having lately seen the keys delivered to Peter, and found that he, with James and John, had been privileged with being present at the Transfiguration, it is no wonder if a measure of jealousy and suspicion began to work in their minds. From this inquiry we may also learn that the disciples had no notion of Peter's supremacy.

One such little child. As our Lord in the preceding verses considers a little child an emblem of a genuine disciple, so by the term in this verse He means a disciple only. Whoso shall receive, i.e., show unto such a childlike, unambitious disciple of Mine any act of kindness for My sake, I will consider it as done to myself.

MATTHEW HENRY

III. While they are striving which of them should be greatest, they will not allow those who are not in communion with them to be anything.

1. The account which John gave him, of the restraint they had laid upon one from making use of the name of Christ, because he was not of their society. Master, saith John, we saw one casting out devils in thy name, but he followeth not us, v. 38. (1) It was strange that one who was not a professed disciple and follower of Christ, should yet have power to cast out devils, in his name, for that seemed to be peculiar to those whom he called. And why might not he receive that power from Christ, whose Spirit, like the wind, blows where it listeth, without such an outward call as the apostles had? And perhaps there were many more such. Christ's grace is not tied to the visible church. (2) It was strange that one who cast out devils in the name of Christ, did not join himself to the apostles, and follow Christ with them, but should continue to act in separation from them. I know of nothing that could hinder him from following them, unless because he was loth to leave all to follow them. The thing did not look well, and therefore the disciples forbade him to make use of Christ's name as they did, unless he would follow him as they did. Thus apt are we to imagine that those do not follow Christ at all, who do not follow him with us, and that those do nothing well, who do not just as we do. But the Lord knows them that are his, however they are dispersed.

2. The rebuke he gave to them for this (v. 39); Jesus said, "Forbid him not." That which is good, and doeth good, must not be prohibited, though there may be some defect or irregularity in the manner of doing it. If Christ be preached, Paul therein doth, and will rejoice, though he be eclipsed by it, Phil. i. 18. Two reasons Christ gives why such should not be forbidden. (1) Because we cannot suppose that any man who makes use of Christ's name in working miracles, should blaspheme his name, as the scribes and Pharisees did. (2) Because those that differed in communion, while they agreed to fight against Satan under the banner of Christ, ought to look upon one another as on the same side. He that is not against us is on our part. As to the great controversy between Christ and Beelzebub, he had said, He that is not with me is against me, Matt. xii. 30. He that will not own Christ, owns Satan. But as to those that own Christ, that follow him, though not with us, we must reckon that they are not against us, and therefore are on our part.

I. Christ promiseth a reward to all those that are any way kind to his disciples (v. 41); "Whosoever shall give you a cup of water because you belong to Christ, he shall not lose his reward." It is the honour and happiness of Christians, that they belong to Christ; they wear his livery as retainers to his family; nay, they are more nearly related, they are members of his body. The relieving of Christ's poor in their distresses, is a good deed; he accepts it, and will reward it. What kindness is done to Christ's poor, must be done them for his sake, and because they belong to him; for that is it that sanctifies the kindness. This is a reason why we must not discountenance and discourage those who are serving the interests of Christ's kingdom, though they are not in everything of our mind and way. If Christ reckons kindnesses to us services to him, we ought to reckon services to him kindnesses to us, and to encourage them, though done by those that follow not with us.

II. He threatens those that offend his little ones, v. 42. Whosoever shall grieve any true Christians, though they be of the weakest, shall either restrain them from doing good, or draw them in to commit sin, it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and he were cast into the sea: his punishment will be very great.

III. He warns all his followers to take heed of ruining their own souls. This charity must begin at home; if we must take heed of doing anything to hinder others from good, much more careful must we be to avoid everything that will take us off from our duty, or lead us to sin; and that which doth so we must part with, though it be ever so dear to us. Observe,

1. The case supposed, that our own hand, or eye, or foot, offends us; that the impure corruption we indulge is as dear to us as an eye or a hand. Suppose the beloved is become a sin, or the sin a beloved. Suppose we must part with it, or part with Christ and a good conscience.

2. The duty prescribed in that case; Pluck out the eye, cut off the hand and foot, mortify the darling lust, crucify it. Let the idols that have been delectable

Incidental Rebuke of John for Exclusiveness (vss. 38-41). 38. And John aswered him, saying, Master, we saw one casting out devils in thy name, and he followeth not us: and we forbade him, because he followeth not us—The link of connection here with the foregoing context lies, we apprehend, in the emphatic words which our Lord had just uttered, "in My name." "Oh," interposes John—young, warm, but not sufficiently apprehending Christ's teaching in these matters—"that reminds me of something that we have just done, and we should like to know if we did right. We saw one casting out devils "in Thy name," and we forbade him, because he followeth not us. Were we right, or were we wrong?" Answer—"Ye were wrong." "But we did it because he followeth not us." "No matter."

39. But Jesus said, Forbid him not: for there is no man which shall do a miracle in my name, that can lightly—soon, i.e., readily—speak evil of me. 40. For he that is not against us is on our part—Two principles of immense importance are here laid down: "First, No one will readily speak evil of Me who has the faith to do a miracle in My name; and second, If such a person cannot be supposed to be against us, ye are to consider him for us." Let it be carefully observed that our Lord does not say this man should not have "followed them," nor yet that it was indifferent whether he did or not; but simply teaches how such a person was to be regarded, although he did not—viz., as a reverer of His name and a promotor of His cause.

41. For whosoever shall give you a cup of water to drink in my name, because ye belong to Christ, verily I say unto you, he shall not lose his reward—See on Matthew 10:42.

Continuation of Teaching Suggested by the Disciple's Strife (vss. 42-50). What follows appears to have no connection with the incidental reproof of John immediately preceding. As that had interrupted some important teaching, our Lord hastens back from it, as if no such interruption had occurred. 42. For whosoever shall offend one of these little ones that believe in me—or, shall cause them to stumble; referring probably to the effect which such unsavory disputes as they had held would have upon the inquiring and hopeful who came in contact with them, leading to the belief that after all they were no better than others. it is better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck—The word here is simply "millstone," without expressing of which kind. But in Matthew 18:6 it is the "ass-turned" kind, far heavier than the small hand-mill turned by female slaves, as in Luke 17:35. It is of course the same which is meant here. and he were cast into the sea—meaning, that if by such a death that stumbling were prevented, and so its eternal consequences averted, it would be a happy thing for them. Here follows a striking verse in Matthew 18:7, "Woe unto the world because of offences!" (There will be stumblings and falls and loss of souls enough from the world's treatment of disciples, without any addition from you: dreadful will be its doom in consequence; see that ye share not in it.) "For it must needs be that offences come; but woe to that man by whom the offence cometh!" (The struggle between light and darkness will inevitably cause stumblings, but not less guilty is he who wilfully makes any to stumble.) 43. And if thy hand offend thee, cut it off: it is better for thee to enter into life maimed, than having two hands to go into hell—See Matthew 5:29, 30. The only difference between the words there and here is that there they refer to impure inclinations; here, to an ambitious disposition, an irascible or quarrelsome temper, and the like: and the injunction is to strike at the root of such dispositions and cut off the occasions of them. 47. And if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out: it is better for thee to enter into the kingdom of God with one eye, than having two eyes to be cast into hell-fire;

ADAM CLARKE

38. We saw one casting out devils in thy name. It can scarcely be supposed that a man who knew nothing of Christ, or who was only a common exorcist, could be able to work a miracle in Christ's name. We may therefore safely imagine that this was either one of John the Baptist's disciples, who, at his master's command, had believed in Jesus, or one of the seventy whom Christ had sent out, Luke x. 1-7, who, after he had fulfilled his commission, had retired from accompanying the other disciples. But as he still held fast his faith in Christ and walked in good conscience, the influence of his Master still continued with him, so that he could cast out demons as well as the other disciples. We forbad him. I do not see that we have any right to attribute any other motive to John than that which he himself owns—because he followeth not us—because he did not attach himself constantly to Thee, as we do, we thought he could not be in a proper spirit.

39. Forbid him not. If you meet him again, let him go on quietly in the work in which God owns him. If he were not of God, the demons would not be subject to him, and his work could not prosper. A spirit of bigotry has little countenance from these passages. There are some who are so outrageously wedded to their own creed and religious system that they would rather let sinners perish than suffer those who differ from them to become the instruments of their salvation.

40. He that is not against us is on our part. Or rather, "Whosoever is not against you is for you."

There is a parallel case to this mentioned in Num. xi. 26-29. The reader will easily observe that Joshua and John were of the same bigoted spirit, and that Jesus and Moses acted from the spirit of candor and benevolence.

But whoso shall offend one of these little ones. But, on the contrary, whosoever shall cause one of the least of those who believe in Me to be stumbled—to go into the spirit of the world, or give way to sin—such a one shall meet with the most exemplary punishment. A millstone. "An ass's millstone," because in ancient times, before the invention of wind and water mills, the stones were turned sometimes by slaves, but commonly by asses or mules.

things, be cast away as detestable things. It is necessary that the part which is gangrened should be taken off for the preservation of the whole. Self must be denied, that it may not be destroyed.

3. The necessity of doing this. The flesh must be mortified, that we may enter into life (v. 43, 45), into the kingdom of God, v. 47. Though, by abandoning sin, we may, for the present, feel ourselves as if we were halt and maimed, yet it is for life; and all that men have, they will give for their lives. These halts and maims will be the marks of the Lord Jesus, will be in that kingdom scars of honour.

4. The danger of not doing this. The matter is brought to this issue, that either sin must die, or we must die. If we be ruled by sin, we shall inevitably be ruined by it. With what an emphasis of terror are those words repeated three times here, Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched! The reflections and reproaches of the sinner's own conscience are the worm that dieth not. The wrath of God fastening upon a guilty and polluted conscience, is the fire that is not quenched; for it is the wrath of the living God, into whose hands it is a fearful thing to fall. Philo saith, The punishment of the wicked is to live for ever dying.

The last two verses are somewhat difficult, and interpreters agree not in the sense of them; for every-one shall be salted with fire, and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt. Therefore have salt in yourselves. It was appointed by the law of Moses, that every sacrifice should be salted with salt, not to preserve it but because it was the food of God's table. The nature of man, being corrupt, and as such being called flesh, some way or other must be salted, in order to its being a sacrifice to God. Our chief concern is, to present ourselves living sacrifices to the grace of God (Rom. xii. 1), and, in order to our acceptableness, we must be salted with salt. We must have in our souls a savour of grace. Those that have the salt of grace, must make it appear that they have it; that they have salt in themselves, a living principle of grace in their hearts, which works out all corrupt dispositions. Our speech must be always with grace seasoned with this salt, that no corrupt communication may proceed out of our mouth, but we may loathe it as much as we would to put putrid meat into our mouths. As this gracious salt will keep our own consciences void of offence, so it will keep our conversation with others so, that we may not offend any of Christ's little ones. We must not only have this salt of grace, but we must always retain the relish and savour of it; for if this salt lose its saltness, wherewith will ye season it? They who will not be salted with the salt of divine grace, will be salted with fire. The pleasures they have lived in, shall eat their flesh, as it were fire. Now since this will certainly be the doom of those that do not crucify the flesh with its affections and lusts, let us, knowing this terror of the Lord, be persuaded to do it.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

48. Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched—See on Matthew 5:30; and on the words "hell" and "hell-fire," or "the hell of fire," see on Matthew 5:22. The "unquenchablesness" of this fire has already been brought before us (see on Matt. 3:12); and the awfully vivid idea of an undying worm, everlastingly consuming an unconsumable body, is taken from the closing words of the evangelical prophet (Isa. 66: 24), which seem to have furnished the later Jewish Church with its current phraseology on the subject of future punishment (see LIGHTFOOT). 49. For every one shall be salted with fire, and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt—A difficult verse, on which much has been written—some of it to little purpose. "Every one" probably means "Every follower of mine"; and the "fire" with which he "must be salted" probably means "a fiery trial" to season him. (Cf. Mal. 3:2, etc.) The reference to salting the sacrifice is of course to that maxim of the Levitical law, that every acceptable sacrifice must be sprinkled with salt, to express symbolically its soundness, sweetness, wholesomeness, acceptability. But as it had to be roasted first, we have here the further idea of a salting with fire. In this case, "every sacrifice," in the next clause, will mean, "Every one who would be found an acceptable offering to God"; and thus the whole verse may perhaps be paraphrased as follows: "Every disciple of Mine shall have a fiery trial to undergo, and everyone who would be found an odor of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable and well-pleasing to God, must have such a salting, like the Levitical sacrifices." Another, but, as it seems to us, far-fetched as well as harsh, interpretation—suggested first, we believe, by MICHAELIS, and adopted by ALEXANDER—takes the "every sacrifice which must be salted with fire" to mean those who are "cast into hell," and the preservative effect of this salting to refer to the preservation of the lost not only in but by means of the fire of hell. Their reason for this is that the other interpretation changes the meaning of the "fire," and the characters too, from the lost to the saved, in these verses. But as our Lord confessedly ends His discourse with the case of His own true disciples, the transition to them in the preceding verse is perfectly natural; whereas to apply the preservative salt of the sacrifice to the preserving quality of hell-fire, is equally contrary to the symbolical sense of salt and the Scripture representations of future torment. Our Lord has still in His eye the unseemly jarrings which had arisen among the Twelve, the peril to themselves of allowing any indulgence to such passions, and the severe self-sacrifice which salvation would cost them. 50. Salt is good; but if the salt have lost his saltness—its power to season what it is brought into contact with. wherewith will ye season it?—How is this property to be restored? See on Matthew 5: 13. Have salt in yourselves—See to it that ye retain in yourselves those precious qualities that will make you a blessing to one another, and to all around you. and—with respect to the miserable strife out of which all this discourse has sprung, in one concluding word—have peace one with another—This is repeated in I Thessalonians 5:13.

ADAM CLARKE

43. The fire that never shall be quenched. That is, "the inextinguishable fire." The same clause in v. 45 is omitted in BCL, seven others, Syriac, later Persic, Coptic, and one Itala. "Eternal fire" is the expression of Matthew.

44. Where their worm dieth not. The bitter reflection, "I might have avoided sin, but I did not; I might have been saved, but I would not," must be equal to ten thousand tormentors. What intolerable anguish must this produce in a damned soul! Their worm. It seems everyone has his worm, his peculiar remorse for the evils he did, and for the grace he rejected; while the fire, the state of excruciating torment, is common to all. Reader! may the living God save you from this worm and from this fire! The fire is not quenched. The state of punishment is continual; there is no respite, alleviation, nor end!

49. For every one shall be salted with fire. Every one of those who shall live and die in sin; but there is great difficulty in this verse. The Codex Bezae and some other MSS. have omitted the first clause; and several MSS. keep the first and omit the last clause—and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt. Some take the whole in a good sense, as referring to the influence of the Spirit of God in the hearts of believers, which shall answer the same end to the soul, in preserving it from the contagion that is in the world, as salt did in the sacrifices offered to God to preserve them from putrefaction. Old Trapp's note on the place pleases me as much as any I have seen: "The Spirit, as salt, must dry up those bad humors in us which breed the never-dying worm; and, as fire, must waste our corruptions, which else will carry us on to the unquenchable fire." Perhaps the whole is an allusion to the purification of vessels, and especially such metallic vessels as were employed in the service of the sanctuary. Probably the following may be considered as a parallel text: "Every thing that may abide the fire, ye shall make it go through the fire, and it shall be clean . . . and all that abideth not the fire ye shall make go through the water," Num. xxxi. 23. You disciples are the Lord's sacrifice; you shall go through much tribulation, in order to enter into My kingdom. But you are salted, you are influenced by the Spirit of God, and are immortal till your work is done; and should you be offered up, martyred, this shall be a means of establishing more fully the glad tidings of the Kingdom. And this Spirit shall preserve all who believe on Me from the corruption of sin, and from eternal perdition. That converts to God are represented as His offering, see Isa. lxvi. 20, the very place which our Lord appears to have here in view.

50. Have salt in yourselves. See that you have at all times the preserving principle of divine grace in your hearts, and give that proof of it which will satisfy your own minds and convince or silence the world. Live in brotherly kindness and peace with each other.

Our Lord Jesus did not continue long in a place, for the whole land of Canaan was his parish, and therefore he would visit every part of it. Here we have him in the coasts of Judæa, eastward, as we found him, not long since, in the utmost borders westward, near Tyre and Sidon. Thus was his circuit like that of the sun, from whose light and heat nothing is hid.

I. Resorted to by the people, v. 1. They came to him again, and, as he was wont, he taught them again. He did as he was wont. In Matthew it is said, He healed them; here it is said, He taught them. His teaching was healing to poor souls. He taught them again. Such is the fulness of the Christian doctrine, that there is still more to be learned; and such our forgetfulness, that we need to be reminded of what we do know.

II. Disputed with by the Pharisees.

1. A question they started concerning divorce (v. 2); Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife? They proposed it, tempting him, seeking an occasion against him, which side soever he should take of the question. Ministers must stand upon their guard, lest, under pretence of being advised with, they be ensnared.

CHAPTER 10

Vss. 1-12. FINAL DEPARTURE FROM GALILEE—DIVORCE. (=Matt. 19:1-12; Luke 9:51.) See on Matthew 19:1-12.

and came into the coasts—or, boundaries—of Judea beyond Jordan—i.e., to the further, or east side of the Jordan, into Perea, the dominions of Herod Antipas. But though one might conclude from our Evangelist that our Lord went straight from the one region to the other, we know from the other Gospels that a considerable time elapsed between the departure from the one and the arrival at the other, during which many of the most important events in our Lord's public life occurred—probably a large part of what is recorded in Luke 9:51, onward to ch. 18:15, and part of John 7:2-11, 54.

Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause?—Two rival schools (as we saw on ch. 5:31) were divided on this question—a delicate one, as DE WETTE pertinently remarks, in the dominions of Herod Antipas.

CHAPTER 10

1. He arose. "He departed thence." Many transactions took place between those mentioned in the preceding chapter and these that follow, which are omitted by Matthew and Mark; but they are related by both Luke and John.

2. Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife? See this question about divorce largely explained on Matt. xix. 3-12.

MATTHEW HENRY

2. Christ's reply to them with a question (v. 3); What did Moses command you? This he asked them, to testify his respect to the law of Moses, and to show that he came not to destroy it.

3. The fair account they gave of the law of Moses, expressly concerning divorce, v. 4. Christ asked, What did Moses command you? They own that Moses only suffered, or permitted, a man to write his wife a bill of divorce, and to put her away, Deut. xxiv. 1.

4. The answer that Christ gave to their question, in which he abides by the doctrine he had formerly laid down in this case (Matt. v. 32), That whosoever puts away his wife, except for fornication, causeth her to commit adultery. He here shows,

(1) That the reason why Moses, in his law, permitted divorce, was only for the hardness of their hearts (v. 5).

(2) That the account which Moses, in this history, gives of the institution of marriage, affords such a reason against divorce, as amounts to a prohibition of it.

Moses tells us, God made man male and female, one male, and one female; so that Adam could not put away his wife and take another. The law was, That a man must leave his father and mother, and cleave to his wife (v. 7); which intimates not only the nearness of the relation, but the perpetuity of it. The result of the relation is, that, though they are two, yet they are one, they are one flesh, v. 8. The union between them is a sacred thing that must not be violated. God himself has joined them together; he has in wisdom and goodness appointed them who are thus joined together, to live together in love till death parts them. Marriage is not an invention of men, but a divine institution. The bond which God himself has tied, is not to be lightly untied.

5. Christ's discourse with his disciples, in private, about this matter, v. 10–12. It was an advantage to them, that they had opportunity of personal converse with Christ, not only about gospel mysteries, but about moral duties. No more is here related of this private conference, than the law Christ laid down in this case—That it is adultery for a man to put away his wife, and marry another; it is adultery against the wife he puts away, v. 11. He adds, If a woman shall put away her husband, and be married to another, she commits adultery (v. 12). Wisdom and grace, holiness and love, reigning in the heart, will make those commands easy which to the carnal mind may be as a heavy yoke.

It is looked upon as the indication of a kind and tender disposition to take notice of little children, and this was remarkable in our Lord Jesus, which is an encouragement not only to little children to apply themselves to Christ, but to grown people, who are conscious to themselves of weakness and childishness, and of being helpless and useless, like little children.

I Little children brought to Christ, v. 13. It doth not appear that they needed any bodily cure, nor were they capable of being taught. They that had the care of them were mostly concerned about their souls, their better part. They believed that Christ's blessing would do their souls good; and therefore to him they brought them, that he might touch them, knowing that he could reach their hearts, when nothing their parents could say to them, or do for them, would reach them. We may present our children to Christ, now that he is in heaven, and therein we may act faith upon the fulness and extent of his grace, and the promise to us and to our children.

II. The discouragement which the disciples gave to the bringing of children to Christ; They rebuked them that brought them.

III. The encouragement Christ gave to it. He took it very ill that his disciples should keep them off; When he saw it, he was much displeased, v. 14. Christ is very angry with his own disciples, if they discountenance any in coming to him themselves, or in bringing their children to him. He ordered that they should be brought to him; suffer little children to come to me. Little children are welcome betimes to the throne of grace with their Hosannas. He came to set up the kingdom of God among men, and took this occasion to declare that that kingdom admitted little children to be the subjects of it. There must be something of the temper and disposition of little children found in all that Christ will own and bless. We must receive the kingdom of God as little children (v. 15); that is, we must stand affected to Christ and his grace as little children do to their parents, nurses, and teachers. We must be inquisitive, as children, must learn as children and in learning must believe. The mind of a child is white paper, you may suffered you to put away your wives—tolerated a relaxation of the strictness of the marriage bond—not as approving of it, but to prevent still greater evils.

He saith unto them, Moses—as a civil lawgiver. because of—or "having respect to." the hardness of your hearts—looking to your low moral state, and your inability to endure the strictness of the original law.

"He that made them made them from the beginning a male and a female." And said, For this cause—to follow out this divine appointment. shall a man leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife: and they twain shall be one flesh?—Jesus here sends them back to the original constitution of man as one pair, a male and a female; to their marriage, as such, by divine appointment; and to the purpose of God, expressed by the sacred historian, that in all time one man and one woman should by marriage become one flesh—so to continue as long as both are in the flesh. This being God's constitution, let not man break it up by causeless divorces.

13-19. LITTLE CHILDREN BROUGHT TO CHRIST. (=Matt. 19:13-15; Luke 18:15-17.) See on Luke 18:15-17.

infants—showing that some, at least, of those called in Matthew (19:13) and Mark (10:13) simply "little" or "young children," were literally "babes." touch them—or, as more fully in Matthew, "put His hands on them and pray," or invoke a "blessing" on them (Mark 10:16), according to venerable custom (Gen. 48:14, 15). rebuked them—Repeatedly the disciples thus interposed to save annoyance and interruption to their Master; but, as the result showed, always against the mind of Christ (Matt. 15:23; ch. 18:39, 40). Here, it is plain from our Lord's reply, that they thought the intrusion a useless one, as infants were not capable of receiving anything from Him. His ministrations were for grown people. But Jesus—much displeased," says Mark (10:14); and invaluable addition. said—"SUFFER THE LITTLE CHILDREN TO COME UNTO ME"—"AND FORBID THEM NOT," is the important addition of Matthew (19:14) and Mark (10:14). What words are these from the lips of Christ! The price of them is above rubies. But the reason assigned, "FOR OF SUCH IS THE KINGDOM OF GOD," or "of heaven," as in Matthew 19:14, completes the previous information here conveyed; especially as interpreted by what immediately follows: "AND HE TOOK THEM UP IN HIS ARMS, PUT HIS HANDS UPON THEM, AND BLESSED THEM" (Mark 10:16). It is surely not to be conceived that all our Lord meant was to inform us, that seeing grown people must become childlike in order to be capable of the Kingdom of God, therefore they should not hinder infants from coming to Him, and therefore He took up and blessed the infants themselves. Was it not just the grave mistake of the disciples that infants should not be brought to Christ, be-

Except it be for fornication. The grand subject of dispute between the two schools mentioned above was the word in Deut. xxiv. 1, "When a man hath taken a wife, and she find no grace in his sight, because of some uncleanness." This the school of Shammai held to mean whoredom or adultery; but the school of Hillel maintained that it signified any corporeal defect which rendered the person deformed, or any bad temper which made the husband's life uncomfortable.

Moses because of the hardness of your hearts. Moses perceived that if divorce were not permitted, in many cases, the women would be exposed to great hardships through the "cruelty" of their husbands.

For this cause. Being created for this very purpose, that they might glorify their Maker in a matrimonial connection. Shall a man leave (wholly give up) father and mother—the matrimonial union being more intimate and binding than even paternal or filial affection—and shall be "closely united, shall be firmly cemented" to his wife. A beautiful metaphor, which most forcibly intimates that nothing but death can separate them, as a well-glued board will break sooner in the whole wood than in the glued joint. And they twain shall be one flesh. Not only meaning that they should be considered as one body, but also as two souls in one body, with a complete union of interests, and an indissoluble partnership of life and fortune, comfort and support, desires and inclinations, joys and sorrows.

12. And if a woman shall put away her husband. From this it appears that in some cases the wife assumed the very same right of divorcing her husband that the husband had of divorcing his wife; and yet this is not recorded anywhere in the Jewish laws, as far as I can find, that the women had such a right.

13. And they brought young children. See on Matt. xix. 13-15.

Then were there brought unto him little children. These are termed by Luke, chap. xviii. 15, "infants," very young children; and it was on this account, probably, that the disciples rebuked the parents, thinking them too young to receive good. That he should put his hands. It was a common custom among the Jews to lay their hands on the heads of those whom they blessed or for whom they prayed. This seems to have been done by way of dedication or consecration to God—the person being considered as the sacred property of God ever after.

Of such is the kingdom of heaven. Or, "The kingdom of heaven is composed of such." A great part of God's kingdom is composed of such literally, and those only who resemble little children shall be received into it; see on chap. xviii. 3. Christ loves little children because He loves simplicity and innocence; He has sanctified their very age by passing through it himself—the holy Jesus was once a little child.

MATTHEW HENRY

write upon it what you will; such must our minds be to the pen of the blessed Spirit. Children are under government; so must we be. Little children depend upon their parents' wisdom and care, are carried in their arms, and take what they provide for them; and thus must we receive the kingdom of God, with a humble resignation of ourselves to Jesus Christ, and an easy dependence upon him. He received the children, and gave them what was desired (v. 16); He took them up in his arms, put his hands upon them, and blessed them. They begged he would touch them, but he did more. He took them in his arms. He shall gather the lambs in his arms, and carry them in his bosom. Time was, when Christ himself was taken up in old Simeon's arms, Luke ii. 28. And now he took up these children, not complaining of the burthen, but pleased with it. He put his hands upon them. He blessed them. Our children are happy, if they have but the Mediator's blessing for their portion.

Verses 17–31

I. Here is a hopeful meeting between Christ and a young man; such he is said to be (Matt. xix. 20, 22), and a ruler (Luke xviii. 18).

1. He came running to Christ; he laid aside the gravity and grandeur of a ruler; he manifested his earnestness and importunity; he ran as one in haste. He had now an opportunity of consulting this great Prophet, and he would not let slip the opportunity.

2. He came to him when he was in the way, in the midst of company.

3. He kneeled to him, in token of the great value and veneration he had for him, and his earnest desire to be taught by him. He bowed the knee, as one that meant to bow the soul to him.

4. His address to him was serious and weighty; Good Master, what shall I do, that I may inherit eternal life? He thinks it a thing possible, that he may inherit eternal life, looking upon it not only as set before us, but as offered to us. Most men enquire for good to be had in this world, he asks for good to be done in this world; not, Who will make us to see good? But, "Who will make us to do good?" He enquires for happiness in the way of duty. Now this was, (1) A very serious question. Then there begins to be some hope of people, when they begin to enquire solicitously, what they shall do to get to heaven. (2) It was proposed to a right person, one that was every way fit to answer it, being himself the Way, the Truth, and the Life; who came from heaven on purpose, first to make, and then to make known, the way to heaven. It is peculiar to the Christian religion, both to show eternal life, and to show the way to it. (3) It was proposed with a good design—to be instructed. We find this same question put by a lawyer (Luke x. 25), with a bad design; he tempted him, saying, Master, what shall I do? It is not so much the good words as the good intention of them that Christ looks at.

5. Christ encouraged this address by assisting his faith, v. 18. He called him good Master; Christ would have him mean thereby, that he looked upon him to be God, since there is none good but one, that is God. Our English word God doubtless hath affinity with good. Further, he directed his practice (v. 19); Keep the commandments. He mentions the six commandments of the second table, which prescribe our duty to our neighbour. The fifth commandment is here put last, as that which should especially be remembered and observed, to keep us to all the rest.

6. The young man bid fair for heaven, having been free from any open gross violations of the divine commands. Master, all these have I observed from my youth. He thought he had, and his neighbours thought so too. He that could say he was free from scandalous sin, went further than many in the way to eternal life.

7. Christ had a kindness for him; Jesus, beholding him, loved him, v. 21. Christ particularly loves to see young people, and rich people, asking the way to heaven, with their faces thitherward.

II. Here is a sorrowful parting between Christ and this young man.

1. Christ gave him a command of trial. Has he indeed his heart upon it? Bring him to the touchstone. Can he find in his heart to part with his riches for the service of Christ? Let him know the worst now; if he will not come up to these terms, let him quit his pretensions; as good at first as at last. "Sell whatsoever thou hast; and be a father to the poor." Every man, according to his ability, must relieve the poor. Worldly wealth is given us as a talent, to be used and employed for the glory of our great Master in the world, who hath so ordered it, that the poor we should have always with us as his receivers. Can he find in his heart to go through the hardest, costliest cause only grown people could profit by Him, which "much displeased" our Lord? And though He took the irresistible opportunity of lowering their pride of reason, by informing them that, in order to enter the Kingdom, "instead of the children first becoming like them, they must themselves become like the children" [RICHTER in STIER], this was but by the way; and, returning to the children themselves, He took them up in His gracious arms, put His hands upon them and blessed them, for no conceivable reason but to show that they were thereby made capable, AS INFANTS, of the Kingdom of God.

17-31. THE RICH YOUNG RULER. (=Matt. 19: 16-30; Luke 18:18-30.) See on Luke 18:18-30.

This case presents some remarkable points. (1) The man was of irreproachable moral character; and this amidst all the temptations of youth, for he was a "young man" (Matt. 19:22), and wealth, for "he was very rich" (vs. 23; Mark 10:22). (2) But restless notwithstanding, his heart craves eternal life. (3) Unlike the "rulers," to whose class he belonged (vs. 18), he so far believed in Jesus as to be persuaded He could authoritatively direct him on this vital point. (4) So earnest is he that he comes "running" and even "kneeling before Him," and that when He was gone forth into the war (Mark 10:17)—the high-road, by this time crowded with travellers to the passover; undeterred by the virulent opposition of the class he belonged to as a "ruler" and by the shame he might be expected to feel at broaching such a question in the hearing of a crowd and on the open road. Why . . .—Did our Lord mean then to teach that God only ought to be called "good"? Impossible, for that had been to contradict all Scripture teaching, and His own, too (Ps. 112:5; Matt. 25:21; Titus 1:8). Unless therefore we are to ascribe captiousness to our Lord, He could have had but one object — to raise the youth's ideas of Himself, as not to be classed merely with other "good masters," and declining to receive this title apart from the "One" who is essentially and only "good." This indeed is but distantly hinted; but unless this is seen in the background of our Lord's words, nothing worthy of Him can be made out of them. (Hence, Socinianism, instead of having any support here, is only baffled by it.)

Thou knowest . . .—Matthew is more complete here: "but if thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments. He saith unto him, Which?"—as if he had said, Point me out one of them which I have not kept?—"Jesus said, Thou shalt . . ." (Matt. 19: 17, 18). Our Lord purposely confines Himself to the second table, which He would consider easy to keep, enumerating them all—for in Mark (10:19), "Defraud not" stands for the tenth (else the eighth is twice repeated). In Matthew the sum of this second table of the law is added, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," as if to see if he would venture to say he had kept that. All these . . .—"what lack I yet?" adds Matthew. Ah! this gives us a glimpse of his heart. Doubtless he was perfectly sincere; but something within whispered to him that his keeping of the commandments was too easy a way of getting to heaven. He felt something beyond this to be necessary; after keeping all the commandments he was at a loss to know what that could be; and he came to Jesus just upon that point. "Then," says Mark (10:21), "Jesus beholding him loved him," or "looked lovingly upon him." His sincerity, frankness, and nearness to the kingdom of God, in themselves most winning qualities, won our Lord's regard even though he turned his back upon Him—a lesson to those who can see nothing lovable save in the regenerate. lackest . . . one thing—Ah! but that a fundamental, fatal lack. sell . . .—As riches were his idol, our Lord, who knew if from the first, lays His great authoritative grasp at once upon it, saying, "Now give Me up that, and all is right." No general direction about the disposal of riches, then, is here given, save that we are to sit loose to them and lay them at the feet of Him who gave them. He who does this with all he has, whether rich or poor, is a true heir of the kingdom of heaven.

ADAM CLARKE

16. And he took them up in his arms. Jesus Christ loves little children, and they are objects of His most peculiar care. And blessed them. Then, though little children, they were capable of receiving Christ's blessing. If Christ embraced them, why should not His Church embrace them?

17. There came one running. See the case of this rich young man largely explained on Matt. xix. 16, etc.

One came. Much instruction may be had from seriously attending to the conduct, spirit, and question of this person. (1) He came running, Mark x. 17, and he was deeply convinced of the importance of his business, and seriously determined to seek so as to find. (2) He kneeled, or caught Him by the knees, thus evidencing his humility, and addressing himself only to mercy. (3) He came in the spirit of a disciple, or scholar, desiring to be taught a matter of the utmost importance to him—Good teacher. (4) He came in the spirit of obedience; he had worked hard to no purpose, and he is still willing to work, provided he can have a prospect of succeeding—What good thing shall I do? (5) His question was the most interesting and important that any soul can ask of God—How shall I be saved?

Why callest thou me good? Or, "Why do you question Me concerning that good thing?" The whole passage therefore may be read thus: "O Teacher! what good thing shall I do that I may have eternal life? And He said unto him, Why do you question Me concerning that good thing? There is One that is good." Keep the commandments. From this we may learn that God's great design in giving His law to the Jews was to lead them to the expectation and enjoyment of eternal life. But as all the law referred to Christ, and He became "the end of the law for righteousness" (justification) to all that believe, so He is to be received, in order to have the end accomplished which the law proposed.

All these things have I kept. I have made these precepts the rule of my life. There is a difference worthy of notice between this and our Lord's word. He says, v. 17, keep, earnestly, diligently, as with watch and ward, probably referring not only to the letter but to the spirit. The young man modestly says, All these have I "observed"; I have paid attention to, and endeavored to regulate my conduct by them. I have "kept them in custody." What lack I yet? He felt a troubled conscience, and a mind unassured of the approbation of God; and he clearly perceived that something was wanting to make him truly happy.

21. Then Jesus beholding him. "Looking earnestly" or "affectionately upon him," loved him, because of his youth, his earnestness, and his sincerity. One thing thou lackest. What was that? A heart disengaged from the world, and a complete renunciation of it and its concerns, that he might become a proper and successful laborer in the Lord's vineyard.

If thou wilt be perfect. "Be complete," have the business "finished," and all hindrances to your salvation removed, go and sell that thou hast—go and dispose of your possessions, to which it is evident his heart was too much attached, and give to the poor—for your goods will be a continual snare to you if you keep them; and thou shalt have treasure in heaven—the loss, if it can be called such, shall be made amply up to you in that eternal life about which services he may be called to as a disciple of Christ, and depend upon him for a recompence in heaven? Doth he really believe there is a treasure in heaven sufficient to make up all he can leave, or lose, or lay out, for Christ? Is he willing to deal with Christ upon trust? Can he give him credit for all he is worth; and be willing to bear a present cross, in expectation of a future crown?

2. Upon this he flew off (v. 22); He was sad at that saying; was sorry that he could not be a follower of Christ upon any easier terms, that he could not lay hold on eternal life, and keep hold of his temporal possessions too. But since he could not come up to the terms of discipleship, he was so fair as not to pretend to it; He went away grieved. Here appeared the truth of that (Matt. vi. 24), Ye cannot serve God and mammon; while he held to mammon he did in effect despise Christ. He bids for what he has a mind for in the market, yet goes away grieved, and leaves it, because he cannot have it at his own price.

III. Here is Christ's discourse with his disciples We are tempted to wish that Christ had mollified that saying and taken off the hardness of it: but he knew all men's hearts; he would not court him to be his follower, because he was a rich man and a ruler; but if he will go, let him go. Christ will keep no man against his will.

1. The difficulty of the salvation of those who have an abundance of this world; because there are few who have a deal to leave, that can be persuaded to leave it for Christ.

(1) Christ asserts this here; He looked about upon his disciples; How hardly shall they who have riches enter into the kingdom of God! v. 23. They have many temptations to grapple with, and many difficulties to get over, which lie not in the way of poor people. But he explains himself, v. 24, where he calls the disciples children, because as such they should be taught by him. Whereas he had said, How hardly will those who have riches get to heaven; here he tells them, that the danger arose not so much from their having riches as from their trusting to them. They that have such a value as this for the wealth of the world, will never be brought to put a right value upon Christ and his grace. They that have ever so much riches, but do not trust in them, have got over the difficulty, and can easily part with them for Christ: but they that have ever so little, if they set their hearts upon that little, it will keep them from Christ. He enforces this assertion with, v. 25, It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God. [1] Some imagine there might be some wicket-gate, or door, to Jerusalem, commonly known by the name of the needle's eye, for its straitness, through which a camel could not be got, unless he were unloaded. So a rich man cannot get to heaven, unless he be willing to part with the burthen of his worldly wealth, and stoop to the duties of a humble religion. [2] Others suggest that the word we translate a camel, sometimes signifies a cable-rope. A rich man, compared with the poor, is as a cable to a single thread, and it will not go through the needle's eye, unless it be untwisted. So the rich man must be loosed and disentangled from his riches, that thread by thread he may be got through the eye of the needle, otherwise he is good for nothing but to cast anchor in the earth.

(2) This truth was very surprising to the disciples; They were astonished at his words, v. 24. They were astonished out of measure, and said among themselves, Who then can be saved? They knew what abundance of promises there were, in the Old Testament, of temporal good things; they knew likewise that they who are rich have so much the larger opportunities of doing good, and therefore were amazed to hear that it should be so hard for rich people to go to heaven.

(3) Christ reconciled them to it, by referring it to the almighty power of God, to help even rich people over the difficulties that lie in the way of their salvation (v. 27); He looked upon them: "With men it is impossible, but the grace of God can do it, for with him all things are possible."

2. The greatness of the salvation of those that have but a little of this world, and leave it for Christ. This he speaks of, upon occasion of Peter's mentioning what he and the rest of the disciples had left to follow him; Behold (saith he), we have left all to follow thee, v. 28. "You have done well," saith Christ, "you shall be abundantly recompensed, and not only you shall be reimbursed, who have left but a little, but those that have ever so much, though it were so much as this young man had." (1) The loss is supposed to be very great; he specifies, Worldly wealth; houses are here put first, and lands last: a man may was very sorrowful—Matthew more fully, "went away sorrowful"; Mark still more, "was sad" or "sullen" at that saying, and "went away grieved." Sorry he was, very sorry, to part with Christ; but to part with his riches would have cost him a pang more. When Riches or Heaven, on Christ's terms, were the alternative, the result showed to which side the balance inclined. Thus was he shown to lack the one all-comprehensive requirement of the law—the absolute subjection of the heart to God, and this want vitiated all his other obediences.

when Jesus saw—Mark says, He "looked round about"—as if first following the departing youth with His eye—"and saith unto His disciples." how hardly . . .—with what difficulty. In Mark an explanation is added, "How hard is it for them that trust in riches . . ."—i.e., with what difficulty is this idolatrous trust conquered, without which they cannot enter; and this is introduced by the word "children"—sweet diminutive of affection and pity (John 21:5).

you inquired; and come and follow me—be My disciple, and I will appoint you to preach the kingdom of God to others.

22. And he was sad at that saying. This young man had perhaps been a saint, and an eminent apostle, had he been poor! From this, and a multitude of other cases, we may learn that it is oftentimes a misfortune to be rich. But who is aware of this?—and who believes it?

Went away sorrowful. Men undergo great agony of mind while they are in suspense between the love of the world and the love of their souls. He had great possessions. And what were these in comparison of peace of conscience and mental rest?

A rich man shall hardly enter. That is, into the spirit and privileges of the gospel in this world, and through them into the Kingdom of glory.

A camel. It was a mode of expression common among the Jews, and signified a thing impossible. Hence this proverb: "No man sees a palm tree of gold, nor an elephant passing through the eye of a needle."

With men this is impossible. God alone can take the love of the world out of human heart. Therefore the salvation of the rich is represented as possible only to Him.

MATTHEW HENRY

quit his house, which should be for his habitation, and his land, which should be for his maintenance; or his dear relations. Father and mother, wife and children, brethren and sisters. Without these the world would be a wilderness; yet, when we must either forsake these or Christ, we must remember that we stand in nearer relation to Christ than we do to any creature. The greatest trial of a good man's constancy is, when his love to Christ comes to stand in competition with a love that is lawful, nay, that is his duty. It is easy to such a one to forsake a lust for Christ; but to forsake a father, a brother, a wife, for Christ, that is, to forsake those whom he knows he must love, is hard. And yet he must do so, rather than deny or disown Christ. It is not the suffering, but the cause, that makes the martyr. And therefore, (2) The advantage will be great. They shall receive a hundred-fold in this time, houses, and brethren, and sisters. He shall have abundance of comfort while he lives, sufficient to make up all his losses. Suffering Christians shall have a hundred-fold in the comforts of the Spirit sweetening their creature comforts. It is added here in Mark, with persecutions. Even when they are gainers by Christ, let them still expect to be sufferers for him. They shall have eternal life in the world to come. If they receive a hundred-fold in this world, one would think they should not be encouraged to expect any more. Yet, as if that were a small matter, they shall have life eternal into the bargain. But because they talked so much, and really more than became them, of leaving all for Christ, he tells them, though they were first called, that there should be disciples called after them, that should be preferred before them. Then the first were last, and the last first.

Verses 32–45

I. Christ's prediction of his own sufferings.

1. See here how bold he was; when they were going up to Jerusalem, Jesus went before them, v. 32. Now that the time was at hand, more than ever, he pressed forward. Jesus went before them, and they were amazed. They began now to consider what imminent danger they ran themselves into, when they went to Jerusalem; and they were ready to tremble at the thought of it. To hearten them, therefore, Christ went before them. When we see ourselves entering upon sufferings, it is encouraging to see our Master go before us. Or, He went before them, and therefore they were amazed; they admired to see with what cheerfulness and alacrity he went on. Christ's courage and constancy are, and will be, the wonder of all his disciples.

2. See here how timorous and faint-hearted his disciples were; As they followed, they were afraid. Their Master's courage should have put spirit into them.

3. See here what method he took to silence their fears. He did not go about to make the matter better than it was, but told them again the things that should happen to him. He knew the worst of it, and therefore went on thus boldly, and he will let them know the worst of it. Come, be not afraid. He shall rise again; the issue of his sufferings will be glorious to himself, and advantageous to all that are his, v. 33, 34. The method and particulars of Christ's sufferings are more largely foretold here than in any other of the predictions. Christ had a perfect foresight, not only of his own death, but of all the aggravating circumstances of it; and yet he thus went forth to meet it.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

is no man . . .—graciously acknowledging at once the completeness and the acceptableness of the surrender as a thing already made. house . . .—The specification is still more minute in Matthew and Mark, to take in every form of self-sacrifice. for the kingdom of God's sake—in Mark, "for MY sake and the Gospel's." See on ch. 6:22. manifold more in this present time—in Matthew (19:29) "an hundredfold," to which Mark (10:30) gives this most interesting addition, "Now in this present time, houses, and brethren, and sisters, and mothers, and children, and lands, with persecutions." We have here the blessed promise of a reconstruction of all human relationships and affections on a Christian basis and in a Christian state, after being sacrificed, in their natural form, on the altar of love to Christ. This He calls "manifold more"—"an hundredfold more"—than what they sacrificed. Our Lord was Himself the first to exemplify this new adjustment of His own relationships. (See on Matt. 12:49, 50; and on II Cor. 6:14-18.) But this "with persecutions"; for how could such a transfer take place without the most cruel wrenches to flesh and blood? but the persecution would haply follow them into their new and higher circle, breaking that up too! But best of all, "in the world to come life everlasting." And

> When the shore is won at last
> Who will count the billows past?

These promises are for every one who forsakes his all for Christ.

32-45. THIRD EXPLICIT AND STILL FULLER ANNOUNCEMENT OF HIS APPROACHING SUFFERINGS, DEATH, AND RESURRECTION—THE AMBITIOUS REQUEST OF JAMES AND JOHN, AND THE REPLY. (= Matt. 20:17-28; Luke 18:31-34.)

Third Announcement of His approaching Sufferings, Death, and Resurrection (vss. 32-34). 32. And they were in the way—on the road. going up to Jerusalem—in Perea, and probably somewhere between Ephraim and Jericho, on the farther side of the Jordan, and to the northeast of Jerusalem. and Jesus went before them—as GROTIUS says, in the style of an intrepid Leader. and they were amazed—or "struck with astonishment" at His courage in advancing to certain death. and as they followed, they were afraid—for their own safety. These artless, lifelike touches—not only from an eye-witness, but one whom the noble carriage of the Master struck with wonder and awe—are peculiar to Mark, and give the second Gospel a charm all its own; making us feel as if we ourselves were in the midst of the scenes it describes. Well might the poet exclaim—

> The Saviour, what a noble flame
> Was kindled in His breast,
> When, hasting to Jerusalem,
> He march'd before the rest!
> COWPER

And he took again the twelve—referring to His previous announcements on this sad subject. and began to tell them what things should happen unto him—were going to befall Him." The word expresses something already begun but not brought to a head, rather than something wholly future. 33. Saying, Behold, we go up to Jerusalem—for the last time, and—"all things that are written by the prophets concerning the Son of man shall be accomplished" (Luke 18:31). the Son of man shall be delivered unto the chief priests and unto the scribes; and they shall condemn him to death, and shall deliver him to the Gentiles—This is the first express statement that the Gentiles would combine with the Jews in His death; the two grand divisions of the human race for whom He died thus taking part in crucifying the Lord of Glory, as WEBSTER and WILKINSON observe. 34. And they shall mock him, and shall scourge him, and shall spit upon him, and shall kill him: and the third day he shall rise again—Singularly explicit as this announcement was, Luke (18:34) says "they understood none of these things; and this saying was hid from them, neither knew they the things which were spoken." The meaning of the words they could be at no loss to understand, but their import in relation to His Messianic kingdom they could not penetrate; the whole prediction being right in the teeth of their preconceived notions. That they should have clung so tenaciously to the popular notion of an *un*suffering Messiah, may surprise us; but it gives

29. And the gospel's. Read, "for the sake of the gospel," on the authority of most MSS. and almost all the versions.

30. In this time. "In this very time." Though Jews and Gentiles have conspired together to destroy both Me and you, My providence shall so work that nothing shall be lacking while anything is necessary. Those who have left all for the sake of Christ do find, among genuine Christians, spiritual relatives, which are as dear to them as fathers, mothers, etc. Yet they have the promise of receiving an hundredfold often literally fulfilled; for wherever a Christian travels among Christians, the shelter of their houses and the product of their lands are at his service as far as they are requisite. With persecutions. For while you meet with nothing but kindness from true Christians, you shall be despised, and often afflicted, by those who are enemies to God and goodness. But, for your comfort, you shall have in the world to come, "the coming world" (that world which is on its way to meet you), eternal life.

And Jesus going up. From Jericho to Jerusalem,

32. And he took again the twelve. Or thus: "For having again taken the twelve." I translate kai "for," which signification it often bears; see Luke i. 22; John xii. 35, and elsewhere. This gives the reason of the wonder and fear of the disciples, for He began to tell them, on the way, what was to befall Him.

The Son of man shall be betrayed. Or "will be delivered up." This is the third time that our Lord informed His disciples of His approaching sufferings and death. This was a subject of the utmost importance, and it was necessary they should be well prepared for such an awful event.

Deliver him to the Gentiles to mock. This was done by Herod and his Roman soldiers. See Luke xxiii. 11. To scourge, and to crucify. This was done by Pilate, the Roman governor. The punishment of the cross was Roman, not Jewish; but the chief priests condemned Him to it, and the Romans executed the sentence.

MATTHEW HENRY

II. The check he gave to two of his disciples for their ambitious request. This story is much the same here as we had it Matt. xx. 20. Only there they are said to have made their request by their mother, here they are said to make it themselves. As, on the one hand, there are some that do not use, so, on the other hand, there are some that abuse, the great encouragements Christ has given us in prayer. It was a culpable presumption in these disciples to make such a boundless demand upon their Master;

We would that thou shouldst do for us whatsoever we shall desire. We had much better leave it to him to do for us what he sees fit, and he will do more than we can desire, Eph. iii. 20. We must be cautious how we make general promises. What would ye that I should do for you? He would have them go on with their suit, that they might be made ashamed of it. James and John conclude, If Christ rise again, he must be a king, and if he be a king, his apostles must be peers, and one of these would willingly be the first peer of the realm, and the other next him. To be good should be more our care than to look great, or to have the pre-eminence. Our weakness and short-sightedness appear as much in our prayers as in any thing. It is folly to *pre*scribe to God, and wisdom to *sub*scribe. It is the will of Christ that we should prepare for sufferings, and leave it to him to recompense us for them. Our care must be, that we may have wisdom and grace to know how to suffer with him, and then we may trust him to provide in the best manner how we shall reign with him.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

How lonely Jesus was! While He strode before the Twelve, absorbed in thoughts of the cross to which He was pressing, they, as they followed, "amazed" and "afraid," were thinking not of what He would suffer, but of what they might gain. He saw the cross. They understood little of it, but supposed that somehow it would bring in the kingdom, and they dimly saw thrones for themselves. Hence James and John try to secure the foremost places, and hence the others' anger at what they thought an unfair attempt to push in front of them. What a contrast between Jesus, striding on ahead with "set" face, and the Twelve unsympathetic and self-seeking, lagging behind to squabble about preeminence! We have in this incident two parts: the request and its answer, the indignation of the Ten and its rebuke. The one sets forth the qualifications for the highest place in the kingdom; the other, the paradox that preeminence there is service.

James and John were members of the group of original disciples who stood nearest to Jesus, and of the group of three whom He kept specially at His side. Their present place might well lead them to expect preeminence in the kingdom, but their trick was mean, as being an underhanded attempt to forestall Peter, the remaining one of the three, as putting forward their mother as spokeswoman, and as endeavoring to entrap Jesus into promising before the disclosure of what was desired. Matthew tells that the mother was brought in order to make the request, and that Jesus brushed her aside by directing His answer to her sons ("Ye know not what ye ask"). The attempt to get Jesus' promise without telling what was desired betrayed the consciousness that the wish was wrong. His guarded counter-question would chill them and make their disclosure somewhat hesitating.

Note the strangely blended good and evil of the request. The gold was mingled with clay; selfishness and love delighting in being near Him both had place in it. We may well recoginexpressible weight to their after-testimony to a suffering and dying Saviour.

Ambitious Request of James and John—The Reply (vss. 35-45). 35. And James and John, the sons of Zebedee, come unto him, saying—Matthew (20:20) says their "mother came to Him with her sons, worshipping Him and desiring . . ." (Cf. Matt. 27:56, with ch. 15:40.) Salome was her name (ch. 16:1). We cannot be sure with which of the parties the movement originated; but as our Lord, even in Matthew's account, addresses Himself to James and John, taking no account of the mother, it is likely the mother was merely set on by them. The thought was doubtless suggested to her sons by the recent promise to the Twelve of "thrones to sit on, when the Son of man should sit on the throne of His glory" (Matt. 19:28); but after the reproof so lately given them (ch. 9:33, etc.) they get their mother to speak for them. Master, we would that thou shouldest do for us whatsoever we shall desire—thus cautiously approaching the subject. 36. And he said unto them, What would ye that I should do for you?—Though well aware what was in their mind and their mother's, our Lord will have the unseemly petition uttered before all. 37. Grant unto us that we may sit, one on thy right hand, and the other on thy left hand, in thy glory—i.e., Assign to us the two places of highest honor in the coming kingdom. The semblance of a plea for so presumptuous a request might possibly have been drawn from the fact that one of the two usually leaned on the breast of Jesus, or sat next Him at meals, while the other was one of the favored three. 38. But Jesus said unto them, Ye know not what ye ask—How gentle the reply to such a request, preferred at such a time, after the sad announcement just made! can ye drink of the cup that I drink of?—To "drink of a cup" is in Scripture a figure for getting one's fill either of good (Ps. 16:5; 23:5; 116:13; Jer. 16:7) or of ill (Ps. 75:8; John 18:11; Rev. 14:10). Here it is the cup of suffering. and be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with—(Cf. for the language, Ps. 42:7). The object of this question seems to have been to try how far those two men were capable of the dignity to which they aspired and this on the principle that he who is able to suffer most for His sake will be the nearest to Him in His kingdom. 39. And they said unto him, We can—Here we see them owning their mother's petition for them as their own; and doubtless they were perfectly sincere in professing their willingness to follow their Master to any suffering He might have to endure. As for James, he was the first of the apostles who was honored, and showed himself able to be baptized with his Master's baptism of blood (Acts 12:1, 2); while John, after going through all the persecutions to which the infant Church was exposed from the Jews, and sharing in the struggles and sufferings occasioned by the first triumphs of the Gospel among the Gentiles, lived to be the victim, after all the rest had got to glory, of a bitter persecution in the evening of his days, for the word of God and for the testimony of Jesus Christ. Yes, they were dear believers and blessed men, in spite of this unworthy ambition, and their Lord knew it; and perhaps the foresight of what they would have to pass through, and the courageous testimony He would yet receive from them, was the cause of that gentleness which we cannot but wonder at in His reproof. And Jesus said unto them, Ye shall indeed drink of the cup that I drink of; and with the baptism that I am baptized withal shall ye be baptized—No doubt this prediction, when their sufferings at length came upon them, cheered them with the assurance, not that they would sit on His right and left hand—for of that thought they would be heartily ashamed—but that "if they suffered with Him, they should be also glorified together." 40. But to sit on my right hand and on my left hand in not mine to give; but it shall be given to them for whom it is prepared—"of My Father" (Matt. 20:23). The supplement which our translators have inserted is approved by some good interpreters, and the proper sense of the word rendered "but" is certainly in favor of it. But besides that it makes the statement too elliptical—leaving too many words to be supplied—it seems to make our Lord repudiate the right to assign to each of His people his place in the kingdom of glory; a thing which He nowhere else does, but rather the contrary. It is true that He says their place is "prepared for them by His Father." But that is true of their admission to heaven at all; and yet from His great white throne Jesus will Himself adjudicate the kingdom, and authoritatively invite into it those on His right hand, calling them the "blessed of His

ADAM CLARKE

35. And James and John . . . come unto him. The request here mentioned, Matthew says, chap. xx. 20, was made by Salome, their mother. The two places may be easily reconciled thus: The mother introduced them, and made the request as if from herself; Jesus, knowing whence it had come, immediately addressed himself to James and John, who were standing by; and the mother is no further concerned in the business.

Ye know not what ye ask. How strange is the infatuation in some parents which leads them to desire worldly or ecclesiastical honors for their children! He must be much in love with the Cross who wishes to have his child a minister of the gospel; for, if he be such as God approves of in the work, his life will be a life of toil and suffering.

38. And be baptized. "Or be baptized." Instead of and, "or" is the reading of many versions and MSS.

W. E. VINE:

BAPTISMA, baptism, consisting of the processes of immersion, submersion and emergence (from bapto, to dip), is used (a) of John's baptism; (b) of Christian baptism; (c) of the overwhelming afflictions and judgments to which the Lord voluntarily submitted on the cross, e.g., Luke 12:50; (d) of the sufferings His followers would experience, not of a vicarious character, but in fellowship with the sufferings of their Master. Some mss. have the word in Matt. 20:22, 23; it is used in Mark 10:38, 39, with this meaning.

—Vine's Expository Dictionary

Is not mine to give, but it shall be given to them for whom it is prepared of my Father. The true construction of the words is this: "To sit on My right hand and on My left is not mine to give, except to them for whom it is prepared of My Father." According to the prediction of Christ, these brethren did partake of His afflictions. James was martyred by Herod, Acts xii. 2; and John was banished to Patmos for the testimony of Christ, Rev. i. 9.

nize our own likenesses in these two with their love spotted with self-regard, and be grateful for the gentle answer which did not blame the desire for preeminence, but sought to test the love. It was not only to teach them that He brought them back to think of the cross which must precede the glory, but because His own mind was so filled with it that He saw that glory only as through the darkness which had to be traversed to reach it. But for us all, the question is solemn and heart-searching.

Was not the answer, "We are able," too bold? They knew neither what they asked nor what they promised; but just as their ignorant question was partly redeemed by its love, their ignorant vow was ennobled by its very rashness, as well as by the unfaltering love in it. They did not know what they were promising, but they knew that they loved Him so well that to share anything with Him would be blessed. So it was not in their own strength that the swift answer rushed to their lips, but in the strength of a love that makes heroes out of cowards. And they nobly redeemed their pledge. We, too, if we are Christ's, have the same question put to us, and, weak and timid as we are, may venture to give the same answer, trusting to His strength.

—Expositions of Holy Scripture

III. The check he gave to the rest of the disciples, for their uneasiness at it. They began to be much displeased, to have indignation about James and John, v. 41. They were angry at them for affecting precedency, because each of them hoped to have it himself. So these discovered their own ambition, in their displeasure at the ambition of James and John; and Christ took this occasion to warn them against it, v. 42–44. He called them to him in a familiar way, to give them an example of condescension. He shows them,

1. That dominion was generally abused in the world (v. 42); They that seem to rule over the Gentiles, they exercise lordship over them, that is all they study and aim at. Their care is, what they shall get by their subjects to support their own pomp and grandeur, not what they shall do for them.

2. That therefore it ought not to be admitted into the church; "It shall not so be among you; those that shall be put under your charge, must be as sheep under the charge of the shepherd, who is to tend them and feed them, and be a servant to them, not as horses under the command of the driver, that works them and beats them, and gets his pennyworths out of them. He that affects to be great and chief, he shall be servant of all. He that would be truly great and chief, he must lay out himself to do good to all. Those not only shall be most honoured hereafter, but are most honourable now, who are most useful." To convince them of this, he sets before them his own example (v. 45). He takes upon him the form of a servant, comes not to be ministered to, and waited upon, but to minister. He becomes obedient to death, for he gives his life a ransom for many.

This passage of story agrees with that in Matt. xx. 29, &c. Only that there we were told of two blind men; here, and Luke xviii. 35, only of one: but if there were two, there was one. This one is named here; he was called Bartimæus, that is, the son of Timæus.

I. This blind man sat begging. Those who are disabled to get a livelihood by their own labour, are the most proper objects of charity; and particular care ought to be taken of them.

II. He cried out; Have mercy on me, O Lord, thou Son of David. Misery is the object of mercy.

III. Christ encouraged him, for he stood still, and commanded him to be called. We must never reckon it a hindrance to us in our way, to stand still, when it is to do a good work. Those about him, who had

Father"; so little inconsistency is there between the eternal choice of them by His Father, and that public adjudication of them, not only to heaven in general, but each to his own position in it, which all Scripture assigns to Christ. The true rendering, then, of this clause, we take it, is this: "But to sit on My right hand and on My left hand is not Mine to give, save to them for whom it is prepared." When therefore He says, "It is not Mine to give," the meaning is, "I cannot give it as a favor to whomsoever I please, or on a principle of favoritism; it belongs exclusively to those for whom it is prepared," etc. And if this be His meaning, it will be seen how far our Lord is from disclaiming the right to assign to each his proper place in His Kingdom; that on the contrary, He expressly asserts it, merely announcing that the principle of distribution is quite different from what these petitioners supposed. Our Lord, it will be observed, does not deny the petition of James and John, or say they shall not occupy the place in His kingdom which they now improperly sought:—for aught we know, that may be their true place. All we are sure of is, that their asking it was displeasing to Him "to whom all judgment is committed," and so was not fitted to gain their object, but just the reverse. (See what is taught in Luke 14:8-11.) One at least of these brethren, as ALFORD strikingly remarks, saw on the right and on the left hand of their Lord, as He hung upon the tree, the crucified thieves; and bitter indeed must have been the remembrance of this ambitious prayer at that moment. 41. And when the ten heard it, they began to be much displeased with James and John—or "were moved with indignation," as the same word is rendered in Matthew 20:24. The expression "began to be," which is of frequent occurrence in the Gospels, means that more passed than is expressed, and that we have but the result. And can we blame the ten for the indignation which they felt? Yet there was probably a spice of the old spirit of rivalry in it, which in spite of our Lord's recent lengthened, diversified, and most solemn warnings against it, had not ceased to stir in their breasts. 42. But Jesus called them to him, and saith unto them, Ye know that they which are accounted to rule—are recognized or acknowledged as rulers. over the Gentiles exercise lordship over them: and their great ones exercise authority upon them—as superiors exercising an acknowledged authority over inferiors. 43. But so shall it not be among you: but whosoever will be great among you, shall be your minister—a subordinate servant. 44. And whosoever of you will be the chiefest—or "first." shall be—i.e., "let him be, or "shall be he who is prepared to be." servant of all—one in the lowest condition of service. 45. For even the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for. instead of—many—i.e., "In the kingdom about to be set up, this principle shall have no place. All My servants shall there be equal; and the only greatness known to it shall be the greatness of humility and devotedness to the service of others. He that goes down the deepest in these services of self-denying humility shall rise the highest and hold the chiefest place in that kingdom; even as the Son of man, whose abasement and self-sacrifice for others, transcending all, gives Him of right a place above all!" As "the Word in the beginning with God," He was ministered unto; and as the risen Redeemer in our nature He now is ministered unto, "angels and authorities and powers being made subject unto Him" (I Pet. 3:22); but not for this came He hither. The Served of all came to be the Servant of all; and His last act was the grandest Service ever beheld by the universe of God—"HE GAVE HIS LIFE a RANSOM FOR MANY!" "Many" is here to be taken, not in contrast with few or with all, but in opposition to one—the one Son of man for the many sinners.

46-52. BLIND BARTIMEUS HEALED. (=Matt. 20:29-34; Luke 18:35-43.) See on Luke 18:35-43.

In Matthew 20: 29-34, they are two, as in the case of the Demoniac of Gadara. In Matthew and Mark (10:46-52) the occurrence is connected with Christ's departure from Jericho; in Luke with His approach to it. Many ways of accounting for these slight divergences of detail have been proposed. Perhaps, if we knew all the facts, we should see no difficulty; but that we have been left so far in the dark shows that the thing is of no moment any way. One thing is plain, there could have been no collusion among the authors of these Gospels, else they would have taken care to remove these "spots on the sun."

W. E. VINE:

AGANAKTEO, to be indignant, to be moved with indignation (from agan, much, achomai, to grieve), is translated "were moved with indignation" of the ten disciples against James and John, Matt. 20:24; in Mark 10: 41, R.V. (A.V., "they began to be much displeased"); in Matt. 21:15, of the chief priests and scribes, against Christ and the children, R.V., "they were moved with indignation" (A.V., "they were sore displeased"); in 26:8, of the disciples against the woman who anointed Christ's feet, "they had indignation"; so Mark 14:4; in Mark 10:14, of Christ, against the disciples, for rebuking the children, "He was moved with indignation," R.V. (A.V., "he was much displeased"); in Luke 13:14, of the ruler of the synagogue against Christ for healing on the Sabbath, "being moved with indignation," R.V., A.V., "[answered] with indignation."

41. When the ten heard it. See Matt. xx. 24-28.

Exercise dominion . . . and . . . authority upon them. They "tyrannized" and "exercised arbitrary power" over the people.

It shall not be so among you. Every kind of lordship and spiritual domination over the Church of Christ, like that exercised by the Church of Rome, is destructive and antichristian. Your minister. Or "deacon." I know no other word which could at once convey the meaning of the original and make a proper distinction between it and servant, in v. 27. The office of a deacon, in the primitive Church, was to serve in the love feasts, to distribute the bread and wine to the communicants; to proclaim different parts and times of worship in the churches; and to take care of the widows, orphans, prisoners, and sick, who were provided for out of the revenues of the Church. Thus we find it was the very lowest ecclesiastical office.

Your servant. The lowest secular office, as deacon was the lowest ecclesiastical office.

A ransom for many. Or "a ransom instead of many,"—one Ransom, or Atonement, instead of the many prescribed in the Jewish law.

46. Blind Bartimaeus. Bar in Syriac signifies "son." It appears that he was thus named because Timeus, Talmeus or Talmai, was the name of his father, and thus the son would be called Bar-talmeus, or Bartholomew. It was because he was the most remarkable that this Evangelist mentions him by name, as a person probably well-known in those parts.

MATTHEW HENRY

discouraged him at first, perhaps were now the persons that signified to him the gracious call of Christ; "Be of good comfort, rise, he calls thee." The gracious invitations Christ gives us to come to him, are great encouragements to our hope, that we shall have what we come for.

IV. The poor man, hereupon, cast away his loose upper garment, and came to Jesus (v. 50); he cast away everything that might be in danger of throwing him down, or might any way hinder him. Those who would come to Jesus must cast away the garment of their own sufficiency, and the sin that, like long garments, doth most easily beset them, Heb. xii. 1.

V. The particular favour he begged, was, that his eyes might be opened; that so he might be able to work for his living, and might be no longer burthensome to others.

VI. This favour he received; his eyes were opened (v. 52). "Thy faith hath made thee whole; not thy importunity, but thy faith, setting Christ on work, or rather Christ setting thy faith on work." Those supplies are most comfortable, that are fetched in by our faith. When he had received his sight, he followed Jesus by the way. By this he made it appear that he was thoroughly cured, that he no more needed one to lead him. When he had his sight, he made this use of it. It is not enough to come to Christ for spiritual healing, but, when we are healed, we must continue to follow him. Those that have spiritual eye-sight, see that beauty in Christ, that will effectually draw them to run after him.

commanded . . .—Mark has this interesting addition: "And they call the blind man, saying unto him, Be of good comfort, rise, He calleth thee"—just as one earnestly desiring an interview with some exalted person, but told by one official after another that it is vain to wait, as he will not succeed (they know it), yet persists in waiting for some answer to his suit, and at length the door opens, and a servant appears, saying, "You will be admitted—he has called you." And are there no other suitors to Jesus who sometimes fare thus? "And he, casting away his garment"—how lively is this touch, evidently of an eye-witness, expressive of his earnestness and joy—"came to Jesus" (Mark 10:49, 50). What wilt thou . . .—to try them; to deepen their present consciousness of need; and to draw out their faith in Him. Lord "Rabboni" (Mark 10:51); an emphatic and confiding exclamation. (See on John 9.)

50. And he, casting away his garment. He cast off his outward covering, a blanket, or loose piece of cloth, the usual upper garment of an Asiatic mendicant, which kept him from the inclemency of the weather, that he might have nothing to hinder him from getting speedily to Christ. If every penitent were as ready to throw aside his self-righteousness and sinful encumbrances as this blind man was to throw aside his garment, we should have fewer delays in conversions than we now have.

52. Followed Jesus in the way. Instead of Jesus, several eminent critics read him.

CHAPTER 11

We have here the story of the public entry Christ made into Jerusalem. And he came into town thus remarkably, 1. To show that he was not afraid of the power and malice of his enemies in Jerusalem. He did not steal into the city incognito, as one that durst not show his face. 2. To show that he was not cast down or disquieted at the thoughts of his approaching sufferings. He came, not only publicly, but cheerfully.

I. The outside of this triumph was very mean; he rode upon an ass's colt. This colt was borrowed too. Christ went upon the water in a borrowed boat, ate the passover in a borrowed chamber, was buried in a borrowed sepulchre, and here rode on borrowed ass. Let not Christians scorn to be beholden one to another, and, when need is, to go borrowing, for our Master did not. He had no rich trappings; they threw their clothes upon the colt, and so he sat upon him, v. 7. All the show they could make was, by spreading their garments in the way, and strewing branches of trees in the way (v. 8), as they used to do at the feast of tabernacles. They are instructions to us, not to mind high things, but to condescend to them of low estate. How ill doth it become Christians to take state, when Christ was so far from affecting it!

II. The inside of this triumph was very great. Christ showed his knowledge of things distant, and his power over the wills of men, when he sent his disciples for the colt, v. 1–3. He showed his dominion over the creatures in riding on a colt that was never backed. Perhaps Christ, in riding the ass's colt, would give a shadow of his power over the spirit of man, who is born as the wild ass's colt, Job xi. 12. The colt was brought from a place where two ways met (v. 4), as if Christ would show that he came to direct those into the right way, who had two ways before them, and were in danger of taking the wrong. Christ received the joyful hosannas of the people. It was God that put it into the hearts of these people to cry Hosanna.

(1) They welcomed his person (v. 9); Blessed is he that cometh, so often promised, so long expected; he comes in the name of the Lord; Blessed be he: let him have our applauses, and best affections; he is a blessed Saviour, and brings blessings to us, and blessed be he that sent him.

(2) They wished well to his interest, v. 10. They believed that he had a kingdom, that it was the kingdom of their father David; a kingdom that came in the name of the Lord. Blessed be this kingdom; let it come in the power of it. Let it go on conquering, and to conquer. Hosanna to this kingdom; all happiness attend it.

Christ, thus attended, thus applauded, came into the city, and went directly to the temple. He came to the temple, and took a view of the present state of it, v. 11. He looked round about upon all things, but as yet said nothing. He let things be as they were for this night, intending the next morning to apply himself to the necessary reformation. We may be whole multitude . . .—The language here is very grand, intended to express a burst of admiration far wider and deeper than ever had been witnessed before. Blessed be the King . . .—Mark more fully, "Hosanna," i.e., "Save now," the words of Psalm 118:25, which were understood to refer to Messiah; and so they add, "to the Son of David, blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord (Ps. 118:26), Hosanna in the highest." This was the very loftiest style in which He could be saluted as the promised Deliverer.

1. He sendeth forth two of his disciples. This was done but a few days before the Passover. See our Lord's entry into Jerusalem illustrated, on Matt. xxi. 1-17.

2. Whereon never man sat. No animal was allowed to be employed in sacred uses, even among the heathen, that had previously been used for any domestic or agricultural purpose; and those which had never been yoked were considered as sacred.

3. And straightway he will send him hither. From the text I think it is exceedingly plain that our Lord did not beg, but borrow, the colt; therefore the latter clause of this verse should be understood as the promise of returning him. Is not the proper translation the following? "And if anyone say to you, Why do ye this? Say, The Lord hath need of him, and will speedily send him back hither."

6. And they let them go. Having a full assurance that the beast should be safely and speedily restored.

10. In the name of the Lord. Omitted by some MSS. and several versions. Hosanna in the highest. See on Matt. xxi. 9.

11. When he had looked round about upon all things. He examined everything, to see if the matters pertaining to the divine worship were properly conducted, to see that nothing was wanting, nothing superfluous. And now the eventide was come. The time in which He usually left Jerusalem to go to Bethany.

confident that God sees all the wickedness that is in the world, though he do not presently reckon for it, nor cast it out. Christ, having made his remarks upon what he saw in the temple, retired in the evening to a friend's house at Bethany.

I. Christ's cursing the fruitless fig-tree. He returned in the morning, at working-time; and so intent was he upon his work, that he went out from Bethany without breakfast, and was hungry (v. 12). He went to a fig-tree, being well adorned with green leaves which he hoped to find enriched with some fruit. But he found nothing but leaves; he hoped to find some fruit, for though the time of gathering in figs was near, it was not yet. There was not so much as one fig to be found upon it, though it was so full of leaves. However, Christ was willing to make an example of it, not to the trees, but to the men, of that generation, and therefore cursed it. He said unto it, Never let any man eat fruit of thee hereafter for ever, v. 14. This was intended to be a type and figure of the doom passed upon the Jewish church, to which he came, seeking fruit, but found none (Luke xiii. 6, 7). The disciples heard what sentence Christ passed on this tree, and took notice of it. Woes from Christ's mouth are to be observed and kept in mind, as well as blessings.

II. His clearing the temple of the market people that frequented it, and of those that made it a thoroughfare. He came, hungry as he was, to Jerusalem, and went straight to the temple, and began to reform those abuses which the day before he had marked out. He came not, as he was falsely accused, to destroy the temple, but to purify and refine it.

1. He cast out the buyers and sellers, overthrew the tables of the money-changers (and threw the money to the ground, the fitter place for it), and threw down the seats of them that sold doves. And he did it without opposition; for what he did, was manifested to be right and good, even in the consciences of those that had connived at it, and countenanced it, because they got money by it. It may be some encouragement to zealous reformers, that frequently the purging out of corruptions, and the correcting of abuses, prove an easier piece of work than was apprehended. Prudent attempts sometimes prove successful beyond expectation.

2. He would not suffer that any man should carry any vessel through the temple, v. 16. The Jews owned that it was one of the instances of honour due to the temple, not to make the mountain of the house, or the court of the Gentiles, a road, or common passage, or to come into it with any bundle.

3. He gave a good reason for this; because it was written, My house shall be called of all nations, The house of prayer, v. 17. It shall pass among all people under that character. It shall be the house of prayer to all nations; it was so in the first institution of it. Christ will have the temple to be, (1) A house of prayer. After he had turned out the oxen and doves, which were things for sacrifice, he revived the appointment of it as a house of prayer. (2) That it should be so to all nations, and not to the people of the Jews only; for whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord, shall be saved. When Christ drove out the buyers and sellers at the beginning of his ministry, he only charged them with making the temple a house of merchandise (John ii. 16); but now he chargeth them with making it a den of thieves. Those that suffer vain worldly thoughts to lodge within them when they are at their devotions, turn the house of prayer into a house of merchandise; but they that make long prayers for a pretence to devour widows' houses, turn it into a den of thieves.

4. The scribes and the chief priests were extremely nettled at this, v. 18. They hated him, and yet they feared him, lest he should next overthrow their seats, and expel them. They found that all the people were astonished at his doctrine, and that everything he said was an oracle and a law to them; and what durst he not attempt, being thus supported? They therefore sought, not how they might make their peace with him, but how they might destroy him. They care not what they do, to support their own power and grandeur.

III. His discourse with his disciples, upon occasion of the fig-tree's withering away. At even, as usual, he went out of the city (v. 19), to Bethany. The next morning, as they passed by, they observed the fig-tree dried up from the roots, v. 20. The curse was no more than that it should never bear fruit again, but the effect goes further, it is dried up from the roots. If it bear no fruit, it shall bear no leaves to cheat people.

1. How the disciples were affected with it. Peter remembered Christ's words, and said, with surprise, Master, behold, the fig-tree which thou cursedst is our Evangelist dispose of this His first day in Jerusalem, after the triumphal entry. Nor do the Third and Fourth Gospels give us more light. But from Matthew (21:10, 11, 14-16) we learn some additional and precious particulars, for which see on Luke 19:45-48. It was not now safe for the Lord to sleep in the city, nor, from the day of His Triumphal Entry, did He pass one night in it, save the last fatal one.

The Barren Fig Tree Cursed (vss. 12-14). 12. And on the morrow—The Triumphal Entry being on the first day of the week, this following day was Monday. when they were come from Bethany—"in the morning" (Matt. 21:18). he was hungry—How was that? Had he stolen forth from that dear roof at Bethany to the "mountain to pray, and continued all night in prayer to God?" (Luke 6:12); or, "in the morning," as on a former occasion, "risen up a great while before day, and departed into a solitary place, and there prayed" (ch. 1:35); not breaking His fast thereafter, but bending His steps straight for the city, that He might "work the works of Him that sent Him while it was day"? (John 9:4). We know not, though one lingers upon and loves to trace out the every movement of that life of wonders. One thing, however we are sure of—it was real bodily hunger which He now sought to allay by the fruit of this fig tree, "if haply He might find any thing thereon"; not a mere scene for the purpose of teaching a lesson, as some early heretics maintained, and some still seem virtually to hold. 13. And seeing a fig tree—(In Matt. 21:19, it is "one fig tree," but the sense is the same as here, "a certain fig tree," as in Matt. 8:19, etc.) Bethphage, which adjoined Bethany, derives his name from its being a fig region—"House of figs." afar off having leaves—and therefore promising fruit, which in the case of figs come before the leaves. he came, if haply he might find any thing thereon: and when he came to it, he found nothing but leaves; for the time of figs was not yet—What the precise import of this explanation is, interpreters are not agreed. Perhaps all that is meant is, that as the proper fig season had not arrived, no fruit would have been expected even of this tree but for the leaves which it had, which were in this case prematurely and unnaturally developed. 14. And Jesus answered and said unto it, No man eat fruit of thee hereafter for ever—That word did not make the tree barren, but sealed it up in its own barrenness. See on Matthew 13:13-15. And his disciples heard it—and marked the saying. This is introduced as a connecting link, to explain what was afterwards to be said on the subject, as the narrative has to proceed to the other transactions of this day.

Second Cleansing of the Temple (vss. 15-18). For the exposition of this portion, see on Luke 19:45-48.

As the first cleansing was on His first visit to Jerusalem (John 2:13-22), so this second cleansing was on His last. den of thieves—banded together for plunder, reckless of principle. The mild term "house of merchandise," used on the former occasion, was now unsuitable.

sought—continued seeking, i.e., daily, as He taught.

Lessons from the Cursing of the Fig Tree (vss. 20-26). 20. And in the morning—of Tuesday, the third day of the week: He had slept, as during all this week, at Bethany. as they passed by—going into Jerusalem again. they saw the fig tree dried up from the roots—no partial blight, leaving life in the root; but it was now dead, root and branch. In Matthew 21:19 it is said it withered away as soon as it was cursed. But the full blight had not appeared probably at once; and in the dusk perhaps, as they returned to Bethany, they had not

13. For the time of figs was not yet. Rather, "For it was not the season of gathering figs yet." When our Lord saw this fig tree by the wayside, apparently flourishing, he went to it to gather some of the figs. Being on the wayside, it was not private but public property, and any traveller had an equal right to its fruit. As it was not as yet the time for gathering in the fruits, and yet about the time when they were ready to be gathered, our Lord with propriety expected to find some. This tree was intended to point out the state of the Jewish people. (1) They made a profession of the true religion. (2) They considered themselves the peculiar people of God, and despised and reprobated all others. (3) They were only hypocrites, having nothing of religion but the profession—leaves, and no fruit. Our Lord's conduct towards this tree is to be considered as emblematical of the treatment and final perdition which was to come upon this hypocritical and ungodly nation. (1) It was a proper time for them to have borne fruit. Jesus had been preaching the doctrine of repentance and salvation among them for more than three years; the choicest influences of Heaven had descended upon them; and everything was done in this vineyard that ought to be done, in order to make it fruitful. (2) The time was now at hand in which God would require fruit, good fruit; and, if it did not produce such, the tree should be hewn down by the Roman axe. Therefore (1) The tree is properly the Jewish nation; (2) Christ's curse, the sentence of destruction which had now gone out against it; and (3) Its withering away, the final and total ruin of the Jewish state by the Romans. His cursing the fig tree was not occasioned by any resentment at being disappointed at not finding fruit on it, but to point out unto His disciples the wrath which was coming upon a people who had now nearly filled up the measure of their iniquity.

15. And they come. This was the next day after our Lord's triumphant entry into Jerusalem; for on the evening of that day He went to Bethany and lodged there, v. 11, and returned the next morning to Jerusalem.

19. He went out of the city. To go to Bethany.

MATTHEW HENRY

withered away, v. 21. Christ's curses have wonderful effects, and make those to wither that flourished like the green bay-tree. And this seemed very strange to the disciples. They could not imagine how that fig-tree should so soon wither away: but this comes of rejecting Christ, and being rejected by him.

2. The good instructions Christ gave them from it; for of those even this withered tree was fruitful.

(1) Christ teacheth them from hence to pray in faith (v. 22); Have faith in God. They admired the power of Christ's word of command; "Why," saith Christ, "a lively active faith would put as great a power into your prayers, v. 23, 24. Whosoever shall say to this mountain, Be removed, and be cast into the sea; and if he shall not doubt in his heart, but shall believe that those things which he saith shall come to pass, he shall have whatsoever he saith." Through the strength and power of God in Christ, the greatest difficulty shall be got over, and the thing shall be effected. And therefore (v. 24), "What things soever ye desire, when ye pray believe that ye shall receive them; nay, believe that ye do receive them, and he that has power to give them, saith, Ye shall have them. I say unto you, Ye shall, v. 24. Verily I say unto you, Ye shall," v. 23. Now this is to be applied, [1] To that faith of miracles which the apostles and first preachers of the gospel were endued with. [2] It may be applied to that miracle of faith, which all true Christians are endued with. It justifies us (Rom. v. 1), and so removes mountains of guilt, and casts them into the depths of the sea. It purifies the heart (Acts xv. 9), and so removes mountains of corruption. It is by faith that the world is conquered, Satan's fiery darts are quenched, a soul is crucified with Christ, and yet lives.

(2) To this is added here that necessary qualification of the prevailing prayer, that we freely forgive, and be in charity with all men (v. 25, 26); When ye stand praying, forgive. When we are at prayer, we must remember to pray for others, particularly for our enemies, and those that have wronged us. If we have injured others before we pray, we must go and be reconciled to them, Matt. v. 23, 24. But if they have injured us, we go a nearer way to work, and must immediately from our hearts forgive them; because this is a good step towards obtaining the pardon of our own sins: Forgive, that your Father may forgive you; because the want of this is a certain bar to the obtaining of the pardon of our sins; "If ye do not forgive, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses." This ought to be remembered in prayer, because one great errand we have to the throne of grace, is, to pray for the pardon of our sins. Our Saviour often insists on this, for it was his great design to engage his disciples to love one another.

We have here Christ examined by the great Sanhedrim concerning his authority. They came to him when he was walking in the temple, teaching the people. The cloisters, in the courts of the temple, were fitted for this purpose. The great men came to him, and did as it were arraign him at the bar with this question, By what authority doest thou these things? v. 28.

I. How they designed hereby to run him aground, and embarrass him. If they could make it out before the people, that he had not a legal mission, that he was not duly ordained, they would tell the people that they ought not to hear him. This they made the last refuge of an obstinate unbelief; they were resolved to find some flaw or other in his commission. This is indeed a question, which all that act either as magistrates or as ministers, ought to be furnished with a good answer to, By what authority do I these things? For how can men preach except they be sent?

II. How he effectually ran them aground, and embarrassed them, with this question, "What are your thoughts concerning the baptism of John? Was it from heaven, or of men? Answer me," v. 30. By the resolving of their question into this, our Saviour intimates how near akin his doctrine and baptism were to John's; they had the same design and tendency—to introduce the gospel kingdom.

They knew what they thought of this question; they could not but think that John Baptist was a man sent of God. But the difficulty was, what they should say to it now.

1. If they own the baptism of John to be from heaven, they shame themselves; for Christ will presently turn it upon them, Why did ye not then believe him? They could not bear that Christ should say this, but they could bear it that their own consciences should say so.

2. If they say, "It is of men, he was not sent of God," they expose themselves; the people will be ready to do them a mischief; for all men counted John that he observed it. The precision with which Mark distinguishes the days is not observed by Matthew, intent only on holding up the truths which the incident was designed to teach. In Matthew the whole is represented as taking place at once, just as the two stages of Jairus' daughter—dying and dead—are represented by him as one. The only difference is between a mere summary and a more detailed narrative, each of which only confirms the other. 21. And Peter calling to remembrance saith unto him—satisfied that a miracle so very peculiar—a miracle, not of blessing, as all His other miracles, but of cursing—could not have been wrought but with some higher reference, and fully expecting to hear something weighty on the subject. Master, behold, the fig tree which thou cursedst is withered away—so connecting the two things as to show that he traced the death of the tree entirely to the curse of his Lord. Matthew (21:20) gives this simply as a general exclamation of surprise by the disciples "how soon" the blight had taken effect. 22. And Jesus answering saith unto them, Have faith in God. 23. For verily I say unto you, That whosoever shall say unto this mountain, Be thou removed . . . he shall have whatsoever he saith—Here is the lesson now. From the nature of the case supposed—that they might wish a mountain removed and cast into the sea, a thing far removed from anything which they could be thought actually to desire—it is plain that not physical but moral obstacles to the progress of His kingdom were in the Redeemer's view, and that what He designed to teach was the great lesson, that no obstacle should be able to stand before a confiding faith in God. 24. Therefore I say unto you, What things soever ye desire, when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them—This verse only generalizes the assurance of the former verse; which seems to show that it was designed for the special encouragement of evangelistic and missionary efforts, while this is a directory for prevailing prayer in general. 25. And when ye stand praying, forgive, if ye have aught against any; that your Father also which is in heaven may forgive you your trespasses . . .—This is repeated from the Sermon on the Mount (see on Matt. 6:14, 15); to remind them that if this was necessary to the acceptableness of all prayer, much more when great things were to be asked and confidently expected.

27-33. THE AUTHORITY OF JESUS QUESTIONED—HIS REPLY. (=Matt. 21:23-27; Luke 20:1-8.) See on Matthew 21:23-27.

By what authority doest thou these things!—referring particularly to the expulsion of the buyers and sellers from the temple. and who gave thee this authority? And Jesus answered and said unto them, I also will ask you one thing . . .

The baptism of John—meaning his whole mission and ministry, of which baptism was the proper character. whence was it? from heaven, or of men?—What wisdom there was in this way of meeting their question will best appear by their reply.

If we shall say, From heaven; he will say unto us, Why did ye not then believe him?—"Why did ye not believe the testimony which he bore to Me, as the promised and expected Messiah?" for that was the burden of John's whole testimony. But if we shall say, Of men; we fear the people—rather the multitude. In Luke (20:6) it is, "all the people will stone us." for all hold John as a prophet—Crooked, cringing hypo-

22. Have faith in God. "Have the faith of God," i.e., Have strong faith, or the strongest faith, for thus the Hebrews expressed the superlative degree.

25. When ye stand praying. This expression may mean no more than, "When ye are disposed or have a mind, to pray," i.e., whenever you perform that duty. But the Pharisees loved to pray standing, that they might be seen of men.

26. The verse is wanting in some MSS. and editions.

27-33. See on Matt. xxi. 23-27.

By what authority doest thou these things? The things which the chief priests allude to were His receiving the acclamations of the people as the promised Messiah, His casting the traders out of the Temple, and His teaching the people publicly in it.

The baptism of John. Had John a divine commission or not for his baptism and preaching? Our Lord here takes the wise in their own cunning. He knew the estimation John was in among the people, and He plainly saw that if they gave any answer at all they must convict themselves; and so they saw, when they came to examine the question.

32. They feared the people. Or rather, "We fear," etc.

was a prophet indeed. There is a carnal slavish fear, which not only wicked subjects but wicked rulers likewise are liable to. (1) They were confounded and forced to make a dishonourable retreat; to pretend ignorance—We cannot tell. What Christ did by his wisdom we must labour to do by our well doing—put to silence the ignorance of foolish men, 1 Pet. ii. 15. (2) Christ justified himself in refusing to give them an answer to their imperious demand; Neither tell I you by what authority I do these things. They did not deserve to be told; nor did he need to tell them, since no man could do those miracles which he did unless God were with him.

CHAPTER 12

Christ had formerly in parables showed how he designed to set up the gospel church; now he begins in parables to show how he would lay aside the Jewish church.

I. They that enjoy the privileges of the visible church, have a vineyard let out to them, from the occupiers of which rent is justly expected. Members of the church are God's tenants, and they have both a good Landlord and a good bargain, and may live well upon it, if it be not their own fault.

II. Those whom God lets out his vineyard to, he sends his servants to, to put them in mind of his just expectations from them, v. 2.

III. It is sad to think what base usage God's faithful ministers have met with, in all ages. The Old Testament prophets were persecuted. They beat them, and sent them empty away (v. 3); that was bad: they wounded them, and sent them away shamefully entreated (v. 4); that was worse: nay, at length, they came to such a pitch of wickedness, that they killed them, v. 5.

IV. It was no wonder if those who abused the prophets, abused Christ himself. God did at length send them his Son, his well-beloved. And it might be expected that he whom their Master loved, they also should respect and love (v. 6); "They will reverence my son." But, instead of reverencing him because he was the son and heir, they therefore hated him, v. 7. They were the more enraged against him, and determined to put him to death, that all the respect might be paid to them only; "The inheritance shall be ours." There is an inheritance, which, if they had duly reverenced the Son, might have been theirs, a heavenly inheritance. So they took him, and killed him; and they cast him out of the vineyard.

V. For such sinful and shameful doings nothing can be expected but a fearful doom (v. 9); What shall therefore the Lord of the vineyard do?

1. He will come, and destroy the husbandmen. When they killed his servants, and his Son, he determined to destroy them; and this was fulfilled when Jerusalem was laid waste.

2. He will give the vineyard to others. This was fulfilled in the taking in of the Gentiles, and the abundance of fruit which the gospel brought forth in all the world, Col. i. 6. If some from whom we expected well, prove bad, it doth not follow but that others will be better.

3. Their opposition to Christ's exaltation shall be no obstruction to it (v. 10, 11); The stone which the builders rejected, is become the Head of the corner. God will set Christ as his King, upon his holy hill of Zion. And all the world shall see and own this to be the Lord's doing.

Now what effect had this parable upon the chief priests and scribes? They knew he spoke this parable against them, v. 12. They could not but see their own faces in the glass of it. (1) They sought to lay hold on him, and make him their prisoner immediately, and so to fulfil what he had just now said they would do to him, v. 8. (2) Nothing restrained them from it but the awe they stood in of the people; they did not reverence Christ, nor had any fear of God before their eyes. (3) They left him, and went their way; if they could not do hurt to him, they resolved he should not do good to them, and therefore they got out of the hearing of his powerful preaching. If men's prejudices be not conquered by the evidence of truth, they are but confirmed. If the gospel be not a savour of life unto life, it will be a savour of death unto death.

crites! No wonder Jesus gave you no answer. 27. And they answered Jesus, and said, We cannot tell—Evidently their difficulty was, how to answer, so as neither to shake their determination to reject the claims of Christ nor damage their reputation with the people. For the truth itself they cared nothing whatever. Neither tell I you by what authority I do these things—What composure and dignity of wisdom does our Lord here display, as He turns their question upon themselves, and, while revealing His knowledge of their hypocrisy, closes their mouths! Taking advantage of the surprise, silence, and awe produced by this reply, our Lord followed it up immediately by the two following parables.

VSS. 1-12. PARABLE OF THE WICKED HUSBANDMEN. (=Matt. 21:33-46; Luke 20:9-18.) See on Matthew 21:33-46.

There was a certain householder, which planted a vineyard—See on Luke 13:6. and hedged it round about, and digged a winepress in it, and built a tower—These details are taken, as is the basis of the parable itself, from that beautiful parable of Isaiah 5:1-7, in order to fix down the application and sustain it by Old Testament authority. and let it out to husbandmen—These are just the ordinary spiritual guides of the people, under whose care and culture the fruits of righteousness are expected to spring up. and went into a far country—"for a long time" (Luke 20:9), leaving the vineyard to the laws of the spiritual husbandry during the whole time of the Jewish economy. On this phraseology, see on Mark 4:26. And when the time of the fruit drew near, he sent his servants to the husbandmen—By these "servants" are meant the prophets and other extraordinary messengers, raised up from time to time. See on ch. 23:37. that they might receive the fruits of it—See again on Luke 13:6.

They will reverence my son—In Mark (12:6) this is most touchingly expressed: "Having yet therefore one son, His well-beloved, He sent Him also last unto them, saying, They will reverence My Son." Luke's version of it too (20:13) is striking: "Then said the lord of the vineyard, What shall I do? I will send My beloved Son: it may be they will reverence Him when they see Him." Who does not see that our Lord here severs Himself, by the sharpest line of demarkation, from all merely human messengers, and claims for Himself Sonship in its loftiest sense? (Cf. Heb. 3:3-6.) The expression, "It may be they will reverence My Son," is designed to teach the almost unimaginable guilt of not reverentially welcoming God's Son. But when the husbandmen saw the son, they said among themselves—Cf. Genesis 37:18-20; John 11:47-53. This is the heir—Sublime expression this of the great truth, that God's inheritance was destined for, and in due time is to come into the possession of, His own Son in our nature (Heb. 1:2). come, let us kill him, and let us seize on his inheritance—that so, from mere servants, we may become lords. This is the deep aim of the depraved heart; this is emphatically "the root of all evil." And they caught him, and cast him out of the vineyard—cf. Hebrews 13:11-13 ("without the gate—without the camp"); I Kings 21:13; John 19:17. and slew him.

And when the chief priests and Pharisees had heard his parables—referring to that of the Two Sons and this one of the Wicked Husbandmen—they perceived that he spake of them. But when they sought to lay hands on him—which Luke (20:19) says they did "the same hour," hardly able to restrain their rage. they feared the multitude—rather, 'the multitudes'—because they took him for a prophet—just as they feared to say John's baptism was of men, because the masses took him for a prophet (vs. 26). Miserable creatures! So, for this time, "they left Him and went their way" (Mark 12:12).

13-40. ENTANGLING QUESTIONS ABOUT TRIBUTE, THE RESURRECTION, AND THE GREAT COMMANDMENT, WITH THE REPLIES—CHRIST BAFFLES THE PHARISEES BY A QUESTION ABOUT DAVID, AND DENOUNCES THE SCRIBES. (=Matt. 22:15-46; Luke 20:20-47). The time of this section appears to be still the third

We cannot tell, said they; which, in the words of truth, should have been, "We will not tell," for we will not have this man for the Messiah; because, if we acknowledge John as His forerunner, we must, of necessity, receive Jesus as the Christ.

CHAPTER 12

1. A certain man planted a vineyard. See this parable explained, Matt. xxi. 33-41.

4. At him they cast stones, and wounded him in the head. Or rather, "they made short work of it." We have followed the Vulgate in translating the original, wounded him in the head, in which signification, I believe, the word is found in no Greek writer. [It] signifies to "sum up, to comprise," and is used in this sense by Paul, Rom. xiii. 9.

9. And will give the vineyard unto others. I will give it into the care of new vinedressers, the Evangelists and apostles. And under their ministry, multitudes were brought to God before the destruction of Jerusalem.

A. T. ROBERTSON:

12. "Against them" (pros autous). So in Luke. It was a straight shot, this parable of the Rejected Stone (12:10 f.) and the longer one of the Wicked Husbandmen. There was no mistaking the application, for he had specifically explained the application (Matt. 21:43-45). The Sanhedrin were so angry that they actually started or sought to seize him, but fear of the populace now more enthusiastic for Jesus than ever held them back. They went off in disgust, but they had to listen to the parable of the King's Son before going (Matt. 22:1-14).

and the Herodians, v. 13. The Pharisees were great sticklers for the liberty of the Jews, and, if he should say, It is lawful to give tribute to Caesar, they would incense the common people against him. The Herodians were great sticklers for the Roman power, and, if he should discountenance the paying of tribute to Caesar, they would incense the governor against him. It is no new thing for those that are at variance in other things, to join in a confederacy against Christ.

II. The pretence they made was, that they desired him to resolve them a case of conscience, v. 14. They complimented him at a high rate, called him Master, owned him for a Teacher of the way of God, a Teacher of it in truth, who would not be brought by smiles or frowns to depart a step from the rules of equity and goodness; "Thou carest for no man, nor regardest the person of men; thou art right, and dost in a right manner declare good and evil, truth and falsehood." They knew that he taught the way of God in truth, and yet rejected the counsel of God against themselves.

III. The question they put was, Is it lawful to give tribute to Caesar, or not? They would be thought desirous to know their duty. Really they desired nothing but to know what he would say, in hopes that, which side soever he took of the question, they might take occasion from it to accuse him. They seemed to refer the determining of this matter to Christ; they put the question fairly, Shall we give, or shall we not give? They seemed resolved to stand to his award. Many seem desirous to know their duty, who are no ways disposed to do it.

IV. Christ determined the question, and evaded the snare, v. 15–17. He knew their hypocrisy. Hypocrisy, though ever so artfully managed, cannot be concealed from the Lord Jesus. He sees the potsherd that is covered with the silver dross. He knew they intended to ensnare him, and therefore contrived the matter so as to ensnare them. He made them acknowledge that the current money of their nation was Roman money, had the emperor's image on one side, and his superscription on the reverse; and if so, 1. Caesar might command their money for the public benefit. Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's. The circulation of the money is from him as the fountain, and therefore it must return to him. 2. Caesar might not command their consciences, nor did he pretend to it. "Pay your tribute, therefore, without murmuring or disputing, but be sure to render to God the things that are God's." Many that seem careful to give to men their due, are in no care to give to God the glory due to his name. All that heard Christ, marvelled at the discretion of his answer, but I doubt none were brought by it, as they ought to be, to render to God themselves and their devotions. Many will commend the wit of a sermon, that will not be commanded by the divine laws of a sermon.

Verses 18–27

The Sadducees, who were the deists of that age, here attack our Lord Jesus. They were not bigots and persecutors, but sceptics and infidels, and their design was upon his doctrine. They denied that there was any resurrection, any world of spirits, any state of rewards and punishments on the other side of death; now those great and fundamental truths which they denied, Christ had made it his business to establish and prove, and therefore they set themselves to perplex his doctrine.

I. See here the method they take to entangle it; they quote the ancient law, by which, if a man died without issue, his brother was obliged to marry his widow, v. 19. They suppose a case to happen that, according to that law, seven brothers were, successively, the husbands of one woman, v. 20. Probably, these Sadducees intended hereby to ridicule that law. Those who deny divine truths, commonly set themselves to disparage divine laws and ordinances. Their design was to expose the doctrine of the resurrection; for they suppose that if there be a future state, it must be such a one as this, and then the doctrine, they think, is clogged either with this invincible absurdity, that a woman in that state must have seven husbands, or else with this insolvable difficulty, whose wife she must be. See with what subtlety these heretics undermine the truth; they do not deny it, they do not seem to doubt of it. They pretend to own the truth, as if they were not Sadducees. They take it for granted that there is a resurrection, and would be thought to desire instruction concerning it, when really they are designing to give it a fatal stab, and think that they shall do it. It is the common artifice of heretics and Sadducees to perplex and entangle the truth, which they have not the impudence to deny.

II. See here the method Christ takes to clear and establish this truth. This was a matter of moment, day (Tuesday) of Christ's last week. Matthew introduces the subject by saying (22:15), "Then went the Pharisees and took counsel how they might entangle Him in His talk." 13. And they send unto him certain of the Pharisees—"their disciples," says Matthew; probably young and zealous scholars in that hardening school. and of the Herodians—See on Matthew 22:16. In Luke 20:20 these willing tools are called "spies, which should feign themselves just [righteous] men, that they might take hold of His words, that so they might deliver Him unto the power and authority of the governor." Their plan, then, was to entrap Him into some expression which might be construed into disaffection to the Roman government; the Pharisees themselves being notoriously discontented with the Roman yoke.

Tribute to Cæsar (vss. 14-17). 14. And when they were come, they say unto him, Master—Teacher—we know that thou art true, and carest for no man; for thou regardest not the person of men, but teachest the way of God in truth—By such flattery—though they said only the truth—they hoped to throw Him off His guard. Is it lawful to give tribute to Cæsar, or not?—It was the civil poll-tax paid by all enrolled in the "census." See on Matthew 17:25. 15. Shall we give, or shall we not give? But he, knowing their hypocrisy—"their wickedness" (Matt. 22:18); "their craftiness" (Luke 20:23). The malignity of their hearts took the form of craft, pretending what they did not feel—an anxious desire to be guided aright in a matter which to a scrupulous few might seem a question of some difficulty. Seeing perfectly through this, He said unto them, Why tempt ye me?—hypocrites!" bring me a penny that I may see it—"the tribute money" (Matt. 22:19). 16. And they brought it. And he saith unto them, Whose is this image—stamped upon the coin. and superscription?—the words encircling it on the obverse side. And they said unto him, Cæsar's. 17. And Jesus answering said unto them, Render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's—Putting it in this general form, it was impossible for sedition itself to dispute it, and yet it dissolved the snare. and to God the things that are God's—How much is there in this profound but to them startling addition to the maxim, and how incomparable is the whole for fulness, brevity, clearness, weight! and they marvelled at him—"at His answer, and held their peace" (Luke 20:26), "and left Him, and went their way" (Matt. 22:22).

The Resurrection (vss. 18-27). 18. Then come unto him the Sadducees, which say there is no resurrection—"neither angel nor spirit" (Acts 23:7). They were the materialists of the day. See on Acts 23:7. and they asked him, saying, 19-22. Master, Moses wrote unto us—(Deut. 25:5)—If a man's brother die, and leave his wife behind him . . . And the seven had her, and left no seed: last of all the woman died also. 23. In the resurrection therefore when they shall rise . . .

13. And they send unto him. See this, and to v. 17, largely explained on Matt. xxii. 15-22.

The Herodians. The preceding parable had covered the Pharisees with confusion. When it was ended they went out, not to humble themselves before God and deprecate the judgments with which they were threatened, but to plot afresh the destruction of their Teacher. The depth of their malice appears (1) in their mode of attack. They had often questioned our Lord on matters concerning religion, and His answers only served to increase His reputation and their confusion. They now shift their ground, and question Him concerning state affairs, and the question is such as must be answered; and yet the answer, to all human appearance, can be none other than what may be construed into a crime against the people or against the Roman government. (2) Their profound malice appears further in the choice of their companions in this business, viz., the Herodians. Herod himself was extremely attached to the Roman emperor, and made a public profession of it. All these considerations engaged the Pharisees to unite with the Herodians, who, as the Syriac intimates, were the domestics of Herod, in this infernal plot. (3) Their profound malice appears further in the praises they gave our Lord. "Teacher, we know that thou art true, and teachest the way of God." This was indeed the real character of our blessed Lord; and now they bear testimony to the truth, merely with the design to make it subserve their bloody purposes. (4) Their malice appears still further in the question they propose. Is it lawful to give tribute unto Caesar, or not? The constitution of the Jewish republic rendered an answer to this question extremely difficult: (1) In the presence of the people, who professed to have no other king but God, and looked on their independence as an essential point of their religion; (2) In the presence of the Pharisees, who were ready to stir up the people against Him if His decision could be at all construed to be contrary to their prejudices or to their religious rights. (3) In the presence of the Herodians, who, if the answer should appear to be against Caesar's rights, were ready to inflame their master to avenge, by the death of our Lord, the affront offered to his master, the emperor.

18. See this question, concerning the resurrection, explained in detail on Matt. xxii. 23-32.

Raise up seed unto his brother. This law is mentioned in Deut. xxv. 5. The meaning of the expression is that the children produced by this marriage should be reckoned in the genealogy of the deceased brother and enjoy his estates. The word seed should be always translated "children" or "posterity."

Seven brethren. It is very likely that the Sadducees increased the number, merely to make the question the more difficult.

23. When they shall rise. This clause is wanting in several MSS.

MATTHEW HENRY

and therefore Christ does not pass it over lightly, but enlarges upon it.

1. He charges the Sadducees with error, and charges that upon their ignorance. Do ye not therefore err? Ye cannot but be sensible of it yourselves, and that the cause of your error is, (1) Because ye do not know the scriptures. Not but that the Sadducees had read the scriptures, and perhaps were ready in them; yet they might be truly said not to know the scriptures, because they did not know the sense and meaning of them, but put false constructions upon them. A right knowledge of the scripture, as the fountain whence all revealed religion now flows, and the foundation on which it is built, is the best preservative against error. Keep the truth, the scripture-truth, and it shall keep thee. (2) Because ye know not the power of God. They could not but know that God is almighty, but they would not apply that doctrine to this matter, but gave up the truth to the objections of the impossibility of it. The power of God, seen in the return of the spring (Ps. civ. 30), in the reviving of the corn (John xii. 24), in the restoring of an abject people to their prosperity (Ezek. xxxvii. 12–14), in the raising of so many to life, miraculously, both in the Old Testament and in the New, and especially, in the resurrection of Christ (Eph. i. 19, 20), are all earnests of our resurrection by the same power (Phil. iii. 21); according to the mighty working whereby he is able to subdue all things to himself.

2. He sets aside all the force of their objection, by setting the doctrine of the future state in a true light (v. 25); When they shall rise from the dead, they neither marry, nor are given in marriage. It is a folly to ask, Whose wife shall she be of the seven? It is no wonder if we confound ourselves with endless absurdities, when we measure our ideas of the world of spirits by the affairs of this world of sense.

III. He builds the doctrine of the future state, and of the blessedness of the righteous in that state, upon the covenant of God with Abraham, which God was pleased to own, after Abraham's death, v. 26, 27. He appeals to the scriptures; Have ye not read in the book of Moses? Now that which he refers them to is, what God said to Moses at the bush, I am the God of Abraham; not only, I was so, but I am so. It is absurd to think that God's relation to Abraham should be continued, and thus solemnly recognized, if Abraham was annihilated, or that the living God should be the portion and happiness of a man that is dead, and must be for ever so. You must conclude, 1. That Abraham's soul exists and acts in a state of separation from the body. 2. That therefore, some time or other, the body must rise again. Upon the whole matter, he concludes, Ye therefore do greatly err. Those that deny the resurrection, greatly err, and ought to be told so.

Only we have here an account of one of them, a scribe, who had so much civility in him as to take notice of Christ's answer to the Sadducees, and to own that he had answered well, and much to the purpose (v. 28). We have his application to Christ for instruction, and it was such as became him; not tempting Christ, but desiring to improve his acquaintance with him.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

24. Do ye not therefore err, because ye know not the scriptures—regarding the future state. neither the power of God?—before which a thousand such difficulties vanish. 25. For when they shall rise from the dead, they neither marry, nor are given in marriage—"neither can they die any more" (Luke 20:36). Marriage is ordained to perpetuate the human family; but as there will be no breaches by death in the future state, this ordinance will cease. but are as the angels which are in heaven—In Luke it is "equal unto the angels." But as the subject is death and resurrection, we are not warranted to extend the equality here taught beyond the one point—the immortality of their nature. A beautiful clause is added in Luke—"and are the children of God"—not in respect of character, which is not here spoken of, but of nature—"being the children of the resurrection," as rising to an undecaying existence (Rom. 8:21, 23), and so being the children of their Father's immortality (I Tim. 6:16). 26. And as touching the dead, that they rise: have ye not read in the book of Moses—"even Moses" (Luke 20:37), whom they had just quoted for the purpose of entangling Him. how in the bush God spake unto him—either "at the bush," as the same expression is rendered in Luke 20:37, i.e., when he was there; or "in the (section of his history regarding the) bush." The structure of our verse suggests the latter sense, which is not unusual. saying—(Exod. 3:6)—I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob? 27. He is not the God of the dead, but the God of the living—not "the God of dead but [the God] of living persons." The word in brackets is almost certainly an addition to the genuine text, and critical editors exclude it. "For all live unto Him" Luke 20:28—"in His view," or "in His estimation." This last statement—found only in Luke—though adding nothing to the argument, is an important additional illustration. It is true, indeed, that to God no human being is dead or ever will be, but all mankind sustain an abiding conscious relation to Him; but the "all" here means "those who shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world." These sustain a gracious covenant relation to God which cannot be dissolved. (Cf. Rom. 6:10, 11.) In this sense our Lord affirms that for Moses to call the Lord the "GOD" of His patriarchal servants, if at that moment they had no existence, would be unworthy of Him. He "would be ashamed to be called their God, if He had not prepared for them a city" (Heb. 11:16). It was concluded by some of the early Fathers, from our Lord's resting His proof of the Resurrection on such a passage as this, instead of quoting some much clearer testimonies of the Old Testament, that the Sadducees, to whom this was addressed, acknowledged the authority of no part of the Old Testament but the Pentateuch; and this opinion has held its ground even till now. But as there is no ground for it in the New Testament, so JOSEPHUS is silent upon it; merely saying that they rejected the Pharisaic traditions. It was because the Pentateuch was regarded by all classes as the fundamental source of the Hebrew religion, and all the succeeding books of the Old Testament but as developments of it, that our Lord would show that even there the doctrine of the Resurrection was taught. And all the rather does He select this passage, as being not a bare annunciation of the doctrine in question, but as expressive of that glorious truth out of which the Resurrection springs. "And when the multitude heard this" (says Matt. 22:23), "they were astonished at His doctrine." "Then," adds Luke 20:39, 40, "certain of the scribes answering said, Master, thou hast well said"—enjoying His victory over the Sadducees. "And after that they durst not ask Him any [question at all]"—neither party could; both being for the time utterly foiled.

The Great Commandment (vss. 28-34). "But when the Pharisees had heard that He had put the Sadducees to silence, they were gathered together" (Matthew 22:34). 28. And one of the scribes—"a lawyer," says Matthew (22:35); i.e., teacher of the law. came, and having heard them reasoning together, and perceiving that he had answered them well, asked him—manifestly in no bad spirit. When Matthew therefore says he came "tempting," or "trying him," as one of the Pharisaic party who seemed to enjoy the defeat He had given to the Sadducees, we may suppose that though somewhat priding himself upon his insight into the law, and not indisposed to measure his knowledge with One in whom he had not yet learned to believe, he was nevertheless an honest-hearted, fair disputant. Which is the first commandment of all?—first in

Ye do err. Or, "Ye are deceived"—by your impure passions, not knowing the scriptures, which assert the resurrection, nor the miraculous power of God by which it is to be effected.

Have ye not read? This quotation is taken from Exod. iii. 6, 16; and as the five books of Moses were the only part of Scripture which the Sadducees acknowledged as divine, our Lord, by confuting them from those books, proved the second part of His assertion, "You are ignorant of those very Scriptures which you profess to hold sacred."

I am the God of Abraham. Let it be observed that Abraham was dead upwards of three hundred years before these words were spoken to Moses; yet still God calls himself the God of Abraham. Now Christ properly observes that God is not the God of the dead (that word being equal, in the sense of the Sadducees, to an eternal annihilation), but of the living. It therefore follows that, if He be the God of Abraham . . . Isaac, and . . . Jacob, these are not dead, but alive; alive with God, though they had ceased, for some hundreds of years, to exist among mortals.

The multitude . . . were astonished at his doctrine. God uses the infidelity of some for the edification of others. Truth always gains by being opposed.

A lawyer. "A teacher of the law." What is called lawyer in the common translation conveys a wrong idea to most readers. These teachers of the law were the same as the scribes.

MATTHEW HENRY

I. He enquired, Which is the first commandment of all? v. 28. He doth not mean the first in order, but the first in weight and dignity. Not that any commandment of God is little, but some are greater than others, moral precepts than rituals, and of some we may say, They are the greatest of all.

II. Christ gave him a direct answer to this enquiry, v. 29–31. Those that sincerely desire to be instructed concerning their duty, Christ will guide in judgment, and teach his way. He tells him,

1. That the great commandment of all, which is indeed inclusive of all, is, that of loving God with all our hearts. Where this is the commanding principle in the soul, there is a disposition to every other duty. Love is the leading affection of the soul; the love of God is the leading grace in the renewed soul. Where this is not, nothing else that is good is done. Loving God with all our heart, will effectually take us off from all those things that are rivals with him for the throne in our souls. No commandment will be grievous where this principle commands, and has the ascendant. Now here in Mark, our Saviour prefixes to this command the great doctrinal truth upon which it is built (v. 29); Hear, O Israel, The Lord our God is one Lord; if we firmly believe this, it will follow, that we shall love him with all our heart. If he be one, our hearts must be one with him, and since there is no God besides, no rival must be admitted with him upon the throne.

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

We may deduce that a man is bound to love God heartily: that is plain enough, for it says, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart." Yes, there is to be in our love to God a heartliness. We are to throw our whole selves into the love that we give to Him. Not the kind of love that some people give to their fellows when they say, "Be ye warmed and filled," and nothing more. No: our heart is to have its whole being absorbed into God, so that God is the hearty object of its pursuit and its most mighty love. See how the word all is repeated again and again. The whole going forth of the being, the whole stirring up of the soul, is to be for God, and for God only. "With all thy heart."

Again: as we are to love God heartily, we are to love Him with all our souls. Then we are to love Him with all our life; for that is the meaning of it. If we are called to die for God, we are to prefer God before our own life. We shall never reach the fullness of this commandment till we get as far as the martyrs, who rather than disobey God would be cast into the furnace, or devoured by wild beasts. We must be ready to give up house, home, liberty, friends, comfort, joy, and life at the command of God, or else we have not carried out this commandment, "Thou shalt love Him with all thy heart and with all thy life."

And, next we are to love God with all our mind. That is, the intellect is to love God. Now, many men believe in the existence of a God, but they do not love that belief. They know there is a God, but they greatly wish there were none. But the Christian never wishes such a thing as that. The thought that there is a God is the sunshine of his existence. His intellect bows before the Most High; not like a slave who bends his body because he must, but like the angel who prostrates himself because he loves to adore his Maker. His intellect is as fond of God as his imagination. "Oh!" he saith, "my God, I bless Thee that Thou art; for Thou art my highest treasure, my richest and my rarest delight. I love Thee with all my intellect; I have neither thought, nor judgment, nor conviction, nor reason, which I do not lay at Thy feet, and consecrate to Thine honor."

And, once again, this love to God is to be characterized by activity; for we are to love Him with all our heart, heartily—with all our soul, that is, to the laying down of our life—with all our mind, that is mentally; and we are to love importance; the primary, leading commandment, the most fundamental one. This was a question which, with some others, divided the Jewish teachers into rival schools. Our Lord's answer is in a strain of respect very different from what He showed to cavillers—ever observing His own direction, "Give not that which is holy to the dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine; lest they trample them under their feet, and turn again and rend you" (Matt. 7:6). 29. And Jesus answered him, The first of all the commandments is—The readings here vary considerably. TISCHENDORF and TREGELLES read simply, "the first is"; and they are followed by MEYER and ALFORD. But though the authority for the precise form of the received text is slender, a form almost identical with it seems to have most weight of authority. Our Lord here gives His explicit sanction to the distinction between commandments of a more fundamental and primary character, and commandments of a more dependent and subordinate nature; a distinction of which it is confidently asserted by a certain class of critics that the Jews knew nothing, that our Lord and His apostles nowhere lay down, and which has been invented by Christian divines. (Cf. Matt. 23: 23.) Hear, O Israel; the Lord our God is one Lord—This every devout Jew recited twice every day, and the Jews do it to this day; thus keeping up the great ancient national protest against the polytheisms and pantheisms of the heathen world: it is the great utterance of the national faith in One Living and Personal God—"ONE JEHOVAH!" 30. And thou shalt—We have here the language of law, expressive of God's claims. What then are we here bound down to do? One word is made to express it. And what a word! Had the essence of the divine law consisted in deeds, it could not possibly have been expressed in a single word; for no one deed is comprehensive of all others embraced in the law. But as it consists in an affection of the soul, one word suffices to express it—but only one. Fear, though due to God and enjoined by Him, is limited in its sphere and distant in character. Trust, hope, and the like, though essential features of a right state of heart towards God, are called into action only by personal necessity, and so are—in a good sense, it is true, but still are properly—selfish affections; that is to say, they have respect to our own well-being. But LOVE is an all-inclusive affection, embracing not only every other affection proper to its object, but all that is proper to be done to its object; for as love spontaneously seeks to please its object, so, in the case of men to God, it is the native well-spring of a voluntary obedience. It is, besides, the most personal of all affections. One may fear an event, one may hope for an event, one may rejoice in an event; but one can love only a Person. It is the tenderest, the most unselfish, the most divine of all affections. Such, then, is the affection in which the essence of the divine law is declared to consist. Thou shalt love—We now come to the glorious Object of that demanded affection. Thou shalt love the Lord, thy God—i.e., Jehovah, the Self-Existent One, who has revealed Himself as the "I AM," and there is "none else"; who, though by His name JEHOVAH apparently at an unapproachable distance from His finite creatures, yet bears to thee a real and definite relationship, out of which arises His claim and thy duty—of LOVE. But with what are we to love Him? Four things are here specified. First, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God" with thy heart—This sometimes means "the whole inner man"(as Prov. 4:23); but that cannot be meant here; for then the other three particulars would be superfluous. Very often it means "our emotional nature"—the seat of feeling as distinguished from our intellectual nature or the seat of thought, commonly called the "mind" (as in Phil. 4:7). But neither can this be the sense of it here; for here the heart is distinguished both from the "mind" and the "soul." The "heart," then, must here mean the sincerity of both the thoughts and the feelings; in other words, uprightness or trueheartedness, as opposed to a hypocritical or divided affection. But next, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God" with thy soul. This is designed to command our emotional nature: Thou shalt put feeling or warmth into thine affection. Further, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God" with thy mind—This commands our intellectual nature: Thou shalt put intelligence into thine affection—in opposition to a blind devotion, or mere devoteeism. Lastly, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God" with thy strength—This commands our energies: Thou shalt put intensity into thine affection—"Do it with thy might" (Eccles. 9:10). Taking these four

Which is the great commandment? We see here three kinds of enemies and false accusers of Christ and His disciples, and three sorts of accusations brought against them: (1) The Herodians, or politicians and courtiers, who formed their questions and accusations on the rights of the prince, and matters of state, v. 16; (2) The Sadducees, or libertines, who founded theirs upon matters of religion, and articles of faith, which they did not credit, v. 23. (3) The Pharisees, lawyers, scribes, hypocritical pretenders to devotion, who founded theirs on that vital and practical godliness (the love of God and man) of which they wished themselves to be thought the sole proprietors.

30. Thou shalt love the Lord. On the nature and properties of the love of God and man, and the way in which this commandment is fulfilled, see the notes on Matt. xxii. 37, etc.

What is implied in loving God with all the heart, soul, mind, strength, and when may a man be said to do this? (1) He loves God with all his heart who loves nothing in comparison of Him and nothing but in reference to Him, who is ready to give up, do, or suffer anything in order to please and glorify Him. (2) He loves God with all his soul, or rather, "with all his life," who is ready to give up life for His sake—to endure all sorts of torments, and to be deprived of all kinds of comforts, rather than dishonor God—who employs life with all its comforts and conveniences to glorify God in, by, and through all. (3) He loves God with all his strength, Mark xii. 30; Luke x. 27, who exerts all the powers of his body and soul in the service of God; who, for the glory of his Maker, spares neither labor nor cost; who sacrifices his time, body, health, ease, for the honor of God, his divine Master; who employs in His service all his goods, his talents, his power, credit, authority, and influence. (4) He loves God with all his mind (intellect) who applies himself only to know God and His holy will; who receives with submission, gratitude, and pleasure the sacred truths which God has revealed to man.

Him with all our strength, that is, actively. I am to throw my whole soul into the worship and adoration of God. I am not to keep back a single hour, or a single farthing of my wealth, or a single talent that I have, or a single atom of strength, bodily or mentally, from the worship of God. I am to love Him with all my strength.

2. That the second great commandment is, to love our neighbour as ourselves (v. 31), and we must show it by doing as we would be done by. As we must therefore love God better than ourselves, so we must love our neighbour as ourselves, because he is of the same nature with ourselves; and if a fellow-Christian, and of the same sacred society, the obligation is the stronger. Hath not one God created us? Has not one Christ redeemed us? Well might Christ say, There is no other commandment greater than these; for in these all the law is fulfilled, and if we make conscience of obedience to these, all other instances of obedience will follow of course.

III. The scribe consented to what Christ said, v. 32, 33. 1. He commends Christ's decision of this question; Well, Master, thou hast said the truth. It shall be brought in evidence against those who persecuted Christ, as a deceiver, that one of themselves confessed that he said the truth, and said it well. And thus must we subscribe to Christ's sayings, must set to our seal that they are true. 2. He comments upon it. Christ had quoted that great doctrine, that the Lord our God is one Lord; and this he not only assented to, but added, "There is none other but he." This excludes all rivals with him, and secures the throne in the heart entire for him. Christ had laid down that great law, of loving God with all our heart; and this also he explains—that it is loving him with the understanding. Our love to God, as it must be an entire, so it must be an intelligent, love; we must love him with all the understanding; our rational powers and faculties must all be set on work to lead out the affections of our souls toward God. Christ had said, "To love God and our neighbour is the greatest commandment of all"; "Yea," saith the scribe, "it is more than all whole-burnt offerings and sacrifices, more acceptable to God." There were those who held, that the law of sacrifices was the greatest commandment of all; but this scribe readily agreed with our Saviour in this—that the law of love to God and our neighbour is greater than that of sacrifice, even than that of whole-burnt-offerings.

IV. Christ approved of what he said, and encouraged him to proceed in his enquiries of him, v. 34. 1. He owned that he understood well, as far as he went; so far, so good. Jesus saw that he answered discreetly, and was the more pleased with it, because he had of late met with so many that answered indiscreetly. He answered as one that had a mind; as one that had his wits about him; whose judgment was not biassed. He answered as one that allowed himself liberty and leisure to consider, and as one that had considered. 2. He owned that he stood fair for a further advance; "Thou art not far from the kingdom of God, the kingdom of grace and glory." There is hope of those who make a good use of the light they have, and go as far as that will carry them, that by the grace of God they will be led further. What became of this scribe we are not told, but would willingly hope that he took the hint Christ hereby gave him, and that he proceeded to enquire of him what was the great commandment of the gospel too. Yet, if he did not, we are not to think it strange; for there are many who are not far from the kingdom of God, and yet never come thither. No man, after that, durst ask him any question; those that desired to learn, were ashamed to ask, and those that designed to cavil, were afraid to ask.

Verses 35–40

I. Christ shows the people how weak and defective the scribes were in their preaching, and how unable to solve the difficulties that occurred in the scriptures of the Old Testament. Of this he gives an instance, which is not so fully related here as it was in Matthew.

1. They told the people that the Messiah was to be the Son of David (v. 35), and they were in the right. The people took it as what the scribes said; whereas the truths of God should rather be quoted from our things together, the command of the Law is, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy powers—with a sincere, a fervid, an intelligent, an energetic love." But this is not all that the Law demands. God will have all these qualities in their most perfect exercise. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God," says the Law, "with all thy heart," or, with perfect sincerity; "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy soul," or, with the utmost fervor; "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy mind," or, in the fullest exercise of an enlightened reason; and "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy strength," or, with the whole energy of our being! So much for the First Commandment. 31. And the second is like—"unto it" (Matt. 22:39); as demanding the same affection, and only the extension of it, in its proper measure, to the creatures of Him whom we thus love—our brethren in the participation of the same nature, and neighbors, as connected with us by ties that render each dependent upon and necessary to the other. Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself—Now, as we are not to love ourselves supremely, this is virtually a command, in the first place, not to love our neighbor with all our heart and soul and mind and strength. And thus it is a condemnation of the idolatry of the creature. Our supreme and uttermost affection is to be reserved for God. But as sincerely as ourselves we are to love all mankind, and with the same readiness to do and suffer for them as we should reasonably desire them to show to us. The golden rule (Matt. 7:12) is here our best interpreter of the nature and extent of these claims. There is none other commandment greater than these—or, as in Matthew 22:40, "On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets" (see on Matt. 5:17). It is as if He had said, "This is all Scripture in a nutshell; the whole law of human duty in a portable, pocket form." Indeed, it is so simple that a child may understand it, so brief that all may remember it, so comprehensive as to embrace all possible cases. And from its very nature it is unchangeable. It is inconceivable that God should require from his rational creatures anything less, or in substance anything else, under any dispensation, in any world, at any period throughout eternal duration. He cannot but claim this—all this—alike in heaven, in earth, and in hell! And this incomparable summary of the divine law belonged to the Jewish religion! As it shines in its own self-evidencing splendor, so it reveals its own true source. The religion from which the world has received it could be none other than a Godgiven religion! 32. And the scribe said unto him, Well, Master—Teacher—thou hast said the truth: for there is one God; and there is none other but he—The genuine text here seems clearly to have been, "There is one," without the word "God"; and so nearly all critical editors and expositors read. 33. And to love him with all the heart . . . and to love his neighbour as himself, is more than all whole burnt offerings and sacrifices—more, i.e., than all positive institutions; thereby showing insight into the essential difference between what is moral and in its own nature unchangeable, and what is obligatory only because enjoined, and only so long as enjoined. 34. And when Jesus saw that he answered discreetly—rather, "intelligently," or "sensibly"; not only in a good spirit, but with a promising measure of insight into spiritual things. he said unto him, Thou art not far from the kingdom of God—for he had but to follow out a little further what he seemed sincerely to own, to find his way into the kingdom. He needed only the experience of another eminent scribe who at a later period said, "We know that the law is spiritual, but I am carnal, sold under sin": who exclaimed, "O wretched man that I am! Who shall deliver me?" but who added, "I thank God through Jesus Christ!" (Rom. 7:14, 24, 25). Perhaps among the "great company of the priests" and other Jewish ecclesiastics who "were obedient to the faith," almost immediately after the day of Pentecost (Acts 6:7), this upright lawyer was one. But for all his nearness to the Kingdom of God, it may be he never entered it. And no man after that durst ask any question—all feeling that they were no match for Him, and that it was vain to enter the lists with Him.

Christ Baffles the Pharisees regarding David (vss. 35-37). 35. And Jesus answered and said, while he taught in the temple—and "while the Pharisees were gathered together" (Matt. 22:41). How say the scribes that Christ is the son of David?—How come they to give it out that Messiah is to be the son of David? In Matthew, Jesus asks them, "What think ye of Christ?" or of the promised and expected Messiah? "Whose son is He [to be]? They Thou shalt love thy neighbour. The love of our neighbor springs from the love of God as its Source; is found in the love of God as its principle, pattern, and end; and the love of God is found in the love of our neighbor as its effect, representation, and infallible mark.

On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets. They are like the first and last links of a chain; all the intermediate ones depend on them. True religion begins and ends in love to God and man. These are the two grand links that unite God to man, man to his fellows, and men again to God.

32. And the scribe said. The answer of the scribe, contained in verses 32-34, is not found in either Matthew or Luke. This is another proof against Mark's supposed abridgment.

34. Thou art not far from the kingdom of God. This scribe appears to have been a prudent, sensible, and pious man; almost a Christian—so near the kingdom of God that he might have easily stepped in.

35. How say the scribes? See Matt. xxii. 41, etc.

Bibles than from our ministers, for there is the original of them.

2. Yet they could not tell them how to call him his Lord, as he doth, Ps. cx. 1. They had taught the people that concerning the Messiah, which would be for the honour of their nation—that he should be a branch of their royal family; but they had not taken care to teach them that he should be the Son of God, and, as such, and not otherwise, David's Lord. If any should object, How then doth David himself call him Lord? they would not know how to avoid the force of the objection. Note, Those are unworthy to sit in Moses's seat, who, though they are able to preach the truth, are not in some measure able to defend it when they have preached it, and to convince gainsayers.

Now this galled the scribes, to have their ignorance thus exposed; but the common people heard him gladly, v. 37. What he preached was surprising and affecting, and they had never heard such preaching. Probably there was something more than ordinarily commanding and charming in his voice and way of delivery which recommended him to the affections of the common people; for we do not find that any were wrought upon to believe in him, and to follow him. And perhaps some of these cried, Crucify him, as Herod heard John Baptist gladly, and yet cut off his head.

II. He cautions the people to take heed of suffering themselves to be imposed upon by the scribes; He said unto them in his doctrine, "Beware of the scribes" (v. 38).

1. They affect to appear very great; for they go in long clothing, as princes, or judges. Their going in such clothing was not sinful, but their loving to go in it, this was a product of pride. Christ would have his disciples go with their loins girt.

2. They affect to appear very good; for they pray, they make long prayers. They took care it should be known that they prayed, that they prayed long. This they did for a pretence, that they might seem to love prayer.

3. They coveted applause, and were fond of it; they loved salutations in the market-places, and the chief seats in the synagogues, and the uppermost rooms at feasts. To have these given them, they thought, expressed the value they had for them, who did know them, and gained them respect for those who did not.

4. They herein aimed to enrich themselves. They devoured widows' houses; it was to screen themselves from the suspicion of dishonesty, that they put on the mask of piety; and that they might not be thought as bad as the worst, they were studious to seem as good as the best. Let not prayers, no nor long prayers, be thought the worse of, if made in humility and sincerity, for their having been by some thus abused. Iniquity, thus disguised with a show of piety, is double iniquity, so its doom will be doubly heavy; These shall receive greater damnation.

This passage of story was not in Matthew, but is here and in Luke; it is Christ's commendation of the poor widow, that cast two mites into the treasury.

I. There was a public fund for charity, a poor's-box, and this in the temple; for works of charity and works of piety very fitly go together. We often find prayers and alms in conjunction, as Acts x. 2, 4. It is good for those to lay by as God has prospered them (1 Cor. xvi. 2), that they may have something ready to give when an object of charity offers itself.

II. Jesus Christ has an eye upon it; He sat over against the treasury, and beheld how the people cast money into it. Our Lord Jesus takes notice of what we contribute to pious and charitable uses; whether we give liberally or sparingly; whether we do it as unto the Lord, or only to be seen of men.

III. He saw many that were rich cast in much: and it was a good sight to see rich people charitable, to see many rich people so, and to see them cast in much. Those that are rich, ought to give richly; if God give abundantly to us, he expects we should give abundantly.

IV. There was a poor widow that cast in two mites, which make a farthing (v. 42); and our Lord Jesus highly commended her; called his disciples to him, and bid them take notice of it (v. 43); told them that she could very ill spare that which she gave, it was all her living. He reckoned it more than all that put together, which the rich people threw in; for they did cast in of their abundance, but she of her want, v. 44. Now many would have been ready to censure this poor widow; why should she give to others, when she had little enough for herself? Charity begins at home. It is so rare a thing to find any that would not blame this widow, that we cannot expect to find say unto Him, The son of David." The sense is the same. "He saith unto them, How then doth David in spirit call Him Lord?" (Matt. 22:42, 43.) 36. For David himself said by the Holy Ghost, The Lord said to my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand, till I make thine enemies thy footstool—(Ps. 110:1). 37. David therefore himself calleth him Lord; and whence is he then his son?—There is but one solution of this difficulty. Messiah is at once inferior to David as his son according to the flesh, and superior to him as the Lord of a kingdom of which David is himself a subject, not the sovereign. The human and divine natures of Christ, and the spirituality of His kingdom—of which the highest earthly sovereigns are honored if they be counted worthy to be its subjects—furnish the only key to this puzzle. And the common people—the immense crowd. heard him gladly "And no man was able to answer Him a word; neither durst any man from that day forth ask Him any more questions" (Matthew 22: 46).

The Scribes Denounced (vss. 38-40). 38. And he said unto them in his doctrine—rather, "in His teaching"; implying that this was but a specimen of an extended discourse, which Matthew gives in full (ch. 23). Luke says (20:45) this was "in the audience of all the people said unto His disciples." Beware of the scribes, which love—or like—to go in long clothing—(see on Matt. 23:5). and [love] salutations in the market-places, 39. And the chief seats in the synagogues, and the uppermost rooms—or positions—at feasts—See on this love of distinction, Luke 14:7; and on Matthew 6:5.

40. Which devour widows' houses, and for a pretence make long prayers: these shall receive greater damnation—They took advantage of their helpless condition and confiding character to obtain possession of their property, while by their "long prayers" they made them believe they were raised far above "filthy lucre." So much the "greater damnation" awaited them. (Cf. Matt. 23:33.) A lifelike description this of the Romish clergy, the true successors of "the scribes."

41-44. THE WIDOW'S TWO MITES. (=Luke 21: 1-4.) See on Luke 21:1-4.

He had "sat down over against the treasury" (Mark 12:41), probably to rest, for He had continued long standing as he taught in the temple-court (Mark 11:27), and "looking up He saw"—as in Zaccheus' case, not quite casually. the rich . . .—"the people," says Mark 12:41 "cast money into the treasury, and many rich cast in much"; i.e., into chests deposited in one of the courts of the temple to receive the offerings of the people towards its maintenance (II Kings 12:9; John 8:20).

two mites—"which make a farthing" (Mark 12:42), the smallest Jewish coin. "She might have kept one" [BENGEL]. And he said—"to His disciples," whom He "called to Him" (Mark 12:43), to teach from it a great future lesson. more than . . . all—in proportion to her means, which is God's standard (II Cor. 8:12). of their abundance—their superfluity; what they had to spare," or beyond what they needed. of her penury—or "want" (Mark 12:44)—her deficiency, of what was less than her own wants required, "all the living she had." Mark still more emphatically, "all that she had—

How is he his son? As the Jews did not attempt to deny the conclusion of our Lord's question—which was, The Messiah is not only the Son of David according to the flesh, but He is the Lord of David according to His divine nature—then it is evident they could not. Indeed there was no other way of invalidating the argument but by denying that the prophecy in question related to Christ. But it seems the prophecy was so fully and so generally understood to belong to the Messiah that they did not attempt to do this; for it is immediately added, "No man was able to answer him a word." They were completely nonplussed and confounded.

37. The common people heard him gladly. And doubtless many of them were brought to believe and receive the truth. By the comparatively poor the gospel is still best received.

38. Beware of the scribes. See on Matt. xxiii. 1, etc.

The scribes and the Pharisees sit in Moses' seat. They "sat" there formerly by divine appointment; they sit there now by divine permission. What our Lord says here refers to their expounding the Scriptures, for it was the custom of the Jewish doctors to sit while they expounded the law and prophets, chap. v. 1; Luke iv. 20-22, and to stand up when they read them. By the seat of Moses we are to understand authority to teach the law. Moses was the great teacher of the Jewish people, and the scribes are here represented as his successors.

41. Cast money into the treasury. It is worthy of observation that the money put into the treasury, even by the rich, is termed by the Evangelist "brass money," probably that species of small brass coin which was called prutah among the Jews, two of which make a farthing. We call this mite, from the French, miete, which signifies a crumb or very small morsel. The prutah was the smallest coin in use among the Jews, and there is a canon among the rabbins that no person shall put less than two prutahs into the treasury. This poor widow would not give less, and her poverty prevented her from giving more. And whereas it is said that many . . . rich persons cast in much (many), this may only refer to the number of the prutahs which they threw in, and not to the value. What opinion should we form of a rich man who, in a collection for a public charity, threw in only a handful of halfpence? The whole of this account is lacking in Matthew—another proof that Mark did not abridge him.

any that will imitate her; and yet our Saviour commends her. We must hence learn, 1. That giving alms, is an excellent good thing, and highly pleasing to the Lord Jesus; he will graciously accept of it, though in some circumstances there may not be all the discretion in the world. 2. Those that have but a little, ought to give alms out of their little. We should in many cases pinch ourselves, that we may supply the necessities of others; this is loving our neighbours as ourselves. 3. Public charities should be encouraged, and though there may be some mismanagement of them, yet that is not a good reason why we should not bring in our quota to them. 4. Though we can give but a little in charity, it shall be accepted of Christ, who requires according to what a man has, and not according to what he has not; two mites shall be put upon the score, and brought to account, if given in a right manner, as if they had been two pounds. 5. It is much to the praise of charity, when we give not only to our power, but beyond our power, as the Macedonian churches, whose deep poverty abounded to the riches of their liberality, 2 Cor. viii. 2, 3, and trust God to provide for us some other way, this is thank-worthy.

her whole subsistence." Note: (1) As temple offerings are needed still for the service of Christ at home and abroad, so "looking down" now, as then "up," Me "sees" who "cast in," and how much. (2) Christ's standard of commendable offering is not our superfluity, but our deficiency—not what will never be missed, but what costs us some real sacrifice, and just in proportion to the relative amount of that sacrifice. (See II Cor. 8:1-3.)

F. B. MEYER:

In terrible words (vv. 38-40), Christ denounced the moral and religious leaders of the time. They made a pretense and a gain of their religion. How great the contrast between them and this poor widow, who cast into God's treasury all that she had to provide for her day's living! Our Lord is quick to notice acts like these, which give evidence of the true heart.

F. B. MEYER:

Our Lord departed from the temple, never again to enter its sacred precincts or to open his mouth in public teaching. When he withdrew, the whole system of Judaism was given over to desolation, and the predictions spoken at this time were minutely fulfilled in the fall of Jerusalem under Titus. The temple was blotted out. Indeed, a plowshare passed over its site; the people were sold into slavery or butchered in the gladiatorial shows; their nationality was obliterated, and their land given to strangers.
—Bible Commentary

I. How apt many of Christ's own disciples are to idolize things that look great, and have been long looked upon as sacred. One of them said to him, "Look, Master, what manner of stones, and what buildings are here (v. 1). We never saw the like in Galilee; O do not leave this fine place."

II. How little Christ values external pomp, where there is not real purity; "Seest thou these great buildings" (saith Christ)? "I tell thee, the time is at hand when there shall not be left one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down," v. 2. He looks with pity upon the ruin of precious souls, and weeps over them, for on them he has put a great value; but we do not find him look with any pity upon the ruin of a magnificent house, when he is driven out of it by sin. With what little concern doth he say, Not one stone shall be left on another! While any part remained standing, there might be some hopes of the repair of it; but what hope is there, when not one stone is left upon another?

III. How natural it is to us to desire to know things to come, and the times of them; more inquisitive we are apt to be about that than about our duty. His disciples knew not how to digest this doctrine, and therefore they were in pain till they got him alone, and got more out of him concerning this matter. As he was returning to Bethany therefore, he sat upon the mount of Olives, over against the temple; and there four of them agreed to ask him privately, what he meant by the destroying of the temple. Probably, Christ's discourse, in answer to it, was in the hearing of the rest of the disciples, yet privately, that is, apart from the multitude. Their enquiry is, When shall these things be? They will not question whether they shall be or no, but are willing to hope it is a great way off. "Tell us what shall be the sign, when all these things shall be fulfilled?"

Vss. 1-37. CHRIST'S PROPHECY OF THE DESTRUCTION OF JERUSALEM, AND WARNINGS SUGGESTED BY IT TO PREPARE FOR HIS SECOND COMING. (=Matt. 24:1-51; Luke 21:5-36.) Jesus had uttered all His mind against the Jewish ecclesiastics, exposing their character with withering plainness, and denouncing, in language of awful severity, the judgments of God against them for that unfaithfulness to their trust which was bringing ruin upon the nation. He had closed this His last public discourse (Matt. 23) by a passionate lamentation over Jerusalem, and a solemn farewell to the temple. "And," says Matt. 24:1, "Jesus went out and departed from the temple"—never more to re-enter its precincts, or open His mouth in public teaching. With this act ended His public ministry. As He withdrew, says OLSHAUSEN, the gracious presence of God left the sanctuary; and the temple, with all its service, and the whole theocratic constitution, was given over to destruction. What immediately followed is, as usual, most minutely and graphically described by our Evangelist. 1. And as he went out of the temple, one of his disciples saith unto him—The other Evangelists are less definite. "As some spake," says Luke; "His disciples came to Him," says Matthew. Doubtless it was the speech of one, the mouthpiece, likely, of others. Master—Teacher —see what manner of stones and what buildings are here—wondering probably, how so massive a pile could be overthrown, as seemed implied in our Lord's last words regarding it. JOSEPHUS, who gives a minute account of the wonderful structure, speaks of stones forty cubits long (Jewish War, v. 5. 1.) and says the pillars supporting the porches were twenty-five cubits high, all of one stone, and that of the whitest marble (ibid., v. 5.2). Six days' battering at the walls, during the siege, made no impression upon them (ibid., vi. 4. 1). Some of the underbuilding, yet remaining, and other works, are probably as old as the first temple. 2. And Jesus answering said unto him, Seest thou these great buildings?—"Ye call My attention to these things? I have seen them. Ye point to their massive and durable appearance: now listen to their fate." there shall not be left—"left here" (Matt. 24:2). one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down—Titus ordered the whole city and temple to be demolished [JOSEPHUS, J. W., vii. 1. 1]; Eleazar wished they had all died before seeing that holy city destroyed by enemies' hands, and before the temple was so profanely dug up (ibid., vii. 8. 7). 3. And as he sat upon the Mount of Olives, over against the temple—On their way from Jerusalem to Bethany they would cross Mount Olivet; on its summit He seats Himself, over against the temple, having the city all spread out under His eye. How graphically is this set before us by our Evangelist! Peter and James and John and Andrew asked him privately—The other Evangelists tell us merely that "the disciples" did so. But Mark not only says that it was four of them, but names them; and they were the first quarternion of the Twelve. 4. Tell us, when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign when all these things shall be fulfilled?—"and what shall be the sign of Thy coming, and of the end of the world?" They no doubt looked upon the date of all these things as one and the same, and their notions of the things themselves were as confused as of the times of them. Our

And Jesus went out, and departed from the temple. Or, "And Jesus, going out of the Temple, was going away." This is the arrangement of the words in several eminent manuscripts, versions, and fathers, and is much clearer than that in the common translation.

1. See what manner of stones. Josephus says (Ant. b. xv, c. xi) "that these stones were white and strong, fifty feet long, twenty-four broad, and sixteen in thickness." If this account can be relied on, well might the disciples be struck with wonder at such a superb edifice, and formed by such immense stones! The principal contents of this chapter are largely explained in the notes on Matthew xxiv.

There shall not be left here one stone. These seem to have been the last words He spoke as He left the Temple, into which He never afterwards entered; and when He got to the Mount of Olives, He renewed the discourse. From this mount, on which our Lord and His disciples now sat, the whole of the city and particularly the Temple were clearly seen. This part of our Lord's prediction was fulfilled in the most literal manner. Josephus says, War, b. vii, c. 1; "Caesar gave orders that they should now demolish the whole city and temple, except the three towers, Phaselus, Hippicus, and Mariamne, and a part of the western wall, and these were spared; but, for all the rest of the wall, it was laid so completely even with the ground, by those who dug it up to the foundation, that there was left nothing to make those that came thither believe it had ever been inhabited."

MATTHEW HENRY

Our Lord Jesus, in reply to their question, sets himself, not so much to satisfy their curiosity as to direct their consciences; but gives them the cautions which were needful, with reference to the events that should now shortly come to pass.

I. They must take heed that they be not deceived by the seducers and impostors that should now shortly arise (v. 5, 6); "Take heed lest any man deceive you. Many shall come in my name, saying, I am Christ" After the Jews had rejected the true Christ, they were imposed upon by many false Christs. Those false Christs deceived many; Therefore take heed lest they deceive you. When many are deceived, we should thereby be awakened to look to ourselves.

II. They must take heed that they be not disturbed at the noise of wars, which they should be alarmed with, v. 7, 8. At some times the nations are more distracted and wasted with wars than at other times; so it shall be now; Christ was born into the world when there was a general peace, but soon after he went out of the world there were general wars; Nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom. "But be not troubled at it. Let it be no surprise to you; such things must needs be. Let it be no terror to you, you have no concern in them, and therefore need not be apprehensive of any damage by them." Those that despise the smiles of the world, and do not court and covet them, may despise the frowns of the world, and need not fear them. "Let it not be looked upon as an omen of the approaching period of the world, for the end is not yet (v. 7). Think not that these wars will bring the world to a period. Let it not be looked upon as if in them God had done his worst. Be not troubled at the wars you shall hear of, for they are but the beginnings of sorrows, and therefore, you ought to prepare for worse; for there shall also be earthquakes in divers places, and there shall be famines and troubles. The world shall be full of troubles, but be not ye troubled; but fear not ye their fear." The disciples of Christ may enjoy a holy security and serenity of mind, when all about them is in the greatest disorder.

III. They must take heed that they be not drawn away from Christ by the sufferings they should meet with for Christ's sake. Again, he saith, "Take heed to yourselves, v. 9. Though you may escape the sword of war, better than some of your neighbours, yet be not secure; you will be exposed to the sword of justice more than others. Take heed therefore lest you deceive yourselves with the hopes of outward prosperity, when it is through many tribulations that you must enter into the kingdom of God. Take heed what you say and do, for you will have many eyes upon you."

1. What the trouble is which they must expect. They shall be hated of all men; trouble enough! The thoughts of being hated are grievous to a tender spirit. Those that are malicious, will be mischievous. It was not for anything amiss in them, or done amiss by them, that they were hated, but for Christ's name's sake. The world hated them because he loved them. Their own relations shall betray them, those to whom they were most nearly allied, and on whom therefore they depended for protection. Their church-rulers shall inflict their censures upon them; "You shall be delivered up, and shall be beaten in the synagogues with forty stripes at a time, as offenders against the law." It is no new thing for the church's artillery, through the treachery of its officers, to be turned against some of its best friends. Governors and kings shall use their power against them. They shall cause you to be put to death, as enemies to the empire. They must resist unto blood and still resist.

2. What they shall have to comfort themselves with.

(1) That the work they were called to should be carried on and prosper (v. 10); "The gospel shall, for all this, be published among all nations, and the sound of it shall go forth into all the earth." It is comfort to those who suffer for the gospel, that, though they may be crushed and borne down, the gospel cannot; it shall keep its ground, and carry the day.

(2) That their sufferings, instead of obstructing their work, should forward it; "Your being brought before governors and kings shall be for a testimony of them (so some read it, v. 9); it shall give you an opportunity of preaching the gospel to those before whom you are brought as criminals." Or, as we read it, It shall be for a testimony against them, against both the judges and the prosecutors. The gospel is a testimony to us concerning Christ and heaven. If we receive it, it will be a testimony for us: it will justify and save us; if not, it will be a testimony against us in the great day.

(3) That, when they were brought before kings

Prophecies of the Destruction of Jerusalem (vss. 5-31). 5. And Jesus answering them began to say, Take heed lest any man deceive you: 6. For many shall come in my name, saying, I am Christ—(see Matt. 24:5)—"and the time draweth nigh" (Luke 21:8); that is, the time of the kingdom in its full splendor. and shall deceive many—"Go ye not therefore after them" (Luke 21:8). The reference here seems not to be to pretended Messiahs, deceiving those who rejected the claims of Jesus, of whom indeed there were plenty—for our Lord is addressing His own genuine disciples—but to persons pretending to be Jesus Himself, returned in glory to take possession of His kingdom. This gives peculiar force to the words, "Go ye not therefore after them." 7. And when ye shall hear of wars and rumours of wars, be ye not troubled—see on vs. 13, and compare Isaiah 8:11-14. for such things must needs be; but the end shall not be yet—In Luke (21: 9), "the end is not by and by," or "immediately." Worse must come before all is over.

8. These are the beginnings of sorrows—"of travail-pangs," to which heavy calamities are compared. (See Jer. 4: 31, etc.). The annals of TACITUS tell us how the Roman world was convulsed, before the destruction of Jerusalem, by rival claimants of the imperial purple.

9. But take heed to yourselves: for—"before all these things" (Luke 21:12); i.e., before these public calamities come. they shall deliver you up to councils; and in the synagogues ye shall be beaten—These refer to ecclesiastical proceedings against them.

10. And the gospel must first be published among all nations—"for a witness, and then shall the end come" (Matt. 24:14). God never sends judgment without previous warning; and there can be no doubt that the Jews, already dispersed over most known countries, had nearly all heard the Gospel "as a witness," before the end of the Jewish state. The same principle was repeated and will repeat itself to "the end."

and ye shall be brought before rulers and kings—before civil tribunals next. for my sake, for a testimony against them—rather "unto them"—to give you an opportunity of bearing testimony to Me before them. In the Acts of the Apostles we have the best commentary on this announcement. (Cf. Matt. 10:17, 18.)

ADAM CLARKE

Take heed that no man deceive you. The world is full of deceivers, and it is only by taking heed to the counsel of Christ that even His followers can escape being ruined by them. From this to v. 31, our Lord mentions the signs which should precede His coming. The first sign is false christs.

For many shall come in my name. Josephus says (War, b. ii, c. 13) that there were many who, pretending to divine inspiration, deceived the people, leading out numbers of them to the desert, pretending that God would there show them the signs of liberty, meaning redemption from the Roman power, and that an Egyptian false prophet led 30,000 men into the desert, who were almost all cut off by Felix. See Acts xxi. 38. It was a just judgment for God to deliver up that people into the hands of false christs who had rejected the true one. About twelve years after the death of our Lord, when Cuspius Fadus was procurator of Judea, arose an impostor of the name of Theudas, who said he was a prophet, and persuaded a great multitude to follow him with their best effects to the river Jordan, which he promised to divide for their passage; and saying these things, says Josephus, "he deceived many"—almost the very words of our Lord. A few years afterwards, under the reign of Nero, while Felix was procurator of Judea, impostors of this stamp were so frequent that some were taken and killed almost every day (Josephus Ant., b. xx, cc. 4 and 7).

The second sign given by our Lord is wars and rumours of wars. These may be seen in Josephus (Ant., b. xviii, c. 9; War, b. ii, c. 10), especially as to the rumours of wars, when Caligula ordered his statue to be set up in the Temple of God, which the Jews having refused, had every reason to expect a war with the Romans, and were in such consternation on the occasion that they even neglected to till their land.

9. Councils. "Sanhedrins." The grand Sanhedrin consisted of seventy-two elders (this was the national council of state), and the small Sanhedrins, which were composed of twenty-three counsellors. Synagogues. Courts of justice for villages, etc., consisting of three magistrates, chosen out of the principal directors of the synagogue in that place.

And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world. But, notwithstanding these persecutions, there should be a universal publication of the glad tidings of the Kingdom for a witness [testimony] to all nations. God would have the iniquity of the Jews published everywhere before the heavy stroke of His judgments should fall upon them, that all mankind, as it were, might be brought as witnesses against their cruelty and obstinacy in crucifying and rejecting the Lord Jesus. In all the world. Perhaps no more is meant here than the Roman empire. Tacitus informs us (Annal. l. xv) that, as early as the reign of Nero, the Christians were grown so numerous at Rome as to excite the jealousy of the government, and in other parts they were in proportion. Then shall the end come. When this general publication of the gospel shall have taken place, then a period shall be put to the whole Jewish economy, by the utter destruction of their city and Temple.

Rulers. Or "governors." The Roman deputies, such as Pontius Pilate. Kings. The tetrarchs of Judea and Galilee, who bore this name.

MATTHEW HENRY

and governors for Christ's sake, they should have special assistance from heaven (v. 11); "Take no thought beforehand what ye shall speak, but whatsoever shall be given you in that hour that speak ye, and fear not the success of it, because it is offhand, for it is not ye that speak, but it is the Holy Ghost." When we are engaged in the service of Christ, we may depend upon the aids of the Spirit of Christ.

(4) That heaven at last would make amends for all; he that shall endure to the end, the same shall be saved," v. 13. Perseverance gains the crown. The salvation here promised is more than a deliverance from evil, it is an everlasting blessedness.

Verses 14–23

The Jews, in rebelling against the Romans, and in persecuting the Christians, were setting both God and man against them. Now here we have a prediction of that ruin which came upon them within less than forty years after this.

I. What is here foretold concerning it.

1. That the Roman armies should make a descent upon Judæa, and invest Jerusalem, the holy city. These were the abomination of desolation. They had rejected Christ as an abomination, who would have been their salvation; and now God brought upon them an abomination that would be their desolation. This army stood where it ought not, in and about the holy city, which the heathen ought not to have approached. Sin made the breach, at which the glory went out, and the abomination of desolation broke in, and stood where it ought not.

2. That when the Roman army should come into the country, there would be no safety anywhere but by quitting the country, and that with all possible expedition. A man cannot have so much as his life given him for a prey, but by fleeing to the mountains out of Judæa; and let him take the first alarm, and make the best of his way. If he be on the house-top, and spies them coming, let him not go down to take anything out of the house, for it will occasion his losing of time. If he be in the field, let him get away as he is, and not turn back again, to take up his garment, v. 16. If he can save his life, let him reckon it a good bargain, though he can save nothing else, and be thankful to God, that, though he is cut short, he is not cut off.

3. That it would go very hard at that time with poor mothers and nurses (v. 17); "Woe to them that are with child, that cannot shift for themselves, nor make haste as others can. And woe to them that give suck, that know not how either to leave the tender infants behind them, or to carry them along with them." The time may often be, when the greatest comforts may prove the greatest burthens. It would likewise be very uncomfortable, if they should be forced to flee in the winter (v. 18). If there be no remedy but that trouble must come, yet we may desire and pray that the circumstances of it may be so ordered as to be a mitigation of the trouble; and when things are bad, we ought to consider they might have been worse

4. There should be such destruction and desolation made, as could not be paralleled in any history (v. 19); In those days shall be affliction, such as was not from the beginning of the creation which God created unto this day, neither shall be. It threatened a universal slaughter of all the people of the Jews; so barbarously did they devour one another, and the Romans devour them all, that, if their wars had continued a little longer, no flesh could have been saved. But in the midst of wrath God remembered mercy. He shortened the days. Many particular persons had their lives given them for a prey, by the storm's subsiding when it did. It was for the elects' sake that those days were shortened; many among them fared the better for the sake of the few among them that believed in Christ. There was a promise, that a remnant should be saved (Isa. x. 22). God's own elect cry day and night to him, and their prayers must be answered, Luke xviii. 7.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

11. But when they shall lead you, and deliver you up, take no thought beforehand—"Be not anxious beforehand." what ye shall speak, neither do ye premeditate—"Be not filled with apprehension, in the prospect of such public appearances for Me, lest ye should bring discredit upon My name, nor think it necessary to prepare beforehand what ye are to say." but whatsoever shall be given you in that hour, that speak ye: for it is not ye that speak, but the Holy Ghost—(See on Matt. 10:19, 20). 13. And ye shall be hated of all men for my name's sake—Matthew (24:12) adds this important intimation: "And because iniquity shall abound, the love of many"—'of the many,' or 'of the most', i.e., of the generality of professed disciples—"shall wax cold." Sad illustrations of the effect of abounding iniquity in cooling the love even of faithful disciples we have in the Epistle of James, written about the period here referred to, and too frequently ever since. but he that shall endure unto the end, the same shall be saved—See on Matthew 10:21, 22; and cf. Hebrews 10:38, 39, which is a manifest allusion to these words of Christ; also Revelation 2:10. Luke adds these reassuring words: "But there shall not an hair of your heads perish" (21:18). Our Lord had just said (Luke 21: 16) that they should be put to death; showing that this precious promise is far above immunity from mere bodily harm, and furnishing a key to the right interpretation of Psalm 91 and such like. 14. But when ye shall see—"Jerusalem compassed by armies"—by encamped armies; in other words, when ye shall see it besieged, and—the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, standing where it ought not—i.e., as explained in Matthew (24:15), "standing in the holy place." (let him that readeth—readeth that prophecy—understand.) That "the abomination of desolation" here alluded to was intended to point to the Roman ensigns, as the symbols of an idolatrous, and so unclean pagan power, may be gathered by comparing what Luke says in the corresponding verse (21:20); and commentators are agreed on it. It is worthy of notice, as confirming this interpretation, that in I Maccabees 1:54—which, though aprocryphal Scripture, is authentic history—the expression of Daniel is applied to the idolatrous profanation of the Jewish altar by Antiochus Epiphanes. then let them that be in Judea flee to the mountains—The ecclesiastical historian, EUSEBIUS, early in the fourth century, tells us that the Christians fled to Pella, at the northern extremity of Perea, being "prophetically directed"—perhaps by some prophetic intimation more explicit than this, which would be their chart—and that thus they escaped the predicted calamities by which the nation was overwhelmed. 15. And let him that is on the housetop not get down into the house, neither enter therein, to take any thing out of his house—i.e., let him take the outside flight of steps from the roof to the ground; a graphic way of denoting the extreme urgency of the case, and the danger of being tempted, by the desire to save his property, to delay till escape should become impossible. 16. And let him that is in the field not turn back again for to take up his garment. 17. But woe to them—or, "alas for them"—that are with child, and to them that give suck in those days—in consequence of the aggravated suffering which those conditions would involve. 18. And pray ye that your flight be not in the winter—making escape perilous, or tempting you to delay your flight. Matthew (24:20) adds, "neither on the sabbath day," when, from fear of a breach of its sacred rest, they might be induced to remain. 19. For in those days shall be affliction, such as was not from the beginning of the creation which God created unto this time, neither shall be—Such language is not unusual in the Old Testament with reference to tremendous calamities. But it is matter of literal fact that there was crowded into the period of the Jewish war an amount and complication of suffering perhaps unparalleled; as the narrative of JOSEPHUS, examined closely and arranged under different heads, would show. 20. And except that the Lord had shortened those days, no flesh—i.e., no human life—should be saved: but for the elect's sake, whom he hath chosen, he hath shortened the days—But for this merciful "shortening," brought about by a remarkable concurrence of causes, the whole nation would have perished, in which there yet remained a remnant to be afterwards gathered out. This portion of the prophecy closes, in Luke, with the following vivid and important glance at the subsequent fortunes of the chosen people: "And they shall fall by the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations: and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled"

ADAM CLARKE

11. Neither do ye premeditate. This is wanting in some MSS. and versions. On this verse see Matt. x. 19.

But he that shall endure the persecutions that shall come—unto the end, to the destruction of the Jewish polity, without growing cold or apostatizing—shall be saved, shall be delivered in all imminent dangers, and have his soul at last brought to an eternal glory. It is very remarkable that not a single Christian perished in the destruction of Jerusalem, though there were many there when Cestius Gallus invested the city; and had he persevered in the siege, he would soon have rendered himself master of it. But when he unexpectedly and unaccountably raised the siege, the Christians took that opportunity to escape. See Eusebius, Hist. Eccles., lib. iii, c. 5.

The abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel. This abomination of desolation (Luke xxi. 20-21) refers to the Roman army; and this abomination standing in the holy place is the Roman army besieging Jerusalem. This, our Lord says, is what was spoken of by Daniel the prophet, in the ninth and eleventh chapters of his prophecy, and so let everyone who reads these prophecies understand them; and in reference to this very event they are understood by the rabbins. The Roman army is called an abomination for its ensigns and images, which were so to the Jews. Josephus says (War, b. vi, c. 6) the Romans brought their ensigns into the Temple, and placed them over against the eastern gate, and sacrificed to them there. The Roman army is therefore fitly called the abomination, and "the abomination that maketh desolate," as it was to desolate and lay waste Jerusalem; and this army besieging Jerusalem is called by Mark (chap. xiii. 14) "standing where it ought not," that is, as in the text here, the holy place, as not only the city, but a considerable compass of ground about it, was deemed holy, and consequently no profane persons should stand on it.

Then let them which be in Judea flee into the mountains. This counsel was remembered and wisely followed by the Christians afterwards. Eusebius and Epiphanius say that at this juncture, after Cestius Gallus had raised the siege and Vespasian was approaching with his army, all who believed in Christ left Jerusalem and fled to Pella, and other places beyond the river Jordan; and so they all marvellously escaped the general shipwreck of their country—not one of them perished. See on v. 13.

Let him which is on the house top. The houses of the Jews, as well as those of the ancient Greeks and Romans, were flat-roofed, and had stairs on the outside, by which persons might ascend and descend without coming into the house. In the Eastern walled cities, these flat-roofed houses usually formed continued terraces from one end of the city to the other, which terraces terminated at the gates. He therefore who is walking on the housetop, let him not come down to take any thing out of his house; but let him instantly pursue his course along the tops of the houses, and escape out at the city gate as fast as he can.

Except those days should be shortened. Josephus computes the number of those who perished in the siege at eleven hundred thousand, besides those who were slain in other places, War, b. vi, c. 9; and if the Romans had gone on destroying in this manner, the whole nation of the Jews would, in a short time, have been entirely extirpated. But, for the sake of the elect, the Jews, that they might not be utterly destroyed, and for the Christians particularly, the days were shortened. These, partly through the fury of the zealots on one hand and the hatred of the Romans on the other, and

II. What directions are given to the disciples with reference to it.

1. They must shift for the safety of their lives; "When you see the country invaded, and the city invested, without further deliberation or delay, let them that are in Judæa, flee to the mountains, v. 14. Do you go out of the ship when you see it sinking"

2. They must provide for the safety of their souls. Then, if any man shall say unto you, Lo, here is Christ, or, Lo, he is there, believe them not; for false christs, and false prophets, shall arise, v. 22. False christs shall rise, and false prophets that shall preach them up; or such, as set up for prophets, and they shall show signs and lying wonders. They shall seduce, if it were possible, the very elect; so plausible shall their pretences be, that they shall draw away many that were forward and zealous professors of religion, many that were very likely to have persevered. They shall seduce, if it were possible, the very elect. In consideration hereof, let the disciples be cautious whom they give credit to (v. 23); But take ye heed. Christ knew that they were of the elect, and yet he said to them, Take heed. An assurance of persevering, and cautions against apostasy, will very well consist with each other. God will keep them, but they must keep themselves. "I have foretold you all things; that, being forewarned, you may be fore-armed."

These verses seem to point at Christ's second coming, to judge the world; the disciples, in their question, had confounded the destruction of Jerusalem and the end of the world (Matt. xxiv. 3), which was built upon a mistake, as if the temple must needs stand as long as the world stands; this mistake Christ rectifies. And here he foretells,

1. The final dissolution of the present frame and fabric of the world; The sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall no more give her light. The stars of heaven shall fall as leaves in autumn; and the powers that are in heaven shall be shaken.

2. The visible appearance of the Lord Jesus, to whom the judgment of that day shall be committed (v. 26); Then shall they see the Son of man coming in the clouds. He shall come with great power and glory. Every eye shall then see him.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

(Luke 21:24). The language as well as the idea of this remarkable statement is taken from Daniel 8: 10, 13. What, then, is its import here? It implies, first, that a time is coming when Jerusalem shall cease to be "trodden down of the Gentiles"; which it was then by pagan, and since and till now is by Mohammedan unbelievers: and next, it implies that the period when this treading down of Jerusalem by the Gentiles is to cease will be when "the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled" or "completed." But what does this mean? We may gather the meaning of it from Romans 11 in which the divine purposes and procedure towards the chosen people from first to last are treated in detail. In vs. 25 of that chapter these words of our Lord are thus reproduced: "For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits; that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in." See the exposition of that verse, from which it will appear that "till the fulness of the Gentiles be come in"—or, in our Lord's phraseology, "till the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled"—does not mean "till the general conversion of the world to Christ," but "till the Gentiles have had their full time of that place in the Church which the Jews had before them." After that period of Gentilism, as before of Judaism, "Jerusalem" and Israel, no longer "trodden down by the Gentiles," but "grafted into their own olive tree," shall constitute, with the believing Gentiles, one Church of God, and fill the whole earth. What a bright vista does this open up! 21. And then, if any man shall say to you, Lo, here is Christ; or, lo he is there; believe him not—So Luke 17:23. No one can read JOSEPHUS' account of what took place before the destruction of Jerusalem without seeing how strikingly this was fulfilled. to seduce, if it were possible, even the elect—implying that this, though all but done, will prove impossible. What a precious assurance! (Cf. II Thess. 2:9-12.) 23. But take ye heed; behold, I have foretold you all things—He had just told them that the seduction of the elect would prove impossible; but since this would be all but accomplished, He bids them be on their guard, as the proper means of averting that catastrophe. In Matthew (24:26-28) we have some additional particulars: "Wherefore, if they shall say unto you, Behold, He is in the desert; go not forth: behold, He is in the secret chambers; believe it not. For as the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." See on Luke 17:23, 24. "For wheresoever the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together." See on Luke 17:37. 24. But in those days, after that tribulation—"Immediately after the tribulation of those days" (Matt. 24:29). the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light. 25. And the stars of heaven shall fall—"and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth" (Luke 21:25, 26). and the powers that are in heaven shall be shaken—Though the grandeur of this language carries the mind over the head of all periods but that of Christ's Second Coming, nearly every expression will be found used of the Lord's coming in terrible national judgments: as of Babylon (Isa. 13:9-13); of Idumea (Isa. 34:1, 2, 4, 8-10); of Egypt (Ezek. 32:7, 8); compare also Psalm 18:7-15; Isaiah 24:1, 17-19; Joel 2:10, 11, etc. We cannot therefore consider the mere strength of this language a proof that it refers exclusively or primarily to the precursors of the final day, though of course in "that day" it will have its most awful fulfilment. 26. And then shall they see the Son of man coming in the clouds with great power and glory—In Matthew 24:30, this is given most fully: "And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven; and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man . . ." That this language finds its highest interpretation in the Second Personal Coming of Christ, is most certain. But the question is, whether that be the primary sense of it as it stands here? Now if the reader will turn to Daniel 7:13, 14, and connect with it the preceding verses, he will find, we think, the true key to our Lord's meaning here. There the powers that oppressed the Church—symbolized by rapacious wild beasts—are summoned to the bar of the Great God, who as the Ancient of days seats Himself, with His assessors, on a burning Throne: thousand thousands ministering to Him, and ten thousand times ten thousand standing before Him. "The judgment is set, and the books are opened." Who that is guided by the mere words would doubt that this is a description of partly through the difficulty of subsisting in the mountains, without houses or provisions, would in all probability have all been destroyed, by either the sword or famine, if the days had not been shortened. The besieged themselves helped to shorten those days by their divisions and mutual slaughters, and by fatally deserting their strongholds, where they never could have been subdued but by famine alone. So well-fortified was Jerusalem, and so well-provided to stand a siege, that the enemy without could not have prevailed had it not been for the factions and seditions within. When Titus was viewing the fortifications after the taking of the city, he could not help ascribing his success to God. "We have fought," said he, "with God on our side; and it is God who pulled the Jews out of these strong holds: for what could machines or the hands of men avail against such towers as these?" (War, b. vi, c. 9.)

Then if any man shall say unto you, Lo, here is Christ. Our Lord had cautioned His disciples against false Christs and prophets before, v. 11; but He seems here to intimate that there would be especial need to attend to this caution about the time of the siege. And in fact many such impostors did arise about that time, promising deliverance from God; and the lower the Jews were reduced, the more disposed they were to listen to such deceivers. Like a man drowning, they were willing to catch even at a straw, while there was any prospect of being saved. But as it was to little purpose for a man to take upon him the character of the Christ, without miracles to avouch his divine mission, so it was the common artifice of these impostors to show signs and wonders—the very words used by Christ in this prophecy, and by Josephus in his history, Ant. b. xx, c. 7.

Immediately after the tribulation. Commentators generally understand this, and what follows, of the end of the world and Christ's coming to judgment; but the word immediately shows that our Lord is not speaking of any distant event, but of something immediately consequent on calamities already predicted—and that must be the destruction of Jerusalem.

Then shall appear the sign of the Son of man. The plain meaning of this is that the destruction of Jerusalem will be such a remarkable instance of divine vengeance and such a signal manifestation of Christ's power and glory that all the Jewish tribes shall mourn, and many will, in consequence of this manifestation of God, be led to acknowledge Christ and His religion. By "of the land," in the text, is evidently meant here, as in several other places, the land of Judea and its tribes, either its then inhabitants or the Jewish people wherever found.

TODAY'S DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE:

The functions of angels are manifold. (a) In the widest sense they are agents of God's providence (Ex. 12:23; 2 Sam. 24:16; 2 Kings 19:35; 1 Chron. 21:16; Ps. 104:4; Acts 12:23; 1 Cor. 10:10; Heb. 11:28). (b) They are specially God's agents in carrying on his great work of redemption. There is no notice of angelic appearances to man till after the call of Abraham. From that time onward there are frequent references to their ministry on earth (Gen. 18:19; 24:7, 40; 28:12; 32:1). They appear to rebuke idolatry (Judg. 2:1-4), to call Gideon (Judg. 6:11, 12), and to consecrate Samson (13:3). In the days of the prophets, from Samuel onward, the angels appear only in their behalf (1 Kings 19:5; 2 Kings 6:17; Dan. 4:13, 23; 10:10, 13, 20, 21; Zech. 1-6).

The Incarnation introduces a new era in the ministrations of angels. They come with their Lord to earth to do him service while here. Predicting his advent (Matt. 1:20; Luke 1:26-38), they minister to him after his temptation and agony (Matt 4:11; Luke 22:43), and declare his resurrection and ascension (Matt. 28:2-8; John 20:12, 13; Acts 1:10, 11). They are now ministering spirits to the people of God (Ps. 34:7; 91:11; Matt. 18:10; Acts 5:19; 8:26; 10:3; 12:7; 27:23; Heb. 1:14). Rejoicing over a penitent sinner (Luke 15:10), they bear the souls of the redeemed to paradise (Luke 16:22); and they will be the ministers of judgment hereafter on the great day (Matt. 13:39, 41, 49; 16:27; 24:31).

3. The gathering together of all the elect to him (v. 27); He shall send his angels, and gather together his elect to him. They shall be fetched from the uttermost parts of the earth, most remote from the place where Christ's tribunal shall be set, and shall be brought to the uttermost part of heaven. A faithful Israelite shall be carried safely, though it were from the utmost border of the land of bondage to the utmost border of the land of promise.

We have here the application of this prophetical sermon.

I. "As to the destruction of Jerusalem, expect it to come very shortly; as when the branch of the fig-tree becomes soft, and the leaves sprout forth, ye expect that summer will come shortly, v, 28. So when ye see these things come to pass, when ye see the Jewish nation embroiled in wars, distracted by false christs and prophets, and drawing upon them the displeasure of the Romans, then say that their ruin is nigh, even at the door." The disciples themselves were indeed all of them, except John, taken away from the evil to come, but the next generation would live to see it. "This generation that is now rising up, shall not all be worn off before all these things come to pass. And as this destruction is near and within ken, so it is sure."

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

the Final Judgment? And yet nothing is clearer than that it is not, but a description of a vast temporal judgment, upon organized bodies of men, for their incurable hostility to the kingdom of God upon earth. Well, after the doom of these has been pronounced and executed, and room thus prepared for the unobstructed development of the kingdom of God over the earth, what follows? "I saw in the night visions, and behold, one like THE SON OF MAN came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they (the angelic attendants) brought Him near before Him." For what purpose? To receive investiture in the kingdom, which, as Messiah, of right belonged to Him. Accordingly, it is added, "And there was given Him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all peoples, nations, and languages should serve Him: His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and His kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." Comparing this with our Lord's words, He seems to us, by "the Son of man [on which phrase, see on John 1:51] coming in the clouds with great power and glory," to mean, that when judicial vengeance shall once have been executed upon Jerusalem, and the ground thus cleared for the unobstructed establishment of His own kingdom, His true regal claims and rights would be visibly and gloriously asserted and manifested. See on Luke 9:28 (with its parallels in Matthew and Mark), in which nearly the same language is employed, and where it can hardly be understood of anything else than the full and free estabishment of the kingdom of Christ on the destruction of Jerusalem. But what is that "sign of the Son of man in heaven?" Interpreters are not agreed. But as before Christ came to destroy Jerusalem some appalling portents were seen in the air, so before His Personal appearing it is likely that something analogous will be witnessed, though of what nature it would be vain to conjecture. 27. And then shall he send his angels—"with a great sound of a trumpet" (Matt. 24:31). and shall gather together his elect . . .—As the tribes of Israel were anciently gathered together by sound of trumpet (Exod. 19:13, 16, 19; Lev. 23: 24; Ps. 81:3-5), so any mighty gathering of God's people, by divine command, is represented as collected by sound of trumpet (Isa. 27:13; cf. Rev. 11: 15); and the ministry of angels, employed in all the great operations of Providence, is here held forth as the agency by which the present assembling of the elect is to be accomplished. LIGHTFOOT thus explains it: "When Jerusalem shall be reduced to ashes, and that wicked nation cut off and rejected, then shall the Son of man send His ministers with the trumpet of the Gospel, and they shall gather His elect of the several nations, from the four corners of heaven: so that God shall not want a Church, although that ancient people of His be rejected and cast off: but that ancient Jewish Church being destroyed, a new Church shall be called out of the Gentiles." But though something like this appears to be the primary sense of the verse, in relation to the destruction of Jerusalem, no one can fail to see that the language swells beyond any gathering of a human family into a Church upon earth, and forces the thoughts onward to that gathering of the Church "at the last trump," to meet the Lord in the air, which is to wind up the present scene. Still, this is not, in our judgment, the direct subject of the prediction; for the next verse limits the whole prediction to the generation then existing. 28. Now learn a parable of the fig tree—"Now from the fig tree learn the parable," or the high lesson which this teaches. When her branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves—"its leaves." 29. So ye, in like manner, when ye shall see these things come to pass—rather, 'coming to pass'—know that it—"the kingdom of God" (Luke 21:31)—is nigh, even at the doors—that is, the full manifestation of it; for till then it admitted of no full development. In Luke (21:28) the following words precede these: "And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh"—their redemption, in the first instance certainly, from Jewish oppression (I Thess. 2:14-16; Luke 11:52): but in the highest sense of these words, redemption from all the oppressions and miseries of the present state at the second appearing of the Lord Jesus. 30. Verily I say unto you, that this generation shall not pass till all these things be done—or "fulfilled" (Matt. 24:34; Luke 21: 32). Whether we take this to mean that the whole would be fulfilled within the limits of the generation then current, or, according to a usual way of speaking, that the generation then existing would not pass away without seeing a begun fulfilment of this prediction, the facts entirely correspond. For

W. E. VINE:

EKLEKTOS lit. signifies picked out, chosen (ek, from, lego, to gather, pick out), and is used of (a) Christ, the chosen of God, the Messiah (Luke 23:35), and metaphorically as a "living stone," "a chief corner stone" (1 Pet. 2:4, 6); (b) angels (1 Tim. 5:21), as chosen to be of especially high rank in administrative association with God, or as His messengers to human beings, doubtless in contrast to fallen angels (see 2 Pet. 2:4 and Jude 6); (c) believers (Jews or Gentiles), Matt. 24:22, 24, 31; Mark 13:20, 22, 27; Luke 18:7; Rom. 8:33; Col. 3:12; 2 Tim. 2:10; Tit. 1:1; 1 Pet. 1:1; 2:9 (as a spiritual race); Matt. 20:16; 22:14 and Rev. 17:14, "chosen"; individual believers are so mentioned in Rom. 16:13; 2 John 1, 13.

Believers were chosen "before the foundation of the world" (cf. "before times eternal," 2 Tim. 1:9), in Christ (Eph. 1:4); to adoption (Eph. 1:5); good works (Eph. 2:10); conformity to Christ (Rom. 8:29); salvation from the delusions of the Antichrist and the doom of the deluded (2 Thess. 2:13); eternal glory (Rom. 9:23).—Vine's Expository Dictionary

He shall send his angels. "His messengers," the apostles, and their successors in the Christian ministry. With a great sound of a trumpet. Or "a loud-sounding trumpet"—the earnest, affectionate call of the gospel of peace, life, and salvation. Shall gather together his elect. The Gentiles, who were now chosen or elected, in place of the rebellious, obstinate Jews, according to our Lord's prediction, Matt. viii. 11-12 and Luke xiii. 28-29. To Matthew's account, Luke adds, chap. xxi. 24, "They shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations: and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." The number of those who fell by the sword was very great. Eleven hundred thousand perished during the siege. Many were slain at other places and at other times. Many also were led away captives into all nations. Josephus says the number of the captives taken in the whole war amounted to 97,000. Those above seventeen years of age were sent to the works in Egypt; but most were distributed through the Roman provinces, to be destroyed in their theaters by the sword and by the wild beasts; and those under seventeen years of age were sold for slaves. Jerusalem also was, according to the prediction of our Lord, to be "trodden down of the Gentiles." Accordingly it has never since been in the possession of the Jews.

Learn a parable of the fig tree. That is, These signs which I have given you will be as infallible a proof of the approaching ruin of the Jewish state as the budding of the trees is a proof of the coming summer.

30. This generation. "This very race of men." It is certain that this word has two meanings in the Scriptures: that given in the text, and that above. Generation signifies a period of a certain number of years, sometimes more, sometimes less. In Deut. i. 35 and ii. 14, Moses uses the word to point out a term of thirty-eight years, which was precisely the number in the Christ doth not speak these things, merely to frighten them; no, they are the declarations of God's fixed purpose; "Heaven and earth shall pass away; but my words shall not pass away" (v. 31).

II. "As to the end of the world, do not enquire when it will come, for of that day, and that hour, knoweth no man; it is not revealed by any word of God, either to men on earth, or to angels in heaven." But it follows, neither the Son; but is there anything which the Son is ignorant of? There were those in the primitive times, who taught from this text, that there were some things that Christ, as man, was ignorant of; they said, "It was no more absurd to say so, than to say that his human soul suffered grief and fear." Christ, as God, could not be ignorant of anything; but the divine wisdom which dwelt in our Saviour, did communicate itself to his human soul, according to the divine pleasure, so that his human nature might sometimes not know some things; therefore Christ is said to grow in wisdom (Luke ii. 52).

III. "As to both, your duty is to watch and pray (v. 33); Take ye heed of everything that would indispose you for your Master's coming; watch for his coming, that it may not at any time be a surprise to you, and pray for that grace which is necessary to qualify you for it, for ye know not what the time is; and you are concerned to be ready for that every day, which may come any day." This he illustrates, in the close, by a parable.

1. Our Master is gone away, and left us something which we must give account of, v. 34. He is as a man taking a far journey; he has left his house on earth, and left his servants in their offices, given authority to some, and work to others. They that have authority given them, in that had work assigned them, for those that have the greatest power have the most business; and to them to whom he gave work, he gave authority, to do that work. And when he took his last leave, he appointed the porter to watch, to be sure to be ready to open to him at his return. Thus our Lord Jesus, when he ascended on high, left something for all his servants to do. All are appointed to work, and some authorized to rule.

2. We ought to be always upon our watch, in expectation of his return, v. 35–37. Our Lord will come, and will come as the Master of the house, to take account of his servants. We know not when he will come. This is applicable to his coming to us in particular, at our death, as well as to the general judgment. Our present life is a night, a dark night, compared with the other life; we know not in which watch of the night our Master will come, whether in the days of youth, or middle age, or old age; but as soon as we are born, we begin to die, and therefore, as soon as we are capable of expecting anything, we must expect death. Our great care must be, that, whenever our Lord comes, he does not find us sleeping, secure in ourselves, off our guard, ready to say, He will not come, and unready to meet him. His coming will indeed be coming suddenly. It is therefore the indispensable duty of all Christ's disciples, to watch, to be awake, and keep awake; "What I say unto you four (v. 37), I say unto all, what I say to you of this generation, I say to all that shall believe in me, in every age, Watch, watch, expect my second coming, prepare for it, that you may be found in peace, without spot, and blameless."

either the whole was fulfilled in the destruction accomplished by Titus, as many think; or, if we stretch it out, according to others, till the thorough dispersion of the Jews a little later, under Adrian, every requirement of our Lord's words seems to be met. 31. Heaven and earth shall pass away; but my words shall not pass away—the strongest possible expression of the divine authority by which He spake; not as Moses or Paul might have said of their own inspiration, for such language would be unsuitable in any merely human mouth.

Warnings to Prepare for the Coming of Christ Suggested by the Foregoing Prophecy (vss. 32-37). It will be observed that, in the foregoing prophecy, as our Lord approaches the crisis of the day of vengeance on Jerusalem and redemption for the Church—at which stage the analogy between that and the day of final vengeance and redemption waxes more striking—His language rises and swells beyond all temporal and partial vengeance, beyond all earthly deliverances and enlargements, and ushers us resistlessly into the scenes of the final day. Accordingly, in these six concluding verses it is manifest that preparation for "THAT DAY" is what our Lord designs to inculcate. 32. But of that day and that hour—i.e., the precise time. knoweth no man—lit., no one—no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father—This very remarkable statement regarding "the Son" is peculiar to Mark. Whether it means that the Son was not at that time in possession of the knowledge referred to, or simply that it was not among the things which He had received to communicate—has been matter of much controversy even among the firmest believers in the proper Divinity of Christ. In the latter sense it was taken by some of the most eminent of the ancient Fathers, and by LUTHER, MELANCTHON, and most of the older Lutherans; and it is so taken by BENGEL, LANGE, WEBSTER and WILKINSON. CHRYSOSTOM and others understood it to mean that as man our Lord was ignorant of this. It is taken literally by CALVIN, GROTIUS, DE WETTE, MEYER, FRITZSCHE, STIER, ALFORD, and ALEXANDER. 33. Take ye heed, watch and pray; for ye know not when the time is. 34. For the Son of man is as a man taking a far journey . . .—The idea thus far is similar to that in the opening part of the parable of the talents (Matt. 25:14, 15). and commanded the porter—the gatekeeper—to watch—pointing to the official duty of the ministers of religion to give warning of approaching danger to the people. 35. Watch ye therefore; for ye know not when the master of the house cometh, at even, or at midnight, or at the cock-crowing, or in the morning—an allusion to the four Roman watches of the night. 36. Lest, coming suddenly, he find you sleeping—See on Luke 12:35-40, 42-46. 37. And what I say unto you—this discourse, it will be remembered, was delivered in private. I say unto all, Watch—anticipating and requiring the diffusion of His teaching by them among all His disciples, and its perpetuation through all time.

present case; for Jerusalem was destroyed about thirty-eight years after our Lord delivered this prediction. But as there are other events in this chapter which certainly look beyond the destruction of Jerusalem, and which were to take place before the Jews should cease to be a distinct people, I should therefore prefer the translation given above. See Matt. xxiv. 34.

But of that day and hour. Hora here is translated "season" by many eminent critics, and is used in this sense by both sacred and profane authors. As the day was not known in which Jerusalem should be invested by the Romans, therefore our Lord advised His disciples to pray that it might not be on a Sabbath; and as the "season" was not known, therefore they were to pray that it might not be in the winter, v. 20. See on Mark xiii. 32.

34. Left his house. "Family." Our blessed Lord and Master, when He ascended to heaven, commanded His servants to be faithful and watchful.

35. Watch ye therefore. The more the master is expected, the more diligent ought the servants to be in working, watching, and keeping themselves in readiness.

36. He find you sleeping. A porter asleep exposes the house to be robbed, and well deserves punishment.

CHAPTER 14

II. Of the malice of Christ's enemies.

1. The chief priests consulted how they might put him to death, v. 1, 2. The feast of the passover was now at hand, and at that feast he must be crucified, (1) That his death and sufferings might be the more public. (2) That the anti-type might answer to the type. Christ, our Passover, was sacrificed for us, at the same time that the paschal lamb was sacrificed, and Israel's deliverance out of Egypt was commemorated.

VSS. 1-11. THE CONSPIRACY OF THE JEWISH AUTHORITIES TO PUT JESUS TO DEATH—THE SUPPER AND THE ANOINTING AT BETHANY—JUDAS AGREES WITH THE CHIEF PRIESTS TO BETRAY HIS LORD. (=Matt. 26:1-16; Luke 22:1-6; John 12:1-11.) The events of this section appeared to have occurred on the fourth day (Wednesday) of the Redeemer's Last Week.

Conspiracy of the Jewish Authorities to Put Jesus to Death (vss. 1, 2). 1. After two days was the feast of the passover, and of unleavened bread—The meaning is, that two days after what is about to be mentioned the passover would arrive; in other words, what follows occurred two days before the feast. and the chief priests and the scribes sought how they might take him by craft, and put him to death—From Matthew's fuller account (ch. 26) we learn that our Lord announced this to the Twelve as follows, being the first announcement to them of the precise time: "And it came to pass, when Jesus had finished all these sayings"—referring to the contents of chs. 24, 25, which He delivered to His disciples; His public ministry being now closed: from His prophetical He is now passing into His priestly office, although all along He Himself took

The passover. A feast instituted in Egypt to commemorate the destroying angel's passing over the houses of the Israelites, when he slew the firstborn of the Egyptians. See the whole of this business largely explained in the notes on Exod. xii. 1-27. This feast began on the fourteenth day of the first moon, in the first month, Nisan, and it lasted only one day; but it was immediately followed by the days of unleavened bread, which were seven, so that the whole lasted eight days, and all the eight days are sometimes called the feast of the passover, and sometimes the "feast or days of unleavened bread." See Luke xxii. 1-7.

And consulted that they might take Jesus by subtilty. The providence of God frustrated their artful machinations; and that event which they wished to conduct with the greatest privacy and silence was transacted with all possible celebrity, amidst the thousands who resorted to Jerusalem at this season for the keeping of the Passover.

MATTHEW HENRY

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

For what reason were these men conscious of hatred of Jesus? He had rebuked their ideals through the whole course of His public ministry. Ideals are always closely related to conduct; consequently the whole tenor of His teaching had been to rebuke their conduct.

During the latter days of His ministry He had rebuked their failures as shepherds of the people. Functional failure is always related to organic failure. Sometimes the physicians tell us that there is a functional trouble, and not an organic one, and we are always comforted. Yet the physician would admit that functional failure is at least an organic peril. Where functional failure is as pronounced as it was in the case of these men, it is demonstration of organic failure. These men had been compelled, in the whole course of the ministry of Jesus Christ, and superlatively in these closing days, to stand disclosed; unwillingly, but definitely self-confessed as corrupt, as having failed. Their hatred of Jesus was consequently of One who had revealed their failure.

—The Gospel According to Mark

Now see, How spiteful Christ's enemies were; for they aimed not only to silence him, but to be revenged on him for all the good he had done. How subtle they were; Not on the feast-day, Lest there should be an uproar (v. 2); lest they should rise, and rescue him. They who desired nothing more than the praise of men, dreaded nothing more than the rage and displeasure of men.

Verses 1–11

We have here instances,

I. Of the kindness of Christ's friends. Some friends he had, even in and about Jerusalem, that loved him, and never thought they could do enough for him.

1. Here was one friend, that was so kind as to invite him to sup with him, v. 3. Though he had a prospect of his death approaching, yet he did not abandon himself to a melancholy retirement from all company.

2. Here was another friend, that was so kind as to anoint his head with very precious ointment as he sat at meat. This was an extraordinary piece of respect paid him by a good woman that thought nothing too good to bestow upon Christ. Did he pour out his soul unto death for us, and shall we think any box of ointment too precious to pour out upon him? It is observable that she took care to pour it all out upon Christ's head; she broke the box. Christ must be honoured with all we have. Do we give him the precious ointment of our best affections? Let him have them all; love him with all the heart.

(1) There were those that put a worse construction upon this than it deserved. They called it a waste of the ointment, v. 4. The liberal and bountiful ought not to be called wasteful. They pretended it might have been sold, and given to the poor, v. 5. A common charity to the poor will not excuse from a particular act of piety to the Lord Jesus.

our infirmities and bare our sicknesses—"He said unto His disciples, Ye know that after two days is [the feast of] the passover, and the Son of man is betrayed to be crucified."The first and the last steps of His final sufferings are brought together in this brief announcement of all that was to take place. The passover was the first and the chief of the three great annual festivals, commemorative of the redemption of God's people from Egypt, through the sprinkling of the blood of a lamb divinely appointed to be slain for that end; the destroying angel, "when he saw the blood, passing over" the Israelitish houses, on which that blood was seen, when he came to destroy all the first-born in the land of Egypt (Exod. 12)—bright typical foreshadowing of the great Sacrifice, and the Redemption effected thereby. Accordingly, "by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, who is wonderful in counsel and excellent in working," it was so ordered that precisely at the passover season, "Christ our Passover should be sacrificed for us." On the day following the passover commenced "the feast of unleavened bread," so called because for seven days only unleavened bread was to be eaten (Exod. 12:18-20). See on I Corinthians 5:6-8. We are further told by Matthew (26:3) that the consultation was held in the palace of Caiaphas the high priest, between the chief priests, [the scribes], and the elders of the people, how "they might take Jesus by subtlety and kill Him." 2. But they said, Not on the feast day—rather, not during the feast; not until the seven days of unleavened bread should be over—lest there be an uproar of the people—In consequence of the vast influx of strangers, embracing all the male population of the land who had reached a certain age, there were within the walls of Jerusalem at this festival some two million people; and in their excited state, the danger of tumult and bloodshed among "the people," who for the most part took Jesus for a prophet, was extreme. (See JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, xx. 5. 3.) What plan, if any, these ecclesiastics fixed upon for seizing our Lord, does not appear. But the proposal of Judas being at once and eagerly gone into, it is probable they were till then at some loss for a plan sufficiently quiet and yet effectual. So, just at the feast-time shall it be done; the unexpected offer of Judas relieving them of their fears. Thus, as BENGEL remarks, did the divine counsel take effect.

The Supper and the Anointing at Bethany Six Days before the Passover (vss. 3-9). The time of this part of the narrative is four days before what has just been related. Had it been part of the regular train of events which our Evangelist designed to record, he would probably have inserted it in its proper place, before the conspiracy of the Jewish authorities. But having come to the treason of Judas, he seems to have gone back upon this scene as what probably gave immediate occasion to the awful deed. 3. And being in Bethany, in the house of Simon the leper, as he sat at meat, there came a woman—It was "Mary," as we learn from John 12:3. having an alabaster box of ointment of spikenard—pure nard, a celebrated aromatic—(See Song of Sol. 1:12). very precious—"very costly" (John 12:3). and she brake the box, and poured it on his head—"and anointed," adds John, "the feet of Jesus, and wiped His feet with her hair: and the house was filled with the odor of the ointment." The only use of this was to refresh and exhilarate—a grateful compliment in the East, amid the closeness of a heated atmosphere, with many guests at a feast. Such was the form in which Mary's love to Christ, at so much cost to herself, poured itself out. 4. And there were some that had indignation within themselves and said—Matthew says (26:8), "But when His disciples saw it, they had indignation, saying . . ." The spokesman, however, was none of the true-hearted Eleven—as we learn from John (12:4): "Then saith one of His disciples, Judas Iscariot, Simon's son, which should betray Him." Doubtless the thought stirred first in his breast, and issued from his base lips; and some of the rest, ignorant of his true character and feelings, and carried away by his plausible speech, might for the moment feel some chagrin at the apparent waste. Why was this waste of the ointment made? 5. For it might have been sold for more than three hundred pence—about $50 in our currency. and have been given to the poor. And they murmured against her—"This he said," remarks John, and the remark is of exceeding importance, "not that he cared for the poor but because he was a thief, and had the bag"—the scrip or treasure-chest—"and bare what was put therein"—not 'bare it off' by theft, as some understand it. It is true that he did this; but the expression means simply that he had charge

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

They were strangely moved by fear, afraid to do the thing that was in their heart. Read again the statement: "Not during the feast, lest haply there shall be a tumult of the people." Why should they fear a tumult among the people? They were perfectly acquainted with the fact that the great human conscience, as expressed in the life of the multitude, agreed with the ideals of Jesus, agreed with His condemnation of their own failure. They feared a tumult. And why should there not be a tumult? What is there necessarily evil in a tumult of the people? Their fear was purely selfish; behind their fear of the people in tumult, there lurked a craven fear of Rome, and of the possible loss of favor, and position. Again, what a high tribute to Jesus, that these men in this hour were afraid of the tumult, which would be inspired by popular love of, and belief in, all that for which He had stood.—The Gospel According to Mark

Not on the feast day, lest there be an uproar. It was usual for the Jews to punish criminals at the public festivals; but in this case they were afraid of an insurrection, as our Lord had become very popular. The providence of God directed it thus, for the reason given in the preceding note.

Simon the leper. This was probably no more than a surname, as Simon the Canaanite, chap. x. 4, and Barsabas Justus, Acts i. 23, and several others. Yet it might have been some person that Christ had healed of this disease.

3. Spikenard. Or "nard." An Indian plant, whose root is very small and slender. It puts forth a long and small stalk, and has several ears or spikes even with the ground, which has given it the name of spikenard. Very precious. Or rather, "unadulterated." Theophylact gives this interpretation of the passage: "Unadulterated nard, and prepared with fidelity."

There came unto him a woman. There is much contention among commentators about the transaction mentioned here and in John xii. 14, some supposing them to be different, others to be the same. Some think that the woman mentioned here was Mary, the sister of Lazarus; others, Mary Magdalene; but against the former opinion it is argued that it is not likely, had this been Mary the sister of Lazarus, that Matthew and Mark would have suppressed her name. Besides, say they, we should not confound the repast which is mentioned here with that mentioned by John, chap. xii. 3. This one was made only two days before the Passover, and that one six days before; the one was made at the house of Simon the leper, the other at the house of Lazarus, John xii. 1-2. At this, the woman poured the oil on the head of Christ; at the other, Mary anointed Christ's feet with it.

And given to the poor. How often does charity serve as a cloak for covetousness! God is sometimes robbed of His right under the pretense of devoting what is withheld to some

MATTHEW HENRY

(2) Our Lord Jesus put a better construction upon it than, for aught that appears, was designed. Christ makes it to be an act of great faith, as well as great love (v. 8); "She is come aforehand, to anoint my body to the burying." See how Christ's heart was filled with the thoughts of his death, how familiarly he spoke of it upon all occasions. It is usual for those who are condemned to die, to have their coffins prepared, and other provision made for their funerals, while they are yet alive; and so Christ accepted this. Christ never rode in triumph into Jerusalem, but when he came thither to suffer; nor had ever his head anointed, but for his burial.

(3) He recommended this piece of heroic piety to all ages; Wherever this gospel shall be preached, it shall be spoken of, for a memorial of her, v. 9. This was this good woman repaid for her box of ointment. She lost neither her oil nor her labour. She got by it that good name which is better than precious ointment, Those that honour Christ he will honour.

2. Judas, his disguised enemy, contracted with them for the betraying of him, v. 10, 11. He went to the chief priests, to tender his service in this affair.

(1) That which he proposed to them, was, to betray Christ to them without making an uproar among the people, which they were afraid of. Did they know that he had a mind to serve them, and make court to him? No, they could not imagine that any of his intimates should be so base. The spirit that works in all the children of disobedience, knows how to bring them in to the assistance one of another in a wicked project.

(2) That which he proposed to himself, was, to get money by the bargain; they promised to give him money. Covetousness was Judas's master-lust. They promised him money. Perhaps it was Judas's covetousness that brought him at first to follow Christ, having a promise that he should be cash-keeper, or purser, to the society, and he loved in his heart to be fingering money; and now that there was money to be got on the other side, he was as ready to betray him as ever he had been to follow him.

(3) Having secured the money, he set himself to make good his bargain; he sought how he might conveniently betray him. See what need we have to be careful that we do not ensnare ourselves in sinful engagements. It is a rule in our law, as well as in our religion, that an obligation to do an evil thing is null and void; it binds to repentance, not to performance. See how the way of sin is down-hill—when men are in, they must on.

Verses 12–31

I. Christ's eating the passover with his disciples, the night before he died. No apprehension of trouble, come or coming, should put us out of frame for our attendance on holy ordinances.

1. Christ ate the passover at the usual time, when the other Jews did. It was on the first day of that feast, which was called, The feast of unleavened bread, even that day when they killed the passover, v. 12.

2. He directed his disciples how to find the place where he intended to eat the passover. "Go into the city and there shall meet you a man bearing a pitcher of water; follow him, go in where he goes, enquire for his master, the good man of the house (v. 14), and desire him to show you a room." No doubt, the inhabitants of Jerusalem had rooms fitted up to be let out, for this occasion, to those that came out of the country to keep the passover and one of those Christ made use of. Probably he went where he was not known, that he might be undisturbed with his disciples. Perhaps he notified it by a sign, and by such a sign to intimate that he will dwell in the clean heart, that is, washed as with pure water. Where he designs to come, a pitcher of water must go before him.

of it and its contents, or was treasurer to Jesus and the Twelve. What a remarkable arrangement was this, by which an avaricious and dishonest person was not only taken into the number of the Twelve, but entrusted with the custody of their little property! The purposes which this served are obvious enough; but it is further noticeable, that the remotest hint was never given to the Eleven of his true character, nor did the disciples most favored with the intimacy of Jesus ever suspect him, till a few minutes before he voluntarily separated himself from their company—for ever! 6. And Jesus said, Let her alone; why trouble ye her? she hath wrought a good work on me—It was good in itself, and so was acceptable to Christ; it was eminently seasonable, and so more acceptable still; and it was "what she could," and so most acceptable of all. 7. For ye have the poor with you always—referring to Deuteronomy 15:11. and whensoever ye will ye may do them good: but me ye have not always—a gentle hint of His approaching departure, by One who knew the worth of His own presence. 8. She hath done what she could—a noble testimony, embodying a principle of immense importance. she is come aforehand to anoint my body to the burying—or, as in John (12:7), "Against the day of my burying hath she kept this." Not that she, dear heart, thought of His burial, much less reserved any of her nard to anoint her dead Lord. But as the time was so near at hand when that office would have to be performed, and she was not to have that privilege even after the spices were brought for the purpose (ch. 16:1), He lovingly regards it as done now. "In the act of love done to Him," says OLSHAUSEN beautifully, "she has erected to herself an eternal monument, as lasting as the Gospel, the eternal Word of God. From generation to generation this remarkable prophecy of the Lord has been fulfilled; and even we, in explaining this saying of the Redeemer, of necessity contribute to its accomplishment." "Who but Himself, asks STIER, "had the power to ensure to any work of man, even if resounding in His own time through the whole earth, an imperishable remembrance in the stream of history? Behold once more here the majesty of His royal judicial supremacy in the government of the world, in this, 'Verily I say unto you.'" 10. And Judas Iscariot, one of the twelve, went unto the chief priests, to betray him unto them—i.e., to make his proposals, and to bargain with them, as appears from. Matthew's fuller statement (ch. 26: 14, 15) which says, he "went unto the chief priests, and said, What will ye give me, and I will deliver Him unto you? And they covenanted with him for thirty pieces of silver." The thirty pieces of silver were thirty shekels, the fine paid for man-or maid-servant acidentally killed (Exod. 21:32), and equal to about $25 in our currency—"a goodly price that I was prized at of them!" (Zech. 11:13). 11. And when they heard it, they were glad, and promised to give him money—Matthew alone records the precise sum, because a remarkable and complicated prophecy, which he was afterwards to refer to, was fulfilled by it. And he sought how he might conveniently betray him—or, as more fully given in Luke (22:6), "And he promised, and sought opportunity to betray Him unto them in the absence of the multitude." That he should avoid an "uproar" or "riot" among the people, which probably was made an essential condition by the Jewish authorities, was thus assented to by the traitor; into whom, says Luke (22:3), "Satan entered," to put him upon this hellish deed.

12-26. PREPARATION FOR, AND LAST CELEBRATION OF, THE PASSOVER—ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE TRAITOR—INSTITUTION OF THE SUPPER. (=Matt. 26: 17-30; Luke 22:7-23, 39; John 13:21-30.) See on Luke 22:7-23, 39; and on John 13:10, 11, 18, 19, 21-30.

the day of unleavened bread—strictly the 15th Nisan (part of our March and April) after the paschal lamb was killed; but here, the 14th (Thursday). Into the difficult questions raised on this we cannot here enter. when ye are entered the city—He Himself probably stayed at Bethany during the day. there shall a man . . .

charitable purpose, to which there was no intention ever to give it.

Why trouble ye the woman? Or, "Why do you put the woman to pain?" A generous mind is ever pained when it is denied the opportunity of doing good, or when its proffered kindness is refused.

Ye have the poor always with you. And, consequently, have the opportunity of doing them good at any time. But me ye have not always; My bodily presence is about to be removed from you forever. The woman, under a presentiment of My death, is preparing Me for My burial.

8. To anoint my body to the burying. "Against," or "in reference to," its embalmment, thus pointing out My death and the embalmment of My body, for the bodies of persons of distinction were wrapped up in aromatics to preserve them from putrefaction.

9. For a memorial of her. See on Matt. xxvi. 13.

As embalming preserves the body from corruption, and she has done this good work to embalm and preserve this body, so will I order everything concerning this transaction to be carefully recorded, to preserve her memory to the latest ages. The actions which the world blames, through the spirit of envy, covetousness, or malice, God takes delight to distinguish and record.

Then . . . Judas. After this supper at Bethany, Judas returned to Jerusalem and made his contract with the chief priests.

11. They were glad. The joy that arises from the opportunity of murdering an innocent person must be completely infernal.

He sought opportunity. "A convenient or fit opportunity." Men seldom leave a crime imperfect. When once sin is conceived, it meets, in general, with few obstacles, till it brings forth death. How deceitful, how deeply damning, is the love of money!

Now the first day of the feast of unleavened bread. As the Feast of Unleavened Bread did not begin till the day after the Passover, the fifteenth day of the month (Lev. xxiii. 5-6; Num. xxviii. 16-17), this could not have been, properly, the first day of that feast. But as the Jews began to eat unleavened bread on the fourteenth (Exod. xii. 18), this day was often termed the first of unleavened bread. The Evangelists use it in this sense, and call even the paschal day by this name. See Mark xiv. 12; Luke xxii. 7. Where wilt thou that we prepare? How astonishing is this, that He who created all things, whether visible or invisible, and by whom all things were upheld, should so empty himself as not to be Proprietor of a single house in His whole creation, to eat the last Passover with His disciples! It is worthy of note what the Talmudists say, that the inhabitants of Jerusalem did not let out their houses to those who came to the annual feasts, but afforded all accommodations of this kind gratis. A man might, therefore, go and request the use of any room, on such an occasion, which was as yet unoccupied.

3. He ate the passover in an upper room furnished. In eating his common meals he chose that which was homely, sat down on the grass: but, when he was to keep a sacred feast, in honour of that he would be at the expense of as good a room as he could get.

4. He ate it with the twelve. If Christ came with the twelve, then Judas was with them, though he was at this time contriving to betray his Master; and it is plain by what follows (v. 20), that he was there: he did not absent himself, lest he should have been suspected. Christ did not exclude him from the feast, though he knew his wickedness, for it was not as yet become public.

II. Christ's discourse with his disciples, as they were eating the passover.

1. They were pleasing themselves with the society of their Master; but he tells them that they must now presently lose him; The Son of man is betrayed. If he be betrayed, the next news you will hear of him, is, that he is crucified and slain; The Son of man goes, as it is written of him, v. 21.

2. They were pleasing themselves with the society one of another, but Christ casts a damp upon the joy of that, by telling them, One of you that eateth with me shall betray me, v. 18. Christ said this, if it might be, to startle the conscience of Judas, and to awaken him to repent of his wickedness, and to draw back from the brink of the pit. But for aught that appears, he who was most concerned in the warning was least concerned at it. All the rest were affected with it. They began to be sorrowful. Here were the bitter herbs, with which this passover-feast was taken. They began to be suspicious of themselves; they said one by one, Is it I? And another said, Is it I? They were more jealous of themselves than of one another. It is the law of charity, to hope the best (1 Cor. xiii. 5–7), because we assuredly know, therefore we may justly suspect, more evil by ourselves than by our brethren. They trusted more to his words than to their own hearts; and therefore do not say, "I am sure it is not I", but, "Lord, is it I?"

Now, in answer to their enquiry, Christ saith that, [1] Which would make them easy; "It is not you, nor you; it is this that now dips with me in the dish." [2] Which, one would think, should make Judas very uneasy. If he go on in his undertaking, it is upon the sword's point, for woe to that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed; it were better for him that he had never been born. It is very probable that Judas encouraged himself in it with this thought, that his Master had often said he must be betrayed; "And if it must be done, surely God will not find fault with him that doth it." But Christ tells him that this will be no shelter or excuse to him; The Son of man indeed goes, as it is written of him, but woe to that man by whom he is betrayed. Christ was delivered indeed by the determinate counsel and fore-knowledge of God; but, notwithstanding that, it is with wicked hands that he is crucified and slain, Acts ii. 23.

III. The institution of the Lord's supper.

1. It was instituted in the close of a supper. In the Lord's supper there is no bodily repast intended. It is food for the soul only, and therefore a very little of that which is for the body, as much as will serve for a sign, is enough.

2. It was instituted by the example of Christ himself; by the practice of our Master himself, because intended for those who are already his disciples.

3. It was instituted with blessing and giving of thanks; the gifts of common providence are to be so received much more the gifts of special grace. He blessed (v. 22), and gave thanks, v. 23.

4. It was instituted to be a memorial of his death; and therefore he broke the bread, to show how it pleased the Lord to bruise him; and he called the wine, which is the blood of the grape, the blood of the New Testament. Frequent mention is made of the blood, the precious blood, as the price of our redemption. It is called the blood of the New Testament; for the covenant of grace became a testament, and of force by the death of Christ, the testator. It is said to be shed for many, to bring many sons to glory, Heb. ii. 10. It was sufficient for many, being of infinite value; we read of a great multitude which no man could number, that had all washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb (Rev. vii. 9–14); and still it is a fountain opened. How comfortable is this that the blood of Christ is shed for many! And if for many, why not for me? If for sinners, sinners of the Gentiles, the chief of sinners, then why not for me?

5. It was a sign of the conveyance of those benefits to us, which were purchased for us by his death; and therefore he broke the bread to them (v. 22), and said, Take eat of it: he gave the cup to them, and ordered them to drink of it, v. 23.

6. It was instituted with an eye to the happiness

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

And he shall show you a large upper room furnished, or "spread" with tables, and couches, and covering, all ready for supper. Such large apartments were set apart by the inhabitants of the city for the accommodation of parties from the country.

Verily, verily, I say unto you, One of you shall betray me—The announcement of vs. 18 seems not to have been plain enough to be quite apprehended, save by the traitor himself. He will therefore speak it out in terms not to be misunderstood. But how much it cost Him to do this, appears from the "trouble" that came over His "spirit"—visible emotion, no doubt—before He got it uttered. What wounded susceptibility does this disclose, and what exquisite delicacy in His social intercourse with the Twelve, to whom He cannot, without an effort, break the subject! the disciples looked one on another, doubting of whom he spake—Further intensely interesting particulars are given in the other Gospels: (1) "They were exceeding sorrowful" (Matt. 26:22). (2) "They began to inquire among themselves which of them it was that should do this thing" (Luke 22:23). (3) "They began to say unto Him one by one, Is it I, and another, Is it I?" (Mark 14:19). Generous, simple hearts! They abhorred the thought, but, instead of putting it on others, each was only anxious to purge himself, and know if he could be the wretch. Their putting it at once to Jesus Himself, as knowing doubtless who was to do it, was the best, as it certainly was the most spontaneous and artless evidence of their innocence. (4) Jesus, apparently while this questioning was going on, added, "The Son of man goeth as it is written of Him, but woe unto that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed! It had been good for that man if he had not been born" (Matt. 26:24). (5) "Judas," last of all, "answered and said, Lord, is it I?" evidently feeling that when all were saying this, if he held his peace, that of itself would draw suspicion upon him. To prevent this the question is wrung out of him, but perhaps, amidst the stir and excitement at the table, in a half-suppressed tone as we are inclined to think the answer also was—"Thou hast said" (Matt. 26:25), or possibly by little more than a sign; for from vs. 28 it is evident that till the moment when he went out, he was not openly discovered.

This cup is the new testament in my blood, which is shed for you. In Matthew (26:28), "This is my blood of the new testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins." In 1 Cor. (11:25) "This cup is the new testament in my blood: this do ye, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me." Most critics now maintain that the word here rendered "testament" should be rendered covenant, not only here but wherever else it occurs in the New Testament; being used in the Old Testament constantly by the LXX translators for the well-known Hebrew word signifying "covenant," which never signifies "testament." Here, in particular, there is a manifest allusion to Ex. 24:8, "Behold, the blood of the covenant, which the Lord hath made with you concerning all these words." Now it is beyond doubt that "covenant" is the fundamental idea, and that in the Old Testament the word is correctly rendered "covenant." But let it be observed, first, that "testament" or "will" is the proper classical sense of the Greek work, and "disposition" or "covenant" but a secondary sense; and next, that in Heb. 9:15, the sense of "testament" appears to be so obviously what the apostle reasons on that to exclude it there, and restrict the meaning to "covenant," can only be made to yield the harshest sense.

ADAM CLARKE

15. Furnished. "Spread" with carpets—so this word is often used. But it may also signify the couches on which the guests reclined when eating. It does not appear that the Jews ate the Passover now, as their fathers did formerly, standing, with their shoes on and their staves in their hands.

One of you shall betray me. Or "will deliver Me up." Judas had already betrayed Him, v. 15, and he was now about to deliver Him into the hands of the chief priests, according to the agreement he had made with them.

They were exceeding sorrowful. That is, the eleven who were innocent; and the hypocritical traitor, Judas, endeavored to put on the appearance of sorrow.

19. And another said, Is it I? This clause is wanting in several MSS. and versions.

20. That dippeth with me in the dish. In the East persons never eat together from one dish, except when a strong attachment subsists between two or more persons of the same caste; in such a case one invites another to come and sit by him and eat from the same dish. This custom seems to have existed among the Jews; and the sacred historian mentions this notice of our Lord's, It is one of the twelve, that dippeth with me in the dish, to mark more strongly the perfidy of the character of Judas.

21. Goeth. That is, to die.

Jesus took bread. Of what kind? Unleavened bread, certainly, because there was no other kind to be had in all Judea at this time; for this was the first day of unleavened bread (v. 17), i.e., the fourteenth of the month Nisan, when the Jews, according to the command of God (Exod. xii. 15-20; xxiii. 15; and xxxiv. 25), were to purge away all leaven from their houses. For he who sacrified the Passover, having leaven in his dwelling, was considered to be such a transgressor of the divine law as could no longer be tolerated among the people of God, and therefore was to be cut off from the congregation of Israel. Now if any respect should be paid to the primitive institution, in the celebration of this divine ordinance, then unleavened, unyeasted bread should be used. And blessed it. Both Matthew and Mark use the word blessed instead of "gave thanks," which is the word used by Luke and Paul. The terms, in this case, are nearly of the same import, as both blessing and giving thanks were used on these occasions. But what was it that our Lord blessed? Not the bread, though many think the contrary, being deceived by the word it, which is improperly supplied in our version. In all the four places referred to above, whether the word blessed or gave thanks is used, it refers not to the bread, but to God, the Dispenser of every good. Our Lord here conforms himself to that constant Jewish custom, viz., of acknowledging God as the Author of every good and perfect gift, by giving thanks or taking the bread and taking the cup at their ordinary meals. The Jewish form of blessing, probably that which our Lord used on this occasion is: "Blessed be thou, our God, King of the universe who bringest forth bread out of the earth!" "Likewise, on taking the cup, they say: "Blessed be our God, the King of the universe, the Creator of the fruit of the vine!"

MATTHEW HENRY

of heaven, and to be an earnest and foretaste of that, and thereby to put our mouths out of taste for all the pleasures and delights of sense (v. 25); I will drink no more of the fruit of the wine. Lord, hasten the day, when I shall drink it in the kingdom of God.

7. It was closed with a hymn, v. 26. This was Christ's swan-like song, which he sung just before he entered upon his agony; probably, that which was usually sung, Ps. cxiii to cxviii.

IV. Christ's discourse with his disciples, as they were returning to Bethany by moonlight. When they had sung the hymn, presently they went out. The Israelites were forbidden to go out of their houses the night that they ate the passover, for fear of the sword of the destroying angel. But because Christ, the great shepherd, was to be smitten, he went out purposely to expose himself to the sword, as a champion; they evaded the destroyer, but Christ conquered him.

1. Christ here foretells that in his sufferings he should be deserted by all his disciples; "You will all be offended because of me, this night." Christ knew this before, and yet welcomed them at his table. Nor should we be discouraged from coming to the Lord's supper, by the fear of relapsing into sin afterward; but, the greater our danger is, the more need we have to fortify ourselves by the diligent conscientious use of holy ordinances. Christ tells them that they would be offended in him. Hitherto, they had continued with him in his temptations; though they had sometimes offended him, yet they had not been offended in him; but now the storm would be so great, that they would all slip their anchors, and be in danger of shipwreck. The smiting of the shepherd is often the scattering of the sheep: the whole flock suffers for it, and is endangered by it.

But Christ encourages them with a promise that they shall rally again, shall return both to their duty and to their comfort (v. 28); "After I am risen I will go before you into Galilee."

2. He foretells that he should be denied particularly by Peter. When they went out to go to the mount of Olives, we may suppose that they dropped Judas (he stole away from them). But Christ tells them that they would have no reason to boast of their constancy. Though God keeps us from being as bad as the worst, yet we may well be ashamed to think that we are not better than we are.

(1) Peter is confident that he should not do so ill as the rest of the disciples (v. 29); Though all should be offended, yet will not I. He supposes himself to be able to receive the shock of a temptation, and bear up against it, all alone; to stand, though nobody stood by him. It is bred in the bone with us, to think well of ourselves, and trust to our own hearts.

(2) Christ tells him that he will do worse than any of them. They will all desert him, but he will deny him; not once, but thrice; and that presently; "This day, even this night before the cock crow twice, thou wilt deny that ever thou hadst any knowledge of me."

(3) He stands to his promise; "If I should die with thee, I will not deny thee": and, no doubt, he thought as he said. Judas said nothing like this, when Christ told him he would betray him. He sinned by contrivance, Peter by surprise; Peter was overtaken in this fault. It was ill done of Peter, to contradict his Master. If he had said, with fear and trembling, "Lord, give me grace to keep me from denying thee," it might have been prevented: but they were all thus confident; they who said, Lord, is it I? now said, It shall never be me. Being acquitted from their fear of betraying Christ, they were now secure. But he that thinks he stands, must learn to take heed lest he fall.

Verses 32–42

Christ is here entering upon his sufferings, and begins with those which were the sorest of all his sufferings, those in his soul. Here we have him in his agony.

I. He retired for prayer; Sit ye here (saith he to his disciples), while I go a little further, and pray. He had lately prayed with them (John xvii); and now he appoints them to withdraw while he goes to his Father upon an errand peculiar to himself.

II. Even into that retirement he took with him Peter, and James, and John (v. 33), three competent witnesses of this part of his humiliation. These three had boasted most of their ability and willingness to suffer with him; Peter here, in this chapter, and James and John (ch. x. 39); and therefore Christ takes them to stand by, and see what a struggle he had, to convince them that they knew not what they said. It is fit that they who are most confident, should be first tried, that they may be made sensible of their folly and weakness.

III. There he was in a tremendous agitation (v. 33); He began to be sore amazed—a word not used in 27-31. THE DESERTION OF JESUS BY HIS DISCIPLES, AND THE FALL OF PETER, FORETOLD. (=Matt. 26:31-35; Luke 22:31-38; John 13:36-38.) See on Luke 22:31-46.

In Matthew and Mark it was when our Lord told them they should all be stumbled in Him that night, that Peter said, "Though all men"—or rather, "all," meaning all that sat with him at the table—"shall be offended in Thee, yet will I never be offended" (Matt. 26:33; Mark 14:29). But as the answer there given by our Lord is the same as that recorded by our Evangelist, he probably uttered both protestations in his vehemence at one time; his feeling being roused by our Lord singling him out from all the rest. Poor Peter, thou shalt yet pay dear for that unlovely elevation of thyself above the rest of thy brethren, when thy risen Lord shall wring thy heart by asking thee, in presence of these very brethren, "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou Me more than these?" (John 21:15-17). Yet no vain-glorious vaunt was this of Peter. it was just the outcoming of conscious attachment; insomuch that all the rest, feeling a cord touched in their own hearts by this protestation, immediately repeated it for themselves. For, add our two first Evangelists, "Likewise also said all the disciples." Dear disciples! Ye spoke out but the feelings of your heart then; your Lord knew that, and doubtless was comforted by it, as a spontaneous utterance of your hearts' affection. But little thought ye how soon it was to be seen—in all of you, but in Peter pre-eminently—that "he that trusteth in his own heart is a fool" (Prov. 23:26). And he said, I tell thee, Peter, the cock shall not crow this day, before that thou shalt thrice deny that thou knowest me. Most interesting and touching is the fact, that whereas in the first, third, and fourth Gospels only one crowing of the cock is mentioned as sounding the note of Peter's fall, in the second Gospel —which all ancient tradition proclaims, and internal evidence suggests, to have been drawn up under the immediate eye of Peter—it is said that two crowings of the cock would sound his fall. And as it is Mark alone who records the fact that the cock did crow twice—the first time after one denial of his Lord, and the second immediately after the last—we have thus an affecting announcement, almost from his own pen, that warning after warning passed unheeded, till the second knell rung in his ears and bitterly revealed how much wiser his Lord was than he.

32-42. THE AGONY IN THE GARDEN. (=Matt. 26:36-46; Luke 22:39-46). See on Luke 22:39-46.

the place—the Garden of Gethsemane, on the west or city side of the mount. Comparing all the accounts of this mysterious scene, the facts appear to be these: (1) He bade nine of the Twelve remain "here" while He went and prayed "yonder."

ADAM CLARKE

And when they had sung an hymn. Probably no more than a kind of recitative reading or chanting. As to the hymn itself, we know, from the universal consent of Jewish antiquity, that it was composed of Psalms 113—118, termed by the Jews halel, from halelu-yah, the first word in Psalm 113. These six psalms were always sung at every paschal solemnity. They sung this great hallel on account of the five great benefits referred to in it; viz., (1) The Exodus from Egypt, Ps. cxiv. 1, "When Israel went out of Egypt." (2) The miraculous division of the Red Sea, v. 3, "The sea saw it, and fled." (3) The promulgation of the law, v. 4, "The mountains skipped like . . . lambs." (4) The resurrection of the dead, Ps. cxvi. 9, "I will walk before the Lord in the land of the living." (5) The passion of the Messiah, Ps. cxv. 1, "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us."

All ye shall be offended. Or rather, "You will all be stumbled"—you will all forsake Me, and lose in a great measure your confidence in Me. This night. The time of trial is just at hand. I will smite the shepherd. It will happen to you as to a flock of sheep whose shepherd has been slain—the leader and guardian being removed, the whole flock shall be scattered, and be on the point of becoming a prey to ravenous beasts.

But after I am risen again. Do not lose your confidence; for though I shall appear for a time to be wholly left to wicked men, and be brought under the power of death, yet I will rise again, and triumph over all your enemies and mine. I will go before you. Still alluding to the case of the shepherd and his sheep. Though the shepherd have been smitten and the sheep scattered, the shepherd shall revive again, collect the scattered flock, and go before them, and lead them to peace, security, and happiness.

Peter . . . said unto him, Though all men shall be offended . . . yet will I never. The presumptuous person imagines he can do everything, and can do nothing; thinks he can excel all, and excels in nothing; promises everything, and performs nothing. The humble man acts a quite contrary part. There is nothing we know so little of as ourselves—nothing we see less of than our own weakness and poverty.

30. That . . . thou. Su is added by most MSS. and versions. It adds much to the energy of the passage, every word of which is deeply emphatical. "Verily I say unto you that you, this day, in this very night, before the cock shall crow twice, you will deny Me."

Though I should die with thee, yet will I not deny thee. He does not take the warning which his Lord gave him—he trusts in the warm, sincere attachment to Christ which he now feels, not considering that this must speedily fail unless supported by the power of God.

A place called Gethsemane. A garden at the foot of the Mount of Olives. The name seems to be formed from gath, "a press," and shemen, "oil"; probably the place where the produce of the mount of Olives was prepared for use. The garden of the oil press, or olive press.

And he took with him Peter and the two sons of Zebedee. That is, James and John, the same persons who had beheld His transfiguration on the mount—that they might contemplate this agony in the light of that glory which they had there seen, and so be kept from being stumbled by a view of His present humiliation. And very heavy. "Overwhelmed with anguish." This word is used by the Greeks to denote the most extreme anguish which the soul can feel—excruciating anxiety and torture of spirit.

MATTHEW HENRY

Matthew, but very significant; it bespeaks something like that horror of great darkness, which fell upon Abraham (Gen. xv. 12). Never was sorrow like unto his at that time. Yet there was not the least disorder or irregularity in this commotion of his spirits; for he had no corrupt nature to mix with them, as we have. If water have a sediment at the bottom, though it may be clear while it stands still, yet, when shaken, it grows muddy; so it is with our affections: but pure water in a clean glass, though ever so much stirred, continues clear; and so it was with Christ.

IV. He made a sad complaint of this agitation. He said, My soul is exceeding sorrowful. He was made sin for us, and therefore was thus sorrowful; he fully knew the malignity of the sins he was to suffer for; and having the highest degrees of love to God, who was offended by them, and of love to man, who was damaged and endangered by them, no marvel that his soul was exceeding sorrowful. He was made a curse for us; the curses of the law were transferred to him as our surety and representative. He now tasted death (as he is said to do, Heb. ii. 9), he drank up even the dregs of the cup; he tasted all the bitterness of it.

Now the consideration of Christ's sufferings in his soul, and his sorrows for us, should be of use to us,

(1) To embitter our sins. Can we ever entertain a favourable or so much as a slight thought of sin, when we see what impression sin made upon the Lord Jesus? Shall that sit light upon our souls, which sat so heavy upon his? Was Christ in such an agony for our sins, and shall we never be in an agony about them? If Christ thus suffered for sin, let us arm ourselves with the same mind.

(2) To sweeten our sorrows; if our souls be at any time exceeding sorrowful, let us remember that our Master was so before us, and the disciple is not greater than his Lord. Why should we affect to drive away sorrow, when Christ for our sakes, submitted to it, and thereby not only took out the sting of it, but put virtue into it, and made it profitable, nay, and put sweetness into it, and made it comfortable. Blessed Paul was sorrowful, and yet always rejoicing.

V. He ordered his disciples to keep with him; he said to them, Tarry ye here and watch. He had said to the other disciples nothing but, Sit ye here (v. 32); but these three he bids to tarry and watch, as expecting more from them than from the rest.

VI. He addressed himself to God by prayer (v. 35); He fell on the ground, and prayed. It was but a little before this, that in prayer he lifted up his eyes (John xvii. 1); but here, being in an agony, he fell upon his face. As Man, he deprecated his sufferings, that, if it were possible, the hour might pass from him (v. 35). We have his very words (v. 36), Abba, Father. The Syriac word is here retained, which Christ used, and which signifies Father, to intimate what an emphasis our Lord Jesus, in his sorrows, laid upon it, and would have us to lay. Father, all things are possible to thee. Even that which we cannot expect to be done for us, we ought yet to believe that God is able to do: and when we submit to his will, it must be with a believing acknowledgment of his power, that all things are possible to him. As Mediator, he acquiesced in the will of God concerning them; "Nevertheless, not what I will, but what thou wilt."

VII. He roused his disciples, who were dropped asleep while he was at prayer, v. 37, 38. He comes to look after them, since they did not look after him; and he finds them asleep. This carelessness of theirs was a presage of their further offence in deserting him. He had so lately commended them for continuing with him in his temptations, though they had not been without their faults. They had lately promised not to be offended in him; what! and yet mind him so little? He particularly upbraided Peter with his drowsiness; Simon, sleepest thou? Couldest thou not watch one hour? He did not require him to watch all night with him, only for one hour. He doth not over-task us, nor weary us.

As those whom Christ loves he rebukes when they do amiss, so those whom he rebukes he counsels and comforts. It was a very wise and faithful word of advice which Christ here gave to his disciples; Watch and pray, lest ye enter into temptation, v. 38. It was bad to sleep when Christ was in his agony, but if they did not stir up themselves, and fetch in grace and strength from God by prayer, they would do worse; and so they did, when they all forsook him, and fled. It was a very kind and tender excuse that Christ made for them; "The spirit truly is willing; you would willingly keep awake, but you cannot." The flesh is weak, and if you do not watch and pray, you may be overcome, notwithstanding. The consideration of the weakness and infirmity of our flesh should engage and quicken us to prayer and watchfulness.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

(2) He "took the other three, Peter, James, and John, and began to be sore amazed [appalled], sorrowful, and very heavy [oppressed], and said, My soul is exceeding sorrowful even unto death"—'I feel as if nature would sink under this load, as if life were ebbing out, and death coming before its time'-

-"tarry ye here, and watch with Me"; not, 'Witness for Me,' but, 'Bear Me company.' It did Him good, it seems, to have them beside Him. (3) But soon even they were too much for Him: He must be alone. "He was withdrawn from them about a stone's-cast"—though near enough for them to be competent witnesses—and kneeled down, uttering that most affecting prayer (Mark 14:36), that if possible "the cup," of His approaching death, "might pass from Him, but if not, His Father's will be done": implying that in itself it was so purely revolting that only its being the Father's will would induce Him to taste it, but that in that view of it He was perfectly prepared to drink it. It is no struggle between a reluctant and a compliant will, but between two views of one event—an abstract and a relative view of it, in the one of which it was revolting, in the other welcome. By signifying how it felt in the one view, He shows His beautiful oneness with ourselves in nature and feeling; by expressing how He regarded it in the other light, He reveals His absolute obediential subjection to His Father. (4) On this, having a momentary relief, for it came upon Him, we imagine, by surges, He returns to the three, and finding them sleeping, He addresses them affectingly, particularly Peter, as in Mark 14:37, 38. He then (5) goes back, not now to kneel, but fell on His face on the ground, saying the same words, but with this turn, "If this cup may not pass . . ." (Matt. 26:42)—i.e., 'Yes, I understand this mysterious silence (Ps. 22:1-6); it may not pass; I am to drink it, and I will'—"Thy will be done!" (6) Again, for a moment relieved, He returns and finds them "sleeping for sorrow," warns them as before, but puts a loving construction upon it, separating between the "willing spirit" and the "weak flesh." (7) Once more, returning to His solitary spot, the surges rise higher, beat more tempestuously, and seem ready to overwhelm Him. To fortify Him for this, "there appeared an angel unto Him from heaven strengthening Him"—not to minister light or comfort (He was to have none of that, and they were not needed nor fitted to convey it), but purely to sustain and brace up sinking nature for a yet hotter and fiercer struggle. And now, He is "in an agony, and prays more earnestly"—even Christ's prayer, it seems, admitted of and now demanded such increase—"and His sweat was as it were great drops [literally clots] of blood falling down to the

My soul is exceeding sorrowful (or "is surrounded with exceeding sorrow"), even unto death. This latter word explains the two former: My soul is so dissolved in sorrow, My spirit is filled with such agony and anguish, that, if speedy succor be not given to My body, death must be the speedy consequence.

36. Abba, Father. This Syriac word, which intimates filial affection and respect and parental tenderness, seems to have been used by our blessed Lord, merely considered as man, to show His complete submission to His Father's will, and the tender affection which He was conscious His Father had for Him. Abba, Syriac, is here joined to pater, Greek, both signifying "father"; so Paul, Rom. viii. 15; Gal. iv. 6. The reason is that from the time in which the Jews became conversant with the Greek language, by means of the Septuagint version and their commerce with the Roman and Greek provinces, they often intermingled Greek and Roman words with their own language.

O my Father, if this cup may not pass away from me. If it be not possible to redeem fallen man unless I drink this cup, unless I suffer death for them; thy will be done—I am content to suffer whatever may be requisite to accomplish the great design. In this address the humanity of Christ most evidently appears, for it was His humanity alone that could suffer.

He . . . saith unto Peter. He addressed himself more particularly to this apostle because of the profession he had made, v. 33; as if He had said: "Is this the way you testify your affectionate attachment to Me? You all said you were ready to die with Me; what, then, cannot you watch . . . one hour?"

That ye enter not into temptation. Watch —that you be not taken unawares; and pray—that when it comes you may be enabled to bear it.

A. T. ROBERTSON:

33. "Greatly amazed and sore troubled" (ekthambeisthai kai ademonein). Matt. 26:37 has "sorrowful and sore troubled." Mark alone uses exthambeisthai (here and in 9:15). There is a papyrus example given by Moulton and Milligan's Vocabulary. The verb thambeo occurs in Mark 10:32 for the amazement of the disciples at the look of Jesus as he went toward Jerusalem. Now Jesus himself feels amazement as he directly faces the struggle in the Garden of Gethsemane. He wins the victory over himself in Gethsemane and then he can endure the loss, despising the shame. For the moment he is rather amazed and homesick for heaven. "Long as He had foreseen the Passion, when it came clearly into view its terror exceeded His anticipations" (Swete). "He learned from what he suffered" (Heb. 5:8), and this new experience enriched the human soul of Jesus.
—Word Pictures in the New Testament

VIII. He repeated his address to his Father (v. 39); He went again, and prayed, saying the same word; he spoke to the same purport, and again the third time. This teaches us, that men ought always to pray, and not to faint, Luke xviii. 1. Though the answers to our prayers do not come quickly, yet we must renew our requests. Paul, when he was buffeted by a messenger of Satan, besought the Lord thrice, as Christ did here, before he obtained an answer of peace, 2 Cor. xii. 7, 8. He must come a second and a third time, for the visits of God's grace, in answer to prayer, come sooner or later, according to the pleasure of his will.

IX. He repeated his visits to his disciples. Thus he gave a specimen of his continued care for his church on earth, even when it is half asleep. He came the second time to his disciples, and found them asleep again, v. 40. See how the infirmities of Christ's disciples return upon them, and overpower them, and what clogs those bodies of ours are to our souls. This second time he spoke to them as before, but they wist not what to answer him. Like men between sleeping and waking, they knew not where they were, or what they said. But, the third time, they were bid to sleep if they would (v. 41); "Sleep on now, and take your rest." It is enough; we had not that word in Matthew. "You have had warning enough to keep awake, and would not take it. Now the hour is come, in which I knew you would all forsake me." The Son of man is now betrayed into the hands of sinners. "Come, rise up. Let us go, for lo, he that betrayeth me is at hand."

Verses 43–52

We have here the seizing of our Lord Jesus by the officers of the chief priests. He began first to suffer in his soul, but afterward suffered in his body.

I. Here is a band of rude miscreants employed to take our Lord Jesus; a great multitude with swords and staves. At the head of this rabble is Judas, one of the twelve. It is no new thing for a very fair and plausible profession to end in a shameful and fatal apostasy.

II. Men of no less figure than the chief priests, and the scribes, and the elders, sent them, and set them on work, who pretended to expect the Messiah, and to be ready to welcome him; and yet, when he is come, they set themselves against him, and resolve to run him down.

III. Judas betrayed him with a kiss. He called him, Master, Master, and kissed him. It is enough to put one for ever out of conceit with being called of men Rabbi, Rabbi (Matt. xxiii. 7), since it was with this compliment that Christ was betrayed.

IV. They arrested him, and made him their prisoner (v. 46); They laid their hands on him, rude and violent hands, and took him into custody.

V. Peter laid about him in defence of his Master, and wounded one of the assailants. He was one of them that stood by, of them that were with him (so the word signifies). He drew a sword, and aimed, it is likely, to cut off the head, but missed his blow, and only cut off the ear, of a servant of the high priest, v. 47. It is easier to fight for Christ, than to die for him; but Christ's good soldiers overcome, not by taking away other people lives, but by laying down their own.

VI. Christ shows them the absurdity of their proceedings against him. 1. That they came out against him, as against a thief, whereas he was innocent of any crime; he taught daily in the temple, and if he had any wicked design, there it would some time or other have been discovered. By his fruits he was known to be a good tree; why then did they come out against him as a thief? 2. That they came to take him thus privately, whereas he was neither ashamed nor afraid to appear publicly in the temple. He was none of those evil-doers that hate the light, neither come to the light, John iii. 20. To come upon him thus at midnight, and in the place of his retirement, was base and cowardly. But this was not all. 3. They came with swords and staves, as if he had been in arms against the government. There was no occasion for those weapons; but they made this ado, (1) To secure themselves from the rage of some; they came armed, because they feared the people. (2) To expose him to the rage of others. By coming with swords and staves to take him, they represented him to the people as a dangerous turbulent man.

VII. He reconciled himself to all this injurious, ignominious treatment, by referring himself to the Old Testament predictions of the Messiah. I am hardly used, but I submit, for the scriptures must be fulfilled, v. 49. See here what a regard Christ had to the scriptures; he would bear anything rather than that the least jot or tittle of the word of God should ground." What was this? Not His proper sacrificial offering, though essential to it. It was just the internal struggle, apparently hushing itself before, but now swelling up again, convulsing His whole inner man, and this so affecting His animal nature that the sweat oozed out from every pore in thick drops of blood, falling to the ground. It was just shuddering nature and indomitable will struggling together. But again the cry, If it must be, Thy will be done, issues from His lips, and all is over. "The bitterness of death is past." He has anticipated and rehearsed His final conflict, and won the victory—now on the theater of an invincible will, as then on the arena of the Cross. 'I will suffer,' is the grand result of Gethsemane: "It is finished" is the shout that bursts from the Cross. The Will without the Deed had been all in vain; but His work was consummated when He carried the now manifested Will into the palpable Deed, "by the which WILL we are sanctified THROUGH THE OFFERING OF THE BODY OF JESUS CHRIST ONCE FOR ALL" (Heb. 10:10). (8) At the close of the whole scene, finding them still sleeping (worn out with continued sorrow and racking anxiety), He bids them, with an irony of deep emotion, "sleep on now and take their rest, the hour is come, the Son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinners, rise, let us be going, the traitor is at hand." And while He spoke, Judas approached with his armed band. Thus they proved "miserable comforters," broken reeds; and thus in His whole work He was alone, and "of the people there was none with Him."

43-52. BETRAYAL AND APPREHENSION OF JESUS—FLIGHT OF HIS DISCIPLES. (=Matt. 26:47-56; Luke 22:47-53; John 18:1-12.) See on John 18: 1-12.

Judas then—"He that was called Judas, one of the Twelve," says Luke, in language which brands him with peculiar infamy, as in the sacred circle while in no sense of it. a band of men—"the detachment of the Roman cohort on duty at the festival for the purpose of maintaining order" [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. officers from the chief priests and Pharisees—captains of the temple and armed Levites. lanterns and torches—It was full moon, but in case He should have secreted Himself somewhere in the dark ravine, they bring the means of exploring its hiding-places—little knowing whom they had to do with. "Now he that betrayed Him had given them a sign, saying, Whomsoever I shall kiss, that same is He, hold Him fast" (Matt. 26:48). The cold-bloodedness of this speech was only exceeded by the deed itself. "And Judas went before them [Luke 22:47], and forthwith he came to Jesus, and said, Hail, Master, and kissed Him" (Matt. 26:49; cf. Exod. 4:27; 18:7; Luke 7:45). The impudence of this atrocious deed shows how thoroughly he had by this time mastered all his scruples. If the dialogue between our Lord and His captors was before this, as some interpreters think it was, the kiss of Judas was purely gratuitous, and probably to make good his right to the money; our Lord having presented Himself unexpectedly before them, and rendered it unnecessary for any one to point Him out. But a comparison of the narratives seems to show that our Lord's "coming forth" to the band was subsequent to the interview of Judas. "And Jesus said unto him, Friend"—not the endearing term "friend" (in ch. 15:15), but "companion," a word used on occasions of remonstrance or rebuke (as in Matt. 20:13; 22: 12)—"Wherefore art thou come?" (Matt. 26:50). "Betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss"—imprinting upon the foulest act the mark of tenderest affection? What wounded feeling does this express! Of this Jesus showed Himself on various occasions keenly susceptible—as all generous and beautiful natures do.

Then Simon Peter, having a sword, drew it, and smote the high priest's servant, and cut off his right ear. The servant's name was Malchus—None of the other Evangelists mention the name either of the ardent disciple or of his victim. John being "known to the high priest" (vs. 15), the mention of the servant's name by him is quite natural, and an interesting mark of truth in a small matter. As to the right ear, specified both here and in Luke, the man was "likely foremost of those who advanced to seize Jesus, and presented himself in the attitude of a combatant; hence his right side would be exposed to attack. The blow of Peter was evidently aimed vertically at his head" [WESTER and WILKINSON].

ADAM CLARKE

Prayed the third time. So Paul wrote: "I besought the Lord thrice, that it might depart from me" (2 Cor. xii. 8). This thrice repeating the same petition argues deep earnestness of soul.

My hour—in which I am to be delivered up, is at hand; therefore, now think of your own personal safety. The Son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinners. Viz., the Gentiles or heathens, who were generally distinguished by this appellation from the Jews.

Rise, let us be going. That is, to meet them, giving thereby the fullest proof that I know all their designs and might have, by flight or otherwise, provided for My own safety. But I go willingly to meet that death which their malice designs Me, and through it provide for the life of the world.

Judas, one of the twelve. More deeply to mark his base ingratitude and desperate wickedness. A great multitude with swords and staves. They did not come as officers of justice but as a desperate mob.

Gave them a sign. How coolly deliberate is this dire apostate! The man whom I shall kiss—how deeply hypocritical! That is He; hold him fast, "seize Him"—how diabolically malicious!

Hail, master. A usual compliment among the Jews. Judas pretends to wish our Lord continued health while he is meditating His destruction! And kissed him. "And tenderly kissed Him"—this is the proper meaning of the original word. He kissed Him again and again—still pretending the most affectionate attachment to Him, though our Lord had before unmasked him.

One of them which were with Jesus. This was Peter—struck a servant of the high priest's (the servant's name was Malchus, John xviii. 10), and smote off his ear. In Luke xxii. 51 it is said, Jesus touched and healed it. Here was another miracle, and striking proof of the divinity of Christ.

But how then—had I such a defense—shall the scriptures be fulfilled, which say that thus it must be? That is, that I am to suffer and die for the sin of the world. Probably the fall to the ground. See what use we are to make of the Old Testament; we must search for Christ, the true treasure hid in that field.

VIII. All Christ's disciples, hereupon, deserted him (v. 50); They all forsook him, and fled. They were very confident that they should adhere to him; but even good men know not what they will do, till they are tried. If it was such a comfort to him as he had lately intimated, that they had hitherto continued with him in his lesser trials (Luke xxii. 28), we may well imagine what a grief it was to him, that they deserted him now in the greatest. Let not those that suffer for Christ, think it strange, if they be thus deserted, and if all the herd shun the wounded deer. When St. Paul was in peril, none stood by him, but all men forsook him, 2 Tim. iv. 16.

IX. The noise disturbed the neighbourhood, v. 51, 52. This passage of story we have not in any other of the evangelists. Here is an account of a certain young man, who, as it should seem, was no disciple of Christ, who followed him to see what would become of him. Now observe concerning him,

1. How he was frightened out of his bed, to be a spectator of Christ's sufferings. Such a multitude, so armed, could not but produce a great stir; this alarmed our young man, who had the curiosity to go, and see what the matter was, and was in such haste to inform himself, that he could not stay to dress himself, but threw a sheet about him. When all his disciples had quitted him, he continued to follow him, desirous to hear what he would say, and see what he would do.

2. See how he was frightened into his bed again, when he was in danger of being made a sharer in Christ's sufferings. His own disciples had run away from him; but this young man thought he might securely attend him, especially being so far from being armed, that he was not so much as clothed; but the young men, the Roman soldiers, who were called to assist, laid hold of him. Finding himself in danger, he left the linen cloth by which they had caught hold of him, and fled away naked. This passage is recorded to show what a narrow escape the disciples had of falling into their hands, out of which nothing could have kept them but their Master's care of them; If ye seek me, let these go their way, John xviii. 8. It also intimates that there is no hold of those who are led by curiosity only, and not by faith and conscience, to follow Christ.

We have here Christ's arraignment, trial, conviction, and condemnation, before the great sanhedrim, of which the high priest was president, the same Caiaphas that had lately adjudged it expedient he should be put to death, guilty or not guilty (John xi. 50), and who therefore might justly be excepted against as partial.

I. Christ is hurried away to his house. And there though in the dead of the night, all the chief priests, and elders, and scribes, that were in the secret, were assembled, ready to receive the prey; so sure were they of it.

W. E. VINE:

In the Gospels the term denotes the official residence in Jerusalem of the Roman governor, and the various translations of it in our versions arose from a desire either to indicate the special purpose for which that residence was used on the occasion in question, or to explain what particular building was intended. But whatever building the governor occupied was the Praetorium. It is most probable that in Jerusalem he resided in the well-known palace of Herod.... Pilate's residence has been identified with the castle of Antonia, which was occupied by the regular garrison. The probability is that it was the same as Herod's palace. Herod's palace in Caesarea was used as the Praetorium there, and the expression in Acts 23:35, marg., "Herod's praetorium," is abbreviated from "the praetorium of Herod's palace."

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

53-72. JESUS ARRAIGNED BEFORE THE SANHEDRIM, CONDEMNED TO DIE, AND SHAMEFULLY ENTREATED—THE FALL OF PETER. (=Matt. 26:57-75; Luke 22:54-71; John 18:13-18, 24-27.) Had we only the first three Gospels, we should have concluded that our Lord was led immediately to Caiaphas, and had before the Council. But as the Sanhedrim could hardly have been brought together at the dead hour of night—by which time our Lord was in the hands of the officers sent to take Him—and as it was only "as soon as it was day" that the Council met (Luke 22:66), we should have had some difficulty in knowing what was done with Him during those intervening hours. In the Fourth Gospel, however, all this is cleared up, and a very important addition to our information is made (John 18:13, 14, 19-24).

Peter Obtains Access within the Quadrangle of the High Priest's Residence, and Warms Himself at the Fire (vss. 53,54). 53. And they led Jesus away to the high priest: and with him were assembled—or rather, "there gathered together unto him"—all the chief priests and the elders and the scribes—it was then a full and formal meeting of the Sanhedrim. Now, as the first three Evangelists place all Peter's denials of his Lord after this, we should naturally conclude that they took place while our Lord stood before the Sanhedrim. But besides that the natural impression is that the scene around the fire took place overnight, the second crowing of the cock, if we are to credit ancient writers, would occur about the beginning of the fourth watch, or between three and four in the morning. By that time, however, the Council had probably convened, being warned, perhaps, that they were to prepare for being called at any hour of the morning, should the Prisoner be successfully secured. If this be correct, it is fairly certain that only the last of Peter's three denials would take place while our Lord was under trial before the Sanhedrim. One thing more may require explanation. If our Lord had to be transferred from the residence of Annas to that of Caiaphas, one is apt to wonder that there is no mention of His being marched from the one to the other. But the building, in all likelihood, was one and the same; in which case He would merely have to be taken perhaps across the court, from one chamber to another. 54. And Peter followed him afar off, even into—or "from afar, even to the interior of"—the palace of the high priest—"An Oriental house," says ROBINSON, "is usually built around a quadrangular interior court; into which there is a passage (sometimes arched) through the front part of the house, closed next the street by a heavy folding gate, with a smaller wicket for single persons, kept by a porter. The interior court, often paved or flagged, and open to the sky, is the hall, which our translators have rendered 'palace,' where the attendants made a fire; and the passage beneath the front of the house, from the street to this court, is the porch. The place where Jesus stood before the high priest may have been an open room, or place of audience on the ground-floor, in the rear or on one side of the court; such rooms, open in front, being customary. It was close upon the court, for Jesus heard all that was scriptures to which our Lord principally refers are Psalms xxii; lxix; and especially Isaiah liii and Dan. ix. 24-27. Christ shows that they had no power against Him but what He permitted, and that He willingly gave up himself into their hands.

Then all the disciples forsook him, and fled. He had but twelve who professed inviolable attachment to Him. One of these betrayed Him; another denied Him with oaths; and the rest ran away and utterly abandoned Him to His implacable enemies!

A. T. ROBERTSON:

51. "A certain young man" (neaniskos tis). This incident alone in Mark. It is usually supposed that Mark himself, son of Mary (Acts 12:12), in whose house they probably had observed the passover meal, had followed Jesus and the apostles to the Garden. It is a lifelike touch quite in keeping with such a situation. Here after the arrest he was following with Jesus.

—Word Pictures in the New Testament

51. A certain young man. Probably raised from his sleep by the noise which the rabble made who came to apprehend Jesus, having wrapped the sheet or some of the bedclothing about him, became thereby the more conspicuous. On his appearing, he was seized; but as they had no way of holding him but only by the cloth which was wrapped round him, he disengaged himself from that, and so escaped out of their hands. This circumstance is not related by any other of the Evangelists.

They . . . led him away to Caiaphas. John says, chap. xviii. 13, that they led him first to Annas; but this appears to have been done merely to do him honor as the father-in-law of Caiaphas, and his colleague in the high priesthood. But as the Sanhedrin was assembled at the house of Caiaphas, it was there He must be brought to undergo His mock trial.

Peter followed him afar off. Poor Peter! This is the beginning of his dreadful fall. His fear kept him from joining the company and publicly acknowledging his Lord, and his affection obliged him to follow at a distance that he might see the end.

MATTHEW HENRY

II. Peter followed at a distance, v. 54. But when he came to the high priest's palace, he sat with the servants. The high priest's fire side was no proper place, nor his servants proper company for Peter, but it was his entrance into a temptation.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

His love pushed him into a dangerous place. He was in bad company among the inferior sort of servants huddled around the fire that cold morning, at the lower end of the hall; and as its light flickered on his face, he was sure to be recognized. But we have not now to do with his denial. Rather, he is the type of a true disciple coercing his human weakness and cowardice to yield to the attraction which draws him to his Lord, and restful in the humblest place where he can catch a glimpse of His face, and so be, as he long after alleged it as his chief title to authority to have been, "a witness of the sufferings of Christ."—Expositions of Holy Scripture

III. Great diligence was used to procure, for love or money, false witnesses against Christ. They had seized him as a malefactor, and now they had him they had no indictment to prefer against him, but they sought for witnesses against him, if they would accuse him, v. 55, 56. The chief priests and elders were by the law entrusted with the prosecuting and punishing of false witnesses (Deut. xix. 16, 17). It is time to cry, Help, Lord, when the physicians of a land are its troublers, and those that should be the conservators of peace and equity, are the corrupters of both.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

The fundamental wrong, so far as the rulers were concerned, was that the whole case was prejudged. That is perfectly patent. "The chief priests and the whole council sought witness against Jesus"—by no means to discover the truth concerning Him but "to put him to death." The revelation of some intellectual obscurity or wickedness is obvious. They were gathered together ostensibly for the purpose of investigation; but really they were mastered by one determination; the death of the Man who was arraigned before them. The inevitable issue of such a gathering would be that of ignorance. Light could not penetrate their minds. They were predetermined to encompass, at all costs, the destruction of the Prisoner at the bar. Ignorance must be the result of that attitude of mind. There was no room for light. What was said by one and another was contorted, twisted, to the one purpose of putting Him to death.

Let us watch the proceedings, for they reveal some striking facts. These men, mastered by this unholy passion, set upon realizing and encompassing the death of this Prisoner at the bar, were nevertheless compelled to a recognition of the rights of truth. Else why should they look for witnesses at all? Why not dispense with a trial, and at once lay violent hands upon Him? No, that even they dare not do. They must seek some accusation which will appear to be true. They must find witnesses; they must have some reason for the thing they do. This was the unconscious compliment which devilish falsehood paid to the ascendancy of truth.

going on around the fire, and turned and looked upon Peter (Luke 22:61). and he sat with the servants, and warmed himself at the fire—The graphic details, here omitted, are supplied in the other Gospels. John 18:18, "And the servants and officers stood there" that is, in the hall, within the quadrangle, open to the sky, "who had made a fire of coals," or charcoal (in a brazier probably), "for it was cold." John alone of all the Evangelists mentions the material, and the coldness of the night, as WEBSTER and WILKINSON remark. The elevated situation of Jerusalem, observes THOLUCK, renders it so cold about Easter as to make a watch fire at night indispensable. "And Peter stood with them and warmed himself." "He went in," says Matthew (26:58), "and sat with the servants to see the end." These two minute statements throw an interesting light on each other. His wishing to "see the end," or issue of these proceedings, was what led him into the palace, for he evidently feared the worst. But once in, the serpent-coil is drawn closer; it is a cold night, and why should not he take advantage of the fire as well as others? Besides, in the talk of the crowd about the all-engrossing topic he may pick up something which he would like to hear. Poor Peter! But now, let us leave him warming himself at the fire, and listening to the hum of talk about this strange case by which the subordinate officials, passing to and fro and crowding around the fire in this open court, would while away the time; and, following what appears the order of the Evangelical Narrative, let us turn to Peter's Lord.

The Judicial Trial and Condemnation of the Lord Jesus by the Sanhedrim (vss. 55-64). But let the reader observe, that though this is introduced by the Evangelist before any of the denials of Peter are recorded, we have given reasons for concluding that probably the first two denials took place while our Lord was with Annas, and the last only during the trial before the Sanhedrim. 55. And the chief priests and all the council sought for witness against Jesus to put him to death—Matthew (26:59) says they "sought false witness." They knew they could find nothing valid; but having their Prisoner to bring before Pilate, they behooved to make a case. and found none—none that would suit their purpose, or make a decent ground of charge before Pilate. 56. For many bare false witness against him—From their debasing themselves to "seek" them, we are led to infer that they were bribed to bear false witness; though there are never wanting sycophants enough, ready to sell themselves for naught, if they may but get a smile from those above them: see a similar scene in Acts 6:11-14. How is one reminded here of that complaint, "False witnesses did rise up: they laid to my charge things that I knew not" (Ps. 31:11)!—but their witness agreed not together—If even two of them had been agreed, it would have been greedily enough laid hold of, as all that the law insisted upon even in capital cases (Deut. 17:6). But even in this they failed. One cannot but admire the providence which secured this result; since, on the one hand, it seems astonishing that those unscrupulous prosecutors and their ready tools should so bungle a business in which they felt their whole interests bound up; and, on the other hand, if they had succeeded in making even a plausible case, the effect on the progress of the Gospel might for a time have been injurious. But at the very time when His enemies were saying, "God hath forsaken Him; persecute and take Him; for there is none to deliver Him" (Ps. 71:11), He whose Witness He was and whose work He was doing was keeping Him as the apple of His eye, and while He was making the wrath of man to praise Him, was restraining the remainder of that wrath (Ps. 76:10). 57. And there arose certain, and bare false witness against him—Matthew (26:60) is more precise here: "At the last came two false witnesses." As no two had before agreed in anything, they felt it necessary to secure a duplicate testimony to something, but they were long of succeeding. And what was it, when at length it was brought forward? saying, 58. We heard him say, I will destroy this temple that is made with hands, and within three days I will build another made without hands—On this charge, observe, first, that eager as His enemies were to find criminal matter against our Lord, they had to go back to the outset of His ministry, His first visit to Jerusalem, more than three years before this. In all that He said and did after that, though ever increasing in boldness, they could find nothing. Next, that even then, they fix only on one speech, of two or three words, which they dared to adduce against Him. Further, they most manifestly pervert the

All the council, sought false witness. What a prostitution of justice! They first resolve to ruin Him, and then seek the proper means of effecting it; they declare Him criminal, and after that do all they can to fix some crime upon Him, that they may appear to have some shadow of justice on their side when they put Him to death.

I am able to destroy the temple of God. (1) These words were not fairly quoted. Jesus had said, John ii. 19, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up." (2) The innuendo which they produce, applying these words to a pretended design to destroy the temple at Jerusalem, was utterly unfair; for these words He spoke of the temple of His body.

MATTHEW HENRY

True, there was a ghastly readiness to compromise, to accept as true the basest falsehood, if only it might be made to serve their purpose of having an appearance of truth. Oh! it was an unholy business; it is a terrible picture. Yet it is a wonderful illustration of that marvelous and inherent consciousness of right and wrong, from which humanity never has, and never can escape. Whenever humanity forgets to make its bow to truth, then humanity is entirely and absolutely hopeless.
—The Gospel According to Mark

IV. He was at length charged with words which, as they were represented, seemed to threaten the temple (v. 57, 58), but the witnesses to this matter did not agree (v. 59). Their testimony was not sufficient, nor equal to the charge of a capital crime; they did not accuse him of that upon which a sentence of death might be founded.

V. He was urged to be his own accuser (v. 60); The high priest stood up and said, Answerest thou nothing? This he said under pretence of justice and fair dealing, but really with a design to ensnare him, that they might accuse him. We may well imagine with what an air of haughtiness and disdain this proud high priest brought our Lord Jesus to this question. Pleased to think that he seemed silent, who had so often silenced those that picked quarrels with him. Still Christ answered nothing, that he might set us an example, 1. Of patience under calumnies and false accusations. 2. Of prudence, when a man shall be made an offender for a word, and our defence made our *of*fence.

VI. When he was asked whether he was the Christ, he confessed, and denied not, that he was, v. 61, 62. He asked, Art thou the Son of the Blessed? that is, the Son of God?

And for the proof of his being the Son of God, he binds them over to his second coming; "Ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power; that Son of man that now appears so mean you shall shortly see and tremble before." Now, one would think that such a word as this should have startled the court, and at least, in the opinion of some of them, should have amounted to a demurrer, or arrest of judgment. When Paul at the bar reasoned of the judgment to come, the judge trembled, and adjourned the trial, Acts. xxiv. 25.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

speech of our Lord. We say not this because in Mark's form of it, it differs from the report of the words given by the Fourth Evangelist (John 2:18-22)—the only one of the Evangelists who reports it all, or mentions even any visit paid by our Lord to Jerusalem before His last—but because the one report bears truth, and the other falsehood, on its face. When our Lord said on that occasion, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up," they might, for a moment, have understood Him to refer to the temple out of whose courts He had swept the buyers and sellers. But after they had expressed their astonishment at His words, in that sense of them, and reasoned upon the time it had taken to rear the temple as it then stood, since no answer to this appears to have been given by our Lord, it is hardly conceivable that they should continue in the persuasion that this was really His meaning. But finally, even if the more ignorant among them had done so, it is next to certain that the ecclesiastics, who were the prosecutors in this case, did not believe that this was His meaning. For in less than three days after this they went to Pilate, saying, "Sir, we remember that that deceiver said, while he was yet alive, after three days I will rise again" (Matt. 27:63). Now what utterance of Christ known to His enemies, could this refer to, if not to this very saying about destroying and rearing up the temple? And if so, it puts it beyond a doubt that by this time, at least, they were perfectly aware that our Lord's words referred to His death by their hands and His resurrection by His own. But this is confirmed by the next verse. 59. But neither so did their witness agree together—i.e., not even as to so brief a speech, consisting of but a few words, was there such a concurrence in their mode of reporting it as to make out a decent case. In such a charge everything depended on the very terms alleged to have been used. For every one must see that a very slight turn, either way, given to such words, would make them either something like indictable matter, or else a ridiculous ground for a criminal charge—would either give them a colorable pretext for the charge of impiety which they were bent on making out, or else make the whole saying appear, on the worst view that could be taken of it, as merely some mystical or empty boast. 60. Answerest thou nothing? what is it which these witness against thee?—Clearly, they felt that their case had failed, and by this artful question the high priest hoped to get from His own mouth what they had in vain tried to obtain from their false and contradictory witnesses. But in this, too, they failed. 61. But he held his peace, and answered nothing—This must have nonplussed them. But they were not to be easily baulked of their object. Again the high priest—arose (Matt. 26:62), matters having now come to a crisis. asked him, and said unto him, Art thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed?—Why our Lord should have answered this question, when He was silent as to the former, we might not have quite seen, but for Matthew, who says (26:63) that the high priest put Him upon solemn oath, saying, "I adjure Thee by the living God, that Thou tell us whether Thou be the Christ, the Son of God." Such an adjuration was understood to render an answer legally necessary (Lev. 5:1). 62. And Jesus said, I am—or, as in Matthew 26:64, "Thou hast said [it]." In Luke, however (22:70), the answer, "Ye say that I am," should be rendered—as DE WETTE, MEYER, ELLICOTT, and the best critics agree that the preposition requires—"Ye say [it], for I am [so]." Some words, however, were spoken by our Lord before giving His answer to this solemn question. These are recorded by Luke alone (22:67, 68): "Art Thou the Christ [they asked]? tell us. And He said unto them, If I tell you, ye will not believe: and if I also ask [interrogate] "you, ye will not answer Me, nor let Me go." This seems to have been uttered before giving His direct answer, as a calm remonstrance and dignified protest against the prejudgment of His case and the unfairness of their mode of procedure. But now let us hear the rest of the answer, in which the conscious majesty of Jesus breaks forth from behind the dark cloud which overhung Him as He stood before the Council. and—in that character—ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven—In Matthew (26:64) a slightly different but interesting turn is given to it by one word: "Thou hast said [it]: nevertheless"—We prefer this sense of the word to "besides," which some recent critics decide for—"I say unto you, Hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sit on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven." The word rendered "hereafter" means, not

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

The single specimen of the worthless evidence given may be either a piece of misunderstanding or of malicious twisting of innocent words; nor can we decide whether the witnesses contradicted one another or each himself. The former is the more probable, as the fundamental principle of the Jewish law of evidence ("two or three witnesses") would, in that case, rule out the testimony. The saying which they garble meant the very opposite of what they made it mean. It represented Jesus as the restorer of that which Israel should destroy. It referred to His body which is the true Temple; but the symbolic temple "made with hands" is so inseparably connected with the real, that the fate of the one determines that of the other. Strangely significant, therefore, is it, that the rulers heard again, though distorted, at that moment when they were on their trial, the far-reaching sentence, which might have taught them that in slaying Jesus they were throwing down the temple and all which centered in it, and that by His resurrection, His own act, He would build up again a new polity, which yet was but the old transfigured, even "the church, which is his body." His work destroys nothing but "the works of the devil." He is the restorer of the divine ordinances and gifts which men destroy, and His death and resurrection bring back in nobler form all the good things lost by sin, "the desolations of many generations." The history of all subsequent attacks on Christ is mirrored here. The foregone conclusion, the evidence sought as an after-thought to give a colorable pretext, the material found by twisting His teaching, the blindness which accuses Him of destroying what He restores, and fancies itself as preserving what it is destroying, have all reappeared over and over again.
—Expositions of Holy Scripture

I adjure thee by the living God. I put Thee to Thy oath. To this solemn adjuration Christ immediately replies, because He is now called on, in the name of God, to bear another testimony to the truth.

Thou hast said. That is, I am the Christ, the promised Messiah (see on v. 25) and you and this whole nation shall shortly have the fullest proof of it.

For hereafter, in a few years, shall ye see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, fully invested with absolute dominion, and coming in the clouds of heaven, to execute judgment upon this wicked race. Our Lord appears to refer to Dan. vii. 13: "One like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven." This may also refer to the final judgment.

MATTHEW HENRY

TODAY'S DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE:

Son of Man. (1.) Denotes mankind generally, with special reference to their weakness and frailty (Job 25:6; Ps. 8:4; 144:3; 146:3; Isa. 51:12, etc.).

(2.) It is a title frequently given to the prophet Ezekiel, probably to remind him of his human weakness.

(3.) In the New Testament it is used forty-three times as a distinctive title of the Savior. In the Old Testament it is used only in Ps. 80:17 and Dan. 7:13 with this application. While there is much debate over the meaning of this title, it is almost certain that it does not denote Christ's humanity but rather is a title with far-reaching messianic implications.

VII. The high priest, upon this confession of his, convicted him as a blasphemer (v. 63); He rent his clothes. If Saul's rending Samuel's mantle was made to signify the rending of the kingdom from him (1 Sam. xv. 27, 28), much more did Caiaphas's rending his own clothes signify the rending of the priesthood from him, as the rending of the veil, at Christ's death, signified the throwing of all open.

VIII. They agreed that he was a blasphemer, and, as such, was guilty of a capital crime, v. 64. So they all condemned him to be guilty of death; what friends he had in the great sanhedrim, did not appear, it is probable that they had not notice.

IX. They set themselves to abuse him and to make sport with him, v. 65. It should seem that some of the priests themselves so far forgot the dignity, and the gravity which became them, that they helped their servants in playing the fool with a condemned prisoner. This they made their diversion, while they waited for the morning. If they did not think it below them to abuse Christ, shall we think anything below us, by which we may do him honour.

We have here the story of Peter's denying Christ.

1. It began in keeping at a distance from him. Peter had followed afar off (v. 54). Those that are shy of Christ, are in a fair way to deny him.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

"at some future time" (as today "hereafter commonly does), but what the English word originally signified, "after here," "after now," or "from this time." Accordingly, in Luke 22:69, the words used mean "from now." So that though the reference we have given it to the day of His glorious Second Appearing is too obvious to admit of doubt, He would, by using the expression, "From this time," convey the important thought which He had before expressed, immediately after the traitor left the supper-table to do his dark work, "Now is the Son of man glorified" (John 13:31). At this moment, and by this speech, did He "witness the good confession" emphatically and properly, as the apostle says in I Timothy 6:13. Our translators render the words there, "Who before Pontius Pilate witnessed"; referring it to the admission of His being a King, in the presence of Cæsar's own chief representative. But it should be rendered, as LUTHER renders it, and as the best interpreters now understand it, "Who under Pontius Pilate witnessed . . . In this view of it, the apostle is referring not to what our Lord confessed before Pilate—which, though noble, was not of such primary importance—but to that sublime confession which, under Pilate's administration, He witnessed before the only competent tribunal on such occasions, the Supreme Ecclesiastical Council of God's chosen nation, that He was THE MESSIAH, and THE SON OF THE BLESSED ONE; in the former word owning His Supreme Official, in the latter His Supreme Personal, Dignity. 63. Then the high priest rent his clothes—On this expression of horror of blasphemy, see II Kings 18: 37—and saith, What need we any further witnesses? 64. Ye have heard the blasphemy—(See John 10: 33). In Luke (22:71), "For we ourselves have heard of His own mouth"—an affectation of religious horror. what think ye?—'Say what the verdict is to be.' they all condemned him to be guilty of death—or of a capital crime, which blasphemy against God was according to the Jewish law (Lev. 24:16). Yet not absolutely all; for Joseph of Arimathea, "a good man and a just," was one of that Council, and "he was not a consenting party to the counsel and deed of them," for that is the strict sense of the words of Luke 23:50, 51. Probably he absented himself, and Nicodemus also, from this meeting of the Council, the temper of which they would know too well to expect their voice to be listened to; and in that case, the words of our Evangelist are to be taken strictly, that, without one dissentient voice, "all [present] condemned him to be guilty of death."

The Blessed One Is Now Shamefully Entreated (vs. 65). Every word here must be carefully observed, and the several accounts put together, that we may lose none of the awful indignities about to be described. 65. some began to spit on him—or, as in Matthew 26:67, "to spit in [into] His face." Luke (22:63) says in addition, "And the men that held Jesus mocked him"—or cast their jeers at Him. to cover his face—or "to blindfold him" (as in Luke 22:64). to buffet him—Luke's word, which is rendered "smote Him" (22:63), is a stronger one, conveying an idea for which we have an exact equivalent in English, but one too colloquial to be inserted here—began to say unto him, Prophesy—In Matthew 26:68 this is given more fully: "Prophesy unto us, thou Christ, Who is he that smote Thee?" The sarcastic fling at Him as "the Christ," and the demand of Him in this character to name the unseen perpetrator of the blows inflicted on Him, was in them as infamous as to Him it must have been, and was intended to be, stinging. and the servants did strike him with the palms of their hands—or "struck Him on the face" (Luke 22:64). Ah! Well did He say prophetically, in that Messianic prediction which we have often referred to, "I gave My back to the smiters, and My cheeks to them that plucked off the hair: I hid not My face from shame and spitting!" (Isa. 50:6). "And many other things blasphemously spake they against Him" (Luke 22:65). This general statement is important, as showing that virulent and varied as were the recorded affronts put upon Him, they are but a small specimen of what He endured on that dark occasion.

Peter's FIRST DENIAL of His Lord (vss. 66-68). 66. And as Peter was beneath in the palace—This little word "beneath"—one of our Evangelist's graphic touches—is most important for the right understanding of what we may call the topography of the scene. We must take it in connection with Matthew's word (26:69): "Now Peter sat without in the palace"—or quadrangular court, in the center of which the fire would be burning; and crowding around and buzzing about it would be the menials

TODAY'S DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE:

Blasphemy. In the sense of speaking evil of God, this word is found in Ps. 74:18; Isa. 52:5; Rom. 2:24; Rev. 13:1, 6; 16:9, 11, 21. It denotes also any kind of calumny, or evil-speaking, or abuse (1 Kings 21:10; Acts 13:45; 18:6, etc.). Our Lord was accused of blasphemy when he claimed to be the Son of God (Matt. 26:65; comp. Matt. 9:3; Mark 2:7). They who deny his messiahship blaspheme Jesus (Luke 22:65; John 10:36).

The high priest rent his clothes. This rending of the high priest's garments was expressly contrary to the law, Lev. x. 6 and xxi. 10. But it was a common method of expressing violent grief, Gen. xxxvii. 29, 34; Job i. 20, and horror at what was deemed blasphemous or impious, 2 Kings xviii. 37; xix. 1; Acts xiv. 14. All that heard a blasphemous speech were obliged to rend their clothes, and never to sew them up again.

He is guilty of death. "He is liable to death." All the forms of justice are here violated. The judge becomes a party and accuser, and proceeds to the verdict without examining whether all the prophecies concerning the Messiah and the innumerable miracles which He wrought did not justify Him.

Then did they spit in his face. This was done as a mark of the most profound contempt. See Job xvi. 10 and xxx. 10; Isa. l. 6; Mic. v. 1. The judges now delivered Him into the hands of the mob. And buffeted him. Smote Him with their fists. "Beat with the hand, the fingers being clenched." Smote him with the palms of their hands. "Smite the cheek with the open hand."

Prophesy unto us, thou Christ. Their conduct toward Him now was expressly prophesied of, by a man whose divine mission they did not pretend to deny; see Isa. l. 6. It appears that, before they buffeted Him, they bound up His eyes; see Mark xiv. 65.

MATTHEW HENRY

2. It was occasioned by his associating with the high priest's servants. They that think it dangerous to be in company with Christ's disciples, because thence they may be drawn in to suffer for him, will find it much more dangerous to be in company with his enemies, because there they may be drawn into sin against him.

3. The temptation was, his being charged as a disciple of Christ; Thou also wert with Jesus of Nazareth, v. 67.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

Let us try to put the doings of these two places side by side. Probably the court where Jesus stood in the midst of the priests and elders was somewhat elevated, by a few steps perhaps, from "the court beneath," as Mark says, where the officers and the maid-servants were, and Peter also. In the first false witness after false witness arose; the high priest put Jesus on oath; Jesus took the oath that the confession that Peter made several months ago was true. In the second, there was the clamor of the gossip of the officers, the saucy laugh of a servant maid, as she said to Peter, "You belong to them." The great soul of Peter stumbled and fell at the laugh of that serving-maid, and presently he took an oath that he did not know Jesus; Jesus on oath, within; Peter on oath, without. Peter outside, taking his oath that he did not know Him; Jesus inside, taking His oath that what Peter had said in the better hour of his life was true. The contrast is vivid.
—The Gospel According to Mark

This is one of them (v. 69), for thou art a Galilean, one may know that by thy speaking broad, v. 70. It doth not appear that he was challenged upon it, but only bantered upon it, and in danger of being ridiculed as a fool for it. Sometimes the cause of Christ seems to fall so much on the losing side, that everybody has a stone to throw at it. Yet, all things considered, the temptation could not be called formidable; it was only a maid that casually cast her eye upon him, and said, Thou art one of them, to which he needed not to have made any reply.

and others who had been admitted within the court. At the upper end of this court, probably, would be the memorable chamber in which the trial was held —open to the court, likely, and not far from the fire (as we gather from Luke 22:61), but on a higher level; for (as our verse says) the court, with Peter in it, was "beneath" it. The ascent to the Council chamber was perhaps by a short flight of steps. If the reader will bear this explanation in mind, he will find the intensely interesting details which follow more intelligible. there cometh one of the maids of the high priest—"the damsel that kept the door" (John 18:17). The Jews seem to have employed women as porters of their doors (Acts 12:13). 67. And when she saw Peter warming himself, she looked upon him—Luke (22:56) is here more graphic; "But a certain maid beheld him as he sat by the fire"—lit., 'by the light,' which, shining full upon him, revealed him to the girl—"and earnestly looked upon him"—or, 'fixed her gaze upon him.' His demeanor and timidity, which must have attracted notice, as so generally happens, leading," says OLSHAUSEN, "to the recognition of him." and said, And thou also wast with Jesus of Nazareth—"with Jesus the Nazarene," or, "with Jesus of Galilee" (Matthew 26:69). The sense of this is given in John's report of it (18:17), "Art not thou also one of this man's disciples?" i.e., thou as well as "that other disciple," whom she knew to be one, but did not challenge, perceiving that he was a privileged person. In Luke (22:56) it is given as a remark made by the maid to one of the bystanders—this man was also with Him." If so expressed in Peter's hearing—drawing upon him the eyes of every one that heard it (as we know it did, Matt. 26:70), and compelling him to answer to it—that would explain the different forms of the report naturally enough. But in such a case this is of no real importance. 68. But he denied—"before all" (Matt. 26:70). saying, I know not, neither understand I what thou sayest—in Luke, "I know Him not." And he went out into the porch—the vestibule leading to the street—no doubt finding the fire-place too hot for him; possibly also with the hope of escaping—but that was not to be, and perhaps he dreaded that, too. Doubtless by this time his mind would be getting into a sea of commotion, and would fluctuate every moment in its resolves. AND THE COCK CREW. See on Luke 22:34. This, then, was the First Denial.

Peter's SECOND DENIAL of His Lord (vss. 69, 70). There is here a verbal difference among the Evangelists, which without some information which has been withheld, cannot be quite extricated. 69. And a maid saw him again—or, "a girl." It might be rendered "the girl"; but this would not necessarily mean the same one as before, but might, and probably does, mean just the female who had charge of the door or gate near which Peter now was. Accordingly, in Matthew 26:71, she is expressly called "another [maid]." But in Luke it is a male servant: "And after a little while (from the time of the first denial) another"—i.e., as the word signifies, "another male" servant. But there is no real difficulty, as the challenge, probably, after being made by one was reiterated by another. Accordingly, in John, it is, "They said therefore unto him . . .," as if more than one challenged him at once. and began to say to them that stood by, This is one of them—or, as in Matthew 26:71—"This [fellow] was also with Jesus the Nazarene." 70. And he denied it again—In Luke, "Man, I am not." But worst of all in Matthew—"And again he denied with an oath, I do not know the man" (26:72). This was the Second Denial, more vehement, alas! than the first.

Peter's THIRD DENIAL of His Lord. (vss. 70-72). 70. And a little after—"about the space of one hour after" (Luke 22:59). they that stood by said again to Peter, Surely thou art one of them: for thou art a Galilean, and thy speech agreeth thereto—"bewrayeth (or "discovereth") thee" (Matt. 26:73). In Luke it is, "Another confidently affirmed, saying, Of a truth this [fellow] also was with him: for he is a Galilean." The Galilean dialect had a more Syrian cast than that of Judea. If Peter had held his peace, this peculiarity had not been observed; but hoping, probably, to put them off the scent by joining in the fireside talk, he was thus discovered. The Fourth Gospel is particularly interesting here: "One of the servants of the high priest, being his kinsman (or kinsman to him) whose ear Peter cut off, saith, Did not I see thee in the garden with Him?" (John 18:26.) No doubt his relationship to Malchus drew his attention to the man who had smitten him, and this enabled him to identify Peter. "Sad reprisals!" exclaims BENGEL. Poor Peter!

ADAM CLARKE

A damsel came unto him. "A maidservant." Thou also wast with Jesus. What a noble opportunity had Peter now to show his zeal for the insulted cause of truth and his attachment to his Master!

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

Peter was lying about his faith. He did know Him; more, he wonderfully understood Him. He was also violating his own love. Here was an instance of the contradiction of sinners against themselves. He was wounding his own soul. This must be borne in mind. Peter's love for Jesus never failed; his faith in Jesus never failed. Christ had said to him, "I have prayed for thee that thy faith fail not," and his faith never failed. His hope failed, the light of hope went out; his courage failed; but never his faith, nor his love. Here, then, was a man who believed in Jesus, who loved Him with a great heart, or he never would have followed Him to that court; denying his faith, and the denial was a lie; denying his love, and the denial was a lie. His own intelligence was insulted; the truth that was in him, and never really destroyed, was flung in the mire.—The Gospel According to Mark

And again he denied with an oath. He has told a lie, and he swears to support it. A liar has always some suspicion that his testimony is not credited, for he is conscious of his own falsity, and is therefore naturally led to support his assertions by oaths.

Thy speech. "Your manner of speech," "that dialect of yours"—his accent being different from that of Jerusalem. Bewrayeth thee. "Makes you manifest."

MATTHEW HENRY

4. The sin was very great; he denied Christ before men, at a time when he ought to have confessed and owned him. Christ had often given notice to his disciples of his own sufferings; yet, when they came, they were to Peter as great a surprise and terror as if he had never heard of them before. When Christ was admired and flocked after, he could readily own him; but now that he is deserted, and despised, and run down, he is ashamed of him, and will own no relation to him.

5. His repentance was very speedy. He repeated his denial thrice, and the third was worst of all, for then he cursed and swore, to confirm his denial.

Then the cock crew the second time, which put him in mind of his Master's words, the warning he had given him, with that particular circumstance of the cock crowing twice; and when he thought thereon, he wept. Some observe that this evangelist, who wrote, as some have thought, by St. Peter's direction, speaks as fully of Peter's sin as any of them, but more briefly of his sorrow, which Peter, in modesty, would not have to be magnified, and because he thought he could never sorrow enough for so great a sin. Fixing his mind upon it, he wept. It is not a transient thought of that which is humbling, that will suffice, but we must dwell upon it.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

Thou art caught in thine own toils; but like a wild bull in a net, thou wilt toss and rage, filling up the measure of thy terrible declension by one more denial of thy Lord, and that the foulest of all. 71. But he began to curse—'anathematize,' or wish himself accursed if what he was now to say was not true. and to swear—or to take a solemn oath. saying, I know not this man of whom ye speak. 72. And the second time the cock crew. The other three Evangelists, who mention but one crowing of the cock—and that not the first, but the second and last one of Mark—all say the cock crew "immediately," but Luke says, "Immediately, while he yet spake, the cock crew" (22:60). Alas!—But now comes the wonderful sequel.

The Redeemer's Look upon Peter, and Peter's Bitter Tears (vs. 72; Luke 22:61, 62). It has been observed that while the beloved disciple is the only one of the four Evangelists who does not record the repentance of Peter, he is the only one of the four who records the affecting and most beautiful scene of his complete restoration (John 21:15-17). Luke 22:61: "And the Lord turned and looked upon Peter." How? it will be asked. We answer, From the chamber in which the trial was going on, in the direction of the court where Peter then stood—in the way already explained. See on vs. 66. Our Second Evangelist makes no mention of this look, but dwells on the warning of his Lord about the double crowing of the cock, which would announce his triple fall, as what rushed stingingly to his recollection and made him dissolve in tears. And Peter called to mind the word that Jesus said unto him, Before the cock crow twice, thou shalt deny me thrice. And when he thought thereon, he wept—To the same effect is the statement of the First Evangelist (Matt. 26:75), save that like "the beloved physician," he notices the "bitterness" of the weeping. The most precious link, however, in the whole chain of circumstances in this scene is beyond doubt that "look" of deepest, tenderest import reported by Luke alone. Who can tell what lightning flashes of wounded love and piercing reproach shot from that "look" through the eye of Peter into his heart! "And Peter remembered the word of the Lord, how He had said unto him, Before the cock crow, thou shalt deny Me thrice. And Peter went out and wept bitterly." How different from the sequel of Judas' act! Doubtless the hearts of the two men towards the Saviour were perfectly different from the first; and the treason of Judas was but the consummation of the wretched man's resistance of the blaze of light in the midst of which he had lived for three years, while Peter's denial was but a momentary obscuration of the heavenly light and love to his Master which ruled his life. But the immediate cause of the blessed revulsion which made Peter "weep bitterly" was, beyond all doubt, this heart-piercing "look" which his Lord gave him. And remembering the Saviour's own words at the table, "Simon, Simon, Satan hath desired to have you, that he may sift you as wheat; but I prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not," may we not say that this prayer fetched down all that there was in that "look" to pierce and break the heart of Peter, to keep it from despair, to work in it "repentance unto salvation not to be repented of," and at length, under other healing touches, to "restore his soul?" (See on Mark 16:7.)

ADAM CLARKE

Then began he to curse and to swear. Rather, "Then he began positively to affirm." The cock crew. This animal becomes, in the hand of God, the instrument of awaking the fallen apostle at last to a sense of his fall, danger, and duty.

Peter remembered the word of Jesus. Luke says, chap. xxii. 61, "The Lord turned, and looked upon Peter." And wept bitterly. Felt bitter anguish of soul, which evidenced itself by the tears of contrition which flowed plentifully from his eyes. "Let him that standeth take heed lest he fall." Where the mighty have been slain, what shall support the feeble? Only the grace of the almighty God. This transaction is recorded by the inspired penmen: (1) That all may watch unto prayer, and shun the occasions of sin. (2) That if a man be unhappily overtaken in a fault, he may not despair, but cast himself immediately with a contrite heart on the infinite tenderness and compassion of God.

I. A consultation held by the great Sanhedrim for the effectual prosecution of our Lord Jesus. They met early in the morning about it; they lost no time, but followed their blow in good earnest. The unwearied industry of wicked people in doing that which is evil, should shame us for our backwardness and slothfulness in that which is good.

II. The delivering of him up a prisoner to Pilate; they bound him. Christ was bound, to make bonds easy to us, and enable us, as Paul and Silas, to sing in bonds. It is good for us often to remember the bonds of the Lord Jesus, as bound with him who was bound for us. They led him through the streets of Jerusalem, to expose him to contempt, and we may well imagine how miserably he looked after such a night's usage as he had had. They voluntarily betrayed him that was Israel's crown, to them that were Israel's yoke.

III. The examining of him by Pilate upon interrogatories (v. 2); "Art thou the king of the Jews?" "Yea," saith Christ, "it is as thou sayest, I am that Messiah."

IV. The articles of impeachment exhibited against him, and his silence under the charge and accusation.

CHAPTER 15

Vss. 1-20. JESUS IS BROUGHT BEFORE PILATE—AT A SECOND HEARING, PILATE, AFTER SEEKING TO RELEASE HIM, DELIVERS HIM UP—AFTER BEING CRUELLY ENTREATED, HE IS LED AWAY TO BE CRUCIFIED. (=Matt.26:1, 2, 11-31; Luke 23:1-6, 13-25; John 18:28-19:16.) See on John 18:28-19; 16.

Then led they Jesus from Caiaphas to the hall of judgment—but not till "in the morning the chief priests held a consultation with the elders and scribes and the whole council against Him to put Him to death, and bound Him" (Matt. 27:1; and see on Mark 15:1). The word here rendered "hall of judgment" is from the Latin, and denotes 'the palace of the governor of a Roman province.'

Pilate . . . called Jesus, and said . . . , Art thou the King of the Jews?—In Luke 23:2 they charge our Lord before Pilate with "perverting the nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar, saying that He Himself is Christ a king." Perhaps this was what occasioned Pilate's question.

1. In the morning. See Matt. xxvii. 1, etc.

When the morning was come. As soon as it was light. Took counsel against Jesus. They had begun this counsel the preceding evening; see chap. xxvi. 59. But as it was contrary to all forms of law to proceed against a person's life by night, they seem to have separated for a few hours, and then, at the break of day, came together again, pretending to conduct the business according to the forms of law.

MATTHEW HENRY

The chief priests turned informers, and did in person accuse Christ of many things (v. 3), and witness against him, v. 4. Wicked priests are generally the worst of men. The better anything is, the worse it is when it is corrupted. These priests were very eager and noisy in their accusation; but Christ answered nothing, v. 3. While Pilate urged him to clear himself, and was desirous he should (v. 4), yet still he stood mute (v. 5), he answered nothing, which Pilate thought very strange. He gave Pilate a direct answer (v. 2), but would not answer the prosecutors and witnesses, because the things they alleged, were notoriously false, and he knew Pilate himself was convinced they were so. As Christ spoke to admiration, so he kept silence to admiration.

V. The proposal Pilate made to the people, to have Jesus released to them, since it was the custom of the feast to grace the solemnity with the release of one prisoner. The people expected and demanded that he should do as he had ever done to them (v. 8). Now Pilate perceived that the chief priests delivered up Jesus for envy, v. 10. It was easy to see that it was not his guilt, but his goodness, that they were provoked at. He thought that he might safely appeal from the priests to the people. Let them demand him to be released, and Pilate will readily do it. There was indeed another prisoner, one Barabbas, that had an interest, and would have some votes; but he questioned not but Jesus would out-poll him.

VI. The unanimous outrageous clamours of the people to have Christ put to death, and particularly to have him crucified. It was a great surprise to Pilate, when he found that they all agreed to desire that Barabbas might be released, v. 11. Pilate opposed it all he could; "What will ye that I shall do to him whom ye call the King of the Jews?" v. 12. They say, Crucify him. When Pilate objected, Why, what evil has he done? they did not pretend to answer it, but cried out the more exceedingly, Crucify him, crucify him. Now the priests promised themselves that it would influence Pilate two ways to condemn him. 1. It might incline him to believe Christ guilty, when there was so general an out-cry against him. "Surely," might Pilate think, "he must needs be a bad man, whom all the world is weary of." It has been the common artifice of Satan, to put Christ and his religion into an ill name, and so to run them down. But let us judge of persons and things by their merits, and not prejudge by common fame and the cry of the country. 2. It might induce him to condemn Christ, to please the people, and indeed for fear of displeasing them. Though he was not so weak as to be governed by their opinion, to believe him guilty, yet he was so wicked as to be swayed by their outrage, to condemn him, though he believed him innocent. Our Lord Jesus dying as a sacrifice for the sins of many, he fell a sacrifice to the rage of many.

I. Pilate, to gratify the Jews' malice, delivers Christ to be crucified, v. 15. Willing to content the people, he released Barabbas unto them, and delivered Jesus to be crucified. Though he had scourged him before, hoping that would content them, and then not designing to crucify him, yet he went on to that. He who could persuade himself to chastise one that was innocent (Luke xxiii. 16), could by degrees persuade himself to crucify him.

Christ was crucified, for that was, 1. A bloody death, and without blood no remission, Heb. ix. 22. Christ was to lay down his life for us, and therefore shed his blood. 2. It was a painful death. Christ died, so as that he might feel himself die. Christ would meet death in its greatest terror, and so conquer it. 3. It was a shameful death, the death of slaves, and the vilest malefactors. The cross and the shame are put together. Christ makes satisfaction by submitting to the greatest reproach and ignominy. Yet this was not the worst. 4. It was a cursed death; thus it was branded by the Jewish law (Deut. xxi. 23). Now that Christ has submitted to be hanged upon a tree, the reproach and curse of that kind of death are quite rolled away.

II. Pilate, to gratify the gay humour of the Roman soldiers, delivered him to them, to be abused and spitefully treated. They called together the whole regiment that was then in waiting, and they went into an inner hall, where they ignominiously abused our Lord Jesus, as a king. 1. Do kings wear robes of purple or scarlet? They clothed him with purple. 2. Do kings wear crowns? They platted a crown of thorns, and put it on his head. A crown of straw, or rushes, would have been banter enough; but this was pain also. He wore the crown of thorns which we had deserved, that we might wear the crown of glory which he merited. 3. Are kings attended with the acclamations of their subjects, O king, live for ever?

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

"And the chief priests accused Him of many things, but He answered nothing (Mark 15.3). Then said Pilate unto Him, Hearest Thou not how many things they witness against Thee? And He answered him to never a word, insomuch that the governor marvelled greatly" (Matt. 27:13, 14). See on Mark 15:3-5. In his perplexity, Pilate, hearing of Galilee, bethinks himself of the expedient of sending Him to Herod, in the hope of thereby further shaking off responsibility in the case. See on Mark 15:6, and on Luke 23:6-12. The return of the prisoner only deepened the perplexity of Pilate, who, "calling together the chief priests, rulers, and people," tells them plainly that not one of their charges against "this man" had been made good, while even Herod, to whose jurisdiction he more naturally belonged, had done nothing to Him: He "will therefore chastise and release him" (Luke 23:13-16). But ye have a custom that I should release one unto you at the passover . . .—See on Mark 15:7-11. "On the typical import of the choice of Christ to suffer, by which Barabbas was set free, see Leviticus 16, particularly vss. 5-10, where the subject is the sin offering on the great day of atonement" [KRAFFT in LUTHARDT].

they cried out—their fiendish rage kindling afresh at the sight of Him—Crucify him, crucify him—

Pilate took Jesus and scourged him—in hope of appeasing them. (See on Mark 15:15.) "And the soldiers led Him away into the palace, and they call the whole band" (Mark 15:16)—the body of the military cohort stationed there—to take part in the mock coronation now to be enacted.

the soldiers platted a crown of thorns, and put it on his head—in mockery of a regal crown. and they put on him a purple robe—in mockery of the imperial purple; first "stripping him" (Matt. 27:28) of His own outer garment. The robe may have been the "gorgeous" one in which Herod arrayed and sent Him back to Pilate (Luke 23:11). "And they put a reed into His right hand" (Matt. 27:29)—in mockery of the regal scepter. "And they bowed the knee before Him" (Matt. 27:29).

ADAM CLARKE

He answered nothing. An answer to such accusations was not necessary; they sufficiently confuted themselves.

Marvelled greatly. Silence under calumny manifests the utmost magnanimity. The chief priests did not admire this because it confounded them; but Pilate, who had no interest to serve by it, was deeply affected. This very silence was predicted, Isa. liii. 7.

The governor was wont to release. Whence this custom originated among the Jews is not known; probably it was introduced by the Romans themselves, or by Pilate, merely to oblige the Jews, by showing them this public token of respect.

8. The multitude crying aloud. The word itself strongly marks the vociferations or, to come nearer the original word, the bellowing of the multitude. It signifies, properly, a loud and long cry, such as Christ emitted on the Cross. See the whole history of these proceedings against our Lord treated at large on Matthew xxvii.

A notable prisoner called Barabbas. This person had, a short time before, raised an insurrection in Jerusalem, in which it appears, from Mark xv. 7, some lives were lost. In some MSS. this man has the surname of Jesus.

For envy. "Through malice." Then it was his business, as an upright judge, to disperse this mob, and immediately release Jesus. Seeing malice is capable of putting even Christ himself to death, how careful should we be not to let the least spark of it harbor in our breasts! Let it be remembered that malice as often originates from envy as it does from anger.

What shall I do then with Jesus? Showing, hereby, that it was his wish to release Him.

Scourged Jesus. This is allowed to have been a very severe punishment of itself among the Romans, the flesh being generally cut by the whips used for this purpose. It has been thought that Pilate might have spared this additional cruelty of whipping, but it appears that it was a common custom to scourge those criminals which were to be crucified (see Josephus De Bello, lib. ii, c. 25), and lenity in Christ's case is not to be allowed; He must take all the misery in full tale. Delivered him to be crucified. Tacitus, the Roman historian, mentions the death of Christ in very remarkable terms: "Nero put those who commonly went by the name of Christians to the most exquisite tortures. The author of this name was Christ, who was capitally punished in the reign of Tiberius, by Pontius Pilate the Procurator."

17. And platted a crown of thorns. In the note on Matt. xxvii. 29, I have ventured to express a doubt whether our Lord was crowned with thorns, in our sense of the word, this crown being designed as an instrument of torture. I am still of the same opinion, having considered the subject more closely since writing that note.

MATTHEW HENRY

That also is mimicked; they saluted him with "Hail, King of the Jews." 4. Kings have sceptres put into their hand, marks of dominion; to imitate this, they put a reed in his right hand. Those who despise the authority of the Lord Jesus do, in effect, put a reed in his hand; nay, and, as these here, smite him on the head with it. 5. Subjects, when they swear allegiance, were wont to kiss their sovereign; but, instead of that, spit upon him. 6. Kings used to be addressed upon the knee; and this also they brought into the jest, they bowed the knee, and worshipped him; this they did in scorn, to make themselves and one another laugh. He was thus mocked, not in his own clothes, but in another's, to signify that he suffered not for his own sin; the crime was ours, the shame his. Those that bow the knee to Christ, but do not bow the soul, put the same affront upon him that these here did.

III. The soldiers, at the hour appointed, led him away from Pilate's judgment-hall to the place of execution (v. 20). They compelled one Simon of Cyrene to carry his cross for him. He passed by, coming out of the country, not thinking of any such matter. We must not think it strange, if crosses come upon us suddenly, and we be surprised by them. The cross was a very troublesome unwieldly load: but he that carried it a few minutes, had the honour to have his name upon record in the book of God. Wherever this gospel is preached, there shall this be told for a memorial of him.

Verses 22–32

We have here the crucifixion of our Lord Jesus.

I. The place where he was crucified; it was called Golgotha—the place of a skull: it was the common place of execution, for he was in all respects numbered with the transgressors.

II. The time when he was crucified; it was the third hour, v. 25. At the third hour, according to the Jews' way of reckoning, that is, about nine of the clock in the morning, or soon after, they nailed him to the cross.

III. The indignities that were done him, when he was nailed to the cross.

1. It being the custom to give wine to persons that were to be put to death, they mingled his with myrrh, which was bitter; he tasted it, but would not drink it; was willing to admit the bitterness of it, but not the benefit of it.

2. The garments of those that were crucified, being, as with us, the executioners' fee, the soldiers cast lots upon his garments (v. 24), so making themselves merry with his misery.

3. They set a superscription over his head, The king of the Jews, v. 26. Here was no crime alleged, but his sovereignty owned. Perhaps Pilate meant to cast disgrace upon Christ as a baffled king, or upon the Jews, as a people that deserved no better a king: however, God intended it to be the proclaiming even of Christ upon the cross, the king of Israel; though Pilate knew not what he wrote, any more than Caiaphas what he said, John xi. 51. Whenever we look unto Christ crucified, we must remember the inscription over his head, that he is a king.

4. They crucified two thieves with him, one on his right hand, the other on his left, and him in the midst as the worst of the three (v. 27). While he lived he has associated with sinners, to do them good; and now when he died, he was for the same purpose joined with them, for he came into the world, and went out of it, to save sinners. But this evangelist takes particular notice of the fulfilling of the scriptures in it, v. 28. In that famous prediction of Christ's sufferings (Isa. liii. 12), it was foretold that he should be numbered with the transgressors.

5. The spectators instead of condoling with him in his misery, added to it by insulting over him.

(1) Even they that passed by railed on him, v. 29. They taunted him, and expressed themselves with the utmost detestation of him, and indignation at him. The chief priests, no doubt, put these sarcasms into their mouths, Thou that destroyest the temple, and buildest it in three days, now, if thou canst, save thyself, and come down from the cross.

(2) Even the chief priests, who, being taken from among men and ordained for men, should be tender of those that are suffering and dying (Heb. v. 1, 2), yet they mocked him, they said, He saved others, himself he cannot save. They challenged him to come down from the cross, if he could, v. 22. Let them but see that, and they would believe.

(3) Even they that were crucified with him, reviled him (v. 32).

Verses 33–41

Here we have an account of Christ's dying.

I. There was a thick darkness over the whole land for three hours. The Jews had often demanded of Christ a sign from heaven; and now they had one,

And said, Hail, King of the Jews!—doing Him derisive homage, in the form used on approaching the emperors. "And they spit upon Him, and took the reed and smote Him on the head" (Matt. 27:30). The best comment on these affecting details is to cover the face.

21-37. CRUCIFIXION AND DEATH OF THE LORD JESUS. (=Matt. 27:32-50; Luke 23:26-46; John 19:17-30.) See on John 19:17-30.

And he bearing his cross—(See on Luke 23:26). went forth—Cf. Hebrews 13:11-13, "without the camp"; "without the gate." On arriving at the place, "they gave Him vinegar to drink mingled with gall [wine mingled with myrrh, Mark 15:23], and when He had tasted thereof, He would not drink" (Matt. 27:34). This potion was stupefying, and given to criminals just before execution, to deaden the sense of pain.

they crucified him, and two others with him—"malefactors" (Luke 23:33), "thieves" (rather "robbers," Matt. 27:38; Mark 15:27). on either side one and Jesus in the midst—a hellish expedient, to hold Him up as the worst of the three. But in this, as in many other of their doings, "the scripture was fulfilled, which saith (Isa. 53:12), And he was numbered with the transgressors"—(Mark 15:28)—though the prediction reaches deeper. "Then said Jesus"—['probably while being nailed to the CROSS'] [OLSHAUSEN], "FATHER, FORGIVE THEM, FOR THEY KNOW NOT WHAT THEY DO" (Luke 23:34)—and again the Scripture was fulfilled which said, "And He made intercession for the transgressors" (Isa. 53:12), though this also reaches deeper. (See Acts 3:17; 13:27; and cf. I Tim. 1:13).

"And they that passed by reviled Him, wagging their heads" in ridicule (Ps. 22:7; 109:25; cf. Jer. 18:16; Lam. 2:15). "Ah!"—'Ha,' an exclamation here of derision. "Thou that destroyest the temple, and buildest it in three days, save Thyself and come down from the cross" (Matt. 27:39, 40; Mark 15:29, 30). "It is evident that our Lord's saying, or rather this perversion of it (for He claimed not to destroy, but to rebuild the temple destroyed by them) had greatly exasperated the feeling which the priests and Pharisees had contrived to excite against Him. It is referred to as the principal fact brought out in evidence against Him on the trial (cf. Acts 6:13, 14), as an offense for which He deserved to suffer. And it is very remarkable that now while it was receiving its real fulfilment, it should be made more public and more impressive by the insulting proclamation of His enemies. Hence the importance attached to it after the resurrection, ch. 2:22" [WEBSTER and WILKINSON].

"Now from the sixth hour (12, noon) there was darkness over all the land unto the ninth hour" (Matt. 27:45). No ordinary eclipse of the sun could have occurred at this time, it being then full moon, and

21. A Cyrenian. One of Cyrene, a celebrated city in Libya. The father of Alexander and Rufus. It appears that these two persons were well-known among the first disciples of our Lord. It is not unlikely that this is the same Alexander who is mentioned, Acts xix. 33, and that the other is the Rufus spoken of by Paul, Rom. xvi. 13.

A place called Golgotha. From the Hebrew golgoleth, "a skull," probably so called from the many skulls of those who had suffered crucifiction and other capital punishments scattered up and down in the place. It is the same as Calvary, Calvaria, i.e., calvi capitis area, the place of bare skulls. Some think the place was thus called because it was in the form of a human skull. It is likely that it was the place of public execution.

25. The third hour. It has been before observed that the Jews divided their night into four watches, of three hours each. They also divided the day into four general parts. The first began at sunrise; the second, three hours after; the third, at midday; the fourth, three hours after, and continued till sunset. Christ having been nailed to the Cross a little after midday, John xix. 14-17, and having expired about three o'clock, Mark xv. 33, the whole business of the Crucifixion was finished within the space of this third division of the day, which Mark calls here the third hour. Commentators and critics have found it very difficult to reconcile this third hour of Mark, with the sixth hour of John, chap. xix. 14. It is supposed that the true reading, in John xix. 14, should be the third instead of the sixth.

They gave him vinegar to drink mingled with gall. Perhaps gall signifies no more than bitters of any kind. It was a common custom to administer a stupefying potion compounded of sour wine, which is the same as vinegar, frankincense, and myrrh to condemned persons to help to alleviate their sufferings or so disturb their intellect that they might not be sensible of them. Some person, out of kindness, appears to have administered this to our blessed Lord; but He, as in all other cases, determining to endure the fullness of pain, refused to take what was thus offered to Him, choosing to tread the winepress alone.

28. The scripture was fulfilled. All this verse is wanting in many MSS., some versions, and several of the fathers.

Wagging their heads. In token of contempt.

Thou that destroyest. Who pretended that you could have destroyed the Temple, and built it up again in three days. Cruelty is obliged to take refuge in lies in order to vindicate its infamous proceedings. If thou be the Son of God. Or rather, "a son of God," i.e., a peculiar favorite of the Most High.

He saved others; himself he cannot save. Or, "Cannot He save himself?"

but such a one as signified the blinding of their eyes. It was a sign of the darkness that was come, and coming, upon the nation. This intimated to them, that the things which belonged to their peace, were now hid from their eyes. It was the power of darkness that they were now under, the works of darkness that they were now doing.

II. Toward the close of this darkness, our Lord Jesus, in the agony of his soul, cried out, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? v. 34. The darkness signified the present cloud which the human soul of Christ was under, when he was making it an offering for sin. Our Lord Jesus was denied the light of the sun, when he was in his sufferings, to signify the withdrawing of the light of God's countenance. And this he complained of more than anything; he did not complain of his disciples' forsaking him, but of his Father's. 1. Because this wounded his spirit; and that is a thing hard to bear. 2. Because in this especially he was made sin for us. These symptoms of divine wrath were like that fire from heaven which had been sent sometimes, to consume the sacrifices; and it was always a token of God's acceptance. The fire that should have fallen upon the sinner, if God had not been pacified, fell upon the sacrifice, as a token that he was so; therefore it now fell upon Christ. When Paul was to be offered as a sacrifice for the service of saints, he could joy and rejoice (Phil. ii. 17); but it is another thing to be offered as a sacrifice for the sin of sinners.

III. Christ's prayer was bantered by them that stood by (v. 35, 36); because he cried, Eli, Eli, or (as Mark has it, according to the Syriac dialect) Eloi, Eloi, they said, He calls for Elias, though they knew very well what he said, and what it signified, My God, My God. One of them filled a sponge with vinegar, and reached it up to him upon a reed, v. 36. This was intended for a further affront and abuse to him; and whoever it was that checked him who did it, did but add to the reproach; "Let him alone; let us see whether Elias will come to take him down; and if not, we may conclude that he also hath abandoned him."

IV. Christ did again cry with a loud voice, and so gave up the ghost, v. 37. He was now commanding his soul into his Father's hand. Though speech fails, that we cannot cry with a loud voice, as Christ did, yet if God be the strength of the heart, that will not fail. Christ was really and truly dead, for he gave up the ghost; his human soul departed to the world of spirits, and left his body a breathless clod of clay.

V. Just at that instant that Christ died upon mount Calvary, the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom, v. 38. This bespoke a great deal, 1. Of terror to the unbelieving Jews; for it was a presage of the utter destruction of their church and nation, which followed not long after. 2. It bespeaks a great deal of comfort to all believing Christians, for it signifies the consecrating and laying open to us of a new and living way into the holiest by the blood of Jesus.

VI. The centurion who commanded the detachment which had the oversight of the execution was convinced, and confessed that this Jesus was the Son of God, v. 39. One thing that satisfied him, was, that he so cried out, and gave up the ghost. He said, to the honour of Christ, and the shame of those that abused him, Truly this man was the Son of God. But what reason had he to say so? 1. He had reason to say that he suffered unjustly. He suffered for saying that he was the Son of God; so that if he suffered unjustly, then what he said was true, and he was indeed the Son of God. 2. He had reason to say that he was a favourite of heaven, seeing how Heaven did him honour at his death. "Surely," thinks he, "this must be some divine person, highly beloved of God." Our Lord Jesus, even in the depth of his sufferings and humiliation, was the Son of God, and was declared to be so with power.

VII. There were some of his friends, the good women especially, that attended him (v. 40, 41); There were women looking on afar off: the men durst not be seen at all. The women durst not come near, but stood at a distance, overwhelmed with grief. Some of these women are here named. Mary Magdalene was one; she owed all her comfort to his power and goodness, which rescued her out of the possession of seven devils, in gratitude for which she thought she could never do enough for him. Mary also was there, the mother of James the little. This Mary was the wife of Cleophas or Alpheus, sister to the virgin Mary. These women had followed Christ from Galilee, though they were not required to attend the feast, as the males were. Now to see him upon a cross, whom they thought to have seen upon a throne, could not but be a great disappointment to them. Those that follow Christ, in expectation this obscuration lasted about twelve times the length of any ordinary eclipse. (Cf. Exod. 10:21, 23). Beyond doubt, the divine intention of the portent was to invest this darkest of all tragedies with a gloom expressive of its real character.

"And about the ninth hour Jesus cried, ELI, ELI, LAMA SABACTHANI ... My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" (Matt. 27:46). As the darkness commenced at the sixth hour, the second of the Jewish hours of prayer, so it continued till the ninth hour, the hour of the evening sacrifice, increasing probably in depth, and reaching its deepest gloom at the moment of this mysterious cry, when the flame of the one great "Evening Sacrifice" was burning fiercest. The words were made to His hand. They are the opening words of a Psalm (the 22d) full of the last "sufferings of Christ and the following glories" (I Pet. 1:11). "FATHER," was the cry in the first prayer which He uttered on the cross, for matters had not then come to the worst. "Father" was the cry of His last prayer, for matters had then passed their worst. But at this crisis of His sufferings, "Father" does not issue from His lips, for the light of a Father's countenance was then mysteriously eclipsed. He falls back, however, on a title expressive of His official relation, which, though lower and more distant in itself, yet when grasped in pure and naked faith was mighty in its claims, and rich in psalmodic associations. And what deep earnestness is conveyed by the redoubling of this title! But as for the cry itself, it will never be fully comprehended. An absolute desertion is not indeed to be thought of; but a total eclipse of the felt sense of God's presence it certainly expresses. It expresses surprise, as under the experience of something not only never before known, but inexplicable on the footing which had till then subsisted between Him and God. It is a question which the lost cannot utter. They are forsaken, but they know why. Jesus is forsaken, but does not know and demands to know why. It is thus the cry of conscious innocence, but of innocence unavailing to draw down, at that moment, the least token of approval from the unseen Judge—innocence whose only recognition at that moment lay in the thick surrounding gloom which but reflected the horror of great darkness that invested His own spirit.

38-47. SIGNS AND CIRCUMSTANCES FOLLOWING THE DEATH OF THE LORD JESUS.—HE IS TAKEN DOWN FROM THE CROSS AND BURIED—THE SEPULCHRE IS GUARDED. (=Matt. 27:51-66; Luke 23:45, 47-56; John 19:31-42). See on Matthew 27:51-56; and on John 19:31-42.

Truly this was the Son of God—There cannot be a reasonable doubt that this expression was used in the Jewish sense, and that it points to the claim which Jesus made to be the Son of God, and on which His condemnation expressly turned. The meaning, then, clearly is that He must have been what He professed to be; in other words, that He was no impostor. There was no medium between those two. See, on the similar testimony of the penitent thief—"This man hath done nothing amiss"—on Luke 23:41.

many women were there beholding afar off, which followed Jesus—The sense here would be better brought out by the use of the pluperfect, "which had followed Jesus." from Galilee, ministering unto him—As these dear women had ministered to Him during His glorious missionary tours in Galilee (see on Luke 8:1-3), so from this statement it should seem that they accompanied him and ministered to His wants from Galilee on His final journey to Jerusalem. Among which was Mary Magdalene—(see on Luke 8:2). and Mary the mother of James and Joses—the wife of Cleophas, or rather Clopas, and sister of the Virgin (John 19:25). See on ch. 13:55, 56. and the mother of Zebedee's children—i.e., Salome: cf. Mark 15:40. All this about the women is mentioned for the sake of what is afterwards to be related of their purchasing spices to anoint their Lord's body.

"My God! My God! to what sort of persons hast Thou left Me?" The words thus understood are rather to be referred to the wicked Jews than to our Lord, and are an exclamation indicative of the obstinate wickedness of His crucifiers, who steeled their hearts against every operation of the Spirit and power of God. Through the whole of the Sacred Writings, God is represented as doing those things which, in the course of His providence, he only permits to be done. Therefore the words, "To whom hast Thou left or given Me up?" are only a form of expression for "How astonishing is the wickedness of those persons into whose hands I am fallen!" If this interpretation be admitted, it will free this celebrated passage from much embarrassment, and make it speak a sense consistent with itself, and with the dignity of the Son of God. The words of Mark, chap. xv. 34, agree pretty nearly with this translation of the Hebrew: "To what [sort of persons, understood] has Thou left me?" But whatever may be thought of the above mode of interpretation, one thing is certain, viz., that the words could not be used by our Lord in the sense in which they are generally understood. This is sufficiently evident, for He well knew why He was come unto that hour; nor could He be forsaken of God, in whom dwelt all the fullness of the Godhead bodily. The Deity, however, might restrain so much of its consolatory support as to leave the human nature fully sensible of all its sufferings, so that the consolations might not take off any part of the keen edge of His passion; and this was necessary to make His sufferings meritorious. And it is probable that this is all that is intended by our Lord's quotation from the twenty-second psalm. Taken in this view, the words convey an unexceptionable sense, even in the common translation.

37. Gave up the ghost. This was about three o'clock, or what was termed by the Jews the ninth hour, about the time that the paschal lamb was usually sacrificed. The darkness mentioned here must have endured about two hours and a half.

The veil of the temple was rent. That is, the veil which separated the holy place, where the priests ministered, from the holy of holies, into which the high priest only entered, and that once a year, to make a general expiation for the sins of the people. This rending of the veil was emblematical, and pointed out that the separation between Jews and Gentiles was now abolished, and that the privilege of the high priest was now communicated to all mankind. All might henceforth have access to the throne of grace, through the one great Atonement and Mediator, the Lord Jesus. See this beautifully illustrated in Heb. x. 19-22.

The centurion. The Roman officer who superintended the execution, called centurio, from centum, a hundred, because he had the command of 100 men. Truly this was the Son of God. An innocent, holy, and divine Person; and God thus shows His disapprobation of this bloody tragedy. It is not likely that this centurion had any knowledge of the expectation of the Jews relative to the Messiah, and did not use the words in this sense. "A son of God," as the Romans used the term, would signify no more than a very eminent or divine person, a hero.

Many women. To their everlasting honor, these women evidenced more courage and affectionate attachment to their Lord and Master than the disciples did, who had promised to die with Him rather than forsake Him. Beholding afar off. "At a distance."

Mary Magdalene. She probably had her name from Magdala, a village or district in Lower Galilee. See chap. xv. 39. Mary the mother of James. She was mother of him called James the lesser, or junior, who was son of Alphaeus or Cleopas; see chap. x. 3; Mark xv. 40; John xix. 25; and she was sister to the Holy Virgin.

of great things in this world by him, may probably live to see themselves sadly disappointed.

Verses 42–47

We are here attending the funeral of our Lord Jesus.

I. How the body of Christ was begged. It was at the disposal of the government. We are here told,

1. When the body of Christ was begged, and why such haste was made with the funeral; The even was come, and it was the preparation, that is, the day before the sabbath, v. 42. The Jews were more strict in the observation of the sabbath than of any other feast; and therefore, though this day was itself a feast-day, yet they observed it more religiously as the eve of the sabbath. The day before the sabbath should be a day of preparation for the sabbath. We should get ready for it a day before; nay, the whole week should be divided between the improvement of the foregoing sabbath and the preparation for the following sabbath.

2. Who it was that begged the body; it was Joseph of Arimathea, who is here called an honourable counsellor (v. 43), a person of character and distinction; he was one of the great Sanhedrim. But here is a more shining character put upon him; he was one that waited for the kingdom of God. Those who wait for the kingdom of God, and hope for an interest in the privileges of it, must show it by their forwardness to own Christ's cause. This man God raised up for this necessary service, when none of Christ's disciples could, or durst, undertake it. Joseph went in boldly to Pilate; though he knew how much it would affront the chief priests, yet he put on courage; perhaps at first he was a little afraid.

3. What a surprise it was to Pilate, to hear that he was dead, especially that he was already dead. Pilate doubted whether he was yet dead or no, fearing lest he should be imposed upon, and the body should be taken down alive. He therefore called the centurion, his own officer, and asked him whether he had been any while dead (v. 44). The centurion could assure him of this, for he had particularly observed how he gave up the ghost, v. 39. There was a special providence in it, that there might be no pretence to say that he was buried alive, and so to take away the truth of his resurrection. Thus the truth of Christ gains confirmation, sometimes, even from its enemies.

II. How the body of Christ was buried. Pilate gave Joseph leave to take down the body, and do what he pleased with it.

1. Joseph bought fine linen to wrap the body in, though in such a case old linen might have been thought sufficient.

2. He took down the body, mangled and macerated as it was, and wrapt it in the linen as a treasure of great worth.

3. He laid it in a sepulchre of his own, in a private place. This sepulchre belonged to Joseph. Abraham, when he had no other possession in the land of Canaan, yet had a burying-place, but Christ had not so much as that. This sepulchre was hewn out of a rock, for Christ died to make the grave a refuge and shelter to the saints.

4. He rolled a stone to the door of the sepulchre, for so the manner of the Jews was to bury.

5. Some of the good women attended the funeral, and beheld where he was laid, that they might come after the sabbath to anoint the dead body, because they had not time to do it now. When our great Mediator and Lawgiver was buried, special notice was taken of his sepulchre, because he was to rise again: and the care taken of his body, bespeaks the care which he himself will take concerning his body the church. Our meditations on Christ's burial should lead us to think of our own, and should help to make the grave familiar to us, and so to render that bed easy which we must shortly make in the darkness.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

the preparation—sabbath eve. that the bodies should not remain—over night, against the Mosaic law (Deut. 21:22, 23). on the sabbath day, for that sabbath day was an high—or 'great'—day—the first day of unleavened bread, and, as concurring with an ordinary sabbath, the most solemn season of the ecclesiastical year. Hence their peculiar jealousy lest the law should be infringed.

Joseph of Arimathea—"a rich man" (Matt. 27:57), thus fulfilling Isaiah 53:9; "an honorable counsellor," a member of the Sanhedrim, and of good condition, "which also waited for the kingdom of God" (Mark 15:43), a devout expectant of Messiah's kingdom; "a good man and a just, the same had not consented to the counsel and deed of them" (Luke 23:50, 51—he had gone the length, perhaps, of dissenting and protesting in open council against the condemnation of our Lord); "who also himself was Jesus' disciple" (Matt. 27:57). being a disciple of Jesus, but secretly, for fear of the Jews—"He went in boldly unto Pilate" (Mark 15:43)—lit., "having taken courage went in," or "had the boldness to go in." Mark alone, as his manner is, notices the boldness which this required. The act would without doubt identify him for the first time with the disciples of Christ. Marvellous it certainly is, that one who while Jesus was yet alive merely refrained from condemning Him, not having the courage to espouse His cause by one positive act, should, now that He was dead, and His cause apparently dead with Him, summon up courage to go in personally to the Roman governor and ask permission to take down and inter the body. But if this be the first instance, it is not the last, that a seemingly dead Christ has wakened a sympathy which a living one had failed to evoke. The heroism of faith is usually kindled by desperate circumstances, and is not seldom displayed by those who before were the most timid, and scarce known as disciples at all. "And Pilate marvelled if he were"—rather "wondered that he was" "already dead." "And calling the centurion, he asked him whether He had been any while dead"—Pilate could hardly credit what Joseph had told him, that He had been dead "some time," and, before giving up the body to His friends, would learn how the fact stood from the centurion, whose business it was to oversee the execution. "And when he knew it of the centurion," that it was as Joseph had said, "he gave"—rather 'made a gift of'—"the body to Joseph"; struck, possibly, with the rank of the petitioner and the dignified boldness of the petition, in contrast with the spirit of the other party and the low rank to which he had been led to believe all the followers of Christ belonged. Nor would he be unwilling to show that he was not going to carry this black affair any farther.

ADAM CLARKE

42. The day before the sabbath. What we would call Friday evening. As the law of Moses had ordered that no criminal should continue hanging on a tree or gibbet till the setting of the sun, Joseph, fearing that the body of our Lord might be taken down and thrown into the common grave with the two robbers, came and earnestly entreated Pilate to deliver it to him, that he might bury it in his own new tomb.

43. Went in boldly unto Pilate. It needed no small measure of courage to declare now for Jesus, who had been a few hours ago condemned as a blasphemer by the Jews and as a seditious person by the Romans; and this was the more remarkable in Joseph because hitherto, for fear of the Jews, he had been only a secret disciple of our Lord. See John xix. 38.

Wrapped it in a clean linen cloth. The Jews, as well as the Egyptians, added spices to keep the body from putrefaction, and the linen was wrapped about every part to keep the aromatics in contact with the flesh. From John xix. 39-40 we learn that a mixture of myrrh and aloes of 100 pounds' weight had been applied to the body of Jesus when He was buried. And that a second embalmment was intended, we learn from Luke xxiii. 56 and xxiv. 1, as the hurry to get the body interred before the Sabbath did not permit them to complete the embalming in the first instance.

47. Beheld where he was laid. The courage and affection of these holy women cannot be too much admired. The strength of the Lord is perfected in weakness; for here a timid man and a few weak women acknowledge Jesus in death, when the strong and the mighty utterly forsook Him.

Verses 1–8

Never was there such a sabbath since the sabbath was first instituted as this was; during all this sabbath our Lord Jesus lay in the grave. It was to him a sabbath of rest, but a silent sabbath; it was to his disciples a melancholy sabbath, spent in tears and fears. Well, this sabbath is over, and the first day of the week is the first day of a new world.

I. The affectionate visit which the good women that had attended Christ, now made to his sepulchre. They set out from their lodgings very early in the morning, so that it was sun-rising by the time they got to the sepulchre. They had bought sweet spices too, and came not only to bedew the dead body with their tears, but to perfume it with their spices, v. 1.

Vss. 1-20. ANGELIC ANNOUNCEMENT TO THE WOMEN ON THE FIRST DAY OF THE WEEK, THAT CHRIST IS RISEN—HIS APPEARANCES AFTER HIS RESURRECTION—HIS ASCENSION—TRIUMPHANT PROCLAMATION OF HIS GOSPEL. (=Matt. 28:1-10, 16-20; Luke 24:1-51; John 20:1, 2, 11-29.)

The Resurrection Announced to the Women (vss. 1-8). 1. when the sabbath was past—that is, at sunset of our Saturday. Mary Magdalene—see on Luke 8:2. Mary the mother of James—James the Less (see on ch. 15:40). and Salome—the mother of Zebedee's sons (cf. ch. 15:40 with Matt. 27:56). had bought sweet spices, that they might come and anoint him—The word is simply "bought." But

1. And anoint him. Rather "to embalm Him." This is a proof that they had not properly understood what Christ had so frequently spoken, viz., that He would rise again the third day. And this inattention or unbelief of theirs is a proof of the truth of the Resurrection.

MATTHEW HENRY

Nicodemus had bought a very large quantity of dry spices, myrrh and aloes, John xix. 39. But these good women did not think that enough; they bought spices, some perfumed oils, to anoint him. The respect which others have showed to Christ's name, should not hinder us from showing our respect to it.

II. The care they were in about the rolling away of the stone, and the superseding of that care (v. 3, 4); They said among themselves, as they were coming along, and now drew near the sepulchre, Who shall roll us away the stone from the door of the sepulchre? For it was very great, more than they with their united strength could move. And there was another difficulty much greater than this, to be got over, which they knew nothing of, to wit, a guard of soldiers set to keep the sepulchre; who, had they come before they were frightened away, would have frightened them away. But their gracious love to Christ carried them to the sepulchre; and see how by the time they came thither, both these difficulties were removed, both the stone which they knew of, and the guard which they knew not of. They saw that the stone was rolled away. They who seek Christ diligently, will find the difficulties that lie in their way strangely to vanish, and themselves helped over them beyond their expectation.

III. The assurance that was given them by an angel, that the Lord Jesus was risen from the dead, and had left him there to tell those so who came thither to enquire after him.

1. They entered into the sepulchre, and saw that the body of Jesus was not there. He, who by his death undertook to pay our debt, in his resurrection took out our acquittance, and the matter in dispute was determined by an incontestable evidence that he was the Son of God.

2. They saw a young man sitting on the right side of the sepulchre. The angel appeared in the likeness of a man, of a young man; for angels grow not old. This angel was sitting on the right hand as they went into the sepulchre, clothed with a long white garment, a garment down to the feet. The sight of him might justly have encouraged them, but they were affrighted. Thus many times that which should be matter of comfort to us, through our own mistakes and misapprehensions proves a terror to us.

3. He silences their fears by assuring them that here was cause enough for triumph, but none for trembling (v. 6); He saith to them, Be not affrighted. Be not affrighted, for, (1) "Ye are faithful lovers of Jesus Christ, and therefore, instead of being confounded, ought to be comforted. Ye seek Jesus of Nazareth, which was crucified." He speaks of Jesus as one that was crucified; "The thing is past, that scene is over, ye must not dwell so much upon the sad circumstances of his crucifixion as to be unapt to believe the joyful news of his resurrection." He was crucified, but he is glorified. After his entrance upon his glory, he never drew any veil over his sufferings, nor was shy of having his cross spoken of. (2) "It will therefore be good news to you, to hear that, instead of anointing him dead, you may rejoice in him living. He is risen, he is not here, not dead, but alive again. And you may here see the place where they laid him. You see he is gone hence, not stolen either by his enemies or by his friends, but risen."

4. He orders them to give speedy notice of this to his disciples. Thus they were made the apostles of the apostles, which was a recompence of their affection in attending him on the cross, to the grave, and in the grave. They first came, and were first served; no other of the disciples durst come near his sepulchre. None came near him but a few women, who were not able so much as to roll away the stone.

(1) They must tell the disciples, that he is risen. It is a dismal time with them, their dear Master is dead, and all their hopes and joys are buried in his grave; so that there remains no more spirit in them, they are perfectly at their wits' end. "O, go quickly to them," saith the angel, "tell them that their Master is risen; this will keep them from sinking into despair." Christ is not ashamed to own his poor disciples; his preferment doth not make him shy of them, for he took early care to have it notified to them. Christ is not extreme to mark what they do amiss, whose hearts are upright with him.

(2) They must be sure to tell Peter. This is particularly taken notice of by this evangelist, who is supposed to have written by Peter's direction. He is particularly named: Tell Peter, for, [1] It will be good news to him, more welcome to him than to any of them; for he is in sorrow for sin. [2] He will be afraid, lest the joy of this good news do not belong to him. Had the angel said only, Go, tell his disciples, poor Peter would have been ready to sigh, and say, "But I doubt I cannot look upon myself as one of them, for I disowned him, and deserve to be disowned by him"; to obviate that, "Go to Peter our translators are perhaps right in rendering it here "had bought," since it would appear, from Luke 23:56, that they had purchased them immediately after the Crucifixion, on the Friday evening, during the short interval that remained to them before sunset, when the sabbath rest began; and that they had only deferred using them to anoint the body till the sabbath rest should be over. On this "anointing," see on John 19:40. 2. very early in the morning—see on Matthew 28:1. the first day of the week, they came unto the sepulchre at the rising of the sun—not quite literally, but "at earliest dawn"; according to a way of speaking not uncommon, and occurring sometimes in the Old Testament. Thus our Lord rose on the third day; having lain in the grave part of Friday, the whole of Saturday, and part of the following First day. 3. they said among themselves—as they were approaching the sacred spot. Who shall roll us away the stone from the door of the sepulchre? . . . for it was very great—On reaching it they find their difficulty gone—the stone already rolled away by an unseen hand. And are there no others who, when advancing to duty in the face of appalling difficulties, find their stone also rolled away? 5. entering into the sepulchre, they saw a young man—In Matthew 28:2 he is called "the angel of the Lord"; but here he is described as he appeared to the eye, in the bloom of a life that knows no decay. In Matthew he is represented as sitting on the stone outside the sepulchre; but since even there he says, "Come, see the place where the Lord lay" (28:6), he seems, as ALFORD says, to have gone in with them from without; only awaiting their arrival to accompany them into the hallowed spot, and instruct them about it. sitting on the right side—having respect to the position in which His Lord had lain there. This trait is peculiar to Mark; but cf. Luke 1:11. clothed in a long white garment—On its length, see Isaiah 6:1; and on its whiteness, see on Matthew 28:3. and they were affrighted.

6. he saith unto them, Be not affrighted—a stronger word than "Fear not" in Matthew. Ye seek Jesus of Nazareth, which was crucified—"the Nazarene, the Crucified," he is risen; he is not here—See on Luke 24:5, 6. behold the place where they laid him—See on Matthew 28:6.

7. But go your way, tell his disciples and Peter—This Second Gospel, being drawn up—as all the earliest tradition states—under the eye of Peter, or from materials chiefly furnished by him, there is something deeply affecting in the preservation of this little phrase by Mark alone. that he goeth before you into Galilee; there shall ye see him, as he said unto you—See on Matthew 28:7.

ADAM CLARKE

2. Very early in the morning. This was the time they left their own houses, and by the rising of the sun they got to the tomb. As the preceding day was the Sabbath, they could not, consistently with the observances of that day, approach the tomb.

In the end of the sabbath. "After the end of the week." In general the Jews divided their natural day, which consisted of twenty-four hours, into day and night. Their artificial day began at the rising and ended at the setting of the sun; all the rest of the time, from the setting to the rising of the sun, they termed night. Hence the same word, in Hebrew, signifies both evening and night, Gen. i. 5; Mark vi. 47. Matthew has employed the word in this extensive sense here, pointing out the latter part of the Jewish night, that which immediately preceded the rising of the sun, and not that first part which we call the evening. The transaction mentioned here evidently took place early on the morning of the third day after our Lord's crucifixion; what is called our Sunday morning, or first day of the next week. Came . . . to see the sepulchre. That is, they set out at this time in order to visit the tomb of our Lord, and also to weep there, John xi. 31, and to embalm the body of our Lord, Luke xxiv. 1. Matthew omits Mary Salome, mentioned by Mark; and Joanna, the wife of Chuza, Herod's steward, mentioned by Luke. The other Mary was the wife of Cleopas, and mother of James and Joses, mentioned before, chap. xxvii. 56. Were not Mary and Salome two distinct persons?

6. Jesus of Nazareth. The Jews had given this name to Christ by way of reproach, Matt. ii. 23; but as it was under this name that He was crucified, John xix. 19, the angel here, and the apostles after, have given Him the same name, Acts iv. 10, etc. Names which the world in derision fixes on the followers of God often become the general appellatives of religious bodies; thus Quakers, Puritans, Pietists, and Methodists have in their respective times been the nicknames given in derision by the world to those who separated themselves from its corruptions.

7. Tell his disciples and Peter. Why is not Peter included among the disciples? For this plain reason—he had forfeited his discipleship, and all right to the honor and privileges of an apostle, by denying his Lord and Master. However he is now a penitent; tell him that Jesus is risen from the dead, and is ready to heal his backsliding, and love him freely; so that, after being converted, he may strengthen his brethren.

by name, and tell him, he shall be as welcome as any of the rest to see him in Galilee." A sight of Christ will be very welcome to a true penitent, and a true penitent shall be very welcome to a sight of Christ, for there is joy in heaven concerning him.

(3) They must appoint them all, and Peter by name, to give him the meeting in Galilee, as he said unto you, Matt. xxvi. 32. All the meetings between Christ and his disciples are of his own appointing. Christ never forgets his appointment. In all meetings between Christ and his disciples, he is the most forward. He goes before you.

IV. The account which the women did bring of this to the disciples (v. 8); They went out quickly, and ran from the sepulchre, trembling and amazed. Christ had often told them, that the third day he would rise again; had they given that its due notice and credit, they would have come to the sepulchre, expecting to have found him risen, and would have received the news of it with a joyful assurance, and not with all this terror and amazement. They showed not anything of it to any man that they met by the way, for they were afraid, afraid it was too good news to be true.

We have here a very short account of two of Christ's appearances.

I. He appeared to Mary Magdalene, to her first in the garden, which we have a particular narrative of, John xx. 14. It was she out of whom he had cast seven devils; and she loved much; and this honour Christ did her, that she was the first that saw him after his resurrection. The closer we cleave to Christ, the sooner we may expect to see him, and the more to see of him.

1. She brings notice of what she had seen, to the disciples; not only to the eleven, but to the rest that followed him, as they mourned and wept, v. 10. And it was an evidence of their great love to Christ. But when their weeping had endured a night or two, comfort returned, as Christ had promised them, I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice. Better news cannot be brought to disciples in tears than to tell them of Christ's resurrection.

2. They could not give credit to the report she brought them. They heard that he was alive, and had been seen of her. Yet they believed not. They fear that she is imposed upon, and that it was but a fancy that she saw him. Had they believed the frequent predictions of it from his own mouth, they would not have been now so incredulous of the report of it.

II. He appeared to two of the disciples, as they went into the country, v. 12. This refers, no doubt, to that which is largely related (Luke xxiv. 13, &c.), of what passed between Christ and the two disciples going to Emmaus. He is here said to have appeared to them in another form, in another dress than what he usually wore.

1. These two witnesses gave in their testimony to this proof of Christ's resurrection; They went and told it to the residue, v. 13. Being satisfied themselves, they were desirous to give their brethren the satisfaction they had, that they might be comforted as they were.

2. This did not gain credit with all; Neither believed they them. Now there was a wise providence in it, that the proofs of Christ's resurrection were given in thus gradually, and admitted thus cautiously. We have the more reason to believe those who did themselves believe so slowly: had they swallowed it presently, they might have been thought credulous, and their testimony the less to be regarded; but their disbelieving at first, shows that they did not believe it afterward but upon a full conviction.

Verses 14–18

I. The conviction which Christ gave his apostles of the truth of his resurrection (v. 14); He appeared to them himself, when they were all together, as they sat at meat, which gave him an opportunity to eat and drink with them, for their full satisfaction; see Acts x. 41. And still, when he appeared to them, he upbraided them with their unbelief and hardness of heart. The evidences of the truth of the gospel are so full, that those who receive it not, may justly be upbraided with their unbelief; and it is owing to the hardness of their heart, its senselessness and stupidity. Though they had not till now seen him themselves, they are justly blamed because they believed not them who had seen him after he was risen. It will not suffice for an excuse of our infidelity in the great day, to say, "We did not see him after he was risen," for we ought to have believed the testimony of those who did see him.

II. The commission which he gave them to set up his kingdom among men by the preaching of his gospel.

1. To whom they were to preach the gospel. Hitherto they had been sent only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, and were forbidden to go into the way of the Gentiles, or into any city of the Samaritans;

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

8. And they went out quickly, and fled from the sepulchre: for they trembled and were amazed—"for tremor and amazement seized them." neither said they anything to any man; for they were afraid—How intensely natural and simple is this!

Appearances of Jesus after His Resurrection (vss. 9-18). 9. Now when Jesus was risen early the first day of the week, he appeared first to Mary Magdalene, out of whom he had cast seven devils—There is some difficulty here, and different ways of removing it have been adopted. She had gone with the other women to the sepulchre (vs. 1), parting from them, perhaps, before their interview with the angel, and on finding Peter and John she had come with them back to the spot; and it was at this second visit, it would seem, that Jesus appeared to this Mary, as detailed in John 20:11-18. To a woman was this honor given to be the first that saw the risen Redeemer, and that woman was NOT his virgin-mother. 11. they, when they had heard that he was alive, and had been seen of her, believed not—This, which is once and again repeated of them all, is most important in its bearing on their subsequent testimony to His resurrection at the risk of life itself.

12. After that he appeared in another form—(cf. Luke 24:16). unto two of them as they walked, and went into the country—The reference here, of course, is to His manifestation to the two disciples going to Emmaus, so exquisitely told by the Third Evangelist (see on Luke 24:13, etc.). 13. they went and told it unto the residue: neither believed they them.

ADAM CLARKE

8. They departed quickly from the sepulchre. At the desire of the angel they went into the tomb, to have the fullest certainty of the Resurrection. Fear and great joy. Fear produced by the appearance of this glorious messenger of God, and great joy occasioned by the glad tidings of the resurrection of their Lord and Master. At the mention of unexpected good news, fear and joy are generally intermingled.

9. Now when Jesus was risen, etc.—This, to the conclusion of the Gospel, is wanting in the famous Codex Vaticanus, and has anciently been wanting in many others. In the margin of the later Syriac version there is a remarkable addition after this verse; it is as follows: "And they declared briefly all that was commanded, to them that were with Peter. Afterward Jesus himself published by them, from east to west, the holy and incorruptible preaching of eternal salvation. Amen." Mary Magdalene. It seems likely that, after this woman had carried the news of Christ's resurrection to the disciples, she returned alone to the tomb; and that it was then that Christ appeared to her, John xx. 1-12; and a little after, He appeared to all the women together, Matt. xxviii. 9; Luke xxiv. 10.

10. Them that had been with him. Not only the eleven disciples, but several others who had been the occasional companions of Christ and the apostles. Mourned and wept. Because they had lost their Lord and Master, and had basely abandoned Him in His extremity.

12. He appeared . . . unto two of them. These were the two who were going to Emmaus. The whole account is given by Luke, chap. xxiv. 13-34, where see the notes.

14. And upbraided them with their unbelief. Never were there people so difficult to be persuaded of the truth of spiritual things as the disciples. It may be justly asserted that people of so skeptical a turn of mind would never credit anything till they had the fullest evidence of its truth. The unbelief of the disciples is a strong proof of the truth of the gospel of God.

but now they are authorized to go into all the world, and to preach the gospel of Christ to every creature, to the Gentiles as well as to the Jews; to every human creature that is capable of receiving it. These eleven men could not themselves preach it to all the world, much less to every creature in it; but they and the other disciples, with those who should afterward be added to them, must disperse themselves several ways, and, wherever they went, carry the gospel along with them. They must make it the business of their lives to send those glad tidings up and down the world with all possible fidelity and care, not as an amusement or entertainment, but as a solemn message from God to men, and an appointed means of making men happy.

2. What is the summary of the gospel they are to preach (v. 16); "Set before the world life and death, good and evil. Now go and tell them," (1) "That if they believe the gospel, and give up themselves to be Christ's disciples; if they renounce the devil, the world, and the flesh, and be devoted to Christ, they shall be saved from the guilt and power of sin, it shall not rule them, it shall not ruin them. He that is a true Christian, shall be saved through Christ." Baptism was appointed to be the inaugurating rite, by which those that embraced Christ owned him. (2) "If they believe not they shall be damned, by the sentence of a despised gospel, added to that of a broken law." And even this is gospel, it is good news, that nothing else but unbelief shall damn men, which is a sin against the remedy.

3. What power they should be endowed with, for the confirmation of the doctrine they were to preach (v. 17); These signs shall follow them that believe. They shall do wonders in Christ's name, the same name into which they were baptized, in the virtue of power derived from him, and fetched in by prayer. Some particular signs are mentioned; (1) They shall cast out devils; this power was more common among Christians than any other. (2) They shall speak with new tongues, which they had never learned, or been acquainted with; and this was both a miracle for the confirming of the truth of the gospel, and a means of spreading the gospel among those nations that had not heard it. (3) They shall take up serpents. This was fulfilled in Paul, who was not hurt by the viper that fastened on his hand, which was acknowledged a great miracle by the barbarous people, Acts xxviii. 5, 6. (4) If they be compelled by their persecutors to drink any deadly poisonous thing, it shall not hurt them. (5) They shall not only be preserved from hurt themselves, but they shall be enabled to do good to others; They shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover. Many of the elders of the church had this power, as appears by James v. 14, where they are said to anoint the sick with oil in the name of the Lord. With what assurance of success might they go about the executing of their commission, when they had such credentials as these to produce!

1. Christ welcomed into the upper world (v. 19): After the Lord had spoken what he had to say to his disciples, he went up into heaven, in a cloud; which we have a particular account of (Acts i. 9); he was received up, and he sat on the right hand of God. Now he is glorified with the glory he had before the world.

2. Christ welcomed in this lower world. (1) We have here the apostles working diligently for him; they went forth, and preached everywhere far and near. Though the doctrine they preached was directly contrary to the spirit and genius of the world, though it met with abundance of opposition, yet the preachers of it were neither afraid nor ashamed. (2) We have here God working effectually with them, to make their labours successful, by confirming the word with signs following, partly by the miracles that were wrought upon the bodies of people, and partly by the influence it had upon the minds of people. These were properly signs following the word—the reformation of the world, the destruction of idolatry, the conversion of sinners, the comfort of saints; and these signs still follow it, and that they may do so more and more, for the honour of Christ and the good of mankind, the evangelist prays, and teaches us to say Amen. Father in heaven, thus let thy name be hallowed, and let thy kingdom come.

. . . 15. he said unto them, Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature—See on John 20:19-23; and on Luke 24: 36-49.

16. He that believeth and is baptized—Baptism is here put for the external signature of the inner faith of the heart, just as "confessing with the mouth" is in Romans 10:10; and there also as here this outward manifestation, once mentioned as the proper fruit of faith, is not repeated in what follows (Romans 10:11)—shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned—These awful issues of the reception or rejection of the Gospel, though often recorded in other connections, are given in this connection only by Mark.

17. these signs shall follow them that believe . . . 18. They shall take up serpents . . .—These two verses also are peculiar to Mark.

The Ascension and Triumphant Proclamation of the Gospel Thereafter (vss. 19-20). 19. So then after the Lord—an epithet applied to Jesus by this Evangelist only in the two concluding verses, when He comes to His glorious Ascension and its subsequent fruits. It is most frequent in Luke. had spoken unto them, he was received up into heaven—See on Luke 24:50, 51. and sat on the right hand of God—This great truth is here only related as a fact in the Gospel history. In that exalted attitude He appeared to Stephen (Acts 7:55, 56); and it is thereafter perpetually referred to as His proper condition in glory. 20. they went forth, and preached everywhere, the Lord working with them, and confirming the word with signs following. Amen.—We have in this closing verse a most important link of connection with the Acts of the Apostles, where He who directed all the movements of the infant Church is perpetually styled "THE LORD"; thus illustrating His own promise for the founding and building up of the Church, "LO, I AM WITH YOU alway!"

ADAM CLARKE

15. Go ye into all the world. See on Matt. xxviii. 19. And preach the gospel to every creature. "Proclaim the glad tidings"—of Christ crucified, and raised from the dead—"to all the creation"—to the Gentile world.

16. He that believeth. He that credits this gospel as a revelation from God; and is baptized—takes upon him the profession of it, obliging himself to walk according to its precepts; shall be saved—redeemed from sin here, and brought at last to the enjoyment of My eternal glory. But he that believeth not shall be damned—because he rejects the only provision that could be effectual to his soul's salvation.

17. These signs shall follow. Or rather, "accompany." Them that believe. "The believers," as we express it; i.e., the apostles, and all those who in those primitive times were endued with miraculous powers, for the confirmation of the doctrines they preached. In my name. That is, by the authority and influence of the almighty Jesus. Cast out devils. Whose kingdom Jesus Christ was manifested to destroy. Speak with new tongues. This was most literally fulfilled on the Day of Pentecost, Acts ii. 4-12.

18. Take up serpents. This also was literally fulfilled in the case of Paul, Acts xxviii. 5. If they drink any deadly thing. Being understood —if they should through mistake or accident drink any poisonous matter, their constant Preserver will take care that it shall not injure them. See a similar promise, Isa. xliii. 2. They shall lay hands on the sick. And I will convey a healing power by their hands, so that the sick shall recover, and men shall see that these are sent and acknowledged by the Most High. Several instances of this kind are found in the Acts of the Apostles.

19. After the Lord had spoken these things, and conversed with them for forty days, he was received up into heaven, there to appear in the presence of God for us.

20. The Lord working with them. This cooperation was twofold, internal and external. Internal, illuminating their minds, convincing them of the truth, and establishing them in it. External, conveying their word to the souls that heard it, by the demonstration of the Holy Ghost; convincing them of sin, righteousness, and judgment; justifying them by His blood, and sanctifying them by His Spirit. Though miraculous powers are not now requisite, because the truth of the gospel has been sufficiently confirmed, yet this cooperation of God is indispensably necessary, without which no man can be a successful preacher, and without which no soul can be saved. With signs following. "The accompanying signs"; viz., those mentioned in the seventeenth and eighteenth verses, and those others just now spoken of, which still continue to be produced by the energy of God, accompanying the faithful preaching of His unadulterated Word. Amen. This is added here by many MSS. and versions, but is supposed not to have made a part of the text originally.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO LUKE

I. Perfect (1:1-3:38)
- A. Prologue (1:1-4)
- B. Being and birth (1:5-2:39)
  - 1. Angelic annunciations (1:5-38)
  - 2. The two mothers (1:39-56)
  - 3. The births (1:57-2:39)
- C. Childhood and confirmation (2:40-52)
  - 1. Growth (2:40)
  - 2. Confirmation (2:41-51)
  - 3. Advancement (2:52)
- D. Development and anointing (3:1-22)
  - 1. The ministry of John (3:1-20)
  - 2. Anointing and attestation (3:21, 22)
- E. Genealogy (3:23-38)

II. Perfected (4:1-9:36)
- A. Temptation: first process and issue—the devil (4:1-14)
  - 1. The challenge (4:1, 2)
  - 2. The process (4:3-12)
  - 3. The issue (4:13, 14)
- B. Teaching: second process and issue—man (4:15-9:27)
  - 1. Induction and things following (4:15-6:11)
  - 2. The twelve (6:12-8:56)
  - 3. The issue (9:1-27)
- C. Transfiguration: third process and issue—God (9:28-36)
  - 1. The process is in the perfecting already considered
  - 2. The issue (9:28-36)

III. Perfecting (9:37-24:53)
- A. Prelude (9:37-50)
  - 1. Symbolic miracle (9:37-45)
  - 2. The disciples (9:46-50)
- B. Purpose and preparation (9:51-18:30)
  - 1. Purpose—the key to all that follows (9:51)
  - 2. Preparation (9:52-18:30)
- C. Approach and accomplishment (18:31-24:12)
  - 1. Approach—the key to all that follows (18:31-34)
  - 2. Accomplishment—the priest making atonement alone (18:35-24:12)
    - a. "Up to Jerusalem" (18:35-19:44)
    - b. "Delivered to Gentiles" (19:45-23:56)
    - c. "The third day" (24:1-12)
- D. Administration (24:13-53)
  - 1. The new interpretation creating passion (24:13-35)
  - 2. The new comradeship creating confidence (24:36-43)
  - 3. The new commission creating responsibility (24:44-49)
  - 4. The new benediction creating worship (24:50-53)

We are now entering into the labors of another evangelist, Luke. Some think he was the only one of all the penmen of the Scripture who was not of the seed of Israel. He was a Jewish proselyte, and, as some conjecture, converted to Christianity by the ministry of St. Paul; and after his coming into Macedonia (Acts 26:10), he was his constant companion. He had employed himself in the study and practice of physics; hence, Paul calls him "Luke, the beloved physician" (Col. 4:14). Some of the pretended ancients tell you that he was a painter, and drew a picture of the Virgin Mary. He is supposed to have written this gospel when he was associated with St. Paul. Some think this is "the brother" whom Paul speaks of (2 Cor. 8:18), "whose praise is in the gospel throughout all the churches of Christ."

His way and manner of writing are accurate and exact, his style polite and elegant, yet perspicuous. He expresses himself in a vein of purer Greek than is to be found in the other writers of the holy story. Thus he relates divers things more copiously than the other evangelists; and thus he especially treats of those things which relate to the priestly office of Christ. It is uncertain when, or about what time, this gospel was written. Some think it was written at Rome, a little before he wrote his history of the Acts of the Apostles (which is a continuation of this), when he was there with Paul, while he was a prisoner, and preaching in "his own hired house," with which the history of the Acts concludes; and then Paul says that "only Luke is with me" (2 Tim. 4:11). When he was under that voluntary confinement with Paul, he had leisure to compile these two histories (and many excellent writings the church has been indebted to a prison for). Jerome says Luke died when he was eighty-four years of age, and was never married.

Complimental prefaces and dedications, the language of flattery and the food and fuel of pride, are justly condemned by the wise and good; but it doth not therefore follow, that such as are useful and instructive are to be run down; such is this. It is not certain who this Theophilus was; the name signifies a friend of God; some think that it does not mean any particular person, but everyone that is a lover of God. But it is rather to be understood of some particular person, probably a magistrate; because Luke gives him here the same title of respect which St. Paul gave to Festus the governor, Acts xxvi. 25. Religion does not destroy civility and good manners, but teaches us, according to the usages of our country, to give honour to them to whom honour is due.

I. Why St. Luke wrote this gospel. It is certain that he was moved by the Holy Ghost, not only to the writing, but in the writing of it; but in both he was moved as a reasonable creature, and not as a mere machine; and he was made to consider,

1. That the things he wrote of were things that were most surely believed among all Christians, and therefore things which they ought to be instructed in. He will not write about things of doubtful disputation, but the things which are, and ought to be, most surely believed. Though it is not the foundation of our faith, yet it is a support to it, that the articles of our creed are things that have been long most surely believed. The doctrine of Christ is what thousands of the wisest and best of men have ventured their souls upon.

Vss. 1-4. It appears from the Acts of the Apostles, and the Apostolic Epistles, that the earliest preaching of the Gospel consisted of a brief summary of the facts of our Lord's earthly history, with a few words of pointed application to the parties addressed. Of these astonishing facts, notes would naturally be taken and digests put into circulation. It is to such that Luke here refers; and in terms of studied respect, as narratives of what was "believed surely," or "on sure grounds" among Christians, and drawn up from the testimony of "eye-witnesses and ministering servants of the word." But when he adds that "it seemed good to him also to write in order, having traced down all things with exactness from their first rise," it is a virtual claim for his own Gospel to supersede these "many" narratives. Accordingly, while not one of them has survived the wreck of time, this and the other canonical Gospels live, and shall live, the only fitting vehicles of those life-bringing facts which have made all things new. Apocryphal or spurious gospels, upheld by parties unfriendly to the truths exhibited in the canonical Gospels, have not perished; but those well-meant and substantially correct narratives here referred to, used only while better were not to be had, were by tacit consent allowed to merge in the four peerless documents which from age to age, and with astonishing unanimity, have been accepted as the written charter of all Christianity.

1. Many have taken in hand. Great and remarkable characters always have many biographers. So it appears it was with our Lord. But as most of these accounts were inaccurate, recording as facts things which had not happened, and through ignorance or design mistaking others, especially in the place where Luke wrote, it seemed good to the Holy Spirit to inspire this holy man with the most correct knowledge of the whole history of our Lord's birth, preaching, miracles, sufferings, death, resurrection, and ascension, that the sincere, upright followers of God might have a sure foundation on which they might safely build their faith. Most surely believed among us. "Facts confirmed by the fullest evidence." Everything that had been done or said by Jesus Christ was so public, so plain, and so accredited by thousands of witnesses, who could have had no interest in supporting an imposture, as to carry the fullest conviction to the hearts of those who heard and saw Him of the divinity of His doctrine and the truth of His miracles.

MATTHEW HENRY

2. That it was requisite there should be a declaration made in order of those things; that the history of the life of Christ should be methodized. When things are put in order, we know the better where to find them for our own use, and how to keep them for the benefit of others.

3. That there were many who had undertaken to publish narratives of the life of Christ. Others' services to Christ must not be reckoned to supersede ours, but rather to quicken them.

4. That the truth of the things he had to write was confirmed by the concurring testimony of those who were competent and unexceptionable witnesses of them. What he was now about to publish, agreed with that which had been delivered by word of mouth, over and over, by those who from the beginning were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word, v. 2. (1) The apostles were ministers of the word of Christ, or of the doctrine of Christ; they, having received it themselves, ministered it to others, I John i. 1. They had not a gospel to make as masters, but a gospel to preach as ministers. (2) The ministers of the word were eye-witnesses. They did themselves hear the doctrine of Christ, and see his miracles, and had them not by report, at second hand. (3) They were so from the beginning of Christ's ministry, v. 2. He had his disciples with him when he wrought his first miracle, John ii. 11. They companied with him all the time that he went in and out among them, Acts i. 21. (4) The written gospel, which we have to this day, exactly agrees with the gospel which was preached in the first days of the church. (5) That he himself had a perfect understanding of the things he wrote of, from the first, v. 3. He asserts his own ability for this undertaking: "It seemed good to me, having attained to the exact knowledge of all things." He had diligently searched into these things. He had made it his business to inform himself concerning particulars. He had received his intelligence, not only by tradition, but by revelation. He wrote his history of things reported by tradition, but ratified by inspiration. He could therefore say that he had a perfect understanding of these things. He knew them, accurately, exactly.

II. Observe why he sent it to Theophilus: "I wrote unto thee these things in order, that thou mightest know the certainty of those things wherein thou hast been instructed." It is implied that he had been instructed in these things either before his baptism, or since, or both, according to the rule, Matt. xxviii. 19, 20. Concerning which thou hast been catechized; so the word is; the most knowing Christians began with being catechized. It was intended that he should know the certainty of those things. There is a certainty in the gospel of Christ, there is that therein which we may build upon; and those who have been well instructed in the things of God should give diligence to know the certainty of those things, to know not only what we believe, but why we believe it, that we may be able to give a reason of the hope that is in us.

The two preceding evangelists begin the gospel with the baptism of John and his ministry. This evangelist, designing to give a more particular account than had been given of our Saviour's conception and birth, determines to do so of John Baptist.

I. The account given of his parents (v. 5): They lived in the days of Herod the king, who was a foreigner, and a deputy for the Romans, who had lately made Judæa a province of the empire. This is taken notice of to show that the sceptre was quite departed from Judah. Israel is enslaved, yet then comes the glory of Israel.

Now the father of John Baptist was a priest, a son of Aaron; his name Zacharias. No families in the world were ever so honoured of God as those of Aaron and David; with one was made the covenant of priesthood, with the other that of royalty. Christ was of David's house, his forerunner of Aaron's. This Zacharias was of the course of Abia. When in David's time the family of Aaron was multiplied, he divided them into twenty-four courses, for the more regular performance of their office. The eighth of those was that of Abia (1 Chron. xxiv. 10), who was descended from Eleazar, Aaron's eldest son.

1. set forth in order—more simply, to draw up a narrative.

2. from the beginning—that is, of His public ministry, as is plain from what follows.

3. from the very first—that is, from the very earliest events; referring to those precious details of the birth and early life, not only of our Lord, but of His forerunner, which we owe to Luke alone. in order—or "consecutively"—in contrast, probably, with the disjointed productions to which he had referred. But this must not be pressed too far; for, on comparing it with the other Gospels, we see that in some particulars the strict chronological order is not observed in this Gospel. most excellent—or "most noble"—a title of rank applied by this same writer twice to Felix and once to Festus (Acts 22:26; 24:3; 26:25). It is likely, therefore, that "Theophilus" was chief magistrate of some city in Greece or Asia Minor [WEBSTER and WILKINSON].

4. that thou mightest know—"know thoroughly." hast been instructed—orally instructed—lit., "catechized" or "catechetically taught," at first as a catechumen or candidate for Christian baptism.

5-25. ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE FORERUNNER. 5. Herod—(See on Matt. 2:1). course of Abia—or Abijah; the eighth of the twenty-four orders of courses into which David divided the priests (see I Chron. 24:1, 4, 10). Of these courses only four returned after the captivity (Ezra 2:34-39), which were again subdivided into twenty-four—retaining the ancient name and order of each. They took the whole temple service for a week each.

ADAM CLARKE

2. Even as they delivered them unto us which from the beginning were eyewitnesses. Probably this alludes to the Gospels of Matthew and Mark, which it is likely were written before Luke wrote his, and on the models of which he professes to write his own; and from the beginning must mean from the time that Christ first began to proclaim the glad tidings of the Kingdom. Eyewitnesses must necessarily signify those who had been with Him from the beginning, and consequently had the best opportunities of knowing the truth of every fact.

3. Having had perfect understanding. "Having accurately traced up"—entered into the very spirit of the work, and examined everything to the bottom; in consequence of which investigation I am completely convinced of the truth of the whole. Though God gives His Holy Spirit to all them who ask Him, yet this Gift was never designed to set aside the use of those faculties with which He has already endued the soul, and which are as truly His gifts as the Holy Spirit itself is. The nature of inspiration, in the case of Luke, we at once discover: he set himself by impartial inquiry and diligent investigation to find the whole truth and to relate nothing but the truth; and the Spirit of God presided over and directed his inquiries, so that he discovered the whole truth and was preserved from every particle of error. From the very first. "From their origin." Some think anothen should, in this place, be translated "from above"; and that it refers to the inspiration by which Luke wrote. I prefer our translation, or "from the origin," which several good critics contend for, and which meaning it has in some of the best Greek writers. Theophilus. As the literal import of this word is "friend of God," some have supposed that under this name Luke comprised all the followers of Christ, to whom, as "friends of God," he dedicated this faithful history of the life, doctrine, death, and resurrection of our Lord. But this interpretation appears to have little solidity in it; for if all the followers of Christ are addressed, why is the singular number used? and what good end could there be accomplished by using a feigned name? Besides, most excellent could never be applied in this way, for it evidently designates a particular person, and one probably distinguished by his situation in life; though this does not necessarily follow from the title, which was often given in the way of friendship. Theophilus appears to have been some very reputable Greek or Roman who was one of Luke's disciples.

4. Wherein thou hast been instructed. In which you have been "catechized." It appears that Theophilus had already received the first elements of the Christian doctrine, but had not as yet been completely grounded in them. That he might know the certainty of the things in which he had been thus catechized, by having all the facts and their proofs brought before him in order, the Evangelist sent him this faithful and divinely inspired narrative.

5. In the days of Herod, the king. This was Herod, surnamed the Great, the son of Antipater, an Idumean by birth, who had professed himself a proselyte to the Jewish religion, but regarded no religion further than it promoted his secular interests and ambition. Thus, for the first time, the throne of Judah was filled by a person not of Jewish extraction, who had been forced upon the people by the Roman government. Hence it appears plain that the prophecy of Jacob, Gen. xlix. 10, was now fulfilled, for the sceptre had departed from Judah; and now was the time, according to another prophecy, to look for the Governor from Bethlehem, who should rule and feed the people of Israel, Mic. v. 1-2. The course of Abia. When the sacerdotal families grew very numerous, so that all could not officiate together at the Tabernacle, David divided them into twenty-four classes, that they might minister by turns, 1 Chron. xxiv. 1, etc., each family serving a whole week, 2 Kings xi. 7; 2 Chron. xxiii. 8. Abia was the eighth in the order in which they had been originally established, 1 Chron. xxiv. 10. These dates and persons are particularly mentioned as a full confirmation of the truth of the facts themselves; because any person, at the time this Gospel was written, might have satisfied himself by applying to the family of John the Baptist, the family

The wife of this Zacharias was of the daughters of Aaron too, and her name was Elisabeth, the very same name with Elisheba, the wife of Aaron, Exod. vi. 23. The priests were very careful to marry within their own family.

Now that which is observed concerning Zacharias and Elisabeth is,

1. That they were a very religious couple (v. 6): They were both righteous before God; they were sincerely and really so. They approved themselves to him. It is a happy thing when those who are joined to each other in marriage are both joined to the Lord. They walked in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord, blameless. They showed it, not by their talk, but by their works; by the way they walked in and the rule they walked by. They walked not only in the ordinances of the Lord, which related to divine worship, but in the commandments of the Lord, which have reference to all the instances of a good conversation. Not that they never did in anything come short of their duty, but it was their constant care and endeavour to come up to it. Though they were not sinless, yet they were blameless; nobody could charge them with any open scandalous sin; they lived honestly and inoffensively.

2. That they had been long childless, v. 7. Children are a heritage of the Lord. They are valuable desirable blessings; yet many there are, who are righteous before God, who yet are not thus blessed. Elisabeth was barren, and they began to despair of ever having children, for they were both now well stricken in years. Many eminent persons were born of mothers that had been long childless, as Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Samson, Samuel, and so here John Baptist, to make their birth the more remarkable and the blessing of it the more valuable to their parents.

II. The appearing of an angel to his father Zacharias, as he was ministering in the temple, v. 8–11. Observe,

1. How Zacharias was employed in the service of God (v. 8): He executed the priest's office, before God, in the order of his course; it was his week of waiting, and he was upon duty. Now it fell to Zacharias's lot to burn incense morning and evening for that week of his waiting, as other services fell to other priests by lot likewise. It was the burning of the daily incense at the altar of incense (v. 11), which was in the temple (v. 9), not in the most holy place, into which the high priest entered. The Jews say that one and the same priest burned not incense twice in all his days (there were such a multitude of them), at least never more than one week.

While Zacharias was burning incense in the temple, the whole multitude of the people were praying without, v. 10. These all addressed themselves to their devotions (in mental prayer, for their voice was not heard), when by the tinkling of a bell they had notice that the priest was gone in to burn incense. Now observe here, (1) That the true Israel of God always were a praying people. (2) That then, when ritual and ceremonial appointments were in full force, as this of burning incense, yet moral and spiritual duties were required to go along with them. David knew that when he was at a distance from the altar his prayer might be heard without incense. But, when he was compassing the altar, the incense could not be accepted without prayer, any more than the shell without the kernel. (3) That it is not enough for us to be where God is worshipped, if our hearts do not join in the worship. (4) All the prayers we offer up to God here in his courts are acceptable and successful only in virtue of the incense of Christ's intercession in the temple of God above. We cannot expect an interest in Christ's intercession if we do not pray, and pray with our spirits, and continue instant in prayer.

2. How, when he was thus employed, he was honoured with a messenger sent from heaven to him (v. 11): There appeared unto him an angel of the Lord.

his wife was of the daughters of Aaron—The priests might marry into any tribe, but "it was most commendable of all to marry one of the priests' line" [LIGHTFOOT].

6. commandments and ordinances—The one expressing their moral—the other their ceremonial—obedience [CALVIN and BENGEL], (Cf. Ezek. 11:20; Heb. 9:1). It has been denied that any such distinction was known to the Jews and New Testament writers. But Mark 12:33, and other passages, put this beyond all reasonable doubt.

7. So with Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebekah, Elkanah and Hannah, Manoah and his wife.

9. his lot was to burn incense—The part assigned to each priest in his week of service was decided by lot. Three were employed at the offering of incense—to remove the ashes of the former service; to bring in and place on the golden altar the pan filled with hot burning coals taken from the altar of burnt offering; and to sprinkle the incense on the hot coals; and, while the smoke of it ascended, to make intercession for the people. This was the most distinguished part of the service (Rev. 8:3), and this was what fell to the lot of Zacharias at this time [LIGHTFOOT]. 10. praying without—outside the court in front of the temple, where stood the altar of burnt offering; the men and women in separate courts, but the altar visible to all. the time of incense—which was offered along with the morning and evening sacrifice of every day; a beautiful symbol of the acceptableness of the sacrifice offered on the altar of burnt offering, with coals from whose altar the incense was burnt (Lev. 16:12, 13). This again was a symbol of the "living sacrifice" of themselves and their services offered daily to God by the worshippers. Hence the language of Psalm 141:2; Revelation 8:3. But that the acceptance of this daily offering depended on the expiatory virtue presupposed in the burnt offering, and pointing to the one "sacrifice of a sweet-smelling savor" (Eph. 5:2), is evident from Isaiah 6:6, 7.

of our Lord, or the surrounding neighbors. What a full proof of the Gospel history! It was published immediately after the time in which these facts took place; and among the very people, thousands of whom had been eyewitnesses of them; and among those, too, whose essential interest it was to have discredited them if they could. And yet, in all that age, in which only they could have been contradicted with advantage, no man ever arose to call them in question! What an absolute proof was this that the thing was impossible, and that the truth of the Gospel history was acknowledged by all who paid any attention to the evidences it produced! Of the daughter of Aaron. That is, she was of one of the sacerdotal families. This shows that John was most nobly descended. His father was a priest, and his mother the daughter of a priest; and thus by both father and mother he descended from the family of Amram, of whom came Moses, Aaron, and Miriam, the most illustrious characters in the whole Jewish history.

6. They were both righteous. Upright and holy in all their outward conduct in civil life. Before God. Possessing the spirit of the religion they professed; exercising themselves constantly in the presence of their Maker, whose eye they knew was upon all their conduct, and who examined all their motives. Walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless. None being able to lay any evil to their charge. They were as exemplary and conscientious in the discharge of their religious duties as they were in the discharge of the offices of civil life. Perhaps commandments may here mean the Decalogue; and ordinances, the ceremonial and judicial laws which were delivered after the Decalogue, as all the precepts delivered from Exodus xxi to xxiv are termed ordinances.

7. Both were now well stricken in years. By the order of God, sterility and old age both met in the person of Elisabeth to render the birth of a son (humanly speaking) impossible. This was an exact parallel to the case of Sarah and Abraham, Gen. xi. 30; xvii. 17. Christ must (by the miraculous power of God) be born of a virgin; whatever was connected with or referred to His incarnation must be miraculous and impressive. Isaac was his grand type, and therefore must be born miraculously—contrary to the common course and rule of nature. John the Baptist was to be the forerunner of Christ; his birth, like that of Isaac, must be miraculous, because, like the other, it was to be a representation of the birth of Christ. Therefore his parents were both far advanced in years, and besides, Elisabeth was naturally barren. The birth of these three extraordinary persons was announced nearly in the same way. God himself foretells the birth of Isaac, Gen. xvii. 16. The angel of the Lord announces the birth of John the Baptist, Luke i. 13; and six months after, the angel Gabriel, the same angel, proclaims to Mary the birth of Christ!

8. Before God. In the Temple, where God used to manifest His presence, though long before this time He had forsaken it; yet on this important occasion the angel of His presence had visited it.

9. His lot was. We are informed in the Talmud that it was the custom of the priests to divide the different functions of the sacerdotal office among themselves by lot; and in this case the decision of the lot was that Zacharias should at that time burn the incense before the Lord in the holy place.

10. The whole multitude . . . were praying. The incense was itself an emblem of the prayers and praises of the people of God; see Ps. cxli. 2; Rev. viii. 1. While therefore the rite is being performed by the priest, the people are employed in the thing signified. Happy the people who attend to the spirit as well as the letter of every divine institution! Incense was burnt twice a day in the Temple, in the morning and in the evening, Exod. xxx. 7-8; but the Evangelist does not specify the time of the day in which this transaction took place. It was probably in the morning.

11. There appeared unto him an angel of the Lord. There had been neither prophecy nor

This angel stood on the right side of the altar of incense, on Zacharias's right hand. Zacharias had a good angel standing at his right hand, to encourage him.

3. What impression this made upon Zacharias (v. 12): When Zacharias saw him he was troubled, and fear fell upon him, v. 12. Though he was righteous before God, and blameless in his conversation, yet he could not be without some apprehensions. Ever since man sinned, his mind has been unable to bear the glory of such revelations and his conscience afraid of evil tidings brought by them. And for this reason God chooses to speak to us by men like ourselves, whose terror shall not make us afraid.

III. The message which the angel had to deliver to him, v. 13. He began his message, as angels generally did, with, Fear not. Perhaps when he saw the angel he was afraid lest he came to rebuke him for some mistake or miscarriage; "No," saith the angel, "Fear not, but compose thyself, that thou mayest with a sedate and even spirit receive the message I have to deliver to thee." Let us see what that is.

1. The prayers he has often made shall now receive an answer of peace: Fear not, Zacharias, for thy prayer is heard. If he means his particular prayer for a son, it must be the prayers he had formerly made for that mercy, when he was likely to have children. God will now, in giving this mercy, look a great way back to the prayers that he had made long since for and with his wife. Prayers of faith are filed in heaven, and are not forgotten, though the thing prayed for is not presently given in. If he means the prayers he was now making, we may suppose that those were according to the duty of his place, for the Israel of God and their welfare, and the performance of the promises made to them concerning the Messiah and the coming of his kingdom: "This prayer of thine is now heard; for thy wife shall shortly conceive him that is to be the Messiah's forerunner." Some of the Jewish writers themselves say that the priest, when he burnt incense, prayed for the salvation of the whole world; and now that prayer shall be heard. In general, "The prayers thou now makest, and all thy prayers, are accepted of God, and this shall be the sign that thou art accepted of God, Elisabeth shall bear thee a son."

2. He shall have a son in his old age, by Elisabeth his wife, who had been long barren. He is directed what name to give his son: Call him John, in Hebrew Johanan, a name we often meet with in the Old Testament: it signifies gracious.

3. This son shall be the joy of his family and of all his relations, v. 14. He shall be a welcome child. Thou for thy part shalt have joy and gladness. Mercies that have been long waited for, when they come at last, are the more acceptable. "He shall be such a son as thou shalt have reason to rejoice in; many parents, if they could foresee what their children will prove, instead of rejoicing at their birth, would wish they had never been; but I will tell thee what thy son will be, and then thou wilt not need to rejoice with trembling at his birth, as the best must do, but mayest rejoice with triumph at it. Nay, and many shall rejoice at his birth; all the relations of the family will rejoice in it, and all its well-wishers, because it is for the honour and comfort of the family," v. 58.

4. This son shall be a distinguished favourite of Heaven, and a distinguished blessing to the earth. The honour of having a son is nothing to the honour of having such a son.

(1) He shall be great in the sight of the Lord. God will set him before his face continually. He shall be a prophet, yea more than a prophet. He shall be much, he shall be great, in the sight of the Lord.

(2) He shall be a Nazarite, set apart to God from everything that is polluting; in token of this, according to the law of Nazariteship, he shall drink neither wine nor strong drink. He shall be a Nazar te for life. Which intimates that those that would be eminent servants of God, and employed in eminent services, must learn to live a life of self-denial and mortification, must be dead to the pleasures of sense, and keep their minds from everything that is darkening and disturbing to them.

(3) He shall be abundantly fitted and qualified for those great and eminent services. He shall be filled with the Holy Ghost, even from his mother's womb. [1.] Those that would be filled with the Holy Ghost must be sober and temperate, and very moderate in the use of wine and strong drink. Be not drunk with wine, but be filled with the Spirit, Eph. v. 18. [2.] It is possible that infants may be wrought upon by the Holy Ghost, even from their mother's womb; for John Baptist even then was filled with the Holy Ghost. God has promised to pour out his Spirit upon the seed of believers, Isa. xliv. 3.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

11. right side—the south side, between the altar and the candlestick, Zacharias being on the north side, in front of the altar, while offering incense [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. But why there? The right was the favorable side (Matt. 25:33) [SCHOTTGEN and WETSTEIN in MEYER]; cf. Mark 16:5.

13. thy prayer is heard—doubtless for offspring, which by some presentiment he even yet had not despaired of. John—the same as "Johanan," so frequent in the Old Testament, meaning "Jehovah's gracious gift."

14. shall rejoice—so they did (vss. 58, 66); but the meaning rather is, "shall have cause to rejoice"—it would prove to many a joyful event.

15. great in the sight of the Lord—nearer to Him in official standing than all the prophets. (See on Matt. 11: 10, 11.) drink neither wine . . .—i.e., shall be a Nazarite, or "a separated one" (Num. 6:2, etc.). As the leper was the living symbol of sin, so was the Nazarite of holiness; nothing inflaming was to cross his lips; no razor to come on his head; no ceremonial defilement to be contracted. Thus was he to be "holy to the Lord [ceremonially] all the days of his separation." This separation was in ordinary cases temporary and voluntary: only Samson (Judg. 13:7), Samuel (I Sam. 1:11), and John Baptist were Nazarites from the womb. It was fitting that the utmost severity of legal consecration should be seen in Christ's forerunner. HE was the REALITY and PERFECTION of the Nazarite without the symbol, which perished in that living realization of it: "Such an High Priest became us, who was SEPARATE FROM SINNERS" (Heb. 7:26). filled with the Holy Ghost, from . . . womb—a holy vessel for future service.

angelic ministry vouchsafed to this people for about four hundred years. But now, as the Sun of Righteousness is about to arise upon them, the dayspring from on high visits them, that they may be prepared for that kingdom of God which was at hand.

12. Zacharias . . . was troubled. Or "confounded" at his sudden and unexpected appearance; and fear fell upon him, lest this heavenly messenger were come to denounce the judgments of God against a faithless and disobedient people, who had too long and too well merited them.

13. Thy prayer is heard. This probably refers, first, to the frequent prayers which he had offered to God for a son; and second, to those which he had offered for the deliverance and consolation of Israel. They are all heard—you shall have a son, and Israel shall be saved. If fervent, faithful prayers be not immediately answered, they should not be considered as lost; all such are heard by the Lord, are registered in heaven, and shall be answered in the most effectual way and in the best time. Answers to prayer are to be received by faith; but faith should not only accompany prayer while offered on earth, but follow it all its way to the throne of grace, and stay with it before the throne till dismissed with its answer to the waiting soul. Thou shalt call his name John. For the proper exposition of this name, see on Mark i. 4.

14. Thou shalt have joy. "He will be joy and gladness to you." A child of prayer and faith is likely to be a source of comfort to his parents. Many shall rejoice at his birth. He shall be the minister of God for good to multitudes, who shall, through his preaching, be turned from the error of their ways and converted to God, their Saviour.

15. He shall be great in the sight of the Lord. That is, before Jesus Christ, whose forerunner he shall be; or he shall be a "truly great person," for so this form of speech may imply. Neither wine nor strong drink. I.e., all fermented liquors which have the property of intoxicating, or producing drunkenness. The original word, sikera, comes from the Hebrew, shakar, "to inebriate." "Any inebriating liquor," says Jerome, "is called sicera, whether made of corn, apples, honey, dates, or any other fruits." Shall be filled with the Holy Ghost. Shall be divinely designated to this particular office, and qualified for it, from his mother's womb—from the instant of his birth.

MATTHEW HENRY

(4) He shall be instrumental for the conversion of many souls to God, and the preparing of them to receive and entertain the gospel of Christ, v. 16, 17. He shall be sent to the children of Israel, and not to the Gentiles; to the whole nation, and not to the family of the priests only. He shall go before the Lord their God, that is, before the Messiah. John shall go before him, a little before him, to give notice of his approach, and to prepare people to receive him. He shall go in the spirit and power of Elias. That is, First, He shall be such a man as Elias was, and do such works as Elias did—shall, like him, preach the necessity of repentance and reformation to a very corrupt and degenerate age—shall like him, be bold and zealous in reproving sin and witnessing against it even in the greatest, and be hated and persecuted for it. He shall be carried on in his work, as Elijah was, by a divine spirit and power, which shall crown his ministry with wonderful success. John Baptist went before Christ and his apostles, and introduced the gospel dispensation by preaching the substance of the gospel doctrine and duty, Repent, with an eye to the kingdom of heaven. Secondly, He shall be that very person who was prophesied of by Malachi under the name of Elijah (Mal. iv. 5), who should be sent before the coming of the day of the Lord. He shall turn many of the children of Israel to the Lord their God. Whatever has a tendency to turn us from iniquity, will turn us to Christ as our Lord and our God; for those who through grace are wrought upon to shake off the yoke of sin, will soon be persuaded to take upon them the yoke of the Lord Jesus. Hereby he shall turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, that is, of the Jews to the Gentiles; shall help to conquer the rooted prejudices which the Jews have against the Gentiles, which was begun to be done by John Baptist, who baptized and taught Roman soldiers as well as Jewish Pharisees, and who cured the pride and confidence of those Jews who gloried in their having Abraham to their father, and told them that God would out of stones raise up children unto Israel, Matt. iii. 9. When the Jews that embraced the faith of Christ were brought to join in communion with the Gentiles that did so too, then the heart of the fathers was turned to the children. And the effect of this will be, that enmities will be slain and discord made to cease; and they that are at variance, being united in his baptism, will be better reconciled one to another. This agrees with the account Josephus gives of John Baptist, Antiq. lib. 18. cap, 7. "That he was a good man, and taught the Jews the exercise of virtue, in piety towards God, and righteousness towards one another." And he saith, "The people flocked after him, and were exceedingly delighted in his doctrine." Thus he turned the hearts of fathers and children to God and one another, by turning the disobedient to the wisdom of the just. First, True religion is the wisdom of just men. It is both our wisdom and our duty to be religious; there is both equity and prudence in it. Secondly, It is not impossible but that those who have been unbelieving and disobedient may be turned to the wisdom of the just; divine grace can conquer the greatest ignorance and prejudice. Thirdly, The great design of the gospel is to bring people home to God, and to bring them nearer to one another. Hereby he shall make ready a people prepared for the Lord. All that are to be devoted to the Lord, and made happy in him, must first be prepared and made ready for him. Nothing has a more direct tendency to prepare people for Christ than the doctrine of repentance. When sin is thereby made grievous, Christ will become very precious.

IV. Zacharias's unbelief of the angel's prediction, and the rebuke he was laid under. We are here told,

1. What his unbelief spoke, v. 18. Whereby shall I know this? There are many instances in the Old Testament of those that had children when they were old, yet he cannot believe that he shall have this child of promise: "For I am an old man, and my wife is now well stricken in years. Therefore he must have a sign given him, or he will not believe." Though he had this notice given him in the temple, though it was given him when he was praying, and burning incense, and though a firm belief that God has an almighty power, and with him nothing is impossible, was enough to silence all objections, yet considering his own body and his wife's too much, unlike a son of Abraham, he staggered at the promise.

2. How his unbelief was silenced, and he silenced for it.

(1) The angel stops his mouth. Doth he ask, Whereby shall I know this? Let him know it by this, I am Gabriel, v. 19. He puts his name to his prophecy. This angel readily saith, I am Gabriel, which signifies the power of God, or, the mighty one of God. He is Gabriel, who stands in the presence of God. "Though

16, 17. A religious and moral reformer, Elijah-like, he should be (Mal. 4:6, where the "turning of the people's heart to the Lord" is borrowed from I Kings 18:37). In both cases their success, though great, was partial—the nation was not gained. 17. before him—before "the Lord their God" (vs. 16). By comparing this with Malachi 3:1 and Isaiah 40:3, it is plainly "Jehovah" in the flesh of Messiah [CALVIN and OLSHAUSEN] before whom John was to go as a herald to announce His approach, and a pioneer to prepare His way. in the spirit—after the model. and power of Elias—not his miraculous power, for "John did no miracle" (John 10:41), but his power in "turning the heart," or with like success in his ministry. Both fell on degenerate times; both witnessed fearlessly for God; neither appeared much save in the direct exercise of their ministry; both were at the head of schools of disciples; the success of both was similar.

fathers to the children—taken literally, this denotes the restoration of parental fidelity [MEYER and others], the decay of which is the beginning of religious and social corruption—one prominent feature of the coming revival being put for the whole. But what follows, explanatory of this, rather suggests a figurative sense. If "the disobedient" be "the children," and to "the fathers" belongs "the wisdom of the just" [BENGEL], the meaning will be, "he shall bring back the ancient spirit of the nation into their degenerate children" [CALVIN, etc.]. So Elijah invoked "the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Israel," when seeking to "turn their heart back again" (I Kings 18:36, 37).

to make ready . . .—more clearly, "to make ready for the Lord a prepared people," to have in readiness a people prepared to welcome Him. Such preparation requires, in every age and every soul, an operation corresponding to the Baptist's ministry.

18. whereby . . .—Mary believed what was far harder without a sign. Abraham, though older, and doubtless Sarah, too, when the same promise was made to him, "staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief, but was strong in faith, giving glory to God." This was that in which Zacharias failed.

19. Gabriel—signifying "man of God," the same who appeared to Daniel at the time of incense (Dan. 9:21) and to Mary (vs. 26). stand, . . .—as his attendant (cf. I Kings 17:1).

ADAM CLARKE

16. Many of the children of Israel shall he turn. See this prediction fulfilled, chap. iii. 10-18.

17. He shall go before him. Jesus Christ, in the spirit and power of Elias; he shall resemble Elijah in his retired and austere manner of life, and in his zeal for the truth, reproving even princes for their crimes; compare 1 Kings xxi. 17-24 with Matt. xiv. 4. It was on these accounts that the Prophet Malachi, chap. iv. 6, had likened John to this prophet. See also Isa. xl. 3 and Mal. iv. 5-6.

To turn the hearts of the fathers. By a very expressive figure of speech Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and the rest of the patriarchs are represented here as having their hearts alienated from the Jews, their children, because of their unbelief and disobedience; but that the Baptist should so far succeed in converting them to the Lord their God that these holy men should again look upon them with delight and acknowledge them for their children.

The disobedient. Or "unbelieving," the persons who would no longer credit the predictions of the prophets relative to the manifestation of the Messiah. Unbelief and disobedience are so intimately connected that the same word in the sacred writings often serves for both.

19. I am Gabriel. This angel is mentioned in Dan. viii. 16; ix. 21. The original is exceedingly expressive; it is compounded of geburah and el, "the might of the strong God." An angel

MATTHEW HENRY

I am now talking with thee here, yet I stand in the presence of God. I am sent to speak to thee, sent on purpose to show thee these glad tidings, which, being so well worthy of all acceptation, thou oughtest to have received cheerfully."

(2) The angel stops his mouth indeed. "That thou mayest object no more, behold thou shalt be dumb, v. 20. If thou wilt have a sign for the support of thy faith, it shall be such a one as shall be also the punishment of thine unbelief; thou shalt not be able to speak till the day that these things shall be performed," v. 20. Thou shalt be both dumb and deaf; the same word signifies both, and it is plain that he lost his hearing as well as his speech, for his friends made signs to him (v. 62) as well as he to them, v. 22. God dealt justly with him, because he had objected against God's word. God dealt kindly with him, and very tenderly and graciously. For, First, Thus he prevented his speaking any more such distrustful unbelieving words. It is better not to speak at all than to speak wickedly. Secondly, Thus he confirmed his faith; and, by his being disabled to speak, he is enabled to think the better. Thirdly, Thus he was kept from divulging the vision, and boasting of it. Fourthly, It was a great mercy that God's words should be fulfilled in their season, notwithstanding his sinful distrust. He shall not be for ever dumb, but only till the day that these things shall be performed, and then thy lips shall be opened, that thy mouth may show forth God's praise.

V. The return of Zacharias to the people, and at length to his family, and the conception of this child of promise.

1. The people staid, expecting Zacharias to come out of the temple, because he was to pronounce the blessing upon them in the name of the Lord. Though he staid beyond the usual time, yet they did not hurry away without the blessing, but waited for him, marvelling that he tarried so long in the temple, and afraid lest something was amiss, v. 21.

2. When he came out, he was speechless, v. 22. He was now to have dismissed the congregation with a blessing, but was dumb and not able to do it.

3. He made a shift to give them to understand that he had seen a vision, for he beckoned to them, and remained speechless, v. 22. The Old Testament speaks by signs; it beckons to us, but remains speechless. It is the gospel that speaks to us articulately, and gives us a clear view of that which in the Old Testament was seen through a glass darkly.

4. He staid out the days of his ministration; for, his lot being to burn incense, he could do that, though he was dumb and deaf. When we cannot perform the service of God so well as we would, yet, if we perform it as well as we can, God will accept of us in it.

5. He then returned to his family, and his wife conceived, v. 23, 24. She hid herself five months, and kept in private. (1) Lest she should do herself any prejudice. (2) Lest she should contract any ceremonial pollution which might intrench upon the Nazariteship of her child. (3) Some think it was in an excess of modesty that she hid herself. Or, it was in token of her humility, that she might not seem to boast of the honour God had put upon her. (4) She hid herself for devotion. She gives this reason for her retirement, "For thus hath the Lord dealt with me; he hath taken away my reproach among men." Fruitfulness was looked upon to be so great a blessing among the Jews that it was a great reproach to be barren; and those who were so were concluded to be guilty of some great sin unknown. Now Elisabeth triumphs, that not only this reproach is taken away, but great glory is put upon her instead of it: Thus hath the Lord dealt with me in the days wherein he looked on me.

We have here notice given us of all that it was fit we should know concerning the incarnation and conception of our blessed Saviour. The same angel, Gabriel, that was employed in making known to Zacharias God's purpose concerning his son, is employed in this also; for in this, the same glorious work of redemption, which was begun in that, is carried on.

I. We have here an account given of the mother of our Lord.

1. Her name was Mary, the same name with Miriam, the sister of Moses and Aaron; the name signifies exalted.

2. She was a daughter of the royal family, lineally descended from David, and she herself and all her friends knew it, for she went under the title and character of the house of David. She was enabled by God's providence, and the care of the Jews, to pre-

21. waited—to receive from him the usual benediction (Num. 6:23-27). tarried so long—It was not usual to tarry long, lest it should be thought vengeance had stricken the people's representative for something wrong [LIGHTFOOT]. 22. speechless—dumb, and deaf also (see vs. 62).

with such a name was exceedingly proper for the occasion, as it pointed out that all-prevalent power by which the strong God could accomplish every purpose and subdue all things to himself. That stand in the presence of God. This is an allusion to the case of the prime minister of an Eastern monarch, who alone has access to his master at all times and is therefore said, in the Eastern phrase, "to see the presence," or "to be in the presence." From the allusion we may conceive the angel Gabriel to be in a state of high favor and trust before God.

20. Thou shalt be dumb. "Silent"; this translation is literal; the angel immediately explains it, You shall not be able to speak. Dumbness ordinarily proceeds from a natural imperfection or debility of the organs of speech. In this case there was no natural weakness or unfitness in those organs; but for his rash and unbelieving speech, silence is imposed upon him by the Lord, and he shall not be able to break it till the Power that has silenced him gives him again the permission to speak! Let those who are intemperate in the use of their tongues behold here the severity and mercy of the Lord: nine months' silence for one intemperate speech! Many, by giving way to the language of unbelief, have lost the language of praise and thanksgiving for months, if not years!

21. The people waited. The time spent in burning the incense was probably about half an hour, during which there was a profound silence as the people stood without engaged in mental prayer. To this there is an allusion in Rev. viii. 1-5. Zacharias had spent not only the time necessary for burning the incense, but also that which the discourse between him and the angel took up.

22. They perceived that he had seen a vision. As the sanctuary was separated from the court by a great veil, the people could not see what passed; but they understood this from Zacharias himself, who "made signs," or "nodded" unto them to that purpose. Signs are the only means by which a dumb man can convey his ideas to others.

23. As soon as the days of his ministration were accomplished. Each family of the priesthood officiated one whole week, 2 Kings xi. 17.

24. Hid herself five months. That she might have the fullest proof of the accomplishment of God's promise before she appeared in public, or spoke of her mercies.

25. To take away my reproach. As fruitfulness was a part of the promise of God to His people, Gen. xvii. 6, and children, on this account, being considered as a particular blessing from Heaven, Exod. xxiii. 26; Lev. xxvi. 9; Ps. cxxvii. 3, so barrenness was considered among the Jews as a reproach, and a token of the disapprobation of the Lord, 1 Sam. i. 6.

MATTHEW HENRY

serve their genealogies, to make it out, and as long as the promise of the Messiah was to be fulfilled it was worth keeping; but for those now, who are brought low in the world, to have descended from persons of honour, is not worth mentioning.

3. She was a virgin, but espoused to one of the same royal stock, like her, however, of low estate. His name was Joseph; he also was of the house of David, Matt. i. 20. Christ's mother was a virgin. But he was born of a virgin espoused, made up to be married, and contracted, to put honour upon the married state.

4. She lived in Nazareth, a city of Galilee, a remote corner of the country, and in no reputation for religion or learning, but which bordered upon the heathen, and therefore was called Galilee of the Gentiles. The angel was sent to her from Nazareth. No distance or disadvantage of place shall be a prejudice to those for whom God has favours in store.

II. The address of the angel to her, v. 28. He surprised her with this salutation, Hail, thou that art highly favoured. This was intended to raise in her, 1. A value for herself. In some, who like Mary pore only on their low estate, there is occasion for it. 2. An expectation of great news, not from abroad, but from above. Hail, thou, χαῖρε—rejoice thou; it was the usual form of salutation.

(1) She is dignified: "Thou art highly favoured. God, in his choice of thee to be the mother of the Messiah, has put an honour upon thee peculiar to thyself."

(2) She has the presence of God with her: "The Lord is with thee." Nothing is to be despaired of, not the performance of any service, not the obtaining of any favour, though ever so great, if we have God with us.

(3) She has the blessing of God upon her: "Blessed art thou among women; not only thou shalt be accounted so by men, but thou shalt be so. Thou that art so highly favoured in this instance mayest expect in other things to be blessed." She explains this herself (v. 48), All generations shall call me blessed.

III. The consternation she was in, upon this address, v. 29. When she saw him she is confounded at it, as not conscious to herself of anything that either merited or promised such great things; and she cast in her mind what manner of salutation this should be. Was it from heaven or of men? Her thoughtfulness upon this occasion gives a very useful intimation to young people of her sex, when addresses are made to them, to consider and cast in their minds what manner of salutations they are.

IV. The message itself which the angel had to deliver to her. He went on with his errand, v. 30. To what he had said she made no reply; he therefore confirms it: "Fear not, Mary, thou hast found favour with God more than thou thinkest of, as there are many who think they are more favoured of God than really they are." Doth God favour thee? Is he for thee? No matter who is against thee.

1. Though she is a virgin, she shall have the honour of being a mother: "Thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a son, thou shalt call his name Jesus," v. 31.

2. Though she lives in poverty and obscurity, yet she shall have the honour to be the mother of the Messiah; her son shall be named Jesus—a Saviour. He will be very nearly allied to the upper world. He shall be great, truly great, for he shall be called the Son of the Highest. He shall be called, and not miscalled, the Son of the Highest. Those who are the children of God, are truly great, and therefore are concerned to be very good, 1 John iii. 1, 2. He will be very highly preferred in the lower world; for, though appearing in the form of a servant, yet the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, v. 32. His people will not give him that throne, but the Lord God shall give him a right to rule them, and set him as his king upon the holy hill of Zion. He assures her, (1) That his kingdom shall be spiritual: he shall reign over the house of Jacob. It must therefore be a spiritual kingdom, the house of Israel according to promise, that he must rule over. (2) That it shall be eternal: he shall reign for ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end. Other crowns endure not to every generation, but Christ's doth.

V. The further information given her, upon her enquiry.

1. It is a just enquiry which she makes: "How shall this be?" v. 34. She knew that the Messiah must be born of a virgin; and, if she must be his mother, she desires to know how. This was not the language of her distrust, but of a desire to be further instructed.

2. It is a satisfactory answer that is given to it, v. 25. (1) She shall conceive by the power of the Holy Ghost. A divine power will undertake it, the Joseph, of the house of David—(See on Matthew 1: 16).

28. highly favoured—a word only once used elsewhere (Eph. 1:6, "made accepted"): cf. vs. 30, "Thou hast found favour with God." The mistake of the Vulgate's rendering, "full of grace," has been taken abundant advantage of by the Romish Church. As the mother of our Lord, she was the most "blessed among women" in external distinction; but let them listen to the Lord's own words. "Nay, rather blessed are they that hear the word of God and keep it." (See on ch. 11:27.)

A. T. ROBERTSON:

30. "Favor" (charin). Grace. Same root as chairo (rejoice) and charitoo in verse 28. To find favor is a common Old Testament phrase. Charis is a very ancient and common word with a variety of applied meanings. They all come from the notion of sweetness, charm, loveliness, joy, delight, like words of grace (Luke 4:22), growing grace (Eph. 4:29), with grace (Col. 4:6). The notion of kindness is in it also, especially of God toward men as here. It is a favorite word for Christianity, the Gospel of the grace of God (Acts 20:24) in contrast with law or works (John1:16). Gratitude is expressed also (Luke 6:32), especially to God (Rom. 6:17). "With God" (para toi theoi). Beside God.

31. The angel purposely conforms his language to Isaiah's famous prophecy (ch. 7:14) [CALVIN]. 32, 33. This is but an echo of the sublime prediction in Isaiah 9:6, 7.

34. How . . .—not the unbelief of Zacharias, "Whereby shall I know this?" but, taking the fact for granted, "How is it to be, so contrary to the unbroken law of human birth?" Instead of reproof, therefore, her question is answered in mysterious detail. 35. Holy Ghost—(See on Matthew 1:18). power of the highest—the immediate energy of the Godhead conveyed by the Holy Ghost.

ADAM CLARKE

26. A city of Galilee. As Joseph and Mary were both of the family of David, the patrimonial estate of which lay in Bethlehem, it seems as if the family residence should have been in that city, and not in Nazareth; for we find that, even after the return from the Captivity, the several families went to reside in these cities to which they originally belonged. See Neh. xi. 3. But it is probable that the Holy Family removed to Galilee for fear of exciting the jealousy of Herod, who had usurped that throne to which they had an indisputable right.

28. And the angel came in unto her. Some think that all this business was transacted in a vision, and that there was no personal appearance of the angel. When divine visions were given, they are announced as such in the sacred writings; nor can we with safety attribute anything to a vision where a divine communication is made, unless it be specified as such in the text. Hail. Analogous to, "Peace be to you"—May you enjoy all possible blessings! Highly favoured. As being chosen in preference to all the women upon earth to be the mother of the Messiah. Not the "mother of God," for that is blasphemy. The Lord is with thee. You are about to receive the most convincing proofs of God's peculiar favor toward you. Blessed art thou among women. That is, you are favored beyond all others.

29. She was troubled at his saying. The glorious appearance of the heavenly messenger filled her with amazement, and she was puzzled to find out the purport of his speech.

31. Thou . . . shalt call his name JESUS. See on Matt. i. 20-21; here; chap. ii. 21; and John i. 29.

33. The house of Jacob. All who belong to the twelve tribes, the whole Israelitish people.

34. Seeing I know not a man. Or "husband." As she was only contracted to Joseph, and not as yet married, she knew that this conception could not have yet taken place; and she modestly inquires by what means the promise of the angel is to be fulfilled in order to regulate her conduct accordingly.

35. The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee. This conception shall take place suddenly, and the Holy Spirit himself shall be the grand Operator. The power, the miracle-working power, of the Highest shall overshadow thee, to accomplish this purpose, and to protect you from danger. As there is a plain allusion to the Spirit of God brooding over the face of the waters, to render them prolific, Gen. i. 2, I am the more firmly established in the opinion advanced on Matt. i. 20, that the rudiments of the human nature of Christ were a real creation in the womb of the Virgin, by the energy of the Spirit of God. Therefore also that holy thing (or Person) . . . shall be called the Son of God. We may plainly perceive here that the angel does not give the appellation of Son of God to the divine nature of Christ, but to that holy person or thing which was to be born of the Virgin by the energy of the Holy Spirit. The divine nature could not be born of the Virgin; the human nature was born of her. The divine nature had no beginning; it was God manifested in the flesh, 1 Tim. iii. 16; it was that Word which, being in the beginning (from eternity) with God, John i. 2, was afterwards made flesh (became manifest in human nature), and tabernacled among us, John i. 14. Of this divine nature the angel does not particularly speak here, but of the tabernacle or shrine which God was now preparing for it, viz., the holy thing that was to be born of the Virgin. Two natures must ever be distinguished in Christ: the human nature, in reference to which He is the Son of God and inferior to Him, Mark xiii. 32; John v. 19; xiv. 28; and the divine nature, power of the Holy Ghost himself.

(2) She must ask no questions concerning the way and manner how it shall be wrought; for the Holy Ghost, as the power of the Highest, shall overshadow her. The formation of every babe in the womb, and the entrance of the spirit of life into it, is a mystery in nature. We were made in secret. Much more was the formation of the child Jesus a mystery.

(3) The child she shall conceive is a holy thing, and therefore must not be conceived by ordinary generation. He is spoken of emphatically, That Holy Thing, such as never was; and he shall be called the Son of God. His human nature must be so produced, as it was fit that should be which was to be taken into union with the divine nature.

3. It was a further encouragement to her faith to be told that her cousin Elisabeth, though stricken in years, was with child, v. 36. Here is an age of wonders beginning. This is the sixth month with her that was called barren. The angel assures Mary of this, to encourage her faith, and concludes with that great truth, of undoubted certainty and universal use, For with God nothing shall be impossible (v. 37), and, if nothing, then not this. No word of God must be incredible to us, as long as no work of God is impossible to him.

VI. Her acquiescence in the will of God concerning her, v. 38. She owns herself, 1. A believing subject to the divine authority: "Behold, the handmaid of the Lord. Lord, I am at thy service." She leaves the issue with God, and submits entirely to his will. 2. A believing expectant of the divine favour. She is not only content that it should be so, but humbly desires that it may be so: Be it unto me according to thy word. We must, as Mary here, guide our desires by the word of God, and ground our hopes upon it. Be it unto me according to thy word; just so, and no otherwise.

Hereupon, the angel departed from her; having completed the errand he was sent upon, he returned.

Verses 39-56

We have here an interview between the two happy mothers, Elisabeth and Mary. Sometimes it may prove a better piece of service than we think to bring good people together, to compare notes.

I. The visit which Mary made to Elisabeth, v. 39. She arose, and left her affairs, to attend this greater matter: in those days, at that time. She went with care, diligence, and expedition. She went to a city of Judah in the hill-country; thither Mary hastened, though it was a long journey, some scores of miles.

It is generally supposed that she went thither for the confirming of her faith, and to rejoice with her sister-favourite. And, besides, she went thither, perhaps, that she might be more retired from company, or else might have more agreeable company than she could have in Nazareth. We may suppose that she did not acquaint any of her neighbours at Nazareth with the message she had received from heaven, yet longed to talk over a thing she had a thousand times thought over, and knew no person in the world with whom she could freely converse concerning it but her cousin Elisabeth. It is very beneficial and comfortable for those that have a good work of grace begun in their souls, to consult those who are in the same case. They will find that, as in water face answers to face, so doth the heart of man to man, of Christian to Christian.

II. The meeting between Mary and Elisabeth. Mary entered into the house of Zacharias. She saluted Elisabeth (v. 40), told her that she was come to make her visit, and rejoice with her in her joy.

1. The babe leaped in her womb, v. 41. It is very probable that she had often felt the child stir; but this was a more than ordinary motion of the child, which alarmed her to expect something very extraordinary. The babe leaped as it were to give a signal to his mother that he was now at hand whose forerunner he was to be.

2. Elisabeth was herself filled with the Holy Ghost, or a Spirit of prophecy, by which she was given to understand that the Messiah was at hand. The uncommon motion of the babe in her womb was a token of the extraordinary emotion of her spirit under a divine impulse.

III. The welcome which Elisabeth, by the Spirit of prophecy, gave to Mary, the mother of our Lord.

1. She congratulates her on her honour. She spoke with a loud voice. She said, Blessed art thou among women, the same word that the angel had said, v. 28. But Elisabeth adds a reason, Therefore blessed art thou because blessed is the fruit of thy womb. Elisabeth was the wife of a priest, and in years, yet she grudges not that her kinswoman, who was many years younger than she, should have the honour of conceiving in her virginity, and being the mother of the Messiah, overshadow—a word suggesting how gentle, while yet efficacious, would be this Power [BENGEL]; and its mysterious secrecy, withdrawn, as if by a cloud, from human scrutiny [CALVIN]. that holy thing born of thee—that holy Offspring of thine. therefore . . . Son of God—That Christ is the Son of God in His divine and eternal nature is clear from all the New Testament; yet here we see that Sonship efflorescing into human and palpable manifestation by His being born, through "the power of the Highest," an Infant of days. We must neither think of a double Sonship, as some do, harshly and without all ground, nor deny what is here plainly expressed, the connection between His human birth and His proper personal Sonship. 36. thy cousin—"relative," but how near the word says not. conceived . . .—This was to Mary an unsought sign, in reward of her faith. 37. For . . .—referring to what was said by the angel to Abraham in like case (Gen. 18:14), to strengthen her faith. 38. Marvellous faith in such circumstances!

39-56. VISIT OF MARY TO ELISABETH. 39. hill country—the mountainous tract running along the middle of Judea, from north to south [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. with haste—transported with the announcement to herself and with the tidings, now first made known to her, of Elisabeth's condition. a city of Juda—probably Hebron (see Josh. 20:7; 21:11).

40. saluted Elisabeth—now returned from her seclusion (vs. 24). 41. babe leaped—From vs. 44 it is plain that this maternal sensation was something extraordinary—a sympathetic emotion of the unconscious babe, at the presence of the mother of his Lord.

which was from eternity, and equal to God, John i. 1; x. 30; Rom. ix. 5; Col. i. 16-18. It is true that to Jesus the Christ, as He appeared among men, every characteristic of the divine nature is sometimes attributed without appearing to make any distinction between the divine and human natures. But is there any part of the Scriptures in which it is plainly said that the divine nature of Jesus was the Son of God? Here, I trust, I may be permitted to say, with all due respect for those who differ from me, that the doctrine of the eternal sonship of Christ is in my opinion anti-scriptural and highly dangerous.

36. Thy cousin Elisabeth. "Thy kinswoman." As Elisabeth was of the tribe of Levi, v. 5, and Mary of the tribe of Judah, they could not be relatives but by the mother's side. She hath also conceived. And this is wrought by the same power and energy through which you shall conceive. Thus God has given you a proof and pledge, in what He has done for Elisabeth, of what He will do for you; therefore, have faith in God. Who was called barren. It is probable that Elisabeth got this appellative by way of reproach; or to distinguish her from some other Elisabeth, also well-known, who had been blessed with children. Perhaps this is the reproach which Elisabeth speaks of in v. 25, her common name among men, among the people who knew her, being "Elisabeth the barren."

37. For with God nothing shall be impossible. Words of the very same import with those spoken by the Lord to Sarah, when He foretold the birth of Isaac, Gen. xviii. 14, "Is any thing too hard for the Lord?" As there can be no doubt that Mary perceived this allusion to the promise and birth of Isaac, so she must have had her faith considerably strengthened by reflecting on the intervention of God in that case.

38. Behold the handmaid of the Lord. I fully credit what thou sayest, and am perfectly ready to obey thy commands, and to accomplish all the purposes of thy grace concerning me. It appears that at the instant of this act of faith, and purposed obedience, the conception of the immaculate humanity of Jesus took place; and it was done unto her according to his word.

39. In those days. As soon as she could conveniently fit herself out for the journey. With haste. This probably refers to nothing else than the earnestness of her mind to visit her relative Elisabeth, and to see what the Lord had wrought for her.

41. Elisabeth was filled with the Holy Ghost. This seems to have been the accomplishment of the promise made by the angel, v. 15, "He shall be filled with the Holy Ghost, even from his mother's womb." The mother is filled with the Holy Spirit, and the child in her womb becomes sensible of the divine influence.

42. Blessed art thou among women. Repeating the words of the angel, v. 28, of which she had probably been informed by the holy Virgin, in the present interview.

MATTHEW HENRY

whereas the honour put upon her was much less; she rejoices in it. While we cannot but own that we are more favoured of God than we deserve, let us by no means envy that others are more highly favoured than we are.

2. She acknowledges her condescension, in making her this visit (v. 43): Whence is this to me, that the mother of my Lord should come to me? She calls the virgin Mary the mother of her Lord. She not only bids her welcome to her house, but reckons this visit a great favour, which she thought herself unworthy of. Whence is this to me? Those that are filled with the Holy Ghost have low thoughts of their own merits, and high thoughts of God's favours.

3. She acquaints her with the concurrence of the babe in her womb, in this welcome to her (v. 44): "As soon as the voice of thy salutation sounded in my ears, not only my heart leaped for joy, but the babe in my womb did so too." He leaped as it were for joy that the Messiah, whose harbinger he was to be, would himself come so soon after him. This would serve very much to strengthen the faith of the virgin, that there were such assurances as these given to others.

4. She commends her faith, and encourages it (v. 45): Blessed is she that believed. Believing souls are blessed souls. They are blessed who believe the word of God, for that word will not fail them; there shall, without doubt, be a performance of those things which are told her from the Lord. The faithfulness of God is the blessedness of the faith of the saints. Those that have experienced the performance of God's promises themselves should encourage others to hope that he will be as good as his word to them also.

IV. Mary's song of praise, upon this occasion. Elisabeth's prophecy was an echo to the virgin Mary's salutation, and this song is yet a stronger echo to that prophecy. We may suppose the blessed virgin to come in, very much fatigued with her journey; yet she forgets that, and is inspired with new life, and vigour, and joy, upon the confirmation she here meets with of her faith.

1. Here are the expressions of joy and praise, and God alone the object of the praise and centre of the joy. Observe how Mary here speaks of God.

(1) With great reverence of him, as the Lord: "My soul doth magnify the Lord." Those, and those only, are advanced in mercy, who are thereby brought to think the more highly and honourably of God. The more honour God has any way put upon us, the more honour we must study to give to him; and then only are we accepted in magnifying the Lord, when our souls magnify him, and all that is within us. Praising work must be soul work.

(2) With great complacency in him as her Saviour: My spirit rejoiceth in God my Saviour. This seems to have reference to the Messiah, whom she was to be the mother of. She calls him God her Saviour; for the angel had told her that he should be the Son of the Highest, and that his name should be Jesus, a Saviour; this she fastened upon, with application to herself: He is God my Saviour. Even the mother of our Lord had need of an interest in him as her Saviour, and would have been undone without it.

2. Here are just causes assigned for this joy and praise.

(1) Upon her own account, v. 48, 49. Her spirit rejoiced in the Lord, because of the kind things he had done for her. He has regarded the low estate of his handmaiden. "He has chosen me to this honour, notwithstanding my great meanness, poverty, and obscurity." And, if God regards her low estate, he not only thereby gives a specimen of his favour to the whole race of mankind, whom he remembers in their low estate, but secures a lasting honour to her (for such the honour is that God bestows, honour that fades not away): "From henceforth all generations shall call me blessed." Elisabeth had once and again called her blessed: "But that is not all," saith she, "all generations of Gentiles as well as Jews shall call me so." Her soul magnifies the Lord (v. 49): He that is mighty has done to me great things. A great thing indeed, that a virgin should conceive. A great thing indeed, that Messiah should now at length be born. It is the power of the Highest that appears in this. She adds, and holy is his name. He that is mighty, even he whose name is holy, has done to me great things. Glorious things may be expected from him that is both mighty and holy; who can do everything, and will do everything well and for the best.

(2) Upon the account of others. The virgin Mary, as the mother of the Messiah, is become a kind of public person, and therefore looks abroad, looks about her, looks before her, and takes notice of God's various dealings with the children of men, v. 50, &c. It is a certain truth that God has mercy in store,

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

42-44. What beautiful superiority to envy have we here! High as was the distinction conferred upon herself, Elisabeth loses sight of it altogether, in presence of one more honored still; upon whom, with her unborn Babe, in an ecstasy of inspiration, she pronounces a benediction, feeling it to be a wonder unaccountable that the mother of her Lord should come to her." "Turn this as we will, we shall never be able to see the propriety of calling an unborn child "Lord," but by supposing Elisabeth, like the prophets of old, enlightened to perceive the Messiah's Divine nature" [OLSHAUSEN]. "The mother of my Lord"—but not "My Lady" (cf. ch. 20:42; John 20:28) [BENGEL].

45. An additional benediction on the Virgin for her implicit faith, in tacit and delicate contrast with her own husband. for . . .—rather, as in the margin, "that." 46-55. A magnificent canticle, in which the strain of Hannah's ancient song, in like circumstances, is caught up, and just slightly modified and sublimed. Is it unnatural to suppose that the spirit of the blessed Virgin had been drawn beforehand into mysterious sympathy with the ideas and the tone of this hymn, so that when the life and fire of inspiration penetrated her whole soul it spontaneously swept the chorus of this song, enriching the Hymnal of the Church with that spirit-stirring canticle which has resounded ever since from its temple walls? In both songs, those holy women, filled with wonder to behold "the proud, the mighty, the rich," passed by, and, in their persons the lowliest chosen to usher in the greatest events, sing of this as no capricious movement, but a great law of the kingdom of God, by which He delights to "put down the mighty from their seats and exalt them of low degree." In both songs the strain dies away on CHRIST; in Hannah's under the name of "Jehovah's King"—to whom, through all His line, from David onwards to Himself, He will "give strength"; His "Anointed," whose horn He will exalt (I Sam. 2:10); in the Virgin's song, it is as the "Help" promised to Israel by all the prophets. My soul . . . my spirit—"all that is within me" (Ps. 103:1). 47. my Saviour—Mary, poor heart, never dreamt, we see, of her own "immaculate conception"—in the offensive language of the Romanists—any more than of her own immaculate life.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

There is a deep truth there. God's voice is made more sure to our weakness when it is echoed by human lips, and our inmost hopes attain substance when they are shared and spoken by another. We need not attribute to the maiden from Nazareth philosophical accuracy when she speaks of her "soul" and "spirit." Her first words are a burst of rapturous and wondering praise, in which the full heart runs over. Silence is impossible, and speech a relief. They are not to be construed with the microscopic accuracy fit to be applied to a treatise on psychology. "All that is within" her praises and is glad. She does not think so much of the stupendous fact as of her own meekly exultant heart, and of God, to whom its outgoings turn. There are moods in which the devout soul dwells on its own calm blessedness and on God, its source, more directly than on the gift which brings it.

Note the twofold act—magnifying and rejoicing. We magnify God when we take into our vision some fragment more of the complete circle of His essential greatness, or when, by our means, our fellows are helped to do so. The intended effect of all His dealings is that we should think more nobly—that is, more worthily—of Him. The fuller knowledge of His friendly greatness leads to joy in Him which makes the spirit bound as in a dance—for such is the meaning of the word "rejoice"—and which yet is calm and deep. Note the double name of God—Lord and Savior. Mary bows in lowly obedience, and looks up in as lowly, conscious need of deliverance, and beholding in God both His majesty and His grace, magnifies and exults at once.—Expositions of Holy Scripture

43. The mother of my Lord. The prophetic spirit, which appears to have overshadowed Elisabeth, gave her a clear understanding in the mystery of the birth of the promised Messiah.

45. Blessed is she that believed; for there shall be. Or, "Blessed is she who hath believed that there shall be." This I believe to be the proper arrangement of the passage, and is thus noticed in the marginal reading. Faith is here represented as the foundation of true happiness, because it receives the fulfillment of God's promises.

46. And Mary said. Two copies of the Itala, and some books mentioned by Origen, give this song to Elisabeth. It is a counterpart of the song of Hannah, as related in 1 Sam. ii. 1-10. My soul doth magnify the Lord. The verb signifies "to celebrate with words, to extol with praises." This is the only way in which God can be magnified, or made great; for, strictly speaking, nothing can be added to God, for He is infinite and eternal. Therefore the way to magnify Him is to show forth and celebrate those acts in which He has manifested His greatness.

47. My spirit hath rejoiced. "Exulted." These words are uncommonly emphatical—they show that Mary's whole soul was filled with the divine influence, and wrapped up in God.

48. He hath regarded. "Looked favorably." In the most tender and compassionate manner He has visited me in my humiliation, drawing the reasons of His conduct, not from any excellence in me, but from His own eternal kindness and love. All generations shall call me blessed. This was the character by which alone she wished to be known, viz., "The blessed or happy virgin." What dishonor do those do to this holy woman who give her names and characters which her pure soul would abhor, and which properly belong to God, her Saviour! By her votaries she is addressed as "Queen of Heaven," "Mother of God," titles both absurd and blasphemous.

49. He that is mighty hath done to me great things! Or "miracles." Holy is his name. Probably the word which Mary used was chesed, which though we sometimes translate holy, see Ps. lxxxvi. 2; cxlv. 17, yet the proper meaning is "abundant goodness, exuberant kindness"; and this well agrees with the following clause.

mercy in reserve. But never did this appear so as in sending his Son into the world to save us (v. 50): His mercy is on them that fear him; it has always been so. But he hath manifested this mercy, so as never before, in sending his Son to bring in an everlasting righteousness, and work out an everlasting salvation, for them that fear him, and this from generation to generation; for there are gospel privileges transmitted by entail, and intended for perpetuity. In him mercy is settled upon all that fear God, pardoning mercy, healing mercy, accepting mercy, crowning mercy, from generation to generation, while the world stands. It has been a common observation that God in his providence puts contempt upon the haughty and honour upon the humble. As God had, with his mercy to her, shown himself mighty also (v. 48, 49), so he had, with his mercy on them that fear him, shown strength likewise with his arm. In the course of his providence, it is his usual method to cross the expectations of men. Proud men expect to carry all before them, but he scatters them in the imagination of their hearts, and brings them low. The mighty think to secure themselves by might in their seats, but he puts them down, while, on the other hand, those of low degree are wonderfully exalted. This observation concerning honour holds likewise concerning riches; many who were so poor that they had not bread for themselves and their families, by some surprising turn of Providence in favour of them, come to be filled with good things; while, on the other hand, those who were rich, are strangely impoverished, and sent away empty. God takes a pleasure in disappointing their expectations who promise themselves great things in the world, and in out-doing the expectations of those who promise themselves but a little. As a good God, it is his glory to exalt those who humble themselves, and to speak comfort to those who fear before him. The gospel grace is shown

1. In the spiritual honours it dispenses. When the proud Pharisees were rejected, and Publicans and sinners went into the kingdom of heaven before them,—when the Jews, who followed after the law of righteousness, did not attain it, and the Gentiles, who never thought of it, attained to righteousness (Rom. ix. 30, 31),—when God chose not the wise men after the flesh, not the mighty, or the noble, to preach the gospel, and plant Christianity in the world, but the foolish and weak things of the world, and things that were despised (1 Cor. i. 26, 27)—then he scattered the proud, and put down the mighty, but exalted them of low degree.

2. In the spiritual riches it dispenses, v. 53. (1) Those who see their need of Christ, he fills with good things, with the best things; he gives liberally to them, and they are abundantly satisfied. Those who are weary and heavy-laden shall find rest with Christ, and those who thirst are called to come to him and drink. (2) Those who are rich, who, like Laodicea, think they have need of nothing, are full of themselves, and think they have a sufficiency in themselves, those he sends away from his door; he sends them empty away; they come full of self, and are sent away empty of Christ.

It was always expected that the Messiah should be the strength and glory of his people Israel, and so he is in a peculiar manner (v. 54): He hath helped his servant Israel. He hath taken them by the hand, and helped them up that were fallen and could not help themselves. The sending of the Messiah, on whom help was laid for poor sinners, was the greatest kindness that could be done and that which magnifies it is,

First, That it is in remembrance of his mercy. While this blessing was deferred, his people were often ready to ask, Has God forgotten to be gracious? But now he made it appear that he had not forgotten, but remembered, his mercy. He remembered the days of old.

Secondly, That it is in performance of his promise. It is a mercy not only designed, but declared (v. 55); it was what he spoke to our fathers, and particularly to Abraham, that in his seed all the families of the earth shall be blessed with the blessings that are for ever. What God hath spoken he will perform; what he hath spoken to the fathers will be performed to their seed.

Lastly, Mary's return to Nazareth (v. 56), after she had continued with Elisabeth about three months. Those in whose hearts Christ is formed take more delight than they used to do in sitting alone and keeping silence.

Verses 57–66

I. The birth of John Baptist, v. 57. Elisabeth's full time came, that she should be delivered, and then she brought forth a son. Promised mercies are to be

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

ALBERT BARNES:

51. "Hath showed strength with his arm." The "arm" is the symbol of strength. The expression in this and the subsequent verses has no particular reference to his mercy to Mary. From a contemplation of his goodness to her, she enlarges her views to a contemplation of his goodness and power in general, and to a celebration of the praises to God for all that he has done to all men. This is the nature of true piety. It does not terminate in thinking of God's mercy toward ourselves. It thinks of others, and praises God that others also are made partakers of His mercy, and that His goodness is manifested to all His works. "He scattereth the proud." He hath often done it in time of battle and war. When the proud Assyrian, Egyptian, or Babylonian had come against the people of God, He had often scattered them and driven away their armies. "In the imagination of their hearts." Those who were lifted up or exalted in their own view. Those who thought themselves to be superior to other men.

52. "Hath put down the mighty." The "mighty" here denotes princes, kings, or conquerors (see Isa. 14:2-14). Their "seats." Their "thrones," or the places where they sat in pomp and power. "Exalted them." Raised them up, or placed them in the seats of those who had been removed. "Low degree." Low or humble birth and condition in life. This probably has reference to the case of her ancestor David. Mary was celebrating the mercies of God to herself, to her family, and of course to her ancestors. It was natural to allude to that great event in their history when Saul was overcome in battle, and when David was taken from the sheepfold and placed on the throne. The origin of illustrious families is often obscure. Men are often raised by industry, talent, and the favor of God, from very humble stations—from the farm or mechanic's shop—to places of great trust in the church and state. They who are thus elevated, if imbued with right feelings, will not despise their former employments nor their former companions, nor will they esteem their parents or friends the less because they still remain in the same rank in life. No conduct is more odious and unchristian than to be ashamed of our birth or the humble circumstances of our friends. —Popular Commentary

54. holpen—Cf. Psalm 89:19, "I have laid help on One that is mighty." 55. As he spake to our fathers—The sense requires this clause to be read as a parenthesis. (Cf. Mic. 7:20; Ps. 98:3.) for ever—the perpetuity of Messiah's kingdom, as expressly promised by the angel (vs. 33). 56. abode with her about three months—What an honored roof was that which, for such a period, overarched these cousins! and yet not a trace of it is now to be seen, while the progeny of those two women—the one but the honored pioneer of the other—have made the world new. returned to her own house—at Nazareth, after which took place what is recorded in Matthew 1:18-25.

57-80. BIRTH AND CIRCUMCISION OF JOHN—SONG OF ZACHARIAS, AND PROGRESS OF THE CHILD.

ADAM CLARKE

50. His mercy is on them that fear him. His exuberant kindness manifests itself in acts of mercy to all those who fear or reverence His name; and this is continued from generation to generation, because He is abundant in goodness, and because He delights in mercy. This is a noble, becoming, and just character of the God of the Christians; a Being who delights in the salvation and happiness of all His creatures, because His name is mercy, and His nature love.

51. He hath shewed strength. Or, "He hath gained the victory." The word is used for "victory," by Homer, Hesiod, Sophocles, Euripides, and others. With his arm. Grotius has well observed that God's efficacy is represented by His finger, His great power by His hand, and His omnipotence by His arm. The plague of lice was the "finger" of God, Exod. vii. 18. The plagues in general were wrought by His "hand," Exod. iii. 20. And the destruction of Pharaoh's host in the Red Sea, which was effected by the omnipotence of God, is called the act of His "arm." Exod. xv. 16. He hath scattered. "Hath scattered abroad"; as a whirlwind scatters dust and chaff. The proud. Or "haughty"—the haughty men, who wish to be noticed in preference to all others, and feel sovereign contempt for all but themselves. These God scatters abroad—instead of being in His sight, as in their own, the most excellent of the earth, He treats them as straw, stubble, chaff, and dust. In the imagination of their hearts. While they are forming their insolent, proud, and oppressive projects—laying their plans, and imagining that accomplishment and success are waiting at their right hand—the whirlwind of God's displeasure blows, and they and their machinations are dissipated together.

52. He hath put down the mighty from their seats. Or, "He hath taken down potentates from their thrones." This probably alludes to the removal of Saul from the throne of Israel, and the establishment of the kingdom in the person and family of David. And as Mary spoke prophetically, this saying may also allude to the destruction of the kingdom of Satan and his allies, and the final prevalence of the kingdom of Christ.

53. Filled the hungry . . . the rich he hath sent empty away. God is here represented under the notion of a Person of unbounded benevolence, who is daily feeding multitudes at His gates. The poor man comes through a sense of his want to get his daily support, and God feeds him; the rich man comes through the lust of gain, to get more added to his abundance, and God sends him away empty—not only gives him nothing more, but often deprives him of that which he has, because he has not improved it to the honor of the Giver.

54. He hath holpen [supported] his servant Israel. Israel is here represented as falling, and the Lord comes speedily in and props him up. The house of David was now ready to fall and rise no more; Jesus, being born of the very last branch of the regal line, revived the family, and restored the dominion. In remembrance of his mercy. By mercy, the covenant which God made with Abraham, Gen. xv. 18, as intended; which covenant proceeded from God's eternal mercy, as in it salvation was promised to all the nations of the earth. See Gen. xvii. 19 and xxii. 18; and this promise was, one form or other, given to all the fathers, v. 55. This song properly consists of three parts. (1) In the first part Mary praises God for what He had done for herself, vv. 46-50. (2) In the second, she praises Him for what He had done, and would do, against the oppressors of His people, vv. 51-53. (3) In the third, she praises Him for what He had done, and would do, for His Church, vv. 53-56.

56. And Mary abode with her about three months. According to some, the departure of Mary from Hebron must have been but a few days before the birth of John, as nine months had now elapsed since Elisabeth's conception; see v. 36.

57. Now Elisabeth's full time came. But, according to others, we are to understand the three months of Mary's visit as preceding the expected when the full time for them is come, and not before.

II. The great joy that was among all the relations of the family, upon this extraordinary occasion (v. 58): Her neighbours and her cousins heard of it. Now these here discovered, 1. A pious regard to God. They acknowledged that the Lord had magnified his mercy to her, so the word is. Many things concurred to make the mercy great—that she had been long barren, was now old, but especially that the child should be great in the sight of the Lord. 2. A friendly regard to Elisabeth. When she rejoiced, they rejoiced with her. We ought to take pleasure in the prosperity of our neighbours and friends, and to be thankful to God for their comforts as for our own.

III. The dispute that was among them concerning the naming him (v. 59): On the eighth day they came together, to circumcise the child. They that rejoiced in the birth of the child came together to the circumcising of him. The greatest comfort we can take in our children is in giving them up to God. The baptism of our children should be more our joy than their birth.

Now it was the custom, when they circumcised their children, to name them, and it is not unfit that they should be left nameless till they are by name given up to God.

1. Some proposed that he should be called by his father's name, Zacharias. They intended hereby to do honour to the father, who was not likely to have another child.

2. The mother opposed it, and would have him called John; having learned that God appointed this to be his name (v. 60): He shall be called Johanan—Gracious, because he shall introduce the gospel of Christ, wherein God's grace shines more brightly than ever.

3. The relations objected against that (v. 61): "There is none of thy kindred that is called by that name; and therefore let him have the name of some of his kindred."

4. They appealed to the father, for it was his office to name the child, v. 62. They made signs to him, by which it appears that he was deaf as well as dumb. However, they gave him to understand what the dispute was which he only could determine; whereupon he made signs to them to give him a table-book. He wrote these words, His name is John, v. 63. Not, "It shall be so," or, "I would have it so," but, "It is so." The matter is determined already. When Zacharias could not speak, he wrote. When ministers have their mouths stopped, that they cannot preach, yet they may be doing good as long as they have not their hands tied, that they cannot write. Zacharias's pitching upon the same name that Elisabeth had chosen was a great surprise to the company: They marvelled all.

5. He thereupon recovered the use of his speech (v. 64): His mouth was opened immediately. The time prefixed for his being silenced was till the day that these things shall be fulfilled, v. 20. That time was now expired, whereupon the restraint was taken off, and God gave him the opening of the mouth again. Infidelity closed his mouth, and now believing opens it again. His mouth was opened, and he spake, and praised God. When God opens our lips, our mouths must show forth his praise. As good be without our speech as not use it in praising God.

6. These things were told all the country over, to the great amazement of all that heard them, v. 65, 66. We are here told, (1) That these sayings were discoursed of, and were the common talk all about the hill-country of Judæa. (2) That most people who heard of these things were put into consternation by them: Fear came on all them that dwelt round about there. (3) It raised the expectations of people concerning this child. They laid up these presages in their hearts. What we hear, that may be of use to us, we should treasure up, that we may be able to bring forth, for the benefit of others, things new and old, and may be able to look back and to say, "It was what we might expect." They said within themselves, and said among themselves, "What manner of child shall this be? What will be the fruit when these are the buds?"

Lastly, It is said, The hand of the Lord was with him; that is, he was taken under the special protection of the Almighty, from his birth, as one designed for something great. God has ways of operating upon children in their infancy, which we cannot account for. God never made a soul but he knew how to sanctify it.

We have here the song wherewith Zacharias praised God when his mouth was opened; in it he is said to prophesy, v. 67.

I. How he was qualified for this: He was filled with

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

59. eighth day—The law (Gen. 17:12) was observed, even though the eighth day after birth should be a sabbath (John 7:23; and see Phil. 3:5). called him—lit., "were calling"—i.e., (as we should say) "were for calling." The naming of children at baptism has its origin in the Jewish custom at circumcision (Gen. 21:3, 4); and the names of Abram and Sarai were changed at its first performance (Gen. 17:5, 15).

62. made signs—showing he was deaf, as well as dumb.

63. marvelled all—at his giving the same name, not knowing of any communication between them on the subject. 64. mouth opened immediately—on thus palpably showing his full faith in the vision, for disbelieving which he had been struck dumb (vss. 13, 20).

65. fear—religious awe; under the impression that God's hand was specially in these events (cf. ch. 5:26; 7:16; 8:37).

66. hand of the Lord was with him—by special tokens marking him out as one destined to some great work (I Kings 18:46; II Kings 3:15; Acts 11:21).

ADAM CLARKE

birth of John, which would complete the time of Elisabeth's pregnancy, according to v. 36, and the only difficulty is to ascertain whether Mary went immediately to Hebron after her salutation or whether she tarried nearly three months before she took the journey.

58. And her neighbours and her cousins . . . rejoiced with her. Because sterility was a reproach; and they now rejoiced with their relative, from whom that reproach was now rolled away.

59. On the eighth day they came to circumcise. See an account of this institution in the note on Gen. xvii. 10-14. Had circumcision been essential to an infant's salvation, God would not have ordered it to be delayed to the eighth day, because in all countries multitudes die before they arrive at that age. Baptism, which is generally allowed to have been substituted for circumcision, is no more necessary to the salvation of an infant than circumcision was. Both are signs of the covenant—circumcision, of the putting away the impurity of the flesh; and baptism, of the "washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost." They called him Zacharias. Among the Jews, the child was named when it was circumcised, and ordinarily the name of the father was given to the firstborn son.

60. Not so; but he shall be called John. This is the name which the angel desired should be given him, v. 13, and of which Zacharias by writing had informed his wife. There is something very remarkable in the names of this family: Zacharias, the "memory or memorial of Jehovah"; Elisabeth, the "Sabbath or rest of my strong God"—names probably given them by their parents, to point out some remarkable circumstance in their conception or birth; and John, which should always be written Jehochanan or Yehochanan, the "grace or mercy of Jehovah"—so named because he was to go before and proclaim the "God of all grace," and the mercy granted through Him to a lost world.

61. None of thy kindred. As the Jewish tribes and families were kept sacredly distinct, it appears the very names of the ancestors were continued among their descendants, partly through reverence for them and partly to avoid confusion in the genealogical tables, which, for the sake of distinguishing the inheritances, were carefully preserved in each of the families.

62. They made signs to his father. Who, it appears from this, was deaf as well as dumb; otherwise they might have asked him and obtained his answer in this way.

63. A writing table. "A "tablet," diminutive of a "table."

64. The latter clause of the preceding verse should be joined with the beginning of this, as follows: And they marvelled all, for his mouth was opened. The people did not wonder because Zacharias said, He shall be called John, but because he himself was that instant restored to the use of his speech. And he spake, and praised God. In his nine months' silence he had learned the proper use of his tongue; and God, whose power was discredited by it, is now magnified.

65. And fear came. Seeing what they might have thought a paralytic affection so suddenly and effectually healed. This word certainly means in several places "religious fear or reverence"; and in this sense it is used in Acts ix. 31; Rom. iii. 18; xiii. 7; 1 Pet. i. 17; ii. 18; iii. 2.

66. What manner of child shall this be! As there have been so many extraordinary things in his conception and birth, surely God has designed him for some extraordinary purpose. These things they laid . . . up in their hearts, patiently waiting to see what God would work. The hand of the Lord was with him. God defended and prospered him in all things, and the prophetic spirit began to rest upon him.

67. Zacharias . . . prophesied. The word prophesy is to be taken here in its proper acceptation, for the "predicting or foretelling future events." Zacharias spoke not only of what God had already done, but also of what He was about to do in order to save a lost world.

MATTHEW HENRY

the Holy Ghost; he was divinely inspired. God not only forgave him his unbelief and distrust, he filled him with the Holy Ghost.

II. What the matter of his song was. Here is nothing said of the private concerns of his own family, the rolling away of the reproach from it, but in this song he is wholly taken up with the kingdom of the Messiah. The Old Testament prophecies are often expressed in praises and new songs, so is this beginning of New Testament prophecy: Blessed be the Lord God of Israel. Zacharias, speaking of the work of redemption, called him the Lord God of Israel, because to Israel the prophecies, promises, and types, of the redemption had hitherto been given, and to them the first proffers and proposals of it were now to be made.

Now Zacharias here blesses God,

1. For the work of salvation that was to be wrought out by the Messiah himself, v. 68–75.

(1) In sending the Messiah, God has made a gracious visit to his people; he hath visited them as a friend, to take cognizance of their case.

(2) He has wrought out redemption for them: He has redeemed his people. This was the errand on which Christ came into the world, to redeem those that were sold for sin, and sold under sin. Christ redeems them by price out of the hands of God's justice, and redeems them by power out of the hands of Satan's tyranny.

(3) He has fulfilled the covenant of royalty made with the most famous Old Testament prince, that is, David. Glorious things had been said of his family, that on him, as a mighty one, help should be laid. But that family had been long in a manner cast off. Now here it is gloried in, that, according to the promise, the horn of David should again be made to bud; he hath raised up a horn of salvation for us in the house of his servant David (v. 69), there, where it was promised and expected to arise. There is in Christ, and in him only, salvation for us, and it is a horn of salvation. It is an honourable salvation. It is raised up above all other salvations, none of which are to be compared with it. It is a plentiful salvation. It is a cornucopia—a horn of plenty. It is a powerful salvation. He has raised up such a salvation as shall pull down our spiritual enemies, and protect us from them.

(4) He has fulfilled all the precious promises made to the church by the most famous Old Testament prophets (v. 70): As he spoke by the mouth of his holy prophets. His doctrine of salvation by the Messiah is confirmed by an appeal to the prophets. God is now doing that which he has long ago spoken of. See, [1] How sacred the prophecies of this salvation were. The prophets who delivered them were holy prophets, and it was the holy God himself that spoke by them. [2] How ancient they were: ever since the world began. God having promised, when the world began, that the Seed of the woman should break the serpent's head. [3] What a wonderful harmony and concert we perceive among them. God spoke the same thing by them all.

Now what is this salvation which was prophesied of?

First, It is a rescue from the malice of our enemies; a salvation out of our enemies, from among them, and out of the power of them that hate us (v. 71); it is a salvation from sin. He shall save his people from their sins, that they may not have dominion over them, Matt. i. 21.

Secondly, It is a restoration to the favour of God; it is to perform the mercy promised to our forefathers, v. 72. The Redeemer shall reinstate us in the mercy of God and re-establish us in his covenant; which was signified by the promises made to the patriarchs, and the holy covenant made with them, the oath which he sware to our Father Abraham, v. 73. That which was promised to the fathers, and is performed to us, is mercy, pure mercy; nothing in it is owing to our merit. He loved us because he would love us. God herein had an eye to his holy covenant, that covenant with Abraham: I will be a God to thee and thy seed. This his seed had really forfeited by their transgressions; this he seemed to have forgotten in the calamities brought upon them; but he will now remember it.

Thirdly, It is a qualification for, and an encouragement to, the service of God. Thus was the oath he sware to our Father Abraham, That he would give us power and grace to serve him, in an acceptable manner to him and a comfortable manner to ourselves, v. 74, 75. The great design of gospel grace is not to discharge us from, but to engage us to, and encourage us in, the service of God. We are therefore delivered from the iron yoke of sin, that our necks may be put under the sweet and easy yoke of the Lord Jesus. The very bonds which he has loosed do bind

68-79. There is not a word in this noble burst of divine song about his own child; like Elisabeth losing sight entirely of self, in the glory of a Greater than both. Lord God of Israel—i.e., in order to redeem: returned after long absence, and broken His long silence (see on Matt. 15:31). In the Old Testament, God is said to "visit" chiefly for judgment, in the New Testament for mercy. Zacharias would, as yet, have but imperfect views of such "visiting and redeeming," "saving from and delivering out of the hand of enemies" (vss. 71, 74). But this Old Testament phraseology, used at first with a lower reference, is, when viewed in the light of a loftier and more comprehensive kingdom of God, equally adapted to express the most spiritual conceptions of the redemption that is in Christ Jesus.

69. horn of salvation—i.e., "strength of salvation," or "mighty Salvation," meaning the Saviour Himself, whom Simeon calls "Thy Salvation" (ch. 2:30). The metaphor is taken from those animals whose strength is in their horns (Ps. 18:2; 75:10; 132:17). house of . . . David—This shows that Mary must have been known to be of the royal line, independent of Joseph; of whom Zacharias, if he knew anything, could not know that after this he would recognize Mary. 70. since the world began—or, "from the earliest period."

72. the mercy promised . . . his holy covenant . . . 73. the oath . . . to . . . Abraham—The whole work and kingdom of Messiah is represented as a mercy pledged on oath to Abraham and his seed, to be realized at an appointed period; and at length, in "the fulness of the time," gloriously made good. Hence, not only "grace," or the thing promised; but "truth," or fidelity to the promise, are said to "come by Jesus Christ" (John 1:17).

ADAM CLARKE

68. Blessed be the Lord God of Israel; for. Zacharias praises God for two grand benefits which He had granted to His people. (1) He has visited them. (2) He has ransomed them. God visits His people in the incarnation of Jesus Christ; therefore this Christ is called by Him "Jehovah the God of Israel." Here the highest and most glorious character of the Supreme Being is given to Christ. He hath . . . redeemed. "He hath made a ransom"—laid down the ransom price. Lytroo signifies particularly to "ransom a captive from the enemy, by paying a price." The following remarkable passage from Josephus, Ant., b. xiv, c. 14, sect. 1, fully illustrates this meaning of the original. "Herod, not knowing what had happened to his brother, hastened to ransom him from the enemy, and was willing to pay a ransom for him, to the amount of three hundred talents." Sinners are fallen into the hands of their enemies, and are captives to sin and death. Jesus ransoms them by His own blood, and restores them to life, liberty, and happiness.

69. And hath raised up an horn of salvation. That is, a "mighty and glorious Saviour," a quotation from Ps. xviii. 2. Horns are the well-known emblems of strength, glory, and power, in both sacred and profane writers, because the strength and beauty of horned animals consist in their horns. It is likely that the allusion is here made to the horns of the altar; and as the altar was a place of refuge and safety, and those who laid hold on its horns were considered to be under the protection of the Lord, so, according to the expression of Zacharias, Jesus Christ is a new Altar, to which whosoever flees shall find refuge. In the house of his servant David. Or "in the family"; so the word house is often used in the Sacred Writings. In v. 32 the angel states that Mary was of the family of David; and Zacharias, who from the nature of his office must have been well acquainted with the public genealogical tables, attests the same thing. This is a matter of considerable importance, because it shows forth the truth of all the prophetic declarations, which uniformly state that the Messiah should come from the family and sit on the throne of David.

71. That we should be saved (literally, a salvation) from our enemies. As Zacharias spoke by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, the salvation which he mentions here must necessarily be understood in a spiritual sense. Satan, death, and sin are the enemies from whom Jesus came to deliver us. Sin is the most dangerous of all, and is properly the only enemy we have to fear.

us faster unto him. We are hereby enabled, 1. To serve God without fear—ἀφόβως. We are therefore put into a state of holy safety that we might serve God with a holy security and serenity of mind, as those that are quiet from the fears of evil. God must be served with a filial fear, a reverent obedient fear, an awakening quickening fear, but not with a slavish fear, like that of the slothful servant, who represented him to himself as a hard master, and unreasonable. 2. To serve him in holiness and righteousness, which includes the whole duty of man towards God and our neighbour. 3. To serve him, before him, in the duties of his immediate worship, to serve him as those that have an eye always upon him, and see his eye always upon us, upon our inward man. 4. To serve him all the days of our life. Christ loved us to the end, and thereby engaged us to love him to the end.

2. He blessed God for the work of preparation for this salvation, which was to be done by John Baptist (v. 76): Thou child shalt be called the prophet of the Highest. Jesus Christ is the Highest. John Baptist was his prophet. Prophecy had now long ceased, but in John it revived. John's business was,

(1) To prepare people for the salvation: Thou shalt go before the face of the Lord to prepare his ways. Let everything that may obstruct his progress, or embarrass it, or hinder people from coming to him, be taken away: see Isa. xl. 3, 4.

(2) To give people a general idea of the salvation, for the doctrine he preached was that the kingdom of heaven is at hand. There are two things in which you must know that this salvation consists:—

[1] The forgiveness of what we have done amiss. It is salvation by the remission of sins, v. 77. John Baptist gave people to understand that, though their case was sad, it was not desperate, for pardon might be obtained through the tender mercy of our God: there was nothing in us but a piteous case to recommend us to the divine compassion.

[2] Direction to do better for the time to come. The gospel salvation sets up a clear and true light, by which we may order our steps aright. In it the day-spring hath visited us from on high (v. 78); and this also is owing to the tender mercy of our God. Christ is the morning Light, the rising Sun. The gospel brings light with it, leaves us not to wander in the darkness of Pagan ignorance, or in the moonlight of the Old Testament types or figures, but in it the day dawns; in John Baptist it began to break, but increased apace, and shone more and more to the perfect day. We have as much reason to welcome the gospel day as those have to welcome the morning who had long waited for it. First, The gospel is discovering; it is to give light to them that sit in darkness, the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. Secondly, It is reviving; it brings light to them that sit in the shadow of death, as condemned prisoners in the dungeon, to bring them the tidings of a pardon, at least of a reprieve and opportunity of producing a pardon. How pleasant is that light! Thirdly, It is directing; it is to guide our feet in the way of peace. It guides us into the way of making our peace with God; that way of peace which as sinners we have wandered from and have not known, nor could ever have known of ourselves.

In the last verse, we have a short account of the younger years of John Baptist. We are here told,

1. Of his eminence as to the inward man: The child grew in the capacities of his mind, so that he waxed strong in spirit, had a strong judgment and strong resolution. Those that are strong in the Lord are strong in spirit.

2. Of his obscurity as to the outward man: He was in the deserts. There he spent most of his time, in contemplation and devotion, and had not his education in the schools, or at the feet of the rabbin. Many a one is qualified for great usefulness, who yet is buried alive; and many are long so buried who are designed, and are thereby in the fitting, for so much greater usefulness at last; as John Baptist, who was in the desert only till the day of his showing to Israel. There is a time fixed for the showing of those favours to Israel which are reserved.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

74. that he would grant us . . . How comprehensive is the view here given! (1) The purpose of all redemption—"that we should serve Him"—i.e., "the Lord God of Israel" (vs. 68). The word signifies religious service distinctively—"the priesthood of the New Testament" [BENGEL]. (2) The nature of this service—"in holiness and righteousness before Him"—or, as in His presence (cf. Ps. 56:13). (3) Its freedom—"being delivered out of the hand of our enemies." (4) Its fearlessness—"might serve Him without fear." (5) Its duration—"all the days of our life." 76-79. Here are the dying echoes of this song; and very beautiful are these closing notes—like the setting sun, shorn indeed of its noontide radiance, but skirting the horizon with a wavy and quivering light—as of molten gold—on which the eye delights to gaze, till it disappears from the view. The song passes not here from Christ to John, but only from Christ direct to Christ as heralded by His forerunner. 76. thou child—not "my son"—this child's relation to himself being lost in his relation to a Greater than either. prophet of the Highest; for thou shalt go before him—i.e., "the Highest." As "the Most High" is an epithet in Scripture only of the supreme God, it is inconceivable that inspiration should apply this term, as here undeniably, to Christ, unless He were "God over all blessed for ever" (Rom. 9:5). 77. to give knowledge of salvation—To sound the note of a needed and provided "salvation" was the noble office of John, above all that preceded him; as it is that of all subsequent ministers of Christ; but infinitely loftier was it to be the "Salvation" itself (vs. 69 and ch. 2:30). by the remission of . . . sins—This stamps at once the spiritual nature of the salvation here intended, and explains vss. 71, 74. 78. Through the tender mercy . . .—the sole spring, necessarily, of all salvation for sinners.

dayspring from on high . . .—either Christ Himself, as the "Sun of righteousness" (Mal. 4:2), arising on a dark world [BEZA, GROTIUS, CALVIN, DE WETTE, OLSHAUSEN, etc.], or the light which He sheds. The sense, of course, is one.

79. (Cf. Isa. 9:2; Matt. 4:13-17.) "That St. Luke, of all the Evangelists, should have obtained and recorded these inspired utterances of Zacharias and Mary—is in accordance with his character and habits, as indicated in vss. 1-4" [WEBSTER and WILKINSON].

80. And the child . . .—"a concluding paragraph, indicating, in strokes full of grandeur, the bodily and mental development of the Baptist; and bringing his life up to the period of his public appearance" [OLSHAUSEN]. in the deserts—probably "the wilderness of Judea" (Matt. 3:1), whither he had retired early in life, in the Nazarite spirit, and where, free from rabbinical influences and alone with God, his spirit would be educated, like Moses in the desert, for his future high vocation. his showing unto Israel—the presentation of himself before his nation, as Messiah's forerunner.

74-75. Being delivered. The salvation brought by Jesus Christ consists in the following things: (1) We are to be delivered out of the hand of our enemies, so that sin shall neither have dominion over us nor existence in us. (2) We are to serve (worship) God, to render Him that service and adoration which the letter and spirit of His religion require. (3) We are to live in holiness, a strict inward conformity to the mind of Christ—and righteousness, a full outward conformity to the precepts of the gospel. (4) This is to be done before God, under the continual influence and support of His grace, and with a constant evidence of His presence and approbation. (5) This state is a state of true happiness—it is without fear. Sin is all cast out; holiness is brought in. God's power upholds and His approbation cheers and comforts the believing heart. (6) This blessedness is to continue as long as we exist—all the days of our life, in all ages, in all situations, and in all circumstances.

76-79. And thou, child, etc. Zacharias proclaims the dignity, employment, doctrine, and success of his son, and the ruin and recovery of the Jews and the Gentiles. (1) His dignity. Thou . . . shalt be called (constituted) the prophet of the Highest. Prophet has two acceptations: first, a person who foretells future events; and, second, a teacher of men in the things of God, 1 Cor. xiv. 3. John was a prophet in both senses. He had the honor of being the last and clearest prophet of the old covenant and the first of the new. (2) His employment. Thou shalt go before the face of the Lord to prepare his ways. He should be the immediate forerunner of Jesus Christ, none being capable of succeeding him in his ministry but Christ himself. He was to prepare his ways, to be the honored instrument, in the hands of God, of disposing the hearts of multitudes of the Israelites to believe in and follow the Lord Jesus. (3) Zacharias points out the doctrine or teaching of John. It should be the science of salvation. (4) Zacharias predicts the success of his son's ministry. Under his preaching the people should be directed to that tender mercy of God through which they might obtain the remission of their sins, vv. 77-78. (5) Zacharias points out the wretched state in which the inhabitants of Judea and the Gentile world were then found. Their feet had wandered out of the way of peace (v. 79), of temporal and spiritual prosperity. They had got into a state of darkness—they were blind concerning the things of God, and the things which belonged to their salvation. They had become contented inhabitants of this land of intellectual darkness—they had sat down in it, and were not concerned to get out of it. They were about to perish in it—death had his dominion there; and his swift approaches to them were now manifested to the prophet by seeing his shadow cast upon them. Ignorance of God and salvation is the shadow of death; and the substance, eternal ruin, is essentially connected with the projected shadow. See these phrases explained at large on Matt. iv. 16. (6) Zacharias proclaims the recovery of a lost world. As the removal of this darkness and redemption from this death were now at hand, John is represented as being a dayspring from on high, a "morning star," that foretold the speedy approach of the day, for the rising of the Sun of Righteousness. That these words should be applied to John, and not to Christ, I am fully satisfied.

80. The child grew. Increased in stature and bodily vigor. And waxed strong in spirit—had his understanding divinely illuminated and confirmed in the truths of God. And was in the deserts—the city of Hebron, the circumjacent hill country, and in or near Nazareth. Till the day of his shewing, or "manifestation"—till he was thirty years of age, before which time the law did not permit a man to enter into the public ministry, Num. iv. 3.

CHAPTER 2

The fulness of time was now come, when God would send forth his Son, and it was foretold that he should be born at Bethlehem. Now here we have an account of the time, place, and manner of it.

I. The time when our Lord Jesus was born.

1. He was born at the time when the fourth monarchy was in its height. He was born in the days of Augustus Cæsar, when the Roman empire extended itself further than ever before or since, including Parthia one way, and Britain another way; so that it was then called Terrarum orbis imperium—The empire of the whole earth; and here that empire is called all the world (v. 1), for there was scarcely any part of the civilized world, but what was dependent on it.

2. He was born when Judæa was become a province of the empire, and tributary to it; as appears evidently by this, that when all the Roman empire was taxed, the Jews were taxed among the rest. Jerusalem was taken by Pompey the Roman general, about sixty years before this. Judæa was ruled by Cyrenius the Roman governor of Syria (v. 2). This was the first taxing that was made in Judæa, the first badge of their servitude.

3. There is another circumstance, as to the time, which is, that there was now universal peace in the empire. The temple of Janus was now shut, which it never used to be if any wars were on foot; and now it was fit for the Prince of peace to be born.

II. The place where our Lord Jesus was born is very observable. He was born at Bethlehem; so it was foretold (Mic. v. 2), the scribes so understood it (Matt. ii. 5, 6), so did the common people, John vii. 42. The name of the place was significant. Bethlehem signifies the house of bread; a proper place for him to be born in who is the Bread of life, the Bread that came down from heaven. Bethlehem was the city of David, where he was born, and therefore there he must be born who was the Son of David. Zion was also called the city of David, yet Christ was not born there; for Bethlehem was that city of David where he was born in meanness, to be a shepherd; and this our Saviour chose for the place of his birth; not Zion, where he ruled in power and prosperity. Now when the virgin Mary was with child, and near her time, Providence so ordered it that, by order from the emperor, all the subjects of the Roman empire were to be taxed; that is, they were to be registered and enrolled, according to their families, which is the proper signification of the word here used.

That which Augustus designed was either to gratify his pride in knowing the numbers of his people, and proclaiming it to the world, or he did it in policy, to make his government appear the more formidable; but Providence had another reach in it. All the world shall be at the trouble of being enrolled, only that Joseph and Mary may. This brought them up from Nazareth in Galilee to Bethlehem in Judæa, because they were of the stock and lineage of David, v. 4, 5. Divers ends of Providence were served by this.

1. Hereby the virgin Mary was brought, great with child, to Bethlehem, to be delivered there, according to the prediction. See how man purposes and God disposes.

2. Hereby it appeared that Jesus Christ was of the seed of David; for what brings his mother to Bethlehem, now, but because she was of the stock and lineage of David?

3. Hereby it appeared that he was made under the law; for he became a subject of the Roman empire as soon as he was born. Instead of having kings tributaries to him, when he came into the world he was himself a tributary.

III. The circumstances of his birth, which were very mean. He was indeed a first-born son; but it was poor honour to be the first-born of such a poor woman as Mary was, who had no inheritance but what was in nativity.

1. He was under some abasements in common with other children; he was wrapped in swaddling clothes, as other children are when they are new-born, as if he could be bound, or needed to be kept straight. The Ancient of days became an infant of a span long.

2. He was under some abasements peculiar to himself.

(1) He was born at an inn. Christ was born in an inn, to intimate that he came into the world but to sojourn here for awhile, as in an inn. An inn receives all comers, and so does Christ. He hangs out the banner of love for his sign, and whoever comes to him, he will in no wise cast out; only, unlike other inns, he welcomes those that come without money and without price.

(2) He was born in a stable; so some think the word signifies which we translate a manger. Because

Vss. 1-7. BIRTH OF CHRIST. 1. Cæsar Augustus—the first of the Roman emperors. all the world—so the vast Roman Empire was termed. taxed—enrolled, or register themselves. 2. first . . . when Cyrenius . . .—a very perplexing verse, inasmuch as Cyrenius, or Quirinus, appears not to have been governor of Syria for about ten years after the birth of Christ, and the "taxing" under his administration was what led to the insurrection mentioned in Acts 5:37. That there was a taxing, however, of the whole Roman Empire under Augustus, is now admitted by all; and candid critics, even of skeptical tendency, are ready to allow that there is not likely to be any real inaccuracy in the statement of our Evangelist. Many superior scholars would render the words thus, "This registration was previous to Cyrenius being governor of Syria"—as the word "first" is rendered in John 1:15; 15:18. In this case, of course, the difficulty vanishes. But it is perhaps better to suppose, with others, that the registration may have been ordered with a view to the taxation, about the time of our Lord's birth, though the taxing itself—an obnoxious measure in Palestine—was not carried out till the time of Quirinus. 3. went . . to his own city—the city of his extraction, according to the Jewish custom, not of his abode, which was the usual Roman method. 4, 5. Not only does Joseph, who was of the royal line, go to Bethlehem (I Samuel 16:1), but Mary too—not from choice surely in her condition, but, probably, for personal enrolment, as herself an heiress. 5. espoused wife—now, without doubt, taken home to him, as related in Matthew 1:18; 25: 6.

6. while . . . there . . .—Mary had up to this time been living at the wrong place for Messiah's birth. A little longer stay at Nazareth, and the prophecy would have failed. But lo! with no intention certainly on her part, much less of Cæsar Augustus, to fulfil the prophecy, she is brought from Nazareth to Bethlehem, and at that nick of time her period arrives, and her Babe is born (Ps. 118:23). "Every creature walks blindfold; only He that dwells in light knows whether they go" [BISHOP HALL]. 7. first-born—So Matthew 1:25, 26; yet the law, in speaking of the first-born, regardeth not whether any were born after or no, but only that none were born before [LIGHTFOOT]. wrapt him . . . laid him—The mother herself did so. Had she then none to help her? It would seem so (II Cor. 8:9). a manger—the manger, the bench to which the horses' heads were tied, on which their food could rest [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. no room in the inn—a square erection, open inside, where travellers put up, and whose rear parts were used as stables. The ancient tradition, that our Lord was born in a grotto or cave, is quite consistent with this, the country being rocky. In Mary's condition the journey would be a slow one, and ere they arrived, the inn would be fully occupied—affecting anticipation of the reception He was throughout to meet with (John 1:11).

CHAPTER 2

1. Caesar Augustus. This was Caius Caesar Octavianus Augustus, who was proclaimed emperor of Rome in the twenty-ninth year before our Lord, and died A.D. 14. That all the world should be taxed. "The whole of that empire." It is agreed, on all hands, that this cannot mean the whole world, as in the common translation, for this very sufficient reason, that the Romans had not the dominion of the whole earth, and therefore could have no right to raise levies or taxes in those places to which their dominion did not extend.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

"In those days"—a "decree from Caesar Augustus." Caesar Augustus was the first Roman emperor. His real name was Caius Octavius. He was a great-nephew of Julius Caesar. The word "Augustus" is significant. That was his title. He took the name "Caesar" by courtesy and by adoption. In process of time the title "Augustus" was dropped, and the title became "Caesar." When this man became Imperator, and the matter was under discussion as to what title he should assume, he declined to be called "Dictator," which suggests a temporary office. He declined also to be called "King," as it did not signify enough. In consultation with the Roman Senate, this name was created for him, "Augustus," derivable from the word "Augur"; and consequently indicating a religious sanction. He was moving toward that which happened subsequently, the claim of deity on the part of the supreme ruler of the Roman Empire. Gradually the power of government had been taken from the people, and vested in military governors; and at last this man, a singularly able man, a singularly astute man, gained the supreme power. He became the first emperor, the first Imperator, with a capital "I." "Imperator" is a military title. The generals of the Roman republic had all been called "Imperators"; but at last the plural ended, and the singular marked despotism, autocracy. The Roman republic had passed away, and in its place had emerged the Roman Empire, under Augustus Caesar.

—The Gospel According to Luke

7. Laid him in a manger. Many have thought that this was a full proof of the meanness and poverty of the Holy Family, that they were obliged to take up their lodging in a stable; but such people overlook the reason given by the inspired penman, because there was no room for them in the inn. As multitudes were going now to be enrolled, all the lodgings in the inn had been occupied before Joseph and Mary arrived.

MATTHEW HENRY

there was no room in the inn, and for want of conveniences, nay for want of necessaries, he was laid in the manger, instead of a cradle. His being born in a stable and laid in a manger was an instance, [1] Of the poverty of his parents. Had they been rich, room would have been made for them. [2] Of the corruption and degeneracy of manners in that age. If there had been any common humanity among them, they would not have turned a woman in travail into a stable. [3] It was an instance of the humiliation of our Lord Jesus. We were become by sin like an outcast infant, helpless and forlorn; and such a one Christ was.

Verses 8–20

The meanest circumstances of Christ's humiliation were all along attended with some discoveries of his glory, to balance them. When we saw him wrapped in swaddling clothes and laid in a manger, we were tempted to say, "Surely this cannot be the Son of God." But see his birth attended with a choir of angels, and we shall say, "Surely it can be no other than the Son of God."

We had in Matthew an account of the notice given to the wise men, who were Gentiles, by a star; here we are told of the notice given of it to the shepherds who were Jews, by an angel: to each God chose to speak in the language they were most conversant with.

I. How the shepherds were employed; they were abiding in the fields and keeping watch over their flocks by night, v. 8. The angel was not sent to the chief priests or the elders, but to a company of poor shepherds. The patriarchs were shepherds and by this instance God would show that he had still a favour for those of that innocent employment. They were not sleeping in their beds, when this news was brought them, but abiding in the fields, and watching. They were broad awake, and therefore could not be deceived in what they saw and heard, so as those may be who are half asleep. They were employed now, not in acts of devotion, but in the business of their calling; they were keeping watch over their flock. We are not out of the way of divine visits when we are sensibly employed in an honest calling, and abide with God in it.

II. How they were surprised with the appearance of an angel (v. 9): Behold, an angel of the Lord came upon them, of a sudden. The angel's coming upon them intimates that they little thought of such a thing, or expected it. Gracious visits are made us from heaven, or ever we are aware. They saw and heard the glory of the Lord round about them; such as made the night as bright as day. This made them sore afraid, as fearing some evil tidings. While we are conscious to ourselves of so much guilt, we have reason to fear lest every express from heaven should be a messenger of wrath.

III. What the message was which the angel had to deliver to the shepherds, v. 10–12. "Fear not, you need not fear your enemies, and should not fear your friends." He furnishes them with abundant matter for joy: "Behold, I evangelize to you great joy. It shall bring joy to all people; that unto you is born this day a Saviour which is Christ the Lord, in the city of David," v. 11. "The Saviour is born this day; and, since it is matter of great joy to all people, you may proclaim it. He is born in the place where it was foretold he should be born, in the city of Davia; and he is born to you; to you Jews he is sent in the first place, to bless you, to you shepherds, though poor and mean in the world." This refers to Isa. ix. 6. Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given. This is matter of joy indeed to all people, great joy. Long-looked for is come at last. He gives them a sign for the confirming of their faith in this matter. "You will find him by this token: he is lying in a manger, where surely never any new-born infant was laid before. You will find him wrapped in swaddling clothes, and laid in a manger.

IV. The angels' doxology to God, and congratulations of men, upon this solemn occasion, v. 13, 14 The message was no sooner delivered by one angel than suddenly there was with that angel a multitude of the heavenly hosts praising God. Let God have the honour of this work: Glory to God in the highest; Glory to God, whose kindness and love designed this favour, and whose wisdom contrived it. Other works of God are for his glory, but the redemption of the world is for his glory in the highest. Let men have the joy of it: On earth peace, goodwill toward men. If God be at peace with us, all peace results from it. Peace is here put for all good. All the good we have, or hope, is owing to God's goodwill; and, if we have the comfort of it, he must have the glory of it. Here was the peace proclaimed with great solemnity; whoever will, let them come and take the benefit of it.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

Wrapt in His swaddling-bands,
And in His manger laid,
The hope and glory of all lands
Is come to the world's aid.
No peaceful home upon His cradle smiled,
Guests rudely went and came where slept the royal Child.

But some "guests went and came" not "rudely," but reverently. God sent visitors of His own to pay court to the newborn King.

8-20. ANGELIC ANNUNCIATION TO THE SHEPHERDS —THEIR VISIT TO THE NEWBORN BABE. 8. abiding in the fields—staying there, probably in huts or tents. watch . . . by night—or, night watches, taking their turn of watching. From about passover-time in April until autumn, the flocks pastured constantly in the open fields, the shepherds lodging there all that time. (From this it seems plain that the period of the year usually assigned to our Lord's birth is too late.) Were these shepherds chosen to have the first sight of the blessed Babe without any respect of their own state of mind? That, at least, is not God's way. "No doubt, like Simeon (vs. 25), they were among the waiters for the Consolation of Israel" [OLSHAUSEN]; and, if the simplicity of their rustic minds, their quiet occupation, the stillness of the midnight hours, and the amplitude of the deep blue vault above them for the heavenly music which was to fill their ear, pointed them out as fit recipients for the first tidings of an Infant Saviour, the congenial meditations and conversations by which, we may suppose, they would beguile the tedious hours would perfect their preparation for the unexpected visit. Thus was Nathanael engaged, all alone but not unseen, under the fig tree, in unconscious preparation for his first interview with Jesus. (See on John 1:48.) So was the rapt seer on his lonely rock "in the spirit on the Lord's Day," little thinking that this was his preparation for hearing behind him the trumpet-voice of the Son of man (Rev. 1:10, etc.). But if the shepherds in His immediate neighborhood had the first, the sages from afar had the next sight of the newborn King. Even so still, simplicity first, science next, finds its way to Christ, whom

9. glory of the Lord—"the brightness or glory which is represented as encompassing all heavenly visions" [OLSHAUSEN]. sore afraid—So it ever was (Dan. 10:7, 8; Luke 1:12; Rev. 1:17). Men have never felt easy with the invisible world laid suddenly open to their gaze. It was never meant to be permanent; a momentary purpose was all it was intended to serve. 10. to all people—"to the whole people," i.e., of Israel; to be by them afterwards opened up to the whole world. (See on vs. 14.) 11. unto you is born . . .—you shepherds, Israel, mankind [BENGEL]. Cf. Isaiah 9:6, "Unto us a Child is born." It is a birth—"The Word is made flesh." When? "This day." Where? "In the city of David"—in the right line and at the right spot; where prophecy bade us look for Him, and faith accordingly expected Him. How dear to us should be these historic moorings of our faith! With the loss of them, all substantial Christianity is lost. By means of them how many have been kept from making shipwreck, and attained to a certain external admiration of Him, ere yet they have fully "beheld His glory." a Saviour—not One who shall be a Saviour, but "born a Saviour." Christ the Lord—"magnificent appellation!" [BENGEL]. "This is the only place where these words come together; and I see no way of understanding this "Lord" but as corresponding to the Hebrew JEHOVAH" [ALFORD]. 12. a sign—"the sign." the babe—"a Babe." a manger—"the manger." The sign was to consist, it seems, solely in the overpowering contrast between the things just said of Him and the lowly condition in which they would find Him—Him whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting, "ye shall find a Babe"; whom the heaven of heavens cannot contain, "wrapt in swaddling-bands"; the "Saviour, Christ the Lord," lying in a manger! Thus early were these amazing contrasts, which are His chosen style, held forth. (See II Cor. 8:9.) 13. suddenly—as if only waiting till their fellow had done. with the angel—who retires not, but is joined by others, come to seal

8. There were . . . shepherds abiding in the field. It was a custom among the Jews to send out their sheep to the deserts, about the Passover, and bring them home at the commencement of the first rain; during the time they were out, the shepherds watched them night and day. As the Passover occurred in the spring, and the first rain began early in the month of Marcheswan, which answers to part of our October and November, we find that the sheep were kept out in the open country during the whole of the summer. And as these shepherds had not yet brought home their flocks, it is a presumptive argument that October had not yet commenced, and that, consequently, our Lord was not born on the twenty-fifth of December, when no flocks were out in the fields.

9. The angel of the Lord came upon them. Or "stood over them." It is likely that the angel appeared in the air at some little distance above them, and that from him the rays of the glory of the Lord shone round about them, as the rays of light are projected from the sun. They were sore afraid. Terrified with the appearance of so glorious a being, and probably fearing that he was a messenger of justice, coming to announce divine judgments or punish them immediately for sins with which their consciences would not fail, on such an occasion, to reproach them.

10. Behold, I bring you good tidings. I am not come to declare the judgments of the Lord, but His merciful loving-kindness, the subject being a matter of great joy. He then declares his message. Unto you—to the Jews first, and then to the human race.

11. A Saviour, which is Christ the Lord. A Saviour, the same as Jesus, from to "make safe, to deliver, preserve, to make alive." Which is Christ. "The anointed," the same as Messiah. This name points out the Saviour of the world in His prophetic, regal, and sacerdotal offices, as in ancient times prophets, kings, and priests were anointed with oil when installed into their respective offices. Anointing was the same with them as consecration is with us. It appears from Isa. lxi. 1 that anointing with oil in consecrating a person to any important office, whether civil or religious, was considered as an emblem of the communication of the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit. The Lord. The supreme, eternal Being, the Ruler of the heavens and the earth. The Septuagint generally translate Yehovah by Kyrios. This Hebrew word, from hayah, he was, properly points out the eternity and self-existence of the Supreme Being. Jesus is a Prophet, to reveal the will of God, and instruct men in it. He is a Priest, to offer up sacrifice, and make atonement for the sin of the world. He is Lord, to rule over and rule in the souls of the children of men.

12. This shall be a sign (or token) unto you; Ye shall find this glorious Person, however strange it may appear, wrapped in swaddling clothes, lying in a manger. It is by humility that Christ comes to reign; and this is the only way into His kingdom! Pride is the character of all the children of Adam; humility, the mark of the Son of God, and of all His followers. Christ came in the way of humility to destroy that pride which is the root of evil in the souls of men.

13. Suddenly there was with the angel. This multitude of the heavenly host had just now descended from on high, to honor the newborn Prince of Peace, to give His parents the fullest conviction of His glory and excellence, and to teach the shepherds, who were about to be the first proclaimers of the gospel, what to think and what to speak of Him who, while He appeared as a helpless Infant, was the Object of worship to the angels of God.

MATTHEW HENRY

It is on earth peace, to men of goodwill (so some copies read it), ἀνθρώποις εὐδοκίας; to men who have a goodwill to God; or to men whom God has a goodwill to. This is a faithful saying, and well worthy of all acceptation, That the goodwill of God toward men is glory to God in the highest, and peace on the earth.

V. The visit which the shepherds made to the newborn Saviour. 1. They consulted about it, v. 15. While the angels were singing their hymn, they could attend to that only; but, when they were gone away from them into heaven, the shepherds said one to another, Let us go to Bethlehem. And it is no reflection upon the testimony of angels, no nor upon a divine testimony itself, to get it corroborated by observation and experience. These shepherds do not speak doubtfully, "Let us go see whether it be so or no"; but with assurance, Let us go see this thing which is come to pass; for what room was left to doubt of it, when the Lord had thus made it known to them? 2. They immediately made the visit, v. 16. They lost no time, but came with haste to the place, and there they found Mary and Joseph, and the babe lying in the manger. The poverty and meanness in which they found Christ the Lord were no shock to their faith, who themselves knew what it was to live a life of comfortable communion with God in very poor and mean circumstances. We have reason to think that the shepherds told Joseph and Mary of the vision of the angels they had seen, and the song of the angels they had heard, which was a great encouragement to them, more than if a visit had been made them by the best ladies in the town.

VI. The care which the shepherds took to spread the report of this (v. 17): When they had seen it they made known abroad the whole story of what was told them, both by the angels, and by Joseph and Mary, concerning this child, that he was the Saviour, even Christ the Lord, that in him there is peace on earth. This they told everybody, and agreed in their testimony concerning it. What impression did it make upon people? Why truly, All they that heard it wondered at those things which were told them by the shepherds, v. 18. They wondered, but never enquired any further about the Saviour, but let the thing drop as a nine days' wonder.

VII. The use which those made of these things, who did believe them. 1. The virgin Mary made them the matter of her private meditation. She said little, but kept all these things, and pondered them in her heart, v. 19. As she had silently left it to God to clear up her virtue, when that was suspected, so she silently leaves it to him to publish her honour, now when it was veiled; and it is satisfaction enough to find that, if no one else takes notice of the birth of her child, angels do. The truths of Christ are worth keeping; and the way to keep them safe is to ponder them. Meditation is the best help to memory. 2. The shepherds made them the matter of their more public praises. If others were not affected with those things, yet they themselves were (v. 20): They returned, glorifying and praising God. God would accept the thanksgivings they offered to him. They praised God for what they had heard from the angel, and for what they had seen, the babe in the manger, as it had been spoken to them. They thanked God that they had seen Christ. As afterwards the cross of Christ, so now his manger, was to some foolishness and a stumbling-block, but others saw in it, and admired, and praised, the wisdom of God and the power of God.

Verses 21–24

Our Lord Jesus, being made of a woman, was made under the law, Gal. iv. 4. As the son of a daughter of Abraham he was made under the law of Moses.

Now here we have two instances of his being made under that law, and submitting to it.

I. He was circumcised on the very day that the law appointed (v. 21): When eight days were accomplished they circumcised him. Though it was a painful operation, yet Christ would undergo it for us. Though it supposed him a stranger, that was by that ceremony to be admitted into covenant with God, though it supposed him a sinner, yet he submitted to it; nay, therefore he submitted to it, because he would be made in the likeness, not only of flesh, but of sinful flesh, Rom. viii. 3. Though thereby he made himself a debtor to the whole law (Gal. v. 3), yet he submitted to it. Christ was circumcised, that he might own himself of the seed of Abraham; that he might own himself a surety for our sins, and an undertaker for our safety; that he might justify the dedication of the infant seed of the church to God, by that ordinance which is the instituted seal of the covenant, as circumcision was (Rom. iv. 11), and baptism is.

At his circumcision he had his name given him; he was called Jesus or Joshua, for he was so named and to celebrate the tidings he has brought. heavenly host—or "army," an army celebrating peace! [BENGEL] "transferring the occupation of their exalted station to this poor earth, which so seldom resounds with the pure praise of God" [OLSHAUSEN]; to let it be known how this event is regarded in heaven and should be regarded on earth. 14. Glory . . .—brief but transporting hymn—not only in articulate human speech, for our benefit, but in tunable measure, in the form of a Hebrew parallelism of two complete clauses, and a third one only amplifying the second, and so without a connecting "and." The "glory to God," which the newborn "Saviour" was to bring, is the first note of this sublime hymn: to this answers, in the second clause, the "peace on earth," of which He was to be "the Prince" (Isa. 9:6)—probably sung responsively by the celestial choir; while quickly follows the glad echo of this note, probably by a third detachment of the angelic choristers—"good will to men." "They say not, glory to God in heaven, where angels are, but, using a rare expression, "in the highest [heavens]," whither angels aspire not," (Heb. 1:3, 4) [BENGEL]. "Peace" with God is the grand necessity of a fallen world. To bring in this, and all other peace in its train, was the prime errand of the Saviour to this earth, and, along with it, Heaven's whole "good will to men"—the divine complacency on a new footing—descends to rest upon men, as upon the Son Himself, in whom God is "well-pleased." (Matt. 3:17, the same word as here.) 15. Let us go . . .—lovely simplicity of devoutness and faith this! They are not taken up with the angels, the glory that invested them, and the lofty strains with which they filled the air. Nor do they say, Let us go and see if this be true—they have no misgivings. But "Let us go and see this thing which is come to pass, which the Lord hath made known unto us." Does not this confirm the view given on vs. 8 of the spirit of these humble men? 16. with haste—Cf. ch. 1:39; Matthew 28:8 ("did run"); John 4:28 ("left her water-pot," as they do their flocks, in a transport). found Mary . . .—"mysteriously guided by the Spirit to the right place through the obscurity of the night" [OLSHAUSEN]. a manger—"the manger," as before. 17. made known abroad—before their return (vs. 20), and thus were the first evangelists [BENGEL]. 20. glorifying and praising God . . .—The latter word, used of the song of the angels (vs. 13), and in ch. 19:37, and ch. 24:53, leads us to suppose that theirs was a song too, probably some canticle from the Psalter—meet vehicle for the swelling emotions of their simple hearts at what "they had heard and seen."

21. CIRCUMCISION OF CHRIST—Here only recorded, and even here merely alluded to, for the sake of the name then given to the holy Babe, "JESUS," or SAVIOUR (Matt. 1:21; Acts 13:23). Yet in this naming of Him "Saviour," in the act of circumcising Him, which was a symbolical and bloody removal of the body of sin, we have a tacit intimation that they "had need"—as John said of His Baptism—rather to be circumcised by Him "with the circumcision made without hands, in the putting off of the body [of the sins] of the flesh by the circumcision of Christ" (Col. 2:11), and that He only "suffered it to be so, because thus it became Him to fulfil all righteousness" (Matt. 3:15). Still the circumcision of Christ had a profound bearing on His own work—by few rightly apprehended. For since "he that is circumcised is a debtor to do the whole law" (Gal. 5:3), Jesus thus bore about with Him in His very flesh the seal of a voluntary obligation to do the whole law—by Him only possible in the flesh since the fall. And as He was "made under the law" for no ends of His own, but only "to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons" (Gal. 4:4, 5), the obedience to which His circumcision pledged Him was a redeeming obedience—that of a "Saviour." And, finally, as "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law" by "being made a curse for us" (Gal. 3:13), we must regard Him, in His circumcision, as brought under a palpable pledge to be "obedient unto death, even the death of the cross" (Phil. 2:8).

22-40. PURIFICATION OF THE VIRGIN—PRESENTATION OF THE BABE IN THE TEMPLE—SCENE THERE WITH SIMEON AND ANNA. 22, 24 her purification—Though the most and best copies read "their," it was the mother only who needed purifying from the legal uncleanness of child-bearing. "The days" of this purification for a male child were forty in all (Lev. 12:2, 4), on the expiry of which the mother was required to offer a lamb for a burnt offering, and a turtledove or a young pigeon for a sin offering. If she could not afford a lamb, the mother had to bring another turtledove or young pigeon;

14. Glory to God in the highest. The design of God, in the Incarnation, was to manifest the hidden glories of His nature, and to reconcile men to each other and to himself. The angels therefore declare that this Incarnation shall manifest and promote the glory of God, not only in the highest heavens, among the highest orders of beings, but in the highest and most exalted degrees. Peace, good will toward men. Men are in a state of hostility with Heaven and with each other. The carnal mind is enmity against God. He who sins wars against his Maker. When men become reconciled to God, through the death of His Son, they love one another. They have peace with God, peace in their own consciences, and peace with their neighbors; good will dwells among them, speaks in them, and works by them.

15. Let us now go even unto Bethlehem. Let us go across the country at the nearest, that we may lose no time, that we may speedily see this glorious Reconciler of God and man.

17. They made known abroad the saying. These shepherds were the first preachers of the gospel of Christ; and what was their text? Why, Glory to God in the highest heavens, and on earth peace and goodwill among men.

19. And pondered them in her heart. "Weighing them in her heart." "Weighing" is an English translation of our word "pondering," from the Latin ponderare. Every circumstance relative to her Son's birth, Mary treasured up in her memory; and every new circumstance she weighed, or compared with those which had already taken place, in order to acquire the fullest information concerning the nature and mission of her Son.

20. The shepherds returned, glorifying and praising—These simple men, having satisfactory evidence of the truth of the good tidings, and feeling a divine influence upon their own minds, returned to the care of their flocks, glorifying God for what He had shown them, and for the blessedness which they felt.

21. When eight days were accomplished. The law had appointed that every male should be circumcised at eight days old, or on the eighth day after its birth, Gen. xvii. 12; and our blessed Lord received circumcision in token of His subjection to the law, Gal. iv. 4; v. 3.

22. Days of her purification. That is, thirty-three days after what was termed the seven days of her uncleanness—forty days in all; for that was the time appointed by the law, after the birth of a male child. See Lev. xii. 2, 6. The MSS. and versions differ much in the pronoun in this place: some reading her purification; others, his purification; others, their purification. Two versions and two of the fathers omit the pronoun. Their and his have the greatest authorities in their support, and the former is received into most of the modern editions. The purification of every mother and of the angel to his mother Mary before he was conceived in the womb (Luke i. 31) and to his supposed father Joseph after, Matt. i. 21. It was a common name among the Jews, and in this he would be made like unto his brethren. It was the name of two eminent types of him in the Old Testament, Joshua, the successor of Moses; and Joshua, the high priest, Zech. vi. 11, 13. It was very significant of his undertaking. Jesus signifies a Saviour. He brings salvation.

II. He was presented in the temple. This was done at the time appointed by the law, when he was forty days old, when the days of her purification were accomplished, v. 22. Now, according to the law,

1. The child Jesus, being a first-born son, was presented to the Lord. The law is here recited (v. 23): Every male that opens the womb shall be called holy to the Lord. Christ was the first-born among many brethren, and was called holy to the Lord, so as never any other was; yet he was presented to the Lord as other first-born were, and no otherwise. But, according to the law, he was redeemed, Num. xviii. 15. The first-born of man shalt thou redeem, and five shekels was the value, Lev. xxvii. 6; Num. xviii 16. But probably in case of poverty the priest was allowed to take less, or perhaps nothing; for no mention is made of it here.

2. The mother brought her offerings, v. 24. So it is said in the law of the Lord, that law which was yet in force, she must offer a pair of turtle-doves, or two young pigeons; had she been of ability, she must have brought a lamb for a burnt-offering, and a dove for a sin-offering; but, being poor, and not able to reach the price of a lamb, she brings two doves, one for a burnt-offering and the other for a sin-offering (see Lev. xii. 6, 8). Christ was not conceived and born in sin, as others are, yet, because he was made under the law, he complied with it. Thus it became him to fulfil all righteousness.

Verses 25–40

Even when he humbles himself, still Christ has honour done him. Simeon and Anna now do him honour, by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost.

I. A very honourable testimony is born to him by Simeon. Now observe here,

1. The account that is given us concerning this Simeon, or Simon. He dwelt now in Jerusalem, and was eminent for his piety and communion with God. Some learned men, who have been conversant with the Jewish writers, find that there was at this time one Simeon, a man of great note in Jerusalem. The Jews say that he was endued with a prophetical spirit. One thing objected against this conjecture is that at this time his father Hillel was living, and that he himself lived many years after this; but, as to that, he is not here said to be old; and his saying Now let thy servant depart intimates that he was willing to die now, but does not conclude that therefore he did die quickly. Another thing objected is that the son of Simeon was Gamaliel, a Pharisee, and an enemy to Christianity; but, as to that, it is no new thing for a faithful lover of Christ to have a son a bigoted Pharisee.

The account given of him here is, (1) That he was just and devout, just towards men and devout towards God; these two must always go together, and each will befriend the other, but neither will atone for the defect of the other. (2) That he waited for the consolation of Israel, that is, for the coming of the Messiah. Christ is not only the author of his people's comfort, but the matter and ground of it. He was long coming, and they who believed he would come continued waiting, desiring his coming, and hoping for it with patience; I had almost said, with some degree of impatience waiting till it came. The consolation of Israel is to be waited for, and it is worth waiting for, and it will be very welcome to those who have waited for it, and continue waiting. (3) That the Holy Ghost was upon him, not only as a Spirit of holiness, but as a Spirit of prophecy; he was filled with the Holy Ghost. (4) That he had a gracious promise made him, that before he died he should have a sight of the Messiah, v. 26. He received this oracle (for so the word signifies), that he should not see death before he had seen the Messiah, the Lord's Anointed. Those, and those only, can with courage see death, and look it in the face without terror, that have had by faith a sight of Christ.

2. The seasonable coming of Simeon into the temple, at the time when Christ was presented there, v. 27. Just then, when Joseph and Mary brought in the child, Simeon came, by direction of the Spirit, into the temple. The same Spirit that had provided for the support of his hope now provided for the transport of his joy. Those that would see Christ must go to his temple; for there the Lord, whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to meet you, and there you and, if even this was beyond her means, then a portion of fine flour, but without the usual fragrant accompaniments of oil and frankincense, as it represented a sin offering (Lev. 12:6-8; 5:7-11). From the intermediate offering of "a pair of turtledoves or two young pigeons," we gather that Joseph and the Virgin were in poor circumstances (II Cor. 8:9), though not in abject poverty. Being a first-born male, they "bring him to Jerusalem, to present him to the Lord." All such had been claimed as "holy to the Lord," or set apart to sacred uses, in memory of the deliverance of the first-born of Israel from destruction in Egypt, through the sprinkling of blood (Exod. 13:2). In lieu of these, however, one whole tribe, that of Levi, was accepted, and set apart to occupations exclusively sacred (Num. 3:11-38); and whereas there were 273 fewer Levites than first-born of all Israel on the first reckoning, each of these first-born was to be redeemed by the payment of five shekels, yet not without being "presented (or brought) unto the Lord," in token of His rightful claim to them and their service (Num. 3:44-47; 18:15, 16). It was in obedience to this "law of Moses," that the Virgin presented her babe unto the Lord, "in the east gate of the court called Nicanor's Gate, where she herself would be sprinkled by the priest with the blood of her sacrifice [LIGHTFOOT]. By that Babe, in due time, we were to be redeemed, "not with corruptible things as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ" (I Pet. 1:18, 19), and the consuming of the mother's burnt offering, and the sprinkling of her with the blood of her sin offering, were to find their abiding realization in the "living sacrifice" of the Christian mother herself, in the fulness of a "heart sprinkled from an evil conscience," by "the blood which cleanseth from all sin."

just—upright in his moral character. devout—of a religious frame of spirit. waiting for the consolation of Israel—a beautiful title of the coming Messiah, here intended.

the Holy Ghost was—supernaturally—upon him—Thus was the Spirit, after a dreary absence of nearly 400 years, returning to the Church, to quicken expectation, and prepare for coming events. 26. revealed by the Holy Ghost—implying, beyond all doubt, the personality of the Spirit. should see not death till he had seen—"sweet antithesis!" [BENGEL]. How would the one sight gild the gloom of the other! He was, probably, by this time, advanced in years. 27, 28. The Spirit guided him to the temple at the very moment when the Virgin was about to present Him to the Lord.

child, which the law enjoined, is a powerful argument in proof of that original corruption and depravity which every human being brings into the world. The woman to be purified was placed in the east gate of the court, called Nicanor's gate, and was there sprinkled with blood; thus she received the atonement.

24. And to offer a sacrifice. Neither mother nor child was considered as in the Lord's covenant or under the divine protection till these ceremonies prescribed by the law had been performed. A pair of turtledoves. One was for a burnt offering and the other for a sin offering; see Lev. xii. 8. The rich were required to bring a lamb; but the poor and middling classes were required to bring either two turtledoves or two pigeons. This is a proof that the Holy Family were not in affluence. Jesus sanctified the state of poverty, which is the general state of man, by passing through it. Therefore the poor have the gospel preached unto them, and the poor are they who principally receive it.

25. And, behold, there was a man in Jerusalem. This man is distinguished because of his singular piety. There can be no doubt that there were many persons in Jerusalem named Simeon, besides this man; but there was none of the name who merited the attention of God so much as he in the text.

The same man was just. He steadily regulated all his conduct by the law of his God; and devout—he had fully consecrated himself to God, so that he added a pious heart to a righteous conduct. The original word signifies also a person of good report—one well received among the people, or one cautious and circumspect in matters of religion. Waiting for the consolation of Israel. That is, the Messiah, who was known among the pious Jews by this character; He was to be the consolation of Israel because He was to be its Redemption. The Holy Ghost was upon him. He was a man divinely inspired, overshadowed, and protected by the power and influence of the Most High.

26. It was revealed unto him. He was "divinely informed"—he had an express communication from God concerning the subject. "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him." The soul of a righteous and devout man is a proper habitation for the Holy Spirit. The Lord's Christ. Rather, "the Lord's anointed": that Prophet, Priest, and King who was typified by so many anointed persons under the old covenant.

27. He came by the Spirit into the temple. Probably he had in view the prophecy of Malachi, chap. iii. 1, "The Lord, whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to his temple." Now the prophecy was just going to be fulfilled; and the Holy Spirit, who dwelt in the soul of this must be ready to meet him.

3. The abundant satisfaction wherewith he welcomed this sight: He took him up in his arms (v. 28), he embraced him, laid him in his bosom, as near his heart as he could, which was as full of joy as it could hold. He took him up in his arms, to present him to the Lord. When we receive the record which the gospel gives us of Christ with a lively faith, and the offer it makes us of Christ with love and resignation, then we take Christ in our arms. It was promised him that he should have a sight of Christ; but more is performed than was promised: he has him in his arms.

4. The solemn declaration he made hereupon: He blessed God, and said, Lord, now let thou thy servant depart in peace, v. 29–32.

(1) He has a pleasant prospect concerning himself, he is arrived at a holy contempt of life, and desire of death: "Lord, now let thou thy servant depart, for mine eyes have seen the salvation I was promised a sight of before I died." Here is, [1] An acknowledgment that God had been as good as his word. Never any that hoped in God's word were made ashamed of their hope. [2] A thanksgiving for it. He blessed God that he saw that salvation in his arms. [3] A confession of his faith, that this child in his arms was the Saviour, the Salvation itself; thy salvation, the salvation of thine appointing, the salvation which thou hast prepared. [4] It is a farewell to this world: "Now let thy servant depart." The eye is not satisfied with seeing till it hath seen Christ, and then it is. What a poor thing doth this world look to one that hath Christ in his arms and salvation in his eye! [5] It is a welcome to death: Now let thy servant depart. Simeon is promised that he should not see death till he had seen Christ; and he is willing to construe what was expressed, as an intimation that, when he had seen Christ, he should die: Lord, be it so, saith he, now let me depart. See here, First, How comfortable the death of a good man is; he departs as God's servant from the place of his toil to that of his rest. He departs in peace, peace with God, peace with his own conscience; in peace with death. Secondly, What is the ground of this comfort? For mine eyes have seen thy salvation. It bespeaks a believing expectation of a happy state on the other side death, through this salvation he now had a sight of, which not only takes off the terror of death, but makes in gain, Phil. i. 21. Those that have welcomed Christ may welcome death.

(2) He has a pleasant prospect concerning the world, and concerning the church. This salvation shall be a blessing to the world. It is prepared before the face of all people, to be a light to lighten the Gentiles that now sit in darkness. This has reference to Isa. xlix. 6, I will give thee for a light to the Gentiles; for Christ came to be the light of the world, not a candle in the Jewish candlestick, but the Sun of righteousness; a blessing to the church: the glory of thy people Israel. Of those who were Israelites indeed, of the spiritual Israel, he was indeed the glory, and will be so to eternity. They shall glory in him. When Christ ordered his apostles to preach the gospel to all nations, therein he made himself a light to lighten the Gentiles; and when he added, beginning at Jerusalem, he made himself the glory of his people Israel.

5. The prediction concerning this child, which he delivered to Joseph and Mary. They marvelled at those things which were still more and more fully and plainly spoken concerning this child, v. 33. And because they were affected with, and had their faith strengthened by, that which was said to them, here is more said to them.

(1) Simeon shows them what reason they had to rejoice; for he blessed them (v. 34). He prayed for them that God would bless them, and would have others do so too. He is set for the rising again of many in Israel, that is, for the conversion of many to God that are dead and buried in sin, and for the consolation of many in God that are sunk and lost in sorrow and despair. Those whom he is set for the fall of may be the same with those whom he is set for the rising again of; For their fall, in order to their rising again. He wounds and then heals, Paul falls, and rises again.

(2) He shows them likewise what reason they had to rejoice with trembling. Lest Joseph and Mary especially, should be lifted up with the abundance of the revelations, here is a thorn in the flesh for them, and it is what we sometimes need. It is true, Christ shall be a blessing to Israel; but there are those in Israel whom he is set for the fall of, who will be prejudiced and enraged against him, and offended. As it is pleasant to think how many there are to whom Christ and his gospel are a savour of life unto life, so it is sad to think how many there are to

28. took him up in his arms—immediately recognizing in the child, with unhesitating certainty, the promised Messiah, without needing Mary to inform him of what had happened to her. [OLSHAUSEN]. The remarkable act of taking the babe in his arms must not be overlooked. It was as if he said, "This is all my salvation and all my desire" (II Sam. 23:5).

29. Lord—"Master," a word rarely used in the New Testament, and selected here with peculiar propriety, when the aged saint, feeling that his last object in wishing to live had now been attained, only awaited his Master's word of command to "depart." now lettest . . .—more clearly, "now Thou art releasing Thy servant"; a patient yet reverential mode of expressing a desire to depart. 30. seen thy salvation—Many saw this child, nay, the full-grown "man, Christ Jesus," who never saw in Him "God's Salvation." This estimate of an object of sight, an unconscious, helpless babe, was pure faith. He "beheld His glory" (John 1:14). In another view it was prior faith rewarded by present sight.

32. all people—all the peoples, mankind at large. a light to the Gentiles—then in thick darkness. glory of thy people Israel—already Thine, and now, in the believing portion of it, to be so more gloriously than ever. It will be observed that this "swan-like song, bidding an eternal farewell to this terrestrial life" [OLSHAUSEN], takes a more comprehensive view of the kingdom of Christ than that of Zacharias, though the kingdom they sing of is one.

34, 35. set—appointed. fall and rising again of many in Israel, and for a sign spoken against—Perhaps the former of these phrases expresses the two stages of temporary "fall of many in Israel" through unbelief, during our Lord's earthly career, and the subsequent "rising again" of the same persons after the effusion of the Spirit at pentecost threw a new light to them on the whole subject; while the latter clause describes the determined enemies of the Lord Jesus. Such opposite views of Christ are taken from age to age. 35. Yea, . . .—"Blessed as thou art among women, thou shalt have thine own deep share of the struggles and sufferings which this Babe is to occasion"—pointing not only to the continued obloquy and rejection of this Child of hers, those agonies of His which she was to witness at the cross, and her desolate condition thereafter, but to dreadful alternations of faith and unbelief, of hope and fear regarding Him, which she would have to pass through.

ADAM CLARKE

righteous man, directed him to go and see its accomplishment. Those who come, under the influence of God's Spirit, to places of public worship will undoubtedly meet with Him who is the Comfort and Salvation of Israel. After the custom of the law. To present Him to the Lord, and then redeem Him by paying five shekels, Num. xviii. 15-16, and to offer those sacrifices appointed by the law.

28. Then took he him up in his arms. What must the holy soul of this man have felt in this moment!

29. Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace. "Now Thou dismissest," "loosest" him from life, having lived long enough to have the grand end of life accomplished. According to thy word. It was promised to him that he should not die till he had seen the Lord's Anointed, v. 26; and now, having seen Him, he expects to be immediately dismissed in peace into the eternal world, having a full assurance and enjoyment of the salvation of God.

30. Thy salvation. That Saviour which it became the goodness of God to bestow upon man, and which the necessities of the human race required. Christ is called our salvation, as He is called our Life, our Peace, our Hope; i.e., He is the Author of all these to them who believe.

31. Which thou hast prepared. Which Thou hast "made ready" before the face, in the presence, of all people. Here salvation is represented under the notion of a feast which God himself has provided for the whole world, and to partake of which He has invited all the nations of the earth. There seems a direct allusion here to Isa. xxv. 6, "In this mountain shall the Lord of hosts make unto all people a feast of fat things." Salvation is properly the food of the soul, by which it is nourished unto eternal life; he that receiveth not this must perish forever.

32. A light to lighten the Gentiles. "A light of the Gentiles, for revelation." By Moses and the prophets, a "light of revelation" was given to the Jews, in the blessedness of which the Gentiles did not partake. By Christ and His apostles a luminous revelation is about to be given unto the Gentiles, from the blessedness of which the Jews in general, by their obstinacy and unbelief, shall be long excluded. But to all true Israelites it shall be a glory, an evident fulfillment of all the predictions of the prophets, relative to the salvation of a lost world; and the first offers of it shall be made to the Jewish people, who may see in it the truth of their own Scriptures indisputably evinced.

33. Joseph and his mother marvelled. For they did not as yet fully know the counsels of God relative to the salvation which Christ was to procure, nor the way in which the purchase was to be made.

34. This child is set for the fall. This seems an allusion to Isa. viii. 14-15: Jehovah, God of hosts, shall be "for a stone of stumbling and for a rock of offence to both the houses of Israel . . . And many among them shall stumble, and fall." As Christ did not come as a temporal deliverer, in which character alone the Jews expected Him, the consequence should be, they would reject Him, and so fall by the Romans. See Rom. xi. 11-12 and Matthew xxiv. But in the fullness of time there shall be a rising again of many in Israel. See Rom. xi. 26. And for a sign. A "mark" to shoot at—a metaphor taken from archers. Or perhaps Simeon refers to Isa. xi. 10-12. "There shall be a root of Jesse, which shall stand for an ensign of the people; to it shall the Gentiles seek"—intimating that the Jews would reject it, while the Gentiles should flock to it as their ensign of honor, under which they were to enjoy a glorious rest.

MATTHEW HENRY

whom he is a savour of death unto death. He is set for a sign, to be admired by some, but by others, by many, spoken against. He had many eyes upon him, he was a sign, but he had many tongues against him. The effects of this will be that the thoughts of many hearts will be revealed (v. 35). The secret good affections and dispositions in the minds of some will be revealed by their embracing Christ, and closing with him; the secret corruptions and vicious dispositions of others will be revealed by their enmity to Christ and their rage against him. Men will be judged of by the thoughts of their hearts, their thoughts concerning Christ. The word of God is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart. It is true, Christ shall be a comfort to his mother; but be not thou too proud of it, for a sword shall pass through thine own soul also. He shall be a suffering Jesus. "Thou shalt suffer with him, by sympathy, because of the nearness of thy relation, and strength of affection, to him." When he was abused, it was a sword in her bones. When she stood by his cross, and saw him dying, we may well think her inward grief was such that it might truly be said, A sword pierced through her soul, it cut her to the heart. Thou shalt suffer for him. Many understand it as a prediction of her martyrdom.

II. He is taken notice of by one Anna, a prophetess.

1. The account here given of this Anna, who she was. She was A prophetess. Perhaps no more is meant than that she was one who had understanding in the scriptures above other women, and made it her business to instruct the younger women in the things of God. God left not himself without witness. She was the daughter of Phanuel and her name signifies gracious. She was of the tribe of Asher, which was in Galilee. She was of a great age, a widow of about eighty-four years. She never married again, but continued a widow to her dying day, which is mentioned to her praise. She was a constant resident in or at least attendant on the temple. Some think she had lodgings in the courts of the temple; others think her not departing from the temple means no more, than that she was constantly there at the time of divine service; when any good work was to be done, she was ready to join in it. She served God with fastings and prayers night and day; she gave up herself wholly to her devotions, and spent that time in religious exercises which others spent in eating and drinking and sleeping. And in these she served God; that was it that put a value upon them and an excellency into them. She served God, and aimed at his honour, in fasting and praying. Other duties are in season now and then, but we must pray always. It is a pleasant sight to see aged Christians abounding in acts of devotion, as those that are not weary of well-doing, but that take more and more pleasure in them. Anna is now at length abundantly recompensed for her attendance so many years in the temple.

2. The testimony she bore to our Lord Jesus (v. 38): She came in at that instant, she, who was so constant to the temple, could not miss the opportunity. She gave thanks likewise to the Lord, just as Simeon, perhaps like him, wishing now to depart in peace. We should be excited to our duty by the praises and thanksgiving of others; why should not we give thanks likewise, as well as they? She, as a prophetess, instructed others concerning him: She spoke of him to all them that believed the Messiah would come, and with him looked for redemption in Jerusalem. Some there were in Jerusalem that looked for redemption; yet but a few, for Anna, it should seem, had acquaintance with all. She knew where to find them, or they where to find her, and she told them all the good news, that she had seen the Lord. Those that have an acquaintance with Christ themselves should do all they can to bring others acquainted with him.

Lastly, Here is a short account of the infancy and childhood of our Lord Jesus. Where he spent it, v. 39. They returned into Galilee. Luke relates no more concerning them, till they were returned into Galilee; but it appears by St. Matthew's gospel (ch. ii) that from Jerusalem they returned to Bethlehem, and there they continued till they were directed to flee into Egypt, and, returning thence when Herod was dead, they were directed to go to their old quarters in Nazareth. It is here called their own city. How he spent it, v. 40. In all things it behoved him to be made like unto his brethren, and therefore he passed through infancy and childhood as other children did. As other children, he grew in stature of body, and the improvement of understanding in his human soul. Whereas other children are weak in understanding and resolution, he was strong in spirit. By the Spirit of God his human soul was endued with extraordinary vigour. Whereas other children have foolishness bound in their hearts, he was filled with that the thoughts . . .—Men's views and decisions regarding Christ are a mirror in which the very "thoughts of their hearts" are seen.

37. Anna—or, Hannah. a prophetess—another evidence that "the last times" in which God was to "pour out His Spirit upon all flesh" were at hand. of the tribe of Aser—one of the ten tribes, of whom many were not carried captive, and not a few reunited themselves to Judah after the return from Babylon. The distinction of tribes, though practically destroyed by the captivity, was well enough known up to their final dispersion (Rom. 11:1; Heb. 7:14); nor is it now entirely lost. lived . . .—she had lived seven years with her husband, and been a widow eighty-four years; so that if she married at the earliest marriageable age, twelve years, she could not at this time be less than 103 years old. 37. departed not from the temple—was found there at all stated hours of the day, and even during the night services of the temple watchmen (Ps. 134:1, 2), "serving God with fastings and prayer." (See I Tim. 5:5, suggested by this.)

38. coming in—"presenting herself." She had been there already but now is found "standing by," as Simeon's testimony to the blessed Babe died away, ready to take it up "in turn" (as the word rendered "likewise" here means). to all them . . .—the sense is, "to all them in Jerusalem that were looking for redemption"—saying in effect, In that Babe are wrapt up all your expectations. If this was at the hour of prayer, when numbers flocked to the temple, it would account for her having such an audience as the words imply [ALFORD].

39. Nothing is more difficult than to fix the precise order in which the visit of the Magi, with the flight into and return from Egypt (Matt. 2), are to be taken, in relation to the circumcision and presentation of Christ in the temple, here recorded. It is perhaps best to leave this in the obscurity in which we find it, as the result of two independent, though if we knew all, easily reconcilable narratives. 40. His mental development kept pace with His bodily, and "the grace of God," the divine favor, rested manifestly and increasingly upon Him. See vs. 52.

own soul also. Probably meaning, You also, as well as your Son, shall die a martyr for the truth. But as this is a metaphor used by the most respectable Greek writers to express the most pungent sorrow, it may here refer to the anguish Mary must have felt when standing beside the cross of her tortured Son, John xix. 25.

36. Anna, a prophetess. It does not appear that this person was a prophetess in the strict sense of the word, i.e., one who could foretell future events, but rather a holy woman who, from her extensive knowledge and deep experience in divine things, was capable of instructing others—according to the use of the word propheteuo, 1 Cor. xiv. 3: "He that prophesieth, speaketh unto men to edification, and exhortation, and comfort." So we find this holy widow proclaiming Jesus to all who looked "for redemption in Jerusalem," v. 38. The tribe of Aser. This was one of the ten tribes of the kingdom of Israel, several families of which had returned from their idolatry unto God, in the time that Hezekiah proclaimed the Passover in Jerusalem, which is mentioned in 2 Chron. xxx. 1-11. Seven years. She was a pure virgin when married, was favored with her husband but seven years, and was now in all, taking in the time of her virginity, marriage, and widowhood, eighty-four years of age. At such an age it might be supposed she was reasonably exempted from performing the severer duties of religion, but her spirit of piety continued still to burn with a steady and undiminished flame.

37. Departed not from the temple. Attended constantly at the hours of prayer, which were nine in the morning and three in the afternoon. See Acts ii. 15; iii. 1. It does not appear that women had any other functions to perform in that holy place. With fastings. She accompanied her devotion with frequent fastings, probably not oftener than twice in the week, for this was the custom of the most rigid Pharisees; see chap. xviii. 12.

38. Coming in that instant. "At that very time"—while Simeon held the blessed Redeemer in his arms, and was singing his departing and triumphal song. Gave thanks likewise. She, as well as Simeon, returned God public thanks for having sent this Saviour to Israel. Spake of him. Of the nature and design of His mission, and the glory that should take place in the land. To all them that looked for redemption. As Daniel's seventy weeks were known to be now completed, the more pious Jews were in constant expectation of the promised Messiah. In Jerusalem. It is probable she went about from house to house, testifying the grace of God.

40. The child grew. As to His body—being in perfect health. Waxed strong in spirit. His rational soul became strong and vigorous. Filled with wisdom. The divinity continuing to communicate itself more and more in proportion to the increase of the rational principle. The reader should never forget that Jesus was perfect man as well as God. And the grace of God was upon him. The word not only means grace in the common acceptation of the word (some blessing granted by God's mercy to those who are sinners, or have no merit), but it means also "favor" or "approbation"; and this sense I think most proper for it here when applied to the human nature of our blessed Lord; and thus our translators render the same word, v. 52. Even Christ himself, who knew no sin, grew in the favor of God, and as to His human nature, increased in the graces of the Holy Spirit.

MATTHEW HENRY

wisdom. Everything he said and did was wisely said, and wisely done, above his years. Whereas other children show that the corruption of nature is in them, and the tares of sin grow up with the wheat of reason, he made it appear that nothing but the grace of God was upon him. He was greatly beloved, and high in the favour of God.

Verses 41–52

We have here the only story recorded concerning our blessed Saviour, from his infancy to the day of his showing to Israel, and therefore we are concerned to make much of this, for it is in vain to wish we had more.

I. Christ's going up with his parents to Jerusalem, at the feast of the passover, v. 41, 42. It was their constant practice to attend there, according to the law, though it was a long journey, and they were poor. Public ordinances must be frequented, and we must not forsake the assembling of ourselves together. They went up thither, after the custom of the feast. The child Jesus, at twelve years old, went up with them. The Jewish doctors say that at twelve years old children must begin to fast from time to time, and that at thirteen years old a child begins to be a son of the commandment, having been from his infancy, by virtue of his circumcision, a son of the covenant. Those children that are forward in other things should be put forward in religion. Those children that were in their infancy dedicated to God should be called upon, when they are grown up, to come to the gospel passover, to the Lord's supper, that they may make it their own act and deed to join themselves to the Lord.

II. Christ's tarrying behind his parents at Jerusalem, unknown to them.

1. His parents did not return till they had fulfilled the days; they had stayed there all the seven days at the feast, though it was not absolutely necessary that they should stay longer than the two first days. It is good to stay to the conclusion of an ordinance, as becomes those who say, It is good to be here, and not to hasten away.

2. The child tarried behind in Jerusalem, not because he was loth to go home, or shy of his parents' company, but because he had business to do there, and would let his parents know that he had a Father in heaven, whom he was to be observant of more than of them; and respect to him must not be construed disrespect to them. It is good to see young people willing to dwell in the house of the Lord; they are then like Christ.

3. His parents went the first day's journey without any suspicion that he was left behind, for they supposed him to have been in the company, v. 44. On these occasions, the crowd was very great, and they concluded that he came along with some of their neighbours, and they sought him among their kindred and acquaintance. Pray did you see our Son? or, Did you see him? They found him not, v. 45. There are many, too, many who are our kinsfolk and acquaintance, that we cannot avoid conversing with, among whom we find little or nothing of Christ: When they could not hear of him, yet they hoped they should meet with him at the place where they lodged that night; but there they could learn no tidings of him.

4. When they found him not at their quarters at night, they turned back again, next morning, to Jerusalem, seeking him. Those that would find Christ must seek till they find; for he will at length be found of those that seek him. Those that have lost their comforts in Christ, must bethink themselves where, and when, and how, they lost them, and must turn back again to the place where they last had them.

5. The third day they found him in the temple. There they found him sitting in the midst of them (v. 46), not standing as a catechumen to be examined or instructed by them. This is an instance, not only that he was filled with wisdom (v. 40), but that he had both a desire to increase it and a readiness to communicate it; and herein he is an example to children and young people, who should learn of Christ to delight in the company of those they may get good by, and choose to sit in the midst of the doctors rather than in the midst of the players. Many a youth at Christ's age now would have been playing with the children in the temple, but he was sitting with the doctors in the temple. He heard them. Those that would learn must be swift to hear. He asked them questions; whether, as a teacher (he had authority so to ask) or as a learner (he had humility so to ask) I know not. He returned answers to them, which were very surprising and satisfactory, v. 47. And his wisdom and understanding appeared as much in the questions he asked as in the answers he gave, so that all who heard him were astonished:

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

41-52. FIRST CONSCIOUS VISIT TO JERUSALEM. "Solitary flowered out of the wonderful enclosed garden of the thirty years, plucked precisely there where the swollen bud, at a distinctive crisis (at twelve years of age), bursts into flower. To mark that is assuredly the design and the meaning of this record" [STIER]. 42. went up—"were wont to go." Though males only were required to go up to Jerusalem at the three annual festivals (Exod. 23:14-17), devout women, when family duties permitted, went also, as did Hannah (I Sam. 1:7), and, as we here see, the mother of Jesus. when twelve years old—At this age every Jewish boy was styled "a son of the law," being put under a course of instruction and trained to fasting and attendance on public worship, besides being set to learn a trade. At this age accordingly our Lord is taken up for the first time to Jerusalem, at the passover season, the chief of the three annual festivals. But oh, with what thoughts and feelings must this Youth have gone up! Long ere He beheld it, He had doubtless "loved the habitation of God's house and the place where His honor dwelt" (Ps. 26:8), a love nourished, we may be sure, by that "word hid in His heart," with which in afterlife He showed so perfect a familiarity. As the time for His first visit approached, could one's ear have caught the breathings of His young soul, he might have heard Him whispering, "As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after Thee, O God. The Lord loveth the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob. I was glad when they said unto me, Let us go unto the house of the Lord. Our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem!" (Ps. 42:1; 87:2; 122:1, 2). On catching the first view of "the city of their solemnities," and high above all in it, "the place of God's rest," we hear Him saying to Himself, "Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth is Mount Zion, on the sides of the north, the city of the great King: Out of Zion, the perfection of beauty, God doth shine" (Ps. 48:2; 50:2). Of His feelings or actions during all the eight days of the feast not a word is said. As a devout child, in company with its parents, He would go through the services, keeping His thoughts to Himself. But methinks I hear Him, after the sublime services of that feast, saying to Himself, "He brought me to the banqueting-house, and his banner over me was love. I sat down under his shadow with great delight, and his fruit was sweet to my taste" (Song of Sol. 2:3, 4). 43. as they returned—If the duties of life must give place to worship, worship, in its turn, must give place to them. Jerusalem is good, but Nazareth is good, too; let him who neglects the one, on pretext of attending to the other, ponder this scene. tarried behind . . . Joseph and his mother knew not—Accustomed to the discretion and obedience of the lad [OLSHAUSEN], they might be thrown off their guard. 44. sought him among their kinsfolk and acquaintances—On these sacred journeys, whole villages and districts travelled in groups together, partly for protection, partly for company; and as the well-disposed would beguile the tediousness of the way by good discourse, to which the child Jesus would be no silent listener, they expect to find Him in such a group. 45, 46. After three sorrowing days, they find Him still in Jerusalem, not gazing on its architecture, or surveying its forms of busy life, but in the temple—not the "sanctuary" (as in ch. 1:9), to which only the priests had access, but in some one of the enclosures around it, where the rabbins, or "doctors," taught their scholars. 46. hearing . . . asking—The method of question and answer was the customary form of rabbinical teaching; teacher and learner becoming by turns questioner and answerer, as may be seen from their extant works. This would give full scope for all that "astonished them in His understanding and answers." Not that He assumed the office of teaching—"His hour" for that "was not yet come," and His equipment for that was not complete; for He had yet to "increase in wisdom" as well as "stature" (vs. 52). In fact, the beauty of Christ's example lies very much in His never at one stage of His life anticipating the duties of another. All would be in the style and manner of a learner, "opening His mouth and panting." "His soul breaking for the longing that it had unto God's judgments at all times" (Ps. 119:20), and now more than ever before, when finding Himself for the first time in His Father's house. Still there would be in His questions far more than in their answers; and if we may take the frivolous interrogatories with which they afterwards plied Him, about the woman that had seven husbands and such like, as a specimen of their present drivelling questions, perhaps we shall not greatly err, if we

ADAM CLARKE

41. His parents went . . . every year. This was their constant custom, because positively enjoined by the law, Exod. xxiii. 17. But it does not appear that infants were obliged to be present; and yet all the men-children are positively ordered to make their appearance at Jerusalem thrice in the year, Exod. xxxiv. 23. And our Lord, being now twelve years old, v. 42, accompanies His parents to the feast. Probably this was the very age at which the male children were obliged to appear before the Lord at the three public festivals—the Feast of Unleavened Bread, of Weeks, and of Tabernacles. According to the Jewish canons, it was the age at which they were obliged to begin to learn a trade.

43. Had fulfilled the days. Eight days in the whole: one was the Passover, and the other seven the days of unleavened bread.

44. Supposing him to have been in the company. Some have supposed that the men and women marched in separate companies on these occasions, which is very likely; and that sometimes the children kept company with the men, sometimes with the women. This might have led to what otherwise seems to have been inexcusable carelessness in Joseph and Mary. Joseph, not seeing Jesus in the men's company, might suppose He was with His mother in the women's company; and Mary, not seeing Him with her, might imagine He was with Joseph. And they sought him. "They earnestly sought Him." They are now both duly affected with a sense of their great loss and great negligence. Kinsfolk and acquaintance. Those of the same family and neighborhood went up to Jerusalem together on such occasions.

45. Seeking him. Or rather, "seeking Him diligently." This is the reading of several MSS., Vulgate, and nine copies of the Itala.

46. Sitting in the midst of the doctors. The rabbins, who were explaining the law and the ceremonies of the Jewish religion to their disciples. Asking them questions. Not as a scholar asks his teacher, to be informed; but as a teacher, who proposes questions to his scholars in order to take an occasion to instruct them.

47. Answers. The word seems not to mean answers only, but what Jesus said by way of question to the doctors, v. 46.

MATTHEW HENRY

they never heard one so young, nor indeed any of their greatest doctors, talk sense at the rate that he did. He gave them a taste (says Calvin) of his divine wisdom and knowledge. They understood not; they were only astonished.

6. His mother talked with him privately about it, v. 48. Joseph and Mary were both amazed to find him there, and to find that he had so much respect showed him as to be admitted to sit among the doctors. His mother told him how ill they took it: "Son, why hast thou thus dealt with us? Why didst thou put us into such a fright?" Thy father and I have sought thee, sorrowing. Those may have leave to complain of their losses that think they have lost Christ. They did not sorrow and sit down in despair, but sorrowed and sought. They that thus seek him in sorrow shall find him, at length, with so much the greater joy. He gently reproved their inordinate solicitude about him (v. 49): "How is it that you sought me? Wist ye not that I ought to be, ἐν τοῖς τοῦ πατρός μου;—in my Father's house?" so some read it. "Under my Father's care and protection." "At my Father's work" (so we take it): I must be about my Father's business, and therefore could not go home as soon as you might. Wist ye not? It was his errand into the world, and his meat and drink in the world, to do his Father's will, and finish his work: and yet at that time his parents understood not this saying, v. 50.

Lastly, Here is their return to Nazareth. He did not urge his parents either to come and settle at Jerusalem, but very willingly retired into his obscurity at Nazareth, where for many years he was, as it were, buried alive. But here we are told,

1. That he was subject to his parents; as it should seem, worked with his father at the trade of a carpenter. Herein he hath given an example to children to be dutiful and obedient to their parents in the Lord. Though his parents were poor and mean, though he was strong in spirit, and filled with wisdom, yet he was subject to his parents; how then will they answer it who, though foolish and weak, yet are disobedient to their parents?

2. That his mother, though she did not perfectly understand her son's sayings, yet kept them in her heart. However we may neglect men's sayings because they are obscure, yet we must not think so of God's sayings. That which at first is dark, so that we know not what to make of it, may afterwards become plain and easy. We may find use for that another time which now we see not how to make useful to us.

3. That he improved, and came on, to admiration (v. 52): He increased in wisdom and stature. This is meant of his human nature, his body increased in stature and bulk, he grew in the growing age; and his soul increased in wisdom, and in all the endowments of a human soul. As the faculties of his human soul grew more and more capable, the gifts it received from the divine nature were more and more communicated. And he increased in favour with God and man. The image of God shone brighter in him, when he grew up to be a youth, than it did, or could, while he was an infant and a child.

suppose that "the questions" which He now "asked them" in return were just the germs of those pregnant questions with which He astonished and silenced them in after years: "What think ye of Christ? Whose Son is He? If David call Him Lord, how is He then his Son?" "Which is the first and great commandment?" "Who is my neighbour?" 49. about my Father's businesss—lit., "in" or "at My Fathers," i.e., either "about My Father's affairs," or "in My Father's courts"—where He dwells and is to be found—about His hand, so to speak. This latter shade of meaning, which includes the former, is perhaps the true one, Here He felt Himself at home, breathing His own proper air. His words convey a gentle rebuke of their obtuseness in requiring Him to explain this. "Once here, thought ye I should so readily hasten away? Let ordinary worshippers be content to keep the feast and be gone; but is this all ye have learnt of Me?" Methinks we are here let into the holy privacies of Nazareth; for what He says they should have known, He must have given them ground to know. She tells Him of the sorrow with which His father and she had sought Him. He speaks of no Father but one, saying, in effect, My Father has not been seeking Me; I have been with Him all this time; "the King hath brought me into His chambers . . . His left hand is under my head, and His right hand doth embrace me" (Song of Sol. 1:4; 2: 6). How is it that ye do not understand? (Mark 8:21.) 50, 51. understood not—probably He had never expressly said as much, and so confounded them, though it was but the true interpretation of many things which they had seen and heard from Him at home. (See on John 14:4, 5). But lest it should be thought that now He threw off the filial yoke, and became His own Master henceforth, and theirs too, it is purposely added, "And He went down with them, and was subject unto them." The marvel of this condescension lies in its coming after such a scene, and such an assertion of His higher Sonship; and the words are evidently meant to convey this. "From this time we have no more mention of Joseph. The next we hear is of his "mother and brethren" (John 2:12); whence it is inferred, that between this time and the commencement of our Lord's public life, Joseph died" [ALFORD], having now served the double end of being the protector of our Lord's Virgin-mother, and affording Himself the opportunity of presenting a matchless pattern of subjection to both parents. 52. See on vs. 40. stature—or better, perhaps, as in the margin, "age," which implies the other. This is all the record we have of the next eighteen years of that wondrous life. What seasons of tranquil meditation over the lively oracles, and holy fellowship with His Father; what inlettings, on the one hand, of light, and love, and power from on high, and outgoings of filial supplication, freedom, love, and joy on the other, would these eighteen years contain! And would they not seem "but a few days" if they were so passed, however ardently He might long to be more directly "about His Father's business?"

ADAM CLARKE

48. Why hast thou thus dealt with us? It certainly was not His fault, but theirs. Men are very apt to lay on others the blame of their own misconduct.

49. How is it that ye sought me? Is not this intended as a gentle reproof? My Father's business. "My Father's concerns." Some think that these words should be translated, "In My Father's house," which was a reason that they should have sought Him in the Temple only. As if He had said, Where should a child be found, but in his father's house?

51. Was subject unto them. Behaved towards them with all dutiful submission. Probably His working with His hands at His reputed father's business is here also implied; see on v. 41. No child among the Jews was ever brought up in idleness.

52. Jesus increased in wisdom. See on v. 40.

CHAPTER 3

Verses 1–14

John's baptism introducing a new dispensation, it was requisite that we should have a particular account of it. Glorious things were said of John (ch. i. 15, 17); but we lost him in the deserts, and there he remains until the day of his showing unto Israel, ch. i. 80.

I. The date of the beginning of John's baptism; this is here taken notice of, which was not by the other evangelists, that the truth of the thing might be confirmed by the exact fixing of the time. And it is dated,

1. By the government of the heathen, which the Jews were under.

(1) It is dated by the reign of the Roman emperor; it was in the fifteenth year of Tiberius Cæsar, the third of the twelve Cæsars, a very bad man. The people of the Jews, after a long struggle, were of late made a province of the empire, and were under the dominion of this Tiberius; an inconsiderable despicable part of the Roman empire.

(2) It is dated by the governments of the viceroys that ruled in the several parts of the Holy Land under the Roman emperor, which was another badge of their servitude, for they were all foreigners. Pilate is here said to be the governor, president, or procurator, of Judæa. This character is given of him by some other writers, that he was a wicked man, and one that made no conscience of a lie. He reigned ill,

CHAPTER 3

Vss. 1-20. PREACHING, BAPTISM, AND IMPRISONMENT OF JOHN. See on Matthew 3:1-12; Mark 6: 17, etc. 1, 2. Here the curtain of the New Testament is, as it were, drawn up, and the greatest of all epochs of the Church commences. Even our Lord's own age (vs. 23) is determined by it [BENGEL]. No such elaborate chronological precision is to be found elsewhere in the New Testament, and it comes fitly from him who claims it as the peculiar recommendation of his Gospel, that he had "accurately traced down all things from the first" (ch. 1:3). Here, evidently, commences his proper narrative. the fifteenth year of Tiberius—reckoning from the period when he was admitted, three years before Augustus' death, to a share of the empire [WEBSTER and WILKINSON], about the end of the year of Rome 779, or about four years before the usual reckoning. Pilate . . . governor of Judea—His proper title was Procurator, but with more than the usual powers of that office. After holding it about ten years he was ordered to Rome, to answer to charges brought against him, but ere he arrived Tiberius died (A.D. 35), and soon after Pilate committed suicide. Herod—(See on Mark 6:14). Philip—a different and very superior Philip to the one whose wife Herodias went to live with Herod Antipas. (See Mark 6:17.) Iturea—to the northeast of Palestine; so called from Ishmael's son

CHAPTER 3

1. Fifteenth year. This was the fifteenth of his principality and thirteenth of his monarchy; for he was two years joint emperor, previously to the death of Augustus. Tiberius Caesar. This emperor succeeded Augustus, in whose reign Christ was born. He began his reign August 19, A.D. 14, reigned twenty-three years, and died March 16, A.D. 37, aged seventy-eight years. He was a most infamous character. During the latter part of his reign especially, he did all the mischief he possibly could; and that his tyranny might not end with his life, he chose Caius Caligula for his successor, merely on account of his bad qualities. Herod. This was Herod Antipas, the son of Herod the Great, who murdered the innocents. It was the same Herod who beheaded John Baptist, and to whom our Lord was sent by Pilate. Ituraea and . . . Trachonitis. Two provinces of Syria, on the confines of Judea. Abilene. Another province of Syria, which had its name from Abila, its chief city. These estates were left to Herod Antipas and his brother Philip by the will of their father, Herod the Great, and were confirmed to them by the decree of Augustus.

That Philip was tetrarch of Trachonitis in the fifteenth year of Tiberius we are assured by Josephus, who says that Philip the brother of and at last was displaced and sent to Rome, to answer for his maladministrations. The other three are called tetrarchs, some think from the countries which they had the command of, each of them being over a fourth part of that which had been entirely under the government of Herod the Great.

2. By the government of the Jews among themselves, v. 2. Annas and Caiaphas were the high priests. God had appointed that there should be but one high priest at a time, but here were two, to serve some ill turn or other.

II. The origin and tendency of John's baptism.

1. The origin of it was from heaven: The word of God came unto John, v. 2. It is the same expression that is used concerning the Old Testament prophets (Jer. i. 2); for John was a prophet, yea, more than a prophet. John is here called the son of Zacharias, to refer us to what the angel said to his father. The word of the Lord came to him in the wilderness; for those whom God fits he will find out, wherever they are. As the word of the Lord is not bound in a prison, so it is not lost in a wilderness. John was the son of a priest, now entering upon the thirtieth year of his age; and therefore, according to the custom of the temple, he was now to be admitted into the temple-service. But God had called him to a more honourable ministry.

2. The scope and design of it were to bring all the people of his country off from their sins and home to their God, v. 3. He came first into all the country about Jordan, that part of the country which Israel took possession of first; there was the banner of the gospel first displayed. John resided in the most solitary part of the country; but, when the word of the Lord came to him, he quitted his deserts, and came into the inhabited country. Those that are best pleased in their retirements must cheerfully exchange them, when God calls them into places of concourse. He came into all the country, preaching a new baptism. The sign or ceremony, was such as was ordinarily used among the Jews, washing with water, by which proselytes were sometimes admitted, but the meaning of it was, repentance for the remission of sins.

(1) They were thereby obliged to repent of their sins, to be sorry for what they had done amiss, and to do so no more. The former they professed, and were concerned to be sincere in their professions; the latter they promised, and were concerned to make good what they promised. He bound them to change their mind, and change their way, and to make them new hearts and to live new lives.

(2) They were thereby assured of the pardon of their sins, upon their repentance. As the baptism he administered bound them not to submit to the power of sin, so it sealed to them a gracious and pleadable discharge from the guilt of sin.

III. The fulfilling of the scriptures in the ministry of John. The other evangelists had referred us to the same text that is here referred to, that of Esaias, ch. xl. 3. It is written in the book of the words of Esaias the prophet. Among them it is found that there should be the voice of one crying in the wilderness; and John is that voice; he cries, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, and make his paths straight. Luke goes further on with the quotation than Matthew and Mark had done, and applies the following words likewise to John's ministry (v. 5, 6), Every valley shall be filled. 1. The humble shall by it be enriched with grace. 2. The proud shall by it be humbled; Every mountain and hill shall be brought low. 3. Sinners shall be converted to God; The crooked ways and the crooked spirits shall be made straight. God by his grace can make that straight which sin hath made crooked. 4. Difficulties that were hindering and discouraging in the way to heaven shall be removed: The rough ways shall be made smooth. The gospel has made the way to heaven plain and easy to be found, smooth and easy to be walked in. 5. The great salvation shall be more fully discovered than ever, and the discovery of it shall spread further (v. 6): All flesh shall see the salvation of God; not the Jews only, but the Gentiles. All shall see it, and some of all sorts shall see it, enjoy it, and have the benefit of it.

IV. The general warnings and exhortations which he gave to those who submitted to his baptism, v. 7–9. In Matthew he is said to have preached these same things to many of the Pharisees and Sadducees, that came to his baptism (Matt. iii. 7–10); but here he is said to have spoken them to the multitude, that came forth to be baptized of him, v. 7. This was the purport of his preaching to all that came to him. As he did not flatter the great, so neither did he compliment the many, but gave the same reproofs of sin and warnings of wrath to the multitude that he did to the Sadducees and Pharisees; for, if they had not the same faults, they had others as bad. Now observe here, Itur or Jetur (I Chron. 1:31), and anciently belonging to the half tribe of Manasseh. Trachonitis—farther to the northeast, between Iturea and Damascus; a rocky district, infested by robbers, and committed by Augustus to Herod the Great to keep in order. Abilene—still more to the northeast, so called from Abila, eighteen miles from Damascus [ROBINSON]. Annas and Caiaphas . . . high priests—the former, though deposed, retained much of his influence, and, probably, as sagan or deputy, exercised much of the power of the high priesthood along with Caiaphas (John 18:13; Acts 4:6). Both Zadok and Abiathar acted as high priests in David's time (II Sam. 15:35), and it seems to have become the fixed practice to have two (II Kings 25: 18). word of God came unto John—Such formulas, of course, are never used when speaking of Jesus, because the divine nature manifested itself in Him not at certain isolated moments of His life. He was the one everlasting manifestation of the Godhead—THE WORD [OLSHAUSEN].

And were baptized of him in Jordan, confessing [probably confessing aloud] their sins—This baptism was at once a public seal of their felt need of deliverance from sin, of their expectation of the coming Deliverer, and of their readiness to welcome Him when He appeared. The baptism itself startled, and was intended to startle, them. They were familiar enough with the baptism of proselytes from heathenism; but this baptism of Jews themselves was quite new and strange to them.

Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight—This prediction is quoted in all the four Gospels, showing that it was regarded as a great outstanding one, and the predicted forerunner as the connecting link between the old and the new economies. Like the great ones of the earth, the Prince of peace was to have His immediate approach proclaimed and His way prepared; and the call here—taking it generally—is a call to put out of the way whatever would obstruct His progress and hinder His complete triumph, whether those hindrances were public or personal, outward or inward. In Luke (3:5, 6) the quotation is thus continued: "Every valley shall be filled, and every mountain and hill shall be brought low; and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough ways shall be made smooth; and all flesh shall see the salvation of God." 5. every valley . . .—levelling and smoothing, obvious figures, the sense of which is in the first words of the proclamation, "Prepare ye the way of the Lord."

6. all flesh . . .—(quoted literally from the Septuagint of Isa. 40:5). The idea is that every obstruction shall be so removed as to reveal to the whole world the Salvation of God in Him whose name is the "Saviour" (cf. Ps. 98:3; Isa. 11:10; 49:6; 52:10; Luke 2:31, 32; Acts 13:47).

Herod died in the twentieth year of Tiberius, after he had governed Trachonitis, Batanea, and Gaulonitis thirty-seven years, Antiq., b. xviii, c. 5, s. 6. And Herod continued tetrarch of Galilee till he was removed by Caligula, the successor of Tiberius, Antiq., b. xviii, c. 8, s. 2. That Lysanias was tetrarch of Abilene is also evident from Josephus. He continued in this government till the Emperor Claudius took it from him, A.D. 42, and made a present of it to Agrippa. See Antiq., b. xix, c. 5, s. 1. Tetrarch signifies the "ruler of the fourth part of a country." See the note on Matt. xiv. 1.

2. Annas and Caiaphas being the high priests. Caiaphas was the son-in-law of Annas or Ananias, and it is supposed that they exercised the high priest's office by turns. The word of God came unto John. That is, the Holy Spirit revealed to him this doctrine of salvation. This came upon him in the desert, where he was living in such a state of austerity as gave him full right to preach all the rigors of penitence to others.

3. The baptism of repentance. See on Matt. iii. 4-6, and Mark i. 1 and xvi at the end.

Were baptized. Were the people dipped or sprinkled? Those who are dipped or immersed in water, in the name of the Holy Trinity, I believe to be evangelically baptized; those who are washed or sprinkled with water in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, I believe to be equally so. Confessing their sins. Earnestly acknowledging that their sins were their own, thus taking the whole blame upon themselves, and laying nothing to the charge of God or man. This is essential to true repentance; and till a man take the whole blame on himself, he cannot feel the absolute need he has of casting his soul on the mercy of God, that he may be saved.

4. Prepare ye the way. It was customary for the Hindoo kings, when on journeys, to send a certain class of the people two or three days before them, to command the inhabitants to clear the ways—a very necessary precaution where there are no public roads.

5. Every valley shall be filled. All hindrances shall be taken out of the way. A quotation from the Greek version of Isa. xl. 4, containing an allusion to the preparations made in rough countries to facilitate the march of mighty kings and conquerors.

7-9. On this account of the Baptist's mode of preaching, see the notes on Matt. iii. 7-11.

Pharisees. A very numerous sect among the Jews, who, in their origin, were very probably a pure and holy people. It is likely that they got the name of Pharisees, i.e., Separatists (from pharash, "to separate"), from their separating themselves from the pollution of the Jewish national worship. But in process of time, like all religious sects and parties, they degenerated; they lost the spirit of their institu-

MATTHEW HENRY

1. That the guilty corrupted race of mankind is become a generation of vipers; not only poisoned, but poisonous; hateful to God, hating one another.

2. This generation of vipers is fairly warned to flee from the wrath to come, which is certainly before them if they continue such. We are not only warned of this wrath, but are put into a way to escape it, if we look about us in time.

3. There is no way of fleeing from the wrath to come, but by repentance.

4. Those that profess repentance are highly concerned to live like penitents (v. 8): Bring forth therefore fruits meet for repentance, else you cannot escape the wrath to come. By the change of our way must be evidenced the change of our mind.

5. If we be not really holy, both in heart and life, our profession of religion will stand us in no stead at all: Begin not now to frame excuses from this great duty of repentance, by saying within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father.

6. We have therefore no reason to depend upon our external privileges and professions of religion, because God can effectually secure his own honour and interest without us. If we were cut off and ruined, he could raise up to himself a church out of the most unlikely,—children to Abraham even out of stones.

7. The greater professions we make of repentance, and the greater assistances and encouragements are given us to repentance, the nearer and the sorer will our destruction be if we do not bring forth fruits meet for repentance. Now that the kingdom of heaven is at hand, now that the axe is laid to the root of the tree, threatenings to the wicked and impenitent are now more terrible than before, as encouragements to the penitent are now more comfortable.

8. Barren trees will be cast into the fire at length; it is the fittest place for them: Every tree that doth not bring forth fruit, good fruit, is hewn down, and cast into the fire.

V. The particular instructions he gave to several sorts of persons, that enquired of him concerning their duty: the people, the publicans, and the soldiers. Some of the Pharisees and Sadducees came to his baptism; but we do not find them asking, What shall we do? They thought they knew. But the people, the publicans, and the soldiers, who knew that they had done amiss, and were conscious to themselves of great ignorance and unacquaintedness with the divine law, were particularly inquisitive: What shall we do? Those that are baptized must be taught. Those that profess and promise repentance in general must evidence it by particular instances of reformation. They that would do their duty must desire to know their duty. These here enquire, not, What shall this man do? but, What shall we do? What fruits meet for repentance shall we bring forth? Now John gives answer to each, according to their place and station.

(1) He tells the people their duty, and that is to be charitable (v 11): He that has two coats, let him give, or lend at least, to him that has none, to keep him warm. The gospel requires mercy, and not sacrifice; and the design of it is to engage us to do all the good we can. Food and raiment are the two supports of life; he that hath meat to spare, let him give to him that is destitute of daily food. What we have we are but stewards of, and must use it, accordingly, as our Master directs.

(2) He tells the publicans their duty, the collectors of the emperor's revenue (v. 13): Exact no more than that which is appointed you. They must do justice between the government and the merchant, and not oppress the people in levying the taxes. They must not think that because it was their office to take care that the people did not defraud the prince they might therefore, by the power they had, bear hard upon the people, as those that have ever so little a branch of power are apt to abuse it: "Collect for Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and do not enrich yourselves by taking more." The public revenues must be applied to the public service, and not to gratify the avarice of private persons. He does not direct the publicans to quit their places, the employment is in itself lawful and necessary, but let them be just and honest in it.

(3) He tells the soldiers their duty, v. 14. Some think that these soldiers were Romans; and then it is an early instance of Gentiles embracing the gospel and submitting to it. Military men seldom seem inclined to religion; yet these submitted even to the Baptist's strict profession, and desired to receive the word of command from him: What must we do? In answer to this enquiry, John does not bid them lay down their arms, but cautions them against the sins that soldiers were commonly guilty of. They must not be injurious to the people among whom they were

O generation of vipers—"Viper-brood," expressing the deadly influence of both sects alike upon the community. Mutually and entirely antagonistic as were their religious principles and spirit, the stern prophet charges both alike with being the poisoners of the nation's religious principles. In ch. 12:34, and 23:33, this strong language of the Baptist is anew applied by the faithful and true Witness to the Pharisees specifically—the only party that had zeal enough actively to diffuse this poison. who hath warned you [given you the hint, as the idea is] to flee from the wrath to come?—"What can have brought you hither?" John more than suspected it was not so much their own spiritual anxieties as the popularity of his movement that had drawn them thither. What an expression is this, "The wrath to come!" God's "wrath," in Scripture, is His righteous displeasure against sin, and consequently against all in whose skirts sin is found, arising out of the essential and eternal opposition of His nature to all moral evil. This is called "the coming wrath," not as being wholly future—for as a merited sentence it lies on the sinner already, and its effects, both inward and outward, are to some extent experienced even now—but because the impenitent sinner will not, until "the judgment of the great day," be concluded under it, will not have sentence publicly and irrevocably passed upon him, will not have it discharged upon him and experience its effects without mixture and without hope. In this view of it, it is a wrath wholly to come, as is implied in the noticeably different form of the expression employed by the apostle in I Thessalonians 1:10. Not that even true penitents came to John's baptism with all these views of "the wrath to come." But what he says is that this was the real import of the step itself. In this view of it, how striking is the word he employs to express that step—fleeing from it—as of one who, beholding a tide of fiery wrath rolling rapidly towards him, sees in instant flight his only escape! Bring forth therefore fruits [the true reading clearly is "fruit"] meet for repentance—that is, such fruit as befits a true penitent. John now being gifted with a knowledge of the human heart, like a true minister of righteousness and lover of souls here directs them how to evidence and carry out their repentance, supposing it genuine; and in the following verses warns them of their danger in case it were not.

10-14. What shall we do then?—to show the sincerity of our repentance.

11. two coats . . .—directed against the reigning avarice.

12. publicans . . . 13. Exact no more . . .—directed against that extortion which made the publicans a byword. (See on ch. 19:2, 8.)

ADAM CLARKE

tion. They ceased to recur to first principles, and had only the form of godliness, when Jesus Christ preached in Judea; for He bore witness that they did make the outside of the cup and platter clean—they observed the rules of their institution but the spirit was gone. Sadducees. A sect who denied the existence of angels and spirits, consequently all divine influence and inspiration, and also the resurrection of the dead. The Sadducees of that time were the materialists and deists of the Jewish nation. When the sect of the Pharisees arose cannot be distinctly ascertained, but it is supposed to have been some time after the Babylonish captivity. The sect of the Sadducees were the followers of one Sadok, a disciple of Antigonus Sochaeus, who flourished about three centuries before Christ. O generation of vipers. A terribly expressive speech. A serpentine brood, from a serpentine stock. As their fathers were, so were they, children of the wicked one. This is God's estimate of a sinner, whether he wade in wealth or soar in fame. The wrath to come. The desolation which was about to fall on the Jewish nation for their wickedness, and threatened in the last words of their own Scriptures. See Mal. iv. 6. "Lest I come and smite the earth with a curse." This wrath or curse was coming; they did not prevent it by turning to God, and receiving the Messiah, and therefore the wrath of God came upon them to the uttermost.

And now also the ax is laid. Or, Even now the ax lieth. As if he had said, There is not a moment to spare—God is about to cut off every impenitent soul—you must therefore either turn to God immediately or be utterly and finally ruined. It was customary with the prophets to represent the kingdoms, nations, and individuals, whose ruin they predicted, under the notion of forests and trees doomed to be cut down. See Jer. xlvi. 22-23; Ezek. xxxi. 3, 11-12. The Baptist follows the metaphor; the Jewish nation is the tree, and the Romans the ax which, by the just judgment of God, was speedily to cut it down.

10. What shall we do then? The preaching of the Baptist had been accompanied with an uncommon effusion of that Spirit which convinces of sin, righteousness, and judgment. The people who heard him now earnestly begin to inquire what they must do to be saved. They are conscious that they are exposed to the judgments of the Lord, and they wish to escape from the coming wrath.

11. He that hath two coats. He first teaches the great mass of the people their duty to each other. They were uncharitable and oppressive, and he taught them not to expect any mercy from the hand of God while they acted towards others in opposition to its dictates. If men be unkind and uncharitable towards each other, how can they expect the mercy of the Lord to be extended towards themselves?

12. Then came also publicans. He next instructs the taxgatherers in the proper discharge of their duty, though it was an office detested by the Jews at large, yet the Baptist does not condemn it. It is only the abuse of it that he speaks against. If taxes be necessary for the support of a state, there must be collectors of them; and the collector, if he properly discharge his duty, is not only a useful, but also a respectable, officer. But it seems the Jewish taxgatherers exacted much more from the people than government authorized them to do, v. 13, and the surplus they pocketed. For an account of the publicans, see the note on Matt. v. 46.

MATTHEW HENRY

quartered: "Do violence to no man. Your business is to keep the peace, do not you do violence to any. Shake no man" (so the word signifies); "do not put people into fear; the sword of war, as well as that of justice, is to be a terror only to evil doers, but a protection to those that do well." Nor must they accuse any falsely to the government, thereby to make themselves formidable, and get bribes. They must not be injurious to their fellow-soldiers; for some think that caution, not to accuse falsely, has special reference to them: "Be not forward to complain one of another to your superior officers, that you may be revenged on those whom you have a pique against." They must not be given to mutiny, or contend with their generals about their pay: "Be content with your wages. While you have what you agreed for, do not murmur that it is not more." It is discontent with what they have that makes men oppressive and injurious. It is wisdom to make the best of that which is.

Verses 15–20

I. How the people took occasion, from the ministry and baptism of John, to think of the Messiah, and to think of him as at the door. Thus the way of the Lord was prepared. When men's expectations are raised, that which they are in expectation of becomes doubly acceptable. Now when they observed what an excellent doctrine John Baptist preached, 1. They began presently to consider that now was the time for the Messiah to appear. Never did the corrupt state of the Jews more need a reformation, nor their distressed state more need a deliverance, than now. 2. Their next thought was, "Is not this he that should come?" All thinking men mused, or reasoned, in their hearts, concerning John, whether he were the Christ or not. His life was holy and strict, his preaching powerful and with authority, and therefore "why may we not think that he is the Messiah?" That which puts people upon considering, reasoning with themselves, prepares the way for Christ.

II. How John disowned all pretensions to the honour of being himself the Messiah, but confirmed them in their expectations of him that really was the Messiah, v. 16, 17. John's office, as a crier or herald, was to give notice that the kingdom of God was at hand; and therefore, when he had told all manner of people severally what they must do, he tells them one thing more which they must all do: they must expect the Messiah now shortly to appear. And this serves as an answer to their musings and debates concerning himself.

1. He declares that the utmost he could do was to baptize them with water. He could only exhort them to repent, and assure them of forgiveness, upon repentance.

2. He consigns them, and turns them over, as it were, to Jesus Christ, for whom he was sent to prepare the way, and would have them no longer to debate whether John was the Messiah or no, but to look for him that was really so.

(1) John owns the Messiah to have a greater excellency than he had; he is one the latchet of whose shoe he does not think himself worthy to loose. John was a prophet, yea more than a prophet, more so than any of the Old Testament prophets; but Christ was a prophet more than John. This was a great truth which John came to preach; but the manner of his expressing it bespeaks his humility, and in it he not only does justice to the Lord Jesus, but does him honour too. Thus highly does it become us to speak of Christ, and thus humbly of ourselves.

(2) He owns him to have a greater energy than he had: "He is mightier than I." They thought that a wonderful power went along with John; but what was that compared with the power which Jesus would come clothed with? John can do no more than baptize with water, in token of this, that they ought to purify and cleanse themselves; but Christ can, and will, baptize with the Holy Ghost; he can give the Spirit to cleanse and purify the heart. John can only preach a distinguishing doctrine, and by word and sign separate between the precious and the vile; but Christ hath his fan in his hand, with which he can, and will, perfectly separate between the wheat and the chaff. He will thoroughly purge his floor. John can only speak comfort to those that receive the gospel, but Jesus Christ will give them comfort. John can only promise them that they shall be safe; but Christ will make them so. John can only threaten hypocrites, and tell the barren trees that they shall be hewn down and cast into the fire; but Christ can execute that threatening; those that are as chaff, light, and vain, and worthless, he will burn with fire unquenchable.

The evangelist concludes his account of John's preaching with an et cetera (v. 18): Many other things in his exhortation preached he unto the people. First, soldiers . . . Do violence to none—The word signifies to "shake thoroughly," and so to "intimidate," probably in order to extort money or other property. accuse . . . falsely—acting as informers vexatiously, on frivolous or false grounds. content with your wages—"rations." We may take this as a warning against mutiny, which the officers attempted to suppress by largesses and donations [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. And thus the "fruits" which would evidence their repentance were just resistance to the reigning sins, particularly of the class to which the penitent belonged, and the manifestation of an opposite spirit.

15-17. whether he were the Christ—showing both how successful he had been in awakening the expectation of Messiah's immediate appearing, and the high estimation, and even reverence, which his own character commanded.

16. John answered . . .—either to the deputation from Jerusalem (see John 1:19, etc.), or on some other occasion, simply to remove impressions derogatory to his blessed Master which he knew to be taking hold of the popular mind. saying unto them all, . . .—in solemn protestation. So far from entertaining such a thought as laying claim to the honors of Messiahship, the meanest services I can render to that "Mightier than I that is coming after me," are too high an honor for me. Beautiful spirit, distinguishing this servant of Christ throughout! one mightier than I—"the Mighter than I."

18. many other things, . . .—such as we read in John 1:29, 33, 34; 3:27-36.

ADAM CLARKE

14. The soldiers likewise demanded of him. He, thirdly, instructs those among the military. They were either Roman soldiers or the soldiers of Herod or Philip. Use no violence to any; do not extort money or goods by force or violence from any. Neither accuse any falsely. Or "on a frivolous pretense"—"be not sycophants," like those who are base flatterers of their masters, who to ingratiate themselves into their esteem, malign, accuse, and impeach the innocent. Be content with your wages. The word signifies not only the money which was allotted to a Roman soldier, which was two oboli, about three halfpence per day, but also the necessary supply of wheat, barley, etc.

15. Whether he were the Christ. So general was the reformation which was produced by the Baptist's preaching that the people were ready to consider him as the promised Messiah. Thus John came in the spirit and power of Elijah, and reformed all things; showed the people, the taxgatherers, and the soldiers their respective duties, and persuaded them to put away the evil of their doings. See the note on Matt. xvii. 11.

16-17. On these verses see Matt. iii. 11-12 and Mark i. 7-8, and particularly the note on John iii. 5.

But he that cometh after me, or, is coming after me, who is now on His way, and will shortly make His appearance. Jesus Christ began His ministry when He was thirty years of age, Luke 3:23, which was the age appointed by the law, Num. iv. 3. John the Baptist was born about six months before Christ; and as he began his public ministry when thirty years of age, then this coming after refers to six months after the commencement of John's public preaching, at which time Christ entered upon His. Whose shoes I am not worthy to bear. This saying is expressive of the most profound humility and reverence. To put on, take off, and carry the shoes of their masters was not only among the Jews but also among the Greeks and Romans the work of the vilest slaves. With the Holy Ghost, and with fire. That the influences of the Spirit of God are here designed needs but little proof. Christ's religion was to be a spiritual religion, and was to have its seat in the heart. Outward precepts, however well they might describe, could not produce inward spirituality. This was the province of the Spirit of God, and of Him alone; therefore He is represented here under the similitude of fire, because He was to illuminate and invigorate the soul, penetrate every part, and assimilate the whole to the image of the God of glory.

Whose fan is in his hand. The Romans are here termed God's fan, as in v. 10 they were called His ax, and as in 12:7, they are termed His troops or armies. His floor. Does not this mean the land of Judea, which had been long, as it were, the threshing floor of the Lord? God says He will now, by the winnowing fan (viz., the Romans), throughly cleanse this floor. The wheat, those who believe in the Lord Jesus, He will gather into His garner, either take to heaven from the evil to come, or put in a place of safety, as He did the Christians by sending them to Pella previously to the destruction of Jerusalem. But he will burn up the chaff—the disobedient and rebellious Jews, who

John was an affectionate preacher. He was exhorting, beseeching; he pressed things home upon his hearers, as one in earnest. Secondly, He was a practical preacher. Much of his preaching was exhortation, quickening them to their duty, directing them in it, and not amusing them with matters of nice speculation. Thirdly, He was a popular preacher. He addressed himself to the people, to the laity, and accommodated himself to their capacity, as promising himself best success among them. Fourthly, He was an evangelical preacher, he preached the gospel to the people; in all his exhortations, he directed people to Christ, and excited and encouraged their expectations of him. Fifthly, He was a copious preacher: Many other things he preached, many things, and different. He varied in his preaching, that those who were not reached, and touched, and wrought upon by one truth, might be by another.

III. How full a stop was put to John's preaching. When he was in the midst of his usefulness he was imprisoned by the malice of Herod (v. 19, 20): Herod the tetrarch being reproved by him, not only for living in incest with his brother Philip's wife, but for the many other evils which Herod had done (for those that are wicked in one instance are commonly so in many others), he could not bear it, and added this wickedness to all the rest, that he shut up John in prison. Because he could not bear his reproofs, others should be deprived of the benefit of his instructions and counsels. Must he be silenced who is the voice of one crying in the wilderness? But thus the faith of his disciples must be tried; thus the unbelief of those who rejected him must be punished; thus he must be Christ's forerunner in suffering as well as preaching. He must now give way to him, and, the Sun being risen, the morning-star must of course disappear.

Verses 21–38

The evangelist mentioned John's imprisonment before Christ's being baptized, though it was nearly a year after it, because he would finish the story of John's ministry, and then introduce that of Christ.

I. A short account of Christ's baptism. Jesus came, to be baptized of John, and he was so, v. 21, 22.

1. It is here said that, when all the people were baptized, then Jesus was baptized. Christ would be baptized last, among the common people, and in the rear of them. He saw what multitudes were hereby prepared to receive him, and then he appeared.

2. Notice is here taken of Christ's praying when he was baptized, which was not in Matthew: being baptized, and praying. He prayed, as others did, for he would thus keep up communion with his Father. He prayed for the discovery of his Father's favour to him, and the descent of the Spirit. What was promised to Christ, he must obtain by prayer: Ask of me and I will give thee, &c.

3. When he prayed, the heaven was opened. Sin had shut up heaven, but Christ's prayer opened it again. Prayer is an ordinance that opens heaven: Knock, and it shall be opened unto you.

4. The Holy Ghost descended in a bodily shape like a dove upon him. When he begins to preach, the Spirit of the Lord is upon him. Now this is here expressed by a sensible evidence for his encouragement in his work, and for the satisfaction of John the Baptist; for he was told before that by this sign it should be notified to him which was the Christ.

5. There came a voice from heaven from the excellent glory (so it is expressed, 2 Pet. i. 17), Thou art my beloved Son. Here, and in Mark, it is expressed as spoken to Christ; in Matthew as spoken of him: This is my beloved Son. It comes all to one. It was foretold concerning the Messiah, I will be his Father, and he shall be my Son, 2 Sam. vii. 14. It was also foretold that he should be God's elect, in whom his soul delighted (Isa. xlii. 1); and, accordingly, it is here declared, Thou art my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.

II. A long account of Christ's pedigree, which had been more briefly related by St. Matthew.

1. His age: He now began to be about thirty years of age. At this age the priests were to enter upon the full execution of their office, Num. iv. 3.

2. His pedigree, v. 23, &c. Matthew had given us somewhat of this. He goes no higher than Abraham, but Luke brings it as high as Adam. Matthew designed to show that Christ was the son of Abraham, in whom all the families of the earth are blessed, and that he was heir to the throne of David; and therefore he begins with Abraham, and brings the genealogy down to Jacob, who was the father of Joseph, an heir-male of the house of David: but Luke, designing to show that Christ was the seed of the woman, that should break the serpent's head, traces his pedigree upward as high as Adam, and begins it with Eli, or Heli, who was the father, not of Joseph,

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

19, 20. but Herod . . .—See on Mark 6:14, etc. and for all the evils which Herod had done—important fact here only mentioned, showing how thoroughgoing was the fidelity of the Baptist to his royal hearer, and how strong must have been the workings of conscience in that slave of passion when, notwithstanding such plainness, he "did many things and heard John gladly" (Mark 6:20, 26).

21, 22. BAPTISM OF AND DESCENT OF THE SPIRIT UPON JESUS. See on Matthew 3:13-17. 21. when all the people were baptized—that He might not seem to be merely one of the crowd. Thus, as He rode into Jerusalem upon an ass, "whereon yet never man sat" (ch. 19:30), and lay in a sepulchre "wherein was never man yet laid" (John 19:41), so in His baptism He would be "separate from sinners."

23-38. GENEALOGY OF JESUS. 23. he began to be about thirty—i.e., "was about entering on His thirtieth year." So our translators have taken the word [and so CALVIN, BEZA, BLOOMFIELD, WEBSTER and WILKINSON, etc.]: but "was about thirty years of age when He began (His ministry)," makes better Greek, and is probably the true sense [BENGEL, OLSHAUSEN, DE WETTE, MEYER, ALFORD, etc.]. At this age the priests entered on their office (Num. 4: 3). being, as was supposed, the son of Joseph . . .—Have we in this genealogy, as well as in Matthew's, the line of Joseph? or is this the line of Mary?—a point on which there has been great difference of opinion and much acute discussion. Those who take the former opinion contend that it is the natural sense of this verse, and that no other would have been thought of but for its supposed improbability and the uncertainty which it seems to throw over our Lord's real descent. But it is liable to another difficulty; viz., that in this case Matthew makes "Jacob," while Luke makes "Heli," to be Joseph's father; and though the same man had often more than one name, we ought not to resort to that supposition, in such a case as this, without necessity. And then, though the descent of Mary from David would be liable to no real doubt, even though we had no table of her line preserved to us (see, for example, ch. 1:2-32, and on ch. 2:5), still it does seem unlikely—we say not incredible—that two genealogies of our Lord should be preserved to us, neither of which gives his real descent. Those who take the latter opinion, that we have here the line of Mary, as in Matthew that of Joseph—here His real, there His reputed line—explain the statement about Joseph, that he was "the son of Heli," to mean that he was his son-in-law, as the husband of his daughter Mary (as in Ruth 1:11, 12), and believe that Joseph's name is only introduced instead of Mary's, in conformity with the Jewish custom in such tables. Perhaps this view is attended with fewest difficulties, as it certainly is the best supported. However we decide, it is a satisfaction to know that not a doubt was thrown out by the bitterest of the early enemies of Christianity as to our Lord's real descent from David. On comparing the two genealogies, it will be found that Matthew, writing more immediately for Jews, deemed it enough to show that the Saviour was sprung from Abraham and David; whereas Luke, writing more immediately for Gentiles, traces the descent back to Adam, the parent stock of the whole human family, thus showing Him to be the promised "Seed of the woman." "The possibility of constructing such a table, comprising a period of thousands of years, in an uninterrupted line from father to son, of a family that dwelt for a long time in the utmost retirement, would be inexplicable, had not the members of this line been endowed with a thread by which they could extricate them-would not come unto Christ, that they might have life. Unquenchable fire. That cannot be extinguished by man.

19. Herod the tetrarch. See this subject explained at large, Matt. xiv. 1, etc., and Mark vi. 21, 23.

Herod the tetrarch. This was Herod Antipas, the son of Herod the Great. The word tetrarch properly signifies a person who rules over the fourth part of a country; but it is taken in a more general sense by the Jewish writers, meaning sometimes simply a governor, or a king; see v. 9. The estates of Herod the Great were not, at his death, divided into four tetrarchies, but only into three. One was given by the Emperor Augustus to Archelaus; the second to Herod Antipas, the person in the text; and the third to Philip: all three, sons of Herod the Great.

21. Jesus also being baptized. See on Matt. iii. 16-17.

23, etc. Thirty years of age. This was the age required by the law, to which the priests must arrive before they could be installed in their office; see Num. iv. 3. Being (as was supposed) the son of Joseph. This same phrase is used by Herodotus to signify one who was only reputed to be the son of a particular person. Much learned labor has been used to reconcile this genealogy with that in Matthew, chap. i, and there are several ways of doing it; the following, which appears to me to be the best, is also the most simple and easy. Matthew, in descending from Abraham to Joseph, the spouse of the blessed Virgin, speaks of sons properly such, by way of natural generation: Abraham begat Isaac, and Isaac begat Jacob, etc. But Luke, in ascending from the Saviour of the world to God himself, speaks of sons either properly or improperly such; on this account he uses an indeterminate mode of expression. And Jesus himself began to be about thirty years of age, being (as was supposed) the son of Joseph . . . of Heli . . . of Matthat, etc. After this observation it is next necessary to consider that, in the genealogy described by Luke, there are two sons improperly such: i.e., two sons-in-law instead of two sons. The two sons-in-law who are to be noticed in this genealogy are Joseph, the son-in-law of Heli, whose own father was Jacob, Matt. i. 16; and Salathiel, the son-in-law of Neri, whose own father was Jechonias, 1 Chron. iii. 17 and Matt. i. 12. This remark alone is sufficient to remove every difficulty. Thus it appears that Joseph, son of Jacob, according to Matthew, was son-in-law of Heli, according to Luke. And Salathiel, son of Jechonias, according to the former, was son-in-law of Neri, according to the latter. Mary therefore appears to have been the daughter of Heli, so called by abbreviation for Heliachim, which is but of the virgin Mary. Matthew draws the pedigree from Solomon, whose natural line ending in Jechonias, the legal right was transferred to Salathiel, who was of the house of Nathan, another son of David, which line Luke here pursues, and so leaves out all the kings of Judah. It is well for us that our salvation doth not depend upon our being able to solve all these difficulties. It is further worthy of observation, that, when those records of the Jewish genealogies had continued thirty or forty years after these extracts out of them, they were all lost and destroyed with the Jewish state and nation; for now there was no more occasion for them.

The genealogy concludes with this, who was the son of Adam, the son of God. He was both the Son of Adam and the Son of God, that he might be a proper Mediator between God and the sons of Adam, and might bring the sons of Adam to be, through him, the sons of God.

CHAPTER 4

Verses 1–13

In this story of Christ's temptation, observe,

I. How he was prepared and fitted for it.

1. He was full of the Holy Ghost, who had descended on him like a dove. Those are well armed against the strongest temptations that are full of the Holy Ghost.

2. He was newly returned from Jordan, where he was baptized, and owned by a voice from heaven to be the beloved Son of God. When we have had the most comfortable communion with God, and the clearest discoveries of his favour to us, we may expect that Satan will set upon us (the richest ship is the pirate's prize), and that God will suffer him to do so, that the power of his grace may be manifested and magnified.

3. He was led by the Spirit into the wilderness. His being led into the wilderness gave some advantage to the tempter; for there he had him alone. Woe to him that is alone! He might give Satan advantage, who knew his own strength; we may not, who know our own weakness. He gained some advantage to himself, during his forty days, fasting in the wilderness. We may suppose that he was wholly taken up in proper meditation, that he spent all his time in immediate, intimate converse with his Father, as Moses in the mount. And this prepared him for Satan's assaults, and hereby he was fortified against them.

4. He continued fasting (v. 2): In those days he did eat nothing. As by retiring into the wilderness he showed himself perfectly indifferent to the world, so by his fasting he showed himself perfectly indifferent to the body; and Satan cannot easily take hold of those who are thus loosened from, and dead to, the world and the flesh.

II. How he was assaulted by one temptation after another, and how he defeated the design of the tempter in every assault. During the forty days, he was tempted of the devil (v. 2). But at the end of the forty days he did as it were close with him, when he perceived that he was hungry, v. 2.

1. He tempted him to distrust his Father's care of him, and to set up for himself (v. 3): If thou be the Son of God, command this stone to be made bread. (1) "I counsel thee to do it; for God, if he be thy Father, has forgotten thee." If we begin to think of living by our own forecast, without depending upon divine Providence, we must look upon it as a temptation of Satan's, and reject it accordingly; it is Satan's counsel to think of an independence upon God. (2) "I challenge thee to do it, if thou canst; if thou dost not do it, I will say thou art not the Son of God." Christ yielded not to the temptation. First, Because he would not do what Satan bade him do. We must not do anything that looks like giving place to the devil. Miracles were wrought for the confirming of faith, and the devil had no faith to be confirmed. Secondly, He wrought miracles for the ratification of his doctrine, and therefore till he began to preach he would not begin to work miracles. Thirdly, He would not work miracles for himself and his own supply. He would rather turn water into wine, for the credit and convenience of his friends, than stones into bread, for his own necessary supply. Fourthly, He would reserve the proof of his being the Son of God for hereafter. Fifthly, He would not do anything that looked like distrust of his Father. He would, like the other children of God, live in a dependence upon the divine Providence and promise. He returned a scripture-answer to it (v. 4): It is written. This is the first word recorded as spoken by Christ after his instalment in his prophetical office; and it is a quotation out of the Old Testament.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

selves from the many families into which every tribe and branch was again subdivided, and thus hold fast and know the member that was destined to continue the lineage. This thread was the hope that Messiah would be born of the race of Abraham and David. The ardent desire to behold Him and be partakers of His mercy and glory suffered not the attention to be exhausted through a period embracing thousands of years. Thus the member destined to continue the lineage, whenever doubtful, became easily distinguishable, awakening the hope of a final fulfilment, and keeping it alive until it was consummated" [OLSHAUSEN]. 24-30. son of Matthat, . . .—(See on Matt. 1:13-15). In vs. 27, Salathiel is called the son, while in Matthew 1:12, he is called the father of Zerubbabel. But they are probably different persons. 38. son of God—Cf. Acts 17:28.

Vss. 1-13. TEMPTATION OF CHRIST.—See on Matthew 4:1-11.

Then—an indefinite note of sequence. But Mark's word (1:12) fixes what we should have presumed was meant, that it was "immediately" after His baptism; and with this agrees the statement of Luke (4:1). was Jesus led up—i.e., from the low Jordan valley to some more elevated spot. of the Spirit—that blessed Spirit immediately before spoken of as descending upon Him at His baptism, and abiding upon Him. Luke, connecting these two scenes, as if the one were but the sequel of the other, says, "Jesus, being full of the Holy Ghost, returned from Jordan, and was led . . . ." Mark's expression has a startling sharpness about it—"Immediately the Spirit driveth Him," "putteth," or "hurrieth Him forth," or "impelleth Him." (See the same word in Mark 1:43; 5:40; Matt. 9:25; 13:52; John 10:4.) The thought thus strongly expressed is the mighty constraining impulse of the Spirit under which He went; while Matthew's more gentle expression, "was led up," intimates how purely voluntary on His own part this action was. into the wilderness—probably the wild Judean desert. The particular spot which tradition has fixed upon has hence got the name of Quarantana or Quarantaria, from the forty days, —"an almost perpendicular wall of rock twelve or fifteen hundred feet above the plain" [ROBINSON'S Palestine]. The supposition of those who incline to place the temptation amongst the mountains of Moab is, we think, very improbable. to be tempted —The Greek word (peirazein) means simply to try or make proof of; and when ascribed to God in His dealings with men, it means, and can mean no more than this. Thus, Genesis 22:1, "It came to pass that God did tempt Abraham," or put his faith to a severe proof. (See Deut. 8:2.) But for the most part in Scripture the word is used in a bad sense, and means to entice, solicit, or provoke to sin. Hence the name here given to the wicked one—"the tempter" (vs. 3). Accordingly "to be tempted" here is to be understood both ways. The Spirit conducted Him into the wilderness simply to have His faith tried; but as the agent in this trial was to be the wicked one, whose whole object would be to seduce Him from His allegiance to God, it was a temptation in the bad sense of the term. The unworthy inference which some would draw from this is energetically repelled by an apostle (Jas. 1:13-17). of the devil. The word signifies a slanderer—one who casts imputations upon another. Hence that other name given him (Rev. 12:10), "The accuser of the brethren, who accuseth them before our God day and night." Mark (1:13) says, "He was forty days tempted of Satan," a word signifying an adversary, one who lies in wait for, or sets himself in opposition to another. These and other names of the same fallen spirit point to different features in his character or operations. What was the high design of this? First, as we judge, to give our Lord a taste of what lay before Him in the work He had undertaken; next, to make trial of the glorious equipment for it which He had just received; further, to give Him encouragement, by the victory now to be won, to go forward spoiling principalities and powers, until at length He should make a show of them openly, triumphing over them in His cross: that the tempter, too, might get a taste, at the very outset, of the new kind of material in man which he would find he had here to deal with; finally, that He might acquire experimental ability "to succor them that are tempted" (Heb. 2:18).

ADAM CLARKE

the same in Hebrew with Joachim. Joseph, son of Jacob, and Mary, daughter of Heli, were of the same family. Both came from Zerubbabel: Joseph from Abiud, his eldest son, Matt. i. 13; and Mary by Rhesa, the youngest. See v. 27. It is worthy of being remarked that Matthew, who wrote principally for the Jews, extends his genealogy to Abraham, through whom the promise of the Messiah was given to the Jews; but Luke, who wrote his history for the instruction of the Gentiles, extends his genealogy to Adam, to whom the promise of the Redeemer was given in behalf of himself and of all his posterity.

36. Of Cainan. This Cainan, the son of Arphaxad, and father of Sala, is not found in any other Scripture genealogy.

CHAPTER 4

1. Was led by the Spirit. Or, "And was carried about." Matthew says, "he was brought up." Mark says, "the Spirit driveth him"—"putteth Him forth." But each of the Evangelists attributes this to the Holy Ghost, not to Satan.

To be tempted. The first act of the ministry of Jesus Christ was a combat with Satan. Does not this receive light from Gen. iii. 15: "I will put enmity between" the woman's Seed and thy seed; "it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel."

And when he had fasted forty days. It is remarkable that Moses, the great lawgiver of the Jews, previous to his receiving the law from God, fasted forty days in the mount; that Elijah, the chief of the prophets, fasted also forty days; and that Christ, the Giver of the new covenant, should act in the same way. Was not all this intended to show that God's kingdom on earth was to be spiritual and living? That it should not consist "in meat and drink; but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost," Rom. xiv. 17?

And when the tempter. This onset of Satan was made (speaking after the manner of men) judiciously; he came when Jesus, after having fasted forty days and forty nights, was hungry. Now as hunger naturally diminishes the strength of the body, the mind gets enfeebled, and becomes easily irritated; and if much watching and prayer be not employed, the uneasiness which is occasioned by a lack of food may soon produce impatience, and in this state of mind the tempter has great advantages. Command that these stones. The meaning of this temptation is: "Distrust the divine providence and support, and make use of illicit means to supply Thy necessities."

MATTHEW HENRY

The word of God is our sword, and faith in that word is our shield; we should therefore be mighty in the scriptures. The text of scripture he makes use of is quoted from Deut. viii. 3: "Man shall not live by bread alone. I need not turn the stone into bread; man can live by every word of God, by whatever God will appoint that he shall live by." God has many ways of providing for his people, without the ordinary means of subsistence; and therefore he is not at any time to be distrusted, but at all times to be depended upon, in the way of duty. She was an active believer who said that she had made many a meal's meat of the promises when she wanted bread.

2. He tempted him to accept from him the kingdom and to do him homage, v. 5–7. This evangelist puts this temptation second, which Matthew had put last, and which, it should seem, was really the last. Now observe,

(1) How Satan managed this temptation.

[1] He gave him a prospect of all the kingdoms of the world in a moment of time. He took him up for this purpose into a high mountain. It was done in a moment of time; whereas, if a man take a prospect of but one country, he must do it successively. Thus the devil thought to impose upon our Saviour with a fallacy; and, by making him believe that he could show him all the kingdoms of the world, would draw him into an opinion that he could give him all those kingdoms.

[2] He boldly alleged that these kingdoms were all delivered to him, that he had power to dispose of them and all their glory, and to give them to whomsoever he would (v. 6), but clogged with this condition, that he should fall down and worship him.

[3] He demanded of him homage and adoration: If thou wilt worship me, all shall be thine, v. 7. He would have him worship him himself. He would indent with him, that, when he had got possession of the kingdoms of this world, he should make no alteration of religions in them. Then let him take all the power and glory of the kingdoms if he pleased. Let who will take the wealth and grandeur of this earth, Satan has all he would have if he can but have men's hearts and adorations.

(2) How our Lord Jesus triumphed over this temptation. He gave it a peremptory repulse, rejected it with abhorrence (v. 8): "Get thee behind me, Satan." Such a temptation as this was not to be reasoned with, but immediately refused; it was presently knocked on the head with one word, It is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God; and not only so, but him only, him and no other. Men must be turned from the power of Satan unto God, from the worship of devils to the worship of the only living and true God. This is the great divine law that Christ will re-establish among men, and reduce men to the obedience of, That God only is to be served and worshipped.

3. He tempted him to a presumptuous confidence of his Father's protection.

(1) What he designed in this temptation: If thou be the Son of God, cast thyself down, v. 9. He would have him seek for a new proof of his being the Son of God, as if that which his Father had given him by the voice from heaven, and the descent of the Spirit upon him, were not sufficient. He would have him seek a new method of proclaiming and publishing this to the world. If he would now declare from the pinnacle of the temple, among all the great people who attend the temple service, that he was the Son of God, and then, for proof of it, throw himself down unhurt, he would presently be received by everybody as a messenger sent from heaven. Or the fall might be his death, and then he should have got him finely out of the way.

(2) How he backed and enforced this temptation. He suggested, It is written, v. 10. Christ had quoted scripture against him; and he thought he would be quits with him, and would show that he could quote scripture as well as he. He shall give his angels charge over thee, and in their hands they shall bear thee up. It is true, God has promised the protection of angels, to encourage us to trust him, not to tempt him; as far as the promise of God's presence with us, so far the promise of the angels' ministration goes, but no further.

(3) How he was baffled and defeated in the temptation, v. 12. Christ quoted Deut. vi. 16, where it is said, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God, by desiring a sign for the proof of divine revelation, when he has already given that which is sufficient.

III. What was the result and issue of this combat, v. 13. Our victorious Redeemer kept his ground, and came off a conqueror, not for himself only, but for us also.

1. The devil emptied his quiver: He ended all the temptation. Did Christ suffer, being tempted, till

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

It is written—(Deut. 8:3). Man shall not live by bread alone—more emphatically, as in the Greek, "Not by bread alone shall man live." but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God—Of all passages in Old Testament Scripture, none could have been pitched upon more apposite, perhaps not one so apposite, to our Lord's purpose. "The Lord . . . led thee [said Moses to Israel, at the close of their journeyings] these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldest keep His commandments, or no. And He humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna, which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know; that He might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only . . .", "Now, if Israel spent, not forty days, but forty years in a waste, howling wilderness, where there were no means of human subsistence, not starving, but divinely provided for, on purpose to prove to every age that human support depends not upon bread, but upon God's unfailing word of promise and pledge of all needful providential care, am I, distrusting this word of God, and despairing of relief, to take the law into My own hand? True, the Son of God is able enough to turn stones into bread: but what the Son of God is able to do is not the present question, but what is man's duty under want of the necessaries of life. And as Israel's condition in the wilderness did not justify their unbelieving murmurings and frequent desperation, so neither would Mine warrant the exercise of the power of the Son of God in snatching despairingly at unwarranted relief. As man, therefore, I will await divine supply, nothing doubting that at the fitting time it will arrive." The second temptation in this Gospel is in Luke's the third.

Then saith Jesus unto him, Get thee hence, Satan—Since the tempter has now thrown off the mask, and stands forth in his true character, our Lord no longer deals with him as a pretended friend and pious counsellor, but calls him by his right name—His knowledge of which from the outset He had carefully concealed till now—and orders him off. This is the final and conclusive evidence, as we think, that Matthew's must be the right order of the temptations. For who can well conceive of the tempter's returning to the assault after this, in the pious character again, and hoping still to dislodge the consciousness of His Sonship, while our Lord must in that case be supposed to quote Scripture to one He had called the devil to his face—thus throwing His pearls before worse than swine? for it is written—(Deut. 6:13). Thus does our Lord part with Satan on the rock of Scripture. Thou shalt worship—In the Hebrew and LXX it is, "Thou shalt fear"; but as the sense is the same, so "worship" is here used to show emphatically that what the tempter claimed was precisely what God had forbidden. the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve—The word "serve" in the second clause, is one never used by the LXX of any but religious service; and in this sense exclusively is it used in the New Testament, as we find it here. Once more the word "only," in the second clause—not expressed in the Hebrew and LXX—is here added to bring out emphatically the negative and prohibitory feature of the command.

He shall give his angels charge concerning thee: and in [rather, on] their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone—The quotation is precisely as it stands in the Hebrew and LXX, save that after the first clause the words, "to keep thee in all thy ways," are here omitted. Not a few good expositors have thought that this omission was intentional, to conceal the fact that this would not have been one of "His ways," i.e., of duty. But as our Lord's reply makes no allusion to this, but seizes on the great principle involved in the promise quoted, so when we look at the promise itself, it is plain that the sense of it is precisely the same whether the clause in question be inserted or not. Jesus said unto him, It is written again—(Deut. 6:16), q.d., "True, it is so written, and on that promise I implicitly rely; but in using it there is another Scripture which must not be forgotten. Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God—Preservation in danger is divinely pledged: shall I then create danger, either to put the promised security skeptically to the proof, or wantonly to demand a display of it? That were "to tempt the Lord my God," which, being expressly forbidden, would forfeit the right to expect preservation."

ADAM CLARKE

But by (or upon,) every word. Rhema in Greek answers to dabar in Hebrew, which means not only "a word spoken" but also "thing, purpose, appointment." Our Lord's meaning seems to be this: God purposes the welfare of His creatures—all His appointments are calculated to promote this end. Some of them may appear to man to have a contrary tendency; but even fasting itself, when used in consequence of a divine injunction, becomes a means of supporting that life which it seems naturally calculated to impair or destroy.

An exceeding high mountain, and sheweth him. If the words all the kingdoms of the world be taken in a literal sense, then this must have been a visionary representation, as the highest mountain on the face of the globe could not suffice to make evident even one hemisphere of the earth, and the other must of necessity be in darkness. But if we take the world to mean only the land of Judea and some of the surrounding nations, as it appears sometimes to signify, then the mountain described by the Abbe Mariti (Travels Through Cyprus, etc.) could have afforded the prospect in question. Speaking of it, he says, "Here we enjoyed the most beautiful prospect imaginable. This part of the mountain overlooks the mountains of Arabia, the country of Gilead, the country of the Amorites, the plains of Moab, the plains of Jericho, the river Jordan, and the whole extent of the Dead Sea. It was here that the devil said to the Son of God, 'All these kingdoms will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me.'"

7. If thou therefore wilt worship me. This temptation is the last in order, as related by Matthew; and it is not reasonable to suppose that any other succeeded to it. Luke has here told the particulars, but not in the order in which they took place. See every circumstance of this temptation considered and explained in the notes on Matt. iv. 1-11.

Pinnacle of the temple. It is very likely that this was what was called the king's gallery; which, as Josephus says, "deserves to be mentioned among the most magnificent things under the sun: for upon a stupendous depth of a valley, scarcely to be fathomed by the eye of him that stands above, Herod erected a gallery of a vast height, from the top of which if any looked down, he would grow dizzy, his eyes not being able to reach so vast a depth."

Cast thyself down. Our Lord had repelled the first temptation by an act of confidence in the power and goodness of God, and now Satan solicits Him to make trial of it. Through the unparalleled subtlety of Satan, the very means we made use of to repel one temptation may be used by him as the groundwork of another. He shall give his angels charge. This is a mutilated quotation of Ps. xci. 11. The clause "to keep thee in all thy ways," Satan chose to leave out, as quite unsuitable to his design. That God has promised to protect and support His servants admits of no dispute; but as the path of duty is the way of safety, they are entitled to no good when they walk out of it. In their hands they shall bear thee up. This quotation from Ps. xci. 11 is a metaphor taken from a nurse's management of her child. In teaching it to walk, she guides it along plain ground; but when stones or other obstacles occur, she lifts up the child and carries it over them, and then sets it down to walk again.

Thou shalt not tempt. To expose myself to any danger naturally destructive, with the vain presumption that God will protect and defend me from the ruinous consequences of my imprudent conduct, is to tempt God.

MATTHEW HENRY

all the temptation was ended? And must not we expect also to pass all our trials, to go through the hour of temptation assigned us?

2. He then quitted the field: He departed from him. He saw it was to no purpose to attack him, he had no blind side, no weak or unguarded part in his wall. If we resist the devil, he will flee from us.

3. Yet he continued his malice against him; he departed but for a season, till the season when he was again to be let loose upon him, but as a persecutor, to bring him to suffer. He departed now till that season came which Christ calls the power of darkness (ch. xxii. 53), and when the prince of this world would again come, John xiv. 30.

Verses 14–30

Having defended himself against the devil's assaults, he now begins to act offensively, and to make those attacks upon him, by his preaching and miracles, which he could not resist or repel.

I. What is here said in general of his preaching, and the entertainment it met with in Galilee. Thither he came in the power of the Spirit. He was not to wait for a call from men, for he had light and life in himself. There he taught in their synagogues, their places of public worship, where they met, not, as in the temple, for ceremonial services, but for devotion. These came to be more frequent since the captivity, when the ceremonial worship was near expiring. This he did so as that he gained a great reputation. A fame of him went through all that region (v. 14), and it was a good fame; for (v. 15) he was glorified of all. Now, at first, he met with no contempt or contradiction; all glorified him, and there were none as yet that vilified him.

II. Of his preaching at Nazareth, the city where he was brought up. And here we are told how he preached there, and how he was persecuted.

1. How he preached there.

(1) The opportunity he had for it: He came to Nazareth when he had gained a reputation in other places. There he took occasion to preach, [1] In the synagogue, where it had been his custom to attend when he was a private person, v. 16. But, now that he was entered upon his public ministry, there he preached. [2] On the sabbath day, the proper time which the pious Jews spent, not in a mere ceremonial rest from worldly labour, but in the duties of God's worship.

(2) The call he had to it. He stood up to read. They had in their synagogues seven readers every sabbath, the first a priest, the second a Levite, and the other five Israelites of that synagogue. We often find Christ preaching in other synagogues, but never reading, except in this synagogue at Nazareth, of which he had been many years a member. The book of the prophet Esaias was delivered to him. The second lesson for that day being in the prophecy of Esaias, they gave him that volume to read in.

(3) The text he preached upon. He stood up to read. Now the book being delivered to him, [1] He opened it. The books of the Old Testament were in a manner shut up till Christ opened them, Isa. xxix. 11. [2] He found the place which was appointed to be read that day. Now his text was taken out of Isa. lxi. 1, 2, which is here quoted at large, v. 18, 19. There was a providence in it that that portion of scripture should be read that day, which speaks so very plainly of the Messiah. This text gives a full account of Christ's undertaking, and the work he came into the world to do.

First, How he was qualified for the work: The Spirit of the Lord is upon me. All the gifts and graces of the Spirit were conferred upon him, not by measure, as upon other prophets, but without measure, John iii. 34.

Secondly, How he was commissioned: Because he has anointed me, and sent me. His being anointed signifies both his being fitted for the undertaking and called to it.

Thirdly, What his work was. He was qualified and commissioned.

(a). To be a great prophet. He was anointed to preach; that is three times mentioned here. To whom he was to preach: to the poor; to those that were poor in the world; to those that were poor in spirit, to the meek and humble, and to those that were truly sorrowful for sin. What he was to preach. In general, he must preach the gospel. He is sent to evangelize them; not only to preach to them, but to make that preaching effectual; to bring it, not only to their ears, but to their hearts. Three things he is to preach:

(i) Deliverance to the captives. The gospel is a proclamation of liberty, like that to Israel in Egypt and in Babylon. It is a deliverance from the worst of thraldoms, which all those shall have the benefit of that are willing to make Christ their Head.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

Then the devil leaveth him—Luke says, "And when the devil had exhausted"—or "quite ended," as in Luke 4:2—"every [mode of] temptation, he departed from him till a season." The definite "season" here indicated is expressly referred to by our Lord in John 14:36 and Luke 22:52, 53.

14-32. JESUS, ENTERING ON HIS PUBLIC MINISTRY, MAKES A CIRCUIT OF GALILEE—REJECTION AT NAZARETH. N.B.—A large gap here occurs, embracing the important transactions in Galilee and Jerusalem which are recorded in John 1:29 to 4:54, and which occurred before John's imprisonment (John 3:24); whereas the transactions here recorded occurred (as appears from Matt. 4:12, 13) after that event. The visit to Nazareth recorded in Matthew 13:54-58 (and Mark 6:1-6) we take to be not a later visit, but the same with this first one; because we cannot think that the Nazarenes, after being so enraged at His first display of wisdom as to attempt His destruction, should, on a second display of the same, wonder at it and ask how He came by it, as if they had never witnessed it before.

16. as his custom was—Cf. Acts 17:2.

stood up for to read—Others besides rabbins were allowed to address the congregation. (See Acts 13:15.)

18, 19. To have fixed on any passage announcing His sufferings (as Isaiah 53), would have been unsuitable at that early stage of His ministry. But He selects a passage announcing the sublime object of His whole mission, its divine character, and His special endowments for it; expressed in the first person, and so singularly adapted to the first opening of the mouth in His prophetic capacity, that it seems as if made expressly for this occasion. It is from the well-known section of Isaiah's prophecies whose burden is that mysterious "SERVANT OF THE LORD," despised of man, abhorred of the nation, but before whom kings on seeing Him are to arise, and princes to worship; in visage more marred than any man and His form than the sons of men, yet sprinkling many nations; laboring seemingly in vain, and spending His strength for naught and in vain, yet Jehovah's Servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob and be His Salvation to the ends of the earth (Isa. 49, etc.). The quotation is chiefly from the Septuagint version, used in the synagogues.

ADAM CLARKE

14. Returned in the power of the Spirit. "In the mighty power of the Spirit." Having now conquered the grand adversary, he comes in the miracle-working energy of the Spirit to show forth His power, Godhead, and love to the people, that they might believe and be saved. He who, through the grace of God, resists and overcomes temptation is always bettered by it. This is one of the wonders of God's grace, that those very things which are designed for our utter ruin He makes the instruments of our greatest good.

15. And he taught in their synagogues. We do not find even the persecuting Jews ever hindered Christ or His disciples from preaching in their synagogues. Glorified of all. All felt the power of His preaching, and acknowledged the divinity of His mission. The scandal of the Cross had not yet taken place.

16. To Nazareth, where he had been brought up. It is likely that our Lord lived principally in this city till the thirtieth year of His age; but after He entered on His public ministry, His usual place of residence was at the house of Peter, in Capernaum. As his custom was. Our Lord regularly attended the public worship of God in the synagogues, for there the Scriptures were read. To worship God publicly is the duty of every man, and no man can be guiltless who neglects it. If a person cannot get such public worship as he likes, let him frequent such as he can get. Better to attend the most indifferent than to stay at home, especially on the Lord's day.

Stood up for to read. The Jews, in general, sat while they taught or commented on the Sacred Writings or the traditions of the elders; but when they read either the law or the prophets, they invariably stood up; it was not lawful for them even to lean against anything while employed in reading.

17. And when he had opened the book. "When He had unrolled it." The Sacred Writings used to this day, in all the Jewish synagogues, are written on skins of parchment or vellum, sewed end to end, and rolled on two rollers, beginning at each end; so that, in reading from right to left, they roll off with the left, while they roll on with the right. Probably the place in the Prophet Isaiah here referred to was the lesson for that day; and Jesus unrolled the manuscript till He came to the place. Then, after having read, He rolled it up again, and returned it to the officer, v. 20, the ruler of the synagogue, or his servant, whose business it was to take care of it.

18. The Spirit of the Lord. This is found in Isa. lxi. 1; but our Lord immediately adds to it v. 7 of chap. xlii. The proclaiming of liberty to the captives and the acceptable year (or year of acceptance) of the Lord is a manifest allusion to the proclaiming of the year of jubilee by sound of trumpet; see Lev. xxv. 9, etc., and the notes there. This was a year of general release of debts and obligations, of bond men and women, of lands and possessions which had been sold from the families and tribes to which they belonged. Our Saviour, by applying this text to himself, a text so manifestly relating to the institution above mentioned, plainly declares the typical design of that institution. He hath

(ii) Recovering of sight to the blind. He came not only by the word of his gospel to bring light to them that sat in the dark, but by the power of his grace to give sight to them that were blind. Christ came to tell us that he has eye-salve for us, which we may have for the asking: that, if our prayer be, Lord, that our eyes may be opened, his answer shall be, Receive your sight.

(iii) The acceptable year of the Lord, v. 19. He came to let the world know that the God whom they had offended was willing to be reconciled to them, and to accept of them upon new terms. It alludes to the year of release, or that of jubilee, which was an acceptable year. It was an acceptable time, for it was a day of salvation.

(b) Christ came to be a great Physician; for he was sent to heal the broken-hearted, to give peace to those that were troubled and humbled for sins, and to bring them to rest who were weary and heavy-laden, under the burden of guilt and corruption.

(c) To be a great Redeemer. He not only proclaims liberty to the captives, but he sets at liberty them that are bruised. The prophets could but proclaim liberty, but Christ, as one having authority, as one that had power on earth to forgive sins, came to set at liberty; and therefore this clause is added here.

(4) Here is Christ's application of this text to himself (v. 21): When he had read it, he rolled up the book, and gave it again to the minister, or clerk, that attended, and sat down, according to the custom of the Jewish teachers. Now he began his discourse thus, "This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears." It now began to be fulfilled in Christ's entrance upon his public ministry; now, in the report they heard of his preaching and miracles in other places; now, in his preaching to them in their own synagogue. Many other gracious words proceeded out of his mouth, which these were but the beginning of; for Christ often preached long sermons, which we have but a short account of. This was enough to introduce a great deal: This day is this scripture fulfilled. The works of God are the accomplishment not only of his secret word, but of his word revealed; and it will help us to understand both the scriptures and the providences of God to compare them one with another.

(5) Here is the attention and admiration of the auditors.

[1] Their attention (v. 20): The eyes of all them that were in the synagogue were fastened on him. It is good, in hearing the word, to keep the eye fixed upon the minister by whom God is speaking to us; for, as the eye affects the heart, so, usually, the heart follows the eye, and is wandering, or fixed, as that is.

[2] Their admiration (v. 22): They all bore him witness and wondered at the gracious words that proceeded out of his mouth; and yet, as appears by what follows, they did not believe in him. They admired the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth. Christ's words are words of grace. And these words of grace are to be wondered at; Christ's name was Wonderful, and in nothing was he more so than in his grace, in the words of his grace, and the power that went along with those words. Their wonder increased as they said, Is not this Joseph's son? Some from this suggestion took occasion perhaps so much the more to admire his gracious words, concluding he must needs be taught of God, while others perhaps with this consideration corrected their wonder at his gracious words, and concluded there could be nothing really admirable in them, whatever appeared, because he was the Son of Joseph.

(6) Christ's anticipating an objection which he knew to be in the minds of many of his hearers. Observe

[1] What the objection was (v. 23): "You will surely say to me, Physician, heal thyself. You will expect that I should work miracles among you, as I have done in other places." Most of Christ's miracles were cures;—"Now why should not the sick in thine own city be healed as well as those in other cities?" They were designed to cure people of their unbelief:—"Now why should not the disease of unbelief be cured in those of thine own city as well as in those of others? Whatsoever we have heard done in Capernaum, do here also in thine own country." They were pleased with Christ's gracious words, only because they hoped they were but the introduction to some wondrous works of his. They thought their own town as worthy to be the stage of miracles as any other. And why should not his neighbours and acquaintance have the benefit of his preaching and miracles, rather than any other?

[2] How he answers this objection against the course he took.

First, By a plain and positive reason why he would not make Nazareth his headquarters (v. 24), because it generally holds true that no prophet is accepted in

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

19. acceptable year—an allusion to the jubilee year (Lev. 25:10), a year of universal release for person and property. (See also Isa. 49:8; II Cor. 6:2.) As the maladies under which humanity groans are here set forth under the names of poverty, broken-heartedness, bondage, blindness, bruisedness (or crushedness), so, as the glorious HEALER of all these maladies, Christ announces Himself in the act of reading it, stopping the quotation just before it comes to "the day of vengeance," which was only to come on the rejecters of His message (John 3:17). The first words, "THE SPIRIT of the LORD is upon ME," have been noted since the days of the Church Fathers, as an illustrious example of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost being exhibited as in distinct yet harmonious action in the scheme of salvation. 20. the minister—the chazan or synagogue-officer. all eyes . . . fastened on Him—astounded at His putting in such claims. 21. began to say . . .—His whole address was just a detailed application to Himself of this and perhaps other like prophecies.

22. gracious words—"the words of grace," referring both to the richness of His matter and the sweetness of His manner (Ps. 45:2).

Is not this . . .—(See on Matt. 13:54-56). They knew He had received no rabbinical education, and anything supernatural they seemed incapable of conceiving.

23. this proverb—like our "Charity begins at home." whatsoever . . .—"Strange rumors have reached our ears of Thy doings at Capernaum; but if such power resides in Thee to cure the ills of humanity, why has none of it yet come nearer home, and why is all this alleged power reserved for strangers?" His choice of Capernaum as a place of residence since entering on public life was, it seems, already well known at Nazareth; and when He did come thither, to give no displays of His power when distant places were ringing with His fame, wounded their pride. He had indeed "laid his hands on a few sick folk and healed them" (Mark 6:5); but this seems to have been done quite privately the general unbelief precluding anything more open. 24. And he said . . .—Her replies to the one proverb by another, equally familiar, which we express in a rougher form—"Too much familiarity breeds contempt." Our Lord's long residence in anointed me. I have been designed and set apart for this very purpose; My sole business among men is to proclaim glad tidings to the poor. All the functions of this new Prophet are exercised on the hearts of men; and the grace by which He works in the heart is a grace of healing, deliverance, and illumination.

A. B. SIMPSON:

The first note and the supreme note in it is joyfulness. It is a message of hope to a sorrowing, despairing world. It has been well called "the Gospel of the Jubilee." Its undertone and its echo is gladness, victory, deliverance for all the evils that oppress humanity. It is the "sovereign balm for every wound." It is the remedy for the ills of humanity. Back of it stands the splendid figure of the Year of Jubilee. This is just the meaning of the closing clause to "proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord."

Every fifty years there came to ancient Israel a great festival that lasted a whole year long. All labor ceased and the earth abundantly supplied, the preceding year, enough for two. Nature rested, man rested and every home and synagogue and sanctuary and spot became the scene of festival and gladness. With its early dawn, the jubilee trumpets rang out upon every mountaintop and summoned the people to a year of rejoicing, and, as the year wore on, you might have seen many a family moving back to the vine-clad cottage which they had been compelled to lose years before for some mortgage debt. You might have seen sons and daughters traveling home and welcomed by rejoicing fathers and mothers as they came back from the slavery to which they had been consigned as hostages for some family debt. You might have seen bonds and mortgages, promissory notes and liens torn up or burned to ashes while every debt was cancelled, every slave set free, every prison opened and every lost heritage restored. All this Jesus Christ came to fulfill in a higher and grander sense by proclaiming an everlasting jubilee for all who accept His grace. Surely, such a gospel is indeed humanity's greatest boon and the announcement of such a message a fitting and glorious inauguration of the Gospel of the Son of Man.

—Christ in the Bible

20. Were fastened on him. Were "attentively fixed on Him."

22. At the gracious words. "To the words of grace," or the doctrines of grace, which He then preached.

23. Physician, heal thyself. That is, heal the brokenhearted in Thine own country, as the latter clause of the verse explains it; but they were far from being in a proper spirit to receive the salvation which He was ready to communicate, and therefore they were not healed.

MATTHEW HENRY

his own country. Experience seals this. Familiarity breeds contempt; and we are apt to think meanly of those whose conversation we have been accustomed to. That is most esteemed that is far-fetched and dear-bought, above what is home-bred, though really more excellent. Christ declined working miracles, or doing anything extraordinary, at Nazareth, because of the rooted prejudices they had against him there.

Secondly, By pertinent examples of two of the most famous prophets of the Old Testament. Elijah maintained a widow of Sarepta, a city of Sidon, one that was a stranger to the commonwealth of Israel, when there was a famine in the land, v. 25, 26. As God would hereby show himself a Father of the fatherless, and a Judge of the widows, so he would show that he was rich in mercy to all, even to the Gentiles. Elisha cleansed Naaman the Syrian of his leprosy, though he was a Syrian, and not only a foreigner, but an enemy to Israel (v. 27): Many lepers were in Israel in the days of Eliseus. And yet we do not find that Elisha cleansed them, but only this Syrian; for none besides had faith to apply himself to the prophet for a cure. Christ himself often met with greater faith among Gentiles than in Israel. Christ wrought his miracles, though not among his townsmen, yet among Israelites, whereas these great prophets wrought theirs among Gentiles.

2. How he was persecuted at Nazareth.

(1) That which provoked them was his taking notice of the favour which God by Elijah and Elisha showed to the Gentiles: When they heard these things, they were filled with wrath (v. 28), a great change since v. 22, when they wondered at the gracious words that proceeded out of his mouth; thus uncertain are the opinions and affections of the multitude, and so very fickle. If they had mixed faith with those gracious words of Christ which they wondered at, they would have been awakened by these latter words of his. Those only pleased the ear, and went no further, and therefore these grated on the ear. But that which especially exasperated them was that he intimated some kindness God had in reserve for the Gentiles. Their pious ancestors pleased themselves with the hopes of adding the Gentiles to the church; but this degenerate race hated to think that any others should be taken in.

(2) They were provoked to that degree that they made an attempt upon his life. They rose up in a tumultuous manner against him. They thrust him out of the city. They thrust from them the Saviour and the salvation. They led him to the brow of the hill, with a purpose to throw him down headlong. Though they had heard such a fame of him and had but just now themselves admired his gracious words, yet they hurried him away in a popular fury, or frenzy rather, to put him to death in a most barbarous manner.

(3) Yet he escaped, because his hour was not yet come: He passed through the midst of them, unhurt. They drove him from them, and he went his way. He would have gathered Nazareth, but they would not, and therefore their house is left to them desolate. But now, though they received him not, there were those that did.

When Christ was expelled from Nazareth, he came to Capernaum, another city of Galilee.

I. His preaching: He taught them on the sabbath days, v. 31. Christ's preaching much affected the people (v. 32); they were astonished at his doctrine, there was weight in every word he said, and admirable discoveries were made to them by it. His word was with power; there was a commanding force in it, and a working power went along with it to the consciences of men.

II. His miracles.

1. Two particularly specified, showing Christ to be,

(1) A controller and conqueror of Satan by his power to cast him out of the bodies of those he had taken possession of. [1] The devil is an unclean spirit, his nature directly contrary to that of the pure and holy God. [2] This unclean spirit works in the children of men. [3] It is possible that those who are very much under the power and working of Satan may yet be found in the synagogue. [4] Even the devils know and believe that Jesus Christ is the Holy One of God. [5] They believe and tremble. This unclean spirit cried out with a loud voice, apprehensive that Christ was now come to destroy him. [6] The devils have nothing to do with Jesus Christ, nor desire to have anything to do with him. [7] Christ has the devil under check: He rebuked him, saying, Hold thy peace; and this word he spoke with power; Be muzzled. Christ did not only enjoin him silence, but stopped his mouth. [8] In the breaking of Satan's power, both the enemy that is conquered shows his malice, and Christ, the conqueror, shows his over-

Nazareth merely as a townsman had made Him too common, incapacitating them for appreciating Him as others did who were less familiar with His everyday demeanor in private life. A most important principle, to which the wise will pay due regard. (See also Matt. 7:6, on which our Lord Himself ever acted.) 25-27. But I tell you . . .—falling back for support on the well-known examples of Elijah and Elisha (Eliseus), whose miraculous power, passing by those who were near, expended itself on those at a distance, yea on heathens, "the two great prophets who stand at the commencement of prophetic antiquity, and whose miracles strikingly prefigured those of our Lord. As He intended like them to feed the poor and cleanse the lepers, He points to these miracles of mercy, and not to the fire from heaven and the bears that tore the mockers" [STIER]. three years and six months—So James 5:17, including perhaps the six months after the last fall of rain, when there would be little or none at any rate; whereas in I Kings 18:1, which says the rain returned "in the third year," that period is probably not reckoned. 26, 27. save . . . saving—"but only." (Cf. Mark 13: 32, Greek.) Sarepta—"Zarephath" (I Kings 17:9), a heathen village between Tyre and Sidon. (See Mark 7:24.)

28, 29. when they heard these things—these allusions to the heathen, just as afterwards with Paul (Acts 22:21, 22). rose up—broke up the service irreverently and rushed forth. thrust him—with violence, as a prisoner in their hands. brow . . .—Nazareth, though not built on the ridge of a hill, is in part surrounded by one to the west, having several such precipices. (See II Chron. 25:12; II Kings 9:33.) It was a mode of capital punishment not unusual among the Romans and others. This was the first insult which the Son of God received, and it came from "them of His own household!" (Matt. 10:36.) 30. passing through the midst . . .—evidently in a miraculous way, though perhaps quite noiselessly, leading them to wonder afterwards what spell could have come over them, that they allowed Him to escape. (Similar escapes, however, in times of persecution, are not unexampled.) 31. down to Capernaum—It lay on the Sea of Galilee (Matt. 4:13), whereas Nazareth lay high.

33-37. DEMONIAC HEALED. unclean—The frequency with which this character of impurity is applied to evil spirits is worthy of notice. cried out . . .—(See on Matt. 8:29; Mark 3:11).

35. rebuked them . . .—(see on vs. 41). thrown him . . .—see on Mark 9:20.

ADAM CLARKE

24. No prophet is accepted. See on Matt. xiii. 55-57.

25. In the days of Elias. See this history, 1 Kings xvii. 1-9, compared with chap. xviii. 1-45. This was evidently a miraculous interference, as no rain fell for three years and six months, even in the rainy seasons.

26. Unto none of them was Elias sent, save unto Sarepta. The sentence is elliptical, and means this: To none of them was Elias sent; he was not sent except to Sarepta; for the widow at Sarepta was a Sidonian, not a widow of Israel.

27. None of them was cleansed. This verse is to be understood as the twenty-sixth; for Naaman, being a Syrian, was no leper in Israel.

28. Were filled with wrath. They seem to have drawn the following conclusion from what our Lord spoke: "The Gentiles are more precious in the sight of God than the Jews; and to them His miracles of mercy and kindness shall be principally confined." This was pretty near the truth, as the event proved. Those who profit not by the light of God, while it is among them, shall have their candle extinguished.

30. Passing through the midst of them. Either He shut their eyes so that they could not see Him or He so overawed them by His power as to leave them no strength to perform their murderous purpose. The man Christ Jesus was immortal till His time came, and all His messengers are immortal till their work is done.

31. Came down to Capernaum. Which it is likely He made His ordinary place of residence from this time.

32. His word was with power. "With authority." He assumed the tone and manner of a new Lawgiver; and uttered all His doctrines, not in the way of exhortation or advice, but in the form of precepts and commands, the unction of the Holy Spirit accompanying all He said.

33. A spirit of an unclean devil. As "demon" was used in both a good and a bad sense before and after the time of the Evangelists, the word unclean may have been added here by Luke merely to express the quality of this spirit. But it is worthy of remark that the inspired writers never use the word demon in a good sense.

ruling grace. The devil showed what he would have done, when he threw the man in the midst, as if he would have dashed him to pieces. Christ showed what a power he had over him, in that he not only forced him to leave him, but to leave him without so much as hurting him. Whom Satan cannot destroy, he will do all the hurt he can to; but this is a comfort, he can harm them no further than Christ permits; nay, he shall not do them any real harm. He came out, and hurt him not. [9] Christ's power over devils was universally acknowledged and adored, v. 36. They were all amazed, saying, What a word is this! They that pretended to cast out devils did it with abundance of charms and spells, but Christ commanded them with authority and power. [10] This, as much as anything, gained Christ a reputation, and spread his fame. This instance of his power, magnified, and was looked upon as greatly magnifying him (v. 37); upon the account of this, the fame of him went out, more than ever, into every place of the country round about. Our Lord Jesus, when he set out at first in his public ministry, was greatly talked of, more than afterwards, when people's admiration wore off with the novelty of the thing.

(2) Christ showed himself to be a healer of diseases. In the former, he struck at the root of man's misery, which was Satan's enmity: in this, he strikes at one of the most spreading branches of it, one of the most common calamities of human life, and that is bodily diseases. These our Lord Jesus came to take away the sting of. Of all bodily diseases none are more common or fatal to grown people than fevers. Now here we have Christ's curing a fever with a word s speaking; the place was in Simon's house, his patient was Simon's wife's mother, v. 38, 39. [1] Christ is a guest that will pay well for his entertainment; those that bid him welcome into their hearts and houses shall be no losers by him; he comes with healing. [2] Even families that Christ visits may be visited with sickness. Houses that are blessed with his distinguishing favours are liable to the common calamities of this life. Simon's wife's mother was ill of a fever. [3] Even good people may sometimes be exercised with the sharpest afflictions. She was taken with a great fever, very acute, and high, and threatening. [4] No age can exempt from diseases. [5] When our relations are sick, we ought to apply ourselves to Christ, by faith and prayer, on their account: They besought him for her. [6] Christ has a tender concern for his people when they are in sickness and distress: He stood over her, as one concerned for her. [7] Christ had, and still has, a sovereign power over bodily diseases: He rebuked the fever, and it left her. [8] This proves Christ's cures to be miraculous, that they were done in an instant: Immediately she arose. [9] Where Christ gives a new life he designs and expects that it should be a new life indeed, spent more than ever in his service. If distempers be rebuked, and we arise from a bed of sickness, we must set ourselves to minister to Jesus Christ. [10] Those that minister to Christ must be ready to minister to all that are his for his sake: She ministered to them, not only to him that had cured her, but to them that had besought him for her.

2. A general account of many other miracles which Christ did. He cured many that were diseased, and it was when the sun was setting (v. 40); in the evening of that sabbath day which he had spent in the synagogue. It is good to abound in the work of the day, in some good work or other, even till sunset; as those that call the sabbath, and the business of it, a delight. He cured all that were sick of divers diseases. He had a remedy for every malady. The sign he used in healing was laying his hands on the sick. He healed by his own power. He cast the devil out of many that were possessed, v. 41. They said, Thou art Christ the Son of God. Christ rebuked them, and did not suffer them to say that they knew him to be the Christ.

3. Here is his removal from Capernaum, v. 42, 43.

(1) He retired for awhile into a place of solitude. It was but a little while that he allowed himself for sleep. When it was day, he went into a desert place to be sometimes alone with God, as even those should be, and contrive to be, that are most engaged in public work. They will find themselves never less alone than when thus alone.

(2) He returned again to the places of concourse and to the work he had to do there. Though a desert place may be a convenient retreat, yet it is not a convenient residence, because we were not sent into this world to live to ourselves. He was earnestly solicited to stay at Capernaum. The people were exceedingly fond of him. They sought him, and, though it was in a desert place, they came unto him. A desert is no desert if we be with Christ there. They

36. What a word—a word from the Lord of spirits.

38-41. PETER'S MOTHER-IN-LAW, AND MANY OTHERS, HEALED. See on Matt. 8:14-17.

And forthwith, when they were come out of the synagogue—so also in Luke 4:38. they entered into the house of Simon and Andrew, with James and John—The mention of these four—which is peculiar to Mark—is the first of those traces of Peter's hand in this Gospel, of which we shall find many more. The house being his, and the illness and cure so nearly affecting himself, it is interesting to observe this minute specification of the number and names of the witnesses; interesting also as the first occasion on which the sacred triumvirate of Peter and James and John are selected from among the rest, to be a threefold cord of testimony to certain events in their Lord's life (see on ch. 5:37)—Andrew being present on this occasion, as the occurrence took place in his own house. But Simon's wife's mother lay sick of a fever—Luke, as was natural in "the beloved physician" (Col. 4:14), describes it professionally; calling it a "great fever," and thus distinguishing it from that lighter kind which the Greek physicians were wont to call "small fevers," as GALEN, quoted by WETSTEIN, tells us. and anon—immediately. they tell him of her—naturally hoping that His compassion and power towards one of His own disciples would not be less signally displayed than towards the demonized stranger in the synagogue.

And he healed many that were sick of divers diseases, and cast out many devils—In Matthew 8:16 it is said, "He cast out the spirits with His word"; or rather, "with a word"—a word of command.

41. suffered them not to speak—The marginal reading here is wrong. Our Lord ever refused testimony from devils, for the very reason why they were eager to give it, because He and they would thus seem to be one interest, as His enemies actually alleged. (See on Matt. 12:24, etc.; see also Acts 16:16-18.)

42-44. JESUS, SOUGHT OUT AT MORNING PRAYER, AND ENTREATED TO STAY, DECLINES FROM THE URGENCY OF HIS WORK. See on Mark 1:35-39, where we learn how early He retired, and how He was engaged in solitude when they came seeking Him.

35. And hurt him not. Though he "convulsed" him, Mark i. 26, and threw him down in the midst of them, probably with the design to take away his life, yet our Lord permitted it not; and this appears to be the meaning of the place. The spirit was not permitted essentially to injure him at that time.

37. The fame. The "sound." This is a very elegant metaphor. The people are represented as struck with astonishment, and the "sound" goes out through all the coasts, in allusion to the propagation of sound by a smart stroke upon any substance, by which the air is suddenly agitated and conveys the report made by the stroke to distant places.

38. Simon's wife's mother. See on Matt. viii. 14-17. As soon as Peter began to follow Christ, his family began to benefit by it.

Peter's house. That Peter lived at Capernaum, and that Christ lodged with him, is fully evident from this verse compared with chap. xvii. 24. Peter's . . . wife's mother. Learn hence, says Theophylact, that marriage is no hindrance to virtue, since the chief of the apostles had his wife. Marriage is one of the first of divine institutions, and is a positive command of God. He says the state of celibacy is not good, Gen. ii. 18. Those who pretend to say that the single state is more holy than the other slander their Maker, and say in effect, "We are too holy to keep the commandments of God."

40. When the sun was setting. And consequently the Sabbath ended, for before this it would have been unlawful to bring their sick to be healed.

42. And the people sought him. Rather "Sought Him earnestly." This reading is supported by many MSS. The people had tasted detained him that he should not depart from them. It ought not to discourage the ministers of Christ that some reject them, for they will meet with others that will welcome them and their message. He chose rather to diffuse the light of his gospel to many places than to fix it to one. Though he was welcome at Capernaum, yet he is sent to preach the gospel to other cities also. They that enjoy the benefit of the gospel must be willing that others also should share in that benefit, and not covet the monopoly of it. Christ, though he preached not in vain in the synagogue at Capernaum, yet would not be tied to that, but preached in the synagogues of Galilee, v. 44. It is well for us that our Lord Jesus has not tied himself to any one place or people, but, wherever two or three are gathered in his name, he will be in the midst of them.

MATTHEW HENRY

CHAPTER 5

This passage of story is the same with that which was more briefly related by Matthew and Mark, of Christ's calling Peter and Andrew to be fishers of men, Matt. iv. 18, and Mark i. 16. They had not related this miraculous draught of fishes at that time, having only in view the calling of his disciples; but Luke gives us that story as one of the many signs which Jesus did, which had not been written in the foregoing books.

I. What vast crowds attended Christ's preaching: The people pressed upon him to hear the word of God (v. 1). The people flocked about him (so the word signifies); they showed respect to his preaching, though not without some rudeness to his person, which was very excusable, for they pressed upon him. Some would reckon this a discredit to him when none of the rulers or of the Pharisees believed in him. Their souls were as precious as the souls of the grandees, and it is his aim to bring not so much the mighty as the many sons to God. See how the people relished good preaching: they pressed to hear the word of God; they could perceive it to be the word of God, and therefore they coveted to hear it.

II. What poor conveniences Christ had for preaching: He stood by the lake of Gennesaret (v. 1), upon a level with the crowd, so that they could neither see him nor hear him; he was lost among them, he was crowded, and in danger of being crowded into the water: what must he do? There were two ships, or fishing boats brought to shore, one belonging to Simon and Andrew, the other to Zebedee and his sons, v. 2. At first, Christ saw Peter and Andrew fishing at some distance (so Matthew tells us, ch. iv. 18); but he waited till they came to land, and till the fishermen, that is, the servants, were gone out of them. Christ entered into that ship that belonged to Simon, and begged of him that he would lend it him for a pulpit; and prayed him that he would thrust out a little from the land, which would be the worse for his being heard, but Christ would have it so, that he might the better be seen; and it is his being lifted up that draws men to him. It intimates that Christ had a strong voice (strong indeed, for he made the dead to hear it). There he sat down, and taught the people the good knowledge of the Lord.

III. What a particular acquaintance Christ, hereupon, fell into with these fishermen, They had had some conversation with him before, which began at John's baptism (John i. 40, 41); they were with him at Cana of Galilee (John ii. 2), and in Judæa (John iv. 3); but as yet they were not called to attend him constantly. Now it was that they were called into a more intimate fellowship with Christ.

1. When Christ had done preaching, he ordered Peter to apply himself to the business of his calling again: Launch out into the deep, and let down your nets, v. 4. It was not the sabbath day, and therefore, as soon as the lecture was over, he set them to work. With what cheerfulness may we go about the duties of our calling when we have been in the mount with God. It is our wisdom and duty so to manage our religious exercises as that they may befriend our worldly business, and so to manage our worldly business as that it may be no enemy to our religious exercises.

2. Peter having attended upon Christ in his preaching, Christ will accompany him in his fishing. He stayed with Christ at the shore, and now Christ will launch out with him into the deep.

3. Christ ordered Peter and his ship's crew to cast their nets into the sea, which they did, in obedience to him, though they had been hard at it all night, and had caught nothing, v. 4, 5. We may observe here,

(1) How melancholy their business had now been: "Master, we have toiled all the night and have taken nothing." One would have thought that this should stayed him—"were staying Him," or sought to do it. What a contrast to the Gadarenes! The nature of His mission required Him to keep moving, that all might hear the glad tidings (Matt. 8:34). 43. I must . . .—but duty only could move Him to deny entreaties so grateful to His spirit.

CHAPTER 5

Vss. 1-11. MIRACULOUS DRAUGHT OF FISHES—CALL OF PETER, JAMES, AND JOHN. Not their first call, however, recorded in John 1:35-42; nor their second, recorded in Matthew 4:18-22; but their third and last before their appointment to the apostleship. That these calls were all distinct and progressive, seems quite plain. (Similar stages are observable in other eminent servants of Christ.)

the good word of God, and now they cleave to Christ with their whole hearts. Hearing the words of Christ and feeling the influence of His Spirit upon the soul will attract and influence the heart; and indeed nothing else can do it. And stayed him. Strove "to detain Him"; "they caught hold of Him," thus showing their great earnestness to be further instructed.

43. I must preach the kingdom of God to other cities. To proclaim the kingdom of God was the Messiah's great work; healing the diseases of the people was only an emblematical and secondary work, a work that was to be the proof of His goodness, and the demonstration of His authority to preach the gospel, and open the kingdom of Heaven to all believers.

1. The people pressed upon him. There was a glorious prospect of a plentiful harvest, but how few of these blades came to full corn in the ear! To hear with diligence and affection is well; but a preacher of the gospel may expect that, out of crowds of hearers, only a few, comparatively, will fully receive the truth and hold out to the end.

The lake of Gennesaret. Called also the "sea of Galilee," Matt. iv. 18 and Mark i. 16; and the "sea of Tiberias," John vi. 1. No synagogue could have contained the multitudes who attended our Lord's ministry, and therefore He was obliged to preach in the open air.

2. Two ships. "Two vessels." It is highly improper to term these ships. They appear to have been only such small boats as are used to manage nets on flat, smooth beaches.

3. And taught . . . out of the ship. They pressed so much upon Him on the land, through their eagerness to hear the doctrine of life, that He could not conveniently speak to them, and so was obliged to get into one of the boats; and, having pushed a little out from the land, He taught them. The smooth, still water of the lake must have served excellently to convey the sounds to those who stood on the shore.

5. Simon . . . said unto him, Master. Epistota. This is the first place where this word occurs; it is used by none of the inspired penmen but have excused them from hearing the sermon; but it was more refreshing and reviving to them than the softest slumbers. But they mention it to Christ, when he bids them go a fishing again. Some callings are much more toilsome than others are, and more perilous; yet Providence has so ordered it for the common good that there is no useful calling so discouraging but some or other have a genius for it. Those who follow their business, and get abundance by it with a great deal of ease, should think with compassion of those who cannot follow theirs but with a great fatigue, and hardly get a bare livelihood by it. Be the calling ever so laborious, it is good to see people diligent in it. These fishermen, that were thus industrious, Christ singled out for his favourites. Even those who are most diligent in their business often meet with disappointments; they who toiled all night yet caught nothing. We must do our duty, and then leave the event to God. When we are tired with our worldly business, and crossed in our worldly affairs, we are welcome to come to Christ, and spread our case before him.

(2) How ready their obedience was to the command of Christ: Nevertheless, at thy word, I will let down the net. Though they had toiled all night, yet, if Christ bid them, they will renew their toil. For every fresh service they shall have a fresh supply of grace sufficient. Though they have taken nothing, yet, if Christ bid them let down for a draught, they will hope to take something. We must not abruptly quit the callings wherein we are called because we have not the success in them we promised ourselves. The ministers of the gospel must continue to let down that net, though they have perhaps toiled long and caught nothing; and this is thankworthy, to continue unwearied in our labours, though we see not the success of them. In this they have an eye to the word of Christ: "At thy word, I will let down the net.' We are then likely to speed well when we follow the guidance of Christ's word.

4. The draught of fish they caught was so much beyond what was ever known that it amounted to a miracle (v. 6): They enclosed a great multitude of fishes, so that their net broke. It was so great a draught that they had not hands sufficient to draw it up; but they were obliged to beckon to their partners to come and help them, v. 7. But the greatest evidence of the vastness of the draught was that they filled both the ships with fish, to such a degree that they overloaded them, and they began to sink.

Now by this vast draught of fishes, Christ intended to show his dominion in the seas as well as on the dry land, over its wealth as over its waves. He intended hereby to confirm the doctrine he had just now preached out of Peter's ship. We may suppose that the people on shore stayed halting about there, to see what he would do next; and this miracle immediately following would be a confirmation to their faith, of his being at least a teacher come from God. He intended hereby to repay Peter for the loan of his boat. Christ's recompences for services done to his name are abundant, they are superabundant. He intended hereby to give a specimen, to those who were to be his ambassadors to the world, of the success of their embassy, that though they might for a time, and in one particular place, toil and catch nothing, yet they should be instrumental to bring in many to Christ, and enclose many in the gospel net.

5. The impression made upon Peter was very remarkable.

(1) All concerned were astonished, and the more astonished for their being concerned. All the boat's crew were astonished at the draught of fishes which they had taken (v. 9); they were all surprised. So were also James and John, who were partners with Simon (v. 10). Now they were the more affected with it, because they understood it better than others did. They that were well acquainted with this sea had never seen such a draught of fishes fetched out of it, and therefore they could not be tempted to diminish it, by suggesting that it was what might as well have happened at any time. It greatly corroborates the evidence of Christ's miracles that those who were best acquainted with them most admired them. Because they were most interested in it, and benefited by it. Peter and his part-owners were gainers by this great draught of fishes; their joy was a helper to their faith. When Christ's works of wonder are to us, in particular, works of grace, then especially they command our faith in his doctrine.

(2) Peter was astonished to such a degree that he fell down at Jesus's knees, as he sat in the stern of his boat, and said, Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord, v. 8. He thought himself unworthy of the favour of Christ's presence in his boat. It was the language of Peter's humility and self-denial, then (John 21:3), and even now Peter, as a fisherman, knew how hopeless it was to "let down his net" again, save as a mere act of faith, "at His word" of command, which carried in it, as it ever does, assurance of success. (This shows he must have been already and for some time a follower of Christ.)

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

The way in which to serve God is to do it at His word. I pray that none of us may sink into serving the Lord as a matter of routine. May we never fall to serving Him in our own strength. We must preach, teach, and labor in His name, because we hear Him bidding us do it. We must act at His word. If this were the case we should work with much more faith, with much more earnestness, and with much more likelihood of success. It is a blessed thing to see Christ sitting in the boat while you cast out the net. If you catch a glimpse of His approving smile as He watches you, you will work right heartily. We must labor in entire dependence upon Him, not preaching or teaching because in our judgment it is the right thing to do—Peter did not think so—but because Jesus gives the word, and His word is law. You must not work because you have any expectation of success from the excellence of your work, or from the nature of the people among whom you labor, but because Jesus has given you the word. You stand there doing a thing which critics sneer at as absurd, but you do it in all confidence, believing that it must be wise, because Jesus bids you do it.

I remember well how some of our brethren used to talk to us. They said, "You preach the gospel to dead sinners: you bid them repent and believe. You might as well shake a handkerchief over a grave and bid the corpse come out of it." Exactly so. They spoke the truth, but then I would delight to go and shake a handkerchief over graves and bid the dead live if Jesus bade me do so. I should expect to see the cemetery crack and heave from end to end if I were sent on such an errand by the Lord. I would accept the duty joyfully. The more absurd the wise men of our age make the gospel out to be, and the more they show that it is powerless to produce the end designed, the more will we persevere in our old method of preaching Jesus crucified. Our resolves are not to be shaken by that mode of reasoning. We never did draw our argument for preaching the gospel from the work itself, but from the orders given us to do it, and we would rather be acting upon the responsibility of Christ than upon our own. I would rather be a fool and do what Christ tells me than be the wisest man of the modern school and despise the word of the Lord. I would rather lay the responsibility of my life at the feet of Him who bids me live according to His word than seek out an object in life for myself, and feel that the responsibility rested on my own shoulders. Let us be willing to be under orders to Christ, willing to persevere under difficulties, willing to begin anew in His service from this very hour.

—The Treasury of the New Testament

6. net brake—rather "was breaking," or "beginning to break," as in vs. 7, "beginning to sink."

8. Depart . . .—Did Peter then wish Christ to leave him? Verily no. His all was wrapt up in Him (John 6:68). "Twas rather, Woe is me, Lord! How shall I abide this blaze of glory? A sinner such as I am is not fit company for Thee." (Cf. Isa. 6:5.)

ADAM CLARKE

Luke, and he applies it only to our blessed Lord. It properly signifies a praefect, or one who is set over certain affairs or persons; it is used also for an instructor or teacher. Peter considered Christ, from what he had heard, as Teacher of a divine doctrine, and as having authority to command. He seems to comprise both ideas in this appellation; he listened attentively to His teaching, and readily obeyed His orders.

We have toiled all the night. They had cast the net several times in the course of the night, and drew it to shore without success, and were now greatly disheartened. At thy word I will let down the net. He who assumes the character of a fisher of men, under any authority that does not proceed from Christ, is sure to catch nothing; but he who labors by the order and under the direction of the great Shepherd and Bishop of souls cannot labor in vain.

6. Their net brake. Or "began to break," or was "likely to be broken." Had it broken, as our version states, they could have caught no fish.

7. They beckoned unto their partners. Had not these been called in to assist, the net must have been broken and all the fish lost. What a pity there should be such envious separation among the different sects that profess to believe in Christ Jesus! Did they help each other in the spirit of Christian fellowship, more souls would be brought to the knowledge of the truth. Some will rather leave souls to perish than admit of partners in the sacred work. It is an intolerable pride to think nothing well done but what we do ourselves, and a diabolic envy to be afraid lest others should be more successful than we are. They . . . filled both the ships. Both the boats had as many as they could carry, and were so heavily laden that they were ready to sink. As one justly observes, "There are fish plenty to be taken, were there skillful hands to take, and vessels to contain them. Many are disputing about the size, capacity, and goodness of their nets and their vessels, while the fish are permitted to make their escape."

8. Depart from me; for I am a sinful man. "Go out from" me, i.e., from my boat. Peter was fully convinced that this draught of fish was a miraculous one; and that God himself had particularly interfered in this matter, whose presence and power he reverenced in the person and had not the least tincture of the devils' dialect, What have we to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of God? His acknowledgment was very just, and what it becomes us all to make: I am a sinful man, O Lord. Even the best men are sinful men, and should be ready upon all occasions to own it, and especially to own it to Jesus Christ. His inference from it was what might have been just, though really it was not so. If I be a sinful man, as indeed I am, I ought to say, "Come to me, O Lord, or let me come to thee, or I am undone, for ever undone." Peter may well be excused, if, in a sense of his own sinfulness and vileness, he cried out on a sudden, Depart from me. Those whom Christ designs to admit to the most intimate acquaintance with him he first makes sensible that they deserve to be set at the greatest distance from him. We must all own ourselves sinful men, and that therefore Jesus Christ might justly depart from us; but we must therefore fall down at his knees, to pray him that he would not depart.

6. The occasion which Christ took from this to intimate to Peter (v. 10), and soon after to James and John (Matt. iv. 21), his purpose to make them his apostles. He said unto Simon, "Thou shalt both see and do greater things than these; fear not, henceforth thou shalt catch men. That shall be a more astonishing miracle, and infinitely more advantageous than this."

Lastly, The fishermen's farewell to their calling, in order to their constant attendance on Christ (v. 11): When they had brought their ships to land they forsook all and followed him. It is observable that they left all to follow Christ, when their calling prospered in their hands more than ever it had done. When riches increase, and we are therefore most in temptation to set our hearts upon them, then to quit them for the service of Christ, this is thankworthy.

Verses 12–16

I. The cleansing of a leper, v. 12–14. This narrative we had both in Matthew and Mark. It is here said to have been in a certain city (v. 12); it was in Capernaum. This man is said to be full of leprosy; he had that distemper in a high degree. Let us learn here,

1. What we must do in the sense of our spiritual leprosy. We must seek Jesus. We must humble ourselves before him, as this leper, seeing Jesus, fell on his face. We must be ashamed of our pollution, and blush to lift up our faces before the holy Jesus. We must earnestly desire to be cleansed. We must firmly believe Christ's ability and sufficiency to cleanse us: Lord, thou canst make me clean, though I be full of leprosy. No doubt is to be made of the merit and grace of Christ. We must be importunate in prayer: He fell on his face and besought him; they that would be cleansed must reckon it a favour worth wrestling for. We must refer ourselves to the goodwill of Christ: Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst. This is not so much the language of his diffidence, or distrust of the goodwill of Christ, as of his submission to the goodwill of Jesus Christ.

2. What we may expect from Christ, if we thus apply ourselves to him. We shall find him very forward to take cognizance of our case (v. 13): He put forth his hand and touched him. His touching the leper was wonderful condescension; but it is much greater to us when he is himself touched with the feeling of our infirmities. We shall find him very compassionate, and ready to relieve us; he said, "I will, whosoever comes to me to be healed, I will in no wise cast him out." We shall find him all-sufficient, and able to heal and cleanse us, though we be ever so full of this loathsome leprosy. One word, one touch, from Christ, did the business: Immediately the leprosy departed from him.

3. What he requires from those that are cleansed, v. 14. We must be very humble (v. 14): He charged him to tell no man. He must not tell it to his own honour. Those whom Christ hath healed and cleansed must know that he hath done it in such a way as for ever excludes boasting. We must be very thankful: Go, and offer for thy cleansing. Christ did not require him to give him a fee, but to bring the sacrifice of praise to God. We must keep close to our duty; go to the priest. The man whom Christ had made whole he found in the temple, John v. 14. Those who by any affliction have been detained from public ordinances should, when the affliction is removed, attend on them the more diligently.

4. Christ's public serviceableness to men and his private communion with God.

(1) Though never any had so much pleasure in his retirements as Christ had, yet he was much in a crowd, to do good, v. 15. Though the leper should altogether hold his peace, yet the thing could not be hid, so much the more went there a fame abroad of him. For honour is like a shadow, which flees from those

10. Simon, fear not—This shows how the Lord read Peter's speech. The more highly they deemed Him, ever the more grateful it was to the Redeemer's spirit. Never did they pain Him by manifesting too lofty conceptions of Him. from henceforth—marking a new stage of their connection with Christ. The last was simply, "I will make you fishers." fishers of men—"What wilt thou think, Simon, overwhelmed by this draught of fishes, when I shall bring to thy net what will beggar all this glory?" (See on Matt. 4:18.) 11. forsook all—They did this before (Matt. 4:20); now they do it again; and yet after the Crucifixion they are at their boats once more (John 21:3). In such a business this is easily conceivable. After pentecost, however, they appear to have finally abandoned their secular calling.

12-16. LEPER HEALED. (See on Matt. 8:2-4.)

And, behold, there came a leper—"a man full of leprosy," says Luke 5:12. Much has been written on this disease of leprosy, but certain points remain still doubtful. All that needs be said here is that it was a cutaneous disease, of a loathsome, diffusive, and, there is reason to believe, when thoroughly pronounced, incurable character; that though in its distinctive features it is still found in several countries—as Arabia, Egypt, and South Africa—it prevailed, in the form of what is called white leprosy, to an unusual extent, and from a very early period, among the Hebrews; and that it thus furnished to the whole nation a familiar and affecting symbol of SIN, considered as (1) loathsome, (2) spreading, (3) incurable.

And Jesus—or "He," according to another reading,—"moved with compassion," says Mark (1:41); a precious addition. put forth his hand, and touched him—Such a touch occasioned ceremonial defilement (Lev. 5:3); even as the leper's coming near enough for contact was against the Levitical regulations (Lev. 13:46). But as the man's faith told him there would be no case for such regulations if the cure he hoped to experience should be accomplished, so He who had healing in His wings transcended all such statutes. saying, I will; be thou clean—How majestic those two words! By not assuring the man of His power to heal him, He delightfully sets His seal to the man's previous confession of that power; and by assuring him of the one thing of which he had any doubt, and for which he waited—His will to do it—He makes a claim as divine as the cure which immediately followed it. And immediately his leprosy was cleansed—Mark, more emphatic, says (1: 42), "And as soon as He had spoken, immediately the leprosy departed from him, and he was cleansed"—as perfectly as instantaneously. What a contrast this to modern pretended cures! And Jesus ["straitly charged him, and forthwith sent him away," Mark 1:43, and] saith unto him, See thou tell no man—A hard condition this would seem to a grateful heart, whose natural language, in such a case, is "Come, hear, all ye that fear God, and I will declare what He hath done for my soul" (Ps. 66:16). We shall presently see the reason for it. but go thy way, show thyself to the priest, and offer the gift that Moses commanded [Lev. 14] for a testimony unto them—a palpable witness that the Great Healer had indeed come, and that "God had visited His people." What the sequel was, our of Jesus. But as he felt himself a sinner, he was afraid the divine purity of Christ could not possibly endure him; therefore he wished for a separation from that power, which he was afraid might break forth and consume him. It seems to have been a received maxim among the Jews that whoever had seen a particular manifestation of God should speedily die.

10. Thou shalt catch men. "You shall catch men alive"; this is the proper signification of the word. Fear not. These discoveries of God tend to life, not to death; and you shall become the instruments of life and salvation to a lost world.

11. They forsook all, and followed him. God expects this from every person, and especially from those in whose hearts, or in whose behalf, He has wrought a miracle of grace or of providence.

12. A certain city. This was some city of Galilee, probably Chorazin or Bethsaida.

And, behold, there came a leper. The leprosy was an inveterate cutaneous disease, appearing in dry, thin, white, scurfy scales or scabs, either on the whole body or on some part of it, usually attended with violent itching and often with great pain. The various symptoms of this dreadful disorder, which was a striking emblem of sin, may be seen in Leviticus xiii—xiv, where also may be read the legal ordinances concerning it. Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean. As this leper may be considered as a fit emblem of the corruption of man by sin, so may his cure, of the redemption of the soul by Christ. A sinner, truly penitent, seeks God with a respectful faith; approaches Him in the spirit of adoration; humbles himself under His mighty hand, acknowledging the greatness of his fall and the vileness of his sin. His prayer, like that of the leper, should be humble, plain, and full of confidence in that God who can do all things, and of dependence upon His will or mercy, from which all good must be derived. It is peculiar to God that He need only will what He intends to perform. His power is His will.

Jesus put forth his hand . . . I will; be thou clean. The most sovereign authority is assumed in this speech of our blessed Lord—I will. There is here no supplication of any power superior to His own; and the event proved to the fullest conviction, and by the clearest demonstration, that His authority was absolute and His power unlimited. And immediately his leprosy was cleansed. What an astonishing sight! A man whose whole body was covered over with the most loathsome disease cleansed from it in a moment of time! Was it possible for any soul to resist the evidence of this fact?

Jesus saith unto him, See thou tell no man. Had our Lord, at this early period, fully manifested himself as the Messiah, the people in all likelihood would have proclaimed Him King. This, however, refused by Him, must have excited the hatred of the Jewish rulers and the jealousy of the Roman government; and, speaking after the manner of men, His further preachings and miracles must have been impeded. This alone seems to be the reason why He said to the leper, See thou tell no man. Shew thyself to the priest. This was to conform to the law instituted in this case, Lev. xiv. 1, etc. Offer the gift. This gift was two living, clean birds, some cedarwood, with scarlet and hyssop, that pursue it, but follows those that decline it. The less good men say of themselves, the more will others say of them. But Christ reckoned it a small honour to him that his fame went abroad; it was much more so that hereby multitudes were brought to receive benefit by him. By his preaching. They came together to hear him. By his miracles. They came to be healed by him of their infirmities.

(2) Though never any did so much good in public, yet he found time for pious and devout retirements (v. 16): He withdrew himself into the wilderness, and prayed. It is likewise our wisdom so to order our affairs as that our public work and our secret work may not interfere with one another. Secret prayer must be performed secretly; and those that have ever so much to do of the best business in this world must keep up constant stated times for it.

Verses 17–26

I. A general account of Christ's preaching and miracles, v. 17. He was teaching on a certain day, not on the sabbath day, but on a week-day. Preaching and hearing the word of God are good works, if they be done well, any day in the week. It was in a private house; for even there where we ordinarily converse with our friends it is not improper to give and receive good instruction. And the power of the Lord was to heal them. It was mighty to heal them; to heal their souls, to give them a new life, a new nature. It may be meant (and so it is generally taken) of the healing of those who were diseased in body, who came to him for cures. Whenever there was occasion, Christ had not to seek for his power, it was present to heal. There were Pharisees, and doctors of the law, sitting by; not sitting at his feet, to learn of him. But, by what follows (v. 21), it appears that they were not healed, but cavilled at Christ. They sat by as spectators, censors, and spies, to pick up something on which to ground a reproach or accusation. How many are there in the midst of our assemblies that do not sit under the word, but sit by! It is to them as a tale that is told them, not as a message that is sent them; they are willing that we should preach before them, not that we should preach to them. These Pharisees and scribes came out of every town of Galilee, and Judæa, and Jerusalem; they came from all parts of the nation. Christ went on with his work of preaching and healing, though he saw these Pharisees sitting by, who, he knew, despised him, and watched to ensnare him.

II. A particular account of the cure of the man sick of the palsy.

1. The doctrines that are taught us and confirmed to us by the story of this cure. (1) That sin is the fountain of all sickness, and the forgiveness of sin is the only foundation upon which a recovery from sickness can comfortably be built. They presented the sick man to Christ, and he said, "Man, thy sins are forgiven thee (v. 20), that is the blessing thou art most to prize and seek." The cords of our iniquity are the bands of our affliction. (2) That Jesus Christ has power on earth to forgive sins. This was the thing intended to be proved (v. 24): That ye may know and believe that the Son of man hath power to forgive sins, he saith to the sick of the palsy, Arise, and walk; and he is cured immediately. Christ claims one of the prerogatives of the King of kings when he undertakes to forgive sin, and it is justly expected that he should produce a good proof of it. "Well," saith he, "I will put it upon this issue: here is a man struck with a palsy, and for his sin; if I do not with a word's speaking cure his disease, then say that I am not entitled to the prerogative of forgiving sin: but, if I do, you must own that I have power to forgive sins." Thus it was put upon a fair trial, and one word of Christ determined it. He did but say, Arise, take up thy couch, and that chronical disease had an instantaneous cure; immediately he arose before them. They must all own that there could be no cheat or fallacy in it. (3) That Jesus Christ is God. He appears to be so, [1] By knowing the thoughts of the scribes and Pharisees (v. 22). [2] By doing that which their thoughts owned none could do but God only (v. 21): Who can forgive sins, say they, but only God? "I will prove," saith Christ, "that I can forgive sins"; and what follows then but that he is God?

2. The duties that are taught us, and recommended to us, by this story. (1) In our applications to Christ, we must be very pressing and urgent. They that were the friends of this sick man sought means to bring him in before Christ (v. 18); and, when they were baffled in their endeavour, they did not give up their cause; but when they could not get in by the door, it was so crowded, they untiled the house, and let the poor patient down through the roof, into the midst before Jesus, v. 19. In this Jesus Christ saw their faith, v. 20. When the centurion and the woman

Evangelist Matthew does not say; but Mark thus gives it (1:45): "But he went out, and began to publish it much, and to blaze abroad the matter, insomuch that Jesus could no more openly enter into the city, but was without in desert places: and they came to Him from every quarter." Thus—by an over-zealous, though most natural and not very culpable, infringement of the injunction to keep the matter quiet—was our Lord, to some extent, thwarted in His movements. As His whole course was sublimely noiseless (ch. 12:19), so we find Him repeatedly taking steps to prevent matters prematurely coming to a crisis with Him. (But see on Mark 5:19, 20). "And He withdrew Himself," adds Luke (5:16), "into the wilderness, and prayed"; retreating from the popular excitement into the secret place of the Most High, and thus coming forth as dew upon the mown grass, and as showers that water the earth (Ps. 72:6). And this is the secret both of strength and of sweetness in the servants and followers of Christ in every age.

17-26. PARALYTIC HEALED. (See on Matt. 9: 1-8.)

17. Pharisees and doctors . . . sitting by—the highest testimony yet borne to our Lord's growing influence, and the necessity increasingly felt by the ecclesiastics throughout the country of coming to some definite judgment regarding Him. power of the Lord . . . present—with Jesus. to heal them—the sick people.

19. housetop—the flat roof. through the tiling . . . before Jesus—(See on Mark 2:2).

thy sins be forgiven thee—By the word "be," our translators perhaps meant "are," as in Luke (5:20). For it is not a command to his sins to depart, but an authoritative proclamation of the man's pardoned state as a believer. And yet, as the Pharisees understood our Lord to be dispensing pardon by this saying, and Jesus not only acknowledges that they were right, but founds His whole argument upon the correctness of it, we must regard the saying as a royal proclamation of the man's forgiveness by Him to whom it belonged to dispense it; nor could such a style of address be justified on any lower supposition. (See on Luke 7:41, etc.).

24. take up thy couch—"sweet saying! The bed had borne the man; now the man shall bear the bed!" [BENGEL].

Why doth this man thus speak blasphemies? who can forgive sins but God only?—In this second question they expressed a great truth. (See Isa. 43:25; Mic. 7:18; Ex. 34: 6, 7, etc.). Nor was their first question altogether unnatural, though in our Lord's sole case it was unfounded. That a man, to all appearances like one of themselves, should claim authority and power to forgive sins, they could not, on the first blush of it, but regard as in the last degree startling; nor were they entitled even to weigh such a claim, as worthy of a hearing, save on supposition of resistless evidence afforded by Him in support of the claim. Accordingly, our Lord deals with them as men entitled to such evidence, and supplies it; at the same time chiding them for rashness, in drawing harsh conclusions regarding Himself.

When Jesus saw their faith—It is remarkable that all the three nar-

Lev. xiv. 4, which were to be brought for his cleansing; and, when clean, two he lambs, one ewe lamb, three tenth deals of flour, and one log of oil, v. 10. But if the person were poor, then he was to bring one lamb, one tenth deal of flour, one log of oil, and two turtledoves or young pigeons, vv. 21-22.

Now all this was to be done for a testimony unto them, to prove that this leper, who was doubtless well-known in the land, had been thoroughly cleansed; and thus, in this private way, to give full proof to the priesthood that Jesus was the true Messiah. The Jewish rabbins allowed that curing the lepers should be a characteristic of the Messiah; therefore the obstinacy of the priests in rejecting Christ was utterly inexcusable.

16. And he withdrew himself into the wilderness. Or rather, "He frequently withdrew into the desert." He made it a frequent custom to withdraw from the multitudes for a time, and pray, teaching hereby the ministers of the gospel that they are to receive fresh supplies of light and power from God by prayer, that they may be the more successful in their work; and that they ought to seek frequent opportunities of being in private with God and their books. A man can give nothing unless he first receive it; and no man can be successful in the ministry who does not constantly depend upon God, for the excellence of the power is all from Him. Why is there so much preaching, and so little good done? Is it not because the preachers mix too much with the world, keep too long in the crowd, and are so seldom in private with God?

17. On a certain day. This was when He was at Capernaum. See Mark ii. 1. The power of the Lord. The "mighty" or "miraculous" power of the Lord, i.e., of Jesus, was there to heal them—as many as were diseased in either body or soul. Where the teaching of Christ is, there also is the power of Christ to redeem and save.

18. A man which was taken with a palsy. See this case described on Matt. ix. 1, etc., and Mark ii. 1, etc.

Lying on a bed. A "couch" or "sofa," such as they reclined on at meals. Seeing their faith. The faith of the paralytic person, and the faith of those who brought him. Be of good cheer. "Son, take courage!" Probably he began to despond, and Christ spoke thus to support his faith. Thy sins be forgiven thee. Moral evil has been the cause of all the natural evil in the world. Christ goes to the source of the malady, which is sin. It is probable that this paralytic person had, in the earnest desires of his heart, entreated the cure of his soul, leaving his body to the care of others, as the first miracle of healing is wrought on his soul. It may be necessary to be observed that it was a maxim among the Jews that no diseased person could be healed till all his sins were blotted out. Hence our Lord first forgives the sins and then heals the body of the paralytic person.

21. Who can forgive sins, but God alone? If Jesus were not God, He could not forgive sins; and His arrogating this authority would have been blasphemy against God, in the most proper sense of the word. That these scribes and Pharisees might have the fullest proof of His Godhead, He works in their presence three miracles, which from their nature could be effected only by an omniscient and omnipotent Being. The miracles are: (1) the remission of the poor man's sins, (2) the discernment of the secret thoughts of the scribes, (3) the restoration of the paralytic in an instant to perfect soundness.

of Canaan were in no care at all to bring the patients they interceded for into Christ's presence, but believed that he could cure them at a distance, he commended their faith. In these there seemed to be an apprehension that it was requisite the patient should be brought into his presence, yet he did not censure and condemn their weakness, did not ask them, "Are you under such a degree of infidelity as to think I could not have cured him, though he had been out of doors?" But he made the best of it, and even in this he saw their faith. It is a comfort to us that we serve a Master that is willing to make the best of us. (2) When we are sick, we should be more in care to get our sins pardoned than to get our sickness removed. (3) The mercies which we have the comfort of, God must have the praise of. The man departed to his own house, glorifying God, v. 25. (4) The miracles which Christ wrought were amazing to those that saw them, and we ought to glorify God in them, v. 26. They said, "We have seen strange things today." They glorified God, who had sent into their country such a benefactor to it; and were filled with fear, with a reverence of God.

Verses 27–35

All this, except the last verse, we had before in Matthew and Mark; it is not the story of any miracle in nature wrought by our Lord Jesus, but it is an account of some of the wonders of his grace.

I. It was a wonder of his grace that he would call a publican, from the receipt of custom, to be his disciple and follower, v. 27. By this he exposed himself, and got the invidious character of a friend of publicans and sinners.

II. It was a wonder of his grace that the call was made effectual, v. 28. This publican, though those of that employment commonly had little inclination to religion, rose up, and followed Christ. There is no heart too hard for the Spirit and grace of Christ to work upon, nor any difficulties in the way of a sinner's conversion insuperable to his power.

III. It was a wonder of his grace that he would not only admit a converted publican into his family, but would keep company with unconverted publicans. Here is a wonder of grace indeed, that Christ undertakes to be the Physician of souls distempered by sin, and ready to die of the distemper (he is a Healer by office, v. 31)—that he came to call sinners, the worst of sinners, to repentance, and to assure them of pardon, upon repentance, v. 32. These are glad tidings of great joy indeed.

IV. It was a wonder of his grace that he did so patiently bear the contradiction of sinners against himself and his disciples, v. 30. He did not express his resentment of the cavils of the scribes and Pharisees, but answered them with reason and meekness.

V. It was a wonder of his grace that, in the discipline under which he trained up his disciples, he considered their frame, and proportioned their services to their strength. It was objected that he did not make his disciples to fast so often as those of the Pharisees and John Baptist did, v. 33. He insisted most upon that which is the soul of fasting, the living of a life of self-denial, which is as much better than fasting and corporal penances as mercy is better than sacrifice.

VI. It was a wonder of his grace that Christ reserved the trials of his disciples for their latter times, when by his grace they were in some good measure better prepared and fitted for them. Now they were as the children of the bride-chamber, when the bridegroom is with them, when they have plenty and joy, and every day is a festival. But this will not last always. The days will come when the bridegroom shall be taken away from them, v. 35. When Christ shall leave them with their hearts full of sorrow, their hands full of work, and the world full of enmity and rage against them, then shall they fast.

VII. It was a wonder of his grace that he proportioned their exercises to their strength. He would not put new cloth upon an old garment (v. 36), nor new wine into old bottles (v. 37, 38); he would not, as soon as ever he had called them out of the world, put them upon the strictnesses and austerities of discipleship, lest they should be tempted to fly off. Christ would train up his followers gradually to the discipline of his family; for no man, having drank old wine, will of a sudden, straightway, desire new, or relish it, but will say, The old is better, because he has been used to it, v. 39. The disciples will be tempted to think their old way of living better, till they are by degrees trained up to this way whereunto they are called. Christ's disciples, though they had not so much of the form of godliness, had more of the power of it.

ratives call it "their faith" which Jesus saw. That the patient himself had faith, we know from the proclamation of his forgiveness, which Jesus made before all; and we should have been apt to conclude that his four friends bore him to Jesus merely out of benevolent compliance with the urgent entreaties of the poor sufferer. But here we learn, not only that his bearers had the same faith with himself, but that Jesus marked it as a faith which was not to be defeated—a faith victorious over all difficulties. This was the faith for which He was ever on the watch, and which He never saw without marking, and, in those who needed anything from Him, richly rewarding.

"We have seen strange [unexpected] things to-day"—referring both to the miracles wrought and the forgiveness of sins pronounced by Human Lips. In Matthew (9:8) it is, "They marvelled, and glorified God, which had given such power unto men." At forgiving power they wondered not, but that a man, to all appearance like one of themselves, should possess it!

27-32. LEVI'S CALL AND FEAST. (See on Matt. 9:9-13; and Mark 2:14.)

sitting at the receipt of custom—as a publican, which Luke (5:27) calls him. It means the place of receipt, the toll-house or booth in which the collector sat. Being in this case by the seaside, it might be the ferry tax for the transit of persons and goods across the lake, which he collected. (See on ch. 5:46.) and he saith unto him, Follow me—Witching words these, from the lips of Him who never employed them without giving them resistless efficacy in the hearts of those they were spoken to. And he ["left all" (Luke 5:28)] arose and followed him.

30. their scribes—a mode of expression showing that Luke was writing for Gentiles.

33-39. FASTING. (See on Matt. 9:14-17.) The incongruities mentioned in vss. 36-38 were intended to illustrate the difference between the genius of the old and new economies, and the danger of mixing up the one with the other. As in the one case supposed, "the rent is made worse," and in the other, "the new wine is spilled," so by a mongrel mixture of the ascetic ritualism of the old with the spiritual freedom of the new economy, both are disfigured and destroyed. The additional parable in vs. 39, which is peculiar to Luke, has been variously interpreted. But the "new wine" seems plainly to be the evangelical freedom which Christ was introducing; and the old, the opposite spirit of Judaism: men long accustomed to the latter could not be expected "straightway"—all at once—to take a liking for the former; i.e., "These inquiries about the difference between My disciples and the Pharisees," and even John's, are not surprising; they are the effect of a natural revulsion against sudden change, which time will cure; the new wine will itself in time become old, and so acquire all the added charms of antiquity. What lessons does this teach, on the one hand, to those who unreasonably cling to what is getting antiquated; and, on the other, to hasty reformers who have no patience with the timidity of their weaker brethren!

ADAM CLARKE

26. Strange things. "Paradoxes." A paradox is something that appears false and absurd, but is not really so, or something contrary to the commonly received opinion.

27. Levi. See on Matt. ix. 9; Mark ii. 14.

28. And he left all. "Completely abandoning" his office, and everything connected with it. He who wishes to preach the gospel, like the disciples of Christ, must have no earthly entanglement.

29. A great feast. "A splendid entertainment." The word refers more properly to the number of the guests, and the manner in which they were received, than to the quality or quantity of the fare. A great number of his friends and acquaintance were collected on the occasion, that they might be convinced of the propriety of the change he had made, when they had the opportunity of seeing and hearing his heavenly Teacher.

37. The new wine will burst the bottles. These old bottles would not be able to stand the fermentation of the new wine, as the old sewing would be apt to give way. It is scarcely necessary to remark that the Eastern bottles are made of skins, generally those of goats.

39. The old is better. Is more "agreeable to the taste or palate." The "old wine," among the rabbins, was "the wine of three leaves"—that is, wine three years old—because, from the time that the vine had produced that wine, it had put forth its leaves three times.

MATTHEW HENRY

I. Christ justifies his disciples in a work of necessity for themselves on that day, and that was plucking the ears of corn, when they were hungry on that day. This story here has a date, which we had not in the other evangelists; it was on the second sabbath after the first (v. 1), that is, the first sabbath after the second day of unleavened bread, from which day they reckoned the seven weeks to the feast of pentecost. We may observe, 1. Christ's disciples ought not to be nice and curious in their diet, but take up with what is easiest got, and be thankful. These disciples plucked the ears of corn, and did eat (v. 1); a little served them, and that which had no delicacy in it. 2. Many are forward to censure others for the most innocent and inoffensive actions, v. 2. The Pharisees quarrelled with them as doing that which it was not lawful to do on the sabbath days, when it was their own practice to feed deliciously on sabbath days. 3. Jesus Christ will justify his disciples, and will own and accept of them in many a thing which men tell them it is not lawful for them to do. 4. Ceremonial appointments may be dispensed with, in cases of necessity, v. 3, 4. And, if God's own appointments might be thus set aside for a greater good, much more may the traditions of men. 5. Works of necessity are particularly allowable on the sabbath day. 6. Jesus Christ, though he allowed works of necessity on the sabbath day, will notwithstanding have us to know and remember that it is his day (v. 5): The Son of man is Lord also of the sabbath. In the kingdom of the Redeemer, the sabbath day is to be turned into a Lord's day. In token of this, it shall not only have a new name, the Lord's day, but shall be transferred to a new day, the first day of the week.

II. He justifies himself in doing works of mercy for others on the sabbath day. 1. Christ on the sabbath day entered into the synagogue. It is our duty, as we have opportunity, to sanctify sabbaths in religious assemblies. Our place must not be empty without very good reason. 2. In the synagogue, on the sabbath day, he taught. Christ took all opportunities to teach, not only his disciples, but the multitude. 3. Christ's patient was one of his hearers. A man whose right hand was withered came. Those that would be cured by the grace of Christ must be willing to learn the doctrine of Christ. 4. Among those who were the hearers and the eye-witnesses, there were some who came with no other design than to pick quarrels with him, v. 7. The scribes and Pharisees watched him, as the lion does his prey, whether he would heal on the sabbath day, that they might find an accusation against him. 5. Jesus Christ was neither ashamed nor afraid to own the purposes of his grace, v. 8. He bade the man rise, and stand forth, hereby to try the patient's faith and boldness. 6. He appealed to his adversaries themselves, whether it was the design of the fourth commandment to restrain men from doing good on the sabbath day, that good which their hand finds to do, and which cannot so well be put off to another time (v. 9): Is it lawful to do good, or evil, on the sabbath days? 7. He healed the poor man, though he knew that his enemies would not only take offence at it, but take advantage against him for it, v. 10. 8. His adversaries were hereby enraged so much the more against him, v. 11. Instead of being brought to be in love with him as a benefactor to mankind,—they were filled with madness, vexed that they could not frighten him from doing good. They were mad at Christ, mad at the people, mad at themselves. When they could not prevent his working this miracle, they communed one with another what they might do to Jesus, what other way they might take to run him down.

In these verses, we have our Lord Jesus in secret, in his family, and in public; and in all three acting like himself.

I. In secret we have him praying to God, v. 12. This evangelist takes frequent notice of Christ's retirements, to give us an example of secret prayer, without which it is impossible that the soul should prosper. In those days, when his enemies were filled with madness against him, he went out to pray. He was alone with God; he went out into a mountain, to pray, where he might have no disturbance or interruption given him. He was long alone with God: He continued all night in prayer. We think one half hour a great deal, but Christ continued a whole night in meditation and secret prayer. We have a great deal of business at the throne of grace, and we should take a great delight in communion with God, and by both these we may be kept sometimes long at prayer.

II. We have him nominating his immediate attendants, that should be the constant auditors of his

Vss. 1-5. PLUCKING CORN EARS ON THE SABBATH. (See on Matt. 12:1-8; and Mark 2:23-28.) 1. second sabbath after the first—an obscure expression, occurring here only, generally understood to mean, the first sabbath after the second day of unleavened bread. The reasons cannot be stated here, nor is the opinion itself quite free from difficulty.

Lord also—rather "even" (as in Matt. 12:8). of the sabbath—as naked a claim to all the authority of Him who gave the law at Mount Sinai as could possibly be made; i.e., "I have said enough to vindicate the men ye carp at on My account: but in this place is the Lord of the law, and they have HIS sanction." (See on Mark 2:28.)

6-11. WITHERED HAND HEALED. (See on Matthew 12:9-15; and Mark 3:1-7). 7. watched whether . . .—In Matthew this is put as an ensnaring question of theirs to our Lord, who accordingly speaks to the state of their hearts (vs. 9), just as if they had spoken it out.

9. good, or . . . evil, save . . . or destroy—By this novel way of putting His case, our Lord teaches the great ethical principle, that to neglect any opportunity of doing good is to incur the guilt of doing evil; and by this law He bound His own spirit. (See on Mark 3:4.) 11. filled with madness—The word denotes senseless rage at the confusion to which our Lord had put them, both by word and deed. what . . . do to Jesus—not so much whether to get rid of Him, but how to compass it. (See on Matt. 3:6.)

12-19. THE TWELVE APOSTLES CHOSEN—GATHERING MULTITUDES—GLORIOUS HEALING. 12, 13. went out—probably from Capernaum. all night in prayer . . . and when . . . day, he called . . .—The work with which the next day began shows what had been the burden of this night's devotions. As He directed His disciples to pray for "laborers" just before sending themselves forth (see on Matt. 9:37; 10:1), so here we find the Lord Himself in prolonged communion with His Father in preparation for the solemn appointment of those men who were to give birth to His Church, and from whom the world in all time was to take a new mould. How instructive is this! 13-16. (See on Matt. 10:2-4.)

CHAPTER 6

1. On the second sabbath after the first. "In the first Sabbath after the second." What does this mean? In answering this question, commentators are greatly divided. By this Sabbath seems meant that which immediately followed the two great feasts, the first and last day of the Passover, and was, therefore, the second after the proper Passover day. The words in the Greek seem to signify the "second first Sabbath"; and, in the opinion of some, the Jews had three first Sabbaths: viz., the first Sabbath after the Passover, that after the Feast of Pentecost, and that after the Feast of Tabernacles. According to this opinion, this "second first Sabbath" must have been the first Sabbath after Pentecost. This was the second day after the Passover, the day in which they were forbidden to labor, Lev. xxiii. 6, and for this reason was termed sabbath, Lev. xxiii. 15. But here it is marked by the name "second first Sabbath," because, being the day after the Passover, it was in this respect the second; and it was also the first, because it was the first day of unleavened bread, Exod. xii. 15-16. I think, with many commentators, that this transaction happened on the first Sabbath of the month Nisan; that is, after the second day of the Feast of Unleavened Bread. We may well suppose that our Lord and His disciples were on their way from Jerusalem to Galilee, after having kept the Passover. The word "the second first," is omitted by some MSS. and versions and the verse is read thus: "It came to pass, that he walked through the corn fields on a Sabbath day." I suppose they omitted the above word because they found it difficult to fix the meaning, which has been too much the case in other instances.

2. Which is not lawful. See on Matt. xii. 2-8.

3. What David did. See on Mark ii. 26-27.

4. After this verse, the Codex Bezae and two ancient MSS. have the following extraordinary addition: On the same day, seeing one working on the Sabbath, he said unto him, Man, if indeed thou knowest what thou dost, blessed art thou: but if thou knowest not, thou art cursed, and art a transgressor of the law. Whence this strange addition proceeded, it is hard to tell. The meaning seems to be this: If you now work on the Jewish Sabbath, from a conviction that that Sabbath is abolished, and a new one instituted in its place, then happy are you, for you have received divine instruction in the nature of the Messiah's kingdom; but if you do this through a contempt for the law of God, then you are accursed, forasmuch as you are a transgressor of the law.

6. Whose right hand was withered. See on Matt. xii. 10, etc.

7. Watched him. "They maliciously watched Him." This is the import of the word, chap. xiv. 1; xx. 20, and in the parallel place, Mark iii. 2.

9. I will ask you one thing. I will put a question to you. See on Mark iii. 4-5.

doctrine and eye-witnesses of his miracles, that hereafter they might be sent forth as apostles, his messengers to the world, v. 13. After he had continued all night in prayer, one would have thought that, when it was day, he should have reposed himself. No, as soon as anybody was stirring, he called unto him his disciples. In serving God, our great care should be, not to lose time, but to make the end of one good duty the beginning of another. Ministers are to be ordained with prayer more than ordinarily solemn. The number of the apostles was twelve. Their names are here recorded; it is the third time that we have met with them, and in each of the three places the order of them differs. Never were men so privileged, and yet one of them had a devil, and proved a traitor (v. 16); yet Christ, when he chose him, was not deceived in him.

III. In public we have him preaching and healing, the two great works between which he divided his time, v. 17. He came down with the twelve from the mountain, and stood in the plain, and there were presently gathered about him, not only the company of his disciples, but also a great multitude of people, a mixed multitude out of all Judæa and Jerusalem. They came also from the sea-coast of Tyre and Sidon. Though they bordered upon Canaanites, yet there were some well affected to Christ; such there were dispersed in all parts, here and there one. They came to hear him, and he preached to them. It is worthwhile to go a great way to hear the word of Christ, and to go out of the way of other business for it. They came to be cured by him, and he healed them. Some were troubled in body, and some in mind; some had diseases, some had devils; but both the one and the other, were healed, for he has power over diseases and devils (v. 17, 18). Nay, it should seem, those who had no particular diseases to complain of yet found it a great confirmation and renovation to their bodily health and vigour to partake of the virtue that went out of him; for (v. 19) the whole multitude sought to touch him, and they were all, one way or other, the better for him: he healed them all; and who is there that doth not need, upon some account or other, to be healed? There is a fulness of grace in Christ, that is enough for all, enough for each.

Verses 20–26

Here begins a practical discourse of Christ, most of which is found in the sermon upon the mount, Matt. v. and vii.

I. Blessings pronounced upon suffering saints (v. 20): He lifted up his eyes upon his disciples, not only the twelve, but the whole company of them (v. 17), and directed his discourse to them. There he sat, as one having authority; thither they come to him (Matt. v. 1).

1. "You are poor, you have left all to follow me. But you are blessed in your poverty, nay, you are blessed for it, for yours is the kingdom of God, all the comforts and graces of his kingdom here and all the glories and joys of his kingdom hereafter; yours it shall be, nay, yours it is."

2. "You hunger now (v. 21), you are not fed to the full as others are, you are glad of a few ears of corn for a meal's meat; thus you hunger now in this world, but in the other world you shall be filled."

3. "You weep now. But blessed are you; your present sorrows are no prejudices to your future joy, but preparatories for it: You shall laugh. You are but sowing in tears, and shall shortly reap in joy," Ps. cxxvi. 5, 6. God is treasuring up comforts for them; and the day is coming when their mouth shall be filled with laughing and their lips with rejoicing, Job. viii. 21.

4. "You now undergo the world's ill will. You must expect all the base treatment that a spiteful world can give you for Christ's sake, because you serve him and his interests. Wicked men will hate you, because your doctrine and life convict and condemn them. They will reproach you, will charge you with the blackest crimes, which you are perfectly innocent of, will fasten upon you the blackest characters, which you do not deserve; they will cast out your name as evil. Blessed are you when you are so used. It is an honour to you, as it is to a brave hero to be employed in the wars, in the service of his prince; and therefore rejoice you in that day, and leap for joy, v. 23. Do not only bear it, but triumph in it. You are treated as the prophets were before you, and therefore not only need not be ashamed of it, but may justly rejoice in it. You will for this be abundantly recompensed. Your reward is great in heaven. Though you may be losers for Christ, you shall not be losers by him in the end."

II. Woes denounced against prospering sinners as miserable people, though the world envies them. These we had not in Matthew. It should seem, the best exposition of these woes, compared with the

17. in the plain—by some rendered "on a level place," i.e., a piece of high tableland, by which they understand the same thing, as "on the mountain," where our Lord delivered the sermon recorded by Matthew (5:1), of which they take this following discourse of Luke to be but an abridged form. But as the sense given in our version is the more accurate, so there are weighty reasons for considering the discourses different. This one contains little more than a fourth of the other; it has woes of its own, as well as the beatitudes common to both; but above all, that of Matthew was plainly delivered a good while before, while this was spoken after the choice of the twelve; and as we know that our Lord delivered some of His weightiest sayings more than once, there is no difficulty in supposing this to be one of His more extended repetitions; nor could anything be more worthy of it. 19. healed—kept healing, denoting successive acts of mercy till it went over "all" that needed. There is something unusually grand and pictorial in this touch of description.

20, 21. In the Sermon on the Mount the benediction is pronounced upon the "poor in spirit" and those who "hunger and thirst after righteousness" (Matt. 5:3, 6). Here it is simply on the "poor" and the "hungry now." In this form of the discourse, then, our Lord seems to have had in view "the poor of this world, rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which God hath promised to them that love Him," as these very beatitudes are paraphrased by James (2:5).

21. laugh—How charming is the liveliness of this word, to express what in Matthew is called being "comforted!"

22. separate you—whether from their Church, by excommunication, or from their society; both hard to flesh and blood. for the Son of man's sake—Cf. Matthew 5:11, "for MY SAKE"; and immediately before, "for righteousness' sake" (vs. 10). Christ thus binds up the cause of righteousness in the world with the reception of Himself. 23. leap for joy—a livelier word than "be exceeding glad" of "exult" (Matt. 5:12).

ADAM CLARKE

13. He chose twelve. "He chose twelve out of them." Our Lord at this time had several disciples, persons who were converted to God under His ministry; and out of these converts He chose twelve, whom He appointed to the work of the ministry; and called them apostles, i.e., persons "sent" or commissioned by himself to preach that gospel to others by which they had themselves been saved.

15. Called Zelotes. Some Jews gave this name to themselves according to Josephus (War, b. iv, c. iii, s. 9 and vii, c. vii, s. 1), "because they pretended to be more than ordinarily zealous for religion, and yet practiced the very worst of actions." It is very probable that this name was first given to certain persons who were more zealous for the cause of pure and undefiled religion than the rest of their neighbors.

17. And stood in the plain. In Matt. v. 1, which is supposed to be the parallel place, our Lord is represented as delivering this sermon on the mountain; and this has induced some to think that the sermon mentioned here by Luke, though the same in substance with that in Matthew, was delivered in a different place, and at another time. But, as Dr. Priestly justly observes, Matthew's saying that Jesus was "sat down" after He had gone up to the mountain, and Luke's saying that He stood on the plain when He healed the sick, before the discourse, are no inconsistencies. Jesus ascends a mountain, employs the night in prayer; and, having thus solemnly invoked the divine blessing, authoritatively separates the twelve apostles from the mass of His disciples. He then descends, and heals in the plain all the diseased among a great multitude, collected from various parts by the fame of His miraculous power. Having thus created attention, He likewise satisfied the desire of the people to hear His doctrine, retiring first to the mountain whence He came, that His attentive hearers might follow Him and might better arrange themselves before Him.

20. Blessed be ye poor. See the Sermon on the Mount paraphrased and explained, Matthew v; vi; vii.

22. They shall separate you. Meaning, They will excommunicate you, or "separate you from their communion." Luke, having spoken of their separating or excommunicating them, continues the same idea in saying that they would cast out their name likewise, as a thing evil in itself. By your name is meant their name as His disciples. As such, they were sometimes called "Nazarenes," and sometimes "Christians"; and both these names were matter of reproach in the mouths of their enemies. So James (ii. 7) says to the converts, "Do not they blaspheme that worthy name by the which ye are called"? So when Paul (in Acts xxiv. 5) is called "a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes," the character of "a pestilent fellow" and that of "a mover of sedition" are joined to it; and in Acts xxviii. 22 the Jews say to Paul, "As concerning this sect, we know that every where it is spoken against"; and this is implied in 1 Pet. iv. 14, when he says, "If ye be reproached for the name of Christ," i.e., as "Christians," agreeably to what follows there in v. 16, "If any man suffer as a Christian." In after times we find Pliny, Epist. x. 97, consulting the Emperor Trajan whether or not he should "punish the name itself (of Christian), though no evil should be found in it."

foregoing blessings, is the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. Here is a woe to them that are rich, that is, that trust in riches; woe to them, for they have received their consolation, that which they placed their happiness in, v. 24. They in their lifetime received their good things, which, in their account, were the best things. "You that are rich are in temptation to set your hearts upon a smiling world, and to say, Soul, take thine ease in the embraces of it." It is the folly of carnal worldlings that they make the things of this world their consolation, which were intended only for their convenience. They please themselves with them; and to them the consolations of God are small, and of no account. It is their misery that they are put off with them as their consolation. Here is a woe to them that are full (v. 25), and have more than heart could wish. They are full of themselves, without God and Christ. Woe to such, for they shall hunger, they shall shortly be stripped and emptied of all the things they are so proud of. Here is a woe to them that laugh now, that have always a disposition to be merry, and always something to make merry with, and are always entertaining themselves with the laughter of the fool. Woe unto such, for it is but now, for a little time, that they laugh; they shall mourn and weep shortly. Here is a woe to them whom all men speak well of; that is, who make it their great and only care to gain the praise and applause of men (v. 26): "Woe unto you; it would be a bad sign that you were not faithful to your trust, and to the souls of men, if you preached so as that nobody would be disgusted; for your business is to tell people of their faults. The false prophets indeed, that flattered your fathers in their wicked ways, were caressed and spoken well of. We should desire to have the approbation of those that are wise and good; but, as we should despise the reproaches, so we should also despise the praises, of the fools in Israel.

These verses agree with Matt. v. 38, to the end of that chapter: I say unto you that hear (v. 27), to all you that hear, for these are lessons of universal concern. He that has an ear, let him hear. Now the lessons Christ here teaches us are,

I. That we must render to all their due, and be honest and just in all our dealings (v. 31): As ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise; for this is loving your neighbour as yourselves. We must put our souls into their souls' stead, and then pity and succour them, as we should desire and justly expect to be ourselves pitied and succoured.

II. That we must be free in giving to them that need (v. 30): "Give to every man that asketh of thee, that wants necessaries, which thou hast wherewithal to supply out of thy superfluities. Give to those that are not able to help themselves." Christ would have his disciples ready to distribute, and willing to communicate, to their power in ordinary cases, and beyond their power in extraordinary.

III. That we must be generous in forgiving those that have been any way injurious to us.

1. We must not be extreme in demanding our right, when it is denied us: "Him that taketh away thy cloak, forbid him not to take thy coat also (v. 29). Let him have that too, rather than fight for it. And (v. 30) of him that taketh thy goods, of such do not exact them; if Providence have made such insolvent, do not take the advantage of the law against them, but rather lose it than take them by the throat," Matt. xviii. 28.

2. We must not be rigorous in revenging a wrong when it is done us: "Unto him that smiteth thee on the one cheek, offer also the other. If anyone smite thee on the cheek, rather than give another blow to him, be ready to receive another from him"; that is, "leave it to God to plead thy cause, and do thou sit down silent under the affront."

3. Nay, we must do good to them that do evil to us. This is that which our Saviour chiefly designs to teach us, as a law peculiar to his religion, and a branch of the perfection of it. We must be kind to those from whom we have received injuries. We must not only love our enemies, and bear a good will to them, but we must do good to them. We must study to make it appear, by positive acts, that we bear them no malice, nor seek revenge. Do they curse us, speak ill of us, and wish ill to us? Do they despitefully use us, in word or deed? Do they endeavour to make us contemptible or odious? Let us bless them, and pray for them, speak well of them, the best we can, wish well to them, and be intercessors with God for them. This is repeated, v. 35: Love your enemies, and do them good. To recommend this difficult duty to us, it is represented as a generous thing, and an attainment few arrive at. To love those that love us has nothing received your consolation—(see on ch. 16:25). shall hunger—their inward craving strong as ever, but the materials of satisfaction forever gone.

26. all . . . speak well of you—alluding to the court paid to the false prophets of old (Mic. 2:11). For the principle of this woe, and its proper limits, see John 15:19.

27-36. (See on Matt. 5:44-48; 7:12; and 14:12-14.)

Give to him that asketh thee—The sense of unreasonable asking is here implied (cf. Luke 6:30). and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away—Though the word signifies classically "to have money lent to one on security," or "with interest," yet as this was not the original sense of the word, and as usury was forbidden among the Jews (Exod. 22:25, etc.), it is doubtless simple borrowing which our Lord here means, as indeed the whole strain of the exhortation implies. This shows that such counsels as "Owe no man anything" (Rom. 13:8), are not to be taken absolutely; else the Scripture commendations of the righteous for "lending" to his necessitous brother (Ps. 37:36; 112:5; Luke 6: 37) would have no application. turn not thou away—a graphic expression of unfeeling refusal to relieve a brother in extremity.

And if any man will sue thee at the law, and take way thy coat—the inner garment; in pledge for a debt (Exod. 22:26, 27). let him have thy cloak also—the outer and more costly garment. This overcoat was not allowed to be retained over night as a pledge from the poor because they used it for a bed-covering.

But I say unto you, That ye resist not evil; but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also—Our Lord's own meek, yet dignified bearing, when smitten rudely on the cheek (John 18:22, 23), and not literally presenting the other, is the best comment on these words. It is the preparedness, after one indignity, not to invite but to submit meekly to another, without retaliation, which this strong language is meant to convey.

But I say unto you, Love your enemies—The word here used denotes moral love, as distinguished from the other word, which expresses personal affection. Usually, the former denotes "complacency in the character" of the person loved; but here it denotes the benignant, compassionate outgoings of desire for anothers' good. bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you—The best commentary on these matchless counsels is the bright example of Him who gave them. (See I Pet. 2:21-24; and cf. Rom. 12:20, 21; I Cor. 4:12; I Pet. 3:9). But though such 24-26. But woe unto you that are rich! The Pharisees, who were laden with the spoils of the people which they received in gifts. These three verses are not found in the sermon as recorded by Matthew. They seem to be spoken chiefly to the scribes and Pharisees, who, in order to be pleasing to all, spoke to everyone what he liked best; and by finesse, flattery, and lies found out the method of gaining and keeping the good opinion of the multitude.

ALBERT BARNES:

26. "When all men shall speak well of you." When they shall praise or applaud you. The men of the world will not praise or applaud my doctrine; they are opposed to it, and therefore, if they speak well of you and your teaching, it is proof that you do not teach the true doctrine. If you do not do this, then there will be woe upon you. If men teach false doctrines for true; if they declare that God has spoken that which he has not spoken, and if they oppose what he has delivered, then heavy punishments will await them. "For so did their fathers." The "fathers" or "ancestors" of this people; the ancient Jews. "To the false prophets." Men who pretended to be of God—who delivered their own doctrines as the truth of God, and who accommodated themselves to the desires of the people. Of this number were the prophets of Baal and the false prophets who appeared in the time of Jeremiah.—Popular Commentary

Give to him that asketh thee, and from him that would borrow. To give and lend freely to all who are in need is a general precept from which we are excused only by our inability to perform it.

29. Thy cloak . . . thy coat. Coat, chiton, signifies "undergarment"; and cloak, himation, means "upper garment."

30. Ask them not again. Or, "Do not beg them off." It is probable that what is here spoken relates to requiring a thing speedily that had been lent, while the reason for borrowing it still continues. In Ecclus. xx. 15, it is a part of the character of a very bad men "that to-day he lendeth, and to-morrow will he ask it again."

34. Of whom ye hope to receive. Or "whom ye expect to return it."

35. Love ye your enemies. This is the most sublime precept ever delivered to man. A false religion durst not give a precept of this nature, because, without supernatural influence, it must be forever impracticable. In these words of our blessed Lord we see the tenderness, sincerity, extent, disinterestedness, pattern, and issue of the love of God dwelling in man.

MATTHEW HENRY

uncommon in it, nothing peculiar to Christ's disciples, for sinners will love those that love them. It is but following nature and puts no force at all upon it (v. 32). "And (v. 33) if you do good to them that do good to you, what thanks have you? What credit are you to the name of Christ, or what reputation do you bring to it? for sinners also do even the same. But it becomes you to do something more excellent and eminent, to do that which sinners will not do: you must render good for evil"; then we are to our God for a name and a praise, and he will have the thanks. We must be kind to those from whom we expect no manner of advantage (v. 35): Lend, hoping for nothing again. We must lend though we have reason to suspect that what we lend we lose, lend to those who are so poor that it is not probable they will be able to pay us again. Here are two motives to this generous charity. It will redound to our profit; for our reward shall be great, v. 35. What is lent and lost on earth, from a true principle of charity, will be made up to us. "You shall not only be repaid, but rewarded, greatly rewarded; it will be said to you, Come, ye blessed, inherit the kingdom." It will redound to our honour; for herein we shall resemble God in his goodness, which is the greatest glory: "Ye shall be the children of the Highest." It is the glory of God that he is kind to the unthankful and to the evil. Hence he infers (v. 36), Be merciful, as your Father is merciful; this explains Matt. v. 48, "Be perfect, as your Father is perfect. Imitate your Father in those things that are his brightest perfections." Those that are merciful as God is merciful, even to the evil and the unthankful, are perfect as God is perfect. This should strongly engage us to be merciful to our brethren, not only that God is so to others, but that he is so to us, though we have been, and are, evil and unthankful; it is of his mercies that we are not consumed.

Verses 37–49

All these sayings of Christ we had before in Matthew. They were sayings that Christ often used. We need not be critical here in seeking for the coherence: they are golden sentences, like Solomon's proverbs or parables.

I. We ought to be very candid in our censures of others, because we need grains of allowance ourselves: "Therefore judge not others, because then you yourselves shall not be judged; therefore condemn not others, because then you yourselves shall not be condemned, v. 37. God will not judge and condemn you, men will not." They that are merciful to other people's names shall find others merciful to theirs.

II. If we are of a giving and a forgiving spirit, we shall ourselves reap the benefit of it: Forgive and you shall be forgiven. If we forgive the injuries done to us by others, others will forgive our inadvertencies. If we forgive others' trespasses against us, God will forgive our trespasses against him. And he will be no less mindful of the liberal that devise liberal things (v. 38): Give, and it shall be given to you. Men shall return it into your bosom; for God often makes use of men as instruments, not only of his avenging, but of his rewarding justice. God will incline the hearts of others to give to us when we need, and to give liberally, good measure pressed down and shaken together. Whom God recompenses he recompenses abundantly.

III. We must expect to be dealt with ourselves as we deal with others: With the same measure that ye mete it shall be measured to you again. Those that deal hardly with others may expect to be paid in their own coin; but they that deal kindly with others have reason to hope that God will raise them up friends who will deal kindly with them.

IV. Those who put themselves under the guidance of the ignorant and erroneous are likely to perish with them (v. 39): Can the blind lead the blind? Shall not both fall together into the ditch? How can they expect any other? Those that are led by the common opinion, course, and custom, of this world, are themselves blind, and are led by the blind.

V. Christ's followers cannot expect better treatment in the world than their Master had, v. 40. Let them not promise themselves more honour or pleasure in the world than Christ had. Let each live a life of labour and self-denial as his Master doth, and make himself a servant of all; let him stoop, and let him toil, and do all the good he can, and then he will be a complete disciple.

VI. Those who take upon them to rebuke and reform others are concerned to look to it that they be themselves without rebuke, v. 41, 42. It is very absurd for any to pretend to be so quick-sighted as to spy small faults in others, like a mote in the eye, when they are themselves so perfectly past feeling as not to perceive a beam in their own eye. How canst precepts were never before expressed—perhaps not even conceived—with such breadth, precision, and sharpness as here, our Lord is here only the incomparable Interpreter of the law in force from the beginning; and this is the only satisfactory view of the entire strain of this discourse.

For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans the same?—The publicans, as collectors of taxes due to the Roman government, were ever on this account obnoxious to the Jews, who sat uneasy under a foreign yoke, and disliked whatever brought this unpleasantly before them. But the extortion practiced by this class made them hateful to the community, who in their current speech ranked them with "harlots." Nor does our Lord scruple to speak of them as others did, which we may be sure He never would have done if it had been calumnious. The meaning, then, is, "In loving those who love you, there is no evidence of superior principle; the worst of men will do this: even a publican will go that length." And if ye salute your brethren only—of the same nation and religion with yourselves. what do ye more [than others]?—what do 're uncommon or extraordinary? i.e, wherein do ye excel? do not even the publicans so?—The true reading here appears to be, "Do not even the heathens the same?" Cf. ch. 18:17, where the excommunicated person is said to be "as an heathen man and a publican."

37, 38. See on Matt. 7:1, 2; but this is much fuller and more graphic. Judge not, that ye be not judged—To "judge" here does not exactly mean to pronounce condemnatory judgment, nor does it refer to simple judging at all, whether favorable or the reverse. The context makes it clear that the thing here condemned is that disposition to look unfavorably on the character and actions of others, which leads invariably to the pronouncing of rash, unjust, and unlovely judgments upon them. No doubt it is the judgments so pronounced which are here spoken of; but what our Lord aims at is the spirit out of which they spring. Provided we eschew this unlovely spirit, we are not only warranted to sit in judgment upon a brother's character and actions, but in the exercise of a necessary discrimination are often constrained to do so for our own guidance. It is the violation of the law of love involved in the exercise of a censorious disposition which alone is here condemned. And the argument against it—"that ye be not judged"—confirms this: "that your own character and actions be not pronounced upon with the like severity"; i.e., at the great day. For with what judgments ye judge, ye shall be judged: and with what measure ye mete [whatever standard of judgment ye apply to others] it shall be measured to you again—This proverbial maxim is used by our Lord in other connections—as in Mark 4:24, and with a slightly different application in Luke 6:38—as a great principle in the divine administration. Unkind judgment of others will be judicially returned upon ourselves, in the day when God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ.

39. Can the blind . . .—not in the Sermon on the Mount, but recorded by Matthew in another and very striking connection (ch. 15:14). 40. The disciple . . . i.e., "The disciple aims to come up to his master, and he thinks himself complete when he does so: if you then be blind leaders of the blind, the perfection of one's training under you will only land him the more certainly in one common ruin with yourselves." 41-49. (See on Matt. 7:3-5, 16-27.)

why beholdest thou the mote—"splinter," here very well rendered "mote," denoting any small fault. that is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye?—denoting the much greater fault which we overlook in ourselves.

ADAM CLARKE

32. For sinners also love those that love them. I believe the word is used by Luke in the same sense in which "taxgatherers" is used by Matthew, chap. v. 46-47, and signifies "heathens"; not only men who have no religion, but men who acknowledge none.

Lend, hoping for nothing again. The rabbins say that he who lends without usury, God shall consider him as having observed every precept.

36. Be ye therefore merciful. Or "compassionate." A merciful or compassionate man easily forgets injuries; pardons them without being solicited; and does not permit repeated returns of ingratitude to deter him from doing good, even to the unthankful and the unholy. See on Matt. v. 7.

37. Judge not. See on Matt. vii. 1. Forgive. The mercy and compassion which God recommends extend to the forgiving of all the injuries we have received, or can receive.

38. Bosom. Or "lap." Almost all ancient nations wore long, wide, and loose garments; and when about to carry anything which their hands could not contain, they used a fold of their robe in nearly the same way as women here use their aprons. The phrase is continually occurring in the best and purest Greek writers. See also Ps. cxxix. 7; Prov. vi. 27; xvii. 23. The same measure that ye mete withal it shall be measured to you again. The same words we find in the Jerusalem Targum on Gen. xxxviii. 26. Our Lord, therefore, lays down a maxim which themselves allowed.

39. Can the blind lead the blind? This appears to have been a general proverb, and to signify that a man cannot teach what he does not understand. This is strictly true in spiritual matters. A man who is not illuminated from above is utterly incapable of judging concerning spiritual things, and wholly unfit to be a guide to others.

40. Every one that is perfect. Or "thoroughly instructed." The noun is used by the Greek medical writers to signify the reducing a disjointed limb. It sometimes signifies to "repair" or "mend," and in this sense it is applied to broken nets, Matt. iv. 21; Mark i. 19; but in this place, and in Heb. xiii. 21; 2 Tim. iii. 17, it means "complete instruction and information." Everyone who is "thoroughly instructed" in divine things, who has his heart united to God, whose disordered tempers and passions are purified and "restored to harmony and order"; everyone who has in him the mind that was in Christ, though he cannot be above, yet will be as, his Teacher—"holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners."

thou offer thy service to thy brother, to pull out the mote from his eye, which requires a good eye as well as a good hand, when thou thyself hast a beam in thine own eye. To help to pull the mote out of our brother's eye is a good work, but then we must qualify ourselves for it by beginning with ourselves; reforming our own lives.

VII. We may expect that men's words and actions will be according as they are.

1. The heart is the tree, and the words and actions are fruit according to the nature of the tree, v. 43, 44. If a man be really a good man, though perhaps he may not abound in fruit, and though he may be sometimes like a tree in winter, yet he does not bring forth corrupt fruit; though he may not do you all the good he should, yet he will not do you hurt. If he cannot reform ill manners, he will not corrupt good manners. If the fruit that a man brings forth be corrupt you may be sure that he is not a good tree. On the other hand, a corrupt tree doth not bring forth good fruit, though it may bring forth green leaves. So neither can you expect any good conduct from those who have justly a bad character. If the fruit be good, you may conclude that the tree is so; for every tree is known by its fruit.

2. The heart is the treasure, and the words and actions are the produce from that treasure, v. 45. The reigning love of God and Christ in the heart is a good treasure in the heart: it enriches a man, it furnishes him with a good stock to spend upon, for the benefit of others. Out of such a good treasure a man may bring forth that which is good. But where the love of the world and the flesh reign there is an evil treasure in the heart, out of which an evil man is continually bringing forth that which is evil. Of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaks; what the mouth ordinarily speaks generally agrees with what is innermost and uppermost in the heart. Not but that a good man may possibly drop a bad word, and a wicked man make use of a good word to serve a bad turn; but, for the most part, the heart is as the words are, vain or serious; it therefore concerns us to get our hearts filled, not only with good, but with abundance of it.

VIII. It is not enough to hear the sayings of Christ, but we must do them.

1. It is putting an affront upon him to call him Lord, Lord, if we do not make conscience of conforming to his will. We do but mock Christ, as they that in scorn said, Hail, King of the Jews, if we call him ever so often Lord, Lord, and yet walk in the way of our own hearts.

2. It is putting a cheat upon ourselves if we think that hearing the sayings of Christ will bring us to heaven, without doing them. This he illustrates by a similitude (v. 47–49), which shows,

(1) That those only make sure work for their souls and eternity who do not only come to Christ as his scholars, and hear his sayings, but do them. They are like a house built on a rock. These are they that take pains in religion, as they do that build on a rock,—that begin low, as they do,—that dig deep, that found their hope upon Christ, who is the Rock of ages (and other foundation can no man lay). They who do thus do well for themselves; for, [1] They shall keep their integrity, in times of temptation and persecution; when others fall from their own steadfastness they shall stand fast in the Lord. [2] They shall keep their comfort, and peace, and hope, and joy, in the midst of the greatest distresses. The storms and streams of affliction shall not shock them, for their feet are set upon a rock. [3] Their everlasting welfare is secured. Obedient believers are kept by the power of Christ, through faith, unto salvation, and shall never perish.

(2) That those who rest in a bare hearing of the sayings of Christ, and do not live up to them, are but preparing for a fatal disappointment: He that heareth and doeth not, he is like a man that built a house without a foundation. His hopes will fail him when he most needs the comfort of them. When the stream beats vehemently upon his house, it is gone, the sand it is built upon is washed away, and immediately it falls.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

Or how wilt thou say to thy brother, Let me pull out the mote out of thine eye; and, behold, a beam is in thine own eye? Thou hypocrite [Hypocrite]—first cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye—Our Lord uses a most hyperbolical, but not unfamiliar figure, to express the monstrous inconsistency of this conduct. The "hypocrisy" which, not without indignation, He charges it with, consists in the pretense of a zealous and compassionate charity, which cannot possibly be real in one who suffers worse faults to lie uncorrected in himself. He only is fit to be a reprover of others who jealously and severely judges himself. Such persons will not only be slow to undertake the office of censor on their neighbors, but, when constrained in faithfulness to deal with them, will make it evident that they do it with reluctance and not satisfaction, with moderation and not exaggeration, with love and not harshness.

A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit—Obvious as is the truth here expressed in different forms—that the heart determines and is the only proper interpreter of the actions of our life—no one who knows how the Church of Rome makes a merit of actions, quite apart from the motives that prompt them, and how the same tendency manifests itself from time to time even among Protestant Christians, can think it too obvious to be insisted on by the teachers of divine truth.

Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord—the reduplication of the title "Lord" denoting zeal in according it to Christ (see Mark 14:45). Yet our Lord claims and expects this of all His disciples, as when He washed their feet: "Ye call me Master and Lord: and ye say well; for so I am" (John 13:13). shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven—that will which it had been the great object of this discourse to set forth. Yet our Lord says warily, not "the will of your Father," but "of My Father"; thus claiming a relationship to His Father with which His disciples might not intermeddle, and which He never lets down. And He so speaks here to give authority to His asseverations. But now He rises higher still—not formally announcing Himself as the Judge, but intimating what men will say to Him, and He to them, when He sits as their final judge.

Therefore—to bring this discourse to a close. whosoever heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them—see James 1:22, which seems a plain allusion to these words; also Luke 11:28; Romans 2:13; I John 3:7—I will liken him unto a wise man—a shrewd, prudent, provident man. which built his house upon a rock—the rock of true discipleship, or genuine subjection to Christ. And the rain [from above] descended, and the floods [from below] came, and the winds [sweeping across] blew, and [thus from every direction] beat upon that house; and it fell not; for it was founded upon a rock—See I John 2:17. And every one that heareth these sayings of mine—in the attitude of discipleship—and doeth them not, shall be likened unto a foolish man, which built his house upon the sand—denoting a loose foundation—that of an empty profession and mere external services. And the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon [struck against] that house; and it fell: and great was the fall of it—terrible the ruin! How lively must this imagery have been to an audience accustomed to the fierceness of an Eastern tempest, and the suddenness and completeness with which it sweeps everything unsteady before it!

ADAM CLARKE

41. And why beholdest thou the mote? See this explained on Matt. vii. 3-5.

43. Corrupt fruit. Literally, rotten fruit; but here it means such fruit as is unfit for use. See on Matt. vii. 17-20.

45. A good man. See on Matt. xii. 35.

46. Lord, Lord. God judges of the heart, not by words, but by works.

47. I will shew you. "I will show you plainly." I will enable you fully to comprehend My meaning on this subject by the following parable.

48. He is like a man. See on Matt. vii. 24-27.

And the rain descended, and the floods came. A fine illustration of this may be seen in the case of the fishermen in Bengal, who, in the dry season, build their huts on the beds of sand from which the river has retired. But when the rain sets in suddenly, as it often does, accompanied with violent northwest winds, and the waters pour down in torrents from the mountains, in one night multitudes of these buildings are swept away, and the place where they stood is on the next morning indiscoverable.

MATTHEW HENRY

CHAPTER 7

Some difference there is between this story of the cure of the centurion's servant as it is related here and as we had it in Matt. viii. 5, &c. There it was said that the centurion came to Christ; here it is said that he sent to him first some of the elders of the Jews (v. 3), and afterwards some other friends, v. 6.

This miracle is here said to have been wrought by our Lord Jesus when he had ended all his sayings in the audience of the people, v. 1. What Christ said he said publicly; In secret have I said nothing, John xviii. 20.

I. The centurion's servant that was sick was dear to his master, v. 2. It was the praise of the servant that by his diligence and faithfulness, he recommended himself to his master's esteem and love. Servants should study to endear themselves to their masters. It was likewise the praise of the master that, when he had a good servant, he knew how to value him. Many masters think it favour enough to the best servants they have not to rate them, whereas they ought to be kind to them, and tender of them, and solicitous for their welfare and comfort.

II. The master, when he heard of Jesus, v. 3, begged that Christ would come and heal his servant.

III. He sent some of the elders of the Jews to Christ, thinking that a greater piece of respect to Christ than if he had come himself. For that reason he sent Jews. And not ordinary Jews either, but elders of the Jews, that the dignity of the messengers might give honour to him to whom they were sent.

IV. The elders of the Jews were hearty intercessors for the centurion: They besought him instantly (v. 4), pleading for the centurion that which he would never have pleaded for himself, that he was worthy for whom he should do this. The centurion said, I am not so much as worthy of a visit (Matt. viii. 8), but the elders of the Jews thought him worthy of the cure. But that which they insisted upon in particular was, that, though he was a Gentile, yet he was a hearty well-wisher to the Jewish nation and religion, v. 5. He loveth our nation (which few of the Gentiles did). Even conquerors, and those in power, ought to keep up an affection for the conquered, and those they have power over. He was well-affected to their worship: He built them a new synagogue at Capernaum. Hereby he testified his veneration for the God of Israel, and his desire to have an interest in the prayers of God's Israel. Building places of meeting for religious worship is a very good work, and those who do good works of that kind are worthy of double honour.

V. Jesus Christ was very ready to show kindness to the centurion. He presently went with them (v. 6), though he was a Gentile. The centurion did not think himself worthy to visit Christ (v. 7), yet Christ thought him worthy to be visited by him.

VI. The centurion gave further proofs both of his humility and of his faith. When he was now not far from the house he sends friends to meet him with fresh expressions, 1. Of his humility: "Lord, trouble not thyself, for I am unworthy of such an honour." This bespeaks not only his low thoughts of himself, notwithstanding the greatness of his figure; but his high thoughts of Christ, notwithstanding the meanness of his figure in the world. 2. Of his faith: "Lord, trouble not thyself; thou canst cure my servant without coming under my roof. Say in a word, and my servant shall be healed." He illustrates this faith of his by a comparison taken from his own profession, and is confident that Christ can as easily command away the distemper as he can command any of his soldiers, as he can send a soldier on an errand, v. 8.

VII. Our Lord Jesus was wonderfully well pleased with the faith of the centurion, and the more surprised at it because he was a Gentile; and, the centurion's faith having thus honoured Christ, see how he honoured it (v. 9): He turned him about and said to the people that followed him, I have not found so great faith, no not in Israel. Christ will have those that follow him to observe and take notice of the great examples of faith—especially when any such are found among those that do not follow Christ so closely as they do in profession—that we may be shamed by the strength of their faith out of the weakness and waverings of ours.

VIII. The cure was presently and perfectly wrought (v. 10): They that were sent went back, and found the servant well. Christ will take cognizance of the distressed case of poor servants, for there is no respect of persons with him. Nor are the Gentiles excluded from the benefit of his grace.

Verses 11-18

We have here the story of Christ's raising to life a widow's son at Nain, which Matthew and Mark had made no mention of.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

Vss. 1-10. CENTURION'S SERVANT HEALED. (See on Matt. 8:5-13.)

2. And a certain centurion's servant, who was dear unto him, was sick, and ready to die. These centurions were Roman officers, so called from being captains over a hundred soldiers. Though a heathen by birth and early training, he had become acquainted with the Jewish religion probably either while quartered at Capernaum or in some other Galilean town; although there were so many proselytes to the Jewish religion in all the principal Greek and Roman cities that he might have embraced the true faith even before his arrival in the Holy Land. The same may be said of Cornelius (Acts 10:1). His character appears here in the most beautiful light. The value which he set upon this dying servant and his anxiety for his recovery—as if he had been his own son—is the first feature in it; for, as Bishop Hall observes, he is unworthy to be well served who will not sometimes wait upon his followers.

4. he was worthy . . .—a testimony most precious, coming from those who probably were strangers to the principle from which he acted (Eccles. 7:1).

5. loved our nation—Having found that "salvation was of the Jews," he loved them for it. built . . .—His love took this practical and appropriate form.

These elders content not themselves with delivering the humble petition of the centurion himself, but urge their own arguments in support of it. And how precious is the testimony they bear to this devout soldier; all the more so as coming from persons who were themselves probably strangers to the principle from which he acted. "He loveth our nation," they say; for he had found, in his happy experience, as our Lord said to the woman of Samaria, that "Salvation is of the Jews" (John 4:22); "and [they add] he hath built us a synagogue"—rebuilding the synagogue of the place at his own sole expense. His love to the Jews took this appropriate and somewhat costly form. He would leave a monument in Capernaum of the debt he owed to the God of Israel by providing for His worship and the comfort of His worshipers. Lord, trouble not thyself; for I am not worthy that thou shouldest enter under my roof. What deep humility! 7. Wherefore neither thought I myself worthy to come unto thee: but say in a word. In Matthew it is "but speak the word only"—or more expressively, "but speak only a word." and my servant shall be healed. No such faith as this had been before displayed. 8. For I also am a man set under authority, having under me soldiers; and I say unto one, Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh; and to my servant, Do this, and he doeth it—"I know both to obey and command: though but a subaltern, my orders are implicitly obeyed: Shall not diseases, then, obey their Lord, and at His word be gone?" 9. When Jesus heard these things, he marvelled at him. As Bengel hints, Jesus marveled but at two things—faith (as here) and unbelief (Mark 6:6): at the one, considering the general blindness in spiritual things; at the other, considering the light that shone around all who were privileged to hear Him and behold His works. But the unprecedented faith of this heathen convert could not fail to fill His soul with peculiar admiration. and turned him about, and said unto the people that followed him—Jews, no doubt, I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel—among the chosen people; this Gentile outstripping all the children of the covenant.

ADAM CLARKE

2. A certain centurion's servant. See this miracle explained on Matt. viii. 5-13.

A centurion. A Roman military officer who had the command of 100 men.

3. Elders of the Jews. These were either "magistrates" in the place, or the elders of the synagogue which the centurion had built, v. 5. He sent these, probably, because he was afraid to come to Christ himself, not being a Jew, by either nation or religion. In the parallel place in Matthew he is represented as coming to Christ himself; but it is a usual form of speech in all nations to attribute the act to a person which is done, not by himself, but by his authority.

But speak the word only. Or, "Speak by word or command." Jesus can will away the palsy, and speak away the most grievous torments.

For I am a man under authority. That is, "under the authority of others." The argument of the centurion seems to run thus. If I, who am a person subject to the control of others, yet have some so completely subject to myself that I can say to one, Come, and he cometh; to another, Go, and he goeth; and to my slave, Do this, and he doeth it; how much more then canst Thou accomplish whatsoever Thou willest, being under no control, and having all things under Thy command!

I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel. That is, I have not found so great an instance of confidence and faith in My power, even among the Jews, as this Roman, a Gentile, has shown himself to possess.

10. Found the servant whole. This cure was the effect of the faith, prayer, and humility of the centurion, through which the almighty energy of Jesus Christ was conveyed to the sick man. But these very graces in the centurion were the products of grace. It is God himself who, by the gifts of His mercy, disposes the soul to receive its cure; and nothing can contribute to the reception of His grace but what is the fruit of grace itself. The apostle says, "The grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men," Titus ii. 11. It should therefore be our concern, not to resist the operations of this grace: for though we cannot endue ourselves with any gracious disposition, yet we can quench the Spirit, by whose agency these are produced in the soul. The centurion had not received the grace of God in vain.

MATTHEW HENRY

I. Where, and when, this miracle was wrought. It was the next day after he had cured the centurion's servant, v. 11. It was done at the gate of a small city, or town, called Nain, not far from Capernaum.

II. Who were the witnesses of it. It was done in the sight of two crowds that met in or near the gate of the city. There was a crowd of disciples and other people attending Christ (v. 11), and a crowd of relations and neighbours attending the funeral of the young man, v. 12.

III. How it was wrought by our Lord Jesus. The person raised to life was a young man. This young man was the only son of his mother, and she a widow. She depended upon him to be the staff of her old age, but he proves a broken reed; every man at his best estate is so. We may well think how deep the sorrow of this poor mother was for her only son, and it was the deeper in that she was a widow. Much people of the city was with her, condoling with her loss, to comfort her. Christ showed both his pity and his power in raising him to life. See how tender his compassions are towards the afflicted (v. 13): When the Lord saw the poor widow following her son to the grave, he had compassion on her. Here was no application made to him for her. Purely from the goodness of his nature, he was troubled for her. The case was piteous, and he looked upon it with pity. He said unto her, Weep not. What a pleasing idea does this give us of the compassions of the Lord Jesus, and the multitude of his tender mercies. Christ said, Weep not; and he could give her a reason for it which no one else could: "Weep not for a dead son, for he shall presently become a living one." This was a reason peculiar to her case; yet there is a reason common to all that sleep in Jesus, that they shall rise again, shall rise in glory; and therefore we must not sorrow as those that have no hope, 1 Thess. iv. 13. Let our passion at such a time be checked and calmed by the consideration of Christ's compassion. See how triumphant his commands are over even death itself (v. 14): He came, and touched the bier. Hereby he intimated to the bearers that they should not proceed. Hereupon they that bore him stood still, and then with solemnity, as one that had authority, he said, Young man, I say unto thee, Arise. Power went along with that word to put life into him. Christ's dominion over death was evidenced by the immediate effect of his word (v. 15): He that was dead sat up. Have we grace from Christ? Let us show it. Another evidence of life was that he began to speak; for whenever Christ gives us spiritual life he opens the lips in prayer and praise. He delivered him to his mother, to attend her as became a dutiful son. Now she was comforted, according to the time in which she had been afflicted.

IV. What influence it had upon the people (v. 16): There came a fear on all; they were all struck with wonder at this miracle, and glorified God. The Lord and his goodness, as well as the Lord and his greatness, are to be feared. The inference they drew from it was, "A great prophet is risen up among us, and in him God hath visited his people." This would be life from the dead indeed to all them that waited for the consolation of Israel. The report of this miracle was carried, in general, all the country over (v. 17): This rumour of him went forth through all Judæa, which lay a great way off, and throughout all Galilee, which was the region round about. Many have the rumour of Christ's gospel in their ears that have not the savour and relish of it in their souls. In particular, it was carefully brought to John Baptist, who was now in prison (v. 18): His disciples came, and gave him an account of all things, that he might know that though he was bound yet the word of the Lord was not bound; God's work was going on, though he was laid aside.

Verses 19–35

I. We have here the message John Baptist sent to Christ, and the return he made to it. The great thing we are to enquire concerning Christ is whether he be he that should come, or whether we are to look for another, v. 19, 20. We are sure that God has promised that a Saviour shall come; we are as sure that what he has promised he will perform. If this Jesus be that promised Messiah, we will receive him; but, if not, we will continue our expectations, and will wait for him. The faith of John Baptist himself wanted to be confirmed in this matter. The great men of the Jewish church had not owned him. Nothing of that power and grandeur was to be seen about him in which it was expected that the Messiah would appear; and therefore it is not strange that they should ask, Art thou the Messiah? Christ left it to his own works to praise him. While John's messengers were with him, he wrought many miraculous cures, in that same hour, v. 21. He cured

11-17. WIDOW OF NAIN'S SON RAISED TO LIFE. (In Luke only.) 11. Nain—a small village not elsewhere mentioned in Scripture, and only this once probably visited by our Lord; it lay a little to the south of Mount Tabor, about twelve miles from Capernaum. 12. carried out—"was being carried out." Dead bodies, being ceremonially unclean, were not allowed to be buried within the cities (though the kings of David's house were buried in the city of David), and the funeral was usually on the same day as the death. only son . . .—affecting particulars, told with delightful simplicity.

13, 14. the Lord—"This sublime appellation is more usual with Luke and John than Matthew; Mark holds the mean" [BENGEL]. saw her, he had compassion . . .—What consolation to thousands of the bereaved has this single verse carried from age to age!

14, 15. What mingled majesty and grace shines in this scene! The Resurrection and the Life in human flesh, with a word of command, bringing back life to the dead body; Incarnate Compassion summoning its absolute power to dry a widow's tears!

16. visited his people—more than bringing back the days of Elijah and Elisha (I Kings 17:17-24; II Kings 4:32-37; and see on Matt. 15:31).

18-35. THE BAPTIST'S MESSAGE, THE REPLY, AND CONSEQUENT DISCOURSE.

20. When the men were come unto him, they said, John Baptist hath sent us unto thee, saying, Art thou he that should come? or look we for another? Was this a question of doubt as to the messiahship of his Lord, as rationalists are fain to represent it? Impossible, from all we know of him. Was it then purely for the satisfaction of his disciples, as some expositors, more concerned for the Baptist's reputation than for simple and natural interpretation, take it? Obviously not. The whole strain of our Lord's reply shows that it was designed for John himself. Clearly it was a message of impatience, and almost of desperation. It seemed, no doubt, hard to him that his Master should let him lie so long in prison for his fidelity—useless to his Master's cause and a comparative stranger to His proceedings—after having been honored to announce and introduce Him to His work and

11. Nain. A small city of Galilee, in the tribe of Issachar. According to Eusebius, it was two miles from Mount Tabor, southward; and near to Endor.

12. Carried out. The Jews always buried their dead without the city, except those of the family of David.

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

It was a remarkable incident, this meeting of the two processions at the gates of Nain. If someone with a fine imagination could picture it, what an opportunity he would have for developing his poetical genius! I venture on no such effort. Yonder a procession descends from the city. Our spiritual eyes see death upon the pale horse coming forth from the city gate with great exultation. He has taken another captive. Upon that bier behold the spoils of the dread conqueror! Mourners by their tears confess the victory of death. Like a general riding in triumph to the Roman capital, death bears his spoils to the tomb. What shall hinder him?

Suddenly the procession is arrested by another: a company of disciples and much people are coming up the hill. We need not look at the company, but we may fix our eyes upon One who stands in the center, a Man in whom lowliness was always evident, and yet majesty was never wanting. It is the living Lord, even He who only hath immortality, and in Him death has now met his destroyer. The battle is short and decisive; no blows are struck, for death has already done his utmost. With a finger the chariot of death is arrested; with a word the spoil is taken from the mighty, and the lawful captive is delivered. Death flies defeated from the gates of the city, while Tabor and Hermon, which both looked down upon the scene, rejoice in the name of the Lord. This was a rehearsal upon a small scale of that which shall happen by and by, when those who are in their graves shall hear the voice of the Son of God and live: "then shall the last enemy be destroyed." Only let death come into contact with Him who is our life, and it is compelled to relax its hold, whatever may be the spoil which it has captured. Soon shall our Lord come in His glory, and then before the gates of the New Jerusalem we shall see the miracle at the gates of Nain multiplied a myriad times.

18. The disciples of John shewed him. It is very likely that John's disciples attended the ministry of our Lord at particular times.

19. Art thou he that should come? Are you the promised Messiah? See on Matt. xi. 3. Some have thought that this character of our Lord, "he who cometh," refers to the prophecy many of their infirmities and plagues in body, and of evil spirits, and unto many that were blind he gave sight. He multiplied the cures, that there might be no ground left to suspect a fraud; and then (v. 22) he bade them go and tell John what they had seen. And he and they might easily argue, as even the common people did (John vii. 31), When Christ cometh, will he do more miracles than these which this man hath done? You see that Jesus does this to the bodies of people, and therefore must conclude this is he that should come to do it to the souls of people, and you are to look for no other. To his miracles in the kingdom of nature he adds this in the kingdom of grace (v. 22), To the poor the gospel is preached, which they knew was to be done by the Messiah. Judge, therefore, whether you can look for any other that will more fully answer the characters of the Messiah. He gave them an intimation of the danger people were in of being prejudiced against him (v. 23): Blessed is he whosoever shall not be offended in me, or scandalized at me. Christ's education at Nazareth, his residence at Galilee, the meanness of his family and relations, his poverty, and the despicableness of his followers—these and the like were stumbling-blocks to many. He is blessed, for he is wise, humble, and well disposed, that is not overcome by these prejudices. It is a sign that God has blessed him, and he shall be blessed indeed, blessed in Christ.

II. We have here the high encomium which Christ gave of John Baptist; when they were departed (v. 24). Let them now consider what they went out into the wilderness to see. "Come," saith Christ, "I will tell you."

1. He was a man of steadiness and constancy. He was not a reed shaken with the wind; he was firm as a rock, not fickle as a reed.

2. He was a man of unparalleled self-denial. He was not a man clothed in soft raiment, nor did he live delicately (v. 25); but, on the contrary, he lived in a wilderness and was clad and fed accordingly.

3. He was a prophet. Nay, he was more, he was much more than a prophet (v. 26), than any of the prophets of the Old Testament; for they spoke of Christ as at a distance, he spoke of him as at the door.

4. He was the harbinger and forerunner of the Messiah, and was himself prophesied of in the Old Testament (v. 27): This is he of whom it is written (Mal. iii. 1), Behold, I send my messenger before thy face. Before he sent the Master himself, he sent a messenger, to give notice of his coming. It was a previous indication, plain enough, of the spiritual nature of Christ's kingdom, that the messenger he sent before him to prepare his way did it by preaching repentance and reformation. Certainly that kingdom was not of this world which was thus ushered in.

5. He was so great that really there was not a greater prophet than he. Prophets were the greatest that were born of women, and John was the greatest of all the prophets. And yet he that is least in the kingdom of God is greater than he. The meanest of those that follow the Lamb far excel the greatest of those that went before him. Those therefore who live under the gospel dispensation have so much the more to answer for.

III. We have here the just censure of the men of that generation.

1. Christ here shows what contempt was put upon John Baptist, while he was preaching and baptizing. Those who did show him any respect were but the common ordinary sort of people, v. 29. The people indeed, the vulgar herd, of whom it was said, This people, who know not the law, are cursed (John vii. 49), and the publicans, these were baptized with his baptism, and became his disciples. By their repentance and reformation they justified God in appointing such a one as John Baptist to be the forerunner of the Messiah: they hereby made it to appear that it was the best method that could be taken, for it was not in vain to them, whatever it was to others. The great men of their church and nation heard him indeed, but they were not baptized of him, v. 30. The Pharisees and the lawyers rejected the counsel of God against themselves; if they had closed with the counsel of God, it had been for themselves; but they rejected it, and it was against themselves, it was to their own ruin.

2. He here shows the strange perverseness of the men of that generation, and the prejudices they conceived. They made but a jesting matter of the methods God took to do them good (v. 31): "Whereunto shall I liken the men of this generation? They are, then, like children sitting in the market-place, that mind nothing that is serious, but are as full of play as they can hold. As if God were but in jest with them, as children are with one another in the

to the people. And since the wonders of His hand seemed only to increase in glory as He advanced, and it could not but be easy for Him who preached deliverance to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that were bound, to put it into the heart of Herod to set him at liberty, or to effect his liberation in spite of him, he at length determines to see if, through a message from the prison by his disciples, he cannot get Him to speak out His mind, and at least set his own at rest. This, we take it, was the real object of his message. The message itself, indeed, was far from a proper one. It was peevish; it was presumptuous; it was all but desperate. He had gotten depressed; he was losing heart; his spirit was clouded; heaven's sweet light had, to some extent, departed from him; and this message was the consequence. As it was announced that he should come in the spirit and power of Elijah, so we find him treading in that prophet's steps rather more than was desirable (1 Kings 14:1-4).

24. And when the messengers of John were departed, he began to speak unto the people concerning John. What went ye out into the wilderness for to see? A reed shaken with the wind?—"a man driven about by every gust of popular opinion, and uttering an uncertain sound? Such is not John." 25. But what went ye out for to see? A man clothed in soft raiment?—"a self-indulgent courtly preacher? Such was not John." Behold, they which are gorgeously apparelled, and live delicately, are in kings' courts. "If that be the man ye wanted, ye must go in quest of him to royal palaces." 26. But what went ye out for to see? A prophet?—"a faithful straightforward utterer of the testimony given him to bear?" Yea, I say unto you, and much more than a prophet. "If that was what ye flocked to the wilderness to see in John, then ye have not been disappointed; for he is that, and much more than that." 27. This is he of whom it is written (Mal. 3:1), Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, which shall prepare thy way before thee. (See Mark 1:3; Luke 1:17.) "There were many prophets, but only one Forerunner of the Lord's Christ; and this is he." 28. For I say unto you, Among those that are born of women there is not—"there hath not risen" (Matt. 11:11) a greater prophet than John the Baptist: but he that is least in the kingdom of God is greater than he. The point of comparison is manifestly not personal character; for as it could hardly be said that in this respect he excelled every human being that preceded him, so it would be absurd to say that he was outstripped by the least advanced of the disciples of Christ. It is of his official standing or position in the economy of grace that our Lord is speaking. In that respect he was above all that ever went before him, inasmuch as he was the last and most honored of the Old Testament prophets, and stood on the very edge of the new economy, though belonging to the old: but for this very reason, the humblest member of the new economy was in advance of him.

29, 30. And all the people that heard—"on hearing (this)." These are the observations of the Evangelist, not of our Lord. and the publicans—a striking clause. justified God, being baptized . . .—rather, "having been baptized." The meaning is, They acknowledged the divine wisdom of such a preparatory ministry as John's, in leading them to Him who now spake to them (see ch. 1:16, 17); whereas the Pharisees and lawyers, true to themselves in refusing the baptism of John, set at naught also the merciful design of God in the Saviour Himself, to their own destruction.

of Jacob, Gen. xlix. 10, where He is called Shiloh, which Grotius and others derive from shalach, "he sent." Hence, as the time of the fulfillment of the prophecy drew nigh, He was termed, "He who cometh," i.e., He who is just now ready to make His appearance in Judea. In Zech. ix. 9, a similar phrase is used, "Behold, thy King cometh unto thee . . . having salvation." This is meant of the Messiah only; therefore I think the words "to save" are necessarily implied.

21. Unto many that were blind he gave sight. Rather, "He kindly gave sight"; or, "He graciously gave sight." This is the proper meaning of the original words. In all His miracles, Jesus showed the tenderest mercy and kindness; not only the cure, but the manner in which He performed it, endeared Him to those who were objects of His compassionate regards.

22-28. See these verses explained at large on Matt. xi. 4-15.

A prophet? yea . . . and more than a prophet. That is, one more excellent than a prophet; one greatly beyond all who had come before him, being the immediate forerunner of Christ, and who was especially commissioned to prepare the way of the Lord. This was a fourth excellency.

Behold, I send my messenger. A fifth excellency of the Baptist was his preparing the way of the Lord, being the instrument, in God's hand, of preparing the people's hearts to receive the Lord Jesus; and it was probably through his preaching that so many thousands attached themselves to Christ immediately on His appearing as a public Teacher.

A greater than John the Baptist. A sixth excellency of the Baptist—he was greater than any prophet from the beginning of the world till that time: (1) Because he was prophesied of by them, Isa. xl. 3; Mal. iii. 1. (2) Because he had the privilege of showing the fulfilment of their predictions, by pointing out that Christ has now come, which they foretold should come. (3) Because he saw and enjoyed that salvation which they could only foretell. Nothwithstanding he that is least in the kingdom of heaven. By the kingdom of Heaven in this verse is meant the fullness of the blessings of the gospel of peace, which fullness was not known till after Christ had been crucified, and had risen from the dead. Now the least in this Kingdom, the meanest preacher of a crucified, risen, and glorified Saviour, was greater than John, who was not permitted to live to see the plenitude of gospel grace in the pouring out of the Holy Spirit.

29. Justified God. Or "declared God to be just." The sense is this: John preached that the divine wrath was coming upon the Jews, from which they might flee by repentance, chap. iii. 7. The Jews, therefore, who were baptized by Him, with the baptism of repentance, did thereby acknowledge that it is but justice in God to punish them for their wickedness unless they repented, and were baptized in token of it. This is the sense in which the word is used here and in Ps. li. 4, compared with Job xxxii. 2, and by this Evangelist again in chap. x. 29 and xvi. 15.

30. Rejected the counsel of God. Or "frustrated the will of God." Kypke says the verb has two meanings: (1) to "disbelieve"; (2) "despise, or disobey," and that both senses may be properly conjoined here. The will of God was that all the inhabitants of Judea should repent at the preaching of John, be baptized, and believe in Christ Jesus. Now as they did not repent at John's preaching, so they did not believe his testimony concerning Christ. Thus the will, gracious counsel, or design of God relative to their salvation was annulled or frustrated. They disbelieved His promises, despised the Messiah, and disobeyed His precepts.

MATTHEW HENRY

market-place (v. 32), they turn it all off with a banter." This is the ruin of multitudes, they can never persuade themselves to be serious in the concerns of their souls. O the amazing stupidity and vanity of the blind and ungodly world! The Lord awaken them out of their security. They still found something or other to carp at. John Baptist was a reserved austere man, lived much in solitude, and ought to have been hearkened to as a man of thought and contemplation; but this, which was his praise, was turned to his reproach. Because he came neither eating nor drinking you say, "He has a devil: he is a melancholy man, he is possessed." Our Lord Jesus was of a more free and open conversation; he came eating and drinking, v. 34. He would go and dine with Pharisees, and with publicans. In hopes of doing good both to the one and the other, he conversed familiarly with them. By this it appears that the ministers of Christ may be of very different tempers and dispositions, very different ways of preaching and living, and yet all good and useful. Therefore none must make themselves a standard to all others, nor judge hardly of those that do not do just as they do. John Baptist bore witness to Christ, and Christ applauded John Baptist, though they were the reverse of each other in their way of living. But the common enemies of them both reproached them both. The very same men that had represented John as crazed in his intellects, represented our Lord Jesus as corrupt in his morals; he is a gluttonous man, and a wine-bibber. Ill-will never speaks well.

3. He shows that, notwithstanding this, God will be glorified in the salvation of a chosen remnant (v. 35): Wisdom is justified of all her children. Wisdom's children are herein unanimous, one and all, they have all a complacency in the methods of grace which divine wisdom takes, and think never the worse of them for their being ridiculed by some.

When and where this passage of story happened does not appear, but it comes in here, upon occasion of Christ's being reproached as a friend to publicans and sinners. Who this woman was that here testified so great an affection to Christ does not appear.

I. The civil entertainment which a Pharisee gave to Christ (v. 36): One of the Pharisees desired him that he would eat with him. It appears that this Pharisee did not believe in Christ, for he will not own him to be a prophet (v. 39), and yet our Lord Jesus accepted his invitation, went into his house, and sat down to meat. And those may venture further into the society of such as are prejudiced against Christ, who have wisdom and grace sufficient to instruct and argue with them, than others may.

II. The great respect which a poor penitent sinner showed him. It was a woman in the city that was a sinner, a harlot, and infamous. She knew that Jesus sat at meat in the Pharisee's house, and she came to acknowledge her obligations to him, having no opportunity of doing it in any other way than by washing his feet, and anointing them with some sweet ointment that she brought with her for that purpose. Now this woman did not look Christ in the face, but came behind him, and did the part of a maid-servant.

Now in what this good woman did, we may observe,

1. Her deep humiliation for sin. She stood behind him weeping; her eyes had been the inlets and outlets of sin, and now she makes them fountains of tears. Her face is now foul with weeping, which perhaps used to be covered with paints. Her hair now made a towel of, which before had been plaited and adorned. We have reason to think that she had before sorrowed for sin; but now that she had an opportunity of coming into the presence of Christ, her sorrow was renewed.

2. Her strong affection to the Lord Jesus. This was what our Lord Jesus took special notice of, that she loved much, v. 42, 47. She washed his feet, she washed them with her tears, tears of joy; she was in a transport, to find herself so near her Saviour, whom her soul loved. She kissed his feet. It was a kiss of adoration as well as affection. She wiped them with her hair. Her eyes shall yield water to wash them, and her hair be a towel to wipe them; and she anointed his feet with the ointment. All true penitents have a dear love to the Lord Jesus.

III. The offence which the Pharisee took at Christ, for admitting the respect which this poor penitent paid him (v. 39): He said within himself, This man, if he were a prophet, would then have so much knowledge as to perceive that this woman is a sinner, and so much sanctity as therefore not to suffer her to come so near him. See how apt proud and narrow souls are to think that others should be as haughty their playmates to join them in their amusements, will play with them neither at weddings nor funerals (juvenile imitations of the joyous and mournful scenes of life), so that generation rejected both John and his Master: the one because he was too unsocial—more like a demoniac than a rational man; the other, because He was too much the reverse, given to animal indulgences, and consorting with the lowest classes of society. But the children of Wisdom recognize and honor her, whether in the austere garb of the Baptist or in the more attractive style of his Master, whether in the Law or in the Gospel, whether in rags or in royalty, for "the full soul loatheth an honeycomb, but to the hungry soul every bitter thing is sweet" (Prov. 27:7).

36-50. CHRIST'S FEET WASHED WITH TEARS. 37, 38. a sinner—one who had led a profligate life. N.B.—There is no ground whatever for the popular notion that this woman was Mary Magdalene, nor do we know what her name was. (See on ch. 8:2.)

an alabaster box of ointment—a perfume-vessel, in some cases very costly (John 12:5). "The ointment has here a peculiar interest, as the offering by a penitent of what had been an accessory in her unhallowed work of sin" [ALFORD]. 38. at his feet behind him—the posture at meals being a reclining one, with the feet out behind. began to wash . . .—to "water with a shower." The tears, which were quite involuntary, poured down in a flood upon His naked feet, as she bent down to kiss them; and deeming them rather fouled than washed by this, she hastened to wipe them off with the only towel she had, the long tresses of her own hair, "with which slaves were wont to wash their masters' feet" [STIER]. kissed—The word signifies "to kiss fondly, to caress," or to "kiss again and again," which vs. 45 shows is meant here. What prompted this? Much love, springing from a sense of much forgiveness. So says He who knew her heart (vs. 47). Where she had met with Christ before, or what words of His had brought life to her dead heart and a sense of divine pardon to her guilty soul, we know not. But probably she was of the crowd of "publicans and sinners" whom Incarnate Compassion drew so often around Him, and heard from His lips some of those words such as never man spake, "Come unto Me, all ye that labour . . . . No personal interview had up to this time taken place between them; but she could keep her feelings no longer to herself, and having found her way to Him (and entered along with him, vs. 45), they burst forth in this surpassing yet most artless style, as if her whole soul would go out to Him. 39. the Pharisee—who had formed no definite opinion of our Lord, and invited Him apparently to obtain materials for a judgment. spake within himself . . .—"Ha! I have Him now; He plainly knows nothing of the person He allows to touch Him; and so, He can be no prophet." Not so fast, Simon; thou hast not seen through thy Guest yet, but He hath seen through thee.

ADAM CLARKE

authority and importance, with most of the versions, omits these words. As the Evangelistaria (the books which contained those portions of the Gospels which were read in the churches) began at this verse, the words were probably at first used by them to introduce the following parable. There is the fullest proof that they never made a part of Luke's text.

32. They are like unto children. See on Matt. xi. 16-19. It is probable that our Lord alludes here to some play or game among the Jewish children, no account of which is now on record.

For John came neither eating nor drinking. Leading a very austere and mortified life, and yet you did not receive him. He hath a devil. He is a vile hypocrite, influenced by a demon to deceive and destroy the simple.

The Son of man came eating and drinking. That is, went wheresoever He was invited to eat a morsel of bread, and observed no rigid fasts. They say, Behold a man gluttonous. Whatever measures the followers of God may take, they will not escape the censure of the world; the best way is not to be concerned at them.

35. Wisdom is justified. Probably the children of wisdom is a mere Hebraism here for the "products or fruits of wisdom"; hence the Vatican MS., one other, and some versions have "works," instead of "sons," in the parallel place, Matt. xi. 19.

36. One of the Pharisees. Called Simon, v. 40. This account is considered by many critics and commentators to be the same with that in Matt. xxvi. 6, etc.; Mark xiv. 3; and John xii. 3. This subject is considered pretty much at large in the notes on Matt. xxvi. 6, etc., to which the reader is requested to refer.

37. A woman . . . which was a sinner. Many suppose that this woman had been a notorious public prostitute. My own opinion is that she had been a mere heathen who dwelt in this city (probably Capernaum) who, through the ministry of Christ, had been before this converted to God, and came now to give this public testimony of her gratitude to her gracious Deliverer from the darkness and guilt of sin. I am inclined to think that the original word is used for "heathen" or "Gentile" in several places of the sacred writings. I am fully persuaded that this is its meaning in Matt. ix. 10-11, 13; xi. 19; and xxvi. 45—The Son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinners, i.e., is delivered into the hands of the "heathens," viz., the Romans, who alone could put Him to death. I think also it has this meaning in Luke vi. 32-34; xv. 1-2, 7, 10; xix. 7; John ix. 31. I think no other sense can be justly assigned to it in Gal. ii. 15: "We who are Jews by nature, and not sinners of the Gentiles." It is, I think, likely that the grand subject of the self-righteous Pharisee's complaint was her being a "heathen." As those who were touched by such contracted a legal defilment, he could not believe that Christ was a conscientious Observer of the law, seeing He permitted her to touch Him, knowing who she was; or, if He did not know that she was a heathen, it was a proof that He was no prophet, v. 39, and consequently had not the discernment of spirits which prophets were supposed to possess. Many suppose this person to be the same as Mary Magdalene, but of this there is no solid proof.

38. Stood at his feet behind him. In taking their meals the Eastern people reclined on one side; the loins and knees being bent to make the more room, the feet of each person were turned outwards behind him. This is the meaning of standing behind at His feet. Began to wash his feet with tears. She began to water His feet—to and censorious as themselves.

IV. Christ's justification of the woman in what she did to him, and of himself in admitting it. Christ knew what the Pharisee spoke within himself, and made answer to it: Simon, I have something to say unto thee, v. 40. Simon is willing to give him the hearing: He saith, Master, say on. Now Christ, in his answer to the Pharisee, reasons thus:—It is true this woman has been a sinner: he knows it; but she is a pardoned sinner, which supposes her to be a penitent sinner. What she did to him was an expression of her great love to her Saviour. If she was pardoned, who had been so great a sinner, it might reasonably be expected that she should love her Saviour more than others, and if this was the fruit of her love, and flowing from a sense of the pardon of her sins, it became him to accept of it, and it ill became the Pharisee to be offended at it.

1. He by a parable forces Simon to acknowledge that the greater sinner this woman had been the greater love she ought to show to Jesus Christ when her sins were pardoned, v. 41–43. A man had two debtors that were both insolvent, but one of them owed him ten times more than the other. He very freely forgave them both, and did not take the advantage of the law against them. Now they were both sensible of the great kindness they had received; but which of them will love him most? Certainly, saith the Pharisee, he to whom he forgave most. Hence learn the duty between debtor and creditor.

(1) The debtor, if he have anything to pay, ought to make satisfaction to his creditor.

(2) If God in his providence have disabled the debtor to pay his debt, the creditor ought not to be severe with him, but freely to forgive him.

(3) The debtor that has found his creditors merciful ought to be very grateful to them; and ought to love them. Some insolvent debtors, instead of being grateful, are spiteful, to their creditors that lose by them, and cannot give them a good word. But this parable speaks of God (or rather of the Lord Jesus himself, for he it is that forgives) and sinners are the debtors: and so we may learn here, [1] That sin is a debt, and sinners are debtors to God Almighty. As creatures, we owe a debt, a debt of obedience. We have not paid our rent; nay, we have wasted our Lord's goods, and so we become debtors. [2] That some are deeper in debt to God, by reason of sin, than others are: One owed five hundred pence and the other fifty. The Pharisee was the less debtor, yet he a debtor too, which was more than he thought himself. This woman was the greater debtor. Some sinners are in themselves greater debtors than others. [3] That, whether our debt be more or less, it is more than we are able to pay: They had nothing to pay, nothing at all to make a composition with. No righteousness of our own will pay it, no, not our repentance and obedience for the future; for it is what we are already bound to. [4] That the God of heaven is ready to forgive, frankly to forgive, poor sinners. If we repent, and believe in Christ, our iniquity shall not be laid to our charge. God has proclaimed his name gracious and merciful, and ready to forgive sin. [5] That those who have their sins pardoned are obliged to love him that pardoned them; and the more is forgiven them, the more they should love him. The greater sinners any have been before their conversion, the greater saints they should be after. When a persecuting Saul became a preaching Paul he laboured more abundantly.

2. He applies this parable to the different temper and conduct of the Pharisee and the sinner. Christ seems ready to allow that he was one forgiven, though to him less was forgiven. He did indeed show some love to Christ, but nothing to what this poor woman showed. "Observe," saith Christ to him, "she is one that has much forgiven her, and therefore, she should love much more than thou dost, and so it appears. Seest thou this woman? (v. 44). Consider how much kinder a friend she is to me than thou art; should I then accept thy kindness, and refuse hers? Thou didst not so much as order a basin of water to be brought, to wash my feet in, but she has done much more: she has washed my feet with tears, and has wiped them with the hairs of her head, in token of her great love to me. Thou didst not so much as kiss my cheek, but this woman has not ceased to kiss my feet (v. 45). Thou didst not provide me a little common oil, as usual, to anoint my head with; but she has bestowed a box of precious ointment upon my feet (v. 46)." The reason why some people blame the pains and expense of zealous Christians, in religion, is because they are not willing themselves to come up to it, but resolve to rest in a cheap and easy religion.

3. He silenced the Pharisee's cavil: I say unto thee, Simon, her sins, which are many, are forgiven, v. 47. He owns that she had been guilty of many sins:

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

40-43. Like Nathan with David, our Lord conceals His home-thrust under the veil of a parable, and makes His host himself pronounce upon the case. The two debtors are the woman and Simon; the criminality of the one was ten times that of the other (in the proportion of "500" to "50"); but both being equally insolvent, both are with equal frankness forgiven; and Simon is made to own that the greatest debtor to forgiving mercy will cling to her Divine Benefactor with the deepest gratitude. Does our Lord then admit that Simon was a forgiving man? Let us see.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

When you begin to talk about the guilt of actions in God's sight, you have to go far below the mere surface. If we could see the infinite complexity of motives—aggravations on the one side and excuses on the other—which go to the doing of a single deed, we should not be so quick to pronounce that the publican and the harlot are worse than the Pharisee. It is quite possible that an action which passes muster in regard to the morality of the world may, if regard be had (which God only can exercise) to the motive for which it is done, be as bad as, if not worse than, the lust and the animalism, drunkenness and debauchery, crime and murder, which the vulgar scales of the world consider to be the heavier. If you once begin to try to measure guilt, you will have to pass under the surface appearance, and will find that many a white and dazzling act has a very rotten inside, and that many a very corrupt and foul one does not come from so corrupt a source as at first sight might seem to be its origin. Let us be very modest in our estimate of the varying guilt of actions, and remember that, deep down below all diversities, there lies a fundamental identity in which there is no difference, that all of us respectable people that never broke a law of the nation, and scarcely ever a law of propriety, in our lives, and the outcasts, if there are any here now, the drunkards, the sensualists, all of us stand in this respect in the same class. We are all debtors, for we have "all sinned and come short of the glory of God." A viper an inch long and the thickness of whipcord has a sting and poison in it, and is a viper. And if the question is whether a man has got smallpox or not, one spot is as good evidence as if he was spotted all over. So, remember, he who owes five hundred and he who owes the tenth part of it, which is fifty, are both debtors.

—Expositions of Holy Scripture

44-47. I entered . . . no water—a compliment to guests. Was this "much love?" Was it any? 45. no kiss—of salutation. How much love was here? Any at all? 46. with oil . . . not anoint—even common olive oil in contrast with the woman's "ointment" or aromatic balsam. What evidence was thus afforded of any feeling which forgiveness prompts? Our Lord speaks this with delicate politeness, as if hurt at these inattentions of His host, which though not invariably shown to guests, were the customary marks of studied respect and regard. The inference is plain—only one of the debtors was really forgiven, though in the first instance, to give room for the play of withheld feelings, the forgiveness of both is supposed in the parable. 47. Her sins which are many—"Those many sins of hers," our Lord, who admitted how much more she owed than the Pharisee, now proclaims in naked terms the forgiveness of her guilt. for—not because, as if love were the cause of forgiveness, but "inasmuch as," or "in proof of which." The latter clause of the verse, and the whole structure of the parable, plainly show this to be the meaning. little forgiven . . . loveth little—delicately ironical intimation of no love and no forgiveness in the present case. 48. said unto her . . .—an unsought assurance, usually springing up unexpected in the midst of active duty and warm affections, while let a shower of tears fall on them. As the Jews wore nothing like our shoes (theirs being a mere sole, bound about the foot and ankle with thongs), their feet being so much exposed had frequent need of washing, and this they ordinarily did before taking their meals. Kissed his feet. With affectionate tenderness, or "kissed them again and again." See on Matt. xxvi. 49. The kiss was used in ancient times as the emblem of love, religious reverence, subjection, and supplication. It has the meaning of supplication, in the way of adoration, accompanied with subjection. See 1 Kings xix. 18, "Every mouth which hath not kissed him [Baal]"; and Job xxxi. 27, "My mouth hath [not] kissed my hand"—I have paid no sort of adoration to false gods; and Ps. ii. 12, "Kiss the Son, lest he be angry"—close in with Him, embrace affectionately, the offers of mercy made unto you through Christ Jesus, "lest he [the Lord] be angry [with you], and ye perish"—which commandment this woman seems to have obeyed, in both the literal and the spiritual sense. Kissing the feet was practiced also among the heathens to express subjection of spirit and earnest supplication. Kissing the feet is a further proof that this person had been educated a heathen. This was no part of a Jew's practice.

41. A certain creditor. It is plain that in this parable our Lord means, by the creditor, God; and, by the two debtors, Simon and the woman who was present. Simon, who had the light of the law, and who in consequence of his profession as a Pharisee was obliged to abstain from outward iniquity, might be considered as the debtor who owed only fifty pence, or denarii. The woman, whom I have supposed to be a heathen, not having these advantages, having no rule to regulate her actions, and no curb on her evil propensities, may be considered as the debtor who owed five hundred pence, or denarii. And when both were compared, Simon's debt to God might be considered, in reference to hers, as fifty to five hundred. However we find, notwithstanding this great disparity, both were insolvent. Simon, the religious Pharisee, could no more pay his fifty to God than this poor heathen her five hundred; and if both be not freely forgiven by the divine mercy, both must finally perish. Having nothing to pay, he kindly forgave them both.

42. Which of them will love him most? Which is under the greater obligation and should love him most?

43. He to whom he forgave most. By this acknowledgment he was, unknowingly to himself, prepared to receive our Lord's reproof.

44. Thou gavest me no water. In this respect Simon was sadly deficient in civil respect, whether this proceeded from forgetfulness or contempt. The custom of giving water to wash the guest's feet was very ancient. See instances in Gen. xviii. 4; xxiv. 32; Judg. xix. 21; 1 Sam. xxv. 41.

46. My head with oil thou didst not anoint. Anointing the head with oil was as common among the Jews as washing the face with water is among us. See Ruth iii. 3; 2 Sam. xii. 20; xiv. 2; 2 Kings iv. 2; and Ps. xxiii. 5, where the author alludes to the Jewish manner of receiving and entertaining a guest.

47. For she loved much. Or, "Therefore she loved much." It appears to have been a consciousness of God's forgiving love that brought her at this time to the Pharisee's house. In the common translation her forgiveness is represented to be the consequence of her loving much, which is causing the tree to produce the root, and not the root the tree. I have considered hoti here as having the sense of dioti, "there-

"But they are forgiven her, for she loved much." It should be rendered, therefore she loved much; for it is plain that her loving much was not the cause, but the effect, of her pardon. We love God because he first loved us; he did not forgive us because we first loved him. "But to whom little is forgiven, as is to thee, the same loveth little, as thou dost." Instead of grudging greater sinners the mercy they find with Christ we should be stirred up by their example to examine ourselves whether we be indeed forgiven, and do love Christ.

4. He silenced her fears. Christ said unto her, Thy sins are forgiven, v. 48. She was dismissed with this word from Christ, Thy sins are forgiven! and what an effectual prevention would this be of her return to sin again! Though there were those present who quarrelled with Christ, in their own minds, for presuming to forgive sin, and to pronounce sinners absolved (v. 49), yet he stood to what he had said. He would now show that he had pleasure in forgiving sin; he loves to speak pardon and peace to penitents: He said to the woman, Thy faith hath saved thee, v. 50. All these expressions of sorrow for sin, and love to Christ, were the effects and products of faith. As faith of all graces doth most honour God, so Christ doth of all graces put most honour upon faith.

I. What Christ made the constant business of his life—it was preaching; in that work he was indefatigable, and went about doing good (v. 1). 1. Where he preached: He went about. He was an itinerant preacher, did not confine himself to one place, but diffused the beams of his light. He went about through every city, that none might plead ignorance. Hereby he set an example to his disciples; they must traverse the nations of the earth, as he did the cities of Israel. Nor did he confine himself to the cities, but went into the villages, among the plain country-people. 2. What he preached: He showed the glad tidings of the kingdom of God. Tidings of the kingdom of God are glad tidings, and those Jesus Christ came to bring. It was glad tidings to the world that there was hope of its being reformed and reconciled. 3. Who were his attendants: The twelve were with him to learn from him what and how to preach hereafter.

II. Whence he had the necessary supports of life: He lived upon the kindness of his friends. There were certain women that ministered to him of their substance, v. 2, 3. Some of them are named; but there were many others.

1. They were such, for the most part, as were the monuments of his power and mercy; they had been healed by him of evil spirits and infirmities. We are bound in interest to attend him, that we may be ready to apply ourselves to him for help in case of a relapse; and we are bound in gratitude to serve him and his gospel, who hath saved us, and saved us by it.

2. One of them was Mary Magdalene, out of whom had been cast seven devils. Some think that she was one that had been very wicked, and then we may suppose her to be the woman that was a sinner mentioned just before, ch. vii. 37. Upon her repentance and reformation she found mercy, and became a zealous disciple of Christ. The worse any have been before their conversion the more they should study to do for Christ after. This Mary Magdalene was attending on Christ's cross and his sepulchre.

3. Another of them was Joanna the wife of Chuza, Herod's steward. Her husband, though preferred in Herod's court, had received the gospel, and was very willing that his wife should be both a hearer of Christ and a contributor to him.

4. There were many of them that ministered to Christ of their substance. Though he was rich, yet for our sakes he became poor, and lived upon alms. Christ would rather be beholden to his known friends for a maintenance for himself and his disciples than be burdensome to strangers. It is the duty of those who are taught in the word to communicate to them who teach them in all good things.

Verses 4–21

The former paragraph began with an account of Christ's industry in preaching (v. 1); this begins with an account of the people's industry in hearing, v. 4. He went into every city, to preach; but there were those here that came to him out of every city, would not stay till he came to them, nor think that they had enough when he left them, but met him when he was coming towards them, and followed him when he was going from them.

Much people were gathered together, abundance of often it flies from those who mope and are paralyzed for want of it. 49, 50. they that sat . . . Who is this . . . ?—No wonder they were startled to hear One who was reclining at the same couch, and partaking of the same hospitalities with themselves, assume the awful prerogative of "even forgiving sins." But so far from receding from this claim, or softening it down, our Lord only repeats it, with two precious additions: one, announcing what was the one secret of the "forgiveness" she had experienced, and which carried "salvation" in its bosom; the other, a glorious dismissal of her in that "peace" which she had already felt, but is now assured she has His full warrant to enjoy! This wonderful scene teaches two very weighty truths: (1) Though there be degrees of guilt, insolvency, or inability to wipe out the dishonor done to God, is common to all sinners. (2) As Christ is the Great Creditor to whom all debt, whether great or small, contracted by sinners is owing, so to Him belongs the prerogative of forgiving it. This latter truth is brought out in the structure and application of the present parable as it is nowhere else. Either then Jesus was a blaspheming deceiver, or He is God manifest in the flesh.

CHAPTER 8

Vss. 1-3. A GALILEAN CIRCUIT, WITH THE TWELVE AND CERTAIN MINISTERING WOMEN. (In Luke only.) went—travelled, made a progress. throughout every city and village—through town and village. preaching . . .—the Prince of itinerant preachers scattering far and wide the seed of the Kingdom. 2. certain women . . . healed . . .—on whom He had the double claim of having brought healing to their bodies and new life to their souls. Drawn to Him by an attraction more than magnetic, they accompany Him on this tour as His almoners—ministering unto Him of their substance. Blessed Saviour! It melts us to see Thee living upon the love of Thy ransomed people. That they bring Thee their poor offerings we wonder not. Thou hast sown unto them spiritual things, and they think it, as well they might, a small thing that Thou shouldst reap their material things (I Cor. 9: 11). But dost Thou take it at their hand, and subsist upon it? "Oh, the depth of the riches"—of this poverty of His! Mary Magdalene—i.e., probably, of Magdala (on which see Matt. 15:39). went—rather "had gone." seven devils—(Mark 16:9). It is a great wrong to this honored woman to identify her with the once profligate woman of ch. 7:37, and to call all such penitents Magdalenes. The mistake has arisen from confounding unhappy demoniacal possession with the conscious entertainment of diabolic impurity, or supposing the one to have been afflicted as a punishment for the other—for which there is not the least scriptural ground. 3. Joanna, wife of Chuza, Herod's steward—If the steward of such a godless, cruel, and licentious wretch as Herod Antipas (see on Mark 6:14, etc.) differed greatly from himself, his post would be no easy or enviable one. That he was a disciple of Christ is very improbable, though he might be favorably disposed towards Him. But what we know not of him, and may fear he lacked, we are sure his wife possessed. Healed either of "evil spirits" or of some one of the "infirmities" here referred to—the ordinary diseases of humanity—she joins in the Saviour's train of grateful, clinging followers. Of "Susanna," next mentioned, we know nothing but the name, and that here only. But her services on this memorable occasion have immortalized her name. "Wheresoever this gospel shall be preached throughout the whole world, this also that she hath done," in ministering to the Lord of her substance on His Galilean tour, "shall be spoken of as a memorial of her" (Mark 14:9). many others—i.e., many other healed women. What a train! and all ministering unto Him of their substance, and He allowing them to do it and subsisting upon it! "He who was the support of the spiritual life of His people disdained not to be supported by them in the body. He was not ashamed to penetrate so far into the depths of poverty as to live upon the alms of love. He only fed others miraculously; for Himself, He lived upon the love of His people. He gave all things to men, His brethren, and received all things from them, enjoying thereby the pure blessing of love: which is then only perfect when it is at the same time both giving and receiving. Who could invent such things as these? "It was necessary to live in this fore"; because, to make this sentence suit with the foregoing parable, vv. 42-43, and with what immediately follows here, but to whom little is forgiven, the same loveth little, we must suppose her love was the effect of her being pardoned, not the cause of it. Hoti seems to have the sense of "therefore" in Matt. xiii. 13; John viii. 44; 1 Cor. x. 17; and in the Septuagint, in Deut. xxxiii. 52; Isa. xlix. 19; Hos. ix. 15; and Eccles. v. 6. Both these particles are often interchanged in the New Testament.

48. Thy sins are forgiven. He gave her the fullest assurance of what He had said before to Simon (v. 47). While the Pharisee murmured, the poor penitent rejoiced.

50. Thy faith hath saved thee. Thy faith hath been the instrument of receiving the salvation which is promised to those who repent. Go in peace. Though peace of conscience be the inseparable consequence of the pardon of sin, yet here it seems to be used as a valediction or farewell; as if He had said, May goodness and mercy continue to follow you! In this sense it is certainly used in Judg. xviii. 6; 1 Sam. i. 17; xx. 42; xxix. 7; 2 Sam. xv. 9; Jas. ii. 16.

CHAPTER 8

1. Throughout every city and village. That is, of Galilee.

2. Out of whom went seven devils. Who had been possessed in a most extraordinary manner; probably a case of inveterate lunacy, brought on by the influence of evil spirits. The number seven may here express the superlative degree. Mary Magdalene is commonly thought to have been a prostitute before she came to the knowledge of Christ, and then to have been a remarkable penitent. So historians and painters represent her: but neither from this passage nor from any other of the New Testament can such a supposition be legitimately drawn. I conclude, therefore, that the common opinion is a vile slander on the character of one of the best women mentioned in the gospel of God, and a reproach cast on the character and conduct of Christ and His disciples. From the whole account of Mary Magdalene it is highly probable that she was a person of great respectability in that place; such a person as the wife of Chuza, Herod's steward, could associate with, and a person on whose conduct or character the calumniating Jews could cast no aspersions.

3. Herod's steward. Though the original word signifies sometimes the "inspector" or "overseer" of a province, and sometimes a "tutor of children," yet here it seems to signify the "overseer of Herod's domestic affairs," the "steward of his household." Unto him. Instead of unto him, meaning Christ, many of the best MSS. and versions have to them, meaning both our Lord and the twelve apostles; see v. 1. This is unquestionably the true meaning.

fish to cast his net among; and he was as ready and willing to teach as they were to be taught.

I. Necessary and excellent rules and cautions for hearing the word, in the parable of the sower. When Christ had put forth this parable, the disciples were inquisitive concerning the meaning of it, v. 9. They asked him, What might this parable be? We should covet earnestly to know the true *in*tent, and full *ex*tent, of the word we hear. They had opportunity of acquainting themselves with the mystery and meaning of his word, which others had not: Unto you it is given, v. 10. Happy are we, and for ever indebted to free grace, if the same thing that is a parable to others, with which they are only amused, is a plain truth to us.

Now from the parable itself, and the explication of it, observe,

1. The heart of man is as soil to the seed of God's word; it is capable of receiving it, and bringing forth the fruits of it; but, unless that seed be sown in it, it will bring forth nothing valuable. Our care therefore must be to bring the seed and the soil together.

2. The success of the seeding is very much according to the nature and temper of the soil. The word of God is to us, as we are, a savour of life unto life, or of death unto death.

3. The devil is a subtle and spiteful enemy. He takes the word out of the hearts of careless hearers, lest they should believe and be saved, v. 12. This is added here to teach us that we cannot be saved unless we believe. That therefore the devil does all he can to keep us from believing, to make us not believe the word when we read and hear it; or, if we heed it for the present, to make us forget it again, and let it slip (Heb. ii. 1); or, if we remember it, to create prejudices in our minds against it, or divert our minds from it to something else; and all is lest we should believe and be saved.

4. Where the word of God is heard carelessly there is commonly a contempt put upon it too. It is added here in the parable that the seed which fell by the wayside was trodden down, v. 5.

5. Those on whom the word makes some impressions, but they are not deep and durable ones; as the seed sown upon the rock, where it gains no root, v. 13. These for awhile believe, their profession promises something, but in time of temptation they fall away from their good beginnings.

6. The pleasures of this life are as dangerous and mischievous thorns to choke the good seed of the word. This is added here (v. 14), which was not in the other evangelists. The delights of sense may ruin the soul, even lawful delights, indulged, and too much delighted in.

7. It is not enough that the fruit be brought forth, but it must be brought to perfection, it must be fully ripened. If it be not, it is as if there was no fruit at all brought forth; for that which in Matthew and Mark is said to be unfruitful is the same that here is said to bring forth none to perfection.

8. The good ground, which brings forth good fruit, is an honest and good heart (v. 15); a heart firmly fixed for God and duty, an upright heart, a tender heart, is an honest and good heart, which, having heard the word, understands it (so it is in Matthew), receives it (so it is in Mark), and keeps it (so it is here), as the soil not only receives, but keeps, the seed.

9. Where the word is well kept there is fruit brought forth with patience. This also is added here; Patience to continue to the end in well-doing.

10. In consideration of all this, we ought to take heed how we hear (v. 18); take heed of those things that will hinder our profiting by the word we hear; take heed lest we hear carelessly and slightly; and take heed after we have heard the word, lest we lose what we have gained.

II. Needful instructions given to those that are appointed to preach the word, and to those also that have heard it. Those that have received the gift must minister the same. People that have profited by the word must look upon themselves as lighted candles. A candle must not be covered with a vessel nor put under a bed, v. 16. Ministers and Christians are to be lights in the world. Their light must shine before men; they must not only be good, but do good. What is now done in secret will shortly be manifested and made known, v. 17. What is committed to you in secret should be made manifest by you; for your Master did not give you talents to be buried, but to be traded with. The gifts we have will either be continued to us, or taken from us, according as we do, or do not, make use of them for the glory of God: Whosoever hath, to him shall be given, v. 18. He that hath gifts, and does good with them, shall have more; he that buries his talent shall lose it. From him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath, so it is in Mark; that which he seemeth manner that it might be so recorded" [OLSHAUSEN].

4-18. PARABLE OF THE SOWER. (See on Mark 4:3-9, 14-20.)

Behold, there went out a sower to sow—What means this? The sower soweth the word—or, as in Luke (8:11), "Now the parable is this: The seed is the word of God." But who is "the sower"? This is not expressed here because if "the word of God" be the seed, every scatterer of that precious seed must be regarded as a sower. It is true that in the parable of the tares it is said, "He that soweth the good seed is the Son of man," as "He that soweth the tares is the devil" (Matt. 13:37, 38). But these are only the great unseen parties, struggling in this world for the possession of man. Each of these has his agents among men themselves; and Christ's agents in the sowing of the good seed are the preachers of the word. Thus, as in all the cases about to be described, the sower is the same, and the seed is the same; while the result is entirely different, the whole difference must lie in the soils, which mean the different states of the human heart. And so, the great general lesson held forth in this parable of the sower is, that however faithful the preacher, and how pure soever his message, the effect of the preaching of the word depends upon the state of the hearer's heart. Now follow the cases.

"When any one heareth the word of the kingdom, and understandeth it not, then cometh the wicked one, and catcheth away that which was sown in his heart." The great truth here taught is, that hearts all unbroken and hard are no fit soil for saving truth. They apprehend it not (Matt. 13:19) as God's means of restoring them to Himself; it penetrates not, makes no impression, but lies loosely on the surface of the heart, till the wicked one—afraid of losing a victim by his "believing to salvation" (Luke 8:12)—finds some frivolous subject by whose greater attractions to draw off the attention, and straightway it is gone. Of how many hearers of the word is this the graphic but painful history!

"The pleasures of this life," or "the lusts of other things entering in"—the enjoyments in themselves may be innocent, which worldly prosperity enables one to indulge. These "choke" or "smother" the word; drawing off so much of one's attention, absorbing so much of one's interest, and using up so much of one's time, that only the dregs of these remain for spiritual things, and a fagged, hurried, and heartless formalism is at length all the religion of such persons.

A heart soft and tender, stirred to its depths on the great things of eternity, and jealously guarded from worldly engrossments, such only is the "honest and good heart" (Luke 8:15), which "keeps," i.e., "retains" the seed of the word, and bears fruit just in proportion as it is such a heart. Such "bring forth fruit with patience" (vs. 15), or continuance, "enduring to the end"; in contrast with those in whom the word is "choked" and brings no fruit to perfection. The "thirtyfold" is designed to express the lowest degree of fruitfulness; the "hundredfold" the highest; and the "sixtyfold" the intermediate degrees of fruitfulness. As a hundredfold," though not unexampled (Gen. 26:12), is a rare return in the natural husbandry, so the highest degrees of spiritual fruitfulness are too seldom witnessed. The closing words of this introductory parable seem designed to call attention to the fundamental and universal character of it.

16. No man . . .—(see on Matt. 5:15, of which this is nearly a repetition). 17. For nothing . . .—(see on ch. 12:2.

18. how ye—in Mark 4:24, "what ye hear." The one implies the other. The precept is very weighty. seemeth to have—or

ADAM CLARKE

5. A sower went out to sow. See all this parable largely explained on Matt. xiii. 1-23.

When any one heareth the word of the kingdom. Viz., the preaching of the gospel of Christ. And understandeth it not. Perhaps more properly, "regardeth it not," does not lay his heart to it. The wicked one. He who distresses and torments the soul. Mark, chap. iv. 15, calls him Satan, the "adversary" or "opposer," because he resists men in all their purposes of amendment, and to the utmost of his power opposes, in order to frustrate, the influences of divine grace upon the heart. In the parallel place in Luke, viii. 12, he is called the devil. It is worthy of remark that the three Evangelists should use each a different appellative of this mortal enemy of mankind; probably to show that the devil, with all his powers and properties, opposes everything that tends to the salvation of the soul. Catcheth away. Makes the utmost haste to pick up the good seed, lest it should take root in the heart. A careless, inattentive hearer is compared to the way side—his heart is an open road, where evil affections and foolish and hurtful desires continually pass and repass without either notice or restraint.

But he that received the seed into stony places, the same is he. That is, is a fit emblem of that man who, hearing the gospel, is affected with its beauty and excellency, and immediately receiveth it with joy—is glad to hear what God has done to make man happy.

Yet hath he not root in himself. His soul is not deeply convinced of its guilt and depravity; the fallow ground is not properly ploughed up, nor the rock broken. When tribulation or persecution ariseth, which he did not expect, "he is soon stumbled"—seeks some pretext to abandon both the doctrine and the followers of Christ.

He also that received seed among the thorns. In land ploughed, but not properly cleared and weeded. Is he—represents that person that heareth the word; and the care, rather "the anxiety" the whole system of anxious, carking cares. The deceitfulness of riches. Which promise peace and pleasure, but can never give them. Choke the word. Or "together choke the word," meaning either that these grow up together with the word, overtop, and choke it, or that these united together, viz., carking, worldly cares, with the delusive hopes and promises of riches, cause the man to abandon the great concerns of his soul and seek, in their place, what he shall eat, drink, and wherewithal he shall be clothed. Dreadful stupidity of man, thus to barter spiritual for temporal good—a heavenly inheritance for an earthly portion! The seed of the Kingdom can never produce much fruit in any heart till the thorns and thistles of vicious affections and impure desires be plucked up by the roots and burned.

15. With patience. Rather, "with perseverance." The Greek word which our translators render patience properly signifies here, and in Rom. ii. 7, "perseverance." The good ground, because it is good, strong and vigorous, continues to bear; bad or poor ground cannot produce a good crop, and besides it is very soon exhausted. The persons called the good ground in the text are filled with the power and influence of God and therefore continue to bring forth fruit; i.e., they persevere in righteousness. From this we may learn that the "perseverance of the saints," as it is termed, necessarily implies that they continue to bring forth fruit to the glory of God. Those who are not fruitful are not in a state of perseverance.

16. Lighted a candle. This is a repetition of a part of our Lord's Sermon on the Mount. See the notes on Matt. v. 15; x. 26; and on Mark iv. 21-22.

17. For nothing is secret. Whatever I teach you in private, you shall teach publicly; and you shall illustrate and explain every parable now delivered to the people.

18. Even that which he seemeth to have.

MATTHEW HENRY

to have, so it is in Luke. The grace that is lost was but seeming grace, was never true. Men do but seem to have what they do not use.

III. Great encouragement given to those that prove themselves faithful hearers of the word, by being doers of the work, in a particular instance of Christ's respect to his disciples, in preferring them even before his nearest relations (v. 19–21). Observe what crowding there was after Christ. There was no coming near for the throng of people that attended him. Some of his nearest kindred were least solicitous to hear him preach. Instead of getting within, desiring to hear him, they stood without, desiring to see him. Jesus Christ would rather be busy at his work than conversing with his friends. Christ is pleased to own those as his nearest and dearest relations that hear the word of God and do it.

Verses 22–39

We have here two illustrious proofs of the power of our Lord Jesus—his power over the winds, and his power over the devils. See Mark iv. and v.

I. His power over the winds.

1. Christ ordered his disciples to put to sea: He went into a ship with his disciples, v. 22. If Christ sends his disciples, he goes with them. And those may safely and boldly venture anywhere that have Christ accompanying them. He said, Let us go over unto the other side.

2. Those that put to sea in a calm, yea, and at Christ's word, must yet prepare for a storm. There came down a storm of wind on the lake (v. 23), and presently their ship was so tossed that it was filled with water, and they were in jeopardy of their lives.

3. Christ was asleep in the storm, v. 23. Some bodily refreshment he must have. The disciples of Christ may really have his gracious presence with them at sea, and in a storm, and yet he may seem as if he were asleep; he may not immediately appear for their relief. Thus he will try their faith and patience and make their deliverance the more welcome when it comes at last.

4. A complaint to Christ of our danger is enough to engage him to awake, and appear for us, v. 24. They cried, Master, master, we perish! The way to have our fears silenced is to bring them to Christ. Those that in sincerity call upon him as their Master, may be sure that he will not let them perish.

5. Christ's business is to lay storms, as it is Satan's business to raise them. He delights to do it: for he came to proclaim peace on earth. He rebuked the wind and the raging of the water, and immediately they ceased (v. 24); all of a sudden, there was a great calm.

6. When our dangers are over, it becomes us to take to ourselves the shame of our own fears and to give to Christ the glory of his power. Christ gives them a rebuke for their inordinate fear: Where is your faith? v. 25. Many that have true faith have it to seek when they have occasion to use it. A little thing disheartens them; and where is their faith then? They give him the glory of his power: They, being afraid, wondered. Those that had feared the storm feared him that had stilled it, and said one to another, What manner of man is this!

II. His power over the devil. Presently after the winds were stilled they were brought to their desired haven, and arrived at the country of the Gadarenes, and there went ashore (v. 26, 27).

1. These malignant spirits are very numerous. They that had taken possession of this one man called themselves Legion (v. 30), because many devils were entered into him: he had had devils a long time, v. 27. They either were, or at least would be thought to be, a legion.

2. They have an inveterate enmity to man. This man in whom the devils had got possession wore no clothes, neither abode in any house (v. 27). They forced this man to abide in the tombs, to make him so much the more a terror to himself and to all about him.

3. They are very strong, fierce, and unruly, and hate and scorn to be restrained: He was kept bound with chains and in fetters, but he broke the bands, v. 29. Those that are ungovernable by any other thereby show that they are under Satan's government. He was driven of the devil. Those that are under Christ's government are sweetly led with the bands of love; those that are under the devil's government are furiously driven.

4. They are much enraged against our Lord Jesus, and have a great dread and horror of him: When the man saw Jesus, he roared out and fell down before him, and owned him to be the Son of God most high, that was infinitely above him and too hard for him; but protested against having any league or confederacy with him: What have I to do with thee? The devils have neither inclination to do service to Christ nor

"thinketh that he hath" (Margin). The "having" of Matthew 13:12 (on which see), and this "thinking he hath," are not different. Hanging loosely on him, and not appropriated, it is and is not his.

19-21. HIS MOTHER AND BRETHREN DESIRE TO SPEAK WITH HIM. (See on Mark 12:46-50.)

22-25. JESUS, CROSSING THE LAKE, STILLS THE STORM. (See on Matt. 8:23-27, and Mark 4:35-41.) 23. filled—lit., "were getting filled," i.e., those who sailed; meaning that their ship was so.

Let us pass over unto the other side—to the east side of the lake, to grapple with a desperate case of possession, and set the captive free, and to give the Gadarenes an opportunity of hearing the message of salvation, amid the wonder which that marvellous cure was fitted to awaken and the awe which the subsequent events could not but strike into them.

Master—or "Teacher." In Luke (8:24) this is doubled—in token of their life-and-death earnestness—"Master, Master." carest thou not that we perish?—Unbelief and fear made them sadly forget their place, to speak so. Luke has it, "Lord, save us, we perish." When those accustomed to fish upon that deep thus spake, the danger must have been imminent. They say nothing of what would become of Him, if they perished; nor think, whether, if He could not perish, it was likely He would let this happen to them; but they hardly knew what they said. And he arose, and rebuked the wind—"and the raging of the water" (Luke 8:24).

And the wind ceased, and there was a great calm—The sudden hushing of the wind would not at once have calmed the sea, whose commotion would have settled only after a considerable time. But the word of command was given to both elements at once.

how is it that ye have no faith?—next to none, or none in present exercise. In Luke it is, "Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith?" Faith they had, for they applied to Christ for relief: but little, for they were afraid, though Christ was in the ship. Faith dispels fear, but only in proportion to its strength. And they feared exceedingly—were struck with deep awe.

26-39. DEMONIAC OF GADARA HEALED. (See on Matt. 8:28-34; and Mark 5:1-20.)

there met him a man with an unclean spirit—"which had devils [demons] long time" (Luke 8:27). In Matthew (8:28), "there met him two men possessed with devils." Though there be no discrepancy between these two statements—more than between two witnesses, one of whom testifies to something done by one person, while the other affirms that there were two—it is difficult to see how the principal details here given could apply to more than one case. Who had his dwelling among the tombs—Luke says, "He ware no clothes, neither abode in any house." These tombs were hewn out of the rocky caves of the locality, and served for shelters and lurking-places (Luke 8:26).

Because that he had been often bound with fetters and chains . . .—Luke says (8:29) that "oftentimes it [the unclean spirit] had caught him"; and after mentioning how they had vainly tried to bind him with chains and fetters, because, "he brake the bands," he adds, "and was driven of the devil [demon] into the wilderness." The dark tyrant-power by which he was held clothed him with superhuman strength and made him scorn restraint. Matthew (8:28) says he was "exceeding fierce, so that no man might pass by that way." He was the terror of the whole locality.

What have I to do with thee, Jesus, Son of the most high God? I adjure thee by God, that thou torment me not—or, as in Matthew

ADAM CLARKE

Or rather, "even what he hath." What he seemeth to have seems to me to contradict itself. Let us examine this subject a little. (1) To seem to have a thing is only to have it in appearance and not in reality; but what is possessed in appearance only can only be taken away in appearance; therefore on the one side there is no gain, and on the other side no loss. On this ground, the text speaks just nothing. (2) It is evident that what he seemeth to have, here, is equivalent to what he hath, in the parallel places, Mark iv. 25; Matt. xiii. 12; xxv. 29; and in Luke xix. 26. (3) It is evident also that these persons had something which might be taken away from them. (4) The word dokein is often an expletive; so Xenophon in Hellen, vi. "Because he seemed to be" (i.e., was) "their father's friend." So in his Oecon, "Among the cities that seemed to be" (actually were) "at war." So Athenaeus, lib. vi, ch. 4, "They who seemed to be" (who really were) "the most opulent, drank out of brazen cups." (5) It often strengthens the sense, and is thus used by the very best Greek writers.

19. His mother and his brethren. See the notes on Matt. xii. 46, etc., and on Mark iii. 31, etc.

22. Let us go over. See on Matt. viii. 24, etc., and Mark iv. 36-41.

23. There came down a storm of wind . . . and they . . . were in jeopardy. This is a parallel passage to that in Jon. i. 4, "There was a mighty tempest in the sea, so that the ship was like to be broken." The word jeopardy, an inexpressive French term, is properly the exclamation of a disappointed gamester, Jeu perdu! "The game is lost!"

25. Where is your faith? You have a power to believe, and yet do not exercise it! You have "little faith" (Matt. viii. 26) because you do not use the grace which I have already given you. Many are looking for more faith without using that which they have.

26. The country of the Gadarenes. Or, according to several MSS., Gerasenes or Gergasenes. See on Matt. viii. 28 and Mark v. 1.

27. A certain man. See the case of this demoniac considered at large on the parallel places, Matt. viii. 28-34; Mark v. 1-20.

What have we to do with thee? The literal translation is, "What is it to us and to Thee?" which perhaps might be understood to imply their disclaiming any design to interfere with the work of Christ, and that He should not therefore meddle with them; for it appears they expectation to receive benefit by him. But they dreaded his power and wrath: I beseech thee, torment me not. They do not say, I beseech thee, save me, but only, Torment me not. See whose language they speak that have only a dread of hell but no desire of heaven as a place of holiness and love.

5. They are perfectly at the command, and under the power, of our Lord Jesus; and they knew it, for they besought him that he would not command them to go into the deep. O what a comfort is this to the Lord's people, that all the powers of darkness are under the check and control of the Lord Jesus! He can send them to their own place, when he pleaseth.

6. They delight in doing mischief. When they found there was no remedy, but they must quit their hold of this poor man, they begged they might have leave to take possession of a herd of swine, v. 32. When he could not destroy the man, he would destroy the swine. If he could not hurt them in their bodies, he would hurt them in their goods, which sometimes prove a great temptation to men to draw them from Christ, as here. Christ suffered them to enter into the swine. They entered into the swine; and no sooner had they entered into them than the herd ran violently down a steep place into the lake, and were drowned.

7. When the devil's power is broken in any soul that soul recovers itself: The man out of whom the devils were departed sat at the feet of Jesus, v. 35. While he was under the devil's power he was ready to fly in the face of Jesus; but now he sits at his feet. If God has possession of us, he preserves to us the government and enjoyment of ourselves; but, if Satan has possession of us, he robs us of both. We are never more our own than when we are Christ's.

Let us now see what was the effect of this miracle.

(1) What effect it had upon the people of that country: The swineherds went and told it both in city and country (v. 34). They told by what means he that was possessed of the devils was healed (v. 36), that it was by sending the devils into the swine, as if Christ could not have delivered the man out of their hands, but by delivering the swine into them. The people came out, to see what was done, and they were afraid (v. 35); they were taken with great fear (v. 37). They thought more of the destruction of the swine than of the deliverance of their poor afflicted neighbour, and therefore the whole multitude besought Christ to depart from them. None need to be afraid of Christ that are willing to forsake their sins and give up themselves to him. But Christ took them at their word: He went up into the ship, and returned back again. Those lose their Saviour, and their hopes in him, that love their swine better.

(2) What effect it had upon the poor man. He desired Christ's company as much as others dreaded it: he besought Christ that he might be with him, as others were that have been healed by him of evil spirits and infirmities (v. 2). He was loth to stay among those rude and brutish Gadarenes that desired Christ to depart from them. But Christ sent him home, to publish among those that knew him the great things God had done for him, that so he might be a blessing to his country, as he had been a burden to it. We must sometimes deny ourselves the satisfaction even of spiritual benefits and comforts, to gain an opportunity of being serviceable to the souls of others.

Verses 40–56

Christ was driven away by the Gadarenes. But when he returned to the Galileans, they gladly received him, wished and waited for his return, and welcomed him with all their hearts, v. 40. He returned, and found work to do in the place whence he came, fresh work. The needy you have always with you.

We have here two miracles interwoven, as they were in Matthew and Mark.

I. A public address made to Christ by a ruler of the synagogue, whose name was Jairus, on the behalf of a little daughter of his, that was very ill. Jairus, though a ruler, fell down at Jesus's feet. He besought him that he would come into his house; not having the faith of the centurion, who desired Christ only to speak the healing word at a distance. But Christ complied with his request; he went along with him. Strong faith shall be applauded, and yet weak faith shall not be rejected. When Christ was going the people thronged him. Let us not complain of a crowd, and a throng, and a hurry, as long as we are in the way of our duty, and doing good; but otherwise it is what every wise man will keep himself out of as much as he can.

II. Here is a secret application made to Christ by a woman ill of a bloody issue, which had been the consumption of her body and the consumption of her purse too; for she had spent all her living upon physicians, and was never the better, v. 43. The nature of 8:29, "Art Thou come to torment us before the time?" (See on ch. 1:24.) Behold the tormentor anticipating, dreading, and entreating exemption from torment! In Christ they discern their destined Tormentor; the time, they know, is fixed, and they feel as if it were come already! (Jas. 2:19.) For he said unto him—i.e., before the unclean spirit cried out. Come out of the man, unclean spirit!—Ordinarily, obedience to a command of this nature was immediate. But here, a certain delay is permitted, the more signally to manifest the power of Christ and accomplish His purposes.

And the unclean spirits went out—of the man—and entered into the swine: and the herd ran violently—rushed—down a steep place—down the hanging cliff—into the sea (they were about two thousand)—The number of them is given by this graphic Evangelist alone. and were choked in the sea—"perished in the waters" (Matt. 8:32).

And they come to Jesus—Matthew (8:34) says, "Behold, the whole city came out to meet Jesus." and see him that was possessed with the devil—the demonized person—and had the legion, sitting—"at the feet of Jesus," adds Luke (8:35); in contrast with his former wild and wandering habits. and clothed—As our Evangelist had not told us that he "ware no clothes," the meaning of this statement could only have been conjectured but for "the beloved physician" (Luke 8:27), who supplies the missing piece of information here. This is a striking case of what are called Undesigned Coincidences amongst the different Evangelists; one of them taking a thing for granted, as familiarly known at the time, but which we should never have known but for one or more of the others, and without the knowledge of which some of their statements would be unintelligible. The clothing which the poor man would feel the want of the moment his consciousness returned to him, was doubtless supplied to him by some of the Twelve. and in his right mind—but now, oh, in what a lofty sense! (Cf. an analogous, though a different kind of case, Dan. 4:34-37.) and they were afraid—Had this been awe only, it had been natural enough; but other feelings, alas! of a darker kind, soon showed themselves. And they that saw it told them how it befell to him that was possessed with the devil ('the demonized person') and also concerning the swine—Thus had they the double testimony of the herdsmen and their own senses. And they began to pray him to depart out of their coasts—Was it the owners only of the valuable property now lost to them that did this? Alas, no! For Luke (8:37) says, "Then the whole multitude of the country of the Gadarenes round about besought Him to depart from them; for they were taken with great fear." The evil spirits had thus, alas! their object. Irritated, the people could not suffer His presence; yet awe-struck, they dared not order Him off: so they entreat Him to withdraw, and—He takes them at their word.

40-56. JAIRUS' DAUGHTER RAISED, AND ISSUE OF BLOOD HEALED. (See on Matthew 9:18-26; and Mark 5:21-43.) 40. gladly received him, for... all waiting for him—The abundant teaching of that day (in Matt. 13: and see Mark 4:36), had only whetted the people's appetite; and disappointed, as would seem, that He had left them in the evening to cross the lake, they remain hanging about the beach, having got a hint, probably through some of His disciples, that He would be back the same evening. Perhaps they witnessed at a distance the sudden calming of the tempest. Here at least they are, watching for His return, and welcoming Him to the shore. The tide of His popularity was now fast rising.

ADAM CLARKE

exceedingly dreaded His power. What have we to do with thee? is a Jewish phrase which often occurs in the Old Testament, signifying an abrupt refusal of some request, or a wish not to be troubled with the company or importunity of others. Art thou come hither to torment us before the time? From this it appears that a greater degree of punishment awaited these demons than they at that time endured; and that they knew there was a time determined by the divine Judge when they should be sent unto greater torments.

33. Then went the devils out of the man, and entered into the swine. Some critics and commentators would have us to understand all this of the man himself, who, they say, was a most outrageous maniac; and that, being permitted by our Lord, he ran after the swine, and drove them all down a precipice into the sea! This is solemn trifling indeed; or, at least, trifling with solemn things. It is impossible to read over the account, as given here by Luke, and admit this mode of explanation.

34. They fled, and went and told it. They . . . went is omitted by almost every MS. of repute and by the best of the ancient versions.

The whole city came out. Probably with the intention to destroy Jesus for having destroyed their swine; but, having seen Him, they were awed by His presence, and only besought Him to depart from their borders. Many rather choose to lose Jesus Christ than those temporal goods by which they gratify their passions at the expense of their souls. They love even their swine better than their salvation.

40. Gladly received him. This is the proper import of the word; therefore our translators needed not to have put gladly in italics, as though it were not expressed in the text.

41. A man named Jairus. See these two miracles—the raising of Jairus' daughter and the cure of the afflicted woman—considered and explained at large on Matt. ix. 18-26 and Mark v. 22-43.

42. The people thronged him. Almost "suffocated Him"—so great was the throng about Him.

43. Spent all her living upon physicians. See the note on Mark v. 26.

MATTHEW HENRY

her disease was such that she did not care to make a public complaint of it and therefore she took this opportunity of coming to Christ in a crowd. Her faith was very strong; for she doubted not but that by the touch of the hem of his garment she should derive from him healing virtue, looking upon him to be such a full fountain of mercies that she should steal a cure and he not miss it. Thus many a poor soul is healed, and helped, and saved, by Christ, that is lost in a crowd. The woman found an immediate change for the better in herself, and that her disease was cured, v. 44. Believers have comfortable communion with Christ incognito.

III. Here is a discovery of this secret cure.

1. Christ takes notice that there is a cure wrought: Virtue is gone out of me, v. 46. Those that have been healed by virtue derived from Christ must own it, for he knows it. It was his delight that virtue was gone out of him to do any good, and he did not grudge it to the meanest; they were as welcome to it as to the light and heat of the sun.

2. The poor patient owns her case, and the benefit she had received: When she saw that she was not hid, she came, and fell down before him, v. 47. She came trembling, and yet her faith saved her, v. 48. There may be trembling where yet there is saving faith. She declared before all the people for what cause she had touched him, because she believed that a touch would cure her, and it did so.

3. The great physician confirms her cure, and sends her away with the comfort of it: Be of good comfort: thy faith hath made thee whole, v. 48. It was obtained surreptitiously and underhand, but it was secured and seconded aboveboard. She is healed, and she shall be healed.

IV. Here is an encouragement to Jairus not to distrust the power of Christ, though his daughter was now dead, and they that brought him the tidings advised him not to give the Master any further trouble about her: Fear not, saith Christ, only believe. Our faith in Christ should be bold and daring. Though the child is dead, yet believe, and all shall be well.

V. The preparatives for the raising of her to life again. 1. The choice Christ made of witnesses that should see the miracle wrought. A crowd followed him, but perhaps they were rude and noisy; however, it was not fit to let such a multitude come into a gentleman's house, especially now that the family was all in sorrow; therefore he sent them back. He took none with him but Peter, and James, and John, designing these three, with the parents, to be the only spectators of the miracle. 2. The check he gave to the mourners. They all wept, and bewailed her. But Christ bids them not weep; for she is not dead, but sleepeth. He means, as to her peculiar case, that she was not dead for good and all; it would be to her friends as if she had been but a few hours asleep. But it is applicable to all that die in the Lord; therefore we should not sorrow for them as those that have no hope, because death is but a sleep. This was a comfortable word which Christ said to these mourners, yet they wickedly ridiculed it, and laughed him to scorn for it. They knew that she was dead, they were certain of it, and therefore nothing less than a divine power could restore her to life. But he put them all out, v. 54. They were unworthy to be the witnesses of this work of wonder.

VI. Her return to life: He took her by the hand (as we do by one that we would awake out of sleep, and help up), and he called, saying, Maid, arise, v. 55. Here that is expressed which was only implied in the other evangelists, that her spirit came again. Where the soul of this child was in this interval we are not told; it was in the hand of the Father of spirits. When her spirit came again she arose, and made it appear that she was alive by her motion, as she did also by her appetite; for Christ commanded to give her meat. In the last verse, we need not wonder to find her parents astonished.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

45. Who touched me?—"Askest Thou, Lord, who touched Thee? Rather ask who touched Thee not in such a throng." 46. Somebody hath touched—yes, the multitude "thronged and pressed Him—"they jostled against Him," but all involuntarily; they were merely carried along; but one, one only—"Somebody TOUCHED" HIM, with the conscious, voluntary, dependent touch of faith, reaching forth its hands expressly to have contact with Him. This and this only Jesus acknowledges and seeks out. Even so, as the Church Father AUGUSTINE long ago said, multitudes still come similarly close to Christ in the means of grace, but all to no purpose, being only sucked into the crowd. The voluntary, living contact of faith is that electric conductor which alone draws virtue out of Him. 47. declared . . . before all—This, though a great trial to the shrinking modesty of the believing woman, was just what Christ wanted in dragging her forth, her public testimony to the facts of her case—both her disease, with her abortive efforts at a cure, and the instantaneous and perfect relief which her touch of the Great Healer had brought her.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

Notice that our Lord never forbids weeping unless He takes away its cause. "Weep not" is another of the futile forms of words with which men try to encourage and comfort one another. There is nothing more cruel than to forbid tears to the sad heart. Jesus Christ never did that except when He was able to bring that which took away occasion for weeping. He lets grief have its way. He means us to run rivers of waters down our cheeks when He sends us sorrows. We shall never get the blessing of these till we have felt the bitterness of them. We shall never profit by them if we stoically choke back the manifestations of our grief, and think that it is submissive to be dumb. Let sorrow have way. Tears purge the heart from which their streams come. But Jesus Christ says to us all, "Weep not," because He comes to us all with that which, if I may so say, puts a rainbow into the teardrops, and makes it possible that the great paradox should be fulfilled in our hearts, "As sorrowful yet always rejoicing." Weep not; or if you weep, let the tears have thankfulness as well as grief in them. It is a difficult commandment, but it is possible when His lips tell us not to weep, and we have obeyed the central exhortation, "Only believe."

give her meat—(see on Mark 5:43).

ADAM CLARKE

Came in the press behind. She had formed her resolution in faith; she executes it, notwithstanding her weakness, with courage; and now she finds it crowned with success.

Thou seest the multitude thronging thee. Many touch Jesus who are not healed by Him; the reason is, they do it not by faith, through a sense of their wants, and a conviction of His ability and willingness to save them. Faith conveys the virtue of Christ into the soul, and spiritual health is the immediate consequence of this received virtue.

46. I perceive that virtue. Dynamin, divine or miraculous power.

Why troublest thou the Master? These people seem to have had no other notion of our Lord than that of an eminent physician, who might be useful while there was life, but afterwards could do nothing.

Jesus . . . saith. These words were spoken by our Lord to the afflicted father, immediately on his hearing of the death of his child, to prevent that distress which he otherwise must have felt on finding that the case was now, humanly speaking, hopeless.

The father and the mother. Prudence required that they should be present, and be witnesses of the miracle. And them that were with him. That is, Peter, James, and John, v. 37. It is remarkable that our Lord gave a particular preference to these three disciples, beyond all the rest, on three very important occasions. They were present (1) at the Transfiguration, (2) at the raising of Jairus' daughter, and (3) at His agony in the Garden of Gethsemane.

54. He put them all out. That is, the pipers and those who made a noise, weeping and lamenting. See Matt. ix. 23; Mark v. 38.

55. And he commanded to give her meat. Though she was raised to life by a miracle, she was not to be preserved by a miracle. Nature is God's great instrument, and He delights to work by it; nor will He do anything by His sovereign power, in the way of miracle, that can be effected by His ordinary providence.

CHAPTER 9

Verses 1–9

I. The method Christ took to spread his gospel. He had himself travelled about; but he could be only in one place at a time, and therefore now he sent his twelve disciples abroad. Let them disperse themselves, some one way and some another, to preach the kingdom of God. For the confirming of their doctrine he empowered them to work miracles (v. 1, 2): He gave them authority over all devils, to dispossess them, and cast them out. He authorized and appointed them likewise to cure diseases, and to heal the sick, which would not only convince people's judgments, but gain their affections. This was their commission.

CHAPTER 9

Vss. 1-6. MISSION OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES. (See on Matt. 10:1-15.) 1. power and authority—He both qualified and authorized them.

CHAPTER 9

1. Power and authority. The words properly mean here the power to work miracles, and that authority by which the whole demoniac system was to be subjected to them. The reader will please to observe: (1) Luke mentions both devils (demons) and diseases; therefore he was either mistaken or demons and diseases are not the same. (2) The treatment of these two was not the same; the demons were to be cast out, the diseases to be healed. See Matt. x. 1.

2. To preach the kingdom of God. For an explication of this phrase, see on Matt. iii. 2.

MATTHEW HENRY

1. What Christ directed them to do, in prosecution of this commission. (1) They must not be solicitous to recommend themselves to people's esteem by their outward appearance. They must go as they were, and not change their clothes, or so much as put on a pair of new shoes. (2) They must depend upon Providence, and the kindness of their friends. They must not take with them either bread or money. Christ would not have his disciples shy of receiving the kindnesses of their friends, but rather to expect them. (3) They must not change their lodgings, as suspecting that those who entertained them were weary of them; "Whatsoever house ye enter into there abide (v. 4), that people may know where to find you; there abide till you depart out of that city; stay with those you are used to." (4) They must put on authority, and speak warning to those who refused them as well as comfort to those that received them, v. 5. "If there be any place that will not entertain you, bind them over to the judgment of God for it; shake off the dust of your feet for a testimony against them."

2. What they did, in prosecution of this commission (v. 6): They departed from their Master's presence; they went through the towns, preaching the gospel, and healing everywhere. Their work was the same with their Master's, doing good both to souls and bodies.

II. We have here Herod's perplexity and vexation at this. The communicating of Christ's power to those who were sent forth in his name was an amazing and convincing proof of his being the Messiah. That he could not only work miracles himself, but empower others to work miracles too, this spread his fame more than anything. They had been with Jesus, Acts iv. 13. When the country sees such as these healing the sick in the name of Jesus it gives it an alarm.

1. The various speculations it raised among the people, who, though they thought not rightly, yet could not but think honourably, of our Lord Jesus, and that he was one come from the other world; that either John Baptist or one of the old prophets was risen again; or that Elias had appeared, v. 7, 8.

2. The great perplexity it created in the mind of Herod: When he had heard of all that was done by Christ, he was ready to conclude with them that John was risen from the dead. "What shall I do now?" saith Herod. "John have I beheaded, but who is this? Is he carrying on John's work, or is he come to avenge John's death?" Those who oppose God will find themselves more and more embarrassed. He desired to see him; and why did he not go and see him? He desired to see him, but we do not find that ever he did, till he saw him at his bar.

Verses 10–17

I. The account which the twelve gave their Master of the success of their ministry. When they returned, they told him all that they had done.

II. Their retirement, for a little breathing: He took them, and went aside privately into a desert place. He that hath appointed our man-servant and maid-servant to rest would have his servants to rest too. Those in the most public stations, must sometimes go aside privately, both for the repose of their bodies, and for the furnishing of their minds by meditation for further public work.

III. The resort of the people to him, and the kind reception he gave them. They followed him, though it was into a desert place. He welcomed them, v. 11. Pious zeal may excuse a little rudeness; it did with Christ, and should with us. Though they came unseasonably, yet Christ gave them what they came for. He spoke unto them of the kingdom of God. He healed them that had need of healing. Christ hath still a power over bodily diseases, and heals his people that need healing. Sometimes he sees that we need the sickness for the good of our souls, more than the healing for the ease of our bodies. Death is the servant, to heal the saints of all diseases.

IV. The plentiful provision Christ made for the multitude that attended him. With five loaves of bread, and two fishes, he fed five thousand men. This narrative we had twice before, and shall meet with it again; it is the only miracle of our Saviour's that is recorded by all the four evangelists. Let us only observe out of it, 1. Those who diligently attend upon Christ in the way of duty, and therein deny or expose themselves, are taken under his particular care. He will not see those that fear him, and serve him faithfully, want any good thing. 2. Our Lord Jesus was of a free and generous spirit. His disciples said, Send them away, that they may get victuals; but Christ said, "No, give ye them to eat; let what we have go as far as it will reach, and they are welcome to it." Thus he has taught both ministers and Christians to use hospitality without grudging. Those Nor scrip for your journey—the bag used by travelers for holding provisions. neither two coats—or tunics, worn next the skin. The meaning is, Take no change of dress, no additional articles. neither shoes—i.e., change of them. nor yet staves—The received text here has "a staff," but our version follows another reading, "staves," which is found in the received text of Luke (9:3). The true reading, however, evidently is "a staff"—meaning, that they were not to procure even that much expressly for this missionary journey, but to go with what they had.

And whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear your words, when ye depart out of that house or city—for possibly a whole town might not furnish one "worthy." shake off the dust of your feet—"for a testimony against them," as Mark and Luke add. By this symbolical action they vividly shook themselves from all connection with such, and all responsibility for the guilt of rejecting them and their message. Such symbolical actions were common in ancient times, even among others than the Jews, as strikingly appears in Pilate (ch. 27:24). And even to this day it prevails in the East.

7-9. HEROD TROUBLED AT WHAT HE HEARS OF CHRIST. DESIRES TO SEE HIM. (See on Mark 6:14-30.)

7. perplexed—at a loss, embarrassed. said of some, that John was risen—Among many opinions, this was the one which Herod himself adopted, for the reason, no doubt, mentioned on Mark 6:14.

9. desired to see him—but did not, till as a prisoner He was sent to him by Pilate just before His death, as we learn from ch. 23:8.

10-17. ON THE RETURN OF THE TWELVE, JESUS RETIRES WITH THEM TO BETHSAIDA, AND THERE MIRACULOUSLY FEEDS FIVE THOUSAND. (See on Mark 6:31-44.)

And they departed into a desert place by ship privately—"over the Sea of Galilee, which is the Sea of Tiberias," says John (6:1), the only one of the Evangelists who so fully describes it; the others having written when their readers were supposed to know something of it, while the last wrote for those at a greater distance of time and place. This "desert place" is more definitely described by Luke (9:10) as "belonging to the city called Bethsaida." This must not be confounded with the town so called on the western side of the lake (see on Matt. 11:21). This town lay on its northeastern side, near where the Jordan empties itself into it: in Gaulonitis, out of the dominions of Herod Antipas, and within the dominions of Philip the Tetrarch (Luke 3:1), who raised it from a village to a city, and called it Julias, in honor of Julia, the daughter of Augustus [JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 18:2, 1].

And when the day was now far spent—"began to wear away" or "decline," says Luke (9:12). Matthew (14:15) says, "when it was evening"; and yet he mentions a later evening of the same day (vs. 23). This earlier evening began at three P.M.; the latter began at sunset. Send them away, that they may go into the country round about, and into the villages, and buy themselves bread: for they have nothing to eat—John tells us (6:5, 6) that "Jesus said to Philip, Whence shall we buy bread, that these may eat? (And this He said to prove him: for He Himself knew what He would do.)"

Give ye them to eat—doubtless said to prepare them for what was to follow.

3. Take nothing. See on Mark vi. 7-8. Neither money. See on Matt. x. 9.

Provide neither gold, nor silver, nor brass in your purses. "In your girdles." It is supposed that the people of the East carry their money in a fold of their girdles. This is scarcely correct; they carry it in a purse in the bosom, under the girdles. This I have often observed. "Have no money in your purse" is a command, obedience to which was secured by the narrow circumstances of most of the primitive genuine preachers of the gospel.

7. Herod the tetrarch. See on Matt. xiv. 1. By him. This is omitted by some MSS. and versions. It is probable that Luke might have written, "Herod, hearing of all the things that were done"; but Matthew says particularly that it was the fame of Jesus of which he heard, chap. xiv. 1.

He was perplexed. "He was greatly perplexed." It is a metaphor taken from a traveller who in his journey meets with several paths, only one of which leads to the place whither he would go; and, not knowing which to take, he is distressed with perplexity and doubt.

10. Told him all. "Related distinctly."

11. The people . . . followed him. Observe here five grand effects of divine grace. (1) The people are drawn to follow Him. (2) He kindly receives them. (3) He instructs them in the things of God. (4) He heals all their diseases. (5) He feeds their bodies and their souls.

12. Send the multitude away. See this miracle explained at large on the parallel places, Matt. xiv. 15-21; Mark vi. 36-44.

Send the multitude away, that they may go . . . and buy. The disciples of Christ are solicitous for the people's temporal as well as spiritual welfare; and he is not worthy to be called a minister of Christ who does not endeavor to promote both to the uttermost of his power.

MATTHEW HENRY

that have but a little, let them do what they can with that little, and that is the way to make it more. 3. Jesus Christ has not only physic, but food. He not only heals them that need healing, but feeds them too that need feeding. Christ has provided not only to save the soul from perishing by its diseases, but to nourish the soul unto life eternal. 4. All the gifts of Christ are to be received in a regular orderly manner: Make them sit down by fifties in a company, v. 14. 5. When we are receiving our creature-comforts, we must look up to heaven. Christ did so, to teach us to do so. We receive them from God, we depend upon God's blessing upon them to make them serviceable to us, and desire that blessing. 6. The blessing of Christ will make a little go a great way. 7. Those whom Christ feeds he fills; as there is in him enough for all, so there is enough for each. Here were fragments taken up, to assure us that in our Father's house there is bread enough, and to spare. We are not straitened or stinted, in him.

Verses 18–27

One circumstance of this discourse is taken notice of here which we had not in the other evangelists—that Christ was alone praying, and his disciples with him, when he entered into this discourse, v. 18. He found some time to be alone in private, for converse with himself, with his Father, and with his disciples. When Christ was alone he was praying. It is good for us to improve our solitude for devotion, that, when we are alone, we may not be alone, but may have the Father with us. When Christ was alone, praying, his disciples were with him, to join with him in his prayer. Christ prayed with them before he examined them. Those we give instructions to we should put up prayers for and with. He discourses with them,

I. Concerning himself; and enquires,

1. What the people said of him: Who say the people that I am? They tell him what conjectures concerning him they had heard in their converse with the common people. Ministers would know better how to suit their instructions, reproofs, and counsels, to the case of ordinary people, if they did but converse more frequently and familiarly with them. The more conversant the physician is with his patient, the better he knows what to do for him. Some said that he was John Baptist, who was beheaded but the other day; others Elias, or one of the old prophets; anything but what he was.

2. What they said of him. Saith Peter, "We know that thou art the Christ of God, the Anointed of God." Now one would have expected that Christ should have charged his disciples to publish it to everyone they met with; but no, he strictly charged them to tell no man that thing as yet. After his resurrection, which completed the proof of it, Peter made the temple ring of it, that God had made this same Jesus both Lord and Christ (Acts ii. 36); but as yet the evidence was not ready to be summed up, and therefore it must be concealed.

II. Concerning his own sufferings and death. Now that his disciples were well established in the belief of his being the Christ, and able to bear it, he speaks of them expressly, v. 22. They must not yet preach that he was the Christ, because the wonders that would attend his death and resurrection would be the most convincing proof of his being the Christ of God.

III. Concerning their sufferings for him.

1. We must accustom ourselves to all instances of self-denial and patience, v. 23. We must not indulge our ease and appetite, for then it will be hard to bear toil, and weariness, and want, for Christ. We frequently meet with crosses in the way of duty; and, though we must not pull them upon our own heads, yet, when they are laid for us, we must take them up, carry them after Christ, and make the best of them.

2. We must prefer the salvation and happiness of our souls before any secular concern whatsoever. Reckon upon it, (1) That he who to preserve his liberty or estate, nay, or to save his life, denies Christ and his truths, will be, not only not a saver, but an unspeakable loser, in the issue. He that will save his life upon these terms will lose it, will lose that which is of infinitely more value, his precious soul. (2) We must firmly believe also that, if we lose our life for cleaving to Christ, we shall save it to our unspeakable advantage. We shall have it again a new and an eternal life. (3) That the gain of all the world, if we should forsake Christ, would be so far from countervailing the eternal loss and ruin of the soul that it would bear no manner of proportion to it, v. 25. If we could be supposed to gain all the wealth, honour, and pleasure, in the world, by denying Christ, yet when, by so doing, we lose ourselves to all eternity, and are cast away at last, what good will our worldly gain do us? In Matthew and Mark the dreadful

And they did all eat, and were filled—All the four Evangelists mention this: and John (6:11) adds, "and likewise of the fishes, as much as they would"—to show that vast as was the multitude, and scanty the provisions, the meal to each and all of them was a plentiful one. "When they were filled, He said unto His disciples, Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost" (John 6:12). This was designed to bring out the whole extent of the miracle. And they took up twelve baskets full of the fragments, and of the fishes—"Therefore (says John 6:13), they gathered them together, and filled twelve baskets with the fragments of the five barley loaves, which remained over and above unto them that had eaten." The article here rendered "baskets" in all the four narratives was part of the luggage taken by Jews on a journey—to carry, it is said, both their provisions and hay to sleep on, that they might not have to depend on Gentiles, and so run the risk of ceremonial pollution.

18-27. PETER'S CONFESSION OF CHRIST—OUR LORD'S FIRST EXPLICIT ANNOUNCEMENT OF HIS APPROACHING DEATH, AND WARNINGS ARISING OUT OF IT. (See on Matt. 16:13-28; and Mark 8:34.)

Whom—or more grammatically, "Who"—do men say that I the Son of man am?—(or, "that the Son of man is"—the recent editors omitting here the me of Mark and Luke; though the evidence seems pretty nearly balanced)—i.e., 'What are the views generally entertained of Me, the Son of man, after going up and down among them so long?' He had now closed the first great stage of His ministry, and was just entering on the last dark one. His spirit, burdened, sought relief in retirement, not only from the multitude, but even for a season from the Twelve. He retreated into "the secret place of the Most High," pouring out His soul "in supplications and prayers, with strong crying and tears" (Heb. 5:7). On rejoining His disciples, and as they were pursuing their quiet journey, He asked them this question.

And Simon Peter answered and said, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God—He does not say, "Scribes and Pharisees, rulers and people, are all perplexed; and shall we, unlettered fishermen, presume to decide?" But feeling the light of his Master's glory shining in his soul, he breaks forth—not in a tame, prosaic acknowledgment, "I believe that Thou art . . ."—but in the language of adoration—such as one uses in worship, "THOU ART THE CHRIST, THE SON OF THE LIVING GOD!" He first owns Him the promised Messiah (see on ch. 1:16); then he rises higher, echoing the voice from heaven—"This is My beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased"; and in the important addition—"Son of the LIVING GOD"—he recognizes the essential and eternal life of God as in this His Son—though doubtless without that distinct perception afterwards vouchsafed.

From that time forth began Jesus to show unto his disciples—i.e., with an explicitness and frequency He had never observed before—how that he must go unto Jerusalem and suffer many things "and be rejected," (Matthew and Mark)—of the elders and chief priests and scribes—not as before, merely by not receiving Him, but by formal deeds. and be killed, and be raised again the third day—Mark (8:32) adds, that "He spake that saying openly"—"explicitly," or "without disguise."

24. will save—"is minded to save," bent on saving. The pith of this maxim depends—as often in such weighty sayings (for example, "Let the dead bury the dead," Matt. 8:22)—on the double sense attached to the word "life," a lower and a higher, the natural and the spiritual, temporal and eternal. An entire sacrifice of the lower, or a willingness to make it, is indispensable to the preservation of the higher life; and he who cannot bring himself to surrender the one for the sake of the other shall eventually lose both.

ADAM CLARKE

We have here but five loaves, and two fishes. When we are deeply conscious of our own necessities, we shall be led to depend on Jesus with a firmer faith. God often permits His servants to be brought low, that they may have repeated opportunities of proving the kindness and mercy of their gracious Lord and Master.

And took the five loaves. This was the act of the father of a family among the Jews—his business it was to take the bread into his hands, and render thanks to God, before any of the family was permitted to taste of it. Looking up to heaven. To teach us to acknowledge God as the Supreme Good, and Fountain of all excellence. He blessed. The word "God" should, I think, be rather inserted here than the word "them," because it does not appear that it was the loaves which Christ blessed, but that God who had provided them; and this indeed was the Jewish custom, not to bless the food, but the God who gave it. However, there are others who believe the loaves are meant, and that He blessed them in order to multiply them. And brake. The Jews made their bread broad and thin like cakes, and to divide such, being very brittle, there was no need of a knife.

18. Whom say the people? "The common people," i.e., the mass of people.

Whom do men say? He asked His disciples this question, not because He was ignorant what the people thought and spoke of Him, but to have the opportunity, in getting an express declaration of their faith from themselves, to confirm and strengthen them in it; but see on Luke ix. 20. Some . . . John the Baptist. By this and other passages we learn that the Pharisaic doctrine of the transmigration of souls was pretty general; for it was upon this ground that they believed that the soul of the Baptist, or of Elijah, Jeremiah, or some of the prophets, had come to a new life in the body of Jesus.

Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God. Every word here is emphatic—a most concise, and yet comprehensive, confession of faith. The Christ, or "Messiah," points out His divinity, and shows His office; the Son designates His person. On this account it is that both are joined together so frequently in the new covenant. Of the living God—literally, of God the Living One. Living. A character applied to the Supreme Being, not only to distinguish Him from the dead idols of paganism, but also to point Him out as the Source of life, present, spiritual, and eternal. Probably there is an allusion here to the great name Yehovah, which properly signifies being or existence.

23. If any man will come after me. See on Matt. xvi. 24 and on Mark viii. 34, where the nature of proselytism among the Jews is explained.

24. Will save his life. See on Matt. xvi. 24, etc.

25. Lose himself. That is, his "life" or "soul." See the parallel places, Matt. xvi. 25; Mark viii. 35, and especially the note on the former. Or be cast away. "Or receive [spiritual] damage." I have added the word "spiritual" here, which I conceive to be necessarily implied. Because if a man received only temporal damage in some respect or other, yet gaining the whole world must amply compensate him. But if he should receive spiritual damage—hurt to his soul in the smallest degree—the possession of the universe could not indemnify him.

MATTHEW HENRY

issue is a man's losing his own soul, here it is losing himself, which plainly intimates that our souls are ourselves. The soul is the man; and it is well or ill with us according as it is well or ill with our souls. The body cannot be happy if the soul be miserable in the other world; but the soul may be happy though the body be greatly afflicted and oppressed in this world.

3. We must therefore never be ashamed of Christ and his gospel, v. 26. For whosoever shall be ashamed of me and of my words, of him shall the Son of man be ashamed, and justly. He can expect no other than that in the great day, when his case calls for Christ's appearance on his behalf, Christ will be ashamed to own such a cowardly, worldly, sneaking spirit, and will say, "He is none of mine; he belongs not to me." As Christ had a state of humiliation and of exaltation, so likewise has his cause. They, and they only, that are willing to suffer with it when it suffers, shall reign with it when it reigns. Observe here, How Christ, to support himself and his followers under present disgraces, speaks magnificently of the lustre of his second coming. He shall come in his own glory. This was not mentioned in Matthew and Mark. He shall come in his Father's glory. He shall come in the glory of the holy angels. What a figure will the blessed Jesus make in that day! Did we believe it, we should never be ashamed of him or his words now.

Lastly, To encourage them in suffering for him, he assures them that the kingdom of God would now shortly be set up, v. 27. "The kingdom of God shall come in its power in the present age, while some here present are alive." They saw the kingdom of God when the Spirit was poured out, when the gospel was preached to all the world and nations were brought to Christ by it.

We have here the narrative of Christ's transfiguration which was designed for a specimen of that glory of his of which he had lately been speaking, and, consequently, an encouragement to his disciples to suffer for him, and never to be ashamed of him. We had this account before in Matthew and Mark.

I. Here is one circumstance of the narrative that seems to differ from the other two evangelists. They said that it was six days after the foregoing sayings; Luke says that it was about eight days after, that is, it was that day sevennight, six whole days intervening, and it was the eighth day.

II. Here are divers circumstances added and explained.

1. We are here told that Christ had this honour put upon him when he was praying: He went up into a mountain to pray (v. 28), and as he prayed he was transfigured. When Christ humbled himself to pray, he was thus exalted. Christ himself must sue out the favours that were purposed for him, and promised to him. And thus he intended to put an honour upon the duty of prayer, and to recommend it to us. It is a transfiguring, transforming duty. By prayer we fetch in the wisdom, grace, and joy, which make the face to shine.

2. Luke does not use the word transfigured (which Matthew and Mark used), but makes use of a phrase equivalent, the fashion of his countenance was another thing from what it had been; and his raiment was white and glistening; it was bright like lightning (a word used only here), so that he seemed to be arrayed all with light, to cover himself with light as with a garment.

3. It was said in Matthew and Mark that Moses and Elias appeared to them; here it is said that they appeared in glory. He being in glory, they appeared with him in glory.

4. We are here told what was the subject of the discourse between Christ and the two great prophets of the Old Testament: They spoke of his decease, which he should accomplish at Jerusalem. His departure; that is, his death. (1) The death of Christ is here called his exit, his going out, his leaving the world. The death of the saints is their exodus, their departure out of the Egypt of this world, their release out of a house of bondage. (2) This departure of his he must accomplish; for thus it was determined in the counsel of God, and could not be altered. (3) He must accomplish it at Jerusalem. (4) Moses and Elias spoke of this, to intimate that the sufferings of Christ, and his entrance into his glory, were what Moses and the prophets had spoken of; see Luke xxiv. 26, 27. (5) Our Lord Jesus, even in his transfiguration, was willing to enter into a discourse concerning his death and sufferings. In our greatest glories on earth, let us remember that here we have no continuing city.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

26. ashamed of me, and of my words—The sense of shame is one of the strongest in our nature, one of the social affections founded on our love of reputation, which causes instinctive aversion to what is fitted to lower it, and was given us as a preservative from all that is properly shameful. When one is, in this sense of it, lost to shame, he is nearly past hope (Zech. 3:5; Jer. 6:15; 3:3). But when Christ and "His words"—Christianity, especially in its more spiritual and uncompromising features—are unpopular, the same instinctive desire to stand well with others begets the temptation to be ashamed of Him, which only the 'expulsive power' of a higher affection can effectually counteract. Son of man be ashamed when he cometh . . .—He will render to that man his own treatment; He will disown him before the most august of all assemblies, and put him to "shame and everlasting contempt" (Dan. 12:2). "Oh shame, to be put to shame before God, Christ, and angels!" [BENGEL]. 27. not taste of death till they see the kingdom of God—"see it come with power" (Mark 9:1); or see "the Son of man coming in His kingdom" (Matt. 16:28). The reference, beyond doubt, is to the firm establishment and victorious progress, in the lifetime of some then present, of that new Kingdom of Christ, which was destined to work the greatest of all changes on this earth, and be the grand pledge of His final coming in glory.

28-36. JESUS TRANSFIGURED. 28. an eight days after these sayings—including the day on which this was spoken and that of the Transfiguration. Matthew and Mark say "after six days," excluding these two days. As the "sayings" so definitely connected with the transfiguration scene are those announcing His death—at which Peter and all the Twelve were so startled and scandalized—so this scene was designed to show to the eyes as well as the heart how glorious that death was in the view of Heaven. Peter, James, and John—partners before in secular business; now sole witnesses of the resurrection of Jairus' daughter (Mark 5:37), the transfiguration, and the agony in the garden (Mark 14:33). a mountain—not Tabor, according to long tradition, with which the facts ill comport, but some one near the lake. to pray—for the period He had now reached was a critical and anxious one. (See on Matt. 16:13.) But who can adequately translate those "strong cryings and tears?" Methinks, as I steal by His side, I hear from Him these plaintive sounds, Lord, who hath believed Our report? I am come unto Mine own and Mine own receive Me not; I am become a stranger unto My brethren, an alien to My mother's children: Consider Mine enemies, for they are many, and they hate Me with cruel hatred. Arise, O Lord, let not man prevail. Thou that dwellest between the cherubim, shine forth: Show Me a token for good: Father, glorify Thy name." 29. as he prayed, the fashion . . .—Before He cried He was answered, and while He was yet speaking He was heard. Blessed interruption to prayer this! Thanks to God, transfiguring manifestations are not quite strangers here. Ofttimes in the deepest depths, out of groanings which cannot be uttered, God's dear children are suddenly transported to a kind of heaven upon earth, and their soul is made as the chariots of Amminadab. Their prayers fetch down such light, strength, holy gladness, as make their face to shine, putting a kind of celestial radiance upon it (II Corinthians 3:18, with Exod. 34:29-35). raiment white . . .—Matthew says, "His face did shine as the sun" (17:2), and Mark says "His raiment became shining, exceeding white as snow, so as no fuller on earth can white them" (9:2). The light, then, it would seem, shone not upon Him from without, but out of Him from within; He was all irradiated, was in one blaze of celestial glory. What a contrast to that "visage more marred than men, and His form than the sons of men!" (Isa. 52:14). 30, 31. there talked with him two men . . . Moses and Elias . . . appeared in glory—"Who would have believed these were not angels had not their human names been subjoined?" [BENGEL]. (Cf. Acts 1:10; Mark 16:5.) Moses represented "the law," Elijah "the prophets," and both together the whole testimony of the Old Testament Scriptures, and the Old Testament saints, to Christ; now not borne in a book, but by living men, not to a coming, but a come Messiah, visibly, for they "appeared," and audibly, for they "spake." spake—"were speaking." of his decease—"departure"; beautiful euphemism (softened term) for death, which Peter, who witnessed the scene, uses to express his own expected death, and the use of which single term seems to have recalled the whole by a sudden rush of recollection,

ADAM CLARKE

26. Ashamed of me. See on Mark viii. 38.

Whosoever therefore shall be ashamed of me. Our Lord hints here at one of the principal reasons of the incredulity of the Jews—they saw nothing in the person of Jesus Christ which corresponded to the pompous notions which they had formed of the Messiah. And of my words. This was another subject of offense to the Jews: the doctrine of the Cross must be believed; a suffering Messiah must be acknowledged; and poverty and affliction must be borne; and death, perhaps, suffered in consequence of becoming His disciples.

28. About an eight days after. See the whole of this important transaction explained at large on Matt. xvii. 1-13.

After six days. Mark ix. 2 has the same number; but Luke says, ix. 28, after "eight" days. The reason of this difference seems to be the following: Matthew and Mark reckon the days from that mentioned in the preceding chapter to that mentioned in this; Luke includes both days, as well as the six intermediate. Hence the one makes eight, the other six, without any contradiction. Peter, James, and John. He chose those that they might be witnesses of His transfiguration, two or three witnesses being required by the Scripture to substantiate any fact. The same three were made witnesses of His agony in the garden, chap. xxvi. 37. An high mountain. This was one of the mountains of Galilee, but whether Mount Tabor or not is uncertain. Some think it was Mount Hermon. St. Luke says Christ and His disciples went up into the mountain to pray, chap. ix. 28.

Was transfigured. That fullness of the Godhead which dwelt bodily in Christ now shone forth through the human nature, and manifested to His disciples not only that divinity which Peter had before confessed, chap. xvi. 16, but also the glorious resurrection body, in which they should exist in the presence of God to eternity.

Moses and Elias. Elijah came from heaven in the same body which he had upon earth, for he was translated, and did not see death, 2 Kings ii. 11. And the body of Moses was probably raised again as a pledge of the resurrection. It was a constant and prevalent tradition among the Jews that both Moses and Elijah should appear in the times of the Messiah, and to this very tradition the disciples refer, v. 10. We may conceive that the law in the person of Moses, the great Jewish legislator, and the prophets in the person of Elijah, the chief of the prophets, came now to do homage to Jesus Christ, and to render up their authority into His hands, as He was the End of the law and the grand Subject of the predictions of the prophets. This appears more particularly from what Luke says, chap. ix. 31, that Moses and Elijah conversed with our Lord on His death, which He was about to accomplish, because in it all the rites, ceremonies, and sacrifices of the law, as well as the predictions of the prophets, were fulfilled.

31. His decease. "That going out [or death] of His." That peculiar kind of death—its nature, circumstances, and necessity being considered.

MATTHEW HENRY

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

It is worthy of note that He was transfigured while He was praying. Every blessing comes to the great Head of the Church, and to all the members of His mystical body, through prayer. There is nothing promised to us without prayer; but, with prayer, everything is provided for us and by prayer we shall ascend into glory.
—The Treasury of the New Testament

5. We are here told, which we were not before, that the disciples were heavy with sleep, v. 32. Perhaps it was owing to a sinful carelessness: when Christ was at prayer with them, they did not regard his prayer as they should have done, and, to punish them for that, they were left to sleep on now, and so lost an opportunity of seeing how that work of wonder was wrought. These three were now asleep, when Christ was in his glory, as afterwards they were, when he was in his agony. Nothing could be more affecting to these disciples, one would think, than the glories and the agonies of their Master, and both in the highest degree; and yet neither the one nor the other would serve to keep them awake. What need have we to pray to God for quickening grace, to make us not only alive, but lively! After awhile they recovered themselves, and then they took an exact view of all those glories, so that they were able to give a particular account, as we find one of them does, of all that passed when they were with Christ in the holy mount, 2 Pet. i. 18.

6. It is here observed that it was when Moses and Elias were now about to depart that Peter said, Lord, it is good to be here, let us make three tabernacles. Thus we are often not sensible of the worth of our mercies till we are about to lose them; nor do we covet and court their continuance till they are upon the departure. Peter said this, not knowing what he said.

7. It is here added, concerning the cloud that overshadowed them, that they feared as they entered into the cloud. This cloud was a token of God's more peculiar presence. Then no wonder that the disciples were afraid to enter into it. But never let any be afraid to enter into a cloud with Jesus Christ; for he will be sure to bring them safely through it.

8. The voice which came from heaven is here, and in Mark, related not so fully as in Matthew: This is my beloved Son, hear him: though those words, in whom I am well pleased, which we have both in Matthew and Peter, are not expressed, they are implied in that, This is my beloved Son.

Lastly, The apostles are here said to have kept this vision private. They told no man in those days. As there is a time to speak, so there is a time to keep silence. Everything is beautiful and useful in its season.

Verses 37–42

This passage of story in Matthew and Mark follows immediately upon that of Christ's transfiguration, and his discourse with his disciples after it; but here it is said to be on the next day, as they were coming down from the hill. It was not till next day that they came down from the hill, and then he found things in some disorder among his disciples. 1. How forward the people were to receive Christ at his return to them. Much people met him, as, at other times, much people followed him. 2. How importunate the father of the lunatic child was with Christ for help for him (v. 38): I beseech thee, look upon my son; this is his request; one compassionate look from Christ is enough to set everything to rights. Let us bring ourselves and our children to Christ, to be looked upon. His plea is, He is my only child. They that have many children may balance their affliction in one with their comfort in the rest. 3. How deplorable the case of the child was, v. 39. He was under the power of an evil spirit, that took him; when the fit seized him, he suddenly cried out, and many a time his shrieks had pierced the heart of his tender father. This malicious and occasioned that delightful allusion to this scene which we find in II Peter 1:15-18. which he should accomplish—"was to fulfil." at Jerusalem—Mark the historical character and local features which Christ's death assumed to these glorified men—as important as it is charming—and see on ch. 2:11. What now may be gathered from this statement? (1) That a dying Messiah is the great article of the true Jewish theology. For a long time the Church had fallen clean away from the faith of this article, and even from a preparedness to receive it. But here we have that jewel raked out of the dunghill of Jewish traditions, and by the true representatives of the Church of old made the one subject of talk with Christ Himself. (2) The adoring gratitude of glorified men for His undertaking to accomplish such a decease; their felt dependence upon it for the glory in which they appeared; their profound interest in the progress of it, their humble solaces and encouragements to go through with it; and their sense of its peerless and overwhelming glory. "Go, matchless, adored One, a Lamb to the slaughter! rejected of men, but chosen of God and precious; dishonored, abhorred, and soon to be slain by men, but worshipped by cherubim, ready to be greeted by all heaven. In virtue of that decease we are here; our all is suspended on it and wrapped up in it. Thine every step is watched by us with ineffable interest; and though it were too high an honor to us to be permitted to drop a word of cheer into that precious but now clouded spirit, yet, as the first fruits of harvest; the very joy set before Him, we cannot choose but tell Him that what is the depth of shame to Him is covered with glory in the eyes of Heaven, that the Cross to Him is the Crown to us, that that 'decease' is all our salvation and all our desire." And who can doubt that such a scene did minister deep cheer to that spirit? 'Tis said they "talked" not to Him, but "with Him"; and if they told Him how glorious His decease was, might He not fitly reply, "I know it, but your voice, as messengers from heaven come down to tell it Me, is music in Mine ears." 32. and when they were awake—so, certainly, the most commentators: but if we translate literally, it should be "but having kept awake" [MEYER, ALFORD]. Perhaps "having roused themselves up" [OLSHAUSEN] may come near enough to the literal sense; but from the word used we can gather no more than that they shook off their drowsiness. It was night, and the Lord seems to have spent the whole night on the mountain (vs. 37). saw his glory . . .—The emphasis lies on "saw," qualifying them to become "eye-witnesses of His majesty" (II Pet. 1:16). 33. they departed—Ah! bright manifestations in this vale of tears are always "departing" manifestations. 34, 35. a cloud—not one of our watery clouds, but the Shekinah-cloud (see on Matt. 23:39), the pavilion of the manifested presence of God with His people, what Peter calls "the excellent" of "magnificent glory" (II Pet. 1:17). a voice—"such a voice," says Peter emphatically; "and this voice [he adds] we heard, when we were with Him in the holy mount" (II Pet. 1:17, 18). 35. my beloved Son . . . hear him—reverentially, implicitly, alone. 36. Jesus was found alone—Moses and Elias are gone. Their work is done, and they have disappeared from the scene, feeling no doubt with their fellow servant the Baptist, "He must increase, but I must decrease." The cloud too is gone, and the naked majestic Christ, braced in spirit, and enshrined in the reverent affection of His disciples, is left—to suffer! kept it close—feeling, for once at least, that such things were unmeet as yet for the general gaze.

37-45. DEMONIAC AND LUNATIC BOY HEALED—CHRIST'S SECOND EXPLICIT ANNOUNCEMENT OF HIS DEATH AND RESURRECTION. (See on Mark 9:14-32). And one of the multitude answered, and said, Master, I have brought unto thee my son—"mine only child" (Luke 9:38). which hath a dumb spirit—a spirit whose operation had the effect of rendering his victim speechless, and deaf also (vs. 25). In Matthew's report of the speech (17:15), the father says "he is lunatic"; this being another and most distressing effect of the possession. And wheresoever he taketh him, he teareth him; and he foameth, and gnasheth with his teeth, and pineth away—rather, "becomes withered," "dried up," or "paralyzed"; as the same word is everywhere else rendered in the New Testament. Some additional particulars are given by Luke, and by our Evangelist below. "Lo," says he in Luke 9: 39, "a spirit taketh him, and he suddenly crieth out; and it teareth him that he foameth again, and bruising him hardly [or with difficulty] departeth from him."

ALBERT BARNES:

32. "Heavy with sleep." Borne down with sleep—oppressed, overcome with sleep. It may seem remarkable that they should fall asleep on such an occasion; but we are to bear in mind that this may have been in the night, and that they were weary with the toils of the day. Besides, they did not fall asleep while the transfiguration lasted. While Jesus was praying, or perhaps after he closed, they fell asleep. While they were sleeping his countenance was changed, and Moses and Elias appeared. The first that they saw of it was after they awoke, having been probably awakened by the shining of the light around them.
—Popular Commentary

A bright cloud overshadowed them. A cloud was frequently the symbol of the Divine Presence. This is my beloved Son. "This is My Son, the beloved One, in whom I have delighted," or "been well pleased." God adds His testimony of approbation to what was spoken of the sufferings of Christ by Moses and Elijah, thus showing that the sacrificial economy of the old covenant was in itself of no worth, but as it referred to the grand atonement which Jesus was about to make. Therefore He says, "In Him have I delighted," intimating that it was in Him alone, as typified by those sacrifices, that He had delighted through the whole course of the legal administration; and that it was only in reference to the death of His Son that He accepted the offerings and oblations made to Him under the old covenant. Hear . . . him. The disciples wished to detain Moses and Elijah that they might hear them, but God shows that the law which had been in force, and the prophets which had prophesied, until now, must all give place to Jesus; and He alone must now be attended to, as "the way, the truth, and the life," for no man could now come unto the Father but through Him.

35. This is my beloved Son. Instead of "the beloved One," some MSS. and versions have "the chosen One"; and the Aethiopic translator, as in several other cases, to be sure of the true reading, retains both.

39. A spirit taketh him. This very phrase is used by heathen writers when they speak of supernatural influence.

MATTHEW HENRY

spirit tore him, and bruised him, and departed not from him but with great difficulty. What mischief doth Satan do where he gets possession! But happy they that have access to Christ! 4. How defective the disciples were in their faith. Though Christ had given them power over unclean spirits, yet they could not cast out this evil spirit, v. 40. Either they distrusted the power they were to fetch in strength from, or they did not exert themselves in prayer as they ought; for this Christ reproved them. 5. How effectual the cure was, which Christ wrought upon this child, v. 42. Christ can do that for us which his disciples cannot: Jesus rebuked the unclean spirit. The devil threw the child down, and tore him, as if he would have pulled him to pieces. But one word from Christ healed the child, and made good the damage the devil had done him. He delivered him again to his father. When our children are recovered from sickness, we must receive them as delivered to us again, receive them as life from the dead. It is comfortable to receive them from the hand of Christ: "Here, take this child, and be thankful; take it, and bring it up for me, for thou hast it again from me." With such cautions as these, parents should receive their children from Christ's hands, and then with comfort put them again into his hands.

Verses 43–50

I. The impression which Christ's miracles made upon all that beheld them (v. 43): They were all amazed at the mighty power of God. Their wonder was universal: they wondered every one. The causes of it were universal: they wondered at all things which Jesus did; all his actions had something uncommon and surprising in them.

II. The notice Christ gave to his disciples of his approaching sufferings: The Son of man shall be delivered into the hands of men. That is here implied which is expressed by the other evangelists: They shall kill him. But that which is peculiar here is, 1. The connection of this with what goes next before, of the admiration with which the people were struck at beholding Christ's miracles (v. 43): While they all wondered at all things which Jesus did, he said this to his disciples. They had a fond conceit of his temporal kingdom, and that he should reign, in secular pomp and power; and now they thought that this mighty power of his would easily effect the thing. Therefore Christ takes this occasion to tell them again that he was so far from having men delivered into his hands that he must be delivered into the hands of men. 2. The solemn preface with which it is introduced: "Let these sayings sink down into your ears. Admit what I say, and submit to it." Let it sink down into your hearts; so the Syriac and Arabic read it. The word of Christ does us no good, unless we let it sink down into our heads and hearts. 3. The unaccountable stupidity of the disciples. It was said in Mark, They understood not that saying. It was plain enough, but they would not understand it in the literal sense; and they could not understand it in any other, and were afraid to ask him lest they should be undeceived and awaked out of their pleasing dream. But it is here added that it was hidden from them, that they perceived it not. We cannot think that it was in mercy hidden from them, lest they should be swallowed up with overmuch sorrow at the prospect of it; but that it was a paradox, because they made it so to themselves.

III. The rebuke Christ gave to his disciples for their disputing among themselves which should be greatest, v. 46–48. This passage we had before, and, the more is the pity, we shall meet with the like again.

1. Ambition of honour, and strife for superiority and precedency, are sins that most easily beset the disciples of our Lord Jesus. They flow from corruptions which they are highly concerned to subdue and mortify, v. 46. They that expect to be great in this world commonly aim high, and nothing will serve them short of being greatest; this exposes them to a great deal of temptation and trouble, which they are safe from that are content to be little, to be least, to be less than the least.

2. Jesus Christ is perfectly acquainted with the thoughts and intents of our hearts: He perceived their thoughts, v. 47. Thoughts are words to him, and whispers are loud cries.

3. Christ will have his disciples to aim at that honour which is to be obtained by a quiet humility, and not at that which is to be obtained by a restless and aspiring ambition. Christ took a child, and set him by him, v. 47 (for he always expressed a tenderness and kindness for little children). (1) Let them be of the temper of this child, humble and quiet, and easy to itself. Let them be willing to be the least, if that would contribute anything to their usefulness. (2) Let them assure themselves that this was the way

Bring him unto me—The order to bring the patient to Him was instantly obeyed; when, lo! as if conscious of the presence of his Divine Tormentor, and expecting to be made to quit, the foul spirit rages and is furious, determined to die hard, doing all the mischief he can to this poor child while yet within his grasp.

And they brought him unto him: and when he saw him, straightway the spirit tare him—Just as the man with the legion of demons, "when he saw Jesus, ran and worshipped Him" (ch. 5:6), so this demon, when he saw Him, immediately "tare him." The feeling of terror and rage was the same in both cases.

43-45. the mighty power of God—"the majesty" or "mightiness" of God in this last miracle, the transfiguration, etc.: the divine grandeur of Christ rising upon them daily. By comparing Matthew 17:22, and Mark 9:30, we gather that this had been the subject of conversation between the Twelve and their Master as they journeyed along.

44. these sayings—not what was passing between them about His grandeur [MEYER, etc.], but what He was now to repeat for the second time about His sufferings [DE WETTE, STIER, ALFORD, etc.]; i.e., "Be not carried off your feet by all this grandeur of Mine, but bear in mind what I have already told you, and now distinctly repeat, that that Sun in whose beams ye now rejoice is soon to set in midnight gloom." "The Son of man," says Christ, "into the hands of men"—a remarkable antithesis (also in Matt. 17:22, and Mark 9:31). 45. and they feared—"insomuch that they feared." Their most cherished ideas were so completely dashed by such announcements, that they were afraid of laying themselves open to rebuke by asking Him any questions.

46-48. STRIFE AMONG THE TWELVE, WHO SHOULD BE GREATEST—JOHN REBUKED FOR EXCLUSIVENESS. 46-48. (See on Matt. 18:1-5.)

And he took a child—"a little child" (Matt. 18:2); but the word is the same in both places, as also in Luke 9:47. and set him in the midst of them: and when he had taken him in his arms—This beautiful trait is mentioned by our Evangelist alone. he said unto them—Here we must go to Matthew (18:3, 4) for the first of this answer: "Verily I say unto you, except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of Heaven:" i.e., "Conversion must be thorough; not only must the heart be turned to God in general, and from earthly to heavenly things, but in particular, except ye be converted from that carnal ambition which still rankles within you, into that freedom from all such feelings which ye see in this child, ye have neither part nor lot in the kingdom at all; and he who in this feature has most of the child, is highest there." Whosoever, therefore, shall "humble himself as this little child, the same is greatest in the kingdom of heaven": "for he that is [willing to be] least among you all, the same shall be great" (Luke 9:48).

ADAM CLARKE

42. The devil threw him down, and tare him. See this case considered at large on Matt. xvii. 15-18 and on Mark ix. 14-27.

43. The mighty power. This "majesty" of God. They plainly saw that it was a case in which any power inferior to that of God could be of no avail, and they were deeply struck with the majesty of God manifested in the conduct of the blessed Jesus.

44. Let these sayings sink down into your ears. Or "put these words into your ears." To other words you may lend occasional attention —but to what concerns My sufferings and death you must ever listen. Let them constantly occupy a place in your most serious meditations and reflections.

45. But they understood not. See the note on Mark ix. 32.

46. There arose a reasoning. "A dialogue took place"—one inquired, and another answered, and so on.

to preferment. They that loved Christ would therefore receive them in his name, because they did most resemble him. Christ would take the kindnesses done to them as done to himself: Whosoever shall receive one such child receiveth me; and whosoever receiveth me, receiveth him that sent me; and what greater honour can any man attain to in this world than to have God and Christ own themselves received and welcomed in him?

IV. The rebuke Christ gave to his disciples for discouraging one that honoured him and served him, but was not of their communion, but, upon occasional hearing of Christ, believed in him, and made use of his name with faith and prayer in a serious manner, for the casting out of devils. This man they rebuked and restrained; they would not let him pray and preach, though it was to the honour of Christ. He did not follow Christ with them. Jesus Christ chid them for what they did: "Forbid him not (v. 50), but rather encourage him, for he is carrying on the same design that you are. He will meet you in the same end, though he does not accompany you in the same way. He that is not against us is for us, and therefore ought to be countenanced by us." We need not lose any of our friends, while we have so few, and so many enemies. Those may be found faithful followers of Christ, and, as such, may be accepted of him, though they do not follow with us.

This passage of story we have not in any other of the evangelists. Here they were for putting infidels to death. Christ reprimanded them, for a spirit of bigotry and persecution is directly contrary to the spirit of Christ.
